PREFACE

THE idioms brought together in this volume were chosen from a large collection of similar phrases with a view to present in a useful shape a number of sentences in bonâ fide kuan hua, each containing one of those common expressions of every-day life which are generally troublesome, but should certainly be familiar, to all students of colloquial Mandarin. Two thousand sentences were originally set aside for publication, but these were finally reduced by one half, and the volume interleaved, to enable any student to add a like number taken from his own particular experience and more adapted to his own peculiar wants.

By confining the present collection to kuan hua, many neat and expressive idioms in the Peking dialect were cast, though reluctantly, aside; for while pronounced to be kuan hua by a northern teacher, they were rejected as patois by natives of An-hui and Ho-nan to whom the question was referred. The following are two examples taken at random:—

We two don't agree      我們倆上不來
This road is impassable      這個道兒走不開

The alphabetical arrangement was adopted for the sake of convenience, and is purely arbitrary, for many sentences would stand as well, and perhaps better, under other headings; but the object was to keep as much as possible to Saxon verbs which are more likely to come uppermost in the flow of ordinary conversation. It is not, however, supposed that every sentence as it now stands will be found of sufficient value to commit to memory, but only that each one contains a useful idiom which was actually heard in conversation, and may be adapted as circumstances require; moreover, that as all trace of dialect or local taint has been carefully eliminated, the speaker will find himself on common ground with educated natives from any one of the eighteen provinces.

And here I may be allowed to add that if typographical errors are conspicuous by their absence, this desirable result is due to the care and accuracy of Messrs. Jamieson and Budler of H. I. M. Customs' Service, each of whom kindly gave every proof a separate and patient revision.

H. A. GILES.

NOTE

---

The phrase 連一隻船我都搭不上 I can't hire a single boat occurring under Hire, is used north of Shanghai with the meaning here given; but in the south the sense would follow more closely the primary meaning of 搭 and be—I can't get a passage in a single boat—implying that all the boats were full.
