FOR GOVERNOR
J. B. DAV[illegible]

By yesterday's northern mail [illegible] from New York and Philadelphia, to the 13th instant. In both cities the cholera was decreasing.

In New York, on the 14th, there were 42 new cases 15 deaths; on the 15th, 75 new cases and 26 deaths.

In Philadelphia, on the 14th,—311 new cases and 17 deaths; and on the 15th, 73 new cases and 23 deaths.

There have been no later arrivals [illegible] at any the northern ports, and the demand [illegible] has abated no inte[illegible]

We [illegible] from an authentic [illegible] that five-[illegible] a half of the banks of the state, issuers for the purpose of [illegible] the capital stock of the Union Bank, have been taken in New York, and that the balance may be considered as engaged. This is a full verification [illegible] one of the [illegible] that there is no need of going [illegible] for capital. This bank will [illegible] mammoth [illegible]

He despatched one of the [illegible] Mr. Duerr [illegible] of the Gentily [illegible] with instructions [illegible] dead or alive. About 9 o'clock [illegible] Duerr returned in answer to the Mayor that he [illegible] the body of Mrs. Frederica Fayot, [illegible] the owner, in the cornfield of Mr. [illegible] plantation in the Gentilly road, where it had been [illegible] assassinated. The coroner was in [illegible] of the fact, and [illegible] to the spot [illegible] The [illegible] would [illegible] [illegible] yesterday.

[illegible] the Virginia papers [illegible] arrival of the hon. EDWARD LIVINGSTON [illegible] of state, at Sulphur Springs. On [illegible] Livingston [illegible] CARLTON, was ship there. [illegible] Mr. Daniel Brent, chief clerk of the department of state, is acting secretary of state.

The Louisiana Gazette, at Donaldsonville, [illegible] has hitherto stood neutral in regard to national politics, [illegible] the cause of JACKSON. It has passed into the hands of Mr. Duhy, to those of Mr. Samuel Kerr, recently of this city, and is [illegible] with considerable talent.

The second communication in A Creole, on the subject of "a tunnel from the bend above the city to a point below the English turn," and in reply to the [illegible] received, that is postponed, on account of its [illegible] length, when there is [illegible] and no [illegible] cramped for [illegible] not sufficiently [illegible] of the subject [illegible] interest in [illegible] trov[illegible]

Mr. S. Brown has [illegible] first numbers [illegible] this city, entitled [illegible] Gazette [illegible] a monthly [illegible] being made up of the na[illegible] of the Empire. A weekly Change of the [illegible] sketches of manners, and a dance [illegible] day, might prosper—but the [illegible] probably well provided for [illegible] Nathiel, [illegible] Brown success, for his [illegible] albeit we [illegible] lities. The mechanical [illegible] of the Gazette is [illegible] creditable to the printer.

[illegible] every appearance, the race for the gubernatorial [illegible] Kentucky, between Messrs. Breathitt and Bookner, will have been a very close one. Should the Clay candidate succeed, it will be by a very small majority,—not so large as that by which Mr. Barry was defeated: yet, it must be remembered, general Jackson carried the electoral vote of the state, immediately afterwards, by a concentrated majority of 20,000 votes! A pleasing reminiscence for [illegible] "gloomy talk of the coming prospects." We carry the [illegible] of the Anti-masonic paper at Louisville, as well as [illegible] Advertiser.

[illegible] the opposition papers publish the late resolutions of the [illegible]-planters of this state, approving the conduct of [illegible] Jackson, in relation to the seizure of dissolved foreign [illegible] which has been so [illegible]sly introduced in corps de [illegible] Until [illegible] them, it will be [illegible] [illegible] of the duty upon [illegible] [illegible] those who have [illegible] their rescuers [illegible] professing friends. The friend in need is [illegible] indeed." In approving Gov. Houston's course, they [illegible] of the [illegible] late bill passed [illegible] half a cent on the pound [illegible] be of no avail. [illegible] for the consumption of [illegible] other [illegible] have been introduced in [illegible]

We have received the [illegible] of the Louisiana Republican [illegible] published in Philadelphia. We are pleased [illegible] patronage has been obtained to enable the editor of this paper to continue his valuable [illegible] which have proved most [illegible] spirit. The appearance of the sheet is highly creditable [illegible] and we take occasion to commend it to the patriotic [illegible] in this city. The agent, in New Orleans, is Mr. [illegible] M'Greg[illegible]

