FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 261—VOL. XI.] NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 24, 1860. [PRICE 6 CENTS,

Our Position.

IN our pages this week we illustrate passing events of great and stirring interest, both in the South and in the North—the Seceding movements in the South and the scenes in the Presidential campaign in the North. We claim to be strictly and entirely neutral in our course of Journalism, chronicling events as they transpire in every section of the country, without bias and without feeling; adhering closely to facts, but advocating neither one side nor the other of the disturbing element of partisan politics.

In pursuing this course we do not lose one jot of our independence; we truckle to neither party, neither do we ask favors of any party. The necessity of our position is, that our circulation must be universal—our expenses are so vast that the patronage of one class, however liberal, would be but as a drop in the bucket in the way of remunerating our outlay.

Our aim is to produce a paper which shall be so entirely free from objectionable opinions or partisan views of national policy, that it can be circulated in every section of the Union and be received in every family as a truthful exponent of facts as they occur, and a reliable Illustrated History of the time in which we live.

Bearing this aim steadily in view, we do not SWERVE from our design. Our Artists and Correspondents furnish us with illustrations and descriptive matter of every event of importance, which we transfer to our pages, and we must not be held responsible if our pages illustrate scenes of which the actors therein are ashamed. We are Historians, and represent the World as we find it, without fear, favor or prejudice, confident that, while we persevere in that course, FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER will be welcome in every section and in every home in the United States.

THE PALMETTO FLAG OF CHARLESTON, S. C.

A Fact for our Advertisers.

WE publish below two letters which we have just received. They will show that the vast circulation and the widely extended influence which we claim for FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER are simple facts, without exaggeration. There is no advertising medium in the world where so extensive and varied a circulation can be obtained as through the columns of this journal.

SECESSION ORATORS ADDRESSING THE PEOPLE OUTSIDE OF THE CITY HALL, CHARLESTON, S. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 3.

New York, November 14, 1860.

FRANK LESLIE, Esq.

DEAR SIR—I inclose an order received from Lima, Peru, which shows that your paper is read and has an influence even in distant lands. You may make what use of it you see fit.

HENRY C. SPALDING.

Lima, Peru, October 22, 1860.

MR. HENRY C. SPALDING:

DEAR SIR—You will please deliver to Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. twenty dollars' worth of the first Part (or Volume) of Gleason's Publishing Hall, now being issued from your establishment.

Yours, truly, JOSE RAZUR.

During the past year Mr. Henry C. Spalding has advertised in our columns to the amount of over one thousand dollars, and so entirely satisfied is he with the result of the influence of our paper, and more especially as a United States paper, that in South America, &c., that he has commenced anew in the present Volume with a column advertisement, to be continued every week for twelve months, at a cost of several thousand dollars. Mr. Spalding understands the philosophy of advertising thoroughly, and his reward is a business success but rarely paralleled. Let our advertising friends bear in mind the case above stated, and if they would win a similar success—do as he has done.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE!

THIS NUMBER

Commences the XIth Volume

OF

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

With this number we commence the Eleventh Volume of our Illustrated Newspaper. Of the preceding Volumes we need hardly speak—its enterprise and energy we have displayed in entering for the public are evidenced on their pages, and give their evidence in our favor.

The present volume will hardly be inferior in interest to the one now closed. Our resources have wonderfully increased. In every section of the country we are in daily correspondence with first-class artists and photographers, ready to supply us with illustrations of loss interest and of all events which transpire in their neighborhood. Our artistic resources are more varied and complete than was ever combined in one establishment in the world.

It will also contain a large amount of interesting reading matter than heretofore; comprising original and translated novels, tales and other amusing matter; besides editorials, criticisms on art, music and literature; chess columns, billiard columns and other interesting and valuable matter, making together the best and most richly-illustrated family paper in America.

Subscriptions should be sent directed to

FRANK LESLIE

19 City Hall Square.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	1 week	10 cts.
One Copy	1 year	$ 5
Two Copies	1 year	$ 9
Five Copies	1 year	$ 20
Eleven Copies	1 year	$ 40
Five do.	2 year	$ 8

and an extra Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2

BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM

HAS again become the popular resort of

EVERY LOVER OF THE BEAUTIFUL, THE CURIOUS AND AMUSING, and is now attracting more attention, as a focusing more visitors than every other place of Amusement in New York. Everything new, curious and instructive is secured by Mr. Barnum, and placed at his Museum in addition to the 850,000 Curiosities from every part of the world, and the which take place every afternoon at 2 o'clock, and every evening at half past 7, by full and efficient Dramatic Companies. At present the Great Temperance Drama, the most curious, wonderful and interesting human lesson the world has ever given, entitled "THE DRUNKARD; OR, THE MISERIES OF RUM," the Aerial Ballet, the Grand Aquaria, Museum Stages, Living Model Exhibition, &c., &c., are all in full operation. Admission to the Museum 25 cents. Children under 10 years 15 cents.

SELECTED DRAMATIC ENTERTAINMENTS

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 24, 1860.

All Communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write to us the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own address. This notice is not given without a reason, and it is to the end that we in my photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without any or only a part of the necessary information, and therefore suppose with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The difficulty in our paper process that we are up to the times in always requiring the name and precise description of the subject we wish, that we may not, unintentionally, put forth anything that may be regarded as offensive. Therefore, to avoid mistakes, we must request that the name (or some better title) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or all kinds.

Correspondents.—J. W., Jr., is mistaken. The party has not been in New York for several weeks.

Foreign News.

The news from Italy is progressive and gratifying. Lord John Russell had, it is declared in the British Senate at Turin, acknowledged that the resistance of the Neapolitans was provoked by the tyranny of their King, and also that the King of Sardinia was not to be censured for going to their assistance, to observe a revolt that had become obnoxious. It would seem as though both France and England were a unit in declaring the course of the dethroned monarch from the British theory, but his emperor should complete matters still more, when that lord should say of the late King of Naples, that he was not to be censured in the least, as the prisoners of war. Naples was dismembered on the principle that the people themselves declared they had been misgoverned. Quite by the French Article I. The truth is, possibly, that the latter has had a hint from the cannon of G. E.

The Marine Conference, it appears, only came to one conclusion, that it was not expedient to hold a Congress in the present unsettled aspect of Europe. In the meantime, the French Government had ordered the building of ten additional steam-armed frigates. Whatever it had also been engaged by that power of furnish a large number of his new rifles.

From China we learn that the Tien Tsin Acts had been captured by the Anglo-French forces, with the loss of four hundred on the allied troops, and about a thousand of the Chinese. This would produce as much the fighting had been much more obstinate than formerly. The Lieut Commander-in-Chief was among the slain. The possession of those forts gave the allies the entire control of the Pei Ho and all the boats and guns of the enemy captured. The Admiral above had gone to Tien Sin, where it was said Chinese Commissioners were there with full powers to open negotiations for peace. The Russian Minister would soon proceed to Pekin, attended by a strong escort of troops.

The Earl of Dunmore, Lord Elgin, Lord Cowley, Lord Derby, and Lord Lansdowne, aged 86. He was one of the most famous of British statesmen, and as shown, had served for the space of sixty years in Parliament. He was a consistent Tory for years, by his participation in a transitional attempt to take the price of corn by excluding them from the ports. He lived long enough to explain his reasons to be restored to his honors in the House, and to be named to the Peerage.

New Granada and Panama.—The Panama Star and Herald announces the departure from Colon Montgomery and Captain Hiller, of Her Majesty's ship Clio, and between the former and the Honorable General of Panama, the object of which was to take the necessary steps for the protection of the rights of Americans who are by the British consulate, but to maintain in an unsatisfactory manner in both instances. Mr. Montgomery, it appears, several weeks before both parties, and has finally elect still no such, in which no previous arrangements were made. Mr. Montgomery left Panama for Bogota with a satisfactory reply. The correspondence will be forwarded to the State Department, and may be the subject of a special message from President Buchanan to the Senate and House no new movement of importance. The members of the Chiriqui Surveying Expedition had arrived at Panama from Golfo Dulce.

The Nations and their Rulers.

The London Times of the 27th of October by no means takes the hopeful view of the present European imbroglio that the French Press does. It appears to entertain the conviction that the Great Powers are preparing for a gigantic struggle, which will settle the question of divine right for ever. It admits that the issue cannot be left to the will of the people, and that between Press and Retrogression. After reviewing the condition of the despotic combatants, it concludes by saying that America, hopelessly bankrupt, and driven to the last extremities to propitiate her chief creditor, Hungary, with paltry installments, which that nation will refuse, seeing that she will soon have an opportunity of helping herself. Russia, the only one of the three declares to be poor and embarrassed, with the fetter of serfdom around her neck, and comes to the conclusion that the nobles will avail themselves of the war to rid themselves of the yoke of big-pravaricators, so as to bring the Government more within the scope of European influence; while Prussia, it predicts, will survive to feel the instinct of freedom, and to profit by the favorable conditions for the principles of liberty and national government. While this France and Sardinia contend against the allied despotisms of Europe, the chief organ of British opinion thus marks out the course of England:

When this treacherous struggle is shaking Europe to its centre will England be passive? Her interests, her honor, her duty, her reputation will forbid her to remain quiet. We may not imitate the French Emperor, but still we are to see that the balance of power is not destroyed. With those we have the previous moment is no object or dislike can subsist, and the enmity or friendship of the Powers is determined by their conduct. We are not to engage until ago, but we are to be prepared to engage when the occasion calls. The feeling of regard for our right hand as between these peoples, and we administer to the existing state of things, is the opinion of the empire voice. The regeneration of Italy is to us, and by the sword away. but we may observe that the Emperor of the French has not yet declared that the Queen regards it powers wrong." However disposing this may be to the European Courts, it is impossible to deny that it is the language we would be at all most interview at Coblentz between Lord John Russell and the Prussian Minister, Count Bernstorff, and that the latter has been sent to Vienna. It appears that Lord John Russell has declared that he will not interfere in which France has observed in private. We shall assume once more the same neutral attitude which we have maintained in the Austrian campaign of 1859, and France cease to be a nuisance—that is, we shall look on and see the same gaged and disarmed. Such is the position, and withdrawing all the naval superiority we must particular to the combatants.

Some new complication may arise unexpectedly, while others may condemn it as undignified and timid; but it must be remembered that England, like America, is already passed through this crisis, and knows that the only value a series of constitutions similar to those now agitating the Continental nations. Her proper place is to act as moderator, and temper the triumph.

Social Questions of the Day.

Work for Women.

Those who collect statistics of arrests, of social phenomena, and of the various conditions of labor—and there are those of the latter class—tell us that the number of women is more that from time to time an instance occurs of some healthy, resolute female who dresses in male garb, passes herself off for one of the other sex, and earns a livelihood in such until she is convicted of the crime, arrested and punished.

We entirely except from the cases to which we refer all romantic cases of disguise for the purpose of concealment of Sensation Novels, seek for Adventure under cover of sack coats and pantaloons. We do not by any means refer to the loves of Billy Taylor or Jemmy Ducks. We speak of those women who are of a run-away dimensions who weep or are otherwise violently excreted in their "emotions" while in Court, and who generally turn out to be "young women" when the case is fully investigated. Those to whom we refer are generally calm, stout, good-natured, rather illiterate damsels, who have worked steadily at some very laborious calling for a livelihood, and have taken to male attire because is that they could not "get along" as women, while in masculine garb they could earn a good living. Just such a case has occurred recently in this city, and they are by no means rare. They do not seem to be by any means connected with loose dimension; and we are convinced that there is a certain healthy, resolute, and even heroic element in such cases, which we think they do well to make the attempt.

Now, while repudiating the extravagances of the so-called Woman's Rights movement, we think that their ultimate drawback and a hindrance to the cause of female industrial progress let us see if there is not room for much social reform in this matter. Should wages and popular prejudice only result from a limited field of labor and great competition, are at present the acknowledged lot of the working women. In those departments where the same kind of labor is shared by men, she does not receive so high wages, though her efforts may be just as profitable to the employer. It is hardly worth while to say a word on the atrocious injustice of all this. On the one side we have plain common sense, justice and humanity, to say nothing of material and industrial fact; while on the other are certain social prejudices which are not only unreasonable, but which are founded in very good feeling, and which, indeed, were once practically useful, are at present losing their value every day. And that which causes them to lose their value is the constantly increasing demand for labor. As Labor rises in the social scale, all who can contribute to it must rise with it. The death of Feudalism and of social tyranny of all kinds is the birth of Labor. No person can carefully study the history of Labor in Europe for the past century without admitting that, whatever convulsions may shake society, one thing must progress in power and dignity, and that is Labor. The preservative art of printing alone would assure this to the world, and there are a thousand agencies even more preservative than that.

Such being the case, it is inevitable that sooner or later the field of labor work must and will be thrown open to all, and every Competent, whether male or female, be permitted to earn precisely what his or her abilities are worth. As regards women, this change is now generally considered inevitable independence, industry and the pride and ambition which they begin, are a thousand fold more productive of morality than the present Sentimentalism and what ought to be called Vice. There is no better friend to good behavior than cheerful, fairly rewarded industry.

The greatest drawback is the one least observed by reformers. We refer to the unscrupulous—but miserably contemptible opposition to female rivalry of those who fear the temporary reduction of their own gains. We have met with many men who had this feeling as well as illiterate mechanics. Some years ago in England the male employes in a porcelain-painting atelier refused to work unless the female painters in the same establishment were prohibited to use "rests" for the hand, while they themselves retained them! The reason was that the women, who allowed to use the "rests," could earn a little more.

In a few years this question will undoubtedly force itself to discussion and solution. Meanwhile let every true philanthropist do all in his power to increase those peoples which stand so much in the way of giving their just rights and dues to one half of humanity.

Prospectus of the Eighth Volume of Frank Leslie's Monthly.

The January number of Frank Leslie's Monthly commences the Eighth Volume, and with it a new era in its existence. New features will be added, rendering its pages more ornamental and more useful. The large illustrations will be of the most original description of excellence, sufficient to merit separate framing, while the Illustrations of the Novels, Tales and Travels will be more numerous and beautiful. The thrilling Novel which was commenced in the December number will be continued, and a vast amount of the most admirable literature, by first-class writers, will adorn its pages throughout the year.

The Fashion Department, so valuable to ladies in the country, will be completely remodelled, and will contain esthetic articles upon dress and the Fine Arts, besides the large number of the newest Fashions prevailing in the first circles, not only in dress, bonnets, &c., but in needle-work, crochet, Berlin wool &c., &c.

The series of beautiful Illustrated Poems will be continued: also our Portrait Gallery, the plan of which will be enlarged, embracing not only the chief authors and artists of our own and foreign countries, but also the actors and popular artists whose musical genius delights the refined audiences in every section of the country.

Frank Leslie's Monthly enjoys an enviable reputation wherever it has been seen, as its constantly increasing subscription list proves. No pains will be spared to sustain this reputation; no expense will be grudged to render it still more worthy of the patronage of the public.

The subscriptions which expire with Volume VII. should be renewed at once, to insure the prompt delivery of No. 1 of the Eighth Volume. Subscriptions should be sent direct to this office.

FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, N. Y.

EDITORIAL CLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS.

An Ear Ache has perpetrated at the expense of brave little Savoy, in the Herald's proposition a few days ago. A fair complimenting her for the gallantry she displayed on the occasion of the famous collision "that shook the world" on the Ocean, but deserves to be forthwith smeared to sudden ideal!"

Messrs. Cubbert Brothers, the well-known jewellers of 371 Broadway, have just completed a magnificent Jewish Shield for a Regiment. It is of solid eighteen carat gold, and has the arms of the regiment on one side, while on the other it contains the Star of David. With Company, Brevet Colonel, presented to them as being "It is a very elegant specimen of workmanship.

The Union is emphatic proof upon equal success in the battle of the Ballot Box—and we have no doubt it will upon the rising cop of officers who assist in the pages of our current literature. Mr. Brevet's union on Washington last but not least, is a most powerful ally. Union, when the vote of honesty has lately received considerable trouble criticism. A New York Union is also a powerful ally, and we hope it will be duly encouraged.

"In the letter addressed to, and which, we presume, is not premature to have been written by Mr. Lincoln, we find the following sentence. Its spirit is excellent though we cannot to the grammar of the sentence. He tells you manfully that "no doubt a house divided against itself cannot stand," and that he believes that the government cannot permanently endure half slave and half free. In giving utterance to these sentiments, Mr. Lincoln uttered what indeed may be called truisms of the day; they are, in fact, a mere hackneyed, and, being hackneyed, are true. But in the connection in which he uttered them, they are not true. They are false." Dear Editor, George Washington uttered them—not the Lord!

The New York Weekly—We are gratified to learn that our contemporary, the New York Weekly, has met with the success which this enterprise has so long and so richly deserved. Its special strength at present is in which it has been conducted merits. Its special strength at present is in the fact that it is a story in which the interest does not flag from beginning to end. The Weekly is merits deserve, a very liberal prize has been awarded to the author of the story which has been published in it, and by the distribution of a large sum of business talent has been expended that they will be in the near future. Several stories have been awarded, and the last been commenced in the present number. A great deal of the "Social Science" department of the paper is conducted in a very entertaining manner, and is very respectable, both as regards quality and quantity. The gentlemen proprietors of the Weekly form a "young firm," but one most assuredly known, and one whose well understood merits ages is peculiar type of the "young American."

The Rent Fiend at Poughkeepsie—Our notice last week of the rent fiend has much to do in the district, the phrase from which the occasion would be changed almost by an oversight. The writer, Judson Lord, and the Chamberlain year or America, hails from Newburg, and his gallant address is Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Let him be heard from.

Express Trains to Albany and the West—such fast trains are the evening of the Hudson River Railroad. The Diamond Express has arrived with the New York Central, and passengers are taken through to the principal Western, North-western and South-western cities. New and comfortable cars have been provided for the trains, and great improvements have been made upon the line. The Express leaves New York at seven A. M. and five P. M., and the Mail train at ten A. M.

The Idea of a Clergyman being swindled by a "matrimonial woman" seems like the engineer being hoisted on his petard, or the poisoner having the drugged chalice returned to his own lips. Our readers will, no doubt, feel this when they read this little extract from a newspaper published in "Honest Abe's" State:

"A singular card appears in the Brockport (Ill.) Advertiser. Rev. A. F. Finch warns the clergy against a woman, small in stature and wearing spectacles, who met him at a camp meeting in Rockport and cajoled him into matrimony. Afterward he ascertained that he was the third victim of her wiles. One of his predecessors lived at Belleville (C. W.), and the other resided in Wisconsin. The latter she left in a destitute condition with three children to provide for."

As a companion picture from the Portland Argus, which sums up a recent divorce case in this peculiar style:

Freeman Waterhouse, libelant, vs. Eliza A. Waterhouse.—Petition for divorce—cause, desertion. From the evidence in the case, it appeared that the wife was an exceedingly pious woman, and that she left her husband on account of his profanity. Judge Appleton said she should show her piety in a becoming manner by returning to her husband, that she had no excuse for leaving him, and that if she continued to desert him after this nothing could be recovered of him for her support. The circumstances in the case were not sufficient, in his mind, to warrant him in decreeing a divorce. Libel dismissed."

Why profanity should not be a valid excuse is evident, since ladies differ in their definition of what constitutes profanity. Dickens relates that, upon the husband complaining that the pork was underdone, he was taken to task by his pious wife, and rebuked for "his profanity and being discontented with his victuals." As though Providence sent cooks as well as pigs.

The Great Organ of Fourierism copies an article from the Journal des Débats of Paris on Garibaldi, which closes with this remarkable sentence: "When a man performs miracles he represents a great power!"

All Young Nations, like parvenues, are notoriously thinskinned. There is a mauvaise honte about them, which makes them cry out with Scrub, in the farce, "I know they are talking of me, they laugh so consumedly." Some of our journals are playing Scrub at this very minute, and all because the London Times, the Beadle Bumble of the British press, has been shaking its head and bow-wowing at some overzealous attentions paid to the Prince of Wales in Richmond, Virginia. This acute sensibility to what little foreign journals say of us is ludicrous, and reminds us of a story told by the author of Jacob Leisler, as having happened either to himself or to some of his literary friends. He had just retired to his Howe's Patent Spring Bedstead, when he was roused by a poetical admirer. Ring after ring made the author spring from his couch and poke out his nightcapped head to know what was the matter. "Is that you?" cried a voice. "Yes, what's the matter? House on fire, or is the Union in danger?" "No," replied his friend; "but the Paddington Snorer, Sneerer and Sneezer has an article on your last new play!" Next morning, the night-disturbed author found that a little penny London paper had pronounced him to be a rising young writer, for an American. What does it matter to a nation of thirty millions of freemen what the Paddington Sneezer or the London Times says of us. Just read what our New York papers say of them!

PERSONAL.

When Louis Napoleon was an exile in Switzerland he was made a citizen of Thurgovie, and received from the Federal Council the command of an artillery company. In acknowledgment of the latter favor, he wrote the President: "I am proud to be numbered among the defenders of a state in which the people are recognised as sovereign, and where each citizen is ready to sacrifice himself for the good of the fatherland." It would seem from his present unamiable conduct to the humbugs of the Alps, that he is now ready to sacrifice that little selfish Republic.

Senator Chesnut has resigned his position in the Senate.

The Charleston Mercury says that South Carolina has thrown the tea overboard; it means the milk.

The Evening Post says that Perry of New Jersey, although notoriously a Breckinridge man, was obliged to promise to vote Douglas before he was put on the ticket!

John B. Gough gave a lecture at the Cooper Institute on the 12th, on "Social Responsibilities." It was very able and earnest.

Miss Mary L. Booth, who is gaining quite a reputation by her clever translations from the French, has just completed, and Scribner will shortly publish, a translation of "La Femme Affranchie." This book, which will appear under the English name of "Woman Enfranchised," was written by Madame d'Héricourt, and is intended as an answer to Michelet's "L'Amour."

Miss Susan Fenimore Cooper's compilations from her father's works, entitled "Pages and Pictures," will be issued in a few days. It will be illustrated with forty steel engravings, and one hundred and thirty sketches on wood.

Moore's "Lalla Rookh" has just been published by the Longmans of London, in a more elaborate style than any previous editions of the poem. It is profusely illustrated from sixty-five designs by Mr. John Tenniel. The London Times thinks that "the entire set of illustrations is without a parallel in English embellishment, and putting aside Turner's and Stothard's Rogers as not exactly a case in point, the greatest illustrative achievement of any single hand."

General Avezzana, who has been for the last ten years a cigar and spirit merchant in New York, arrived in Italy just in time to be present at the battle of Caserta; he mentions four young American volunteers very favorably.

Two young Americans, named Mead and Spackman, distinguished themselves by their gallantry at the fire in the Astor House Hotel; at the imminent hazard of their lives they rushed through a storm of fire and rescued a man named Brady. The poor fellow was, however, so much injured that he died in a few hours.

Missing Man.—The Canadian Government have offered $500 reward for any information relative to John Sheridan Hogan, Esq., M. P. P., who left his residence in Canada last December, and has not been heard of since. Communications should be sent to Charles Alleyn, Esq., Provincial Secretary, Quebec. A faithful portrait of Mr. Hogan will be found in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, No. 244, of July 28th, 1860.

LITERATURE.

The Masonic Eclectic is a very interesting monthly magazine, edited by John W. Simons, assisted by several distinguished Masonic brothers, and devoted to gleanings from the harvest field of Masonic literature. The November number is before us, and contains many articles which cannot fail to interest the Members of the Craft; among them are—The Masonic Question, by the Editor; a Masonic Poem, by George P. Morris; also one by A. H. Duganne, and another by Samuel Whiting; a Sketch of Cagliostro, by the Latomia Society; a Fragment of History, by John L. Lewis, jun.; and the Orders of Knighthood by Robert Macoy; together with a large amount of interesting items on Masonic subjects. It is a well conducted work, and needs only to be known to obtain a large circulation. It is published at 430 Broome street, at one dollar per year.

From Macoy & Sickles, 430 Broome street, we have received a Masonic book, entitled The Signet of King Solomon, or the Templar's Daughter, by Aug. C. L. Arnold, LL.D., Past Grand Chaplain. The design of this work is to illustrate by means of a pleasant and interesting work of fiction the governing principles of the noble order of Freemasonry. The writer is an enthusiastic mason, and has developed the goodness and beauty of the craft, and its influence for great good in its higher degrees, and has at the same time given a strong and living interest to the plot of the story by which the governing principles of the order are evolved and illustrated. It is a very interesting volume. A memoir of Elizabeth Aldworth, the Female Freemason, and a Masonic Prologue add considerably to the interest and value of the publication.

Thayer & Eldridge, of Boston, have sent us a ranting and raving Abolition book, disguised under the name of A Story of True Love. We have before expressed our disgust at these outrageously sectional productions, so exaggerated in detail, so false in facts and so untrue in deduction. There is some very powerful writing in this work, and many of the scenes are full of striking action, but the absurdity of raising a superstructure of god-like virtues on the sole basis that the individual is an Abolitionist, and the monstrous theory that a man must be a devil and graced with every demoniacal quality because he owns slaves, are so manifestly preposterous, that common sense revolts at it—truth refutes it—human nature rises up against it, and we feel inclined to throw the dangerous and disingenuous volume into the fire. The author is a believer in "nigger," but a doubter of Shakespeare; indeed, we got so confused by his eloquent bombast, in which Garrison, Wendell Phillips, the nigger, Theodore Parker and Shakespeare were so inextricably blended, that we were yet in some doubt as to whom is ascribed the honor of having written Shakespeare's works—but we rather think it was the "nigger." The publishers, we presume, find it to their interest to bring out these intolerable and abominable books, but we can only class them with the worst sort of sensation novels, which, beneath an outside show of morality and humanity, appeal to the worst passions of our nature, and stir up the bitter blood of hate and intolerance in kindred hearts. Such books should be tabooed by every class of readers.

Leonard Scott & Co., 79 Fulton street, New York, have sent us the Edinburgh and Quarterly Review for October. It is an interesting number, and contains several sterling articles; among them one, entitled "The United States under the Presidentship of Mr. Buchanan," is devoted to the consideration of the Slave Question. Leonard Scott & Co's. republication of the sterling magazines of England is a well considered and most successful enterprise.

THE SECESSION MOVEMENT IN THE SOUTH.

Ever since the vote of the 6th of November, which indicated beyond peradventure that the candidate for the Republican party would be the next President of the United States, there has been a wild excitement and a terrible agitation in our sister States of the South. Even before the vote which settled the doubt, many Southern politicians looked upon the result as a foregone conclusion, and had prepared the minds of their constituents for an organised and determined resistance. So the feeling had been growing and growing, fanned almost to a premature fire by the sneering and insulting tone of too many of the Northern papers, until the public mind at the South was fully prepared for some prompt, definite and determined action.

South Carolina led the van in opposition to the assumption of power of that party so obnoxious to the sentiment of the entire South. Her State Legislature has authorised a Convention, to meet on the 17th, to deliberate upon the present state of affairs and decide what course of action the State shall pursue. Popular indications seem to point to immediate secession as the only means of allaying the feverish excitement of the people. In Charleston and Columbia meetings take place daily and nightly. Distinguished public men address excited crowds from the steps of the public buildings, from the windows of the hotels, and at the corners of the streets. The language of the speakers is unmistakable, and those who speak the loudest for immediate dissolution are the most enthusiastically cheered. A large proportion of the Federal officers have resigned, and are to be remunerated by the State for their sacrifice for the cause of right, and it is said that their course will be followed by every official, Postmasters, &c., now holding positions under the Federal Government. Senators Toombs, Chestnut and Hammond have resigned.

South Carolina does not stand alone in this secession movement. Georgia and Alabama are active, enthusiastic and demonstrative in the cause. Alabama will call a State Convention on the seventh of December, and the Governor of Georgia, in a lengthy message, recommends a system of retaliation against hostile States (those which nullify the Fugitive Slave Law), and the immediate calling of a State Convention. From State to State the disunion feeling is spreading with a terrible rapidity, and the more it spreads the wilder and the more intense it seems to grow. In our next issue we shall probably chronicle the first steps taken by the Southern States towards withdrawing from the Union.

Charleston is boiling over with the spirit of secession. It is the theme of every tongue, and, apparently, the hope of every heart. The palmetto flag was raised amidst the thunder of cannon and the shouts of the people, and now waves from a hundred houses. Several State Legislatures have made large appropriations for the arming of the militia, and "minute" men are being enrolled by hundreds. It has been stated that the minute men organization numbers between one and two hundred thousand men, prepared to defend the action of the South at all hazards. Hardee's drill is adopted and zealously practised.

The Legislature passed a bill authorizing the banks to suspend specie payments, and the military committees of both houses were to sit during the recess.

Governor Pettus, of Mississippi, is about to summon the Legislature to consider the state of affairs.

There is a disposition at the North to speak lightly of this great and general movement, but a free people so strongly moved, and writhing under what they believe to be a deliberate and settled plan to rob them of that which they consider to be their vested and inalienable rights, are not likely to be quieted without some definite object is obtained, be it what it may.

On Monday, the 12th inst., a mass meeting of the people of Charleston was called to be holden at the Institute Hall, to ratify the call of a convention by the Legislature. The invitation extended to ladies and was responded to with enthusiasm, the galleries of the vast hall being thronged by the gentle sex, who displayed a deep and earnest interest in the transactions. The building was densely thronged, and the thousands outside who could not force their way in were addressed at various points by strong and excited speakers. The meeting was presided over by the late Federal Judge Magrath, and addresses were made by ex-Senator Rhett, Mr. Spratt, ex-Government Attorney Conner, ex-Collector Colcock and other eloquent men. It is stated that when the speaker declared "The Union is dissolved," the enthusiasm beggared description. The vast audience rose as with one impulse, and amid waving of hats and handkerchiefs shout after shout pealed forth, which seemed to shake the building to its foundation. Fireworks and illuminations marked the occasion, which appeared to be one of general joy.

MUSIC.

The Academy does not reopen its doors to the public until the 1st inst. During the recess it is stated that several important, and we should judge most judicious, alterations are to be made in the auditorium. Private boxes are to be constructed to take the place of the present entrances to the parquette next the orchestra, and in lieu thereof several additional passages will be opened leading directly from the first circle into the parquette. This will not only afford much greater facilities for ingress and egress, but also relieve the ladies who occupy the front seats from the rude, unmannerly gaze of the "b'hoy ruffians" who have been in the habit of congregating in the present parquette entrances, and ranging themselves along the front of the balcony, frequently entirely shutting out those seated behind them from a view of the stage. Corridors, in addition to those already existing, will likewise be opened in the parquette, to afford the audience greater convenience in visiting and receiving visits. If these improvements are thoroughly carried out, the patrons of the Academy, especially those of the fair sex, will have reason to be devoutly thankful. The new season, which it is said will only be continued up to the holidays, will be under the management of Mr. Ullman, and artists and operas will be alike, in a great measure, novelties to the New York public.

The New York Philharmonic Society.—The first concert of the Nineteenth Season took place at the Academy of Music on the 10th inst. It was attended by a very fashionable and crowded audience, and to their honor be it stated, there was very little talking and scarcely any flirting, exclusive attention being paid to the very fine performance which was prepared for their delectation. The orchestra was evidently in a playing mood; satisfied with themselves, the music selected and the conductor—for rarely has the Philharmonic band equalled the executive excellence of that evening. The symphony was played with sentiment, delicacy and precision, and Mendelssohn's beautiful Overture has never before in this city been so faithfully and intelligently rendered. Mr. Eisfeld deserves infinite credit for his excellent interpretation and leading of these fine works.

The vocal portion of the concert was sustained by Madame Dummler, whose début was received with some favor. Our friend Noll, clever as he is, is not equal to Vieuxtemps' Concerto. The violin is an exacting instrument, and he who would excel as a soloist must pay to it the exclusive devotion of a lover. We subjoin the programme.

PART I.

Symphony, No. 2, in C, Op. 61, Robert Schumann; 1. Lento—Allegro con energia. 2. Scherzo—Molto vivace. 3. Larghetto. 4. Allegro, Molto vivace. Aria from "Robert le Diable," "Va! dit-elle," Madame Schroeder Dummler, Meyerbeer.

PART II.

Overture "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," in D, Op. 27 (Calm at Sea and Happy Voyage), Mendelssohn; Second Concert, for violin, in F sharp minor, Op. 19, Mr. Joseph Noll, H. Vieuxtemps; "Gebet der Elizabeth" (Prayer), from "Der Tannhauser," Madame Schroeder Dummler; Overture, "Leonora," No. 1, in C (Anno 1805), first time, Beethoven; Conductor, Theodore Eisfeld.

DRAMA

Winter Garden.—Many years had elapsed since Miss Cushman had enacted her favorite character of "Romeo," until she reappeared in that part on Thursday evening last, supported by Mrs. Bowers as Juliet, Mr. Dyott as Mercutio, and Mr. Couldock as Friar Lawrence. The house was crowded on this interesting occasion, and a fair share of enthusiasm was manifested, but candidly speaking, we cannot admire Miss Cushman's rendition of the love-sick Romeo. In her hands every particle of poetry is lost, and in place of a charming embodiment of thoroughly romantic passion, we have presented to us a nervous, awkward, over-grown boy, full of irregularities, uninteresting in manner, and unattractive in bearing. Now we are quite willing to admit that many a young lady like Juliet would fall desperately in love with just such a Romeo as Miss Cushman offers us, for her impersonation is full of ardor, full of intensity; but we submit that the Romeo the mind craves for is a creature full of grace and beauty, elegant in bearing, refined in manner, passionate but never rude in speech, by turns exulting and by turns despairing, as the course of his great love runs smoothly over the golden sands of hope, or is dashed remorselessly upon the iron rocks of a hard fate. Of all characters in the range of the acting drama, Romeo can least afford to be dealt with in a realistic manner; we do not wish to believe that, like other youths, his impetuosity is rude, his passion absurd to all save himself and the object upon which it is lavished. We prefer to deal with him only poetically, to find in him the very concentration of what we dream a "lover" should be; once dash aside the veil of romance and deal with him in an off-hand, every day manner, and the charm vanishes, the interest ceases, your sympathy is dashed with realism as with cold water, and when you should weep you can with difficulty refrain from smiling. We willingly admit that Miss Cushman makes Romeo act very much as any young man of average ability acts when he is first in love, but thus by being too natural she destroys the ideality of the part. Who desires to see Cupid painted without wings?

The Juliet of Mrs. Bowers is a highly respectable performance, very much better than any previous delineations of character we have witnessed by the lady. Mr. Dyott as Mercutio, deserves especial credit; his was infinitely the best acted part in the tragedy, full of life and animation, overflowing with geniality and spirit, yet carefully and delicately shaded, and on the whole a most excellent performance. Mr Couldock's Friar Lawrence was simply as bad as possible, and the rest of the performers are not entitled to any large share of praise, if we except young Mr. Stoddart, whose Benvolio was exceedingly well acted; and Mr. Davidge, whose performance of Peter was truly Shakespearian, and consequently life-like and amusing to an unusual degree. The scenery is nearly all new, in good taste and most admirably painted, and the tragedy throughout is well mounted. We congratulate both patrons and management of this house upon the return of Mr. Tillotson. This gentleman during his former connection with the establishment won the esteem of all the habitués. He has the general charge of the auditorium, which is sufficient assurance to visitors that their comfort will be well looked after.

At the other theatres there are no changes to note. Mr Forrest in "Othello," and the stock company on the off nights in the "Dead Heart," still fill Niblo's; while "Playing with Fire" does the same at Wallack's. Miss Keene keeps "Physic and Fancy" on the bills, but promises some startling novelty.

Barnum's Museum.—The great sensational drama of "Rose Elmer," originally published in the New York Ledger, has been produced by the enterprising manager, and is received nightly by crowded audiences, with immense applause. The Aztecs are likewise great attractions, and excite much curiosity. Altogether, there is no place equal to Barnum's Temple of Art and Curiosities, to while away a pleasant hour.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A brutal murder was perpetrated at the flourishing town of New Lotts, Long Island. It appears that on Monday, Theodore Collyer, a well-to-do market gardener, came to New York to dispose of his load of vegetables. He returned to his home shortly after dark with the proceeds in his pockets. After taking his supper he went out, and visited the store of Mr. Torrey on the plank road, and while paying for some purchases there he drew out a large roll of bills. This was remarked by some of the bystanders. Collyer then left the store. The next morning early he was found by his wife in the barn with his skull fractured and quite dead. His money and watch were also gone. The murderers have not yet been detected.

Company F, National Guard, Boston, who had been sojourning in our city for some days, were reviewed by Mayor Wood before the City Hall on the 13th. The Guard was escorted by Company B, of the Eighth, Capt. Moore, from the Armory, and arrived at the Park about three o'clock. The review was a very imposing and satisfactory affair. The Bostonians took their departure the same evening in the steamer Traveller of New Haven.

Considerable excitement is now raging in Bergen, New Jersey, on account of the sudden and most suspicious death of Mrs. Absom, wife to a farmer in that town. From the brutal manner with which he had treated her for years, and in consequence of his repeated threats against her life, uttered to herself and others, suspicion immediately fastened upon him, and a warrant for his arrest was issued by Coroner Gaffney. There is little doubt that she has been poisoned, and her husband's brutal conduct naturally fixes public suspicion upon him. She had been sick for some time, and under a doctor's care.

The Boston Traveller announces that Dr. William Lounsbaw, Jr., of East Cambridge, who went out as Surgeon with the Hayes Expedition, has arrived home in Boston, and he reports all well. Dr. Lounsbaw went from Greenland to Copenhagen, and thence to America. The vessel behaved admirably.

The Providence Press has a very distressing account of the suicide of an old man named Thomas Aston, in the State prison. He had been tried for perjury a day or two before, and sentenced to six years' imprisonment with hard labor. There were many circumstances in this case to arouse the public sympathy, and the verdict as well as the sentence caused considerable surprise. When the keeper went the following morning, the unhappy man was found with his throat cut. His wounds were so severe that it is almost impossible he can recover.

We gave in a late number an illustration of the inauguration of Druid Park, Baltimore. We have now to record the death of Mr. Lloyd Rogers, the late owner of that new public domain. It is supposed to have been hastened by the grief and excitement of parting with so much of his ancestral estate.

A coin collector in Salem, Mass., recently sold to a collector in Hartford a copper cent for seventy-five dollars. It was the coin known as the "Higley copper," the first copper cent of Connecticut, dated 1737, and struck by a blacksmith named Higley. But three specimens of this ancient coin are known to be in existence; and being thus rare, it readily commands the high price paid for this one of the three.

Mr. Barney has withdrawn his charge against Isaiah Rynders, with the observation that his object was accomplished by the publicity given to the matter.

The defalcation of Mr. Bates, the late State Treasurer of Vermont, is above $60,000. As most of this sum is composed of sums he has buried in the name of the State, there is considerable litigation in prospect. It was only discovered, therefore, that the ex-treasurer had created any debt when a note of $9,000 at the Brattleboro' bank fell due. Mr. Bates, being then looked for, had deeded away his property and fled. The principal notes now discovered, going to make up the sum of $51,500 are: 15,000 with Lawrence Brainerd, of St. Albans; $3,000 with Abel Underwood; $1,500, Orange county bank; $3,300, Lamoille county bank; and lesser sums with seven other banks. Of course the State cannot dodge payment, as the treasurer's name bound the State under the law.

The Rochester Express has a long account of a secret society called the American Eagles, which has for its end and aim a political object. It does not, however, state what its proclivities are.

On Monday night Mr. Sebastian Meckel, his wife, son and Miss Nella Kingroth, all stopping at the Astor House, were in the act of crossing Broadway opposite Barnum's Museum, when one of the Fourth avenue line of stages, driven by Henry Scofield, came rushing down the street and before the party could get out of its way the two ladies were knocked down and severely injured. Mrs. Meckel had one of her arms fractured, and Miss Kingroth had two fingers of her left hand crushed by the wheels of the vehicle. The driver, who was intoxicated, was arrested; and Justice Welsh locked him up. The ladies were assisted to the Astor House.

On Saturday there were in this port 28 steamers, 123 ships, 101 barks, 104 brigs and 134 schooners, not including Collins, &c.; 52 are loading for Europe, 3 for East Indies, 2 for West coast of South America and 8 for Australia. There are on the berth for San Francisco 7 fine ships.

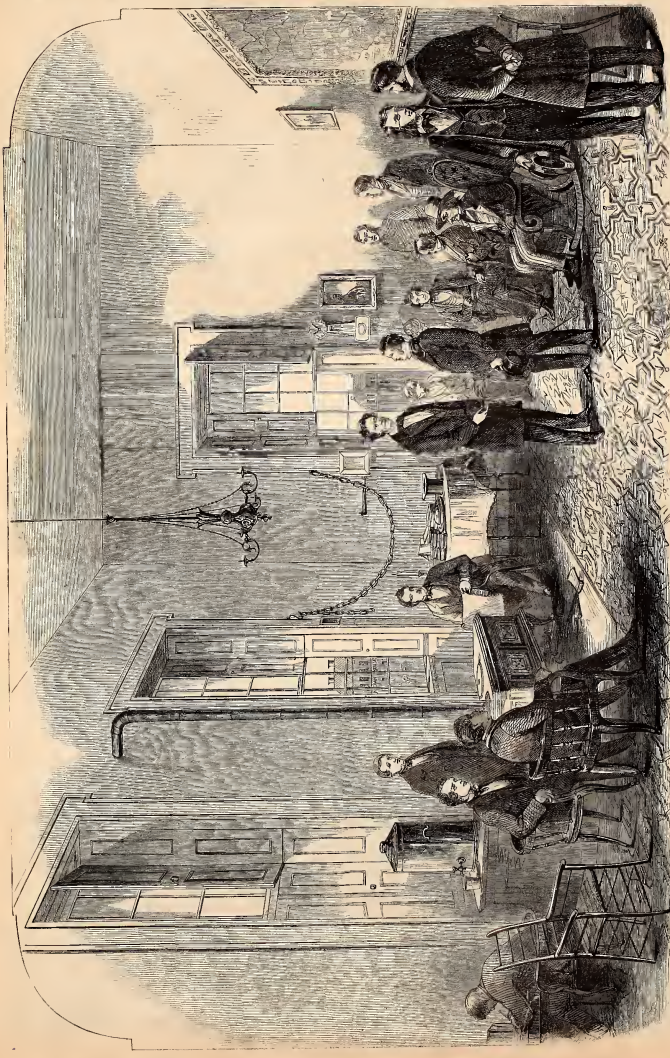
A most diabolical attempt to poison a patient in the City Hospital was made last week on a patient by two other men in the institution. The first attempt was made by the confederates in the morning, when Croton oil was placed in the broth. This was so unpleasant that their intended victim could not drink it; in order to avoid detection one of the men threw the basin over as though by accident. The same evening the man had a friend come to see him, and a large quantity of Croton oil was placed in the milk. Before they detected the unpleasant flavor both had swallowed a considerable quantity. Shortly after the unlucky milk-drinkers were seized with all the symptoms of violent poison, and still remain in a very precarious condition. The men confessed their deed, but denied any evil attempt, declaring they did it as a lark. They have been arrested to await events. It is said that the man whose life was thus attempted had been seen by these men counting the money he had in his belt, but which he afterwards had placed in a Savings Bank unknown to the supposed conspirators.

The carelessness of the rock blasters in the avenues is becoming more glaring every day. During the last week three accidents have occurred, one fatally. The contractor ought to be heavily fined, as well as the immediate cause of the explosion. The recklessness of some of these men is an infatuation equally dangerous to themselves and the public.

On Saturday, the 10th, and Monday, the 12th, the tides in Boston were higher than they have been for two years. Many of the streets were submerged.

As Mrs. Rogers, of Sixth street, South Brooklyn, was taking her dinner in the basement on the 12th, some person entered the house by means of a latch-key, and stole about $1,200 worth of jewellery out of her bed-room. Three men have been arrested on suspicion.

The custom of Lynch law is becoming too frequent in some parts of our State. One day last week, a young man, named Gordon, was shot while standing near a house of ill-fame. The next evening, a party of his friends, aided by numerous rowdies, made an assault upon several equivocal mansions, and destroyed everything inside them. These lawless men are as great evils in a city as the nuisance they pretend to obviate. It must, however, be confessed that the laxity and corruption of our judicial authorities are indirectly the cause of this growing evil.

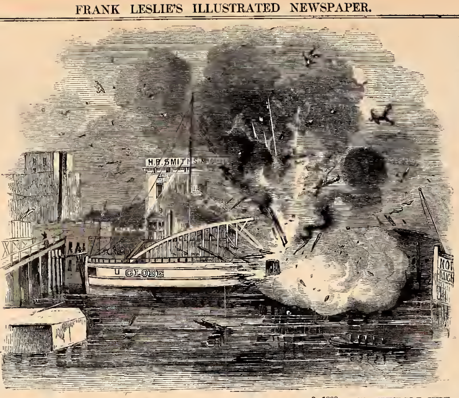


HON. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, THE PRESIDENT-ELECT, RECEIVING HIS VISITORS IN THE GOVERNOR'S ROOM IN THE STATE HOUSE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—From a Sketch by our Special Artist, Mr. Hugh Lovie.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMER GLOBE AT CHICAGO.

It is our painful duty to-day to illustrate one of those appalling catastrophes which has rendered Western travelling so dangerous, and, we fear, from what we have read in the local papers, that it was the result of the grossest carelessness. On the morning of Thursday, 8th November, about nine o'clock, the citizens in the vicinity of Clarke and Well streets, Chicago, were startled by a tremendous explosion upon the north side of the river, and at the same instant the air was filled with a shower of beams, iron and splinters of every description. This was found to be the remains of the propeller Globe, Captain Amos Pratt, lying at Hale's dock.

The Globe had only arrived about five hours that morning from Buffalo with a cargo of apples and other merchandise. She had also brought some passengers, all of whom had left the vessel. The engineers and firemen were in the engine-room taking off a cylinder head. The steam had been blown off from one of the boilers and the fire put out, the other boiler had but little steam in it. While they were thus occupied, the boiler exploded with terrific force, tearing the propeller into atoms, and covering the adjacent parts with the wreck of the ill-fated vessel. The crew numbered twenty-five in all, and it is feared that most of them have perished. The force of the shock was terrible. The long block of buildings adjoining the north side of the river was shaken as by an earthquake. The windows were all broken and the ceilings destroyed.



TERRIBLE EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMER GLOBE, AT HALE'S DOCK, CHICAGO, THURSDAY, NOV. 8, 1860.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. PETRIE.

HOLE MADE IN AN IRON SHUTTER ON THE REAR OF LARRABEE & NORTH'S HARDWARE STORE, BY ONE OF THE FENDERS OF THE BOAT.

Some idea may be formed of the wonderful power concealed in a drop of water from some of the particular effects of the explosion. The iron of the boilers, as we have said, was ripped asunder as if it had only been so much paper. The boilers were literally torn to shreds, and one of them, less torn than the others, was twisted and collapsed like an old felt hat that has been through an election-day fight.

A piece of timber, weighing some two hundred and fifty pounds, was thrown across the river and into the rear office of Messrs. Stewart, Youle & Co., in the Board of Trade Building. It entered via the window, and landed in the middle of the room. Mr. Stewart had left the room scarcely a minute before the intrusion of the unwelcome projectile.

One of the fenders of the boat, weighing two hundred pounds, was blown through the air and hurled into the rear of Larrabee & North's hardware store, over a block from the dock, and cutting out a circular piece of a foot in diameter from the centre of a thick iron shutter.

The Globe was one of the oldest of our lake craft now in commission. She came from the stocks as a side-wheel steamboat in 1848. Subsequently she was altered to a propeller. Her present engines were comparatively new, having taken the place of the old ones, which were condemned about four years ago. She was registered as a B 2 vessel, with a valuation of $17,000. She was insured for $5,000, but as marine policies do not cover loss or damage by explosion, the loss will fall entirely upon her owner, Mr. William O. Brown, of Buffalo. She was commanded by Captain Amos Pratt, one of the oldest and best of lake navigators.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Receiving his Friends in the Court Room of the State House, Springfield.

We give in our present number a sketch of the President elect receiving the congratulations of his friends and neighbors in the Court Room of the State House, Springfield. It would seem from all accounts that he received the news of his elevation with that equanimity which has distinguished his whole career. The capital of Springfield is a large handsome building of a yellowish stone, and has been erected about twenty years.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c., &c.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I., II. AND III.

I

The scene opens on a cold, cheerless afternoon in November, when a carriage containing an old gentleman and a fine, handsome youth of nineteen years is dashing along on the way from Wootton-under-Edge towards Kingswood Hall, the residence of one of England's proud nobility. The youth demands of his aged companion some information respecting his birth and parentage. This the old man declines, but says that he is taking him to Kingswood Manor, where he has a right to shelter, and adds, mysteriously, that Lord Kingswood can solve the mystery. The youth at first refuses to proceed, but upon his companion declaring that his residence there is a sacred duty he owes one who is dear to him, he acquiesces in the wish of his associate. He confides, also, to the youth his name, which he was to keep secret. He also added that he had been his true friend, and would ever prove so.

In a short time they reached Kingswood Manor, one of those noble old residences so common in England. The aged man and his youthful charge alighted from the carriage and inquired for Lord Kingswood. The former was ushered into his presence, while the youth was taken to another apartment which looked on a magnificent woodland scene. While buried in gloomy reflections and forebodings, a pair of tender hands were pressed over his eyes, and a sweet, silvery voice cried out,

> "Guess my name,
> Or a forfeit I claim."

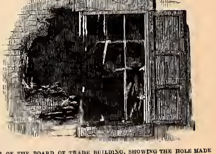
Erle Gower, for such was the youth named, sat utterly bewildered. The hands were removed, and a beautiful girl stood before him. Their astonishment was mutual. After casting a terrified glance, she ran away like a frightened fawn. At the earnest entreaties of Erle, the beautiful girl returned and apologized for her unwitting familiarity, by telling him that as her cousin Cyril was expected she mistook Erle for him. She then disappeared.

Erle remained in a reverie for a few minutes, and with the instinctiveness of jealousy cried, "I hate that cousin Cyril!"

II.

The room to which the attendant ushered Ishmael Malpas—the name of the elderly traveller already alluded to—was a large study, where sat a handsome man in the prime of life. Lord Kingswood rose abruptly to his feet as he entered, and rebuked his attendant for thus conducting any one unannounced to his presence. He then, in a stern voice, ordered him to retire. When the two men were thus face to face, Lord Kingswood said, in an uncertain tone, "I did not expect to find you the bearer of that note." A scene of the most wonderful power ensues, in which the visitor, whose real name is Vernon, harrows the soul of the guilty nobleman with recounting the wrongs of an injured lady whom the earl had married and deserted. The youth is, of course, the child of this unhappy lady. The whole range of sensational literature does not contain a more thrilling chapter.

It appears that while Lord Kingswood had endeavored to beguile the virtuous scruples of his beautiful victim, the marriage had actually been legal, so that when he thought he was seducing his victim he was really marrying her. When Ishmael Malpas told him this, and also that the youth lived and was at that minute beneath his roof, his anguish was indescribable. What if Lady Kingswood should learn it? The thought was distraction.



REAR OF THE BOARD OF TRADE BUILDING, SHOWING THE HOLE MADE BY A PIECE OF TIMBER WEIGHING 250 POUNDS WHICH WAS BLOWN ACROSS THE RIVER.

After an interview, Ishmael sprang into the carriage and was driven away leaving Erle, the youthful stranger, at Kingswood Manor.

III.

No sooner had the carriage driven away, than Lord Kingswood left his study to prevent his haughty and jealous wife from being the first to meet the young stranger. He found Erle Gower in the apartment to which he had been shown, and Lord Kingswood, in an artful conversation, endeavored to draw from the youthful stranger what he knew of himself. Finding that he really knew nothing of his name or lineage, and that even Mr. Vernon, who brought him hither, had only seen him on that special occasion, his mind grew calmer, and, in answer to the youth's fervent entreaties as to who and what he was, Kingswood answered that he was the son of a deceased officer, and Kingswood's particular friend. He also informed Erle Gower that Kingswood Manor would be for a time his abiding-place. As he was thus conversing with his young guest, the door of the apartment opened, and Lady Kingswood entered. Lady Kingswood was a fine woman about forty, and still retaining the traces of great beauty. Jealous to disposition, she was inquisitive to rudeness. Her husband introduced the young Gower to her as the orphan of a dear friend, a statement which she received with a smiling incredulity. She at once took upon herself the care of entertaining him, and, bowing to both, she left the room.

When she disappeared, Lord Kingswood urged upon his protege the necessity of great caution and discretion in replying to the questions of his wife. He then left Gower to his reflections. Soon after the housekeeper of the Manor came and showed him to the rooms intended for him. They were at the extreme end of the edifice, and decidedly the most ancient. A smaller room opened out of the sitting one, in which there was a massive bedstead. On the wall there was a portrait of a lady, which strangely roused the recollections of the youth. The fires were made in the old fireplaces, and he was told that his dinner would be served in his own room, as Lord Kingswood had guests. This stung his pride, but he had no alternative but submission. He therefore eat his dinner in gloomy silence, and after spending a most melancholy evening, he went to bed, but it was not to sleep. Fancies thick and fast poured through his brain, which at length found in slumber a respite. He threw himself upon his bed, and regarded the portrait of a lady, young, and of strange, weird-like beauty. A singular thrill passed through his frame as he gazed on it; he felt he had seen that face before, but whether in his dreams or in his infancy he could not tell. As the Manor turret clock struck midnight, Erle suddenly sat up in his bed, his eyes wide open and fixed. He stepped lightly on the floor, and walked across the apartment, as though pursuing some object.

THE WRECK OF THE STEAMER AS IT APPEARED AFTER THE EXPLOSION—CARRYING AWAY THE DEAD BODIES.—FROM A SKETCH BY T. WILLIAMS.

He entered the sitting-room with the same slow, measured pace, still as if in pursuit, and paused before an oaken door, situated in a remote corner of the apartment. Then he clasped his hands upon his temples, uttered a low cry, and fell on the floor as though bereft of life.

CHAPTER IV.

> Seeming at first all heavenly under virgin veil,
> Soft, modest, meek, demure,
> Once joined, the contrary she proves, a thorn
> Intestine, far within defensive arms
> A cleaving mischief, in his way to virtue > Adverse and turbulent.—Milton.

As the turret-bell, with a deep and sonorous tone, chimed the hour of one, Erle sprang from his prostrate position to his feet, and gazed wildly around him.

His lips moved rapidly, and gave utterance to incoherent words, those alone audible being,

> "The heir of the race, by God's holy grace,
> The wronged to right,
> His own to regain,
> Shall toil and fight,
> In sorrow and pain
> Till he solves the wonder of Kingswood Chace."

It seemed as if the repetition of the words recalled to him a consciousness of his position. He covered his eyes with his hands for a moment, and then looked once more slowly and earnestly around him.

The decaying wood embers threw a flickering glare upon the quaint, grim old furniture, and caused them to look more grotesque and ghostly than in the daylight. He was some little while before he could realize his situation, and then, drawing a long breath, he murmured,

"I have been dreaming. But, merciful Heaven, what a horrid dream!" A shivering fit seized him, and hurrying to his bed-chamber, he divested himself of his attire, and buried himself beneath the clothes.

Out of an unrefreshing sleep, disturbed by wild and feverish dreams, he was awakened by Lord Kingswood's valet, a dark, sallow faced looking individual, excellent, no doubt, in his capacity, but by no means attractive in his personal appearance.

He was precisely one of those individuals into whose arms nobody, especially the softer sex, would feel disposed to rush with enthusiasm. He had a long visage, beetling brows, and shifty, restless black eyes.

Erle naturally frowned as this visage presented itself on opening his eyes to his gaze, even though its owner had done him the service of waking him from a distracting dream, and without a word, inquired by a glance why he had aroused him.

The man replied as if questioned.

"By the orders of my Lord Kingswood, I awaken you to inform you that it his lordship's wish——and it is understood here that his wishes are commands—that for the present you will confine yourself scrupulously to the apartments you at present occupy. There are guests at the manor, and his lordship deems it advisable, that until their departure you should remain secluded in your chamber. Every attention to your comfort will be paid. I am instructed to control that arrangement. His lordship will shortly pay you a visit, and hopes to find you contented and obedient."

Erle gazed with indignant eyes upon him.

"What!" he cried, "am I to be detained here a prisoner?"

"There will be no objection on his lordship's part to your indulging yourself with a walk in the Chace," returned the valet, with an offensive superciliousness of tone. "But you will proceed to it by a communication which leads from a door at the end of the adjoining corridor. It has not been used for many, many years. His lordship alone keeps possession of the key; here it is. He entrusts it to you, but it must not leave your custody. Shall I convey to his lordship that you readily assent to his wishes?"

"To his commands," responded Erle, with a curling lip. "You will inform his lordship that I must perforce comply, as for the present I cannot help myself."

The valet raised his eyes with a sinister look, and with the habitual bow, he disappeared.

It was daylight, the sky was blue, and the air without seemed frosty. Erle rose at once, and hastily attired himself, and entered the sitting-room.

As he advanced to the centre, his eye fell upon the oaken door, in the furthermost corner of the room.

He started, and placed his hand to his forehead with a confused manner. After a few minutes' thought, he muttered,

"A dream, but how singular—how terrible!"

He approached the window, but the gardens and pleasure-grounds were not visible, and the figure of that young girl, whose touch, the day before, had thrilled every nerve in his frame, was not to be seen in any direction, nor that of any other human being either.

He ate his solitary breakfast, which he found prepared for him but no attendant remained to wait upon him, so he partook of it sparingly, and under a most painful sense of loneliness. He quickly grew restless and impatient, and the sight of the key, which Lord Kingswood's valet had given to him, resting on the table where the man had thrown it, determined him to take advantage of the permission given to him to visit the Chace.

The door at the end of the corridor was quickly found, and as quickly, though not without difficulty, unlocked. Erle saw before him a staircase, which ascended as well as descended, but he took little note of it, and closing the door behind him, he proceeded, aided by a very dim and uncertain light, down a worn, narrow stone staircase, with a rude iron railing for banisters. He continued his descent until he fancied the stairs were interminable; but it was not until he found himself in utter darkness that he halted.

His first impulse was to retrace his steps, his second to proceed. It seemed improbable that the valet had given erroneous directions to him. Besides, he had read that these old places had curious modes of communication with the outer precincts, and no doubt the present way of entrance to the Chace remained as when built some hundreds of years previously. He therefore continued groping his way, until he at length reached the bottom.

Before him, shining in the darkness, upon a level with his eyes, there appeared to be a glittering diamond. The next instant the illusion passed away, and he decided that he there perceived the outlet to the Chace.

He hurried along still—save the small light from the aperture—in utter darkness, over uneven, damp and slimy ground, until he was rewarded by the object of his search. A massive iron door, pierced with circular holes, crossed protectingly by small bars of iron, opposed his further progress; but his key, when applied to the lock of this iron door, after repeated trials of his utmost strength, turned it; there remained two massive bolts to remove. One more powerful exertion of his muscular strength, and he succeeded in opening the door sufficiently wide to squeeze through the space, narrow as it was. He then found himself in a gap, choked with an undergrowth of brushwood and shrubs.

He looked upwards, and found the branches of tall trees spread high above him, intervening between the earth and sky. He forced his way through the entangled mass of briar, thorn and gorse, and he stood fairly and freely in a copse forming part of Kingswood Chace.

Everywhere around him grew trees forming alleys and vistas, leading in all directions of the compass. Already acquainted with the precautions necessary to be taken in forest ramblings, he attentively regarded the form and character of the tree nearest to the gap, and the position of the sun, and commenced cutting notches in the nearest trees, and sticking pieces of paper on straggling twigs, as landmarks by which to find his way to the gap again. While thus employed, he heard the shriek of a female voice, sharp, quick and piercing. The sound rose up like the cry of a wounded bird, and did not appear to emanate at any great distance from him.

He hastened towards the spot, and soon ascertained that he was on the right track by hearing sounds of altercation.

He distinctly heard a voice exclaim—"Stand back, you ruffian, or I'll shoot you! Stand back, you scoundrel, or I'll fire at you!"

A few hasty leaps, and an impetuous burst through an entangled thicket, and he emerged into a glade.

Immediately before him stood a youth in shooting garb, holding a double-barrelled gun ready to raise to his shoulder and level, confronting a shaggy-haired, gipsey-looking fellow, of huge stature, who, with clenched hands, was preparing at all risks to make a spring upon the armed young sportsman.

Upon the green turf, near to the youth, lay in a swoon a young girl, in a light dress.

The ruffian had paused in his leap as Erle came crashing through the boughs, for he was uncertain whether a friend or an enemy would make an appearance; but when he saw a youth of no greater calibre than the one he was about to attack he laughed coarsely.

The young sportsman cried, excitedly—

"Aha! A friend, I see! My good fellow, raise up this young lady, and carry her away through the glade to the left. I'll come to you presently. Halt before you get far, because I know where to convey her, and you don't."

"Give me the gun," cried Erle, as he seized hold suddenly of the weapon. "You know where to bear her, and who to deliver her up to. I'll keep this fellow at bay until you are safely away; then I'll follow with the gun."

"Bravely said—hurrah!" cried the young sportsman. "I owe you a good turn for this. Stick to him—our keeper will be up in a minute; you can return my gun to him."

All these words were gabbled rather than spoken, and quite as rapidly was the transfer of the double barrelled gun made.

The young sportsman lifted quickly the prostrate girl in his arms, and hurried off with her.

A glance informed Erle that she had a face of marvellous beauty; but it was blanched as if death had already made his claim.

With an oath the gipsey ruffian moved towards the retreating sportsman, but Erle placed himself with a bound before him.

He raised the gun to his shoulder, and aimed it point blank at the man's head.

"Stay where you are, or I'll give you both barrels in the skull," he cried, in a firm, determined voice.

The man halted.

"You git out o' my way, or I'll cut thee weasand with my knoife," he responded, drawing from his pocket a formidable clasp-knife, which he opened.

"These triggers are quicker than your hand," returned Erle, speaking with cool steadiness. "You put out a foot to approach me; or raise that hand with the knife in it, and by the Supreme Power that made me I'll give you the contents of the gun."

"D'ye s'pose I keare for the peppercorns in thee gun?" exclaimed the ruffian, snarling like a dog. "They'll flatten again my head like biled peas again a stone wall. I tried 'em."

"Don't try these," answered Erle, covering the fellow's head with the muzzle of the gun, and speaking without excitement.

"Thee be'est a bold lad, an' I don't want to hurt thee," exclaimed the ruffian, as he caught a glimpse of the fluttering dress of the girl in the arms of the young sportsman disappearing among the thickly clustered tree-stems. "But I tell 'ee what, an' thee don't gi' back, by gosh I'll jump on thee, an' cut thee, and slash thee wi' knife as I would a varmint, I tell 'ee."

He drew a pace nearer, with his knife clenched in his hand, and crouched as if he intended to wait for the shot and dodge it, and then leap upon the youth and half kill him, before he pursued the young sportsmen carrying off his prize.

"Back, you scoundrel!" exclaimed Erle, in a louder and more energetic tone, though by no means exhibiting flurry. "I can hit a titlark on the wing, and if you move an inch nearer I'll blow your eyes out."

But the words were hardly out of his mouth when the fellow ducked down and made a bound towards him with extraordinary agility and power. He reached him, and grasped at the barrel of the gun, but missed it, as one of the barrels accidentally went off, discharging the shot harmlessly in the air.

The next instant, Erle, however, nimble as himself, was twenty paces from him, and he discharged the remaining barrel full at the ruffian's body. The shots struck him on the breast: two or three buried themselves in his face. He uttered a howl of pain, staggered and fell, but rose in an instant again, for the thickness of his sandy-colored velveteen coat prevented the charge from having any further effect than the one above described.

He dashed at Erle, who was, however, prepared for him with the gun clubbed, ready to strike him down with the butt end of it. As the fellow reached him Erle swung the weapon round his head, and delivered it; but the ruffian, with the agility of a wild cat, escaped the intended blow. As the butt-end of the gun reached the turf he instantly made a spring at him, to bury his knife in his body, but a mound of turf, unseen by him, tripped him up, and he fell heavily on the ground.

At the same moment, a brace of pointers, attracted by the report of the gun, came bounding into the glade, followed by a gamekeeper and a couple of beaters.

The ruffian scrambled up, and exclaimed, between his teeth, as he shook his clenched fist at Erle—

"Keep out o' Kingswood Chace if thee wouldn't ha' slit weasand. I'll kill thee if ever a' meet thee alone as sure as moy name be Tubal Kish—that I will."

Then, with the speed of a deer, he darted off in the opposite direction to that in which the gamekeeper was advancing.

The dogs as soon as they beheld Erle holding the gun with the stock on the ground, lay down, and in a few seconds more the gamekeeper came up, and Erle briefly related what had taken place.

The gamekeeper, with a look of surprise, took the double-barrel in his hands, and, examining it, said

"Why, it is the young squire's gun."

Then turning to Erle, he asked which way the squire took. Erle pointed it out to him, and the gamekeeper, accompanied by dogs and beaters, hurried away, saying—

"The young master is the one we must follow. Yonder rough will bury himself like a fox in the earth. His must be a keen scent who can unkennel Tubal Kish when he is once stole away."

Erle, left to the pursuit of his own ruminations, devoted himself to the task of recovering the track to the gap, in which the entrance to the subterranean passage, leading to Kingswood Hall, was situated; and, not without the exercise of skill and consummate patience, discovered it.

He worked his way beneath the brushwood, retraced his steps, fastening the iron door as before, and ultimately he regained his own apartment, having taken sufficient careful notice of particular objects on his return, that he should be able to find his way to the corridor, in connection with his room, without difficulty again. He had not long re-entered his room when he received a summons to attend Lady Kingswood in her boudoir, as she desired to have a little conversation with him. He obeyed the request brought to him by Mrs Muddlemist, in her usual pompous manner; from which, however, she occasionally departed to give a quick and shivering glance around the room, and an amazing stare at Erle, as though he had performed some unexampled feat, and yet continued to live.

As soon as he was alone with Lady Kingswood, who reclined with a listless, luxurious manner on a rich fauteuil, he found that he had not been cautioned in vain respecting the communications he would be called upon to make, for Lady Kingswood put every variety of questions to him, from delicate suggestions down to rude and abruptly direct queries. His impatient manner, his burning cheeks, though witnessed by her, did not absolve him from her seemingly inexhaustible interrogations.

At last, having extracted all she was likely to obtain, she said, musingly—

"And you really assure me that you are unacquainted with your parents—your extraction, in fact?"

With closed teeth, inflated nostrils and humid eyes, Erle bowed to her.

"You do not, in fact, know who you are?"

Erle drew himself proudly up, and said, in a tone made rich by emotion—

"I am Erle Gower. A name may disgrace as well as elevate. I will not stain the name I bear."

"Romance," murmured Lady Kingswood, gazing steadfastly at him, unable to suppress a feeling of admiration at his handsome, flushed face, and really noble bearing. "By your own argument it is well to have had a father known to the world favorably, for the former possessor of the name of Gower might not have been held in high odor by the honorable."

"And he may have been, madam!" exclaimed Erle, almost fiercely, "else, madam, why am I beneath this roof, or under the protection of Lord Kingswood?"

Lady Kingswood looked at him fixedly. Really, the boy was very handsome and very gentlemanly in his manner and appearance. Would it be possible for him to become attached to her? A young and graceful companion, with a form so elegant and attractive as his, would be highly desirable to one who went so much abroad by herself. Lord Kingswood certainly grew more inattentive to her and more unsociable every day.

Suddenly she remembered that he had spoken, and bending her head towards him, she said—

"I beg your pardon, my thoughts ran away with me—what did you observe?"

"That those to whom I am indebted for my existence could scarcely have been so undistinguished as your ladyship, pardon me, unkindly suggests, or the Lord of Kingswood would surely not take sufficient interest in me to provide for me a home beneath his own roof," he answered with offended dignity.

Her eyes, as he concluded, flashed fire. She half rose up, with an air of excitement, and said, with severity,

"You have touched a chord there. Lord Kingswood does take an interest in you. Why does he do this?"

"I do not know," he replied, with a lowering brow.

"I appeal to your love of truth, Mr. Gower," she said, urgently; "tell me I earnestly request you, why does Lord Kingswood take so remarkable an interest in you?"

"Lord Kingswood will himself inform you, madam; I cannot," returned Erle, adding—"I beg that your ladyship will not prolong an interview which you cannot fail to perceive must be very painful to me."

"Hardly less to me, Mr. Gower," she returned, "because you have increased some misgivings and raised others by your inability to give me the information I require. Have you seen Lord Kingswood, to-day?"

"I have received a message from his lordship, but I have not seen him," answered Erle, reluctantly.

"Ha!" exclaimed Lady Kingswood, half soliloquising. "So, then, he knew where you have been located. Consummate hypocrite!"

Musing for a minute, she presently inquired what message his lordship had sent to him, and he informed her, though he did not mention that he had already taken advantage of the permission to visit the Chace.

"One moment, if you please," she said to him, motioning to him to be seated, for he had not yet, though directed to do so, taken a seat in her presence.

She placed her fair hands to her temples, and gazed upon the fire thoughtfully. She remained some few minutes thus. Then arousing herself, she muttered,

"I will prevail in this!"

She addressed herself to Erle, and smiling upon him with the most winning, fascinating expression she could bring to play upon her features, she said,

"The interest Lord Kingswood takes in you cannot be of a kind to keep you incarcerated in the dreariest part of this dull pile. You will dine with us to-day; I will acquaint Lord Kingswood that it is by my especial desire that you favor us with your company. The second bell will summon you to the drawing-room. If you are in doubt as to its situation, your attendant will conduct you to it. Good morning—Erle—I think you said your Christian name——"

"Erle!" he replied.

"Good morning, Erle!" she exclaimed, turning upon him a glance intended to be enchanting, but which had only the effect of perplexing him.

He bowed low to her, and smiled because she smiled. He hastened from the room, heartily glad to be released.

"He will certainly be an exceedingly handsome man," she murmured, with a sigh, as he departed.

"What a variable woman!" he ejaculated, as he returned to his apartments; "singularly unamiable and rudely inquisitive, yet excessively pleasing in her manner, too, if she so wills it."

Erle dressed for dinner with more care than he had ever before bestowed upon himself. Nothing appeared to satisfy him, even though, according to her indirect promise, Lady Kingswood had sent him a supernumerary valet to assist him at his toilet.

As he arranged and re-arranged himself before the glass, he seemed to feel a pair of exquisitely soft hands pressing on his eyelids; probably that was the reason he could not see himself as he wished to look.

The second bell beat a responsive blow on his heart every peal. Never had he felt so nervous, so little self possessed before.

Attended by the servant, he descended to the drawing-room, and entering, found a large party assembled. There were elderly men, young men, elderly ladies and young ladies, but not a face he recognised.

Many inquiring eyes were turned upon him; some glances were remorselessly fixed upon him by dowagers. A clergyman, with a kindly look, alone bowed and smiled as he passed, and glided to a recess leading to one of the windows.

He fancied he should be able to stand here alone, unnoticed and unquestioned, and he noiselessly moved into it

To encounter a pair of deep, lustrous, blue eyes, fixed upon him in amaze—questioning, half tempted, half-gratified amaze.

Here alone, unnoticed but by himself, stood the fair owner of the soft, small fingers, and the silvery, musical voice.

What was he to do—what was he to say? He had not been introduced to her; he did not know who she was; he was quite convinced that she could have no idea of his identity.

He felt this: his eyes, large and handsome, fastened themselves with an earnest look upon hers, but his lips refused to utter a word. He bowed timidly, and she responded timidly, too. Her cheek crimsoned, her brow became roseate. She turned her face to the window, and it became white as death.

She turned again her eyes upon his. Not unkindly, very far from that was the look: but appealingly, as though to remind him not to mention how they had first met.

She seemed as if she would speak. Then, as if unable to withstand the brilliancy of his eyes—their expression was soft and dreamy, too—she turned away again, and gazed out of the window.

As she did this, she pulled the leaves from the flowers of a beautiful bouquet she held in her hand to pieces, and they lay like snowflakes upon the floor.

At this moment there was a slight buzz and a stir among the folks near them. A pleasant laugh replied to some warm and friendly observations, and the fair young creature turned her eyes smilingly, with evident pleasure, in the direction whence the sound proceeded.

"Cousin Cyril!" she murmured, audibly, and with unmistakeable satisfaction.

A shade passed over Erle's face, and a pang went through his heart.

Another moment and Cyril was at their side.

"Ha, sweet little coz!" he exclaimed, with a tone of joyfulness, "I have not seen you the whole day—I have been in despair; do I not look ill?"

"I never saw you looking better or happier, Cyril," she replied, smiling, and speaking in a tone Erle thought far too tender, though she did happen to be his cousin.

As she concluded, her cousin Cyril gallantly raised her hand to his lips. As he released it he turned to encounter Erle, who had witnessed the action with a feeling of impatient annoyance.

Each recognised the other in a moment. Cyril, with an unequivocal expression of surprise spreading over his features, held out his hand, to which Erle instinctively responded, and he felt his own pressed with warmth.

"My brave friend of this morning!" ejaculated Cyril, with ardor. "How glorious that we should meet here!" He suddenly lowered his voice. "Not a word about the adventure in the Chace. We will discuss that when we are alone." Then, resuming his natural tone, he continued, "You are a guest here—that is evident; but it is strange that I should not know you. Pardon me, to whom have I the honor, as well as the pleasure, of speaking?"

Before Erle could answer, a silvery voice, proceeding from one immediately behind him, cried quickly,

"Mr. Gower, Mr. Gower!"

He turned, and beheld, almost at his elbow, Lady Kingswood, magnificently dressed. She made a gesture for him to come to her side

At this instant dinner was announced, and her ladyship, in a manner far more affable than condescending, said to Erle,

"Mr. Gower, will you favor me with your arm?"

Erle started, and as he rapidly glanced round the assembly he perceived that every eye was fastened upon him with an expression of amazement

Flushed and embarrassed, he hastily tendered his arm to her ladyship, who at once placed her small, gloved hand upon it.

In their rear, some one pressed up, and in a voice which formed its sound through clenched teeth, exclaimed,

"Lady Kingswood!"

They both turned. Before them they beheld Lord Kingswood, livid with rage. He pointed to a tall individual of distinguished appearance near to him, wearing very long and ample fair moustaches, and possessing very dreamy eyes. His lordship whispored to his wife,

"The Marquis of Chillingham will——"

Lady Kingswood's eyes fluttered, she half closed them, and addressing her husband in cold, measured tones, she said,

"I can hardly have misinterpreted your lordship's wishes. If I have, permit me to express my regret. It is too late to alter the present arrangement. Lady Maud will, with pleasure, accept the honor the marquis designed for your humble servant. Allons, Mr. Bowyer!"

She beat to Lord Kingswood, and marched off with Erle, sweeping along with a grand bearing, though she turned and spoke to her young and embarrassed companion in a low, confidential tone, rendering him more confused and uncomfortable, and leaving all who observed her help-lessness to whisper to each other, in a mingled curiosity and amusement.

"Who is he?"

CHAPTER V.

He sought Aurora's eyes in vain,
Unconscious like a rustic upon her cheek.
Now they're ready and on our side
In those who strive smile, their smile bespeaks
A strong interest under a mask.
Smile of America's there was sought to plant.—Byron.

The famous old Manor was in a state of excitement and brilliant affair. Actuated by high political motives, Lord Kingswood, of Kingswold, had for months labored to all the people of wealth and influence residing within ten miles of the estate, and the invitation had, a week previous, been issued to a select list of the personal presence of those thus specially favored. For be it understood it was considered in the country that the honor to be entertained by a splendid suite at the table of Lord Kingswood, of Kingswold.

Among those thus favored were the Sir Charles, of Hooke, near the, descendant of one of the oldest families in the country—the squire, his lady and handsome, still-fashioned looking people. Scarcely were they in aspect, stiff and starched in manner, extremely reserved in speech, and escaped the latter by confining their conversation to subjects of the most general character, and which could not be construed into a display of personal curiosity. Looking at Jem, it was difficult to say which was the most stiff, he son or Sir Charles or the mother of the son. They all possessed large, golden, inexpressive eyes, which every now and then fixed themselves on Jem, dropping their copacious eyelids over them. Altogether they resembled those who are voted to glowing majesty and power, and consented the antiquity of their station.

In strange contrast to Sir Charles, of Hooke, were the Cottons, of Dursley Court, who were a family of a very new creation. That is to say, Governor Cotton, the progenitor of the present race, was not with the rest of his species, trace his lineage down through Noah to Adam, but was a species of Yankee Doodle, who, as soon as he was upon, as his immediate progenitor was not known to the exactly inquiring genealogic authorities who traced the pedigree of the noble and, while yet a child, into a factory. He was an instance of what may be accomplished by a man of energy, industry, perseverance and enterprise, and what may be achieved by paying small wages and gaining large profits. Once a penniless boy, he was now a first class prince, and proprietor of Dursley Court, which he had bought for two hundred thousand pounds. Of course, he was very reticent about his manner, while his wife and the two Miss Cottons kept themselves rigidly within the boundaries of the most approved of the old, old Smithites. There was the Vicar of Kingswood and his lady; Mr. Bowyer, Mr. Wilks, a rising young barrister, who was the son of more mind as a monument's notice; Mr. Chichell, Member of Parliament for Tetbury; Sir Wm. Lyon, Bart., and Lady Lyon and his son Philip, together with many others it would and nothing to the interest of the tale to be enumerated. Of course, there was a select number of familiar certain political views entertained by Lord Kingswood.

They were not invited to meet the Lord of Kingswold.

The marquis was an unfortunate minister and a member of the cabinet. It was true, power had been wrested from the unscrupulous statement of Lord Kingswood, and in short, almost to secure the minister's subsidies.

Lord Kingswood was therefore exceedingly anxious that the marquis should be excited and have a good time of it, and that the wine and spare expert. The singular conduct of Lady Kingswood exceedingly displeased him with unexpectedness and annoyance.

It was not possible for him under the extraordinary circumstances to alter the arrangements, and request Lady Maud to remain out to the occupation of the post of honor at the table, and he was obliged to make the best he could of the circumstances, and console himself as he could with the reflection that the marquis was very partial to the society of the fair sex, and would be pleased with the change.

Lord Kingswood followed the marquis to the dining-room, almost dragging the unwilling mistress of the house after him, while Erle threw his arm with him in his eagerness to speak to the marquis. They approached the dining-room.

"Her ladyship, you perceive, my lord marquis," he whispered, "grows more peculiar with every passing moment. I fear that her ship has already observed and commented upon with your secretary an unbecoming familiarity."

The marquis exhibited an even row of white teeth, the perfection of the dentist's art, and looked down upon the face of the speaker from a slight ad-climb of the throat, which compelled him to remember his chin, though he hadn't forgotten it.

"It is, I presume, her ladyship's prerogative—nay, surely that of every lady present—to be peculiar, my lord," he replied, with a mingled, admiring the beautiful young girl whose fingers rested upon his arm.

Lady Maud dropped her eyes and smiled, but made no reply.

The marquis was subsequently to the fact that he was not, as his tactless eye more settled on the form of Erle.

But Lord Kingswood was evidently not satisfied, and upon whom Lady Kingswood is now leaning, with quite a distinguished air, too. Who is he? Surely not Jem Bowyer? Yes, it is Jem Bowyer.

A pair of bright eyes that eyes were bent upon Erle, as the marquis looked to him. Perhaps they were not entirely unobserved by her contolerer trembled, perhaps a rising blush tinged the cheek of the fair young lady, but if so, Lady Maud, at all events, felt that her heart accompanied her involuntary anxiety to catch Lord Kingswood's words.

Lord Kingswood blushed too, but not slightly; a comfort his confused indignation, and he was about to speak, when one of the persons he perceived that Lady Maud glanced up at his face as it curious to hear its reply.

"A—my lord marquis, he is a—an orphan," he stammered, the son of a friend—a—I might say a relative."

"Her ladyship's," suggested the marquis, in a dry, sarcastic tone.

"A—she, yes, my lord marquis," he stuttered.

"In short, a family secret," laughed the marquis, dropping his voice.

"A family secret, my lord?" returned Lord Kingswood, in a low, deep, inaudible whisper, intended evidently to close the subject of conversation.

Lord Kingswood glanced at the face of the Lady Maud to be assured her to take his post at the table. Her eyes were fixed, and she looked, and her eyes were downcast, but she seemed to be heeded this brief conversation with the utmost attention.

Nevertheless not a sentence had escaped her ear.

As the company thronged into the dining-room, Lord Kingswood turned his eye in the direction of his wife, and was about to make approach of the noble guest, intending to invite him to the seat next to her. He was exceedingly annoyed to perceive that Erle Rene should not occupy that seat, and he need to give some inexpressible to his butler, to conduct his noble and distinguished visitor to a place upon his own right hand.

He was too late! Lady Kingswood had caught the eye of the marquis as he entered; a great receivedly object was sufficient, without the intercession and the protocol and frequent affectation of that awful dignitary the butler, who bowed only to high nobility —who had been already instructed by his mistress to act quite contrary to the wish of Lord Kingswood. The marquis, still endearly Lady Maud, bowed to her ladyship's end of the table, and seated himself, at her request, upon her right hand.

Erle, silent, seemed to be lost in his fit yet with a proud bearing outwardly, though inwardly emotions of doubt, by her ladyship's direction, his seat upon her left hand. Lady Maud occupied the next seat to him.

Cyril Kingswood, full of life and animation, was placed next to his father, and between the two giggling Miss Cottons, whose dresses were lavishly with diamonds, which a princess might have envied them the possession of. The other guests were disposed according to pre-arrangement.

And so the dinner commenced.

Lord Kingswood had intended to make political capital out of this entertainment. He was in an opulent degree master of the art of hospitality, and of pleasing and real, but he was also in unpart information and knowledge with ease and fluency. He possessed wealth and influence, and was a man of the world and of manners, he voice assumed a mellow tone, his face wore a winning smile, his deportment was courteous and graceful, he was, in short, patiently and attractively to whatever remarks were addressed to him, and all in all he was a host to be proud of. He was a lucky attaching much value to the opinion he opposed, but superior to the fear of it, he always expressed his sentiments without disagreeably pronounced.

He never had a more desired to shine, never did he feel himself so completely obscured by circumstances as unexpected as they were unpleasant. The handsome face of the young Lady Maud, which drew all other thoughts out of his brain. Mockett was never so dismal a failure as upon this occasion. Nevertheless, Lord Kingswood was at the presence of the gate, haughty-looking boy, who sat with his chin thrust out, and his eyes fixed on the ceiling, and observers.

A man in vain that his lordship endeavored to display marked attention to the solemnly dreary Stafferts, to be complaisant with the sweet-looking Miss Cottons, to be agreeable to the marquis, agreeable to the barrister, chatty with Sir Walter Lyon, an agreeable to the rector of Kingswood, and to be courteous to all, under the direction of Lady Kingswood, or from watching Erle Gower, or from listening to the conversation of Lady Maud and the Marquis of Chillingham, so conversing with Lady Kingswood, he kept his call, and was a most successful entertainer.

Sick at heart, confused by the distorted thoughts and suspicions which were crowding upon him, Erle Rene sat with his head averted rather coupling incorrectly to observations made to him by Lady Maud, and with a sensation of pain and mortification that pitied fits of confusion and mis-and aberration had prevented him making himself known to the young lady. He was conscious that necessary to induce a spirit of cheerfulness and ease into the minds of the guests, and to make them forget, if they had felt it, the little embodied conversation, each with his neighbor, and then into general conversation, and he was aware that the young lady at his side was not one of the most ill-at ease.

He had been almost instantaneously struck by a conviction that Lady Kingswood was the lady of the Lake-side residence, and that, however coldly or harshly all the world might treat him, he could not be the unworthy object of her love. He felt that he was not one who did not feel or wonder at the cause.

He had been placed in a most embarrassing position, it was that he was seated next to the fair young Lady Maud.

He had been introduced to her by Lord Kingswood form in their first bow and remarkable utterance, and now that he beheld her in the full blaze of her beauty, and in the light of her rich, noble and elegant attire could contribute, it is easy to comprehend that his confusion was not entirely unnatural.

He was not her loveliness, however, that attracted him. There was a charm in her manner, a kindness in her address, and a sweetness and amiability shining in her countenance, which drew his heart to her.

He had been almost instantaneously struck by a conviction that Lady Maud was one of those rare women who, by the influence of their

GREAT MASS MEETING TO ENDORSE THE CALL OF THE LEGISLATURE OF SOUTH CAROLINA FOR A STATE CONVENT
MONDAY, NOV. 12, 1860.—FROM A S

TION, TO DISCUSS THE QUESTION OF SECESSION FROM THE UNION, HELD AT INSTITUTE HALL, CHARLESTON, S. C., ON Sketch by our Special Artist.—See Page 3.

PINEGROVE HALL;

OR, THE

WHITE LADY OF THE SWAMP.

A TALE OF THE SOUTH.

By M. Dana Shindler.

CHAPTER XVI.

In this relative position they continued for some time, Edward meanwhile considering earnestly the best method of soothing the poor demented creature. The kindness of his countenance, and the firm yet sympathizing look of his fine dark eyes, produced an evident effect upon her, but she changed like a flash of lightning the moment he made the slightest demonstration of his intention to draw the boat ashore.

At length, in one of her softened moods, she moved stealthily towards the rope, and, taking it in her hand, tried gently to pull it from him. Looking in his face with a beseeching gaze she murmured some words of entreaty in a voice wonderfully soft and musical; but he shook his head, and only held on the tighter. Then she pulled harder, and the tones of her voice grew louder and harsher; the round red spot upon each cheek grew brighter, and her eyes began to dance and sparkle.

Edward prayed to Heaven for guidance, for he knew not how to manage the case. He was intensely excited, for the life of a human being, a young and beautiful woman, "one more unfortunate," seemed to be placed almost in his hands. Of the infant he scarcely thought at all.

In a beseeching tone of voice he addressed her, and stretched forth one hand to beckon her to his protection, but she shook her head wildly, and tugged furiously at the rope. Finding that she grew worse every moment, and knowing that this state of things would some time or other come to an end he concluded at all events to draw the boat to land; but no sooner had he began the task than the woman, with a fearful shriek, threw both arms around her baby, rose up suddenly, and sprang into the water.

CHAPTER XVII.

In an instant Edward's coat was off, and he plunged in after her. He was not long in finding and bringing her to the shore. The babe was still clasped fondly in her arms, and opened soon its pretty little eyes, but the mother was already quite insensible.

Edward bore them in his arms to the cabin, made as comfortable a bed as he could with the poor materials at his command, and, with a sad but hopeful heart, set about the work before him, which was, first of all, to restore to life the poor creature to whom death would have been a blessing.

But human life is a sacred thing, and Edward keenly felt the awful responsibility which was resting upon him. Night was coming on, the sun was sinking in the west, and, though the spring was somewhat advanced, the evening was rather cool.

His first care was to make a rousing fire. This was no difficult task as he found dry materials all around the cabin door, and he had matches in his pocket, and the cheerful blaze he soon produced infused its pleasing influence into his heart, while it gave him the light and warmth he needed for his work.

He was a man, and she was a woman; he young and ardent, and she young and beautiful in form most beautiful; but never did purer heart beat in a human bosom than Edward Alston's heart that awful night. That cabin was one of the holiest spots on earth.

He removed her saturated garments, and covered her with his own warm cloak; for he had been too much of a hunter not to go from home without ample provision for changes of weather. He chafed her icy limbs with his own warm hands and held her in his arms near the fire that she might feel its reviving warmth. When the baby cried he took a biscuit from his pocket and chewed it into pap, feeding it, as the birds do their young, from his own mouth.

At length, made dry and comfortable, the baby slept, and Edward continued to work upon the still insensible mother. She certainly grew warmer; yes, he was sure of that. But that might be merely the influence of the fire. At length he was rewarded; his efforts were crowned with success, for she opened her eyes and gazed upon him. His heart sent up its song of praise to Heaven, but he said not a word.

Taking a flask from his pocket he prepared some warm brandy toddy, which he held to the lips of his patient. At first she shut her eyes and refused to take it; but he stroked her forehead for awhile, as though trying to mesmerize her, and then offered it again, and this time it was not refused.

She soon felt its restoring influence, and looked around for her baby, endeavoring at the same time to raise herself from the bed; but Edward gently laid her head back upon the pillow, and going to the corner where he had placed the baby, he raised it gently in his arms, and brought it without awaking it to the mother. She laid it on her bosom, gazed earnestly at Edward, said a few words in her sweet Spanish tongue, which, though he could not understand, he knew to be pleasant words; and then, closing her eyes, she fell into a calm and refreshing slumber.

Night closed in and the sufferer slept on. Edward watched over her as a mother would have watched her child. When the baby awoke he gently removed it from her arms, and though she held it tightly, as though unwilling to give it up, he firmly though quietly removed it, and the mother still slept on. Soon the baby also was asleep again, and everything was quiet in the cabin.

Edward replenished the fire and seated himself near it, then drawing from his pocket a miniature edition of Shakespeare, which he always carried about him, he began to read it by the light of the fire.

At length a sound from without caught his attention. He laid down his book and listened. He certainly heard voices—human voices. Rising softly he went to the door, opened it, and looked out. He saw nothing, for the night was rather dark; but still he heard the voices as of people talking in a suppressed tone. He was gazing out of the front door in the direction of the canoe, but soon he became convinced that the sounds came from the back part of the house. He stept noiselessly up to the sleeper, to see whether the noise, slight as it was, might not have disturbed her; then finding that she still slept quietly, he left the house to ascertain what was going on in that apparently uninhabited spot.

CHAPTER XVIII.

When he reached the back part of the house, and had put aside some of the tangled vines which obstructed his view, what was his surprise to see lights moving hither and thither on the water of the swamp, at the very place where he and his companions had crossed from one spot of land to another that very day. Immediately he came to the conclusion that the cabin he had just left was the rendezvous of a gang of lawless men, and instinctively he put his hand into his pocket to feel for his trusty pistol.

Finding that the party were about to land and ascend to the cabin, he withdrew into the deep shade of a monstrous vine, and stood perfectly still, resolved to be guided by circumstances.

The company, apparently six or seven in number, came slowly on, picking their way by the light of the torches which some of them carried. To his surprise, he saw that two of them were females, but he could not yet distinguish their faces. They came on and on, and he saw—could he believe his eyes—his own sister and his betrothed! Yes, there they certainly were, as large as life, Lucy Alston and Laura Ford.

Edward stept forth from his concealment and stood in the path before them. They were not surprised to see him, though he appeared so suddenly, for they knew that he would be wide-awake and on the watch.

Behind them were Charles and the real Louis Legrange, and still further behind were faithful old Tom and one of his fellow-servants.

When Charles and Tom carried to Pinegrove Hall the startling news they had to tell, Lucy and Laura, womanlike, had insisted on going immediately to the assistance of the poor woman for whom they had so long been seeking, and for whose sad fate they had so often mourned. Hastily collecting together all the articles they thought they would be likely to need, they packed them in a large basket, and each mounting a trusty horse, sallied forth at night at the call of humanity, to thread the intricacies and to tempt the dangers of the swamp. Charles begged them to wait till morning, but they would not hear of it, the poor woman might die in the meantime they said.

When they reached the cabin the woman was still asleep. Lucy and Laura bent over their suffering sister, and shuddered to think that one so young, so delicate and so beautiful, had met with so sad a fate. Louis Legrange examined her features with a thoughtful countenance, and then looked intently on the floor as if trying to recall something to his mind.

Just at this moment the woman uttered a deep sigh and awoke. She looked surprised and alarmed to see so many people in the cabin, and missing her infant from her arms, endeavored to rise. Edward thought of it in a moment, and hastened to bring the baby from the corner in which he had laid it. She stretched forth her arms to receive it, and smiled in Edward's face as he bent over her to lay it safely on her bosom. He had evidently gained her confidence.

Louis had retired from observation when he found she was awaking, but at Edward's request he came forward and addressed her in Spanish. She replied to him with a bewildered stare, but as she gazed a look of recognition stole over her features, and reaching forth her hand, she said a few words in Spanish.

"'Tis just as I thought," said Louis, in English, as if speaking to himself. "Poor creature! Poor Juanita!"

They now entered into a long and earnest conversation, which Louis interpreted to the rest from time to time. She had married, she said, the man she loved, and he had brought her to that cabin, till, as she said, he could provide for her a better home. He had been very kind to her for awhile and provided for all her wants, but after awhile he stayed away from her so much that she was afraid he loved her no more; so she braved everything, and used to leave the island at night and wander about in search of him. They had two canoes, so that when he had taken one she had still the means of getting to the main road.

He used to bring her, she said, plenty of beautiful things, which he told her to keep against the time when he would get a fine house in some fine city. She often wondered where they came from, but she knew he was smart enough to get anything he wanted, or to do anything he pleased.

He often, she said, let her leave the swamp with him, but as soon as they got to the main road, would kiss her and send her back. But he got to staying away so long that she became uneasy; and one afternoon, by dint of hiding behind trees, and following him when his back was turned, she traced him to a certain house. There, from a hiding place in the avenue, she used to see him talking to a beautiful young lady, and she knew from the expression of his countenance that she herself was to be cast aside for another love. The thought maddened her, and she determined to see the young lady and to tell her by signs, if in no other way, that she alone had a right to her husband's love. But she was frightened away by suddenly seeing her husband in the piazza, and she was afraid that he would be angry if he caught her there.

She brooded, she said, over her wrongs. For days and nights together he often left her now, and though he kept her supplied with food, she was almost constantly alone. Night after night she would steal away and watch him talking in the piazza to that beautiful young lady, and one night she took a loaded pistol with her and tried to kill her rival. That night her husband had nearly caught her, for he rushed out of the house and pursued her, but she managed to escape. He beat her severely, she said, for it. As she said this, she covered her face with her hands and rocked to and fro with a low moaning noise, then added, "but for all that, I love him still; I love him still!"

"How long is it since you last saw him?" inquired Louis.

"Oh, so long, so long, I can hardly tell. I believe I have been mad, I am sometimes mad now. When he was last here he brought me a great quantity of bread ready cooked, and said he was going to the city for a little while, and if I followed him he would kill me. I slipped out before he went and hid one of the canoes; oh, how hard he tried to find it; but he seemed in such a hurry. I would have followed him to the city, but I didn't know how to get there; and besides I think I have been ill. I went to the beautiful young lady's house and watched her from my hiding-place; but there was another gentleman with her then, and they held each other's hands, and I saw that they loved each other dearly, and then I knew that it was not she who had taken my husband from me."

"Was this the young lady?" inquired Louis, leading Lucy forward where the light from the fire could shine upon her face.

She gazed earnestly at Lucy, who could not keep back the tears that sprang to her eyes at the piteous aspect of the poor deserted creature. "Yes, yes," she cried, extending both her hands towards her, "where is my husband? Oh, tell me, where is my husband?" Then knowing that she could not understand her reply, she turned inquiringly to Louis.

"She says," replied Louis, "that he went to the city, and she has not seen him since."

"But she knows where he is; oh! tell me—tell me—take me to him!" Thus exhausted by the violence of her emotions, she fell back in a fainting state upon her pillow.

CHAPTER XIX.

The party had brought various restoratives with them, and they worked with the poor creature all the rest of the night, but with very little effect; the powers of nature seemed well nigh exhausted. Anxiously they watched for the dawn, that they might remove her from that miserable and lonely dwelling to a more comfortable spot. As Louis had informed them she was the daughter of a wealthy Cuban planter, who had been accustomed to every luxury and indulgence; and they shuddered to think what her sufferings must have been in that lonely spot; but had she always been the humblest and poorest of God's creatures, she would have been just as well cared for by the true Christians who had come to her relief.

The morning came at last, a beautiful spring morning. Finding that the sufferer grew no better, they consulted together, and agreed to remove her, ill as she was, to a more comfortable home.

Charles and Tom had declined crossing the water at the front of the cabin, because they knew the other way better; and it was now decided still to take the old way, as it would be easier to carry the patient on a raft than in a small canoe.

I will not weary my readers with a minute description of the journey. Though not very long, it was full of difficulties; and they more than once repented having made the attempt; but when they saw the invalid safely laid on a soft, clean bed in one of the best rooms of Pinegrove Hall, and that she certainly was no worse than when they had left the swamp, they were heartily glad of the change.

But the patient did not rally much. On the contrary, she seemed to be gradually sinking; and, indeed, it seemed hardly desirable that she should live to know for what a villain she had fled from her doting father, whose heart had been broken by the blow.

It will be remembered that there was another invalid at Pinegrove Hall; another victim to the arts of the same unmitigated villain.

Poor Claudine had been at the very gates of death; but, thanks to a good constitution, good nursing, and the good Providence who orders all things, she was now better; in fact, quite out of danger. Her brother Tom devoted himself to her day and night; and her eyes followed him affectionately wherever he went; but nothing could rouse her from the state of quiet melancholy into which she had fallen.

They had not thought it best, at first, to tell her that Mason's real wife was under the same roof with her; for they did not wish any allusion made to the sad mistake which had blighted her young life. But at length they began to think that the excitement of seeing a greater sufferer than herself, and the very child of the man who had wrought her ruin, might draw her thoughts from herself; and, by enlisting her sympathies for another, might do her great and lasting good.

They consulted the doctor on the subject, and he caught at once at the proposal. "The very thing," he said. "I wonder I did not think of it myself! But I was always a stupid old blockhead, you know, Lucy, my dear!"

"I don't know any such thing, doctor," said Lucy; "I know you're the nicest old soul that ever lived."

"Hear, hear!" shouted the doctor. "But now we'll go right up stairs, and see to this matter; and the sooner it is done the better; for that poor young Spaniard has but a little while to live." And the good old doctor cleared his throat suspiciously, and walking to the window, whistled the liveliest tune he could think of.

CHAPTER XX.

"Now, Lucy, my dear," said the doctor, "who will be the best person to break this matter to Claudine?"

"You may laugh at the idea, doctor," replied Lucy, "but I think old mom Pris will be the very best one. She has been able to manage Claudine throughout her whole sickness, better than any of us; better even than her brother Tom."

"Why should I laugh at the idea?" said Doctor Park. "Where the feelings of the heart are concerned, give me a black skin before any other. They obey orders, too, and don't spoil everything by exercising the right of private judgment. Where's old Pris, Lucy, my dear?"

Old Pris was called, and taught her lesson. She was to arrive at the fact in a roundabout way, the doctor said; she was not to plump it right out.

"Let old Pris 'lone, marse doctor!" said the old woman; "I knows jis how fur tell de chile: does'nt I, ole man?" This was addressed to old Tom, who, feeling that Pris had no right to any secret in which he was not a sharer, had volunteered his presence.

"I respect my ole woman, marse doctor, is uncommon smart 'bout the tongue," said Tom, "but she ain't always judgmatical."

"But I don't like judgmatical people, Tom," said the doctor; "I don't want them about me; especially in a sick room. That's just why I like Pris, because she ain't judgmatical."

"Ah," said Tom, shaking his head sagaciously, "that being the case, marse doctor, perhaps my ole woman might do."

"Oh, she'll do, Tom, she'll do, never fear," said the doctor.

They entered Claudine's room together, Doctor Park, Lucy, mom Pris and daddy Tom, who would not be left out of the party, probably because he felt some responsibility in regard to the manner in which mom Pris would acquit herself of the great responsibility that had been laid upon her.

They found Claudine reclining upon a sofa, near an open window, her cheek resting upon her hand, and an expression of hopeless grief upon her sunken features. Beside her sat her brother Tom, looking almost as wretched as herself. They both looked somewhat surprised at this influx of company, so strangely assorted; but old Tom soon managed to account for his presence by proceeding to take out a window sash—it was quite a warm day—which he said he was going to wash. At Claudine's bedside mom Pris was always welcome.

"Well, lady bird," said the doctor, in a cheerful tone, "how is it to-day? Haven't you a single smile for me, when I've cured you up so nicely?"

"Perhaps it would have been better," said Claudine, with a languid smile, "if you had let me die, doctor."

"Not a bit of it! Not a bit of it!" said the doctor; "I never let my patients die if I can help it; do I, mom Pris?" Old Tom pricked up his ears and listened for the old woman's answer.

"No, dat you don't, marse doctor," said Pris. "I can take my davy to dat; and I does wish to gracious dat you would cure up all your sick people; 'cos I don't wish my marster's house to be a hospitable no longer."

"Ah, thar now," granted old Tom; "that thar ole nigger's gone an' done it, now! They might a knew it!"

Tom Bondo started to his feet and looked first at Pris, then at the doctor, and finally at Lucy, who colored highly, and knew not what to say or do. But Claudine understood mom Pris better than her brother, for she only smiled and said, "One patient doesn't make a hospital, mom Pris."

"But you see, my dear Miss Claudine," said Pris, "dar's more'n one patient, my chile."

"Woman, are you crazy?" exclaimed Tom Bondo, who knew full well who that other patient was.

"No, my dear Marse Tom," said Pris, dropping a low courtesy: "not as I knows on."

She then turned to Claudine, and was about to say something more, when Tom Bondo exclaimed,

"Old woman, will you leave this room or not? for if you won't, I'll see if I can put you out!"

Dr. Park now took Tom Bondo by the hand, and drew him to the window, where he explained to him in a few words why they had thought it best to tell his sister about the Spanish woman.

"We ought to have prepared you for it, my dear boy," said the doctor, "but we never thought of it."

Tom was very dubious about the propriety of the measure, but quietly returned to his sister. He found her busily engaged in cross-questioning old mom Pris with more of eager interest than he had seen there since her illness.

"Dat a God's blessed truth, Miss Claudine," said Pris. "I isn't told you no lie; thar's a sick lady in this same blessed house what's a heap worser off dan you is. An' you's gittin well enough now, my chile, to go an' see what you kin do for her."

"Worse off than I am!" said Claudine; "that can hardly be. She may be sicker in body, she may be near to death—in that case she is far better off. Oh, doctor, you ought to have let me die when I was so near to death."

"Well, I'll see about it the next time," said the doctor.

"Miss Claudine, chile," said mom Pris, "dat poor ting sort o' b'long to you."

"Belongs to me?"

"Yes, my dear chile, she an' her baby, all two."

"What do you mean, mom Pris?"

"It's dat poor creetur, Miss Claudine, my chile, what was lef' in de swamp, an' what my marster and mistress took from dar while you was a lying onsensible."

"The swamp? the swamp?" repeated Claudine to herself. "What did I hear about the swamp? Oh, oh, oh—I remember now—I remember now!"

CHAPTER XXI.

She had a long and hearty fit of crying, which undoubtedly did her good. At length she looked up and began to question her brother.

"Who was it that he said was in the swamp?" she asked.

Her brother tried to tell her, but soon broke down, not knowing how to put his ideas into words that would not wound her feelings.

"Ask mom Pris," said he.

"Who was it, mom Pris? was it a woman?"

"Dat it was, honey! A poor, beautiful, onfort'nit, forsaken woman, an' baby too."

"His baby?"

"His baby, my dear chile, sure as you're livin."

"Oh, God! oh, God!" she exclaimed, as she hid her face in the cushions of the sofa. Then, rising suddenly, she exclaimed, "Take me to them! Oh, Brother Tom, take me to them!"

Tom looked inquiringly at the doctor, who came forward, took Claudine's hand, and felt her pulse.

"I cannot let you go," said the doctor, "unless you promise that you will be perfectly calm. My other patient cannot bear the least excitement. She is almost gone, and it would kill her at once."

"Oh, I will be perfectly calm," said Claudine. "I am quite calm now."

"Not quite," said the doctor; "compose yourself, my dear, and then we will all go."

With the docility of a little child Claudine sat down and waited, the doctor still feeling her pulse. Her lips were firmly pressed together, and her eyes were closed, and when after awhile the doctor said, "Come, my dear!" she rose calmly, took her brother's arm, and they all left the room together, old black Tom feeling considerably de trop, but not willing to be left out of a group in which his old woman played so prominent a part.

As they entered the chamber of the interesting invalid, she turned her large dark eyes upon them, looking with considerable curiosity at Claudine, whom she had never seen before.

Louis Legrange, her interpreter, was seated near her, and so were Charles and Edward. The baby, fast asleep, was lying on the bed beside her. Its fat little hand unconsciously clasped one of her emaciated fingers, forming a mournful contrast.

Notwithstanding her promise to be calm, Claudine was very nearly overcome by her emotion, and sank into a chair near the bed, looking very pale, and trembling all over.

"Who is that lady?" asked the dying woman, turning to Louis.

"She is, like yourself, a child of sorrow," answered Louis.

"Was she deserted, as I was?"

"She would have been, if her betrayer had lived long enough."

"Who was her betrayer?"

"Can you bear it if I tell you?"

"Ah, I know, you need not tell me."

She turned her dying eyes on Claudine, who sat, still pale and trembling, before her, gazed on her long and earnestly, and then reached forth her hand. Claudine advanced to the bed, threw herself on her knees beside it, took the emaciated hand, which had been held out to her, and laid her head upon it. Another flood of tears came to her relief. The room was perfectly quiet, excepting now and then a sob from the weeping Claudine, and the somewhat laborious breathing of the dying woman.

At length the latter spoke to Louis.

"Tell her," said she, "to dry her tears, and stay calmly by me till I am gone."

Lords had left.

"I will," said Claudine, "I will be calm, and I will stay with her to the last." Alfred could say no more, but she must have suffered more than he. Turn, noble friend her, she placed her chair be side the bed, and rested her—all there, saying, "That is my place. Brother, you will not have to nurse me any more."

And then the baby woke and began to cry. Claudine sprang to take it, seeming all of once to have recovered all her strength, and she betrayed it not, but walked to the cradle, took the baby, came forward, took the baby, smiled in the wet manner who had been pre viously fed, and in there were tears again spoiled.

"Let them bring my baby here when it has sucked," the mother said to Lord.

The baby was brought, and the mother asked to be raised up. Then taking her child in her arms, she handed it to Claudine, saying:

"It can still take it, it is young.

Lord interpreted.

"Oh, thank you, thank you!" said Claudine. "Tell her so, M. Legrange. Tell her it shall be mine, my own. I will be to it a mother, and will tell it of its mother ever."

When the dying mother heard these words she smiled, fell back on her pillow, her eyes closed, her face parted, and she was gone.

THE END.

THE PROMISE REDEEMED.

A Tale of Genoa.

CHAPTER I.

It was night. The sky was clear and starry, and the wind blew in chilling gusts through the dark and narrow streets, and even along its principal streets, but few persons were abroad, for the inhabitants of Genoa had retired within the mansion of the darkness admitted.

It was the season of the Feast of Assumption, and the holy day of the holy child, who he just assumed her station with joy. The merchants was a mid-day, a Neapolitan by birth, but having married a Genoese lady, he had settled in her native town's profession to her death, and partly from habit, as by from inclination, he was a confirmed bachelor.

Amidst the cares of any calling, and the pursuit of gainful lotion, Adeline had grown to womanhood, and was esteemed in the city's loveliness. A single beauty could not be more perfect than she was, and her mind and heart would around be guarded by and her eyes—she is brotherly like. Rather than brunette was a fragrant. The color was delicate, and the eyes dark and her voice was sweet, and about as on as the summer wind.

Many were the admirers who sought her favor, and many a crown to win her favor. But, contrary to all she smiled on none in particular. As the evening advanced the streets of the city were filled with gay parties and revelers, being herself even confined to her father's house, and the sound of music and dancing reached her ears from distant palaces. The windows opened into a magnificent garden, and being by a fine evening, Adeline had seated herself on the rear of the main set. The moon was up, though at times partially obscured, but at times more very bright, and whether viewing a cloudy sky, stooped out upon the terrace to breathe for a moment the pure air. She was about to return, when she observed a figure ascend the flight of the terrace, and it quickly she heard a voice more breather than in a tone not to be mistaken, and which thrilled through her heart.

"Adeline, my own, my beloved Adeline!"

Under in red, dressed, he replied, as he stepped her to his heart. Could I know that this was all that I am to see of you? Is a pledge homage to the fairest flower, no such to me can still be my all?"

"In the name of the holy mother, dear Lorenzo, depart. You have no fresh testimony of my affection."

"No, lovely one! I will not depart. Truth, proudly. "I both believe and love you. I know that although the highest in flower sigh for her love, the daughter of the Senator Gonsalvo is not to be won by the rich or the great. Her heart is free, and I will not depart from the spot where I have found it, without the promise from her lips, and placed it in the hands of Adeline. I can come hither no more, for I am watched, and my life would be the forfeit of my entry, dearest, as you are, and prized it. You will prize it, although an inferior gift to many, for it is my heart. Will you accept it, Adeline, a pledge for him who is—shall be for ever?"

"What can I say, dear Lorenzo?" replied the lovely beauty.

"I can say," he replied, "to bid you farewell. Nay, hear me, my love, for I must not stay. Adeline, I am not of the rank of your father, but I am not of low birth, and can worthily claim your hand, for which do not think be well hear of me as the dearest lover I can declare."

"I dared Lorenzo, to be true to me, and to me alone."

She could proceed in his arms around her, and drew her trembling form to his breast.

"I must be strong," he said. "I have lingered instinctly here too long to part as you and myself, you must not see me again. Adeline, this is a fair world. A thousand paths are open to me which will lead either to fame and fortune, and I will not rest till I have gained one or the other. Then I will return, and claim you as my own. Farewell, my beloved Adeline. Let us be together, in words breath and let us keep them with unmeaning influence. Heaven and all around us witness that we are united from this hour before God."

"Amen," she replied in the same breath, and drew her trembling form to his breast.

"You shall not forget me," she said.

"I must not change

THE LATE U. S. FAIR AT CINCINNATI.

THE STRIPED TENT—NEW YORK CITY HEADQUARTERS — TRAVEL ON THE NEW YORK AND ERIE, AND OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROADS, ETC.

We have taken from our portfolio and note-book some of the many sketches and notes prepared by our representatives at Cincinnati and St. Louis, and give them as a part of the matter of our present number. Among them will be found illustrations of C. L. Fegley's great Importing Rotthewurst House, from sketches by D. J. Compton, our artist correspondent ex St. Louis; and the luminous Striped Tent manufactured by Gompert, the celebrated awning maker, 101 Bowery, this city, from a sketch by H. Lovie, Esq., which formed the popular headquarters of the New York city delegation at the Fair, composed of representatives of the American Watch Company, P. S. & French, the great Umbrella Washing Machine firm; Bartlett & Lesley, the celebrated Pulaf Refrigerator firm; Henry C. Spalding, Esq., so widely known for his business enterprise, originality, advertising and remarkable success in connection with his celebrated Pursured Ghee; George B. Griffin, and Clinton Rice, Esq., the legal advisor of the U. S. S. The members of this delegation tendered polite hospitalities to members of the Press, and were especially honored with a visit from Governor Dennison and many other distinguished visitors attending the Fair, including several parties of Indies. They also paid us a special compliment by placing on their flag which waved over their beautiful tent the name —FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER—which could be seen from all parts of the fair grounds, and attracted universal attention and comment on the part of visitors, and especially from the local press of Cincinnati, whose representatives were especially attentive to the gentlemen, Messrs. Lovie and Stuart, representing us at the Fair. From their testimony and our own knowledge, we are fully prepared to pronounce Cincinnati and Cincinnatians an institution "as well as to tie to" in a storm.

This beautiful tent received a premium, and has since become the property of Mr. Henry A. Robbins, of the firm of Robbins & Appleton, General Agents of the American Watch Company, and is likely to be the scene of many a pleasant gathering and fishing party on the banks of the various popular far-away angling resorts in different parts of the country, habitually visited by its present owner, who is a summer devotee to the scaly theories of dreamy old Izaak Walton.

▶ We are also under special obligations to the Hon. T. R. Smith, Acting County Clerk of Hamilton, to W. W. Foulke, Esq., the Cincinnati poet; to Messrs. Smith & Nixon, the enterprising agents of Steinway & Sons; and to Messrs. Sumner & Wright, the popular and efficient agents of Wheeler & Wilson, all of whom tendered our representatives valuable information and assistance. We also received gratifying evidence of the popularity of our Illustrated Newspaper in a substantial shape from Messrs. P. & G. Bogen, I. Jacobs and other prominent citizens, largely connected with the trade and prosperity of Cincinnati.

Among the Cincinnati institutions that ought to be more widely known is the great Music Hall, on Fourth street, built and owned by Messrs. Smith & Nixon. This superb Hall is eighty feet wide and one hundred and ten feet deep, with a concave floor rising toward the rear, and seated with twelve hundred armchairs on a floor raised but about two feet from the ground, thus rendering any accident or fatal crush an impossibility. Its acoustic qualities are of the highest order, which makes it very popular with vocalists. The Hall stands back from Fourth street one hundred feet, on which it has at present an unpretending entrance. It is the intention of Messrs. Smith & Nixon, as soon as an existing lease expires, or erect a magnificent building fronting on Fourth street and connecting with this admirable Hall, to be devoted to their immense piano and music business.

U. S. FAIR, CINCINNATI—THE STRIPED TENT, WITH FRANK LESLIE'S FLAG FLYING.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR CORRESPONDENT.

Messrs. Sumner & Wright have the largest Sewing Machine rooms in the world, under Pike's Opera House, and have the exclusive agency for the sale of the Wheeler & Wilson sewing machines in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky and Missouri, with a large branch establishment on Fourth street, St. Louis, under the charge of Mr. A. Sumner.

The New York and Erie Railroad we found to be in unusually good condition, and evidently growing in the good opinion of the traveling public, which will be vastly increased so soon as the six feet gauge line, which is now rapidly in progress, after having been delayed for some time, shall be completed from Dunkirk to Cincinnati, where it will connect with the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, which will thus form a continuous, uniform broad gauge line from New York, on the Hudson, to St. Louis on the Mississippi, whence it will ultimately extend across the Continent, finding a terminus somewhere in the supposed neighborhood of sundown.

We also found the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad to be in a very much better condition, and with better rolling stock than we had been led to expect previous to our late visit; and thus can cordially recommend both of these great roads to travelers from this point west, and vice versa.

BLONDIN'S DARING FEATS—CARRYING A MAN ON HIS BACK OVER THE ROPE.

DARING FEATS OF BLONDIN.

We present to-day a couple of sketches which illustrate in a remarkable manner what human skill and nerve can accomplish. One represents Blondin performing his daring feat of crossing Niagara on a rope with a man on his back, and the other walking over that frightful abyss on stilts. We have described these great achievements so fully in previous numbers that it is now only necessary to call attention to the illustrations, from which our readers can form some idea of the frightful reality of an achievement which belongs entirely to the nineteenth century.

DEATH OF SIGNOR ALBERTO MARIO.—We learn by private letters from Naples that Signor Alberto Mario, the husband of Madame Jessie White Mario, has been killed. He was sent by Garibaldi, at the head of a column of one thousand men, to put down a reactionary movement in Modica. The patriots were overpowered and cut to pieces by a body of Neapolitan soldiers six times their number. Only forty out of the thousand are reported as being saved, and in that number Mario's name does not occur. The encounter is said to have been tremendous, the Garibaldians having fought like lions, and against desperate odds. Signor Mario was a member of a very old Venetian family, who had lived on the same estates for centuries, and have suffered severely from time to time by the persecution of the Austrians. He was a barrister by profession, but in the year of Venice, in 1848 and 1849, he fought under Manin. Although he entered the service as a common soldier, his skill and courage soon raised him to a superior command.

A TALE OF ARCTIC SUFFERING. —William Armstrong, a sailor, arrived at Galway in the Prince Albert, tells a marvellous story of exposure and suffering. He says he was on the bark Mary, from Newcastle, outward bound, with stores for the Hudson's Bay Company; was wrecked August 11, by contact with icebergs. The ship Resolute in all escaped in two boats just before the bark was crushed and sank; wanted several days to get out of the ice-field, the men were principally falling from cold, at last got into clear water, was beaten about in all sixty-five days, when land was reached. Armstrong being the only survivor in his boat (the other boat's fate unknown). He was succored by Esquimaux, sent to a Moravian mission in Labrador, and thence to St. John, Newfoundland.

MURDER OF AN AFRICAN TRAVELER.—M. Malte Brun, not the old geographer, but the present editor of the Nouvelles Annales des Voyages, states in that periodical that he has it from the mouth of Dr. Barth that another name has been added to the martyrs of geographical discovery in Central Africa—that of Dr. Roscher, who had reached Lake N'Yassi. For the first time from the shores of Eastern Africa. During his long and painful journey he fell sick, was robbed of all he possessed by his own guides and the chief of the caravan, who was bound to protect him. He nevertheless persisted in continuing his journey. Arrived at Lake N'Yassa, he waited there for provisions, which had been despatched to him from Zanzibar. Having at length received them, he started in a northern direction, and succeeded in reaching the borders of Lake Tanganyika, where he was attacked in bed by two natives, armed with poisoned arrows, and died of his wounds. Other details for the present are wanting. It is greatly to be desired that this papers may be discovered, as his detailed account of a journey from Lake N'Yassa to Lake Tanganyika cannot fail to be of great interest to science.

A DUCAL VOLUNTEER IN GARIBALDI'S ARMY.—I do not know whether you are aware that another scion of the house of Marlborough is disguised the eldest son of one of the noblest dukes of the English peerage. Lord S——, the heir of the illustrious title of the Duke of S——, by his mother's side descendant of Sheridan, is the very soul of the regiment sent by the people of Free England to fight for Italian liberty. Kind to his soldiers, excelling in the performance of his duties, Lord S—— is the model of an officer, and his courage, activity and coolness are the envy of the best officer of any army of Europe. Of course his real name is known in the camp, and the Italians are not a little proud that a representative of one of the noblest families of England is in the ranks of the national army.

As Lord S—— always wears a sort of Italian red turban on his head, when he passes through our camp the Garibaldini come forward, exclaiming, "Here! here! look at the English lord!" and asking whether they can do anything for "Sua Excellenza."

A SUBSCRIPTION has been started in Ireland for the gallant captain and crew of the Marcus Scholtz, owned by the energetic United States Consul at Galway, Mr. I. M. Perose.

BLONDIN'S DARING FEATS—WALKING OVER THE ROPE ON STILTS.

DIRECT IMPORTATION OF QUEENSWARE TO ST. LOUIS, MO.

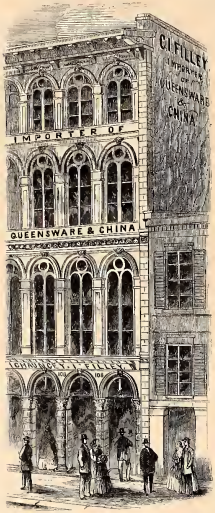
Chauncey I. Filley's Extensive Queensware Importing House — The Queensware Trade in the Mississippi Valley.

WHILE on a recent first visit to St. Louis we were vividly impressed with the cosmopolitan character of this great metropolitan city in the heart of the continent, and especially with the broad and statesmanlike views entertained by some of its commercial and manufacturing princes. As an illustration for our present number, we have selected the great Importing Queensware House of Chauncey I. Filley, Esq., the only Queensware dealer in the city, who has visited England and France, and carried into successful operation the idea of importing directly to St. Louis from the Old World potteries and manufactories.

Millions of dollars have been invested in the earthenware trade of the Mississippi Valley, chiefly at St. Louis, the New York of the West, and many large fortunes accumulated by men whose enterprise has found ample scope in purchasing their stock, at second-hand, through parties in New York and other home markets, thus, in reality, acting as middlemen between the manufacturer and the consumer, and, as a consequence, taxing the consumer with an advance on manufacturer's prices equal to the importer's profit.

After a careful examination of the whole subject of the earthenware trade of the West, Mr. Chauncey I. Filley, one of the enterprising young merchants and pioneer spirits of St. Louis, who had for some years been a partner with two of his elder brothers in the Queensware House, originally established by Mr. Giles F. Filley, determined, in March, 1848, to close up his copartnership matters, for the purpose of visiting the various European manufactories, with a view to establish a direct importing trade between them and St. Louis. This he succeeded in doing, and on returning home, in the beginning of 1849, he opened his present magnificent marble store, No. 108 Main street, St. Louis, where his success has been most decided and

(Continued on page 14.)



EXTERIOR VIEW OF CHAUNCEY I. FILLEY'S QUEENSWARE IMPORTING HOUSE, NO. 108 MAIN STREET, ST. LOUIS, MO.

CHAUNCEY I. FILLEY, ESQ.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY D. ELLIOT, STAFFORDSHIRE POTTERIES, ENGLAND

INTERIOR OF CHAUNCEY I. FILLEY'S GREAT QUEENSWARE IMPORTING HOUSE, NO. 108 MAIN STREET, ST. LOUIS, MO.

We have known a sisters preaching one exhange, who received an invitation to dine from any of their hearers; and were compelled to go to a public house for shelter and food. Some congregations are proud like this belong, which was probably a serious one. [Ex.

We should like to——had travelled far to preach to a congregation at ——. After the sermon he waited very patiently, expecting some of the brethren to invite him home to dinner. In this he was disappointed. One and another departed, until the house was almost as empty as the minister's stomach. Something recollected, however, he walked up to an elderly gentleman, and gravely said:

"Will you go home with me to-day to dinner, brother?"

"Where do you live?"

"About twenty miles from this, sir."

"No," said the man coloring; "but you manage to come it nice."

"Thank you—I will, cheerfully."

After that time the minister was no more troubled in that place about dinner.

Dyspepsia.

ONE great predisposing cause to the disease is the neglect and irregularity of action of the bowels; if the stomach and liver are troubled to effectively perform their office, the bowels must be aroused to do their duty. DR. TUTT'S PILLS exercise the most searching influence on these organs, thereby giving them vigor and health. Sold by druggists everywhere. 20 cents a box.

L. BARLOW'S VARIETY ENVELOPE, containing a package with assortment of envelopes, and a variety of jewellery of the same kind as ordered by the purchaser, forwarded by mail, free, to any address sent to, and on the receipt of 25 cents and a red for postage.

Discounts to the trade on these:
On an order of 5 packets at $1.25, I will send free of ex.
" " 12 " " 2.50, " "
" " 25 " " 5.00, " "

Circulars containing Terms to Travelling Agents and to the Trade sent to P. O. BARLOW, 154 Court St., Boston. 260-62

$85,000,000.—A BLUE BOOK

for officers and their pay in the 6th of the President of the United States, 1857, 8vo., cloth. Government work, just published. A complete list of every officer, from the President to the Lieutenant, with his bound, $0 with $100. Apply to Gen. Thomas S. Jesup, Brevet Major-General of Ordnance, 2 parts; Colonel, 1302 fields, 8th. Col. Irvin Gouverneur Barbour, Quartermaster-General of the fields, 230 states, 154. Johnson on Cash, $5. Many more books. Eleventh and Chestnuts sts. Perfect Publication, 56 each; sent, 10c., 10 cents. A Catalogue in preparation. Publisher of Annual Cyclopedia and Register of 1857, and acts as Patent Agent.

ALFRED J. BUNNELL,
Washington City, D. C.
261

Eminent Personages.

NOW ready, and will be sent for $2, the beautiful engraved Portraits, including Jeffries, Spurgeon & Barnard and Gladstone, with the Illustrated News of the World, or thirteen weeks' issue, post-paid, by G. A. BROWN & CO., 14 Spruce St., Boston, importers of English ingravings. Catalogue, 25 cents. 261

THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!

MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS,
AUTHOR OF THE POPULAR WORKS,
"FASHION AND FAMINE," "THE HOUSE-STEAD," "MARY DERWENT," "LOST JEWELS," "MALAESKA," ED-ITRESS OF PETERSON'S MAGAZINE, &c., are engaged on a new story, exclusively and exclusively for the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,
the best literary and fun (not Paper published)
ENTITLED
THE GOLD BRICK
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
Which will be ready to the
NEW YORK WEEKLY
OF THURSDAY, NOV. 15,
OR THEN DAY, NOV. 15,
1860.
For sale by every News Agent and Bookseller throughout the World.

Price, Four Cents per Copy.

