A SAGACIOUS STATESMAN.

One of the ablest and most competent opponents of the war between England and Russia, is Mr. Bazoer, M. P. for Manchester. Mr. Bazoer is a Quaker, and by his profession a lover of peace; but he is likewise a politician and a public man, and as a shrewd and sagacious politician, and a close and cogent reasoner, he perceives all the lasting evils which must accrue to England from the prosecution of the war. With his colleagues, Cobden, he has been decried, sneered at, and peculiarly berated for sturdily sounding his protestations for peace; yet both politicians, and all men, undaunted by the clamor of the clamorous, the obloquy heaped upon them by the press, have unfeelingly pursued their straight path, warning their countrymen of the coming difficulties, and counselling her to abandon the fatal folly as possible. The influence of Russel and other reason, reiterated firmly in the midst of declamatory and inflammatory appeals, is beginning to be felt. Correspondents from England on all sides agree, that while the debtor are preparing on a gigantic scale for the eventualities of a new campaign, the people, upon whom the burdens of the war weigh heavily, are anxious for peace. We perceive that Messrs. Cobden and Bazoer are prophets, by this manifestation of public opinion to drive their arguments home, and to lay before the constituency some familiar illustrations of the various results of wars undertaken for the establishment of arbitrary and chimerical lines of demarcation, and carried on with reckless prodigality and frightful loss. In a speech recently made by Mr. Bazoer at his chosen borough the Manchester Institution, he alluded, by way of contrast, to the position and policy of the United States, and to our steady increase in every element of prosperity, under the beneficent operations of peace. Said Mr. Bazoer:

"Many of you have relatives or friends in America. There is a young nation has a population about equal to ours in those islands. It has a great internal and external commerce. It has more tonnage in shipping than we have. It has more railroad than we have. It has more newspapers than we have. It has institutions more free than ours. The slavery of the South excepted—and which is no fruit of its institutions, but an unhappy legacy of the past. It has perfection in the affairs, as it occurred on board an American ship. The Captain afterwards paid the finest compliment to the Mechanics'
