MEETING OF THE LEGISLATURE.—The House was in secret session, but it is understood that the joint resolution withdrawing the school fund for the purpose of arming the State, which passed the Senate, has been also adopted by the House. The Harris Military bill which passed the Senate at the last session is said to be under discussion in the House. This bill provides for the division of the State into military districts, each to be commanded by a Major-General. Every able-bodied man between the ages of eighteen and forty-eight is compelled to do military duty or pay a fine of $150. Anybody speaking disrespectfully of the Governor or Legislature is to be subjected to trial by court martial, and every citizen is required to take an oath of allegiance to the State of Missouri only. A detachment of forty State militia was sent out on the Pacific Railroad to guard the Gasconade and Osage bridges on that route.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

TEXAS, VICTORIA.—It is rumored that Col. Reeves, who was stationed above San Antonio with 600 United States troops, has been obliged to surrender to General Van Dorn. The force of the latter was so large that resistance was useless.

VIRGINIA, WHEELING, May 10.—The Convention to form a separate State west of the Alleghanies meets at Washington Hall on Monday. It is expected that thirty counties will be represented, including Hancock, Brooke, Ohio, Marshall, Monongahela, Tyler, Wetzel, Kanawha, Ritchie, Marion, Preston, Taylor, Harrison, Wood, Lewis, Mason, Wayne, Jackson, &c. These counties are firm for the Union, no matter what Eastern Virginia may do.

Two companies of United States troops have been mustered into service at Wheeling by Major Oakes, late of Texas.

The United States Government encourages the Union movement in this section of Virginia. 4,000 bayonet rifles have been sent here for this purpose.

Hon. John S. Carlile, the leading spirit of the Union movement, is now here, closeted with prominent men, perfecting a schedule for operations.

The calculation is to elect a Governor, members of the Legislature, United States Senators and Representatives, and in all other respects act as if it were a sovereign State. Thirty-three counties are already in the league.

The Petersburg Express has the following paragraph: "HESSIANS.—The City Government of Boston are offering twenty dollars per month, beside the regular Government pay, to volunteers to invade the South. So, after all, the thousands who are rushing everywhere in the North to assist the Government, it seems that it is the pay that brings out those volunteers. But the money will not last, and when it is exhausted volunteering in the North will be a slow business.

"HOW THE POOR CREATURES ARE STARVED.—A letter from Danbury, Conn., dated Sunday last, tells how the Yankee contractors are endeavoring to starve the poor devils who have been caught in the enlistment trap, and also how the latter rebelled."

From the Richmond Whig.

A HINT FOR OUR LADIES.—As intercourse with the North has been cut off, and the milliners of Richmond are prevented from making their usual trip to the American Babylon in quest of new styles, the ladies of our city will have to look elsewhere for the "spring fashions." The Southern Confederacy of Atlanta, Ga., speaks of a novelty in ladies' apparel, recently introduced in that city. It says:

"We were pleased to observe yesterday, promenading on Whitehall street, four beautiful young ladies from our neighboring suburban village, wearing Quakers, beautifully trimmed with the Confederate flag, thus—the crown was covered with solid blue, studded with eight bright stars, and the skirt was alternately white and red. The whole was a complete counterpart of our country's flag. From the modest mien, grace and beauty of the wearers, we predict that more stars will be captured, ere long, by some of our brave soldier boys. Mrs. Biring and Mrs. Durand must look sharp for their laurels, or Decatur will secure the patent right of the new style of Quaker."

From the Newbern Progress.

A POLITE INVITATION.—Troops from the South and South-West by thousands continue to pour into Virginia. They all go well armed and equipped, and when Abraham orders his mercenaries to invade Old Virginia, they will be met by not less than 100,000 well drilled and thoroughly disciplined troops, and after the first battle won't the vultures have a good time feasting on Yankee carcasses? Come on, Abraham, you are wanted. Old Scott, we hope, will head the invading force. If so, his bones will be apt to rot on the soil which he has degraded by his treachery.

From the Richmond Dispatch.

FIGHTING MEN OF VIRGINIA.—We are glad to learn that the whole of Virginia is arming to meet the invader, and that there is no disposition to be over-squeamish about what are called "improved arms." The fact is, the old Virginia rifle is as good a weapon as was ever invented. We have 100 000 men who can use that rifle, most of whom are amongst the best marksmen in the world. The 20,000 Confederate troops on their way here may be more thoroughly disciplined than some of our mountaineers, but they cannot be braver men or better shots. As for the fighting men of Virginia, the North, with all its resources, cannot produce such a formidable body.

BENEFITS OF THE BLOCKADE.—The blockade, which Lincoln intends for our injury, is working in exactly the opposite direction. We have heard of no less than four important branches of manufacture (two of them indispensable in time of war) which the blockade has taught us to produce ourselves. One of these is manufactured at less than half the price of the Northern article, and is better in every respect. The truth is, if he will only continue his blockade long enough he will prove the most efficient ally of Southern manufacturing independence that we could possibly command.

NORFOLK AND THE RIVERS.—We are glad to learn that the preparations for the defence of Norfolk are of the most complete character, and that our seaboard city, which bade defiance to the British in the late war, is now able to laugh to scorn the Yankee invaders. We learn, also, that the batteries on the York and James are of a very formidable character, and can sink with ease any fleet that would be foolhardy enough to attempt the passage of the river.

GUERILLA WARFARE.—We must again impress upon our friends throughout Virginia the value of this species of warfare. Nothing harasses an enemy upon his march as much as the constant harrassing of guerillas. They are an adversary who cannot be caught with ease or avoided. They come unexpectedly, drop their man here and there, are off and on again in a moment, and cause infinite perplexity and danger.

GEORGIA.—ONE STATE WIPED OUT.—Under this head the Columbus Times tells us: "Maryland has ceased to exist. Her boundaries, in fact, remain, but they serve only to designate a territory, over every foot of which a brutal usurper holds undisputed sway, and whose boundaries upon its bosom a people oppressed with a despotism more galling and revolting than any under which Pole or Turk ever groaned. If there ever were a people who deserved so dire a fate, surely Maryland has no right to complain. Fortune has never before granted the opportunity to man to strike so grand and effective a blow for freedom as that which Marylanders have deliberately spurned. If a few bold and resolute men had properly directed the tide of feeling that was generated by the first uprising at Baltimore, the Abolition cabal at Washington would now be dissolved and the State spared her present degradation. If her Abolition Governor had been beheaded on the spot, and a man of brains, spirit and nerve put in his place, who would have marched a few thousand men upon Washington, calling upon Virginia for a like movement from the West, the work would have been done. Lincoln and Scott would now be prisoners of war or disconsolate fugitives from justice, and the independence and sovereignty of Maryland would be an act. But the golden opportunity was allowed to pass unimproved. The generous aspirations of the people have been repressed by the timorous counsels and dastardly conduct of their rulers, fifty thousand abolition Huns sit down upon her soil ready to quench the first spark of resistance to their brutal tyranny, and the proclamation of martial law throughout her borders places the capstone upon her ruin. For all this she can blame herself alone. A brave and free people stood upon her borders eager to respond to her beckoning for assistance, but she gave it not. Fuit Ilium may furnish the model for her epitaph."

MILLEN, May 7.—Never in the history of this country has such a sight been seen as was witnessed this evening. The Clinch Rifles were greeted at every station and cross-road between Augusta and Millen by enthusiastic crowds. At several points young and beautiful ladies, numbering from sixty to eighty, were ranged along the railroad with rifles in their fair and delicate hands, and presented arms to the Clinch Rifles as they passed, covering them with showers of bouquets. The Clinch Rifles have taken Millen virtually by storm. Never did a Zouave or other soldier win greater applause. In fact, their progress thus far has been attended with that appreciation ever manifested for this favorite and universally popular military corps.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—CHARLESTON IS DISBANDING ALREADY.—Two regiments, lately in service on Morris Island, were disbanded on Monday week, and a battalion of artillery has since followed them. One of the infantry regiments was asked to go to Virginia, but the troops refused, on the ground that their six months' term of service had expired.

From the Charleston Courier.

THE LINCOLN RECRUITS OF MASSACHUSETTS.—It was, no doubt, the profound policy of Lincoln and his faction to throw the operatives of the North out of employ, to secure the recruits for the army of coercion. Starvation produces a certain sort of valor, and a hungry belly may stimulate patriotism to a kind of courage which, on a good feed, will risk the encounter with a bullet. It appears that the Lincoln recruits from Massachusetts, at Baltimore, were in large proportion cobblers. The Revolution seems to have affected their craft more than any other, according to some of the accounts; their vocation gave them admirable facilities in the fight, especially in running; they used their soles expeditiously, and took a free fight with their soles (souls)—not one of them apparently being anxious, under the fire of Baltimore brickbats, to see his last.

TENNESSEE.—The Mayor of Nashville has issued a proclamation setting forth that, as it is the determination of the authorities to preserve the peace, all complaints or suspicions against persons of Northern birth can be lodged with him for investigation, and that everything necessary will be done.

KENTUCKY, FRANKFORT, May 10.—Messengers arrived here this morning, saying that three or four hundred negroes had armed themselves and formed into a company, and were committing depredations; that the whites undertook to disarm them, and that several were killed. The Governor has sent General Buckner to ascertain the truth of the matter. He has not yet returned. The military are in readiness.

The telegraph operator at Patriot, Ind., telegraphs that he has been called upon to aid in quelling a negro insurrection, which broke out last night in Owen and Gallatin counties, in Kentucky.

Great fears were felt, as it was supposed the negroes were led on by two or three white citizens of Kentucky. The people are gathering all their forces to put down the rebellion, and runners have been sent into Indiana for assistance. Captain Wells, of Rising Sun, Ind., who has a company ready for that State's service, has telegraphed that he would send his men and arms to their assistance, if needed.

The telegraph line has been down all the morning between Patriot and Vevay, so we are without any news from the latter place. It is thought the line has been cut by the insurgents to prevent the transmission of the news of the insurrection.

The Kentucky Legislature is a little suspicious of Governor Magoffin's Secession proclivities, and have called for the correspondence between him and the Confederate States relating to their requisition on Kentucky for troops and his reply thereto. They have under consideration the propriety of authorizing the banks to suspend specie payments.

From the Jackson Mississippian.

MISSISSIPPI.—THE WAR SPIRIT.—And still they come from the North, the South, the East, the West, literally besieging the Executive Department and the War Office with earnest applications for enrolment in the service of the Confederate States. Every train of cars brings officers and agents upon this errand of patriotism. Mississippi has now eighteen hundred gallant men on duty at Pensacola, and requisitions have been made for eight hundred additional troops. In one week from this moment every man called for can be under arms and on the line of march. Never did any people respond with more alacrity to the summons of their Government, and evince greater eagerness to prove their manhood, and their resolve to make good their declaration of independence of the Abolition Government.

From the Memphis (Tenn.) Appeal.

ARMS IN THE SOUTH.—The erroneous opinion seems prevalent in some quarters that the South is totally destitute of arms and ammunition for her defence, and such an idea has actually been urged as a sufficient argument against the blow which she has recently struck for her independence. An estimate of the amount on hand, however, will demonstrate the folly of the fears which such a false opinion may have engendered, and show our state of preparation for resistance. The following seizures have been made since the inception of the Southern movement:

Baton Rouge	70 000
Alabama arsenal	20,000
Elizabeth, North Carolina	30,000
Fayetteville, North Carolina	35 000
Charleston	23,000
Harper's Ferry	7 000
Norfolk	7,000
Other places	10[illegible],000
Total	290,000

The State arms previously purchased by the State amounts to:

Alabama	80,000
Virginia	73,000
Louisiana	30,[illegible]00
Georgia	[illegible]2,000
South Carolina	45 000
Mississippi	50,[illegible]00
Florida	17,000
Total	417,000

The grand total thus amounts to 707,000 stand of arms, besides 2[illegible]0,000 revolvers, which are said to be on hand at various points. We have not included in the above the arms owned by the States of Tennessee, Arkansas, Texas, Kentucky, Maryland and Virginia, which will increase the number at least to 1 000 000. Besides this, there are thought to be two millions of private arms, which will answer all practical purposes in case of invasion by the enemy. In the face of the above figures, let no one deny that the South is sufficiently well armed to drive the last minion of Federal power from her soil, in any possible emergency.

Comment by the Petersburg Express.

No mention is made of cannon. The eight cotton States are said to have under their control at least two thousand cannon. The Gosport Navy Yard contained, when seized by Virginia, some 4,000 cannon. Bellona Arsenal, in Virginia, has several hundred cannon, and the State Armory at Richmond several hundred more. An arsenal was seized at Augusta, Georgia, by the authorities of that State, but the number of arms secured we do not recollect. Of private arms in Virginia, there is no computing the number, but the figures, if they could be correctly ascertained, would doubtless foot up millions. If the Northern myrmidons base their hopes of subjugation on the fact that we are destitute of means of defence, they are doomed to disappointment, as the day of trial, when it does come, will abundantly prove.

FLORIDA.—LATEST FROM PENSACOLA.—The Columbus (Ga.) Times of the 7th says: "There has been a rumor for the past few days that Captain Brown, the commander of Fort Pickens, who superseded Lieutenant Slemmer, had made formal demand for the surrender of the forts, barracks and navy yard at Warrington. We give this merely as a rumor, as nothing official upon the subject has been made public. Unless the attack is made within a very few days General Bragg will be in a condition to bid defiance to the Federal troops, and can not only meet successfully any attack, but will be able to reduce Fort Pickens in a short time, without receiving material injury from their fire. A line of sand batteries has been erected, extending from the navy yard to the lighthouse, some fourteen or fifteen in all, which, when the guns now on the way down are mounted, will prove safe positions for our men, and points from which Fort Pickens can be punished severely. That a fight is anticipated here within a few days is evident by the actions of the Government. An order was given on Saturday to a merchant in Montgomery for 5,000 sand bags, to be completed immediately, and large quantities of shot, shell and cannon are being hurried down. General Bragg now has nearly 9,000 men under his command, all impatient for the fight to begin. The passengers who come from Pensacola bring very little of interest from that point, as visitors are not allowed within a certain distance of the camp, unless indeed, with a special permit from General Bragg, which is not always to be obtained."

From the Mobile Tribune.

ALABAMA.—IMPORTANT DIPLOMATIC REVELATIONS.—Dr. F. de Castro, agent for the Brazilian Government, was in the city last Tuesday on his way to New Orleans. His errand, as we infer, is to inquire especially into the results of a blockade of our ports on the interests of his Government.

We are not, perhaps, violating any courtesy in saying that he informed us that the sympathies of the foreign Ministers at Washington are with the Confederate States. Of course, until the Governments which they represent indicate their policy in respect to the unwise and wicked warfare of the North, no action can be taken by them.

One of the elements of the prosperity of Brazil is negro slavery, and that fact is sufficient to account for the sympathy of its Emperor and his Ministers with our Confederate States. [illegible] we shall have been made, and we be allowed to go our own way, this trade will be learned.

Dr. de Castro has a store of very amusing anecdotes of the President of the Old Concern, but it were not proper to give them to our readers. They serve, we may say, to corroborate some of the stories in respect to Mr. Lincoln which have been published in our papers.

WHAT THE SOUTH EXPECTS.—The Vicksburg Sun says: "England and France will ere the closing of the first campaign have opened a way to those ports from which cotton is shipped, and the South will be blessed with the proceeds of the sale of 4 000 000 of bales."

And the New Orleans Crescent adds: "All desired now from John Bull is the recognition of the Southern Confederacy and two or three British squadrons off the Southern ports or in the Gulf, just to teach Mr. Lincoln the law of nations in regard to blockades."

THE FOREIGN PRESS ON THE WAR.

The London Saturday Review, an able but crotchety organ, has an article in which no preference for either party is professed. It believes, however, that it was the policy of the Southern States to provoke a collision with the Federal Administration, to operate upon the Border States, and to cause them to take sides at once. It also very justly adds that Virginia, as a slave-breeding country, can no more dispense with the cotton districts than the Lincolnshire horse-dealers could do without the London market.

The London Spectator says the North has men, but what is more, has money. In England still [illegible] account has never yet been taken of the vast strength which the North has in reserve—its irrepressible [illegible]. Once aroused, the North will act with all the energy of the Anglo-Saxon race, and it is difficult to conceive of the defeat of 19,000,000 [illegible] the comparatively small population of the Southern States. It concludes by saying the Republic is gone, and predicting that it will carry out the Secession principle till it crumbles into the isolated atoms of separate States.

The London Times, in its reflections upon the opening of hostilities between the Government and the South Carolinians, [illegible] of the bloodless bombardment of Fort Sumpter, observing that even a barrier in difficulty has been attended with more bloodshed. The result being so utterly unlike all they ever heard of American manners, [illegible] Lincoln and Davis were [illegible] each other [illegible]. So far, however, as the first result is concerned, it [illegible] be no doubt, since the North can easier raise a hundred millions than the South can ten. It concludes by saying that, from the very first to the very last, President Lincoln has been baffled with his measures.

The London Shipping Gazette, a paper, despite its commercial name, edited with considerable ability and knowledge of foreign affairs, [illegible] surprise and gratification at the bloodless [illegible] of Fort Sumpter, [illegible] conviction that the North will triumph, since no cause can stand against the moral [illegible] of the world, which every State must have which bases its right upon human slavery.

The London Post, generally considered Lord Palmerston's organ, is very severe on Ex-President Buchanan, saying that had he, upon the first indication of rebellion, sent a few vessels of war to Charleston, the whole movement would have been as easily crushed in the bud as nullification was by Jackson in 1832. It goes on to predicate that the North, having a just and righteous cause, and possessing both the will and the power, cannot fail to reduce the Secessionists to obedience. It also distinctly recognises the right of blockade, by which means the resources of the Confederate States will be destroyed. Its conclusion is so important that we quote it entire: "Upon higher grounds than those of self-interest the people of this country regard the inevitable inconveniences and horrors of civil war which are about to afflict the people of the United States. We may say that the merchants of Liverpool and the manufacturers of Manchester will feel the evil quite as strongly as the producers of the South, who are all for free trade, and the manufacturers of the North, who are for protection at all cost. Upon the progress of humanity in the Western World a great cloud has fallen. We believe that the battle will be fought à l'outrance, and that in the place of one great, powerful and pretentious Republic, we may see three Confederacies equally weak and powerless for good. But the sympathy of the people of England must be with the North, where repudiation of slavery in every shape is a compensation for prohibitory tariffs and restrictive legislation. By means of a maritime war, by privateers and blockades, they can easily reduce the South to obedience, and restore that Union which at one time appeared to be destined to make the United States the dominant power of the New World."

The London Herald, considered as Lord Derby's organ, thinks that President Lincoln planned the attack upon Fort Sumpter, in order to put the South Carolinians in the wrong. It anticipates that he will receive dictatorial powers from the Congress he has summoned for the 4th of July, and that he will distinguish himself by his vigor. The tone of the whole article is more favorable to Lincoln than any of its contemporaries.

The Daily News, in a very severe article on the conduct of the Secessionists, concludes in these words: "Having destroyed the greatness of Union and the prosperity of their country, it only remained for them to destroy its peace, and this was an easy matter."

The Manchester Guardian is the only journal that lays the blame of commencing hostilities with the President. It says that he has, by a long series of blunders, succeeded in driving the Border States into Secession.

The London Weekly Dispatch, the organ of the ultra liberals, is very severe upon the Cotton States, and prophecies their utter humiliation.

The London Examiner, Whig organ, is equally strong in its censure of the South and profession of good feeling towards the North. It, however, rebukes the North for its meanness in the Morrill tariff.

THE REGIMENTS IN WASHINGTON.

THE following is a correct list of the regiments that have reached this city, and reported to the Commandant of the District since the President's Proclamation:

From Massachusetts—The 6th, 5th and 8th Regiments, and Salem Zouaves.

From New York—The 7th, 71st, 12th, 25th, 69th, 28th and 5th Regiments, and Colonel Ellsworth's Fire Brigade.

From Pennsylvania—The 5th, 4th and 6th Regiments, and 1st Artillery.

From Rhode Island—One regiment and a Marine Artillery Company.

From New Jersey—The 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th Regiments.

Troops belonging to the United States service—Sherman's Battery, 2d Artillery, 3d Infantry, and 400 cavalry.

These, with what were stationed here before, and the District militia, volunteers, &c., render the calculation of 31 000 troops not far from correct. The District militia are by no means undesirable aids, under command of Colonel Stone. They have become proficient in drill, and are deservedly well spoken of.

On the 6th May the action of Count Johannes against the Bee Printing Company for a libel, of calling him a soi-disant Count, came on for trial. Mr. Dana defended the Company, and was very severe on pompous Americans who went to Europe plain Jonathan Jones and came back counts de Johannes. The Count replied in an amazingly complacent speech, in which he related his successes. On one of these occasions, he said, Louis Napoleon remarked to him, "Count Johannes, you are the most magnificently audacious man I ever met." To which compliment the Count responded, "I should be extremely sorry to take precedence of your Majesty in that line." The Count claimed that his honors and titles abroad were literally "thrust upon him," while he modestly admitted that his real greatness as an author and orator was all achieved by his own talent and perseverance. The worst of it is that the Count wants to thrust his honors and titles down the American throats. Remembering how unpleasant it was to him to have them forced on him, he should be merciful to his fellow-citizens here. The jury gave him fifteen hundred dollars for being called a soi-disant.

One of the most destructive steamboat conflagrations that has happened for years occurred on the 5th at New Orleans. In the course of a few hours eight steamers were totally destroyed. The fire is considered to be the act of an incendiary.

Mr. SIMONTON, the correspondent of the New York Times, met with a painful accident on Wednesday week in Washington. He was riding in the country in an open carriage, accompanied by his wife, and on passing a station where the advance military companies are located, a musket in the hands of the captain exploded, the ball striking Mr. Simonton in the back, and passing through his body under the right shoulder blade. The horses immediately took fright, and soon threw out both occupants of the carriage, injuring the lady severely. Both were picked up and brought to the city, and though very seriously, are not fatally injured.

On Wednesday night week, at ten o'clock, an unknown man proceeded to the pier foot of Gansevoort street, and after divesting himself of most of his clothing, deliberately plunged into the dock. Captain Walton, of the schooner Mary A. Irving, lying near, saw the act, and sent a boat to rescue the young man, but the effort was unsuccessful. His clothes were taken to the Ninth Ward station-house, where they can be seen. The body has not been recovered.

The Rochester Union says that J. D. Stevens, who was murderously assaulted near his own residence in Pembroke, on Tuesday night week and badly injured, rallied sufficiently next day to be able to give some information about the affair. Mr. S. had some $4,000 with him, which was taken. He says that just before he was knocked down he saw a man walking ahead of him, and almost at once he was felled to the ground. A man, by the name of Norton, residing at Bergen, has been arrested on suspicion of having committed the assault and robbery. He was held for examination until Mr. Stevens can appear against him. Mr. S.'s physicians think his chances of recovery are favorable at present.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c., &c.

CHAPTER XLIX.

And then toward me came
A shape as of a woman; very pale
It was and calm; its cold eyes did not move,
And mine moved not, but only stared on them.
Their fixed awe went through my brain like ice;
A skeleton hand seemed clutching at my heart,
And a sharp chill as of a dank night fog,
Suddenly closed me in.—Prometheus.

Erle had entered the grim, dark old library with feelings of awe rather than reverence. There was so much of the supernatural mixed up with the natural in the dusky aspect of the gloomy chamber, that a painful thrill ran through his frame even as he advanced to the antique bookcase, to withdraw from its dusty shelves that volume which, in his estimation, possessed a priceless value.

The deathlike stillness which reigned around him, the black obscurity which pervaded the room, and which the feeble rays of his small lamp only tended to render more sepulchral in its features, the vivid consciousness that he was trespassing here, and if detected, would be subjected to some painful humiliating indignity, all united to make his breast echo with a sickly, fainting oppression. For a time his blood seemed chilled and his heart stilled in its pulsation, but suddenly, when his startled ear caught the light sound of an approaching footstep and the rustling of a flowing robe, it palpitated with wild rapidity, and it quickened its violent beatings when his amazed eye fell upon the slight and graceful form of Lady Maud advancing towards him with the gentle, gliding motion of an apparition; yet more impetuous were its throbbings now that he found himself, under such extraordinary circumstances, alone with her and by her side.

At first he was appalled and rendered speechless by her sudden appearance—now his emotion was of a suffocating nature—he felt as though he should choke unless he could utter a cry; yet he knew that were he to breathe a sound to startle and awaken her, the consequences might prove fatal to her.

Motionless he sat with her alone in that grim, cold, dark old library, her soft shoulder resting against his, and her glazed eyes turned upon the black-lettered page of the ancient volume, as though they could decipher the strangely-formed characters there written.

Motionless, awe-stricken, he remained while she, murmuring words with low, sweet accents—words so indistinctly uttered that, though he listened intently, he failed to interpret them—bent her young, fair face lower and lower over the book, until her trembling lips came into contact with the leaf, and then he saw them press it with a sweet, soft, lasting kiss.

It is impossible to describe the tumultuous feelings which upheaved within his breast, and which filled his whole being with an intense and passionate joy, when he saw this. But he felt the imperious necessity of restraining his emotions, and by a painfully exercised control he kept them confined where they originated—not, however, accomplishing this without quivering nerves and trembling limbs.

His own eyes, though they had their natural speculation in them, were so filled with moisture, that though he strove to read the words also, they appeared hazy, indistinct and undecipherable.

And then Lady Maud slowly uplifted her head when she had kissed the page, and she leaned her marble cheek upon her hand, turning, as it seemed, her gaze towards the darkly-shadowed entrance by which she had made her way into the old library.

And she sat still, without a sound emanating from her lips. Erle could hear his own heart beat, but not her breath coming and going.

The situation was indeed trying. The ghastly chamber, with its tall cases of black oak running gauntly up to the now undistinguishable ceiling, its massive furniture, its grim array of hauberks, corslets, and military weapons of ancient date, its suits of armor, plate and mail, perfected with helmets, so as to resemble warriors in all the panoply of war, its triple-arched windows with lozenge-shaped panes, stained in various tints of armorial bearings, ecclesiastical emblems, and other quaint devices, engendered in the glare of day, even under the most favorable conditions, a feeling of solemn awe; but in the dim and feeble light emanating from his lamp it appeared supernaturally gloomy and full of imaginative terrors even to the firm mind of Erle, though he knew these fears to be unreal. Such a scene, indeed, at that hour of the still night, with its awe-inspiring gloom and death-like silence, would scarcely have failed to have raised emotions of strange, horrifying, unshapeable dread in the breasts and minds of many a stout-hearted fellow; but even such emotions paled before those which filled the bosom of Erle, and made his heart ache nigh to bursting.

It was not alone that his mind was oppressed by the supernatural characteristics of this drear old chamber, but he had also to encounter and to endure, without an audible sign, the preternatural appearance of Lady Maud.

To have met her alone at this hour, and in this very solemn and antique chamber, full of animation and consciousness, would have afforded him unspeakable happiness. He would have thought no more of the solemn gloom and mystery which hung over the place, and have been filled only with the bliss which the soft expression of her sweet eyes and gentle face would have created; but now he was overwhelmed by the situation.

He knew that she slept, he knew that her state forbade her vision recognizing him, yet her eyes had rested upon his countenance, and she addressed him as though she knew of his presence and was in a condition to converse with him.

He was acquainted with the danger of arousing her from her state of somnolency, either by design or accident, and greatly as he wished that she should recognize and speak with him, he was compelled to forego that first and most anxious, as most natural wish—not only, indeed, forego it, but to sit motionlessly, to suspend his breath, to do all he could to prevent her becoming conscious of his presence in the library, but equally of his contiguity.

This latter consideration it was that made the situation trying to him. He was compelled to keep his great excitement under control, and remain still and silent, as he gazed with immovable eyes on a face dearer to him than that of any other being in the world.

He observed the change her features had undergone, he noted the lines of care and grief which her sorrows had marked there, and he set his teeth hard together as a suspicion of the cause rushed through his brain.

Suddenly he perceived her features undergo a rapid alteration in their expression—horror and aversion took the place of tenderness and affection. She rose up abruptly, and muttered, indistinctly,

"He comes. He must not see me here. O, that I could die ere see that face again. Hush! it is Philip Avon's dark face. I must fly—I must fly, or he will seize upon me and make me his. Oh, horror! oh, Heaven! save me—save me!"

These words were gibbered rather than spoken, still Erle caught them, and his brow darkened.

He uprose as she uprose, and followed her as she moved swiftly along the library until she reached the entrance and passed out.

As she ascended a flight of stone steps which communicated with the old library, passed along several passages which were intersected by others, evidently instinctively, following the correct route to her own chamber, he, fearing an accident might occur to her, kept her in sight until he came abruptly upon some person bearing a light advancing towards him.

A glance showed to him the face of Lady Kingswood, white as death, haggard and full of alarm. He stopped suddenly and remained immovable.

Lady Maud kept on as rapidly as before, and on nearing Lady Kingswood, the latter stepped aside, suffered her to pass untouched, then turned and followed her into a chamber, the door of which she closed softly behind, and thus left Erle in utter darkness.

Lady Kingswood, it seemed plain, was acquainted with Lady Maud's somnambulistic habit, and having missed her from her chamber, had come thus far, he presumed, in search of her.

He remained without moving until the stillness which reigned supreme within the mansion assured him that the inmates were all buried in profound slumber, and then he turned to retrace his steps to the library.

In doing this he had to encounter difficulties upon which he had not calculated. In the excitement under which he labored while following the quick steps of Lady Maud, he had failed to observe the direction which the various windings and turnings took, and being in darkness, he could only grope his way.

He knew he was then in the modern part of the structure, and he had a shrewd impression of the course it would be necessary to follow. He cared not if he could contrive to work his way to his old apartments; it would be easy to get to the library from thence. His danger, however, lay in mistaking his path and in penetrating into some part where the servants were located, and where one less sleepy than the rest might hear his stealthy footsteps and give an alarm.

After much care, deliberation and cautious movements, he found himself again on the old, time-worn flight of stone stairs, and he knew he had reached the ancient portion of Kingswood Hall.

As he remembered that he had ascended this flight while following Lady Maud, so he descended and proceeded until he paused before a door, through the crevices of which a faint glimmer of light was perceptible. He had left his own lamp burning in the library, and he concluded that he had now reached that place, so he passed through the old doorway, to find himself in the picture-gallery, to which, on a former occasion he had been conducted by Lady Kingswood.

A strange, unearthly light pervaded this gallery. There was certainly within it no artificial illumination from chandelier or lamp of any kind, yet the objects within it were distinctly visible. The ghostly figures in armor cap-à-pie, like spectre sentinels on guard, stood at measured intervals down the long chamber, and the portraits hanging against the wall in their sombre, carved and massive frames, glared down upon him, white-faced, as if angry at his intrusion upon their phantom-like domain.

Impressed with the same strange feeling of awe which spread itself over him on his first entry into the library that night, he stood and gazed on the scene before him for a minute or two without advancing. Then, as if impelled by some unseen power, whose influence he could not control, he strode down the centre of the gallery, every nerve thrilling, yet bearing himself instinctively with a proud, haughty and even defiant mien.

His eyes wandered from face to face of the many panoplied warrior portraits hanging against the walls of the gallery, and a wild, ungovernable, busy fancy made it appear to him that there was life in their large, stern, staring eyes, but he did not betray by his manner that such an impression obtained with him; indeed, he felt, though there was an awful centre of reality in the apparently silent movement of their grave orbs, that such a supposition was a mere illusion, and that he was bound to treat it as such.

He arrived at length opposite the place where the portrait of the "Bad Baron of Kingswood" had for a long, long period hung; there was but a space left for it now—a large, black, dismal-looking blank.

A feeling of vexed disappointment passed over the mind of Erle, he scarcely knew why; it could be nothing to him he inwardly acknowledged, that it was not there. Yet he was angered at its absence; it appeared like an indignity forced upon himself, an irrational emotion, certainly, but one, nevertheless, which stirred him strangely.

He remembered the circumstances which attended his former visit to this place with Lady Kingswood, and his eyes naturally reverted to the spot where he recollected the picture to have fallen, and there, in truth, it lay untouched, even on the very place where he had last seen it rest.

He advanced towards it. In the dim light he could perceive that one edge rested upon the polished floor, and one also leaned against the wall. The back of the picture was towards him, and he felt an irrepressible desire to look once more upon the face of the swart warrior, whom, it had been said by Lady Kingswood, he so much resembled.

The picture was large and heavy, and it required his almost strength to move it; but obeying the strong impulse which had fastened on him, he applied all his powers, and succeeded in turning it with the face outwards, though, in accomplishing it, the massive weight overpowered him, and it fell back to the wall with a report which made the whole gallery reverberate with a thundering echo.

He started at the sound and instinctively retreated into a deep shadow cast by a ponderous suit of mail.

Soon all was silent again, and he moved forth from his hiding-place and confronted the figure as it stood now boldly in relief in the painting. Obscurity no longer rendered this remarkable portrait indistinct; on the contrary, as Erle gazed upon the face with deepening interest, it seemed each moment to grow brighter and brighter, until every feature was clearly and boldly defined.

The face was familiar to him, but not as reproducing his own; still it seemed to bear a remarkable resemblance to one with whom he was well acquainted. Then a sharp, thrilling, acute pang ran through his brain, for he recollected that the face he now gazed upon was startlingly like that of Lord Kingswood.

Why should that resemblance affect him? It did, whatever the cause. His cheek burned, his ear tingled, and he groaned with pain, as one who feels himself about to suffocate.

It was not alone, however, that he was to be startled by the resemblance between the portrait and Lord Kingswood. While passionate and agonizing thoughts were rushing through his brain, it seemed to him as though the eyes and the face of this painted, bold, bad Baron of Kingswood became animated.

The eyes appeared to flutter and gleam, and then to become dead, again to flash forth as brilliantly as before, and the cheeks became of a warm, roseate hue, and then changed to a ghastly blue. Although his heart died within him at this extraordinary appearance—illusion he felt it to be—his eyes were fastened by a horrible fascination on the ghastly face, with its varying hues. He tried to banish his fancies by a strong exercise of his will, but in spite of all his efforts he felt convinced that the eyes did flutter, and the cheeks did change from a glowing blush to a pale and livid as blue.

Void of all superstitious fears as he was naturally, he yet had a horrifying impression that this figure, which riveted his eyes upon it so that he could not withdraw them if he would, in another moment would step forth from the frame and address him.

Brighter each moment gleamed the eyes and glowed the cheeks, and then again the aspect became fearfully livid. Unable to bear longer the excitement it occasioned him he leaped back, and turned his eyes rapidly around him to endeavor to ascertain what caused not only the strange, unearthly light filling the usually sombre gallery, but the changing hues upon the face of the portrait.

His anxious, straining eyes perceived that, fronting the portrait was a high, lozenge-paned window, curiously wrought in stained glass, representing some subject which Erle did not attempt or care to decipher; but he instantly, and no doubt correctly, conjectured that the bright beams of the moon, which he knew to be shining brilliantly, forcing their way through the many-dyed panes, had now tinted the cheeks of the bad Baron of Kingswood with the hues of the rose, and anon with a ghastly blue.

Although he did not endeavor to follow out the subject which had been so cunningly executed in the colored panes, he saw there plainly the figures 1655, in ruby letters upon a golden ground, for they stood out boldly and glittered brightly.

He remembered them as a date, but not the circumstances connected with it. While he tried to think it disappeared abruptly, and he found himself buried in darkness.

A heavy cloud had suddenly rolled across the moon and obscured its rays; at the same time a low, hoarse moan arose, the wind sighing through the forest trees mournfully, thus rendering his situation in that impenetrable darkness the reverse of enviable. He could not repress a shudder, and inwardly resolved that the instant the moon became sufficiently unobscured to enable him to see his way out of the gallery he would take advantage of it and retreat without a moment's delay.

The moonlight came again with a sudden burst, and once more his eye turned, unable to resist the mysterious influence, towards the portrait. This time, however, his eyes were attracted by a small ebony box which lay near to where the picture stood. Instinctively Erle stepped forward and raised it. It was dusty, and seemed very ancient. It was heavy for its size, and felt strangely, painfully cold in his hands.

While examining it the moon again became abruptly obscured as before, and the gallery was filled with a pitchy darkness.

It was at this instant he heard the rustling of silk and the distinct patter of soft light feet. They appeared to proceed from close to where the portrait of the baron was standing, to advance to him, to pass close—terrifyingly close to him—hurry onward down the gallery towards the entrance where the old stone staircase was situated, and then to cease, for he heard them no longer.

As these singular and alarming sounds ended, the moon shone out brightly again, and displayed to him the grim contents of the gallery, but no moving object, not even an apparition.

His mind was, however, fearfully high-wrought, he could bear his situation not even for another instant, and he, too, hurried with swift foot down the gallery, even though he had the horrible consciousness passing through his brain with a ringing hiss that he was following in the wake of the footsteps and the rustling dress, the sounds of which had sent the blood rushing back to his heart.

It mattered little to him; the horror of encountering a phantom could not, he believed, be greater than that he should feel if he remained longer in this dismal picture-gallery.

He passed out on to the stone staircase. He remembered that the library was over the picture-gallery, and that he would have to ascend. He did so, groping his way in blank, stifling darkness. The echo of his own footsteps, although he stepped cautiously and lightly, startled him, but he could not pause, even though the continued reverberation of his footsteps on the stair might occasion an alarm to be raised.

Suddenly he found, to his great relief, that he had reached the top of the flight, and that passages diverged thence right and left. As the staircase he had ascended was spiral, it was difficult to determine which path would probably prove the correct one; he, however, obeyed an instinct in selecting one, and in a few seconds passed through an opening, which enabled him to perceive that his instinct had served him faithfully, and that he was once again in the old library.

To be sure the change was not one that afforded a very favorable contrast; the solemn old chamber in which he now stood appeared even yet more gloomy, dark and sepulchral than the picture-gallery. His lamp was yet burning, but its feeble rays served only to heighten the obscurity, and enabled him to perceive, standing at the further end of the gallery, a figure in white, with upraised hand, as if motioning him to advance.

For an instant, and but an instant, an impression seized him that the original of that light footstep and the rustling silk he had heard in the darkened picture-gallery stood before him; and the pulses of his heart were quickened, but he recovered himself immediately, for he remembered that it was the statue of the Lady Maud.

So he passed down the library towards the desk where yet lay the book he had placed there—the book which the lips of Lady Maud had pressed, the book which he secretly resolved his lips should press, too, even on the very spot where hers for a moment had rested—the book which contained so much that had proved of importance to him; so much more, that he knew not of yet, more important still to him.

But ere he could reach it a blaze of moonlight filled the chamber, streaming through the brilliantly-stained panes, and throwing hues of violet and crimson, amethyst, amber and purple upon the floor and upon the walls, upon the figures of armed warriors, and upon the white statue of Lady Maud.

The brightness of the moonbeams, rendered infinitely more vivid by the previous darkness, made the hues which fell upon the marble statue more glowingly distinct in color than they appeared on any other object. At the same time they blended so softly together intermingling, and forming such delicate and varied tints, that it seemed as though a rainbow had melted its own exquisite gradations of color on this fair, white figure—yet white, although it had passed through centuries since it had left the hands of the sculptor.

It was strange that, eager as he was to sit down where Lady Maud had placed herself by his side, he yet paused to gaze upon the statue of the Lady Maud. Amid all the excitement which her unexpected and startling presence in the library, and the subsequent events, had created in his mind, he yet had space for the belief that she knew of the words he had pencilled on the margin of the page of the old Saxon chronicle, and that she had been favorably influenced by it, or she would not in her sleep-walking have come thither in search of it. Despite all that had happened, this impression raised a violent tumult in his breast, and made him yearn to ascertain whether, if she had read his sad, hopeless love revelation she had appended any comment, even one single word. But, intense as was his curiosity to satisfy himself concerning this, he was yet controlled by some extraneous influence to pause before the statue of Lady Maud; to note the sweet, sorrowful features; watch their seeming mutations under the reflection of the changing hues of the rich dyes of the painted windows; and then to bend his gaze upon the pedestal, and read there, upon the carved tablet, those words, "The Unavenged, 1655."

The date disturbed him; it was the same as that which had appeared so sharply outlined upon the amber-stained pane in the picture-gallery. He mechanically turned his eyes to his left; it was the same date which now caught his sight in gilded letters, upon a high, massive, antique chest of black oak, elaborately carved, banded, and ornamented with steel studs.

"Surely," he muttered, as a strange sensation passed over him, "these coincidences cannot be all accidents. I am of the Kingswoods—I feel that I am—these signs, these symbols, these uncanny, suggestive, curious relations to me; they call upon me to examine and to act. There is a doom upon the House—that I know. It may be that I am the one to lift it from the race. I will enter into council with it under the influence of strange, that it would seem as if I had by fate been marked out to fulfil some high and important position, perhaps some preordained deeds, by which the ban shall be removed, and I prove to be, even as the ruffian in the forest ever addressed me, 'the Heir of the Race.'"

As these words left his lips, swift-flying masses of cloud obscured instantaneously the light of the moon. There arose a mighty roar in the forest as of a hurricane rushing through the branches of the bending trees, rending, crashing everything which tended to arrest its impetuous path.

A furious, howling gust at the same time passed from the old chamber in which he had been first located on his arrival at Kingswood, into through the passages leading to the library, closing each door which he had left open with a report like the falling of a thunderbolt, clattered violently among the suits of armor hanging against the wall, whirled his lamp from the desk upon which it stood, hurled it upon the floor, extinguishing it, went roaring through the passages and corridors, waking domestics, who muttered their prayers and buried their faces affrightedly beneath the bedclothes, and leaving, ere it subsided, Erle stretched, overpowered by what he had undergone, in insensible and unconscious at the foot of the pedestal which held the statue of "Lady Maud, the Unavenged!"

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

Question for a Debating Society.—Which is the most delightful, "To kiss a fair woman on a dark night, or a dark woman on a fair night?"

"I don't know him," said a Glasgow magistrate in speaking of a less prosperous citizen. "I believe he is a decent enough fellow in his way, but he is not of the hong-kon." This opulent gentleman probably intended to use the words haut ton.

In reply to her father's question why she did not wear rings upon her fingers, a young lady said,

"Because, papa, they hurt me when anybody squeezes my hand."

"What business have you to have your hand squeezed?"

"Certainly none; but still you know, papa, one would like to keep one's hand in squeezing order."

A Baker's Dozen of Uses for a Word: I got your letter within ten minutes after I got shaved. I got to Canterbury, where I got such a cold as I shall not get rid of. I got the secret of getting a memorial, but I could not get an answer, yet I got intelligence from the messenger that I should get one next morning. I got back to supper, and got to bed, and then got to sleep. I have got nothing further to say.

At West's re-election to the chair of the Royal Academy, in 1803, after a recession of twelve months, the votes for his return to the office of President were unanimous, except one, which was in favor of Mrs. Lloyd (Miss Moser), then an academician. Fuseli, at no time of his life an admirer of West, was taxed by some of the members with having given this vote, and answered,

"Well, suppose I did; she is eligible to the office; and is not one old woman as good as another?"

M. de Balzac was lying awake in bed, when he saw a man enter his room cautiously, and attempt to pick the lock of his writing desk. The rogue was not a little disconcerted at hearing a loud laugh from the occupant of the apartment, whom he supposed asleep.

"Why do you laugh?" asked the thief.

"I am laughing, my good fellow," said M. de Balzac, "to think what pains you are taking, and what risk you run, in hope of finding money by night in a desk where the lawful owner can never find any by day."

The thief "evacuated Flanders" at once.

We learn from the Athenæum that "Miss Susan Durant has received a commission to execute one of the poetical marbles for the Mansion House, being, so far as we recollect, the first English lady who has ever obtained a compliment of this particular kind." Who deserve compliments, pray, but clever English ladies? Women ought to make good sculptors, especially in taking busts of the so-called and self-created Lords of the Creation. We say this advisedly, knowing what first-rate hands women invariably are in cutting out the gentlemen.

A certain sea-captain, who had considerable interest with his brother officers, and the cook aboard his vessel, were once to be tried for an offence against the laws of the navy, of such a nature as put their lives in some jeopardy. The cook displayed every mark of fear and apprehension for his safety. The captain, on the contrary, seemed in very good spirits, and said,

"Cheer up, man; why should you be cast down? I fear nothing, and why should you?"

"Why, faith, your honor," replied the fellow, "I should be as courageous as you are if we were to be tried by a jury of cooks."

A late Earl of Kelly was relating in company that he had listened to a sermon in Italy, in which the preacher described the alleged miracle of St. Anthony preaching to the fishes, which, in order to listen to him, held their heads out of the water.

"I can believe the miracle," said Erskine, "if your lordship was at church."

"I was certainly there," said the peer.

"Then," rejoined Henry, "there was at least one fish out of water."

On a change of Ministry, Erskine was appointed to succeed Harry Dundas (subsequently Lord Melville) as Lord Advocate. On the morning of his appointment he met Mr. Dundas in the Parliament House, who had resumed the ordinary gown worn by all practitioners at the Scotch bar, excepting the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General. After a little conversation, Erskine remarked that he must be off to order his silk gown.

"'Tis not worth your while," said Dundas, "for the short time you'll want it; you had better borrow mine."

"I have no doubt your gown," replied Erskine, "is made to fit any party; but, however short may be my time in office, it shall not be said of Henry Erskine that he put on the abandoned habits of his predecessors."

Mr. A—— B——, a Judge of the Commissary Court, talked in an inflated and pompous manner. Having failed to attend an appointment with Erskine, he subsequently explained that he had been called out of town owing to his brother, the proprietor of B——, having, in attempting to leap a fence, fallen from a stile and sprained his foot.

"It was fortunate for your brother," said the wit, "that it was not from your style he fell or he had certainly broken his neck."

Shortly after the death of Mr. John Wright, a talented but unsuccessful advocate, the late Sheriff Anstruther remarked to Erskine in the street, "Poor Wright is dead. He has died very poor. It is said he has left no effects."

"That is not wonderful," replied the humorist; "as he had no causes he could have no effects."

"Where were you yesterday, you rascal?" said a country pedagogue to one of his pupils.

"I was out in the fields alone."

"Well, but what were you doing in the fields, sir—picking berries?"

"No, sir; I was out alone, by myself."

"But what were you doing?"

"I was meditating."

"Meditating upon what?"

"I was meditating upon what I'd be when I got to be growed up—printer, lawyer, doctor or schoolmaster, and took the field for it."

"Bravo boy! What was your conclusion?"

"I thought as how I'd be a schoolmaster—they live easy, and I like to give lickins."

One of your foppishly-got-up exquisites, with small cane, eyeglass, &c., &c., dropped into a tavern a few days since for a dinner. His fastidiousness caused much merriment to those who sat near him at the table, and he was pretty well observed by all. Matters reached a climax when the "fellah" called the waitress, and slowly taking in her features by the aid of his pretty one-eyed spectacle, drawled out,

"I say, waitaw, have you any more pulverized potataw?"

The poor dumfounded waitress modestly asked, "Any more what, sir?"

"Pulverized potataw, my child—pulverized potataw; and please be expeditious in placing it before me!"

It isn't likely the girl would have known that the gentleman meant mashed potatoes had he not pointed energetically to a dish of that vegetable which had just been placed upon the table. The laughter, silent but hearty, to which his neighbors indulged, nearly deprived them of the benefit of what they were eating, and the story made a good joke for the day.

Unsocial old Snarl says that love is a combination of diseases—an affection of the heart and an inflammation of the brain.

A young lady who was perfectly thunder-struck at hearing of her friend's engagement, has since been provided with a lightning rod.

The Chinese, after a long period of wet weather, when they have prayed vainly for relief, put their idols out in the rain, to see how they like it.

Lord Braxfield, a Scotch judge, once said to an eloquent culprit at the bar, "You're a vera clever chiel, mon; but I'm thinking ye wad be nane the waur o' a hangin'."

A person having wilfully put an end to his life by drowning in a canal, the coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Felo de se." Upon hearing it a Frenchman exclaimed,

"No, de sea, for he fell in de canal."

When Fox had ruined himself, and a subscription for him was talked of, some one asked how he thought he would take it.

"Take it," cried Selwyn, suddenly lighting up, "why, quarterly, to be sure."

ENCAMPMENT

Of Massachusetts Troops on Federal Hill, near Baltimore.

THE change that has come over the spirit of the Baltimore populace is remarkable. On the 19th of April the Northern troops were fighting their way through its streets, and now Governor Hicks is raising troops for the Union, and the very regiment which was then impeded and attacked is now welcomed with cordial shouts. It would seem from all accounts that General Butler's appearance with his force and a park of artillery took the Baltimoreans by surprise, although they evinced in merely as we have said, by the liveliest demonstrations of regard and welcome. Passing through Baltimore the General encamped with his men on Federal Hill, a rising ground, which commands the city and is situated near a mile from Fort McHenry.

He then issued a proclamation on the 14th of May, in which he declared that he had occupied the city of Baltimore for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the laws of the United States, which were being hourly infringed by malignant citizens.

The General, very soon after establishing his camp, ordered the arrest of Mr. Ross Winans, of eight-steamer and steam-gun celebrity, and that suspected millionaire was arrested on the evening of the 14th, at Relay House. A correspondent says that he was perfectly astonished at the enthusiastic reception General Butler and his troops met with as they passed through Baltimore to Federal Hill, and the total absence of all fear and apprehension which characterized the populace, the streets being thronged with women with children in their arms. There seems to be every prospect of a protracted occupation of this camp, since on the 14th the Water Commissioners and their men were engaged in laying down water pipes, and great care was being bestowed upon the entire encampment. So peaceful is the city now that on the evening of the very day of occupation General Butler and his staff dined at the Gilmore House, and then rode back to the camp. Some excitement has been caused by the seizure of an immense quantity of arms found in Gitting's store, corner of Jay and Second streets, and which were intended for the Secessionists. The troops on Federal Hill consist of the Massachusetts Sixth, the New York Eighth and the Boston Flying Artillery, numbering in all about two thousand five hundred men.

LUCILLE DE VERNET;

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XIV.

Two months had nearly elapsed. Lucille, as a last resort, had addressed a letter to Madame D'Almaine. A week after a packet arrived directed to Mademoiselle de Vernet; it was in the writing of the countess. Lucille broke the seal slowly, and with a fainting spirit. There were her own letters to Jules and Emile, all but one unopened. She was pushing them from her with a sinking sensation, when one addressed to herself fell to the ground; she caught it up eagerly, broke the seal, and read:

"MADAME—I have returned your letters that you may fully understand the uselessness of writing either to my son or daughter. The latter is still in her convent, and I have so fully explained the enormity of your conduct to the former, that he desires all intercourse must cease between you for ever. He is suffering now from a wound received in a duel with the Duke de Paleron. But he tells me to say, that although he can never acknowledge you as one bearing his name, he feels himself in a degree bound to give you an allowance; he therefore has made a settlement of four thousand francs per annum on you, and I inclose a bill for the half yearly amount. I should strenuously recommend you not to adopt the name of our family, as you can never be considered the Count d'Almaine's wife. In regard to your infant you may retain it, or give it up to its legal protectors. I have no advice to offer on the subject.

HORTENSE D'ALMAINE."

Lucille's feelings were indescribable on reading this cruel letter; but indignation predominated, and taking the letter of madame, and the bill inclosed in it, put it on the fire, and laying the poker on it, pressed it down into the flame till not a vestige of it remained.

"This is your act!" she cried, with flashing eyes, "and thus let it perish! You would compromise my honor, and trample me in the dust, but I will triumph yet over you, you unfeeling woman, for I am innocent and oppressed, and shall conquer, for I want only my husband's love and the esteem which nothing shall make me forfeit."

Her resolution was formed on the moment; it was hasty but firm, though time and trouble would be the cost. She would see him, speak to him, tell him all her wrongs, and she knew his heart too well to imagine he would turn away from her truthfulness, though a serpent had coiled round him to poison his mind against her.

She wept bitterly when she thought of his wound, for he had doubted her truth, and had fought to vindicate his honor at the risk of his reputation; she sighed, too, for Emile, who, immured in a convent, was helpless where she might have worked so much good.

De Vernet could scarcely keep his indignation within bounds. At first he insisted that the law should compel both the count and his mother to do justice to his daughter's claims; but Lucille pleaded so forcibly against these proceedings—declaring it would separate her from her husband for ever, for if he would not acknowledge her without compulsion, she would never live with him—that after many trials of patience and forbearance on his part, her father consented, partly instigated by Batiste, who was the friend on both sides, to permit her to make the attempt at reconciliation her own way. This was to proceed alone and unattended to Paris, to obtain an interview with Jules, unfold to him the artifice practised against him, and her sanguine hopes whispered all would be right.

On a bright morning in July, when the golden sun was giving a deeper tint to the clustering grapes hanging profusely and temptingly, slightly shaded from its glare by the broad dark green leaves, and every glade and mossy bank was lighted up by its brilliancy, Lucille with tearful eyes and trusting spirit, bade adieu to her loving and beloved friends, and a last farewell to the sweet home of all her happiness. As she pressed for the twentieth time a kiss on the lips of her child, as it slept on the careful arm of Madelina, she whispered, "Sweetest, I quit you but for a time. At our next embrace, your father's arm will entwine with mine round thy tiny form, and all will be peace and happiness."

With the faithful and tried servant of her father, Lucille stepped into the waiting vehicle, and was soon hastening to Paris with as much speed as French travelling in those days permitted. She gave a tearful and lingering look to the last green spot of the valley yet visible, and when it faded away for ever from her sight, she leant back in the carriage and closed her eyes; her tears were gone; but her heart seemed too large and heavy for her bosom, and with indescribable pain she pressed her hand tightly over it.

On the second day's journey the carriage drew up in the Rue de la Paix at the residence of a court milliner, a person who was partially known to the Batistes, and where Lucille was to locate while she had occasion for it.

Madame Boton received her with the freedom and courtesy of an old acquaintance. Comfortable apartments were assigned her, and an invitation to visit her business department when she pleased. All was free and easy; there were no suspicions, no inquiry about who or what she was. The milliner was well versed in fashionable news and scandal, and Lucille soon heard her own history in several different versions as connected with Madame d'Almaine. She heard, too, that her husband was much changed from the gay, fashionable man so greatly admired and caressed. He had scarcely recovered from his wound, which was a pistol shot in the arm; he was pale, languid and seldom quitted the house but for an airing.

How Lucille's heart yearned towards him at this intelligence! How she longed to see him! She many hours during the day, wrapped in a large shawl and thick veil, her person being disguised by them, she paced before the gates of the Hôtel d'Almaine, in the vain hope of seeing him, knowing from experience how useless would be the attempt to reach him by written communication.

One morning, worn and unhappy by her weary, useless watchings, urged by an impulse, she determined to boldly seek an interview with him. She drew towards the bell and laid her hand upon its handle; her courage was gone ere she had made it sound. Her peculiar position struck her forcibly; a wife of the proud and ancient house of D'Almaine forcing herself within its portals, or like a menial humbly asking for what she could command—her husband's presence! All her emotions for the moment were concentrated in her pride. She pulled the bell sharply, with a steady hand, and it still sounded when the porter looked through the aperture to reconnoitre the visitor. She demanded in a decided tone, "Is the Count d'Almaine at home?"

The porter scanned her from head to foot, before he answered, "He is gone out for a ride, mademoiselle."

"When will he return?" she asked. "Are his rides generally prolonged to great lengths?"

The man smiled, as he replied, "Monsieur knows his own mind better than I do, mademoiselle. I may as well ask what your business is with him?"

"I wish to see him," she replied; "and you will greatly oblige me by informing me of the most probable time for me to procure an interview."

"It is impossible," replied the man, "for, since monsieur's illness, madame, his mother, has not permitted any one to see him, but through her agency. Shall I take your message to the countess, mademoiselle?"

"No," she replied, in a desponding tone, for the courage that had impelled her to act was damped by this information. "I will call again. I may be more successful another time. The count may be at home." She hesitated, then added, "If you could deliver a letter to him from me, it might answer the purpose of seeing him; and I will reward you for your trouble," she said putting a Napoleon into his hand while speaking.

The man looked at the money, saying as he did so, "It is not the trouble, mademoiselle, you see; it is the risk we run. Madame threatens to discharge any domestic who should convey anything to the count without her knowledge; but a letter—I suppose it is but a love letter—might be an exception. Bring it, and I'll consult Jacqueline about it. She is more quick sighted than myself on these points; and though more discreet than tender hearted, is not above doing a good turn when profit is attached to it."

"Thanks, a thousand thanks, my good man!" said Lucille, elated with her seeming success. "I will be here about this time to-morrow."

"Well, well," said the porter, "I will do what I can for you, mademoiselle."

Here a very small face, with a remarkably sharp pair of eyes, peered over the man's shoulder, and in a voice something beyond tenor, demanded why he was wasting so much time at the portal.

"I'll tell you all about it Jacqueline," he said, in a half soothing, half frightened voice. "It's a lady wants to see the count. I'll tell you all about it."

He then closed the shutter abruptly, leaving Lucille standing on the other side, in a half bewildered mood.

A loud ring at the bell aroused Lucille. She moved slowly away, uncertain, in her state of irritability, whither; and when she looked up to learn her direction, she was beyond the gardens of the Tuileries. She knew not the right turning homewards, and stood glancing anxiously round for some steady looking person to inquire her way.

She was standing on the curbstone, when she retreated slightly at the tramp of horses' hoofs; they were passing her, and mechanically her eyes were raised to the horseman. She uttered an exclamation, and stretched forth her arms.

"Jules! Jules!" she cried. "Stop! I am here. Oh, do not go, Jules! Jules, surely you will hear me."

But D'Almaine, unconscious she was near, rode on rapidly. He was pale and thoughtful, and pursued his course without once turning to the right or to the left. And onward went Lucille, with rapid movements unmindful of the observation she had attracted, till the object she was pursuing was hidden from her by distance, and the numerous vehicles and horsemen with which the streets were thronged: and when her straining eyes could no longer discern him, she leaned against an iron palisade and wept.

Many persons had assembled round her, some smiling at her, others pitying her, but all pronouncing audibly, "She is mad!"

Lucille had just become conscious of her unpleasant position and was trying to make her way through the crowd, when a middle-aged woman, after looking searchingly at her, exclaimed, "Mademoiselle de Vernet! or I am greatly deceived."

Lucille looked up; it was the mother of Rosalie, Emile's maid, who spoke; and happy to recognise one face among the gazers she had seen before, caught her arm, exclaiming, "Madame, will you escort me home. A stranger in Paris, I have mistaken the turning."

"Take my arm," said the woman; "I will see you safe; but you are fatigued, mademoiselle. My home is near: rest there for a time, and," she added, in a low voice, "it will enable us to rid ourselves of this rabble."

Lucille gladly took her offered arm, and was soon under her sheltering roof, listening with interest, that for the time drove other thoughts from her mind, to information of Emile.

"You must know, mademoiselle," said the woman, "that after you quitted us that morning when you were so fearfully ill, Rosalie came to tell me that madame had given her warning. She had a month before her, and she told me she would not, if possible, quit the Hôtel d'Almaine till she had discovered where her young lady was placed. She was successful. It is at the convent of St. Ursula; but when she applied at the gates to see her, instructions had been issued that none from the hotel were to be admitted without a special order from madame. It was a cruel disappointment to Rosalie, who was unacquainted with your address, and therefore had no power to do anything; and her next place taking her into the country, she was obliged to let the matter rest."

"But I can visit her," replied Lucille, anxiously. "I am not from the hotel, and can gain admittance. Tell me, madame, how can this be done?"

"To-morrow is visiting day," she replied; "the hours from twelve to two. Present yourself at the lodge, and if you succeed in passing the portress, you may, I think, gain access to the poor young lady, whom they are punishing to make her take the hateful vows."

"Dear Emile! you shall not, if I have power to prevent it," exclaimed Lucille, energetically; "and in exerting myself for your benefit, self shall be forgotten. I must return, now, madame. Will you direct me to the Rue de la Paix? Expect me shortly again, and believe my gratitude to be enduring."

It was late when Lucille returned; all were in consternation at her long absence; and Annette, her father's faithful servant, declared that she should not, without her attendance, again perambulate the streets of Paris. To this Lucille readily consented; and fatigued morally and physically she retired to bed. But the day had been an eventful one; it was replete with unlooked-for events. She had seen her husband—heard of his sister. Surely the countess's reign was not so triumphant as it had been. Hope whispered something would arise from it; and though she slept little, she arose in the morning for the first time refreshed since her residence in Paris.

It seemed a long time till the hour arrived for her departure to the convent. She wrote her letter to her husband, intending, as she returned, to leave it with the porter; and with a fluttering heart started off, accompanied by Annette, for St. Ursula's. She had planned that it should be considerably past the hour of admission when she arrived that, unmolested, she might have an opportunity of conversing with the captive. She trembled violently, as she stood waiting in the convent porch for her summons for admittance to be answered. But when the portress appeared she said in a low but firm voice that she was sent by Madame D'Almaine with a message to sister Emilie.

The door was opened immediately, and she passed in, Annette remaining on the outside, one visitor only being admitted at a time, according to the rules of the establishment. She went inward till she stood before a grating through which a nun was discernible pacing slowly the stone pavement. She was old and shrivelled; and what part of her face was visible from beneath the linen bandages bound round her chin and forehead was yellow as saffron; but her small coalblack eyes, wholly devoid of eyelashes, had an unquenching fire and quickness in them; and when for a moment they stopped their rapid movements, they seemed diving into the inmost soul.

Lucille shuddered and felt as cold as the marble on which she stood, as those eyes fixed searchingly upon her. The nun was close to her, the grating alone separating them; but she spoke not; and, as a degree of impatience deepened her yellow skin and sharpened her pointed features, Lucille seemed gradually sinking into nothingness; but finding she was to speak first, she said falteringly, "Mademoiselle D'Almaine, I have come to see her."

The nun tingled a small brass hand-bell, wrote the name on a card, and silently gave it to a sister, who had answered the summons. But a few minutes elapsed, when a tall figure, clad in a sombre, loose, dingy grey habit, with her forehead bound in linen, and a broad piece, similar to the nun's, apparently fastening up her chin, stood before the nun, who silently pointed to the grating. The figure turned; it was Emile; but how changed she was, pale as death; her large dark eyes had lost their brightness, and they were surrounded by a red circle; her features were sharp and her mouth, which had been formerly wreathed in smiles, was compressed and spiritless.

Lucille strained her eyes to be certain she was not deceived in the appearance; and when assured it was Emile, she uttered in a low, suppressed tone, catching her hand,

"Emile, dearest Emile, speak to me; do not look so unnaturally cold!"

The blood rushed up to the face of Emile; the paleness had departed from her cheeks; her eyes were bright and distended, as she said in a faltering voice,

"Lucille! Lucille! can it be? Yes, yes, I know the voice. Throw back your veil, that I may once more look upon a human face."

Lucille withdrew her veil.

"Ah, the same sweet face!" cried Emile, seizing her hand, "but pale and wan like my own. Lucille, you are not happy. Jules, where is he? Are you not with him? Oh, how I have wondered that you have both left me here so long to pine away my existence!"

"I am not with him Emile," replied Lucille. "We are separated. The hand that immured you in this wretched solitude has parted the husband and wife."

"My mother!" exclaimed Emile. "Unhappy woman, to what lengths has her indomitable pride driven her. But, my sister, you must see Jules. Write to him. I know his nature—generous and unsuspecting; but my mother's sway is over it. He knows not what she is, and trusts her, believing her what she should be. But you must dispel the mist. Have you written?"

"Yes, alas! yes," said Lucille, "and all my letters are returned unopened. But let us think of yourself Emile; of how I can serve you. My means seem trifling, helpless as I am. But remember the mouse once freed the lion when his enemies had entrapped him. Think if I can do anything."

Emile looked cautiously round. The small, fierce eyes of the nun were roving from one to the other; and Lucille, alarmed lest her words had been heard, said rather abruptly,

"Why are you kept so long beneath this roof? I trust not to further the countess's plans against myself?"

"Why?" replied Emile, with a derisive laugh. "Why, because I will not marry the Duke de Paleron; because I will not be a duchess. I have my choice to be a duchess or a nun; but I will be neither," she added, with a burst of her bygone spirit. "I will be neither, and I will yet quit these hated walls, where nothing seems human; where forms flit about cold, noiseless, heartless, with as little vitality in them as the marble beneath our feet, or the material of which the hated fabric is composed."

The nun was at the side of Emile as she spoke the last word; her sharp eyes met hers, and for a moment Emile's large flashing ones defied them; then she turned them to Lucille's, and said more calmly,

"My mother has done this; let her answer for it. If she perseveres, my heart will be steeled against her as it is against the semblance of religion she compels me to practise."

Again she was talking low to Lucille when a deep bell sounded; it was to warn visitors away. Emile turned sharply at its first vibration; for once the nun's eyes were not on them, and taking a small stone from her pocket threw it suddenly from her. It struck the window at the opposite end of the apartment, and the nun's eyes followed the cracking noise upon the glass. Emile took hurriedly a letter from her bosom, and placed it in the hand of Lucille, who as hastily conveyed it to her pocket, and all trace of the transaction was buried beneath the folds of her dress ere the nun's eyes had left the window. Both girls were pale and silent, they trembled, but were collected, and Emile said after a pause in a whisper,

"Let no hands but your own deliver it; it is directed; and if possible sleep not till he has it. Let us part now; for if they have any suspicion, they will search you. I shall see you next visiting day. Adieu, dearest Lucille; success attend your mission."

Lucille could scarcely repeat adieu when she found herself standing alone beside the grating. Emile and the nun were both gone, and with rapid, timid steps, glancing furtively round as she passed each massive, lofty pillar, reached the lodge. Annette impatiently waited, and was despatched as soon as they had crossed the last threshold of the convent for a hackney-coach.

Lucille did not feel to breathe freely till she found herself within the coach, when, drawing the letter from her pocket, she saw it was to Monsieur Charles de Bleville, Hotel de Paleron, Rue d'Antin. The driver was told to stop there; and on learning Monsieur de Bleville was at home, she desired them to say that a lady wished to see him at the gate on business of importance.

In a short space of time Charles de Bleville, with surprise painted on his countenance, appeared at the coach door, which was more increased when Lucille told him to open it and enter.

With little hesitation, however, he obeyed, when drawing up the glass she took the letter from her pocket and placed it in his hand. He knew the writing immediately, and became greatly agitated.

"How is this?" he said. "To whom am I indebted for this precious document?"

"To Emile's friend, monsieur," replied Lucille. "Perhaps it may be as well not to enlighten you further on the subject. Emile, as the letter will inform you, is in the convent of St. Ursula; of course you will see her and she will tell you as much of my history as she thinks proper. But here is my address; if you require other aid than your own to assist Emile, you both know where to come."

"Thanks," he cried, running his eyes over the card; then trying to pierce through the thickness of her veil, added, "St. Ursula the convent that has the worst reputation in France for its confinement and severe discipline. I am all anxiety to see what the dear girl says, though I well know why she is punished. If you will permit me, madam, I will call upon you to-morrow."

Lucille bowed assent; and he left the carriage, but stood at the hotel-gate with uncovered head till it drove off. The driver had not proceeded far when the checkstring was once more pulled, and he was ordered to stop a few doors from the Hôtel d'Almaine.

CHAPTER XV.

WHEN the coach stopped at the Hôtel d'Almaine, Lucille, with a light step and fluttering heart, stepped from it, leaving Annette within it till she returned. She took the letter intended for Jules from her bosom, touched the bell and waited with a conflict of emotions till it was answered.

Jacqueline's thin, shrew-like visage was soon visible at the aperture. "Well," said she, in a sharp tone, "and what's the business?"

"Is the porter to be seen?" said Lucille, very humbly.

"No, he is out, and will not return till night," replied Jacqueline; "you can leave your message with me."

Lucille felt almost daunted by the uncourteous words and manner, but she had much at heart, and was determined to proceed.

"I spoke to your husband yesterday," she said, "about conveying a letter to the Count d'Almaine, he promised to befriend me, here it is," laying a Napoleon on it; "and I promise not only a further reward from myself, but will answer for the count, if you deliver it into his hands, handsomely remunerating you for any risk or trouble you may be at concerning it."

Jacqueline looked at the letter, then at the money—her eyes remained longer on the latter—but she quickly said, "Well, well, ma mselle, you must chance it, I'll take the letter, and do my best. Have you anything more to say?"

"Nothing," answered Lucille; "only that I will call or send in the morning to know if it has reached the count's hand."

"You need not," was the reply, "it will but create unnecessary trouble for us all; for an opportunity may not occur to give it the count these two or three days; and I dare say," she added, in a sinister tone, "when he gets it you will have an answer."

Lucille turned away as Jacqueline closed the shutter doubtful and unhappy that this expedient, like those already tried, would terminate ineffectually, but doubt would have been ended had she followed the portress into her sitting room. Jacqueline there laid the letter on the table, and put the Napoleon into her pocket, then silently deliberated a moment, then spoke aloud in her shrill trumpet-like notes.

"No, no," said she, "it will not do to run any risk about losing one's place. I dare say she gets her money easy, and the Napoleon will do me more good than the letter will monsieur, so this shall end it;" and putting the former on the top of a blazing wood fire, it sent forth a bright greenish flame, twisted itself into a few light contortions, and ended its brief existence.

The portress laughed. "You will tell no tales now," she cried, "nor do any mischief. I am glad my silly clown of a helpmate was not here, for he has a tender conscience, and would have screwed his features into numerous forms and shapes, and then have left me to do the business. I have ended it briefly and satisfactorily to my own mind."

While Lucille, at times hopeful, then desponding, listened day after day to every knock at the house door, every strange voice raised uncontrollable emotions. One moment her heart beat tumultuously, the next with scarcely a single pulsation, faint, heavy, even its fond sensations seemed fading, dying from it.

Thus toiled on a week, perhaps the most wearisome week Lucille had ever known. Away from all that was dear—a lonely, anxious watcher—life seemed a weary existence; and but for her child and her father, she would have laid it down cheerfully.

It was again the visiting day at St. Ursula's. Lucille had neither seen nor heard from Charles de Bleville; and with hopes and fears of another description, she sallied towards its dark, gloomy, towering walls, attended by Annette. As they turned a corner of a street leading from the Champs Elysées, a carriage passed them rapidly, but not so quick but the eye of Lucille, who had recognized the

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

TENNESSEE.—The Memphis Bulletin tells the following story of the way suspected persons are treated in that city: "The city still contains at least a few suspicious characters. The patrol in the Fifth Ward arrested three of this character—William Gaynor, William Graham and Thomas Burns—on Thursday night. They had concealed weapons, pistols, knives and keys, and failing to give a good account of themselves, the Recorder sent them all to the chain-gang, two of them for fifty-three and Graham for one hundred and three days. This is a good disposition to make of all such characters as cannot give a good account of themselves."

WASHINGTON, May 17.—The Charleston Courier reports that on the 12th instant the British bark Hilga was refused entrance into the port by the Niagara. The British ships Monmouth and General Parkhill were also ordered off. The British ship A and A was pursued, but run into shoal water and was towed up to the city. The British ship Susan G. Owens, for Liverpool, was boarded but finally permitted to pass.

MISSOURI, St. Louis, May 17.—Two pieces of cannon, several hundred muskets and rifles, and a number of pistols and ammunition were taken from the custody of the Police Commissioners by order of the United States authorities. Sixty Colt's navy revolvers were also seized while in the hands of the American Express Company. All these arms have been sent to the Arsenal.

General Harney on the 14th of May issued a proclamation in which he annuls the recent act of the Legislature, as he considers it as an attempt to override the supreme Federal authority: "It must be apparent to every one who has taken a proper and unbiased view of the subject, that whatever may be the termination of the unfortunate condition of things in respect to the so-called "Cotton States," Missouri must share the destiny of the Union. Her geographical position, her soil, productions, and in short, all her material interests point to this result. We cannot shut our eyes against this controlling fact. It is seen and its force is felt throughout the nation. So important is this regarded to the great interests of the country, that I venture to express the opinion that the whole power of the Government of the United States, if necessary, will be exerted to maintain Missouri in her present position in the Union. I express to you in all frankness and sincerity my own deliberate convictions, without assuming to speak for the Government of the United States, whose authority, here and elsewhere, I shall at all times and under all circumstances, endeavor faithfully to uphold."

The same day Thomas G. Canult a wealthy planter of St. Louis, wrote a letter to General Harney, highly approving his proclamation, and wishing to know if the Goverment intended to interfere with negro slavery. General Harney replied by stating that although he had no special knowledge of the President's intentions, yet he was convinced from the action of General Butler in offering to suppress a slave riot in Maryland, and from the fact that the few fugitive slaves who had escaped into the District of Columbia having been sent back, that every description of property would be protected.

St. Louis, May 18.—Several Union men having been driven from Potosi, on the Iron Mountain railroad, a detachment of volunteers, under command of Captain Cole, was sent on Tuesday night to protect the loyal citizens in that section.

Captain Cole reached Potosi at three o'clock this morning, and surrounded the town with a chain of sentinels, and shortly after daylight a hundred and fifty citizens were taken prisoners and formed in line.

The Union men were recognised and released. About fifty Secessionists were liberated on parole, and nine of the leaders were brought to the city as prisoners of war.

A lead manufactory belonging to John Dean was taken possession of, and some four hundred pigs of lead seized.

On the return trip the troops dispersed a company of cavalry at De Soto, and captured thirty horses they left behind in their flight. The Stars and Stripes were then hoisted on a pole just ready to receive a Secession flag. Another prominent Secessionist was arrested here and another at Victoria, making twelve in all, who are now in the Arsenal.

SOUTH CAROLINA—Big Thing.—We find the following in the shape of a telegram from Charleston to the Savannah Republican of the 13th: "Wagner's improved rifled cannon has been tested and found to throw a shell seven miles. Preparations are on foot to compliment the Niagara with a few."

General Beauregard is constantly at Charleston—or rather, he was there on the 15th (last Wednesday)—as busy as a bee on a tour of inspection, of the defences along the coast. The Charleston Courier letter says:

"He found the planters everywhere eagerly willing to give the labor of their servants, and their own superintendence, if necessary, to the execution of the works ordered, and they will soon be completed.

"He visited specially and made important additions to defensive resources at Stono, North and South Edisto, St. Helena Sound, Beaufort, and the Broad River.

"In some of the places, which we need not specify more particularly, there are admirable opportunities for the use and application of batteries which cannot be seen, but which may be brought into use by a long wire fuse and a slight chain of galvanism or electricity."

ALABAMA, Mobile, May 12.—W. H. Russell, the correspondent of the London Times, visited Forts Morgan and Gaines to-day. He was accompanied by several prominent citizens. Mr. Russell made several important suggestions to Colonel Hardee regarding the fortifications, gathered from his experience in the Crimea, and seemed well pleased with Hardee's command. He says Col. Hardee is every inch a soldier.

VIRGINIA.—The Norfolk papers of the last dates report that the old Navy Yard will soon be impregnable—that big guns are being removed, gun carriages manufactured, new batteries put up on Craney Island, and along the Nansemond river, and that fresh troops had arrived from Georgia, Kentucky, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and other parts of Virginia.

The Minnesota, Commander Stringham, had allowed messengers from the British bark Volant, and the Swedish brig Tyrus, to communicate with their consignees at Norfolk.

The United States troops from Fort Monroe have taken possession of Mill Creek bridge and the well of water on Captain Clark's place. Mrs. Clopton's place is also threatened by Colonel Dimmick. The small trees and undergrowth between the gunner's house and the water fronting the Navy Yard have been burnt. This is on the public property known as St. Helena, where the battery to be raised is now progressing.

Brigadier-General Gwynne, of the Southern forces—the engineer at Charleston harbor—was superintending new batteries.

FLORIDA, Fort Pickens.—We have dates via Mobile to May 12th. Governor Moore, of Alabama, was at Pensacola. More and more troops are there coming in. The Ladies' Battery of two thirty-two pounders for the defence of Pensacola is completed. The correspondent of the Mobile Register writes: "I have been requested by several Mobile friends to let them know a day or two before the fight is to commence, as they would like to come over, look round, and if need be, take a hand. I would give them such information gladly, if it were possible. But commence when it will, I don't think that I risk much in saying that in sixty hours after the first gun is fired, there will not be a Yankee left in Fort Pickens. A hundred and forty guns converging on any one point sixty hours would drive the devil from his hole. For several days it will be essentially a big gun fight—such a fight as was never witnessed on this continent, a cannonade that will shake the land and the sea.

The steamer Powhatan amused herself a couple of hours in firing shell and shot at a target. Those who witnessed it through glasses pronounced the shots buncombe! She had better tried Fort McRae, only two or three miles distant."

Key West, May 14, 1861.—The steamship Suwanee, Captain Crowell, arrived at this port last evening from New Orleans, with a cargo of provisions, &c. She also brought a small mail from the Gulf ports, excepting Pensacola. By her we learn that the schooner W. C. Atwater, Captain Allen, had arrived at Pensacola with a cargo of lumber from Key West; discharged the same at Fort Pickens, and thence sailed for Cedar Keys, where she was seized by the authorities and sent to Apalachicola. It is also reported by Captain Crowell, of the Suwanee, that Captain Allen had been hung by an Apalachicola mob.

Captain Craven, of the steamer Crusader, has taken possession of the steamer Suwanee in the name of the United States. He has now in his possession the yacht Wanderer and steamer Suwanee. The Wanderer will soon be armed, and sent into the Gulf in charge of a lieutenant of the United States Navy. The Suwanee will be detained at this port in charge of the authorities until further orders are received from Washington.

The city of Key West remains loyal to the Government, and all seditious and disaffected persons are to be removed beyond the limits of the island on Monday next, by order of Major William H. French, the commanding officer of the island.

MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS AND MOVEMENTS IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

The Excelsior Brigade.—This fine brigade of four regiments is completed and ready for service. The regiments composing it are as follows:

First Regiment, New York Legion, under Acting Brigadier-General Curtis and Major Judson.

Second Regiment, the Brooklyn Phalanx, Colonel Adams and Lieutenant-Colonel Cross.

Third Regiment, the Fire Zouaves, Colonel John Banlch.

Fourth Regiment, Imperial Zouaves, Colonel Merritt.

The Legion has been organized under able hands, and promises to be an efficient brigade. The headquarters are North William street.

Our Soldiers at Washington and their Fare.—A gentleman who has just returned to this city from Washington says he was invited to dine with some members of the Seventh Regiment. He accepted the invitation, and when he was seated at dinner one of his friends, pushing towards him a piece of half-raw pork on a hard biscuit, requested him "to pitch in and help himself." This was the principal part of the repast, the soldiers being allowed to purchase no extra articles of food but eggs. The same gentleman states that the life of the soldier is anything but an idle one. The first gun is fired at half-past four o'clock in the morning, and all must be in ranks for drill at five o'clock. The drill continues until seven o'clock, at which time breakfast is served. Immediately after breakfast drilling and field exercise commence again, and continue until twelve o'clock, when dinner is ready. At five o'clock in the afternoon the men must all be on hand for dress parade, with their belts, muskets and accoutrements scoured and in good order. From this statement of the case it is evident that the soldier's life is no holiday.

The Union Defence Committee, by virtue of the authority vested in it by the Government at Washington, has selected the following New York regiments to be called into immediate service:

Second Regiment, Colonel G. W. B. Tompkins.

Ninth Regiment, Colonel Hawkins.

Fourteenth Regiment, Colonel Wood, Brooklyn.

Seventy-ninth Regiment (Highland Guard), Lieutenant-Colonel Elliott commanding.

General Order No. 41.

1. By a resolution of the Board of State Officers, the following organization of volunteers is hereby ordered:

First Division, to be commanded by Major-General Dix, is to consist of First Brigade, composed of

First Regiment	Colonel Allen.
Second Regiment	Colonel Carr.
Third Regiment	Colonel Townsend.
Fifth Regiment	Colonel Duryea.
Ninth Regiment	Colonel Hawkins.

And Second Brigade, composed of

Seventh Regiment	Colonel Bendix.
Eighth Regiment	Colonel Blenker.
Eleventh Regiment	Colonel Ellsworth.
Twentieth Regiment	Colonel Weber.

British Volunteers.—Captain R. E. A. Hompton arrived from Boston a few days ago on the steamboat Plymouth Rock, from Stonington, Conn., with more than one hundred men who have enlisted to join the regiment of British volunteers. The men went to the headquarters in the Bowery for inspection. Other reinforcements for this nearly-full regiment are expected from Albany and Montreal. One company from Troy, under command of Captain Howe, joined the regiment the other day. The Newark (N. J.) Mercury says:

"Captain W. W. Armstrong, recruiting officer at Union Hall in this city, sent a squad of fifty men to New York, as recruits to the regiment of British volunteers. They were a fine, able-bodied set of men, and will compare favorably with any in the service. Recruits will be received at Union Hall as usual. British residents are invited to enrol."

No Cavalry Wanted.—Major Armstrong having inquired relative to the acceptance of volunteer cavalry by the Government, Secretary Cameron replied that he would not receive a mounted regiment raised north of Philadelphia. This will be unwelcome news to the colonels and captains who are busy getting up cavalry regiments in this city. Their movement was rather premature in any case, as the Government has made no call except for infantry and riflemen.

The Santee.—The United States frigate Santee will be reported ready for sailing orders on the 1st of June. The Santee is a new ship, 1,726 burthen, and carries fifty guns. She was on the stocks for nearly half a century, and launched in 1855, at the same time that the new steam frigates Niagara, Wabash, &c., which were only ten months building, were put afloat. The Santee will have on her first cruise 500 officers and sailors and fifty marines.

Another Gunboat.—The schooner Henry W. Johnson (formerly a wrecking schooner) has been chartered by the Government. She will carry three guns and cruise around Key West.

Second Regiment Fire Zouaves.—General Nathan P. Graham has been appointed Colonel of this regiment. His ability and experience as an officer eminently qualify him for the command. The regiment has been ordered to hold itself in readiness for immediate departure.

Garibaldi Guard.—This regiment, commanded by Colonel D'Utassy, paraded on the 19th in Tompkins square. By Wednesday the men will be fully uniformed and ready to start at a moment's notice, providing the Union Defence Committee furnishes them with arms.

A Regiment from Troy.—Colonel Carr's regiment (Second Volunteer) from Troy, arrived in this city on the 19th at eleven o'clock. They are quartered at Devlin's new store, Canal street.

Arrival of the Albany Regiment.—The Third Regiment New York Volunteers arrived here on Sunday from Albany. The men, a fine set of fellows, were marched to the barracks in the Park, and are at present quartered there.

The Wilson Zouaves' Encampment.—The chaplain was not called upon on Sunday to do duty for the soldiers under command of Colonel William Wilson. Instead of prayers, they had two regimental drills—one before breakfast, and the other at nine o'clock. Two new companies were mustered into the regiment in the morning, bringing the corps up to the full number required by military regulations. Colonel Wilson's men look very finely, are in a thorough state of discipline, and, whilst outwardly rough, give one the impression that effective service may be expected from them.

Mr. Bristow's Concert.—Mr. George F. Bristow's monster patriotic Union Concert, in aid of the Volunteer Fund, established for the benefit of those who go to the war, will take place on Saturday, May 25, at the Academy of Music. He will be assisted by the New York Philharmonic Society and nearly all the best artists in the city, including Miss C. Hinckley, Miss M. Brainard, Madame Anna Bishop, Madame Stoepel, Miss Bowcroft, Messrs. Aynesley Cook, J. R. Thomas, George W. Wooster and others; also Mr. S. B. Mills, Professors Eben and Dahler, &c., &c., with a full and efficient orchestra. General John A. Dix is Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, sustained by a host of highly influential names. Among them are Simeon Draper, Comptroller Haws, Hon. Fernando Wood, Most Rev. Archbishop Hughes, Rev. Dr. S. H. Tyng, Rev. Dr. Armitage, Rev. Dr. Hutton, Hon. Hamilton Fish and very many others. The excellence of this most noble enterprise commends it to all good and true patriots. It is one in which rich and poor can unite. They will undoubtedly flock thither next Saturday, and fill the house from floor to ceiling.

Departure of the Second Regiment New York State Militia.—Colonel Tompkins's regiment that has been under canvas on the Battery for some time past, left on the 10th for Washington, by way of Baltimore.

National Union Volunteers.—Colonel Colvin E. Pratt's regiment, now quartered in the Park barracks, will be removed to other quarters further up town.

President's Life Guard.—The gentlemen composing the official corps of this regiment were, on the 19th, the recipients of quite a compliment from the Union Defence Committee. They formed in line and marched from the headquarters, corner of Nassau and Beekman streets, to the waiting-room of the Committee, where their commanding officer, Colonel Goodwin, intimated to the person in charge his desire of an inspection of his corps. They were immediately admitted by order of the Chairman, Mr. Simeon Draper, to the private office of the Committee, and reviewed by the members then present. Mr. Draper, we are informed, expressed himself highly pleased at the appearance of the officers, and proffered such aid within his official capacity as would advance the speedy completion of the organization.

Westchester Chasseurs.—This regiment, under command of Colonel Laasing, is about to leave the old quarters, No. 73 Broadway, and go into barracks on Forty-ninth street, North River.

First California Regiment.—Four hundred men belonging to this regiment left the city on the 19th, for Nieuw Dorp, Staten Island, where they will be quartered.

Anderson Zouaves.—Eight hundred men have already been recruited for this regiment. Two companies from Albany and one from Troy will arrive here in a day or two, and attach themselves to Colonel J. Lafayette Riker's regiment. Recruits are received in the large tent erected on Union square.

Constitution Guard.—One company, under command of Captain C. Ray, arrived here on the 10th from Philadelphia, and joined this regiment. Colonel Cock's men are quartered at the corner of Houston and Greene. Recruiting station, No. 632 Broadway.

Empire City Guard.—About five or six hundred men belonging to this regiment assembled at the headquarters, No. 594 Broadway, on Sunday, in order to hear a sermon delivered by the Rev. Mr. Everett. It was a most patriotic discourse, and was listened to with marked attention by the men. Colonel Sheehan, Lieutenant-Colonel Mulligan and the other officers were present.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES OF THE WAR.

Philadelphia, May 17, 1861.—Quite an excitement was created in the upper part of the city this morning by the seizure of a submarine boat, the invention of De Villeroi, a Frenchman. It was going down the river and struck on an island. Four men were found on board. Villeroi says he was about taking it to the navy yard to test; but the officers of the yard disclaim any knowledge of him. The boat was constructed some time since for raising wrecks and other submarine work, but was never put in active use. It is cigar-shaped and made of iron, thirty feet long. It supplies its own air, and will be useful in running under a fleet.

Key West.—The celebrated yacht Wanderer was seized, under suspicious circumstances, on the evening of the 5th inst., and is now lying at the Government wharf, in charge of Lieutenant James M. Duncan, with a prize crew. The Wanderer had been lying in the harbor of Havana upwards of a year, and had left that place the day previous to her seizure.

The steamboat Empress, of St. Louis, was brought to by a shot fired across her bows at Camp Harris, six miles above Memphis, where there is a body of about 400 State troops encamped. When landing, a body of soldiers came aboard, and after examining the freight book, very coolly took possession of a hogshead of sugar, and rolled it ashore, giving as an excuse that they "needed it." Several of the troops examined, without ceremony, the freight book, in search of various articles which they needed. One of them, a German, was particularly anxious to find a box of claret. A portion of them proceeded to the ice-chest of the boat, and were about to help themselves to the boat's supply of vegetables; but upon the very decided remonstrance of the officers of the boat, who represented that they had a large number of passengers, they were induced to forego that luxury. After some parley, a receipt for the sugar was given in the name of the State of Tennessee, and the officers will send a bill for the property to the functionaries at Nashville.

A Good Story.—The Charlestonians tell a good story at their own expense, which well illustrates the want of discipline. A company was keeping guard at the Arsenal. The Colonel of the regiment passing by, saw the sentinel inattentive to his duty. He took away his gun, then entered the Arsenal. A subordinate officer was concocting a cocktail.

"Where is the Captain?" the Colonel asked.

"Up stairs."

"Please say to him that I want to see him."

"Well, after I take a drink," said the subaltern. After swallowing his toddy he went up-stairs to the Captain.

"The Colonel is down stairs, and wants to see you, Captain."

"Well, if he wants to see me more than I do him, just tell him to walk up," said the Captain, who was lying on a bed.

The Colonel went up-stairs, and found the Captain taking things easy. "Sir, you ought to be drilling your company. Your sentinel don't know how to do his duty, and I took his gun away from him."

"Well, I dare say he will be much obliged to you. I reckon he was tired of carrying it."

Another good story is told, which has not found its way into the Charleston papers. The light-boat which was captured has been anchored at the mouth of the creek which leads to Stono River. The guns have been placed on board. The one aiming down the creek is kept loaded with shot, while the one pointing toward the city is used to fire a morning and evening gun. Not long since, when the sunrise gun was fired, a twelve pound ball ripped through a negro's shanty, and lodged in a hotel, greatly to the consternation of an old negro and several boarders. The crew of the light-boat did not discover that the boat had turned with the tide during the night!

A Critical Zouave.—The Washington Star tells this story of a Fire Zouave: "A day or two since a couple of the Firemen Zouaves strolled over the Long Bridge into Virginia, when they came across a small party of Secession scouts. One of the 'Lambs,' beckoning a scout aside, asked him if he belonged to the 'chivalry.' The scout replying in the affirmative, the 'Lamb' proceeded to examine him very minutely, taking off his cap, lifting up the skirts of his coat, &c.; after which he turned, as if disappointed, to his companion, with, 'Why, d—n it, Joe, he's just like other men!'"

While Colonel Anderson was talking with some officers, one of the number congratulated him upon being elevated to the rank of Colonel.

"Oh," said he, "I am only getting back to my former position. I was a Colonel in 1833, over the Illinois volunteers in the Black Hawk War."

"Old Abe was there?"

"Yes; a Captain. I ranked him then," said the Major; "but he is ahead of me now."

CAMP CAMERON, GEORGETOWN HEIGHTS, WASHINGTON,

Where the Seventh Regiment of the New York Militia are now stationed.

However civilised a man may be, and however cultivated his taste, there is an inherent love of adventure in his nature, which culminates in camp life, and which leads him on, despite of the Damoclean sword of sudden battle which ever hangs over the soldier. Wordsworth, in one of his finest sonnets, has admirably depicted the stern resolve of the warrior when he goes forth on his perilous task:

> That what we would perform in arms we must;
> We read its dictates in our children's eyes,
> In the wife's smile, and in the silent dust
> Of those who were before us.

A patriot soldier is as different as light from dark from the paid myrmidons of a European despot.

It is this feeling which has made our militia so great a favorite with the public, and foremost among them stands the Seventh Regiment, or National Guard of New York.

Our Special Artist has sent us an admirable sketch of the encampment and headquarters of this regiment at Camp Cameron, which has been formed on Georgetown Heights, about two and a half miles from Washington. It is immediately situated on a very beautiful spot, forming part of the grounds of Mr. Stone, a gentleman of considerable wealth, and who has vacated his mansion for the accommodation of the officers of the regiment and a body guard composed of the engineer corps. The prospect from the front piazza of the house is very beautiful, commanding a view of the Potomac for several miles. It is situated on a knoll, and surrounded with shady trees, while a lawn in front gives it a park-like appearance. The men are encamped in a large field at the back of the garden.

One of the regiment thus describes their mode of life: "We are under strict military discipline. Rise at five, roll call; breakfast at seven; at nine drill one hour; dinner served at twelve; five, dress parade; and lights out at nine. Guards are set, with loaded pieces, and all know that to make any infringement on rules is to be shot. Our room is twelve by ten feet, and when all are stretched out at night it is close packing; but we are so much better fixed than the rest that we are satisfied." Another adds that "one of their greatest treats is the regularity with which they get their newspapers." A luxury unheard of in the days of Julius Cæsar, who never had the pleasure of seeing himself in print; a privilege common now to every hero who does anything worthy of praise.

IMPORTANT DIRECTIONS TO VOLUNTEERS.

The Private Secretary of Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, issues these directions to volunteers, which are the substance of a report made to the State Medical Commission by the eminent physician, Dr. Ware:

Soldiers should recollect that, in a campaign, where one dies in battle from three to five die of disease. You should be on your guard therefore more against this than the enemy, and you can do much for yourselves which nobody can do for you.

1. Avoid especially all use of ardent spirits. If you will take them, take them rather after fatigue than before. But tea and coffee are much better. Those who use ardent spirits are always the first to be sick and the most likely to die.

2. Avoid drinking freely of very cold water, especially when hot or fatigued, or directly after meals. Water quenches thirst better when not very cold and sipped in moderate quantities slowly—though less agreeable. At meals tea, coffee and chocolate are best. Between meals the less the better. The safest in hot weather is molasses and water with ginger or small beer.

3. Avoid all excesses and irregularities in eating and drinking. Eat sparingly of salt and smoked meats, and make it up by more vegetables, as squash, potatoes, peas, rice, hominy, Indian meal, &c., when you can get them. Eat little between when you have plenty at meals.

4. Wear flannel all over in all weathers. Have it washed often when you can—when not, have it hung up in the sun. Take every opportunity to do the same by all your clothing, and keep everything about your person dry, especially when it is cold.

5. Do not sit, and especially do not sleep upon the ground, even in hot weather. Spread your blanket upon hay, straw, shavings, brushwood, or anything of the kind. If you sleep in the day, have some extra covering over you.

6. Sleep as much as you can and whenever you can. It is better to sleep too warm than too cold.

7. Recollect that cold and dampness are great breeders of disease. Have a fire to sit around whenever you can, especially in the evening and after rain, and take care to dry everything in and about your persons and tents.

8. Take every opportunity of washing the whole body with soap and water. Rub well afterwards. If you bathe, remain in the water but a little while.

9. If disease begins to prevail, wear a wide bandage of flannel around the bowels.

10. Keep in the open air, but not directly exposed to a hot sun. When obliged to do this, a thin, light, white covering of the head and neck, in the form of a cap with a cape, is a good protection.

11. Wear shoes with very thick soles, and keep them dry. When on the march, rubbing the feet after washing with oil, fat or tallow, protects against foot sores.

MEXICO.—On the 2d of May, we learn from Vera Cruz, that the Hon. Thomas Corwin, United States Minister to Mexico, and suite, Sir Charles Wyke, Minister from England, and Mr. Von Kint, Chargé des Affaires from Belgium, arrived at Vera Cruz by the English steamer Solent, from Havana, on the 30th ult. The three Legations are to proceed at once to the city of Mexico. It is considered that now Mexico has a chance of realizing a regular and stable Government, it being reported in diplomatic circles that the Ministers of England, France and the United States have agreed to support the authority of Juarez. This is considered as a great triumph for American interests.

Mr. Theophilus Popp, of Poppville, in Popp county, fancying himself to be very popular with his lady love, "popped the question" to her under the poplar tree, when she referred him to her poppy, who, when asked for his consent, laboring under the influence of ginger pop, popped him out of the door to the tune of "Pop goes the weasel!"

ENCAMPMENT OF COLONEL ELLSWORTH'S NEW YORK FIRE ZOUAVES, ON THE HEIGHTS O

ENCAMPMENT OF ELLSWORTH'S ZOUAVES.

This famous body of fiery and active soldiers have at length got free from the trammels and confinement of their city quarters, a change which is both pleasant and beneficial to them. They are encamped on the heights opposite the Navy Yard, Washington, D. C., and, as our sketch will show, are most comfortably situated. Colonel Ellsworth is indefatigable in drilling his regiment, and his men most willingly second his efforts by close attention to duty and alacrity in the performance of all the details of camp life. It is the opinion of the best military authorities that Ellsworth's New York Fire Zouaves will prove one of the most effective and efficient regiments in the field.

GENERAL CADWALLADER, WITH HIS DIVISION OF PENNSYLVANIA TROOPS

Entering the Harbor of Baltimore.

On Wednesday, May 15th, the steamers and propellers containing General Cadwallader's division were seen entering the harbor of Baltimore. The troops consisted of the First Division of Pennsylvania volunteers, under the command of General Cadwallader, intended for the occupation of Baltimore. The fleet of boats was cordially greeted on its way up the harbor, the large ships and the small pungies displaying the American flag.

THE LONG BRIDGE CONNECTING WASHINGTON

With Alexander's Island.

The Long Bridge over the Potomac, which connects Washington with Alexander's Island, is how jealously guarded by the Federal troops. Our sketches show it from two points of view, one from the Washington side, and the other from the Alexander's Island side. The two smaller sketches on page 28 are interesting views on Alexander's Island.

BARRICADES AT THE TREASURY, WASHINGTON, D. C.

While the Capitol was in a defenceless state and open to any sudden assault of the Secession troops, it was deemed advisable to put the public buildings in as good a state to resist attack as circumstances would permit. In addition to fortifying other Government offices, the Treasury Building was barricaded in such a way as to offer the greatest possible obstruction to a storming party, and the best defence for the besieged. Our sketch shows the planking which barred every entrance, secured by ponderous beams of wood running across from door to door, so as to entirely blockade all passage, thus rendering it necessary to storm each room and gallery before possession of the building could be obtained. The ample force which has now rendered the safety of Washington secure has also rendered the previous precautions unnecessary, but the exigencies of the time warranted their erection, and those precautionary measures were proofs of the determination of the authorities to defend the Capitol to the last.

THE NAVAL ACADEMY, ANNAPOLIS.

The Naval Academy of Annapolis was founded in 1845 for the education of young persons intended for the United States naval service, and in 1853 had one hundred and seventy-six students. Since then the number of pupils has very much increased, and although it has been so short a time established it has produced several officers of great ability.

The route to Washington by Annapolis was chosen immediately after the riotous demonstrations in Baltimore, and the Naval Academy with its grounds and dock became the scene of great excitement, all the troops intended for Washington having to encamp there during the period between the time of their debarkation and their departure for Washington. We need hardly say that the city of Annapolis has been more than usually alive during the past few weeks.

Since the recent trouble in Baltimore, and the burning of the United States vessels at Norfolk, the students have been transferred to Newport, Rhode Island, where they will complete their nautical education.

THE NEW YORK SEVENTH REGIMENT AT ANNAPOLIS.

It will be remembered that our gallant Seventh Regiment was among the first of the Northern troops which arrived at Annapolis, and to them fell the duty, in conjunction with the noble Eighth Massachusetts Regiment, of opening the way to Washington. Laying down rails, repairing bridges, locomotive and baggage cars, besides guarding every point of the road, may be enumerated as portions of their first campaign duty. How well both regiments behaved, how ably they fulfilled every part of a soldier's duty is a matter of history, and the hearty friendship which sprang up between the two regiments, cemented by soldierly acts of good fellowship and liberal interchange of generous courtesies, speaks well for the manly character of the men of both regiments. Our Artist has sketched the encampment of the Seventh on the Battery at Annapolis, which we engrave this week.

ARREST OF SUPPOSED SECESSIONIST SPIES.

There is no branch of war so desperate, and yet so despised, as that of espionage, for an ignominious death is inevitable upon discovery, and to escape detection a rare combination of qualities is indispensable, if anything like vigilance is displayed by the other party. Major André occupies the most illustrious rank in this class, although he rather belongs to that of the secret negotiator than the spy. There have been several arrests lately on the suspicion of being spies, the most important of which are those of Edward de Grandval and Brooks, alias Connor, accurate portraits of whom we now present to our readers. Edward de Grandval is known by name to the public on account of his brother, Oscar de Grandval, having been killed some years ago by a young Cuban desperado, named Cueva, as he was leaving the residence of Judge Charles, of Hoboken. He is of a very respectable family, originally, as may be readily inferred from the name, French, and for several years kept a classical academy in Hudson terrace, Hoboken. He was arrested on the 5th at Annapolis, under very suspicious circumstances, and upon being searched sketches were found upon him of the encampments at the Junction and also of Annapolis.

The other is a young man of most respectable family, which has resided for many years in Maryland. His name is Brooks, or Connor, since it seems he has gone by both these names. The exact offence he is charged with is opening some Government despatches entrusted to his care, and it is said that he has communicated the contents to a third party. A telegraphic despatch says that he had confessed his crime to Commandant Smith, and had begged to have an interview with a priest.

RECRUITING FOR THE NAVY.

Very few of our readers have ever, we believe, penetrated into the obscure and not very sweet smelling locality in which the Naval Recruiting Depot, which we illustrate, is situated. As a general thing, it is one of the dirtiest streets in the city, and enjoys the double odor of old junk and loose morals. It contains a large number of those dens called "sailor traps," where the hard-working tar is robbed of everything—his character, health and money. When literally haggared, and in the last stages of rum-besotted despair, the naval recruiting rendezvous offers a sure refuge for the able-bodied seaman, and Jack, following the nautical adage, "any port in a storm," enters and becomes one of Uncle Sam's men for a long or short cruise, as the case may be.

The naval service is not popular with seamen, and many eye the entrance to the rendezvous with suspicion and misgiving, and not a few hitch up their waistbands, and turn their quids and themselves in another direction. In the stirring times of war, however, recruiting for the navy goes on briskly. Our sketch represents an excited scene at the depot immediately after the President's call for an increase of the navy. Hundreds offered every day under the excitement of a probable brush with the Southern Privateers.

THE RHODE ISLAND REGIMENT IN THE PATENT OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Our readers will remember the magnificent appearance which the crack regiment from Rhode Island made as they passed through Broadway to their place of embarkation en route to Washington.

their looks and their bearing proclaimed them work-a-day soldiers, men to be depended upon at times of the greatest emergency. They endured the privations of the voyage and the march without a murmur, and entered Washington with buoyant step and high spirits. Their appearance there was hailed with pleasure, and as they marched to their quarters at the Patent Office they attracted universal attention, and were loudly cheered along the whole route. Everything was done for their comfort that could be done under the circumstances, and our Special Artist has sketched a portion of the sleeping arrangements provided for those gallant Rhode Islanders.

PARTING WITH FRIENDS—GOING TO THE WAR.

During the few past weeks the streets of our city have witnessed many sad and tender scenes of parting. Mothers taking leave of their sons, wives of their husbands, sisters of their brothers and maidens of their lovers. There was much sorrow and much weeping, gentle exhortation and earnest prayers, but no remonstrance, no complaining; all seemed sustained in their great affliction by a spirit of pure and deep enthusiasm for the cause of their country, which dictated a noble self-sacrifice, unselfishly and unrepiningly yielded. All honor to the brave, good, gentle and noble women who could so exalt their duty above the natural and dear claims of domestic ties and home affections.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

The Charentais tells the following tale, which has already had many counterparts in the French press: "As a wealthy gentleman of Jouzac, in the Charente, was with his wife a few days back coming from Spain in a postchaise, he, at a steep ascent in the Pyrenees, got out to walk, letting the vehicle go on. After a while a man suddenly issued from a wood, and, presenting a revolver, threatened death if the traveller did not allow himself to be robbed quietly. Seeing that resistance was useless, the gentleman permitted the man to take his purse, in which were about 2,000 francs, his watch, breastpin and a diamond ring. The thief then turned to leave, but, stepping back, he made the gentleman give up his great coat, and threw to him contemptuously, in exchange, his own ragged jacket. The traveller took the latter, and, fearing to catch cold, put it on. On joining his wife in the postchaise, after telling her what had occurred, he examined the pockets of his strange garment, and, to his astonishment, found not only his purse, ring, watch and pin, but a gold snuff-box and another purse! The thief, in his anxiety to obtain the gentleman's coat, had forgotten the property deposited in the pockets of his own jacket."

The Pleasant Present not Enjoyed because of the Unpleasant Future.—John Foster could not heartily enjoy the summer weather, for thinking how every sunny day that shone upon him was a downward step towards the winter gloom. Each indication that the season was progressing, even though progressing as yet only to greater beauty, filled him with great grief. "I have seen a fearful sight to-day," he would say, "I have seen a buttercup."

The Poles in Paris are appearing in their national costumes, with the idea of going to Warsaw. In the meantime it is a pretty bit of masquerading, and the Cracovienne will be the fashion of the day in our saloons. The affair will end in tailoring and fiddling.

A new opera is announced, "La Reine de Saba." It is by Gounod.

Groups of people "did business" in the Duke d'Aumale's pamphlet. As much as forty francs was given for a single copy for immediate delivery, but bargains were made at ten, fifteen and twenty francs for time. This is a fact. Already 70,000 copies have been distributed.

A Spaniard, named Signor Monturiol, has discovered the means of constructing a vessel by means of which he and a crew can live at the bottom of the sea. We should like to have the nomination of the crew of Signor Monturiol, and the dating of their return to dry land again. We could make up a very nice party, political and social, for a sojourn amongst the fishes.

A Madrid letter states that a ball recently given by the Duchess of Medina-Celi is the great subject of conversation in that city. On the occasion alluded to there was a special quadrille composed of all the characters in "Don Quixote," in costumes copied from the engravings in the grand edition of that work published by the Spanish Academy. A French gentleman personated the knight of La Mancha; the Duchess was represented by the Duchess de Fernand Nunes, and of course Sancho was not forgotten. On the following day the Duke de Medina-Celi had photographs taken of his guests, to the number of two hundred, all colored with the utmost care, to be formed into an album. It is said that this caprice will cost the Duke some 15,000 francs.

A frightful tragedy has taken place within the last month on the coast of Abyssinia. King Negouziah, the rival of the Emperor Theodocius, having been beaten in a pitched battle with the Emperor's troops, has been put to death by flaying, his body being afterwards suspended on a gibbet for two days, together with the corpses of two of his most devoted followers. France loses in Negouziah an ally who had already given a pledge of his sincere amity in his cession of one of the best harbors on the coast.

Lion Hunting at the Cape.—We have been informed, says the Cape Argus, that Mr. George Reynolds, of Queenstown, shot a full-grown male lion in the bush, close to the Rev. Mr. Waters's mission station, a few days ago. The king of the forest had been preying on the stock of a farmer named Ferreira, having killed three oxen belonging to him, and also a mare belonging to a Hottentot working in the bush. After the latter was killed, a party was formed, consisting of a few Englishmen and natives, among whom was Mr. Reynolds, who happened to be there at the time with some wagons fetching timber. They all sallied out with guns, and about eight A. M. they came upon the lion, which was feeding on the dead body of the mare. As soon as the lion saw the party approach he made off into the bush, growling, feeling, no doubt, vexed at being disturbed in his repast, and was followed by a little dog, which commenced barking. Presently a Hottentot boy called out that the lion was coming in the direction of the party, when most of them got up into trees close by, Reynolds (or George, as he is familiarly styled), who happened to be on the outskirts of the bush, remained standing where he was, when his majesty trotted up towards him to within about forty yards, and then stood and faced him, roaring tremendously, causing the ground apparently to shake. Reynolds, who must have possessed a high degree of courage, raised the gun to take aim, when the roar of the lion caused his hand to vibrate and swing about, and his hat, he states, was sensibly raised from off his head. He quickly adjusted his wideawake, pulling it down over his eyes to shade the sun, and again raised his gun, and with unerring precision shot the lion through the kidneys. Before going up close to the animal he fired another shot, the ball passing into the brain. The party took off the skin, and we are informed that Mr. Waters has it in his possession. Sir Walter Currie, who was hunting in the neighborhood, regretted much his absence, but went subsequently to see the skin at the station, where he passed a high eulogium on Reynolds for his courage.

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

A crooked gentleman, on his arrival at Bath, was asked by another what place he had travelled from.

"I came straight from London," replied he.

"Did you so?" said the other. "Then you have been terribly warped by the way."

A man the other day was brought before a country magistrate for poaching in preserved covers.

"So, my man," said the worthy justice, "you've got into a preserve, eh?"

"Noa," said the man; "please your worship, I've got into a pickle."

A doctor in Wisconsin being disturbed one night by a burglar, and having no ball or shot for his pistol, noiselessly loaded the weapon with dry, hard pills, and gave the intruder a "dose" which he thinks will go far towards curing the rascal of a very bad ailment.

A young lady who gave herself many airs, having contemplated a sojourn to France, a friend expressed a doubt whether she would condescend to talk English when she came back.

"Oh," said one, who knew what her powers of language were, "she'll never forget the vulgar tongue!"

BROOKS, ALIAS CONNOR, A SPY, CAPTURED BY THE U. S. TROOPS AT ANNAPOLIS.

Rose, private secretary to Louis XIV., having married his daughter to M. Portail, president of the parliament, was constantly receiving from his son-in-law complaints of his daughter's ill-temper. To one of these he at length answered, that he was fully convinced of her misconduct, and was resolved to punish her for it; in short, if he heard any more of it he would disinherit her. He heard no more.

During the residence of the Prince of Wales at Oxford it was not unnatural that the dons should pay him a good deal of attention, with a view to future preferment. One of them, however, who is remarkable for his independent spirit, when his turn came to preach the University sermon, chose the following for his text: "There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many?"

During the recent meeting of the Emperors at Warsaw a ballet entitled "Robert and Bertrand; or, The Two Thieves," was being performed at the theatre; but on account of the simultaneous presence of the two Emperors at the performance, the police, to show them an attention as witty as it was delicate, ordered the piece to be called on the bills, for that night only, "Robert and Bertrand," and suppressed the second half of the title, namely, "The Two Thieves."

When the late King of Denmark was visiting England he very frequently honored Sir Thomas Robinson with his company, though the knight spoke French in a very imperfect manner, and the king had scarcely any knowledge of English. One day, when Sir Thomas was in company with the late Lord Chesterfield, he boasted much of his intimacy with the king, and added, "that he believed the monarch had a greater friendship for him than any man in England."

"How report lies!" exclaimed Lord Chesterfield; "I heard no later than to-day, that you never met but a great deal of bad language passed between you."

By fastidious people Margate has frequently been termed "a continuation of Wapping," and wagers have been laid that at least one lady on board the steamer "thither bound" would recognize her laundress or housemaid. A celebrated musical composer—a wag in his way—recently visited the Isle of Thanet, and, while pacing the deck during a heavy squall, was extremely annoyed to perceive that the spray had damaged the lace and other finery in which a young lady (as he supposed) had bedizened herself. She "heeded not," but turning to an elderly female, who proved to be her mother, exclaimed,

"La! ain't the waves jist like our soapsuds?"

The mamma was wroth and speedily doffed her gentility by saying, "Hang it, why when you comes out a lady, can't you leave the tub at home?"

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XVI.

is a small but commodious room, the furniture of which was more conducive to comfort than show and luxury, though early autumn a bright fire burnt in the polished stove, which reflected manifold on its glittering surface the high mantelpiece frames, now mounting up the dark chimney, now crouching low, till all was glowing red, giving a coloring to each article of furniture in the room. The recessed apartment, the breakfast table was spread with choice delicacies of the season, both in game and fruits, and on a sofa, drawn close to the fire, reclined the Count d'Almaine, listlessly scanning over a morning paper.

"Good morning, my Virgie," he uttered, in a peerish tone to his valet, "after me to have a glimmering of sunshine; don't let it be always night with me. There, be moderate, do not allow the whole glow to fall on the paper, if your design is not to blind me; there and again, now you are to the other extreme."

After the blind was adjusted partly to his satisfaction, he asked, "Has the letter-bag come?"

"Yes, monsieur, Adele has taken it to madame's dressing-room. Shall I inquire about monsieur's letters?"

"Yes, val," he replied; "but," he added, quickly, "did my mother say she intended breakfasting with me this morning?"

"Yes," replied the valet, "Adele brought a message to monsieur half an hour ago."

"Well, see about the letters, and say I wish breakfast."

The valet quitted the room, and d'Almaine, throwing the paper from him, paced rapidly up and down, exclaiming, "I know not why I am thus anxious for letters, they will not bring peace to my mind. No; that was banished by Lucille's parting—her perfidy—she who looked and spoke so innocently, can she be false? Yes, or why not have sent me one word, to say only if one child lives. This suspense is torturing, for my sanguine mind sometimes dares to whisper, hope. I will to the valley. I will go, if only to pardon her."

The valet entered with the letters. d'Almaine caught them eagerly, his quick eye glanced over the superscriptions, then threw them carelessly upon the table, again took up the sofa.

The countess entered in becoming dishabille; she drew near the couch, and leaning his forehead with her lips, saying kindly, "Good morning, my son; I am happy to see the black ribbon discarded from the wounded arm, although it did give an interesting feature to your appearance."

An unintelligible response fell from the count's lips as he placed himself at the breakfast table. He woe pale and haggard, and apparently without appetite, for he helped himself to some, which, after mincing in his plate, he sent away nearly untouched; a peach and grapes were severally tried, and shared the same fate.

The countess watched him with a somewhat troubled countenance, as throwing himself back in the chair, and fixing his eyes on the glowing embers in the grate, his thoughts wandered far from the society he was in. After a long silence, she said, "My son, why dwell so deeply on the past; discard from your mind the ungrateful woman who slighted it, and let health and happiness once more give vigor to your frame and light to your eye."

The count evidently winced at a part of his mother's speech, for he moved uneasily in his chair, and there was a flash in his eyes as he answered, "Mother, I have forbidden this subject. If you have any regard or feeling for me, you will not again broach what you must be aware is hateful to me."

The countess sighed as she replied, "Ah, you will have to peace, I foresee, till the hated connection is annulled, then I trust that it you would be yourself, and another union formed in your own sphere would restore to you your self-respect, and insure to you the esteem of your friends."

"Another union!" he returned, bitterly. "Enough, enough, say no more. On that head there will be no change."

"My son, you still love this woman," said the countess.

"With almost a woman's weakness," he replied, pacing the floor hurriedly. "She was pure, so childlike a year ago. Can it be possible that in that short time her nature can have become so perverted? I sometimes think she must have been seduced, that she is the victim of some treachery, did not her absence suggest that belief. Mother, why do you not let me see Sorde? She is all truth. A dozen words from her would convince me. Tell me why is she banished from her home?"

"I have told you," said the countess, hastily. Because she disobeyed my will in reference to the Duke de Paleron, and she returns not here, nor to any dwelling of mine until she consents to become his wife."

The Duke de Paleron!" blazed through the closed teeth of the count. "Madame," he added, turning sternly towards her, "ask your heart, if it still exists, why you inculd desire such a union. You admit he is the destroyer of your son's happiness, would you sacrifice your daughter's to his also?"

An angry and vindictive answer had risen to the countess's lips, but its utterance was stopped by the entrance of Virgie, to announce the arrival of the dresses from Madame Belois.

Both mother and son were glad of an interruption to their dialogue, and the countess desired the young woman to be shown upstairs. D'Almaine was about retiring, but in her blandest manner she entreated him to stay, and indifferent as he was to all appertaining to the ball, which he had determined on not attending, he went to the window, and resumed his perusal of the newspaper.

Lucille who had been some time waiting in an anteroom, not having had any desire to head the letter given to her by Madame Belois to the housekeeper, now promptly at the summons entered by the summons, and letting full her thick veil, and drawing tightly her shawl round her, followed the servant, and unobserved and reverently carried the box, for she had forgotten all its contents.

At the door leading to the drawing-room Lucille pressed both hands upon it, as still the unconscious, but how impassive! She paused for a moment on the threshold, and in that moment what a host of wild, throbbing thoughts rushed through it. Here she was once, the mistress of the costly mansion, with the noble retinue of domestics, in magnificently decorated rooms, vying even in splendour with royalty—more helpless than its meanest dependents; for they had free ingress to their master's dwelling, while she, like a criminal or a mendicant, by mean stratagem alone could enter the gates that should have opened wide their portals to admit her.

Let us hope it was the first, the only time that a wife of the honor of d'Almaine trod its wide corridors, timid, heartbroken, lest, when known, she should be thrust forth from its roof, an outcast from her husband's heart, an alien to his family.

Though but a moment it was one of trial, such as we hope few

CAPTAIN HARE

Demanding from Marshal Kane the Arms taken from the Massachusetts Soldiers.

One of the incidents of the occupation of Baltimore by General Butler was the demand made upon the Marshal of Baltimore, Kane, by Captain Hare, in the name of the United States for the arms taken from the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment by the mob of Baltimore on the 19th of April. The Marshal would only render them on an order from the Police Commissioners. The mob which surrounded the principal group was inclined to be riotous, but the police kept their demonstrations within bounds.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

By the Persia we learn that England proposes to treat the South as "belligerents"—that is to recognise their privateers as bona fide, and to open her ports for the safety of them and their prizes. The United States Government has notified its intention of agreeing to the declaration with regard to privateering, signed 1856, by England, France, Prussia, Austria, Russia, Sardinia and Turkey. The reception of this notification must necessarily change the intentions of the British Government. The Queen of England has issued a proclamation, withdrawing the protection of her flag from English subjects joining in the civil war in America.

The Government seized on Monday, the 29th inst., by a simultaneous movement, all the telegraph on tie of the American Telegraph Company in New York, and the principal Northern cities. It is said that a great amount of secession correspondence has been discovered, and a large number of wealthy and influential persons are implicated as active in bringing the Secession movements. It is supposed that this discovery will cause a stampede from certain cities of the North.

A PRIVATE dispatch announces that the Southern Confederacy has established a blockade at Memphis, prohibiting the passage of all upward bound boats.

CHAPTER XVII.

D'AMASNE hurriedly threw the shawl of Lucille round her, whispering as he did so words of love and confidence to all the emotions the harsh words of the countess had excited; while the latter, with proud defiance and irrepressible rage, kept her flashing eyes upon them, her lips at times opposing as if to give utterance to the bitterness of her spirit, but she would control herself and leave him with her squeezed like a single flue, whilst her small foot moved with such rapidity that the lace flounces of her dress trembled with emotion.

This scene, so painful to D'Amasne and Lucille, lasted but a few short minutes. A light vestmill was heard on the stairs, and until it several voices reached them, although her words were inaudible.

"Mademoiselle Eudie de Vernt-Gondelaure has returned to us!"

The countess started to her feet, and Lucille half approached the door as a light step was heard upon the corridor, some orders given in the corridor, and an anxious voice said:

"Is my lady in her mother's apartments; it is her hour to rest. Is she alone?"

The words were scarcely pronounced when the door opened, and Eudie, dressed in the height of fashion, her countenance radiant with bonnet, followed by Charles de Blerille, entered.

"Lucille," she exclaimed, in a joyous tone, catching her in her arms, "this is unlooked-for delight! My interference is not required, you have entered the forbidden castle without any aid, driven the demoniac, jealousy and suspicion, from your knight's head, and, relying upon my promise, Oh, this is delightful—delightful! but you see I did not forget my promise. My first act of freedom was to make you an heiress in my stead, and Jules, dear Jules, how long since we met! Ah, you are pale and thin," she added, raising her head from his shoulder, and with a look of tenderness at her sister Lucille, you have suffered; but it is passed, and the road to happiness is before us. But——"

She stopped in visible trepidation. She then for the first time beheld her mother, who, pale and trembling, was standing in the middle two or three steps towards her, but the countess waved her from her.

"Come not near me," she cried in a cold, haughty tone; "if you have repudiated love you have duty to pay to me, and you cannot escape the vigilance of the superior of St. Ursule."

Eudie, though startled at her mother's proud spirit, and, stung by her coldness, she answered nearly as haughty a tone as she would have addressed a stranger.

"I would willingly submit to your displeasure if I could see Urville before I met my mother's orders. To rejoice that I have been saved from a cruel marriage, to implore your forgiveness, and place me for ever beyond her control!"

"Yes! Urville would be expected to take without my sanction!" exclaimed the countess. "The power I have hitherto exerted over you is useless, but you have not yet attained majority, a parent has over her child. In your disobedience it has escaped your discernment, independent of the duty you owe to me, under the walls of the convent you have deserted, which shall be before the sun sets again, that you owe to Urville the duty of a wife, and a mother and a religious house can place over you."

"Urville shall never be my husband!" said Lucille while her mother spoke, and as she concluded a smile of triumph lighted her eyes.

"Your will, mother!" said Eudie, "is stronger than your power. Thank heaven I am free from you, and, as for Urville, whose only child owes a parent, the command a parent has over her offspring; and until you forced it I never thought of disputing it. I never have loved you would you have attended it, and will even try to do so now if you will but be reasonable, and not talk of convents."

Her voice softened as she pronounced the last words. She gazed sad over her countenance, but her features became at her sweep in haughty defiance, exclaiming, tauntingly,

"Yes, as the convent of St. Ursule I shall be given, and——"

"Talk not of that place, madam," said Eudie. "I—we all—have sufficient of it; but there is no time to spend in words. Let us prepare for putting her arm within Charles de Blerille's, who had several times made an indistinct sound as if desirous to be heard, and as she continued, "and while my husband's arms and voice are raised in supplication to my mother, the machinations of the Count de Vernt, your daughter, like your son, preferring a happy union to a splendid misery, will fly with me to the altar, and be united immediately."

The countess, with a scream, sank on a chair, her pride and haughty spirit for a moment overwhelmed by the unexpected announcement.

"Married!" she cried. "Both children, for whom I had such high hopes, such expectations, decreased! One, my favored son, the husband of the daughter of a lady-in-waiting to the queen, and a young soldier, his whole wealth lying in his constellation."

"Constellation, mother!" said Eudie, with a look of their mother, rose as the same time and took her hand, but her momentary humility vanished at the touch, for she, too, was moved down deep with vehemence, saying,

"Beguile I implore you both! From henceforth I am childless. You have chosen your fate; may it blight your hopes. Go to your husbands, Eudie," said she to Emilie, "to your husband, Lucille; you feel the loss of the mother you have braved."

"The mother we have not lost, dear sister," added Emilie, in the same tone.

The countess's eyes glanced for a moment upon her, and they were averted to fall on Lucille, who, trembling at the scene between the mother and daughters, had drawn close to her side in the room. The affection depicted on their countenances gave a fresh stimulus to her anger, and Lucille quickly said:

"You," she said, "are the hated cause of all you have witnessed, you inclosed my son in the cloister, you have driven from me my destiny the contract that bound my daughter to him. As you have robbed me of my children, you shall be robbed of your own. Not you may be irrevocably parted from you, when you may weep in silence and despair, and——"

"Silence, silence!" fell in loud, disdainful tones from the lips of the countess.

And another, more solemn than the former, said: "And I will be no silence the affrighted Eudie to her bosom, while Emilie, as she sided in soothing her, cast a glance of exhaustion at their mother as she quitted the room.

It was a relief when they were gone, and Lucille more freely, and Emilie asked,

"Jules, of course you quit this house. It would be an insult to your wife and a triumph to your mother to remain an hour beneath her roof."

"The carriage is ordered," said Jules. "We are off for the chateau as soon as I have conducted you to your father's house with us?"

"No, not with you," replied Emilie; "but we will follow in a few days. Oh, Jules, though I carried things so lofty with my mother, I cannot forget the love I have borne you, and, though I have no needless, but before I leave Paris I will make one more attempt at reconciliation."

The count shook his head.

"It will be useless, but her present mood," he said; "nor can I with my present feelings, deem her worthy of a moment's consideration that would delay by a single hour our return to the chateau in the loudest point.

"But stay in your mother," said Lucille, solemnly. "Bear her resentment against her. Mistaken by her pride, she has but endeavored to add by your duty. Remain by her side, and endeavor to reconcile her."

"If you can look thus tenderly on her offenses," cried Emilie, in a burst of feeling, "I will not be less generous. I will remain with her, and endeavor to heal the wounds she has made. Jules, you have my permission to quit Paris, but I will not leave Lucille, returning her embrace, "and though I hope not again for another interview with Madame D'Amasne, in part, as far as I am concerned, shall be buried in oblivion."

"I do not agree with you," said D'Amasne, gravely. "My mother has cared too deeply for me easily to forget the wounds she has inflicted, and which, if I am to judge from Lucille's intervention, might have been too deep for cure."

"Ah!" exclaimed Lucille, owing to the perseverance of Lucille. Had she slept calmly in her secluded valley, I should have languished to death in St. Ursule. Now, that Lucille has escaped the lee of De Paiseon, would scarcely have escaped the wounds inflicted by our mother."

"And I," said Lucille, "what would have been my fate?" smiling as she spoke, to drive away the melancholy on the countenances of the brother and sister.

"And mine?" chimed in Charles de Blerille, with a merry laugh. "I should have been left to sigh in single blessedness, without the chance of a second Emilie to break the chorus."

"Ah, the chorus would have been broken sooner than your heart," said Emilie, in the same merry strain. "Mrs beaute are too hard to be easily captured. I verily believe you have come to flatter their self-love by giving them our affection, that they show us anything like kindness or regard."

"I must stop your sarcasm en mon before it proceeds to too great a length," said D'Amasne, "or we shall lose the carriage horses.

The carriage was now announced, and they all descended to the courtyard. Annette, with a joyful face, was already in the cambric, and the servants in the hall of the mansion. She greeted Lucille with a happy, meaning smile, and "Gracious me! who would have thought it?" was heard from the lips of the footmen, coachmen and Russian ruffles of Madame Belair.

The latter, as Lucille passed her, stepped wide for the carriage of their master to pass through. Jacqueline stood beside her with a countenance of the most triumphant joy. She had overheard the whole conversation. Eudie had hastily recalled the porter's lodge, and as the latter closed the door, she exclaimed:

"Ah, ma cousine, you have escaped the convent, and you are now the true mistress of the house, and of its master's heart! Ah, Lucille, you have settled the affair with your self-will, and the old dowager on my side, for I did not obey her commands."

But Lucille no longer resented this with the spirit she was not established; for she suspected, and sagely, that the "old dowager" would give good cause for displeasure, and that her sister was the herself in opposition she knew the result. In anticipation, then, of that, might avert the storm, and as the carriage drove off she were note but her husband and the house-cat to vent it upon, both of these in the courtyard. Annette took shelter from it at the nearest stewbeup, and the unfortunate quadruped, less active than the former, was kicked by the coachman, and sought for safety further assault by taking for the time safe refuge in the Sunday cap and gown of her mistress.

As she passed through the last harbor of Paris, Lucille looked fond upon the spot where she had first met Jules D'Amasne.

"Alice!" she said, "gay centre of refinement and civilization! How I have regretted my separation from thee! Yet, in my heart and though I quit you now with hope and love before me, I with not to return to thee. Oh, Jules, how I have longed to see you in the quiet seclusion of my own valley, or in the chateau De Noi, shall I strive to be in my native element."

CHAPTER XVIII.

On the second day after their departure from Paris they arrived in Normandy. Lucille's heart throbbed as the chateau D'Amasne was pointed. The setting sun of an autumnal day was just shedding its splendor on the scene, and the light fell upon the towers and turrets the new-fit-formed terrace garden, with even a richer glow than before had been bestowed upon it by the hand of taste and wealth. The mansion, though still bending beneath their heavy fallings, even in its ruin, had a more imposing and noble appearance of the season. The gradations from young, delicate grass, the shadowy of the trees, the flowers, and the waterfall that beneath the sun and the heart hesitated whether to give the palm of admiration to the days of its former splendor, or to the present, when it seemed to an everlasting close.

Lucille looked with beaming eyes, and heart raised above earth, to the natural beauties surrounding her.

"Oh, till to-morrow!" she cried, with the enthusiasm of her nature, "where I should wish for ever to live, as the soil and home composed of my love!"

"It is a sweet and beloved spot to dwell in for a time," returned D'Amasne; "but I have other views for you, my Lucille, and after a short time spent within its quiet I sigh for the tumult of the world, and the pleasures of Paris. Ah, there is Monsieur Le Blanc, who, I see, has already received the news of our arrival. Once installed in the world, Lucille, you shall learn to prize it."

"Never, never!" said Lucille, with a look of the sweets of retirement, and a smile of pity at the idea that could ever the luxuries of their results for wiser heads and colder hearts than mine to possess," was her answer.

"But you must enter the world," said the count. "I should be accused of selfishness, and my wife of unkindness, were you to belong not to D'Amasne, if I buried you in these wilds, and trod in the halls of Belair. Besides, I have a duty to perform, and one in showing my beautiful wife to the world of fashion which she is so well fitted to adorn."

"And do you wish it?" fell softly from Lucille's lips; but the change, which these words produced upon her face as he penetrated her to the housekeeper, whose gray hairs and antique attire told that she was one of the old and faithful household she still served. "Madame Sinkerre, I have brought a mistress to the old chateau, who will, I trust, endeavor to make you feel less than you have grieved its proximity in your time."

"Welcome, welcome, my lady!" Lucille closely, "and a young and beautiful lady she is. You have come, monsieur, to bring a fresh young mistress to the old chateau, and to gladden your fathers, and then away again."

"Not so," said D'Amasne, "for many moons have lighted the world since we broke; but now the not wasted yet, and will not, Madame Sinkerre, be long."

"That will depend on yourselves," said the housekeeper. "But, monsieur, you will find the chateau in a sad state. The door and a large modernly furnished, where a large fire blazed most brightly. Ah, it is a sad change from the glowing under the hands of a lady!" she added, with a sigh.

"Not so, my friend D'Amasne, laughing, "do not betray me to her; and you shall find that all her palaces and all her gold will not enough to give a little one six months old, the illusion has not yet vanished."

The old lady raised her eyes in wonder. "Then you must be married?" she said to D'Amasne, "and where is the bride? Where are the nurse and child?"

"We shall not be long in a few days," replied D'Amasne. "And now, Sanzarc, set before us such refreshments as you have. You must remember that we have had a long journey, and have not broken since morning."

"Ah, I have your favorite soup and fricassee in readiness," said the old lady; "you shall have them before you in a few minutes. Monsieur, you will find your rooms as you left them, and I hope to be allowed to show her mistress to her own."

"Thank you, no," replied Lucille. "I will litter your next room with my travelling wraps till Annette can find time to carry them away; but I will not trouble you to show me to my chamber. I have some coffee; that is all I shall require."

"Ah, when you have tasted of my favorite soup and fricasee, she will be tempted," said the housekeeper; "but I go to hasten their preparation," she added, as she left the room, followed by the they forgot everything; but talking and gesticulating about it." And the old lady replied servant at the door, with a curtsey of the reign of Louis Quatorze to Lucille, quitted the room.

The moment they were alone D'Amasne bound Lucille's waist, and, "Lucille, now we are settled you must write an invitation to Madame Belair to visit us. Emilie will not refuse, and I shall be much to your."

"Oh, with the least like me," she replied; "it is the mistaken resemblance of yourself, Jules—the same deep hazel eyes, the dimpled chin and chiselled lips. Oh, when you see her you will love her as I do, and think her lovely as no angel."

"Oh Goddy, I've caught a jealous jet at enthusiasm; "like yourself, and the generality of passions, I shall think my bird the sweetest songster in the grove. Lucille, you must write to Madame Belair. If not too much fatigued, write, there is just time to despatch your letters to-night, and I will see that they are sent. Emilie must have my wife."

The letters were written and despatched, and in an incredibly short space of time Monsieur and Madame de Vernt, Juliette and Madeline, with the infant, were at the chateau.

It was a happy meeting to all. The child at first feared a half affrighted from the lofty form and deep-toned voice of her father, but his soft caresses soon drew her tottering him, and before many weeks were over she would crow in her nurse's arms, and hold out her small hands at his approach to be taken by him, and her first lisping accents were, as she raised her head, covered with jetty curls, from his bosom, "Birdie loves papa."

Birdie was a name he had given her from her being such a light, airy, fairy creature. Her mother at first was reluctant to the extension of any other; for by the domestics and peasants she was Mademoiselle Eudie, and by them she was by their visitors connected with her.

Back to return to the arrivals. Lucille learned from her father that, since she had left, although her mother was with him, his valley home had been deserted by the Vernts, Madame de Belair, after his consultations, and letters to the Baroness Waldenburg's urgent entreaties, had left for Germany. Madame Belair was not quite so often there, Lucille," he added, "as if I remained in my old abode. She has been with me but a few days, without being able to settle a few leagues from Waldenburg or Marcelles. The only thing I fear is that she may have left her heart in Germany. I shall feel the loss thrown off my own resources."

"Never, father," replied Lucille, "can dear father, and replace it by that of the happiness your presence and manner's will be to most dear to me. Ah, you have been with me, and I have learned to be a happy creature again. Oh, I am fearful of rendering my time in this way an excuse, and I am sure that Madame Belair will not forgive me for my absence."

"Ah, I forgot you are not a Frenchwoman," said her father, "and that you cannot feel the ties of friendship and love which so satisfy me."

When D'Amasne heard of De Vernt's intention to quit France, he asked Lucille if she thought her friends the Belizes would like to accompany them to Italy. She was rather cool to their sex, that was about being vacated on his own estate.

"I will see the Belizes," he said, "I am about parting with my land steward. Besides his talent and integrity; the house attached to the situation is a small mansion, and as Adele in life would be improved by his acceptance of it, and you would by it have always a friendly, well-informed person near you; and Madame for years was your second self, to commune with."

"Ah, my dear, generous husband," said Lucille, with glistening eyes, "to me—to us, I mean, if Belizes can bring himself to give up his birthplace, the home endeared to him by his father, to reside near us."

"Well, we will put it to him," said D'Amaine; "he can but refuse, it will not change our opinion of each other," and, seeing Emilie and his wife enter the room, he joined them.

Lucille watched them from the window, but could hear nothing of the conversation, as they walked to and fro before the mansion to her, best quick time with her foot on the carpet till Madeline's nurse brought in the child, and then her trembling voice threatening if she should join her, made her start hastily from her seat and give the desired permission.

CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

THIS city, situated on the fork of the Ohieyo Ohio and Mississippi, is now a point of considerable interest to the public in consequence of the recent movements of the Kentucky rebels and attack of. The Mississippians says:

Gen. Grant has made Cairo a strategical position of the very utmost consequence. It is the key to the upper, as New Orleans is the key to the lower Mississippi. Cairo is the key to Illinois. It can blockade St. Louis on the one hand and Louisville on the other. Its position, therefore, renders it considerably embarrassing heavy ordnance, and commanding the railroad leading south of that city, which is the only route by which the rebels can carry out an invading army to make that an advanced post of occupation."

The Cairo Democrat says that there is no lack of excitement in the town. It is said that there is now gathering at Memphis a formidable operation against us.

A SOLDIER SERVING HIS COUNTRY.—The magistrates in a small town in Somersetshire. A man calling himself Presbury ——— lectured on Electro-Biology, and had a number of persons under his influence. It was his bad taste gentlemen never like was a young woman. Under the direction of the performer, she was ordered to perform all the gymnastics in connection with the opposed lady, and upon a further order from the same person, he sprang on, clasped his arms round her waist, and kissed him a dozen times. The young lady, on coming to herself, was overwhelmed with confusion, and, of course, highly indignant, and although the Western Flying Post states in evidence that the prisoner "has the power of subjugating honest beings and mending them as he will," the learned gentleman walked up to the platform and gave the delinquent a month with a walking-stick.

CHANGING.

What is it makes a man grow so round?
My wife says as we sail along?
If I knew, I'd tell you, I'm sure,
The chance to Circulate!

But till I must confess, to-day,
I'm quite as much in the dark,
There's no change in the Dollar,
Or in the Cent, I remark.

When by my side I walk him stay,
Two or three times a week,
He keeps his distance—will he may—
Two or three times a week.

What was it looked upon a post
Is now a Dollar and a Cent,
When I was on the Jersey coast?
My wonder is intent.

By sundries I would be up
To what his head and cry? No, no!
There is no change in me.

To something beautifully low,
Or to some other thing,
To be no longer animal, He dress
Or to a Bird on wing.

A MARRIAGE.—Generally advertised for a situation, and the wife of a merchant went to make inquiries about her. The girl called at the house of the inquirer and left her address, which was as follows: "Any one asking that she was passing through the street and brought she would call.

"Ah, my dear," replied the girl, with a sad thought, otherwise, you would come."

"Ah, marm," replied the girl; "when a lady advertises for a place, it is expected that the poorest wanting her services will do. That is the objection."

A RECENT BANKRUPTCY.—Among the well Pearce, was condemned to find, on two Cubic, that sons, women and children all inside French. In the height of the storm the passengers were compelled to retreat to the cabin, and remain in the morning by the cook crowing; whereupon he burst into a wail curtains and bewailed his unfortunate lot in pathetic terms. An Irish soldier of the regiment fell asleep in a wheelbarrow and was taken all covered before Marcella, who asked him, through the medium of an from side if he was crazy, when was the strength of the Irish Brigade. The prisoner was not that it was ten thousand men, at which Marcella appeared impressed.

"Ah," said the interpreter, "you are very much Polay."

"He must have been telling him true."

"Ah, I see, if he don't believe me, tell him to attack them with ten thousand men, and he will see how they will run away."

By the connivance of his counterpane, Polay rejoined his regiment and was soon after killed in the battle of the Pyrenees Mountains.

THE MURDER OF COLONEL ELLSWORTH.

Ten tidings of the untimely death of the young and gallant Ellsworth were received with public demonstrations of sorrow by every State in the Union. It was justly looked upon as a great calamity, and the flag at half-mast in city, town and village over thousands of miles, North, East and West, attested at once the estimation of the promise of the man and profound sorrow for his loss. He was quite young, but he had already made his mark among men.

The story of his death may be told in a few words. He was ordered to take possession of Alexandria with his gallant regiment of New York Fire Zouaves, and before dawn on the morning of the 24th of May he effected a landing and proceeded to occupy the city. Passing, with a handful of his men, the Marshall House, he saw a Secession flag waving above it. On the spur of the moment he entered the hotel, saying that he must have that flag. He met a man in the entry and asked, "Who put that flag there?" The man replied that he was a boarder and did not know. Ellsworth ascended to the roof with two or three friends, and cutting the halliards took possession of the flag. As he descended the stairs, the man who had called himself a boarder, but who was in reality James W. Jackson, the keeper of the hotel, stood ready with a double-barrelled gun and presented it at Colonel Ellsworth. It was knocked up by Francis E. Brownell, of Troy, a Zouave. Jackson, however, discharged both barrels of his gun, the whole contents of which entered the left breast of Colonel Ellsworth, making a fearful and fatal wound. He fell to the ground, his life's blood dyeing the flag it must lay life to obtain. In a moment Brownell levelled his piece, shot Jackson through the head, and then run him through with his

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and occupation on the back of every picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographers are sent to us from every part of the country, without a number without any word of explanatory matter, they giving no credit for being an engraver who is receiving those negatives at a rate in no degree reasonable. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times to almost everything with interest of public importance throughout the world, while we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching intercourse. To have labor and science accurately interpreted our names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

The State of the Nation.

THE army of the North has advanced upon Virginia. The troops of armed Anglo-Saxon humanity upon the soil of the Old Dominion, and the might of the North has gone forth to conquer a peace, to give comfort and assurance to her loyal brethren, and reunite the people in all its former power. Not for conquest, not for acquisition, not for the greed of glory which delights in the pomp of martial array and the carnage of the battle-field, but to win back that allegiance to a great compact which has made us once our glory and our salvation as a nation. It is the earnest hope of the great body of the people that the solemn exhibition of the marvellous power of the Government of the country will awaken the attention of the thinking men of the South, and cause that healthy reaction which will lead to a speedy withdrawal of the difficulty without resorting to that terrible alternative, the battle-field. For some days past the intentions of the Government were the subject of much speculation. The public journals were profuse in their advice, and laid out a dozen magnificent campaign plans, each of which would have overwhelmed and dismembered the combined forces of the South. The event has proved to the fact that every New York editor is a wonderfully accomplished military strategist, and the public mind is calmed upon the subject of generals, and satisfied that, if the chances are we should dispose of all the regular commanders, the editorial staff of New York could supply all vacancies for two or three years to come. The newspaper correspondents were of the opinion and for information "on authority," but as they could learn nothing definite they reiterated the assurance that no advance would be made. Right on the heels of the forward, at last official assurance, the Government revealed itself and confounded the prophets.

On Thursday night, the 23d, at ten o'clock, four companies of picked men moved over the Long Bridge, as an advance guard. They were sent to reconnoitre, and if assailed were ordered to retreat, when they would have been supported by a strong regular infantry and a battery. At two o'clock Colonel Ellsworth, of Zouaves, to the number of nine hundred, were conducted on board the steamers Mount Vernon and Baltimore, and proceeded at once to Alexandria. The embarkation was made with wonderful order, promptness and silence, and the movement of the whole sensation army were clearly seen, but after discharging their pieces they disappeared and were seen no more. The troops disembarked, it is supposed, at once, in the utmost order, and proceeded to take possession of the city. This was effected without resistance, but a terrible gloom was cast over the success of the movement by the assassination of the gallant and chivalrous Colonel Ellsworth. In passing the Marshall House he saw the Secession flag flying on the roof, and entering the hotel took a few companions with him and tore it down. While descending with it in his hands, the keeper of the house, James W. Jackson, discharged both barrels of his gun into his breast, and he rolled down the stairs dead. But the retribution was swift and terrible, for one of his company, Francis E. Brownell, of Troy, N. Y., shot him through the head and then bayoneted him, killing the assassin immediately. The full particulars of this terrible episode will be found in another column.

The scene at the Long Bridge was most imposing. It was a bright, clear moonlit night, and the silent march of the armed men could be distinctly seen. Eight thousand infantry, two regular cavalry companies and two sections of Sherman's artillery battalion, consisting of two batteries, were in line this side of the Long Bridge at two o'clock.

The Twelfth (New York) was the first on the ground. The army crossed the bridge in the following order: Twelfth Regiment, New York; Twenty-fifth Regiment, New York; First Regiment, Michigan; First, Second, Third and Fourth, New Jersey, in the order named; two regular cavalry corps, of eighty men each, and Sherman's two batteries.

These were followed by the New York Seventh, which mustered more than any other regiment in the line and were deeply gratified at the chance of active service.

The troops quartered at Georgetown—the Sixty-ninth, Fifth, Eighth and Twenty-eighth New York Regiments—proceeded across what is known as the Chain Bridge, above the mouth of the Potomac Aqueduct, under the command of General McDowell. They took possession of the heights in that direction.

Including the Zouaves, who went by steamer, over thirteen thousand troops crossed over into Virginia between the hours of twelve P. M. and four A. M. General Mansfield directed the movement into Virginia, and every point on the line was taken possession of with the utmost order and clockwork. The disposition of the various regiments was as follows:

The New York Seventh is stationed at the Virginia end of the Long Bridge. The Twenty-fifth New Jersey regiment is at Roache's Springs, about half a mile from the bridge. The battalion of United States militia is posted three miles nearer Alexandria. The Michigan volunteers and the Zouaves and Sherman's battery occupy Alexandria. The Fifth, Twelfth, Twenty-eighth and Sixty-ninth New York Regiments, together with the Third and Fourth New Jersey regiments, with two companies of cavalry and some artillery, are posted at different points along the base and summit of Arlington Heights, the Sixty-ninth—who are stationed a few of them hundred metres—on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad—being stationed at the Chain Bridge. A body of Federal troops had been quartered in Fairfax, or rather Upperville Court House—the headquarters of a large force of the Secession army—thus cutting off all communication with Richmond. Harper's Ferry, Winchester, Manassas Gap, Strasburg, Orange and Manassa Gap Railroad. The outposts of the Southern troops are believed to be stationed on this road, sixty-two miles from Alexandria. Fairfax was captured by the Michigan volunteers, while attempting to make their escape from Alexandria, are composed of a gentlemen's corps from Fairfax, and a company from Fredericksburg, Virginia, mustered. They were placed on board a steamer and sent to Washington, there to be dealt with as traitors.

On Friday, the 24th, the House of the policy shadowed forth in the Inaugural of the President, namely, to retake and hold possession of the forts, tenements, custom-houses and all other property of the Federal Government.

The energetic and prompt action of General Lyon and General Harney has had the happiest effect on the policy of Missouri. The Rebel troops, Jefferson Davis and Governor Jackson, have been disbanded, and Missouri may be said to be with the Union beyond precautions.

On Friday, the 24th, the Senate of Kentucky passed the resolutions that Kentucky will not sever her connection with the National Government, nor take up arms for either belligerent power, and will maintain a strict and impartial peace within her borders, and tendering their services as mediators to effect a just and honorable peace.

Congress has been brought of a treasonable character against Governor Magoffin, and a committee has been appointed to inquire into the charges, with permission to sit thirty days. The committee will report to the Governor and Council Anderson and the probable acherence of John C. Breckinridge, indicates that Kentucky will eventually act decisively with the Federal Government.

The Government of England has concluded to remain entirely neutral in our present troubles. This, of course, would be expected of England, but the declaration of neutrality could stand an hour in England which took sides with a Slavery issue against the Free North. Besides, it is plainly to be seen, that the operation will be to get the cotton of the South, and to have no hand in prolonging the contest. We append a synopsis of the important Proclamation upon the American question which has been issued by the Queen of England:

It warns British subjects against engaging in the American war, and it forbids them to take commissions in the service of either. The Proclamation declares the intention of that Government in maintaining the strictest impartiality between England and the Government of the United States, and certain states styling themselves the Confederate States of America, and as British subjects, if they enter the military service of either side, or join ships of war, or transports, or carry officers, soldiers, or despatches, or any material contraband of war, for either party, they will be liable to all the penalties which they may incur, will do so at their peril, and in no wise obtain the protection of their Government.

Postmaster-General Blair has issued an order discontinuing the transmission of the mails to Virginia, Georgia (Western Virginia excepted), and other Seceding States, and annulling all contracts for the same. Tennessee is excepted from the order, as that State is not yet in open rebellion.

The blockade of the Mississippi is, in all probability, at this date, complete and effective. The following announcement on this subject was issued from the British Consulate at New Orleans:

BRITISH CONSULATE, NEW ORLEANS, May 17, 1861.

Editors Picayune—Although I have not received any official notice regarding the time when the blockade of the Mississippi river will be established, I deem it my duty to make the announcement to give such information as I have received from Washington:

Vessels sailing from this port will be allowed to leave port after the actual commencement of the blockade, whether such vessels have or have not received notice that such ports were shipped before or after the commencement of the blockade.

I may add that the blockade of the Mississippi will be effectually established on or about 30th inst.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. MURE, H. B. M. Consul.

Affairs in the city of Baltimore are fast settling down to a settled state. The seizure of the telegraphic dispatches at various telegraph offices, by the Government, has revealed evidences of great treason in that city. A leading journal makes the following startling statement:

WASHINGTON, May 24.—The Government is in possession of intelligence of the most startling character from Baltimore.

Its advices are of such a nature as to leave no doubt that the pretended Unionism of that city, so far as certain prominent men are concerned, is false and hypocritical, and that the presence of United States troops has alone kept in check the enemies of the Government.

The Administration, in fact, has positive information of new conspiracies against the Federal authorities, in which many of the leading citizens of Baltimore are involved.

Men who, in the presence of United States troops, have loudly professed their devotion to the Union, are now known to be secretly in favor of Secession, and actually plotting to turn the State of Maryland over to the rebel government of Jeff. Davis.

The Administration has the names of the leaders in these conspiracies, and accurate information regarding their plans; but these, of course, will probably withhold from the public.

Immediately upon this comes the news that one of the wealthiest citizens of Baltimore, Mr. Merriman, has been arrested and sent to Fort McHenry on very serious and treasonable charges. He is charged with burning the bridges on the Northern Centre road. It is understood that he says he acted by authority of the Mayor and Board of Police Commissioners.

From Chambersburg, Penn., we learn that nine thousand five hundred Confederate troops are now posted between the Point of Rocks and Williamsport, on the Potomac; seven thousand are Virginians, and the rest Alabamians, Mississippians, Carolinians and Georgians. There are also three hundred Cherokees, armed with tomahawks, scalping knives and rifles. They are from North Carolina and Georgia. The Virginians are well armed, but short of provisions.

Between the Point of Rocks, eight miles below, and Williamsport, twenty-three miles above Harper's Ferry, there are thirty-five pieces of cannon at various points. Twenty of these are brass field-pieces.

Great apprehension prevails in the Cumberland Valley of invasion from the rebels. Thousand upon thousand will rush and five thousand horses could be seized by a sudden eruption of an expeditionary corps, holding the Valley five days, even if finally driven back into Virginia.

A forward movement of Virginia may be expected at any moment. Campbell's Flying Artillery, six pieces, has been ordered to this place. Also, the Fifth Pennsylvania regiment is here, and a battalion of cavalry, are absolutely needed here to prevent a devastation of the whole Valley. There should also be three batteries of artillery stationed here.

Our countrymen in England are watching the progress of affairs in their native land with intense anxiety. Some of them in Manchester and elsewhere have subscribed and sent as a present to our Government a battery of Whitworth's rifle cannon, and the gun forwarded to Washington, with a letter from one of them to the Secretary of War. They are sent to Messrs. H. A. Smythe & D. Babcock and S. F. Spaulding, of this city, by Mr. R. D. Griffith, of Manchester, with the request that they be forwarded to the proper point.

These gentlemen are also advised that the production of these rifled cannon has been completed for six months or longer, and as they have excelled all other cannon upon several trials in England (throwing a ball five and a half miles with morning accuracy) they are probably the most effective ones now possible.

The suggestion it seems has been acted on, for we hear from Washington, on the 28th, that the Government has succeeded in obtaining from England a number of the armstrong, mantlebaum and cannon foundries in Great Britain which are permitted to make arms for foreign States—for three months to come.

Contraband of War.

The importance of holding Virginia seems to be the great first fact of the war, and one recognized by both parties. Jefferson Davis has disposed of his military forces on the side of the Virginia line, reaching the base of which is James River—its sides, from Norfolk up to Lynchburg, a distance of about two hundred miles, and from Lynchburg to Harper's Ferry, the shortest line of Chesapeake Bay. According to their own account the Secessionists have now under arms the following troops:

At Norfolk and near it	10,000
About twenty miles up James River	2,000
Posted on the York and Rappahannock Rivers	7,000
Fredericksburg	6,000
Richmond	25,000
Petersburg	5,000
Gordonsville	2,000
Charlottesville and Staunton	5,000
Lexington	1,000
Fredricksburg	2,000
Culpeper Court House	3,000
Dumfries and Acquia Creek	3,000
Manassas	7,000
Harper's Ferry	9,000
Point of Rocks	4,000
Total	95,000

This statement is necessarily vague and unsatisfactory, as our means of information are by no means reliable. The Southern newspapers are full of boasts and the information derived from travellers, who are not allowed to see too much, is necessarily very inaccurate. Their estimates of bodies of men are as likely to be above or below the real standard.

PERSONAL.

DR. BENJAMIN MORGAN, the eccentric and versatile literary editor of the Troy Budget, is dying, and is dying with the New York last week. Like Sheridan, he has written his own epitaph, as he says himself:

GEORGE N. SANDERS has come into a handsome property by his father's death. He says this has no political bearing, and means his money to swing his movements of Associate politics.

HON. THOMAS EWING, Engineer of the Free Department, had a very spicy debate with Mr. Simeon Draper, of the Union Defence Committee, lately. The latter gentleman says that in addition to the broad Department of Free Services existing they have the city money, they are to be taxed for the privilege by the Board of Aldermen, and they have their own Commissariat, &c. Dana's boasts are doing the work of the Secessionists by such captious behavior.

MR. HENRY J. RAYMOND, editor of the New York Times, Congress in the Third District of Morrisiana, says in his address that, although opposed to the Chicago platform, he will support the Administration in the present war. He is in favor of the Crittenden resolutions, and says that the time to hang is the week there is remaining a single thread of the Constitution against a wicked conspiracy to destroy the Union and the Constitution against a wicked conspiracy to destroy the Union and the Constitution.

A report has been in circulation in Washington that Surgeon N. Parkhurst, United States Army, is under arrest for disloyal practices. Such, would reflect. That gentleman has published a card contradicting the rumor. He says he remained in Washington through the whole, but remained there because his health would not bear his travel to the Union, and under no other flag than that of the United States will he serve.

MR. GODFREY, son-in-law of E. A. STEVENS, and formerly M. C. for Virginia, is in Washington on the Union Committee.

LIEUTENANT PERSONHEIMER, of the Seventy-first Regiment of New York, was the first officer to enter Alexandria with the troops. He was in command of the steamer Mount Vernon, the vessel which conveyed the Fire Zouaves of New York from the Long Bridge to Alexandria, and was in company with Colonel Ellsworth at the occupation of the city.

DEPARTURE OF REGIMENTS FOR THE SEAT OF WAR.

THE SEVENTH (SEVENTY) REGIMENT.—On this day body of men, commanded by Colonel Smalley, under the Fourteen Months in the Empire City on the 11th ult., proceeded to their departure they received a beautiful banner, the gift of their patriotic German ladies, and which was presented by Miss Bertha Hegel, daughter of the distinguished German Consul, in behalf of the donors, and delivered to them at the City Hall by James Beekman, in a few appropriate, brilliant and patriotic words, which was enthusiastically received.

Colonel Bendix said a few words in reply. "He gave the donors the sincere and hearty thanks of the regiment; he would not make a long speech, for he was not a man of words, but he could assure them, for his soldiers, from what he had seen of them, that they never would disgrace the Stars and Stripes. He had confidence that he spoke their sentiments, in saying that every one, from the highest to the lowest, respected that flag, and so long as they lived they would remain faithful to the flag and the Constitution of the United States. He again returned thanks, his heart was too full for words, therefore he hoped they would excuse him from speaking further." Colonel Bendix's remarks were received with loud and hearty cheers.

The regiment is composed of 850 men, who are admirably trained, many of their officers having seen service in the Holstein-Schleswig war. It is one of the most efficient regiments in the service.

COLONEL ALLEN'S (FIRST) REGIMENT.—This gallant regiment, which has for some time been stationed in Staten Island, took their departure on Sunday, the 28th ult., for the seat of war. They are commanded by Col. Allen, and number 1,000 men. Previous to their departure, they received a very handsome flag from the fair hands of Miss Mott, presented by her in the name of several ladies of New York. Major J. M. Turner returned thanks in a very feeling address. Colonel Allen's unwearied attention to the comfort of his men is the theme of universal praise. A very handsome sword was presented to Major Turner by the citizens of Richmond county, Staten Island, a few days previous to their leaving their encampment.

THE NINTH REGIMENT, COL. J. W. STYLES.—This excellent regiment assembled in Washington Square on the 24th ult., and were reviewed by Col. Styles, who announced to them that they were to march for Washington on the following Monday, an announcement which was received with the utmost enthusiasm.

THE SECOND TROY REGIMENT, 800 men, embarked on the 22d ult. for Fortress Monroe.

CAPTAIN THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER, with a battalion of 300 men, started for Washington on the 22d ult. They were in admirable spirits, and received deafening farewells as they marched down Broadway. They are called Meagher's Irish Zouaves.

THE NEW YORK SECOND REGIMENT, COLONEL TOMPKINS, numbering 900 men, passed through Baltimore on the 22d ult. They received from the citizens a most cordial reception.

NEW HAMPSHIRE'S FIRST REGIMENT that she has sent to the war passed through New York on the 26th May. They number 800 men, and are commanded by Colonel Mason W. Tappan. They are a splendid body of men, and although only enlisted for three months, will, if required, serve for the war. They were received by the Reception Committee of the Sons of New Hampshire who presented the regiment with a handsome flag. After breakfasting at the Division armory, Elm and Centre streets, they marched to the foot of Cortlandt street, amid the cheers of the assembled thousands.

WAR NEWS FROM THE NORTH, EAST AND WEST.

CALIFORNIA.—A great Union meeting was held in San Francisco on the 28th April, which was the greatest demonstration ever witnessed in that city. Business was totally suspended. All political parties joined in it, and resolutions declaring their attachment to the Union were passed. Speeches denouncing Secession were made by Senators Latham and McDougall, General Shields and other leading citizens. The mention of Jefferson Davis's name aroused a perfect storm of indignation.

INDIANA.—There is great military activity and enthusiasm all through this State. At Indianapolis five regiments are encamped at the new Fair grounds, two on the old grounds, and one regiment of Zouaves have marched to Evansville. Altogether, Indiana has eleven regiments all in marching order.

KENTUCKY.—Governor Magoffin has been completely baffled in his plan of forcing Old Kaintuck into the arms of Jeff. Davis, for the Legislature has passed a resolution requiring the State militia to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. In addition, Governor Magoffin's bill to arm the State under his control has been rejected by an immense majority.

MISSOURI.—The energetic measures of General Harney have been eminently successful. On the 24th May General Price ordered the State troops at Jefferson City to disband. They number about four thousand men. A ten-inch howitzer, a nine-inch mortar, and a large quantity of ammunition were sent from the arsenal at St. Louis to complete the fortification of Cairo. Colonel Lyon has seized a large quantity of lead on its way to the Confederate forces.

KANSAS.—Judge Arney has offered to the President three Kansas regiments to co-operate with the Iowa regiments in Camp Keokuck, and the Illinois regiments encamped at Quincy to protect the Union men in North-western Missouri, and to secure safe transit of stores over the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad to the West. The President has accepted their offer, and orders have been sent to Captain Roscoe, at Fort Leavenworth, to equip them forthwith. A regiment of cavalry is also to be raised.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

MISSISSIPPI.—It is stated in a Grenada paper that active measures are being taken to provide against the contingency of a servile insurrection. At several places symptoms of slave insubordination have been manifested. On the 15th of May considerable alarm was felt, and every suspected person was scrutinized with the most jealous fear.

ARKANSAS.—There is not much excitement here, generally speaking. At St. Francis a disturbance had occurred, in consequence of a Northern fanatic, named J. B. Lippe, in the course of an angry discussion, firing into a crowd of Secessionists, who fired at him in return, lodging sixty bullets in his body.

VIRGINIA.—The blockade of Richmond is so complete that not a vessel can leave the city. Great apprehension exists in Richmond on account of its unprotected state. An extract confirming this will be found in another column, from the Richmond Examiner. It is feared that President Davis may be tempted to save Harper's Ferry by advancing to the relief of General Johnstone, in which case Richmond would be left exposed to General Butler. General Beauregard is in Norfolk, watching that energetic Bostonian.

Major-General Sandford has issued a proclamation to the people of Fairfax county, Va. He says that all the inhabitants may return to their peaceful occupations, and be assured of the protection of the United States forces, which are "employed for no other purpose than that of suppressing unlawful combinations against the constituted authorities of the Union, and of causing the laws thereof to be duly respected and executed."

Alexandria is under martial law. The inhabitants are assured of protection, but are informed that they must conform to the law established. Property will be respected if no attack is made on the Federal troops. The Marshall House, where Colonel Ellsworth was shot, was the headquarters of General Washington, and the Colonel was shot near the door leading to the apartment originally occupied by the Father of his Country.

POSTAGE STAMPS.—The Richmond Whig says: "As the services of the United States will be dispensed with in our postal affairs on and after the 1st of June, we would suggest to those who have a quantity of the United States postage stamps on hand the propriety of getting rid of them by that day, as they will then be useless. We give notice that from this date none will be received at this office in payment of dues."

MUST HAVE WASHINGTON.—"We are not enough in the secrets of our authorities," says the same paper, "to specify the day on which Jeff. Davis will dine at the White House, and Ben McCullough take his siesta in General Sickles's gilded tent. We should dislike to produce any disappointment by naming too soon or too early a day; but it will save trouble if the gentlemen will keep themselves in readiness to dislodge at a moment's notice! If they are not smitten, however, with more than judicial blindness, they do not need this warning at our hands. They must know that the measure of their iniquities is full, and the patience of outraged freedom is exhausted. Among all the brave men from the Rio Grande to the Potomac, and stretching over into insulted, indignant and infuriated Maryland, there is but one word on every lip—'Washington'—and one sentiment on every heart—vengeance on the tyrants who pollute the Capital of the Republic!"