Terms, $2 per Year, Postage Free. Specimen Numbers sent free. Address, with 3 cent P. O. stamps,

STREET & SMITH,
PROPRIETORS,
No. 31 BEEKMAN ST.,
NEW YORK

A ROCKING CHAIR WITHOUT ROCKERS. The "reception" Rocking Chairs sold by Terry & Wells, No. 652 Broadway, stand on eastern end rock without rockers. They are made in all the various styles of the ordinary arm chairs now used in parlors and chambers, and present a similar appearance. The rocking movement can be stopped by a catch, and the chair held rigidly either upright or at any inclination desired. This makes them very convenient for invalid chairs, for which purpose certain styles of them have been found very satisfactory. As a library or study chair, combining as they do of easy change of position, they relieve the fatigue of protracted sitting. They are peculiarly appropriate as a present to an aged parent or invalid friend. The entire absence of rockers, which wear carpets so injuriously, and are ever in the way, is the one great feature of this new invention. 260d

The Stove that Pleases Everybody.

THE "INDEPENDENT"
LARGE OVEN
COOKING STOVE,
For all Countries and all Climates,
FOR HARD OR SOFT COAL, OR FOR WOOD.
ADVANTAGES:
1. Self-cleaning from the ashes.
2. A Damping Grate and a Hole for combining the coal and ashes into the hearth.
3. The Grate Bars keep clean in all varieties.
4. The improved double-arch Flues, and extra large at the top.
5. The thickness of the linings and the extra lining and finish.
6. Great economy in the use of fuel.
7. Having with Brodhead's Patent Gauge Guillotine, which is done without burning or smoking the inside of the cook.
Nothing Requires Over—before the fire.
8. Hot Water Reservoir and Tea Closet if desired.
9. The Oven Flue Damper can be set for as well as any range, cook or heater.
Every Stove guaranteed. Sold by the principal Dealers in nearly every State in the Union.
Address BRADWELL & PERRY, Agents,
No. 5 Platt-st., (Tribune Building,) New York.

1860! PRICES 1861!

RE UCED
Queensware.
CHINA,
GLASSWARE,
&c.
CHAUNCEY I. RILEY,
DIRECT IMPORTER
AND WHOLESALE DEALER.
New Marble Row,
705 MAIN ST.,
ST. LOUIS, MO.

In presenting my first Ann ual Circular to the Trade, I have special reason, in the liberal encouragement and patronage extended to me by my partners, to thank them and extend a continuance of their favors; and to present the fact to the Trade in general that I am, and have been, selling lower than it has ever been sold in the West, and lower than it can be landed here from any market in the United States.

QUEENSWARE, &c., &c.,

Being the pioneer, and so fixed the only St. Louis Earthenware Dealer who has visited the

ENGLISH
AND
Continental Manufactories,

and opened a direct trade, I am prepared to, can and will compete with any market East or West.

I am now receiving, and shall be in the monthly receipt of Goods all DIRECT FROM THE MANUFACTURERS throughout the year, and shall cages a the largest and best assorted Store of

GRANITE,
CHINA,
COMMON,
MEDIUM COMMON,
GLASS, AND OTHER
WARE,

ever brought to this market, and not to be excelled or surpassed. Leave the exclusive sale of many new styles in this market, which cannot be had of the manufacturers by any other house in this city. I am also getting up still another new ware, which on its completion I shall have in store. It will be entirely original in design, very showy, combining new and important features of strength with elegance of properties, of which, too, I shall have the exclusive sale here.

Besides lowering very considerably the prices, I increased the discount on time bills and made liberal discounts to cash buyers, which I shall continue to do—soliciting, however, the trade of none but cash and prompt time purchasers.

SIX MONTHS

Why Merchants should Deal with Me.

Having been the first to reduce prices to the lowest possible rate, and a point which renders it unprofitable to purchase these goods East, lark the candid examination of Dealers to this fact whether it is not for their interest to purchase these heavy goods on near home as possible? If you will make a calculation of the cost of transportation of Ware, taking the actual weight of Plates, Pans, &c., &c., it will be found that a handsome profit is paid to railways and carriers, to say nothing of insurance, cartage, breakage, &c., and a not less important item, loss of time (delay), &c. Will you examine closely these facts?—and see whether it is not for your interest to place and continue your patronage with those who, like myself, in other branches of trade, are making the effort to cut down excessive profits, and compete, beyond the shadow of a doubt, with Eastern mart.

I shall continue to SELL CHEAP, and keep none but the best Manufacturers' Goods, and solicit your examination of my Stock, confident that you will find it to your interest to purchase from it, and especially solicit an examination from Eastern buyers.

My personal attention is given to the filling of Orders, and will guarantee as good satisfaction as if solicited in person by the purchasers.

Yours truly, &c.,
CHAUNCEY I. RILEY.
St. Louis, 12-0

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,

FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.
For curing and preventing Baldness.
For removing Scurf and Dandruff.
For beautifying, and making pliable the hair.
In fact the best and most effective compound ever found to do.
Be sure and get the right article
Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator.
Price 75 cents per bottle
Wholesale D. LEWIS & CO., Proprietors,
No. 165 Main st., Buffalo, N. Y.
Agents wanted in every town in the United States.
Try them, and you will acknowledge the fact. 260-67

The Union Clothes Dryer.

A NEW INVENTION—HOUSEHOLD, CHEAP AND PORTABLE.
By which Clothes or Bed Clothing of any quantity may be dried in a yard, a room, or on the top of a house. Can be put up and taken down in a few minutes, without injury to the most delicate fabric.
Price only $1 50 to $3.
J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors, 70 Cortlandt st. (near Broadway), New York, and 212 Union st., Brooklyn, N. Y.

100,000 for 1861!

ILLUSTRATED PREMIUMS TO GET-UP OF CLUBS.

Arthur's Home Magazine
For 1861! Vols. XVII. and XVIII.

EDITED BY T. S. ARTHUR AND VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

Devoted to the Literature, Art, Morals, Health and Fashion of the Home Circle.

So well known is the HOME MAGAZINE in all parts of the United States and the Canadas, that we are scarcely required in the announcement of its 16th annual to go into extensive characteristics. All that it now implies the editors have strived to make it more and more so.

Our purpose has ever been to give a non-sectarian, non-political, and non-partisan Magazine, that should interest with high moral aims, and teach useful lessons; and, more especially, to make it a welcome visitor to the home circle, containing as much matter in each number, and more in each volume, as any similar publication of the kind.

In the January number will be commenced a new Serial story entitled

NOTHING BUT MONEY;
By T. S. Arthur.

Mrs. Townsend will continue to furnish these stirring stories on social and domestic matters which have for two decades of so many visitors. 260d

Written for Character and Reputation

Will give those who write for them a reputation. Besides an extensive and popular DEPARTMENT, a portion of the Magazine is devoted to subjects of special interest to the Ladies. Each Number contains a Steel Plate Engraving, a Fine Fashion Plate, and Work Table Department, a series of Engravings, and a Music Page. Every Number is a perfect Gem.

AN ELEGANT STEEL ENGRAVING

is given in each number of the Magazine, besides from six to eight pages of wood cuts, mostly new patterns, patterns, and other choice illustrations.

TERMS—CASH IN ADVANCE.

We offer two elegant and attractive Steel Engravings as premiums to all who obtain subscribers to the Home Magazine. The first is entitled "Sunday Morning," size 20 by 24 inches. The second is entitled "Sunday Afternoon," size 20 by 24 inches. They are two delicate Engravings on enamelled paper, and would make handsome ornaments for any parlor. The publisher's price for these prints is $1 50 each.

TERMS, CASH IN ADVANCE.

1	copy (and one of the Premium Plates to select)	$2 00
2	copies (and one of the Premium Plates to select)	3 50
3	" " " " " "	5 00
4	" (and one extra copy of Magazine, and one Premium Plate to select)	6 50
5	" " " " " "	8 00
10	" (and one extra copy of Magazine, and both Premium Plates to select)	15 00
17	" (and one extra copy of Magazine, and both Premium Plates to select)	25 00

Three cent stamps must be sent, in every case, to pay the cost of mailing the premiums.

Specimen numbers sent to all who wish to subscribe, or make up clubs.

CLUBBING.

Home Magazine, and Godey, Harper or Knickerbocker, $3 50 per annum.

Home Magazine and Peterson's Magazine, $3 50 per annum.

Home Magazine, T. S. ARTHUR & CO., 323 Walnut St., Philadelphia. 261

The Rural American!

50,000 COPIES OF THE RURAL AMERICAN, of Utica, N. Y., will be issued on the 1st of January, 1861, containing the largest, most complete and most valuable list of Agricultural Warehouses in the United States. Every paper can now compare such a list with its real value—and it is in this list—and in the Rural American—that the value lies. Each Agent wanted in every town in the United States. Send for specimen copy and terms. Address, in the States, Vol. 6, August Journey St. Send your address copy and order to I. D. WOOD & SON, Utica, Oneida Co., N. Y.

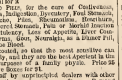
Traveling Agents

All paid $50 to $60 per month to canvass for the RURAL AMERICAN. Terms made in paper. Direct as above. 260

DR. HOGAN'S RHEUMATIC CURE.

—This invaluable French Specialty, and all Rheumatic Diseases, having been unanimously declared a specific against Rheumatism, is now perfectly harmless. It is a certain cure for all cases of Chronic, Acute and Inflammatory Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Sciatica, Gout, Sprains, &c. It is fast superseding all other remedies heretofore used. One bottle is sufficient in most cases, and makes a permanent cure. Price $1 per bottle. Sold by all Druggists. Depot, 129 Nassau st., 257 Broadway. Sent by Express to any part of the United States and Canada, upon receipt of the price. Pamphlet supplied. 25-60

WHAT SHALL I DO FOR MY HAIR?



LYON'S KATHAIRON, Rich, restored and preserved the natural color of the hair, and imparts to it a beautiful gloss. Nothing can exceed its delightful perfume. It is used by all who have once used it, and is the favorite dressing of the toilet. 261

Miscellaneous.

The Amalgamation of Languages.—There is a growing tendency in this age to appropriate the most expressive words of other languages and after a while to incorporate them into our own: thus the word Cephalic, which is from the Greek, signifying "for the head," is now becoming popularized in connection with Mr. Spalding's great Headache remedy, but it will soon be used in a more general way, and the word Cephalic will become as common as Electrotype and many others whose distinction as foreign words has been worn away by common usage until they seem "native and to the manor born."

'Ardly Realized.

Hi 'ad 'n 'orrible 'eadache this hafternoon, hand I stepped into the hapothecary's, hand says hi to the man, "Can you hease me of an 'eadache?" "Does it hache 'ard?" says 'e. "Hexceedingly," says hi, hand upon that 'e gave me a Cephalic Pill, hand 'pon me 'onor it cured me so quick that I 'ardly realized I 'ad 'ad an 'eadache.

☞ Headache is the favorite sign by which nature makes known any deviation whatever from the natural state of the brain, and viewed in this light it may be looked on as a safeguard intended to give notice of disease which might otherwise escape attention till too late to be remedied, and its indications should never be neglected. Headaches may be classified under two names, viz. Symptomatic and Idiopathic. Symptomatic Headache is exceedingly common and is the precursor of a great variety of diseases, among which are Apoplexy, Gout, Rheumatism and all febrile diseases. In its nervous form it is sympathetic of disease of the stomach constituting sick headache, of hepatic disease constituting bilious headache, of worms, constipation and other disorders of the bowels, as well as renal and uterine affections. Diseases of the heart are very frequently attended with Headaches. Anæmia and plethora are also affections which frequently occasion headache. Idiopathic Headache is also very common, being usually distinguished by the name of nervous headache, sometimes coming on suddenly in a state of apparently sound health and prostrating at once the mental and physical energies, and in other instances it comes on slowly, heralded by depression of spirits or acerbity of temper. In most instances the pain is in the front of the head, over one or both eyes, and sometimes provoking vomiting; under this class may also be named Neuralgia.

For the treatment of either class of Headache the Cephalic Pills have been found a sure and safe remedy, relieving the most acute pains in a few minutes, and by its subtle power eradicating the diseases of which Headache is the unerring index.

Bridget—Missus wants you to send her a box of Cephalic Glue, no, a bottle of Prepared Pills—but I'm thinking that's not just it naither; but perhaps ye'll be aither knowing what it is. Ye see she's nigh dead and gone with the Sick Headache, and wants some more of that same as relaived her before.

Druggist.—You must mean Spalding's Cephalic Pills.

Bridget.—Och! sure now and you've sed it; here's the quarther and give me the Pills, and don't be all day about it aither.

Constipation or Costiveness.

No one of the "many ills flesh is heir to" is so prevalent, so little understood, and so much neglected as Costiveness. Often originating in carelessness or sedentary habits, it is regarded as a slight disorder of too little consequence to excite anxiety, while in reality it is the precursor and companion of many of the most fatal and dangerous diseases, and unless early eradicated it will bring the sufferer to an untimely grave. Among the lighter evils of which Costiveness is the usual attendant are Headache, Colic, Rheumatism, Foul Breath, Piles and others of like nature, while a long train of frightful diseases such as Malignant Fevers, Abcesses, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Dyspepsia, Apoplexy, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Hysteria, Hypochondriasis, Melancholy and Insanity, first indicate their presence in the system by this alarming symptom. Not unfrequently the diseases named originate in Constipation, but take on an independent existence unless the cause is eradicated in an early stage. From all these considerations it follows that the disorder should receive immediate attention whenever it occurs, and no person should neglect to get a box of Cephalic Pills on the first appearance of the complaint, as their timely use will expel the insidious approaches of disease and destroy this dangerous foe to human life.

Cephalic Pills,
CURE
Sick Headache,
CURE
Nervous Headache,
CURE
All kinds of Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented; and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Laxative, improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS!

The genuine have five signatures of Henry C. Spalding on each Box.

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

All orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING

48 Cedar St., New York.

PHELAN'S PATENT BILLIARD TABLES, &c.
MANUFACTORY & WAREROOMS
63, 65, 67 & 69, CROSBY ST. NEW YORK.

HANDSOME WOMEN.

TO THE LADIES.

HUNT'S "BLOOM OF ROSES," a rich and delicate color for the cheeks and lips, WILL NOT WASH OR RUB OFF, and when once applied remains durable for years, mailed free in bottles for $1.

HUNT'S "COURT TOILET POWDER" imparts a dazzling whiteness to the complexion, and is unlike anything else used for this purpose, mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "BRITISH BALM" removes Tan, Freckles, Sunburn and all eruptions of the skin; mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "IMPERIAL POMADE," for the Hair, strengthens and improves its growth, keeps it from falling off, and warranted TO MAKE THE HAIR CURL; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "PEARL BEAUTIFIER," for the Teeth and Gums, cleanses and whitens the Teeth, hardens the Gums, purifies the Breath effectually, PRESERVES THE TEETH AND PREVENTS TOOTHACHE; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "BRIDAL WREATH PERFUME," a double extract of orange blossoms and cologne, mailed free for $1.

This exquisite Perfume was first used by the PRINCESS ROYAL OF ENGLAND, on her marriage. MESSRS. HUNT & CO. presented the Princess with an elegant case of Perfumery (in which all the above articles were included), in handsome cut glass with gold stoppers, valued at $1,500, particulars of which appeared in the public prints. All the above articles sent FREE by express for $5. Cash can either accompany the order or be paid to the express agent on delivery of goods.

HUNT & CO., Perfumers to the Queen,
Regent Street, London, and 707 Sansom St., Philadelphia.
The Trade supplied.

The Grover & Baker
NOISELESS
FAMILY SEWING MACHINE

Is rapidly superseding all others for family use. The DOUBLE LOCK STITCH formed by this Machine is found to be the only one which survives the wash-tub on bias seams, and, therefore, the only one permanently valuable for Family Sewing.

READ THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY:

"MRS. JEFFERSON DAVIS presents her compliments to Grover & Baker, and takes pleasure in saying that she has used one of their Machines for two years, and finds it still in good order, making a beautiful stitch, and does easily work of any kind."—Washington, D. C.

"I take pleasure in saying that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines have more than sustained my expectation. After trying and returning others, I have three of them in operation in my different places, and after four years trial, have no fault to find."—J. H. Hammond, Senator, of South Carolina.

"My wife has had one of Grover & Baker's Family Sewing Machines for some time, and I am satisfied it is one of the best labor saving machines that has been invented. I take much pleasure in recommending it to the public."—I. G. Harris, Governor of Tennessee.

"The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has performed fully equal to representation. My negro clothes were made with it last fall, and again this spring; and the clothes for winter are now being made with it. The coarsest kerseys, lowells, denims, &c., were used for the clothes. It has been used on many fine articles, such as calicoes, &c., for family wear. I am perfectly satisfied with it, and would not be deprived of its use for three times the cost of it."—Hon. Judge McGuire, Monroe, La.

"On the recommendation of a friend I procured, some months since, one of your Family Sewing Machines. My [illegible] has been most successful in its use, from the start, without any trouble or difficulty whatever in its management [illegible] wife says it is a 'family blessing,' and could not be induced to dispense with its use—in all of which I most heartily concur."—James Pollock, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.

OFFICES

495 Broadway, New York; 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; 249 King Street, Charleston; 11 Camp Street, New Orleans; 124 North Fourth Street, St. Louis; 58 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati; 171 Superior Street, Cleveland; 115 Lake Street, Chicago, Ill., and all the principal cities and towns in the United States. 000

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

PUBLISHED for the benefit and as a warning to young men who suffer from Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, &c.; supplying the means of Self-Cure. By one who cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. Single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Bedford, Kings County, N. Y., by inclosing a postpaid addressed envelope. 255 67

MATRIMONY MADE EASY; Or, How to Win a Lover—Containing plain common sense directions, showing how all may be suitably married, irrespective of age, sex or position, whether prepossessing or otherwise. This is a new work, and the secret, when acted upon, secures a speedy and happy marriage to either sex. Mailed free for 25 cents in cash or postage stamps. Address T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia Post Office Box 2300. 200-63

Two Works,
VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL.

Sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. Six Lectures on the Causes, Prevention and Cure of Lung, Bronchial and Skin Diseases, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to a Hundred Years. 360 pages, 21 engravings. Price 50 cents, in silver or Postage stamps.

2d. A work on Heart Disease, Palsy, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Dysentery, Cholera Infantum, Summer Diarrhœa of Children, Cholera and Cholera Morbus, Bilious Cholic, Costiveness, Diphtheria, Sore Throat, Scarlet Fever, Yellow Fever, and the diseases of elderly and old people, with Medical Prescriptions for nine of these diseases. The Prescriptions alone worth $500.

Why we grow Old and what Cures Disease.

108 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. Say which Book you will have, giving Name, State, County and Post Office. 258 01

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order.

R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau Street, New York.

Holloway's Ointment.

THE complaints that render maternity rather a curse than a blessing yield to this healing agent. The sore nipple and gathered breast, that endanger the life of the offspring as well as the parent, are speedily dispelled by the immediate use of this powerful detergent remedy. Sold at the manufactory, No. 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all Druggists, at 25 cts., 63 cts. and $1 per pot.

VALUABLE TO ALL WHO USE THE PEN OR PENCIL.—SHAVER'S PATENT ERASER AND BURNISHER, PENCIL SHARPENER, &c., all neatly combined in one small, tasteful form.

"It is a most ingenious contrivance, answering so many purposes entirely."—Independent.

"It gives a neatly finished point to the lead, without soiling the fingers in the least."—N. Y. Tribune.

"It is a very nice contrivance, and will be found useful on every writing desk."—Prof. B. Silliman, Jr., of Yale College.

For sale by all Stationers. Send for a Circular.
257 61 A. G. SHAVER, New Haven, Conn.

A. LANGE,
PICTURE AND LOOKING-GLASS FRAMES
AND
CORNICES FOR ROOMS,
MADE TO ORDER, AND RE-GILDING DONE.
206 William St., cor. Frankfort, New York.

AGENTS WANTED in every city, town and county in the United States, by the old established house of [illegible] for persons out of employment. We offer great inducements. For full particulars write immediately and receive our answer by return mail.

F. B. [illegible]ORNE & CO.,
[illegible] No. 432 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PIANOFORTES.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

MANUFACTURER OF THE OVERSTRUNG

Celebrated Dunham Pianofortes,

GRAND AND SQUARE

MANUFACTORY AND SHOW ROOMS,

75 to 85 East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1834.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five years, and prices are moderate.

Bogle's Hair Dye and Wigs

BOGLE'S ELECTRIC HAIR-DYE

ARE unapproached and unapproachable in their superior merits. Both are perfection. Try the one, see the other, and be convinced.

Private Rooms for Dyeing Hair and fitting Wigs at BOGLE'S Hairwork, Perfumery and Toilet Bazaar, No. 202 Washington St., Boston. Diagrams to measure the head sent by mail. Inclose postage stamp for reply. 000

Pianofortes.

A. H. GALE & CO.,
MANUFACTORY AND WAREROOMS,
107 East Twelfth Street, N. Y.

Boar's Head Six Cord Spool Cotton.

ESTABLISHED 1783.

Superior to any ever imported in Strength, Smoothness and Elasticity, for

MACHINE OR HAND SEWING.

On Spools of 100, 500 and 2,400 Yards, the lengths warranted.

C. CARVILLE,
Sole Agent, 180 Fulton St.

000

Kennedy's Medical Discovery
CURES SCROFULA

Kennedy's Medical Discovery cu[illegible]
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures [illegible]
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures N[illegible]
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Hu[illegible]
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Scald [illegible]
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Running [illegible]
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ulcerated Sore Legs
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Lepra
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Rheumatism
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Salt Rheum
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Dyspepsia.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Bowels.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Kidneys.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Liver.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery has cured Dropsy.

When you are sick, and do not know what the matter is, perhaps you have an inward humor. Try Kennedy's Medical Discovery. For sale by all Druggists.

A Card to the Ladies.

DR. RECAMIER, from Paris, respectfully informs the ladies that he still can be consulted at his office, 645 Broadway, above Bleecker St. Dr. Recamier's Imperial Pills will be sent to all parts of the country on receipt of $1. Address Box 3774, Post Office, New York. His Medicines never fail. Consultation gratis at 645 Broadway, from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M. 252-64

Liquid and Extract Triesmer.

THE genuine English preparations, purely vegetable, and pleasant to the taste, prepared by J. T. BRONSON, M. D., Holborn, London. LIQUID TRIESMER A is guaranteed to effectually eradicate all traces of premature decay, spermatorrhœa, &c., restoring the functions of either young or old with an astonishing permanency. EXTRACT TRIESMER is warranted to cure in every case (for which mercury and sarsaparilla is used), infallibly eradicating all disease and impurities from the body. Price $1 per Bottle or Six Bottles for $5. Sent by Express to any part of the country. All orders must be addressed to DR. W. S. HOWELL, No. 149 Spring Street, New York City. 250-75

CURE FOR DYSPEPSIA.

Dr. Van Doren's Dyspepsia Antidote,

A Sure and Certain Remedy

For Dyspepsia under whatever symptoms it may be developed. It will cure Headache, Indigestion, Feeling of weight at the Stomach, Loss of Appetite, Oppression after eating, Nausea, Heartburn, Pain in the [illegible] Back, Depression of Spirits, Torpor of the [illegible] Bowels, and all diseases arising from a dis[illegible] Stomach.

This medicine strengthens and regulates the Bowels, gives tone and vigor to the Digestive Organs, without any of the debilitating effects generally produced by Dyspepsia remedies.

It is composed of purely vegetable substances [illegible] gives almost immediate relief. A few doses will [illegible] the most skeptical of its curative qualities.

This is no new and untried remedy, but one compounded after years of investigation and experiment, by the late Dr. J. L. Van Doren, and used in his practice with great success, where all other remedies have been tried and failed.

☞ As an appetiser it has no equal. ☜

This no humbug, but a safe and reliable medicine, as has been proved in thousands of cases in New York and vicinity within the past two years.

Dose—A single tablespoonful.

Put up in quart bottles, price $1, or six bottles for $5. Prepared and sold, wholesale and Retail, by

ROBERTS & CO.,
258-70 352 Broadway, N. Y.

Superior Pianofortes.

ERNEST GABLER, MANUFACTURER OF PIANOFORTES (with or without patent action), 129 East Twenty-Second St., between Second and Third Avs., New York. Dealers and others are respectfully invited to call and examine my very superior instruments, made with full iron frame and warranted equal to any in the market for strength and beauty of finish, sweetness and power of tone. My instruments are warranted for three years, and I guarantee to sell at lower prices than any respectable manufacturer in this city. ERNEST GABLER,
274 129 East Twenty-Second Street, New York.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AND GYMNASIUM, YONKERS, N. Y.

Winter Session commenced on the 1st day of Nov.

TERMS:

Board and Tuition.........$150 per Session.

For Circulars and particular information, apply to
M. N. WISEWELL, Principal.
Yonkers, 1860 00

ESTABLISHED 1843.

BOGLE'S CELEBRATED HYPERION FLUID overtops everything as the greatest restorer and best dressing for the Hair in the world. Ye who have been deceived by nostrums, try this and be convinced. It never fails. To be had at

W. BOGLE'S

Hairwork, Perfumery and Toilet Store,
202 Washington St., Boston, and for sale everywhere.

Tiffany & Co.,
LATE
TIFFANY, YOUNG & ELLIS,

Fine Jewellery, Precious Stones, Watches, Silver Ware, Bronzes, Clocks, Rich Porcelain Articles of Art and Luxury.
No. 550 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
HOUSE IN PARIS, TIFFANY, REED & CO.

RARE OPPORTUNITY.

ISAAC HALE, Jr., & Co., Newburyport, Mass.,

Will employ Males and Females to act as local or travelling Agents. Those now in their employ average from $30 to $50 per month. We cannot, in this advertisement, particularize the business, but we will in a circular (free of cost), to all who address us upon the subject. This is a rare opportunity for those out of employment to obtain an honorable situation. 000

Chapped Hands and Lips
CURED IN A FEW HOURS BY THE USE OF
TADMAN & CO.'S
CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE,
81 Bleecker St., 208 Fourth Av., N. Y. By mail 25 cents.
260-63

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S
LOTTERIES!

AUTHORIZED BY THE STATES OF DELAWARE,
MISSOURI
AND
KENTUCKY,

Draw daily, in public, under the superintendence of Sworn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington, Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM

$2 50 TO $100,000!

TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $20.

☞ Circulars giving full explanation and the schemes to be drawn will be sent, free of expense, by addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
OR
WOOD, EDDY & CO., St. Louis, Missouri.

J. R. STAFFORD'S OLIVE TAR.

WHEN OLIVE TAR IS APPLIED, its healing balsamic odors are brought in direct contact with the living membrane of the

THROAT, BRONCHIAL TUBES AND ALL THE AIR-CELLS OF THE LUNGS,

Relieving at once any pain or oppression, and healing any irritation or inflammation.

WHEN OLIVE TAR IS TAKEN INTO THE STOMACH, it forms an unequaled, soothing and healing syrup for Coughs and all Throat Diseases.

WHEN OLIVE TAR IS APPLIED, its magnetic or concentrated curative powers render it a most speedy and efficient

PAIN ANNIHILATOR.

Olive Tar is not Sticky—does not Bunch.

Fifty Cents a bottle, at No. 442 Broadway, New York, and by all Druggists.

J. R. STAFFORD'S
Iron and Sulphur Powders.

Are a soluble preparation of iron and sulphur, identical with that existing in the blood as a perfectly healthy person. Uniting with the digested food,

THEY INVIGORATE AND PURIFY THE BLOOD,
THEY IMPART VIGOR TO THE NERVOUS SYSTEM,
THEY INVIGORATE THE LIVER,
THEY STRENGTHEN THE DIGESTION,
THEY REGULATE THE SECRETIONS OF THE BODY,
AND ARE A SPECIFIC FOR ALL KINDS OF FEMALE WEAKNESS.

Price $1 a Package, at No. 442 Broadway, New York, and all Druggists.

A PAMPHLET containing Testimonials from the following and many other well-known persons will be sent to any address, free by mail:

GEN. LAW. E. Q., Fifth Av., New York.
HIRAM PAINE, Esq., Rutger, New York.
THEODORE WEED, Esq., Albany, N. Y.
GEN. JOHN GIBBS WILLIAMS, Detroit, Mich.
CORNELL FARMER, Coal, Hartford, Conn.
GEN. CHAS. MAY, U. S. A.
REV. JOSHUA LEAVITT, Ex Independent, N. York.
REV. EDWARD BEECHER, Ex-Journal, N. York.
REV. H. W. CROSS, Age, And. Union, N. Y.
REV. O. F. A. STORRS, Bridgeton, N. J.
REV. DR. LEONARD, Exeter, N. H.

SEND FOR A PAMPHLET.

Sent Free! Sent Free! Sent Free!

A NEW and beautiful Art, for which we want Agents everywhere. Agents make $10 a day. Terms and Specimen sent FREE. Address, with stamp for return postage, L. L. DODD & CO., Lowell, Mass.
277 6t*

FRENCH'S
CELEBRATED CONICAL
Washing Machine,
UNEQUALLED AND IN DISPENSABLE!

PRICE ONLY TEN DOLLARS.
Depot No. 425 Broadway, corner of Grand St.
Agents wanted in all parts of the United States.
SEND FOR A CIRCULAR
Address: Box No. 2,932 Post Office, New York City.
P. & B. FRENCH.
000

SILSBEE, CASE & CO,
Photographic and Daguerreotype ARTISTS.
293½ Washington Street, Boston.
Up but one flight of stairs.
G. M. SILSBEE, J. G. CASE, W. H. GERSHELL.
254 7t

Smith and Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STOBRS, Agent,
121 Chamber Street, N. Y.

THIS PISTOL is light, has great force, is sure fire, shoots accurately, can be left loaded any length of time without injury, is not liable to get out of order, is safe to carry. EVERY PISTOL warranted.

CAUTION TO DEALERS.

Dealers and purchasers are cautioned against Pirated, Spurious and Worthless Imitations of the above pistols. All cartridges not stamped on the head of the breech-ball with the name of the Company, and all such infringements will be prosecuted. Beware the cartridges have Smith & Wesson's Patent stamped on each end of the box. 247 13t

"WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES are certainly the best."—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.
Office, 505 Broadway, New York. 0176

The Singer Sewing Machines.

IN order to supply FAMILY MACHINES in the WORLD within the reach of all, we have reduced our Lever A, and Transverse SHUTTLE MACHINES, beautifully ornamented, to $65.

Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machines, both of very general application and capacity, and popular with the family and manufactory. Price Reduced, respectively from $125 and $135 to $90 and $100.

Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine,

For Carriage-makers and heavy leather work. Price, complete, $125.

Also, to complete the list, an

ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,

originated for manufacturing purposes: Namely, Hem, and Gathered or Plaited Ruffle, at one operation, and at the rate of 1,000 stitches per minute. Price, complete, $150.

Also, the Singer Family Machine, with the new Hemmer, Feller and Gatherer, for $65.

Office, 458 Broadway, New York.
J. M. SINGER & CO., Manufacturers.

COMING EVENTS CAST THEIR SHADOWS BEFORE.

Augustus thinks of Adelphine and Lucinda meet each other in the open air, and put up an umbrella, not to keep off the rain but the spectator, that they had better be careful where they sit, in order to avoid reflections.

$30 Willcox & Gibbs' $35
SEWING MACHINES
REMARKABLE FOR SIMPLICITY

Manufactured with mathematical precision, hence are always in working order. One hour's practice will enable any one to work with unerring rapidity.

Office, 508 Broadway. 249 6to

Under-Garments for the Million,

A. P. McLAUGHLIN'S Improved French Yoke Shirt Manufactory, 529 Greenwich St., corner of Murray, New York. 257 6to

SHAVER'S PATENT ERASER, &c.—See advertisement next page. 257 4to

Spalding's Prepared Glue!
A Stitch in Time saves Nine.
ECONOMY! Dispatch! Save the Pieces!

Useful in every house for mending Furniture, Toys, Rockery, Glassware, &c.

Wholesale Depot, No. 48 Cedar Street, New York.

Address HENRY C. SPALDING & CO., Box No. 3,076, New York.

Put up for Dealers in cases containing four, eight and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithograph Show-Card across packing each package. 0990

JOY TO THE WORLD
Clothes Washed in One Minute by Johnson's Union Washing Machine.
Patented April 10, 1860.

Price $8 to $10.

A CHILD CAN OPERATE IT. Washes every spot. Cure and certain without soaking or boiling. Call and see it in operation at 472 Broadway, New York, and 312 Fulton St, Brooklyn, N. Y. J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors. 259

SMITH,
HATTER.

151 Nassau St., two doors from Ann, from Fulton St., New York; also, Metropolitan Silk Hats, $12. Call and examine for yourself. 0000

"I love there a man with cool ex dead,
Who never so himself hath said,
This is my own my native land."

OUR ARTISTS have been well employed this Summer, and we are now publishing the most extensive series of AMERICAN SCENERY ever produced, viz:

THE SCENERY OF THE HUDSON
THE GLENS OF THE CATSKILLS.
THE HILLS AND DALES OF NEW ENGLAND.
THE PICTURESQUE ON THE PENNSYLVANIA CENTRAL
THE MAJESTY AND BEAUTY OF NIAGARA.
GLIMPSES OF THE GREAT WEST.
UP AND DOWN THE SHENANDOAH.
FOURTH OF JULY IN AND ABOUT NEW YORK.
A SCROLL IN CENTRAL PARK.

INSTANTANEOUS VIEWS IN DAGUERREOTYPE. (A new project.)
THE EXECUTION OF THESE VIEWS IS UNSURPASSED.
CATALOGUES sent on receipt of stamp.
E. ANTHONY,
American and Foreign Stereoscopic Emporium,
No. 501 Broadway,
Three doors south of N. Y. Society Library.
A splendid assortment of new Foreign Views on Glass and Paper on hand. 000 6to

A TRAVELLING COMPANION.

If the lady resolves to shoot travelling, or wishes to secure a most acceptable gift to a friend about doing so—if the progress waiting a railroad place, or would like "something else to have in the country," let her by all means procure the Tuxis Companions, consisting a bottle of his Cologne, which cleanses the hair perfectly, softens greasiness, drying or stiffening it—a PLACE OF PERFUMES, one drop of which performs the handkerchief deliciously—one of Lazenby, the best cosmetics in the world, and one of the Oriental Tooth Wash. The 4 preparations are of approved excellence, and all that they profess to be.—Philadelphia Bulletin. 251

THE ELECTROTYPING OF LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is done by FILMER & SON, 10 Spruce Street.

SHENWEIN'S
Tar and Wood Naphtha PECTORAL.

In the early cerebic cases for all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs. From this cause that are constantly being made by one of the first Natural Chemists, it has been called the Wonder of the Age. It cures speedily and without Cod Liver compound, Acid tea, Pyrmidine, Coughs and Colds, Croup, Whooping Cough, Inflammation of the Heart, Bronchitis, &c. This article is placed in the hands and proved in its effect. Be careful to ask for Shenwein's Tar and Wood Naphtha Pectoral and take no other.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS PER BOTTLE

Prepared only by
DR. A. SHENWEIN & CO.,
Druggists and Chemists,
N. W. corner of Second and Vine Streets,
PHILADELPHIA.
And sold by every respectable Druggist and dealer in Medicines throughout the United States and Canada. 0000

Ladd, Webster & Co's
IMPROVED TUBULAR-ARCH SEWING MACHINES,
500 Broadway, New York. 0000

STEINWAY & SONS'
PATENT
OVER-STRUNG
GRAND
AND SQUARE
PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured in the United States, and warranted for five years.

Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y.

WHITE'S PATENT LEVER TRUSS AND SUPPORTER

A New Discovery
FOR THE
Retention and Radical Cure of Hernia, &c

White's Patent Lever Truss.

This endorsement, which is now offered to the public in the city, is totally different in principle and action from all others in use, combining every requisite for the perfect retention of the rupture at all points of the body in whatever manner it may move, without any pressure whatever on the pubic bone. Among a few of the advantages claimed for the instrument are these: It has a new, simple, and unique bow; graduating pressure power (supercommodation); curved and upper screw combined; no uncomfortable pressure on the pubic bone or on the spermatic cord; does not ride up, down or out of place by any exertion of the body; no thongs, and consequently, shows least; holds the rupture in every case; requires less than one-half the usual pressure, and in a radical cure. The ABDOMINAL SUPPORTER is on the same principle. Call and see it. Prices. Pamphlets gratis. Instruments have been sent from No. 20 Bond St., New York, for the application of these instruments, with perfect success, in every instance. The Lever, improved, adapted by a lady. The instruments are now offered at wholesale and retail by the Proprietor, SHERWIN & CO., No. 22 Bond St., and by Messrs. D. S. Barnes & Co., Nos. 13 and 14 Park Row, Messrs. Smith Bliss & Co., Nos. 170 William St., and by all first-class drug houses. 0ct

William Taylor's
NEW SALOON,
No. 555 Broadway.

Embellishment of all kinds can be best obtained by ladies and gentlemen at all hours of the day and evening. 259 6t

Patented November 1st, 1859.

The measures are
A, the distance round the Neck.
B to B, the Yoke.
C to C, the Sleeve.
D to D, distance around the Body, under the armpits.
E to E, the length of the Shirt.

F.Y.S.

BALLOU'S
Patent Improved French Yoke SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.

A New Style of Shirt, warranted to Fit.

By reading the above measures per mail we can furnish a perfect fit of our new style of shirt, and warrant it to prove to any person who will send us (only $10, $14, $16, $18, &c., per shirt). No order forwarded for less than half a dozen shirts.

Also Importers and Dealers in GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS.

BALLOU BROTHERS,
409 Broadway, N. Y.
Wholesale Trade supplied on the usual terms.

A Card.

THE Subscriber will send to all who wish it (free) The Recipe and full directions for using the UNAL BALM, for the removal of Blotches, Pimples, Freckles, &c., from the face, leaving the skin clear, soft and fair as in childhood. Those who have used this article pronounce it the best in existence. Address, with stamp, F. COUPON, Box 4,231 Chemist, 681 Broadway, New York.

EDMUNDS & CO.'S SUPERIOR
WORCESTER SAUCE,

Admitted to be the best, wholesomest and most appetizing relish in use.

Suitable for all kinds of Roast Meats, Gravies, Game, Fish, Soups, &c.

Sauce Bottles can be had at the Wholesale Depot, 161 Fulton Street, New York.
516 6to EDMUNDS & CO.

FINKLE & LYON'S
SEWING MACHINES.

Our Machines took the highest medal at the Fair of the American Institute, with the highest premium for its Sewing Machine work.

They also took the highest premiums at the New Jersey State Fair, at the Mechanics' Fair, Utica, N. Y., the Franklin Institute, and are generally acknowledged the best.

Lots office 305 Broadway.

AND DEPOT, 510 BROADWAY 000

BILLIARD BALLS, BAGATELLE AND PIGEON HOLE PUZZLE of every and Patent Combination. Send for Circular. 0007
WM. H. WEIDIG, 183 Fulton st.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 262—Vol. XI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 1, 1860. [Price 6 Cents.

Our Position.

We deem it right at this time, when partisan politics run so high that every circle in the country feels the throe of the agitation we deem it due to our readers to explain in a few words the position of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. We claim to be strictly and entirely neutral in our course of Journalism, chronicling events as they transpire in every section of the country, without bias and without feeling; adhering closely to facts, but advocating neither one side nor the other of the disturbing element of partisan politics.

In pursuing this course we do not bate one jot of our independence; we truckle to neither party, neither do we ask favors of any party. The necessity of our position is, that our circulation must be universal—our expenses are so vast that the patronage of one class, however liberal, would be but as a drop in the bucket in the way of remunerating our outlay.

Our aim is to produce a paper which shall be so entirely free from objectionable opinions or partizan views of national policy, that it can be circulated in every section of the Union and be received in every family as a truthful exponent of facts as they occur, and a reliable Illustrated History of the time in which we live.

Bearing this aim steadily in view, we do not swerve from our design. Our Artists and Correspondents furnish us with illustrations and descriptive matter of every event of importance, which we transfer to our pages, and we must not be held responsible if our pages illustrate scenes of which the actors therein are ashamed. We are Historians, and represent the World as we find it, without fear, favor or prejudice, confident that, while we persevere in that course, FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER will be welcome in every section and in every home in the United States.

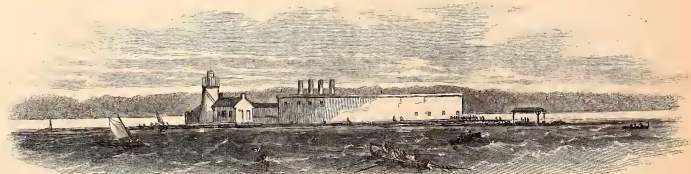
THE FORTS OF CHARLESTON HARBOR.

The harbor of Charleston, S. C., is a noble expanse of water, affording ample depth and scope for all the purposes of commerce on the grandest scale. It has, however, one great drawback, namely, the sand-bar, which forbids the entrance of ships of large burthen. Measures are about being taken by the authorities of Charleston to dredge the channel, and thus open the way for the admission of every class of vessels. Scientific men consider that the proposed dredging is perfectly feasible, and will prove completely effective.

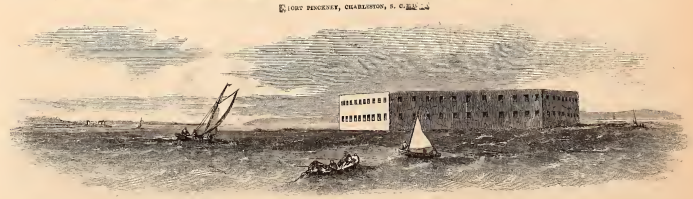
Fort Sumter, which commands the channel, is a very strong fortress, mounting a double tier of guns of heavy calibre. It is situated on a mole at the end of the sand-bar, and would prove a formidable objection to a hostile force approaching too near.

Fort Moultrie, on Sullivan's Island, is a low but strong fortification, and is of great historic interest to all Americans, it being the scene of one of the first and best fought battles of the Revolution, when a few hundred native riflemen, who had never

THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, S. C.—FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—FORT MOULTRIE, ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND.



FORT PINCKNEY, CHARLESTON, S. C.



FORT SUMTER, CHARLESTON, S. C.

fired a cannon before, best off and ready dressed to formidable British fleet, making such slaughter among them as, in proportion to the numbers engaged, was not even reached by that of Trafalgar and the Nile."

Castle Pinckney, also a very strong fortress, stands at the very portals of the city, covering an ancient mud red. There were some forts in the olden time; one at Haddrill's, Mount Pleasant Village, in 1776, and another on James's Island, which was wrested from the British by a small body of citizen soldiers previous to the battle of Fort Moultrie.

BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM

HAS again become the popular resort of
ALL LOVERS OF THE WONDERFUL, THE CURIOUS AND AMUSING.

And is now attracting more attention, as a receiving more visitors than every other place of Amusement in New York. Everything new, curious and and interesting is secured by Mr. Barnum, and presented to his visitors in addition to the 850,000 Curiosities from every part of the world, and the which take place every afternoon at 3o'clock, and every evening at half-past 7, by a full and complete company from Astley's Royal Amphitheatre, London, Cremorne, the most curious, wonderful and interesting human beings the world has ever produced, the LIVING WHALE BOY of Man Monster; the two ASIATIC GIRLS; the GRAND ARABIAN; MOORISH SCHOOL; LIVING HAPPY FAMILY, &c., &c., for the exhibition, and price per ticket admission to the whole is only 25 cents. Children under 10 years 15 cents.

LIVING ANIMAL KINGDOM,

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 1, 1860.

ALL Communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	1 year	$ 2
One do.	2 years	3
One do.	3 years	4
Three Copies	1 year	5
Five do.	1 year	10

And in case Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and residence on the back of every such picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us now and from parties throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, they giving us credit for being an expert will everything that transpires in every part of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, and we are not so simpleton but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching intercourse. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Our Thanksgiving Story.

IT is with much pleasure that we present to our readers the first chapters of a most exquisite story, particularly adapted to the present time, called

CHANTICLEER;

A STORY OF THANKSGIVING.

By Cornelius Mathews.

Mr. Mathews has for many years held an honorable position in literature as a chaste, elegant, earnest and imaginative writer, and the story which we commence in this number is one of the most successful of his works. It is a simple and beautiful tale of real life, ably constructed, developing striking and peculiar characters, woven into a plot distinguished for the natural flow of its incidents, and which owes its deep interest and earnest pathos to those affecting occurrences of everyday life which take place almost daily in our immediate vicinity, and to which the history of every family affords more or less material. One of the chief charms of the "Chanticleer" is its perfect simplicity. Mr. Mathews has reached the point of intensity in pathos, without resorting to any of the melodramatic machinery used by too many of our modern writers.

We call the attention of our readers particularly to this beautiful story; it will well repay the trouble of perusal.

Foreign News.

Great Britain.—The news is very uninteresting. Prince Alfred had arrived from the Cape on 8th May, just in time to celebrate his brother's birthday. Public opinion had settled down as regards the Queen's visit to Ireland, that the Ministry were constrained to pledge it to avoid Victor Emanuel. Lord John Russell's despatch on Italian affairs, dated 27th April, was read in the Lords to greatly irritated the Northern Powers, that it was expected a diplomatic censure would result of the same kind as was given to Count Cavour, and which had taken to task by Lord John. It had, however, greatly strengthened the Ministry in England, and given universal satisfaction to the Country. The Bill has been lodged, a deliberate endorsement of the Italian Revolution, and the King of Sardinia's intervention in favor of the territorial integrity of Rome and Naples.

France.—Paris was in a fascinating condition, the Exhibition of Pictures were being restored on a large scale.

Russia.—The Polish question was again being discussed, and threatened to create much difference of opinion between the Czar and his nobles.

Austria.—We learn that the great of Constitution to Hungary had not had the desired effect, and the aggressive Austrian Government was preparing for the inevitably greatly declined. The Court papers now say that the warlike preparations in Venetia had been much exaggerated, and that Austria has no intention to overrun the reference. The Prussian Government had shown a greater inclination to facilitate an English policy, if the time of her press can be accepted as a guide.

Italy.—On the 7th the King of Sardinia, accompanied by Garibaldi, entered Naples and the latter immediately resigned all his dictatorial powers. The King of Naples still maintains his position in Gaeta, but since the battle of the 1st his army had declined in numbers, and in discipline. The action of the French Admiral in preventing the bombardment of Gaeta was pronounced to be unlikely to result in a part of the Neapolitan fleet joining the Sardinian. Rich up an opportunity of assigning, to the Duke of Modena, Tuscany, &c., had done, these last matters would increase the general complications, which are endlessly embarrassing now.

China.—It is reported that the Ambassadors of the allied forces were to have an interview with the Emperor at Pekin. The London Times considered the very ill-advised, unless they took their army with them.

Relief by the Banks.

Our banks have, during the present panic, adopted a system of renewal relief, which will, in all probability, have the effect of sustaining the mercantile community, and which at any rate redounds vastly to their enterprise and liberality. Realizing the fact that the panic may be averted by timely measures, the banks, as represented by their presidents, on the 21st inst. held a meeting, at which it was resolved that the banks should, by mutual support, expand the loans in general discount to the whole community to the extent of $5,000,000. This, in fact, reduces all the banks to one great bank, and has the effect that, through the mutual supporting system pursued, no one bank can be broken as long as the whole stand. This accordingly relieve the mercantile community to their last resource, and then, if must be, fall together. It is, however, believed—and on very good grounds—that this will not be the case, and that before they are reduced to extremities relief will come, partly from the foreign payment for produce, and in part from fresh California remittances.

This system of general relief in an emergency is adopted from the course pursued at such times as the present by the Government of France, and which has proved successful. It is really nothing more than the manifest duty of every bank to afford relief in adversity, as well as during prosperity, high praise is still due to those of the metropolis for having set so noble an example, and of having broken through the illiberal policy which has hitherto rendered them so unpopular in periods of great public suffering.

Elective Judiciary.

The inconvenience of an Elective Judiciary is forcing itself every day more sternly upon the public mind. Experience has proved that making a judge dependent for support upon the pleasure of a mob, is as bad as making him dependent upon the will of a monarch. In either case he is exposed to a very powerful distributing influence. Should a politician happen to be on trial, the judge, if elected by the popular voice, will naturally have an affinity with the criminal, while on the other hand, should he be chosen by the King, he will naturally incline towards the court favorite. This disturbing element in the administration of justice is obviated materially in England by their being appointed for life, and the courts are thus rendered without any reference to their politics. Secure therefore of their position—equally independent of king and people, and exposed to the constant leveling of their decisions by the Government, the British judges have been remarkable for their fearlessness, independence and ability; knowing that nothing can remove them but malfeasance in office, they are enabled to administer the law with unerring rectitude and impartiality. As a further inducement to good conduct, they are endowed with a retiring pension when they are incapacitated by age or sickness. The result is that the system has proved effective in a short term of four or five years, the unhappy possessor of this precarious and dirty dignity truckles, whenever he has the opportunity, to the one man who has in his position; and we often behold the melancholy spectacle of a judge rising from his midnight bed, at the bidding of a ward politician, to release notorious rowdies and boulder-hirers, when a new brother could have committed to jail.

Nor can we expect the highest of the legal profession to be candidates for judiciary honors. It is likely that such eminent men as James T. Brady, Elijah Ward, Graham and others of that class will break up their practice, worth $20,000 per annum, to fill an uncertain and dishonored position for a few years at a salary of $2,000 per annum. They will be deprived of all its profitable dignity by the inferior class of shysters into whose hands it has fallen of late years. The fact is, the office of judge is now only fit for those who have no practice without and want one within practice. Such men are naturally corrupt, and assimilate with the politicians who are at once their creatures, their masters and their accomplices.

At all events we have seen enough of the present system of electing judges, to know that, so long as it lasts, we shall continue to be the worst governed city in the broad expanse of civilization.

Social Questions of the Day.

The Formation of Character in its Practical Relations.

No one who has reflected deeply on the subject, doubts that the present system of education, in our schools or at home, only grapples with a few points of character, leaving undisturbed the mass. It grafts something on a tree which may or may not succeed; it trims the branches, and sometimes on the Chinese plan dwarfs it altogether into a pretty little flower-pot parlor ornament. But it does not, it cannot with certainty modify the radical condition of the tree. That is, it has not learned the laws of growth or the principles of perfecting it.

Why not? Simply because no plan of education now followed attempts to deal with the primary and basic deleterious influences which have most to do with really injuring it. Great pains are taken, to be sure, to exclude the "immoral," not merely the knowledge of which is wrong, but even to train them that through life there shall be no social recognition of the existence of such an element. Now it is tolerably certain that any system which aims to deal with the whole practical question of humanity, will only gather strength by being ignored and left to itself. The piquancy of mystery is the true soul of vice, and social ignorance is its best safeguard.

But how prevent the mere knowledge of evil from having the worst results? Simply enough—by strengthening the mind. A strong, healthy mind trained to rely on its own literally nothing to dread from any knowledge of any kind whatever. The best and greatest men who have ever lived—the world's real workmen and benefactors—have been, in this respect, the strongest. A General knowledge, therefore, carefully and judiciously imparted by wise teachers, is a powerful strengthening force. The principle—now so much in vogue—of shutting our children down and ignoring all the dark side of history, of "vindicating" the real sins of Mirabeaus, Richards III., Isabellas and other talented sinners, is contemptible because false. If we were to believe the books published during the past thirty years all the great representatives of the past were saints, the world has always gone on in a most perfect way, and everything glorious through a rose-colored light. Will lying, even with the best intentions, really advance truth?

But of the greatest weakening influence "education" takes positively no care. A young girl of the finest natural gifts who grows up in a city is almost certain to be so weakened by r influences, that knowledge and truth would act on her mind like poisons. Let us examine it. From childhood she hears an incessant gossip about other people, their private affairs and domestic details. How A dresses and B lives, who C married, and why D is or is not "in society," is poured in one endless wash into her mind—yes, into her very soul. Dress and appearance share with gossip literally nine-tenths of all the conversation in which she is engaged. She may be highly educated and acquire much accomplishment; she may be varnished until the very polish, as in Japanese work, is a source of constant strength, but even so actually have a vigorous and tenacious character. But it is all false after all. Gossip generally brings with it a habit of passing over all things with a shallow, hasty and effete attention. It destroys the power of general interest in what is earnest and beautiful and true. It has been shown that our huge cities are sores of human life—that their population would soon become fatal to immigration. But they are far more terrible ogres of intellect and genius in the young.

And not one girl in a thousand, when he hears his children chattering gossip, ever dreams that they are gossiping themselves into practical imbeciles—into creatures whom it will never be quite safe to trust with unexpurgated English or any other classic writers; spes whom it would be very impr ident to teach heinous their own physical structure and the laws of health; workings which must be regarded with trembling and terror until safely married or otherwise settled. Can parents, teachers or preachers do nothing to make their charges ashamed of this gossip and vile chitchat? Will it ever be understood that all gossip should be taken to cultivate youthful interest in anything else? Interest in reading, in forming collections, in hearty amusements, in anything at all except in the follies of gossip's life.

The yo.thful mind, and especially the girl's, which resists the influences of family pride, dress, social gossip and frivolous treatment of knowledge, must be a miracle. Perhaps nineteen in twenty are now in city "society" reduced to about a level with Oriental odalisques, and are about as capable of being rational companions for a man. Fortunately, the majority of women grow up under better influences, which are, it is to be hoped, continually increasing in power.

Opening of Derby's Institute of Art.

On Friday, the 16th inst., the celebrated New Institute of Arts, founded and managed by C. A. Derby, Esq., in the interest of the Boston Athenæum, was opened to the Association, and for the inspection of the public. As it is at present beyond all question the first Art Gallery in America, we feel it to be a duty to call the attention of our readers in all parts of the country to its existence, and to the great influence which it will probably exert in refining public taste.

The splendid marble building, and the spacious and truly elegant galleries of themselves proclaim the extent of Mr. Derby's enterprise. The fact that these apartments are perfectly comfortable—the warmed and ventilated to make them so, fact, superior to the magnificent but bleak and cheerless galleries of Europe, where, as our travelled readers will bear witness, many a cold is caught.

As regards the pictures, there is, in addition to the well-known Dusseldorf Collection, the celebrated one of Jarves, in which the history of Art is illustrated from its earliest dawn, passing through the blessings down through the glorious Renaissance and Eclectic periods to the present day. When it is borne in mind how very few, even among our most wealthy citizens, possess anything like a thorough and genial knowledge of the history of Art, it will be seen that this Collection may yet be made of the greatest utility. One good course of lectures on Art, delivered, illustrated by what the Derby Building contains, would do more to raise the standard of both literary and art criticism than is now done by all that is written in this country on the subject.

Of the opening suffice it to say that it was numerously attended by a brilliant and intellectual circle, that the "hospitable board" was one to which gentlemen sat, and that all who were there had abundant cause to congratulate themselves on having been present at the inauguration of the chief temple of Art on this side of the Atlantic, and of what is beyond question the principal lion and attraction of the Metropolis to all persons of true cultivation and refinement.

EDITORIAL GLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS.

We Are Glad to see from the London papers that John Brougham has not forgotten that his obligations to the American public are for their recognition of his genius. In the very first spe ch he made at the Haymarket, he drew heavily pon forth in the line of English audience he has affection for his American friends.

Dickens has commenced the publication of a new series of Christmas stories, and it is a great many years since I had the pleasure of reading anything from his pen which so completely absorbed my attention and has acknowledge my well indebtedness to the inexhaustible imagination and wonderful pathos—pathos, indeed, which has never been surpassed by any writer.

Apropos, the London Athenæum has an epigram on Dickens' present career. The London Athenæum has a very severe remark that Tilbury is the name of a popular omnibus now engaged by dints of Percy Lear, and also of a carriage, and that Dickens has made a small vehicle uness as we mean.

These passengers as proper call be
That uses us shall not know 'em:
Single fare, or penny subway,
And Dickens varies both to Brougham!

The Legal Advisers of the Government of Japan continue calculated to entertain sincerely, in becoming earlied to an extent which to framers never dreamed of. The Japanese have made a most unfortunate selection of every law they committed. We were present last week at a reference, where a well-known lawyer was engaged in the case of a Japanese vessel, and a certain point difficulties to disburse were come from human ips. We can make allowances for the difficulty of translating from which a Japanese lawyer has to contend with, but we believe in the fashion with are placed before him for recognition; but although the law allows silence, it never allows misrepresentation. We think the question of "Japanese lawyers" are very different matters. As the whole of the extraordinary divorce case to which we have alluded will be published in the Japanese papers, we shall probably be interested to hear what the decision of the law and the laws regarding it require a thorough revision.

There seems to be considerable doubt whether the Common Council has any authority to appoint a Committee to investigate the accounts of Mr. Flint, as he is responsible to the Comptroller. Like most other matters connected with our Municipal Government, it threatens to involve in confusion legislation. It would seem as though the powers of the Municipal Government were not even yet nearly defined.

Washington with the Brown Stone Front.—The divisions of the work of art and science, the monument of the "Father of his Country," which has so long been an eyesore in front of the City Hall, will at last, we understand, be removed. It is to be purchased by the city, and is removed from the public gaze is strongly sought at the price of two thousand dollars. When the Aldermen have concluded the bargain we suggest that it should be placed in the cupola on the top of the City Hall. It will be there privately secreted under the figure of Justice, and if that blind lady is true to her instincts she will keep her foot upon it for ever.

Fair Play is well-known to be a jewel, and we claim that jewel in behalf of Commodore Vanderbilt. Everybody knows that Live Oak George—who tried to joke himself into the Presidential Chair by starting a comic paper called Young Sam—this Live Oak George seized a piece of the Battery and made himself a pier for the accommodation of his Staten Island coffins. Induced by his friend's success, Commodore Vanderbilt began to build a pier for his steamers, and had got as far as to lay some foundation, when the city authorities actually woke up, and warned the gallant Commander not to build. They have also threatened him with the utmost terrors of the law! Now what is sauce for the goose Live Oak George is sauce for the gander Vanderbilt, and we end this glance as we commenced it by demanding—Fair Play!

PERSONAL.

S. M. Wolf, of Virginia, who lately published a very able reply to the Helper Book, has lately been appointed Consul to the Navigator Islands.

Miss Harriet Hosmer, the sculptoress, sailed for Rome lately.

Miss Margaret Foley, the well-known cameo cutter and sculptoress, will also sail for the Eternal City in a few days

Felicite Vestvali, the superb and manly contralto, was mulcted in $900 a day or two ago, at the suit of her agent, Mr. Joseph Wells. The amount was for services rendered.

Miss Isabella Hinckley, the American prima donna, arrived in the Teutonia last week. She is engaged by Ullman.

Senator Bayard, of Delaware, is stopping at the New York Hotel.

By the Vanderbilt, we notice the arrival of Com. Stockton, Richard Ten Broeck, Signora Loiti de la Santa and Signor Panconi, both distinguished vocalists.

The late Sir Henry Smith, long M P. for Colchester, England, was one of the Tories of the old school, and among the advocates of Reform his resolute opposition to all change gave him a reputation for folly and obstinacy which was not borne out by his real character. On one occasion he was canvassing in presence of numerous friends, and on asking a heavy-looking farmer for his vote, the man replied, "I'd vote for ye, Sir Henry, as usual, only you're such a fool." "Fool am I!" retorted Sir Henry; "then I'm the very man to represent you!" This diamond shaft of wit went to the farmer's heart, and with a loud guffaw he promised his vote.

Mrs. Cobb, mother to the Hon. Howell Cobb, lately received the premium of a silver goblet for five most beautifully embroidered shirts, worked with her own hands.

Mr. Columbus Tyler, of Somerville, the Steward of the Insane Asylum, was the only Bell and Everett man elected to the Massachusetts Legislature on the 6th inst.

Dion Boucicault has written to Fisher and Jamieson to sail for England without delay, it being his intention to bring out "Jeanie Deans" and the "Octoroon."

Mr. Everett delivered his lecture on "The Early Life of Benjamin Franklin," in Lowell, on Wednesday. Dr. Huntington, who presided on the occasion, in behalf of the committee, asked the audience, during this winter, to remain should any lecturer extend his remarks beyond the nine o'clock bell, which he knew had the bad effect to scatter a Lowell audience. He had no fears that they would notice the bell this evening, considering the ability of the lecturer, Mr. Everett, whom he would now introduce. Mr. Everett, says the Lowell Courier, was received with loud applause, and commenced by saying that, judging from the remark just made, the audience had hardly got over associating Bell and Everett (laughter and applause), but his theme this evening would be something of a more pleasant nature.

Mr. Harvey Major, formerly a prominent member of Dodworth's Band, but whose serious illness has prevented his attending to his professional duties for some time past, is to receive a complimentary benefit very soon, under the direction of George Bristow. We trust it will be a substantial one

Geo. C. Thorburn, son of Grant Thorburn, died at Newark on the 19th, from the effects of a fall. He was the Superintendent at Mount Vernon. He was a florist of considerable celebrity and science. He was also highly esteemed as a man.

Mr. Hobbs, the famous locksmith, has arrived in Boston.

The hotel-keepers of New York and Albany have invited Mr. Mitchell to a grand banquet, as a set-off to the dinner he lost when Gov. Morgan did not think him aristocratic enough to dine with the Prince of Wales at the table of a retired grocer. May the ghosts of Leland, Stetson, Stevens and their confrères of hoteldom haunt the shade of the Governor in Hades!

The Legislature of North Carolina met on the 19th, at Raleigh. Its last Session was held two years ago.

The county of Cumberland, State of Maine, is a fertile spot for divorces. Forty-two suits were on the docket for a recent term of the court. Of these thirty were brought by wives and twelve by husbands. The court granted divorces in eight of the cases and dismissed the libels in two cases. Two have been entered "neither party," and thirty still remain to be adjudicated upon.

The Rev. Angus C McNeil, of the Presbyterian Church, while preaching on Sunday week in the Brick Church near Pleasant Hill, Dallas county, Alabama, of which he was pastor, on Romans v., 12, suddenly sank into his seat when about half through his discourse, and died almost instantly, without a struggle or a groan.

Mrs. Lincoln will take with her to the White House her sister, Mrs Miriam Edwards, of Springfield, Ill., said to be an educated and accomplished lady, and a good-looking niece, about eighteen years old. The latter possibly has an eye to the Union.

LITERATURE.

Saxton and Barker, Park Row, New York, have published a Guide to Central Park. It contains a complete history of the undertaking, with ground plans of the whole Park, together with views of the Ramble, Terrace, &c. It contains, also, besides a large amount of interesting matter, full descriptions of how to reach the Park from various points of the city. It is a very useful twenty-five cent book.

The Oakland Stories. Sheldon & Co. have sent us the third volume of the series. It is called Claiborne, by George B. Taylor, of Virginia It is fully as interesting as its predecessor, and will surely find special favor with the young. It is handsomely brought out, and contains several illustrations.

We have received from Richardson & Co., of Galveston, Texas, the Almanac for 1861. It is one of the handsomest almanacs published, and is invaluable to all doing business with the State of Texas. It contains an elaborate history of that State from the period of Governor Burnet's administration to the installation of General Houston It contains, also, a vast amount of miscellaneous information of great value, political, commercial and statistical; also, about railroads, steamboats, and a hundred important items which we have not time to enumerate The map of Texas which accompanies the Texas Almanac is very large, full and accurate, and is worth double the price of the book. To business men in New York the advertisements it contains will prove invaluable as a suggestive directory.

Bob and Walter, with the Story of Breakneck Ledge, is a very interesting little book for children, just published in admirable style, with illustrations, by Phinney, Blakeman & Mason, Walker street, New York

Sheldon & Co. have sent us the Florence Stories, by Jacob Abbott. This volume is intended both for amusement and instruction. The plan is simple. Mrs. Morelio, in New York, receives a letter from her husband in Singapore, inviting her to bring her children and meet him in England, where they may spend a few weeks in traveling. This volume comprises their journey across the Atlantic to England, and from Liverpool to Scotland, the Orkney Isles, &c. Much information is given, and many interesting scenes described in a pleasant, easy manner. It ends with their journey to London, but what they saw there will be reserved for another volume. The Florence Stories will be popular with the young folks. The volume contains several illustrations.

Andrew F. Graves, of Boston, has sent us another volume of the Percy Family The several previous volumes contained the sketches of travel of the Percy Family through England, Scotland, &c., and we now follow them from the Baltic to Vesuvius Mr. D. C. Eddy, the author, has a style peculiarly adapted to interest the young; he tells the prominent points in the history of every place his characters visit in a simple, straightforward manner, which is calculated to improve the memory while it amuses his young readers. The Percy Family is really a most amusing and instructive series, and we can commend it warmly to our young friends.

Phinney, Blakeman & Mason have just published a very interesting book, called True Stories of the Days of Washington. The title fully explains the nature of the book, which abounds with exciting stories, incidents and gallant exploits of that time which was so rife with noble deeds, personal sacrifices and thrilling romances. It is well that our children should know what their forefathers did and suffered to secure the glorious inheritance of freedom which they are now privileged to enjoy. We can commend this book to our readers.

Phinney, Blakeman & Mason have just issued a very valuable book on the subject of Railway Property, by John B. Jervis, Civil Engineer. It is a treatise upon the construction and management of railways, and is designed to afford useful knowledge, in a popular style, to the holders of this class of property, as well as to railway managers, officers and agents. It is a work which will interest thousands, for it discusses in a clear and logical manner subjects but imperfectly understood even by those most actively engaged therein

MUSIC.

Of course no one expects any event to transpire at the Academy of Music at the time specified; consequently the disappointment was philosophically borne when the opening night of the winter season was deferred from the 21st to the 26th inst. This time, however, we think we may venture to endorse the Academy advertisements, and state that it will positively open on Monday next with Halevy's great work, "La Juive." As regards scenery, costumes and mounting generally, every care has been taken to insure success, and we shall probably have the pleasure of recording it as the most perfectly appointed opera ever brought out in America. To the company, previously a strong one, has been added that most charming vocalist and actress, Madame Anna Bishop. It is many years since Madame Bishop has appeared in opera in New York, and the simple announcement of her rentrée will, among her admirers, be suggestive of such a host of pleasant reminiscences as will insure her a hearty welcome, while those to whom she is as yet a stranger will find in her a thoroughly educated and most fascinating artiste

DRAMA.

In spite of "Crisis and Panic," "Nullification and Secession," the theatres apparently sail over tranquil seas, as yet making no changes of note in their programmes. The different managers are lavish indeed of promises, but appear to have forgotten the proverb that relateth to hope deferred. Have they been learning a lesson from the opera directors, that, just as a novelty seems to be in our very grasp, by some skilful piece of legerdemain they cause it to vanish away into the dim distance? What has become of Tom Taylor's comedy so long promised us by Miss Keene? have the "Seven Sisters" sung it to sleep for ever? Whither has "Macbeth" disappeared? have the Witches, not content with making themselves air, converted him also into that unstable element? Well, there is one result consequent upon this state of things theatrical for which we presume our readers will be devoutly thankful—short notices, in place of long criticisms.

Mr Forrest played "Hamlet" on Monday, and "Lear" on Wednesday, to the accustomed crowds; and Miss Keene has favored her patrons with another week of "Physic and Fancy," together with "Toodles a Father."

Wallack's.—At this house some little variety has been offered on the occasion of several benefits which have occurred; but nothing new has been produced, and we see by the bills that "Playing with Fire" will resume its place on the boards. We notice with great pleasure the rapid advance being made on the new building, to which in the spring Mr. Wallack will transplant his banner, for with all the speed with which the said building is being pressed forward, the work seems to be carefully and faithfully performed, and we judge that we shall at an early day be enabled to congratulate the community upon the possession of at least one properly constructed theatre.

Winter Garden.—With this week Miss Cushman's engagement comes to a close. She has appeared with more or less success as Mrs. Haller in the "Stranger;" Bianca in "Fazio;" Meg Merrilies in "Guy Mannering;" Lady Macbeth, Queen Katharine, Cardinal Wolsey, Romeo, and Juliana in the "Honeymoon." It is not probable that the New York public will ever again have an opportunity of witnessing the delineations of this distinguished actress. We have so frequently put upon record our opinion of Miss Cushman as a tragedienne, that it is not necessary here to repeat it. Our estimate of her abilities may be erroneous, but it is honest, and we have only to say in conclusion that, though the critics may differ as to the exact position to be accorded her as an artist, a large portion of the public, at least, will sincerely regret her permanent absence from the stage; or should that absence prove but temporary, eagerly welcome her return.

Speaking of the retirement of Miss Cushman reminds us that we have seen notices extensively copied, touching the retirement of another most charming and thoroughly accomplished actress. We allude to Miss Jean M. Davenport, or rather, if said notices prove true, Mrs. Colonel Lander.. For many years Miss Davenport has been regarded as the leading actress on the American stage, and we earnestly hope that before making her final adieux she will give all her admirers an opportunity of witnessing her chaste and really great performances.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Robbery of Watches and Jewellery.—The jewellery establishment of Mr. James Jacquet, corner of John and Nassau streets, was robbed of $3,500 worth of watches and jewellery, a few nights since. The property was in a large safe, manufactured by Messrs Valentine & Butler, which had one of their best locks to secure it. From the absence of all marks of violence, it was supposed by the proprietor and detectives that the lock must have been picked. On this supposition, they called upon the makers of the safe, who assured them that it was impossible for the lock to have been picked. In order to satisfy themselves on this point, the officers made a thorough examination of the plan of the lock, also of the front door Rotary Lock, which is similar in construction, invented and manufactured by Messrs. Valentine & Butler, and became fully convinced that there was no possibility of picking the lock or opening it without the true key, or an exact duplicate. With this clue, they at once decided that some one in the establishment, who had ample facilities for making a copy of the key, must have committed the robbery, which proved to have been the case. Proprietors cannot be too careful in regard to the facilities they allow persons in their employ to become acquainted with the secrets of their treasure boxes—especially in these exciting times.

The steamer Pacific was burnt to the water's edge at Louisville on the 10th. Captain Law was the only one whose life was lost. She was about to start for New Orleans.

It is reported that the British Governor of Vancouver's Island has taken a slave from an American ship in Victoria and set him free. This has naturally caused considerable indignation in Washington, and an explanation demanded.

John Horrigan, who was sentenced, about three years ago, by Judge Russell to forty years' imprisonment, for garotting, has been pardoned by Governor Morgan. Although the startling severity of the punishment stopped garotting, yet the sentence was considered excessive.

Tammany has given some signs of life, for on the 19th lights were visible in the Old Wigwam, and Elijah Purdy, the Old War-Horse, took the chair. A committee was appointed to look after the elections next December.

Coroner Gaffney closed his inquest on Mrs. Absom last Monday, and a verdict implicating her husband was found by the jury. He was committed to Hudson County Jail, to await his trial in January Julia Kennedy's evidence was materially shaken, it being conclusively shown that he was in the habit of meeting her in a saloon in Montgomery street, Jersey City. Dr. Doremus distinctly deposed that he had detected the presence of strychnine in the stomach of the deceased. This poison would occasion all the symptoms of her sudden death.

The census of Maine is 645,137, which is an increase of 64,668 since 1850. Baltimore has increased 40,000 out of 214,000—a very remarkable increase for a Southern city.

The case of Alderman Russell against ex-Alderman Wilson came off on the 19th, before a Sheriff's Jury, who found a verdict of $5,000. It will be remembered that the ex-Alderman assaulted the Alderman in the City Hall some months ago. $5,000 is a pretty heavy fee to pay for education at Wilson's time of life; but better late than never

Mr Lindsay, the well-known travelling companion of Mr. Roebuck in his visit to Cherbourg, and the maritime "M P." of England, sailed for England in the Persia on the 21st. He has travelled above 5,000 miles, and visited all our great cities. Although he has no special commission from the Government, his influence is very great with the commercial portion of it. He will be a valuable advocate in the British Parliament.

The United States mail steamship Columbia, Captain Berry, sailed at noon on Saturday, 17th, for Charleston, with the American flag at her peak as usual, while a Palmetto flag adorned her mainmast, in place of the customary private signal of the Company. It created quite a sensation. Captain Berry owns considerable real estate in Charleston, and it is alleged that for certain politic motives he was induced to fly the disunion flag while in Charleston last. The steamship herself hails from Charleston, but is the property of a joint stock company, whose members reside in various cities in the Union.

The Spanish frigate, the Berenguela, arrived in the harbor on the 19th, and was received with a salute from the forts. She has come from Havana for repairs.

Gen Riley, the Senator from Lumpkin county, Ga., was approached stealthily, and shot, while sitting by his own fireside, in Dahlonega, some days ago, by a man named Davis. The balls took effect in the shoulder, and ranged toward the cavity of the chest. He is not expected to recover. Davis fled, and $1,200 is offered for his apprehension.

On the 20th, a respectable man named Robert Swartz, attempted to commit suicide on one of the trains of the Hudson River Railroad, by shooting himself through the head. He was taken to Bellevue Hospital. The cause, business troubles.

Mr. W. A. Livingston, a well known New Yorker, fell dead in the drug store, corner of Pierrepont and Fulton streets on the 20th inst. He was in his 66th year He had been for some time suffering from disease of the heart.

A shark, recently captured near Port Jackson, N S. W., carried this remarkably curious assortment in its stomach—half a ham, several legs of mutton, hindquarter of a pig, head and forelegs of a bull dog with a rope round his neck, a quantity of horseflesh, a piece of sacking and a ship's scraper.

Four burglars entered the house of Mr. Johnson, near West Troy, on Saturday night, the 17th, and one of them, entering Mr. Johnson's sleeping apartment, compelled him to give up his money A young man who was sleeping in the house, hearing the noise, ran to the neighbors, procured assistance and surrounded the house, succeeding, after a desperate resistance, in capturing one of the four ruffians. He was badly cut in the fray, and when taken requested to be hung on the spot

It would be highly desirable if the police authorities would pay some attention to the convenience of the passengers of the Hoboken Barclay street Ferry. The policeman, No. 83, is very efficient at the corner of West street and Barclay, but it is very dangerous to cross Washington and Greenwich streets. A correspondent informs us that he saw a lady injured by the brutality of the carmen, who form a long line, refusing to obey the ordinance, which compels them to have a certain space between each cart. Mr. Kennedy ought to station a policeman at each of these crossings.

The Dalton Times (Ga.) gives the particulars of an unhappy rencontre between Dr. Moffett and Col. Glenn, in which the former was shot in the abdomen by Col Glenn. He has been bound over to make his appearance at the next term, should the wound prove fatal. The difficulty was occasioned by a dispute at the election.

The Pittsburg Chronicle has a very interesting account of a singular occurrence on the Mahoning river, about a mile from Edinburgh. The men had just ceased drilling a well for Kissick and Bryson, when a rumbling was heard in the bowels of the earth, and immediately afterwards a torrent of mud and water rushed forth, covering the floor and shed erected over the works, for more than a foot. The workmen made a precipitate retreat to a distance. After a short pause, one of the men returned with a lighted candle to see the extent of the damage. The gas from the well immediately ignited, setting fire to the derrick and all the works. After destroying considerable property the fire was extinguished. Fortunately, no lives were lost.

A dreadful murder was committed at San Francisco on the 31st Oct. A well-known New York character, named Michael Horrigan, or Irish Mike, as he was called by his companions, went up to his wife as she was sitting in a drinking-saloon, and saying, "Now I know that you are guilty," he cut her throat from ear to ear. She died immediately. He justifies his crime on account of her infidelity. She was his second wife.

The inhabitants of Fishkill, Newburgh, and parts adjacent, have determined to erect a statue to Henry Hudson, the discoverer of our noble river. We question if they can find any marble as imperishable as the water that bears his name.

The St. Louis Republican gives the particulars of a horrible case of Catholic parents poisoning their son rather than he should marry a Protestant. They have been arrested, and will be tried for their villainous bigotry.

The Yorkville, S. C., Enquirer says that an accident occurred at Shelby, N. C., at the celebration of the election. In order to show the inhabitants' appreciation of the different candidates, a very small quantity of powder was used when the cannon was fired in honor of Bell, Lincoln and Douglas. The smallness of the report made the Committee and spectators very merry. When their favorite candidate, Breckinridge, was to be celebrated, so much powder was put in that it broke, seriously wounding Col. Thomas Beardsly and several others.

The New Orleans Delta relates a novel method to set fire to houses. Two men, armed with all the tools necessary for repairing the gas meter, call upon the pretence that they were sent by the Company. They then empty the meter of the water and pour in spirits of turpentine, expecting that the gas will take fire. Col Miles, and Mr. Finney, the celebrated lawyer, had a narrow escape lately, of having both their houses burnt down, owing to this most infamous plot.

It appears after all that New Jersey did not go so emphatically for the Union as was supposed—four of her electors being Lincoln men Considering the influence brought to bear upon her, and the example of her Pennsylvania neighbor, this is not to be wondered at. Hudson county, however, was thoroughly Union. Much of this is due to the exertions of Gen. Wright, R. J. Deming, and others, whose speeches made a powerful impression on the wavering Mr. Deming is one of the most energetic and rising men of the Jerseys.

There has been a considerable row between the sophomores and the Faculty of Harvard College. Two of the freshmen being assaulted by the sophomores, one of the former discharged a pistol (loaded only with powder) at the sophomores. This led to a great riot, and the expulsion of nine of the sophomore offenders In order to show their contempt for Professor Felton and his associates, they drew the suspended members in a wagon past the house of the principal authorities and groaned very lustily. The Boston Traveller advocates that very vigorous action should be taken in this affair, if only for the sake of discipline.

The Webster Times (Mass.) is responsible for the following romance: "Two farmers, who have jointly owned and occupied a farm in that township for sixteen years, have lately dissolved partnership. During the whole of this period no accounts of any kind have been kept by either parties. Both individuals were men of family, occupying different portions of the same house, and when either wished to use cash he went to the drawer in which it was kept and took it, no account being kept in a single instance. Yet in all these sixteen years not a word of fault was spoken; no ill-feeling, jealousy or suspicion was shown, and perfect harmony subsisted between the parties to the day of their separation The final dissolution of business was occasioned by the marriage of a member of one of the families, when it was thought the house might not be able to contain 'the consequences;' so one party raised the value of one half the premises in cash, paid it over to the retiring partner, who quietly left We believe this to be an unparalleled case of honesty and confidence."

There seems to be some difference between the Irish wakes and the Wide Awakes, but what the difference is we leave the curious to discover. The Express, always glad to pick a hole in the "coat of the brogue," as Dr. Shelton Mackenzie calls his countrymen, gives the following little account of a slight emeute in Brooklyn on the 21st: "A cry of murder broke upon the ears of one of the officers of the Eighth Precinct, as he was patrolling his beat through Fifth avenue at an early hour this (Wednesday) morning. The cry, he discovered, came from a shanty in the vicinity, and thinking that he might possibly save the life of some unfortunate being, he hastened to the spot, when he found that the inmates had been holding a wake over the dead body of an old woman, and having indulged rather freely in bad liquor, they became quarrelsome, and finally had a rough-and-tumble fight, during which the corpse was knocked about rather roughly. Several of the most violent were taken into custody and locked up in the station-house" Mr. Davidge, the celebrated comedian, is so much disturbed by these mournful ceremonies that he declares he is kept "a wide awake" all night, despite his objection to mingle in our political squabbles.

The Mobile Tribune (Ala.) gives the following account of a series of brutal assaults: "Captain Harley, of the British ship Culloden, had occasioned considerable excitement there on account of his brutal treatment of a defenceless emigrant girl named McDonald. As the vessel was coming into port Miss McDonald—who was one of two hundred emigrants—expressed her delight at the near prospect of release from the tyranny and meanness of the captain, whereupon that dignitary made his mates throw three buckets of water over her person. When she was soaking wet these valiant mates seized her and dragged her on to the quarter deck before their valiant captain. He most valiantly beat her with a rope lash, tearing from her head and shoulders the shawl she tried to wrap around her as a shield against his merciless blows. Thus he flogged her until she fainted and fell upon the deck. Not yet satiated with cruelty he had the pump manned with six strong men, and had a stream of salt water, through a hose attached, with all the force they could give to it, thrown into her face and about her person, continuing the operation a full quarter of an hour. The captain is in the hands of a vigilance committee." We trust the vigilance committee will hand him over to the proper authorities, who should be compelled to punish the scoundrel according to his deserts.

Judge Gould and District-Attorney Waterbury deserve the thanks of the community for their behavior in the conviction of Gordon, one of the ticket swindlers, who has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment for cheating a California emigrant in the sale of a ticket. We think Mr. Waterbury ought to explain to the public why he does not try Charles Jefferds, accused of murdering his stepfather, Walton. As it is, the letter of that unhappy young man, demanding a speedy trial or some reason for the delay, has caused considerable sympathy in the popular mind. A false sympathy is as injurious to the general welfare as legal oppression.

E. H. Rosa, of the house of Vanduson, Jaggor & Baldwin, No 30 Vesey street, New York, writes to the Louisville (Ky) Journal, that on the 27th of October, at dusk, a very tall man, who said that his name was Henry Johnson, and that he lived at Louisville, where he had a wife and children, deposited $107 50 with the house for safe-keeping, as he was afraid he would be robbed by some Jews, who had followed him all the way from Louisville. He then went with Rosa to the Western Hotel, to spend the night, and during the temporary absence of the latter disappeared, since when he has not been heard of.

SINGULAR DOUBLE MURDER IN ENGLAND.

We copy from an English paper the following remarkable event: On the 29th ult., about two o'clock, the central block of the permanent barracks at Aldershott was the scene of a dreadful tragedy, involving deliberate murder, attended with the sacrifice of two lives, under the following circumstances: A lance-sergeant, named Owen Chipp, and John Coles, corporal of the 41st Regiment, were sitting together in the quarters of the former at the barracks, playing quietly a game of draughts, when James Johnson, a private soldier, opened the door, and entering the room, walked behind Sergeant Chipp, and then deliberately placing the muzzle of his rifle in the middle of his back instantly fired, when the bullet passed through the body of the unfortunate man and entered the breast of Corporal Coles, the ball passing also through the body of the latter, and being then flattened against the wall. Sergeant Chipp, after being shot, rose, staggered a few paces, and then fell dead between the two bedsteads. Corporal Coles, on being struck by the bullet, fell back and instantly expired. The alarm was given, and assistance was speedily at hand. The murderer was at once secured and taken to the guard-house, whence he was conveyed by a police-constable, two privates, and a corporal to the police-station. The only cause at present assigned for the perpetration of the diabolical act is that Johnson was recently confined to barracks for three days for insubordination, on the report of Sergeant Chipp, against whom he in consequence entertained a rancorous feeling of resentment.

THE BROTHERS RUBLE,
Farmers and Pioneers of the West.

THE Brothers Ruble were born in Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, and moved from thence with their father to Wayne county, Ohio, in the year 1832. Their respective ages and weights are as follows:

Simon,	age 48,	weighs 303	pounds avoirdupois,
Geo. S.	" 35,	" 285	" "
Henry,	" 33,	" 268	" "
John,	" 32,	" 201	" "
Aggregate weight, 1,157

Their respective heights will vary only a trifle from six feet two and a half inches.

Henry Ruble, the father of these "boys," was a man of more than ordinary mercantile powers, yet his weight scarcely exceeded two hundred pounds at any period of his life. He died near Wooster, Ohio, in 1854. Their mother, who is still living with Simon, near Beloit, Wisconsin, is a woman of strong masculine features. In the meridian of life her weight was about one hundred and eighty pounds. They are of German origin, and the "boys" still use and are more familiar with the German than the English language. They are all married, except Henry who is called the "Old Bach." In 1847 the Ruble Brothers settled upon and commenced the improvement of their valuable and well-known farm, four miles west of Beloit, Wisconsin, where Simon and Henry still reside. George and John removed to Alberton, Freeborn county, Minnesota, in 1856, and have established permanent and beautiful homes in that new State. George S. was the founder and proprietor of Alberton, the county seat of Freeborn, one of the most delightful spots for a town in the wide West. He has one of the best water powers in the State at that healthy village, is propelling the machinery for grinding and sawing daily.

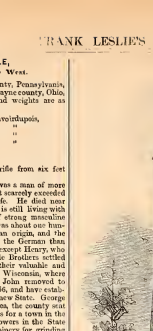
The Ruble boys are emphatically farmers, having purchased and raised some of the finest and best blooded cattle and horses in America. Among the latter, which are also particularly noted for their speed, we will mention Buck-shot, Circassian, Red Eye and St. Patrick, as horses of superior merit, which the records of various State Fairs in the West will likewise abundantly substantiate.

AMOSKEAG STEAM FIRE ENGINE.

On the night of the 10th of January, when the flames were raging with their utmost fury through the fallen ruins of the Pemberton Mills, in Lawrence, Mass., and the Washington Mills, together with other buildings, being in great danger, Mayor Saunders, of that city, deeming the force of the firemen present insufficient, forwarded a dispatch to Manchester, N. H., for assistance. The call was nobly responded to by orders of Chief Engineer Hunt, the "Amoskeag" was sent. The dispatch was received about half-past twelve. No engine was in readiness at Manchester, and a dispatch was sent to Lawrence for one. An engine was started from Lawrence, went to Manchester, took in with the steamer, its horses and company, and a carload of firemen, and returned, accompanied by Mayor Harrington and a part of the engineers. In just two hours and eight minutes from the time the telegram was received, the Amoskeag was at Lawrence, playing four streams of water upon the fire. The distance is twenty-six miles, making fifty-two miles travel-ed by the locomotive, which, with the loading and unloading of the machine, is remarkable time. Even then was such terror and confusion, its arrival at the ruins was greeted with enthusiasm. And the firemen, who were nearly worn out with exhaustion, greeted it with hearty cheers. It remained at Lawrence during the greater part of the next day, doing good service at the ruins.

This engine was built for the city of Manchester by the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company, under the direction of N. A. Bond, Esq., whose portrait we give in this issue. It is the first one of its own peculiar kind, though many are being made by the Company now, and for lightness and ease of firing up is unequalled. Weighing when empty five thousand five hundred pounds, is easily drawn by two horses, and will carry fuel sufficient to feed four or five hours. She will throw up and play two streams in less than four minutes from lighting the match; can get up steam as well while running as while standing. On one occasion she fired up and had two streams through four hundred feet of hose each in three minutes and forty seconds, drafting her own water. She will throw forty-eight inch inch streams through one hundred and fifty feet of leading hose each, horizontally; will throw one and one-fourth inch stream two hundred and forty feet.

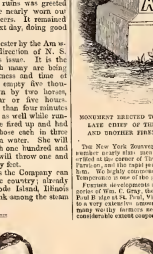
These machines are being made as fast as the Company can get them out, and sent to various parts of the country; already have they gone to Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Illinois and other places—bidding fair to take first rank among the steam fire engines throughout the country.



MONUMENT ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF CORNELIUS V. ANDERSON, LATE CHIEF OF THE N. Y. FIRE DEPARTMENT, BY HIS FRIENDS AND FORMER FIREMEN.—SEE PAGE 28.

BIRTHPLACE OF ROBERT FULTON.

It is said that in this country we take too little interest in memorials of our great men. The reproach cannot be urged against the liberminded newspapers, which preserve, and that copiously, monuments of every description. Such a memorial is given in the picture of the birthplace of Robert Fulton, situated in Fulton township, Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, for the original sketch of which we are indebted to E. B. Cope, Esq. Fulton's name stands, in common with those of Watt and Stephenson, as the greatest of the perfecters of steam power; that is to say, of the greatest civilizing agent of the modern world; and future generations, in the coming industrial age, will far surpass us of the present in doing him honor. The building is at present in the possession of John Ruble, Esq.



THE BROTHERS RUBLE, FARMERS AND PIONEERS OF THE WEST, WHOSE AGGREGATE WEIGHT IS 1157 POUNDS.

ERLE GOWER;
OR, THE
SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c.

CHAPTER V.—CONTINUED.

Poor Lady Maud! she witnessed the effect of her thoughtless remark, and said hurriedly, to alter the turn the subject.

"There are other introductions, Mr. Gower; you would possibly like——"

He stopped her by saying, in a tone abruptly,

"No, Lady Maud. I cast my eyes around this table and do not see an individual whose name I care to know—save one."

She emphasised the two last words.

Lady Maud threw her eyes across the table, and responded quickly,

"Colonel Fyfe?"

"No," returned Erle, so quickly and sharply as almost to startle her.

Then he added, in a subdued manner,

"There is a person seated lower down the table than your cousin Cyril, talking at this moment to a very voluble gentleman, who appears to be attracting everybody near and overhearing. Tell me, pray, who is he?"

Lady Maud, by a glance, discovered to whom he alluded, and her consciousness at once became grave.

"Mr. Pelling is the gentleman's name," she replied, in a voice that betrayed that the subject was not pleasing to her. He frequently here, Lord and Lady Kingswood rather like him, but Cyril—and I—do not."

"Nor I," thought Erle, but the mention of Cyril's name rather distorted him.

Lady Kingswood at this moment, having invited much attention on the Marquis of Chillingham, now suddenly appeared to remember the existence of the youth at her elbow, and entered into a lively conversation with him, which he supported with far greater readiness and skill than his previous life could have been expected. But then he had an audience at his elbow whom it especially desired to impress with a favorable opinion of him, the quiet, peerless, because he saw that many timid, wealthy glances were stole at him now by her, and those glances were not at all unfriendly in their expression.

The Marquis of Chillingham deigned to address some observations to him, and he observed with wonder that the youth did not blush at his condescension. The vicar, too, perceived that the young stranger was a distinguished guest, also engaged him in social conversation. He Sufferin Wills would have opened if he could have got at him. He resolved, however, to abide his chance, and cheerily bide over his woes.

This opportunity was not, however, afforded him. Lord Kingswood had watched the actions of Lady Gower with earnest attention; he observed, too, with a mortification he could not express, what attractions the possessor of Erle Gower excited among his guests. Several palable observations respecting the young stranger were made by him, in order to elicit a response from Erle, which his lordship declined to give.

When the ladies had retired, the signal for which Lord Kingswood himself gave at a period much earlier than usual, Mr. Spofford Wills and Mr. Pelling even both drew their chairs nearer to Erle's.

At the same moment, the stately butler sailed majestically down the room, and poured at Erle's elbow. With ineffable dignity, the magnificent personage then moved over the goodly table—

"Lord Kingswood suggests that, as you have been unaccustomed to scenes of excitement such as the fire to-day, you should immediately, without making an observation to any one present, retire to your own room, and remain there until he pays you a visit in the morning."

Erle glanced at Lord Kingswood, and saw upon his brow a sullen, moody, wrathful expression, which roused his pride.

He rose up, and walked with a firm step to meet mien down the room, acutely though he felt the insult conveyed in the message.

As he arrived opposite to Cyril Kingswood, the latter rose up, and with some eagerness addressed him—

"If you are for a stroll on the terrace, I'll join you," he said. "As he quitted his chair, he cast a cruel look of triumph at Erle stood.

"Stay," thunder'd Lord Kingswood.

Cyril started, and turned his head with an air of astonishment.

"Mr. Gower," continued Lord Kingswood, in a tone of asperity, "will retire to his own room. Cyril will remain where he is."

Such an insult Erle never before encountered in his life. Amazed, angry, he flung himself in his chair, while Erle, burning inwardly, strode out of the room, without seeing a man-servant who stood transfixed on the other side of Pulley Arch.

As Erle quitted the room a dead silence prevailed. The guests looked at each other in wonder, and again the question, Who is he? passed on their lips.

They were aroused, after a dreary, flagging conversation, to re-ve their noise a d join the ladies, where Lord Kingswood had the further chagrin to store for him of having to answer several queries put to him respecting the absence of Erle Gower.

In the meantime Erle retired, with a human swelling and burning with indignation, to his own dreary, gloomy apartments, and there exhausted some time in fruitless wish, and yet regretful speculation and schemes for the future.

One consolation he had in this dark hour of trouble and that was the sweet face of Lady Maud, which yet shone upon him in his vision like that of an angel.

He flung himself upon a bed, and the name of Maud upon his lips fell into a deep sleep.

At the target bell and the hour of midnight he rose an ever in his bed, stepped on the floor, and walked, with his eyes fixed on vacancy, right from the apartment into the next room, proceeding up his walk until he stopped at a window, and, pressing his forehead against the window pane, he fell motionless upon the ground.

He lay without moving until the turret-bell chimed one, when he rose up, muttering—

"And must solve the wonder of Kingswood Chase."

Instinctively he returned to his bed, without taking notice of aught, until his eye encountered the face of a female, in a large portrait hanging upon the wall upon which the moonbeams played brightly.

There he uttered a wild cry, an hurried his face in his pillow.

CHAPTER VI.

Strange tidings these to tell a world who treat
All but their own experience as deceit!
Will they believe, though credulous enough
To swallow much upon much weaker proof?—Cowper.

The cold, gray light of morning forced its chill beams through the diamond panes of Erle's chamber-window ere he moved from the position in which, sobbing bitterly, he had sunk into a deep sleep.

He was not naturally of a temperament easily excited to tears, and had borne his isolation at school, with all its attending trials, wild dreamings and strange misgivings, well and bravely. The sneers and taunts of school companions, the almost agonising surmises which others indulged in for him, if he hesitated himself to raise them, he had met with a bold front and erect bearing, intended to give an emphatic contradiction to any unworthy suggestion respecting his origin. But it was when alone, under the gaze of no eye but that of Heaven's, that he gave way to wild and passionate bursts of grief.

He felt like a chained lion; he had heart enough to meet and dare any difficulty fate might weave for him, but here, as at school, felt himself manacled like a captive, bound to the chariot of Lord Kingswood, compelled to halt or move as he dictated, unconscious of the real nature of the prerogative by which his lordship exercised the right to govern his movements.

Such reflections as these, when alone, coupled with an acute sense of his utterly forlorn position—for he could not consider it aught else, even though he had been kindly nurtured at school, and was now in the charge and beneath the roof of a lord—produced those bitter, passionate floods of tears which no torture could have wrung from him in the presence of others. Leaping from his trance-like sleep with a troubled exclamation, he gazed confusedly round his chamber, and was a minute or so before he could satisfy himself that he was in his own room.

At length his eye rested upon the portrait facing the foot of his bed, and, heaving a deep sigh, he proceeded to attire himself, in moody thought.

He passed into the sitting-room, and found there, awaiting him, Lord Kingswood's valet.

There was something peculiar in the expression of this man's face which excited an instinctive repugnance in Erle's breast. The searching, furtive glance of his cunning eyes; the constant smile, indicative of malice rather than of amiability; the subdued voice, the catlike tread, the noiseless movements, were singly sufficient to create dislike in the bosoms of the open-minded, the frank-hearted and the honorable, but when combined they acted with infinitely greater force, especially upon such a nature as that of Erle's.

A frown settled upon the lofty brow of the pale-faced youth as he beheld him, and he said, sharply and curtly,

"Why are you here?"

"By the commands of Lord Kingswood of Kingswood," returned the valet, in a tone especially offensive to Erle. It was as though he had said, "From your master and mine."

Erle felt the implied taunt instantly, the color rushed into his cheek and his eye brightened. He was about to make an impetuous observation, but he checked himself. Altering his manner to one of lofty coldness, he bade the valet communicate the object of his visit and then to leave him alone.

The valet, however, in his quiet, passionless tone, acquainted him that he was there at the request of Lord Kingswood to attend upon him, and that he was further ordered to remain with him until his lordship himself appeared. As Lord Kingswood had expressed an intention of favoring him with an interview, Erle made no reply, but seated himself, with poor appetite, to the breakfast prepared for him.

For some time no word passed between them, but presently the valet said, in an oily, insinuating voice,

"I am afraid you have not had a refreshing sleep, sir; you have made but a poor repast."

"Is a want of appetite a natural consequence of disturbed sleep?" asked Erle, coldly.

"You have had disturbed sleep, I perceive," returned the valet, evasively; "I don't wonder at it."

"Why not?" inquired Erle, raising his eyes to the man's face.

He was rather struck by the significant expression he perceived upon it.

The valet shrugged his shoulders.

"This portion of Kingswood Manor House is part of the original erection, built in the time of Edward the Second by an old baron or lord of the manor," he replied. "There are many strange stories told about this wing of the building—that sleeping apartment and the room we sit in, in particular."

Erle started.

The valet, with a glance beneath his pent brows, perceived it, and added,

"I have no faith in such idle, superstitious stories, and I am sure that you are a young gentleman of too brave and bold a nature to permit them to have any effect upon you."

The face of Erle became a shade whiter, and he passed his hand over his temples, as though a throng of new and strange thoughts had rushed through his brain. After a slight pause, he said, in a quiet tone,

"What are the stories to which you refer."

The valet smiled; a malicious sneer curled his lip, sufficiently perceptible to be displeasing, but not so positive as to call forth a remark.

"The common people dwelling on an estate have always some wild stories respecting their lord passing from mouth to mouth," he answered. "The lords of Kingswood have not been spared any more than other members of their order. So a tradition rests on the house of Kingswood."

"What is it?" inquired Erle, betraying an interest he wished to have concealed.

Again he felt vexed by the distasteful smile with which this man prepared to reply to him, but he was compelled to smother his anger by his anxiety to hear the tradition to which he alluded.

"Many, many years ago," commenced the valet—"I don't know how many—a bold baron of Kingswood earned for himself the reputation of being a very bad baron of Kingswood. He was guilty of many excesses and many crimes, but the blackest deed has reference to the lady whose portrait hangs in the adjoining room, over the hearth and facing the foot of the bed."

Erle gave an involuntary start, and the valet, bending on him a fixed look, said,

"You have, perhaps, noticed the portrait?"

Erle bowed his head in assent, but did not make any other reply.

"It is a fair and beautiful face—that of a young, high-born lady," continued the valet, in his smooth, sleek tones; "and the atrocious, hard-hearted cruelty with which this bad baron of Kingswood treated this fair lady it was that drew down upon his house a doom which, from that day to the present, clings to the members of the family."

"What is that doom?" inquired Erle, hastily.

"Ah!" ejaculated the valet, with his offensive smile crawling over his face, "that is known to the initiated alone."

"The initiated," echoed Erle; "what do you mean?"

"Why, the tradition is, that there have been, since the death of the bad baron, a false and true heir to the House of Kingswood, one brought up within the walls, one without them," returned the valet. "That to the true heir alone the lady of the Chace will reveal herself, and the fashion in which the doom shall be removed from the heirs of the race."

N. S. BEAN ESQ., BUILDER OF THE AMOSKEAG STEAM FIRE ENGINE. PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. B. BURTON, MANCHESTER, N. H.

"This appears to be a very idle, ignorant piece of superstition," observed Erle, thoughtfully.

"Well, it does so, as I have said, to the uninitiated," replied the valet, with a glittering look and a sinister grin. "As you are not a heir of Kingswood, your observation is a natural one—to me a very sensible one; but there are some curious confirmations of the story, wild as it may appear."

THE AMOSKEAG STEAM FIRE ENGINE, OF MANCHESTER, N. H.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. B. BURTON, MANCHESTER, N. H.

"What are they?" inquired Erle, somewhat coldly.

"Firstly, that no heir of Kingswood can sleep in the bed you have just quitted without seeing the spectre of the Lady Maud," returned the valet, regarding him very closely.

"The Lady Maud?" echoed Erle, with surprise.

"That is the name of the lady to whose portrait I have drawn your attention," rejoined the valet, continuing to gaze searchingly at him. "You may have observed that it bears a singular resemblance to Lady Maud, who sat next to you yesterday evening at dinner."

"I now remember that the face appeared familiar to me when I looked at the portrait," remarked Erle, rather pleased to discover that such a likeness existed.

After this it was likely to become a source of constant attraction to him, although, when this suggested itself, the cause remained hidden from him.

"There is also another motive in connection with this tradition, which is singular enough," continued the valet; "and this part is what is called 'The Wonder of Kingswood Chace.'"

"The Wonder of Kingswood Chace?" repeated Erle. "The Wonder of Kingswood Chace? Where have I heard those words—where—where—where?"

He placed his hands upon his temples, which began to throb violently, and fell into a fit of profound abstraction, from which he he started at a touch from the finger of the valet, who, with singular earnestness, watched the varying expression of his face.

"Be good enough to hear my story out," said the valet, "there is not much more to communicate. The Lady Maud of two hundred years ago is seen at times in the Chace, sometimes pursued by a villainous ruffian, to be rescued by the heir of Kingswood, who finds that he has been doing battle with a spectre, in behalf of a phantom. I have been assured, however, by the housekeeper, who has lived two generations in the family, that the lady seen in the wood is real flesh and blood—some young, fair creature, brought up in obscurity, who turns out to be a heir of the race. It is through this young female, I believe, and by her aid alone, that the doom can be removed from the house of Kingswood."

The valet ceased to speak, but he kept his dark, treacherous-looking orbs fixed on Erle.

The latter had listened to the concluding portion of this strange story with perturbation and excitement. He recalled the incident of the previous morning, and it seemed to confirm the tradition, save that none of the actors in it were spectral. He now remembered that the face of the insensible female, of which he had caught but a glimpse, bore a remarkable resemblance to the portrait in the adjoining room, and yet did not strike him as being like that of the Lady Maud.

He determined to satisfy himself on this point through the assistance of Cyril Kingswood.

He paced the room as these thoughts revolved themselves through his mind, followed by the inquisitive eyes of the valet.

Suddenly he paused before the black, oaken door, in the corner of the room, and as it caught his attention, he stopped. A vision, a dream, seemed suddenly to present itself before him, and involuntarily he exclaimed,

"The heir of the race, by God's holy grace,
Shall solve the wonder of Kingswood Chace."

"The very words," exclaimed the valet, with quickness; "where did you hear them?"

Erle turned to him with an abstracted look. The valet repeated his question, but before Erle could reply, the door opened, and Lord Kingswood entered the room.

He turned to his valet, and waving his hands towards the door, he said,

"Leave us, Pharisee."

The valet glided, with a low obeisance, out of the room, muttering as he went,

"A heir of the house of Kingswood by all that is marvellous. This discovery shall turn to good account for me, or I am strangely mistaken."

Erle raised his eyes to Lord Kingswood's face and saw written there an expression that boded him no good.

His lordship was pale, his brow sullen, and his lips were compressed. He pointed to a chair, and said, in a stern, commanding voice,

"Be seated."

Erle's proud heart rebelled at the tone of the words and the gesture which accompanied them. He obeyed, but it was with the air of one who would yield more readily to a request than to a command.

Lord Kingswood gazed long and steadfastly at the boy's pale, handsome face, before he spoke.

A change passed over his features. Probably a memory crossed him which softened his wrath, and toned down his indignation.

Aye, it was not alone a memory. Those features brought back to him many memories. He could not fail to remember, as he perused them, how many touching proofs of love, tenderness and devotion they had heralded to him; he could not forget how much of love and truth there had been on one side—how much of passion and deceit upon the other.

The most hardened have their moments of remorse, when they would recall the past if they could. Some such touch of nature penetrated to the haughty, aristocratic heart of Lord Kingswood, and wrought a reaction in his intentions.

He drew a long breath, and paced up and down the apartment, muttering to himself. At length he approached Erle, and said,

"You have grievously offended me. I strictly enjoined you not to quit your apartment. I had especial and important reasons for not introducing you to the guests assembled at the house. I need not descend to particulars. If I had not been so influenced, I, the proper person, would have introduced you to my friends and acquaintances. It was very wrong—it was highly reprehensible to thus force yourself, under the assumption of my patronage, upon my visitors, many of them persons moving in extremely high circles——"

"Pardon me, my lord," exclaimed Erle suddenly rising up, and interrupting Lord Kingswood. "I cannot listen to your accusation that I forced myself into the presence of your friends, without giving it at once a prompt and emphatic denial. On the contrary, the dinner yesterday evening was to me an ordeal I would most thankfully have been spared. I was present in obedience to the especial request, I may say command, of Lady Kingswood. For all that occurred, including the responsibility attaching to it, I must refer you, by her ladyship's request, to Lady Kingswood. I am not to blame, my lord; and I cannot conclude, without suggesting that the insult your lordship last night forced upon me was as unmerited as it was cruel."

Lord Kingswood looked at him with amazement. He was not accustomed to be thus answered or treated in so haughty a spirit.

"Boy!" he exclaimed, sharply, "do you remember who stands before you?"

"That you are Lord Kingswood I know well," returned Erle; "but I do not know what right that title empowers you with to command and control my actions—perhaps my future life."

This was a home-thrust which his lordship knew not how to parry. He felt at a loss how to reply. Erle proceeded for the moment quickly.

"It is a piece of information which, indeed, I seek most earnestly, most solicitously; I ought to know wherefore I am to be implicitly guided by your counsel, and to yield unreserved obedience to your commands. Once prove to me that you justly possess that right, and I will be as faithful and obedient to your wishes as though I were your own son."

Lord Kingswood, at those last words, turned instantly scarlet, then white. He walked to the further end of the apartment, to conceal his embarrassment.

As he reached it, the open door of the sleeping chamber enabled his eye to rest upon the portrait of the Lady Maud, respecting whose unrest Erle had heard so strange a tale.

His face, figure, mien, suddenly underwent an extraordinary change. He stood for a moment paralyzed, as though his eyes played upon a spectre, then every limb in his frame became convulsed, and froth bubbled from his lips.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF ROBERT FULTON, LANCASTER CO., PA.—FROM A SKETCH BY E. B. COPE, ESQ.

He clutched at a chair for support, and drops of sweat rolled down his livid brow.

He uttered rather than walked back to Erle: he pointed to the room, and clutching him by the wrist, he said, in a low, hoarse whisper:

"Who slept within that chamber?"

"Twice I have slept within that chamber," replied Erle, suddenly feeling a strange and awful thrill creep over his frame.

"Tell me—tell me of your visitation!" exclaimed Lord Kingswood, in a loud, unnatural voice, and he sank down upon a chair, staring out from their sockets his eyes.

Erle covered his face with his hands as if to think. With startling abruptness he withdrew them, and his eyes, setting upon vacancy, became riveted on the opposite wall, apparently his lip quivered, and speaking in a low, musical tone, as if under inspiration, he said:

"I dreamed that I stood in the midst of waving trees, the green sward stretched from under my feet for miles around me, and the shadows fell upon it from embrageous boughs, and golden streams of sunlight shot between them, intersecting it with a most delicate tracery of leaves. And so from all alley there bounded a white fawn, its neck studded with diamonds, and its horns were interlaced with luxuriant leaves. It paused, looked back on it wistfully, then bounded on again, so that it was soon lost to my eyes. Then there came forth from the same alley a youth and a maiden. He wore the dress of a hunter, and she the loose robe of a time long past. She leaned upon his arm, and looked up in his eyes tenderly and confidingly. Their costume and their purple shade of a quaint old oak, whose gnarled arms extended many a yard, forming a canopy between them and the blue vault of heaven. The youth sank upon one knee and addressed her beseechingly and impassionedly. She turned away and hid her face, and then raised her face, it seemed in toil, did he grow more pressing and urgent in his pleadings, and at length she gave him her hand. He leaned on his shoulder, and bending over him, imprinted a timid kiss upon his forehead. He turned his face and caught her lips to his own. A large bird at the instant darted from the deepest recesses of the oak and with its wings struck the hunter and maiden. At the moment the maiden gazed at it affrightedly, but she clung to the arm of the youth, and he mildly regarded the bird.

"Then the sunlight began to change from golden to crimson and the gray shadows to deep purple, and the trees and the sward then spread a sanguine hue, until the air seemed hot, oppressive and the grass to rock with fire. My dream-scene was now in the upper storey, for a growing shriek pierced my brain. I could not move, for my feet felt as if they were rooted to the floor, and my head seemed to grow heavy, and my eyes to burn. I could not—I would not withdraw them from the object, for my grew cold, the green leaves and grassy sward changed to a dull gray, and the golden streams of silver light burst through the openings of branches, of the leaves, and I knew that the scene was changing. Flames were in the air and in the ground, and the youth and maiden were in the midst of them, and they were shrieking, shrieking, shrieking!

His glassy, rigid eyes suddenly turned upon the door of the sleeping chamber, and his head moved slowly away from it, as though his eyes were following some object in the air. He repeated silent until his face had turned from right to left. Then his lips separated, his hands relaxed, and he fell back upon the couch of Lord Kingswood.

It would be impossible to depict the expression which passed over the nobleman's features as he listened, with quiet but intense eyes, to the words of Erle's dream, and when the latter ceased to speak he fell senseless himself.

He recovered after a strong effort, by retiring his own senses, and with them sufficient presence of mind not to ring for assistance.

He hastily laid Erle on the floor, poured some water from a jug on the table, and raising his head upon his knee, he bathed his temples carefully and tenderly.

"He is my son—a Kingswood—he heir to the race! This event hath proved it," he said, in a voice of deep and solemn tone. "He is her son, too. See how her handsome features are here repeated."

He gazed upon the face of the unconscious Erle with a deep, low, despairingly reverend he eyes with his hand.

"Almighty Heaven, be graciously to us that a terrible position this in which I am placed! What can I do? I dare not disown, disavow him. He is my son, and he is entitled to the name of Kingswood. What is to be done? I am distracted. Would I knew what to do! Would I suspected!"

How many a criminal has attained the same fruitless wish when intimidated by the consequences of his crime, and the utter inefficacy as Lord Kingswood!

A deep sigh heaved on the breast of Erle announced returning animation, and then Lord Kingswood raised him to his feet and seated him in a chair, but he had scarcely done so when Erle, with a spring up, and gazed in a disordered manner around him.

"Where am I?" he said, and then his eyes rested on the face of Lord Kingswood.

"You have had a sudden attack of the nerves, which for a few moments has rendered you unconscious," his lordship replied, hurriedly. "I am sorry to have occasioned it to you shall be removed at once from the room."

He rang the bell, and beamed in Erle's eyes.

"I thought it strange that I should faint," he said, confused.

"And have the most ungodly entrust of you to retain what you now recognize as your own property, my dear, dear son," said his lordship, anxiously; "for, though he'll mild, unmeaning dream, it may lead to idle gossip and scandal, and the latter is a thing which ignorant and superstitious minds are too fond of indulging."

Erle gazed fixedly at him.

"This that I have seen, my lord, is so idle, unmeaning dream as he exclaimed, with energy of emphasis.

"Think of it what you will," returned Lord Kingswood, hastily, "if you must persist in it as a subject for reverie. Let no one know you to be careful how and to whom you may reveal it. More chance attaches to it than you imagine, and you are not aware of it. Be advised as well as cautioned by me—forget it."

Lord Kingswood paused thoughtfully for a moment, and then added,

"At your face once entered and, indeed, mixed with my family and friends, it will, upon consideration, be better that I should at once introduce you to them as the son of a deceased friend of an officer, who died abroad and committed you to my care on his death-bed, and most steadfastly I will do it."

"But am I the son of such a man?" inquired Erle, eagerly.

Lord Kingswood looked at him with a face veiled in hard deportedly.

"Be content with this; you may learn all some day."

As he concluded, the door silently opened, and Lord Kingswood's valet glided in.

Lord Kingswood started as he found him at his elbow.

"What now, Hayward?" he exclaimed, angrily.

"I am desired by Lady Kingswood to say that her ladyship, Lady Maud, Sir Cyril and Lady Chilling have returned, and are now in the park, and her ladyship would be gratified by the attendance of your lordship and Mr. Erle," he replied. "I am also desired by your lordship to join the party, her ladyship trusts nothing will be suffered to prevent your lordship's doing so," he concluded.

Lord Kingswood bit his lip, and a shade of displeasure crossed his face. Suddenly he turned to Erle.

"It is better as it is!" he muttered. "Pluckee, return to her ladyship, my son will join her party in the park. Hayward, attend, turning to Erle," you shall accompany me. Let me exhort you to be discreet and reserved; answer no polemic or impertinent question put to you by any person whatever, and something bright may yet be in store for you. Your actions shall be my guide, and your future you now occupy, brighter, more cheerful, and you will then be released from the restraint which appears to have so much disturbed brain."

He strolled his arm to Erle, who took it gladly, a cheerful smile playing on his lips.

Not at what had fallen from the lips of Lord Kingswood, but that to his mind's eye he saw the sweet face and fair form of the Lady Maud waiting his coming on the velvet lawn, stretching like a long green carpet in front of Kingswood Manor House.

CHAPTER VII.

The progress from the chamber Erle had occupied to the tastefully arranged lawn was considerably a very short one, for in the most modern style of ornamental and landscape gardening, was like a rapid transition from one's every day life into that where lies the appeal of dark gloom, of frowning, dreary antiquity, of times long past, when crime and power stalked hand in hand, of dismal corridors, of hidden recesses and passages subterranean and secret-guarded. The other of the bright, sunny to-day, with all the marvellous improvements and refinements of modern times, of comfort, enjoyment and repose.

Erle gazed upon the beautiful scene spread before him with eyes of admiration and a throbbing heart. The gloom of the misty morning had broken away and the sun was shining brightly. Stretched before him was a lawn of emerald verdure, studded with parterre grounds, beneath a lengthened slope, down which terrace beneath terrace, rising in succession, presented a wide expanse of walks, flower-beds of every shape and form, green with hardy shrubs and plants, and in the centre a large circular basin, filled with water, in which white toste could devise, skill exercise and wealth contribute to adorn.

A background of park, woodland, hill, dale and distant mountain completed the picture.

In the grounds, in various parts, might be seen the guests of the house, some reclining on the grass, others in the distance sport, while immediately before his eyes stood stationed Lady Kingswood, Lady Maud, Sir Cyril and Lady Chilling.

As he approached them with Lord Kingswood, he perceived that Lady Maud was the only one of the party who would love on a gallery embarrassment him, but that he beheld an expression on the countenance of Lady Kingswood, Sir Cyril and Lady Chilling, which not to interpret as a pleased welcome.

However, the first introduction he became entrusted to him by Lady Kingswood, had removed the worst opposition. Both Lord Kingswood and Erle had received the impression of starting in a mere ramble through the cedarn pathways in the spacious undulating park, and not to a formal introduction, and a repetition of dinner, that the party were equipped for riding, and at some short distance from the mansion were their horses, with a groom to attend each steede.

Lady Maud, attired in a close-fitting, dark green riding-habit, were upon her head a black Rubens hat, to which clung a white ostrich feather, which drooped over her left shoulder.

Her graceful, youthful form, her sweet face, and her soft, dreamy, violet eyes looked charming in the extreme. At least Erle thought so, and at the same time believed that human nature need be cycle or more beautiful than that of Lady Maud, at which he had arrived.

He felt the blush when she saw him approaching her?

Why did the pulse of his heart beat quicker, and a rosy glow suffuse his cheek as he met her gaze? Why did his eyes fall and caught her exquisitely formed figure standing near to her cousin Sir Cyril, with a species of expectancy fine of attention to his remarks?

Love is still perhaps knew much.

Lady Kingswood, who, in her capacious attire, looked a yet fluid and more matronly than usual, as she sat in her carriage-by passed, awaited with no less excitement the arrival of Lord Kingswood and his companion, and perhaps, for the first time in her long, dreadful maid, become mistress of what had happened after the, with the exception of Lord Kingswood, was quite aware of Lord Kingswood's early visit to Erle's room. Adding these motives to the curiosity of the rest of the party, it is not to be wondered at that Erle's explanation as to the latter's true history, was materially shortened.

She was pretty well convinced that the course she had adopted in Erle's case, and which Lord Kingswood by his silence, had genuine respecting Erle. She was therefore firmly resolved to weed out the truth, but as well as she could, and never to be seen by what she knew all, learned, it had helped her to conjectures and self-satisfactory solutions of the mystery.

She was surprised to receive Lord Kingswood's ready assent to her request—surprised to find him so little

"I am very well satisfied with him," returned Erle.

"And ought to be," rapidly rejoined Philip, with spiteful sarcasm; "safe riders prefer quiet horses."

"I never turned a horse from anything he would face, be his mettle what it might," responded Erle, the blood mounting to his brow.

"I'll be sworn you did not," exclaimed Cyril, with emphasis.

"We may have to test you yet before the ride is over," exclaimed Philip, savagely, reckless whether he kept within the bounds of good breeding or not.

"You may," replied Erle, laconically, but haughtily.

He did!

"This is where the Chace commences, Lady Kingswood," cried Cyril, in a loud voice. "We must pass through yonder copse to get out into the broad glades of the old forest. There is one part of it very dark, therefore be careful how you pick your way through it; it is full of gaps and ridges."

"I will attend to her ladyship's horse," returned the Marquis of Chillingham, in reply.

"Lady Maud, I will lead your horse," proffered Philip Avon, in a tone suasive, soft, very different to that in which he addressed Cyril.

"Thank you, no; I place my trust in my cousin Cyril," returned Lady Maud, in a grave and decided tone.

Cyril laughed gaily.

"You observe," he exclaimed, "there is but one Maud, and Cyril is her prophet."

"There is but one Maud," thought Erle, "but I fancy there is a mistake about the prophet."

They quickly fell almost into single file, Cyril leading the way, followed by Lady Maud, Lady Kingswood, the Marquis of Chillingham holding the latter's bridle. Philip Avon, with marked rudeness, displaced Erle, and compelled him to bring up the rear. It was a small incident, and Erle laughed contemptuously at it. Yet it rankled.

The way was yet scarcely wide enough for two steeds to pass abreast, when Philip Avon perceived Erle in advance of him.

The copse was so dark, the necessity for caution so great, that it seemed impossible for Erle to do other than grope his way. Yet he had given his horse the rein, left him to pick his own path, slightly pricked him with the spur, and so Philip Avon was left behind.

It was not with a view of retaliation that this was done: Erle scorned so petty a proceeding. It was, in fact, because his keen eyes caught a glimpse of the dark figure of a man, dodging from tree to tree, and keeping as near to Cyril as he could.

Erle might have thought little of this, had it not been that he perceived the figure raise its arm, as though to fling some heavy missile at Cyril's head, and that he paused only because he could not take a satisfactory aim.

At length he observed Cyril and Lady Maud emerge into the daylight. Then a missile was hurled with deadly force, but it only whistled past Cyril's temple, without hitting him.

The effect of this dastardly outrage was to cause Cyril to rein in his steed, in order to ascertain whence it had proceeded, and from whom.

Erle, at this moment, uttered a loud cry, and dashed past the Marquis of Chillingham with such force as nearly to overthrow him, yet but an instant he was level with a man, who, with upraised club behind Cyril, and unseen by him, was about to deliver a blow at him which, if it missed him not, would either slay him or maim him for life.

He delivered with swiftness a fearful lash across the ruffian's face, who uttered a wild yell as he received it, and missed, in consequence, his mark. But, unhappily, the hedge-stake with which he was armed glanced from Cyril's horse and descended with frightful force upon the haunches of the high-bred, high-blooded steed on which the Lady Maud was mounted.

The horse uttered a scream of pain, plunged for an instant with frantic violence, and tearing his bridle from Cyril's hand, fled down down the glade with the velocity of a racehorse, the Lady Maud clinging to the pommel of the saddle.

For a moment there was a horrified silence, then sticking his spurs into his horse's flanks, and animating him with his voice, Erle dashed after Lady Maud, leaving Cyril to settle with his assailant, whom he recognised as Tubal Kish. Almost instantly he found a horse's head at his saddle-girths, and the animal galloping onward as furiously as his own. At the same time a voice shouted fiercely,

"Clear the path or I'll cut you down. This task is mine."

If a glance of the eye could slay like a stroke of lightning, Philip Avon would have been struck dead in his saddle. Erle's eyes literally flashed fire.

"Not for a thousand Philip Avons will I give way. You shall answer to me for your insolent threat. Mine the task to save her yet more justly than thine!" he responded, passionately.

Away!

Over heaths and furzes, under the straggling arms of the old trees, down sweeping slopes, up rugged rises, now over a sand gap, anon, through a slushy pool, clearing every impediment, flew Maud's horse, hotly pursued by Erle and Philip Avon.

In vain the latter lashed his magnificent steed, spurred and railed at him; he could not cause him to overtake that on which Erle was mounted, and which, as intense as his anxiety, he animated to the pursuit by his voice and the gentle pressure of his hand alone.

At the top of his voice Erle urged Lady Maud to keep her seat, and he promised her that he would yet save her, dangerous and critical as her position appeared. And she heard his voice, and listening, believed him, though nearly dead with fright.

Away down a ravine, crashing and leaping over boughs and prickly underwood, along the uneven bottom and into the open.

Now Erle urged his steed, for yet at his elbow, shouting and lashing the animal he bestrode madly, came Philip Avon. Erle's horse answered the call, and pressed forward at a yet swifter pace than before.

Now rose up suddenly before them a long, stone, ancient wall, crumbling to ruins, part of the boundary wall of the old castle grounds. It was topped with ivy, and was a startling height to get over. But Maud's horse went at it, scrambled through the ivy which surmounted it, displaced a stone or two, and dashed on again.

With a loud cheer, a smart crack of his whip, a sharp prick with the spurs, and Erle's horse cleared it like a deer. On he went in pursuit, now pressing his horse more than ever, for before him he saw that a wide chasm had been cut in the hill they were descending in order to form a level road to a neighboring quarry, and that this chasm, which was evidently the part of the hill to which Lady Maud's horse was making, was some twenty or thirty feet deep. If he could not succeed in stopping it before it reached this terrible spot, he shuddered to think what the consequences must be.

Now he plied his whip, spur and voice; his horse did its utmost, but Lady Maud's steed, maddened by the attempts to overtake it, yet frantic with terror, made tremendous efforts to continue its career, and contrived to reach the fearful gap before Erle could come up with it. With a mad snort the affrightened beast saw its own danger, and made a terrific, convulsive plunge over the abyss, and barely cleared it.

"Over with it, at a splendid bound, with eyes starting, ears erect, came Erle's horse.

The youth, with teeth set and leaping heart, as soon as he saw that to check Maud's horse was, at that frightful moment, impossible, dared all. He called with a ringing voice upon his gallant steed, and nobly it answered him.

The two horses leaped at a moment. The next instant Erle had the bridle of Maud's horse in his hand, and drew it to his own, which he sharply pulled up.

Her horse required no further checking; it stood still and trembled, as if it had been smitten with a palsy.

Erle sprang from the back of his foaming, panting, reeking steed, and lifted Lady Maud from her saddle, which she yet clutched, in a state of semi-insensibility, and placed her uninjured upon the turf.

She instinctively flung her arms upon his shoulders, and burst into a very passion of tears. She tried to speak twice or thrice, but her quivering lips prevented the articulation of a word. She could only cling to him and lay her face upon his breast, and sob hysterically, and she trembled and shook like an aspen.

Then he prevailed on her to be seated upon the soft, mossy turf, and he knelt by her side.

And she sat there with her arms yet clinging round him, and her pallid face still resting half hidden on his bosom, so that her ears could catch the hurried beatings of his young, proud heart.

So he had saved her. She had escaped her fearful danger; was safe and unhurt.

"Where was Philip Avon?"

Erle gazed around him with kindling though humid eye, and a curling lip, but he could not see Philip Avon.

(To be continued.)

MONUMENT ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF CORNELIUS V. ANDERSON.

IN the month of February, 1859, a few of the friends and brother firemen of Cornelius V. Anderson, late Chief Engineer of the Fire Department of New York, were assembled together by Mr. Zophar Mills, to provide for the erection of a suitable monument over the remains of the departed chief. The meeting was organized by appointing Mr. Mills, chairman; Philip W. Engs, treasurer; and Robert McGinnis, secretary. A committee was appointed to raise the necessary funds among exempt and active firemen, with instructions to collect it in sums not over five dollars from one individual. The active members of that committee were the officers as above, with Henry B. Venn, Owen W. Brennan, J. R. Platt, D. S. Weeks, L. Delmonico, J. Y. Watkins, J. M. Miller and D. D. Conover. The Exempt Firemen's Association contributed thirty dollars, and two gentlemen, who are not desirous of having their names published, fifty dollars each. There was received from California firemen, through Mr. Venn, twenty-one dollars, and the balance required was made up in small sums. A committee, consisting of Messrs. Engs, Miller and Venn, was appointed to procure plans or drawings, with estimates of cost. That drawn by Mr. Corregio was adopted, and contract made with Mr. T. F. Goodwin, Fourteenth street, near Eighth avenue, for the monument, at the cost of one thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars, which, being completed to the satisfaction of the committee, was paid for by means collected as above. The ground is the property of Mr. James Anderson, brother of the deceased, and his sisters, and the iron fence around was erected by them.

Mr. Anderson was one of "nature's noblemen;" he had the valuable quality of commanding the respect and obedience of a large body of firemen without degrading his position by too free association with subordinates, or compromising his dignity in any way.

A party move was made at one time to induce him to resign his office, by reducing his salary to a very low sum. This did not operate as intended, and he continued his duties until a more just set of men in our public councils, who appreciated his services, remunerated him in a reasonable way, which, although sufficient, was less than one-half that now allowed to a Chief Engineer.