Among the various charges urrayed against ANDREW JACKSON, by the enemies of his country's friends, none has been more emphatically urged than that of a general proscription of all public officers. Whether a judicious rotation of all public officers [illegible] ment, sound in republican [illegible] and salutary [illegible] ains for the people as a [illegible] of the last [illegible] resort, to determine [illegible] but the accusation is without the shadow of foundation. Among the great body of officers collected in the city of Washington, the removals have been but as [illegible] chiefly on account of misconduct, or for bad character; yet a large majority were notoriously in the interests of the opposition, to whom they were formerly [illegible] to their stations. In the whole government [illegible] complaints were loud[illegible] American people [illegible] which their opponents never es[illegible] passed upon the injustice of these charges. They know that the election of Andrew Jackson was not the mere ordinary succession of one executive to another, but the express result of a revolution in public opinion, based on the just condemnation of ancient and deeply rooted abuses. With the first, the fourth auditor might [illegible] to consume his illegotten gains, and the [illegible] to revel in the security of "good old [illegible] the last administration was supplanted for more [illegible] sins; and the only surprise is that the work [illegible] be executed with so little change in the in[illegible]

[illegible] a sensible article on the [illegible] meeting of seceding Irishmen in Philadelphia, from the Saturday Courier, a well managed [illegible] miscellaneous [illegible] Somerville, which takes no part in politics [illegible] an attempt is exposed.

The Philadelphia [illegible] Sentinel of the city also condemns the [illegible] in [illegible] to [illegible]. It states that in their [illegible] cemetery in the city was ransacked, and the names of about [illegible] hundred deceased persons copied from the tomb-stones [illegible] from the [illegible] of the meeting [illegible] after all, the names of the [illegible] in instration [illegible] consent. Five hundred at least, [illegible] discipline of [illegible] patriot countrymen [illegible] and by [illegible] O'Connell, or to what he finely [illegible] the wounds of their brethren [illegible] [illegible] Irishmen [illegible] the Irish [illegible] people [illegible] their [illegible] are rich and unoffending. They form a large and valuable portion of our population. They have done much [illegible] advantage to our peaceful [illegible] citizens [illegible] common good we [illegible] assume a decided control over the affairs of state, which [illegible] American [illegible] and [illegible] assuming their claims to superior consideration, [illegible] that [illegible] be done in order to gratify their views and wishes we cease to regard them as [illegible] [illegible] an unjustifiable foreign interference [illegible] which we [illegible] submit. Suppose the naturalized Irishmen on the eve of the late war had met and [illegible] the declaration of that war, what [illegible] would have been said, what would have been done, by those who are foremost in the present measure? [illegible] thought of such an assemblage would have lain in [illegible] than that of those we now speaking. With the [illegible] meeting we have nothing to [illegible] the anti-American feeling it is calculated [illegible] produce there can be no doubt. There is enough of so[illegible] already, without fostering and encouraging national prejudices and national [illegible] in the minds of those who ought to know no other motive for the support or opposition of men and measures, than the public good.

The effect of this meeting will be felt hereafter. We do not mean in reference to the coming contest; how far it may influence that we neither know nor care, but it will be felt in more important matters. The example once given, and our men are passively submitting to, but sustained and encouraged by those whose whole course of doctrine and conduct has been hitherto vehemently opposed, will soon be followed, and when it is too late the evil will be seen and deplored.

In concluding these hasty, but sincere remarks, it is but justice to say that many highly respectable Irishmen, including both friends and foes of the present general administration, heartily regret the spirit in which the late meeting originated, and regret that any portion of their countrymen should thus have drawn a line of distinction between themselves and their fellow citizens.

From the Baltimore Republican and C. Advertiser.

CLAY GIVEN UP.

The prospects of Mr. Clay have become so desperate that his friends are rapidly abandoning him.—Charles Hammond describes his standing some time ago, from the consideration that it was perfectly idle to attempt any longer to support him. The whigs generally in New York have left him and gone over to the support of the Antimasonic ticket, for governor, lieut. governor and all. Our neighbors of the Chronicle intimated, some time ago their willingness to abandon him provided a strong candidate could be found with whom to battle with Andrew Jackson, and now, behold you, they go for Wirt and Antimasonry! They announce that the Clay men in Pennsylvania have agreed to relinquish the support of the electoral ticket, and propose to meet their convention and adopt the antimasonic ticket; and they are as much delighted with it as they had found a raven's nest! They say: "The National Republican Convention is to be assembled for the purpose, as we learn, of withdrawing their ticket, and uniting on that of the antimasonic party. This will defeat the Jackson ticket, and put the election of general Jackson by the people out of the question."—They say further: "We do not believe the intelligent Jackson men make any calculation on obtaining the vote of New York; and as their expectations of carrying Pennsylvania were based on the apparent division among the opposition—what prospect will they have of his elections after the intended amalgamation shall have taken place? To those who are on the fence, the calculation may be useful, and it might also be a saving of much breath and labour to the zealous devotees of Jacksonism.—In fact, they are rowing against both wind and tide, or we have greatly mistaken the true signs of the times."