REPORTS FROM RICHMOND.—The Examiner says that the Danville cars that arrived at an early hour on the 21st ult., brought another instalment of the gallant representatives of ever glorious Tennessee, in the members of the above regiment, to the number of 952 men.

The regiment is called the "Walker Legion," in compliment to the Secretary of State of the Southern Confederacy. The Colonel is from Gallatin county, is a distinguished lawyer, and a man of undoubted ability; besides, he has acquired fame on the bloody fields of Mexico.

The Lieutenant-Colonel (of Sumner county), was one of the first to scale the walls of Monterey at the siege of that place by the Americans. Major Doak is also an old Mexican volunteer, and a member of the Tennessee Legislature. M. W. M'Cluskey, the Quartermaster (of the Memphis Avalanche), is well known to the whole country as the author of the "Political Text Book," and former Postmaster of the United States House of Representatives, while the surgeons of the regiment are both members of the Legislature and leading members of their profession.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—Charleston has been so imperfectly blockaded that several French and English vessels have entered and sailed with cargoes. Several of the regiments have been disbanded, their term of service having expired. The Charleston press is evidently not pleased at the secondary position now occupied by that plucky little State, "the very head and front of the offending."

FLORIDA.—Mr. Russell, the special correspondent of the London Times, has paid a visit to the Federal fleet, and also to Fort Pickens. He was courteously received, of course. He was attended by some influential citizens of Mobile, one of whom, strange to say, was allowed to accompany him to the fort.

Lieutenant Slemmer, whose portrait, with that of his heroic wife, appeared in No. 273 of our Illustrated Paper, arrived in New York on the 20th, in the steamer Philadelphia, from Fort Pickens. He was accompanied by his detachment, who show on their bronzed faces the effects of their long confinement and want of fresh provisions.

FORT PICKENS.—To those who are clamorous for General Bragg to order an assault upon Fort Pickens the Mobile Advertiser says:

"General Bragg is an old soldier and a famously brave and shrewd one, and will not begin the work before he is ready, or be provoked into beginning it; and he will not consider himself ready to begin before he is ready to end the work victoriously.

"The magnitude of the preparations which the commanding General considered necessary to making a sure job of the bombardment of Pickens may be estimated by considering the number of men who have been unceasingly to work for so long. A small city could have been built by this force while it has been preparing for the destruction of one erection. When the bombardment commences, it will be one of the grandest events of the sort on record.

"From the forts and batteries occupying an area of near three miles, a continuous storm of shot and shell will be rained upon a common centre, the stronghold of the Lincolnites, and if it long holds out against this destructive shower it will disappoint the calculations of men best versed in the science of warfare.

"The able engineering officer who superintended its construction says it cannot withstand the attacking batteries. We have heard no complaints of the delay in the attack, but much natural impatience is felt. Better that the army of the Confederacy should wait six months, if necessary, and make a sure thing of the attack, than make it prematurely and encounter a repulse. But Bragg's 'big guns' are arriving, and certain signs indicate that the end is at hand."

NORTH CAROLINA.—THE BIBLE UNION CUT OFF.—A letter from Roxobelle says: "The Chowan Association, by a unanimous vote yesterday, cut off all intercourse with the Bible Union, and recommended those owing subscriptions to withhold the same, and deprecating any further agency of the Bible Union among the churches. Another fruit of the reckless fanaticism of the Northern agitators. Unwilling to bow down to the Jehovah revealed by Moses and preached by Paul, they seek an anti-slavery God. Nor are they unmindful in their ardent devoirs to the almighty dollar. Thousands have gone into the Bible Union treasury annually for years past; but the steam is now stopped."

LOUISIANA.—The New Orleans Picayune says: "Occasionally we have an inkling of the condition of affairs in the Northern cities. Private advices represent them to be very disastrous, and the prospect ahead is most gloomy. It is estimated that the one hundred and twenty millions of portfolio of the New [illegible] banks is hardly worth more than two bits on the dollar. Not a single [illegible] of paper is met at maturity. The greater portion, both principal and in[illegible] has to be carried over. The failures for some time past have been averaging a dozen a day. But the papers are prohibited from promulgating the [illegible] commercial distress, on the assumption that such candor would be affording aid and comfort to the enemy."

MARYLAND.—A Baltimore lady writes to her brother at Richmond: "Oh! what a dark day has dawned on Maryland, whose daughter I was once proud to [illegible]! Now what State lies so low in the dust? Last night one thousand [illegible] arrived here from the Relay House and encamped on Federal Hill, and I [illegible] are coming to be placed on other commanding eminences. For [illegible] Lincoln act thus, and by what is this move to be followed? I crave [illegible] opportunity of insulting him, and I would do it, too, at the risk of censure from every friend I have. I am but too glad they do doubt us. I want to hold out no false colors."

ALABAMA.—If we may form any conclusion from the journals, the inhabitants are m[illegible] relieved in mind by the transfer of the capital from Montgomery to Richmon[illegible] throws the horrors of war into Virginia.

JUDGE FORSYTH MAKES A SPEECH.—At a German concert at Mobile, 17th, Judge Forsyth presented a Confederate flag to the lady patronesses of the fête, in the course of which he said: "To my fair countrywomen I can safely give the pledge which burns, a Promethean flame, in my own and every masculine Southern bosom, that while a son of the South survives to maintain the combat, we will never yield your native soil, your dear homes, your darling children and your lovely selves to the dominion of the usurper and spoiler. You may be sonless, brotherless and widows, but you shall never be the mothers, the wives, the daughters, the sisters, the sweethearts of political bondsmen. The Sabine women of old were forced to find rude lords in their Roman conquerors, but they were lords of a noble and iron race. God and Southern manhood forbid that we should yield you to the fanatic rabble that has been armed against our peace and freedom. Is there a man in this assembly, soldier in arms, or citizen, ready to grasp his steel, who will not respond with his profoundest and latest breath, never! never! never!"

TENNESSEE.—Eastern Tennessee, like Western Virginia, repudiates the Secession tendencies of their State Government, and intend to form themselves into a separate State and remain in the Union. A convention will be called and resolutions passed to that effect. An order, issued by General Pillow, commanding the Secession forces in Tennessee, directs all the volunteers in the State to rendezvous at Jackson, Madison county, in that State, for immediate service. Jackson is a great railroad centre, and one of the roads leads direct from that place to Columbus, Ky., which is only twenty miles below Cairo. This order was doubtless issued with a view to making an immediate demonstration upon Cairo, but the proclamation of Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky, forbidding the passage of troops across the State, which has since been issued, has probably interfered somewhat with General Pillow's plans, and rendered necessary some other modes of procedure.

TEXAS, AUSTIN, May 8.—Our whole male population, says the correspondent of the New Orleans Crescent, is rapidly being organized into military companies, and the whole State placed on a war footing.

Companies are organizing in every county, and placing themselves under the orders of the Governor, to march to any designated point at a moment's warning. The whilom Union men are as eager for the fray as the oldest and most intense Secessionists. In truth there is but one voice here, and that is for war. The old men form themselves into home and reserve guards, for the protection of the women and children.

From present prospects the growing crops in Texas will be full to overflowing. Enough grain will be raised to support the present population for three years.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES OF THE WAR.

ON the 22d ult., at three o'clock in the afternoon, the police of the principal cities entered the telegraphic offices and took possession of the manuscripts of the various telegraphic messages that have been sent for the last eight months. They are said to implicate many leading Northern merchants and politicians, who, like Judas Iscariot, have been willing to betray the Republic for money. The question is now being scrutinised by the proper authorities, and prosecutions founded upon the evidence thus obtained. Several journals have denounced the proceeding as unconstitutional, but in these times such objections are puerile. In times of life and death punctilios must give way to common sense.

THE steamer Keystone State arrived at New York on the 23d ult., from Fort Monroe, having on board a number of passengers flying from the South, and with the British ship Hiawatha, of Liverpool, in tow as a prize. She was laden with tobacco, and had been captured in attempting to escape from Charleston.

AN officer who recently resigned from the Mississippi steam frigate, while stationed at the Charleston Navy Yard, superintended some repairs made to her machinery, and while so engaged, sawed two inches off her delivery-pipe and replaced it with gum and canvas. The Mississippi went to sea, but had proceeded but a short distance when the pipe gave way, and a large quantity of water was discharged into the vessel. The ship returned to the Navy Yard.

COLONEL VOSBURGH had effected an insurance for the benefit of his family, some time since, with the United States Life Insurance Company, of this city. A member of the Seventy-first, having come on from Washington with the remains, reported at the office of the company, No. 40 Wall street. The instantaneous response was, "Please say to the family that the money is ready for them." It is five thousand dollars. We have not heard whether the Col. had insurance in any other office.

SERGEANT BUTTERWORTH, of the New York Zouaves, was shot on the 25th ult., at Alexandria, by the sentry, Mike O'Neil, after having been challenged by him for the countersign three times. It appears that Butterworth was a stutterer, and his failing to answer was caused by that infirmity.

C. JACOBUS, of the Seventy-first, was drowned on the 26th ult., while bathing.

THE Parkersburg, Virginia, News office has been forced to submit to the will of the Union men, a crowd of whom demolished it.

THERE was another false alarm created at Washington. It was caused by a squad of the New York Second regiment at field practice.

AT Alexandria several hundred arms were seized. They were found in the theatre. A number of arrests of persons having concealed weapons were made.

MR. MERRIMAN, against whom are charges of treason, is still confined at Fort McHenry. An attempt will be made to take him out on a writ of habeas corpus, with what success will be soon ascertained.

WAR ITEMS.

THE Richmond Examiner thus discusses the defenceless condition of Richmond: "And if they come to Richmond, we may be well assured that they will come the same way that the enemy came before—the British—by York River, and by no other way. There is the assailable point; the map shows that, experience and history have made the fact public to all the world except ourselves. A march by land from Alexandria, through a difficult country, and over the most warlike population of the Continent, is dreamed of by nobody but ourselves. The route by Aquia Creek can be cut short at Fredericksburg by a few hundred pounds of powder under the bridges of the Rappahannock, to look no further. Nor did the enemy come up the narrow and imperfect channel of the James when they came before, nor will they come up it now. But they will do as they did, and will always do in future, sail or steam through the deep and straight York, disembark their troops in a little more than a day's march of the city, and take the chances of resistance. Any number of steamers can be loaded with men and artillery at Washington, and come to the mouth of the York, at least without any more trouble than on a morning excursion."

A NUMBER of shot, weighing three hundred and fifteen pounds each, have been shipped at Pittsburgh for the big Floyd gun at Fortress Monroe. This gun weighs forty-nine thousand one hundred pounds, and is now mounted and ready for service. It carries a ball with a charge of forty pounds of powder over four miles.

JOHN BATES, aged ninety-two, who fought in the Revolutionary war, and also in that of 1812, has volunteered in the Pendleton Guards, Ind. There are also eleven of his sons in the same regiment.

SENATOR FOOTE, of Vermont, has been authorised by his State to tender to the President ten more regiments of the Green Mountain Boys.

A YOUNG Virginian, named Reuben Jefferson, escaped across the Potomac from Alexandria on the 22d ult. to the New York Zouave camp, and said that he had been compelled to enlist in the Secession ranks, although a Union man. He says that hundreds also have been compelled to join the Confederate army against their convictions.

A MANUFACTORY has been established in Nashville, Tenn., which turns out 20,000 percussion caps a day.

A BATTERY of the celebrated Whitworth guns, twelve pounders, with ammunition and carriages complete, has just arrived in this city as a present to the Government from patriotic Americans abroad. The battery is consigned to Henry F. Spaulding, Samuel D. Babcock and Henry A. Smythe, who have informed Secretary Cameron of its arrival, and that it is at the disposition of the Government. Each one of the guns bears the following inscription—"From Loyal Americans in Europe to the United States Government, 1861."

THE Secessionists have fitted out a war steamer called the Ingomar to serve on the Mississippi River.

THOMAS HART CLAY, one of the sons of the Sage of Ashland, in a recent letter, speaks of the Secessionists as traitors, and declares that the firing on the Stars and Stripes at Fort Sumpter could not help firing the breast of every patriot in the country.

THE Government has decided upon establishing two camps on the French and English system. One is to be located on Staten Island, and the other in the southern part of Pennsylvania, most probably Chambersburg. There regiments will be sent to be drilled and accustomed to a camp life.

THE Washington Star says that up to the 20th May the number of troops which had responded to the President's call amounted to 312,000 men, and that it was most probable all of them would be in the field before the 4th July, when Congress meets.

NEARLY 2,000 Baltimoreans have left that city and joined the Confederate army since the 19th April.

ON Wednesday, the 22d, a splendid American flag was raised over the Post Office in Washington. The President officiated. He made a speech, as did also Messrs. Seward, Blair and Smith. Great enthusiasm was manifested.

REVIEW OF TROOPS.

ON the 25th ult., at three o'clock, P.M., the Union Defence Committee reviewed eight regiments near Fourteenth street. They were the Anderson Zouaves, commanded by Col. Riker, 400 men; the Dekalb Regiment, Col. Von Gilsa Leopold, 800 men; the Mozart Regiment, Col. J. B. Cocks, 841 men; the Tammany Regiment, Col. Kennedy, 600 men; the Garibaldi Guard, Col. D'Utassy, 909 men; the Ninth Regiment, Col. Styles, 801 men; and the Fifty-fifth Regiment, Col. Le Gal, 400 men; making a grand total of 4,751 men. The Garibaldi Guard is composed of Italians, Hungarians, Poles, Swiss, &c. Col. Le Gal told Mayor Wood that, in consequence of the delay of the authorities, above 500 men of his regiment had joined other regiments which were already on their way to the seat of war. The review was very satisfactory, and their admirable appearance and discipline drew loud applause from the assembled thousands.

HARPER'S FERRY, VIRGINIA.

HARPER'S FERRY, a post village of Jefferson county, Virginia, is situated at the confluence of the Shenandoah with the Potomac River, where the united streams break through the Blue Ridge, one hundred and sixty miles north of Richmond, and fifty-three miles north-west of Washington. The scenery is in the highest degree picturesque and beautiful. It was originally called Shenandoah Falls. Its present name is derived from a ferry long since established across the Potomac, which is also spanned by a fine bridge about eight hundred feet in length. The village is irregularly built at the base of a hill, and is the centre of considerable trade. It contains several churches, manufactories and flouring mills; but it is chiefly noted for being the seat of a manufactory of arms, where several hundred men were generally employed by the Federal Government, and which produced annually about ten thousand muskets. It has also an arsenal, where a large quantity of arms were always kept till lately, and the partial destruction of which by Lieutenant Jones, to prevent them falling into the hands of the Secessionists, is uppermost in the public mind. The attempt of Ossawatomie Brown, in October, 1859, is likewise too recent to need more than a passing allusion.

Harper's Ferry is now the scene of a far greater drama, having been for some weeks in the possession of a large body of Secessionists, under the command of Colonel Lee, the exact number of which has not been ascertained—some putting it down as low as four thousand, and others as high as four times that number. That it is naturally a place of immense strength is evident, and will doubtless soon be the scene of stirring events. Our Artist has sent us a most complete view of the place, taken from the Virginian side.

Our large double-paged cut represents the Secession battery on the heights at the back of the town of Harper's Ferry, which commands the railroad bridge, and which, strong by nature, has been rendered still more so by art. Colonel Jackson is the commandant of the troops at this station, under the orders of General Johnstone, who was formerly in Utah. As our readers can perceive, the scenery is magnificent, and our Artist has done justice to its beauty. Colonel Jackson's headquarters are between the village of Harper's Ferry and a little suburb called Bolivar. The number of troops here are about ten thousand men, composed of Virginians, Kentuckians, Alabamians and Mississippians. Our sketch has been taken from the burial-ground of the Catholic Church—sad illustration of the poet's line—

The path of glory leads but to the grave.

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

WHY are well-fed chickens like successful farmers? They are blessed with full crops.

AN American poet talks of the music of a low wind. The wind is often low, and very few of the poets can raise it.

DR. CASS, a quack in the reign of Charles II., made a fortune, and set up his carriage, with the motto, "The case is altered."

A BASHFUL printer refused a situation in a printing-office where females are employed, saying he never "set up" with a girl in his life.

BEAUTIES generally die old-maids. They set such a value on themselves that they don't find a purchaser until the market is closed.

BOASTING of a visit he paid to the Queen at Windsor, a Yankee clenched his remarks by declaring, "I should have been invited to dinner, but it was washing day."

A TAR, who had been boasting of the numerous foreign places he had seen, was asked if he had ever seen Louisiana. "No," said Jack, "what country does she live in?"

AN Irishman, just from the sod, was eating some old cheese, when he found, to his dismay, that it contained living inhabitants. "Be jabers," said he, "does your cheese in this country have childer?"

CHARLES BANNISTER, coming from a coffee-house one cold and stormy night, said that he never saw such a wind.

"Such a wind!" replied a friend. "What was it like?"

"Like!" answered Charles, "like to blow my hat off!"

A GIRL recently advertised for a situation as barmaid or waitress in a refreshment-saloon. Among her qualifications for such a position, she says she can cut two hundred and twenty-five pieces of bread, of satisfactory appearance, out of one pound of bread, and butter them with two ounces of butter.

THE Northampton Press says that an ambitious young lady was talking very loud and fast about her favorite authors, when a literary friend asked her if she liked Lamb. With a look of ineffable disgust she answered her interlocutor, that she cared very little about what she ate, compared with knowledge.

A GENTLEMAN travelling in a one horse trap chanced to stop at a small roadside inn, which rejoiced in the possession of a very intelligent Irish ostler. Handing the reins to this worthy as he alighted, the traveller requested the man "to take his horse to the stable and bait him."

"Sure an I will, your honor," answered the Milesian, briskly, and away he went.

In about half an hour the gentleman, having refreshed himself sufficiently, naturally concluded that his four-footed servant was in equally good case, and accordingly ordered his trap to the door. The horse was panting and trembling.

"What's the matter with my horse?" asked the traveller. "What have you been doing to him?"

"Only what your honor ordered me."

"He don't look as if he had had anything to eat."

"Is it ate your honor said?"

"To be sure."

"Sorra the word like it did yer honor say to me. More betoken, your honor tould me to bate the beast, and not to ait him!"

"Why, you stupid rascal, what have you been doing?"

"Och, I just tied him up to the stable with a halter, then cut with me stick and bate him till me arm was used out."

COLONEL ABRAHAM S. VOSBURGH,

Of the Seventy-first Regiment.

The lamented officer whose early and sudden death has cast such a gloom over the city was born in 1825, in Ulster county, New York, and belongs to one of our oldest Knickerbocker families. After receiving a good and practical education, he came to this city, and engaged in the storage and forwarding business in Broad street, where his integrity and attention to business made him universally respected. He commenced his military career very early, since in 1846 he was appointed Aide-de-Camp to General Storms. He was soon after made Brigade-Major, and in July, 1852, he was chosen Colonel of the American Rifles, then just organized by his friend, General Storms. This regiment was subsequently made the Seventy-first Regiment of Infantry in the State Militia. His unceasing attention to his military duties soon made him a most efficient commander, while his courtesy and attention to the men under him made him, at the same time, one of the most popular. He possessed the rare art of combining discipline with kindness. His firm behavior at the time of the Dead Rabbit riots was universally applauded.

At the breaking out of the present unhappy troubles, he was one of the first to take the field, and his unceasing exertions insured the admiration of all. These, however, aggravated a complaint he had long suffered from, hemorrhage of the lungs, of which he died at half-past eight on Monday morning, the 20th May, after only two days' illness. He reviewed his regiment on Friday, and entertained his friend General Sickles the same evening.

He leaves a widow and two children, both boys, of the respective ages of four years and eight months.

The Funeral Solemnities in Washington.

Our Artist has sent us a most graphic sketch of the ceremonies at the Navy Yard, in honor of the gallant and lamented Colonel of the Seventy-first Regiment, which we have the mournful satisfaction of presenting to the public.

The funeral ceremonies commenced at twelve o'clock at the Navy Yard, Washington, and were of the most imposing character. The President and the Secretaries of State, War and the Treasury were present, and seemed deeply affected at the fate of one who lost his life in a cause of which they were such prominent exponents, and which they had so much at heart.

Governor Sprague, at the head of the Rhode Island troops, was in attendance, and the New York Twelfth Regiment, headed by Colonel Butterfield, was also there with full ranks. The body lay in state in the great hall of the Navy Yard, and was visited by hosts of his gallant companions in arms, whose silent reverence, as they gazed on their departed brother, testified the depth of their regret.

The funeral procession then moved away from the Yard at half-past one o'clock on the 21st, accompanied by the Seventy-first Regiment as mourners. The body was sent to New York under an escort of the Seventy-first, and arrived at Jersey City the next morning. It was taken to the residence of Colonel Vosburgh's father, 806 Greenwich street, and was buried with military honors in Greenwood Cemetery, on the 23d May. The flags were at half-mast, and the signs of woe everywhere displayed evinced the respect which all classes of our citizens entertained for the brave and courteous Colonel of the Seventy-first Regiment.

BATTERY OF CAMP DEFIANCE, CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

Camp Defiance is situated on the south-east point of the city of Cairo, the farthest point now out of water, and immediately in advance of the Levee. Colonel Prentiss has planted cannon on this point, which completely sweep the approaches both by the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. To the right and to the left of the battery on the Levee other batteries have been erected, of such strength that the approaches may be said to be completely secured from any attack by water. The military force centred at Cairo, under the command of Colonel Prentiss, has now swelled up to several thousands, and, in addition, Illinois has ten thousand men ready at any moment to advance to the assistance of Cairo.

HENRY C. J. HEUSKEN,

Interpreter to the United States Legation to Japan.

In our present number our readers will find a portrait of the late Mr. Heusken, the Interpreter to our Legation in Japan. Our readers will recollect that as he was riding, on the 15th of January last, from one of the suburbs of Jeddo into that city, with two servants, he was suddenly attacked by about a dozen armed Japanese and murdered, his attendants flying without offering any resistance. The perpetrators have never been discovered, despite the efforts made by all the Foreign Consuls there, among whom were honorably prominent the British and French Ministers. He was buried with much pomp on the 18th of January, and a handsome monument has been erected over his remains, in the cemetery near Jeddo, at the expense of Mr. Harris, the United States Consul.

Mr. Heusken was born in Amsterdam on the 20th of January, 1832, and was murdered on the 15th of January, 1861. He went to Japan in company with Mr. Harris in 1857, and fulfilled his duties in the most exemplary manner.

ANNAPOLIS JUNCTION.

This is a railroad station, seventeen miles south-west from Baltimore, and twenty-two miles north-east of Washington, on the Washington Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. At this point the Annapolis Branch Railroad, a short line of twenty-two miles in length, here comes in from Annapolis. This place derives its chief importance from commanding the railway route from Annapolis to Washington, a total distance of thirty-nine miles. Millersville is on the line of this railroad, and is about eleven miles from Annapolis.

FORT M'HENRY, BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

Fort McHenry is situated on Patapsco Bay, in Baltimore harbor, on a tongue of land about two miles from the city, which it commands with its largest guns. It also completely commands the harbor. It was bombarded by the British fleet in the War of 1812, but without success. In the present excited time it is a place of vast importance, not only on account of its great strength but of its position; and the Federal Government, fully appreciating its consequence, has greatly strengthened it, and has thrown into it a large body of troops, provisions and munitions, sufficient to render it impregnable against attack, and efficient for any offensive operation. In conjunction with Federal Hill, it completely commands the city of Baltimore, and is a reliable guarantee of its faith to the Union. It is a sentinel at the gate of the

LUCILLE DE VERNET;

A TALE OF WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XIX.

"THIS is a fine old house," said Madeline to her husband, when they were alone together in the Chateau do Nol. "All within and without bespeaks splendor, and every dish and plate at dinner was solid silver. And madame, how well and joyous she seems; I hope she will ever remain so. And monsieur—I never saw so much of him as since we have been here, short as the time is—has a generous noble nature, though we did give him credit for some frailties of human nature—but who is without them? But, Jacques, I like the idea of what he proposed to you, for this is a charming, thriving place, and the land a thousand times more productive than that surrounding Marseilles. Of course you will accept his offer?"

"Of course," he returned, laughing, "if Madeline has set her heart upon it. But, joking apart, I have seriously conned over monsieur's offer, and shall most assuredly accept it, if I can find a tenant for my own farm. We have no ties to bind us to the south; your friends lie northward, and mine are too few and distant for us to bestow a thought on their whereabouts. And the dear child is here, who has been like our own from its birth; to part wholly from it would jar the love feelings of us both. And again, if Lucille should need your services, you will be near to give them. For life's hopes are fleeting, the rose that blooms so fresh and fair to-day, to-morrow rude winds may scatter on the desert plain."

"Ah, now you are preaching a sermon, Jacques," said Madeline; "you always look so deep into the waters. Why not skim the surface, as I do? It must be better than meeting sorrow midway. But to speak of monsieur's offer, are you serious about the acceptance of it?"

"Quite serious, Madeline; and if old Jean Lerne, as I expect he will, will come to terms with me about my little patrimony, take it—I mean to set his daughter and new son-in-law up in the world—I shall take possession of my new post so soon as the deeds are signed, anticipating that you will not object to be left here while I return to settle matters at home."

"What objection can I have to anything you propose, Jacques, unless being separated from you?" said Madeline. "But even that I shall surmount," she added, archly, "without any material injury to my health, I trust, considering what a clever manager I have, for absolutely you have arranged all as cleverly and neatly as if the tenor of it had been in your ideas the last ten years."

"I hope," returned Jacques, thoughtfully, "it will be better managed and turn out more propitiously than if it had been years in coming to maturity. But, good night, little wife, let us sleep upon it and see if our dreams throw any shadows before them; let me hear yours in the morning; if mine are momentous you shall hearken to them."

A few days later brought Emile and Charles de Bleville to the château. Emile had made an ineffectual attempt to be restored to her mother's favor, and though the refusal cost her many tears and some regrets she had too much of the light-heartedness and gay disposition of her brother to brood long and hopelessly over an event which appeared to her irremediable. The party was also increased by the presence of D'Almaine's uncle, Monsieur Louis D'Almaine, an admiral, and man of worth but small fortune, which is generally the case, where the estates are so entailed on the heir that but little beside the savings of the parents (which is mostly very trifling), is the portion of the younger children. He was a widower, and accompanied by his only child, a boy nine years old, who, being heir presumptive to the D'Almaine estates, was looked on by all graciously on that account, as well as being a fine, bold, handsome boy, with noble and generous feelings, which his father, by his judicious affection and management, was rendering permanent qualities.

"I have brought Eugene to see you, niece," said the admiral to Lucille. "He is young to come out visiting his relatives, but he was anxious to see his new cousin, so I indulged him; but his pony and old Laurent wait to take him home when he has paid his compliments to you, and a ride of ten miles backwards and forwards will improve his appetite for the good things Madame Lachère is preparing to gratify it."

"Oh! he must not leave us so speedily," said Lucille. "As he was so kind as to wish to see me, I am desirous of further acquaintance with him. Spare him to me, monsieur, a few days; no doubt he is better acquainted with the surrounding country than I am, and he shall be my escort to some of his most favorite spots."

"Yes," said the boy, pleased at the invitation, his dark eyes wandering from his father's face to Lucille's. "I know the walks and rides miles away, nearly as far as Château Henri Quatre."

"Ah! your knowledge is too extended," returned the admiral, smiling. "You must keep it within bounds, or woe be to your cousin if she trusts to your guidance. But, my little Emile," he continued, running up to her as she entered, "wedlock agrees with you, judging from your bright bloom and brighter eyes. Accept my congratulations, my dear, and tell me where you intend to weigh anchor now you are spliced."

"What a question!" said Emile, returning his embrace, and speaking in the same gay tone. "What a question to ask a soldier's wife, where she intends to live, for that is I conclude what you mean. To tell you the truth, good uncle, since I have taken up the knapsack I intend to cling to it, and though, like the English song, I shall not carry my soldier's wallet, I shall follow wheresoever he goes, with exception of the battle-field."

"Bravo, and well-spoken," said the old admiral. "It is a pity you preferred a helmet; for by St. Denis you are worthy the choice of a sailor."

Charles de Bleville joined cordially in the laugh, raised as much at himself as at the admiral's prejudices to his calling.

The sudden entrance of Batiste, who had returned unexpectedly from his farm, turned the conversation. He was in high spirits, having settled all to his satisfaction, and the following week entered on his new avocations, and was soon initiated into the mysteries of stewardship. He was honest and just in his dealings; he therefore not only gained the confidence of the count, but the praises and good-will of the numerous tenantry; and the neighbors, both large and small, seeing the terms on which Madeline and himself stood with the owners of the D'Almaine estates, looked one and all graciously upon them.

"I do not know what we shall do with all the money, Madeline," cried Batiste, after they had taken possession of their well furnished house. "An income of six thousand francs from monsieur, and near three thousand from our own farm—we are certainly rich people."

"And the house, this handsome house, rent free," said Madeline. "We cannot spend all the money. You must at least put by the farm money, Jacques; for we are both young, and who knows—perhaps we may yet be blessed with children, and that should be put away for their portion, or some such purpose."

Jacques laughed. "Who dives deep into the waters now?" said he. "Ah, Madeline, you are a true woman, and a farmer's wife, for you are absolutely reckoning your chickens before they are hatched."

Madeline blushed. "Not reckoning upon them, Jacques," said she, "only preparing for what may happen. You caught me up hastily for offering a little healthful advice."

"Well, well, I see your meaning," returned Jacques. "Our three thousand francs which you imagine overplus should be put into the bank, or laid out probably to better advantage."

"Yes. What think you of the English stocks?" said Madeline. "They, I have understood, are never failing."

"I have not thought beyond my own country," said Jacques; "but we have time enough before us for consideration—rely on it, for your sake, on its being made the best of. It is good, honest money, and I see not why it should not thrive, however we invest it."

Madeline, in her wisdom, quite concurred with him, and for the time the affair terminated.

Lucille felt the advantage of having Madeline near her, separated as she was from her parents, and without having any near relatives near; for Emile was leaving for the South, where her husband's regiment was ordered, and during D'Almaine's frequent visits to the metropolis, Madeline's and Batiste's near vicinity to her was a source of sincere congratulation.

CHAPTER XX.

WE must pass over a lapse of five years, for little connected with our history had transpired worth relation, with the exception of the Duke de Paleron's marriage with a lady high at court; that D'Almaine and the duke had shaken hands, after an ample apology and explanation of the former's conduct in regard to Lucille; and D'Almaine and his mother were on friendly terms. She still occupied the hotel as her town residence, Lucille having been steady in her first resolve of not making Paris, unless compelled, a residence. Therefore, when D'Almaine took his departure for the season there, she spent that time in Germany, in a happier and more congenial manner. She had not met her mother-in-law since the morning of her reunion with her husband, an event Madame D'Almaine had not forgotten, and which rankled with full force at her heart; her name had never passed between the mother and son; but it was observed when her daughter-in-law was mentioned in the countess's presence, much bitterness of feeling towards her was exhibited, and once she had been heard to doubt the validity of her marriage with her son.

A report, whether intended or not to find credit, was circulated in and beyond the ranks of fashion, for it had vaguely extended to the neighborhood of the chateau. Though but few listened to it, there were scandalmongers who talked it over and connected Lucille's seclusion from fashionable haunts with the report, whether true or false. Among these was the Duke de Paleron; his admiration for Lucille was still unbounded, having called upon her several times with the duchess, who possessed property a few miles distant from D'Almaine's Norman estate. The duchess was a proud, courtly personage, several years the senior of the duke, between whom was no resemblance of temper or disposition, nor a single reciprocal sentiment, she being a vestal in person and heart, whilst he was a well-known and determined gallant; but she was rich and powerful; he was deficient of power in any form, and trod complacently beneath that of his wife's, where it interfered not with his love of intrigue.

* * * * *

It was a bright and golden morning, the glorious sun tinting all objects with its own beautiful radiance. D'Almaine, Lucille, and Eugene D'Almaine, now a boy of fourteen, were seated at breakfast in the parlor of the chateau, whose large windows reached nearly from the lofty ceiling to within a foot of the floor, so that those within, as they partook of the morning repast, might look without rising on the terrace flowers beneath, now glowing in the morning sun, the dewdrops yet lingering on their surface looking like rare gems of many hues from the wealthy mines of Golconda.

"Where is Birdie this morning? She is late with her offering; have you seen her, Eugene?" asked Lucille, looking as she did so towards the distant fields, seen through a vista of lofty elms.

"I left her gathering flowers by the brook," replied Eugene; "she had not then made her selection, but——"

At this moment a light, quick step on the gravel was heard, and immediately after the beautiful face of a child, shaded by long dark curls, peeped roguishly in at the window.

"Ah, you have not waited breakfast as you said you would, Eugene!" she cried, holding up a tiny finger admonishingly, and with her small, round sunburnt arm dripping with dew, she raised into the room a straw hat laden with flowers, and then with the airy grace of Queen Mab herself, leapt in after them, and after a hasty kiss to her father and mother, quickly threw the contents of the hat on the carpet, saying in a gleesome tone the while, "Look how beautiful they are all—every one for papa."

"All for papa?" returned Lucille, "and Birdie has not brought mamma a single blossom?"

The child turned her head towards her with a beaming smile, and hastily scattered and searched among the flowers, till she came to a rose, adorned by a small bud, which catching up, she sprang to the lap of her mother.

"No, not forgotten," she said, in a low soft tone; "I gathered this pretty rose from Monsieur Batiste's garden, because it looked like you," and putting it against her mother's cheek, said, with a playful smile, "and was I not right? Look, papa, Eugene, is it not the color of mamma's own pretty cheeks? And," she added, putting one small finger on the bud, at the same time looking archly around as she did so, "and this is mamma's own little Birdie."

Lucille silently pressed her child to her, and D'Almaine, putting his arm round both, said, with feeling, "My bud and blossom, what would life be without you?"

The scene was interrupted by a head of another description

thrusting itself through the open window; it was that of a large Newfoundland dog.

"Lion, Lion!" cried the child, and instantly the noble animal, with a spring, was among them; the little girl's arms were round his neck, and her rosy mouth against his capacious one, his tongue amply returning the caresses bestowed on him. "Lion wants his breakfast," said Birdie, and seating herself at the table, gave, of course, as Lion expected, every alternate morsel to his ready acceptance.

"Come," said Eugene, "make haste, Birdie, I am going to the trout stream; of course you will go with me and carry the basket?"

"To the trout stream," said the child, a shade of sadness and distaste crossing her animated countenance, "to catch little fishes, Eugene? No, I think I will stay at home. I do not like to see them struggle, beat themselves against the basket, and then die."

"Oh, but you must go, if only to save some of their lives, which you often do, Birdie, to my detriment as a fisherman, you know—come," and he pressed the straw hat over the clustering curls of the beautiful child. "Here, take up the basket, while I carry the rod and lines."

"No, give the basket to Lion," said Birdie, "it is his business to carry that," and putting it between the dog's teeth, he sprang from the window, followed by the boy and girl, with the sporting laugh of youth and childhood ringing joyfully with the morning breeze among the broad leaves of the sycamore avenue.

"Take care of her, Eugene," cried D'Almaine, as they turned and kissed their hands to the watchers at the window. "Remember, if anything happens to her you must answer for it."

"Agreed!" came the laughing tones of the boy's voice. "With Lion with us, what danger can there be to either?"

The father's and mother's eyes were bent on them till the thick foliage rendered them no longer visible, and as that sensitive, ardent child, so wild, yet so graceful in mind and person, tripped sylphlike, held by her cousin's hand, her transparent dress and the blue ribbons of her hat floating in the air and sunshine, she appeared like some winged thing flown to earth from another sphere.

Arrived at the trout stream, Eugene was soon alone, dangling in the well-stocked waters with line and hook. The child and the dog were at their old sports, she gathering wild flowers, he, in frolic, carrying them away as they were collected, that the pair might sport together amid the long grass.

At length her lap was filled, they were again beside the waters; the blossoms, the labor and sport of so much time were industriously pulled to pieces, and, with the exception of a collar to grace the black sleeky neck of Lion, they were thrown on their surface, and with clapping hands and sparkling eyes watched till the breeze both slowly and distantly bore them away.

An exclamation from Eugene now attracted them. He had caught a trout of unusual size, and Birdie, with commiserating eyes, was soon gazing in the basket at its floundering and writhing motions.

"The little fish is thirsty, Eugene," she said, taking it in her small hands, and kneeling on the bank putting its head in the stream.

In a moment the fish had glided through her fingers, and, recovered by its native element, was swimming far beyond reach.

Eugene, vexed that this fine specimen of his skill as an angler had disappeared so suddenly, exclaimed, with a manner and voice ruffled,

"Birdie, I am angry with you; thus it is ever—as I fill the basket, you return its contents to the stream. I had prided myself on that fish, thinking it would redeem my character as a fisherman, seeing how often you have spoiled my sport."

Tears were in the child's eyes; it was, perhaps, the most severe rebuke she had received in her life, and she answered, lowly,

"Forgive me, Eugene; I am sorry. But little fishes like water—I only wished it to drink."

But Eugene was not exactly in a humor to pardon, and Birdie, throwing herself on the bank, buried her dark curly head amid the long, sleek white hair of Lion's stomach, and was soon in a sound, child-like slumber.

Eugene, with instinctive care, covered her with his silk handkerchief, and drew the branches of a willow, whose leaves kissed the waters, as a screen over her, to shield her from the noonday sun, hung his basket high up in the tree to prevent further larceny, and, unmolested, pursued his occupation.

When the child awoke, Eugene had replenished his basket, his good humor was restored, and, showing the proceeds of so many hours' patience to his little companion with the pride of a connoisseur, said,

"I think we shall have praises to-day, Birdie, from Madame Santarre, who will make a nice dish of them."

The child peered into the basket, its contents were immovable, consequently her sympathies were hushed. The basket was put into the teeth of Lion, who, proud of the honor thus bestowed, with wagging tail and triumphant glances at the juvenile pair, trudged sagaciously and steadily by their side.

CHAPTER XXI.

It was a bright autumnal morning, just such a one to tempt a sportsman forth to try his fortune, and D'Almaine, in shooting-jacket, gun in hand, bade Lucille adieu for a few hours to try his hand among the wild fowl on his grounds.

At the extremity of the spacious garden a small summer-house, or rather pavilion, had been erected as a morning summer's retreat for the ladies of the mansion. It was delightfully situated, forming two commodious rooms, one fitted up as a library, the other as a small boudoir. It was a favorite retirement of Lucille's, and thither on this eventful morning she repaired with her child. After having taken from the shelves several books, but finding her mind too wandering to read, Lucille went into the larger apartment, and taking a small piece of work from a basket, tried to absorb herself with it as much as the child's prattle would permit.

The building stood on an eminence, and as the child's quick eye discovered objects they were prattled forth to her mother. At length she cried,

"A carriage is coming fast down the back road, mamma. I see a gentleman looking from the window. Oh, I see now, it is the Duke de Paleron; and papa far out on the hill yonder. Shall I ask him to come home?"

Lucille instinctively rose, an unpleasant sensation assailing her, and looked out on the road. It was one little frequented and never used by visitors, being exclusive to themselves and family, and felt surprise, not unmixed with displeasure, that the duke should have presumed, with his servants—for she saw two beside the driver—to enter on it. Turning her eyes in another direction, she beheld D'Almaine approaching slowly, as if he had seen the carriage; but he turned suddenly, fired his piece and called his dogs, who were soon running with the dead birds towards him. He then again loaded his gun and pursued his way leisurely.

Lucille was still watching him, when a quick step on the stairs of the pavilion sent the blood rushing to her heart, and before she had time for thought, the door was rudely opened, and the duke stood before her. Offended at the intrusion, she indignantly desired him to retire or to permit her to pass, that she might leave his unwelcome presence.

"I will do neither," he answered, standing against the door, which he had closed on entering, and fixing his eyes boldly upon her. "Madame," he continued, hurriedly, but with the bold front guilt too often gives, "I have sought this time and place to tell you life is a blank without you. Turn not so scornfully from me, for you must and shall listen to me. I have heard—yes, even from D'Almaine's mother—that you are not his legally. If this be true, I have the same right to you which he has. Fly, then, with me! I will make you rich, portion your child, and, should the duchess die, will give you legal guarantee to make you my wife as soon as I am free."

Lucille could hear no more; a spirit seemed issuing from her eyes which made his fall beneath them, as she replied,

"Do you dare say I must listen to your hateful language?—dare insult me by your base insinuations, and baser offers?—dare say that were you free, thinking me guilty, you would make me your wife? Man, this outrage is beyond patience! Let me pass, sir! I insist that the door be opened to give me a free passage from the place your words have polluted!"

While she spoke the aspect of the duke had undergone a change from beseeching gallantry to bold defiance, and drawing nearer to her, he said, with assumed nonchalance,

"I should have desired matters to have proceeded peaceably; you decree it otherwise. Know then, madame, I came here on no idle errand. My carriage waits outside your garden gate, fleet horses are attached to it, and trusty servants attend it. I have sworn you shall be the partner of my intended journey. De Paleron never retracts when a lovely woman is to be the reward of his perseverance. You are in my power. I can laugh your scruples to scorn. Before you are missed from your morning retreat you will be miles away, D'Almaine, and all but myself unacquainted where you will be borne."

With a sudden dart he caught her in his arms, opened the door, and carried her down the steps of the summer-house. Lucille had no power to move in his iron grasp. A dread, an intense agony came over her; she felt herself lost, and could only scream and and agonizingly, her child joining her with all the vehemence and force of childhood, at seeing these fiercely loved forcibly taken from them.

"Curse your clamor!" exclaimed the duke. "I hear some one coming; I shall be foiled at last!" and putting his hand over Lucille's mouth, he turned towards another gate leading to the road more circuitously, but there was an accent to it, and Lucille, who had fainted, was a heavy weight to be disengaged in his plot, he ascended by rapid strides, and had nearly reached the top, when a loud "Halloo!" from the bottom, and by others, villain!" reached him without affecting his progress. He kept on, and had nearly reached the gate, when there was a report, a flash—the duke staggered, proceeded a few paces, then with a heavy groan fell with his burden to the earth.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c.

CHAPTER I.

Ash that night, from the instant of having left Lucretia through the old library and extinguished the lamp Erle had brought with him to that, the storm raged furiously, awfully. The wind groaned, whistled, and shrieked, and rushed through the playful branches and young leaves of the innumerable trees in the park and grounds of Gower Hall, and the rain descended in torrents. Then a vivid flash of lightning, a loud clap of thunder, succeeded by a heavy pause, then a hurricane of wind, with following, crashing thunder shaking them with its reverberations.

Ever by its violence and fury did that night seem to be the harbinger of joy for the dawn.

The scene within the library was a strange one, though it was unseen by mortal eye.

Amidst the wild turmoil of the elements, even on the lurid flashes of lightning that illumined the whole chamber with a sudden glare, Erle rose by fearful steps where he had been, and stood for a moment erect and immoveable, and then he moved with the same slow, fearful, measured steps to the entrance of the door.

He still grasped the small black ebony box which he had found in the library, and now seemed to fear it already, as if in fear that some unseen being would seize him—some spirit of darkness.

He moved from the high, antique, massive chest, still appearing to gaze upon one who, according to the aspect of his features, was a victim to the power of horrible spells.

Suddenly he fumbled with his fingers at the ebony box, and his lips moved, and then he uttered a wild and convulsive laugh, which, as it rang in the air, as it were, as if terrogatively, and a low, wild laugh burst from his lips. He then muttered something to himself, which was inaudible to any ear but his. From which he appeared to have found the key he was anxious to seek in one of the most shady places, and he had found it. He then muttered some unmeaning words, and a loud peal of thunder followed, which seemed to shatteringly engage by a loud and sharp echo. Then he held the small ebony box upon the table, and rose to his feet, as he appeared to have suddenly recovered a wish.

He looked around him, and uttered a wild scream. The lid fell from its hands with a crash, and once more he took precious upon the door without betraying a sign of life.

The storm passed on, the wind groaned and whistled, the lightning darted and the thunder shook the building, but Erle remained motionless at the side of the old black chest.

With the dawn the wind went down, the sky cleared, the morning sun poured its bright beams upon the stained windows of the old library, and gilded the dark, gloomy, lengthy and strong, but dirty, pale and countenance, still lay upon the floor, as if in a deep sleep.

It was an hour after the sun had risen, when a low, wild laugh burst from his lips, and he moved his limbs and body writhingly, as if in pain or in the throes of a horrible dream. The sun's rays streamed upon his features, and he made over his eyes, and presently whether them, only to replace them. At last he opened them, and rose slowly and gazed around him with a look of wild bewilderment.

He sprang to his feet.

"Almighty Heaven!" he ejaculated, in a tone of deep emotion, "it was no dream."

A violent shudder went through his whole frame.

Then he clenched his hands, and turned his head proudly up.

"Let conscience be as it will, with a God above, I will not rue to give way to the dictates of such superstitions. Still, I am free!" he added, as he looked around him, and a wild, fearful expression came over his features, as he saw the box upon the table, and he shuddered violently.

"This is too horrible!" he ejaculated, and pressed his hands over his eyes. "I was certainly not in my senses when I found it, or I would not have had the power to wrestle with the horror which seemed to convulse and then to paralyze him in his search.

At length he took his hands away.

"I will look—my destiny!" he exclaimed. "I cannot evade it; let me go through with it manfully at least."

He stooped and raised the box from the floor and looked within it. He withdrew from it a roll of vellum, apparently of great antiquity.

"I discovered this act night, in the picture gallery," he murmured, "and, by Heaven, it is—"

He paused, and then upon his knees, as if to assist his thoughts.

"Let me collect myself, and consider what I have to do," he said, then.

"I remember all I found in the picture gallery, and I am almost loth with to them now. Another time, another time," he muttered.

He remained in full of volume to the box, and, as if with some emotion what to look for, and where to find it, he re-united both his hand and hid it upon the key, which was the cause of where he had left it in the picture gallery. He then read on the massive raised chest, and withdrawing it, placed in the small ebony box, he left the room, and locked the door.

"I feel that we have all, to proceed with this mysterious matter. I will come again," he murmured.

At this moment Mrs. Clifford upon the old Saxon volume laying open on the Gothic reading-desk.

Seized by a sudden memory, he hastened towards it, and seized himself upon it.

Then the margin still remained his own possessing.

His hands, which had long been clear and transparent in wont, but, drained, beautifully-shaped character.

There were also in Lady Maud's handwriting. He would have elected his head upon that.

His head had violently, his throat swelled as if it would suffocate him, and a sudden flush of intense blue his eyes protected his deciphering the words.

He read them over and over again, and then he closed the book, and placed down from his seat. He turned in his words, and then read them down, pausing, gazing, and he reached these words:

"Oh, my love! how I have suffered since we last met!"

Then his breast, having wear filled up his vision so that he could no longer see the book, and then he turned his head, and he read on, without a word.

Oh, at the last, but never ceased each other down his cheek, what particulars my fliest his face, and he read on, and continued:

Maud, the beautiful Maud—this high and noble Maud—the fairest prize ever won had to offer to a king, mind, heart!

What destiny feared he to him now? What danger could death him? what could keep him from claiming his own chattels, his own property, his own all?

He took out his tablets to take down these words, but but what they were engraved upon his heart, but then it would be an offence to him to see that he open vaulter to explore over them.

But only upon his tablets could he transcribe them; so he laid the book upon the carved-cushioned seat, and he drew from his breast, nearest to his heart, a small tablet to which was he brought from a pocket and a withered flower. He kissed them both tenderly, and then he kissed them words written, as it were, in the very blood of the heart which had once throbbed for her.

And with solemn words and unutterable emotion he wrote down the same upon his tablets; and he drew a solid, nervous line beneath the last or preceding sentence; and then, when he had finished writing, he closed the book, and placed them away in his breast; then a thousand times he kissed the withered flower, and then white down, and then he rose from his seat, and restored the book to its place, which he replaced next to its heart, and pressed them with both hands, and then he said:

"Oh, dearest maid, I pray that you may be, to find how deeply, deeply I love you!"

And, as his lips repeated these words, his eyes encountered the pale face of Lady Maud fixed to him, bending over him, seated, with an expression half of love and half of pity, upon her own. He suddenly dropped upon it.

In a moment, with a very upon his lips, he spoke; intuitively he clutched out his arms to her. While—for so long a time—he had been in a trance, so had it was scarcely possible to tell when reading it expressed, she soul, as instinctively and his enlarged arms.

He pressed her to his heart. He stood up erect, but his lips trembled on, and his heart seemed to rise so high in his breast, that he could not utter a word. And if he could not have sung and spoken to her, he could not have done it. He raised upon his shoulder, and her closed eyes and half-parted lips, told him that she had sunk into a swoon. So he let her rest there, like a child to a slumber, upon his breast, his heart beating proudly as her sighs and grateful tears fell upon his cheek. He felt that he was her protector, and that he had her in upon them still, for intense was that they might alone upon upon him.

And she looked so sad and sorrowful as she lay there, and he saw what a change must have agitated had wrought; and it seemed to him that perversion might have produced it; and he bared lowered and he hit his lip.

He who pains or wrongs thee, dearest," he murmured, "I will have to account with me."

He pressed her to his heart, and then he kissed her once more, and he said it in that was a pale grey; his eyes were as calm as the ocean, and his brow was as free as a mountain breeze before exquisite enjoyment.

Lucretia and retired melancholy was impressed upon her features, and his sorrowful sighs as he thought of the intense misery of suffering the night have been suspected in another from the cause of his sorrow.

Then Lucretia was still unconscious in the face of the cause of Lady Maud's restless summer found its way through a tangled pane of rose-bloom, and tinted her face with a faint blush.

It seemed to him that a reflected ray of happiness lit up that strange, weird face, and that it was a smile of joy that played upon it.

He turned away his eyes, and took his gaze on the living Lady Maud. He saw that her eyes were open, and that they were looking upon him, and by the mere means of her smile he knew that sensations were returning.

He waited, with the most intense anxiety, not alone the opening of her eyes, but the recovery of her consciousness, as full comprehension that she was then in the old library with him, encircled by his arms—the arms of him she loved, and who loved her to madness.

Her eyelids were lifted gently up, and her eyes, she turn, moved forth, resting upon his earnest face, and then she smiled, and then she sighed, and then a gentle shudder, but a happy sigh, and rather she became sensible that she was not the hero of a dream, but of a reality.

She started—withdrew herself from his embrace—looked hastily about her —seemed at once her position, and with a shrinking, cowering appeal to her, she said, in a voice of alarm, "Erle, Erle, I am lost!"

"Dear Lady Maud!" he said, in a soft, tender tone, with emphasis on the word with me; I implore you! We have both been subject to strange and mysterious influence. I am not accusing you to be. You are also sensible by an accident in this ancient, ghostly chamber; but through we both have taken part in strange, and, I might be thought, dangerous, pursuit to let our affections, it is a reality which, for me, whatever my future fate, may be one of extreme happiness, and which, I trust, may be so to you. Why, I will confess, I have passed a night in my entire sentence and your own hours to be so dream?"

She bent her head, and said in a low, faint voice,

"I fear it."

"I loved you, Lady Maud," he continued, "from the first instant that my eyes rested upon your face, and my heart told me you were formed expressly for me to love my sacredly. I knew that you. I have learned from your own lips that you love me, and I am now the happiest of men. Oh, Lady Maud, I am to be by Maud, and you will be my wife, my beloved, from this moment my destiny is united, joyous task will be to call my way through all adverse circumstances, and to surmount every difficulty. Dearest Maud, entangled discords and weeds, signal impediments between them and I. Heaven, to the proprietor, will be published in the Times and Morning Post, and then followed by a month in the gloomy pall of late opened over me, and now, between a wide river, the Lady Maud Gower, and Erle Gower, my wife. Why, I will continue to call you a little while longer, for I am loth to oppose me, and will not rest, sweet Lady Maud, until, indeed, by letter—no, by word of mouth, you are about to become mine."

She sprained her weeping eyes to his. She withdrew her hand from him, and pressed her eyes upon it.

"I cannot be," she murmured.

"Why, dearest Lady Maud?" he asked. He thought he knew to what the allusion was, but he wished to hear it from her own lips.

"That decision rests there," he exclaimed.

She raised her head, and looked around her.

"I entreat you, dear Lady Maud, to be calm, and to be hopeful," he said, with a smile. "Let us not, for the present, indulge a shadow even upon the face, for a time, our lovers must be considered within the secret and sacred recesses of our own hearts. Dearest Maud, you are not prepared to what is going on around you. Your father, the duke, is in the house, and your mother and sister, and barriers in my path—what there? I am the wife of Lady Maud Gower. There is that fact to be established, and then I will proclaim it to the world, or, rather, my coming. What are these things that can keep me back? Nothing, nothing, dearest Maud, nothing! There are no bonds that will not burst, no bars I will not break, no obstacles I will not overleap. With such a prize, such a treasure, such a love, such a heart, such a soul, such a mind as my sentiment progress to that goal where you—you, oh beloved Maud! will be my wife, my own, my cherished, my darling, my—my—my—my—my—"

She turned to him, still with clasped hands.

"Oh, Erle," she exclaimed, "there is one impediment, there is one final barrier, which even you cannot surmount."

"Name it, dearest," he exclaimed.

"I cannot," she replied, in a tone of despair. "It cannot, it shall not be that you should ever become intimate with the woman who has obtained the consent of Lord Kingswood, my father, to our union."

"Dearest Lady Maud," he exclaimed, "I beg Arra does not—I will not—I will see this with his terrible rule, and I pray to Heaven that I may not, as I have a sacred heart, and I will not, be urged by him to the other."

"In mercy's name, speak not such language," she cried, with some earnestness, "for I tremble at the very thought of your doing so."

"Dearest Lady Maud," he continued, and was about to be interrupted, as, regularly, I shall be, with your permission, to call you, "I will not, I cannot, I will not, I will not, with his life at the mind I dreamed, I sometimes myself with such upon my courage—prepared what followed. MURDER OF COLONEL ELLSWORTH.

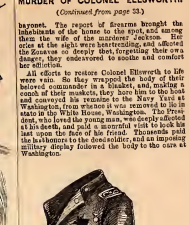
bayonet. The report of firearms brought the inhabitants of the house to the spot, and among them the wife of the murderer Jackson. Her cries at the sight were heartrending, and affected the Zouaves so deeply that, forgetting their own danger, they endeavored to soothe and comfort her affliction.

All efforts to restore Colonel Ellsworth to life were vain. So they wrapped the body of their beloved commander in a blanket, and, making a couch of their muskets, they bore him to the hotel and conveyed his remains to the Navy Yard at Washington, from whence it was removed to lie in state in the White House, Washington. The President, who loved the young man, was deeply affected at his death, and paid a mournful visit to look his last upon the face of his friend. Thousands paid the last honors to the dead soldier, and an imposing military display followed the body to the cars at Washington.



SKETCH OF THE COAT WORN BY COL. ELLSWORTH WHEN HE RECEIVED HIS DEATH WOUND AT THE HANDS OF THE MURDERER JACKSON.

On arriving in New York, the funeral cortege proceeded to the City Hall, where the body of Colonel Ellsworth lay in state for several hours. Thousands thronged in to take a last mournful view of one who had so recently passed through ornamental glowing with life and hope, but many more thousands strove in vain to gain admission. The funeral procession was of the most imposing kind. All the high military and city authorities were present, besides other officials, the Fire Department, Union Defence Committee, &c., forming an immense procession, which passed slowly and solemnly through hundreds and thousands of people, while the bells tolled, flags floated at half mast, and public buildings were draped in black. It was a solemn sight, not soon to be forgotten. The remains of Colonel Ellsworth were conveyed to Mechanicsville, New York, and were interred with military honors, amid the tears of the people, in the cemetery close to the cottage of his parents.

Peace to the gallant soldier! He died young, but he died pure and unsullied, loved, respected and mourned by a whole people.

The last letter written by this parents, the day before his death, will give an insight into his loving, amiable nature:

HEADQUARTERS, FIRE ZOUAVES, CAMP LINCOLN, Washington, May 23.

MY DEAR FATHER AND MOTHER.—The regiment is ordered to move across the river to-morrow. This is all I have time knowing what position we shall occupy. I am well. I am, and always shall be, your affectionate son Alexandre will be here evening, as I see his initials carved on trees have arrived there to-day. Should this happen, my dear parents, I may be up to-night, so be agreed in readiness.

Whatever may happen, cherish the consolation that I was engaged in the performance of a sacred duty, and to-night, shielding over the prohibition of the mayors and the co-operation of the police, we have taken possession of Alexandria without firing a gun, so confident was the enemy even the 7th of a sparrow will have some purpose even in the fate of one like me.

My darling and ever loved parents, good-bye. God bless, protect and care for you.

Your child.

Biography.

Elmer E. Ellsworth was born near Mechanicville, Saratoga county, New York, on the 23d of April, 1837. After receiving a common school education, he went to New York, where he resided for a short time, and then removed to Troy, Rensselaer county, and became a printer. From there he went to Illinois, and to Springfield, in that State, where he became intimately with the engraver of the Illinois State Journal, Mr. Carroll, and commenced the formation of a company in Chicago, to which the name of United States Zouaves was given, after the organization of a similar regiment in the French Army of the Crimea. The use of all intervening figure were prohibited, as in infantry and artillery. Hardtack Having brought them to a wonderful degree of perfection, he resolved to introduce that branch of the service by a tour through the principal cities of the Union. It is before this tour that we find him in Washington, where the President, who was personally acquainted with the manner of this most efficient branch of our military service. Returning to the North, he went to Springfield, on business connected with Mr. Lincoln's office. His acquaintance with the latter dated from the time he was a clerk in Vandalia, meeting friends everywhere. Upon the breaking out of the present rebellion, he was one of the first to receive a regiment, which was the Chicago Zouaves, the pioneers of the Fire Zouaves. He left New York with this gallant body of men, and was with them on the morning of their entry.

Few men in so short a time have made so shining a mark upon our military history as Colonel Ellsworth, and when it is considered how rapidly he disciplined a body of the finest and most unmanable men in the world, it must be conceded that he possessed in the very highest degree those qualities which go to make the soldier. He was the first victim of attacking the principle of secession, while the cruel manner of his death has made of him a martyr and endeared remembrance to the dark corner of military obsequies.

THE interest attached to these important places induces us to illustrate their positions in relation to each other. Our cut represents Fort Monroe, from which, looking south, is seen the Rip-raps midway, and beyond them the hotly contested battery on Sewall's Point. From the Point to Fort Monroe the distance exceeds four miles.

MURDER OF JOHN SWAINE

By Samuel Merritt, in a Lager Beer Saloon, on the 31st of May, during an Argument on the Affairs of the Country.

THE danger of prolonging an angry discussion in the present exciting times received a mournful illustration on Friday afternoon, the 31st of May. It appears from the evidence elicited on the inquest that a young man named Samuel Merritt was walking along Prince street when he was invited by a friend, Christopher Salmon, to take a glass of lager at a saloon kept in the basement of 199 Prince street. While they were discussing the present unhappy state of our national affairs, a baker, named Iden Swaine, whose store was in the same house, came in; he was invited by Merritt to join them. In the course of the sitting Swaine expressed the most violent Secessionist sentiments, which led to a fierce altercation with Merritt, in the course of which the latter drew a pistol, and shot the unfortunate man Swaine. Merritt has been committed to the Tombs on the verdict of the Coroner's Jury. Both the prisoner and his victim had hitherto borne irreproachable characters. Swaine was about forty years old, and had been married about a month. Merritt is a single man. It is said that the pistol with which the deed was done belonged to Swaine. Should this be so, it would seem as though the deceased had contemplated using it upon Merritt.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

WE shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, they giving us credit for being en rapport with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching information. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

The State of the Nation.

THE utmost activity has prevailed in the various divisions of the Federal army during the past week, and the cordon which it seems the purpose of General Scott to draw around the Secession forces is growing tighter and tighter, and its gradual but certain closing up must infallibly result either in a great battle or the retreat of the forces under Jefferson Davis from every point now occupied by them. The approach of the divisions of the Army of the North seems like the decrees of Fate, so premeditated, so undeviating, so systematic is its regularity. From Wheeling, Va., through Grafton, march the Western men under General McClelland, towards Harper's Ferry; from Chambersburg, Pa., march the troops of Pennsylvania under General Paterson, towards Harper's Ferry; and in both cases the Secession troops fall back, and retreat before the advancing forces. The troops which have been centreing at Washington are advancing towards Harper's Ferry on both sides of the Potomac, and thus hemming in the Secession army at Harper's Ferry on every side, and ultimately cutting them off from all communication with the main body of the Confederate army, will either starve them out or force them to yield to superior numbers. Their only salvation seems to be in a hasty retreat towards Richmond while the station at Manassas Gap is still in possession of the Confederate troops.

It is generally supposed that a determined stand will be made at Manassas Gap, but it would seem that it is the policy of the Confederate Generals to retreat as the Federal troops advance for the purpose of withdrawing them from their line of defences. By some it is believed that all the forces now fronting the Federal Army will fall back upon Richmond, which has been strongly fortified, and that the decisive battle of the present campaign will take place before and in that city. The foresight and profound strategical skill of General Scott will, in our opinion, regulate when a battle shall be fought, and that moment will be only when he can bring into action a force so overwhelming as to make victory on the side of the Federal troops a certainty.

In the meantime, General Butler is gathering a large force at Fort Monroe, not only for defensive but for offensive purposes. The battery at Sewall's Point is to be destroyed, those at Aquia Creek silenced, and Norfolk will, in all probability, be taken possession of. With the energy, skill and determination of General Butler, the execution [illegible] these important manœuvres is merely a question of time and adequate force.

We cannot speak authentically of the positions or the numbers of the Secession forces. The numbers are probably equally over and under estimated. Scattered in various parts of Virginia, they possibly number from 50,000 to 60,000. Accounts also differ materially as to their morale. Some say they are full of enthusiasm, well clothed and well drilled and armed, and well paid; others state that they are poorly clothed, poorly fed, and neither well armed nor drilled, and that they are clamoring for pay, and are generally discontented. We receive both statements with reservations. We do not doubt the enthusiasm of the Southern troops, and we believe that a large proportion of them are well armed and clothed, but there are good reasons for supposing that there is an alarming scarcity both of money and rations. Provisions in the South have risen fearfully in price, and the consequence of the scarcity must fall on soldier and citizen alike, but rather worse upon the soldier. The consciousness, too, of fighting against a constituted authority which refuses to recognise the conditions of a war, and against a people which are as a unit in the cause, while in their own States there are great and threatening divisions, must inevitably lower the morale of the soldier. The gallantry and devotion of the Southern men no one questions a moment, but there is much in what we have described to cause doubt and hesitancy in their midst, and, in a measure, to paralyze their efforts, while suggesting mistrust of their cause. The sudden awakening, too, to a knowledge of the marvellous power of the Federal Government, arising from the voluntary and enthusiastic support of the people, both in men and money, cannot fail to impress the Southern army with a sense of the hopelessness of a successful struggle with such an overwhelming force.

Another significant indication of the insecurity of their position will be found in the flight of their slaves, whenever the advance of the Federal troops gives them the opportunity of a safe asylum. Already several hundred negroes have sought the shelter of Fort Monroe, and General Butler, by claiming them as "property, contraband of war," has virtually closed against their owners all chance of their restitution. The action of General Butler has been fully endorsed by the Federal Government. The flight of these slaves proves conclusively that they are not so entirely content, but they would make a struggle for freedom; and the hope will undoubtedly extend far and wide, and give rise to a disaffection which may call for a large proportion of the forces of the States to subdue, and thus detract from their power to contend against the advancing Federal forces.

The blockade of the waters of the Mississippi and Ohio, and also of the railroads running South, will close every avenue of supply from the West, and will fearfully increase the scarcity of food already experienced in some of the Southern States; and the impregnable strength of Cairo, which commands both rivers, and the growing loyalty of Missouri and Kentucky render all hopes of raising the blockade vain and impossible.

There has been a smart skirmish between Company B., U. S. Dragoons, under Lieutenant Tompkins, and a small body of infantry, commanded by Lieutenant Gordon, and the Secessionists, at Fairfax Court House, Virginia. The infantry force consisted of only forty-five men. Our troops met the picket-guards of the rebels at a point about four miles this side of the hill, and made an unsuccessful attempt to secure them. The pickets fled and conveyed the alarm to the rebel camp. Our cavalry then charged into the town, encountering a vigorous resistance. They were fired at from the houses on both sides of the streets, and from all quarters of the town. Lieutenant Tompkins's horse was shot under him, and in falling beneath the animal, the Lieutenant's ankle was sprained. The cavalry were finally completely enclosed by a company of rebel infantry, who beset them in front and rear, and poured in volley after volley upon them.

Lieutenant Tompkins and his men fought their way out, bringing with them no less than seventeen rebels as prisoners. All of these, except five, afterwards escaped, but the five were safely brought in. One member of the cavalry was killed and two others were wounded.

Some of the staff officers of the Fifth Regiment of New York were with the Federal troops, and several were wounded, but none mortally. It is reported on the authority of Lieutenant Tompkins, that not less than thirty of the rebels were killed. The force of the enemy at that point was about fifteen hundred men. When the attack was made it was not supposed that their strength exceeded two hundred men.

There has also been some severe fighting at Aquia Creek, about fifty-five miles below Washington, flowing through Stafford county, Virginia, into the Potomac. It is the terminus of the Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad, and in direct communication with Richmond. It is an important position, and its possession will be strongly contested. The information of the bombardment reached Washington on Saturday, June 1st.

The steamers which attacked the Secession battery at the mouth of the creek were the Thomas Freeborn, Anacosta and Resolute. They were attended by a schooner.

The Southern troops had erected two powerful batteries on the shore, one having been planted on the wharf at the terminus of the Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad, and the other on the bluff. The fire from the Government vessels was severe and well directed, and finally silenced the wharf battery. The firing from our vessels was finely done. The shells were thrown with great precision, and evidently several of the enemy were killed. The enemy also performed their part with diligence, delivering a close and steady fire, and working the guns at the battery on the bluff with regularity and precision. So far as we have yet learned, none of the Government troops were killed. The steamer Pawnee left Alexandria May 31st, accompanied by the tug Yankee, for Aquia Creek, probably to reinforce the attacking squadron. The Seventy-first Regiment of New York were ordered to be ready for a start for the same locality, but were not sent down.

These batteries [illegible] undoubtedly be silenced and the position occupied. The Southern batteries on the James River, another approach to Richmond, are being threatened. A large force was landed at Newport News, which to a great extent commands the peninsula between the James and York Rivers. It also controls Sand Island, which may be said to guard the mouth of James River, and has not been taken possession of by the Secession troops. The force forming the intrenched camp will be from four to five thousand men. Among other regiments there and ordered there are the Vermont, Fourth Massachusetts, the Steuben Guard, the Naval Brigade, and some regulars with four pieces of artillery. This point will doubtless soon be heard from.

An appeal has been made by Frank V. Blair on behalf of the four regiments raised for the Union in St. Louis, Missouri. The Governor and authorities refuse all assistance, and the loyal States are asked to come forward and furnish means to arm and clothe them. Governor Dennison, of Ohio, immediately responded, asking the Legislature to forward at once to St. Louis $30,000 for that purpose from the military fund. New York has also nobly responded. Many thousands of dollars have been raised by voluntary subscription for the patriots of St. Louis.

The appointments of Colonel Fremont and ex-Governor Banks as Major-Generals are commented upon, and generally approved. With veterans like General Scott to counsel, and men like Mansfield, McDowell, McClelland, Butler, Dix, Banks and Fremont to execute, this war will be sooner closed.

A list of seceded Postmasters has been made out at the Post-office Department, to which is appended the amounts for which they are proven delinquents. Duplicate lists will be given the commanding officers of the various divisions moving Southward, with accompanying instructions concerning the treatment of the same. It is stated on good authority that no class of men will meet with more severe punishment, or more summary, than that which will be visited upon these men.

The President has the Cadwallader case under consideration. There are many difficulties in the way, and the question of suspending the writ of habeas corpus is of so delicate a nature that a decision will be given by the Executive only after a careful deliberation. It is thought that the decision of Judge Taney is correct, and that the President will so decide.

Troops are rapidly marching from Ohio into Virginia. General McClelland, who directs the movements, has issued a very important proclamation to the Union men of Western Virginia. He reviews the actions of the Secessionists and the manner in which Virginia has been forced to side against the Union, and alluding to the frequent request of prominent citizens of Western Virginia to the Federal Government for assistance, he says:

> The General Government cannot close its ears to the demand you have made for assistance. I have ordered troops to cross the river. They come as your friends and brothers; as enemies only to armed rebels, who are preying upon your homes, your families and your property, all safe under our protection. All your rights shall be religiously respected, notwithstanding all that has been said by the traitors to induce you to believe our advent among you will be signalized by an interference with your slaves. Understand one thing clearly; not only will we abstain from all such interference, but we will, on the contrary, with an iron hand crush any attempt at insurrection on their part.
> Now that we are in your midst, I call upon you to fly to arms and support the General Government, sever the connection that binds you to traitors, proclaim to the world that the faith and loyalty so long boasted by the Old Dominion are still preserved in Western Virginia, and that you remain true to the Stars and Stripes.
> (Signed) G. B. McCLELLAND,
> Major General Commanding.

In addition to this he has issued an address to his troops, which is at once patriotic, humane and politic, and cannot fail to give general satisfaction. It is as follows:

> You are ordered to cross the frontier and enter on the soil of Virginia. Your mission is to restore peace and confidence; to protect the majesty of the law, and secure our brethren from the grasp of armed traitors. I place under the safeguard of your honor the persons and property of the Virginians. I know you will respect their feelings and all their rights, and preserve the strictest discipline. Remember each one of you holds in his keeping the honor of Ohio and of the Union. If you are called upon to overcome armed opposition, I know that your courage is equal to the task. Remember that your only foes are armed traitors, and show mercy even to them when in your power, for many of them are misguided. When, under your protection, the loyal men of Western Virginia shall have been enabled to organise and form until they can protect themselves, you can return to your homes with the proud satisfaction of having preserved a gallant people from destruction.

Governor Sam Houston who so strongly opposed the Secession action in his State, has come out at last firm-footed for the Southern Confederacy. He says:

> Now that not only coercion, but a vindictive war is about to be inaugurated, I stand ready to redeem my pledge to the people. Whether the Convention acted right or wrong is not now the question. Whether I was treated justly or unjustly is not now to be considered. I put all that under my feet and there it shall stay. Let those who have stood by me do the same, and let us all show that, at a time when peril environs our beloved land, we know how to be patriots and Texans.

The affairs at Fort Pickens remain unaltered, as far as regards any aggressive movement. General Bragg is, however, unceasingly active in his measures. Lines of forts, it is said, extend for miles, of a very formidable character. Heavy guns are mounted in every direction, as the force at present stationed there is counted at twelve thousand men, a large proportion of which are said to be well drilled and efficient soldiers. General Brown, in command of Fort Pickens, has done all that can be done to strengthen the fort, per se; he has also erected batteries on the Island San Rosa, both open and masked, which render his position, in the event of an attempt to storm it, much more defensible. General Bragg seems in no hurry to attack Fort Pickens, but a future intention which he has expressed may precipitate hostilities. In a letter to the New Orleans Delta from Pensacola, dated May 20th, it is stated:

> General Bragg will, in a few days, make an effort to sink the dry dock in a channel running between Fort Pickens and Fort McRea. This attempt will be made for the purpose of causing the guns from the latter to operate successfully on any vessel that may attempt to force an entrance into the bay of Pensacola. The dock referred to is said to be in size almost equal to your City Hotel, and was built at the cost of one million dollars. It is the intention of Government to use every effort to recover this valuable property after the battle is over, that is, provided its sinking is permitted by the Federal authority at Fort Pickens, but here seems the difficulty that will, in all probability, result in the opening of hostilities. General Brown, it is said, has communicated officially to General Bragg his determination to prevent any further obstruction of the channel, and will, he says, fire the moment the attempt is made. General Bragg, on the other hand, says the dock must and will be sunk, and that the channel shall be obstructed. This is, I am informed, the present position of our affairs at Pensacola.

Major-General Banks will be ordered to a command at Baltimore or to Fortress Monroe, to operate with General Butler. In the latter case, Butler will superintend the offensive operations against Norfolk and Richmond, under the direction of General Banks.

John Sherman, aid of Gen. Patterson, carries orders from the War Department for Gen. Patterson to move on with his command to Harper's Ferry as soon as Gen. McClelland can advance from the West.

Mrs. Taylor, of Washington, has received intelligence that her brother, the Sheriff of the County of Fairfax, was one of the rebels killed at the battle at the Fairfax Court House.

"Extra" Billy Smith, it is said, was in the fight as Colonel in command, and was wounded.

Major-General Fremont will return with 10,000 rifles and a park of artillery, say forty twelve-pound guns, rifled.

By the end of this week the Government expects to have twenty-five thousand men at Washington, twenty-five thousand near Alexandria, twenty thousand at Grafton, twenty thousand near Harper's Ferry, fifteen thousand at Fortress Monroe, and ten thousand around Baltimore, Annapolis and the Relay. This is independent of the encampments at the West and elsewhere.

It has been determined by the Government to give to every man, of whatever rank, serving in the army or navy of the United States, in defence of the Union, a diploma, on parchment, or fine parchment paper. The design of the embellishment is by Leutze, and is one of the most beautiful artistic achievements we ever saw. Underneath it is to be the following certificate, viz.:

WASHINGTON, ——, 186–.

A. B. has been enrolled as a —— in the —— forces of the United States, for the defence of the Constitution and the maintenance of the Union. ABRAHAM LINCOLN.
By the President.

Jefferson Davis has arrived at Richmond with his family, and it is reported that all the officials in the Government departments are also there or have been ordered there. The reception of Jefferson Davis on the route is said to have been very enthusiastic. On arriving at Richmond he made the following speech at the new fair grounds:

MY FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS—I am deeply impressed with the kindness of your manifestations. I look upon you as the last, best hope of liberty; and in our liberty alone is our constitutional Government to be preserved. Upon your strong right arms depends the success of our country, and, in asserting the birthright to which you were born, you are to remember that life and blood are nothing as compared with the immense interests you have at stake. (Cheers.) It may be that you have not long been trained, that you have much to learn of the art of war, but I know that there beats in the breasts of Southern sons a determination never to surrender—a determination never to go home but to tell a tale of honor. (Cries of "never!" and applause). Though great may be the disparity of numbers, give us a fair field and a free fight, and the Southern banner will float in triumph everywhere. (Cheers). The country relies upon you. Upon you rest the hopes of our people; and I have only to say, my friends, that to the last breath of my life, I am wholly your own. (Tremendous cheers).

President Davis then retired from the balcony. Senator Wigfall, Governor Letcher and Mayor Mayo followed with brief speeches, in response to the calls of the crowd, after which the President and suite proceeded to the adjoining parade-ground, where a review of the troops took place.

The spirit of the Southern people is strongly indicated in the speech of the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, at Atlanta, Ga., on the 23d ult. He said:

MY FELLOW CITIZENS—The time for speech-making is past. The people have heard all that can be said. The time for prompt, vigorous, decisive action is upon us, and we must do our duty. Upon the surface affairs appear to be quiet, and I can give you no satisfaction as to their real condition. It is true that threats of an attack on Pensacola have been made, but it is uncertain whether any attack will be made. As you know, an attack was made on Sewall's Point, near Norfolk, but the vessel making it was repulsed and disabled. But the general opinions and indications are that the first demonstration will be made at Harper's Ferry, and that there, where John Brown inaugurated his work of slaughter, will be fought a fierce and bloody battle. As for myself, I believe that there the war will begin, and that the first boom of cannon that breaks upon our ears will come from that point. But let it begin where it will, and be as bloody and prolonged as it may, we are prepared for the issue. The North is fast drifting to anarchy and an established despotism. On you, therefore, as citizens of the Confederate States, depend the success and perpetuation of constitutional liberty; for the day is not far off when freedom will exist only south of Mason and Dixon's line, and your stout arms and brave hearts will be her only support on all this continent. We prefer and desire peace, if we can have it; but if we cannot we must meet the issue forced upon us. We must meet Lincoln and his myrmidons on their own grounds, and on their own terms—on constitutional principles. So far, our progress has been all that we could expect. A Government has been organized, executive departments and offices supplied, all needful laws passed, and all necessary arrangements made to meet any emergency. At the head of our Government is President Davis, who led the Mississippi Rifles at Buena Vista, and whose flag never yet trailed in the dust. This noble and true son of the South goes to Richmond, to take command in person of our soldiers there, and to lead upon the battle-field against all the military power and talent they can summon, even to their veteran chieftain, General Scott himself. Whether brought to a bloody conflict or not, we are prepared. Our people everywhere are full of enthusiasm, and strong in their determination never to submit to the rule of Lincoln. Fathers and mothers and sisters are all ready, and doing all they can in aid of the cause. We are in the right, and justice is upon our side. We must succeed. The same God who guided our fathers in the bloody Revolution and who made the glory of the late United States, is yet upon the side of right and justice. Relying upon Him who holds the destinies of all nations in His hands, we will go forth to battle, resolved to conquer or die.

On the evening of the 2d June, two columns of troops from Gen. McClelland's command—one led by Col. Kelly of the First Virginian Volunteers, the other by Col. Crittenden, left Grafton, Virginia, and after a march of twenty miles in a drenching rain, surprised a camp of Secessionists, amounting to two thousand men, at Philippi, Virginia. The surprise was complete, and many of the Secessionists were killed. On the side of the Federal troops Col. Kelly was killed, and several wounded. Philippi is a post village, the capital of Barbour county, on Taggart's Valley River, about two hundred and ten miles northwest of Richmond. A large quantity of arms, ammunition and horses were captured by the Federal troops. The Secessionists retreated in great disorder into the interior.

PERSONAL.

WE notice with pleasure among the removals that of Madame C. MEARS BURKHARDT's Boarding and Day School from 32 West Fifteenth street to Nos. 222 and 224 Madison avenue, corner of Thirty-eighth street. This healthy and beautiful location will offer an additional inducement to parents to place their children in this famed establishment, the long experience of the elegant and accomplished principal as an instructress having won for it a deservedly high reputation in our community. The languages are all taught by native professors, and the strictest attention is paid to the manners as well as the education of and comfort of her pupils. At the earnest solicitation of many of her patrons, Madame C. MEARS BURKHARDT will remain in the city for the summer months, and devote herself to the instruction of her pupils, enabling them to pursue uninterruptedly their course of study.

WE have received from FIRTH & POND, 547 Broadway, several national songs well suited to the spirit and temper of the times. Among them the following are the most popular: "A Song for my Countrymen," written and composed by Henri Braylon; and "Our Good Ship Sails To-Night," composed by Stephen C. Massett, and sung with great success by Madame Anna Bishop. Also the following new publications, which are received with great favor. The "Blokley Galop," by Helmsmuller; "Dixie for the Union," written by F. J. Crosby, composed by Dan D. Emmett; the "Bensel Quickstep," by W. Berge; the "Good-natured Waltz," by Helmsmuller; "My Lady," a ballad, by J. Gaspard Maeder; "The Star Spangled Banner," for piano, by A. W. Berg; "Sourire du Matin," by Wm Jucho; "Un Ballo in Maschera," Nocturne, by J. Ascher; "How Dear to Me the Hour," duet, soprano and tenor, by Henry Kleber; the "Tric-trac Galop," by Helmsmuller; "Long Years have Passed" ballad, by F. H. Holmes; "Our Willie Dear is Dying," by Stephen C. Foster; and "Reminiscences of Un Ballo in Maschera," by A. W. Berg. These pieces are all admirably brought out, and have made a good success.

HENRY C. CORNELL, one of Ellsworth's Zouaves, was killed in a skirmish with the Secessionists at midnight, the 1st June, as his company was about to relieve the Michigan Regiment, near Alexandria. He was in his twentieth year, and a member of Company 13 Fire Department.

GOV. BANKS, Mass., has been made a Major-General, and is now busy with his military duties. Such men as Butler and Banks are guarantees of the integrity and success of our cause.

COL. ANDERSON (Fort Sumpter) addressed the German school children in Cincinnati on Sunday, the 26th May, in a speech full of piety and patriotism.

THE Montgomery Advertiser says that Yancey, the Secessionist, now in London, writes to a friend that there is a strong contest going on between the Exeter Hall party and the Ministry, the former being for the North and the latter for the South. The weakness of Mr. Yancey's faith will be apparent in a few days.

RUMORS affecting the sanity of Chief-Justice Taney are very prevalent in the legal circles of Washington.

THE citizens of Mechanicsville have resolved to raise a monument to the memory of their young hero, Col. Ellsworth.

MR. HENRY, of Maryland, has received the nomination for the First Congressional District of Maryland. He is a moderate.

THE Hon. Emerson Etheridge made a most eloquent Union speech at Louisville on the 27th May. It was loudly applauded.

THAT atrocious miscreant, Elder Orson Pratt, has published a prophecy in the Pearl of Great Price of the total destruction of the Union. He is a strong Secessionist.

GEN. SAM HOUSTON made a speech at Independence, Texas, on the 21st, in which he says that he has, after much hesitation, resolved to stand by that section of the Republic to which he belongs, and is, consequently, a Secessionist.

GEN. MCCULLOCH has been ordered by Jeff. Davis to Arkansas.

GEN. OGILVIE BYRON YOUNG was tried for treason on the 29th May, at Cincinnati. He escaped, on the plea that the court had no jurisdiction. At his trial a letter was read from Gen. Greene, of Missouri, dated 7th November, 1860, in which the present Secession was deliberately announced. Col. Anderson (Sumpter) was examined, but his evidence was not important.

GEO. C. HERSEY, who poisoned Miss Tirrell, of Weymouth, last year, after having seduced her, has been found guilty of murder, and will be hanged, as he deserves to be.

THE Rev. Hosea Ballou died on the 28th, in his sixty-fifth year. He was the author of "The Ancient History of Universalism," and the editor of The Universal Expositor and Quarterly Review.

The New Manual of the Bayonet, for the Army and Militia of the United States, by Lieutenant J. C. Kelton, Sixth Regiment United States Infantry. This very valuable book is published by D. Van Nostrand, 192 Broadway, in very admirable style. It is a book which should be in the hands of every infantry officer, and the better it is known in the ranks the more efficient our soldiers will be in that most important arm of the drill—defence at close quarters. The work is sanctioned by the Military Academy, and is, in fact, a complete manual of attack and defence with the bayonet. It is admirably illustrated, every position being represented with singular clearness and exactness. We can most cordially commend the New Manual of the Bayonet to our volunteer army all over the country.

COUNT AGENOR DE GASPARIN's new work, A Great People Rising—the United States in 1861, is in press, and will be issued in a few days, by Charles Scribner. The translation is by Mary L. Booth, of New York.

THE LATE HON. STEPHEN ARNOLD DOUGLAS.

STEPHEN ARNOLD DOUGLAS was born in Brandon, Rutland county, Vermont, 23d April, 1813. His father, Dr. Stephen A. Douglas, a respectable physician of that town, died of apoplexy, on the 1st of July, 1813, leaving two children, a daughter of twenty months, and the other the subject of our present memoir. The widow then went to live with her brother, a bachelor in good circumstances, and who resided on a farm they had inherited from their father. His subsequent marriage, disappointing them of a competency, compelled young Stephen, then aged fifteen, to apprentice himself to a cabinet-maker, in Middlebury, and afterwards at Brandon. His health failing, induced him to turn his attention to a less laborious pursuit, and his mother and sister having at this juncture married a father and son named Granger, he went to reside with them in the State of New York, and attended Canandaigua Academy, at the same time devoting every spare minute to the study of law. In this quiet and laborious course he continued till his nineteenth year. In his twentieth year he removed to Cleveland, Ohio, where he entered the office of the Honorable I. J. Andrews, who then represented that district in Congress, being the editor. From thence he went to Jacksonville, Illinois, which place he reached in a destitute condition. Finding no immediate opening for his services, he went to Winchester, where he was engaged as schoolmaster, devoting every evening, after his scholastic duties, to his legal studies. His savings as a schoolmaster enabled him to commence the practise of the law, having previously obtained a licence, and he soon made his industry and talent tell upon that little community. At this time the great question was the removal of the Government deposits from the United States Bank, and it was in defence of General Jackson that the late Senator for Illinois made his first speech to the people of Jacksonville. The success he met with in that effort induced him to give more attention to politics, and in 1834 he was elected by the Legislature as States Attorney over Colonel John J. Hardin. In 1836 he was elected a member of the Legislature of Illinois, from Morgan County, being the youngest member in it.

Shortly after the adjournment of the Legislature, Mr. Douglas received from President Van Buren the appointment of Land Register at Springfield, for Illinois, which office he retained till 1838, when he was nominated for Congress in opposition to Mr. Stuart, who was elected by a trifling majority. It is stated by Mr. Douglas's friends that his opponent owed his election to the mistake of many of his constituents spelling his name as Douglass.

After his defeat, the late Senator for Illinois continued the practice of law in Springfield till 1840, when he canvassed the State for Van Buren and Johnson. At the Session of the Legislature in 1841 he was appointed one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, the duties of which he fulfilled till the summer of 1843, when he was nominated as candidate for Congress for the Quincy District. In this contest he was successful, and took his seat as a member of the Twenty-eighth Congress in December, 1843. In 1844 he was again elected by a much larger majority.

Before taking his seat for the third term of his election as a Representative, a vacancy occurred in the Senate, by the expiration of the term of General Semple, and Judge Douglas, with great unanimity on the part of the Democrats of his State, was elected to that distinguished body, where he first took his seat on the 4th of March, 1847. He was re-elected, his term expiring March 3, 1859, when he was again chosen in 1859—his term expiring in 1865. In 1856 he made himself famous for his Kansas Nebraska Bill, which rescinded the Missouri Compromise.

Senator Douglas married, in 1847, a daughter of Colonel Robert Martin, of North Carolina, and with her he obtained a large fortune in land and personal property. She died several years ago. In 1857 he again married, Miss Cutts, one of the belles of Washington, by whom he also obtained considerable wealth.

Our space will not allow us to dwell upon his career, which has been one of continual activity, and patent to the public through the daily press. Having received from a portion of the Democratic party the nomination for President, he was in common with Breckinridge defeated, and Lincoln elected. When the present Secession movement took place he forgot his lifelong hostility to the principles of which Mr. Lincoln was the supposed representative, and joined heartily in defence of the Union. Early in May he was taken ill, and has since then been more or less indisposed. About a fortnight ago his complaint assumed the shape of typhoid fever, which terminated his existence in Chicago, at ten minutes past nine on the morning of Monday, the 3d June.

In the death of Mr. Douglas the country has met with an almost irreparable loss. As a statesman he has made his mark upon the times, as a man he had a vast circle of ardent admirers and earnest and devoted friends, who will deeply mourn his death. His best epitaph will be that he served his country well in life, and died true to his flag and the Constitution.

THE Seventh Regiment, under the command of Colonel Lefferts, returned to New York on Saturday, and received from the people a generous harvest of thanks. As they had rushed off at the first alarm to save the Capital, they had necessarily left their private affairs in so unsettled a condition that their speedy return was a matter of solemn duty they owed their families. They are ready to interpose again should the country demand their services. They left Washington on Friday, after being reviewed by the President, and passed up Broadway on Saturday about six in the evening. Their appearance is very "veteran." Considering the alacrity with which they rushed to the rescue, they deserve well of the nation.

WAR NEWS FROM THE NORTH, EAST AND WEST

MISSOURI.—The Missouri Democrat of May 27 says: "Our advices by last night's train are to the effect that the State troops have all left Jefferson City, but two companies under Captains Duke and Kelly, of St. Louis. These will remain to act as a body guard to the Governor. The disbanded troops all took their arms with them. They have been sworn into the State service for six months, are to preserve their organization, and are required to drill two or three times every week. The eighteen pieces of cannon have been secretly removed from the Capitol, and their whereabouts is only a matter of conjecture. An agent of the Southern Confederacy is now being entertained by Governor Jackson. It is reported that he proposes to furnish the State of Missouri with thirty thousand men and fifty thousand stand of arms, to get us out of the Union by the autumn months. This heavy contract does not seem to recommend itself very readily to his Excellency, for he knows that Gen. Harney must necessarily become one of the high contracting parties. Twenty baggage-waggons are reported to have left Sedalia, a few days since, for Arkansas. Captain Blandowski, who was wounded at the capture of Camp Jackson, died on May 25, and was buried the succeeding day, with all military honors. The First Regiment, Colonel Blair's, was, on May 29, sworn into the service of the United States for the period of three years, unless sooner discharged. With few exceptions, the men took the oath with alacrity and enthusiasm. The Second Regiment, Colonel Boernstein, have left the camp at the reservoir, and have taken up quarters at Jefferson barracks. The Third Regiment, Colonel Sigel, have also struck their tents, and located themselves at the arsenal."

ST. LOUIS.—In the McDonald case General Harney is discharged from further proceedings. A new petition for a writ, to be directed to Captain N. Lyon, and all other officers at the Arsenal, was substituted and presented, and the writ granted. Two additional regiments are ordered to Cairo, besides a company of Illinois artillery, now at Springfield. The Government has chartered the big Wharf Steamer, capable of conveying several thousand troops and stores. It is understood also that the Government has chartered twenty-five river steamers at St. Louis.

ILLINOIS, CAIRO.—Colonel Schuttner's regiment has arrived from St. Louis, and proceeded at once to Bird's Point, which they will permanently hold. They number over one thousand men, and are supplied with Minie rifles, camp equipage and provisions, &c., for thirty days. Shortly two batteries will be furnished them from here. All came on the steamer Louisiana, which steamed around Battery Point, amid great enthusiasm on ship and shore. Gen. Prentiss and Staff escorted them to their new location, where their camp lines were defined by Col. Webster, but owing to the storm, they remained on the boat all night. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the work of fortification was commenced and several big guns were mounted. Of all of Gen. Pillow's men, only five thousand one hundred are well armed, and these are principally at Union City and Randolph. Arms are, however, arriving for the others. There is no recoil battery at Columbus, Pillow having seized the guns intended for that place. A Secession flag has, however, been raised at Columbus, and troops are organizing there for an expected attack from here. News that Gen. McLelland has sent Ohio troops into Western Virginia gives satisfaction here, and strengthens the popular belief of an early movement down there.

WESTERN VIRGINIA.—Judge Thompson has just issued a Proclamation from Wheeling, ordering the Disunionists to disperse peacefully and return to their allegiance. What renders the document the more interesting is the fact that both his sons are officers in the Secession army.

WHEELING.—On Sunday, the 19th of May, Colonel Kelley, commanding the First Regiment of loyal Virginians, moved towards Grafton, which was evacuated by the Secessionists at his approach. After Colonel Kelley's departure the Sixteenth Ohio Regiment, 1,000 strong, stationed at Bellaire, crossed the Ohio, and followed Colonel Kelley's advance. The Fourteenth Ohio Regiment crossed the Ohio at Marietta, and occupied Parkersburg.

NEBRASKA.—We have late advices from Omaha, N. T., to the effect that the Sioux Indians had recently become enraged at the Pawnees, and were determined to exterminate them. They were able to muster about 3,000 braves, and were quite too much for the Pawnees, who are not so numerous nor so warlike. In view of this, the white traders living among the Pawnees agreed to help them. On the Sioux hearing of this, they threatened vengeance on all the white settlers of the Territory. The whites became alarmed, and in two weeks enlisted a thousand volunteers. These, added to the forces of the Pawnees, were too powerful for the Sioux, so that they deemed it inexpedient to proceed against their enemies. Thus the matter stands for the present. Nebraska will offer this division of a thousand men to the United States Government, as a home guard, it being the business of the General Government to protect the people of the Territories.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

VIRGINIA, RICHMOND.—The Arch Secessionist is in the capital of Virginia. He left Montgomery on Sunday June 2d, accompanied by Wigfall and Toombs. In consequence of his recent severe illness he departed so quietly as to be almost clandestine. He addressed the people at Atlanta, Augusta, Wilmington and Goldsboro, at which latter place he was crowned with flowers by beautiful girls, while others, equally lovely, fanned him. Governor Letcher and the Mayor of Richmond met Jeff Davis at Petersburg, and escorted him to Richmond, where he made a speech.

The next thing that Jefferson Davis did was to appoint the 13th of June as a Fast day, which, considering that eggs are twenty-five cents a piece, ham one dollar a pound, butter seventy-five cents, and everything in proportion, seems rather a work of supererogation.

HARPER'S FERRY.—There has been no direct intelligence since our last. A Government scout reports that two sixty-four pounders were placed in position here on the 30th, and that General Johnson has inspected the various batteries and pronounced them impregnable. He will no doubt be found a false prophet. A Southern paper, the Louisville Courier, of the 25th May, says: "General Johnston assumed command, and immediately set to work reconnoitreing the surrounding country. Attached to his staff is the Hon. Henry A. Edmundson, formerly a prominent member of Congress from this State. That General Johnston intends to hold this place may be inferred from the fact that he has brought his family with him. His accomplished wife is the daughter of the late Hon. Louis McLane, and a sister of the Hon. Robert M. McLane, of Baltimore, recently Minister to Mexico.

"Major Whiting, a very able officer, has assumed charge of the engineering branch of the service of this point.

"You will see by reference to a map of Virginia, that if the reports be true concerning the seizure of the Manassas Gap Railroad by the Federal troops, that we are completely hemmed in at Harper's Ferry. We have no means of access to Richmond, nor the interior of the State, and within rifle shot of us is the frontier, while there are thousands of the enemy in a half-day's march. Here then we must stand, and when the time comes cut our way out of this trap. But we are not at all disheartened or appalled by these circumstances.

"More big guns continue to arrive, and are being rapidly planted on the mountain heights. We are expecting still other reinforcements, and in a few days will be enabled to guard the whole west bank of the Potomac from this point up. Our policy is to be one of defence, not aggression."

TEXAS.—A gentleman has just arrived here from Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Tennessee. He says the feeling in the portion of Texas that he visited was more for herself than the remainder of the Southern States, that she is more anxious to secure her own independence, and become what she was sixteen years ago, than to take part in a war for the benefit of the cottonocracy. She will fight for the State rights of Texas to the last, but will not be over prominent in the balance of the conflict. Ben McCulloch was at Memphis four days ago, and will take part in the defence of that city in case it should be attacked. The force in Texas is not very extensive, but there are large bodies of troops within twelve hours' ride by railroad. Those in the city are not well drilled. There are but few cannon in Memphis, and but three or four at Columbus. Powder is manufactured at some point in the interior of Tennessee, and sent to the soldiers at the various points of rendezvous. Two hundred kegs of butter were lately shipped down the river from this point to Memphis, which were found to contain ball cartridges instead of pure Goshen. They did not reach their destination.

TENNESSEE, MEMPHIS.—There are here six mounted companies under arms, calling themselves the Tigers, à la Chinese. They are armed with Sharpe's rifles. There are two six-pounders mounted on the levee below the bluff, and five thirty-two pounders not yet mounted on the bluff. Three of these five were condemned a year ago, and considered dangerous to those who fire them; but they will make a show. General Pillow is here, having returned from his visit to Kentucky, very much depressed with his reception. At Fort Harris, six miles above Memphis, there are 1,700 men, armed with flint muskets.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES OF THE WAR.

A SECESSIONIST proposes, through the Mobile Register, to raise Fort Pickens with red pepper. He would mix red pepper and veratria with the powder in the shells, and make the garrison cough themselves out of the fort. The morals of the people down there must be improving. For it was only last week a correspondent of a Mobile paper proposed to poison our men. They like any way, it seems, better than fighting. The correspondent of the Register ought to be banished to Cayenne.

A SOUTHERN merchant wrote lately to a large firm in New York, requesting a list of the names of those who supported and sympathized with the "movement against the South." The New Yorker replied by sending, through Adams & Co.'s Express, a copy of the "City Directory."

WE learn that our friend Gov. Magoffin, finding that the whole State is in doubt as to what his proclamation means, intends to issue another very soon, explaining what it does mean. He will probably do this as soon as he can see Mr. Breckinridge, and make sure as to the meaning himself.

THE Mormons are delighted at the present imbroglio. One of their preachers lately remarked in his sermon that the North and South were now arrayed against each other, and each party praying to the same Lord to grant them power over their enemies. For the speaker's part, he would say, success to both parties, and he hoped the Lord would hear and answer the prayers of each party with strict impartiality.

A SOUTHERN lady, on her way home from Philadelphia, passed through Harper's Ferry last week with no less than a dozen revolvers stowed away under her crinoline. It was certainly a singular location for so many arms.

BRIG.-GEN. W. S. HARNEY.

The daring and experienced soldier, whose recent promptness in Missouri has stemmed the tide of Secession, was born in Louisiana at the beginning of this century, and entered the army at a very early age, being appointed Second Lieutenant of the First Infantry in 1818. Since then he has been constantly in service, and with such acceptation that he is now the third in rank, his only superiors being Lieutenant-General Scott and General Wool. The last command General Harney held, previous to his recent one in Missouri, was that in Oregon, where his energetic advocacy of our national interests led to so decided a breach between the British Governor of Victoria and himself, that Mr. Buchanan, with his usual pusillanimity, despatched Lieutenant-General Scott to inquire into the matter, and come to some arrangement with the British authorities. General Harney returned to Washington some few months ago, and offered his services to the President, although decidedly opposed to him in politics. His arrest by the Secessionists we have already related, an incident which exposed him to much unjust suspicion at the time. About a month ago he was despatched by the President to St. Louis, where his energetic action crushed the spirit of Secession. His fearless and patriotic address to the Missourians we published in our paper for the 18th of May. He has since been recalled to Washington, to assume a prominent part in the military operations about to take place in Virginia.

CAIRO.

The importance of Cairo as a military position can hardly be overrated. Situated in the very heart of two slave States, and completely controlling the great highways of Western traffic, the very nature of the surrounding country makes this point one of the strongest positions on the Continent. The only approach by land is by the Illinois Central Railroad track. The rivers are at present very high, and the country for ten miles back from six to fifteen feet deep under water. The first dry land on the Kentucky side of the Ohio River is a ridge about eight miles distant, and between it and Cairo is an impenetrable swamp. The Missouri shore is about two or three feet above the present high water at Bird's Point, which is the terminus of the Cairo and Fulton Railroad. This point will undoubtedly be shortly occupied by United States troops. A reconnoitring party, headed by Captain Benham, United States Engineers, surveyed this position lately. The only approach at present from the South is by the Mississippi River, which, after receiving the waters of the Ohio, makes a sudden turn southward. An assaulting force would be under shelter until it approaches this bend, which is about two and a half miles distant from Battery Defiance; from here they would be exposed to the fire of the batteries. If you consider the present state of the Confederate navy you will conclude that Cairo is at present perfectly safe, and before the waters subside and the surrounding swamps are dried sufficiently to make the approach by land at all feasible, the fortifications about to be erected will make an attack impracticable. Captain Benham, of the United States Engineers, and an assistant are busily engaged in laying out fortifications. General Prentiss commands the troops now here. The principal part of the army are encamped on the south side of Cairo, inside of the levee, but detached corps of artillery are occupying positions along both rivers at intervals of two and three miles, while reserves of cavalry and infantry are encamped along the Illinois Central Railroad, guarding the bridges and track, and ready to be thrown into Cairo at any time. The troops are all well drilled and armed, and the hospitals are in perfect condition. The health of the men is very good, only light cases of sickness, arising from colds and the effects of change in diet and water, being reported, and no death has as yet occurred. The oldest inhabitants say that, notwithstanding unfavorable appearances, Cairo is essentially a healthy city; and, if this is the case, all scientific demonstrations of the evil effect of malaria generated by standing water are confuted. The only dry land here now is the levee, which is from twenty to twenty-five feet high; the rivers are about fifteen feet higher than the interior of Cairo, a great part of which is covered with standing water, which two steam pumps, working day and night, endeavor to throw into the river, while the substance of the remaining territory is exceedingly doubtful. There is, however, one point of comfort in Cairo, and that is the St. Charles Hotel, T. G. Lansdon & Co., proprietors. It was opened in the fall of 1860, and is a large roomy brick building, containing all the conveniences of metropolitan hotels, with the addition of a generous allowance for room and fresh air. The commissary department of this hotel must be in excellent hands, judging from the quantity and quality of the provisions, and the officers of the army seem to appreciate the superior experience of the host, and occupy the hotel from garret to cellar.

The only excitement here, under prevailing circumstances happens at the arrival of boats, which either from ignorance or carelessness neglect giving the signal to land. They receive the first warning by a blank shot, and if they do not answer a ball is fired across their bows.

MAP OF CAIRO, ILLINOIS AND ITS VICINITY.

We give in our present number the completest, most accurate and most comprehensive map of Cairo that has yet appeared. Our readers will perceive from this the immense importance of this city in a strategic point of view, and how entirely it commands both the great rivers of Ohio and Mississippi. This, with the unrivelled pictures we give of the city, enable all to form as perfect an idea of Cairo as though they had visited the place. The river is about two-thirds of a mile broad at this spot.

GOVERNOR DENNISON, OF OHIO.

In times of national excitement the men of strong character rise above the mass, and almost without an effort make opportunities and mould events. Gov. Wm. Dennison, of Ohio, is one of these men. When it became obvious that the question to be decided was whether or not the Federal Government was to be sustained, without a moment's hesitation he ranked himself with the heartiest and firmest supporters of the Constitution, and threw the whole energy of his nature and the influence of his position into the cause which he deemed both national and holy. Led by his patriotic example, the spirit of the people of Ohio quickly rose up to a high point of enthusiasm, and on the call of the President for volunteers for the army hundreds offered for every one that was needed.

Governor Dennison, in consultation with General McClelland, issued a general order, in which the military strength of Ohio was detailed. The total number of men capable of bearing arms was over five hundred thousand, one hundred thousand of which could be immediately placed at the disposal of the Government. Governor Dennison rightly interprets the generous and noble sentiment of the people of Ohio. He may justly be termed a representative man, for in his frank and liberal nature, and in his high and estimable personal qualities we see the reflex of the great State he so honorably represents.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL B. M. PRENTISS

Was of the first company who took ground at Buena Vista, occupying the high land by the wagon road, where the militia from Illinois were so providentially saved by the service of a corps of artillery, which he had posted at the entrance of the thoroughfare, and the supporting power of the infantry under Captain James D. Morgan, who has become Colonel of the Seventh, or Prentiss Regiment. Prentiss was near to Colonel Hardee (in whose regiment he served) when he fell. On the body of that gallant soldier was found the sash belonging to Prentiss, which he wears in this war, stained as it is with his former gallant leader's blood. So popular was Prentiss in his district of country, that upon his call more than two companies assembled under him as captain. The companies being brought together, he was at once promoted by the free voices of the men to the Colonelcy, and since, by a large majority, was elected to his present post.

CAMP SMITH

Is situated at the Mississippi Bend of the Levee—see map—and protects the approach by land from the interior of Illinois. It is occupied by Captain Smith's Chicago artillery company. This company is to Chicago what the Seventh regiment is to New York. The men composing it are members of the first families, and most of them are wealthy, while others have forsaken remunerative situations to fight for their country. The camp is delightfully situated on high dry ground, inside the Levee, opposite the lower end of Cairo Island—see sketch—and is in the very best order. The parade ground has been perfectly cleaned and levelled, the stumps removed, brush burned, and everything put in the very best trim. In the foreground are the tents of the Lincoln Rifle Company, Captain Miolozi. The arbors, covered with foliage, will demonstrate the German character of this company. The captain is a Hungarian, an old soldier, and perfect disciplinarian.

CAMP M'ALLISTER.

On the Ohio Bend of the Levee is Camp McAllister, occupied by Captain McAllister's Plainfield artillery. The ground here is not so favorable, bogs and swamps surrounding the little dry spot which the camp occupies; but the captain and his men are hard at work, ditching, grubbing and burning logs, and will soon master their situation. It is no wonder, however, that the captain has a heart to work, as he has a faithful and beautiful wife, who prefers to share the hardships of camp life with him to the enjoyments of a comfortable home without him.

NEGROES TAKING REFUGE AT FORT MONROE.

It has been a subject of considerable apprehension with the Union men as well as the Secessionists as to what the slaves would do in the present unfortunate and unprecedented state of the country. The hatred of compulsory labor, however moderate, is so strongly implanted in the African breast, that those who knew them best felt assured one of the greatest difficulties the South would have to contend with would be the peculiar institution itself, in whose behalf Secession had been undertaken. The promptness and sagacity of General Butler have increased the dilemma of the Secessionists to a remarkable degree, since it is at once equally hostile to Abolitionism and Secession. By declaring that slaves are contraband of war he recognizes them as property, and, consequently, as liable to capture. When Colonel Mallory, therefore, applied to General Butler for the restoration of his slaves, who had fled to Fortress Monroe, General Butler offered to restore them upon condition of taking the oath of allegiance to the Union, in whose name alone he could demand the fulfilment of the Fugitive Slave Law. It is needless to add that the Secessionist was foiled with his own weapon. Since then a large number of slaves, men, women and children, have "seceded" to Fortress Monroe, and General Butler has made the best possible use of an evil, and employed the able-bodied to work at the entrenchments, while the women have been set to washing, cleaning, &c.

Our artists have sent us several sketches, which illustrate the various methods in which they made their escape and the remarkable risks they ran. There are now about five hundred in the fortress, and are valued at half a million of dollars. Thirty of these belonged to a planter in Richmond, who visited General Butler to confer with him. Upon his asking if he might take them back, the General said that they came of their own accord, and could go back if they wished. They, however, decided to remain, whereupon the planter manumitted the entire lot, and returned to Richmond.

It is reported from Fortress Monroe that gangs of fugitive slaves, in parties of twenty or thirty, were constantly arriving there, over one hundred having reached there on Monday. Some of them said they were about being sent South, and others alleged that they came in to get food. They complained that, whilst they were kept at work in the sandhills, the soldiers ate up all the food. Some of them were free negroes, who had been compelled to work upon the enemy's fortifications in and near Norfolk.

A few miles below —— there now lives, and has lived for several years past, a worthy clergyman, a man, however, very short in stature. Upon a certain Sunday, this clergyman was invited by the pastor of a church in that village to fill his pulpit for the day. The invitation was accepted, and Sunday morning saw Mr. —— in the pulpit. Now it happened that the pulpit was a very high one, and accordingly nearly hid the poor little clergyman from view. However, the congregation, out of respect, managed to keep their countenances, and with over pious faces seemed religiously anxious for the text. They were not obliged to wait long, for a nose and two little eyes suddenly appeared over the top of the pulpit, and a squeaking, tremulous voice proclaimed the text: "Be of good cheer, it is I, be not afraid!" A general roar of laughter followed the announcement—the clergyman became confused, and turned all sorts of colors. Many, in the general uproar, left the church, and it was a long time before the minister was enabled to proceed with the sermon, so abruptly broken off. Afternoon came, and the little man, standing on a footstool, had a fair view of his audience. The text was announced in due form—"A little while ye shall see me, and again a little while and ye shall not see me." In the course of his sermon he repeated his text with great earnestness, and stepping back, lost his elevated footing and disappeared from his hearers. The effect may be more readily imagined than described.

A gamekeeper having attained to the age of eighty-two years, and unwilling to let the secret die with him, has communicated what he proclaims to be a certain cure for hydrophobia, he having many times in his life tried and proved its efficacy both upon men and animals. He recommends to bathe the wound with warm water and vinegar immediately after the bite, and let it dry; then to pour on to the wound a few drops of muriatic acid (hydrochloric acid), mineral acids possessing the property of neutralising the venom of the saliva.

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

D'ALMAINE had heard the screams of his wife and child, and hurrying to the garden where they proceeded from, demanded of the old screaming affrighted little girl where her mother was. She could only point distractedly to the entrance. The Duke de Palerno on his hearing manner in his arm up the steps Louis Quinze !" the name given to the steps by an ancestor of D'Almaine, who had been a minister, and high in favor with the fifteenth Louis.

At the report of firearms the servants of the duke were on the spot immediately. D'Almaine stooped loudly as he approached, and his own household were soon beside him standing over the objects on the ground, both covered with the lifestream from the heart of De Palerno.

D'Almaine looked on with horror, scarcely knowing which, or in both, were not his victims. "What have I done ?" he exclaimed. "What has the vestiness and villainy of this man hurried me into?" He caught the insensible Lucille in his arms, and bade some of the domestics to bear the bleeding body of the duke to the chateau; ordered others to hasten for surgical assistance, and in a state of frenzied bewilderment drew with his wife to the house.

It was soon ascertained that Lucille was unhurt, but D'Almaine would not quit her till she recovered. When she opened her eyes she looked wildly and fearfully round.

"Where am I?" she cried. "My husband! my child! am I torn from both?"

"You are here safe; I am near you. Fear not, for harm cannot reach you through me," said D'Almaine, leaning over her; but his face was pale, his hair dishevelled, and bloodstains from his dress were on his hands.

"Oh, what has happened? in the name of mercy tell me!" looking at him with the affrighted force surrounding her. "That wretched child! How was I rescued? Oh, tell me, those villains set your hand—what do they tell me? Has he—"

"Hush, dearest, compose yourself," said D'Almaine. "I have but avenged myself on the man who sought to blast my own and your honor. Be tranquil, I wish to make inquiries about the wounded wretch, but cannot quit you till I see you more tranquil."

"Oh, do not think of me," said Lucille. "Think of yourself if you are in danger. I have brought it on you. Inquire after Monsieur de Palerno," she said to a servant standing near; "Juliet, your looks frighten me." At this moment the surgeon entered. "Oh, sir," she added, on seeing him, "is the duke wounded, has he done he live?"

"Madame," he replied gravely, "the duke has gone to his account. The ball pierced his heart—death was instantaneous."

There was a deathlike silence for a time, when the surgeon again spoke.

"Monsieur D'Almaine," he said, "the death of the duke will lead to unpleasant inquiries. Until it blows over, I would recommend you to visit the church, and till you have the result keep beyond the bands of justice."

There was a proud flash in D'Almaine's eye.

Hide myself!" he cried. "What have I to fear from justice? I have not violated the laws. I may stand as enemy in defence of his life and when Lucille, who is dearer than life, is at stake, shall he not defend it?"

"That is as an honorable, injured man would argue," said the surgeon; "but the two servants of the duke are notorious rogues; for money they will swear anything. Of course you will not purchase the silence of those men."

"I will purchase the silence of no man," replied D'Almaine, haughtily. "nor will I flee. My country is just, my own act was just, and the duke of Palerno's death the just act of a retributive Providence."

"There is truth in all you have said, count," returned the surgeon, "and I fear not the justice of French laws; but none but the duke's servants were witnesses to his death, and we have no proof on your grounds. If his own or his wife's family are inclined to be implacable, you may be in some danger. I should recommend your departure hence to some place more secure."

"Oh, dearest love," urged the trembling Lucille; "quit the chateau for a few days. He must, if you wish, so that if you desire it you can appear when time and opportunity favor your doing so."

"So agree, Lucille," he returned, sternly. "My conscience, and none other, shall guide me in this affair. I am the innocent and injured, and can boldly face any false evidence. Let a messenger be dispatched to inform the family of Monsieur Perigue," he added, turning to the surgeon, "from who are a kindly and humane man will be the bearer of the mournful tidings to Juliet. It is right it should be broken gently to the wife, to whom—although she lives not on the most amicable terms with the deceased—the shock is a natural consequence, will be severe."

Lucille covered her face, and sighed deeply. The surgeon looked on her with sentiments of pity; more for her than for the duchess, whose apathetic disposition was well known.

"How beautiful and delicate she is!" he said inwardly, as Lucille led her head to answer a question of the count's. "She appears so if a breeze would send her. Pray Heaven in this sad case she may not have the sharp wind of misfortune to contend with."

Then turning to D'Almaine he said,

"I undertake your mission to the duchess, monsieur. She is staying at her estate, I think. Good morning. I will look in upon you again as I return."

CHAPTER XXII.

THE following morning as D'Almaine and Lucille were sitting over their breakfast, which had passed almost in unbroken silence, a servant, with blanched cheek, entered to say that two gentlemen wished to see the count.

"Who are they?" said D'Almaine. "Did they not send in their cards?"

"No, monsieur," replied the servant; "they merely said they must see you. I told them you were at breakfast. They said they would wait till you had finished. But they are rather suspicious looking, and I thought I would just step and tell you, in case you might not wish to see them. And there is no occasion," he added, hesitatingly, "if monsieur wish it otherwise. We can easily send them away without their errand."

"Show them in," said D'Almaine, in a tone not to be contended with; and you, Lucille, had better quit the room. It is better I should see these gentlemen—for whatever they terms themselves—alone."

"Let me remain," said Lucille, firmly, though her lips were pale and trembling. "If they are the messengers of bad news I must soon know it. The prolongation of a few wretched minutes passed in suspense will avail either of us little."

She had scarcely spoken when the door again opened, and preceded by the trembling servant, whose eyes seemed starting from their sockets in the intensity of his gaze on them, entered the two men with hurried obeisances, and one of them drawing a paper from his pocket, presented it to the count. He scanned it a moment, then returned coldly.

"A warrant for my apprehension. Well, gentlemen, I am your prisoner. I will order my carriage, and when it is ready will attend you. To where do you take me?"

"To Rouen, monsieur," replied the man, surprised at D'Almaine's ready compliance; "but there is no immediate hurry," he added. "If you have any papers to sign, or business to settle, we can wait an hour."

"I shall be ready when my carriage is," said D'Almaine, sharply. "You can retire into the ante-room, or remain here, which you please. I shall not quit the apartment till I leave it in your custody."

They then, with an innate delicacy unusual to those in their occupation, said, they would retire until summoned by him, and bowing, left the room.

Lucille, who had stood nervously gazing from one to the other during this brief conversation, had summoned all her fortitude to her aid, that she might support her husband. As the men left the room she approached him, and leaning on the chair he had thrown himself on, said in a low but calm voice, "Do not let this misfortune depress you. I will accompany you to Rouen, and on the way consult with you what had better be done. I suppose your relict had better follow with the necessaries you require?"

"You can do as you like, dear Lucille," he said, with an attempt at gaiety, "only keep up your spirits, for I have no fears, though I confess the imprisonment of the affair in a measure depresses me. I have sent a chief creature out of the world unprepared; and though I consider the deed his own, I could wish that other hands and other occasions had been the means. But have courage, for I again repeat I have no fears for my safety. I trust to my country, and it will do me justice."

"I hope so," was the faint reply.

The carriage was announced, and Lucille, throwing on her shawl and bonnet, they were soon on their unpleasant journey, and as hour's drive brought them to the prison. Being a man of fortune, private apartments, with every attention from the governor, were accorded to D'Almaine. And only that he was from home, and a slight paralysis placed on his hands at night, he would not have known he was a prisoner.

Lucille came to him each day, and who was assidenos in her inquiries about the result, learnt that a host of evidence against D'Almaine had risen up by the duchess, who, having, when first he entered the world, been slighted by him, spite of her immense wealth and interest, for his younger and more attractive wife, was now determined to revenge the slight upon herself, by heaping with all her power the character and acts of him whom she raved of as her husband's murderer. She had bribed the servants who accompanied the duke on his infamous errand, to say his business at the chateau had been a duel with D'Almaine, and that a quarrel between them on some gambling transactions was the cause of the latter firing his piece at him with such fatal aim, and Monsieur D'Almaine falsifying, and her dress being bloodstained was a mere attempt to attribute a contrast to other causes.

Estate, the indefatigable Estate, was out night and day, gleaning every information possible. He advised, and when it was necessary acted for Lucille with the friendship he had always professed, and which was now tried in its firm fidelity, while Madeline's gentle, studious attention to all that was passing was a drop of honey in the unfortunate wife's cup of misery.

The trial of D'Almaine was hurried onward by his enemies, who felt they had full power to convict; for not one of his own people had either heard the screams for assistance of Lucille or her child; none had opposed him the servants of Monsieur de Palerno till after the fatal shot had pierced his heart. There was nothing but his own testimony to refute the long train of conclusive evidence against him, and what was that when malice, wealth and power were working with all her terrible engines against him?

Lucille visited her husband daily; there was little change in his appearance beside a shade of melancholy on his countenance; and his step, as he paced restlessly up and down his confined chamber, at times fevered; but his voice had still its bold commanding tones, and still vaunted of his country's justice.

Lucille with an aching heart was looking through the iron bars of his prison, when she uttered half audibly,

"One short week to bring such fearful changes!"

She was pale and careworn, and a restless nervousness shook her generally firm collected manner. D'Almaine observed it, and stepping in his cell before her said soothingly,

"Lucille, you are fatigued, harassed with this unfortunate affair, you have neither rest nor quiet. Coming daily to this place must pain you at both health and fortitude, and yet your presence is so essential to my comfort that I cannot bid you leave. But dearest," and he took tenderly her and put his arm round her, "you will be better pleased, whatever the result, more resigned after the trial."

"The trial!" she responded, starting to her feet, then with an effort resuming herself, answered with an attempt at steadiness, though the tremulousness of her voice was not to be mastered and her countenance wore fearfully on his—"most think of that, too, think of what may be the final results. D'Almaine, can I do this and live?"

"Yes, you must think of it as an event not to be avoided," he replied; "but as one not to be dreaded. Think of the justice of our laws, and ask can they pronounce me guilty for defending my wife's honor?"

"Ah, but will it have proof, of that?" said Lucille. "Will it believe your single testimony against a host of opposite witnesses?"

"It will believe when truth is spoken by honorable lips," replied D'Almaine.

"But should their verdict be contrary to truth and honor, what would be the punishment?" she asked breathlessly.

"The guillotine or the galleys," he replied.

A sharp, short, irrepressible cry fell from Lucille; she covered her face with her hands, and gradually it sank down, she remained in this attitude several minutes, and D'Almaine too was again pacing the room; but when he turned to face there was a tint of color on the cheeks, and the eyes looked less tearfulness though, they thought, in those few minutes had counted like a whirlwind through her brain, bringing with them hope and life for her husband.

D'Almaine, who had watched with pain the agony of the moment, was surprised at the sudden change, but happy to see a returning sunbeam gathering over her expressive face, which gave cheerfulness to his mind, pressed her return home, with injunctions to take the rest she so much needed.

Lucille unelectantly consented; a new impulse had given an impetus to her whole nature, and her fervent good night at parting, uttered in a firm tone, hope and confidence in nothingness on the cure of D'Almaine long after she had left him, that his rest was free from the feverish excitement of the day.

On arriving at the chateau, Lucille's first inquiry was for Batiste, and on learning that he had long waited for her, she hastened to him; but her face was again pale and careworn in its expression, and her voice trembling as she demanded:

"What further intelligence, Monsieur Batiste, from Madame de Palerne and her family?"

"That they have no mercy," he replied; "that they will pursue the count with the utmost rigor. Six of the principal advocates of Paris are retained for the cause, and it is the greatest opinion there, with each powerful adversaries, nothing can save him. Some say he will escape the guillotine, but nothing can preserve him from the hateful galleys."

A thrill of anguish compressed her lips and closed her eyes, and the white marble sank, on which she leant for support, was left more colored than has been her cheek since a glass of water. She waved it away, saying, in a hoarse voice:

"What can be done by your retained for us?"

"Turn what small high in public favor," he replied.

"What said they on your arrival, Batiste?" she asked.

"Alas! madame," said Batiste, "I cannot deceive you, though I see you so worn and harassed with the last week's misery, for I judged more by their manner than words, that hope had but a frail place to anchor on."

"Then on Heaven and our own energies will we rely," said Lucille. "But the trial, Batiste, is the day yet fixed?"

"It has been hurried on," he replied. "It is to be the day after to-morrow. Ah, madame, that day will be a trial for us all. I see the count tried for a deed he should merit commendation for, to see him tried by men and punished by pain for an act of retribution God as I have deemed the laws of France, I begin to doubt their justice now."

"We are too powerless to do aught but murmur at them," said Lucille. "Is Madeline here?"

"Yes, with the child," he replied. "Shall I ring for her?"

"No, we will all there go to my dressing-room," said Lucille, "I have much to talk over with you both; it may be the last opportunity for the present we can converse alone, for I shall join the two forthcoming days with the count. Our time together may be short, if the evil hour cannot be averted."

Batiste drew his hand across his eyes, no he ceremonially followed her. As she entered her room, Lucille met Madeline and her child at the door.

"Oh! mamma," cried the delighted child, who had seen but little of her mother the last week, "how long you have been away! how you brought pain home!"

"No, dearest," she replied, clasping her to her, to hide her tears, "not to-day; but papa has sent twenty kisses for his Estelle."

"I wish he would come," said the child. "I sometimes think I shall never see him more, mamma, for I dreamt last night I was a long way from Madeline and everybody I love, travelling in a large, heavy coach, and crying because they would not take me to you. Mamma, do not go away again, in case the large heavy coach should come and take me from you for ever."

"Dear child," said Lucille, shivering, "do not make me more unhappy by your sad forebodings. Here, Annette, take her and let her go out of your sight; for I am so weak and foolish that even a child's dream makes me tremble."

The child disappeared with her nurse, and the trio entered the room, where they remained in earnest converse till long after dark.

Before Lucille went to bed, for we cannot say rest, she went to her child's bedside; she slept sound, the sweet sleep of childhood; but while the mother watched, the smile on the child's lips fled, her features slightly distorted, and she cried out in a pewish tone, "Take me to Madeline." Then the tone changed to one of plaintiveness, a tear stood on the long, dark lashes, and she said, "Goodbye, good-bye, mamma; they will never bring your Estelle back again! I shall see never you more."

"Good Heavens!" said Lucille, in a fearful tone. "She is again dreaming that dreadful dream. Oh! it is ominous that I should leave her late in sickness, or that it is the Almighty's intention to take my child to Himself. Oh! pardon, dear one, but let me bear for you the worst while I have you," and taking the child in her arms she bore it to her own bed.

CHAPTER XLIII.

It was the eve of the day before the trial, the hour when twilight has deepened to the bright stars, that a carriage stopped at the gate of the prison. The horses, from appearance, had been long at hard duties, and the coachman, for he was the only attendant to it, might have been worn from exhaustion, for he wiped the perspiration from his forehead several times before descending from his box; but as soon as he did descend he rang the bell, the heads of which was just visible in the uncertain light. Immediately the huge portcrow opened, and Bowdy rang loud and boldly at the gate, he went to the door of the carriage, opened it, and a gentleman of a stout stunning appearance alighted. As the portal opened, the inmate of the carriage, who from his attire appeared a servant, handed a letter to him, which he gave to the hands of the door-keeper, saying in a loud tone, "For the governor, and say I wait a reply."

The man disappeared, the gate closed heavily, and he was soon with the governor. The letter, who with a few friends had just commenced a convivial evening, broke the seal, after it had remained on the table before him till he had ended an argument he was discussing; and having deliberately satisfied it, read the contents:

"Monsieur de Calecte's compliments, and desires an interview with his client, the Count d'Almaine. He offers apologies for his late visit; but having been detained unavoidably in court, trusts was no alternative. Monsieur de Calecte, to lose no time, has not even waited to change, as time is precious, from the fee hours intervening previous to the trial."

"It is late," said the governor, "and against rule to admit people after the gates are closed; but on this occasion the rule must be dashed from. I suppose for my orders are to admit unreservedly the friends and advisers of the count. How has Monsieur de Calecte arrived?"

"In his own carriage, monsieur," returned the door-keeper, "and I do not know how many servants, as I was not at the trouble of counting them."

"Oh, Monsieur de Calecte is a great man," said the governor; "I admit him by all means, and tell him if he wishes an interview with me I am at his service."

The door-keeper disappeared, and soon the jingle of his numerous and heavy keys was heard. Once more the lock turned, and the small portal again opened. The man partly showed himself, and in a surly tone said to the coachman, who had drawn near the door as soon as it had turned on its hard hinges,

"Your master may enter, though, like the governor, I think it is an unseasonable hour; but as it is a Mr. so-and-so gentleman, I suppose——"

At this moment the coachman pulsed something into the man's hand, saying,

"Master is aware that this is extra trouble for you, monsieur, and sends you this."

Without waiting the reply the coachman let down the steps of the carriage, and the obsequious servant of justice descended and passed through the portal, and the key was turned upon him.

stooped to let the man take the lead, who after passing through several long narrow closes passengers, mounted a flight of stairs, and stopped before a low door, which he lifted by the latch. The door open, the advocate entered, when he heard the latch again turned, and he was alone in the small chamber with the Count Di Almaine.

D'Almaine had been writing. He pushed the table from him, rising on the entrance of the advocate, and he a cold, proud tone, demanded,

"To what, monsieur, am I to attribute this late, unexpected visit?"

The advocate laid the tip of his forefinger on his lips, and with his arm on the door behind him he held silently out his hand. A step of the jailor had ceased to vibrate, and every sound save their own breathing was hushed. Then, when the man was sure of not erring fire, he pointed to D'Almaine to be seated.

D'Almaine, whose appearance bore testimony to his late sojourn, at first refused; but there was something in urgent and anxious in the manner of his visitor, that he could not, though he asked the cause for him, be himself sunk into the one he had risen from, and he remembered to fall back again into the revery he had been awakened from.

The advocate replaced the chair, and drawing a small stool to the feet of D'Almaine, which he held, he sat down. Then, as if to free from his head, the rich curls, bright as gold in sunshine, of Lucille shewn in a world of beauty over the pale face which he had concealed her identity.

Over-powering emotions, in which were mingled love, dread and wonder, for a time prevented D'Almaine's utterance. Lucille broke the silence.

"You are not surprised to see me here," she said, "when to-morrow is the trial."

D'Almaine looked with order on the sweet face raised to his with such devoted love, and his bitter thoughts came back perhaps another week he would be torn from her for ever; that she, with so much beauty, love and virtue, might be thrown penniless, and without protection, on a world which had hitherto shown her but little kindness, but they would prove a sweeter and more powerful sequal to that he had nursed her from—a rescue which seemed likely to make both free. Such were the thoughts which passed in a flash over his side.

Surprised!" he said. "I ought not to be surprised at your devotion, my wife, for it is that has brought you here in disguise and in danger to my prison. But I should be surprised, and more than surprised, at your having left your preceding one, because not bringing me your presence, as I had sent to you to do, that I had not left it for ever."

"Do not speak so, dearest, of the noblest punishment will be the certain death of the guilty one."

"That would be a punishment which I have not deserved, Lucille," said D'Almaine, "but I have heard much since I saw you, and dare not trust myself to it."

"I have perplexed myself to-day in a degree for what may have," said D'Almaine; "I have written to the Count Di Lorme, the man who is the kindest and best of men. He will guard you till you become Countess, and then a lawyer if necessary."

She kissed the hand lovingly that held her own.

"Think not of being," she said, "but of the time to speak, or even think, of the future; the present must have all our considerations, all our energies. It is now hours, if not minutes, to the trial. If you will stand a criminal in a court of justice, surrounded by the agents of criminal law, I will be by your side, and whether you live or death, will not stop till your doom is life-long labor. Juries, you again remember."

"Enough!" he cried, starting to his feet, and looking at her with distended eyes. "Lucille, are you mad? Do you know that in a few seconds, this hole that secures me can be withdrawn, or the vigilance of a jailor fail? No, no, I will not be the cause, I will consider it the cowlings of a madman."

"I speak not, my husband, and it will be lost," said Lucille. "Again seat yourself, listen, and listen to me. You have still hope. Should it be the last moment, you will not be left to die. Be sure they will send you to the galleys. Thither, if you go, I follow you. Look at me, I am a child, defenceless in appearance, but I know myself if we are forced from these hateful manacles," looking at her hands, "I will be strong."

"I will do both, all, if you will trust to me," replied Lucille. "I will shew you that I can, though young and defenceless in nature, can, by her love and energy, outdo the strong resolution, the resources, the experience of a man. Now, dearest, I will tell you of the hotels and lodgings I have visited, and the plan I have formed."

While she spoke she had taken from a small silk bag, concealed under her cloak, a number of the advertisements of the day before yesterday, with which she had commenced the labor of freeing him from his dungeon. D'Almaine perused them with deep attention; there was so much of hopeful energy in her voice and manner, so much determined will, that he seemed to partake beneath its sway.

Two young men in Monroe, La., are ridiculed by the local press because they do not join at once the Confederate army. The people of that city and neighborhood have organized a company, assigning the following principle: "We, the undersigned, having determined to protect our property, and to agree to stand and watch for our beloved South, and to protect our beauties and our property, pledge ourselves to meet every night at the hour and on the ward."

The first case of Dan Tennessee here called a Convention, in spite of Secession. This Convention, however, decided that it was not competent to take any step touching that in the treaty of the French Revolution. The traitors are ruling the country with a high hand, and no mistake.

The happiest idea for a monument to the memory of the gallant and murdered officer, is that originated by Mr. Ellsworth's friends in Mechanicville, New Hampshire, composed of one man from a town—or ward—as supplied by our fast-fighting friend. The figure of a young man, handsome and sculptured and the rock a purpose, could not fail of deeds that would make a monument worthy of the name.

The blockade of the Mississippi river is producing some singular results. New Orleans is dependent on the Mississippi valley for its supplies of food. New Orleans flour is sent to Memphis than to New Orleans, one hundred miles below.

The Colonel of the Massachusetts Fifth regiment, who was killed at Baltimore, was a fine soldier, and with a friend, his subject, he was hated to the cowhide, but he was very much respected by his men. He was shot to death to give the contraband. The latter wanted his gun, and in a moment would have fired but for the prompt energy of the officer who interposed his body.

The city of Alexandria, now under martial law, presents a curious spectacle from a commercial point of view. Before I was unable to describe a single Small-ware—the low-rooms are closed, and almost the only persons met or seen are those wearing the Federal blue coats.

Three hundred negroes from Texas are said have been sent on there up on contraband on the roads leading to Green View. The troops are said to be badly disciplined and badly armed.

The Secession flag, captured from the Marshall House by Colonel Ellsworth on the morning of the 24th inst. has been presents to the Ex-Department of the Interior by Lieutenant Greble, of the 2nd U. S. Artillery, Fort Sumter. The flag is much torn and stained with the blood of the Colonel.

The Secessionists have, since recently, under assumed circumstances, at night, left Alexandria. This is due to the fact that they are afraid to be found elsewhere, and the situation appeared to be duly noticed in many persons' country residing in the city, and others discovered the hateful rat, which fact by also, concealed under her hoops.

A Miss Dickinson, niece of Senator Simmons, residing in the corner of Sixty and Green streets, East New York, was bona by her indignant countrymen for being a Union woman. Her house was attacked by a secession mob, and she, with her married German, who administered a series of reformatory kicks to him. He was thrown down, and the infuriated mob commenced to pull down the house, but, however, soon but a policeman would entrance police station so shortly as to allow time for which so many pulled men are patrolling their lives.

The last number of the Alexandria Sentinel, which was issued the day before the entrance of the Federal troops into that city, contained a valiant article on the evacuation of Secessionville, and the defeat of the 79th Highlanders. It said if they dared set foot in Virginia, no matter in how large a force, they would be swept from the face of the earth. The next day, when the troops of their bodies would furnish furnishing material for the most cannon's whose bones would be used for the manufacture of buttons for the Secessionists.

The romance of war is always greater than that of peace. The soldier who has been wounded in battle, and who has been compelled to leave his regiment, was known to his gallant sister in Brooklyn, New York (a married lady), she resolved to join there in pursuit of her wounded brother, and to nurse him over at her presence. When he recovered consciousness, he said, with a look of surprise, "Sister, how did you get here?" "Why, I came to see you." "Like a sheep, the age-sexed, and her promises has recovered him. Her husband has also joined the regiment, and is now with his wife and brother.

Dr. Gardner Quincy Colton, of New York, has issued a circular inviting medical journals where the drugs have been prescribed by him without payment, to publish the fact, and to report the effects. He claims to have discovered "the healing or therapeutic properties of atmospheric air—from respiration, or inhalation—as a remedy for consumption."

Rs. S. G. Howe, who was appointed by Governor Andrew to examine into the contract according of the Massachusetts troops, says that their wants are abundantly provided for, and that their health is good. He makes a number of suggestions, among which is that the men be furnished with a change of underclothing, and that they be furnished with a waterproof coat. He gives the following illustrations of the furious spirit which still lives among the Secessionists. One of them said in his opinion that the West Point Cadet who killed them was a most profane swearer.

It may that the cannon balls will not kill us.

The Secessionists drill largely, and the cadet begins to show at the soldiers.

The Secessionists have a fine band of music, which plays "Dixie" and "Yankee Doodle" alternately, and the Yankees are ordered to whistle or sing, but not to speak any thing.

A Secession paper says: "Our Sprague, of Rhode Island, has presented himself to the Confederate States Government, and has been received with the best and kindest, that makes four great bags of wool, besides an infinite number of knives."

PRINCE, of the Louisville Journal, says: As Ohio either says that our pay is not large enough, or that it is too large. We suppose he means to say that keeping a laughs pay.

Some of our Virginia citizens seem trying to drown all thoughts of the hard times. They get richer than the money market.

It is now thought that the loss of her and her guns' forces being called upon to go on war, now perhaps to be killed in the conflict enclosed, with the Union. Let us hope that the report is false and it would be a shame.

A Secession paper charges the Union men of Kentucky with being "unbelievable." Our opinion is that the Secessionists are the ones who believe and say they mean to keep it.

The enlistments in the United States Government extends its category to all sort of printing paper and writing paper going to the South. That's what we call a paper blockade.

One neighbor of the Courier talks of nothing but the Louisville blockade. Here's a fine thing. Louisville seems to have been reading the Courier long enough!

The Cincinnati Enquirer says that the powers which he are unreasing in their vigilance, as shown in the fact that several contraband of necessaries to maintenance have been seized on the Ohio river.

Fresno Bourbonism's house is the only one in Knoxville, Tenn., over which the Stars and Stripes are not seen. It is the only one without floral decorations. Would not a splendid flag be the best thing to hang over the State and region. But then it would be a flag of the Union, and that is what they don't want. Their hearts are cold and their heads are empty. They cannot appreciate the Union as those down there have and forgive. No humanity drew a revolver from her bosom and presented it to the head of a Union man, and said, "Now, damn you, look it over and see if you can."

"If the leader of that girl's eye she'll shoot," one remarked. "I think I would better not try it," said his back and get more men," said the other.

The Secessionists in Texas are in a bad way for powder, and some talk is even made of using gunpowder for bullets.

They entered with a company of ninety armed men, and demanded that the Union flag should be taken down. On discovering that it could not be replaced now, armed to the teeth, who would rather die as dearly as possible than see their country's flag dishonored, the Secessionists retired.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

A correspondent writes from Winchester to the Courier that the Secessionists have not yet succeeded in getting the iron for the gunning establishments supposed to be in progress at Richmond. He says that Mr. Ellis has been appointed as a representative to the Germanic that on the authority of a gentleman who has seen his credentials.

A German society lately gave a picnic to build a playground-house. Among those in high spirits was a fat Dutchman, who was dancing a jig to the music of their walls. Long before this dance was rendered, a perpetual spring of cement had been put in the floor, and the dancing party was not aware of the fact. One to one was not very good, but the unlucky person was obliged to stand. A friend, who was looking on, called out to him, "Why don't you get out?" "Get out!" he replied, "I can't get out, because there is no door, and you don't know how to get out of it."

The Saint Louis Democrat says that Mr. Cernea, reviews: "The family had been in Washington since last winter, and they were in the city during the days or two before the attack upon Fort Sumter. The family is all precious—as I am not. This is a mercenary boast. This house is a museum of curiosities."

A Runaway Restraint—Custom clerks were performing at Sandusa, and one of the acts was to ride a horse around the ring. A young man was induced to try all the work of a person who was flying a horse with that horse ridden by a lady. He got on the horse and started around the ring, when the horse with his head and tail, and the lady, who was standing on the ring-floor, was thrown down side. The keeper, in alarm, followed it, crying out, "Stop, stop!" The young man, who was unable to stop, cried out in the presence who showed the approach of the elephant took flight themselves at the top of their speed, and the elephant followed after them at a full run. The beast was fortunately secure by its keeper without having done any harm.

A Fine Joke.—A gentleman who resides in the city of Boston, and who, in the south of France, there some weeks at once. Here are many of them, the Boston Post says, who are in the habit of playing practical jokes upon all advantages by persons and by the liquid plaster in them fresh and pure to the taste.

The Chinese at German-see-Laye is to be transmogrified into a Tower of Babel, to replace the present of keeping some rare insects alongside. The system pursued at the Tower of London has been imported into, and will be carried out at the Chinese at German-see-Laye. Here, as in the latter, the visitors must remember the very keepers of London Tower, who get their stories from the Beefeaters, and who tell them to the visitors as they pass along. "Ah! Jones," said one to another, "I'm glad to see you back again."

"Yes, sir," says he, "I'm glad to be back myself, sir, for I've been a-travelling about a good deal, sir, and I've seen a great many curiosities, sir, but I never see such a curiosity as this here, sir, in all my travels, sir."

FOREIGN OPINIONS ON THE WAR.

England.—Despatches of the press still doubtful—that of the people is decidedly true at the North. The American press is strongly or wholly against the fact, and the armed to secure the end. In the House of Lords a debate was had on the 10th, in which several of the leading members gave their opinion on government. Owing to Jeff Davis refusing to subscribe to the Paris Congress, the privateering question is not settled. Lord Brougham and Lord Derby spoke. Lord Derby is described, there is every reason to believe, that England will gladly recognize the secession, more especially as the Queen's Speech will be delivered in a few days, and the American people who refused to accede to the treaty in 1856, but Mr. Jeff Davis, Franklin Buchanan and Co. have refused to do so. Lord Derby is also said to have advised Northern principles in London. The European Times says that the liberal commercial spirit of the South has encouraged some Liverpool merchants to commence a Steam Company to New Orleans, and that two iron steam vessels are now building for the service. Mr. Bright, M.P., speaking in Germany, said, in the town of Germania, a section from the misunderstandings, facts and prejudices which had led to the present unhappy state of affairs in the Republic, among that they viewed with alarm the serious circumstances which would probably take place in the supply of cotton, in consequence of the war between the Northern and Southern States of America, and urging the people to adopt such measures as would contribute to the development of the cotton growing capabilities of India. The people, he said, were the true source of the real power which existed in the United States. He had the greatest confidence in the power of the people by oft-told in fact, the establishment of efficient courts of law and justice. He said that the Free Trade principles of the age, and the people, including railroads, canals, water-ways, modes of exchange, and commercial intercourse, and the establishment of a cheap postage. He also would not have more than a year, and the Government assumed the responsibility of the war. He concluded by declaring his belief in the speedy victory. When about ends.

France.—Despite every proof that, like England, France will preserve a strict neutrality. Her journals, however, fortunately allude to the miserable state of affairs in America, and express a hope that the people will be enabled to overthrow the Government which has brought them to such a pass. Monsieur Dupuy, Prince; Marshal, Turin; Duc, Bugeo; Barbiguiere, Vienne, and Count Walewski, Secretary of State.

Spain.—The American troubles have had the effect of calling the Spanish Ladies from the Bull Fights. The Government has issued a decree forbidding contraband in the shape of taking either side in the present war.

ANECDOTES, INCIDENTS AND HUMOR OF THE TIMES.

A Southern journal says that all the planters are attended to fight, and they "have the whistle of bullets." Isn't the south paying rather dear for the whistle?

A coin has been appointed in the following (Miss.) fine for the saying of all in the Mississippi Secession Convention: "Any person who shall be guilty of using the word Union shall be fined $100 for the same offence."

Mathew, who has just returned from the South, says that the companies in that section of country are very much in the way of the regular army of Northumberland. The is nothing, as it don't come by wrapped.

The Detroit Free Press says that Secession has carried her wealth in the South." The wealth will be afraid, Mr. Junior, to have the wheelbarrow of that interesting young lady.

One of the leaders of the Columbia and Fort Moreno is hunting directly upon the house and Government. He is one small boy to go and see him. Secession will happen.

The Ninth Ohio regiment was going from Cleveland to Camp Dennison, Capt. Buck-ighan supposed the train would stop at Crestline, and settled his bill. The conductor refused to stop, and he was forced to pay himself without coupling. The train, however, checked up a little, but the rate of speed was still fast. Capt. Buck-ighan was not to be done out of his money, and, as the train slowed, jumped for it, struck, kissed his greedy, and, under tremendous momentum, rolled over and over, finally going with his money, but with very little to the skin and clothes.

A Germans paper says: "Gen. Sprague, of Rhode Island, has presented himself to the Confederate States Government, and has been received with the best and kindest, that makes four great bags of wool, besides an infinite number of knives."

Some time ago. The Constitutional Government has succeeded great energy and determination in bringing the robbers to the public judgment, and with such success that the great road between Vera Cruz and the City of Mexico is now entirely cleared of robbers. Gen. Degollado, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Mexican Government appears to be verging towards neutrality. Mr. Wallace had been very ill. He was at Jalapa, awaiting an opportunity to leave for the United States.

YOU are respectfully informed hereby that DR. POTTS has removed his office from Nos. 15 CHATHAM STREET, NEW YORK.

(Entrance), "Dr. Potts has never been excelled in curing DYSPEPSIA AND LIVER COMPLAINT, SCROFULA AND PILES, and all Diseases of the Blood."—Newark Daily Advertiser.

Dr. Potts' Medicines are purely vegetable, and they are not STIFLED or ever nauseate. They have made the

ASTONISHING CURES,

Professor Hitchcock, of the Truxton Academy, says: "Dr. Potts has been equally successful in the treatment of the

in which our race is subject."

S. L. Hanley, Esq., of 160 Broad St., Newark City, says: "For three years I was an utter invalid with Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Scrofula, Piles, Heart and Lung Complaint. I had a distressing Cough, and was a rapid decline. Dr. Potts positively cured me in less than two years."

Rev. Harry, of 76 Seventh St., Newark:

"I was a great sufferer for many years from

Dyspepsia, Scrofula, Scurvy and Liver Complaint.

Dr. Potts saved my life. I believe. I commend the sick of my race to Dr. Potts. He is eminently successful in curing all complaints peculiar to my race."

Joseph Ricks, of 56 Sussex St., Newark, says:

"I was in rapid decline from

DYSPEPSIA, CONSUMPTION AND LIVER COMPLAINT.

Dr. Potts restored me in sound health."

These and Dr. Cowden, and six other certificates.

Dr. Potts' Medicines are for sale by druggists everywhere.

Dr. Potts will give his personal attention in the city of New York to all of the New York and Brooklyn patients. Office hours: from 10 A. M. to 4 P. M., and when not otherwise engaged.

THE MARSHALL HOUSE,

ALEXANDRIA, VA.

As the spot where the gallant Ellsworth met his death-wound, the Marshall House at Alexandria, Va., has become widely notorious, and the object of general and curious attention. It is situated on a corner of Pitt and King streets, and has for years attained a somewhat local distinction. The proprietor, James W. Jackson, who murdered Ellsworth and was so promptly killed by Brownell, was an active and determined Secessionist, and was boastful of his political views, having inscribed at the bottom of his hotel cards, "Virginia is determined, and will conquer under command of Jeff. Davis."

Postscript, June 4.

A skirmish came to from the camp at Hampton with the report that Colonel Allen, commander of the Troy (N. Y.) regiment, sent out yesterday morning a scouting party, consisting of one company from his regiment, in the direction of Fox Hill; that they were suddenly surrounded by a party of two hundred rebels, and that eight of the prisoners taken in this skirmish are from Colonel Allen's camp. Although the message came off orally from Colonel Allen to General Butler, the latter discredited the report, upon the ground that from all the various reports brought in by spies and others, each corroborating the other's there could not be five hundred men within fifteen miles of Hampton. Nevertheless, General Butler immediately issued orders to Colonel Burnes's regiment of Zouaves to go in pursuit of the enemy and recapture the Federal prisoners. If they found any General Butler and staff also left the fort and proceeded to Hampton, to investigate the report himself.

Colonel Kelly was not killed at the battle at Philippi. He was severely wounded in the breast, and though it has been reported, all hopes are entertained of his recovery.

Colonel Anderson is not to take command of troops in Kentucky.

On account of failing health he will repair to the mountains of Pennsylvania for invigoration.

General Sterling Price, of Missouri, has issued a proclamation intimating that he suspects that the State is to be disarmed. He proposes to resist any such effort.

General Butler has refused to be sent on the regular army establishment, preferring to return to civil life when the war ends.

It has been ascertained, by careful inspection, that the cannon balls fired by the Secessionists at Aquia Creek, at the Germantown battalia, are different from any projectiles in common use, and there is some speculation on the subject. It is believed that the cochon and projectile must have come from Europe.

Colonel Lander has offered his services to General McClellan.

Colonel Magee is to be Quartermaster General of the army.

Provisions are passing through Kentucky for Tennessee. It is not known whether they will be stopped or not.

James Watson Webb will leave in a few weeks for Brazil, by way of England, there being no United States ship that can be spared from his service now to convey him there.

The prisoners of war are still on board the Powhatan. They pass away their time mostly with sleeping and playing cards. Everything is done to make their physical comfort, but they are strictly guarded, and are not allowed to hold communication with any one.

There has been insubordination among the Secessionist troops at Corinth, Miss. Some of the soldiers refused to obey orders, and a fight ensued, in which seven were killed.

No. 291—Vol. XII.] NEW YORK, JUNE 15, 1861. [Price 6 Cents.

THE BATTLE AT GREAT BETHEL.

Repulse of the Federal Troops.

General Butler having learnt that the Secessionists were fortifying Great Bethel and that they intended making a stand at Little Bethel, ordered Colonel Duryea's regiment to cross Hampton Creek, and march on Little Bethel. This order was promptly executed, and the regiment moved from Hampton at about half-past one o'clock, having been ferried over the Hampton Creek by Lieutenant Crosby's flotilla of boats, manned by recruits from the Naval Brigade. Colonel Townsend's Albany regiment followed an hour after, and at the same time Colonel Bendix's regiment and detachments of the Vermont and Massachusetts regulars at Newport moved forward to form a junction with the regulars from Fortress Monroe at Little Bethel, about half way between Hampton and Great Bethel. The Zouaves passed Little Bethel about four A. M. Colonel Bendix's regiment arrived next, and took a position at the intersection of the roads. Not understanding the signal, the German regiment in the darkness of the morning fired upon Colonel Townsend's column, marching in close order, and led by Lieutenant Butler, son and aid of General Butler, with two pieces of artillery.

The Albany regiment returned the fire, but fortunately without effect. The loss of the Albany Regiment was one man killed, two seriously wounded, and some other casualties. The unfortunate mistake was speedily corrected, and the troops advanced upon Great Bethel in the following order: The Zouaves, Colonel Bendix, Lieutenant-Colonel Washburne, Colonel Allen and Colonel Carr, at the point our regiments formed and successively endeavored to take a large masked Secession battery. The effort was futile, our three small pieces of artillery not being able to cope with the heavy rifled cannon of the enemy, according to some accounts thirty in number. The rebel battery was completely masked, so that no men could be seen, but only the flashes of the guns. There were probably less than a thousand men behind the batteries of the rebels. A well concerted movement might have secured the position, but Brigadier-General Pierce, who commanded the expedition, appears to have lost his presence of mind, and the Troy regiment stood for an hour exposed to a galling fire, when an order to retreat was at last given, but at that moment Lieutenant Greble, of the United States Army, and in command of the artillery, was struck by a cannon ball and instantly killed. He had spiked his gun, and was gallantly endeavoring to withdraw his command. Captain George W. Wilson, of the Troy regiment, after the order to retreat was given, took possession of the gun, and, with Quartermaster McArthur, brought it off the field with the corpse of the beloved Lieutenant. Both were brought to Fortress Monroe in the evening.

The loss of the Federal troops is said to be twenty-five killed and one hundred wounded. It is hard to tell whether indignation or grief predominated at the recall of this gallant attack, but it is certain that had the intelligence of the commander of the expedition equalled the daring courage of the men, the batteries would have been stormed and taken.

On the receipt of the report, General Butler mounted his horse and rode to Newport News, to remedy the want of judgment in the leader of the expedition if possible, and to take the batteries without a doubt, and with the least possible delay. We shall give the result of his action in our next.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, they giving us credit for being en rapport with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching information. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

The State of the Nation.

Events crowd upon us so rapidly, events so significant in themselves, and yet so minute in relation to the whole, and so numerous withal, that it is utterly impossible to chronicle or even keep count of them all. On both sides measures are progressing towards a certain point, which is a deadly conflict between large masses of the Federal and Secession troops, now moving steadily on from various points towards each other. Untiring activity is displayed on both sides, and if we may believe the party presses a like determined hostility and deep-seated enthusiasm animate both. We know within a few hundreds the force which General Scott is throwing in and towards Virginia; at least a hundred thousand men will, in a few days be treading the sacred soil of the Old Dominion, and threatening the occupation of her proud capital, Richmond. Where their point of concentration will be is, of course, a profound secret, one not entrusted even to those safe depositaries of State secrets, the newspaper correspondents; but all conjectures seem to point towards Manassas Gap, where, it is supposed, the largest Secession force is now gathered, and where Jefferson Davis and Beauregard are said to be superintending in person. There are many reasons for favoring this movement, as a dislodgment of the Southern troops from that point would completely isolate the army at Harper's Ferry and would open the way up to Richmond.

It is impossible to arrive at any correct statement of the Southern troops now in the field. The amounts vary from forty-five thousand to ninety thousand and one hundred and forty-seven thousand soldiers, armed and equipped. The first estimate is probably as far below as the last is above the truth. Probably all told, and in various stages of efficiency, the Southern army will number from eighty to ninety thousand men, a force by no means to be despised, and although by no means sufficient to cope with the enormous masses of the North now in the field, and those ready at call, still enough to make a determined stand and cause the result of a general engagement to be by no means certain as to which side would gain the victory. The sure but cautious movements of General Scott prove to us, at least, that he has reliable intelligence of the strength of his opponents, and that he is determined not to risk the event of a general action until the necessary forces are in the field, and victory is assured beyond all probable peradventure.

The policy of the Southern Generals is said to be not unanimous. One is for throwing an immense force into Harper's Ferry, a second for concentrating the whole strength upon Manassas Gap, and a third for falling back upon Richmond, and there awaiting the approach of the Federal troops and defending the city to the last extremity. We dread the result of the meeting of the two armies; the conflict will be obstinate and deadly, and a vast amount of bloodshed will be the consequence, which all will sooner or later bitterly regret.

The movement of troops upon Harper's Ferry from the West, from Pennsylvania and from Washington, continues without abatement, and in sufficient force to either cage the Secession troops there or compel them to retreat. There is no action anticipated at H[illegible]'s Ferry. Warlike expeditions are in preparation all down [illegible]onroe, and a few days will bring out some decided steps in [illegible] quarter. Newport News, which has been recently seized and occupied by the Federal troops, is a strategic point of great importance, since it serves for a base of operations for advance movements both on Norfolk and Richmond the capital. The regiments sent there are doing an immense amount, they have already erected extensive breastworks and powerful stockades, and are now mounting heavy and effective guns, so that Newport News may at this time be reasonably allowed to be strong enough to repel any attack that may be made upon it.

Several of the leading New York papers are pouring out the bitterest and most vituperative invectives against the English Government for its course of conduct in the present crisis of our national affairs. The most terrible acts of retaliation are threatened against the British nation before a shadow of offence has been given. Ireland is told "this is the time to rise and shake off your oppressors;" Canada is invited to came in and take "pot luck with us;" France is advised to "go in" and avenge Waterloo. In short, every suggestion which could irritate, every expletive which could annoy, are lavishly used to heap contumely and contempt upon our great commercial rival. All this is wrong, weak and childish. It will not frighten England into friendliness, and it certainly will not conciliate her to favor the action of the North. Every reasonable man feels assured that the people of England are with the Federal Government heart and hand, and the Ministry will not dare to outrage the moral sense of the community, or set at defiance the will of the people. Enough tremendous paper pellets have been expended, "terror has been struck into Windsor Castle," so we can now afford to be reasonable and wait the course of events.

The vote in Tennessee went largely for Secession, as was expected, but there is a widely extended Union feeling, which will be more strongly developed when the Federal troops give the Tennesseeans the support of their presence.

The state of feeling in Baltimore and in other parts of Maryland is still very unsettled, and a violent demonstration is expected on the 13th inst., when the election takes place. The Government is fully prepared, and an overwhelming force, assisted by Fort McHenry, will be in readiness to control events. General Banks has replaced General Cadwallader, who leads a brigade into Virginia, and is now at Fort McHenry.

The death of Judge Douglas has created a deep and profound sensation throughout the whole country. North, East and West, all the municipal authorities recognised the melancholy intelligence by special demonstration, and public bodies passed resolutions of sorrow and sympathy. In most of the cities and towns in Illinois business was entirely suspended on the day of his funeral, and every possible token of respect was offered to the memory of the great statesman whose loss is so sincerely and deeply deplored.

The funeral of Judge Douglas took place at Chicago, Illinois, on Friday, the 7th of June. Business was generally suspended, the Board of Trade having adjourned from Thursday until Saturday. The banks, jobbing-houses and drygoods stores were all closed, and the streets at an early hour, on the line of march of the procession, were densely thronged with people, large numbers of whom arrived from the country by the morning trains. At eleven o'clock, amid the tolling of bells and the firing of minute guns, the procession moved from Bryan Hill, where, since Tuesday, Senator Douglas's remains had lain in state, through Clark and Lake streets to Michigan avenue, thence to Cottage Grove. The procession was about two miles in length, and occupied an hour in passing a given point. At a low estimate there were ten thousand persons in the procession, which was composed of the military, Governor, State officers, members of the Legislature, medical and legal professions, Masonic fraternity, Mercantile Association, Fire Department, Typographical Union, and all the benevolent societies, to do honor to the memory of the illustrious dead.

At Cottage Grove the services were conducted by Bishop Duggan, who delivered a brief but eloquent oration on the character of the deceased.

The following account of the last moments of a man so eminent in the annals of our country cannot fail to be of interest to every American reader:

LAST HOURS OF JUDGE DOUGLAS.

At about eleven o'clock on Sunday morning Bishop Duggan called at the request of friends to converse with Mr. Douglas, who was then, for the first time, perfectly rational. Mr. Douglas immediately recognized the Bishop, and expressed his gratification at the visit. Bishop Duggan soon asked,

"Mr. Douglas, have you been baptized according to the rites of any church."

Mr. Douglas replied,

"Never."

The Bishop continued: "Do you desire to have mass said after the ordinances of the holy Catholic church?" The answer was,

"No, sir; when I do I will communicate with you freely."

The Bishop then turned to Mr. Rhodes and said,

"Do you think he is fully possessed of his mental facilities?" Mr. Rhodes replied, "I do not know—perhaps you had better ask him again." The Bishop repeated his question, to which Mr. Douglas answered, in strong, full voice,

"You perhaps did not understand me. When I desire it, I will communicate with you freely."

The Bishop then remarked to Mr. Rhodes, "He is undoubtedly in his right mind, and does not desire my offices" He then withdrew.

During the day (Sunday) Mr Douglas seemed to be much better, and strong hopes were entertained of his recovery; he slept most of the day, and in the evening seemed much refreshed. Mrs Douglas and Mr. Rhodes remained with him during the night. At about four o'clock on Monday morning he seemed to be much worse, and sank rapidly; his friends were sent for, and at the request of Mrs. Douglas Bishop Duggan again visited him. Soon after the Bishop entered he approached the bedside, and addressing the [illegible], said,

"Mr. Douglas, you know your own condition fully, and in view of your approaching dissolution, do you desire the ceremony of extreme unction to be performed?"

Mr. Douglas replied,

"No, I have no time to discuss those things now."

The Bishop then withdrew. After he had gone Mrs. Douglas requested Mr. Rhodes to ask her husband if he desired the ministrations of any other clergyman. Mr. Rhodes then said to Mr. Douglas:

"Do you know the clergymen of this city?" To which Mr. Douglas replied,

"Nearly every one of them."

Mr. Rhodes—"Do you wish to have either or any of them call to see you to converse upon religious subjects?"

Mr Douglas—"No, I thank you"

Soon after this, about five o'clock, he desired to have his position in bed changed, the blinds opened and the windows raised. Mr. Rhodes lifted him to an easier posture, where he could look out upon the street, and drink in the fresh morning air. For a few moments he seemed to gain new life. Then he began to sink away; his eyes partially closed, and in slow and measured cadence, with considerable pause between each accent, he uttered,

"Death!—death!—death!"

After this he seemed to revive slightly, and Mr. Rhodes asked him whether he had any message to send to his mother, or sister Sarah, or his boys, "Robby" and "Stevie," to which he made no reply, evidently not understanding the question. Mrs. Douglas then placed her arms around his neck and said,

"My dear, do you know cousin Dan?"

"Yes," he replied.

Mrs. Douglas continued:

"Your boys, Robby and Stevie, and your mother and sister Sarah—have you any message for them?"

The dying man replied,

"Tell them to obey the laws and support the Constitution of the United States."

At about five o'clock Dr. Miller came into the room, and, noticing the open shutters and windows, inquired,

"Why have you all these windows raised and so much light?"

"Mr. Douglas replied,

"So that we can have fresh air."

At Mr Douglas's request Mr. Rhodes changed the dying man's position again in the bed for the last time. He now lay rather down in the middle of the bed, upon his left side, his head slightly bent forward and off the pillow. His wife sat beside him, holding his right hand in both of hers, and leaning tenderly over him, sobbing. Mr. Rhodes remarked to Mrs. Douglas,

"I am afraid he does not lie comfortable;" in reply to which Mr. Douglas said,

"He is—very comfortable."

These were his last intelligible words. From five o'clock he was speechless, but evidently retained his consciousness. When, a few minutes before his death, his wife leaned lovingly over him and sobbingly asked, "Husband, do you know me? will you kiss me?" he raised his eyes and smiled, and though too weak to speak, the movements of the muscles of his mouth evinced that he was making an almost dying struggle to comply with her request.

His death was calm and peaceful; a few faint breaths after nine o'clock; a slight rattling in his throat, a short, quick, convulsive shudder, and Stephen A. Douglas had passed from time into eternity.

The march on Philippi and the rout of the Secession troops there was a gallant affair, and but for the terrible roads and the want of proper guides would have proved of much greater importance. The attacking party on the Secession camp at Philippi consisted of four regiments in two divisions, one consisting of the First Virginia Regiment, part of the Sixteenth Ohio and Seventh Indiana, under the command of Colonel Kelly; the other consisting of the Ninth Indiana and Fourteenth Ohio, under Colonel Lander of Wagon Road and Potter of Pryor duel notoriety.