The standing of the department was much elevated during the command of Mr. Anderson, and since the days of Thomas Franklin no individual holding that station has contributed more to the well-ordering and management of the Fire Department in all respects.

Mr. Anderson held, during part of his term of service, the offices of President and Trustee of the Incorporation, and was found as efficient there as in his duties of Chief.

The high post in command was not sought for by him; it was a voluntary offering to the worth and competency of one who was simply occupied in the calling of a tradesman, but from which he rose in the estimation of his fellow-citizens, subsequently filling the important stations of City Register and Governor of the Almshouse, in a manner reflecting the highest credit upon his ability and character.

THE CHAIRMAN'S DAUGHTER.

A Tale of Real Life.

PART I.

MR. HARDMAN SELBY was a great man in his own district in the west of England. He was very rich, very dictatorial, and very ill-tempered. He had been long a widower, with one child. Annette Selby was, ten years ago, a beautiful girl. She was doated on by her father, who provided for her every luxury she desired. Happy Annette Selby! Yet you have seen her to-day, a raving madwoman in a pauper lunatic asylum.

The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children. Hardman Selby was, in his wrath, awful to look upon, terrible to be near. In her fits of passion, Annette Selby was a very fiend.

Well, all around were well-nigh perfect slaves; so what matter. Tenants, dependants, servants, crouched and fawned, cursed, hated and obeyed; so the father's wrath and the daughter's vehemence did no great harm, save to themselves, mentally and bodily.

Annette had just turned twenty, when one day her father intimated to her that Captain Wyerly would be their guest for a few weeks. The captain came. He was an attractive, well-educated man of five-and-twenty. Of course he fell in love with Annette. Every man fell in love with her at first sight, and remained in love with her until she showed her colors, and then he immediately withdrew. But Captain Wyerly had to pass half a dozen weeks with Annette, whether he would or no—for Mr. Selby had arranged it; Captain Wyerly was not only to love Annette, but to marry her; and for Mr. Selby's will not to be carried out! Mercy!

Things took the proper course. The lady and gentleman acted with perfect propriety. Mr. Selby's resolution was implicitly fulfilled. Now, who was Captain Wyerly? Oh, of course, everything that was satisfactory. He was the only nephew of that fearfully wealthy old bachelor, Sir John Larby, and Sir John had just had notice to go where none of his bullion could follow him.

"I am sorry to say, sir, that I must leave you, and that immediately," said Captain Wyerly, coming down to breakfast one morning with an open letter in his hand. "Sir John is at the point of death."

Of course expressions of sympathy were the response; but, to tell the truth, there was a smile of satisfaction on the faces of both father and daughter, as they uttered them.

"You will return to us as soon as you can."

"Most certainly I will."

"You will have a great deal to attend to," remarked Mr. Selby. "In the case of such an enormous property as Sir John's, much labor will be required to arrange all things, and this labor must devolve——"

"Upon me," said the captain. "There is no one else, you know."

"Not a single other relative, I believe." Mr. Selby had devoted months to the satisfying himself on the point.

"Not one; and what is more, I believe he has never had the slightest affection for anything or anybody in this world, save myself and his bulldog."

"A kind, good soul," murmured Mr. Selby, without the least touch of irony in his tone. "Farewell, captain, for a short time; and then return, to receive this roof as your abode."

This remark referred to the captain's having been formally recognized by her father as Annette's future husband. And Annette herself—had she truly accepted him? With her whole heart—her strong, passionate heart—she loved him. His was a determined will, and he had conquered hers. She was, in the most absolute sense, his.

A fortnight passed. The scene was again the breakfast-room; but this time it was Mr. Selby who appeared with the open letter. What was the matter with him? He gasped, and tried in vain to speak. Annette took the letter. It conveyed startling news. Sir John Larby was dead, and no sooner was he dead, than it came to light that many years ago he had been secretly married to his scullery maid, who now appeared as his widow with four children. It was all revealed in the will, and the property, save a legacy to Captain Wyerly, was entirely left to the late Sally Mobbs, now Lady Larby.

For some minutes father and daughter gazed at each other without speaking.

"He never enters the house again," growled Mr. Selby. "An insolent impostor!"

It was not easy to see where the imposture lay, as regarded the captain. So thought Annette, and in her heart she said, "The gold had no influence with me. Penniless though he be, I will not forsake him."

But not a word to her father. Discussions, she knew, would be worse than useless. There must be sacrifice without debate.

Then swiftly there passed communications which had these results—a secret preparation, many tears, a meeting, a flight, a private marriage and a roaring as of a maddened lion, which almost shook the walls of Selby House.

After a time there came the usual appeal for forgiveness. It was unanswered. A year passed, and there came another very painful letter. The treacherous husband had gone, no one knew whither, and the stricken wife and sorrowing daughter lay with her sickly infant in a garret in London. To that letter went this reply:

"You should have known me better than to apply to me. I feed the birds at our parlor window as we used to do of old. I would not give you a loaf of bread to save you from the workhouse. Each Saturday old blind Billy still has from me the sixpence you used to put into his hand when you were my daughter Annette. I would not now give you, yourself, sixpence to screen you from a prison. Trouble me no more—begone."

No more applications came after this, and Mr. Selby went abroad for several years.

PART II.

IT was a drear November day, foggy and wretched. Everybody within doors drew close to the fireside, and marvelled at the misery that had no fireside to which to draw. As the snow falls, and the keen blast causes the houses to rock, and the very incarnation of horror seems abroad, seeking to clutch and press the breath from out of all poor wayfarers whom he may meet with, we, all of us, more or less, wonder what in the world can save such as are lowly and poverty stricken from utter desperation and raving madness.

A woman, apparently in the last stage of distress, with an infant in her arms staggered into a relief office.

"Now, what is it you want?" inquired a surly functionary, from behind a counter, as though anybody finding their way in there for relief were an idea never for a moment occurring to his mind.

"I want bread, I starve;" was the reply, in a hoarse voice.

"If you had bought a penny loaf instead of that last glass of gin," suggested the acute official, "it would have done you more good, and you needn't have come here."

"That isn't your business," replied the woman, "and so don't you meddle with it. I want bread."

"Then you won't have any."

"I'll break the windows."

"Do, and you'll go to prison."

"I tell you I'm starving. Give me a night's lodging."

The officer scanned the applicant. "You casual paupers will ruin us. There—there's an order for the workhouse."

The miserable being received the order, and drawing round the unfortunate little creature on her bosom the tattered remnants of an old black shawl, staggered from the office to journey to the workhouse, which was some distance off.

Now, how it came to pass none can tell, but the road to the workhouse was never taken, or if taken, was soon widely departed from. Stumbling onwards through snow and mud, numbed and half blinded, yet retaining the power to advance, and exercising it with strange determination, that forlorn woman, still hugging her child to her bosom, travelled many, many miles, and it was at the entrance of a village, a great distance from town, that she stopped and asked of a countryman "the way to the house." It so happened that there was a workhouse nigh at hand, and having been directed accordingly, the wanderer, with almost a last effort, reached the door and dropped senseless. Thus she was presently found and carried indoors. She was then searched, but nothing whatever was found upon her, even the order for relief which had been given her having been lost in the long sad journey. By degrees consciousness was partially restored, but memory seemed to have entirely departed, and reason itself but flickering. What was to be done with such a case? The guardians of that union, like the guardians of all other unions, had a great dislike to more permanent burdens than were absolutely necessary. Was there no possibility of learning where the woman was chargeable, so that she might be "passed to her parish?" The relieving officer was desired to bring up this would-be drain on the parish coffers before the board sitting in solemn conclave.

Now in this neighborhood stood Selby House, and to this mansion had lately returned Hardman Selby, Esq., after several years' absence on foreign travel. Little benefited he looked by his wanderings. He was stout in body, and full and flushed in the face; but the village doctor shook his head, and remarked to a friend that the squire had only come back from a long journey to take a longer, and one from which he would not return. However, the country round about manifested great delight at the reappearance of the wealthy invalid, and amongst the honors shown him was the re-electing him Chairman of the Board of Guardians of the Poor.

It was, therefore, before Mr. Selby, as chairman, and a numerous assemblage of the board, that Mr. Jones, the relieving officer, brought that poor, wretched woman. A great patch covered one eye and her left temple, which had been sorely bruised and cut when she fell at the workhouse door. Her long black hair had only been partially cleansed, and so hung matted and dirty about her shoulders. She was still in the deplorable attire in which she was found, and still she grasped her infant, for she would not part with it for an instant.

"Some mystery about the case," remarked the relieving officer, in a low tone; "I can make nothing of her, but whether she will or cannot answer questions I really do not know."

"Where do you come from, woman?" inquired Mr. Selby, authoritatively (in the old style, reader).

"Who asks me such a question as that?" was the counter-interrogation, and in a tone of pride which caused Mr. Selby to stare, but which only led the relieving officer to touch his forehead significantly.

"You are married," said one of the guardians, looking at a handsome wedding-ring on the woman's finger.

Not a word.

"Come, you must tell us something about yourself," said the chairman, rather angrily. "Where's your husband?"

There was one of the guardians, a good-natured old gentleman, by name Mr. Potts, who was made a butt by the guardians generally. Mr. Potts chanced to be seated close by where the woman was standing. On the chairman putting the last question, the infant in the woman's arms suddenly leaped up and struggled towards Mr. Potts.

"Dada! my dada!" it shrieked, in ecstasy.

"Halloa, Potts, halloa!" cried a number of the guardians; "what have you been about, Potts?"

Mr. Potts grew crimson at this unexpected attack, and, in his confusion, leant forward affectionately to the child, and looked it attentively in the face.

"There can't be a question, Potts. It's the very image of you," cried a jocose guardian.

"Now, if ye would all like to know who I am and where I came from," suddenly exclaimed the woman, "why, now I've got it all written down in a letter, which I will show to that gentleman in the chair—to no one else, only to him. I seem to think I know him."

"She can have no letter," observed the relieving officer; "she has been searched."

"Hasn't she, though?" retorted the woman, with all that horrible look of cunning which often characterizes madness. And from underneath the masses of hair she drew forth a very soiled piece of paper, which she handed mysteriously to the chairman.

Mr. Selby examined it through his eyeglass.

"I cannot make out a word of it," he said. "Do you mind some one else reading it? It isn't a love-letter, is it?"

"Oh, no! it isn't a love-letter," said the woman. "Aye! he may read it," (seeing the letter handed to Mr. Potts).

"Here, Mr. Potts, you read aloud," said the chairman. "But stay, don't do it if you find it lets us into any awkward secrets; we won't be hard upon you, Mr. Potts," and Mr. Selby laughed more heartily than he had done for many a day, and the guardians joined.

Mr. Potts, half angry, and so confused that he hardly knew what he was doing, then read, in a loud tone, the following letter:

"You should have known me better than to apply to me. I feed the birds at our parlor window as we used to do of old. I would not give you a loaf of bread to save you from the workhouse. Each Saturday old blind Billy still has from me the sixpence you used to put into his hands, when you were my daughter Annette. I would not now give you, yourself, sixpence to screen you from a prison. Trouble me no more—begone!"

Mr. Selby, who, during the reading of the letter, had seemed bewildered, at its close sprang towards the woman, and holding her by both arms (she looking vacantly in his face the while) gazed at her intently. He then turned quietly, as though to walk back to his seat, when he encountered that foe who is always spying and dodging after every living being that walks the earth—death. He fell, and was gone.

The board broke up in the utmost alarm and confusion. Slowly the light which had first entered hazily into the mind of Mr. Potts shone upon the other members.

All Mr. Selby's property passed by his will to different charities. What was to be done with that poor outcast? Her case was inquired into by a few friends of her girlhood; but guilt and misery came into view so strongly that they shrunk back with horror. Ultimately an arrangement was made for her in a pauper lunatic asylum, where she was received under a slightly altered name and treated with special kindness and consideration.

"But she won't need anybody's kindness long," said Mr. Jones, in conclusion. "The same disease of the heart which killed her father is killing her. She will be at rest soon."

ANECDOTE OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.

A Leaf from the Note-Book of Laurie Todd.

IN 1790 I heard the farmer (referred to) narrate the following incident. Said he: "When the British troops kept possession of New York, and Washington with the American army lying in the neighborhood of West Point, one morning at sunrise I went forth to bring home the cows; on passing a clump of brushwood I heard a moaning sound, like a person in distress. I stood behind a tree, and heard the words of a man at prayer. I listened; the man came forth; it was George Washington, the Captain of the Lord's host in North America." This farmer belonged to the Society of Friends, who, being opposed to war under any pretext, were lukewarm and in some cases opposed to the cause of the country: however, having seen Washington enter the camp, he went to his own house. "Martha," said he to his wife, "we must not oppose this war any longer. This morning I heard the man George Washington send up a prayer to Heaven for his country, and I know it will be heard." This farmer dwelt between the lines, and sent Washington certain items concerning the movements of the enemy, which did good service to the good cause.

From this incident we may infer that Washington arose with the sun to pray for his country; he fought for her at meridian, and he watched for her in the silent hours of midnight!

Every editor of a newspaper, magazine or journal, between Montauk Point and the Rocky Mountains, if the drops of American blood run in his veins, should publish this anecdote now, and on the 22d of February (Washington's birthday), while wood grows and water runs.

GRANT THORBURN, SENIOR,
Aged 87 years and 8 months.

NEW HAVEN, November 1st, 1860.

SECESSION MEETING IN FRONT OF THE MILLS HOUSE, MEETING STREET, CHARLESTON, S. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

VIEWS IN CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

At this time, when the attention of the whole country is centred upon the gallant State of South Carolina, in speculation as to the course she will pursue, it will be both seasonable and interesting to present to our readers some views in the city of Charleston, where the secession fever seems to be both vigorous and demonstrative. We have selected a few sketches of the prominent buildings, in advance of other illustrations of these stirring times of more vivid interest.

THE GOVERNMENT ARSENAL IN CHARLESTON, S. C.—This extensive, handsome and important building, which we illustrate this week, is at the present moment an object of peculiar interest. In the present state of popular excitement in Charleston, this great depot of arms and ammunition is watched with great care and peculiar jealousy. It was reported on the 10th, that an attempt had been made to remove the arms, &c., to Fort Moultrie, but had been resisted by the people. A later report states that it had been seized by the people, but the report was entirely unfounded. At the present moment it is guarded by detachments of the Washington Light Infantry. It is believed that no immense amount of ammunition is stored there. Military discipline is strictly observed: the Light Infantry patrols are not admitted into the arsenal, but are cantoned in the enclosure.

SECESSION MEETING AT THE MILLS HOUSE.—We present, in connection with the present secession movement in the South, a sketch of an enthusiastic meeting in favor of secession, held in front of the popular hotel, the Mills House. The speeches were decidedly in favor of immediate secession, and every Southern sentiment was cheered most vociferously.

HON. JAMES CHESNUT, JUN., SECEDING SENATOR FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.

HON. ROBERT TOOMBS, SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.

SECESSION MOVEMENT IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

We publish in our present number the portraits of three of the leading spirits in the Secession movement in the South.

James Chesnut, Jun., of South Carolina.

Jas. Chesnut, Jr., Senator from Camden, S. C., was, we believe, the first who resigned his seat in obedience to what he deemed the call of honor and duty. His term of office does not expire until the year 1866.

Robert Toombs, of Georgia.

Robert Toombs, of Washington, Wilkes county, Georgia, has been for many years before the people in a public capacity. First in the Creek war, where he distinguished himself; afterwards in the Legislature of his State, and then from 1845 to 1853 in the House of Representatives. He was then elected to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate, and was re-elected at the expiration of the term. He only awaits the action of his State before resigning his seat; he is actuated by the same principles as Senator Chesnut, but is less precipitate. His present term does not expire until 1865.

(Continued on page 26.)

HON. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, EX-SENATOR OF GEORGIA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.

THE GOVERNOR'S ARSENAL IN CHARLESTON, S. C., OCCUPIED BY DISTAFF-BEARERS OF THE WASHINGTON LIGHT INFANTRY.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

SECESSION MOVEMENT IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

(Continued from page 24.)

Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia.

While the whole country is echoing with rumors and cries of secession, there is one man bold enough to stand forward and, in the height of a popular political excitement almost unprecedented, speak soothing words of peace, and endeavor, by all the power of his eloquence and all the weight of his position, to throw oil upon the troubled waters, that discontent may vanish and harmony prevail. It is no common man who thus endeavors to stem the tide of public opinion, and takes the unpopular side at a moment when the ultra man is almost deified by the enthusiastic many. Alexander H. Stephens is the statesman who assumed this position, a position which cannot fail to have its weight with the thinking and wealthy men of the South. Mr. Stephens was invited to speak in the House of Representatives of Georgia, on Wednesday evening, the 14th inst. After reviewing the position of the country, he said—"The first question that presents itself is, shall the people of the South secede from the Union in consequence of the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency of the United States? My countrymen, I tell you frankly, candidly and earnestly that I do not think that they ought. In my judgment, the election of no man, constitutionally chosen to that high office, is sufficient cause for any State to separate from the Union. It ought to stand by and aid still in maintaining the constitution of the country. To make a point of resistance to the government—to withdraw from it because a man has been constitutionally elected—puts us in the wrong. We are pledged to maintain the constitution."

He was decidedly in favor of remaining in the Union for strong and cogent reasons; he showed the strong opposing power to the coming President in the Senate, and also that the majority in the House of Representatives was against him, deducing from these facts that it was manifestly the interest of the South not to secede, but to fight the constitutional fight for the maintenance of their right in the National Legislative Halls. His speech throughout was eminently patriotic and practical, and frequently during the delivery and at the close Mr. Stephens was greeted with loud and enthusiastic cheering. We do not doubt that Mr. Stephens' speech in the Legislative Halls of Georgia will have a most soothing and tranquillising effect upon the whole country.

CHANTICLEER.

A Thanksgiving Story of the Peabody Family.

By Cornelius Mathews.

CHAPTER I.—THE LANDSCAPE OF THE STORY.

I see old Sylvester Peabody—the head of the Peabody family—seated in the porch of his country dwelling, like an ancient patriarch, in the calm of the morning. His broad-brimmed hat lies on the bench at his side, and his venerable white locks flow down his shoulders, which time in one hundred seasons of battle and sorrow, of harvest and drouth, of toil and death, in all his hardy wrestlings with old Sylvester, has not been able to bend. The old man's form is erect and tall, and lifting up his head to its height, he looks afar, down the country road which leads from his rural door, towards the city. He has kept his gaze in that direction for better than an hour, and a mist has gradually crept upon his vision; objects begin to lose their distinctness; they grow dim or soften away like ghosts or spirits; the whole landscape melts gently into a pictured dew before him. Is old Sylvester, who has kept it clear and bright so long, losing his sight at last, or is our common world, already changing under the old patriarch's pure regard, into that better, heavenly land?

It seemed, indeed, on this very calm morning in November, as if angels were busy about the Old Homestead (which lies on the map, in the heart of one of the early States of our dear American Union), transforming all the old familiar things into something better and purer, and touching them gently with a music and radiance caught from the very sky itself. As in the innocence of beauty, shrouded in sleep, dreams come to the eyelids which are the realities of the day, with a strange loveliness—the fair country lay as it were in a delicious, dreamy slumber. The trees did not stand forth boldly with every branch and leaf, but rather seemed gentle pictures of trees; the sheep-bells from the hills tinkled softly, and as if whispering a secret to the wind; the birds sailed slowly to and fro on the air; there was no harshness in the low of the herds, no anger in the heat of the sun, not a sight nor a sound, near by nor far off, which did not partake of the holy beauty of the morning, nor sing, nor be silent, nor stand still, nor move, with any other than a gliding sweetness and repose, or an under-tone which might have been the echo, here on earth, of a better sphere. There was a tender sadness and wonder in the face of old Sylvester, when a voice came stealing in upon the silence. It did not in a single tone disturb the heavenly harmony of the hour, for it was the voice of the orphan dependent of the house, Miriam Haven, whose dark bright eye and graceful form glimmered, as though she were the spirit of all the softened beauty of the scene, from amid the broom corn, where she was busy in one of the duties of the season. Well might she sing the song of lament for her people had gone down far away in the sea, and her lover—where was he?

> Far away—far away are they,
> And I in all the world alone—
> Brightly, too brightly, shines the day—
> Dark is the land where they are gone
>
> I have a friend that's far away,
> Unknown the clime that bears his tread
> Perchance he walks in light to day—
> He may be dead! he may be dead!

Like every other condition of the time, the voice of Miriam, too, had a change in it.

"What wonder is this?" said old Sylvester, "I neither hear nor see as I used—are all my senses going?"

He turned, as he spoke, to a woman of small stature, in whose features dignity and tenderness mingled, as she now regarded him, with reverence for the ancient head of the house. She came forward as he addressed her, and laying her hand gently on his arm, said,

"You forget, father; this is the Indian summer, which is the first summer softened and soberer, and often comes at thanksgiving time. It always changes the country, as you see it now."

"Child, child, you are right. I should have known it, for always at this season, often as it has come to me, do I think of the absent and the dead—of times and hours and friends, long, long passed away. Of those whom I have known," he continued, eagerly, "who have fallen in battle, in the toil of the field, on the highway, on the waters, in silent chambers, by sickness, by swords; I thank God they have all, all of my kith and kin and people, died with their names untouched with crime; all," he added with energy, planting his feet firmly on the ground and rising as he spoke sternly, "all save one alone, and he——"

He turned towards the female at his side, and when he looked in her face, and saw the mournful expression which came upon it, he dropped back into his chair and stayed his speech.

At this moment a little fellow, who, with his flaxen locks and blue eyes, was a very cherub in plumpness and the clearness of his brow, came toddling out of the door of the house, struggling with a basin of yellow corn, which, shifting about in his arms, he just managed to keep possession of till he reached old Sylvester's knee. This was little Sam Peabody, the youngest of the Peabodys, and as he looked up into his grandfather's face you could not fail to see, though they grew so wide apart, the same story of passion and character in each. The little fellow began throwing the bright grain from the basin to a great strutting turkey which went marching and gobbling up and down the door-yard, swelling his feathers, spreading his tail, and shaking his red necktie with a boundless pretence and restlessness. Like many a hero he was proud of his uniform, although the fatal hour which was to lay him low was not far off. It was the thanksgiving turkey, himself, in process of fattening under charge of Master Sam Peabody. Busy in the act, he was regarded with smiling fondness by his mother, the widow Margaret Peabody, and his old grandfather, when he suddenly turned and said,

"Grandpa, where's brother Elbridge?"

The old man changed his countenance and struggled a moment with himself.

"He had better know all," he said, after a pause of thought, in which he looked, or seemed to look afar off from the scene about him. "Margaret, painful though it be to you and to me, let the truth be spoken. God knows I love your son, Elbridge, and would have laid down my life that this thing had not chanced; but the child asks of his brother so often and is so often evaded, that he will be presently snared in a net of falsehoods and deceptions if we speak not more plainly to him."

An inexpressible anguish overspread the countenance of the widowed woman, and she turned aside to breathe a brief prayer of trust and hope of strength in the hour of trial.

The thanksgiving turkey, full of his banquet of corn, strutted away to a slope in the sun by the roadside, and little Sam Peabody renewed his question.

"Can't I see brother Elbridge, grandpa?"

"Never again, I fear, my child."

"Why not, grandfather?"

"Answer gently, father," the widow interposed. "Make not the case too harsh against my boy."

"Margaret," said the old man, lifting his countenance upon her with dignity of look, "I shall speak the truth. I would have the name of my race pure of all stains and detractions, as it has been for a hundred years, but I would not bear hardly against your son, Margaret. This child, innocent and unswayed as he is, shall hear it, and shall be the judge."

Rising, old Sylvester, with Margaret's help, lifted the boy to the deep window-seat; and, standing on either hand, the widow and the old man each at his side, Sylvester, taking one hand of the child in his, began.

"My child, you are the youngest of this name and household; to you God may have intrusted the continuance of our race and name, therefore thus early would I have you learn the lesson your brother's errors may teach."

"That should come last," the widow interposed gently. "The story itself should teach it, if the story be true."

"Perhaps it should, Margaret," old Sylvester rejoined. "I will let the story speak for itself. It is, my child, a year ago this day that an excellent man, Mr. Barbary, the preacher of this neighborhood, disappeared from among living men. He was blameless in his life, he had no enemy on the face of the earth. He was a simple, frugal, worthy man. The last time alive he was seen in company with your brother Elbridge, by the Locust-wood, near the pond where you go to gather huckleberries in the summer, and hazels in the autumn. He was seen with him, and seen no more."

"But no man saw Elbridge, father, lift hand against him, or utter an angry word. On the contrary, they were seen entering the wood in close companionship, and smiling on each other."

"Even so, Margaret," said Sylvester, looking at the child steadily, and waving his hand in silence towards the widow. "But what answer gave the young man when questioned of the whereabout of his friend? Not a word, Margaret—not a word, my child."

"Is Mr. Barbary dead, grandfather?" the child inquired, leaning forward.

"How else? He is not to be found in pulpit or field. No man seeth his steps any more in their ancient haunts. No man hearkens to his voice."

"But the body, father, was never found. He may be still living in some other quarter."

"It was near the rock called High Point, you will remember, and one plunge might have sent him to the bottom. The under currents of the lake are strong, and may have easily swept him away. There is but one belief through all this neighborhood. Ethan Barbary fell by the hand—Almighty God, that I should have to say it to you, my own grandson—of Elbridge Peabody."

The child sat for a moment in dumb astonishment, glancing, with distended eyes and sweat upon his brow, fearfully from the stern face of the old man to the downcast features of the widow, when recovering speech he asked:

"Why should my brother kill Mr. Barbary if he was his friend? Was not Elbridge always kind, mother? I'm sure he was to me, and used to let me ride old Sorrel before him to the mill!"

"Ever kind? He was. There was not a day he did not make glad his poor mother's heart with some generous act of devotion to her. No sun set on the day which did not cheer her lonely hearth with a new light of gladness and peace from his young eyes."

"Margaret, you forget. He was soft of heart, but proud of spirit, and haughty beyond his age; you may not remember, even I could not always look down his anger, or silence his loudness of speech. Why should he kill Mr. Barbary? I will tell you, child. The preacher, too, had discerned well your brother's besetting sin, and, being fearless in duty, from the Sabbath pulpit he spake of it plainly, and with such point that it could not fail to come home directly to the bosom of the young man. This was on the very Lord's day before Mr. Barbary disappeared from amongst us. It rankled in your brother's bosom like poison; his passions were wild and ungoverned, and this was cause enough. If he had been innocent why did Elbridge Peabody flee this neighborhood, like a thief in the night?"

"Why did my brother Elbridge leave us, mother?" said the child, bending eagerly towards the widow, who wrung her hands and was silent.

"He may come back," said the child, shaking his flaxen locks, and not abashed in the least by her silence. "He may come back yet and explain all to us."

"Never!"

At that very moment a red rooster, who stood with his burnished wings on the garden wall, near enough to have heard all that had passed, lifted up his throat and poured forth a clear cry, which rang through the placid air far and wide.

"He will—I know he will," said little Sam Peabody, leaping down from his judgment-seat in the window. "Chanticleer knows he will, or he would not speak in that way. He hasn't crowed once before, you know, grandfather, since Elbridge went away; we'll hear from brother, soon. I know we shall—I know we shall!"

The little fellow, in his glee, clapped his hands and crowed too. The grandfather, looking on his gambols, smiled, but was presently sad again.

"Would to Heaven he may," he said. "If they come who should, to-day, we may learn of him—for to-day, my children should come up from all the quarters of the land where they are scattered—the East, the West, the North, the South—to join with me in the festival of Thanksgiving which now draws near. My head is whitened with many winters, and I shall see them for the last time," Sylvester continued; "if they come—in this calm season, which, so soft and sweet, seems the gentle dawn of the coming world—we shall have, I feel, our last re-gathering on earth! But they come not; my eyes are weary with watching afar off, and I cannot yet discern that my children bear me in remembrance, in this grateful season of the year. Why do they not come?"

The aged patriarch of the family bowed his head and was silent. From the broom-corn the gentle voice stole again:

> Why sings the robin in the wood?
> For him her music is not shed:
> Why blind-brook sparkle through the field?
> He may be dead! he may be dead!

The murmur of Miriam's musical lamenting had scarcely died away on the dreamy air, when there came hurrying forward from the garden—where she had been tending the great Thanksgiving pumpkin, which was her special charge—the black servant of the household, Mopsey by name, who, with her broad-fringed cap flying all abroad, and her great eyes rolling, spoke out as she approached,

"Do hear dat, massa?"

"I hear nothing, Mopsey."

"Dere, don't you hear't now? Dey're coming!"

With faces of curiosity, and ears erect, they listened. There was a peculiar sound in the air, and on closer attention they discerned, in the stillness of the morning, the jingling traces of the stage-coach, on the cross road, through the fields.

"They are not coming," said old Sylvester, when the sound had died away in the distance; "the stage has taken the other road."

"Dat may be, grandfather," Mopsey spoke up, "but for all dey may come. Ugly Davis, when he drive, don't always turn out of his way to come up here. Dey may be on de corner."

As Mopsey spoke, two figures appeared on foot on the brow of the road, which sloped down towards the Homestead, through a feathery range of graceful locusts. They were too far off to be distinctly made out, but it was to be inferred that they were travellers from a distance, for one of them held against the light some sort of travelling bag or portmanteau; one of them was in female dress, but this was all they could as yet distinguish. Various conjectures were ventured as to their special character. They were unquestionably making for the Homestead, and it was to be reasonably supposed they were Peabodys, for strangers were rare upon that road, which was a by-way, off the main thoroughfare.

The family gathered on the extreme look-out of the balcony, and watched with eager curiosity their approach, which was slow and somewhat irregular—the man did not aid the woman in her progress, but straggled on apart, nor did he seem to address her as they came on.

CHAPTER II.—ARRIVAL OF THE MERCHANT AND HIS PEOPLE.

"It is William and Hannah," said the patriarch, towering above the household grouped about him, and gaining an advantage in observation from his commanding height. "I am glad the oldest is the first to come!"

When the two comers reached the door-yard gate, the man entered in without rendering the least assistance or paying the slightest heed to his companion, who followed humbly in his track. He was some sixty years of age, large-featured and inclining to tallness; his dress was oldmanish and plain, consisting of a long furred beaver hat, a loose-made coat and other apparel corresponding, with low cut shoes. He smiled as he came upon the balcony, greeting old Sylvester with a shake of the hand, but taking no notice whatever either of the widow, little Sam or Mopsey. His wife, on the contrary, spoke to all, but quietly and submissively, which was, in truth, her whole manner. She was spare and withered, with a pinched colorless face, constrained in a scared and apprehensive look as though in constant dread of an impending violence or injury. Over one eye she wore a green patch, which greatly heightened the pallor and strangeness of her features.

"Where's the captain and Henrietta?" old Sylvester asked when the greetings were over.

"They started from the city in a chay," he was answered by William Peabody, "some hours before us—the captain—seaman—way of driving irreg'lar. Nobody can tell what road he may have got into. Shouldn't be surprised if didn't arrive till to-morrow morning. Will always have high-actioned horse."

William Peabody had scarcely spoken when there arose in the distance down the road a violent cloud of dust, from which there emerged a two-wheeled vehicle, at a thundering pace, and which, in less than a minute's time, went whirling past the Homestead. It was supposed to contain Captain Saltonstall and wife; but what with the speed and dust, no eye could have guessed with any accuracy who or what they were. In less than a minute more it came sweeping back with the great white horse, passing the house again like an apparition, or the ghost of a horse and gig. With another sally down the road and return, with a long curve in the road before the Homestead, it at last came to at the gate, and disclosed, in a high sweat and glowing all over his huge person, the jovial captain, and at his side his pretty little cherry-faced girl of a wife, Henrietta Peabody, daughter of William Peabody, who, be it known, is old Sylvester's oldest son. There also emerged from the one-horse gig, after the captain had made ground, and jumped his little wife to the same landing in his arms, a red-faced boy, who must have been closely stowed somewhere, for he came out of the vehicle highly colored, and looking very much as if he had been sat upon for a couple of hours or more. The captain having freed his horse from the traces, and at old Sylvester's suggestion, set him loose in the dooryard to graze at his leisure, rushed forward upon the balcony very much in the character of a good-natured tornado, saluted the widow Margaret with a whirlwind kiss, threw little Sam high in the air and caught him as he came within half an inch of the ground, shook the old grandfather's readily extended hand with a sturdy grasp, and wound up, for a moment, with a great cuff on the side of the head with a roll of stuff for a new gown for Mopsey, saying as he delivered it, "Dere, what d'ye say to dat, darkey!"

Darkey brightened into a sort of nocturnal illumination, and shuffling away in the loose shoes, to the keeping of which on her feet the better half of the best energies of her life were directed, gave out that she must be looking after dinner.

It was but for a moment only that the captain paused, and in less than five minutes he had said and done so many good-natured things, had shown himself so free of heart withal, and so little considerate of self or the figure he cut, that, in spite of his great clumsy person and the gash in his face, and the somewhat exorbitant character of his dress, his coat being a bob, as long and straight in the line across the back as the edge of a table, you could not help regarding him as a decidedly well-made, well-dressed and quite handsome person; in fact, the captain passed with the whole family for a fine-looking man.

"Where's my little girl, Miriam?" asked the jovial captain, after a moment's rest in a seat by the side of old Sylvester; "I must see my dolphin, or she'll think I'm growing old."

Being advised that the young lady in question was somewhere within, the captain rushed into the house, pursued by all the family in a body, save William Peabody, who remained with old Sylvester, seated in silence.

"How go matters in the city, William?" he said, removing his hand from his brow, where it had rested in contemplation for several minutes.

"After the old fashion, father," William Peabody answered, smiling, with a fox-like glance at his father; "added three new houses to my property since last year."

"Three new houses?"

"Three, all of brick—good streets—built in the latest style. The city grows and I grow!"

"Three new houses, and all in the latest style! And how does Margaret's little property pay?"

"Poorly, father, poorly. Elbridge made a bad choice when he bought it—greatly out of repair—rents come slowly."

"In a word, the old story—the widow gets nothing again from the city. I had hopes you would be able to bring her some returns this time, for she needs it sadly."

"I do the best I can; but money's not to be got out of stone walls."

"And you have three new houses which pay well," old Sylvester continued, turning his calm blue eye steadily upon his son.

"Capital! Best in the city! Already worth twice I gave for 'em. The city grows and I grow!"

"My son, do you never think of that other house reserved for us all?"

William Peabody was about to answer it was nonsense for a man only sixty and in sound condition of body and mind to think too much of that, when his eye, ranging across the fields, espied, in shadow as it were, through the dim atmosphere, the mist clearing away a little in that direction, an old sorrel horse, a long settler with the family and well-known to all its members, staggering about feebly in a distant orchard, and in her wanderings stumbling against the trees.

"Is old Sorrel blind?" he asked, shading his own eyes from the light.

"She is, William," old Sylvester replied; "her sight went from her last New Year's day."

"My birthday!" said the merchant, a sudden pallor coming upon his countenance.

"Yes; you and old Sorrel are birthmates, my son."

"We are; she was foaled the day I was born," said William Peabody, and added, as to himself, musingly, "Old Sorrel is blind! So we pass—so we pass—young to day—to-morrow old—limbs fail us—sight is gone."

They sat silently contemplating the still morning scene before them, and meditating, each in his own peculiar way, on the history of the past.

To William, the merchant, it brought chiefly a recollection how, in his early manhood, he had set out from those quiet fields for a hard struggle with the world, with a bare dollar in his pocket, and when that was gone the whole world seemed to combine in a desperate league against him to prevent his achieving another. How at last, on the very edge of starvation and despair, he had wrung from it the means of beginning his fortunes; and how he had gone on, step by step, forgetting all the pleasant ties of his youth, all recollections of nature and cheerful faces of friends and kinsfolk, adding thousand to thousand, house to house, building, unlike Jacob, a ladder that descended to the lower world, up which all harsh and dark spirits perpetually thronged and dragged him down. And yet he smiled grimly at the thought of the power he possessed, and how many of his early companions trembled before him because he was grown to be a rich man.

Old Sylvester, on the other hand, in all his memory, had no thought of himself. His recollections ran back to the old times when his neighbors sat on under a king's sceptre in those calculous; how that chain had been freed; how the gloomy Indian had wrested his fare from their desire; how the darkness of the woods had retired before the clearing ax of peace and profit; and how, from a little people, the dear country, for whose welfare he would bet been shamed, had grown into a great nation. Sheltered up and down long his journey were the homes of friends and kindred which had received him from the birth. He called to mind many pleasant breeze of memory, a funeral scene and his ring in sunlight and in the cold rain. To the very last moment, too, was his thoughts list of all. Could he return to them with a name unstained, the old sires would cheerfully lie down in their graves and rest upon with all the world.

In the steerage, within the range, the captain, in high favor, was seated in a great cushioned armchair with little Sam Peabody on his knee, and the women of the house were about him, listening also as he narrated the courses and adventures of his last voyage. The widow Sylvester with a vast interest in the story of the sea was mirthful in the most serious and stormiest passages, while little Sam was the mother's wife evening's delight in the wonders of the captain with imminent wonder and astonishment, as though he were the most extraordinary man that ever trod the sea, or sat in a chair tailing about it, as the whole habitable globe. Miriam Haven sheer was shielded from the scene, sitting in the half dark of the bunked in household duties in a neighboring apartment, and catching a word here and there as she glanced by.

It was a wonderful story, certainly, the captain was telling, and it seemed to be brief that it could be true that the men could have seen the whales, the icebergs, the floating islands, the skies in the air, the sea-fowl, and gangramen, the flying fish, the phosphorus, the thousand other wonders the captain reported to have crossed his path in a voyage to across the Atlantic and back. He answered to have distinctly seen the sea-serpent, and, when was more, to have had a conversation with a ship in the very middle of the ocean. Was there anything wonderful in that? It occurs every day. He would listen to the jovial captain, and he had no reason to tell them of one they would like to hear about. They pressed close to the story, and Mrs. Sylvester and Miriam Haven stood pausing in her task, and at spring atone still like a statue in the door, while her very heart stayed its beating.

Go on, captain—go on—go on!

"Well, what go you like, we were in latitude—no matter, you don't care about that—we had just come out of a great gale, which made the sea pitch about as if it was the deck of a ship. The sun opened the clouds we found ourselves alongside a ship with the old Star and Stripes flying like a bird at the mizzen. There we sat night, my brethren. We hailed her, she hailed us—we threw her papers, she threw out, and we parted for ever.

"Is that all?"

"Not half. One of there was a list of passengers; I ran my eye up, and I run my eye down, and there, shining out like a star amongst them all, I beheld—Mary Sylvester, Elizabeth Sylvester, and Sylvester his wife.

Miriam Haven staggered against the doorpost, the widow fell upon her knees, "Thank God, my boy is heard from!"

Little Sam Peabody darted from the captain's knee and rushed upon the hideway crying at the top of his lungs, "Grandfather, brother Elbridge is heard from!"

"I don't believe it," said William Peabody; the poor old blunt sensed head staggered from side to side as a piece of woods swept the orchard, and the merchant had quite recovered his usual way of speaking. "Never will believe it. Your brother dead at sea, my youngster—never will. Always knew he would run away some day —never come back again."

The captain's story was rapidly explained by the different members of the family, who had fallen into the room, by reference to Mrs. Sylvester, each in her own way. Miriam and Hannah Peabody, who at sound of the commotion had come from from an interior chamber, whither she had been retired by herself, joined the company of lookers-on.

"What all amount to," he continued, in his peculiar clipped style of speech. "Expect to see him again, do you? Mighty few chances —where going to?"

The captain didn't tell.

"One of the captain's line stories—no—no—What boy ever comes back again, eh?"

There was a deep silence to hear what the hard old merchant pronounced.

"I'll bend over to him the management of his little property, he says, by his newly bankering skill, and thought he could make no much more of than his hard-sested old uncle."

While this was actually passing, little Sam Peabody, as though it were a great joke or real pippin that was spoken of, responded with a shout:

"Mother! my boy!"

"I do," said the widow, "and call you all to witness."

William Peabody smiled grimly as Margaret's countenances darkened suddenly, and he was no doubt, on the point of retreating, his conclusion other, when his wife spoke in an undertone, but extremely, half authority, "William!" at the same time turning on her husband a look of the most significant character, and a nod of shade. He edited what he intended to utter, and shifting uneasily in his seats, he looked towards the door, and then, without replying to the reason, it was clear that when they were seated at the table partaking of meat, it was Margaret's determination that all her attention from every member of the household (and the best of the dish), from the poor old Sylvesters, who had himself erect as usual, and imperial in the matter.

"The ways of Providence are strange," said old Sylvester. "Out of darkness he brings marvellous light, and from the frivolous scene, perhaps, he may reach hardening skill, and from the sea, safety and a solace, and a shadowy playground to our youth and old age. We must wait with humble and submissive hearts for the will to be made."

With this sentiment for a benediction, the patriarch dismissed his family to their slumbers, which to each one of the household brought its peculiar train of speculations to the mind. Miriam and the widow Margaret, they brought dreams which only the strong light of day could disperse to be realities.

(To be continued.)

HUMOROUS CLEANINGS.

"I say, Pat, what are you about—wearing out the room?" "No," answered Pat, "I am sweeping out the dirt, and leaving the room."

Young Lady—"Do you think you can support a wife and do you admire me?" Old Squab:—"Well, I think a goose with plenty of stuffing is about as like as any."

A Cockney preacher says that—"In he beginny on earth one must be born a Secchyne, but in heaven, and me in London, we must be born again." A second people, in the second the richest instance, and in the third the best college."

Parsons of many children are sometimes taken in. "Well, my little man," said a friend of the family to a youngster present, "what do you get on in your class?" "Promotion, I'm sent the book." "Good!" looking over the boy's head, "and are there any more in the family?" "Yes, two to get up."

"Why, you rascal," said Dr. Rodcliffe, the great physician, to a porter, who dawned him, "you pretend to be a doctor in a place of this kind, and you have spelled my password, and then covered it over with earth to hide your bad work." "Why, sir," said the porter, "I only did as I was told by the curt-bills." "You dog, you," said Dr. Rodcliffe, "you are a wit. You must be good, and you shall be promoted."

An Irishman met a brother Paddester who had, as they or four previous interviews, married a woman, and was asked how he was getting on. "Faith, sir'rare, an' I berrid you'd get married as it is a three story, they're inches of the stairs, and the first one is a baby, and the next one is a baby, and in the wife, and a-comin'-on, they're room to-day, yer-sir, where's go for room to-day?" Oh, gentlemen, it is the best of all to be married, and to have a marryin' husband, and a wife!"

Satyrn, the Paid Nimrod, who is no such a man of the world as churchmen, entered a sales lately, while the company were playing "consequences," and a charming woman was being "put to the question" on the subject's state of "Ah! unmarried," she cried out to the Nimrod, "pray relieve us from our pressure. I cannot tell how to answer the question they have asked me." "What is it, then?" "They ask why friendship is like my ornament." "Is not nothing very embarrassing in that, madame. Tell them that in friendship, as in cricketer, appearances are deceitful."

An Indian man was travelling down the Ohio on a steamer, with a more and a two-year-old child, when, by a sudden lurch of the boat, the former was thrown into the river. The Hoosier, as he rose, pulling and heaving above the water, caught hold of the child, and, with a single blow, dashed the little brains out of the animal. Would very like safe where. The old more took direct for the shore, but the frightened pale woman hardly drew the current, with its owner still hanging fast. "Let go the cub and bring to the old mare" shouted some of the passengers. "Let go the cub, you fool!" The Indian turned the water from his mouth, and shaking his head like a Newfoundland dog, "Me all mighty fine time saving me to let go the cub; but a mean that can't swim this ain't exactly the time for swapping horses."

A GUARDIAN, who could not pronounce the letter R, was asked to read the following

"Robert gave Richard a cup in the city,
For to-day the robbin to-rare?"

He would the difficulty very quickly, and answered the answer:

"Bobby gave Bicky a dicky in the city,
For to-day the dobbin to-dare?"

LORD MACAULAY added recently to a party pattern for a squabble. "Well," said the person, "what's against the pattern of a nightcap?" "Oh, what I'm said she," but you know, a piece of dirt."

A pattern of three sons and five daughters was asked what family he had to leave behind him. "Why, sir," replied the man, "I have left eight children."

"I suppose," replied the inquirer, "you mean eight children."

A newspaper man, who was a great sleeper, was thought by his family to be rather too much given to the indulgence in room, they found nothing in the bed but his nightcap. A medical gentleman was called in, opinion that the sleeper required change of air.

MISSES MAS.—"Come, come, my dear mistress, there is evidently something wrong; such a sad countenance I never saw." "Well, doctor, I am always my great ambition (not to be the wife of a poly proper, and now I am the wife of a poly proper, and I am very unhappy), and although the dear fellow is as kind as he can be (sob), and brings me home any quantity of oysters, and fish, and delicacies of all kinds, I can never thrive to do (sob) wounded spirit that expected ocean as brocade and paint lace?" (Sob, sob, sob.)

A MODERN SAYING calls the Niagara River "the pride of rivers." That pride certainly has a tendency to fall.

MR. CHARLES, after a long period of wet weather, when they have prayed vainly for relief, put up a notice on the door, "Shop to let."

OLD BACHELOR SAYS: would like to know what kind of a broom the young lady in the next house would use if she had to sweep up each sick falling before her classic brow.

"He who will starve must do it early" is the proverb, though there is more rhyme than reason in it, for if

He who would thrive must rise at five;
He who'd thrive more must rise at four;
And he will insure a fortune, that Who'd get still more thriving he Must know his bed at turn of three;
Or, if he'd be more thriving yet,
Will retire him at the stroke of two;
But he who will thrive more than all
Who would never be undone,
Must never rise as soon as see.

But the best illustration would be

He who'd flourish best of all,
Must lie in bed till he can get to bed at all.

A GENTLEMAN residing in a village, finding that the diminution of his wood piles continued after his fires were out, by weather one night in order to obtain the solution of the mystery, he found that his man of all work was in the habit of making a practice of warming his feet by the fire, he ordinarily retired to his chamber minutes, and soon a boy another replacement to get a large log into the fire whenever he left the kitchen. "Now, sir," he began, "I've come here and tired my wood while I sleep." "No," replied the thief, "and I have been sitting by the fire to warm my feet and keep with falling, before you'd offer to come and help me."

A FARMER asked his clergyman about an evidentiary things (except new and then a stranger) one of business might cross his mind), as one occasion, being about to cut his grass, called in the clergyman, and requested him for "but to draw a long fill, he couldn't afford it," asked the minister of his comfort. After having the grass, the clergyman called for his money, and was told the farmer desired that he was drawing himself. "Surely, friend," said the clergyman, "you don't mean to say that you have cut my grass?" "Why, master," replied the farmer, "I have been to you for a long time, and you have not given me a single sermon, but I could not allow you to cut and to think of having my grass." "Well, well, master, I'll cut some more next time." "Ha, ha, Jocker, ye'll put it in the bill." "Master, I'm not much given over charity, and many I'll put it in the bill." "Well, well, I'll cut some more next time." "Ha, ha, Jocker, ye'll put it in the bill." "Master, I'm not much given over charity, and many I'll put it in the bill." "Well, well, I'll cut some more next time." "Ha, ha, Jocker, ye'll put it in the bill." "Master, I'm not much given over charity, and many I'll put it in the bill."

A WAGON, having four children, was called upon to give the names and ages of his children, which he did as follows: "The eldest is a girl, Margaret, commenced: Caroline: "Now, sir, what I have your name, please, sir, to your age?" "Why, my name is Margaret, and I'm a girl, and I'm eight years of age." "Now, my daughter's name is Caroline, and I'm a girl, and I'm seven years of age." "Now, what are you when she was born?" "Lady (very courtly) "Why, sir, I was born in the year 1852." "Lady: "Then I will make you fifty years." "Lady: "I don't care; I am only thirty-two." "Lady: "Then I will make you fifty-two." "Lady: "I don't care; I am only thirty-two." "Lady: "Then I will make you fifty-two." "Lady: "I don't care; I am only thirty-two."

A GENTLEMAN was asked to name the following sentence when a count can be effected in several ways, the best way is to take into consideration the probabilities of effecting, the chance of success, and the number of ways.

B. Saddleby.—The English spot is placed thirteen inches from the end or lower cushion. It is usual to place the spot in the United States at fifteen. It is generally placed about nine inches from the corner cushion. In playing the English game, the cushions are not to be touched, and very, with a rubbing of the inches. In England, the spot is placed twelve inches from the cushion. In the United States, the spot is placed fifteen inches from the cushion. In the English game, the spot is placed twelve inches from the cushion. In the United States, the spot is placed fifteen inches from the cushion.

CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters for the Editor of this department must be addressed to Frank H. Palmer, and not to the Editor of the Leslie's Publishing House, 537 Pearl-street, New York.

T. VAN K.—Parker's is the English term for "scratch."

Thompson, Jersey City.—Your solution of the Two Knights can only be deducted from the points on the diminutive scale of the time you made it. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct.

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN
Edited by Michael Phelan.

☞ Diagrams of Remarkable Shots, Reports of Billiard Matches, or items of interest connected with the Billiard Table, solicited. Letters on Billiard subjects thankfully received and published.

All Communications relative to this column to Mr. Phelan in reference to the color of the game of billiards will in future be answered in this column. It would be too much labor to send written answers to so many correspondents.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. M. S., Philadelphia.—Mr. Phelan will be glad to know when a count can be effected in several ways, the best way is to take into consideration the probabilities of effecting, the chance of success, and the number of ways.

B. Saddleby.—The English spot is placed thirteen inches from the end or lower cushion. It is usual to place the spot in the United States at fifteen. It is generally placed about nine inches from the corner cushion. In playing the English game, the cushions are not to be touched, and very, with a rubbing of the inches. In England, the spot is placed twelve inches from the cushion. In the United States, the spot is placed fifteen inches from the cushion. In the English game, the spot is placed twelve inches from the cushion. In the United States, the spot is placed fifteen inches from the cushion.

CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters for the Editor of this department must be addressed to Frank H. Palmer, and not to the Editor of the Leslie's Publishing House, 537 Pearl-street, New York.

T. VAN K.—Parker's is the English term for "scratch."

Thompson, Jersey City.—Your solution of the Two Knights can only be deducted from the points on the diminutive scale of the time you made it. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct. Your solution of the Two Knights is correct.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

GAME OF M. BROSIUS'S EXHIBITION IN NEW YORK.—The series of evening exhibitions of games of billiards by M. Brosius, at Irving Hall, began on the evening of Saturday, the 24th inst. On the occasion, as usual, M. Brosius performed some very fine and difficult carroms. The game was played on a "carom" table, by a game of 100 points with an American player. Mr. Brosius played with his accustomed skill, and won the game by 100 points to 45. It was the first game he ever played in public, and was the first game he ever played in public. The game was won by M. Brosius by 100 points to 45. It was the first game he ever played in public, and was the first game he ever played in public. The game was won by M. Brosius by 100 points to 45. It was the first game he ever played in public, and was the first game he ever played in public.

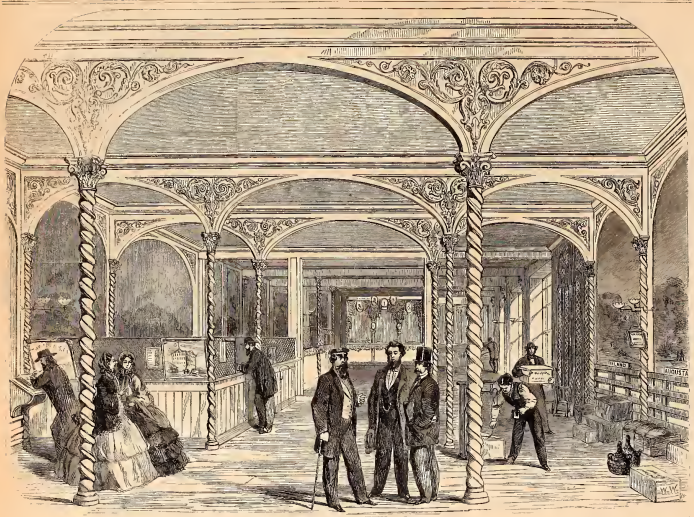
Mr. Brosius has been a resident of this city for many years, and has always been a popular player. He is a native of Germany, and has been a resident of this city for many years. He is a native of Germany, and has been a resident of this city for many years.

Gentlemen—It is my intention to leave New York on Monday next. But before taking my departure from this ungrateful city, let me say a few words to recommend to the public the fine game of billiards which I have always been accustomed. I have always been accustomed to the fine game of billiards which I have always been accustomed.

At the close of the game, Mr. Brosius addressed the audience as follows:

Gentlemen—It is my intention to leave New York on Monday next. But before taking my departure from this ungrateful city, let me say a few words to recommend to the public the fine game of billiards which I have always been accustomed. I have always been accustomed to the fine game of billiards which I have always been accustomed.

I have the honor to be an old and grateful patron of billiards in a younger city, and I have the honor to be an old and grateful patron of billiards in a younger city, and I have the honor to be an old and grateful patron of billiards in a younger city, and

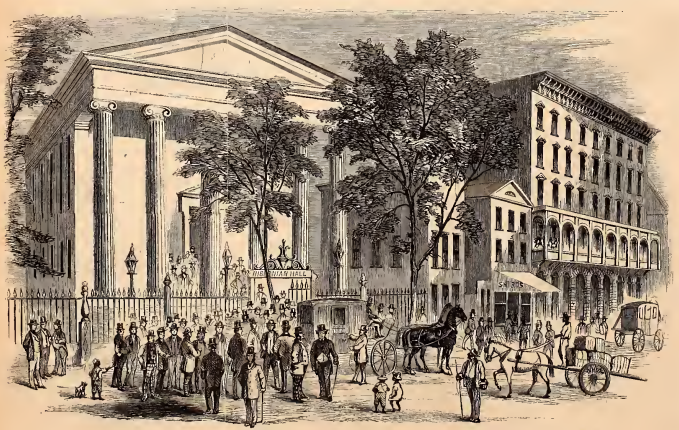


INTERIOR VIEW OF THE OFFICE OF ADAMS' EXPRESS COMPANY, IN CHARLESTON, S. C.

VIEWS IN CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE MILLS HOUSE, on Market street, is a commodious and beautiful hotel, and is kept in very popular style by Major Nickerson, who is known and respected by every one. It was built a few years since by Otis Mills, Esq., one of the merchant princes of the "Queen City of the South." The building is constructed of brick, covered with cement or plaster, and painted a dark cream color. It is palatial in style, ornamented with well sized windows, enriched with massive and elaborately carved cornice, which gives a cast of elegance to the entire fabric; but the entrance is rather small and cramped, while a verandah of delicate structure is stretched across the second story, and more, to some extent, the beauty of the building. It is four stories in height, and internally it is decidedly the most handsome hotel in the city, and is generally esteemed the favorite stopping-place of Northern sojourners.

HIBERNIAN HALL is situated a few doors below the Mills House. Its architectural style being of the Ionic order, it is a neat, plain and impressive structure, and in size is next to the largest hall in the city. It is the property of the Hibernian Society, and the favorite resort of our Celtic friends for holding anniversary suppers, balls and festivals.



Hibernian Hall — Meeting Street — The Mills House

STREET VIEWS IN CHARLESTON, S. C.—FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

HAMILTON'S MACHINE FOR FELLING TREES, CROSS-CUTTING AND BUCK-SAWING.

HAMILTON'S MACHINE FOR FELLING TREES, CROSS-CUTTING AND BUCK-SAWING.

We illustrate in this issue another of those labor-saving machines in the production of which this age is so prolific. It must prove of incalculable value to farmers, lumber-men and ship-builders, and we call the attention of those classes especially to its consideration. The explanation of the cuts which follows will show the various advantages gained by Hamilton's Machine, which appear to us to be both striking and important, combining a great saving of time and labor, besides the more perfect accomplishment of the work done.

Description of the Cuts.

No. 1.—FOR FELLING TREES.—It is well-known that in chopping down trees with the axe, from two to three feet, according to the size of the tree, of the most valuable part of the lumber is lost, while by this machine the tree is felled within five inches of the ground; and by removing the soil sufficiently to avoid dulling the saw, it can be cut as low as desired. Four men can do the work of ten men with axes in the forests, and two men can do the work of four. It will be recollected that the butt must be squared, or cross-cut, before the log is ready for the mill, and the single operation of felling the tree with this machine leaves the log already squared. The butt is left smooth, thus facilitating cultivation and greatly increasing its value. The surface of the stump being left flat and level, is porous and spongy, so that by the action of the elements it soon decays; but when cut by the axe, with its pores sealed up and surface rendered smooth, the stump defies dissolution, and remains for years an unsightly and inconvenient object.

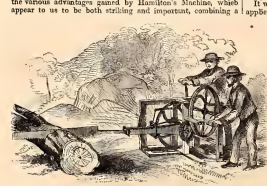
No. 2 represents this machine in its position for cross-cutting. It operates with equal facility whether the log lies flat on the ground or is elevated several feet above it. The advantage gained over a common cross-cut saw, used by two men, is that the saw works with greater rapidity, and, by having greater power, is fed faster.

No. 3 represents this machine with the attachments for cutting wood in short lengths. For this purpose it can be worked by one or two men, and when not employed in the forests, it may be used to advantage in cutting all the firewood required in a neighborhood. It is readily adapted to the several kinds of work for which it is intended, requiring less than five minutes for the necessary change of position, and practical experience has proved its complete success and efficiency.

It will be observed, by reference to the cuts, that the power is applied by two cranks AA., which are sufficiently elevated above the ground to be conveniently worked.

The machine is furnished with two handles, by means of which it is easily carried about by two men, and performs its work with great expedition and entire safety. A wedge of peculiar shape accompanies each machine, which is driven into the kerf as the saw proceeds, and thus prevents the tree from settling down or binding the saw, and also forces the tree to fall in the desired direction.

The agents for these machines are T. L. D. Perkins, Hancock House, Court Square, Boston, and Samuel P. Lewis, No. 110 Broadway, New York.



HAMILTON'S MACHINE—CROSS-CUTTING.

JOHNSTON'S PATENT AMERICAN CORN HUSKER.

THIS is a hand corn husker, held in the hand like a pair of sheep shears. The inventor of this simple, cheap and effective husker is Mr. Johnston, who is a farmer, residing in Orleans county, in the State of New York. He has experimented for about three years, and the result of his ingenuity and labor is this simple but excellent husker; so simple that the wonder is that no one thought of it before. Until within a few years corn has always been husked by hand, and until this invention the hard and rough labor of husking has not been much improved. The huskers in use are mostly expensive and complicated, and the corn must all be picked and brought to them. This invention was fully tried last fall, and proved to be more than equal to the expectations of the inventor. Although rude and imperfect then, he was able to husk with it one-third more than he could without it.

Some of the many advantages of the American Husker are the following:

1. It is simple, handy, light, and so cheap that every farmer can afford to buy as many as he wants.

2. It can be used with gloves or mittens in cold weather.

3. In the use of other huskers the corn has to be handled several times but in the use of this only once.

4. It can be used anywhere—as well in husking corn after it is picked as on the stalk after the corn is cut up and shocked, or standing on the hill.

HAMILTON'S MACHINE—BUCK-SAWING.

5. In the use of it, with the husker in the right hand, as it is closed, the fingers are sufficiently at liberty to bundle up and arrange the stalks.

6. With it more corn can be husked with greater ease, and entire protection of the hand.

The method of using this corn husker is very simple, and great expertness can be acquired in a very short time.

This is so simple that any one will at once be familiar and expert in the use of it. The ear should be seized by the left hand near the middle, in precisely the same manner as if you were going to husk it with your hands. See fig. 2. The husker is held in the right hand, with the knife side up, precisely as you would hold sheep shears. With the fingers of the husker you seize the husks near the top of the ear and whatever husks are grasped are stripped off with a quick motion. Now you can see precisely where the ear should be cut off and as the knife enters the stalk, with the leverage between the cross bar, the knife and the forward end of the fingers of the husker, the ear is separated from the stalk, and the remaining husks are stripped down by the first motion, readily separate from the ear. See fig. 3.

Johnston's Corn Husker has been exhibited at the various State fairs by the inventor, and has met with the warm approval of competent judges, the farmers, &c. They are manufactured by R. L. Howard, one of the leading manufacturers of Buffalo, N. Y., where our country friends can get all they require at the small charge of one dollar each.

JOHNSTON'S PATENT CORN HUSKER, BUFFALO, N. Y.

A SUPERNUMARY was once intrusted to deliver the following message to Lord Randolph in the play: "My lord, the banquet waits." But having lost the run of the sentence, he called out amid the roars of the audience, "Mr. Randolph, your supper has been ready for some time!"

THE HAWK AND THE OWL.—That worthy and witty divine, Thomas Fuller, was a man of considerable substance as well as spirit, and one day riding with a friend named Sparrowhawke he thought to chaff him after the manner of the ancients. "Pray, what is the difference," quoth he, "between an owl and a sparrowhawk?" "Oh," retorted the other, "much every way; an owl is fuller in the head, fuller in the body, and fuller all over."

WHEN the celebrated Viotti (the father of modern violin playing), then residing in London, turned wine merchant, a young nobleman, one of his numerous admirers, accosted him somewhat angrily, thus: "Signor Viotti, how could you, an artist of such high standing, degrade yourself by becoming a trafficker in wine?" "My dear sir," Viotti replied, "simply because I find that the English like wine better than music."

Brown's Bronchial Troches.

FROM REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER, N. Y.—"BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES." "It is five years since that I accidentally entered your store for some sort of a preparation for Hoarseness. The Troches which you gave me entirely answered the purpose which I had in view. Since then to all my lecturing tours I put Troches in my carpet-bag as regularly as I do lectures or linen, and I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, except to think yet better of that which I began in thinking well of."

TO CONSUMPTIVES.

THE ADVERTISER, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure.

To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a SURE CURE FOR CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address
THE REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
262 Williamsburgh, Kings County, New York.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST FURS AT WILLIAMS'S, 336 Fulton St., Brooklyn. 262-660

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES.

Our Machines took the highest medal at the Fair of the American Institute, with the highest premium for fine Sewing Machine work.

They also took the highest premiums at the New Jersey State Fair, at the Mechanics' Fair, Utica, N. Y., the Franklin Institute, and so generally wherever exhibited.

Late office 503 Broadway,
REMOVED TO 538 BROADWAY 660

BILLIARD BALLS, BAGATELLE AND FIFTEEN BALL POOL, of Ivory and Patent Compressed Ivory. Manufactured and for sale by
201 WM. M. WELLING, 416 Broome St

A Fine Novel, by Wilkie Collins.

HIDE AND SEEK.

A Novel,

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "The Dead Secret," "After Dark," &c.

Large Octavo. Price 50 cents.

Also new Editions of

THE DEAD SECRET. Price 50 cents.
AFTER DARK. Price 50 cents.

Published and for sale by DICK & FITZGERALD,
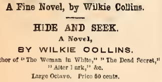
18 Ann St., New York.

Copies of the above books sent to any address in the United States free of postage. 262



"GET THE BEST."

Webster's Unabridged Dictionary.

NEW PICTORIAL EDITION.

1,500 PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

9,000 to 10,000 NEW WORDS in the Vocabulary.
Table of SYNONYMS, by Prof. Goodrich.
Table giving Pronunciation of Names of 8,000 distinguished Persons of Modern Times.
Peculiar use of Words and Terms in the Bible. With other new features, together with all the matter of previous editions.

In one Volume of 1,750 Pages.

PRICE $6 50. SOLD BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

"GET THE BEST." GET WEBSTER.
G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass.

A Splendid Collection OF PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

THE HOME CIRCLE.—A collection of Marches, Waltzes, Polkas, Schottisches, Redowas, Quadrilles, Contra Dances, &c., for the Pianoforte. Price $1 50; cloth, $2. Published by O. DITSON & CO., Boston. Sent postpaid on receipt of price. 262

Save a Dollar

PETERSON'S MAGAZINE.

SUBSCRIBE FOR 1861.

☞ THE MAGAZINE FOR THE TIMES. ☜

This popular monthly Magazine has already a circulation of nearly 100,000; but it is to be greatly improved for 1861. It will contain

ONE THOUSAND PAGES OF READING!
FOURTEEN SPLENDID STEEL PLATES!
TWELVE COLORED FASHIONS!
TWELVE COLORED BERLIN WORK PATTERNS!
EIGHT HUNDRED WOODCUTS!
TWENTY-FOUR PAGES OF MUSIC!

All this will be given for only TWO DOLLARS a year, or a dollar less than Magazines of the class of "Peterson's." Its

Thrilling Tales and Novelettes are the best published anywhere. All the most popular writers are employed to write originally for "Peterson." It also publishes

FASHIONS AHEAD OF ALL OTHERS.

Each number, in addition to the colored plate, gives Bonnets, Cloaks and Dresses, engraved on wood. Also a Pattern, from which a Dress, Mantilla or Child's Dress can be cut out, without the aid of a mantua-maker. Also several pages of Household and other Receipts.

☞ It is the best Lady's Magazine in the World. ☜

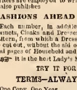
TRY IT FOR ONE YEAR!

TERMS—ALWAYS IN ADVANCE.

One Copy, One Year	$2 00
Three Copies, for One Year	5 00
Five Copies, for One Year	7 50
Eight Copies, for One Year	10 00
Sixteen Copies, for One Year	20 00

Premiums for Getting up Clubs.

Three, Five, Eight or Sixteen copies make a club. To every person getting up a club the Proprietor will send a magnificent mezzotint, 20 inches by 27, of the largest size for framing, the subject, "BUNYAN'S WIFE INTERCEDING FOR HIS RELEASE FROM PRISON." This is such an engraving as is sold by printsellers for $3. Address, postpaid,
CHARLES J. PETERSON,
306 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.
☞ Specimens sent gratis. 262



ADVICE GRATIS.

A MANUAL OF advice how to obtain Letters Patent for New Inventions, furnished free on application to MESSRS. MUNN & CO., Proprietors of the Scientific American and Solicitors of AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PATENTS.

OFFICES—No. 37 Park-row, New York; corner of F and Seventh streets, Washington, D. C.; also in London, Paris and Brussels.

A Synopsis of European Patent Laws furnished free.

Examination of Inventions free.

262-63

Chapped Hands and Lips

CURED IN A FEW HOURS BY THE USE OF
TADMAN & CO.'S
CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE,
81 Bleecker St., 268 Fourth Av., N. Y. By mail 25 cents
260-63

Immense Stock OF WINTER CLOTHING, &c.

GREAT REDUCTION!

We have concluded to offer our large and complete stock of Winter Clothing and Furnishing Goods for men and boys, at a great reduction in prices, preparatory to removal.

We are determined to close out the entire stock in the present stand, bring what it may.

This presents a great opportunity to provide complete outfits from the largest stock of men and boys'

Clothing and Furnishing Goods

In the city,

AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

DEVLIN, HUDSON & CO.,
262 Nos. 258, 259 and 260 Broadway.

The Water-Cure Journal.

THERE is no publication in the world from which you can gain so much valuable information relative to the Laws of Life and Health, as

The Water-Cure Journal.

In it the true nature and cause of disease are fully and rationally explained, and one of its principal objects is to teach

How to Keep Well.

Out of some from Hereditary affections, or supposed unavoidable causes do not enjoy health, one department of the JOURNAL is devoted to articles relative to the treatment of diseases, where you may learn

How to Recover Health when Sick.

The JOURNAL is now in the fifteenth year of publication, and thousands in every part of the country are ready to testify to the priceless benefits they have derived from its perusal.

Published monthly at $1 a year. Five copies, $3; ten copies, $5.

FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

☞ All who send in their subscriptions before January 1, 1861, will receive a copy of WATER-CURE FOR THE MILLION GRATIS. 262-63

WIVES AND DAUGHTERS.—All the Ladies who ever read it, in both Town and Country—declare that MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER is the best Family Newspaper in the Union. Aside from its choice literary reading and various novelties and illustrations, its Domestic Economy department is invaluable to every Daughter, Sister, Wife or Mother. Terms, $2 a year; or the 13 numbers of this quarter, on trial, at half price—only 25 cents. Address 262 D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,

FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.

For curing and preventing Baldness.
For removing Scurf and Dandruff.
For beautifying and making the Hair soft and curly.
In fact the only safe and effective compound of the kind in use.
Be sure and get the right article.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator.

Price 25 cents per bottle.
Wholesale Depot, 56 Dey St., New York.
Also,
PROF. L. MILLER'S INSTANTANEOUS LIQUID HAIR DYE,
Price 50 cents per box.
Warranted superior to all others.
Try them, and you will acknowledge the fact. 260-63

Something New.

AGENTS WANTED to sell YALE'S VARIETY STATIONERY ENVELOPE, retail price 25 cents, the best and most saleable in market, containing Stationery worth the price paid for the Envelope. Also a Gift in each Envelope worth from 25 cts to $5. We will guarantee smart, enterprising Agents to clear from $3 to $10 per day. For further particulars address
J. W. YALE, Proprietor,
Metropolitan Gift Book Store, Syracuse, N. Y.

$40. Parker Sewing Machine, $40, FIRST CLASS, DOUBLE THREAD, Rapid and Noiseless, under Patents of Howe, Grover & Baker, Wheeler & Wilson. Agents wanted.
Office, VERNON & CO.,
No. 469 Broadway.

The Penman's Manual.

Being a new Theory and System of Practical Penmanship, Designed as a Text-Book for Schools and Private Students.

This is the title of a new work just issued, which it is believed will do more to improve the penmanship of all classes than all others ever before written. It teaches not only how to write, but instructs in what good writing consists. Knowing this the student becomes a critic, and this point attained, nothing but practice is necessary to make him an accomplished penman.

Sent by mail, postpaid, for 50 cents. AGENTS WANTED.
FOWLER & WELLS,
262-63 308 Broadway, New York.

The Monarch of the Monthlies!

FOR DECEMBER, 1860.

CONTENTS OF NO. 6, VOL. VII., OF

FRANK LESLIE'S MONTHLY,

With which is incorporated

THE GAZETTE OF FASHION.

Price 25 cts., or $3 per annum.

Literary.

To Our Readers.
Verona Brent; or, The Wayward Course of Love. Three Engravings.
Divorce a Vinculo; or, The Wrongs of an English Husband. Seven Engravings.
Marry in Haste and Repent at Leisure.
How Gold Lace is Made.
He Didn't Like It.
The Bringing of Gold from Ophir to King Solomon. Engraving.
The Prophecy.
The Wren's Nest. Engraving.
Temper. Engraving.
The Tailor's Birthday; or, What came from Putting off a Pleasure Trip.
Gluttons.
Marrying an Ideal. Three Engravings.
Our School.
Maude Herapath—Founded on Fact.
The Effect of Music on Sheep.
Somnambulism.
Bygone Days.
Our Young Minister. By Martha Haines Butt, A. M.
The Iceberg. Three Engravings.
A Surprising Funeral.
Marriage and Style of Living.
Editorial Gossip.
The Boarding-school Miss—Course of Education. Twelve Engravings.
Poetry—Faces in the Fire; Schiller's Ballad of the Diver—Engraving; Myrtilla; The Fireside; Two Twilights; A Score of Years Ago.
Miscellaneous.

List of Engravings.

Verona Brent—The Inn of the Flying Horse at Stoke-Dorne; Mrs. Gower and Dr. Thornton; The "Chase" at Brent-Meadow.
Divorce a Vinculo—British Matrons at the Divorce Court; Cupid and the Barrister; Mrs. Barber, the Milliner and Counsellor Lamb; Dr. Dodge and Counsellor Lamb examine Mrs. Barber; Dr. Dodge; The Prosecutor's View of the Outrage; The Defendant's Explanation of the Case.
Bringing the Gold of Ophir to King Solomon.
The Diver.
The Handsome Young Widow.
Lady Rosstrevor and Daughter at the Opera.
Coast Scene.
Marrying an Ideal—Jonah Quogg, Office Boy to Dr. Gay; Dr. Gay at the Ship Chandler's; Captain Toolypso discovers a Long-lost Daughter.
A Score of Years Ago.
Esther and her Baby.
Iceberg and Shoe.
Comic Pages. Twelve Engravings.

Gazette of Fashion.

Things Seen and Talked About; Review of Fashions; Styles for the Month; Description of Colored Plate; Description of Fashions; Glassware; Gentlemen's and Boys' Fashions; Diagram of Boy's Renfrew Coat; Epaulette Waist; Instructions for Enlarging Diagram; The Prince's Ball; The Whole Art of Tatting—With Illustrations; Title Page and Index.

Illustrations to the Gazette.

Cloak and Two Bonnets; Glassware; Dressing Robe and Boy's Zouave Suit; Pattern for Boy's Renfrew Coat; Dresses Worn at the Ball given to the Prince of Wales in New York; Pattern for Epaulette Waist; The Art of Tatting.

Each number of the Magazine contains over 100 pages of the most entertaining Literature of the day, besides nearly sixty beautiful Engravings, and a superb colored Plate, alone worth more than the price of the Magazine.

1 copy 1 year	$3
2 copies 1 year	5
1 copy 2 years	5
3 copies 1 year	6

and $2 for each copy added to the Club. An extra copy sent to the person getting up a Club of Five Subscribers, 1 year for $10.

The postage of this Magazine is three cents and must be paid three months in advance at the office where the Magazine is received.

FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

335 EMPIRE 335 SEWING MACHINE.

PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.

SALESROOM, NO. 335 BROADWAY.

This Machine is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanics. It possesses many rare and valuable IMPROVEMENTS—has been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY AND PERFECTION COMBINED.

The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:

1. Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2. Liability to get out of order.
3. Expense, trouble and loss of time in repairing.
4. Incapacity to sew every description of material.
5. Disagreeable noise while in operation.

The Empire Sewing Machine

IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.

It has a straight needle, perpendicular motion, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL, and is alike on both sides; performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth AS GLASS, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.

It requires FIFTY PER CENT less power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of twelve years of age can work it steadily, without fatigue or injury to health.

Its strength and WONDERFUL SIMPLICITY of construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is GUARANTEED by the Company to give entire satisfaction.

We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article to call and examine this UNRIVALLED MACHINE.

But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of

MERCHANT TAILORS,
COACH-MAKERS,
HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS,
SHIRT AND BOSOM MAKERS,
DRESSMAKERS,
CORSET-MAKERS,
GAITER-FITTERS,
SHOE-BINDERS,
VEST AND PANTALOON-MAKERS

Religious and Charitable Institutions
WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.

PRICE OF MACHINES COMPLETE:

No. 1—Or Family Machine	$50
No. 2—Small size Manufacturing	65
No. 3—Large size Manufacturing	80

AGENTS WANTED for all towns in the United States. Terms made known by inquiring at the Salesroom, No. 335 Broadway.
000 T. J. McARTHUR & CO.

Sands' Sarsaparilla

PURIFIES THE BLOOD,

And expels the poisonous virus which engenders all ulcerous and eruptive diseases. It may be taken at all times with safety, without detention from business or pleasure.

THE TOILET COMPANION

Is the name by which Joseph Burnett & Co. designate the neat and convenient case in which these famous chemists and perfumers put up their superior preparations for toilet use, viz.: "Kalliston," "Cocoaine," "Oriental Tooth Wash" and "Florimel." These are not only of approved usefulness, and all that they profess to be, but also remarkable for a delicacy of perfume and healthy purity very seldom met with in articles which are sold at such moderate prices.—Louisville Democrat. 262

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.

VILLAINY has been at work! For counterfeits are in the market! The test of purity is known by the water-mark, "Holloway, New York and London," in semi-transparent letters on every leaf in the book of directions around each pot or box. Sold at the manufactory, No. 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all Druggists, at 25 cts., 63 cts. and $1 per box or pot.

Worth Having.

"THE MINE OF WEALTH."

A Book that instructs how to make one article that three men are making each $15 a day from. Also two articles that are paying persons who travel from $5 to $8 a day. Also four articles that Agents are making from $3 to $5 a day with. The Book also contains 160 other rare and valuable recipes never before made public, some of which cost over $100. Price $1, sent free by mail for the price.
GARRISON & CO., Publishers,
126 Randolph Street, Chicago, P. O. Box 3871.
262-74

A Card.

THE Subscriber will send to all who wish it (free) the Recipe and full directions for using his OPAL BALM, for the removal of Blotches, Pimples, Freckles, &c., from the face. Also, Polatrean's Stimulating Unguent, which is warranted to bring out a full set of whiskers in from four to eight weeks.
Apply to or address THOS. F. CHAPMAN,
2620 Chemist, 831 Broadway, New York.

The French Student's Monthly.

A MAGAZINE devoted to the use of Students of the French Language, and offering each month and at a small cost a continuous supply of new, interesting reading matter and practical exercises.

To teachers who know what an impulse is ever given to a class by the introduction of a new text-book, and who are aware of the difficulty of keeping up for months the interest of Students in the same oft-thumbed text-books, we need scarcely point out the advantages of the Monthly, while to those compelled to study alone it will prove the only possible substitute for the lessons of an experienced teacher.

CONTENTS OF THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER.

1. Histoire Abrégée de la Littérature Française (written expressly for the French Monthly), by Prof. P. Morand, late Instructor of the French Language to the Princes of Hohenzollern, of the Royal Family of Prussia. 2. Le Cousin Pierre, Proverbe en un Acte, par Emile Souvestre. 3. Poésie. 4. Hints on French Pronunciation (with exercises). 5. London Assurance, for Translation into French (with notes). 6. The Beginner's Department. 7. Mosaïque Rebus, &c. 8. Answers to Correspondents. 9. Key to Exercises (sent only to Teachers and Persons studying alone, on special application to the Publisher).

TERMS INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

One copy for the Scholastic Year (ten months) $1 50.
Schools and Classes, ordering six or more copies, $1.
☞ A sample copy will be sent, postpaid, to any address upon receipt of 12 cents in stamps.
Address P. W. GENOEMBRE, Editor, Chapman Hall, Boston.
Agent for New York, F. W. Christern, 763 Broadway.

The Stove that Pleases Everybody.

THE "INDEPENDENT"

LARGE OVEN

COOKING STOVE,

For all Countries and all Climates,

FOR HARD OR SOFT COAL, OR FOR WOOD.

ADVANTAGES:

1. Self-cleaning from the ashes!
2. A Damping Valve in the flue for conducting the coal gas through the stove!
3. An extra large oven and well ventilated.
4. The improved double-arch Fires, and extra large at that.
5. The thickness of the castings and the extra fitting and finish
6. Great economy in the use of fuel.
7. Broiling with Smothered Fire! Patent Gauge Grating, which can be used without turning or touching the cake or bread.
8. Splendid Roasting Oven—before the fire.
9. Hot Water Reservoir and Hot Closet if desired.
10. Water Backs, which heat water as well as any range, and at half the cost.

Every Stove guaranteed. Sold by the principal Dealers in nearly every State in the Union.

Address TREADWELL & PERRY, Agents,
Albany, N. Y.

THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!

MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS

AUTHOR OF THE POPULAR WORKS,

"FASHION AND FAMINE," "OLD HOMESTEAD," "MARY DERWENT," "LOST JEWELS," "MALAESKA," EDITRESS OF PETERSON'S MAGAZINE, &c., a new engaged on a new Story, expressly and exclusively for the

NEW YORK WEEKLY,

(the best Story and Sketch Paper published)

ENTITLED

THE GOLD BRICK
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!
THE GOLD BRICK!

Which will be ready in the

NEW YORK WEEKLY

ON THURSDAY, NOV. 15,
ON THURSDAY, NOV. 22,
1860.

For sale by every News Agent and Bookseller throughout the World.

Price, Four Cents per Copy.

Terms, $2 per Year with a Premium. Specimen Numbers sent free, on receipt of a list of Premiums.

STREET & SMITH,
PROPRIETORS,
NO. 31 ROCKMAN ST.,
NEW YORK

J. L. BAILEY'S VARIETY ENVELOPE, containing writing paper with Envelopes to match. Also, a large assortment of the Copy of the same, in variety by the gross, from $6 to $24. Sent by express package sent by mail on the receipt of 25 cts. and a cir. for postage.

Discounts to all agents on Cash.

Can supply one of 5 parcels at 25 cts. 1 extra parcel free of mail.
" " 25 " 5 " " "
" " 50 " 10 " " "

Circulars containing Terms to Travelling Agents and to the Trade sent to any address.

1859-62 J. L. BAILEY, 164 Court St., Boston.

PHOTOCHROMATIC OIL PAINTINGS.—Agents wanted to introduce the beautiful art. Young men are making over $50 a month in the business. Terms and Specimens sent free, by addressing, with stamp for return postage.

1859-66 J. L. WOOD & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Ayer's Compound Extract Sarsaparilla.

NO one remedy is more needed in this country than a reliable alterative, but the sick have been a extraordinary shocks by their flagrant exposition of the virtues of nearly every article that has been called the name. Yet the true cannot be blamed for the deceptions from which they have suffered. Most of the so-called Sarsaparilla in market contain little of the virtues of Sarsaparilla or any thing else. They are mere slops—inert and worthless, while a concentrated extract of the entire variety of Sarsaparilla compounded with Dock, Stillingia, Yellow Dock, Mezereon, Iodine, and other substances long and so celebrated for their alterative virtues, such as Extract of Sarsaparilla, as its truly wonderful cures of the great variety of complaints which require an alterative medicine have abundantly shown. Do not, therefore, or cast this invaluable medicine because you have been deceived by something pretending to be Sarsaparilla, while it was not. Where you have used AYER'S—try it, and feel sure that you know the virtues of Sarsaparilla. For minute particulars of the remedies for which we ask the confidence of the people, see our Almanac, which the agent below named will furnish gratis to all who call for it.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills, for the cure of Costiveness, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Dyspepsia, Sick-ache, Piles, Rheumatism, Gout, Neuralgia, arising from Inactivity of the Stomach, Pain or Morbid Inaction of the Bowels, Liver Complaint, Fever and Ague, and all Bilious Disorders, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, or a Worm Fever, and for Purifying the Blood.

They are compounded, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best Aperient in the world for all the purposes of a family physic. Price, 25 cents per Box, Five Boxes for $1.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand Ayer's Pills, and take no other. They will cure you, and cheaper than those which have cheated you.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists, everywhere. 1857-62

IMPORTANT INVENTION FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.—For particulars address, with stamp, DR. H. HEGGELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 468 Broadway, N. Y. 1859-74

The Union Clothes Dryer.

A NEW INVENTION—USEFUL, CHEAP AND PORTABLE,

By which Clothes to be dried in any quantities may be dried in a yard, a room, or on the top of a house. Can be put up and taken down in one minute without mounting the lines.

Price only $1 50 to $3.

J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors, 447 Broadway (over Grand St.), New York, and 264 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

1859-74

The Rural American.

50,000 COPIES OF THE RURAL AMERICAN, of Utica, N. Y., will be sent Feb. 1, 1861. Advertising rates low. Farmers and others who want the best, largest, most splendid and cheapest agricultural family Weekly in the Union! No other paper can now compete with it. It is 20 per cent cheaper, and 20 per cent better than any other. Has a larger circulation than any other agricultural weekly in every county in the United States. Premiums magnificent! Circulars in all the States. The first January 1st. Send your subscription promptly or in clubs to T. S. MINER & SON, Utica, Oneida Co., N. Y.

Traveling Agents

A RE paid $10 to $20 per week by canvass for the RURAL AMERICAN. Details sent in paper. Direct as above. 1860

DR. ROBANS'S RHEUMATIC CURE—The infallible French Remedy, out of thousands of cases, has not in one instance failed to effect a speedy cure. It is purely vegetable, and acts in diffusing, in every case of Chronic, Acute and Inflammatory Rheumatism, Gout, Lumbago, Sciatica, or Neuralgia, like magic. Two doses relieve the most violent cases. Sold by druggists in every city in the world. Depot, 164 Chicago and insure a permanent cure. Price $1 per bottle. For sale at the Agency of DR. ROBAN, No. 682 Broadway. Sent by Express to any part of the United States and Canada, upon receipt of the price. Pamphlets supplied. 1854-65

WHAT SHALL I DO FOR MY HAIR?—Use LYON'S KATHAIRON, the most popular Hair Preparation of the day. Sold by druggists generally. Reference. No. ——thing has ever been discovered for curing dandruff, preserving and beautifying the Hair, and imparting a delightful odor. 1859-73

HANDSOME WOMEN.

TO THE LADIES.

HUNT'S "BLOOM OF ROSES," a rich and delicate color for the cheeks and lips, was not want on ten cts, and is warranted to stay on one season during 24 years, and not to bother for $1.

HUNT'S "COMPLEXION POWDER" imparts a dazzling whiteness to the complexion, and is perfectly pure, and for this purpose, mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "FRENCH BALM" removes Tan, Freckles, Sunburn and all roughness of the skin; mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "IMPERIAL POMADE," for the Hair, strengthens and restores hair to growth, keeps it from falling off, and warranted to make the hair curl, mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "PEARL BEAUTIFIER," for the Teeth and Gums, cleanses and whitens the Teeth, hardens the Gums, purifies the Breath effectually. Pamphlets free. Sent anywhere Insurance, mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "CHEMICAL BREATH PERFUME," a double extract of orange blossoms and cologne, mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "CHEMICAL SOAP," for the Toilet, Bath and Nursery, is perfection, and for sale by druggists generally. Sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of 25 cts. and a cir. for postage.

Discounts to agents on Cash.

Can supply one of 5 parcels at 25 cts. 1 extra parcel free of mail.
" " 25 " 5 " " "
" " 50 " 10 " " "

Circulars containing Terms to Travelling Agents and to the Trade sent to any address.

1859-62 J. L. BAILEY, 164 Court St., Boston.

PHOTOCHROMATIC OIL PAINTINGS.—Agents wanted to introduce the beautiful art. Young men are making over $50 a month in the business. Terms and Specimens sent free, by addressing, with stamp for return postage.

1859-66 J. L. WOOD & CO., Lowell, Mass.

Celebrated Dunham Pianofortes,

GRAND AND SQUARE

MANUFACTORY AND SHOW ROOMS,

75 to 85 East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1834.

Parties in the country ordering Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of those instruments. They are warranted for Five years, and prices the lowest.

THE READERS OF

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper

Desiring to purchase any article in New York, no matter how trifling or costly, can have their orders promptly and faithfully fulfilled by addressing

JAMES W. FORTUNE,

Care of Frank Leslie, Esq.,
19 Gay Hall Square, N. Y.

In all cases the necessary funds should be inclosed in the communication.

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

PUBLISHED for the benefit and as a warning to Young Men who suffer from Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, &c.; supplying the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. Single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAY, P. O. Box 1758, Boston, Mass.; or by inclosing a postage stamp to the address of the author. 1853-62

MATRIMONY MADE EASY; Or, How to Win a Lover—Containing plain common sense directions, showing how all may be suitably married, irrespective of age, sex or position, whether possessing personal charms or not, how write, and the quick, secret, active vision, secure a speedy and happy marriage to either sex. By a Lady of this City. Sent by mail, in sealed envelopes, for 25 cents. Address MRS. L. WILLIAMS & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia, Post Office Box 2109. 1860-65

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

IF so, we will forfeit them to grow lovely to all. We warrant (upon the signed certificate) without one or injury to the skin. Free by mail, post free, in sealed envelopes, on receipt of 25 cents.

R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau Street, New York.

A. LANGE,

PICTURE AND LOOKING-GLASS FRAMES

CORNICES FOR ROOMS,

MADE TO ORDER, AND RE-GILDING DONE.

206 William St., cor. Frankfort, New York.

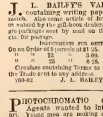
COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AND GYMNASIUM, at YONKERS, N. Y.

Winter Session commenced on the 1st day of Nov.

TERMS:

Board and Tuition.....$150 per Session.
For Circulars and particular information, apply to
R. N. THOMPKINS, Pres. 1857-62
Yonkers, 1860

ESTABLISHED 1843.



BOGLE'S CELEBRATED HYPERON FLUIDVAND never overgrows as the present Fluid does, and will restore Gray Hair in the world. It is the best dressing discovered for invigorating, try this and be convinced. It never fails. To be had at

W. BOGLES

Hairdresser, Perfumery and Toilet Saloon,

202 Washington St., Boston. 1854

for sale everywhere.

Superior Pianofortes.

PERFECT GABLER, MANUFACTURER OF PIANOFORTES (with or without the Patent Action), Nos. 428 and 430 West Fourteenth Street, near Tenth Ave., New York.

Purchasers and others are invited to call and examine the present improvements, which for quality of tone, firmness and wear are equal to any in the market for strength and power of tone, excellence of touch, and beauty of finish—as a test, every instrument is warranted for three years, and I guarantee to sell at lower prices than any responsible manufacturer in this city. 1859-74

EUGENE GABLER,
428 West Fourteenth Street, New York.

GREATLY IMPROVED PIANOFORTES.—CALENDER & CO., Manufacturers of Overstrung Grand and Square Pianofortes, which for value of Tone, elasticity of Touch and beauty of Finish—as a test, every thing that renders a Piano perfect—are unsurpassed. Every Piano warranted for Five Years. Rooms to Let. Warerooms, 31 Lovers' Place, Bleecker St., near Broadway, New York. 1852-65

Pianofortes.

A. H. GALE & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF HARMONIUMS,

107 East Twelfth Street, N. Y.

Bogle's Hair Dye and Wigs

ARE unsurpassed and all else unapproachable in the popular mind. Both are patentees. Try the one, try the other, and be convinced.

Private Rooms for Dyeing Hair and Ornamental Wigs at 202 Washington St., Boston. Perfumery and Toilet Soaps. No. 202 Washington St., Boston. The genuine to counteract the bad wash by rain. Bottles perhaps cheap for supply. 1854

Liquid and Extract Tisomer.

THIS genuine English preparation, highly recommended, and pleasant to the taste, prepared by J. T. TISOMER, M. D., Holborn, London. Liquid Tisomer is guaranteed to effectually eradicate all traces of premature decay, rheumatism, &c., restoring the functions of every young or old man to astonishing perfection. Extract Tisomer is a powerful aperient, and a specific for which secrecy and impossibility to trace, will help eradicating all disease and impurities from the body. Price $1 per Bottle or Six Bottles for $5. Sent to Europe to any part of the country. All orders must be addressed to DR. W. B. HOWELL, No. 189 Spring Street, New York City 1859-74

Kennedy's Medical Discovery

CURES SCROFULA.

Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Erysipelas.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Salt Rheum.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Nursing Sore Mouth.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Tetter or Scald Head.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Scald Head.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Running of the Ears.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Blotches on the Face.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Leprosy.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ringworm.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Salt Rheum.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Pimples.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery to Purify the Blood.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery to Purify the Breath.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery Regulates the Liver.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery has cured Dropsy.
When you are sick, and can't tell what ails you, or the matter is, perhaps you have an inward humor. Try Kennedy's Medical Discovery. For sale by all Druggists.

A Card to the Ladies.

DR. BRIGNALL, from Paris, respectfully informs the ladies that he may be consulted at his office, 21 Bond street, daily, from 9 to 4 o'clock. Female impotent pills will be sent to all parts of the country on receipt of $5. Address Dr. Paul Du Pont, Box 4,632, New York. He discloses secret fell. Consultation gratis at 645 Broadway, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. 1852-64

Boar's Head Sx Cord Spool Cotton.

ESTABLISHED 1793.

Superior to any ever introduced in Strength, Smoothness and Elasticity, for

MACHINE OR HAND SEWING.

On Spools of 200, 500 and 1,000 Yards, the length warranted.

C. CARVILLE,
Sole Agent, 199 Pearl St.

CURE FOR DYSPEPSIA.

Dr. Van Doren's Dyspepsia Antidote,

A Sure and Certain Remedy

For Dyspepsia under whatever symptoms it may be developed, Sick Headache, Nervousness, Loss of Feeling of weight at the Stomach, Loss of Appetite, Depression of Spirits, Nausea at the Stomach, Bad Taste in the Mouth, Bad Breath, Depression of Spirits, Torpor of the Liver or Bowels, and all diseases arising from a disordered Stomach.

This medicine strengthens and regulates the Bowels, purifies the blood, and gives a healthy action to the whole system of the debilitating effects generally produced by Dyspepsia or Indigestion.

It is composed of purely vegetable substances, and may be taken with perfect safety by children of the weakest constitution or the most delicate female.

This is no new and untried remedy, but one compounded after years of investigation and experience by the late Dr. J. L. Van Doren, and used in his practice for many years, since which time its extraordinary merits have been tried and tested.

Let the sufferer from dyspepsia in any of its forms or stages, or from any of the diseases of the Stomach or Bowels which the name implies, try this remedy, and it will not be found wanting.

Price—A single bottle (sufficient to cure the worst case of dyspepsia) $1; or six bottles for $5.

Prepared and sold, wholesale and retail, by

ROBERTS & CO.,
365 Broadway, N. Y.

1219-70

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S

LOTTERIES!

AUTHORIZED BY THE STATE OF

DELAWARE,

MISSOURI

AND

KENTUCKY

Issue daily, in public, under the superintendence of Drawn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM

$2 50 TO $100,000!

TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $20.

☞ Circulars giving full explanation and the Schemes to be drawn will be sent, free of expense, by addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
or
WOOD, EDDY & CO., St. Louis, Missouri.

Miscellaneous.

THE AMALGAMATION OF LANGUAGES.—There is a growing tendency in this age to appreciate the most expressive words of other languages, and after a while to incorporate them into our own; that the word Catholic, was borrowed from the Greek, signifying "for the whole," and becoming the English word signifying "universal." Speaking great Britain correctly, but it will soon be lost in a more general way, and the word Catholic will become as common as Episcopal and many others whose distinctive or foreign words has been worn away by common usage until they seem "native and to the manner born."

"Ardly Realised.

Hi 'ad a terrible toothache this 'Ot Season, 'ead I stepped into the hapothecary's, hand says he to the man, "Can you 'ave been one of an 'orrible?" "Does it 'ache 'orrid?" says he. "Excessively," says hi, hand upon that 'e gave me a Cephalic Pill, hand pon me 'onor it cured me so quick that I 'ardly realised I 'ad 'ad an 'orrible.

ST. HARMONIA is the favorite sign by which nature makes known any deviation whatever from the natural state of the body, and viewed in this light it may be looked on as a universal remedy as to some portion of disease which might otherwise escape unnoticed till too late. Headaches, such as tetterings should never be neglected. Headaches, such as tetterings, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Sympomatic and Hypochia, Symptomatic Headache is unceasingly connected with the precursor of a great variety of diseases, among which are Apoplexy, Liver, Hypochondria and all forms of disease. In its various form it is symptomatic of disease of the stomach, originating cold humidity, of bowel disorder constituting bilious headache, of worms, constipation and other derangements of the digestive organs, of nervousness, or debility. Diseases of the liver are very frequently accompanied by headache. Alcoholic and epidemic are also attendant which frequently assume headache. Hippyfire Electricity is also very common, being usually distinguished by the name of nervous headache, and appears coming on suddenly in a state of apparently sound health and gradually in some the mental and physical are affected, and in other instances it comes on slowly, headache is the first symptom of the disease. Nervous headache is sometimes the only in the front of the head, over one or both eyes, and sometimes preceding vomiting; under this class may also be named Neuralgia.

For the treatment of either class of Headache the Cephalic Pills have been found a very valuable remedy, relieving the most acute pains to a few minutes, and by its active power eradicating the diseases of which Headache is the morning index.

DESPERT.—Mama wants you to send here 1 box of Cephalic Pills, as a bottle of Perrigrine Pills—that you sent before, is all gone, and I will be sadly missing without it. Yes she says she will send you the money for the Cephalic, and wants some more of that same as relieved her before.

DESPERT.—You must mind Spalding's Cephalic Pills.

DESPERT.—Mother says she will send you $1 after the quarter and give me the Pills, and don't be all day about it either.

Constipation or Costiveness.

No one of the "many ills that flesh is heir to" is so prevalent as little understood, and so much neglected as Costiveness. Often originating in habitual or temporary debility, it is regarded as a slight disorder of too little importance to excite anxiety, while in fact there is no one complaint which partakes of many of the most fatal and dangerous diseases to which we are subjected, and which bring the sufferer to an untimely grave. Among the milder evils of which Costiveness is the well-understood are Headache, Coke Dissemination, Foul Breath, Piles and others of like nature, while a long train of frightful diseases such as Bilious Fever, Abscess, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Apoplexy, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Hysteria, Hypochondriac Affections, and Insanity, frequently have their origin in the same fatal and unsuspecting source. None unfrequently the deceiving manual organs in Constipation, but take on an I opposite, an existence within the system is produced in the early stage. From all these considerations it follows that the disorder should receive immediate attention whenever it occurs, and no person should neglect to get a box of Cephalic Pills on the first appearance of the complaint, for thereby one will expel the morbific materials at once and destroy the dangerous foe to human life.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented, and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Bilious Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Laxative, improving appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and energy of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times without any regard to diet, without making any change of life, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS

The genuine have five signatures of Henry C. Spalding on each box

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

All orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING,
49 Cedar St., New York.

$30 Willcox & Gibbs' $35
SEWING MACHINES
REMARKABLE FOR SIMPLICITY.
Manufactured with noiseless motion, hence are always in working order. One hour's practice will enable any one to sew with ease and rapidity.
Office, 508 Broadway. 509 0te

Sent Free! Sent Free! Sent Free!
A NEW and Beautiful Art, for which we want Agents every where. Agents Make $70 a month. Terms and Specimen sent FREE. Address, with Stamp for return postage,
L. L. WOOD & CO.,
237 6to Lowell, Mass.

FRENCH'S
CELEBRATED CONICAL
Washing Machine,
UNEQUALLED AND IRRESPONSIBLE!
FACE OUT TIN BRASS.
Depot No. 419 Broadway, corner of Canal St.
Agents wanted in all parts of the United States.
Send for a Circular.
Address Box No. 2,893 Post Office, New York City.
P. & R. FRENCH.
609

"WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES are certainly unrivalled."—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper
Office, 505 Broadway, New York. 607te

The Singer Sewing Machines.
IN order to place the BEST FAMILY MACHINES in the World within the reach of all, we have reduced our LITTLE A, or DOMESTIC FAMILY MACHINE, beautifully ornamented, to $50

Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machines,
Being of very great application and capacity, and popular with in the family and manufactory. Prices reduced, respectively from $125 and $150 to $100 and $125.

Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine,
For Carriage makers and heavy leather work. Price, complete, $150.

All to complete the list, as

ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,
unequalled for manufacturing purposes; NOISELESS, RAPID, and capable of every kind of work. Price (including long stand and drawer), $150—cheaper at that in view of its value than machines of any other kind at a gift.
609 I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway

J. W. STORRS, Agent.
131 Chatham Street, N. Y.
THIS PISTOL is light, has great force, is sure fire, shoots accurately, can be left loaded any length of time without injury, is not liable to get out of order, is safe to carry. Every Pistol warranted

CAUTION TO DEALERS.
Be sure and get those stamped "Smith & Wesson, Springfield, Mass." as no others genuine. All cartridge inventors have had all their patents infringed upon. Suits are now commenced, and all such infringements will be prosecuted. Be sure the cartridges have Smith & Wesson's patent on the end of the box 247 7te 609 62

JOY TO THE WORLD.
Clothes Washed in One Minute by
Johnson's Union Washing Machine.
Patented April 10, 1860.
Price
$8
to $10.
A CHILD CAN OPERATE IT. Washes every spot. Sure and certain. Washing soaking or by boiling. Call and see in operation at 377 Broadway, New York, and 102 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y. J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors.
609

SILSBEE, CASE & CO.,
Photographic and Daguerreotype
ARTISTS.
209½ Washington Street, Boston.
Up but one flight of stairs.
G. M. SILSBEE, J. O. CASE, W. H. GITCHELL
2t4-7te

Patented November 1st, 1859.

The measures are
A, the distance round the Neck.
B to B, the Yoke.
C to C, the Sleeve.
D to D, distance around the Body under the armpits
E to E, the length of the Shirt.

BALLOU'S
Patent Improved French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.
A New Style of Shirt, warranted to Fit
By sending the above measures per mail we can guarantee a perfect fit of our new style of Shirts, and return by Express, C. O. D. to any part of the United States, at $1, $15, $18, $24, $30, per doz. No extra charge for new Patterns for this shirt—same Shirt.
Also Improved and Perfect in MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS
BALLOU BROTHERS,
409 Broadway, N. Y.
Wholesale Trade supplied on the usual terms.

William Taylor's
NEW SALOON
No. 555 Broadway.
Refreshments of all kinds can be here obtained by ladies and gentlemen at all hours in the day and evening.
609

WHITE'S
FIVE-PLY LEVER
TRUSS
AND SUPPORTER
A New Discovery
FOR THE
Retention and Radical Cure of Hernia, &c
White's Patent Lever Truss.
This instrument, which is now offered to the public in the city, radically differs in principle and method of action from all others. The use of the steel spring pad is done away with, the lever, instead, exerts pressure at the highest value never before attained. Among some of the advantages claimed by the instrument are these: It has a new, PLIABLE, METALLIC BOW, producing precisely power required—PERFECT ADJUSTABILITY, elevated and upper action combined, with an unyielding pressure on the Pubis, and rests on the Sympathetic Cord; does not, like the spring pad, bear on the Pubis, causing irritation, disease, and debility, cause blood below the rupture in every case; requires less than one-half the usual pressure, and is a radical cure. The ABDOMINAL SUPPORT fits on on the same principle. Send and get a Truss. Pamphlets gratis. Elevated rooms lower rent has enabled us to sell at less than half the usual price. Also, a new article of Shoulder Brace, for Females, with Corsets and Gore Bosom. The Ladies' Department attended by a lady. The instruments are now offered at WHITE'S, the only place where they can be had. Sold and rented by the Proprietor, GEBGORY & CO., No. 25 Bond St., and by Drs. D. S. Barnes & Co., No. 11 and 14 Park Row, Messrs. Schaeffer Brothers, No. 218 William St., and by all first class drug houses.

SMITH,
HATTER,
181 Nassau St., near corner of Ann, and 178 Fulton St., New York
Fine Bedaville Silk Hats, $2! Call and examine for yourself. 609

Want'd,
A GOOD STENCIL, DIE SINKER.—For sale, all kinds Stencil Dies, Indelible Ink, Brushes, Stencil Machinery, Alphabets, &c. Price List sent free. Address
S. STRICKLER,
250 Pearl Street, N. Y.

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
Noiseless Family Sewing Machines.
PRICES ESTABLISHED FOR SEVEN YEARS.
$ 50 and $125 and UPWARDS.
* No Machine to sell under $50 that is warranted.—Home Journal
Office 495 Broadway, New York.
280-609

Tiffany & Co.,
LATE
TIFFANY, YOUNG & ELLIS,
Fine Jewellery, Precious Stones, Watches, Silver Ware
Prompt, Quick, Bird's Eye Articles Always on Hand.
No. 550 Broadway, New York.
Stores at PARIS, TIFFANY & CO.

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24 and 36 Tunes.
PAILLARD & MARIUS, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired. 21 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

ESENWEIN'S
Tar and Wood Naphtha
PECTORAL
Is the only certain cure for all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs. From the cures that are constantly being made by the use of this great Vegetable Remedy, it has been called the Wonder of the Age. It cures recently and confirmed Consumptions, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs and Colds, Croup, Whooping Cough, Pulmonary or the Heart, Influenza, &c. Time action is certain to relieve and prevent in all cases. Be careful as to be Esenwein's Tar and Wood Naphtha Pectoral. Prepared only by

DR. A. ESENWEIN & CO.,
Druggists and Chemists,
N. W. corner of Second and Race Sts.,
PHILADELPHIA.

And sold by every respectable Druggist and Dealer in Medicines throughout the United States and Canada. 609

Ladd, Webster & Co.'s
IMPROVED TUBULAR HOISTING MACHINES,
609 Broadway, New York. 0-Co

STEINWAY & SONS'
PATENT
OVERSTRUNG
GRAND
AND SQUARE
PIANOS
Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured. Each instrument warranted for five years.
Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway. 609

THE ELECTROTYPING OF LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is done by FILMER & Co., 41 Duane Street.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

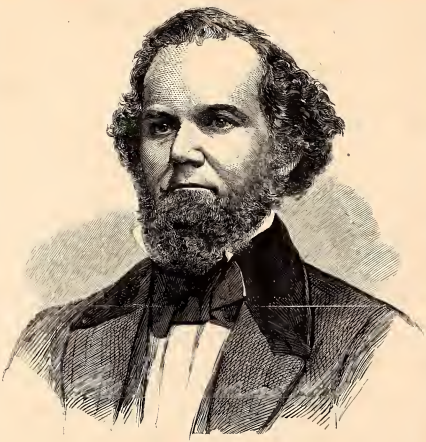
Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York

No. 263—Vol. XI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 8, 1860. [Price 6 Cents.

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE ABROAD.

Wherever the children of the American soil gain a foothold, a new order of things springs up. Old fogyism receives a shock—the proprietus of ages are for the time outraged—enterprise takes a new and startling phase, and old-fashioned custom sees the ground slipping away from under it. Our countryman, G. W. Train, has just succeeded in persuading Englishmen into the use of street railroads, and so marked and extraordinary is the improvement esteemed, that before long, if we may prognosticate from popular demonstrations, the horse-railroads will be adopted all over the United Kingdom of Great Britain.

We have also to record a new instance of American enterprise in the far-off colony of Victoria, Australia. We illustrate below a very large coach, built in Ballarat, by Mr. J. D. Morgan (formerly of New York), for Messrs. F. B. Clapp & Co., coach proprietors and mail contractors. This is only one of many coaches possessed by this company. It is intended to seat sixty-five persons, and is drawn by six horses. The outside is beautifully ornamented—the panellings having painted on them the American Eagle, the Goddess of Liberty and several other appropriate devices. The interior is divided into two compartments, one being set apart for ladies and the other for gentlemen. It is most gorgeously fitted up with velvet pile cushions, damask hangings, Brussels carpets and mirrors. The proprietors are all citizens of the United States; Mr. Frank Boardman Clapp, of Massachusetts; Mr. William Warren and Mr. Henry Hoyt, both of New York State. Their agents and business men generally are also Americans.



LAWRENCE M. KEITT, M. C. FOR THE THIRD DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.—SEE PAGE 34.

The number of horses in constant use by the firm is between seven and eight hundred; the weekly expenses about one thousand two hundred pounds, or six thousand dollars, and the number of miles traversed daily about eight hundred or nine hundred. Their mail contracts amount to about twenty-five thousand pounds, or one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars per annum. This will give an idea of the extent of their operations, and shows that Americans there, as well as in all other parts of the world, are men of enterprise, and consequently valuable to any community that they settle with. This company alone does about one-third of the whole of the coaching done in that Colony. The rest of it is also in the hands of Americans, and all running, or rather carrying on their business, under the title of the firm of Cobb & Co., from the fact of Mr. Freeman Cobb, a native of Massachusetts, having initiated the coaching here, in which he was very successful, having returned to his home with a large fortune.

The following extract from a Victoria paper will give an idea of the sensation made by the starting of this mammoth coach:

The Leviathan Coach.

We (that is, Victorians) may be in our infancy, and there are possibly a great many things in which either London or New York might beat us, but if England can produce a Great Eastern, and America an Astor House, we can afford to give them credit for their possessions, and point with calm contempt to our Monster Coach. It is a coach; a regular double narrated three books; and as it appeared on Saturday morning, loaded with all the enlarged number of newspapers, with engravings enlivening its columns, it was the most welcome visitor to the breakfast table of the whole week. Mr. Lever's stories, with their humorous sketches of Irish character, their inimitable fun, and Mr. Charles O'Malley, Harry Lorrequer, Jack Hinton, the Confessions of Con Cregan, the Knight of Gwynne, with the whole train of charming characters from the hero down, with Shoppiard, that celebrated whip, handling his ribbons with becoming lankiness nonchalance, with Lively and the Green Jackets mounting pinkeens as on parade, and many more characters barnacling on by roof, with Bill Ballinger surrounding it and Young Ireland parking regardless of all with exemplary vigor; with all these accessories to fame of which was particularly required, that same Leviathan Coach was considered by the Irish public as the perfection of mail coaches, and the perfect manufacture of art. In the country and, of all events, the most favored coach as regards public interest that ever had the pleasure of seeing.

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE IN AUSTRALIA—THE NEW COACH, THE LEVIATHAN, STARTED AT BALLARAT, VICTORIA, FOR THE MINES, BY THE AMERICAN FIRM OF F. B. CLAPP & CO.

It was manufactured by Mr. Peter Stuart, of Dublin, and was contracted to carry sixty passengers. The interior is divided into two compartments, the "Ferocious" being reserved for him and the aristocratic few outsiders. On the roof are fixed a number of benches, pretty much closed, on which the lovers of fun can clamber, and the dirty, the drunken, and the disorderly, with the assistance of rapid locomotion and the soothing weed. Besides these there is also the box seat for the coachman, and the guard's seat behind, with a most delightful elevated position for the enjoyment of the scenery. Certainly, the coach, loaded as it was on Saturday, had to us an unfettered appearance of spaciousness; but experience, as it usually does, proved that the coach had been great to warrant the safety of the superannuates. At all events it went down the Main Road in perfect safety, and reached the end of the stage in time. The service required perfect grooming ever so many times on the way to Bunratty Castle, and the horses were changed at the various stages with the utmost celerity. Indeed, John also is clever, and a company sufficiently enterprising to purchase such a coach as the Leviathan.

HON. LAWRENCE M. KEITT.

This noble specimen of a South Carolinian gentleman was born in Orangeburg district, on the 27th October, 1820. He was educated with great care, and graduated at the South Carolina College, Columbia, in 1840, taking the highest honors. In 1848 he was elected a member of the State Legislature, which honor he retained till 1853, when he was sent to the House of Representatives for the Third District, which consists of Orangeburg, Barnwell, Beaufort and Colleton districts. Since then he has been re-elected four times, without reckoning his re-election when he resigned on the Sumter affair, when he was unanimously re-elected and returned him as their representative. In May, 1859, he married Miss Susan Rhett, the daughter of Robert Barnwell Rhett, Esq., and immediately started on an European tour, from which, however, he returned in time to attend the session of Congress on the election of Lincoln, he threw himself with his usual vigor into the foremost ranks of the secessionists, and his speeches have had a great effect in producing the present crisis. As an orator, Mr. Keitt has many advantages—his voice is loud and clear—his action very effective, and although he is not a man to attempt to shine as an orator, either in a deliberative assembly or a popular gathering. His hair is a dark brown—his eyes of a grayish color—his complexion ruddy—his head of an imposing and large size, and he sometimes rises into a poetical strain very fascinating to an audience. In politics he has always been a decided and fearless Democrat.

BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM

HAS again become the popular resort of EVERY LOVER OF THE WONDERFUL, THE CURIOUS AND INSTRUCTIVE.

And is now attracting more attention, and receiving more visitors than every other place of amusement in the city. Let no lover of the curious, the rare and interesting be annoyed by Mr. Barnum, and pronounced to his visitors in addition to the 600,000 who have visited his Museum in the past year.

SURPRISING DRAMATIC ENTERTAINMENTS

which take place every afternoon and evening, in the spacious and elegant hall, by a full and complete dramatic company. At present the two Little Agnes' CHILDREN, the Infant Prodigies, in the Drama of the Child of the Regiment, the Wife's Victory; the Grand Aquatic Drama of Life on a Mountain; the Ballet Comedy; the Grand Aquatic; Negro Sketch, Little Happy Family, &c., &c., are all at command. The price of admission to the whole is only 25 cents. Children under 10 years 15 cents.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 8, 1860.

Ass. Communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, No City Hall Square, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	1 week	$ 1
One do	1 month	4
Two do	1 year	5
Three Copies	1 year	7 50
Five do	1 year	12
Ten do	1 year	20

And an extra Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description, on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanation further than a request that we keep an copper with everything that transpires or occurs in all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper are open to all, and we desire to have everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous that we can personally attend to the events of our far-reaching journalism. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Foreign News.

THE last news from foreign affairs is such the same state as they were when the Africa sailed. Immediately after handing over the government of the Two Sicilies to Victor Emanuel, Garibaldi quitted Naples, and left for his home, Caprera, in the Mediterranean. He then took leave of the army, and with a simplicity unknown in this noisy age left for his home in a small boat. Before the Neapolitan troops belonging to Garibaldi, and the next mail will no doubt bring us news of his escape or surrender. The Government of the Piedmontese Empire would make it that he did not fall into the hands of the Spaniards, but that he would use any harsh measures towards him, but because it would complicate matters. The document which he took—his letters, maps, &c., in his own charge—of Modena and Tuscany.

Lord John Russell's despatch to the British Ministers at Turin was most opportune. It has strengthened Cavour more than half a dozen victories, since it, to a great extent, breaks the league between Austria and France. Russell's despatch to the Monsignor Legion in a liberal sense, it is clear another war is not, accepted in the spring, but that Austria will be left to fight her own battles in Italy, and be like her ejected and Venetian throne.

Germany is remarkably quiet, and there is not what concessions will effect on the Hungarians, but it would seem as though they were considered as hostages, and, consequently, the concessions will be withheld accordingly.

Louis Napoleon seems carrying out his free trade policy with a quiet vigor characteristic of the man. Still the building of frigates went on, as though peace was sworn with a blue kerb.

In England the news is equally unimportant. The Lord Mayor of London gave, on the 9th of November, his annual banquet, which was attended only by the French and Sardinian Ambassadors. The other foreign representatives, it is said, were displeased with Lord John Russell's despatch, and kept away. Lords Palmerston and John Russell, in their speeches, declared that England's neutrality policy. Count Persigny also made a speech, enlarging the English alliance, but neither Palmerston nor Russell made any allusion to the fact that the Sardinian Minister was present. Lord John Russell, however, supplied the omission in the following which, which apply equally to every nation struggling for liberty. He said, "That, notwithstanding the love of order which characterized the people of England, they appeared still to sympathize with liberty. And with all the efforts and struggles of a oppressed people to obtain freedom."

From China the news is contradictory—some declaring that the Emperor has received to make peace, while another despatch says that the French and English troops are on their way to carry their victorious arms into Pekin. One thing is very certain, that the consuls of the French in Shanghai has brought the intelligence of the allied army to Pekin. Some of the more recent accounts say that the interests of employer and employed (like those of rival nations, in this trading age), are gradually becoming more identical. The Harmony of Interests is our watchword, and the industrial history of the past century proves a beyond all question that co-operation is the way to those who believe in the Christian revelation of the sufferings of the working man. The labor theory does not, however, with demagogue voice, clamor for working-men's rights any more than for the rights of capitalists. It simply calls for the fullest and freest scope for intellect, muscle and capital; being well assured that in due time the old conflict will be settled peacefully in the new and generous spirit of concordias with Nature—in wrenching out of the latter her secret treasures. It is young yet, the labor doctrine. But the day is not far off when it will stand upon solid foundations and demagogue—those open foes and secret friends—as Hercules of old strangled the serpents. It is doing it practically now, though like him as yet in its cradle.

The most practical proof of what we assert may be found by any one in the fact that at the present day there is no calling so respectable that it does not bring education and science to bear on it thereby elevates it and himself in the social scale. Nothing so low, so paltry but that Science may make it both profitable and honorable. The very cocoons at Polytechnic school makes a boy a better mechanic, master mechanic, and finally master manufacturer, than he would have been. His rise is more certain, and he is more respected by all of the advantages which are generally derived only from a "University education." And in this age it becomes every year much easier for poor young men to obtain opportunities for such a practical education as science grants to those who have the sense to take it, while Polytechnic schools and Polytechnic school specially adapted to the education of all who wish to become civil engineers practical mechanics, merchants, artists, engineers, or in fact anything positively useful.

The great moral lesson which the labor theory exacts is she enormous obscurity and wickedness of attaching an arbitrary standard of respectability to this or that occupation. "Be-cause it is what it is." The social distinctions observed between those who sell different sorts of goods, are, for instance, exquisitely absurd, and the more ignorant and unlettered a man is conceivably more ridiculous and contemptible spirit than that of even a regularly titled aristocracy. But the fact is, that the spirit which would make so small differences to labor where no intellectual or personal differences exist is stronger in proportion to its narrow-mindedness and isolation.

The fact is that the great and great rising truth of the age is this of the gradual and constant rise of Labor in the social scale. Let it be taught in schools, let it be urged as a serious and solemn duty from the pulpit, let the greatest writers of the Christianity; let it be sung by poets and enlarged on by the lecturer. The development of Labor is the material guarantee of all human happiness.

EDITORIAL GLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS.

The Public has lately been gratified by having three dreams sons of Mr. Barnum exhibited on the dramatic stage of the city papers. The heroines belong to Chicago, Boston and New York. In the first Mr. Burch, Miss Isaacs, Miss Lindley, Mr. Stevens, and Mr. Barnum himself, with his wife's understudies. We will not undertake to pronounce on what a lady and her husband should or should not undertake in the way of amusement. The first might not be considered as a mark of tenderness if sense were in the way. The first impression was, however, very nay, and nothing but solid success, for yet those of Mr. Burch, the opinion of the scientific men is that the less said about those matters the better. Duty then should be hidden from sight. I see of Barnum's Museum, the walking machines, and wished it became not by request but by tenderness. The second case was where a curtain lecture was brought on the stage. Mr. Burch's genius would probably have produced excellence. The jury valued his power of mind, tender heart, chastened benevolence, his gentle and manly bearing, and their words, of course, were, that his case is the mysterious one at Brooklyn, which we have already noticed in these columns. The jury found that Mr. Burch was not insane, and that his marriage was like dipping into a bag for an eel, where there were ninety-nine snakes to one of the eel.

The London Critic says: "One of the most cheering signs of an improvement in American taste is, the gratifying fact that no publisher in that republic has brought the splendid edition of Audubon's Birds to a close. We should rejoice at the assertion, but think our good taste is purchased at the expense of our gratitude, since Messrs. Audubon & Bachman have given us the birds themselves and seem to defend it against the cockney assaults of cockneys, Trollope, &c., &c.

Thanksgiving Day is a time-honored institution in New England. In the republican states, recommending the due observance of Thanksgiving Day, he says:

"Whilst, in my judgment, the country, either in its political, commercial or social relations, has much to be grateful for, I am not aware that it has been the will of God to visit us with any special calamity, or call upon us to humble ourselves before the Father of all mercies devout and fervent prayer for His interposition and protection. I therefore recommend that the 29th day of November be set apart as a day of festival interests of the people."

Leaving the Mayor to confer with the Parsons and muslin theologians, we would say that our curiosity may do to more good than even a Thanksgiving Day sermon. We have not been upon our presently, and we could go to Boston and New York, and we have many great men of all parties as a colossal state of mind.

The Thanksgiving-sell is certainly not a very sentimental man. The speech he made at Bloomington, on his way to Chicago, has killed him dead with the Democratic party. Mr. Douglas is a very large-hearted man, a second opponent, yet, as they are only in the proportion of nine to twelve, the "better half" of the party will not be represented. Mr. Douglas will be left to the honor of her next sale of Stash. Bad here is the offensive paragraph. If this South should secede from the Union, we have two words:

"Let us suppose, I think very much of the people as an old friend said to daughter of women. He said when he had his first wife, who was a great help to him, he had a very poor opinion of her. He thought her a very fine woman, and he was very much attached to her, but he did not think she was a remarkable woman. He had the same as well as the first, and that his opinion now was that a remarkable woman was a very poor thing to have."

At Mr. Lincoln is Abe's first instalment of wedded happiness, we should like to have her say on her husband's opinion, that her less can to as much as remarkable woman was a very poor thing to have. Mr. Lincoln is not "Oh, the tenant that has truly loved love is the close."

Our Readers are doubtless aware that a proposition for the widening of Catherine street—contested obstinately by long the inhabitants of the author of Chancellor—has been for some time before the Common Council. At a visit meeting this proposition was received by many of the real estate owners, among whom was a Mr. Rice. He expressed in decidedly a strange one.

"Mr. Rice stated that there was no particular call for the improvement, as the business in part of Catherine street was dull. He also stated that he had petitioned against the improvement in other streets in the vicinity, and that the petitions had been disregarded. Chamberlain Cornell, Mr. Meeker, Erickson, Walker and Harris, the latter two representing the New York Tribune, and Mr. Rice, all spoke in favor of the proposition.

Surely Mr. Rice ought to say that his own argument shows that the trade is decreasing on account of the ill-conditioned state of Catharine street. If the trade were brisk and increasing, then the necessity to widen and improve the thoroughfare would not be so apparent. In conclusion, we should recommend him to look at the widening of Catharine street couleur de Rose.

PERSONAL.

It is stated that Chief-Justice Taney resigned his distinguished office on the 25th. He is in his eighty-fourth year. It will also afford to President Buchanan the opportunity of appointing a Southern Democrat to the office.

The Charlestonians have presented Commodore Berry with a very handsome gold cane for what they term his heroism in displaying the Palmetto Flag on board the steamer Columbia, when she was steaming from New York to Charleston.

It is stated that Judge White, recently elected to that office, has commenced an action against John Clancy, of the Leader.

Abraham Lincoln, the President elect, has been on a visit to Chicago. He here met for the first time Mr Hamlin. The reporters say that these gentlemen were very much annoyed by half a dozen busybodies who took possession of them. A Springfield paper says that till his election Old Abe had no idea how many uncles, aunts, cousins, &c., he had. He says that the Lincolns are a more numerous family than the Smiths!

Lamoricière is about to retire from the service of the Pope, and take up his abode in Paris. He will there meet Bosco, Agossa, and many of the anti-Italian policy. He has lost much of the prestige that once was attached to his name. Those who know him best pronounce him to be a gloomy and ferocious bigot. His cruelties in Algeria are only exceeded by those to Italy.

In the family of Lord Brougham several instances of remarkable longevity occur. The most singular is that of one of his collateral ancestors, who, born in 1683 and dying in 1789, when Lord Brougham was eleven years old, connected in two individuals the reigns of Charles II. and Victoria. Lord Brougham's grandmother lived to the age of ninety-three, and his mother to eighty-nine.

Harrison Ainsworth has advertised a new historical romance, entitled, "The Constable of the Tower." Gilbert will illustrate it. This will give the author of "Rookwood" an excellent opportunity for the parade of his unrivalled "old clo'" phraseology.

The Little Giant is expected early next week in New York. A monster serenade will be given to him by his admirers.

The new French Minister has taken the house on Georgetown Heights formerly occupied by Sir John Crampton.

Every Episcopalian minister in Charleston has dropped the usual prayer for the President. Do they consider as he is no longer their virtual head there is no further occasion for prayer, or that he is past praying for?

The Philadelphia papers are crowing very loudly over the fact that M. Berghmans, the Secretary of the Belgian Legation, is about to wed a Philadelphia belle. We always prefer to see our belles marry Americans.

Captain Frazer, formerly of the Vanderbilt, and latterly of the Francis Skiddy, died at his house in Jersey City on the 20th. He was much respected.

Governor Banks is at present in New York. He is about removing out West.

It is proposed to give a dramatic entertainment at one of the large theatres, in order to raise funds for a monument to the late T. D. Rice, the original Jim Crow.

Mr. Erben, well-known in the musical world, and who was organist to old Trinity Church for over forty years, fell in Catherine street the other day and severely injured himself. He is in his ninetieth year.

The Fleetwood arrived the other day from Para with a very amiable and interesting lot of emigrants—fourteen immense anacondas!

Senator Douglas left New Orleans on the 13th. Senator Slidell had taken his passage in the same boat, but when he saw the Little Giant, Slidell had his baggage taken to another boat, and left the steamer. Douglas tells the story with immense gusto.

The Philadelphia Press says that Charles Dickens used to get Talfourd to read all his MSS.; now it is Robert Bell. The Press is wrong, John Forster was C. D.'s adviser. Talfourd never had time even to read all his law papers, much less to correct voluminous MS.

The model of a steamer with air chambers, for the purpose of lessening the draught of water when passing through shallow places, was patented by Abe Lincoln in 1849, and is now on exhibition in Washington at the Patent Office.

On Sunday, December 2, the Reformed Dutch Church at Hudson City will celebrate their two hundredth anniversary. Dr. Taylor is the present minister, and much esteemed.