We know not what our neighbors would denominate "intelligent Jackson man," nor is it perhaps very important to inquire. If we might judge from the language which they generally employ, especially when, we might be led to infer that they do not believe there is any intelligence in society; and we are strongly inclined to the belief that this is the ground upon which they place the division they have made. We venture to assert that there is no Jackson man, possessing even ordinary means of information, who doubts the success of the Jackson ticket in New York; and we have abundant reason for believing that the intelligent Clay men do not expect to succeed with their contrivance of uniting the Clay antimasonic parties in the support of the antimasonic ticket. We will venture to assert, moreover, that the expectations of our friends of carrying the vote of Pennsylvania have not been based on the apparent division among the opposition. They have been, and still are, very indifferent about the attempts that are making to concentrate the efforts of the different fragments of the opposition. As long as we place any reliance upon the virtue and intelligence of the people, we cannot permit ourselves to doubt that such attempts, to unite the efforts of two such parties, will receive their merited reward; and we are not how soon they may make the same attempt in Pennsylvania, and in Maryland also, which has been made in New York?

But what must the Clay masons of Maryland think of the exultation of the Chronicle at the prospect, as it is pretended there is, that their brethren in New York and Pennsylvania will vote for an anti-masonic candidate for president, and give up the support of their own? Would they consent to pursue such a course? Can they expect or wish that others should do what they would scorn! Are they willing to rest their political hopes upon a union which they must despise and at odds with? It is not simply an abandonment of their own candidate and their own principles, but an alliance with a party decidedly hostile to their principles, and hostile to them as individuals on account of their principles, for the support of a presidential candidate, without any avowed political principles; but pledged to pursue the measures, for principles in no wise connected with the administration of our national affairs. Can they candidly and sincerely say the subject to their hearts and wish success to such a scheme; or can they approve of the conduct of the Chronicle in proposing it? We put it to their reason and their conscience and if they will treat it as nonsense and as soon we are sure they will detest the contrivance, and despise its authors.

But the beauty of the matter is that Mr. Clay is abandoned. Clay is completely [illegible] in the mountain. As the mountain would not go to the Prophet, Mahomet has concluded to go to the mountain. The Chronicle has been looking for a stronger candidate than Mr. Clay, and it has now found him. Mr. Wirt, the antimasonic candidate; and forthwith Mr. Clay is abandoned. As what is to result from all this? We suppose it even possible for the Clay men to give the votes of N. Y. and Pennsylvania to Messrs. Wirt and Mr West, which we regard as utterly out of the question, still it is no possible case that the Clay men and antimasons united succeed in electing either of the two candidates. They do not even pretend to possess the power to do it by the vote of the people; but their great effort is to carry the election into the house of representatives, where they pretend to entertain some hopes of success. But suppose they should succeed in their attempt to prevent an election by the people, what is their prospect? Desperate indeed. The members who will have the election to make, have been chosen, and we know their feelings, and it is known that a majority of the states as represented in the house are in favour of Jackson.—That there may be no mistake about the matter, we will name the states: Maine, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri, are all known to be represented by a majority of Jackson men, who will certainly vote for Jackson, in case the election should devolve upon them. If Messrs. Daniel and Wickliffe, or either of them, should receive the feelings of the party by whom they were elected, Kentucky will also be in his favor, which would give him eleven votes of fourteen out of the twenty four states, of those two non-slave holding states against Jackson the vote of Kentucky would be lost, and all thirteen votes would seem to be necessary, which is impossible for the Mr. Clay or Mr. Wirt to obtain in the states. Our opponents are well aware of this, and they know Jackson is sure to be elected, and they are trying to surprise by defeating the success of the Clay ticket. We [illegible] the success of the Clay ticket, which they have [illegible] the hopes of the Jackson party, and they [illegible] the fence men [illegible] has thrown its net [illegible] votes. Truly the [illegible] wrong age.

BONAGE OF THE RICHMOND WHIG.

We [illegible] since a sample of the [illegible] paid homage to [illegible] Telegraph. The Whig looks so much [illegible] in its new connections that it now [illegible] makes obeisance to the proxy of the Telegraph, at [illegible] Jefferson and Times. He calls the [illegible] "a common paper," and [illegible] the [illegible] course" in charging the president with having [illegible] and deliberately violated the constitution of the [illegible]

The Jeffersonian and Times, a malignant Calhoun paper, endeavoring in Virginia, to subserve the cause of nullifyer—It is a most [illegible] counterfeit assuming the name of Jefferson, to disguise his principles and pretending to support the [illegible] Jackson to betray it. The panic [illegible] more a Jeffersonian or a Jacksonian, than the Richmond Whig is a real Whig.—Globe.