Colonel Kelly's division moved east by railroad to Thorntown; from thence he marched to Philippi, twenty-two miles. The Indiana regiment moved by railroad to Webster, where they were joined by the Fourteenth Ohio; from which place they pushed forward on foot to Philippi, twelve miles distant. The march of the two divisions was performed through darkness, rain and mud.

It was a terrible undertaking, but they all went bravely through it unshrinkingly, and without complaint. All night they toiled on through the darkness and storm, the soft earth yielding beneath their feet, till the gray dawn found them in the neighborhood of the enemy.

Colonel Lander reports that he arrived on the hill across the river from below Philippi, and commanding the town, before daylight. He at once prepared to open fire on the rebels at the appointed time. Four o'clock was the hour at which the attack was to be made simultaneously by both divisions.

Colonel Kelly was to attack them in the rear and cut off retreat, while Colonel Lander would assail them in front, but Colonel Kelly's division was behind the appointed hour, owing to the terrible fatigues of the forced march and being misled by guides.

When day began to dawn upon Colonel Lander's impatient forces it discovered to them the camp below in a state of commotion, evidently in great alarm and preparing for flight. The hour appointed for the fight came and passed, but still Colonel Kelly's division had not arrived.

Impatient to begin the attack, and fearful that the rascals, almost within his grasp, would escape without smelling powder, Colonel Lander ordered his artillery to begin the attack, and at a quarter past four the guns were unlimbered and dropped the first messenger of terror into the rebel camp.

Simultaneously with the roar of the first gun, Colonel Kelly, at the head of his command, came in sight across the river below the camp; and, comprehending the position of affairs, he rushed forward in the direction of the camp. Meanwhile, the battery having got range, played upon the camp with marked effect, tearing through the tents and houses at a fearful rate.

The Southern troops fled with great precipitancy, firing a random volley which did no harm. Colonel Kelly was the only sufferer, he having received what was feared to be a fatal wound. The last accounts, we are glad to say, announce his probable recovery. He was shot by an Assistant Quartermaster of the Confederate troops, named Sims, who was taken prisoner. The Secessionists left behind them fifty horses, five hundred muskets, a lot of handsome uniforms and all their camp equipage. Fifteen of their party were known to have been killed, as their bodies were afterwards found concealed in a thicket close by.

PERSONAL.

Gen. Twiggs, who surrendered his command to Texas, is in such disrepute with the Virginians that his command has been transferred to New Orleans. The New Orleans Crescent of the 28th May says that in future he will remain in that city.

Senator Green, of Missouri, has published a card in the St. Louis Journal, in which he pronounces the letter produced on the trial of Gen. Ogilvie Byron Young to be a forgery. This will place Mr. Yancey in the unpleasant position of having forged his name to aid the Secession cause. Senator Green adds: "Of Mr. Yancey, I will remark that I never saw him or corresponded with him, nor ever had any kind of intercourse with him, and could not have taken the liberty of writing to him as 'my dear friend.' From my information, I respect Mr. Yancey as a gentleman and patriot, and I do not, in this statement of facts, abate or qualify any of my views often expressed on State rights and secession, but I wish merely to vindicate myself against the vile slander."

Prince Orloff, of Russia, died in St. Petersburg on the 22d ult. He was one of Russia's most celebrated statesmen, and represented the Emperor Alexander to the Paris Congress, in 1858.

Tommy, the Japanese Idol of Gotham last year, was with Mr. Harris, our Minister in Yeddo, last March. Our correspondent says he looked as spruce as a young Fifth avenue beau.

Gov. Letcher, of Virginia, has adopted the wife and children of Jackson, the murderer of Col. Ellsworth.

The Springfield papers are full of the rivalry now existing between Mr. Bonner (Ledger) and Com. Vanderbilt. They are both enthusiastic in horseflesh.

The friends of T. E. Harvey, our Minister at Lisbon, and who is accused of sending telegraphic intelligence to the Secessionists, declare that it is susceptible of an explanation.

The Concert at Mrs. Mears Burkhardt's.—The principal event in the musical and fashionable world this week was the concert given in aid of the families of the New York Volunteers, at Nos. 222 and 224 Madison Avenue, corner of Thirty-eighth street, at the new residence of Mrs. Mears Burkhardt, who most generously threw open her elegant and spacious dwelling for this charitable object. The performers were all amateurs, with the exception of Mr. Perring, the accomplished tenor; but, place aux dames, Mrs Dalton, née Secor, is too well known to all lovers of music in this her native city to require particular mention here; suffice it to say her friends and admirers had no reason to feel disappointed at her efforts on this occasion. Can we pay a higher compliment to her vocal powers? Miss Foster and Miss Harris acquitted themselves with great credit. And last, but not least, we may mention Miss Annie Coles, who sang for the first time in public on Thursday last. Scarcely fifteen, endowed with rare beauty of face and form, her modesty and artlessness as she advanced to the piano impressed every one most favorably; but when her sympathetic voice was heard, combining exquisite sweetness with wonderful power, the tribute to her grace and girlish beauty was overshadowed by that paid to her great ability as a vocalist. Her rendering of an aria from the "Sicilian Vespers" was so fine that the compliment of an encore was extended to her—the only encore, by the way, of the evening—to which she responded by a morceau from "Traviata," which was sung with such tenderness and feeling as vividly to recall to our minds La Gazzaniga. The concert was attended by some three hundred of the élite of the city, two-thirds of whom were ladies in full evening dress, which lent additional brilliancy to the scene. All together we congratulate Mrs. Mears Burkhardt and the ladies who assisted her in this charitable undertaking, on the entire success of their efforts.

Mr. Schaus, of Broadway, has published a large and very accurate "Birds-eye View of the Seat of War." It is a large and beautifully executed map, which, besides showing the whole face of the country, exhibits all the principal points of interest and importance in the present state of the Southern campaign. It is a most valuable chart, and will be of infinite service to all who take an interest in tracing the lines of operation of the Federal and Secession armies in Virginia.

The Biographical Memoir of Winfield Scott, Commander-in-Chief of the United States army, published in Beadle's Dime Biographical Library, is just the work for the time. It is a clear, compact and comprehensive history of the career of the great soldier of the United States, and every American should have a copy in his house, that his children may know how to love and honor the patriot and soldier, Winfield Scott. The price is only ten cents.

Beadle's "Military Hand Book and Soldier's Manual" is a work of general information for the soldier. It contains the Articles of War, General Orders and Regulations, Pay Department, Ordnance, Rifles and their Use, Culinary and Health Departments, The Law of Prizes, Personal Hints to Volunteers, Dictionary of Military Terms, &c., &c. It is really a very valuable book, and will command a large sale at the very reasonable price of twenty-five cents.

Mowing Machines.—Among the many valuable implements for lessening the labor of the farmer, by substituting horse for hand power, the mowing machine stands prominent as one of the first importance. We take pleasure in calling the attention of our farming readers to the Buckeye Mower as a machine worthy of their notice. Trial has proved its merits, and usage its durability, and has earned for it its great reputation as the best mowing machine wherever it has been introduced. Having two independent driving wheels, it has a more steady motion and lighter draft, the weight being supported on the wheels instead of dragging on the ground, as is the case with one-wheeled mowers, and the knives continue in motion when turning either to the right or left. It has a double-jointed cutter bar, which adapts itself to all undulations of the ground, and can be folded over into the frame by a boy, when the machine may be driven on the road as easily as a gig. When backing it is out of gear, making it very easy for the team to back. An excellent reaping attachment adapts it to the wants of those who wish to cut their grain by horse power. We would advise all of our readers who take an interest in implements of this description to see the Buckeye Mower. It is manufactured by C. Aultman & Co., at Canton, Ohio, and John P. Adriance at Poughkeepsie, New York. It can be seen at Mr. Adriance's New York warehouse, No. 165 Greenwich street.

Union Badges have become almost universal, and every one is eager to possess some symbol of loyalty and devotion to his country. We have seen a large assortment of Union symbols, manufactured by W. A. Hayward, wholesale manufacturing jeweller, of 208 Broadway, which is rich in material and tasteful in design. One is a combination of the shield, flags and eagle, and a miniature portrait of either Scott, Anderson, Butler, &c. Our readers, if they will pay Mr. Hayward a visit, will find a vast selection, and wholesale dealers can have their orders promptly supplied.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

The Ladies of New Orleans and Gen. G. T. Beauregard.

New Orleans, May 3, 1861.

General G. T. Beauregard, of the Confederate States Army:

General—The ladies of the Military Fair, held in this city, for the benefit of our volunteers, on the 25th, 26th, 27th and 29th, respectfully ask your acceptance of the accompanying sword, as a testimonial of the estimate we place upon your moral and professional fitness for the high and honorable position you fill as the military chieftain of our country's army.

We are assured that, in presenting it to you, we place it in the hands of a patriot and a General—such as the exigencies of our beloved country imperatively demand.

May victory, in the cause of the right, ever crown your efforts, and the laurel's wreath remain fresh and unfading upon your brow.

With great respect,
MRS. HARLOW J. PHELPS,
Secretary of Ladies' Military Fair.

Headquarters, Provisional Army, Confederate States,
Charleston, S. C., May 25, 1861.

Madam—I accept, with emotions of gratitude and pride, the beautiful sword presented to me, through you, by the ladies of the Military Fair, held in New Orleans on the 25th, 26th, 27th and 29th ult., for the benefit of the Louisiana Volunteers. I tender to them and to you, my warm acknowledgment for the very kind and flattering terms in which their precious gift has been conveyed. To receive the commendation of his countrymen would be the soldier's highest reward, were it not still surpassed by the approval of his countrywomen. May the victory, which is due them, as the fairest and noblest among the interests we are contending for, ever be upon the banner of the friends they bless.

I remain, with the highest regard,
Your very obedient servant,
G. T. BEAUREGARD,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

The Crops.—We don't think we ever saw the cane and corn crops looking in a finer condition than at present, and if the season continues favorable, the labor of our planters will be rewarded by a tremendous harvest. If the crops look as flourishing throughout the South as they do in this locality, it doesn't look very likely to us that Old Abe will be able to starve us into submission by blockading Southern ports.—Bee.

Blockading the Watering-Places.—The surmise that the watering places would be blockaded is groundless. What is there to blockade at Bay St. Louis, Pass Christian, Mississippi City, Biloxi, or Ocean Springs? A few oystermen comprise the extent of the marine. A dozen or two of sailing boats are scattered about. It is not known that they would be of any service to Lincoln, Seward & Co. Some alarm has been caused at the burning of the shanties on Ship Island. It was a telegraphic sensation dispatch that a great big steamer was seen in the harbor; it turned out to be a small cutter acting under orders of the commandant of Mobile harbor. "Nobody was hurt," but a good many old ladies and children were somewhat frightened.

A gentleman direct from New Orleans says, in regard to the entire commerce of the South, that it is in a most frightful condition. He says the States that will suffer most will be Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas. In regard to the latter State, he says he was in Galveston on the 15th of May. When he left there bacon was twenty-five cents per pound, and flour eighteen dollars per barrel, and a very limited supply at that. They were wholly dependent on New Orleans for means of subsistence.

The Blockade.—It was dull on the flags yesterday, not more so, however, than usual on the last day of the spring months.

The capture of the barque H. E. Spearing, Captain Rogers, from Rio, by the Brooklyn, was talked of freely. Whether she was taken in attempting to run in after being warned off has not been ascertained. However, the captors have got a tartar. The cargo of forty six hundred bags of coffee is owned by Rio, purchased on the credit of Brown, Brothers & Co. The vessel is owned in part here and the balance is owned in New England. The coffee would have paid well in our market at this time. It will be remembered that the Brazilian Minister at Washington protested against the blockade, contending that ninety days' time should be allowed for South American Governments to be notified. The blunder-headed commanders of Lincoln, Seward & Co. do not know what they are about. The week closing has been attended with favorable weather for the growing crops. The accounts of the staple are flattering.—Crescent.

Providing their own Cannon.—Messrs. Leeds, in New Orleans, have established one of the most extensive and complete foundries in the country for casting heavy ordnance. The Bulletin of that city says they are successfully casting columbiads, fieldpieces and breech-loading cannon, with hexagonal bores, something nearly similar to the Whitworth gun.

SOUTH CAROLINA—Movements of Troops.—The Charleston Courier of the 28th ult. says: "An almost simultaneous offer has been made from the volunteer regiments now in camp to enter the Confederate States service, and proceed at once to Virginia. Col. M. Jenkins's regiment, eleven hundred strong, which has been in camp on Sullivan's Island, drilling, for several weeks, will be mustered into service very soon by Assistant Adjutant-General D. R. Jones, and will start in a day or two. Col. Cash's fine regiment, at Florence, nearly nine hundred strong, are also ready to start for the scene of action. Col. Bacon's regiment, eight hundred strong, now encamped at Aiken, are ready for departure at a moment's notice. Col. Hampton's Legion expect to move early this week. Col. Williams's, Col. Hagood's and Col. Rion's regiments have almost unanimously volunteered and been accepted. Besides which other offers of men and means have poured in upon Gov. Pickens and Gen. Beauregard. In less than ten days those noble regiments will be on the march for the Old Dominion."

TENNESSEE.—The Memphis Appeal of the 4th inst. contains the following: "We learn that the Mayor is about to raise a company of men for the protection of the city, to be called the Chickasaw Pikemen. For this company sixty-four formidable Irish pikes have been already made. They are ten feet in length; at the butt there is a spike; the pike resembles a bayonet in size and appearance, and at the point where it joins the staff a hooked blade projects. The pike will cut with a thrust, the hook with a pull. On the approach of cavalry the butts are set on the ground and the pikes presented to the enemy."

Rumors from Memphis.—The Memphis Bulletin of May 30 contains the following items:

"A gentleman, who came from Montgomery yesterday morning, reports that he passed about 5,000 troops en route for Union city. This looks as if Cairo was to be taken, or an invasion was expected. Yesterday there were 2,500 troops there and 10,000 more expected.

"Gen. Beauregard, we understand, reached this city yesterday afternoon. His presence here indicates important movements looking to the defense of the Mississippi valley.

"Messrs. Quimby & Robinson, of this city, are engaged in making six brass cannon for a company of artillery in Mississippi, commanded by Capt. Burns. They successfully cast one yesterday, and it is said to be of the very best quality.

"The late flood in White River destroyed the new levee, extending from the highlands below Augusta to Peach Orchard Bluff, some thirteen miles. The levee cost the State about $100,000, and was pronounced one of the best jobs in the State. What is singular is that the river was not up to the extreme high water mark."

The last account reports that there are no troops and no batteries in Memphis, except an inconsiderable "Home Guard." A single cannon is mounted on the bluff for the purpose of stopping boats. The defence of the city is trusted wholly to Forts Wright and Randolph, some distance above, on the left bank of the Mississippi, and to a force of about 4,000 men at Union City, on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, a mile or two south of the Kentucky line. The entire force available for repelling an advance from Cairo is stated as follows, and is, doubtless, greatly exaggerated.

	No. men.
At Jackson, Tenn.	8,000
At Union City, Tenn.	4,000
At Germantown, Tenn.	3,500
At Forts Wright and Randolph	2,500
At Corinth, Miss.	8,000
At Camp Rector, Ark.	2,000
Total	27,000

The only encampments geographically north of Memphis are those at Union City, Camp Rector, and the two fortifications on the river. The Jackson encampment, under command of Gen. Pillow, is about sixty miles north east of Memphis, on the Mississippi Central and Tennessee Railroad. The Corinth encampment is ninety-four miles south-west of Memphis, on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, in the north-west corner of Mississippi. Gen. Beauregard had not been in Memphis when our informant left, but he had been at both Corinth and Jackson, and it was the general expectation that he would assume the command in Tennessee. Gen. Pillow was altogether played out. It adds that the blockade has prostrated business, and no one dreams of attacking Col. Prentiss in Cairo—but they tremble at the idea of his attacking them. Gen. Pillow is fast losing his authority, as his drunkenness increases every day. The price of provisions is terrible.

VIRGINIA, Petersburg, May 25.—I met ——— this morning. He informed me he was the military instructor of forty ladies, whose captain would be Josephine Swan. The women of Petersburg are resolved to fight.—Mobile Advertiser.

A Heroic Woman.—A large and enthusiastic meeting was held in the Convention Hall, to aid those Marylanders who had left their homes to aid in fighting our battles, and who are now at Harper's Ferry without the bare necessaries of the soldier's camp.

Mrs. Johnson, wife of Capt. Bradley T. Johnson, of Maryland, and daughter of Judge Sanders of this city, was present, having encountered the dangers and fatigues of travel from Harper's Ferry, where she left her husband and his comrades, for her native State, to solicit aid.

Eloquent speeches were made on the occasion by Gov. Reid, Hon. Kenneth Raynes, Hon. T. L. Clingman, Hon. J. W. Osborne and Mr. Woodfin. At the conclusion of Mr. Woodfin's speech, he proposed that a committee of five be appointed to wait on those present and collect their subscriptions. Adopted.

The committee collected some $500, together with many names for large donations.

Mrs. Johnson will leave in the morning, having succeeded entirely in her noble mission, besides five hundred rifles, which the Governor has tendered to the husband of Mrs. Johnson and the men under his command.—Richmond Examiner.

Norfolk.—The Merrimac has been raised by the insurgents, and will be commissioned. If so, it is the only effect of ship they have got. On the 6th, the Confederate authorities sent the West Point, one of their steamers, under a flag of truce, to Fortress Monroe, with several loyal families. One of the ladies informed Gen. Butler that there were about 12,000 rebel troops there. Along the entire river from the city to Sewall's Point both sides are dotted with batteries, and no fear was anticipated from a sea invasion. The Norfolk and Petersburg and Weldon Railroads are heavily guarded by the Confederate troops. Reinforcements and provisions arrive daily, and on Monday last there arrived from the South two monster Columbiads intended for the battery at Sewall's Point. The rebels have now at this point three rifled cannon of long range. At Craney Island they have thirty eight cannon of heavy calibre, and thirteen Columbiads mounted. The Secessionists have also erected a battery a short distance up the James river, at the mouth of a small stream. It is the intention of the enemy to fortify the shore at points where the Federal forces may make a lodgment, fearing it may be Gen. Butler's intention to land a force on that side of James river, with the view of holding on to a point that will command the rear of Norfolk and cut off their railway connection with the South and Richmond.

Hampton.—There was a skirmish on Friday night, the 7th June. The pickets were driven in, when Gen. Butler ordered out Col. Duryea's Zouaves, who pursued the rebels. One hundred muskets were captured by our troops. The enemy fled, after firing a few shots, which did no damage.

GEORGIA, Liberal Contributions.—The Milledgeville Federal Union says Miss Henrietta Kenno, of that city, has waited on Gov. Brown, and in the name of herself and mother tendered to him, for the use of the State in conducting the war, all their silver plate of every description and their jewellery, including diamond rings, watches, &c., amounting to a very handsome sum in value.

Jeff. Davis's War Horse.—The Augusta Constitutionalist of the 30th ult. says: "President Davis's war horse passed through this city last night on his way to Richmond, Va. Accompanying the animal was the President's saddle, on the horn of which is a compass, to be used in case the rider should lose his way."

OUR CAMPS AND STRONGHOLDS.

Chambersburg.—There were on the 5th of June fifteen regiments stationed here, and the number was to be increased from 25,000 to 30,000 men. It is under the chief command of General Patterson. Capt. Doubleday, of Sumpter Fort fame, is to have command of the artillery. The Hon. John Sherman, of Ohio, is one of General Patterson's staff. A most beautiful and retired building, conveniently located, known as Fusaldie Female Seminary, has been turned into headquarters for General Patterson. General William H. Keim has also taken a private residence on Queen street. Brigadier-General E. C. Williams and many of the regimental colonels are very comfortably fixed at the Franklin Hotel. Our streets are alive with army wagons attached to the Commissariat, and constantly engaged hauling from the railroad depot out to the different camps supplies and baggage of the troops. The Virginians have burned another bridge at Opequan station, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, two miles below Martinsburg.

Newport News.—Since our last Hawkins's Zouaves have arrived, and other regiments are on their way. It is intended to form a camp of about 15,000 men at this point. It is about seven miles from Fortress Monroe and eighteen from Yorktown.

Trenton.—The three new regiments called for from this State are now encamped at Camp Olden, three miles from this city, awaiting proper arms and equipments prior to moving to the seat of hostilities. The clothing will be furnished next week. The Government has contracted for the alteration into the most approved manner of three thousand flint lock muskets, to render them efficient. It is the desire of the department here that the troops shall not leave until they are fully prepared with everything necessary. Additional ground for another camp has been selected, which will give a better opportunity for regimental drills. The troops are being drilled many hours each day, and are becoming pleased with camp life, and are in good health. Captain Herman, of the Hudson Rifles, and almost all his command have returned to Hoboken, in consequence of the shameful treatment they received in Trenton. They were obliged to sleep in the streets and on steps, and, after being kept without rations for two days, the meat given to them was putrid. Many are ill through privation and indignation.

Fortress Monroe.—Our illustrations of this famous stronghold in No. 281, and in our last paper, have given our readers so admirable an idea of its position and appearance that any further description is needless. Its water battery is capable of sinking any hostile fleet. Along the beach it commands a range of miles, where the columbiads and rifled cannon would soon prevent any approach in that direction. It will be impossible for assailants to set the garrison buildings on fire; and if they should do so, the area is so great their burning would not smoke out the combatants. The casemates are so large and well ventilated that they will allow the most constant firing without danger of suffocation. Captain Phillips, of the James Adger, who arrived from Fortress Monroe on the 7th of June, thus reports: The Troy Regiment are still stationed at Hampton, in full view of the fortress. Colonel Allen's regiment is a little below them, while Colonel Duryea's Advance Guard was stationed some two miles still further. As for the last named regiment, while in conversation on Wednesday evening with one of the officers, he stated that they were to start the next day for Yorktown, thence to Norfolk, and from there direct to Richmond. He says: "The Secessionists aver that they are not afraid of the Troy, Albany, Colonel Allen's or the Vermont Regiment, but they would rather keep clear of the 'red-legged devils,' as they call Duryea's Zouave Regiment." This same officer remarked that one day he took about two hundred and fifty of his regiment to capture a party of Secessionists, numbering over nine hundred men, and armed with cannon. Upon approaching them, they (the Secession soldiers) retreated in great haste.

Cairo.—The map and illustrations in our last issue have made this most important point palpable to all, while our portrait and biography of the heroic Prentiss cannot fail to have given our readers a personal interest in that glorious soldier. Our accounts are up to the 7th, from which it would seem that the Tennesseeans, under the command of General Pillow, were about to make an attack upon Cairo, for which Colonel Prentiss is prepared. On the 6th that vigilant officer, having heard that a camp of Kentucky Secessionists had been formed at Elliott's Mills, Ky., about ten miles from Cairo, sent two companies to dislodge them. The Secessionists, of course, fled without fighting. We append a list of the troops within twenty-four hours of Cairo:

Camp at Cairo and Village Ridge	6,000
The Congressional Districts Encampments in the State	8,3 0
The Arsenal at St. Louis, under General Lyon	5,875
St. Louis, at the Six Regimental Headquarters	6,390
Three regiments in Iowa	2, 66
Three regiments in Wisconsin	2,845
Jefferson Barracks, St. Louis (infantry)	1,150
Jefferson Barracks, St. Louis (cavalry)	445
Indiana troops now under arms	5,000
Total within twenty-four hours of Cairo	38,811

Of these about 800 are cavalry, 17,0 0 rifles, 35 heavy cannons, with 1,500 artillerymen, and the rest infantry. These figures do not vary materially from the actual facts.

Camp Corcoran.—The works beyond Arlington House, near Arover's Place, opposite Georgetown, are being rapidly and effectually strengthened by the United States forces there. Thirty-six guns have been mounted on the embankment. The troops are in expectation of an attack upon their line by the Confederates from Manassas Junction very shortly. Colonel Corcoran, of the Sixty-ninth Regiment, with a detachment of one hundred men, proceeded on the 7th June to Ball's Corner, five miles out, where he arrested a party of five Secessionists, one wearing the uniform of a Secession Sergeant; one, named Richard Motich, an employee at the Capitol as watchman, and one named Ball, a rich farmer, on whom was found a muster roll of a rebel company, and in whose house were found arms, bedding and cooking utensils for a company of at least fifty men. Nine hundred dollars in gold were also found, but returned by the mistaken generosity of the sergeant to Ball's wife, without the Colonel's knowledge until after their return to the camp. Three fine horses were also seized. The papers captured are oddly mixed—Breckinridge electoral tickets, Secession speeches, vouchers for Government money, and obscene books form the staple. The prisoners are now in Fort Corcoran.

THE BLOCKADE.

The Federal Government is drawing the blockade tighter every day. The United States steam sloop of war Brooklyn is now engaged in enforcing a strict blockade of the mouths of the Mississippi, and we hear very little more of prizes captured by privateers out of that port. The Picayune, of the 4th inst., states that the Brooklyn had ordered away several vessels, and had made a prize of one, the brig Creole, which had been sent North in charge of a prize crew. The various foreign consuls had paid a visit to the Brooklyn, and had an interview with Capt. Poore, her commander, respecting the blockade. It is not stated whether all the vessels on the bar at the time the fifteen days' notice was given had succeeded in getting away. Capt. Poore had made a full survey of the river and sounded it in every direction, a proceeding which indicates his intention to remain at that post for some time.

From the New Orleans Delta, of May 31, we glean the following items of interest:

"The Brooklyn, Capt. Poore, entered the river, day before yesterday, and sent out a number of boats, strongly manned with armed men, to board the ships lying on the bar, to acquaint them of the terms of the blockade. After some discussion it was agreed that the ships on the bar should have fourteen days to go out. Whether they may be able to get off in that time is very doubtful. Poore also made a full survey and soundings of the river, and intimated his purpose to bring the Brooklyn up as far as the Passes, and there anchor her. At present she is lying about a mile outside."

WAR ITEMS.

United States Forces in and about Washington, June 4.

New York State Militia.—Second Regiment, Col. Tompkins, 950 men, Washington side. Fifth Regiment, Col. Schwarzwaelder, 1,100 men, Arlington Heights. Eighth Regiment, Col. Lyons, 964 men; Arlington Heights. Ninth Regiment, Col. Stiles, 1,100 men; Washington side. Twelfth Regiment, Col. Butterfield, 1,550 men; Washington side. Fourteenth Regiment, Col. Wood, 960 men; Washington side. Twenty-Fifth Regiment, Col. Bryan, 800 men; Arlington Heights. Twenty-eighth Regiment, Col. Bennett, 650 men, Arlington Heights. Sixty-ninth Regiment, Col. Corcoran (Irish), 1,563 men, Arlington Heights. Seventy-first Regiment, Col. Martin, 1,100 men, Washington side. Seventy-ninth Regiment, Col. Elliott (Scotch), 836 men; Washington side.

First Michigan Regiment, Col. Wilcox, 780 men, Alexandria.

Five Batteries U. S. Artillery, 400 men; Washington and Virginia. U. S. Cavalry, 600 men; Washington and Virginia. U. S. Infantry, 2,000 men; Washington and Virginia.

Total, 34,015.

Of these there were, June 4,

Encamped and quartered in Washington and Georgetown	20,866
Encamped and quartered across the river	13,149
Total	34,015

So far as the safety of the capital is concerned, we may add to the above list about 9,000 volunteers and militia, regularly enrolled and partially drilled, but not required to go out of the district or to serve otherwise than for its defence. At the Relay House are stationed the Sixth and Eighth Massachusetts Regiments (formerly in Washington), together with the Boston Light Artillery—in all about 1,730 men.

Force of the Southern Army.

The Richmond correspondent of the New Orleans Delta thus figures up the disposable forces of the Secessionists in Virginia:

Manassas Junction	8,000
Fredericksburg	4,300
Aquia Creek	700
Norfolk and its neighborhood	12,000
Yorktown	3,200
Williamsburg	2,100
Harper's Ferry	14,000
Grafton	several thousand*
Culpepper Court House	4,000
Total	48,300

* ot one man—all fled.

DIGGING ENTRENCHMENTS IN THE OUTSKIRTS OF ALEXANDRIA, FAIRFAX COUNTY, VA.

Our sketch represents the gallant volunteers of Michigan and the Fire Zouaves at work on a breastwork on the outskirts of Alexandria, in Fairfax county, Virginia, about a mile in advance of the town. These fortifications will effectually prevent a surprise, should any unforeseen reverse attend the Federal army. A gentleman who has just returned states that the volunteers are in the highest possible spirits, and perfectly satisfied with their rations, which occasionally includes poultry fit for the table of the F. F. V.'s.

CAMP CORCORAN, ARLINGTON HEIGHTS.

The gallant Sixty-ninth, New York State Militia now encamped on Arlington Heights, have been doing soldier's duty with a readiness and hardihood worthy of all praise. They have worked unremittingly, and with such success that their position is of immense strength; the breastworks thrown up by them are pronounced by military authorities to be perfect and admirable in every respect. Their camp, which is a model for soldierly neatness and completeness, is appropriately called Corcoran, in compliment to their Colonel, who is both trusted and beloved.

The Sixty-ninth have won the praise of all for their soldierly qualities, their alacrity and endurance, and for their admirable behavior as orderly and conscientious citizens. When they are found on the field of battle we shall hear of them as heroes.

THE HARRIET LANE ENGAGING A BATTERY

At Pig's Point on the Nansemond River.

The Harriet Lane had a smart action on Wednesday, the 5th inst., near Newport News, with a battery of seven guns, erected by the Secessionists on Pig's Point, where the Nansemond enters the James River. The engagement lasted nearly an hour, beginning at thirty-five minutes past eight A. M. The firing was quite brisk, the Harriet Lane firing some thirty shots, and the Confederates over fifty. The Harriet Lane received one round shot forward, near her long thirty-two pounder. It struck the shot tub, making a great scatteration of splinters and shot, and wounding five of the men, three of them severely, and passing entirely through the vessel. Another round shot passed through the fore rigging, and grazing the foremast, went out through the starboard bulwarks. The battery guns were well served, and had their range been more perfect they would have hulled the Harriet Lane every time. As it was, the armament of the United States revenue cutter was not heavy enough to silence the guns of the Confederate battery.

Foreign News.

The Adriatic brings us European intelligence to the 5th June of a very important character. Both England and France have invited our Federal Government to subscribe to the Paris Convention, which declared privateering to be piracy. Lord John Russell announced this in the House of Commons, and also that the English Government had resolved to close all British ports to privateers, thus putting an end to the Southern hopes in that direction. The general tone of the British press is much more friendly to the North than it was, as they begin to see the real bearings of the case. Mr. Gregory, member from Galway, and a personal friend of Jefferson Davis, gave notice that on the 7th June he should move, in the House of Commons, the recognition of the Southern Confederacy. There had been a meeting of loyal Americans in Paris, in which our Minister to Russia, Cassius M. Clay, had made a singularly foolish speech, which had afforded the London Times an excellent opportunity of sneering at American statesmen. Mr. Dayton and Mr. Fremont also made speeches, which were distinguished by admirable sense and ability. The entire of Europe sympathises with the Northern States.

Camphor, it is said, has been recently discovered to be an antidote to that terrible poison, strychnine.

operations in both the hostile camps, he was enabled to make himself personally familiar with all the details, and every possible aspect of modern warfare on a gigantic scale. His report to the Government of the results of his observations forms one of our most reliable and interesting works. For several years past he has been actively engaged in superintending extensive railroad operations in the Western States, to which pursuit he exceptionally devoted himself after his resignation. He is the translator and compiler of the "Manual of Bayonet Exercise for the United States Army."

SEARCHING FARMERS' WAGONS FOR CONTRABAND GOODS.

The search for contraband goods at all the out posts and military stations is rigid and severe looking to allowing to pass into the enemy's coun try such contraband of war, such as munitions provisions, &c. Our Artist sketched an exciting episode on the Frederick road, Maryland, where the United States Volunteers make a thorough investigation of a large country wagon, in spite of the energetic protestations of the driver. The business was done in the most perfect good humor, and the man finding that no violence was intended, at length allowed every facility for the search, which, however, resulted in no warlike spoils.

GENERAL PRENTISS'S STAFF, AT CAIRO, ILL.

Major S. D. Baldwin

Has held commissions ranging to Colonel in the frontier regular service and the Eastern Militia. Connecticut. He it was who was next with the detachment from Chicago to this post (Cairo), to bring down "the forlorn hope." Thence did with such success as the world already knows. He has since taken rank on the General's staff as Brigade Inspector.

Captain William Hemstreet, Aide-de-Camp,

A young man, is a resident of Chicago, but recently from New York, where he was engaged as stenographic reporter, the experience of which craft has naturally qualified him for the arduous duties of Brigade Secretary. His military experience has been acquired in the Eastern schools, and upon one minute's notice from Brigadier-General Swift, who first occupied Cairo, he took the field already a soldier. His reporting and military qualifications have rendered his services indispensable, and he was immediately transferred to General Prentiss's staff.

Henry Binmore,

Military Secretary to the General, is known throughout the United States as a stenographer. In 1846 he came to the United States from France, where he was employed during the Revolution of 1848, and from Italy, where he was a party to the Papal exodus into Gaeta. At New York he was constantly in employ as a stenographer until he left for Nicaragua, where he attended in Walker's wake during the first campaign. Subsequently he went West, being appointed official reporter of the House of Representatives of Missouri in 1855. In this capacity he served two sessions. Shortly after he went to Kansas, and started through the troubles there. Thence to Utah in advance of Colonel Sumner's colonna. Ten days after his arrival at Salt Lake City he was on his road for the States, where he met Senator Douglas at Michigan City, and during the heated campaign of 1858 acted as one of the two of his private secretaries. In January, 1859, he was appointed official reporter of the House of Representatives of Illinois, and in 1861 this post was continued to him by a unanimous vote.

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN.

MAP OF NORFOLK AND ITS NEIGHBORHOOD.

The strong force gathered in the vicinity of Norfolk, by both the Federal authorities and the Secessionists, gives a remarkable interest to it, and we therefore give a correct map, that the public may better realise our limited views. It is said that there are twelve thousand Secession troops now at Norfolk, and that there are two hundred and seventy pieces of cannon all ready placed. The great probability that an attack will be made upon this naval station by the Government forces throws a peculiar interest around it.

PLAN OF FORTRESS MONROE.

In No. 276 of our Illustrated Paper we gave two splendid pictures of Fortress Monroe, a strong hold for ever historical. We also, in our last number, published a sketch of it, showing the position of Sewall's Point and other places of interest. The diagram we now publish of the fortress itself will enable all to understand the shape and capabilities of resistance, saying nothing of the deep interest attached to a place whose so many thousands of our fellow-citizens are stationed to uphold the Union.

ACTION BETWEEN THE PAWNEE AND FLOTILLA

And the Battery at Aquia Creek, June 1.

At ten o'clock on the morning of the 1st of June the flotilla got under way, the Pawnee, commanded by Commander Ward, accompanying the steamer Anacosta Creek, the expedition being the Anacosta's first further down the Yankee was moving down the river, but she turned back.

At half-past eleven stood close in shore, rounded with the land all the time, till the Freeborn approached within two thousand yards, when she opened fire. Captain Wood, as Commodore-in-Chief, taking the post of honor and of danger. The fire from the Freeborn was followed by shots from the Pawnee, which was opportunely passed down from Alexandria just in the nick of time, forestalling Captain Ward in his despatches to the Navy Department to send her down.

The enemy opened soon after the Freeborn and the Pawnee commenced their fire, with rifled cannon, which were evidently removed from the upper battery to the lower during the night.

There was no firing from the battery on the hill, because the guns were removed from there. The Pawnee's guns were nine inch bore, and her shot and shell were thrown with great precision and deadly effect.

Shortly after the fire opened, the passenger depot at the end of the wharf was seen in flames. But whether it was set on fire by the enemy, as the supposition is that the flotilla had a force to land, or by shells from the Freeborn or Pawnee, is not known.

The fire from the Freeborn and Pawnee was so accurate and so deadly that not a man at the wharf dared stop in to extinguish it.

The Anacosta did good service with her long thirty-two pounder, worked by a detachment of the Seventy-first New York Regiment, under the command of Lieut. T. B. Prendergast. Several of her shots were seen to strike the battery.

After one hour's firing, the Freeborn stood in within seventeen hundred yards of the shore, when shot and shell from the Freeborn and Pawnee poured in as thick as hops. The enemy returned the fire as briskly. But no deadly was the fire from the flotilla, that the enemy was at last silenced, with the exception of a single gun, which replied at intervals for about half an hour.

THE ATTACK ON THE SECESSION BATTERIES AT AQUIA CREEK, POTOMAC RIVER, BY THE U. S. VESSELS PAWNEE, LIVE YANKEE, FREEBORN, ANACOSTA AND LIONESS, JUNE 1, 1861.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE EXPEDITION.—PAGE 371.

Every shot and shell from the Freeborn went into the freight and passenger depot and the battery, and men were seen carrying out bodies of apparently dead and wounded, and laying them under the shade of trees and covering them up.

At another time the rebels were seen running from the batteries at the top of their speed.

The fire was increased for five hours, during which the Freeborn fired two hundred and sixty rounds, of which only sixty were shells. The Parvese fire three hundred and fifty rounds. The Yankees only fired three or four shots, and then let her mission. The Ancosta fired not many more. The Parvese was further out than the Freeborn, which really bore the brunt of the battle.

NEWPORT NEWS, VIRGINIA.

THIS spot, which will hereafter be famous as the site of Camp Butler, is the post village of Warwick county, Virginia, and is about ten miles from Fortress Monroe, eighteen miles from Yorktown, and forty miles from Jamestown. It is situated on the James River, nearly opposite the mouth of Nenemond River, the entrance of which is protected by a battery called Fort Faunt, recently bombarded by the Hessrat Lase, an illustration of which will be found in another part of our paper. It is the intention of General Butler to concentrate a large force in this encampment, for the purpose, as it is said—of sweeping Yorktown, preparatory to co-operating with the invading divisions destined to march upon Richmond.

At present there are about six thousand men in camp, consisting of the First Vermont, Colonel Phelps; Third Massachusetts, Colonel Richardson, and the New York Rifles, Colonel Duryea; Seventh, Colonel J. K. Bendix's (German), and Ninth, Colonel Hawkins's (Zouaves) regiments. The Eighth regiment arrived on Saturday morning, and came from Fortress Monroe on the steamer George Peabody. The troops are now fortifying this part, and it will soon be capable of withstanding any attack that may be made upon it. The camp is under the command of Colonel Phelps.

The Camp at Newport News.

The camp at Newport News is well arranged: every care having been taken for securing the comfort and accommodation of the men. The arrangement represents the quarters of the Vermont regiment.

Camp Butler, Newport News.

A formidable defence work is being erected by the Fourth Massachusetts regiment at Newport News. It is situated at Camp Butler, and consists of an extensive and important breastwork. The labor necessary to its formation is very hard, but it is cheerfully borne by the gallant boys of the Fourth Massachusetts regiment.

Erecting Stockades at Newport News.

It is the intention of General Butler to strengthen the position of Newport News to the utmost extent afforded by the locality. To this end he is addressing himself to other matters than the erecting strong and effective stockades, which would be hard to carry, defended as they will be by the hardy and gallant sons of the North. Our illustration shows one of the stockaded positions already nearly completed.

Shipment of Columbiads at Fortress Monroe.

Our illustration shows the method of shipping the heavy Columbiads on board a schooner, intended for the defence of the entrenched position at Newport News. The greatest activity has been observed at Fortress Monroe during the four past days, and the great guns have been forwarded to their destination with the least possible delay.

OCCUPATION OF BIRD'S POINT, MO.

By Colonel Kastner's Regiment of Missouri United State Volunteers.

BIRD'S POINT is nearly opposite the city of Cairo, on the Missouri side of the Mississippi River, and, since the occupation of the latter place by the United Volunteers, has become, in a military view, a point of some importance. It consists of scarcely half a dozen superseding houses and a wharf boat, which latter is the principal feature of the town, inasmuch as it supports upon its floating bottom the chief store, grocery and commission-house of the town. It was to-night, and seemingly with much reason, that the occupation of this place by the rebel forces from the South Western States would have been an immediate sequence of the occupation of Cairo by Government troops; and although such a purpose was entertained, yet the chance for its peaceful attainment no longer exists, from the fact that Colonel Kastner's Regiment of Missouri United States Volunteers are now encamped here.

Standing upon even as low a shoulder as the deck of the wharf-boat, the housetops and spires within the Cairo levee are plainly visible, and with a good range of a battery at Bird's Point, and although the latter place is considerably the lower ground and subject to frequent overflows, yet the still lower situation of Cairo is palpable that, to a spectator on Bird's Point, it seems as if the great rivers would here mix their waters and been displaced from their beds to make room for the hamlet, which are hugged within the huge embrace of the levee. The river here is very wide, and, bah for the murky turbulence of its water, and the steady, onward motion of its current, would give one an idea of an arm of the sea.

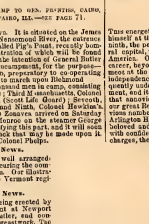
The object of the occupation of this place by Colonel Kastner's command will be not only to strengthen the river blockade, but will throw an obstacle in the way of assisting the blockade by landing freights destined for Southern ports at a point above Cairo, and transporting them by land through Missouri to a point below for redshipment, which trick has been played upon at least one occasion.



COLONEL CORCORAN. COMMANDING OFFICER OF THE SIXTY-NINTH REGIMENT OF N. Y. S. M.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY M'LEE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

COLONEL CORCORAN.

THE energetic and fearless soldier, who at the first call of duty put himself at the head of his regiment, the gallant and famous Sixty-ninth, the pet of our Irish citizens, and rushed to defend the Federal capital, promises to make himself one of the military stars of America. Our sympathy for his domestic affliction, in the recent decease, beyond the reach of human succor, of the partner of his bosom, and the mother of his children, showed the utterly inconsequential character of his own personal interest in the present war, but his conduct is too recent to need any comment, and it is certainly to his credit that his self recollection of this sorrowing formula has been to quicken him in his devotion to our gross Republic. Having recorded and illustrated in our previous number the career of the Sixty-ninth in Washington and on Arlington Heights, we have only to add that Colonel Corcoran is beloved and respected by his men, and that they will follow him with confidence into the field of battle, where, when the Sixty-ninth charges, there will be "no such word as fail!"

MOUNT PLEASANT, ARLINGTON HEIGHTS,

Now Fortified by the Federal Army.

THE Federal troops have taken possession of Arlington Heights in force, have used every exertion to render the important position impregnable. Trenches have been dug and breastworks thrown up all along the face of the heights. All that the best military skill could suggest to strengthen the position has been done, and the whole line of defences on Arlington Heights may be said to be complete and capable of being held against any attacking force. The Federal forces at Arlington Heights are the Fifth regiment, Colonel Schwarzwaelder; the Ninth regiment, Colonel Lyons; the Twenty-fifth regiment, Colonel Bryan; the Twenty-eighth regiment, Colonel Bennett; and the Sixty-ninth regiment, Colonel Corcoran.

Our view includes Mount Pleasant on Arlington Heights, the Alexandria and Georgetown Canal, the breastwork and camp, and distant view of the city of Washington.

THE BODY OF JUDGE DOUGLAS LYING IN STATE

At Bryan Hall, Chicago, Illinois.

THE remains of Mr. Douglas were removed from the Fremont House at one o'clock, Thursday afternoon, June 6th, under escort of the Chicago Light Guard, Shurtgee Rifles and Scammon Light Infantry, the Committees of Citizens, of the Common Council, and Committees of the different Civic Associations. The procession were under the charge of Howard Priestly, Esq., Assistant Marshal. Upon arriving at Bryan Hall the remains were placed upon a pedestal, guard was mounted by the Chicago Light Guard, and the citizens encamped, in solemn silence, paying their last respects to the illustrious dead.

Under the direction of the Committee of Thirty Bryan Hall had been most tastefully arranged and decorated for the reception of the remains. In the centre of the platform, draped in black, ascended a circular platform of three steps, and pinned under a canopy of black crape, festooned with black, and relieved with a gilt star, the whole surmounted by an eagle. From the valance of the eagle the flag of the Union fell gracefully to the four columns supporting the canopy. At the foot of the coffin stood a broken column, at the head a vase of beautifully variegated flowers. The gallery itself was decorated with American flags. Around the middle of the stage were four large American flags looped in festoons with crape, in the centre of which hung a portrait of Judge Douglas, painted by Healy some fifteen years since. The front of the stage was beautifully ornamented with rose of living flowers from the Cemetery nursery.

ERLE GOWER;

OR, THE SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER II.

LADY KENSINGTON WAS, we have said, still reclined from the very time of Erle Gower's departure, in the very corner at the morning apartment at Kensington Palace, and to the very moment the latter was glowing with the emotion pangs of a heart gushing, at the very moment he was quitting the inner instincts of her soul in its triumph over the most vain and powerful passion, love, tragic, in the very full bloom and prime of her good-nature—if by that term it can be called, for it is a misnomer to the quality—Lady Kensington, Lord Kensington's better moiety, was in the act of the discovery of the secret which has just warning and a guardian angel.

Lady Kensington's astonishment surpassed the matter of the extraordinary interposition. Her unbecoming agony, her heaving breasts and tears, her convulsive, hysterical sobs as she followed Lady Maud, clutching at her garment, and during the whole of her journey to the apartment of the latter, in the endeavor to prevent the communication of her secret to her daughter, had suffered her suspicions of her husband's truth to remain unbroken.

She passed her time with Lady Maud, her dear little sweet, her alpha and her omega. She would not have Lord Kensington, could not receive a communication from him without her knowledge. She had no secrets to keep from her with her husband, to whom he accustomed her love lately had been so little, who scarcely spoke to him, never noticed her except in his way, and who, in fact, studiously avoided her face from him.

The commendation so suddenly displayed by Lady Maud developed by overwrought and excited feeling, served to set on fire the whole of her soul. She was in a state to smash all of her little sweet darling to pieces. She was, in fact, in a state herself alone with her son to slaughter the cause of her every pain, for there still existed within her heart a latent bitterness at Lord Kensington's presumed conduct to her, with which a desire to further revenge it on change the more she brooded over her wrongs.

The secret of Lady Maud's parentage of air and cause of Erle Gower's birth, the secret of making either equation to go on, was a mystery inscrutable—and none else did our passion, was not without a beneficial effect upon her. What the eventual result might have been, had the elapsed hours of Erle Gower's absence been passed by Lady Maud with them, it is unnecessary to surmise; but certainly something occurred, was already checked by her mother's presence, and the object of her visit, which excited her terrible suspicions, and immediately following the departure of Erle Gower, her

To remain an hour longer in Brighton she felt to be impossible, to return to the Kingswood mansion in Belgravia she would not; and, therefore, to prevent false surmises and disingenuous reports, there was but one alternative open to her, and that was Kingswood Hall.

Cyril had disappeared; she did not ask how, when or wherefore, and Lady Maud's supplications not to return to that dreary pile, where Philip Avon could come and go at will, where he could persecute her with his hateful and terrifying wooing, were borne down by Lady Kingswood's impetuous desire to place herself where the Marquis of Chillingham would be unlikely to come, or her eyes could rest on the face of that youth whose advent at Kingswood Hall had shattered at one blow the whole fabric of her happiness.

The solitary, monastic character of Kingswood Hall did not help to tone or to calm down her mind as Brighton had done. There the variable sea, the everchanging human tide, and the sprightly bustle peculiar to a place at once so fashionable and so populous, did something to attract her thoughts from dwelling on gloomy and painful subjects.

She had fled from her danger at a critical moment, but there were certain acts of her own from which she could not escape. Nothing, it is true, had actually transpired between herself and the Marquis of Chillingham upon which an actual charge could be substantiated, but too much had been implied to be misunderstood. She was not unconscious of the guilt of the step she was about to take when the Marquis of Chillingham urged her to fly, but her proper perception of its infamy was obscured by her passionate hankering for revenge.

But she had erred, and the commission of error rarely fails to entail baneful consequences. She knew well that the Marquis of Chillingham would not, for a time at least, abandon his iniquitous purpose. She felt certain that if she remained in London she would have to meet him again, even if she avoided society, beneath her husband's roof and in her husband's presence.

These painful impressions mainly determined her to fly to Kingswood Hall, and they also urged her to remain there so long as Lord Kingswood's parliamentary and governmental duties kept him in London. She had no fear that the Marquis of Chillingham would follow her to the Hall.

At first she began to hope that the worst was over, and though she felt herself to be doomed to a life of sorrow, a life which would be tortured by a keen acute sense of the wrong inflicted upon her by her husband, the worst a woman can suffer, she believed that she should possess the consolation of not having forfeited her own self-respect.

But she suddenly, even while the first ray of consolation dawned upon her, remembered the man Pharisee.

A spasmodic shudder ran through her frame as a vision of his sallow face and furtive eyes, his sleek and insinuating manner presented itself to her. She recollected, with a groan of mortal agony how deeply she had committed herself to this man's power by employing him and by communing with him respecting Lord Kingswood's unfaithfulness to herself.

She, with a feeling of horror, recalled to mind that it was by the agency of Pharisee that the Marquis of Chillingham had been introduced into the picture-gallery. By no other means could he have got there, and at an hour when she was there by appointment. She wildly taxed her memory to reproduce the words of the note written by her in a moment of frenzied excitement to the Marquis of Chillingham.

The Marquis of Chillingham had no doubt received the note, and would, she felt sure, keep it secret, had, in fact, she hoped, destroyed it. But Pharisee had received from her a written communication addressed to the Marquis of Chillingham, and he had, according to his instructions, secretly delivered it, unconscious of its contents, and consequently prepared to place the worst construction upon them. What if he were to proceed to Lord Kingswood, and under a promise of a handsome reward, betray all!

He had succeeded, by a long course of service, steadily and seemingly faithfully performed, in ingratiating himself deeply in Lord Kingswood's favor. He not only seemed to be always aware of what Lord Kingswood wished to be done, but also how he desired that it should be done, and in this spirit Lord Kingswood usually spoke of his services.

It was natural, therefore, that Lady Kingswood, in believing her husband guilty of acts which would render a confidant essential, should assume that Pharisee would be the individual he would elect to that post. The man was in every respect fitted for the task, cunning, shrewd, reserved, and a slave to the will of his master; he, of all men, would be the most likely person Lord Kingswood should choose, and thus it was just as natural that Lady Kingswood should endeavor to extract from him the secret she believed he was mixed up with. But, in doing this, she had unhappily made a confidant and an envoy of him, and had so placed herself in his power.

Grievously as she felt she had been wronged by Lord Kingswood, bitterly as she resented it, she yet shrunk from appearing in his eyes as an equally guilty and unfaithful partner.

In her endeavors, out of a spirit of retaliation, to make Lord Kingswood jealous, under the notion that while making him angry she was herself doing no wrong, she forgot that every such act weakened his faith in her integrity and lowered the standard of her purity she had maintained in his estimation. She saw this now, and felt how fearfully it would tell against her should Pharisee, proving treacherous, reveal to Lord Kingswood not only that she had written a private note to the Marquis of Chillingham, but had given him a secret interview in the dead of night.

The more she reflected upon this, the more it appeared necessary that she should see Pharisee and learn what had transpired during her absence from Kingswood House, in London. She had an impression, from the earnestness which he had displayed in addressing her, that he would be faithful to the trust she had reposed in him, nay, he had sworn it. Still she had her misgivings, and she felt that without seeing him, questioning and probing him, she would only be plunged into a state of such harassing incertitude, that she would be unable to find peace or contentment anywhere. But how to contrive this interview? Pharisee was with Lord Kingswood in London; she could not at present go back to London; but under what pretext would it be possible to procure Pharisee's attendance at Kingswood?

As at Brighton she had kept Lady Maud's society constantly, so here, at Kingswood Hall, Lady Maud kept as constantly with her.

At only one period of the day did Lady Maud absent herself from Lady Kingswood, and that was in the morning. She would disappear then for above an hour, and Lady Kingswood knew only at these times that Lady Maud did not make it an occasion for a walk in the grounds. All, indeed, she knew was, that Lady Maud, in these morning absences, directed her steps, on leaving her, towards the ancient portion of the Hall.

It had not occurred to her to ask Lady Maud whither she went, or by what motive she was actuated in performing these regular daily visits. She was too much occupied with her own reflections to see anything remarkable in what Lady Maud did, but she was one morning induced to seek her during one of these accustomed absences by the arrival of Philip Avon, who, having sent in his name to Lady Kingswood, requested, with a kind of feverish earnestness, to have an interview with Lady Maud.

Lady Kingswood was aware that Maud entertained feelings of dislike for the uncouth, imperious young man, but she knew that Lord Kingswood had set his heart on a match between them. She knew how distressed Maud was at the thoughts of such a marriage, but she believed it would be a wiser plan to let matters take their course. It would be for Maud, at the last moment, to reject the proffered hand, or, induced to change her aversion into liking, accept it. She had not the slightest notion of the real impulse to Maud's hatred of Philip Avon. However, on the present occasion, it occurred to her that she had herself better seek Maud and acquaint her with the arrival of Philip Avon; it would prepare her to go through the scarcely unexpected but distasteful interview, an interview which the abrupt communication of a servant might prevent taking place.

Lady Kingswood having traced Lady Maud to the entrance of the old library, could not summon sufficient resolution to enter the solemn and silent antique chamber, uncertain whether she should find Lady Maud within it or not.

So she paused without the doorway, and in a low, husky voice called Lady Maud by name. She scarcely expected to hear her respond, even though she repeated her calls two or three times in a louder tone than before. She was therefore startled by the light pattering of swiftly-advancing feet, which seemed to trip briskly over the inlaid oaken floor, nearing her each instant. While she hesitated whether to remain or fly, Lady Maud suddenly made her appearance at the doorway, ran into her arms, embraced her, and then hurried her away from the place.

Lady Kingswood yielded almost instinctively to the direction of her young companion, and found herself in her own boudoir before she attempted to check her movements or explain her own mission.

Lady Kingswood noticed with surprise that a fresh color was upon Maud's cheeks, and that her eyes were bright, glittering, dancing and joyous.

"What has enlivened you, sweet Maud?" she inquired, tenderly. "You appear to be in lighter and better spirits than when we parted last night, and even when I watched you as you slept the tears stood thickly upon your cheek, and you moaned, and sighed, and uttered a name——"

"A name!" echoed Lady Maud, an expression of alarm creeping over her features.

"Yes. I could not, however, catch what it was," continued Lady Kingswood. "You muttered it twice or thrice, and wrung your hands as if in much anguish, but then you became calm and slept peacefully. Strange, Maud, it is that you should be attacked by that dangerous excitement to wander in your sleep."

"Wander?" repeated Lady Maud, with a sudden blush spreading over her cheeks, forehead and neck. "Do you mean to—to—to walk while sleeping, as I did at Kingswood House?"

"Yes—yes," faltered Lady Kingswood, turning pale at the recollection.

"Did I last night wander thus?" inquired Lady Maud, timidly, with her eyes bent upon the ground, and the crimson hue upon her fair cheeks and brow growing brighter.

"I almost fear to tell you," responded Lady Kingswood. "After I had quitted your side last night, and had retired to my own chamber to sleep, I was tortured by harassing and terrifying dreams, and abruptly started out of one which distracted me. I was horrified to find my room filled with a blue, lurid light, rendering every object in the room clear and distinctly visible. I was much affrighted, for there are fearful stories afloat respecting the ancient portion of the mansion, as you know, and my heart died within me as I gazed on this strange and unearthly effect. I was yet more painfully affected by fear when this light suddenly disappeared, and there rose up a furious rushing, roaring sound among the old trees of the forest, as though a tremendous tempest had sprung up. I cannot remember how I quitted my couch and relighted my lamp, which had, from some unexplained cause, expired, or how, in my agitation, I gained your room. I know only that I was overwhelmed when I discovered you were absent from the room. I searched hastily everywhere I could think, and then recollected that you had recently been seized with a morbid fancy to visit the old portions of the Hall. I could not dare to alarm the household, but I almost swooned at the thought of searching for you in the dead hour of the night in the haunted library."

"Haunted!" ejaculated Lady Maud, with white lips.

"Haunted!" repeated Lady Kingswood, clutching her by the wrist. "Haunted, it is said, by the weird Lady Maud. In the dawning, at eventide at the midnight hour, aye, and even at noon, those who have been there sitting in silence and alone have heard the soft sound of a female step, and the rustling of silk sweeping down the hall, although they have nothing seen."

"Merciful Heaven!" ejaculated Lady Maud, a spasm convulsing her frame.

She had heard the sound within that hour.

"So runs the legend," continued Lady Kingswood; "and you may conceive what emotions I suffered, as, with tottering steps, I made my way towards that terrible place. I had advanced but a few steps, when I heard an approaching footstep; another moment, and you appeared. I stood aside and let you pass; you returned to your room, and unrobing yourself, retired quietly into your bed, appearing to be calm and even happy, though you repeated several words."

"Distinctly?" inquired Lady Maud, confusedly.

"Most distinctly," returned Lady Kingswood. "You said, 'It is an old tale, but it is a true one. Love! He is noble and he is brave. Shall I not love him? I will! I will!' Your lips closed, and you uttered no more. I laid down by your side, and watched you until I slept myself."

Lady Maud trembled violently. She wondered whether she had muttered Eric by name. She dared not ask. She turned white and red by turns, and did not speak a word.

Lady Kingswood gazed at her in silence and in earnestness for a minute or so, then she twined her arms about her, and kissed her cheek.

"Maud, my beloved child, I hoped within my inmost heart, that you had as yet escaped that passion—faint to so many, favorable to so few. I fear now that you have not, and that you love only to love in vain!"

Maud was as silent as death and as white.

"When," continued Lady Kingswood, speaking with impressiveness, "Mr. Philip Avon came here, and appeared to be inspired with an affection for you, I perceived that he had made no very favorable impression upon you, but I thought, with a heart unscathed, you would get over that first distaste, and come to like him, if not to love him."

"Never!" exclaimed Lady Maud, with a sudden energy.

"Hush!" interposed Lady Kingswood, hastily. "I have lived to discover the folly of making strong assertions. You, Lady Maud, may do so too. Now, Maud, you were ever truthful, and you will be sincere with me. The words you uttered in your sleep represented the state of your heart. They were the true exponents of your real feelings towards one living being."

She was silent; Lady Maud was silent, too. She bowed her head low, but Lady Kingswood raised it gently, and looked her softly in the eyes. Maud, of the hue of crimson, drew her face away, and laid it upon Lady Kingswood's neck.

The latter bent over her, and whispered in her ear,

"Maud, you love!"

"I do," she faintly articulated, after almost a minute's pause.

Again there was a silence, then Lady Kingswood said,

"Sweetest Maud! I believe in very truth that you are deceiving yourself, and that you are converting the simple emotions of a natural affection into those of a higher and more passionate nature. You have been brought up with Cyril from childhood; you have been constantly with him; you have been treated by him, thought of by him, loved by him, as a sister—but with no other sentiment. I know a girl's feelings, and I can see that, even as I should have done, you have exaggerated them. Between Cyril and Mr. Avon there is, in your eyes, a wide interval. You fancy that you love Cyril—it is but fancy, as you will find—and of course you, in your romantic dreamings, believe that difficulties will eventually be cleared away, and his hand may become yours. No time is so proper as the present to disabuse your mind of this supposition—this hopeless hope. Mr. Philip Avon is now——"

"Dear Lady Kingswood," interposed Lady Maud, a little excitedly, "you are laboring under a misconception. I—I am attached to my cousin Cyril, of course, but——"

"But what?" inquired Lady Kingswood, with some surprise, not alone at the interruption, but the form it had taken.

"I say that I am attached to my cousin Cyril," continued Maud, in a low voice, and with a burning cheek, "but in no other way than as a cousin. I am very fond of him, and always shall be, but not with the hope, or even the wish, to be—to be—to be united to him."

It was with difficulty that she forced the last words out.

"But you have this moment told me that you loved!" exclaimed Lady Kingswood, quickly.

"I did," faltered Lady Maud.

"But is it not Cyril that you love?" rejoined Lady Kingswood, with amazement.

"No—no—it is not Cyril," murmured Lady Maud, almost fainting.

Lady Kingswood drew herself up, and gazed at her like one thunderstricken; but recovering herself, she clutched Maud's hand, and exclaimed,

"Who is it you love—who?"

Lady Maud, to have saved herself from destruction, could not have answered that question. Before, however, Lady Kingswood, bewildered and astonished, could repeat her question, a servant entered, and said,

"My lady, Mr. Philip Avon desires me to remind you that he is awaiting the honor of an interview with Lady Maud, that he is impatient——"

"So impatient," interrupted a voice in the doorway, "so impatient, Lady Maud, to see you once again, that he cannot even wait the return of his messenger with your assent to receive him."

It was Philip Avon who spoke.

Lady Maud, all shrinking and trembling before, drew herself proudly up, and with a firm and even haughty attitude, prepared to go through and endure bravely a scene—for such now she knew it would be.

We must now return to Pharisee and his Albertina.

Pharisee, when he recovered from the inanimate condition into which, by the aid of a potent chemical agent for producing insensibility, he had been thrown by old Pengreep, was some time before he recovered his sentient faculties. At last he recalled the previous evening's occurrences seriatim, tracking event by event, until all further recollection faded with one which brought old Pengreep standing over him like a fiend, with his bony hands upon his throat, endeavoring to strangle him. With this memory came his consciousness that he had been outwitted, duped, made a helpless tool by old Pengreep, and had actually assisted at the accomplishment of some important object the old villain had at heart to the destruction of his own.

The ingrain of this man's composition was of a very base kind. Lord Kingswood had behaved liberally and well to him during the period of his servitude—liberally enough, indeed, to have raised in the breasts of some dependents a very large amount of devotion. But his lordship was irritable and passionate to his irritation. Pharisee had experienced, while in his service, many a gust of passion and its attendant consequences, and he nourished a feeling of revenge which had nothing to do with the base passion he had conceived for Lady Kingswood. The latter frenzy, indeed, was to him a means of gratifying the vindictive feelings which had been raised independent of it.

Now there was another being against whom he entertained the deadliest sentiments of revenge and that was old Pengreep.

This strange old man, whom he had met in so remarkable a manner, had extorted from him, under circumstances which appeared like a dream to him, all his dearest secrets. He had wrested Lady Kingswood's letter—or his own copy, and in the result there was little difference—from him, and had presented it to the Marquis of Chillingham, an act Pharisee was exceedingly anxious to have himself performed, in accordance with a plot he had concocted to bring the marquis and Lord Kingswood at arms' length, armed with deadly weapons, together, in the hope that the murder of the latter would screen him effectually from the consequences of his intended deed. Old Pengreep had, instead of him, obtained the interview with the marquis, and therefore had got him in his power. He must, too, have seen Lady Kingswood in the picture-gallery, and she must be also in his power, a fact which necessarily would go

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

er to weaken his own influence over her ladyship, if not destroy it. It was easy to conceive that Lady Kingswood, seeing old Pengreep, would believe him treacherous to her trust, and scorn him accordingly.

He sat upon his bed, with his elbows on his knees, and his talon-like fingers working nervously upon his teeth. It was not until he had cogitated for some hours that he seemed to have arrived at a decisive resolution. When he had done this, he rose up, made his toilet with very great care, and glided into his old place in attendance on Lord Kingswood.

He watched for Lady Kingswood as a cat would for a mouse; but was unable to get a glimpse of her so that he might speak with her alone.

One day he missed her; upon inquiry he found that she, attended by Lady Maud and Cyril, had gone to Brighton. He informed Lord Kingswood of this event, because, assured that he was ignorant of their departure, he believed it would take him by surprise, and elicit angry remarks from him, which he intended to blow into a flame, taking care that the fire should travel in one direction.

He wrote a line anonymously to the Marquis of Chillingham, imitating as closely as he could Lady Kingswood's hand. Its contents simply were,

"Lady K—— has retired to Brighton, to endeavor, in seclusion, to recover the health and spirits which for a time she has lost. She anticipates being much alone while there."

This note he contrived to place in the hands of the Marquis of Chillingham as one night he was passing out of the entrance of the House of Lords. But that he recognized the face of Pharisee, he would have flung the note from him, but as the latter fled instantly, as if he had been employed secretly to deliver this letter, he kept it, read it, and, as we have seen, went to Brighton, too.

Pharisee next seemingly let fall to Lord Kingswood that the marquis had, through his servant, been making inquiries after Lady Kingswood's health, and had been informed that she had gone to Brighton. Pharisee added, quietly, that not being, he believed, perfectly well, the marquis had paid a flying visit to Brighton, too.

Pharisee noticed the deadly pale-green pallor which spread itself over Lord Kingswood's face, and was not surprised to hear him say, an hour or two afterwards,

"Pharisee, look to my small travelling-case. I shall go to Brighton in the morning."

Pharisee's eyes glistened. It was precisely what he wished, for he hoped that, in a smaller mansion there, he should obtain his opportunity of speaking with Lady Kingswood alone.

"I am, I presume, to accompany your lordship?" he said.

"No," curtly returned Lord Kingswood; "I shall go alone."

Pharisee ground his teeth, but made no reply.

Lord Kingswood departed, and Pharisee was left for a time to amuse himself as best he might.

Aware that he could not now afford to let matters take their course, conscious that he must act quickly, secretly and surely, he determined that he would pay a visit to Albertina Virgo. He remembered her advice to come to the house at Gray's Mount at ten o'clock at night, and to whistle for admission.

She made her appearance abruptly at the door, with a jug in her hand, as if she had come there to take in the evening porter; she stood listening intently and watching with quick and eager eyes the flight of stairs leading up to old Pengreep's room, and the return of the person who had made the signal intended for a whistle.

Presently she perceived the form of Pharisee gliding, thief-like, by the iron railings which enclosed the area, and she beckoned him to her.

"Not a word now, my pet," she whispered. "He is prowling over the house like a wolf smelling about for a corpse. Come here on Thursday next, I know he is going out on that day, and be here at three in the afternoon. There will be no mistake next time. My turn must come some day or other, you know, and it will come on Thursday, I do believe and then you shall see that ——I'll take a pint of half-and-half, and mind it's a good measure, or you'll have it back; be off this instant, and bring it directly."

Pharisee heard a stair creak and a stealthy footstep follow. He understood Albertina's meaning as soon as it caught his ear, and she changed the tone of her voice. He fled away like a deer, keeping in the shadow of the houses, and contented himself with the belief that if he had at present been disappointed in the object of his visit, old Pengreep, with all his cunning, had failed to discover him.

A week nearly must elapse now before he could renew his visit, but more assured than ever that Albertina was bent upon obtaining for him the valuable documents in old Pengreep's possession, and that she would obtain them for him, he waited patiently—at least as patiently as he could.

During this interim Lady Kingswood and Lady Maud passed through London on their way to Kingswood Hall. Lord Kingswood had also returned to London, and seemed to be plunged deeper than ever in the manifold duties of the department over which he presided. He availed himself but slightly of Pharisee's services—nay, rather seemed to be vexed by his presence; made no allusions to what had passed between them, and, in fact, rarely spoke to him at all. When he did, it was in a distant, imperious tone—the tyrant addressing the slave.

Pharisee betrayed no change in his manner; he glided noiselessly in and out, was at his post when required, performed his duties with his accustomed ease and silence; but he was adding all the time to the sum of the reckoning he intended one day to make.

On the Thursday appointed by Miss Virgo, he attired himself in a costume quite different to any in which Pengreep had seen him, and indeed disguised himself as completely as he possibly could.

At three o'clock he was passing the door, and saw the face of Miss Virgo glowering over a card placed in the front parlor, informing the public that apartments, genteelly furnished, were to be let, and that all inquiries respecting them were to be made within. A thought flashed across the mind of Pharisee, and he ran up the steps before the door; he raised the knocker and gave a smart rat-a-tat-tat. The door was opened immediately by Albertina, with an air of grim dignity.

"Apartments to let?" said Pharisee, with a bow.

"Come in and inspect them," rather curtly responded Albertina.

Pharisee stepped upon the mat in the narrow hall. The door was slammed in behind him, and he felt himself seized suddenly round the neck, and a very rough, hairy and prickly substance, which afterwards proved to be Miss Albertina's chin, was rubbed about his face, distributing with it an odor which was not the essence of wood violets.

"Did you think to deceive the fond eye of your own devoted?" exclaimed Miss Virgo, as Pharisee, by a tremendous effort, released himself from her suffocating embrace. "Aha, a fond woman always knows the presence of the beloved object, let it come in what shape it may. I knew my pet the instant my eyes dropped on him, in spite of the ugly creature he's made himself, and——"

"But Pengreep?" suggested Pharisee.

"Oh, bless you, he's out, as I told you he would be."

"When will he return?" he inquired, with a serious, nervous, by no means loving expression of features.

"Oh, not for some time yet, I believe," she answered, smiling at him in a manner which somewhat bewildered him—it had so little of the aspect of affection. "There is yet time for an interchange of tender sentiments," she added, biting her thumb-nail, and giving him a poke in the ribs which sent him half way across the room.

He raised his hands deprecatingly.

"But business, my dear Miss Virgo," he cried; "business first, you know. We cannot tell one moment from another that Pengreep will not make his appearance, and——"

"You are right, my clever beauty!" she replied, and added, "still we may indulge in a chaste embrace, and you may receive one virgin kiss from yours ever affectionately, Albertina Virgo."

Pharisee had to submit, but at length breaking away, he gasped out,

"Oh, my angel!"

He leaned against the doorpost in a fainting condition.

But the object of his visit overcame all his weakness, and, in fact, every other consideration.

"The papers," he murmured, panting, "the papers. Our marriage depends upon my obtaining them."

She nodded, smiled her grim smile, and beckoned him up the stairs.

He followed her with nervous quickness, and when they reached old Pengreep's door, she said,

"Wait here till I come."

After he had waited a little while, feeling uneasy about old Pengreep, he knelt down and looked through the keyhole of the chamber door, but something pungent instantly attacked his eyes, and he rose up half blinded by the water that rushed into them, a violent fit of sneezing followed, and this appeared to bring Miss Virgo to his side.

"You have been looking through the keyhole," she said, sharply.

Pharisee, between sneezing and weeping, admitted that he had.

"You should not have done it; you had no need to do it," she rejoined, angrily, "when I told you, you stupid duck, he was not at home."

"Why did you leave me?" he exclaimed, with a groan.

"My precious," she answered, "I must leave you sometimes. I went to play 'Sister Anne' at the top of the house, but I could not 'see any one coming' that we need care about."

She now produced her master-key, and after a moment's intense listening she placed it in the keyhole and opened the door.

She withdrew the key and let the door fall slowly back.

Both rested upon the threshold of the door, afraid for a moment to enter, but at length Albertina caught Pharisee by the hand, and they sneaked into the room on tiptoe.

They gazed around them; Pharisee saw that the boxes and the furniture appeared to stand exactly in the same place as they did when last he was present.

He cast his eyes nervously and eagerly round him.

"Which is the box that contains the papers relating to the Kingswood family?" he asked in an undertone.

She drew him towards a corner, and pointed to a large iron chest. It had the name of Vernon painted upon it in white letters.

"Come, open it. Quick, quick!" he cried, anxiously. "Where is the key; open it, and give them to me."

"Softly, my chosen one," she rejoined insinuatingly. "Those papers are as good to me as a marriage certificate. With those papers in my hands, you would marry me—without them, you would as soon give your heart and hand to the Queen of the Gipsies at the age of a hundred and one——"

"My enchantress!" ejaculated Pharisee, expostulatingly.

Miss Virgo shook her head in a very cunning manner.

"Do you understand this," she said, emphatically. "Those papers once out of that box, I must depart out of this house with them. Pengreep is always glowering over them and will miss them very soon after they are gone. If I happened to be here when he missed them he'd throttle me if I did not tell him what had become of them; and if I told him that you had got them he'd get them from you, and your life would not be worth a pin afterwards; he'd poison you. So, when they go, I go too. They go with you, I go with you too. When we have been in the church together, before the parson, and you have put the ring on my finger in his presence, and called me your wife, then I give them up to you to do as you please with."

"My loveliest, I have already agreed to all this!" he exclaimed. "Of course I mean to keep my promise."

"And, of course, I mean to make you; so I will show you the papers in my hands, and I will keep them in my hands until we are married," she rejoined.

"Then you propose to quit the house with me," he said, gnawing his knuckles.

"I do," she replied, in a decisive tone, "for the reason I have already told you, as well as that it will be necessary to impress upon you the danger in which you stand as well as myself, as soon as the papers are gone. Pengreep will suspect you. He will hunt in every direction, and it will be necessary, therefore, to remain very close in some place, snug and secret, until to-morrow morning. Then you must go alone to Doctors'-commons, and get the license; then we must go to the first church handy and be married; then I will give up the papers to you, and then I will show you how to make use of them, set old Pengreep at defiance, and make him hang himself out of sheer spite."

Pharisee heaved a deep sigh, for he felt how very hazardous was the game he was playing. Then it suddenly occurred to him that, as he would be with his Albertina shortly in some remote spot alone, he would be able perhaps during part of [illegible] night to purloin the papers, and get safely away with them. If they were once fairly in his possession, he thought he might ridicule safely any attempt made by any one to get them from him until he had made them answer his purpose. He took her hand and raised it to his lips, and, with a sense of faintness and nausea, hastily released it.

"Do with me as you will," he said, and instantly exclaimed, "Hark!"

She jumped a foot high.

"What!" she cried, clutching him by the arm.

He pointed to the space between the windows.

"Something sounded there," he exclaimed.

She grinned horribly.

"Behold!" she said, and touching a knob, she opened it.

"Look in," she added.

Pharisee put his head into a kind of dark closet, and withdrew it with a cry of fright.

"There is a skeleton in there," he said, with a shudder.

"Yes," she replied, shrugging her shoulders. "It is a fancy of Pengreep's to have that beastly object there; there's some mystery about it. A nice place, my dear, that would be for you to be locked up in if you didn't know that by pressing the other side of the knob I touched you could get out. Why, you would become a skeleton too," and she gibbered at him as she concluded.

He said quickly, as he turned away from the unpleasant receptacle,

"Let us get the papers."

She went to the box marked with the name of Vernon, and kneeling down, she applied the key to the chest and raised the lid. She drew forth a large, heavy packet, upon which was written only the word Kingswood.

Pharisee's eyes gloated as he beheld it, and he stretched forward his hands to take it. She made a gesture as if to draw it away from him, but stumbled over. His fingers caught in a loose part of it, and it was left in his hands.

At the same instant the lid of the chest fell with a crash.

At the same instant voices were heard in the hall below.

Albertina leaped to her feet with a low screech, and darted out of the room closing the door behind her, leaving Pharisee there with the packet in his possession.

He heard a heavy footstep ascending the stair, and his heart sickened and died within him.

Suddenly he remembered the closet between the windows. He touched the knob, the door flew open, he drew it after him, it closed, he heard the click, and he was confined in the dark and alone with a skeleton.

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

A COOPER, finding considerable difficulty in keeping one of the heads of a cask he was finishing in its place, put his son inside to hold the head up. After completing the work much to his satisfaction, he was astonished to find his boy inside the cask, and without a possibility of getting out, except through the bunghole.

"Job Printing! Job Printing!" exclaimed Mrs. Partington, the other day, as she peeped over her spectacles at the advertising page of a country paper. "Poor Job! they've kept him printing, week after week, ever since I larnt to read; and if he wasn't the patientest man that ever was he never could have stood it so long, no how."

JOHN JONES has no objection to the lick her law, when applied to Jane. Jane Jones contends stoutly for the liquor law, as applicable to John. Jane's argument is simple and conclusive. When John does liquor, he does lick her. When John don't liquor, he don't lick her; therefore, if John can't liquor, he won't lick her—the conclusion she wishes to reach.

A MEDICAL student who had been screwed very hard at his examination for admission to the faculty, on a very warm day, was nearly overcome by the questions put to him, when the following query was added:

"What course would you adopt to produce a copious perspiration?"

After a long breath he observed, wiping his forehead,

"I would have the patient examined before the Medical Society."

AN exquisite, who had ordered a pair of pants from his tailor, requested him to make them tight. The man tried them on after they were finished, and at once returned them with the complaint,

"They are too small!"

"Did you not tell me to make them as tight as your skin?" said the tailor.

"Certainly, I did," replied the dandy, "and I can sit down in my skin, but I cannot in my pantaloons!"

DRS. CHALMERS and Stuart must have been a "wee bit" metaphysical that day they got into a controversy about the nature of faith. Chalmers, compelled at length to leave his friend, said,

"I have not time to say any more, but you will find my views fully and well put in a tract called 'Difficulties in the Way of Believing.'"

"Why," exclaimed Dr. Stuart, "that is my own tract! I published it myself."

AN enumerator in Essex, having taken the census, received a visit from an old farmer at whose house he had called a few days previously. The farmer fumbled awkwardly with his hat, and didn't seem to know exactly how to get at his business. The enumerator inquired after the health of his sixteen children, all under seventeen years of age, whose names he remembered to have taken, spoke about the weather, &c.; but the honest old farmer seemed to grow more and more embarrassed. At length the farmer blurted out,

"My old woman sent me down to tell you to come and take the census over again—she's got another one."

A FEVER prevailed on board ship at sea, and a negro man was appointed to throw overboard the bodies of those who died from time to time. One day, when the captain was on deck, he saw the negro dragging out of the forecastle a sick man, who was violently struggling to extricate himself from the negro's grasp, and remonstrating very bitterly against the cruelty of being buried alive.

"What are you going to do with that man, you black rascal?" said the captain.

"Going to throw him overboard, massa, 'cause he dead."

"Dead, you scoundrel!" said the captain, "don't you see he moves and speaks?"

"Yes, massa, I know he says he no dead; but he always lie so, nobody ever knew when to believe him."

"You carry your head rather high," as the owl said to the giraffe, when he poked his nose into the belfry.

IF a person catch hold of your ear, and demand [illegible] he has the wrong pig by the ear, would you answer yes or no?

"A LARGE man-eating shark was captured off Solway Frith." Another newspaper reports the circumstance as follows: "A large man, eating shark, was captured off Solway Frith."

IF an old hat sits uneasy on the head, will not the application of chloroform produce a comfortable nap? When a person's pocket gets bill-ious, is not change of some sort desirable? Do not doctors, generally speaking, bleed their patients too freely?

"You know, madame, that you cannot make a purse out of a sow's ear." "Oh, sir, please fan me. I have intimation of a swoon. When you use that odious specimen of vulgarity again, clothe it in refined phraseology. Just say it is impossible to fabricate a pecuniary receptacle from the auricular organ of the soft sex of the genus swine."

THE following dialogue is reported between two boys: "What do you think? My father, the other day, shot nine hundred and ninety-nine pigeons with one barrel of his gun." "Oh, why didn't he say a thousand at once?" (Reply provokingly): "Do you suppose my father would tell a lie just for the sake of one pigeon?"

GENERAL GRANT, a Scotchman, was in the service of the great Frederick of Prussia, and was observed one day fondling the king's favorite dog. "Are you fond of dogs?" asked Frederick. "No, please your majesty," replied Grant; "but we Scotch have a saying that it is right to secure a friend at court." "You are a sly fellow," said the monarch; "recollect for the future that you have no occasion for any friend at court but myself." Grant rose afterwards with great rapidity, and was intrusted with the command of the most important fortresses in the kingdom.

And wins

(a) This move is condemned by all the authors, with whom we entirely concur. It weakens Black's right wing, and permits White's K's B to occupy a most important diagonal.

(b) The correct move here is P to Q B 3, obtaining a fine attacking game.

(c) This looks like lost time; we believe that Q to K 3 would have enabled Black to play the Bishop to K 5 with great effect.

(d) P to Q 4 would not have been good play, because then White could have effectively posted his Kt at K 5.

(e) Q tks K Kt P, sacrificing the Kt looks tempting, but White would capture the Kt, and on Black's playing R to K B 4, White could move Kt to R 4, and B to K sq with a safe game.

(f) Winning the exchange.

(g) A good move, the effect of which will presently become apparent.

(h) Much better than taking Rook.

(i) The game has now assumed a phase of great interest and complication.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM NO. 295.—B to Q 6; K tks R (a); Q to Q B 8 (ch); K tks Q; Kt mates.

(a) B tks R; Q to Q 4 (ch); K moves; B mates.

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Detroit, Mich., 18th April, 1861.

M. PHELAN, ESQ.—Sir—I was playing a discount game, and receiving that odds. Towards the end of the game a small wager was made by a friend of mine with my opponent that I would beat him a love game; the score stood 87 to 59, the latter figure being mine, and it being my play. I ran the game out, but in making the last shot I scored 5, having but 2 points to go. The number of points made in my run was [illegible], the number I needed to make was 11; my opponent lacked 13 to make his game. Did I beat him a love game or not? Please answer in your column, and oblige, yours sincerely, M.

Ans.—You did not beat him a love game, as any point you made over and above the number you required to make your game goes for naught.

J. T. W., Boston.—A formal announcement to that effect has already appeared.

JUNIUS, Portland, Me.—The reasoning of your opponent is altogether fallacious. The whole proceeding is unwarrantable, and no amount of sophistry can make it otherwise.

B. B., Providence.—We have nothing later than the published intelligence.

M. T., Philadelphia, Pa.—"In playing a game with the agreement that one ball shall be out of the string when either player is in hand, if my opponent being in hand I put a ball out is he obliged to play on it, or has he the right to bank at any ball within the string?"

Ans.—He has the right to play as he chooses. He is not obliged to play on the ball that was put out of the string.

F. R., Scranton.—There is no such rule extant.

W. O'B.—In such a case the voice of the majority, in accordance with the recognized rules, should be accepted as decisive.

N. P. B., Chicago, Ill.—Neither of the parties can claim the game under the circumstances. They must win it by their next count.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

BILLIARDS AT SARATOGA SPRINGS.—Mr. Esmonde has added another of Phelan's tables to his establishment at this fashionable summer resort. He is making all necessary preparations for the coming season.

Mr. Ainsworth is also engaged in renovating his favorite establishment, where he will have seventeen of Phelan's tables.

BILLIARDS IN LUNATIC ASYLUMS.—The recognition of the important and most salutary influence of the game of billiards in mental maladies is continually and widely spreading. During the past year the physicians of several State and private establishments for the insane have, in their annual published reports, impressed this fact upon the public. The Butler Hospital for the Insane, Providence, R. I., has just been furnished with one of Phelan's billiard tables.

BILLIARDS IN MASSACHUSETTS.—The Bay State Hotel in Worcester, Mass., has just been supplied with two of Phelan's tables. Mr. Phelan intends visiting his friends in Worcester at an early day.

MOVEMENTS OF M. BERGER.—M. Berger has arrived at Cincinnati from New Orleans, and was to have given his first exhibition in the Queen City of the West on the 3d inst. M. Berger is to give a series of exhibitions at Mr. Tieman's room.

THE following was the bulletin of the Amateur Tournament on the 3d inst.:

Around the table	188
Four ball carom game	164
French carom	30
Carom pool	898

BIG RUNNING.—We see by our cotemporaries that Mr. Foley, of Detroit, has been making some long runs at Cleveland, Ohio, where he is now located. We also hear of some big running in Boston.

BILLIARDS IN CHICAGO.—A billiard match at the Tremont Exchange last evening attracted a large audience, and considerable interest. The players were Washington Campbell and Timothy McCarty. The game was the four ball carom game, 500 points up. This was won by Campbell by 109 points. Some first-class playing was done on both sides. A French carom game was then played between Campbell and Michael Geary, who has of late been the travelling companion of Berger. The game of 30 was won by Campbell by 11 points. It was skilfully contested. Mr. Geary then displayed some of Berger's fancy shots with excellent effect.—Chicago Times, May 28.

Shot made by H. Kearing, at Thompson's Billiard Room, New Haven, in a game of 63 points up; winning the game by a 67 off the two reds.

This work will be published in Semi-Monthly Numbers, its mammoth size will allow of the largest Engravings, and will contain a complete epitome of the war in which the country is involved, with all the Facts, Scenes, Incidents and Anecdotes connected with it, arranged chronologically, so as to form a contemporary and permanent history of the time. All official and important Documents, emanating North or South, will appear in full, with complete and authentic accounts and illustrations of all the striking incidents of the War, together with the Portraits of leading Officers and Statesmen, Plans and Views of Fortifications, Maps, &c., &c. The Pictorial History of the War of 1861 will be invaluable to families, for in its magnificently illustrated page even children can trace the course of events, while as a work of reference for all classes its value and importance will increase year by year. In its completed form it will be one of the most magnificent Historical Pictorial Works ever issued from any press in the world. Each Number will be exquisitely printed on fine thick paper, in large clear type, and will be stitched in a cover with a beautiful illustrated Title Page.

lieutenant Crosby, mounting the flotilla. That gallant regiment, the Zouaves, then marched by the road to New Market Bridge. That regiment afterwards Colonel Townsend's regiment marched to support Colonel Harper's advance. At the same time two regiments from Newport News, namely, Colonel Allen's Troy regiment, and the Seventh under Colonel Bendix, started from the camp at that place to join them within a mile of Little Bethel. Everything went on well till about three o'clock in the morning, when Colonel Townsend's regiment from Hampton, and Colonel Bendix's from Newport News, met in the fork of the road close to Little Bethel. Here they learned that infantry ahead which defeated the whole plan, and revealed to the Secessionists the fact that they were to be the first to the attack. Colonel Bendix hearing the advance of Colonel Townsend's regiment, rashly pushed on to the conflict. Both regiments then became mixed up and began firing between each other. Of course, hearing under a similar circumstances, Colonel Townsend's regiment also under a similar circumstances, Colonel Townsend's regiment also under wounded by this fatal error. To add to the confusion, Colonel Duryee's regiment, the Fifth, from Camp Butler, Colonel Pierce's regiment, fortunately, owing to the darkness, without doing any damage. The mistake being discovered, Colonel Bendix's regiment was marched forward, the day having just dawned. Little Bethel was immediately attacked and was captured, the enemy retreating rapidly toward Great Bethel.

The Federal troops, after having burnt little Bethel, arrived at Great Bethel, at ten o'clock. The Secessionists had retreated to the Yorktown road, and hence, under the command of Colonel Townsend and Duryee, pursued hotly, halting only to refresh themselves, when they were cross-roads cannon.

As the batteries were reached, the first intimation they had of the presence of the enemy was a heavy fire, which killed and wounded several. It was here that Lieutenant Greene, in the performance of mind and skill apparent, for he worked his gun with such effect that in a very short time the fire from the Secessionists was silenced. General Pierce then came to the emergency the expedition might have had a different termination. He arrived in the rear just in time, owing to a deep breach at the front and sides over the retrenched Secessionists, to prevent the latter from making a rush at Greene upon their unyielding rank. The same praise must be given to all the regiments that fought for their entire day, and especially for two hours, and only retreated at the command of General Pierce. It was at this time that Major Winthrop, of the Seventh, fell. He was for having just distinguished his gun at the enemy, and described that it rejoiced and the gun the enemy's breast. He was instantly killing it when a ball struck him. The young hero fell dead by the side of his gun. Between the Secessionists and Major Winthrop, who immediately placed an gun carriage, and carried off the dead by his surviving men. This action occurred at half past seven o'clock in the morning, and between seven and eight o'clock.

About the time also it was discovered that Major was killed by a Louisiana chieftain; the brave soldier was bending over his fallen foe when he was killed by the same ball by which he gave it an honor-able end.

After a retreat of the Federal troops was conducted with great order and deliberation, the dead and wounded were brought off by turns, with the exception of Major Winthrop, already named, and two Sergeants of Duryee's regiment. The latter was in the Secessionists lain on the field of battle wounded. These brave men died soon afterwards, and were buried by the Secessionist foes. The latest accounts of this afternoon's engagement give the returns of killed, wounded, and missing, as nearly four hundred on the part of the Federal forces. It is, of course, impossible to ascertain that of the enemy. General Pierce has displayed the highest skill, and upon Colonel Bendix, and praises every Brigadier General Pierce's immediate very highly. Encouraged by the success of the Federal troops, possibly have a wholesome effect upon the campaign, by impressing upon the Government and the people of the North with the importance necessity of placing at the head of every expedition, great or small, men who have seen actual service, or of all events those who have received a regular military education.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographers are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without even their own address having been given, as can only be done in support with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. Our obliging agent proceeds to every part of the country, and sketches everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not to whom the sketches are to be sent, and they are often stowed away for months awaiting an opportunity. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

The State of the Nation.

WHILE political preferences and party obligations regulate the action of the Federal Government in respect to military appointments, the action of the rolling powers of the Southern confederation is dictated solely by common sense, which is a true sense of the necessities of the position of affairs. While the Federal Government chooses for the most important offices in the army civilians, good and true men doubtless, but mere experimentalists in the science of war, the Southern confederacy, while though not regularly educated to military life, have yet seen actual service in the field; and, lastly, to State militia officers and officers of the volunteer regiments. This common sense arrangement will insure a certain efficiency in every department, and though it may not always command success, reverse, at least, will not be the result of military incapacity.

The authorities at Washington seem to be perfectly terrified lest they should be compelled to acknowledge merit, and reward gallantry, in the members of the regular army. They seem to regard them with a jealousy which, to mere bookworms, is perfectly incomprehensible. In the military business of life, if we want a men to cast a cannon, we employ a tailor and not a practical gunfitter; or if we want a professional cook, we rarely select a gentleman accustomed to carry a book. But in our Government, the instincts of common sense, and the consciousness of the "eternal fitness of things," are utterly set at naught; a political partisan, unless living considered far more eligible for command a brigade than a practised officer and gentleman without primary election influence.

To summon General Scott, that true and noble old man, from all participation in the gross incompetency and shameful favoritism of the ruling powers; but we appeal to him, as a last resource, not to allow a wanton sacrifice of life and a desecration of our national honor to be offered at the shrine of political and personal favoritism. Let the gallant and unspotted name of Scott serve as a shroud, and let our ambitious civilians go to the mucks. We should then have no more Bethel blunders.

Let the public mind be disabused of the impression that the first place since our last issue—movements which indicate that the Southern Generals are about to concentrate their entire strength upon some one point, and that point the defence of the city of great battle. The Secession troops have evacuated Harper's Ferry, leaving behind only a small force to guard their retreat. Harper's Ferry being the property of the Government property, and also the bridge across the Potomac. The wanton destruction of property, bridges, dams, &c., by the Secession troops has been unusually wanton. For the gallant and unspotted troops have fallen back upon Manassas Gap, a portion of them probably going up to hold possession, if possible, of Leesburg. The western Secessionists, with the exception of the seven thousand, a large body of troops, of which the Ninth New York Regiment, Colonel Silles, is the advance guard, is advancing from their place, and have reached us that the North is already in possession of Leesburg. If such should be the case, the Ninth will probably occupy the post of the railroad, while immense masses of troops are ready to advance upon Manassas Gap from the South, there is every probability that the Secession troops will concentrate their entire and strongly fortified position. Telegraphic despatches on the 17th state that a retrograde movement of the Southern troops at that point had been commenced, and that the bulk of the army would concentrate upon Richmond and there make a stand.

The line of defence of the Potomac is now considered complete, and the only weak point is at Alexandria, where a strong crossing could be effected in its possession of the Federal troops. Much has been said about the intended attack of the Secessionists upon Washington, but the impression is that the fact of the attempt will be made within a few days, but we feel satisfied that no such attempt will be made. The aggression of the capital city so well fortified that the Southern army being taken in the rear is so imminent, that we look upon the oft repeated threat as one of those military ensemble flown out to throw a blind upon the surrounding and real movements.

Fortress Monroe is constantly receiving additional engineers. By the end of the month it will be one of the strongest fortresses in every thousand men. In addition to the gallant regiments already there, withdraw but two days Colonel Weber's Twentieth New York Volunteers, General Butler's force, and fifteen other regiments are expected immediately, together with an efficient corps of artillery and a regiment of mounted riflemen. Such a force is such a position is considered perfectly

There is every prospect of warm times in Missouri. The Secessionist Governor Jackson, of Missouri, was continuing his fight with the Federal troops in Jefferson City, from which the carried of General Lyon's forces drove him so hurriedly. An important movement of Federal troops is to be made at once towards St. Louis. Eight regiments are concentrated within two hours' march of that city—four at Boonville and four at Cape-ville. A camp of instruction is immediately will be established at Quincy. It is said that the State militia (Secessionists) have full sway in the counties immediately bordering on this side of the Missouri River, from the Kansas frontier to Boonville.

Cairo is threatened with an immediate attack. General Fillow is said to be on the march from Columbus and Memphis to take Cairo and break the blockade of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. General Fillow, it seems, has been promised auxiliaries and assistance from Kentucky and Kentucky, Governor Jackson and Magoffin. This movement is not feared by General Prentiss, who feels confident in the impregnable strength of his position. The following correspondence has passed between General Prentiss and the authorities of Kentucky:

FARMAN, Kentucky, Saturday, June 8, 1861.

To General Prentiss, Commanding Forces at Illinois:

SIR—Inclosed please find a copy of my instructions from the Excellency the Governor of Kentucky, which, among other things, you will learn that it is the determined and fixed attitudes of self-defence as assumed by the State. Especially you will notice all instructions in relation to the movements of the State troops and her sovereign relations.

The instructions in relation of the note is this: I have received positive information that a force of from 3,000 to 5,000 under your command is now on their hands, and under command of United States officers, and have been ordered by the Governor to dispose a body of unarmed militia, which had assembled for military instruction by the county of Hickman, under the laws of this State; that they placed guards around the houses and over the persons of our citizens and prisoners, to prevent intelligence of their approach from being communicated, and other steps, all wearing the appearance of hostile intentions.

The Governor and people of Kentucky had hoped that, after the declaration of their neutrality, they would be left free from the menace or taunt, to solve for themselves the momentous questions which agitated the country. But such is not the case, and which in other States has resulted in the overthrow of the civil and the substitution of military power. Such a course in Kentucky will be bloodshed and anarchy.

I shall hope to hear from you by the return of Lieutenant Gerard, the bearer hereof.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JNO. J. JOHNSON.

The following is a copy of the instructions of Governor Magoffin to Dr. Johnson, to which he refers in the above letter:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, May 7, 1861.

To Dr. Jno. M. Johnson:

DEAR SIR—Rumors have reached me to the effect that a most unjustifiable movement of troops is being set on foot by the Federal on Monday next, the 13th instant, and apprehending that such rumors may be taken detrimental to the domestic peace of this State, you are requested to attend its session, and lay before the citizens assembled there my proclamation of the 20th of May, and explain upon them a true and sincere observance of its recommendations. You will please exert your utmost influence to induce upon the part of those citizens and others in that region of the State, a respect for the position held by Kentucky as set out in that proclamation, and to restrain from any infraction of the militude of self-defence as assumed by the State. Especially you will restrain all movements looking to a disregard of the authority of the State in her sovereign relations. Report to me when you can do this pleasure.

Respectfully yours,
(Signed) B. MAGOFFIN.

To these State Sovereignty documents, General Prentiss returned the following reply:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE ILLINOIS VOLUNTEERS,
CAMP DESPAIGNE, CAIRO, June 8, 1861.

To Hon. J. M. Johnson:

SIR—I received your letter of this date, and have read it carefully. I have to say that I hold myself responsible to my Government for my official acts.

I have under my command severe Union citizens of Kentucky that I am ready to render aid to them at all times when solicited, and believe the best way Government will be to approve of my course in this.

I remain, yours respectfully,
S. M. PRENTISS.

Brigadier-General First Brigade Illinois Volunteers.

Shortly after these letters appeared General McClellan issued a letter which, we trust, will shortly see consider both unfortunate and misplaced, as it disavows the energetic action of General Prentiss:

CINCINNATI, June 7, 1861.

To Hon. J. J. Crittenden, Frankfort, Ky.:

The papers of this morning state that General Prentiss, Commander United States forces at Cairo, has sent troops across the Ohio River into Kentucky. I am ignorant of the nature of such a movement, but I at once telegraphed General Prentiss for the facts; and have his reply. He says that the movement was true, disapproves it, and ordered him to make no more such movements without my permission. I approve this.

GEO. B. MCCLELLAN, Major-General.

In the State Convention at Wheeling, Virginia, on the 16th inst., the Committee on Business reported a declaration, reviewing the unhappy condition of the State, setting forth the usurpations of the Richmond Convention, offering a bill of rights, repudiating allegiance to the Southern Confederacy, and vesting the offices of all who adhere to it, whether legislative or judicial. The section, as read, recently, offered a resolution which was adopted, setting forth the grievances long suffered by Western Virginia, and declaratory of their intention never to submit to the Ordinance of Secession and the usurpation based in the Union.

As a great struggle is momentarily expected in Virginia, it will be interesting to our readers to know the relative forces between the two armies in each other. It may be remembered that the forces of the Federal Government are increasing almost hourly, and that the estimate of the Secession army is likewise gradually from increasing, and is in all probability greatly over-estimated:

UNION FORCES.
Gen. McClellan's column now in the West, via Cumberland, &c.	30,000
Gen. Patterson's column, moving from Chambersburg	21,000
Gen. Butler's column, moving from Baltimore	15,000
Gen. Cadwallader's column, via Rockville, Relay, &c., to Upper Potomac	4,000
Gen. Mansfield's column, from Washington	10,000
Gen. Hicksworth's column, from Arlington Heights, Va., to Alexandria ...	10,000
Gen. Robert's division, from Fortress Monroe	12,000
Total	97,000

REPORTED SECESSION FORCES.
At Harper's Ferry, now gone	5,000
At Leesburg, Winchester, and Manassas	15,000
At Manassas Junction, Centreville, &c.	20,000
At Culpepper, Gordonsville, Spotsylvania and Charlottesville	15,000
At Richmond	12,000
At Richmond	15,000
At Norfolk and Portsmouth	15,000
At Norfolk and in Blue vicinity	11,000
At Yorktown	11,000
On the York and Manassas Rivers and Aquia Creek, say	30,000
Total	146,000

We also give the total amounts of the Federal troops under arms, in position or awaiting orders, together with their location and commanding officers:

South side of Potomac, Alexandria, &c., Brig.-Gen. T. McDowell, U.S.A.	18,000
Fortress Monroe, Brig.-Gen. J. G. Wool, U.S.A.	17,000

Oregon	1,000
Camp Union, New Jersey	5,000
Total	223,500

PERSONAL.

A CERTAIN letter from Paris says that Mr. Payne, M.C. of our Minister to Spain, has received a most flattering reception at the "Bridesse Village" in Biskay—called, by her fondness in him George Payne singing with the Basques of their ancient liberties, and presenting him with a gold medal. The Queen has signed the treaty of commerce between Spain and Italy, signed with ink of the blade Morgarthe, and engraved with three narrow cuchas signed in metals, and presented to the Queen by Victor Emanuel. It is said that the Queen's military articles are written in Mr. Buckley's best style.

Lord Brougham is now in the last year of his 83d year. The classic mansion, Philadelphia on the York June, is in his thirty-eighth year. He was a man of great versatility and talent.

CARLOS EUGENIO, better known as Pedro Gomez, a mulatto artist and musician, died at the Bellevue Hospital, on the 9th instant. He composed the airs and sacrifice by carrying him Bazzar, of Charleston.

PRINCE NAPOLEON PLON-PLON and the Princess Clotilde have started in their yacht on a trip to Algeria, Spain, &c.

QUEEN Bathilde readers, including the Princess Alice, of Windsor Castle, England, will doubtless be glad to know that the Prince Louis, of Hesse, is the latest addition to the nursery.

MAJOR WINTHROP, who was killed in the battle of Great Bethel, was the author of the well-known "Cruise of the Dahlgren," and other works of merit.

Another article from his pen will appear in the July number. It is called "The Battle of Great Bethel."

THE brave veteran, General Harney, who, though on match for Secession is honored and command as exhibited by Governor Jackson and as General

Price, is an excellent and faithful soldier, is in Philadelphia. He is to be actively employed in the approaching campaign.

A CONTRIBUTOR to the Tribune demands, in its Sunday edition, the immediate execution of Jeff. Davis, Floyd, Beauregard, Stephens, Wigfall, Letcher and about a dozen others of the same way of thinking. This is too much for even the Tribune who reminds its correspondent that Mrs Glass could not cook a hare till it was caught. Lieutenant-Governor Raymond, of the New York Times, seems, however, to demand the instant execution of President Lincoln and his Cabinet. Let us hope that somebody will save these gentlemen from their friends. There is no truth in the rumor that Lieutenant-General Scott has resigned in favor of the editor of the New York Times

IF we may judge from the Charleston Courier of June 8th, South Carolina has so little sympathy with Southern affairs that it burlesques its tribulation. The Courier contains an announcement that on the 11th, at the Institute Hall, an entertainment will be given, and a new farce performed called "The Vigilance Committee; or, a Lover in a Box," in which the author "has given in a most happy sketch the leading events of Secession to the death of Ellsworth and the hero martyr, Jackson"

IF anything could more thoroughly show the utter despondency and degradation of the Southern cause in Louisiana it is found in the New Orleans Delta of the 3d, which contains an enthusiastic account of a fête given to free niggers, who had at their own expense formed a regiment of niggers, or "culled pussons," to assist the new Confederacy! The lion and the lamb fraternising is not a circumstance. What a frightful leveller is fear!

IT is said that Mrs. Page, née Dougherty, is not the original of her husband's Venus. She was his Juno. This correction will make her popular with the wives.

GENERAL BEAUREGARD has been detected in a trick which has disgusted even the Confederate troops. It appears that he has been in the habit of disguising himself at the places where he commanded, and returning after a few days absence with fabulous accounts of what he has seen as a spy in the Federal camps. He was detected at Manassas Junction—it being proved that these absences were occasioned by a visit to a French mistress whom he had concealed a few miles away.

MR. ANSON BURLINGAME, whose alcoholic speech in Paris showed how unfit he was to be trusted in any land where there was a free press, is to hide the disgrace of being rejected in Vienna by taking tea in China. He will do for the Celestials. Mr. Seward is very unfortunate in his foreign appointments. With the exception of Adams, Dayton and Marsh, they have all turned out addled egg-otists. We have yet to hear of Mr. Corwin in Mexico.

WAR NEWS FROM THE NORTH, EAST AND WEST.

WISCONSIN.—A Philadelphia paper says: "The Wisconsin regiment presents an appearance highly creditable to that young and patriotic State, both in the muscle and discipline of the men, and their comparatively perfect equipment. The superiority of their dress and equipment to that of the poor, defrauded Pennsylvania volunteers may be gathered from a little colloquy I overheard between the soldiers yesterday. One of them says,

"'I say, Gus, did you see them Wisconsin fellows this morning, down at the depot?'

"'Yes, I did; ain't they fixed up well though, and got good clothes on?'

"'That's a fact; they are not like the old things our fellows have to wear, that ain't fit for no decent man.'

"'There's Tom Brown, now, round the corner, drunk as blazes; and I don't wonder at it. He was a respectable man that wore good clothes at home as anybody but seein' how he's treated, he don't care a d—n for himself, he's only a common soldier, anyhow, and he takes what fun he can get.'

"Yes, gentlemen in authority, that's the way it works; degrade a man among his fellows and to himself, and you demoralise him.

"The Wisconsin boys are armed with the Minie rifle, and they are sharpshooters who know how to use that effective weapon.

"It is said that there are five lawyers, three doctors and two preachers in the ranks. The clarion voice of their martial-looking Colonel, Starkweather, will ring the knell of the traitors who get within rifle distance. The complete discipline of the regiment is evinced by the fact that, though the camp is in the suburbs of the town, not one soldier has been seen out of it, and all communication outside is strictly prohibited.

"General Patterson's command already numbers over 20,000 men, and has a good look for 30,000. The regiments have been re-brigaded."

ILLINOIS.—Orders have been received from the Government that the twelve regiments now organised in this State shall, on Tuesday, the 18th, rendezvous as follows: At Quincy, Cols. Smith's, Palmer's, Goode's, Scott's; at Alton, Cols. Ross's, Turner's, Marsh's, Heckers's; at Caseyville, Cols. Hyman's, Dougherty's, Mulligan's."

The correspondent of the Tribune, writing from Cairo on the 14th inst., says that Gen. Buckner, Commissioner from Kentucky, was here to day. He says that Kentucky intends to establish a grand encampment of State troops at Columbus. The Columbus people, he added, had no right to raise the Secession flag, and he had requested them not to do so again.

MICHIGAN.—This loyal State has sent its third regiment to Washington. It is from the Grand Rapids, and the material is excellent. An immense multitude of 15,000 men welcomed them at Detroit, and bade them good speed.

MISSOURI.—The treachery of Governor Jackson having been made apparent, General Lyon resolved to take possession of Jefferson City, and, consequently, on the afternoon of Saturday, 15th June, the Missouri Federal Volunteers entered the capitol of Missouri, but found the rebel Governor Jackson had fled. The citizens received the Federal troops as though they had been deliverers, which, in fact, they were, as the Secessionists had robbed and outraged the people to a frightful extent. So much so, that where there were a dozen Secessionists to one Unionist a month ago, there are now a dozen Unionists to one Secessionist. The whole city is now in possession of law and order. General Lyon is pursuing Governor Jackson, whom he threatens to hang.

CALIFORNIA, SAN FRANCISCO.—The dates from California are to the 29th. The Union feeling there is as strong as it is in Massachusetts and the Northern States.

On receipt of the intelligence of the call by the President for volunteers, measures were put on foot to raise a regiment of volunteers. Recently stations were opened, headquarters established and drill-rooms hired, where the primary steps of instruction were imparted to the recruits. This latter department was placed under the charge of Lieut. Hamilton, of the Third regiment of the regular Artillery; he was specially detailed for this service by Gen. Sumner. At the date of our intelligence there were enlisted in San Francisco five companies of fifty-four men each; in San Jose, one company, in Sacramento, two companies; and in Oroville and Nevada, each one company; all of which it is intended to fill up to the full complement of eighty men each, by the addition of squads enlisted in places where a full company cannot at present be raised. The entire press, Republican and Democratic, are unanimous in favor of the Union.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

ARKANSAS.—The Arkansas State Convention, which has been several weeks in session, has adjourned. The misunderstanding between General Bradley and the troops in the Eastern section has been referred to the Military Board of the State for adjudication. The Convention has suspended all sales under execution. General McCulloch has taken command of the Western forces, and has made requisitions for six regiments upon Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana and the Indian Territory. Albert Pike goes with him as Indian Commissioner. Colonel Thomas C. Hindman, late Member of Congress from Arkansas, has reached Memphis with a regiment of 800 Arkansas troops, on the way to Richmond. He acknowledges, in the Memphis Avalanche of June 10, the present of a Confederate silk flag from Mrs. Jefferson Davis, sent from New Orleans. He also complains bitterly of the State of Arkansas for not furnishing his regiment shoes and blankets.

The St. Louis Democrat says: "News has just arrived here of another murderous and horrible outrage by the Secessionists, perpetrated at Mound City, Arkansas, this week. An old, gray-headed man, aged over sixty years, a watchman on board of the steamer W. M. Morrison, tied up by the rebels at that place, let slip some Union sentiments in their presence. He was soon surrounded by ruffians, who told him they were going to hang him forthwith. The poor old man thought they were jesting, and said, 'Gentlemen, surely you don't mean what you say; I am a poor, old gray-headed man—always have worked hard, and made an honest living; surely you would not hang me for the expressions of my old honest heart.' The poor old man could not believe that the demons could perpetrate such a murder until he felt the rope round his neck. The end of the rope was thrown over the limb of a tree, and the demoniac crowd of devils pulled him up, struggling and dying, until dead. Several who were commanded to assist slunk away in horror and dread. All these deeds will soon be avenged. These men regard not even gray hairs, the sacred rights of families, or the tears and graves of widows and orphans. There is no doubt about this fact being true, as it came from an eye-witness."

THE ARKANSAS GOVERNOR AND LINCOLN.—A facetious account has been given of Governor Rector's response to Lincoln's demand for troops—"Nary one—see you d—d first." We find the genuine dispatch embodied in his Message to the Legislature, as follows:

"EXECUTIVE OFFICE, LITTLE ROCK, Ark., April 22, 1861.

"Hon. Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, Washington City, D. C.:

"In answer to your requisition for troops from Arkansas, to subjugate the Southern States, I have to say that none will be furnished. The demand is only adding insult to injury.

"The people of this Commonwealth are freemen, not slaves, and will defend to the last extremity their honor, lives and property against Northern mendacity and usurpation.

"HENRY M. RECTOR, Governor of Arkansas."

GEORGIA.—Governor Brown, of this State, seems laboring under some strange hallucination, for he says in a recent proclamation: "It is said our enemies exempt cotton from blockade. Why? Because they cannot do without it. I appeal to our planters, therefore, to refuse to ship a bag while the blockade lasts. This will soon remove the blockade from our ports, and the increase in price will amply reward you for the loss you may sustain while keeping your cotton on hand. I trust our people will hold public meetings and petition the Government at Montgomery to lay an embargo upon cotton, permitting not one bag to pass out of the Confederate States while the blockade is maintained." He concludes by urging all to grow wheat, and to be very economical. Persons who have recently come from Augusta and other parts of Georgia report that Georgia is very languid in the cause of Secession. Should the tide of war roll from North Carolina not a Georgian will fight. The slaves are already on the alert.

NORTH CAROLINA.—The Raleigh Standard says that when completed the contingent from North Carolina will amount to twenty thousand men. From reliable sources we hear at present there are only five regiments, none of which exceed six hundred men. The western and northern parts are by no means staunch in the cause.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—The Charleston press is especially severe upon the actions at Philippi and Fairfax Court House. They also complain that their own coasting boats supply the blockading squadron with fresh provisions. The want of ice is frightfully felt. The Charlestonians were aware of the capture of the Savannah privateer by the Perry, and call upon Jeff Davis to hang every Northerner in his power should the Federal authorities hang any of the pirates. Their indignation at England's conduct is very great. They were convinced she would do anything for cotton.

The following, from the Charleston Courier of the 8th inst., shows that that port is now effectually blockaded: "The sea front of our harbor was quite an object of interest among our citizens yesterday, there being in sight of our port at one time no less than four armed vessels. During the day a party went down in the steamer Charleston, and approached them as near as prudence would dictate. Of the four vessels off the port one of them is the Minnesota, which has been off this place over a week; near her was a large steam frigate, apparently of the first class, and, as seen about three miles off, a much more sightly vessel than the Minnesota. If not the Wabash, she is no doubt the Roanoke or Colorado. The two frigates were anchored quite near each other, and apparently expect to stay for a time. The other two vessels seen in the morning were steamships of about six hundred to one thousand tons, and were both vessels that had been merchantmen, but are now part of Lincoln's provisional forces. Soon after midday one of the latter had disappeared, no doubt gone South, and at three o'clock P. M. the second was working in the same direction. The boat seen astern of the Minnesota on Thursday was not in sight yesterday, but as vessels of that class are sometimes employed as tenders to a fleet, she may be one of that kind."

VIRGINIA, MANASSAS JUNCTION.—A Lynchburg paper says seventy-five negroes arrived from the South to work at the fortifications. A correspondent to the Republican (Lynchburg) adds: "I was told, coming from one of the parties engaged (the captain), that a party of scouts, seven in number, under Captain McKay, commanding an independent company, late of the United States service, met with four Federal cavalry, also scouts at Falls Church, and taking deliberate aim at the Federalists, fired, killing three instantly and wounding the fourth so badly that he had to cling to the neck of his horse as he ran. This happened in distinct view of the enemy's camp, supposed to be dragoons, about six miles from Alexandria. The rangers made good their escape, having only one shot fired after them. This came from the captain himself, and was told to Lieutenant K., of the Artillery, from whom I got the information."

The Norfolk Day Book furnishes us, accounts of military operations about Cape Henry. It says: "The steamer Quaker City captured a schooner off the Capes and carried her into the Roads. She returned about four o'clock that afternoon and opened fire upon the Princess Anne cavalry, stationed on Cape Henry Beach. She fired six shots at the quarters, none of which took effect, except in the pine trees. Some of the balls were picked up, one of which is a thirty-three pounder. The cavalry captain, John Fentress, is daily exposed to the fire of the steamer, but so far, fortunately, no one has been hurt. If our men now had one or two of those heavy ordnance, say long thirty-two pounders, mounted on large carryall wheels, as we have suggested and urged repeatedly for the last month or two, this steamer could easily be sunk from the position she takes to annoy our troops on the beach."

LYNCHBURG.—Lynchburg was completely surrounded by camps, and looked like a place besieged. There is the camp of instruction. Among the ranks are to be seen beardless boys side by side with the gray-headed. As a general thing they were well equipped, and provisions were plenty. It is true the latter command exorbitant prices, as for instance, beef twenty cents per pound, ham twenty-five cents, flour nineteen to twenty-five dollars per barrel, other articles in proportion. In every direction the planters were much discouraged at the ruin before them.

Our informant passed within fifteen miles of Manassas Junction, and says that there were at that point not more than fifteen thousand troops, who daily expected an attack by the Federal forces. General Beauregard was to have taken the command there, but it was thought he would be sent to Norfolk, and General Lee left in charge. The Virginians have every confidence in the military skill and judgment of the latter officer, but Jeff Davis, influenced by the South Carolinians, prefers Beauregard. General Beauregard was to issue a proclamation to the troops on Monday last. He had given it as his advice to evacuate Harper's Ferry and hold the Junction. The re-enforcement would enable them to withstand any attack the invaders might make.

There were about one thousand men at Leesburg. Passing through Frederick, Md., he found the Secession element, to his surprise, quite strong, as it was currently reported in Virginia that Maryland had been completely Abolitionised.

THE Richmond Enquirer contains the following proclamation from General Beauregard:

HEADQUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF ALEXANDRIA,
CAMP PICKENS, June 5, 1861.

A Proclamation—To the People of the Counties of Loudoun, Fairfax and Prince William.

A reckless and unprincipled tyrant has invaded your soil. Abraham Lincoln, regardless of all moral, legal and constitutional restraints, has thrown his Abolition hosts among you, who are murdering and imprisoning your citizens, confiscating and destroying your property, and committing other acts of violence and outrage too shocking and revolting to humanity to be enumerated.

All rules of civilised warfare are abandoned, and they proclaim by their acts if not on their banners, that their war-cry is "Beauty and Booty." All that is dear to man—your honor and that of your wives and daughters—your fortunes and your lives are involved in this momentous contest.

In the name, therefore, of the constituted authorities of the Confederate States—in the sacred cause of constitutional liberty and self-government, for which we are contending—in behalf of civilization itself, I, G. T Beauregard, Brigadier-General of the Confederate States, commanding at Camp Pickens, Manassas Junction, do make this my Proclamation, and invite and enjoin you by every consideration dear to the hearts of freemen and patriots, by the name and memory of your Revolutionary fathers, and by the purity and sanctity of your domestic firesides, to rally to the standard of your State and country, and by every means in your power, compatible with honorable warfare, to drive back and expel the invaders from your land.

I conjure you to be true and loyal to your country and her legal and constitutional authorities, and especially to be vigilant of the movements and acts of the enemy, so as to enable you to give the earliest authentic information at these headquarters, or to the officers under my command.

I desire to assure you that the utmost protection in my power will be given to you all.

(Signed) G. T. BEAUREGARD,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

Official—THOMAS JORDAN, Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

The following is from a letter written from Manassas Junction to the Richmond Whig, under date of June 3.

"There are of course a thousand rumors in circulation here, but none sufficiently authentic to justify their transmission to your paper. General orders yesterday announced that General Beauregard had assumed command at this point. Some five or six prisoners of war, taken near Fairfax Court House, have been brought here.

"We are drilled pretty hard for this warm weather, but manage to endure it. The commissary stores are bad, but perhaps this is unavoidable at present.

"The real evil, however, and one easily corrected, is the working day and night in digging trenches and throwing up fortifications of dirt by men unaccustomed to labor. In cold weather it might be stood, but in hot weather the result is already seen in quadrupling the sick list.

"The volunteers have seen in the newspapers that many wealthy gentlemen have tendered their negroes for these labors, and they know that there are thousands of free negroes who might be so employed. I really believe that if this state of things continues ten days, there will be at least one fifth of the force here on the sick list or dead, for we have no real hospital here, and medicine is as scarce in the surgical department as money is in the camp. Besides this, it is difficult to get water enough to drink, and even officers cannot get it. Water is guarded and given out as provisions are given out. These are absolute facts. Cleanliness is essential to recovery from camp diseases, and without water cleanliness is impossible, especially in warm weather. On this very day some forty sick had to be sent to Culpepper Court House."

FORTRESS MONROE.—General Butler has asked for more men, and fifteen more regiments are to be sent forthwith, thus increasing his force to about 27,000 men. Its ultimate service is doubtless to advance upon Richmond, or else to retake Norfolk. The large rifled cannon just received from Washington has been placed upon the Rip-Raps, which are only three miles from Sewall's Point. Their range will be tried in a few days. The Union Gun, the monster cannon from Baltimore, will be mounted near the Floyd Gun. These cannons' mouths, like murder, though they have no tongue, will speak with most miraculous organ. Miss Dix took an advance guard of Nightingales (nurses) to Fortress Monroe on the 15th.

Capt. H. E. Davis, son of Judge Davis, Lieut. Charles H Seaman and Dr. Martin, of Col. Duryea's regiment, on Thursday, the 13th, entered the enemy's lines with a flag of truce, and went to within half a mile of Yorktown. They saw a formidable battery at Great Bethel, but were not allowed to examine the works, and from there to Yorktown were conducted by bridle paths. They were escorted by a sergeant and four troopers, who met them at New Market bridge, three miles from Hampton, to which point the Secession pickets now extend. They were courteously treated by Col. J. B. Magruder, who commanded at Great Bethel. There was a large encampment of cavalry at Yorktown, and the place was being strongly fortified. There are also batteries between Great Bethel and Yorktown.

MARYLAND.—The elections have been altogether in favor of the Union candidates, but the leniency with which such malignants as Ross Winans has been treated disgusts the Union men, whose zeal outruns their discretion. They should remember that this is not a war for Abolition, although it may end in it if the South is blind to consequences, but to preserve the Union. Winter Davis was rejected solely on account of his personal unpopularity. He is, however, to be consoled by the Mission to Austria.

Baltimore has still some Plug Uglies left. As two soldiers of Col. Moorhead's regiment were walking the streets they were fired at from a house, corner of Lombard and Gough streets. The house was searched, but the party escaped. The house ought to have been levelled to the ground.

MISSISSIPPI.—We may get some idea of what Secession has done for this State from the following letter: "Destruction is sure as the sun rises, yet we are helpless. Our property, that one year since would have been valued at over $100,000, could not now be sold at any price. There is no money among us. Our merchants and mechanics are doing nothing. Provisions are stopped from above, and I am truly apprehensive that starvation will be upon us. Many have enlisted for a support. Every man and boy is a soldier, and are drilling daily.

"Great uneasiness and alarm is felt from our peculiar institution, but I must say I have seen no indications of uneasiness among the slaves. They seem as cheerful and dutiful as ever, and mine never seemed more devoted to us than now. Times are so very hard that mine earn me very little, and I am fearful they will earn me less. The sober, thinking part of community begin to think we are to have desperate times, and perhaps to be subjugated at last. Of one thing I feel assured, that we are gaining nothing by Secession.

"Our crops look fine. My corn is shooting; potatoes fully grown and plenty. What I am raising will be ample for my family, unless my negroes come home for want of employment, and the suffering people do not rob me, which I fear, provided times do not improve. Provisions will be extremely scarce and high, and the laboring class can get no employment; they must live, and will not starve if it is in the country.

"We have just begun to feel the effects of the blockade. Provisions are rising, and I am now informed we are to have no more from above.

"I have no means, if I had the mind to move. I cannot collect one dollar in a thousand due me."

FLORIDA, PENSACOLA.—The correspondent of the Mobile Advertiser has the following in its Pensacola letter: "Another large steamer arrived in the fleet this morning, June 6, about four o'clock. She is probably the vessel that sailed from New York last week with rifled cannon, troops, &c., for Fort Pickens. There were eleven vessels, of all sail, in the squadron yesterday. This morning I missed a sloop-of-war that had been lying for a week near the frigate Sabine. She has probably gone to the Mississippi's mouth, or to Mobile, to swap ducks a while. There are now in sight four small steamers of the United States. They come and go—somewhere."

Business is so bad at Mobile, that the Advertiser and Commercial have become one concern.

The Richmond, Va., Enquirer of the 9th inst. says: "Colonel W. E. Starke, who has been connected with the army at Pensacola for three months past, left that post on the 1st inst., and arrived in Richmond yesterday. He reports General Bragg in good health and fine spirits, and the army well supplied, and in admirable condition every way. General Bragg is confident that when he attempts to take Fort Pickens the effort will be successful."

TENNESSEE.—The Memphis Bulletin has the following atrocious article: "To those of our people who entertain apprehensions of danger, we have to say that all fears are groundless. Our climate would protect us without a single soldier. Suppose Memphis captured. We can furnish deserters with the yellow fever within twenty days. We might poison our cisterns and put our enemies upon river water, and in less than a week they would have small alligators crawling through them; cholera would furnish an elysium compared with the delights of a vertical sun and the turbid waters of the Father of Floods." This is the very delirium tremens of war.

The same paper (June 8th) says:

"Including the forces at Fort Wright, there are now within one hundred miles of Memphis, Arkansas, Mississippi and Tennessee, on the four railroads converging at this point, not less than fifty thousand men, and under arms, ready to march to the defence of this city at a moment's notice.

"The military fortifications of this city are progressing rapidly. A battery has been erected at the mouth of Wolf River; a redoubt is in the course of erection on the levee in front of the Bradley block, wherein several Dahlgren guns, with others, ten in number, will be placed. Then the bluff has been barricaded with cotton bales and plank, and it is understood that every street below Jefferson, as far down as Beale, is to be barricaded. Thus our thoroughfares are growing smaller by degrees and beautifully less.

"It is suggested by many that it would be safer for our fair city, in the improbable event of invasion, that all the roads leading to it, some miles from town, were fortified rather than the city itself. Everybody admits that our safety is out of the question when it becomes necessary to use these fortifications now being erected in our midst."

TEXAS.—Misery makes strange couch sharers. From the New Orleans Crescent we learn that the Texans are rejoicing over the prospect of making a treaty with those wretched savages the Indians. It says:

"After taking possession of Fort Arbuckle, it was garrisoned by a company of Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, under Captain McKinney. Fort Ouachita was garrisoned by the Dead-shot Rangers, under Captain Mayberry.

"Mr. Peel also informs us that the Chickasaws held a council on the 24th of May, and formally dissolved their connection with the United States Government, and issued a manifesto to the Choctaws, Creeks, Cherokees and Seminoles, and to the Reserve Indians, advising them to secede from the Old Union, and to petition the Southern Confederacy to be received as a distinct organized Territory, instead of an Indian Territory. The friendly Indians are all in favor of it." They had ordered off all the Yankee missionaries in the country. The Indians also took up two Abolitionists from Northern Texas, one of whom was a preacher, and hung them. The forts were all to be garrisoned in twenty days, in accordance with a treaty made with the Reserve Indians. Mr. Peel further states, in illustration of the spirit of the Texas troops, that within forty-eight hours after the news came across the border that the Kansas bandit, Montgomery, was coming down, there were 10,000 men under arms, who started immediately to meet him. He says that instead of there being any Abolitionists in Northern Texas, the people are unanimous for fighting, and all classes, including preachers, were eager for the fray."

LOUISIANA.—The New Orleans Crescent of June 5 hopes that the appointment of General Twiggs to the chief command at that station will have the good effect of putting an end to the plunder. Indeed, from its lamentations, not even our Albany lobby could be more corrupt than is the Southern one. The Crescent says, anent the blockade of New Orleans by the Brooklyn: "The commander of the Brooklyn has been graciously pleased to allow until the 9th inst. for outward-bound vessels, with foreign property, to proceed to sea. The military and marine defences of Louisiana ought to have been in a better position at this time than to allow one solitary steamer to dictate terms to the Southern Confederacy. Three months ago it was resolved to blockade the Southern ports. There ought to have been a sufficient force within the military department of Louisiana to have blown this Brooklyn out of water on her first appearance."

KENTUCKY.—It has become quite evident to the Union men in Kentucky that Governor Magoffin intends to use the Home Guard, when occasion requires, to aid the rebellion. Under this knowledge the Louisville battery last week voted almost unanimously to disband, and the commandant advises the men not to deliver up their arms or uniforms, but to keep them until they can use them in defence of the Union. Two military companies in Lexington have also left the State Guard, for the reasons above mentioned. The Governor insists that the "sacred soil of Kentucky" shall not be invaded by Federal forces for the protection of the Government, but when General Pillow sends rebels into the State to "pollute the sacred soil," the Governor "can't see it." The great trouble seems to be the conduct of the Governor.

ALABAMA.—Hon. R. H. Smith, in a speech at Selma, Ala., on the 4th inst., exhorted the people to take as much of the loan as possible, and stated that the simple feeding and clothing of the army of the Confederate States now costs $30,000 per day, to which amount must be added the whole immense cost of the civil Administration. He informed his hearers that not a dollar could be obtained from abroad, that the necessary amount could not possibly be raised by taxation at home, and that if the people would not contribute by loan the means of meeting the tremendous and constantly increasing expenses, the Government must perish even in its infancy.

In Mobile, and no doubt in many Southern cities, another expedient is resorted to for the replenishment of the exhausted treasury. The Mobile Register calls upon all the married women and widows, and maidens and little girls to step forward for the relief of the Government. It appeals to them to give up their little pin-money, their diamonds, their ear-rings, their finger-rings and all the other personal ornaments they have, to be turned into money for the carrying on of the war. And in the Richmond (Va.) papers, a Virginia matron, a worthy and excellent woman no doubt, earnestly asks all her sex to sacrifice their silver plate, their watches, their sofas, their costly furniture of all descriptions, everything, in fine, that they can spare, to aid in the payment of the half million of dollars, more or less, per day.

Mexico.—Dates from Vera Cruz, Mexico, are to the 28th ult. The news generally is unfavorable to the cause of law and order. There was a want of harmony between Congress and the Government, and it is asserted that Juarez, despairing of success in his attempts to ameliorate the condition of the country, had determined to resign and retire. Another change of Ministry had taken place, the following being now in office: Foreign Relations, Leon Guzman; Justice, Joaquin Ruiz; War, General Zaragoza. Don Francisco Verduzco was named for the Finance Department, but Congress refused to confirm the appointment, and the post had not been filled. A number of papers in the capital are making a great outcry against the Government for its alleged intention to demand extraordinary powers from Congress. The Church partisan leaders in the field grow bolder every day. Zuloaga, of eventful memory, is positively in the field, and up to the 14th was threatening Toluca, which is only a day's march from the capital. Marquez had actually entered Queretaro, but retired before Governor Arteaga. The Government troops were almost in a state of mutiny everywhere, being badly paid and fed, and numerous desertions in large squads from the garrisons of Mexico City and other important places were of daily occurrence. These men either join the Church faction or become marauders on their own hook. Discontent among the people was general, and even in the capital many articles of prime necessity were not to be had. The Vera Cruz papers say that "frightful misery" reigns throughout the land.

QUESTIONS FOR ACTORS.—Can a man be said to work when he plays? or to be a sound man when he is continually in pieces?

COLONEL DURYEA'S ZOUAVE REGIMENT FERRIED OVER HAMPTON CREEK BY THE NAVAL BRIGADE, BEFORE DAYBREAK, ON THE 10TH OF JUNE, EN ROUTE TO ATTACK THE SECESSION FORCES AT LITTLE BETHEL, VA.

THE BATTLE AT PHILIPPI, VA., BETWEEN THE FEDERAL TROOPS UNDER THE COMMAND OF COLONEL DUMONT, SUPPORTED BY COLONEL KELLY AND COLONEL LANDER, AND THE SECESSION TROOPS UNDER THE COMMAND OF LIEUTENANT-COLONEL PORTERFIELD.—SEE PAGE 86.

GENERAL GEORGE CADWALLADER.

THE excellent soldier is the son of Brigadier-General T. Cadwallader, and has, from his earliest youth, placed himself to a military life. Descended from a warrior family, in whose veins for ver runs the blood of soldiers, he quotes one of their bards, his instincts are those of a soldier. After passing through the usual routine of military study with great credit, he was first engaged in actual service in Mexico, where he commanded the Eleventh and Fourteenth regiments, infantry and volunteers. He particularly distinguished himself on the 8th September, 1847, in the battle of Molino del Rey. He was made a Major-General for his gallantry at Chapultepec on the 13th September, 1847.

On the field of battle there is no more brilliant officer than the Illustrious man who is now at the head of a gallant brigade, carrying law and order into the "sacred soil," but he is too honest and fearless to deal with the masked batteries of lying tongues and traitorous deeds. He is a true soldier, and knows what to do. The Stars and Stripes will be nobly led by one of the heroes of Chapultepec.

CAPTAIN ROGER JONES.

THIS gallant officer, who, as Lieutenant in command of the Arsenal at Harper's Ferry, took the responsibility of destroying the arms and munitions of war at that place, is the son of the late General Roger Jones, for many years Adjutant-General of the United States Army. He is a Virginian, as are most of his relatives. He has brothers in the army and navy, and one brother, a physician, in this city. He graduated at West Point, in 1834, and is not yet thirty years of age. Colonel Leo, who is in command of the Virginian troops, who were on the march to Harper's Ferry when the Arsenal was fired, is not only a relative, but the former friend and instructor of Captain Jones at West Point; a man to whom, until his treachery, the Captain had looked up for counsel and advice. His brothers and relatives, except those in the city, are supposed to be in the present struggle. He keenly felt this defection, but finds consolation in his duties under the flag of his country.

While in command at Harper's Ferry, he received a warning from General Scott to be on his guard. Further than this he received no instructions, and acted entirely upon his own judgment. He received secret information, unknown to all but himself and his informant, that Virginia had seceded, and that Colonel Lee was marching towards him. Immediately quantities of powder were placed in the soldiers' mattresses, which were distributed about the buildings. His men split kindling-wood and piled upon them, and otherwise prepared them for the torch. He had only forty-nine men with him. The approach of the enemy was made known by a mounted rifle sentinel, until Captain Jones thought they were near enough. He then ordered the commandant to be set on fire, and seeing his pistols, ready by on his table, gave the order to depart. As they started, Captain Jones, who had been had gone out, and he returned and relighted it with his own hand. Before he got out of hearing, however, yells and curses were loud and frequent as the traitors realized their disappointment. Neither Captain Jones nor his men knew the route they were to take; they knew not their destination. They started at half-past two o'clock A.M., and marched all night through mud and water. At Hagerstown, where they expected a train for the train, they did not dare to wait until they had been, but hurried on to Pennsylvania. When they left Harper's Ferry, the traitors were only about fifteen minutes behind them, and they were obliged to leave everything except what they had on their persons. Captain Jones has not yet recovered from the fatigue and hardships of his journey. Government has rewarded his gallantry by promoting him to the rank of Captain.

MAJOR JOHN A. CREGIER OF THE NEW YORK FIRE ZOUAVES.

THE well-known and popular veteran fireman, now Major John A. Cregier, of the Fire Zouaves, had a narrow escape from the Secession troops shortly after the occupation of Alexandria. While riding along the outposts he came to a picket, making inquiries of some people he met, when Lieut. Colonel Connolly towards the enemy's lines. The latter found himself surrounded by a number of Secession pickets, and despite his coolness and presence, decked away in the opposite direction. He was hotly pursued, but his high-spirited steed soon bore him out of the reach of his pursuers and into the lines of the Federal troops. For a brief space during the pursuit a brisk interchange of shots took place, but without any fatal result. Major Cregier has determined to limit his solitary rambles to within his own lines, rightly judging that the only legitimate reason for risking life is the service of his country.

THE BATTLE AT PHILIPPI.

WHEN it was known that the Secessionists were in force at Philippi, measures were taken to attack and drive them out.

The programme laid down was for Colonel Kelley's command to surprise Philippi by way of Beverly turnpike. Colonel Lander, Aid to General McClellan, was to attack von Wetzler at precisely four o'clock A.M. Kelley's column had a march of twenty-two miles to make; that of Colonels Dumont, Steadman and Crittenden, led by Col. Lander, thirteen miles.

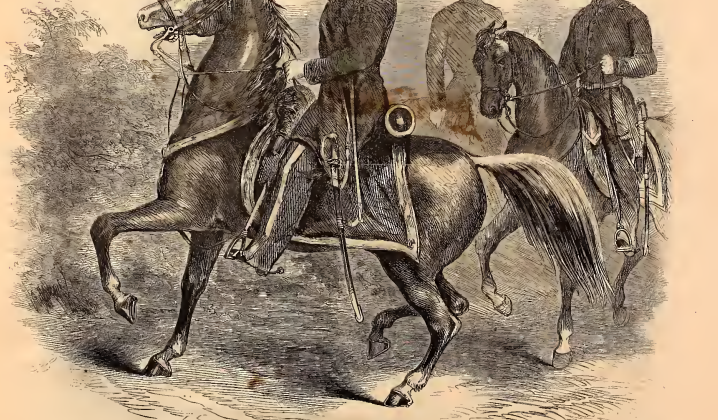
A heavy storm arose during the night, which impeded and distressed the men—some of whom fainted—on the march to reach Philippi at the appointed time. Colonel Lander's division reached the last two miles in one hour and a quarter, relieved promptly on time, and halted some time, expecting to hear from Kelley. But it appears that gallant officer, after pushing on through the storm and darkness during many hours, mistook the road, and entered Philippi by a side road, instead of the Beverly pike.

Meantime the rebel camp was alarmed by messengers from an adjoining farm-house. Colonel Lander, perceiving the certainty of the escape of the rebels, ordered an advance. The artillery opened on the rebels before any were seen. Then, Colonel Dumont took the turnpike bridge across the river and the town at double quick step. The artillery followed on, soon managed by a detachment from Colonel Barnett's Ohio regiment artillery, who were much praised for their efficiency. By this time Colonel Kelley had arrived, and attacked the rear of the rebels. Colonel Lander now rode alone to meet his son Kelley, but just as he met him he was fired on, and rebel brought Kelley down by a shot through the lungs. Lander at once charged among the enemy and cleared the rebels out of the town at a fence, where he guarded him until the infantry came up. As unsuccessful charges was made by a few of the rebels to rescue their prisoner. On Kelley's men arriving they were determined to capture the prisoner, but were prevented by Colonel Lander, against their urgent remonstrances. The Quartermaster of the Virginia regiment took charge of him, becoming responsible for his safety. Colonel Lander maintained that the man had thrown down his arms and yielded himself to him as a prisoner of war, that if he had killed Kelley he would have done it in actual fight, and after our troops had commenced the engagement, and that he should protect Kelley with his life.

Colonel Lander now rode back and brought up Colonel Dumont's regiment, which pursued the enemy vigorously and until they were utterly demoralized. The other troops scattered about the town and captured four-and-twenty-five hundred stand of arms—new rifles—forty horses, several wagons, important prisoners, valuable papers and maps, provisions, camp equipage, &c. Sixteen of the enemy were killed—that many dead bodies being found—and many were wounded and disabled.

It is said that the march of Colonel Kelley's command during the night was terrible. His attack was unprecedented, and the greatest credit is due him for his conduct for the gallant manner in which they engaged and put the enemy to flight. The reconnaissance in advance of Colonel Dumont's column, by the experienced Ranger officer who aided that Commander, and who, indeed, enabled it to reach the town and take up its position in order for battle unseen.

Colonel Lander tells an amusing incident of the Secessionist of the spirit that governs the Virginia women. As he was at the head of the troops, riding down the road, reconnoitering, he came to a house by the roadside, where the women of it was up, pious, Yankee-like, by began to question her about the number of Secessionists in the neighborhood. She wanted to have what she so bountifully lied. He replied by asking if she supposed he would be in that neighborhood if he did not want to join the Secessionists. He learned from her that the rebels had no artillery. Before he returned from his reconnoissance of the town of Philippi the woman had discovered her mistake, and had a pistol in hand for him, which she discharged at him, without any damage, however. He took off his hat and bowed to her, and begged her not to shoot at his men, as they would kill her. Just then the advance of his reconnoitering party came up, when he ordered a couple of them to seize the woman's son, a lad of about seventeen, to prevent him informing the enemy of their approach. The boy was immediately seized, when the mother came at them with an axe and the fury of a savage, and they had to let the boy go to defend themselves, when he took to the woods and was seen not to night. As the main body of troops marched by she fired her pistol at them also, but without effect, her door receiving its return some half dozen rifle-ball perforations, to remind her that shooting was a dangerous business.



BREVET MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE CADWALLADER, OF PENNSYLVANIA, COMMANDING THE FIRST DIVISION OF THE FEDERAL ARMY, NOW AT CHAMBERSBURG, PA.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

GENERAL BRAXTON BRAGG, COMMANDER OF THE SOUTHERN ARMY BEFORE FORT PICKENS.

GENERAL BRAXTON BRAGG was born in North Carolina, and was educated at West Point, being a Cadet in 1815. He was brevetted Captain in 1836, for gallant conduct in defence of Fort Brown. In September, 1846, he was brevetted Major for gallant conduct in several actions at Monterey, and was made Lieutenant-Colonel for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista, on the 23d of February, 1847. It was in this action that he stopped the charge of the Mexican cavalry, and it was to him that General Taylor addressed the well-known sentence, "A little more grape, Captain Bragg." He is a resident of Louisiana, where he owns a large sugar plantation.

He is now in command of the Confederate army before Fort Pickens, directing the operations for the reduction of that strong fortification. He is esteemed by military men as more remarkable for vigor and determination than for strategical skill.

THE CAMP AT NEWPORT NEWS.

THE camp at Newport News is rapidly assuming a position of great importance. Regiment after regiment is detailed to that place, until now the force amounts to several thousand. There, with the camp at Hampton and the large force at Fortress Monroe, will, it is rumored, form an army to march shortly on towards Richmond, to support the other columns which from various points will concentrate upon the capital of Virginia. These supporters, of course, are the main body of the army, and the fact that the position is deemed one of first importance is evidenced in the number of troops detailed to it, and the arms, with of the intrenched camps and batteries erected and in the course of erection. The monstrous columbiads recently sent from Fort Monroe are now mounted in position at Newport News, and will be found formidable both as a means of attack and defence. The intrenchments are made on the most scientific principles, reflecting the greatest credit upon the energy and perseverance of the men and the engineering skill of the officers. The ditch in advance of the breastwork is wide and deep, and is commanded by pieces of brass ordnance at the angles. Colonel Phelps, of the Vermont Regiment, is in immediate command of Newport News, under the control of General Butler.

SEWALL'S POINT.

This spot, which has become famous from its actions with our naval flotilla, forms an extreme point of the promontory on which Norfolk stands, and is opposite nearly midway between Fortress Monroe and Newport News. Its exact strength is, of course, a secret to us, but there is no question it is very considerable, since the stores found at the Navy Yard were ample for that purpose. It has also been supplied with rifled cannon from the foundries now in full blast at Richmond. The width of the channel here, however, renders Sewall's Point of little importance as an offensive position, its only value being as a defence against any landing of the Federal troops in advancing upon Norfolk.

PIG'S POINT.

This is situated at the entrance of Nansemond River, and was lately attacked by Captain Faunce in the Harriet Lane, without any practical result. It is said to be well manned, and to be armed with heavy guns; but it will be remembered that in an action of nearly three hours with the above mentioned vessel, which was within range of its guns, only two shots were effective, the others either falling short or passing over. Like Sewall's Point, its only value is in a defensive point of view. About twelve miles from the entrance of Nansemond River is Suffolk, the chief town of Nansemond county, and on the direct line of the Norfolk and Richmond Railroad.

GOVERNOR SPRAGUE, OF RHODE ISLAND.

Among the earnest and patriotic men of the Union, there is no man more truly and earnestly patriotic than Governor Sprague, of the gallant and chivalrous little State of Rhode Island. He was among the very first to bestir himself in the cause of the Union. He entered into it with a determination which nothing could daunt, and from that moment to the present time his activity has been restless and unceasing.

He is now with the Rhode Island regiment at the seat of War. With his men his popularity is unbounded, and his return to the camp was a scene of the greatest enthusiasm and excitement. We have little doubt that Governor Sprague will be heard of honorably in the future operations of the army.

BATTERY LINCOLN,

Erected by the Federal Troops on Santa Rosa Island, Pensacola Bay.

In order to strengthen the position of Fort Pickens Major Brown, in command of that fortification, has caused several strong batteries to be erected upon the Island of Santa Rosa, which render all attempt at storming the position quite impracticable. Our illustration represents the interior of a new work called Battery Lincoln. It contains four eight-inch sea-coast howitzers, and is situated about six hundred yards from Fort Pickens, on the north side of Santa Rosa Island, nearly opposite the Navy Yard, which it commands. It is built of sand, and riveted with pine logs. The magazine, guarded by a door in the centre of the battery, is constructed in the traverse separating the second and third guns. It is a work of considerable strength, and will prove an effective work for offensive or defensive operations.

THE SAVANNAH,

A Privateer of the Southern Confederacy.

The first privateer, bearing a commission from the Government of Jeff. Davis, which has ventured to leave a Southern port was captured on the 2d inst. by the United States brig Perry, and arrived at this port on the 15th, in charge of Midshipman McCook and a prize crew from the United States steam frigate Minnesota. She is a small schooner, pilot-rigged, named the Savannah, and is said to have been owned by one McDonald, a pilot, formerly in the employ of Spofford, Tileston & Co.'s line. She was only thirty-six hours out of Charleston when she was captured, but meantime she had herself taken the brig Joseph, of Rockland, Maine, with a cargo of molasses from Cuba, bound to Philadelphia, and sent her into Georgetown, South Carolina. Her captain was detained as a prisoner on board the pirate craft, and was with her when she was captured by the Perry. The pirate crew consisted of twenty-two men, who, with one exception, are in irons on board of the United States frigate Minnesota. One of the number, who hails from New York, and asserts that he was impressed into the service, was sent here with the vessel. She was well armed, having an eighteen pounder on a swivel stationed amidships, a large quantity of small arms, such as sabres, pistols, muskets, dirks, bayonets, &c., on board, with a full magazine, and provisions and water for a two weeks' cruise. She was surrendered to the custody of the United States Marshal. She lies off the Battery, with the Secession flag flying underneath the Stars and Stripes, and attracts much attention.

AMERICAN IMPROVEMENTS

In Implements of War.

Since the French Revolution, almost every great campaign in Europe has resulted in some improvement in the art of war. Dickenson's steam gun and the effective engine just invented by McCarty, of this city, which, by centrifugal force, projects, with much precision, a deadly shower of 180 balls per minute to a distance of more than 1,000 yards, are among the numerous American improvements which will be tested during the present war, and, if they fulfil expectations, may modify the character and abridge the duration of the existing struggle.

Mr. Taylor, an ingenious mechanic of Roxbury, Massachusetts, has just invented a self-igniting fuse, which may, perhaps, come into extensive use, and prove of the highest importance for military purposes. He claims that the fuse is not affected by any conditions of the atmosphere, and ignites as readily under the water as in the air. It is not dependent upon friction or concussion for the generating of fire, but the time when this is produced may be calculated in advance, and may be set at five seconds or five hours, at the option of the operator. The many advantages of this invention will at once be obvious. It may be used in bombs, and their explosion regulated with certainty and accuracy, and secured against accident or contingency. It will produce explosions in a fort after its evacuation at any time desired. It may be operated under the keels of vessels in the water as surely as on land—and in this connection its utility in the explosion of sunken vessels or rocks in harbors will at once suggest itself.

Mr. Taylor is known as the inventor of an explosive mixture, a description of which, in 1851, he read in a paper before the Royal Dublin Scientific Society. Being put into use by the Russian Government against the Baltic fleet in its late war, it also was found in the Malakoff Tower by the French when they entered after its assault; but being dependent upon friction, and indicated by flags, which the Russians had placed to guard their own soldiers, it was removed before explosion.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

Napoleon was no dancer. On one occasion a ball was given him, in honor of one of his great victories. The temptation to dance with a certain countess, however, was irresistible. At it the conquering General went, and succeeded about as well as a horse-marine. He had no taste for light, fantastic movements. At the close of the dance he turned to his partner and thus addressed her: "I am very sensible, charming Countess, that I have acquitted myself indifferently; but the fact is, my 'forte' lies not so much in dancing myself as in making others dance."

The roulette-table of Wiesbaden—that fruitful source of disputes between gentlemen who are given to large profits as well as quick returns—has again been the occasion of a duel of truly German character. The offended party, being an invalid, actually insisted upon going through the campaign that was to follow the challenge while sitting in an easy chair. This arrangement saved the bed-ridden challenger from the trouble of falling to the ground; his opponent managing to shoot him through the head, the chair of the combatant proved his bier.

Singular Dream.—There was a curious circumstance connected with the case of John Ham, burnt to death at Dedham by his clothes catching fire from his pipe, and who, we learn, was the brother of Mr. Ham, carpenter, of Moulsham. At the inquest a gentleman residing at Dedham stated to the coroner that many years ago he had a dream of Ham's death by an event similar to that which had actually occurred; and that, knowing the man, he had felt it his duty to relate it to him, and caution him as to his mode of life, which he had frequently done; and that he only recently again reminded him of his dream.

Monster Egg.—The captain of a vessel trading to Madagascar one day observed a native using a vase which much resembled an egg, and, upon examination it proved to be one. The native eventually produced some enormous fossil eggs, from the interior of the island, and some fossil bones of a bird. The largest of these eggs is equal in bulk to six ostrich eggs, or 148 eggs of the common hen, and will hold two gallons of water. M. St. Hilaire, who described these marvellous eggs and bones in a report to the French Académie des Sciences, proposed the name of "Æpiornis" for the monster bird that laid the monster egg.

The fascinating but very fast-dancing Pepita was too much for the prudery of the Copenhagen moralists who visit the Casino Theatre, and they received her with a charivari truly continental. Pepita the Great stood her ground on tiptoe, and looked so provokingly fascinating at the claque that their hearts relented, and were as suddenly taken with a fire of enthusiasm for the petitoes of Pepita.

Presence of Mind.—On some occasions we are mournfully reminded of the name of "Presence of Mind," bestowed on a late dignitary of the Church in consequence of a story told of him by himself. "A friend," he used to relate, "invited me to go out with him on the water. The sky was threatening, and I declined. At length he succeeded in persuading me, and we embarked. A squall came on, the boat lurched and my friend fell overboard. Twice he sank and twice he rose to the surface. He placed his hands on the prow, and endeavored to climb in. There was great apprehension lest he should upset the boat. Providentially I had brought my umbrella with me. I had the presence of mind to strike him two or three hard blows over the knuckles—he let go his hold and sank. The boat righted itself, and we were saved!" Such "presence of mind" is, happily, by no means universal. We have heard a story of another Dean, who has left behind him a race of sons chivalrous as himself, who, on a raw and gusty day in December, and at the advanced age of seventy, leaped into a canal to save a drowning person.

The Bank of France, and several other establishments, recently discovered that many of the napoleons they received had been fraudulently reduced in value by scooping out part of the inside, and filling up the hollow with lead or brass. The perpetrators of this fraud first sawed off the head side of the piece, then hollowed out the inside, till only a mere pellicle of gold remained, and afterwards filled up the interior as stated. They then put on the head again, and so cleverly as to leave scarcely any mark on the edge. The police are endeavoring to discover the guilty parties.

A Pillar of Burning Gas.—Near the Featherstone station, about three miles and a half from Pontefract, and five miles and a half from Wakefield, boring for coal has been in progress for some time, and has reached a depth of one hundred and forty yards from the surface. At this depth the boring was advancing through a thick layer of blue sandstone, which overlies the coal-bearing strata throughout a wide area in that district. On Saturday, April 13th, while the borers were at work, a strong smell of gas was perceived, and suddenly an eruption took place which threw the muddy water from the borehole about thirty feet into the air. This continued, and put an end to the boring. Subsequently, some one applied a light to the gas, which then formed a fiery pillar of considerable height, such as would be formed by igniting the gas that would issue from a broken street main through a hole in the soil above it containing water. The gas has continued burning ever since it was lighted, but with a gradual diminishing flame, and it now ascends to about five feet above the level of the water.

The artesian wells in Venice, from which, at one time, water was expected in sufficient abundance and of such quality as to supply the wants of the city, have utterly failed to fulfil the purposes for which they were designed. Some of the wells have ceased to flow, others have given far less than they did at first, and the water of all has been found to contain from twice to three times the quantity of substances in solution, besides gas, of either river or rain water. The municipality of Venice are, therefore, obliged to seek from other sources the water necessary for the supply of the population.

A return from the War Office states that in the last financial year Enfield factory turned out 99,443 musket rifles (pattern 1853), made by machinery complete, and that the expenditure of the factory for the year was £216,055.

A few weeks ago the Marquis de Montmerillon entered a carriage on the St. Etienne railway, and a person in it would not move to allow him to reach a seat. As a return for this rudeness the Marquis began smoking a cigar, without asking the other if his doing so would inconvenience him. The person in an offensive manner desired the marquis to leave off smoking, and, as the latter refused, threatened to throw him out of the window. The marquis took no notice of the threat, and the passenger knocked the cigar out of his mouth. On that the marquis flung open the door of the carriage, and did what the other had threatened—threw him out on the line! As the train was going at a rapid rate, the chances were ten to one that the man would have been much hurt, if not killed; but, strange to say, he fell to the ground without sustaining any material injury. Getting up he shook his fist at the marquis, but the latter quietly responded by throwing out the man's cloak, which had remained on the seat.

The other day we heard the following astounding narration from a son of the deep, and, remarkable as it is, we give it credence, on the ground that the narrator was himself an eye-witness of the singular scene. Somewhere about longitude 70 E. and latitude 35 S., the crew of a homeward-bound East India merchantman caught what was supposed to be a large basking shark (selache maxima) a species very rare in the Indian Ocean. On pulling it on deck it was struck on the head repeatedly with a marline-spike, and when supposed dead its mouth was gagged and the tail chopped off. It was then opened up, and the heart and liver plucked out. After lying for about an hour on deck the animal was heaved overboard, and on gaining its native element (although its liver and heart were simmering in the cook's copper) it revived, and swam away with its usual vigor, apparently unaware of the loss it had sustained.

The following is an extract from a letter dated Pesth, May 9th: "It was unrequited love that drove Count Teleki to commit suicide. He was madly enamored of a beautiful Hungarian lady of very high rank, who spurned his addresses. He was specially impelled to the rash act by the frank avowal of the lady that her aversion to him arose from horror of his political principles. 'She would never,' she told him, 'give her hand to a traitor.' A few hours after the wretched man blew out his brains."

A new question has arisen, viz., whether the Southern Confederation can have the benefit of the Extradition law for the arrest of fugitives from justice in Canada. The United States have a treaty with Great Britain for this purpose, but if the seceded States have really separated from the Union they lose the benefit of that provision; in which case Canada will become as safe and popular a refuge for absconding debtors as for slaves.

A traveller who is now visiting the canal works of the Isthmus of Suez sends the Siecle the following details, dated El Guizer, 3d inst.: "The central service of the supplies and the administration for all the points of the isthmus is organized at Damietta. From 6,000 to 7,000 Arabs are now employed. There are upwards of 2,000 at Timsate, where the works are carried on with an intelligent activity which must secure sure results. I was surprised to see those masses of native workmen using with the greatest facility all the French tools and improved machinery. Courageous and persevering efforts were necessary to organize all these works, which are carried on with the greatest order and precision. The company advances towards its object, and it will attain it. The materiel employed is immense. The wheelbarrows alone are more than 14,000 in number, there are steam saw mills, machinery for cutting metal and wood, hospitals, bakehouses, butchers' shops—in fact nothing is wanting!"

"Don't rob yourself," as the farmer said to the lawyer who gave him a hard name.

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XXIII.—CONTINUED.

It is wondrous indeed what miracles affection can surmount. Who that had before marked those white taper fingers could have imagined them capable of such a toilsome labor; it was a labor performed in silence, for the feelings of both, though widely different, were intense. At length the chain gave way to her perseverance; it was severed, and before she was aware of it fell with a loud clank to the ground. Both were on their feet together. With a trembling hand she put the chain in his, hastily replaced the cap she had taken from her hand, and for a few minutes the silence of death reigned in that prison room. At length she breathed again, though the blood refused to stain her lips with a single tint of its vermilion.

"Thank Heaven!" she exclaimed, earnestly. "The alarm rests with ourselves; we are still safe, and so much accomplished. Be brief, Jules; we have no time for parley. Batiste, with a carriage and fleet horses, waits outside. Dress yourself in this gown and cap, and without delay summon the jailor and follow him; he will lead you to liberty."

She then freed herself hurriedly from the dress she had worn on entering.

"And you, how will you pass?" he asked.

"I have said, think not, speak not of me," she replied, "there will be time enough for me to pass when you are safe. Here, throw on the gown, every minute enhances the danger. Surprised at our long interview, the governor may send, may come here himself. Haste, then, Jules; if this plan fails, we are lost, irremediably lost. I conjure you, by our love, our safety, to fly."

"Fly, and leave you subjected to the scorn and sneers of the wretches inhabiting this place?" said D'Almaine. "Never! I will not owe my safety to your danger! Go, Lucille, leave me to my fate, if it cannot be avoided but at such a price."

"Oh, this is cruelty!" she cried, dashing the tears from her eyes. "What have I to fear, though you leave me in a prison? I shall have honorable men to deal with; and when did they ever scorn or insult a woman thrown on them for protection? Go, Jules; for mine, for our child's sake, fly! for in our helplessness we shall both need your arm to defend us," and she put her hands together beseechingly.

D'Almaine wavered. "Dare I trust you?" he said, in a faltering voice, bending over her. "Can I trust you with those who, for an imaginary crime, have pursued me with such rancour? Will they not punish you that I may feel their vengeance more keenly than if inflicted on myself? Urge me not; the galleys, if it must be, a thousand times, rather than the sacrifice of such a woman!"

Lucille's face drooped over the hands resting on her knees. "To the galleys?" she murmured. "You will it, then, that we toil there together?" She raised her head slowly, their eyes met, she saw irresolution in the glance, and promptly acted upon it. "Ah, I have conquered!" she cried, rising and throwing the gown over his shoulders. "You will save us; the father will again clasp his child; we shall all be free!"

He caught her in his arms; but the knit brow, and the swollen veins in the forehead, told the workings of his soul.

"I go," he said, hurriedly; "I leave these walls; but not like a dastard, to fly far away while you suffer beneath them. No, I will hover round them, to shield you, should the slightest menace assail; be near, to give myself to them, should they dare detain you as a hostage. And now," he added, with a faint smile, "for the adorning, if you think it likely that the piercing eyes of the jailor will not detect the difference in our height."

"I forgot not so essential a point," said Lucille, a flush of grateful joy lighting up her pale, anxious face. "See," she added, pointing to the boots, "Batiste, ever watchful, had them raised, by means of cork soles, three inches. You have but to be firm to pass; escape is certain. Hark! the cathedral clock strikes eleven; ere its bell tolls midnight, you will be far, far beyond danger."

D'Almaine's dress was soon adjusted. Lucille wrapped herself in the travelling-cloak her husband had worn on her entrance, and with his cap pressed tightly over her thick, bright hair, she seated herself on the chair he usually occupied, and with a fluttering heart, but bold hand, rang the bell for the turnkey. But a few minutes elapsed, when his slow, heavy step sounded along the passages, and vibrated on the hearts of the husband and wife, as with throbbing bosoms, and hands clasped in each other, they awaited his coming.

D'Almaine's brow knit more closely when the key grated in the lock, and he clutched Lucille's hand more tightly; but she, though her feelings were perhaps more agonised, had more self-possession. Withdrawing her hand hastily, she whispered, "Courage!" and turned coldly from him. The door opened! D'Almaine passed the turnkey, and waited till the ponderous key turned and shot him out from Lucille, when for a moment caution forsook him; he forgot his own danger, remembering only that she was alone and a prisoner, and with an instinctive motion he turned and laid his hand fiercely on the lock.

"What has monsieur forgotten now?" said the man, surlily, who had been kept up beyond his usual time by the interview. "Methinks after such a long parley, a head long as monsieur's should have allowed his tongue to leave nothing unsaid that was necessary for the count's defence in the morning."

Recalled to his senses by the rebuke, D'Almaine shrugged his shoulders and went on.

While Lucille, as the key was withdrawn from the lock, started nervously to her feet, the blood, like molten lead, coursing through her heart, a cold, heavy moisture on her brow, she approached the door, and with form bent, till her ear nearly touched the keyhole, her hands clasped, stood in the attitude of listening, her lips compressing more firmly, her hands clasping more tightly, as the retreating steps fell lighter and lighter on her ear. Not a sound escaped her. Though so distant, she heard distinctly the key turn in the outer door, heard it creak on its heavy hinges, then close with a sound which seemed to bring the rushing air with a torrent through the passages and to the door at which she stood; then for a minute there was a deathlike silence, and then, oh, joy, joy unutterable, the smack of a whip was heard, then the rumbling of wheels, and all was again silent as the midnight hour.

The cold moisture left her brow; her lips half opened, for her breathing was now free as air, and with still clasped hands she sank on her knees, and in low, fervent accents murmured her prayer of gratitude and love to Him who had given her power to save her husband. The prayer, so full of sincerity and devotion, reached the throne of mercy, for when she arose from her knees she remembered not she was in a prison, but with a light spirit took up the cloak which had fallen to the ground, wrapped it round her, and throwing herself on the pallet, slept her first healthy sleep since her husband's committal.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Lucille awoke not till the entrance of the man with the morning meal. Alarmed by the unusual noise, forgetting at the same time where she was, she half turned on the bed. The sight of him, busily employed in arranging the cloth, awoke her as well to reality as to life. She kept her face concealed till he quitted the room, when she arose and ate heartily of the comfortable meal, more welcome than any she had had placed before her for many days. It was the first time she had peace of mind, and it had brought appetite with it.

Having arranged her hair and replaced the cloth cap over it, as the only covering she possessed for her head, she waited, with a palpitating heart, the hour of noon, wondering, with a sinking dread, if she should be exposed to the rude gaze of the expectant throng anticipating her husband's trial.

She remained but a short time in doubt; at twelve o'clock the jailor appeared to conduct his prisoner into court. Lucille, who was aware she could not avert the evil hour, turned her full gaze upon him. Terrified, as if by an apparition, the man retreated a few paces, then rubbed his eyes and came again towards her. This second glance seemed to convince him of something too clearly.

"What is this?" he cried. "Where is the Count D'Almaine? Here is treachery! A substitute! and, by the Holy Virgin, a woman! The prisoner escaped last night in the garb of Monsieur de Calcote! I'll away to him—he must account for this treachery."

And, relocking the door, he ran through the long halls calling, at the height of his voice,

"Treachery! Monsieur de Calcote! the Count D'Almaine!"

Lucille sat in trembling expectation near an hour, when she heard the sound of many footsteps approaching. She wrapped D'Almaine's cloak more tightly round her, and drew the cap further over her face. But, alas! its dimensions were too small to conceal a single particle of her beautiful contour, or the varying color of her transparent complexion, or round red lips, or pearly teeth, which, as her lips parted with agitation, showed themselves small and even.