John Brougham, having concluded a very successful engagement at the Haymarket Theatre, London, has proceeded to Manchester, where he is engaged to perform in a round of his favorite characters.

MUSIC.

The fashionable world has inaugurated the season, and we are permitted to announce that winter has socially commenced. We state this fact that the outside barbarians—which include all who have not admission to the sacred circle of wealth and fashion—may govern themselves accordingly.

The great inaugurating occasion was the opening of the Academy of Music and the performance of "La Juive." The management promised that the famous work of Halevy should be brought out in a style of magnificence never before equalled in this country; glowing advertisements appeared, a strong cast was promised, and every means were used to get up an excitement in the public mind. The end was achieved, and an audience which overflowed the Academy was present on the first night of "La Juive." It was an elegant, refined and fastidious audience, but undemonstrative to a painful degree. Still it was a money audience, and that to the manager is compensation for every shortcoming.

The mounting of this opera is magnificent in every respect. The scenery is new and very beautiful. Young Calzo has fully sustained the promises of his previous works. He is a mere youth yet, and this early development of his genius warrants us in predicting for him a place in the front ranks of the great scenic artists of the age. The costumes are superb, and what with the glitter of costly suits of steel armor, dresses of silk, satin and gold, banners flaunting in the air, and all the panoply and pride of an imperial procession, the scene presented has rarely been excelled in gorgeous magnificence. To gaze at the accessories of this opera is alone worth the price of admission.

Madame Fabbri's performance of the rôle of the Jewess is highly meritorious. She displays both energy and passion, and although we cannot concede to her the position of lyric-tragedienne, we acknowledge her high claims as a melodramatic vocalist. Madame Anna Bishop consented to appear in a part which is utterly unworthy of her talents and position. A more thankless, ungenerous part than that of Eudoxia cannot be found in the whole range of operas, but she did for it all that could be done. She was exquisitely and superbly dressed, and looked very beautiful. Her acting was admirable, every movement indicated the finished artist, every posé was a study. We hope to hear and see her soon in a character worthy of her powers.

Stigelli, as the Jew, gained the great success of the evening. His singing throughout was of a high order of excellence, and his acting merited unqualified praise. Carl Formes acted the Cardinal with great dignity and dramatic force, but his singing was by no means up to the mark. Quinto sang excellently well, acted with spirit, and justly shared in the success of the evening. The orchestra and chorus were large and well trained, and Carl Anschutz conducted the whole with his usual care and ability.

Mr. Ullman was called out, but with becoming modesty said nothing. The work which so gratified the public spoke for him. It was a genuine success, and will crowd the Academy for many nights to come.

DRAMA

Winter Garden.—On Monday evening, Mr. Edwin Booth made his first appearance in three years at this house, in the character of Hamlet. The auditorium was by no means well filled, but the reception accorded to the young actor was quite cordial. There is nothing in this gentleman's representation of Hamlet to call forth special notice; he acts the part as we have seen it acted time and again, that is, he repeats the words of the text—not always correctly—with an apparent indifference as to their meaning, and accompanies them with gestures more or less suited to said words. During Mr Booth's previous engagements in this city we took occasion to witness all of his representations, but failed to discover wherein lay the secret of his success in the provinces—for that he is successful in all other places but New York is abundantly verified. To us he appears a young man of average ability, with a good figure, pleasant voice and quiet manner; his shortcomings as an artist are not glaring, but, nevertheless sufficiently apparent to make it evident that he will never reach the goal that injudicious friends claim he has already attained. His is a Hamlet to please school-girls and very young men; it is lachrymose, sentimental, gloomy. The shadow is never relieved by any of those quaint and effective flashes of light that the text suggests and genius always revels in. From the first scene to the last "the fruitful river of the eye and dejected 'havior of the visage" denote his conception of the part truly. To produce his picture of Hamlet, Mr. Booth has dipped his brush in but one tint; of that, however, he has made ample use. Fancy an artist wishing to paint a storm, and, as the best means of producing the desired effect, covering his entire canvas with a huge thunder-cloud, and you have some idea of Mr. Booth's prevailing "tone" in his delineation of the melancholy Prince of Denmark. The tragedy is put on the stage with some care, but, with the exception of Mrs. Duffield as the Queen, and Davidge as the Gravedigger, the acting cannot be commended.

Laura Keene's.—At this house was produced on Monday evening a nondescript piece, called the "Seven Sisters;" it is an adaptation from a French play, entitled, "The Seven Daughters of the Devil," and, despite its lack of literary ability, is destined to be "the success" of Miss Keene's season. This success is entirely due to the scene-painter, Mr. Roberts, who, for the concluding tableau, has produced a scene of fairy-land so dazzlingly beautiful that we are at a loss for words to describe it. We can only say that it is the most complete triumph of scenic art we have ever witnessed, and we doubt whether it has been excelled in any theatre in the world. The fairy ferns trembling as though instinct with life, the mirrorlike water, the floating lilies, the many-colored shells, the revolving pillars and thousand other indescribable wonders combine to form a picture of most exquisite loveliness. We heartily congratulate Miss Keene as having made a veritable success.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

On the 23d a very serious accident occurred near Fordham, on the Harlem Railroad, owing to the carelessness of some of the officials. Several persons were injured, and Mr Kelly, a respectable citizen, was so fearfully mangled that he is not expected to survive.

One of the most disastrous fires that has visited our city for years broke out on the morning of Sunday, the 25th, in the store of Messrs. Stone & Co., Murray street. In less than an hour the whole five story building was in flames, extending from Murray street to Warren. The exertions of the firemen, after five hours labor, finally extinguished it, but not till nearly half a million of property was destroyed.

Sunday, the 25th of November, being the anniversary of Evacuation Day, it was kept on the Monday by a military parade, in which the following regiments took part: The First Brigade, under the command of General C. B. Spicer, New York State Militia, consisting of the First Regiment (Cavalry), Second Regiment, Colonel Tompkins; Third Regiment (Hussars), Colonel S. B Postley, and the Seventy-first Regiment, Colonel A. S Vosburgh, and the Fourth Brigade, Brigadier-General John Ewen, consisting of the Eleventh Regiment, Colonel Homer Bostwick, Sixty-ninth Regiment, Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Nugent, the Seventy-ninth Regiment, Colonel McLeary, and the Twenty-second Regiment, Colonel Raynor; also, the Twelfth and Thirteenth Regiments.

Superintendent Kennedy's Quarterly Report has been published. The number of persons arrested is 24,576; 16 820 males, and 7,750 females. Three-fourths were of foreign birth. Superintendent Kennedy has ordered all liquor houses to be closed on the Sunday. The result is that the arrests for drunkenness have diminished three-fourths.

McGowan and his wife who killed Daniel Rourke on the 25th September, in a tenement-house in Water street, and which was duly reported in our Illustrated Paper, were tried before Judge Gould on the 23d November. They were found guilty of murder in the fourth degree. The female prisoner had an infant only six months old in her arms during the trial. It is supposed she will be pardoned. It is another proof of the curse of rum, and the result of these overcrowded tenement-houses. Oh, for a Christian Garibaldi to head a revolution against these two Molochs of our laboring classes!

Betsy Nichols, the colored woman, who killed her husband with a tumbler, was also tried for her crime, and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Drunkenness the cause. The wretched woman was not aware till next morning that she had murdered her husband, having thrown the glass tumbler at him when she was intoxicated.

There has been a singular trial in Brooklyn. A Mr. Beardsley sues for a divorce from his wife, on the ground that, while living with him as his wife, she had contracted a second marriage with a Mr. Mahon, a Catholic, under the assumed name of Seymour, pleading, as a reason why the marriage should be kept a profound secret, that if it were known before she came of age she would lose all her property. With this understanding Mr. Mahan consented to see his wife at his own office, and actually did not know where she resided. Accident, however, revealed to him that he held the second mortgage only of his wife's heart and person, and the husband, being equally unwilling to share with another what should be monopoly, sues for a divorce. In support of Mr Beardsley, Mr. Mohan swears that Mrs. Beardsley is the woman he married under the name of Miss Seymour, and the Catholic priest also swears to her identity. But the most mysterious thing about it is the defence. The lady swears that she has never been married a second time, that she never saw her pretended second husband before, that she never saw the Catholic priest. In a word, that if it is not a conspiracy to ruin her, it is a case of mistaken identity, and that there must be somebody very much like her.

Every day several bodies are washed ashore on the margin of Lake Michigan, the sad remains of the Lady Elgin disaster. At Gibson station, Indiana, last week seven were found.

Mary Smith, of Newburgh, Indiana, rose from her bed one night last week and walked in her night clothes to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, where, placing her head on the rail, she quietly awaited the express train. Her head was severed from her body. The cause of this rash act was a disappointment in love.

Considerable care ought to be taken with furnaces in churches and public buildings. The carbonic acid gas emitted from some kinds of coals is fatal. A number of persons fainted, and others were taken very sick in the Universalist church at Woonsocket, Rhode Island, on Sunday afternoon, owing to gas from a defect in the furnace. Many of the children fell to the ground when they reached the open air.

The Evening Post gives a very pleasant description of the facetious manners of Mr. Frederick Trupper, a Teutonic gentleman. His amiable weakness consists in his fancying himself intimate with everybody. For instance, finding the door of 143 Waverley place open, Mr. T. entered and made himself perfectly at home. The family being up stairs, and thinking it might be a country cousin, descended and found Mr. T. playing the piano in evident admiration of his own skill. He was persuaded by the gentleman to leave, which he did with many protestations of friendship to the "old boy," as he called him. Passing through the streets, dispensing bows, smiles and jocose remarks, with the occasional variety of putting his thumb to his nose, or extending his arms as if to embrace the passers by, he finally so alarmed some ladies that he was indulged with a night's lodging gratis, and discharged next morning on promise of good behavior.

Young Lambert has been held by the Coroner's jury for the murder of Collyer, the Jamaica, Long Island, farmer. The principal evidence against him was the facts of his sudden disappearance after the murder, and the possession of money which he could not account for.

On the 23th the Lakes were visited with a terrible storm, which swept over them with a sustained fury quite unprecedented. Many vessels have been driven ashore, and it is feared much life has been sacrificed.

A remarkable instance of the power of grief to kill occurred last Saturday. One of the fire police operators dying suddenly, a messenger was dispatched to inform his mother, who is housekeeper to Mayor Fernando Wood. The effect was so great upon the unhappy lady that she fell to the ground and expired. Mrs Winans was in her fifty-eighth year, and much respected.

Gold has been discovered in Missouri. The quartz where it is found is in Madison county. Experienced miners are on the start for this new El Dorado.

The Nashville Patriot has an excellent story. Some wag, nearly seven feet high, walked into the City Hotel of that city lately, and wrote in a fine bold hand, Abraham Lincoln, Springfield, Illinois. He then went to a room and sat down, waiting events. In less than half an hour it was all over the city that Old Abe was there on his way to South Carolina, to argue the point with Keitt, Yancey, Commodore Berry and other secessionists. A rush was made to his room, when he coolly told them they were sold. He was not lynched. After enjoying their discomfiture at not getting their names "on the slate," he treated them all to liquor.

An amusing scene occurred on the cars near Cincinnati last week. A respectable elderly gentleman, who bears a great resemblance to the Mormon apostle, was mistaken for that polygamous vagabond by an ancient and lovesick spinster. She forthwith proposed to be one of his spiritual wives, sealed or unsealed, as the case may be. The old gentleman, who is a venerable deacon of the Methodist profession, was so scandalized that, after administering a serious rebuke to the antediluvian wanton, he left the train at the next station, to the utter confusion of the disappointed damsel.

The corn crop of Illinois this year will amount to one hundred and ten millions of bushels—worth to the producers at least twenty five millions of dollars—more than ten times the quantity produced by the whole of New England.

Henry Froelich, for some time past barkeeper at the Galt House, Louisville, recently visited New Orleans with $300 in his pocket, and accompanied by two young men, whose fare he paid, and whom he made his room-mates. He is supposed to have been gradually robbed by them, and was finally turned out of his hotel and his trunk detained. Unable to get employment, he committed suicide by taking chloroform.

It is supposed that Crowley, who killed Bund with a mallet last week, at the store 78 Nassau street, sailed in the Persia, which left the same day. The murder was, like most murders, caused by rum.

The body of William Dolson, a colored man, was found dead on Wednesday at one of the limekilns belonging to Col. William R. Brown, at New Mills, N. Y. The deceased entered the shed about ten o'clock on Tuesday night, and is supposed to have died from the inhalation of the burning limestone.

On Saturday last Charles Gregory, son of Dudley S. Gregory, Esq., of Jersey City, was united to Miss Maury. A considerable gathering of the Gregory family was present, among them being the Major Dudley Gregory and his charming wife.

LIFE ON THE TURNING OF A CARD.

The following anecdote of early times in West Tennessee is strictly true. It appears that some eighteen or twenty years since a well-known resident of Tipton county was put on his trial, charged with the murder of his wife. As usual in such cases, popular feeling was largely against him, and all the eloquence and ingenuity of his counsel were required to make any impression in his favor upon a jury, which, however impartial it might desire to be in the consciousness of sworn duty, could not but see the waves of popular prejudice surging in upon it.

The case was ably argued. The counsel for the defence made most vigorous and impassioned appeals. The case was submitted to the jury, and they retired to consider their verdict. Time passed—and as the setting sun warned all of the approaching night, the large throng in attendance, the judge, counsel, &c., retired—all anxious, the accused not the least so, to learn the verdict of the jury, and some wondering that the jury hesitated for one moment to bring in a verdict of "Guilty." In the meantime the jury had come to a point beyond which they could progress no further. The appeals of the counsel for the defence had not been without their influence, and the jury stood unchangeable, six for conviction and six for acquittal. Something had to be done. In those days twelve good fellows could not be got together for a night only to sleep. Cards appeared mysteriously from the depths of sundry large pockets, and a game called "seven-up and poker" was zealously commenced.

About midnight, one of their number, Colonel Pierce, proposed they should play a game of seven-up, the result to decide the verdict. The proposition was heartily and unanimously agreed to in all seriousness, and the lookers-on collected around Colonel Pierce and his opponent, who proceeded to play the game on which was staked a human life.

Colonel Pierce played to save the accused. His opponent played, and quite as zealously, to secure the conviction. The backers, five and five, stood behind them, encouraging the champions and watching the game, dimly seen by the light of two tallow candles, with the utmost interest.

The game proceeded with very equal fortune, till both parties stood at six and six. It was Colonel Pierce's deal; he dealt, and turned up a jack. The prisoner was acquitted, and every member in the jury joined in the shout, which startled the whole village, even the revellers in the tavern. Next morning the jury went into court and gave, to the astonishment of many, the verdict of "Not guilty." The juryman who played an unsuccessful game for human life still lives—a much respected citizen of the district. One of the counsel is a very distinguished member of the Memphis bar, and the accused has, as we believe, gone to a higher court; but neither of them, nor any of the assemblage, nor the court, who marvelled at the verdict, eighteen years ago, have ever known that a human life was saved by turning up a Jack!

UR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

☞ Diagrams of Remarkable Shots, Reports of Billiard Matches, or Items of Interest concerning the game, addressed to the Editor of this column, will be thankfully received and published.

To Correspondents.—All questions sent to Mr. Phelan in reference to the rules of the game of billiards will in future be answered in this column. It would be too much labor to send written answers to so many correspondents.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Islip, L.I., 30th November, 1860.

M. Phelan, Esq.—Dear Sir—In playing a game of billiards, my antagonist, endeavoring to hole the red ball, left it balanced on the edge of the pocket. I also played to hole it, but, before my ball reached it, it (the red) dropped into the pocket and my ball followed it. My adversary claims a forfeit, and also insists that I lose my shot. What is the rule? Answer in column, and oblige
An Amateur.

Ans.—Sections fourth and fifth of Rule VIII. ("Game of Billiards," page 181) states, that when the cue ball or the object ball, resting on the edge of a pocket, drops into it before the striker has time to play, the marker must replace the ball. There is no forfeit, and you are entitled to your shot from the same position as before.

W. S., Newhaven.—You should have played with sufficient strength to pass below the deep red ball. You lose your choice.

L. L., Nashville, Tenn.—Mr. H. Roy's shot has been received. M. Berger has not as yet decided as to what route he will take, or in what order he will visit the various cities.

Concord, N. H.—Thirteen shot received, and will be published.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

M. Berger in Boston.—M. Berger commenced operations in the Modern Athens on the 30th November, by a private entertainment at Alston Hall, to which a limited number of the patrons of the game were specially invited. The ladies were represented on the occasion, and the audience numbered about one hundred persons. Before taking the cue, M. Berger made a brief address to the audience.

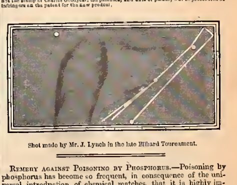
A carom game of 100 points was then commenced by Messrs. Berger and Phelan, both gentlemen meeting with a flattering recognition by the spectators, the game being won by M. Berger. M. Berger's fancy shots were very much applauded. On the next evening, Wednesday, 21st November, the first public exhibition took place, in the same hall, about two hundred and fifty persons being present. Many of the prominent citizens of Boston were present; among them James Lawrence, Esq., and Professor Longfellow, the gifted author of "Evangeline" and "Hiawatha." On the evening of Thursday a large audience also greeted M. Berger, who played with Mr. Phelan, with about the same average result as in New York. On Friday evening, Mr. Phelan's place was supplied by an amateur, Mr. Banks, brother to Governor Banks. The game was a discount one, and was won by M. Berger, Mr. Banks, however, showing himself to be a player of considerable ability. An afternoon exhibition was given on Saturday, in the presence of a large audience, M. Berger playing with Mr Phelan and winning. At the evening exhibition, M. Berger discounted Mr. Howe, of Brighton, the latter gentleman scoring 31 to the former's 100.

M. Berger's success in Boston has been so great, that he has concluded to stay another week in that city. On his return, he will visit Providence, R.I.

Mr. Phelan has been obliged, by pressure of business engagements, to return to New York. On the evening previous to his departure from Boston, he visited Captain Horan's Rooms, in Bowdoin square, opposite the Revere House, now the rendezvous of all the connoisseurs of billiards in Boston, where about one thousand persons were assembled to meet him. Mr P. played two discount games with Mr Howe, of Brighton, and won both, running out the last one from the lead. This feat was loudly applauded.

A Long Run.—Mr. L——n, one of the best amateurs of the New York Club, lately made, on a carom table, a run of 150 consecutive caroms on the red and white ball. The balls were jammed in a corner.

Important Patents.—We see by the official report of the Patent Office, just issued, that the vulcanizing patent of Charles Goodyear has been re-issued in two patents, one for the process of manufacture employed, and the other for the new manufacture, or substance produced. And that all persons who sell or use vulcanized rubber for billiard cushions, whether manufactured in the United States or imported from foreign countries, which has not the stamp of Charles Goodyear, the patentee, and date of patent, will be prosecuted as infringers on the patent for the new product.



Shot made by Mr. J. Lynch in the late Billiard Tournament.

Remedy against Poisoning by Phosphorus.—Poisoning by phosphorus has become so frequent, in consequence of the universal introduction of chemical matches, that it is highly important to make every one acquainted with the best means of counteracting the effects of that substance, in order that speedy relief may be afforded to those who may have had the misfortune to take some. The Medizinisch-Chirurgische Monatschrift, a German medical paper, proposes calcined magnesia as the best remedy for the purpose, stated to have been largely experimented on by Drs. Antonelli and Borsarelli. In cases of poisoning by phosphorus, or by any other substance containing that metalloid, the administration of fatty substances should be avoided; because, far from attenuating the effects of the poison, they increase its energy and facilitate its diffusion. Calcined magnesia should be administered in large quantities, suspended in water that has been exposed to ebullition. In cases of dysuria occasioned by phosphorus, the best remedy is acetate of potash. All mucilaginous beverages administered to the patient should be prepared with water that has boiled, in order that they may contain as little atmospheric air as possible.

SCENE ON THE HUDSON RIVER, LOOKING TOWARDS NEWBURG.—TAKEN FROM THE RESIDENCE OF GEN. MORRIS, AT COLD SPRING

VIEW ON THE HUDSON RIVER, LOOKING TOWARDS NEWBURG.

THE exquisite beauty of the scenery of the North River has been so often sung in poetry, referred to in prose and depicted on canvas, that it would seem to be mere reiteration were we to enlarge upon it at this time. One point of especial beauty we have engraved this week. It was sketched from Undercliff, the seat of General George P. Morris, at Cold Spring. The rolling Hudson, after passing West Point and Cold Spring, first narrows at the base of two mighty hills, and then expands into a noble bay at Newburg. From General Morris's house the surrounding hills give to this large expanse of water the appearance of a beautiful lake. At all seasons of the year this view is charming, but in the leafy summer time it is inexpressibly lovely.

VISIT OF RALPH FARNHAM.

One of the most interesting incidents connected with the recent visit of the Prince of Wales to this country, was the interview between him and that sole survivor of the heroes of Bunker's Hill, Ralph Farnham. It having been named to the Prince that the old soldier would be glad to see him, the Prince sent him an invitation to visit him at his hotel. Their meeting was very cordial, the Prince rising, taking the old gentleman by the hand and leading him to a seat. After some introductory remarks, Mr. Farnham said that he had heard so much in favor of the Prince that he was half afraid his people were turning royalists. As for himself he had come to tell the Prince that he had no unpleasant feelings towards him or his family on the old score. The Duke of Newcastle then made several inquiries as to the veteran's recollection of the great struggle, and was told by Mr. Farnham that he was present at the surrender of General Burgoyne. He observed that the latter was a fine man and a brave soldier, but being very short of provisions he had been obliged to surrender.

THE RESIDENCE OF RALPH FARNHAM, AT ACTON, MAINE.

"Yes, Mr. Farnham," said the Duke, "you had him there."

Old Farnham laughed, and after exchanging autographs with the Prince, with whom he shook hands with great warmth, this noble specimen of our revolutionary heroes took his departure.

Ralph Farnham was born in 1756, and enlisted in his nineteenth year, and was marched with other recruits to Cambridge, where Washington was commanding the American forces. He served with the army in three campaigns, from 1775 to 1777, and was a guard at the camp when Burgoyne surrendered to General Gates. He had many opportunities of seeing Washington, whose memory he highly venerates. At the close of the war, in 1785, he went to reside on the farm at Acton, Maine, where he has lived ever since. It was then a wilderness overrun with bears and other wild beasts. Taking possession of one hundred acres, he built himself a log cabin and lived alone until 1794, when he married a neighbor's daughter, Mehitabel Bean. She bore him several children, five of which are still living. His wife died twenty-three years ago. He has voted for every President that ever ruled over this country, and modestly remarks he hopes to vote for several more. We are glad to record that during his recent visit to Boston above seven hundred dollars were raised and presented to him. His memory is very perfect, more especially as to events which happened in his youth, and he conveyes with great freedom on the events of the Revolution.

CAPT. HENRY CLAY PATE, OF VIRGINIA.

Albert Edward P.

Ralph Farnham

On this page we give a portrait of Mr. Farnham and a picture of the house in which he has resided, with his daughter, a lady of seventy-five, for the last eighty years.

CAPTAIN HENRY CLAY PATE.

CAPTAIN HENRY CLAY PATE, whose adventures in Kansas have given him so great a notoriety, is, we believe, a native of Petersburg, Virginia, and first became prominent in the early disturbances in the border districts. Our readers will, no doubt, recollect that he was taken prisoner by Ossawattomie Brown, in the famous battle of Black Jack. After Brown's capture at Harper's Ferry, Captain Pate paid him a visit in prison at Charlestown, which of course was of a mutually hostile character. After Brown's execution he published a life of that person, and made an elaborate defence of his own conduct in the Kansas troubles.

Captain Pate is now a resident of Norfolk, Virginia, and has, we are told, announced his intention of avoiding in future the stormy path of controversial politics.

A SEAMAN DEVOURED BY A SHARK.—While the bark Jessie, from Quebec and Fernando Po, was lying at the latter port, a seaman, named William Looney, a native of County Cork, went on shore for a few hours. Having missed the return boat, he stripped off his jacket and waistcoat, tied them up in his handkerchief, which he carried in his mouth, and plunged into the sea, intending to swim to the ship, which lay about three ships' length from the shore. He had been in the water but a few minutes before a large shark was seen approaching. A cry was raised by the seamen on board, and two gallant fellows jumped into the boat and made every effort to extricate their companion from the awful fate which awaited him. Looney literally swam for life, straining every nerve to escape from the monster, which drew nearer and nearer every instant. It was, however, all in vain; the shark overtook the exhausted seaman, and those on deck were horror-stricken at seeing a companion swallowed by this monster of the deep. The shrieks of the poor fellow when seeing his assailant within a few yards were heartrending.

RALPH FARNHAM, THE LAST SURVIVOR OF THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL.

THE RESIDENCE OF KIT CARSON, IN TAOS CITY, NEW MEXICO.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. D. RICHARDSON, ESQ.

A VISIT TO KIT CARSON.

By A. D. Richardson.

KIT CARSON, the renowned hunter and mountaineer, after a career checkered with incidents of wild excitement, imminent peril, and sometimes of heroic daring, has settled in northern New Mexico, and is now leading a quiet, domestic life. It was the good fortune of the writer, a few months ago, to pass several days under his pleasant roof, and to learn something of those traits of his character which have made his name so widely known throughout the country. His residence in the city of Taos is a popular place of resort for travellers passing through the country, and one often meets there a motley array of Americans, Mexicans and Indians.

Mr. Carson is a short, stoutly built man, with straight brown hair, mild eyes and a round, kindly face. In his ordinary plain attire and broad-brimmed hat, you might take him for an Illinois farmer, of Quaker descent; but his countenance, upon a second look, exhibits marked indications of character. When standing, his appearance reminds one of the Hoosier girl's description of Senator Douglas; he seems to possess "an in-fy-nite small chance of legs," but he sits upon a horse like a king. I have never seen a man presenting a more regal aspect than this veteran mountaineer, when mounted upon his favorite steed, and dashing along like the wind. Fondness for hard riding is the only one of his old nomadic habits which he seems to retain; he thinks nothing of a ride of seventy-five or a hundred miles in a single day. "A running horse," saith the old proverb, "is an open sepulchre;" but Mr. Carson is wonderfully robust and vigorous for a man who has spent so much of his life upon a yawning grave. I spoke feelingly upon this subject, having enjoyed the dubious satisfaction of a break-neck ride of eighty miles among the mountains with Mr. Carson, while greatly weakened and reduced by recent illness. The trip ultimately proved invigorating and health-inspiring; but it is still an open question whether the remedy was not nearly as bad as the disease.

Like most persons of real courage, he is modest and retiring, never alluding to his own exploits except in reply to direct questions. His adventures with the Indians of the Far West, however, have been varied and thrilling; he can, if he will, relate many incidents

> "Of most dangerous chances,
> Of moving accidents by flood and field,
> Of hair-breadth 'scapes

His experiences in the matter of diet have been more extensive than those of most men. He deems the flesh of a wild horse the best meat he ever tasted. A fat mule is not altogether unpalatable; but when the animal is old and poor he does not deem its flesh inviting. The most sorrowful repast he ever took was upon the Pacific slope, several years ago, when necessity compelled him to kill and eat of a faithful horse which had borne him several hundred miles.

The happiest days of his life were passed during his long residence as a trapper among the Rocky Mountains. He spent ten years in this fascinating career, his ordinary fare consisting of fresh beaver and buffalo meat, without salt, bread or vegetables of any kind. Once or twice a year, when the supplies arrived from "the States," such luxuries as flour and coffee were enjoyed for a single meal, though they cost one dollar per pint. During the winter, when visiting their traps twice a day, he and his companions were often compelled to break through the ice and wade in the cold water up to their waists. Notwithstanding these hardships, infractions of every hygienic law, and the irregular habits of some of them, sickness was absolutely unknown. He cannot recollect that during his whole residence in the mountains a single one of the trappers (ranging in number from one to three hundred) ever died from disease. They were sometimes killed by the Indians; but the wonderfully healthy air of the mountains seemed a panoply against ill-health.

VILLAGE OF THE PUEBLOS INDIANS, NEAR TAOS, NEW MEXICO.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. D. RICHARDSON, ESQ.

Mr. Carson enjoyed no educational facilities in his youth, and reads and writes but indifferently. He speaks English, French, Spanish and several Indian tongues, however, with fluency, and in his intercourse with the world has acquired much practical information. He is a gentleman by instinct, and is respected and loved, alike by Americans, Mexicans and Indians. He is the government agent for a branch of the "Ute" or Utah Indians—a position which yields him about fifteen hundred dollars per year, and which he will undoubtedly hold as long as he desires. He has a handsome competence, however, independently of his salary, and is surrounded by the comforts of life. Now about fifty years of age, and enjoying the full vigor of manly health and activity, he seeks, in his pleasant home, that quiet and rest to which he was so long a stranger. His wife is a Spanish lady of the better class, and he has a family of interesting children. He is a native of Kentucky, but removed to Missouri when very young; and since he was twenty years of age, his home has been upon the great plains and among the mountains. The race of trappers, of which he is one of the finest specimens, is now nearly extinct.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c., &c.

CHAPTER VIII.

He started, and beheld with dizzy eyes
What seemed the substance of a happy dream
Stand there before him, spreading a warm glow,
Within the green gloom of the shadowy oak.
It seemed a woman's shape, yet all too fair
To be a woman, and with eyes too meek
For any that were wont to mate with gods.—Lowell.

Aye! where was Philip Avon?

Cyril Kingswood, whose life had been aimed by Tubal Kish, just caught a glimpse of that scoundrel as, finding his murderous intention defeated, he plunged into the thicket from which he had emerged and disappeared.

Precisely at the same moment, the rein of Lady Maud's steed was torn rudely from his hand, a shriek burst from the lips of Lady Kingswood, and with amazement he beheld Lady Maud clinging to her saddle in terror, her steed in full flight, with Erle and Philip Avon in mad chase after her.

A few hasty reassuring words to his mother, a hurried request to the Marquis of Chillingham to attend to her safety, and he joined in the pursuit.

After a few minutes' hard galloping, he saw the route Lady Maud's horse was taking, and at once took a circuitous course with a view of outflanking it. But her affrighted beast suddenly diverged from the route in which it had directed its headlong flight, galloped furiously down a tremendous ravine, and thence into the open beyond, which he knew to be fenced with a stone wall rather higher than the Lady Maud's horse, frightened as it was, was likely to dare.

Beneath this wall he expected to find all—he only found one.

He had observed Erle sitting upon his steed with the firm and motionless seat of an accomplished jockey. He saw that Philip Avon was acting like a frenzied madman.

With an excitement almost amounting to convulsion, he saw the Lady Maud's horse clear the wall, leaving a cloud of dust behind, so that he imagined the animal must have fallen. With a cry of exultation he beheld another go over it with a flying leap. For a moment he saw no more, for a throng of grateful tears rushed into his eyes.

He dashed them away, and the next sight was Philip Avon beneath the wall, beating his horse with brutal violence, trying to compel him to a leap he had not the courage to attempt.

He saw the horse wheel round and round, dash with desperate wildness away, to be again and again put to the wall, up to which, with whip and spur, Philip, distracted with passion, urged him furiously. Suddenly the contest between man and horse became terrible. The horse, infuriated by the treatment he had received, plunged, leaped, reared, kicked and eventually flung his rider with terrific violence, and galloped away in the direction he had come.

A few seconds more and Cyril was up at the wall. Beneath it, on his back, lay extended the form of Philip Avon. His face was pale, his eyes were closed, his teeth were clenched, blood and froth were oozing from his lips, his hands were clutched, and Cyril's first impression was that he had been sent to his long account while in the full fury of a paroxysm of intemperate passion.

He raised himself in the saddle and looked over the wall. Far away fled Maud's horse, closely followed by Erle's. Both seemed well and firmly fixed in their seats, and Cyril had a strong hope that his cousin would be safely rescued by her young but brave pursuer.

He alighted, raised the head of Philip and laid it upon his knee, awaiting the signs of returning animation.

Away in the distance he caught a glimpse of Lady Kingswood and the Marquis of Chillingham following, and he waved his hand to them to hurry forward and join him, that he might be enabled to adopt some plan for procuring assistance.

In the meanwhile, Erle, having permitted the tears of Lady Maud to have their way in silence, then addressed a few words of congratulation and sympathy to her. He sought to inspire her anew with confidence and courage to remount her steed that they might return to her friends, and so put a stop to the agony of excitement it was natural they should be laboring under.

Especially was he anxious to give her no opportunity to dwell on the danger she had just escaped, for he feared that if she did the return might even yet be more difficult than the flight.

She listened to him in silence for a time, then she turned her trembling eyes upon him glistening with tears. It was worth a life-purchase to have been the recipient of that look.

No words could describe it—no pencil depict it. Erle felt faint as his own glowing eyes met and interpreted it, and his bosom heaved with a proud, exulting joy, such as he had never before known.

She stretched out her hand and took his. The one trembled in the other. Her soft, intense blue eye, after lingering on his, turned slowly upon the yielding grass; her voice was low and unsteady as she spoke, in reply to his reassuring words.

"Gratitude such as mine, Mr. Gower," she said, "has but a poor choice of epithets to express its real force, but yet——"

"Pardon me, Lady Maud," he interposed, gently, "this is no time to think about me. I overheard your fervent offering of thanks to Heaven for your escape from danger; and the next consideration is your safe return, to relieve the painful anxiety of those awaiting you. We have some distance to recover, and your strength will hardly be more than equal to the task. Some day, dear Lady Maud, when the days are long and the topics are scarce, then we will exchange sentiments upon the events of this day. Pray let me assist you to mount. See, your steed has recovered from its fright, and is quiet enough now. Besides, I observe a bridle-path down the hill, and I will lead him on foot."

Large, glittering tears filled Lady Maud's eyelids and trickled down her cheek as she bowed assent to his suggestion, and permitted Erle to help her into her saddle again.

If ever Erle was certain of one thing in his life, it was that when she took his hand there was a pressure given by her soft, small fingers on his own, which made its presence known to every nerve in his frame. If he was certain of another thing, it was that the vibration of the nerves thus caused created a sense of felicity which was well nigh overpowering.

Passing the rein of his own horse, which, after its severe race, had taken to quietly grazing, over his arm, he took the bridle of Lady Maud's in his hand, and slowly descended the hill.

On reaching the dale beneath, he found that he was compelled to pursue a circuitous route in order to reach a spot where a gap existed in the old stone wall, and having done this, to take a yet wider range to avoid the ravine, down which they had descended fast enough, but up which it would be far too severe a task to attempt to toil.

In consequence of this deviation from a direct track, they entered the Chace at a very different spot to that at which they had quitted it.

Erle was not without a knowledge of woodcraft and directed his steps to the point as well as he could judge where Kingswood Manor House stood; but after he had passed down successive alleys and over various glades, he arrived at the unwelcome conclusion that they were lost in the forest.

The sun had been for some time obscured by a veil of grey clouds so even in color that as he looked upward through the trees, he could not detect the direction in which it was journeying; he found it therefore impossible to ascertain to what quarter of the compass he was wandering.

Baffled and perplexed, he came to a full stop, and turned his eyes anxiously in every direction, and then on Lady Maud's face. He saw there a reassuring smile.

"You have missed the path to the house?" she suggested.

He smiled too, and shook his head.

"In truth I have not yet found it, Lady Maud," he replied, in a voice far more cheerful than his feelings warranted. A night in the woods was a prospect which he did not contemplate with any satisfaction, yet, so far as he could calculate, that appeared to be an event looming with only too much probability. "I doubt much," he added, "whether any path does exist, nor I fear a clue or token save such as are known to those who make this solitary wood their home. This is evidently a part of Kingswood Chace, but in what direction Kingswood Manor House lies I am at a loss to conceive."

He was startled by a faint cry of surprise issuing from the lips of Lady Maud, as she turned her eyes suddenly on some object behind him.

He turned sharply round and beheld, to his amazement, the young female rescued from Tubal Kish by Cyril Kingswood, in which act he himself had borne a share, standing beneath a tree, eyeing them with a look of curious wonder. She was tall and delicately formed, her face was pale, her eyes dark, large and lustrous, her nose thin and straight, her lips small, her face oval, and the aspect of all combined singularly beautiful. In effect, her appearance was spiritual—it scarcely seemed real, even though her attire was earthly enough. She wore upon her head a hat not unlike that which the Lady Maud had on, but in place of a waving feather, white, star-like wild flowers were twined gracefully round it. Upon her shoulders rested a cloak of rich mulberry hue, of texture sufficiently thin to permit it to hang gracefully, leaving exposed an alabaster neck, round and swan-like. Her dress was a pale fawn color, and contrasted beautifully with the deep, warm purple of the cloak.

Whence had she sprung? A moment before they had passed the very spot where she now stood, yet no trace of her had been visible. She looked not like a denizen of the woods, but it was clear to Erle, at least, that she roamed them at will.

After a minute, or even more, expended in gazing on each other, Erle addressed her.

At the sound of his voice she started and half turned, as if, like a frightened fawn, to fly, but as he modulated his voice to a tone of softness, she paused.

"We have lost ourselves in the Chace," he said, "and would return to Kingswood Manor House. If you can point out the path we ought to take, you would confer a very important obligation upon this lady and myself."

She gazed stedfastly at him all the time he spoke, and seemed as if trying to remember where she had before seen his face.

Emerging with timid steps from the shadow of the interlaced trees in which she had stood, she approached them with more of the manner of a shrinking Indian girl than an English maiden reared in the precincts of an old forest.

She bent her eyes once or twice on Lady Maud, rather with a look of inquiry than fear. But she settled her gaze on Erle's face with an eager, perusing look, as though she had seen those features if not in reality, in her dreams, or desired to so imprint them on her memory that she should never more forget them. After a slight pause, Erle repeated his request, and a change passed over her face.

"It is far hence," she at length replied, in a low, silvery voice, "and the way is both dangerous and dreary."

"I fear neither, so that I am made acquainted with the track," responded Erle. "If you can point it out, I entreat you to do so, for there are many awaiting our return in dread anxiety."

"No doubt Cyril is in search of us," observed Lady Maud, suddenly.

The strange maiden started as the name reached her ear. She turned her full, brilliant eyes on Lady Maud with an eager, almost wild earnestness.

"He is acquainted with all parts of the Chace," continued the Lady Maud, reddening, she knew not why, as she observed the fixed, searching look of the stranger. "His loud calls will no doubt enable us, if we proceed, to join him."

Erle glanced askance at the forest maiden as he said,

"He will grieve to think we have wandered so fruitlessly thus long."

The beautiful young stranger turned her face slowly to his, and in a low voice murmured,

"Follow me."

She immediately moved in the direction she had already been pursuing. Erle, with an exclamation of surprise, ere he retraced his steps, pointed into the more open glade with his whip, and said,

"Is not that the easier and more direct path?"

She raised her finger, and in an undertone ejaculated,

"Tubal Kish!"

"The scoundrel!" muttered Erle, in an angry tone. "He bears upon his cheek the mark of my lash given him this day. I fear not to encounter a ruffian such as he."

A perceptible shudder ran through the frame of Lady Maud.

"Pray, Mr. Gower, let us pursue the way in which we shall be most likely free from molestation," she said, hurriedly.

He bowed, and led her horse and his own into the path which the forest maiden had selected.

"Who is Tubal Kish?" inquired Lady Maud, after they had proceeded a considerable distance, as if with a design to break the solemn silence reigning beneath that great vault of leaves.

The forest maiden slackened her pace to listen to Erle's reply.

"A ruffian, who infests this wood," he answered. "Of his history I know nothing. I have seen him twice," he continued, and remembering himself, he hastily, and with some slight embarrassment, related the incident which had that morning taken place, by which both Cyril and Lady Maud had nearly lost their lives.

When he ceased, the forest maiden abruptly said to Erle,

"You saved her?"

She pointed to Lady Maud. He nodded assent.

"And him!"

She pointed across the wood. Erle comprehended her, and again nodded in reply.

Her features broke into a smile of grateful pleasure, and her eyes danced and glittered joyously, as they rested on Erle's face. Suddenly her eye grew dull, and her face clouded.

"Beware of Tubal Kish," she said, in clearer and graver tones than she had yet used. "You have struck him a blow; he will kill you."

Erle laughed scornfully.

"It is not my fate to fall by the hand of a coarse wretch like him," he returned.

A brilliant flash, and the loud report of a gun close to them, made Lady Maud scream, and both horses started back affrighted.

The forest maiden gripped Erle by the wrist.

"The gamekeepers at Kingswood," she exclaimed; "they will guide you now. We shall meet again—that I feel! Look to her, she is fainting with fright."

She pointed as she concluded to Lady Maud, and Erle sprang to her side.

"We are safe!" he exclaimed; "cease all future fear. Lord Kingswood's gamekeepers are within a few yards of us."

At this moment a couple of dogs burst through the underwood, and commenced baying loudly.

"Ho! ho! hillioh!" shouted a voice not far from them. Erle instantly responded, and almost instantly the thick boughs were parted aside, and two gamekeepers, attended by three or four beaters, appeared, to the very undisguised satisfaction of Lady Maud.

Erle turned to thank the handsome young creature who had thus safely conducted them hither, but as he expected, she was nowhere visible.

Lady Maud, too, made inquiry respecting her, and he informed her that she had disappeared without waiting for the tribute of thanks she was anxious to pay her.

The head gamekeeper, who recognised Lady Maud and Erle, too, as a guest at the house, very readily offered to act as their guide for the remainder of the distance.

"You are but a short way from the house, my lady," the man exclaimed, with a smile, very respectful nevertheless. "You could not have been lost here," he added.

"Probably not," returned Erle; "we were far hence when we lost ourselves."

"A young person—something beyond a village maiden in position—guided us hither," exclaimed Lady Maud.

The gamekeeper looked at both in silence for a moment. Then as if it was imperative upon him to speak beneath his breath, he said, in a whisper,

"Eh! but you have seen the Wonder of Kingswood Chace."

A slight moan escaped the lips of Lady Maud, and a flashing glance went from the eye of Erle to the gamekeeper, and the rest of the way was performed in silence.

As they slowly entered the park, they perceived a group of persons gathered together, some hastily mounting horses, others already mounted, making extravagant gestures, pointing in various directions, and shouting instructions to horsemen in the act of galloping away.

The gamekeeper blew a blast on his horn, and all eyes were turned upon Lady Maud and Erle.

In an instant, the whole party came rushing up to them, and shouts of joy and lusty rejoicings resounded as soon as it was found that Lady Maud had escaped unhurt.

The poor girl was so overpowered by this reception that she could only, with some hysterical, inarticulate sounds, point to Erle, and then fainted.

There were almost too many assistants to lift her from her horse, and bear her into the house, where, she, under the direction of, and accompanied by, Lady Kingswood, was conveyed to her chamber, and properly attended to.

Erle, in the meantime, "the observed of all observers," was surrounded on all sides, eagerly questioned and vehemently eulogised for his gallantry. He found that Cyril had returned, accompanied by Lady Kingswood, the Marquis of Chillingham and Philip Avon.

He was told of Philip Avon's mishap. It appeared that he was stunned, bruised, shaken, but not otherwise hurt, and Cyril had brought him back, not in a very dignified position, mounted upon his own steed.

Until the arrival of Erle and the Lady Maud, the fate of the latter—nay, of both—was unknown. Their appearance, uninjured, it may be understood, was the source of much gratification.

Cyril was especially enthusiastic in his encomiums upon Erle's high-couraged devotion to the pursuit of Lady Maud's affrighted steed; and he related, now the danger was over, with much gusto, the frightful character of the chace which had taken place, especially the leap before which Philip Avon succumbed, amid the well-bred yet hearty applause of those who surrounded him as they moved slowly towards the manor-house.

There were two persons who stood aloof from this gathering; one, Lord Kingswood, whose agitation, no less than his vexation, could not be concealed. Erle, it seemed, do as he might, compelled the attention of every one, and called forth questions and observations most galling, most inconvenient, ill-timed and embarrassing. After this incident, he resolved to send him away from Kingswood, and place him where his popularity would not prove so disconcerting.

The other was Philip Avon.

He had entered the house earth-soiled, and his brain racking with agony, made a few inquiries respecting the corridor Erle was likely to pass through on his way to dress for dinner, and had taken up his station in a recess, where he could remain unseen until the moment that he wished to make his presence known.

Erle, only too glad to escape from the congratulations, which were more embarrassing than grateful, hurried to his apartment, on the plea of fatigue, and to his surprise, in the dim obscurity of a long corridor, he found himself intercepted by the sudden appearance of Philip Avon, with a white face, and frowning malignantly.

"Stay!" cried the latter, in a hoarse tone. "I seek a word or two with you."

Erle looked at him for a moment with angry eyes. Then recovering himself, he said,

"Before I interchange a sentence with you, let me remind you that you threatened to cut me down, when the life of one dear to many was at stake, because I ventured in her behalf. I kept the path you could not take. Now I dare you to fulfil your threat!"

"Oh, be sure a time will come for that," returned Philip, between his teeth. "What I now would say——"

"I desire to hear nothing from your lips," cried Erle, haughtily. "Stand out of my path now; I am engaged."

He thrust Philip Avon so violently back, as he uttered his words, that he fell.

"When you wish to seek me," he said, turning a scornful glance upon the prostrate form, "you know where and when I can be met with; until then, keep your speech for those whom it pleaseth. I like it not."

With those words, he strode from the spot, and entered his chamber.

Philip Avon sprung up, and would have followed him, but that some servants entered the corridor; he was, therefore, compelled to retire, convulsed with malicious fury, and resolving to have a bitter revenge for the insult he had just received.

CHAPTER IX.

Good Hubert, Hubert, Hubert, throw thine eye
On yon young boy: I tell thee what, my friend,
He is a very serpent in my way;
And wheresoe'er this foot of mine doth tread,
He lies before me: Dost thou understand me?—Shakespeare.

Lord Kingswood had no sooner ascertained that Lady Maud had been rescued by Erle, and that both were unhurt, than he hurried to the privacy of his library, in order to escape from the observations poured into his ears on all sides respecting Erle.

Congratulations he could have accepted with condescending equanimity of manner, but remarks connecting the gallantry of Erle with an illustrious origin, his high spirit with gentle lineage, his unflinching, sustained resolution, and noble devotion to unsullied blood, springing from a lofty fount, were to him especially distasteful, if not offensive.

They were as well embarrassing, for they seemed to call forth explanations which he was reluctant to offer, because he knew that they must necessarily be a tissue of falsehoods.

His situation, altogether, was what he considered cruelly perplexing. An interregnum of years had passed untroubled. He had for a time forgotten his unhappy victim and the child purloined by his directions, and supposed by him to have afterwards died. Even conscience, which had now and then dealt him a sharp thrust, slumbered—perhaps thrust out of the way by ambition—a door was opened to him to achieve political influence, if not distinction. The world smiled, fawned upon him, and was beginning to bow down to him. Even at the very instant when, with exulting smile, he was mentally contemplating the shining path to gilded honors glowing before him, Ishmael Malpas intruded upon him like a spirit of darkness. His glorious vision was shattered at a blow, and he discovered himself struggling in dark and troubled waters. His first distraction was softened by his interview with Erle, and in spite of the suggestions and menaces of Ishmael he decided on keeping the boy secluded until he had resolved what he should do with him. Lady Kingswood had, however, defeated that intention; she had forced Erle from his seclusion, had paraded him, a nameless unknown, as it were, before his guests; had compelled him, Lord Kingswood, to make an unfortunate admission respecting Erle to the Marquis of Chillingham, and had contributed to bring about the incident of the morning, which would of course be speedily noised over the county.

All hope of keeping Erle at Kingswood unnoticed or unregarded was thus dissipated. It was clear that he would be the lion at that day's dinner party, which was to be increased by numerous invites sent out days before Erle's unwelcome arrival. And it was equally clear that the coined story of his extraction would be sifted, the Army List searched, and every person within reach of question by mouth or letter, bearing the name of Gower, would be examined as to the degree of relationship borne by him or them to this youth, or whether he was connected with them by any ties of affinity at all.

It was also as unpleasantly certain that, if the visitors at Kingswood Manor did not pursue this investigation, Lady Kingswood would.

Here was his great, almost overwhelming difficulty, and, after all, it was this very difficulty which drove him to his library.

The inquisitive researches and tattling gossip of fleerers and talkers, though annoying, and in some respects calculated to prove vexatiously inconvenient, became a matter of trifling consideration when compared with the gravity of the searching investigation likely to be pursued by Lady Kingswood, and the results which must follow her discovery of the real truth.

With Erle a constant resident beneath his roof, Lady Kingswood's suspicions would be always receiving fresh stimulus. The very sight of him would foster and keep alive her curiosity, and induce her to harbor the wildest conjectures, of which, as he knew by experience, she would not fail to give him the full benefit.

If he could manage to get rid of Erle, if he could only arrange to successfully set him down for life in Russian America, at Jeddo in Japan, or in the miasmatic region between Central K'hutu and the base of the Nsagara Mountains in East Africa, the very delicate subject of his origin, as well as the fact of his existence, might fade from the memory of Lady Kingswood. But with him ever in her eyes, the desire to make herself acquainted with every fact connected with his parentage, and the true cause of the interest Lord Kingswood, in spite of himself, was compelled to acknowledge that he took in him, would be followed by every possible effort to satisfy it. Lord Kingswood knew only too well that she would unscrupulously employ any agency, or resort to any means she could grasp to satisfy her curiosity, and it became really a matter of importance to his pride as well as to his domestic peace to remove far away the object of his uneasiness.

It was not difficult to reach this conclusion, but the consequences were to be considered.

It was impossible to ignore the existence of Ishmael Malpas, or, as he knew him, Horace Vernon. He remembered his character only too well. Firm, determined, daring, as a boy, he was no less resolute, energetic, fearless as a young man. Steadfast, persevering, undiscouraged by check or difficulty, it was his nature to pursue his course until he had obtained the object for which he worked.

Lork Kingswood knew so much of him, and he had in the time long past found it hard to reconcile his conduct respecting the loss of the woman he loved with the qualities he knew him to possess. His lordship, when he had successfully perpetrated his act of villainy in seducing his victim from the man who really loved her, expected that man to call him to account. His lordship was a dead shot, and a perfect master of fence; he calculated upon a duel, in which he should either wing his opponent with a bullet, or pierce the fleshy part of his sword-arm, or pink him near the fifth rib, and there the matter would end.

But he heard nothing of Horace Vernon after the flight of his betrothed. He simply disappeared and "was heard no more." His lordship believed the child to be disposed of, and what had become of the mother he did not know and would not care.

His return to England, married to the young, flighty creature to whom he had been betrothed, was unmarked by the startling appearance of the creature he had so cruelly duped, or the unwelcome presence of the man he had so deeply wronged. His own nervous anticipations and forebodings at length died away, and if he cast a thought upon her who had so often hung about his neck with devoted loving tenderness, it was after he had had an altercation with Lady Kingswood upon some occasion on which her unprincipled selfishness had been rather sternly developed.

Then he thought of the discarded one with a bitter pang, and then it was an impression stole over him that retribution hath many shapes.

However, the long silence was broken with a tremendous crash. The offspring of that unhappy connection, supposed dead, was beneath his roof, and at his back a fierce, relentless foe. He was placed at an instant on the horns of a terrible dilemma. If he disposed of Erle, in some prompt and definite way, he brought down upon him the wrath, and Heaven alone knew what with it, of Horace Vernon. If he suffered him to remain a member of his household, and treated him with the respect due to his son and heir, he should have perhaps to encounter the dreadful consequence of Lady Kingswood's discovery, that though married to him, she was not his wife, and that his, their son Cyril, was—oh, fearful shock to her pride—illegitimate.

The very thought of such a discovery frenzied him, and he resolved to dare Vernon's direst vengeance rather than the frantic wrath of Lady Kingswood.

But how to get rid of Erle, how to obtain his consent to banish himself to some remote spot until his reappearance would be unattended by any unpleasant consequences. The boy was certainly high-spirited, haughty, and self-willed, required considerable management to control, and having been impressed with a notion that he had a right to be at Kingswood—that it was a duty he owed to himself, and an act of justice to one whose claims he maintained by his presence there—it promised to be no light task to persuade him that the only proper place for him to inhabit was some remote spot where the British flag was seen once in a century.

Still, it was imperative that he should be sent away, and having resolved upon that—with many misgivings, being, as he perceived, the least of two great evils—it remained only to decide upon the agency.

In reflecting upon this unpalatable necessity, he felt the want of the aid of counsel, and it occurred to him that his faithful Pharisee, who had served him so long, so well, and so unscrupulously, might help him to effect his purpose. It was not possible to carry out his project without a confederate, and he could think of no one who would so well enact the part as his valet.

He rang the bell used to summons the man, and almost immediately Pharisee make his appearance.

Pharisee, in common with the household, had heard of Lady Maud's accident and her brilliant rescue by Erle. He had contrived to mix with the group that had welcomed Erle and Lady Maud's arrival. He had picked up all he could by the use of his quick ears, in order to repeat it, to his own advantage, to Lord Kingswood, and in returning to the house, he perceived Lord Kingswood, with chagrin plainly marked on his pale face, striding in the same direction.

Pharisee guessed that his services would be called into requisition, and he placed himself in the vicinity of the library. So, when, as he expected, his bell rang, he was very prompt in answering it.

Well acquainted with every shade of expression Lord Kingswood's face was accustomed to exhibit, he was unprepared to find it so anxious and haggard as now he beheld it. But he kept his amazement concealed, and glided up to the harassed nobleman much in the same apathetic way as when merely required to assist his lordship to dress.

On reaching his master, he paused and waited for a communication.

He had to wait some little time, for Lord Kingswood knew not how to break the subject rankling in his mind to him.

At length, in a sleek, insinuating voice Pharisee said,

"Your lordship, I believe, rung for me."

Lord Kingswood, who with furtive glance, had observed him enter the room with noiseless step, started from a reclining position in his easy-chair, which he had purposely assumed, as though he had awakened suddenly from a troubled dream.

"Ah—a—Pharisee—yes, I rung for you," his lordship returned, with a hesitating manner of speech. "The fact is," he continued, in a thoughtful manner, "I want to have some conversation with you upon a subject which perplexes and confounds me."

Pharisee bowed very low, but offered no observation.

"Yes," continued Lord Kingswood, with a ruminating air, "I want your advice—well, not, perhaps, your advice, but your opinion—at least, your assistance in an affair of a singularly delicate nature."

"I am your lordship's devoted servant," returned Pharisee, with an oriental bend.

"So I believe, Pharisee, or I should decidedly not consult with you in the present matter," was his lordship's response.

"I have served your lordship faithfully for many years," continued Pharisee, with artful plausibility; "may I hope that the steadfastness and consistency with which I have ever fulfilled the duties your lordship has been pleased to favor me by entrusting me with, will give me some small claim to the confidence your lordship seems disposed to honor me by reposing in me."

"Say a strong claim, Pharisee," returned his lordship, with a well assumed affable condescension. "In short, from the manner in which you have performed the services required of you by me, I have every right to suppose that you will ably execute any little mission I may entrust you with."

"I will do my utmost zealously and faithfully to discharge any service your lordship may graciously confide to me."

"Well, Pharisee, then I request your attention to what I am about to communicate to you," said his lordship, affecting a calmness of manner he did not feel. "You have lived with me the greater portion of my married life, Pharisee, and you are, of course, acquainted with its principal incidents. But a—ahem—a—there were events—there were circumstances—I say there were occurrences which took place previous to my marriage, which—which I have kept closely hidden within my own breast, and——"

Lord Kingswood detected, as he thought, a little too much eager inquisitiveness in the eye of his devoted servant, he therefore added, a little quickly and very emphatically—

"Of course I intended to keep them where they now rest undisclosed."

Pharisee dropped his eye instantly upon the carpet, and inwardly cursed his own want of tact.

Lord Kingswood resumed:

"Out of those occurrences, Pharisee, there has suddenly sprung into being a youth, who has settled himself in the very heart of my home."

Pharisee gazed steadfastly at the carpet, and remained intent as well as motionless."

"You, of course, guess to whom I allude, Pharisee," said Lord Kingswood, glancing up beneath his eyebrows at him.

"Mr. Gower, my lord," murmured Pharisee, in an almost inaudible voice.

"Mr. Gower," repeated Lord Kingswood, promptly. "You are right, Pharisee. Well, I am under certain engagements—made—a—made, I say, in the heyday and the folly of youth, to protect and to provide for this boy, who—a—I—I—a—may say possesses not—a—not—the ghost—I say, not the shadow of a legal nor—well, I think I am justified in saying nor a moral claim upon me. Nevertheless, I am called upon to fulfil these embarrassing engagements, and I cannot very well help complying with—a—the—the—demand," the last word came out very reluctantly; "but," continued his lordship, quickly, "I do not intend to say that, as a matter of honor, I object to comply, though I confess that my acquiescence occasions me the very greatest perplexity and inconvenience."

"Your lordship, I presume, refers to the presence of Mr. Gower at Kingswood?" suggested Pharisee, gently, and with a slight hesitation in his delivery.

"Exactly, Pharisee," returned his lordship, almost eagerly, "his presence here occasions me very great embarrassment, because it calls for explanations which it is impossible for me to give——"

"I understand your lordship," suggested Pharisee, in a meaning tone.

Lord Kingswood reddened.

"No, you do not understand me, Pharisee," he rejoined, sharply; "and, further, I do not require you to interpret my suggestions. What I desire you to understand I will be very explicit in communicating. Though myself not personally affected by the explanations to which I have alluded, there are others whose interests might be injured, and their position compromised, were I to enter into matters which really concern no other person but Mr. Gower, and—the—the individuals with whom he is secretly connected. Lady Kingswood—like many, I might, with truth, perhaps, say, in common with the rest of her sex—is not likely to remain satisfied with the statement I have given her, similar to that I have just made to you. Unwilling to subscribe to the sacredness of a trust reposed in me, she will wish to know every little fact and detail connected with the history of Mr. Gower, which, to a certain extent, I cannot give if I would, and my determined refusal to her request may lead to inconveniences which I am especially desirous to avoid at the present time. I am desirous to act well and liberally to Mr. Gower, to advance his future, to do anything to enhance his comfort and happiness, but—a—not here."

His lordship paused, and Pharisee slowly raised his eyes.

He now quite understood that his lordship wished to get rid of Mr. Gower; but how?

That expression, "get rid of," was a very wide one—in some senses, a very significant one.

He slowly perused Lord Kingswood's features, but he did not read there the villainous thoughts which crossed his own vile mind.

Lord Kingswood remained silent, and Pharisee therefore knew an observation was expected from him.

"It can scarcely be a question of difficulty, my lord," he presently observed, in his usual oily tone. "Remove Mr. Gower to some other part of the kingdom."

"You do not understand, Pharisee, that he has been brought hither to remain here," rejoined Lord Kingswood, in a suggestive tone.

"Ah!" ejaculated Pharisee, "I am not wrong, I presume, in supposing that, although your lordship wishes for his departure, you do not desire it to be known that his removal emanates from you."

"You are quick of comprehension, I perceive, Pharisee," replied Lord Kingswood. "You have truly conjectured my position: you have arrived at my singular difficulty."

"It does not strike me as being a difficulty of an extraordinary character," rejoined Pharisee, in a slow, soft tone.

"No?" ejaculated Lord Kingswood, interrogatively.

"No, my lord," responded Pharisee.

"Proceed to explain your views," said Lord Kingswood, leaning back in his chair, and eyeing his crafty valet with an eager curiosity.

"Youth is fond of change," commenced Pharisee. "At Mr. Gower's age the mind is active and restless. It does not remain content in one place. The wonders of London, described in glowing terms to Mr. Gower, would create within his breast an ardent yearning to visit its gay scenes. London, my lord, has many temptations, many follies, many vices. A youth yielding to its temptations springs from folly to folly, and leaps thence to excesses: the step from excess to vice is short. Your lordship, learning from sources on which you can rely that such a course has been pursued, will certainly be thoroughly justified in removing your patronage, and withdrawing, in fact, your countenance from him, very properly forbidding his appearance in your presence again."

"Um!" mused Lord Kingswood, "a neat contrivance; but it will not do. He would remain in London, and might talk. No; if he could be persuaded to emigrate to some distant region, where, if not killed by the climate, he would not, at all events, return to England, my object would be attained."

A sinister smile stole over the cadaverous features of Pharisee. In the same slow, insinuating tones, he said:

"Does not your lordship imagine that a youth having grossly committed himself, and being sharply awakened to a sense of his humiliating position by your just and unappeasable displeasure, would eagerly seize an offer to provide him with a passage to some distant land, together with a sum of money to give him a start in life on his arrival there! With humble deference to your lordship, I think that such a plan would succeed to perfection, because the youth, knowing how culpably he had acted here, would proceed to any other quarter of the globe rather than remain in this."

Lord Kingswood received the suggestion with some little excitement. He rose up, and paced the chamber, exhibiting a degree of feverish anxiety quite comforting to Pharisee, who stood motionless as a statue, but followed Lord Kingswood with his shifty, restless eyes, as he passed and repassed him.

He was unacquainted with the harassing considerations which formed the train of thought racing through Lord Kingswood's mind, but he was quite satisfied that though his lordship had denied being personally affected in revelations connected with the history of Erle Gower, he was deeply implicated in them. He was equally sure that his lordship would assent to his proposition. He had long yearned to obtain a complete and fearful power over Lord Kingswood from a remarkable cause, and now he saw it fairly within his reach.

His bosom throbbed and heaved violently, the veins in his forehead swelled like chords, his nerves tingled and pricked, and his teeth knit themselves closely together, because he saw dancing before his eyes and within his grasp the long hoped-for prize.

Yet he stood motionless, his face a shade ghastlier in its sallowness, but his features rigidly immovable; his eyes, in their flashing restlessness, and the persistency with which they watched the movements of Lord Kingswood, alone betraying the tumult of his concealed feelings.

At last Lord Kingswood resumed his seat, and in a vexed, impatient tone, he exclaimed—

"I am afraid I see no other way to attain an end in which, it is no use disguising it, my happiness and the distinctions I am seeking are involved; but the instructions I ought to give you, they perplex, distress, confound me; I cannot find it in my soul to direct you to——"

"Take any step in the matter," sleekly interposed Pharisee; "it will be unnecessary for your lordship to do so. I foresaw that difficulty, and I provide for it by requesting your lordship to give me no instructions whatever, but to leave to me the working out of the scheme. Your lordship shall remain in utter ignorance of the proceedings of Mr Gower until the proper time. Every proposition for change shall emanate from him. He shall not know other than that you are warmly interested in his future welfare, and when he flies, degraded, dishonored, humiliated, he shall be in no position to blame or curse any one but himself for what has happened. Your lordship's conscience may rest very lightly as to any participation in events which shall insure his downfall."

The face of Lord Kingswood brightened. He gazed steadfastly in the face of his devoted servant.

"I believe, Pharisee, you are attached to me," he exclaimed.

"My long and continuous services, my lord, I believe fairly answer that question," rejoined the astute valet, in a meek tone.

"And I think you are devoted to my interests," continued Lord Kingswood.

"Your lordship has not occasion, I think, to question my trustworthiness," was the equally modest reply.

"No, I am sure I have not," responded Lord Kingswood. He drew a long breath, and then slowly added—"My very good Pharisee, I leave the whole of this matter entirely in your hands. What has transpired between us will remain concealed in your breast and buried in my own. From time to time, if need be, you can draw on me for such amounts as you may need for secret service. You understand, Pharisee?"

The valet, with a sickly smile, bent his head.

"When the affair has terminated you may rely upon my honor for an adequate reward," concluded his lordship.

Pharisee bowed again in reply, and mentally said, "I mean to take it," but he did not utter a word.

"There will be no further occasion, I suppose, to discuss this matter between us again, Pharisee?" observed Lord Kingswood, intending to close the interview here.

"No, my lord," returned the valet, "unless something very unexpected or unforeseen occurs. I may suggest, however, that your lordship will not expect the plan to be consummated at too early a date. It will take time. I must work with the greatest care and caution. Mr. Gower has a nature which will not submit to dictation—he cannot be driven—he is difficult to guide, and yet more difficult to lead. But he is proud, haughty and impressionable. I shall have to work upon the sensitive and sentimental part of his nature, and at first my progress will be slow, but when he has once started, he will hurry along with a heedless velocity which will give your lordship no reason to complain of further delay."

"Very good, then he will continue to remain here for the present," said Lord Kingswood, with a shade of dissatisfaction on his face.

"Until, my lord, he demands, rather then asks, your lordship to permit him to go to London," responded Pharisee, with a cunning leer.

"I understand," replied his lordship, a little more satisfied, adding, "Where have you placed him now, Pharisee? It was a dreadful mistake to place him in those old unused rooms."

Lord Kingswood instinctively shuddered.

"Lady Kingswood gave the orders to prepare those rooms for him," answered Pharisee, quickly. "Her ladyship, I presume, was desirous that the young gentle——"

Lord Kingswood frowned.

"I ask you, Pharisee, where you have now located Mr. Gower?"

Pharisee informed him.

"The apartments are too near Cyril's rooms," he exclaimed, thoughtfully. "I do not wish their intimacy to grow," then shrugged his shoulders and added, "I cannot help myself; I have a hard part to play, and I must do the best I can with it."

The library door opened, and a footman appeared. He bore a message from Erle to Lord Kingswood, requesting to be excused from appearing at dinner that day, pleading a severe headache as a ground for the request he made. Lord Kingswood readily assented, for he had looked forward to the dinner as a source of especial annoyance, owing to the incident of the morning. He felt that with Erle absent, he should be enabled to play the host to his numerous guests with all the animation, spirit and vivacity he was desirous of exhibiting, in order to secure their political influence in his favor, and he terminated his interview with Pharisee with a far lighter heart and more cheerful countenance then he had commenced.

Pharisee, too, hastened to Lord Kingswood's dressing-room to prepare his lordship's dinner-dress, and in a tone of passionate exultation, he said to himself:

"My triumph approaches. It is said a worm stings. I have been treated as a worm—oh, but I'll sting like a scorpion!"

(To be continued.)

FOREIGN NEWS AND GOSSIP.

The sensitiveness of the police frequently places a very unpleasant reflection upon the conduct of their rulers. It is like the parson who never mentioned hell to ears polite. An amusing instance of this lately happened in Warsaw during the conference of the sovereigns. The theatre was called upon to get up something appropriate for the two Emperors, and it accordingly announced for the entertainment of the partitioners of Poland a ballet bearing the ominous title of "Bertrand and Robert; or, the Two Robbers!" The police thinking, perhaps, of the duet between Peachem and Lockit, of which the refrain is,

"If you mention vice or bribe,
Each will say that is levelled at me," struck out the "Two Robbers." Very complimentary of the police to imagine that the title of the "Two Robbers" would fit the Czar and the Emperor of Austria. We don't exactly see why the Prince Regent of Prussia should escape.

Garibaldi has a very awkward method of transacting business with his ministry. Conforti, the minister, went up the other day to Naples to have an audience. After hunting about for three or four hours, he at last found the Dictator in the lines of Santa Maria, under the enemy's fire, and counting shells thrown by the Neapolitans that did not explode, for want of a proper fuse. He did not interrupt this interesting investigation on the arrival of the minister, but continued walking about, bidding him tell him what he had to say. Now, M. Conforti, who was unused to be under fire, became very uncomfortable, and, after the lapse of half an hour, had become so alarmingly pale, that Garibaldi took pity on him and withdrew out of range.

French papers say that the Emperor contemplates the establishment of public gaming houses in Paris, under the surveillance of the police. We think that this will obviate many of the abuses of private gambling institutions, and afford a revenue as well.

An Irish paper has this incident: Father Esteve, S.J., Superior of the Missions in Syria, on arriving in Montpellier, has related some very interesting details of the persecution in that unfortunate country. One of them is a wonderful instance of the protection of Mary. A young girl, pursued by a Druse, and fearing outrages worse than death, threw herself boldly into the sea, first calling upon the Virgin of Virgins for protection; for a moment she sank beneath the waves, then was lifted on the shore again. The barbarians were close to her—she again threw herself in, and was again brought to shore by the waves. Five times did this heroic girl throw herself in, crying out, "Mary, help me! Mary, help me!" and as many times did the sea cast her back upon the sand. The last wave, however, had carried her to some distance from the Druses, and near a party of Christians—she was safe.

The Irish battalion which was captured at Spoleto were sent on to Paris, and lodged in the Quartier Latin. This soon became a kind of Donnybrook, and so disgusted the French authorities, that they were speedily dispatched to Havre at the Government expense, to get rid of them. From Havre they were shipped to Dublin.

Queen Victoria is about instituting a new order of Knighthood under her title of Queen of the Indies. Natives as well as Englishmen are eligible.

The Court Journal of London says that the census of Ireland for 1861 will show a decrease in her population of at least a million and a half as compared with 1841.

Alderman Wire, who, two years ago filled the office of Lord Mayor of London, died on the 9th. He was a lawyer.

A most terrible accident occurred near Ringdon, Hampshire. Miss Emily, daughter of Thomas Entwhistle, a gentleman of large fortune, was riding near her home, when her horse took fright, and she lost her seat in the saddle. Her foot being at the same time, unfortunately, entangled in the stirrup, and her dress in the saddle, she was dragged upwards of four hundred yards before the horse could be stopped. When she was taken up, it was found that her head and face were literally smashed to pieces, the brains protruding from her head, having come in contact with the wheel of a cart that was near the spot at the time. The body was taken up and carried into the house of Mr. Walden, which is close by where the accident occurred, and from thence conveyed to the mansion of Admiral Walcot which is in the same locality. The unfortunate young lady was between seventeen and eighteen years of age.

The same day, Mr. Devas, of Dulwich, a merchant of London, while riding from his home to his place of business in the city, was observed to reel in his saddle. The next minute he fell from his horse. He was taken to a chemist's shop, where he soon expired. His complaint was heart disease.

Marochetti's magnificent colossal statue of Richard Cœur de Lion has been erected in Old Palace Yard, London, between Westminster Abbey and the Houses of Peers. It is cast in bronze. The English are great people for cherishing the memory of their famous men. It is only about eight centuries since he was killed.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE HARBOR AND THE CITY O

THE CITY OF CHARLESTON, S.C.

For beautiful city of Charleston, which we illustrate this week, is the largest city of South Carolina, and is situated on a tongue of land, bounded on either side by the rivers Ashley and Cooper, which, joining at the extreme outward point, form a large and beautiful bay, which communicates with the ocean at Sullivan's Island, seven miles below. It was founded in 1672. In 1687 a large company of French Huguenots, flying from religious persecution, landed at Charleston, and made it their permanent residence, and from this noble stock are descended many of the first families in the city. It was incorporated as a city in 1783, and played a glorious part in the following Revolutionary struggle. History mentions no more gallant action than the victory gained by Colonel Moultrie and his four hundred gallant volunteers who repelled and badly beat a British squadron of nine ships, making it retreat with much damage and severe loss of life, before the well-served guns of Fort Moultrie. Charleston has suffered immense losses by fire, the loss at one, in 1838, being over five millions of dollars; but she has great recuperative powers, and the beautiful city comes out still more beautiful after each desolating disaster.

The ground on which the city of Charleston is built is some eight or nine feet above high water-mark. The tide rises about six feet, and passing, like the tide of our Hudson and East Rivers, on either side of the city, preserves it pure and healthy. The streets are laid out in lines running parallel with each other from the Cooper to the Ashley Rivers, and are intersected almost at right angles by others. Many of the streets are very broad, varying from sixty to seventy feet in width. One of the most delightful features of the city is the abundance of beautiful shade trees which line the streets of the Palmetto City, serving the double purpose of screening the pedestrian from the rays of the summer sun and of an ornament of rare and unequalled beauty.

The public buildings of the city were planned on a liberal scale. They are remarkable for architectural beauty, and for the solidity of their structure. Not only are the Government buildings particularly worthy of notice, but the banking-houses, churches, public institutions, hotels and private mansions are rich in their architecture and spacious in their accommodation.

JOHN S. BARRY, ESQ., THE CELEBRATED HORSE-TAMER.

SATURDAY NIGHT IN THE MARKET, CHAR

OF CHARLESTON, S. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

Charleston is a great resort for strangers, not only for the salubrity of its climate, but for the charming ease, the hospitality and the refined and elegant tone which prevails in every class of its society.

The commerce of Charleston is very considerable, not only by the marine, but inland, by means of the several railroads which centre in the city.

CHARLESTON MARKET.

We give in our present number a very spirited sketch of Charleston market on Saturday evening. Our space will not allow us to give a description; indeed our artist has made the picture speak for itself.

LESTON, S. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

JOHN S. RAREY, THE HORSE-TAMER.

Until 1858 Mr. Rarey, who has since become so famous, was comparatively unknown, even in America, his native country. In that year he went to England, and in a brief time so well satisfied the eminent officials in authority of his undoubted power to perform the wonderful feats which rumor ascribes to him, that permission was given to him to exhibit his skill before the Queen of England and her Court. His success was complete, and afterwards, on several occasions, he exhibited before the Queen by special command. These experiments were repeated in Paris and the other Courts of Europe, and always with unequivocal success. Royal Commissions examined his system and pronounced it valuable, exhibiting a means of perfectly controlling the nature of the wildest and most savage horses. Mr. Rarey was engaged to teach his method to military officers both in the English and Continental services, and it may be said, with justice, that he has inaugurated a new and humane system of taming the most savage of the equine species.

The main idea of Rarey's system, says Wilkes's Spirit of the Times, seems to be admirable blending of firmness with patience and kindness. It has been said that the struggle is tremendously severe, and that the horse lies sweating, quivering and panting, as if his broken spirit was rushing out in streams of hot vapor from his nostrils. There is, however, one consideration overlooked. This desperate and prolonged struggle between the man and the beast for the mastery only occurs when the subject is a horse of intractable temper and confirmed ferocity in all other hands. It is not to be supposed that in so great a horse-breeding, breaking and training country as England, Mr. Rarey would be long without having his system and himself put to the severest test that could be devised. A thoroughbred stallion was selected, whose ferocity had made him the dread and terror of the great breeding establishment at Swacliffe.

LORENZO SICKEY, ESQ., THE INVENTOR OF THE GREAT VIRGINIAN GUN—THE UNION PACIFICATOR. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.—SEE AGE 42.

Cruiser was held to be the most savage and intractable horse in England, and upon him Mr. Rarey was to operate. While he was in training as a racer, his ungovernable spirit had not displayed itself to any great extent, but he had given such indications that John Day gave a warning to the man who took him to Swacliffe, not to take his halter off in any stable. In spite of the caution, the groom did so, and before they could get Cruiser out again, they had to take the roof off the building and lasso him from above. As he grew older he got worse, and when Mr. Rarey took him in hand he was a perfect fiend in temper and fury. He was completely subdued by the system of Mr. Rarey, and his victory over this noted horse, in public, set the seal upon the merits of his method for the taming of the most ferocious animals of the equine order.

At the farewell exhibition given by Mr. Rarey at the Crystal Palace, on the 27th of last month, which was a great ovation, Cruiser was introduced. He was not only no longer a dangerous and ferocious savage, but playful and docile; and we predict that there will be great curiosity here to see this noted animal. The most furious subject at Mr. Rarey's last exhibition in England was an Irish mare, whose screams filled the transept before she was brought in. She was a powerful gray roan, and kicked, bit, reared and howled in the most ferocious manner. Watching his opportunity, however, Rarey got his strap on her fetlock and finally overthrew her, to the delight of the vast audience, who at one time feared that she might get the better of his cool courage and patience in her efforts to eat him up.

Mr. Rarey will soon, we understand, exhibit his extraordinary prowess in New York. His wide spread reputation will doubtless attract thousands, and we have no doubt that his exhibitions here and elsewhere will return him as rich a result, and effect as much good as did his public and private lessons in the old countries.

LORENZO SIBERT, INVENTOR OF THE GREAT VIRGINIA GUN.

Lorenzo Sibert, of Mount Solon, Augusta county, Virginia, the inventor of the great Virginia gun he calls the "Union Pacificator," is an iron manufacturer by education—a native of Shenandoah county, Virginia, and about fifty-six years of age. He possesses an inventive genius, and his name is already recorded several times in the archives of inventions at Washington. This gun, destined to supersede all others, is a self-loading one. The cartridge is bored out of solid iron or steel, and has nipper and all in one piece. The cartridges, when loaded, are placed in magazines made of tin or other light substance, that revolve around the barrel, and fall by gravity into a pair of iron cylinders, in a range with the barrel; the cock is pulled back—the hammer strikes the cap-end of cartridge—the empty cartridge slides down into the breech and a full one takes its place, and the process of shooting is as rapid as the cock and the trigger can be pulled, until the magazines, your pockets and cartridge box or shot pouch is empty. The gun is light—simple in construction—cannot get out of order in hands of the common soldier—never heats or fouls in the barrel, each cartridge carrying away its own heat and dirt. The cartridges last for years—can't burst—and if they did, the cylinders could not. One of these guns is equal to a company or small regiment. The Government ought to make a monopoly of this arm.

THE RETRIBUTION OF HISTORY.

The name of George III. will always have a certain interest with Americans, since, in some respects, he might be termed the Pontius Pilate of our freedom. In a recent work, many facts illustrating the miserable close of his life—for his reign ended long before—have been made public, and although Madame D'Arblay had given us many indications of the wretched condition into which the once great bigot of England had fallen, it is enough to make even the descendants of the victims of the Sugar-House and Prison Ships feel for their royal murderer when we read such a scene as the following, taken from a recent work published in England:

It would have been well if the errors of the physicians had been confined to ignorance. But their negligence was still more reprehensible. While the poor maniac was deprived of those tender offices which his wife and daughters might have rendered, he was abandoned to the care of low mercenaries; and so little discrimination was observed in the choice of his attendants that the charge of his person devolved chiefly on a German page, named Ernst, who was utterly unworthy to be trusted with the charge of the humblest of his fellow-creatures. This man, who had been raised by the patronage of His Majesty, repaid the kindness of his royal master with the most brutal ingratitude. He went so far as to strike the helpless King, and on one occasion, when His Majesty wished to protract his exercise in the gardens at Kew, Ernst seized him in his arms, carried him into a chamber, and, throwing him violently on a sofa, exclaimed, in an insolent manner to the attendants, "There is your king for you!"

These outrages were perpetrated in the seclusion of the palace at Kew, to which the king had been removed in the month of October, at the instance of the Prince of Wales. His Majesty had been persuaded to leave Windsor, to which he was much attached, by the promise that he should see his children at Kew. He entered the carriage cheerfully; but, on passing through the iron gates of the Little Park, he put his hands before his face and burst into tears. Recovering his composure, however, he talked to the equerries who accompanied him to the carriage in his ordinary, hurried manner, pointing out the objects in the road and anticipating the pleasure, long denied him, of seeing his wife and daughters. But on his arrival at Kew he found himself a prisoner. Proceeding towards the apartments he usually occupied, he was stopped, and conducted into a large room, where he found the pages who were to be his keepers waiting to receive him. The equerries, among whom was his faithful and valued servant, General Harcourt, according to the orders they had received, withdrew. The physicians also, who had accompanied the royal patient from Windsor, having consigned him to the charge of the pages, also thought proper to retire, and actually returned to London the same night. The king then impatiently demanded to see his family; and the promise under which he had been induced to leave his palace at Windsor was, in cruel mockery, fulfilled. The princesses were brought before the window; the king on seeing them rushed forward to lift the sash, but it was screwed down. A paroxysm was the immediate consequence of this cruel restraint; the princesses were hastily removed, and the king was dragged from the window, entreating to be allowed to speak to his children.

The late witty Samuel William Riley, author of the "Itinerant," seeing a proud and solemn man of sixty swelling down Lord street, Liverpool, accosted him, politely touching his hat, "Excuse me, sir, for stopping you in the street, but I just wish to inquire the rent of the house No. 10 Great George street?" "Sir," replied his haughtiness, "I have no house in Great George street." "Oh, I beg a thousand pardons, sir," said Mr. R., "I thought all the town belonged to you."

SHRINK'S ISLAND.

How many years ago is it since John Simmonds and I went fortune-hunting to New Zealand?—since John Simmonds died of fever in the passage out and I stepped on stranger's land with a heap of baffled hopes for luggage? A great many years ago—for my hair is gray now and the hand that pens these lines is wrinkled and unsteady. I was not a young man when I made that weary journey in a sailing vessel, neither was John Simmonds; we had both seen forty summers, were both men of the world—rolling stones, who, having gathered no moss in our native land, made sure of finding all the moss across the sea, and, with the restless fever on us, started off to "settle down."

John and I had been rolling stones all our lives—fellows who had never known what luck was and were drawing blanks from the great lottery whilst other men grew rich. We had shared cribs together at Ponder's Institution; we had worked together as carpenter's apprentices; we had knocked about town together and fallen in love with the same girl (who had jilted us both); we had parted once or twice in "huffs" and met again in manners the most odd—fate being resolved to cross our lives and keep John in sight of me and me of John.

Simmonds and I had been apart two years when we met in a dark little street near the docks. I had been seeking a situation at a wine-merchant's and John was returning from a sight of the Saucy Sarah, a sailing vessel, in which he had booked his passage to New Zealand. John and I, over our glasses of grog at the Hope and Anchor, forgot old grievances and remembered past associations, and were soon shaking hands and laughing till the tears ran down our cheeks into the gin and water.

Well, it ended after the old fashion—John and I became sworn friends again, and I was ready to try the new land with him and begin life afresh to-morrow. There were fortunes to be made across the sea, and in London only hard work, hard pay, hard masters. Both of us had fared ill in merry England and there were no claims strong enough to bind us to it. Educated at Ponder's Institution, where the want of father and mother at an early age had rendered us eligible as pupils, with a married sister or two, whose surly husbands did not care to see us very often, and with an old aunt on my side, out of her mind, and an old uncle of John's, out of luck and in the workhouse, things were not particularly conducive to our stay. So away we went, and in the crowd of faces that looked after the Saucy Sarah there was not one that John and I had any right to say, "God bless!"

Still we went not away low-spirited; there were great hopes that affairs would take a turn now and that we should be wealthy merchants some fine day. John had letters of recommendation in his pocket that were to work wonders. John knew a friend out there, who had started in life as poorly off as himself and had become an influential tradesman with more money than he knew what to do with—happy fellow!—and who was to give us work directly we reached him and launch us on strange waters bravely. All was as it should be to our sanguine natures, and it was our turn to be uppermost as the wheel went round.

Well, John Simmonds sickened on the passage out and died. So much for castle building and stray ventures, and looking forward to the day that never comes; and so an end to all John's hopes in the deep waters wherein they slowly let him sink!

Two years and a half ago I should have shaken my head, said poor Jack and set to work again, had any one met me with the news of John Simmonds's decease; but it was a different thing in that sailing vessel, wherein we had sworn fellowship again and been such friends. When they sank him into the sea I gave up like a child and cried as if my heart would break; and a month after I woke up to find myself still aboard ship and to the congratulations of my fellow-passengers on having slipped the clutch of death at last and beaten back the fever that settled poor John Simmonds.

Well, it was a long passage, and I thought New Zealand never would be reached. A dreadful passage, with storms that drove us back; and frightful calms, that kept us stationary for days; and winds that tore the sails away and blew one unhappy wretch overboard—to keep John company, perhaps. John was always fond of company; too much company in bar-parlors after his day's work had been the ruin of all John's prospects, people said; I can't believe it, even now.

There was plenty of time to collect John's scanty wardrobe and search for those letters of recommendation which never came across me; they had been ever myths in John's fecund imagination or been lost during his illness and my own, for no letters ever came to light, and the name and address of the friend who was to put us in the way of fortune-making I had utterly forgotten—they have slipped my memory to this day. What became of John's money, too—there were twelve pounds I could swear to—I was unable to ascertain; but it was missing also, and every one on board was innocent as heaven.

The Saucy Sarah reached New Zealand at last, and the new world lay before me where to choose. The passengers went east and west without so much as a good bye; and I, friendless and alone, with no hand to grasp my own after that long journey—how I yearned for only one!—looked round for work to put my hand to and save me from starvation. I did not find work difficult to procure, but it was rough work, and I had never been one of the strongest. Then there were old habits to stand in my way—a trick of never keeping time was one, and a knack of dozing at mid-day was another; and there was the climate too hot for me, and no John Simmonds to keep my spirits up when they dropped suddenly to zero. I found New Zealand harder to live in than England; men of energy might rise therein, but I had been inclined to give up, all my life. Energy was the one thing I had ever lacked—it has happened, so let it be; call it destiny, or fate, or preordination, and sit down by the wayside with crossed arms, and let the workers pass me by.

I was thinking of giving up for good and following John Simmonds, when a letter from my sister (my youngest sister, who had been my favorite at home, and had taken most kindly to me in after-life when her own troubles were not few, and her husband turned out a brute) brought me welcome news. Yes, there is no disguising the fact—welcome news it was to hear that my aunt, who had been out of her mind so long, had gone suddenly and will-less out of the world, and that her nephews and nieces were her next of kin. Forty pounds a-piece at least—money enough to open a little shop in London, and make my fortune after all!

On the strength of my sister's letter, I contrived to obtain a place in a little vessel bound Londonwards, and away I sailed one bright morning in the month of August. The ship which bore me from New Zealand was the smallest craft, I believe, that had ever made the journey; and the skipper, Abel Shrink, the smallest man that ever had command of a cockleshell on the high seas. Whether he had been made for the ship, or the ship for him, is a matter of uncertainty; but they matched each other admirably well—were both old and creaky in the joints, and black with tar. There was a very small crew—I don't think half-a dozen altogether—to the Naiad, as the ship was called, and I was the only passenger on board. The Naiad traded in a variety of goods, and made no boast of its accommodation for passengers, which was frank and open, and deceived nobody. Skipper Shrink did not lay himself out for passengers, but I was anxious to reach home, and Shrink never turned away a chance of sixpence.

I cannot say that I saved time by starting in the Naiad, or that we began the journey pleasantly. The skipper was a bad tempered man, and the Naiad was a bad tempered ship, which did not stand nice about answering to the helm. When it was fine weather there was no hope of making way; and when it was rough, there was every chance of going to the bottom. I began to wish I had waited for the next ship, and started homewards in a better fashion. I began to doubt getting home at all, and I grew particularly distrustful of skipper Shrink, himself.

Not having long enjoyed the pleasure of that gentleman's acquaintance, there was nothing remarkable in being puzzled with him; but when the crew began to grow doubtful of the skipper's movements, and the sailors to mutter "damnation" on their eyes and limbs if they could make him out, it was time to grow curious concerning him. Possessing no knowledge of navigation, I was perfectly content for a time with the consciousness of the ship's movement; but when, after four or five weeks' sail, one man swore we had been exactly in the same latitude three weeks since, my misgivings concerning skipper Shrink's sanity began to strengthen.

Yet he was always cool and collected enough, gave his orders briskly, and swore at those who did not attend to them in an easy, business kind of manner, that seemed seamanlike and sane. The mate alone made no remark, hinted that the captain knew perfectly well what he was about, and that if people only minded their own business, people would get on better—much!

Having more time on my hands than the small crew—though what they did to occupy their minds, save pulling a rope now and then, is doubtful—I set myself the task of keeping a quiet look-out on skipper Shrink. I accustomed myself to read a great deal on deck, and Shrink, who had long since set me down as a milksop, took little notice of me. I observed that he was always busy with a telescope; that every spare moment of his time he was standing on a coil of rope, or on a pail turned bottom upwards on deck, or else curled up in the rigging, looking out to sea with great intentness. Sometimes he would exchange a few words with the mate, a black-bearded, Blueskin kind of person I had never taken kindly to; but in most cases he prosecuted his studies alone, looking through his telescope, or drawing extraordinary diagrams on the palm of his hand with a lead pencil, and licking them carefully out again when they did not seem to please him. So weeks went on at this game, and the ship, as I learned afterwards, wandered about the high seas in a very eccentric fashion, and went every way but the right.

The secret came out at last in an odd manner. We had been two months away from New Zealand and I was still reflecting on the littleness of humanity, compared with that immensity of sea and sky which shut us in between them, a tiny speck to be blotted out at any instant, and nobody the wiser. It was mid-day, and I had been indulging in one of my old naps, when the harsh voice of skipper Shrink woke me with a start.

"By the Lud, there's one at last, Marks! By the Lud, we've got it! Take the bearings—hold the glass—look at the compass—by the Lud, our blessed fortune's made!"

"Hush!" cried Marks, looking quickly round.

I had presence of mind to shut my eyes again, and snore on peacefully.

"It's all right," said Shrink, in a husky whisper, "he's sound asleep; he always goes to sleep about this time, the fool. Bang in the sun, blister him!"

He ran to the compass, pored over it for some time, scrawled out some hieroglyphics in a dog's-eared note-book, sprang at Marks, snatched the telescope from his hands, danced frantically about the deck, ran to the hold and listened, and came back to Marks again.

"Sixty thousand pounds, Marks—nearly a hundred thousand, perhaps—you and I gentlemen for life, when we come back this way! A real seal island! I can see them flipping about like mad, hundreds of seals. And there they'll be till we fetch them, and weigh all the heavier and increase their blessed blubber, and their blessed families, and all for you and me, Marks."

"Ah!" said Marks, drawing a deep breath, and rubbing one hand over the other.

"Old Bones made his fortune this way, Marks; he tooked the latitude and longitude quietly as we might, did his voyage, and came back with everything suitable, and made heaps of money, and we're as lucky as Bones, and that's Shrink's Island, by ——."

"The less said about it the better, now," growled Marks, who was of a taciturn nature, and able to master his emotions.

"You're right, Marks; you're always right. Mum's the word."

Two of the men came on deck at this juncture; the skipper and the mate separated, and a few minutes afterwards Shrink was ordering all sail up, and taking advantage of a stiff breeze, away we went, and left the seal island many miles behind us.

Time passed on and there was no more idling it; Shrink cursed every slackness of wind, and every intensity of wind that blew us the wrong way, and prayed for fine weather and a quick journey, like an angel as he wasn't. Time upset one man's calculations too, very strangely. Marks was taken ill, and died. A queer illness, with lots of queer pains, that made me rather suspicious of foul play from Shrink. Still Shrink was very much cut up at his loss, and perhaps I am doing the man an injustice in that respect, remembering all that happened afterwards. So Marks was sewed up in canvas and pitched overboard, and the fate of him and his hopes strongly reminded me of John Simmonds, as he sank in the deep water, and Shrink read the burial service over him, and cursed all the hard words.

We had been three months at sea, and I had wearied and addled my brain by thinking of the skipper's luck, and how some men come to grief, and others to seal-islands. Pondering on the same topic one breezy morning, when the ship was suffering from staggers, I came upon the skipper fighting against the wind, and deep in calculation. Shrink had the advantage of me in the matter of sea legs and I was compelled to hang by ropes, and hold by the side of the vessel, to keep on my feet at all. Consequently, as I slowly made my way along the deck, I might have presented rather a skulking appearance, had the skipper glanced in my direction. But Shrink had his note book open, and his hands were full of papers, which the wind rustled and blew about, and his hat was wedged over his forehead, and the ship was lurching frightfully, and the salt water was splashing over the deck, and he had several things upon his mind that kept his thoughts distracted. Now and then I observed that he crumpled the papers in one hand, and scrawled on them as well as he could with a lead pencil, that he swore occasionally and stamped with his feet, and once burst into a screeching laugh of triumph, that curdled every drop of blood in my body. I might have been watching him, and yet I was thinking of my heritage and my sister in England, and had no felonious thoughts in my mind, when an oath of uncommon volume, followed by a madman's yell, made me execute a nervous leap in the air.

The wind had blown half a dozen papers out of Shrink's hands, and they were whisking about the deck in half a dozen different directions, with Shrink leaping and tumbling after them, and trying to catch them all at once. But the skipper was not ubiquitous, and one paper was blown behind him, another into the boat, one was stopped by my feet, and two whirled out to sea and were never heard of more. Instinctively I stooped and picked up a paper for the skipper, almost unconsciously glancing at the one line written on it—"Shrink's Island. Lat. 12 deg. 4 min. 17 sec. N., Long. 97 deg. 37 min. 30 sec. E." I mention these figures to make up my story. I am certain that they are incorrect, but they are as near the mark as my memory will allow. At the time of which I write, the true figures sank at once into my brain, and became fixed there as for some wise purpose. I had not time to take a second glance, before the skipper's hand had snatched the paper from me, and the skipper, with eyes like balls of fire, was dancing round me and gesticulating violently.

"What have you seen? What have you read? What did you touch the paper for? I'll murder you! I'll heave you overboard, by—!" And then followed a string of the fiercest expletives I had ever heard him indulge in; and his great, bony hands opened and shut, and came nearer my throat every moment.

"Keep back, Mr. Shrink," I cried. "I don't know what reason you have for this conduct; there's nothing I have seen in your papers that's comprehensible to me. I can't understand your conduct, sir."

This was not strictly the truth, but when a man's within an ace of being murdered, he's rather glad of an excuse. At least I was; for there was little of the hero in me.

"You've seen the figures!"

"I certainly saw some figures; a string of figures. What of that?"

"Nothing," he grunted, thrusting the paper into his trousers pocket, wheeling round, scuttling off after the rest, and threatening to split my fool's head open, if I moved. Recovering the majority of his papers, he returned to my side with quite a bland expression of countenance. "A man's a bit rough when he's riled," said he, half apologetically. "You mustn't mind a row in those times. The papers are worth nothing—only old washing bills, but they might have been bank notes for that matter. I didn't know at the moment, o'course. You couldn't ha' read the figures in the time, if they had been worth anything, eh?"

"Not very likely."

Shrink walked away relieved in mind, and I was left to mutter to myself, lat. 12 deg. 4 min. 17 sec. N., long. 97 deg. 37 min. 30 sec. E. Still the skipper had his suspicions of me; they could not be shaken off by a man who was born suspicious of his mother, and who would possibly die distrustful of the doctor. The way that man dogged me about, and harassed me to death with questions, and put one or two of the figures to me suddenly, in an attempt to throw me off my guard, was wearisome and trying to my nerves. I knew Shrink was doubtful of me, and knowing more myself than he perhaps gave me credit for, I felt rather insecure on the high seas beneath that man's murderous glances. I took the trouble to load an old pistol of mine; and sleep with it under my pillow, in the ragged old hammock, where every night I fought so hard for sleep. I felt I was in danger, and that unaware some day or night, skipper Shrink might make an end of me.

I thought of Mary, and the sudden manner in which he took leave of society, and I was very careful in my food and drink, and made advances to the mate, and offered wonderous treats in wines to the journey was over, and my native land was under my lee. I only wanted to reach home; I did not care for real friends or relatives in those existence; I would be content with the little step and the ferry golden pleasure that were to set me up on life. Strike me a great visionary; let him be even the most practical of men, his base sense was very transparent, and I had no right to trifle with him.

How well I remember the night I thought of this meat, and lay in my hammock, tossing and sea-sick to excess—for I have a deep bowels into a calm-like, and confounded things hopelessly! How the real island adored me, with a home anxiety, when I was married to my sister, and selling coal ships in seven Dials, and how latitude 12 deg. 4 min. N. and Long. 27 deg. 20 min. W., was the marker over his ship-head and he, suddenly, was wrecked into my face with a knife, which he grabbed in his agony somewhere by the skipper's nasty hand. Was it dreaming or waking, or losing one's senses that awful night, when I was dragged and pulled about like a log at every moment or of later date?

Surely it was nothing more than a dream that woke me with a start at three o'clock in the morning, and set me bolt upright in my hammock, staring into the darkness before me; and listening for unusual noises too, and fancying I could detect them—strange, rustling sort of sounds, from my old home, where an old coach and coffin of rope were stowed. An odd dream, with the tingling sensation of the tattooing explained therein so preternaturally acute, that I passed my hands to my side and then to my arm to make quite sure that the latitude and longitude of the real island were not disguised there. What a treat was I in to be sure! how strange that was also, for the night was cold, and I had gone shivering to bed from heavy sleep. Then as small thought made me fall back in my hammock, and watch both hands to my heart to stop its throbbing, my brain was disturbed by the dream, and this weakness was uncontemptible, unheard of, and I could not speak, but my mouth was open. Was I bleeding to death? I felt sure of that now by my fluttering, by the slow current of blood from my old wound, which, somehow, had perhaps more than one had broken, or been opened?

Yes, opened, for it was impossible to be mistaken; by one not wholly unskilled to surgery. I should be a dead man in a few minutes, certainly. If I could only get at the spot from which the blood was flowing I tried to compose myself, to think I might live on some hours, or till some one came to pay me assistance. I felt for the knife, and abandoned with horror at the weak tone s of my own voice. Then I sat up and listened once more to the sounds that I had fancied coming of the wind amidst the rigging, and then I turned my eyes inside towards the door and became hardly aware of a dark figure that was still lurking, waiting for my death to steal away and make no sign. Oh! for a night bell—a cord hanging at my side to ring for help—for a guttering candle. Oh! for the tread of the watch overhead, that I might be over some one else's wounds, and not my own! I was fascinated. Was a hoary, or was there a resulting to the left where the creature's dead should be?

"Who's there! Speak, or I shall fire."

I had drawn with difficulty my old pistol from beneath the pillow; and was holding over my hammock into the dreary beneath. It was a happy thought that pistol—if I could only remember that the pistol would go off when the trigger was pulled, the report might bring the crew to my assistance. I could not see the man, but if he came there, there was no harm done, and if a person were concealed, he or she was murderer.

Speak, or I fire. Who's there?"

My hand trembled with fear, and my life was drifting away so rapidly, that there was little time to lose. No answer. I pulled the trigger and the sudden click of the lock was the only sound. After a struggle it was to cock the pistol again; I had never worked so hard in my life! Once again I would give a chance to my unknown enemy in the corner.

"Who's there?"

No answer; and with my remaining strength I pulled the trigger again. A quick flash, a loud report, followed by a heavy fall against the chest, a curdling of fear overhead, and then the little crew tumbling rapidly down the companion ladder, one holding a candle.

"What's the matter? Who fired? Who's hurt?"

"Something in the hold, I think," I said. "I've been murdered—see to the man across the chest—who is he?"

"The skipper, by all that's holy!" exclaimed the man with the light.

"Is—he—dead?"

Before an answer was returned, I had fainted away.

When I recovered consciousness six hours afterwards, I found myself tightly bandaged, and a rough nurse of a sailor keeping watch.

"Belay there! we've stopped the bleed; pe'll do, if you keep quiet."

"And the skipper?"

"All aboard hee-arwards; there's time enough."

And in good time I learned that skipper Shrink lived but half an hour after I had run the hammock. They had picked him up with a mouth in his head, and a broken arm, and a broken leg, and some ribs driven down his colon stairs, but he made no sign for water and died without a word. He was a bad man, and I was glad to hear that he was lying in his berth. When they came to search him, they found a note in his pocket, which I will give in my own words, for which several figures had been written, was torn in half and thrown away, but left upon the table that covered him.

From those figures I have not remembered correctly to this day. Owing to the nature of the story to the author he was ill of the illness and served me well and kindly. I have sometimes fancied the time figures of the memorandum were those of the days he had in his earnings three years since, and hence that he had become suddenly rich, and that he was now more wealthy than ever. Be that as it may, Shrink killed, I wonder? Perhaps so. Some men step into the arms of death, and I am one of those who have lived to tell it, despite wrinkles in shape of forty pennets, despite the friendly hands stretched out to help them on their journey. My journey has been long and hard with me, and I am old and gray. This is the tale of many years ago.

AMERICAN IMPROVEMENTS IN SURGERY. Probably no disease has been so ineffectively and unsatisfactorily treated as those attacking the spine, the hip and the joints. The reason being found in the fact that but little has been accurately known of the real nature, progress and cause of these maladies. A recent discovery has, however, thrown considerable light on these subjects, which promises to be of considerable use in the treatment of a large class of sufferers. Dr. H. G. Davis, of Philadelphia, is said to be the author of this discovery. From researches and investigations prosecuted during many years, Dr. Davis has arrived at the point whatever is stiffened from any cause, and the ends of the bones are closely pressed together by muscular action, a very small area of each extensor surface receives the entire pressure, and by the action of a well-known law, this pressure produces waste, first depositing the cartilage and then the earthy matter, ends of the bone beneath. The area of pressure being thus gradually enlarged, the destruction being perhaps assisted by the inflammation of the patient placed in jeopardy. Now, it is evident that no, according to the discoveries, the first step to relief must be to stop the continued muscular pressure on the joint, the first and chief object must be to remove this pressure, and to relax, for a considerable period, the muscles producing it. The simple apparatus which Dr. Davis has devised for this purpose has been exhibited before the New York Academy of Medicine and the Medico-Chirurgical College. We learn that it has also been adopted by Dr. Buck in the New York Hospital, and with more or less modification by Dr. Sayre and other eminent surgeons. Its results are stated to be very satisfactory.

A CONSERVEDENT, who signs herself "Sophie," says that woman is twice as good as man, and proves it thus by the very orthography—W-o-m-e-n—double you, O man!

CHESS.

All communications and newspapers intended for the Chess Department should be addressed to T. Percy, Office of Home Life Insurance Co., 74 Wall St., N. Y.

PROBLEM NO. 274—By G. R Cowie, Berlin, S. U. S. Bodley, Jr.

WHITE to CHECKMATE in 3 P. P. No move has to be given to or without exposing his own King to check. Should Black play any move not mentioned in the solution, he will be mated in two moves. Should White play any move not mentioned in the solution, he will not be mated in three moves.—G. Coffman, Dublin. Your position is received and it will soon be inserted.

MATCH BETWEEN MR. STAUNTON AND MR. BUCKLEY.

Game 5, played on Tuesday October 5, 1858.

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1 P to K 4	P to K 4	17 P to Q 4	Q to K 2
2 P to K B 4	P takes P	18 P to K 5	Q to K 3
3 K Kt to B 3	P to K Kt 4	19 P to K 6	P takes P
4 P to Q 4	P to Kt 5	20 B takes P	P to Q B 4
5 K Kt to Q 5	Kt to K B 3	21 B takes Kt	P takes B
6 P to Q B 4	P to Q 3	22 Q to Q 4	Q to Q 2
7 P to Q 5	Kt to K 4	23 Q to Q 3	Q to K 3
8 P to K 3	P to K B 4	24 Q to K 3	Q to Q 2
9 P to K B 3	P to K Kt 3	25 Q to Q 3	Q to K 3
10 P to K B 5	P to K R 4	26 Q to K 3	Q to Q 2
11 P to K Kt 4	P to K R 3	27 Q to Q 3	Q to K 3
12 P to K R 4	P to K Kt 4	28 Q to K 3	Q to Q 2
13 P to K Kt 3	P to K R 5	29 Q to Q 3	Q to K 3
14 P to K B 3	P to K B 3	30 Q to K 3	Q to Q 2
15 P to K B 4	P to K Kt 5	31 Q to Q 3	Q to K 3
16 P to K 4	P to K 4	32 Q to K 3	Q to Q 2

Drawn game.

Mr. Staunton commenced with the Kt's game, and Mr. Buckley with the Queen's game. Mr. Staunton's game was the more attacking one, and Mr. Buckley's best method of defence was to keep his pieces well together, and to avoid exchanges. Mr. Staunton's 5th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 6th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 7th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 7th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 8th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 8th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 9th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 9th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 10th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 10th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 11th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 11th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 12th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 12th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 13th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 13th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 14th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 14th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 15th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 15th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 16th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 16th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 17th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 17th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 18th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 18th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 19th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 19th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 20th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 20th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 21st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 21st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 22nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 22nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 23rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 23rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 24th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 24th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 25th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 25th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 26th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 26th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 27th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 27th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 28th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 28th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 29th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 29th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 30th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 30th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 31st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 31st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 32nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 32nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 33rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 33rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 34th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 34th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 35th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 35th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 36th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 36th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 37th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 37th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 38th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 38th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 39th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 39th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 40th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 40th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 41st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 41st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 42nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 42nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 43rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 43rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 44th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 44th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 45th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 45th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 46th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 46th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 47th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 47th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 48th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 48th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 49th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 49th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 50th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 50th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 51st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 51st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 52nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 52nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 53rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 53rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 54th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 54th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 55th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 55th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 56th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 56th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 57th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 57th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 58th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 58th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 59th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 59th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 60th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 60th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 61st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 61st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 62nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 62nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 63rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 63rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 64th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 64th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 65th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 65th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 66th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 66th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 67th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 67th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 68th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 68th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 69th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 69th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 70th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 70th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 71st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 71st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 72nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 72nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 73rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 73rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 74th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 74th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 75th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 75th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 76th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 76th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 77th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 77th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 78th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 78th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 79th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 79th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 80th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 80th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 81st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 81st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 82nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 82nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 83rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 83rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 84th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 84th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 85th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 85th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 86th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 86th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 87th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 87th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 88th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 88th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 89th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 89th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 90th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 90th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 91st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 91st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 92nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 92nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 93rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 93rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 94th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 94th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 95th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 95th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 96th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 96th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 97th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 97th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 98th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 98th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 99th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 99th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 100th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 100th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 101st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 101st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 102nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 102nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 103rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 103rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 104th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 104th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 105th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 105th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 106th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 106th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 107th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 107th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 108th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 108th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 109th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 109th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 110th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 110th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 111th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 111th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 112th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 112th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 113th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 113th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 114th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 114th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 115th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 115th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 116th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 116th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 117th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 117th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 118th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 118th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 119th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 119th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 120th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 120th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 121st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 121st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 122nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 122nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 123rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 123rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 124th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 124th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 125th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 125th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 126th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 126th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 127th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 127th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 128th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 128th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 129th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 129th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 130th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 130th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 131st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 131st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 132nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 132nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 133rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 133rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 134th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 134th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 135th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 135th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 136th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 136th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 137th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 137th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 138th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 138th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 139th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 139th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 140th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 140th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 141st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 141st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 142nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 142nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 143rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 143rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 144th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 144th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 145th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 145th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 146th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 146th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 147th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 147th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 148th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 148th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 149th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 149th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 150th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 150th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 151st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 151st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 152nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 152nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 153rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 153rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 154th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 154th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 155th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 155th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 156th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 156th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 157th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 157th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 158th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 158th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 159th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 159th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 160th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 160th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 161st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 161st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 162nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 162nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 163rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 163rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 164th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 164th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 165th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 165th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 166th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 166th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 167th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 167th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 168th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 168th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 169th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 169th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 170th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 170th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 171st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 171st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 172nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 172nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 173rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 173rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 174th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 174th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 175th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 175th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 176th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 176th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 177th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 177th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 178th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 178th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 179th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 179th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 180th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 180th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 181st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 181st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 182nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 182nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 183rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 183rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 184th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 184th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 185th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 185th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 186th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 186th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 187th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 187th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 188th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 188th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 189th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 189th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 190th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 190th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 191st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 191st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 192nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 192nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 193rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 193rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 194th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 194th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 195th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 195th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 196th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 196th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 197th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 197th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 198th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 198th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 199th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 199th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 200th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 200th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 201st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 201st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 202nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 202nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 203rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 203rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 204th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 204th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 205th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 205th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 206th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 206th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 207th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 207th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 208th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 208th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 209th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 209th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 210th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 210th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 211th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 211th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 212th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 212th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 213th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 213th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 214th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 214th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 215th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 215th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 216th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 216th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 217th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 217th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 218th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 218th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 219th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 219th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 220th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 220th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 221st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 221st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 222nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 222nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 223rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 223rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 224th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 224th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 225th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 225th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 226th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 226th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 227th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 227th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 228th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 228th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 229th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 229th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 230th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 230th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 231st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 231st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 232nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 232nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 233rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 233rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 234th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 234th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 235th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 235th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 236th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 236th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 237th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 237th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 238th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 238th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 239th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 239th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 240th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 240th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 241st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 241st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 242nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 242nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 243rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 243rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 244th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 244th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 245th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 245th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 246th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 246th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 247th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 247th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 248th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 248th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 249th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 249th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 250th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 250th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 251st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 251st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 252nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 252nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 253rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 253rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 254th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 254th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 255th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 255th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 256th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 256th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 257th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 257th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 258th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 258th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 259th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 259th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 260th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 260th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 261st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 261st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 262nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 262nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 263rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 263rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 264th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 264th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 265th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 265th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 266th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 266th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 267th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 267th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 268th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 268th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 269th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 269th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 270th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 270th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 271st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 271st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 272nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 272nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 273rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 273rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 274th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 274th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 275th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 275th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 276th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 276th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 277th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 277th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 278th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 278th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 279th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 279th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 280th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 280th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 281st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 281st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 282nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 282nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 283rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 283rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 284th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 284th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 285th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 285th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 286th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 286th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 287th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 287th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 288th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 288th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 289th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 289th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 290th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 290th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 291st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 291st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 292nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 292nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 293rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 293rd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 294th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 294th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 295th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 295th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 296th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 296th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 297th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 297th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 298th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 298th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 299th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 299th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 300th move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 300th was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 301st move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 301st was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 302nd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 302nd was not the best move to play with. Mr. Staunton's 303rd move was a good one, and Mr. Buckley's 303rd

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

"There is no Elhridge now," said the old grandfather.

"I know all," said Oliver; "I had a letter from Margaret, telling me the story and begging me to keep a watch for her boy."

"A wide watch to keep and little to be got by it, I fear," old Sylvester added.

"Not altogether idle, perhaps; we have sharp eyes in the West, and see many strange things. Jane is confident she saw our Elhridge making through Ohio, but two months after he left here; he was riding swiftly, and in her surprise and suddenness she could neither call nor send after him."

"You did not tell us of that," said the old man.

"No, I waited some further discovery."

"Be silent now; you may easily waken hopes to be darkened and dashed to the ground. Which way made the boy?"

"Southward."

During this discourse, as though he distinguished the sound of his young master's name and knew to what it related, Chanticleer walked slowly, and as if by accident or at leisure, up and down the garden-wall, keeping as near to the speakers as was at all seemly. When they stopped speaking he leaped gently to the ground and softly clapped his wings.

A moment after there came hurrying into the garden, in a wild excitement, and all struggling to speak first, little Sam Peabody in the lead, Robert, the flat-featured youth of thirteen, and Peabody Junior (who, it should be mentioned, having found his way into a pantry a couple of minutes after his arrival with the captain, and appropriated to his own personal use an entire bottle of cherry brandy, had been straightway put to bed, from which he had now been released not more than a couple of hours), and to announce as clamorously as they respectively could that Brundage's bull had just got into "our big meadow."

In consequence of the stringency of the money market, and the gloomy state of mind produced by reading the daily papers, the fashionable young ladies sell their horses and poodles and content themselves with wooden substitutes—immense saving in provender, stabling, noise and doctors.

"Nobody hurt?" asked old Sylvester.

"Nobody hurt, grandfather; but he's ploughing up the meadow at a dreadful rate," said little Sam Peabody.

"Like wild," Peabody Junior added.

This statement, strongly as it was made, seemed to have no particular effect on old Sylvester. Oliver Peabody, on the other hand, was exceedingly indignant, and was for proceeding to extremities immediately, the expulsion of the Brundage bull, and the demanding of damages for allowing his cattle to cross the boundary line of the two farms.

Old Sylvester listened to his violence with a blank countenance; nor did he seem to comprehend that any special outrage had been committed, for it must be acknowledged that the only indication that the grandfather had come to his second childhood was, that, with his advancing years, and as he approached the shadow of the other world, he seemed to have lost all idea of the customary distinctions of rank and property, and that, very much like an old apostle, he was disposed to regard all men as brethren, and boundary lines as of very little consequence.

Where new shoes are possible, they will have to be of the most serviceable make. Consumption cured at the expense of elegance.

He therefore promptly checked his son Oliver in his heat, and discountenanced any further proceedings in the matter.

"Brundage," he said, "would, if he cared about him, come and take his bull away when he was ready; we are all brethren, and have a common country, Oliver," he added: "I hope you feel that in the West as well as we do here."

"Thank God we have," Oliver rejoined with emphasis, "and we love it!"

"I thank God for that too," old Sylvester replied, striking his staff firmly on the ground. "I remember well, my son, when your great State was a wilderness of woods and savage men, and now this common sky—look at it, Oliver—which shines so clearly above us, is yours as well as ours."

"I fear me, father, one day—bright, beautiful and wide-arched as it is—the glorious Union may fall," said Oliver, laying his hand upon an aged tree which stood near them—"may fall, and the States drop one by one away, even as the fruit I shake to the ground."

As though he had been a tower standing on an elevation, old Sylvester Peabody rose aloft to his full height, as if he would clearly contemplate the far past, the distant and the broad-coming future.

"The Union fall!" he cried. "Look above, my son! The Union fall! as long as the constellations of evening live together in yonder sky; look down, as long as the great rivers of our land flow eastward and westward, north and south, the Union shall stand up, and stand majestical and bright, beheld by ages, as these shall be, an orb and living stream of glory unsurpassable."

The children were gathered about, and watched with eager eyes and glowing cheeks the countenance of the grandfather as he spoke.

"No, no, my son," he added, "there's many a true heart in brave Ohio, as in every State of ours, or they could not be the noble powers they are."

While old Sylvester spoke, Oliver Peabody wrenched with some violence, from the tree near which they stood, a stout limb, on the end of which he employed himself with a knife in shaping a substantial knob.

"What weapon is that you are busy with, Oliver?" old Sylvester asked.

"It's for that nasty bull," Oliver replied. "I would break every bone in his body rather than let him remain for a single minute on my land; the furtherance of law and order demands the instant enforcement of one's rights."

"You are a friend of law and order, my son."

"I think I am," Oliver answered, standing erect and planting his club, in the manner of Hercules in the pictures, head down on the ground.

"I hope you are, Oliver, but I fear you forget the story I used to tell of my old friend Bulkley, of Danbury, who, being written to by some neighboring Christians who were in sore dissension for advisement, gave them back word: Every man to look after his own fence, that it be built high and strong, and to have a special care of the old black bull; meaning thereby, no doubt, our own wicked passions; that is the true Christian way of securing peace and good order."

Oliver threw his great trespass-club upon the ground, and was on the point of asking after an old sycamore, the largest growth of all that country—which, standing in a remote field, had, in the perilous times, sheltered many of the Peabody family in its bosom—when he was interrupted by the sudden appearance of Mopsey in a flutter of cap strings, shuffling shoes, and a flying color in her looks of at least double the usual depth of darkness. It was just discovered that the poultry-house had been broken into over night and four of the fattest hens taken off by the throat and legs, besides sundry of the inferior members of the domicile; as wicked a theft, Mopsey said, as ever was, and she hadn't the slightest hesitation in charging it on them niggers in the Hills (a neighboring settlement of colored people, who lived from hand to mouth and seemed to be fed, like the ravens, by some mystery of Providence).

Oliver Peabody watched closely the countenance of the patriarch, not a little curious to learn what effect this announcement would have upon his temper.

"This is all our own fault," said old Sylvester, promptly. "We should have remembered this was thanksgiving time, and sent them something to stay their stomachs. Poor creatures, I always wondered how they got along! Send 'em some bread, Mopsey, for they never can do anything with fowls without bread!"

"Send 'em some bread!" Mopsey rejoined, growing blacker and more ugly of look as she spoke; "send 'em whips, and an osifer of the law! The four fattest of the coop!"

"Never mind," said old Sylvester.

"Six of the tend'rest young'uns!"

"Never mind that," said old Sylvester.

"I'd have them all in the county jail before sundown," urged Mopsey.

"Oliver, we will go in to tea," continued the patriarch. "We have enough for tea, Mopsey?"

"Yes, quite enough, mas'r."

"Then," cried the old man, striking his staff on the ground with great violence, rising to his full height, and glowing like a furnace upon Mopsey, "then, I say, send 'em some bread!"

This speech, delivered in a voice of authority, sent Mopsey, shuffling and cowering, away, without a word, and brought the sweat of horror to the brow of Oliver, which he proceeded to remove with a great cotton pocket-handkerchief, produced from his coat behind, on which was displayed in glowing colors, by some cunning artist, the imposing scene of the signers of the Declaration of Independence getting ready to affix their names. Mr. Oliver Peabody was the politician of the family, and always had the immortal Declaration of Independence at his tongue's end, or in hand.

Aunt Tabitha disposes of her favorite parrot to a poultry dealer, and purchases one of wood—which saves the food. Pretty Poll only speaks when pressed.

CHAPTER IV.—THE FORTUNES OF THE FAMILY CONSIDERED.

When Oliver and old Sylvester entered the house they found all of the family gathered within, save the children, who loitered about the doors and windows, looking in, anxious eyed, on the preparations for tea going forward under the direction of the widow Margaret and Mopsey. The other women of the household were busy with discussion of the merits of Mrs. Carrack, of Boston, the fashionable lady of the family.

"I should like to see Mrs. Carrack above all things," said the captain's pretty little wife; "she must be a fine woman, from all I have heard of her."

"Thee will have small chance, I fear, child" said Mrs. Jane Peabody, sitting buxomly in an easy armchair, which she had quietly assumed; "she is too fine for the company of us plain folks, in every point of view."

"It's five years since she was here," the widow suggested, as she adjusted the chairs around the table; "she said she never would come inside the house again, because the best bedchamber was not given to her—I am sorry to say it."

"She's a heathen and wicked woman," Mopsey said, shuffling at the door, and turning back on her way to the kitchen—'your poor boy was lying low of a fever, and how could she expect it.'

"In one point of view, she may come. Her husband was living then," continued Mrs. Jane Peabody; "she has become a rich woman since, and may honor us with a visit—to show us how great a person she has got to be. Let her come—it needn't trouble thee, nor me, I'm sure." Mrs. Jane Peabody smoothed her Quaker vandyke, and sat stiffly in her easy chair.

Hoops entirely abrogated as involving expense; fewer deaths by crinoline taking fire.

Old Sylvester entering at that moment, laid aside his staff and broad-brimmed hat, which little Sam Peabody ran in to take charge of, and took his seat at the head of the table; the captain, who was busy at the back-door securing an old rusty fowling-piece for some enterprise he had in view in the morning, was called in by his little wife; the others were seated in their places about the board.

"Where's William?" old Sylvester asked.

He was at a window in the front room, where he had sat for several hours, with spectacles on his brow, poring over an old faded parchment deed, which related to some neighboring land he thought belonged to the Peabodys (although in possession of others), and which he had always made a close study of on his visits to the homestead. There was a dark passage, under which he made their title, which had been submitted to various men learned in the law; it was too dark and doubtful, in their opinion, to build a contest on, and yet William Peabody gave it every year a new examination, with the hope, perhaps, that the wisdom of advancing age might enable him to fathom and expound it, although it had been drawn up by the greatest lawyer of his day in all that country. His wife Hannah, grieving in spirit that her husband should be toiling for ever in the quest of gain, sat near him, pale, calm, and disheartened, but speaking not a word. He could not look at her with that fearful green shade on her face, but kept his eyes always fixed on the old parchment. When his aged father had taken his seat, and began his thanks to God for the bounties before them, as though the old patriarch had brought a better spirit from the calm day without, he thrust the paper into his bosom and glided to his place at the table. It would have done you good to hear that old man's prayer. He neither solicited forgiveness for his enemies nor favors for his friends; for schools, churches, presidents, or governments; neither for health, wealth, or worldly welfare, nor for any single other thing; all he said, bowing his white old head, was this—

"May we all be Christian people the day we die—God bless us."

That was all; and his kinsfolk lost no appetite in listening to it, for it was no sooner uttered than they all fell to; and not a word more was spoken for five minutes at least, nor then, per-hope, had not little Sam Peabody cried out, with breathless animation, and delight of feature,

"The pig-on, grandfather!" at the same time pointing from the door to the receding sky, along which they were winging their calm and clear flight in a countless train—streaming on westward as though there was an end to them; which put old Sylvester upon recalling the cheerful sports of his younger days.

"I have taken a couple of hundred in a net on the hill before breakfast many a time," he said.

"You used to help me, William."

"Yes, I and old Ethan Barbary," said the merchant, " used to spring the net; you grew the seed."

"Old Ethan has been dead many a day. Eaton," continued old Sylvester, in a reproachful, "was the father of our Mr. Barbary. He was a preacher too and carried a gun in the Revolution. I remember he was accounted a peculiar man. I never knew why. To be sure he used to speak, the time he did not employ in prayer, preaching and tending his flock, in working on the farms about, for he had no wages for preaching. When there was none of that to be had, he took his net, and sallying through the fields, gathered berries, while the neighbors needy families of the neighborhood. In winter he collected beechnut in the woods about, or the seed for the pear.

"That was a useful idea," said Oliver the politician. "It must have made him very popular."

"Wasn't he always thought to be a little out of his head?" asked the merchant. "He might have sold the wood for a good price in the severe winters."

"I remember it as if it were yesterday," old Sylvester went on in his own way, not heeding in the slightest the suggestions of his sons, "he and black Borting, who is buried in the woods by the great walnut-tree, near the pond, both fought in the American revolution, and had but one gun between them, which they used turn about."

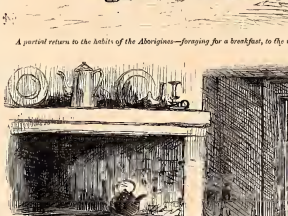
"You saw rough times in those days, grandfather," said the captain.

"I did, Charley," old Sylvester answered, looking kindly on the captain, who had always been something of a favorite of his from the day he had married into the family; "and there are but few left to talk with me of them now. I am one of the living survivors of an almost extinguished race. The grave will soon t e our only habitation. I am one of the few tasks that still remain in the field where the tempest passed. I have fought against the foreign foe for your sake: they have disappeared from the land, and you are free; the strength of my arm delays, and my feet fail me in the way; the blood which fought for your liberties is now open to bleed you. In my youth I bled in battle that you might be independent—let me my heart, in my old age, bleed because you abandon the path I would have you follow."

The old patriarch leaned his head upon his hand, and the company was silent as though they had listened to a voice from the grave. He presently looked up and smiled—" Old Ethan, I call to mind now," he renewed, " had a quality which our poor Barbary inherited, and for which," he added, looking towards his son William, "and for which I greatly honor his memory. He combed the money of this world but as dross. From his boyhood to the very moment of his entering on the ministry, he never would touch silver nor gold—partly, I think, because it was the true Scripture course, and partly because a dreadful accident once happened in the Barbary family, growing out of a quarrel for the possess n of a paltry sum of money."

The bread she was raising to her lips fell from the widow's hand, for she could not but help thinking of the history of her absent son, and the evice of Miriam, who did not present herself at the table, was heard from a distant chamber, not distinctly, but in that sort of chanting lament which had become habituel to her whether in house, garden or field. It was an inexpressibly mournful cadence, and for the time stilled all other sounds. They were only drawn away from it by descrying Mopsey the black servant in a turn of the road, hurrying with great animation towards the homestead, but with a singularity in her progress which could not fail to be observed. She rushed along at great speed, for several paces, and suddenly came to a halt, during which her head disappeared, and then renewed her pace, repeating the peculiar manœuvre she had used in every stage of her course. She was shaking on to her loose shoe (which were on or off, one or the other of them every other minute), at as rapid a rate as that peculiar species of locomotion allowed. Bursting with impatience and the importance of her communication, her cap flaunting from the back of her head in the doorway and announced, "We've beat Brundage—we've beat Brundage!"

A portrait return to the habits of the Aborigines—foraging for a breakfast, to the increase of appetite and diminution of gout.



The fashionable young ladies learn some household arts and sciences, long since considered as lost to Aquascidom. Servant-palmia in decline.

In consequence of the young ladies doing all the housework, the Bridian take a sudden and sorrowful departure for their native land. Requiescent in pace.

"What's this, Mopsey?" old Sylvester inquired.

"I've tried it, and I've spanned it. I can't span corn!"

On further questioning, it appeared that Mopsey had been on a pilgrimage to the next neighbor's, the Brandages, to inspect their Thanksgiving pumpkin, and institute a comparison with the Peabody growth; of that kind, with a highly satisfactory and complacent result as regarded the home production. Nobody was other-ise than pleased at Mopsey's success and coming, and when she had been duly complimented on her accession she went away with a broad black gaiter to set a trap in the grass for the brown mouse, the sole surviving enemy of the great Peabody Thanksgiving pumpkin which must be plucked next day for use.