Novel Writing.—Mr. D'Israeli thus describes the rapidity with which he wrote "Vivian Gray." I took up my pen, held it [illegible] I thought to myself what will be the result, but I said nothing. I began writing some hours before noon, and I never ceased. My thoughts, my passion, the rushing invention, were too quick for my pen. Page [illegible] page; as a sheet was finished I threw it on the floor. I was amazed at the rapid and prolific production. And I could not stop to wonder. In half a dozen hours I sank back, utterly exhausted, with an aching frame. I rang the bell, ordered some refreshments and walked about the room. The wine invigorated me and warmed up my sinking fancy, which, however, required little fuel. I set to again, and it was midnight before I retired to my bed. The next day I again rose early, and with a bottle of wine at my side, for I was determined not to be disturbed. I dashed at it again. I was perfectly successful. This day I finished my first volume. The third morning I had no inclination to write. I read over and corrected what I had composed. I [illegible] my fancy and, in the afternoon, I executed seven chapters of my second volume. Each day, [illegible] I had not in the least lost my desire of writing, it was slower. It was necessary for me, each day, to commence work from the beginning, before I felt the existence of the characters sufficiently real to invent their adventures.—Nevertheless, on the morning of the seventh day, the second and last volume was finished."

The "citizen king" of the French, appears to have a very laudable zeal to provide for his family. One of his sons-in-law is about to marry the new Belgian king, report says, and the duke of Orleans is to propose for the hand of a Russian princess, and the duke of Nemours to wed donna Maria of Portugal. The rest of them will in due time be parcelled off among the royal families great or small, with which Europe is so plentifully stocked, and numberless ties of blood and friendship will thus be formed between the new dynasty of France and the old legitimates the holy alliance, and [illegible] The hope that was felt at the era of the revolution of July, that the new monarch would join the rallying point of liberal principles in opposition to despotic power, that he would place himself at the head of a new order of things in Europe, hostile to the divine right doctrines and the passive obedience of subjects, must receive a severe shock, not only from his [illegible] policy, adopted at home, but the evident eagerness with which every occasion is seized to propitiate the sympathies of the absolute governments, and multiply the bonds of connexion and alliance with them. We do not believe it possible that Louis Philippe can succeed in identifying himself with the reigning dynasties. Their bigotry [illegible] all popular principles will never permit them to receive him cordially among the brotherhood of legitimate monarchs. They may temporise for a while, while the nation is apparently [illegible] against them,—they may fawn upon him while he is strong, as they did upon Napoleon, and give his family their sons and daughters in marriage as they did to the Bonapartes; but he deceives himself if he believes that they will ever forgive him for his offences against the divine right of Charles the tenth, and for calling himself king by the grace of the people. That he is deceiving himself in thus laboring in opposition to the spirit of the age, and courting the [illegible] enemies of [illegible] is to be deeply lamented, because it imposes the necessity of other struggles on the part of the French people to secure and advance the institutions which they hoped for from his energy and liberalism. He compels them to resort to a new organization of parties, new conflicts, perhaps new and violent excesses; the object of which will be to recover the ground upon which they stood when they confided the guardianship of these principles to him. He cannot defeat those advances, but by checking and thwarting the real friends and undoubted rights of the French, as well as [illegible] policy towards other nations; he may succeed, [illegible] establishing him self firmly, as he desires, but in [illegible] temporary discredit upon the cause of liberty [illegible] with more scenes of violence and excitement.—Balt. American.

Mr Clay promises to be [illegible] scarcely [illegible] eminent as a poet, than he already is [illegible] orator. The lines found upon his desk in the state, on the 12th of July, together with the following, which [illegible] uncommonly plaintive [illegible] the ladies of "the society," it is said, are [illegible] forming them, [illegible] sufficient proof of this. It would be cold enough, even in his retirement, [illegible] rival the all hyed poets of America, and [illegible] Chesterfield, in the double fame of a statesman and minstrel.

THE ADVOCATE'S APOLOGY.

A song of sadness and promise, to the crestfallen Prince of Whigs.

Tune—"My heart and lute."

I gave thee all! I could no more,
However large the fee;
My voice, and vote were all the store
I bargained for with thee—
A voice, whose silver tones revealed
The price at which they sell—
A vote, that shows how much I feel
For those that pay me well
I gave thee all! I could no more,
However large the fee:
My voice and vote were all my store:
I gave them both to thee.

But voice and vote have failed, alas!
The well paid fee to clear
Two-thirds have still refused to pass
The bill, and [illegible]
Be patient yet; you [illegible] the bank
Of Harry's [illegible] reign;
Let go like Dan [illegible] the chunk,
And try your chance again.
Yes; give him all! I'll ask no more
Than just to make his fee
He'll put it into common store
And settle it with me.