The door was thrown open with little ceremony, several men appeared, and with rough voice and rude gesture presented the judge's order to her to appear in court. She started as she read "appear in court." She said,

"Can I not be spared this exposure? Say I would speak to M. de Calcote."

"That is not allowed," was the reply. "You have used his name to find ingress here. There must be no further collusion."

"The judge, then, monsieur?" said Lucille. "Surely he will compassionate my situation and spare me appearing before the gaze of so many. Tell him I am the Countess D'Almaine, and crave his clemency."

"We must obey our orders, madame. You may be the countess; and now I look at you, you are certainly the lady who spent so much time with the prisoner. But that says nothing, you have connived at his escape, and must answer in court for it. Come, madame, follow us, or we shall be compelled to insist on——"

"Insist!" sighed Lucille, "and do you not do that now? Resistance will avail me nothing," she thought. "They will examine me, and in public too, so the sooner it is over the sooner I shall have my liberty. I am ready," she said, rising. "I have hard hearts to deal with, therefore contention is useless."

"Quite, madame," returned the men of office, as they marshalled themselves round her to conduct her to the court.

During the short journey to the court Lucille had been collecting her coolness and courage, but both vanished when she entered the court, crowded to excess, and that world of faces fixed upon her own, and those numerous inquisitive eyes following her faltering steps to the spot she was led to, subdued it all. She felt faint, falling, and caught at the railing to support herself.

"A chair," called out M. de Calcote, "and a glass of water!"

A chair was immediately brought, and several hands presented glasses filled with water. She sank upon the first, and gratefully wetted her lips with the water. On being sufficiently recovered to be interrogated, the counsel of De Peleron pompously demanded.

"Your name, madame?"

"Lucille D'Almaine," was the simple reply.

"D'Almaine!" repeated the counsel. "Are you certain that you have a right to the name of D'Almaine?"

She looked up a moment surprised, then answered, in the same quiet tone,

"As certain as I am that it is my husband's."

"Your husband?" said the counsel. "Then you presume to tell us that the Count D'Almaine is he?"

She bowed proudly, but spoke not.

"Speak, madame, if you please," continued the counsel. "We wish to know who you are, and before we question others would have it from your own lips. You say you are the wife of M. D'Almaine; now we have some doubts on that point, which we expect you to explain."

"Doubts?" she repeated, and the color spread itself vividly over her fair face, while her large eyes, which she raised to the speaker, sparkled with insulted dignity. "Doubts that I am the wife of the Count D'Almaine?" she repeated. "Monsieur, this is a ruse known too well to your calling, and your question one I should scorn to answer were it not for my situation. I repeat, then, I am Lucille D'Almaine, the wife of the count of that name, and I trust that the truthfulness of the reply will save me from further doubt or interrogation on the subject."

"But we have heard," interrupted the counsel, "that you are his mistress; that, encouraged by you, the late Duke de Peleron came by his unfortunate death."

Lucille rose proudly from her chair, and raised her tall figure to its full height.

"It is false!" she said in a full, clear voice. "You have never heard this falsehood; and if it has been hinted at among the base, it is falser still to say that any one believed it, monsieur. After your base insinuation, I am silent to your interrogations. I declare to you and the court I will not again answer you on this or any other subject."

A murmur of applause ran through the court; and the counsellor, though discomfited, joined in the admiration she excited.

A second counsel on the same side rose.

"Madame," said he, "you are charged with a serious offence—that of aiding and abetting the escape of a murderer."

"I deny it," interrupted Lucille, in the same proud tone. "I assisted the escape of the Count D'Almaine, an injured and honorable man, who, in defence of his own honor, fired too surely on the unfortunate and guilty Duke de Paleron."

"You own, then, to having assisted his escape?" said the counsel.

"I do," replied Lucille, "and glory in it, though my own life fall the sacrifice for his."

At this moment her eyes turned inadvertently towards the door. A tall, robust fisherman leant against the post, his eyes flashing beneath his uncombed hair on the men who were examining her. She turned quickly away, but not before her eyes had encountered the fisherman's, when she sank, pale and trembling, on the chair, and the next question put to her was unheard.

"Madame is ill—why is she thus teased?" ran in a displeased manner through the court. "Shorten the examination, gentlemen. Remember you have a woman, a delicate, an unprotected woman before you."

"It is something that madame has seen in court that has disturbed her, not what she has heard," returned the counsel of De Paleron, in a pointed manner. "Perhaps madame will inform the court what apparition has alarmed her?"

Lucille's eyes again glanced to the spot where the fisherman had stood—it was vacant. She drew a quick breath, and looked deliberately on the many faces gazing admiringly and commiseratingly at her. There was not one among them to excite a single emotion. The icy coldness running through her veins was succeeded by a warm glow of returning animation, and she said in the same clear, full voice,

"I am ready."

"You confess to having connived at the escape of your——of the Count d'Almidor," resumed the counsel. "Are you aware of the danger that may accrue to yourself from the bold, lawless deed?"

"I know not, neither do I care," replied Lucille. "I thought not of danger beforehand, when my husband was imprisoned by your policy; why should I fear now, now he is free? Is it a crime for the wife to rescue of those false men who for money would take his life?"

The advocate showed symptoms of temporary uneasiness, but after a pause he continued his interrogatories.

"Is it my client's wish not to press a heavy charge against you; therefore if you will name the secret instrument of the escape, you expect your freedom."

"If my freedom rests on that foundation it is a poor one," said Lucille; "for I am so ignorant of his meetings even to yourself, but if I knew where he is, it would be the same, for neither threat nor promise would move me to breathe a hint detrimental to his safety."

"We may or may not, madame, believe the whole of this statement," said the advocate, steadily. "Name your accomplices."

"Accomplices!" repeated Lucille, scornfully. "I have none—except my maid, I exchanged places with Monsieur d'Almidor—what need had I of accomplices for such a sole?"

"But you did not drive the coach that brought you here in disguise. Who accompanied you?"

"A servant whom I could depend on."

"Your name and residence?"

"Pray, what do you call Lucille, determinedly; "not that I fear he would betray his master, but because I will not go out of his fidelity by placing him beneath your merciless scrutiny; nor will I subject myself longer to it. I appeal to the court," she said, looking round, "if I have not answered your questions clearly and truthfully. I know nothing but what is known to the court. Am I going to be spared further misery by this public exposure; and if I have betrayed it, now to deal with my appeal will be heard. If I have committed a crime amenable to the laws of my country in rescuing my husband from an ignominious fate, let him punish me to the full extent. I pronounce myself guilty of the crime. Let me be removed hence then, if it be even to the deepest, gloomiest dungeon your walls can boast."

Another burst of applause was hushed by Monsieur de Chicde, d'Almidor's counsel, rising to address the court.

"Monsieur," he said to the judge, "the noble lady—for she is noble in mind and station—has been somewhat rudely examined, her title of wife cruelly questioned; but I will not detain the court by expatiating on a subject of no moment to her arraignment. She is before the court for the rescue of her husband, an act neither his nor her nature can condemn; but, if Monsieur le Procureur de la Republique thinks otherwise, I am ready to defend her. Every moment she remains within these walls she is falsely imprisoned. I pray, nay insist that she be instantly set at liberty."

The judge nodded his head in approbation of the speech.

"You are right, Monsieur de Cadoudal," he said. "This lady, now she is examined, is free to depart. It was our duty to interrogate, as it is now our duty to discharge her. Madame," he said, turning to Lucille, "you can depart at your pleasure, and with the heartiest wishes of your country upon for your welfare. Though I cannot applaud your deed, it was a heroic one; and in such all hearts but the basest ones will acknowledge your worth."

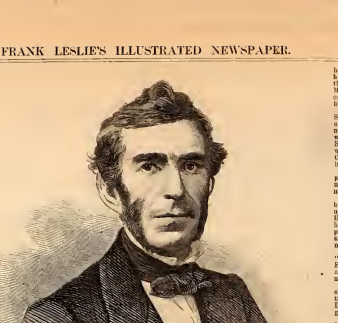
Lucille bowed to him and to her counsel with cold heartlessness and dried up blinded her at the words of kindness. And as the judge's words in succession burst of enthusiastic hand-forth, and nearly hands were held out to conduct her from her seat, and as many voices offered the use of a carriage to take her to the chateau. Confused, she looked round, scarcely able to discern objects through her misty eyes, when some one approached and offered his arm, saying,

"Madame, your own carriage waits. Have I permission to take you to it?"

"Oh, Estelle!" she uttered in joyful accents, taking his proffered arm, "this is happiness unlooked for. Take me quickly hence."

A line was instantly made for her to pass amid a respectful silence, many following to the carriage to pender their services.

Estelle thanked them, but promptly told them that at present nothing was required but the lady's removal from a place where she had been so deeply tried; and placing Lucille safely inside the vehicle, where Annette, the old servant of her father, was already with several trunks and packages, he jumped up beside the driver, and they were soon beyond the turmoil of the prison and the gates of the city.



GEN. BEAUVOIR BRAGG, COMMANDING THE SOUTHERN ARMY AT PENSACOLA, FLORIDA, FOR THE REDUCTION OF FORT PICKENS, NOW IN POSSESSION OF THE FEDERAL TROOPS.—PHOT. BY JACOBS, N. O.—PAGE 86.

CHAPTER XVI.

LUCILLE and her companion journeyed several miles by unfrequented roads till they stopped to change horses at a small, quiet roadside inn, when Estelle, telling the coachman, an old servant of the count's, that he would take the reins the remainder of the way, and that he, after well bathing the horses, was to return home with them, and meet him on the morrow at the same hour and place, and having written a few lines to Madeline by the same conveyance, without waiting to refresh either himself or Lucille, mounted the box, and the coach was again in motion.

Twilight was now deepening. Lucille saw that they were crossing a moor; but whither they were going she knew not, her trust was in Estelle; and though nervously anxious, she forbore to put any questions, when Annette, looking from the window, cried in a half-affrighted tone,

"What a dreadful place Monsieur Estelle is crossing! Neither house, tree, or the least thing habitable within sight; but what is that in the distance, my lady? If my eyes see clearly, a horseman at full speed, and very like a brigand, too! Pray Heaven he may not be one, for there is much property in the trunks beneath the seats, which will surely not escape his observation. I see one of his cloaks and handkerchiefs peeping, and a quantity of plate and other things of value. What if he should be a brigand?"

Lucille looked quickly from the window. She had no fear for the property; she thought only that they were pursued, and, doubting not they were hastening to join D'Almidor, she was going to bear the unwelcoming to warn Estelle, when the horseman dashed up to the window. It was the fisherman she had seen in the court, and, as then, in him she recognized her disguised husband.

"Oh, Jules!" she cried, "is not this tempting Providence? I perceived the disguise in an instant, and others have as sharp vision as my own."

"No, no," said her husband. "I have fared both friend and foe for the last twelve hours unsuspected, but love penetrates all disguise. Had my life and liberty, which I risked here at stake I could not have kept from that prison house. I was hovering about it all night, and had you been in danger should have given the signal, and I would have been at your side."

"I knew it, my husband," said Lucille. "What would such cohesive have availed? Had they seen your fickling eye and lip twitch as I did in the court, you would not be here now to speak of your precautions."

"It was wonderful how I sustained my passion when those knaves even were seeking their base insinuations upon you," said D'Almidor. "How they must have tried your gentle nature, my Lucile!"

"Not a hundredth part as you did," replied Lucille. "When my eyes glanced upon you I gave up all as lost, and with all my forced courage, had you remained, should have betrayed you."

"I saw it," he said, in a deep-toned voice; "but the horror of it is over. Let us hope for a better future; that and poverty we have never known before us."

He rode to the side of Estelle, and continued talking to him till they entered the small fishing town of Dunkirk, where Estelle had engaged a fishing smack to convey them to the Flemish coast, and Lucille, for the first time, learned she was to be the companion of her husband's journey.

"Could it not be better that I should follow?" she asked, in a timid voice. "You could travel more expeditiously alone, and I will join you in a few days when you are in England—the refuge of the oppressed!"

"You deceive," said D'Almidor, hastily but peremptorily, "must accompany me whereso ever fate guides my footsteps; and it is but confirming your words to say, where I go there must then go Lucile!"

"But our child, Jules! You do not bid me leave Fenice without her. Yes, I know full well, most hostess he is; every hour—all every minute—has danger in it while you tread these shores; but I——nearly a few days may be given up for my child's safety. Do not frown, Jules," she said, her eyes filling with tears, "it is a mother—a mother of an only child—who asks to delay her journey a few hours that she may be assured of its safety. Jules, think of our Birdie! It harm should befall her in the land that has treated her parents so harshly, should we not blame ourselves as in part the cause?"

Most selfish must for selfish those ever art, though love, and gentleness and generosity will group themselves with the virtue passion in your bosom! The cloud deepened on D'Almidor's brow.

"It shall be as you will," he said, "since the child is dearer than the father. But know, Lucille," and there was a stern determination in his voice, "that we quit France together. If you wait for the child, I will wait likewise."

Lucille's head sank on her clasped hands; the mother's warm pure affection struggled with the wife's love, the husband's safety. The latter conquered. She uncovered her face, looking, as she did so, the glistening tears from her pale cheeks, and gliding towards D'Almidor, who stood with folded arms regarding her, he knelt at-tled in his. She spoke not, but her eyes, as they met his, said, "Through all dangers I am yours." D'Almidor folded her in his arms.

"I am unworthy of you, Lucille," said he, "but in this instance you wish me. Our Birdie is as dear to me as to yourself, and were I not assured that in the arms of Madeline and Estelle she is protected with the same care as our own, I would face more dangers than new instance me to put her in yours."

The good and zealous Estelle was lavish in his assurances of everything he thought likely to soften the heavy weight he saw so clearly lurking at Lucille's heart.

"Have comfort, madame," said he, "this dear child is as precious to Madeline and myself as to her own parents. It is best you should go with monsieur; you have the discretion which he lacks; and I promise that as soon as you are settled Madeline shall bring her to you. In the meantime she shall be watched over, guarded as if she were indeed our own."

"I know it, Batiste," she replied, "I am assured of your worth. Bat—but—" and a look of anguish crossed her face, "the child's dream haunts me. Oh! Batiste, tell me if it was not strange, foreboding, that a creature so light-hearted, so young, should dream till the tears stood on her cheeks! Oh! why should one so young dream at all if not ominous of evil?"

"You are nervous, Madame d'Almaise, to allow so visionary a matter as a child's dream to disturb your usually strong mind," said Batiste; "the infant at the nurse's breast dreams, and from the expression on its features, sometimes of woe as well as weal. Discard this fancy from your mind; in less than a fortnight I promise you Birdie shall be safe under her mother's wing."

"Take my blessing to her," said Lucille, earnestly. "It may be my last blessing, for we have both to cross the deep waters before we can meet again; and this ring," she added, taking one of great value from her finger, which D'Almaine had given to her on their marriage, having the initials to her name, L. D. A., in brilliants, "take this, put a ribbon to it, and let her wear it round her neck; it may, at another period, be serviceable to her. And now I have nothing more to say, and they summon us to the boat."

D'Almaine, who had been at the waterside, entered. "The trunks are on board," he said, "the sails spread! Adieu, Batiste, my good and tried friend! Let our Birdie be your first care, as you hope for success and happiness."

"A hundred blessings for her!" murmured Lucille, trying to force a smile, but it died on her lips. She was leaving country, child, friends, a home surrounded with luxuries, for a precarious one, a land she had only heard of; the effort to smile was vain. The smack was in motion, the night was dark, a few dim stars struggling through the murkiness made the vault of heaven just visible, Batiste was no longer to be seen. She drew her cloak closely round her, and leant over the gunwale of the vessel; now her tears, so fought against, would come, and as her hands were pressed hard over her eyes, they fell drop by drop into the cold, rapacious ocean, mixing heedlessly with its white dashing foam.

The following day they reached Flanders, from whence they took water for England, and in an obscure village on the coast awaited news from France.

The Nantes journals state that, in addition to experiments with a steel cannon said to be invented by the Emperor, which have just been made near that city, trials have taken place with a new projectile weighing forty-five kilogrammes (99¼ pounds), and which is of such terrific power that it is believed that, in bursting in the midst of a mass of men, a hundred might be killed or wounded.

The English are to have a visit from young Dahomey, the Prince, son of the King of that name, who has such barbarous customs. Perhaps he will hear something that is not palatable to him, if the British men-of-war have not been engaged with conveying the fact to his parent.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

CHAPTER LII.

ERLE GOWER watched with earnest eyes the form of Lady Maud as she fled from him down the centre of the old library. He caught the sweet—and to him it seemed joyous—expression beaming on her fair countenance, as she turned it to him, while yet flying, towards the outlet.

Securing the small box which he had brought from the old portrait-gallery, he made his way through the secret door by which he entered, and this time retaining the keys, he passed out into the Chace, not by that door which led immediately outside the building, but the passage and outlet which introduced him into a wild part of the Chace itself.

The day was fine, the sky blue, the sun shone brightly, the birds sang with sprightly notes as they perched upon branches and twigs or darted to and fro. A wind, fresh but not strong, played among the young leaves, making them rustle and hum as they waved gracefully under its pressure.

Erle, who was jaded and worn by his night's adventure and his morning's excitement, acknowledged gratefully the pleasant breeze as it cooled his heated brow, and he drew large draughts of it, like one who had suddenly escaped from a stifling vapor into a clear and fragrant atmosphere.

And now from the secret place nearest to his heart he again drew forth the small glove and the dried flower, and pressed them passionately to his lips, feeling, as he did so, the pressure of Maud's sweet, soft, pulpy lips, as they clung to his own when they both in the library simultaneously discovered into what emotion their friendship had merged.

ERLE GOWER.

And thus, full of exulting thoughts, of rapturous imaginings, of glowing anticipations, he paced to and fro, entirely wrapt in ecstatic contemplation.

One thing struck him at this time with more painful force than it had ever done before. It was that his vague claims on Lord Kingswood were, according to the suggestions of Ishmael, of a character which, if substantiated, could only be subversive of his happiness and destructive of his position. In what light would Lady Maud regard him who ruined Lord Kingswood, destroyed the peace of mind of Lady Kingswood, and placed Cyril in a humiliating position—Cyril, in whom the whole happiness of Violet was bound up?

It was a question of immense moment, and he felt its force and responsibility. Yet he believed a path might be found, if he could influence others to be animated by the same feelings as himself, which would reconcile all opposing elements, and make them all one and united.

"It is imperative upon me to assert my rights, whatever they may be!" he exclaimed, while pursuing this course of thought; "but it would not cost me a pang to surrender all the glitter of rank, and wealth, and station, so that Maud—beloved Maud—shared my fate! Let Lord Kingswood keep his pomp and title—let him feed his ambition with the toys which make up high station—give to me Maud, and if it spares her sorrow, let him enjoy all."

He made his way through the silent intricacies of the forest, and emerged upon the borders of the small stream whose meandering form he at once recognized; but instead of pursuing its wandering course, he, in an impatient mood, leaped it, forced his way amid briars and brakes, turned into a narrow, leafy alley, sinuous, and crossed in all directions by straggling shoots of young trees, growing thicker and thicker as he proceeded, as if they were gradually gathering so as to impede his course, and ultimately yielding before his impetuous movements, to disclose to him that he had reached the old hunting-tower in the forest.

He started as he beheld the gray, moss-covered ancient structure, and regarded it with singular interest. He had often heard Violet speak of it in terms of affection, at other times with feelings of awe. Herein he knew existed the picture of which she had so often spoken, and herein he expected to discover, he knew not why, matters relating to himself.

He gazed up at the window, over which trailed dark ivy. It was closed, and seemed as though it had not for some time been opened.

Beneath that window was an opening, or rather a narrow slit in the thick walls, intended to admit air and light together. Narrow as it was, a massive, rusty, time-eaten iron bar divided it, intended, no doubt, to prevent bats or animals from entering, and it was too small to permit any human creature to squeeze through the fissure. Erle tried to examine it, but he found it beyond his reach, or he would have looked within.

He moved round to the doorway. The door was formed of planks of oak of immense thickness, banded with huge iron bars, and studded with thick knobs of the same material. There appeared to be no means of opening it from the outside. An iron handle, upright, and formed like that on a drinking measure, was affixed for the purpose of closing it, but he could find nothing, not even a keyhole, to betray how admission was to be obtained.

He tried the door, but it was firm; he pressed against it, and, by the aid of the iron handle, attempted to shake it, but it remained immoveable.

He was now only more anxious to obtain an entrance, but he could not see any mode by which to effect it. He thought of climbing to the window, but he gazed round in vain to discover anything which would assist him.

He walked slowly round the building, which occupied a much larger space than he supposed, with a view of ascertaining if there was any other mode by which ingress could be obtained; but he observed only another window, fashioned much in the same way as the first he had seen, and a narrow opening similar to the other for the purpose of admitting air.

Resolved not to be baffled, he examined the old building with attentive care. He approached closely the second window, and casting his eyes up the walls, noticed some iron staples driven into them at irregular distances, and ascending which, by the aid of a rope, would certainly enable one who was agile to reach the window above.

As it was his intention, when the night drew on, to return to Kingswood by the route across the park, he thought it would be possible to purchase materials, not only such as would enable him to reach the windows, but to force it, if necessary.

With this resolution on his mind, he, with slow steps, examining cautiously the crumbling wall as he went, came ultimately round to the arched doorway again.

He started back with a cry of astonishment, if not of alarm.

The old oaken door was open, and in the entrance stood, or rather cowered, an old woman, who bent a pair of piercing, brilliant eyes at him beneath a pair of slanting, bushy, but snow-white eyebrows. She leaned with both hands upon a stick, and stood motionless, watching him with considerable earnestness.

He, in turn, regarded her with wonder. She was decrepit from great age, but she was not bronzed or shrivelled so as to make her hag-like. On the contrary, her skin was white—a dull white, it is true—but not sallow. She had, indeed, rather the aspect of one who has for a long series of years been confined within a chamber, sufficiently ventilated so as not to be injurious, but yet so limited in the circulation of its air as to give to the complexion of those imprisoned within it a delicate but death-like hue. She was much wrinkled, but not offensively so; her long elf-locks, unconfined and white as her brows, hung straggling upon her shoulders, while her dress was a strange compound of a past and a present age.

Erle saw in a glance that in her maidenhood she must have been [illegible] and he could not divest himself of an idea that there was some floating resemblance between her and Violet.

There was a strange, weird-like look about her, yet he felt that much of that appearance was due to the circumstances under, and the place in, which he saw her, and her evidently extreme age.

He was so full of marvel, so occupied with wondering who she could be, for he never heard Violet drop the remotest hint that any such singular being as this dwelt with her in the hunting-lodge, that he stood, without speaking, gazing upon her.

At length she broke the silence, and said, in a harsh but almost shrill tone,

"Whom do you seek?"

He started, and replied,

"I do not seek any one here."

She eyed him keenly as he spoke, and the tone of his voice seemed to move her, for she pressed one of her hands upon her temples.

She withdrew it, and in a yet harsher tone exclaimed,

"Whom do you seek?"

"I have answered you," he returned, slowly, and with emphasis. "There is no living being I am seeking likely to be met with here."

"Shall I convict you of falsehood out of your own mouth?" she asked, with bitterness.

"If you can, in Heaven's name do, dame," he returned, with a curling lip.

"You stood before yon window and gazed long at it," she exclaimed, with energy, pointing at the one he understood to have been that which lighted Violet's room.

"I did," he replied, laconically.

"You tried this door—you have examined the outside of this tower to find a place by which to enter," she cried, rapidly.

"I have," he returned, calmly.

"And yet you profess to seek no one whom you hoped to find within!" she rejoined, with a sarcastic tone in her almost shrill voice.

"It is even so," he answered.

"Go to! You are a Kingswood!" she cried, bitterly; "and who of all breathing creatures should know better than myself how little of truth and of honor is to be found in any of your race?"

"Softly, dame," interposed Erle, raising his hand in a deprecatory manner. "How know you that I am a Kingswood?"

There was such a peculiar earnestness in the tone of his inquiry, despite his gesture, that the old crone could not help observing it.

She screamed rather than laughed,

"How do I know you to be a Kingswood—I!—I!—I!" she cried, shrilly. "Do you, a Kingswood, ask this of old Eldra?"

"If I am a Kingswood, still do I ask it," he responded, in a haughty tone, and a flush mounted to his cheek.

"If you are a Kingswood!" she repeated, sternly. "Do you deny it?"

"No!" he returned, in a loud, emphatic tone; then he added, in a milder voice, "But that is a different affair to making the assertion that I am a Kingswood."

The old woman shook her clenched hands at him in a paroxysm of fury.

"It is mean, it is base, it is contemptible to descend to such paltry artifices," she cried, in a choking voice. "Oh, but an angry God is degenerating the race. Lord Kingswood, villain that he is, would spurn such an ignoble subterfuge."

Erle looked at the old woman with amazement. The intensity of her excitement confounded him; he knew not how to reply to it so as to appease it, and he remained silent, feeling that any attempted explanation would only increase her fury.

"Not know you for a Kingswood!" she screamed. "Is there not stamped upon your features more impressively than upon those of any belonging to the accursed race yet born the resemblance to him who pulled down desolation, misery and crime upon the name of Kingswood? Can I not see in the broad, high, white forehead, the full, bright, haughty eye, the compressed, passionate lip, those marks which distinguish a Kingswood from all the world? Do I not find it confirmed by your acts?"

"What acts?" cried Erle, with a sudden, haughty impetuosity. "There lives not one who dares to say I am the author of an act tainted by aught derogatory to my honor."

"There lives one who dares do that," exclaimed the old creature, vehemently.

"Name him, then, to me," cried Erle, stung out of his intended calmness. "He will not dare face me with a lie so base on his lip. I would ram it with my knuckles down his throat."

"Brave words, bold words, with but an old woman and a forest aisle to echo them," retorted the old woman. "See, proud boy, before you the being who lives and dares to tell you that, young as you are, your acts are such as should shame even a Kingswood."

"Old woman, you are mad," cried Erle, indignantly. "How dare you utter an assertion so utterly without foundation? You know me not, I tell you. You do not even know my name, although you address me with such presumptuous familiarity."

The old woman scowled at him.

"Look at yon window," she said, with slow emphasis, pointing to the one above where they stood, "that at which you first gazed when you broke through yon covert. That window has enshrined the faces of maidens young and fair as ever the light of Heaven shone on. Woe for them! A Kingswood's eye has fallen upon them, even as, in successive years, they have sat within yon chamber, and a Kingswood's tongue has lured them down, down, down to their eternal destruction! Your father, true to the traditions of his house, has done this. The last bright and beauteous face but one of a creature as pure and innocent as she was beautiful, sat one day in happiness and purity at that window, listening to the music of the birds, chanting strange melodies herself, with her tender eyes fixed upon the green, growing, budding things. The present proud Lord of Kingswood passed and saw her there—he lured her away—destroyed her. You, oh, Cyril Kingswood, with the curse of your race clinging to you like a shroud, have seen one such face seated at that window. You, too, sought to lure it. You, the son of the author of the foulest wrong of which even a Kingswood could have been guilty, you seek to perpetuate the crimes of your house by the wanton annihilation of one whose only sin would be that of loving you too well."

"No!" cried Erle, with a fiery and impatient gesture.

"But I repeat my charge, miserable, degenerate boy," screamed the old woman, frantically. "Why, have you not seen her there, gazing out with soft, loving eyes upon the skies, and the flowers, and the woodland? Have you not met her in the unfrequented glades and in the covert? Have you not haunted her—a pure, innocent, forest fawn—like a hunter tracking his game to its destruction? Oh, but she is snatched from you now! You find her not there! She is gone—she is gone——"

"Woman!" shouted Erle, passionately, "I am not Cyril Kingswood. Your wild and furious charges are for other ears than mine. I repeat, I am not Cyril Kingswood."

Erle spoke with a rapidity and impetuosity which would not be denied, and notwithstanding the excitement which seemed to render her deaf and blind to all but her own impressions, the words, "I am not Cyril Kingswood," came thundering into her ears like a discharge of artillery.

The words seemed to stun her, not by the force with which they were uttered, but the sense they conveyed.

"Not Cyril Kingswood!" she muttered.

Then she placed her two hands upon her stick and peered up at him from beneath her slant and hoary brows. Her eyes absolutely glared as they perused and reperused every lineament of his noble features.

Once or twice she pressed her aged eyelids with her long and bony fingers, but it was for a moment, for she withdrew them again and gazed at him with a more steadfast crueity than ever.

"Not Cyril Kingswood?" she repeated, with evident emotion.

Presently she said, with sharpness,

"But you are a Kingswood. Yet Lord Kingswood has but one son! Are you not a Kingswood?"

"I do not bear the name," answered Erle, for obvious reasons deeply interested in all that fell from the old woman's lips.

"No?" she exclaimed, interrogatively. "Where were you born?" she asked.

A flush mounted to his forehead.

"I do not know," he answered, in a low tone.

"Where reared?" she inquired, almost authoritatively.

"At Avening," he replied.

She shook her head.

"What this may mean I cannot tell," she muttered, as she rocked her body to and fro. "There is a strange wild disorder about my heart, a tumultuous throbbing, which seems to forewarn me that some tremendous development of the mystery which hangs over the doomed race is nigh. What can it be? Nature seldom lifts its voice of warning in my breast but there is a fulfilment of its presage."

She again perused his features with earnestness, and presently beckoning him, she said,

"Enter the tower with me. It is the first time I have asked within its aged walls a Kingswood since—O my God! let me not recur to that—my sin, my sin, my mortal sin!"

She bowed her head upon her white, attenuated, wrinkled hands, and moaned as if in mental agony.

She, however, soon shook off her spasm of pain, and turning to him, said,

"Follow me! There is one in here whom you may recognise when your eye lights upon him."

She turned and entered the hunting-lodge. He followed closely upon her heels, and whispered in her ear,

"There is, indeed, one whom I know to be within here whom I expect to see."

She staggered round as if he had stabbed her.

"What is that you have dared to breathe in my ear after what you have denied?" she exclaimed, as she raised her stick to bar his further progress.

"Nay, dame, fear me not," he rejoined, quickly and gently. "There hangs within a portrait of one of whom I have heard. I wish to see it."

She looked at him inquiringly.

"It is a portrait I would have shown you," she said.

"And will," he responded. "I am not one of whom you at least should be in fear."

"And why not you?" she asked, as her bright eyes still rested upon his features.

"You shall know anon," he exclaimed. "Pray lead on; I am impatient to see the portrait."

In the centre of the tower within there was a spiral stone staircase. Though very old, it was built so massively that it was likely to last for ages. It was [illegible] and but one person could pass up it at a time. The walls seemed to [illegible] with moisture, though the interior of the tower was not damp, but [illegible] accounted for from the fact that the staircase continued up to the roof, where it was open and exposed to the sky.

There was a small handrail of wood, which ran spirally up the side of the wall, and to this handrail the old woman clung as she dragged herself up.

"Do not touch the wall! do not touch the wall!" she exclaimed, twice or thrice, and as she mounted the last stair, which paused at a door she unlocked and flung open, she repeated, "Do not touch the wall! Beware! do not touch the wall!"

"Wherefore?" asked Erle, as he stood beside her.

"Because there is blood upon it, the blood of one pitilessly slain, staining it, smearing it from this room to the ground," she answered, in a hollow voice.

"But I have touched it," he said; "for at first I did not see the handrail."

She clutched his hand, and looked at it; the light which came in at the window enabled her to see that amid the moisture and the crumbling particles of stone which had adhered to the palm of his hand, from pressing against it in his ascent, there appeared a bright crimson streak. She uttered a shuddering cry of horror.

"It is her blood—her blood!—the blood of Lady Maud!" she exclaimed, excitedly.

"Of whom?" cried Erle, in startling tones.

"Of the Lady Maud," she returned, with the same wild animation. "For three hundred years that streak has rested there, a record of her wrongs, a broad red brand of infamy on the name of Kingswood! Who are you whose hand should remove it from the place where it has rested for centuries?"

"See!" he cried, in a half-delirious voice, as, drawing with a sudden impulse a knife from his pocket, he made an incision across his hand, where the bright red streak yet shone. "I am he whose blood shall mingle with that of the Lady Maud's."

The old woman uttered a choking scream of frantic terror.

As he concluded his words, and towered to his full height, under the passionate impulse of the inspiration which had induced him to perform this singular and unprompted act, she shrunk back, contemplating his face and form, and turned it upon a large painting which hung against the wall.

To her intense horror she saw the picture move—swell—dilate. It might have been the rush of air which entered from the well-staircase and the open door that stirred it thus strangely. Of this she thought not; all she beheld or heeded was, that not only did it move, quiver and oscillate, but suddenly the cords by which it was suspended seemed to stretch to twice their length, and then snap, while the picture itself glided from the place where so long it had rested, and descended swiftly to the floor, with a noise resembling a low peal of thunder.

A cloud of dust rose up, but was in an instant whirled away in eddies to the ceiling, leaving the picture clear and distinct in the same upright position as it had maintained when hanging against the wall.

Old Eldra lay in a swoon upon the ground, her face bent towards her knees, and her hands clasped upon her forehead.

Erle stood firm and erect, gazing upon the pale face of the young hunter, whose large, stern eyes seemed to glare upon his own, and to search down into their very depths.

THE LAST WORDS OF MAJOR WINTHROP.

OUR readers will remember that brilliant article in the June number of the Atlantic Monthly describing the march of the New York Seventh Regiment to Washington. Young Winthrop was the author of it, and he purposed continuing his contributions to the Atlantic during the war. He accordingly sent a paper for the July number, full of admirable descriptions of "Our Camp at Washington," the closing portions of which have now a heart-saddening interest. We anticipate the publication of the new number of the magazine, by extracting a few paragraphs:

"The time had come for myself and my regiment to leave it by different ways. I should have been glad to stay and see my comrades through to their departure; but there was a Massachusetts man down to Fortress Monroe, Butler, by name—has any one heard of him?—and to this gentleman it chanced that I was to report myself. So I packed my knapsack, got my furlough, shook hands with my fellows, said good-bye to Camp Cameron, and was off, two days after our month's service was done.

"Under Providence, Washington owes its safety, first, to General Butler, whose genius devised the circumvention of Baltimore and its rascal crew, and whose utter bravery executed the plan; he is the Grand Yankee of this little period of the war. Second, to the other Most Worshipful Grand Yankees of the Massachusetts regiment, who followed their leader, as he knew they would, discovered a forgotten colony called Annapolis, and dashed in there, asking no questions. Third, and while I gladly yield the first places to this General and his men, I put the Seventh in as last, but not least, to saving the capital. Character always tells. The Seventh, by good, hard, faithful work at drill, had established its fame as the most thorough militia regiment in existence. Its military and moral character were excellent. The mere name of the regiment carried weight. It took the field as if the field were a ball-room. There were myriads eager to march, but they had not made ready beforehand. Yes, the Seventh had its important share in the rescue. Without our support, whether our leaders tendered it eagerly or hesitatingly, General Butler's position at Annapolis would have been critical, and his forced march to the capital a forlorn hope—heroic, but desperate.

"So honor to whom honor is due.

"Here I must cut short my story. So good-bye to the Seventh, and thanks for the fascinating month I have passed in their society. In this pause of the war our camp-life has been to me as brilliant as a permanent pic-nic.

"Good-bye to Company I, and all the fine fellows, rough and smooth, cool old hands and recruits verdant, but ardent! Good-bye to our lieutenants, to whom I owe much kindness! Good-bye, the orderly, so peremptory on parade, so indulgent off! Good-bye, everybody!"

THE SOUTHERN PRESS.

THE Charleston Mercury, after giving a very candid account of Lieut. Tompkins brilliant charge through Fairfax Court House, refrains from recounting the crowning achievement the night after, when he rescued the two men he had left behind him, in consequence of their being dismounted, and uses this ungracious but truthful language, so far as the reproaches are concerned: "It is said, in extenuation of this apparently dastardly conduct, that one company of the Virginia cavalry were without pistols. But what a vain and empty excuse! What is the use of pistols in a sabre fight? The sabre, not the pistol, is the weapon for a charge of cavalry upon cavalry. Still further, it is stated that the other company of Virginians had pistols. They were two to one against the United States troops, and backed, besides, by a company of riflemen. Good God! is this the sort of fighting Southern troops intend to make? Why, with their riflemen, and two sabres to one, they ought to have cut up the Lincolnites to a man, and pursued the last man into the very encampment of the enemy. Is the banner of the Old Dominion to be thus trailed in the dust? Are there men found in Virginia thus to rob her of her ancient prestige, and, more than all, her honor, her glory in arms? Unless our meagre accounts from the Richmond papers are strangely incorrect, the epaulettes should be torn from the shoulders of the officers who have thus sinned the honor of their State, and a court martial should expel them from the ranks of the Confederate army. That there are brave men in Virginia who will maintain her integrity, the gallant conduct of the single company of rifles, unsupported and without bayonets, who drove back the enemy with their bullets, will testify. Let those, then, who have no stomach for the fight be spurned from the ranks of the army—objects of contempt to mankind."

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

WHY should the male sex avoid the letter A? Because it makes men mean.

A MAN was suspected of stealing a horse and was taken up. "What am I taken for?" he inquired of the constable. "I take you for a horse," was the reply; whereupon he kicked the officer over, and bolted.

"I AM a great gun," said a tipsy printer, who had been on the spree for a week.

"Yes," said the overseer, "you're a great gun, and half cocked, and you can consider yourself discharged."

"Well," said typo, "then I had better go off."

"I WISH you would give me that gold ring on your finger," said a village dandy to a country girl, "for it resembles the duration of my love for you—it has no end."

"Excuse me, sir," she said, "I choose to keep it, for it is likewise emblematical of my love for you—it has no beginning."

FULLER, author of the "Church History," was famous for his love of punning. One day he invited Mr. Crowe and Mr. Rooke to dine with him, and having given Mr. Birdmore, another guest, a hint to be rather after the time, on his appearance, he said, "Mr. Rooke, Mr. Crowe—I beg leave to introduce one Bird-more."

"HALLOA!" ejaculated a guardian to his pretty niece, as he entered the parlor and saw her in the arms of a swain, who had just popped the question and sealed it with a kiss, "what's the time of day now?"

"I should think it was about half-past twelve," was the cool reply of the blushing damsel; "you see we are almost one."

"I HOPE you are not going to give this stuff to father," sobbed a little girl as she returned from the apothecary's shop, where she had been sent with the doctor's prescription.

"Why not, my child?" inquired the mother, somewhat surprised.

"Because," replied the child, "the man took the medicine out of the same bottle that he did the poison the other day for you to kill rats with."

"You don't understand science, my dear."

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1861, by Frank Leslie, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 293—Vol. XII.] NEW YORK, JUNE 29, 1861. [Price 6 Cents.

Important New Historical Work.

FRANK LESLIE'S

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR OF 1861.

Descriptive, Statistical and Documentary.

EDITED BY E. G. SQUIER,

LATE MINISTER TO CENTRAL AMERICA, &c.

The second number of this superb work has already been issued, and the third number is ready for delivery.

The design of this work is great and comprehensive. It is a thorough history of the causes and the progress of the war, from its initiation to the present time, derived from documentary evidence; illustrated by the first artists of the age, and engraved in the highest style of art. It combines Historical Details with the Incidents, Anecdotes and Poetry of the War, carefully and judiciously selected with the most exquisite, graphic and correct Illustrations.

The voice of the press is unanimous in its praise of the great Pictorial History of the War, not only as regards its able literary editing, but as to its large, elegant type, thick and splendid paper, and superb printing. The engravings of each part, numbering over thirty, consist of large double and single page cuts, portraits, maps, &c., and are of unequalled beauty, and entirely authentic.

Each number contains sixteen pages, each page measuring 23 by 17 inches. The price of each part is twenty-five cents, to be had of all dealers. Parties wishing the four first numbers will, by sending one dollar to this office, receive them postage free.

Flattering Opinions of the Press.

It is something which will interest every true patriot.—Piqua Register, Ohio.

This work will be of great value in after years, when peace and tranquillity again reign in the land.—Republican Standard, Mt. Clemens, Mich.

"The Pictorial History of the War," which is published by Mr. Frank Leslie, of New York, is an attractive work. All who wish to procure, in a cheap form, a record of passing events, will secure this publication.—Boston Courier.

The preparing of the History has been intrusted to Mr. E. G. Squier, formerly United States Minister to Nicaragua, and a gentleman of established reputation in literature. Readers may be assured that it will receive full justice at his hands. The type used is large and clear, the engravings are among the most spirited and best finished of the art, and the whole design and execution of the work render it invaluable as a work of record and reference.—Norfolk Co. Journal, Roxbury, Mass.

It will be a continued illustrated history of our present civil strife, and as to the ability with which it will be conducted, it is enough to say that its management will be in the hands of the Hon. E. G. Squier, who is well known to the public as a scientific and literary writer.—Sun, Canada.

Two numbers have already appeared, which, so far as the matter and engravings are concerned, have never been equalled by the American pictorial press.—Boston Transcript.

All who subscribe for this splendid historical work will possess a full and complete account of every transaction connected with the stirring scenes now being enacted.—New London, C. W.

It will give a complete epitome of the war, with all the facts, scenes, incidents and anecdotes connected with it, arranged chronologically, so as to form a contemporary and permanent history of the times. Accurate and life-like portraits of leading officers and statesmen, plans and views of fortifications, maps, battle scenes, &c., &c. To families it will be of incalculable importance and interest, and for preservation it will be invaluable.—Gem and Gazette, Dexter, Penobscot Co., Me.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, they giving us credit for being en rapport with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching information. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Foreign News.

The European news is of little importance. The British press has considerably modified its tone, and has become friendly to the North, although it declares its neutrality. The ill-judged speeches of Cassius M. Clay and Anson Burlingame, taken in conjunction with the articles in some of our New York papers, recommending that we should indemnify ourselves for our loss of the South by robbing England of Canada, have naturally incensed the British, who swallow this buncombe as popular opinion. Gregory, of Galway, has been forced to abandon his motion for the recognition of the Southern Confederacy, but has published a defence of the Seceding States in the London Times. The Great Eastern and Golden Fleece have been chartered to convey about three thousand troops to Canada. Louis Napoleon had issued a proclamation warning all French subjects from engaging in the war between the North and South. It is an echo of the British proclamation. It also terms the South a "belligerent power." Privateers are only allowed to remain twenty-four hours in a French port, according to their ancient custom. Baron Ricasoli is to succeed Count Cavour as Premier of Italy. The Southern Commissioners had left London for Paris.

State of the Nation.

Although no decisive action has yet taken place between the vast opposing forces in Virginia, the massing together of the scattered columns and their centralization upon one point forebodes an almost immediate collision, and probably a general battle, the result of which can only be a matter of speculation. That the Secession leaders have collected a vast army in the State of Virginia is now ascertained as a fact, and although reports reach us from various sources that a large proportion of them are poorly armed, the whole badly provisioned, and that a lukewarmness to the cause exists among some of the troops, we believe these reports exaggerated, and we do not doubt that they will make a sturdy stand and defend the soil of Virginia with dogged determination. It is still given out that the great object of the Southern Generals is to force the line of defences of the Federal troops on the Potomac, penetrate to the Capitol and carry the war into Maryland and Pennsylvania. It is also said that the reason why this movement has not been made earlier was the opposition of Jefferson Davis, and that he is still opposed to it. If this is true it gives us a higher opinion of his judgment, for it cannot be doubted that a defensive war is the true line of policy for the South, and that an attempt on her side to invade the Northern States would be an act of sheer madness.

The plan of the campaign of the Federal authorities is of course a profound secret, but an important meeting, at which many general officers were present, was convoked by General Scott at Washington, on the 24th inst., at two o'clock. It is probable that the plan of the campaign will be here discussed and finally settled, and that a faint shadow of the details will soon be seen in the operations which will assuredly immediately commence. Under any circumstances the events which are now crowding upon us will culminate in some startling action within the next few days.

The battle at Booneville, Mo., was fully as decisive as we announced, the Secession troops flying in all directions, but the loss of life happily was not so large as the first account intimated. One hundred will probably cover the dead and wounded on both sides. Its moral effect has been very great, and the energy of General Lyon has strengthened the Union feeling in Missouri, and has imparted a very good idea of the strong and determined power of the Federal Government. Governor Jackson is still flying, and probably by this time is safe with the sympathising Government of Tennessee. Energetic measures are being pursued by all the officers under the command of General Lyon, and there can be little doubt that the allegiance of Missouri to the Union will be secured by the Union men, supported by the Federal troops.

An important agreement has been entered into between Major-General McClellan and the Governor of Kentucky, Magoffin. The Governor agrees to preserve the property of the United States in Kentucky, to enforce the laws of the United States according to the interpretation of the Federal Courts, and to secure the neutrality of Kentucky with respect to the Southern States; and in consideration of this action, General McClellan agrees to respect the soil of Kentucky, even though Southern armies occupy it until called upon by the Legislature or Governor, in accordance with Article IV., Section IV., of the Constitution, to aid in effecting what the State cannot accomplish. There must be strong reasons for this action; the loyalty of Kentucky must be largely believed in, or we can see no reasons why such conditions should be granted to Kentucky, when they were rejected when asked for by the Governor of Missouri. Kentucky has been more active in the cause of Secession than Missouri; she has sent regiments to the aid of the Southern States, and thousands of her sons now stand in Virginia arrayed against the authority of the United States. Let us trust that the confidence reposed in the honor of her Government and her people may not be misplaced.

General McClellan has issued a proclamation, assuring the people of Western Virginia that the pledges of his proclamation of May 26 will be faithfully carried out. He concludes:

To my great regret I find that the enemies of the United States continue to carry on a system of hostilities prohibited by the laws of war among belligerent nations, and of course far more wicked and intolerable when directed against loyal citizens engaged in the defence of the common Government. Marauding parties are pursuing a guerilla warfare, firing upon sentinels and pickets, burning bridges, insulting, injuring and even killing citizens because of their Union sentiments, and committing many kindred acts.

I do now, therefore, make proclamation and warn all persons that individuals or parties engaged in this species of warfare, irregular in every view which can be taken of their attacking sentries, pickets, or other soldiers, destroying public or private property, or committing injuries against any of the inhabitants because of Union sentiments or conduct, will be dealt with in their persons and property according to the severest rules of military law.

All persons giving information or aid to the public enemies will be arrested and kept in close custody, and all persons found bearing arms, unless of known loyalty, will be arrested and held for examination.

The election by the delegates in Western Virginia has closed. Governor Letcher is deposed, together with all his officers, and Frank H. Pierpont has been elected in his place. The new Governor will at once assume all the Gubernatorial duties, and his acts will assuredly be recognised by the Federal Authorities, and be will be supported by all the power of the Supreme Government.

Steps are being taken by the Union men of Missouri to form a new Government. The disgraceful conduct and flight of Governor Jackson and his unscrupulous abettors, have determined the law-abiding citizens to take the government out of their hands, and following the course of Western Virginia, ignore their acts and elect a new Governor and new State officers, who will support the Federal Government, and put down every symptom of rebellion in their midst.

The attitude of most of the Northern press towards England remains both hostile and abusive. It is difficult to understand the policy of this course of conduct. If it is to offend her it will hardly succeed, for the interests of the two countries, both social and mercantile, are too closely connected to admit of severance for mere newspaper bullying. If it is to frighten her, the attempt is still more preposterous; she is too strong to be worried into a war by the barks of scribblers for the press. But if it is to afford her an opportunity by and bye, when cotton is imperatively needed, to force the blockade or make business arrangements with the Southern States, it is a design well conceived and carried out with an abusive ability and dogged persistency worthy of a better cause. It is probable, however, that the indignant Solons of the press will not be quite so down upon England now, but will honor France with a large share of attention. The Emperor has followed the steps of "perfidious Albion," and has issued the following proclamation:

His Majesty, the Emperor of the French, taking into consideration the state of peace which exists between France and the United States of America, has resolved to maintain a strict neutrality in the struggle between the Government of the Union and the States which propose to form a separate Confederation.

In consequence, his Majesty, considering Article 14 of the Naval Law of August, 1851, the 3d Article of the law of the 10th of April, 1825, Articles 84 and 85 of the Penal Code, 65 and following of the Decree of the 24th of March, 1852, 313, and following of the Code Penal Maritime, and Article 21 of the Code Napoleon,

Declares:

1. No vessel of war or privateer of either of the belligerent parties will be allowed to enter or stay with prizes in our ports or roadsteads longer than twenty-four hours, excepting in case of compulsory delay (relache forcée).

2. No sale of goods belonging to prizes is allowed in our ports and roadsteads.

3. Every Frenchman is prohibited from taking a commission under either of the two parties to arm vessels of war, or to accept letters of marque for privateering purposes, or to assist in any manner whatsoever the equipment or armament of a vessel of war or privateer of either party.

4. Every Frenchman, whether residing in France or abroad, is likewise prohibited from enlisting or taking service either in the land army or on board vessels of war or privateers of either of the two belligerent parties.

5. Frenchmen residing at home or abroad must likewise abstain from any act which, committed in violation of the laws of the empire, or of international law, might be considered as an act hostile to one of the two parties, and contrary to the neutrality which we have resolved to observe. All persons acting contrary to the prohibitions and recommendations contained in the present declaration will be prosecuted, if required, conformably to the enactments of the law of the 10th of April, 1825, and of Articles 84 and 85 of the Penal Code, without prejudice to the application that might be made against such offenders of the enactments of the 21st Article of the Code Napoleon, and of Articles 65 and following of the Decree of the 24th of March, 1852, on the Merchant Service, 313 and following of the Penal Code for the Navy.

His Majesty declares, moreover, that every Frenchman contravening the present enactments will have no claim to any protection from his Government against any acts or measures, whatever they may be, which the belligerents might exercise or decree.

NAPOLEON.

Thouvenel, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

It has been ascertained beyond a doubt that information of the movements of our troops have been reported on many occasions, and especially on the night of the advance of our regiments upon Little, and subsequently Great Bethel. Also that much traitorous correspondence is carried on between the Confederate Government and ladies residing in Washington and the large cities North and East, and that letters are constantly carried into Virginia concealed in the clothing of ladies travelling. The utmost vigilance is now exerted, and it is supposed that this means of affording information to the enemy will henceforth be stopped. With regard to the male traitors who betray the secrets of the Government, if taken they should be summarily hanged. A strong and terrible example is needed, and no weakness should be allowed to interfere with the course of justice. The correspondents of the newspapers do undoubtedly most seriously embarrass the movements of the Government. They are eternally spying and eavesdropping, and their guesses frequently verge upon facts, which, published broadcast over the Union next morning, expose much that should be, and was intended to be, hidden from the public. Strong measures have been taken to remedy this, even to the length of having "Our Specials" arrested and imprisoned. It is well known that our papers travel South, and information is received in Virginia in advance of many of our near States.

Troops are literally pouring into Washington at the rate of one thousand and sometimes five thousand men a day. It is now stated from official returns that over two hundred and twenty-five thousand troops are mustered and in the pay of the United States Government. The largest portion of this immense force is now concentrating upon Virginia, and it is almost certain that the Secessionists have no adequate force to resist this immense army, directed by one of the greatest soldiers of the age. Let us trust that the magnitude of the power displayed may prove to the Secession leaders the hopelessness of resistance, and lead them to the consideration of the policy of forcing the blockade, and spending a few months at Baden-Baden. The Southern people left to themselves, and rid of those turbulent, pestilent, ambitious political leaders who have plunged the country into a bloody war and mercantile ruin, would speedily crush out this armed protest against the Federal authority, and settle the difficulty constitutionally in the Congress of the United States.

Jefferson Davis is said to be very sick. Why does he not take the ultra-ubiquitous Beauregard, the mighty Wigfall and a few others, and make the European tour? Floyd would supply the means, and would probably go himself, as the climate of the Western hemisphere may soon become unhealthy for him. If this suggestion is acted upon, it would relieve our Southern brethren of a useless and expensive crew of agitators, spare the shedding of oceans of gallant fraternal blood, and reunite our common country in that bond of brotherhood which has made it the wonder and dread of European monarchies, and the hope and the glory of freemen all over the world.

PERSONAL.

Ex-Alderman Briggs, the fidus Achates of the celebrated Branch, died of apoplexy on the 22d June. He was talking to a friend in the store of Haley, Sayre & Co., when he fell dead. He was an earnest, honest man. We can give no higher praise to an Alderman.

Baron Manteuffel and Herr Twesten (what horrible names these Prussian duellists have!) had a passage at arms recently at Potsdam. Manteuffel wounded his antagonist in the ball of his right hand, which stopped the fight. As Twesten had written a libellous pamphlet on Manteuffel, the punishment was appropriate.

George Vandenhoff, famous for his Shakespeare and his gallantries, was one of the passengers in the Great Eastern. During the voyage he opened the Atlantic Theatre, and gave an entertainment for the benefit of a sailor's widow. Vandenhoff is now doing good service in brushing the cobwebs from John Bull's eyes. He is showing up Floyd's gigantic conspiracy. He has lately written to a friend declaring, "Not one in a dozen go in for the slaveocracy. Pam would fall to-morrow were he to lean to the South. But John Bull is old, cautious and indomitable, and when he has made up his mind he means it. Believe one thing I tell you—every individual Englishman looks upon a Southerner as an infinitesimal Bombo. Mrs. Beecher Stowe's book is again uppermost, and I know that the Duchess of Sutherland has ordered a shilling edition of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" to be issued immediately, paying the authoress and her London publisher a handsome sum to guard against loss."

The Gazette de France says that Dr. Schoelin has been sent for to London, to attend a consultation on Queen Victoria's health, to which the most celebrated English and German physicians have been summoned. This illustrious lady, the pet of America as well as England, being of a composite blood, requires a committee of physicians to ascertain "her equation." We most fervently hope that the best of all sovereigns will yet recover her mental composure. We must, however, add, en passant, that if anything could more endear this excellent feminine to the American people it would be a mental prostration caused by a beloved mother's death.

It has been suggested to us by several correspondents that the North will lose its character for prudence if it carries its gallantry much farther than it does at present. Colonel Magruder, who commanded the rebel assassins at Great Bethel, sent his wife and daughters (or sisters) to the North, and Brigand-General Beauregard has sent his wife and her adopted daughter (a niece) to Cambridge, on account of her delicate health. In mentioning this fact we regret to see a very flippant article in the New York Times calling attention to Mrs. Beauregard's want of personal attractions. Surely a warrior who would run ten miles after his bet at Solferino, would run to the antipodes after Mrs. Beauregard if her charms were felt.

The Tribune says "Mrs. Lincoln showed presence of mind recently. She drove over to Virginia, to have a look at the camps, attended by her two youngest sons, Mrs. Grimsley and General Walbridge. In descending a hill near the Twenty-fifth New York regiment, the horses attached to the Presidential carriage stumbled and fell, throwing the driver off the box and breaking the pole. Mrs. Lincoln clung to her youngest boy, and leaped safely from the carriage, while General Walbridge gallantly protected the other boy and Mrs. Grimsley." We venture to hope that Mrs. Lincoln's husband will show presence of mind and get rid of the "Weeds" who are now ruining that garden, the American Union. We congratulate Mrs. Grimsley upon her gallant protector, General Walbridge, whose tailor is a sly Fox.

Garibaldi's daughter, Theresa, is married at last. The happy or unhappy man is a Major Canzio.

The correspondent of a New York paper says: "One day lately, when the brilliant crowd in the Champs Elysées was thick, the horse of M. Kardi ran away, and in pursuing his fiery course would doubtless have severely injured some of the promenaders, had not a policeman, named Diskey, resolutely faced the steed and arrested him. The highest lady in the land happened to be driving by, and witnessed the intrepidity of the policeman, who next morning was astonished by receiving a gold watch bearing the cypher of one who, of course, was no less a personage than the Empress." The most serious of our readers will say, "This is a Discovery."

Major General Hall, the great musician, has ordered a grand parade on the 4th of July. He will be assisted by Colonel Lefferts, of the Seventh, and Colonel Le Clare, of the Fifty-fifth regiments.

Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, after a narrow escape of being assassinated by the Southern chivalry, arrived in Washington on Saturday. He received the compliment of a serenade in the evening, and made a speech urging all to uphold the Union. He said that the majority of Tennesseeans were loyal, but were under the control of armed and drunken Secessionists. In point of fact, the whole thing had been a gigantic conspiracy and surprise. He said that the rebels were men of desperate morals and fortunes.

We have received from Mr. Aug. B. Sage, a copy of the gold medal about to be presented to Colonel Anderson of Sumpter renown. It is the result of a joint subscription of one hundred of our most prominent citizens, among whom are Moses Taylor, P. Perch, R. G. Goodhue, Brown Bros., &c. On one side is a representation of Fort Sumpter in flames, under which is subscribed "April 12 and 13, 1861." On the reverse is "To Major Robert Anderson, U.S.A., from the citizens of New York city, as a slight tribute to his patriotism." This inscription is encircled with stars, around which is engraved, "Prudens, fidelis, et audax. Invictæ fidelitatis præmium." This medal is equally creditable to all concerned—as a work of art, of appreciation and valor.

WAR NEWS FROM THE NORTH, EAST AND WEST.

PENNSYLVANIA, Harrisburg.—On the 21st of June six thousand troops passed through for Washington. The same day two regiments were dispatched to the assistance of the men employed in forming the camp at New Freedom, York county, as Governor Curtin had telegraphed that the rebels had fired upon them and killed two.

Pittsburgh.—In the machine shop was a ten-inch Columbiad on the lathe whose bore seemed of sufficient capacity to put your head into it with ease, while on the other lathes were eight-inch Columbiads and a number of eight-inch howitzers. At these works the celebrated Rodman gun, now at Fortress Monroe, was cast, and still later another immense gun, weighing over 50,000 pounds, and carrying a fifteen-inch shell weighing nearly 300 pounds, and requiring nine pounds of powder as a charge. A number of the monster pills lay in piles around, while vast quantities of 6, 12, 24, 32, 64 pound balls and shells of various calibre were scattered in heaps around the building. A large number of eight and ten-inch mortars were being bored and turned, and iron mortar balls lay scattered in every direction, denoting great bustle and activity. On the 21st a number of eight-inch howitzers and two Columbiads were tested at the proving-ground, twenty miles above this city, with success, and will be shipped for the seat of war early this week. On Friday, the 14th, Knapp, Rudd & Co., received a larger order from Government for eleven navy guns of the Dahlgren patent, for sea service. There are several hundred men employed here, and the manufactory is in operation day and night. They have also at this factory a battery of six twelve-pound iron guns with which the workmen drill every evening. Though heavier than the brass pieces, they are a very serviceable cannon for light artillery.

KANSAS.—Governor Robinson has issued a proclamation calling all good citizens to organize into military companies. He says Missouri having declared war against the Federal Government, Kansas is liable to invasion by the rebels. He says one or two infantry corps will be sworn into the United States service for three months.

The Second Kansas regiment, in camp at Wyandotte, has been mustered in. Captain John's command will be organized as an independent company.

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XXV.—CONTINUED.

AT length news came. D'Almaine was decreed an outlaw, his estates confiscated; and the once rich, influential Count d'Almaine found that two hundred a year in the English funds, which he had settled on his wife at her marriage, with a stock of plate and jewels, was the whole of his worldly wealth—poor indeed, to one whose luxurious mode of living had been unbounded; but he had a light heart, a careless nature, and only said, on reading the documents from his counsel, transmitted to him through Batiste:

"Well, Lucille dearest, my news is better than none. This, bad as it is, will free us from the monotony of this wretched village, which, although surrounded and embellished with nature's greatest beauties, has been to me little better than a prison, from being compelled to be mewed up in it. We will quit it as soon as possible—in the morning, if you are ready."

"I am quite willing," she returned. "Whither shall we go?"

"To London, most assuredly," said D'Almaine.

"But will our means allow us to live in London?" asked Lucille, doubtingly. "They are small in a place where money is of so little value, I mean where it will not go far, and I do not know what kind of economist I am. And you, Jules, will require the whole for pocket-money."

"And a trifle, too," he said, smilingly. "Well, we will look out for a little place in the suburbs, and hope for the best."

Accordingly the next evening they were at an hotel in the metropolis, where they remained till they had taken and furnished a cottage at Fulham. It was a prettily fitted-up place, standing in a flower garden, and to those unaccustomed to little better might have been an Eden; but to D'Almaine, who had trod the spacious halls of his ancestors, the twelve-feet dimensioned floors which he crossed with his long strides were almost unendurable, and the more so as he possessed not the power to alter it, and it cost him many a bitter pang that Lucille, with all her beauty and worth, should be doomed to pass it in such obscurity; while she, satisfied with any home that he shared with her, wanted only the presence of her child to make her happy; but they had been three months settled in their cottage at Fulham yet Madeline had not brought Birdie to her, and to her repeated letters urging her to do so, some excuse was named, an early time which some other excuse terminated; but assurances always came of the child's health and happiness, and although anxious and nervous about her child, she was compelled to remain satisfied and hopeful.

Annette, who had come with her mistress to England, and who had nursed the little girl, pined to see her, and was loud in her complaints against Madame Batiste at her unnecessary delay.

D'Almaine, who had noble friends in England, was much sought after; his handsome person and gay fascinating manners making him always welcome wherever he presented himself. Lucille, on his account, had many invitations to fashionable assemblies. She visited two or three, where her uncommon beauty was the general theme, but she soon gave up these visits as suiting neither her inclination nor circumstances, and as D'Almaine was in his glory among the great and gay, she was for days, which increased to weeks, alone and sad in her small suburban home.

About this time Lucille's father and mother came to visit her. It was the first interview since her misfortunes, and of course was painful on both sides. Lucille was pale and thin, and her father imputed it greatly to the absence of D'Almaine, who was indeed more a visitor than a host. He mentioned his suspicions to his daughter.

"No, father," she replied. "I scarcely regret Jules's mixing in the world, as it is the element in which he was bred, and it is genial to him; it makes his home sweeter when he returns to it, and my presence more pleasing than if I were always near to admonish, or to remind him of his lost position. He is ever kind and loving, and I am satisfied with him and with my home. I want only my child to make me happy."

"And it is strange that they do not bring her," said her father. "The Batistes, usually considerate, are sadly at fault in this."

"He has a long lease of his farm," said Lucille, "which fortunately cannot in the general wreck be wrested from him, and in endeavoring to let it, which I understand is his desire, he is necessarily detained, and Madeline being so expert a housewife, her presence is essential just now; but though I sigh for my Birdie's sweet prattle, I know she is safe and happy as if with me."

"No, nothing is to be apprehended for her safety," said her father, "for I believe, and am certain, that the child is as dear to Madeline and Jacques as to any of us. But, my child, have you had any communication from the haughty countess, your mother-in-law?"

"Jules had a letter from her, which he scorned to answer," replied Lucille, "for she throws the whole blame of our reverse of fortune on me."

"Cruel woman," said her father. "Misfortune has no influence on her callous heart. Is she still in Paris?"

"Yes," replied Lucille, "she has her jointure, so that the late proceedings but little affect her pecuniary circumstances, further than she has been compelled to quit her mansion for a more humble abode."

"But her pride will be humbled," said her father, "if anything can reach her heart that will, and I trust she may yet suffer; for I fear it was her infamous report about you which made the unfortunate De Palgron the victim of his folly. Well, well," he added, soothingly, "I see I distress you. We will leave this wicked woman to her own reflections—they will be her punishment."

CHAPTER XXVI.

A FORTNIGHT after Lucille had quitted France, Madeline Batiste with her little charge stepped into a chaise, which was to take them to Rouen, to meet the diligence to convey them to Paris, from whence they were to proceed to Calais and thence to England, Madeline preferring this long route to a shorter one to Dieppe, where the journey by sea to Brighton was so long that she refused to undertake it.

It was a fine morning in bright October, and the warm sun dispelling the night frost, shot his golden beams on the good-humored face of Madeline and on the beautiful one of the little girl, whose innocent but ardent remarks drew many a smile and fond reply from the quiet, staid Batiste, whose countenance was ever and anon tinctored with melancholy at the idea of the approaching separation, which, to his evident dissatisfaction, every minute hastened.

At length the lofty spires of the cathedral were in sight; Madeline's face lengthened, and the child's remarks remained unanswered. It was the first time Madeline had been separated from her husband more than a few days; now it might be for months, and gloomy anticipations of ill hung on her usually buoyant spirits; but they were entering the city, the diligence was in sight, and Madeline forced a smile on her lips, lest her melancholy should affect Batiste. But they had not time for long thought; by the time they and their luggage were placed inside the ponderous vehicle the driver had jumped into his immense boots, and was cracking his whip, the well-known summons for departure; and at last they had to take a hasty adieu, but handkerchiefs were waving from the window as long as the last sign of Batiste was visible, when Madeline with a deep sigh for the first time looked round on her fellow-passengers.

There were three passengers in the diligence; one a stout bluff Englishman with a round red face, betokening with his bulk the good cheer of merry England. He was very loquacious, and kept his neighbor, a serious-looking man with an Italian cast of countenance, about eight-and-twenty, in constant conversation, sometimes about the English stocks, at others—for he was somewhat learned—he dipped into the poets, which last subject seemed better suited to his companion, as he entered into deep controversy with him while on the money subject. When not silent, monosyllables were his only reply. The third, who sat beside Madeline, was a pale consumptive-looking man, apparently thirty-five, perhaps younger; for he was muffled up closely and shabbily attired; he was almost a silent auditor of the conversation passing opposite to him. Once he offered Birdie some bonbons, then returned to his corner of the diligence, where it seemed he would have slept but for his troublesome cough, which the lozenges he constantly had recourse to seemed little to appease.

They had gone about half their journey. Birdie had fallen to sleep, and was carefully covered up with numerous shawls by her careful friend; the consumptive man had found a short cessation, and dozed also, and the two other gentlemen were deep in discussion. The diligence had stopped to change horses, when Madeline, unused to travel, was seized with faintness, and cried out rather suddenly,

"Some one let me out a few minutes. I am sick and giddy—the air will revive me."

The door was opened; she descended the steps, and staggered across the court towards the house. The conversation, slightly interrupted, continued; the horses were put to, and the diligence was again in motion, regardless of the absence of Madeline Batiste. The horses were changed, and again changed and though now her place was observed to be vacant, none noticed it, all probably supposing she had gone as far in the vehicle as she intended. The poor child, thus so unconsciously deserted, continued in its happy slumber, till the wheel of the carriage passing over a large stone, jolted heavily, leant tiltingly on one side, and as it crushed its impediment to atoms in revolving, made a loud cracking sound. It awoke Birdie, who starting up, threw her covering from her, rubbed her eyes, and looking round affrighted, uttered in half peevish, half affrighted tones,

"Where is Madeline? Take me to Madeline"

Had a pistol been fired through the vehicle more surprise and alarm could scarcely have been exhibited by the three men who occupied it, though each was differently affected.

"What!" exclaimed the Englishman, "a child belonging to the woman who quitted us three stages off? Gentlemen, it is palmed upon us, by all that is infamous!"

"I think," returned the young man who sat beside him, "the young woman was affected with giddiness, and merely left the diligence for air. No doubt she is in great tribulation at the loss of her child."

"No, no, nothing of the kind," said the Englishman; "these tricks upon travellers are often practised all over the world; and take my word for it this child has been left for one of us to take compassion on. For my own part, I wash my hands of it; I have a jealous wife, and dare no more notice the child than fly. My wife would suspect a thousand things, which might bring on a complaint, not only of the tongue, but of the heart. I repeat, I wash my hands of the affair altogether."

"I have not a jealous wife," said the young man, smiling, "but am, from other circumstances, quite as unable as yourself to take charge of this little helpless one. I may at present call myself a homeless man, with a long and uncertain journey before me."

The consumptive man, drawing the crying child towards him, tried by kind words, and the offer of his bonbons, to solace her. "What is your name, little one?" he asked.

"Birdie," was the reply.

"Birdie," he repeated; "but what else? What other name?"

"No other," said the child. "But where is Madeline—my Madeline?"

"Is Madeline your mamma?" he interrogated.

"No," she replied; "mamma is in the box."

This was in allusion to Lucille's miniature, which she had seen Madeline place among the clothes in the trunk.

"And where do you live, my dear?" asked the young man.

"Once at the chateau," she replied, "now at the farm. Oh, take me to the farm! I must go to the farm!"

"If I take you to the farm, will you see papa?"

"No, no, papa has gone over the water, a long, long way. Will you take me over the water to papa?"

As she said this she looked so beseechingly in the poor man's face that he drew her still closer to him, saying, as he did it, "Poor child! is it possible they could desert you, so young, so beautiful, so helpless! I dare not think human nature so depraved. Here, take these bonbons, and let me wipe the tears from your cheeks. I will hold you in my arms; perhaps you can sleep again."

The child took the sweetmeats, but held them in her hand; her infant heart was too full to eat them, yet she nestled close to him, and touching his wan cheek with her plump, rosy fingers, said, "I will try not to cry, because you are good, and will take me to Madeline. Oh, pray take me, monsieur, if I do not cry."

Hiding her face in his bosom, her sobs were audible for a few minutes, then they sank into a low, plaintive moan, till they ceased altogether, and she again slept.

"Poor little girl!" said the stout gentleman. "A pretty child, a very pretty child. Monsters to desert her; probably her father has run away over the water, to get rid of the incumbrance, and the mother thinks of doing the same. It is obvious, quite obvious. I shall be glad when I quit this ill-omened conveyance. I suppose, if I leave it at the last stage it will not be difficult to get posthorses to Paris."

"Not if you pay for them," returned the young man, drily. "Any inn will supply you with them." Then turning to the consumptive man, he added, "Her troubles, poor thing, are hushed for a time, but at the end of the journey, if we all forsake her——"

"We will not all do so," returned the one spoken to. "I have an idea that accident, not design, has placed the child in this perilous situation, but be it which it may, for the present, I will take her to my own poor home. I have a little one of the same age; it will be no great charity to let her share the same bed. Here is my card. As I live, as you will perceive, fourteen miles on the other side of Paris, I may be out of the way of inquiries; if you should hear anything concerning this affair, as a man of feeling you will inform me."

The young man took the card, and the stout gentleman glanced at it, and both read, "Jean Perre, Saules, near Versailles."

"I leave Paris to-night," was the young man's reply, "but will preserve your card, and certainly will communicate any intelligence I may hear."

Little occurred worth notice the remainder of the journey, except that the stout gentleman took leave of them, pack and package, the stage before Paris, his doubts still remaining, spite of the tailor's assurances, that being the greatest personage of the three, whether the child might not be imposed on him ultimately.

On getting out of the diligence at Paris, a large trunk was taken from the boot. "It is the person's belonging to the child," said the young man; "and of course, as you take the incumbrance attached to it, it is yours. Probably it may contain a clue to unravel the mystery."

The trunk was put into the coach, a short stage one, which passed near the tailor's cottage, and with the child still in his arms, though scarcely able to bear the burden, the sickly man followed it.

"Adieu," said the young man, shaking hands with him from the window. "Yours is a kindly heart. May it meet its reward!"

"Yes, in heaven," said Perre, smiling; "for I am not long for earth."

"Long or short," said the young man; "you are an ornament to earth, and a beautiful example to man. Like yourself, I am not rich, but I can spare this trifle in a good cause." Putting a purse into Perre's hand, he turned into the courtyard as the coach drove off.

Perre looked at the purse with an eye that said, "I had rather not have it." He then let it drop slowly into his pocket, adding, "The poor should not be proud, nor grudge sharing a just act with another."

The coach stopped before his own door; his wife and child stood there ready to receive him; the former, a young woman, finely but slatternly attired; the latter a pale, sickly-looking little girl, five or six years old, with unnaturally large bright eyes, and rather precocious appearance.

Jean Perre alighted with his burden in his arms, ordered the trunk to be brought in, and setting Birdie on a chair, kissed his wife, and fondly embraced his child. A good fire blazed on the hearth, and the room, though small and cottage-like, seemed furnished with the remnants of better days; but all, with the exception of the bright fire, had the air of untidiness and mismanagement, and the tablecloth, spread for a frugal supper, bore the semblance of many weeks having passed since it had come in collision with soap and water.

As soon as the greetings were over, the wife, looking towards the chair where Birdie was deposited, exclaimed, "But, St. Beatrice, what have you here, Perre?"

"A child, Rose," he replied, with some emotion, "a poor deserted child. I had not the heart to leave her in the diligence when we had a roof to cover her."

"But, Jean Perre, you should have thought of our poverty," said his wife. "How can we keep other people's children when we can hardly keep our own, and you so ill, and Blanche wanting extra nourishment?"

"And she shall have it," said Perre in a husky tone, pressing the child in his arms; "but the coffee, Rose! Neither the little foundling nor myself have had aught beside a few bonbons during our long and trouble-fraught journey.'

He took Birdie from the chair where she had remained in silent wonder, looking from one to the other, and taking her hat and shawls from her, turned her towards his wife.

"But she is a pretty child,' said Rose, setting down the coffee pot to look more closely at the little aspirant for her favor, "and, blessed Mary! how grand she is dressed!—an India muslin frock fine as a web, trimmed with Valenciennes lace, and a Leghorn hat as good, and the ribbon on it at least three francs a yard."

Little Blanche stepped noiselessly up to the child, and touched with her thin white finger the articles her mother was expatiating on; then the fingers wandered to the long black curls of Birdie, and lifting them one by one from the graceful little shoulders, she smiled admiringly, and taking her hand led her to a seat beside her own.

Blanche retained the little hand she had taken till the supper was placed in equal portions before the children, when a large tabby cat put his broad velvety paws on the lap of Birdie, purring and rubbing his head against her hand for notice

"Go," said the child in a peevish tone, "I do not want you—you are not papa's Lion."

"It is Jose," said Blanche, who now for the first time spoke, in a soft, winning voice, "Jose, so large and handsome; he is all mine, and if you like you shall have half of him, quite half."

Birdie seemed to feel the weight of this generous offer, for she caressed the animal, and fed him, saying,

"Yes, he is very handsome; I will have half of Jose, and I'll take you to see papa's Lion when we go to the chateau. What's your name?"

"Blanche," she replied.

"And I am Birdie," said the child.

Blanche laughed gently, and repeated the name. The meal being concluded, Rose Perre proposed putting the children to bed, being anxious to learn more particulars of her husband's protegé. But on entering the room where the little bed of Blanche stood still unmade, and which in a hurried, careless manner she was smoothing, the color of the sheets was so unusual to what the delicate and sensitive Birdie had been accustomed to, that she exclaimed in the pettish tones of a child whose every wish had been studied,

"I do not like that dirty bed; I will not go to it. I want my own nice bed, with the muslin curtains lined with rose silk."

Rose felt almost as angry as her indolent disposition would permit at this reflection on her cleanliness, and answered sharply,

"Oh, you are a dainty puss, with your rose pink curtains! You have done with them now, miss; so jump into bed."

The child was inclined to be equally peremptory, had not Blanche, in a low, soft voice, said,

"It is a nice bed, Birdie, so soft and warm. It is my bed, all mine. Won't you have half, Birdie?"

"Yes," answered Birdie, still sobbing, "if it is yours, I will have half; but to-morrow we will go to the chateau, and we will both sleep in my beautiful bed, and go into my handsome bath with Indian birds and flowers on it. Have you a bath, Blanche?"

ARRIVAL OF THE FIRST AND SECOND CONNECTICUT REGIMENTS AT THE VILLAGE OF FALLS CHURCH, NEAR VIENNA, VA., ON WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 19TH, SUBSEQUENT TO THE SURPRISE OF THE OHIO REGIMENT BY THE MASKED SECESSION BATTERY.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ACCOMPANYING GENERAL M'DOWELL'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 103.

"Yes," said Blanche, lowly. A lash was unknown to her, poor child, as she never was almost a stranger in absence, while it was present her time was spent in the closest child-like intimacy.

Rose Perre returned to her husband; he was leaning his face on his hands, and spoke not a word.

"Jean," she said, touching him, "are you worse this evening? This adventure will do you no good. I wish you had left the child for some one else to take it to."

"If there had been another to have done so, I might," he replied, raising his head; "for should there be no inquiries after the child, as she will be safe with me, I love you still."

"Don't rest trouble's half way, Jean," said Rose, moved as much as her constant nature was capable of by his words; "I am glad I hoped this jaunt would have done you good." While speaking, she took up one of Blanche's boots, and, with the quickness of a fairy, throwing it over her own shoulders, exclaimed, "What a beautiful shoe!—really, I shall make a fairy of her, she is so small and delicate, and exactly the thing I most want!"

The husband sighed for the child's future destiny.

And to go to some of your neighbors, Rose, Ah! with the property you have, you could have other thoughts. A dying husband, and only our little Blanche, and the child, Rose, you have taken on her face, should bring other reflections."

"Now for a peep with the forest of fairy words, a tear strayed down her cheek; but brushing it away, she said with a sob,

"They say, Jean, that we give up our life to the angels in the world; we are both sorrowful to-night. Let us direct these sad thoughts by heaven to that little girl's image; we may feel something to lead to her parents."

"Birds, be explained," spoke the trunk!

Rose raised it on two chairs.

A gaoler's appointment for such a child," she observed, while doing it; "but where is the key?"

"I have it," said Jean.

"Oh! a chisel will force the lock," said his wife, and suiting the action to the word she applied the instrument to the lock and wrenched it open.

The first article which attracted her attention were two dresses of Madeline, a silk and merino; these she held before her with delight.

Exactly my own size," she said; "and the merino, and well made. I shall look well, indeed, like myself again. Jean, in these good clothes," she added, gaily, "I shall look a lady."

Jean looked again sighed and turned from her; but, without noticing that, she took a little sighteering cap, the only article of the little bundle from the box, repudiating on the beauty of each article as she displayed it to view.

"A fine stock of clothes!" she said. "The child must have rich friends to have such things. Lord, what beautiful lace!" she continued, "They will be Blanche. I shall equally divide them between the children. Our own poor child will be the better for the superfluous garments. But what is this?" said she, taking up a small box, fastened with a padlock, which was in a deep recess at the thumb, "a miniature, and of a lovely girl, by St. Beatrice, as beautiful as the figure herself! I wonder what it is worth? Yes, there is not the slightest resemblance. This is a fair, sunny beauty, like the mother of our little crime. Look at the rich golden hair and hair claim the south for birthplace." She turned the picture round, and exclaimed, "And what is here? A lock of hair! A lock of hair combined and bonded together with a knot of brilliants, cut from the head of the dear one! Jean, the child could not be the golden as the sun at noonday, the other dark as night, but not such glossy jet as this. Jean, look at this hair!"

"Too probably," answered Perre, "it belongs to the mother of the Englishman, Lord Lawrence," said the sculptor of her mother, Rose, perhaps, in the confusion has even taken the child's hair. Let it be replaced, concealed, lest on her mother was in the box."

"I cannot," said Rose, raising her head, "for the beautiful hair seek fastened to a black ribbon," said Rose. "I suppose it is a token not fitted for strangers. Jean, look at the hair, and tell me if it sembles glossed spun it."

Perre looked. "Every trifle is of consequence in such an event; and if the poor thing is but unwittingly lost, my heart is wrung for the child. It will occasion us trouble."

Rose brought the ring. Her husband saw at a glance it was valuable, but would not have given it a thought, but seeing the ring, with the cautionary idea, and who with children easily was adding how well it would become her look, if, as she had first considered, a plaything for a babe. Take it from your finger, Rose, and deposit it in the box with the miniature. Let the things be in a box, lit contents, and the clothes the child were to-day, may be carefully locked up, and secretly kept for her use. Secrecy is the only means of preserving her identity."

"But if we have the child with us, the least return in my mind will be to dispose of these trifles," said Rose. "Our good turn deserves another."

They are valuable," I tell you, to the child," said Perre, with a frown to which she would. Would you for such a trifle ruin the prospect of the child? Remember, we are poor, and have not a large sheet of paper and reading-was, they were securely sealed, and put exactly as they were. Perre, observing this, put in his pocket the purse his fellow-passenger had put into his hand at parting, and hastily left the cell.

Here is something that will buy those trifles twenty times over —the offering of a benevolent lady, unconscious of the unfortunate situation, and who has promised to make inquiries, in the hope of tracing the parents of the unknown child."

Rose took the purse, and weighed it with her thumb and forefinger.

"It is heavy," she cried. "Are its contents gold and silver?"

"I know not," was the reply; "I have not looked within; still putting my hand into my pocket for a paper, it came in contact with it."

Rose emptied its contents on the table, and counted the money. "This is extraordinary indeed. We can settle our rent in the morning, and then be free. Jean, you look pale; I will get you a glass of ing, and then be free. Jean, you look pale; I will get you a glass of wine, and you shall have it, but she is very aristocratic. She bed, good enough for our child, and, therefore, she will clothe her, and provide for her rose pink curtains and her bath."

Jean Perre smiled; and Rose, encouraged by his feelings were excited, and talking up his candle retired to bed. As he passed through the children's room he stopped for a moment by the side of the little cot, and gazed on the beautiful face of Blanche's. She were pressed with a smile—the happy smile of childhood—on her rosy lips and cheeks. While he gazed there was a movement of the eyelids, and the door opened and Rose stood there. Her finger on her lips, whispered,

"Monsieur, I will not cry. Take me to mamma."

The gentle voice, the soft accents, the fair face, slept not; both children haunted his imagination. "Wine will become of them when I am taken away?" he thought, and he still could not answer me. Happy are they who will be spared the anguish that would be doomed to feel for the parent; and happy the parent who has no misery will protect it."

Rose Perre had some tender feelings by nature, but they were unfortunately overbalanced by her love of money, and the constant lectures of her husband on her ingratitudinous conduct. Married young to a man much older than herself, she had been left a widow in her youthful, and who thought her love of pleasure had caused her husband's death, and, therefore, she considered herself justified in, and still ill was too late to be eradicated was Perre's desire at the time. He had no fixed employment, but occasionally made a comfortable home, and was surrounded by many of the luxuries of life, of which, through the extravagance of his wife's extravagance, one by one passed away from him; and, to a last resource, he had taken to sculpture, and was also inhabited, working as a tailor at a daily stipend. Even this, while he had strength to compose it, Perre would have cheerfully exhausted to, for Rose was industrious at times, and could finish off a waistcoat with as much neatly as himself, had her love of dancing been eradicated by their change of circumstances; but, on the contrary, it appeared increased. Her home, and child—by nature delicate, and by neglect sickly—were left most evenings to provide for themselves, while forgetful or repudiates of her duties, she laughed and danced with the gayest and lightest of the throng that met to celebrate their evening orgies at the nearest village from Perre's cottage.

To such a woman and such a home, though an unfortunate event, was the child of luxury and the loudest love now consigned.

We must now return to the mansion in Berkeley Square.

Thurlow had hardly time to draw close the door of the dark little closet in which he had so hastily placed himself, before a key applied to the chamber door, and the next instant, by the pressure of his spread the door of the recess in which he was concealed, he could see Miss Ross open with a curious force. Instantly he heard a shuffling step hastily perambulate the room in search of the intruder, and then the footsteps approached the closet in which he was concealed. Thurlow's heart beat violently, and he was in a state of most interesting whether a bad boss entered during his absence.

Passover's heart was nearly at his mouth. Pungenby's voice exclaim:

"You may enter safely, we are alone."

A ray of light penetrated the recesses in the door, immediately close to his head, drew his attention, and he found that there was a small crack of part of the door, which, by placing his eye to, he could see the whole interior of the room, and the occupants.

He had not time to speculate, for his attention was engrossed by the face of the individual who immediately entered.

It was a countenance pale, stern, and dark. There was something exceedingly forbidding in the expression of the features, and Thurlow felt the blood rush to his heart as the impression which preceded it the presidency of forgetting, and of fear.

Pungenby, with his brown coat, and his white cravat on his throat, as for he completed his exam as the companion of Erle Gower and the Master of Kingswood Mote.

The figure, stern man was about to enter with Pungenby, to reveal secrets, which, if discovered, would have placed his life in jeopardy, and he felt that to be detected was safety concealed by contact where he could hear all with impunity. DRUMMING THIEVES OUT OF FORTRESS MONROE.

The usual routine of camp duty on the outposts toward Hampton was relieved yesterday morning, the 20th, by a "drumming out" performance, which afforded the soldiers much amusement—the two principal performers being a pair of thieves. The culprits were brought up in line, extending along between the encampments of Colonel Bendix's and Colonel Townsend's regiments of Massachusetts. Two privates of Colonel Cast's regiment who had been sentenced by court martial to have their heads shaved, and drummed out of camp, for repeatedly, had previously been stripped of their stripes and other military insignia, and their heads were shaved in the presence of the troops to which they belonged. Their heads were shaved by the barbers among them. In this novel and ridiculous regalia, with other incidental accompaniments, they were marched down the line between the two lines, preceded by a file of soldiers, and the fierce playing right merrily the Rogue's March.

"Poor old soldier, tarred and feathered," &c.

While several along the line snobbit hammed the words for the gratification of the public, and the rest of the band played on.

The scene was one of great merriment among the regiments, and the performance was considered a good joke by the majority of soldiers, with true soldierly pride about him, would scarcely prefer such an ill fate as that of desertion.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES OF THE WAR.

JOHN FARMER then wrote to the Philadelphia Press: "The other day I was in company with some officers, paying a visit to the camp and fortifications at Washington, when one of them, who had been in the skirmishing at Bull Run, related the following remarkable escape: He was in command of a drunken soldier on his way to the guard-house, who, on seeing us, said, 'Boys, I am a prisoner, but I am not going to be taken alive.' 'What do you mean?' 'What do?' was the natural inquiry.

'I mean exactly what I say,' answered he. 'Didn't get drunk on Sunday. No, I'll get drunk on four hours of hard work, and then gobble—' Here the fellow, who was evidently a character, was interrupted by the command to march, and was marched off to the guard-house in the rear.

One of my acquaintance mentioned him to the sutler at the party, as' among the most remarkable men in the army. He is a Pennsylvania Dutchman, by name Hendrick or Peltz. The former then drew me upon the couch at his head, and told me that he was a native of the Fatherland, and, as he expressed it, could not, although he was poor 'I am brother of the Governor of No. 21 Hun.'"

He has evidently a very high opinion of his own importance.

"Yes," he said, "I have accepable features in a pictural. Good-bye! I must go and see the Commander-in-Chief."

HENRY M. BRENNAN, of Albany, has been appointed First Lieutenant in the Army, and ordered to report to General Sherman for service in Kentucky. Mr. Brennan was a page in the Assembly, and while there had picked up a fund of information which will be serviceable to him in his new position. He is a writer, he has also contributed to the press political articles of merit. He is a young man of fine personal appearance, and has considerable influence in the Democratic party. Mr. Brennan, it will be remembered, was the author of the letter to Governor Seymour, and said letter drew his fire by which he held he could prosecute his interior duties, and which he considered would be of service to him in the event of any political rise either that he was elevated young man, and would find for the Governor's office. Mr. Brennan has been appointed to the position of Lieutenant in the Army, and is now in command of a company with an eagle and a mustache, and, thus accompanied, he visited the prominent points of interest in Albany, and in no case more prominent than the printers. The reward for his services was the lieutenant's commission.

The Army appointments are now being made, composed of wisdom and ignorance, found a member of the Seventy gone belonging to the United States Army, and the Seventy are now in the field. Mr. Brennan is the only other position where they would be unlikely to do that serious injury, which they are now doing in the appointments to the Army. Mr. Brennan is a young man of fine personal appearance, and has considerable influence in the Democratic party. Mr. Brennan, it will be remembered, was the author of the letter to Governor Seymour, and said letter drew his fire by which he held he could prosecute his interior duties, and which he considered would be of service to him in the event of any political rise either that he was elevated young man, and would find for the Governor's office. Mr. Brennan has been appointed to the position of Lieutenant in the Army, and is now in command of a company with an eagle and a mustache, and, thus accompanied, he visited the prominent points of interest in Albany, and in no case more prominent than the printers. The reward for his services was the lieutenant's commission.

The Army appointments are now being made, composed of wisdom and ignorance, found a member of the Seventy gone belonging to the United States Army, and the Seventy are now in the field. Mr. Brennan is the only other position where they would be unlikely to do that serious injury, which they are now doing in the appointments to the Army. The security one feels, knowing that there is no danger of outlay out of pocket, is a great satisfaction. Feathers having been recommended to us as first thing to be used, we purchased one the other day while in Washington, and gave it a fair trial. The first night in the tent we found ourselves in bed, and a little before we retired to rest in the morning, probably as long ago as 3 o'clock, we were awakened from a nap with the cheerful shout, of 'Fresh fish! Fresh fish!' Some of the officers of our company rowed them in the same manner."

ASTOUNDING CURES.

Professor Rittenhouse, of the Trenton Academy, says: "Dr. Potts has done a thing unsurpassed in the treatment of the

MOST VIRULENT AND FATAL DISEASES

to which our race is subject."

S. L. Mosley, Esq., of 146 Broad St., Newark City, says: "For three years I was at times much afflicted with DYSPEPSIA, LIVER, HEART AND KIDNEY COMPLAINT. I had a distressing Cough, and was in a rapid decline. Dr. Potts positively cured me in less than two months."

Mr. Barry, of 70 New St., Newark:

"I was a great sufferer for many years from

Dyspepsia, Gravel and Nerve Complaints.

Dr. Potts cured my life, I believe. I commend the sick of my race to Dr. Potts. He is eminently qualified to cure all complaints peculiar to my sex."

Joseph Heck, Esq., of Orange St., Newark, says:

"I was in rapid decline from

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION AND LIVER COMPLAINT.

Dr. Potts restored me to sound health."

This work will be published in Semi-Monthly Numbers, its mammoth size will allow of the largest Engravings, and will contain a complete epitome of the war in which the country is involved, with all the facts, figures, incidents and anecdotes connected with its progress and campaigns, so as to form a reminiscency and permanent history of the time. All official and important Documents, emanating from the Rebels, will appear in full, with complete and authentic accounts and illustrations of all the striking incidents of the War, together with the Portraits of leading Citizens and Statesmen, Plans and Views of Fortifications, Ships, &c., &c. The Pictorial History of the War of 1861 will be invaluable to families, for in its magnificently illustrated pages even children can trace the course of events, while the work of reference for all classes to explain and impression will increase year by year. In its completed form it will be one of the most magnificent Historical Pictorial Works ever issued from any press in the world. Each number will be elegantly printed on fine white paper, in large clear type, and will be stitched in a cover with a beautiful illustrated Title Page.

SUCCESSFUL ENTERPRISE!

FRANK LESLIE'S

The Oldest, Most Brilliant and Most Enterprising

Illustrated Newspaper in America.

Within the few last weeks, although our Southern circulation is entirely cut off, as in that of every other paper, our Illustrated Newspaper has experienced the most triumphant evidence of the public approval of our efforts to present in our columns the most varied, striking and accurate illustrations of the great events transpiring on the whole line of military operations from Cairo to Alexandria—from Fort Pickens to Fortress Monroe. Not only has our casual circulation increased by very many thousands of copies weekly, but our Subscription List, the surest test of the value and popularity of a journal, has doubled.

It must not be supposed that this large increase of income is all profit. Our war expenses have risen in proportion to our gains.

in the various regiments now at or proceeding to the seat of war, and on the United States ships of war now engaged on the blockade, besides numerous first-class Photographers in the cities through which our troops pass.

The expenses incident upon these arrangements have foreseen our outlay enormously, but the result has justified our enterprise.

OUR PAGES REFLECT EVERY ACTION, INCIDENT AND MOVEMENT OF THE WAR,

in brilliant and accurate sketches taken on the spot, and transferred to our pages within a day or two of occurrence, together with views of fortresses, encampments, plans of battles, maps, and likilike portraits of prominent officers and statesmen, taking marked positions in the important events of the day.

We claim the precedence of all other illustrated journals in promptitude, enterprise and accuracy; and the public verdict in our favor is evidenced in a business success which has few parallels in the newspaper history of the world.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and residence on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from all parts of the country, and country without any word of explanatory matter, they giving us credit for being as an expert with everything that is suspected or sent to us all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which comes of great interest and importance to the world, still we have no pretensions but that something may occur beyond the ken of our far reaching information. We have had many photographs, daguerreotypes and ambrotypes sent (as above mentioned) should, as all ever, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

State of the Nation.

THE extra session of Congress which commences at Washington on the Fourth of July will be the most important and eventful session held since America became a nation. The questions to come before it are of the gravest and most momentous character, affecting the honor and the destinies of the present people and the prosperity of the country for many years to come. We trust that all small sectional questions will be abandoned, that party feeling will be obliterated, that all incendiary and inflammatory speeches will be omitted, and that the whole body of Representatives will discuss the mighty issues before them calmly, dispassionately and wisely. The nation is sadly needy of counsel, and needs no strong language to perpetuate its enthusiasm. It requires calm, humane and brotherly counsel to direct the action of the discreet good to an honorable peace. In such a course of consideration there need be no timorous yielding, no blinding submission to public opinion, no faltering, no fickleness, no want of energy or expedience; neither need there be recriminations, hot blood or hasty counsel, or implacable and bloody purpose. Its mission is to heal and not to aggravate the disorders of the body politic.

A portion of our country is in a state of armed rebellion; that must be dealt with firmly. But whatever action is taken to that end, it must have in view the fact that in the rebel States there are hundreds of thousands of citizens who are true and loyal to the traditions of the land, and upon whom will fall equally with those in armed hostility all the horrors and miseries of civil war. To strengthen and support these, to save their lives and property, and at the same time to quell most speedily the existing internecine strife and restore the Union of States should be the first thought and prompt action of the assembled legislators. Let not the precious time be wasted in angry and plethoric use the opponents of the Constitution, but let the quickest remedy be devised, and let the action follow quick upon the decision.

It is reported that, at an early day of the session, Senator Wilson, as Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will introduce a series of bills proposing the adoption of the following measures:

First—To legalize Executive action concerning the present declaration of war by Congress.

Second—Giving the sanction of law to the plan already announced for a blockade of the harbors of the South.

Third—Resisting ruthless and disabled army officers.

Fourth—To augment the number of regiments in the regular and National Guards, to be all clothed and armed alike.

Fifth—Granting authority to the President, in the extent of sixty-eight, to the number of Senators, and authorizing the President to fill the vacancies caused by resignation or otherwise in that institution.

It is also understood that $250,000,000 will be asked for, to enable the Government to complete the vast preparations necessary to repossess itself of the forts and other Federal property now in possession of the Secessionists, and to put down all armed resistance to its authority. Let this be granted freely and without cavil, for every day's delay in resolving the issue not only enhances the burden, but plunges the country into deeper distress and mercantile embarrassment.

These great measures settled, let the obnoxious Tariff be modified, so that none may be imposed to our languishing commerce.

It should be the duty of the present Congress to impose some of those high in power for abuse of office, such as clerks in counting-rooms, the most shameless swindling of pet contractors, and fraudulent abuses in their unholy spoils. That social devil "Routine" weighed heavily on the English soldier in the Crimea, but a more heartless fiend in the shape of a Contractor preys upon the comfort and life of our gallant soldiers in the field. In times of peace the swindler is pointed at and despised, but what shall be said of him who come untold wealth out of the necessities of his country—out of the life's blood of those arrayed in its defence? Language fails to furnish epithets sufficiently damning wherewith to brand the dastard, soulless wretch. And there are in many such who starve our soldiers, who clothe them with rottenness dignified by the name of clothing, who furnish them with wretched, useless arms, thus imperilling their lives and the safety of the State, and yet who bask in the smiles of those who rule, with cash insidious, the rulers of the land. If the doom of traitors and pirates is to be the gibbet, let every gallows in the land have its legitimate fruit of army contractors.

It is impossible to chronicle the progress of inaction, which is, simply, the present state of our affairs. Tens of thousands of men are chained within sight of each other, but policy restrains their order, directed doubtless by a wise and merciful counsel. The basked-for issue will be one of two things, every true patriot will look upon every delay which spares the effusion of kindred blood as a glimmering of hope that it may yet be spared altogether. There has been a peculiar reluctance to strike. The various host engagements on the Potomac have been ill-conceived and always ruinous. Batteries have been attacked by vessels unfitted for the duty, and always were of insufficient caliber, each attack resulting more or less disastrously for the Federal force. These petty actions, which would, in no event, result favorably, especially as it is now all prepared, seems more like playing at war than serious resolve; they should be stopped; such efforts, if made at all, should be made with sufficient force to insure success. Regulars and volunteer troops accompanied the expedition, the Secession batteries could have been taken and held or completely destroyed. The line of fierce trifling engaged in at Bethel Point resulted in the death of an able and tried officer, Captain Ward, whose services we can ill dispense with, and whose loss we sincerely lament. There should be an end of them.

There is trouble brewing in the command of General Butler, who has arrested Colonel Allen, a brave New York regiment, without, as it seems at present, sufficient cause. The circumstances, so far as they have reached us by telegraph, which can be relied on, are briefly stated as follows:

Colonel Allen and other officers have recently arrested a great many alleged Secessionists, particularly armed men engaged in conveying information to the enemy, and sent a number to Fort Monroe. It is said that General Butler has released them, almost without any investigation.

On Thursday morning Colonel Allen brought that negress and white men were gathered in a field of wheat, five miles off, which was the property of Major Thompson of the Southern troops. It was to be seen from Hampton, and a body of the laborers came from the Virginian side and before they previously confronted from the Virginian, to aid in carrying the wheat off. Colonel Allen not only arrested the negress, but sent out a squad of men to prevent the wheat from being carried away. It was not long before the wheat field was on fire, and twenty acres of it were consumed.

On the supposition that the field was burned by Colonel Allen's directions, General Butler issued a special order censuring Colonel Allen in respect to the matter, and ordered his release. Colonel Allen, however, declined to accept the release, and resigned his command, Colonel Allen's command devolving in the meantime, upon Lieutenant-Colonel Dyckman of the New York First regiment.

Subsequently, it was ascertained that the negress that Colonel Allen has been arrested, and that a very general sentiment of dissatisfaction has existed against General Butler ever since the Bethel affair, on account of the unnecessary human sacrifice of life through the incompetency of the superior officers.

In our last we gave an account of an arrangement said to have been entered into between the Federal Government of Kentucky, guaranteeing its neutrality providing the State Government resisted the presence of Secession troops on its shores. The following, however, is a letter from General McClellan, and the absurd story set at rest.

The arrest of Marshal Kane, of Baltimore, well-known as a vigorous opponent of the Lincoln Administration, and the substitution of Colonel Kenley as Provost-Marshal in his place, has created a deep and agitating sensation in that city. The following notices were made July 3rd, by Major-General Banks, for the Marshal's office and various police stations were found filled with concealed arms, cannons and munitions of war. The Commissioners, however, and the Police Commissioners dismissed their force, which Colonel Kenley has replaced with trusty Union men, and have issued a strong proclamation for the suppression of disorder and the military commander. To this protest Major-General Banks has issued the following reply:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF ANNAPOLIS,
JULY 3rd, 1861.

To Colonel Kenley, Provost-Marshal:

SIR—The situation has arisen out of a resolution, purporting to have been this day passed by the late Board of Police Commissioners, suppressing the Police Force of Baltimore, and creating another organization at the same time the operations of the police law, and puts the officers and men out of duty for the present.

You will therefore take charge of the police stations and property, and see that neither the law nor the officers appointed to execute the laws are affected in any manner. Communicate with me at once in case of any interference by the Board of Commissioners and the Chief of Police, whose functions were and are suspended. Report and put in force the police law of 1860, and all other laws in force which relate to the authority of the Commissioners and Chief of Police; and every officer and man of the police force will continue in the discharge of his duty, and be considered in service by you, in the position they now occupy, and with the advantages of pay and rank which now or more shall relate to the same position.

If any police officer declines to perform his duty, in order to avoid the necessity which it was the purpose of the Commissioners in passing upon the city, by incorrectly stating that it had been by my act or direction of its police protection, you will inform him that he is relieved from duty by his own act, and that he will be considered as having resigned his office.

You will also take especial notice that no military resolution or other act of the Board of Commissioners of Police can relieve any person from any of the duties now, or to-morrow may become, required of him by the civil authorities. If any officer, except such as are actually bound, leave the service, it will be regarded as desertion.

You will report promptly to me any violation of the laws or public order.

I repeat my declaration and my purpose—no intervention with the laws or the movement of the city whatever is intended, except to prevent riot, violence and treasonable combinations of disloyal men against the Government of the United States.

I am, sir, very truly yours, &c.,
N. P. BANKS.

The latest advices from Baltimore state that the plot of a general uprising in favor of the Secession cause, under Secession auspices, has been arrested and sent to Fort McHenry, and that the Federal troops have occupied the city and planted cannon in various commanding positions. It is to be feared that the turbulent spirit of Baltimore will not be quieted without a desperate and bloody fight; a result to be lamented, and if possible, avoided.

It is stated on telegraphic authority that Harper's Ferry has been reoccupied by Secession troops, who have destroyed all the remaining property, bridges, &c., and have driven every Union family from the desolated and ruined place.

Troops continue to pour into Washington by the thousand per day, from whence they are despatched to take up their positions in the ranks of the advancing army, which now numbers, within twenty-four hours of horseback travel, over eighty-five thousand men.

It seems to be the general opinion that no further advance will be made until after the meeting of Congress on the Fourth of July, after which date it is rumored that the Generals-in-Chief, Winfield Scott, will order a simultaneous advance of all his columns upon the Secession positions in Virginia, and force the Southern army back upon Richmond. We give these rumors as they pass by; they may be true or false, but one thing is certain, that the present delay must remark, for grave reasons to both sides, last much longer. The feverish anxiety of the country upon the subject is natural, but the cooler presentiments accompany to insure a successful issue to a great movement more slowly, and we must patiently abide the action of the ripened judgment of the great soldier who controls the events.

PERSONAL.

CONGRESSMAN ENTERTAINED has been considered by the arrest of President Lincoln, twelve or fifteen days, in consequence of being an officer in the State Legislature.

THE HON. FRANK HUNT, JR., was surrouded on the 29th at the Metropolitan Hotel, in Washington, by several friends and admirers, with whom he was much applauded.

THE youngest brother of Jennie, the celebrated baritone, died on his passage from Australia, of yellow fever.

PROFESSOR E. N. KENDALL, of this city, has intended a new rifle cannon, which will throw a ball weighing 64 lbs. to a long distance. It is now under examination by the Government.

MR. BURDETT, the Chicago banker, whose divorce case caused so much excitement and amusement last year, has obtained a new divorce.

FRANK AUSTIN, of England, was at Montreal on the 25th June.

MR. W. H. RUSSELL, of the London Times, was at Jackson, Miss., on the 18th, and was treated with the greatest kindness. He left for Vicksburg on the 19th, and was to have left Vicksburg on the 20th. After leaving that city he was expected to visit Camp Pickens, Cairo, where he was received with great honor by General Prentiss. He intends to remain a month, and then return to England the quickest acceptable. His report of the Southern troops is very disparaging to them.

GEORGE JOSEPH STORER, of Connecticut, died at Hartford on June 18th, aged 70 years. He was a member of the Connecticut State Legislature for seven consecutive years 1829 to 1835, and from 1839 to 1844. He was a very able and amiable man.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, the Confederate Vice-President, made a speech at Washington, Ga.

AT A RECENT meeting of the Virginia Legislature it was proposed to change the name of the county, named in honor of Scott and Washington, to Harper's Ferry and Stephens, but Mr. Garnett opposed it, and the matter was dropped.

On the 26th, Mr. Wm. H. Wyatt, Treasurer of the Harper's Ferry Central Railroad, threw himself out of a street story window in a fit of despondency and killed himself. He was considered a man of wealth, but his pecuniary affairs is unquestionable, and his accounts as treasurer are perfectly correct.

JOHN W. FORNEY, who has been for the great pleasantness, has sent to the resident at Newport News and fortress Monroe a most beautiful supply of pipes and tobacco.

FRANK VANDERLIP, the well-known correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, has been appointed and will exercise the same duty for the Cincinnati Commercial. Frank is a clever fellow, a newspaper of the first kind, and the most prompt correspondent of the Rebels war for that paper.

THE HON. JOHN SLIDELL, of Louisiana, is now in the City of Rome, and the author of the celebrated article on "the cheese at the Manor," has recently been invested on a visit to that city. Mr. Slidell is now in Richmond, and by this time, as he is a Southerner by birth, and a decided southerner in opinions, he will have left Richmond for Montgomery.

REV. MR. MCCLINTOCK, whose obituary is almost equal to that of General Beauregard, is at present residing in Little Rock, Arkansas.

THE Charleston Courier indignantly denies Mr. Russell's statement that the Secessionists have been spending their time in playing at base ball, and that the two meerschaums in all South Carolina, one an eccentric lawyer in Charleston, and the other a Dutch doctor in the back woods of Newton district, are lost to 1860.

CYRUS FIELD, a prominent primary politician, died at his house in Greene street on the 29th ult. His funeral was largely attended by friends.

LIEUTENANT J. G. BROOKE, of the Hercules, is cruising on the coast in search of privateers.

HENRY BARNES has postponed his visit to California, in consequence of the critical condition of the Secession movement.

LIEUTEN TON PARK will not contest Mr. Gay, Aaron Burlingame and his guest have been dining together, when the latter came to inquire about the Rebels, and but went Frank Blair, Jun., whose exploits in Missouri have made him the hero of the hour, and who is now in the field with his regiment. The latter is a young man, but he has all the elements of strong-nature; and his admirable social qualities, the courteous hospitality of the Leland Palace, the acquaintance of the city, and his unquestionable character, will make him a very important of this social host of our commercial metropolis.

THE NEW YORK HERALD has published a list of the killed up to the 25th of June, and that was to review the Orders of Mount Pleasant Academy. These youths are from the ages of fifteen to twenty-one, and they equal in size and strength U. S.'s. Their appearance and drill were excellent, and elicited loud applause from a full of friends and acquaintances. They were treated to refreshments. Recipients and Phelps inhale exalt. They were attended by a capital band.

BATTLE OF GREAT BETHEL—A CORRECTION.

HEADQUARTERS, SEVENTH REGIMENT N. Y. V.,
Camp Butler, Newport News, June 24, 1861.

To the Editor of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper:

SIR—Permit me to correct a few statements made by your reporter in his account of the battle of Great Bethel, and published in your issue of June 22. Judging from his remarks, I am forced to conclude that he was not present at the engagement. Indeed, I think if a reporter professes to chronicle the particulars of any proceedings, he should be present at the professional duties of the day, and he should most assuredly ascertain facts, and write accordingly. Your informant states that he ascertained that the Seventh and 1st were to be there, that I consider his observation at fault, and his statements are incorrect. The Seventh Regiment, Colonel Townsend commanding, and Townsend commanded, and ours only, with the exception of the Massachusetts 3rd, were also in the expedition. Regarding the statement that Colonel Allen of the First Regiment is to be under arrest, Newport News, New York Allen's regiment is not from Troy, and Colonel Townsend and Newport News, Colonel Allen plainly show that he did not even know where the various regiments were encamped previous to the day of the battle, leaving the advance of Col. Townsend's regiment." Now, sir, I positively over that Colonel Townsend was not in advance. The colonel was behind Gen. Pierce and staff and Col. Townsend in person, with two companies, was in the rear. He then states that I "evidently jumped to the conclusion that they were the enemy, and fired upon the first regiment" &c., also, that Col. Duryee, leading the flag, also fired at Townsend's regiment." These misstatements plainly show either that he was not present at the time, or that he is attempting to make capital for some one at the expense of candor and fair dealing. I repeat, that the regiment was not fired upon in accordance with the orders I had received from my commander at Newport News. We did not fire upon the enemy, for the simple reason that the enemy was not with me. All I have to say in my defence is this: That under similar circumstances I should be willing to act in the same way. Depend upon it, I shall never be found asleep when the States and Stripes are to be defended.

I remain, your obedient servant,
JOHN B. BENDIX,
Colonel Seventh Regiment, New York Volunteers.

EDITORIAL RESPONSE.—We have, in justification to Colonel Bendix, inserted his communication, but we must state in justice to ourselves, that the mistakes of which he complains are not to be attributed to our reporter, as we bid none on the field of action, but to that general and very false reporter, the magnetic telegraph. To those in far-off localities there is nothing more difficult and delicate than the process of gleaning the truth from the various telegraph exaggerations which follow every trifling or important engagement. If we sometimes fall into error, it is because we are not universally ubiquitous. Our sources of information extend far and near, but under certain circumstances we are compelled to rely upon the public sources of information. We would remark, however, that in the very article of which Colonel Bendix complains we sustained him, while other journals, taking their cue from the telegrams, were cruelly unjust and severe.]

GENERAL WAR INTELLIGENCE FROM ALL PARTS OF THE COUNTRY.

KENTUCKY, LOUISVILLE.—Several volunteers have returned from Richmond and Norfolk. They report the health of the Confederate troops as good. A Disunion speaker was addressing an assemblage of persons in Louisville on the 23d, when the ladies rose en masse and sang the "Star Spangled Banner," effectually quenching the Secessionist.

W. R. Walker, the British Consul at Charleston, lately passed through Louisville on his way to New Orleans. It is said he had been sent by Lord Lyons to inquire into the facts contained in Mr. Russell's letter from that city. The British Consul at New Orleans is a great alder of the South, and not reliable.

The Journal says that the Colonel of the State regiment, who was to have been stationed at Columbus, has resigned, being unwilling to support the neutrality policy of Kentucky. He is a Secessionist. It is thought that the presence of the regiment at Columbus will produce much trouble, and that it is only a trick of Gov. Magoffin's to create a panic in that region.

The same paper has a letter from Paducah, saying: "The Union men did not vote their full strength on election-day; many of them were forced to vote for Burnett for Congress. Mr. Brigham, a Kentuckian, suspected of being a spy, was arrested, and shot at three times, and was about to be started for Union City, Tenn., to be tried for treason, when the mob desisted. The same day the Coroner of the county was killed. The Secessionists assert that every man must declare either for the North or the South, and that Northerners must leave. The day after the election the Southern flag was raised, and General Prentiss invited to come and take it down."

A fight occurred between two Unionists and two Secessionists in Graves county, in which one Secessionist was killed and the other had his arm shot off. Two companies, one Union and the other Disunion, were drilling near by at the time. The latter started in pursuit of the Unionists, when the Union company followed after. Nothing has been heard of the result of the affair.

LEXINGTON.—Senator Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, made a speech at this town on the 19th. He was much applauded. It was a strong Union oration. He declared that East Tennessee would never leave the Union if the Federal Government would arm them. They did not want aid, but arms. A regiment left Lexington on the 20th for Columbus, Ky., to protect the Union men in the latter city. Many of the towns in Kentucky are requesting General Prentiss to help them against the brutal ferocity of the Secessionists. Governor Harris, of Tennessee, has written to Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky, pledging himself not to allow any armed Tennesseean to pass through or enter Kentucky.

Arms and ammunition were sent on the 25th June from Louisville to East Tennessee. The Newport camp is to be got ready for three regiments of regulars.

A letter from Southern Kentucky says, that fat cattle, mules by droves, and loads of bacon are daily passing through Cumberland Gap to the rebels. The writer adds that if the people of that section of Kentucky were armed with legal authority to do so, they would soon put a stop to the business. A regiment or two could easily be formed in the neighborhood. Another letter says that Hoffman, the contractor to carry the mail from Lancaster to Richmond, Ky., is an open Disunionist, who enters Union villages shouting for Jeff. Davis and waving a Secession flag.

TENNESSEE, MEMPHIS.—General Pillow is still here, uttering large oaths and boasting what he means to do when he has taken Cairo. It is, however, certain that the violence of Secession is very much diminished, not from want of malignity, but disgust at the slowness of Jeff. Davis. Their hopes of triumph are also at an end. The gross vote in Tennessee was—for Secession, 99,172; for Union, 44,602; above 32,000 refusing to vote, or terrified from doing so. It is thus clear that there is a very strong Union feeling in Tennessee. The Tennesseeans were also highly irate with the Western States. The Memphis Avalanche threatens them with war to the knife. Eastern Tennessee gave a majority of 13,177 against Secession. Texas is sending supplies to Memphis.

As a significant proof of the enormous lying which is part and parcel of Secession, the Memphis Appeal says the French Government have agreed to advance $100,000,000 on the next cotton crop, which, when ready for delivery, will be shipped in the French fleet.

As a proof of how patriotic the Tennesseeans are, the Appeal has a severe and admirable article on the villainy of the tradespeople, who, it says, make a practice of charging the poor soldiers double price for everything, and then selling to them the worst of every kind. Thurlow Weeds are found everywhere! In consequence of the loyalty of East Tennessee, the postal facilities have been restored. The mail will pass through Cincinnati instead of Louisville.

The Nashville City Council has appropriated $750,000 for a residence for the President, as an inducement to remove the capital there.

MAJOR-GENERAL PILLOW has issued an order dated Memphis, June 21st, confiscating all Northern property. It says:

"Merchants, brokers, bankers and others so indebted to our enemies, are required to report to the Adjutant-General's office of the Major-General commanding, the amount of such indebtedness, deposits, balances, dividends in stock, stocks owned, &c., and in the mean time are ordered not to pay over the same to other than the State of Tennessee."

Many Tennesseeans who favored the Secession in order to swindle their creditors begin to think they might just as well have been loyal, since they have to pay their just debts to the wrong man. The infamous dishonesty of this man Pillow's conduct needs no comment. It is a shade worse than Floyd.

THOMAS R. NELSON, one of the candidates for the Legislature, has issued from Jonesborough a most stirring Union appeal to his misguided fellow-citizens. He concludes in these emphatic words:

"But it is said this is a war between the North and the South, and we are compelled to take sides. I do not so regard it. It is a war between the Government of the United States and rebellious citizens who have committed treason against that Government. Neither is it a war between Lincoln and the South. It is a war between the Constitution and those who have violated it; a war between law and no law—between order and anarchy—between freedom and despotism—between right and wrong."

HARRIS, the rebel Governor of Tennessee, has issued a solemn proclamation, declaring Tennessee out of the Union, and a free and independent State. He, however, strange to say, makes no allusion to the "one-eyed Confederacy of Davisdom," as the Charleston Mercury calls it.

The wonderful delusions under which the people of this State labor is admirably depicted by the following article from the Memphis Avalanche of June 24.

"We were shown last night a letter from a bearer of dispatches from the Southern Commissioners in Europe to a gentleman high in authority here, which contains the most cheering intelligence.

"He immediately dispatched a special messenger to General Pillow, with a letter to the effect that his documents, intended for President Davis, convey the cheering intelligence that the sum of $2,000,000 has been offered to be advanced upon our cotton crop alone and that the Southern Confederacy will soon be acknowledged as one of the powers of the earth. The letter also says that England and France have dispatched twenty additional ships of the line to our shores, and that the blockade will be raised by the 1st of November. He says that England and France are with us in sentiment, and that our flag will soon be recognized by their Governments.

"The bearer of dispatches, as before stated, passed through Indiana and a portion of Illinois. The following extracts from his letter, confirming the Southern account in regard to the victory at Booneville, will be read with interest.

"Wallace and his regiment, composed of 1,100 men from Indianapolis, have been cut off at Cumberland, Md., and are supposed to have been killed or taken prisoners. The news from Missouri you have by telegram, but the State troops were victorious—that is, they lost only four killed and wounded, while the Nationals lost twenty killed. The State troops number 900—some say 600—the Nationals 3,000."

VIRGINIA.—The latest reports confirm the rumor of the movement of General Wise down the Kanawha. General Garnett, with the Confederate forces, was encamped on the 21st inst. at Laurel Hill, twelve miles from Philippi, at which point Union forces were strongly entrenched.

Reports, via Richmond, to the 20th, state that General Beauregard was advancing from Manassas Junction toward the Potomac.

"WHY DON'T THE YANKEES PUSH ON TO RICHMOND?—RICH READING.—The Yankee despatches of the battle of Bethel—General Butler's confession that General Pierce, who commanded the invading horde, 'lost his presence of mind,' is exquisite. We hope the gallant Butler may long survive to chronicle our victories. He makes one strange omission. He could not have heard of the bayonet charge of the North Carolinians, otherwise, in the abundance of his candor and simplicity, he would surely have stated it. As he did not hear of the charge, it is more than probable he never heard of the stampede which followed it.

"The terrible fire of the batteries—masked at that—astonished the Yankees. In their bewilderment, they exclaim, 'It is thought Colonel Magruder must have had charge of the guns!' No very unreasonable conjecture of scared men! Magruder is a very devil in Yankee imagination, and if we could only have him in charge of all our batteries, we should not be long troubled with the Yankees.

"It will be seen that the loss is put down at 1,000. We had not rated it at so much; but they knew better than we do, though we incline to the opinion that their fears have exaggerated the number.

"We hear that later and fuller reports, made by officers from Fortress Monroe, give a still more discouraging view of Yankee affairs in that region than that contained in the Sun. We should judge from the representations, that the enemy's forces are quite demoralized; each officer blames the other for the disaster to their arms, and all of them concur in nothing except in condemning General Butler for not commanding in person. Gen. B.'s remarkable despatch to the Associated Press, censuring General Pierce for his conduct on the field of battle, is ominous of a change in his staff; but we hope there is no purpose of removing Butler himself. He has promised to visit Richmond, and it would be cruel to make him break his word."

RICHMOND.—The Richmond Dispatch has a most excellent and ingenious way of supplying themselves with niggers. It is this:

"We have heard from various sources that a large number of the negroes who have been captured by the Northern invaders on the Peninsula have been sent by them to Cuba to be sold, and that they declare their intention to make the sale of negroes one means of defraying the expenses of the war.

"The authorities of the South can only meet this procedure in one way. For every negro kidnapped, some Yankee prisoner must be put into the hands of the master who has been robbed, to supply the place of his servant till the negro is returned; and for every slave sold to Cuba or elsewhere, two Yankees must be enslaved. The time for forbearance with these wretches has passed, and the people of the South demand that they shall be treated as their crimes deserve."

The editor of the Richmond Dispatch had better avoid "Yankees and Irish," for they have a decided crow to pick with him.

VIRGINIA FICTIONS.—"A gentleman on this train says that he left St. Louis last night, and that Gen. Lyon and all his command were taken by our men at Booneville.

"It is reported that in a battle at Harper's Ferry the Federal troops were entirely routed, with the loss of 3,000. A. J. INGERSOLL."

A SECOND ENGAGEMENT AT PHILIPPI.—In the Lynchburg Republican of the 12th we find the annexed account of a second fight at Philippi, in which the Confederate forces achieved a complete victory over the Abolitionists:

"Through a gentleman of undoubted veracity, who arrived here yesterday from Manassas Junction, we learn that information, deemed altogether authentic, had been received there of another battle at Philippi, in which the most complete victory was achieved by our troops. Large reinforcements having been added to our forces, they made an advance on Philippi, where the enemy were encamped, and engaging them in battle, succeeded in completely routing them, with a loss to the enemy of over 100 killed and wounded, besides the capture of a number of prisoners, and the recapture by our troops of a large amount of arms, munitions, &c., together with several of the enemy's cannon. Our troops suffered but little loss, and now hold complete possession of the town."

ARKANSAS.—It would seem from the following extract that the slaves are yet destined to be a great trouble to the South. The Helena Shield of the 15th states that, on Sunday or Monday last, in Cypress neighborhood, Monroe county, about thirty miles west of Helena, several negroes were arrested upon a charge of attempted insurrection, and on Tuesday three of them—two men and a girl—were hung. One of those executed belonged to Colonel Lightfoot. He was a mulatto boy, a blacksmith, formerly owned by James Bush, of Big Creek. He was the ringleader of the plot, which, as detailed by himself and others, was most atrocious. The white male inhabitants were to be murdered, the females and children spared, provided they did not resist. Details of what they further designed doing we forbear publishing. Fortunately their fiendish purposes were frustrated by discovery of the plot.

GEORGIA, SAVANNAH.—The City Council has purchased of Mr. Crawshaw his beautiful mansion, at a cost of $50,000. It is intended for President Jefferson Davis. As Mr. Davis sent some three weeks ago a large sum of money to be invested in the English funds, his Georgian admirers had better purchase him a house in Belgravia.

ATLANTA.—Mr. Hurlbut, formerly of the New York Times, was lately arrested at Atlanta. He was sent on to Richmond, to take his trial as a spy. Mr. May, Mayor of Augusta, was very anxious to get him out of Mr. Yancey's hands, for the pleasure of hanging him; but his sanguinary purpose was defeated by the prudent humanity of Jeff. Davis, who peremptorily told Mr. Yancey to send him on to Richmond.

Hon. Alexander B. Stephens was advertised to solicit subscriptions of cotton for the Southern Confederacy, at Lincolnville, Ga., on the 20th of June.

The State Treasurer of Georgia gives notice that, on account of the war with the Anti-Slavery States, the interest on the coupons and bonds of the State, payable in New York, must be redeemed at Savannah.

An advertisement announces the reopening of the Confederate loan at several places in Georgia. It says that only eleven millions of the fifteen millions have been subscribed for.

MISSOURI, JEFFERSON CITY.—The energetic proceedings of General Lyon and Colonel Frank Blair seem to have laid the ghost of Secession, for Morrison, the State Treasurer, Mosely, State Auditor, and Boustoo, Register of Lands, took the oath of allegiance on the 29th, and were restored to their offices. Attorney-General Hayes refused and is a prisoner. The verdict of the Coroner's jury in the recent conflict between the mob and the soldiers was:

"That the subjects of the present inquest came to their deaths from gunshot wounds inflicted by Minie musket balls discharged by certain members of companies C, E, F, B and I of the Second Regiment United States Reserve Corps, while marching down Seventh street on the morning of the 17th inst.

"The jury further express it as their opinion that said wounds were inflicted without any provocation or discharge of firearms from citizens then present, and also without any order to fire having been given by the officers of the said companies."

BOONEVILLE.—This city is undoubtedly loyal. It has a decided Union Mayor, and upon the arrival of General Lyon with his troops they were received with the greatest enthusiasm.

ST. JOSEPH.—Colonel Curtis, who commands the Federal troops at this city, has issued a proclamation, promising protection to all the peaceable citizens, and declaring his intention of maintaining the Constitutional authority.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—The news from Charleston is very gloomy. Business is at a standstill. Everything is dear excepting rice and cotton; shoes are quite a luxury, ladies' gaiters realizing four dollars a pair for the commonest kind, or four times their usual price. Salt is ten cents a pound. Governor Pickens is not at all pleased with the Jefferson Davis style of Government, and has issued a proclamation refusing to allow any more regiments to leave the State, alleging that their first duty is to defend their own State. The Charleston Courier recommends that all the South Carolinian regiments be recalled, as it is informed General Scott intends seizing Charleston. There are three South Carolina regiments in the Confederate army.

THE HERO OF THE ENFILADE BATTERY.—Lieutenant Jacob Valentine, Confederate States Army, who distinguished himself at the enfilade battery during the Fort Sumpter fight, has been placed in command of a battery at Manassas by his old commander, General Beauregard. The gallant Carolinian will give a good account of himself.

DIRECT IMPORTATION.—H. C. Covert, of the firm of D. R. Williams & Co., left for Europe last night for the purpose of obtaining a stock of hats and caps for this market.—Charleston Courier.

MISSISSIPPI.—There are reports of slave risings on some of the plantations, but no reliable accounts. As Mr. Russell, of the London Times, has been on a visit to his cousin, Dr. Russell, of Jackson, we shall probably have his report very soon. In other respects this State suffers the least of any of the Seceding ones.

LOUISIANA.—If we may judge from Mr. Russell's letter in the London Times, the state of affairs in New Orleans is perfectly pandemonian. As Lord Palmerston is notorious for his defence of British subjects, we shall probably hear of a British fleet paying a second visit to New Orleans, and of its wiping out the defeat of 1814. British subjects have been beaten and forcibly impressed into the rebel service, and the French origin of the Crescent City has given the British a strong feeling of hostility to it.

JEFF. DAVIS, it is said, appointed Bishop Polk, of the diocese of Louisiana, to a Major-Generalship of the rebel force. (Doubtful.)

PIERRE SOULE has been communicating with Jeff. Davis about the defence of New Orleans and the Mississippi.

FLORIDA AND ALABAMA.—General Bragg has now only about 2,700 men at Pensacola, and these are in a very ill fed and ill clad condition. From Montgomery we learn that since the seat of Government has been moved to Richmond a spirit of sullen indifference has settled on the public mind. This has reacted on Mobile, and criticisms are daily indulged both in conversation and print that would not have been tolerated a month ago. The man, however, must be above suspicion ere he utters it. The Mobile Advertiser has a letter from Mr. Otis, formerly of the New York Express, in which he gives a glowing account of a speech he made on the presentation of a flag to the New Orleans Zouaves. Mr. Otis is a Northern man, and editor of the New Orleans Picayune.

WISCONSIN, MILWAUKEE.—The effects of the war are becoming every day more visible. On the 24th of June a mob attacked several of the banks in Milwaukee, and destroyed all the furniture, books, and every other description of property. They endeavored to burn the State Bank. After several hours of mob misrule, the Zouaves and Police arrested thirty-three of the rioters, and quelled the disturbance. The offenders were principally farmers. The cause of offence was the action of the banks in question throwing out various bills, and refusing to redeem their own notes in specie. A clerk in one of the banks was much injured.

NEW JERSEY, TRENTON.—New Jersey is doing more than her share. On Thursday, the 27th of June, Regiments Nos. 1, 2 and 3—all volunteers for three years—left Trenton for Washington by the Camden and Amboy line. They looked very well, and their equipment was excellent.

Major Hexamer and his artillery battery are ready for their departure for the seat of war; but the Secretary of War wishes the State to furnish extra guns and extra horses to meet casualties. The Governor has written to the President on the subject.

Some surprise has been expressed that the Highwood Guard, one of the New Jersey crack companies, should have disbanded at the first sound of war. A few, we understood, entered into other regiments, but some explanation is due. Where are the Hoppers, the Joneses, Browns, Smiths and Robinsons gone to?

General Batfold is busy making experiments with a new kind of gun, which promises great results. It is very light, very certain, and of long range.

MOVEMENTS OF TROOPS.

THE following regiments have left for Washington since our last paper:

Thirty-seventh New York Volunteers, Colonel McCunn.

Fifteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, Colonel McLeod Murphy.

Thirty-second Regiment New York Volunteers, Colonel Mathieson.

Sixteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, Colonel Davis.

Massachusetts Fourth Regiment Volunteers, from Boston, Colonel Cass—ordered to Fortress Monroe, but sent on from thence to Washington.

Second Maine Regiment, Volunteers.

Fifth Maine Regiment, Colonel Donnell.

Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteers, Colonel Clarke.

Twenty-second (Athens) New York Volunteers, Colonel Phelps.

In addition to these eight regiments, New Jersey despatched on Friday three additional regiments, viz.:

First Regiment Volunteers, Colonel Montgomery.

Second Regiment Volunteers, Colonel McLane.

Third Regiment Volunteers, Colonel Taylor.

These were forwarded to Washington.

INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES OF THE WAR.

THE following singular document appears in the New Orleans papers:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT NO. 1,
NEW ORLEANS, June 6, 1861.

1. Information having reached these Headquarters that some unprincipled sympathizers with the Black Republican despotism at the North are in the habit of furnishing the blockading vessels daily with fresh provisions and the daily newspapers, Colonel P. O. Herbert will give positive orders to the commanding officers at Forts Jackson and Pike, and to Lieutenant-Colonel Fuller at the passes, to overhaul all boats, and take all fresh provisions which they may have in excess of all that is necessary for the use of their crews, and for such families along the coast as they may have been in the habit of supplying.

2. The regular mail boats and tow boats are not referred to in this order.

By Command of Major General Twiggs.

D. BELTZHOOVER, Major Louisiana Artillery.

A RIVERMAN, named Grisset, about ten days ago was engaged in taking in a cargo of wood in a sloop at a place about six miles up Mattox Creek, Westmoreland county, Virginia, when his sloop was seized and he threatened with being held as a prisoner. He was, however, permitted to leave if he could get away. A Union man gave him a canoe, and with this he paddled out and over to the Maryland shore, and after about thirty-four hours of the hardest work he ever experienced he arrived at Marlow's Bay, where he was taken aboard a long boat and brought to the city. The distance he paddled in his chestnut dug-out was about sixty miles. Grisset discovered during his stay in Westmoreland county that provisions were very scarce. Coffee was worth fifty cents per pound. A party formed a Home Guard while he was there, and sent to Fredericksburg for ammunition. The amount obtained was twenty-five pounds of powder and fifty of lead in bars. Great dread is expressed, in that portion of Virginia, of an uprising of the slaves.

JOHN LETCHER, the tool of "One-eyed Davis," as the Charleston Mercury complimentarily calls him, now and then catches a Tartar. Some time ago he received a letter from Lieutenant Mayo, son to the present Mayor of Richmond, and a nephew of General Scott, in which appears the following passage: "John Letcher, I am not your mercenary, nor the mercenary of the 'Convention.' My primary and only allegiance is due and rendered to the United States. The United States has cared for me for many years, and its flag is endeared to me by too many associations to be lightly abandoned and turned against in this hour of its direst peril, particularly upon the promises to pay of an exhausted treasury and the promises of 'rank' from a State whose militia, by her own showing and invitation, is commanded by a foreigner who is a traitor to that Government to which the people of Virginia are faithful, despite the unholy and unpatriotic action of the 'Convention.' If, sir, I were to forsake the Stars and Stripes in this dread hour and join your banner, what assurances would you have that I would not betray you? Surely not that of honor, not that of patriotism."

WAR ITEMS.

DUTIES OF LOYAL OFFICERS TO DISLOYAL VESSELS.—On the 28th ult. Thomas Freno, United States Consul at Belfast, addressed a letter to our Minister, Mr. Adams, asking his instructions regarding the disposition to be made of two vessels which had arrived at Belfast, bearing certificate and clearance from the New Orleans Deputy Collector, who professed to act under authority "of the State of Louisiana and the Montgomery Government." On the 4th of June Mr. Adams made answer, as follows:

"LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, June 4, 1861.

"Sir—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 28th May last, making certain inquiries touching the irregularities in the papers of the American bark Ivanhoe, of Bath, and the Cephas Starrot, of Rockland, Me., lately arrived at Belfast.

"It may be as well to establish the rule once for all, that no papers whatever, issued from a power in the United States purporting to be adverse to that known and established by constitution and law of the United States, can be deemed worthy of recognition by the officers of the United States. The people of the State of Louisiana are now known to be in a state of open rebellion. Hence, no ship's papers issued from any source established by them whatever, within the Custom House or outside of it, is to be considered as of more worth than if issued by an equal number of irresponsible individuals. The same rule may be held to apply to any similar case.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,
"CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS."

IMPRESSMENT OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN THE REBEL ARMY.—Mr. Russell writes to the London Times, under date of New Orleans, May 26: "British subjects living in New Orleans have been seized, knocked down, carried off from their labor at the wharf and the workshop, and forced by violence to serve in the 'volunteer' ranks! These cases are not isolated. They are not in twos and threes, but in tens and twenties; they have not occurred stealthily or in byways, they have taken place in the open day and in the streets of New Orleans. These men have been dragged along like felons, protesting in vain that they were British subjects. Fortunately, their friends bethought them that there was still a British Consul in the city who would protect his countrymen—English, Irish or Scotch. Mr. Mure, when he heard of the reports and of the evidence, made energetic representations to the authorities, who, after some evasion, gave orders that the impressed 'volunteers' should be discharged, and the 'Tiger Rifles' and other companies were deprived of the services of thirty-five British subjects, whom they had taken from their usual avocations. The Mayor promises it shall not occur again."

"LINCOLN'S IMPUDENCE."—Under this caption, the Richmond Enquirer, of June 13, says: "A piece of impertinence, entirely in character with Lincoln's Government, was attempted towards Governor Letcher, which was promptly and pointedly repelled. A pardon was sent from Lincoln to the Governor for a convict in the Penitentiary, who had been sentenced for robbing the mail by the late Federal Court in this city, which the Governor returned with the following letter:

"'EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Richmond, Va., June 7, 1861.

"'To his Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States:

"'Sir—I am instructed by his Excellency the Governor of Virginia to return to you the accompanying documents from the Department of State, U.S.A.

"'The Commonwealth of Virginia not being one of the United States of America, the power of the Chief Executive of that nation is not recognised by by the Government of this State.

"'I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"'S. BASSET FRENCH,
"'A. D. C. to the Governor of Virginia.'"

THE citizens of Woodruff county will give Mr. Crittenden a grand festival near Versailles on Wednesday. From the preparations, it will doubtless be an outburst of love and respect to the distinguished statesman.—Louisville Journal.

WM. W. LAMB has been elected Mayor of Norfolk.

JACK HAYS, the celebrated Texas Ranger, is reported on his way from California with a party of picked men for the Rebel States. General Albert S. Johnson is supposed to be one of Hays's party.

THE SOUTHERN PRESS.

ALTHOUGH the Southern papers do not reach us regularly, there now and then strays one from that interdicted region which convinces us that the masterly longevity of Scott has half killed the rebellion. He has scotched the snake. The Richmond Examiner says:

"We have taken a great many Federal forts and hundreds of thousands of arms without opposition, and captured Fort Sumpter after the Administration had been engaged more than a month in measures to relieve it. No Seceded State is invaded, although Lincoln, his Cabinet and the whole North have been trying to do so for more than two months. * * * To preserve appearances they will no doubt make an occasional John Brown raid and shoot a few negroes, pigs and poultry, but they have no more idea, and no more ability to invade the South than to invade England."

A gentleman who came from Richmond last week informed us that the common people there were not aware that the "sacred soil" of the Old Dominion had been invaded, the military occupation being confined to Fortress Monroe, which they were told was so closely besieged that Butler was on the point of surrendering. A cause founded on such deceptions must indeed be in a perishing condition.

DR. CLARKE, the traveller, asked in Sweden what became of a woman who fell into the shaft of an iron mine that he visited. "Became of her? said the man to whom he put the question, striking his hand forcibly upon his thigh, "she became a pancake!"

A HALF SILLY basketwoman passing down Lord Dundrennan's avenue, at Cumbstone one day, he met her, and said: My good woman, there's no road this way." "Na, sir," she said, "I think ye're wrang there; I think it's a most beautiful road."

ARREST OF MARSHAL KANE, IN BALTIMORE, BY ORDER OF MAJOR-GENERAL BANKS.

MR. KANE, the Marshal of Baltimore, has long been known for his Secession proclivities, and has been deemed a dangerous man in his official capacity, through the influence which his position gave him over the entire police force. He was suspected of irrevocable correspondence, and of concealing vast amounts of arms. Important facts coming to the knowledge of Major-General Banks, he issued an order for the arrest of Marshal Kane, who was taken at his house, at Govan's, on the 27th inst. Marshal Kane offered no resistance, and he was at once conveyed to Fort McHenry, where he now occupies the same apartment as Mr. Merriman.

Colonel Negley, of the Maryland Volunteers, was appointed Provost Marshal, and since took possession of the Marshal's office. The Police Commissioners protested against the usurpation, and directed Captain Kane to take charge of all their books, and to act virtually dictatorial. But General Banks at once took measures to suppress them, and commanded Kane to remain in the new office, so that Baltimore will now have a loyal officer in control sufficient to control all real demonstrations. In the meantime Mayor Brown is held prisoner, and the scarcity of his office has revealed an immense amount of arms and ammunition, and evidences of a more direct and dangerous treason. Let us trust that he will not be discharged and rewarded with a Major-Generalship.

THE U. S. MILITARY TELEGRAPH LINE.

The great inventions of the age are now brought in as assistants to the art of warfare. Whole regiments are moved from place to place by railroads; reconnoissance is made by means of balloons, and despatches are sent by the electric telegraph, and not by carrier pigeons, as in the days of Napoleon. In the present war we certainly expect that results should be as rapid in proportion; that they are not so is probably owing to the new and popular science of "how not to do it."

The telegraph material was sent on with the advance of the army, and was laid down with as much rapidity as possible. Its importance can hardly be over-estimated, as every step in the movements of the troops can be despatched instantly at Washington, and orders and countermanders be conveyed back without a moment's delay. The skeleton force of our Special Artist accompanying General Stone's column has sent us representa the Bureau of the United States Military Telegraph Line, at the headquarters of General McDowell, at Arlington House, Va. The operator is busy at his work, and others are availing the despatches as they arrive to convey them to the General in command.

RECONNOITRENING THE SHORES OF THE POTOMAC

River with Professor Grant's Caloium Light.

It is a matter of military necessity to watch the operations of the enemy on the shores of the Potomac, and from time to time in various public batteries spring up as if by magic, and reveal themselves by firing upon the unsuspecting craft. Communication by day are attended with considerable danger, and the observer can be observed and the whole covered. But at night the case is quite different for purposes of observation, and it was to take advantage of this constant security that experiments were made by Professor Thaddeus Sobieski Coulton Grant. In the darkness of the night the vessel bearing them glides silently and swiftly along, and when the light is turned upon the point the full strength of the calcium light is suddenly directed upon it, lighting it up with a brightness equal to that of day. It is said to be effective in the present operations, but in the letter of Charleston harbor, and after the attack on Sumpter it was tried and deemed not effective.

RECONNOISSANCE BY COLONEL MAX WEBER'S TURNER RIFLES.

The reconnoissance of the enemy's country is a service of no slight danger. It requires rapidity and secrecy of motion, and a great amount of courage. The reconnoissance by Colonel Max Weber's Turner Rifles was ordered in consequence of a report that the Secessionists were already fortifying the vicinity of Newcastle Bridge, on the road to Yorktown. This point being one of great importance, it was deemed necessary to test the truth of the report, and the Turner Rifles were dispatched, accompanied by a battery of two pieces of artillery, manned by a detachment of the command of Captain Smith of the Topographical Engineers. After threatening a marching the neighborhood, no evidence was discovered to justify the report. A few mounted scouts were met and dispersed, but these immediately took to cover on the approach of the reconnoitring party.

GENERAL JAMES S. NEGLEY.

JAMES S. NEGLEY is a native of Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, of forty-five years of age, and thirty-four years. He enlisted as a private in the Duquesne Grays of Pittsburg, to serve in the war with Mexico. At that time he was not of age, and left in opposition to the wishes of his friends, who tried to detain him, but without success. He was elected Orderly Sergeant of the first company of the regiment, and was also one of the few who escaped the terrible slaughter of the Duquesne Grays at Cerro Gordo on the 18th of October. While in Mexico he received a complimentary discharge from the Secretary of War, which he indignantly refused, and returned with his company at the close of the war. On his return home a company was formed in his native village, of which he was elected Captain, and under his command the company was recognized as one of the best in the State. A portion of that same company is at York under the name of the Negley Zouaves. On the vacancy of Brigadier-Generalship of Allegheny county, which had twenty-two military companies, General Negley was unanimously elected Brigadier-General, and, on the election of Governor Curtin, became Major-General of the State militia, succeeding General Negley's appointment as Adjutant-General.

When a call was issued for volunteers from Pennsylvania General Negley was one of the first to offer his services, and was appointed Third Brigade commander, commanding the entire Western portion of the State of Pennsylvania. The brigade has since become a model for everything pertaining to the command has been arranged in simple proof that he is the first man in the right place. The Penn sylvanians have reason to be proud of this young commander, who has already proved by his deeds that the aspersions against aristocratic families possessing the confidence of his native people. They know and feel that they have a soldier for a commander, one who acts from experience and from a keen appreciation of all their wants and desires.

AWAITING THE ENEMY.

There is scarcely a more anxious period in a soldier's life than that which passes while awaiting in the deep midnight the attack of an expected foe. It is true that we become second nature, and that the men who have been in battles can sometimes contentedly sleep with arms at their hands, however imminent the danger or the peril that threatens; but generally the tragedy the interval between the expectation and the reality is a period of anxiety and serious thought, when the far becomes painfully acute, and every nerve is strained to the utmost tension. Our Artist has sketched one of these night scenes when the gallant Eleventh Indiana Regiment of Zouaves were under arms, awaiting the attack of the Secession troops in the neighborhood of Cumberland, Maryland.

COL. JOHN F. DUNDIN, OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT, STEUBEN RIFLES, N. Y. V. V.

COLONEL ROBERT COWDEN, OF THE FIRST REGIMENT MASSACHUSETTS VOLUNTEERS.

BIVOUAC OF THE ELEVENTH INDIANA VOLUNTEER REGIMENT AT ZOUAVES, COLONEL LEW. WALLACE, AT CUMBERLAND, MARYLAND.

OUR Special Artist accompanying Major-General McClellan's command has sketched the gallant Eleventh Indiana Zouaves in their bivouac at Cumberland, Maryland. Great interest is attached to this regiment since its brilliant attack at Romney, and as we have presented them in the middle of the action, we have pleasure in showing them to our readers roughly in their decent camp.

CAPTURE OF THE SCHOONER AID, OFF MOBILE BAY.

By the Boats of the U. S. Frigate Niagara.

THE United States steam frigate Niagara arrived off Mobile June 3. In blockade that portion on the eastern day took a schooner in prize which was anchored close under the land, wrecking on English ship, which had been ashore since last spring. At noon the steamer Mount Vernon took three of the frigate's boats, and leaving run in for the land as far as was deemed practicable, the boats were let go, and the crews pulled for the schooner, being about one hundred yards off. They saw the crew attempt to retain the anchor, but a marine being ordered to destroy the anchor's cable he soon had stopped them from say further attempt to get away.

The vessel was taken quite by surprise, and it is probable that they hardly thought it worth while to keep a lookout in the best of the day. The schooner's name is the Aid, of Mobile, formerly of Long Island. The captain and crew were allowed to depart in the schooner's boat, the prize pending very hard to save his vessel, but the lieutenant commanding the expedition told him that he would give him an order to take charge of the United States revenue cutter now at Mobile, and if he (the captain) could get her away they would then make an exchange of vessels. The boats then raised the anchor and towed her out some distance, when they set sail and proceeded at five p. m., the Stars and Stripes flying from the peak, under the guns of the frigate Niagara.

ATTACK AT MATHIAS POINT, ON THE POTOMAC.

CAPTURE OF CAPTAIN WARD.

On the 27th instant the steamers Freeborn and Defiance landed a small force upon Mathias Point, to erect a battery.

The Freeborn left the point at 4 p. m., having consisted of only thirty-five men. They threw out pickets and worked all day in erecting a battery on the point. During the time they were not molested, but while in the act of putting to their boats at six o'clock in the afternoon, our men were fired upon by a force of six hundred rebels who had been concealed in ambush. The Federal troops returned a good order. Private Wilmore held a flag after he had been wounded. Part of the fascines was shot away by the rebels when they fired upon our men, but were soon in the hands of Wilmore continued to wave it manfully at the enemy. The boats of the Federal steamers were riddled with bullets.

The steamer quickly left the point, and the rebels retreating troops, and we deeply regret to state that Captain Ward, of the Keystone State, was wounded and captured by the rebels. One ball also was shot in the chest while in the act of sighting a gun upon the enemy. The wound was fatal, and we have no means of knowing another good and brave man and able officer. Several of our troops were severely wounded one, it is supposed, mortally.

The Secession force numbered one thousand men, and it is reported that the Confederate troops were clean at hand to support the attacking party. The fight lasted half an hour, when the vessels withdrew. The Secessionists claim that Captain Ward was the Pawnee came up to the Washington Navy Yard, bringing the body of Captain Ward.

ST. LAWRENCE HALL, MONTREAL.

THIS celebrated hotel, which rises with, if it does not surpass in size, any similar establishment in the American continent, in the house of all the distinguished families who make Montreal their temporary resort. Its selection by the Prince of Wales has given it a prestige of fashion which insures it the patronage of the titled, the wealthy, and the distinguished. Situated in the centre of the city, on St. James street, and possessing a handsome front of three hundred feet, and a depth over three hundred and fifty feet, in addition to its magnificent corners, reception rooms, family suites and dining halls, the St. Lawrence Hall seems to occupy the whole square, and the new dining hall, just finished, can seat comfortably over two hundred guests. The rooms are light, large well, ventilated, and furnished throughout with perfectly new and elegant furniture. The St. Lawrence is in all respects the model of a first-class hotel.

In the immediate vicinity of the hotel are the churches which the pious through Canada make the St Lawrence Hall their resting place, and the Bonsecours Market, where floats are the handsome residence of the American Consul.

The present proprietor, Mr. Hagan, has managed for ten years past, and the popularity and esteem which he now enjoys is the best proof of his ability to govern his office, and of the agreeable relations which his efforts to please have given to his influential titled and notified guests.

COUNT CAVOUR.

The greatest statesman Italy has produced for centuries died in Turin, at seven o'clock on the morning of the 6th instant. After having achieved, by his wisdom, the independence of his country. It has been reserved for him to see the work of his life and his triumph so great an end to so masterly a manner. At his birth, fifty-three years ago, Italy was but a difficult heap of broken and fragments—he has left it a great European power—he was the brain of United Italy, and the sword of Victor Emmanuel in the strong arm—both were necessary to its resurrection. The absence of Garibaldi from the council from the forgetting of ages by his voice, and with a rare good fortune he survives to see the end of his work. To the statesman and the soldier the name of Italy will ever be associated with great deeds, and as a strict Catholic. Being of an ancient and wealthy family, he very soon received the appointment of Page in the Palace. There he lingered not long, but left it for the army, and he was elected. He then entered the Military Academy, where he obtained the rank of Lieutenant of Engineers. Here his liberal opinions made him enemies, and throwing up his commission he went to England, where he remained for many years, studying its language, laws, its national manners and political philosophy. When he returned to Turin in 1848, he went head and heart into politics. To this end he first set the present regeneration of Italy is indontestably due. He was not a theorist—an enthusiast—he returned a practical statesman. He saw that the foundation of all regeneration was moderation and control, who "forgot nothing and learned nothing," by reformers capable of asserting every principle of political accident. A monarchist from philosophy, as well as by hereditary education, he threw away, as idle dreams, the vague visions and opinions which have rendered French and Italian republicanism at once a failure and a scourge. In the constitutional monarchy of England he found a model, and where long may she remain so best suited for control of a priesthood, he saw that the measure equal of the flattering words of a people all prone to the deadly revolve around; and looking at our present unchanging Constitution, he took to heart the words of a great American writer, that even we are less adapted for a republican form of government now than we were in the days of Jefferson. Republicanism takes from the individuality, originality, honesty and industry in the people, and patriotism and principle in one another; we know some readers to decide how far those two classes cannot know requirements.

On his return to his native land he commenced the publication of a newspaper called the Risorgimento, in which he developed his aspirations with masterly force and moderation. In 1850 he became Minister of Commerce and Agriculture, and left the Sardinian Ministry in 1852. He took this opportunity to revisit England. Soon afterwards Baron Azeglio was compelled to resign, and Cavour became President of the Council, a position he retained, with a short intermission in 1859, till his death.

We have so fully detailed his measures in this paper that it is unnecessary to recapitulate here exclusively he made Sardinia the confrère of England and France, by joining those two great and liberal nations in the war against Russian aggression, and how by the Treaty of Paris and it was the germ out of which Italy has grown. Cavour was not bloodthirsty, Garibaldi, the great murderer, moved down the Austrian, Papal and Neapolitan weeds which threatened to overrun the fair plant of freedom, Count Cavour sowed the seed. Like all great men, when more far-seeing than their compeers, he was misunderstood by even his associates, and hence the misunderstanding between him and Garibaldi last December. It is gratifying to know that the great warrior was speedily convinced of his illustrious friend's equal patriotism and superior sagacity to his own, and sincerely mourns his death.

It is an interesting fact that Count Cavour and Louis Napoleon first met at Lord Palmerston's hospitable mansion, when the present ruler of France was a mere dreaming adventurer and the other a student. We may here mention that Count D'Orsay was their most intimate friend, and that this most remarkable trio were considered three of the fastest men in London. Count Cavour was at once a bachelor and an epicurean—indeed, if it be decorous to say anything disparaging of so great and noble a man, we might add that had he been as abstemious as he was patriotic he would have lived for many years. But he has done a good life's work, and deserves the heartfelt respect and admiration of every American. In person he was middlesized and corpulent—his countenance was somewhat heavy, with a pleasant expression. His eye was uncommonly brilliant, and though he talked with deliberation, he was fluent. In disposition he was magnanimous and generous, and although not a person of refined taste, he was a very liberal patron of the fine arts. We can add nothing more emphatic of the public sentiment than to say his death is a calamity for the world.

COL. ROBERT COWDIN,

Of the First Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers.

THERE was a brilliant reception given to the First Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers by the Sons of that State residing in New York. The regiment numbers one thousand and forty-six men, and is commanded by Colonel Robert Cowdin, whose portrait we give in the present number. Mr. Richard Warren addressed the regiment for the delegation, saying much that was flattering, kind and patriotic. The response to this was made by Colonel Robert Cowdin, who, being more a man of deeds than words, made the following brief and pointed speech:

"Some of your faces are familiar to me; one I know served with me in the Massachusetts Volunteer Militia. I am no speechmaker. I am here to do some work. But I speak from the bottom of my heart when I say that I am at the head of as brave a set of men as ever breathed. If dishonor happens to our colors, it will occur after we are all dead. We have volunteered for three years. We go to fight for liberty or death, and our bones will be left upon the battle-field rather than desert those principles."

Those remarks were greeted by loud applause, and all present felt, if ever the regiment had work to do, that, under the leadership of Colonel Cowdin, it would be heard of honorably and victoriously.

COL. JOHN E. BENDIX,

Of the Seventh Regiment, Steuben Rifles,

WAS formerly Lieutenant-Colonel of the Washington Rifles, the only rifle corps in the First Division of our regularly organised Militia. This regiment is composed of ten companies, in all seven hundred and fifty men, among whom are many of our best German citizens and some Americans. The men are armed with the long range Minie rifle, with sword bayonet, and are in the highest state of discipline, especially in the skirmish drill. The great military skill displayed in this regiment is highly creditable to Colonel Bendix, as he labored hard and sacrificed much to bring it to its present state of efficiency. The Colonel's military life has been a very arduous one, owing to his laudable ambition to become a well-skilled and thoroughly drilled soldier, both in the practical use of arms and in the various evolutions in the field. He has been a hardworking soldier for a period of over twenty years, and by his untiring exertions has secured for himself his present prominent position. He possesses a good military library, and has made himself familiar with military information from the best authorities. Colonel Bendix has taught military tactics to private classes, in which some of our officers have received valuable instruction in military matters. At the time the Colonel left for the seat of war he was engaged in translating "Hardee's Tactics" into German, for the use of the German military population of the United States. He had the work far advanced when he embarked. The Colonel possesses all that is requisite to make the soldier—bravery, decision and determination. He is a strict disciplinarian, with a kind and generous heart. He is forty-three years of age, has a good constitution and great endurance. He is an American by birth, of German extraction. The Colonel's friends have every confidence in him and his regiment, as it is one of the best volunteer corps that has left this State. All its officers have seen service in the recent European wars.

THE UNITED STATES GENERAL HOSPITAL, GEORGETOWN, D. C.

THE Union Hotel at Georgetown has been converted into the United States General Hospital, for the use of the sick and wounded soldiers of our army. It has been arranged with forethought and care for the comfort and well-being of the gallant victims of a terrible necessity. The hospital duties are rendered with all the tenderness and delicacy of woman's ministerings, and we doubt if the sufferers could be cared for more lovingly at the hands of their mothers, wives or sisters. The general arrangement of the hospital service has been entrusted to Miss Dix, who, in her ministerings to the afflicted, emulates the undying, though modest fame of Florence Nightingale. Her presence or supervision guarantees that all that can be done for suffering humanity will assuredly be done.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

IT is not often that we hear of any new musical publications from Spain—a country generally reputed [illegible] in music, politics and literature—but a cantata, the work of a native composer, Don Francisco Frontera de Valldemosa, entitled "El triste España," is spoken of as deserving special notice for its beauty and originality. The fortunate composer has already been distinguished by several marks of honor, being named Commander of the Royal Order of Charles III. and also Honorary Secretary to the Queen.

THE KING OF DAHOMEY'S AMAZONS.—Among the King of Dahomey's army there is a troop called the Amazon Guard. The West African Herald thus describes them: "The Amazon Guard, as they have sometimes been styled, are the most extraordinary troops that we have ever heard or read of. They are 3,000 in number, all females, and display such a degree of ferocious bloodthirstiness and hardihood as to bear a greater resemblance to a lot of mad tigresses than to human creatures. They utterly despise death; they show no mercy to any living in war; they are mad after blood, and seem not to know what fear means. They are in fact a troop of devils, so to speak, whose hideous wildness of manner and the savage madness of whose demeanor in times of excitement is so appalling and inhuman as to have led many well-judging persons to opine that these dreadful creatures are periodically subjected to the influence of some species of drug which has this effect. The dress of the Amazons consists of a pair of loose trowsers, an upper garment covering the breast, and a cap. They are armed with a gun, knives and daggers; some have blunderbusses, others long elephant guns, while the remainder carry the ordinary musket. In their military exercise they display good discipline, as well as wonderful dexterity and agility."

THE Opinione of Turin mentions a new kind of lusus naturæ, in the shape of two highwaywomen, who, a few days ago, attacked a female of Serravalle, near Florence, rifled her pockets of all she had, and struck her several severe blows with a stick.

A VERY tall flagstaff has been erected in Kew Gardens. It is of unrivalled height and symmetry, and made of the Douglas Pine from Vancouver's Island, British Columbia. The spar is one hundred and fifty-nine feet long, and its diameter is twenty-two inches at the base, tapering regularly to eight inches at the summit. There are two hundred and fifty concentric rings, or layers of wood, indicating as many years of growth; its weight is three tons, and it contains one hundred and fifty-seven square feet of timber.

THE Journal de la Vienne gives an account of a singular hunt in the neighborhood of Poitiers, in that department. "An ox of great ferocity, belonging to a farmer at Civaux, escaped a month ago from a stable in which it had been confined, and sought refuge in a forest near Lussac. On several occasions it pursued people passing through the forest, and caused great alarm in the neighborhood. At length the sub-prefect of Montmorillon gave orders that a general battue should take place for the purpose of killing the animal. Accordingly, three days back, some gendarmes went to the village of La Tour, near which it had been last seen, and obtained the assistance of a number of inhabitants. A search was then commenced, and the ox was after awhile found in a clump of brushwood. Two gendarmes, advancing to within about thirty paces, discharged their carbines, and five or six of the villagers who were armed with guns also fired, but though wounded in several places, it appeared disposed to rush at the gendarmes, when the flashing of their bayonets frightened it, and it took to flight. The gendarmes and villagers pursued, and again fired and wounded it as before. Once more the animal fled and was chased a long time before it could be caught. The gendarmes then discharged their carbines, and it fell dead. Altogether, the hunt lasted several hours.

WILD BEASTS IN INDIA.—Everybody is aware that wild beasts abound in the jungles of the Punjaub, but we suspect very few people entertain the remotest idea of the frightful number of human creatures, especially children, that are destroyed year after year by these animals. In the past two years, no less than nine hundred and ninety-nine children were killed, principally by wolves, as will be seen by the subjoined extract: 1859—Killed, six men, one woman and four hundred and sixty-seven children—474; injured, thirty-three men, three women and eighty-three children—119; total, 593. 1860—Killed, nine men, four women and four hundred and thirty-two children—445; injured, twenty-four men and thirty-one children—55; total, 500. The number of wild animals destroyed is not so considerable as one would expect, seeing that Government has paid in two years fourteen thousand three hundred and eighty-six rupees as rewards for the destruction of four thousand two hundred and twenty-five, which includes a large proportion of cubs. The total number of each description of animals killed stands thus: In 1859, tigers, twelve; leopards, one hundred and ninety-two; bears, one hundred and eighty-seven, wolves, one thousand one hundred and seventy-four; and hyenas, two; total, 1,567. In 1860, tigers, thirty-five; leopards, one hundred and sixty-three; bears, three hundred and fifty; wolves, two thousand and eighty; and hyenas, thirty; total, 2,658. The wolves, we understand, do the greatest mischief. The wolf is probably the most cruel but most cowardly animal in existence, and a blundering, stupid beast, devoid of the cunning which many wild animals display. He does not sneak up to his prey like the tiger or fox, or attempt to conceal himself till the moment of his spring, but advances in the open, at a deliberate pace, until he arrives close to the object he has in view, when, if he experiences the least resistance, a blow on the head, for instance, or a thump from a man's fist, he will immediately show his teeth and snarl, but at the same time turn tail and be off without inflicting injury.

THE LATE COUNT CAMILLO CAVOUR, PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL OF THE KINGDOM OF ITALY.

BRIGANDS continue to infest alike the dominions of the Pope and those of Victor Emanuel. The diligences which lately arrived at Rome from Florence and Bologna, had both been overhauled by marauders. The Bologna vehicle was stopped near Macerata by a rope drawn across the road, which brought the horses down to the ground in a heap, and awoke the passengers in a trice. A lady inside was possessed of so much presence of mind that she lectured the brigands upon their incivility in requiring her to get out as well as the gentlemen; and she subsequently upbraided them for their cruelty in such terms as to prevent them from carrying into effect their purposes of killing two Piedmontese passengers, who were less tractable than the others in giving up their watches and money to the spoliators.

THE Nazione of Florence announces that a considerable number of jewels, stolen from the gallery of the Uffizi, a few months ago, have at length been discovered in a most singular manner. A hen belonging to a farm not far from Porta Romana (Roman gate), in scratching up the ground in the yard, picked up something shining, which caught the attention of a person present, who happened to be well acquainted with the jewels in question. The bit of shining stuff turned out to be a precious stone from one of the necklaces which had been stolen. The authorities were immediately sent for, and a search being made, a large bundle of jewels, all belonging to the same collection, was dug up. It is confidently believed that this discovery will lead to the arrest of the thieves.

MR. FLINT, a Leeds manufacturer and picture collector, has recently bought Holman Hunt's "Finding of Christ," for £3,000, Mr. Gambart being allowed to retain it for ten years for exhibition and engraving. Upwards of 100,000 persons have paid their shilling to see the picture, and the engraving list is growing prodigiously long. Mr. Flint is a rough Yorkshireman, and when first he saw the painting, expressed his admiration of it aloud and in homely language. "I mun hae that pictur'—I mun hae it." "But," said the gallery-keeper, who did not recognise a wealthy manufacturer in the coarse figure before him, "but it will cost a deal of money, sir." "I dunna care, I mun hae the pictur'. Where's Muster Gambart?" He saw Mr. Gambart, and in five minutes the bargain was concluded.

AFRICAN EXPLORATION.—Summing up the results of his four years travel, M. du Chaillu says: "I travelled—always on foot, and unaccompanied by other white men—about eight thousand miles. I shot, stuffed and brought home over two thousand birds, of which more than sixty are new species, and I killed upwards of one thousand quadrupeds, of which two hundred were stuffed and brought home, with more than eighty skeletons. Not less than twenty of these quadrupeds are species hitherto unknown to science. I suffered fifty attacks of the African fever, taking to cure myself more than fourteen ounces of quinine. Of famine, long-continued exposures to the heavy tropical rains and attacks of ferocious ants and venomous flies, it is not worth while to speak. My two most severe and trying tasks were the transportation of my numerous specimens to the seashore, and the keeping of a daily journal, both of which involved more painful care than I like even to think of."