With the dispatch of the evening meal, old Sylvester withdrew to the other room, with a little hand-lamp, to read a chapter by himself, the others remaining seated about the apartment. The captain and Oliver presently fell into a violent discussion on the true sources of national wealth, the captain giving it as his opinion that it solely depended on having a great number of ships at sea, and Oliver on seven different occasions—Oliver was equally clear and resolute—that the real wealth of a nation lay in the wheat crops. When Oliver was at the height of the bustle of argument, he would fall a quarter and pound a general bankruptcy staring you in the face. Mr. William Peabody wasn't at the pains to differ in opinion, but he was satisfied, in his secret mind, that it lay in the success of new houses, or the prosperous supply of calicoes—he didn't make up his mind which. Presently Oliver was troubled again in reference to the supply of gold in the world—whether there was enough to do business with. He also had some things to say (which he had out of a great speech in Congress) about bullion and rates of exchange, but nobody understood him.

"By the way," he added, "Mr. Carrick's son Tiffany has gone to the Gold Region. From what he writes to me, I think he'll cut a very great figure in that country."

"An exceedingly fine, talented young man," said the merchant, who had then under-current on hand from his mother.

"In a very great vein of view in which you regard it," continued Oliver, "the gold country is an important acquisition."

"You haven't the letter Tiffany wrote with you?" interrupted the captain.

"I think I have," was the answer. "I brought it, supposing you might like to look at it. Shall I send it?"

There was no objection; the letter was read—in which Mr. Tiffany Carrick professed his wearin ss of civilized life—got a touch of misspent hours—a determination to rally and do something important, intimating that there was a great country for enterprising young men, and, in a familiar strain, closed with a kindly remembrance to do or die.

"I have a letter to the same effect," said the captain.

"And so have I," said William Peabody, "word for word."

"He seems to do something very grand," said the captain. Something very grand—the women all agreed—for Mr. Tiffany Carrick was a nice young man, and had a prospect of inheriting a hun ired thousand dollars, to say nothing of the large sums he was to bring from the Gold Region. It was evident to all that he was going into the business with a rush. They, of course, wouldn't see Mr. Tiffany Carrick at the Brandages giving gatherings—he had better business on hand—but Tiffany Carrick was clearly the promising young man of the family, and was carrying the fortunes of the Peabodys into the remotest corners of the land.

"In a word," said Mr. Oliver Peabody, developing the Declaration of Independence in the pocket handkerchief, "he is going to do wonders in every point of view. He'll carry the principles of free government everywhere!"

The consideration of the extraordinary talents and energies of the son imparted a new interest to the question of the coming of Mrs. Carrick, which was discussed in all the bearings, and was almost the businesses of the whole evening. Oliver Peabody instructed his wife to be very attentive to Mrs. Carrick. It was necessary to look for one. There had been a private dispute—secretly opposed only by Mrs. Jane Peabody, to wish for that distinguished person the best bed-chamber, which was always accounted a great prize and distinguished honor among the family. But now there was scarcely any need of reserving it longer—and who was to have it? Also! that is a question, often mixed in rural households, often shakes them to the very base, and spreads through whole families a bitterness and strength and length of strife which frequently ends only with life itself.

To bring the matter to an issue, various waispoint conversations were held in the small room.

lying next to the sitting-room, at first between Mrs. Margaret Peabody and Mooney, to which one by one were summoned, Mrs. Jane Peabody, the captain's wife, and Mrs. Hannah Peabody. The more it was observed the farther off seemed any reasonable conclusion. When the house was fully prepared, various fires of the most approved kinds were found: when another, other fuses. Each and all simulated; smoke, but no blood; fuses every manner, and all burning, but with a habit's way to fall out before they burn into his bible, and bring him to their fuses; he would not have had the sanctum hint how disturbed the peace of the Peabodys. He was long in discovering the cause of it little, and even in subsequent adieus to them willing calmly to Eden among the sweet spices of all degrees and kinds, the old sea-hawk came forward into the house of the Peabody's, saying: "My children," he said, "should dwell in peace for the short stay allotted them on earth." He made a difference about an email a matter as a lodging-place—they are small and beautiful spaces. I have seen the day when, camping on the wet grounds and mountains, I would have held any one of them to be a palace chamber. The back chamber," my child," he continued, addressing the captain's wife, "looks out on the orchard, where you may love to walk; the white room, Hannah, locates your father's house; and, Jane, you cannot object to the front chamber, for you, myself will banished, and has the best of the sunrise, The Sun of day, my children, had risen before we lay his head, and shall we who are but mails and worms, compared with his glory and grandeur, presume to exalt ourselves, where he was abased."

The old gentleman's advice then was delighted, and with the deepest reverence for his character, he called the Cough or Irritation of the throat he never willingly, by this precaution a more serious affection may sometimes be prevented. 150

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

Coughs.

TRUE, sudden and sudden changes of our climate are fruitful sources of Coughs, Colds, and Bronchial affections. Experience has long proved that simple remedies act promptly and safely when taken in the early stage of the disease, and hence, as soon as the first symptoms appear, a dose or two of Brown's Bronchial Troches, or Lozenges, will be found of great benefit in relieving the Cough or Irritation of the throat he never willingly, by this precaution a more serious affection may sometimes be prevented. 150

WHITE'S PATENT LEVER TRUSS AND SUPPORTER

A New Discovery FOR THE Retention and Radical Cure of Hernia, &c

White's Patent Lever Truss.

This instrument, which is now offered to the public in this city, radically different in principle and action from all others, is the result of many years' valuable point in other Trusses, besides several points of the highest value never before attained. Among some of the advantages claimed for the improvement are the following: It is self-adjusting, retaining a perfect hold in every position of the body, and under all circumstances of exertion; it is durable and cannot get out of order; it is comfortable and cannot chafe or compress; no unpleasantness in wearing; no Belt, and none on the Pneumatic Cone; does not work out of place; prevents many complaints, incurring, obstruct, most stubborn, shows soon, and in the majority of cases permanently cures; can be had the most powerful and in a radical cure. The Lever, Pad, Cone, Spring, Belt, and Buckle are all separate, perfectly good. Call and examine it, or send for Letter and Gentlemen by the Professor, GEORGE WHITE, No. 36 Bond St., N. Y. for their adjustment.

These Instruments are also offered at wholesale by Messrs. E. S. Barnes & Co., Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row; Messrs. Lemuel Williams & Co., No. 2 Vesey Street, and at the Manufactory, No. 33 Bond St., New York. 253

A ROCKING CHAIR WITHOUT ROCKERS—The 8th exception" Rocking Chairs sold by Jerry A. Wells, No. 651 Broadway, stand on centennial and rock without rockers. They are made in the various styles of the ordinary arm chair and similar in pattern and cushions, and present a similar appearance, but are supported by a spring operated by a catch, and the chair rocks on the other upright part of the spring, rockers dispensed. This makes them very convenient for invalid chairs, for which purpose certain styles of them have been found very desirable. Also, a library or office chair, combining as they do of easy change of position; they have the advantage of protracted sitting, and are genuinely appropriate as a present to an aged person or invalid friend. Also, a variance of rockers, which wear carpets so injuriously, and are not in the way, is the one great feature of this new invention. 253

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,

FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.

For curing and preventing Baldness.

For removing Scurf and Dandruff.

For beautifying and making the Hair soft and curly

It acts on the scalp and follicles composed of the kind to be sure and get the right article.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator.

Price 25 cents per bottle.

Wholesale Depot, 50 Dey St., New York.

PROF. L. MILLER'S INSTANTANEOUS LIQUID HAIR DYE.

Warranted superior to all others.

Try them, and you will acknowledge the fact. 260-65

CURE FOR DYSPEPSIA.

Dr. Van Doren's Dyspepsia Antidote,

A Sure and Certain Remedy

For Dyspepsia under whatever symptom it may be developed. It is the cure for Sour Stomach, Rushing of weight at the Stomach, Loss of Appetite, Distension of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Sick Headache, Depression of Spirits, Torpor of the Liver, Jaundice, and all diseases arising from a deranged Stomach.

This medicine strengthens and regulates the Stomach, and gives tone and action to the Digestive Organs, without any of the debilitating effects generally produced by the various remedies used.

It is composed of purely vegetable substances, and may be taken with perfect safety by those most delicately organized, as it contains no mineral.

This is no new and untried remedy, but one compounded after years of investigation and experiment by the late Dr. J. L. Van Doren, and used in his practice with great success. Many of all other remedies have been tried and failed.

Use this, and the experiment is has no equal. "Eh

It is so handsome, but a safe and reliable medicine, as has been proved by thousands of cases in New York and vicinity within the last few years.

Price—A single tablespoonful.

Put up in quart bottles, and for sale by all druggists. Prepared and sold, wholesale and Retail, by

ROBERTS & CO.,

215-76 262 Broadway, N. Y.

Send for Specimen of

CLARK'S SCHOOL VISITOR,

An Illustrated Day School Paper for Teachers and Pupils everywhere. Address MACHAUT & HAMMOND, 263-65 411 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Sands' Sarsaparilla

CURES CUTANEOUS ERUPTIONS,

And has an actinic like effect on the general system, removing Constipation, correcting Acidities and easing all Nervous conditions. 253

A Great Picture!

NOW ON EXHIBITION at No. 42 East Fourteenth St., Union Square, WASHBURN'S ORIGINAL PICTURE OF DANAE.

Admittance, 25 cts. Season Tickets, 50 cts. 263

NEW BOOKS FOR AGENTS,

Sold only by Subscription.

WANTED—An Agent in every County, to engage in the sale of Interesting and Instructive Works. Circulars, giving full particulars, sent free to applicants. For a full list of my Publications, send an application. Address

DEANE HARRIS,

Quincy Cy Publishing House,

262-64 No. 33 North Fifth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Bogle's Hair Dye and Wigs

At 68 Nassau-street and 5 Ann-street, N. Y. An unapproachable in their superior merits. Wigs are peruvian. Try the one, and you will always send to one.

BOGLE'S ELECTRIC HAIR-DYE

Private Rooms for Dying Hair and Fitting Wigs at No. 68 Nassau-street, between Fulton and Ann streets. No. 202 Washington St., Boston. Beware of imitations. Sold by druggists generally. 259

Boar's Head Six Cord Spool Cotton.

ESTABLISHED 1793.

Superior to any ever imported in Strength, Smoothness and Elasticity, for

MACHINE OR HAND SEWING.

Six Spools of 200 Yards, 1200 and 2,400 Yards, the lengths warranted.

C. CARVILLE,

Mills Agent, 105 Fulton St.

Holloway's Pills

Are the only universal medicine of the present day. They are recommended above the science of its wonderful influence, and have been used by millions for all the maladies and infirmities to which the human race are heir to. 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all druggists and venders of medicine throughout the civilized world. 260-65

Dr. Phelps' Trusses.

THE great number of radical cures of Hernia within the last few years, by the use of Dr. J. W. Phelps' Spiral Spring Trusses, has given them the preference over all others. He appreciates the correction and cure of all kinds of deformities are used at the Establishments Gen. Hospital, and are recommended by the first Surgeons in Europe and America.

At the sign of the Golden Eagle, 68 Fremont St., Boston. 263-64

THE PEOPLE'S GREAT BOOKS.

Copies Already Sold.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES;

BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S.,

Graduate of Veterinary and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association, &c., &c.

In One Handsome Volume, 8vo.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES, although but Two Months issued from the press, has already received the unqualified approval of upwards of Fifty Thousand Horse Owners, and is now, and will only, do so, when completed, realize more than the Horse ever published. It tells you of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of Horses in America, Africa and American Horses, with the physical features and peculiarities of the animal, and how to advertise him to buy by the number and on doing which tells; also of Breeding, Breaking, Subduing, Training, Shoeing, Grooming, Feeding, Watering and Management of the Horse, with the best method of administering medicine also, How to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Stumbling, Cribbing, Restlessness, and other vices of which he is subject, with numerous explanatory engravings

HORSES AND HIS DISEASES tells you of the causes, symptoms and treatment of Staggers, Sore Throat, Distemper, Influenza, Bronchitis, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Cough, Heaving and Nasal Gleet, Lockjaw, Sore Mouth and Ulcers, and Diseases Teeth, with the best method of extracting them, Diseases of the Organs of Digestion, Worms, Bots, Colic, Constipation, Stony Concretions Hepatitis, Jaundice, Dropsy, Anasarca, Diseases of the Kidneys, Bloody Urine in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation, Stone in the Bladder, Inflammation, Swelled Legs, Diseases of the Skin, Mange, Scratches, Lice and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you the causes, symptoms and treatment of Sprains, Bruises, Broken Knees, Wounds, Bruises, Bruising, Bruises, Cuts, Wounds, Bruises, Sore Shoulders, Sore Backs, Saddle, Sore Backs, Harness Galls, Sore Tendons, Sore Feet, Thrush, Corns, Quarter Crack, Foundered Feet, Hoof Bound, Contracted Hoofs, Grease, Scratches, Tetanus and Curbs; also, of Ringbone, Navicular, Spavin, Splents, Curbs and other diseases of the Feet, Legs and Head, of Fistula, Poll Evil, Gunshot, Sore Withers, Sore Back, Saddle Galls, Sore Ears, Abscesses, Cysts, Galls, Diseases of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Castration, Bleeding, Tongueing, Docking, Nicking, Rowelling, Mandrilling, Tapping and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you of Barrys, Method of Making Horses Love or Appreciate Hitter or Stable's Oil; how to administer a Horse to strange persons and sights; how to Bit, Bit, Saddle, Ride and Break Horses Harness; also the Farm and Use of Waggons. The whole being the result of more than fifteen years' careful study of the habits, peculiarities, wants and weaknesses of this noble and useful animal.

The book contains 384 pages, illustrated by nearly two Hundred Engravings, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or, in cloth, extra, $1 25.

$1,000 A YEAR can be made by canvassing for this popular work. Our subscription list is now open, and we offer liberal terms to Agents.

As these books are unequalled in their methodized examination of the Horse and his Diseases, and contain more than double the information of any other work, the sale is unlimited.

For single copies, or for terms to Agents, with other information, address as above.

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,

263-66 No. 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$1,500 PER ANNUM—Agents Wanted, to travel or locally, in every County in the United States, to sell a new and useful article, on which salary or cash profits guaranteed. For particulars inquire or call at room 3, No. 315, corner B. Lockwood, Brainard & Co., New York City. 264

A Card.

THE Subscriber will send to all who wish it (free) the Recipe and full directions for using the Italian Balm, which in a few days renders the Hair Luxuriant, Beautiful, Soft and Glossy. Containing Curpons, which is warranted to bring out a full set of whiskers in from four to eight weeks.

Apply to or address THOS. F. CHAPMAN, 263tw Chemist, 831 Broadway, New York.

"GET THE BEST."

Webster's Unabridged Dictionary.

NEW PICTORIAL EDITION.

1,500 Pictorial Illustrations.

9,000 to 10,000 NEW WORDS in the Vocabulary.

Recently published, by G. & C. MERRIAM,

Successors to Webster, and Publishers of the Entire Unabridged Persons of Webster Dictionary.

In one Volume of 1,730 Pages.

Price $6 50. Sold by all Booksellers.

"GET THE BEST."

G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass.

L. BAILEY'S VARIETY ENVELOPE, containing writing paper with Envelopes to match, also some article of Jewellery of the same kind enclosed by the gift-book dealers from 50 cts. to $5. Single packages sent by mail on the receipt of 25 cts. and 6 cts. for postage.

A liberal commission per cent to Cash:

On an Order of 5 parcels at $1 25. 1 extra parcel free of cost.

" " 10 " " 2 50. 2 " " "

" " 20 " " 5 00. 5 " " "

Circulars containing Terms to Travelling Agents and a few Trade sent on application.

260-62 L. L. BAILEY, 144 Court St., Boston.

SEWING MACHINE.

PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.

SALESROOM, NO. 335 BROADWAY.

This Machine is distinguished on an entirely new principle of mechanism. It possesses many rare and valuable improvements—each being essential to make perfection exists, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY AND PERFECTION COMBINED!

The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:

1. Excessive labor to the operator.
2. Liability to get out of order.
3. Noisy, trouble and fuss if it can be repaired.
4. Its capacity is to a very low degree of material.
5. Disagreeable noise while in operation.

The Empire Sewing Machine

IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.

It has a straight needle, perpendicular motion, makes the ELASTIC LOCK STITCH, alike on both sides, sews all sorts, and is adapted to light, heavy, leather, or fancy sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nainsook Muslin, with cotton, linen or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither Cam or Cog wheel, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is PROFOUNDLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.

It requires only the easy low power to drive a Hand any other Machine! It sews, in a given space of time, as ago one work it steadily, without fatigue or injury to health!

Its strength and simplicity of construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is GUARANTEED by the Company for a period of five years.

We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this unrivalled MACHINE.

But if in a more personal manner do we solicit the patronage of a

MERCHANT TAILORS,
COACH-MAKERS,
HOUSE-FURNISHING MANUFACTURERS,
SHIRT AND BOSOM MAKERS,
DRESS-MAKERS,
CORSET-MAKERS,
HAT MANUFACTURERS,
HOSE-KNITTERS,
VEST AND PANTALOON-MAKERS

Religious and Charitable Institutions

WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.

PRICE OF MACHINES COMPLETE:

No. 1.—For Family Machine, ... $60
No. 2.—For Light Manufacturing, ... 80
No. 3.—For Heavy Manufacturing, ... 100

AGENTS WANTED for all towns in the United States. Terms made known by inquiring at the Salesroom, No. 335 Broadway.

T. J. McARTHUR & CO.
000

The Water-Cure Journal.

THERE is no publication in the world from which you can gain so much valuable information relative to the laws of Life and Health, as

The Water-Cure Journal.

It is the true nature and cause of disease are fully and rationally explained, and the best means to prevent and cure it is taught.

How to Keep Well.

But as some from Hereditary affection, or supposed unavoidable causes to be exempt from the supervention of disease, is devoted to articles relative to the treatment of diseases, where it may be had.

How to Recover Health when Sick.

The JOURNAL is now in the fifteenth year of publication, and thousands in every part of the country are testifying to the priceless benefits they have derived from its perusal.

Published monthly at $1 a year. Five copies, $3; ten copies, $5.

FOWLER & WELLS,
308 Broadway, New York.

☞ All who send in their subscriptions for the year 1861, will receive a copy of WATER-CURE FOR THE MILLION gratis.

FINKLE & LYON'S
SEWING MACHINES,

Our Machines took the highest premium at the Fair of the American Institute, with the highest premium for the Sewing Machine work.

They are now the highest premium at the New Jersey State Fair, at the Maryland Institute, and at the Franklin Institute, and so generally wherever exhibited.

Lots office 343 Broadway.

REMOVED TO 439 BROADWAY 000

Chapped Hands and Lips

CURED IN A FEW HOURS BY THE USE OF

WARNER & CO.'S
CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE,

81 Bleecker St., 205 Fourth Av., N. Y. By mail 26 cents 250-53

$40. Parker Sewing Machine, $40.
Plain Oaks, Donna Instead,
Rapid and Noiseless, Lock Stitch of Hems, Gravel & Baker, Whether & Wilson Agents wanted.
Office, TUNNEL & CO.,
No. 469 Broadway.

Being a new Theory and System of Practical Penmanship. Designed as a Text-Book for Schools and Private Students.

This is the title of a new work just issued, which it is believed will do more to improve the penmanship of the children than all else in our home schools. It teaches no theory, but a practical system, which is easily learned by rule. Knowing that the teacher who possesses a skill and point attained, nothing but practice is necessary to make him an accomplished penman.

Sent by mail, postpaid, for 10 cents. AGENTS WANTED.

PAYSON, WOOD & WARREN,
308 Broadway, New York.

DR. HORAN'S RHEUMATIC CURE.—This is a valuable French Remedy, and of thousands of cases, has not in one instance failed to effect a speedy cure. It is perfectly harmless, but certain in its effects, in severe cases of Chronic, Acute and Inflammatory Rheumatism. Neuralgia, Lame Back, Sciatica, Gout, and all kinds of Nervous Affections. Many thousands have been cured. One bottle is sufficient for ordinary cases. Price $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5. For sale by all Druggists, and at the Depot, No. 692 Broadway. Sent by Express to any part of the United States and Canada, upon receipt of the price. Circulars supplied. 251-66

The Stove that Pleases Everybody.

THE "INDEPENDENT"
LARGE OVEN
COOKING STOVE,
For all Countries and all Climates,
FOR HARD OR SOFT COAL, OR FOR WOOD.

ADVANTAGES:

1. Self-cleaning from the ashes.
2. Its Sheeting, Grate, and Mode for conducting the coal and ashes into the hearth.
3. An Oven large enough, and well ventilated.
4. The improved double-arch Flues, and extra large at flue.
5. The thickness of the castings and the extra fitting and finish
6. Great economy in the use of fuel.
7. The Patent Duplex Grate, or Shaker Grate Grinders, which fit so close without burning or cutting the more or the coals.
8. Refined Roasting Oven—before the fire
9. Hot Water Reservoir and Hot Closet if desired.
10. Fire Brick, which last most as well as any range, and at half the cost.

Every Stove guaranteed. Sold by the principal Dealers in nearly every State in the Union.

Address, DESMOND & PERRY, Agents,
Albany, N. Y.

Worth Having.
THE MINE OF WEALTH."

A Book that instructs how to make one article that does more use making such $25 a day from. Also two articles that will sell to every house and make $5 a day. Also more articles that Agents are making from $3 to $5 a day with. Book sent free of postage. Wholesale rates and all sales require no other means public, some of which cost $1 per hundred. Circulars to be mailed for the price.

GARRISON & CO., Publishers,
128 Randolph Street, Chicago, P. O. Box 2871.
265-74

PHOTOCHROMATIC OIL PAINTINGS.—Agents wanted to introduce the beautiful art. Young men are making over $75 a month in this business. Profits immense and ready for work. Send stamp for circular. L. TODD & CO., Lowell, Mass.
256 66

Ayer's Compound Extract Sarsaparilla.

NO one remedy is more needed in the country than a reliable alterative, but the sick have been deceived so often by what has proved worthless or of therapeutic value that they have become discouraged on the cure. Yet the drug cannot be blamed for the imposition practiced upon the credulity of the people. Sarsaparilla in market contains little of the virtues of the genuine root, and that little. They are never reliable, and worthless, while a concentrated extract of the active principles of Sarsaparilla, combined with other alteratives, has the power to cure the various forms of blood disease, and is the most reliable remedy. Such is Ayer's Extract of Sarsaparilla, as its many wonderful cures of the most severe of complaints which require an alterative medicine have abundantly shown. Do not, therefore, distrust this alterative medicine because you have been imposed upon by something pretending to be Sarsaparilla, while it was not. When you have used Ayer's—then, and not till then, will you have tried Sarsaparilla sufficiently to judge what it will do for you. Then we are sure you will join with your neighbors and friends in saying that Ayer's Extract of Sarsaparilla is the best blood purifier we know of, and does more real good than any other remedy we can use.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills, for the cure of Costiveness, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Sick Headache, Foul Stomach, Erysipelas, Rheumatism, Piles, Rheumatism, Heartburn, Worms, Coughs, Colds, Influenza, and for the Derangements of the Bowels, Flux, Dysentery, Loss of Appetite, Liver Complaint, Fevers, and as a Dinner Pill, they are the best cathartic Purgative in use.

They are sugar coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best aperient in the world for all the purposes of a family physic. Price 25 cents per Box. Five Boxes for $1.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand Ayer's and take no other. For sale by all druggists everywhere. Prepared and for sale by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists, everywhere.

201-52

IMPORTANT INVENTION FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.—For particulars address, inclosing stamp, DR. R. BRICKELL, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 120 Broadway, New York. 250-71

The Union Clothes Dryer.
A NEW INVENTION—DEEPUL, CHEAP AND USEFUL.

By which Clothes in large or small quantities may be dried in a yard, a room, or on the top of a house. Can be put up and taken down in a moment. Price only $1 50 to $3.

J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors, 417 Broadway (near Grand St.), New York, and 212 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

WHAT SHALL I DO FOR MY HAIR?—The RAHARIMO, or LION'S KATHAIRON, preparations never fail to restore, invigorate, and beautify the human hair. In cases of baldness, no other thing has ever been found universal success. It removes Dandruff, Humors, and Heats, and imparts a delightful odor.

HANDSOME WOMEN.
TO THE LADIES.

HUNT'S "BLOOM OF ROSES," a rich and delicate color for the cheeks and lips, WILL NOT WASH OR RUB OFF, and retains its beautiful remains durable for years, mailed free in a bottle for $1.

HUNT'S "COCOATONE POMPEIAN" imparts a dazzling whiteness to the complexion, and is unlike anything else used for the purpose, mailed free for 50 cts

HUNT'S "PEARL BALM" removes Tan, Freckles, Sunburn and all eruptions of the skin; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "IMPERIAL POMADE," for the Hair, strengthens and improves its growth, keeps it from falling off, and WONDERFUL TO MAKE THE HAIR CURL; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "FLORAL BEAUTIFIER," for the Teeth and Gums, cleanses and whitens the Teeth, hardens the Gums, prevents the Breath obtaining a disagreeable odor. Tans and PREVENTS TOOTHACHE; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "FLORAL WREATH PERFUME," a double extract of orange blossoms and cologne, mailed free for $1.

This exquisite Perfume was first used by the PRINCESS ROYAL OF ENGLAND, on her marriage. MESSRS. HUNT & CO. presented the Princess with an elegant set of the Perfumery (in which all the above articles were included), in a beautiful Rosewood Case, made in the form of a Lyre, the peculiarities of which appeared in its pretty prizes. All the above articles sent free by express for $5. Cash can either accompany the order or be paid to the express agent on delivery of goods.

HUNT & CO., Perfumers to the Queen,
Regent Street, London, and 707 San ON St., Philadelphia
The Trade supplied.

AGENTS WANTED.—In every city, town and county in the United States, by the old established house of Osborne & Co. No person out of employ need apply unless he can furnish the best of references, as unqualified and recommendations will be required. Address F. H. OSBORNE & CO.,
252-68 No. 423 Walnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The Rural American!

50,000 COPIES OF THE RURAL AMERICAN, of Rochester, N. Y., will be issued on the 1st of December next. Persons desiring to advertise in this widely circulated and popular paper can now compute with it at 10 cts per nonpareil line each week—or $1 per line for 13 weeks—or $2 per line for a year. Cash. Our AGENTS WORKED in every town in the United States. Premiums magnificent! Circulars to be had gratis. Vol. 6 begins January 1st. Send your names early as it sells to T. B. MINER & SON, Editors, Chatham Co., N. Y.

Traveling Agents

ARE paid $30 to $60 per month to canvass for the RURAL AMERICAN. Details sent in paper. Direct as above. 000

PIANOFORTES.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,
MANUFACTURER OF THE CONSERVING

Celebrated Dunham Pianofortes,

GRAND AND SQUARE
MANUFACTORY AND SALESROOMS,
75 to 83 East Thirteenth Street, near Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1834.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, are invited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these Instruments. They are warranted for Five years, and prices are moderate.

THE READERS OF
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper

Desiring to purchase any article in New York, no matter how trifling or costly, can have their orders promptly and faithfully fulfilled by addressing

JAMES W. FORTUNE,
Care of Frank Leslie, Esq.,
19 City Hall Square, N. Y.

In all cases the necessary funds should be inclosed in the communication

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

PUBLISHED for the benefit and as a warning to young men who suffer from Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, &c.; supplying the means of self-cure by one who cured HIMSELF, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. Single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL HAYWARD, Esq., Bedford, Kings County, N. Y., by inclosing a post-paid addressed envelope. 256-67

MATRIMONY MADE EASY; Or, How to Win a Lover—Containing plain common sense directions for both sexes, in all matters pertaining to the proprieties of love, and to produce mutual understanding or otherwise. This is a new work, and the surest, most reliable, and every way best guide to matrimony ever issued. Mailed free for 25 cents in cash or postage stamps. Address WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia Post Office Box 2300. 259-68

A. LANGE,
PICTURE AND LOOKING-GLASS FRAMES
AND
CORNICES FOR ROOMS,
MADE TO ORDER, AND RE-GILDING DONE.
206 William St., cor. Frankfort, New York.

Greatly Improved Pianofortes.

THE CALENBERG & CO., Manufacturers of Overstrung Bass Full Iron Frame Pianofortes, which for ease of Tone, clearness of Touch and beauty of Finish—in short, everything that renders a Piano perfect—are unsurpassed. Every Piano warranted for Five Years. Pianos to Let. Warerooms, 15 Leroy Place, Bleecker St., near Broadway, New York. 262-68

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

IF SO, use Phalon's Nightly Sense Restorative, which will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Free from Nitrate of Silver, and will not soil the finest linen. Price $1 per bottle, sent by mail, prepaid, to any address, on receipt of an order.

N. G. PHALON, 160 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AND GYMNASIUM YONKERS, N. Y.

Winter Session commences on the 1st day of Nov.

TERMS:

Board and Tuition.....$150 per Session.
For Circulars and particular information, apply to
M. N. WISEWELL, Prin. and
Yonkers, 1860 000

ESTABLISHED 1843.

BOGLE'S CELEBRATED HYPERION FLUID, for preserving everything as the product to color and fast dressing for the hair in the world. Yo who have not used it can form no idea of the use can be condemned. It never fails. Sold by

W. BOGLE'S
Hyperion Fluid Depot and Toilet Store,
202 Washington St., Boston, and for sale everywhere.

Superior Pianofortes.

WAREROOMS, 112 FOURTH AVENUE, MANUFACTURER OF PIANOFORTES (with or without the Æolian Attachment), between Second and Third Ave., New York.

Dealers and others are most respectfully invited to call and examine my very superior instruments, made with full iron frame and overstrung scale to any in the market, for strength and beauty of finish, sweetness and power of tone. My instruments are warranted for three years, and I guarantee to sell at lower prices than any first-class manufacturer in the city. JONAS CHICKERING.
214 120 East Twenty-Second Street, New York.

GREATLY IMPROVED PIANOFORTES.—CALENBERG & CO., Manufacturers of Overstrung Bass Full Iron Frame Pianofortes, which for ease of Tone, clearness of Touch and beauty of Finish—in short, everything that renders a Piano perfect—are unsurpassed. Every Piano warranted for Five Years. Pianos to Let. Warerooms, 15 Leroy Place, Bleecker St., near Broadway, New York. 262-68

Liquid and Extract Tricomer.

THESE genuine English preparations, purely vegetable, are unrivalled for the toilet. Prepared by J. BROWNE HAY, M. D., London. Introduced as a sure and effectual remedy for Baldness, Premature Decay, Weak and Weeping Eyes, Scurf, Dandruff, Stopping the functions of either decay or old with an astonishing permanency. Extract Tricomer is invaluable to cure a sore eye (for which memory and carcinogenic is used), including the wonderfully efficacious and delicious Cream of the body. Price $1 per Bottle or six Bottles for $5. Sent by Express to any part of the country, on receipt of the price. Sold by J. W. S. HOWELL, No. 749 Spring Street, New York. 262-68

Kennedy's Medical Discovery

CURES SCROFULA

Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Erysipelas.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Canker.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Nursing Sore Mouth.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Blotches on the Face.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Scald Head.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Inflammation of the Eyes.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ulcerated Sore Legs.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Boils.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures all Skin Diseases.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Tetter.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ringworm.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery relieves the Itching.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Liver.

When you are sick, and do not know what the matter is, you will find a good word in Kennedy's Medical Discovery. For sale by all Druggists.

A Card to the Ladies.

DR. RECAMIER, from Paris, respectfully informs the ladies that he has taken rooms at 64 Bond st. No. 64, Bond street, above Broadway. Dr. Recamier's Imperial Pills are the best to be had in the country. Sent by mail, $5. Address Box 3773, Post Office, New York. He receives never fail. Consultation free. 262-68

IMPORTANT TO THE MARRIED.—Send Stamp for particulars to D. A. WILLIAMS, Lowell, Mass. 252-64

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S

LOTTERIES!

AUTHORIZED BY THE STATES OF

DELAWARE,
MISSOURI
AND
KENTUCKY

Drawn daily, in public, under the superintendence of Sworn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM

$2 50 TO $100,000!

TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $20.

☞ Circulars giving full explanation and the Schemes to be drawn will be sent, free of expense, by addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
OR
WOOD, EDDY & CO., St. Louis, Missouri.

Miscellaneous.

THE ANNIHILATION OF LOGOGRAPHY.—There is a growing tendency in this age to abbreviate the most expressive words of other languages, and adopt a while to incorporate them into our own: thus the word Cophalic, which is from the Greek, signifying "for the head," is now becoming popularized in connection with Dr. Hosking's great Headache remedy, but it will soon be used in a more general way, and the word Cophalic will become as common as Hydrophobia, and more effective as a distinction in family words—but soon even easy by meaning usage until they occupy "a niche and in the literary hole."

'Ardly Realized.

Ill 'ad 'a terrible headache this afternoon, 'ad I stopped into the hapothecary's, and says I to the man, "Can you 'ave one of an 'eadache?" "Does it 'ache 'ard?" says 'e. "Somebody," says I, 'ad done that to poor me 'ead. "Cophalic Pills, then," says 'e, "is the cure." Cured me so quick that I 'ardly realized I 'ad 'ad an 'eadache.

☞ Headache is the favorite sign by which nature makes known any deranged condition of the other internal viscera of the brain, and viewed in this light it may be looked on as a refrigerant intended to put to rest all disease which might otherwise compromise its vitality too far to be remedied, and its ordinances should never be neglected. Headache may be classified under two names, viz: Symptomatic and Idiopathic. Symptomatic Headache is accompanying contraband is the precursor of a great variety of diseases, among which may be mentioned Fevers, Inflammation of the brain, &c. In nervous Headache is a concomitant of disorders of the stomach constituting what Headache, of hepatic disease constituting Bilious Headache, of worms, contagious and other disorders of the bowels, as well as renal and uterine affections. Diseases of the heart are very frequently attended with Headaches. Anemia and plethora are also affections which frequently occasion headache. Idiopathic Headache is also very common, being usually considered to be a disease of the nervous system, and is evidently in a state of depressed mental faculty and constituting at once the mental and physical energies, and in other instances it comes on slowly, terrified by depression of spirits or scarcity of temper. In most instances the pain is in the front of the head, over the both eyes, and sometimes preceding vomiting; under this class may also be classed Megrim.

For the relief of these and many other forms of Headache Dr. Cophalic Pills have been found a sure and safe remedy, relieving the most acute pain in a few minutes, and by a subtle power eradicating the diseases of which Headache is the unerring index.

DIGGUP.—Would you like to send her a box of Cophalic Gilts, as a token of Peace and Love? Well, why think of it? Don't put it neither; but perhaps you'll be sharper knowing what I do. Try one day's trial and grow well. Cophalic Headache, and wants some more of that same so relieved by Cophalic.

Perfection.—You need more Cophalic Pills for Headache.—Such news now and you've said it; here's the brother and give me the Pills, and don't be all day about it either.

Constipation or Costiveness.

No one of the many ills flesh is heir to is so prevalent as this understood, and so much neglected. Costiveness Often originating in carelessness or ordinary habits, it is regarded as a slight disorder but into one exposure to excite anxiety, while in reality it as the precursor and companion of many of the most fatal and dangerous diseases, and unless early eradicated it will bring the sufferer to an untimely grave. Among the fatal evils of which Costiveness is the usual antecedent are Headache, Colic, Flatulency, Dyspepsia, Jaundice, Piles, Fevers, Inflammation of the bowels, Worms, Convulsions, Hemorrhoids, Bilious Derangements, Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Apoplexy, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Hypochondriasis, Melancholy and Insanity, first indicate their presence in the system by this alarming symptom. Over fifty thousand die annually named originate in Constipation, but there an an immediate end to this state of things, and that is to use Dr. Hosking's Cophalic Pills. They will never fail to relieve the most disordered stomach, remove immediate attention, whatever it may be, and as proved and testified by thousands of Cophalic Pills on the first appearance of the complaint, as they family we will regret the melancholy necessities of disease and destroy this dangerous foe to human life.

Cephalic Pills
CURE
Sick Headache,
CURE
Nervous Headache,
CURE
All kinds of Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented; and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Lenitive, improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS

The genuine have five signatures of Henry C. Spalding on each Box

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

All orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING,
48 Cedar St., New York.

CONTRADICTED ON THE SPOT.

JINKS (who has paid ten dollars for a window where his Louisa and her family can see the great torchlight procession)—" Observe, my darling Lou, how much firecracks improves the affair—what a superb finish they give to——" (Jinks is here interrupted by the entrance of one of the objects of his admiration. Sad Tableau.)

Fall and Winter.

FOR the best cut, best made, best fitting, fashionable, tasty, and the largest assortment of Hat and Winter Clothing, Furnishing Goods and Children's Clothing, and at prices less than at any other establishment, go to F. E. BALDWIN'S,
Nos. 70 and 72 Bowery.
The largest store in the city 2630

The Singer Sewing Machines.

IN order to place THE SEWING FAMILY MACHINES within the reach of all, we have reduced our LARGE, or Tabernacle Stitch, Machines to a correspondingly reduced price, to both of very general application and capacity, and popular both in the family and manufactory. Prices reduced, respectively from $150 and $150 to $60 and $100.

Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machines,

Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine

For Carriage makers and heavy leather work. Price, complete, $125.

Also, to complete the list, an

ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,

unequalled for manufacturing purposes, Hosiers, Knitters, and capable of every kind of work; Price (including iron stand and drawers), $110—cheaper at that in view of its value than the machines of any other make. Address

I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway.

Smith and Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STORRS, Agent,
181 Chamber Street, N. Y.

THIS PISTOL is light, has great force, is sure fire, shoots accurately, can be belt loaded any length of time without injury, is not liable to get out of order, is safe to carry. Every Pistol warranted.

CAUTION TO DEALERS.

Be sure and get those stamped "Smith & Wesson, Springfield, Mass." as no others genuine. All dealers are cautioned that most of the breech are infringements. Suits are commenced, and all such infringements will be prosecuted. Beware the cheapjacks have Smith & Wesson's magazines for sale and of the best 247-Tue

A New Six Shooting Cartridge Revolver.

Weighing only 6½ ounces.

For sale, wholesale and retail,

By JOSEPH MERWIN, Agent,
207 Broadway, N. Y. 262-660

SILSBEE, CASE & CO.,
Photographic and Daguerreotype
ARTISTS.
209½ Washington Street, Boston.
Up but one flight of stairs.
G. M. SILSBEE, J. G. CASE, W. H. GERCHELL.
251-Tf

THE ELECTROTYPING OF LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is done by FILMER & Co., 17 Dutch Street

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST FURS AT WILLIAMS'S, 376 Fulton St., Brooklyn. 262-660

JOY TO THE WORLD.
Clothes Washed in One Minu'e by
Johnson's Union Washing Machine.
Patented April 10, 1860.

Price
$8
TO $10.

A CHILD CAN OPERATE IT. Washes every spot. Save cost certain without soaking or boiling. Call and see it in operation at 457 Broadway, New York, and 182 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y. J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors. 600

ADVICE GRATIS.

A MANUAL OF advice how to obtain Letters Patent for New Inventions furnished free on application to MESSRS. MUNN & CO., Proprietors of the Scientific American and Solicitors of AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PATENTS.

OFFICES—No. 37 Park-row, New York; corner of F and Seventh streets, Washington, D. C.; also in London, Paris and Brussels.

A Synopsis of European Patent Laws furnished free.

Examination of Inventions free. 262-63

ESENWEIN'S
Tar and Wood Naphtha
PECTORAL

is the only certain cure for all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs. From the cures that are constantly being made by the use of this PECTORAL, Naphtha has been called the Wonder of the Age. It cures speedily and without fail Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs and Colds, Croup, Whooping Cough, Pulmonary of the Heart, Diphtheria, &c. The effects it produces on the lungs and system is to effect. No catarrh is not for Esenwein's Tar and Wood Naphtha Pectoral and take no other.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS PER BOTTLE

Prepared only by
DR. A. ESENWEIN & CO.,
Druggists and Chemists,
N. W. corner of Ninth and Parrish Sts.,
PHILADELPHIA.
And sold by every respectable Druggist throughout the United States and Canada. 600

Ladd, Webster & Co's
IMPROVED TIGHT STITCH SEWING MACHINES,
500 Broadway, New York. 600

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
Noiseless Family Sewing Machines.
PRICES ESTABLISHED FOR SIXTY YEARS.
From $40 and Upwards.
"It fatches its own work; others do not."—Home Journal.
Office 505 Broadway, New York.
262-660

A Dollar Book for a Dime.

Beadle's Dime Novels.

THE LIBRARY OF ROMANCE AND STORY

NOW READY.

No. 19—The Bidden Trapper; or, Life in the North-West. By Edward S. Ellis, author of "Seth Jones."

Mrs. Ann S. Stephens's Best Story.

No. 18—Malaeska, the Indian Wife of the White Hunter. No. 17—Irene Wilde, the Settlement's Daughter. By Mrs. Metta V. Victor.

No. 16—Seth Jones; or, The Captives of the Frontier. By Edward S. Ellis.

No. 15—The Backwoods Bride; A Romance of Squatter Life. By Mrs. Metta V. Victor.

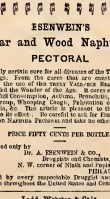
The best works of books, from the pens of the very best writers in America, but not in brilliant readers. The time of the publishers was, and only to give a dollar book, but to give a good one in place within the reach of all. Beadle's Dime Novels should be particularly sought after by all circles. Beadle's Dime Novels, No. 1, Malaeska, Mrs. Metta V. Victor, Mrs. Mary A. Denison. Every novel is complete. 192 pp. 8vo., &c., have prepared the several romances from the issued, and the verdict of the whole country is that they are the best and most commendable works of fiction yet brought before the reading public of America.

A New Novel is issued on the 1st and 15th of each month. Single copies sent, postpaid, on receipt of ten cents. Send for a Catalogue.

BEADLE & CO., Publishers,
141 William St., N. Y.

3670 FOR SALE AT ALL NEWS DEPOTS.

Patented November 1st, 1859.



The measures are
A, the distance round the Neck.
B to B, the Yoke.
C to C, the Sleeve.
D to D, distance around the Body under the armpits
E to E, the length of the Shirt.

BALLOU'S
Patent Improved French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.

A New Style of Shirt, warranted to Fit.

By sending the above measure you can order and procure a perfect fit of our new style of Shirt, and return by Express to any part of the United States, at $18, $15, $12, $9, &c., &c., per dozen. No order forwarded for less than half a dozen Shirts.

Also Importers and Dealers in MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS

BALLOU BROTHERS,
409 Broadway, N. Y.
Wholesale Trade supplied on the usual terms.

"WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES are certainly unrivalled."—French Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.
Office, 505 Broadway, New York. 600

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRAND AND SQUARE PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured Each Instrument warranted for five years.

Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. 6000

Sent Free! Sent Free! Sent Free!

A NEW and Beautiful Art, for which we want agents in every town. Agents make $10 a month. Terms and Specimen sent FREE. Address, with 3c. for return postage, L. L. WOOD & CO., 277 600 Lowell, Mass.

TO OUR LADY FRIENDS.

Amongst the many compounds now offering to our lady friends, there are few that we can so readily recommend as those containing Dr. Jayne's celebrated Sanative of Joseph Burnett & Co. They possess two qualities in which we would especially call attention, viz., the entire absence of all deleterious substances, and the certainty that they will perform all they are said to do. The compounds are scientific patient results attending experience in our most changeable climate upon the skin, may be safely elevated by the use of Burnett's Kalliston, which does not possess so useful an auxiliary to the toilet that no lady considers her dressing-table complete without it.—N. Y. True Delia.

Tiffany & Co.,
LATE
TIFFANY, YOUNG & ELLIS,
Fine Jewellery, Precious Stones, Watches, Silver Ware
Bronzes, Clocks, Fancy Goods, Silver Plated Ware
No. 550 Broadway, New York.
Branch in Paris, TIFFANY, ELLIS & CO.

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24 and 36 tunes
PAILLARD & MARVIN, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired. 25 Nassau Lane, N. Y.

Pianofortes.
C. GHLE & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS AND WAREROOMS,
107 East Twelfth Street, N. Y

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 264—VOL. XI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 15, 1860. [PRICE 6 CENTS.

MRS. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, WIFE OF THE PRESIDENT ELECT, AND SONS.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY P. PUTNEY, OF SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—SEE PAGE 59.

MRS. LINCOLN "AND HER SONS.

MRS. LINCOLN, the wife of the President elect, is a Southerner by birth, the daughter of a planter, and brought up in all the traditions of conservatism. Mrs. Lincoln (n e Mary Todd) is the daughter of the Hon. Robert S. Todd, of Lexington, Kentucky, and was educated with great care by her excellent parents, and is much respected and beloved by all who come within the sphere of her social influence. She was united in marriage with the President Elect in November, 1842, and the fruits of this marriage were four sons, three of whom are now living. The eldest, a fine young man, is now graduating at Harvard College, and is highly esteemed by his comrades and tutors. The two younger boys are remarkably intelligent lads, and the pet present to our readers, and one fine specimen of our Western youth.

Our engraving is from a photograph by P. Butler, of Springfield, Ill.

BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM

HAS again become the popular resort of
EVERY LOVER OF INSTRUCTIVE, THE CURIOUS AND AMUSING.

And a visit of inspection will be rewarding more visitors than ever with the place of amusement in New York. Everything new is useless and not interesting is removed by Mr. Barnum, and replaced by his vigilant addition to the $50,000 Curiosities from every part of the world, and the which take place every afternoon and evening, and every evening at half-past 7, by a full and complete dramatic company and orchestra, in the LITTLE LEAGUE CHILDREN, the most curious, wonderful and interesting dramas brought the world has ever presented; THE OCTOROON OR LIFE AT LOUISIANA; THE MISSOURI CHILDREN; THE QUADROON; HUMPHREY'S CLOCK; LEAGUE HAPPY FAMILY, &c. &c., are all on exhibition, for the period of admission to the whole is only 25 cents. Children under 10 years 15 cents.

STUPENDOUS DRAMATIC ENTERTAINMENTS

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 15, 1860.

All Communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 19 City and Suburb Square, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	52 weeks	$ 3
One do.	1 year	2 50
two do.	1 Year	5
Three do.	1 Year	6 50
Five do.	1 Year	10

And in like Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional Subscriber, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent us to favor our friends throughout the country without the name of the subject attached to them, and we are thus left in a quandary with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The editorial corps cannot be expected to be cognizant of and know everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, and we are sure to frequently receive photographs of which we have the utmost desire for reading information. To save labor and insure accuracy, therefore, we and names (or names indorsed) should, as all soon, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Foreign News.

Its foreign news is of considerable interest. England and France were agreed as to the propriety of acknowledging the new power of Italy in Italy, one were only waiting the departure of the Pope from Rome. Victor Emanuel declines to Victor Emanuel as King of Italy. It is reported in Paris that Garibaldi, and the Emperor of Austria will meet at Venice. Peace had been restored by the British fleet with the royal palace.

France is quiet. The visit of the Emperor and Prince Napoleon and Walewski were to change places—the latter to be Ambassador to England, and the former to assume a ministerial capacity near the Emperor.

The siege of Gaeta still continued, but Bomba is now making preparations to depart for Germany—where he resides when not in Naples. The Queen is dangerous, near Bomba. Her mother and some of the royal family had gone to Rome.

There was a rumor that Germany, backed by Russia, had guaranteed Venetia to Austria; and that France had demanded a cession of the exploration concession to Count Cavour, and the Austrian Ambassador left Paris in consequence. Sardinia declared a threat of attacking Venetia in the spring.

The Bank of England had advanced two millions sterling of gold to the Bank of France, upon the security of an equal value in silver.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THE President commences by observing that the past year has been one of great prosperity. The only exception to universal happiness and contentment is the temperate intolerance of the Northern people with the question of slavery in the Southern States. We, the people of the North, have no constitutional right to the family alone, nuisance existing in their midst, but the threat of servile insurrection. This agitation has been fanned by the hostile action of certain religious sects, and by Conby Conventions, and by fanatical sermons and lectures.

With regard to the Union, the President says that he quotes the President's own words:

"If this is necessary to accomplish the object, and all for which the States have ever contended, to be let alone, and permitted to manage their domestic institutions in their own way, why should they not do it? Why should there not prevail a mutual feeling of kindness between the two sections? Why should there not be a common effort to destroy anything which may have a tendency to interrupt the peace and harmony of the country? I can see no reason why we should not live as a band of brothers, as we have lived for the last seventy years, and as our fathers lived before us. I can see no reason why the Union may not be as perpetual as the States themselves. I cannot but express my deep conviction that the Union must be preserved, and that the secession movement, if successful, must result in a total destruction of the blessings of self-government throughout the entire country."

The President then confesses the Personal Liberty Laws of some of the Northern States, which he says ought to be repealed. He also suggests that the Fugitive Slave Bill be amended in the following manner: That the fugitive, on his arrest, be merely examined upon oath. After deciding that South Carolina has any right to secede, he declares that the Federal Government has no power to coerce a sovereign State, and requests that we shall wait for some amicable adjustment of our differences. The President concludes by recommending "forbearance and conciliation."

CONGRESSIONAL MATTERS.

On Monday the Senate met in the Senate Chamber, and there was a short conversation which gave a no unusual unanimity. This impression seemed to be long over all, for there did not seem to be any sort of notice and excitement as they seemed at the initial gathering of our great deliberative Assembly. In a manner which was unusually quiet and subdued, the members were passing a good of the deep interest felt in the present juncture. The South Carolina Senators were absent, but the Senators from other States were all present, and there in their seats. The only business appointed the usual Committee to notify the President and the House of Representatives that they were ready to proceed to business, and then adjourned.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Tuesday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale's resolution was then referred to the Committee with the following amendment, which was adopted by a vote of 107 to 71. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Wednesday, the 5th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Branch, Mr. Clarkson, of South Carolina, then made a strong resolution speech, and Mr. Chilcoton, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee.

On Thursday, the 6th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Friday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Saturday, the 8th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Sunday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Monday, the 10th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Tuesday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Wednesday, the 12th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Thursday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Friday, the 14th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Saturday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Sunday, the 16th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Monday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Tuesday, the 18th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Wednesday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Thursday, the 20th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Friday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Saturday, the 22nd, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Sunday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Monday, the 24th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Tuesday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Wednesday, the 26th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Thursday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Friday, the 28th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Saturday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Sunday, the 30th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Monday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Tuesday, the 31st, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Wednesday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Thursday, the 32nd, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Friday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Saturday, the 34th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Sunday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr. Roulet's resolution then passed by 123 to 23.

On Monday, the 36th, the Senate met at the usual time, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Select Committee. The motion was laid over. Senator Green (—) introduced a resolution for the appointment of a committee to confer with one from the House, for the election executive of the Fugitive Slave Law and for the Constitutional Amendment. The following Senators were appointed: Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay (New Hampshire), Iverson (Georgia), Pugh (Ohio), Bigler (Pennsylvania), Bayard (Delaware), Hunter (Virginia), and Toombs (Georgia). Mr. Hale moved to amend the resolution by adding Mr. Seward. Mr. Seward's resolution was then passed by 26 to 23.

In the House of Representatives, Mr. Grady, of Pennsylvania, called up a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Harpers Ferry affair. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, but the motion was postponed. The House then adjourned.

On Tuesday, the customary message of President Buchanan was delivered. Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, introduced a bill to abolish the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Hale also introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to report on the advisability of repealing so much of the Missouri Compromise as relates to the prevention of slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, and to report a bill to that effect. It is not to be expected on any line. Mr. McClernand, of Illinois, moved to amendment substituting the name of Stephen A. Douglas for that of Jefferson Davis, which was supported by bill or by amendment to the Committee, and more particularly as to the other subjects referred to them. Mr. Hale declined the amendment, but finally consented to accept it. The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of the Whole, of Pennsylvania, then moved an address, "pledging the members to support the Constitution and the Union." The motion was lost by a vote of 80 to 80. Mr.

as usual, seized the opportunity to show their appreciation of the American citizen soldiery, and we give the passage :

"The armed excursions, which a short time back seemed so ridiculous to the English at Boulogne, appear likely to be repeated on a larger scale, and we are menaced at Paris with the visit of several hundreds from London with arms and baggage, muskets, swords and the rest. These exhibitions are much in fashion in England and America, but they are not at all to the French taste. We fête with enthusiasm our brave army, returning from one of its great victories—from Malakoff or from Solferino; but we accord very little attention to citizen soldiers, who have never seen any other fire than that of the soup pot. In the United States, on the contrary and for all we know, in England, the militia of different towns visit each other; and these excursionists, not content with causing themselves to be admired in the streets, hire in the evening a theatre, on the stage of which they execute manœuvres, amidst the applause of the gaping vulgar who have paid to enjoy so fine a spectacle. That is one way of enabling the volunteers to make up their travelling expenses. The movement which has led to the reorganization of the volunteers in England is essentially anti-French."

There is one advantage our citizen soldiery have over the heroes of La Grande Nation, and that is, it has never run away from the British, a custom the French invariably practise, whenever they have the opportunity. Our Chicago Zouaves cannot fail to understand and solve the delicate allusion to their performances at the Academy of Music.

PERSONAL.

SHERIDAN KNOWLES, the clever dramatist, like most Irishmen, has a small spice of humbug in his composition. The London papers report that having become a nonconformist preacher, he has now as great a horror of the drama as he before loved it. He therefore receives his copyright money which his dramatic works bring him in under protest. Why does he not bestow the proceeds upon the Society for the Suppression of Vice?

THE writers in Punch sent to Garibaldi a handsome telescope. He acknowledged the compliment in a very cordial and grateful letter.

COL. PEARD, better known as Garibaldi's Englishman, when introduced to Victor Emanuel, told him plumply that the continuance of English sympathy for Italy chiefly depended upon his Majesty's treatment of Garibaldi. He also expressed to the King his utmost contempt for the Italian people, and wound up by calling Count Cavour, Farini and Louis Napoleon a parcel of rascals.

EMPRESS EUGENIE is in Scotland on a visit to her husband's cousin, the Duchess of Hamilton, née Princess Marie de Baden. The health of the Empress is in a very depressed condition. The death of her sister and the forlorn condition of the Pope have deeply affected her mind.

THE invention which Lord Dundonald was desirous the British Government should apply in the Crimean war to the annihilation of the enemy, was the filling of hollow shells with a gas of so potent a nature, that when liberated from the bursting shell it would poison the atmosphere for many square yards, and kill those who breathed it.

EDWARD LODER's opera of the "Night Dancers," has been revived by Miss Pyne and Harrison with great success.

THE Australians are about to erect a statue to Shakespeare in the public market-place of Melbourne. Strange that a continent the great dramatist never dreamt of—never heard of—that wasn't (in point of fact) put into his "geography book," should get the start of his own land and erect a statue first! We suggest that Forrest, Wallack, Booth and their confrères should do something in the "brown stucco" line for the man who has made them rich and famous.

PARIS possesses at present 503 newspapers; forty-two of these, as treating of politics and national economy, have to deposit a security in the hands of Government; 460 are devoted to art, science, literature, industry, commerce and agriculture. The more ancient of the latter is the Journal des Savans, and dates from the year 1665.

THE Rev. J. M. Bellew, of London, has, with singular good taste and honesty, announced his attention of reading from the pulpit sermons written by the old divines. It will be a great treat to hear one of the finest theological orators reading the noble productions of Jeremy Taylor and other eminent men of the good old times.

IN "Shakespeare and his Birthplace," one of the forthcoming publications of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., the pen of Mr. J. R. Wise and the pencil of Mr. W. J. Linton will combine to trace the first steps of the poet, from boyhood to maturity, among the scenes of his native Stratford and its surrounding villages.

A MEMBER of Congress wrote to his wife, on his arrival in Washington, that he had "formed a connection with a very agreeable mess, and expected to spend the season very pleasantly." Unfortunately, to the surprise and mortification of the good lady to whom he was writing he dotted the e in the word mess. The Hon. Mr. Smith was rather surprised in the course of three days to see his wife walk into Willard's Hotel with a cowhide. The explanation he made is considered doubtful.

GOV. MOORE of Alabama, is certainly a gallant fellow, and we hope he will not secede. During his visit lately to the penitentiary, he found that Southern Institute so full that he discharged all the female prisoners!

AN English paper has this: "Two young ladies of Fairhaven, U.S., recently fell equally and deeply in love with a gentleman who visited them very frequently. Being mutually acquainted with each other's passion, and withal strong friends, they romantically resolved to 'draw lots,' to decide which should have him. The fortunate one lost no time in making known to him the result of the drawing, and he then informed her that he was already engaged to a third lady." It complacently adds, "American ladies can have no delicacy if these things are common."

EDMUND ABOUT thus sketches a Roman prima donna : "The prima donna is the good mother of a family; her six children have paid their mamma the delicate attention of not spoiling her voice. Her husband is a baritone, or, perhaps, a broken-down gentleman whom she supports. Do not fear that she will be unfaithful to him; she has too much to do. The performances, the rehearsals, the children, the pot au feu, absorb all her time. Her husband is to her a necessary piece of furniture; he takes her to the theatre and home again, he signs agreements, he leads the little boys to school, he buys provisions in the market." We opine that this is not a true sketch of an American prima donna. The dictum that a prima donna's husband should be either a baritone or a broken-down gentleman, or perhaps both, might do, is about as rich as Mrs. Southworth asserting that one of her heroines was originally a falsetto, which she had cultivated into a rich soprano.

THERE is a wealthy citizen in Berlin, Prussia, who has a most singular periodical desire to knock off hats. He afterward makes up the loss to the astonished victim by the payment of three thalers. During the past year he has been obliged to make good the loss of two hundred and sixty-seven hats. At a recent musical festival fifty-three hats were sacrificed, and for the evening's entertainment he paid one hundred and fifty thalers.

JACKSON THORPE, of Cincinnati, died on the 20th. He was probably the heaviest man in the United States, weighing four hundred and ten pounds.

FRANCIS' INVISIBLE FRICTION MATCH BOX.—Dr. S. W. Francis, the youngest son of the venerable Dr. Francis, the ingenious inventor of the Francis printing or writing machine, has made an important improvement in the plan of constructing friction match boxes, which is likely to come into general use. The improvement has been patented, and an arrangement made for its immediate use by one of the largest match manufacturers in this city. The improvement consists in placing the friction surface on the inside of the box and igniting the match while withdrawing it, the matches being placed head down in the boxes instead of up, as in the ordinary boxes.

JOHN SAVAGE, the well-known rebel, dramatist, good-fellow and journalist, has written a comedy, which is soon to test public opinion. It is, we understand, founded upon Washington manners, and hits the foibles of society some hard raps.

MR. BACHMAN has published an excellent bird's-eye view of Hoboken. It is remarkable for its minute detail, as well as general accuracy.

MR. G. HARDING, the artist, gave a soirée artistique at his art studio, 32 Waverley place, on Monday evening, December 3, which was largely attended by a fashionable and distinguished company. The sister art of music added to the enjoyment of the evening, some beautiful selections being performed by Madame Clara M. Brinkerhoff, Mr. Mills, Mr. Millard and Mr. Coetemori.

THE Tuesday evening reception of Mrs. Meara Burkhardt, in Fifteenth street, on the 4th inst., attracted quite a distinguished company of the élite of the city. The conversation was animated and interesting, and the musical melange very pleasing.

We are compelled to omit our notices of New Books and Music this week. They will appear in our next.

MUSIC.

THE Ullman dynasty has ceased to exist; the "Jewess," notwithstanding her superb setting, did not attract. The music is utterly uninteresting to the multitude, and people will not pay a dollar and a half, merely to see a pageant, more than once. We shall have something to say on this subject in our next.

Fabbri, Stigelli and Formes continued the season, giving Auber's "Masaniello" on Friday, and Flotow's "Stradella" on Saturday. We hope that their experiment will succeed.

DRAMA.

Wallack's Theatre.—The management of this house treated us on Monday night to a real "sensation," all the more agreeable that it was thoroughly legitimate, consisting of a new comedy with a new actress in a leading rôle. The name of the comedy is "The Model Hypocrite," and it is a translation and adaptation of Madame de Girardin's "Lady Tartuffe;" the name of the fair debutante is Miss Henriques.

"The Model Hypocrite" (we wish the adapter had selected a better title for his work) is a most excellent comedy, life-like and interesting; the characters are all well defined and carefully but not tediously elaborated, and the plot works directly and smoothly towards its denouement undisturbed by counter plot. The story is simply this : Madame Eugenie de Blossac (the Model Hypocrite, Mrs. Hoey), is desperately in love with Hector de Renville (Mr. Reynolds), and to win his affection is willing to make any sacrifice. The gentleman, on the contrary, is enamored of Jeannette (Miss Henriques), and is quite as willing to go through any amount of hardship to win the object of his adoration. From this fruitful source proceeds a long train of incidents in which man's cunning and woman's will are constantly battling for the mastery. Madame de Blossac, as the surest means of accomplishing her ends, sets afloat slanderous stories concerning the reputation of Jeannette, which of course are readily caught up by "society" and magnified ; but fortunately, in the end, the crooked ways are made straight and the rough places smooth, the innocent vindicated, and the guilty frustrated in their designs. This is, of course, but a faint outline of the plot, which is skilfully evolved, and in the hands of such artists as Mr. Wallack's company can boast, most charmingly interpreted. Miss Henriques, the debutante, is very young and very beautiful. She has black hair and black eyes, a fresh and blooming complexion, musical voice and winning manner ; add to all this most decided dramatic ability and perfect self-possession and you can readily imagine the début to have been—what it actually was—a most flattering success. Mrs. Hoey, as Madame de Blossac, is entitled to most unqualified praise. Her impersonation of this bad but loving woman was marked by a degree of intensity for which we scarcely gave her credit, the last act being as finely rendered as the most exacting critic could desire. So great, in fact, was the effect produced upon the audience that they would not permit the play to proceed until the actress, after her exit, had responded to their enthusiastic call. This custom of recalling an artist after an especially fine scene is detestable, but upon the present occasion it seemed to be the spontaneous wish of the entire audience. Miss Morant, as the Countess de Clermont, was earnest and effective ; Mr. Blake's Marshal d'Estigey, both in make-up and acting, admirable ; Mr. Lester Wallack gave great prominence to the rather unimportant rôle of La Touche ; Mr. Reynolds was acceptable as De Renville, and Mr. Norton respectable as Leonard. The comedy is put upon the stage with every care, and was announced for repetition amid the applause of an audience that filled to overflowing every available portion of the house.

Laura Keene's Theatre.—"The Seven Sisters," as we predicted in our last, has turned out a real success. Nightly are crowds turned away from the doors, and it bids fair, not only to outlive the holidays, but push forward its triumphant career far into the winter.

Winter Garden.—Since our last Mr. Booth has appeared as Pescara ("Apostate"), Richelieu and Richard III., but we see no grounds for altering our previously expressed opinion of this gentleman's merits as an actor. His performances are crude and unequal, never rising to real excellence, but too frequently sinking into commonplaces. He is in the habit of slurring over important passages and elaborating others into undue prominence. Then, too, there is no attempt even at individuality in his performances, whether the name on the programme be Pescara, Hamlet, Richard or Richelieu, we see only Edwin Booth, a young man with a pleasant voice, good eye and somewhat pallid countenance, and black hair standing much in need of the attention of the hair-dresser. With every desire to see in this gentleman the elements that go to make the grand artist, we must confess that we have not as yet been successful in finding them.

Niblo's Theatre.—We had intended to write an extended article on Mr. Forrest's Macbeth for this issue of our paper, but we are so startled by the innovations, not only upon custom, but the text of the tragedy, indulged in by the management under the sanction, it is presumed, of the actor, that we prefer delaying our remarks for a day or two, that we may more carefully study what at first sight appears most unwarrantable and injudicious. We are inclined to acknowledge Mr. Forrest as high authority in Shakespearean affairs, but when he undertakes to transform the witches of Macbeth into Fates, adorned after the most approved manner of modern ballet, and in direct violation of the text of the play, we require time at least to think the matter over before accepting or rejecting this innovation.

GARIBALDI AT HOME.

GARIBALDI has arrived at Caprera. We learn from a Lombard correspondent, that he has ordered from France a corn windmill, as Caprera has no water course. So anxious was the Dictator to get to his farm, that he loosened the anchor with his own hands, and was like a boy home for his holidays when he set foot on the island.

He appears extremely happy, in the first place, because he has resigned the management of affairs at Naples into the hands of the King Galantuomo ; secondly, because he is finally free from the numberless petitions with which he was pestered. He speaks with enthusiasm of his regained freedom, and he has been anxious to extend it even to his three war-horses, which he with his own hands unsaddled and unbridled, and allowed freely to run about the country the moment he set foot on his own isle.

The thousand volunteers, or rather what are left of them, have come to the determination of offering a diamond star to their beloved chief, with this inscription, "The Gift of the Thousand." In Venetia and Rome, Societies are being formed, every one of which elects Garibaldi as its President. In the spring, the hero of Palermo may be at the head of the million of armed men he speaks of.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE "SPINNING JENNY."—Suddenly he (James Hargreaves) dropped upon his knees, and rolled on the stone floor at full length. He lay with his face towards the floor, and made lines and circles with the end of a burnt stick. He rose and went to the fire to burn his stick. He took hold of his bristly hair with one hand, and rubbed his forehead and nose with the other and the blackened stick. Then he sat upon a chair and placed his head between his hands, his elbows on his knees, and gazed intently on the floor; then he sprang to his feet, and replied to some feeble question of his wife—who had not risen since the day she gave birth to a little stranger—by a loud assurance that he had it; and taking her in his sturdy arms in the blankets, the baby in her arms, he lifted her out and held her over the black drawings on the floor. These he explained, and she joined a small, hopeful, happy laugh, with his high-toned assurance that she should never again toil at the spinning-wheel—that he would never again "play," and have his loom standing for want of weft. She asked some questions, which he answered, after seating her in the armchair, by laying her spinning-wheel on its back, the horizontal spindle vertically, while he made the wheel revolve, and drew a roving of cotton from the spindle into an attenuated thread. "Our fortune is made when that is made," he said, speaking of his drawings on the floor. "What will you call it?" asked his wife. "Call it? What an we call it after thysen, Jenny! They called thee 'Spinning Jenny' afore I had thee, because thou beat every lass in Stanehill Moor at the wheel. What if we call it 'Spinning Jenny?'"

ANECDOTE OF THE LATE MR. INGRAM, M.P.—The Quebec correspondent of the Montreal Gazette says: "I heard the other day that Mr. Ingram, the lamented late proprietor of the Illustrated London News, was in the Crown Lands Office—(poor fellow! he was inquiring about half a township, which he proposed buying for his son), when, on looking through one of the collections of wood, he espied a bit of white thorn. 'What,' he exclaimed, 'is there white thorn of that size in Canada? I would buy almost as much as could be furnished me, for box in England is getting scarce, and white thorn is the best of substitutes for wood-engravers.' This just illustrates the way in which mines of riches exist among us, of whose existence we hardly dream until we find we have destroyed them. Basswood, buttonwood, white (or tulip-tree) wood, curly birch, and other kinds of timber which used to be thought valueless, are now beginning to form articles of considerable consumption and export."

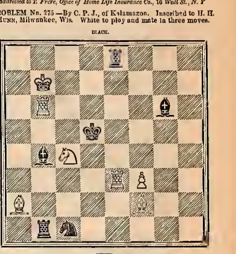
THE Echo of the Ardèche says that some years since a young girl was found living alone, and in a perfectly savage state, in a ravine in the mountains of the Drome; she fed on roots, climbed trees like an ape, and amused herself with the deer and other animals. Nothing could ever be discovered relative to her early history. When first reclaimed from the woods, she was placed in an hospital at Marseilles; here she was seen by a countess, who undertook the onerous task of educating the poor child. The effort has been successful; and we are told that the once savage creature is now a young lady, perfectly educated and highly accomplished. Her face is said to be very beautiful, but retains a curious air of originality in its expression.

CHESS.

All communications and newspapers intended for the Chess Department should be addressed to T. Frère, Office of Home Life Insurance Co., 10 Wall St., N. Y.

PROBLEM No. 275.—By C. P. J., of Kalamazoo. Inscribed to H. H. HUNN, Milwaukee, Wis. White to play and mate in three moves.

BLACK.



WHITE.

"STANDARD" PROBLEM TOURNAMENT.—Mr. John Gardner, of the Brooklyn Standard, offers the following prizes in his problem tournament : 1. For the best set of Problems, consisting of one three-move, one four-move and one five-move position, a handsome set of Staunton Chess men. 2. For the best three-move position, a copy of the English edition of Morphy's games ; and 3. For the best two-move Problem, a copy of Staunton's Chess Praxis. The three-move position for the second prize must be in addition to, and separate from, the one in three moves of the first set. No suicidal or conditional problems will be allowed to compete. Each set for each prize must be accompanied by a distinctive motto. For the second and third prizes each competitor may send in as many positions as he chooses. All positions must be sent in to the Chess Editor, box 253, Brooklyn, N. Y., by the first of January, 1861, after which date no problems will be received.

MATCH BETWEEN HORWITZ AND KOLISCH.

The conditions of the match are, that the player who wins the first three games will be declared the victor. The first game, which was won by Mr. Kolisch, we present below. It will be seen that Mr. Horwitz has not displayed the high order of play which he exhibited in former contests. Mr. Kolisch, on the other hand, played with his usual skill, and obtained an easy victory. We hope that in the remaining games Mr. Horwitz will give his opponent more trouble, and that the contest will afford features of more interest.

WHITE. Mr. H.	BLACK. Mr. K.	WHITE. Mr. H.	BLACK. Mr. K.
1 P to K 4	P to K 4	12 Kt tks B (a)	Q Kt to Kt 3 (b)
2 P to K B 4	P to Q 4	13 B to Kt 3	P to Q B 4
3 P tks Q P	P to K 5	14 P tks P	B tks P (ch)
4 B to Kt 5 (ch)	P to Q B 3	15 K to R 2 (c)	Kt to Kt 5 (ch) (d)
5 P tks P	P tks P	16 K to Kt 3	B to B 7 (ch)
6 B to B 4	K Kt to B 3	17 R tks B (e)	Q tks Q
7 P to Q 4	B to Q 3	18 P tks Kt	P to K 6
8 K Kt to K 2	Castles	19 R to K B 4	Q to K 8 (ch)
9 Castles	B to K Kt 5	20 K to R 3	Q tks Kt
10 Q Kt to B 3	Q Kt to Q 2	21 Q B tks P	K R to K
11 P to K R 3	B tks Kt and after a few more moves Mr. Horwitz resigned.

(a) To take with Queen seems to us to be plainly a better mode.
(b) Instantly taking advantage of White's last move by attacking the now unsupported Bishop.
(c) Losing the game at once. Courting defeat thus shows that Mr. Horwitz is quite out of effective practice. By playing instead the King to Rook square, White's game would have been good enough.
(d) Mr. Kolisch is not the player to overlook the now certain forcing of the game. It is evident if White take this Kt he is mated on the move.
(e) White has no alternative, for if K tks Kt Black plays Q to B (ch), and then Q K to K sq, forcing mate directly.

(We shall give the remainder of the games in our next number.)

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

☞ Diagrams of Remarkable Shots, Reports of Billiard Matches, or Items of interest concerning the game, addressed to the Editor of this column, will be thankfully received and published.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—All questions sent to Mr. Phelan in reference to the rules of the game of billiards will in future be answered in this column. It would be too much labor to send written answers to so many correspondents.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

H. D., Concord, N. H.—Received.

F. P., Racket Club.—Question : If, in leading, my ball goes in the pocket, what is the penalty?

Answer : It is optional with your adversary to make you spot your ball on the foot spot, play it over again, or take the lead himself. No count or forfeiture can be made until each player has played one stroke. As, in leading, there is no possible chance for a player to score any points, it would not be just to make him lose any.

New York, 2d December, 1860.

M. PHELAN, ESQ.—Dear Sir—I witnessed a game at Lynch's Room, in Fourteenth street, the other evening, in which occurred the following incident: The red ball was on the edge of the pocket, the position of the cue ball obliged the player to use the rest; in playing, the cue slipped and struck the end of the rest, which struck the ball and propelled it, causing a miss. The player had three to go, the opponent but one. The former claimed that the shot was null, the latter claimed that the miss put him out. Who was right?

Yours, E.

Answer.—The latter.

Hanover House, Rondout, November 30, 1860.

MICHAEL PHELAN, ESQ.—Dear Sir—You will please answer the following questions in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, next issue, as there was a small bet made on them, and is to be decided by your decision. You will do me a great favor by answering.

1st.—If the deep or painted ball, when pocketed, cannot be placed upon its proper spot, what is to be done with either of them, providing there is a centre spot on the table? If no spot on the centre of the table, then what is to be done?

2d.—If you shoot your ball in the pocket when touching to another ball, does it count for your opponent?

Yours respectfully,
AUSTIN ROBERTS.

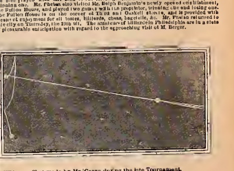
Answers.—1st. It is immaterial whether there be a centre spot on the table or not; the following is the rule. "If, when a red ball is holed or forced off the table, the striker, before playing, does not see that said red ball is replaced upon its proper spot, supposing such spot to be unoccupied, the stroke he may make while the red is not in its place is foul. But should the spot be covered by any other ball when the red is pocketed or forced off, the red must remain off the table until its proper position is vacant, and all the balls cease rolling."

2d.—Yes. The forfeitures are the same whether the cue ball be in contact with another ball or not.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

M. BERGER.—We have received a letter from M. Berger. He expresses himself gratified with his success in Boston, particularly with that of his exhibition for ladies, which was attended by the flower of Athenian society. On Monday M. Berger left Boston for Providence, where he intended to remain a day or two. He expects to commence his public exhibitions in Philadelphia on Monday, the 10th inst. A private exhibition for the gentlemen of the press will probably be given on Saturday, the 8th inst. Mr. Phelan will be present on this occasion.

BILLIARDS IN PHILADELPHIA.—Mr. Phelan visited Philadelphia during the past week on business. On the 28th ult. he played at the rooms of the Philadelphia Club, one of the most flourishing of our associations for the cultivation of the game of billiards. Mr. Phelan played with Mr. Bird, at the Club-room, a carom game, which was won by Mr. B. He also played with Mr. Bird at the latter gentleman's room two games, each player winning one. Mr. Phelan also visited Mr. Ralph Benjamin's newly opened establishment, the Fulton House, and played two games with the proprietor, winning one and losing one. The Fulton House is on the corner of Third and Gaskell streets, and is provided with means of enjoyment for all tastes, billiards, chess, bagatelle, &c. Mr. Phelan returned to this city on Thursday, the 29th ult. The amateurs of billiards in Philadelphia are in a state of pleasurable anticipation with regard to the approaching visit of M. Berger.



Shot made by Mr. Geary during the late Tournament.

THE VICTUALLING DEPARTMENT OF THE METROPOLITAN HOTEL, BROADWAY, NEW YORK, SHOWING THE PREPARATIO

(From the Home Journal.)

FRANK LESLIE A LIFE-LENGTHENER.

By N. P. Willis.

THERE are men who lengthen human life—those who shorten its industrial processes, or remove its hindrances or accidents its compelled purposes and movements—enabling us to accomplish and enjoy, where, before, we only lost life by toiling and suffering. It is for more time to live vividly, in fact, that we thank all great inventors—Morse for relieving us of suspense and dependence on mail-bags; Fulton for faster conveyance than by sails and stage-coaches; Whitney for a machine by which one man can do the work of three hundred; Daguerre and Bradley for superseding expensive portrait-sitting and difficult fresco-engraving. And to this list of public benefactors we now think should be added Frank Leslie, who has rendered comparatively needless two of life's most laborious processes, viz., the travelling and fancy-picturing which have been hitherto necessary to get "a realizing sense" of what is going on in the world.

But look for a moment at this Leslie-wonder of substitution and acceleration.

You buy for sixpence, at any corner in Broadway, or in any railroad car, a Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper. Two days previous there has been a stirring scene of public excitement, five hundred miles away—and here is a picture of it! In one second (after paying your sixpence) as complete a knowledge of the affair as you would get by travelling to the spot is conveyed to your brain, and this without the reading of an elaborate description, and without any effort of the imagination to locate the actors and their surroundings. The affair took place only twenty-four or forty-eight hours ago, and here is an exact copy of the scene, printed from an engraving on wood—a job of itself that used to take a month to execute. Think of all the other hindrances which there used to be—the tediousness of getting the artist to the spot, of his taking the view, and of long waiting for its return from the engraver—and now how is this miracle achieved?

It is by a skilful combination of the new facilities of the day, aided by ingenious contrivances and bold enterprise. In every part of the country there are now photographers and artists, with nearly all of whom Mr. Leslie is in correspondence. On the occurrence of any noteworthy event some one of these is immediately on the spot, so also one of his equally numerous literary agents—the view and the written description bring thus done at the moment, and transmitted by special messenger on an express train. The telegraph has meantime informed the office at New York, and the engravers are ready for the arrival of the drawings. A picture is made by skilful artists on a block of wood, which (a new invention) consists of many pieces, held together by bolts and nuts, so that the whole can be put into the hands of twenty engravers instead of one. By skilful arrangements of light and other conveniences these can work all night on a subject of urgent interest; and in twelve or eighteen hours from the time of the sketch's arrival it is admirably engraved and ready for the press. The description has been meantime rewritten or adapted by the resident editors and put in type. Thus there has been the employment of photography, the electric telegraph, the railway express, division of labor among artists, mechanic invention as to blocks and combined literary talent—reducing a month's work to a day!

Then comes the printing-press. And here Mr. Leslie's own specific invention has done wonders. He found on a survey so to overlay theoylinders by which certain effects of light and shade could be produced later and in one-fourth part of the time formerly consumed to produce the same results. The desired art of printing large and splendid editions of pictorial newspapers was thus rescued from final abandonment. There were also several minor difficulties which he has had to contend with, such as the warping of the blocks by change of temperature and the alteration in the character of the ink. And this latter article he is obliged (with the inferiority of the article in this country) to import from England and Germany.

But what a lesser world—standing, indeed, in the world of New York like "a world within a world"—is this vast establishment of Frank Leslie's! And how unconsciously and carelessly we daily pass it! Such a modern world, reading only the sign over the door! Such has been our own reflection, at least, after a chance walk we made to Jersey yesterday—invited by a friend to look in for once, and see its wonders of industry and talent in operation. Let us tell one or two more of its statistics, thus gathered.

A tall white marble building, on City Hall Square, opposite the Park, is the locality we speak of. The street floor is a long hall of one hundred and forty feet, occupied by the desks and counters of the superintendents and financial clerks, and looking like a vast banking-house in London. The mailing departments are connected with this, and the united business of the four periodicals here issued—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, the German illustrated paper, called Illustrirte Zeitung, Frank Leslie's Monthly, and the Budget of Fun—require, of course, a well-disciplined system of industry and management. Beneath is a cellar, and again another cellar beneath this, the first devoted to the printing-presses (which are worked by steam, and are perfect marvels of human ingenuity when seen in operation), and the second to the vast preparations of paper and ink.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLICATION OFFICE, 19 CITY HALL SQUARE, N. Y.

The several upper stories of the building are divided quite as systematically—the rooms where the numerous artists work together, the "dens" of the different members of the editorial corps, the type-setters of the two languages—German and English—and (last and most curious) the apartment of the many engravers on wood. This is under the more particular superintendence of Frank Leslie himself (originally an engraver), and the process, as carried on by these troubled and fine-looking men with their various delicate implements is exceedingly interesting.

The money circulation of which this single building (or rather Mr. Leslie's brain) is the valvular heart, is, of course, very large. In answer to inquiries we ventured to make, we learned as item or two. Nearly one hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars a year paid for paper, between six thousand and seven thousand dollars for printing ink, nearly six thousand dollars per month for salaries to sub-editors and artists, one hundred and thirty persons employed altogether, and the receipts about five hundred thousand dollars a year. Leslie's Monthly is the youngest of the family of illustrated newspapers in America.

We really think such an establishment is a wonder—and not so much from any one feature, as from the mingled genius for combination and effectiveness which is at the bottom of it all! First, however, come the sagacity to detect a public want; and on the single certainty of a popularity for such knowledge as could go in to the eye at a glance—picture reading—it is scarcely infallible—and sustained. And what a lucent-sworn, of pleasurable and instructive impressions issues perpetually from that one building, for the children of the country, the harried and the overburdened, as well as for the intelligent and art-loving!

What will they do next, we wonder! With the discoveries we have above enumerated for this age, what will the next age do for its share of improving miracles? Looking ahead it is dim enough, to be sure—for human ingenuity seems exhausted—but looking back, we are ready for anything! The Frank Leslie of the year A. D. 1900 will perhaps have taken Venuvius in hand, have looked into its brimstone and lava, and set up a private volcano in Broadway for the production of "monster editions" of earthquakes and Gunbuilders! We shall do our best to look down and see how it all is.

A TRUE SISTER OF CHARITY.—An elderly gentleman, being taken ill at an inn, in a seaport town, where he was quite unknown, was advised by the doctor to have a Sister of Charity as a nurse; and much comfort, attention and consolation he found from so doing. He lingered for two months and died, despite his sister's solicitude. The will of the old gentleman was made just before his death, and was to be opened by the doctor. To the surprise of all he left to the sister who had so carefully tended him twenty-three thousand pounds, while to his family and the expectant heir, his nephew, there fell but scanty legacies. When summoned, the youth, who should have been a wealthy man, was indignant, but still he could not excuse the girl of trickery. She was artless, and seemed very sorry for him, and he was struck with that je ne sais quoi which is the first symptom of matrimony; so he seized upon the idea which had faintly flashed through his mind. It was the only safety valve, and, despite her being a sister, he then and there popped the question, and was naively met with a "Yes; and I don't see any other alternative to return the property to its owner." This is a fact—romance as it appears.

MR. GLEIG relates the following anecdote of the Duke of Wellington: Referring to the advance from the lines of Torres Vedras, the Duke stated that he "got famously taken in on that occasion. The troops and staff were in dandies—a good deal. It was necessary to stop it, and I issued an order announcing that, the first man taken in the act should be hanged upon the spot. One day, just as we were sitting down to dinner, there men were brought to the door of the tent by the provost. The one against them was clear. I had a good many guests with me on that occasion, and among the rest, I think, Lord Nugent. They seemed dreadfully shocked, and could not eat their dinner. I didn't like it much myself, but, as I told them, I had no time to indulge my feelings, I must do my duty. We then broke them off rather gravely, and next morning, when we were moving forward, the branches of a tree close to the high road. It was a terrible example, and produced the desired effect; there was no more plundering. But you may guess what my astonishment was when some months afterwards, I learned that one of my staff took counsel with Dr. Hume, and as there men had just died in the hospital, they hung them up, and let the three culprits return to their regiments." "Were you angry?" was the next question. "Well, I suppose I was at first; but as I had no wish to take the provost's office, and only wanted the example, and as the example had the desired effect, my anger soon died out, and I confess to you that I am very glad now that the three rascals were spared."

ERLE GOWER;

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c., &c.

CHAPTER X.

In some breasts passion lies conceal'd and silent,
Like war's swart powder in a castle vault,
Until occasion like the linstock lights it;
Then comes at once the lightning and the thunder,
And distant echoes tell that all is rent asunder.—Old Play.

Erle, chafing with ire as he quitted the prostrate form of Philip Avon, strode with swift steps to the chambers which he had occupied since his arrival at the manor-house. He found the sitting-room more grim, bleak and lonely than ever. No fire burned cheerily on the wide hearth, the few signs of life and animation which had in some degree lifted it out of the solemn gloom which previously overspread it were removed, and the dark old chamber looked more chill, silent and dreary than it had yet seemed to him.

He entered the bedroom, and the same change seemed to have come over that apartment. The large, antique, four-post bedstead, deprived of its curtains, looked ghastly and skeleton-like, the table was shorn of its ornaments, and the high backed chairs, unoccupied even by a stray garment, stood bolt-upright against the black oaken wainscoting with a kind of terrifying, prim formality.

He saw at a glance that his wardrobe had been removed, and he began to marvel wherefore, unless Lord Kingswood, over whom, with respect to himself, so agreeable a change appeared to have come, had ordered him to be removed to more cheerful quarters.

While this thought crossed him, his eye fell upon the portrait over the fireplace.

A strange and violent thrill ran through his frame, for it seemed as if the weird-like beauty whom he had met in Kingswood Chace was sitting there smiling down upon him.

Whether it was the effect of some peculiar refraction of the rays of light, admitted by the undraped window, whether the removal of the heavy, massive curtains from the bed, had enabled a more direct action of the daylight to take place he could not tell, nor did he seek to know. All he was conscious of was the startling, life-like appearance of the portrait.

The resemblance to the forest maiden was singularly striking, and, what was yet more strange, the features seemed to slowly change into those of the Lady Maud, and then to make a rapid transition back to those of the maiden he had met in the forest.

And suddenly, to his great and almost overpowering excitement, it seemed as though the clear blue eyes fixed upon him glittered and glistened, and that the lady moved forward as though she would approach him.

He gasped for breath, and clutched at the bedstead for support; and then it seemed to him that she pointed with her right hand to a particular spot on the side of the chamber near to him.

A deadly faintness seized him and benumbed his limbs; he covered his eyes with his hand, and remained for a few minutes struggling between consciousness and insensibility; at length calling reason to his aid, he became ashamed of his weakness, and tearing his hand from his eyes, he fixed his gaze once more upon the face which had so affected him. It was no longer vividly animated and life-like. It appeared a dull old portrait of one young and fair, time-worn and obscure.

Still the hand pointing to the wall caught his eye, and he turned his gaze in the direction which it indicated.

He saw nothing but the black oaken wainscot, with its gorgeously carved panelling, representing groups of flowers and fruits in high relief.

Impelled by an influence for which he could not account, he examined those flowers at the part where the finger yet pointed, and in among the wreathing leaves and blossoms he caught sight of a small object which had evidently been pushed in there for the purpose of concealment.

With no little patience and care he contrived to draw out an antique key, possessing a gothic handle, elaborately ornamented, and many wards to fit the lock to which it belonged. Again he looked at the portrait, but the hand still pointed as before, and if possible the painting itself looked dingier and less legible than ever.

After some little thought he placed the key in his pocket, and glided out of the room, resolved to take an opportunity to search for some lock within the precincts of those apartments, to which he felt sure that it belonged. And as he passed through into the sitting-room he cast his eyes round the apartment, and he noted the doors in them, apparently belonging to store closets; one only appeared to have a lock that small key would fit.

That door was situated in a remote corner of the room.

Influenced by an irresistible impulse, he hurried to it and tried it. The key fitted, and he was about to turn it and open the door, when he heard hasty footsteps approaching the room. He had barely time to remove the key and conceal it, when a man-servant entered in search of him.

The servant then informed him that by direction of Lord Kingswood his apartments had been changed, and that he was prepared to conduct him to the part of the building in which they were situated.

Erle could only reply with an assent, and promising himself at an early date to examine the contents of the closet, the key of which had been so mysteriously discovered by him, he followed the servant from the room in silence. The apartments selected for him were in front of the mansion, and overlooked the garden and other grounds, and part of the park beyond. They were as completely the opposite in their aspect and their appointments to those he had just quitted as it is possible to conceive—spacious, airy, lighted by large plate-glass windows, handsomely decorated, and filled with modern furniture of a luxurious and expensive character. They presented a contrast so striking and so remarkable it was impossible to escape from the conviction that the selection of the apartments he had just quitted to be appropriated to him was a studied and deliberate insult.

He was quite aware that he had to thank Lady Kingswood for it, and he found it difficult to reconcile her subsequent behavior to him with such an unmerited, and, therefore, so unworthy indignity.

He, however, knew nothing of the operating influences under which she acted, or he might have felt amazed had her insult been of a more decided and unequivocal character. The thought troubled a little at first, but he presently put it aside, as one of the singular events of his strange though young life.

He seated himself by the window, and his eye fell upon the detested form of Philip Avon, who was standing on one of the terraces in conversation with Cyril Kingswood, and was gesticulating in an excited manner.

Erle could even at that distance see that the face of Philip Avon was whiter than usual, and, by his movement, that he was speaking under the influence of passion. Cyril, on the contrary, stood calmly erect, and listened to him either with lofty dignity or contemptuous indifference.

Whatever the sentiment prompting his conduct, it moved Philip Avon to a paroxysm of passion, for Erle saw him suddenly raise his clenched fist in the air, and then hurry from the terrace on which they had been standing and make towards the avenue, among the trees of which he was soon hidden. Cyril Kingswood watched him for a few minutes, and, so far as Erle could judge, he turned and entered the house.

It was strange that similar expressions respecting the sensations his presence had created at Kingswood should have crossed his mind and Lord Kingswood's almost simultaneously.

He could only too well comprehend that the mystery which surrounded his birth, as well as his recent and present position, must have some connection with events which would not bear the light of day, or why was such secrecy respecting his history so carefully preserved and jealously guarded? He perceived how cautiously Lady Kingswood regarded him, and how strangely, and it seemed to him defiantly, she acted respecting him. Cyril eyed him, too, every now and then, with an aspect of marvel, while sweet young Lady Maud evidently indulged in much quiet wonder, as to who and what he was. The knowledge that he was a "family secret" only perhaps rendered her more anxious to become mistress of it, being quite sure that if it was entrusted to her keeping, she would never communicate it to a living being.

Then the guests stared at him so inquiringly. Good breeding kept most of them silent, but there were some individuals staying at the manor-house who were only waiting, he knew, to put certain questions to him it would be difficult for him to answer.

He felt, therefore, a conviction that he had attracted too much attention, that the morning's performance had rendered him too popular, and that in the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed, he ought to remain in a species of seclusion until the time arrived for him to take an active part in the affairs of life.

Acting under this impression, he sent the message to Lord Kingswood, requesting to be excused from appearing at dinner that day, and he formed a resolution to follow up this proceeding by appearing as little as possible in the presence of Lord Kingswood's guests.

He consoled himself for his absence from dinner with the belief that Lady Maud would not be present. He assured himself that she had undergone enough excitement and fatigue to confine her to her room for that day at least, and at table there would be no one else he could have the slightest wish to meet.

Sweet Lady Maud! What a delightful reverie he sank into when, going over mentally the exciting incidents of the morning, he dwelt upon that one in which Lady Maud, just saved from a terrible fate, clung to him in still terrified agitation, and laying her dear face on his panting bosom, relieved her overcharged heart in a flood of gushing tears.

"From the instant I beheld her, I yearned for her friendship," he murmured, with emotion, and added, in exultation, "I have won a claim to it. She will not repel if I prefer it now. Then, in this wide world, I can turn to one, if to one alone, who will be interested in my advancement, sympathise with me in my disappointments, and smile upon me in my conquests over fate. Dear, dear Lady Maud! how I wish you were my sister."

And with this aspiration, which by no means disclosed the real condition of his feelings, he proceeded to sketch out, as youth will do, gorgeous visions of the future. Scenes in sunny, flowery meads and moonlit glades, glidings on still lakes and wanderings in the green umbrageousness of leafy vistas. We will not be sure but that the visions did not include triumphant gatherings of joyous tenantry, in holiday clothing, shouting deliriously and casting flowers upon the velvet, grassy path, along which he conducted Lady Maud, in proud, self-gratulating triumph. What farther they might have included, it is needless to conjecture, for his reverie was brought to an abrupt close by the discovery that Cyril Kingswood, with a pleasant smile upon his handsome features, was standing before him, quietly watching him.

Erle sprang up, and a flush of scarlet illuminated his face, while an expression something like displeasure, passed over it.

Cyril laid his two hands upon his shoulders, and said,

"Sit down, Gower, I want to talk to you. Don't think I have rudely intruded upon your privacy, for I have behaved exceedingly well. I knocked twice at your door before I entered, coughed twice when I did venture inside, and I have called you by name four times. As you did not reply, I awaited the close of your ruminations, especially as I perceived they were of a pleasant character, or I am no judge of the human face divine."

Erle seated himself as requested, and could not help smiling at the frank and easy manner in which Cyril entered into his explanation, and then apologised for not being more attentive and ready to welcome him on his entrance.

Cyril abruptly stopped him.

"Our apartments are near to each other, and I assure you I shall frequently drop into your room without ceremony, as I hope you will drop into mine," he exclaimed; "and for certain reasons, too. Firstly, I have taken a liking to you because of your ready and brave assistance to me when in some peril from that pestilent ruffian, Tubal Kish, who haunts the Chace, like a wolf, whom nobody can catch, and who has more lives than a cat; and, secondly, because of your right noble rescue of my pretty little cousin Maud. Do you know, Gower, I am very much attached to cousin Maud. I could not easily have spared her, and therefore, again and again, with a full heart, I thank you for having pursued her, undaunted by any obstacle, and, rescuing, having restored her to those who love her with very genuine affection."

A bright tear glistened in his eye as he spoke, and at the same time he squeezed Erle's hand with a hearty pressure.

Erle, though pleased with this testimony of his gratitude, nevertheless felt a strange, acute pang pass through his heart when he heard him speak of Lady Maud in such warm terms. He sighed and said, "Lady Maud seems very gentle and amiable. I do not wonder that you should all be attached to her."

"If you did, you would wonder less as soon as you knew her better," replied Cyril, quickly. "Aye, and unless I am deceived in Maud's character, which I am sure I am not, she will, after what happened this morning, become as fond of you, Gower, as of me. I should say, fonder, because you—never mind, we shall see."

"Pray finish your sentence," observed Erle, rather eagerly.

Cyril, laughing good-humoredly, replied,

"The fact is, Maud knows more of me than she does of you; I have teased her far more than ever I caressed her, and then—then, you know, Gower, she is more like a sister to me than a cousin. So, as you are neither brother nor cousin, as you are better looking than I am, and have done her ladyship good service, why, you certainly possess a better claim to her gentle consideration than your humble servant."

Again Cyril broke out into a merry laugh, in which Erle joined—not that his mirth was at all sincere; the subject possessed an interest far too deep for him to treat slightly. He laughed, in fact, to hide the real state of his feelings.

Presently he said, pursuing the subject, a pleasant one to him,

"Lady Maud's home appears to be at Kingswood?"

"Oh, yes," replied Cyril, quickly, "Lady Maud is, you might almost say, a Kingswood. She is the daughter of Lady Kingswood's only sister, and, like her mother, is named after a remarkable ancestress, about whom strange tales are told. Poor cousin Maud! she is an orphan. Her mother was married to Lord St. Clair, and while Maud was yet a child, Lord and Lady St. Clair visited Italy. They were both drowned in a tempest while returning from thence to France. She has been reared under the guardianship of my father. There, you perceive, I have established another bond of sympathy between you and her, for you, too, are an orphan, you know."

This was precisely a fact, which Erle did not know, and he therefore felt the barb of the arrow, thus unintentionally launched at him, pierce his heart acutely. He made, however, no response, he only reddened.

Cyril became silent, his face suddenly assumed a more serious expression, and he said, in a grave tone,

"Let me now come to the object of my present visit. I have just parted with Philip Avon. He left me in a frenzy of vindictive passion concerning you."

Erle smiled scornfully.

"You have deeply offended him, Gower," continued Cyril.

"I care not!" exclaimed Erle, impatiently.

"He is an obstinate and a desperate fellow," rejoined Cyril.

"Still I care not," responded Erle, in a haughty tone.

"Well, the truth is, my dear friend," observed Cyril, in a kind of persuasive tone, "he is the scion of a very old house. The Avons, of Hawkesbury, trace to the Saxon Heptarchy——"

"Why not to Adam?" interposed Erle, in a yet more impatient tone.

Cyril shrugged his shoulders and smiled, but without further allusion to Philip's ancestry, he continued:

"He is heir to very extensive estates, will be very wealthy, and will possess great influence in the county."

Erle's brow lowered, and speaking abruptly, as if the subject was distasteful, he said,

"All this is nothing to me."

"But it is to Lord Kingswood," rejoined Cyril, quickly, "and, in one respect, to Lady Maud. Let me beg of you to hear me out patiently, Gower. The affair I wish to talk over with you is more serious than you can imagine."

"Philip Avon has been preferring a whining complaint to you," exclaimed Erle, with a sneer.

"Not a whining complaint, but a complaint," returned Cyril. "Philip Avon does not whine, he storms."

"The most worthless cur yelps the loudest," observed Erle, in the same scornful tone.

Cyril regarded him earnestly; he appeared surprised at the extreme bitterness with which Erle spoke.

"You have scarcely interchanged a word with Philip Avon," he remarked, "yet you speak of him as if he had put a mortal affront upon you, instead of the reverse being the case."

"He has insulted me," replied Erle, quickly.

"You—when?" asked Cyril, eagerly.

Erle related what had occurred between them when Lady Maud's horse took flight.

"And you have repaid him with a blow," returned Cyril, thoughtfully.

"He placed himself offensively in my path, with the intention of making some observations which would probably have added outrage to the insult already received," responded Erle, angrily. "I therefore removed him from my path."

"Philip Avon is certainly not an individual whose friendship I covet, or whose acquaintance even I care to retain," observed Cyril, thoughtfully; "yet I should be careful how I fastened an affront upon him."

"Why?" inquired Erle, sharply. He wished to have put the question in an indifferent tone, but his excitement was too great to be so easily controlled.

"I have said that the Avons of Hawkesbury are an ancient race," Cyril rejoined. "They possess extensive influence in the county, an influence Lord Kingswood is anxious to secure. Philip Avon is deeply smitten with Lady Maud; Lord Kingswood is very anxious that they should be united, because he thus secures the influence he is longing for. I don't think—in fact, I am sure—Lady Maud does not much like him; but then Lord Kingswood has set his heart upon the match and if it were to be broken off by some such contretemps as that of to-day, my father's fury would know no bounds. It would be launched not only upon you and I, but upon Maud likewise; I am, therefore, anxious to prevent an explosion if we can patch it up."

Erle echoed the last words, and added,

"I do not understand you. Explain."

"To be plain," replied Cyril, frankly. "You struck Philip a blow, he insists that he will not be satisfied without a most ample apology, or by washing out the stain with your blood. Such were his furious and vehement observations. But as he is certainly not free from blame, it has occurred to me that by some little dexterous management the turbulent son may be calmed down."

"I have explained to you the position in which we stand," rejoined Erle, with haughtiness. "Pray let me ask you what course you would pursue?"

"Pray, my dear fellow, do not put that question to me," responded Cyril, hastily. "At this moment I should not like to answer it. Besides, I wish to see you both reconciled, or at least not in open hostility, for the very special reasons I have given to you."

"I shall not apologise," replied Erle, peremptorily. "Let Mr. Avon solve the other half of the problem."

"Tut, tut, don't be obstinate, Gower," urged Cyril. "Think of Maud—your own position as a protegé of Lord Kingswood, a patron you would not wish to offend. Mind me, the ridiculous behavior of Philip Avon springs from nothing more than a stupid jealousy with regard to Maud. Why, he was at first jealous of me, the fool; but when he is satisfied that Lady Maud is not and cannot be anything to you but a friend, his rudeness will disappear, and you will be quickly on very good terms. He'll alter, be sure, after he has married dear little Maud."

Erle ground his teeth together as if he would reduce them to powder when the last suggestion reached his ears. If Cyril had cast about for some inducement which should render Erle inflexible, he could have hit on no one more powerful than the last.

Erle's eyes flashed fire.

"Mr. Kingswood," he said, sternly, "among the considerations you have brought forward with a view to settle the rupture which has taken place, you have omitted my honor. I am very anxious that no act of mine shall in the very lightest degree inflict pain or annoyance upon the Lady Maud. This is a consideration which would urge me to any step short of a sacrifice of my honor. I have also an anxious wish to retain the favor of Lord Kingswood as well as not to implicate you in a transaction which exclusively belongs to me and Philip Avon. But I will not, to save myself or others from any fate, surrender my honor. I must, therefore, repeat that I will offer no apology or present any other front to Mr. Philip Avon but one of inflexible defiance."

At this instant a long-drawn note, as if produced by a silver horn, rose in the air, swelling softly and sweetly. It seemed to come from afar, and yet was distinctly heard, and in some degree it resembled a prolonged moan of anguish.

Cyril started as it caught his ear, and he bent his eyes confusedly on Erle.

The latter stood in an attitude of intense attention, like the startled stag who winds the approach of the hunter from afar.

Suddenly he gripped Cyril's wrist.

"What is that?" he asked, in an almost inaudible whisper.

Cyril seemed strangely moved. He replied hastily and unguardedly—

"The wonder of Kingswood Chace."

Again the long, mournful note swelled in the air, and died gradually away.

A throng of words rushed to Erle's lips, and he was about to address a host of questions to Cyril, when a servant entered, bearing in his hand a letter.

He advanced to Erle, and placing it in his hand, said,

"From Mr. Philip Avon."

CHAPTER XI.

He bursts the thickets, glances through the glades,
And plunges deep into the wildest wood;
Is slow, yet sure adhesive to the track.—Thomson.

Poor little spirit! naught but shame and woe
Nurse the sick heart whose life-blood nurses thine;
Yet not those only; love hath triumphed so,
As for thy sake makes sorrow more divine;
And yet though thou be pure, the world is fee
To purify it born in such a shrine;
And having trampled it for struggling thence,
Smiles to itself, and calls it Providence.—Lowell.

The name of Philip Avon had a marked effect both on Erle Gower and Cyril Kingswood.

Strangely excited as they had been by the plaintive single note of the horn which they had just heard issuing from some distant part of the Chace, they were scarcely less moved by the sudden presentation of a note from one of whom they had been speaking in hostile terms, and whose communication they were well aware must be of an unfriendly character.

Erle glanced at the superscription, and observed, written in one corner of the envelope, with a strong dash under it, the words, "Strictly private." He raised his eyes to the bearer of the note, who proved to be Lord Kingswood's valet, Pharisee, and, in a cold tone, inquired whether an answer was required.

"Mr. Philip Avon's groom placed it in my hands, to be instantly delivered to you, Mr. Gower," returned Pharisee, fixing his eyes steadfastly upon him, as if to endeavor to elicit from the expression of his features whether he anticipated the contents of the note.

"Does he wait?" asked Erle.

"No," replied Pharisee; "but if——"

"You can leave us!" exclaimed Erle, with a peremptory gesture.

The lips of Pharisee compressed, but he made his habitual bow, and moved lightly and swiftly out of the chamber.

Cyril fixed his eyes eagerly and inquiringly on Erle's face.

A faint smile curled the lips of Erle, and he pointed to the words in the corner of the note.

Cyril read them hastily, and said instantly—

"Still Gower, as it no doubt contains——"

Erle interposed.

"Fear not for me," he said, with a smile, even though a shade of melancholy crossed his expressive features. "Let its contents prove what they will, I am prepared for them. I fear to face no breathing being. If I am to meet him, and I fall, I do not know that in my last moments my fate would cost me a sigh. I have not been known out of the small sphere in which I have moved. I shall not be missed even from that. I shall leave no gap to fill up, and in truth it seems to me it would have been well had I never been."

"Tush, Gower, you may have need of a friend, talk not thus," exclaimed Cyril, earnestly.

"If I should, I will seek one. As it is, I intend to rely upon myself," he rejoined.

Cyril would have further urged him, but he stopped him ere he uttered half a dozen words.

"Hear me," he exclaimed, in a firm and decided tone. "I am unacquainted with the contents of the communication forwarded to me by Mr. Philip Avon; whatever they may be, I repeat to you they will find me prepared. I may, and perhaps it is only just to myself as well as to you, that I should here mention that my education has been of a peculiar kind. Not alone has my mind been subtivated in a manner calculated to develop my reasoning faculties at a somewhat precocious age, but I have been long trained in a very rigidly severe school to the use of weapons of all kinds, to pedestrian and horse exercise, and to undergo fatigue supposed to be beyond the physical strength of one of my age. I have been instructed to rely always upon myself, and to believe that if my own resources failed, there would be none to help me, as none to lament me, for I have no friend, save God. Let me entreat you, Mr. Kingswood, to leave me, and unless at my especial request, to attempt to take no part in the matter between myself and Mr. Philip Avon. If we should not meet again, make no inquiries concerning me. I shall do well when I am resting, and you can only do harm by seeking to interfere with the inevitable."

He pressed the hand of Cyril Kingswood as he concluded, and with a gentle violence forced him to the door of the apartment.

Cyril found himself in the corridor, and heard Erle turn the key in the lock, thus fastening himself within his chamber, before he was able to renew the arguments with which he wished to enforce the propriety of Erle's perusing the communication he had received in his presence.

For a moment Cyril felt offended, and with a quick step hurried to his own room, but soon his better feelings prevailed, and, as he had taken a liking to Erle, he resolved not to let the matter rest there, but to take an early opportunity that night again to visit him.

As he made this resolve, he donned a cap, took a double-barrelled gun out of its case, and quietly, descending a private staircase, made his way, at a leisurely pace out into the park, diverging in an oblique direction towards the Chace, and keeping himself beneath the shadow of the trees springing up almost everywhere in his path, until he was quite sure that he could not be observed from the house.

Then he quickened his step, pursuing his way now through darkened groves, and anon through open spaces studded with large patches of dark furze, occasionally pausing to listen or to turn a quick eye about him, carefully examining from time to time as he did so the lock of his gun.

But save a startled bird that flew up screaming before him, or a timid hare which dashed with a sudden plunge into the tangled furze, nothing met his gaze, and he continued his course even at a quickened pace until he reached a part of the Chace where many varieties of trees, thickly clustered, intertwined their branches above, while the stems, irregularly situated beneath, formed a kind of natural labyrinth.

Here Cyril paused, looked back on the route he had pursued, cast his eyes right and left, and, satisfied that he was neither followed nor watched, he threaded his way by a meandering path between the narrow trunks of the innumerable trees until he was checked by such a profusion of undergrowth that further progress appeared to be impossible.

Skirting this entangled mass for a short distance into a denser and yet deeper part of the hoary old forest, he, with a light and quick step, glided along a narrow winding path, which was barely perceptible to other than a practised eye, and pursued it until he turned abruptly into what proved to be an alcove.

In the leafy summer time it would have been undiscoverable to one unacquainted with its situation, and even now, with its network and tracery of thin boughs and shoots straggling from the parent stems in every imaginable direction, it would have been passed unobserved by those in search of it.

As he parted the obstructing shrubs aside a smile of pleasure lighted up his face, for his eager eye fell upon the form of a young, timid girl, who was standing motionless and phantomlike in the centre of this dimly lighted tree-formed recess.

It was the forest maiden rescued from Tobal Kish.

He hastened towards her, took her unresisting hand and raised it to his lips.

She hurriedly snatched it from him as if angry. Then she let it fall to her side and gazed in his face sorrowfully and earnestly.

With a look of surprise, he said in an anxious tone,

"Violet, what has happened? You alarm me by your looks, and even yet more by your manner"

She turned upon him a look of deep reproachfulness. She seemed about to utter some rapidly enunciated observations, but though she struggled to express the thoughts pressing on brain and heart, she seemed incapable of constructing the language in which she wished to convey them.

Her lips quivered, her bosom heaved and fell, and she burst into tears.

"Great Heavens! what can have occurred?" exclaimed Cyril, excitedly. "I entreat you to tell me, Violet. You distress me by your silence as much as by your sorrow. You know that you may confide in me, and you know that if I can aid you and restore your mind to its usual peace and cheerfulness, I will."

She shook her head, wrung her hands bitterly, and turned her humid eyes upon him with a look of inexpressible misery.

He grew yet more excited, and with much solicitude urged her to reveal to him the cause of her grief, repeating his determination to win back for her that serenity of which, through some yet unknown cause, she had been deprived.

"You cannot—you cannot—oh, Cyril you cannot!" she at length exclaimed, with another wild ebullition of grief.

He stared at her aghast. He clenched both hands and knitted his brows.

"Has Tubal Kish again pursued you?" he asked, between his teeth.

"No—oh, no—it is you alone, Cyril. You who have caused me this sorrow—you, oh you!"

"I!" he faltered, in increased amazement. "What have I done, Violet, that you should thus suddenly shrink from me in tears and reproachful anger?"

She drew a step nearer to him, and clasped her hands together.

"Not reproachful anger, Cyril," she cried, with trembling lip. "Yet you have caused my heart this terrible sorrow, for we must part—part, Cyril, part—for ever. Oh, bitterness! oh, misery!"

"In the name of mercy, explain what all this means!" rejoined Cyril, in a state of bewilderment. "I cause you sorrow? I, Violet? I the occasion of our parting? I am at a loss even for a clue to your meaning."

She shook her head sorrowfully, and with a deep sigh, said,

"Perhaps it would be better that there should be no explanation. Perhaps it would be wiser for you to say farewell, and leave me now and for ever, and forget that I ever lived"

Cyril, with a frantic and passionate gesture, cried,

"You will drive me to frenzy, Violet. Of what have I been guilty? what unintentional crime have I committed to bring about in you a change at once so remarkable and so distressing?"

"No crime! oh, no crime! And yet——" hesitatingly exclaimed the young girl, who appeared to be in a state of distracting perplexity as well as grief.

"And yet—what?" inquired Cyril, impetuously, as she checked herself.

She gazed in his face with a strange earnestness. She looked stedfastly into his eyes, as if searching down into their depths to pluck out truth from his soul. As his unwavering eyes returned her solicitous scrutiny with an expression fully as searching as her own, unmixed with a trace of untruth or deception, she again wrung her hands and paced up and down with disordered steps, saying,

"I do not know. I cannot tell. I am at a loss to comprehend or conceive."

Cyril watched her for a few moments, perfectly overwhelmed and confounded by astonishment.

She had, up to the present moment, always met him with a glad smile radiating her sweet face, innocent words of joy trembling on her lips, and a charming frankness of manner wholly free from guile, which rendered her singular beauty even yet more prepossessing. Her changed mien and deep distress of mind, unconscious as he was of having acted in any way calculated to occasion it, absolutely electrified him—especially, too, when she displayed such reluctance to afford him an explanation.

He at length, though not without difficulty, succeeded in restoring her to something like a degree of calmness, save that she appeared to tremble and shrink if he offered to take her hand or approach her closely, as he had been wont to do. Beyond this her terror rather than her timidity most affected him. Her artless confiding had hitherto been to him an inexpressible charm. Its sudden withdrawal enraged as well as wounded him, but he subdued his emotion in his efforts to draw from her an explanation of the extraordinary change which had taken place in her conduct towards him.

Ultimately, at his earnest request, she seated herself, and in a low, sorrowful tone, in compliance with his urgings, she said—

"You will remember that years ago we met in one of the forest glades. At first I turned from you and fled, but yet I looked back, because you did not appear to be older than myself, and your face was fair to look upon, and did not seem like that of one of whom I should be afraid. It was not cold and stern like Ishmael's; it was not ugly, dark and ferocious, like Tubal Kish's; but it seemed kind and good, and I stopped, for you had not offered to pursue me, and I wondered who you were, and whether, like me, you lived in the forest. Then you drew near to me, and spoke gentle words, and you smiled and seemed glad to speak to me and to gaze upon me."

"Indeed, indeed, I was!" breathed Cyril, softly.

"Then we met again and again, and we have wandered together through all the prettiest places in the old Chace, in the copse and the thicket, in the glade and over the heath, and your looks were always pleasant, and your words gentle, and your conduct tender and loving, like as though you were a brother that had been revealed to me after a separation since infancy. And you told me that you lived beyond the trees, yonder even where the great old hall stands, and I told you that my name was Violet, and that I lived with Ishmael, a grave, quiet man, down in a dell where nobody but Tubal Kish came to visit"

"Aye, in the ancient hunting-lodge, which everybody supposed to be deserted except by spirits of the old hunters of the Chace," observed Cyril, quietly, with a view of inspiring her with confidence to proceed. "It is said that the lodge was the favorite haunt of a bad baron of Kingswood——"

"Oh yes, oh yes!" interposed the maiden, with a sudden renewal of her affrighted mien. "Do not speak of it! do not you speak of it!"

He looked with surprise at her, and she waved her hand rapidly and deprecatingly at him.

"Look not at me in that way," she cried entreatingly, "but listen to me; I will not extend our interview longer than I can help. I have told you often that I never beheld any living creature like unto you. I have seen the gamekeepers belonging to the manor, and the beaters, and Ishmael and Tubal Kish, but I have never seen one so fair and noble as you, until to-day."

"To-day!" cried Cyril, quickly, a pang of jealously darting through his heart.

"Hush, Cyril!" she exclaimed, again waving her head. "I say that I have not, from the hour we met until now, seen any face like to yours. Well, we have met many times in joy and happiness, and have parted sadly because of the time that must pass before we could meet again; and I have thought of you in the early dawn, as the joyous sun rose up to gladden the sky and brake, to make the birds sing, and cause the budding flowers to blossom with his shining smiling face, and I have thought of you the long day through, when your presence made my eyes happy; and I thought of you at eventide to name you in my prayers, and implore a blessing upon you; and I saw your face in my dreams, only to welcome it more gladly when in bright reality it shone before me. Was this wrong, Cyril? was this very wrong?"

"Very wrong," he iterated, as if he hardly believed his ears. "Ah, dear Violet, if you only knew how that sweet confession overjoys me, you would not believe that it was wrong," he subjoined with fervor.

She turned her eyes upon his with an eager searching gaze and said:

"Was it thus you thought of me?"

"Even thus, my sweet Violet," he returned, in a tone of passionate fondness. "I have thought of you in the dawn, in the day, in the still night, and in my slumbers your dear face has smiled down upon me like that of an angel. Far away or near, in the dull loneliness of my college rooms, or in the gay, brilliant festivity of my father's mansion, my first, only, dearest thought, has been of you"

An expression of inexpressible felicity passed over her features as she heard this, and instinctively she stretched out her small white hand towards him, he seized it and kissed it with ardor.

Then she uttered a low cry of anguish, turned deathly pale, and withdrew her hand hastily.

"It was wrong, Cyril, for you to have done this. It was wrong for me to think of you, and to pray for you," she exclaimed hurriedly. "It was a sin and wickedness of both, but, oh! most of all a crime in you!"

"Violet, in the name of Heaven, tell me who has been speaking with you, and what has been said of me; give me, I implore you, the opportunity of meeting the accusations, so that I may be enabled to disabuse your innocent mind of unkind thoughts, raised by false assertions made concerning me. At least, in fairness, I claim this!" he said, energetically.

"Cyril," she rejoined, earnestly, "tell me, in all sincerity and honor, have you sought me here in this lonely forest, and wandered with me in silent places, with other motive than that you have found some pleasure in my society—as I confess I had in yours?"

"What motive other than that could I possibly have?" he answered, quickly. "Have we not been happy in our ramblings, our interchange of thought, and those sweet communings which assured us our tastes, our preferences, our impressions—even our aspirations—were similar? What object, dear Violet, could I have than to be as often as I might near to you, and always dear to you."

"I do not know," she returned, with a perplexed, almost irritated aspect. "Yet I learn that you are the son of a lord, with many high and powerful friends, and noble acquaintances, while I am but a poor forest maiden, dwelling beneath a humble roof in the wilds of an old forest, and that it is not in the nature of human institutions for the lofty and the mean to consort for other than the destruction of the weakest and most helpless."

"Who has dared to say this to you, Violet?" he cried, with an indignant air.

"Oh, Cyril, Cyril! I begin now to see there is truth and reason in the assertion, though at first it appeared incredible to me," she returned, an increasing sadness stealing over her expressive features. "I will tell you all that has occurred, and why I am so suddenly changed in my manner and conduct to you. In spite of what has been urged upon me, I have faith in your truth, and in the sincerity of your affection, for were you in reality the demon you have been painted to me, nature, Heaven itself, would have provided me with an instinct to discover it, and to fly from you with horror."

The tears sprang into his eyes. He took her now unreluctant hand and laid it on his heart.

"Before God, Violet," he exclaimed, solemnly, though his voice slightly trembled under the deep emotion he felt, "since I have known you, no thought of wrong to you has obtruded its base presence upon the, I trust, spotless surface of my honor."

She raised her fond, weeping eyes, and as she upturned her sweet, innocent face to his, she sunk gently on his breast, and murmured,

"I do, in the fulness of a grateful heart, believe you, Cyril."

There was a very expressive silence for a minute.

Cyril pressed her to his breast, unable to utter a word.

Suddenly he started, and gently removed her from his shoulder, as a suggestion flashed through his brain.

"No," he thought, "bliss though it be to press you to my heart, I will sacrifice even that rather than a suspicion shall be allowed to vex your innocent mind or give to infamous calumniators the smallest ground on which to found an accusation."

"Let me know, Violet," he observed, aloud, "the name of the scoundrel who has defamed me in your hearing, and I will cram his lying words down his throat."

She shuddered and looked round, and then drawing close to him as if for protection, she said, in an under tone,

"No, no Cyril, you must not harm him. He is severe, stern, cold, but yet he has been ever gentle and kind to me. Him alone have I known from infancy. He has reared me, taught me all I know from books, borne with me patiently, and though he spoke in severe language respecting you, he did so, as he said, for my safety and my honor, and oh, Cyril, because he did not know you as I do, believe me."

"But who is this?" he asked, a little impatiently.

"Ishmael," she answered.

(To be continued.)

A NOVEL RACE BETWEEN A RAILROAD TRAIN AND A BALLOON.

Prof. Simmons, the aeronaut, who recently ascended from Baltimore, Md., found the evening passenger train of the Northern Central Railroad leaving the city at the same time he ascended; he kept vertically over the train for a distance of five or six miles, when, on rising to a greater altitude, and taking another course, he lost sight of the cars, and landing a short distance from Rider's Switch station, he had nearly completed the packing up of the balloon before the train (which he had outrun) arrived at the same station.

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

"So there's another corruption of Mount Vociferous," said Mrs. Partington, as she put down her specs. "The paper tells us about burning leather running down the mountain, but it don't tell how it got afire."

"Mick," said a bricklayer to his laborer, "if you meet Patrick, tell him to make haste, as we are waiting for him." "Shure an' I will," replied Mick; "but what will I tell him if I don't meet him?"

The following epitaph conveys a back-handed compliment (unconsciously, no doubt) to the unfortunate deceased lord and master. "Maria Brown, wife of Timothy Brown, aged eighty years. She lived with her husband fifty years, and died in the confident hope of a better life."

"Didn't you tell me, sir, you could hold the plough?" said a farmer to a green Irishman whom he had taken on trial.

"Arrah, be aisy now," said Pat. "How the deuce can I hold it and two horses drawing it away from me? But give it to me in the barn, and be jabers, I'll hould it with anybody!"

A good many years ago, a Massachusetts man was elected to the office of Lieutenant-Governor. When the fact of his election was announced he was called upon for a speech. He proceeded to acknowledge the honor in very handsome terms, and added that he had no doubt he should make a good Lieutenant-Governor, as that was the office he had always held in his own house.

The charitable festivals out West must be particularly attractive. The young ladies there have adopted the delicious custom of forming a line, and for a given price permitting the gentlemen to take a running kiss of the lot. Who wouldn't be benevolent under such circumstances? The only thing open to objection is the "running." One would like to linger over such a work of charity.

If there is any better advertisement extant than this, in the Cairo Gazette, let us hear of it:

"Lorst! A smort slurt purp, about the size and age of a young dorg, of black and tan complecksthun, and altirat proclivnes. Had on when sho left a pair of sassy bobbed ears, a long tail and a lame streak on the off fore leg. Five dollars reward will be paid for the recovery of this interesting animile, by Jon Absll."

The wife of a well-known literary gentleman, while reading one of his articles for the press, corrected it as she went along, and the errors were somewhat numerous.

"Why, husband," she exclaimed, "you don't know the first rules of grammar, or else you are very negligent."

"Well, well, my love," he exclaimed, looking up from his work, "what's the matter, now?"

"Why, in three cases you speak of our sex in the plural and write it in the singular number."

"I can't help it," was the retort; "woman is a singular being!"

"Stanly," said widower Brown to his hopeful of fifteen summers, "I want you to remain at home this evening"

"What for, pop? Where are you going?"

"That's a very impertinent question for a son to propound to his father, but I suppose I must answer it. I am going to pay my best respects to Miss Sally Patterson this evening."

"No you don't, pop. I am going to see her myself this evening, and 'taint no use of us both going to see the same gal at the same time!"

So saying, young Stanly took up his hat and walked off, leaving his father perfectly confounded.

Dr. Cadogan, of Charles II.'s time, secured as his wife a wealthy lady, over whose property he had unfettered control. Against the money, however, there were two important points figuring under the head of "set-off"—the bride was old and querulous. After spending a few months in alternate fits of jealous hate and jealous fondness, the poor creature conceived the terrible fancy that her husband was bent on destroying her with poison, and so ridding his life of her execrable temper. One day, when surrounded by her friends, and in the presence of her lord and master, she fell on her back in a state of hysterical spasms, exclaiming,

"Ah, he has killed me at last—I am poisoned!"

"Poisoned!" cried the lady friends, turning up the whites of their eyes. "O, gracious goodness! you have done it, doctor!"

"What do you accuse me of?" asked the doctor, with surprise.

"I accuse you—of—killing me—e—e," responded the wife, doing her best to imitate a death-struggle.

"Ladies," answered the doctor, with admirable nonchalance, bowing to Mrs. Cadogan's bosom associates, "it is perfectly false. You are quite welcome to open her at once, and then you'll discover the calumny."

Wanted to Know.—If a man "pursues a path," is the path supposed to run away from him? Of what thickness is a "line of conduct?" When a clock "runs down," does it ever capsize itself?

An Undesirable Office.—In the law regulating the sale of ardent spirits in Nebraska is the following punishment for violation: "The justice shall render judgment for the whole amount of fine and costs, and be committed to the common jail until all is paid."

An Agreement of Opinion.—An old Connecticut parson, whose peculiarities of preaching were proverbial, and who was blessed with a temper of great value, was one day told by a parishioner that he did not like his sermons. "Well," said the old man, "I don't wonder at it. I don't like 'em myself."

Elbow-Room Scarce.—Elbow-room has been quite scarce in Nashville during the past week. Such "scrouging" has seldom before been witnessed. Instance the following:

Traveller (dismounts at a tavern): "Halloo, landlord, can I get lodgings here to-night?"

Landlord: "No, sir; every room in the house is engaged."

Traveller: "Can't you even give me a blanket and a bunch of shavings for a pillow, in your bar-room?"

Landlord: "No, sir; there's not a square foot of space unoccupied anywhere in the house."

Traveller: "Then I'll thank you, sir, to shove a pole out of your second floor window, and I'll roost on that"

Mat and his Hurryback.—Old Mr. Simms had in his employ a man named Matthew—called Mat for short. When told to do anything, he always made some blunder, more or less egregious; and it was only his perfect willingness to do anything required of him that kept him in his situation. One morning Mr. Simms summoned him into his presence.

"Well, Mat," said he, "I want you to take the barrow and go down to the ironmonger's and get my new grindstone, and hurry back."

On arriving at the shop, Mat walked in, and addressed the shopman with,

"Mr. Simms sent me after his grindstone and hurryback, sur."

"There's the stone alongside of that plough. What else did you say he wanted?"

"His hurryback, sur."

"His hurryback?"

"Yes, sur."

"I'd like to know what sort of a thing that is—are you sure he said hurryback?"

"Av coorse I am. Sez he to me, 'Mat,' sez he, 'go you down to the ironmonger's, and ax him for my new grindstone and hurryback;' and sez I to meself, 'what the deuce do he mane?'"

A smile lit up the countenance of the shopman, he saw the man's mistake, and, being desirous of running the joke further, said,

"I'll see if I can see anything about it in the book."

He opened the one nearest to him, and ran his eyes over half a dozen pages.

"Ah, here it is!" said he; "tell Mr. Simms that it is not finished yet, but will be ready in two or three days."

"Well, Mat," said Simms, "I see you have got the stone; now tell me how many blunders you have made."

"Niver a wun, sur. I couldn't bring the h[illegible] me, sur, because wasn't done"

"I didn't tell you to bring any hurryback with you."

"Faith, but you did, sur!"

"I told you to hurry back—meaning to make haste back; and you've made a blunder as usual, and the shopman has made a fool of you."

An old lady from a temperance village lately attended a party in town, where champagne was served, and was prevailed upon to take a glass. She drank two, when, smacking her lips, she exclaimed:

"Well, it may be a wicked drink, but it's good!"

Miss Mary—"Now, Harry, if you are a doctor, you must prescribe for me. I've a very bad pain about my heart. What can I take?"