IN order to show the enormous increase in the value of land in Paris, it is mentioned that four acres of ground adjoining the Passage Saudrié was rented by M. Jérôme Saudrié, in 1769, for ninety-nine years, at six hundred francs an acre. This ground, let on those conditions ninety-two years ago, is now sold at a minimum price of four hundred francs a mètre, and consequently represents a capital of six millions of francs, which, at five per cent. produces a revenue of 300,000 francs.

JULIA CANDEILLE was famous in our great-grandfather's time, and she had a stage friend, as fair as herself, named Lange, who had captivated the son of M. Simons, the wealthy coachbuilder of Paris. To break what he thought a disgraceful marriage, the coachbuilder hastened to Paris, to remonstrate with Mdlle. Lange, at whose house he found, on arriving, only Julie Candeille. This couple discussed the question, and with such decisive effect that the actress returned to Brussels the wife of the elder Simons, at whose residence the other pair of lovers were also united.

ENCOUNTER WITH A BUFFALO AT HENGLER'S CIRCUS.—The Sheffield Daily Telegraph says: "We regret to announce that on Friday evening a circumstance of a painful and exciting character occurred at this popular place of amusement. During his engagement at Hengler's establishment, Mr. Dan Castello has been exhibiting his beautiful and highly-trained horse Ducrow, and a ponderous buffalo, which he bought on the prairies of America, and which the Indians had named 'Yellow Thunder,' after one of their chiefs, who was of huge proportions. In order to provide against accident in the event of the buffalo turning violent, Castello held the animal by a rope, which was fastened to a hook through its nose, and whenever it exhibited symptoms of obstinacy he applied a whip. On Friday evening the buffalo gave evidence of more than ordinary stubbornness, and did not perform some of the customary tricks, and when it came to that part of its programme at which it should leap over a number of bars placed against the side of the arena, it cleared one, and then, in the twinkling of an eye, turned upon Castello, and knocked him down. It fell heavily upon him, and attempted to gore him, but Castello being an active and powerful man, struggled to free himself, and succeeded in avoiding much of the injury which would otherwise have been inflicted on him. The horns of the brute struck several times against the side of the arena, and tore down some portion of the red cloth covering. The utmost alarm was created in the place, and great fears were entertained for Castello's safety. The audience, which was very large, screamed and shouted, and several people ran out of the place. At length Castello succeeded in escaping from his powerful assailant, and jumped into the boxes. The buffalo, on losing its victim, immediately ran out of the arena the same way that it entered, and order was soon afterwards restored. On inquiry we are informed that Castello was not dangerously hurt, that he was able to walk to a cab, and that the most serious injury is a wound in the fleshy part of one of his legs."

M. MARIETTE is said to have made a new and important discovery in the ruins of Memphis; it is a list of sixty-three Egyptian kings, engraved on limestone. The Paris Library and British Museum are in possession of similar tablets, but they are not nearly so complete as the one lately discovered, which is to find its place in the new Museum in Egypt. This tablet of Memphis will determine the Egyptian dynasties of the ante-pyramidical period.

THE well-known stained glass windows of Fairford Church, Gloucestershire, have been restored, and it has been ascertained that some of the glass is English manufacture. Tradition has always asserted that a ship was captured at sea with these identical windows on board, intended for some foreign church, and that the merchant who owned the privateer brought the glass to Fairford, and had the church built to receive it.

A NEW instrument of destruction appears to have been invented in France. A letter from Nantes says: "At present an experiment is being made with a new projectile, of which the effect is said to be terrific. It weighs ninety pounds, and it is estimated that, should it fall among a body of troops in close column, it might kill or wound a hundred men."

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

"Look well before you leap." Very good advice, in its way, but how can sickly-looking people follow it?

"You need not sit up for me, to-night," said a wag to his wife, "but can put the street-door key on the first floor window-sill." "What do you mean?" "Why?" answered he, "I expect to come home a little elevated, and shall be able to reach it right enough."

AN Irish foreman to a stevedore, discharging a ship's cargo in London, required some extra help on deck, so he went to the hatchway and shouted down the hold to the men working there, "Now, thin, how many ov yo's down there I dar say?" "Three of us," was the reply. "Then, come up here the half ov yez, directly," says the foreman.

A PRETTY girl stepped into a New York store and asked the price of a pair of mits. "Why," said a gallant but impudent clerk, "you may have them for a kiss." "Agreed!" said the young lady, pocketing the gloves, and her eyes speaking daggers, "agreed; and as I see you give credit, you may charge it to your books, and collect it the best way you can."

A BOSTON clergyman, meeting one of his congregation who had recently come into possession of a handsome property by the death of his brother, inquired how he was getting along in the settlement of the estate. "Oh," said he, "I am having a dreadful time! What, with getting out letters of administration, and settling claims, I sometimes almost wish he hadn't died."

SYDNEY SMITH was, on one occasion, waited on by a lady, who lamented her inability to make her child pronounce his words correctly, and said that in a Scripture lesson lately given to him, the youngster called Abraham and the other sacred characters in the passage which he was reading—instead of patriarchs—"partridges." "I see," responded Sydney, "the young rascal was making game of them."

LOUIS XIV., who loved a laconic style, met a priest whilst travelling in the country, and ordering him to stop, asked hastily, "Whence come you? Where are you going? What do you want?" The priest, who knew perfectly well the king's disposition, instantly replied, "From Bruges—to Paris—a benefice." "You shall have it," replied the king, and in a few days he presented him to a valuable living.

A FASHIONABLE lady who, from having been a laundress, was raised to the height of upper-ten-dom by a fortunate marriage with a millionaire, being one day besieged by a flatterer, who treated her as if she had been born to royalty, said to him, half laughing, half seriously, "Sir, you owe me for some washing I did for you some time since." "I had not forgotten it, madam," replied the no ways disconcerted flatterer, "but I was afraid to pay you." There are few persons, men or women, in society, who would dare to have so good a memory.

THE RHODE ISLAND CAMP NEAR WASHINGTON, D. C.

From the Rhode Island Camp the view of the surrounding country is vast and beautiful in the extreme. It embraces the whole of the City of Washington with its magnificent buildings, Arlington Heights with its long line of glittering camps, the Female Academy at Fairfax, Virginia, the Virginia shores of the Potomac, the Long Bridge and Alexandria, and a portion of Maryland. It is a panorama of rare and exceeding beauty, and one of absorbing interest. The Rhode Island camp is indeed finely located, pleasant and healthful, and ample for all military purposes. Our Special Artist, accompanying General McDowell's command, has sketched the Camp at a happy moment, when the gallant Rhode Islanders were on parade and the efficient artillery coming up in martial array. It was a scene full of animation, and has been spiritedly transcribed by our Artist.

THE HUNTER GUN AT FORT CORCORAN, ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, VA.

The immense line of works excavated and made by the Sixty-ninth Regiment of N. Y. S. M., under Colonel Corcoran, is now nearly completed, and will be one of the strongest defences on the whole line of the Potomac. It will be mounted by many heavy guns, some of which are already in position, and among them the splendid Hunter Gun, which will speak most effectively for the Union. Colonel Hunter is active in his supervision, and cordially approves of the successful labors of the gallant Sixty-ninth.

Professor Wise, of Lancaster, Pa., it is understood, has been engaged by the Government for war balloon operations. He will commence his service immediately.

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Poor Madeline, who shall portray her distress, or what language can give expression to her misery? When the diligence drew up to change horses, she had descended from the vehicle, intending merely to seek to overcome the giddiness which depressed her by breathing the fresh air, and by a change of position, which the opportunity seemed to offer; but her giddiness increased as she alighted from the diligence, and she tottered towards the house in attempting to mount the steps, of which her strength entirely failed her. She felt herself falling, and to save herself endeavored to reach an iron palisade which surmounted the steps; she had not time before she became insensible, and fell heavily against the rails. She was carried into the house, where she recovered but from one fainting fit to fall again into insensibility; and on sending for a surgeon it was discovered that in her fall her arm had struck violently against the iron railings, and was broken.

Madeline, feverish and unconscious, after the fractured limb was set was conveyed to bed, and not till the night had far advanced was she aware of being in a strange place. She looked wildly round the room, and seeing a woman dozing on a chair by the fire, demanded in an alarmed voice where the child was.

The woman, who knew nothing of any child, and thinking she raved, understanding she had fever, and having been told by the doctor she was to be kept free as possible from excitement, replied carelessly,

"Safe, madame, quite safe; and now you are awake, let me give you this composing draught."

"What is the matter with me?" cried the bewildered young woman, for the first time noticing the splints on her arm. "Why is this?"

"Compose yourself, madame," said the woman; "take this draught, and to-morrow you will know all."

"But my arm," said Madeline. "Oh, it is broken! How came it? Was it done by the fall which I now remember I had?"

The woman nodded, again offered the medicine, which Madeline, unconscious of the cup of misery in store for her, swallowed, and turning on her pillow fell into a perturbed but long sleep. She awoke not till near mid-day. Breakfast was brought her, and while partaking of it she again asked for her child.

Finding from Madeline's conversation and manner that she was now perfectly sane, it was their turn to demand to what child she alluded. On naming the diligence, it was at once explained; it had carried the object of her care on to Paris.

Madeline in an ecstacy of grief and terror sprang from the bed at this intelligence, and entreated them in heartrending accents to assist her to dress and let her have some conveyance, no matter what, that she might hasten in pursuit of the lost child.

It was in vain they urged her inability to undertake a journey, or endeavored to soften her anguish by telling her on the return of the diligence next day no doubt the child would be brought back with it, or that the doctor persisted that it would bring on an attack of fever. Madeline was firm in her determination to hasten without a moment's hesitation to Paris.

"What will become of me?" she cried. "How can I face her parents!—how return to tell Batiste that I have betrayed the sacred trust all have reposed in me! I cannot, cannot show myself again to them but with the child; they would scorn me, spurn me as I deserve, for daring to undertake a charge I had so ill fulfilled. Oh, Monsieur d'Almaine! bereaved Lucille! Batiste, trample on me, crush me, for having in my madness quitted for a single moment your beloved—your lost child."

It was useless offering consolation or whispering hope; she would not hearken to the first, and could not admit the second an inmate to her bosom; and in a state of torture commenced her hopeless pursuit in a state of mind incapable of acting with either decision or promptitude, or indeed with even discretion.

Her head was continually from the window of the carriage, as if she expected to see the child on the wayside, left there by the merciless hand of some cold-hearted stranger, or as in reality she would have considered it, the noble deed of the benevolent and kind hearted.

A ray of hope for the first time dawned in her heart as her quick eye discerned in the distance the heavy, tottering vehicle that had occasioned her agony and self-reproach. She had descended from the carriage long before it was near, her impatience giving her the idea that she could reach it sooner on foot than riding; and certainly with the speed which nothing but her perturbed mind could have bestowed in her present weak state, she flew, rather than ran, to meet it. On reaching it, breathless with speed and anxiety, she cried out to the postilion,

"Stop, monsieur, and tell me what you have done with my child—where you have left it—who has got it? Oh, tell me what you have done with my child, if you would not drive me mad!"

"That you are already," said the man, "to ask me about your child. What should I possibly know about anybody's child but my own?"

"It is false—you have stolen it!" returned the frantic Madeline. "Will none assist me to recover my child? Are there no Christians present?"

The postilion smacked his lips, an intimation for his horses to proceed; but a gentleman, struck with the all but maniacal appearance of Madeline, ordered him to delay a few moments, while he interrogated the person, who evidently had some deep meaning in what she had said.

A few words from the unfortunate young woman acquainted him with the transaction, and questioning the postilion, he found he was not the one who had conducted the coach on the fatal day; but he readily gave his fellow-servant's address, which the gentleman, writing down, put into the hand of Madeline, telling her at once to go to him, and act according to his statement; at the same time recommending her to take the opportunity, if unsuccessful with the man, to have handbills printed, and distributed through Paris and its environs.

Madeline, too wild to bestow her thanks, promised to do as he advised; and, with dread and impatience, which were enfeebling both mind and body, allowed him to hand her to the coach, which, slow and rumbling, little suited to the passionate excitement of its inmate, proceeded on its way.

It was late at night, the rain falling heavily, when Madeline was set down at a hotel in the Rue de Richelieu. Without waiting a moment for refreshment, she hired a person, and proceeded to the lodging of the postilion. She learnt nothing from him. He could tell her nothing but that one of her fellow-passengers had left the diligence a stage from Paris, and that the others, having arrived in the city, each of them had taken the way to his own destination, but to his belief neither of them had a child with him, but that certainly one of them had taken her luggage—which he could not say.

It is impossible to describe her distraction at this news, one moment imagining they had destroyed the child for the sake of the supposed value of the contents of the trunk; the next that she had been dropped on the road, and was enduring the sufferings of cold, hunger and desertion. She told the man to conduct her to a printer's, where she gave an order to have bills posted with a description of the child, and also of her dress.

Madeline had scarcely strength to follow her guide to the hotel. On reaching it she desired to be shown a sleeping room, where, exhausted by fatigue and pain, and tortured by grief and anxiety, she threw herself on the bed, in the hope of finding a temporary relief in slumber; but there was too much deep emotion in every throb of her heart for sleep. She tossed restlessly from side to side many hours, the hot current coursing through her veins like molten lead, and daylight found her feverish and helpless, alike incapable of acting or resisting.

In this fevered state Madeline lay several days. Her first words on consciousness returning were in a low, feeble tone,

"Have you found her? Say you have—oh, say you have found my child!"

They shook their heads.

"Not found!" she exclaimed; "then they have killed her. Dress me; let me go to Batiste; he will search into it; he will find the child of his friend. Do you not see I am weak, and cannot use but one arm? Will no one dress me that I may go to my husband?"

The doctor, who had entered while she spoke, insisted on silence; and on her taking a composing draught, assured her of her inability to leave the house at present, but offered to write to her husband, or any friend she would name.

Madeline shuddered.

"No, no," she murmured. "I must go. No one must write the dreadful news. Give the draught if it will give me power to quit this place."

The next day her anxiety was so great that even the medical man thought she might as well be removed, and die with her friends as there, which he prognosticated would be the case if her fever continued.

Accordingly, on the following day, propped by pillows, and accompanied by one of the domestics, Madeline departed from Paris. During the journey the same restlessness assailed her as when before travelling the same road; she frequently raised herself to look from the window, in the vain hope that she should see something of the little creature who, like herself, though not so intensely, was suffering the pain and privation of being torn from those she had never before for a day been separated from, and it was only in the endearments of the gentle little Blanche, and the particular regard of the handsome Jose, that she could find consolation.

At length the form of Batiste was in sight. Madeline's trembling increased. The candles were lighted, but the curtains undrawn, and the figure of her husband bending over some papers was distinctly visible. She groaned; her weight of misery was heavier than it had been yet, as she looked on him.

"He is assiduous," she murmured, "to get all he can for them; he has toiled day and night for it, but what will be all to them without their child? They had before lost wealth and station, and now, now——" her agony prevented her finishing the sentence.

Batiste had heard the carriage approaching. He listened a moment; then rose hurriedly, opened the door, and looked out.

"Who is it," he demanded, "that comes at this late hour?"

"Batiste!" said a faint voice.

"Madeline!" he cried. "What has brought you back? No new misfortune, I trust? I had expected and hoped you were in London."

Madeline groaned more audibly. "Take me home," she said, "though I am not worthy to cross its threshold."

Batiste lifted her from the vehicle, carried her into the house, and placed her carefully on a sofa. The lights then gleamed upon her, and he started with wonder and alarm at her altered appearance; scarce a week had passed since she had left him, buoyant with health and vivacity; she had returned broken in spirit, pale, haggard and helpless as an infant, with dishevelled hair and dress, scarcely a vestige of her former self remaining. Something dreadful he knew had happened, and some minutes elapsed after he observed all this before his strong mind recovered the sudden shock it had received, to ask its meaning. He put his arm round his suffering wife, and in a tone of assumed calmness said, "Speak Madeline; what has caused all this? You are ill; your arm in splinters; but neither is so bad to me, though you suffer from both, as the wildness of your look and manner. Quiet yourself; feel that you are at home with me near you; that, whatever may have occurred, now nothing can harm you."

"You are right, Jacques," said Madeline; "I am ill, my arm broken; but what of it? I feel not my physical ailments. Would that I had died in receiving them!"

"Speak," said Batiste; "this suspense is unendurable! What of the count, Lucille, and the child?"

Madeline screamed slightly. "The child! the child!" she cried, wildly. "Ah! it is that that maddens me; she is lost—gone!—irrevocably gone! Upbraid me, crush me; I will bear all!"

Batiste started to the other side of the apartment, where for a moment he glanced almost as wildly as herself on the unhappy Madeline.

"Lost!" he exclaimed. Then, modulating his voice, and drawing near her, he added, "You rave, Madeline. This accident," pointing to her arm, "has bewildered, unnerved you, and you fancy what is impossible to have happened."

She covered her face with her hands, sobbing, "Oh! it is true, it is true; I have had a precious trust and have abused it!—no, no, not abused it! I was ill; I stepped from the diligence a moment to recover myself, when I became insensible, fell and broke my arm. Meanwhile the diligence with Birdie in it proceeded without me. This I knew not till I recovered. What could I do but follow it? I did this, but without success, without hope, for none knew how she was taken from the carriage, not even the porters that attended it."

"But there were other passengers," returned Batiste, after a pause, in which he had endeavored, and not unsuccessfully, to gain a glimmering of comfort. "Surely they can be discovered, and in the trunk there might have been a clue to induce them to guard her; her name or residence may have been there, and D'Almaine is a name well known to every Frenchman. Take comfort, Madeline; we know not but even now this child, the child of all our affections, may be safe with her parents."

Madeline's heavy eyes brightened a moment; a tint of color passed over her pale face. "If I could but think so," she uttered, nervously, "if I could but believe that she was not hurt, I would try to find consolation in the thought; but I have such dire apprehensions that none but the darkest fears assail me."

"You have not slept for some nights. Go to bed now, and do your best to compose yourself," said her husband. "You require advice and medicine. I will ride over to our friend Dumont, take his opinion on this unfortunate affair, and send him to you. In the meantime, should I not return to-night, consider I have gone forward to Paris. All seems mysterious, but with God's help I will fathom it. Ah, Madeline, why did you not come home at once? It would have saved the delay of a week, and the passengers in the diligence might have been easily found. They may now be many hundred miles off—all undoubtedly in different directions."

Madeline could but weep and bewail her want of foresight. Her husband embraced her, whispering, "Courage, my dear, pray for my success, and be well on my return to receive me. Adieu."

Madeline followed him to the door. She heard him give orders to the servant to follow with his horse to the village. The moon shone bright, and raising herself on the trellis-work of the verandah, she watched him with a beating heart till the orb, obscured by a dark cloud, shaded her husband, the fields, and nearly the trees from her view. She still hung to the trellis-work till the moon again shed her pale light on the landscape—Batiste was gone. With trembling limbs she dropped from her resting-place and entered the house. She looked round the room, it seemed desolate and deserted.

"And I have made it thus!" she cried, in a faint, hollow voice. "I have made the home once so happy hateful to me! And Lucille, what will her home be when she knows she is childless? Oh, mercy me, that is a scene I cannot look upon. The bare idea freezes up the best attributes of life. Hope and energy are extinguished by it."

Exhausted by her illness and her emotion, her head sank listlessly on her folded hands, till aroused by a servant, who, by soothings and persuasions, got her to her apartment.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The sad anticipations of poor Jean Perre had been but too quickly verified. Within a year of his kind-hearted adoption of little Birdie, both he and the little Blanche were at rest from the struggles and sorrows of this world; and little Birdie, the cherished pet—the bright, carefully tended blossom—was left to the care of Rose Perre, whose natural indolence and incapacity were now heightened by the poverty in which her husband's death had plunged her. The clothes of the little foundling had long since disappeared, or become ragged and shabby; her scanty and coarse diet was beginning to affect her health and looks; and though her lovely features and beautiful hair could not but attract the attention of the most casual observer, no one could have recognized in the half-fed, half-clad child the lovely, elegant little heiress of the proud Count D'Almaine. She had sorrowed with far more bitterness and permanence than was natural to her age for her little playfellow Blanche; and her chief consolation appeared to be in visiting the lowly grave, on which many a flower bloomed, plucked by her little hands, and in roaming in the fields and roadsides, always accompanied by her faithful Jose, who never left his little mistress day or night.

She was sitting on the bank of a lonely lane one morning, amusing herself with ornamenting Jose with a garland of wild flowers, which unwonted gaiety he received with more polite submission than pleasure, when a footstep near her made her look up, and she saw a gentleman of very pleasing appearance, looking with a kind smile upon her occupation.

"So you are trying to make a May Queen of your pet, my little girl," he said. "I think you had better put the flowers in your own sunny curls. I am afraid pussy does not appreciate the honor."

She shook her pretty head decidedly, as she replied, "No, no, I give all the flowers either to Blanche or Jose."

"And who is Blanche?" he inquired.

"Blanche is dead," replied Birdie. "She lies in the churchyard yonder. She was Jose's mistress as well as me."

"And who is your mother?" he asked.

"Madame Perre," was the quick reply.

"Madame Perre!" ejaculated the young man. "Good heavens! is it possible? What is your name, my child?"

"Birdie," she replied.

"Birdie," he repeated. "Can it be—can this poor little child be the little beautiful creature that good man received only one short year ago? Merciful Providence! what would her parents feel could they see her. Is M. Perre living, my little girl?"

"No, he died before before Blanche," she replied.

"Will you take me to your mother?" he asked. "I was a friend of M. Perre's, I should like to see her."

Birdie willingly complied, and in a few minutes they were in the wretched habitation of the poor tailor's widow.

The young man quickly explained to her what the reader has doubtless already guessed, that he was the person who had sympathised so fully in Jean Perre's benevolent act, and aided him in it, to the best of his power, by his purse. He added, that though unable at that time to do more than give that small assistance to the worthy Perre's good deed, circumstances had since changed with him as well as Madame Perre, and he was now willing and able to take the burden of the little creature's maintenance off her hands.

"But you are yet young, monsieur," said Madame Perre, "and have, perhaps, no wife or mother who could take charge of the child."

"I have a sister who will be a mother to her," he replied, "and who will live with me. You are right, Madame Perre, to be particular on that head; but I assure you she could not be in better hands. My sister will bring her up to be in all respects in the way I believe her birth entitles her to."

Madame Perre still hesitated; but though her really kind heart clung to the child, the only thing left her to love, her judgment and her poverty at once counselled her to consent to an offer so advantageous for Birdie, and which would relieve herself from a deep source of anxiety.

"Well, monsieur," she said, "I cannot doubt your assurances; and as I am little able to give the poor child either comfort or education, I will consent to give her up to you, though I shall be sadly lonely without her." And Madame Perre, catching the little Birdie in her arms, covered her with tears and kisses.

"I will bring my sister to see you the day after to-morrow," said the young man kindly, "when we will take the child with us; and meanwhile, get her some clothes to take the journey in till we can get her fitted out."

He gave the good woman a couple of gold pieces as he spoke, and then took his leave, after a few more directions as to the collection of any articles which could lead to the identity of the little girl being discovered at some future time.

At the appointed day the stranger again appeared, and this time accompanied by a lady of singularly mild and pleasing aspect, who was at once won by the loveliness and grace of the little Birdie, who now, dressed in a neat though plain dress, looked more like her old self than when her kind protector last saw her.

"Here," said Madame Perre, when the first salutations were over, "is the dress in which Birdie came to us when she was lost, the ring which hung round her neck, and a picture she always said was her mamma. It is the only clue we have ever had to help in discovering her parents. I have packed them up in this parcel, and now give it into your keeping, monsieur. You will not betray your trust."

"Rely on me," returned the young man, "and I have still confidence that some day the truth will come to light. But what is in that basket?"

"It is the cat," said Madame Perre, "I could not pacify Birdie till I assured her he should go with her."

The lady smiled good-naturedly, and though by no means anxious for this addition to their travelling party, she consented to the arrangement, in compassion to the tearful looks of the little girl, who was thus about to be torn from all she had known or loved since losing her natural protectors; and Birdie nestled up to her side and put her little hand in hers, in loving gratitude for her goodness. And now the moment of parting came. The carriage which had brought the brother and sister to the cottage, had received both the basket containing Jose and the small packet, which was Birdie's sole luggage, and the travellers rose to depart. Birdie clung to Madame Perre in an agony of childish grief, and the good woman herself was little less moved.

"You will be kind to her madame," she said. "She is a loving little creature, and needs little severity, though I have been cross to her at times. Heaven forgive me!"

"She shall be to me as my own child," said the lady. "So God prosper me."

"Amen!" added her brother. "From this hour I consider myself her father. Till her real parent shall be discovered, I will provide for her as such."

Madame Perre smiled through her tears at these assurances; then gently disengaging the clinging arms of the little girl, she placed her in the carriage. The elder travellers entered it, and it quickly drove off.

Rose Perre watched the carriage till it was out of sight, and then re-entered her cottage. It had never looked so dreary before.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER LIII.

When Lady Maud and Lady Kingswood turned at the sound of Philip Avon's voice and beheld him standing in the doorway, they both shuddered, not so much at his unexpected as at his actual appearance.

He stood, drawn up to his full height, sternly regarding both. His form was gaunt and spare, looking, as it was, fearfully wasted; his face was thin, his cheekbones stood out, and were unpleasantly prominent.

"Ladies," he exclaimed, "you will extend your pardon to me if I have made a too liberal use of the free licence which, perhaps, unenviably distinguishes our country manners. I must honestly confess at the same time, however, that the freedom many complain of suits my wild, intractable disposition, and I constantly avail myself of it from choice, and not from ignorance of what is due to good breeding. To be sure, I ought to have sat patiently below and awaited your coming, I could have looked out of the window into the park, or gazed admiringly at the ornamental grounds, criticised the engravings upon the wall of the apartment, hummed a tune, if nature had deigned to have given me a musical ear to distinguish between a country jig and the National Anthem, or have beat a tattoo with my heels, as a tenant does in the steward's office when he wants his rent lowered. I could, probably, have done all this had I not been a love-sick swain; but then I have come a wooing, and in my wooing patience is not my mood; hence, as Lady Maud came not in search of me, I appear thus abruptly in search of Lady Maud. Lady Kingswood, I have, I hope, your pardon for this seemingly rude intrusion, but which, I hope, my frank explanation will have proved to have been a very natural one."

He entered the room as he spoke, and tendered his hand to Lady Maud, who, however, stood like a statue, motionless, without heeding it.

Lady Kingswood, extremely proud and exacting in all the observances which etiquette demands, reddened slightly, and gave him but a cool inclination of the head.

"Now, Mr. Philip Avon, after tendering you the usual greetings," commenced Lady Kingswood, with an assumption of self-possession which she might hardly have been expected to have exhibited, "will you favor us with the object of your visit?"

"Lady Maud is the object of my visit, unquestionably," he said.

Lady Kingswood felt Lady Maud shudder. Philip's mode of speech was offensive even to Lady Kingswood.

"I know, as a boy, that I liked young Lady Maud better than any other maiden I had seen, and I thought it was because she was prettier, more graceful, and, somehow, pleasanter than any of them. When I had sprung into manhood and found that she had leaped from a mere girl into maidenhood, my heart, Lady Kingswood, my heart, which, till then, beat only for myself, told me the nature of the preference I entertained for her. I loved her not with a holiday liking—not a mild, milky longing at a distance, but a fierce, burning, impetuous, ungovernable—why should it be governable?—frenzied passion, but no less love, that love which places her peerless above all women that ever lived, and will keep her unalterably there the highest, the brightest, the proudest——"

"Never to change?" murmured Lady Kingswood, with a face of ghastly paleness.

"Never to change?" repeated Philip Avon. "Why not ask me to change from what I am to the merman who pirouettes in a ballet? As mine, my wife, Lady Avon, she will be a part of my own heart, my own life, of my own honor, a creature apart from the rest of the world. Change! Trample down my name in the ashes of my pride, lash me through my own lands by the hand of my own groom, compel me to bend the knee to him who strikes me, to bow down humbly before him who basely wrongs me, then ask me to change, I may then, but not before, Lady Kingswood."

Lady Kingswood rose up and paced the room in a perturbed manner. There was a spasmodic sob in her throat, but her head and form was proudly erect, and she paced the apartment with the carriage of an empress.

Philip watched her beneath his brows.

"I have struck the right trail," he thought, "to this proud woman's heart. Lord Kingswood has played her false for a thousand! I'll make her my friend at least."

He waited until she approached him again, and then arresting her steps, he said,

"Are you, Lady Kingswood, wonder-stricken that where I have set heart, honor, life, soul, all upon one stake, that I should be jealous, suspicious, mistrustful; that I should watch the ideal of my love, though in clay, with burning, feverish eyes; that I should deem mine enemy him who would rob me of a glance which should belong only to me, that should lay snares to entrap smiles which are mine alone; that should spread nets for honied words sung with the sweetest music with which human voice ever charmed mortal ear; that I should, moreover, regard him as my most deadly foe who would to attempt to seize the prize which I claim to be mine—and mine alone upon earth—by every mortal right?"

"Save one!" exclaimed a low, clear voice.

Both Lady Kingswood and Philip Avon started as the tones reached their ears. Lady Maud it was that spoke. She had risen suddenly and turned towards him.

She stood firmly, her arms hanging loosely by her side, and she herself, it seemed, calm and impassible, notwithstanding the painful emotions which were seething within her young bosom—all too young to be the receptacle of so much grief, a grief that must be hidden from all eyes except those of One to whom all things are revealed, and to whom in her bitter agony she had prayed.

"What right is it that is reserved, dear Maud?" inquired Lady Kingswood, putting the question Philip shrank from suggesting.

Lady Maud raised her eyes to Lady Kingswood, and pointed to Philip Avon.

"Mr. Avon has been speaking to you of me, Lady Kingswood," she said.

"Rather of himself, Maud," observed Lady Kingswood, a little hastily.

"But I am to understand, Mr. Avon, that when he is speaking of the one stake upon whom he asserts that he has set his heart and honor, I am the being alluded to," she rejoined.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. S. NEGLEY, COMMANDING THE THIRD BRIGADE OF PENNSYLVANIA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY EVANS & PRINCE, YORK, PA.—SEE PAGE 118.

"You are!" cried Philip, impetuously; "and my life for your hand!"

"I am the prize, therefore, which he declares, by every mortal right to be his, and I interpose one which—perhaps the only one left him to omit, but yet is the one which belongs to me—is insuperable—my consent!"

Philip's lips trembled, his eyes flashed fire, and his eyebrows fell over his eyes so as almost to exclude them from sight.

"I have already explained away your fancies—a mere girl's fancies—upon that point," he exclaimed, in low voice, as though he dared not trust himself to raise it.

"They are not to be explained away by reasons which touch not my convictions," answered Lady Maud, coldly and firmly.

Lady Kingswood laid her hand gently upon her arm.

"My darling Maud," she said, in a tone of surprise.

Certainly she regarded Maud with wonder. That Maud should assert such a right to think for herself, even in the choice of one to whom for life she must link her happiness, filled her with astonishment.

Lady Maud turned from her. Yet more surprised, she wound her arm about her waist.

"My beloved child," she continued, in an urgent voice, "obedience is your first duty; remember that Lord Kingswood——"

Maud disengaged herself sharply and suddenly.

"I remember, too," she said, drawing herself up erect, "that I am a Kingswood. That I bear the name of her of our race who knew how to ally death with outrage."

Lady Kingswood fell back in fear. Before her, the very counterpart of the figure in the old library, which but once in her life she had seen, stood Lady Maud. Pale, with knitted brows and compressed lips, she faced Lady Kingswood, the very incarnation of high determination, which death might level, but persuasion against the promptings of her own heart never.

It seemed but the other day that she was an artless, timid, shrinking girl—a child full of play. As Lady Kingswood gazed upon her now she could scarcely credit her eyes, she looked so tall, so proud, so majestic.

It was in the unpleasant pause which followed this extraordinary assertion of right by one usually so shrinkingly timid that Philip Avon interposed.

Although Lady Kingswood could find no words to respond to Lady Maud's startling remark, so like the expression of inspiration, yet he addressed her as though she was about, in somewhat harsh terms, to correct Lady Maud for what she had uttered.

"Let me speak, Lady Kingswood," he said, hastily. "Leave Lady Maud to me, I will woo her and win her in my own fashion. Although her eyes are blinded to my qualifications, and her heart has not yet opened its portals to receive the smallest intake of my affections, I do not despair of yet bringing her round to wish to be Lady Avon, and when Lady Avon, as desire to be no one else."

"Enough one of a thousand times," muttered Lady Maud, speaking as if addressing nothing. "I am not fated to reach a crown so dear."

"Is all preliminary for prophecy over all, Lady Maud," responded Philip, "and may I now submit a request? I have a favor to ask of you, and as Sir Harcourt has your hand in keeping, I know the Exponents to be a thousand more. In asking you since I willingly accept my share of the load during—may I say it?—my vacation years here. It is not that the Lady Maud of Kingswood haunts the Close, that at times his form appears within it, that there is a sense of pleasure in the air, that I feel I am in a position to entertain errant to his aggressors under particular circumstances. For years, Lady Maud, I have had a fancy to be a student of the Close, and to become the subject matter of its history. Come, and there are many days in the year when visitors are few and the gentle evenings and rambling attainments, to the effect that at times, in the dusk, there are those whose friends I have not the pleasure to know, who have become there the students of the trees in the workshop, and who become there the students of the trees in the workshop, and who have grown in the Close. Perhaps the fellow, ignorant and superstitious, has not the power to see the spirit of the Kingswood Lady Maud, but I have, and I may be excusable in the eyes of the Exponents to be a student of the Kingswood, assert that the spirits of the dead appears in the precincts of Kingswood, and that they have enough to do to keep their spirits in the house of Kingswood. Now, it is usually asserted by many whose duties take us to involve ourselves in a knowledge of the spirits of the dead, that it is upon the events that the phantom of the once-living Baron of Kingswood, about whom there is a mystery, and whose spirit is said to walk the Close, is the identity of the mysterious Knight of Kingswood, Sir Harcourt Rivers."

A half-smothered shriek burst from the lips of Lucy Kingswood.

"Sweetheart! Lucy, darling! What is the matter? Are you sure?"

"Sir Lucy, Lucy Kingswood," continued Philip Avon, with a vindictive gratification of the word, "you are a fool. I am the last person in the world to permit to be honored guest of one who was said to be originally like this and who has been known to be subject to such attacks as you have had."

And what more was to have been said by Philip Avon, and what more emphatically expressed Lady Maud, can be easily and another word.

There was a pause of what workmen generally call a breakfast, indictable really in her intense pain, and within a definite aspect, when disturbed him. He, however, gently recovered himself, and, with a slight cough, which was carefully prolonged the suppression that he would make her his at any and at.

"It is indispensable that you be by, he said.

Beloved Lady Maud, you have rather surfeited me with these confessions. I am anxious as to what you have to say, and I am sure that you will be glad, and I will not trouble you with an really possible reception. If you so far on, and your gracious permission to be present at your interview with Philip, I will present with the object of my discussion from the moment that you have concluded your interview with Philip Avon."

Lady Maud looked at him, but made no reply. She turned to Lucy Kingswood, and said Lucy Maud, in the would a moment previously have considered, Miranda-like, beyond all mere loveliness.

"I said," presented Philip Avon, "that in November but the phantom harm appeared and disappeared, and with the appearance of the Lady Maud would, what, perhaps, in—or, by the way, may not be—a mistake, is the case of the Kingswood Lady Maud, and the disappearance of the Lady Maud, and the disappearance of the Lady Maud, and the disappearance of the

Can be carried by a single person, and is entirely free from the objections of Packing, Carriage, &c.

For Yachting or Gaming Parties they will prove invaluable. The Tent can be put up in ten minutes, and removed in the same time.

For Gentlemen fond of Field Sports, their peculiar utility is apparent, as they will at once recommend themselves to Deer Hall, Cricket Club, or Military Companies, they are so compact, and can be carried a mile in the usual length of a belt for ammunition or luncheon pouches.

Price, complete, 50s. Sent Agent for Inventor and Patentee, GEO. RAPHAEL, No. 166 WILTON St. London.

N. B.—Also on view at the Crystal Palace. Tents capable of holding 30 to 100 persons, suitable for the Crimea and originally £150; will be sold for 20*l*. 260

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1861, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 295—Vol. XII.] NEW YORK, JULY 13, 1861. [Price 6 Cents.

ARREST OF MARSHAL KANE AND THE POLICE COMMISSIONERS OF BALTIMORE, MD.

Major General Banks has acted with great promptitude and decision since he assumed his military duties. He acts out the old saying that "prevention is better than cure," that a rebellion prevented is better than a rebellion put down. In this faith he promptly arrested Marshal Kane as the most active rebel in Maryland, and incarcerated him in Fort McHenry. He supplied his place by Colonel Kenley, a tried and trustworthy officer; and as the Police Commissioners put all the police officers off duty, and, in a measure, disbanded them, he first swore in a body of loyal men as substitutes and then arrested the Commissioners, and sent them to keep company with Marshal Kane in Fort McHenry. Symptoms of disaffection among the populace were too manifest to be disregarded, and, to quell it before it ripened to a revolt, Major General Banks stationed troops, with artillery, in the principal streets of the city of Baltimore, and thus effectually subdued the spirit of insubordination and restored confidence to the loyal citizens.

In the meantime, Provost-Marshal Kenley actively pursued his search after concealed arms. He took possession of the late Marshal's office, the entrance to which was guarded by a cannon planted in the hall, and officers with drawn swords, a precautionary measure rendered necessary by the disturbed state of the city, and the fact that this building was the principal point of excitement. Thus guarded, the business of the office was carried on without interruption.

The search after arms was eminently successful. In an old back building of the City Hall, recently used by Marshal Kane, was found two six-pounder and two four-pounder guns, half a ton of assorted shot, four hundred weight of balls, eight hundred rifle ball cartridges, gun carriages, &c. In the office and under the Marshal's office, in the floors and in the ceiling, arms and ammunition were found, among them a case of splendid pistols, two hundred and fifty muskets and rifles, twenty-five of which were Minie, besides several muskets which were supposed to belong to the Massachusetts soldiers disarmed by the mob on the 19th of April. There was no lack of evidence of the traitorous sentiments of Marshal Kane and his coadjutors. The prompt action of General Banks has been of vast service at this time, when it is highly important to preserve peace in our midst whilst our army is engaged with a powerful and active foe in the field.

THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

EXTRA SESSION.

JULY THE FOURTH.

SENATE.—The following Senators were present: Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bingham, Breckinridge, Bright, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foote, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Lane of Indiana, Latham, Morril, Nesmith, Pearce, Polk, Powell, Saulsbury, Sherman, Simmons, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Thomson, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson and Wilson.

Mr. Grimes presented the credentials of James S. Lane, Senator elect from Kansas, who took the oath.

Mr. Doolittle presented the credentials of S. C. Pomeroy, Senator elect from Kansas.

Mr. Trumbull presented the credentials of Orville H. Browning, Senator elect from Illinois, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Stephen A. Douglas.

Mr. Latham presented the credentials of James A. McDougal, Senator elect from California.

Messrs. Pomeroy, Browning and McDougall then had the oath administered to them.

Notices of several bills to indemnify the President for certain acts were then given, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—When the House organized, the election of a Speaker was proceeded with. Mr Colfax having resigned, the contest was narrowed to Blair and Galusha Grow; the latter was elected, and conducted to the chair by Blair and Richardson. After Mr Grow had expressed his thanks in rather a long but patriotic speech, the House proceeded to elect a Clerk, the result was the election of Mr. Etheridge (Tenn.), by ninety-two votes over Mr. Forney, who numbered forty-one. After some unimportant business, the House adjourned.

SENATE.—On the 5th the President's Message was received. On the 6th after the election of Isaac Basset as Assistant Doorkeeper, Mr. Wilson presented the several bills of which he gave notice on Thursday. The bill to Promote the Efficiency of the Army was referred to a Special Committee, consisting of Messrs. Wilson of Massachusetts, Hale of New Hampshire, Latham of California, Sherman of Ohio, Powell of Kentucky, Cowan of Pennsylvania, King of New York, Kennedy of Maryland, and Howe of Wisconsin, and the other bills were referred to the Military Committee. A message was then received from the President, and the Senate went into executive session.

HOUSE.—On the 5th the Message was received, and the Members then adjourned. On the 6th the death of Mr. Scranton, of Pennsylvania, was announced and appropriate remarks were made by several members, after which the House adjourned, in accordance with the usual custom on such occasions.

Foreign News.

THE Great Eastern brings us the text of the neutrality proclamation of Queen Isabella of Spain, on the subject of the American rebellion. It is similar in import to that issued by Napoleon. Privateers may have a shelter of twenty-four hours duration in Spanish ports, but no longer, except in case of urgent necessity. Spaniards are forbidden to engage on either side, but they may, if they wish, take service and its consequences.

Sir Archibald Alison, the historian, had written a letter in reply to the Paris speech, we presume, of Cassius M. Clay. Sir Archibald asserts that the American Constitution has failed, and sagely recommends the establishment of a national church, with a monarchy, as a cure for our difficulties and quarrels.

Lord Palmerston defended the shipment of English troops to Canada against remarks made in the British House of Commons by Mr. Disraeli and other members. He declared that it was not an unusual course to pursue when hostilities existed in a neighboring nation, and denied that the act was of itself calculated to give offence to the United States Government.

State of the Nation.

THE President's Message and the Reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy, to the Congress now in extra session, have been subjects of general discussion for several days past. It was not to be expected that the President's Message would give satisfaction to every one, but few public documents have been so generally approved as the one presented by Abraham Lincoln on the 5th July. It has been looked for with intense anxiety; for during two or three weeks past rumors have been frequently pointing to a probable compromise—to a patched-up reconciliation with the South. This was so entirely at variance with the sentiment of all loyal men, so poor an ending to the great drama of the uprising of the North, that men paused, wondering if such weakness could prevail in the Cabinet at Washington. The President's Message has dispelled all such doubts; a stern and vigorous policy is there indicated, and the people have become reassured.

There can be no doubt that the Army now will be moved forward, that the various columns of the grand army will be speedily concentrated, and that the rebel force will either be brought to a great and decisive battle, or that it will retreat before the forces of the Federal Government.

On Saturday, the 6th, ten regiments were ordered to leave Washington, to join General Patterson's division at Martinsburg. It was supposed that this order was issued upon information received at headquarters that the rebels were more numerous in that vicinity than was at first believed. Generals Patterson and McClellan are pushing their column forward to make a junction at a point south of Winchester, so as to be able to cut out General Johnston's force, and, it is thought, with a view to co-operate with a column which is to be moved from the Potomac line, near Washington, to meet them in the vicinity of Richmond. General McClellan's forces are now at Buchanan, and it was said that the rebels were assembled in considerable force very close to them, at a point a few miles west of Beverley, but that the main body, under Governor Wise, was at Laurel Hill.

A report was conveyed to headquarters that the rebels were extending their lines in the direction of the outposts of the Federal army near Falls Church. It was also reported that the Secession troops stationed at Fairfax Court House were making preparations to resist the advance of the Government troops. These movements were known and guarded against by General Scott, but it is hardly likely that he will invite a general attack in that direction for a day or two, the advance movements of the western flank of the line, comprising the divisions of General Patterson and General McClellan, being necessarily slow, and yet all important to the safe conduct of the programme so skilfully laid down.

The army of General Lyon, in Missouri, is steadily advancing southwards, while the rebels from Arkansas and Tennessee are reported to be moving up to meet them. Colonel Montgomery, with his Union troops from Kansas, crossed the line into Missouri on the 27th ult. No further collision has occurred in that quarter, though the rapid concentration of troops on both sides would indicate the probability of an engagement in the south-western portion of the State before long.

The Indiana troops are ever on the alert. The Eleventh, under Colonel Wallace, seem indefatigable in pursuit of the enemy. The following despatch will best describe a gallant skirmish which shows the metal of our troops:

HEADQUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Hagerstown, June 30, 1861.

General Orders, No. 29.

The Commanding General has the satisfaction to announce to the troops a second victory over the insurgents by a small party of Indiana volunteers, under Colonel Wallace, on the 26th inst. Thirteen mounted men attached to the regiment attacked forty-one insurgents, killing eight and chasing the rest two miles. On their return, with seventeen captured horses, they were attacked by seventy-five of the enemy, and fell back to a strong position, which they held till dark, when they returned to the camp, with the loss of one man killed and one wounded. In the last skirmish, a captain, two lieutenants and a large number were wounded.

The Commanding General desires to bring to the attention of the officers and men of his command the courage and conduct of this gallant little band of comparatively raw troops, who met the emergency by turning on an enemy so largely superior in numbers, chastising him severely, and gathering in retreat the fruits of victory.

By order of Major-General PATTERSON.

J. F. PORTER, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Another victory of the Federal troops has been thus briefly recorded by Major-General Patterson:

BLACK RIVER, near Martinsburg, July 2, 1861.

To Colonel E. D. Townsend, Assistant Adjutant General.

I left Williamsport at six o'clock this morning for this place, and drove and routed the rebels, who were about ten thousand strong, and who had four guns. I now occupy their camp, with the loss, I regret to say, of three killed and ten wounded.

(Signed) R. PATTERSON,
Major-General Commanding.

General Lyon, whose prompt action at St. Louis did much to assure Missouri to the Union, has been, we are pleased to say, promoted to a Major-Generalship. Men of his stamp are worthy the best favors of the Administration.

The Reports of the Secretaries of the Treasury, Army and Navy will be found in another column.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THIS important document was presented to the Congress now in session on Thursday, the 4th inst. It is a document remarkable for its directness and simplicity, for its grasp of the whole subject which now agitates the country, and for its ability in meeting the various subterfuges upon which the Secession leaders have based their action. After reviewing the position of the country on the 4th of March, 1861, when six States had declared their independence, had seized the forts, custom-houses, arsenals and other Federal property, and had ceased to acknowledge fealty to the United States, and had further issued a formula for instituting a combined government of those States, and under the character of "Confederate States," were already invoking recognition, aid and intervention of foreign powers, the President proceeds to say:

Finding this condition of things, and believing it to be an imperative duty upon the incoming Executive to prevent, if possible, the consummation of such attempt to destroy the Federal Union, a choice of means to that end became indispensable. This choice was made and declared in the Inaugural Address.

The policy chosen looked to the exhaustion of all peaceful measures before resort to any stronger one—it sought only to hold the public places and property not already wrested from the Government, and to collect the revenue, relying for the rest on time, discussion and the ballot-box; it promised a continuance of the mails, at Government expense, to the very people who were resisting Government; and it gave repeated pledges against any disturbances to any of the people or any of their rights, of all that which a President might constitutionally and justifiably do in such a case. Everything was forborne without which it was believed possible to keep the Government on foot.

On the day after the President's Inauguration a letter was received from Major Anderson—then in Fort Sumpter—stating that provisions were running short, and that reinforcements could not be thrown into the fort with a less expedition than twenty thousand men. General Scott concurred in this position, and was satisfied that no such force would be raised before the supplies in the fort would be exhausted.

In a purely military point of view this reduced the duty of the Administration in the case to the mere matter of getting the garrison safely out of the fort. It was believed, however, that to so abandon that position, under the circumstances, would be utterly ruinous; that the necessity under which it was to be done would not be fully understood; that by many it would be construed as a part of a voluntary policy; that at home it would discourage the friends to the Union, embolden its adversaries, and go far to insure to the latter a recognition abroad; that in fact it would be our national destruction consummated. This could not be allowed. Starvation was not yet upon the garrison, and ere it would be reached Fort Pickens might be reinforced.

This last would be a clear indication of policy, and would better enable the country to accept the evacuation of Fort Sumpter. As a military necessity, an order was at once directed to be sent for the landing of the troops from the steamship Brooklyn into Fort Pickens. This order could not go by land, but must take the longer and surer route by sea.

This expedition failed, and before another could be attempted Fort Sumpter must either be provisioned or fall. In the meantime, preparations had been made to relieve Fort Sumpter, and it was decided to despatch the expedition forthwith, and to notify the Governor of South Carolina that an attempt would be made to provision the fort, but that neither arms nor men would be thrown in, unless opposition was offered to the peaceful expedition or the fort was attacked.

This notice was accordingly given, whereupon the fort was attacked and bombarded to its fall, without even awaiting the arrival of the provisioning expedition.

It is thus seen that the assault upon and reduction of Fort Sumpter was in no sense a matter of self-defence on the part of the assailants. They well knew that the garrison in the fort could by no possibility commit aggression upon them; they knew they were expressly notified that the giving of bread to the few brave and hungry men of the garrison was all which would on that occasion be attempted, unless themselves, by resisting so much, should provoke more.

They knew that the Government desired to keep the garrison in the fort, not to assail them, but merely to maintain visible possession, and thus preserve the Union from actual and immediate dissolution, trusting, as hereinbefore stated, to time, discussion and the ballot-box, for final adjustment, and they assailed and reduced the fort for precisely the reverse object, to drive out the visible authority of the Federal Union and thus force it to immediate dissolution; that this was their object the Executive well understood, and having said to them, in the Inaugural Address, "You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors," he took pains, not only to keep this declaration good, but also to keep the case so far from ingenuous sophistry as that the world should not misunderstand it. By the affair at Fort Sumpter, with its surrounding circumstances, that point was reached. Then and thereby the assailants of the Government began the conflict of arms, without a gun in sight or in expectancy to return their fire, save only the few in the fort sent to that harbor years before, for their own protection, and still ready to give that protection in whatever was lawful.

In this act, discarding all else, they have forced upon the country the distinct issue—immediate dissolution or blood. And this issue embraces more than the fate of these United States. It presents to the whole family of man the question whether a constitutional republic or democracy, a government of the people by the same people, can or cannot maintain its territorial integrity against its own domestic foes. It presents the question whether discontented individuals, too few in numbers to control the Administration according to the organic law in any case, can always, upon the pretences made in this case or any other pretences, or arbitrarily without any pretence, break up their government, and thus practically put an end to free government upon the earth.

It forces us to ask, "Is there in all republics this inherent and fatal weakness?" Must a government of necessity be too strong for the liberties of its own people, or too weak to maintain its own existence?

So viewing the issue, no choice was left but to call out the war power of the Government, and so to resist the force employed for its destruction by force for its preservation.

The President then describes the great uprising of the people of the North; the wonderful response made to his call for men, and the unity of the vast masses in the cause of the integrity of the Union. Then follows a review of the traitorous action of Virginia; her illegal compact with the Seceded States; her invitation to their troops; her permission to the transfer of the capital of the so-called Confederate States to Richmond, and her voluntary transfer of the battle-ground to her own soil. He also alludes to the true Union men in Western Virginia, and to their call upon the Federal Government for protection.

Those loyal citizens this Government is bound to recognize and protect as being in Virginia. In the border States, so called—in fact, the middle States—there are those who favor a policy which they call an armed neutrality. That is, an arming of those States to prevent the Union forces passing one way, or the Disunion the other, over their soil. This would be Disunion completed. Figuratively speaking, it would be the building of an impassable wall along the line of separation; and yet not quite an impassable one, for under the guise of neutrality it would tie the hands of the Union men, and freely pass supplies from among them to the insurrectionists, which it could not do as an open enemy; at a stroke it would take all the trouble off the hands of Secession, except only what proceeds from the external blockade.

It would do for the Disunionists that which of all things they most desire—feed them well, and give them Disunion without a struggle of their own. It recognizes no fidelity to the Constitution—no obligation to maintain the Union; and while very many who have favored it are doubtless loyal citizens, it is nevertheless very injurious in effect.

Recurring to the action of the Government, it may be stated that at first a call was made for seventy-five thousand militia, and rapidly following this a proclamation was issued for closing the ports of the insurrectionary districts by proceedings in the nature of blockade. So far all was believed to be strictly legal.

At this point the insurrectionists announced their purpose to enter upon the practice of privateering. Other calls were made for volunteers to serve three years, unless sooner discharged, and also for large additions to the regular army and navy. These measures, whether strictly legal or not, were ventured upon under what appeared to be a popular demand and a public necessity, trusting then as now that Congress would readily ratify them.

It is believed that nothing has been done beyond the constitutional competency of Congress. Soon after the first call for militia, it was considered a duty to authorize the commanding General, in proper cases, according to his discretion, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, or, in other words, to arrest and detain, without resort to the ordinary processes and forms of law, such individuals as he might deem dangerous to the public safety.

This authority has purposely been exercised but very sparingly. Nevertheless, the legality and propriety of what has been done under it are questioned, and the attention of the country has been called to the proposition that one who is sworn to take care that the laws be faithfully executed should not himself violate them.

Of course some consideration was given to the questions of power and propriety before this matter was acted upon. The whole of the laws which were required to be faithfully executed were being resisted, and failing in execution in nearly one-third of the States. Must they be allowed to finally fail of execution, even had it been perfectly clear that, by the use of the means necessary to their execution, some single law, made in such extreme tenderness of the citizen's liberty, that, practically, it relieves more of the guilty than the innocent, should, to a very limited extent, be violated?

To state the question more directly—Are all the laws but one to go unexecuted, and the Government itself to go to pieces, lest that one be violated? Even, in such a case, would not the official oath be broken if the Government should be overthrown, when it was believed that disregarding the single law would tend to preserve it?

But it was not believed that this question was presented—it was not believed that any law was violated. The provision of the Constitution that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it, is equivalent to a provision that such privilege may be suspended when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety does require it. It was decided that we have a case of rebellion, and that the public safety does require the qualified suspension of the privilege of the writ, which was authorized to be made. Now it is insisted that Congress, and not the Executive, is vested with this power.

But the Constitution is silent as to which or who is to exercise the power, and as the provision was plainly made for a dangerous emergency, it cannot be believed that the framers of the instrument intended that in every case the danger should run its course until Congress could be called together, the very assembling of which might be prevented—as was indeed the case—by the rebellion.

No more extended argument is now offered, as an opinion at some length will probably be presented by the Attorney-General. Whether there shall be any legislation on the subject, and, if so, what, is submitted entirely to the better judgment of Congress.

The forbearance of this Government had been so extraordinary and so long-continued as to lead some foreign nations to shape their action as if they supposed the early destruction of our national Union was probable.

While this, on discovery, gave the Executive some concern, he is now happy to say that the sovereignty and rights of the United States are now everywhere practically respected by foreign powers, and a general sympathy with the country is manifested throughout the world.

The reports of the Secretaries of Treasury, War and Navy will give the information in detail deemed necessary and convenient for your deliberation and action, while the Executive and all the departments will stand ready to supply omissions or to communicate new facts considered important for you to know.

It is now recommended that you give the legal means for making this contest a short and decisive one; that you place at the control of the Government for the work at least 400,000 men and $400,000,000. That number of men is about one tenth of those of proper ages within the regions where, apparently, all are willing to engage, and the sum is less than a twenty-third part of the money value owned by the men who seem ready to devote the whole.

A debt of $600,000,000 now is a less sum per head than was the debt of our Revolution when we came out of that struggle, and the money value in the country bears even a greater proportion to what it was then than does the population. Surely each man has as strong a motive now to preserve our liberties as each had then to establish them.

A right result at this time will be worth more to the world than ten times the men and ten times the money.

The evidence reaching us from the country leaves no doubt that the material for the work is abundant, and that it needs only the hand of legislation to give it legal sanction, and the hand of the Executive to give it practical shape and efficiency.

One of the greatest perplexities of the Government is to avoid receiving troops faster than it can provide for them. In a word, the people will save their Government, if the Government itself will do its part only indifferently well.

It might seem at first thought to be of little difference whether the present movement at the South be called Secession or Rebellion; the movers, however, well understand the difference.

At the beginning they knew they could never raise their treason to any respectable magnitude by any name which implies violation of law; they knew their people possessed as much of moral sense, as much of devotion to law and order, and as much pride in the reverence for the history and Government of their common country as any other civilised and patriotic people.

They knew they could make no advancement directly in the teeth of these strong and noble sentiments. Accordingly they commenced by an insidious debauching of the public mind; they invented an ingenious sophism, which, if conceded, was followed by perfectly logical steps through all the incidents of the complete destruction of the Union.

The sophism itself is that any State of the Union may consistently with the nation's Constitution, and therefore lawfully and peacefully, withdraw from the Union without the consent of the Union or of any other State.

The little disguise that the supposed right is to be exercised only for just cause, themselves to be the sole judge of its justice, is too thin to merit any notice. With rebellion thus sugar-coated, they have been drugging the public mind of their section for more than thirty years, and until at length they have brought many good men to a willingness to take up arms against the Government the day after some assemblage of men have enacted the farcical pretence of taking their State out of the Union who could have been brought to no such thing the day before.

This sophism derives much, perhaps the whole, of its currency from the assumption that there is some omnipotent and sacred supremacy pertaining to a State—to each State—of our Federal Union. Our States have neither more nor less power than that reserved to them in the Union by the Constitution, no one of them ever having been a State out of the Union.

The original ones passed into the Union even before they cast off their British colonial dependence, and the new ones came into the Union directly from a condition of dependence, excepting Texas; and even Texas, in its temporary independence was never designated as a State. The new ones only took the designation of States on coming into the Union, while that name was first adopted for the old ones in and by the Declaration of Independence.

Therein the united colonies were declared to be free and independent States. But even then the object plainly was not to declare their independence of one another and of the Union, but directly the contrary, as their mutual pledge and their mutual action before, at the time and afterwards, abundantly show.

The express plighting of faith by each and all of the original thirteen States in the Articles of Confederation, two years later, that the Union shall be perpetual is most conclusive, having never been States, either in substance or in name, outside of the Union—whence this magical omnipotence of State rights, asserting a claim of power to lawfully destroy the Union itself.

Much is said about the Sovereignty of the States; but the word even is not in the national Constitution, nor, as is believed, in any of the State Constitutions. What is a sovereignty in the political sense of the term? Would it be far wrong to define it a political community without a political superior?

Tested by this, no one of our States, except Texas, was a sovereignty, and even Texas gave up the character on coming into the Union by which act she acknowledged the Constitution of the United States and the laws and treaties of the United States, made in pursuance of States, have their status in the Union made in pursuance of the Constitution, to be for her the supreme law.

The States have their status in the Union, and they have no other legal status. If they break from this they can only do so against law and by revolution.

The Union, and not themselves separately, procured their independence and their liberty by conquest or purchase. The Union gave each of them whatever of independence and liberty it has.

The Union is older than any of the States, and in fact it created them as States. Originally some dependent colonies made the Union, and in turn the Union threw off their old dependence for them and made them States, such as they are. Not one of them ever had a State Constitution independent of the Union.

Of course it is not forgotten that all the new States formed their Constitutions before they entered the Union, nevertheless dependent upon and preparatory to coming into the Union. Unquestionably the States have the powers and rights reserved to them in and by the national Constitution, but among these surely are not included all conceivable powers, however mischievous or destructive, but at most such only as were known in the world at the time as governmental powers; and certainly a power to destroy the Government itself had never been known as a governmental. As a merely administrative power, this relative matter of national power and State rights, as a principle, is no other than the principle of generality and locality. Whatever concerns the whole should be confided to the whole General Government, while whatever concerns only the State should be left exclusively to the State.

This is all there is of original principle about it. Whether the national Constitution, in defining boundaries between the two, has applied the principle with exact accuracy is not to be questioned. We are all bound by that defining without question. What is now combated is the position that Secession is consistent with the Constitution—is lawful and peaceful. It is not contended that there is any express law for it, and nothing should ever be implied as law which leads to unjust or absurd consequences. The nation purchased with money the countries out of which several of these States were formed. Is it just that they should go off without leave, and without refunding? The nation paid very large sums in the aggregate—I believe nearly a hundred millions—to relieve Florida of the aboriginal tribes.

Is it just that she shall now go off without consent or without any return? The nation is now in debt for money applied to the benefit of these so-called Seceding States in common with the rest. Is it just either that creditors shall go unpaid, or the remaining States pay the whole? A part of the present national debt was contracted to pay the old debts of Texas. Is it just that she shall leave and pay no part of this herself? Again, if one State may secede, so may another; and when all shall have seceded, none is left to pay the debts.

Is this quite just to creditors? Did we notify them of this sage view of ours when we borrowed their money? If we now recognise this doctrine by allowing the Seceders to go in peace, it is difficult to see what we can do if others choose to go, or to extort terms upon which they will promise to remain.

The Seceders insist that our Constitution admits of Secession. They have assumed to make a National Constitution of their own, in which, of necessity, they have either discarded or retained the right of Secession as they insist it exists in ours. If they have discarded it, they thereby admit that, on principle, it ought not to exist in ours; if they have retained it, by their own construction of ours, they show that, to be consistent, they must secede from one another whenever they shall find it the easiest way of settling their debts, or effecting any other selfish or unjust object.

The principle itself is one of disintegration, and upon which no Government can possibly endure. If all the States save one should assert the power to drive that one out of the Union, it is presumed the whole class of Seceder politicians would at once deny the power and denounce the act as the greatest outrage upon State rights. But suppose that precisely the same act, instead of being called driving the one out should be called the seceding of the others from that one, it would be exactly what the Seceders claim to do; unless, indeed, they make the point that the one, because it is a minority, may rightfully do what the others, because they are a majority, may not rightfully do.

These politicians are subtle and profound in the rights of minorities. They are not partial to that power which made the Constitution, and speaks from the preamble, calling itself "We, the people." It may well be questioned whether there is to-day a majority of the legally qualified voters of any State, except, perhaps, South Carolina, in favor of Disunion. There is much reason to believe that the Union men are the majority in many, if not in every other one of the so-called Seceded States.

The contrary has not been demonstrated in any one of them. It is ventured to affirm this even of Virginia and Tennessee, for the result of an election held in military camps, where the bayonets are all on one side of the question voted upon, can scarcely be considered as demonstrating public sentiment. At such an election all that large class who are at once for the Union and against coercion would be coerced to vote against the Union. It may be affirmed, without extravagance, that the free institutions we enjoy have developed the powers and improved the condition of our whole people beyond any example in the world. Of this we now have a striking and impressive illustration.

So large an army as the Government has now on foot was never before known, without a soldier in it but who has taken his place there of his own free choice. But more than this, there are many single regiments whose members, one and another, possess full practical knowledge of all the arts, sciences, professions and whatever else, whether useful or elegant, is known in the whole world; and there is scarcely one from which there could not be selected a President, a Cabinet, a Congress, and perhaps a Court, abundantly competent to administer the Government itself. Nor do I say this is not true also in the army of our late friends, now adversaries, in this contest. But it is so much better the reason why the Government which has conferred such benefits on both them and us should not be broken up. Whoever in any section proposes to abandon such a Government would do well to consider in deference to what principle it is that he does it; what better he is likely to get in its stead; whether the substitute will give, or be intended to give, so much of good to the people.

There are some foreshadowings on this subject. Our adversaries have adopted some Declaration of Independence in which, unlike the good old one penned by Jefferson, they omit the words, "all men are created equal." Why? They have adopted a temporary national Constitution, in the preamble of which, unlike our good old one signed by Washington, they omit "we, the people," and substitute, "we, the deputies of the sovereign and independent States." Why?

Why this deliberate pressing out of view the rights of men and the authority of the people? This is essentially a people's contest. On the side of the Union it is a struggle for maintaining in the world that form and substance of government whose leading object is to elevate the condition of men, to lift artificial weights from all shoulders, to clear the path of laudable pursuit for all, to afford all an unfettered start and a fair chance in the race of life, yielding to partial and temporary departures from necessity.

This is the leading object of the Government, for whose existence we contend. I am most happy to believe that the plain people understand and appreciate this. It is worthy of note that, while in this, the Government's hour of trial, large numbers of those in the army and navy who have been favored with offices have resigned and proved false to the hand which pampered them, not one common soldier or common sailor is known to have deserted his flag. Great honor is due to those officers who remained true, despite the example of their treacherous associates, but the greatest honor, and the most important fact of all, is the unanimous firmness of the common soldiers and common sailors.

To the last man, so far as known, they have successfully resisted the traitorous efforts of those whose commands, but an hour before, they obeyed as absolute law. This is the patriotic instinct of plain people. They understand, without an argument, that the destroying the Government which was made by Washington means no good to them. Our popular Government has often been called an experiment. Two points in it our people have settled—the successful establishing and the successful administering of it. One still remains. Its successful maintenance against a formidable internal attempt to overthrow it. It is now for them to demonstrate to the world that those who can fairly carry an election can also suppress a rebellion; that ballots are the rightful and peaceful successors of bullets, and when ballots have fairly and constitutionally decided, there can be no successful appeal back to bullets, that there can be no successful appeal except to ballots themselves, at succeeding elections. Such will be a great lesson of peace, teaching men that what they cannot take by an election neither can they take it by a war. Teaching all the folly of being the beginners of the war.

Lest there be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the Government towards the Southern States after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and the Laws, and that he probably will have no different understanding of the powers and duties of the Federal Government relatively to the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution than that expressed in his Inaugural Address. He desires to preserve the Government, that it may be administered for all as it was administered by the men who made it.

Loyal citizens have the right to claim this of their Government; and the Government has no right to withhold or neglect it. It is not perceived that in giving it there is any coercion, any conquest or any subjugation in any just sense of these terms.

The Constitution provided—and all the States have accepted the provision—that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a Republican form of Government. But if a State may lawfully go out of the Union, having done so, it may also discard the Republican form of Government, so that to prevent its going out is an indispensable means to the end of maintaining the guarantee mentioned; and when an end is lawful and obligatory, the indispensable means to it are also lawful and obligatory.

It was with the deepest regret that the Executive found the duty of employing the war power in defence of the Government forced upon him; he could but perform this duty, or surrender the existence of the Government. No compromise by public servants could in this case be a cure—not that compromises are not often proper—but that no popular Government can long survive a marked precedent. That those who carry an election can only save the Government from immediate destruction by giving up the main point upon which the people gave the election. The people themselves and not their servants can safely reverse their own deliberate decisions.

As a private citizen the Executive could not have consented that these institutions shall perish, much less could he, in betrayal of so vast and so sacred a trust as these free people had confided to him, he felt that he had no moral right to shrink, nor even to count the chances of his own life in what might follow.

In full view of his great responsibility he has so far done what he has deemed his duty. You will now, according to your own judgment, perform yours. He sincerely hopes that your views and your actions may so accord with his as to assure all faithful citizens who have been disturbed in their rights of a certain and speedy restoration to them under the Constitution and Laws; and, having thus chosen our cause without guile and with pure purpose, let us renew our trust in God and go forward without fear and with manly hearts.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

July 4, 1861.

THE TREASURY REPORT.

SECRETARY CHASE's estimates make the total amount required for the fiscal year which ends on June 30th 1862, $318,519,581 87.

Of this amount the War Department requires $180,296,307 19, the Navy Department, $30,609,520 29—being a total for the defence of the nation of $217,168 850 15.

For civil list, foreign intercourse, &c., the estimate is $631 496 90; for the Interior Department, $431,525 75. For redemption of treasury notes, $12,639,861 64.

It is proposed to raise $80,000,000 by taxation and $240,000,000 by loan. To raise this sum the Secretary proposes to Congress that a duty of two and a half cents per pound be laid on brown sugar; of three cents per pound on clayed sugar; of four cents per pound on loaf and other refined sugars; of two and a half cents per pound on the syrup of sugar cane; of six cents per pound on candy; of six cents per gallon on molasses, and of four cents per gallon on sour molasses; and it is also proposed that a duty of five cents per pound be imposed on coffee; fifteen cents per pound on black tea, and twenty cents per pound on green tea.

These duties, he estimates, will produce a sum of not less than twenty millions per annum. In addition, he estimates the revenue from "duties of the present tariff not affected by proposed changes" at not less than thirty millions; with an additional seven millions from "proposed duties on articles non-exempt, and from changed duties on articles now either lightly burdened or so heavily taxed that the tax amounts to a prohibition." This makes a total estimated revenue from duties on imports of $57,000,000.

Twenty millions can be raised by levying a small tax upon real estate. He gives it as his opinion that the needed sum may also be obtained from moderate charges on stills and distilled liquors, ale, beer, tobacco, bank notes, spring carriages, silver ware and jewellery, and legacies. And he suggests that "the property of those engaged in insurrection or in giving aid and comfort to the insurgents, may properly be made to contribute to the expenditures made necessary by their criminal misconduct."

Of the war loan of $240 000,000, he proposes that $100,000 000 be raised by a national loan to be issued in Treasury notes or exchequer bills, of the denominations of $50, and the multiples of 50 up to $5,000, to bear interest at the rate 7 3-10 per cent per annum to be redeemable at will after three years from date of issue, to be received at offices to be established at convenient places throughout the country; the sums subscribed to be paid in cash or in instalments of ten per cent. down, and ten per cent. on the first and fifteenth of every month after, till all is paid.

"In case it shall be found inexpedient to provide the whole amount needed ($240,000,000) in that mode," the Secretary suggests the raising of a regular loan from capitalists abroad and at home, to the amount of another $100 000,000, redeemable by the Government at will after thirty years, and bearing seven per cent. interest, payable in London or at the Treasury of the United States.

Lastly, he recommends the issue of $50,000,000 in Treasury notes, of denominations of ten and twenty dollars; to bear interest at the rate of 3 05-100 per annum and be exchangeable at the will of the holder for exchequer bills bearing 7 3-10 per cent interest, and redeemable after three years.

He finishes by a touching allusion to the difficulty of collecting revenue in the Rebel States—a somewhat unnecessary remark.

ARMY REPORT.

MR. SECRETARY CAMERON'S Report is a very able one, and it meets the difficulty boldly. After a fair statement of the manner in which his department had been crippled by Mr. Secretary Floyd, he naturally claims credit for what the present Administration has done. At present there are about 315,000 troops of all periods. The discharge of the three months regiments, numbering about 80,000, will leave the Federal army at 235,000. It will be for Congress to decide how to raise and equip the additional forces. He estimates the expenses of the army at $185,300,000.

THE NAVY REPORT.

As usual, our Secretary of the Navy's Report is a very meagre one. It is this year rendered more than usually humiliating by the fact of civil war, and the destruction of part of the Norfolk Navy Yard.

Of the sixty-nine vessels, carrying 1,346 guns, available for service on the 4th March last, the sloop Levant has been given up as lost in the Pacific, the steamer Fulton was seized at Pensacola, and one frigate, two sloop and one brig were burned at Norfolk. These vessels carried 172 guns. The other vessels destroyed at Norfolk were considered worthless, and are not included in the list of available vessels.

The losses left at the disposal of the Department sixty-two vessels, carrying 1,174 guns, all of which are now, or soon will be, in commission, with the exception of the—

Vermont, ship-of-the-line	81
Brandywine, frigate	50
Decatur, sloop, at San Francisco	10
John Hancock, steam tender, at San Francisco	3

There have been recently added to the navy, by purchase, twelve steamers, carrying from two to nine guns each, and three sailing vessels. There have been chartered nine steamers, carrying from two to nine guns each. By these additions the naval force in commission has been increased to eighty-two vessels, carrying upwards of 1,100 guns, and with a marine complement of about 13,000 men, exclusive of officers and marines. There are also several steamboats and other small craft which are temporarily in the service of the department.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

LOUISIANA.—A Richmond correspondent of the Picayune writes to that journal to say "the enemy are hard pressed on the Potomac," and that:

"Passengers just in from Washington report the greatest alarm at the Federal capital on account of the advance of General Beauregard. The archives of the Government, books, records, &c., were being moved out as rapidly as possible."

The Picayune is indignant at, and over, the "outrages" of the Abolitionists, who land from the blockading squadron, and "commit all sorts of outrages on the coast." The presence of these "impudent wretches," the editor says, "is an intolerable insult as well as injury, and should be borne no longer, especially as the means of ridding ourselves of it are abundantly practicable."

Among some of the intolerable results alluded to by the Picayune is, "decoying unsuspecting craft by concealing their numbers and force, and even going up to the wharves at the landing places and stealthily possessing themselves of luggers and other small vessels."

The Picayune of 27th ult. announces that the British steam sloop-of-war Jason, twenty-one guns, arrived off the bar on the day previous.

Mayor Monroe, of New Orleans, advertises for a loan of $250,000, to be appropriated for the defence of the city. Certificates are to be kindly issued in sums of $25 and upwards, "in order to allow all our people to take part in the movement."

The ship S. F. Pettigrew had been condemned by Judge Morse, in the District Court, as a lawful prize. The question of cargo was reserved.

The fire at Donaldsonville, Louisiana, previously reported by telegraph, destroyed property to the amount of $200,000, of which only $11 000 was insured. The fire commenced on the morning of the 21st of June, and raged so furiously that in an hour and a quarter a whole square on Mississippi street, except one house, was consumed.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT NO. 1,
NEW ORLEANS, LA., June 26.

General Order, No 15:

Communication of any kind, and on any pretence, with the Black Republicans is positively and peremptorily forbidden.

Any citizen detected in communicating with them will be arrested and prosecuted.

By order of Major-General Twiggs.

MISSOURI.—INDEPENDENCE, July 1.—The report reached here yesterday that the State troops, 10,000 in number, had crossed the Marais des Cygnes, a branch of the Osage River, one hundred miles south of this place. The Union forces were twenty miles in the rear, 2,000 or 3 000 in number. They had also encamped, it was thought, for reinforcements.

This information is derived from a gentleman just from the State camp, who also came through the Union camp.

ST. LOUIS, July 4.—Official information received here says that Colonel Sigel is at Mount Vernon, Lawrence county, with a strong force, and that Governor Jackson is supposed to have crossed the Arkansas line.

The Republican learns from letters dated Springfield, June 30th, that Governor Jackson, with 1,500 men, was at Montevello, Severn county.

The line of the Federal troops had been extended to Sarcoxie, Jasper county, through which Governor Jackson would have to pass to reach Arkansas, and the opinion is confidently expressed that he would be taken prisoner unless he receives larger reinforcements than he is likely to obtain.

Major Phelps is delayed at Springfield by important events there, but will be in Washington in time for all important business this session.

VIRGINIA.—The Richmond Convention has passed an ordinance authorizing an issue of treasury notes, providing for borrowing four millions of dollars, two of which shall be issued by the Auditor in form of treasury notes.

The Convention also passed an ordinance declaring holders of office under President Lincoln, after August 1st, aliens and enemies.

The Convention adjourned on Monday, until the second Wednesday in November.

Prince Camille de Polignac is regarded in Richmond as a second Lafayette. He will join the rebel forces, and has already had a personal interview with Jeff Davis.

Ex-Governor Smith's appointment as Colonel in the Virginia army has been confirmed by the Convention.

LACONIC CORRESPONDENCE.—Soon after the passage of the Virginia ordinance of Secession, Governor Letcher sent the following despatch to the Mayor of Wheeling.

"Richmond, April 20, 1861.

"To Andrew Sweeney, Mayor of Wheeling:

"Take possession of the Custom House, Post Office, all public buildings and public documents in the name of Virginia. Virginia has seceded.

"JOHN LETCHER, Governor."

Mayor Sweeney replied in the following laconic style:

"Wheeling, April 21, 1861.

"To John Letcher, Governor of Virginia:

"I have taken possession of the Custom House, Post Office and all public buildings and public documents in the name of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, whose property they are.

"ANDREW SWEENEY, Mayor of Wheeling."

The correspondence here closed. Mayor Sweeney continued to hold possession of the Federal property until the organization of the new State Government at Wheeling. Governor Letcher made no further attempt to seduce him from his allegiance.

A gentleman just arrived from various points in Virginia gives us the following account of the war movements in that State:

Our informant also states that Norfolk is now considered in such a state of defence that it would defy the combined navy of Europe and America to take it. The vessels sunk in the harbor render it altogether impossible for any enemy to come up to the city, as nothing but small boats can get inside the river.

The man-of-war Plymouth, that has been raised, is in excellent condition and will be got ready for sea in a very short time. The Germantown is also expected to be raised in a day or two, and can soon be got ready for sea. The Merrimac will be converted into a floating battery. The developments of vandalism that have been made since the possession of Norfolk by our troops exhibit a malignity of spirit truly astounding. Thirty kegs of gunpowder, of one hundred pounds each, were found under the Dry Dock, intended to blow it up. Had the fiends succeeded, Portsmouth and Norfolk would have been one mass of ruins. A merciful interposition of Providence alone saved them.

The fuse burned down within two inches of the shell and then went out. The vandals destroyed some of the largest columbiads, knocked off the trunnions with sledge hammers, &c. An extensive factory of lint has been in successful operation for some time past, and they have been turning out from forty to fifty gun carriages every twenty-four hours. Work is kept up day and night.

At Manassas and Fairfax Court House the military movements of General Beauregard are progressing with great rapidity. Our informant thinks that a decisive blow will be struck by our troops this week. When he left the opposing armies were within six miles of each other, almost face to face. Our troops are scouring the country in all directions. Our informant states that on his return he encountered daily from 600 to 1,000 troops on their way to the seat of war.—Charleston Courier.

KENTUCKY, LOUISVILLE, July 1.—The Owensboro' Shield, a Secession paper, reports the probable return of one of the Kentucky companies which went to Richmond, where they were unreceived. They have been living at their own own expense.

By a special order of General Pillow, dated the 27th, it appears that he now thinks it was feared that, owing to the pressure on the enemy's resources in the East, and the belligerent attitude of Missouri, the enemy will not find himself in a position to make a descent upon the valley this summer.

A correspondent of the Memphis Appeal of the 29th June says: "Colonel Hardee is to operate on the western banks of the Mississippi, in concert with the force on this side."

From the same, it appears that the $2,000,000 British loan is not yet consummated, and says that J. M. Vernon had arrived at Richmond, direct from Europe; although not bearer of despatches, he brings Government intelligence of a highly interesting character. He speaks hopefully of the market being opened at the proper season for tobacco and cotton.

July 5.—The Democrat of this morning states that a Secession flag, raised yesterday, was torn down and burned by the citizens in the neighborhood.

The Courier says that a company of 110 men from Trimble county passed through here last evening, going South, and that another company of 110 men will leave to-day.

The Democrat says that a company of 40 men from Lexington left yesterday for the South.

The Unionists celebrated the 4th enthusiastically; the military generally paraded, a national flag was raised at Walker's Exchange, and patriotic speeches were made by Messrs. Cassidy and others.

The Memphis Argus, of the 3d inst., says that 700 Missourians, with arms, are in camp at that place; and a special dispatch to the same paper from Little Rock, Ark., says that General Montgomery's and Lane's force are marching for the Indian country; also that a proclamation has been issued by Ben McCulloch, calling on the citizens of Arkansas to sustain the Missouri troops on her frontier, and ordering a rendezvous at Fayetteville.

The Augusta Constitutionalist thinks it certain that the Confederate Constitution will be defeated in that State.

The Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows of Georgia have invited the Southern Lodges to meet at Montgomery and dissolve their connection with the Grand Lodge of the United States.

Governor Pettus, of Mississippi, has issued a proclamation calling on the State officers to collect all the arms, rifles, shot-guns, &c., new and old, in and out of order, and send them immediately to Jackson. All the citizens in the State are notified to arm themselves with double-barrelled shot-guns.

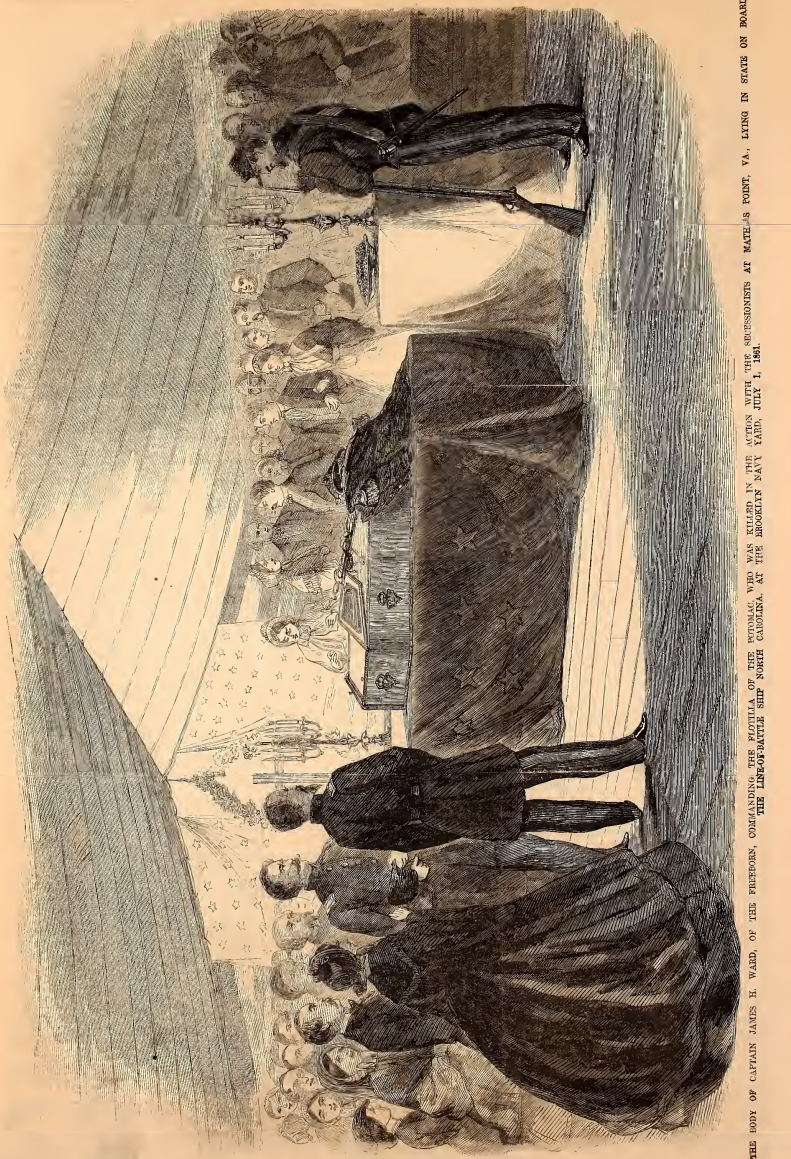
FLORIDA, PENSACOLA.—On the 24th June the Vanderbilt arrived with the Wilson Zouaves. If any credence is to be put in the information given by prisoners and deserters, the force at Pensacola is under four thousand men. These, it is well known, from Mr. Russell's letters, are in a very demoralised condition.

A letter received at this office from Pensacola, dated June 14, says: There were near ten thousand of us who envied the Georgia and Louisiana regiments and Zouave battalion their superior fortune in being ordered to the field of glory in Virginia. Many are still hoping to follow them at an early day. As an indication of our health—since we left home over two months since, the regiment has lost but one member by death. There are rumors of yellow fever in Fort Pickens; but whether true or not, I cannot say.

ARKANSAS.—Capt. McCrie, formerly of South Carolina, is now raising a force of two hundred men in the wilds of Arkansas, for the purpose of joining Ben McCulloch's Rangers. One of the conditions of their enlistment is, that each recruit shall be a single man. Another condition is, that no man shall be admitted into the company who cannot prove, by disinterested witnesses, that he has killed his bear with his knife.

GEORGIA.—Hon. M. A. Cooper has manufactured a lot of splendid bowie knives, and has gone to Virginia, says the Atlanta Confederacy, with a sufficient number of the implements to furnish one to each of the "Atlanta Grays." These knives were made at the Etowah Iron Works.

NEBRASKA, FORT KEARNEY, July 1.—Reliable information from Denver, June 27th, says, a rebel force set out from their rendezvous, twenty miles up Cherry Creek to-day, for the avowed purpose of taking Forts Wise and Garland. They are well armed and equipped, and expect to be joined by a majority of the forces inside. There is much valuable property and money in the forts. The movement is watched, but we are comparatively powerless and totally without authority or leadership.



THE BODY OF CAPTAIN JAMES H. WARD, OF THE FREEPORS, COMPANIONS THE FLOTILLA OF THE POTOMAC WHO WAS KILLED IN THE ACTION WITH THE SECESSIONISTS AT MATHIAS POINT, VA., LYING IN STATE ON BOARD THE LIGHT-DRAUGHT SIDE WHEELER NORTH CAROLINA, AT THE BROOKLYN NAVY YARD, JULY 1, 1861.

BURNING OF THE TRANSPORT STEAMER CATALINE OFF THE LANDING AT FORTRESS MONROE, WHILE STARTING ON HER RETURN TRIP TO NEWPORT NEWS, ON TUESDAY EVENING, JULY 2, 1861.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ACCOMPANYING MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER'S COMMAND.

THE LATE CAPTAIN WARD.

AT one o'clock P. M. Saturday, 29th nlt., the remains of the late Captoin Ward, of the steamer Freehorn, whe was killed in the skirmish with the Secessionists at Mathias Point, Virginio, were token to the depot at Washiegton, accomponied by the following escort: Engioecr-Corps of the Seventy-first, Dodworth's Brass Band, Seventy-first regiment, detachment of marines, Marine Band, hearse ond bearere, General Harris, Major Reynolds, Captain Dohlgren, Captain Rowao and officers of the Yard, io carriagee, and citizeoe. The processioo marched from the Navy Yard, aud the flags of the shipping were at half-mast.

The coffin remaieed io Philodelphia a brief time when it was forwarded to New York, arriving bere on Sondoy evening, June 30, at eleven o'clock. A few of Captain Ward's relatives weot to Jersey City, to receive tho remaine. Captain Ringgold, of the Uoited States Navy, came on in charga of the body, ond Lieutenant Hontington, with seven marines and a coxswain ond six Freehorn sailors, accompanied him.

The officers et the Brooklyn Navy Yard were waiting to receive the body. Commaodant Breese, of the yord, and Commander Meade, of the North Carolina, had made all the necessary arraogements. The poop deck of the North Carolino wae fitted np as a chapel, aed the entire canvae wall draped with American flage. The coffin wos placed on the stage aod opened. The hody was enclosed in a zloc case, with a gloss over the foce, and the case was within o heautiful mahogany coffie. As the air had been exhausted from the case, the body was in ao excellent state of preservation—ootnral end life-like. His sword eod cocked het were ploced on the coffin, the candclohra at the head and foot were lighted, ond heaotiful wreaths ond crosses of flowers decorate the chapel.

The men on the North Carolina were deeply affected at the loss of their late commaoder. They were grotified on Mooday moroing with the sight of hie remains, and e large oumber of visitors viewed the hody as it lay in state.

The fnneral procession left the North Carolino at three o'clock P. M., the 1st inst., and marched through Water street to the Fulton ferry. The romsies were token to the steamhoat Granite State, which left at four P. M., for Hartford. Captain Ringgold, the North Carolina marine baod, twenty-four men, and a detachment of marines, escorted the hody to Hartford.

At ten o'clock Bishop Langhlin, of the Diocese of Brooklyn, aod Father Keogen, of the Church of the Assomption, went on board the North Carolina and celebrated a funeral mass.

In Hortford the funerol ceremonies took place at St. Patriok's Cethedral on Tuesday, July 2.

HEADQUARTERS OF COL. MAX WEBER, OF THE GERMAN RIFLES.

THE Artist stationed at General Butler's command has sent ns e sketch of the headqnarters of Colonel Max Waher, end which is at the conotry residence of the famous ex-President, John Tyler. This heantiful residence, although not very spacious, is very comfortable, and is most elegantly furnished. It is sitoated on the banks of Hampton Creek or River, and is huilt in the semi-gothic style. A few days after the gallant Colooel of the German Rifles took np his quarters at Tyler's honse, he gave a mnsical party to the principal officers of General Botler's command, where the faast of melody and flow of wioe relieved the stern aspact of war. We question if the Virginian's house had ever truer patriots in it than were there and then assemhled.

BURNING OF THE STEAMER CATALINE AT FORTRESS MONROE.

OUR Artist has sent ns two most interesting sketches of the burning of the Cataline, which is thus described hy an eye-witeess:

The treusport steamer Cataline, Captain I. Phillips, chartered hy the Government for the term of three months, two of which had expired, wos totally destroyed hy fire Joly 2nd, at about nioe o'clock, the officers and crow harely escaping with their lives, leaving all their worldly effests to the mercy of the devouring flames. The hoat had just returned from Newport News and landed General Butler and staff, who had been reviewing the troops there, also the Geeeral's wife and family, and wos hacking out from the pier to retorn, in order to make her regular morning trip down; the pilot had given the signal hell to go ahead, and finding no response, tnrned to examioe into the matter, when he saw a hlaze issuing from the woodwork eronnd the smokestack, and the first engineer retreotieg from the flames and emoke. In five minutes all the woodwork amidships wae in a light blaze, which spread with rapidity for a few miontee, when the hoat from the pilot-house was one sheet of flome, illumining the eky and snrrounding shipping. Purser Larkin, Dr. Brodley (tate of the Massachnsetts regimeot), and Engineer Simmons, retreoted hy the stern and got dowo to the rudder of the boat, where they remained until picked up hy hoats which came to the resouo. Storekeeper Parks jomped overhoord, hut, not heing ebla to ewim, called for help, when Dr. Brodley, of Massachnsetts, swam for him aod hnoyed him np until resenad. Captain Phillips and his pilot, Steward Graham and others of the crew, took refuge forward and were rescued hy the propeller Fanny, just hefore the flamee enveloped thot portion of the deck where they were standing. Steward Graham was severely bnrned on one of his haode. As soon as the flames were discovered hy the war veesels in the Roads, all the hoats were manned and fnlly armed for oction, not koowing but that the enemy had commanced an ettack. The first to arrive olongside the hnrning hoat was the one from the Cumherlend, led hy Lientenaet E. Gordon, who ordered his men to uolimher end place in their hoots e twelve-pounder rifled coonon, with which tho Cataloe was armed, also to throw overboard an ammnnition chest containing shot and shell. This heing done, and the flames making rapid advances towords the place where the hrave sailors were, the command to "man hoats" was given, aod they reterned to their vessel. The flag ship Minesota, frigate Santee, and gnnhosts Anacosta and Alhatross, had hoets et the scene ready to co-operate if necessary. The scene was truly grand as the lerid flames bnrst forth, illumining the water and land for five miles around. The enemy's position at Sewall's Point was clearly visihle, and hy the eid of a glass the rehels in large nnmhers were eeen on the heach. The beoch in the vicinity of the fortress was olso covered by hnndrads of soldiers, negro servants and spectators geoerelly, all nnahle to render any aid in consequence ot the lack of fire apparatus. After berning for three honrs the dehris sonk in fifteen feet of water. The Cataloe was an old hoot, and was formerly employed on tha East River, New York. Her owoers, at the time ol her loss, it is alleged, were Thurlow Weed, M. M Freeman ond E. S. Dickerson. She was ohertered to the Government at the stipnlated sum of ten thonsond dollors per month. The ohorter wos effected through a third porty, and not hy the owners. The value of the hoat was not more thon eighteen thousand dollors. The Cataline, while she was in the service of the Government, did good service at Annopolie, Woshingtoo, aod latterly hetween this point end Newport News, steom having heen kept up in the hoilers neerly all that time, hoth night ond day. Captain Phillips's individnal loss in stores and personal property is obout twelve hoodred dollars; First Engineer McNamara's, one hundred ond fifty dollars; Second Eogineer Simmons's, in money aod clothing, two hnndred ond fifty dollars; Purser Lorkin's, two hundred aod fifty dollars; Steward Grahum's, three hnndred dollars; Dr. Bradley's, two thoneand five hundred dollars, in notes and personal effects; and the crew, of which there were teo or twelve men, from one hondred to one hnndred and fifty dollars each.

GOVERNOR CURTIN.

THE election of Cortio as Governor of Penesylvonia, lost Octoher, wos the first significont sign of the revolution which has culmineted in the Secession of nine of oor States. Taken in conjunction with the then approoching Presidential election, it plainly showed that the North had resolved no longer to truckle to the South, and that the sceptre hed departed from Judah. On that emphatic day the great State of Pennsylvaoia had declared, hy a majority of above thirty thonsond votes, that the Slaveocracy had for a time ceased to control tha Executive, aod thet tha unanimity of tha Democratic Party alone could save it from a crushing defeat. As the pioneer of this movement, Governor Cortin is a most remarkahle mon, a distinction which his energy and success in raising the Pennsylvania Contingent has emply confirmed. The coll of the President for men was hardly issued hafore Governor

Curtin had regiments formed and equipped. His conduct in this matter was characterized by the most unceasing and untiring energy. The Pennsylvanians were the first in the field at the call of their country, and how nobly that State, with Governor Curtin at the helm, has poured forth its gallant sons to vindicate the integrity of the Union, the history of our great struggle against rebellion will assuredly record to its undying honor.

COLONEL CARLOS A. WAITE.

WE have great pleasure in presenting to our readers a portrait of this able and gallant soldier, and regret that our space is so limited as only to allow a very brief record of the most emphatic facts of his life. Trained from his boyhood to the service of his country, he was gazetted as a Second Lieutenant of Infantry on the 28th of January, 1820, and, after serving in this position with great satisfaction to his superior officers, he was made First Lieutenant in May, 1828. In 1836 he received the rank of Captain, and two years afterwards was made Assistant Quartermaster. On the 16th of February, 1847, he received his commission as Major, which rank he held on the breaking out of the Mexican War. He so distinguished himself in Mexico, that he was breveted Lieutenant-Colonel for "his gallant and meritorious conduct," specially mentioning the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco. For his brilliant behavior in the battle of El Molino del Rey he was made Colonel, in which battle he had the misfortune to be severely wounded. Our space will not permit us to follow him since then, and we must therefore confine ourselves to the present year, when he was sent by the Government to supersede General Twiggs in Texas, of whose treason it had received sufficient proofs. Before, however, Colonel Waite could reach Texas, General Twiggs had already surrendered to the Confederate commander, a calamity which would not have occurred had the gallant and loyal Waite been appointed in time.

FEDERAL TROOPS GUARDING MONUMENT SQUARE, BALTIMORE, MD.

THE arrest of Marshal Kane, and subsequently of the Police Commissioners on a charge of treason, had so excited the populace of Baltimore, that an outbreak seemed imminent. To guard against this, and to protect the city from outrage, Major-General Banks ordered the Federal troops to take up commanding positions in the city, in order to control the principal avenues.

Monument Square.

Monument Square, Baltimore, so called from the imposing monument erected there in memory of the gallant and devoted men who fell while repelling the British invaders under Ross, contains some of the handsomest buildings in the city, such as the City Hall, the Gilmore House, Barnum's Hotel, &c. This important position was occupied by two sections of Major Cook's Boston Artillery, supported by several companies of Colonel Lyle's Nineteenth Pennsylvania regiment. A more weather-beaten, soldierly-looking body of men it would hardly be possible to find. The square was thronged with people, and although there was some murmuring, the general feeling was one of satisfaction and security.

The Troops at the Post-Office.

The Custom-House, which includes the Post-Office, the latter, or west wing, having the honor of being covered by the dome of the structure, is situated at the corner of Gay and West Lombard streets, a very convenient location for mercantile purposes. General Banks, apprehending that an attempt might be made by the disaffected to obtain possession of these premises and seize the valuable archives therein contained, ordered a detachment of infantry to occupy that building at six o'clock in the morning. About half past eight, a section of Major Cook's battery was detailed to the post, and with two brass six pounders, facing up and down Lombard street, in front of the Custom-House and adjacent public buildings, was prepared to rake the street in both directions in case of hostile demonstrations. A detachment of the Twentieth Pennsylvanians (Company H) occupied the rotunda and the interior balconies of the Post-Office, and, without seriously interrupting the progress of business with either the Post-Office or Custom House, performed guard duty with untiring zeal, amid a bristling array of bayonets and an ample supply of bread from their three days' rations. The troops were orderly, and did not appear disposed to interfere with the free ingress and egress of all orderly persons.

CAMP PRINCETON, ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, VIRGINIA,

Headquarters of General Runyon and the New Jersey Brigade.

OUR Artist furnishes this week a sketch of the New Jersey camp at Arlington, Va., designated as Camp Princeton, in honor of one of the Revolutionary battle-grounds of New Jersey. At the head is a portrait of the Brigadier-General, Theodore Runyon, of Newark, New Jersey. At his right stands his Aide-de-Camp, Captain James B. Mulligan, of Elizabeth, New Jersey. At the left is a representation of the officer's tents of the Jersey City Zouave Company, acting as guard of honor to General Runyon. Below is a general representation of the camp, taken from the entrenchments constructed by the brigade, at the junction of the Alexandria and Columbia roads.

The brigade consists of four full regiments, the First drawn principally from Newark; the Second from Hudson and Bergen counties; the Third from the vicinity of Trenton; and the Fourth from the lower counties of the State. The force of the brigade is about three thousand three hundred men, but four companies of the Second Regiment, numbering some two hundred and fifty men, have been detailed since the brigade reached Annapolis (May 6), on the special duty of guarding the railroad between Washington and the Annapolis Junction. All the regiments are in a very effective condition, and consist of respectable citizens, chiefly farmers and mechanics, who have become well qualified soldiers.

INDIAN WOMEN OF MONTREAL.

WHO has not seen in the streets of New York, at Saratoga, at Niagara, and especially at Montreal, those short, round, strangely-dressed, half Chinese looking women, whose appearance puzzles foreigners so much, but whom our world unites in terming Indian squaws? Always clad, in the warmest weather, in one vast blue blanket, covering the whole figure from head to foot, always bearing a basket, always quiet, they illustrate, after two centuries of life in contact with white people, the original state of woman among savages—that of uncomplaining, patient endurance. Come upon them in one of their gipsylike encampments, and you find them at domestic duty, or patiently working their moccasins and baskets; see them abroad, there is still the same animal-like endurance.

Many of these squaws, especially those who have some French blood in their veins, are very beautiful. We have seen one at Niagara who was both sprightly and graceful, and for several years Nancy, at Sharon, was quite a belle, selling her horsehair ear-rings at preposterous prices to young gentlemen. But, as a rule, the half-breed squaw, or the Indian, is a rather plain, Mongol-mulatto-looking person, somewhat giving to sulking, and seldom very lively; "Ugh!" and "Two shillin'!" forming the average limits of her English conversation.

Our engraving represents two extremely well known moccasin and pincushion sellers of Montreal, who will at once be recognised by such of our readers as are familiar with that city. Like the fiorare, or flower-girls of Florence, they are general acquaintances, but seek their special patrons in strangers. Many of their wares are really beautiful, and are regarded as the most characteristic and charming presents which can be sent from the New World to the Old.

A BRITISH CONSUL AMONG BRIGANDS.—A letter from Genoa says: "The English consul at Palermo has been placed under ransom by some brigands. Mr. Rose had left the city with his family and when he arrived at Porazzi his carriage was stopped. He was made prisoner, and a ransom of 2,000 gold ounces demanded. Mr. Rose disputed the sum, and got it reduced to 200, which he pledged his word as an Englishman to send to his captors. Mr. Bastoggi, the Minister of Finance, will have to reimburse the 200 ounces."

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XXIII.

WELLE Bridie is proceeding with her new friends, we will glance back to the day when Estiole left Madeline in search of the lost child. The unfortunate little horse, which had followed him to the latter's residence, whom he immediately dispatched to Madeline, merely something on the feed-bill which had caused her unhappy decoying it back for the present to keep the unfortunate abduction of Bridie from attracting too much attention, and also prescribed the strictest injunctions, lest it should reach the ears of the unfortunate parents, who were daily, may hourly, expecting their child.

It was not midnight when Estiole reached Rosen, for like the rest of the household, he was anxious to hear the result, and was uncomfortable so long himself as he was in ignorance, not to try over in his chair, well-regulated mind the best way to pursue his business. Alas! there was no time for such reflections—the excitement and search—he would willingly have foregone the first, but how prevent the intelligence of the latter? Rosen gave the secret easy details without its meaning the ear of D'Almaine, who regularly read the Parisian papers. After a while he turned and said, musingly wrote for the press the following:

"If any of the gentlemen travelling in the Bois de Boulogne to Paris, on the 3rd of last month, will kindly come forward and give what intelligence they are able of the child, five years old, who, by mistake, was carried on in the vehicle, the distressed friends of the child will feel overwhelming gratitude to them, and if money can reward them for their trouble and kindness, the whole fortune of the child's friends will be freely and gladly bestowed on them. Apply or by letter, to J. R. S. at the Hotel Quatre Hotel, Rosen, or at No. 7, Rue Louis Quinze, No. 11, Paris."

This advertisement was ambiguous, but should it meet the eyes of any person cognizant of the crime, it would be thoroughly understood, without awakening the fears of D'Almaine, should he even scrutinize it, which, as he judged from his face, was by no means different office, felt assuring that good would result from it.

After making diligent inquiry through the city where he had passed the night, he mounted his steed, and proceeded slowly towards Paris, stopping at every town and village on the route to make strict and searching inquiry. He was three days in reaching Paris without ever entering the capital, where for a week he waited, prosecuting the same diligent inquiries. He thought of gaining a practice of real information on the unhappy subject, although many fruitless journeys were taken both by himself and the several persons he employed, regardless of expense, to share his toils, though not his anxieties.

After a fortnight his thoughts bent on returning to his home, and on going to the street his horse was stopped at nearly all the inns, and indeed everyone on the road, but not a clue could be reached to guide him where else to search. It was on the evening of the first day of the month of the close of the month which two years previously he had taken possession of, glowing with health, hope and every prospect conducive to happiness. How changed was now the scene! Health was wanting, hope had nearly lost her anchor, and happiness, alas for happiness, it seems a gone interminably and for ever. He looked towards the parlor, all was darkness. He glanced cautiously at the chamber of Madeline, through the closely-drawn blinds a glimmering light was visible.

"She is ill," he murmured, in a subdued tone. "My poor Madeline! and I can give no comfort. Oh, this last affliction that has fallen on us is heavier than all besides, and will prove more fatal in its consequences. It will prey like a worm at the heart of Madeline, for, though innocent, she will blame herself as the cause, and I, and Lucille, the mother but heroic Lucille, there is the worst cried of all. I cannot dwell upon that thought."

And shuddering, he leant against the doorpost, and for a short time gave free vent to his feelings. The pawing of his horse, the bridle of which he had held, aroused him, and he was unconscious that after a hard day's journey he was belonging to the senses's absence of rest and food.

"Poor Bride!" he said, patting her, "though you partake of our sad, sorrowful lot, it is declared from the comforts of rest and enjoyment of your stable. Ho, there!" he cried to a farm servant just leaving the back of the premises, "take Bride to her stable and see to her well, for she has had but small rest and little care bestowed on her since this quiet home, and—and—" he hesitated, "your master, how is he?"

The man shook his head. "Better now, master, they say, but she has been bad enough since you left us, something like mad, they say, taking on about Monsieur Estiole and all he's been dead, or lost, or something of the kind. I hope nothing happened to the child, master, for she was such a pretty little creature."

"Who is he, the boss?" cried Estiole, anxious to turn the subject.

"Ronald Lacy, sir," was the reply. "But how bad you look, master," he added suddenly.

"Hire your horse at all, sir, and have it more in the wind than rain, or my name is not Joseph Bostaire." Come Bride, poor beast, you look tired and downcast, as you could speak you'd tell a tale that would set us all talking."

Estiole heard the last part commencement of this speech; he opened the back door and passed through the kitchen to the parlor, which he entered with a slow tread and downcast head.

"What is it, Ann, your mistress?" he asked of the servant who brought candles.

"Soon and long, master," was the response. "She doctor's lady has been with her nearly ever since you left; but she's sleeping now—to-night she has been."

"Thanks for the good lady's kindness!" said Estiole with emotion, and taking a candle he repaired to the door. He opened it slightly on the door, fearing to alarm her by his too precipitous presence; gradually opened the door, and on seeing his wife sleeping he advanced towards the bed.

Madeline was in deep slumber; he shaded the candle with his hand, and gazed on her. She was pale as death, and seemed to have suffered much, and dissolving, for the dark circles formed on the bed to await her waking. He watched for some time with painful solicitude, hoping that the sleep would be of long duration that was weighing them both down.

Presently Madeline moved slightly, when she awoke; but she smiled and stretched out her hand to him. He pressed it between both his own, and was about to speak when she said:

"What news?" said Madeline, utter a pause, forcing herself to speak.

"Do not think of it to-night," he replied. "You shall know all to-morrow."

"But is it satisfactory?" she asked.

"I have said I will tell you nothing, either good or bad, until you are able to hear it," said Estiole. "Don't yourself then, dearest Madeline; do not nourish sorrow to destroy health from within; try and be yourself, pray for courage, and it God is with us we will put our shoulders to the wheel. Let us work in unity, in love, in prayer, and strength."

"Right," she replied, "at best it is but selfish to feed upon one's grief, it makes us feel more keenly our loss, but task will be hard, but my best shall be done to surmount it, or at least to subdue it; but you are changed, Jacques; you have rested neither in mind or body since we parted. Go to bed and practise what you have preached to me. Good-night; I would sleep, do you go, love, and remember."

They parted, but not to sleep; they lay on their couches, tossing in their minds what next was to be done; for although Estiole spoke not on the subject we near to both, Madeline knew by his manner and look that he had returned unsuccessful from his search.

The following day letters came from Lucille, saying she feared something serious had occurred to detain them, as Margaret Lacy Englend, and asking if she should send Annette for the child, as it was hard to live, and her son Hugh, in a country where all was strange, cold and sad, so far from friends and kindred.

The husband and wife read the letter, the portrait of the latter, and awoke to write the painful news to the anxious mother, made Madeline's illness the excuse for not having written before the time appointed.

There came a severe winter; the roads were blocked with ice and snow so many weeks. She was a veritable detainer, and even Lucille, who had long contemplated a visit to Rosen before hopefast that her child was better and safer in the house of the Bastiles than exposed to long journeys and wintry weather, and the danger of crossing the Channel. But had she seen her little Bridie that cold winter's night, with small bare pegging through her shoes and stockings, and hoddled close to a sickly child, both crouching near the dying embers of a fire for warmth, she would have been stricken with the misery it would have occasioned her that her child, so long to be the object of her heart's interest, should thus early in life be exposed to such great privations.

Bastiste and his wife were not into this cold winter. Both at times were exposed to its inclemency, in a fruitless, toilsome endeavor to discover the lost one; but the watery ground, and spring again robed the valleys and woods with her green mantle, but its smiling aspect brought with it no hope, and neither Madeline and her husband. Hope scarcely lived in their bosoms; the truth must out, otherwise would no longer wear them. Their form was vanished, the new tenant installed in it, and with overwhelming sensations they prepared to take their departure for England.

It was a bright morning in April when they entered their postchaise. Medicines were filled with tears as she cast them for the last time on the dwelling she had taken possession of five years before with such smiling anticipations.

"Adieu!" she cried, "I leave you for ever; and the chateau, Jacques, let us take a last glance at its old walls, where Lucille passed a few years of happy wedded life."

Jacques ordered the chaise to stop, and opening a small wicket leading to the grand walk, he noble mansion stood before them; every shutter was closed, and it looked changed as the fortunes of its late possessor. For several years it had been untenanted, and had been broken by design or accident. Rose trees and vines swept the overgrown gravel walks, and the internal magnificence, filling for the spot to the fragile agave lilies blossomed gracefully and profusely on the long coarse grass, and the fragrance of the large cotoneaster and the bramble had been removed from the Hall and the melancholy reverie of the scene was increased by the sight of Madeline and her husband, both gazed in deep meditation on the massive walls; the night showers had washed the white stone, and clearly visible from the wretched dwelling appeared the dark melancholy observation like tears falling for the fate and ruin of its possessor, and forced their gaze from the scene to themselves. As their eyes were raised to the window of Lucille's chamber, a raven, that had built there for many years, flew out and uttered their hoarse, but loved by her progeny, with a loud and dismal croak.

They both involuntarily shuddered, and Madeline, whose illness had made her superstitious, said, "What is that an omen of, dearest?"

"Why?" he answered, trying to smile, "it is an omen that ravens have dared to build their nest in the best window of the old castle."

"If that were so it would be nothing," said Madeline. "It is an omen of death, Jacques. If monsieur should be reinstated in his rights, Lucille will not return with him; she will find a grave in England; she will rest with the stranger."

"Old gull!" exclaimed Jacques, "what can a bird have to do with death, and the death of one so distant from here? Come, love, let us away. Let us forget for a time the sight of so much desolation in so short a time would give a pang to the sternest nature; let us away, and remember that we have a duty to perform to Lucille."

Taking her hand, he was hurrying away when the raven, returning, alighted, with his disagreeable "caw, caw!" just at the foot of Madeline, then rising, in his flight nearly touched her head, and whirling in the air, again returned to his nest.

With his handkerchief and a loud shout Bastiste succeeded in driving him away.

Bastiste was affected the hint to this spot," he said. "I must remain here for a day or two for your satisfaction, or you will leave me imagined with the idea of a trouble deeper than what has really occurred."

He was obeyed, something real attested his situation; it was embedded in the gravel, and undoubtedly had drawn the bird to its spot, thinking it was a worm, or some other species of insect food. It was a string of small coral beads that had once looped up the sleeve of Bridie's dress. Madeline caught it with a cry, and remembered well the child was with her when it fell from her dress, and she had awoke in terror from the dream that the child must see it were by the bird, tended rather to increase her nervous irritation than quiet it. But she spoke not, and taking the arm of her husband, with mutual satisfaction they quitted the ground.

CHAPTER XXIV.

MADELINE'S agitation increased as they approached London, after landing at Dover. Every child or group of children she beheld made her heart bound with the hope that it might be one enjoyed that she might reconnoitre them, for she remembered that on Lingfisherness was the greatest number in the village, and she had scrolled her that in England she should learn something of the lost child.

On arriving in London they took up their temporary abode at an hotel, and writing to Lucille to announce their arrival, left at the clubhouse to frequented, and in anxious suspense awaited his answer.

The following morning it was received in person. Lucille, in hasty, nervous footsteps were heard by the listening Bastiste; and Madeline, who was stationed, he flung open the door, and stood before them.

Bastiste met his delivery on the floor, and received the friendly shake of the hand of the escort, and the animated welcome to England; but Madeline's greetings were cold, and Lucille, Madeline, who knew that she was ill, kindly saluted her, then, looking round, cried

"But my darling—where is she! Have you sent my sweet child to Rosen? Oh, you have made the unhappy mother of Lucille Estiole midday!"

There was a pause almost painful, and neither of D'Almaine, Bastiste nor Madeline replied. Lucille looked from one of his friends, fear that he was to expect something without waiting for their voices to the highest degree, and rose with which he had entered the hotel.

"What is the matter?" he said at length. "This suspense is terrible. Is my child dead? If she is, let me know it. Bridie, Bridie, my child will be mercy to speak. The will of Providence be done. Oh, Estiole, Estiole, speak—speak quick. Another, and the heaviest affliction, has fallen upon me. My child is no more. Alas, for her mother—alas, for my poor Lucille!"

"She is gone," answered Estiole, "but not dead, monsieur. She is lost, but the lost may be found. Monsieur, be assured our search has been weary—unsuccessful; yet had we not hope we should not be here to tell you the truth we have the truth."

A flush of force reproach darted from the dark eyes of the unhappy father.

"What! Madeline, you have you betrayed the parents' trust in you? Have you allowed my child to be stolen—basely decoyed from you?"

"Not so—not so, count!" interrupted Bastiste, with dignity. "Never was a child better or more fondly guarded, till one unhappy accident. Had I entrust you, I consolable, to compose yourself—at least sufficiently to hear the whole—I will proceed to explain."

After several agitated strides across the room, D'Almaine seated himself, and covered his face with his hands, said,

"I am ready—I am quick—let me know the worst!"

The narrative was short, and D'Almaine, ever sanguine, felt relieved. His child lived. The sleigh was found. He had a clue to obtain it.

"She will be restored to us," he said. "In fear that the painful truth should reach us, you were called to Rosen. My child will be found. Health, fortune, domestic comfort—sweeter than all—would be expended to discover where she has been abducted."

"But how can you?" cried Madeline, "how can you?"

"Be quiet, love, be still, monsieur," said Bastiste. "It would be cruel, indeed, to keep a child from her parents. Let me know, sir, how successful will be the period when she may see her child."

D'Almaine again paced the floor dejectedly. After many turns he stopped before Madeline, who still drooped her head on her bende.

"Madeline," he said, "accept such a decoy; the fault cannot be alleged to you. What has happened might have occurred to any one in the most careful. I am going home. Will you follow? Lucille will join us hopefully. Will you not give it better than yourself?"

"Do as you please," asked Madeline, looking up, timidly. "Oh, if she would, and I could but see her! the load of sorrow that lies on me down. Her reproaches I can bear, if she will but see and pardon me."

"She will do both," said the count; "and though her regrets may be keen, she will not blame the unfortunate. Let D'Almaine on this a chastening from above. Follow me quickly. Bastiste, but you not better count?"

Lucille was at the window. When D'Almaine entered the garden he had was joined by Bastiste, and Madeline, who, pale as death, was addressed to his natural alert, dashing tread, surprised her, and going to the door was met by her husband, who, with a hurried movement, sprang to the steps leading to it. His pale lips and the forced smile that parted them alarmed her, and following him to the parlor, where he flung himself on a chair without removing the hat from his head, she stood before him, trembling with fear, and with more strong with his disbelief hair and ghastly paleness, said,

"Jacques, what is it?"

"No, not bodily," he said, trying to speak calmly. "I have been overcome with the heat, and the sudden change from morning."

"Some intelligence?" said Lucille. "What intelligence could have so overpowered you? Oh, tell me, Jacques!"

D'Almaine tried to arm himself with courage to speak out, but he glanced at the pale face of his wife, and his heart sickened and fainted. She neared one's placed herself, but he waved it away.

"Ah! this was not the reception I looked for," he said. "Has your fortune, dearest, for you will need it?"

"My fortune!" she said. "What new misfortune has fallen on us? Speak, D'Almaine, when I share it with you can bear much."

"Ah! this was not the second wife Lucille. I repeat, have fortunes, for I must tell you of our child."

"Our child!" she said, starting from him, and speaking in a sharp, breathless tone. "What of her? What has happened to her? She was safe with Bastiste and my own arms clasped her. Oh, Jacques, what of our child?"

"I have told you when you are in that excited state." he replied. "Be calm, Lucille, and I will tell you all. Have the goodness of your heart when you are sufficiently composed."

"Composed!" repeated Lucille. "How can composure come when all the scenes are up in arms! How can a mother's heart be still while she breathlessly waits to learn the fate of her child?"

She leaned her head on the arm of the chair and burst into a passionate flood of tears.

"Ah! now you weep, my wife," said D'Almaine, patting his arm round her. "Though your tears are bitter drops, and fall like fire on my own heart, I can tell you what far a time will cast a deeper shadow on our path of life."

"Weep for my child," she said, in a low, broken voice. "I am childless—the link between mother and child is snapped asunder, and I cannot even drop the tear of affection and regret on the sod that covers the dear remains!"

"Do not talk so, dearest!" said D'Almaine. "Dearest Lucille, Heaven forbid our child should sleep in her grave. It is not of her death I have to speak—no! other fate than mine must have told you that. It—"

"What—what is it, James?" she interrupted. "Is she sick, and you hesitate to tell me? You have heard from the Babies—pray me the letter. Oh, I must away to them immediately! My destiny believe me, she is blameless, like Batiste, in all but not having given greater publicity to the loss of our Birdie at the commencement of the unfortunate affair. But I am sanguine, with our united efforts we shall do much, and, ere long, I trust the truth will be found."

He went to the door, for he knew that Madeline and Batiste stood without. The sight of Madeline, so altered, the mere shadow of her former self, dark and humble before her, told Lucille, if she had suspected the wholly likeness, she had suffered long and much, and at the sight, remembering only the days of childhood, when Madeline was sister, mother, friend, all to her, she stretched out her arms and called upon her by name.

Madeline rushed wildly towards her, and catching her hand, cried, in a scarcely audible tone,

"Lucille, I am unfortunate, but not guilty. Can you believe that I have not betrayed your trust in me?"

"I do believe it," said Lucille. "The fault is not yours; it is my own unhappy fate. And the child's dream, Madeline—do you recollect her dream, when she told me not to leave her, or she should see me no more? Oh, why did I not, with her words still haunting me, bring her with me?"

Madeline embraced her, and whispered the hope mutter felt, but they found silence in each other, while D'Almaine and Batiste were energetic in their means to obtain intelligence, however vague.

—my little Birdie—I will soon be with you! Oh! even in sickness to have her head once more nestled in my bosom will be bliss."

She rose precipitately. The count drew her gently towards him, and she shielded her saying, impressively.

"Our child is in Heaven's blessing, is neither dead nor in illness, but—hush—my brother. Have courage, do not breathe so short nor look so wildly, for what with overweening emotion continues I suffer more on your account than on my child's—she may be in health, happy, while you, if you do not command yourself will die, or, worse, your reason will be endangered by it. For, after all, through an unfortunate indiscretion of Madeline's, we have lost, and, perhaps, in no kind nor heartless keeping as our friend."

"Lost!" she exclaimed, starting from him. "Lost! It is impossible—sabbeyfor! They have stolen her, James—those who have robbed you of your birthright have taken from you your child! But there is redress in this country. Who dare keep a child from its parents? Jules, Jules! we must recover this lost treasure."

Her energy had returned. She stood before him restless, but the deep flush of injury and strong will deepened on her cheek.

D'Almaine's spirit brightened, the Princess left his lips, he was glad that she had taken this view of it, although he did not himself for a moment imagine there was any ground for the supposition. A low, humble rap was on the door, he rose and looked from the window.

"Here is Madelipe," he said. "Poor Madelipe, worn in body and spirit. You will see her, dear Lucille, and learn all from her; for I remember you well; there were three of you in the diligence—say which took the child?"

Mr. Logan looked at her, but Madeline, if he had noticed her then, was too much changed to be recognized now, and he referred.

"I do not recollect you, madame, though I do the child perfectly. May I ask which is the mother?"

"I am, sir," said Lucille, "and if you know aught about her I entreat you to reveal it to me at once."

"Why, madame, it was by mere chance I beheld the advertisement, that being a department of the newspaper I seldom bestow a glance on; but hearing one of my clerks remarking how often the same thing had appeared, I had it pointed out to me. You may be sure I was much struck with it, and without a moment's delay went to Comte D'Almaine's agent, who gave me your address."

"Yes, sir; but my child," said the agitated mother, "tell me, is she safe? At once let me know all."

"I think I may venture to say the child is safe, if the kind-hearted fellow in still alive who took her, as he thought, a deserted, forsaken object, to his arms as if she were his own."

"Heaven bless and reward him!" murmured Lucille and Madeline together.

"Where can we find him?" said Madeline. "Oh, sir! where can

CHAPTER LXIII.

SIX months had passed away, and still no tidings of the lost one. Hopeless against hope makes the heart sick, for not a clue beyond what Batiste had formerly obtained with such unsatisfactory results was to be met with, when, by a strange coincidence, a gentleman called at the house of the count, and demanded to speak with him or Monsieur D'Almaine. Lucille and Madeline were together in the parlor when the servant brought in his card.

"Mr. Logan, solicitor," said Lucille. "I do not know him. But, admit him. He brings news, or he would speak to either D'Almaine or myself."

The man concluded the gentleman ordered. He was a stout, red-faced personage, and at a glance Madeline recognized him as one of the passengers in the diligence. She half rose, but was unable to speak, and sank down again.

Mr. Logan, with his small eyes fixed admirably on Lucille, who still beautiful, though much altered since the time when Birdie brought the fresh bloom rose to mantle her blooming cheeks, was a little too much an object of admiration not to strike even a common observer, said, as he seated himself upon the chair to which Lucille motioned him,

"Excuse me, madame; I have been directed here by the count's agent concerning an advertisement."

"But the child, sir," said Madeline, who now found her voice, and spoke in great agitation; "tell us where she is. You must know, for I remember you well."

"Be calm, madame; I am here with three of you in the diligence—say which took the child?"

Mr. Logan looked at her; but Madeline, if he had noticed her then, was too much changed to be recognized now, and he referred,

"I do not recollect you, madame, though I do the child perfectly. May I ask which is the mother?"

"I am, sir," said Lucille, "and if you know aught about her I entreat you to reveal it to me at once."

"Why, madame, it was by mere chance I beheld the advertisement, that being a department of the newspaper I seldom bestow a glance on; but hearing one of my clerks remarking how often the same thing had appeared, I had it pointed out to me. "I think I may venture to say the child is safe, if the kind-hearted fellow is still alive who took her, as he thought, a deserted, forsaken object, to his arms as if she were his own."

"Heaven bless and reward him!" murmured Lucille and Madeline together.

"Where can we find him?" said Madeline. "Oh, sir! where can neither wife nor home; and the good Jean Perre so willingly taking charge of her, exonerated us both from any want of humanity, and from what I saw of him, I think you have nothing to fear for the child's safety, who with childish accents and streaming eyes clung to his neck as if she had been accustomed to him for years; while on his part he declared that while he had a home the forlorn one should share it."

"Oh! nothing on earth can reward him for such disinterested kindness," cried Lucille; "Heaven only can and will duly appreciate it. Madeline, let us hasten to this good man's hearth; it must be a blessed one, and I long to press his hand, to give him a mother's thanks and blessing. A village tailor, only a village tailor!" she added. "And he voluntarily, and with such uncharitable ideas as were expressed by his fellow-passengers, took a child whose tender years he was assured would long be a permanent burden to him! Oh! he shamed the rich and influential by such a deed, and has earned a reward in Heaven if not on earth. To you, sir," she said, turning to the lawyer, "I offer my best thanks for your information, and Count D'Almaine's agent will see that you have the advertised reward, which, believe me, will be delivered to you with the most heartfelt satisfaction; but excuse me if I say it would have been but humane if you, being the only rich man of the three, had made this case public; think how many tears it would have saved; and you, as a lawyer, had your supposition been just in imagining my child had been left by design to the charity of strangers, I say, sir, as a lawyer, you would but have done your duty in doing your best to bring the authors of such a crime to justice."

Mr. Logan's face assumed a deeper hue while listening to the latter part of this speech, for he was obliged to acknowledge the truth also that, had the advertisement not mentioned the handsome reward he would have, it would have been ninety-nine to a hundred if he had noticed it at all; but indifferent to the rebuke, as the reward was a golden one, as Lucille rang the bell he bowed himself from the room with a wish that the child might be found well.

"What had we better do?" said Lucille, as the door closed on Mr. Logan. "Set off immediately for France, I think, for hours will seem days till I see my child again."

"Write immediately to Monsieur Perre," said Madeline. "It would not be well-judged to go before we see the count and Batiste; they will be home to-night. In the meanwhile, let us pack up a few things in readiness to be off to-morrow. Dear Birdie! after a year's absence, at her tender age, she will scarcely recollect us; but the extreme strangeness of all connected with this unfortunate affair thickens with all we hear. First, that she should have been so near to us, while Batiste and I were severally making such searching inquiries at Paris; then, that so intelligent a child as Birdie should not have told her father's name and his place of residence, which, if she had done, none would have presumed to detain her long from her parents. I hope this lawyer has told us all the truth."

"Dear Madeline," said Lucille, "do not raise a single doubt if you would not crush my best hopes. Oh!" she added, laying her trembling fingers on her throbbing heart, "if it be not truth, may I not live to prove its fallacy."

"Amen," replied Madeline, devoutly. "Write, dear madame, and though we shall reach them soon after the reception of the letter, it will be better to warn these kind-hearted people of our approach than to take them entirely by surprise."

Before Lucille's letter was despatched D'Almaine and Batiste returned. It was indeed joyful tidings to them; but the count, amid his joy, regretted deeply the necessity which precluded him going with his wife to embrace his recovered child. "But you will hasten back with her, love," he said, earnestly. "I shall see you to Dover and wait there your return, being so selfish that I cannot permit you above a single night at Paris."

"Nor will I permit myself an hour to elapse away from you that is not reconcilable to my mission," she replied. "Oh, Jules! yesterday I was overladen with sorrow, to-day I have flung it to the winds; yesterday I thought the world made up of clouds, to-day it is all sunshine. When thus, how lovely is life!"

He looked at her animated countenance; the smile of other days was on it, and as he leaned over her with fondness, he prayed with fervor that it might not be blighted.

SECRET MARRIAGE.

CHAPTER LIV.

It would be idle to deny that Erle was affected by any superstitious imaginings. It is true that he had no positive belief in what is termed the supernatural.

As he stood before the portrait of the bad Baron of Kingswood in the old hunting-lodge, its sudden gliding from its position affected him with awe, not from the fact of its falling from the place where it had for so many years hung immoveable, but from the coincidence. He instinctively ascribed the accident to a sudden rush of wind, which agitating the picture, caused, by its abrupt motion, the rotten supports to give way and the portrait to descend to the ground. The effect was a natural consequence of the cause, and the event ought not to have surprised him; under ordinary circumstances it would not, but he had not forgotten the wonders of the previous night, and the recollection that the portrait in the picture gallery of this same remarkable ancestor of the Kingswood race had fallen with a tremendous crash while he and Lord and Lady Kingswood were gazing upon it, made him view the similar occurrence in the hunting-lodge as a concurrence sufficiently startling to thrill every nerve in his frame.

There was a remarkable identity between the two pictures; they were apparently painted by the same hand; the costume was the same in both; and though one might have been a copy of the other, there was a degree of exactness between them which Erle could not avoid noticing. Here, however, he had a better opportunity of examining this singular portrait, for the light which fell upon it was bright and almost dazzling, presenting indeed a remarkable contrast to that semi obscurity in which he had contemplated the counterpart in the gallery at Kingswood Hall.

The form was that of one young and vigorous, of an age but little exceeding his own. The features, like those of the portrait in the picture-gallery, were regular and strikingly handsome.

The figure was attired in a hunting shirt, fastened about the waist with a richly ornamented baldrick. Immediately behind it was painted a complete suit of armor, to show that the baron was a warrior as well as a hunter. In his right hand, half raised, he bore a spear, while his left hand in the picture in the gallery hung down by his side in repose. Its position was the same in the portrait upon which Erle now gazed, save that it partly rested upon a small ebony box, now scarcely decipherable.

Faint as it was, however, it caught Erle's eye, and he recognised it. He withdrew from beneath his cloak the one he had brought with him from the old library and compared it with the one in the picture. They exactly resembled each other. Upon both appeared the date, 1555, and a throng of strange thoughts were called up into his half bewildered brain by this discovery.

Nor was this all, he was singularly and painfully moved as he contemplated this vivid resemblance to the evil spirit of the race whose doom he felt that he was to share—or to end, perhaps by his own violent death.

How long he looked upon the picture, and how far his thoughts ran wild with him, he seemed not to consider; but he was aroused from a reverie—the deeper into which he sank the paler became his face—by the slow rising of a figure by his side.

He started, and turned half round to behold the aged woman who had accompanied him into this chamber, staggering, tottering back, with her white, wrinkled face towards him, her eyes, expressing indescribable terror, bent upon him.

He moved towards her, with a view of supporting her enfeebled frame, but she waved him off.

"Back! back!" she cried, wildly. "You have no power over me now, that I know. Your malignant influence fell like a withering blight upon me in the brightest hour of my youth, as it did upon her, thou accursed! I sinned—I fell. I have borne my cross, and I am passing on to my eternal rest with the memory of the past clinging to me and inflicting upon me earthly pain, which no unearthly torments can surpass. The destiny which your crimes have originated has fallen upon me as upon others, it has implanted its most deadly blow; it is not in human nature to endure greater suffering than I have borne, and it is not in your power, wandering restless, accursed and evil spirit, to wreak upon me one grief, one throb of passionate agony to surpass it. That I know, therefore I defy you. What do you here? Avaunt! Even though this may be my last hour, I acknowledge not thy summons. I have cried to my anguish to Him whose power alone is infinite. When the last flutter of life trembles on my lip it is He who will summon me hither, not thou! That I feel! Away! You have blasted my life, why now attempt uselessly to embitter the short remnant of my tottering captivity on earth?"

The old woman tottered to the wall as she spoke, and covered her eyes with her trembling hands.

Erle at first thought she recovered from the swoon only to fall into a state of delirium; but as soon as he caught the tenor of her expressions, he gathered that she was laboring under the same delusion respecting him as Tubal Kish had hitherto done, and modulating his voice to a gentle tone, he said,

"Fear not, dame, quiet your agitation. Look up. I am no spirit, but one come hither only for a simple purpose, which has been fulfilled."

At the sound of his voice she quickly withdrew her hands from before her eyes, and gazed upon him with a sharp and eager scrutiny.

"I remember now," she said, passing her fingers across her forehead. "I remember you said you were not Cyril Kingswood—but yet——"

"I am not he," interposed Erle in the same quiet tone; "and if you will conduct me to another apartment I will explain to you, as far as I am able, what I am and why I am here. It may, perhaps, lead to the discovery I so wish to make."

"What is that?" asked the old woman in a somewhat faint voice.

"Who I am!" he exclaimed, with a strong emphasis upon the pronoun.

"It is strange," she muttered, as her singularly bright eyes ran over his lineaments, "very strange that you should profess ignorance upon that point. You are a Kingswood—that I see."

"So have I heard that I am, dame," he answered. Then a scarlet flush mounted to his cheek, as he added, "but under what circumstances I know not—I have that important discovery yet to make."

The old woman approached him with a tottering step, and laid her white, shrivelled hand upon his arm and looked into his face. Presently she said,

"What is your age."

"I am in my twentieth year, I believe," he returned.

"And—and—Cyril Kingswood?" inquired the dame, eagerly and quickly.

"Is my junior by nearly twelve months," he replied.

The old woman gasped for breath.

"Great Heaven!" she muttered, "can it be that this boy is——"

She paused, and again interrogated with a shrill sharpness.

"Have you no knowledge of your place of birth?"

"I have told you, no," he replied.

"Nor of your parents?" she asked.

"No," he replied laconically.

"But of those who reared you?" she continued.

"A schoolmaster and a schoolmistress," answered Erle, "to whom I was nothing but a pupil, whose quarterly bills were regularly paid, and so far entitled to their consideration. Yet there was one who had a life interest in me, who, I am sure, is acquainted with my true history, but refuses to put me in possession of it on the plea that it is not yet time. He cannot be, I imagine, unknown to you."

"To me?" she cried.

"To you," he repeated.

"His name?" she exclaimed.

"Ishmael Malpas," he replied, fastening upon her a searching look.

"Ishmael! Ishmael!" she repeated, with evident astonishment. For an instant she appeared convulsed, and her body rocked to and fro, but presently she mastered her emotion, and said,

"Has he been your guardian, your protector, from your childhood?"

"I believe so," answered Erle.

The old woman seemed as if she were about to choke. She pressed her hands upon her throat, and then tossed them wildly in the air.

"If it should be so," she murmured hoarsely, "then surely is the dawning nigh!"

"You still reside beneath the roof of Lord Kingswood?"

"No," he returned, laconically.

"No!" she iterated. "He did not cast you forth?"

"No," repeated Erle, thoughtfully, and somewhat sadly. "A chain of circumstances, forced upon me by influences over which I had no control, compelled me to quit it suddenly and secretly."

The old woman started.

"Are you he who drew blood from the son of Black Walter of Hawkesbury?" she demanded, in an eager tone.

"If you mean Phil Avon," he replied, in a stern tone, "yes. Stung by his ignoble insults, I met him in fair combat. I could have slain him, but I spared his life in very scorn of him and his boasted power."

"But it was your weapon which crimsoned the pure green sward of the Chace with his blood?" she exclaimed with singular earnestness.

"It was my weapon," he replied, laconically.

She rocked herself to and fro, and murmured,

"It is written—

> He bears the Kingswood brand
> Who has blood upon his hand,
> Yet for him there will be grace,
> Who within the old lone Chace
> Shall wound Black Walter's heir,
> And though his life he spare,
> Shall thrust a venom'd dart
> Deep in his serpent heart.
> Soul-slain, yet not to die,
> Shall be his destiny.
> The Kingswood who does this
> May win a path to bliss.

If you are a Kingswood truly and legitimately born," she added, bending her penetrating eyes upon him, "so much of the prediction have you fulfilled."

The broad scarlet band which appeared always upon the brow of Erle when any question respecting the integrity of his origin arose, appeared there now brightly and vividly.

A groan escaped him.

"Woman!" he said, "it is this, to me tremendous fact, that I have yet to learn. You may help me to it. Will you?"

"I may," she answered. "If it is within my power to do so I must. You have spoken of Ishmael; have you seen him since you fled from Kingswood Hall, after leaving the heir of Black Walter stretched in the semblance of death upon the sward, ensanguined with the foul blood he has inherited from his race not less accursed than that of Kingswood, for their destinies are intertwined?"

"I have been living with him in splendor, and might have been in content, if wealth could have given it," rejoined Erle. "But not there existed what I seek, what my soul yearns to know, nor the emprise upon which I have set my heart; so I have even quitted him to fight my battle with the future, guided alone by the promptings of my spirit and the energies belonging to my nature."

"Were you alone with Ishmael?" inquired Eldra, displaying eager interest in his answer.

"No," he replied, in which excitement was blended with feeling. "No, there was with us one fair, gentle, lovely as an angel and as innocent; ay, and sad as beautiful, for within this leafy Chace she left her young heart."

"You speak," said Eldra, sharply, "of——"

"Violet," he ejaculated.

"Aye, another sacrifice immolated upon the altar of Kingswood," screeched the old woman, with malignant bitterness.

"Not yet," exclaimed Erle, folding his arms and regarding the old dame steadfastly. "In this I feel as I have felt in other matters, that Violet's fate is linked with mine. As I dwelt in comparative desolation in the old school-house at Avaling, so Violet dwelt within this drear old building, equally unconscious with myself of our origin, mere puppets in the hands of him who has assumed the right, without possessing the power, of controlling our fates. I regard Violet as a sister in my isolated fate, so do I look upon her in whatever may betide in the future. If I spring up into fortune and to happiness, she shall ascend with me; aye, and it shall go hard, too, but she shall win and wear him upon whom her young, pure, loving heart is set!"

"Cyril Kingswood?" exclaimed Eldra, in a hoarse voice.

"Even him," returned Erle, firmly.

"It must not, cannot be; I say it," cried the old woman.

"And if it can, it shall be; I say it," cried Erle, almost passionately. "It is not for you, woman, to interpose your voice between the decrees of Heaven and their fulfilment."

"Nor for you!" retorted Eldra, sharply. She waved her hand. "Nor is it for us to dispute between the possible and the impossible. You know not who she is. I do!"

"From whom is she descended? In Heaven's name, I pray you to tell me," he cried with earnestness.

"Why should you seek so anxiously to learn this?" she inquired, eyeing him suspiciously.

"Because, as I have told you, I believe her fate and history to be closely linked with mine," he replied. "To be frank with you, I wish it not alone for her sake, but because it may afford some clue to my own origin."

"In this supposition," observed the old crone, musingly, "you may not be far wrong, but I dare not reveal yet a history which must be disclosed only when the object for which the secrecy has been maintained shall have been gained."

Erle gazed at her with earnest attention for a few minutes, during which a profound silence obtained. He broke it by saying,

"You have repeated some doggerel rhymes respecting a Kingswood. I have heard others such from a rough fellow whom I have met in the Chace, and I have heard them——"

He paused, and placed his hand thoughtfully upon his brow.

"Where?" inquired Eldra, as he hesitated.

"In—in dreams—strange, mysterious dreams, by which I was much disturbed when I slept within an antique bed chamber in the ancient part of Kingswood Hall," he replied.

"A chamber in which hung a portrait of the Lady Maud, whose blood stains the walls of this doomed building, and yet rests—aye, see, it sleeps with your own from the wound you inflicted upon your hand and drips upon the floor—already blood-stained," the old woman cried, in a tone of excitement.

Erle started, and bound hastily his bleeding hand with his handkerchief.

"Aye," he muttered inwardly, "they commingle, as they shall commingle the first with the last."

"I am a Kingswood," she said, in tones of singular bitterness. "The withering mantle of their shame has clung to me from girlhood until now, and will until the reluctant earth receives me into its cold arms to bear the doom no longer."

"You a Kingswood?" echoed Erle, with an air of astonishment.

"Aye," she replied, in clear but hollow tones. "Listen. This old tower, known in past centuries as The Wonder of Kingswood Chace, has been so called because there exists no record of its first erection or of him by whom it was built. The archives of the race of Kingswood go not back so far as the building of the tower nor its original occupiers. All that is known is, that it stood in the time of the Saxon Heptarchy, and was held by a powerful chief, who ruled over a vast body of followers, by name Erle."

Erle started and would have spoken, but the old woman waved her hand, and continued,

"This Saxon chief was followed by descendants who still held this tower in common with other possessions, and eventually that which is now known as Kingswood Hall became the castle of the first Baron of Kingswood; it occupied once an extensive site, it suffered partial demolition through the contumacy of one of the race, and has since become what you see it; but this tower has undergone scarcely any change. Such as it was in the time of the Saxon chief, you see it now——"

"One moment," interposed Erle, his heart leaping within his breast, "the Saxon name you have mentioned is one which interests me more nearly than you perhaps imagine. Are the Barons of Kingswood descended from the chief you have named?"

"This is a fact which is hidden in obscurity. There is a gap in the history of the house which it has been found impossible to supply. If any archives were written which could have thrown light upon the point, they have been lost. It is known that yon baron," she pointed to the picture as she spoke, "he who has wrought so much dire misery upon his successors, was named Erle, Baron of Kingswood, but since his time that name has not been borne by a Kingswood."

"Until now," thought Erle, not a little moved by the impression her statement made and the suggestion it forced upon him. He did not make any allusion to this suggestion, but he said,

"Has the name of Gower ever been mixed up with that of Kingswood by marriage or otherwise?"

The old woman shook her head.

"It has its significance," she replied, "when mentioned with the name of Kingswood. It is one of the family names of Vernon, of Huntingford."

Erle understood now why Ishmael had given to him the fictitious appellation of Erle Gower, for each name was to Lord Kingswood a symbol of doom and retribution.

"This old hunting tower of Kingswood Chace, the scene of a dreadful deed of former days, has been my home for many a weary year, as it has been the home of others similarly circumstanced to myself. Though it belongs to the barony, it is only held by the baron for the time being, under certain conditions, one of which is, that it shall afford a home to such nearest member of the direct line, being a woman, who shall have suffered from the curse which clings to the house. There has never been any failure in the direct line, and there have been many collateral branches, male and female. Of the female branch the most beautiful were the first to be sacrificed to the doom. I had the fatal gift of beauty, even like unto her from whom you have but recently parted. A violet in these old woods—a bruised flower, perhaps, ere this, in the accursed city. My father, a Kingswood, married a young and beautiful girl. I was the only offspring. Well that it was so; he broke her heart, squandered his patrimony, and came bitter to die miserable and a beggar. He left me in care of an old woman, whom he had hired to wait upon him. She brought me up within the old building carefully and tenderly, but in ignorance and simplicity. One bright morning as I sat at yonder window, a young hunter passed by, stopped, gazed at me, and spoke; he was handsome, and looked truthful and noble, and generous in spirit, but he was a Lord of Kingswood and a villain. He came again and again. I had seen no mortal creature so beautiful to my eyes as him. I had heard no words so soft, so musical, so strongly pleasing as his, and so, when he asked me to quit the old Chace for a brighter world than here I had known, I consented and fled with him. It was a short happy dream while it lasted. I awoke to find myself discarded, a fingerpoint, an object of scorn and contempt to my own sex, of horror and humiliation to myself."

"Did he not marry you?" inquired Erle, with indignant astonishment.

"I came back here lone and desolate, and he married a lady of wealth and of high family, who perished not long after she had given birth to a son, by a fall from her horse. It was at this period while I was mourning in bitterness and anguish, that one night there was a violent knocking heard at the door of the tower, and a voice called my name thrice. I descended and opened the door. I could see no one, but at my feet lay a bundle, from which issued the wail of an infant. I took it up and entered the tower with it. I examined it with a light, and found a beautiful young female child of scarce a twelvemonth old, carefully enwrapped in a thick mantle. Upon its breast was pinned a scroll, upon which was written the following words:

"This child is a Kingswood, its mother was a Kingswood; the doom of her race is fallen upon her—she is dead. To you, by right and by tradition, the care of her and the task of rearing her within the ancient tower falls. Look to her, protect her from the fatal glance of a Kingswood. She is the offspring of a secret marriage; be content to learn no more. The name she is to bear is Erla."

"The female of Erle," suggested he.

"Even so," rejoined the old woman, with a shudder, and continued, "Nothing further was written on the paper. In the fold of the clothes there was a bag of gold pieces, but not the slightest clue to any further discoveries respecting her. I looked upon the child rather as a gain in my desolation than as a fresh burden to my sorrow, and I commenced my maternal task with zeal. I reared it with the watchfulness of a bird tending its young, and she grew up a perfect marvel of loveliness. The foresters and retainers of the Kingswood estate were forbidden to approach this tower, but if ever they caught a glimpse of fleeting Erla, as she darted like a fawn across a narrow glade, they called her The Wonder of Kingswood Chace. Even as I had been, as Violet has been, as others yet to come may be. At last the eye of Lord Kingswood fell on her—the eye of the serpent—it fascinated her. I discovered this all too late. I fled with her to Huntingford, and thought that she would have been wedded to Vernon of that place; but I kept my secret when I should have disclosed it. Kingswood followed and fled with her——"

"But," cried Erle, with startled energy and a face white as marble, "he—he married her?"

"Aye, he married her, but—hush!" suddenly exclaimed the old woman, raising her finger, "we are intruded upon."

A stealthy step was heard ascending the stair, and in another minute the shaggy head of Tubal Kish appeared in the doorway.

Violet found, after Erle's departure from the roof of Ishmael, that the forebodings she had expressed to the former were quickly in the way of realization.

The return to London had been abrupt; it was followed by a seclusion even yet more lonely than that she had suffered at Gray's Mount. She met Ishmael but seldom, and he, though kind and gentle in his manner to her, scarce spoke a word.

He was away much, and she passed the greater part of her time within her own room, wondering at the purport of Cyril's words, and weeping as she remembered them and the look which accompanied them. What could these words and that look mean?

He had said, "I dare not see you more." There was not a tone in the utterance of this sentence which implied, "I care not to see you more." And he had said that they were to part for ever, but he had spoken this dreadful sentence with a cry of anguish, as though it was his own death-warrant.

What was she to believe? Not that he loved her less than ever, but that, like herself, he was coerced to pursue some path which would conduct him from hers in such direction that she could never meet as she had in love and happiness.

Perhaps it was not strange that she should feel this repulse less acutely after she had thought it over than she had that which had occurred at the Marquis of Chillingham's. Then his face was averted from her, his eye fell coldly upon the ground, and it seemed to her that, in separating from her, his love had departed too.

Now, it was clear that some most formidable obstacle intervened between them and the interchange of their loves, but it was not clear to her that his love for her had faded, even though they were divided. There was a dear, soothing, even pleasing consolation in that thought. She felt that she should love him as fondly, as dearly, whatever barriers might divide them. It would matter little what harsh designs Ishmael might have in store, or what part he might force her to enact, he could not compel her to cease to love Cyril, to forget him, or to omit him in her morning and nightly orisons, and she thought that it would be some alleviation to his sorrow if he knew it.

One morning, in the absence of Ishmael, she was seated in her apartment before a piano, playing and singing her favorite ballad, "When We Two Parted," and as the last notes of the final verse—for she repudiated all other stanzas—died tremblingly away upon her quivering lips, a low, soft voice expressed words of gratified approbation.

She hastily started from the instrument, blushing to have been thus overheard, for she only played in the presence of her music mistress or alone, and beheld Carlton Stanhope standing at her side.

He had entered unannounced, and he apologised for it.

"I was anxious to see you alone, Violet," he said, with a slight tremble in the tone of his voice, "and I fancied if I permitted myself to be announced I should have to face 'thy king, thy lord, thy governor,' the most grave and potent Mr. Vernon, and that you, so timid as you are, would fly from me, though by no means such a terrible fellow, simply because Beatrice is not with me. The fact is, Beatrice is not herself; she has grown whimsical, capricious; her thoughts are disjointed, her actions curious, impulsive and unmeaning; but, Violet, when she is in the favorable mood to visit you, she will come and be violently affectionate to you; and then suddenly as cold as Siberian ice, will laugh with you, weep with you, sing to you, quit you abruptly, and return and entreat your pardon, winding up with a menace never to see you more."

Still Violet was silent, and looked at him with an air of surprise.

Then he flung his hat impatiently on the table, and pulled off his gloves impetuously.

"Shall we be seated?" he said, motioning her to take a seat.

She complied, and remained silent, as though it was necessary that all to be spoken should come from him.

"Where is Erle?" he inquired abruptly.

"He is absent," returned Violet, quietly.

"I have not met him anywhere lately," he subjoined. "What has become of him? Where has he gone?"

"I do not know," replied Violet, in as quiet a tone as before, and still regarding him with some surprise.

"I beg your pardon," he returned, promptly; "I had no right to put that question. I don't think he looked well when I saw him at Brighton. I am sure you did not, Violet. My sister was ill, I was fidgetty, and not the thing; Lady Kingswood and Lady Maud were both miserably ill. Nobody was well at Brighton. I don't quite think I like Brighton. There was poor Cyril Kingswood, too, he looked deucedly ill, in fact, frightfully bad."

"Is—he—is—is Mr. Cyril Kingswood—really—really very ill?" inquired Violet, articulating the words with the greatest possible difficulty, for Carlton's hasty words had shocked her greatly.

"Well, yes," returned Carlton, thoughtfully, "if looks are a fair criterion. He seems so horridly miserable, too, and that in the face of his approaching marriage."

"His marriage!" exclaimed Violet, with a sudden, eager earnestness.

"Oh, yes. You have surely heard of it!" he rejoined. "It is a strange match for Lord Kingswood to countenance. You must have heard the particulars?"

"N—o!" returned Violet, faintly.

"How extraordinary! It is in everybody's mouth," replied Carlton. "The fact is, Lord Kingswood is a proud, haughty noble, priding himself upon his descent from some grim old baron, who, between you and I, tradition declares to have been no better than he should be, for in those days barons and such folk did a great deal in the way of burglary and cattle-stealing. Possibly the Kingswood ancestor distinguished himself in that peculiar mode of accumulating property. Now, everybody thought that Lord Kingswood would not permit Cyril Kingswood, whom he is said to regard as the apple of his eye, to

WE copy the following from the Cincinnati Gazette:

NEW YORK, June 8, 1861.

MY DEAR FRIEND—Yes you are happier than I am, this moment. You stand at the head of a body of brave men, eager to fight for the greatest of causes—and I am left behind, to do the work of a woman. Were the country just at a time when it is cleared to me. I could pay my record, the record which I expected to secure in the battle-field. I am a victim of the fortunes of war. You choose and warm friendship which, as you know, I always cherished for you, but I am not to be with you. Perhaps you will never know how I regret your absence. C. S. HEINTZ.

TO COLONEL HECKER, E. Force, Fourth Regiment Wisconsin State Volunteers.

THE Rev. Dr. Cheever, of the Bowery Mission, should have remained here to lead his countrymen, and not be sent to Spain, where he will not be required.

AMONG the many things calculated to protect the health of our brave volunteers, we have received a sample of Dr. Perry's Compound Cork Lining for military hats and caps. It is the best invention yet out. The Government, or the Town Executive Committees, should send a number at once to our soldiers. Already many have died from sunstroke.

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

THE following is a good story about a clergyman who lost his horse one Sunday morning. He had a very fine animal, which he was fond of riding, and he gave up in disgust. The next day he saw his horse following no road in particular, and he called out to the animal to stop. The boy, who had just come in, supposing the horse was still the bartender of thought, cried out, "Stop the horse, stop the horse!" and he was stopped.

A NEW HAMPSHIRE man was lately robbed while travelling. How much his loss was he could not tell, for he had forgotten how much he had when he started. He was only sure that he had been robbed.

"I DON'T mistake one's dinner, your particular. I don't keep such. For instance, I'm a bit of a newspaper scrawl, a pair of wooden mandrel, two newspaper reporters, and a few miscellaneous impressions on the premises. And I hear you are on editor, I return your fresh. I never robs only myself."

"MR. PARKS," said a lawyer to a witness, "I understand you to say that you were formerly engaged in the practice of law, but relinquished it for the profession?"

"I was tired of any correspondence or letters passing between them."

"Do you mean to say that you were ever in the practice of law?"

"No, I think he actions as easy as any man I ever saw."

"Do you mean to say, sir, that you have known the defendant a long time; what are his habits—wine or otherwise?"

"Why, I don't like 'em; but I take a little sugar under the arms, and toe short-waisted for the bottom."

"You can take your seat, Mr. Parks."

IN a railroad car the seats were all full except one, which was occupied by a thread-bare looking man, who was trying to entertain a couple of evidently well-to-do and intelligent gentlemen with a story of his adventures. Judge Story, they were about to go into the back car, when Patrick arose hastily, and offered them his seat with a polite bow.

"But you will have no seat for yourself," suggested one of the young ladies, as she looked around the crowded car.

"Never mind that," said the gallant Hibernian, "I'd rate upon the crow-bar sooner than you should be left without a seat." The young lady thanked him, and he seized hastily into the next car, and the chorus of his fellow-passengers.

Some say there's nothing made in vain,
While others the reverse maintain,
But I'm not one of either,
For I'm sure
Mosquitoes, bed-bugs, crickets, flies,
Were made to plague the wise.

WANTED—A life-boat that will float on a "set of sentiments."

IF FIVE in Choice there is the interesting interruption on a handsome break, how many will it take to make a Queen? Answer—Two, for the knight, his descendants soften would keep the Queen from the throne.

A GENTLEMAN in Paris, on coming home to dinner, found his wife in bed. On being asked the reason of her unusual indisposition, she replied that she had always supposed her husband was dead, and that she had gone to bed in order to get used to it.

A PARISIAN dandy one day, when he entered his "Petite Boutique," the dandy had at his counter a young lady, who was trying on a pair of gloves. "Mademoiselle," said he, "I am your humble servant." "Permit me to send you a bouquet by my valet." "Mademoiselle, I am your most obedient." "Shall I have the honor to send a bouquet?" "Sir," said the young lady, putting on her livery, and handing the dandy's money, "you have been and handed me the change."

"They go Right to the Spot."
INSTANT RELIEF | STOP YOUR COUGH!
PURIFY YOUR BREATH!
STRENGTHEN YOUR VOICE!
SPALDING'S
TROCHES
AND GOOD FOR CLERGYMEN,
GOOD FOR LECTURERS,
GOOD FOR PUBLIC SPEAKERS,
GOOD FOR SINGERS,
GOOD FOR CONSUMPTIVES.
GENTLEMEN CARRY
SPALDING'S THROAT CONFECTIONS.
LADIES ARE RECEIVED WITH
SPALDING'S THROAT CONFECTIONS.
CHILDREN CRY FOR
SPALDING'S THROAT CONFECTIONS.
They relieve a Cough instantly.
They clear the Throat.
They give a beautiful Volume to the Voice.
They prevent a cold from coming to the Breast.
They are delightful to the Taste.
They are made of Simple Herbs and cannot harm any one.
I advise every one who has a Cough or a Husky Voice or a Bad Breath, to say efficiently to his patient, to give a box or any Troches a trial. I feel sure they will relieve you in a short time, and will agree with me that "they go right to the spot." You will find them very useful also, gentlemen, while travelling or attending meetings for relieving your throat or clearing your utterance. If you try one you will use it in singing and you will ever afterwards consider them indispensable. You will find them at the Depots and Stations in Meriden.
PRICE TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.
My signature is on each package. All others are counterfeit.
A Package will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of Twenty Cents.

Cephalic Pills,
CURE
Sick Headache,
CURE
Nervous Headache,
CURE
All kinds of Headache!

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented, and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and restraint will be obtained.
They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are subject.
They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.
For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Laxative improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the long lost energy and strength of the whole system.
The CEPHALIC PILLS, from the result of long investigations and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved much vast suffering and suffering from Headache whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the Stomach.
They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any dangerous after-effects renders it easy to administer them to children.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS!

DYSPEPSIA AND LIVER COMPLAINTS,
SCROFULA AND PILES, CONSUMPTION,
and all Diseases of the Blood.—"Annuals Daily Advertiser.
Dr. Potts' Medicines are purely vegetable, and they unite SPECIALTY in every disease. They have made the most ASTOUNDING CURES.
Professor Silliman, of the Trenton Academy, says:
"Dr. Potts has done more quackeries in the treatment of the MOST VEXELIOUS AND FATAL DISEASES
to which our race is subject."
A. L. Mosby, of 52 Broad St., Newark City, says:
"For three years, I was so much afflicted with DYSPEPSIA, LIVER, HEART AND LUNG COMPLAINT. I had a distressing Cough and was in a rapid decline. Dr. Potts positively cured me in less than two years."
Mr. Barry, of 9 New St., Newark:
"I was a great sufferer for many years from
Dyspepsia, Bowel and Nerve Complaints.
Dr. Potts saved my life, I believe. I commend the visit of my son to Dr. Potts. He is eminently successful in curing the most capricious patient in my son."
Joseph Reed, Esq., of 46 State St., Newark, says:
"I was a total cripple from RHEUMATISM AND LIVER COMPLAINT.
Dr. Potts restored me to health."
Please send for Circulars, and see other certificates.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1861, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 296—Vol. XII.] NEW YORK, JULY 20, 1861. [Price 6 Cents.

VISIT OF MAJOR TAYLOR OF THE CONFEDERATE ARMY.

We illustrate, in our present number, an incident which considerably agitated the public mind, and from which, even now it has scarcely recovered its surprise. On the 4th of July the pickets of the Eighth New York Regiment, Colonel Lyons, observed a small party of Confederate soldiers approach with a flag of truce. This proved to be from Manassas Junction, and protected Major Taylor, of New Orleans, who bore letters from Jefferson Davis and Beauregard to President Lincoln and General Scott. Colonel Lyons telegraphed to Washington, and in reply received orders to send the despatches to Washington. A cannon was held, when the despatches from these eminent rebels were read, but their nature has not transpired. It is sufficient to say the no answer was given, and Major Taylor was conducted to the rebel lines in the manner portrayed by our Artist. From the Richmond Guardian we learn that the letter from Jeff. Davis to Lincoln was on the subject of privateering, while that of Beauregard to General Scott related to an exchange of prisoners. Whatever the subject of these epistles might have been, the expedition was fruitless in all respects. We pay no heed to the surmise of some persons that it was a weak invention of the enemy to gather information. There are too many traitors in office in Washington to render such a clumsy expedient necessary on the part of the one-eyed Confederacy.

THE BATTLE AT RICH MOUNTAIN, WESTERN VIRGINIA.

On the morning of the 12th of July General McClellan ordered four regiments—the Eighth, Tenth and the Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers, and the Nineteenth Ohio Volunteers—to proceed along the line of the hills, south-east of the enemy's entrenched camp, to the Beverly road, where it crosses Rich Mountain, two miles east of the enemy's position, with orders to advance along the Beverly road, and attack the east side of the works, General McClellan being prepared to assault the west side as soon as firing should announce the commencement of the attack. The capture of a courier, who mistook the road through his enemy's camp for the route of our troops, placed the enemy in possession of the movement. When General Rosecrans reached the Beverly road, at two o'clock, after a most exhausting march over the mountains, he found the enemy posted in the opposite side of the road, about eight hundred strong, with two cannons, and holding a strong position, partially fortified.

An engagement instantly took place, and continued for three-quarters of an hour, when the rebels were totally routed, with the loss of three hundred men, including officers and both cannon. About seventy-five of the rebels were killed; seventy-five of their wounded are in our hands, and one hundred and fifty others as prisoners.

The road was between two hills. Our troops descending a steep declivity were greatly exposed to the fire of the rebels, who occupied the opposite hill and poured musketry, shot and shell upon them. General Rosecrans' column remained at the place of the engagement during the night.

General McClellan was in position with his whole force during the whole afternoon, ready to make the assault, but heard nothing from the other column except this distant firing. Early in the morning he was proceeding to plant cannon upon an eminence commanding a portion of the rebel camp, and preparing to attack the whole nest in front, when it was ascertained that the enemy had evacuated the place during the night, moving towards Laurel Hill, leaving behind a few of their sick men, all their tents, cannon, camp equipage and transportation. A rapid march was then made by General McClellan to Beverly, passing Rosecrans' command on the road, with instructions to follow quickly. At Beverly it was ascertained, late

THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

EXTRA SESSION.

Senate, July 10.—After some unimportant business, the resolution to approve certain acts of the President was taken up; Mr. King offered to amend so as to reduce the standing army in six months after the re-establishment of the authority of the United States. Mr. Latham saw no reason for the increase of the regular army or suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, but was willing to approve past acts of the President. Mr. Hale also wished to reduce the navy after the war, and was for making war on the harpies who in the guise of friends were filching from the Government. Mr. Kennedy protested against the suspension of the habeas corpus writ by the President; he was opposed to coercion, and to a violation of the Constitution in the effort to sustain it. Mr. Lane, of Indiana, declared he would sanction no peace until the death by the halter of the leaders of the rebellion. Mr. Baker was for war. The amendment was amended so as not to permanently increase army or navy. Agreed to. Mr. Polk opposed the resolution, and in a speech of much length and ability argued that the President had assumed unconstitutional powers. The resolution was then postponed. The amended bill authorizing the President to call for 500,000 volunteers, appropriating $500,000,000, and granting franking privilege to military officers, was taken up, and after various amendments passed by 33 to 5. The Senators who voted against the bill were Polk, Salisbury, Powell, Johnson, of Missouri, and Kennedy.

July 11.—After some preliminary business, the House resumed the grave discussion of affairs. The bill for the payment of the militia and volunteers was passed without discussion. Then Mr. Clarke's motion to expel the members for Seceding States was also carried. Mr. Polk and Mr. Powell made strong peace speeches, and Mr. Breckinridge obtained the floor.

July 12.—The Force Bill, after considerable discussion, was passed, by 36 yeas to 6 nays. The previous vote on the bill authorizing the employment of volunteers was reconsidered, some amendments made, and the bill again passed—yeas 35, nays 5. A bill was introduced relative to the Sanitary Commission, and referred to the Military Committee. Notice was given of a bill to be introduced authorizing the Federal Government to take possession of personal property in the rebellious States where the owners have been found in rebellion. Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, offered his previously noticed resolution for an amendment to the Constitution, with a view to putting a stop to the present war. It is in substance the Crittenden compromise of the last Congress.

On the presentation of the credentials of Mr. Frederic P. Stanton, appointed by the Governor of Kansas to fill a supposed vacancy from that State, understood to be caused by the appointment of Senator James Lane to a command in the regular army, Mr. Lane demurred to being ousted from his Senatorial functions before his military nomination had been confirmed, and the matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Various bills received consideration, all having in view the strengthening of the administrative arm of Government.