Dr. Harry (thinking this the best opportunity he has had): "I've no doubt as to what is the best remedy to take—you'd better take me!"

My friend, the foreigner, called on me to bid farewell before he quitted town, and on his departure, he said:

"I am going at the country."

I ventured to correct his phraseology, by saying that we were accustomed to say, "Going into the country." He thanked me for this correction, said he profited by my lesson, and added, "I will knock into your door on my return!"

"My dear husband," said a devoted wife, "why will you not leave off smoking? It is such an odious practice, and makes your breath smell so."

"Yes," replied the husband, "but only consider the time I have devoted, and the money I have spent, to learn to smoke. If I should leave off now, all that time and money would have been wasted, don't you see?"

What's in a Name?—De Honorable Spencer de Horsey," murmured Mrs. Needle's French groom of the chamber, as he entered the drawing-room, when she was engaged.

"Well, sir," quoth Mrs. N., "show him into the stables directly."

"Into the stable, mi ladi?" shrieked the groom.

"Yes, to be sure; where the deuce would you ask him?"

"Pardonnez moi, I think he should be introduced into the drawing room."

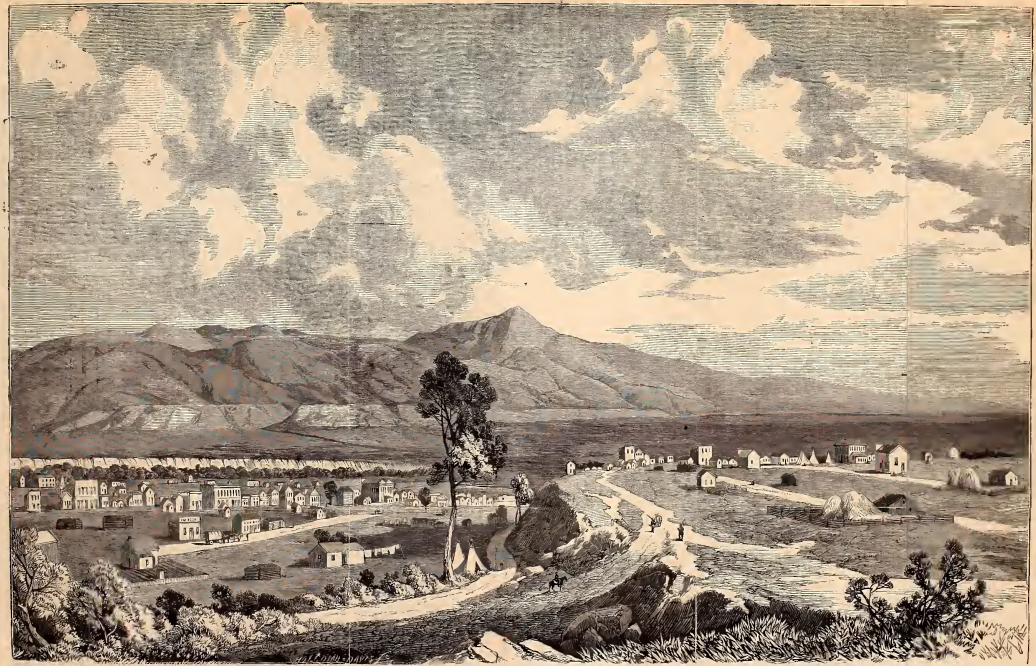
"Into the drawing-room!" cried Mrs. N. "Show a horse into a drawing room!"

"Morbleu! I did not say a horse."

"What did you say then?"

"I say, mi ladi, Monsieur de Honorable Spensaire de Horsey is below."

"Oh," rejoined Mrs. N., "show him up, the fellow's name had nearly got him into the stable."



THE KANSAS GOLD REGION—VIEW OF AURARIA AND DENVER CITY, CHERRY CREEK, NEAR LONG'S PEAK.—FROM A SKETCH MADE BY COL. H. HUTTT, EXPRESSLY FOR FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

STREET IN GREGORY'S GULCH, PIKE'S PEAK.—FROM A SKETCH MADE ON THE SPOT, EXPRESSLY FOR FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, BY COL. D. H. HUNTT.

THE GOLD REGIONS OF KANSAS

Pike's Peak and Long's Peak.

THAT part of the Rocky Mountains which is called Pike's Peak was discovered, or rather named by Lieutenant Z. M. Pike, who made an exploring expedition under the authority of the United States Government in 1807. According to his measurement, its altitude is ten thousand five hundred and eighty-one feet above the level of the prairie, or eighteen thousand feet above the level of the sea. It was then renowned among the savage tribes for its wonderful altitude, and regarded with almost a species of veneration by their untutored minds.

The gold regions, according to some accounts, extend about two hundred to three hundred miles north and south, and from fifty to one hundred east and west, and are situated to the south-west of Nebraska, the west of Kansas and the north of New Mexico. Lieutenant Pike states that in his wanderings, from the 14th November to 27th January, the Peak towered into the skies, the great object of vision, and was never out of sight except when they were in some deep valley. The summit of this remarkable mountain is bare of vegetation, and is constantly covered with snow. The snow line is above one thousand eight hundred feet above the three small mountain lakes described by Fremont. Standing upon this peak, you behold innumerable streams and lakes, and a vast stretch of prairie to the south-east, east and north-west, dotted here and there with immense herds of buffalo. Immediately, on either hand, the ridge is split into chasms and ravines, between which rise their lofty walls, terminating with slender minarets and columns, which impress one with the conviction that this chain of mountains was thrown up by some terrific convulsion of Nature. The summit rock is gneiss, succeeded by sienite, and feldspar continues to the snow line, where is found the feldspathic granite.

SKETCH OF GREGORY'S QUARTZ MILL, PIKE'S PEAK, MADE ON THE SPOT BY COL. D. H. HUNTT, EXPRESSLY FOR FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Mrs. Holmes, of Lawrence, Kansas, who was the first woman to ascend Pike's Peak, gives a very glowing description of the magnificent view from its summit. She says, "Think of the huge rocks projecting out in all imaginable shapes, with the beautiful evergreens, the pines, the firs, the spruces interspersed among them, and then the clear, cold mountain stream, which appears as though it started right out from under some great rock, and on it goes, rushing, rumbling and hissing down over the rough mountain side, now sparkling in the sunbeams, and hiding behind some huge rock. Extending, as far as the eye can reach, lie the great level plains, stretched out in all their verdure, while the winding of the Arkansas River is visible for many miles."

The reader will perceive that the mountain sides are covered with creeks or rills, which stream down, and at certain places rest and form small lakes. The washings of the eastern slopes are particularly rich. Along the banks of Cherry Creek, the Fontaine que Bouille, the South Platte, and smaller affluents in the vicinity of Pike's Peak, surface explorations have shown an abundance of precious metals. Farther along there are equally promising appearances in the Three Parks, and southward, among the huge formations that skirt the Rio Bravo del Norte.

Pine trees of immense size and in large tracts grow along the base of the mountains, and the spruce is scattered along the mountain side. Some of the streams are skirted by timber, and upon the plains are large groves of noble great pines that shoot up a hundred feet high, clear of limbs and straight as an arrow. The sides of the mountains are indurated with gullets, as they are termed, caused by the melting of the snows, and these are made serviceable by being converted, as it were, into natural washers.

The towns of Auraria and Denver, of which we give faithful and graphic pictures, are situated near the mouth of Cherry Creek, where the roads from Bent's Fort and Taos meet. They are remarkable proofs of the agency of gold in the creation of towns, and are doubtless destined to become great cities, even when the present gold excitement has passed away. The climate of these regions is so delightful and invigorating, that no more favorable spots can be found for health and longevity. Auraria and Denver cities are situated at the base of Long's Peak, a mountain summit of the Rocky Mountains. Pike's Peak is situated 38 25 north latitude, and 105 west longitude. Long's Peak is in 40.10 north latitude, and 106 west longitude.

Mr. Greeley in his amusing work thus describes Auraria and Denver cities, as they appeared to him in June, 1859:

"The rival cities of Denver and Auraria front on each other from either bank of Cherry Creek, just before it is lost in the South Platte. The Platte has its sources in and around the South Park of the Rocky Mountains, a hundred miles south-west of this point; but Cherry Creek is headed off from them by that river, and, winding in its northward course of forty or fifty miles over the plains, with its sources barely touching the mountains, is a capricious stream, running quite smartly when we came here, but whose broad and thirsty sands have since drank it all up at this point, leaving the log foot-bridges which connect the two cities as useless as an ice-house in November.

"Of these rival cities Auraria is by far the more venerable—some of its structures being, I think, fully a year old, if not more. Denver, on the other hand, can boast of no antiquity beyond September or October last. In the architecture of the two cities there is, notwithstanding, a striking similarity—cotton-wood logs, cut from the adjacent bottom of the Platte, roughly hewed on the upper and under sides and chinked with billets of split cotton-wood on the inner, and with mud on the outer side, forming the walls of nearly or quite every edifice which adorns either city. Across the centre of the interior, from shorter wall to wall, stretches a sturdy ridge pole, usually in a state of nature, from which "shooks" or split saplings of cotton-wood, their split sides down, incline gently to the transverse or longer sides; on these (in the more finished structures) a coating of earth is laid; and, with a chimney of mud-daubed sticks in one corner, a door nearly opposite and a hole beside it representing or prefiguring a window, the edifice is complete. Of course, many have no earth on their covering of shooks, and so are liable to gentle inundation in the rainy season; but, though we have had thunder and lightning almost daily, with a brisk gale in most instances, there has been no rain worth naming such here for weeks, and the unchinked, barely shook-covered houses, through whose sides and roofs you may see the stars as you lie awake nights, are decidedly the cooler and the airier. There is a new hotel nearly finished in Auraria, which has a second story (but no first story) floor; beside this, mine eyes have never yet been blessed with the sight of any floor whatever in either Denver or Auraria. The last time I slept or ate with a floor under me (our wagon-box and mother earth excepted) was at Junction City, nearly four weeks ago. The Denver House, which is the Astor House of the gold region, has walls of logs, a floor of earth, with windows and roof of rather flimsy cotton-sheeting; while every guest is allowed as good a bed as his blankets will make."

THE PUEBLA INDIANS—TAOS, NEW MEXICO.

In our last (page 37) we gave a graphic sketch of a village of the Puebla Indians. The habits and manners of this people are singularly interesting. They live always isolated in their villages, cultivate the soil, raise from stock, and are generally poor, frugal and sober. These various tribes, of which a large number still exist, are reduced probably to about seven thousand souls. They speak various dialects, and sometimes broken Spanish. For the government of their communities they select a Cacique and a council, and in war are led by a Capiton. In religious rites they mingle Catholicism and Paganism. Their villages are very regularly built, though sometimes there is but one large house of several stories, with a vast number of small rooms, in which all the inhabitants of the puebla are quartered. Instead of doors in front, traps are made on the roofs of their dwellings, to which they ascend by a ladder that is withdrawn during the night, so as to secure them from surprise or attack. Their dress consists of moccasins, short breeches and a woollen jacket or blanket. Their black hair is usually worn long; while bows and arrows, together with a lance, and sometimes a gun, compose their weapons.

The Puebla region lies in the torrid zone, occupying a portion of the table land, and stretching westwardly down the slopes of the Sierra Madre to the Pacific Ocean, between the parallels of 16.17 and 20.40 north latitude.

Too Ripe.—It is the custom for planters at the South to purchase clothing for their slaves by wholesale; and as of course they have not the opportunity to examine closely each article, they are swindled sometimes by a few bad ones being thrown in among the good. An acquaintance of ours tells us that on one occasion he had laid in a box of shoes, and distributed the most of them among the negroes. A few days afterwards, "Old Bob," a favorite servant, found that the shoes that had fallen to his lot were bursting out. So going to his master he said:

"Massa, where you buy dose shoes?"

"I bought them in New Orleans, Bob," responded our friend.

"Well, where did de New Orleans people buy 'em?"

"They bought them from the people up North—they bought them from the Yankees."

"Well, where do de Yankees get 'em?" persisted the negro.

"The Yankees, why they pick them off trees, Bob."

"W-w-well," responded the darkey, holding up his shoes. "I reck'n dat de Yankees didn't pick dose pair soon enough, massa; I reck'n dat dey waited till—till—till dey was a little too ripe!"

How I was made an M.D.—During two weeks last spring, I and another clerk of "our house" were engaged in getting orders for muslin goods in Boston. We put up at one of the best hotels, and succeeded in doing a large amount of business. On the third morning of our stay at the hotel, I was carelessly turning over the leaves of the book in which we had entered our names, and on glancing at my name found the letters M. D. attached to it. I instantly recognized the handwriting as being that of my fellow-worker, Andy B——.

"How's this?" said I, on meeting him; "I didn't know that I was a medical doctor!"

"Nobody said you were," answered he; "but you're a muslin dispenser, ain't you?"

A light broke over me, and I felt inclined to break something over him, but he made for the door and got away.

"Dora, what did you do with that tallow that Mr. Jones greased his boots with this morning?"

"Please, marm, I baked the griddle cakes with it."

"You did, eh? Confound you, I thought you had wasted it!"

Hotel Life—How the Guests are Fed.

THE METROPOLITAN HOTEL.

The Lelands—The Administrative Labors of a great Establishment.

Out of the many thousands who daily sit down to the bounteously-spread tables of our great hotels, how few know anything about the means by which the necessarily vast amount of comestibles is supplied with regularity and without waste or extravagance. It is a curious matter to pass an hour at the breakfast table of the Metropolitan, to watch the hundreds of guests as they lounge in, and ordering from the carte half a dozen different luxuries for their matutinal meal. One naturally wonders how the calculation can be made to satisfy these multitudinous appetites with any exactitude as to economy and plenty; but the question is speedily settled when inquiry brings to light the admirable division of labor which a system of perfect order has established as the rule of action in the Metropolitan Hotel, and which produces such excellent results.

The Lelands have been identified with the best hotel system in New York for twenty years past. They studied hotel management as an art, each of the several brothers taking up a separate branch which he mastered thoroughly in all its details as a student masters the formula of a science. Their earliest New York experience was in the old Clinton Hotel, which was a model for cleanliness, comfort, gentlemanly and genial politeness, and for substantial and excellent living.

When that magnificent structure, the Metropolitan Hotel, was designed, in proportions so vastly ahead of all existing hotels in the city, it was very natural that it should fall into the hands of these young, enterprising, responsible and thoroughly competent hands. To conduct the affairs of so vast a concern needed energy, dash and personal popularity, based upon public confidence of tried capacity and integrity. In the case of the Leland Brothers these conditions were all fulfilled, and they commenced their enterprise under auspices the most favorable. Their success is a matter of everyday history, for, during the eight years of their administration, they have sustained the reputation of their house, which took at once a first-class position, and through all the fluctuations of commerce and finance, and they have not been few, they have sustained their credit and retained the host of friends and patrons who throng the Metropolitan from year to year, and thus perpetuate its success.

The administration of a hotel comprises three distinct departments, namely, Finance, Household and Provision. Each is itself separate and independent, but all responsible to the one interest—the comfort of the guests, and in that the welfare of the house.

In most hotels there is one head, the proprietor; the other departments are necessarily confided to parties competent, but not personally or pecuniarily interested in the business beyond their salaries. In the Metropolitan, each department is controlled and supervised by the proprietors. Simeon Leland controls the Finance department, and his sagacity and ability, combined with great personal popularity, have enabled him to weather all the financial storms which have swept over our country; Charles Leland, the Household department, and how competent he is to fill the duties assigned to him, the splendid condition of the hotel sufficiently attests; and Warren Leland, of whose capacity this article discourses, the Provision department. Besides these gentlemen, there are four nephews, George and Jerome Leland, who are graduating (in the best school, too) through the various branches of hotel-keeping, and Lewis and Horace Leland, who are now perfect masters of the business, and are to be the future conductors of the great Lindell Hotel, now building at St. Louis, three hundred feet front by two hundred and fifty feet deep, fifteen years' lease of which they have obtained through the widely known reputation, influence and good will of their uncles, the Lelands, of New York.

But—"How the guests are fed" is the question propounded, and we will forthwith proceed to answer it.

The Metropolitan Hotel accommodates six hundred guests when it is only full—there are times when it is overflowing, and some hundreds more must be added to that number. Besides the guests, there are two hundred and fifty servants, and all these have to be fed amply every day.

The marketing is not supplied every day by order, but selection is made daily from the best of the necessaries of the table, and from the most recherché and tempting luxuries which each season produces and the markets afford. Warren Leland, the Commissary-General, is an early man, that is, he is early to bed and early to rise, but whether he is the father of a large family or not we are unable to say, but let us hope so. As the clock strikes four, whether the morning be cloudy or bright, he turns out from the luxurious spring bed (all the rooms have spring beds), and, accompanied by George Leland, takes his way down to Fulton Market, reflecting all the way along upon the labor before him. Arrived at the market, running the gauntlet of "Good mornings!" "How are yous?" from a hundred strange characters peculiar to the location, he seeks out his men of beef, the famous C. G. Cornell, who deals in lordly steers and giant rounds and sirloins, grained and bordered with rich yellow fat, which make the mouth water even at that early hour of the morning. Here selection is hardly necessary, the quantity is the only question, the quality being all of the very best. Amount bought of

C. G. Cornell.

584lb Beef Loins and Ribs—164lb Corn Beef.
10 Beef Kidneys—40 Ox Tails.

He then seeks the stall of A. & E. Robbins, the poulterer, where every kind of fowl and game is displayed in boundless profusion. Here, perhaps, a little ripe judgment is necessary, for an old turkey may wear a very young look, and a seemingly tender chicken may prove a very tough old rooster. Here Warren & Robbins also have to be judgmatical. Of the game the choice can only be of what is in season; it may be perhaps that some game which is not in season, but a very great luxury, may be found in the hotel basket when it arrives at the house, but that is an accident and cannot be accounted for either by the buyer or seller, the name of the bird not being in the account. Amount bought of

A. & E. Robbins.

144lb Capon—372lb Turkeys.
38lb Tame Ducks—24 pair Canvas Back Ducks.
24 pair Partridges—22 doz. Quail.
20 doz. Small Birds—107lb Venison.

The vegetables are found at Barker & Co.'s, and they are a pleasant sight to behold. All fresh from the ground within a few hours. Big headed cauliflowers, portly cabbages, crisp nutty celery, rosy cheeked tomatoes, luscious asparagus, melting peas, potatoes which burst their skins from flowery joy, and a hundred other nutritious and delicious products of mother earth. Amount bought of

Wm. Barker & Co.

5 bbl. Peach Blow Potatoes—4 bbl. Sweet Potatoes.
2 bbl. Russian Turnips—2 bbl. White Onions.
2 bbl. Carrots—26 Cabbages.
10 bunches Leeks—10 bunches Parsley.
6 doz. Lettuce—12 doz. Celery.

From thence to the fish dealers, D. Manwaring & Co., where the finny denizens of lake, river, brook and sea are displayed in all the varieties which the seasons afford. The great sea bass from the eastern shores, the speckled trout from the streams of Vermont and along the Erie railroad, the lake trout, the muscalonge and the ravenous pike from the great lakes, not to mention of other rare and delicious and seasonable fish, the choicest of which fulfil their glorious destiny on the luxurious tables of the Metropolitan. Amount bought of

D. Manwaring & Co.

30lb Salt Mackerel—60lb Salt Cod.
38lb Smoked Salmon—35lb Smelts.
34lb Bass, Striped—30lb Salmon Trout.
200 Crabs—60lb Lobsters—213lb Green Turtle.

Then comes the important item in the day's marketing, the smoked meats, of which the largest and finest assortment is to be found at Cape & Floyd's in Fulton Market, where Warren Leland deals exclusively. Amount bought of Cape & Floyd.

30 Hams—30 Beef Tongues.
10 pieces Smoked Bacon—6 pieces Dried Beef.
12 Smoked Pigs Jowls.

Having concluded his purchases here, the Commissary-General works his way over to Washington Market, exchanging pleasant greetings with the busy crowds, for every one knows the Commissary, and seeks out the celebrated stall of Starrett & Madden, who, upon the subject of mutton are hard to beat; indeed so pleasant is their reputation with connoisseurs, that the best quality of sheep offer themselves willing sacrifices for the cultivated palates of appreciative gourmands. In short their muttons are right proper muttons; whether they be South Downs, or Welsh, or what not, they are unequalled in the market, and the Commissary takes his choice of the lot, and his choice is always the best. Amount bought of Starrett & Madden.

205lb Racks of Mutton—8 Saddles Mutton.
39lb Breast of Mutton—20 doz. Sweetbreads—6 Calves' Livers.
8 Calves' Head and Feet—2 Quarters Veal.

We would take off our chapeau when we speak of the succulent, slippery, appetising bivalves, for we do love oysters, as the restaurant signs say, "in every style." And in connection with them we must speak respectfully of M. A. Williams, of Washington Market, who has intimate personal acquaintance with all the best bred oysters to be found in and about New York. We will not mention names, but a grateful memory will suggest Shrewsbury, Mill Pond, East River, Harlem Creek, Prince's Bay and linger upon a long list unmentioned, with unceasing affection and yearning desire. The Commissary considers the oysters supplied by M. A. Williams as beyond reproach, and that endorsement is all sufficient. Amount bought of

M. A. Williams.

3,000 Stewing Oysters—1,600 Frying.
400 Pickled—2,000 Soft Clams.

Having supplied the wants of the ever yawning larder, the Commissary-General and George return to the hotel, "to sleep, perchance to dream," but much more likely to eat a hearty and substantial breakfast off edibles which they know to be good, for they bought them.

Having given our readers an insight into the mysteries of the marketing, we will now conduct them to the basement of the Metropolitan Hotel, where the said marketing is received and prepared for the use of the guests. We will take the several departments in order, and in so doing we arrive at

The Receiving-Room.—Here all the marketing is received as it arrives, and Warren compares the quantities with the order-book, sees that weighed which should be weighed upon the best adjusted of Frank Howes's scales, and delivers the various articles to the heads of the culinary departments, to be disposed of as the law (of the chief cook) directs.

The Bakery.—We need hardly say that this department is chiefly devoted to baking. But it is not ordinary baking that is done here, for the bread and the rolls, especially the rolls, and more especially the Grahame rolls of the Metropolitan Hotel, are famous all over the country, and are counted as luxuries even among the many luxuries of its abundant table. The finest brands of flour are used, and of these over four barrels per day are consumed. It may be truly said that the fire never goes out in the remorseless ovens of the Metropolitan bakery.

The Meat-Room.—In this room are deposited the venison, game and smoked meats, also the fowls and birds stuffed and prepared for cooking that day, the larded meats, boned turkeys, and a hundred other delicacies of the most recherché description. A keen sportsman would rejoice over the hordes of game in this room, and sigh to think that he had not a hand in the killing—reconciling himself, however, with the thought he will eat some of it any how.

The Confectionery Room.—Here are made a thousand forms of pastry, from the small fruit tart to the most exquisitely modelled pyramids and costly set pieces. Ice cream, jelly, Charlotte Russe, not forgetting the celebrated and much-sought-for Metropolitan pudding—a dish the receipt of which is said to be an heir-loom in the Leland family for several generations, and known to none save the family and the confectioner, who is sworn to secrecy. It may be well believed that this is a busy department, where six hundred people, notoriously fond of sweet things, are to be supplied, and where everything is not only made but baked.

The Larder.—This room is built out under the sidewalk in Prince street. A series of bins occupy the entire length; these are filled to the depth of two feet with ice, and upon the ice is placed the stocks of soups, among these the costly and luxurious green turtle, the beloved of the London Alderman and the American epicure; the larded tenderloins, the more delicate birds and perishable food, together with countless steaks, tenderloins and others, and chops which are numbered by the hundreds. The gastronomic connoisseur would linger over this apartment with profound interest, and hold it in especial reverence.

The Kitchen.—To this the essence of all the previous departments is centred. It is the capital of the culinary kingdom, and here Charles Roux, familiarly Charley, the chief cook, reigns supreme. At his exclusive dresser are concocted those wonderful entrées, compotes, salmis, &c., which puzzle and delight connoisseurs of good living, and render it so difficult for one to know where to stop. Here he arranges his cartes, gives his orders to his aids, looks to his flavorings, and oversees the whole progress of the cooking. Charley is a graduate from the kitchen of the Royal Palace in Paris, and is himself an artist with grand original ideas. George is a very able assistant; he keeps his eyes wide open, and makes a point to understand what he sees. He is great upon facts, but has a pretty lively imagination upon a pinch. The kitchen, although replete with every modern convenience, boasts of a fine old fashioned roasting grate of the most monstrous proportions—large enough to roast thirty full grown turkeys at once. There are no baked meats here; all the joints are roasted, and we can hardly add any greater praise. The gridiron is about five feet square, and over the fierce shallow fire myriads of steaks, chops, cutlets, birds, &c., are cooked to a turn in less than no time. The chief charm of this vast subterranean region is its scrupulous and perfect cleanliness—one could, without straining, eat off the boards. Cleanliness is next to godliness—for the cleanliness we can vouch. This department is indeed well worth inspection.

The Store-Room.—This is a museum of all the curiosities of food; it is the magazine of the etceteras, which means, in plain English, every possible thing but meat, vegetables and bread. Truffles, paté de foies gras, &c., from France; figs and pastes from Turkey; grapes and dried fruits from Italy; pickles and rare sauces from England; the choicest teas from China; besides the countless productions of our own country; in short, contributions from all parts of the globe are to be found in mysterious boxes and innumerable drawers, which range from the floor to the ceiling around the room. The Commissary-General, Warren Leland, reigns here supreme, makes his calculations and audits his accounts. The general dispenser of the store-room is "Jimmy," who metes out and enters every item, from a drawing of tea or a pound of crackers up to a box of sardines or a barrel of apples. He is very proud of the whole of the lower region, and always knows when Mr. Warren is coming by his hat and overcoat arriving in advance. In this room are many baskets of eggs, one hundred and fifty dozen of the product of hens being consumed in the hotel per diem, for pastry, omelettes, cream, &c., &c.

We have gone thus minutely into the provision and culinary details of the Metropolitan Hotel, in order to answer fully the question, "How the guests of a great hotel are fed." In fitting ourselves to answer this question, we have seen more of the internal management of such establishments than we ever dreamed of before; we have seen a generous profusion in supplies combined with economy and order and scrupulous delicacy and cleanliness in the culinary department, which we before believed were conducted with but little regard to either the one or the other. If other great hotels are conducted on the principle laid down and carried out by the Landlords in the Metropolitan Hotel (and we hope they are), we shall take our meals therein with much more real enjoyment than heretofore, and our readers will, we are sure, be gratified at the information we have gathered, in order to show "How the guests of a great hotel are fed."

CHANTICLEER.

A Thanksgiving ry of the Peabody Family.

By Cornelius Mathews.

CHAPTER V.—THE CHILDR

There was no question wh re the children were to lodge, for ro had been allotted to them from time immemorial, even since children were known to the Peabody family, a gre t rambling upper chamber, with beds in the corners, where they were al ways bestowed as soon after dark as they could be conveyed thither under the direction of Mopsey and the mistress of the household. This was not always—in truth, it was rarely—easy of achievement, and cost the shuffling black servant at least half an hour of diligent search and struggling persuasion to bring them in from the various straylogs, escapes and lurking-places where they shirked to gain an extra half hour of freedom.

To the children, however, darker humors might work and sadden among the grown people (for whatever hue rose-favored writers may choose to throw over scenes and times of festivity, the passions of character are always busy, in holiday and hall, as well as in the strifes of the world), to the Peabody children this was thanksgiving time indeed—it was thanksgiving in the house, it was thanksgiving in the orchard cl m ng trees; it was thanksgiving in the barn, tumbling in the hay, in the lane. It was thanksgiving, too, with the jovial captain, a grown-up boy—leading their sports, and allowing the country, as he did, little rest or peace of mind wherever he led the revel: it was not four-and-twenty hours that he had been at the quiet homestead before the mill was set a-running, the chestnut-trees shaken, the pigeons fired into, a new bell of greater compass put upon the brindle cow, the blacksmith's anvil at the corner of the road set a-dinging, fresh weathercocks clapped upon the barn, corn crib, stable and outhouse, the sheep let out of the little barn, all the boats of the neighborhood launched upon the pond. With night, darkness closed upon wild frolic: bedtime came, and thanksgiving had a pause; a pause only, for Mopsey's dark head, with its broad-bordered white cap, was no sooner withdrawn and the door firmly shut than thanksgiving began afresh, as though there had been no such thing all day long, and they were now just setting out. For half a minute after Mopsey's disappearance they were all nicely tucked in as she had left them—straight out—with their heads each square on its pillow; then as if by a silent understanding, all heads popped up like so many frisking fish. They darted from bed, and commenced, in the middle of the chamber, a great pillow-fight, amicable and hurtless, but furiously waged, till the approach of a broad footstep sent them scampering back to their couches, mum as mice. Mopsey, well aware of these frisks, tarried till they were blown over, in her own chamber hard by—a dark room, mysterious to the fancy of the children, with spinning-wheels, dried gourd-shells hung against the wall, a lady's riding-saddle, now out of use this many a day, and all the odds and ends of an ancient farm house stored in heaps and strings about.

It was only at last by going aloft and moving a rap in the ceiling, which was connected in tradition with the appearance of a ghost, that they were at length fairly sobered down and kept in bed, when Mopsey, looking in for the last time, knew that it was safe to go below. They had something left even then, and kept up a talk from bed to bed for a good long hour more at least.

"What do you think of the turkey, Bill?" began Master Robert Peabody, the flat featured, rising from his pillow like a homely porpoise.

"I don't know," Peabody Junior answered; "I don't care for turkeys."

Little Sam Peabody, the master of the turkey, took this very much to heart.

"I think he's a very fine one," continued Master Robert, "twice as big as last year's."

"I'm very glad to hear you say that, cousin Robert," said little Sam Peabody, turning over towards the quarter whence the voice of encouragement came.

"As fine a turkey as I've ever seen," Robert went on. "When do they kill him?"

Little Sam struggled a little with himself, and answered feebly, "To-morrow."

There was silence for several minutes, broken presently by Peabody Junior, fixing his pillow, and saying, "Boys, I'm going to sleep."

Allowing some few minutes for this to take effect, Master Robert called across the chamber to little Sam, "I wonder why Aunt Hannah wears that old green shade on her face?"

"Pray don't say anything about that," little Sam answered, "Cousin don't like to hear about that."

Master Robert—rather a blunt young gentleman—is not to be baffled so easily.

"I say, Bill, why does your mother wear that green patch over her eye?" he called out.

There was no answer. He called again in a louder key.

"Hush!" whispered Peabody Junior, who was not asleep, but only thinking of it, in a tone of fear, "I don't know."

"Is the eye gone?" Robert asked again, bent on satisfaction of some kind.

"I don't know," was the whispered answer again. "Don't ask me anything about it."

"I'm afraid Aunt Hannah's not happy," suggested little Sam, timidly.

"Pr'aps she isn't, Sam," Peabody Junior answered.

"What is the reason?" continued little Sam: "I always liked her."

"Don't know," was all Peabody Junior had to reply.

"Did you ever see that other eye, Bill?" asked the blunt young gentleman, whose head was still running on the green shade.

"Oh, go to sleep, will you, Nosey!" cried Peabody Junior. "If you don't leave me alone, I'll get up and wallop you."

The flat featured disappeared with his porpoise face under the bedclothes, and breathed hard, but kept close; and when he fell asleep he dreamed of dragons and green umbrellas all night, at a fearful rate.

"I wouldn't be angry, cousin," said little Sam, when the porpoise gave token that he was hard-bound in slumber. "He don't mean to hurt your feelings, I don't believe."

"P'r'aps he don't," Peabody Junior rejoined. "What could I tell him, if I wanted to? All I know is, mother has worn the shade ever since I can recollect anything. I think, sometimes, I can remember she used to have it on so far back as when I was at the breast, a very little child, and that I used to try and snatch it away, which always made her very sad."

"Don't she ever take it away?" asked little Sam.

"I never saw it off in all my life; nor can I tell you whether my dear mother has one eye or two. I know she never likes to have any one look at it. It makes her melancholy at once. Nurse used to tell me there was a mystery about it—but she would never tell me any more. It always scares father when she turns that side of her face on him, that I've noticed; and he always at home sits on the other side of the table from it."

"I wouldn't think any more about it to-night, cousin," said little Sam. "I know it makes you unhappy from your voice. Don't you miss some one to-night that used to keep us awake with telling pleasant stories?"

"I do," answered Peabody Junior. "I'm thinking of him now. I wish cousin Elbridge was back again."

"You know why he isn't?"

"Father says it's because he's a bad young man."

"And do you believe it, William?"

"I'm afraid he is—for father always says so."

A gentle figure had quietly opened the chamber door, and stood listening with breathless attention to the discourse of the two children.

"You wait and see," continued little Sam, firmly: "I'm sure he'll come back—and before long."

"What makes you think so?" William asked. "I'm sure I hope he will."

"Because the red rooster," answered little Sam, "crowed yesterday morning for the first time since he went away, and the red rooster knows more than anybody about this farm, except old grandfather."

Thinking how that could be, Peabody Junior fell asleep; and little Sam, sure to dream of his absent brother, shortly followed after. The gentle figure of Miriam Haven glided into the chamber, to the bedside of little Sam, and watching his calm, innocent features—which were held to greatly resemble those of the absent Elbridge—with tears in her eyes, she breathed a blessing from her very heart on the dear child who had faith in the absent one. "A blessing," such was her humble wish as she returned to her chamber and laid her fair head on the pillow, "a blessing on such as believe in us when we are in trouble and poverty, out of favor with the world, when our good name is doubted, and when the current, running sharply against, might overwhelm us, were not one or two kind hands put forth to save us from utter ruin and abandonment!"

CHAPTER VI.—THE FASHIONABLE LADY AND HER SON.

All the next day, being the Wednesday before thanksgiving, was alive and busy with the various preparations for the great festival, now held to be a sacred holiday throughout this wide-spread Union. The lark had no sooner called morning in the meadow, than Mopsey, who seemed to regard herself as having the entire weight of the occasion on her single shoulders, slipped from bed, hurried to the garden, and taking a last look at the great pumpkin as it lay in all its golden glory, severed the vine at a stroke, and trundled it with her own arms—she saw, with a smile of pity, the poor brown mouse skulking off, like a little pirate as he was, disappointed of his prize—in at the back door. The Peabodys were gathering for breakfast, and, coming forward, stood at either side of the one range, regarding the pumpkin with profound interest. It fairly shook the house as it rolled in upon the floor.

When little Sam, who had lingered in bed beyond the others with pleasant dreams, came down stairs, he was met by young William Peabody.

"What do you think, Sam?" said Peabody, junior, smiling.

"I suppose Aunt Carrack has come," Sam answered; "it's nothing to me if she has."

"No, that isn't it—turkey's dead."

Little Sam dropped a tear, and went away by himself to walk in the garden. Little Sam took no breakfast that morning.

Every window in the house was thrown wide open to begin with, every chair walked out of its place; the new broom, which Miriam had gathered with a song, was used, for the first time, freely on every floor, in every nook and corner; then the new broom was carried away and locked in a closet, like a conjurer who had wrought his spell and need not appear again till some other magic was to be performed. All the chairs were set soberly and steadily against the wall, the windows were closed, and a sacred shade thrown over the house against the approaching festival. The key was turned in the lock of the old parlor, which was to have no company (save the tall old clock talking, all alone, in the corner to himself) till to-morrow.

And so the day sailed on, like a dainty boat with silent oar on a calm-flowing stream, to evening, when, as though it had been a newborn meteor or great will-o'-the-wisp, there appeared on the edge of the twilight, along the distant horizon, a silvery glitter, which, drawing nearer and nearer, presently disclosed a servant in a shining band, mounted on a coach, with horses in burnished harness. With champing speed, which it seemed must have borne it far beyond, it came to in a moment at the very gate of the homestead as at the striking of a clock. A gentleman in bearded lip, in high polish of hat, chains and boots emerged (the door being opened by a stripling also in a banded hat, who leaped from behind), followed by a lady in a gown of glossy silk and a yellow feather waving, in the partial darkness, from her hat. Such wonder and astonishment as seized on the Peabodys, who looked on it from the balcony, no man can describe.

Angels have descended before now and walked upon the earth, giants have been at some time or other seen strutting about, ghosts appear occasionally in the neighborhood of old farm-houses, but neither ghost, giant nor angel had such a welcome of uplifted hands and staring eyes as encountered Mrs. Carrack and her son Tiffany when they, in the body, entered in at the gate of the old Peabody mansion. There was but one person in the company, old Sylvester, perhaps, excepted, who seemed to have his wits about him, and that was the red rooster, who, sitting on the wall near the gate when Mr. Tiffany Carrack pushed it open, cocked his eye smartly on him, and darted sharply at his white band, with its glittering jewel, as he laid it on the gate.

"Nancy," said old Sylvester, addressing her with extended grasp, and a pleasant smile of welcome on his brow, "we had given up looking for you."

Was there ever such a rash man! "Nancy!" as though she had been a common person he was speaking to!

Mrs. Carrack, who was a short woman, stiff and stern, tossing her feather, gave the tips of her fingers to the patriarch, and, ordering in a huge leathern trunk all over brass nails and capital C's, condescended to enter the house. In spite of all resolutions and persuasions to the contrary, the door of the best parlor unlocked before her grandeur of demeanor, and she took possession as though she had not the slightest connection with the other members of the Peabody family, nor the remotest interest in the common sitting-room without. Mr. Tiffany Carrack, with patent shanks to his boots, which sprang him into the air as he walked, corsets to brace his body, new-fangled straps to keep him down, a patent collar of peculiar invention to hold his head aloft, moving, as it were, under the convoy of invisible influences, deriving all his motions from the shoemaker, staymaker, tailor and linen-draper, who originally wound him up and set him a-going, for whose sole convenience he lives, having withal, by way of point to his sappy countenance, a couple of little cockle-shell tufts, tawny-yellow—that being the latest to be had at the perfumer's—on his upper lip; the representative and embodiment of all the latest new improvements, patents and contrivances in apparel, Mr. Tiffany Carrack, followed his excellent mother.

"Why, Tiffany," said old Sylvester, who, notwithstanding the immensity of these people, calmly pursued his old course, "we all thought you were in California."

The family were gathered around and awaited Mr. Tiffany Carrack's answer with a good deal of curiosity.

"That was all a delusion, sir," he replied, plucking at his little crop of yellow tufts—"a horrible delusion. I had some thought of that kind in my mind, in fact I had got as far South as New Orleans, when I met a seedy fellow, who told me the natives had rebelled, and wouldn't work any more; so I found, if I would get any of the precious, I must dig with a shovel with my own dear digits. Of course I turned back in disgust, and here I am as good as new. Jehosaphat!"

It was well that Mr. Tiffany had a fashion of emphasizing his discourse with a reference to this ancient person, whom he supposed to have been an exquisite of the first water, which happily furnished a cover under which the entire Peabody family exploded with laughter at Mr. Carrack's announcement of the sudden termination of his grand expedition to the Gold Region. Without one exception they all went off in an enormous burst, the captain, little Sam and Mopsey leading.

"Every word true, 'pon my honor," repeated Mr. Carrack.

The great burst was renewed.

"It was a capital idea, wasn't it?" supposing he had made a great hit.

The explosion for the third time, but softened a little by pity in the female section of the chorus.

Mrs. Carrack had sat stately and aloof, with an inkling in her brain that all this mirthful tumult was not entirely in the nature of a complimentary tribute to her son.

"I think," she said, with haughty severity of aspect, "my son was perfectly right. It was a sinful and wicked adventure at the best, as the Rev. Strawberry Hyson clearly showed from the fourth Revelations, in his last annual discourse to the young ladies of the church."

"He did, so he did," said Mr. Tiffany, stroking his chin; "I remember perfectly. It was very prettily stated by Hyson."

"The Reverend Strawberry Hyson," said Mrs. Carrack. "Always give that excellent man his full title. What would you say, my son, if he should appear in the streets without his black coat and white cravat? Would you have any confidence in his preaching after that?"

"Next to myself," answered Mr. Tiffany, "I think our parson's the best dressed man in Boston."

"He should be, as an example," said Mrs. Carrack. "He has a very genteel congregation."

Old Sylvester, who had on at that moment an old brown coat and a frayed black ribbon for a neckcloth, ordered Mopsey to send the two best pies in the house to the negroes in the hills. Mrs. Carrack smiled loftily, and drew from her pocket an elegant small silver vial of the pure otto of roses, and applied it to her nostrils, as though some thing disagreeable had just struck upon the air and tainted it.

"By the way," said Mr. Tiffany Carrack, adjusting his shirt-collar, "how is my little friend, Miriam?"

"Melancholy!" was the only answer any one had to make.

"So I thought," pursued Mr. Carrack, rolling his eyes and heaving an infant sigh from his bosom. "Poor thing, no wonder, if she thought I was gone away so far. She shall be comforted."

Mopsey looking in at this moment, gave the summons to tea, which was answered by Mr. Tiffany Carrack's offering his arm impressively to his excellent mother, and leading the way to the table.

It was observed that in his progress to the tea-table, Mr. Tiffany adopted a tottering and uncertain step indicating a dilapidated old age, only kept together by the clothes he wore, which was altogether unintelligible to the Peabody family, seeing that Mr. Carrack was in the very prime of youth, till Mrs. Carrack remarked, with an affectionate smile of motherly pride,

"You remind me more and more every day, Tiff, of that dear delightful old Baden-Baden."

"I wish the glorious old fellow would come over to me for a short lark," rejoined Mr. Tiffany. "But he couldn't live here long—there's nothing old here."

"Who's Baden-Baden?" asked Sylvester.

"Only a prince of my acquaintance on the other side of the water, and a devilish clever fellow. But he couldn't stand it here, I'm afraid—everything's so new."

"I'm rather old," suggested Sylvester, smiling on the young man.

"So you are, by Jove. But that ain't the thing I want exactly; I want an old castle or two, and a donjon keep, and that sort of thing. You understand?"

"Something," suggested the grandfather, "in the style of the old revolutionary fort on Fort Hill?"

"No—no—you don't take exactly. I mean something more in the antique—something or other, you see—" here he began twirling his forefinger in the air and sketching an amorphous phantom of some sort of an altogether unutterable character—"in a word—Jehosaphat!"

The moment the eye of Mrs. Carrack fell upon the blue and white crockery, the pewter plates which had been in use time out of mind in the family, and the plain knives and forks of steel, she cast on her son a significant glance of mingled surprise and contempt.

"Thomas," she said, standing before the place assigned to her, her son doing the same, "the napkins!"

The napkins were brought from a great basket which had accompanied the leathern trunk.

"The other things!"

The other things, consisting of china plates, cups and saucers, and knives and forks of silver for two, were duly laid. Mrs. Carrack and her son, having kept the rest of the family waiting the saying of grace by old Sylvester, were good enough to be seated at the old farmer's (Mrs. Carrack's father's) board.

When old Sylvester unclosed his eyes from the delivery of thanks, he discovered at the back of Mrs. Carrack and her son's chairs, the two city servants in livery, with their short-cut hats and embroidered coats of the fashion of those worn in English farces on the stage, standing erect and without the motion of a muscle. There is not a doubt but that old Sylvester Peabody was a good deal astonished, although he gave no utterance to his feeling. But when the two young men in livery began to dive in here and there about the table, snapping up the dishes in exclusive service on Mrs. Carrack and Mr. Tiffany Carrack, he could remain silent no longer.

"Boys," he said, addressing himself to the fine personages in question, "you will oblige me by going into the yard, and chopping wood till we have done supper. We shall need all you can split in an hour to bake the pies with."

Thunderstruck, as though a bolt had smitten them individually in the head, this direction, delivered in a quiet voice of command not to be resisted, sent the two servants forth at the backdoor. They were no sooner out of view than they addressed each other almost at the same moment,

"My eyes! did you ever hear such a queer old fellow as that?"

When Mrs. Carrack and her son turned and found that the two young men in livery had actually vanished, the lady smiled a delicate smile of scorn; and Mr. Tiffany, regarding his aged grandfather steadily, merely remarked, in a tone of most friendly and familiar condescension,

"Baden-Baden wouldn't have done such a thing!"

The overpowering grandeur of the fashionable lady chilled the household, and there was little conversation till she addressed the widow Margaret.

"Hadn't you a grown-up son, Mrs. Peabody?"

The widow was silent. Presently Mr. Carrack renewed the discourse.

"By-the-bye," he said, "I thought I saw that son of yours—wasn't his name Elbridge, or something of that sort?—in New Orleans."

"Did you speak to him?" asked the captain, flushing a little in the face.

"I observed he was a good deal out at elbows," Mr. Carrack answered; "and it was broad daylight, in one of the fashionable streets."

"Is that all you have to tell us of your cousin?" old Sylvester inquired.

"He is my cousin—much obliged for the information. I had almost forgotten that! Why, yes—es, I couldn't help seeing that he went into a miserable broken-down house in a by-street; but had to get my moustache oiled for a Creole ball that evening, and couldn't be reasonably expected to follow him could I? Jehosaphat!"

If the human countenance, by reason of its clouding up in gusts of pitchy blackness, acquired the power, like darkening skies, of discharging thunderbolts, it would have been, I am sure, a hot and heavy one which Mopsey, blackening and blazing, had delivered, as she departed to the kitchen, lowering upon Mr. Tiffany Carrack.

"He thought he saw her son Elbridge! The vagabone has no more feeling nor de bottom of a stone jug."

The meal over, the evening wore on in friendly chat of old Thanksgiving times—of neighbors and early family histories, each one in turn launching, so to speak, a little boat upon the current, freighted deep with many precious stores of old time remembrance, Mrs. Carrack sitting alone, as an iceberg in the very midst of the waters, melting not once, nor contributing a drop or trickle to the friendly flow. And when bedtime came again, how clearly was it shown that there is nothing certain in this changeful world. By some sudden and unforeseen interruption, nations lose power, communities are shattered, households well constructed fall in pieces at a breath.

Her sudden appearance in their midst compelled another consultation to be taken as to the disposal of the great Mrs. Carrack for the night. It would never answer to put that grand person in any secondary lodging, so all the old arrangements were of necessity broken up; the best bedroom allotted to her, and, that her gentle nerves might not be afflicted, the old clock, which adjoined her sleeping-chamber, and which had occupied his corner and told the time for the Peabodys for better than a hundred years from the same spot, was instantly silenced as impertinent. The captain's high-mettled white horse, which had enjoyed the privilege of roaming unrestricted about the house, was led away, like an unhappy convict, and stabled in the barn; and, to complete the arrangements, the two servants in livery were put on guard near her window to drive off the geese, turkeys and other talkative birds of the night, that she might sleep without the slightest disturbance from that noisy old creature, Nature.

Mr. Tiffany Carrack, while these delicate preparations were in progress, was evidently agitated with some extraordinary design, in which Miriam was bearing a part; for, although he did not address a word to that maiden, he was as busy as his imitation of antiquity of Baden-Baden would allow in ogling, grimacing and plucking his tawny beard at her every minute, in the most astonishing manner, closely watched by Mopsey, the captain and old Sylvester, who strongly suspected the young man of being afflicted in his wits.

It was very clear that it was this same Mr. Tiffany Carrack who had entered in at the door of the sleeping-chamber assigned to that gentleman, but who would have ventured to assert that the figure which, somewhere about the middle of the night, emerged from the window of the chamber in question, in yellow slippers, red silk cloak trimmed with gold, fez cap and white muslin turban, and, with folded arms, began pacing up and down beneath the casement of Miriam Haven, after the manner of singers at the opera preparatory to beginning, was the same Tiffany! And yet, when he returned again, and holding his face up to the moon, which was shining at a convenient angle over the edge of the house, the tawny tuft clearly identified it as Tiffany, and no one else. And yet, as if to further confuse all recognition, what sound is that which breaks from his throat, articulating,

"Dearest, awake! you need not fear,
For he—for he—your Troubadour is here?"

The summons passed for some time unanswered, till Mopsey, from the little end window of her lodgment, presented her head in a flaming red and yellow handkerchief, and rolled her eyes about to discover the source of tumult, showing in the belief that it must be no other than "one of dem Brundages come to carry off in de dead ob night de Peabody punkin!"

A gentle conviction was dawning in the brain of Mr. Carrack that this was the fair Miriam happily responding to his challenge in the appropriate character and costume of a Moorish princess, when, as he began to roar again, still more violent and furious in his chanting, the black head opened and demanded, "What you want care?" followed by an extraordinary shower of gourd shells, which, crashing upon his sconce, with a distinct shatter for each shell, could not for a moment be mistaken for flowers, signet-rings or other ordinarily love-tokens.

It immediately occurred to Mr. Carrack, with the suddenness of inspiration, that he had better return to his chamber and go to bed, a design which was checked as he proceeded in that direction by the alarming apparition of a great body with a firelock thrust out of the window of the apartment next to his own, occupied by the captain, presented directly at his head, with a cry, "Avast there!" and a movement on the part of the body to follow the gun out at the window. Fearfully harassed in that quarter, Mr. Carrack wheeled rapidly about, encountering, as he turned, the two servants in livery, still making the circuit of the homestead, who, in alarm for their lives at this singular figure in the red cloak, fled into the fields and lurked in an outhouse till daylight. As these scampered away before him, Mr. Tiffany, to relieve himself of the apparition of the gun, would have turned the corner of the house, when Mopsey appeared, wildly gesticulating, with a great brush-broom reared aloft, and threatening instant ruin to his person.

From this double peril what but the happiest genius could have suggested to Mr. Tiffany an instant and straightforward flight from the house, in which he immediately engaged, making up the road—the captain with his musket, and Mopsey with her hearth broom, close at his heels. If Mr. Tiffany Carrack had promptly employed his undoubted resources of youth and activity, his escape from the necessity of disclosure or surrender had been perhaps easy; but it so happened that his progress was a good deal baffled by the conflict constantly kept up in his brain, between the desire to use his legs in the natural manner, and to preserve that antique pace of tottering gentility which he had acquired from that devilish fine old fellow, the Prince of Baden-Baden, so that at one moment he was in the very hands of the enemy, and at the next flying like an antelope in the distance. The gun, constantly following him with a loud threat from the captain, seemed in the moonlight like a great finger perpetually pointing at his head; till at last it became altogether too dreadful to bear, and making up the road towards Brundage's, which still further inflamed the pursuit, in sheer exhaustion he rushed through an open gate into a neighboring tan-yard, and took refuge in the old bark-mill. There was but a moment's rest allowed him even here, for Mopsey and the captain, furiously threatening all sorts of death and destruction, presently rushed in at the door, and sent him scampering about the ring like a distracted colt in his first day's service; a game of short duration, for the captain and Mopsey, closing in upon him from opposite directions, compelled him to retreat again into the open air. How much longer the chase might have continued it were hard to tell, for as his pursuers made after him Mr. Tiffany Carrack suddenly disappeared, like a melted snow flake, from the surface of the earth. In his confusion and haste he had tumbled into a vat, fortunately without the observation of the inexorable enemy, although as he clung to the side the captain discharged his musket directly over his head.

"I guess that's done his business," said the captain. "We'll come and look for the body in the morning."

Now it is strongly suspected that both Mopsey and the captain knew well enough all along that this was Mr. Tiffany Carrack they had been pursuing, and that as they watched him from the distance emerge from the vat, return to the homestead, and skulk, dripping in, like a rat of outlandish breed, at his chamber-window, they were amply avenged: the captain for the freedom with which the city exquisite had treated the Peabody family, especially the good old grandfather; and Mopsey for the slighting manner in which he had referred to the absent young Massa Elbridge.

When all was peace again within the homestead, there was one who still watched the night, and ignorant of the nature of this strange tumult, trembled as at the approach of a long-wished for happiness. It was Miriam, the orphan dependent, who now sat by the midnight casement. Oh, who of living men can tell how that young heart yearned at the thought—the hope—the thrilling momentary belief—that this was her absent lover happily returning?

In the wide darkness of the lonesome night, which was it shone brightest and with purest lustre, in view of the all-seeing Mover of the Heavens—the stars glittering far away in space, in all their lofty glory, or the timid eyes of that simple maiden, wet with the dew of youth, and bright with the pure hope of honest love? When all was still again, and no Elbridge's voice was heard, no form of absent Elbridge there to cheer her, oh, who can tell how near to breaking, in its silent agony, was that young heart, and with what tremblings of solicitude and fear the patient Miriam waited for the friendly light to open the golden gate of dawn upon another morrow!

(To be continued.)

A Too Communicative Child.—"Sonny, do you love me any?"

"Oh, don't I."

"What for?"

"Because you always bring me candy when you come to see Sissy Jane. Give me some more."

"And what does Sissy Jane love me for?"

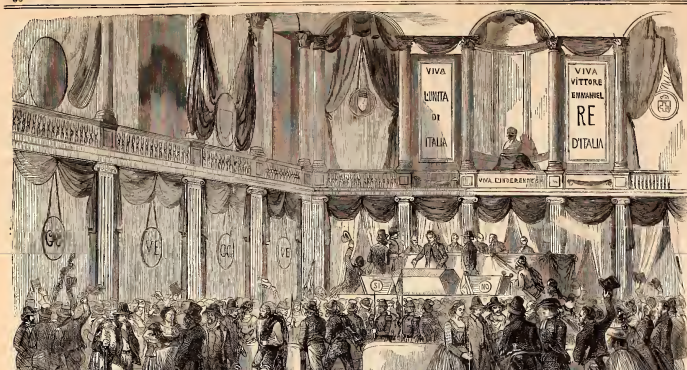
"Oh, 'cause you take her to concerts and give her so many things. She says, so long as you are fool enough to bring her shawls and bonnets, she won't sack you nohow. Now gi' me some more candy."

At Boulogne, during the reception of her Majesty, a number of English ladies, in their anxiety to see everything, pressed with so much force against the soldiers who were keeping the line, that the latter were in some instances obliged to give way, and generally were—to use the expression of our policeman—"impeded in the execution of their duty." The officer in command, noticing the state of affairs, shouted out:

"One roll of the drum, then if they don't keep back, kiss them all."

At the first sound from the parchment the English ladies took to flight.

"If they had been French," says a Parisian journalist, "they would have remained to a woman."



TAKING THE VOTE ON ANNEXATION IN THE UNIVERSITY HALL, AT NAPLES.

THE NEAPOLITAN VOTE FOR ANNEXATION.

NAPLES has voted on annexation to the rest of Italy, and an almost unanimous vote declared in favor of it. It is very evident, however, from the manner of voting adopted, that the Neapolitan leaders have much to learn in the art of ballot-boxing.

Five delegates were seated on an elevated platform as Inspectors. A little below was a table on which was placed a box somewhat resembling a coffin, white right and left were two urns marked si and no ("yes" and "no"). To vote, one took his ticket from either of these and placed it in the coffin in the middle. It will be thus seen that no little courage was required to vote the negative and unpopular ticket.

At Monte Calvario, an officer of the royal army wishing to vote, drew a revolver as he took his "no" from the urn, so menacing was the appearance of many around. It will be seen that, at the very beginning, Naples has learned to rival some of our New York wards. It is needless to say that the voting was in fact a mere ceremony and a foregone conclusion, which rendered the forcing system adopted to lessen the number of aces quite improper.

The result of the election was—with the exception of two provinces not as yet heard from—in the kingdom of Naples, one million one hundred and two thousand four hundred and ninety-nine for annexation, and nine thousand three hundred and seventy-one against it.

THE OHIO HEBREW STONE.

SOME time ago there interested in antiquarian zeal were amazed or amused, as the case may have been, by the alleged discovery in Ohio of a stone shaped very much like an old-fashioned square gin bottle, on each side of which was a Hebrew inscription, three of which, translated, signify Holy of Holies, The Word of the Law, and The Word of the Lord. The stone was discovered by a man named Wyrick, while digging in the vicinity of Indian mounds in Newark, Ohio.

The absurdity of claiming any great degree of antiquity for the stone in question was promptly shown by more than one antiquarian. The material of the relic is soapstone, or lime-stone, and its shape renders it extremely probable that it was made from a common bone. If it had lain only a century in the ground it would have been dissolved or otherwise affected, whereas it is perfectly fresh and unchanged, as if fresh from the manufacturer's hands. Again, the characters are modern Hebrew or old Chaldaic, and are evidently copied from some printed Hebrew Bible.

Finally, we may observe that while tens of thousands of objects have been found which identify the old dwellers in America with the ancient worshippers of the Serpent and the Sun, of High Places and of the Generative Principle, there has never been a single trifle found which had in any way the slightest possible affinity with the Hebrew race or Hebrew devotion.

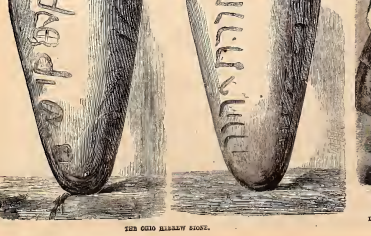
The old American religion was probably identical, in most respects, with that of the Druids, the Phœnicians—in short, with all the primitive races who adored the forces of Nature under the forms of Baal—of the Serpent and Fire, of the Sun and New Moon, of Adonis in Spring, and of similar types. But all this supposes antagonism to the Hebrew and his monotheism, and his every point of social and religious development. Some years ago a "prophet" in the West exhibited a sword which he declared an angel had brought him from paradise. Unfortunately, a close examination discovered on the blade Uncle Sam's stamp, with the locality, we believe, of "Springfield, Massachusetts." The inventor of an orthodox Hebrew inscription being discovered among Western remains is quite as absurd as that of the celestial sword being made down East. Whoever manufactured the article had evidently never read the works of Squier or of Foltor.

LIVING CURIOSITIES AT BARNUM'S.

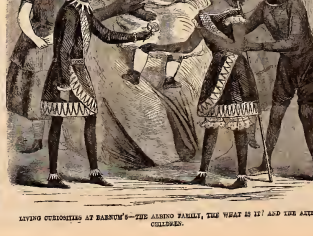
THERE is one lively place around town at least, and that is Barnum's. Sons of our citizens expect grass to grow on Broadway, but none will grow there in front of the Museum while Barnum is captain. He bought back the establishment last spring, and soon the old crowds began to throng its halls to see the novelties and oddities which this ever scheming showman is constantly getting up. Barnum's long vacation seems to have freshened his faculties, for there has not been for years such a deluge of attractions as the Museum now holds, and yet the noted showman is seeking more. We presume he will not be content until he has a few sperm whales swimming in his aquaria, the great sea serpent wriggling at the bottom of a tank, or one half the falls of Niagara boxed up and shown in the Museum.

We have selected a group of the living curiosities of the Museum, which have excited equally the wonder of the learned and the unlearned. They are freaks of nature, and also originals as far as we can guess. In the foreground are the Aztec children. They are odd creatures, and come to this country in an odd way. A pamphlet describing them says: "They were picked up in the city of Izcuzar, Central America, where they were kept for idol worship, and ways, Central America, where they were kept for idol worship, and where they constitute a sacred race of beings. It is likely they have been serving idols, for they are dumb as idols in the matter of

(Continued on page 63.)



THE OHIO HEBREW STONE.



LIVING CURIOSITIES AT BARNUM'S.—THE AZTEC FAMILY, THE WHAT IS IT? AND THE AZTEC CHILDREN.

OF FOOD FOR THE GUESTS OF THAT ESTABLISHMENT, FROM THE MARKET TO THE DINING-ROOM.—See Page 58.

LIVING CURIOSITIES AT BARNUM'S.

(Continued from page 60.)

speech, though every other may be ably intelligent and amusing. They understand all that is said to them, and are remarkably good-natured and playful, but not a word of any one can they give of themselves, or where they came from. Their breasts are small and narrowly shaped, and bear a striking resemblance to the old priestly shroud-piece which are found on the necks of Central American idols; this seems to corroborate their history. They are strange creatures, and like nothing we ever saw, or ever expect to see; and the tale of their discovery which is told cannot be relied upon any more than how of any other uncommon fact. A tall account, of whatever nature it may be, is received with physiological concessions as to the size of the great and saintly men's wonders which have the taste to tell.

On the right is an item of Barnum's endless folly and pig-headedness. He has a cobra, twice enough for a monkey, but always assuming the true American principle to think the cheapest article the most fun, and apparently accustomed to lean upon a stiff fact for support, to search upon for ground for his subsistence. In would state he must have hired upon such fact to the effect or not to be able to crack anything so hard, but that Mr. Barnum is doubtless to a good beforehand and cost. Mr. Barnum's free, Africa, and is rather opportunely called the "White Is I" for he is a strange sight to see the wild man African and George Gordon, and really one of the most delicate and interesting specimens of whiteness.

In the centre is an African scarlet, who has a good-natured, jolly fat nurse to a bi-hold, and the real African, born and brought up among negroes, and every alternative child has a nurse black as it ought to be, but not by any means the picture on the right and left. Upper Tendom the white is the fairest fields of the Upper Tendom Their eyes are pale, the hair perfectly white, but woolly, and the complexion white as a sheet. In short they are white lambs peculiarly suggestive of an to no doubt as to their paternity as to race. They are entirely original and curious creatures. Their appearance has left little doubt the public of their appearance, and are constantly developed specimens and improvements which we notice exhibited.

At the entrance to see Napoleon in his office, but it is so nothing not desirable to visitors at this time man was twenty years ago, and about whom quite an hour's interest was exhausted as if he himself were the greatest curiosity of all the strange ob jects which he has gathered around him.

Relating the polite invitation of the manager to witness the performance of "Uncle Tom and his Brethren," which was just then crowding the lecture-room, and desiring to secure that entertainment came from the mammoth Kentucky cave so many years since, but which we had not time to visit then, and refusing to have a frolic with the monkeys of the Happy Family, we made out, promising to call again another day.

Draining Tile.

ADDRESS

C. & W. M'CAMMON,

ALBANY TILE WORKS,

ALBANY, N. Y.

Established 1845.

Send for Price List. 204

Weslevan Sacred Harp.

A COLLECTION OF

CHOICE TUNES AND HYMNS

For Prayer, Class and Camp Meetings, Choirs and Congregational singing. By Rev. W. Bullen Hall, author of 60 music valued pre-paid. Published by OLIVER DITSON & Co., Boston. 204

Enlargement and Improvement.

MOORE'S RURAL NEW YORKER is the leading and largest Circulated, and is conducted by the ablest Rural and Social Agricultural, Horticultural, Literary and Family Newspaper of the day.

The Twenty-Fifth Volume, commencing with January, 1861, will be in TWELVE ENLARGED and IMPROVED numbers, thereby rendering it superior in value of its terms or manner to any other publication. It will be printed on new and beautiful type, with new dress, and will contain, with a variety of Original Articles, Essays, &c., &c., in the best style. In music, "Songs of the Season," and other Pieces Original and Selected, it will be unsurpassed in both matter and manner, rendering it worthy a single Instrument Musical Circulation.

NOW IS THE TIME TO GET

THE BEST, CHEAPEST AND MOST POPULAR!

The Rural New Yorker comprises Eight Double Quarto Pages (64 columns), in the best Rich Type, and Paper, for the cost of each Volume, complete for binding.

Terms, ONE COPY, ONE YEAR, $2 00; Six for $5; Seven for $10; 10 for $15; 20 for $ 3. Specimens sent free to Canvassers and to all who desire to get up Clubs. Liberal Premiums to such agents. Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y. 204

Holloway's Ointment.

THE hospitals of Europe and America avow its superiority, for it is used universally. It is to all cases of sores, wounds, bruises, burns and scalds. It enlarges glands and other tumors, cures fistulas, ulcers, piles and other local complaints. Manufactured only by Professor Holloway, New York, and by all Druggists, at 25 cts., 62 cts. and $1 per pot.

A ROCKING CHAIR WHICH ROCKERS.—The "rocking-bar" Rocking Chair is sold by Terry & Wells, N. Y. Cut 3, convey, and an eastern and rock without screws. They are made in all the same as styles of the ordinary arm chairs now used in parlors and c ambers, and present a similar appearance. The rocking motion is given by the spring to a catch, and the chair held rigidly when steps or at any position desired. The motion is easy, and very convenient for children, for which purpose they are particularly adapted. They have been found very satisfactory, and a chance to every family, who can do so, should by easy changes of position, they obtain the largest and most comfortable rest. They are really appropriate as a present to no aged person or invalid friend. The rocking motion of recliners, which were carpets so injuriously, and are very in the spring, is the one great feature of this new invention. 203

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,

FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.

For curing and preventing Baldness:

For removing scurf and dandruff;

For beautifying and making the hair soft and curly;

For all the purposes of a healthy compound of the kind is to be used.

Be sure and get the right article.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator.

Sold by all Druggists. Price 75 cents per bottle.

Wholesale Agents, 56 Beekman street, New York.

PROF. L. MILLER'S INSTANTANEOUS LIQUID HAIR DYE, Warranted superior to all others.

Try them, and you will acknowledge the fact. 200-65

Send for Specimen of

CLARK'S SCHOOL VISITOR,

An Illustrated Day School Paper for Teachers and Pupils everywhere. Address

DAUGHADAY & HAMMOND,

41 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Bogle's Hair Dye and Wigs

ARE unsurpassed and unapproached by their superior merits. Both Dye and Wigs Dye to see the color, and do not disappoint.

Private Rooms for Dyeing Hair and Sitting Wigs at 347 Broadway, between Franklin and Tenth Streets, No. 20 Bond street, New York. Orders promptly attended to. Call and try them, before purchasing elsewhere. Ost Boer's Head Six Cord Spool Cotton.

ESTABLISHED 1783.

Superior to any ever in present in Strength, Evenness and Elasticity, for

MACHINE OR HAND SEWING.

On Spools of 200, 300 and 1,000 Yards, the length warranted.

G. CARVILLE,

Sole Agent, 160 Fulton St.

Special Notice.

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

REMOVAL.

The down-town office of this Company has been removed from 61 to 154 BROADWAY, corner of Cedar street, opposite the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. Entrance on Cedar street. 204

WM. G. FARGO, Agent.

Agents and cars arrangements made for the safe and speedy delivery of Holiday goods.

WELLS, BUTTERFIELD & Co.,

Principal Office 61 Broadway.

Branches at 642 and 154 Broadway. 204-66

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper,

Frank Leslie's Magazine,

Can always be had at

HUNT & MILNER,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS AND NEWSDEALERS,

71 and 73 Fifth St., next to the Post Office,

PITTSBURG, Pa. 204-66

A Building Lot or Farm for $20.

MISSOURI CITY ASSOCIATION

And Manufacturing Company.

The above Company having secured the premises of their Lands adjoining the town of St-nilton, in Carroll County, on the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, and laid them into Building Lots and Farms, now offer the same to purchasers in Shares of $10 each, or Building Lots, and Farms for $20 each. For Pamphlets, terms of investment, &c., address the Secretary, Philadelphia, No. 23 West Third Street, Cincinnati, Ohio. 204

Sands' Sarsaparilla,

THE GREAT AMERICAN REMEDY FOR PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

Will be found a safe and speedy cure for Scrofula and Scrofulous Disorders. As an alternative and renovating agent it is unequalled. 204

Dr. Phelps' Tunes.

THE great number of radical cures of Hernia within the last few years, by the use of Dr. J. W. Phelps' Spiral Spring Truss, has given them the preference over all others. His systems for the correction of all kinds of deformities are used at the Hospitals of Europe, and are recommended by the first surgeons in Europe and America.

Call or send for Circular, No. 2, Tremont St., Boston. 204

THE PEOPLE'S GREAT BOOKS.

20,000 Cop ies Already Sold.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES;

BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S.,

Professor of Pathology and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association, &c., &c.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES, although but Two Months from the press, has already proved the unqualified approval of upwards of TWENTY THOUSAND purchasers, and is now the most popular work on the Horse ever published in the English or any other tongue. It tells you of the Origin, History and Characteristics of the various breeds of Europeans, Asiatic, African and American Horses, with the Comparative Merits and peculiarities of the subsoil, and how to ascertain the age by the mouth; and contains a Synonymic Glossary, Breaking, Breeding, Stabling, Grooming, Feeding, Watering, Exercising, Management in the Stable, with the best method of manufacturing manures; also, How to treat Rising, Kicking, Shying, Restive Horses, Shoeing, Cribbing, Stall-fastening, and other vices to which he is subject, with numerous explanatory engravings

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you of the symptoms and treatment of Sore Throat, Cough, Heaves, Broken-winded, Pleurisy, Pneumonia, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Catarrh, Nasal Gleet, Polypus, Consumption, Sore Mouth and Diseases, and Diseases Teeth, with Rules for Judging the Age by the Teeth, and Diseases of the Eye, Sore Eyes, Cataract, Amaurosis, Wall Eye, Gutta Serena, Specific Iritis, Inflammation, Ulcers, Fistula, Poll Evil, Diseases of the Ear, Diseases in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation, Stone and Gravel, Diseases of the Urinary Organs, Liver and Urinary Organs

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you the causes, symptoms and Treatment of Sores, Head, and Ear, Spavin, Ring-Bone, Sweeny, Shoulder Slip, Sore Back, Wind Galls, Founder, Sore Feet, and Grease Scratches, Scratches, Mallenders, Thrush, Canker, Corns, Diseases of Sheep, Swine, Cattle, Dogs, Diagnosis and Treatment of Diseases of Lungs and Heart of Fevers, Foot Rot, Glanders, Farcy, Epizootic, Colic, Gripes, Inflammation of Liver, Inflammation of Bowels, Diseases of the Spleen and Heart, &c. &c., and how to manage Castration, Breeding, Spermatic Cord, Rupture, Hernia, Amputation, Tapping and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you of Horse's Method of Setting Horse's Jaw in Apoplexy, Blister or Stable Cloth; how to accustom a horse to sewage steam and Spirits, and how to Feed Stable, Sick and Fresh Meat in Surgery; also the form and use of Warranty. The whole being the result of more than fifteen years' careful study and practical experience, and a thorough weaknesses of this noble and useful animal.

The book contains 384 pages, illustrated by nearly One Hundred Engravings, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or in cloth, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by any Book Agent who will engage in the sale of our Publications. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

150,000 Copies Sold.

Everybody's Lawyer

AND

COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS.

By Frank Crosby, Esq.,

MEMBER OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS

Is the only volume of the kind ever published, that is adapted to the wants of every man in the community, and contains all the most important points of law, and most useful information, that is necessary for transacting business in every State, and the decisions of the Courts in all the States, and the Statutes of Limitation, and amount and rate of interest allowed in each State, in the Union, and the manner of conveying property, with forms for transferring the same from one to the other, and the mode of doing it in each State. The legal relations and the business Customs and Usages of Trade, Art and Commerce, and Labor and Industry, also what constitutes Libel and Slander, and the law of Husband, Wife and Children, the Widow's Right to Property, Dowers and Jointures.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the Law for Mechanics' Liens in every State; and the Mechanics' Lien of the United States, and the Law of Partnership, Joint Stock Companies, Limited Partnerships, and the Joint Stock Law, and the Pre-emption or Homestead Law. The Law of Insurance, and the Insurance Business in existing era, with Interesting Anecdotes and Table of Rates of Premium in many New York, and how to adjust them as at Interest, with the law, and the requirements thereof, in every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the meaning of Law Terms in general use, and explains the Law of Bankruptcy. It gives the old Revised Statutes of the United States, and the Statutes at Large, and the Decisions of the Courts thereon, and the Statutes of Limitation, and amount and rate of interest allowed in each State, and the Pre-emption or Homestead Law. The Law of Insurance, and the Insurance Business in existing era, with Interesting Anecdotes and Table of Rates of Premium in many New York, and how to adjust them as at Interest, with the law, and the requirements thereof, in every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the meaning of Law Terms in general use, and explains the Law of Bankruptcy. It gives the old Revised Statutes of the United States, and the Statutes at Large, and the Decisions of the Courts thereon, and the Statutes of Limitation, and amount and rate of interest allowed in each State, and the Pre-emption or Homestead Law. The Law of Insurance, and the Insurance Business in existing era, with Interesting Anecdotes and Table of Rates of Premium in many New York, and how to adjust them as at Interest, with the law, and the requirements thereof, in every State.

The book contains 384 pages, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or in law sheep, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by any Book Agent who will engage in the sale of our Publications. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

60,000 Copies Sold.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR;

CONTAINING

SIMPLE REMEDIES, EASILY OBTAINED, FOR THE CURE OF DISEASE IN ALL FORMS,

BY

Prof. Henry S. Taylor, M.D.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR has reached the enormous sale of about Thirteen Editions, and wherever known is universally approved, both by the family and the faculty. For curing Diseases of a from medical treatment, it tells you how to prepare simple remedies, easily obtained, and how to administer them. Full directions are given for the guidance of patients from Confinement to Death, and how to treat Diseases of the Eye, Ague, and Bilious, Yellow, Typhus, Scarlet and other Fevers, with the best and simplest medicines for their cure.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR tells you of the various Diseases of Children, and gives the symptoms of Croup, Cholera Infantum, Fits, Canker, Rash, Worms, Scald Head, Ringworm, Chicken Pox, &c., and how to treat and administer the most simple and effective remedies for their cure.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR tells you of the symptoms of Scrofula, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Apoplexy, Paralysis, Hemorrhoids, Diseases of the Throat, Teeth, Bad and Dry Eyes, Epilepsy, Jaundice, Piles, Ruptures, Diseases of the Heart, Hemorrhages, Venereal Disease on and Hypochondria, and gives the best and simplest remedies for their cure. Also, the best and simplest remedies for Wounds, Broken Bones, Dislocations, Female Complaints, Fever Sores, Burns and Scalds. Also, of the various and diseases peculiar to each sex, and the best remedies for their cure, together with many hints for the preservation of the health.

$1.500 PER ANNUM—Agents Wanted, to travel and sell Goods, in every Town and Village in the United States, for sale of an article in which every family is interested. For terms, address (without fee or cost) Box 943, care P. O. Boston, or Box 5,643, New York City. 204-69

Frank Leslie's

BUDGET OF FUN

IS OUT,

December 15th.

A CAPITAL NUMBER,

Containing all the delineaes of the Season, with abundant seasonings.

Spicy! Spicy! Spicy!

Racy! Racy!

-pitting! Curious! Jolly! Nice

CONTAINING AMONG OTHER BEAUTIES

The Incantation of the Republican (in which Horace Greeley appears); Uncle Lowndes' Spirit Rappings; Uncle Lowndes' Tea at Home; The Japanese Gentleman; Hard Times; Mr. Lincoln's Journey to Washington; An Angel in an Omnibus; The Lion and Bear; Stray Leaves from Uncle Lowndes' Journal, and a host of other Sketches.

A VAST AMOUNT OF GOOD READING,

Just the sort to interest you and Uncle Sam.

The Fourth Count; Cats of a Private Corner; The Mysterious Lady; Uncle Lowndes' Life Assurance Scheme; The Ghost In Grand White Array; Getting Drafted Her Spiritual Friend; Fashion Phrases; Shakspearing and Real Poetry; People who Can't—Don't—Shouldn't and Little Bothers.

ALL THE ABOVE FOR SIX CENTS.

Buy it. You'll not regret the expenditure.

BEAUTIFULLY PRINTED ON GOOD PAPER.

Sixteen Folio Pages!

THIRTY FIRST RATE ENGRAVINGS!

NOTHING LIKE IT PUBLISHED!

Miscellaneous.

THE AMALGAMATION OF LANGUAGES.—There is a growing tendency in this age to appropriate the most expressive words of other languages, and after a while to incorporate them into our own. Until the word Capitol, so well known to the Greek, signifying the Acropolis or citadel of Athens, was adopted by the Romans to designate their magnificent edifice on the Tarpeian Hill, it was but used in a more general way, and the word Capitolia will become as common at Hickory-ry and many edifices whose situation or design needs has been eaten away by the common water until they remain "entire and in the matter form."

"Ardy Reinlied.

He had a terrible wife to his friends, hard I stepped into the hospitality, and kept as to the issue. "Can you learn me to speak Dutch?" I was in Dutch, and I said to "Heidenschaft," says he, based mean that's gone to a Captain Pill, Mate of the New Bedford Bill as quick then I really realized I had to an 'embrido.'

ADV. Headache is the favorite sign by which nature warns human any duration whatever from the normal state of the body, and would be the right way to follow so as a deplored attended to in time, before the attack which either consequence obtained. Headache, therefore, should be considered a friend never be neglected. Sometimes may be a symptom of a disease of the most dangerous and formidable. Symptomatic headache is more frequent, and in the province of a great variety of diseases, among which are Apoplexy, Gout, Rheumatism and all acute diseases. In its common form it is a concomitant of disease of the stomach, developing and, headache, if often recurring, constituting bilious headache, of vertigo, over-indulgence and dyspepsia, and is the most frequent of all the varieties of this affliction. Diseases of the nerves are very frequently attended with Headache. Anæmia and problems are also attendants which frequently occasion headache. Intermittent Headache is also very common, being usually diminished by the name of nervous headache, neuralgia coming on and only in a state of apparently sound health and protracted or acute but not physical disease. Headache is of other occasions it comes on slowly, the body is oppressed with a sense of fullness, and the face is flushed, and the pain is in the front of the head, over one or both eyes, and sometimes preceding vomiting; under this class may also be noted Hemicrania.

For the treatment of either class of Headache the Cephalic Pills have been found a safe and speedy remedy, relieving the most severe pain in a few minutes, and by the gentle power overthrowing the disease of which Headache is the unerring index.

DOUBT.—Want wants you to send her a box of Cephalic Pills, as a friend of Headache, and Nervous Headache, and she can't be without her; but perhaps you'll be either knowing what it is. We can only say that they are called the Cephalic Headache, and wants some more of that same as relished her before.

PATIENCE.—We must mean Seidlitz's Cephalic Pills.

DOUBT.—Let her not be afraid of the Cephalic Pills; the quack-ho and give me the Pills, and don't be all my about it either.

Constipation or Costiveness.

No one of the many ills flesh is heir to is so prevalent as this understood, and so much neglected as Costiveness. Often originating in a slight inattention at first, it is regarded as a slight disorder at the time one consents to its approach, but it is the beginning of a train of evils, painful and many of the most fatal and incurable character, not unless early corrected it will bring the sufferer to an untimely grave. Among the earlier evils of costiveness are heartburn, bilious and intermittent fevers, Colic Flatulency, Bad Breath, Piles and others of the future, while a long train of frightful diseases such as Bilious Fever, Jaundice, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Rheumatism, Gout, Apoplexy, Paralysis, Epilepsy, Hypochondriasis, Melancholy and insanity, first declares their presence in the system by this alarming symptom. No unfavorable symptom can be named opposite to Constipation, but none on a superficial examination appears so insidious and so early magn. From all these considerations it follows that the disorder should receive immediate attention when it occurs, and no persons should neglect to get a box of Cephalic Pills at once. They are the best and safest remedy in their family and will relieve the approaches of disease and destroy the dangerous fire to human life.

Cephalic Pills,
CURE
Sick Headache,
CURE
Nervous Headache,
CURE
All kinds of Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented; and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They obtain full control over the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Laxative, improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and energy to the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the Stomach.

These rare qualities recommend it to the attention, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS

The genuine have the signatures of Henry C Spalding on each Box

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

All orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING,
68 Cedar St., New York.

PIANOFORTES.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

MANUFACTURER OF THE CYPHERINE

Celebrated Dunham Pianofortes,

GRAND AND SQUARE.

MANUFACTORY AND SHOW ROOMS,

75 to 85 East Thirteenth Street near Broadway,

New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1834.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five years, and prices are moderate.

$40. Parker Sewing Machine, $40
Just Out, Device Instan.
rapid and Noiseless, under Patents of Howe, Grover & Baker, Wheeler & Wilson. Agents wanted.
Office, VENDOR & CO.,
No. 102 Broadway.

DR. ROBAN'S RHEUMATIC CURE.—This invaluable French Remedy, out of thousands of cases of rheumatism, has not in one instance failed to effect a radical cure. It is entirely harmless, and certain to be effective, in severe cases of Chronic, Acute and Inflammatory Rheumatism, Sciatica, Lumbago, Gout, Neuralgia, Sprains, Bruises, and checking it gives instant relief. One bottle is sufficient to test its efficacy and insure a permanent cure. Price $1 per bottle. For sale on the Agency of DR. ROBAN, No. 602 Broadway. Sent by Express to any part of the United States and Canada, upon receipt of the price. Pamphlets supplied. 264-66

The Stove that Pleases Everybody.

THE "INDEPENDENT"
LARGE OVEN
COOKING STOVE,
For all Countries and all Climates,
FOR HARD OR SOFT COAL, OR FOR WOOD.
ADVANTAGES:

1. Self-cleaning from the ashes.
2. A Revolving Grate on a slide for conducting the coal and ashes into the hearth.
3. The Grate-bars can be easily ventilated.
4. The improved Sandwich Flues, and extra large at ends.
5. The thickness of the castings and the extra fitting and finish
6. Great economy in the use of fuel.
7. Dealing with Scientific Patent Gauge Grinders, which is done without taking or cracking the bones or the stove.
8. Splendid Roasting Oven—before the fire.
9. Hot Water Reservoir and Hot Closet if desired.
10. Water Basins, which heat water as well as any range, and are not in the cold.

Every Stove guaranteed. Sold by the principal Dealers in nearly every town in the Union.

Address VERADWELL & PERRY, Agents,
Albany, N. Y.

WORTH HAVING

"The Mine of Wealth."

A Book that instructs how to make one article that three men out of money each $15 a day from. Another book that one paying persons who invest from $5 to $5 a day; also how to start this genuine, paying business in a few days with. The Book also contains 150 other rare and valuable receipts, and will be sent to any address on receipt of one $100. Price $1, and one by mail for one copy.

GARDNER & CO., Publishers,
129 Randolph St., Chicago, P. O. Box 3011.

IMPORTANT INVENTION FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.—For particulars address, inclosing stamp, DR. H. BIRSFIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 418 Strawberry, New York. 259-71

The Union Clothes Dryer.
A NEW INVENTION—USEFUL, CHEAP AND PORTABLE.

By which Clothes in large or small quantities may be dried in a part, a room, or on the top of a house. Can be put up and taken down without injury to the building.

Price only $1 50 to $3.

J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors, 402 Broadway (near Grand St.), New York, and 312 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Purify the Blood.

WITH corrupt, disordered or vitiated Blood, you must be sick all over. It may burst out in a pimple, or sore, or in some active disease, or it may merely keep you listless, depressed and good for nothing. But you need to have and health when you have pure blood. Ayer's Sarsaparilla purges out those impurities which make you sick, and when they are gone you feel well. It is safe and strengthening disease. It is the most powerful remedy of combination which can control by purifying the blood, such as Scrofula or King's Evil, Tumors, Ulcers, Erysipelas, Pimples, Blotches, Boils, St. Anthony's Fire, Tetter or Salt-rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, Cancer or Cancerous Tetter, Sore Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back and Bones, Female Weakness, Uterine Disorders, Dropsy, Spitting or Vomiting of Blood, Complaints and Blood Diseases. By AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, and for the purpose of purifying society many times, and eliminate the blood and cures the disorders.

AYER'S FAMILY PHYSIC is so universally known to purpose every other remedy for his cure of Coughs, Colds, Influenza, Hoarseness, Croup, Bronchitis, Whooping Cough, Consumption, and for relieving the Pectoral Organs. In the beginning of the disease, that it may be speedily removed. But every one of its virtues. Be sure to get AYER'S.

AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS—For Costiveness, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Jaundice, Foul Stomach, Nauseous Headache, Heartburn, Piles, Rheumatism, Worms, Fevers, and all cases of the derangement of a purgative need of a purgative medicine. Price 25 cts. per box; five boxes for $1. Sold by all druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.

264-66

WHAT SHALL I DO FOR MY HAIR?—Use
RALSH-HOW'S LYON'S KATHAIRON
Hair Dye, beyond question the best article ever offered to the public. Its operation is unsurpassed. No disappointment. Its tinting is never such universal satisfaction. It is harmless, powerful and beautiful. Sold, and imparts a splendid color. 259-70

PHELAN'S PATENT BILLIARD TABLES.
MANUFACTORY & WAREROOMS,
536 & 562 BROADWAY, CROSBY ST. NEW YORK.

HANDSOME WOMEN.
TO THE LADIES.

HUNT'S "BLOOM OF YOUTH" is the most natural color for the cheeks and lips, and will wash off or rub off, it always remains unchanged. Sent to any address on receipt of 25 dollars for $1.

HUNT'S "COURT TOILET POWDER" imparts a clear transparent whiteness to the complexion, and is entirely free from any injurious ingredient. Sent to any address on receipt of 25 dollars for $1.

HUNT'S "BRITISH BALM" removes Tan, Freckles, Sunburn, and is an eruptions of the skin; applied to the face, 25 cts.

HUNT'S "IMPERIAL POMADE," for the Hair, strengthens and increases its growth, keeps it from falling off, and eradicates the dandruff. Sent to any address for $1.

HUNT'S "PARIS BEAUTIFIER," for the Teeth and Breath, whitens and preserves the Teeth, purifies the Breath and purifies the Breath effectually. Prepared and Sent to any address for 25 cents.

HUNT'S "BRIDAL WREATH PERFUME," a delightful extract of roses, for handkerchief and toilet use. Price 25 cts.

The exquisite Perfumes were first used by the PRINCESS OF WALES, and by the Queen of the Netherlands, and by the Court of Europe and by the Nobility. Their delicacy and fragrancy on which all the other articles were modelled, in handkerchief use gives with great elegance, and their perfectness of which adapted on and in passing prices. All the above articles are sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of 25 cents, accompanying the order or 50 cents to the express agents on delivery of goods.

Remit $1 or $2, in bills or gold, and for $3 on $5, Philadelphia The U. S. supplied.

HUNT & CO., Perfumers to the Queen,
No. 2 Astor House, and 347 Broadway, New York.

The Rural American.

50,000 COPIES OF THE RURAL AMERICAN, of Union, N. Y., will be sent to subscribers next week, to those and others who want the best, largest, most splendid and cheapest Agricultural Weekly in the Union! In every other paper can ever compete with it in size and real reference to it is circulated per large and any paper of the world. CAN AGENTS WANTED in every town in the United States, to whom liberal terms will be given. Send for a specimen copy, which is sent free. Send your address clearly or in clubs to T. D. MILLS & SON, Clinton, Lincoln Co., N. Y.

Traveling Agents

ARE paid $30 to $60 per month in canvass for the RURAL AMERICAN. Details sent in paper. 260

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

PUBLISHED for the benefit and as a warning to young men who suffer from Nervous Debility, premature decay, &c.; supplying the means of self-cure; by one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. Single copies sent by mail for one address. RALPH, LAWRENCE & CO., Albany, N. Y., by inclosing a postpaid addressed envelope. 264-67

A. LANGE,
PICTURE AND LOOKING-GLASS
FRAMES
AND
CORNICES FOR ROOMS.
MADE TO ORDER, AND RE-GILDING DONE.
209 William St., cor. Frankfort, New York.

Pianofortes.
A. H. GALE & CO.,
MANUFACTORY AND WAREROOMS,
107 East Fourth Street, N. Y.

To Consumptives.

A CLERGYMAN having revived his son of Consumption in its worst stages, after being given up to die by the most celebrated physicians, he seeks means to make the remedy known to the afflicted. Those who are afflicted with Consumption, Coughs and Colds, and wish to try the remedy can address Rev. ANDREW BANKS, Albion, 22 Penniman Street, New York. 264

PHOTOGRAPHIC OIL PAINTINGS—Agents wanted to introduce this beautiful art. Young men are making $50 a week in this business. Terms and specimens sent free, by addressing, with stamp, J. P. ROSE & CO., Cincinnati, Ohio. 262-65

Greatly Improved Pianofortes.

CLEMENBERG & CO., Manufacturers of Pianoforte Grand Full Iron Pianofortes, which for vigor of Tone, clear, true and long duration of Finish—in short, everything that renders a Piano perfect—are unsurpassed. Every Piano warranted for Five years. Pianos to Let. Warerooms, 12 Leroy Place, Bleecker St., near Broadway. 260-66

Liquid and Extract Triesmer.

THIS genuine Liquid Preparation, possessing rare qualities, and pleasant to the taste, prepared by J. L. HUBBARD, Chemist, Boston, Lyons Extract as it guaranteed to effectually eradicate all traces of premature decay, dyspepsia, &c., restoring the functions of other power as not with an astonishing permanency. Extract Triesmen is warranted to cure in every case without exception and unsurpassed in result, being by all other remedies and unsurpassed in result, being Price $1 per Bottle, or Six Bottles for $5. Forwarded to any part of the country. All orders must be addressed to DR. W. S. HUSSELL, No. 160 Spring Street, New York. 260-70

Kennedy's Medical Discovery

CURES SCROFULA.

Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Erysipelas.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ringworm.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Rolling Sore Mouth!
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Tumor on the Eyes.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Blood Boils.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Running of the Ears!
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures White Swellings.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Leprosy.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Salt Rheum.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Scaly Eruptions.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Dyspepsia.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Female Weakness.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Kidneys!
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Dropsy.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery has cured Dropsy.

Only one dollar a bottle, and six bottles for one dollar in quantity, perhaps you have an inward humor. Try Kennedy's Medical Discovery. For sale by all druggists.

ESTABLISHED 1843.

BOGLES CELEBRATED
HYPERION FLUID
restores everything as the greatest Nature ever made to grow on the hair in the world. To who have lost their hair by sickness or by this use so convinced. It never fails. Sold by

W. BOGLES
Hidden Hair Dye and Toilet
Store,
277 Washington St., Boston, and
for sale everywhere.

Superior Pianofortes.

WARREN'S PIANOFORTE WAREROOMS, 181 FULTON STREET, Opposite Dutch Church, and 17 Dey Street, between Broadway and Church Street, New York.

Dealers and others are invited to carefully inspect and call and examine my very superior instruments, made with full iron frame and overstrung scale and possessing the most pleasing and beauty of finish, sweetness and power of tone. My Pianofortes are warranted for five years, and sold on reasonable terms as well as lower prices than any pianofortes manufactured in the city. ROBERT GARLAND, 174 181 Fulton Street, New York.

GREATLY IMPROVED PIANOFORTES.—GALE & CO. Manufacturers of Overstrung Full Iron Pianofortes, which for vigor of Tone, Elasticity of Touch, Beauty of Finish, and Durability of Construction, they claim to be unsurpassed—a call respectfully solicited. Pianos warranted for Five Years. Rooms to Let. Warerooms, 107 Leroy Place, Bleecker St., near Broadway, New York. 260-66

A Card to the Ladies.

DE RECAMIER, from Paris, respectfully informs the ladies that he can be consulted at No. 5 Union Place, 16th Street, above Bleecker St. De Recamier's Medicated Steam Baths are the most effectual remedy for Rheumatism, Gout, Nervousness, Skin Diseases, &c. He invites every lady to call. Consultation gratis at 64 Broadway, seven to eight, A. M. 260-66

IMPORTANT TO THE MARRIED.—Send Stamp for particulars to D. A. WILLIAMS, Lowell, Mass. 262-66

You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Mustaches!

Or Concert will force them to grow heavily in 10 to 30 weeks (upon the smoothest face) without injury to the skin, or the use of Nitrate of Silver, and can, to any address, on receipt of an order.

L. G. HEGEMAN & CO., New York.

NEW BOOKS FOR AGENTS,

Sold only by Subscription.

WANTED.—An Agent in every County, to engage in the sale of a beautifully ILLUSTRATED WORKS. Elsewhere, giving full information, with Terms to Agents and a full list of my Publications, sent on application to

THOMAS BELL,
Quaker City Publishing House,
No. 23 Sansom Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S

LOTTERIES!

AUTHORIZED BY THE STATES OF

DELAWARE,
MISSOURI
AND
KENTUCKY

Draw daily, in public, under the superintendence of Sworn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM

$2 50 TO $100,000!

TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $50.

☞ Circulars giving full explanation and the Schemes to be drawn will be sent, free of expense, to addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
OR
WOOD, EDDY & CO., St. Louis, Missouri.

Sent Free! Sent Free! Sent Free!

A NEW and Beautiful Art, for which we want Agents everywhere. Agents make $50 a month. Terms and Specimen sent FREE. Address, with Stamp for return postage, L. L. TODD & CO.,
257 60t Lowell, Mass.

Tiffany & Co.,
LATE
TIFFANY, YOUNG & ELLIS,
Fine Jewellery, Precious Stones, Watches, Silver Ware
Bronzes, Clocks, Rich Porcelain Articles of Art and Luxury
No. 550 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Store of PARIS, TIFFANY, REED & CO

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 18, 24 and 36 tunes
PAILLARD & MAYOU, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired. 13 Maiden Lane, N. Y

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AND GYMNASIUM
YONKERS, N. Y.
Winter Session commenced on the 1st day of Nov.
TERMS:
Board and Tuition..... $100 per Session.
For Circulars and particular information, apply to
M. N. WIDMEYER, Principal.
Yonkers, 1860 000

THE READERS OF
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper
Desiring to purchase any article in New York, no matter how trifling or costly, can have their orders promptly and faithfully fulfilled by addressing
JAMES W. FORTUNE,
Care of Frank Leslie, Esq.,
19 City Hall Square, N. Y.
In all cases the necessary funds should be inclosed in the first communication.

FINKLE & LYON'S
SEWING MACHINES.
Our Machines took the highest medal at the Fair of the American Institute, with the highest premium for fine Sewing Machine work.
They also took the highest premium at the New Jersey State Fair, at the Mechanics' Fair, Utica, N. Y., the Franklin Institute, and at generally wherever exhibited.
A late office 303 Broadway,
REMOVED TO 335 BROADWAY 000

335 EMPIRE 335
SEWING MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
SALESROOM, NO. 335 BROADWAY.
This Machine is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism. Its processes many new and valuable attachments—has been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY AND PERFECTION COMBINED.
The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:
1. Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2. Limited length of roll of cotton.
3. Expense, trouble and loss of time in repairing.
4. Incapacity to sew every description of material.
5. Disagreeable noise while in operation.
The Empire Sewing Machine
IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.
It has a straight needle, perpendicular motion, makes the lock or Shooting Stitch—will neither rip nor ravel, and is alike on both sides; performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nainsook Muslin, with cotton, linen or silk thread, from the nearest to the finest number.
Having neither Cam nor Cog-wheel, and the least possible friction, it runs with the utmost ease and is
EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.
It requires NOT ONE HALF the power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of twelve years of age can work it as steadily, without fatigue or injury to health as the strength and wonderful accuracy of construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction.
We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article to call and examine the Machine before purchasing.
For it is more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of
MERCHANT TAILORS,
COACH-MAKERS,
HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS,
SHIRT AND BOSOM MAKERS,
DRESSMAKERS,
CORSET-MAKERS,
GAITER-FITTERS,
HOOD MAKERS,
VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS
AND
Religious and Charitable Institutions
WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.
PRICES OF MACHINES COMPLETE:
No. 1—For Family Machine..... $55
No. 2—Small size Manufacturing..... 65
No. 3—Large size Manufacturing..... 75
AGENTS WANTED for all towns in the United States. Terms made known by applying at the Salesroom, No. 335 Broadway.
T. J. MARTHER & CO.
000

Toilet Companions
FOR THE LADIES.
As it is proper and natural for our lady friends to wish to make themselves as beautiful as possible, we feel it our duty to inclose the best means for bringing about that much desired consummation, and we can confidently assert that any one who uses HUNNEWELL'S celebrated preparations may obtain their object. Messrs. JAMES BURROW & CO. are practical and scientific chemists, and have made their preparations (viz., COCOAINE, KALLISTON, FLORIDA and ORANGE FLOWER WATER), with strict reference to the human system, in order that they may promote the general health. We are not in the habit of publishing such certificates, but from rather forcible circumstances, that we can cheerfully and cordially recommend these articles to our readers.—Let: Pennsylvania 59t

Charles? Heidsieck
CHAMPAGNE.
The undersigned have for sale the above popular Wine for which they are
THE SOLE AGENTS FOR NORTH AMERICA.
The stock they have now on hand is identical in quality with that for which HEDSIC, CHARLES HEIDSIECK & CO. received the first premium at the Rocheurt Exposition of 1850.
It is well known that the Wine Connoisseurs of Rochelle are the best in the world. In informing the public of the fact that the Charles Heidsieck Champagne took the premium at above mentioned, tested by the most prominent Wine Growers and Merchants of the Champagne District, who had in the opposite samples of their best growths and stocks, we believe no further satisfactory evidence of the great merits of the wine can be given than that awarded, and can be seen at our office.
T. W. BAYARD & BERARD,
No. 350 Pearl St., N. Y.
2660

Smith and Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STORES, Agent,
193 Chamber Street, N. Y.
THIS PISTOL is light and great force, is sure fire, shoots accurately, can be left loaded any length of time without injury, is not liable to get out of order, is safe to carry. Every Pistol warranted
CAUTION TO DEALERS.
Be sure and get those stamped "Smith & Wesson, Springfield, Mass.," none other genuine. All carriers purchasers that deal of the brands are infringements. Suits are commenced, and all such infringements will be prosecuted. Be sure the cartridges have Smith & Wesson's name on each end of the box 247 72t
A New Six Shooting Cartridge Revolver.
Weighing only (6) nine ounces
For sale, wholesale and retail,
By JOSEPH MERWIN, Agent,
257 Broadway, N. Y 253-61e

Ladd, Webster & Co's
IMPROVED TRIPLE-STITCH SEWING MACHINES,
500 Broadway, New York. 000

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
Noiseless Family Sewing Machines.
PRICES ESTABLISHED FOR SIXTY YEARS.
FROM $40 AND UPWARDS.
"It finishes its own work; others do not."—Home Journal.
Office 495 Broadway, New York.
262-65e

A CHRISTMAS PRESENT.
Willcox & Gibbs' Sewing Machine,
Beautiful, reliable and so simple that any person can learn to use it in half an hour, will prove one of the most acceptable presents to a lady that can be offered.
JAMES WILCOX,
264-65e Manufacturer, 505 Broadway.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST FURS AT WILLIAMS'S, 336 Fulton St., Brooklyn. 262-66e

ESENWEIN'S
Tar and Wood Naphtha
PECTORAL
Is the only certain cure for all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs. From the cures that are constantly being made by the use of this great VEGETABLE REMEDY, it has been called the Wonder of the Age. It cures speedily and without fail Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs and Colds, Croup, Whooping Cough, Palpitation of the Heart, Dyspepsia, &c. This article is pleasant in the taste, and prompt in its effects. Be careful to ask for ESENWEIN'S Tar and Wood Naphtha Pectoral, and take no other.
PRICE FIFTY CENTS PER BOTTLE
Prepared only by
DR. A. ESENWEIN & CO.,
Druggists and Chemists,
N. W. corner of Ninth and Poplar Sts.,
PHILADELPHIA.
And sold by every respectable Druggist throughout the United States and Canada. 000

SILSBEE, CASE & CO.,
Photographic and Daguerreotype
ARTISTS.
299½ Washington Street, Boston.
Up two flights of stairs.
G. H. SILSBEE, J. G. CASE, W. H. GINCHELL
253-74e

The Singer Sewing Machines.
IN order to place THIS SUPERIOR FAMILY MACHINE in the World within the reach of all, we have reduced our Levers A, to TREDDLE STITCH MACHINE, beautifully ornamented, to $65.
Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machines, both of very general application and capacity, and popular both in the family and manufactory. Prices reduced, respectively from $150 and $100 to $100 and $100.
Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine, for carriage trimming and heavy leather work. Price, complete, $150.
Also, to complete the list, an
ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,
unequalled for manufacturing purposes; NOISELESS, RAPID, and capable of every kind of work; it sews (unlike any previous kind and known), 2,700—deeper as that in view of its rapid motion and the facility of handling the work.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway

TRAVELLING AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new and valuable article required in every household. Salary paid or commission allowed. For particulars and permanent address, with stamps, A. W. HARRIS, Boston, Mass. 264-67e

TUBE ELECTROTYPING OF LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is done by PITMER & Co., 17 Dutch Street

JOY TO THE WORLD.
Clothes Washed in One Minute by
JOHNSON'S UNION WASHING MACHINE.
Patented April 10, 1860.
PRICE $8 TO $10.
A CHILD CAN OPERATE IT.
Makes every spot, fine and certain, without soaking or boiling. Call and see it in operation at 497 Broadway, New York, and 332 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
J. JOHNSON & CO.,
099 Proprietors.

Patented November 1st, 1859.

The measures are
A, the distance
round the Neck.
B to H, the Yoke.
C to C, the Sleeve.
D to D, distance
around the Body
under the armpits
E to E, the length
of the Shirt.
BALLOU'S
Patent Improved French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.
A New Style of Shirt, warranted to Fit.
By sending the above measure per mail we can guarantee a perfect fit of our new style of Shirt, and return by Express to any part of the United States, $1 for $6, $10, $12, $15, &c., per dozen. No order forwarded for less than half a dozen Shirts.
Also Importers and Dealers in MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS
BALLOU BROTHERS,
459 Broadway, N. Y.
Wholesale Trade supplied on the usual terms.

"WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES are certainly unrivalled."—Prairie Farmer, Cultivator and Horticulturist.
Office, 505 Broadway, New York. 000e

STEINWAY & SONS'
PATENT
OVERSTRUNG
GRAND
AND SQUARE
PIANOS
Are now considered the best Piano manufactured Each Instrument warranted for five years.
Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. 000e

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York

No. 265—Vol. XI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 22, 1860. [Price 6 Cents.

JOHN LETCHER, GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

JOHN LETCHER, the Governor of Virginia, whose portrait we give in our paper this week, is a native of the State of which he is the Chief Magistrate. He was born at Lexington, Rockbridge county, March 29, 1813. His parents are still living. They are plain, respectable people, and pious members of the Methodist Church. He received his early education at the private schools of his native town, and afterwards attended Washington College at Lexington, though he did not graduate. From the time he was fifteen years of age he worked mornings, evenings and Saturdays with his father at the carpenter's trade. This was for relaxation from books, and physical exercise. It was his favorite mode of exercise, and at the age of twenty-one he had a remarkably vigorous frame and was a pretty fair mechanic. He could easily have made his living at the carpenter's bench had not his superior intellect invited him to other pursuits.

In 1836 he commenced the study of law with the Hon. William Taylor, of Lexington. He obtained license to practice in 1839. While engaged in his legal studies he took an active part in politics, both as a speaker and as a writer for the political press. He contributed frequently to the columns of the Richmond Enquirer, then conducted by the veteran journalist, Thomas Ritchie. He also wrote for the Fincastle Democrat and other papers. The depth of his political convictions and the ardor of his nature made him a zealous and active party man. His political creed was based upon the famous Resolutions of 1798, as expounded and carried out by the strict construction Democratic statesmen of the Old Dominion. In 1839 he established the Valley Star, which he edited until December, 1840. During the exciting Presidential canvas of 1840 the paper teemed with able and effective editorials. It wielded great influence with the party in the Valley of Virginia, and contributed materially in imparting that solid strength to the Democracy of the "Tenth Legion" which has ever since enabled it to bid defiance to any and all opposition. It was not alone in the columns of his journal that he fought in that memorable campaign.

GOVERNOR LETCHER, OF VIRGINIA.

He took the stump. He addressed the people at numerous mass meetings, and wherever he appeared he excited great enthusiasm.

This battle being over, Mr. Letcher resumed the practice of law, and for three years he would not suffer himself to be drawn into politics. But as another Presidential canvas approached his party zeal would not permit him to remain inactive. Early in the spring of 1844 he again assumed the editorial control of the Valley Star, and threw his whole soul into the contest. The spirit with which he labored may be understood from the following extract from an editorial which he published upon learning of the nomination of Polk and Dallas:

"We call upon our Democratic associates to come up to an energetic and firm discharge of their duty. There must be no lukewarmness—no keeping back—but all must come forward with a spirit and decision that will be satisfied with nothing short of success—the most brilliant success. Let all feel that they have a great work to accomplish, and let them set about it at once and in earnest. Our principles are sound, and our nominees are eminently worthy of our individual support.

"So far as we are individually concerned, we feel that we have a high duty to discharge towards our party and our country, and if God spares us life and health it shall be faithfully discharged. Neither our pen nor our tongue shall be idle in this contest. All the time that we can command from our professional engagements shall be devoted to the dissemination of our principles. * * * We throw all our flag, encircled with the names of Polk and Dallas, to the wind—hand, and vow our determination to fight while there is a shot in the locker or a man left to tread the deck."

Mr. Letcher's exertions in this campaign not only equalled, but excelled his promises. The election over, he again vacated the editorial chair, and devoted himself to the law. In 1846 he served as Democratic Presidential Elector. In 1850 he was elected to the Convention which was called to revise the Constitution of Virginia. He took a leading part in the deliberations of that body. During the session of the Convention he acquired a high character as a debater and practical legislator. In 1851 he was elected to Congress, where by successive elections he served for eight years. In May, 1859, he was elected Governor of Virginia for four years. He was inaugurated at Richmond on the 1st of January, 1860.

SCENE AT THE CITY HALL PEACE PUMP NEAR THE FIVE POINTS, DURING THE STOPPAGE OF THE CROTON WATER.—SEE PAGE 74.

As a debater Mr. Letcher ranked high in Congress. He speaks with great fluency and readiness. He is always clear in his statements. His sentences are short and terse. His style is plain and simple. It is adapted to the comprehension of everybody who hears him. He never attempts rhetorical display, though his language is duly measured and strictly correct. His prepared speeches are elegant and scholarly. Altogether, he possesses superior powers of oratory. When he spoke in the House he commanded marked attention. In controversy he is noted for frankness and candor towards his adversary. He scorns petty quibbles, and never avails himself of anything little or trivial for the mere purpose of gaining an advantage in debate. In discussion he deals in facts and principles, and is willing to either stand or fall by them. His oratory is equally adapted to the bar, the legislative hall or the stump.

Mr. Letcher was chosen to succeed Governor Wise as Governor of Virginia, and was inaugurated in January of this year. His term expires on the 1st of January, 1863. His noble and constitutional conduct in the present juncture entitles him to the admiration of every lover of our glorious Union.

BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM

HAS again become the popular resort of
EVERY LOVER OF THE WONDERFUL, THE CURIOUS AND AMUSING,

And is now attracting more attention, and receiving more visitors than every other place of Amusement in New York. Everything novel, curious and and interesting is secured by Mr. Barnum, and presented to his visitors in addition to the 850,000 Curiosities from every part of the world, and the which take place every afternoon at 3 o'clock, and every evening at half-past 7, by a full and complete dramatic company. At present the two Living Aztec Children, the most curious, wonderful and interesting human beings the world has every produced; the Living What Is It? or Man Monkey; the two Albino Children; the Grand Aquaria; Monster Snakes; Living Happy Family, &c, &c., are all on exhibition, and yet the price of admission to the whole is only 25 cents. Children under 10 years 15 cents.

SPLENDID DRAMATIC ENTERTAINMENTS

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.
FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 22, 1860.

All Communications, Books for Review, &c, must be addressed to Frank Leslie, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	17 weeks	$ 1
One do.	1 year	$ 3
Two do.	1 year	$ 5
Or One Copy	2 years	$ 5
Three Copies	1 year	$ 6
Five do.	1 year	$10

And an extra Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, they giving us credit for being en rapport with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching information. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Foreign News.

The news by the Europa is very unimportant. Gaeta still holds out, although the Sardinians had driven back a sortie the garrison made with great slaughter.

Count Flahaut had been appointed Ambassador to London in place of Persigny, who was to receive an appointment near the Emperor. Much interest had been excited in Paris by the appearance of an Imperial decree granting certain concessions to the Legislative Assembly. They are more important than at first blush they appear:

"Desiring to afford to the great bodies of the State a more direct participation in the general policy of our Government, and a marked proof of our confidence, we decree that the Senate and the Corps Legislatif shall annually vote an address in reply to our speech at the opening of the Chambers. This address will be discussed in the presence of the Government Commissioners, who will give the necessary explanations on the interior and exterior policy of the empire. Regulatory measures will be taken in order to facilitate to the Corps Legislatif the expression of its opinions, and the publicity of its debates. During the session the Emperor will nominate Ministers without portfolios, in order to defend, conjointly with the Counsellors of State, the Government projects of law before the Chambers. This Ministry of the Emperor's household will be repressed, and its functions united with those of the Marshal of the Palace."

The King of the Belgians is seriously ill.

The King of Prussia is said to be dying.

Victor Emanuel has refused taking the title of King of Italy until proclaimed so by the Italian Parliament, which is to be immediately convoked.

From China we learn that the Allied forces of France and England are within eight miles of Pekin.

Mr. Bowlby, the Times correspondent; Mr. Luck, Secretary to Lord Elgin; Mr. Parkes, Messrs. De Norman and Anderson, of Fane's Horse, and Captain Brabazon, have been made prisoners whilst engaged in choosing camping grounds. They have been taken to Pekin, where they are well treated.

Engagements were fought on the 18th and 21st of September, at Chang-Kia-Waw and Jang Chan. On both occasions 30,000 Tartar cavalry advanced and were completely routed by the Allies. Two thousand Tartars were killed and fifty guns taken. The Allies had only eighteen wounded.

The Chinese have sent in a flag of truce, with the provisions for a treaty. Lord Elgin demands the release of the prisoners before negotiating.

The Emperor's brother has been appointed Chief Commissioner to make peace.

Fould, the French Minister of Finance, has resigned, and Walewski appointed in his place.

CONGRESSIONAL MATTERS.

On the 11th the Senate debated the Treasury Loan bill, and the resolutions moved by Mr. Powell of Kentucky.

In the House the plea of Mr. Hawkins to be excused on the committee was debated, but he was finally compelled to serve by a vote of 101 to 95. It also refused to excuse Mr. Boyce, of South Carolina, by a tie vote. Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, was also denied his application to be excused. On the 12th in the Senate the Treasury Loan bill was debated, and speeches were made by Hunter, Virginia, Anthony, Rhode Island, Hale, New Hampshire, Cameron, Pennsylvania, Fessenden, Maine, Seward, New York, Collamer, Vermont, and others. It was reduced to three millions and passed. Mr. Powell's resolutions were then taken up, and Mr. Wigfall made a very peculiar speech, which created so much merriment in the gallery that the chairman threatened to have it cleared if it occurred again.

In the House the various States were called upon for propositions relating to the present condition of the country, and the best means of averting the threatening calamity of disunion. Resolutions were submitted by Messrs. Thayer of Massachusetts, John Cochrane of New York, Adrain of New Jersey, Morris of Pennsylvania, Stewart of Maryland, Leake, Smith and Jenkins of Virginia, Cox, Hutchins, Sherman and Bingham of Ohio, Mallory and Stevenson of Kentucky, English, Kilgore, Holman and Davis of Indiana, McClernand of Illinois, Noell of Missouri, Hindman of Arkansas, and Larrabee of Wisconsin. The propositions were severally read and referred to the Union Committee. Mr. Bonham, of South Carolina, as he did not expect to remain long a member of Congress, asked to be excused from serving on the Military Committee. The request was complied with. A bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands by Mr. Thayer, which creates the land district of Dacotah, and provides for the admission of a delegate in Congress from that Territory. It was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and after some other unimportant business the House adjourned.

Borrioboola Gha.

We have more than once had occasion to revert severely to the carelessness in execution of the details of the law of our principal cities, and the lack of interest manifested by our Reformers in very important matters, while smaller issues absorb their attention. Reduced to plain facts, there are very few persons who would deny that a very great proportion of our public and private calamities are actually the result of what has been characterized as a case of—Borrioboola Gha.

Very lately a young epileptic lunatic, a very dangerous one, and one whose frequently repeated acts of offence should have apparently have subjected him to close supervision in some comfortable public institution, committed, as is alleged, a most atrocious murder. It would require but a limited perusal of any paper ostensibly devoted to the furtherance of the good cause, to learn that a small proportion of the benevolence applied to strangers would very soon alleviate and provide for such home objects of charity. Here was something very like—Borrioboola Gha.

During the past week a poor sailor, who had been assaulted and was at the time suffering under a cruel wound in the head, was picked up and thrust into a cell (under suspicion of intoxication), where he died. The carelessness implied in this account is horrible. Our readers will bear witness that we have more than once insisted, and that with no little earnestness, that a physician should continually be in attendance at every station-house, to examine all prisoners brought in in a state of insensibility. Deaths in cells under the most dreadful agony are continually occurring for want of such care. A small proportion of the effort annually applied to suffering which is as nothing when compared to this, would soon stop these deaths. Another case of—Borrioboola Gha.

We may venture to rise above such instances, and then taking a calm cosmopolite view of the troubles which now afflict our country, are impelled to the irresistible conclusion that if every county and every State in our Union had from the beginning simply attended to its own business, and done its utmost to relieve its own afflicted, and elevate its own sufferers, the discords which now rend us would not exist. If we had strictly attended to practical issues, and not delegated our whole business to professional polititicians, who thrive by public suffering, we should be doing well enough. But we must needs become fearfully and sensationally interested in matters of secondary importance, and—in short, we are suffering from a very agonizing and protracted case of—Borrioboola Gha.

Finally, we beg all our readers in this city and all in other cities, with regard to their own localities, to remember that winter is coming on, and that there will probably be more suffering among the poor than was ever before known. There are few localities at present where there is likely to be much poverty where there are not societies or individuals able to relieve the poor and deserving judiciously, and these Samaritans should be aided to the utmost. Reader, this is no hackneyed appeal—it is issued in the face of great coming misery, and of a knowledge of many terrible facts which are every day becoming more terrible. Suspend for the moment all exertion directed to merely extraneous objects, and devote your whole mind to charity at home. Had you been doing this years ago it would have been better for you. For this winter remember your own poor neighbors and forget—Borrioboola Gha.

EDITORIAL GLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS.

The Brutal Indifference which wealthy companies show towards those who unfortunately have claims upon them, more especially of an unpleasant nature, has long been a great reproach to the age. We have had recently a case brought to our notice, in which the Consolidated Stage Company are acting more like fiends than human beings. It appears that in October, 1858, Mr. Andrew Stevens was so seriously injured by the carelessness of one of the drivers of that company that he has been an invalid ever since, and quite unable to pursue his usual avocation. Unable to get any redress by a temperate appeal to their sense of justice, he was compelled to call upon the law to right him, but their wealth has enabled them to set him at defiance, and after more than two years he finds himself as far off as ever from obtaining any compensation for his injuries. If there is one thing more calculated than another to bring discredit upon that able, and, generally speaking, honorable body of men, the legal profession, it is lending their talents to such cruel proceedings as those which have been adopted by the Consolidated Stage Company towards Mr. Stevens. We trust that some of the honest shareholders will take the matter up, and compel the directors to act with some degree of decency.

We had last Week a practical proof of how sensitive luxury makes us, for a couple of days we were deprived of our Croton, and all New York went about like Rachel, refusing to be comforted! The Croton pipe was out of joint, and even the temperance men were obliged to make their tea with that apparent resemblance to their favorite liquid—whiskey. We had also a pleasant exemplification of how dependent upon water science makes us, since last week the steam engines refused to move a piston till they had their "staff of life," and the result was that we had to import a far inferior and drier water from Brooklyn to satisfy the craving demands of our thirsty boilors. Truly Pindar was right when he said, "Water is the first of elements." Apropos, it is somewhat remarkable that the opening word of the first Olympiad invents the steam engine—Ariston. James Watt has strutted in borrowed plumes too long—let him now resign them to the great Bard of Horse Jockeys.

Our Disposition to overdo everything is a great drawback. It is the natural effect of our inexperience. We have not yet settled down into nonchalance. The nil admirari is the balance wheel of the world. Directly a man admires he loses his self-respect. Judging from a letter dated Kanawaga, September 3, our reception of the Japanese officials was a diplomatic blunder. We quote verbatim from a letter written upon the interview our Consul Harris had with the Emperor of Japan:

"There was one feature of this audience worthy of note. Our Minister very properly alluded to the Embassy then in the States in a manner calculated to draw forth a response; but no, His Majesty deigned no allusion in reply, and at all times the Government maintain a marked reticence on this subject. What is this Embassy, made up of men bearing a bome rank about coequal with a New Jersey Governor, to the august Tycoon and the illustrious line of Kamis by birth and royal descent! The feeling is universal among Americans who have been in Japan the longest, and may be supposed to know something of the Japanese character, that Brother Jonathan, as usual, has overdone the matter. The Japanese, who love order and quiet in the first place, will be disgusted with the public show made of them, and being proud and arrogant as well, will consider the adulation bestowed upon them as so much tribute money paid to their great and powerful realm."

It is all very well for our Minister Ward to ride in a bandbox to Pekin, but an Armstrong gun is the only vocal instrument the Chinese or Japanese will listen to. We leave the Tribune and its correspondent to settle with New Jersey for comparing a No-Kami to a New Jersey Governor.

Gibbon says that a nation is lost when its statesmen quarrel openly for the national plunder. What would Gibbon say if he could read such papers as the Tribune, where official corruption is treated in this ingenuous manner:

"Ford, says the Tribune, has made only $12,000 on the House Printing, at 40 per cent reduction, while the Times' letter puts his profits in six months or so at $70,000, and Bowman's in the Senate at $40,000. One report mentions the purchase of Wendell's printing office at an expense of $130,000."

The Great Evil of this country is the existence of journals which live by pandering to a diseased vanity. Scrub, in the play, who believed every woman lived upon his winking at them when he went for his master's beer, is but a faint type to the writer of this very precious paragraph:

"John Bull thus far bears up courageously under the bad news from this side. The week's later advices by the Europa in our columns to-day scarcely realize the anticipation that his commercial and financial system would be struck with paralysis the moment the effect of the American distemper came in contact with it. On the contrary the bullion in the Bank, we are told, shows a handsome increase, and though money was very active, the old lady of Threadneedle street felt so comfortable that the rate of discount was reduced to 5½ per cent."

Poor little Gray, the poet, hoped that the sun would rise the day after his decease, and it probably did, but the idea that Europe was to have delirium tremens, paralysis, etcetera, because a few venal penny-a-liners wrote in a state of plenum Bacchi, or whiskey and water, is funny enough for the Budget of Fun.

Jobbery all round is the order of the day. It is officially announced that the Postmaster-General has commenced the distribution of the new ruled one cent stamped envelope, and that their price is $1 50 per hundred. Only half a cent a piece for the blank envelope! And as a consolation we have this impudent announcement: "The cheap edition of this envelope intended for general circulation will not be ready for several weeks!" Now, is not the Post Office intended for the general circulation?

PERSONAL.

Madame Dudevant, alias George Sand, is very ill.

Garibaldi's income, as a farmer, is about three hundred dollars a year—not enough to find an American in rum and tobacco.

Mr. Hope Scott, the last of the Abbotsford family, is about to marry the eldest daughter of the Duke of Norfolk. His first wife was Miss Lockhart, granddaughter to Sir Walter Scott.

Mr. Hudson, the Shakespeare lecturer, is about to give a series on the great poet, in New York, very shortly.

Cardinal Antonelli has advertised his palaces in Rome for sale. This looks like the well-bred dog who prepared to leave when he was about being kicked out.

It is beginning now to be the fashion to toast popular authors before they are dead. At the St. Nicholas Society, lately, the health of "The Dutch Republic and its Yankee Chronicler," was drank with great applause. Mr. Motley well deserves the compliment.

Professor Mason, of London, the editor of Macmillan's Magazine, has won the chief prize—a splendid silver cup, as the best shot in the London Scottish Volunteer Rifles.

Strakosch, with Patti, is at New Orleans, where the company will give concerts in costume.

Gazzaniga is in Lisbon.

Thalberg is in Vienna, but doing nothing professional.

Vestvali is making the tour of France, Holland and Belgium.

Clara Novello has taken her farewell of public life in a concert at St James's Hall, London.

Mr. Bachman, whose bird's-eye view of Hoboken was noticed in our last paper, has nearly completed a large and splendid view of the City of New York, from the Narrows. It gives as perfect an idea of our Empire City as though the spectator were in a balloon. The minute detail and general effect are really wonderful. We understand that it is Mr. Bachman's intention to daguerreotype several of our great cities in a similar manner.

On Wednesday last, the 12th inst., at Bridgeport, Conn., William Herral, Esq., son of the late Hon. H. K. Harral, of Conn., and nephew of the Hon. W. Wright, U. S. Senator of New Jersey, was married to Miss Jennie A. Wells, daughter of George Wells, Esq. The marriage ceremony was celebrated by the Rev. Mr. Bancroft, at the house of the bride's father at Bridgeport, and was attended by nearly three hundred of the first citizens of the place, including a great number of beautiful young ladies, the former companions of the charming young bride. The light of day was entirely excluded from every room in the house, and gas—a recent introduction in that section of the country—was substituted. The flashing lights, the gay dresses and the animated faces of the happy guests made up a scene of exceeding brilliancy not soon to be forgotten. The marriage ceremony took place at 12 A. M., immediately after which dancing commenced and was kept up with great spirit until the time approached when the happy couple were to take their departure for the South, where they purpose to spend their honeymoon.

A splendid dejeuner à la fourchette, prepared by William Hall, was partaken of and duly appreciated by the guests, and a rare spirit of harmony and happiness prevailed. The numerous friends of the bride, not content with bidding her good-bye at her residence, followed her to the depot, determined to have the last look, the last kiss, and the last grasp of the hand. So the bride and bridegroom left amid regretful adieus, but cheered by fervent wishes for their continued happiness and prosperity through the voyage of life which had so auspiciously commenced that day. To all of which we say—amen.

William Vincent Wallace, the eminent composer, has been very unwell in Germany, but was convalescent by the last accounts.

The star of Edward Lodor, one of the finest of English composers, is in the ascendant. His opera of "The Night Dancers" is quite the rage of the season.

Tuesday evening witnessed the reunion of a number of lovers of art at the old Dusseldorf Gallery, No. 548 Broadway, where a number of exquisite works of American art has been assembled. When we say that this collection embraces Page's "Moses on Mount Horeb," a five years' work and his greatest; Aker's "Dead Pearl Diver;" Colonel Thorpe's "Niagara as it is;" Barbee's "Fisher Girl," and Rossiter's three great paintings of "Miriam," "Noah," and "Jeremiah," we have said enough to show that not only critics and connoisseurs, but also the public will find this one of the most attractive exhibitions ever opened in New York.

LITERATURE.

Ticknor & Fields have issued, in very admirable style, a most interesting book called The Heroes of Europe, from A. D. 700 to A. D. 1700, by Henry G. Hewlett. The idea of the book was evidently suggested by a line from Emerson's Essays on Self-Reliance, "All history resolves itself very easily into the biography of a few stout and earnest persons." In carrying out that remark Mr. Hewlett has selected the leading spirits, the representative men, the mainsprings of the great results of the times in which they lived, and has sketched them with a graphic and forcible pen. The book is finely illustrated.

Tom Brown at Oxford, one of the most charming and natural stories of the day, which Ticknor & Fields are publishing in monthly parts, has reached the end of the first volume, and can now be had in collected form. It is a sequel to "School Days at Rugby," which met with a remarkable and well-deserved success, and promises to be as vividly life-like and fully as popular.

Charles Scribner's beautiful blue and gold edition of the collected Poems of General George P. Morris has proved one of the most remarkable literary successes of the age. It has been issued barely three months, and sixteen editions have already been sold out. The seventeenth edition is now ready, and like the others will most probably be speedily exhausted. For a Christmas and New Year's present there is no volume more elegant and appropriate.

Rudd & Carleton have just published another charming novel by Ruffini, the author of "Doctor Antonio," one of the most natural and deeply interesting works of fiction of the present day. It is called Lavinia. The scene is laid chiefly in Rome, the hero being a young Italian artist, and the heroine a beautiful English girl. The plot is ingeniously contrived and the interest is sustained with rare tact until the concluding chapter. It is not only replete with deep human interest, but its views of art, which are incidental and never obtruded, are thorough and valuable, and raise it high above the standard of the ordinary novel. Such works as Lavinia are of the very best class of light literature; they aim to elevate and amuse while they instruct, and may be placed with safety and advantage in the hands of every one. We ourselves look forward with pleasure to the appearance of a new work by Ruffini.

MUSIC.

Italian Opera—Fourteenth Street.—The united artists (our readers will forgive the paradox suggested by "united" and "artists"); the combined artists, then, who have assumed the management of that ruinous concern, the Academy of Music, have met with fair success the past week. On Monday evening, the opera of "Stradella" was given, with Fabbri, Stigelli, Quinto and Formes. The house, in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, was rather poor, but the performance was highly satisfactory.