July 13.—Mr. Hale introduced his bill providing for the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Postmaster-General sent in a communication, in accordance with the request of Congress, explaining the circumstances attending the suspension of the mails in the rebellious States. The credentials of the Senators elect from Virginia, in place of Messrs. Hunter and Mason—John S. Carlile and William B. Willey—were presented by Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, and a long debate occurred as to the propriety of their admission, which was participated in by Messrs. Bayard and Saulsbury, of Delaware; Johnson, of Tennessee; Trumbull, of Illinois, and others, the objections to their admission being constitutional. A motion to refer to the Committee on Elections was finally negatived, 35 to 5, and the new Senators were sworn in. The Loan Bill was then taken up, and several amendments suggested by the Committee on Finance were adopted, after which it was laid over temporarily, and the bill to increase the present military establishment was taken up and passed.

House, July 10.—A very excited and remarkable debate arose respecting the Duties Bill. Mr. Burnett, of Kentucky, protested against the war, while Mr. Mallory, of Kentucky, said the people of Kentucky were overwhelmingly in favor of putting down the rebellion. Mr. Vallandigham made a very fierce attack upon the President, saying that in Europe such tyranny as his would have cost him his head. The bill was carried by 135 to 10. The Loan Bill was afterwards brought forward and passed, by 140 to 5. The five malcontents being Benjamin Wood, Burnett, Reid, Norton and Vallandigham. Congress has thus authorized the raising of 500,000 men and $500,000,000.

July 11.—The bill appropriating $160,000,000 for the army and $30,000,000 for the navy was passed. Messrs. Burnett and Hickman had a spirited passage of arms on the present question, and then Mr. Jackson, of Kentucky, spoke eloquently in favor of the Union.

July 12.—The bill came up authorizing the President to accept the services of 500,000 volunteers for the prosecution of the war, and appropriating $500,000,000 to pay for the same, when a spirited discussion took place, participated in by various members. The bill finally passed the House. It has yet to pass the Senate. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, offered a preamble and resolution, declaring vacant the seats of such members as have accepted commands in the militia of their several States, which occasioned a lively passage of words between various Representatives, when the matter was tabled by 92 to 51. A resolution was adopted requesting the Attorney-General to lay before the House a copy of his opinion in relation to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

July 13.—Mr. Blair, of Missouri, offered a resolution expelling John B. Clark, a member from that State, for having borne arms against the Government. Those among the members of known Secession proclivities did their best to save Clark from his impending fate, by endeavoring to have the matter referred to the Committee on Elections, but their efforts were of no avail. He was expelled by a vote of 94 to 45. The President notified the House that he had approved the bill for the payment of the militia and volunteers. The opinion of the Attorney-General on portions of the President's Message, including that relating to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, was received and referred to the Judiciary Committee. A resolution was adopted providing for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the possibility of reducing the expenditures of the Government. The bill providing for the retirement of disabled army officers was debated in Committee of the Whole and passed; also the bill to pay soldiers for private property lost in the removal from Fort Moultrie to Fort Sumpter.

Foreign News.

The European news is of little importance. The tone of the British press is becoming more friendly to the United States, its good sense having recovered from the irritation produced by the articles in certain Secession papers in this city, which recommend the North to rob England of Canada, to reimburse it for loss of the South. The extreme ignorance of such advice is patent to all who know anything of Canada, where the Americans are heartily detested. The course pursued by certain New York papers was of course made by order of Jeff. Davis, with the intention of making a breach between England and the North. The letters from the London Times (Russell), exposing the outrages upon British subjects in New Orleans, have had great effect, and will make the residence of the three Rebel Commissioners precarious. They should remember how the mob o' London treated Haynau, and if Mr. Train thought it worth while, he might rouse a feeling against Mann, Yancey and Rost of a very dangerous kind. There is nothing new in domestic or foreign politics. The English papers criticise our dead Douglas in a very hostile spirit, pronouncing him to be a corrupt demagogue, and not a patriot, nor a statesman, holding up as a brilliant contrast the Italian Cavour.

France is quiet. The fair Empress is about making another pilgrimage to England. The recognition of Italy by Louis Napoleon has given great satisfaction to the people of France, but as much displeasure to the clergy and Ultramontane party.

Hungary is still unquiet. The Empress of Austria is rapidly sinking, and as a last resort she is going to try the climate of Corfu.

Ricasoli, the successor of Cavour, has made a liberal speech, tempered with moderation.

The new Sultan of Turkey has announced his intention of pursuing the same policy as that of his brother, the deceased monarch.

The serfs of Russia are discontented, not having realised any benefit from their freedom, while Poland is more than ever discontented, despite the semi-liberal measures of the Czar. The rumor of the latter visiting Louis Napoleon at the Camp of Chalons is renewed.

The French troops have left Syria, but a French fleet is cruising off the coast in case of emergencies.

Mexico.—Murders and assassinations abound. On Sunday, June 1, Senor Don Melchor Ocampo, one of the most prominent men in the Republic and ex-Cabinet Minister, was inhumanly butchered on his plantation, at Pocoma, where he has been living in retirement, by the followers of Marquez and Zuloaga, though the latter denies having had anything to do with the affair, and pretended to be very much affected when he heard of it. Another personage of distinction, and especially well known, General Don Santos Degollado, ex-Commander-in-Chief of the Liberal army, was killed a few days after by the same party—in fair fight, however. He had gone to avenge the death of his friend Ocampo.

State of the Nation.

Congress is working earnestly, and the results, which will be found under the Congressional head, are, so far, satisfactory. The Secession element therein raises its voice but weakly, and its efforts are sternly rebuked by overwhelming majorities.

An important order has been issued by General Scott, which places the Telegraph, as far as relates to war movements, under the surveillance of the Department, so that in future the "telegrams" will be in all respects reliable if meagre. Special Correspondents for newspapers in the various camps are looked upon with suspicion by the military authorities, and some few have been arrested. The reason is self-evident. Being in the very midst of military operations, it is hardly possible but some indication of projected movements will be revealed to their argus eyes, and, once upon the scent, not an instant is lost before it is communicated to their respective journals, and in these blazoned to the world, without a moment's reflection as to the propriety of its publication. It is well that such an impolitic system should be stopped.

There are several papers in our midst who indulge every day in insane attacks upon the Government, and more especially upon the War Department, blaming it for want of energy in not advancing long ago upon the enemy. According to their profound knowledge of military tactics, the thing could have been done off-hand several weeks ago, the rebels driven from Virginia, and Richmond in possession of the Federal troops. These writers have become the laughing stock of the country by their presumptuous bombast and their visible ignorance. Impatient for the spoils, they would precipitate the action of the Government and risk all with combinations only half consummated and forces insufficient and incomplete. The wisdom of the wise is not their wisdom, and fortunately for the Union cause their counsel does not prevail. To those who can trace, however faintly, the outline of the plan of the Commander-in-Chief, it appears grand, comprehensive and effectual, not only in its offensive but in its defensive operations. Combinations so vast, with ramifications extending over hundreds of miles, and their strategic operations to be carried out by armies yet to be raised and prepared, might well demand time; and the consummate tact and judgment which met the necessity of keeping the enemy in check until these concerted movements could take effect, and the separate columns move onward, like the march of destiny, to surround and overwhelm the traitorous hosts assembled to work the ruin of the Union, should assure all doubters of the master mind in command.

Congress has acted decisively in reference to the new government of Virginia. The two Senators, Messrs. Willey and Carlisle, were duly qualified and admitted to their seats, while the Secessionists, Messrs. Hunter and Mason, were expelled. This action will give comfort and strength to the true men in Western Virginia.

Baltimore is for the present quiet; the turbulent spirits of that city have been overawed by the firm stand and the prompt exhibition of power made by Major-General Banks; but it cannot be denied that a widespread feeling of sympathy with the Secessionists exists there, which would assuredly burst forth were the governmental power in weaker hands.

The Secessionists are ingenious in their desperation, and lose no opportunity that craft and cunning can suggest of destroying those opposed to them. Being unable to cope with our flotilla on the Potomac, they have attempted its destruction by infernal machines. Captain Budd, of the steamer Resolute, discovered two large casks, joined together by a rope, suspiciously floating towards his vessel. Steps were immediately taken to secure them, but one sank before this could be accomplished. On examining the barrel secured, it was found to be an ingeniously contrived infernal machine. The rope was designed to catch the prow of the vessel, and thus swing the casks under the bilge of the vessel. The rope was floated on the surface of the water by corks. Six feet under water, beneath each cask, was hung a strongly riveted cylinder of heavy boiler iron. These contained the explosive material. The cylinders were supported by the casks, in which were placed the fuses, which were ignited. There were two fuses in each cask. They led from a hole in the upper side of the cask, and were coiled upon a platform fixed about midway inside the vessel, to protect them from any water that might leak into it. From this platform the fuses were carried through a copper pipe passing through the lower part of the cask, and connecting with a gutta percha pipe, the lower end of which was inserted in the cylinder.

A brilliantly contested action took place between the Federal forces, under General Siegel, and the Missouri State troops, under the command of Generals Parsons and Rains, which resulted in the defeat of the Secessionists, with a loss of three hundred men killed, prisoners and wounded.

The future movements of Major-General McClellan will be found in the following despatch written after the gallant and important action at Rich Mountain, Va., which we illustrate this week, where General Rosencrans overthrew the enemy, eight hundred strong, with severe loss in men, camp equipage, cannons, &c.:

WASHINGTON, July 13, 1861.

The following despatch was received to-day at the army head-quarters from General McClellan:

BEVERLY, July 13, 1861.

COLONEL E. D. TOWNSEND, Washington, D. C.:

The success of to-day is all that I could desire. We captured six brass cannon, of which one is rifled, and all the enemy's camp equipage and transportation, even to his cups. The number of tents will probably reach two hundred, and more than sixty wagons. Their killed and wounded will amount to fully one hundred and fifty, with at least one hundred prisoners, and more coming in constantly. I know already of ten officers killed and prisoners.

Their retreat was complete. I occupied Beverly by a rapid march. Garnett abandoned his camp early this morning, leaving much of his equipage. He came within a few miles of Beverly, but our rapid march turned him back in great confusion, and he is now retreating on the road to St. George.

General Morris is to follow him up closely. I have telegraphed for the two Pennsylvania regiments at Cumberland to join General Hill at Rowlesburg. The General is concentrating all his troops at Rowlesburg, and will cut off Garnett's retreat near West Union, or if possible at St. George.

I may say that we have driven out some ten thousand troops, strongly intrenched, with the loss of eleven killed and thirty-five wounded. Provision returns found here show Garnett's force to have been ten thousand men. They were Eastern Virginians, Georgians, Tennesseeans, and, I think, Carolinians. To-morrow I can give full details as to prisoners, &c. I trust that General Cox has by this time drawn Wise out of the Kanawha Valley. In that case I shall have accomplished the object of liberating Western Virginia. I hope the General-in-Chief will approve of my operations.

G. B. McCLELLAN, Major-General, Department of Ohio.

What better proof can be advanced in support of the ripe judgment of General Scott than the present movements of the Federal forces, which are rapidly and securely closing in an armed cordon the great army of the rebels in Virginia? From all points columns are marching down. Those who were at Gallipolis, on the west, are en route for Ripley, on the other side of the Ohio, while at Charlestown, Parkersburg, Belpre, &c., are Ohio troops. At Grafton, Buckhannon, Philippi, &c., are Union forces, under General McClellan, his headquarters being at Buckhannon. At Cumberland the Eleventh Indiana Regiment, Colonel Wallace, is stationed, supported at the State line by two regiments of the Pennsylvania reserve corps. At Martinsburg and surrounding places to the north banks of the Potomac, and including Hagerstown, Williamsport, Frederick, &c., are various portions of General Patterson's forces. At Harper's Ferry, Colonel Stone is in command. Along the north bank of the Potomac River to Washington are scattered battalions of the District militia, while in Washington, Georgetown, &c., are large forces under General Mansfield. Across the river, in Alexandria, Arlington, &c., are nearly forty thousand troops under the charge of General McDowell.

As they approach the rebels are beaten back, dispirited and disheartened. These falling back upon the main bodies, thoroughly demoralized by defeat, cannot but have a disastrous effect upon the whole by lessening their confidence in their own invincibility. The whole plan of the campaign displays consummate military knowledge, aided by experience and foresight, and the result is as certain and inevitable as death.

Gen. McClellan has gained another victory. On Sunday, the 14th, he attacked and defeated the rebel force of about 10,000 men, under General Garnett, who was killed in the action. This battle took place about eight miles from St. George, at a place called Carracksford, a small village. Garnett was ex-Congressman for Virginia.

Carracksford, eight miles from St. George, where Garnett was killed, is about twenty-five miles north of Beverley, where McClellan now is, thirteen miles east of Philippi, and about fifteen miles west of the Alleghany Mountains.

All the camp equipage was taken, together with many prisoners. Fifty of the rebels were killed. It was a total rout.

The first sitting of the court-martial on Colonel Allen took place on Saturday, the 13th of July, at Fortress Monroe. The court is composed of the colonels of the various regiments there and at Newport News. Colonel Duryea was objected to by Colonel Allen's counsel, on account of his well-known prejudice against the accused, and the objection was allowed. There are several counts against Colonel Allen, such as disobedience of orders in burning property, in disregarding the passes and protections granted by General Butler, and in breaking his parole and going beyond his limits when under arrest. He denies all the charges except the last, to which he pleads guilty. This alone will render his dismissal from the service a certainty, without the Commander-in-Chief or the President should interpose, which is improbable.

Another of Jeff. Davis's pirate ships has turned up in the Mexican waters. It is the Sumpter, the privateer that escaped from New Orleans some time ago. She had taken several of our Northern merchantmen into a Cuban port called Cienfuegos, and had left them there to await the decision of the Spanish courts, as the privateer was compelled to sail again before the expiration of the twenty-four hours. One vessel the pirate had burned. The Governor had telegraphed our Consul in Havana, and the question will be the subject of considerable discussion between ourselves and Spain. We now see how much more friendly the British Order in Council was towards us than that of either Spain or France.

At St. Petersburg, Russia, we hear that a captain had been imprisoned for hoisting the Confederate flag, which the Government of Russia will not recognize.

PERSONAL.

CHARLES M. JEFFERDS, who was arrested July 1860, on suspicion of having murdered his father-in-law, Mr. Walten, and Mr. Mathews, was tried for the offence on Wednesday and Thursday, the 10th and 11th of July, and acquitted. He called no witnesses, but left all to his counsel, Mr. Brady, whose speech in his defence was most eloquent and conclusive. It is considered a most remarkable case, since everything was left to the counsel's ability. The jury was out about twenty minutes.

MR. BONNER, of the Ledger, has presented a thousand dollars to the families of the Massachusetts Volunteers. It is a great reflection upon our Government that what ought to be a national duty is left to mere popular impulse. Such neglect is calculated to create disaffection in the army. Heroes are but men, and do not like to be neglected.

COL. MAGRUDER sent back to Fortress Monroe, on the 8th, the watch found on the person of the late Major Winthrop.

NATHAN THOMPSON, the American boatbuilder, who constructs a complete gunboat of one hundred tons by steam, in five hours from the time the keel is laid, has lately astonished the Londoners by introducing the American style of advertising. On the 18th June the London Star appeared with one entire page taken up by his advertisement.

THE New York World, on the 12th, gives a list of twenty-two slave captains tried in New York, all of whom were acquitted. It also adds that the slavers for the last twelve years have been owned by New York merchants.

GEN. BUCKNER, Commander of the State Guard of Kentucky, and who was inclined to Secessionism, has had an interview with his old Commander, Gen Scott, which has had the effect of fixing his wavering faith. He has resigned the command of the State Guard, and has resolved to fight for the Union.

GEN. J. S. RAINS, one of Gov. Jackson's Brigadiers, and who is reported killed at Carthage in the action with Col. Siegel's regiment, was a south-west Missourian politician and a supporter of the Bell-Everett ticket. He was run by the Union men in the last election, for Congress. His treachery has led to his early grave.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL THOS. A. HARRIS, who, at the head of about 1,600 rebel troops, attacked Col. Smith of the Sixteenth Illinois Regiment (600 men), near Monroe Station of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, was the late Speaker of the Missouri House of Representatives. He is a son-in-law of Com. Porter. He was at the late election a strong Union man, and a Bell and Everett man.

AFTER all, it appears that it was Alessandro Amodio, the celebrated baritone, who died, and not his brother, as we, in common with other papers, stated. Alessandro was born in Naples, in 1831, of an old and respectable family. His father is now the editor of the Official Journal in that city. At an early age he displayed uncommon musical talent, and placed himself under the care of some of the best Italian masters. He made his first appearance on the stage in the Teatro di San Carlo, and was so enthusiastically received that the manager of the opera at Florence engaged him for three successive seasons. He then appeared at Milan, after which M. Strakosch secured his services for the American people. His success was unbounded wherever he went. He extended his tour to Havana, and still later to Caraccas, Venezuela, and was on his way home from the latter place when he died of a fever.

IT is said that the A. Alison, who has written a reply to Cassius M. Clay's letter to the London Times, is not the celebrated historian, but an obscure author in London.

CONSIDERABLE inquiries have been made after the nine Senators who were missing on the recent division. Mr. Breckinridge was one of the absent Legislators.

IN consequence of the victory of Mace over Hurst, the Stalybridge Giant, it is said, that Heenan is about to take another trip to England, to win the Champion's Belt.

JESSEN's Sakoo has been very generally introduced into the army as a perfect preventive of the diseases arising from a change of water. It is at once a blood purifier and a tonic.

A MOST deplorable accident happened on the evening of the 9th, at the residence of the poet, Longfellow. While his amiable wife was lighting some sealing wax some of it fell upon her dress, which immediately took fire, and despite the utmost efforts on the part of Professor Longfellow, she was so fatally injured that she died next day. The poet himself was much burned in extinguishing the flames.

THE Richmond Dispatch is certainly the Southern Budget of Fun, for it facetiously informs its serious readers, that "as the contraband of war, otherwise Bombastes Furioso Butler's niggers, are caught, they are shipped off to Cuba, where they are sold for the benefit of Abe Lincoln, Thurlow Weed, Horace Greeley and Parson Beecher!" The force of burlesque can go no further.

SELAH MATHEWS, of Rochester, an able and honest lawyer of Rochester, while pleading in court on Friday, was seized with an apoplectic fit, and died soon after.

JOHN W. ELLIS, Governor of North Carolina, died at the Red Sulphur Springs, Monroe Co., Virginia, on the 7th. At the commencement of the rebellion he was a Union man, but was terrified into joining the Secession ranks. It is said that he died of remorse.

MRS. FREMONT has arrived from California, and her gallant husband, having seen his Jessie, is going to give jesse to the Secessionists.

PETER VAN BUSKIRK, of Washington, is ninety-nine years old. He was on the Revolutionary pension list as a private. As such he had received five dollars a month. But he claimed to have been assistant forage master, and he recently found the evidence to establish his claim. He is therefore awarded arrearages to the amount of sixteen thousand two hundred dollars.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

MARYLAND, BALTIMORE.—Matters are very quiet. The vigor of General Banks achieved this result. Colonel Kenley has resigned his position as Provost-Marshal, and a sound Union man, Mr. Dodge, was appointed Marshal. The state of seige has been removed. Colonel Richard Thomas, alias the French Lady, has been indicted for treason and piracy. It appears that this redoubtable bit of crinoline has a small schooner in the waters of the Potomac and Patuxent, where he has led a sort of half-pirate-patriotic life, so charmingly painted by Cooper. The steamer Chester, which was sent down the bay to capture it, returned at midnight, having failed to make the capture, though they got on her track. The schooner had stopped at Millstone Landing on the Patuxent. She had about thirty men on board, all well armed. The Union gunboat Ben Wood was put on her track, and she will likely be captured soon. The De Kalb regiment passed through Baltimore on the 11th in perfect quiet, on its way to Washington. Nevertheless, there is considerable sullen discontent in the Maryland mind.

EASTERN VIRGINIA.—The gunboat Freeborn has been cruising at night for some time past between Aquia Creek and the mouth of the river. On Sunday two large oil tanks were seen floating toward the squadron, near the creek. One of them struck the rudder of the Resolute and sank. The other was overhauled, and a fuse attached to it put out. On examination it proved to have a cylinder five feet long and eighteen inches in diameter, made of boiler iron. This was filled with many kinds of destructive elements. It was an infernal machine, constructed to destroy the squadron. Its weight was about four hundred pounds. The cylinder was connected with the cask by a fuse, coated with India rubber. The machine has been taken to the Washington Navy Yard, where it has attracted much attention.

MATHIAS POINT.—A person, who passed within half a mile of this point in a boat, reports all was still, and that the rebels had raised no batteries, or, if they had, they had removed them.

CAPE HENRY.—The privateer Jeff. Davis appears to have been doing a thriving business around the Capes of Delaware lately, and even up as far as Nantucket, it is reported, she has been seen. Several vessels arriving at ports in New England make mention of the cruiser, and state that they were chased by her. One or two English vessels have been overhauled by the Davis, but released upon their character being known. Quite an excitement seems to have been aroused by the daring of the rover. Several revenue cutters have been sent after the pirate. The Jeff. Davis was the Washington, which was seized by the rebel authorities at New Orleans last December. It is commanded by a renegade United States naval officer. From Capt. Gentler's report, it would seem that the course of this pirate extended from the mouth of the Chesapeake even to New York.

FORTRESS MONROE.—Everything here remains in statu quo. The troops are becoming better drilled every day, and the scouting parties are constantly on the watch. Captain Hammill, of the Ninth Volunteers, with a detachment of his company, had a brush with the rebels about seven miles from Newport News, in which he compelled them to retire. There were none wounded on the Federal side, while Captain Hammill reports two killed and three wounded on the side of the enemy. The want of cavalry is much felt, and orders have been issued to furnish General Butler with a regiment. This, however, will be a work of time, as it requires at least six months to get cavalry in order. The Naval Brigade were doing good service, and deserve better treatment than they had received. The troops were complaining loudly of the neglect of Mr. Cameron in not paying them. The delay had so disgusted them that there would be trouble in raising more men. There is always money to pay swindles and jobs, such as Catalino buralugs, &c., but none for the gallant men whose families are starving in New York.

An unfortunate event occurred on Friday, the 12th July. A scouting party of thirty-seven men of Bendix's regiment, under command of Lieutenants Hevronger and Meschbeck, fell into an ambuscade, about nine miles above Newport News, and lost thirteen men, including the two lieutenants. Several of the enemy were killed. Seven companies of the regiment went out in the afternoon and picked up some of the stragglers. This expedition was undertaken without Colonel Phelps or Colonel Bendix's consent or even knowledge. There seems to be no controlling power in this camp, every officer acting on his own judgment.

TENNESSEE, MEMPHIS.—A regiment of rebels left this city last week, to join Governor Jackson, of Missouri.

NASHVILLE.—The Union feeling is growing stronger here every day. The drunken, swaggering conduct of the Confederate troops throughout the State has worked a very wholesome change. All the most respectable Secessionists are alarmed at the prospect of a reign of terror and blood.

The Nashville Banner says: "Let us tell the Jeffersonian, then, and all others who, to gratify a personal preference or party prejudice, are anxious to break through an immemorial custom by re-electing Governor Harris, that such a course will inevitably disrupt the State, and drive East Tennessee into rebellion. This is plain talk; but we want the people of Middle and West Tennessee to understand the true position of affairs. The August election will decide the destiny of Tennessee, and have an important bearing upon the history of the whole Southern movement. An effort will be made—is already being made—to induce the people of East Tennessee to vote for separation from the State. The friends of acquiescence there, among whom may be counted some of the leading men who voted the Union ticket on the 8th of June, will make an effort to save the people from so suicidal a decision. To attempt to force upon them for Governor, for a third term, in violation of all precedent, the man most obnoxious to them, of all others in the State, is to manifest a desire to drive them into rebellion, and into the attempt to create a free State in our very midst, rather than to seek to conciliate and disabuse them."

The Nashville Union is so badly off for paper that it offers three cents a pound for rags, to be paid for as subscriptions.

ILLINOIS, CAIRO.—It is reported that there are at Point Pleasant, Mo., 2,000 rebels preparing to attack Bird's Point. Bird's Point is nearly opposite Cairo, and is held by General Prentiss's troops. It is also said that Colonel Aikins has superseded General Pillow in command of the troops in Memphis.

MISSOURI.—The fight at Monroe on the 11th was a very spirited affair. Colonel Smith commanded the Federal troops, and General Harris the rebels. The Chicago Times of the 12th says: "The three companies sent for the relief of Colonel Smith at Monroe, Missouri, returned last night to Hannibal, and report the roads unobstructed between Hannibal and Monroe. On arriving at the latter place, they formed a junction with Colonel Smith's force, who had entrenched themselves in the Academy Buildings. The rebels, 1,200 strong, were grouped around over the prairies, out of the reach of Colonel Smith's rifles. They had two pieces of artillery, which were brought to bear, but the distance was so great that their balls were almost spent before they reached our lines. Colonel Smith's artillery, of longer range, did considerable execution. The fight lasted until dusk. The last shot from Colonel Smith's guns dismounted one of the enemy's. Just at that moment Governor Wood, of Illinois, fell on their rear with the cavalry sent from Quincy on Wednesday, completely routing them, and taking seventy-five prisoners, one gun and a large number of horses. Twenty or thirty of the enemy were killed, but not a man of the Union forces was killed, although several were severely wounded. Colonel Smith is determined to shoot the most prominent rebels. General Thomas Harris, the rebel leader, escaped." Colonel Smith's regiment is known as the Sixteenth Illinois.

BOONE COUNTY.—A special despatch to the Democrat, from Jefferson City, says that large armed bands of rebels from Boone and Calloway counties were crossing the Missouri river, to join Governor Jackson's forces. Colonel Boernstein has sent a detachment of 250 troops and two mountain howitzers to act in conjunction with the Home Guard at Cole Camp and Syracuse, to intercept and drive them back. A squad of cavalry will also be pushed forward on General Lyon's left flank, to keep open the communication with him.

MISSISSIPPI, UNION CITY.—The Oxford Mercury states that there are 10,800 men at Union City, but they expect marching orders for Missouri every day. The Twelfth and Thirteenth Mississippi regiments have each erected a ballroom in their respective camps, and a ball is given three times a week, which are attended by large numbers of gay belles of Tennessee. The army there is well supplied with provisions and arms, and each and all are anxious to be led against Cairo, or to cross the river and co-operate with Governor Jackson.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—The Charleston Courier contains a very grandiloquent account of the "French Lady's" taking the St. Nicholas. The poor editor had not then heard of the capture of that celebrated hermaphrodite. As there appears to be considerable doubt as to his being "fish, flesh or fowl," we suggest that his punishment should be to remain "a single woman" all his life. We also learn from that paper (which seems very fond of spreading evil reports for the Secessionists) that the workshops of the Richmond Penitentiary have been destroyed by fire. As these were the great foundries of the rebels, the loss is great. We quote the Courier's own words: "Last evening the workshops of the Penitentiary were almost completely demolished by fire. The loss is very considerable, as the buildings and machinery were used in the manufacture of articles for the use of the State, which cannot well be supplied elsewhere. It is thought to have been the work of an incendiary."

LOUISIANA, NEW ORLEANS.—A reward of $100,000 has been offered for the capture of the Powhattan or Brooklyn, the United States steamers, now blockading New Orleans. The rebels had been making a "steel"-plated vessel, a la Warrior, and had covered her with railroad iron, placing her machinery below water line, to prevent the shot reaching it. They had also built a new boat completely of iron, very sharp at the bows, with a sharp point below the water line, and intended to run down the blockading ships. This vessel was to be commanded by Captain Seward Porter, formerly of Portland, Maine. It is alone by these puerile experiments that the authorities keep the deluded populace amused, otherwise affairs are in so frightful a state that à la lanterne would long ago have been the dying song of the chief conspirators. As it is, the patriotic and intelligent editor of the New York Herald was right when he said, "The Federal authorities won't have the hanging of 'one-eyed Jeff'—his deluded followers will."

The greatest sufferers in the present rebellion have been those who have most contributed to the calamity. The Southern press will be completely extinct in less than six months if the war continues. The most flourishing Arkansas paper, the Helena Shield, reduces the size three-fourths, but promises to make up for it when the war is over, and the Southern Confederacy acknowledged. The New Orleans Delta, Picayune and the smaller fry are cut down one half. They are very ferocious at London Times Russell, whom they accuse of "flagrant ingratitude!" The fact is, they thought to humbug him. The idea was preposterous—Mr. Russell, an Irishman and a barrister. They are now in a fierce discussion with Mr. Muir, the British Consul, who has exposed the lying of the New Orleans Mayor. It only wants one thing to complete the Southern cure—the bombardment of the Crescent City by a British fleet for their infamous outrages upon the rights of foreign subjects. So terribly frightened have the Creoles and Bombastes of the Crescent City become at Russell's and Muir's letters, that the authorities have issued a proclamation against the receiving of foreign citizens into their ranks.

GEORGIA.—The Augusta Constitutional offers to take the Federal postage stamps as subscriptions to their paper.

MISSOURI.—The vigor and vigilance of General Lyon are above all praise. As we have described the battle of Carthage in another place, we confine ourselves here to giving the number of troops after Governor Jackson and General Rains, with their rebels:

	Men.
General Lyon's force about	3,500
General Sweeney's force about	5,000
First Iowa Volunteers about	800
At Alton about	3,000
Captain Prince's command about	2,500
Colonel Montgomery's force about	400
Regulars from various points about	700
Total readily available	15,900

The Jefferson City Examiner says that General Watkins, of the State Guard, has encamped near Chalk Bluffs, on the Arkansas line, with a large force. It also reports that a number of Tennesseeans, Mississippians and Louisianians embarked at Memphis, on the 2d of July, in a fleet of boats of every description, and proceeded up White River.

KENTUCKY.—Matters here remain very quiet. The Council at Louisville has resolved to inquire into the kidnapping of youths to recruit the Confederate army. The State authorities have also decided that no more money shall be spent on military encampments. This will, no doubt, have the effect of disbanding the State militia, and materially strengthening the hands of the Federal powers. Colonel Stone, of the Louisville battery, and General Buckner are at issue upon the late Secession movement. In many respects the aspect of Kentucky is decidedly improved. General Buckner has seen the error of his ways and returned to the path of duty. Hence Colonel Stone's quarrel with him. The Military Council has declared that its members never had any leaning to Secession, but merely wished to maintain their State rights, and that they consider the right to be neutral as one. Of the two they prefer the Union, but they think both can be preserved.

FLORIDA, FORT PICKENS.—That indomitable body of men, true men to the gelt, albeit, somewhat in the rough—and familiarly known as Billy Wilson's Zouaves, arrived at Fort Pickens on the 24th June. A letter from an eye witness thus describes it:

Twenty-four hours ago our reinforcements were comfortably encamped on Rosas. You probably know more about them than I do. Billy Wilson's regiment got inside the lights on the 24th, and is now on Rosas Island. As I write, there is a battalion drill going on, and it looks queer enough to one who has been thirty years a regular. What the new comers lack in elegance, however, they make up in muscle. Their advent here was a grand affair, and was as noisy as you can imagine. Cheers do not describe the extraordinary roars with which every one of our vessels, and subsequently ourselves, were greeted. I sincerely doubt whether so many "tigers" were ever before heard in Florida.

Is it any wonder, then, that the regiment should be the lion of the hour? The debarkation was something whose like I never hope to look upon again. "Three cheers for Harvey Brown—tiger." "Three cheers for Billy Wilson—tiger." "Three cheers for Gen. Scott—tiger." "Three cheers for old Abe—tiger." "Three cheers for Mr. Slemmer—tiger." "Three groans for old Bragg—tiger." "Three groans for Jeff Davis—tiger." "Say, old bandy legs, fling down that fowling piece." "Hold on there, squint eye, them's my groceries." "Pull that d—d nigger overboard," and a thousand other inelegant bobbin phrases greeted my ear from the crowd, as the Vanderbilt hauled near to let them land. The weather is described as being intolerably hot.

In the meantime General Bragg remains at Pensacola with a force of rebels, variously estimated at from two thousand to five thousand men. Their discipline is bad, and they are so short of powder as not to have enough for a dozen rounds. In respect to manufactures of every description, the entire South is as helpless as children—always having depended upon the Northern States and Europe for every species of industrial production.

It is said that the rebels are erecting batteries at Fernandina, to be ready for an attack.

The Commander of the British war steamer, Jason, has again anchored near our fleet off Santa Rosa Island, after his cruise off the blockaded ports of the rebels, and he pronounces the blockade effectual.

ALABAMA, MOBILE.—Although Alabama is spared the horrors of actual warfare, the state of things is most disastrous. Trade paralysed, Mobile blockaded, and provisions at famine prices. The Mobile Advertiser takes a gloomy view of Southern prospects, and calls for more men and money, neither of which, it says, are offered with that freedom which should characterize the present conflict. It is especially savage with England, who, it says, shall never have another ounce of cotton "except under the guns of their frowning forts." It, nevertheless, is evidently pleased that Jeff. Davis has made Virginia the catspaw of the Southern fox.

BATTLE OF BEALINGTON, NEAR LAUREL HILL, VIRGINIA.

OUR Artist has sent us a sketch of a spirited affair between the Union forces, the Fourteenth Ohio and Seventh and Ninth Indiana, and a Georgian regiment, which has been considered as the crack regiment of the rebels. On the 8th July, about two o'clock in the afternoon, from a high hill in the neighborhood of Bealington, situated at the base of the Laurel mountain, two large bodies of troops were seen marching out of the enemy's camp. Instant preparations were made by our troops to resist the attack. At four o'clock in the afternoon skirmishing by the Fourteenth Ohio and Ninth Indiana commenced. The enemy advanced under cover of the wood, when our skirmishers rushed at them, pouring a sharp volley into their midst. The enemy's cavalry then advanced, upon which the Federal skirmishers retreated, when the two six-pounders of Colonel Barnett's First Ohio battery threw a couple of shells into the midst of the cavalry, who retired under cover of the wood. The Ohio troops then poured another volley and sent several shells into the wood, which did so much execution that the officers could not rally them. The loss of the enemy was about twenty killed and forty wounded, so a prisoner informed the commanding officer. The Union loss was two killed and six wounded. The enemy fell back after the skirmish, and the wood where the Georgians had sheltered themselves was taken possession of by the Ninth Indiana.

The Fourteenth Ohio regiment was commanded by Colonel Steedman, the Seventh Indiana by Colonel Dumont, and the Ninth Indiana by Colonel Milroy. Our sketch was taken at five o'clock in the afternoon, when parts of all three regiments were engaged, and when that panic took place in the Georgian regiment, which is thus described by one of the prisoners: "One shell fell right in the midst of their camp, and created the utmost consternation." He also says the Georgians refused to come down to the woods opposite our advance position again, and were all very much astonished and terrified.

HOUSE BUILT BY MARSHAL KANE ON GALLOWS HILL, BALTIMORE, MD.

OUR sketch represents the house or storehouse built by Marshal Kane upon Gallows Hill, after the attack upon the Massachusetts troops by the mob in the streets of Baltimore, on the 19th of April. The rebel Marshal needed some place to store the arms with which he hoped to give aid and comfort to the enemy, and he erected the building which we represent for that disloyal purpose. It cannot boast of much architectural beauty, but it is handsome enough for the vile purpose to which it was to be devoted. Its location on Gallows Hill is unpleasantly suggestive of the possible fate of somebody. The Thirteenth regiment (Brooklyn) of New York State Militia now hold possession of it, and the arms found therein will be placed in loyal hands and used for the punishment of rebels and the salvation of the Union.

CONFEDERATE WAR STEAMER IN PENSACOLA HARBOR.

A CORRESPONDENT in Fort Pickens has sent us a sketch of an immense war steamer, which he denominates the "Flagship of the Home Squadron of the Southern Confederacy." He also states (he does not give his authority) that Admiral Renshaw is in command of her, and that he is burning Uncle Sam's coal without paying for the same. This proceeding, to say the least of it, is undignified, and, we think Admiral Renshaw should "pay up." There is this excuse, however, for the "Admiral," that his business is to ply between Pensacola and the Navy Yard there, and that if he wanted to go to Washington to settle his accounts, he can't get out unless he destroys Fort Pickens and takes our fleet, outside the harbor, in detail.

THE RIP-RAPS.

THIS famous place really commands the entrance of James River, being about one thousand nine hundred yards from Fortress Monroe, and between three to four miles from the opposite shore. It was formerly called Willoughby's Bank, after the English navigator, and was a sandbank. It has since been artificially raised by throwing on it masses of stone, on which Castle Calhoun, or the Fortress of Rip Raps is in course of construction. The aspect of the place is very rough and savage, and the moaning of the sea waves, as they burst upon the rocks, is the very melody of wild desolation. The name is derived from the effect which the unremitting ripples have had upon the shoal. The foundation of Castle Calhoun was laid in 1826. Since the occupation of Fortress Monroe and Newport News by the Federal troops, under the command of General Butler, several guns have been erected on the Rip-Raps, the latest and most efficient of which is called the Sawyer gun, a rifled cannon of great power. The experiments made have been so successful, that the rebels have been compelled to place their battery on Sewall's Point nearly a mile further back. With Fortress Monroe in our possession, the Rip-Raps can prevent the passage of any vessels into James River.

THE BATTLE NEAR CARTHAGE, MO.

THE State troops were posted on a ridge in a prairie, with five pieces of artillery, one twelve pounder in the centre, two six pounders on the right and left, cavalry on each flank, and infantry in the rear.

The artillery of Colonel Siegel approached within eight hundred yards, with four cannon in the centre, a body of infantry and a six pounder, under Lieutenant Colonel Hassendeubel on the left, Colonel Solomon's command with a six-pounder on the right, and a body of infantry behind the centre artillery.

Colonel Siegel's left opened fire with sharpness, and soon the engagement became general. The rebels had no grape, and their artillerists being poor, their balls flew over the heads of the Unionists. After two hours' firing the enemy's artillery was entirely silenced and their ranks broken. About 1,500 cavalry then attempted to outflank Siegel and cut off his baggage train, which was three miles back, when a retrograde movement was ordered. The train was reached in good order, surrounded by infantry and artillery, and the retreat of the Union troops continued until a point was reached where the road passed through a high bluff on each side, where the enemy's cavalry were posted in large numbers. By a feint, as if intending to pass round the bluff, Siegel drew the cavalry in a solid body into the road at a distance of one hundred and fifty yards from his position, when by a rapid movement of his artillery he poured a heavy cross fire of canister into their ranks. At the same time the infantry charged at a "double quick," and in ten minutes the State troops scattered in every direction. Eighty-five riderless horses were captured, and sixty-five shot guns and a number of revolvers and bowie-knives were picked up from the ground.

Colonel Siegel did not surround Carthage, as reported, but attempted to reach a piece of woods north of the town, and after two hours' desperate fighting, in which all the forces on both sides were engaged, and in which the enemy lost nearly two hundred killed, he succeeded in doing so; and the rebels retired to Carthage, and Siegel fell back on Sarcoxie, whence he proceeded next day to Mount Vernon.

GRAND UNION ARMY IN AND APPROACHING VIRGINIA.

THERE are now ready for immediate action the following divisions:

Central Division, commanded by General Patterson	25,000
North-East Division, by General McDowell	40,000
North West Division, by General McClellan	45,000
South-East Division, by General Butler	20,000
Washington Division, by General Mansfield	40,000
Baltimore Division, by General Banks	10,000
Colonel Stone's Division	5,400
Men	185,400

LOUIS XIV., who loved a laconic style, met a priest whilst travelling in the country, and, ordering him to stop, asked him, hastily, "Whence come you? Where are you going? What do you want?" The priest, who knew perfectly well the King's disposition, instantly replied, "From Bruges—to Paris—a benefice." "You shall have it," replied the King, and in a few days he presented him to a valuable living.

GREAT CONFLAGRATION IN EAST ALBANY, N. Y., ON THE NIGHT OF THE 5TH OF JULY, 1861—TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF THE FREIGHT DEPOTS OF THE ALBANY AND BOSTON RAILROAD CO., TOGETHER WITH ALL THEIR CONTENTS AND SEVERAL LOADED CANAL BOATS LOSS OF PROPERTY OVER HALF A MILLION OF DOLLARS.—FROM A SKETCH TAKEN ON THE SPOT ON THE 6TH INST.—SEE PAGE 159.

FORT CALHOUN, ON THE RIP-RAPS, SITUATED BETWEEN FORTRESS MONROE AND SEWALL'S POINT, IN HAMPTON ROADS, VA.—SKETCHED FROM THE GUNBOAT QUAKER CITY BY J. L. PENKE, ESQ.—SEE PAGE 147.

The flames were overhead and all around the boat. The father of the child got on a point opposite where the boat lay. The mother halloed to the father to catch the child, and almost simultaneously with the remark threw the child to the father. It did not reach him, and it fell into the water. The mother jumped in after it, but, sad to relate, the child was drowned. The mother, however, was saved.

In less than two hours time the large freight depot, about eight hundred feet in length, and upwards of one hundred feet in width; the freight depot on the north side of the canal, at least four hundred feet in length; the passenger depot, two hundred feet in length; the business office of the Company; the bridge leading across the canal from the main depot; between forty and fifty cars, mostly for freight; half a dozen canal boats; hundreds of feet of platform; and quite a large quantity of freight were one immense pile of ruins, the flames dancing to and fro, as if in sporting glee over their work of destruction—the aggregate loss amounting to half a million of dollars.

GREAT FIRE IN EAST BOSTON ON THE FOURTH OF JULY.

Shortly after noon on the 4th of July, a fire broke out in East Boston, near the shipyards. It commenced in a rigger's loft, a wooden building, on Aspinwall's wharf, and spread along the inflammable material with a rapidity and a fierceness which defied all the efforts of the firemen to extinguish or control it. From Aspinwall's it spread to Snelling's and Mickerson's wharves, laying everything in ashes, including the salt refinery, a building one hundred feet square, and the immense foundry of the East Boston Iron Company. It then attacked Clinton Wharf, and spread to the Dry Dock, and afterwards to the shipyard of Samuel Hall, burning the whole square of the Timber Dock Company, which was bounded by three blocks, covered with poor dwelling-houses, all of which were destroyed, rendering at least two hundred families houseless. It spared nothing. Whatever the flames touched was ruthlessly and completely destroyed. The loss is immense, and is not the less disastrous because a large amount of the property was insured. In addition to the buildings swept away by this tremendous conflagration, much damage was done to the vessels at the wharves. The following is a list of the vessels burned: Bark Mystery, Boston; brig Orella, brig Henry Matthews, Searsport; brig Fanny O. Field, schooner T. A. Hawkins, schooner Dashaway, schooner M. A. McNiel, Philadelphia—all totally destroyed. Bark Edward C. Hill lost main and mizenmasts. A large number of vessels were towed into the stream and saved. Fortunately not a single life was lost.

There is at the present time in the woods belonging to the Earl of Dudley, at Himley, Staffordshire, a blackbird, who claps his wings and crows like a domestic cock. Hundreds have been to see and hear this bird, and various are the conjectures as to how he learned to imitate chanticleer. No other blackbirds were ever known to do so before, although they must have heard the cock crow as well as he; neither has any person in the neighborhood lost a tame one. So the thing is a mystery.

ERLE GOWER;

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER LV.

LORD KINGSWOOD arrived at Brighton shortly after Lady Kingswood and Lady Maud had quitted it. He was made acquainted with their abrupt departure immediately he reached the house Lady Kingswood had engaged. He resolved to return to London the same night, but as he had ordered a horse in he brought to the door that he might take a ride before dinner, a habit he had contracted, he mounted it on its being announced, and galloped along the King's Road, to encounter the Marquis of Chillingham, Ishmael and Erle in one damning group.

Before the eve had become night he was within his library in London again, pacing it in a hot and feverish state, and with his brain filled with maddening thoughts, not alone with respect to Vernon and the boy, who he seemed to feel was his son, but because he fancied that he detected lurking upon the calm, undemonstrative face of the Marquis of Chillingham a triumphant, mocking smile.

He had not forgotten that Chillingham had been one of the first suitors Lady Kingswood had in the preceding years of their married life, he had not hitherto thought of it, except to serve as the vehicle for some pleasantry; he remembered it now.

Apparently, however, he had no cause for jealous alarm. Lady Kingswood had passed through London with Lady Maud St. Clair, and was at Kingswood Hall. Chillingham was at Brighton. In a day or two he would be in London, and he would see him daily, either at the House of Peers or in council.

The marquis and Lady Kingswood would thus be apart, and without a probability of their meeting; still he was haunted by jealous doubts of both as by a spectre. His fears, too, were perhaps the greater from the very determined character of Lady Kingswood's conduct towards himself.

He met the Marquis of Chillingham, as he had calculated, almost daily. Tacitly, their former intimate relations cooled, their greetings became more distant, and their bearing to each other more haughty.

Daily communications from Kingswood assured him that Lady Kingswood remained in seclusion at the Hall, his own eyes told him that the marquis did not quit London.

Time went slowly on, and those affairs in which he was most deeply interested remained perfectly stationary. He heard nothing of Ishmael or his menaces of disclosure; he and his companions, so terrible though so fair to look upon, had disappeared, and Cyril had suddenly, instead of acting in direct hostility to his wish, become constant in his attentions to Eleanore Cotton.

Perhaps this lull augured a tolerable ending to the stormy period he had passed through. As if to give some affirmative color to this presumptive aspiration, Pharisee appeared one night suddenly before him.

He glided into the room, and stood by Lord Kingswood's side ere he heard him enter.

Lord Kingswood, on catching sight of him, leaped to his feet, for Pharisee was so disguised he did not know him.

"Pray, my lord, be seated," cried Pharisee, in low, hurried tone; "be not disturbed or alarmed; it is I, your faithful and devoted servant, Pharisee. I have great and important news for your lordship."

Lord Kingswood, recovering his composure, regarded him sternly.

"What is the meaning of this mummery, man?" he said, in a slow, scornful voice.

"It means, my lord, that my life is not for the present safe in my natural appearance," he returned in a whisper. "My lord, my lord, I have, at the peril of my life, obtained for you information of the utmost value to your future peace of mind; and when I tell your lordship that, concealed, I overheard Horace Vernon, Esquire, of Eaton Square and Huntingford confer with that old man of whom I have spoken to your lordship—when I inform your lordship that, believing themselves to be alone, they let out secrets worth half your lordship's fortune to purchase—you will say I could hardly have bought those secrets too dearly at the risk of my life."

He paused, for he saw that Lord Kingswood bent upon him a searching, anxious, tremblingly-eager gaze.

"Go on, Pharisee, my good, faithful fellow," cried his lordship, excitedly, as Pharisee did not attempt to proceed beyond what he had stated. "Do not keep me in suspense; it is possible what you may have to communicate may prove invaluable to me."

"I believe it will, my lord," returned Pharisee; "but your lordship will remember that, while you are great, powerful and wealthy, I am but a poor servant."

"Pharisee, you shall have no cause to doubt my liberality if your information be of the service to me which you intimate it is," returned his lordship, hastily.

"Pardon me, my lord, if I appear mercenary," returned Pharisee, slowly, purposely to increase his lordship's eagerness, "but liberality is but a vague term. I am but a poor servant, and I am anxious to secure an income for my declining years. I have drawn up a small paper——"

He drew one from his breast as he spoke, but Lord Kingswood frowned, and said, hastily and sternly,

"I am not accustomed to make terms of such a kind, especially with one who ought to know that my liberality is not a vague term."

"Your lordship has done well to correct me," returned Pharisee, craftily. "It is because of my knowledge of your lordship's bounty and liberality that I have presumed to draw up this paper, which is simply an agreement to pay me an annuity for life, as I shall almost immediately have to fly my country."

"Fly your country!" cried Lord Kingswood, with surprise, "on what account, man?"

"Upon your lordship's account, solely and wholly upon your lordship's, I assure you," he replied, with a cringing bow. "And, therefore, my lord, in order to avoid delay, I have prepared this paper for your lordship to sign in my favor," subjoined Pharisee, tendering, with fingers that slightly trembled, the paper he had already produced.

"What is the positive purport of this document?" asked Lord Kingswood, in an impatient tone, as he snatched rather than took the paper out of Pharisee's hand.

"It is only a simple agreement, my lord, to secure to me, for the remainder of my life, a small annuity in the event of certain information, communicated by me to you, proving of such importance as would induce you, without the compulsory assistance of any such instrument as this, to grant it."

Lord Kingswood opened it, and observed that it was very lengthy for an agreement of such a character; but Pharisee rather anxiously assured him that it contained only the necessary and usual provisions to make it a legal instrument.

"Enough," said Lord Kingswood, displaying some irritability of manner. "I presume, after so many years' servitude with me, I can trust you in so simple a matter as this. Where is my signature to be affixed?"

"There, my lord," replied Pharisee, pointing out the space left for the purpose.

Lord Kingswood seized a pen and scrawled his accustomed signature on the spot indicated, and then handed the paper back to Pharisee, whose fingers absolutely clutched it as they took possession of it. Carefully applying some blotting-paper to the wet ink, he dried it, folded the paper, and put it into his vest with a gleam of triumph upon his face.

"Having complied with your request," observed Lord Kingswood, "proceed to acquaint me with the conversation you overheard, and which you declare to be of such importance to me."

"My lord, one fact must be of primary importance to you, I believe," said Pharisee, "and that is the death of the mother of Mr. Erle Gower."

A livid tint rendered the features of Lord Kingswood for a moment ghastly, and in a low voice he replied,

"Most important."

"Your lordship is, I have no doubt, conscious that Mr. Vernon, of Huntingford, is deeply interested in Mr. Erle's affairs?"

"You referred to an event," he said; "confine yourself for the present to that."

"I merely, my lord, intended to preface what I had to say on that point," returned Pharisee, "by informing your lordship that the old knave, of whom I have several times spoken to your lordship, is Mr. Vernon's secret agent, and has been engaged by him from the time a false charge was brought against the mother of Mr. Erle up to the present moment."

"His secret agent?" echoed Lord Kingswood, with a look of inquiry.

"Yes, my lord. When the lady to whom I have alluded disappeared, I suppose from her friends, this old man Pengreep was employed by Mr. Vernon to track her," continued Pharisee.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Lord Kingswood, sharply. "With what success?"

"To give his own words," answered Pharisee, "he said that he had in his possession written notes of all the incidents of some trial which the lady had to undergo, her acquittal and subsequent death and burial, a description of the place where she was interred, together with all the necessary official papers relating to it."

"Death and interment! are you sure of that?" exclaimed Lord Kingswood, with eager excitement.

"Quite sure, my lord," returned Pharisee. "That was not all: he not only pointed to a chest in which the documents of which he spoke were, he said, deposited, but also stated that the same box contained the certificate of your marriage with the mother of Mr. Erle."

Lord Kingswood started and caught Pharisee by the arm.

"My good Pharisee," he said, in an earnest tone, "are you sure—quite sure—that he said the mother of Mr. Erle?"

"Yes—let me remember—a—well—a no—I am not sure on that point," answered Pharisee, dubiously; but added, quickly, "I am sure that he said he was in possession of the certificate of the marriage and the official register——"

"Extracted from the book?" exclaimed Lord Kingswood.

"From what I gathered, my lord, I should say subtracted—torn out," replied Pharisee.

"I have some reason to believe that your supposition is correct," observed Lord Kingswood. "But proceed, your information is indeed interesting and important to me."

"It will prove, my lord, yet more deeply interesting to you, I suspect," continued Pharisee, rubbing one hand slowly over the other. "The death of the lady is an important fact."

"A most important fact," repeated Lord Kingswood.

"So, my lord, is that of the death of the clergyman who performed the ceremony of marriage between you and the lady of whom we have been speaking."

A low groan burst from Lord Kingswood's lips.

"The individual who performed the—the ceremony was not—was not—I have, I think, the strongest authority to believe, an ordained clergyman of the Church of England," said his lordship, in a hesitating tone.

"But an impostor?" suggested Pharisee.

"In that sense—yes," replied his lordship.

"My lord, have you any objection to name to me the authority?" asked Pharisee. "Your lordship can depend upon my secrecy."

"I quite believe I can, Pharisee, in this matter, at least," returned Lord Kingswood. "The fact is, Sir Harris Stanhope in some degree assisted me in the—in the—intri—a—I should say—affair, and he subsequently assured me, and does at the present moment positively assert, that the person engaged was not a clergyman."

"Sir Harris Stanhope, my lord, has an interest in deceiving you," replied Pharisee. "The clergyman was his friend, but some years since a quarrel took place between them which was never healed. The reverend gentleman married a lady of fortune, changed his name and residence, and his death has been known only through his adopted name."

Lord Kingswood, in a state of nervous excitement, paced up and down the room for a few moments, his breast filled with tumultuous emotions; several times he essayed to speak, but found it impossible to do so. At length, after wiping the clammy moisture from his forehead, and drawing several deep breaths, he returned to Pharisee.

"I think, then, my faithful Pharisee," he said, still panting for breath, "that I am to understand that the—the unhappy lady who has given me much cause lately for uneasiness is—is dead, and has been so for many years?"

"Exactly so, my lord," returned Pharisee, with a bend of the head.

"And that the clergyman, being dead, no living witnesses of the ceremony can now be produced?" continued Lord Kingswood.

"Precisely so, my lord," returned Pharisee, with a cunning leer upon his sallow face. "The case stands thus: whatever may really have happened in past years to compromise your lordship's position cannot now be proved, save by documents, and we all know that such documents as certificates and attesting papers can be forged to serve a purpose. The real position in which you now stand, my lord, may be understood by your lordship from the following words which Mr. Vernon addressed to old Pengreep—'Lord Kingswood must not know of this clergyman's death, or my revenge and his atonement will for ever be crushed in this world.' I heard him say this distinctly, and your lordship will, no doubt, comprehend the words better than I can explain them."

"They are obligations of a very important and valuable kind," continued Lord Kingswood, "and I appreciate them as such. I refer to the documents and papers of which you have spoken."

"I have, my lord, already had them in my possession," returned Pharisee, a crawling, creeping sensation running over his frame. "I, in fact, my lord, purloined them, and believed that I had made good my escape with them; but I was overtaken, they were wrested from me, and hence the necessity for my flight."

"I will protect you," said Lord Kingswood, a sudden thought flashing through his brain. "But I need not appear in the matter. You say that your belief is those papers were for the most part obtained surreptitiously?"

"There can be no doubt of it, my lord," returned Pharisee.

"Well, in that case," rejoined Lord Kingswood, quickly, "this man Pengreep cannot pursue you for trying to obtain possession of what he has himself stolen."

Pharisee started; this was placing his position in a new form with respect to Pengreep. But Albertina? He groaned at the very thought of her. The memory of the license, the ring, the have and to hold, for better for worse, almost made him sink into the earth.

"Where did you say this man lived?" inquired Lord Kingswood.

"Gray's Mount," returned Pharisee, scarcely, for the moment, knowing what he was saying.

Lord Kingswood made an entry in his tablets.

"I suppose the fellow can be reached with gold?" observed Lord Kingswood.

"No doubt, my lord," returned Pharisee, still musingly.

"What if we were to open negotiations with him?" suggested Lord Kingswood. "Now we know the commodity he has to part with, we shall be in a position to make an offer. Possessing certain information, they are of much less value than they would have been under other circumstances. We can afford, however, to be liberal, for I do not deny that I am very anxious to obtain every scrap of paper relative to this accursed affair, and destroy, obliterate all, so that not a vestige of it shall remain to trouble me more."

"I am afraid, my lord, that you would find him treacherous," suggested Pharisee.

"And he would find me wary," returned Lord Kingswood. "An idea has occurred to me which I think we can carry out. I will cause a search-warrant to be obtained, by which his premises can be entered and examined, and, having that in our hands, we appoint a meeting with him—propose terms; if he refuses, he shall be taken into custody, on a charge of stealing a page from a parish register book, and while he is in confinement we will search his house. You have said that you know the chest in which the documents we want are placed?"

"I do, my lord," returned Pharisee.

"We will then secure the papers, liberate him, and let him take his remedy. We shall have in our possession the proofs of his delinquency, and his bite will be harmless. I will attend to this at the earliest moment in the morning. You shall then contrive an interview with this man Pengreep——"

"But, my lord, he has already threatened to give me into the custody of the police if he catches me, and he is the man to keep his word; besides——"

Pharisee hesitated.

"Besides what?" interrupted Lord Kingswood, seeing that Pharisee had yet something to reveal which he had not communicated.

Before he could reply, a servant entered the room, bringing a letter upon a gold salver for Lord Kingswood.

A frown settled on his brow, and his face a shade paler than before.

"MY LORD—We are instructed by our client, Mr. Vernon, of Eaton-square, to apply to you for the sum of five thousand pounds, the cost of twenty years' maintenance, education, &c., of your son, Mr. Erle Kingswood, and to inform you that unless the same be paid to us, with our costs, before twelve o'clock to-morrow morning, process will be immediately issued against you. In the event of your lordship disputing this claim, your lordship will, perhaps, favor us with the name of the solicitors who act for your lordship. We have the honor to be, your lordship's obedient servants,

"WINDER, TARRALL & PITSTUMP."

"I heard Mr. Vernon say something about going to the Attorney-General's, but I could hardly catch what it was," said Pharisee, rather hastily; "but I heard him say also that he was afraid the storm had passed over, and would leave you scatheless; and he said likewise that Mr. Erle had left him, and had behaved ungratefully, so I think your lordship may toss that letter behind the fire and snap your fingers at them all."

"No," said Lord Kingswood, "I am only more confirmed in a design I have formed to see this man Pengreep myself immediately."

Pharisee suddenly grew cold and faint, for he heard a hoarse turmoil still raging below.

"As your lordship pleases," he said, in a hurried, nervous tone. "I will endeavor to see your lordship at some part of to-morrow, and learn the result."

"Very well, Pharisee," returned his lordship, still with a perplexed, thoughtful look, for the letter he had just received much disturbed him.

He sat down to reperuse it, and before he had finished it Pharisee glided from the room.

He heard the wild noise growing louder below, and his heart died within him, for he recognized the voice of his Albertina used with vehement earnestness.

He slunk down the servants' staircase, sneaked through the passage at the basement, and so out by the servants' private entrance, reaching the pavement as Albertina was hurried out of the hall with fearful velocity.

She caught a glimpse of him as he fled swiftly away, uttered a scream of recognition, and rushed after him in hot pursuit, followed by two policemen, several of the servants, and a queue of idlers and small boys.

CHAPTER LVI.

As soon as the aged eyes of old Eldra perceived the rough, uncouth form of Tubal Kish standing in the doorway of the chamber containing Erle and herself, and she noticed that Tubal stared at Erle with an aspect of bewildered astonishment, she uttered an exclamation which was a compound of vexation and surprise. She, in a shrill but haughty tone of command, bade him descend the staircase, and as he hesitated she advanced hastily towards him with upraised stick, and then, with a grunt like the growl of an ill-conditioned dog, he obeyed her and disappeared.

She turned to Erle and said,

"The blood of a doomed race circulates in my veins as in yours. It may be that the hour rapidly approaches for the redemption of the race from its doom, and with it my release from life. I feel that some great and decisive event connected with our house is at hand. That mystic veil is lifted now, and I see standing by your side the shadow of the first Erle, Baron Kingswood."

Presently she muttered,

"His eyes have lost their ruthless glare, his brow wears not its wonted settled gloom, his eyes regard me with a softer expression, and the ghastly blood upon his hands seems fading—he points to you—and—oh, my God!"

With a scream and a gasp she sank upon the ground, and Erle at once moved forward to raise and support her, although her wild aspect and yet more singular words had caused a strange thrill to run through his frame so as almost for an instant to render him powerless.

She waved him off and rose up.

"It was but a spasm," she said, with difficulty.

"But your vision, dame?" he ejaculated, in an air of eager inquiry.

"You intimate that, therefore let me know it. It may be the mere wanderings of an enfeebled brain that moved you so deeply; but it may have been one of those supernatural communications which set at defiance our ordinary faculties of reasoning, and as such of the greatest moment to me. I have had sights, visions, dreams—call them what you will—they are so misty and improbable that the unthinking world would laugh me to scorn for attaching more weight to them than incoherent dreams deserve."

Again the old woman shook her head sadly.

"Evil flies with falcon's wings," she muttered rather than said. "I fear me that you, too, are doomed, and it is not for me to hasten the agonies which will sooner or later be yours, by prognostications whose fulfilment, even if you have faith in them, you can neither elude nor avert. You are pale, the lines of fatigue and exhaustion circle about your eyes and lips. In yon room you will find a bed. You may rest upon it in safety, innocence alone has rested there. I can tell by your clear, steadfast eyes, and firm lip, that as yet crime has not set its brand upon you. When you arise from your slumber, I may add, perhaps, to what I have already communicated, as you may have the power, even unknown to yourself, to confirm me in the suspicion I have formed with respect to your origin. If all be true, as I now conceive it to be, oh, but you shall press onward in your true path, backed with all the aid and the terrible knowledge with which I can furnish you! Not a word more! Go, you need rest, go—go."

She waved her hand towards an apartment, into which, in full faith that he was safe, Erle entered. He saw at a glance that it had been Violet's, that it was tastefully, even elegantly furnished, but he was too overcome by fatigue to note many things, mere trifles in themselves, but strongly illustrative of the pure mind, the delicate, even refined taste, and the guileless nature of the forest flower which had bloomed there and drooped and faded elsewhere.

He flung himself upon the bed, muttered a hasty prayer, and in a few minutes he was asleep, dreaming that he was seated by the side of Lady Maud in the old library.

They were alone as they had been—were reading the old chronicles together—and it seemed to him that the word LOVE played in characters of lambent flame over the broad page, and though he knew what they intended to represent, yet they would not take the shape of the word, or even the form of the letter, but perplexed and teased and vexed him. And then he had other stronger and wilder dreams, but he slept on deeply and continuously.

In the meanwhile old Eldra descended the stone staircase, and perceived at the opened door leading into the Chace, Tubal Kish prostrate upon the turf, leaning upon his elbows, and watching ardently for Erle as a tiger would for its prey.

He was armed with a fowling-piece, and when he saw that Eldra was alone, he rose to his feet and approached her.

"Where be he?" he exclaimed, in an undertone. "Vanished—gone—like he do in the brake and in the covert, in the alleys and the thickets."

"Fool!" ejaculated old Eldra.

"Nay, I be a cooning vool if I be voot," he retorted. "Dost th' not mind, dame, what the chaunt says? I'se heerd thee drone it:

When the heir of the race
Shall his own features trace?"

"Silence, idiot!" cried the old woman angrily. "The guest above is no spirit, but one who has asked for shelter, rest and refreshment. Look you, disturb him not!"

"No spectre!" exclaimed Tubal, his brow lowering. "Not t' bad baron I seen oop in Chace o' nights?"

"I tell you no, fool!" responded the old woman, sharply. "Hie away with you! he needs quiet and rest. Your rough clatter will only disturb him. Hie away, and beware of a black hawk!"

"So you've told me often, dame," he replied, with a guttural laugh. "I ha' no seen a black hawk, an' I believe eye of man never saw 'un either."

"You have seen the spectre of the Chace, owlet, have you not?" asked the old woman, fixing her glittering eyes upon him, and speaking in a tone which made him gasp with fear.

"Ye—es," he chattered between his teeth.

"Is that a sight for the eye of man?" she asked sharply. "Yet have you seen the ghostly thing. Beware of a black hawk, I bid you! it will be your death! Go."

"Just a word, dame. Ye tell I yon oop in tower be not spectre!" he exclaimed, in a low voice.

"I have told thee so, fool!" she cried.

"Eh, but dost thee know who he be, then?" he inquired.

She gazed at him fixedly for a moment, and then said:

"Dost thou, Tubal?"

"And he be not spectre, he be t' young squire, who was at t' Hall when the last dead leaves were falling from the branches," he returned, and lowering his voice almost to a whisper, continued, "it be he, dame, who poured a barrel o' shot at my breast because I tried to get pretty Vi'let, our flower of the Chace, out of clutches o' young Squire Cyril."

The old dame started back a step.

"Did he—he rescue Violet from you and place her in the hands of Cyril Kingswood?"

"Aye, that did he, dame," replied Tubal. "When I 'ood a lifted her 'oop and carried her to tower, he oop with gun an' covered me wi' it."

"Knowing that he was consigning to the clutches of a designing villain one so fair, so young, so innocent?"

"Nay, he never stopped to ask or right or wrong, but he fired at me," cried Tubal, excitedly. "I have marks now; I count 'em at times loike, because it is a debt, dame, an' them debts I always pay."

The old woman's brows contracted.

"I see," she muttered, "the rash impulse of youth to side with the weaker party. It was not wise, but it was both bold and brave," she said, as if communing with herself.

"Ay! an' if he be not Kingswood o' Kingswood, it be he who broke my head wi' gun-stock in glade, when I'd Cyril Kingswood's weasand beneath my 'ood knife. Dost see, dame, I know 'un, an' I'll make 'un know I afore I done wi' 'un."

"Peace," muttered the dame, sharply. "It is not by your vile hand a Kingswood shall fall. Mark me, he who rests above within the tower is under my protection. See you harm him not; see you attempt not to harm him! If you dare, Tubal, I will turn thee as a ferret will a mole. He sleeps in peace. Hie thee away. Heed me and tremble. Go!"

She raised her stick, and Tubal slunk gloomily away. She watched him for a short time to note whether he lurked about or endeavored to conceal himself within a thicket, but apparently satisfied, she turned, entered the tower and made fast the door upon the inner side.

Tubal did not intend to lurk about; he had an engagement to keep, and he hurried to the place of appointment.

It was a small glade, enclosed with trees, and was untenanted by human beings. He flung himself beneath a mass of entangled brushwood, and lay concealed from sight.

He had not been there hidden long ere his quick ear caught the sound of a footstep advancing along the glade, even though the soft grass made the foot fall lightly.

He turned his eyes in the direction and beheld the form of Philip Avon approaching. As soon as the latter reached a spot within a few feet of him, he rose up silently from his lair and confronted him.

Philip started to find him so close to him, but without alluding to it, said, in a stern, arrogant tone:

"Well, fellow, what more of the ghost about whom you babbled to me this morning? Is it made of flesh and blood, or of moonbeams and mist? Have you come to your senses yet, dolt, or are you still on this point as mad as a March hare?"

"I ha' seen 'un again," said Tubal Kish in reply, a malicious grin spreading itself over his rough, ungainly features.

"What, the ghost!" asked Philip Avon, with a contemptuous laugh.

"He bean't no ghost," muttered Tubal between his teeth.

"Ha! is it so?" cried Philip quickly.

"Nen," responded Tubal. "A' do wish I had a known it last noight, a' would ha' made 'un a ghost before this morn, I 'ood, that I 'ood."

"So, so," rejoined Philip, eyeing him like a hawk. "What! I was in the right when I told you that you were no better than a scared idiot, eh? Now, tell me who this masquerader is. You say that you have seen him," he added, with a sternness of tone, which was intended to intimate to Tubal that he had no intention to be trifled with.

"Why, he be t' young squire who staid at t' Hall afore Christmas tide."

"I was sure of it," muttered Philip between his teeth, and his visage became deadly pale. "Where is he now?" he cried, hoarsely, clutching at the same time Tubal's arm. "He shall not get away from me this time; a sudden blow, and three feet deep beneath the turf, will put an end to his ghostly antics for ever."

"He bides now where neither you nor I dare touch 'un, Master Philip," replied Tubal, gloomily.

"Where is that?" asked Philip, with a laugh of scornful incredulity.

"Nay, that is where I cannot tell 'ee," replied Tubal. "But I know where to watch for 'un."

"Bah!" replied Philip, with a gesture of rage, "I will not wait. Lead me to the spot where I can face him. I am sick for another struggle with him."

"I tell 'ee no; I munna do't," returned Tubal, doggedly. "Thee must wai'. I say't, thee caest not find 'un without I; if thee thinks thee can, do't by thysen; but I tell 'ee he sleeps now where one watches over and protects him, but a' will rise oop and wander in Chace agen, a' will make for t'ould part of Hall, and then thee caest work thy will, but I'll ha' one deep plunge o' my 'ood-knife to settle up my old scores wi' 'un."

The latter observations respecting Erle seemed to strike Philip Avon with some force.

"That he visits the Hall surreptitiously is clear," he soliloquised; "and so long as he does it in mystery, and with the profession of highflown motives, that weak fool Lady Maud will suffer her mind to be led captive by him."

Turning to Tubal, he said, abruptly,

"Can the fellow escape without being detected by you?"

"Noa," returned Tubal, "an' I be sure he won't neither."

"At what hour do you think he'll move abroad again?" inquired Philip, eyeing him steadfastly.

"Not till the moon makes the mist rise in the glades," replied Tubal Kish; "and then you'll see him flit across them like the shadow of too Kingswood o' Kingswood."

"At what hour does the moon rise to-night?" inquired Philip, musingly.

"An hour before midnight she'll be smiling above treetops," replied Tubal. "But he'll be abroad before that hour."

"For what purpose?" inquired Philip.

"I cannot say, but a' walks an' wanders to and fro until the hour o' midnight has chimed; then he wanders in t'ould Hall," replied Tubal Kish.

"By what entrance does he enter the Hall?" he asked, with an air of eager curiosity.

"I dunno," replied the ruffian, with a perplexed look. "When I hunted vor my pistol and my knife, an' I hunted in vain, I fancied I saw a man stealing oop to entrance t' 'ould Hall. At first I thought 'twere gamekeeper on watch for I, but next instant 'twere gone—'twere like magic. I looked again and again, but I saw 'un no more. Only while I watched I saw light come into ould library, and it never went out till couldn't see't for dawn breaking."

Philip Avon walked up and down the glade, deep in thought, for a few minutes. At length he soliloquised,

"I will adopt this plan. All things considered, it will be better than throttling him. Lord Kingswood will be with me. From what he said he will only be too glad to get rid of him, and there is not a man in the commission of the peace down here who will not commit him if they understand it to be Lord Kingswood's wish that he should be sent abroad to herd with felons. Dainty Lady Maud will hardly preserve with pleasure the memory of a lover who is working out a term of servitude with scoundrels of the worst dye in chains, in a penal settlement. I will do it. Tubal Kish, where shall I meet you to-night to track the house-robbing ghost?"

"Ay, an' for that matter, man-robbing too," replied Tubal Kish. "A' stole my pistol and 'ood knife."

"Excellent," cried Philip, slapping his thigh, "a petty larceny theft too. You shall charge him with it, Tubal, before a magistrate."

"Who—I?" cried Tubal, with an air of affright. "Noa! noa! Not I, Master Philip."

"Why not?" asked Philip, angrily.

"Why, Master Philip, t'magistrate do want to see I sorely," replied Tubal, with a downcast look.

"What for—poaching?" suggested Philip.

"Eh! that be it, Master Philip," replied Tubal, somewhat hesitatingly; "an' if he do catch me inside justice room a' will send I to jail too."

"Leave that to me," returned Philip, quickly. "My father, Sir Walter Avon, is in the commission of the peace, and you shall prefer your charge before him. I will protect you. I will bring up with me to-night Hamregue and Picker, two of our best constables, and we will pounce upon our quarry when he has got well inside the Hall."

"I cannot meet t' constables, Master Philip. You maun track the game by yoursen' vor I," said Tubal, doggedly. "They do owe I grudge; I cracked both of their crowns, and they have sworn to lay I by t' heels. I cannot meet 'em, Master Philip. I will do all you wish without 'un, but I cannot meet 'em."

"Fool, I will pay for their broken pates; and I give you my word they shall not touch you, that is enough for you. Therefore, meet me at this spot at ten to-night, and look that you are here, or I will myself set Hamregue and Picker on you. I know where to find you, and if you fail me to-night our next interview shall be in the lock up."

As he concluded he stalked away down the glade, leaving Tubal Kish muttering something very like an anathema against himself if he ran the risk that night of meeting the constables.

Yet at the hour of ten he was at the appointed spot, for after all he feared Philip Avon more than he did the constables, and there he was joined by Philip and two men, who smiled at Tubal Kish when they faced him with a very grim expression.

Without a word Tubal Kish led them in a certain direction, and placed them beneath a covert, and bade them watch an opening which existed in the centre of a mass of forest trees. An hour elapsed, and there was no sign of the approach of their intended victim. Philip began to grow impatient, when suddenly Tubal caught him by the arm and whispered in his ear,

"Lie close—be still; I hear hi' footfall on the grass."

Philip listened, but could not catch the sound, yet presently he caught sight of a figure muffled in a cloak, which glided swiftly across the glade, and entered a long alley or aisle formed by the tall stems of many trees.

They all rose, and with stealthy steps, followed the fleeing figure. They entered the grove of trees also, and beheld the shadow gliding lightly and quickly down it, and then pass out into the open space beyond.

They hurried after it, and entered the open space cautiously, but the figure was not anywhere to be seen—it had vanished.

The space before them was of such extent that it was impossible for the fugitive to have passed over it without being seen by them, and there was nothing but a mass of brushwood and a gully in the place to serve for cover. The brushwood was carefully examined, but in vain, and then Tubal Kish, in a tone of awe, exclaimed,

"Let us back again. We have been hunting the Kingswood o' Kingswood."

"Fool! idiot!" cried Philip, passionately, "I know the fellow, his gait, his step. It is him I swear. Let us to the Hall, and watch there; we shall have him yet."

As he concluded these words he led the way himself to Kingswood Hall, closely followed by the two officers and Tubal Kish.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.

No journal published on the Continent of America has wielded so vast a party and general influence as the New York Tribune. Its influence is not confined to cities, it is felt in towns and villages, in the scattered homesteads of our agricultural districts, and in the log cabins in the wildernesses of our Territories. It addresses a vast audience, and its intense earnestness of purpose in the great issues it advocates bears the inevitable stamp of moral conviction, and its influence and weight with its readers is commensurate with this earnestness. Its rise and progress to its present immense circulation and social and political power is worthy of record.

The New York Daily Tribune was first issued on the 10th day of April, 1841. It was a folio of five columns per page, not half its present size, and containing about one-third the amount of matter. Its price was one cent per copy. A small list of subscribers had been gathered by the industrious efforts of a few personal friends of the sole editor and proprietor, Horace Greeley, but of the first day's edition, only five thousand copies, a large proportion was given away to whoever would accept them. General Harrison's funeral was celebrated on that day in New York by an immense turnout, and there was a chilling north-east storm of rain, hail and wind—both obsequies and storm tending to distract attention from the new journal. Its editor had for seven years previously issued the New Yorker, a literary weekly of good repute, which obtained a circulation of nine thousand five hundred copies, but being sent to subscribers on credit never made a dollar. During the summer and fall preceding the publication of the Daily Tribune, Horace Greeley had issued a campaign weekly paper entitled the Log Cabin, devoted to the election of General Harrison to the Presidency, which obtained the then unprecedented circulation of eighty thousand copies, but was sold for little more than the cost of the white paper on which it was printed. The popularity of this journal doubtless aided the circulation of the Tribune, yet its first week's receipts were but ninety-two dollars, against a current outlay of five hundred and twenty-five dollars. In the following August Mr. Thomas McElrath took an interest in the concern, with the position as publisher, and within a year from its establishment it began to pay expenses, as it has always hitherto done.

The Weekly Tribune, which has now a circulation of over two hundred thousand copies, was first issued in September, 1841, and the Semi-Weekly in 1843.

The Tribune was the first daily newspaper in America issued in double folio of eight pages per day, while it has often issued two folio page supplements per week. It has always been the largest of the cheap dailies, and having fewer advertisements than its rivals prints more news matter than they do, and with larger type. Perhaps two-thirds of its entire receipts have been paid directly over to its paper makers, and of the four or five millions of dollars received from its subscribers and advertisers, at least nine-tenths have been paid directly out for paper, ink, type, reporting, telegraphing, &c., leaving a very small proportion to be divided among its fifteen or twenty proprietors.

Before the era of regular steamship mails its publishers sent a vessel once to Europe expressly for news, and have during the term of its existence spent many thousands of dollars on land and ocean expresses. It now pays for telegraphing alone the enormous sum of thirty thousand dollars a year. It was the first paper in America to stereotype its pages, so as to print its several editions from stereotype forms, and preserve its type from the fearful wear and tear of large editions run off from cylinder presses.

The growth of its circulation is evidenced by the fact that it was first printed on a machine which cost two thousand dollars, and would run off about two thousand copies an hour. Now its principal press, one of Hoe's ten cylinders, cost thirty thousand dollars, or with fixtures forty thousand dollars, and runs off eighteen thousand sheets per hour. It could be driven at a higher rate, though not without danger of breaking it. To print off the enormous editions of the Daily, Semi-Weekly and Weekly Tribune, not only is this great press in constant use, but also another six cylinder Hoe is pressed into service, working day and night.

It is curious to inquire into the working details of this establishment, which is in intimate communication with a million people per day. We find that the amount of paper used every week is over thirteen hundred reams, of five hundred sheets to the ream, or, in other words, over six hundred and fifty thousand sheets of paper, or five millions four hundred thousand pages, are printed, counted, folded and despatched at the New York Tribune office every week.

The circulation of the Daily (per week) is		438,000
" "	Semi-Weekly	50,000
" "	Weekly	200,000
Edition for California		2,500
Total circulation		690,500

It takes a careful observer to realise the enormous proportions of the above numerals, representing the circulation of journals from one office. It is so vast that it almost staggers belief, but the fact is simply so without the slightest exaggeration.

To carry on the business of this great establishment a multiplicity of heads and hands are necessary, and we find their number and classification as follows:

Editors, correspondents and reporters	28
Compositors and proofreaders	76
Pressroom hands	48
Newspaper folding machines	5
Mailing department	44
Publishing department	11
In all (exclusive of carriers and all outside assistance)	212

Horace Greeley is the Editor-in-Chief; indeed, he is the Tribune so far as the world knows, and the popular belief is that he is neatly packed and folded up and distributed with every copy of the Tribune each morning, so thoroughly is his personality identified with that famous sheet. Horace Greeley is essentially a man of the people; if he towers above them in intellect, he comes to their level when wrongs are to be righted and human sympathy expressed. His heart and mind are both large, comprehensive and earnest. When he feels, he gives with an open, ungrudging hand, and, better than all, kind words; when he thinks, he writes in words which stand forth like letters of glowing fire, which burn into the popular mind, and cannot be quenched out. He is a brief, bold, intelligible writer, condensing small volumes into a couple of squares, and giving the skeletons of facts which stare one in the face and will be seen. He enters into every subject he takes hold of with all his heart, and with an impetuosity that acknowledges no obstacles, and regards not the conventional courtesies of language; in short, his absorption is entire, and he drives ahead reckless whom he spills in his onward course. His mind is so inquiring, so ready to seize upon anything which promises to ameliorate our species, that he has been the expounder of a vast many Humanitarian ideas, most of which have dropped quietly into oblivion, but which for a while he upheld with all the force of his vigorous pen. Impulsive and hopeful, he was as likely to be wrong as right in his advocacy of novel theories, but right or wrong he threw the whole force of his nature into whatever contest he was engaged. Horace Greeley's position and influence, socially and politically, is second to none in the country, and this he has won by his fearlessness, his honesty and his earnestness—with the one he met his enemies and conquered them, with the other he silenced all detraction, and with the last he makes the masses believe what he believes. However we may dissent from some of the leading points of his creeds, we acknowledge the admiration which his brilliant talents command, and the respect which his moral character compels. By the attachés of the Tribune he is greatly beloved.

Among his collaborateurs in the editorial room is Mr. C. A. Dana, whose varied knowledge, tact and judgment seemed to point him out for the managing editor, at once capable and reliable. He has held that position for many years, and is besides connected with Mr. Ripley in the editorial charge of "Appleton's Encyclopædia," a work of vast importance and labor, and requiring the finest judgment and tact in its conduct. His liberal acquirements fit him for both positions, and few literary men of his age have reached such prominent and honorable places in the world of letters as Mr. Charles A. Dana.

The Literary Editor, Mr. George Ripley, is a man of liberal education and of rare mental acquirements. His reviews are admirably written, and display a fine discrimination, a genial appreciation and a refined and scholarly taste. His marked qualifications pointed him out as eminently fitted to conduct a great literary work, and he was, consequently, chosen chief editor of "Appleton's Encyclopædia." His conversational powers are described as very remarkable for brilliancy of imagination, eloquence and depth of thought. He is a studious man, much absorbed in his literary labors, but is of a kind and genial disposition.

The musical editor is Mr. William Henry Fry, and he is the only man upon the press for whose opinion on musical matters we have the slightest respect. He is a cultivated musician, a composer who has made his mark, and if he is heterodox upon some of the dogmas of our musical creed, he has sufficient stuff in him to support his theories forcibly if not convincingly, and to compel even his adversaries to respect his opinions. Mr. Fry is also an eloquent speaker, and an able and vigorous political writer.

The Agricultural Editors are Messrs. Solon Robinson and Olcott, both of them experts in their department.

The Commercial Editor, Mr. George M. Snow, is behind the scenes in the Exchange, the bankers and brokers' offices, can point you out the principal bulls and bears, and is in a general sense up to all the "ropes" of the "street." He thoroughly understands and ably fills his department. It is said that he is as much at home "behind the scenes" in private life, among his large circle of friends, and like other great actors in the drama of life, he "holds the mirror up to nature" with consummate art.

Mr. Sidney H. Gay makes up the Weekly Tribune; Mr. Isaac William England is an able and discriminating City Editor, and Mr. J. F. Ottarson is an indefatigable and comprehensive News Editor, and was for a considerable period City Editor.

Mr. J. F. Cleveland is the Albany correspondent, a shrewd and keen observer, and a vigorous and pointed writer. He is also the compiler of the Tribune Almanac, a political annual bought by all politicians, which has reached a circulation of nearly one hundred and twenty thousand copies.

In the publishing department, Mr. Samuel Sinclair is the presiding genius. He has been connected with that department since its commencement, in 1841, and is now the sole publisher. The entire management of that vast business devolves upon him, and under his sagacious and far-seeing control, it has grown up to its present greatness, representing a capital of nearly half a million of dollars. We look upon this fact as the best evidence of his financial and administrative ability. The business department has also the assistance of Mr. R. M. Streheigh as advertising clerk. Mr. James Cuthell, an attaché from the first, died a short time since, never having been absent two successive days for nearly twenty years. Mr. E. T. Watson has charge of the wrapper-writing department, and Mr. J. B. Mix, a member of the Seventh regiment, has charge of the newspaper directing machines, of which there are five.

Three-fourths of a hundred of busy hands are employed with the flying type, under the supervision of Thomas N. Rooker, foreman of the composition room. Half a hundred swarthy figures glide through the dangerous intricacies of the immense press-room, where that ceaseless and noiseless engine works night and day, under the charge of Philip Fitzpatrick, the foreman, Patrick Nulty, assistant foreman. Patrick Rourk is day engineer, and John Rickard the night engineer.

And last, though not by any means the least among the Tribune wonders let us enter the counting, folding and delivering room of the Daily and Weekly Tribune, where Mr. David P. Rhoades is the ruling and animating spirit. It is his duty to count the papers as they come in bundles from the press, and deliver them to the boys and agents who are clamoring and impatient to procure their quota. Calm and unmoved amid the riot and the racket, like the steam engine he goes on and on, and incredible as it may sound, he can count the papers at the rate of eighteen thousand copies an hour, or as fast as the ten cylinder press can run them out. This is an act of manual dexterity not to be paralleled through all newspaperdom. It was acquired by force of necessity. As the power of producing in the printing press was developed, his counting dexterity was developed in the like manner. It was proposed to get two or three men to help him, but he was strong in the belief that it must be a very fast machine that could beat him—and he was right. He is ahead of the steam printing press yet.

It is possible we have omitted some point of interest, but we give our impressions, and the facts we gleaned from a necessarily brief visit to the New York Tribune establishment.

TRIAL OF WIARD'S STEEL RIFLED CANNON FOR THE EXCELSIOR BRIGADE.

Report of Special Commission, composed of officers appointed by General D. E. Sickles, from the Excelsior brigade, on trial of Norman Wiard's patent rifled steel cannon and carriages, which was made on the 3d of July, in the vicinity of Camp Scott, using Hotchkiss's celebrated shot and shell.

The Commission consisted of Colonel Hall, Second regiment; Colonel Graham, Fifth regiment; Captain Brenne, Artillery Officer.

General Sickles—Your Committee, in accordance with your instructions, proceeded to the trial ground, on the morning of the 3d inst., to witness the testing of one of Wiard's patent steel rifled cannon and improved carriage. The gun was dismounted and placed on a trial carriage, and a target of canvas, twenty feet square, erected at a distance of one thousand four hundred and thirty-three yards. Eleven shots were fired at the target, three of which were for adjusting sights and range. Eight of the eleven shots struck, one hitting the bull's eye. The time of flight was three and a half seconds, and the elevation two degrees, thirty-eight minutes. Ten of the shots passed on from one to two hundred yards beyond the target before making the first graze; one fell short of the target. One shot was fired into the beach sand at a distance of twelve yards, at an inclination of twenty degrees, and penetrated about four feet. One shot for ricochet on the water was fired; the first graze was estimated to be about five hundred yards, with four rebounds. The weight of powder charge was eight ounces. The gun was then remounted on its own carriage, and three shots fired with a charge of fourteen ounces. The time of flight was, in one instance, twenty-eight and a half seconds; the second twenty-nine, and the third thirty-one and a half seconds. During the trial a common United States bronze rifled six pounder was placed on the same trial carriage, with an elevation of four and a half degrees. The comparative results were as follows: Time of flight to the target, six seconds, the recoil in the case of the six pounder gun was thirty inches, and of the bronze gun nine feet. The weight of the steel gun is seven hundred pounds, and of the bronze gun eight hundred and ninety pounds, the charges used in the steel gun were eight ounces, in the bronze gun nineteen when firing at the target; the shots weighed six for the steel and twelve for the bronze gun. There are several important improvements in the construction of the gun and carriage, which make them in mobility and efficiency superior, in many essential particulars, to any guns we have seen in service. The carriage gives over twice the elevation of the standard United States carriage, and has a flattened bearing at the end of the trail, which greatly facilitates accuracy in firing. The wheels are constructed with iron adjustable hubs, and may be taken down and put together with the greatest facility by the aid of a hand wrench, and any shrinkage may be compensated by tightening the adjustable wedges in the hub and in the sections of the fellies. The tire is set by simple pressure, without the use of heat. The gun is made of solid steel, forged under heavy steam hammers, and is bored out of the solid mass. The trunnions are forged on an iron band and shrunk on the barrel of the gun. The plan of rifling is a gain twist ending in one revolution in a distance of nine feet. The grooves are eight in number, parallel in depth, and as two to one to the lands. The length of the gun is eighteen calibres. In the distribution of materials, the adaptation of parts, the style of finish and workmanship of his gun and carriage, Mr. Wiard has displayed masterly ability.

THE FRENCH LADY—A WAR EPISODE.

We briefly noticed in our last paper the daring abduction of the steamer St. Nicholas by Col. Richard Thomas, who got on board in the disguise of a lady dressed in the highest style of fashion. We have now to chronicle his capture. It appears that the ease with which he had accomplished his former exploit had given him a taste for another such experiment; but, unfortunately, on board the steamer on which he, with seven Confederates, took his passage up to Baltimore, there happened to be two of the deck hands of the St. Nicholas, who pointed out to Lieut. T. Carmichael and policeman Hornor that suspicious face. Lieut. Carmichael consequently ordered the captain to make at once for Fort McHenry, instead of going straight to Baltimore. When the "French Lady," who was now in proper male dress, found that the vessel was heading in to the Fort, his suspicions were alarmed, and he tried to bully the captain to push on for Baltimore; but, of course, without avail. When the steamer was alongside the landing-place of the Fort, Col. Thomas, pirate and French Lady, was not to be found. After, however, a severe search the heroic Colonel was found snugly ensconced in the drawer of a bureau, where he had been packed away under some female dresses. He was at once seized, and is now a prisoner to Fort McHenry, awaiting his trial for piracy and treason. There is a spice of romance about this "gay and gallant young soldier" calculated to create sympathy for him in the breast of novel readers and young ladies.

EYEBALLING—A NEW GAME IN THE WESTERN CAMPS.

There are variations in camp life here. The most amusing, and yet the most provoking, is the systematic, free and easy, incessant "eyeballing" that mysteriously spirits away everything from a pistol to a camp stool the moment it is left for an instant beyond range of your own eye. This eyeballing has been reduced to a science. The old saying about the Ohio volunteers in Mexico, that if they couldn't take a town they could always steal it, applies with literal truthfulness to the camps here. Does a soldier want a blanket? He "eyeballs" it. The poor fellow from whom he takes it is but little troubled; he eyeballs some other man's blanket, and so it goes clear around. You want a saddle. The "Orderly" doesn't see yours, and so he coolly picks up some other man's, claps it on your horse, and you are equipped. If the "other man" happens to want a saddle, he abides the "fate of war;" maybe he gets one, if he can secure a wide-awake Orderly—and maybe he doesn't. You can't be expected to look after that.

You are the fortunate possessor of a horse. You hitch him, right under the eye of a guard, with a special injunction to "see that nobody takes that horse," and go in to eat your dinner. Returning to remount, you are amazed to see no horse. Question the guard, and he tells you that "some other man got that horse!" "But why didn't you stop him?" "Why, he said it was his horse, and that you had stolen him, and he was only taking him back. Of course I didn't know anything about it!" If you are wise you receive the cool information as coolly as it deserves to be received, and simply "go and do likewise;" if you are a fool you curse and rave, and get laughed at for your pains.

Blue blouses are a very convenient article for camp wear. Some man to whose company blue blouses have not been supplied fancies that he would like one. A soldier has just taken off his blouse for some purpose. He turns his back for a moment, presto, the blouse is gone! Nobody knows anything about it. What can he do? What, indeed, but "go and do likewise?" If he can't get a blouse he can get something else. And so with other things.

THE STUFFED CAT.

An old chiffonnier (or ragpicker) died in Paris, in a state of abject poverty. His only relation was a niece, who lived as a servant with a greengrocer. The girl always assisted her uncle as far as her means would permit. When she learned of his death, which took place suddenly, she was on the point of marriage with a journeyman baker, to whom she had been long attached. The nuptial day was fixed, but Suzette had not yet bought her wedding clothes. She hastened to tell her lover that the wedding must be deferred; she wanted the price of her bridal finery to lay her uncle decently in the grave. Her mistress ridiculed the idea, and exhorted her to leave the old man to be buried by charity. Suzette refused. The consequence was a quarrel, in which the young woman lost her place and her lover, who sided with her mistress. She hastened to the miserable garret where her uncle had expired, and by the sacrifice not only of the money for her wedding attire, but nearly all the rest of her slender wardrobe, she had the old man decently interred. Her pious task fulfilled, she sat alone in her uncle's room weeping bitterly, when the master of her faithless lover, a good-looking young man, entered.

"So, my Suzette, I find you have lost your place," said he; "I am come to offer you one for life. Will you marry me?"

"I, sir!" said Suzette, "you are joking."

"No, faith," said he; "I want a wife, and I'm sure I can't find a better."

"But everybody will laugh at you for marrying a poor girl like me," said Suzette.

"Oh, if that is your only objection," said the young man, "we shall soon get over it; come, come along, my mother is prepared to receive you."

Suzette hesitated no longer, but she wished to take with her a memorial of her deceased uncle—it was a cat he had had for many years. The old man was so fond of the animal that he determined that even death should not separate them, for he had had her stuffed, and placed her on the tester of his bed.

As Suzette took down puss, she uttered an exclamation of surprise at finding it so heavy. The lover hastened to open the animal, when out fell a shower of gold. There were a thousand louis concealed in the body of the cat, and this sum, which the old miser had starved himself to amass, became the reward of the worthy girl and her disinterested lover.

The Golden Belt.—Mdlle. ——, a young lady of no personal attractions but of great moral excellence, and possessing a very large fortune (something like twenty thousand pounds a year), had, like most young ladies in her position, several suitors for her hand. Her father gave a ball about a month ago, to which all the gentlemen were invited. Passing behind a group of bushes, which had been placed in the ball-room to decorate it, the young lady saw two of her admirers engaged in low, and, on one side, angry dialogue. Her own name was mentioned; do not blame her if she did not appear immediately; she was anxious to hear their conversation. The first speaker was the one towards whom her heart yearned; in fact, she had almost pronounced the decisive "yes;" the other, an officer of high rank, but without fortune, and known to be deeply in debt. The first spoke of his future with certainty; regretted her ugliness, and added that he should only marry her for her money. He also said he considered he was conferring a favor upon her. The officer took it up, saying that if the young lady had in reality consented, he was unworthy of the distinction; that love invested its object with beauty; that he (for he loved her) thought her most beautiful, and, even if she were not, her other qualities were such as to entitle her to esteem and admiration. The next day the officer received the golden belt worn by the lady the evening before, instituting him her champion to the eyes of the world. Their banns were published shortly afterwards.

THE PADDED ROOM AT DEEPWATER.

A Tale of an English Inn.

It was nearly dark when I reached Deepwater; and I was glad enough to see the "fly" of the Ten Jolly Drovers waiting at one end of the station, as I stepped out upon the other.

The Ten Jolly Drovers was a gem of a country inn. And the plump, comely woman, in a widow's cap and gown, who stood curtseying in the porch, with a great silver tankard of "home-brewed" in her hands, "to take the dust out of the gentleman's throat"—what of her? Why, she was a gem of a country landlady, to be sure.

I mentioned, when my pen first touched this paper, that it was nearly dark when I reached Deepwater Station. A drive of four miles with Jim the coachman had made it still more near; and by the time I entered the red-tiled porch every fowl had gone to roost, and lamps were twinkling in the kitchen and the hall. Candles had been taken into a room at the right, just beyond the bar, for me, and the sight of a tempting table laid for supper made me so hungry that I at once "fell to," feasted like a king, and then went to bed and slept without the least incursion of nightmare.

The week which I had allotted for my holiday passed rapidly away. I congratulated myself upon having found this happy valley—this home where no shadow of care brooded—these friends whose lives had more of sunshine and less of shadow than any I had ever known before. But, "call no man happy till he dies," says a wise old Eastern proverb. And I rejoin, call no place Paradise till you see its angels. For places, like people, have their good and bad attendant spirits. I found it so, before my sojourn at the Ten Jolly Drovers was over.

On the last night of my stay I sat late in my little parlor below stairs. When I took my candle to go up stairs, the house was shut up. Mrs. Ball had retired to her bedroom in the third story; and I could hear Jim snoring on his settle in the kitchen, where he always slept, with the house dog at his feet, ready to defend the place if burglars should take a sudden fancy to visit it during the small hours of the night.

The dog growled, but hearing my voice, gave a kind of satisfied snort, and betook himself to slumber again. I stole cautiously up the creaking stairs. A gust of air coming from the landing-place nearly blew my light out, and shading it with my hand, I saw that a small, arched door opposite the stairs, which I had never noticed before, stood ajar. It seemed to lead into a narrow passage; and wondering much how it could have escaped my notice, I stepped in. Another door, strongly barred with iron, was just before me. I hesitated a moment; but something stronger than mere curiosity—a kind of breathless interest, that startled me, urged me on. I opened it. Not easily, however—till it was suddenly wrenched from my hand by some one inside—so suddenly that I almost fell into a large, square room, hung with dark curtains, and only lighted by an iron lamp, in a wire case, that burnt high up on the wall. The door closed gently behind me, but I could see no person in the room. Yet something had certainly wrenched it from my grasp.

I suppose I felt afraid. I remember I was very much inclined to whistle, or sing, just as I used to be when in my boyhood I had to pass a lonely churchyard at night. I walked into the middle of the room and put my lamp on the floor, because there was no table or chair on which I could leave it. Then I took a long look at my surroundings, feeling more and more like whistling every moment.

Not a picture hung upon the walls, not an article of furniture made the place more home-like. A low divan ran around the room, at one end it widened, and was furnished with blankets, counterpane and pillows, now tossed into a confused heap. The windows were heavily shuttered and barred—the grate was also barred in and wired—the shovel, poker and tongs had been removed, also the fender. The floor felt strangely beneath my feet, and I bent down to examine it. It was padded, and covered over with elastic matting. I touched the walls, they were not hung with dark drapery, as I had first imagined, but padded also, and covered with a cloth looking and feeling like leather. What strange mystery was this, in this quiet, out-of-the-way place? Who dwelt in this room where safety was evidently the first thing studied, where even the solitary lamp twinkled, like a star, far out of reach? I sat down on the divan and wondered at my discovery.

At last, as my eyes grew accustomed to the darkness of the place, I saw something stir, near the bed, a moment after I heard a low sigh.

"Who sighs so?" I asked, with a beating heart.

A tall, dark figure rose from the ground. It sounds romantic at this distance of time, but it seemed anything but romantic then. I was almost frightened to death, and had no power to speak or stir, as it advanced slowly towards me. Clad in a long, dark robe, like the habit of a monk, a man stood before me, pale, wasted, and with long, white hair, and a beard like snow. He gazed at me a moment in silence, and then sighed again heavily. I gathered up my courage, and said to myself that I must be dreaming, and that my first word would scare the illusion away.

"Who are you, and how came you here?" I asked.

"I am a lost soul," he said, in a melancholy voice; "lost for ever and ever."

"But why do you seek me?" I managed to say.

"You were to come; you came," said the sad voice. "But will you help me?"

"How can I?"

He drew nearer, and bent down, clasping and unclasping his hands in a strange, nervous way.

"There was blood upon the stairs to-night, I suppose, when you came up?"

"Upon the stairs? Why, no!"

"No! Are you sure?"

"Quite."

"No blood!" he kept repeating. "It is very strange! It is all because I did not go myself. If I had been out, I should have cut her throat from ear to ear, you know, and that would have made a beautiful path to walk in."

I nodded, though my heart died within me.

"You know her blood is like carmine," he went on. "I cut her once, before she put me here, and you might have painted a house with it. You would be charmed with the color, would you not?"

"No doubt, sir."

"Well, then, I promise you some. I can find my way to her, only you must lead me through the passage. I can't go through there alone; I always see him if I do."

"Who?"

"Charles—my brother Charles, you know. It is very odd," he added, in an injured tone, "the parson said he was in heaven, and if that is the case, I don't see why he should always stay in that passage."

"Shall I go and see if he is there now?" I said, fancying a chance of escape.

"No!" he answered, in a terrible voice, while his eyes began to gleam. "On second thoughts I will not go to her, she shall come to us. I know how I can bring her."

He snatched up the lamp I had left on the floor, and held it so that the flame touched the padding of the wall. In another moment it would have been on fire; but the real danger drove the imaginary one out of my head, and I sprang upon him. He dropped the lamp, and caught me in his powerful arms. I managed to trample out the flame, and then gave all my strength to the task of keeping his talon-like fingers from my throat. Up and down the padded room we struggled, fighting for life and death, yet making no noise and uttering no cry. The stillness terrified me. What would I not have given to have heard the sharp bark of Towser below.

It seemed an hour—I suppose it was not really more than five minutes. But the maniac's strength seemed to increase as mine gave way; he held one of my hands behind me, and though I kept him off for a time with the other, he fastened upon my throat at last. We had struggled down to the barred door—it was not quite shut, and in utter desperation I screamed aloud for help. The maniac ground his teeth, and uttered a strange cry; the blood rushed to my head as his cold hands tightened around my neck; my eyes seemed starting from their sockets. I was just gasping out a last prayer for mercy, when I heard a noise upon the stairs, the door was burst open—the great dog flew in with a low growl, and after him came Jim, who flung himself upon the madman, and loosened his grasp in an instant. I saw no more, for I went into a long swoon that was almost like death.

When, with much pain and anguish, sense and reason came back to me, I opened my eyes and found Jim bending over me, bathing my lips and temples with brandy and water. I was lying upon the kitchen settle, the gray dawn was stealing through the window, and Towser sat bolt upright in the middle of the floor, watching for my recovery with an anxious eye. He whined and wagged his bushy tail when I spoke. Jim held the brandy to my lips; he was pale, and a contused mark over his eye showed that he had not rescued me without danger on his part.

"In the name of Heaven, who was it, Jim?" I asked.

"Take some more brandy, sir. How in the world did you come to be in there with him?"

I told him how the outer door was ajar, and how the other one had been opened for me. He gave a long low whistle, and shook his head.

"It's missus's fault, and I often tells her we shall all be killed in our beds some night if she will go on visiting him. It always drives him wild. And to-night she must have gone off crying, as she often do, poor thing, and so forgotten to see that the doors were quite safe. It's a living mercy I heard you, sir."

"But who is he, Jim? And why is he here, instead of being in a proper madhouse?"

"That's her fault, too, as I tells her often enough. You see, sir, he was taken this way not long after they were married."

"Good Heavens! Is he her husband?"

"Yes, sir; I may say it to you, though every one else thinks he's dead, except the parson—he knows, and the doctor—he knows, too. It's a long story, and not over above pleasant. He went mad two years after she married him, and killed his brother Charles; leastways he stabbed him in that little passage, and he never got over it. But it was all hushed up, and people thought he was sent away to a madhouse. Afterwards they thought he died. But missus had that room fitted up, and has always kept him here. I mean to see to the bolts myself after this. He's fast enough now, and I've got the key of the passage in my pocket. I'm main glad missus didn't hear you, though."

"And so am I. But, Jim, I wouldn't stay under the same roof another night with him for millions."

He smiled.

"Oh, it's nothing when one gets used to it. Look at missus. Who would fancy she had got a raving maniac in charge?"

Who, indeed? I drank some more brandy, and going up to my own room, packed up my portmanteau and prepared for my journey. At seven I came into the breakfast-room, and lo! there was Mrs. Ball, fresh and smiling as the morning, hovering about me with a thousand attentions, little dreaming that I had by chance discovered the tragedy of her life, and nearly paid my own in forfeit thereby. I shook hands with her as Jim brought around the fly, and looked at her wonderingly, waving her kerchief, and smiling as gaily as a girl, when we drove away. Jim looked at her, too, then at me, and whistled "Jock o' Hazeldean."

"Strange things happen every day, if we only knew them," he said, as he acknowledged the gratuity I presented him at the station. "But for all that, I hopes we shall see you, and Muster Harlington, too, next summer. I'll take good care that you shall not be troubled yonder again."

But I never went. One visit to Deepwater was quite enough for me.

THE VIRGINIA WAR STEAMER EMPIRE UNDER A FLAG OF TRUCE.

The war steamer (?) Empire, which our cut represents, although not a very formidable line-of-battle ship, is the best the Virginians have. It has been chiefly celebrated for its successful trips between Norfolk and Fortress Monroe, while under a flag of truce, conveying northern refugees, who were tired of their Secession quarters, to a place where their lives are safe and the freedom of speech is not denied them. It is understood that the war steamer Empire has made her last trip to Fortress Monroe, as the sacredness of the flag of truce has been violated.

(a) This Bishop has thus early in the game moved four times; tactics which must necessarily have lost much valuable time.

(b) A useless sacrifice, as it obtains no adequate compensation in position; R to R 3 was the correct play.

(c) Again we should have preferred playing R to R 3.

(d) Had White's move been P to K B 5, it would, probably, have led to the following interesting variation:

30 Kt to B 4 winning, at least, the exchange.

30 Kt to B 4 with a fine game.

(e) P to K B 5 would still have been efficacious.

(f) A fatal mistake, which loses a piece and the game.

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

To Correspondents.—All questions sent to Mr. Phelan in reference to the rules of the game of billiards will in future be answered in this column. It would be too much labor to send written answers to so many correspondents.

☞ Diagrams of Remarkable Shots, Reports of Billiard Matches, or Items of interest concerning the game, addressed to the Editor of this column, will be thankfully received and published.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C., New York city.—"A., B. and C. are playing at the three-handed game. A. bets B. that he will not get off the first string. B. makes just 50 points. Does A. win or lose?"

Ans.—He wins. Making 50 points is equivalent to being off his first string.

M. B., Philadelphia.—You lose the tie.

Caballero, New York.—The Spanish game is very common in some parts of the South, as also in Mexico and California. It introduces a new element into the game of billiards in the shape of five wooden pins, diminutive ninepins, which stand up, in a diamond pattern, between the two side pockets, each pin being about two and a half inches from the other, as in pin pool. Nine pins are sometimes used instead of five, but the manner of playing remains the same. The game is generally played 31 up, and is scored by hazards, caroms and knocking down the pins.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

M. Berger.—This distinguished billiard-player writes us from Chicago, where he has been giving exhibitions of his talent in the pleasant science of billiards. The billiard-table which was manufactured for his use during his tour by Phelan & Collender, he informs us, was seized at Memphis, where it is still detained. After his arrival at Cincinnati he was prevented from playing for a week by a sore finger. He gave six exhibitions daily during the second week of his stay, and, we are informed, did not do very badly, the state of the times considered.

From Cincinnati M. Berger went to Columbus, where he gave three performances. He again returned to Cincinnati, and played the American four ball carom game with our friend Tieman, Berger winning by 142 points, the score standing at the close of the game—Berger, 250; Tieman, 108.

From Chicago, M. Berger intends going to Detroit and Cleveland. He also speaks of paying a hurried trip to Canada, and efforts are being made to induce him to visit Milwaukee, where, if he accepts, he will be the guest of Alfred Le Dron, the representative of that billiard district. M. Berger, however, will scarcely have time to cover so much ground, for he writes us that he has requested a berth to be retained for him in the Arago on July 30th, as he has received news of the illness of his wife. M. Berger may, however, change his mind, and return to New York for the purpose of giving a few exhibitions before his departure. Should he do so, he will most probably try his hand at the American game, as there is a great desire among the patrons of billiards generally to see him play the American game on an American table.

The Amateur Tournament.—The score, as will be seen below, stands as heretofore. The runs are high, and but few changes may be expected. However, the work of endeavoring to beat them still goes on, and some of them may yet be surpassed:

Four ball carom game	164
Around the table	128

"Do you think that raw oysters are healthy?" asked a lady of her physician. "Yes," replied he, "I never knew one complain of being out of health in my life."

The Mayor of a certain town put forth an announcement previous to the races: "No gentleman will be allowed to ride on the course, except the horses that are to run."

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

Why is the letter G like the sun? Because it is the centre of light.

The chap who fell into error was lifted out by the lever of public opinion.

If time is money, some people have a good deal more money than they know what to do with.

"It wasn't the wine I drank that made me unsteady," says the toper; "I slipped on a piece of orange-peel."

A young fellow, fond of talking, remarked, "I am no prophet." "True," replied a lady present, "no profit to yourself or any one else."

"My dear lady, your daughter is lovely," said a flatterer, "a perfect little pearl." "And pray, sir, what am I?" "Oh, you are the mother of pearl."

Quilp says, when he sees kisses between women, it reminds him of two handsome unmatched gloves—charming things with their proper mates, but good for nothing that way.

"Now look'er yer, Charlie, Jim mout be an honest nigger, and then again he moutent; but if I was a chicken, and knowed he was about the yard, I tell yer wot, nigger, I'd roost high, I would."

"Say, Cæsar Augustus, why am your legs like an organ grinder?" "Don't know, Mr Sugarloaf—why is they?" "Cause they carry a monkey about the streets." A brick grazed the head of Mr. Sugarloaf just as his ears disappeared round the corner of a street.

Two Dutchmen, who built and used in common a small bridge over a stream which ran through their farms, had a dispute concerning some repairs which it required, and one of them positively refused to bear any portion of the expense necessary to the purchase of a few planks. Finally, the aggrieved party went to a neighboring lawyer, and placing ten dollars in his hand, said,

"I'll give you all dish moneys if you'll make Hans do justice mit the pridge."

"How much will it cost to repair it?" asked the honest lawyer.

"Not more ash five toller," replied the Dutchman.

"Very well," said the lawyer, pocketing one of the notes and giving him the other, "take this and go get the bridge repaired; 'tis the best course you can take."

"Yaas," said the Dutchman, slowly, "yaas, dat ish more better as to quarrel mit Hans;" but as he went along home he shook his head frequently, as if unable, after all, to see quite clearly how he had gained anything by going to law.

Songs without Words—Those of that blessed baby.

At a recent dinner of shoemakers, the following toast was given:

"May we have all the women in the country to shoe, and all the men to boot."

A lady one day wrote to her absent husband the following letter, which may be quoted as a model in its way:

"I write to you because I have nothing to do; I end because I have nothing to say."

An examiner of schools, while lately examining the young children of a country school, asked them the following questions:

"Are there any mountains in Palestine?"

"Yes," replied the children.

"How are they situated?" inquired the examiner.

"Some are in clusters, and there are some isolated ones," they answered.

"What do you mean by the word isolated?" asked the examiner.

"Why, covered with ice, of course!" quickly replied one of the children.

The worthy gentleman who rules the rising generation of boys in a certain town in Tennessee, had occasion recently to correct a little fellow named Johnny. Now Johnny got into a fit of what is called "sulks," because he was whipped; and in order to convince him that he was justly and necessarily punished, his teacher had recourse to the following argument:

"Well, Johnny, suppose you were riding a big horse to water, and had a keen switch in your hand, and all at once the horse were to stop and refuse to go any farther, what would you do?"

Johnny stifled his sobs for a moment, and looking up through his tears, replied,

"I'd cluck to him, sir."

"But, Johnny, suppose he wouldn't go for your clucking, what would you do then?"

"I'd get down and lead him, sir."

"And what if he were obstinate and would not let you lead him?"

"Why, I'd take off his bridle and turn him loose, and walk home, sir."

"You may go and take your seat, Johnny."

Johnny could not be made to see the necessity for using the switch.

During the Repeal agitation in Ireland, a gentleman connected with the Times was sent by that journal to report O'Connell's speeches. One of the first meetings the newspaper man attended was in Kerry. Having heard of O'Connell's polite qualities, he thought he would ask that gentleman's permission to take a verbatim account of the oration. The "Liberator" not only consented, but, in his oiliest manner, informed the assembled audience that "until that gintleman was provided with all writin' convaniences, he would not spake a word," assuming an extra brogue, which was altogether unnecessary. The reporter was delighted. The preparations began, and were completed; the reporter was ready.

"Are you quite ready?" asked Dan.

"Quite ready."

"Now are you sure you're intirely ready?"

"I'm certain, sir. Yes."

The crowd becoming excited and impatient, Dan said,

"Now, 'pon my conscience, I won't begin the speech until the London gintleman is intirely ready."

After waiting another moment or so, O'Connell advanced; eyes glistened; ears were all attention; and the reportorial pencil arose. Dan gave one more benignant smile on the reporter, winked at the auditors, and commenced his speech in the Irish language, to the irrepressible horror of the reporter, and to the infinite delight of all Kerry.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

A British Annexation.—We have advices from the Sandwich Islands to the 16th of April, via the United States, in which we find the following intelligence: "Her Britannic Majesty's steamer Alert took formal possession, for the Queen of England, of Fanning's Island, located in latitude 30 degrees 49 minutes North, longitude 159 degrees 20 minutes West, on the 8th February. The flag of Great Britain was raised amidst a salute of small arms and a twelve pound field howitzer. The entire ship's company officiated at the ceremonies. The harbor has been termed English harbor, and the point which the settlement is situated is called English Point. Everybody seems to feel satisfied that all was right."

The architects of the Crown have presented their report on the Tuileries. They agree that it should be pulled down and rebuilt, but estimate the expense at 95,000,000 francs, or £3,800,000. The Emperor of the French has decided that the old building must be patched up, and that the two wings, the Pavilions de Flore and Hanover, shall only be rebuilt, which will involve an expenditure of 30,000,000 francs. The architects regret that he cannot undertake to rebuild the palace before two or three years. It is said that, when it was notified to the Empress that she would have to wait for her palace, she replied, at dinner at Fontainebleau, "I shall not mind waiting, provided we shall be sure to return to the Tuileries when it shall be rebuilt."

A Ghost "Sold."—The Rev. Dr. Wolff tells a story of a certain M. Preiswerg, of Geneva, a good and excellent Christian, to whom a ghost appeared as he was going to bed, and said, "I am the ghost of a person who was hanged here six weeks ago." "That is no business of mine," replied Preiswerg, "so good night."

A strange affair occurred one night last month in the village of Salvatierra de los Banos, near Madrid. The parish priest received information that his house was to be attacked by a gang of bandits, and at his request four gendarmes, headed by an officer, were sent to protect it. The officer, thinking that, as the priest passed for wealthy, the bandits would go straight to the room in which the reverend gentleman was known to keep his money, placed himself and men there, without lights. At a late hour the thieves arrived, and the gendarmes, who had their carbines loaded and swords drawn, waited quietly until they had entered the room. The strangers were eight in number, and the gendarmes bravely attacked them. A dreadful combat ensued; the gendarmes, after firing their firearms, using their swords and the butt-ends of their carbines, and the others employing pistols and poniards. Eventually three of these latter were killed, four were wounded and took to flight, and the other was made prisoner. As to the gendarmes, all were wounded, although only slightly.

A farmer, near Alnwick, having ploughed over an ancient encampment, recently noticed several heads of strange-looking oats among his crop. Some of them were unusually tall and strong, with long branching stemlets, while others had globular heads resembling the seed of the onion. Mr. Binks selected no less than seventy-five varieties never seen in the district before. The place, it has been conjectured, has been a cavalry camp, and the oats, which were, perhaps, ripened under other skies, after lying covered up with the debris of the camp for probably 1,500 years, will again shoot into cereal beauty, and may add one or more permanent varieties to the stock of the English farmer.

The Chinese boy brought to Strasbourg by the regiment of Pontonniers is named Lai-Too, and his age is nine years. It appears that one very cold day in last December this child came and begged alms of one of the soldiers, named Dorlecq, and that man seeing that he was wretchedly clad and ill-fed, took him to the camp and supplied his wants. The soldier then placed him in the Jesuits' school, where he was distinguished for his extraordinary intelligence. A few days after, a Chinese woman, representing herself to be the child's mother, requested to see the boy, but the latter refused to meet her, and the woman consented to his being brought away by the soldiers. The child has been brought up in the Buddha religion, and has not yet been baptised. The intention is to have him incorporated in the regiment as an enfant de troupe.

The following characteristic note has been published: "Mr. Spurgeon begs to inform the public that he is knocked up with hard work, and is compelled to go into the country and rest. This will upset all his arrangements, and he begs his friends to remit his promises, and the Christian public not to inundate him with invitations."

Flattering Opinions of the Press.
We have much pleasure in recommending this work to our readers.—Tribune, Philadelphia.
We have seen a few of great value in after years, when peace and tranquility again reign in the land.—Brooklyn Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
"The Pictorial History of the War," which is published by Frank Leslie, of New York, is a work of great merit. All who wish to procure, in a cheap form, a record of passing events in this terrible rebellion, should subscribe.—Democrat, Hartford, Conn.
The preparing of the History has been intrusted to Mr. E. Squier, formerly United States Minister to Central America, and a gentleman of established reputation in literature. Besides this, he has spent the last twelve months in the field on the spot. The speed used in large and clear, the engravings are numerous and well executed, and the whole work will be one of great interest. We should say it would be invaluable as a work of record and reference.—Norfolk Co. Journal, Roxbury, Mass.
It will be a continued illustrated history of our present eventful era, and as the ability with which it is to be conducted, it is enough to say that its management will be in the hands of Frank Leslie, E. D. Squier, who is well known to the public as a scientific and literary writer.—Sun, Canada.
Two numbers have already appeared, which, as far as the matter and engravings are concerned, have never been equaled by the American pictorial press.—Boston Transcript.
All who subscribe for this splendid historical work will possess a full and complete account of every occurrence connected with the stirring scenes now being enacted.—New London, C. W.
It will give a complete epitome of the war, with all the facts, scenes, incidents and anecdotes of the same, illustrated by numerous cuts. It is from a competent and partisan pencil, and will be a valuable and reliable portrait of leading officers and statesmen, plans and views of fortifications, battle scenes, &c., &c. The information it will be of inestimable importance and interest, and for preservation will be invaluable.—Salem Register, Dentzler Co., Ind.

FORTUNE'S EDITION,
With 91 Engravings,
Compiled by a graduate of the U. S. Military Academy and Retired Officer of the Regular Army.
This Tactician is designed to explain and illustrate all the Infantry Movements, and is the only work published which contains all the changes in the art of military exercise, and is the only Correct System which each citizen soldier can well confide in. It is intended to illustrate the careful and Rigorous instruction necessary to produce well drilled Companies, and to convey to the mind of the precision and accuracy of movements requisite for the more complicated manœuvres of Battalions and Brigades. Besides which full instruction is given in the Duties of Officers and other movements of Skirmishers, so far as pertains to the ordinary manœuvres of an Army, together with the Banner Drill, sufficiently described and illustrated to furnish each Regimental Color Bearer with the Soldier master of his piece, and perfectly self-taught when brought singly in contact with the equipments of Infantry, or with a company or Battalion.
Each Musket and Rifle Musket are used in the U. S. Army, full information is given in the Manual of Arms for each, together with numerous Illustrations of the various positions of the Soldier and his piece during the execution of the several manœuvres.
The Author has also been taken to make no innovations on what has received official sanction, all the Exercises and Drills being in strict conformity with the latest regulations of the War Department, excepting of the improvements in Military Science, by which greater celerity of movement, more serious formation, and the exercise of a unanimity commands are ensured, thus rendering this Tactician the most perfect Drill Book ever published. It is the only Authorized Edition of the U. S. Infantry, and a little to-the-book for all who desire to become familiar with standard Infantry Tactics and Regular Drill.

BATTLE OF RICH MOUNTAIN, BETWEEN THE U. S. FORCES UNDER GENERAL ROSEIS OF MAJOR-GENERAL MCCLELLAN'S COMMAND AND THE SECESSION TROOPS UNDER COLONEL PEGRAM.—THE THIRTEENTH INDIANA REGIMENT CHARGING DOWN THE PIKE IN THE FACE OF A LARGE BODY OF REBEL TROOPS, CAPTURING A CANNON WHICH THEY WERE ENDEAVORING TO CARRY FROM THE FIELD.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ACCOMPANYING MAJOR-GENERAL MCCLELLAN'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 168.

GREAT BATTLES IN VIRGINIA.

Advance of the Federal Army on Manassas Junction.

BRILLIANT VICTORY OF THE FEDERAL TROOPS AT BULL'S RUN.

THE ENEMY RETREATS TOWARDS MANASSAS JUNCTION.

The advance of the Grand Federal Army towards Manassas Junction was the signal of great rejoicing throughout the loyal part of the country. Successively as they advanced, the rebels retreated before them and Fairfax Court House and Centreville fell into the hands of our troops, and on Saturday morning, at half past two, the whole army, with the exception of the reserve, advanced towards Bull's Run, which was strongly fortified by masked batteries, and is about three and a half miles in advance of Manassas Junction. The advancing army numbered forty-five thousand men.

The Union Army advanced from Centreville in three columns at three o'clock on Sunday morning. Col. Richardson commanded the column by the road to Bull's Run, where the action of Thursday took place, and Colonel Miles lay on the road and at Centreville to support him.

General Tyler commanded the centre division, which took the Warrenton road, General Schenck and Colonel Sherman being in advance. He had the three Connecticut regiments, two from Michigan, two from Wisconsin, and the Sixty-ninth and Seventy-ninth from New York. General McDowell, with Colonel Hunter and a very powerful division, went out on this road, which leads directly forward to Manassas, crossing Bull's Run by a stone bridge, which had been mined.

The attack by these two points was intended mainly as a feint. The real attack was by Hunter, who took a narrow road two miles out leading to the right, having Hunt's and the Rhode Island batteries, and leaving Colonel Keyes in the centre at the crossing of the roads as a reserve. His orders were to proceed high up the stream, cut himself a path through the woods, cross over, and turn the position of the rebels on the north.

At ten minutes before six the centre halted about a mile this side of the position of the rebels. The Sixty-ninth and Seventy-ninth Regiments of New York were thrown to the right, in the woods, and the First and Second Ohio and the Second New York to the left in advance.

The thirty-pound Parrott gun was planted in the middle of the road, and at ten minutes past six it threw two shells into the battery of the enemy, but without eliciting any response. Ten minutes after firing was heard on the left from Richardson's column, which was continued at intervals for two hours, but without eliciting any reply.

At twenty minutes to eight Ayer's battery, formerly Sherman's, fired five or six rounds into the enemy, but without response. At a quarter before nine shots were rapidly exchanged between the opposing skirmishers, and Gardner, of Lacrosse, belonging to the Rhode Island regiment, was reported killed.

At about ten o'clock heavy clouds of dust showed that reinforcements were coming up to the rebels from Manassas, and was continued through the next three or four hours.

At eleven o'clock Ayer's battery went to the front; the Sixty-ninth, New York, was ordered to deploy into the field in front, and firing was heard from Hunter's division, on the extreme right, far in advance.

The Ohio regiments were pushed forward with the Second New York, and ran upon a masked battery of four guns, which killed and wounded quite a number of both. Of the latter, Michael McCarty, Sergeant of Company H, was wounded, and afterwards was reported dead. Lieutenant Dempsey received a slight wound. Some twenty or thirty of the Ohio regiment broke and ran, but the rest stood firm, as did the Second New York.

Carlisle's battery was brought to the front on the right, and soon drove the rebels out of the masked battery.

It was now half-past eleven o'clock, when Hunter's column appeared across the Run, advancing on the flank of the rebels, and the engagement soon became very active in his position. He kept steadily advancing, pouring in a steady fire of artillery and musketry.

The whole brigade under Tyler was ordered forward to his support. The Sixty-ninth and Seventy-ninth New York, the First, Second and Third Connecticut, and the Second Wisconsin were sent in. A constant roll of musketry marked Hunter's advance, and the artillery from our column played incessantly on the flank of the rebels. So far as could be seen the latter were pushed backward a considerable distance to the road directly in front of where I stood, across which they charged twice with the bayonet upon our troops, but were repulsed each time. Our men crossed the road and poured in upon them a terrible fire of artillery and musketry.

The most gallant charge of the day was made by the New York Sixty-ninth, Seventy-ninth and Thirteenth, who rushed up upon one of the batteries, firing as they proceeded, with perfect eclat, and attacking it with the bayonet's point. The yell of triumph seemed to carry all before it. They found that the rebels had abandoned the battery, and only taken one gun, but this success was acquired only after a severe loss of life, in which the Sixty-ninth most severely suffered, and it was reported that Lieutenant-Colonel Nugent was amongst the first killed.

The Zouaves also distinguished themselves by their spirited assaults on the batteries at the point of the bayonet, but it is feared that their loss is immense.

A Mississippi soldier was taken prisoner by Hasbrouck, of the Wisconsin Second regiment. He turned out to be Brigadier-Quartermaster Pryor, cousin to Roger A. Pryor. He was captured, with his horse, as he by accident rode into our lines. He discovered himself by remarking to Hasbrouck, "We are getting badly cut to pieces." "What regiment do you belong?" asked Hasbrouck. "The Nineteenth Mississippi," was the answer. "Then you are my prisoner," said Hasbrouck.

From the statements of this prisoner, it appears that our artillery has made great havoc among the rebels, of whom there are from 30,000 to 40,000 in the field, under command of General Beauregard, while they have a reserve of 75,000 at the Junction.

He describes an officer most prominent in the fight, distinguished from the rest by his white horse, as Jeff Davis. He confirms the previous reports of a regiment of negro troops in the rebel forces, but says that it is difficult to get them to proper discipline in battle array.

The position of the enemy extended in three lines, in the form of a triangle the apex fronting the centre of our column. The area seems to have been filled with masked batteries.

According to the latest bulletins received at headquarters at Washington, the rebels were finally compelled to retire with precipitation from their position, and fell back behind their Manassas lines—some accounts say with the loss of all their ordnance and equipments. Our latest advices direct from the battlefield have the fight still in progress, but there seems to be no doubt, from the nature of the latest official bulletins, that the success of the National arms has been complete. The losses in killed and wounded on our side are very heavy—those of the rebels must have been fearful, from the superior nature of our arms and the rapidity and precision with which they were served.

Scarcely had we put the above in type when rumors of a terrible disaster reached us, which told of the Rout and Defeat of the Federal Army.

We could scarcely credit the telegrams as they arrived, but we were at length compelled to realise the sad intelligence, that after its first advance with such an extraordinary success, it met with a defeat of the most disastrous character.

Many confused statements are prevalent, but enough is known to warrant the statement that we have suffered in a degree which has cast a gloom over the remnants of the army, and excited the deepest melancholy in Washington.

The carnage is tremendously heavy on both sides, and on ours it is represented as frightful. We were advancing, and taking their masked batteries gradually, but surely, and by driving the enemy towards Manassas Junction, when they seem to have been reinforced by General Johnson, who, it is understood, took command and immediately commenced driving us back, when a panic among our troops suddenly occurred, and a regular stampede took place.

It is thought that General McDowell undertook to make a stand at or about Centreville, but the panic was so fearful that the whole army became demoralized, and it was impossible to check them, either at Centreville or at Fairfax Court House.

General McDowell intended to make another stand at Fairfax Court House, but our forces being in full retreat he could not accomplish the object.

Beyond Fairfax Court House the retreat was kept up until the men reached their regular encampments, a portion of whom returned to them, but a still larger portion coming inside the entrenchments.

A large number of the troops in their retreat fell on the wayside from exhaustion, and scattered along the route all the way from Fairfax Court House.

The road from Bull's Run was strewed with knapsacks, arms, &c. Some of our troops deliberately threw away their guns and appurtenances, the better to facilitate their travel.

General McDowell was in the rear of the retreat, exerting himself to rally his men, but only with partial effect.

The latter part of the army, it is said, made their retreat in order. He was completely exhausted, having slept but little for three nights. His orders on the field did not at all times reach those for whom they were intended.

It is supposed that the force sent out against our troops consisted, according to a prisoner's statement, of about 30,000 men, including a large number of cavalry. He further says that owing to reinforcements from Richmond, Staunton and other points, the enemy's effective force was 90,000 men.

According to the statement of two Fire Zouaves they only have about two hundred men left from the slaughter, while the Sixty-ninth and other regiments frightfully suffered in killed and wounded. The number cannot now be known.

Sherman's, Carlisle's, Griffin's and the West Point batteries were taken by the enemy, and the eight siege and 32 rifle cannon, the latter being too cumbrous to remove. They were two miles the other side of Centreville. Such of the wounded as were brought to the Centreville hospital were left there, after having their wounds properly dressed by Surgeon Frank H. Hamilton.

The panic was so great that the attempt to rally them to a stand at Centreville was entirely in vain. If a firm stand had been made there, our troops could have been reinforced and much disaster prevented. General McDowell was thus foiled in his well arranged plans.

The cause of the panic is variously stated, but it seems to have originated in the following manner: All our military operations went swimmingly on, and Colonel Alexander was about erecting a pontoon across Bull's Run.

The enemy were seemingly in retreat, and their batteries being unmasked one after another, when a terrible consternation broke out among the teamsters, who had incautiously advanced immediately after the body of the army, and lined the Warrenton road.

Their consternation was shared in by numerous civilians who were on the ground, and for a time it seemed as if our whole army was in retreat.

Many baggage wagons were emptied, and their horses galloped across the open fields; all the fences of which were torn down to allow them a more rapid retreat.

For a time a perfect panic prevailed, which communicated itself to the vicinity of Centreville, and every available conveyance was seized upon by agitated civilians. Wounded soldiers cried on the road side for assistance, but the alarm was so great that numbers were passed by.

Several similar alarms occurred on previous occasions, when a change of batteries rendered the retirement of the artillery on our part necessary, and it is most probable that the alarm was owing to the same fact.

The reserve force at Centreville was immediately brought up and marched in double quick step in the following order:

Colonel Einstein's Twenty-seventh Pennsylvania regiment, with two guns.

The Garibaldi Guards and Colonel Blenker's first rifle regiment, with its batteries, followed at several miles distant by the DeKalb Regiment.

Two new masked batteries had been opened by the Secessionists on the left flank, and that position of the division had its lines broken and demanded immediate re-enforcement.

The right was in good order. The battery erected on the hill-side, directly opposite the main battery of the enemy, was doing good execution and additional guns were being mounted.

The army in its retreat from Centreville was protected in rear by Colonel Miles's reserve.

It is impossible at the time of going to press to procure a positively reliable account of the retreat, the cause of the retreat, the amount of the casualties, or whether the enemy had retired to their fastnesses or were in pursuit of our retreating forces. To account rationally for such a panic as is said to have seized upon the advance army seems to be hopeless. The daring and sublime courage which they exhibited the day previous forbids for one moment the idea of cowardice; they then dared death in a thousand forms, nothing stayed their impetuosity, and yet in a moment a mortal fear seems to have been communicated from regiment to regiment all through the whole body, and the masses fled like sheep following their leader in very blindness of fear. A day or two will explain this strange mystery, and until then we must be content to know that the Union army has suffered a terrible defeat, which the honor of our people demands shall be speedily and thoroughly avenged, and the memory of it wiped out by a victory which shall determine the fate of the Rebel army in Virginia.

There can be no doubt that we have been fearfully overmatched; that our gallant fellows were combating one against two; but these odds would have mattered little but for that mysterious panic which at this distance we can neither understand nor account for. While our army was barely forty-five thousand men, the enemy numbered full ninety thousand, protected by immensely strong lines and by numerous and powerful masked batteries.

The loss on both sides is said to be terrible. The lowest accounts place the loss of each army at between twenty-five hundred and three thousand men, or six thousand in all. This is assuredly the most terrible and bloody battle ever fought on this Continent, and the saddest phase of it is that it is, so far as we know at present, without any positive results, excepting that it will rouse the whole North as one man, and cause an army of overwhelming proportions to be thrown upon Virginia, when a bloodier and more terrible conflict will ensue, involving the certain defeat of the brave but misguided force in arms against their country.

LATER DESPATCH.

Overwhelming Rebel Re-enforcement.

It is known that on the day previous to the battle a large number of troops publicly protested against being led by General Schenck, and it was only through the importunities of Colonel McCook, in whom they placed all confidence, and others, that they were prevented from making a more formidable rebellion.

The Pennsylvania Fourth was not in the action, having left for home on the morning of the battle, their term of service having expired.

It was known to our troops at the time of the battle yesterday that Johnson's forces had formed a connection with Beauregard on the night of the first action at Bull's Run.

Our men could distinctly hear the cars coming into Manassas Junction, and the cheers with which the Confederates hailed their newly arriving comrades. They knew that the enemy was our superior in number, and in their own position.

These facts were further confirmed by prisoners taken, deserters and spies, but were not probably known at Washington, and the officers, in leading our men into action, only obeyed orders.

General Schenck, as well as the older field officers, acted admirably. He collected his forces and covered the retreat, and up to the last moment was personally engaged in the endeavor to rally his men to make a stand at Centreville.

It was the arrival of fresh re-enforcements to the enemy in superior numbers that turned the scale of battle.

The enemy, before now, might perhaps have more to boast of if they had followed up their advantage last night.

The Killed and Wounded.

Lieutenant Colonel Fowler, of New York Fourteenth.

Colonel Lawrence, of Fifth Massachusetts regiment, Captain Ellis of Seventy-first New York, badly.

Colonel Farnham and Major Cregier, of the Zouaves, are not killed, but badly wounded.

The Seventy-first New York lost about half their men.

Colonel Cameron of the Seventy-ninth N. Y. V., killed.

Colonel Hunter, severely wounded in the throat.

Reported killed—Lieutenant-Colonel Nugent and Captain Thomas Francis Meagher, of the Sixty-ninth N. Y. S. M.

The following Regiments were Engaged in the Fight:

The First, Second and Third Connecticut regiments.

The First regiment of Regulars, composed of the Second, Third and Eighth companies.

Two hundred and fifty marines.

The Eighth and Fourteenth New York Militia.

The First and Second Rhode Island.

The Seventy-first New York.

The Second New Hampshire.

The Fifth Massachusetts.

The First Minnesota.

The First Michigan.

The Eleventh and Thirty-eighth New York.

The Second, Fourth and Fifth Maine, and

The Second Vermont Regiments,

besides the several batteries.

LATEST NEWS FROM THE BATTLE FIELD.

Gen. McDowell behaved with admirable gallantry. He was continually in the front of the battle, and made his reconnoissance in person, and issued his orders with coolness and courage; but the bravery of the commanding officers was unavailing to arrest a panic beginning in the rear.

The Fire Zouaves fought like devils. Their heroism in repelling a charge of cavalry, while they were charging upon one of the batteries, is the theme of universal admiration.

The New York Seventy-first, Fourteenth and Twenty-seventh fought with wonderful gallantry.

The Minnesota and Maine regiments won the praise of all. They were mowed down like grass by the batteries upon which they advanced. The flag of the Minnesota regiment was riddled by the bullets of the enemy.

Col. Slocum of the Second Rhode Island regiment was killed by a shot in the head.

Col. Wilcox of the First Michigan regiment was wounded and taken prisoner.

Col. Wood of the Fourteenth New York regiment, wounded and taken prisoner.

The following is a list of the wounded brought from the battle-field at Bull's Run to the Government Hospital up to eight p. m. Monday.

Second Wisconsin Regiment—Company —Wm. S. Lynch; Company F, J. Hamer, A. Boghee, W. Rowe, Harvey McDaniel, Henry R. McCollum, T. D. Bilne, Samuel N. Bird; Company K, Cornelius Lebriever; Company C, Corporal C. C. Dow, Lieut. A. A. Meredith.

Thirteenth New York Regiment—Company F, A. McVane; Company A, James A. Galt.

First Connecticut Regiment—Company A, J. W. Burgress, Charles C. Lills; Company C, Charles McElroy.

Thirty-eighth New York Regiment—Company H, Barney Milliean.

Seventy-ninth New York Regiment—Company F, Lieut. J. B. St. Clair, Corporal John Frazer, J. Mitchell, Sergeant Macomb; Company B, H. Black.

Sixteenth New York Regiment—Company D, J. Sullivan; Company C, Christopher Cumming.

Second Maine Regiment—Company F, James Cord.

Third Minnesota Regiment—Company H, Wm. Judkins, severely.

Second Rhode Island Battery—C. D. Gladding.

Fifteenth New York Regiment—Company G, Michael Maher.

Fourteenth New York Regiment—Company C, Henry Amos.

Second New York Regiment—Company C, D. Reilly.

Second United States Artillery—Company E, C. Erlough.

Fourth Maine Regiment—Company B, E. R. Blackington; Company K, Wm. H. Gardner.

Third Connecticut Regiment—Company H, Jacob Schroff; Company K, Thos. S. Winton.

Second Michigan Regiment—Company C, Horace Dingman.

All in this hospital are slightly wounded, except Judkins, whose thigh is terribly torn, probably by a grapeshot. The Minie ball by which Burgess was wounded in the left arm lodged in his watch, where it is very curiously wedged among the works.

The following comprises the killed and wounded in the Fourteenth New York Regiment, Colonel Wood, as far as ascertained:

Killed—Company B, Fagan, McManus, Maxfield; Company D, Horn; Company E, Davenport, Wade, Shields; Company C, Ensign Read, Brown; Company F, Schell, Kelly, Sullivan, McCarty, Dietz, Smith, Fay, Morrow, Fesei, Baldwin and Scott.

Wounded—Company C, TenEyck, Hicks, McLear, Snyder, Daynell, DeWitt; Company D, McClung; Company E, Henry Amos; Company F, Prescott, Adams, Middleton.

Twenty men in these companies were slightly wounded.

Of the battalion of United States Marines, Major Zeilen, commanding Company A, was twice wounded; Lieutenant Hitchcock killed, Lieutenant Hale wounded. Only seventy out of three hundred and fifty of the marines have as yet returned to the barracks. As they are chiefly new recruits, they are probably scattered about, but neither killed nor wounded.

It is already ascertained that the number of killed and wounded has been greatly exaggerated. It is believed now that the killed on our side will be between three and five hundred.

Captain E. H. Tillinghast, Assistant Quartermaster, United States Army, is reported dead.

Captain Ayres, United States Army, is not taken prisoner, nor killed, as reported.

The whole of Sherman's battery is saved.

Colonel Blenker, commanding a brigade in the division of Colonel Miles, which brought up the rear of the retreating column, picked up on the way the guns of Burnside's Second Rhode Island Regiment, that had been left behind, and brought them in. The horses had been detached for the purpose of bringing in the wounded.

Hon. A. H. Ely, of the Rochester district, and his companion on the field, Mr. Bliss, recently employed on Appleton's Encyclopedia, have not been heard of since the battle. They were last seen near one of our batteries, and are supposed to have been taken prisoners.

The following officers of the Seventy-ninth Regiment are reported killed: R. T. Shillinglaw, Captain Company I; David Morrison, Captain Company E; William Manson, Captain Company A; David Brown, Captain Company D.

Captain Griffin lost sixty of the horses attached to his battery, but brought away one gun and the fuze.

Senator Wade has arrived at Washington. He left two divisions of the army at Centreville. The army remained within their entrenchments.

General Tyler had thrown up entrenchments at Centreville. There was no prospect of an attack. Governor Sprague spiked the battery of the Second Rhode Island Regiment on the field.

THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

EXTRA SESSION.

Senate, JULY 15.—John W. Forney received 26 out of 36 votes, and was elected Secretary to the Senate. The Army Bills were passed. The $250,000,000 Loan Bill was then considered. A bill was introduced for confiscating the property of rebels.

JULY 16.—A petition from Marshall O. Roberts was presented, demanding indemnification for the loss of the Star of the West. The resolution approving the acts of the President was then introduced. This proved the text upon which Mr. Breckinridge discoursed at considerable length, rehearsing the old arguments against the right of the Government to put down rebellion, which have a thousand times been successfully refuted. In the course of his remarks, however, he took occasion to deny positively that he had ever telegraphed to Jeff Davis that President Lincoln's Congress would not be allowed to meet in Washington on the 4th of July, or that Kentucky would furnish 7,000 armed men for the rebel army. After some discussion by other members, the subject was postponed, and the Naval Appropriation Bill was passed.

JULY 17.—A memorial was presented by Pearce, of Maryland, from Kane, Merriman and others, protesting their innocence. The Naval Bill was then discussed.

JULY 18.—Mr. Powell, of Kentucky, opposed the Military Bills, proposing an amendment that the army and navy should not be used to subjugate the South. Mr. Sherman made an eloquent and crushing reply.

JULY 19.—The proceedings were quite unimportant, being confined to matters relative to soldiers' letters, &c.

July 20.—After the presentation of resolutions and petitions, Mr. Hale presented a bill, which was laid over, to increase the medical corps of the navy. Mr Johnson, of Tennessee, introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs providing for the transportation of arms and munitions of war to loyal citizens in States now in rebellion, and for the military organization of such citizens for defence. The resolution approving the acts of the President was subsequently taken up, and Mr. Latham, of California, addressed the Senate at considerable length in support of all those acts, with the exception of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in Maryland. He administered a marked rebuke to Mr. Breckinridge and the other apologists of Secession on the floor. The subject was finally postponed until Monday, and the Senate went into Executive session.

House, July 15.—A resolution requesting the Secretary of the Navy to supply a sufficient force to suppress rebel privateering was adopted. Ben. Wood, of New York, offered a resolution providing for a National Convention, to devise measures for the restoration of peace to the country. It was laid on the table by a vote of 92 to 51. Bills to increase the efficiency of the army were reported and referred. A select committee was ordered on the subject of a general bankrupt law, to report to the next session of Congress. Mr. Vallandigham offered resolutions condemning the President's action in reference to the war, but they were promptly laid on the table. A bill to define and punish conspiracy was passed by a vote of 123 to 7. A resolution was adopted directing the withholding of money due on account of the steamer Catalise until the Select Committee on Contracts report thereon. A resolution directing the Committee on Elections to inquire whether Hon. Henry May, a member from Maryland, has been holding criminal intercourse with the rebels, and to report what course should be taken in the premises, was adopted. The Senate's amendments to the Volunteer Bill were concurred in, and the House adjourned.

July 16.—A bill was introduced for the more efficient blockade of the rebel ports. The Senate bill, authorising the President to accept the services of 500,000 volunteers, was reported by Mr. Blair, from the Military Committee, with a proviso allowing the President to select the Major and Brigadier-Generals from the line, and passed. The Senate's amendments to the Loan Bill were all concurred in, and the bill went to the President for his signature. The House then passed a unanimous vote of thanks to Gen. McClellan and his officers and men, for recent brilliant victories, and subsequently considered and passed the bill to promote the efficiency of the volunteer forces.

July 17.—The Hon. Henry May, of Maryland, whose recent visit to Richmond has caused so much conversation, then took his seat. The Tariff Bill was discussed.

July 18.—Mr. May made an explanation of his visit to Richmond. He defended Kane and the Police Commissioners. The general opinion of the House was, that Mr. May had better have stayed in Richmond and taken his seat in the Rebel Congress. The bill for increasing the Regular Army was then passed.

July 19.—Mr. Crittenden, of Ky., asked leave to submit resolutions declaring the present civil war had been forced on us by the Disunionists of the Southern States now in rebellion against the Government of the United States; that in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feelings of passion and resentment, will recollect only their duty to their country; that the war is not waged for conquest or subjugation, or for interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to maintain and defend the supremacy of the Constitution, with the rights and equality under it unimpaired; that as soon as these objects shall be accomplished the war ought to cease. Mr. Stevens objected to the introduction of the resolutions. The Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means announced that he had no more bills to report, and moved an adjournment till Monday, which was agreed to.

July 20.—There was no House to day.

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S SPEECH.

Mr. Davis opened the Southern Congress on the 20th of July, with an address which is chiefly devoted to a critical review of President Lincoln's recent Message part of which he endeavors to controvert. The most interesting part is the statement that Major Taylor's late mission to Washington was to inform Mr. Lincoln that he would take a fearful vengeance on the unhappy prisoners in his hands, should he punish the pirates of the Savannah and other captured privateers. He declares that the Southern States are only fighting for their rights. There is, of course, no intimation of surrender in it. On two occasions he endeavors to appeal to the fears of his hearers by drawing a picture of the barbarities practised on women and children, which everybody knows is a most unblushing falsehood. The document is, as far as it has reached us, both undignified and sanguinary.

THE BATTLE AT RICH MOUNTAIN, WESTERN VIRGINIA.

The victories achieved by Major-General McClellan's column at Rich Mountain and St. George's have proved of immense importance in their results. The Secession strength in that section of the country is nearly, if not entirely, broken up. The details of the battle at Rich Mountain have reached us, together with some brilliant sketches of the action from our Special Artist accompanying Major General McClellan's command, which we present to our readers in our present issue.

[From our Special Correspondent.]

On the 8th the main column under General McClellan resumed their march towards Beverley. A reconnoitreing party of fifty-eight men of the Third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, under Captain Lawson, who had been thrown in advance, received information of a small party of Secessionists holding Middlefork Bridge, and resolved to capture them if possible. They crossed the creek below the bridge and attacked the enemy, who were stationed on and around the bridge. No sooner, however, was the skirmish commenced, than a large body of the enemy made their appearance on the hill in their rear and forced them to fall back. The Secessionists withdrew at the advance of McClellan's force, which encamped at the bridge during the night. On Tuesday an advance was made to Roaring Run, where our troops again went into camp. On Wednesday afternoon a reconnoitring party consisting of the several companies of the Ninth Ohio regiment, under Colonel McCook, were sent out towards Rich Mountain, to discover the exact position and force of the enemy. The Ninth Ohio regiment is composed of the Cincinnati Turners, and is one of the best drilled and most effective body of men in the field. They deployed as skirmishers, and displayed such wonderful determination and courage, that it is believed that, had they had orders and support, they would have dislodged the enemy. They went close to the entrenchments and ascertained the position of the batteries and breastworks, killed several of the enemy, and brought away two prisoners. The Germans lost one killed and one wounded.

It being evident that the position of the rebels was exceedingly strong, and if defended with determination, would make a great sacrifice of life in the attempt to take it unavoidable, an attack from the rear was determined upon. A guide had been procured, and General Rosencrans with detachments of the Eighth Indiana, Colonel Benton, Tenth Indiana, Colonel Manson, Thirteenth Indiana, Colonel Sullivan, and Nineteenth Ohio regiment, Colonel Beatty, started on a detour up the mountain, the rear being brought up by Captain Burdsal's Cincinnati dragoons.

A road had to be cut by the advance guards through the underbrush, and thus they travelled through the mountains and through ravines, over rocks and roots, on a road considered impassable, and came in full view of the enemy on the summit of Rich Mountain, at half-past two o'clock P. M., Thursday afternoon. The enemy's pickets first fired on our column, desperately wounding Captain Charles Miller of the Tenth Indiana, by a musket ball in his right lung, killing Sergeant Tagart of the same company, and wounding one or two privates. The attempt was made to form a line of battle, but the impracticability of the ground preventing, they filed to better ground and formed; the Eighth Indiana in the centre, Tenth Indiana right, Thirteenth Indiana left flank, the Nineteenth Ohio and Burdsal's dragoons being kept as reserve half a mile in the rear.

The Beverley pike runs over the summit of the mountain in its lowest elevation, and on both sides of it the hills rise gradually. On the left the enemy had a line of breastworks made of logs, and a battery planted on each side of a log stable on the side of the road. The hill on the right is covered with low underbrush and trees on the summit, but cleared about half the way up. As soon as our troops appeared in the open space, a heavy fire was opened upon them, the enemy firing shot, shell and grape, but firing wild and doing but little damage. Our boys dropped flat, and deployed as skirmishers, advancing slowly. The enemy mistaking the movement—probably imagining that they had killed the crowd—a large number rushed from their breastworks with a shout, and approached the road. Then our boys fired a most terrific and destructive volley and rushed in on bayonet. The fight now raged promiscuously all over the hill. Captain Thomas J. Brady, of the Eighth, with a private silenced the battery. The enemy were driven back up the hill, over their breastworks and completely routed.

Our boys chased them up the mountains, yelling like Indians, and keeping up a continuous fire.

The battle continued for an hour and a half from the first to the last shot. After the fight the dead and wounded were gathered. General Rosencrans ordered the surgeons to take care of the severely wounded of the enemy before attending to the slightly wounded of our own men. We lost nine dead and some twenty or thirty wounded, three of whom have died since. The enemy lost two hundred killed and wounded, which seemed to me so incredible that I took special pains to get the exact truth, and find that such is really the case. One hundred and eighty men were buried the day of the battle, and numbers have been found since who had been dragged off to the mountains to die.

On Friday General McClellan advanced to Beverley, when six hundred and fifty men, under Colonels Heck and Pegram, came out of the woods and surrendered. Some of the enemy's cavalry were at Beverley, but fled precipitately on the approach of General McClellan, who arrived at noon.

The prisoners were nearly starved, and were immediately supplied with food, and treated with the utmost humanity. They are now stationed at the Beverley Academy, where they are provided with all the necessaries of life; the officers are mostly on parole, and board in town.

Capture of an Eight-pound Brass Cannon.

When the enemy were driven from their breastworks on the summit they attempted to run off one of their cannon. Captain Sayles and Lieutenant Atkisson, with about forty men of Company C of the Thirteenth Indiana, accompanied by Major Foster and Adjutant Ross, started in pursuit. One of the horses attached to the gun had been shot, and fell in the road, the cannon running on top of it; the Secessionists had unhitched the other horses, and left about fifty men to defend the cannon. The Indianans on turning the road found the enemy drawn up across in front, firing from a log cabin and from bushes on the side of the way. They fired, stormed the house and charged bayonet down the road, driving the enemy from their position, taking several prisoners and capturing the cannon without losing a man.

Colonel Pegram left as secretly as possible, taking to the woods. He abandoned everything—tents, horses, baggage, indeed everything that could not be carried by men struggling for life in the rocky mountains, in a dark and rainy night. The victory was complete. The number of prisoners taken at the time was very considerable, but has since been greatly increased. There will, probably, be a thousand, as Colonel Pegram, with six hundred men, after wandering in the hills for thirty-six hours, and being completely hemmed in, sent in to General McClellan, proposing to surrender as prisoners of war.

The following is the correspondence between Colonel Pegram and Major General McClellan:

Headquarters at Mr. Kettle's House, near Tygart's Valley River,
Six Miles from Beverley, July 12, 1861.

To "Commanding Officer" of Northern Forces, Beverley, Virginia.

Sir—I write to state to you that I have, in consequence of the retreat of General Garnett, and the jaded and reduced condition of my command, most of them having been without food for two days, concluded, with the concurrence of a majority of my Captains and field officers, to surrender my command to you, to-morrow, as prisoners of war. I have only to add, I trust they will only receive at your hands such treatment as has been invariably shown to the Northern prisoners by the South.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
JOHN PEGRAM,
Lieutenant-Colonel P. A. C. S., commanding.

It is asserted by guides that Colonel Pegram's force, collected since his flight, is between six and seven hundred men, who have thus offered to surrender.

General McClellan sent the following reply by his Aide-de-Camp, Lieutenant Williams, United States Army:

Headquarters, Department of Ohio, Beverley, Va.,
July 13, 1861

John Pegram, Esq., styling himself Lieutenant-Colonel P. A. C. S.:

Sir—Your communication, dated yesterday, proposing to surrender as prisoners of war of the force assembled under your command, has been delivered to me. As commander of this department, I will receive you and them with the kindness due to prisoners of war; but it is not in my power to relieve you or them from any liabilities incurred by taking arms against the United States.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General U. S. A., Commanding Department.

The unconditional surrender demanded by the Union commander was accepted by Colonel Pegram, who was shortly after brought into the lines of the Federal forces. The subsequent death of General Garnett and the rout of his army completed the triumph of the column under command of Major-General McClellan.

Later News.

Wednesday, Morning, July 24

Accounts from the battle field are becoming clearer, and reveal the following points:

Our attack upon Bull's Run was a victory. The retreat of our army before a vastly superior force was in good order and facing the foe.

The whole talent of the rebels was engaged in the contest. Jefferson Davis commanding the centre, and Beauregard and Johnston the wings. The enemy was in no position to advance to take advantage of our retreat, and with but twenty thousand of our force we engaged from sixty to ninety thousand of the crack troops of the rebels, and drove them from their batteries.

The advance of our army did not retreat beyond Centreville, the stampede occuring in the rear, and caused by the needless terror of spectators and teamsters.

Our loss in guns was only eight. Our loss in men has happily been reduced from the first fearful account. The loss will possibly reach one thousand men in all.

The rebel officers acknowledge to a fearful havoc in their ranks. They calculate their loss at from four to five thousand.

WAR NEWS FROM THE SOUTH.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.—The Grand Jury have found a bill against Marshal Kane. He will be tried for treason and conspiracy. Two fair Secessionists appeared the other day in the streets wearing a rebel emblem, and armed with daggers to defend them. The Tammany regiment behaved so riotously in the cars that Superintendent Clarke threatened to pitch them over an embankment. Governor Hicks is fast recovering his popularity. On the 18th July, on his return to Baltimore, he was serenaded. He made a speech full of Union sentiment.

WESTERN VIRGINIA, Wheeling.—The Legislature is now sitting, and Governor Pierpont reigns instead of John Letcher. General McClellan's vigor has entirely cleared the whole of this part of the Old Dominion of rebellion, and he will be in a few days on his way to join the grand army in Eastern Virginia. Ex Governor Wise and his son are somewhere near Ripley with sixteen hundred men, and it is expected every day to hear of their capture. General McClellan had issued a proclamation complimenting his army upon their victories. He states that within the last few days they have captured five guns, twelve colors, fifteen hundred stand of arms and one thousand prisoners, including more than forty officers. One of the second commanders of the rebels is a prisoner; the other lost his life on the battle-field. More than two hundred and fifty of the enemy have been killed, and they have lost all their baggage and camp equipage. This has been accomplished with the loss of only twenty men killed and sixty wounded of the National forces. His army now amounts to a considerable number:

Ohio volunteers	16 regiments.
Indiana volunteers	6 regiments.
Virginia volunteers	3 regiments.
Kentucky volunteers	2 regiments.
Artillery	4 corps.
Cavalry	1 corps

The whole army of Western Virginia now comprises little short of thirty thousand men. Two or three regiments are, however, still on the Ohio River, and a distinct division is operating on the Kanawha. The Twelfth and Fourth Ohio regiments, with the First and Second Kentucky, under General Cox, now constitute the Kanawha army. It will probably be reinforced, either from Camp Dennison or from a part of McClellan's corps, lying at Glenville or Beverley. At any rate, the marauders under Wise and Jenkins will be cleared out.

H. A. Wise issued at Lewisburg the following crazy proclamation: "Are there any who hide their wrath, and bide their time, when the invaders shall come and make them strong? Crush them in advance of the invader as you would fortify your defence. There is not a moment to be lost; the invader is come. Follow me, I repeat, and you who can't come send your arms and your alms to the noble bands who are now braving the elements, dreading less the heat and the cold, the dampness and the death, than the disgrace and dishonor of subjugation. Come, I say, to the camp. I will take you in the legion for the war or for the year, or out of the legion, for the fight. Come and tarry awhile, at least with us, in the field of glorious strife, for inestimable rights. Wounds are soothing there! Come and partake of our frugal rations in camp—enter in faith and hope, and herd there; it is sweeter than honey. Come! If you don't come, you shall be 'the jest of women and the scorn of men,' and coward, sluggard, knave, traitor or trifler shall be branded black upon your name for life and lives hereafter. Your mothers of the cradle and your mother State shall disown and dishonor you. Come to the camp, then, or there is a death more deadly for you, and more to be dreaded than the death by 'fire and blood.'"

EASTERN VIRGINIA, Fortress Monroe.—An affair has recently occurred near Fortress Monroe, which it is hoped will have the effect of putting an end to the system of irresponsible scouting which seems to have prevailed there. On Thursday night a party, few in number and poorly armed, started out from Hampton without permission, and were surprised in the woods beyond Newmarket Bridge by a party of rebels. One of our men—T. E. Rawlings, formerly of this city, Major of the Kentucky Light Cavalry—was instantly killed, and two were wounded and taken prisoners, while the rest escaped. The number of rebel troops at Norfolk and vicinity is reported by a deserter to be less than ten thousand, but they feel perfect confidence in their ultimate success. Jeff. Davis was at Richmond at last advices, where much depression is represented to exist on account of the recent rebel reverses in Western Virginia.

The Baltimore Sun says: "All the woods obstructing the view between Fortress Monroe and the Sewall's Point Battery had been cut and burned off. The Confederates could be seen from the Fortress, and they were busily engaged on their defences. The distance between the two points is 3¼ miles, and it is supposed at the Fortress that they have obtained some heavy rifled cannon, which will be operated against the Fortress. A gun of shorter range than the Sawyer gun will throw shell into Fortress Monroe."

The exact distance of Sewall's Point from the Fortress is 3½ miles. From Sewall's Point to Rip-Raps, 2¼ miles. From Sewall's Point to Newport News, 4½ miles.

The Charleston Mercury gives a very funny account of the Southern chivalry. It is in retailing the death of Lieutenant-Col. Dreux, the gallant young Louisianan killed on the 5th, within three miles of Newport News. After describing how the Lieutenant-Colonel posted his cavalry, infantry and howitzers, it says that "two rifles were fired, one of them killing the Secession scout. In the meantime, the cavalry, hearing the firing, were seized with a sudden and unaccountable panic, and putting spurs to their horses, came dashing like so many devils, in headlong speed athwart and diagonally towards the ambuscade of the Louisianans, and directly upon the howitzers—running up against the howitzer guns, frightening and stampeding their horses, which ran more than a mile with the guns before they could be stopped.

"On the first onslaught of the cavalry, Lieutenant-Colonel Dreux stepped out into the road to ascertain what was the matter, and was instantly shot at and killed by the enemy. Our infantry then fired one round and advanced, but the enemy having heard the extraordinary and unprecedented uproar, accompanied by the terrific snapping of pine saplings, kicked up by the cavalry, had taken to their heels incontinently, and did not call a halt till safe within their entrenchments at Newport News."

Richmond.—The Montgomery Mail is very severe upon the Richmond people. It accuses them of meanness—they charge five cents for a glass of iced water, and fifteen cents for a thimbleful of whiskey. Provisions are so dear that men of moderate means cannot live. Shoes eight dollars a pair, and worse than all, no credit. A member of the Rebel Congress is accused of stealing a pair of shoes out of a store, as his own were out of the toes, and he could not take his seat till he got a new pair. The city is crowded with drunken soldiers and placehunters. A pleasant picture of Pandemonium drawn by one of their own imps. Floyd is at Richmond, having raised two regiments, which are stationed near Wytheville.

Suppression of Military Movements by the Rebels.

Confederate States of America, War Department,
Richmond, July 1, 1861.

To Newspaper Correspondents:

Gentlemen—While I have not withheld permission from any of the representatives of the press to visit the camps in Virginia, and while I am as much the uncompromising advocate of an unshackled press as I am of the freedom of speech, and of the independence of the Confederate States, yet I have thought it proper, under existing circumstances, to make an appeal to you to forbear from the transmission and publication of such intelligence as might be detrimental to the great cause in which we all feel so deep an interest.

You are aware of the great amount of valuable information obtained by us through the medium of the enterprising journals of the North; and we may derive profit from their example by a discriminating and judicious reserve in communications for the Southern journals.

It must be obvious that statements of strength or of weakness, at any of the points in the vicinity of the enemy, when reproduced in the North, as they would be, in spite of all the vigilance in our power, would warn them of danger to themselves or invite an attack upon us; and, in like manner, any statements of the magnitude of batteries, of the quantity and quality of arms or of ammunition, of movements in progress or in supposed contemplation, of the condition of troops, of the commissariat, &c., might be fraught with essential injury to the service.

To gentlemen of intelligence and of unquestioned loyalty to the cause of the Confederate States, I do not deem it necessary to be more explicit; nor can I doubt for a moment that you will appreciate my motives in making this frank appeal to your patriotism and your discretion.

L. P. WALKER, Secretary of War.

NORTH CAROLINA.—This half and half State, neither rebel nor sound, is enjoying comparative quiet and considerable trade, since the Government has not blockaded either Beaufort or Wilmington. What does the Secretary of the Navy mean by not accepting Vanderbilt's offer? Ships sail in and sail out of these ports, and the rebels are thus amply supplied.

SOUTH CAROLINA, Charleston.—The Minnesota is blockading this port. There are also four other United States vessels in sight. The Charleston Mercury is very severe upon Jeff. Davis for the manner in which affairs have been conducted—abandons all hope of England and France helping the South, and confesses that they have no friends except "hard fighting." There is a noble independence about the Mercury eminently refreshing in these days of press corruption and cowardice. The South Carolinians express the utmost contempt for the cowardice of the Virginians, who have ran away even when the glass has been ninety in the shade.

GEORGIA.—The cleverness with which the Confederate President has made Virginia the scapegoat of the rebellion leaves little to record of military interest in the more Southern States. At Augusta, on the 11th, Vice-President Stephens made a begging speech, in which he promised the Secessionists victory if they would raise fifty millions and a hundred thousand more men. To conceal their dismay the rabble cheered. Stephens said that they were the Grecians, and Abe Lincoln the Xerxes, and also that Abe's Persians are only 400 000 men, while Xerxes had 600 000 men. Such is the balderdash to which a bad cause has reduced the once eloquent and logical Alexander H. Stephens.

ARKANSAS.—If anything could stamp the Southern cause as one utterly unworthy the recognition of civilized beings, it is found in the fact that Governor Rector, of Arkansas, made an application to John Ross, Chief of the Cherokees, for a body of savages. John Ross, the Indian savage, rebukes the bloodthirsty Rector, and declares perfect neutrality.

MISSOURI.—Governor Jackson and his bloodhound, Ben McCullough, are at last driven out of Missouri. They are now at Camp Walker, ten miles south of the Missouri line, and at Yellowville, Arkansas. The rebel pickets extend as far as Neosho, thirty miles north of Camp Walker. General Pope is at St Charles, where he has established his headquarters. His command in North Missouri will be 7,000 strong, and so posted that Jefferson City, Booneville, Lexington, and all the principal points in the northern parts of the State will be within easy striking distance. The Union troops and the Home Guards at Jefferson City will encamp outside of the city limits during the session of the State Convention. General Lyon with 11,000 men is in full pursuit of Gov. Jackson; and will not respect the Arkansas frontier.

Proclamation from Brigadier-General Pope.

St. Louis, July 19, 1861.

The following proclamation has just been received from Brigadier-General Pope:

St. Charles, Mo., July 19, 1861.

To the People of North Missouri:

By virtue of power and authority, I have assumed command in North Missouri, I appear among you with a force strong enough to maintain the authority of the Government, and too strong to be resisted by any means in your possession usual in warfare. Upon your own assurances that you would respect the laws of the United States and preserve the peace, no troops have hitherto been sent in your section of the country. The assurances for the last ten days, however, have plainly exhibited your lack of either the power or inclination to fully carry out the pledges, and the Government has therefore found it necessary to occupy North Missouri with a force powerful enough to impel obedience to the laws. As soon as it is made manifest that you will respect its authority and put down unlawful combinations against it, you will be relieved of the presence of the forces under my command, but not until then. I therefore warn all persons taking up arms against the Federal authority, who attempt to commit depredations upon public or private property, or who molest unoffending or peaceful citizens, that they will be dealt with in a most summary manner, without waiting civil process.

JOHN POPE,
Brigadier General United States Army Commanding.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

boy, between seven and eight years old, when I first became conscious that I had a Fate, that my Future was closing around me, and that I was Haunted.

I had the misfortune to be a rich little boy. I wore nice clothes; had toys without number; and was kept so clean, that I went about with an indefinable sensation of having been washed in glue. My mamma and I lived together in a pretty country house, near the great city of London. My papa was dead, and I knew him only by a portrait which hung over the mantelpiece, in a drawing room which I visited on state occasions. This portrait gave me the idea of a rather weakminded and very vulgar small man, who might have been a bailiff, or a chandler, but who could never, by any possibility, have been a gentleman. My mamma, on the other hand, was aristocratic, albeit podgy; not only her Roman nose, but a certain Roman grandeur about her manner, proved that she had been brought up in good society. Mother and son, though, saw very little of each other, and I regret to say there was no love lost between them. I was confided to the care of a very good-natured girl, whose duty it was to keep me clean, superintend my linen, and take me into the drawing-room once or twice a day, there to be inspected by the lady who had given me birth.

I had the misfortune, therefore, to be a rich little boy. I had neither brothers nor sisters, and my only playmate was a young rustic, who was accustomed to pull my hair when I stared at him. I grew more gluey every day. Really, it was not a very pleasant thing to be fed, in this manner, with a silver spoon. Our house stood among a number of other houses, in a pretty locality, close to a very tiny village, and not far from a railway station. But we kept our neighbors at a distance, and received no visitors. I was forbidden to play with vulgar little boys, who abounded, and who persecuted me, and thought me stuck-up. I was left to my own resources. So I fell back upon myself, in a half-anticipatory dream of men and things, and became Haunted.

And first, I became conscious of the ghost of my papa; a vulgar, blustering, weak-minded ghost, like the portrait on the drawing-room mantelpiece. I used to creep into the dim room, when my mamma was out, and stare at that portrait till her knock at the door recalled me to life. Then the ghost came down from the canvas, smirking and blustering, and cocked his eye at me, saying, "You're a rich little boy, a very rich little boy; and I'm looking after you. You're a proud little boy; but do what you can, you won't get rid of me—there!" I disliked, more than I feared, my papa's ghost. He was always at my bedside watching me. He had an evil eye in his head, unsteady, like that of a coward.

Latterly, I became conscious of the ghost of a little girl, with hair like mine, and eyes that looked wistfully, like my own when I would watch my face in the looking glass. She was about my own age, too, or very little older, and her blue, wistful eyes would say to me, "Rich little boy, I am growing up for you. You're a proud little boy, but I'm bound to you for ever and ever." Somehow or other, I fancied that I had wronged the little girl's ghost—that I had sinned against her such a sin as only a wedding could atone for; and that I was in duty bound to marry this ghost who was growing up for me. The fancy grew upon me; the ghost was always with me, and I felt very cruel and wicked, somehow. Then I began to perceive that the little girl's ghost shrunk from my papa's ghost, and detested him as I detested him, and scorned him as I scorned him.

Moreover, the space between my mamma and myself grew so wide, and there was so little love between us, that, in due time, mamma herself became one of my ever-present ghosts. Mamma's ghost was not the querulous, podgy, aristocratic person who inspected me daily, but a dark eyed, proud young woman, in silk and satin and jewels—in fact, just what I imagined mamma to have been in her youthful days. And the ghosts of mamma and papa would linger around me, while the ghost of the little girl stood between them, and seemed to separate them for ever and ever. It seemed to me that I had seen these faces in some far-off forgotten life, and that they were closing slowly around me, shaping my destiny.

Mamma's name was Mrs. Vanhomrigh Brown; mine, partly as a consequence, was Master Henry Vanhomrigh Brown. We claimed, I understand, all the reputable Browns as ancestors, while discarding all the disreputable Browns as unconnected with our branch of the family. There was considerable doubt as to what person was the founder of our house; whether it was the DeBrown who came over with the Conqueror, or that patriotic Brown, the gallant poultry dealer, who fought against the Conqueror in the marshes of Wales.

Being a rich and well-born little boy I ought to have been happy. Strange to say, however, I envied the vulgar little wretch who was in the habit of pulling my hair. I sat, very lonely and indolent, among my ghosts. I often amused myself by speculation how much money I should have when I grew up; and I calculated till my eyes and head swam in an atmosphere of yellow guineas. At this juncture, the little girl's ghost was sure to step in, reminding me that I was a rich little boy, that she would never part from me, and that she was growing up on purpose to marry me.

"Susan," said my mamma one day, to the girl who took care of me, "Susan, to-morrow that dear Mr. Timbs will call, and you will dress Henry in his best black."

It may not be amiss here to say that mamma was of the middle height, but rather stout; that her eyes were black, and beaded and de y, and her nose true Roman; that she almost always dressed in black satin, and that there was a sharp, nervous authority in her manner, betokening spirit, and striking awe into the hearts of poor domestics.

"And, Susan," she continued, "be good enough to see that Mr. Timbs's bed is well aired; he will stop here for the night. Dear Mr. Timbs is so particular."

I will take my oath that Susan had never heard of nor seen "dear Mr. Timbs" before; and as for myself, I was in still greater dumb ignorance. But we took things for granted in that house, and had no courage to speak out.

"Henry, come and kiss me," said mamma, yawning. I crept up to her side, and did as she requested. I feel that kiss still; it was very warm and clammy.

"Remember, child, you will be very humble and respectful to dear Mr. Timbs. He will, perhaps, ask you questions, which you must answer very truthfully. He will ask if you are a well-treated little boy, and you will tell the truth. Susan, you may go."

Mamma leant back in her chair, and closed her eyes; this was our signal to leave the room. We walked away together, Susan and I, but mamma called me back.

"Henry, this being the eve of a state occasion, you shall have a fig."

"Thank you, mamma," said I; and staring up at papa's picture, I thought I heard him chuckle. She walked to the sideboard, and, unlocking it, abstracted something resembling the detached eyelid of a mummy.

"There," she said, giving me my fig; "sit down and eat it."

I squatted down on the hearthrug, and plunged my soft gums into the fruit. She watched me as I ate, like one watching a monkey, and once or twice nodded her head approvingly. It was not a nice fig; it was dry and tasteless, and ashy; but I made a great show of enjoying it amazingly.

"Nice?" she asked, in a proud, helpless, idiotic way.

"Very," I burst out; and may my good stars pardon the deception.

She went on, very gently and coldly, but not kindly:

"You ought to be a very happy little boy, Master Brown."

I had no objection to being called Master Brown, but I was too humble to utter it. I said, with my tongue, that I was a happy little boy; but my great eyes said for me, that I was in high doubt about the matter.

"And a very thankful little boy," she added.

"Yes, mamma."

"Very well, then; listen. If dear Mr. Timbs should ask whether you are happy and thankful, what shall you say to him?"

I was not prepared for this question. It took me by surprise, and I made no answer.

"You will tell him," she continued, rather testily, "you will tell him how happy and thankful you are; how good everybody is to you, and how proud you are of being a rich little boy. You will tell this to dear Mr. Timbs, will you not?"

"Yes, mamma," I murmured, seeing she wished me to reply in the affirmative.

"Very good. You must not be surprised if dear Mr. Timbs takes you with him on a journey. You must not fret or cry when you go away with Mr. Timbs, but thank him, and be very quiet and humble. For you are a rich little boy, and dear Mr. Timbs is your good friend. There, you may go and play."

Mamma fell back in her chair, and closed her eyes; and, after one glance at papa's picture, which actually winked at me, I crept out of the room. But not to play; unless standing on one leg in the garden and watching three pigeons, which were disporting themselves on the eaves, could be called play. I longed to confide my doubts and fears to Susan, who was in the habit of expressing her sympathy with my lonely state. But being a rich little boy, I was forbidden to go near the kitchen, whither Susan had retired. With the mysteries of that odoriferous sanctuary I was almost unacquainted. Once or twice had I peeped stealthily in; to be rewarded by a sensation compounded of grease, rum and black beetles. On one occasion my delicacy had been shocked by the sight of an extensively corpulent person, in slender déshabille, whose back was turned towards me, and who was anointing her flowing locks with fresh butter. This corpulent person was the cook, with whom I subsequently became better acquainted, but whose friendship I was then too proud to encourage much.

After much cogitation, I came to the conclusion that dear Mr. Timbs would be a sleek, cadaverous humbug, of a pious turn. How I came to this conclusion, and how it came to be firmly established in my mind, are questions to be answered by the metaphysician.

I had sat down upon the lawn, and was amusing myself with some pebbles. It was a gray, windy March day, and the lawn was streaked with shadows of passing clouds, which seemed to me the shadows of my ghosts, in different stages of contortion. I was startled out of my reverie by a slight sound; looking up carelessly, I saw a face staring at me over the garden wall. It was a pale, sallow face, ornamented by a slight moustache; but there was a large scar under the right eye, which made it look ghastly. I saw this at a glance; for directly I looked up and met the eyes, the face disappeared. By-and bye it reappeared at another part of the wall, but disappeared again as quickly. I felt rather frightened.

After it had bobbed up and down once or twice, it came up again, and stopped up, while I saw a long white hand beckoning me. I shook my head, and passed round to the front of the house. There was a small garden in front, and a gate. I was swinging to and fro on the gate, when somebody cried out,

"Hi!"

I looked down the road, and saw a person standing some hundred yards from the house, but out of the range of any of its windows. I immediately recognised this person as the owner of the face I had seen peeping over the wall. He was a rather dissipated-looking young man, of about five-and-thirty; short, and strongly built; attired in faded pantaloons of shepherd tartan, and jacket and waistcoat of grizzled velveteen.

"Hi!" he shouted, beckoning to me. "You! Boy!"

Now I knew that Susan had a young man, and I had been repeatedly informed that this young man had a moustache. Comparing the velveteeny person with her description of her beloved, who was in the greengrocery line, I came to the conclusion that this was he, and that he was desirous of conveying some secret token of affection to his charmer. So I walked up to him, without fear, and, conscious of the difference between a greengrocer and a rich little boy, said, rather jauntily,

"Hulloa, greengrocer!"

The velveteeny young man surveyed me with some amazement, and whistled.

"You're a precious young gentleman," he observed, with a grin that made his scar look hideous. "Who lives in that house?"

"My mamma," I answered, conscious that I had made a mistake. He surveyed me from head to foot, with a bad scowl.

"What's her name?" he asked.

"Mrs. Brown," I said, in some trepidation; for the scar had conquered me.

"What's your's?"

"Master Brown."

"Very well, then," said he, suddenly catching hold of me by the neck; "I've got you. Now, boy, if you don't answer my questions, quick and true, I'll——"

Here he shook me violently. I was too frightened to scream.

"Now, then," he said, through his teeth, "Answer, boy. What's your mamma like?"

Making a great effort, I described her personal appearance as closely as possible. He nodded his head and seemed satisfied.

"Proud?" he asked. "Stuck-up like?"

I replied in the affirmative.

"Rich?"

I said that I thought so. He grinned, and the scar seemed more hideous than ever.

"Worth lots of money?"

"Millions," I gasped out, with a random guess at the truth.

"So far, so good. Now then, how old are you?"

"Seven and a half."

"Come, I thought so. Father alive?"

I shook my head. "Dead years and years ago."

"Humph!" growled the velveteeny young man. "That'll do."

He released me and I was creeping off, when he cried out to me to stop. I turned, staring at him. He was writing something with a lead pencil, in a dingy pocketbook. He grinned as he did so more than ever.

"Here," he said, tearing out a leaf and thrusting it into my hand, "give that to your dear mamma, and tell her that I sent my love. Can you read?"

"A little," was my reply; for that branch of my education had been attended to by a sickly young governess, who had lately been dismissed, for some unknown reason or other, by mamma.

"Never mind; give this to your mamma, and say who sent it. I'm a handsome fellow, and you won't forget me in a hurry, I suppose?"

I answered in the negative, with some truth.

"Tell your dear mamma that her very dear friend—meaning myself—sends his respects to her; that he has kept her in his memory, time out of mind, and that he's sorry his time won't admit of his shaking hands with her. She don't lick you, does she?" He added this last question suddenly, after a pause.

"Never, sir," I answered, timidly.

"I was sure of it," he added, triumphantly, addressing a sparrow on a neighboring tree. "She never licks him, not she; but keeps him in a glass cage, coddles him and gives him jam. That's the case, ain't it, youngster?" turning to me.

I thought it better to acquiesce in this hyperbolical description.

"Right again!" he cried, still addressing the sparrow. "Oh, she's a knowing girl, his dear mamma! Buys him buns, dresses him up in fine clothes, and keeps no rod in pickles. Hit it again, haven't I, boy?"

"Yes, sir," I murmured, surprised at his savage delight.

"Then bolt. Bolt! d'ye hear? with your head on!"

I did bolt, as fast as my legs could carry me. I paused at the gate and saw the velveteeny young man walk swiftly away in the direction of the village. I could not quite make him out, but had my suspicions as to his sanity. So, in high dudgeon that I, a rich little boy, should have been so scurvily treated, I crept up to my little bedroom and had a good cry. When I had grown more composed I took out the paper he had given me, and tried to spell it out, unsuccessfully. It was written in a miserable, cramped hand, and defied my humble scholarship. I crumpled it up, put it into my pocket. Then I sat down and asked myself whether I had better give it to my proud mamma. I came to the conclusion that the delivery of the missive had better be postponed.

While I sat in my little white-curtained bedroom, a cold and clean room, the shades of evening gathered around me; and the little girl's ghost, flitting out from the darkness, moaned, "Rich little boy, I am growing up for you; proud little boy, I am bound to you for ever and ever." Then the windows darkened, and, in one of the panes, I seemed to see the velveteeny person's face, with its scar. And I crept down stairs afraid, and took tea with Susan, in a little bandbox of a room which we called the nursery.

CHAPTER II.—DEAR MR. TIMBS.

I SLEPT in a little bed, close to Susan's, in the nursery. Susan, poor girl, worked hard during the day, and revenged herself on Fortune by snoring hard during the night. When I went to bed, after my interview with the velveteeny young person, I was visited by scores of dreams. I wandered, in sleep, through shadowy halls and palaces, all bright and yellow, and paved with dingy gold. There were no sounds, no playmates, no faces, friendly or unfriendly. I was a rich king in a boneless realm, and felt lonely and frightened. The golden seats were so garish and cold, and the silence was so dismal, that I began to sob and cry; when, all at once, there came my little girl's ghost, saying, "Rich little boy, come and marry me," and the long corridors groaned, "Marry me;"—saying, "Proud little boy, I'll cling to you for ever and ever," and the long corridors whispered, "For ever and ever." Then the little girl's ghost took my hand, and we walked far, far away, over dead fields of golden poppies, under a hot, leaden sky, till we came to a church like a golden sepulchre, where papa's ghost, dressed in a cassock, and with white hands, was waiting to marry us. Somehow I wondered why the church bells were not ringing; and I was wondering still, when the little girl's ghost whispered, "Rich little boy, proud little boy, you have married me, and I'll cling to you for ever and ever." Then, all of a sudden, we heard groaning sounds of music; and, walking out of the church, saw the velveteeny young person playing on a trombone made out of a golden skull, and the music was so discordant and hideous that I woke up in a fright and looked around me. The gray, cold dawn was broadening across the white curtains of my bed, and Susan was snoring with all her might, close by. I was very glad, somehow, to find it was all a dream; and, sinking back on my pillow, I went to sleep again.

When I awoke next it was broad daylight, and Susan's bed was vacant. A fine fresh sun was up and abroad; it was one of those fresh, windy mornings which make the blood flow and the pulses throb cheerily. I jumped up and called out for Susan to hook me. My good-natured nurse answered to my call, and hooked me. I walked downstairs into the garden, and out into the road. The wind nipped my cheek into tingling warmth, and I felt for the moment as free as the wind, and as cheerful. I like March and his rough breath better than languid June.

Then I went in to breakfast, which I discussed with Susan in the nursery, for mamma, I understood was not yet up. I had finished my meal, and was looking carelessly out of the window, over a clear prospect of bare trees and little fallow hills, when my attention was attracted to the eccentricities of a person who was staring up at me from the road. The person was a man, and a jolly man—a man whose red face and short white hair reminded me of a red cabbage topped with snow—a short, stout, greasy man, who was dressed in deep mourning, and looked like a mute. He had a carpet-bag in his hand, this jolly man, who was winking and making grimaces at me with all his might. I could not help returning his greetings with many smiles.

He walked up to the gate and rang the bell, and presently I saw Susan trip down and ask his business. Then ensued a lively altercation, for the girl evidently regarded this comer with some contempt: he did not look like a gentleman. To my surprise, however, the jolly man put his arm round Susan's waist and actually kissed her. She was about to box his ears, when he whispered something which changed her whole manner. I saw by her face and his face what he and she were now saying. Would the gentleman walk in? Well, he didn't mind if he did. So they walked towards the house door. Mrs. Brown would be ready to receive the gentleman directly; would he wait for a few minutes, while missus finished her toilette? Yes; he would wait, my dear. Oh, sir! Whereat the jolly man chucked her under the chin. She was a nice article for a man with a small income, she was, my dear. Oh, please sir; this way, sir! Then they disappeared into the house, and I heard Susan show him into the drawing-room. Plainly a vulgar man ignorant of good manners.

By-and bye, Susan bounced into the nursery, looking for me.

"Loramussyme!" she exclaimed, with a burst, "here's Mr. Timbs come; and he's been aggrawatin' me, and drinking port wine and brandy this half hour. He's a droll and impercent cockalorum jig as ever breathed; and make haste, Master Henry, and run to your ma' in the drawing-room—she's asked me to take you to her immediate."

To my surprise—for I had imagined quite a different sort of visitor—it immediately struck me that Mr. Timbs was no other than the jolly man I had seen patronizing Susan; and I felt rather amazed that my proud mamma should seem so partial to so vulgar a person. However, I had no time to deliberate; for after Susan had brushed my hair the wrong way, I was hurried along to the drawing-room door, where Susan left me. I gave a timid knock, was told to "come in," and entered, blushing bashfully.

Mamma was leaning back, languidly, in her armchair; but on her cheek I saw a bright hectic flush, which betokened unusual excitement. I regret to say that Mr. Timbs did not appear to so much advantage, on a closer view, as he did at a distance. Don't tell me that jollity is inconsistent with rascality; that a rubicund, beaming face is always the key to an honest, kindly heart. No; I have seen even bank directors with jovial countenances. Mr. Timbs was jolly in face, figure and manner; his very mourning, his glossy coat and his weepers looked jolly on him. But, child as I was, I instinctively felt that I should like to hit him hard, and I was morally conscious, in my own mind, that his jollity was a mockery, a cheat and a delusion.

"Come and kiss me," said mamma, as I entered. I stole up timidly, and did as she requested. The kiss burnt me; her lips were hot as fire. The jolly person said nothing. He was actively employed in mixing brandy and port together in one tumbler, and drinking the extemporized beverage with great unctuous relish.

"Mr. Timbs," said mamma, addressing that individual, nervously, "this is the boy."

"I eyes and I knows him, ma'am," was the laconic and facetious reply.

"Henry, this is dear Mr. Timbs."

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed dear Mr. Timbs, uproariously. "Very fond of me is your ma', Master Brown. She's a Ripston pippin, your ma' is (begging your pardon, ma'am, for the liberty)—a Ripston pippin, and no mistake."

Assuredly a most vulgar person, this jolly man.

"Dear Mr. Timbs is so droll!" observed mamma, with an idiotic appeal to papa's portrait, which leered at us from its place above the mantelpiece.

"He's a very little 'un," contemplating the writer of this history; "an uncommon little 'un; but he'll grow—ah! that's the point—he'll grow, ma'am, he'll grow. How old are you, Master Brown?"

"Seven and a half, if you please, sir," I replied. How anxious everybody seemed to be about my age! Mamma looked pale as I answered the question.

"Like you, ma'am, uncommon," suggested our visitor.

"Do you think so?" said mamma, with a sickly smile, and another appeal to papa's picture.

"Think so, ma'am! He's your very image; and you ought to be proud of him. Now, just let me take him in hand one moment. Now, Master Brown, right about face—at—ten—tion!"

I had an indescribable longing to scratch dear Mr. Timbs, and ascertain if he would bleed wine. He looked so red, and jolly, and apoplectic, and vulgar, and offensive, that I quite detested him. Mamma closed her eyes, and, with a wave of the hand, passed me over to him for examination. The conversation which follows was interrupted now and again by observations from mamma, in the shape of continued idiotic appeals to papa's picture.

"Now, Master Brown," chuckled Timbs, "you're as happy as the day's long, ain't you?"

I nodded my head to signify assent.

("Dear Mr. Timbs is so good to the child," soliloquized mamma.)

"And as rich as the Bank of England, ain't you?"

I intimated that I had been led to believe so.

"And you've been vaccinated, too, haven't you?" he inquired, recklessly, refilling his tumbler. Mr. T had a way of jumping from one proposition to another, which was, to say the least of it, apt to cause confusion. His last question puzzled me, partly because I was unaware whether I had been vaccinated or not, but chiefly because I was quite at a loss to know what vaccination was, or could be. I appealed to mamma, who nodded her head in assent.

"At—ten—tion!" cried Mr. Timbs. "Excuse me, ma'am, but allow me to take him in hand one moment."

("Now, really, this is too kind of dear Mr. Timbs.")

"Well, you have been vaccinated, I take it," said our guest, drawing me towards him, and placing me between his knees as he spoke. "Once more, Master Brown. You've had the measles, I suppose?"

"Yes, if you please, sir," I faltered out; for I had suffered very acutely with that complaint. I remember wondering at that moment whether the jolly man had ever had the scarlet fever, and whether he was still suffering from it, being so scarlet in face, and whether sobriety was consistent with spirituous erysipelas.

("It is really astonishing," observed mamma to the picture; "now, is it not astonishing, that dear Mr. Timbs should take so extraordinary an interest in the boy? I assure you, it is most touching.")

"Now, then," said dear Mr. Timbs, "let us count our items. You're seven and a half—one; you're as happy as the day's long—two; you're as rich as the Bank of England—three; you're been vaccinated—four; you've had the measles—five. Total: five. Come, then. At—ten—tion! If two geese lay four eggs apiece, in a barn, and if Master Brown smashes five of them eggs with a umbrella, how many chickens will the two geese hatch come Whitsunday?"

("Dear me, he is so droll!" chirped mamma.)

The question was a startling one in itself, apart from its abruptness, and I was quite unprepared to grapple with it. I saw that Mr. Timbs wanted to be facetious, but, I confess, I was unable to see the point of the joke. I made no answer, but hung down my head.

"You don't know, and I shan't tell you. Never mind. Stop, though. You've been to school, of course?"

"No, sir," I said, to his evident surprise.

Mamma interposed to state that, to avoid my mixing with vulgar little boys, she had engaged a governess to teach me at home.

"Leave him to me, ma'am, if you please; I'll get it out of him."

("Dear me, I am overcome by this goodness. Can we ever thank dear Mr. Timbs sufficiently for his interest in the child?")

"Very well, then, Master Brown," quoth our jolly friend. "So, as you say, your ma' has been doing the domestic line of schooling! Good again; but goodness like that can't last for ever. You're as rich as the Bank of England, you know, and all that sort of thing. Who poisoned Julius Cæsar with green tea, when he was a-rollicking with his Romans at Putney Castle?"

I could not exactly make out whether it was ignorance or facetiousness that dictated such absurd questions; but I had read a "Child's History of Rome," and (waiving the incongruities) answered boldly,

"If you please, sir—Brutus."

He eyed me sidelong, and gave a hoarse laugh.

"I dare say you're right; but my memory's at fault, Master Brown. Never mind; you'll do, no doubt, when you've had a little more crammed into you. How fond you must be of your kind, good ma, who's brought you up to the credit of the Bank of England."

"Oh, yes, sir!" I cried, with a timid glance at mamma.

("Dear Mr. Timbs must be aware that nothing can exceed the affection of the child for myself," she remarked to the picture; "and really, you know, I cannot help reciprocating the attachment.")

"Henry," she said, turning languidly to me, "come and kiss me."

I put my lips to hers again. Why did her kisses burn so?

"Very well, ma'am," said Timbs, addressing himself suddenly to her, "I've done with him. When I want more, I'll get more. Sit down on that there hassock, boy. Now, ma'am!"

Mamma smiled feebly, and folded her hands to listen.

"To-morrow, ma'am, is the day. Master Brown and I set off and do our little bit of private business together."

"Yes; to-morrow. I have already informed Henry that you are his very good friend, and that he is to go on a journey with you."

I looked up, timidly appealing. Little as I cared for home, I cared for dear Mr. Timbs less, and had a strong objection to his company.

"Now, don't you blubber, Master Brown," he cried to me; "don't. I can't bear to see an infant weeping—it ain't in natur."

"I assure you that Henry will be only too delighted to go with you. He is very obedient. He must remember, too, that it is only for three days that he will be absent from home——"

"Sweet home," broke in the jolly man, suggestively.

"Precisely," said mamma, who seemed to be no longer the proud mamma I had been accustomed to.

"To-morrow morning, ma'am, at nine to a minute, Master Brown and I set out from here. Mind that, Master Brown, at nine to a minute. And if, ma'am, you could accommodate me, before starting, with threepenn'orth of coffee and an eggflip to follow, I'd be obliged."

"Certainly, Mr. Timbs," said mamma, graciously; and she rang for Susan, who seemed to me to answer the call very suddenly.

"Susan, Master Henry will go away with this gentleman the first thing in the morning. Be good enough to pack a carpet-bag with the necessary things. I beg your pardon, Mr. Timbs, but what were your orders?"

"Threepenn'orth of coffee, my dear, and an eggflip to follow; let alone a bit of meat broiled," said the worthy, addressing hisself to the domestic.

"Yes, sir," curtsied Susan, leaving the room, with a glance at me.

I did not cry or fret; I felt quite resigned to go with the jolly man passively. Just at that moment, however, I remembered the paper which had been given me by the velveteeny person, and thought that it had better be delivered.

"That being settled satisfactorily," said mamma to me, "you had better follow Susan and go to play. Wish dear Mr. Timbs good day, and give me a pretty kiss—there's a dear."

"If you please, mamma——" I stammered.

"Well, well! What is it, Henry; surely you are not going to cry."

"He'd better not," chuckled Timbs, winking at me; "the rogue had better not."

"If you please, mamma, a man told me to give you something; and, if you please, I'm going away in the morning, and had better give it you now."

"Dear me!" said mamma, opening her eyes. "What man, child?"

I described the velveteeny young man to the best of my humble powers. I was astonished to see both mamma and Mr. Timbs turn very pale. The latter turned to me, half savagely, and then gulped down half a tumbler of wine.

"Scar under the right eye, moustache, pale face, short and stout. Well, I'm blowed!"

And he looked like it.

"Oh, it cannot be! it cannot be!" cried mamma, wringing her hands. "Stop; I forgot. You say he gave you something to give to me. Where is it? Quick! give it to me."

I was astonished, on looking at mamma's face, to see that it was as white as snow. I fumbled in my pocket for the paper, and produced it, very crumpled and dirty. She seized it and glanced her eye over it hastily.

"Mon Dieu, il est ici! Je suis perdu, je suis perdu! Il est ici!"

And she fell back in her chair, in a white swoon, quivering. The paper dropped from her hand, and dear Mr. Timbs snatched it up fiercely, reading it out, growing paler as he read,

"Wealthy, married, and a mother. Married, 1828. A mother, 1830. Mad. Remember Eugene."

"It's hard," cried dear Mr. Timbs, striking his fist on the table and looking the very reverse of jolly; "it's tarnation hard, that's what it is. More splits in the Cabinet, and the Bank of England stopped payment! But, blow me, if I didn't think so!"

CHAPTER III.—I TAKE TEA IN THE CITY.

Before I had recovered from my surprise at the effect of my strange communication, I was bundled out of the room by the jolly man, and found myself weeping in the nursery, by the side of Susan. The poor girl, ignorant as she was of the cause of my sorrow, comforted me to the best of her power. I had just dried my tears, and was speculating in my own mind as to the probable cause of the mystery, when Mr. Timbs put his white head in at the door, and told me to look alive. Not precisely understanding how or why I was to do so, and in what matter I was to exhibit my obedience to the mandate, I stared at our visitor with open mouth and eyes, thinking to myself that one so deathly and scared looking as he was at that moment ought to take the hint about looking alive himself.

"Now, then, look alive?" he repeated. "Come back to your ma, Master Brown."

His white head bobbed away, and I followed it as one might follow a will-o'-the-wisp, into the drawing-room. Mamma had recovered from her swoon, and was sitting bolt upright in her chair, pale, but with firmly compressed lips.

"It has been arranged," she said, with a decided nod, "that your journey cannot be put off one moment. Henry, my dear, you must set off at once with Mr. Timbs."

"To-day, mamma?" I murmured appealingly.

"To-day. Three days from this, dear, you will return, I hope, and dear Mr. Timbs will take good care of you while you are away. Dear me, child, you seem astonished!"

"Pooh, ma'am, pooh!" growled the jolly man; "don't pamper him. Your ma's too good to you, Master Brown, and so I tell you. Look here, ma'am. Decision of character was the making of the late Duke of Wellington. Copy him. If Master Brown's to go, say he's to go. Ring the bell, order his things, pass him over to the handy one, and have him togged."

Here, fumbling in some mysterious hiding-place under his waistcoat, Mr. Timbs produced a small silver watch, which he tapped with his right finger, and then consulted.

"Three o'clock exactly," he observed. "There's a train at four. Quarter for him to get ready; another quarter for us to get something to eat (I'm anxious about it, ma'am, but I never neglect nature); half hour to get to the village. We'll do nicely, if you look sharp, ma'am. Ring for the handy one."

Mamma rang the bell, and the handy one appeared. Mr. Timbs repeated his injunctions to Susan, who looked spiteful. Somehow or other, at sight of Susan's kind, simple face, I burst into tears and sobbed loudly. Mr. Timbs swore a mild oath.

"Oh, blaze it!" he cried. "Was there ever so aggravating a boy as this here Master Brown? He wants to murder his kind, good ma, he does; this here is his gratitude for being brought up respectable."

Mr. Timbs spoke this soliloquy at me in a tone that was half banter, half angry reproach. But he only made me cry the more.

"It is very provoking, indeed," said mamma, testily. "What can ail the child?"

"Now, where's the use of asking questions, ma'am? Hang me, if you ain't as bad as he is. Why don't you tell the handy one to take him off, and obey orders?"

"Bless his little heart!" said the handy one, in the folds of whose dress I had hid my tearful face; "he's scared like, and doesn't want to be taken away from me so sudden. Come, Master Henry, you'll go with the gentleman, I know, won't you, deary?"

"Obey my orders, Susan," said mamma, with a stately frown. "I will trouble you to keep your place, and to offer no opinions, unless I ask for them. Take him away."

"Yes, take him away, and be quick, too," said the jolly man.

"I won't go away with him," I screamed. "He's a nasty red thing, and smells of beer, and he wants to run away with me. I hate him."

"Did you ever!" exclaimed Susan, who, however, seemed less surprised than gratified at the personal character of my remarks. "Oh, what a naughty boy!"

Tears have an interesting effect on some minds, and they always render me reckless. On that occasion, although I had a great dread of Mr. Timbs, I felt competent to defy him, and very little would have made me strike and scratch at him. Susan coaxed and soothed me, but I went on sobbing and screaming.

"I hate him, I say; he's an ugly bear! He wants to kill me. I won't go away with him. I'll stay with Susan and be good, if you send him away. I know he'll beat me. He's nasty and red, and he's got hair like a wild cat."

"When boys," said Timbs, grinning savagely, "when boys in our parts use language like that, we whop them. When boys in our parts don't know their best friends, we whop their best friends into them. When they get notions which go agin the current of what's right and proper, we whop the notions out of them."

"Henry," said mamma, severely, "if you do not immediately wipe your eyes and do as you are bid, I shall be compelled to beat you."

"She'll be compelled to beat him!" cried Timbs, with a derisive sneer. But Susan caught me up in her arms and carried me away before the threat could be carried into effect. As she bore me along to the nursery, I heard her muttering to herself that it was a sin and a shame, and that it would be a precious good thing if some people were treated in that way themselves. When we got to the nursery, however, she began to tell me that it was very wicked to go on as I had done; that little boys who behaved so were often taken away by the dustman in his bin; that dear Mr. Timbs was a charitable angel; that I was breaking my mamma's heart; and that, finally, I must be a very good little boy—as good as I was rich—and then I should soon return to Snosey-Poosey, and be happy.

I was rather doubtful whether I should ever return to Snosey-Poosey at all, and I said so. But she upset the proposition immediately by stating that I was a little goose, and that I was going with that dear, droll creature, Mr. Timbs, to see my golden egg. To cut this part of my narrative short, I at last became tolerably resigned to my fate, and allowed myself to be attired and cleaned. After the lapse of about twenty minutes, then, Susan led me back again to the drawing-room, where I found Mr. Timbs and mamma impatiently awaiting my arrival.

"Half-past three," said the former, consulting his watch; then he turned to Susan: "Now, my dear, don't be alarmed if you find that the rats have been pitching into the cold meat in the larder, for I've been showing 'em how to make beef sandwiches. Now, then, Master Brown, wish your ma' good-bye and come along; there's not a moment to lose. There, don't you be at it again."

"Ta, ta, Henry love," said mamma, pressing her burning lips to my cheek. "I'm very, very glad to see that you are going to be good. There, now, go."

Mr. Timbs trotted down stairs, and I followed. At the door Susan caught me in her arms and kissed me fervently, giving me a thousand blessings. So the jolly man and I walked out into the free, fresh March air.

I felt little or no grief at parting from my mamma. Although she had always treated me gently and leniently, I had never learnt to love her, for the simple reason that, in spite of her affectedly kind manner, I was morally conscious that she bore very little love for me—that, in fact, I was rather a bore to her than otherwise. But I had a great dislike to the friend she pandered to; he had so much of the bully in him, and was so vulgar. And here I may observe, for the benefit of metaphysicians, that (malgré my loneliness and my dreaminess) my mamma's pride, the fine, dull country house, and the growing consciousness that I was a rich little boy, had gradually rendered me as aristocratic, stuck-up, and conservative in soul, as could well be desired under the circumstances. I disliked vulgar people. Although I was fond of Susan, I am afraid that I rather looked down upon her as an inferior sort of being. I had got to scorn the vulgar village boys who persecuted me. In a word, I was fully conscious of the dignity of my position.

So, apart from my fear of being run away with, I accompanied Mr. Timbs with some misgivings, induced by pride. There was no denying the fact, that he was too red and apopletic, and jolly, and coarse-spoken, to be fit company for a young gentleman of any standing. I went with him, however, passively; for I now felt that it was useless to resist him.

We walked briskly along the quiet country road. My hand was placed in his; I wondered, and he whistled; but neither spoke a syllable for some time. When we reached the railway station, the train was just due; it was the London train, and Mr. Timbs took tickets for one and a half. The train came snorting to the platform. We took our seats by the window, opposite to each other. Our only companions in the carriage were a stoutish old gentleman in brown, and a pale, smirking lady of middle age, who appeared to be his wife, both of whom put me considerably out of countenance, by staring at me, as if I had been Mr. Daniel Lambert, a gorilla, an infant with two heads, or some other interesting phenomenon.

We had not been long on the journey, when Mr. Timbs, for some reason of his own, came out in all his glory. He talked to me, made jokes to me, bullied me in the jolliest way imaginable, seasoning his remarks by sundry digs into my young ribs, and pinchings of my young cheek, thereby causing me acute pain, which I was too proud to show. He looked so red and beaming, and jolly, as he sat before me, that I almost fancied that I had been mistaken in my estimate of his character, and that he was the dear, droll creature Susan had described him to be. His disposition seemed as open as his eyes, which latter brimmed with laughter. So he digged into my ribs, and pinched my cheeks, and altogether tortured me in his honest way. I was not surprised, therefore, to hear the smirking lady ask the gentleman in brown, in a whisper, if he ever saw so much independence, good nature and heart expressed on a human face; or to hear the gentleman growl in return, that such faces were common among men and Britons, and that such men held the bulwarks of England's liberty against a decayed and depraved aristocracy. Whereupon both lady and gentleman looked admiringly at Mr. Timbs, who had just been within an inch of breaking one of my ribs with his forefinger; and the gentleman, in a confidential tone, asked Mr. Timbs if I was his son, sir. Mr. Timbs, in reply, said that I wasn't his son, sir, but that he'd have thought me worth my victuals if I was, sir; and after a pause, added, that it was stiffish weather, sir, but in his (Mr. Timbs's) opinion, good for the crops; in which opinion the brown gentleman coincided, volunteering, at the same time, some suggestions on guano. So there was a general conversation, which lasted till we reached our destination, when the brown gentleman and the smirking lady walked away, with the belief that Mr. Timbs was the very pink of generous English yeomen.

I had been in London once before, on a tailoring expedition with Susan; and only once, so far as I could recollect. But the dark, gloomy streets, the faded sky above, made me feel dull this time as before; and as we emerged from the station, the beams of the sun, which came full upon my face, seemed unhealthy in their heat. I felt very lonely, too, as I saw the busy crowds roll by, and felt, somehow, like a person shipwrecked in a gloomy sea of human faces.

We walked over a bridge, where there was a toll, and came to a street, where there were shops—large ones. We walked along this street till we came into a square, where there was a monument, and fountains, and large buildings all around. We turned up a by-street, and again up a dark entry, which led us into another street. After innumerable windings and turnings, we reached a quiet row of houses, where everything looked dingy and lonely, and halted before a door, on which there was a dirty brass plate, labelled,

M. Loret, Professor of Dancing and Calisthenics.

Timbs took a latchkey from his pocket, and opened the door. As we entered, our ears were greeted with groaning sounds of music, resembling those one might produce with a pair of tongs and a gridiron. Timbs gave a sly smile, and put his finger on his lips. We crept up a dark flight of stairs, and halted before a chamber door. Timbs applied his ear to the keyhole, then his eye, while I listened to the sounds which issued from the room. Then he suddenly flung open the door, with a loud laugh, and we entered. The music ceased; there was a slight scream, and somebody cried, "Goodness gracious! Dear me! Well, I never!"

It was a clean, orderly parlor, with rough pictures on the walls, bloated china peasants on the mantelpiece, a bright fire burning in the grate, and a kettle singing songs on the hob. The table was laid for tea; there was a tray and accessories, some watercresses, and a plate of shrimps. Altogether, the room looked cozy and comfortable, but its comfort was of a vulgar nature, and hardly came up to my notions of taste and respectability.

A woman, of about thirty years of age, dressed in a plain chintz gown, was measuring out the tea from a mahogany teacaddy. She was the picture of cleanliness and neatness, but she was far from being a jolly woman. Her hair, which was braided down over her low forehead, was black and glossy; her eyes were dark and keen, and looked you firmly in the face; there were deep, anxious lines about her mouth, which were ever on the quiver. For the rest, she was of middle height, slightly made, but rather graceful than otherwise. A pensive, gloomy woman. When she smiled, her smile was sickly; when she frowned, her frown was dark and thoughtful. She had a slow, quiet manner of speaking, and words seemed to drop from her lips like lead, and fall leadenly on your heart as you listened.

Her companion was a very little man, of about forty. His hair was slightly grey; he was clean shaven; his eyes were bright and blue; his mouth was firmly cut, and his speech mincing; his forehead was high, but sloped back to the bump of veneration; and when he smiled his little smile, he showed two rows of very white teeth. He was clad in a tight-fitting suit of rusty brown, and in his hand he held a rusty fiddle. If you were in any doubt about his profession, his beautiful calves would have convinced you that he was a professor of dancing.

"Goodness gracious! Dear me! Well, I never!" cried this last personage, skipping up, fiddle in hand. "If it isn't Timbs."

"If it isn't Timbs," repeated the worthy of that name, chuckling, "you're a nice party, you are, to come dodging after her in my absence. Shrimps, too!"

Here the woman, who had given a slight scream as we entered, broke in. I noticed afterwards that she was nervous to the last degree, and that the slightest sound startled her; she seemed, indeed, like a woman who, at some period of her life, had been scared by some horrible scene.

"You have returned sooner than I expected," she said, "that is all. And Loret here just stept up to cheer me up a bit. It's dull, sitting here alone; I'm not used to it. But who's this you've got with you? Not him?"

Mr. Timbs chuckled and nodded his head. The woman raised her black, searching eyes, and fixed them on me—half sadly, I thought. Then she placed a clean chair by the fire, and asked me to sit down while she got the tea. The dancing-master rose to go, but Timbs stopped him.

"Don't let me frighten you away," said Mr. Timbs. "I want to talk with you; so sit down and let us be comfortable."

Then he turned to me, with a smile.

"This," he said, pointing to the woman, "is Mrs. Martha Timbs, my wife, Master Brown."

I ventured to say that I was glad to see her, and hoped that Mrs. Martha Timbs was very well.

"And this," he continued, pointing to the dancing-master, "is Mr. Loret" (he pronounced the name with the t), "my landlord. Loret, what's the French for 'Twinkle, twinkle, little star, how I wonder what you are?'"

M. Loret smiled a timid smile, and looked uncomfortable.

"He will have his little joke," said Loret, with a very English accent.

"The fact is, Master Brown, he don't know. He was brought over from France when a boy like you, and he's forgotten his native language since. His parents, you see, were a French pair called Jones, and he was known as John Jones in his native country. But as Jones don't pay here, and as Londoners won't believe in French Joneses, he's been rechristened. That's the case, isn't it, Loret?"

And dear Mr. Timbs poked Loret in the side, and beamed and laughed, looking the incarnation of all possible vulgar goodness.

(To be continued.)

An Awful Mystery.—The following is a melancholy illustration of the uncertainty of the types. A young gentleman by the name of Conkey having been united in the holy bonds of wedlock, sent the marriage notice, with a couplet of his own composition, to a local paper for publication, as follows:

"Married—On August 1, A. Conkey, Esq., Attorney-at-Law, to Miss Euphemia Wiggins.

"Love is the union of two hearts that beat in softest melody;
Time with its ravages imparts no bitter fusion to its ecstasy."

Mr. Conkey looked with much anxiety for the issue of the paper, in order to see his name in print. The compositor into whose charge the notice was placed happened to be on a spree at the time, and made some wonderful blunders in setting it up, thus: "Married—On April 1, A. Donkey, Esq., Eternally at Law, to Miss Euphemia Piggins.

"Love is an onion of two heads that beats in softest melony;
Time with its cabbages imparts no better food to an extra dray."

The Spring-time of Life.—Our dancing days.

A False-Hood.—On being shown a portrait of himself, very unlike the original, Hood said that the artist had perpetrated a false Hood.

The Six Stages.—Man is at ten, a child; at twenty, wild; at thirty, tame, if ever; at forty, wise; at fifty, rich; at sixty, good, or never.

An Irish Female Tenant.—"I'll trouble you for my month's rent, madame," said a landlord last Monday to one of his tenants.

"Is it yer rint ye ax for now?"

"Yes, mam, two rooms at two dollars a month each."

"Ah, now, can't ye wait a little time? Sure the likes of ye must have plenty of money," replied the woman, looking at the thin, bent form of the landlord with great contempt.

"But, my dear woman, the money is due, and——"

"Oh, murther, is it dearing me, ye are? an honest, married woman, and blessed mother of siven boys, each big enough to tick the life out of ye. Out of my house, ye monster?" And, unable to give vent to her indignation in words, she seized his coat collar, and fairly threw him into the street. The owner intends to let his agent collect the rents of that house in future.

Romance and Reality.—It was an incorrigible old bachelor who said, "Though some very romantic maiden may exclaim, 'Give me a hut with the heart that I love,' most of the sex vastly prefer a palace with the man they hate."

THE Irrepressible Barnum, with his usual attention to the curiosity of the public, has engaged the "heroic Nigger," who recaptured the S. J. Waring, by killing the three pirates in possession. The German who was with him is also engaged.

WE have received a note from Professor Grant correcting our statement that his calcium light had been tried for reconnoitring purposes in Charleston harbor, and had failed. We received our information from one who was present in Charleston; he might have been deceived by a poor imitation. Professor Grant says that his calcium light "has never yet illuminated those recondite regions, and furthermore I will take especial care that its rays shall not vivify the rebellious strands of Charleston until it lights our Stars and Stripes to restored liberty—and Sumpter!"

THE Twentieth New York State Militia were in active service in Baltimore during Major-General Banks's occupation of that city. The Post-Office and Custom House were guarded by Companies D, F, H and R of the Twentieth New York, under Colonel George W. Pratt, and not by the Twentieth Pennsylvania, as was stated in most of the New York papers. Honor to whom honor is due; let the gallant New York Twentieth have their full meed of praise for good and faithful service done.

MR. CHARLES BROWN, the proprietor of Tammany Hall, died suddenly on Tuesday, the 16th of July, in his forty-fifth year.

MRS. E. BARRETT BROWNING, the famous poetess, died in Florence on the 29th of June, in her forty-ninth year. She has left one child. She had been an invalid for years. Her last poem was on Victor Emanuel giving to Garibaldi's daughter a splendid necklace of brilliants.

MR. JOSEPH LAIDLEY, the well-known chemist, while making detonating powder in Richmond, on the 11th, for the use of the Confederate army, was blown into atoms. The Richmond Despatch says: "Mr. Laidley was found lying on his back, one of the most horrible objects of mutilated humanity which it is possible to conceive. Within a few yards of the body was found a portion of the poor man's brains, looking as if they had been torn by superhuman agency from the skull and splashed upon the floor. The entire head, except the lower jaw, had been blown off, and nothing remained to mark the features of a man except a pair of whiskers and a portion of the neck. The right arm was torn off below the elbow, and from the bloody stump hung the fragments of nerves, veins and sinews which were left behind. The hand was afterward found about two hundred yards from the place of explosion, in the yard of the State Armory; a portion of the face was likewise found, it is said, three hundred yards distant, near the banks of the river. The search for the remainder proved unavailing."

THE Court Martial on Colonel Allen has broken down. General Butler does not seem to have managed the matter well. Nevertheless, the arrest is a warning to other officers.

M. DU CHAILLU, the great gorilla hunter, had a fracas with Mr. Malone lately at an evening reception of one of the Learned Societies in London. It appears that Mr. Malone questioned the accuracy of some of M. Du Chaillu's statements, which had greatly enraged the African traveller. The next morning he wrote a very penitent letter to the London Times, apologising for his violence. The Thunderer says he must not carry the manners and customs of gorillas into London life.

HARVARD COLLEGE has conferred the Degree of Doctor of Laws upon Lieutenant General Scott.

WILLIAM D. KINNEY was convicted in Michigan, last week, of a murder marked by very atrocious circumstances. In accordance with the law of the State he was taken to State Prison, there to endure solitary confinement for life. From the time he enters the cell—a grave for the living man—he will never see a human face again. His meals are conveyed to him through an opening in his cell, and when it becomes necessary for human beings to approach him, they are hooded so as to conceal their features.

A STEADY GOING PARISH.—The first church in Braintree, Mass., was gathored in 1707, since which time it has had but three pastors besides the Rev. Dr. Storrs, the present minister. None of his predecessors has lived less than seventy-five years, or preached less than fifty years. The second pastor had good health to such a rare degree, that he preached every Sunday but two during forty-six years. Dr. Storrs has just entered upon the fifty first year of his ministry over this ancient society.

J. W. FARMER, whose liberality to the Volunteers we have lately chronicled, starts in a few days on a visit to the various camps. He takes with him a large quantity of goods as a present to the brave fellows who are fighting for their country. This visit will be welcome, for what he takes the army regulations do not supply.

THE Tribune correspondent, dating from Charlestown, has the following: "In consequence of complaints from numerous commanders, that their men were without shoes, clothing, &c., and could not now be supplied, as the time for which they had been sworn to was nearly expired, General Patterson visited the different brigades, and pleaded earnestly with the men to stand by him for the love of their country and the honor of our flag for a few days longer, but failed to gain support." It is doubtful which is the best friend to Secession, Jeff. Davis or these infamous contractors. The Herald says, in its Newport News correspondence—"The clothes of the New York First and Seventh regiments look very badly, and the men are ashamed to appear upon parade in their ragged and torn clothes. Many of them are barefooted, and cannot drill upon that account. The clothing furnished to the New York Volunteers should be taken as sufficient evidence of guilt to send the contractors who furnished it to the State Prison for life. I wish they were here; they would have justice meted out to them in a very summary manner. Those men will all be marked by the soldiers, whom they sent into the battlefield with miserable apologies for coats and pants, that are now almost entirely worn out and dropping off their persons." If the Union should fall, it will be through corruption, and not through rebellion.

FATHER MOONEY, the Chaplain of the gallant Sixty-ninth regiment, now at the seat of war with General McDowell's division, returned to this city a few days ago, and was the recipient, on Thursday night last, of a very handsome testimonial of the good will to which he is held by the parishioners of St. Bridget's church, Avenue B., of which he is the worthy pastor. This testimonial consisted of a splendid volume of the "Life of the Blessed Virgin," elegantly illustrated, but the most valuable illustration in the book—in a worldly if not in an artistic sense—was a check for $600, the gift of his parishioners. The presentation was made at the house of Captain Attridge, in Fourth street, in the presence of a numerous assemblage, among whom were Alderman Boole, Major Bagley of the Sixty-ninth, the Rev. Fathers Sterlo and Farrell, John Attridge, sen., Drs. O'Reilly, McGino and O'Sullivan, John McAuliffe, and other residents of that locality. The presentation was made by Mr. Fitzpatrick, and during the evening many warm eulogiums were passed, not only upon the recipient of the gift, but upon Father Sterlo, who was formerly connected with the Church of St. Bridget. The whole affair was characterized by the kindliest and most social feelings.

A MOST valuable work for the present time has just been issued by J. W. Fortnae, 19 City Hall Place. It is entitled "United States Infantry Tactics, together with the Bayonet Exercise." It is a most complete work in both departments, clearly written, simple in its style, and does not contain one word more than is necessary to a thorough explanation of the subjects treated of. It is most profusely illustrated with drawings explanatory of the positions both of the tactics and the exercise, and from these the reader cannot fail to understand the various movements in both without the aid of an instructor. The work is compiled agreeably to the Regulations of the War Department, from standard military authority, by a Graduate of the United States Military Academy and retired military officer of the Mexican war. We understand that this work has been approved by the military authorities at Washington, and will be purchased for distribution among the troops by the Department.

THE FOOT OF A HORSE.—The human hand has often been taken to illustrate Divine wisdom—and very well. But have you ever examined your horse's hoof? It is hardly less curious in its way. Its parts are somewhat more complicated, yet their design is simple and obvious. The hoof is not, as it appears to the careless eye, a mere lump of insensible bone fastened to the leg by a joint. It is made up of a series of thin layers, or leaves, of horn, about five hundred in number, and nicely fitted to each other, and forming a lining to the foot itself. Then there are as many more layers, belonging to what is called the "coffin bone," and fitted into this. These are elastic. Take a quire of paper and insert the leaves one by one into those of another quire, and you will get some idea of the arrangement of the several layers. Now, the weight of the horse rests on as many elastic springs as there are layers in his four feet—about 4,000; and all this is contrived, not only for the easy conveyance of his own body, but for whatever burdens may be laid on him.

A SAFETY SHIP.—Mr. Charles Lungley, shipbuilder, Deptford, working on the ideas of Charles Wye Williams, has produced the model of a ship, which you may set on fire, dash against rocks, stave in and tear to pieces, but which, it is asserted, you cannot sink. His plan consists in dividing the lower part of the ship, or vessel, into two or more closed water-tight compartments, and in affording access to these compartments for the introduction of cargo or stores by means of water-tight trunks or passages, led up from them to such a height that their upper or open ends shall never, in any practicable position of the ship, be brought quite down to the level of the water. Compartments thus formed may be used as ordinary cargo spaces, store-rooms, chain-lockers, or for any other like purposes, and may be ventilated by suitable trunks or tubes, always providing that all trunks or tubes of every kind which enter them shall be made water tight, and shall rise to the height before mentioned, in order that, if by any mischance either compartment should be broken into, and the sea be admitted to it, the water should have no means of escaping therefrom into any other part of the ship. The details vary with the sizes of vessel, but the principle in all ships is the same.

TO SMOKERS.—The meerschaum pipes are made of a kind of fuller's earth, called Keff-kil (literally, foam earth), formerly dug in pits in the Crimea, but now in Anatolia. The keff-kil is pressed into moulds on the spot, dried in the sun, and baked in an oven, the pipes are then boiled in milk, and polished with a soft leather, and then carried to Constantinople. They are there bought up by German merchants, who transport them to Pesth, in Hungary; when, as yet large and rude, they are soaked in water for twenty-four hours, and then turned in a lathe. The sound ones are, for the most part, sent to Vienna, where they are finished, and afterwards expensively mounted in silver.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

HALF the space in the Great Exhibition building is assigned to England and the Colonies. The applications from England were six times the allotted extent, and proportionate reductions have had to be made. About 800 men are at present employed upon the erection. The building will require 18,000,000 bricks, 22,000 tons of mortar, 600 tons of glass, 600 tons of paint and 10,000 tons of iron. There will also be no fewer than 600 miles of planking from seven to nine inches wide, 108 miles of window sashing, and 600,000 square feet of felt.

THE experiments as to the comparative merits of the Armstrong and Whitworth twelve pounder have terminated in favor of the latter, and Government is now considering whether they shall go on any longer making Armstrong's, or adapt the costly machinery at Woolwich to the construction of the better arm. As regards rifles, the Enfield Government piece is a bit of gaspipe when compared to a Whitworth rifle. The only obstacle to the introduction of the latter rifle is the expense of the manufacture—£10 each, said Lord Herbert last year; but the inventor declares this to be an exaggeration, and the cost would very little exceed that of the Enfield, while the weapon would be tenfold more serviceable, and better adapted to rough usage.

THE following singular and incredible paragraph appears in the Journal de Rouen: "The Emperor has had constructed for himself a kiosque in the middle of the pond of Fontainebleau, and in that edifice he intends to terminate his 'Life of Julius Cæsar.'"

A GIGANTIC statue of the Emperor, in the garb of a Roman Cæsar, is to be placed in one of the squares.

OF late a new and, to English notions, somewhat singular fashion has sprung up in Paris. The keepers of a great many cafés, especially in the Boulevards, have entirely removed the front part of their establishments (it generally consists only of woodwork and glass), so that people passing along the streets are favored with a full view of the customers eating and drinking. The French have always lived more in public than the English, but the fashion of taking their meals in, so to speak, the midst of the public, is new.

WORTH KNOWING.—In Jersey, every man (unless he be a landed proprietor) is at the mercy of every other man, both in the island and out of it. In short, one man can arrest another by drawing up an imaginary account on a common bit of paper and handing it to the nearest lawyer, who will send his clerk with the sheriff's man and imprison the unfortunate victim in default of immediate payment. What is worse still, an arrest can be carried into effect by means of a simple letter sent through the post. The exception in favor of landowners of course includes the owners of house property, an exception which mostly benefits Jersey men, as few but natives possess property in the island. It is only a proprietor who must be sued before he can be imprisoned.

A DEPUTATION of Poles waited on Cardinal Barberini not long ago, and one of them made him a speech. The Cardinal heard him in silence and bowed in reply. After the deputation had gone, he turned to his secretary and said, "What strange people these strangers are!" "Why so, your Eminence?" "Why, they made me a long speech in their language, and expected me to understand them." "Pardon me, your Eminence, they spoke in Latin." "In Latin! And why did you not tell me? I would have replied to them." The best of the joke is that the Polish accent, in speaking Latin, is the same as the Italian—a fact which does not argue much for the learning of the eminent Cardinal.

KING VICTOR EMANUEL has sent magnificent presents to Garibaldi's daughter, on the occasion of her marriage, as stated, with one of her father's aides-de-camp, who, it is said, saved Garibaldi's life in Sicily. Among the presents is a suite of ornaments in brilliants of great value.

ROSLIN CHAPEL.—A correspondent writes as follows regarding the restorations going on at this old chapel: "Two workmen only are employed. They are clearing off from the beautiful carved work, with which the interior is enriched, bit by bit, and with the utmost reverence and care, all the mosses, lichens, lycopodiums, ferns and other vegetable matter, which, from the chapel being exposed to the effects of the external atmosphere through unglazed windows and open doors, have gathered over it. They are, further, washing out, with equal care, the lime and whitewash that deeply encrusted many parts of the structure. Every bit of original carving is minutely examined, and where it is in even tolerable preservation it is left untouched. Where the stone is rotten, as it is technically called, or gives other token of inevitable and speedy decay, a mould is carefully taken of it in stucco, and a fresh stone, selected from the original quarry, of precisely the same shade as that for which it is to be substituted, is carved to the model. The decayed one is then cut out and the new one slipt into the place."

A PECULIAR RELATIONSHIP.—Mr. Howard was one day at a great dinner party which the late Duke of Norfolk gave to several of his neighbors. He sat at the bottom of the table, the Duke being at the head, and one of the gentlemen near the Duke called out to him, "Mr. Howard, will you drink a glass of wine with me? There was a connection between our families." "With a great deal of pleasure, sir," replied Mr. H., "though I don't know exactly what the connection is, but in this county there have been several marriages between neighbors." "Why, sir," resumed the gentleman, "your ancestor, Lord William Howard, hung up twenty three out of twenty-seven of my family, and you must own that was a tie."

A COMPANY has just been started in Paris, on strictly high church principles, for the sale of a newly-invented winding-sheet for burials. "It is high time," says the prospectus, "that man, on quitting this life, should cease to be frightful or ridiculous; he is frightful if wrapped in a common sheet, and ridiculous if dressed in his ordinary mundane attire. The newly invented winding sheet supplies a desideratum; the religious emblems with which it is ornamented make it a costume the aspect of which inspires nothing but feelings of consoling resignation." The company promises thirty per cent. dividends. Table linen is also supplied by the company on the most moderate terms.

M. GAUTHIER, the tutor of the Duke d'Aumale's son, was arrested recently, on his visit to Paris. He had with him what seemed to the police a suspicious-looking box. "What have you got in this box?" asked the agent. "I require to know." "Well, then," said M. Gauthier, looking steadfastly at the box, and then imploringly at the agent, "I tell you frankly that it contains something of importance, and which I would not on any account wish you to seize. Take care!" The agent drew back, with a movement similar to that which a novice in the pugilistic art might make in receiving a "one, two," from the fist of Tom Sayers. He recoiled a little, approached, and again stood back, as if he thought a half-dozen fulminating shells lay hid in it. He required M. Gauthier to open the box. M. Gauthier appeared unwilling to take the initiative, but handed the key to the agent, begging him to take care, and, above all, not to seize the contents. There was no help for it, the box must be opened; screwing his courage, therefore, to the highest point, the agent slowly and cautiously opened the lid, and found a suspicious-looking package wrapped up in paper. He undid the paper, and lo and behold! instead of fulminating bombs, "or double-barrelled swords, and cut-and-thrust pistols," there appeared weapons of another kind—a dozen of silver forks and spoons, which had been sent as a present from a friend in England. The police agent and M. Gauthier exchanged looks for a moment of the most comic kind. The agent shrugged his shoulders, begged pardon for the trouble he had given, saluted, and went his way to add his procès verbal to the archives of the prefecture. M. Gauthier replaced his couverts in the box, made his toilet, went to dine, passed a good night, and has by this time started for Burgundy, where he spends a few weeks before joining his pupil at Segovia. So ends this strange, eventful history.

SOME few days ago, the Plover, steamer, picked up a fine roebuck, of two years old, making its way boldly across Loch Ness. What had allured the animal out of its native element, says the Inverness Advertiser, does not appear, although we believe that an adventurous buck has been known occasionally to cross Loch Ness, and shift its feeding ground to the opposite hills.

A PERSON of the name of Baldock, who died lately at Canterbury, exhibited an instance of the accumulation of wealth from small beginnings, in fact, from nothing. He died at the age of little more than sixty, possessed of one million one hundred thousand pounds. He was originally a poor boy employed to look after cows. He afterwards carried "the hod" as a bricklayer's laborer, and at length by dint of industry and parsimony, with some assistance, he amassed money enough to build the barracks at Canterbury, which he lent to the Government at sixpence a day for each soldier—a practice which proved so profitable to him, that in the course of a few years the whole building became his own, and he continued to acquire wealth in various ways, till at the time of his death it amounted to the enormous sum before stated.

ON the occasion of Mr. Baron Alderson and Mr. Justice Patteson holding the assizes at Cambridge, Mr. Gunson was appointed to preach the assize sermon, when next morning the following lines were sent by post to the judges:

> "A Baron, a Justice, a Preacher, sons three—
> The Preacher, a son of a Gun was he;
> The Baron, he is the son of a tree;
> Whose son the Justice is, I cannot well see—.
> But read him Pater-son, and all will agree,
> That the son of his father the Justice must be."

IN connection with the meetings of the British Association there is established a club called the "Red Lions," consisting of eminent scientific and literary men. The origin of this society is described as follows in the Life of Professor Edward Forbes, just published: "The Birmingham meeting of the Association in 1839 is memorable for the institution of the 'Red Lions,' of which Forbes was the founder, and for many years the leading spirit. He and other young naturalists, disliking the irksomeness and expense of the ordinary, adjourned to a small tavern adorned with the sign of the Red Lion. There they dined daily, at small expense, on beef cooked in various fashions, moistened with sundry potations of beer, and enlivened by joke and song, in contradistinction to the ent[r]ées, dishes and wines and formalities of the 'big wigs.' 'Before the conclusion of the meeting,' says Dr. Beaumont, 'these dinners became so famous that the tavern could scarcely hold the guests, and it was resolved to continue them wherever afterwards the Association should meet.' The sign of the tavern furnished a name for the guests. They styled themselves 'Red Lions,' and in proof of their leonine relationship, made it a point of always signifying their approval or dissent by growls and roars more or less audible, and, where greater energy was needed, by a vigorous flourishing of their coat-tails. In these manifestations, it is needless to say, that the voice of Edward Forbes rang out above the rest, and his rampant coat-tail served as a model to the younger lions. He was wont, too, to delight the company by chanting, in his own peculiar intonation, songs composed for the occasion, the subjects being usually taken from some branch of science, and treated with that humor and grotesqueness in which he so much delighted."

LORD MALMESBURY'S ancestor, the author of "Hermes," and an eminent scholar, entered the House of Commons about the middle of the last century. A bon mot of one of the Townsends is recorded on his taking his seat.

"Who is the new member?" asked Townsend.

"A Mr. Harris, who has written on grammar and harmony," was the reply.

"Then what," said Townsend, "brings him here, where he will hear neither."

THE French farmers-general adopted many ingenious contrivances for advancing their fortunes. A certain chancellor of France having lost a dog, of which he was very fond, one of these individuals procured another very like it, and, dressing himself up in a wig and gown like that worn by the chancellor, he accustomed the animal to take su[c]culents from his hand, but to fly at every one else. Having sufficiently trained him, he carried him to the chancellor, and declared that he had found the dog that was lost. The chancellor was delighted, and an acquaintance was thus formed which largely contributed to the advancement of the dog-trainer. Another of this worthy's schemes was to serve mass to Cardinal de Fleury, and instead of the usual wine to give him Madeira or Malaga.

"You know Lord Barrymore?" said a nobleman to Dr. Beaufort.

"Intimately, most intimately."

"You are continually with him?"

"We dine together almost every day when his lordship is in town."

"What do you talk about?"

"Eating and drinking."

"What else?"

"Drinking and eating."

DR. RODET, late chief surgeon of the Antiquaille, at Lyons, having remarked that a solution of perchloride of iron, applied as a topic, was extremely useful in the treatment of certain disorders, was induced to try it also in the cow-pox, and found, as he suspected, that the perchloride destroyed that virus completely. Encouraged by these results, he determined to try its effect on the virus of hydrophobia; and with this view a series of experiments was made at the Veterinary School at Lyons, from which it appears that the solution of perchloride of iron destroys the virus of hydrophobia with certainty, if applied within two hours after the infliction of the bite. It is highly probable that the effect would be the same if the remedy were applied four, six, or even eight hours later, but this requires confirmation by further experiment. Admitting that Dr. Rodet's discovery may be relied on, its importance cannot certainly be overvalued; for, although the actual cautery is exceedingly prompt, nay, instantaneous in its action, it is often difficult to apply it, either owing to the trepidation of the patient or to the dangerous position of the wound; and, on the other hand, it may be often easier to find the solution of perchloride at a chemist's, in the country especially, than a skilful operator to apply the red-hot iron unflinchingly to the injured part.

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

WHEN Mr. White looks black, does he change color?

WHY was Bonaparte's horse like his master? Because he had a martial neigh (Marshal Ney).

A LITTLE girl hearing it remarked that all people had once been children, artlessly inquired, "Who took care of the babies?"

"I SAY, Bill," asked an insulting fellow, "why is your hat like a giblet-pie?" "Give it up." "Why, because there's a goose's head in it."

THERE is a tradesman in Broadway who is so opposed to pugilism that he refuses to advertise his goods, fearing he might hit the public taste.

"I THINK I have seen you before, sir, are you not Owen Smith?" "Oh, yes, I'm owin' Smith, and owin' Jones, and owin' Brown, and owin' everybody."

ONE day, at a farmhouse, a wag saw an old gobbler trying to eat the strings of some nightcaps that lay on the ground to bleach. "That," said he, "is what I call introducing cotton into Turkey."

"Go to the d——l," said Lord Thurlow one day, when storming at his old valet. "Pray give me a character, my lord," replied the fellow, drily. "People like, you know, to have characters from their acquaintance."

A FRIEND, in conversation with Rogers, said, "I never put my razor in hot water, as I find it injures the temper of the blade." "No doubt of it," said the poet, "show me the blade that would not be out of temper, if plunged into hot water."

"NOW, GENTLEMEN," said Sheridan to his guests, as the ladies left the room, "let us understand each other. Are we to drink like men or like beasts?" Somewhat indignant, the guests exclaimed, "Like men, of course." "Then," he replied, "we are going to get jolly drunk, for brutes never drink more than they want."

WHEN Voltaire was on his deathbed many visitors called—all of whom were denied entrance to his chamber. Amongst them was the Abbé Chapeau, who came to offer the consolations of the Church. When his name was announced by the servant, Voltaire said, "I came into the world bareheaded, and I shall leave it without a chapeau!"

JOSEPH II. of Austria was fond of travelling incognito, and one day he reached a little inn on his route before his retinue came up. Entering a retiring room, he began shaving himself. The inquisitorial landlord was anxious to know what post his guest held about the person of the Emperor. "I shave him sometimes," was his majesty's reply.

A LITTLE lawyer appearing as a witness in one of the courts, was asked by a gigantic barrister what profession he was of; and having replied he was an attorney, "You a lawyer?" said Briefless. "Why I can put you in my pocket!" "Very likely you may," rejoined the other; "and if you do you will have more law in your pocket than you ever had in your head!"

"HERE, John," said a gentleman to his servant on horseback in the rear, "come forward, and just take hold of my horse while I dismount, and after I am dismounted, John, you dismount too. Then, John, ungirth the saddle of your horse and put it down; then also ungirth the saddle of my horse and put it down. Afterwards, John, take up the saddle of your horse, and put and girth it on my horse. Next, John, take up the saddle of my horse, and put and girth it on your horse. Then, John, I will seat myself in your saddle, and we will resume our journey." "Bless me master," said the astonished servant, "why couldn't you simply have said, Let's change saddles?"

IN the Paris Court of Correctional Police, recently, a lady, by no means young, advanced coquettishly to the witness stand to give her testimony. "What is your name?" "Virginie Loustalot." "What is your age?" "Twenty-five." (Exclamations of incredulity from the audience.) The lady's evidence being taken, she regained her place, still coquettishly bridling, and the next witness was introduced. This one was a full grown young man. "Your name?" said the judge. "Isadore Loustalot." "Your age?" "Twenty-seven years." "Are you a relative of the last witness?" "I am her son." "Ah, well!" murmured the magistrate, "your mother must have married very young."

SIR FRANCIS HEAD, speaking of the pleasures of the chase, gave an anecdote of a hard argument in favor of fox-hunting, in these words: "Said the haughty Countess of —— to an aged huntsman, who, cap in hand, had humbly invited her ladyship to do him the honor to come and see his hounds, 'I dislike everything belonging to hunting—it is so cruel!' 'Cruel,' replied the old man, with apparent astonishment, 'why, my lady, it can't possibly be cruel, for,' logically holding up three fingers in succession, 'we all knows that the gentleman likes it, and we all knows that the hosses likes it, and we all knows that the hounds likes it; and,' after a long pause, 'none on us, my lady, can know for certain that the foxes don't like it.'"

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

CHAPTER LVII.

LADY KINGSWOOD, having hastily summoned assistance on the instant Philip Avon took his departure, applied restoratives to the senseless Lady Maud, and as soon as she exhibited signs of returning animation had her conveyed to her own chamber. She then seated herself by her side, and dismissed the servants, that she alone might be near her on her awakening to consciousness.

Lady Kingswood, for the last two or three years, had entertained a notion that Lady Maud's affection for her son Cyril was something stronger than friendship or the emotion which is supposed to be created by near relationship; still she believed it to be nothing more than the first liking of a girl, which would be quickly displaced by the "proper" attachment she would form for the man who was to become her husband, and she took no steps to caution Maud to keep her heart in control.

While herself yet single she had been pleased with the attentions of the Marquis of Chillingham, then Lord Buleley. So pleased, indeed, that when most subjected to them she preferred him to Lord Kingswood, to whom she had been betrothed. But she was so imbued with the traditions of her own family and of her own class, that she never dreamed of suffering her heart's impressions to interfere with the disposal of her hand. She assumed that Maud would think as she had done. If she found that her inclining for one object in particular was overstepping the bounds of prudent control, she would retrace her steps and keep her love for the legitimate purpose of bestowing it with her hand.

Lady Kingswood suspected, from the change in Lady Maud's appearance, in her mien, in her whole deportment, that her mind was oppressed with the weight of a secret, and what secret could one so pure and guileless have but love? At first, as we have said, Lady Kingswood thought but little of this; it was so natural that Lady Maud should be fond of her cousin Cyril.

Lady Kingswood shud'ered as she acknowledged to herself that the wedding-ring she would receive would be but as a ticket in a lottery, in which prizes would be the exception, and blanks the bitter, painful and heartbreaking rule.

She, in pursuance of her plan, had elicited from Lady Maud that she was in love, and she was not a little startled by the revelation—not that she was surprised to hear that she had lost her heart, but she was unpleasantly amazed to find that it was not Cyril who had found it.

As for Philip Avon, it was quite clear that he had succeeded in raising only feelings of repugnant antipathy in Lady Maud's breast; who, then, could it be who had made himself master of her first love—the sweetest, tenderest, most genuine and unselfish of human passions?

Lady Kingswood racked her brain, but in vain. Lady Maud had, it is true, mixed in society in London. She had come out at the proper time and had attracted considerable attention, but although she had been the object of direct admiration to several, Lady Kingswood was quite convinced that Lady Maud had not reciprocated the emotion she had evidently created.

A strange, deadly thrill ran through her frame as the clear complexioned, fine, open face of Erle Gower crossed her vision.

Yet it was impossible that he could have won her heart! The youth was haughty and reserved. He had been but little in her company, and had, in fact, displayed rather a disposition to be hostile and antagonistic to all the family than to approach any individual member with love-pleadings.

Yet he had once, at the imminent risk of his own life, saved her from a terrible death, and now Lady Kingswood suddenly remembered that since that time Lady Maud had scarcely, if ever, mentioned his name to her, but that she had repelled the defamatory insults which Philip Avon had heaped upon him, and the terrible accusations which Pharisee had insinuated rather than preferred against him, with indignant if not passionate scorn.

Once upon this trail, Lady Kingswood tracked with care each incident which might be brought in some way to bear upon her present surmise. The events, as forming a chain of evidence, were feeble and inconclusive, but there were one or two of them which were startlingly confirmatory of the truth of her first vague suspicion.

She began to entertain most unpleasant misgivings about the old library, in connection with the sudden reappearance of the phantom whom Erle was said to resemble. It was also a source of uneasiness to her when she remembered the effect Philip Avon's allusion to this event had upon Lady Maud. It was true that she had, ever since her last arrival at Kingswood Hall, disappeared for a short period each morning to visit, as Lady Kingswood now supposed, the old library; but it was also true that Lady Maud, from a child, had been fond of visiting the solemn old chamber, to pore over some of the quaint, antique lore stored away on its shelves. She had done this long before Erle appeared like a spectre of evil upon the scene, and there appeared, therefore, not to be any cause for surprise that she should do so now. Still, Philip Avon's mention, with singular significance, of the phantom of the hunter-baron, and Lady Maud's evident perturbation, if not absolutely a confirmation of her new fears, went some way to strengthen them.

The idea, once conceived, took a strange hold upon her mind, and a cold, numbing faintness seized her. She had believed it impossible to add to the mental torture she already suffered, but she found her present reflections a subject calculated to inflict an anguish almost as acute as the conduct of Lord Kingswood had occasioned her.

When Lady Maud opened her eyes and recognised the face of Lady Kingswood bending over her, she heaved a deep sigh. Then her eyes, with an anxious expression in them, took a survey of the apartment, and the lids closed over them in relief as she perceived that Lady Kingswood and herself were alone.

Gradually, as her thoughts went back to the moment when insensibility came upon her, a rosy tint suffused her cheek and brow. She rose up suddenly from her reclining attitude, and would have quitted her couch but that Lady Kingswood prevented her.

"Rest where you are, my dear Maud," she exclaimed, hastily. "You have but now recovered from a swoon; you are weak and far from well. Repose, therefore, and a calm mind will be necessary to re-establish your health."

Lady Maud instinctively apprehended the examination which was about to take place. She inwardly prayed to be guided aright in the course she might pursue, not that she had any definite notion of the path it would be most advisable for her to take. Indeed, she had no cunning, and though not deficient in quickness of perception and sagacity, neither the one nor the other were of a kind to lead her into deceptive wariness or astute reticence.

"You have become deathly white again, Maud," said Lady Kingswood to her, gently. "Do you feel your faintness returning?"

Lady Maud drooped her head slightly, and answered, in a low voice, "No."

"I will not quit you, dearest," continued Lady Kingswood, in a tender tone; "therefore lay your head upon this cushion, and perhaps a little sleep——"

"I do not wish to sleep," murmured Lady Maud. "I—I—am not ill."

"But you fainted while Mr. Philip Avon was speaking to you. If you were not ill, why should you be so seriously overcome?" observed Lady Kingswood.

"I do not like him," returned Lady Maud, with slight emphasis.

Lady Kingswood replied, equally with some emphasis in her voice,

"Sometimes we form, most erroneously, both likes and dislikes," she said. "I admit that Mr. Philip Avon is somewhat uncouth in his observations as well as in his manners. In Mr. Philip Avon you have a young man of unobjectionable exterior, of ancient descent and of wealthy possessions. In addition to which he is devoted to you, imbued, in fact, with a passion—I might say an adoration—of which any woman might be proud because he will elevate you, when he makes you his wife, above all other women. Your dislike, therefore, is, as I have characterised it, a hasty, unconsidered impression, which you will do wisely for your future happiness to at once correct."

Lady Maud's eyebrows contracted yet more decidedly, and her lips compressed a little more tightly, as those significant words reached her ear, but she still remained perfectly silent.

"One of those states of feeling," continued Lady Kingswood, increasing the sternness of her tone, "is but too often dependent on the other. The emotion of dislike is brought into play by the unfortunate liking, let the latter emotion be created when it may, antecedently or posteriorly. And unhappily the dislike is usually heightened in the exact ratio as the liking increases in warmth."

Lady Maud continued silent; she did not attempt to acquiesce in or to dispute Lady Kingswood's argument, and the latter became, therefore, proportionably the more determined and dogmatic in her observations.

"You have confessed to me, Lady Maud," she continued, a color coming into her cheek, and a brightness commingling with her gravity, "that you have fallen in love—fallen in love," she repeated, with a scornful curl of the lip. "School girls fall in love with their Italian masters or the poor creature who teaches them drawing, or the man who unfolds to them the mysteries of music, and in a very short time they awake from their childish insanity to blush hotly, and be violently angered with themselves for having been so feeble-minded and weak spirited—awake to look back in self contempt upon their poor, vain tribute. Now, this love that you fancy you entertain is, I much fear, something very much of the nature of what I have described——"

Lady Maud rose up, and with a heaving bosom and a brightening eye, interposed,

"Lady Kingswood," she said, in a trembling voice, "you have had experience, I am aware. You have, no doubt, during your past married life, and perhaps previously, met with persons animated by feelings such as you have described. I do not deny the correctness of your assertions until you personify me. So long as your ladyship confined yourself to generalities I felt that they did not apply to me, and, therefore, ought not to affect me, but when you make a deliberate charge against me, when you include me in the category of the poor foibles, who have acted in the weak and culpable manner you have described, I must protest against its truth."

Lady Kingswood rose up too.

"Did you not, Lady Maud," she exclaimed, excitedly, "confess to me that you loved?"

"You extorted that confession from me, Lady Kingswood," retorted Maud, in a fainter tone.

"Extorted it!" cried Lady Kingswood. "To me it seems that it was a gratuitous acknowledgment."

"No," returned Maud, "Oh, Lady Kingswood, you must be aware that it could never have been spoken by me under present circumstances had you not watched over me in my sleep, heard words muttered in my dreams, and then reporting them to me, with certain comments of your own, presented to me an interpretation of them which, without destroying my truthfulness, I could not have denied."

Lady Kingswood stood immoveable, her face had grown white too, her eyes were fixed on Maud's face, her nostrils were inflated, her lips scarcely visible, and her bosom heaved and fell under the powerful inward emotion which Lady Maud's last observation had created.

It was, then, a fact—a truth! She loved, and the object of her love was a secret.

She had no doubt that Erle was Lord Kingswood's son, but with the bar sinister on his escutcheon. The Marquis of Chillingham had certainly told her that Lord Kingswood had married this boy's mother, but that statement fell dead on her ear. She never for one instant entertained a doubt that she was Lord Kingswood's wife; but it would have required some superhuman powers of persuasion to have induced her to believe that Erle was not her husband's son, under circumstances the most outrageously insulting to her.

She might therefore well feel, with implacable bitterness, a communication from Lady Maud's lips that she loved Erle. She might well hesitate to ask for it, because she was attached to Lady Maud, and such an acknowledgment as she dreaded would necessarily separate them for ever in this world, unless Maud sacrificed her feelings, and consented never to see or think of Erle more.

Several times Lady Kingswood essayed to speak but the words seemed to cling to her throat and to refuse to be articulated. At length she said, panting as she spoke,

"I will concede to you, Lady Maud, the view you take of the revelation—the grave, the very serious confession you have made to me—one, I hope, uttered thoughtlessly, and originating in an inconsiderate estimation of the real powers and capabilities of your heart."

"No, Lady Kingswood!" exclaimed Lady Maud, with a startling, passionate fervor in her tone.

Lady Kingswood involuntarily shrank from her. It was evident that the ejaculation gave her great pain. She closed her eyes like one suffering from a spasm, but after a moment's pause she turned her face, with a sad and gloomy expression, to the pale, young, trembling girl before her, so timid as a rule, so brave and firm exceptionally.

Lady Maud threw up her head proudly for a moment but she saw how seriously Lady Kingswood was affected, and her voice and manner became suddenly low and trembling as before.

"Lady Kingswood," she said, "you err in your supposition. You are, too, guilty of a cruel injustice. My love has not been won from me basely or surreptitiously; on the contrary, it has been frankly and freely bestowed. You wrong me also, Lady Kingswood, in presuming that I love where I cannot honor. He to whom I have given my heart is noble and generous in sentiment and spirit. He would scorn to be guilty of a mean or dishonorable action. I would stake my life upon his being a true and loyal gentleman, who would proudly dare a living man to cast an aspersion on him in his presence, and who would meet and disprove it as became his honor if uttered in his absence. As he is for himself, of his nature, personally and mentally he is not second to the bravest, noblest, the highest in the land. Undaunted in courage, gentle in spirit, truthful in thought and action, and incapable of producing a blush on the cheek of another, or upon his own, he requires no ancient name, nor title, nor vast worldly possessions to claim that seat in my heart which he, even unconsciously himself, won, and from which, Lady Kingswood, no living earthly power can displace him."

"This human paragon," she said, in cold tones, "has a name, I presume? Communicate it to me."

"Pardon me, Lady Kingswood," replied Lady Maud, rather decidedly. "That is a portion of the secret which does not belong to you to demand, or even to me to reveal. That I love I have admitted. That admission it was my exclusive right to make, but there for the present I must pause, and entreat you not to press me further, only to receive from my lips a succession of refusals as painful to you as to me."

ERLE GOWER.

"Lady Maud," rejoined Lady Kingswood, severely, "probably you will be good enough to step from your pedestal of romance into this every-day, working world. You are the Lady Maud St. Clair, moving in a high sphere, and known to the world as such. You cannot fix your affections at will upon some unknown person, and sacrifice name, fame, and all who are nearly connected with you, because you happen to be fascinated by some individual lurking in secrecy, and you fallaciously clothe him with attributes not one of which he probably possesses. You must make sacrifices to your position——"

"Lady Kingswood, I am asked—nay, I am sternly commanded—to sacrifice peace, happiness, even self-respect for the sake of my station," cried Lady Maud, with passionate earnestness.

"Your self-respect, Lady Maud?" echoed Lady Kingswood.

"My self-respect, Lady Kingswood," repeated Lady Maud, with excitement. "Has not Lord Kingswood commanded me, have you not exhorted me to give my hand to Mr. Philip Avon?"

"But, Lady Maud," responded Lady Kingswood, "this is a marriage——"

"Of horror, of degradation, of contamination to me, Lady Kingswood," cried Lady Maud, passionately. "I detest, abhor, loathe this man. His aspect, his manner, his whole being is to me intensely odious. I sicken at his name; I shudder at his approach. I believe him to be untruthful and unworthy, yet Lord Kingswood would drag me before Heaven's own altar, and insist upon my falsely swearing myself; would compel me to register a vow to love, to honor and to obey him—him of all men living whom I detest, I despise, and to whom I would never render obedience. I might, Lady Kingswood, be prepared to make some sacrifices to a station which, under its best aspect, is now painfully irksome to me; but that I will barter my self-respect, outrage my sense of truth, violate every sentiment with which happiness and virtue are bound up in this life—I cannot, I will not, Lady Kingswood."

Lady Kingswood gazed at her with astonishment for a few minutes, seemingly bewildered by the force of her reasoning. But presently she recovered herself, and said, with some vehemence, although she preserved the lofty haughtiness she had assumed:

"Lady Maud, you are still regarding this question from an exceedingly romantic point of view. This is not a question of love at all, it is a question of duty, Lady Maud. I have made duty my lode-star through life; I have made continuous sacrifices for duty; and I——"

The door gently opened, Mrs. Muddlemist put her head in, and then glided in immediately afterwards.

"Oh, if you please, m'lady," she said, approaching Lady Kingswood, "Mr. Pharisee, Lord Kingswood's valet, has arrived, m'lady, and he wishes to see your ladyship. I believe, m'lady, he brings a special message from his lordship, m'lady, and is requested by his lordship to deliver it himself to your ladyship, m'lady."

Lady Kingswood turned a ghastly hue as she received this announcement, and she involuntarily staggered back a step or two. It had arrived in the midst of her lecture on duty somewhat inopportunely.

"—I—I will see Pharisee," she said, in a voice which had grown husky. "Conduct him to my boudoir, Muddlemist, I will see him there."

Mrs. Muddlemist went through the ceremony of an elaborate curtsey, and then trotted, or rather strutted off, in her peculiar old-fashioned stately way.

Lady Kingswood, whose manner had strangely altered within the last minute, having changed from hauteur to humility, turned to Lady Maud, and said,

"It is important that we should again confer upon this subject. I hope yet to prevail with you, Maud; at present you entertain a strained, a wrong view of Lord Kingswood's wishes, and—and my own."

She faltered out the last word, and it was almost inaudible. It mattered little. Lady Maud did not appear to heed it if she heard it.

She sank upon the couch as Lady Kingswood—like one in a dream—quitted the apartment, and murmured, as her tears fell thick and fast,

"Erle, Erle, thine, thine alone, or death's."

One of Lady Kingswood's most anxious wishes had been, since she had arrived at Kingswood Hall, to obtain a secret interview with Pharisee.

She was anxious to know what had transpired since that night on which she had quitted the picture gallery in Kingswood House, when the sudden appearance of Lady Maud in a state of somnambulism saved her from committing a dreadful breach of that duty on which she had so recently enlarged with such ardor to Lady Maud.

She knew not how the Marquis of Chillingham had made his escape from the picture-gallery any more than she knew how he had obtained admission to it. As Pharisee had no doubt introduced him, so no doubt he had conducted him safely away again, so she had heard nothing about it, and she had seen the Marquis of Chillingham perfectly unchanged in demeanor and appearance at Brighton.

She had not seen him since that horrible night, and had yet to learn what had happened—what was brewing.

She had access to the chamber in which Pharisee awaited her by a communication different to that which had admitted him, and she entered the room in which he was seated with the carriage of an empress.

She slightly and coldly inclined her head as he rose up and bowed profoundly to her, and seating herself, she left him standing.

A glance told her that there was a great change in the man's exterior. He was dressed in black as usual, but there was a style in the set and fashion of his clothes which were very different to those befitting one holding his position. Then his straight black hair appeared to have been trimmed and curled, and his whiskers to have been dressed to a spruceness which was startling.

"Your business with me, Pharisee?" said Lady Kingswood, coldly, as the valet stood motionless and silent.

He looked at her pale, frigid countenance, and his teeth slightly grated.

"It is of importance to your ladyship," he replied.

Her lip curled.

"You bring, I am informed by Muddlemist, a communication from Lord Kingswood to me. I had formed an intention, after what has passed, of declining to see or to receive either communications or messages from his lordship. On reconsidering this determination, I will hear what you have to say."

"Mrs. Muddlemist correctly delivered to your ladyship the message I forwarded by her," returned Pharisee, in a smooth tone. "It was a precaution of importance to be observed, your ladyship, to state to the servants that I have been honored with the commands of Lord Kingswood to convey to your ladyship a communication from him. It would indeed have been thoughtless and indiscreet on my part to have directed Mrs. Muddlemist to say that I wished to see your ladyship on your business and my own."

Lady Kingswood knew not how to reply. She felt the audacity of the observation, but she had made him a confidant, and she could not object to his observation. She did not; she remained silent.

"I am, therefore, your ladyship, here upon very grave and serious business connected ultimately with your ladyship, and—and your most humble and devoted slave."

"Your ladyship will remember that you urged upon me the task of discovering the whole of the mystery connected with Mr. Erle Gower and the relationship in which he stands to Lord Kingswood. I have made the greatest exertions to comply with your ladyship's commands," he said, with quiet but deliberate emphasis. "At the risk of rousing the suspicions of Lord Kingswood, of incurring his displeasure—indeed, Lady Kingswood, at the hazard of my own existence—I found a clue to certain individuals who were in possession of all the facts, and I have tracked them, dogged them, watched them, secreted myself where I could overhear their mutual statements and admissions, all bearing on the one subject, and all directed to the one same terrible conclusion."

Lady Kingswood passed her hand across her eyes, and then, with an effort, said:

"I have myself reached a conclusion upon this horrible affair. I do not desire to hear the sickening details. I have partly determined upon my course; and, therefore, Pharisee, I request you for the present to be silent on this iniquitous and degrading story."

"Pardon me, my lady," he returned, rather hastily. "I am afraid that your conclusion falls very far short of the truth. The facts are unfortunately more frightful than your ladyship can possibly have contemplated."

"What facts can be more frightful than that the boy introduced mysteriously beneath this roof is a son of my Lord Kingswood?" responded Lady Kingswood, bitterly.

Pharisee shrugged his shoulders.

"If it were only that, my lady, the difficulty now existing might be soon got over," he exclaimed. "Lord Kingswood has had his frailties—of that your ladyship has a living proof—and his lordship would scarcely, knowing that, dare to challenge the strict platonism of your ladyship's friendship with the Marquis of Chillingham."

Lady Kingswood's eyes flashed fire.

"How dare you insinuate?" she cried, angrily.

He stopped her.

"Pray, pardon me, Lady Kingswood, I do not insinuate," he cried, deprecatingly. "I do not desire, much less attempt to do so. I know Lord Kingswood to be proud, haughty, impetuous and jealous of that honor he has but so ill preserved. I merely suggest that his right to exercise a control over your ladyship's actions would be destroyed by his own infidelity to your ladyship. I am only saying if your ladyship's conclusion was the sum of the wrong done to you, it might be surmounted. Not, of course, without considerable pain and vexation to your ladyship, but sufficiently to keep the world from becoming acquainted with the unpleasant events which have transpired. But unhappily, your ladyship, that conclusion does not reach the dreadful truth."

"The dreadful truth!" echoed Lady Kingswood, with an alarmed expression stealing over her features.

She did not like the peculiar gravity of Pharisee's words, nor the ambiguity with which he prefaced a communication which seemed to promise to be more fearful than any she had yet heard respecting Lord Kingswood's conduct to her.

"It is, my lady, I am grieved to say, not all indeed; it is very far from being all that your ladyship will have to hear," he replied.

She groaned.

"Keep me not in suspense, Pharisee," she gasped.

Pharisee gazed upon her handsome face and fine form, and a gulp appeared to swell out his throat, but adhering to his cringing attitude and his fawning tone of voice, he said:

"Your ladyship is aware that there are not only strange traditions clinging to the House of Kingswood, but that there are strange, incomprehensible circumstances occurring within and in the vicinity of this ancient hall."

"I am aware of that," remarked Lady Kingswood.

"The sights and the noises seen and heard within the old part of this antique hall may be taken, Lady Kingswood, for what they are worth," continued Pharisee, "inasmuch that their value depends upon the reliability of the individuals making the statements. But I believe that no doubt does exist in the mind of any person residing within this Hall, or within its neighborhood for miles, that there actually is a living Wonder of Kingswood Chase."

"The living wonder!" gasped Lady Kingswood. And then she remembered that Erle and Maud had both spoken of a young and beautiful girl they had met in the Chace, that she had then an uneasy impression that Cyril, acquainted with the existence and the residence of this sylvan beauty, had formed a wild, romantic attachment to her, which was the clue to his changed appearance and altered manner, and that Erle had stated that this young lovely forest maiden had been named by one of their gamekeepers the Wonder of Kingswood Chace.

She was versed in the traditions of the House, and at the time Erle made this communication to her it had deeply affected her; now Pharisee's mention of her in advance of the revelation he was about to make almost froze the blood in her veins.

"What—what of her?" she subjoined, in a hoarse voice.

Pharisee bent his eyes slowly but steadfastly upon Lady Kingswood, and emphasising each word, said,

"This young lady is in the face the counterpart of the weird Lady Maud. I have seen her, Lady Kingswood. So, indeed, has your ladyship."

A thrill of terror went through Lady Kingswood's frame.

"The weird Lady Maud?" she ejaculated. "I—I have seen her? Where?"

"In the carriage-ride in Hyde-park, my lady, on horseback, side by side with Mr. Erle Gower, and also, I believe, at the Marquis of Chillingham's——"

"I remember her well—yes—yes, pale, fair, spirituelle—and, oh, heaven! in truth, fearfully like unto the statue of Lady Maud in the old library," cried Lady Kingswood, panting under her emotion.

"The same," rejoined Pharisee. "The weird Lady Maud was a Kingswood, my lady, and it will naturally suggest itself that none but a Kingswood would so closely resemble one of the most noted of the ancestry."

Lady Kingswood buried her face in her hands, and a passionate burst of tears forced their way through her eyelids and trickled beneath her white fingers.

But almost instantaneously she flung back her face, and with the water yet glistening in her eyes, she said,

"You mean, in fact, to tell me that Erle and this girl are brother and sister?"

"It is even so, my lady," he replied, in an insinuating tone; "but I do not see how such a fact would much materially add to the injury inflicted upon you by Lord Kingswood, but when that comes into combination with another fact, the injury then becomes irreparable."

"With another fact?" half shrieked Lady Kingswood, rising up. "Man, you torture, madden me by this slow, piecemeal recital. I cannot endure it; give me at once to know the whole dreadful secrets you are about to reveal."

She towered above him, and with clenched hands and outstretched arms, startled him. He shrank back a pace or two, and said, rather hurriedly,

"In brief, then, my lady, that boy is the heir of Kingswood; the girl, my lord's legitimate daughter. You are, in fact, not Lady Kingswood, and your son, Mr. Cyril, is entitled to bear only your maiden name."

Lady Kingswood gazed upon him like one who had been smitten by a stroke of paralysis. She clutched at a table for support, and then staggering back, sank insensible upon a couch.

Pharisee moved towards her, after casting a furtive glance round the apartment; he did not summon assistance, for having expected some such scene, he had provided himself with a bottle of smelling-salts.

He applied it to Lady Kingswood's nostrils, and in silence watched her recovery. She awoke like one from out a frightful dream, but the long, sallow face of Pharisee caught her eyes, and a half-smothered shriek burst from her lips, and again she hid her face in her hands.

"Lady Kingswood," he said, in a low tone, "you remember what I have communicated to you?"

An agonised groan burst from her lips.

"It cannot be true!" she exclaimed, in a tone of intense anguish.

"It is true!" he returned, with emphasis. "It is true, Lady Kingswood. I know where the marriage between Lord Kingswood and the mother of the children was solemnised. I know the name and the residence of the clergyman by whom it was performed. I have seen the certificate duly signed and witnessed of the marriage, and I can establish beyond dispute that it took place before you went through the farce of a wedding with Lord Kingswood. Let me now ask you, Lady Kingswood, what course, after this, you intend to pursue?"

The strange, almost insolent tone he suddenly assumed roused Lady Kingswood out of her passionate grief. She turned her flashing though humid eyes upon him, as if to demand of him how he durst put such a question to her.

He saw the look, and interpreted it correctly.

"Lady Kingswood," he said, as she remained indignantly silent, "let me answer that question for you. Kingswood Hall is no longer a home for you. You cannot remain beneath this roof if even you had the meanness of spirit to wish it, which I am sure you have not. You must therefore depart hence—but where? Again I say, let me answer that question. Your ladyship bade me name my own reward for the services I have rendered you, and to claim it when due! It is due now, and I claim it! It is yourself, Lady Kingswood! I have long loved you passionately——"

She laid her hand upon the bell, and rang it frantically.

Pharisee's face became an olive color. The act was performed before he had the power to arrest it.

"Beware, Lady Kingswood," he cried, in a guttural voice, "of my revenge!"

The door opened, and a man servant appeared.

Lady Kingswood extended her hand to him in a commanding tone, and cried,

"Stand you there to guard the door, but with your voice summon half-a-dozen of your fellows here."

The man, with an air of astonishment, did as he was ordered.

Pharisee, with a face of a whitish-green hue, showed his teeth as a hound would his fangs.

"Lady Kingswood, I bid you beware!" he cried, hoarsely.

"Silence, wretch!" she shrieked rather than spoke, and addressing the servant, she said, in tones quivering with excitement, "if he dares attempt to utter another word strike him to the ground."

The servant advanced instantly with a menacing manner, and as he did so three or four men servants appeared.

Lady Kingswood, erect and immovable as a statue, save that she pointed to Pharisee, said, in a voice she endeavored to make calm, to the men who pressed in:

"Seize that fellow who has dared to fasten upon me an insult of an outrageous kind. Lash him through the park, and fling him thence through the gateway into the road beyond!"

In an instant Pharisee, to whom all these men had been so civil previously, was seized in their arms, and they bore him, struggling violently, down the staircase, and thrust him out of the Hall; then, with sticks and riding-whips, they chased him through the park, leaving him almost senseless and livid from neck to heels, groaning and fainting on the pathway without the park gates.

When the noise of the men hurrying Pharisee had ceased, Lady Kingswood, paler than a spectre, tottered to her bedchamber and locked herself within.

As her hand left the key, there was a sound within of one who had fallen lifeless upon the floor.

THE INFERNAL MACHINE,

Designed by the Rebels to Destroy the United States Flotilla in the Potomac.

An infernal machine, designed by the rebels to blow up the Pawnee and the vessels of the Potomac flotilla, which was set adrift near Aquia Creek, was picked up on the 7th inst., floating toward the Pawnee. The following description of the article has been sent to the Navy Department: "Two large eighty-gallon oil casks, perfectly watertight, acting as buoys, connected by twenty-five fathoms of three and a half inch rope, buoyed with large squares of cork every two feet, secured to casks by iron handles. A heavy bomb of boiler iron, fitted with a brass tap, and filled with powder, is suspended to the casks six feet under water. On top of the cask is a wooden box, with fuse in a gutta-percha tube. In the centre of the cork is a platform with a great length of fuse coiled away, occupying the middle of the cask."

It was intended by the contrivers of this weapon of civilised warfare that the shock of a collision should light the fuse.

OUR MAP OF RICHMOND AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.

Our map of Richmond will be found very interesting at the present time, as it will enable our readers to follow every move of the two armies and note the progress of the war as it approaches the Capital of the Confederate States. Richmond, the Capital of Virginia, is situated on the north-east bank of James River, and is about one hundred miles in a straight line from Washington, although its distance by railroad is one hundred and thirty-four miles. Its population is about twenty-two thousand white, eleven thousand slaves, and two thousand two hundred colored persons. The city is built on several hills, the most considerable of which are the Richmond and Shockoe Hills. These two hills are separated by a small stream called Shockoe Creek. Till lately it has not been fortified, but since the rebellion there have been many batteries planted. It is also defended by four camps. At the present time it is the seat of the Confederate Government, the Rebel Congress having met there on the 20th July for the dispatch of business, when Mr. Jefferson Davis delivered his address, which is noticed in another column. The Capitol and public buildings are situated on Shockoe Hill.

TRIALS OF NEW GUNS AND SHELLS AT WEST POINT.

A Government trial of Hotchkiss's shot and shell, and of Wiard's steel rifle cannon, was commenced last week under the direction of Lieutenant S. V. Benét, U.S.O., the most efficient officer in command at this post. The trials of shot and shell were very successful at the target, placed at a distance of sixteen hundred and fifty yards; four miles were reached in the long range firing at an elevation of twenty-four degrees from a common bronze six-pounder, rifle, and carrying twelve pounds Hotchkiss shot and shell.

One of Wiard's six-pounder steel guns was fired a few times on Wednesday, with shot that were too small. The trials with these guns will be resumed during the present week. The guns weigh seven and twelve hundred weight respectively, carrying six and twelve pound shot and shell. Two of these admirable guns have been ordered on to Washington, and are undergoing a trial by Captain Dahlgren, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, with a view to their ultimate adoption by the authorities. Three six gun batteries were contracted for some time since by General Sickles, and three similar batteries have been contracted for by the State of Illinois. There are many valuable improvements connected with the carriages and gun, which have been made by Mr. Norman Wiard, the inventor, who has for a collaborateur Mr. H. L. Stuart.

Three great establishments have been brought to co-operate in producing these guns—the Franklin Forge, Messrs. Tagnot, Dally & Co.; Messrs. Carpenter & Pless, First avenue and Twenty-ninth street; and John Stephenson, the eminent carriage builder. From one to three batteries can be turned out per week, and Messrs. Tiffany & Co. have proposed to become the agents for the sale of these guns.

West Point is very dull, with the exception of Roe's West Point Hotel, which is crowded constantly with transient visitors, it being the only hotel now on the Point. There is no more charming summer resort than West Point and the Highlands of the Hudson. The Cadets are in camp at present.

THE PIRATES' MISHAPS.

Within the last few days there have been three arrivals which have illustrated some of the heroism of the seas. The first was the arrival of the Costa Rica with two of the piratical crew of the Sumpter on board. It appears that off the Isle of Pines the pirate ship Sumpter fell in with a British ship called the Cuba, bound for Liverpool, and took possession of her, sending five men on board as a prize crew. The gallant Britisher watched an opportunity, and overpowered the pirates, putting them in irons. Meeting with the Costa Rica, he transferred two of the pirates to that vessel. Both the Cuba and Costa Rica have arrived in New York, and delivered their prisoners into the hands of justice. On Sunday a still more interesting arrival was announced—the schooner S. J. Waring. This vessel was captured on the 7th by the pirate ship Jeff. Davis, and five men were placed on board as a prize crew. On the morning of the 10th the negro steward, Tillman, attacked the captain and first and second mates as they were asleep, killed them, and threw the bodies overboard. He then assumed command of the S. J. Waring, and steered her into New York. All honor to the daring seaman!

Two gentlemen, noted for their fondness of exaggeration, were discussing the fare at different hotels. One chap vowed that at his hotel he had tea so strong it was necessary to confine it in an iron vessel. "At mine," said the other, "it is made so weak it has not strength to run out of the teapot."

"They go Right to the Spot."

Cephalic Pills, CURE Sick Headache, CURE Nervous Headache, CURE All kinds of Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented, and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits they are valuable as a Laxative improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the Stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

Important New Historical Work.

FRANK LESLIE'S Pictorial History of the War OF 1861,

DESCRIPTIVE, STATISTICAL AND DOCUMENTARY.

Edited by E. G. Squier,

Late Minister to Central America, &c.

The Third Number of this superb work has already been issued, and the Fourth Number is ready for delivery. The design of this work is great and comprehensive. It is a thorough history of the causes and the progress of the War, from its initiation to the present time, derived from documentary evidence; illustrated by the first Artists of the age, and engraved in the highest style of art. It combines Historical Details with the Incidents, Anecdotes and Poetry of the War, carefully and judiciously selected with the most exquisite, graphic and correct Illustrations.

The voice of the Press is unanimous in its praise of the great PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR, not only as regards its able literary editing, but as to its large, elegant type, thick and splendid paper, and superb printing. The Engravings of each part, numbering over thirty, consist of large Double and Single Page Cuts, Portraits, Maps, &c., and are of unequalled beauty and entirely authentic.

Each number contains sixteen Pages, each page measuring 23 by 17 inches.

THE PRICE OF EACH PART IS TWENTY FIVE CENTS.

Subscriptions will be received at the office of the American Publishing Agency,

No. 14 Chambers Street,

From whence subscribers in the city will be regularly served (semi-monthly) by Carriers, who collect on delivery of the Parts. Orders by mail filled immediately on their receipt. Inclose One Dollar for first four Parts.

Flattering Opinions of the Press.

It is something which will interest every true Patriot.—Piqua Register, Ohio.

This work will be of great value in after years, when peace and tranquillity again reign in the land.—Republican Standard, Mt. Clemens, Mich.

"The Pictorial History of the War," which is published by Mr. Frank Leslie, of New York, is an attractive work. All who wish to procure in a cheap form, a record of passing events, will secure this publication.—Boston Courier.

The preparing of the History has been intrusted to Mr. E. G. Squier, formerly United States Minister to Central America, and a gentleman of established reputation in literature. Readers may be assured that it will receive full justice at his hands. The type used is large and clear, the engravings are among the most spirited and best finished of the art, and the whole design and execution of the work render it invaluable as a work of record and reference.—Norfolk Co. Journal, Roxbury, Mass.

It will be a continued illustrated history of our present civil strife, and as to the ability with which it will be conducted, it is enough to say that its management will be in the hands of the Hon E. G. Squier, who is well known to the public as a scientific and literary writer.—Sun, Canada.

Two numbers have already appeared, which, so far as the matter and engravings are concerned, have never been equalled by the American pictorial press.—Boston Transcript.

All who subscribe for this splendid historical work will possess a full and complete account of every transaction connected with the stirring scenes now being enacted.—New London, C. W.

It will give a complete epitome of the war, with all the facts, scenes, incidents and anecdotes connected with it, arranged chronologically, so as to form a contemporary and permanent history of the times. Accurate and life-like portraits of leading officers and statesmen, plans and views of fortifications, maps, battle scenes, &c., &c. To families it will be of incalculable importance and interest, and for preservation it will be invaluable.—Gem and Gazette, Dexter, Penobscot Co., Me.

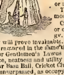
ENGLISH PORTABLE TENT,

Patented February, 1857.



The many advantages this useful and really beautiful Tent possesses over the ordinary article, for whatever purposes used, is at once seen by any casual observer.

First—Its extreme Lightness, Portability and Durability.

Second—It is proof against Fire or any other element.

Third—Its capability of Accommodation.

Can be carried by a single person, or can be conveyed easily in a buggy. For Fishing or Gunning Parties they will prove invaluable. Can be put up in ten minutes, and removed in the same time.

For Gentlemen's Lawns or Gardens, their peculiar elegance, neatness and utility will at once recommend them.

For Base Ball, Cricket Clubs, or Military Companies, they are unsurpassed, as occupying but a fourth the usual space of a tent for twelve or fourteen persons.

Price, complete, $50. Sole Agent for Inventor and Patentee, GEO RAPHAEL, No. 105 William St.

ONE NATURAL TOOTH

IS worth more than a whole set of artificial ones. Don't have your Teeth extracted. Whenever so far gone and painful, yet so long as there is a good foundation the Tooth can and should be saved. Even when a whole side Tooth has been broken or decayed down to the roots, so long as the roots are good you can have a whole Tooth built up without pain, with DR. S. B. SIGESMOND'S White Metal Filling, which will never corrode, and will last your lifetime. Warranted to give satisfaction or no pay will be demanded. Improved Artificial Cheoplastic Bone Teeth, without clasps or extracting any roots, and are three-fourths lighter than any other. Can be had only of the Inventor. THE CURFEW BELL

At Hampton Court House, Virginia.

During the early days of the occupation of Hampton, Va., it was discovered that signal lights were displayed on various points of the rebels' lines, and from their peculiar motion, hardly a doubt could exist but that they were answering lights shown by some parties in the Federal lines. As these traitors could not be discovered, it was deemed advisable to take every precaution possible, and strict orders were issued that all lights were to be extinguished at a reasonable hour, thus for a time reviving the ancient custom of the curfew bell. It was desirable to impress the negroes with the impressiveness of the order, and they were, consequently, mustered by the ringing of the bell of Hampton Court House, when the proclamation of Colonel Max Weber, of the German Turner Rifles, was read to them by Captain Anthony Beardsley. They were not well pleased with the idea of giving up their lights and confining themselves to their houses after dark, but they had to grin and bear.

THE GRAVES OF THE INDIANA VOLUNTEERS

At Rich Mountain.

After the glory and excitement of the battle comes the sad reverse of the picture, the missing familiar faces, the dead and wounded. No glory can compensate the victors for the loss of the noble dead.

Our readers are familiar with the gallant conduct of the Indiana volunteers; they have shown themselves in all the actions in Western Virginia brave, orderly and dashing soldiers; patient in camp and bold and unconquerable in battle. They have maintained the honor of their State and the cause of their country like men.

Our Artist was present at the battle of Rich Mountain, and the day after visited the graves of the gallant men who fell there. They are buried in a beautiful spot on the ridge of Rich Mountain. The graves are neatly sodded, and a rough headstone marks each one. The dead were handled tenderly and affectionately by their living comrades, and the bodies were committed to their resting place with all honors and sacred rites. Near the graves of our poor gallant fellows, decently interred, rest their dead enemies who were left upon the field. Peace be to all!

THE GREAT UNION GUN

At Fortress Monroe.

This immense piece of ordnance, the largest cast iron gun in the world, is at last safely landed at Fortress Monroe. On its first at tempt at embarkation at Baltimore, by some sad mischance it was dropped at the bottom of the river. It was, however, rescued from destruction, and the public will be glad to learn that the monster, which is of length transferred to the wharf at Perrine Moore's dock, near this city. Artist sketched it. It is to be mounted on the deck of the Minnesota. It carries a 350 pound shot, and is supposed to be the most destructive weapon ever manufactured. Neither its range or initial velocity is as great as some other guns, but the weight of the shot will be such as to sink any ship, and literally destroy almost any fortification. The projectiles for the gun have not yet arrived.

THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

EXTRA SESSION.

SENATE, JULY 29.—Mr. Wilson introduced a bill appropriating ten millions for the purchase of arms, which was read a first time. Referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

In lieu of twenty-five dollars for calling liquor to soldiers in the District of Columbia.

JULY 30.—The Tariff bill passed, 32 to 10. The Insurrection Suppression bill was then taken up, and discussed by Messrs. Wilson, Trumbull, Powell, Saulsbury, Bayard, Latham, of California, and some others. The construction of iron-clad steamers was discussed.

JULY 31.—Neither were disposed to-day; several unimportant matters were considered, but they had little bearing upon the war. Seldom has a great deliberative body been so much and so unnecessarily interfered with to small a display of patriotism and ability. Partisan rules the hour.

AUGUST 1.—The bill authorizing the suppression of the rebellion was taken up, and discussed until the adjournment. It was bitterly opposed by Mr. Breckinridge, who moved its indefinite postponement. Pending which question no progress in consideration, however, was regulated, 28 to 16, though the matter was not finally disposed of.

AUGUST 2.—The bill to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional vessels for the Revenue service was passed. The bill authorizing the construction of iron-clad steamers, or war-vessel steamers of light draught was passed. The resolution approving the acts of the President elected considerable discussion. It was not finally passed. The Senate also passed a formal appropriation for the army—among them $70,000,000 for raising and organizing the volunteer force. Adjourned to Monday, 5th inst. The Senate stood on the part of officers making contracts was passed, was reconsidered, and the bill was passed as in the bills. The Senate also passed a bill to relieve master, and subsequently adjourned.

AUGUST 3.—Mr. Crittenden presented a resolution from the Maryland Legislature, protesting against the arbitrary proceedings recently adopted towards her Union and citizens, after a spirited discussion, in which Messrs. Wilson, of New York, of New Jersey, Powell, Maryland, of Kentucky, Wilkinson, Trumbull, Bayard, Saulsbury, Latham, Carlile, Hicks, Davis, of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Hamlett, Iowa, Kansas, Breckinridge, Kentucky, and Powell, of Virginia, participated.

AUGUST 5.—The Senate passed the Tariff bill, and then took up the Confiscation bill. The bill to authorize the employment of the militia was discussed. This bill provides for twenty millions to be appropriated to the different States according to population. The minority report of the Committee, signed by Messrs. Wilson, of New Jersey, Powell, Maryland, Kentucky, Wilkinson, Trumbull, Bayard, Saulsbury, Latham, Carlile, Hicks, Davis, of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Hamlett, Iowa, Kansas, Breckinridge, Kentucky, and Powell, of Virginia, participated.

FRANK LESLIE'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

No. 5 of this magnificent Pictorial History of the War, edited by E. G. Squier, is now ready. All the back numbers are reprinted, and can be supplied to complete sets. Testimonials from the highest authorities and the universal voice of the press place Frank Leslie's Pictorial History of the War among the most remarkable works of the time, as a history of the present great crisis, altogether unapproachable in the magnificence of its illustrations, and in the accuracy, completeness and brilliancy of the historical record.

PERSONAL.

The Hon. Robert Toombs, of Georgia, has resigned his position of Secretary of State in the Rebel Cabinet, and has been succeeded by R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia.

General Robert Anderson recently visited Congress, and received the compliments of the leading members. He is restored in health, and ready to assume his command in Kentucky.

Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clothilda arrived here on Saturday, the 27th of July, in their yacht the Jerome Bonaparte. He left New York on the 31st for Washington, on a visit to the President. The Princess Clothilde remains in New York. She is accompanied by the Duchess D'Abrantes.

Quartermaster Pryor, brother of the famous fire-eater and bowie-knife swallower, Roger, was taken prisoner at Bull's Run. He was the correspondent of the Memphis Avalanche and the Appeal.

Mr. Aaron Clark, formerly Mayor of this city, died August 1st, in his seventy-seventh year. He was a noble specimen of the old school.

If any curious person should wish to know who are fighting for the Union, let him refer to the lists of the killed and wounded. It is half composed of O's and Mac's. The Americans seem "chary of their crimson."

General Flournoy, of Arkansas, died on the 2d at Louisville. He had been a rebel General, but subsequently repented and returned to his sister's house, where death closed his sufferings. The Union journals say it was repentance that killed him, while a Secession paper says it was whiskey. He was a brave and honorable man, despite his one grand error.

Bishop Bowman died suddenly on the 3d August, on his way from Pittsburg to Butler.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal says that Pierre Soule is an ardent Unionist, and that he is in New Orleans perfectly neutral.

MISCELLANEOUS UNION NEWS.

CAIRO, Illinois.—General Fremont and staff and a fleet of eight steamers and four regiments of infantry, also several detached companies of infantry, and two companies of light artillery, all equipped, arrived at Cairo, August 2d. They were enthusiastically received by the soldiers and citizens. A salute was fired by the battery at Fort Prentiss. The troops were landed at Bird's Point, swelling the force at that camp to about eight thousand. No news from the rebel camp.

The steamer S. P. Cheny, running in connection with the Nashville and Mobile and Ohio Railroad, was seized at Columbus, Kentucky, by the rebels from Tennessee.

Scouts who have just returned from the South report that the rebels at New Madrid are well armed and well drilled, and that they have very fine batteries of ten pound field pieces, which are officered by foreigners. They have also two regiments of cavalry well equipped. General Pillow, who is in command, promised Governor Jackson to place twenty thousand men in Missouri at once. He has issued a proclamation, full of wind and bombast, to the people of Missouri, declaring his intention to drive the invaders from the State, and enable her people to regain those rights so ruthlessly taken away by the forces who march under banners inscribed with "beauty and booty," as the reward of victory. He says that he will show no quarter to those who are taken in arms against the State.

MISSOURI.—A gentleman just from Lexington, Missouri, reports that one of the oldest citizens in Lafayette county, Jos. S. Lightner, was shot in attempting to pass the guards put out by Colonel White's command. The citizens of Lexington and vicinity are much excited over his death.

Ben McCulloch and General Jackson, having devastated the country where they are encamped, are slowly moving northward in three divisions for the better subsistence of the troops. We are quietly awaiting their approach, our troops being ready for a battle. The unfavorable news from Virginia has impressed them with a fresh desire to recover in the West whatever prestige may have been lost in the East. General Lyon's command is now only six thousand strong, a considerable number of the three months men having gone to St. Louis, to receive their pay and be mustered out of service, a great many of whom will doubtless re-enlist and return here soon.

Jefferson City, August 1.—The Missouri and Western Telegraph Company commenced taking down their line west of this place this morning, owing to the disturbed state of the counties between this and the Kansas border. It is the Company's property, which is being rapidly destroyed by lawless persons, who roam unrestrained throughout that portion of the State. Despatches going to Kansas City, Missouri, and to points in Kansas and Nebraska, will go hereafter via Quincy, with but little delay.

Mexico, August 2.—General Pope has established his headquarters here for the present. Colonel Grant's and a portion of Colonel Turner's regiment, and four companies of Colonel Marshall's cavalry are quartered here. The water is both inconvenient and impure, and a change of rendezvous will be made as soon as arrangements can be perfected for an encampment.

Brigadier-General Hurlbutt was detached from here to-day, to select a camping ground near Jefferson City, where some thirty thousand troops will be congregated under General Pope's command. General Pope is assigned to all the forces north of St. Louis. These troops will consist principally of Illinois regiments together by themselves, and thus form one arm of the Western army.

General Pope hereafter designs to permit no more scouting, deeming it an injury to the efficiency of the troops for service.

The people will be held strictly responsible for depredations committed. If hostilities occur and troops are called to the relief, they will be sent in sufficient numbers to take possession of the village or villages that may be making trouble. Soldiers will be quartered in the houses, and draw rations of the citizens. This, it is believed, is the only means of making and keeping the people duly vigilant to their own and the United States' interests.

WASHINGTON, August 3.—General Wool is to assume command at Fortress Monroe next week.

It is said that General McCall, of Pennsylvania, is to be appointed to the command of the troops between here and Point of Rocks. Some ten regiments have been sent here within a few days. Out of this probably has sprung the foolish rumor that he was to supersede General Banks.

BALTIMORE, August 1.—Shortly after four o'clock yesterday afternoon, the Fifth New York regiment arrived at the Camden station, from Sandy Hook, Maryland, and after a delay of upwards of an hour, marched to the President street depot, where it was expected a train of cars would be in readiness to convey the regiment to Philadelphia. At half-past seven o'clock, however, no cars could be obtained. Information shortly afterwards reached the depot that the soldiers could be transported to Philadelphia via the Northern Central Railroad, and that a train was ready to start from the Bolton depot at any moment.

The regiment accordingly took up the line of march and passed up Central avenue to Monument street, and when at the corner of Eutaw street a party of Irish Secessionists began cheering for Jeff Davis. The cheering was accompanied by a shower of stones that fell among the ranks of the volunteers. The latter, not forgetting the murderous riot of the 19th of April, supposed that a repetition of that bloody day was to be enacted. The soldiers acting upon that impulse, immediately fixed their bayonets and charged upon the men who lined the sidewalks. Several shots were also fired, but we could hear of no one being injured.

FORTRESS MONROE, August 2.—Information has been received from Lieut. Crosby's expedition to the eastern shore of Virginia, which left Old Point three days ago. The Pocomoke and two small rivers were explored for a number of miles. Several parties of armed Secessionists on shore were dispersed. One schooner was burned and another brought in as a prize.

One of the propellers belonging to the expedition is ashore at the Cherry Stone, and it is feared will be lost.

An educated German, a private belonging to the Tenth regiment of New York, was arrested yesterday for correspondence with the enemy. A letter to General Lee was found on his person. Ambition for advancement is supposed to have been his principal motive. His letter contained no revelations of importance concerning the fortress.

The Vermont regiment will leave for home, via New Haven, on Sunday.

At Newport News, a Captain Barnard shot a private belonging to his company, and was, in consequence, obliged to leave the camp.

A large quantity of liquor was yesterday destroyed at Newport News, by command of General Butler. The General goes to Washington, to-night.

KANAWHA RIVER, Flight of Governor Wise.—The steamer Dunleith arrived from the Kanawha River on the 4th inst., and from her officers we have the following items from our troops up that stream. They left Charleston Sunday evening. General Cox's brigade was at Gauly Bridge, which had been burned by the Secessionists. The steamers Kanawha Valley and Julia Maffitt had been burned and sunk, the former at Camelton, eight miles above Charleston, and the latter at Taylor, four miles below. Governor Wise, his two sons and staff were at dinner at the Kanawha House, when a courier arrived and announced that General Rosencranz was on the march to head his force from a retreat into Virginia. The party immediately rushed from the hotel and ordered the Wise Legion to retreat. Two hours after, word was sent across the river for the Kanawha Rangers to follow. This so enraged the Kanawha troops that three companies deserted. Wise threatened to burn Charleston, but the persuasions of the citizens prevented him from executing that threat. Houses were, however, plundered, and provisions carried away in great abundance. The Federal forces, upon entering Charleston, succeeded in capturing fifty tents, nine boxes of medicines, thirty-five barrels of whiskey and a quantity of stores. While pursuing the rebels a number of guns, knapsacks, &c., were found on the road, and seventeen prisoners taken. After the Federal forces had taken possession of Charleston, the Union men, who had fled to the mountains for safety, returned, and immediately two companies of Home Guards were formed under Captain Boling. A report was current at Charleston on Sunday that the rebels were dissatisfied with Wise, and that he had been shot. His force entire numbers 3,300 men. The Charlestonians who were at the battle of Scarey Creek, report their killed at 65, and wounded 117. The Dunleith brought down a number of trophies taken from the rebels.

Hotchkiss's Shot and Shell and Wiard's Steel Guns.—The result of the recent trials of Hotchkiss's shot and shell with Wiard's steel rifled cannon at West Point and Washington, by order of the War and Navy Departments, has been a decided triumph; Mr. Hotchkiss having received an order from the Ordnance Department to supply, for the State of Ohio, 7,000 shot and shell in equal proportions; and Mr. Wiard unlimited orders to furnish his steel rifled cannon—from six to fifty-pounders—for the navy, and six and twelve-pounders for the various divisions of the army, including orders from the State of Illinois, and for General Fremont's column, each gun to be supplied with one hundred rounds of Hotchkiss's shot and shell.

A Washington letter relates that a New York Zouave recently took a horse belonging to a rebel, and has ever since been much elated with his capture. A day or two since the owner of the animal presented himself to the Zouave and demanded the horse. "I have taken the oath of allegiance," said he, "and the animal is mine." "You may have taken the oath," answered the New Yorker, "but the horse has not, and I shall keep him till he does!" There was no replying to this, and the Zouave keeps his horse.

While one of our chaplains of the army was repeating this line of the Lord's prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," a soldier added, with a loud voice, "fresh."

Drawing Rations.—There are some episodes in the life of a soldier provocative of laughter, and that serve to disperse in some measure the ennui of camp life. Not long ago, a farmer, who did not reside so far from a camp of "the boys" as he wished he did, was accustomed to find every morning that several rows of potatoes had disappeared from his field. He bore it some time, but when the last half of his field of fine "kidneys" began to disappear, he began to think that sort of thing had gone far enough, and determined to stop it. Accordingly he made a visit to camp early next morning, and amused himself by going around to see whether the soldiers were provided with good and wholesome provisions. He had not proceeded far when he found a "boy" just serving up a fine dish of "kidneys," which looked marvellously like those that the gude wife brought to his own table. Halting, the following colloquy ensued:

"Have fine potatoes here, I see?"

"Splendid!" was the reply.

"Where do you get them?"

"Draw them!"

"Does Government furnish potatoes in your rations?"

"Nary potato."

"I thought you said you drew them?"

"Did! we just do that thing!"

"But how, if they are not included in your rations?"

"Easiest thing in the world! Won't you take some with us?" said the soldier, as he seated himself at the table opposite the smoking vegetables.

"Thank you! But will you oblige me by telling how you draw your potatoes, as they are not found by the Commissary?"

"Nothing easier. Draw 'em by the tops, mostly! Sometimes with a hoe, if one is left in the field."

"Hum! Yes! I understand! Well, see here! If you won't draw any more of mine, I will bring you a basket every morning, and draw them myself."

"Bully for you, old fellow!" was the cry, and three cheers and a tiger were given for farmer ——. There, we like to have written his name! The covenant was entered into, and no one but the owner drew potatoes from the field afterward.

General Banks's Column.—The number of troops at Sandy Hook, Maryland, is being daily augmented by the arrival of new and well-disciplined regiments, and the Commanding General and staff are busy in organizing the army into brigades and divisions. The rumored approach of General Johnston towards Leesburg has caused a sharp look-out by General Banks, but no signs of the enemy have yet been discovered. The first reports of the strength of Johnston's army are now thought to have been exaggerated.

Captain McMullin's Rangers, whose term does not expire till the 13th proximo, are quartered in the orchard at General Banks's headquarters.

Colonel Geary's regiments are about one hundred yards distant, with Colonel Mann's regiment on their left. In the rear of these are the Federal Cavalry and the First City Troop. The latter are all well and in excellent spirits, and expect to return on the 13th of next month.

The Rhode Island Artillery, which fought at Bull's Run, arrived here this morning with a full battery.

The point formerly occupied by the Kentucky Rifle Regiment, on the Maryland side, opposite Harper's Ferry, is now garrisoned by our troops.

There are but few of the three months men now left in this column, but troops for the war continue to arrive in large numbers.

There is no regular post office at Sandy Hook. Letters addressed to the officers and men of the regiments now stationed here, would reach them with greater certainty by being sent to Knoxville, two miles below here.

Captain Rowan, of the Pawnee, has received the following letter:

"Alexandria, Monday, July 29, 1861.

"Sir—I learned last evening that a person arrived here from Aquia Creek, who states that the Confederates have taken all the upper works of the steamer Page, and have put six guns on board of her, and that all the flat boats on the Rappahannock have been brought over to the Potomac, the party saying they had a great many in the Creek. I suppose their object is to intercept some of the propellers on their way up the river, with stores, &c. "Union."

Upon the receipt of this the Department ordered the Pawnee to Aquia Creek, agreeing with Commander Craven, who inclosed the letter, that "the collection of so many flat boats must be for some other object than that of intercepting passing steamers."

British Vessels Violating the Embargo.—The British brig Herald, which was captured July 16th and taken to Philadelphia for attempting to run the blockade, cleared from Boston May 27th, ostensibly for Turk's Island, but was then chartered by parties in New York for Beaufort, N. C., with the intent to try the experiment of running the blockade.

It is well known in Boston that other British vessels have left these ports within thirty days for Wilmington and other ports in North Carolina, to take cargoes for England and the British provinces.

SOUTHERN MISCELLANEOUS INTELIGENCE.

Southern Opinion of General McClellan.—The New Orleans True Delta says: "We hear that McClellan, an officer of unquestionable capacity, an accomplished, enterprising and successful soldier, is to be put at the head of their invading armies, subordinate only to Lieutenant-General Scott. We do not regret this change, so far as the fame of Beauregard is concerned; on the contrary, we rejoice that it has been made, because we know there could be little credit in scattering such troops as have hitherto encountered our heroic men in battle, led on by the Pattersons, Butlers and such like political trash. McClellan is worthy of Beauregard's attention, and while we have not for a moment a doubt of the result of their first measurement of arms in the field, nor of any later conflict, so far as the honor and reputation of Louisiana's great soldier is involved, we hope when they are face to face arrayed against each other no great disparity of force nor deficiency of material will be allowed to cripple our side on the eventful occasion. In presence of an officer so thoroughly a soldier as McClellan, it will not do for our gallant boys to sleep or be negligent on outpost duty in contempt of their foe; he will, if any one can, make something of the sons of the Pilgrims, the descendants of the Mayflower's passengers, and therefore our complete satisfaction that one whom it will be really a great honor to defeat is now at the head of the Lincoln army of subjugation."

Business Relations between North and South.—The following queries have been put to the Confederate District Attorney at Charleston.

First. Is it lawful for a citizen of the Confederate States to purchase of our enemy State stocks or bonds of any of the Confederate States, and demand the interest when due?

Second. Is it lawful for the same parties to purchase notes given by merchants of the Southern Confederacy to Northern houses, and demand payment for the same?

Third. If lawful and proper to pursue the above course, would it not be equally legal for the small trader to buy merchandise of the enemy; or, in other words, does the law intend to operate in favor of the fortunate holders of capital against the humble dealers in wares and merchandise?

The response is as follows: "The acts specified by you certainly constitute 'trading with the enemy' peculiarly objectionable, because they afford a direct assistance to the enemy by the transmission of money to foster the resources. And, in addition, such conduct is highly unpatriotic, because directly injurious to the interests of the States and citizens of our Confederacy, whose obligations are thus withdrawn from the enemy's country, where it is for the interests of such States that they should remain, since they could not there be called upon for payment during the war. Such operations are certainly worse than the simple purchase of merchandise in the enemy's country, because they, at the same time, aid our enemies and injure our friends."

Defences of New Orleans.—The commission of engineers appointed to prepare plans of fortifications at various points have submitted them to the Governor and Colonel Herbert. Full power has been given to the engineers to take possession of certain lands and buildings for the purpose of erecting the fortifications, and all the works are now rapidly progressing. Arrangements have also been made for the erection of a powder mill, and a resolution has passed the City Council authorizing the Comptroller to warrant on the City Treasurer for $50,000 for defraying present expenses, out of the $200,000 appropriation for the defences of the city.

A Terrible Weapon.—Captain Beuter, of the Barrow Guard, has exhibited to the editor of the Delta a specimen of the new scythe pike, as used by the Poles in their war of independence, which is truly a most frightful weapon. It is intended to be used against cavalry or infantry, and can be made very cheaply. It consists of the ordinary scythe blade attached to a stout staff, eight or ten feet long, with a hook. It will be a terrible weapon in the hands of brave men.

Church Service for the Dead.—There was service at the cathedral, in Louisville, Ky., on Monday, and prayer was offered up on the occasion for the souls of those who were slain in battle at Manassas. The Right Rev. Bishop Spalding preached an appropriate discourse to one of the largest audiences ever assembled in the cathedral.

An Editor and a Sporting Man Killed.—The Augusta (Ga.) Constitutionalist says that among the killed in the battle was George Stovall, of Rome, Ga., editor of the Southerner. James Jackson, of Alabama, the well-known sporting man, and part owner of the racehorse Daniel Boone, was also killed.

MOVEMENTS OF TROOPS.

The response which New York has made to the call of the President is a triumphant proof of the devoted loyalty of the Empire State. Regiment after regiment has been sent forth, and a large number of others are now in the course of construction. Exclusive of militia, New York State and city have sent to the field of war forty-eight three-years' regiments, each having a full complement of men. Transportation and supplies were provided.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

Recently, among other documents produced for the inspection of the Admiralty relative to property along the eastern shore of the island, Admiral Sir Graham Hamond produced a title, a grant, made in the reign of Edward I., and bearing date 1288, when the heir apparent, the first Prince of Wales, was a boy of four years old. It was written in French, in a beautiful hand, and the attached impression of the great seal of England was remarkably clear. Some present familiar Isle of Wight family names occurred in the document.

A letter from Weimar announces the approaching marriage of Liszt, the pianist, to the Princess Wittgenstein—a match which has been already spoken of.

At the approaching musical festival at Nuremberg, 4,400 singers are to assemble, drawn from 160 different places. Some of them will travel from great distances. For instance, from Kiel, in Denmark, and Presburg, in Hungary.

Her Britannic Majesty's Commissioners for the Universal Exhibition of 1862 have applied to MM. Auber, Meyerbeer and Rossini for three new musical compositions destined to represent France, Germany and Italy, to be performed at the opening of the Exhibition. M. Rossini, who was requested to supply a Triumphal March, sent the following reply to the secretary:

"I regret my inability to accept the honor proposed to me by Her Majesty's Commission for 1862. If I still belonged to the musical world, I should have made it a duty and a pleasure to prove, on this occasion, that I have not forgotten the noble hospitality of England. Allow me to hope, sir, that you will be kind enough to communicate all my regret to your colleagues, with the assurance of my high consideration. G. Rossini."

A new system of stage lighting has just been adopted at the Grand Opera, Paris, doing away with the old float or rampe, which had been found so injurious to the eyes as well as to the voices of the performers. In the present arrangement, the float is raised thirty centimetres (two and a half feet) below the boards of the stage, and the emanations from the burners are carried off through two pipes reaching to the roof. The luminous rays, collected by a double reflector in the shape of a sea-shell, are transmitted to the stage through a sloping aperture, covered with a plate of dull glass, which subdues the glare of the gas. By this contrivance, all danger of the actresses' dresses catching fire is obviated, and a source of hurtful emanations and disagreeable heat, as inconvenient to the spectators as it is to the actors, removed. The air, being no longer disturbed by the vibrations caused by the heat, the propagation of the sonorous rays is much more regular, and even the light cast on the stage is stronger and better distributed. M. Lissajoux, professor of natural philosophy at the Lycee St. Louis, is the inventor of this system.

The brigandage in the Abruzzi and in Calabria recommences. Letters received by deputies from these provinces describe the position of affairs in very alarming terms. The mountains and plains are swarming with brigands, who, being unable to satiate their vengeance on persons, gratify themselves by the most wanton destruction of property. Could not Garibaldi "put this down?" He has made Italy great, he might make her a little more respectable in the eyes of the world.

A curious rencontre took place the other day on board one of the Rhine steamboats. An officer of noble extraction, belonging to the Guards, had ensconced himself in the cabin with some ladies of his acquaintance, when an elderly gentleman, in ordinary attire, came in and joined the circle. The officer received the visitor in a surly manner, telling him to take off his hat. The gentleman taking no notice of the request, his hat was immediately struck off by the military hero. Upon this the insulted individual immediately complained to the captain of the vessel, requesting him to put in force one of the bye-laws contained in his instructions, and set the offensive officer on shore at the next station. From this offensive proceeding the skipper naturally shrank, apparently not wishing to take active measures against so noble a specimen of humanity as an officer of the Prussian Guard. After the next station had been passed, and he found that his request had not been attended to, the old gentleman again repaired to the captain and disclosed himself as Prince Hohenzollern, President of the Prussian Cabinet. Now at last the scene changed. The proud were humbled and the mighty cast down. The master of the vessel no longer hesitated to act up to his instructions; the officer of the Guard was at the feet of the highest personage in the realm next to the reigning dynasty, and humbly begging for pardon. The Prince then addressed the offender in the following very sensible terms: "It is in my power to punish your unseemly behavior against a person not distinguished by military uniform in a way that would ruin your prospects for life. I shall, however, content myself with seeing the instructions of the captain put in force." The crestfallen officer was then landed at the earliest opportunity.

Judge Dooly was remarkable for his wit as well as other talents. At one place where he attended court he was not pleased with his entertainment at the tavern. On the first day of his arrival a hog, under the name of pig, had been cooked whole and laid on the table. No person attacked it. It was brought the next day, and the next, and treated with the same respect, and it was on the table on the day on which the court adjourned. As the party finished dinner, Judge Dooly rose from the table, and in a solemn manner thus addressed the clerk:

"Mr. Clerk, dismiss that hog on his recognizance until the first day of the next court. He has attended so faithfully during the present term that I don't think it will be necessary to take any security."

NEWPORT LIFE ON THE SEASHORE.

Breathing is a necessity of life, at least so it is generally admitted, and breathing in the summer time is quite as necessary as it is in the winter season. But that it is more difficult to do that natural functional exercise in the city during the summer months is an ascertained matter of fact, from the experience of a vast number of our citizens. The general desire is to go somewhere "where they can breathe," and so they go by thousands to Newport, where the breezes from the great ocean inflate their lungs with health, in the same proportion as their pockets are depleted by the great bill for necessary expenses. This is all right; for as they could not live in New York, and can live in Newport, the privilege is certainly worth paying for.

It is no use telling our readers that in ancient times Newport was a place of great commercial importance, or that the ravages of the British during the Revolutionary War reduced that busy place almost to a desert, and its population from twelve to four thousand, for they know all about that as well as we do ourselves. But the romance of history which hangs around the place is not the least of its many attractions.

Fashion has dedicated the place to pleasure, and her votaries flock to it year after year with the anticipation of renewed delights. It has many picturesque and charming features within easy reach of ride or drive. Among them its beaches stand pre-eminent. They are known as the First, Second and Third. The one most used is the First Beach; as it is the great bathing spot of Newport, and as bathing is one of the daily duties of seashore life, the importance of this particular beach may be better imagined than described. The Second and Third Beaches are scarcely less attractive. There will be found the famous rocks called Purgatory, and the still more famous Hanging Rocks, under whose cool shadows it is said that Bishop Berkeley wrote his "Minute Philosopher."

All classes visit Newport, and the social demarcation line is not so rigidly drawn as in our cities. The merchant princes will hobnob with the small trader or artist, and talk horse with the fast men, and mingle indiscriminately in the dignified pleasures of the billiard-room and the faro saloon. Before the erection of the numerous private villas which now adorn the city, hotel life wore the aspect of a general hail-fellow-well-met community, which was most agreeable to the stranger, and made the whole season a real pleasure time to all. The villa system has tended to reconstruct society on the city basis, and has reproduced the aristocratic and exclusive element; but still Newport maintains its position as a fashionable watering-place, and is second to none in popularity and in patronage.

Who shall describe life at our watering-places? It comprises such a jumble of infinite nothings, in which dancing, eating, drinking, smoking, bathing, walking, riding, singing, playing, talking, flirting add their mites to the grand total. Having nothing to do but to live, the question is how to do it with the least trouble and the most pleasure, and to accomplish this end there is no doubt that one and all exert themselves to the very utmost. That this is not accomplished without many heart-burnings may well be imagined, for where all of the fair sex strive to lead society some must go to the wall, and disappointed ambition is very hard to bear. Still, after a brief time, undue pretensions find their proper level, and the real leaders assume their position, and the rest fall in their wake or establish limited outside coteries of their own to preside over. All this takes the natural course of things, and the wheels of society roll on with a regularity of a machine which, wound up to go, goes.

One of the pleasantest features recently introduced by some of the leading ladies at Newport is the musical matinée, at which distinguished amateurs and artists performed, and to which selected guests were invited. These were given not only at the hotels but at the private houses, and the social courtesies were extended from the one to the other.

One resource to pass away the time is the numerous Newport pleasure boats, in which parties embark to sail or fish in the harbor, or to visit Forts Adams, Wolcott and Brown. The landing place at Fort Adams which we illustrate is often the scene of animated excitement. But the beach at bathing time is a scene which once witnessed will not be easily forgotten. The variety of ladies' costume, some killingly fascinating, to say nothing of the wearers, and others execrably ugly, also to say nothing of the wearers; the jaunty dresses of the gentlemen, the pretty terrors of some and the preposterous fears of others, the strange pranks which the surf plays with many, the plashing, puffing and diving, and the general excitement and jollity of the bathers and the lookers-on, form a picture of seashore life not to be found in any other country in the world.

Taking it all in all, one can hardly be said to have seen the most peculiar phase of American life if he has not passed at least one season at Newport.

THE NAVAL BRIGADE CONSTRUCTING A MARINE BATTERY,

At Shutter's Hill, Virginia.

Notwithstanding the unfortunate circumstances which attended the arrival of the New York Naval Brigade, commanded by Lieut. Bartlett, in the vicinity of Fortress Monroe, and its utter disorganization and dismemberment, it has done good service in its department on many occasions. It is now reformed, well organized and disciplined, and proves a most valuable arm of the service. In addition to its other duties, it is now engaged in constructing a powerful marine battery at Shutter's Hill, for the purpose of guarding Alexandria and commanding the approaches of the Fairfax road. It is an important position, and the work is well planned, strongly constructed, and will be armed with powerful and effective guns.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE AT WHEELING, VIRGINIA,

The Seat of the New Government.

The Custom House at Wheeling, Virginia, is a handsome granite building, well and substantially erected. It is furnished with iron staircase and window shutters, and is supposed to be fireproof, as far as any buildings with iron in them can be. It served the purposes not only of Custom House, but of Post Office and National Court Rooms. To these distinctions another has been added, and the Custom House has become the Capitol of the Southern Government of ingenescent Virginia.

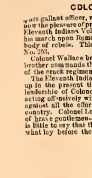
The two largest apartments have been correndered for the use of the Senate and the House of Delegates, and several others furnish ample and convenient offices for the Governor, Secretary, Auditor, Treasurer, &c., of the Commonwealth.

The following is a list of the new Government which has been recognized at Washington: Governor, F. H. Pierpoint, of Fairmont; Lieutenant-Governor, Daniel E. Bagley, of Monroe county; Secretary of the Commonwealth, J. Hagan, of Brandonville; Auditor of the Commonwealth, Samuel Crane, of Beverley; Treasurer, Campbell Tarr, of Williamsburgh; Attorney-General and Adjutant-General, Arnold Wheat, of Wheeling. The Speaker of the House of Delegates is Daniel Frost.

COLONEL LEWIS WALLACE.



WITH gallant officer, whose portrait, with those of his staff, we have now the pleasure of presenting to our readers, is the commander of the Eleventh Indiana Volunteers, and recently distinguished himself by his march upon Romney, where he surprised and defeated a large body of rebels. This brilliant achievement we have illustrated in No. 285.

Colonel Wallace belongs to a noble and patriotic family, since his brother commands the Ninth regiment of Indiana Zouaves, a few one of the finest regiments in the national service.

The Eleventh Indiana regiment has distinguished itself most nobly up to the present time. Under the gallant, daring, yet prudent leadership of Colonel Lew. Wallace, it has done good service, acting on all every with gallantry and success, and maintaining itself against all odds. Its enemy is a difficult and dangerous opponent. Colonel Lewis Wallace is loved by soldiers—the best proof of a good officer—and by his men to a point of devotion; and it is a little to say that they would follow whoever he led, no matter what lay before them. He is the personification of the bold and enterprising soldier, perfectly fitted to the position he occupies, and calculated, from a frank, earnest manner and a warm-hearted humanity even, to endear himself to a body of dashing and skilful men, and at the same time to win their perfect obedience and respect. With such a leader and such men, we have perfect faith in the future of the Eleventh Indiana regiment of Zouaves.

EVACUATION AND BURNING OF HAMPTON, VA., ON THE JAMES RIVER.

THE village of Hampton, situated on the left bank of the James River, about two miles from its entrance into Chesapeake Bay, is a very old town of much historic note, having been settled as early as 1705. It derives its principal importance from its proximity to Fortress Monroe and Old Point Comfort. It contains several churches, a large number of stores and many pretty private residences.

On the 27th July, it was deemed necessary by Major-General Butler to evacuate the village and destroy some of the principal public buildings, and retire the forces within the Federal lines. It was expected that the rebels were advancing in force, and prudence commanded the concentration of our forces round our entrenched position at Newport News. Old Fellows' Hall, the Lee Institute, and other buildings, were unwisely destroyed, and also a portion of Hampton Bridge, but the latter, in case of immediate necessity, can be replaced by our troops in a very few hours.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL NATHANIEL LYON.

GENERAL NATHANIEL LYON is the son of AMASA LYON, of Ashford, Windham county, Connecticut, and is the descendant, paternally and maternally, of families who were distinguished for intellect and integrity of character. His mother was of the KINSMAN family which produced two of the distinguished officers of the Revolution —one, the famous Colonel Thomas Knowlton, who, at Bunker Hill, commanded the Connecticut boys at the old rail fence on the left wing of the American army at Bunker Hill, and was afterwards killed at the battle of Harlem Heights, New York. The two brothers, Thomas and Daniel KINSMAN, had both distinguished themselves in the war between the colonists and English against the French from 1755 to 1760. At the commencement of the Revolution we find these two brothers among the first to take the field in defense of their country, and at Bunker Hill both the historian and the artist have continued to place the name of Colonel KNOWLTON among the most prominent of those whom a grateful country will ever delight to honor.

The oft-recited deeds of daring and patriotism among his ancestors thus falling upon the ears of young Nathaniel LYON, from a mother's lips, may have fired his youthful heart—and had much to do with his choice of the profession of arms. At an early age, while under the tuition of his accomplished mother, he showed great mathematical talent, and a power of combination and plan in the development of schemes which augured to no low order of the indomitable perseverance, the early and manifold traits of character he soon "took to" here in camp. Nathaniel LYON was born at the United States Military Academy at West Point, where he graduated with distinction in 1841, and was appointed in the army over there, having given to the rank of captain in the 2nd regiment of infantry, and by which regiment, as one of its best Volunteers he became their brigadier-general. He is now in the prime of life as a military commander, being forty two years of age. As will be seen, he has had great experience in Indian proficiency, especially in the rougher duties, which at him so especially for his present position. His service has been principally upon the frontiers—in the Florida Texas, California, Oregon, Kansas and other Indian and border wars.

He entered the Military Academy as a cadet in June, 1837, and graduated in 1841. On graduating from the Military Academy he received his commission as lieutenant in the army, and was at once ordered to join the army in Florida, then operating against the Indians. After encountering many hardships and much disagreeable service, he was among the everglades of Florida, he was stationed for some years at various points on the Western frontier.

Soon after the commencement of hostilities between the United States and Mexico he was ordered to join General Taylor, and after reaching Monterey accompanied the expedition against Vera Cruz. In the bombardment and capture of Vera Cruz, and the severely contested battles of Cerro Gordo, Churubusco and others which occurred between that place and the city of Mexico, his active and military skill found full play. He took an active part in each and all of them, and while fighting in the streets of the City of Mexico, near the Belen gate, on September 13, 1847, received a wound from a musket ball.

After the conclusion of peace with Mexico, he was ordered to the Pacific coast. On the contemplated march overland to California Captain Burnett, Lieutenant Lyon, and Lieutenant Sackrider, regularly formed a company for the Cape Horn, and reached California soon after its acquisition by the United States. His service in California was exceedingly arduous. He was in California when the fine mounted rifle regiment was raised there. Indians, with the aid of Mexicans and lawless marauders, constant alarms and frequent bloodshed. He had charge of the line of the Yuma, and enforced by the fatigues and privations incident to a campaign in that sandy and hitherto unknown country, as far removed from the confines of civilization.

After being relieved from his long service in California, he was again stationed on our Western frontier, serving most of the time in Kansas and Nebraska. He consequently became familiar with the men and measures which have so agitated the country for the last few years in that section of the country, and imbibed no special love for the spirit of slavery propagandism. Although he took letters acted with the Democratic party, the acts of those with the heroes which he witnessed in Kansas so disgusted him with the organization under whose sanction they were perpetrated, that he threw up his commission and retired to private life. In this he was richly rewarded by his wife.

May 17th, 1861, for the signal service rendered by the capture of Camp Jackson, he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General. His energy is increasing—as great as his bravery. His plans are laid with consummate skill, and effectively upon conception, but rapidity is also action follows them. He is always governed by celerity caution, and he displays in all his movements the highest qualification for the command and control of large operations. His victory over Governor Jackson and General Price, at Boonville, proved that my strategy was similar to him. He has the confidence of Scott and McClellan, and is idolized by his men, who would follow confidently wherever he led. Connecticut should be proud of her son.

RETURN HOME OF THE GALLANT SIXTY-NINTH.

THE return home of the gallant Sixty-ninth regiment of N. Y. S. M., on Saturday, July 27, was an ovation as warm and enthusiastic as their orderly conduct, endurance and bravery deserved. Their service of three months has been arduous and trying, and they require have been of infinite service to their country and of enduring honor to themselves and their State. The magnificent fortifications —Fort Corcoran, on Arlington Heights, is especially memento of the hard work they have done, and the daring and skill with which every at the battle of Bull's Run showed the splendid material of which their regiment was composed.

On the morning of their arrival, the streets were crowded by many thousands of people, the windows and roofs were thronged, and from every available spot flags and banners were waving. On the gallant fellows were greeted with cheers and applause along the whole line of march, and their progress was but one regular ovation. Governor Morgan was present to witness that triumphal entry.

It is well that New York should thus do honor to her brave sons!

BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. K. F. MANSFIELD.

GENERAL MANSFIELD is a native of Connecticut, from which State he was appointed a cadetship in the United States Military Academy at West Point, in 1817. He graduated in 1822, and was immediately appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers. He was subsequently promoted to a First Lieutenancy in March, 1827, and to a Captaincy, July, 1838. Chief Engineer of the army commanded by General Taylor in the Mexican war, 1846-8. He was promoted to the honorary rank of Brevet Major for gallant and distinguished services in defence of Fort Brown, on the Rio Grande, May 9, 1846, and was severely wounded at the battle of Monterey. He received the honorary rank of Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel for gallant services at the battle of Buena Vista with the enemy in September, 1846, and Brevet Colonel for distinguished bravery in the battle of Buena Vista, February 23, 1847. He was appointed Inspector General of the army, with the rank of Colonel, May 28, 1853, thereupon relinquishing his rank in the Engineer Corps. He held this responsible office until recently, when President Lincoln, appreciating the high scientific and military talents of this distinguished officer, promoted him to a full Brigadier-generalship, and he was assigned to the command at Washington until the recent appointment of Brigadier-General GEO. B. MCCLELLAN, whose command now includes those of General Mansfield and General McDowell. He is about fifty-five years of age, well and graceful in form, with a sunny beard and a handsome head of gray hair.

THE Duke of Wellington was remarkable for the coolness with which he gave his directions. Even in the heat of an engagement he was accustomed to give his orders in a tone of voice as calm and collected as if he were in the quiet study of his own house, or in the midst of a drawing-room. Lord Hardinge, who had been long his military secretary, and observing an artillery-man pointing his gun more carefully than the many around, He was steadying it, Forbes!"

"A very good reason, too," remarked Wellington. "Over up, my man; your fellow will soon make a pair of breeches—to the wall."

At this only the men forgot the danger of their situation, a burst of laughter arose from them, and the next charge carried the fortress.

AN ANECDOTE OF GENERAL CUSTER.—It is time when CUSTER was called before his colleagues to account for securing a gold medal from the Legislature, and his colleagues heard the story of how CUSTER, while riding to near a stone cut, and, seeing a man about drowning, sprang to the water, and, after a struggle, succeeded in saving the man.

"Custer, how did you get that medal?" asked Barry, in a loud voice.

"Sir," said CUSTER, "I am not aware that a gentleman, to be considered, ought to have the desire."

"Very Barry has had one, and I made the president my justification."

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

CHAPTER IV.—CONTINUED.

It was a dull, cloudy morning; the stubbles, which fell occasionally, seemed to me as if it had been soaked through. The street looked dull and dingy; the passers-by looked unwashed and dirty. Their sulky countenances reminded me of the stories I had read; of Lovel and Jack Sheppard, and the rest of the heroes of Newgate. I shook cold water by the head and we rallied forth. I was struck by the energy of the police officers and detectives in the streets. Selling a blue bottle on his shop window, gesticulated like one about to fight a battle. The very ragged boys seemed always excited and passionate. The next grimiest shower threw their ankles in the most energetic attitudes. It was very amusing.

We passed through many fine streets, through squares where fresh trees were growing, and at last, after a long walk, came to a quarter of the town where business, or idleness, or vanity, or whatever you like to call it, was not predominant. Here, in the old-fashioned French people, seemed rather strangers. And the hairy tiers, grape dealer and coiffeur, in the modern style, were not to be seen anywhere. Mr. Timbs grew duller and more melancholy.

At last, I saw my friend's name on a brass-plated door, in a narrow and quiet street. Mr. Timbs rang the bell, and the door swung open, revealing a pair of dirty feet, and the rest of the appearance of a dirty man.

"Monsieur Charles?" asked Mr. Timbs, with a smile of recognition.

The porter nodded his head.

We passed on and waited before another door, in which was a little window with two rails. Mr. Timbs knocked again, and a man appeared at the window. He was a very short person, and was clothed in a kind of office, divided into desks, with low rails of wood. Two individuals were in this office. One looked as if he was about to be a solicitor's clerk to some thirdrate, small-beer, hotel-frequented court, with no legs to speak of; his head was fully developed, and he had the appearance of great enthusiasm, and his smile was anything but disagreeable. The other was a tall, slight person, with a very pale complexion, and a closely compressed lips, frozen hair and sanguine complexion. I noticed that this person had a pen behind his ear, and that he had on his head an inverted pen, but that something sly and impudent in his face and eyes was greatly contradicted by the fact that his pens must have been sent down to modesty. The latter, I found, was Monsieur Charles. A conversation took place between Mr. Timbs and the last named, and he now and then glanced forlornly at me. Monsieur, the fierce, who had opened the door, looked and smiled at me, and was filling the end of a quill pen, and obviously acting me up.

"Speak English, Mr. Timbs," I whispered, "I don't like that tongue," he sensibly replied. The Monsieur here will not understand us. In the meantime, I'll look about me."

He was evidently a little annoyed at my proposal, but, as I spoke up, was deep in accounts, and seemed to hear nothing.

"Well, then," said Mr. Timbs, addressing himself to the young gentleman.

"Good!" This is the young gentleman.' Proceed."

"From personal observations made on the spot, I'm able to make the following report," said Mr. Timbs, in a low voice. "I'm very happy as he is rich; has had schooling of some sort, and he loves his son like anything. Can't do more, Mr. Timbs, can he?"

"Oh, yes, sir!" I cried, rather amused at the turn affairs were taking.

"Very good," said Monsieur Charles, blushing opposed. "Very good, indeed, if I may say so."

I said 'em according to instructions received, Mr. Charles; I said 'em decidedly, sir, and I'm sorry you don't like 'em. Perhaps you are no friends in a visit; then think they they are, as cattle in clover? I make known my opinions, and there I leave 'em, sir."

Monsieur Charles here turned to me, and said that I was a handsome little boy, and very like his father, and that he was glad to see me. Glancing up a moment afterwards, I saw that the good-looking fierce, and now perfectly polite person, had taken down a pen and was adding me up once more with thoughtful brow eyes. Monsieur Charles was then in the act of speaking to me, and I had to turn round to him to answer rooms.

"Yes, sir, rooms," said Mr. Charles, "in I hope, quite well, and very genteel."

"Quite well, thank you, sir," I answered. But Timbs broke in very coldly.

"She is right he better, sir, she might be better. Confound it, though! I wish he had not left his own country, and his own friend, Mr. Charles! He's alive?"

"To what do you allude, my good friend? Truly, you speak in riddles."

Mr. Timbs fumbled in his waistcoat pocket, and produced the paper I had received from the veterinary young man, threw it into the hand of Monsieur Charles.

Just glance your eye over that, if you please, and then tell me what can be done."

Mr. Timbs looked pale and frightened. Monsieur Charles seized the paper, glanced over it, let it fall upon the desk, looked at Timbs and fear in his eye, I thought. He then tore the paper into circular and scattered the fragments on the floor, and looked at Timbs an odder. Mr. Timbs looked on, with open mouth, half frightened, half relieved.

"Who gave you this? and how, when and where?" asked Monsieur Charles.

Mr. Timbs walked up to him, and whispered something in his ear. Monsieur Charles smiled.

"That's the who," said Mr. Timbs. "For the how, when and where, you must ask him."

Monsieur Charles frowned, and asked me all about the veterinary person. I bore to be cocoaon to observe the monsieur had a peculiar way of pulling his nose when he was puzzled, and that he then a forger I should have cried instead myself, and that he got the truth out in the same manner. Monsieur Charles, when he had scribed the interview, the conversation and the events of that dreadful morning, he rose from his seat, and walked up and down the gallery.

"Well, well!" muttered Monsieur Charles, turning to Timbs. "Here you talk her?"

"Meaning what?" said the other. "Yes; of course she knows all about it!"

"I am alluding to quite another party, my good friend. Have you told her?"

"Oh! here! Why, no, I haven't."

And she still remains in the belief that he sleeps under the genial, in point of light. I know, sir, that you are a man of the world, but may have escaped from the fate which was supposed to love over-much in it."

"No," roared Mr. Timbs, growing redder in the face. "I should like to catch the man that I'd tell her a word about it. No, sir, the fact of she was to bring up the subject before me, I'm jiggered if she'd ever hear it from me!"

Mr. Timbs was a brute, and I saw at once that monsieur was quite right in his opinion.

"Is it not possible, my friend, that they may have met unknown to you?" he said.

No. Timbs was taken so aghast by this question that he could only pant, like a locomotive, and shake his white head in savage discredit.

"You think not. So far, so well. Well, a meeting between them might be very awkward for you, my good friend, and very awkward for her. I wish he was dead and buried."

Monsieur Charles looked at me, and was remarkably pure. He put blank thing time. He turned quite white for a second, and pocketed his hands. He looked extremely unlike a smiling person, seeing he looked more outrageously than ever.

"We will talk over this matter again, my good Timbs. Bonne nuit!"

The dismal came shuffling from the inner room, with his pen behind his ear; and monsieur spoke to him in French. Brussels nodded his head, glanced at me, put on his hat, and left the office Monsieur pointed after him, and said:

I found your friend a lodging, his worldly gold; but I will see him with monsieur. He is a talkable fellow, that brussels, but not very clever."

"I never liked him, sir," said Mr. Timbs, scratchingly. "Who's no shoe?"

Monsieur Charles smiled, and shook his head. He then pencilled into the inner room; where he remained with the suspicious-looking black bottle and a glass. Mr. Timbs's eyes twinkled thirstily.

"Drink," said monsieur, pouring out a glass of brown brandy. "Are you thirsty?"

Mr. Timbs drained his glass, shaking our bottles sensibly.

"And now, allies?" said Monsieur Charles, waving his hand. "Leave us!"

Mr. Timbs nodded his head, put on his hat, and stood waiting for the door.

"Return in two hours. The young gentleman and I will, in the meantime, have some conversation together."

Mr. Timbs walked out discreetly, and Brussels again walked in. The dwarf bore to his hand a little box of sweetmeats and on the top of it a bottle of wine. Monsieur Charles took the sweetmeats, and closed the door. It was a comfortable little chamber, furnished in a shabby fashion, but with a certain air of comfort. In one of the three we re escritoire in a corner; and raised round the walls were shelves, with books, and a few boxes, and bundles of papers.

"Sit down, young gentleman," said Mr. Charles. I seated myself on a chair, and he placed the sweetmeats and wine beneath, and, placing it on the table between us, told me to help myself. So my first interview with monsieur was not at all unpleasant.

He was chat, my little friend, and we all eat hob-hobs. Come, I'm sure you like sweets, for you are a little boy. Ah, I see! he also has been good enough to bring you here—you are very fond of sweets, are you not?"

"I hate 'em!" I said, quietly. "I said he was a beast, and he is a beast. I like Mr. Timbs, though, spite as well as any gentleman."

Monsieur Charles rubbed his hands together, and flushed scarlet with enjoyment.

"You like Mr. Timbs, do you, my pretty boy? Take another hob-hob."

"What did he tell her for?" I exclaimed, as e thought struck me. "I love him to do it, I hear."

Monsieur lifted up his eyebrows, and asked me to what I alluded. I explained the matter as briefly as possible, being that he stopped my. I worded the thought that next came uppermost, and said,

"Because I'm not sure that I shall like you when I know my sister Elizabeth."

"Ah, indeed—dear pretty creature," observed monsieur. "Have you no other sister?"

"I am sorry that she is dead," I replied, "because she was growing up to be very pretty. She was not at all cross, and she always combed her hair and oranges, and I would have showed her things. I am sorry that she is dead, because she brought her companions to tea."