On Wednesday evening the opera of "La Fille du Regiment" was given, the same artists fulfilling the leading characters most excellently to a large and paying audience.

"Le Prophète" is to be the next opera, and if the weather only holds good, we have no doubt but that fine opera will attract several crowded audiences. The public should give a cordial support to the present organization, for a very moderate patronage will insure us two or three months of very excellent operatic performances. Let the lovers of music turn out in their strength.

Madame Anna Bishop performed "Lucrezia Borgia," in Philadelphia, last Monday evening. The weather was wretched, but quite a large and enthusiastic audience attended to greet their popular favorite. She made a great hit, the Philadelphia press was unanimous in cordial praise of her performance, and but for the disorganization of the company, which has met with indifferent success, she would have had a brilliant though brief season, and a renewal of her old triumphs.

It is rumored that offers have been made to Madame Bishop to sustain the leading characters in an English opera about to be organized for Niblo's Garden. If operas can be well produced, with Madame Bishop as leading artist, we believe that the enterprise would meet with great favor, and prove a success.

DRAMA.

Mr. Forrest as Macbeth.—Want of time prevented us in our last issue giving due consideration to Mr. Forrest's delineation of Macbeth. We desired, also, to satisfy ourself of the propriety or impropriety of the innovations introduced into the tragedy by the great tragedian. On this latter subject we candidly confess that we are directly at issue with Mr. Forrest, and we are utterly at a loss to conceive why he should so needlessly and unwarrantably tamper with the master's text as he has done, in substituting Fates for the original witches. Not only does this alteration directly conflict with many portions of the text, but destroys, likewise, the weird character of the play. The appearance of the three grim and hideous witches on the blasted heath is not only in keeping with the old Scotch traditions, but lends a terror to the scene, wholly wanting, when, instead of them, are presented three pleasant-looking ladies, gotten up as if for a masquerade. We miss, indeed, the "choppy fingers and skinny lips," the bearded faces, gray locks and misshapen forms, clothed in withered and wild attire, and cannot consent to accept, instead, the three fair-faced ladies, gorgeous in garments of blue and white, and covered with cabalistic signs. We are well aware that this is the idea of the great German critics concerning Shakespeare's witches, but by what right does Mr. Forrest elevate Schiller above the greatest poet the world ever heard? Apart from this unfortunate innovation, "Macbeth" has been most satisfactorily produced, not, perhaps, with that lavish care that was bestowed upon it some years since at the Broadway Theatre, but still most creditably to all concerned. Touching Mr. Forrest's impersonation of the weak-minded Thane of Glamis, criticism is at a standstill—as, in fact, it is, as regards every character represented by this great man. All the resources of a powerful intellect, guided by unremitting study and nearly faultless judgment, have been brought to bear upon his conception and delineation of Macbeth. You read in his face, as in a glass, the workings of the weak mind and weaker heart in their vain struggle with the little good his soul contains; and when, the murder accomplished, the guilty Thane rushes from the awful sight, an impression is produced upon the audience such as no actor that ever lived, save Mr. Forrest, could evoke. Truly his Macbeth may be considered the very crowning triumph of art. Here is a part with which the actor can have no sympathy, a weak-minded, bad hearted, purposeless tyrant, and yet Mr Forrest makes him stand before us a vivid and startling reality. From the first scene to the last a picture is presented perfect to the most minute detail, broad, grand, sublime in its conception, yet presented with pre-Raphaelite minuteness. The tragedy is generally well acted; Mr Conway making an excellent Macduff, and Mr. Fisher a good Banquo; while Mrs. Pouisi, as Lady Macbeth, is entitled to the praise of being the very best representative of the part on the American stage.

Barnum's Museum.—The greatest of all attractions is now starring at the American Museum, for Mr. Barnum is himself reciting the history of that renowned institution. Apart from the interest attaching to Mr. Barnum personally, his discourse is of the most amusing character—indeed, it is special of its kind and full of instruction. The opera of "Masaniello" is also given every evening with excellent effect. Barnum is not only the irrepressible, but the inimitable.

AVERSIONS.

Erasmus, though a native of Rotterdam, had such an aversion to fish that the smell of it threw him into a fever. Ambrose Paré mentions a gentleman who never could see an eel without fainting. There was an account of another who would fall into convulsions at the sight of a carp. A lady of France always fainted on seeing boiled lobsters. There are many who faint from the smell of roses, though other flowers are agreeable.

Joseph Scaliger and Peter Abono never could drink milk. Cardan was particularly disgusted at the sight of eggs. Uladislaus, king of Poland, could not bear to see apples. If an apple was shown to Chesno, secretary to Francis I., he bled at the nose. A gentleman in the court of the Emperor Ferdinand would bleed at the nose on hearing the mewing of a cat, however great the distance might be from him. Henry III., of France, could never sit in a room with a cat. The Duke of Schomburg had the same aversion.

M. Vangheim, a great huntsman in Hanover, would faint, or, if he had sufficient time, would run away at the sight of a roasted pig. John Rol, a gentleman in Alcantara, would swoon on hearing the word lana, wool, although his cloak was woollen. The philosophical Boyle could not conquer a strong aversion to the sound of water running through a pipe. La Mothe le Vayer could not endure the sound of musical instruments, though he experienced a lively pleasure whenever it thundered.

The famous crystal throne which Shah Jehan counted amongst the most valuable of the splendid trophies which adorned his palace, has been sent to England in the Saladin. But little is known of its history prior to its having come into his possession. Subsequently, on the taking of Delhi by the Mahrattas, they made a great effort to destroy it by fire, but succeeded only in injuring its appearance, the heat to which it was subjected having caused it to crack and open out in seams. It consists of a single mass of rock crystal, two feet in height by four in diameter, and is shaped like a sofa cushion, with tassels at the corner.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Zouaves of Bridgetown, N. J., have thrown the Zouaves of Chicago and New York into the shade. The Bridgetown Zouaves have formed themselves into a company for the purpose of sawing and splitting wood for destitute families the ensuing winter. With wood-saw, astride of horse, and axe in hand, they proceed to a wood, chop down and saw up a tree in an incredible short time, and make the heart of the widow and fatherless rejoice by filling the cellar with logs. We advise Mr. Parisen to train his New York Zouaves in a like fashion. Such men as the Bridgetown Zouaves are Christian soldiers, and are entitled to smoke their pipes, since they enable the poor widow to make her chimney.

One of the greatest and most beneficent inventions we have heard of is the brick and mortar elevator. It is intended to supersede the labors of hod-carriers, a class of men who are often worked to death in a broiling sun. The machinery is this: An endless chain, formed of iron hooks, passes around two pulleys, one on the ground and the other on the top of the wall. The pulleys have spurs, which take into holes in the belt to prevent slipping, and the upper pulley is furnished with a crank for turning it. Hoppers are secured on the upper side of the belt for receiving the brick and as the wall rises the belt is lengthened by the insertion of additional links, which are furnished with hooks, so that this may be readily done. We consider this a decided advance on the age, although we doubt not some stupid Paddy will consider it an invasion of his time-honored right of breaking his neck from the scaffold.

Hoffman, the murderer of Mrs. Shumaker and her child, has been pronounced insane by two medical men. He will therefore be confined in a lunatic asylum the remainder of his life, instead of being hanged.

The Burch divorce case has come to an end for the present by the jury finding a verdict for Mrs. Burch. Seldom has a man more completely absorbed public contempt than this pious banker. When the verdict was announced the spectators expressed great approbation. Next to Burch the public indignation rests heaviest on the pastor, who played the part of Judas Iscariot, and betrayed Mrs. Burch's confidential communication. Let us hope he got his thirty pieces of silver. Miss Fannie Burch and the aunt to the pious banker are not remarkable for their nobility of character. Altogether the trial is not a cheering instance of domestic life.

The chief events of the past week have been the bursting of the Croton pipes and the appalling murder in Twelfth street. These we have described and illustrated in another part of our paper.

Divorces are so plentiful that it would appear as though marriage was becoming a fixed failure as well as a fact. Seventy-three now stand on the docket of the court in Middlesex county, Mass.

A servant to Mr. Martin, Springfield, named Maria Marton, has been detected in stealing from her master's house in the evening, when all were in bed, and breaking the windows with large stones. She says she was tempted to this wholesale destruction of glass by the devil.

Ramon Pico, of San Francisco, recently made a wager that he would ride one hundred and fifty miles in six hours and thirty minutes. He accomplished this remarkable feat with twenty-two minutes to spare. He used thirty-three horses.

Three years ago a most valuable officer, named Sawyer, was killed in a low groggery near Carmine and Bleecker streets, while endeavoring to quell a disturbance. A man named Martin Connor was arrested at the time on suspicion, but the evidence being insufficient he was acquitted, although no reasonable doubt was entertained that he was the murderer. Last week this said Connor was arrested for brutally beating his wife, and died of delirium tremens while in the station-house awaiting his examination. The rum-holes of New York have much to answer for. The poet's line to the Tower of London, "By many a foul and midnight murder fed," well applies to the groggeries of Gotham.

The police of New Orleans are very particular. A respectable young man, named Sherman, who had only just arrived in the Crescent City, was arrested the other day for asking his way to a certain hotel. It appears that he was speaking to a notorious thief. How strange they did not arrest the notorious thief!

Mr. Graham, a lively young painter, possibly an artist, went the other night to pass a social hour with a Mr. Jameson, of Forty-second street and Second avenue. The painter grew so facetious at last that, watching a jocular opportunity, he took his host's watch, chain and seals. When arrested for his comicality he declared it was his way of joking. The magistrate made him find bail for $1,000, which he said was his way of joking. Jameson had better read the comic papers than invite their contributors.

Professor Blake is a showman in a small way of business, and keeps his anacondas and "other animals," amphibious, cephalic and hydrocephalous, at No. 9 Chatham square. He has a fife and drum to play "Jordan's a hard Road to Travel," "Dixie's Land" and "Yankee Doodle." Now and then he pokes up the lion, who roars, and the bear, who growls. Now, Mr. Utler, editor of the Seventh Day Snarler, has an utter abomination of any noise but what he makes, and therefore had the poor showman arrested. The Mayor ordered the professor to seek a home elsewhere for his motherless boa constrictors and fatherless anacondas.

FOREIGN NEWS AND GOSSIP.

Mr. Jacobson, a wealthy Jew of London, has lately been trying to avoid the toll near his country residence, and suffered in consequence, for instead of having to pay six cents, the legal fare, he was adjudged to pay thirty shillings, or equal to about seven dollars. His manner was very ingenious, but as it proved highly unsuccessful. He had taken a wagon to be repaired, and had been to fetch it, bringing it at the tail of another carriage. When he got near the toll-gate he got down, unfastened the other vehicle, and then drove through the gate. He then returned, drew the mended wagon through himself, and having hitched it on drove off. For this he was sued, and had to pay. With true Hebrew cunning, he thought that, as the Act of Parliament read, "For every vehicle drawn by a horse, ass, mule, &c., sixpence," he would escape. He evidently forgot that he was an ass for the nonce, and therefore had to pay.

It is very seldom that golden weddings happen in royal circles, but there are now and then exceptions. The Prince of Hesse and the Princess Charlotte, aunt to the King of Denmark, have just celebrated their fiftieth wedding day. There was a very happy gathering at Copenhagen.

Mullins, the presumed murderer of Mrs. Emsley, was executed on the 15th at Newgate. It will be recollected that he falsely accused a man named Emms of the deed, and placed some of the stolen property in a brickfield near his house; but as old Chaucer says, murder will out, and Mullins was detected. He made a long rambling confession the night before his execution, in which he denied that he was the actual murderer, but at the same time he expressed his firm belief that Emms was innocent of the crime. This is tantamount to an acknowledgment that he committed it. Even this tardy act of justice to the poor man he had so infamously accused was only wrung out of him by the interference of the Catholic priest to whom he confessed, and of course to which faith he belonged.

The Road murder is still agitating the public mind of England from the Queen to the costermonger. This is a very praiseworthy feature in the British character. A murder is not with them as it is with us a nine days' wonder, but a problem to be solved, and with a few exceptions it is solved. Eliza Grimwood is an exception to the rule there—here the rule is the exception. There seems to be a settled conviction in the public mind that the poor child was murdered by the nurse, Eliza Gough, because he had told his mother that he had seen familiarities between Eliza and Mr. Kent, but this seems improbable, as the child was only four years old, and not likely to be struck with events that would strike an older child. There is no doubt the mystery is a great provocative to the public appetite. It was so cruel—so heartless—indeed, so unnatural a murder, that, whoever is the culprit, every one must pray for the discovery and severe punishment. As it rests now, there is a vague suspicion resting on the entire household, but which of them it is remains to be discovered.

Our enterprising countryman, G. F. Train, is carrying on with his usual vigor the horse railroads in England. The Town Commissioners of Birkenhead have granted him permission to carry his railroad from Birkenhead to Palm Grove and Axton.

The Empress of Austria embarked at Antwerp on board the Queen of England's steam yacht the Victoria and Albert, and her suite on board the Osborne. They then steamed for Plymouth, where they were received with royal honors. They immediately steamed thence for Madeira, where the Empress will remain till April. It is said that she is wasting away.

The Paris and London journals report that negotiations, under the auspices of France and England, are actually progressing for the sale of Venetia to Victor Emanuel. Count Kisselef, Russian Minister, Thouvenel, French Minister, and the Austrian Ambassador, Metternich, have already had one or two meetings on the subject. England and France have offered to guarantee the amount to Austria.

The Empress Eugenie has received a kind of semi ovation from the Scotch. She has been waylaid by Provosts, who have inflicted short addresses upon her, most of them reminding her that she was a Kirkpatrick. Blood is certainly thicker than water, but with the Celts it is a disease. What can be more absurd than for the Irish to claim the Duke of Magenta as an Irishman, because his great great great great-grandfather had a Mac before his name? The Empress, however, has borne the cacoethes with exemplary patience. It is rumored that after her tour in Scotland she will meet her august lord and master, L. N., at Windsor Castle.

Highland Haymaking.—Rory More M'Kerrall was a bit of a wag, and altogether a screw in the charging department. He was landlord of the Argyle Hotel, Inverary, and once upon a time he was bickering with an Englishman in the lobby of the inn regarding the bill. The stranger said it was a gross imposition, he could live cheaper in the best hotel in London; to which Rory, with unwonted nonchalance, replied:

"O, nae doot, sir, nae doot ava. But do you ken the reason?"

"No, not a bit of it," said the stranger, hastily.

"Weel, then," replied the host, "as ye seem to be a gay, sensible callant, I'll tell ye. There's three hundred and sixty-five days in the London hotel-keeper's calendar, but we have only three months in ours. Do ye understand me noo, frien'? We maun make hay in the Highlands when the sun shines, for it's unco seldom she dis't."

MICROSCOPES FOR THE MILLION.

There is a man who sometimes stands in Leicester Square, London, who sells microscopes at a penny each. They are made of a common pill box, the bottom taken out and a piece of window glass substituted. A small eye-hole is bored in the lid, and therein is placed the lens, the whole apparatus being painted black. Upon looking through one of these microscopes, I was surprised to find hundreds of creatures apparently the size of earth worms swimming about in all directions; yet on the object glass nothing could be seen but a speck of flour and water, conveyed there on the end of a lucifer match from a common inkstand, which was nearly full of this vivified paste.

Another microscope exhibited a single representative of the animal kingdom, showing his impatience of imprisonment by kicking vigorously. Though I must confess to a shudder, I could not help admiring the beauties of construction in this little monster, which if at liberty would have excited murderous feelings unfavorable to the prolongation of his existence. The sharp pointed mouth with which he works his diggings, his side claws wherewith to hold on while at work, and his little heart pulsating slowly but forcibly, and sending a stream of blood down the large vessel in the centre of his white and transparent body, could also be seen and wondered at.

When the stock of this sort of game runs out, a common carrot seed is substituted, which when looked at through a magnifier is marvellously like an animal having a thick body and numerous legs projecting from the sides, so like an animal that it has been mistaken by an enthusiastic philosopher for an animal created in or by a chemical mixture in conjunction with electricity.

I bought several of these microscopes, determined to find out how all this could be done for a penny. An eminent microscopist examined them, and found that the magnifying power was twenty diameters. The cost of the lens made of glass of such a power would be from three to four shillings. How then could the apparatus be made for a single penny?

A penknife revealed the mystery. The pillbox was cut in two, and then it appeared that the lens was made of Canada balsam, a transparent gum. The balsam had been heated and carefully dropped into the eye-hole of the pillbox. It then assumed the proper size, shape, transparency and polish of a very well ground glass lens. Our ingenious lens maker informed me that he had been selling these microscopes for fifteen years, and he and his family conjointly made them. One child cut out the pillboxes, another the gap, another put them together, his wife painted them black and he made the lenses.

GARIBALDI AND VICTOR EMANUEL.

Garibaldi is not only romantic in all his acts, but he makes even Kings romantic. The Turin papers relate a little incident, which is so very pleasant that we cannot forbear recording it. As it appears in the Sardinian official journal, there is no reason to doubt its truth.

When Garibaldi arrived at his island home, Caprera (so called for the number of its goats), he was surprised at the altered appearance of all things around him. His rude farm house, hardly better than a log hut, or a Dutch hill shanty, was converted into an elegant villa. Trees and shrubs had been planted, and the farm placed in excellent order. Fences had been repaired, and walls built. Indeed, had the wand of an enchanter been waved over it, the change could not have been more startling.

When he entered his home he was equally astonished. Every room was appropriately furnished, and in the chief apartment was an excellent portrait of the King, suspended to the wall, with this gratifying inscription under it: "From Victor Emanuel to his friend Garibaldi." The Isle of Caprera, now of historical interest, is on the north-eastern coast of Sardinia, in the straits of Bonifacio, and is about eleven miles long, and two to three miles broad. It is somewhat shaped like the island on which the city of New York stands. It is very fertile.

Garibaldi, in his parting address, announced his intention of returning in March, to Italy, when he should want a million of men to complete the work he had commenced; but if diplomacy induces the Austrian Government to sell Venetia, there will be no occasion for his intended campaign.

The Two Maps.—I will relate an anecdote connected with this projected edifice (the residence of Hyderabad) that will satisfy you that the Princes of the East do not lose much of their valuable time in the study of geography. Major Kirkpatrick, the Resident at this country, wished to obtain a grant of two or three fields to erect a structure upon. He requested the engineer of the English force stationed at Hyderabad to make an exact survey of the spot, and when this was finished upon a large sheet he carried it to the Durbar, and showing it to the Nizam, requested he would give the English Government a grant of the ground. The Prince, after gravely examining the survey, said he was sorry he could not comply with the request. When the Resident was retiring, not a little disconcerted at the refusal of a favor which he deemed so trifling, Meer Allum (the Minister) said to him with a smile, "Do not be annoyed. You frightened the Nizam with the size of the plan you showed him. Your fields were almost as large any of the maps of the kingdom he had yet seen. No wonder," said the Meer, laughing, "he did not like to make such a cession. Make a survey upon a reduced scale, and the difficulty will vanish." The Resident could hardly believe this would be the case. But when, at his interview, he presented the same survey upon a small card, the ready and cheerful assent of the Prince satisfied him that the Meer had been quite correct in his guess at the cause of his former failure.

The conviction expressed by the Emperor of the French, of the re-establishment of the Empress after the departure of her mother, has proved correct. Her Majesty is regaining strength and spirits every day. The only trace of the immense grief she has experienced is visible in the loss of her hair, which it has been found necessary to cut, in order to save its length and color. Her Majesty will henceforward adopt the coiffure so much worn in Paris for the last few months, and called a la chien, from its resemblance to poodle curls, which come down over the eyes and high up over the ears. Although this coiffure has not taken with the aristocracy, the patronage of Her Majesty will, of course, give it distinction.

Shocking Occurrence.—The trip of the Stourport volunteers to the Gloucester review was initiated by a shocking accident, which caused the death of a man named Felton. A small cannon on board the barge containing the volunteers was fired at the moment of starting. The vessel rocked a little as it was tugged off from the bank of the river, and this motion of the vessel raised the mouth of the gun in such a way that, instead of the hard wadding with which it was rammed being stopped by the side of the river, it unfortunately passed above where a large concourse of people were assembled. The charge caught a man named Felton, and took off the upper part of his head, bespattering his brains and blood over the horrified spectators of this unexpected disaster. Felton leaves a wife and two children.

A Royal Anecdote.—A certain royal lady is blest with one child of more wonderful seriousness and solidity of mind than all the other little princes and princesses put together. This scion of the House of Brunswick once asked Prince Albert what was the meaning of the words Cherubim and Seraphim, which occur in the Holy Scriptures and the Service of the Church. The answer returned was, Cherubim is a Hebrew word signifying "Knowledge;" Seraphim is another word of the same language, signifying "Flame," from whence it is inferred that Cherubim are orders of celestial beings excelling in knowledge; the Seraphim are celestial likewise, excelling in Divine affection. The child replied, "I hope that when I die, sire, I shall be one of the Seraphim, for I had rather love God than know all things."

A Gentleman in Paris is stated to have discovered a method not only of producing gold, but a metal even more valuable than that precious substance. A committee has been appointed by the Academy, and another by the Government, to ascertain whether the inventor is a savant or a lunatic.

VIEW IN STATE SQUARE, NORTH SIDE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY F. BUTLER, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

THE CITY OF SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.

THIS rising and prosperous city is naturally the centre of the greatest agricultural country in the world, and year after year the earth is pouring into the lap of the farmer its rich and abundant treasures, and from the force of present circumstances, the great political interests, not only of the State but of the Union, now concentrate here, and give it a position of extraordinary importance. The climate is singularly healthful, and the location very beautiful.

The city of Springfield was originally called "Calhoun." The first "plat" of the city was recorded under that name in 1823, and it received its present name on further additions being recorded in December, 1825. Its first organization as a town took place on the 2d of April, 1832, and this event seemed to give a concentration to business thought, for the town grew rapidly in size, population and commercial activity.

On the 20th of April, 1840, the inhabitants adopted a charter, granted by the Legislature, and Springfield became a city. In 1850 the number of inhabitants numbered five thousand one hundred and six; at the present moment, it numbers between ten and twelve thousand, so that Springfield has doubled its population in the term of ten years.

Its first settlement was some time previous to 1820 (the exact date not known), by a family of the name of Kelly, which settled in what is now the west part of the city. They were the first white inhabitants that disturbed the Indian in his peaceful possession. The first house was built by John Kelly, and was situated on the same spot where now stands the old frame dwelling, known as the Garret House. Another one of the Kellys built close to the spot where now stands the residence of Mrs. Trotter, and the third reared his humble cabin close to, if not upon, the identical place where Archer G. Herndon, Esq., now resides. The second family, if we are correctly informed, came here in the spring of 1820, and settled in that part of the city known by the old inhabitants as Newsomville, situated a little south and east of Hutchison's Burying Ground. Their names were Duggett. No other settlements were made in, or immediately around, what is now Springfield, until the spring of 1821, when several families were added to the infant colony.

All the original houses were simply log cabins, and years went by before such a thing was known as a frame house. The first brick house built still stands. It was built by John Taylor as a store-house. It is the little brick situated at the south side of Jefferson street, a little west of the residence of William Carpenter, Esq.

Springfield originally consisted of a little cluster of log cabins, situated in the neighborhood of the gas works. It was a long time before the town made any progress in the direction where the principal part of the city now is.

It may seem strange that Springfield ever had a rival for the county seat; yet, nevertheless, she had a very formidable opponent—one that contested the matter with her most bravely—one who, for a long time, counted sure upon victory; but, alas, for that rival now!—there is nothing left but its name, and that name is Sangamon. If we are correctly informed, not a single house is left in Sangamon town to tell the sad history of its disappointed hopes—its desolation and decay.

The first tavern that Springfield could boast was kept by a person named Price. It was situated on the place where now stands the residence of Charles Lorch. It was an old-fashioned, two-story log house. We sometimes hear the over-fastidious complaining of the present hotel accommodations. All such should have spent a week at Price's Tavern, and we predict that they would grumble never again.

VIEW IN STATE SQUARE, WEST SIDE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY F. BUTLER, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

VIEW IN STATE SQUARE, EAST SIDE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY P. BUTLER, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

The first tavern of any pretension was the old Indian Queen Hotel built by a prominent citizen, A. G. Herndon. It was the same house subsequently enlarged and improved by Joel Johnson, and was burnt to the ground several year, ago.

The first store for the sale of dry goods in Springfield was opend and kept by Elijo Iales. It was situated upon the same ground now occupied by the residence of the well-known citizen, John Hay.

In 1837 the seat of Government for the State was removed from Vandalia to Springfield, and the first session of the Legislature here was in the winter of 1839 and 1840. The Senate held its session in the Old Methodist Church, and the House of Representatives met in the Second Presbyterian Church.

The city of Springfield, at the present day, presents a handsome appearance. The streets are well planned and wide and straight: and the public square called State Square, which we illustrate, in the middle of which is situated the State House is e noble expense and e great business centre. Springfield contains many fine buildings—banks churches, hotels, &c., all giving unquestionable evidence of commercial prosperity and substantial wealth. The completion of the Chicago Alton and St. Louis Railroad was of great importance to Springfield, developing its resources and opening up to it the thousand beneficent influences which always follow the course of the great civilizing agent of the age—the railway. Other railways are contemplated and seem to be demanded by the rapidly increasing importance of Springfield, the capital of the great State of Illinois.

YANKEE GREEN "Um.—" Sonny, where's your father?"
" Father's dead, sir."
" Have you got any mother?"
" Yes, I had one, but she got married to Joe Dunkin, and don't be wot mother any more, cause she says she's got enough to do to tend to his own young 'uns."
" Smart boy! here's a penny for you.
" That's yo sir; it's the way I got my start.'
" How?
" Why by sellin' big yarns to green 'uns like you, at a penny a piece."

ERLE GOWER;

OR THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Santa in the Grass, &c., &c., &c.

CHAPTER XI.—CONTINUED.

"I am no wiser," he replied. "It is true I have heard you speak of him at times though always in an indicate, obscure sort of a way, as though you knew nor in what relation he stood to you."

"I do not possess his confidence respecting his earlier history, nor my own origin," she rejoined, in a melancholy tone. "I have often wished to learn what friends I have in the great living, moving world beyond the forest, but when I have asked him, then he has always answered me emphatically, 'None! But then, Cyril he knew not you."

VIEW IN STATE SQUARE, SOUTH SIDE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY P. BUTLER, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

"You never mentioned to him our meeting in the forest?" he said, gazing earnestly at her.

A rosy blush flushed her cheek. She knew not why; but she turned her clear, lustrous eyes fondly upon him and said,

"No, Cyril, you were my treasure kept within the secret recesses of my own heart. I wished no other tongue to breathe your name to my ear; no other eyes than mine to gaze upon you. I, in secret, rejoiced that I alone had the luxury of longing to meet you; of dwelling in rich, excelling happiness, on the felicity of those meetings when they were past. No, Cyril, I treasured you in my mind, my heart; but I did not reveal your existence to the only other being with whom I held communion."

"Dear Violet," he ejaculated, fondly; and then added, with a slightly perplexed air, "yet tell me, Violet, how came he to utter such harsh, unkind truths of me, if he know not that we had met."

"You remember yesterday how Tubal Kish rushed suddenly upon us from a thicket," she answered, quickly, "how he frightened me into a swoon, and that you bore me hither, while one, who seemed young and noble, like you, kept Tubal at bay?"

"I shall not lightly forget the occurrence, nor the brute who occasioned it," responded Cyril.

"On the appearance of the gamekeepers, who were in search of you, Tubal fled," she continued. "To-day he sought Ishmael, and he told him that he had seen me wandering with you through the secluded parts of the Chace, and that he had tried to separate us, but that he had been driven off. I have never seen Ishmael so fearfully convulsed or excited as when, having heard this, he taxed me with knowing you, and with secretly meeting you. In a very whirlwind of frenzy he questioned me, menaced me, terrified me, until he had extorted from me all my long-treasured secret, and then he lavished on you such bitter words; he spoke of you as one who designed to destroy me, and wished me to offer up, there, in his presence, a vow to the Almighty that I would never meet you more, in order that I might not live to curse you. He bewildered and frightened me; he declared you to be a cool, designing villain, whose love for me was a mockery, who regarded me as a toy to be trifled with for a moment, and then to be cast away, broken, shattered, destroyed. Oh, Cyril, those were cruel things to say of you, and I, at last, put my fingers in my ears, and fled from him, here—even here to summon you—that you might, as you have done, assure me that your heart was really as true and noble as it has always seemed to be."

Cyril, who had listened in silence and with deep, pained attention, now raised his eyes and gazed upon her young and lovely face, so trusting and confiding in its expression.

"I will be ever loyal to you, Violet, whatever the cost or the sacrifice, believe that," he said, with emphatic earnestness, and then added, "I must see this Ishmael, of whom you speak, Violet. Where is he to be found?"

"Here!" cried a loud voice, at the entrance of the alcove.

Violet uttered a shriek, and clung to the arm of Cyril.

"Ishmael!" she ejaculated, in a tone of affright.

"Fear not," exclaimed Cyril, reassuringly. Taking her by the hand, he led her up to where the tall, dark figure threw its shadow on the floor of dead leaves. Confronting the intruder with a firm and dignified aspect, he said,

"I would speak with you."

"Violet," exclaimed the intruder, in a loud, harsh, stern voice, "fling away with scorn that hand which dishonors you by its touch, and return to me while yet my arms may open to receive you within them and shelter you."

"Ishmael, indeed you wrong Cyril," she murmured, in a trembling voice.

"Silence, and obey me," he exclaimed, in a voice of thunder.

"She shall not need to obey a behest uttered in terms so unjustly and wickedly false," responded Cyril, releasing her hand. "I resign her to your charge, sir, because it is you, so she has told me, who has reared her, and that you have been kind to her, even though stern. But, man, remember too, that I resign her as spotless, as innocent, as pure as when you first beheld her an infant."

"And as free-hearted," bitterly subjoined Ishmael, for here stood the man who had introduced Erle Gower to Lord Kingswood.

Cyril started, but almost immediately replied,

"I think—I hope not."

Ishmael bent his brow and grated his teeth.

"Do you think, boy!" he cried, fiercely; "have you thought, when you with smooth words have wooed this simple maiden and won her heart ere she could know the inestimable value of the prize she has surrendered, and for what? Bad as your blood is, you have not thought, when, with more poisonous venom than a scorpion, you have seemed bright and fair, and charming to the eye, only that your sting might be the more deadly."

"I fling your base accusations in your teeth, man," returned Cyril, indignantly. "I met Violet in the woods long since, by accident, when we were yet boy and girl; our acquaintance is not of yesterday's making; our affection not merely of an hour's growth. For years, I tell you, have we associated, if in love, I swear by Heaven, in the very purest innocence. I invoke the wrath of the Supreme Creator upon me and my future actions, if I ever conceived an idea in connection with Violet not founded in honor, nor breathed a sentence, a word, in her ear playing falsely with my real intentions. If I have won her heart, my hand, my love, my life shall be devoted to her."

"Bah!" cried Ishmael, contemptuously; "those words have been uttered before by members of your race, with what results? To drive to ruin, disgrace, misery, madness, those who most trusted them. Do you know who you are, boy? Listen! You are a Kingswood, though not the heir of your house; you move in a high sphere; pride, ambition and other such vices are already in agitation to hunt in the artificial hot-houses of high and fashionable life for some exotic for you to wear through your wedded life. No lowly flower like my poor little wood-Violet here could rear its head among the haughty, the lordly and the heartless, in your sphere."

"But I tell you——" cried Cyril, excitedly.

"You tell me what?" interposed Ishmael. "That the hawk mates with the sparrow it pursues only to destroy. Hear me, and mark me. Your path and hers are widely different. They diverge in opposite directions. You cannot walk in hers, nor can she travel yours. Rather than it should be attempted, I will plunge my wood-knife to the haft in her heart, sure that it would be her happiest fate to die ere she placed a step on your lifeway. Nay, it is vain to oppose my determination," he added, as Cyril passionately and vehemently protested against his assumptions. "I give you credit for not having wronged this poor creature by an evil act—I pay that testimony to your youth, because at your age youth is generous, unselfish and far more often noble than base. But it is also impulsive, it forms impracticable notions, and is lavish of rash promises. I have interposed not a second too soon—nay, far too late for her peacefulness, until a better knowledge of the world and time shall have banished your image from her mind. You part now and for ever; and bear in mind what I say now, with stern resolve to keep my word. If you hunt or seek for her, to renew your pleadings, as sure as living you stand there, you doom her to death by my hand. Hark! the dinner bell of Kingswood Hall rises on the air; the scents of dainties ascend to regale the nostrils of the titled and the wealthy. Go join the proud and lofty, and forget the humble flower you would have plucked that it might wither on your breast."

"Hear me—hear me—man, I entreat you to hear me!" cried Cyril, in a frenzied voice.

"No!" he shouted, in a savage tone.

"Have mercy, Ishmael, if you love me," cried Violet, with a passionate burst of grief.

"I have mercy, poor fool," he answered, in a subdued tone. "It is because I love thee I act thus. Come."

Cyril dashed forward and caught her by the hand, but Ishmael tore it fiercely from him.

"Rash, mad boy, I have sworn to what I have promised," he cried. "Would you have me immolate her here before your eyes? Would you perpetuate the red blood-stain that clings like a brand on your accursed race? Stand back. You have looked your last on each other."

He drew Violet away as he spoke, but she stretched her arms towards Cyril, and uttered a wild, piercing cry. She struggled for a moment to escape from the strong arms of the stern man who clasped her, but the convulsive character of her agony overpowered her, and she sunk insensible in the tight grasp of Ishmael.

Maddened by what he beheld, his eyes flashing fire, Cyril laid his clutching grip on Ishmael's shoulder, but at the same instant his hand was roughly removed, and his arms pinioned behind by some new comer.

"Hold him in firm security, Tubal, until I am well away," cried Ishmael, sharply, to the new comer; "hurt him not, as you fear my anger, but liberate him only when you hear my signal."

As he concluded, he moved rapidly away, bearing the almost lifeless form of the forest maiden as if she were an infant, and leaving Cyril struggling fiercely and furiously in the hands of Tubal Kish.

CHAPTER XII.

The proud, high spirit with which Erle Gower had been endowed by nature was rendered morbidly sensitive by the singularly isolated position in which he had been placed. A glance of contumely, a word of scorn, an air of condescension, even expressions of compassion at his comparatively friendless condition, stung him far more acutely than they would have done if he had been surrounded by the usual social relations of life. There was not a vacation during the year at his school-home which, as soon as he began to think at all, was not passed in solitary ramblings, during which he brooded over his anomalous position. He had his boyish dreams of grandeur and greatness. In the bright summer time he would lay beneath the cool shadows of waving trees upon the crest of some wooded hill, and gaze wistfully upon the expanse of richly cultivated lands, stretching far away beneath him, and wonder whether he had descended from any of the lordly possessors of the fertile estates he then beheld. If so, why was he thus alone, and his origin unknown even to himself? Then he would speculate, and ask himself whether, if he were some poverty-stricken dependent upon the bounty of a secret friend, would it not be possible himself to found a house and become a great lord? The histories of eminent men, which already he had perused with eager earnestness, afforded him some brilliant examples; and he felt that, with expansion of intellect, accompanied by indomitable perseverance, energy and an unflinching attention to the object of his pursuit, that he might become as elevated in rank and as wealthy in possessions as the inheritors of many of the fair domains upon which his thoughtful eyes then rested. Such dreams, such fancies, such reasonings and speculations, attended by a constant sense of incertitude respecting his real status and his family connections, naturally made him more keenly alive to any observations, or to conduct which seemed to reflect upon his position. But, at the same time, it spurred him on to secure and to maintain a position among his school-companions which compelled from them a consideration they might not otherwise have been disposed to grant. At all manly games and athletic sports he excelled; indeed, it was not alone that he was animated by a desire to achieve a superiority, but he was urged on to attain it by the severity of the discipline to which he was subjected. No other youth belonging to the establishment attempted it, and he would probably have broken down under its rigor but for his haughty spirit, which enabled him, almost without exception, to conquer physical exhaustion. The exercise of his intellect had been equally severe, and he was nominated captain of the school, over many of his seniors in age, with whom he competed for the honor.

His removal to Kingswood had rather quickened his sensitiveness respecting the mystery of his origin, and thus the insolent threat which Philip Avon uttered when both were in pursuit of Lady Maud galled him more fiercely for its manner than its matter, and from that moment he regarded him with a hate which, without being base or ignoble, was nevertheless of a deadly character.

A gleam of triumphant joy illuminated his eyes when, having parted with Cyril Kingswood, he locked his door, and gazed upon the note sent to him by Philip Avon, and which he yet clutched in his burning fingers.

He believed that he was intuitively master of its contents, and he felt a species of fierce glee in the contemplation that he should, perhaps, have it in his power to yet more deeply mortify and humble Philip Avon than as yet he had done, by defeating him in a race for a life and by putting in execution the threat Philip had hurled at him.

He broke open the seal, and read the contents of the epistle, which were as follows:

"We have met in hate. My gorge rose at you when my eyes first fell upon you; our acquaintance, brief as it has been—yet too long—has sufficed to bring our antipathies into direct collision. You have crossed my path. You have thwarted me in seizing an opportunity I have long most ardently hoped for; and you have subjected me to a foul indignity to which no Avon of Hawkesbury has ever tamely submitted. I must have more than satisfaction. I must have full and ample revenge. I know not who you are or what you are; whether you are of good birth or a low-born, and, as you appear to be, an ill-bred fellow: I cannot now at present ascertain any satisfactory evidence on this point, and I must perforce content myself with the fact that you have been presented by Lord Kingswood to his guests, and placed by his wife on an equality with them; but that you are a poor dependent on his bounty I do not doubt by the scene which occurred at dinner yesterday. When you were ordered to quit the dining-room the Honorable Mr. Kingswood was snubbed for wishing to join you. I, however, waive this proof of the meanness of your condition in my desire to erase the stain with which my honor has been smutched by you. To merely lash you across the face with my riding-whip when I met you would not suffice to satisfy the insult I have received from you, nor the aversion I entertain towards you. I propose, therefore, to slay you or be slain by you; and although I do not believe that you are entitled to the consideration I am about to exhibit, still, as it will effectively settle the hostility between us, I prefer to adopt it. I request you to meet me this day week, at dawn—say at six o'clock—at that part of the Chace where the insolent words were uttered by you in reply to my request to give me a precedence which, by every right, was mine. I shall come alone; I shall expect to find you there alone—mark me—alone! I will bring the weapons, of which you can have your choice. I mention this, because you may not possess them, and your inquiries for such a loan may raise suspicions, satisfactory to you, perhaps, but which I, at least, am most anxious to avoid. I have named the day and hour of meeting, at the expiration of a lengthened interval, with the same object. Come, and alone, or be branded and lashed by me as an abject coward when and wherever I may fall across you. Your presence at the appointed spot is the only reply I need. PHILIP AVON."

At first Erle laughed in contemptuous scorn at this insulting epistle, and flinging it on the ground, crushed it with his heel. But presently he raised it up, and again perused it, crumpled and mutilated as it was, and as he read each coldly-calculated, deliberate insult, the most vindictive feelings took possession of him. Naturally impetuous, and possessed of feelings difficult to control, he had been ever ready to retort upon the contumelious, and to avenge an insult, but promptings of avengement had never degenerated to rancorous vengeance. Now he felt that Philip Avon's life was the only atonement he could exact for the numerous and gratuitous insults he had received from him. He was eager for the meeting, was irritated and vexed by the delay, and would have preferred that it should have taken place at once rather than so much time should be allowed to pass with the memory of every stinging observation eating its way into his soul.

As he had no alternative but to accept the terms of the challenge, he was compelled to put up with the bitter feelings it had created and would foster, but he consoled himself with the reflection that no day is so far distant that it cometh not at last.

He threw himself into a chair at the window, and gazed out upon the landscape, although his thoughts were far differently occupied. He noted not the decline of daylight, the rolling up of wreathing vapors eventually dispersed by the rising beams of the moon, or the exquisite scene presented to his eyes when the last white wreaths of mist had disappeared from the valleys. His mind was engaged in resolving that most vexing, trying, difficult of all problems, "What is love?"

Philip Avon, he had been told, was in love with Lady Maud. What did that really and actually mean? What was the true definition of the assertion? Did it mean that Philip Avon liked Lady Maud better than any other of her sex that he had seen? If so, so did he. Did it mean that Philip Avon thought her more beautiful in face, more delicate in form, more graceful in mien and motion than any other young and gentle lady he had beheld?—so did he. Would Philip Avon aid all that lay in his power to insure her happiness—would he not? Would Philip maintain her beauty and purity against the whole world? Would he live only for her? Would he die for her? Did that mean love? Erle proudly felt that no one suggestion equalled his own emotions on those points. There was nothing he could imagine that Philip Avon would do or dare for Lady Maud he would not surpass thrice ten thousand times, if it were possible. Yet did he love her?

How violently his breast throbbed as he put this question to himself! How bitterly his heart ached as he answered himself by saying, that if the strongest liking, if the most intense yearning to render devoted homage, and to render service of any kind, however dangerous and difficult, was to love her, then he loved her with a truer, more earnest, enduring and passionate devotion than could Philip Avon.

Their acquaintance had been only just formed, but in the interval which had taken place from the moment of their meeting until now sufficient events had been crowded to determine the point.

Yes, his heart ached as the conviction forced itself upon him that if Philip Avon's attachment to her was love, his own was love too, of a boundless nature. It ached because he associated love and marriage together. To win the love of Lady Maud was to win her hand. Philip Avon, the son of a wealthy baronet, the heir to a title and to vast estates, might, indeed, prefer a claim to win her hand if he could conquer her heart. But what if he enthralled her? How could he place her in that lofty, elevated position to which her beauty and her rank entitled her?

How? how? He clenched his hands and teeth as his humid eyes gazed out upon the broad lands, which, silver-gray in the moonbeams, spread out far and wide, still and silent, as if hushed in slumber. Was there no way by which he too could become master of woods and vales, of villages and tenantry, a frowning castle and a proud title? Surely the path open to others to pursue would not be closed to him—especially as he would enter upon it steadfast, earnest, energetic, with unfaltering resolution and unflinching perseverance.

Who could give him a clue, a track, a footprint to this path? It was all he asked, he would do the rest. Lord Kingswood, perhaps? Yes, he would not deny him this, he knew, for Erle felt that he was an unwelcome guest at Kingswood, and any proposition that would remove him thence would be welcome to his lordship.

A rather sharp and hurried knock at Erle's door interrupted his reverie, and it was repeated before he collected his scattered thoughts, and rose up to open it.

As he flung it wide, the pale moonbeams fell upon the pallid face of Lord Kingswood's valet, Pharisee, who exclaimed, in low but rapid accents,

"My lord is in a towering fury at the absence of Mr. Cyril. Will he please to attend his lordship on the instant?"

"Mr. Cyril Kingswood is not here," replied Erle, coldly.

"Not with you, sir?" said Pharisee, quickly.

"What do you mean, fellow?" replied Erle, indignantly; "have I not said so?"

"I—I—Mr. Cyril was in your apartment, sir, when I brought you a note from Mr. Philip Avon," persisted Pharisee.

"Is that a reason he should remain here until doomsday?" rejoined Erle, sharply.

"Pray, sir, how long is it since he left you?" inquired Pharisee, anxiously.

"I cannot tell," returned Erle, impatiently. "It may be one, two, or three hours—I do not know what the hour is."

"It is approaching ten," replied Pharisee; and added, hastily, "Of course you are not aware that a commotion has taken place in the dining-room?"

"Commotion!" repeated Erle. "No. What has happened?"

"You are aware that his lordship is hasty and irritable," returned Pharisee, in a sleeker tone. "The absence of Lady Maud at dinner vexed him, because, added to your absence, it excited a host of questions, fears being entertained that both might have sustained injuries unnoticed in the excitement of this morning's desperate affair. Then Mr. Philip Avon took umbrage at praiseful words uttered respecting your act of gallantry, and had, when the ladies retired, some warm words with two or three gentlemen, who spoke in high terms of you. Sir Walter defended his son, and soon the difference extended, until a scene of wrangling, such as I never beheld at his lordship's table, took place, and was terribly heightened by Mr. Philip Avon, who had been drinking deeply, suddenly breaking out into the ravings of a lunatic, and eventually falling down in a fit. He has just been sent home in his father's carriage, which Sir Walter, in a fit of exasperation, had already ordered, and they have departed. It was then discovered by Lady Kingswood that Mr. Cyril had not appeared at dinner nor during the evening, and the result of her ladyship's inquiries, and those of Lord Kingswood, is, that Mr. Cyril was last seen in your company."

"Yourself being the informant?" observed Erle.

Pharisee bowed.

"Go acquaint Lord and Lady Kingswood that their son quitted me immediately you departed from the room," subjoined Erle. "As you know what the hour was, you can enlighten them. I have not since been visited by Mr. Cyril."

Pharisee, in the dim light which the moon spread over the apartment, was unable to observe the expression of Erle's countenance, and he could gather nothing satisfactory from his cold, stern tone. He rather doubted Erle's statement, but there was a peculiarly commanding, haughty manner with the youth which, in spite of himself, compelled him to treat him with a respectful deference. He therefore reluctantly, and with lingering step, retired.

Left alone, it is probable that Erle would have pursued his former train of thoughts, but his eye caught sight of lamps, and one or two blazing torches dancing and gleaming along the winding pathways of the extensive and beautifully arranged garden grounds. Then he heard a bugle sound, and voices cried "hillio!" lustily.

Then he saw dark figures tramping with hurried steps over the park, and spreading in all directions.

Then he remembered the strangely-mournful notes of the horn sounding in the direction of the Chace, the sudden and visible embarrassment of Cyril, who had hastily and perhaps unintentionally ejaculated, "The Wonder of Kingswood Chace." Further, there flashed through his brain the face and form of Tubal Kish, together with his deadly designs on Cyril.

It was but the work of a moment to seize cap and gun, to hurry to the corridor, key in hand, and unlock the door which communicated with the staircase leading to the outlet to the wood.

He descended in pitchy darkness till he could descend no further, and then, with difficulty and great exertion, he pursued his path, until he reached the rusted iron grating, opened it, and crept stealthily up among the thicket and undergrowth, and stepped out as before, into the copse in Kingswood Chace.

It naturally occurred to him, that where he had before encountered Tubal Kish, in a struggle with Cyril, he might, if they had met together there again, find some trace of him. He therefore made his way with a gliding step between the stems of the numerous trees around him, until he reached the spot where he had so opportunely appeared in Cyril's behalf. The spot where he halted was thrown into deep shadow by the close network of boughs, branches, and twigs above, but out in the glades the moonbeams lay upon the motionless grass and made it appear like a carpet of frosted silver.

As he turned his gaze upon various parts of the open space, a stealthy though a heavy footstep caught his ear, pressing down dead leaves, and cracking and crushing dry twigs. The sound proceeded at no great distance from him, and he at once glided behind a tree, to watch the approach of this night prowler of the woods.

At some fifty feet from him, the footstep paused abruptly, and diverged from his direction into the open glade. He looked eagerly thither, and beheld a man emerge from the shadows of the trees, bearing on his shoulder a lifeless human body, which he, with an affectation of carefulness, laid upon the cold sward. He placed his hand upon the heart, as if to ascertain whether it was yet beating, and then raised his head up and looked about him.

The moonbeams glittered whitely on his ghastly visage, and Erle instantly perceived that it was the scowling face of Tubal Kish.

A cold perspiration seemed to ooze from every pore. A clammy dampness gathered on his forehead, and for a moment his limbs felt paralysed.

Could it be the body of Cyril Kingswood that lay motionless at the feet of this ruffian?

While yet under the influence of this horrid thought, he heard the fellow say, in a coarse, gruff voice,

"Shouldn't tempt I, then. Didn't thee hear 'un say don't hurt 'un, but let 'un go soon as I signal? Well, why didn't 'ee keep quiet, then? What did 'ee fight and cuff I vor? What did 'ee break my head wi' gunstock vor? Oh, but was an unlucky blow vor 'ee. You be down now, not I. Wheogh, he be 'ell dead, surely. Aha! Philip Avon ha' promised to pay I well to kill 'un right out. Old Ishmael 'ull be savage if I do, but he'll be anger'd now and anger'd once vor all, so I'll earn Philip Avon's gold. I'll cut his throat, an' when I get the shiners, who'll find I?"

As he concluded, he drew out of his coat-pocket the same desperate knife he had used in the morning, and opening it, knelt down by the side of the still senseless body.

That very instant a tremendous blow from the butt-end of a gun knocked him over.

But his skull was not made of an ordinary thickness, and though a thousand fires flashed in his eyes, and he was stunned for a moment, he yet leaped to his feet, and beheld standing before him a youth, armed with a gun, awaiting his attack.

The moon shone on the youth's face and rendered every feature distinctly visible, the frowning, knit brows, the gleaming eye, and the compressed mouth.

Lord Eric stopped in the midst of his fury, and stood as if frozen into a statue of ice.

His teeth chattered, his blood curdled in his veins, and he growled out, "The Spectre of the Chace, Kingswood of Kingswood!"

Then, with a wild yell of horror, he turned and fled, as though pursued by the phantom hounds of a weird forester.

Eric, surprised at the man's audacity, so strangely different to what he had anticipated, suffered ill to effect him for a moment. He instantly directed his attention to the body at his feet, and, throwing down his gun, he took by the collar the prostrate poacher, and sternly, suspected it upon his knee.

The white handkerchief with which he had previously bound his face was now displaced, and the countenance of the poacher was disclosed to view.

The countenance was a good one, upon the forehead from which blood still slowly flowed, the eyes were large and full, the mouth compressed, and the hue of death seemed settled upon the features, which, with a shivering heart, Eric recognized to be those of Cyril Kingswood.

CHAPTER XIII.

TEARS of security and comparative repose gradually impressed upon the belief of Cyril Kingswood a portion of confidence in his fate.

Vulgar acts of larceny, felony, higher crimes, up to murder were, of course, subjected to certain discovery, and the officers almost unexceptionally sent to the "tracks," explored and probed by the law, and, as Lord Kingswood believed, very properly too. But there were social "errors"—he styled them weaknesses, follies, foibles—any word that let down the dead easily—which neither called for, nor, in the plainest manner, were followed by retribution.

It was true that it sometimes did occur that the feeble in question smirched on its track—a misery, a shame, a disappointment; but there were rare and exceptional cases, and where they did happen the world was arrested only to the more sensitive of the wounds it inflicted, and not to the immolator, who was, no doubt, prepared to act "liberally."

Such were the opinions of Lord Kingswood, converted gradually, by time and experience, to suit his own peculiar position, and he began to conceive his doctrine to be founded on a sandy foundation, when he listened to the confession of Cyril.

Upon the arrival of Eric Gower at Kingswood, one misbap seemed to fall after another.

"Do you mean to say, sir, that you have killed him?"

The embarrassing events of the morning had been followed by a violent altercation at his table—at his table, and among those, too, whom Lord Kingswood had looked to confidentially and hoped to obtain.

This most vexing and annoying occurrence had been followed by the frantic ravings of Phillip Arne, who launches forth yells of hatred, rage and vengeance against his unoffending master, for which he had been crowned by the unaccountable disappearance of the son Cyril.

If this was not the commencement of the first act of retribution, he was at a loss to conceive what was.

The dinner party was broken up in confusion, and already, with a vague suspicion that something was wrong, several of the guests, in conjunction with servants summoned and instructed by them, spread themselves over the grounds in search of the missing youth.

Then it transpired that one of the under servants remembered seeing Mr. Cyril Arne in company with Eric Gower, and, as a last resource, set him approaching the first dinner-bell.

The gamekeeper, who had come to the hall to know something of Mr. Cyril's haunts in the wood, and could lend a party in search of the missing young gentleman.

The gamekeeper, when communicated with, shook his head in a solemn kind of way so as to excite suspicion, and declared that he was not obliged were he called out his men-tants and ordained the dogs, who was then in the kennel, to be ready for the field.

As soon as he had fortified his party, they started, under his guidance, through the Chace, the female servants, as well as the men, in a state unfitting for search.

They went about in pairs and placidly, and the party pushed on without meeting, for a long while, with any success. Indeed, they were far into the thickness of the Chace, then, abruptly, one of the dogs paused, and commenced running round and round a small circle.

Sedgley stopped and set up a peculiar whistle, upon hearing which the manner of those in pursuit almost freeze. The other dog joined the first, and then a third and a fourth.

The gamekeeper's brow fell yet lower, and he ground his teeth together.

"They scent human blood," he muttered. And then he, in a yet lower tone, added the name of Cyril Arne.

The dogs went on rapidly, when suddenly a bogle-note was heard in another direction, and the whole of the dogs, as if by one impulse, by a hound voice calling loudly.

"That's Mr. Cyril's voice," cried the gamekeeper, excitedly; "I know the note. This way—this way," he added, changing the route, "we can be but near."

And so they were.

Through the wood would be seen to pour a stream, bubbling and plashing against the pebbles it laved in its rapid progress. On one part of the banks of this stream was a fallen tree.

A short distance above them they beheld, in the cold moonlight, two figures, one kneeling over and supporting the other.

In an instant they rushed up to them, and found them to be Eric and Cyril Arne.

Cyril had been restored to consciousness, but was yet deeply faint and weak. He gazed wildly around him, as if in search of some one to whose shoulder he could rest.

A dozen voices shouted aloud to Lord Eric, but in firm and somewhat stern tones he bade the questioners reserve their inquiries for another occasion, and send him a litter as soon as they reached the hall.

A litter was quickly cut and formed by the gamekeeper and his assistants, and the procession thumped back in silence to the hall.

At reaching the hall, Eric sent for Lord Kingswood, to whom he then coldly repelled them. To Lady Kingswood, who made her appearance in a state of the most lively joy, on discovering that she found her son somewhere under the attack of a ruffian in the wood, he had been likewise sent for in the first instance.

She pressed his hand with marks of gratefulness, and accompanied him to the room where Cyril was reposing. Eric, at first, was about to distrust, she, being rather a leading man in the neighborhood, had been sent for by Lord Kingswood, and was then still present.

Subsequently, as he expected, Eric was summoned by Lord Kingswood to his library.

He found him in the extreme agitation, haggard in face and almost frenzied in manner.

As Eric entered the room, he rose immediately, and advancing to her in the door, and, advancing to him, said, in tone half-smothered by agitation—

"What is the meaning of this horrible confusion, this distressing din &c., this disturbance of my household, and the attempt to murder and exclude?"

The imperious as well as wrathful manner of Lord Kingswood stung the pride of Eric severely. He at once checked all the generous impulses which would have urged him to pity and excuse, it was in his power to be, and he became as haughty as his lordship, and as cold as he appeared to be excited.

Lord Kingswood was astonished with rage.

"Do you mean to say, sir," he angrily, "to make your appearance in this house under the disguised sport of domestication—could not have so appalled me as did your unexpected presence. You appear at my dinner-table an audacious spectre. You make yourself the hero of a mad freak of circumstances that I may be stung to death by questions concerning you. You thrust yourself into collision with one whom I am anxious to receive with distinction, and encounter a most undignified scene at my table. My son is suddenly and unaccountably missing immediately subsequent to an interview with you, and he is discovered in the centre of the Chace, bruised, with his clothes torn, by you. Do you intend to add to your audacity of falsehood by your further silence?"

"My lord," returned Eric, coldly, "all these events such as you have described have happened, do not trouble yourself to ask me that is has been my occupation to occasion them. The accusation is worthy of your lordship."

"Unworthy!" cried Lord Kingswood, exasperated by the remark of the party at whom it was directed, and by his cool and haughty endurance. You shall not remain another hour beneath my roof."

"Your lordship," said Eric, bowing low in his head upon it he was arrested by the loud, authoritative voice of Eric, who exclaimed—

"Stay, my lord—collect before it is too late. Remember I came not hither designedly."

"No, no," cried his lordship, sharply and interrogatively. "How, then?"

"My time had come!" responded Eric, with emphatic firmness.

Lord Kingswood started back as if struck. He gazed into Eric's face, and then sank into a seat and bowed his face in his hands.

Lord Kingswood was a man of the world, and he saw in Gower now that there exists retribution for a social sin, and though deformed long delayed, it will overtake the sinner.

There was a silence for a short time.

Eric stood with his arms folded, and watched his lordship's extreme agitation with questioning wonder. Presently he said, in a tone of sympathy—

"It is for you, my lord, to say why I am here. At your request I have come from the scene of vital importance to me at your wish I have consented to remain in this painful prison atmosphere, and, in the meantime, I am yet willing to obey you in all things which shall not trench upon my self-respect or my honor. But as I have said, my lord, my time had come. Whether you will or not, you must, that if you take any hasty step to fasten an unhappy name on me, I shall be compelled to communicate with an equal respect to that paid by them to the members of your family—to that paid by them to the members of your family—to the presence of Lady Kingswood, your son, the whole household, a hundred social circles, and the whole neighborhood, to which my presence here is duty on my part, and on yours an imperious necessity."

Lord Kingswood looked up, and, rising from his chair, sighed, and rose and again paced the apartment with an agitated manner.

"What could I do?" he said, pausing suddenly and flushing to that feeble of his youth. Call upon him for an explanation of their future relation to each other? Bring the whole affair before the public being himself from one of the limbs of an ancient oak in the yet Great Chace.

It was clear to him that Eric was master of the situation, and that, for the present, he must submit to the terms he dictated to him. He must wait upon Providence, and fall back upon the plan digested in the morning with Cyril Arne.

Eric still maintained his firm bearing, it was a gift of nature that he possessed, and, therefore, he felt no shame in its manifestation, nor, he appeared quite collected. Again he voluntarily addressed Lord Kingswood.

"I owe, to a very fair explanation, my lord, and that is in reference to Mr. Cyril Arne."

Lord Kingswood paused abruptly in his agitated pacing.

"Mr. Cyril Arne!" he said, in a tone of astonishment, and in a way word or intimation of mine, paid me a visit in the apartments your lordship has given me in the hall. He was in company with a man who I have good reason as bearing reference to his future movements after the hour appointed for his visit. I found him in the act of leaving the acquisit me with an obscene which was considered to be strange and a man of whom I had no knowledge. I felt that I was justified in my misgivings, and, armed with a gun, I hurried to the Chace. I met a man, bleeding from a wound in the head, lying at the foot of the rivulet which runs through the Chace, and by the aid of a dog I discovered that man to be Cyril Arne. I found Lord Gower placed in an event which your lordship has unjustly ceased me of the commission of."

"Your lordship has not yet explained the cause of your having a person in such abominable adventure of this morning?" asked Lord Kingswood, sternly.

"I do not know, my lord," replied Eric, promptly.

"Did you not, on your first encounter, have hurried to the Chace, where, as no doubt you expected, you discovered Mr. Arne was intending to meet Cyril Arne, and, in fact, you met him in the Chace?" rejoined Lord Kingswood, sharply.

"I object to the interrogation," returned Eric, respectfully but firmly.

"Then proving that you are connected with the event," subjoined Lord Kingswood, with a frowning, angry look.

"I repeat I object to be put to the proof you with, my lord," rejoined Eric, wheeling the interruption. "I had no other agency, I repeat, than that of a mere accident, which has led me to the information that I have given you."

"Wherein, I repeat, is that perfect, he contested," exclaimed Lord Kingswood in sullen anger.

"I owe a new explanation to your lordship, to put that question to me. But I have an equal right to decline to answer it. My wrongs are my own, my injuries are my own to endure, and your lordship, no doubt, is possessed of principles too lofty to induce you to demand from me that which I am not willing to give, and which I will not be betrayed."

At first Lord Kingswood was puzzled. What confidence could Philip Arne seek to repose in one whom he had branded with the name of Spectre?

It flashed across his mind that the confidence might include a private meeting with Cyril Arne in the Chace, and that a quick effect his deliverance from the dreadful incubus which now pressed so fatally upon the interests of his son.

He resolved to pursue the question no further.

He thought that Eric might be right, and that, however, without saying upon him the necessity of keeping to the secret communication with Cyril Arne, he was not bound to solve the most delicate mystery connected against the peace of his family.

Eric coldly assisted his lordship to recover, glad to be released.

Lord Kingswood, upon the basis of the plan of operations which had been attended with perfectly satisfactory results. He would, then Eric's presence, and, therefore, he was not to be complained.

It is certain that no such thought as the probability of an attempt upon Eric and Lady Maud crossed his mind.

In the enigma of Eric's character, it was but natural that he the same motive which urged him to prevent the daily association of Eric with other members of the family. The Unexpected was a secret he would have kept hidden from the whole world, even from himself, if he could. Eric, therefore, was to be kept at a distance against if he had suddenly found that his arrangements for Eric's residence were not to be carried out, and that Eric's proper capacities of meeting alone and unobserved.

Eric, then, had been suddenly overawed by Cyril's return to Kingswood frail wounded and in a state of remonstrability, put to the rout all the guests who were there assembled, some to partake of Lord Kingswood's hospitality for a period extending over some ten days or a fortnight, and the following day the mansion was as silent and gloomy as though the whole family had been thrown into mourning.

Cyril was confined to his bed, attended only by doctor and nurse, for he was delirious, and uttered incoherent ravings, which none could comprehend.

Lady Maud, too, still nervously excited by the fright she had undergone, did not make her appearance.

Lady Kingswood, upon receiving an attack of hysterics, kept close within her boudoir, employed mostly in reading a few hasty lines written in pencil, and thrust into her hand by the Marquis of Chilinchem on parting with him the evening before.

Lord Kingswood himself found in his study a prey to anxieties. He sat the whole day through brooding over anticipations of a fearful kind, on conjuring up what he deemed a remorseful inconsistency; and Eric, as he had promised, studiously kept within his apartments.

Three or four days passed thus drearily and monotonously. Eric had no meals in his own room, and never went beyond the limits assigned to him, until he began to feel his captivity insupportable.

He thought of the key of the door, which was locked, and resolved to avail himself of it.

He had, in fact, provided himself with it in recollection of that small key he had found in his former bed chamber, and which appeared to be a key of a door in the library and apartment adjoining the room he had been assigned.

Then accidentally he had discovered what was behind that door, and, in the event of any occasion, great use to a prisoner.

Within the last day or two, in consequence of what he had seen and overheard, Eric had begun to suspect that the female servant who attended upon him, that the apartments in the second corridor had been selected by Lord Kingswood in consequence of their vicinity to the room, pretty girl, born and brought up on the estate. She was the daughter of a gamekeeper, and Eric was led to suspect that the bearer of a message of inquiry from Lady Maud respecting his health, a message which he received with a laconic reply of thanks.

The words of the message were formal; they expressed a regret that Lady Kingswood had not been informed of the sudden meeting as usual, or Lady Maud would have personally made inquiries after his health. Eric had not suffered in consequence of his arduous and exhausting exertions to effect her safety. The terms were conventional, and were of great delicacy, kindly expressed, but it imparted to him a strange, thrilling felicity. He put many questions to the girl respecting Lady Maud, which she answered with lively brevity, because she had, needle sly, a rather larger share of intelligence than the generality of girls, and so she kept in unison with the rest of the servants, that Eric had slept in the haunted room. Eric, therefore, began to know if the story had any positive, night-dawn horrifying ghost.

The girl laughed at the suspicion of her eyes, and the unconvinced shudder which convulsed her frame, as urged by her curiosity into the haunted room, was followed by her with a laugh at the question to him, and he listened passively to her garrulous relation of the ghostly visitant of the room, and heard in the gloomy old quarter of the building. But he listened to her because she was Lady Maud's favorite servant, and because he had felt that all reservations which Eric feeled betrayed that Lady Maud had requested her to communicate to him all that she knew regarding. When the girl had gone, bearing his reply, the conversation he had with her occupied his mind, and he was left to muse by his lonely behind that quaint old black oaken door, until it became a fascination.

He was quite alive to the questionable character of the process; but he was a prisoner, and he had a right to his imprisonment, and there was about the place itself, his own connection with it, as well as that of others, which made him think that was a circumstance dignity and magnanimity, and he resolved to gain his inquisitive curiosity.

He had an inward conviction that a revelation awaited him, and that it would be connected with Lady Maud. He remembered the presented themselves, and waited until the household should be retired to rest, and then he proceeded to the door in question.

Perpendicularly, before the hour of midnight, the whole of the domestics had gone to bed, and Eric, with a light in his hand, and a pistol in the pocket of his dressing-gown, stood at the door of the sonorous bell in the corridor, and, with a beating heart, he put the key in the lock and turned it.

The door opened with a creaking noise, and Eric took up his lamp and proceeded to leave his chamber.

He found himself in a small room, which was of the same construction as the oldest portion of the building and ultimately he found himself in a corridor, which had placed behind, and his own inside low for the marvellous, he determined to prosecute a search which, at all events, he felt to be forbidden him.

A stouter heart than his might well have paused ere he attempted to pass the threshold of the door which he had opened, and he believed it to be his destiny to follow out the singular adventures connected with it, and he pressed on, grasping his gun in object. His progress through a passage intensely dark endowed his imagination with the most horrible shapes, and, even at this late moment, he could not help but shudder.

Then his memory and better sense told him the sound was but the echo of the wind through the corridors.

With startling suddenness a burst of moonlight darted into the passage, and, with a quick, manly manner, Eric, with a collected caused it to steal out before him in singularly bold relief, the figure of a black oak, heavily, and irresistible indicated second to attract him and compel him to advance.

He moved his utmost paralyze a little, his breath appeared to it, which once more it was snatched from his seeing, striking eyeballs of the figure.

A howling blast of wind swept through part the building. The tempest had commenced, and Eric was alone.

(To be continued).

REPAIRING THE BROKEN PIPES OF THE CROTON WATER MAIN IN FIFTH AVENUE, AT SIXTY-FIFTH STREET.—SEE PAGE 74.

THE APPALLING MURDER IN TWELFTH STREET.

On Friday morning, the 7th December, one of the most daring murders ever chronicled was perpetrated at No. 22 Twelfth street, between Fifth avenue and University place. The hour at which it was committed, namely, about nine o'clock in the morning, when hundreds are passing on their way to business, is another startling proof that at no time and in no place is life safe in New York.

Mysterious and terrible as the Burdell murder was, there was the cover of night to give the assassin time to escape and opportunity to evade observation, but here we have a woman brutally murdered, after a protracted struggle, within a dozen feet of hundreds of passengers, and with a family living in the same house. The whole surroundings are well calculated to carry dismay into every household.

The public have, no doubt, noticed, as they walked along Twelfth street, between Fifth avenue and University place, a wooden framed house, the ground floor of which was occupied by Mrs. Mary Shancks, who kept a millinery and fancy store. Behind this was the apartment in which she lived, and which served as parlor, bedroom and kitchen. Above these rooms was a floor rented to a respectable family.

On Friday, Mrs. Shancks opened the store as usual, about half-past seven, and having displayed her articles, she went into her back room to prepare for her breakfast, which a girl was to bring her that morning from Mrs. Davis, who keeps a boarding-house in Elever-h street. This girl deposes, that at half-past eight she took the breakfast to Mrs. Shanoka who deposited it in her back room. The little girl then left. This is the last time Mrs. Shaneks was seen alive.

FRIGHTFUL MURDER OF MRS. SHANCKS IN TWELFTH STREET, NEAR FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, ON THE MORNING OF THE 7TH OF DECEMBER.

THE LAST SCENE IN THE POPULAR AND SUCCESSFUL SPECTACLE OF 'THE SEVEN SISTERS,' NOW PERFORMING AT LAURA KEENE'S THEATRE.—SEE PAGE 74.

At half-past ten o'clock she was found by Sarah Ferguson, a seamstress, laying in the same apartment, quite dead, although warm, and still bleeding. Her throat had been cut from ear to ear, her face fearfully cut, and her skull fractured. Around were the evidences of a violent struggle—her head was to the stove and her feet in a skating position, towards the bed and the door. Our artist, who visited the spot an hour after the discovery of the murder, has given a most graphic and faithful picture of the appalling scene.

Beside the unhappy woman were a carving knife, covered with her blood—a chair, the leg of which had been used as a club to beat her—a stone pitcher, which had been broken to pieces against her head—altogether, our artist declares that the scene was one of unexampled horror.

The disturbed condition of the room showed that every cupboard and drawer had been rifled, and consequently that plunder was the chief if not the sole object of the crime.

As usual, the suspicion fixed itself upon several, but more particularly upon one towards whom the unhappy woman, with death's prophetic instinct, entertained a peculiar antipathy. This was a young man, named Alfred Buchanan, who had done some carpenter's work for her and performed some errands.

On Sunday, the young carpenter, Alfred Buchanan, was arrested at Susquehanna, on the Erie Railroad, and brought to New York. He had fled there on the Saturday evening, and attention was called to him by his bandaged hands, scratched face and agitation of manner. Upon arriving there he had inquired for a Mr. Springstein, with whose brother he had worked in New York. Mr. Springstein hospitably received him, but could not avoid connecting the murder with his guest. He therefore seized an opportunity, and went to Mr. Seymour, a Justice of the Peace, and made an affidavit of the facts. He was therefore arrested and brought to New York. He acknowledges knowing the murdered woman, but denies being the murderer. He accounts for his wounds by saying that he got them in a fight in Mercer street.

THE PRESENT LAW OFFICE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN, THE PRESIDENT ELECT, IN FIFTH STREET, WEST SIDE OF THE PUBLIC SQUARE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 74.

It is said that he is insane, having been confined as a lunatic at Blackwell's Island.

GRAND CLOSING TABLEAU OF THE ROMANTIC SPECTACLE, "THE SEVEN SISTERS," AT LAURA KEENE'S THEATRE.

It is said that the last scene in "The Seven Sisters," at Miss Laura Keene's Theatre, cost the management the enormous sum of three thousand dollars. This may appear extravagant to those who have not witnessed the splendid effects produced; but we will guarantee that a visit to this theatre, and a glimpse even at the scene in question, will dispel all doubt on the subject. All New York and its environs will, as a matter of course, witness this really wonderful and artistic exhibition, and judge for themselves. But for the benefit of our country friends, who may not be fortunate enough to visit New York during the run of "The Seven Sisters," we have caused our artist to reproduce with his pencil this brilliant vision of fairyland, and we must say that he has admirably accomplished his work. In the distance are seen the sylph-like forms moving as it were through mid air, and surrounded by rosy clouds; nearer the waters of a fairy lake glisten in the fairy-like atmosphere, while over its calm surface floats the queen of the realm, radiant in glittering garments and arowned with choicest shells. Over all this hang the fairy ferns, their leaves quivering as at the touch of a whispering zephyr, and every fibre apparently instinct with life; and, as a crowning wonder, a huge water lily, floating down upon the bosom of the water, opens its pearly leaves and discloses a living child nestling amongst its petals.

Truly is this scene a triumph for Miss Keene, and, in order to protect herself in the enjoyment of the fruits of her labors, she has both copyrighted and patented this work of her hands and brain.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S FIRST LAW OFFICE, HOFFMAN'S ROW, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

When Abraham Lincoln first went to Springfield, nearly thirty years ago, he ran for the Legislature, was elected, and served several terms. In 1837 he opened a law office under the firm of Stuart & Lincoln, in Hoffman's Row. This house, which still stands, is a very humble edifice, and the step from thence to the White House is a stride which even Lincoln at that time but little dreamed of.

Abraham Lincoln's present Law Office, Fifth Street, States Square, Springfield, Ill.

Mr. Lincoln's present law office is situated in Fifth street, west side of State Square. He is in partnership with Mr. Herndon, a lawyer of considerable ability and reputation. We give a sketch of both offices, taken by our special artist. They present a contrast almost as wide as the last step in the career of their occupant from either the one or the other.

NEW YORK WITHOUT WATER.

On December 6 a large part of New York when it rose found itself without water. Those who had patent faucets in their rooms could not wash, and applications to their neighbors were returned with a negative. There had been previously a notification from the Croton Aqueduct Board, requesting citizens not waste water, in consequence of repairs. But it was not in consequence of repairs, but of an accident that the stoppage occurred. When the two thirty-six inch mains which led along Fifth avenue and fed the entire city were laid down, they were covered with heavy rocks instead of earth, owing to the neglect of the contractor. A small leak in the pipes near Sixty-fifth street caused the earth beneath to form a cavity, and the pressure above broke the pipes entirely apart. The rush of water was immense, tearing up the ground and making general havoc with the grading. It was discovered by a policeman, who at once gave the alarm to the proper authorities, but owing to some mismanagement many hours elapsed before the water was shut off. In due time gangs of men were set to work to reach the pipe, but it was long before the exact spot of the accident could be found and repaired.

In the City.

Old pumps and abandoned wells were brought into requisition. In every direction went men and women with pails and pots in search of water. Trains were formed near the very few available pumps in the city. Among the places chiefly patronised were the pumps in East Broadway, Cherry street, in First and Third streets. But the great supply came from Brooklyn, barrels being brought during the day from there, the contents meeting with a ready sale at a high price. The hotels, printing presses and other large establishments were supplied in this way. During the day the Twenty-third precinct gave notice that the stoppage of the water would not affect the city above Seventy-ninth street. The police were notified to be as prompt as possible in case of fire in the Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh and Eighth districts. Steamboats were also informed that they could not obtain their supply of water from the city. The Union Ferry Company notified the Chief Engineer, Mr. Decker, that steam would be kept up in all their boats, and one kept in reserve at each ferry, to be used in case of fire. Inspector Carpenter was on duty all night to attend fires.

Nearly all the factories were obliged to suspend work, except those which had wells or their own tanks. Our own establishment was compelled to discontinue until water could be obtained from Brooklyn in carts. Great fear prevailed lest fires might take place, and in fact one soon burst out. As the place was a wholesale drug store, the destruction of the entire block seemed inevitable. The two largest main pipes being broken, the supply through the hydrants was very small indeed, scarcely enough to stiffen the hose while passing through. The arrangements of the Fire Department were so good that in a short time a heavy stream of water was brought from the river by means of the steam engines playing into the hand engines, and so on from one to another till it reached the fire. Two or more lines of engines were thus formed. What would have been the result had the fire been more central it is impossible to say, for the distance to the river would have been almost unattainable.

By dint of hard work the mass of rocks and earth was cleared away when it was ascertained that two lengths of pipe were broken. These were replaced as promptly as possible, so that within twenty-four hours New York was again watered.

Great praise is due to the inhabitants of Brooklyn for their assistance at the time. It may be observed in conclusion, that both scientifically and practically this accident has taught several useful facts to our surveyors and engineers.

Our deputy sheriffs, if we are to judge by the Express, have some very queer fish among them. One Farrell, who is now in Eldridge street jail for his misdeeds, while acting in the capacity of deputy sheriff, sold the goods of Mrs. Sharkland, 16 Bond street, although they were already mortgaged to another person. A man named Brown was also arrested as his associate in the robbery. The City Hall wants a thorough clearing from first to last.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

By Park Benjamin.

'Tis Christmas Eve. I hear the chime
Of bells announce the holy time.
The air grows muter as they fling
Their soft, sweet sounds afar,
As if, borne on an angel's wing,
Came music from a star.

'Tis Christmas Eve. I look above
And see, in thought, the mission'd Dove
Descending from a silver cloud,
With glory round his form,
While sounds a Voice, not wild or loud—
The Voice that hushed the storm.

That Voice comes blended with the tone,
Which, half in mirth and half in moan,
A gleeful requiem sings for all,
Who, in this holy time,
Will heed that solemn spirit-call,
The bells' melodious chime.

Ring on, sweet bells! ye bring to earth
Remembrance of the Saviour's birth;
And with it dreams of love and home,
Of innocent, calm days,
When guarded childhood loved to roam
In virtue's pleasant ways.

Bells, bells—sweet bells! the long ago
Comes back while ye are chiming so.
I sit my mother's knee before,
I view her tearful eyes,
And hear her, as she says, "Adore
Thy Maker, good and wise!"

Ring on! Ye stir the soul of prayer
Thus floating through the dusky air;
Your music breathes a fond accord,
As in that night of old,
When first the heralds of the Lord
Emanuel's coming told.

CHANTICLEER.

A Thanksgiving Story of the Peabody Family.

By Cornelius Mathews.

(Continued from p. 77.)

They were invited to the table, but refusing, asked permission to sit at the fire, which being granted, they took their station on either side of the hearth. The younger staggered feebly to his seat, and kept his gaze closely fixed on the other.

"He had better take something," said old Sylvester, looking towards the young man and addressing the other. "Is your young friend ill?"

"With an ailment food cannot relieve, I fear," the man answered.

Turning slowly at this question, the young man answered,

"We may not prove fit company for such as you; and if so the event should prove, we will pass on and trouble you no farther. If every thread were dry as summer flax," he added, in a tone of deep feeling, "I, for one, am not fit to sit among honest people."

"You should not say so, my son," said old Sylvester; "let us hope that all men may on a day like this sit together; that, remembering God's many mercies to us all, in the preservation of our lives, in his blessed change of seasons, in hours of holy meditation allowed to us, every man in very gratitude to the Giver of all Good, for this one day in the year at least, may suspend all evil thoughts and be at peace with all his fellow-creatures."

The young man turned towards the company at the table, but not so far that his whole face could be seen.

"Have all who sit about you at that table," he asked, glancing slowly round, "performed the duty to which you refer, and purged their bosoms of unkindness towards their fellow-men? Is there none who grasps the widow's substance? who cherishes scorn and hatred of kindred? who judges harshly of the absent?"

There was a movement in different members of the company, but old Sylvester hushed them with a look, and took upon himself the business of reply.

"It may be," said old Sylvester, "that some of us are disquieted, for be it known to you that one of the children of this household is absent from among us for causes which may well disturb our thoughts."

"I have heard the story," the young man continued, "and if I know it aright, there are the truths of that history: There were two men, friends, once in this neighborhood, Mr. Barbary, the preacher, and your grandson, Elbridge Peabody. Something like a year ago the preacher suddenly disappeared from this region, and the report arose, and constantly spread, that he had fallen by the hand of his friend, that grandchild of yours. It began in a cloudy whisper, afar off, but swelled from day to day, from hour to hour, till it overshadowed this whole region, and not the least of the darkness it caused was on this spot, where this ancient homestead stands, and where the young man had grown and lived from the hour of his birth. He saw coldness and avoidance on the highway; he was shrunk from on Sabbath mornings and by children. But this was little and could be borne—the world was against him; but when he saw an aged face averted"—he looked at old Sylvester steadily—"and a mother's countenance sad and hostile——"

"Sad—but not hostile," the widow murmured.

"Sorrowful and troubled, at least," the young man rejoined, "his life, for all of happiness, was at an end. He must cease to live, or he must restore the ancient sunshine which had lighted the windows of the home of his boyhood. He knew that his friend had not fallen by his hand; that he still lived, but in a far distant place, which none but a long and weary journey could reach."

"He should have declared as much," interposed the old patriarch.

"No, sir; his word would have been but as the frail leaf blown idly from the autumn-bow, nothing but the living presence of his friend could silence the voice of the accuser. He rose up and departed, without counsel of any, trusting only in God and his own strength, he bore with him neither bag nor baggage, scrip nor scrippage—not even a change of raiment; but with a handful of fruit, and the humble provision which his good mother had furnished for the harvest-field, he set forth, day and night he journeyed on the track he knew his friend had taken to that far country, toiling in the fields to secure food and lodging for the night, and some scant aids to carry him from place to place—pushing on fast and far through the western country, in hunger and distress, passing by the very door of prosperous kinsfolk, but not tarrying a moment to seek relief."

At this point Mrs. Jane Peabody glanced at her husband.

"And so, by one stage and another hastening on, he reached that great metropolis in the south, the city of New Orleans; often, as hoped, on the very steps of his friend, but never overtaking him, with fortune at so low an ebb that there he was well-nigh wasted in strength, hunger-stricken and tattered in dress; driven to live in hovels till some chance restored him the little means to advance; so mean of person that his dearest friend, his nearest kinsman, even his old playfellow there," pointing to Mr. Tiffany Carrack, "who had wrestled with him in the hayfield, who had sat with him in childish talk often and many a time by summer stream-sides, would have passed him by as one unknown."

The glance which, in speaking this, he directed at Mr. Carrack, kindled on that young gentleman's countenance a ruby glow, so intense and fiery that it would seem as if it must have burned up the tawny tufts before their very eyes, like so much dry stubble. There was a glow of another kind in the captain's broad face, which shone like another sun, as he contemplated the young men, glancing from one to the other.

"The young man, bent on that one purpose as on life itself," he continued, silencing his companion, who seemed eager to speak, with a motion of his finger, "through towns, over waters, upon deserts, still pursued his way, and, to be brief in a weary history, there, in the very heart of that great region of gold, among diggers and searchers, and men distracted in a thousand ways in that perilous hunt, to find his simple-hearted friend, the preacher, in an out-of-the-way wilderness among the mountains, exhorting the living, comforting the sick, consoling the dying—and then, for the first time, he learned, what his friend had carefully concealed before, the motive of his self-banishment to this distant country."

His companion would have spoken, but the young man hurrying on, allowed him not a word.

"You who know his history," he continued, addressing the company at the table, "know what calamity had once come upon the household of Mr. Barbary, by the unlawful thirst for gold, that he held its love as the curse of curses; he thought if he could but once throw himself in its midst, where that passion raged the most, he would be doing his master's service most faithfully, more than in this quiet country place of peaceful households, but when he learned the peril and the sore distress of his young friend, he tarried not a moment. 'To restore peace to one injured mind,' he said; 'to bring back harmony to one household, is a clear and certain duty which will outweigh the vague chances of the good I may do here.' The young man cherished but one wish; through storm and trial and distress of every name and hue, if he could but reach home on the day of Thanksgiving, and stand up there before his assembled kindred a vindicated man, he would be requited fully for all his toil. He took ship; in tempest, and with many risks of perishing far away unvindicated, in the middle of the wild sea."

The widowed mother could restrain herself no longer, but rushing forward, she removed the young man's hat from his brow, parted his locks, and casting herself upon his neck, gave utterance to her feelings in the affecting language of Scripture, which she had listened to in the morning: "My son was dead, and is alive again—he was lost, and is found!"

Miriam timidly grasped his offered hand, and was silent. The company had risen from the table and gathered around.

"Now," said William Peabody, "I could believe—be glad to believe all this, if he had but brought Mr. Barbary with him."

The elder stranger cast back his coat, removed his hat, and standing forth, said, "I am here, and testify to the truth, in every word, of all my young friend has declared to you."

On this declaration the Peabodys, without an exception, hastened to welcome and address the returned Elbridge, and closed upon him in a solid group of affectionate acknowledgment. Old Sylvester stood looking loftily down over all from the outer edge of the circle, and while they were busiest in congratulations and well-wishes, he went forward.

"Stand back!" cried the old man, waving the company aside with outspread arms, and advancing with extended hand towards his grandson. "I have an atonement to render here, which I call you all to witness."

"I take your hand, grandfather," Elbridge interposed, "but not in acknowledgment of any wrong on your part. You have lived a hundred blameless years, and I am not the one this day to breathe a reproach for the first time on your spotless age."

Tears filled the old patriarch's eyes, and with a gentle hand he led his grandson silently to the table, to which the whole company returned, there being room for Mr. Barbary as well.

At this crisis of triumphant explanation, Mopsey, who had, under one pretext and another, evaded the bringing in of the pie to the last moment, appeared at the kitchen-door, bearing before her, with that air of extraordinary importance peculiar to the negro countenance on eventful occasions, a huge brown dish, with which she advanced to the head of the table, and with an emphatic bump, answering to the pithy speeches of warriors and statesmen at critical moments, deposited the great Thanksgiving pumpkin-pie. Looking proudly around, she simply said, "Dere!"

It was the blossom and crown of Mopsey's life the setting down and full delivery to the family of that, the greatest pumpkin-pie ever baked in that house, from the greatest pumpkin ever reared among the Peabodys in all her long backward recollection of past Thanksgivings; and her manner of setting it down was, in its most defiant form, a clincher and a challenge to all makers and bakers of pumpkin-pies, to all cutters and carvers, to all diners and eaters, to all friends and enemies of pumpkin-pie in the thirty or forty United States. The Brundages, too, might come and look at it if they had a mind to!

The Peabody family, familiar with the pie from earliest infancy, were struck dumb, and sat silent for the space of a minute, contemplating its vastness and beauty. Old Sylvester even, with his hundred years of pumpkin-pie experience, was staggered, and little Sam jumped up and clapped his hands in his old grandfather's arms, and struggled to stretch himself across, as if he would appropriate it, by actual possession, to himself. The joy of the Peabodys was complete, for the lost grandson had returned, and the Thanksgiving pie was a glorious one, and if it was the largest share that was allotted to the returned Elbridge, will any one complain? And yet at times a cloud came upon the young man's brow—when dinner was passed with pleasant family talk, questionings and experiences, as they sat about the old homestead hearth—which even the playful gambols of the children, who sported about him like so many friendly spirits, could not drive away. The heart of cousin Elbridge was not in their childish freaks and fancies, as it had been in other days. The shining solitude looking in at the windows seemed to call him without.

As though it had caught something of the genial spirit that glowed within the house, the wind was laid without, and the night softened with the beauty of the rising moon. With a sadness on his brow which neither the old homes end nor the pure heavens cast there, Elbridge went forth into the calm night, and sitting for a while by the road beneath an ancient locust tree, where he had often read his book in the summer-times of boyhood, he communed with himself. He was happy—what mortal man could be happier?—in all his wishes come to pass; his very dreams had taken life, and proved to be realities and friends, and yet a sadness he could not drive away followed his steps. Why was this? That moment, if his voice or any honorable and sinless motion of his hand could have ordained it, he would have dismissed himself from life, and ceased to be a living partaker in the scenes about him. Even then—for happy as he was, he dreaded, in prophetic fear, the chances which beset our mortal path. The weight of mortality was heavy upon the young man's spirit.

Thinking over all the way he had passed, oh! who could answer that he, with the thronging company of busy passions and desires, could ever hope to reach an old age and never go astray? Oh, blessed is he (he thought) who can lie down to death, can close his account with this world, having safely escaped the temptations, the crimes, the trials, which make of good men even, in moments of weakness and misjudgment, the false speaker, the evil-doer, the slanderer, the coward, the hasty assailant, and (oh, dreadful, perchance!) the seeming guilty murderer himself. Strange thoughts for a prosperous lover's night, but earth is not heaven. With the sweat of anguish on his brow he bowed his head as one whose trouble is heavy to be borne. Yet even then the thought of the sweet heaven over him, with all its glorious promises, came upon him, and as he lifted up his eyes from the earth, the moon sailing forth from the clouds, and flooding the region with silver light, disclosed a figure so gentle and delicate, and in its features so pure of all our common passions, it seemed as if his troubled thoughts had summoned a spirit before him from the better world. As he stood regarding it in melancholy calmness, it extended towards him a hand.

"No, no," he said, declining the gentle salutation and retiring a pace, "touch me not, Miriam, I am not worthy of your pure companionship. If you knew what passed and is passing in my breast you would loathe me as a leper."

She was silent, and dropped her eyes before him.

"Think not, my gentle mistress," he added presently, "my heart is changed towards you. The glow is only too bright and warm."

"If you love me not, Elbridge," she interposed quickly, "fear not to say so, even now. I will bear the pang as best I can."

"You have suffered too much already," he rejoined, touched to the heart. "My long silence must have been as death to one so kind and gentle."

"I have suffered," was all she said. "One word from you in your long absence would have made me happy."

"It would, I know it would, and yet I could not speak it," Elbridge replied. "When, with a blight upon my name, I left those halls," pointing to the old homestead standing in shadow of the autumn trees, "I vowed to know them no more, that my step should never cross their threshold, that my voice should never be heard again in those ancient chambers, that no being of all that household should have a word from these lips or hands till I could come back a vindicated man; that I would perish in distant lands, find a silent grave among strangers, far from mother and her I loved, or that I would come back with my lost friend, in his living form, to avouch and testify my truth and innocence."

"And had you no thought of me in that cruel absence, dear Elbridge?" asked Miriam.

"Of you!" he echoed, now taking her hand, "of you! When in all these my wanderings, in weary nights, in lonely days, on seas and deserts far away, sore of foot and sick at heart, making my couch beneath the stars, in the tents of savage men, in the shadow of steeples that know not our holy faith, was it not my religion and my only solace that one like you thought of me as I of her, and though all the world abandoned and distrusted the wanderer, there was one star in the distant horizon which yet shone true, and trembled with a hopeful light upon my path!"

"Are we not each others now?" she whispered softly, as she lay her gentle head upon his bosom; "and if we have erred, and repent but truly, will not He forgive us?"

As she lifted up her innocent face to heaven, did not those gentle tears which fell unheard by mortal ear, from those fair eyes, drop in hearing of Him who hears and acknowledges the latest sound of true affection, through all the boundless universe, musically as the chime of holy Sabbath bells?

"You are my dear wife," he answered, folding her close to his heart, "and if you forgive and still cherish me, happiness may still be ours; and although no formal voice has yet called us one, by all that's sacred in the stillness of the night, and by every honest beating of this heart, dear Miriam, you are mine, to watch, to tend, to love, to reverence, in sickness, in sorrow, in care, in joy: by all that belongs of gaiety to youth, to manhood and to age, we will have one home, one couch, one fireside, one grave, one God, and one hereafter."

An old familiar instrument, swept as he well knew by his mother's fingers, sounded at that moment from the homestead, and hand in hand, blending their steps, they returned to the Thanksgiving household within.

CHAPTER X.—THE CONCLUSION.

When Elbridge and Miriam re-entered the homestead, they found the best parlor, which they had left in humble dependence on the light of a single home-made wick, now in full glow, and wide awake in every corner, with a perfect illumination of lamps and candles; and every thing in the room had woked up with them. The old brass andirons stood shining like a couple of bareheaded little grandfathers by the hearth; the letters in the sampler over the mantel, narrating the ages of the family, had renewed their color, the tall old clock, allowed to speak again, stood like an overgrown schoolboy with his face newly washed, stretching himself up in a corner; the painted robins and partridges on the wall, now in full feather, strutting and flying about in all the glory of an unfading plumage; and at the rear of all, the huge back-log on the hearth glowed and rolled in his place as happy as an alderman at a city feast. The Peabodys, too, partook of the new illumination, and were there in their best looks, scattered about the room in cheerful groups, while in the midst of all the widow Margaret, her face lighted with a smile which came there from far-off years, holding in her hand, as we see an angel in the sunny clouds in old pictures, the ancient harpsichord, which till now had been laid away as out of use for many a long day of sadness.

While Elbridge and Miriam stood still in wonder at the sudden change of th.

living pageant, old Sylvester, his white head carried proudly aloft, appeared from the sitting-room with Mr. Barbary, a quaint figure, freed now of his long coat, and bearing no trace of travel on his neat apparel and face of cheerful gravity. Leaving the preacher in the centre of the apartment, the patriarch advanced quietly towards the young people, and addressing himself to Elbridge, said, "My children, I have a favor to ask of you."

"Anything, grandfather!" Elbridge answered promptly.

"You are sure?" old Sylvester's eyes twinkled as he spoke.

"It would be the pleasure and glory of my young days," Elbridge answered again, "to crown your noble old age, grandfather, with any worthy wreath these hands could fashion, and not call it a favor either."

Old Sylvester, smiling from one to the other, said, "You are to be married immediately."

The young couple fell back and dropped each the other's hand, which they had been holding. Miriam trembled and shrunk the farthest away.

"You will not deny me?" the grandfather said again. "You are the youngest, and the last whom I can hope to see joined in that bond which is to continue our name and race. It is my last request on earth."

At these simple words, turning, and with a fond regard which spoke all their thoughts, Miriam and Elbridge took again each the other's hand, and drew close side to side. The company rose, and Mr. Barbary was on the point of speaking, when there emerged upon the family scene, from an inner chamber, as though he had been a foreigner entering a fashionable drawing-room, Mr. Tiffany Carrack, in the very blossom of full dress, his hair in glossy curl, with white neckcloth and waistcoat of the latest cut and tie, coat and pants of the purest model, pumps and silk stockings, bearing in his hand a gossamer pocket-handkerchief, which he shook daintily as he advanced, and filled the room with a strange fragrance. With mincing step, just dotting the ground, his whole body shaking like a delicate structure in danger every moment of tumbling to the ground, he advanced to where Miriam and Elbridge stood before Mr. Barbary.

"Why, really, 'pon my life and honor, Miriam, you are looking quite charming this evening."

"She should look so now, if ever, Tiffany," said old Sylvester, "for she is just about to be married to your cousin Elbridge."

"No, you don't mean that?" said Mr. Tiffany, touching the tawny tufts tenderly with his perfumed pocket-handkerchief. "Oh, woman! woman! what is your name?" He hesitated for a reply.

"Perfidy!" suggested Mr. Oliver Peabody.

"Yes, that's it. Have I lived to look on this," Mr. Tiffany continued; "to have my young hopes blighted, the rose of my existence cropped, and all that? Is it for this," addressing Miriam directly—he had been talking before to the air, "is it for this I went blackberrying with you in my tender infancy! Is it for this that in the heyday of youth I walked with you to the school-house down the road! Was it for this, that in the prime of manhood I breathed soft music in your ear at the witching time of night!"

As he arrived at this last question, Mopsey, in her new gown of gorgeous pattern, and having laid aside her customary broad-bordered cap, with a high-crowned turban of red and yellow cotton handkerchief on her head, appeared at the parlor door. Mr. Tiffany paused; he saw the Moorish princess before him; rallying, however, he was proceeding to describe himself as a friendly troubadour, whose affection had been responded to, when the captain, placing his mouth to his ear, as in confidence, uttered, in a portentous whisper, "the rat."

Mr. Tiffany immediately lost all joint and strength, subsided into a chair at a distance, and from that moment looked upon the scene like one in a trance.

"All right," said Mr. Oliver, glancing at him, "I don't see just now that, in any point of view, this young gentleman is destined to carry the principles of free government—anywhere."

The family being now all gathered, Mr. Barbary proceeded, employing a simple and impressive form in use in that family from its earliest history:

"You, the bridegroom and the bride, who now present yourselves candidates of the covenant of God and of your marriage before him, in token of your consenting affections and united heart, please to give your hands to one another.

"Mr. Bridegroom, the person whom you now take by the hand, you receive to be your married wife; you promise to love her, to honor her, to support her, and in all things to treat her as you are now, or shall hereafter be convinced is by the laws of Christ made your duty—a tender husband, with unspotted fidelity till death shall separate you.

"Mrs. Bride, the person whom you now hold by the hand you accept to be your married husband; you promise to love him, to honor him, to submit to him, and in all things to treat him as you are now, or shall hereafter be convinced is by the laws of Christ made your duty—an affectionate wife, with inviolable loyalty till death shall separate you.

"This solemn covenant you make, and in this sacred oath bind your souls in the presence of the Great God, and before these witnesses.

"I then declare you to be husband and wife, regularly married according to the laws of God and the Commonwealth; therefore, what God hath thus joined together let no man put asunder."

When these words had been solemnly spoken, the widow Margaret struck her ancient harpsichord to an old familiar tune of plaintive tenderness, and the young bridegroom, holding Miriam's hand in an affectionate clasp, answered the music with a little hymn or carol, often used before among the Peabodys on a like occasion:

"Entreat me not—I ne'er will leave thee,
Ne'er loose this hand in bower or hall;
This heart, this heart shall ne'er deceive thee,
This voice shall answer ever to thy call."

To which Miriam, after a brief pause of hesitation, in that tone of chanting almost familiar to her, answered,

"Thy God is mine, where'er thou rovest,
Where'er thou dwellest there too will I dwell;
In the same grave shall she thou lovest
Lie down with him she loves so well."

Like a cheerful voice answering to these, and wishing, out of the mysterious darkness of night, all happiness and prosperity to the young couple, the silver call of Chanticleer arose without, renewed and renewed again, as if he could never tire of announcing the happy union to all the country round.

And now enjoyment was at its height among the Peabodys, helped by Plenty, who, with Mopsey for chief assistant, hurried in with plates of shining pippins, baskets of nuts, brown jugs of new cider of home-made vintage. Mrs. Carrack, who had selected the simplest garment in her wardrobe, moving about in aid of black Mopsey, tendering refreshment to her old father first, and Mrs. Jane Peabody insisting on being allowed to distribute the walnuts with her own hand.

The children, never at rest for a moment, frisked to and fro like so many merry dolphins, disporting in the unaccustomed candlelight, to which they were commonly strangers. They were listened to in their childish prattle kindly by every one, indulged in all their foolish ways, as if the grown-up Peabodys, for this night at least, believed that they were indeed little citizens of the Kingdom of Heaven straying about this wicked world on parole. Uncle Oliver, once more spreading his Declaration of Independence handkerchief on his knees, attempted to put them to the question as to their learning. They all recognized Dr. Franklin, with his spectacles thrown upon his brow, among the signers, but, denying all knowledge of anything more, ran away to the captain, who was busy building, a dozen at a time, paper packet-ships, and launching them upon the table for a sea.

In the very midst of the mirthful hubbub old Sylvester called Robert and William to his side, and was heard to whisper,

"Bring 'em in!"

William and Robert were gone a moment and returned, bearing, under heavy headway, tumbling and pitching on one side constantly, two ancient spinning-wheels, Mopsey following with snowy flecks of wool and spinning-sticks. Old Sylvester arose, and delivering a stick and flock to Mrs. Carrack and Mrs. Jane Peabody, requested them, in a mild voice, and as a matter of course already settled, "to begin." A spinning-match!

"Yes; anything you choose to-night, father."

Rolling back their sleeves, adjusting their gowns, the wheels being planted on either side of the fireplace, Mrs. Jane and Mrs. Carrack, stick in hand, seized each on her allotment of wool and sent the wheels whirling. It was a cheerful sight to see the two matrons closing-in upon the wheel, retiring, closing-in again. Whose wheel is swiftest, whose thread truest? Now Mrs. Jane—now Mrs. Carrack. If either, Mrs. Carrack puts the most heart in her work.

"Now she looks like my Nancy," said old Sylvester, in a glow, "as when she used to spin and sing in the old upper chamber."

Away they go. Whose thread is swiftest, whose thread the truest now?

While swift and free the contest wages, the parlor door standing open, and beyond that the door of the sitting-room, look down the long perspective. Do you not see in the twilight of the kitchen fire a dark head lighting up, as in flashes, with a glittering row of teeth, with a violent agitation of the body, with gusty ha-ha's and fragments of an uproarious chant flying through the door, something to this effect:

"Oh, de fine ladies, how dey do spin—spin—spin,
Like de gals long ago—long ago!
I bet te'der one don't win—win—win,
Kase de diemond flowers on her fingers grow.
Lay down your white gloves, take up de wool,
Round about de whirly wheel go;
Back'ard and for'ard nimble feet pull,
Like de nice gals long—long ago!"

Silence follows, in which nothing is observable from that quarter more than a great pair of white eyes rolling about in the partial darkness. Who was other than pleased that, in spite of Mopsey's decision, old Sylvester determined that if either, Mrs. Carrack's work was done a little the soonest, and that her thread was a little the truest?

During the contest, the old merchant and his wife had conversed, closely, apart—the green shade had lost its terrors, and he could look on it steadily now; and at the close, William Peabody, approaching the fireplace, drew from his bosom the old parchment deed, which in his hunger for money had so often disquieted his visits to the homestead, and thrust it into the very heart of the flame, which soon thrived fed it up, and, conveying it out at the chimney, before the night was past spread it in peaceful ashes over the very grounds which it had so long disturbed.

"So much for that!" said the old merchant, as the last flake vanished. "And now, nephew," he addressed himself to Elbridge, "fulfilling an engagement connected with your return, I resign to you all charge of your father's property."

"Did you bring anything with you from the Gold Region?" Mrs. Carrack interposed.

"Not one cent, aunt," Elbridge answered promptly.

"You may add, William," pursued Mrs. Carrack, "the sums of mine you have in hand."

William Peabody was pausing on this proposition, the sums in question being at that very moment embarked in a most profitable speculation.

Upon the very height of the festivity, when it glowed the brightest and was most musical with mirthful voices, there had come to the casement a moaning sound as if borne upon the wind from a distance—a wailing of anguish, at the same time like and unlike that of human suffering. By slow advances it approached nearer and nearer to the homestead, and whenever it arose it brought the totally enjoyment to a momentary pause. It had drawn so near that it sounded now again, as if in mournful lamentation, at the very door, when Mopsey, her dark face almost white, and her brow wrinkled with anxiety, rushed in.

"Grandfather," she said, addressing old Sylvester, "blind Sorrel's dying in the door-yard."

There was not one in that company whom the announcement did not cause to start. Led by old Sylvester, they hastily arose, and, conducted by Mopsey, followed to the scene. Blind Sorrel was lying by the moss-grown horse-trough at the gate.

"I noticed her through the day," said Oliver, "wandering up the lane as if she was seeking the house."

"The death agony must have been upon her then," said William Peabody, shading his eyes with his hand.

"She remembered, perhaps, her young days," old Sylvester added, "when she used to crop the door-yard grass."

Mopsey, in her solicitude to have the deathbed of poor blind Sorrel properly attended, had brought with her in the event of the paling or obscuration of the moon, a dark lantern which she held tenderly aside, as though the poor old creature still possessed her sight; immovable herself as though she had been a swarthy image in stone, while on the other side, William Peabody, near her head, stood gazing upon the animal with a fixed intensity, breathing hard and watching her dying struggle with a rigid steadiness of feature almost painful to behold.

"Has carried me to mill many a day," he said, "some pleasant hours of my life spent upon her back, sauntering along at early day."

"Your mother rode her to meeting," Sylvester addressed his second son, "on your wedding-day, Oliver. Sorrel was of a long-lived race."

"She was the gentlest horse-creature you ever owned, father," added Mrs. Carrack, turning affectionately towards old Sylvester, "and humored us girls when we rode her as though she had been a blood relation."

"I'm not so sure of that," Mr. Tiffany Carrack rejoined, "for she has dumped me in a ditch more than once."

"That was your own careless riding, Tiffany," said the captain. "I don't believe she had the least ill-will towards any living creature, man or beast."

It was observed that whenever William Peabody spoke, blind Sorrel turned her feeble head in that direction, as if she recognised and singled out his voice from all the others.

"She knows your voice, father, even in her darkness," said the captain, "as the sailor tells his old captain's step on deck at night."

"Well, she may, Charles," the merchant replied, "for she was foaled the same day I was born."

The old creature moaned and heaved her side fainter and fainter.

"Speak to her, William," said the old grandfather.

William Peabody bent down, and in a tremulous voice said, "Sorrel, do you know me?"

The poor blind creature lifted up her aged head feebly towards him, heaved her weary side, gasped once and was gone. The moon, which had been shining with a clear and level light upon the group of faces, dipped at that moment behind the orchard trees, and at the same instant the light in the lantern flickering feebly, was extinguished.

"What do you mean by putting the light out, Mopsey?" old Sylvester asked.

"I knew de old lamp would be goin' out, massa, soon as ever blind Sorrel die; I tremble so I do' no what I'm sayin'." It was poor Mopsey's agitation which had shaken out the light.

"Never shall we know a more faithful servant, a truer friend than poor blind Sorrel," they all agreed, and bound still closer together by so simple a bond as common sympathy in the death of the poor old blind family horse, they returned within the homestead.

They were scarcely seated again when William Peabody, turning to Mrs. Carrack, said, "Certainly," referring to the transfer of the money of hers in his hands to Elbridge, "he will need some ready money to begin the world with."

All was cheerful friendship now; the family reconciled in all its members, sitting about their aged father's hearth on this glorious Thanksgiving night, the gayer mood subsiding, a sudden stillness fell upon the whole house, such as precedes some new turn in the discourse.

Old Sylvester Peabody sat in the centre of the family, moving his body to and fro gently, and lifting his white head up and down upon his breast; his whole look and manner strongly arresting the attention of all—of the children not the least. After a while the old man paused, and looking mildly about, addressed the household.

"This is a happy day, my children," he said, "but the seeds of it were sown, you must allow an old man to say, long, long ago. If one good Being had not died in a far country and a very distant time, we could not have this comfort now."

The children watched the old grandfather more closely.

"I am an old man, and shall be with you, I feel, but for a little while yet, as one who stands at the gate of the world to come, looking through and through which he is soon to pass, will you not allow me to believe that I thought of the hopes of your immortal spirits in your youth?"

As being the eldest, and answering for the rest, William Peabody replied, "We will."

"Did I not teach you then, or strive my best to teach, that there was but one Holy God?"

"You did, father, you did!" the widow Margaret answered.

"That his only Son died for us?"

"Often, often!" said Mrs. Carrack.

"That we must love one another as brethren?"

"At morning and night, in winter and summer—by the hearth and in the field, you did," Oliver rejoined.

"That there is but one path in happiness and peace here and hereafter," he continued, "through the performance of our duty towards our Maker, and our fellow-men of every name, and tongue, and clime, and color; to love your dear native land as she sits happy among the nations, but to remember this, our natural home, is but the ground-nest and cradle from which we spread our wings to fly through all the earth with hope and kindly wishes for all men. If the air is cheerful here and the sunlight pleasant, let no barrier or wall shut it in, but pray God, with reverent hope, it spread hence to the farthest lands and seas, till all the people of the earth are lighted up and made glad in the common fellowship of our blessed Saviour, who is, was, and will be evermore to all men—guide, protector and ensample. May He be so to us and ours, to our beloved home and happy fatherland, in all the time to come!"

The old man bowed his head in presence of his reconciled household, and fell into a sweet slumber. Not one of all that company but echoed the old man's prayer—"May He be so to us and ours, in our beloved home and happy fatherland in all the time to come!"

On this, on every day of Thanksgiving and Praise be that old man's blessed prayer in all quarters, among all classes and kindred, everywhere repeated—"May He be so to us and ours, to our beloved home and happy fatherland in all the time to come!"

And when, like that good old man, we come to bow our heads at the close of a long, long life, may we, like him, fall into a gentle sleep, conscious that we have done the work of charity, and spread about our path, wherever it lead, peace and good will among men.

THE END.

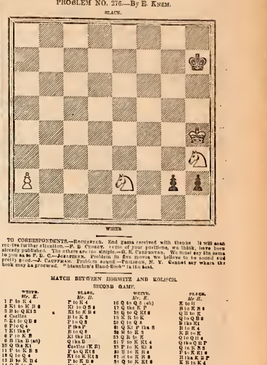
Garibaldi on the Pope.—On the 30th of October Garibaldi made a short address to the people of Naples, in response to calls from those in the street who knew him to be in a house near by. He said, among other things: "Before fighting against the enemy outside, you have internal enemies to beat down, and I will tell you that the chief of them is the Pope. If I have acquired any merit with you, I have acquired that of telling you the truth frankly and without a veil. In using this privilege I tell you that your chief enemy is the Pope. I am a Christian as you are; yes, I am of that religion which has broken the bonds of slavery and has proclaimed the freedom of men; the Pope who oppresses his subjects and is an enemy of Italian independence is no Christian; he denies the very principle of Christianity—he is the Antichrist. This truth you must spread among all those who are near to you, for it is only when all Italians shall be thoroughly convinced of this truth that Italy will be really free and united."

Novel Spanish Trick.—A local journal relates the following impudent robbery in a church at Seville: "A lady went to the altar in order to receive the sacrament, and knelt down beside a woman who was there apparently for the same purpose. While waiting her turn the lady fancied she felt a hand in her pocket, and accordingly looked at her neighbor, but perceiving that this latter was, to all appearance, praying most fervently with her hands crossed on her breast, she reproached herself for her suspicion. But when, on leaving the altar, she put her hand into her pocket, she found that her purse, containing twenty-five douros (125f.) was gone. She in consequence pointed out the suspected person to a police officer, who at once arrested her, and found the stolen purse in her possession, and also made the discovery that the woman had two well-made wax arms crossed on her breast in the attitude of devotion, in order that she might be able, without exciting suspicion, to employ a pair of real flesh and blood in exercises anything but devout."

CHESS.

PROBLEM NO. 276.—By E. Knem.

BLACK.



WHITE.

To Correspondents.—Rochester. End game received with thanks. It will soon receive further attention.—F. B. Crosby. Some of your positions, we think, have been already published. The others are too simple.—G. E. Carpenter. We must say the same to you as to F. B. C.—Josephus. Problem in five moves we believe to be sound and pretty good.—J. Cauffman. Problem sound.—Philidor, N. Y. Cannot say where the book may be procured. "Staunton's Hand-Book" is the best.

MATCH BETWEEN HORWITZ AND KOLISCH.

SECOND GAME.

White. Mr. K.	Black. Mr. H.	White. Mr. K.	Black. Mr. H.
1 P to K 4	P to K 4	16 Q to Q 5 (ch)	K to R
2 Kt to K B 3	Kt to Q B 3	17 Q tks K P	B to K B 3
3 B to Q Kt 5	Kt to K B 3	18 Q to Q Kt 3	Q R to K
4 Castles	B to K 2	19 K R to K	Q to Q B 5
5 Kt to Q B 3	P to Q 3	20 Q to Q 3	B tks Kt
6 P to Q 4	P tks P	21 Q Kt P tks B	R to K 4
7 Kt tks P	B to Q 2	22 R to K 3	K B to K
8 P to K B	Kt tks Kt	23 Q R to K	Q to Q B 4
9 B tks B (ch)	Q tks B	24 P to K Kt 4	Q tks Q B P
10 Q tks Kt	Castles (K B)	25 P to K Kt 5	Q to K R 3
11 P to K B 3	P to Q Kt 3	26 B to K R 4	P to K Kt 3
12 Q to Q 4	Kt to K Kt 3	27 R to K R 3	R tks K B P
13 B to K B 4	P to K B 3	28 Q to K Kt 3	K R to K 4
14 Q R to Q	Kt to K 4	29 Q to R 4	R to K B
15 B tks Kt	B P tks B	30 P to K R 3	B tks P (ch)

Mr. Kolisch resigns.

THIRD GAME.

White. Mr. H.	Black. Mr. K.	White. Mr. H.	Black. Mr. K.
1 P to K 4	P to K 4	17 B to K Kt 3	P to K R 4
2 K Kt to B 3	K Kt to B 3	18 Kt tks Kt	B tks Kt
3 Kt tks K P	P to Q 3	19 B tks K R P	P to K Kt 3
4 Kt to K B 3	Kt tks P	20 B tks Kt P	Q R to K Kt
5 P to Q B 3	P to Q 4	21 B to K B 4	R tks B
6 B to K 3	B to Q 3	22 B tks K P	B tks Q B P
7 P to Q 3	Kt to K B 3	23 Q B to B	B to Q 3
8 Q B to K Kt 5	B to K 3	24 Q to K B 3	Q to Q 3
9 Kt to Q B 3	P to Q B 3	25 Q to K B 7	R to K B
10 Q Kt to B 2	Q Kt to Q 2	26 Q tks Kt (ch)	Q tks Q
11 Castles	Q to B 3	27 B tks Q (ch)	K tks B
12 B to K R 4	Castles (Q R)	28 R to B 3	R to B 3
13 Q Kt to Q 4	Q B to K	29 K to R 3	B to K 4 (ch)
14 P to Q Kt 4	K Kt to Kt 3	30 P to K Kt 3	B tks P (ch)
15 P to K R 3	K Kt to K 4	31 K to Kt 2	R to B 4
16 Kt tks B	P tks Kt	32 P tks B	R tks B

Mr. Kolisch wins.

Latest.—Herr Kolisch won his match. Final score: Herr Kolisch, 3; Herr Horwitz, 1; Drawn, 0.

SOLUTIONS TO PROBLEMS.

Problem No. 274.—R to Q 5; B to K Kt 3, mate.

Problem No. 273.—R to K 4 (ch), B tks R; Kt to Q 6 (ch); B tks R (dis ch); Kt to Kt 6, dis checkmate.

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Juvenile Billiards.—As a rule of play, is it not best for a beginner "to play certainty," and out of two or more different modes of counting which may appear on the table, to choose that which he is most sure of making?

Ans.—Your question is one which cannot be positively answered, as other circumstances would modify matters considerably. But the following may be adopted as a general rule of play: Where two strokes present themselves, one a simple one which, when made, would leave the balls in a position where even an expert would find it difficult to count, the other, less easy of execution, but which, if executed, would leave the balls in a position favorable for a run, it is judicious play to attempt the more difficult stroke, in view of the prospective advantages likely to result from it. As we have said, however, no positive rule can be laid down, as the probabilities, the extent of the risk in each individual case, can only be appreciated by correct judgment on the part of the player himself.

J. K. M.—We have neither time nor inclination to correct the mistakes of such parties.

A. V., New York City.—The shot is unquestionably fair. We cannot imagine why it should be disputed.

M. M., Sandusky, Ohio.—It is one of the cases provided for in the rules as set down in the "Game of Billiards."

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

Now and Then.—Those who played billiards six years ago can appreciate the change which has come over the game to which they have remained faithful through good and evil report. They find the billiard-table, formerly ostracised, greeting them now in the houses of their friends, where formerly billiards was scarcely to be spoken of. We say nothing of the vast improvement, in all the machinery of the game, which has so enhanced their skill. They can now visit establishments devoted to their favorite game, furnished and illuminated in a style which throws a refining influence about all connected with it, for it is a remarkable fact that most men are liable to suit their conduct to their surroundings, and rich carpets and fine furniture have a quieting influence even on the roughest and rudest. The most ill-bred man will shrink from spitting on a Brussels carpet. The player also finds his favorite resort the point of reunion for the most refined classes in our city, and has the satisfaction of being surrounded by gentlemen, among whom may be found those who are distinguished in our city in all the learned and artistic professions.

M. Berger's exhibitions tested the popularity of billiards among our most respectable classes. The character of the spectators on those occasions and the high price of admission decided it. Even for the opera one dollar is looked upon as a high price, which puts that refined mode of enjoyment beyond the reach of many. Yet, night after night, M. Berger's room was crowded with spectators at a dollar ahead, and on more than one occasion numbers had to be refused admittance. Ladies belonging the highest circles witnessed M. Berger's skill with delight, and graced by their presence the match between Mr. Phelan and the winner of the late tournament, Mr. Kavanagh.

The press, so long comparatively neglectful of a really national game—we except, of course, the far-sighted few who have been ahead of their fellows—has at last given it that full and complete recognition which is due to the importance it has acquired in the public mind as a means of elevating and innocent amusement.

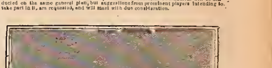
Notice to all Prominent Billiard Players.—In consequence of the marked success which attended the late impromptu billiard tournament and the public interest which it excited, it has been decided to inaugurate an annual series of grand national billiard tournaments, the first of which will take place in the city of New York about the first week in June of the coming year. It will be open to all prominent billiard-players.

The prizes will be highly valuable objects, one of them being a first-class, highly-ornamented and finished billiard-table, worth at least $500, manufactured by Messrs. Phelan & Collender, and presented by them. The other prizes will be decided upon at a future time, and will be of proportionate value.

The game will be played on the prize table, which, in the interest of true billiard science, will be a carom table. Size of the balls to be played with, 2⅝ inches in diameter.

Prominent players, desirous of entering their names as contestants at the tournament, should signify their intention of doing so previous to the 1st of May next. It will be necessary for them to be in this city five or six days before the opening day.

We make this announcement thus early, that those desirous of engaging in the tournament may have an opportunity of going into practice, and thus elevate the average excellence of first-class play. In consequence of the general satisfaction expressed with the arrangement of the late tournament, the Annual National Tournament will be conducted on the same general plan, but suggestions from prominent players intending to take part in it, are requested, and will meet with due consideration.



Made by Mr. Phelan in the complimentary game with Mr. Kavanagh after the tournament. Masse shot; cue ball in contact with middle ball and against the cushion. Only way to [illegible] and leave good break was by playing by a masse on the white ball at A and forcing back on the red.

CHANTICLEER.

A Thanksgiving Story of the Peabody Family.

By Cornelius Matthews.

CHAPTER VII.—THE THANKSGIVING SERMON.

The morning of the day of Thanksgiving came calm, clear and beautiful. A stillness, as of Heaven and not of earth, ruled the wide landscape. The Indian summer, which had been as a gentle mist or veil upon the beauty of the time, had gone away a little—retired, as it were, into the hills and back country, to allow the undimmed heaven to shine down upon the happy festival of families and nations. The cattle stood still in the fields without a low; the trees were quiet as in friendly recognition of the spirit of the hour; no reaper's hook or mower's scythe glanced in the meadow, no rumbling wain was on the road. The birds alone, as being more nearly akin to the feeling of the scene, warbled in the boughs.

But out of the silent gloom of the mist there sprang, as by magic, a lovely illumination which lit the country far and wide, as with a thousand vari-colored lamps. As a maiden who has tarried in her chamber some hour the least expected appears before us, apparelled in all the pomp and hue of brilliant beauty, the fair country, flushed with innumerable tints of the changed autumn-trees, glided forth upon the Indian summer scene, and taught that when kindly Nature seems all foregone and spent she can rise from her couch fresher and more radiant than in her very prime.

What wonder if with the peep of dawn the children leaped from bed, eager to have on their new clothes reserved for the day, and by times appeared before old Sylvester in proud array of little hats, new brightened shoes and shining locks, spun now, as though they had just come from the mint, anxious to have his grandfatherly approval of their comeliness? Shortly after, the horses caught in the distant pastures, the captain and Farmer Oliver having charge of them, were brought in and tied under the trees in the door-yard.

Then, breakfast being early dispatched, there was a mighty running to and fro of the grown people through the house, dresses hurried from old clothes-presses and closets, a loud demand on every hand for pins, of which there seemed to be (as there always is on such occasions) a great lack. The horses were put to Mrs. Carrack's coach, the captain's gig, the old house-wagon, with breathless expectation on the part of the children; and in brief, after bustling preparation and incessant summoning of one member of the family and another from the different parts of the house, all being at last ready and in their seats, the Peabodys set forth for the Thanksgiving sermon at the country meeting-house, a couple of miles away.

The captain took the lead with his wife, and Peabody junior somewhere and somehow between them, followed by the wagon with old Sylvester, still proud of his dexterity as a driver; Oliver, much pleased with the popular character of the conveyance, and wife, with young Robert; William Peabody and wife; little Sam riding between his grandfather's knees in front, and allowed to hold the end of the reins. Slowly, and in great state, after all, rolled Mrs. Carrack's coach with herself and son within, and footman and coachman without.

Chanticleer, too, clear of eye and bright of wing, walked the garden wall, carried his head up, and acted as if he had also put on his thanksgiving suit and expected to take the road presently, accompany the family, and join his voice with theirs at the little meeting-house.

Although the captain, with his high-actioned white horse, kept out of eye-shot ahead, it was Mrs Carrack's fine carriage that had the triumph of the road in itself; for as it rolled glittering on, the simple country people, belated in their own preparations, or tarrying at home to provide the dinner, ran to the windows in wonder and admiration. The plain wagon, bent in the same direction, turned out of the path and gave the great coach the better half of the way, staring a broadside as it passed.

MOPSEY BRINGING IN THE THANKSGIVING TURKEY.

And when the party reached the little meeting-house, what a peace hung about it! The air seemed softer, the sunshine brighter there, as it stood in humble silence among the tall trees which waved with a gentle murmur before its windows. The people, as they arrived, glided noiselessly in, in their neat dresses and looks of decent devotion; others, as they came, made fast their horses under the sheds and trees about—most of them in wagons and plain chaises, brightened into all of beauty they were capable of by a severe attention to the harness and mountings; others—these were a few bachelors and striplings—trotted in quietly on horseback. Before service a few of the old farmers lingered outside discussing the late crops or inquiring after each other's families, who presently went within, summoning from the grassy churchyard—which lay next to the meeting-house—the children who were loitering there reading the gravestones.

When the captain arrived with his gig, under such extraordinary headway that he was near driving across the graveyard into the next county—the country people scampered aside like scared fowl; Mrs. Carrack's great coach, with its liveried outriders, set them staring as if they did not or could not believe their own eyes. With the arrival of old Sylvester they regathered, and almost in a body proffered their aid in hold the horses—to help the old patriarch to the ground—in a word, to show their regard and affection in every way in their power. He tarried but a moment at the door, to speak a word with one or two of the oldest of his neighbors, and passed in, followed by all of his family save Mrs. Carrack and her son, who, under color of hunting up the grave of some old relation, delay in order to make their appearance in the meeting-house by themselves, and independently of the Peabody connection.

Will you pardon me, reader, if I fail to tell you whether this house of worship was of the Methodist, Episcopal or Baptist creed? Whether it had a chancel or altar, or painted windows? Whether the pews had doors to them, and were cushioned or not? Whether the minister wore a gown and bands, or plain suit of black, or was undistinguished in his dress? Will it not suffice if I tell you, as the very belief of my soul, that it was a Christian house, that there were seats for all, that things were well intended and decently ordered, and that with a hymn sung with such purity of heart that its praises naturally joined in with the chiming of the trees and the carols of the birds without, and floated on without a stop to Heaven, when a meek man rose up.

"Some two hundred years ago, our ancestors (he said), finding themselves more comfortable in the wilderness of the New World than they could have reasonably looked for, set apart a day of Thanksgiving to Almighty God for His manifold mercies. That day, God be praised, has been steadily observed throughout this happy land by cheerful gatherings of families, and other festive and devotional observances, down to the present time. Our fathers covenanted, in the love of Christ, to cleave together as brethren, however hard the brunt of fortune might be. That bond still continues. We may not live (he went on, in the very spirit and letter of the first Thanksgiving discourse ever delivered amongst us), as retired hermits, each in our cell apart, nor inquire, like David, how liveth such a man? How is he clad? How is he fed? He is my brother, we are in league together, we must stand and fall by one another. Is his labor harder than mine? Surely I will ease him. Hath he no bed to lie on? I have two—I will lend him one. Hath he no apparel? I have two suits—I will give him one of them. Eats he coarse food, bread and water, and have I better? Surely we will part stakes. He is as good a man as I, and we are bound each to the other; so that his wants must be my wants, his sorrows my sorrows; his sickness my sickness, and his welfare my welfare; for I am as he is: such a sweet sympathy were excellent, comfortable, nay, heavenly, and is the only maker and conserver of churches and commonwealths."

To such as looked upon old Sylvester there seemed a glow and halo about his aged brow and whitened locks, for this was the very spirit of his life.

As though he knew the very secrets of their souls, and touched their very heartstrings with a gentle hand, the preacher glanced from one member of the Peabody household to another, as he proceeded, something in this manner. (For William Peabody): Do I find on this holy day that I love God in all his glorious universe, more than the image even of Liberty, which hath ensnared and enslaved the soul of many a man on the cain of this world? (For buxom Mrs Jane, in her vandyke): Do I stifle the vanity of good looks and comfortable circumstances under a plain garb? (For the jovial captain): Am I not over hasty in pursuit of carnal enjoyment? (For Mr. Oliver, who was wiping his brow with the Declaration of Independence): and eager over-much for the good opinion of men, when I should be quietly serving them without report? (For Mrs Carrack and her son): And what are pomp and fashion but the painted signs of good living where there is no life? These (he continued) are all outward, mere pretences to put off our duty and the care of our souls. Yea, we may have churches, schools, hospitals abounding—but these are mere lath and mortar if we have not also within our own hearts a Church where the pure worship ever goeth on, a school where the true knowledge is taught, a hospital the door whereof standeth constantly open, into which our fellow-creatures are welcomed, and where their infirmities are first cared for with all kindness and tenderness. If these be our inclinings this way, let us be reasonably thankful on this Thanksgiving morning. Let such as are in health be thankful for their good case; and such as are out of health be thankful that they are no worse. Let such as are rich be thankful for their wealth (if it hath been honestly come by), and let such as are poor be thankful that they have no such charge upon their souls. Let old folks be thankful for their wisdom in knowing that young folks are fools; and let young ones be thankful that they may live to see the time when they may use the same privilege. Let lean folks be thankful for their spare ribs; which are not a burden to the harvest-field: fat folks may laugh at lean ones, and grow fatter every day. Let married folks be thankful for blessings both little and great, let bachelors and old maids be thankful for the privilege of kissing other folks' babies, and great good may it do them.

With what a glow of mutual friendship the quaint preacher was warming the plain old meeting-house on that Thanksgiving day.