"Well, little man, she is dead, and you must forget her. Besides, she was a bad girl, and went to heaven, I have always a bad girl, sir, was she so very wicked?"

He pulled my hair in a most impudent fashion, but walked to the window and leered out, biting his lips. Then he went to the room door and beckoned some one. Mr. Timbs entered, looking very much frightened.

"Timbs," said Monsieur Charles, smiling, "our little friend is for me one a spy."

Mr. Timbs cocked his eye at me, observing that he thought so from the beginning of the affair. He was, in fact, a remarkably discontenting coachee his son one of them himself. Them below professions which he was not exactly ashamed of, but which he was enforced to remain uncomplicated, and to assume the air of one who had sold a pig in a poke, and had been done out of the money in a most point-blank.

"It is necessary, therefore," said monsieur, "that he should be sent to school."

Mr. Timbs scented his eyes, being evidently of opinion that one too wise and clever naturally would only add to his cleverness and wisdom. He looked at me, and Monsieur Charles observed that he surprise, and, with a blush, patted Mr. Timbs soothingly on the shoulder.

"It appears," he said, "that our young friend has brought with a deal odor than your neighbors. He must be sent to school, and I will see to it. Timbs, you are already learned, but you much be regardless discipline. It follows, that he shall go to school."

"Here I've been a-thinking, supposing you'd take a whole, or double choke of the kind."

"No, Timbs! I have reasons to me. Timbs, that you are more than usually stupid this morning. Is it not so? Or have I to compliment you on your sharpness?"

Certainly Mr. Timbs was not in a position to merit compliment, and he looked very much ashamed. To be plain, he appeared to utterly perple ond muddled.

"Little boy," said he, when the office and make friends with Brussels," said Monsieur Charles, waving me out. "He is a brave child, and I like him. Timbs, you may depart."

I walked out, and the door was closed after me. The dwarf was not too deep in his accounts to notice me, and he held out his hand, with a smile, angry something in French. I gave him my hand, and shook it, for, though he was a dwarf of a little size, the smile was sufficiently intelligible. Then he held me at arm's length, nodding his head, and smiling, and shaking his fingers at me the head, plunged again into his calculations. Little boxwood seemed to be in the office, for the dwarf, every or twice, jumped up, or May clothes as the case might be, dropped in, in a hung dog manner, and then was no bustle or activity in the place. It seemed quite only for visitors to come sort, and put their feet on the stove.

I was rather puzzled at the conduct of Brussels, the dwarf. Not content with giving me a sound cuffing on the ear, he had actually winked at me and passed me on the ribs; the wonder being that these actions were done in a very sly sort, out of view of Timbs, and accompanied with any marked demonstrations of good humor or kindness. Brussels, I felt sure, had a double character, as I've certainly not a detestable, both face was handsome, and his mouth so large as to be quite Kingsmouth. I could not make out why he chuckled in the head? Why did he exhibit feeling? His submission to the monsieur of the dwarf, and his unlike treatment of me, I could not solving, bored nothing. But now, his whole disposition seemed to be changed, and he was quite a changeyour sort. I was a pet of luther that motto at the event tale of the sons." I got up on a high stool, and took a pen in my hand, and sat down to my accounts, that his eyes were once more fixed upon me. What was my astonishment to find that I was actually being added up by the monsieur, and multiplied, subtracted and divided me for two minutes more, and then I was left to my own devices.

Just for me! Beware!

Brussels, I found, had forgotten himself, and he looked upon me with a most friendly benevolence. I was, however, by no means feat ease, that I was very perplexed these suspicions about the dwarf, and Monsieur Charles, and Mr. Timbs, and many other matters. It is not impossible that he may thereupon have told me his mind upon the subject, but unfortunately, the dwarf knew but little was French, and was consequently unable to make out his meaning. I was quite prepared to undertake the task, and was very much vexed for pity. This revelation touched my pride home, and I felt rather ashamed of myself for my dullness. He seemed as much perplexed, that my feelings shortly took a different shape, and I became quite sorry for him. Then monsieur joined me on the head, told me to be a very good boy, and shook hands with me, looking as my little friend a piece of French money.

"Good-bye, young gentleman," said monsieur. "We shall meet again, very soon, I hope. Tell your father to look to remain. I know you love us." Timbs, shake hands."

Mr. Timbs did so with a good kind, and grasped the slender white one of monsieur.

"Now, Brussels," said the day, little friend. He is a good child, Brussels, and likes to be noticed."

Monsieur appeared to regard the dwarf as a rather harmless, weak-minded person, who ought to be patted and made much of, for business purposes.

"Good-bye, Broussais," I said, quite familiarly.

Monsieur laughed. The dwarf looked up from his accounts, and nodded.

So I followed Mr. Timbs out of the office, which had seemed like a mousetrap, feeling glad to reach the fresh air of the street once more.

CHAPTER VI.—MORE OF THE VELVETEENY PERSON.

We returned to London, Mr. Timbs and I, and one of us at least felt a little worn out by his journey. Tedious had been that journey; tedious had been Paris the Magnificent; tedious, exceedingly, had been those long cross-questionings on the part of Mons. Charles. I observed, with little or no surprise, that Mr. Timbs's manner subsided into its old familiarity as we reached the English metropolis. That blue eye—which he was for ever cocking at me—said plainly enough: "Oh, yes, my young friend, don't labor under a mistake; I'm not to be humbugged by the Bank of England. You're a very little one; and if I ever pay you more respect than is due, it's on account of a promissory note, which I don't want you to dishonor." It was provoking, to say the least of it, of the jolly man: it was inconsiderate; I was a rich little boy, and my riches certainly demanded more consideration.

I could not, for the life of me, get Sister Elizabeth out of my head. "Rich little boy, I am growing up to marry you; proud little boy, I'll cling to you for ever and ever." The burthen of those strange dream-words never left me. I heard it in the jolting of the railway carriage; in the "Home, Sweet Home" of Italian organ-grinders; in the rush and roar of street-life; in the silence of my own heart. There was no delusion, then? Sister Elizabeth (what strange recollections the name conjured up!) had really lived and breathed, and had died because she was bad. Now, I questioned the truth of that last statement, and thought to myself that Monsieur Charles—who had abused Martha Timbs on the same grounds—was indisposed to do justice to unrecognized merit. Surely that pensive and pathetic little face could harbor no thought of evil?

There was the dwarf, too—Broussais. A queer fellow, that Broussais, I thought. What a pity it was, considering his face was so handsome, that his lower limbs were so disreputably short. He had a pleasant smile, that Broussais, and a kindly heart. But why should he commit the absurdity of pitying a rich boy, who, if money can purchase happiness, ought to have been the most enviable of little boys? Broussais was right, though, I concluded, after a long argument with myself on the subject. I was to be more pitied than envied, in spite of the intimation that I was growing up to be a director of the Bank of England.

It was in the evening when Mr. Timbs and I reached London, and it was deemed expedient that I should again pass a night with my guide. This arrangement was not at all to my taste—for I dreaded lest the occurrences of that other night might be repeated. Moreover, I was now really anxious to get back home, and to seek consolation in the warm heart of Susan the maid. I longed, too, to feel the old associations again around me. I was a speculative idealist, you see, and did not at all relish the disenchantments of gentlemen like Monsieur Charles.

Mrs. Martha received me very kindly, in the chamber which I have already described as a pattern of neatness. M. Loret was there too when we arrived—there, with his fiddle. Mrs. Martha was dull again, she said; and the dancing-master added that he had consequently stepped up with his instrument, music being the food for love, and capable of soothing the savage breast.

"She's always dull," said Mr. Timbs, chuckling—for he was himself again. "There's no more life in her than there is in a bridge, or a bucket, or the Houses of Parliament. Why doesn't she pluck up a bit, and comfort a fellow, instead of making him miserable?"

There was such utter scorn and loathing in the eyes that glanced at the jolly man—there was such silent contempt in the lips that curled, but formed no answer, that I almost shuddered. Plainly, there was no love lost here.

"Come, come, neighbors," quoth Loret, in a soothing tone of voice, "don't quarrel."

"Quarrel!" roared Mr. Timbs; "bless you, we dote on one another, me and Martha; we're as fond of each other as can be, Martha and me. Ain't we, old woman?"

The old woman, as he affectionately called her, conjured up her sickly smile, and nodded her head in a a mocking kind of way. So we all had tea together, and became quite cosy and comfortable. After tea, Loret took his fiddle, and said that he must really take his departure for the lower regions.

"Stop, though!" he cried, turning back; "I have a question to ask."

Mr. Timbs looked at the dancing-master; Mrs. Timbs looked at me.

"Has any one here ever been to Botany Bay?"

The jolly man shook his head decisively, and waved off the question.

"Is there a returned convict, or a thief, or a coiner, in this company? No! That's plain and point blank."

Mr. Timbs asked M. Loret, rather impatiently, what he was driving at.

"At a bailiff in disguise, or a p'liceman in plain clothes, I don't know which. He's been hanging about the street this two days, chewing straws and injuring the property, by bringing it into discredit. That's who I'm driving at. Ugh! I should like to drive over him."

None of us seemed to understand the drift of Loret, but he continued:

"I come in and I go out, and I see him standing at the corner, two days continuous, with his eye on this house. Not content with that, he stares me out of countenance, as if I was a suspicious character. Not content with that, he begins asking me questions about you and Mrs. Martha here. Of course I tell him you're respectable, and pass on."

"Asks questions about us, does he, Loret?" said Mr. Timbs. "What's he like?"

"Seedy," said Loret, with disgust. "Scar under the right eye; moustache; short and stout; seedy."

Consternation!

"Why, it's the man that——" I was beginning, in surprise.

"Never you mind what it is," cried Mr. Timbs, aghast.

"It's enough to drive a fellow wild," said M. Loret, going downstairs. "We've got characters to lose, and so this sort of thing don't pay."

Mr. Timbs said nothing, but fell into a brown study; while Mrs. Martha Timbs appeared utterly careless and unconscious that her husband's emotions were unpleasant ones.

The night passed—I sleeping on the sofa as before—without anything unusual taking place in the Timbs household. I awoke early, and saw Mrs. Martha, as before, busy about the chamber. Then Mr. Timbs and I started off for the railway station. There was a train at eight, which he wished to catch, and it so happened that we had to start without breakfast. This was not agreeable.

When we reached the station, however, we were just too late for the train, and there would not be another until nine o'clock. So Mr. Timbs proposed that we should have some breakfast, and I assented with all the energy of which an empty stomach is capable. We dropped into a coffee-house close to the station, and were soon regaling ourselves on tea and toast.

I saw suspicion in Mr. Timbs's eye whenever I dared to meet it. He evidently doubted me, and thought I knew rather too much.

"Don't you think, Master Brown," he said, half savagely, half jocosely, "don't you think I'd better step round to the undertaker's at once, and order you a coffin that'll fit? You're far too clever to live long, you are."

"I wish I was dead!" I said, while the accumulated mysteries of my late adventures weighed heavily on my heart. "I am very unhappy."

"And he calls that gratitude!" cried Timbs.

I had never done anything of the kind.

"Little boys have ears," he continued, "and they have tongues; but woe to little boys if they talk of things that don't concern them. Remember, Master Brown, you've seen nothing, heard nothing, and that you don't know nothing. Good—good—gracious."

And Mr. Timbs's eyes started out of his head; it might have been through fear, it might have been through amazement. For a young man had lounged into our box, taken a seat opposite to Mr. Timbs, and, leaning his chin on both hands, was regarding that worthy with a complacent sneer.

It was the velveteeny young man, of course. That young man appeared to have no other business on his hands save that of frightening my acquaintances out of their wits. That young man was not only a mystery to me, but also something more than a mystery to dear Mr. Timbs.

"Now then," said the velveteeny young man.

"Now then," gasped Timbs, trying in vain to appear composed.

"Why don't you ask me how I am? Old pals shouldn't meet in this way, you know. How are you?"

Mr. Timbs made no answer, but subsided into one long-continued stare.

"Things seem thriving with you," continued the velveteeny young man. "You're as round, and red, and jolly as ever. But look at me! Bones, every bit of me; no flesh to speak of. You're in luck; I ain't. So here I am, on business."

"Call again," murmured the last button on Mr. Timbs's waistcoat. The other winked derisively, and then nodded to me.

"Dear me!" he said, with an assumption of innocent admiration. "What a nice little boy! Yours?"

Timbs only closed his eyes, with a protesting gesture.

"To look at that boy, now, one would fancy he'd been reared in a nobleman's hot-house. He's a credit to you, Timbs. That reminds me: how's the missus?"

"Which one?" asked Mr. Timbs, looking very dolorous.

"Yours."

The eyes of the velveteeny young man burned—absolutely burned—with passion as he asked this question. The poor jolly man put up his hand, as if to ward off a blow.

"She looks tidy," quoth the persecutor, "tidy and happy. I've seen her."

This was evidently too much for the jolly man. He started up with an oath.

"Why ain't you dead and buried!" he cried.

"Because it didn't suit my purpose, old fellow, to give up all the good things of this life. Because I wanted to shake hands again with old friends. Because my grave wasn't deep enough to keep me out of the money market."

He paused, sneering, waiting for an answer, but no answer was given. He went on—

"There, don't get alarmed. I've seen her, but she hasn't seen me. I hope a meeting won't be necessary. It won't, if you're the friend I take you for."

Mr. Timbs seemed a little relieved by these last words.

"What do you want?" he cried, with a gesture of impatience.

"What do I want!" repeated the velveteeny person, with a grin. "Money."

"Haven't got any," exclaimed Timbs, nodding decisively.

"Nonsense."

"Fact, I tell you. Not a blessed farthing."

"Don't deceive an old friend who is starving. Bless your kind heart, I know you won't refuse me. Money I want, and money I'll have, or——"

Mr. Timbs looked helplessly at me, the other followed the glance and winked.

"Yes, he's a nice young gentleman, and his eyes are very like his mamma's. Come now, out with an instalment, Timbs, on my life annuity."

"What can a fellow do? Tell you flat, I haven't a halfpenny."

"Bless the little gentleman's heart," sneered the persecutor, pointing to me, "he wouldn't refuse a man and a brother. Never mind him. He's much too wise and clever, and must go to school."

The words of Monsieur Charles. No wonder that Timbs opened his eyes in horror, and sank down on his seat, perfectly exhausted.

"Come, now," said the other, coaxingly, "how about the golden pump in Paris?"

"Dry long ago," was the deprecatory answer.

"You don't say so. Come, I say, be a Good Samaritan. Just hand over three ten, and I'll go. Why, you don't call that exorbitant. The young gentleman knows that three ten is just half of seven pounds, and that seven pounds wouldn't quite pay his schooling for a quarter."

Mr. Timbs seemed more and more confounded and amazed.

"You won't, then?" said the friend of other days. "How's Sister Elizabeth?"

That name again. It went through my blood like fire, and I stared at the velveteeny person with more surprise than ever. Timbs was quite conquered. He drew out a long cotton purse, and took thence two pounds in gold and ten shillings in silver.

"Take 'em," he growled, hoarsely. "Vampire!"

His companion only laughed, pocketing the money with a complacent air. Then his whole manner changed in an instant. His face turned pale with suppressed passion; his lip quivered, and his brow darkened.

"Tell him, when you see him," he whispered hotly, "that I haven't forgot him; that I shall never forget him; and that the day is coming when he and I shall settle accounts. Tell him that I have sworn it a hundred times—sworn it by this."

He placed his grimy finger on the scar, which had become quite livid.

"What more do you want?" grumbled Timbs, like one grievously ill-used.

"What more do I want? Hear him! I want what you can't give me; what you couldn't give me if you were as rich as the Queen of England. You've bled gold and silver, and shall bleed 'em again. He shall bleed——"

"Well," said Timbs, seeing that the velveteeny person paused.

"Blood!"

Timbs could not repress a shudder at the light in those fierce eyes.

"Yes, blood! Tell him so. The time hasn't yet come; but it's coming fast. Oh, there's a long bill to settle. The time is coming—by this!"

He again placed his finger on the scar, looking hideous with hate.

"Tell her, when you see her," he continued, "that I haven't forgot her; that I shall never forget her; that her account is my account, and that I'll clear off both with blood. You hear me?"

"Do be reasonable," murmured the jolly man. "Where's the use of talking about blood and gore, and him and her, and all that sort of thing; turning a fellow's blood cold for nothing. It doesn't look like business."

The velveteeny young man struck the table, and laughed mockingly.

"As for you," he said, "look out! Money I'll have out of you; I can't starve. Half the money you spend on this young gentleman would set me up in a respectable business."

"Then why don't you be reasonable? Take the cash, go into the public line, or the poultry, or something of that sort, and let us alone."

The velveteeny young man rose up, put his hands in his pockets, and deliberately stared Mr. Timbs out of countenance. He stood staring thus for some minutes, to the other's obvious embarrassment. Then he cocked his rough-looking hat on one side, slapped the crown, and winked at me.

"Take care of the young gentleman's health," he said, tauntingly. "He's a handsome boy, and worth millions. Coddle him; but remember that my time's coming. And take care that I haven't an account to settle with you, about her."

So the velveteeny person lounged away, leaving Mr. Timbs petrified.

ERLE GOWER;

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER LVIII.

Lord Kingswood was greatly excited by the communication which Pharisee had made to him. It may easily be imagined that he was keenly alive to the necessity of securing the documents of which he had spoken, and he resolved, after some anxious consideration, to seek old Pengreep in person, without any delay, and bribe him not only to transfer those important papers to him, but to disclose to him the whole of the details connected with the part he had played in the long drama which had yet its denouement to come.

Lord Kingswood had not a doubt respecting old Pengreep having been Ishmael's agent, and from what Pharisee had let fall he had more than a suspicion that the old scoundrel had a disposition to act treacherously, that is to say, to make the best market he could of the secrets he possessed.

On the following morning he was astir soon after dawn, and, after he had devoted some time to his political labors, he proceeded to pay a visit to Sir Harris Stanhope. It was necessary to secure him at once.

Sir Harris was at breakfast with Beatrice and Carlton when Lord Kingswood arrived. In order to avoid excuses or evasions, Lord Kingswood would not suffer himself to be announced, and as the servant knew his lordship, he complied with his request, and ushered him into the breakfast room without a word.

The abruptness of his entry occasioned at first some little confusion. Sir Harris was a little embarrassed, and was profuse in apologies and excuses, but Lord Kingswood checked him, saying, with a smile,

"Say no more, Stanhope; if the water will not come to the horse, the horse must go to the water, eh?"

Lord Kingswood and Sir Harris Stanhope were soon left alone.

Lord Kingswood laughed.

"The old, old story, Stanhope," he exclaimed.

"Yes, my lord," returned Sir Harris Stanhope, gravely; "but not the subject for hilarity, especially if your lordship knew all the facts."

"Tut—tut," rejoined his lordship, quickly. "I have no desire to pry into your domestic affairs; my own require too much of my attention. Are we quite alone here, Stanhope?"

"I believe so," he responded; "but if your lordship will accompany me to my study, I can be sure there of no eavesdroppers catching our words."

"Conduct me thither," said his lordship, laconically.

As soon as they were in Sir Harris Stanhope's room, which was armed with double doors and double casements, Sir Harris said,

"Your lordship may speak freely here; no sound can penetrate either from within or without."

Lord Kingswood threw himself into a chair.

"You guess the object of my visit, Stanhope?" he said.

"I believe that I do, my lord," returned Sir Harris.

"May I inquire how it is that your promise made to me at Chillingham's evening party has not been fulfilled?"

Sir Harris Stanhope cleared his throat.

"The truth is, my lord, that I have been unable to gather together those proofs I was desirous of placing in your hands, which would relieve your lordship's mind of much of its natural anxiety," he observed, with some slight embarrassment.

Lord Kingswood gazed at him with a fixed, steadfast look.

"Proofs that the ceremony of marriage left to your arrangement was a mere mockery, performed by a hired layman dressed in canonicals," said Lord Kingswood, "a mere cheat, although the scene, where it was enacted, was the chancel of a village church."

"Exactly so, my lord," replied Sir Harris, with a restless movement of his eyes.

"Will you swear that?" demanded Lord Kingswood, emphatically.

"A—a—yes. Oh, of course, yes, my lord," answered Sir Harris, with a very perceptible wince.

"Pray, Harris Stanhope, repeat that to me, but do not do so without seriously reflecting upon the enormity of a false oath," said Lord Kingswood, with a startling sternness of tone.

"My lord!" ejaculated Sir Harris, with a perturbed air.

Lord Kingswood slowly and emphatically repeated his words.

Sir Harris, disconcerted as he was, was yet too much of a diplomatist to confess to the imputation so directly conveyed to him.

"Will your lordship do me the honor to be explicit?" he rejoined. "Innuendos rarely facilitate business, you know, my lord."

"Very true," returned Lord Kingswood. "Then, to come to the point, I will at once inform you that the ceremony was a real marriage, performed by an ordained clergyman in a consecrated place of worship, and properly witnessed by yourself. Now, Stanhope, further disguise or attempt to deceive me are useless, as I know all."

"All?" iterated Sir Harris, with an unpleasant expression of surprise upon his features.

"All," returned Lord Kingswood, with a stern tone and frowning brow. "You have plunged me into a desperate dilemma, Stanhope, and you must help to extricate me from it."

Sir Harris Stanhope's face had become as white as his moustaches and whiskers.

"Your lordship knows that I would do my utmost in your lordship's service," he said eagerly.

"I have just given you an illustration of it," rejoined Lord Kingswood drily.

"But, my lord," exclaimed Sir Harris.

Lord Kingswood stopped him.

"What was the name of the clergyman who performed that terrible ceremony of marriage? He was a friend of yours, Stanhope. Do not hesitate, or——"

"I—a—he—was the Rev. Charles Weatherley, a—my lord," stammered Sir Harris, "a—the—a fact was that time pressed—a—I—a could not get—a—the church—a—I got the clerk out of the—a—way, but the—the—man I engaged disappointed me—and—I, my friend—a—Weatherley—a college chum—a, my lord—he consented to keep the matter quite a secret, my lord, and I believe he did, but——"

"Where did he reside?" asked Lord Kingswood.

"At the vicarage, near to Avening, my lord," replied Sir Harris, quickly.

"But he has quitted there," said Lord Kingswood, sternly.

"Oh, yes—a many years since," returned Sir Harris, with some confusion.

"Whither did he remove?" asked Lord Kingswood.

"I—I—think to Kendal, in Westmoreland," answered Sir Harris. "He married and changed his name to Brand, on account of a fortune he obtained with a wife, but I have neither seen nor heard of him for many years. A difference sprang up between us, and we were never afterwards reconciled."

"May I ask you the grounds of your quarrel?" interrogated Lord Kingswood.

Sir Harris Stanhope consumed a large pinch of snuff.

"A trifling question of money matters," he answered. "I paid him a sum which I was indebted to him, and a year or so afterwards, growing avaricious with his increase of fortune, he renewed his application to me for the sum I have alluded to. As I had paid it once, I refused to pay it a second time, and so our old friendship is broken up and for ever."

"For ever, indeed," responded Lord Kingswood. "He is dead."

"Ah, is it so?" exclaimed Sir Harris. "I am neither surprised nor grieved to hear it. He was neither strong enough nor sufficiently worthy to live long."

"Aye, but do you not see the importance of that fact to me?" observed Lord Kingswood, in an energetic tone.

"To you, my lord?" repeated Sir Harris Stanhope, with a dubious air. "A—oh—yes—it is of some importance to you certainly."

"Some importance, Stanhope!" cried Lord Kingswood indignantly. "It is of the last importance to me in my present position. Mark me. You, Stanhope, procured this clergyman—you alone! You confided to no person breathing but himself that it was your intention to engage him in the affair of which we are now speaking."

"Most assuredly, Lord Kingswood, to no person breathing did I mention that I intended to secure, or that I did secure, the services of Brand," hastily replied Sir Harris.

"You were present at the marriage, Stanhope. The only witness," continued Lord Kingswood, in the same marked tone.

"The only witness, indubitably," rejoined Sir Harris Stanhope.

"Now, observe," continued Lord Kingswood, fixing his eye with a penetrating steadfastness upon Sir Harris Stanhope, and speaking with slow and deliberate emphasis. "What if I have in my possession the only copy of the certificate of that marriage ever given? What if I possess also the leaf of the parochial register-book in which the original entry was made? The clergyman himself being dead, and the mouth of the only witness hermetically sealed, where are the proofs that a marriage ever took place? Should Vernon dare to bring forward the boy he set down beneath my roof as my son and heir, can I not give to the accusation an unqualified denial, and triumphantly dare him to produce any proofs in sustain his assertion?"

Sir Harris Stanhope felt a strange thrill run over his frame as he heard this proposition put by Lord Kingswood.

So, then, he was the only living witness of this clandestine marriage, and he had Lord Kingswood completely in his power.

A throng of ideas rushed through his brain, all addressing themselves to the subject of his own aggrandisement, but he was too astute a diplomatist to permit his thoughts to register themselves in his face, especially as he perceived the eager eyes of Lord Kingswood perusing his features with a view of ascertaining them.

He took a pinch of snuff, and then said, after a slight pause,

"I admit the importance—the very great importance of the situation you suggest, my lord; but are those valuable documents of which you speak in your possession?"

"Tantamount to that, Stanhope," returned his lordship; "I know where to place my hand upon them."

"Has Horace Vernon, my lord, made any further movement towards establishing the legitimacy of the boy he has taken under his protection?" inquired Sir Harris.

"He has taken, I may say, his third step," replied Lord Kingswood.

"His third step?" echoed Sir Harris. "Pray explain your meaning, my lord."

"Well," rejoined Lord Kingswood, "his first step was to, suddenly and without warning, set down the boy in the midst of my family at Kingswood Hall. There my hands were tied, and I was compelled to let matters take their course. His second step was to appear with him in the circles in which we move, and again I am compelled to act passively, for he afforded me no grounds for interference. His third step has taken this shape."

Lord Kingswood, as he concluded, produced the letter he had received from Vernon's solicitors, and flung it over to Sir Harris Stanhope.

The latter perused it with attention, and returning it to Lord Kingswood, said,

"The object of that letter is very clear."

"Possibly," said Lord Kingswood, in reply; "but oblige me, nevertheless, with your interpretation of it."

"It is Vernon's intention to avail himself of every tittle of evidence," replied Sir Harris. "He will put young Mr. Gower into the witness-box. Your lordship will have to appear, and the very striking resemblance between you may go far to influence the verdict of a jury."

"Pshaw!" returned Lord Kingswood. "A resemblance is no evidence, Stanhope, or at best but a weak piece of circumstantial evidence. It is clearly no proof of marriage. Vernon must produce legal documents in support of his claim."

"And he has them not?" suggested Sir Harris.

"He has not," replied Lord Kingswood, vehemently, "nor shall he, whatever may be the cost to me."

"The exposure will be an unpleasant one," observed Sir Harris Stanhope, as if reflectively.

"I shall positively, and without qualification, deny the charge brought against me, and only it so be sub-sanctioned by proof, and will in turn commence an action against Victoria for conspiracy and fraud," returned Lord Kingswood, excitedly.

"And the Heiress?" persisted Sir Harris.

"But for Lord Kingswood, equally," "now you harp on that."

"It is no remarkable thinking," replied Sir Harris.

"What of that?" cried Lord Kingswood. "It must be taken for just so much as it is worth."

"Hem!" coughed Sir Harris.

A plan had occurred to him, calculated to be of great advantage to his client's pecuniary and political fortunes, but how to carry it into effect, he knew not; and, consequently, he took refuge from the coldness of the by-play in an appeal to speech at last.

"Why not?" asked Lord Kingswood. "Indeed, it is the only plan I can peruse with a view."

"Sir, Kingswood," urged Sir Harris, with a pretended show of heart-felt ery, "the boy is only one, he is the son of your lawfully wedded wife, my lord, and he is your heir!"

A pallid hue overspread Lord Kingswood's features.

"I cannot, dare not acknowledge him!" he exclaimed, with a shudder.

"Not in the world, assuredly," replied Sir Harris; "but you will not disavow, dearest, recollect him otherwise?"

"What can I do, what can I do, without demolishing my own position—my own—my—my—Sir Harris, you are a fiend with a perplexing air.

"Do not be too hasty, my lord, in reaching this conclusion," observed Sir Harris Stanhope, thanks fully. "Much may be done for him without your super-fine particularity in the matter. Where is Mr. Gower? I presume still with Horace Vernon?"

"I do not know," returned Lord Kingswood.

"Then, of course, it is hasty to the last degree to let prejudice against you," continued Sir Harris. "Now it appears to me that it would be very desirable to get hold of him before that rich cousin, who, opposite to his youthful and reputed feckless, promises to him a high and assured position in the Government of India, and leaving obtained his consent, which, with such lavish prospects before him, he will hardly withhold, you can clap him off, or let him down his way as, as Mr. Gower, in my height he was the other day, when hoisted by your confidential agent, Mr. Hyde, and you agree to my devising him a handsome allowance, he will keep his own counsel, and you will then succeed in casting the ground completely from under the feet of Vernon's revenge, and of gratifying your own generous nature in amply providing for your offspring, brought into this world of woes under such unhappy circumstances."

"Your reasoning is new without its merits, I own it," returned Lord Kingswood, musing. "Indeed, I should be very glad if it could be realized. Yet I do not see, if I am not to oppose in any arrangements to be made with him, how I can employ an agent without compromising myself."

"I leave that move entirely in the hands," replied Sir Harris, with eagerness. "Fearless has seen Mr. Gower, they have met, and he has invited him to his house. Now, I propose that you shall meet with his cousin a large quantity of cash." "I am given to understand that Gower is himself equally matter, but that, uncertain of his future, he very laudably withdraws himself from the influence of his generous, and the consequent loss of her fortune make and duties spoken. Now, my lord, where young lovers are concerned there are actions that must be sometimes done which, taken per se, are not to be justified, but which, in the end, are found to be the most virtuous that he was enabled to assist her in any desperate way. Now, I know that he is your son, my lord, yes I said he's, though for ever I shall endeavor that secret to my own breast. I will, more-fore, bring this union about, give my consent, celebrate it privately, and leave your lordship to do the rest."

"My dear Stanhope," returned Lord Kingswood, "you overpower me with the old gallon you are pressing upon me."

"Your lordship may rely upon me," returned Sir Harris. "I will not lose an instant, and I will keep your lordship acquainted with my proceedings as I go on. There is my son Carlton, by the way——"

Lord Kingswood drew out his watch and consulted it.

"I must leave you, Stanhope," he said, hastily. "I shall expect to see you shortly at Kingswood House. By-the-bye, there is a neat little appointment just vacant, which will suit your son Carlton. Send him to me at this hour to-morrow morning."

"Oh, my lord!" exclaimed Sir Harris, with an air of humble gratitude.

"Not a word," said Lord Kingswood, checking him; "but pray keep faith with me this time."

"My life upon my truth, my lord," returned Sir Harris, with emphasis.

Lord Kingswood smiled pleasantly, wrung him by the hands, and hurried away.

As Sir Harris listened for the departure of his carriage-wheels, he exclaimed,

"Erle Gower is Lord Kingswood's son and heir. Beatrice shall wed him. When the knot is fast tied then shall she occupy a high seat beneath Kingswood towers. The Honorable Mistress Erle Kingswood, soon Lady Kingswood of Kingswood. I am the only living witness. Oh, but I will weave my children's fortune out of that one fact. Ho! Atrice, love! Atrice! I have such news for you!"

Uttering these words aloud, he hastened to his daughter's chamber.

CHAPTER LIX.

Lord Kingswood quitted the house of Sir Harris Stanhope with greatly improved spirits.

He had some difficulty in finding Gray's Mount, for it was situated in a locality of which he knew nothing; but at length he stood before the door of old Pengreep, and looked inquiringly up at the house.

He ascended the steps and knocked at the door with a gentle strength, and it was almost immediately opened by a tall, gaunt old man, with pallid, wrinkled face, and who gazed at his visitor with a sharp look.

"Your name is Pengreep," said his lordship, in an undertone. "I wish to speak with you."

"Your name is Lord Kingswood; come in," was the laconic reply.

Lord Kingswood was surprised at being thus recognised, but he did not make any observation respecting it. He simply complied with the invitation of old Pengreep, and entered the house.

Pengreep closed the door behind him, and turned the key in the lock. Then ascending the stairs, he said,

"Follow me, my lord."

Lord Kingswood obeyed, and was invited into old Pengreep's sanctum sanctorum.

The old man observed a similar precaution to that he had performed below, and locked the chamber door.

Lord Kingswood remarked it, and said, inquiringly,

"Is it necessary to exercise such extreme caution? Are you in fear of undesirable intrusion?"

A peculiar grin played upon the features of old Pengreep.

"My lord," he said, significantly, "you are in the enemy's camp. You are here to make overtures to one of the chiefs arrayed against you. If I am caught by any of my own side listening to you, I shall be challenged with a disposition to entertain your lordship's propositions, and be declared guilty of treason."

"Very good; I see the necessity for caution now, and I approve of it," responded Lord Kingswood. "You will, however, I hope, listen to me, and, I trust, entertain my propositions."

"I am prepared to listen to your lordship, or I should not have admitted you here," returned Pengreep. "Whether I shall entertain your lordship's propositions will materially depend, first, upon what they may embody, and, secondly, the inducement."

"I understand," said his lordship.

There was a moment's pause, which Lord Kingswood broke by saying,

"You are, I think, acquainted with my valet?"

A singularly malicious grin, which, however, displayed also no expression of intense enjoyment, twisted up Pengreep's wrinkled face.

"I think I am," he replied.

"I am aware," said his lordship, "that he attempted to outwit you."

"And I am aware, my lord, that he has singularly outwitted himself," rejoined Pengreep, with another silent but expressive grin.

"Without going into particulars respecting the skilful exercise of cunning which you have both displayed," continued his lordship, "I will confine myself to the matter which more immediately concerns myself. I have learned from him that you are in full possession of certain unfortunate incidents which occurred in the early part of my life, and to which I was one of the principal actors. Is that so?"

"It is, my lord," rejoined Pengreep, emphatically.

"Enough," rejoined his lordship. "It is also true that you have been acting for many years for Mr. Vernon—engaged in tracing out all the circumstances, searching for links, and procuring them, until you have succeeded in forming a chain of evidence which, when produced, will imperil the position of Lady Kingswood and controvert the title of my son, the Honorable Mr. Cyril Kingswood, to be my heir-at-law."

"You appear to approach this very serious matter with great deliberation and calmness, my lord," observed old Pengreep.

"I have well-grounded reasons for so doing," returned his lordship.

"I am not disposed to dispute your statements, my lord," rejoined Pengreep; "I have only to inform your lordship that I have obtained that chain of evidence link by link, and that your lordship, whatever may be your well-grounded reasons for calmness, will be totally unable to disprove it when produced."

"That for the future, if it should come to the issue," remarked Lord Kingswood. "I am, however, prepared to admit one thing. My position as a member of the Government, and my rank as a descendant of an ancient and noble family, would render a trial in which certain accusations would be brought up against me——"

"And substantiated," interpolated old Pengreep.

Lord Kingswood waved his hand to deprecate interruption, and continued—

"Would be extremely annoying to myself and painful to the feelings of Lady Kingswood and my son."

"No doubt," chimed in old Pengreep.

"I am, therefore, most anxious to prevent the suit already commenced against me proceeding to trial."

"I can well believe that, my lord," remarked old Pengreep, keeping up his offensive fire of interruptions.

"I have, therefore, sought you with a view of offering you a most handsome compensation if you will transfer to me the services you have hitherto rendered to Mr. Vernon."

"I have served Mr. Vernon for very many years," replied old Pengreep, reflectively, "and he has always very liberally compensated me. I presume you would regard me as a precious scoundrel if I were to be guilty of such a monstrous piece of treachery."

"I do not regard such a transaction in that harsh light," rejoined Lord Kingswood, quickly. "You have served one person for many years, and another offers you far higher terms; it would simply be an act of prudence and self-justice to accept the better offer."

"And go over to the highest bidder—secrets and all," added Pengreep, significantly.

"Briefly, then," replied his lordship, "I require from you that packet of papers which my valet obtained, but which you recovered, and subsequently nothing more than to keep a profound silence respecting me and my affairs. The papers I seek includes a marriage certificate subtracted from a parochial register book, and a copy of it, together with such other documents as may bear on the legality of that marriage. You have these papers yet, I believe?"

"I have, my lord," returned old Pengreep.

"Name your price," exclaimed Lord Kingswood. "I am aware of their value, and am disposed to be liberal."

At length he said, in quiet tones:

"I cannot affix any price, my lord, either to the articles I shall place in your hands or to my services; they are of a value which can only be determined by yourself. I am sure your lordship is generous, liberal and noble. I will place the documents in your hands, and throw myself exclusively upon your lordship's generosity."

"And I will reward you, Pengreep, beyond your most sanguine expectations," rejoined Lord Kingswood, promptly.

Old Pengreep went to an antique secretary which stood in a corner of the room and opened it. He appeared to ferret among some papers, and eventually he touched a spring, a band of wood flew out, and disclosed a secret drawer. This he opened, and brought forth from it a packet of papers endorsed with the name "Kingswood." He then handed them to Lord Kingswood.

His lordship took them and opened them, and his hand trembled as he turned each paper over. At length he opened one—it was the copy of the certificate of his marriage in the little church of Avening. His eyes swam with a momentary gush of tears, but in a moment they were dry again, and the paper was put aside. Then he next came to a large sheet of paper folded up, it was the leaf torn from the register book.

He examined it carefully, and turning to Pengreep, he said:

"I am at a loss to understand why Vernon should have caused this leaf to be extracted from the book, when, in the interests of his revenge, it should have remained there intact, to be produced when needed."

"Mr. Vernon believed, my lord, that you would forestall him in the very deed," returned Pengreep, quickly. "You would have prevented its production by destroying it—he preserved it, that it might be produced."

"There are here all the papers which Vernon and yourself have gathered from first to last of this unhappy affair?" he added, after a minute's silent thought.

"There are, my lord," said Pengreep, promptly.

"The—the particulars of the—the death of——" Lord Kingswood stammered, as he uttered his words, and abruptly paused.

"The clergyman," suggested old Pengreep.

"No!" cried Lord Kingswood, impatiently.

"The lady?" suggested Pengreep.

Lord Kingswood bowed his head in assent.

"Yes, my lord, full particulars," returned Pengreep.

"Pray how long after the birth of the—her child, did the sad event occur?" he asked in a subdued tone.

A wild, fierce flash gleamed in the eyes of Pengreep, but he instantly bent his head down, and said, almost in a tone of apathy:

"About three years, my lord," he replied.

Lord Kingswood groaned. He clutched at the packet of papers within the pocket of his coat, and thought of Lady Kingswood, but no word escaped his lips.

"All the papers relative to her decease and to her burial, you will find within the packet," observed old Pengreep, with a strange, malicious glare in his eyes.

"It is well," murmured his lordship, passing his hand hastily over his eyes.

Then he said hastily, as if a sudden recollection forced itself upon him—

"The child of which we have been speaking was abducted from the mother when but a few months old, and placed in the hands of persons presumed to be trustworthy. They said it died, and they swore that they were present at its death, and that they afterwards buried it."

"They lied," said old Pengreep, laconically.

"I have been informed by one who has an interest in deceiving me, that the child did not die, but was stolen from those who had charge of it," observed his lordship.

"Recaptured, my lord," corrected Pengreep, with ironical emphasis. "It was stolen in the first instance."

"Is the assertion true?" asked Lord Kingswood.

"It is, my lord," he replied, with a short, triumphant laugh. "It was I who, through a clue given to me by Mr. Vernon, watched my opportunity and bore it away under his instructions. I afterwards placed it where it was educated, namely, at Avening, within sight of the church in which his mother was married."

Lord Kingswood winced again, but though he felt acutely, he controlled his emotions with much firmness.

"You can answer me, in that case, a most important question," he said, calmly, without betraying how intensely interested in it he was. "My valet, returning to me from an interview with you, brought me a strange story, to the effect that the child of which you have been speaking was——"

"A girl," interrupted old Pengreep, "who was brought up in Kingswood Chace, and was known to the people on your estate as the Wonder of Kingswood Chace."

"Explain," ejaculated Lord Kingswood, almost inaudibly.

"Mr. Vernon, many years since, directed me to a cot in the depths of a forest in the heart of Gloucestershire, and there—as he informed me I should—in the sunshine in the morning, playing before the door, I saw a little child, and I bore it away. I placed it in his hands as soon as I reached the spot where he awaited me, and he immediately leaped into a carriage, to which four horses were attached, and galloped away with it. Twelve months elapsed ere he placed it in my hands again. In the excitement attendant on seizing the child and bearing it from its forest home, I confess I did not observe its features; so that when Mr. Vernon gave Mr. Erle Gower into my charge, and bade me bear him to Avening, to certain persons who were prepared to receive him, I took it for granted that he was the same child that I abstracted from the forest. Subsequently I discovered—it is unnecessary to say under what circumstances—that Mr. Horace Vernon was passing a solitary life in Kingswood Chace."

Lord Kingswood started to his feet.

"In Kingswood Chace!" he iterated, with amazement.

"Even there, my lord; tending, rearing and educating a young girl, who was never permitted to wander beyond a certain range. I confess I am only partially informed on this part of Mr. Vernon's history. I may be able to learn more; but this I know, my lord, that while Mr. Erle exactly resembles you, the young girl Violet, whom he has reared, exactly resembles the lady you married at Avening."

Lord Kingswood dropped down in his seat as if shot.

For a time he could not speak. At length he muttered, incoherently,

"What horrible mystery is here enveloped? The boy stolen, the counterpart of myself; the girl like—like——"

"Erle! my lord," cried Pengreep, sharply. "Erle of Kingswood Chace, too, my lord."

Lord Kingswood's eyes flashed upon him.

"How know you," he cried, "that——"

"My lord, I know more than you dream of," returned Pengreep, significantly; "but I cannot yet enlighten you on the point you wish to be cleared up. I have merely to require from you the reward which is due to me for placing so great a power to preserve your good name and defeat the plots of your bitterest enemy in your hands."

Lord Kingswood, scarcely able to articulate a word, flung to him a pocket-book.

"It contains notes to a considerable amount," he said, huskily, "yet it is but an instalment. Come to me in a day or two. I shall require your presence. I have yet much to ask you. Send up an envelope, with your card enclosed, and let your visit be made at night, as near midnight as possible. I cannot say more to you now."

Old Pengreep bowed and conducted him to the door, and Lord Kingswood passed out into the street.

He had got possession of the coveted packet, yet his return to Kingswood House was made in a gloomier and sadder spirit than when he left it.

Old Pengreep fastened the outer door and scrambled up stairs. He locked himself in his room.

"A gold mine!" he cried, in hoarse, chuckling tones. "A gold mine! Treachery! Who said treachery? Selling copies of the originals cannot be treachery!"

(To be continued.)

THE GUNBOAT JEROME NAPOLEON.

Arrival of Prince Napoleon and Princess Clothilde.

The arrival of the Prince Napoleon and Princess Clothilde, on Saturday, the 27th ult., was so quietly conducted, that no one, save a favored few, was aware of it. They passed through the city in a close carriage, and unpretentiously took up their residence at the New York Hotel. They attended divine service at St. Stephens, Dr. Cummings's Church, on Sunday, and during the week visited Camp Scott, the Navy Yard, &c. They preserved a strict incognito and refused a public reception.

Prince Napoleon is the second son of Jerome Bonaparte, King of Westphalia, and is, after the young Prince Imperial, the heir to the throne of France. Princess Clothilde, his wife, is the daughter of Victor Emanuel, King of Italy. Whether their visit is one of policy or simply a pleasure tour, it is impossible at present to determine; but looking at the aspect of affairs, the unsettled policy of the European Cabinets in regard to our present difficulties, it is more than probable that Prince Napoleon's visit has a high political bearing. He is now in Washington.

The Jerome Napoleon, commanded by Captain Dubussion, is a screw propellor, and a perfect model of a steam yacht. She sits like a swan upon the waters, and is the object of the praise of every one who sees her. She is more of the style of a pleasure ship than of a man-of-war, but the officers and crew are all en regle, and the discipline and management are as strict as those of any fighting vessel in the service.

The yacht was built at the port of Havre, so late as the year 1860, and is therefore one of the newest in the service. She is seventy metres, or about two hundred and thirty-one feet long, and ten metres, or thirty-three feet wide. Her machinery is simple, but strongly constructed, and the speed of the vessel, as evidenced during the late voyage, is at the rate of fourteen miles an hour. She has a crew of one hundred and eighteen men, carries two new brass twelve pounder rifled cannons, of the Emperor's invention, and is very powerfully constructed amidships.

Captain Turner, of Inverness, who has gained a name from his weather predictions for the past and present year (and who is well known to tourists on the Caledonian Canal), paid a visit to Elgin in the end of last month. While the worthy captain was on the railway platform of the Elgin station, a person standing near said to a friend,

"Who's that? I think I know that face."

"Oh," said his friend, "that's Captain Turner, from Inverness."

"Ou," was the reply, "that's the man that sent us the desperate bad weather this winter?"

"My child, take those eggs to the shop, and if you can't get ninepence a dozen, bring them back."

Jemmy went as directed, and came back again, saying,

"Mother, let me alone for a trade; they all tried to get 'em for a shilling, but I screwed 'em to ninepence."

A captain of a rifle company, who shall be nameless, was, we regret to say, guilty of an unheard-of piece of barbarity the other day—the day, too, being one of the coldest we have had of late. He actually marched his men to the very brink of the canal, and then coolly commanded them to "fall in."

Anamboo, an African prince, visiting England, received so many attentions from a celebrated belle of London, that, in a moment of tenderness, he could not refrain from laying his hand upon his heart and exclaiming,

"Oh, madame, if Heaven had only made you a negress, you would have been irresistible!"

"Maister," said an old Scotch servant, "whether it's gude manners when a gentleman gives you a glass o' whuskey, to tak' a drop or drink aff the hail o't?"

The master having in homely phrase judiciously replied to this poser that the courtesy consisted in imbibing the whole, the man exclaimed, with a sigh of relief,

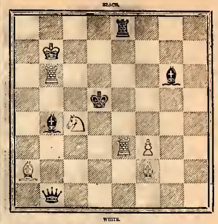
"Then, Gude be thankit, I was mannerly!"

It is better that a woman should scold than do worse. Better for us to endure the present ills than fly to others that we know not of. We do not relish the noise of scolding. We never did. Scolding seems to be a poor use to make of a woman. But then, scolding may have its advantages. We do not like the noise of a boiler blowing off steam, but if it saves the boiler from bursting, we should be content to endure it.

CHESS.

PROBLEM No. 302.—Inscribed to Dr. Lenard, Fort Wayne, Ind., by Frank, of Kalamazoo. White to play and checkmate in three moves.

BLACK.



WHITE.

The following is the ninth game in the match played by Messrs. Watkinson and Thorold. It will be found highly interesting, as exhibiting some positions of great intricacy:

32 Q R to K R sq	R to R 6	64 P to B 8 (Queens)	Q to K Kt 5 (ch)

And White resigns.

(a) Always a good move at this juncture; it was first played by Lowenthal against Harrwitz, but its force was not fully appreciated until adopted by Morphy. In his hands it invariably led to his obtaining superior positions.

(b) Some prefer here B to K 3.

(c) A move which we cannot recommend, because if properly opposed White still improves his position.

(d) Badly played; the correct move would have been B tks B. Had it been adopted White's game would have been preferable. Let us suppose:

9 B tks B	Kt tks B (or A)	10 Kt to B 5	Kt to K 4

11 R to Kt 3 with a fine game.
11 Kt to K 6 might also be played with advantage.

(A)

	9 Q tks B	11 Kt to Kt 5, and we prefer White's game.
10 Castles	P tks P

(e) A good move.

(f) Q tks Kt P could not have been ventured; Black would, in reply, take Kt with Pawn, obtaining an excellent attack.

(g) All this is well conceived.

(h) Admirably followed up.

(i) Black did not make the best of the position, otherwise he must have observed that there was an easy method of deciding the game by simply checking with R to Kt 3, followed by Kt to Q B 7, &c.

(k) Why not the obvious move Kt tks K B P?

(l) White has been allowed to get out of his difficulties, and has now the preferable game.

(m) Played with equal care and skill.

(n) It is obvious that taking P with Rook would have cost Black a piece.

(o) This Pawn is assuming a threatening aspect.

SOLUTIONS TO PROBLEMS.

Problem No. 299.—R to Q B 7, &c.
Problem No. 300.—K to Kt 3; B to Q B 6 (best); Kt to Q B 5; R from B 2 tks Kt; Kt to Q 7, B to B 2 (A and B); Kt to Q B 5; anything; B or Kt mates accordingly, with variations.
Problem No. 301.—B to Q R 2; Q or R tks B (best); R to Q B 4 (ch); P tks R; B mates.

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Wellsville, Ohio, June 18, 1861.

M. Phelan, Esq., New York.—Dear Sir—It being my play, I make a carom on my opponent's ball and one of the reds, at the same time forcing the red off the table. Do I lose the shot, or am I entitled to a count? If entitled to a count, how many? Please answer in Frank Leslie.

Yours, &c.,
B. D. Jasse.

Ans.—You are entitled to two points, and you continue your play.

P. M. McC.—In such a case the ball remains off the table until its spot is vacant.

Brooklyn, L. I.—You are at liberty to withdraw.

W. T. B., Cleveland.—"Mind your own business" is a golden rule in the game of billiards, as in all other varieties of the game of life.

Neophyte, New York.—To execute the shot of which you send a diagram, you must strike your ball about a quarter above the centre, to the left, making it strike the object ball to the right.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

M. Berger's Movements.—This distinguished player has given exhibitions at Louisville, Ky., Cincinnati, Columbus, Chicago, Milwaukee and Detroit. At the latter place he was assisted in his exhibitions by Mr. Seereiter, the well-known player. The following was the result of six games played by them:

	SEEREITER.	BERGER.
1st Exhibition	27	100	game.
2d "	73	100	"
3d "	40	100	"
4th "	25	100	"
5th "	31	100	"
6th "	38	100	"
	235	600

The game was the three ball carom, but the balls were American size, Mr. Seereiter having refused to play with M. Berger's balls, with which all the other American players who encountered M. Berger played. M. Berger and Mr. Seereiter had agreed to play the American game, without pushing shots, but when the time to play arrived the latter gentleman declined playing.

After leaving Detroit, M. Berger visited Toledo. From Toledo he went to Cleveland, where he played at Mr. Foley's rooms, on one of Phelan's full size American pocket tables, giving two exhibitions; and here we might add that the table which was seized by the Secessionists at Memphis—and which was not his French table, as has been stated in the newspapers, but the table made expressly for his use during his tour by Phelan & Collender—has been recovered. The want of this table was very severely felt by M. Berger, who, since leaving Memphis, has been obliged to play on such tables as he could find. He says he has been made to feel the importance to every artist of having a table he knows he can depend on. During his stay in Detroit, M. Berger was presented with a silver snuff-box by his admirers in that city.

M. Berger departed for France, in the City of Glasgow, on the 3d of August. He may return to this country again when our political troubles are over.

Important New Historical Work.
FRANK LESLIE'S
Pictorial History of the War
OF 1861.
DESCRIPTIVE, STATISTICAL AND DOCUMENTARY.
Edited by R. G. Squier,
Late Minister to Central America, &c.
The Third Number of this superb work has already been issued, and the Fourth Number is ready for delivery. The design of this work is great and comprehensive. It is a thorough history of the causes and the progress of the War, from its inception to the present time, derived from documentary evidence; illustrated by the best artists of the age, and conveyed in the highest style of art. It will be published in Twelve Monthly Numbers, and forms a history of the War, carefully and judiciously edited with the most complete, graphic and correct illustrations.
The value of the Work is manifested in the praise of the great PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR, but only as regards its literary merit, but as to its large, full, clear type, thick and splendid paper, and superb printing. The Illustrations are from the pencils of Messrs. Forbes, Waud, Crane, Davis, Taylor, Wells, Ogden, Mayo, &c., and are of unequalled beauty and entirely authentic.
Each Number contains fifteen Pages, each page measuring 11 by 17 inches.
THE PRICE OF EACH PART IS TWENTY FIVE CENTS.
Subscriptions will be received at the office of the American Publishing Agency,
No. 14 Chambers Street,
From whence subscribers in the city will be regularly served (post-monthly) by Carriers, who collect on delivery of the Parts. Agents will call immediately on their receipt. Retail—One Dollar for first four Parts.

Flattering Opinions of the Press.
It is needless what will interest every true Patriot.—Piper Argus, Ohio.
We really have at great value in after years, when peace and tranquility again reign in the land.—Republican Standard, Ft. Wayne, Ind.
"The Pictorial History of the War," which is published by Mr. Frank Leslie, of New York, is unquestionably the best work which has appeared in a cheap form, a record of passing events. It is a work which will become valuable in after years, when peace and tranquility again reign in the land.—Republican Standard, Ft. Wayne, Ind.
It will be a compact illustrated History of our present civil struggle, and as the artists are numerous and of large talent, it is sure to be a monument of truth.—Sunday Mercury, Boston, Mass.
We commend it to every family, who is well known, as a work of merit and literary value.—Sun, Canada West.
Its publishers have already appeared, which, so far as we have seen and examined any numbers, have never been equalled by the American Political press.—Boston Evening Gazette.
All who subscribe for this splendid historical work will receive a full and complete account of every transaction connected with the stirring scenes now being enacted.—Sunday Dispatch.
It will give a complete epitome of the war, with all the facts, events, battles and anecdotes connected with it, arranged chronologically, so as to form a consecutive history of the whole war. It will be profusely illustrated, and the portraits of leading officers and statesmen, plans of battles, &c., will be given in their proper order, &c., &c. To the publication of this invaluable work we cordially recommend our readers.—Sunday Times.
And for preservation it will be invaluable.—Sun and Gazette, Quincy, Illinois.

NOTICE!

FRANK LESLIE'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR, No. 5 of this magnificent Pictorial History of the War is now ready. The immense rale which has attended its production has already exhausted two editions of the back numbers. The painting of this great work is a matter of extreme difficulty and delicacy, and cannot be hurried through like an ordinary newspaper. It requires time, and those who are impatient for their back numbers will please bear this fact in mind as a sufficient excuse for apparent delay. Nos. 2 and 3 are now ready, and Nos. 1 and 4 will be ready in a few days.

BURNING OF THE VILLAGE OF HAMPTON, VA.

By the Rebels under General Magruder.

In our last issue we gave a sketch of the village of Hampton, showing the burning of two or three prominent buildings by order of Major-General Butler, on the withdrawal of his forces from that place. Since then the village, one of the oldest in the State, together with its picturesque old church, which we engrave elsewhere, has been utterly destroyed by order of General Magruder of the rebel army, who has advanced towards it with a force of seven thousand men, including two hundred cavalry and eight pieces of artillery, viz., three Parrott guns, four howitzers and one rifled cannon. Part of the troops were from Williamsburg. Monday night they encamped at Great Bethel, which had been completely deserted.

A few minutes past midnight on Wednesday, 7th inst. General Magruder, with about six hundred rebels, some of them belonging to Hampton, entered the town and immediately fired the buildings with torches. The greater part of the five hundred houses were built of wood, and no rain having fallen lately, the fiery flames wind soon produced a terrible conflagration.

Mr. Seofield, a native of Boston, Connecticut, and a resident of Hampton, Virginia, for the past five years carrying on a general variety business in that village, was there at the firing of the place by the rebels. At about half-past eleven o'clock on Wednesday night the rebels arrived at Hampton and completely surrounded the place. The poor inhabitants, at least all that were left, were sound asleep, and awakened by the sharp firing of the rebel pickets and the Union troops of Colonel Weber, who were posted on the other side of the creek. It was now about twenty minutes past twelve o'clock on Thursday morning when Mr. Scofield noticed about six houses, down town, being fired through the weather boards with turpentine or torches, apparently saturated with tar. An old female slave walked through the place and awakened those that had not heard the firing. All was hurry and confusion. Mr. Scofield hurriedly dressed himself in a light suit tying loosely to his head, and by the time he had on his pantaloons and shirt he heard loud knocks at the front door, and before he could get out of the door his bedroom was already set on fire by one of the torches. In the confusion he escaped, but heard some one say, "We want you," and Mr. Scofield, asking who addressed him, was answered that it was a member of the North Carolina regiment. Mr. Scofield, however, escaped, having been fired upon once by a pistol shot; but fortunately escaped unhurt. On the outskirts of Hampton, going towards Old Point, he met an old acquaintance formerly of Hampton, belonging to the cavalry, who answered to a question why Hampton was fired, that the "cussed Yankees" having had possession of the place once and evacuated it, they (the rebels) might not get another opportunity, and they would set fire to it at once and here them from having the same fate in winter quarters. The village is complete work; every house is gutted with the exception of about five in the east end, which are used by the town, which are the residences of Mr. Moody, the sutler at the fort, Miss Eliza Jones' (a black soldiering), the Episcopal parsonage; the house of Joseph Phillips, H. Clay Wearing's store and warehouse, and one or two small frame houses on the outskirts.

The reason of these being spared was that the rebels had no time to appreciate their hellish work further, being closely pressed by Colonel Weber's men, and the wind blowing south-west swept through the middle of the town, leaving buildings untouched.

THIRTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

EXTRA SESSION.

SENATE.—On Tuesday, the 6th August, Congress adjourned, sine die, having fulfilled the pledge of its most momentous session, and left the country to honor the lasting respect of the nation. The business was a considerable portion of the time was occupied in the discussion of Executive nominations, appointments and communications sent in by the President, who, with several more here of the Cabinet, was in attendance. The Tariff and Direct Tax bills, the measures passed by Congress were approved by him, earnestly and cordially; on Friday he signed a bill to increase the pay, providing for the use of a corps of rural property. Then, after some little embarrassment, he signed the resolution to confirm the appointment of ex-ex. Buchanan's second bill was rejected by 33 to 7. After unimportant matters, the Senate closed its labors at one o'clock, and adjourned until December.

HOUSE, August 6.—The Senate bill to increase the pay of the volunteers and regulars came up for a third reading and passage. Mr. Wickliffe moved to amend it by striking out the next section of all corps dependent with Pennsylvania and Massachusetts regiments. The latter bill was passed, while a very letter speech upon the Spanish Government for its infamous patronage of the African slave trade. Mr. Lovejoy, from the bill for further relief, it has still the same noted hostility to the slave trade that it had in the days of the Abolitionists' existing theology. The bill was finally passed, and all action about exclusively to the consideration of our American troubles. There were two reasons for this: one was the fact that the session was near the Monday's discussion and the London Daily News, shows as much ignorance of the subject as the most ignorant Democrat, and as much prejudice as the evilness of political rancour.

FRANCE.—The Emperor is still at Vichy, from whence he would depart for the camps of instruction on the 1st of August. The French journals (with the exception of the Moniteur) were discussing the Italian question, and the Constitutionnel declared that the real idea if France were to take or retain Rome or Venetia, it would be at once at war with all Europe, except Sardinia, it would put an end to the alliance, and would be a fatal step, probably, for the Empire, were to be attacked in Paris, where it would associate the more cordial alliance between the Czar and Emperor. Considerable activity was still observed in the naval arsenals, and the Moniteur announced the steamers and cutters ships, both of which are indispensable to the working of the line-of-battle steamer for recruits and the fleet of transport steamers. In other respects, France was prosperous and quiet, although there was beginning to be felt a pinch of scarcity.

AUSTRIA.—Hungary very discontented, but the undoubted alliance between Austria and Russia, and the unanimity of the Austrian army in its fidelity, perhaps any effort to revolt.

ITALY.—Nothing definite from the Congress of Cæsar, and remains on the same good sense with a generally, the best of Sufferers. The health of the Prince was very fortunate, and public opinion was already beginning in search of a successor.

JAPAN.—A correspondence had taken place between Mr. Harris, the American Minister, and the Japanese Council, the British Minister, on the expedience of removing the Consulate from Yedo to Yokohama, to which most of the other Foreign and British Consuls had already removed. Mr. Harris, however, declined to do so, and the matter remained in abeyance. Mr. Harris considered that the Consulate should remain at Yedo, as the capital of the country, and the residence of the Emperor, and the Ambassadors, who were then expected to visit the United States. He actually kept the murder of Mr. Heuriken upon the impressions of that unfortunate gentleman, rather than upon the miserable sensation.

State of the Nation.

The official reports from the General commanding, the Generals of divisions, Colonels of regiments and brigades, and Major Hall Rice, although being now in a better matter to light, are highly satisfactory as evidence of the excellent behavior at a majority of our men in the field, and of the skill and bravery of the officers. In the day, we had won a victory which was only wrested from us by the pouring in of large re-enforcements to the ranks of the rebels. Our men commanded the superior ground, but the retreat or panic of a portion was gallantly covered by others, and we showed an unbroken, if retreating, front to the enemy.

General McClellan's report is a highly interesting account of his plans of action. So far as we can judge, his plan was well conceived, and would have been carried out successfully, but the failure of his subordinates in the field prevented it at the time he proposed. But a delay of several days, caused by the slourish movements of the Government, discouraged the troops, robbed him of trained troops, and enabled the force of General Johnston to form a junction with the rebels on the very day of the battle, a fact which turned the Federal victory into a panic and a defeat.

The country will be satisfied with this report, because it shows that, although the plan was not carried out, the skill of the men, unconsidered enterprise which many have represented it to be. It had in it the elements of success; judgment, foresight and undaunted intrepidity distinguished it, and only the necessity of new foes, which made the odds too great, turned the tide against us.

Counting up our losses, and balancing them against the experience we have gained, which, showing us where we were most weak, has indicated the means of acquiring the necessary strength, we are prepared to say that our loss has been a positive gain, and that the blood of our brave soldiers will not have been shed in vain.

General McClellan is quietly but energetically carrying out his plan of organizing our army. He is too thorough a soldier not to know that the crowning element of a successful army is discipline, rigid, if not stringent, and he is the man who can realize that important fact. The idea that all men are equal may do very well as a civil theory, but it is utterly impracticable in a military one. Where the necessity exists, for the same rules are made applicable to their office as the, under McClellan's rule, begin to learn that a soldier has higher responsibilities than being the tribe of captain, and sporting a dashing uniform in saloons and bar-rooms. The present is the most serious epoch in our country's existence, and all that it should be viewed with a gravity becoming its importance.

We cannot forbear quoting one paragraph from General McDowell's report, which is a sense of honor that there could be found in the ranks of the defenders of their country so many white-livered recreants as this passage indicates. Let New York and Pennsylvania read and blush for their fellow-citizens' sons!

On the eve of the battle the Fourth Pennsylvania regiment of volunteers, and the battery of the Second artillery of the New York Eighth Militia, whose term of service expired, insisted on their discharge. I urged upon them the importance of their services for them to remain a short time, and the Hon. Secretary of War telegraphed to the same effect, but they left us, and the battery to increase at the least five days. But in vain. They insisted on discharge that night. It was grossly unjust in the morning, when the army moved forward into the battle, these troops moved to the rear, to the school of the state troops.

In South-western Missouri that gallant and pleasant soldier, General Lyon, has won a victory over the rebels. A victory over the rebel troops. On Friday, the 2d inst., he learned that Ben McCulloch and his Southern horde were approaching to give battle to the Federal troops, and at once marched out to meet him. On approaching a ravine known as Dug Spring the enemy was discovered in large force and marshalled in battle array. It was about 10 o'clock in the morning, when the army moved forward into the battle, three troops moved to the rear, to the school of the state troops.

The engagement was opened by Lyon's artillery, which was promptly replied to by that which the artillery of Lyon proved its superiority, the enemy retreated with a loss of forty killed and forty-four wounded. A large quantity of booty was also captured, including a large stand of arms, fifteen horses and wagons, and other trophies.

The advantages of cavalry were exhibited in this contest. During the engagement a small squad of dragoons made a sudden charge upon a column of the enemy, smashing some four stands of colors, and capturing one of them, a standard, among the infantry, and our boys cut their way through them, and came back with the loss of five of their number.

The engagement at Carthage, Missouri, in Spring towards Curran, when a body of rebels, some three thousand strong, were discovered posted on a hillside south-west of that place. His command consisted of but 1,100 men, and the meeting forward, when Captain Dubois's battery opened with such effect that the enemy was forced to beat a hasty retreat, without waiting for the infantry to engage them. In this affair he lost known.

That of the National forces was none killed and none wounded.

One of our war ships has done something at last, and that is very creditable. She has captured three private schooner Petrel, some time since the United States revenue cutter Aiken, when off Charleston. Supposing the United States flag to be a rebel one, at first mistook her for an East Indiaman. She made for her at once, but soon discovered her mistake. The captain, Mr. Gordon Gray, of England, a nephew of Lord Carew, and, with a foolhardiness altogether astonishing fired three guns at the St. Lawrence, once with grape and twice with shot. The first two shots passed over her, and her last struck side into the pirate, which sank her at once. A shell struck her bows, and bursting literally tore her to pieces. Eight of the crew were taken prisoners by the United States flag-ship, and rescued by the boats of the St. Lawrence, and are now lodged in Moyamensing jail.

At Alabama on the Das Moines River, North-east Missouri, a brisk fight took place resulting in the success of the Union forces. A considerable amount of arms and ammunition for the National troops were thereby seized, and the crew of Captain Moore, with three hundred and fifty men, and a band of rebels upwards of a thousand strong came to attack upon the place for the purpose of capturing them. The fight lasted about an hour, when the rebels were forced to retire without their booty. Captain Moore, the rebel leader, was wounded, and fifty men from Centralia, subsequently pursued the rebels about a mile and a half, killing and wounding a number, and capturing several prisoners. The rebels in this affair numbered upwards of five sixty thousand votes. This is one of the most glorious triumphs of the Union arms, and is highly creditable to the troops of the Confederate traitors. It is now expected that John C. Breckinridge will at once resign his seat in the Senate. He pledged himself to do so if he should go against him, and as he has taken place will be filled by a loyal man, his loss will be our gain.

General Fremont is displaying extraordinary activity in his command. He is personally inspecting every point, and his presence everywhere excites the highest enthusiasm. He has received an immense amount of livery assistance, and we have perfect confidence in his ability to use it to the best advantage. His presence gives unbounded confidence to the Union men in Missouri, and his energetic action sets the spirit rising to a point of enthusiasm which will utterly extinguish the hopes of the Secession traitors in their strongholds.

The barbarous and unnecessary burning of the splendid college of Hampden, Va., by the rebel troops under Magruder, we have illustrated and described in another place. It was an act of shameless wantonness, and utterly disgraces the man who conceived and those who executed it.

General Banks maintains his position at Sandy Hook, Md., and his demonstrations at attack him has as yet been made by the enemy.

Prince Napoleon has paid a visit to the rebels at Manassas Junction. He was received by Beauregard and Johnston, passed the night in Beauregard's bed, examined the fortifications and returned to Washington with the impression that he found that he was not very favorably impressed with what he saw, for though cavalry pressed to proceed to Richmond by Beauregard, he declined deciding to take the journey. It is now rather inclined to think that the living was hardly up to the mark of his fastidious Parisian taste.

With the exception of the threatening advance of seven thousand rebel troops under Magruder upon Hampton, and the transfer of several regiments from Washington to the defensive lines on the Potomac, all the troops in Virginia are unchanged. Rumors are afloat of some great movement to be specially executed, but such rumors are not to be trusted.

General McClellan has made arrangements with the correspondents of the press, so that no information in advance of military movements can be transmitted to the papers. The enemy must therefore derive his information from other sources.

It has caused some surprise that, while the resolutions to indemnify the President for certain violations of the Constitution, such as raising an army, suspending the habeas corpus, putting down the St. Louis Gazette, and other extraordinary acts, passed by a large majority, nevertheless these very necessary resolutions to hold the President harmless did not pass the Senate. They have been, it is said, held over. One of the reasons given is, that while the Senate fully approved of the exercise of these extra-Constitutional privileges, yet it was not desirable to give his Excellency a fresh license to stort again. The matter, however, is of little importance, the people approve of every one of these acts which have rendered a resolution of indemnity necessary, to save the President from those imaginary pains and penalties which the businessmen so amusingly threaten him with.

PERSONAL.

It is somewhat a singular coincidence that by the Fulton Fire Relievers, the diverest wits of the late Jerome Monument, arrived, and took up her quarters in the Fulton Engine House, the brave Virginia Fire Company, the Fulton Confederate remain while in this city.

The following are the names, officers and proprietors of the Democratic Standard, a Secession paper published at Hamilton, Ohio, were visited upon the office by a party of Union men, and the press and type thrown into the street, and some portions of the building burned by the enemy of the Union. The Fulmers not only refused the apology, but fired at the crowd, wounding two citizens. The men then proceeded to the office, and completed the entire work in spite of the Standard. The police had considerable trouble in getting the fire to a place of safety.

The Committee for the Price Auditors have announced that as none of the twelve hundred dollars will be required for the worship of the gods, they have withdrawn from their petition. The idea that twelve hundred American Democrats would subscribe twelve hundred dollars to worship the gods of the Greeks and Romans is a little too much of a good thing to be taken as a word. We have not the Secretary of War invite the rejected twelve hundred to form a body guard for Jefferson Davis, in the event of Colonel Ormsbee's refusal. We want cavalry, and then every man could find his own horse.

Between Buenaventura and Valluchigbara lives entertained by their Secession admirers in Augusta, Ga., and Mr. Augustus Schell, the well-known Democratic Union Broadway, has been appointed Brigadier-General of the Fifth Regiment of Infantry. Mr. Schell is a young fellow, and "the Angel of Mercy," which is drawn as superintendent of the Sanitary Commission, will doubtless still maintain its post in London; also the "Incredible Deliverance will, of course, be anxious to see how an American Democrat conducts himself on the battle-field.

One excellent and gallant Pulaski Fireman, John Cassell, whose hair is Americanized, has very properly declined, has created a sensation in the Secession hotbeds since the Assault, in consequence of his having been one of the Fulton Fire Relievers, which caused him to be arrested by the Secessionists, and lodged in the common cage of Florida Cross. The commissioner of this humane spirit, Mr. Richard Taylor, of Tennessee, is a prisoner at present in the Secession quarter of said Secession city. The badge is quickly welcome on account of the sentiment of the Union.

We very carefully welcome among the editorial corps of New York city, Mr. Richard Grant White, who will contribute to our columns, and is only of varied and invariable ability. She has taken charge of the Leisure Hour, a monthly magazine, which is to be made high-toned and literary, and which we sincerely publish. A new and highly interesting serial tale, by the editress of the Leisure Hour, will be one of the features of the next number. The price, with splendid illustrations, is only twenty cents, an excellent opportunity for lots of a number of colored plates of our political regimen.

The Prince of Wales's visit to Canada, and the reception, as esteem, lately was related at all her jewellery, genuine and bogus. Brunette was in her element at a private party, and Mr. Wallack, as a dashing cavalier, and he was on the point of taking chevalier as courage, when Tom Taylor, Mark Lemon and Shirley Brooks, who were present, and who had been in the habit of dining at his mansion, was now going for themselves, was saved by a well-supply of Mr. Wallack's Champagne, which smiles and other entertainments.

Grim must be farewell of the public world at the Queen's Theatre, London, which will be closed for the season on Saturday next, August 17th.

Gen Newton, Fernando Wood, and his Confrère, visited the Princess Theatre on Monday night, and were received with great applause by the delighted audience in the box adjoining to the Mayor of the House of Lords.

Several distinguished Americans were present at the dinner at Long Branch. Archbishop Hughes, whose health is failing and Mr. Fox remained but a few days, and left for Saratoga. Mr. Fox, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, was also at Long Branch. The Wallacks, par nobile fratrum, were at the "Hub." The ever interesting Mrs. Henry, the most popular, delightful and charming visitor at Long Branch, left for Boston. Mr. Bancroft, the historian, Bishop Odenheimer, visit the greatest and warmest our nature, Anne, Rose, Mr. Bancroft, the historian, Bishop Odenheimer, Eighteen hundred and sixty-one, we count her up a splendid, we have our Addie (Mrs) Hunt?

Secretary Seward has been very ill, but is now apparently well, at his residence in the city. He is now convalescing.

Mr. Lester Wallack has taken a benefit at Wallack's Theatre the coming season.

Miss Matilda Heron Forbes is quickly visiting her opportunity. She has secured the new piece, which she will probably produce during the coming season.

HERMAN, THE MAGICIAN.

We have heard so much about and generally about the new magician who has visited this country, and will in all probability make New York his permanent residence, that we feel called upon at the end of a week or two days since, on seeing a magnificent photograph recently taken by Mr. Sarony, in Union Square, we have been induced to gather some particulars respecting him from friends who have seen him performing in Europe. From these we have heard enough to convince us that he is one of the greatest necromantic marvels that has ever visited this country.

Herman, the magician, is a man who almost entirely depends upon his own single skill in the art of wheedling an audience out of their senses. He has no stage apparatus, as the conjurer class of magicians generally have, but simply produces his effects under the nose of a delighted spectator, with far more certainty than other of the fraternity. He is a man of middle age, and has attained to the whole of their costly stage machinery. The stage ought to endure, or it has outlived him, to a devotion recognition in every country which he may visit. He has shone in Russia, Austria, Prussia, France, England, Spain, Portugal and Brazil as a living marvel. Emperors have petted and kings caressed him, while themselves and their families have bestowed upon him the costliest cadeaux. It now only remains for him to prove himself the human wonder which he is said to be in the greatest republic that has ever existed. When he does so he will find that our emperor, the people, will be even warmer and more generous in their admiration of him than any crowned head has yet been, while their gifts will be such as perhaps he may not deposit in his private museum of imperial and royal jewellery, yet will swell to a larger value upon the right side of his banking-book.

SOUTHERN MISCELLANEOUS INTELLIGENCE.

SOUTH CAROLINA, Charleston.—Despite the blockade several arrivals and departures have occurred. It is said that the captain of a British gunboat called the Racer had an interview with the captain of our blockading steamer the Wabash, and that afterwards the latter vessel sailed away, and was absent more than two days, during which several vessels laden with produce sailed for Liverpool. The more probable account is that the captain heard some intelligence of one of the Rebel privateers, and went after her. Trade is very dull. The Charleston News has been discontinued. The Charleston press does not rejoice so much over the recent victory as the rest of the Secession journals. It is said that Governor Pickens is not satisfied with the manner in which the State he rules has been treated.

LOUISIANA, New Orleans.—The refusal of the bankers to agree to the Rebel loan has very much surprised the ultra Secessionists. It was proposed that the Government should purchase all the cotton at ten cents a pound, and the tobacco at seven cents, and issue Treasury notes for the amount—this to be used as currency. The great objection to the plan consists in the chance that all this produce will not be sold, in consequence of the blockade, till next year, when a second crop will have rendered both these grand staples mere drugs in the market. This would, of course, involve the Government in a loss of above one hundred millions. The New Orleans papers indulge in the most poetical versions of the Bull's Run affair. It seems very certain that the loss on the Confederate side was fully equal to that on the Union.

Baton Rouge.—Great preparations are making here to form a camp, to be prepared for General Fremont's expected advance in November.

FLORIDA, Pensacola.—Only 3,000 Rebel forces remain here. General Bragg spends all his time in drilling the companies that are sent to him from Alabama and Louisiana, and then despatching them to Richmond. There seems to be much more method in the Confederate Government than in ours. In the meantime the Wilson Zouaves are being trained at their camp on San Rosa. Many complaints are made by the Unionists at the inefficiency of the blockade of the coast—more especially the mouths of the Mississippi—as several privateers have escaped to prey upon our commerce. Several British vessels of war are cruising along the coast, occasionally anchoring alongside the Federal fleet. Sir Alexander Milne, the British Admiral of the West India station, has denied the statement of the New York Times that he had reported to the British Government that the blockade was inefficient. The privateer McRea escaped from New Orleans on the 30th of July, and is now doubtless committing havoc on our trade.

The Florida Peninsular, of July 20, says: "From a reliable source we receive information to the effect that the steamer Cuyler, blockading this port, has landed thirty or forty men, with three eighteen-pounders, on Egmont Key, who have erected a battery on the east side of that island. Our readers will not be at a loss to account for the causes which induced this movement on the part of the enemy, when we inform them that the portion of the smack Wilbur's crew who were permitted to leave here for Key West, on Friday of last week, instead of going directly to the latter place, ran alongside the Cuyler, immediately after which the troops and cannon above mentioned were sent ashore. This crew could have avoided the blockading steamer by taking the inland passage, but (as was feared by those of our citizens who doubted the propriety of allowing them to go back to Key West at that particular time) they preferred giving their friends a call before going home. We say friends, because our informant states that this same crew were on the island with the troops—whether as volunteers in the Lincoln service, or as prisoners, the reader can judge from the facts before him. We hope that this affair will serve to make our commander more cautious in future in allowing persons, whom he does not know to be 'sound on the goose,' to go in the direction of Key West, or in the neighborhood of the blockading steamer."

TEXAS.—R. C. Flournoy arrived in Memphis from California on Saturday. He came by the overland route to St. Louis, and by rail thence to Louisville, and from Louisville to Memphis. He passed through Los Angelos on the 4th day of July. General A. S. Johnston left Los Angelos for Texas on the 2d ult., with a party of nearly one hundred men, and among the number several other resigned officers of the United States Army. The party designed to cross the Colorado desert into North-western Texas, which would require a journey of sixty days. So their arrival may be looked for about the 1st of September. Mr. F. says the party is well mounted and fully armed, and no fears need be entertained for their safety.

VIRGINIA.—A correspondent of a Tennessee paper writes from Staunton, Va., July 27, as follows: "We reached Charlottesville on Thursday night, but instead of being ordered to Manassas, as we desired, we were ordered on to the north-west, to meet and check the troops under McClellan or Rosencranz, whoever now commands. We started again on Friday morning, about seven o'clock, and reached this place in the evening, and pitched our tents again. We will wait here only till all of our brigade, under command of General S. R. Anderson, get all together. Some of them got here before us, more arrived last night, and they still continue to come. In all probability we will start this evening or to-morrow. When we start from here we will do it on foot. We will march, unless countermanded, for the mountains, where we will, in all probability, co-operate with the independent army of 20,000 under Gen. Wise."

The following, from the Richmond Dispatch, shows that both the Wises have made a successful retreat upon their reserves: "Captain O. J. Wise, of the Richmond Blues, arrived in this city yesterday, on business connected with the War Department. We learn that the Blues, with the Wise Legion, are at the White Sulphur Springs, in Greenbrier. General Floyd's brigade are at the Sweet Springs."

NORTH CAROLINA.—It has been pretty well established that the South is well supplied by the way of some little ports in North Carolina, Beaufort doing a very large business. The water is so shallow that our blockading vessels cannot follow them, and, consequently, the cargoes are landed, and sometimes the vessels are burned. The rebels are building batteries at certain spots on the coast to cover the retreat of these schooners, &c. Some came from Liverpool and many from Maryland and Delaware. A very large trade has been carried on with Snelton, a little village on the Pocomoke river. The late expedition of the Freeborn and other vessels from Fortress Monroe, it is said, will put an end to this supply. The Wilmington Sentinel says that a company of rifles is being raised in Delaware, and that a man named Spencer is to command it. It is certain that Delaware carries on considerable illicit trade with the rebels.

MISSOURI.—The St. Louis Democrat thus describes the recent battle at Dug Spring, between Lyon and McCulloch.

On Friday, the 2d instant, General Lyon hearing that Ben McCulloch and his Southern hordes were approaching to give him battle, ordered his men under arms, and marched out to meet him. On approaching a ravine, known as Dug Spring, the enemy was discovered in large force and marshaled in battle array. Our force was 8,000, that of Ben McCulloch 15,000. The engagement was opened by Lyon's artillery, which was promptly replied to by the enemy.

After some hard fighting, in which the artillery of Lyon proved its superiority, the enemy retreated with a loss of forty killed and forty-four wounded. We took eighty stand of arms, fifteen horses and wagons, and other trophies.

The advantages of cavalry were exhibited in this contest. During the engagement a small squad of dragoons made a sudden charge upon a column of the enemy, numbering some 4,000. The suddenness of the onset created a stampede among the infantry, and our boys cut their way through them, and came back with the loss of five of their number.

General Lyon is said to be strongly posted, and his camp is in close proximity to the rebels. A battle was momentarily expected. Springfield was in a state of great excitement. Only four companies of infantry, two cannon and six hundred Home Guards were left in the city.

An incident occurred in the battle which indicates the character of the foe we have to contend with. One of Colonel Sigel's lieutenants had prostrated a Secessionist, who then begged for quarter, which the chivalrous lieutenant granted, but as soon as the black-hearted rebel regained his feet, he seized his gun and shot the generous foe; but the lieutenant killed him and two other Secessionists, and rode back, when he fell from his horse and died in two hours.

The Secessionists, they say, are determined to take Springfield, on account of its determined Union sentiments. It is said there is a body of some five thousand men thirty miles west who are coming to attack the town.

Ex Governor Jackson, of Missouri, when in Richmond, on the 5th, said that he was going back to regain his State, which he should attempt at the head of 40,000 men, having that number already mustered in Arkansas and Western Missouri.

At Bethany, Harrison county, Mo., on the 19th, a camp of rebels was attacked by the Unionists, but they managed to escape. On the 24th, however, the Union forces surrounded another camp of rebels, and took them all prisoners. General Lyon would not release them on their offering to take the oath of allegiance.

The next day, Colonel Graynor, at the head of his regiment, surprised another camp of rebels near Gentryville, and after some parleying accepted their conditional surrender, namely, giving up their arms, flag and other property, and taking the oath of allegiance.

KENTUCKY.—Although the total returns have not yet come in, there can be no doubt that Kentucky has done for the Union by a very large majority. So much so, that both Senators Powell and Breckinridge have expressed their intention of resigning. This may, perhaps, mean going over to Richmond, but it is more probable a mere homage forced from them by such a remarkable and unexpected expression of State feeling.

Governor Magoffin has called for all the arms and ammunition taken by the Union troops at Mayfield, but it is doubtful whether the call will be responded to. Nevertheless, after the recent election, Kentucky may be considered as entirely safe for the Union. There have been no rebel or National movements in this State since our last.

THE POTOMAC.—Owing to the very proper reserve maintained by the authorities, little is known of the movements, and nothing whatever of their intentions; we have therefore merely to chronicle that General Banks has stationed his chief force on the Maryland shore, opposite Harper's Ferry, leaving a small force at the latter place to watch the enemy, who are strongly posted at Charlestown, about eight miles from Harper's Ferry and at Leesburg. A skirmish took place the other day between the advanced pickets, in which the enemy had several killed and wounded.

ALEXANDRIA.—It is stated that the Confederates have fortified Fairfax Court House, and are gradually getting nearer to Alexandria, which the Southern press loudly proclaims must be retaken by Beauregard. There have been no conflicts upon the river lately. Deserters represent Aquia Creek as having been strengthened both by large re-enforcements of men and cannon.

The Freeborn threw several shells into Mathias's Point on the 3d, but without eliciting any reply. It is, therefore, more than probable there is no battery there.

VIRGINIA.—Fortress Monroe is still to remain under the care of General Butler, and more regiments are to be sent with all possible dispatch. The contraband niggers are becoming very numerous and very troublesome. Greater order reigns both in the Fortress and Newport News, in consequence of the abolition of whiskey and the sutlers. The First regiment was represented as being very demoralized through the intemperance of some of their officers, but is now fast being worked into order again. A great difference of opinion exists as to the merits of the court martial upon Colonel Allen.

NEWPORT NEWS.—By the last accounts the regiments stationed here were on the qui vive, expecting an attack from General Magruder's force, which moved on the 9th of August to Great Bethel to the number of seven thousand. In the evening the rebels burnt Hampton, only giving the few families that remained there fifteen minutes to leave the town. It is said that several families perished in the flames. On the 8th General Butler paid a visit to Newport News, and presented to Colonel Phelps his commission of Brigadier-General.

TENNESSEE.—The Memphis Argus says: "We have just received information of a gallant exploit, in which a portion of our Memphis soldiers participated. Last Saturday night, Captain J. S. White, of the Tennessee Mounted Rifles, with a detachment of 200 men, composed of his own company, a portion of Captain Arri's (Hardeman county) Avengers, and Captain Price's Missouri Scouts, made a forced march to the Cairo and Fulton Railroad, and destroyed three or four hundred yards of the track across the cypress swamp, between Charleston and Bird's Point. The Abolition pickets were driven in, and the passage of trains on the road effectually stopped, as what could be torn up was burned. This road was very valuable to General Prentiss, and has been frequently used by him to convey marauding parties into the country. All the principal trestlework was guarded by Cairo troops, who, however, incontinently 'mizzled' on the approach of the Southern cavalry. This trestlework extends within six miles of Bird's Point, and one mile of Prentiss's masked batteries. The result of this gallant expedition was hailed with manifestations of joy by the citizens of that portion of Missouri, and at many places where previously the people, in consequence of their terror of Lincoln's thieves, dared not avow themselves Southern sympathisers. The cavalry found Secession flags flying upon their return."

ARKANSAS, Little Rock, August 5.—The Quartermaster of General Pearce's brigade, just down from the North-west, says that a scouting party of twenty-five from Churchill's regiment, encountered one hundred Federalists near Cassville, killing from seventeen to twenty-five of them. We escaped with the loss of four horses killed and wounded. Captain McClear, of Yellville, says the Federalists drove the Missourians out of Forsyth a few days ago, and robbed the place. The Missourians killed thirty-six and had one man wounded.

IOWA, Burlington, August 5.—The Hawkeye received the following special despatch this afternoon:

"Keokuk, Iowa, August 5, 1861.

"About 1,500 mounted rebels attacked 500 Union men at Athens, Mo., this morning, having two cannon. They were repulsed and fled, with a loss of twenty killed and many wounded, a number taken prisoners and sixty horses captured. The Union men, under Captain Colmore, were greatly aided by Captain Belknap's City Rifles and Captain Sample's cavalry, of Keokuk, on foot, using long range rifles. The battle lasted two hours. They were reinforced by McDowell's Division of 400 men, which left here this morning; 800 troops left this afternoon under Colonel Worthington."

THE ROMANCE OF WAR.

A letter from Atlanta, Ga., gives this incident of the battle at Bull's Run. A staff officer from Charleston, engaged in the battle of the 21st of July, says: I rode out the day after the battle to view the ground, and passed piles of dead in various positions. Under a large tree I saw a body lying, very handsomely dressed, with a fancy sword, and a handkerchief over the face. It attracted my curiosity. I stopped, removed the handkerchief, and saw one of the handsomest faces I ever met with of a boy not more than twelve or fourteen years old. His appearance and dress indicated high social position—probably he was a temporary aid to some general officer. To ascertain who he was I examined his pockets, and found a Testament, in which was written,

"James Simmons, New York. From his loving mother. My son, remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

I wished very much to take the body away, but I was six miles from quarters, on horseback, and it was impossible.

The Richmond correspondent of one of the Charleston papers relates the following:

"Among the prisoners is a noble looking and intelligent Zouave. I saw him on the field just after he was taken. While passing a group of our men, one of the latter called him some hard name. 'Sir,' said the Zouave, turning on his heel, and looking the Virginian full in the eyes, 'I have heard that yours was a nation of gentlemen, but your insult comes from a coward and a knave. I am your prisoner, but you have no right to fling your curses upon me because I am unfortunate. Of the two, sir, I consider myself the gentleman.'

"I need not add that the Virginian slunk away under the merited rebuke, or that a dozen soldiers generously gathered around the prisoner and assured him of protection from further insult.

A female was detected in Col. Guthrie's Kentucky regiment, at Racine, Ohio. She enlisted in Company D, on the 10th of May last, and has been doing soldier duty ever since. On all the long marches we have made, she has carried her musket and knapsack the whole time, and has never complained or lagged behind. On being closely questioned, she confessed that she was a spy and in constant communication with the rebels—that she is a member of the Knights of the Golden Circle, and through that Order, members of which she finds everywhere, she has found the means of forwarding letters to the rebels. She says she knew full well that the penalty for being a spy was death, and she is ready, whenever they wish to shoot her. She has been kept a prisoner ever since, and will be forwarded to Columbus for safe keeping. She poisoned one of the soldiers who discovered her sex. It did not injure him seriously. A confidant of hers, by the name of Williams, has been arrested, and will probably give some information of her.

An F. F. V., with rather more than the usual superciliousness of his race, rode up in a carriage from the direction of Alexandria, driven of course by his servant. Zoo-zoo stepped into the road, holding his bayonet in such a way as to threaten horse, negro and white man, stopped the carriage, and roared out, "Pickets." Mr. V. turned up his lip, set down his brows, and by other gestures indicated his contempt for such mud-sills as the soldier before him, ending by handing his pass over to the darkey, and motioning him to get out and show it to Zoo-zoo.

"All right," said the latter, glancing at it, "move on," accompanying the remark with a jerk at the coat collar of the colored person, which sent him spinning several paces down the road. "Now, sir, what do you want?" addressing the astonished white man.

White man had by this time recovered his tongue.

"What? I want to go on, of course. That was my pass."

"Can't help it," replied Zoo; "it says pass the bearer, and the bearer of it has already passed. You can't get two men through this picket on one man's pass."

Mr. V. reflected a moment, glanced at the bayonet in front of him, and then called out to his black man to come back. Sambo approached cautiously, but fell back in confusion when the "shooting-stick" was brandished towards his own breast.

"Where's your pass, sirrah?" asked Zoo zoo.

"Here, massa," said the chattel, presenting the same one he had received from the gent in the carriage.

"Won't do," replied the holder of the bayonet. "That passes you to Fairfax. Can't let any one come from Fairfax on that ticket. Move on." A stamp of the foot sent Sambo down the road at a hand gallop.

"Now, sir, if you stay here any longer I shall take you under arrest to headquarters," he continued.

Mr. V. grabbled up his lines, wheeled around, and went off at the best trot his horses could manage over the "sacred soil." Whether Sambo ever hunted his master up is not known.

A Wealthy Vivandiere—A Young Heiress goes to the Wars with the Fifth Wisconsin Regiment.—Company K (Dunn County Pinery Rifles) of the Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, that passed through Cleveland a short time ago, is composed wholly of men who were in the employ of an extensive mill-owner of Dunn county, named William Wilson. Wilson is immensely rich, worth several millions in fact, and fitted out the company himself. The men have been in his employ from boyhood up, and he appears to them almost in a fraternal light. His daughter, Miss Eliza Wilson, a young lady of rare beauty and accomplishments, was exceedingly active in forming the company, and when they went to camp she accompanied them, and has been with them ever since. She was with the regiment when they passed through Cleveland, and declares her intention to remain with them through the war. She has been chosen "Daughter of the Regiment," and beside being nearly worshipped by the rough soldiers from her father's vast "pineries," she is held in great esteem by all the officers and soldiers of the regiment. She is a great enthusiast on the war question.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. H. LANE.

Foremost among the energetic men who have fought against Southern arrogance and the Slave Propaganda is Brigadier-General J. H. Lane, whose persistent opposition to the Missouri Border Ruffians in the Kansas conflict first brought him prominently into notice. When Mr. Buchanan sent Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton to put down the troubles in that unhappy Territory, they found Mr. Lane one of the firmest and most active supporters of Constitutional law and order, which he enforced in his favorite style, and which, it must be conceded, was the only one his opponents could understand. Upon the breaking out of the present rebellion, he offered his services to Mr. Lincoln, and raised a regiment for the defence of the Capital. He has recently been appointed a Brigadier-General. He is about forty-five years old, and fit for any emergency.

It may be adduced as a singular proof of General Lane's practical mind, that he chooses the best men, regardless of country. His staff comprises the following:

Captain Luigi Navoni, of Nice, Italy, has been in the service for years, having served with much distinction both in the Crimea and the late Italian war. He wears decorations received from the English, Turkish and Sardinian Governments.

Lieutenant Guis Laiguanite, of Calabria, has seen military service for twenty-two years, and was recently with Garibaldi in Italy.

Lieutenant Achille de Vecchi has the reputation of being a good soldier. He was a captain of artillery at Solferino, and has seen service for thirteen years.

Lieutenant Luigi Marini, of Sardinia, is a man distinguished for his brilliant services in Europe, and has been a soldier all his life.

Lieutenant James M. Pomeroy is an American, a cousin of Senator Pomeroy. He has been an officer in one of the three months' New York Regiments.

COL. WM. P. BENTON,

Eight Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

Colonel Benton, who distinguished himself by his personal bravery at Rich Mountain, was born in Frederick county, Maryland, in 1828. At the age of eighteen he enlisted for the war in Mexico, in the company of mounted riflemen under Captain Walker. He was present at Contreras, Cherubusco, Chepultepec, and at the capture of the city of Mexico. On his return he re-entered college and finished his studies as a lawyer. He served as Prosecuting Attorney of Wayne county, Indiana, and was elected in 1856 as Judge of Common Pleas, Richmond, Wayne county.

When our present difficulties commenced Judge Benton at once prepared to enter actively in the struggle, and twenty-four hours after he commenced raising a company for the present war he was on his way with his boys to Indianapolis, where he was mustered into the service of the United States, his company being the first offered by Indiana. At Rich Mountain they captured the cannon on the right of the barn, Colonel Benton rushing on twenty feet in advance of his men. He exhibited the most marked gallantry. His fearless bearing encouraged his men, and made each one emulous of noble deeds. Colonel Benton is immensely popular with his men, who both love and respect him, and is an able and energetic officer.

BELLE AIR, OHIO.

Steamboats Conveying Troops and Munitions of War for the Federal Forces on the Great Kanawha.

Belle Air is a town situated on the Ohio river, three miles below Wheeling, Virginia. It is the eastern terminus of the Central Ohio Railroad, and the point for crossing the river connecting the Baltimore and Ohio with the above named railroad.

The place contains a population of fifteen hundred or two thousand inhabitants. Its importance, however, is owing to its eligible position for the rapid concentration of troops.

The sketch represents a fleet of boats lying in the river awaiting their quota of troops and munitions for the prosecution of the war on the Great Kanawha.

FOREIGN FLOATINGS CAUGHT BY THE WAY.

The late Emperor Nicholas of Russia was very fond, it is said, of whiskey toddy after dinner, and he used to make it himself. General X—— having one day had the honor of sitting to punch with him, and remarking that he had become more sociable than usual, asked his majesty what he thought of Poland. Instead of answering, the Czar began to brew a fresh bowl, and having cut a lemon in two, he squeezed it, threw it into the fire, and in a hasty, peevish mood said, "Thus must Poland be treated before any good result from it to my empire."

An unsinkable iron ship has just been floated by Mr. Langley, of Deptford Green. She is called the Briton, and is destined for Cape service. All the possible damage to any and every part has been arranged for, and if broken into bits and the bottom torn off, there will be life in the old sea dog still. The vessel, from the description, resembles those insects that are indestructible—cut them into any pieces, and each piece has full life in it, and seems, as it runs off on one leg, to relish the joke.

A story that is true, and is too good to be lost, is the following: A few days ago the good ship Atalanta, Captain Spratley, sailed from Southampton with a cargo of four hundred female emigrants, bound for Melbourne. The ship was two or three days in the Downs, and on the third day, just as the pilot was preparing to take his leave, off the Needles, it was reported to the captain that a great quantity of what sailors call "spun yarn," or "line line," but which really means rope, of about the thickness of a finger, was missing. This rope had been stowed away in the lower deck, where the berths had been fitted up. Search was made for it in vain, and, as the captain could not put to sea, on such a voyage, without the requisite supply, great was his rage and disappointment at the robbery. The passengers' accommodation was then minutely searched for traces of the missing rope, when the captain's wife discovered that the whole of it had been taken by the girls and worked up into crinolines. The consequence was that the captain had to delay his voyage, and send to Southampton for a fresh supply; but whether the young ladies were mulcted in the cost we are unable to say.

On Friday, the 5th July, there was a sale by auction at Newstead Abbey of valuable effects, formerly the property of Lord Byron. Many of the lots realized only moderate prices. The first printed copy of his early poems, with autograph, after a vigorous competition, fetched only nine pounds, Mr. Webb being the purchaser; and a pair of brass candlesticks, used by his lordship in college, were bought in by the same gentleman at three pounds and ten shillings. Lord Byron's punchbowl, broken, but repaired, and not perhaps intrinsically worth one shilling, realized three pounds and five shillings.

Prince Pierre Bonaparte, of Auteuil, has lately printed a little poem called "Sampiero," for private circulation, written originally in Italian, and translated by himself into French verse, both versions being given. It is a Corsican legend of war and patriotism, and shows the author to have inherited the talent for poetry possessed by his father, Lucien, who, it may be remembered, wrote an epic while an exile in England. M. Lamartine likens it, in a prefixed letter, to the "Jerusalem Delivered."

From Zara (Dalmatia), we hear of the death of another Louis XVII. in the following terms: "A man named Trevisan, a watchmaker by trade, died at Zara a few days ago, at the age of seventy-four. When the cholera was raging at Zara in 1836, this individual, apprehending an attack of the disease, confided a strange secret to a lady in whose house he lived, which, since his death, she has communicated to the authorities. This secret is, that Trevisan was no other than Louis XVII. After escaping from the cruel hands of the cobbler, Simon, he went to London, thence to Scotland, and subsequently to Padua, where a married couple, named Trevisan, gave him a document, stating that he was born in the year 1787, but the names of his parents are not mentioned in it. On his deathbed Trevisan made a similar statement to his physician. The authorities, in consequence of this information, caused a photographic portrait of the deceased to be taken, and an inquiry is to be made as to the truth of the facts alleged.

Pretended Fainting.—Madame de X. was lately dining with Madame Z. at Paris; the dinner had passed off pleasantly, when, on rising from table, Madame X. thought proper to faint. She was immediately carried to the bed of the lady of the house, where she remained immoveable. Her lacing was cut—salts applied to her nose—everything was useless—Madame X. still remained immoveable on the elegant bed ornamented with silk and lace. One of the lookers-on, more scandalous than the rest, pretended that this fainting was only an ingenious device for taking a siesta, and declared himself ready to go and faint upon a sofa in a neighboring saloon. The mistress of the house grew weary of being employed for so long a time about the same person; her ennui made her a little malicious, and, to spread a snare for the fair fainter, she simply said, "Do you know what makes her ill? Her hair is too tight—it must be untied." These words acted like magic. Forgetting everything, by an involuntary movement the fair invalid put both her hands up to her head to defend her false braids from an aggression which might reveal too much; and feigning to come to herself, "Where am I?" said she, in a feeble voice. "At my house," replied her friend, "but your carriage is here, and in five minutes you will be in your own?" Moral of the story—Pretended fainting requires real hair.

The finest and largest of M. du Chaillu's gorilla skins has at last been set up by a competent stuffer, and is now visible at the Geographical Society.

PRINCE NAPOLEON AT THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON.

PRINCE NAPOLEON, after a brief glance at the leading public works in New York, took the cars for Washington, and arrived at the capital on Friday, the 2d inst. He remained at the French Minister's on that night, and the next day he paid a visit to the President at the White House. He was most cordially received, Mr. Lincoln offering him the hospitalities of the Presidential mansion and alluding to the critical period of his visit. The Prince was equally cordial in manner, but was far more reticent in his expressions. The dinner which the President tendered the Prince was a social and pleasant one, politics as a general thing being avoided.

Mr. Seward in a great measure "did the agreeable," showing him that attention and courtesy due to his high position and the good will our country bears towards his. Our sketch shows the Prince and the distinguished guests of the President on the portico of the White House, enjoying the beautiful scene and the delicious music discoursed by the band in the grounds.

BEALINGTON,

Near Laurel Hill, Western Virginia.

THE victorious career of Major-General McClellan has rendered many places in Western Virginia memorable. From the first moment McClellan placed his foot upon Virginian soil he has met with an uninterrupted course of success. Bealington, the scene of one of these victories, is a small village, consisting of a few scattered houses and the inevitable "store," situated on Beverley Pike, and near Laurel Hill, which the "Pike" crosses. Our sketch shows the fortified camp of the enemy, together with their batteries, and the hill where the gallant Sixth Indiana regiment overcame the rebel enemy.

DISCOVERING A NEW REBEL BATTERY

At Messech's Point, near the Mouth of Back River.

THE activity of the Rebels on the Potomac and the confluent rivers is almost incredible. In one night some point hitherto defenceless is made to bristle with cannon, and the first intimation of its locality is a leaden messenger winging its way on its mission of death. Within a few days a party of the Tenth Regiment of New York Zouaves, while out scouting through a dense wood, came suddenly in sight of Messech's Point, and there beheld the Rebels at work upon an almost completed battery, which had sprung up with magical rapidity. They noted the location carefully and reported it. The new battery is situated on Messech's Point, near the mouth of the Back River, and is about twelve miles from Fortress Monroe. Whether the Rebels will be disturbed in their work by our flotilla on the Potomac is unknown, but from its present inactivity we should judge not.

THE OLD STATE HOUSE AT COLUMBIA, S. C.

THIS historical old building is described, as it appears at the present day, in a very graphic manner by the spirited correspondent of the World:

The State House at Columbia, South Carolina, can scarce be called an imposing structure. It is old, is the State House; in appearance half a century old, at least. It is built of wood—of wood that has not been painted very recently, and that is, par consequence, of a dingy white color. Almost as old-fashioned as it is old, the open-work iron staircase that makes a semicircular sweep to its battered doors is the only appurtenance of a modern look that this State House can boast. The architectural projection, supported by the columns whose bases are in the landing-place of this semicircular staircase, constitute the only deviation from a strict rectangle that this State House has allowed itself.

I do not know what occult motive influenced the builder in ordaining the thing to be so, but I do know that the State House, instead of facing the street boldly, sidles up to it in a very undignified manner. Before the work on the new State House began and the grounds about the old one were converted into a stone-yard, the Senators and Representatives approached their house of deliberation, in consequence of this sidling that I have spoken of, at the southern end, instead of at the front, and now the short cut through the stone-yard into them, in equal violation of all known rules of taste and convenience, slip upon the northern end of that dingy white building.

Traversing stonyard in legislative company, we, too, make the semicircular ascent and enter the battered door. Now we come upon a little branch passage-way that leads us over a yard or two of carpet into the large passage-way that runs in a straight line between the doors of the Senate Chamber and those of the Chamber of Representatives. Out of this passage-way open doors into the State library; into the Solicitor's room, where, mounted on high stools, sit the engrossing clerks, driving away, as if for dear life, at powder-ma bills, and wishing, in their inmost hearts, that the framers thereof had hearkened to the familiar injunction to "cut it short;" into a small committee-room; into a retiring-room for the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House; and upon a stairway leading to the gallery of the House. Preserved from the dust, in a glass case against the wall of the little branch passage-way that is opposite to and corresponds with the one we entered by, are the torn and battle-stained flag that the Palmetto regiment of the State carried through the Mexican war.

The new State House, as will be seen, is in strong contrast with the old one, which it will replace. It is nearly completed, and is really a splendid building. The material is granite of the finest quality, which is got out of the bed of the river, in many cases, in masses of over thirty tons. This is conveyed by a mule railway to the State House grounds and there shaped. The massive columns are turned out of a solid block. The interior is richly ornamented with columns, &c., in various colored marbles.

The new State House will cost a vast sum of money, but it will be an enduring monument to the taste and liberality of South Carolina.

COLONEL KENLEY, FIRST REGIMENT OF MARYLAND VOLUNTEERS, LATE PROVOST MARSHAL OF BALTIMORE.

COLONEL KENLEY, LATE PROVOST MARSHAL OF BALTIMORE.

COLONEL KENLEY was appointed Provost Marshal of the city of Baltimore, by General Banks, in consequence of the arrest of Colonel George P. Kane, charged with treason; he is well qualified by education and experience, by prudence, determination and fearless devotion to duty for the station, and his appointment in the present distracted condition of that city reflects great credit upon the foresight of General Banks, and his sagacity in selecting the right man for the place. Colonel Kenley was born in the city of Baltimore, about the year 1820, and had acquired, through the severe and arduous struggles of early life, a respectable position at the Baltimore bar. When the Mexican war broke out and the Maryland regiment was organized, he was appointed Major, and served with his regiment through the war with credit to himself and to the honor of his native State. Since that eventful period he has devoted himself to the practice of his profession, and the Baltimore bar has no member who is more highly esteemed for his estimable social qualities, or more respected for his legal ability by all those who have an intimate acquaintance with him. Having been commissioned by the War Department a Colonel in the First regiment Maryland Volunteers, now awaiting the orders of the Government at Baltimore, he was actively engaged in drilling and perfecting his command in military discipline, in which he has sustained a high reputation, when he received the order of General Banks to act as Provost Marshal of his native city. To the discharge of its responsible duties he devoted himself with all the energy and determination of his active mind, and to the satisfaction of all Union-loving citizens.

BLOCK-HOUSE, FORT CORCORAN.
Arlington Heights, Virginia.

Our sketch represents one of the block-houses erected by our troops on the Potomac line of defences. It is strongly and compactly built, and is the work of the Twenty-eighth New York regiment. It is pierced for muskets, and its only entrance is guarded by a chevaux-de-frise. Against anything but artillery it would enable its occupants to hold out a long time against a much superior force.

PRISONERS OF WAR,
Taken by the Federal Troops at Beverley, Western Virginia.

AFTER the battles which were won with such rapidity by the colonels under Major-General McClellan, in Western Virginia, a vast number of prisoners were left in the hands of the Federal forces, some six or seven hundred of which were marched into Beverley, recently the headquarters of General McClellan, and held there, together with a large amount of arms, camp equipage and military stores captured from the enemy, by a sufficient force of the Federal troops. The prisoners were in a wretched condition, and resolved to be slightly grateful for their treatment by our hands.

hundred and ten miles north-west of Richmond. The valley is a perfectly level prairie, surrounded by mountains, which rise to the height of from two thousand to three thousand feet. To the left of the Beverley Academy will be seen the new famous Rich Mountain, signalized at once by a great Federal victory and the death of the rebel General Garnett.

THE OLD EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT HAMPTON, VA.

The old church at Hampton, Virginia, which we illustrate, is supposed to be the oldest church, with one exception, in the United States. The town is situated on the left bank of the James River, about two miles from its entrance into Chesapeake Bay, and about seventy-six miles from Richmond, Virginia. It was settled about 1705, and has experienced some vicissitudes. Its population has not varied much for the last few years, being at the present time, we believe, about two thousand. The old Episcopal church was built of brick brought from England, and during the last war with that country it was occupied by the British troops as a barracks. The bell having been broken, it was replaced at the conclusion of the war, by the then reigning monarch.

In another part of this issue we have given an account of the total destruction of the village of Hampton, together with the Old Church. The voice of prayer will be heard no more within its walls, it will know no more vicissitudes whether of war or peace. Posterity will blame this wanton conflagration as an act of unmitigated barbarism.

Mrs. Hawker says, "It is quite a mistake to suppose the Arabs more than who have some partakers of their hospitality. As long as the stranger is under their immediate protection they respect both him and his property; but no sooner has he left their encampment than he is a lawful prey, and the former feels no other tie than is necessarily."

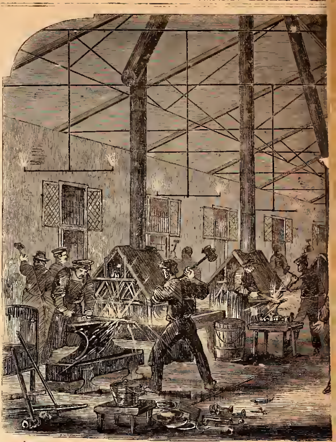
MOULDING BULLETS



FORGING IRON WORK F

THE WATERVLIET ARSENAL, TROY, NEW YORK.

ONE of the most important, as well as one of the largest, handsomest and completest of our public buildings, is the Watervliet Arsenal at Troy. It fronts the Hudson River, and its grounds, which are finely laid out as regards roads, &c., comprise nearly a hundred acres of land. The front view of the Arsenal gives but a faint idea of the immense extent of the buildings, which extend back over acres and acres of ground, affording separate houses for the various departments of manufacture of cannon and war munitions.

Two monstrous brass cannons face the walls near the entrance gate—trophies of victories won by the brave defenders of America's rights in the stirring days long time ago of revolutionary valor. These brazen-throated ambassadors of a proud monarch, bearing the insignia of British royalty, bristled upon the summit of Stony Point, when that formidable height was in possession of the red-coated troops. The exploit which made them American property was one of the most daring and dashing of many executed by our troops in Southern New York. Mad Anthony Wayne, the lion hearted, led the attacking force. The assault was made by surprise. The General had resolved to carry the place at the point of the bayonet, and the soldiers were commanded not to load their muskets. One craven who disobeyed that order was run through by his commanding officer, while in the act of ramming down a cartridge. Swiftly and in perfect silence, in the dark night, the sturdy soldiers clambered up the forbidding height. Not a word was spoken, none scarcely breathed aloud until the command to charge was given, and then with a wild hurrah the brave soldiers rushed forward, leaped over the parapets and closed with the astonished Britishers, with their own favorite weapon. The conflict was terrific but brief. Victory soon perched upon the American arms, and an achievement was accomplished which, though characteristic of its projector, took the county by surprise, and stimulated other deeds of dauntless heroism.

The Arsenal landing, or wharf, has for some time past been the scene of spirited business and excitement; sloops and boats are continually arriving and departing, loading and reloading, thus giving evidence of the great activity within the walls.

The blacksmith's shops, built of heavy stone, are fully employed at the present time manufacturing iron for the heavy gun carriages, shells, rough tools and various fixtures necessary to the work carried on in the Arsenal. The work-rooms are large, high, well ventilated, and supplied with every facility for labor. The power is usually furnished by water but when the fyls there is a condensing steam engine of an indefinite amount of horse power, which will run all the machinery of the works. What most attracts attention is an admirable mechanical contrivance to supersede the venerable trip hammer, which in olden days, with such an extravagance of clatter, flustered, promoted and shook the hairs of iron in every describable form. This is a pneumatic hammer, impressing so to speak the forces of the vapor and the atmosphere in the service of man, and by the simple compression and expansion of this volatile element bringing a power to bear upon the pudgeous shoulder that sends it down with resistless momentum upon the yielding metal. It, in fact, is a pair of powerful sheers of monstrous calibre, the upper blade swinging back and forth constantly upon a pivot. Be the substance of iron an inch in diameter or cut in two as smoothly as a woman would with her slender taper fingers slim of a piece of broadcloth, coming out after the contact almost burning hot from friction and the compression of its particles. Yet in mind better than the slow manual process of doing away the iron, so destructive or other power is dispensed.

The present capability of this shop is Timothy Hosmer, whose principal claim to public honor rests in the fact of having cured John G. Heenan, the man of muscle. Whose battering exploits have made him even more famous than if he were a gentleman, a hero and a scholar, like the Major over in the quarters. Heenan the elder is a stout built, good natured, happy-tongued man, possessing in a strong Celtish accent, and exhibiting the same exposure between the shoulders, and the same lack of diameter at the hips as characterizes his prodigious son. He is an enthusiast in the cause of Heenan the younger, whose feats dwells he recounts with manifest gusto. The Benicia Boy was like mine, in his native and possibly better days, a blacksmith in this shop, and exercised his sinewy muscles in his heavy work, until transferred to another establishment in the proprietorship of Uncle Sam, at Benicia, California, upon his enemies. In the latter place he first learned that stout arm and great nerves of endurance were not designed for any ideal purpose. He was never known for anything peculiar in the fighting line in West Troy, in fact there were dozens of rough and tumble rascallions who were reputed as his superiors. It took a fight in the California mountains to bring him out as a champion.

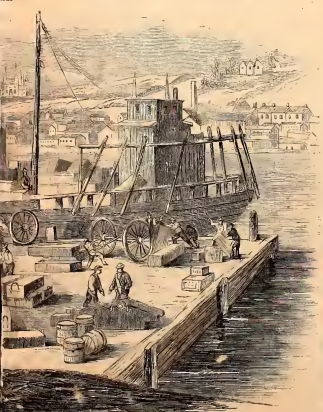
In the machine-shop the bullets are cast on the old plan by running the lead into moulds. But this antiquated method is quite superseded by a new method, the operation of which may be seen within a few feet of the shop. This new method of obtaining bullets was invented by Mr. A. G. Sayles, the foreman of the room.



AT THE TROY ARSENAL WHARF.

MAKING GUN-CARRIAGES.

ROCKETS AND OTHER MUNITIONS AND REQUIREMENTS OF WAR FOR THE UNITED STATES MILITARY AND NAVAL SERVICE.

The lead in round bars, about two feet long, is taken in the hand and held in an orifice, where a piece of the proper size is clipped off, and after passing under a weight to make it more dense, enters the mould, in which it assumes proper shape and receives still further compression, dropping out a perfectly formed hard bullet. Each of these operations is accomplished in an instant of time, the bullets falling out with an incessant "click, click," and the operator having nothing more to do than furnish it with lead to "chew up." The speed with which it runs may be inferred from the fact that it turns out eighty thousand bullets in twenty-four hours, and can be run at that rate continuously, day and night.

The "Shrapnel" shot is manufactured in a room over the machine shop. These are among the most terribly effective instruments of death used in the service, and always attract great attention from visitors as military curiosities. The Shrapnel shot is a round, hollow ball, the heart of which is filled with iron scraps, bullets and other missiles, melted sulphur being poured in to fill up the interstices and make them perfectly solid. Attached to the ball by strips of tin, which serve the purpose of binding it together, is a bicolor fuse, in which its great superiority over any other shell consists. This fuse is marked upon its face like the dial of a watch—the several figures indicating the length of time that will ensue between the instant of its being fired and that of the explosion. If it is punctured at three, three seconds, and if at seven, seven seconds will intervene before they burst. In firing a cannon, the artillerist first ascertains the length of range, and then the amount of time that will be required in making the flight. If it is four seconds, he will puncture the fuse at the mark four the moment it is thrown into the cannon, and at the very instant when the four seconds have elapsed the explosion will ensue. In thousands of experiments which have been made, there has not been a failure of a discharge at precisely the right instant. The fuse is a Belgian invention. Its superiority over the old style is very great. The length of time that would transpire before the explosion of a bomb with the ordinary fuse could only be determined by its length, and as this was very uncertain, it was a common occurrence for daring fellows to pick them up after they had fallen, and throw them over a parapet beyond reach of danger. Of course, when an explosion takes place the instant the shell falls, this is impossible. The Shrapnel shot are used only for field bombardments, the heavier shells being employed for siege attacks.

There are many dangerous and delicate operations performed in certain departments of the Arsenal, such as filling and driving signal rockets, filling cartridges for small arms, filling shells and canister, and filling spherical case shot with resin, all of which require delicate and careful handling. The moulding of brass fuse filings for eight and ten-inch shells, and the strapping of spherical case shot are operations both curious and interesting. A thousand other items which come under the head of materials of war are manufactured in the numerous departments of the Arsenal, all of which have their importance, but which we have not space to mention in detail.

A more thorough and comprehensive establishment cannot be found in the United States; it embraces the whole scope of manufacture which properly belongs to an Arsenal, and the work is carried on with a regularity and a military precision worthy of all praise. The various departments are superintended by competent foremen, the whole governed by a Commandant, assisted by Ordnance Officers G. C. Strong and G. T. Balch. To Lieut. G. C. Strong our Artist was greatly indebted for extraordinary courtesy and kindness, and we beg to tender him our warmest thanks for the same. We are also indebted to the Troy Daily Times for many of the facts and details of our description.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

CHAPTER VII.—EXTENDS THROUGH MANY YEARS.

On my arrival home, I found that my proud mamma still remained the passive, aristocratic lady who had waved me from her side through life with an idle, listless hand, and who had shown such abject subservience to the will of dear Mr. Timbs; but the house wore a different aspect—an aspect, to my mind, similar to that of the Parisian mousetrap. There was the same air of expectant decay about it, the same languor, the same hinted danger; and it seemed gaping for victims. Of course, I now know that to the great moral wrought in my own mind by strange incidents, this unpleasant change in the outward aspect of home was to be attributed. At that time, however, I was not a metaphysician.

Directly I began to regret that I had been born a rich little boy, I found my Golden Skeleton in the cupboard of my soul (that's poetical), and was haunted by it in accordance. Now, in the course of a long and chequered experience, I have noticed it as a peculiar characteristic of skeletons in cupboards, that no coaxing or threatening will draw them from their peculiar hiding-places, or cupboard, and that we are haunted by them, not because they dog our footsteps, but because we ourselves seek them out, and penetrate secretly to their proper sanctuaries.

My Golden Skeleton first revealed itself, I say, when I reached home. I was guided to it—as Queen Eleanor was guided to Rosamond's bower (assuredly not a bower of roses)—by a silken clue, to wit, the memory of Sister Elizabeth. The dark hints of the velveteeny young man had convinced me that even an embryo director of the Bank of England might be unhappy, and I somehow felt sure that Sister Elizabeth had been grossly libelled, perhaps poisoned, certainly ill-treated, somehow or other. I no longer felt pleasure in counting my imaginary yellow guineas; I no longer experienced pride at the idea of being a rich little boy, with wealth and comfort looming in the distance.

So I was ever hunting out my Golden Skeleton, and gloating my eyes on it, and trembling at it, and weeping with it, and visiting it by stealth. There was a mystery about my wealth, which I felt anxious to unravel. There were wicked people connected with me, whom I felt anxious to checkmate. There was a mystery in London, which (had I been big enough) I might have thrashed out of the jolly man. There was a mystery in France, which (had I been wise enough) I might have wheedled out of Monsieur Charles. As matters stood, I felt uncomfortable—and wicked. What did the velveteeny young man mean by the golden pump in Paris?

When I went to school—which I did in less than a fortnight after my return home—my Golden Skeleton went with me; there was no getting rid of it.

The school was a small one, and I was taken to it, as a matter of course, by Mr. Timbs. There were six little boys beside myself; and all six were both rich and very miserable. The school was situated some few miles from an English market town, and a great many more miles from anything like knowledge. The master was a retired clergyman, quite blind to the beauties of the classics, full of secresy, impudence and mock piety. But my story little concerns either schools or schoolmasters. Enough to say that I became no wiser and no cleverer than before. The society of the six little boys was by no means healthy. They were morbid, misanthropic little boys, who pined eternally for home, disdained to study, and were too unhappy to play. They left me a great deal to myself, after they had satisfied themselves, by repeated cross questionings, that I was not an impostor.

Some months after my arrival, however, there came another bigger boy to the school—a rollicking, frolicking London boy, full of fun and sports of all kinds. His name, he said, was Stirrups; his father was an eminent haberdasher; he, himself, was twelve years old. Between Stirrups and myself there sprang up a close friendship; though our opposite tempers might apparently have rendered such a friendship impossible. He was a merry, light-hearted boy, Stirrups. Thanks to him, I now and then forgot to visit my Golden Skeleton.

In the course of the first four years I passed at this establishment, I paid to home four visits of a fortnight each. I found few changes in my mamma, and I heard and said nothing of Mr. Timbs. My visits seemed to me like pure visits of form; made, not for the gratification of affection or any of the vulgar virtues, but simply for the purpose of reminding me that I had relations and friends of some sort.

Thus years passed on, till I was in my fifteenth year. Seven years had passed; but I still clung to my Golden Skeleton, more and more conscious that there was something wrong somewhere, and that I had an account to settle with somebody. The Parisian adventures never faded from my mind for a moment. I was still distinctly conscious of the influence of Mrs. Martha Timbs, Mr. Timbs, Monsieur Charles and the velveteeny young person. This was not all—matter of memory; certain incidents occurred, which served to remind me of my position.

"For instance?"

For instance, some sixteen months after my introduction to school, the face of the velveteeny person looked over the wall of our little playground. Stirrups and I were playing at marbles.

"Good morning!" said the velveteeny young person.

"Good morning, sir," I murmured, quite aghast at the sudden apparition.

"I hope you're as well as might be, Master Brown?"

"Quite well, thank you."

"I'm jolly glad to hear it. Mamma—how's she?"

I intimated that, so far as I knew, mamma was in perfect health.

"How do you like school? Hate it, of course?"

"I like it very much."

"Whop you?"

"No."

"Keep you short of victuals?"

"No."

"Teach you anything?"

"No."

The velveteeny man appeared satisfied, and, nodding his head, said again,

"Good morning."

"Good morning, sir," I answered; whereupon my visitor disappeared.

Regularly every four or five months the face of the velveteeny young man appeared over the walls of the playground, and a conversation like the above took place on each occasion. He was in the habit of bringing me presents. On one occasion he brought me a box of figs; on another, two pots of raspberry-jam. As I grew older, and as he grew older, his gifts increased in importance. From figs and jam he arrived at penknives with six blades and a corkscrew; from penknives to pistols; from pistols to miniature copies of the "Vicar of Wakefield" and "Robinson Crusoe."

I began to alter my opinion of the velveteeny young man. His gifts proved that he was not destitute of consideration.

One morning I was informed that a visitor desired to see me. This was rather an unusual circumstance, and put my poor little heart in a flutter. I was then in my fifteenth year—the Golden Skeleton still haunted me—and anything unusual caused me great excitement. The retired clergyman, bidding me put on a clean collar, told me that his orders were to prevent my receiving any visitors, but that he disobeyed orders on this occasion, because the person was a friend of the gentleman who had, in the first instance, brought me to school.

I was ushered into the parlor, where I found two gentlemen—a stout and tall one, a stout and short one. The short gentleman I immediately recognised as Mr. Loret, the pathetic professor of dancing and calisthenics. His companion was red faced, pink-eyed and clean shaven; his hair was cut very short, and the same might be said of his brown paletot; he wore a rusty-black hat, cocked jauntily on one side, and he smelt of beer. He had a habit of drawing himself to his full stature, frowning keenly, and biting the tips of the nails of his right hand.

"Excuse the liberty," said Loret, skipping up to shake hands. "The fact is, my friend and I are cultivating the arts in the neighborhood. I had no idea, you see, that you were here; but yesterday, as I saw you pass through town with the other young gentleman, I recognised you at once. Pray excuse the liberty."

"I am very glad to see you," I returned—"very glad indeed."

And I was, for I liked Mr. Loret amazingly, and his fresh innocence pleased me.

"And my friend," said Mr. Loret, pointing to the tall gentleman. "That reminds me. Vamps, Master Brown; Master Brown, Mr. Vamps."

I bowed. Mr. Vamps held out an unsteady hand, and asked me if I was all right, old fellow; an observation which he followed up by tapping his forehead sagaciously, as if to imply that they were cramming knowledge into me rather, and by afterwards biting his nails at me with a gloomy frown.

"Vamps," said Mr. Loret, "is one of those individuals on whom the world disdains to smile. Vamps is an artist; he has lungs and originality. What, then, prevents his making a position in the line, except frowning fortune? Nothing."

"Right," commented Vamps, in harsh baritones. "Fortune's a humbug."

"Truly—sadly true. Genius without friends is as hopeless as genius without lungs. Vamps's lungs has been tried, and not been found wanting; but friends he has not. Vamps, am I right?"

"You're always right. May you never want a friend or a bottle to share with him. The enemies of England's glory are managers; the friends of England's glory are Shakespeare and Fitzballoon. The stage, Loret, is stript of its brightest ornaments by managers."

"We talk to stone," cried Mr. Loret, as a bright thought struck him. "To the glorious mysteries of the drummy our young friend is a stranger. This, Master Brown, is Vansittart Vamps, one of the stars of the provincial firmament. You should see him, Master Brown, as a tyrannical father. Talk about heavy men! Pooh!"

As the conversation was getting rather unintelligible, I sat listening, and permitted Mr. Loret to have all the talk to himself. He went on to state that he and his friend were performing at the theatre in the neighboring town—he as leader of the orchestra; Vamps as a planet of tragic magnitude. Business was bad, he said; the common herd had no souls for music and the drama. They had the bad taste to disappreciate Mr. Vamps's lungs, and to underrate the powers of his (Mr. Loret's) fiddle.

"And how is Mrs. Martha Timbs?" I asked, at length.

"As well as ever; no better, no worse. I'm afraid that she mopes, Master Brown. But as I have broken up my humble roof, finding that calisthenics without dinners didn't pay, and spoilt the temper, we have parted. An admirable woman, Master Brown, but she has a temper of her own, and I'm afraid she mopes."

"How is Mr. Timbs?"

"Jolly as ever. A good hearted fellow, Timbs, but uneducated. I took the trouble once to examine his bumps. Benevolence, very large; philoprogenitiveness, immense; soul, I regret to say, lamentably undeveloped."

More conversation of this sort ensued. Mr. Loret was full of astonishment and admiration at my growth. In the end, he put two little pink tickets into my hand, and requested me to visit the theatre that evening, for the purpose of seeing Vansittart Vamps in the "Burglar's Nest." I said that I was afraid that I should not be permitted to avail myself of the treat; but I found that Mr. Loret had already persuaded the retired clergyman (whose creed, by the way, contained a direct condemnation of theatricals) to allow me to spend the evening in the way suggested. I was to take a friend, if I pleased, and I immediately fixed upon Stirrups. So it was arranged that Stirrups and I were to be at the Theatre Royal at seven precisely that evening, when Mr. Loret would find pleasure in conducting us to the boxes. Mr. Loret and Mr. Vamps then wished me good-bye, and respectfully took their leave.

At the appointed hour, Stirrups and I, attired in our best black clothes, stood at the door of the theatre, and were escorted through a dark lobby to the boxes. The theatre was a very small and a very cobwebby one; it was dimly lighted by flyblown chandeliers. Stirrups and I sat alone in a dull box, like a cave. The audience, which consisted of some thirty people in all, dropped in by twos and threes; until at last the lights grew brighter, and the orchestra (consisting of Mr. Loret, two lank young men with fiddles and a diminutive drummer) began to strike up. Then the curtain rose on scene the first—"The Nest"—which consisted of a piece of pasteboard, with a door cut in it, two wooden chairs, a table and a picture of a peer of the realm on the walls. Three dissipated-looking persons (generally described in the programme as "the Band") were carousing nothing out of wooden glasses. Some general conversation ensues. Music. Then enters "the Captain" (Vansittart Vamps), attired in seedy trowsers and a very large cloak, with brass clasps, and followed by a ragged gentleman, who tries to be funny, and only succeeds in looking hungry. The Band bids the Captain dispel these clouds of care, and drink of rosy wine; to which the Captain replies by shaking his head, biting his nails, and talking about revenge. Then, seasoned with much facetious dulness on the part of the ragged gentleman, ensues a dark consultation, during which it oozes out that the Captain has once been moral; that he was a confidential clerk in a large banking house; but that, being unjustly accused and convicted of forgery, principally by means of an envious clerk, he was transported. He is now desirous of revenging himself on the envious clerk, who has risen to wealth, and is now the head of the banking firm; and it is arranged that the Band shall break into the house, and rob the envious clerk of his "gi-old." The Captain then asks for Lily, his daughter; but it turns out the Band has not seen her for hours; whereupon the ragged gentleman goes in for comic pantomime, wherein he expresses his rapturous affection for the young lady. More consultations—more plotting. The scene closes with a dark soliloquy by the Captain, who is compelled into pathos ever and anon by the thought of his "che-ild."

Scene second was just commenced, when I felt a tap on the shoulder. Turning round, I met, to my surprise and fear, the blushing face and sly eyes of Monsieur Charles. He looked more old and worn than he had done on the occasion of our first meeting, but his blushes were still youthful, and bade fair to be perennial.

"Good gracious!" I exclaimed, rising hastily from my seat. He stretched out a soft, white hand, which I touched with my forefinger.

"Good evening," he said, quite familiarly. "You seem surprised to see me. You have not forgotten me, I suppose, young gentleman?"

"Oh, no."

"I thought not; I saw by your eyes that you recognized me. May I hope that you are well?"

"I am very well, thank you."

He saw also by my eyes that I was wondering what he did in that out-of-the-way theatre, and what he wanted with myself. He shrugged his shoulders, and nodded.

"I have come," he said, "on business."

"On business?" I repeated, glancing at Stirrups, who was deep in scene the second.

"Yes. Great changes have taken place, and you must come home immediately. You have a friend there, I see; shake hands with him, and come. I have already hinted the state of affairs up at the school, where I have been seeking for you."

"I will come immediately. Good-bye, Stirrups; they've sent from home for me. Don't forget me, you know, if I shouldn't come back."

Stirrups and I shook hands, after I had explained affairs; and Monsieur Charles sallied out into the dark street.

"Your mamma is ill," said Monsieur Charles, as soon as we were alone.

I am afraid that my countenance expressed more surprise than grief.

"She is seriously ill. Pshaw! let me be plain with you; she is——"

"Dead?" I cried, pausing anxiously, less from grief for her than from fear of death.

"Dead, or dying," observed Monsieur Charles, walking on. "It matters little which. Well, I will be plain with you, my good boy. Calm yourself; she is dying."

CHAPTER VIII.—THE SHADOW IN THE HOUSE.

At fifteen years of age one knows little of those sore griefs and trials which make strong men and women of us. It is a changeful age—the age of hope. Care passes lightly over it, and leaves few marks of its presence. It is busy castle-building in the air, and grief only serves to give color and outline to its cities among the clouds. Nevertheless, my life has been so solitary, and my solitude itself so peculiar, that my heart was more in tune with the harsh discords of life than are the hearts of the majority of boys at fifteen.

Little as I had communed with my mamma, little as I had learnt to love her, I could not restrain my tears at the thought that she was then, in all probability, lost to me for ever. There is in death, moreover, something so uncommon and so terrible to a mind so ignorant of its significance as mine, that the first strange consciousness of its near presence stunned me. It is possible that I could have borne a final parting with some equanimity, had not the thought of the churchyard intervened. There was something fearful in the knowledge that one's flesh and blood was wearing away to foul dust among the worms.

As Monsieur Charles had already intimated to the retired clergyman that my absence was necessary, there was no need for delay of any sort. At two o'clock that morning we reached the railway station of our village, and, hiring a coach at the inn, drove speedily to the house.

The door was opened to us by Susan, who was in tears, with red eyes and a choking voice. She immediately caught me round the neck, and kissed me, hysterically informing me that I was a wretched orphan. She had never borne any peculiar affection for mamma, but I have since noticed that maids-of-all-work and nursery-maids have a peculiar tendency to out-Herod the most extravagant griefs of afflicted households.

"Bah!" said Monsieur Charles, pushing her away with his white hand; "leave the little gentleman alone."

Susan pinched up her mouth to express contempt, ushered us into the drawing-room, and bounced away. In the drawing-room we found a stout, tall and rather pompous gentleman, dressed in black, and with a heavy watchchain.

"How is the patient, Doctor Pestilend?" asked Monsieur Charles, quietly taking a chair.

Doctor Pestilend glanced at me, shook his head with an appearance of fathomless sagacity, and said that it was a very bad case indeed.

"Is there no hope?"

"I regret to say, none. Since your departure this morning, our patient has gradually sunk. I begin to fancy that the brain is affected; she talks a good deal."

Monsieur Charles turned slightly pale at this, and glanced at me anxiously.

"And this, I presume," said the doctor, "is the—the orphan, the unhappy orphan?"

Monsieur nodded his head, and Doctor Pestilend condescended to look at me with a sympathetic movement of the eyebrows. I was seated upright in a cold chair, crying quietly, and wiping my red eyes with my cotton pocket-handkerchief. The old associations of home, mingled with the new consciousness of impending calamity, had a curious effect on me. Monsieur Charles seemed anxious and nervous. Ever and anon he glanced at me anxiously with his sky-blue eyes, as if fearful that I was getting too old to be trifled with.

Here Doctor Pestilend was called away to the patient by Susan.

"Cheer up, boy," said monsieur. "Such things as this happen every day."

I made no answer, but felt a longing to strike more fire from monsieur's cheek by a blow.

"Well, she was a good mother to you. Your tears are excusable; you are young; she was good to you, and you loved her. Is it not so?"

"It is so," I answered, curtly enough. He noticed my manner.

"I am afraid that you hardly do me justice. You consider me an intruder."

"Yes; I cannot help thinking so."

"Then you think nonsense. Listen. I am your mother's beloved brother; your uncle."

I was too bewildered to be surprised at anything or anybody. I simply said "Oh!" in a conciliatory tone of voice, and again subsided into reverie.

"You take the matter coolly, my dear nephew. Come, we are bound to be friends; shake hands."

I arose up, and took his white hand. He held it tightly, and looked me in the face.

"Proud fellows, look you, come to grief," he sneered, bitterly. "I know you hate me, though I don't know why; but I see it in those dreamy eyes of yours, young gentleman. Well, you must learn to like me, if only as a matter of policy. I am your only surviving relative, and, as a matter of course, have been appointed your guardian."

He released my hand. I said nothing, but made an inward resolve to get out of Monsieur Charles's hands at the first opportunity. At this juncture Susan entered, and summoned us to the sick room. We followed her, I with a heavy and nervous heart.

The bed-room in which mamma lay was dingily dusk, for the blinds were drawn. It felt hot and close. A woman, whose back was towards us as we entered, was busy at the end of the room.

"Hush!" murmured monsieur, as we noiselessly entered.

The woman turned hastily round, and I recognized the pale, worn face and wild eyes of Mrs. Martha Timbs. She glanced hurriedly at me, but avoided the eyes of monsieur.

"How fares the patient, nurse?" asked monsieur, in a whisper.

"Worse."

"You have never left her?"

"I have never left her."

"You have heard nothing?"

"I have heard nothing."

"Good. Is she awake?"

Mrs. Timbs nodded her head in assent, and monsieur stole to the bedside. Mamma was lying on her back, white as snow, with closed eyes, breathing heavily. Monsieur stole back.

"Is Doctor Pestilend in the next room?" he asked of the woman.

"He is."

"Good. You can leave us for a moment. Stay; has she asked for the boy?"

"Twice."

Mrs. Martha glided from the room, and monsieur again approached the bedside. This time mamma opened her eyes and looked about her.

"Is Charles here?" she asked, faintly.

"I am here," said monsieur, bending his head and touching her lips gently. With a convulsive effort mamma flung her arms round monsieur's neck, and kissed him in return. He would have stood upright again, but she held him close. He was quite pale now.

"I have been a good wife, Charles," she whispered. "Answer, have I been good?"

"You have," answered monsieur, turning paler than before.

"It is all over, dear; for I die, I die! I have been a miserable sinner. God forgive me!"

Monsieur bit his lips till they almost bled. There was a long pause.

"I love you, Charles, I love you. I am a sinner. God forgive me!"

She released him at last, and sank back exhausted. He came to my side.

"Do not cry, Henry," he said; "it is almost over. The brain is affected, and she rambles in her talk. It imports not. Hush!"

Mamma had opened her eyes again and was gazing vacantly around her.

"Where is the boy?" she asked, faintly.

He beckoned me to the bedside, and placed my hand in hers. She grasped it firmly with her hot fingers, and laid it on her beating heart. She was silent, though her lips moved once or twice as if to speak.

"It is all over," said Monsieur Charles, breathing hotly on my cheek. But the eyes of mamma opened, and her tongue moved.

"Is Charles here?" she asked, in a voice hardly audible.

"I am here."

He bent his ears to her lips, as if to listen.

"Promise, then, dear, to make atonement for our sin. Promise, while he is here to listen; promise before I die. You will set all right, will you not? Promise."

"I promise."

But in those sly, sinister eyes of his a lie seemed blackly visible.

"It is well," panted mamma. "God bless you, Charles. I have been a good wife. Promise again to save her, to rescue her, to give her her own—ay, and the boy too"

"I promise."

"Is the boy here."

I pressed her hand gently, with a bleeding heart.

"Tell him to kiss me."

I bent down and pressed my lips to hers. Monsieur Charles looked anxious; he moved to the door and beckoned somebody. He was not away for more than one moment, but in less than that time the dying woman pressed her lips to my ear, and said, hardly audibly,

"Bless you Henry; all will be well, dear. We have been miserable sinners, and I am not your mamma!"

And she fell back on the bed without motion. Her hand slipped from mine. A great mist swam before me. I saw the faces of Monsieur Charles, the doctor and Mrs Martha Timbs; then I fainted away. When I recovered I found that Mrs. Timbs was bathing my brows with cold water, while monsieur and the doctor stood at the bedside, whispering.

"All is over," said Doctor Pestilend. "Be comforted."

The face of Monsieur Charles was buried in a very white pocket-handkerchief.

"You are sure that she is quite dead?"

"Quite. The excitement overcame her. Pray be comforted."

The doctor's certificate was sound; mamma had died in the usual course of events, of decline. Monsieur was grievously cut up by the events. In less than a month afterwards I stood in the little churchyard of the neighboring village, Caverford, puzzling my brains over the following inscription:

GONE BEFORE.

SACRED
To the Memory of LOUISA,
Wife of
The late Henry Vanhommigh Brown, Esq.,
Who Departed this Life at Caverford,
On the 14th of March, 1845,
Aged 39 Years.
This Tablet was erected by her loving Brother-in-Law, Leonard Charles.

CHAPTER IX.—FACES NEW AND OLD.

I soon ascertained that Leonard Charles, the loving brother-in-law who raised the white stone tablet to mamma's memory, was legally appointed my guardian. Mamma had arranged this in a will, which had been drawn up many months before her death. So, at least, I was led to believe, by means of certain dark consultations which took place under the eye of papa's portrait. There was a hungry-looking lawyer, whom I loathed; there was Monsieur Charles, whom I feared; there were two seedy relatives from London, with whom monsieur appeared to be well acquainted. The will was read in full conclave, and I was handed over bodily to the tender mercies of the owner of the Parisian mousetrap.

But this state of affairs was so peculiarly repugnant to my juvenile mind, that I protested. I made bold to tell my uncle, as he called himself, that I had a cupboard skeleton, and that it was made of gold; in other words, that there was some wicked mystery connected with the disposal of myself and my property.

"Now, mark you," he said, blushing impudently, "those are rash words."

We were sitting alone together in the drawing-room, in the twilight.

"Yes, rash words," he continued. "Quarrel with me, and you quarrel with your bread and butter; keep friends with me, and you butter your bread on both sides. You hear?"

"I hear and understand. I wish I had been born a beggar."

"Imprudent, that wish of yours. Attend to me, nephew. Beggars are not at all enviable, in the first place; riches are enviable, in the second place; finally, it is not too late to take to begging, if you have any predilection for that sort of life."

"Words like those are easily spoken, sir; but they do not affect the matter in hand."

He laughed, mockingly. I somehow felt assured that he was desirous of picking a quarrel with me—why, I knew not and cared not.

"They tell me," I said, "that I have property coming to me. That is the case, is it not?"

"That is the case."

"And that it should come into my possession when I am twenty-one years of age?"

"I believe that such is the arrangement of your lamented mamma."

"Very well, then," I cried, recklessly, "sign me a receipt in full give it me, and let me go; I would rather not touch the money or property you speak of."

The effect of this absurd proposal was peculiar. My uncle's eyes flashed, his face turned white, and, coming close to my side, he shook his fist in my face.

"I shall do nothing of the sort. Take your own course and do as you please."

He took his white hand away and laughed, as if he had done something funny. I said nothing, but rose from the seat and walked from the room. As I approached the door I saw a dark figure flutter from it—the figure of a woman. It passed along the lobby, and I followed. I pursued it into small, dark pantry, when I came up with it, face to face, and ascertained that it was Mrs. Martha Timbs. She was excited and pale.

"I was listening," she whispered, grasping my arm. "I heard you."

I nodded my head, and said, briefly, that I had thought as much.

"The villain!" she was good enough to say.

I appreciated the expression.

"If you think it better to go—go. No harm shall come of it, and you shall have help. What will you do?"

"Go away."

"Very well; you shan't come to harm. Take this paper; friends are always to be heard of at that address. Write to it occasionally (address to me), for the friends wish to know where you are. All will come right in time, but the time has not yet arrived."

I promised to do as she requested, and pocketed the paper.

"When will you go?" she asked, abruptly, after a short pause.

"To-night."

"Very well. You shall hear from friends immediately. Have you any money?"

"A little—nearly three pounds."

"Here is something more. Pshaw! don't thank me: I have my own ends to serve."

I shook her by the hands, and her firm, cold face softened.

"God bless you!" she said, gliding away into the darkness, and leaving in my hand a little purse of beads, which contained three pounds in gold and some loose silver.

We went to bed early in those sad times. It was about nine o'clock when I retired to my little room, took the carpet-bag which I had brought with me from school, and began packing into it all my available property. That done, I laid down on the bed in my clothes, waiting until the members of the household should all be retired to rest. At about ten, monsieur knocked at my door, wishing me good-night through the keyhole, and I answered him quite cheerfully.

My notions as to what I should do in my extremity were as shadowy as the fear which suggested flight. I had some thoughts of seeking the protection of Mr. Loret. I had other thoughts of going on board ship, and becoming an admiral. I had still other thoughts of searching out the velveteeny man, and wringing his secret from him forcibly. Anything, I decided, was better than my Golden Skeleton; but I did not reflect at the time that I was bound to take my Golden Skeleton with me.

Strictly speaking, it was not my moral consciousness of evil so much as my desire for excitement of some kind that encouraged me to fly from the home-cupboard, where my Skeleton had originally been kept. My days had been so lonely and my heart so solitary, that I looked upon a fight with the world as an intoxicating draught to drown care.

It was pitch dark when I crept down stairs with my carpet-bag in my hand, and stole along the dimly-lighted lobby towards the front door. Passing by the drawing-room door, which was on the jar, I heard voices.

"I say again," said the voice of Mrs. Martha Timbs, "that no harm shall come to him."

"And I say again, you goose," said the voice of Monsieur Charles, "that no harm is meant to him. Nevertheless, I have ends to serve."

"You villain!"

"Bah! Don't be aggravating. Come, kiss me."

"I wish that my kisses could poison you; that my lips could curse you."

"You silly little woman, come here. There, feel my pulse. It beats coolly, Martha. Well, then, do you know that, if you are so obstinate, I shall be compelled to kill you."

"Kill me!" in a scornful tone.

"Yes."

She laughed, mockingly, and I crept down stairs. Two moments afterwards I had reached the door, closed it behind me, and stood alone under the starless night.

I walked along the road in the direction of the village. Something led me towards the churchyard where the dead lady had been buried. The wall was low and narrow, and I crawled over it. As I did so, I became conscious of the sound of footsteps behind me. I listened, and they ceased. It was dark, but I found out the grave by its locality, and bending my eyes close to the tablet, I made out, or fancied I made out,

"SACRED
To the Memory of——"

A dark figure sprang up from behind a tombstone, and almost frightened me into fits. It came close up to me, till I recognised the velveteeny person. I was not at all sorry to see him, in spite of the mystery which attached itself to him.

"I knew you'd do it," he said, triumphantly. "How are you?"

I told him that I was perfectly well, physically, but that I was rather uneasy in mind.

"Of course you are!" he cried. "I've had my eyes on you; they've been humbugging you."

"I'm afraid they have."

He walked up to the tablet and kicked it savagely, growling aloud.

"I'm going to make pills out of this tombstone to choke them with. They'll find it almost as tender as that inscription. You've read it, I suppose?"

"Yes"

"And your opinion is—'I know that it's all stuff and nonsense.' You're right. Sacred, indeed! It ought to be ashamed of itself for deluding the innocent. Never mind!"

He growled the last words slowly and decidedly, impressing me with the belief that the "never mind" comprehended a final decision that matters should be set right.

"Shall I tell you what you've done? You've done just what he wanted you to do. You quarrelled with him, packed up your things, and ran away. I knew you'd do it, and have been waiting to see you. Now, then, where are you going?"

"Anywhere."

"No, you don't, if I can help it. Look here! In the first place, you ain't afraid of me, I hope?"

"Not a bit."

"That's right. I'm not much to look at; but it serves my purpose to do you a good turn. Say you trust me, and give me your hand on it."

I said I trusted him, and I gave him my hand on it immediately.

"Come along, then."

He led the way from the churchyard, and I followed him. I'm afraid my trust in him was not so great as to prevent me from feeling any qualms in his company. But I reflected. I came to the conclusion that nothing else could be done under the circumstances, and I had every hope, at the time, of getting out of the velveteeny person (whose fault seemed candor) the mystery of my Golden Skeleton.

"Don't be afraid," said my companion, after we had left the churchyard behind us. "They won't miss you till morning; and what is more, I fancy they won't care to go very far in the search for you. How's Mrs. Timbs?"

This question reminded me of the conversation I had heard as I passed the drawing room. I described to him the nature of that conversation. He gnashed his teeth, but said nothing.

After a pause, he spoke, in an accidental way,

"I knew Mrs. Timbs years ago, and liked her. I know her by sight at the present time, and pity her. You see, Master Brown, her husband is a brute and a humbug."

"I never liked him."

"Like him! I should think not. He'd murder his own baby, if he had one, to make its blood into black puddings."

I hereupon entered into a description of the scene I had witnessed that evening when Timbs had struck his wife a blow. The velveteeny person winced, and grinned savagely.

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Paris was reached, and though late in the day Madeline and Lucille took the little stage that was to set them down at the cottage of Rose Perre, and at each revolution of the wheels the agitation and anxiety of both increased. Neither spoke, but with their hearts reflected in their eyes looked alternately on each other and the landscape before them. At length the little village was in sight. They looked from the window, each expecting, though darkness was veiling objects from view, to see the one their whole thoughts were bound up in start up before them from the clumps of turf and wild thyme, with which the village on all sides was fringed. At length the coach stopped; it was before the cottage of Rose Perre, and a woman stood in the entrance in deep mourning, as if expecting them. It was Rose Perre, and her gloomy brow and moist eyes told that they had come, not as they had anticipated, to the home of happiness. A faintness came over Lucille as she said, in a low tone,

"My child! ask her for it, Madeline."

"Let us enter the cottage," said Madeline, in the same tone, "it is night, she may be in bed."

"Ah! but the woman is in black," said Lucille. "The house seems almost tenantless; death has been busy within its walls."

This was uttered in a hollow voice. As she entered, the mother's high raised hopes vanished. She glanced round, then sank on a chair, for the glance told her that the woman was sole tenant of the poor habitation.

Madeline, little better in spirit, tried to utter words of consolation.

"Dearest Lucille," she said, "do not despair; this is unlike you, to meet misfortune midway." Then turning to Rose, she added, "Have you received a letter? did you expect us?"

"Yes, madam," she returned, sobbing; "and my heart is broken at the mischief I have done. That lady is the original of the beautiful picture which Birdie called her mamma."

"Yes, yes!" said Lucille; "but what of Birdie? She lives—say she lives, and all else will be forgiven you."

"She lives," said Rose Perre; "yes, she lives, and is well cared for, but——"

Here she was interrupted, for Lucille slightly screamed, and every trace of color quitted her cheeks and lips, and she fell back inanimate. She had fainted; her sorrows had been too intense for a moment's inaction; but the two words, "she lives!" had caused such a sudden revulsion that it deprived her for a time of life, proving that joy is more powerful in its operations than the severest grief. It was some time before she recovered. When she opened her eyes, Rose Perre was bathing her hands. A moment she looked wildly round, and then exclaimed, firmly grasping the hand that held her, "You said she lived; at once tell me if your words had truth in them, deceive not yourself, by deceiving me, for I must know it. That mourning dress, why do you wear it?"

"Alas! madam, I am a childless mother, like yourself, with but this difference, that you may once more press a mother's kiss on the lips of your child; but mine, my little Blanche, sleeps with her father, the sleep that neither father nor child will awake from."

Lucille saw in a moment the depth of the woman's grief. She pressed the hand she had grasped, to her lips. "Pardon me," she said, "absorbed in my own sorrow, I forgot all else; but you have a mother's heart and can feel for mine; compose yourself before proceeding further, I can wait with firmness now I know of my child's welfare."

Rose piled up her turf fire, and drew Lucille's chair close to the hearth, and with sundry articles stopped up the broken panes in the window to keep out the autumn wind, which whistled sharp and fitfully through them; for Lucille shivered as the cold blast brushed over her lifting unceremoniously the light curls from her forehead, and she shivered more, when she thought that during the inclemency of the last winter her child had been exposed to its piercing blasts.

Rose Perre's tale was soon told; and both Lucille and Madeline shed tears for her, as well as for their own bereavement, and when it was ended, the former asked if they could be accommodated for the night beneath her roof.

"It will be poor accommodation, madam," replied Rose; "but the children's bed still stands there, which is at your service; I have not had heart to take it away, for Birdie begged so piteously that it might remain. Poor child! she used, after Blanche's death, to bury her head in the pillow and sob herself to sleep; and a sore illness she had on that bed, brought on by sitting on the cold grave, and when she quitted, leaving her cloak on it to keep poor Blanche warm. Ah, madame, you will go to the churchyard, I hope, if only to see the rosetree and forget-me-nots blooming so luxuriantly on the little sward, all planted by the tiny hands of Birdie."

Lucille wept copiously at this trifling incident of her child's affection and sensibility; and as that child had so often done, she buried her head deep in the poor, small pillow, and sobbed herself to sleep.

Madeline stretched herself beside Rose Perre, but her busy mind vainly sought repose; her ardent spirit wanted to be up and away on the path she had determined to pursue. She had vexed to find no resting-place till the child, lost through her uncontrollable illness, was again restored to its parents; and she determined as soon as she had seen Lucille in England and joined Batiste, together they would commence a new search with what she hoped now a clue to guide them.

Lucille dispatched a short letter to her husband, telling him in as softened terms as possible the result of her journey, and that she should remain a few days beyond the prescribed time from England. Indeed, the spot she was on had charms for her, even more deeply linked with her sympathies than her chateau, or the home of her childhood; for it was here her child had first began to think, and young as she was, to feel desolate in the midst of life and bustle; it was here she had mourned the loss of companionship, and oppressed with sickness, had had none but strangers to bestow the charitable mite and scanty aid upon her infant wants.

Lucille walked to the churchyard with Rose, who pointed out the grave of her husband and child. The grass was thick and green upon it, and Lucille knelt beside it, and with a silent prayer rested her forehead on the spot she fancied Birdie's had so often touched before; then plucking a rose and a handful of forget-me-nots, she placed them reverently in her bosom, saying in a low, choked voice, as if speaking to herself, "They are the last relics I shall ever see of my darling. They shall not leave me while I live, and in death they shall go with me to the grave."

Madeline was weeping silently near—perhaps the same thoughts were passing through her mind, for she kissed the blossoms she culled, and hid them in her dress.

When Lucille had recovered sufficiently to speak on other subjects, she said to Rose, "A monument must be erected here to the memory of your husband and child, Madame Perre. It will be a feeble tribute to the just and good. It is the only acknowledgment I can bestow for the kindness shown to the being he thought forsaken. And you, Madame Perre—what can I do to serve you?"

"Nothing," returned Rose, with a burst of feeling, "unless, madam, you will take me with you, and let me find a home in your home. Longer I cannot stay in this place. The cord is broken to shreds that bound me to it, all near reminds me of what I had, what I have lost, and that nothing remains to me to lose, and when you depart another void will open in my heart. Madam, if you would do aught for me, let me be your servant."

"Oh!" said Lucille, with a swelling heart, "you have spoken my own wishes, wishes I feared to speak, thinking you would not leave your country. But, Anette, an old and valued servant is compelled to leave me for a time, for the cold damp climate of England has so injured her health, that unless she goes to her own sunny valley for a time there is little hope for her recovery. Will you come with me, then, and be as she has been to me, a humble friend and companion?"

"Joyfully," replied Rose; "make me what you like, I will be grateful if allowed to be near you."

The compact was settled between them, and Madeline and Lucille went to Paris to spend a couple of days with Emile, to whom the latter told her wishes in regard to the monument to be placed over the grave of Jean Perre, and the little gentle girl, who had been to Birdie her all of childish comfort, while she lingered with her in her short pilgrimage.

Rose in the meantime was to prepare herself for her journey, which she performed with alacrity, her hopes of comfort being fixed on a new home, a new country, and views to which, till within a few days, she had been a stranger.

A few days after they landed in England. D'Almaine with folded arms awaited them on the pier; he hastened to receive Lucille, who, with widely different feelings, met him, to those she had parted from him. He drew her arm within his own.

"Hope then was fallacious, my wife," he said, in a low tone, pressing her arm close to his side.

"It has deceived us," she replied; "but I am happier than when racked with doubt. Our child lives, and if appearances can be trusted, is with those who will be kind guardians to her, but I fear to us she is dead."

The count groaned. "It is a sorry prospect," he said, after a pause: "I had hoped to have kept the Batistes near us, but we shall shortly lose them; by degrees thus drop our friends from us."

"I regret their loss," said Lucille; "but they quit us in our own cause. May Heaven direct their course!"

"Amen!" he responded fervently.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The passage of five years often brings great changes, but it had brought but few comparatively to Lucille: all was in the same mysterious doubt concerning her child. Madeline and her husband were still on their vain pilgrimage, and with the exception of being in straitened circumstances, and Lucille's health gradually declining, there was no change with the D'Almaines worth naming. To a large a sum spent in the hope of recovering their child had much more rendered them. Their country had been sold, the plate and jewels turned into cash, which had also vanished, and the last year of her father's pecuniary well-be ing had passed into the hands of Lucille.

It was morning, and Rose Perre, now a steady matron, and the only domestic they could be called so—for she watchfully relieved Lucille of every duty—was just removing the breakfast cloth. Lucille was sitting in an easy chair, her elbow on its arm, and her head resting on her hand. She was still beautiful, but much thinner, pale, with an unusual brightness of eye, with a languor about her extremely touching, as it impressed the soft shiler with an idea of her fragility. D'Almaine entered from the next room, and had gently laid his hand on her cheek before she perceived him.

"In deep thought as ever, dear Lucille," he said, in his generally lively, careless manner, "our small housekeeping causes more long and serious cogitation than any royal household in Europe."

"Unbosom all that," she replied, attempting to smile, "for I am in a humor to be sympathetic to-day."

"Suppose," he returned, with a perceptible start. "The dreadful grow will never do that. Promise them, for most assuredly some day they shall be paid."

"I have long promised. I fear we cannot do so much longer," replied Lucille; "but dearest Jules," she added, cautiously, "I wish I had power to keep you more at home, for unknown to you, because you will not be at the trouble of thinking, a great portion of our small resources are spent in pastime."

"Oh, you mistaketaste, dear Lucille," returned D'Almaine. "Brought up in retirement, you know so little of life, of money or its magic, that could I form my mind to sit over my own fireside for ever, our expenses would not be decreased, for my waste would be heavier, and do but imagine you see me sitting before you week after week and month after month, brooding over irremediable misfortunes. You would grow weary of me, and I am sure I should of myself end of life, and I was going to say of you. You had better persuade me to turn preacher at once; but seriously you think too much on these stupid money matters, leave them to themselves awhile till something better shows itself; we have had nothing but losing cards in our hands of late, when next we shuffle them who knows but we may have our share of trumps?"

"But in the interim, what shall we do, Jules? You note I gave you an hour since was our last."

"Our last!" He hesitated, then added "Well, our money will soon cease to be a burden to us, for every penny of the note is doomed. There now, be cautioned, kissing her, "you are going to expostulate, thus let me stop your lecture till our next meeting. Good-bye, my dear, do not despair, for every cloud, however dark, has its silver lining."

Lucille's face, which had sunk on her hands, remained there long after he had departed. "How thoughtless he is!" she said, musingly: "pressed and sick; sadly needing rest and quiet and unbeserving, yet will he not listen a single minute to my pressing entreaties. And if he did," she added, with a sigh, "I know not that it would render our emergencies, for he is too proud to eat a favor, and so unattuned to ever method to relieve our circumstances, that if they depended on his exertions they would fail. On myself, then, must depend the trial. Something must be done by which way to turn or what to do upon I cannot determine."

She opened her desk and took out her little purse. They were alike sad, especially when before her, and hastily put them back again, and, with a long, deep drawn breath at the calculation, with quivering lips and clasped hands she bowed her head and leaned herself back in the chair to strive some plan to relieve their necessities. She thought of her husband's unfortunate love of drawing, but she had confidence in neither; and after many a review of them, hastily brushed from the temples the dark curls which the throbs were not equal to the task of a teacher. She was in the same position she had been when Lucille left the room, and as they were broken in upon by a rather sharp rap on the hall door. She started, and, recollecting herself, put her hair back into order, and approached the room door to warn Rose; she could not see any one, but the rap was repeated, and, thinking it the tones of which seemed familiar to her, demanded to see her.

"Is Mrs. Lucille Devereux at home?" he said, in the kind friend of her father, the manager of the Opera-house, existed her with the familiarity and kindness of an old friend.

"I am glad to find you alone," he said, when they were seated, "for had you been at home I should have insisted upon your being named my errand."

"Ah!" she replied, smiling, "and what can be the errand to the wife that the husband cannot be the bearer of? Surely you do not, Mr. Lucille, and madame, I have come to ask; and really it is so profound a one that I almost fear to put it to you, lest you should consider me impertinent."

"Pray proceed, sir," said Lucille, "for I promise not to be too implacable if you commit yourself, being assured that it will not be done intentionally."

"Thanks for your encouragement. I will at once to my errand. I engaged a lady very highly, two days since, to appear in a character I conceive she was to have made her debut; but last evening I had a note from her requesting me to excuse her appearance, and would appear at Covent Garden on Monday, in the very character she was to have appeared in at my theatre. Now, madame, I have, you perceive, no time to make my wrongs known to the world. I am therefore, under the circumstances, left to be ridiculed, or suffer delicacy for it. I have therefore, on the strength of mine and my father's friendship, come to ask you, and if you come to you, to ask for your assistance."

Mrs. Lucille looked at him in unfeigned astonishment. "How can that possibly be? How can I assist you in this emergency?"

By appearing there, madame," he said, "in a few songs or four songs in Italian, both of which you are perfectly competent for."

"I appear before the public as a singer?" said Lucille. "Monsieur, you do indeed jest."

"On my honor, madame. If you will so far oblige me, I shall be grateful to you forever."

"But my husband Lucille.

"Is admirable," said he. "Your consent is all I require. You know what I had to say, and I am sure you will not refuse me when it was deemed so a considered a sphere."

But sorrow, madame," he said, "the voice so much as it will gain the eye and complexion, even more than time, and I have tasted many of the luxuries you have enjoyed in your native land."

"Your beauty has certainly not the freshness, nor your form the graceful roundness of your accomplished sister," said Lucille, "and if bloom has added to the interest of your appearance, and your voice, when last I heard it, was not as full and rich as hers, I shall incline to consent to your request."

"But my husband," said, thoughtfully, without noticing his compliment. "I fear to grant your wish without his knowledge; his acquiescence in my appearing on the stage, that his consent would never be obtained."

"What do you fear him to return?"

"This evening," she replied; "but to-morrow he goes to Lord Llewyn's for a week."

"Then why need he know aught about it?" said the manager. "Is he not the husband to whom you have promised to obey? Why need the name be changed? It will only please him, my father tells me, to see his name in the bills, and I am sure that Signora Vestali, the first singer of the day, will be pleased to have her name in connection with that of the Signora Devereux, and will, next season, be glad to engage the first singer of the day, and will, next season, be glad to engage the first singer of the day, and will, next season, be glad to engage the first singer of the day