Finally, and to conclude—he went on in the language of a chronicle of the time—Let no man look upon a turkey to-day, and say, 'This also is vanity.' What is the life of man without creature-comforts, and the stomach of the son of man with no aid from the tin kitchen? Despise not the day of small things while there are pullets on the spit, and let every fowl have fair play between the jaws of thy philosophy. Are not puddings made to be sliced, and pie-crust to be broken? Go thy ways then, according to good sense, good cheer, good appetite, the Governor's proclamation and every other good thing under the sun render thanks for all the good things of this life, and good cookery among the rest; eat, drink and be merry; make not a lean laudation of the bounties of Providence, but let a lively gusto follow a long grace. Feast thankfully, and feast hopingly; feast in good-will to all mankind, Grahamites included, feast in the full and joyous persuasion, that while the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, dinner-time, pudding-time and supper-time are not likely to go out of fashion, least with exulting confidence in the continuance of cooks, kitchens and orthodox expounders of Scripture and the constitution in our ancient, blessed and fat-sliced commonwealth—feast, in short, like a good Christian, proving all things, relishing all things, hoping all things, expecting all things and enjoying all things. Let a good stomach for dinner go hand in hand with a good mind for sound doctrine. Let us all be thankful that a gracious Providence hath furnished each and all with a wholesome and bountiful dinner this day; and if there be none so furnished, let him now make it known, and we will instantly contribute thereto of our separate abundance. There are none who murmur; we all, therefore, have a thanksgiving dinner waiting for us; let us hie home cheerily, and in a becoming spirit of mirth and devotion partake thereof.

The windows of the little meeting-house were up to let in the pleasant sunshine and the very horses who were within hearing of his voice, seemed, by the pricking up of their brown ears, to relish and approve of his discourse. The captain's city nag, as wide awake as any, seemed to address himself to an acquaintance of a heavy bay plougher who stood at the same post, and laying their heads together for the better part of the sermon, they appeared to regard it, as far as they caught its meaning, as sound doctrine, particularly acknowledging that this was as fine a thanksgiving morning as they—who had been old friends and had spent their youth together, being in some way related, in a farmhouse in that neighborhood—had ever known, and when they had said as much as this, they laughed out in very merriness of spirit with a great win now, as the happy audience came streaming forth at the meeting-house door. There were no cold, haughty or distrustful faces now as when they had entered in an hour ago, the genial air of the little meeting-house had melted away all frosts of that kind, and as they mingled under the sober autumn trees, loitering for conversation, inquiring after neighbors, old folks whose infirmities kept them at home, the young children, they seemed, indeed, much more a company of brethren embarked—as sailors say—on a common bottom for happiness and enjoyment. The children were the first to set out for home through the fields on foot; Peabody the younger, little Sam and Robert being attended by the footman in livery, whom Mrs. Carrack relieved from attendance at the rear of the coach.

If the quaint preacher had urged the rational enjoyment of the thanksgiving cheer from the pulpit, Mopsey labored with equal zeal at home to have it worthy of enjoyment. At an early hour she had cleared decks and taken possession of the kitchen, kindling with dawn a great fire in the oven for the pies and another on the hearth for the turkey. But it was from the oven, heaping it to the top with fresh relays of dry wood, that she expected the thanksgiving angel to walk in all his beauty and majesty. In performance of her duty, and from a sense only that there could be no thanksgiving without a turkey, she planted the tin oven on the hearth, spitted the gobbler, and from time to time, in rely as a matter of absolute necessity, gave it a turn; but about the mouth of the great oven she hovered constantly like a spirit; had her head in and out at the opening every other minute; and when at last the pies were slided in upon the warm bottom, she lingered there regarding the changes they were undergoing, with the fond admiration with which a connoisseur in sunsets hangs upon the changing colors of the evening sky. The leisure thus doubly allowed her was employed by Mopsey in scaring away the poultry and idle young chickens which rushed in at the back entrance of the kitchen in swarms, and hopped with yellow legs about the floor with the racket of constant falling showers of corn. Upon the half door opening on the front, the red rooster had mounted, and with his head on one side, observed with a knowing eye all that went forward: showing, perhaps, most interest in the turning of the spit, the impalement of the turkey thereon having been with him an object of special consideration.

The highly colored picture of Warren at Bunker Hill, writhing in his death-agony on one wall of the kitchen, and General Marion feasting from a potato in his tent on the other, did not in the least attract the attention of Mopsey. She saw nothing on the whole horizon of the glowing apartment but the pies and the turkey, and even for the moment neglected to puzzle herself, as she was accustomed to in the pauses of her daily labors, with the wonders and mysteries of an ancient dog-eared spelling-book which lay upon the smoky mantel.

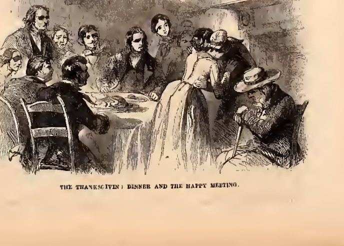
Meanwhile, in obedience to the spirit of the day, the widow Margaret and Miriam, having each diligently disposed of their separate charge in the preparations, making a church of the homestead, conducted a worship in their own simple way. Opposite to each other in the little sitting-room, Miriam opened the old Family Bible, and at the widow Margaret's request, read from that chapter which gives the story of the prodigal son. It was with a clear and pensive voice that she read, but not without a struggle with herself. When the story told that the young man had gone into a far country, that he had wasted his substance in riotous living, that he was abased to the feeding of swine, that he craved in his hunger the very husks, that he lamented the plenty of his father's house, a cloud came upon her countenance, and the simplest eye could have interpreted the thoughts that troubled her. And how the fair young face brightened when she read that the young man resolved to arise and return to the house of his father; the dear encounter; the rejoicing over his return, and the glad proclamation, "This, my son, was dead and is alive again; he was lost and is found."

"If he would come back even so," said the widow when the book was closed, "in sorrow, in poverty, in crime even, I would thank God and be grateful."

"He is not guilty, mother," Miriam pleaded, casting her head upon the widow's bosom and clinging close about her neck.

"I will not think that he is," Margaret answered, lifting up her head. "Guilty or innocent, he is my son—my son!" Clasping the young orphan's

THE FIRST LAW OFFICE RENTED IN 1837 BY ABRAHAM LINCOLN, PRESIDENT ELECT, IN HOFFMAN'S ROW, THIRD DIVISION, UP-STAIRS, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.—SEE PAGE 74.



THE THANKSGIVING DINNER AND THE HAPPY MEETING.

hand, after a pause of tender silence, she gave utterance to her feelings in a Thanksgiving hymn. These were the words:

Father! protect the wanderer on his way;
  Bright be for him thy stars and calm thy seas—
Thanksgiving live upon his lips to-day,
  And in his heart the good man's summer ease.

Almighty! Thou canst bring the pilgrim back,
  With a clear brow to this his childish home;
Guide him, dear Father, o'er a blameless track,
  No more to stray from us, no more to roam.

At this moment a tumult of children's voices was heard in the door-yard, and as the widow turned, young William Peabody was seen struggling with Robert and little Sam, who were holding him back with all their force. As he dragged them forward, being their elder and superior in strength, Peabody junior stretched his throat and called towards the house—"I've seen him—I've seen him!"

"Who have you seen?" asked the widow, rising and approaching the door.

"Mr. Barbary!" When Peabody junior made this answer, the widow advanced with a gleam on her countenance, and gently releasing him, said, "Come, William, and tell us all about it."

"Aunt Margaret," said Robert, thrusting himself between, "don't listen to a word he has to say. I'll tell you all about it. You see we were coming home from meeting, and little Sam got tired, and William and I made a cradle of our hands and were carrying him along very nice."

"Not so very nice, either," Peabody junior interrupted, "for I was pinguy tired."

"That's what I was going to tell you, Aunt Margaret. Bill did get tired, and as we came through the Locust Wood, he made believe to see something, and ran away to get clear of carrying little Sam any farther."

"I did see him!" said Peabody junior, firmly.

"Where was he?" the widow asked.

"Behind the hazel bush, with his head just looking out at the top, all turned white as dead folks do."

Mopsey was in immediately with her dark head, crying out, "Don't believe a word of it."

"I guess you saw nothing but the hazel bush, William," said the widow.

"That was it, aunt, it was the hazel bush with a great mop of moss on it," Robert added.

Miriam sat looking on and listening, pale and trembling.

"If your cousin Elbridge and Mr. Barbary should ever come back," said the widow, addressing Peabody junior, "you would be sorry for what you have said, William."

"So he would, aunt," echoed Robert.

Mopsey was in again from the kitchen; this time she advanced several steps from the door sill into the room, lifted up both her arms and addressed the assembled company.

"One ting I know," said Mopsey, "dere's a big pie baking in dat ere oven, and if Mas'r Elbridge don't eat dat pie, it'll haf to sour, dat I know."

"What is it, Mopsey," asked Margaret, "that gives you such a faith in my son?"

DURING THE CROTON WATER EXCITEMENT, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6.

Our Artist arrived at a propitious moment, when the solemn fact was revealed, that let the pumper pump ever so lustily water was not to be had. The dismay of the crowd was almost indescribable.

DURING THE CROTON WATER EXCITEMENT, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6.

Here there was considerable emulation as to who should have precedence in the pumping arrangements. This point of etiquette brought two of the fair daughters of Erin into collision. They exchanged a good deal of hair and some scratches, and at one time a general muss was anticipated, but at the sight of a policeman the belligerent parties flew to the pump and cooled their angry passions.

"I tell you what it is, missus," Mopsey answered promptly, "dat tanksgivin' when I tumbled down on dis ere sef same floor bringin' in de turkey, everybody laugh but Mas'r Elbridge, and he come from his place and pick me up. He murder anybody! I'll eat de whole tanksgivin' dinner myself if he touch a hair of de old preacher's head to hurt it." Suddenly changing her tone, she added, "Dey're comin' from meetin', I hear de old wagon."

CHAPTER VIII.—THE DINNER.

As the Peabodys approached the homestead, the smoke of the kitchen chimney was visible, circling upward and winding about in the sunshine as though it had been a delicate corkscrew uncorking a great bottle or square old flask of a delicious vintage. The captain averred a quarter of a mile away, the moment they had come upon the brow of the hill, that he had a distinct savor of the fragrance of the turkey, and that it was quite as refreshing as the first odor of the land breeze coming in from sea, and he snuffed it up with a zeal and relish which gave the sign an eager appetite for dinner. The captain's conjecture was strongly confirmed in the appearance of Mopsey, darting, with a dark face of dewy radiance, at the woodpile, and shuffling back with bustling speed to the kitchen with a handful of delicate splinters. "She's giving him the last turn," said the captain.

The shadow of the little meeting-house was still over the captain, even so far away, for he conducted the procession homeward at a pace much less furious than that with which he had advanced in the morning; and Mrs. Carrack, too, observed now, with a strange pleasure, what she had given no heed to before when the fine coach was rolling in triumph along the road—birds twittering in the sunny air by the wayside, and cattle roving, like figures in a beautiful picture, upon the slopes of the distant hills. Oliver, the politician, more than once had out the great cotton pocket-handkerchief, and holding it spread before him, contemplating the fatherly signers, was evidently acquiring some new lights on the subject of independence.

A change, in fine of some sort or other, had passed over every member of the Peabody family save old Sylvester—returning as going, calm, plain spoken, straightforward and patriarchal. When they reached the gate of the homestead, William Peabody gave his hand to his wife, and helped her, with some show of attention, to alight; and then there could be no doubt that it was, in very truth, Thanksgiving day, for the glory of the door yard itself had paled and disappeared in the gorgeous festal light. There was no majestic gobbler in the door yard now, with his great outspread tail, which in the proud moments of his life he would have expanded as if to shut the very light of the sun from all meaner creatures of the mansion.

Within doors there was that bustling preparation, with brief lulls of ominous silence, which precede and usher a great event. The widow Margaret, with noiseless step, glided to and fro, Miriam daintily hovering in the suburbs of the sitting-room, which is evidently the grand centre of interest; and Mopsey toils like a swart goblin in her laboratory of the kitchen, in a high glow, scowling fearfully if addressed with a word which calls her attention for a moment away from her critical labors.

As the family entered the homestead on their return, the combined forces were just at the point of pitching their tent on the ground of the forthcoming engagement, in the shape of the ancient four-legged and wide-leaved table, with a cover of snowy whiteness, ornamented as with shields and weapons of quaint device, in the old plates of pewter, and the horn-handled knives and forks burnished to such a polish as to make the little room fairly glitter. Dishes streamed in, one after the other, in a long and rapid procession, piles of home-made bread, basins of apple-sauce, pickles, potatoes of vast proportion and mealy beauty. When the ancient and lordly pitcher of blue and white (whether freighted with new cider or old cold water need not be told) crowned the board, the first stage of preparation was complete and another portentous pause ensued. The whole Peabody connection, arranged in stately silence in the front parlor, looked on through the open door in wonder and expectation of what was to follow. The children loitered about the doorways with watering eyes and open mouths, like so many innocent little dragons lying in wait to rush in at an opportune moment and bear off their prey.

And now, all at once, there comes a deeper hush—a still more portentous pause—all eyes are in the direction of the kitchen; the children are hanging forward, with their bodies and outstretched necks half way in at the door, Miriam and the widow stand breathless and statue like at either side of the room; when, as if rising out of some mysterious cave in the very ground, a dark figure is discerned in the distance, about the centre of the kitchen (into which Mopsey has made, to secure an impressive effect, a grand circuit), head erect, and bearing before it a huge platter. All their eyes tell them every sense vividly reports, what it is the platter supports; she advances with slow and solemn step; she has crossed the sill; she has entered the sitting-room; and, with a full sense of her awful responsibility, Mopsey delivers on the table, in a cleared place left for its careful deposit, the Thanksgiving turkey.

There is no need now to sound a gong, or to ring an alarm bell to make known to that household that dinner is ready; the brown turkey speaks a summons as with the voice of a thousand living gobblers, and Sylvester rising, the whole Peabody family flock in. To every one his place is considerately assigned, the captain in the centre directly opposite the turkey, Mrs. Carrack on the other side, the widow at one end, old Sylvester at the head. The children, too, a special exception being made in their favor to-day, are allowed seats with the grown folks, little Sam disposing himself in great comfort in his old grandsire's arms.

Another hush—for everything to-day moves on through these constantly shut and opened gates of silence—in which they all sit tranquil and speechless, when the old patriarch lifts up his aged hands over the board and repeats his customary grace:

"May we all be Christian people the day we die—God bless us."

The captain, the great knife and fork in hand, was ready to advance.

"Stop a moment, Charley," old Sylvester spoke up, "give us a moment to contemplate the turkey."

"I would there were just such a dish, grandfather," the captain rejoined "on every table in the land this day, and if I had my way there would be."

"No, no, Charley," the grandfather answered, "if there should be there would be. There is One who is wiser than you or I."

"It would make the man who would do it," Oliver suggested, "immensely popular; he might get to be elected President of the United States."

"It would cost a large sum," remarked William Peabody, the merchant.

"Let us leave off considering imaginary turkeys, and discuss the one before us," said old Sylvester; "but I must first put a question, and if it's answered with satisfaction we'll proceed. Now tell me," he said, addressing himself to Mr. Carrack, who sat in a sort of dream, as if he had lost his identity, as he has ever since the night adventure in the fez cap and red silk cloak—"Now tell me, Tiffany, although you have doubtless seen a great many grand things, such as the Alps, and St. Peter's church at Rome, has your eye fallen in with anything, wherever you travelled over the world, grander than that Thanksgiving turkey?"

Mr. Carrack, either from excessive modesty or total abstraction, hesitated, looked about him hastily, and not till the captain called across the table, "Why don't you speak, my boy?" and then, as if suddenly coming to, and realizing where he was, answered at last, with great deliberation, "It is a fine bird."

"Enough said," spoke up old Sylvester cheerfully; "you were the last Peabody I expected to acknowledge the merits of the turkey;" and, looking towards the captain with encouragement, added, "now, knife and fork, do your duty."

It was short work the jovial captain made with the prize turkey; in rapid succession plates were forwarded, heaped, sent around; and with a keen relish of the Thanksgiving dinner, every head was busy. Straight on, as people who have an allotted task before them, the Peabodys moved through the dinner—a powerful, steady going caravan of cheerful travellers, over hill, over dale, up the valleys, along the stream side, cropping their way like a nimble-toothed flock of grazing sheep, keenly enjoying herbage and beverage by the way.

What though, while they were at the height of its enjoyment, a sudden storm, at that changeful season, arose without, and dashed its heavy drops against the doors and window-panes; that only, by the contrast of security and fireside comfort, heightened the zest within, while they were engaged with the many good dishes at least, but when another pause came, did not the pelting shower and the chiding wind talk with them, each one in turn, of the absent, and oh! some there will not believe it—the lost? It was no doubt some thought of this kind that prompted old Sylvester to speak.

"My children," said the patriarch, glancing with a calm eye around the circle of glowing faces at the table, "you are bound together with good cheer and in comfortable circumstances; and even as you, who are born from east and west, from the north and the south, by each one yielding a little of his individual whim or inclination, can thus sit together prosperously and in peace at one board, so can our glorious family of friendly States, on this and every other day, join hands, and like happy children in the fields, lead a far-lengthening dance of festive peace among the mountains and among the vales, from the soft-glimmering east far on to the bright and ruddy west. If others still seek to join in——"

"Ay, father," said Oliver, "there is great danger."

"Even as by making a little way," answered the patriarch, "we could find room at this table for one, or two, or three more, so may another State and still another join us, if it will; and even as our natural progeny increaseth to the the third, fourth, tenth generation, let us trust for centuries to come this happy Union shall live to lead her sons to peace, prosperity and rightful glory."

"But," interposed Oliver, the politician, again, with a double reference to his thoughts, it would almost seem, to an erring State or an absent child, "one may break away in wilfulness or crime—what then?"

"Let us lure it back," was old Sylvester's reply, "with gentle appeals. Remember we are all brethren, and that our alliance is one not merely of worldly interest, but also of family affection. Let us, on this hallowed day," he added, "cherish none but kindly thoughts towards all our kindred, and if him we have least esteemed offer the hand, let us take it in brotherly regard."

There was a pause of silence once again, which was broken by a knock at the door. Old Sylvester, having spoken his mind, had fallen into a reverie, and the Peabodys glancing one to the other, the question arose, shall the strangers (Mopsey reported them to be two), whoever they may be, be admitted?

"This is strictly a family festival," it was suggested, "where no strangers can be rightly allowed."

"May be thieves!" the merchant added.

"Vagabonds perhaps!" Mrs. Carrack suggested.

"Strangers, anyhow!" said Mrs. Jane Peabody.

The widow Margaret and Miriam were silent, and gave utterance to no opinion.

In the midst of the discussion, old Sylvester suddenly awakening, and rearing his white locks aloft, in the voice of a trumpet of silver sound, cried out, "If they be human, let 'em in!"

As he delivered this emphatic order there was a deep moan at the door, as of one in great pain, or suffering keenly from anguish of spirit; and when it was opened to admit the new comers, the voice of Chanticleer, raised for the second time, broke in, clear and shrilly, from the outer darkness.

THE HOUSE NO. 22 TWELFTH STREET, NEAR FIFTH AVENUE, WHERE MRS. SCHANCKS WAS BRUTALLY MURDERED, ON FRIDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 7, 1860.—SEE PAGE 72.

CHAPTER IX.—THE NEW COMERS.

It was old Sylvester himself who opened the door and admitted the strangers. One of them, the younger, wore a slouched hat, which did not allow his features to be distinctly observed, further than that his eyes were bright with a strange lustre, and that his face was deadly pale. He was partly supported by the elder man, whose person was clad in a long coat, reaching nearly to the ground.

(Continued on page 7[illegible].)

A ROCKING CHAIR WITHOUT ROCKERS.—The "reception" Rocking Chairs sold by Terry & Wells, No. 652 Broadway, stand on castors and rock without rockers. They are made in all the various styles of the ordinary arm chairs now used in parlors and chambers, and present a similar appearance. The rocking movement can be stopped by a catch, and the chair held rigidly either upright or at any inclination desired. This makes them very convenient for invalid chairs, for which purpose certain styles of them have been found very satisfactory. As a library, or study chair, admitting as they do of easy change of position, they relieve the fatigue of protracted sitting. They are peculiarly appropriate as a present to an aged parent or invalid friend. The entire absence of rockers, which wear carpets so injuriously, and are ever in the way, is the one great feature of this new invention.

DELIGHTFUL.

We have recently had occasion to use a bottle of COCOAINE, and can well afford, from the benefit derived by its use, to add our testimony to that of hundreds of others, as to its efficacy. It answers the purpose of a perfume for the hair, and at the same time cleanses it from all impurities, leaving the hair perfectly soft and glossy. We recommend its use to those in need of an article, either to restore, preserve or purify the hair.—St. Joseph (Mo.) West

Brown's Bronchial Troches

ARE among the acknowledged institutions of the land. What would our ministers, our lecturers, our lawyers, do without these invaluable "TROCHES?" To what an amount of "ahems" and coughs and throat clearings would we be all subjected, were it not for those of powerful and soothing lozenges? We have tried them and they did us good.—N. Y. Waverley

POLITICAL TEXT BOOK.

A Democratic Guide to the whole Political Canvass of the United States, Containing the Official Canvass of

EVERY STATE IN THE UNION

by Counties.

PLATFORMS OF THE DIFFERENT POLITICAL PARTIES,

Constitution of the United States,

And such other matter as must be interesting to every Politician and Democrat in the country.

PRICE FIFTEEN CENTS.

265 Address PARSONS & TAYLOR, New York.

The Spring and Fall Medicine.

DELICATE LADIES and young children will find the cleansing and recuperative properties of SANDS' SARSAPARILLA effect the most surprising results, purifying the blood, expelling disease and invigorating the system. Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, No. 100 Fulton St., N. Y. 265

Tillman's Imperial

FLOWERS,

BONNETS,

RIBANDS, &c., &c.

MR. TILLMAN begs to inform his numerous customers that his store will be closed from 12 o'clock on Saturday until Wednesday morning, for the purpose of preparing for private exhibition on Monday and Tuesday, the 17th and 18th inst., for which Mr. Tillman's customers will receive invitation by card.

New York, 712 Broadway. 265

Arthur's Home Magazine,

FOR sale by all the News Agents. Price 15 cts. a number. January number now ready. 265-66

SECRET OR NO SECRET.—I will send, on receipt of 25 cents, full instructions how to write a secret or invisible letter, which no one can read or decipher except the writer and his correspondent, and also how to render the said letter visible at will. Address W. F. HARRIS, St. Louis, Mo. 265-66

GOURAUD'S

TOILET ACCESSORIES.

ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP, it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Eruptions, Chaps, Chafes and all Skin blemishes. It is moreover the best Shaving Compound ever invented. 40 cts.

GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE uproots Hair from low foreheads, upper lips or any part of the body, safely and quickly. Warranted. $1.

GOURAUD'S SUPERB LIQUID ROUGE imparts a delicate roseate tinge to pale lips and cheeks, defying detection or rubbing off. 50 cts.

GOURAUD'S ORIENTAL CREAM, a pure liquid white, instantaneously whitens, softens and beautifies the complexion. 50 cts. Beware of a vile counterfeit.

GOURAUD'S LILY WHITE, HAIR DYE, HAIR GLOSS RESTORATIVE are all well-known articles, and have been used by the ladies the past twenty years. Dr. T. F. GOURAUD'S office at 67 Walker St., near Broadway.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.

WITHOUT these the mother of a family would be short of the Domestic Physician of the nineteenth century, the one acting as a sure remedy for cutaneous disorders, and the other for internal diseases. Sold at the manufactory, No. 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all Druggists, at 25 cts., 63 cts., and $1 per pot or box.

TADMAN'S CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE, for Chapped Hands and Lips, requires no artificial heat in applying it, as it dissolves readily when applied to the skin, cures in a few hours, and makes the skin delicately soft and white. Observe, the color is YELLOW, and the name "CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE."
TADMAN & CO., DRUGGISTS,
268 Fourth Av. and 1 Bleecker St. By mail 25 cts.
7

New Popular Song,

"OLD DONALD GREY,"

Words by "Percival." Sold at all the Music Stores, and sent, postage paid, to any part of the United States on receipt of the price, 25 cents, by the Publisher, JACOB ENDRES, No 62 Fourth St., St. Louis, Mo.

N. B.—In press, and will be issued in a few days, the new song of the Florences', "Ridin' in a Railroad Keer." Price 30 cts. 265-66

Concentrated Leaven

For making

Bread, Tea Cakes,

All Kinds of Pastry, &c.,

MANUFACTURED BY

EDWARD CHAMBERLIN & CO.,

Proprietors of Shawmut Chemical Works,

No. 33 India St., Boston.

Concentrated Leaven

is the result of careful chemical research. Bread of all kinds, made by using it, is light, more digestible and nutritious, has an agreeable, natural taste, is less liable to sour, will retain its moisture longer than by any other process, and the whole preparation for the oven need not exceed ten minutes.

SEE DIRECTIONS IN EACH PACKAGE for making Breakfast and Tea Rolls—Loaf Bread—Brown Bread—Buckwheat Cakes—Sponge Cake—Corn Cake—Cup Cake—Ladies' Cake—Webster Cake—Muffins—Apple Pudding—Highland Cake—Graham Bread—Boston Brown Bread—Dumplings—Chambers Street Cake—Sponge Cake—Jumbles—Election Cake—Soft Sugar Ginger Bread—Hard Sugar Ginger Bread—Silver Cake—Doughnuts—Butter Pudding—Johnny Cake—Gold Cake—Japanese Cake—Union Cake—and every variety of Pastry.

For sale by Wm. Gulager & Bro., 59 North Front St., Philadelphia, Wm. H. Crawford & Co., 62 South St., Baltimore and by all the principal druggists and grocers.

GEORGE H. BATES, Wholesale Agent,
265 No 189 Pearl St., New York.

MATRIMONY MADE EASY; OR, HOW TO WIN A LOVER—Containing plain, common sense directions, showing how all may be suitably married, irrespective of age, sex or position, whether prepossessing or otherwise. This is a new work, and the secret, when acted upon, secures a speedy and happy marriage to either sex. Mailed free for 25 cents, in cash or postage stamps. Address T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia Post Office, box 2,300. 265-68

CUT THIS OUT

AND LOOK AT

IN YOUR STEREOSCOPE.

It will appear as a pyramid five inches high. The letters will stand perpendicularly, and each line an inch back of the preceding—a most remarkable optical illusion.

E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway,
AT WHOLESALE & RETAIL BY
OF EMINENT MEN, &c
PORTRAITS
CARD
501
THE LARGEST IMPORTER OF FOREIGN VIEWS FOR THE STEREOSCOPE,
THE LARGEST PUBLISHER OF AMERICAN VIEWS FOR THE STEREOSCOPE,
E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway,
E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway,
SOLE AGENT FOR THE U. STATES FOR THE PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUM FOR CARD PORTRAITS,

E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway,
AT WHOLESALE & RETAIL BY
OF EMINENT MEN, &c
PORTRAITS
CARD
501
THE LARGEST IMPORTER OF FOREIGN VIEWS FOR THE STEREOSCOPE,
THE LARGEST PUBLISHER OF AMERICAN VIEWS FOR THE STEREOSCOPE,
E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway,
E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway,
SOLE AGENT FOR THE U. STATES FOR THE PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUM FOR CARD PORTRAITS,

FOR THE HOLIDAYS

WE HAVE JUST RECEIVED

A New and most Exquisite Assortment,

The cream of the London and Paris markets, selected with great care on the spot by one of our house.

We have also just published about 500 New Views of American Scenery.

No more instructive and entertaining present can be imagined than

A STEREOSCOPE AND VIEWS.

Parties at a distance, by remitting $5, $10, $15, $20 or $25, can have the worth of it sent by express, carefully selected and warranted to please.

Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

265 E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway.

Bogle's Hair Dye and Wigs

ARE unapproached and unapproachable in their superior merits. Both are perfection. Try the one, see the other, and be convinced.

Private Rooms for Dyeing Hair and fitting Wigs at BOGLE'S Hairwork, Perfumery and Toilet Bazaar, No. 202 Washington St., Boston. Diagrams to measure the head sent by mail. Inclose postage stamp for reply. 000

Send for Specimen of

CLARK'S SCHOOL VISITOR,

An Illustrated Day School Paper for Teachers and Pupils everywhere. Address

DAUGHADY & HAMMOND,
263-65 411 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE PEOPLE'S GREAT BOOKS.

20,000 Copies Already Sold.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES;

BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S.,

Professor of Pathology and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association of Philadelphia, &c., &c.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES, although but Two Months issued from the press, has already received the unqualified approval of upwards of TWENTY THOUSAND purchasers, and is, undoubtedly, the most complete and reliable work on the Horse ever published. It tells you of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of European, Asiatic, African and American Horses, with the physical formation and peculiarities of the animal, and how to ascertain his age by the number and condition of his teeth, also of Breeding, Breaking, Stabling, Feeding, Grooming, Shoeing, and the general management of the horse, with the best modes of administering medicine; also, How to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Stumbling, Crib Biting, Restlessness, and other vices to which he is subject, with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you of the causes, symptoms and treatment of Strangles, Sore Throat, Distemper, Catarrh, Influenza, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Cough, Roaring and Whistling, Lampas, Sore Mouth and Ulcers, and Decayed Teeth, with other Diseases of the Mouth and Respiratory Organs; also, of Worms, Bots, Colic, Strangulation, Stony Concretions, Ruptures, Palsy, Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Hepatirrhœa, Bloody Urine, Stones in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation and other diseases of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you the causes, symptoms and Treatment of Bone, Blood, and Bog, Spavin, Ring-Bone, Sweenie, Strains, Broken Knees, Wind Galls, Founder, Sole Bruise and Gravel-Cracked Hoofs, Scratches, Canker, Thrush and Corns; also, of Megrims, Vertigo, Epilepsy, Staggers and other diseases of the Feet, Legs and Head; of Fistula, Poll Evil, Glanders, Farcy, Scarlet Fever, Mange, Surfeit, Locked Jaw, Rheumatism, Cramp, Galls, Diseases of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Castration, Bleeding, Trephining, Roweling, Firing, Hernia, Amputation, Tapping and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you of Rarey's Method of Taming Horses; how to Approach, Halter or Stable a Colt; how to accustom a horse to strange sounds and sights, and how to Bit, Saddle, Ride and Break him to Harness; also the form and law of WARRANTY. The whole being the result of more than fifteen years' careful study of the habits, peculiarities, wants and weaknesses of this noble and useful animal.

The book contains 384 pages, illustrated by nearly One Hundred Engravings, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or, in cloth, extra, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men everywhere, in selling the above, and other popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

60,000 Copies Sold.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR;

CONTAINING

SIMPLE REMEDIES, EASILY OBTAINED, FOR THE CURE OF DISEASE IN ALL FORMS,

BY

Prof. Henry S. Taylor, M.D.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR has reached the enormous sale of SIXTY THOUSAND copies, and wherever known is universally approved, both by the faculty and others. In plain language, free from medical technicalities, it tells you how to attend upon the sick, and how to cook for them; how to prepare Drinks, Poultices, &c., and how to guard against infection from Contagious Diseases; also, of the symptoms of Fever and Ague, and Bilious, Yellow, Typhus, Scarlet and other Fevers, with the best and simplest remedies for their cure.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR tells you of the various Diseases of Children, and gives the symptoms of Croup, Cholera Infantum, Colic, Diarrhœa, Worms, Scald Head, Ringworm, Chicken Pox, &c., with the best and simplest mode of treatment; also, of Teething, Convulsions, Vaccination, Whooping Cough, Measles, Influenza, Consumption, Dyspepsia, Asthma, Dropsy, Gout, Rheumatism, Lumbago, Erysipelas, Cholera Morbus, Malignant Cholera, Smallpox, Dysentery, Cramp, Diseases of the Bladder, Kidneys and Liver, and gives the best and simplest remedies for their cure.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR tells you of the symptoms of Pleurisy, Mumps, Neuralgia, Apoplexy, Paralysis, the various Diseases of the Throat, Teeth, Ear and Eye; Epilepsy, Jaundice, Piles, Rupture, Diseases of the Heart, Hemorrhage, Venereal Diseases and Hydrophobia, and gives the best and simplest remedies for their cure. The best and simplest treatment for Wounds, Broken Bones and Dislocations, Sprains, Lockjaw, Fever Sores, White Swellings, Ulcers, Whitlows, Boils, Scurvy, Burns and Scrofula. Also, of the various diseases peculiar to women, and the best remedies for their cure, together with many hints for the preservation of the health.

The book is printed in a clear and open type, illustrated with appropriate engravings, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or in substantial leather binding, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men everywhere, in selling the above, and other popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

150,000 Copies Sold.

Everybody's Lawyer

AND

COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS.

By Frank Crosby, Esq.,

MEMBER OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS is the only correct Law and Form Book ever published, that is equally adapted to all the States, and indorsed by over 150,000 purchasers. Old and imperfect works of a similar name, but much inferior character, have been foisted upon the public in place of this, and much dissatisfaction caused thereby. Give strict orders for FRANK CROSBY'S book, as published by John E. Potter, of Philadelphia, and refuse all others, or, what is better, send all orders direct to the publisher. It tells you how to draw up PARTNERSHIP PAPERS, BONDS and MORTGAGES, AFFIDAVITS, POWERS OF ATTORNEY, NOTES and BILLS OF EXCHANGE, and gives general forms for AGREEMENTS of all kinds, BILLS OF SALE, LEASES, PETITIONS, ACQUITTANCES and RELEASES.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the LAWS for the COLLECTION OF DEBTS, with the STATUTES OF LIMITATION, and amount and kind of Property EXEMPT FROM EXECUTION, in every State; also, how to make an ASSIGNMENT properly, with forms for COMPOSITION with CREDITORS, and the INSOLVENT LAWS of every State. The legal relations existing between GUARDIAN and WARD, MASTER and APPRENTICE, and LANDLORD and TENANT; also, what constitutes LIBEL and SLANDER, and the laws to MARRIAGE, DOWER, the WIFE'S RIGHT IN PROPERTY, DIVORCE and ALIMONY.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the Law for MECHANICS' LIENS in every State; and the NATURALIZATION LAWS of this country, and how to comply with the same; also, the Law concerning PENSIONS, and how to obtain one, and the PRE-EMPTION to PUBLIC LANDS. The Law for PATENTS, with modes of procedure in obtaining one, with INTERFERENCES, ASSIGNMENTS and TABLE OF FEES; also, how to make your WILL, and how to ADMINISTER ON AN ESTATE, with the law, and the requirements thereof, in every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the meaning of LAW TERMS in general use, and explains to you the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Powers of both the General and State Governments; also, how to keep out of Law by showing how to do your business legally, thus saving a vast amount of property and vexatious litigation by its timely consultation.

The book contains 384 pages, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or in law style, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men in selling the above popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

As these books are unequalled in their mechanical execution, as well as the value of their contents, a certain and rapid sale follows their introduction everywhere.

For single copies, or for terms to Agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,

263-66 No 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$1.500 PER ANNUM.—Agents Wanted, local or travelling, in every Town and Village in the United States, for the sale of an article on which eighty per cent. profit is realized. For particulars inclose red stamp to Box 101, care B. Lockwood, Broadway Post Office, New York City. 262-75

Two Works, Valuable to the Sick or Well.

SENT by mail; no pay expected until received, read and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1 Six Lectures on the Causes, Prevention and Cure of Lung, Bronchial and Skin Diseases, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to a Hundred Years. 360 pages, 21 engravings. Price 50 cents, in silver or Postage Stamps.

2 A work on Heart Disease, Palsy, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Dysentery, Cholera Infantum, Summer Diarrhœa of Children, Cholera and Cholera Morbus, Bilious Cholic, Costiveness, Diphtheria, Sore Throat, Scarlet Fever, Yellow Fever, and the diseases of elderly and old people, with Medical Prescriptions for nine of those diseases. The Prescriptions alone worth $500.

Why we grow Old and what Cures Disease.

168 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. Say which Book you will have, giving Name, State, County and Post Office.
265-68

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper,

Frank Leslie's Magazine,

FRANK LESLIE'S BUDGET OF FUN,

Can always be had of

HUNT & MINER,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS AND NEWSDEALERS,

71 and 73 Fifth St., next to the Post Office,

PITTSBURG, PA. 261-66

Pianofortes.

A. H. GALE & CO.,

MANUFACTORY AND WAREROOMS,

107 East Twelfth Street, N. Y.

Miscellaneous.

The Amalgamation of Languages.—There is a growing tendency in this age to appropriate the most expressive words of other languages, and after a while to incorporate them into our own; thus the word Cephalic, which is from the Greek, signifying "for the head," is now becoming popularized in connection with Mr Spalding's great Headache remedy, but it will soon be used in a more general way, and the word Cephalic will become as common as Electrotype and many others whose distinction as foreign words has been worn away by common usage until they seem "native and to the manor born."

'Ardly Realized.

Hi 'ad 'n 'orrible 'eadache this hafternoon, hand I stopped into the hapothecary's, hand says hi to the man, "Can you hease me of an 'eadache?" "Does it hache 'ard?" says 'e. "Hexceedingly," says hi, hand upon that 'e gave me a Cephalic Pill, hand 'pon me 'onor it cured me so quick that I 'ardly realized I 'ad 'nd an 'eadache.

☞ Headache is the favorite sign by which nature makes known any deviation whatever from the natural state of the brain, and viewed in this light it may be looked on as a safeguard intended to give notice of disease which might otherwise escape attention till too late to be remedied, and its indications should never be neglected. Headaches may be classified under two names, viz: Symptomatic and Idiopathic. Symptomatic Headache is exceedingly common and is the precursor of a great variety of diseases, among which are Apoplexy, Gout, Rheumatism and all febrile diseases. In its nervous form it is sympathetic of disease of the stomach constituting sick headache, of hepatic disease constituting bilious headache, of worms, constipation and other disorders of the bowels, as well as renal and uterine affections. Diseases of the heart are very frequently attended with Headaches. Anæmia and plethora are also affections which frequently occasion headache. Idiopathic Headache is also very common, being usually distinguished by the name of nervous headache, sometimes coming on suddenly in a state of apparently sound health and prostrating at once the mental and physical energies, and in other instances it comes on slowly, heralded by depression of spirits or acerbity of temper. In most instances the pain is in the front of the head, over one or both eyes, and sometimes provoking vomiting; under this class may also be named Neuralgia.

For the treatment of either class of Headache the Cephalic Pills have been found a sure and safe remedy, relieving the most acute pains in a few minutes, and by its subtle power eradicating the diseases of which Headache is the unerring index.

Bridget.—Missus wants you to send her a box of Cephalic Glue, no, a bottle of Prepared Pills—but I'm thinking that's not just it naither; but perhaps ye'll be afther knowing what it is. Ye see she's nigh dead and gone with the Sick Headache, and wants some more of that same as relaived her before.

Druggist.—You must mean Spalding's Cephalic Pills.

Bridget.—Och! sure now and you've sed it; here's the quarther and give me the Pills, and don't be all day about it aither.

Constipation or Costiveness.

No one of the "many ills flesh is heir to" is so prevalent so little understood, and so much neglected as Costiveness. Often originating in carelessness or sedentary habits, it is regarded as a slight disorder of too little consequence to excite anxiety, while in reality it is the precursor and companion of many of the most fatal and dangerous diseases, and unless early eradicated it will bring the sufferer to an untimely grave. Among the lighter evils of which Costiveness is the usual attendant are Headache, Colic, Rheumatism, Foul Breath, Piles and others of like nature, while a long train of frightful diseases such as Malignant Fevers, Abscesses, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Dyspepsia, Apoplexy, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Hysteria, Hypochondriasis, Melancholy and Insanity, first indicate their presence in the system by this alarming symptom. Not unfrequently the diseases named originate in Constipation, but take on an independent existence unless the cause is eradicated in an early stage. From all these considerations it follows that the disorder should receive immediate attention whenever it occurs, and no person should neglect to get a box of Cephalic Pills on the first appearance of the complaint, as their timely use will expel the insidious approaches of disease and destroy this dangerous foe to human life.

Cephalic Pills
CURE Sick Headache, CURE Nervous Headache, CURE All kinds of Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented; and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Laxative, improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the Stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS

The genuine have five signatures of Henry C. Spalding on each Box.

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

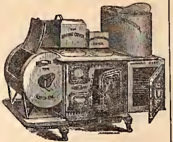
A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

All orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING,
48 Cedar St., New York.

The Stove that Pleases Everybody.



THE "INDEPENDENT"
LARGE OVEN
COOKING STOVE,
For all Countries and all Climates,
FOR HARD OR SOFT COAL, OR FOR WOOD.

ADVANTAGES:

1. Self-cleaning from the ashes.
2. A Dumping Grate and a Slide for conducting the coal and ashes into the hearth.
3. An extra large Oven and well ventilated.
4. The improved double-arch Flues, and extra large at that.
5. The thickness of the castings and the extra fitting and finish.
6. Great economy in the use of fuel.
7. Broiling with Treadwell's Patent Gauge Gridiron, which is done without burning or smoking the meats or the cook.
8. Splendid Roasting Oven—before the fire.
9. Hot Water Reservoir and Hot Closet if desired.
10. Water Backs, which heat water as well as any range, and at half the cost.

Every Stove guaranteed. Sold by the principal Dealers in nearly every State in the Union.

Address TREADWELL & PERRY, Agents,
Albany, N. Y.

WORTH HAVING

"The Mine of Wealth."

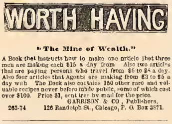
A Book that instructs how to make one article that three men are making each $15 a day from. Also two articles that are paying persons who travel from $5 to $8 a day. Also four articles that Agents are making from $3 to $5 a day with. The Book also contains 150 other rare and valuable recipes never before made public, some of which cost over $100. Price $1, sent free by mail for the price.

GARRISON & CO, Publishers,
263-74 126 Randolph St., Chicago, P. O. Box 3871.

$40. Parker Sewing Machine, $40.
First Class, Double Thread,

Rapid and Noiseless, under Patents of Howe, Grover & Baker, Wheeler & Wilson. Agents wanted.

Office, VERNON & CO.,
No. 469 Broadway.



PIANOFORTES

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

Manufacturer of the Overstrung

Celebrated Dunham Pianofortes,

GRAND AND SQUARE

Manufactory and Show Rooms,

75 to 85 East Thirteenth Street near Broadway, New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1834.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five years, and prices are moderate.

IMPORTANT INVENTION FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.—For particulars address, inclosing stamp, DR. H. HIRSHFIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 428 Broadway, New York. 269-71

The Union Clothes Dryer.

A NEW INVENTION—USEFUL CHEAP AND PORTABLE,

By which Clothes in large or small quantities may be dried in a yard, a room, or on the top of a house. Can be put up and taken down in one minute without detaching the lines.

Price only $1 50 to $3.

J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors, 457 Broadway (near Grand St.), New York, and 312 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

DR. ROBAN'S RHEUMATIC CURE.—This invaluable French Remedy, out of thousands of cases, has not in one instance failed to effect a radical cure. It is perfectly harmless, but certain in its effects, in severe cases of Chronic, Acute and Inflammatory Rheumatism, Neuralgia and Gout. It is a reliable cure. In case of long standing it gives almost instant relief. One bottle is sufficient to test its efficacy and insure a permanent cure. Price $1 per bottle. For sale at the Agency of DR. RUDAN, No. 692 Broadway. Sent by Express to any part of the United States and Canada, upon receipt of the price. Druggists supplied. 251-65

AND SUPPORTER

A New Discovery
FOR THE
Retention and Radical Cure of Hernia, &c.

White's Patent Lever Truss.

This instrument, which is now offered to the public in this city, radically different in principle and action from all others in use, combining every valuable point in other Trusses, besides several points of the highest value never before attained. Among some of the advantages claimed for this instrument are these: It has a soft, pliant, metallic bow; graduating pressure power perfectly controllable; inward and upper action combined; no uncomfortable pressure on the Back, and none on the Spermatic Cord; does not work out of place; perfectly clean; smallest, lightest, cheapest, most durable, shows least, holds the rupture in every case, requires less than one-half the usual pressure, and is a radical cure. The ABDOMINAL SUPPORTERS are on the same principle. Pamphlets gratis. Elegant rooms are fitted up for Ladies and Gentlemen by the Proprietors, GREGORY & CO., No 25 Bond St., N. Y., for their adjustment.

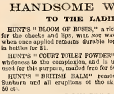
These Instruments are also offered at wholesale by Messrs. D S Barnes & Co., Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row; Messrs. Scheffelin Brothers, No. 170 William St., and by all first-class drug houses throughout the country. aw

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

PUBLISHED for the benefit and as a warning to young men who suffer from Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, &c; supplying the means of Self-Cure. By one who cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. Single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Bedford, Kings County, N. Y., by inclosing a postpaid addressed envelope. 255 67

Boar's Head Six Cord Spool Cotton.

ESTABLISHED 1783.



Superior to any ever imported in Strength, Smoothness and Elasticity, for

MACHINE OR HAND SEWING.

On Spools of 200, 500 and 2,400 Yards, the lengths warranted.

C. CARVILLE,
Sole Agent, 186 Fulton St.

HANDSOME WOMEN.

TO THE LADIES.

HUNT'S "BLOOM OF ROSES," a rich and delicate color for the cheeks and lips, will not wash or rub off, and when once applied remains durable for years, mailed free in bottles for $1.

HUNT'S "COURT TOILET POWDER" imparts a dazzling whiteness to the complexion, and is unlike anything else used for this purpose, mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "BRITISH BALM" removes Tan, Freckles, Sunburn and all eruptions of the skin; mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "IMPERIAL POMADE," for the Hair, strengthens and improves its growth, keeps it from falling off, and warranted to make the hair curl; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "PEARL BEAUTIFIER," for the Teeth and Gums, cleanses and whitens the Teeth, hardens the Gums, purifies the Breath effectually, Preserves the Teeth and prevents Toothache; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "BRIDAL WREATH PERFUME," a double extract of orange blossoms and cologne, mailed free for $1.

This exquisite Perfume was first used by the PRINCESS ROYAL OF ENGLAND, on her marriage. MESSRS. HUNT & CO presented the Princess with an elegant case of Perfumery (in which all the above articles were included), in handsome cut glass with gold stoppers, valued at $1,500, particulars of which appeared in the public prints. All the above articles sent free by express for $5. Cash can either accompany the order or be paid to the express agent on delivery of goods.

[illegible] CO., Perfumers to the Queen,
Regent [illegible], London, and 707 Sansom St., Philadelphia.
The [illegible] supplied.

The Rural American!

50,000 COPIES OF THE RURAL AMERICAN, of Utica, N. Y., will be sent FREE, in December next, to Farmers and others who want the best, largest, most splendid and cheapest Agricultural, Family Weekly in the Union! No other paper can now compare with it in style and real value—only $1 in clubs!—25 per cent larger than any paper of the kind. Club Agents wanted in every town in the United States. Premiums magnificent! Circulates in all the States. Vol. 6 begins January 1st. Send your names singly or in clubs to T. B. MINER & SON, Clinton, Oneida Co., N. Y.

Travelling Agents

ARE paid $30 to $60 per month to canvass for the Rural American. Details sent in paper. Direct as above. 000

A. LANGE,
PICTURE AND LOOKING-GLASS
FRAMES
AND
CORNICES FOR ROOMS,
MADE TO ORDER, AND RE-GILDING DONE.
206 William St., cor. Frankfort, New York.

Nothing But Money.

A NEW SERIAL, BY T. S. ARTHUR, is commenced in the January number of ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE, now ready and for sale by all News Agents. Price 15 cents. 265-66

Purify the Blood.

WITH corrupt, disordered or vitiated Blood, you must be sick all over. It may burst out in pimples, or sores, or in some active disease, or it may merely keep you listless, depressed and good for nothing. But you cannot have good health while your blood is impure. Ayer's Sarsaparilla purges out these impurities and stimulates the organs of life into vigorous action, restoring the health and expelling disease. Hence it rapidly cures a variety of complaints which are caused by impurity of the blood, such as Scrofula or King's Evil, Tumors, Ulcers, Sores, Eruptions, Pimples, Blotches, Boils, St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, Cancer or Cancerous Tumors, Sore Eyes; Female Diseases, such as Retention, Irregularity, Suppression, Whites, Sterility, Syphilis or Venereal Diseases, Liver Complaints and Heart Diseases. Try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and see for yourself the surprising activity with which it cleanses the blood and cures the disorders.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is so universally known to surpass every other remedy for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Influenza, Hoarseness, Croup, Bronchitis, Incipient Consumption, and for the relief of Consumptive Patients in advanced stages of the disease, that it is useless here to recount the evidence of its virtues. The world knows them.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills—For Costiveness, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Jaundice, Headache, Heartburn, Piles, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Worms, and in short for all the purposes of a purgative medicine.

Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by Druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.
264-60

WHAT SHALL I DO FOR MY HAIR?—Use LYON'S KATHAIRON. It is, beyond question, the finest preparation ever made. Its immense sale proves its excellence. Nothing has ever given such universal satisfaction. It restores, preserves and beautifies the Hair, and imparts a delightful odor.

USE LYONS KATHAIRON FOR THE HAIR. FOR THE HAIR.

261-73

Tiffany & Co.

LATE

TIFFANY, YOUNG & ELLIS,

Fine Jewellery, Precious Stones, Watches, Silver Ware, Bronzes, Clocks, Rich Porcelain Articles of Art and Luxury.
No. 550 Broadway, New York.
House in Paris, TIFFANY, REED & [illegible]

PHOTOCHROMATIC OIL PAINTINGS.—Agents wanted to introduce this beautiful art. Young men are making over $50 a month in this business. Terms and Specimens sent free, by addressing, with stamp for return postage, 259-65 L. L. TODD & CO., Lowell, Mass.

ESTABLISHED 1843.

BOGLE'S CELEBRATED HYPERION FLUID overtops everything as the greatest restorer and best dressing for the Hair in the world. Ye who have been deceived by nostrums, try this and be convinced. It never fails. To be had at

W. BOGLE'S
Hairwork, Perfumery and Toilet Store,
202 Washington St., Boston, and for sale everywhere.

You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order.

R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau Street, New York.

NEW BOOKS FOR AGENTS,

Sold only by Subscription.

WANTED—An Agent in every County, to engage in the sale of beautifully ILLUSTRATED WORKS. Circulars, giving full information, with Terms to Agents, and a full list of my Publications, sent on application. Address

DUANE RULISON,
Quaker City Publishing House,
263-60 No. 33 South Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Kennedy's Medical Discovery

CURES SCROFULA

Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Erysipelas.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Canker.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Nursing Sore Mouth.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Humor of the Eyes.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Scald Head.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Running of the Ears.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ulcerated Sore Legs.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Lepra.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Rheumatism.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Salt Rheum.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Dyspepsia.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Bowels.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Kidneys.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Liver.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery has cured Dropsy.

When you are sick, and do not know what the matter is, perhaps you have an inward humor. Try Kennedy's Medical Discovery. For sale by all Druggists.

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S
LOTTERIES!

Authorized by the States of

DELAWARE,
MISSOURI
AND
KENTUCKY

Draw daily, in public, under the superintendence of Sworn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM

$2 50 TO $100,000!

TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $20.

☞ Circulars giving full explanation and the Schemes to be drawn will be sent, free of expense, by addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
or
WOOD, EDDY & CO. St. Louis, Missouri.

A MIDNIGHT INTRUSION.

MCFLANDERS (to fireman, who has just burst into the room).—"Well, what is the matter?"
Fireman.—"Fire! Fire! Fire right next door."
MCF.—"Fire! Where you mean. And every sensteful and wicked it is of you too, considering the present state of the Crotun. Never mind, my man—I'll report you to the Board."

Charles Heidsieck
CHAMPAGNE.

The undersigned have for sale the above popular Wine, for which they are

THE SOLE AGENTS FOR NORTH AMERICA.

The stock they have now on hand is identical in quality with that for which MESSRS. CHARLES HEIDSIECK & Co. recovered the first premium at the Bordeaux Exposition of 1850.

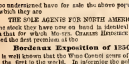
It is well known that the Wine Crowd grows of Bordeaux are the first in the world. In increasing the public of the fact that the Charles Heidsieck Champagne took the premium so above mentioned, is done by the most prominent Wine Growers and Merchants of the Champagne District, who had in the exposition samples of their best growths and stocks, we believe we furnish sufficient evidence of the great merits. The medal awarded by the Judges of the Exposition can be seen at the office of

T. W. KNOX & CO.,
No. 100 Pearl St., N. Y.

267o

Ladd, Webster & Co's.
IMPROVED THREE-THREAD SEWING MACHINES.
160 Broadway, New York. 000o

GROVER & BAKER'S
CELEBRATED
Noiseless Family Sewing Machines.
PRICES ESTABLISHED FOR SEVEN YEARS.
FROM $40 AND UPWARDS.
"It finishes its own work; others do not."—Home Journal.
Office 495 Broadway, New York.
263-65o



A New Six Shooting Cartridge Revolver.
Weighing only (6) nine ounces
For sale, wholesale and retail,
By JOSEPH MERWIN, Agent,
207 Broadway, N. Y. 263-65o

Smith and Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STORRS, Agent,
131 Chamber Street, N. Y.
THIS PISTOL is light, has great force, is sure fire, shoots accurately, can be left loaded any length of time without injury, is not liable to get out of order, is safe to carry. Every Pistol warranted.

CAUTION TO DEALERS.

Be sure and get those stamped "Smith & Wesson, Springfield, Mass.," none others genuine. All others infringements that look at the breech are infringements. Suits are commenced, and all such infringements will be prosecuted. Be sure the cartridges have Smith & Wesson's stamped on each end of the box. 217 52o

Newspapers, Magazines,
AND Miscellaneous Orders for BOOKS, STATIONERY, &c., &c., forwarded at the shortest notice, and by the quickest route, to any part of the country. Send for Price List. JOHN F. RITES & CO., 25 Chatham, American, and Printers Row Agency, No. 31 and 33 Park St., New York. 260o

A CHRISTMAS PRESENT.
Wilcox & Gibbs' Sewing Machine,
Beautiful, reliable and so simple that any person can learn to use it in half an hour, will prove one of the most acceptable presents to a lady that can be offered.
264-66o JAMES WILCOX,
Manufacturer, 505 Broadway.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST FURS AT WILLIAMS'S, 239 Fulton St., Brooklyn. 262-66o

The Singer Sewing Machines.
IN order to place THE SEWING FAMILY MACHINES in the WORLD within the reach of all, we have reduced our LITTLE A, OR TRADESMEN SHUTTLE MACHINE, beautifully ornamented, to $55.
Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machines, both of very general application and capacity, and possessing both in the family and manufactory. Prices reduced, respectively from $125 and $150 to $105 and $120.
Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine,
For Carriage-makers and heavy leather work. Price, complete, $150.
Also, to complete the list, an
ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,
Jacquelled for manufacturing purposes; NOZZLES, HATS, and capable of every kind of work; Price (including iron stand and drawer), $150—cheaper at that in view of its value than the machines of any other one or a half.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway

TRAVELLING AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new and valuable article required in every household. Salary paid or commission allowed. For terms and particulars address, with stamps, J. W. HARRIS, Boston, Mass. 264-66o

JOY TO THE WORLD.
Clothes Washed in One Minute by
JOHNSON'S UNION WASHING MACHINE.
Patented April 10, 1860.
PRICE $8 TO $10.
A CASH'S CAN OPERATE THIS MACHINE. Call and examine, without seeking or buying. Can also be in operation at 457 Broadway, New York, and 512 Fulton St., Brooklyn.
J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors.
000

"WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES are certainly unrivalled."—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.
Office, 505 Broadway, New York. 000o

STEINWAY & SONS'
PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRAND AND SQUARE PIANOS
Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted for five years.
Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. 000o

Patented November 1st, 1859.

The measures are
A, the distance round the Neck.
B to B, the Yoke.
C to C, the Sleeve.
D to D, distance around the Body under the armpits
E to E, the length of the Shirt.

BALLOU'S
Patent Improved French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.
A New Style of Shirt, warranted to Fit.
By reading the above measures per mail we can guarantee a perfect fit in all our new styles of Shirts, and return by Express to any part of the United States, at $18, $15, $12, $9, $6, $3 per dozen. No order forwarded for less than half a dozen Shirts.
Also Importers and Dealers in MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS.
BALLOU BROTHERS,
409 Broadway, N. Y.
Wholesale Trade supplied on the usual terms.

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 18, 24 and 36 tunes.
HALLET & DAVIS, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired. 21 Milton Lane, N. Y.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,
FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.
For curing and preventing Baldness.
For removing Scurf and Dandruff.
For beautifying and making the Hair soft and curly.
It has the only soft and effective compound of the kind in use.
Beware and get the right article.
Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator.
Price 75 cents per bottle.
Wholesale Depot, 50 Dey st., New York.
Also,
PROF. L. MILLER'S INSTANTANEOUS LIQUID HAIR DYE
Price 50 cents per box.
Warranted superior to all others.
Try them, and you will acknowledge the fact.

SKATES.—The largest and best assortment of Ladies', Gentlemen's and Children's SKATES in the city, at less than Broadway prices. Depot of the Philadelphia Club Skates. NATHANIEL KUDLER & MORRISON, No. 319 Seventy and No. 10 Division St. 260-67o

Greatly Improved Pianofortes.
CALENBERG & CO., Manufacturers of Pianofortes, Combining Some Full Iron Frame, Overstrung Bass and Trichord Treble, with the modern Improvements of the day, the result of Twenty-five years' experience, and which, for Power, Quality of Touch and beauty of Finish, surpasses everything that exists; a Piano perfect—not to require repair. Every Piano warranted for Five years. Pianos to Let. Warerooms, 24 Leroy Place, Bleecker St., near Broadway New York. 262-6o

Superior Pianofortes.
ERNEST GABLER, MANUFACTURER of Pianofortes (with or without pedals), 112 Fourth Street, between Second and Third Ave., New York. Dealers and others are respectfully invited to call and examine my very superior instruments, made with full iron frame and wrest plank equal to any in the market for strength and beauty of finish, sweetness and power of tone. My instruments are warranted for three years, and I guarantee them all at lower prices than any respectable manufacturer in the city. ERNEST GABLER, 274 112 Fourth Street, between Second and Third Ave., New York.

HELANS PATENT BILLIARD TABLES.
MANUFACTORY 65&67&69 CROSBY ST. NEW YORK.

FINKLE & LYON'S
SEWING MACHINES.
Our Machines have received the highest medal at the Fair of the American Institute, with the highest premium for Best Spring Stitch Machine.
They also took the highest premiums at the New Jersey State Fair, at the Mechanics' Fair, at the Fair of the American Institute, and at generally wherever exhibited.
Into office 323 BROADWAY.
REMOVED TO 658 BROADWAY 000

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AND GYMNASIUM
YONKERS, N. Y.
Winter Session commences on the 1st day of NOV
TERMS:
Board and Tuition.....$150 per Session.
For Circulars and particular information, apply to
M. N. WHEWELL, Principal
Yonkers, 1860 000

335 EMPIRE 335
SEWING MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
SALESROOM, NO. 335 BROADWAY.
The Machine is constructed on a new and very simple principle of mechanism. It possesses many rare and valuable features, which have been eminently the most perfected experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY AND PERFECTION COMBINED.
The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:
1. Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2. Liability to get out of order.
3. Expense, in order to keep them in use in repairing.
4. Impossibly to sew every description of material.
5. Disagreeable noise while in operation.

The Empire Sewing Machine
IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.
It has a straight needle, perpendicular motion, makes the same or corresponding stitch, which is alike on both sides, and is alike on both sides; it will not run wrong either backward or forward, draws the work closer to the throat, Smooth Stitch, with cotton, linen, silk, or wool, from the coarsest to the finest number.
Having neither Cam nor Cog wheel, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EFFECTUALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.

It requires about one-fifth the power to drive it that any other Machine does. A child of twelve years of age can operate it steadily, without fatigue or injury to health.
Its strength and consequent durability of construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and it is warranted by the Company to give entire satisfaction.
We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article to call and examine the CONTEMPLATED MACHINE.
But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of

MERCHANT TAILORS,
COACH-MAKERS,
HOSE-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS,
RIDER AND CROUP MAKERS,
UPHOLSTERERS,
CORSET-MAKERS,
LADIES' DRESS-MAKERS,
SHOE-BINDERS,
VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS

Religious and Charitable Institutions
WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.
PRICE OF MACHINES COMPLETE:
No. 1—For Family Machine.....$60
No. 2—Small size Manufacturing.....70
No. 3—Large size Manufacturing.....80
AGENTS WANTED in all parts of the United States. Terms made known by applying at the Salesroom, No. 335 Broadway.
T. J. HOLMES & CO.
000

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER
Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by Frank Leslie, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 266—Vol. XI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 29, 1860. [Price 6 Cents.

MINOT'S LEDGE LIGHTHOUSE, BOSTON HARBOR.

On the 15th and 16th of April, 1851, a storm of unexampled violence raged on the coast of Massachusetts, and, when the next morning dawned, to the horror of the inhabitants of Boston it was discovered that the lighthouse on the rock at the mouth of the harbor had totally disappeared. The base of this structure had been formed by eight heavy wrought iron piles, eight inches in diameter at the foot, and four and a half at the top. The keeper's house and lantern were likewise made of iron, and the total height of the whole was seventy feet, being about fifty feet above high water mark. Captain Bennett happened to be on shore at the time of this terrible catastrophe, but his two assistants, Joseph Wilson and Joseph Antonio, were lost in the light. The disaster occurred in the height of the gale. The light was seen at eleven o'clock on the night of the 16th, and the fog-bell was heard to toll with more than usual quickness. At daylight the next morning each of the tenements of the lighthouse as would float strewed the beach to leeward. The massive structure which man, in the pride of his power and self-confidence, had placed to brave the fury of the elements, had vanished; and the mad waves leaped and tumbled wildly and in seeming exultation over its site.

The destruction of the lighthouse made the rocks more dangerous than ever, and a light-boat was soon moored outside of Minot's as a substitute. But the situation was too exposed for a light-boat, which, however, still gives warning to the mariner, although she has repeatedly been driven from her moorings.

A petition was sent to Congress to rebuild the light, and an appropriation was made for building a substantial granite structure upon the site of the pile lighthouse. The work was placed under the superintendence of Captain B. S. Alexander, who has created a most massive superstructure upon that part of Cohasset Rocks called Minot's Ledge. It is about ninety-eight feet from the rock, and is constructed of heavy blocks of granite, each dovetailed into the other, in each course laid in cement, and bolted together with heavy iron bolts. The courses are two feet in thickness, and up to the height of forty feet the work is perfectly solid, with a heavy iron post in the centre, firmly imbedded in the rock below. Above the forty feet, where the diameter is about twenty-seven feet, are six apartments, one above the other with a lantern twelve feet in height surmounting the whole. It has the appearance of being an immense granite post in mid ocean, sustaining a lantern on its top.

Minot's Rock is the outer of the Cohasset Rocks, situated north of Cohasset, and a little less than three miles from the Glades. The distance from Boston is about seventeen miles, and from Boston Light nearly eight miles. The diameter of the rock at the top, which is exposed at extreme low water, is about thirty-five feet. The ledge extends on shore, affording an additional surface of rock, which is partially exposed at low water in fine weather. These rocks had long been the terror of mariners, and the numerous shipwrecks which occurred upon them attracted public attention to the imperative necessity for a lighthouse as a beacon of safety to our gallant sailors. The unfortunate lighthouse, whose destruction we have mentioned in the commencement of this article, was commenced in 1847, and completed in 1849, when Mr. Dunham, of West Bridgewater, was appointed keeper with two assistants. But he soon became convinced that the situation was a most dangerous one. The winds and waves shook the structure in a most alarming manner, and the public mind became soon aware that the lighthouse would not stand a very severe storm. It seems strange that measures were not immediately taken to avert the impending calamity, but what was everybody's business was nobody's business, and two gallant fellows were eventually sacrificed. On the approach of the equinoctial gales Captain Dunham very wisely resigned his appointment, and Mr. J. W Bennett was appointed in his place. Mr. Bennett was one of those who did not credit Captain Dunham's reports of the insecurity of the lighthouse, and resolved to take his chance. A fate, however, which accident spares him, waited, as we have related, our unfortunate assistants. Two or three severe gales in the winter of 1850, however, convinced the incredulous Mr. Bennett that the fears of his predecessor were not altogether groundless, and when the breeze were carried away during one severe tempest, he made a representation to the authorities, who, as usual, being in no danger themselves, gave no credence to the tale. The consequence was the terrible catastrophe of the 18th of April, 1851.

We are happy to say that no such fears need be entertained for the present lighthouse, which is pronounced by all to be as firm and unassailable as the rock itself We give an accurate picture of this triumph of engineering and architecture.

The difficulties attendant upon the erection of such a building upon so circumscribed a foundation was well described by the architect, Captain Alexander, at the consecration of the work in October, 1858, at which the city authorities of Boston were present, and a delegation from the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts Free Masons. He said:

"At the commencement of this work we had nothing but money—no workmen, no shore establishment, no workshop, no tools, no machinery, no boats, no organization. In one year there all started into life. Tuesday morning, the first day of July, 1855, just as the sun tipped the wings of the morning seagull as it took its swift flight over the wave, we struck our first blow on the Minot. In the first year, 1855, we worked on it one hundred and thirty hours; 1856, one hundred and fifty-seven hours; 1857, one hundred and thirty hours and twenty-one minutes; 1858, to September 30, two hundred and eight hours; making in all six hundred and twenty-five hours twenty-one minutes. At first the men were nervous with the natural fear incident to their seemingly dangerous situation; but no accident ever befalling any of their number and seeing every precaution taken for their safety, this fear was soon dispelled, and they worked as cheerily as on land. And you now see before you, gentlemen, the result of the labors of as fine a body of workmen as it has ever been my fortune to meet with."

The following remarks were afterwards made by the Hon. Edward Everett:

"We have come, sir, to express our interest in a great public work. Well do I remember that dreadful night, the 16th of April, 1851, when a furious storm swept along the coast of New England, by which houses were unroofed, steeples toppled down, and vessels driven on shore. In the course of that tremendous night the lighthouse on Minot's Ledge disappeared. It was last seen at half-past three o'clock in the afternoon; and between that hour and daylight the following morning, the ocean, driven in by the furious tempest, had heaved the lighthouse from the nine iron pillars on which it rested, and which it twisted like osiers—had dashed it in fragments on the rocks, and with it the two brave men, who, in that awful hour, stood bravely at their posts. We have come now, sir, to repair the desolations of that hour, and to lay the corner-stone of a structure destined by that divine blessing which has been so fervently invoked by the reverend chaplain to resist the utmost violence of the winds and the waves.

MINOT'S LEDGE LIGHTHOUSE, ON COHASSET ROCKS, BOSTON HARBOR.

"It is a point second to no other on our coast, both for the amount of the commerce which passes it, north and south, to its destined markets, and for the perils which here await the mariner. If Minot's Ledge could keep a Minot's ledger, in which the value of every cargo that passes it in either direction could be entered, and in which—on another page—could be recorded the fearful apprehensions and heart-broken lamentations of anxious and bereaved mothers, wives, sisters and daughters, sorrowing for the delay of the loved ones, destined many of them never to return, it would furnish an illustration of the importance of a lighthouse on these mournfully notorious rocks, which would need no comment of mine."

BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM

HAS again become the popular resort of EVERY LOVER OF THE WONDERFUL, THE CURIOUS AND AMUSING,

And is now attracting more attention, and receiving more visitors than every other place of Amusement in New York. Every thing novel, curious and and interesting is secured by Mr. Barnum, and presented to his visitors in addition to the 850,000 Curiosities from every part of the world, and the which take place every afternoon at 3 o'clock, and every evening at half-past 7, by a full and complete dramatic company. At present the two Living Aztec Children, the most curious, wonderful and interesting human beings the world has every produced; the Living What Is It? or Man Monkey; the two Albino Children; the Grand Aquaria; Monster Snakes; Living Happy Family, &c., &c., are all on exhibition, and yet the price of admission to the whole is only 25 cents. Children under 10 years 15 cents.

SPLENDID DRAMATIC ENTERTAINMENTS

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 29, 1860.

All communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to Frank Leslie, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	17 weeks	$ 1
One do.	1 year	$ 3
Two do.	1 year	$ 5
Or One Copy	2 years	$ 5
Three Copies	1 year	$ 6
Five do.	1 year	$10

And an extra Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, thus giving us credit for being en rapport with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching information. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Foreign News.

The aspect of Europe is remarkably calm; scarcely any perceptible difference since our last. The Empress Eugenie, after a pleasant tour through Scotland and England, where she had been most cordially received, had paid a flying visit to Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle.

It is reported that Garibaldi had been invited to Paris to explain to Louis Napoleon his intentions respecting the Italian Hungarian campaign. This, however, requires confirmation; but should it prove true, it would indicate the certainty of a renewal of the war next year.

The Austrian journals deny that any negotiations are pending for the sale of Venetia. The meeting of the French, Austrian and Sardinian ministers referred to last week related to the Lombard debt, two-thirds of which Sardinia would have to assume.

The British Parliament was summoned to meet on the 5th of February. The London press was unanimous in its regret and disapproval of the breaking up of the Union. They all agree in the opinion that any disaster to the United States is equally one to the British Empire.

The French papers announce that a Baltimore regiment will visit Paris next year, the Emperor having given his assent to its coming in full uniform and armed. It will be remembered that the Emperor's cousin, one of the Baltimore Bonapartes, belonged to a regiment of the Monumental City.

Sir Leopold Clintock's report of the feasibility of an Atlantic Telegraph Cable by the way of Iceland, Greenland and other northern headlands, has been published and favorably received. The greatest length of cable from land to land being only six hundred miles, will afford opportunity for the repairing of it should any break occur.

France is tranquil and prosperous; but the war preparations are zealously continued. The recent edict of the Emperor, giving an enlarged freedom of action to the Legislative Assembly, is rightly considered as a great advance in constitutional government. Like a skilful statesman, Louis Napoleon is gradually giving to France some of the liberties she has lost by her violent and extreme action.

George Sand, otherwise Madame Dudevant, is going to spend the winter in an island, in the Mediterranean, to restore her health.

The siege of Gaeta still continues. It is said that the French Emperor has notified to the dethroned King of Naples the inutility of further resistance.

Affairs in Wallachia were very unsettled, and fears were entertained of a general rising in Little Wallachia.

Twenty of the principal merchants at Crajova had been killed by the military during a popular commotion and the archbishop and president of the council had been arrested at Jassy.

The news by the Persia is of considerable interest. The Emperor of Austria, irritated at the increasing discontent of the Hungarians, had resolved to proclaim martial law throughout Hungary.

The ex-King of Naples had entered another protest against the proceedings of Victor Emmanuel, who had left Palermo for Naples. His reception at Naples had been very gratifying. There was a rumor that the Hungarian Diet were contemplating offering the crown of Hungary to Prince Napoleon.

The Morning Post announces that the police are now able to make out a prima facie case against a certain person for the murder of the child at Road.

The Persia brought $3,100,000 specie.

A foreign office telegram says that the Allies have captured Pekin: that the Emperor's summer palace had been sacked and immense spoils taken and that the Emperor had fled to Tartary.

Parks and Loch, the English prisoners, had returned. Two others had died from ill treatment. Two more are still unaccounted for.

The Allies are to winter in Pekin and Teintsien.

CONGRESSIONAL MATTERS.

The proceedings in Congress have been so overshadowed by the exciting discussions outside the Federal Capitol, that their proceedings have been confined to measures of little national interest. Senator Wade, of Ohio, had given a very frank, outspoken speech on the Republican side of the question, and Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, had made a strong Union speech. These had drawn a very able but extreme oration from General Lane, of Oregon.

In the House the great subject of interest came off on Thursday, the 20th December, when it, in Committee of the Whole, took up the bill granting lands to Nebraska for railroads. Mr Sherman, of Ohio, offered as an amendment the Pacific Railroad bill, reported by the Select Committee during the last session. This was superseded by a substitute offered by Mr. Curtis, of Iowa, which is very similar in its features, and which was finally adopted by the Committee and by the House, after various ineffectual attempts to amend it, by a vote of 95 to 74.

Secession of South Carolina.

It is with more regret than surprise we observe that South Carolina has at last crossed the Rubicon, and formally dissolved her connection with the Great Confederacy which has become so glorious in modern history. The Convention assembled in Charleston took this important step on the 20th December, amid the vociferous plaudits of the excited assembly. It had previously formed committees to carry on the functions of an independent nation, but no practical steps have been taken to organise the customs, post office and other State departments. The forts remain as usual in the hands of the Federal authorities.

What we have Learned, and What we have yet to Learn.

The tremendous trials through which our country is now passing may, should we emerge sound from the ordeal, be of incalculable service to us. Every one has realised by this time that the lessons of the panic of 1857 have been of true value to many during the present crisis. The course pursued by our banks has been a great advance in the right direction, and the straightforward and sensible manner in which our whole business community and the press have prepared for, met and discussed all financial difficulties, indicates that we certainly learn wisdom and profit by experience.

But there is much yet to be learned. Let us trust that, in the first place, the citizens of those localities in which the panic, so to speak, comes to a head, and from which it radiates, will understand the expediency of cultivating, as much as possible, home industry and near markets. New York State judiciously cultivated, for instance, would probably sustain double her present population. Pennsylvania, with a population of less than three millions, would sustain about nine millions; while Delaware might be made in great part a perfect market-garden. There are thousands of square miles of sod in New Jersey which only require the application of the marl, which Nature has so bountifully provided, to raise abundant crops. In all of these States the vicinity to a market, particularly the case with Delaware, renders the soil there by far the most profitable in the country. Were very strenuous efforts made to disseminate knowledge relative to the capacities and resources of our own and neighboring States, it would be more advantageous for the headquarters of commerce, and, of course, for all who are commercially allied to it. Again, the advantage of customers near home—short credit men—men whose means and resources are within reach—is too well-known to require comment.

But we have a far more important lesson to learn in substituting a regard for our material interests for empty political sensation. We must all, without distinction of political views, cease sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind. We have now for years seen our whole representative force engaged in quarrelling when they should have been at business, and devoting to bombast and Buncombe the modicum of talents due to effecting some little practical good. Washington has been termed, not unaptly, our national cockpit, our representatives have been valued for their game qualities—for their idle oratory and power of repartee, instead of for legislative ability—and the country has awaited with breathless interest every day's squabbles and riot, never asking itself whether all this is worth paying for. Perhaps the American world may find it worth while to ask itself whether in future it would not be well for those who really do not wish to see every material interest sacrificed to sensation, to bestir themselves and try to put an end to the reign of Politicians and Politics, and substitute Business and Political Economy in their place.

Finally, it would be well to ascertain whether the monstrous abuse of Lobbying and its managing institution, the Third House, do not deserve quite as much reprobation and reform as any other abuse, real or fancied, which has agitated this country. Lobbying has grown directly out of the neglect of business by Legislators for Buncombe. What is not done well inside is sure to be corruptly done outside. One abuse has fostered another, and the result has been terrible. Unprincipled Legislators—and there are plenty of them—have consumed the whole time of sessions in quarrelling and making idle speeches, in order that bills might be quietly driven into Committees, or managed by their Third House pimps and jackalls. It is high time that the country understood all this, and that efforts were made to send common sense business-men of high moral character to represent us, and not mere noisy orators, who have shown, time and again, that they would belong to any party for the sake of spoils.

It has been very truly regretted that in the present crisis our country has shown no truly great men in any party. The cause may be found in our want of patronage of late years of honest men, and in our insane admiration of puffing and blowing political hacks and Captain Bobadils. While a Third House flourishes and Congress remains a cockpit, there will be every influence at work to extinguish dignity and true greatness.

EDITORIAL GLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS.

We had occasion in our last paper to trace much of our present political disturbance to our system of Borrioboola Gha, or that telescopic philanthropy which only sees distress at three thousand miles distance. The religious public especially, like Sterne, weeps over a dead jackass, but leaves a living mother to starve. We have notable instances of this wretched mania always in our midst. One, in the large sum of money subscribed for the Pope of Rome, and many others in foreign missionary societies which spend millions and produce no actual result. These are such impudent castings of the children's bread to dogs, that we can only attribute them to corruption, humbug or insanity. The bare idea of sending our dollars to Rome, when there are destitute thousands around us, and with the prospect of increased suffering as the winter advances, is as wicked as it is insulting to the common principles of humanity. We would recommend to our preachers, politicians and philanthropists the noble example of our friend Mr Farnum during the crisis in 1857, when, at his own expense, he fed hungry thousands during that terrible winter. We are in the commencement of a similar period of suffering, and we call upon those who have not quite lost their humanity to organise a plan which will do something towards alleviating the miseries of their fellow-creatures. If our wealthy philanthropists will only treat their white serfs with as much consideration as the Southern planters do their black slaves, they will better evince their attachment to our great Union, than by Bancombe speeches at political meetings, or by subscribing a thousand dollars to manumit bogus niggers.

The Welcome Guest, a London journal, is making a fame for ornithological discoveries, which throws our American publications in the shade. In the "Prairie Flower," the scene of which is laid in North America, we have a very thrilling chapter describing an ostrich hunt. We presume the author—Gustave Almard—a Frenchman of course—imported them for that special occasion; but at all events, if he has no further use for them, he had better dispose of them cheap to our friend Barnum. Apropos, the hero of the Prairie Flower always fights with a quizzing glass in his eye and with kid gloves; his weapon an elegant riding-whip, with which he scatters a tribe of furious Camanche Indians with the ease of school girls. Who but a Frenchman would ever make his hero a "bully boy with a glass eye," to use the mysterious phrase of the Indianapolis press?

The Hackneyed Saying that "history constantly repeats itself" will apply to a joke, for since the days of Hierocles, we have had the same jokes repeating themselves, till the wonder is they are not totally worn out. We did not, however, expect to see the following misprint doing duty and applied to General Harney, as happening only "last week." The Washington States, in complimenting that gallant soldier, meant to call him a "battle-scarred veteran," but was made by the typos to call him a "battle-scared veteran." In the next issue the mistake was so far corrected as to style him a "bottle scared veteran." We presume, if the General is a temperance man, he will not object to the last compound epithet.

It is impossible not to admire modesty when it appears in large chunks, and we therefore cordially tender our admiration to Mr. Bayard Taylor, of whom Baron Humboldt said, "he could not conceive how a man could have seen so much and know so little." On Tuesday, Mr. Taylor, the traveller, gave a lecture at Brooklyn, on "Man, Climate and Customs." In the course of this he must bring in the "inevitable nigger," by saying:

"It was related of a tribe of Bulgarians, that they hung all their intellectual men, in order to preserve equality and prevent them from attaining too much influence. Civilised countries imitated this custom somewhat, for they only hissed their men of intellect. An instance of the latter custom happened a few days since at Philadelphia, when a friend of the lecturer, Mr G. W. Curtis, was publicly excluded from the stage."

We are not surprised to read that the lecturer, Mr. Taylor, was soundly hissed for his impertinence in thus bringing in an Abolitionist Lecturer. A correspondent informs us that he hissed the lecturer, because he went to hear the results of science and not the ravings of fanaticism.

Among the remarkable things of the day is the new and amazing friendship conceived by James Brooks of the Express for Thurlow Weed of the Albany Journal. In the seventeenth edition of their excellent paper for Wednesday last, you will find these words:

"For the New York Express to praise the editor of the Albany Evening Journal is hard, difficult, nay, almost impossible. But when we say that he alone of the Republican editors has the sagacity to comprehend the crisis, and foresee the future, we but utter a truth. In fact, he seems to be about the only Republican of note that knows what he is about."

What is the novelty of "two and two are four" to the solemn assurance that "Thurlow knows what he is about!" Weeds are often found about Brooks!

PERSONAL.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Monterey is in the city.

Bombalino has sent his treasures to Paris. They amount to nine millions of silver ducats.

Lord Brougham is about to visit Ireland for the first time in his life.

General Scott is in Washington.

It is said that the last interview between the President and Mr. Cass was of a very angry nature.

It would seem by the following that secession is "according to Hoyle." In the account published by the South Carolinian of a celebration given the other night in Columbia, it says:

"A large transparency had the following mottoes: 'Euchre—South Carolina plays it alone.' 'Her Right and Left Bowers—Georgia and Florida.' 'Her Trumps—Magrath, Colcock, Connor. With these she claims a March.'"

Prentice will no doubt crack his joke even when in articulo mortis. His joke upon the dissolution of the Union is this:

"If South Carolina does secede, recede, draw back, back down, back out from the Union, we hope she will have the grace to display a huge crawfish on her coat of arms."

The Cincinnati Times gives this graphic instance of calling for champagne: "A country couple, newly married, stopped at the Gibson House in Cincinnati a few days ago, and the groom called for some wine. When asked what kind he would have, he replied, "We want that kind of wine where the corks fly out and liquor boils up like soapsuds.""

The Japanese bill is now cut down to a total of $52,832 73. The principal items are: $17,910 51 for the board of the Japanese at the Metropolitan Hotel; $38,863 for the ball and suppers, $7,472 31 for the decorations, $7,851 50 for carriage hire; $2,914 75 for music for the military turnout, and $500 for the use of the steamer Alida to go to South Amboy. The bills appear reasonable, and the necessary appropriation will now probably be passed by the Common Council without opposition. When it is borne in mind that one evening's sport—the Renfrew Ball—cost $30,000, we quite agree with the News that the above is very moderate.

Mr. Daniel S. Burgan, of Baltimore, on the 7th inst., went to a barber-shop and got shaved, the razor cutting a small pimple on his cheek; he returned home, and the same night the cut pimple became inflamed, erysipelas set in, and the swelling quickly extended over his face, neck and breast, causing his death the next Tuesday.

There is now living in Pike county, Missouri, a negro, Phillip, aged ninety-six. He was born in Virginia, and often served at the table where General Washington was a guest.

A Mrs. Macavoy, housekeeper to the Rev. Mr Buchan, entered her master's bed-room, and commenced beating him about the head with a rolling-pin. The astonished divine sprang out of bed, and grappled his assailant. It afterwards proved that she had intended to murder Mr Buchan, and then set fire to the house. Elderly housekeepers are dangerous creatures.

The Archbishop Hughes has received a silver medal from the Pope, for his zeal in raising money for him in New York.

We observe from the Indianapolis papers that our friend and correspondent, Colonel H. H. Hoyt, has been entertained at the Spencer House by the Press to a magnificent dinner. Eloquence, good feeling and champagne abounded.

The London Critic says that Nathaniel Hawthorne and John Russel Lowell are both busy on some startling novelties. We shall be glad to see them.

Sir Edmund Head is busy with the Duke of Newcastle in drafting a Constitution for the Great National Confederation, into which, it is stated, the British Government has decided upon forming the Canadas.

Alexander Mann, for many years editor of the Rochester, New York, daily American, a conservative Fillmore newspaper of the first character in that city, and recently by adoption a Floridian and citizen of St. Augustine, died suddenly of apoplexy in the latter city. ... Mr. Mann was also connected ... with the Albany Statesman, the New York Times and Railroad Review. He was a writer of much power, and ... his profession. Mr Mann was forty-nine years of age. He leaves a wife and two children.

Mr. Corbey is going to spend the ensuing winter in Egypt, for the benefit of his health. He is troubled with a disease of the throat. A man who talks so long and prosily as he has done for twenty years deserves this visitation.

Bradbury and Evans have engaged Wm. Russell, the London Times' correspondent who accompanied the Prince of Wales in his travelling tour, to write an account of the whole trip. It ought to be published in Punch.

The Evening Post says, "apropos of General Cass's resignation, his future biographer will please bear in mind that this is not the first time the General has broken his sword when his superior officer proved a traitor." This is perhaps, "the truth, the Hull truth, and nothing but the truth."

The Express has a critic who does not admire the great American actor, for he says:

"The New York public, the cultivated and fashionable public, which for years past has only now and then at rare intervals looked in at a theatre, has deserted the opera and got into a fashion of going to see Cushman and Booth, and sometimes out of curiosity, Forrest; a fashion which promises to last, for Cushman and Booth are worth seeing."

There is no implication of malice in the last line very painful to the worship pers of bovine tragedy.

Thackeray's new novel which he advertises to commence in the January number of the Cornhill Magazine, is entitled, "The Adventures of Philip on his way through the World, showing who robbed him, who helped him, and who passed him by." The last is a failure, and the novel will be a failure also. Thackeray is only a satirist, and like Swift, only fit to write semi-metaphorical allegorical little ones. A great novelist must be full of earnestness and sympathy, such as were Scott, Dickens, Fielding and Smollett. Thackeray cannot create or put life into anything; he can only assassinate and dissect.

Norman Wiard, Esq., inventor of the Steam Ice Boat, is now staying in this city. He will start for Prairie du Chien in a few days where extensive preparations are being made for the trial trips of his Steam Ice Boat, which excites the liveliest interest and the greatest expectation in that section of the country. The most important commercial benefits are expected to result from the success of this undertaking, and the trial trip is looked forward to with increasing anxiety.

OUR WEEKLY GOSSIP.

New York Carnival in Central Park.

Whatever objections may be urged against Central Park for summer recreations, for winter sports it is not only entirely unobjectionable but it is, positively, a glorious place of resort. No sooner does King Frost command the waters of the lake to be still, than the hum of preparation is heard in a hundred directions. The hardware men shake every variety of skates in the face of the public—rockers and runners, grooved and flat, Philadelphia and London Club skates, and a host of others, with screws, and clasps, and springs, iron and wooden frames, strapped and strapless. Old skates are burnished up and filed at home, and made to look "better as new;" and even the great destinies of the country are for the time forgotten in the joyful anticipation of a "general skate," a jolly good time, in fact—"a big thing."

The "Carnival in New York" a few years since, when the snow lay two feet thick on Broadway, and the sleighs, public and private, made that splendid thoroughfare the gayest and most animated scene in the world, was something to brag of and wonder at. It killed retail trade, to be sure; but, then, as every one went out sleighing, there could not, of course, be any one to buy or to sell. During the last few years the "Carnival" has ceased to be; the utilitarian spirit of the age has waged against it a desolating war, and by a scientific process and the help of salt converted the virgin snow into pestiferous mud. The merry sleigh bells but rarely tinkle now in Broadway, and the lusty shouts of the laughing carnival revellers are heard there no more. But there are compensations through all nature, and the ambition of man steps forward to develope them. We have created a Central Park, and though, unlike Minerva, it did not spring perfect from the head of a modern Jove, it will be all right some time or other. But its creation has changed the location of our winter carnival, and transferred it to the beautiful lake which is its chiefest ornament and pride.

For several days past, not only thousands, but tens of thousands, of people have thronged the frozen lake. From early morning and all day long, to the going down of the young moon, its surface has sustained a swarm of merry skaters of every grade of excellence, from the man who can glide through the figure of a quadrille, or carve out his true love's name in delicate tracery, to him who enjoys the agony of a first trial, and shuffles along on his ankles in so ne-olated state of hopeless imbecility, but in the firm belief that he is "getting along." But whether a man skates well or skates badly, whether he glides away erect or goes along on the broad of his back, the spirit of good humor and good feeling reigns supreme over all.

One noticeable and delightful feature of our carnival in the Central Park is the presence of ladies. They come out in throngs and they do not come out in staid and severe dignity, standing like skeletons at a feast, but, abandoning themselves to the spirit of the scene, they are the liveliest and the merriest of the merry crowd. There we see ladies on foot, ladies on skates and ladies on runners—no, ladies in chairs on runners, with attendant cavaliers, who, by their earnest attention seem to think that the glow of health which exercise gives to the cheeks of their fair companions renders them doubly beautiful. It is impossible to calculate how many wavering intentions are fixed and how many hearts made happy while gliding over the smooth surface of the beautiful lake. So active is the interest felt in this healthy, invigorating and delightful exercise, that on the first skating Sunday it is estimated that over seventy-five thousand persons visited the Central Park.

The Academy of Music to Let.

"Discord, dire sister," has nearly closed up the fountains of music and silenced the sweet syrens of song. Ullman, who covered himself with glory in his last brief campaign, who, in the mise en scène, came nearer to the art standards of Europe than any of his predecessors, has retired from the operatic management, and the Academy of Music is now open to the assaults of any speculator, who, having nothing to lose, may choose to try his hand at extracting dollars from an unwilling public. As far as the immediate future is open to us, we see no hope of an operatic organization for many months to come. The truth is, we have had too many little seasons at our opera-house. We have had seasons of one week, and seasons of two weeks, and seasons of six and eight weeks, coming at such odd and inconvenient times, that most of them had ended before the great public knew that the "singers were in town." Under which thimble is the pea? says the thimblerigger; in which city of the Union is our opera company? says the New York public. We do not want, and cannot support, in New York more than two seasons—the fall and the spring. These should be at stated times, which should never be altered when once dates are announced. If such a regulation were persevered in, a sense of stability would pervade the public mind, and the opera would assume the proportion of an institution, instead of appearing, as it does now, as a superior sort of travelling circus.

German Opera Takes Refuge in Chatham Street.

We hear of a new German operatic combination, which is to give a series of representations in the classic locale of Chatham street—in point of fact, in the Chatham Theatre, sacred to the memory of peanuts and oranges, shirtsleeves and catcalls, and, above all, to the immortal Kirby, who wrapped himself up in the American flag and died like a son of a—hero. We have no personal objection to Chatham street; it is a good thoroughfare for the Third Avenue Railroad, and derives a remote respectability by a sort of doubtful connection with Broadway, into which it would emerge, but for the envious intervention of City Hall Square. Still, it has not a pleasant odor, and the interesting Hebrews, who live in old clothes and smell of them, are not engaging in their appearance or manners. We should feel uncertain, did we attempt to visit the Chatham Theatre, of ever reaching our destination, for we have heard of strangers who were pounced upon by these predatory Hebrews, forcibly carried into their kerseymere dens, whence, invested with mouldy and unsavory "duds," they came forth but little better than unclean things. We submit, therefore, all things considered, that the locality chosen for the new German opera speculation is hardly calculated to secure a very large attendance of the opera habitués.

The Philharmonic Society—A Charitable Suggestion.

The only great musical society in America, the Philharmonic Society of New York, gives one of its interesting concerts at the Academy of Music on the 22d inst. For eighteen or nineteen years this society has maintained its position; it had to struggle in its youth against prejudice and insufferance and an unsympathizing and sparsely (musically) educated public; but it persevered undiscouraged but not dispirited until the tyrant, Fashion, adopted it as its own, and a brilliant and permanent success rewarded its well-directed efforts. And now, in the full tide of its well deserved success, would it not be a graceful and a noble act to repeat the concert of Saturday and give the receipts for the benefit of our starving poor? The stockholders of the Academy would not refuse the free gift of the house for the occasion, the public would certainly respond, for the public at large have a great curiosity to hear the performances of this famous society, and who knows but so noble an example might be followed by all our places of public amusement, and many thousand dollars raised to be devoted to provide food and fire for those who in this hard season have natural claims upon the charity of all. Will the Philharmonic Society set this ball in motion?

Books Just Out.

In the way of new books this season is very prolific. All those who delight in exquisite poetry of a serious character will secure a copy of the Hymns of Ages collected by the Rev. F. D. Huntington, D.D., and just issued in beautiful style by Ticknor & Fields, of Boston. The present volume is the second in the series, and was called for by the great success of the first. The selections are from some of the most celebrated of the old poets, and are rare gems of sacred thought. Ralph Waldo Emerson's new book, The Conduct of Life, just issued by Ticknor & Fields, is exciting much controversy in critical circles. It is a bold and powerful exposition of his peculiar train of thought, well calculated to awake reflection and certain to provoke controversy.

Ticknor & Fields have also published a very charming real life book, called, From Maytime to Hopping, by the author of "Our Farm of Four Acres." It is a story of English country life, artistic in its construction, interesting from its naturalness and simplicity, genial in its tone and healthy in its sentiment.

Sheldon & Co. have issued the third volume of American History, by Jacob Abbott. The design of the work is to narrate in a clear, simple and intelligible manner the leading events connected with the history of our country, from the earliest periods down, as nearly as practicable, to the present time. The several volumes will contain the necessary maps, and also many incidental illustrations. The present volume treats of the Southern colonies.

Fowler & Wells have sent us an elegantly got up volume upon Phonography written by one of the most celebrated phonographists in the country, Benn Pitman, of Cincinnati. It is a complete and admirable exposition of the phonographic art, and is the best and most intelligible guide to all who desire to master its mysteries.

To travellers, we would say that the next most important thing, after taking care of your portmanteau is to secure a copy of Dinsmore's Railroad and Steam Navigation Guide. It is the best work of the kind published, and is as useful for Southern as for North-Eastern or Western travel.

Tiffany & Co. on the Holiday Question.

If any one wishes to be bewildered by an infinite variety of rich and exquisite articles suitable for this season, sacred to loving gifts and friendly souvenirs, let him step into Tiffany & Co.'s, 550 Broadway—or, if he prefers it, to their other store, No. 79 Rue Richelieu, Paris, although he could hardly arrive there before Christmas or New Year—let him then step into 550 Broadway, and he will see at once that the most luxurious and the most inexpensive taste can be gratified whatever direction it may take. Tiffany & Co. have the largest and the richest assortment of diamonds and other precious stones, set and unset, to be found in any single establishment in the world. In jewellery, their styles are of the newest and most recherché fashions, their Paris house, which in a great measure leads the fashions there, always advising them beforehand of the coming modes in advance of all houses in the same line. So that our fashionables can have the satisfaction of wearing the recherché patterns in jewellery which are at the same moment adopted by the nobility of the Old World.

It would be impossible to enumerate a tithe of the articles suitable for Christmas and New Year's greetings displayed on the various floors of Tiffany & Co.'s vast establishment. Suffice to say, that if you want watches or clocks, Sevres, Dresden or other porcelains, dressing or jewel-cases in ebony, rosewood, buhl or leather, articles in silver or plate, or the most exquisite fancies in the way of etrennes, your most fanciful wishes can be gratified. Of the jewellery department and works of art in bronze and silver, we shall attempt no description, for their name is legion, their variety infinite, and their richness and beauty unsurpassed. They may talk of their bazaars of the East, but the true bazaar, thronged all day long during the holiday season by the rich and the beautiful, is Tiffany & Co.'s, 550 Broadway.

DRAMA.

Niblo's Theatre.—Mr. Forrest as "Richard III."—On Monday evening last, that being the opening night of the fourteenth week of his engagement, Mr. Forrest appeared as the crooked-back tyrant, the fifth rôle he has assumed. Mr. Forrest differs entirely both in his conception and rendition of this part, from any of his predecessors. Instead of representing Richard as a vulgar, loud-talking ruffian, Mr. Forrest paints him as a subtle, far-sighted hypocrite; outwardly a courteous gentleman, only forgetting the "proprieties" when under the influence of sudden bursts of anger. Most representations of the tyrant Richard make his hypocrisy and villainy so absurdly glaring, that the most obtuse courtier would fail to be deceived by it; but Mr. Forrest, on the contrary, so nicely and delicately manages all this, that even in the scene with Queen Anne, where he wins her love beside dead Henry's bier, one can almost forgive the gentle lady for yielding herself captive to his earnest vows. Could any low and vulgar nature have played a game of such excellent dissembling as Richard then and there enacts? Certainly not; and yet every actor save and except Mr. Forrest depicts Gloster as an ill-bred ruffian, instead of which he most undoubtedly was in reality a thoroughly well-bred gentleman; a man of the world, whose whole life had been devoted to schooling his countenance and manner, that through neither one nor the other could a glimpse even be caught of the dark plots and treasons that were hatching beneath that calm exterior. Does he not himself say that he "can smile and murder as he smiles, and cry content to that which grieves his heart." Mr. Forrest's performance throughout is marked by a nice consistency, a scholarly appreciation of the text and such perfect taste, that never once, not even in the last acts, where the temptation to over-color is so strong, does he overstep the bounds of propriety; he lives and dies as Richard, Duke of Gloster, afterwards Richard III. King of England, may be supposed to have lived and died; and this can be said of no other artist we have ever seen attempt to act the part. The tragedy is not particularly well put upon the stage, the scenery is shabby and the costumes shabbier but it is creditably performed by Conway, Fisher, Mrs. Ponisi, Mrs. Conway and the rest of the company.

Winter Garden.—Mr. Booth's engagement comes to a conclusion with this week, and despite the futile attempts made by certain papers to manufacture public opinion in his behalf, we fancy that the public proper will feel no very great degree of grief at parting with this young man. He has been more persistently over-praised than any artist of late years. On Monday the ever-popular favorite, Mr. Joseph Jefferson, makes his first appearance this season as "Rip van Winkle;" he is certain of a hearty welcome.

Wallack's Theatre.—"To Marry or not to Marry" is the title of the last novelty at Wallack's; it is an adaptation from Mrs. Inchbald, and has met with deserved success. We regret being compelled to defer a longer notice until next week.

Barnum's Museum.—Another week of crowded and delighted audiences. The variety of amusement afforded by the enterprising Prince of Managers is really marvellous. All the wonders of Nature are gathered in one building, giving to the visitor all the privileges of a circumnavigator of the globe, without the expense of passage money or the unpleasant sensations of sea sickness. In no other spot in the world can such strange sights as the Aztec Children, the Albinos, the What Is It? and a hundred other things be seen. But it is needless to praise Barnum. In addition to these curiosities there are the dramatic performances, afternoon and evening, in the Lecture Room. Parents ought to take their families to the Museum by way of a Christmas treat.

We find the following in an English paper, but it sounds like a canard: The Empress of the French, while at the station on her way to Perth, had her attention drawn to an old man in extreme ill-health, but bearing upon his person several decorations for military service. Prompted, doubtless, by sympathy for his infirmity, she gave him a small donation, when one of the attendants, with more officiousness than good taste, reminded Her Majesty that she had befriended a man who had fought at Waterloo. "Then he is the more deserving," replied the Empress, "for he contended with a brave enemy."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The audacity which young rowdies show in their assaults is becoming a peculiar feature in our "modern manners." On Sunday evening, as two respectable women were walking to church in Jersey City, they were suddenly seized by four boys and rifled of their purses. Before they could recover from their fright to call out, the young villains had fled, and the whole affair was so momentary that the ladies cannot identify them. This happened between seven and eight o'clock, at the corner of Hudson and Grand streets.

A somewhat singular case of abduction occurred last week at Portland. A Mrs. Curtis, who had been living apart from her husband for some time, was forcibly carried off by him. It has caused considerable excitement in the town.

On Saturday week, as General Lockwood was sitting in his parlor at Memphis, Tenn., he was fired at by an assassin; he fortunately escaped unhurt. The next night a man, supposed to be the same, fired into the residence of Mr. Pierson, also without doing any damage.

Richard M. McGill, at Sacramento, recently, was thrown from a carriage and received a fracture of the skull, which, as is presumed, rendered him insane. He was assisted to his residence, where he immediately drew a pistol from his pocket, and, exclaiming, "I will finish this!" shot himself through the head. McGill was aged about twenty-eight years, and was from Maryland.

The pilot of the steamboat Goody Friends has been fined fifty dollars, and compelled to leave New Orleans for making love to a negress.

The Newport Advertiser threatens, in the event of Southern secession, to make Newport a free port and Rhode Island an independent State.

A California paper says that an enterprising merchant of San Francisco has adopted the following plan of swindling the newspapers out of his advertising: He takes a white dog, and with a stencil-plate and black ink he inscribes his business card upon each side of the dog, and then sends him forth, a locomotive advertisement, a doggerytype of the fast people of a fast country.

James Hosley, who was sentenced to imprisonment for life at Cambridge, Mass., the other day, on receiving his sentence said, in a malignant manner, "I want you to understand that a State prison can never hold me—never!" It is said he has a violent hatred of one of the officers of the prison, and is regarded as a most dangerous person.

Ladies ought to be very cautious of steamboat acquaintances. Several susceptible widows of the Crescent City have been victimised by a fascinating colonel, who made their acquaintance on a trip, and whose conversation was so agreeable that they asked him to their houses. Many of them have had to mourn the loss of their jewellery, watches and other valuables.

The Lancaster Examiner says: "We have heard of a project among some Union men to buy Wheatland from Mr. Buchanan, and ask, as a special favor, that he would never return to Lancaster county again."

Dr. Wickham, who was accused of poisoning Mrs. Cole, in conjunction with her husband, for the sake of her life insurance, has been found guilty of murder in the second degree. The trial was a very elaborate one, and the doctor was very ably defended, but the evidence was so very strong against him that no doubt remained on the jury's mind, and, although many of them had known him for years, they were compelled to give in a verdict of "Guilty."

Love suicides are becoming fearfully frequent. Every week the papers abound with them. About a year since a most accomplished and respectable young lady, Miss Flora Eames, went to visit a married sister in Nunda, Livingston county, where she met a young man, who proposed marriage to her. He was accepted, and a day was fixed for the wedding. The day before the appointed time the heartless scoundrel left without seeing his betrothed, merely writing to say that he was going to Cuba for eight years. The unfortunate lady, stung to the soul at his treachery, took poison, and remains in a very precarious state. The Albany Statesman gives the lady's name, but not that of her unmanly lover.

The Western Lunatic Asylum, Hopkinsville, Kentucky, one of the largest and most costly buildings in Kentucky, was burnt down last week. The fire fortunately did not break out till about eleven o'clock in the morning, or the destruction of life would have been fearful. Dr. Montgomery, the Superintendent, exerted himself to the utmost, but the flames were not to be subdued, and in four hours nothing but the walls were left standing. The attendants succeeded in saving the patients, 250, without injury, except one who fastened his cell, near where the fire originated. The attendant, after endangering his own life, had to leave him. The procession of lunatics marching into town presented a spectacle of melancholy grotesqueness, as the poor creatures passed on, the men on foot and the females on wagons and backs, wrapped up in quilts, comforts and blankets of every hue.

The Detroit Advertiser has the following very remarkable story: "In the month of August last Mr. Caleb C. Woodbury, postmaster at White Pigeon, Michigan, was arrested upon the charge of robbing the United States mail. He was taken to Detroit, where a preliminary examination was had before a United States Commissioner, who required him to give bail in the sum of $4 000 to appear on trial, or in default to be imprisoned. On the 18th of August he was taken to his home by Deputy United States Marshal Moore, to give him an opportunity of obtaining the requisite surety. While in his own house he was permitted by the officer to retire for the purpose of changing his clothes and to take a short nap, the officer mounting guard at the door. Not making his appearance in due time, the door was burst open and Woodbury was found dead in his bed. The fact that he had bought strychnine, and the presence of some of it in the room, led naturally to the belief that he had committed suicide by its use. The deputy marshal returned home and reported the facts as narrated above. But the strangest part of the story is to come. The Detroit Advertiser learns that within a few weeks Woodbury has been seen and spoken to by an old acquaintance in or near Chicago. The story reaching White Pigeon, the supposed grave of Woodbury was opened, and found to contain only a coffin enclosing a large stick of wood. The Advertiser further states that the United States authorities at Detroit will proceed to investigate the matter immediately."

A singular funeral took place at Washington, Penn., last week. Patrick Bryson and his wife were interred in the same grave. They were an old couple, he ninety-four and she but a few years his junior. He died on Sunday night, and she on Tuesday, and the bodies of both were carried in the same funeral train to the same grave. They had lived together as man and wife for sixty-six years, coming from Ireland soon after their marriage. They had resided in the town of Washington for sixty-five years, and had raised a large family, and had seen Washington rise from a wilderness to what it is now.

The tavern connected with the extensive cattle yard of Burrus & Dickey, Buffalo, was entirely destroyed by fire on Saturday night. All the inmates escaped but two, Phineas Dickey, a son of one of the proprietors, and Jane Burrus, a servant. Miss Ellen Dickey threw herself from a second story window, severely injuring her spine. Many were more or less injured in escaping, and all suffered intensely from the cold, being obliged to remain unsheltered in their night clothes. Loss on building and furniture about $6,000; insured for $3,000.

While the steamer Commonwealth was on her passage to New York last week, and waiting for daylight near Throgg's neck, with steam shut off, a defective iron plate in the steam chimney blew out, making a slight opening, through which the steam escaped into the fire-room and out among the passengers. Several persons were scalded, and a waiter, named James Myers was so much injured, that he died soon afterwards. Three passengers were also badly burned.

On Wednesday night, the 19th Dec., a fire burst out in the fifth story of 26 Frankfort street, near William street, and despite the utmost exertions of the firemen, was not subdued until Nos. 26 and 28 were completely gutted. The damage is estimated at nearly one hundred thousand dollars. Owing to the hour, five o'clock in the afternoon, no lives were lost.

FOREIGN NEWS AND GOSSIP.

The sufferings inside the fortress of Gaeta are said to be awful. The diplomatic body themselves were reduced, for some days, to a fare consisting of biscuit and maccaroni. The Prussian Minister, who did not seem to be fond of either, lived upon bread and cheese for three days. King Francis did not dream of consoling these gentlemen by inviting them to partake of his table. But he conceded that they might share the protection of the bomb-proof lodgings provided for him and his family. It is said that their disgust with his niggardly behavior was the occasion of their leaving.

While the Duke of Newcastle was in America, one of his daughters married against his wish, Lord Vane, a son of the Marchioness of Londonderry. It appears that the Duke's opposition was well founded, as before a month had elapsed the bride threatened to leave her unworthy husband. The Vanes are a bad set. The Duke is so indignant at his daughter's disobedience, that he drives past her in the Park without any recognition. He is rather unfortunate in his domestic relations, since his wife ran away with a gay officer in the Guards many years ago.

The chief engineer of the steamship Hero, G. S. Theoder, stands charged with having been drunk on the day the Hero started from Portland with the Prince of Wales. The case is to be brought before a court martial, and it is said that he will plead guilty, urging, that as he was, so were others; and that in fact there was a state of general jollity which required one victim as a scapegoat for the flock.

A shoemaker in Preston, England, named Charleston, not being able to live affectionately with his wife, took her to a public-house and sold her at auction for twenty-five cents and two dollars worth of whiskey punch. A bill of sale was given, and the woman seemed satisfied with her change of masters.

A darky named Peterson, the steward of the ship Cyclops, had a high time on a voyage from Hong Kong to England—plenty to eat and nothing to do. On the 5th of September he disappeared during a gale of wind, and it was supposed he was drowned. Eighteen days after, the second mate was in the cabin, in the dark, and stumbled over a man's legs. Calling for a light, he cried to the helmsman, "Bill, here's the dead steward!" Bill looked, and was so terrified that, though a strong man, he did not recover himself for four days. He thought he had seen the steward's ghost. A Newfoundland dog, who came at the same time with Bill, ran off howling and jumped overboard. The fellow had been concealed in the bread-locker all the time, coming out at night for food, and helping himself to preserved meats and delicacies. On the arrival of the ship in London, Peterson actually summoned the captain before a magistrate for wages, but the case was dismissed.

AQUATIC SPORTS—THE PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE, BETWEEN THE CHAMPION ROWERS OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND—PORTRAIT OF HENRY KELLEY, EX-CHAMPION OF THE THAMES AND YARE, WITH SKETCH OF SKELETON BOAT USED IN RACES.

THE PHANTOM WITNESS.

I was on my first circuit—both the cause list and the criminal paper of the Northampton Assizes were crowded with cases. I had two or three briefs of no great importance, for I was young at the bar, and yet at this Northampton Assizes I was daily getting shadowy, nervous, pale and weak—I could not eat—I never could drink—I could not sleep—at times, I could not think. A case sat heavy on my soul—I felt weighed down as by a constant nightmare. I had a criminal case on hand. It had been put off from day to day, on account of the length of time it was supposed it would occupy, but it was coming on.

A fearful sense of responsibility was constantly present to my imagination. I had not yet grown callous to human suffering—I could not then contemplate crime, suffering and retribution, with the merely critical eye of an artist in law—and I suffered accordingly.

A young girl—almost a child—her age was but fifteen—was to be put upon her trial for murder.

Ann Dormer Heritage was committed for trial by the Northamptonshire magistrates, for the murder of John Adolpho Seaton, an infant, and her own sister's son.

I was retained for the defence.

Day and night—at meal times—in the hours that should have been those of recreation—at times when my other duties should have occupied me, I pondered over this case, and read and re-read the depositions, and toiled mentally until I began to look like some wretch with an undiscovered crime resting heavily upon his heart, and who walked and lived in bodily fear of detection.

Could she be guilty? I had seen her more than once—a mild, gentle, loveable, fair young girl, who did not appear to have nerve enough to have crushed an offensive fly.

But the evidence?

The evidence was awfully, conclusively against her.

I condense it for the reader. Before we step into court on the occasion of this most remarkable trial, we will glance over the record exhibited against the youthful and engaging prisoner.

There resided on his own property, which comprised a beautiful mansion and manor in the county of Northamptonshire, a Sir Ralph Heritage. This gentleman had one only son, whose irregularities of life had estranged him from friends, relations, and finally from his father. But the father had long fought against the facts of his son's bad conduct; he had been the last and the most loth to shut his heart against him; and it was not till a highway robbery, in which Richard Heritage most unquestionably had a share, that Sir Ralph was compelled to banish from his home the son to whom his heart yet clung.

Pity this poor father—pity the man who has for years garnered up his best affections in a thankless child!

And so Richard Heritage disappeared, and years passed away, and only now and then came vague rumors that he was a wanderer about those South American States which teem with adventurers of every clime and of every hue.

And Sir Ralph felt that he was getting old and feeble; his wife had been long since in the family tomb of the Heritages. He was a lonely man, and it was with a gush of grateful tears that one autumnal evening he read a letter that had reached him from Ceylon, to say that his younger brother Alfred, who had many a long year ago sought that island as a home, with a sickly wife, was no more, and that the two children—orphans, and one a young widow—were left destitute, or nearly so, and were only waiting in the hope that their uncle, Sir Ralph, would give them encouragement to come home.

They called England "home," although they had been very little children indeed when they had gone to Ceylon, with their sick mother and their anxious father.

Twelve years had elapsed, and mother and father were both dead.

The eldest girl, Rachael, had married for love, and he whom she loved died within eighteen months of their union. Rachael, then, was a young widow, with an infant clinging to her for help. Her sister, Anna, it was who wrote to their uncle at his grand estate, in Northamptonshire, detailing all these events; and it was that letter which produced the flood of tears we have mentioned from the lone old knight.

Would these two sorrowing ones and the little child be welcome? Would he open his heart to them? Ah, yes! The mere thought of their coming was new life to him, and he was seen to smile for the first time in the memory of some of his servants on the day succeeding the receipt of Anna's letter from Ceylon.

That the answer to that letter was all that could be wished by the sisters we may well imagine. It sent them ample means to come to England, and assured them of a fatherly welcome to Heritage Hall.

The time sped on, and the sisters, with the infant, reached England. They travelled post from Liverpool to Northampton, and but for the accident of a breakdown of the postchaise about ten miles from Heritage Hall, they would, on a wild, tempestuous day in February, have dined with their uncle.

But it was not to be.

On a cross-road that the postilion was advised to take, since it avoided a very hilly district, the chaise encountered a fallen trunk of a tree, which, in the dim twilight, was not observed until too late; and then it had so dislocated the machinery of the chaise that it was impossible to proceed further with it, and the party were fain to take shelter for the night at a roadside inn, named the Wheatsheaf.

THE PHANTOM WITNESS—"IT IS HEAVEN'S TESTIMONY—THE PHANTOM WITNESS! I KNOW IT WELL! THERE IS THE MURDERER'S SHADOW!"

The rain came down in torrents, and the wind howled through some neighboring copses, as if presaging, by its dismal tones, unheard-of evils to the unfortunate travellers then benighted on their journey.

The inn's best room—I took the trouble to thoroughly to examine it, in the interests of my young client—was shabby in the extreme. It had two beds in it, and there was, down the middle of the room, a sliding partition, which, on an emergency, would convert the apartment into two.

It was into this room, then, at ten o'clock, on this wild spring evening, that the two sisters, with the infant, were ushered.

The rain dashed and beat against the two latticed windows as though their destruction was the whole and sole object of the storm; and the wind struck the large sloping roof of the house such gusty blows that the sisters more than once believed that some one must be at work in some mad fashion above their heads.

The small candle that the ill-appointed inn afforded them flared and flickered in the little candlestick, and threatened each moment to expire, so that they hastened to rest.

And there was the gentle sisterly caress, the kind "Good night!" the "God bless you, Anna!" and "God bless you, Rachael!" and the little one was kissed and commended to Heaven, and the light was put out; and then Rachael, from some cause that she could not define, burst into a passion of tears, and her sister Anna called out, "Rachael, Rachael! what is it? Why do you cry, when we are going to be so happy?"

"I cannot help it, Anna! My heart is heavy—so very heavy! And yet how much we have to be thankful for, in the kindness of our uncle, who promises to make Ernest (the infant son), his heir."

And then Anna laughed and spoke in badinage, to raise her sister's spirits.

"To be sure, Rachael and I go to the wall, and shall not get a husband at all on account of your little Ernest, when I fully intended to make uncle Ralph leave me everything. Come now, go to sleep. Good night."

"Good night, dear!"

"Good night!"

This little dialogue was overheard by the landlady of the inn. It was nothing in itself, but it appeared on the depositions against Anna, as though written in letters of blood.

The sisters slept.

The little Ernest slept his last sleep on the breast of his mother.

The rain still came down in torrents, and the wind still howled around the old inn. One o'clock had just been proclaimed by the tall old-fashioned clock in the bar, when landlord, landlady, chambermaid and boots were all aroused by such a succession of piercing shrieks, from the room occupied by the sisters, that they one and all made a rush in that direction, with such hastily snatched up garments as terror enabled them to procure, and with the only light that was still burning in the house—an oil lamp that was always on a slab in the passage.

The sight that met their eyes was a terrible one. It was one that has converted that old roadside inn into a melancholy ruin, for no one would sleep in it again.

The door of the chamber was wide open, and Rachael, the mother of the infant boy, was lying half in and half out of the room on her face. Anna was sitting up in bed, looking scared and bewildered; and seemingly not conscious that her hands, face, and the clothing about her, were all dabbled in blood.

The landlady shrieked "Murder!"

The landlord called loud for help!

A traveller, who had arrived on foot at the inn some hours after the sisters, and who had given his name as Mr. Brown, hurried along an ancient corridor, at the further end of which he slept, to the place of confusion.

"Good Heavens!" he said, "what is the matter?"

It was terrible, then, to see Anna, as unconsciously she passed her blood-stained hands over her face, and looked about her like one still in a dream.

"It's murder!" said the landlady.

"The child!" cried the landlord—"there was a child!"

"What child?" said Mr. Brown. "I don't see any child here!"

Upon this the landlady uttered a terrible cry; and from between the bed, on which Anna was, and the wall, she lifted the lifeless and murdered body of the little Ernest.

The little one was stabbed to the heart with a steel ornamental paper-knife.

The sisters had been robbed at Liverpool, or on board the vessel from Ceylon, of a trunk, in which that paper-knife might have been. But one fact was admitted.

The knife belonged to Anna, and she bought it at Colombo!

This was the case.

On her recovery from a swoon, which lasted many hours, Rachael made the following statement.

Soon after the little conversation we have recorded with her sister, she had gone to sleep with the child on her arm, but finding him restless and starting occasionally she had gently withdrawn her arm from him, and had been persuaded that he slept soundly.

How long she had remained in sleep she knew not; but what awakened her was a faint kind of sob, which she felt certain was the last sound uttered by little Ernest in life. It aroused her on the moment, and she sprung out of bed on finding the child was not with her, and mechanically ran to the door of the room, which she flung open.

And here comes a remarkable statement from Rachael. I give it in her own words.

"On opening the door, I saw that from some light below (that was the oil lamp in the passage) there came up a strong reflection on to the wall of the corridor, which was to the right hand, and through that reflection, passing along it, as if stooping to avoid it, if possible, I saw the shadow of a man, large, and not very well defined, owing to its exaggerated dimensions; but still there it was, and it passed away into the gloom at the further end of the corridor and disappeared."

Overcome, then, by terror of she knew not what, Rachael fell into the swoon in which she was found by the people of the inn.

Such was the statement of the half-distracted mother on the examination before the Northampton magistrates of her sister Anna, whose innocence of the murder of the child she declared herself as thoroughly satisfied of as of the existence of heaven.

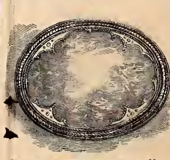
Sir Ralph Heritage was sent for, and the shock so completely unmanned him that, although filling the office that year of high sheriff to the county, he was compelled to go home, where he took to his bed, from which it did not seem probable he would ever rise again.

Several of the seniors at the bar had shrunk from undertaking the defence of Anna Heritage, and the case was brought to me. I took it, and from the moment I did so I felt a conviction that there was some fearful mystery in it, which, unless elucidated, would leave the youthful accused to be judicially murdered.

And so I thought and pondered over the affair until I was afraid that my own mind would get into some abnormal condition, and I should be unable to do what human means could do for Anna Heritage.

I saw her but once before the trial. I shall never forget the manner in which she looked at me as she gently shook her head, saying, "They will kill me, sir; but heaven knows that I am innocent! If my death would bring back to poor Rachael her boy—(here she burst into tears)—I should be willing to die; but as it is, I am very, very young to be murdered!"

I could say but little. I pressed both her hands in mine, and only gasped out some commonplace expression of hopeful consolation, and then I left her.



THE GREAT HONDURAS OPAL.—SEE PAGE 90.

The case was fearfully strong against her. There was but one supposition in her favor.

The shadow—the phantom-like form seen by the mother—who was he? Was it this Mr. Brown? Who and what was he? I hunted him up—I employed people to dog and watch him. It all came to nothing. He was a commercial traveller for a house at Marseilles, and was engaged in trying to do business at Northampton.

Several old counsel, to whom I spoke of the case, were of opinion that the shadow seen by Rachael was either no shadow at all, but merely said by her to be seen to screen her sister, or was the work of her imagination, or the veritable shadow of some of the people of the inn, who, alarmed by her cries, were hastening to the room.

And so at length the morning of the trial came, and, full of anxiety as I was, it came as positive relief to me.

The then Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer presided. He was a calm, enlightened judge, who never permitted his own prejudices—as some of his successors have done—to warp either law or justice; and come what might of the matter, I knew the young prisoner would have a fair trial.

The court was crowded to excess. A positive disturbance at the door hindered the commencement of the proceedings for a full half hour, and it was only quelled by force.

The attorney-general had come down from London to prosecute on behalf of the crown, and the counsels' seats were so closely packed that no one could stir except those engaged in the case.

The jury looked grave and half frightened.

The judge was pale and more serious-looking than usual, and as for me, I felt sick at heart. And when the uneasy kind of hush that pervaded the court let me know that Anna Heritage was placed at the bar, it was some few moments before I could muster up courage to look at her.

How pale, how wan, and yet how beautiful she looked!

Her fair hair was dressed in the most simple style possible, and she wore a dress of gray silk, which fitted closely around the neck, terminating in a narrow plaited frill. Her lips trembled, and her gentle eyes seemed to shrink behind their abundant lashes as she met the gaze of friend and of foe in that crowded court—that is, if one so young, so fair and so innocent, could have a foe!

I could see the judge taking a long look at her beneath his bent-down brows, and then he rested his head on his hands and appeared in deep thought.

The attorney-general tossed a scrap of paper over the table to me. It contained these words:

"The witness Brown has absconded—make what use of the fact you can."

I nodded gratefully, and I felt he would only just do his duty against the prisoner.

Then there was a strange half-sigh, half hush all through the auditory, and a lady in deep mourning came into the court.

It was the bereaved mother. She went direct to the front of the dock, where was her sister arraigned on so dreadful a charge, and she leant over the front of it, with both her arms extended, as she cried,

"Dear, dear Anna, God bless you and prove your innocence, as I feel it!"

Anna was overcome by this, and she burst into a shrieking passion of sobs and tears. The sisters could only just interlace their arms together, and there they remained for some few moments until the judge said, in a deep, sad voice,

"This must not be. Proceed, proceed!"

The clerk of arraigns, in a high, cracked, indifferent voice, proceeded to read the indictment, and Rachael sat down in a chair that some one had placed for her just beneath the dock.

Poor Anna's fortitude seemed wholly to have given way. Her fair face was hidden in her hands, and resting on the front of the bar.

It was a fashion to place a row of aromatic herbs on the bar before the prisoner in those days, and among them she leant, and some of them, watered by her tears, fell upon her sister's lap as she sat beneath.

Then came the question, "Prisoner at the bar, do you plead guilty or not guilty to this present indictment?"

Anna did not stir. The poor girl had not heard the question; but her sister rose, and in a mild, clear voice, said,

"She is not guilty, sirs. He was my little one. He is in Heaven now; and if you take her life she will go to him sooner than I, and be that the happier. She is not guilty, sirs."

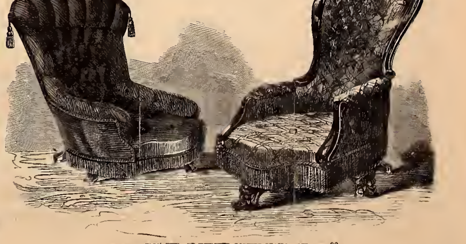
The governor of the jail had by this time jogged Anna by the arm, and whispered to her, when she looked up, hastily, and said,

"Oh, no, no, no, no! a thousand times no!"

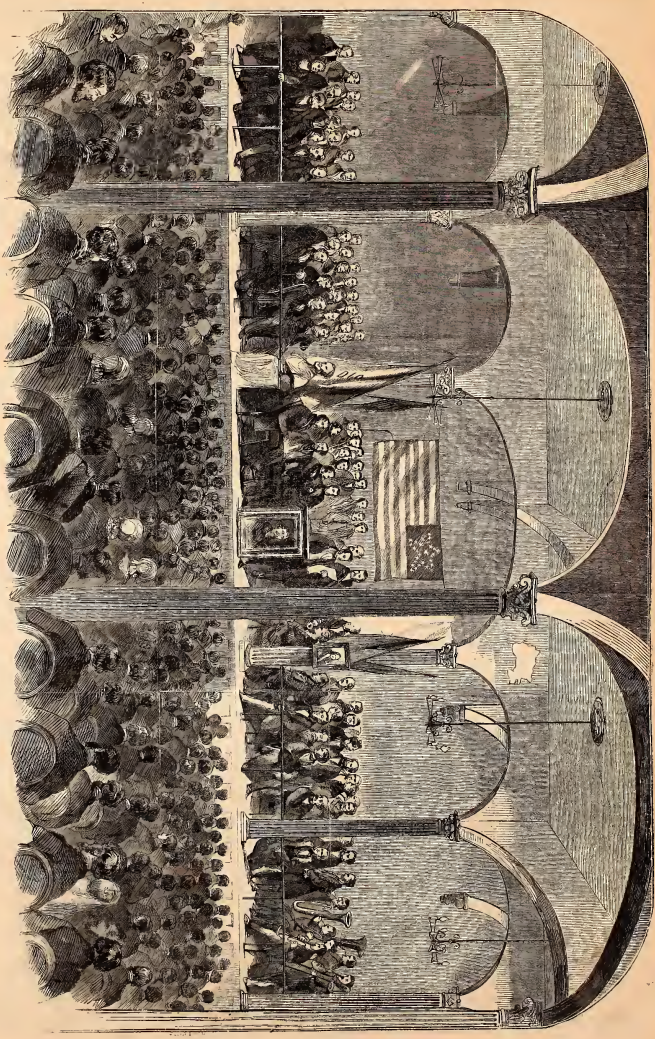
"The plea is 'Not guilty,'" said the judge. "So enter it."

The attorney-general rose.

The court was hushed. I never took my eyes off his for one moment while he spoke.



TERRY & WELLS' NEW AND IMPROVED ROCKING CHAIRS.—SEE PAGE 90.



GREAT MEETING IN BEHALF OF GARIBALDI AND ITALIAN LIBERTY, AT THE COOPER INSTITUTE, ON TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 18, 1860.—See Page 90.

ERLE GOWER;

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c., &c.

CHAPTER XIV.

Now from the virgin's cheek a fresher bloom
Shoots, less and less the live carnation round;
Her lips blush deeper sweets, she breathes of youth;
The shining moisture swells into her eyes
In brighter flow; her wishing bosom heaves
With palpitations wild; kind tumults course
Her veins, and all her yielding soul is Love.—Thomson.

The dawn was breaking when Erle started from his bed, and, pressing his hands on his temples, endeavored to collect his thoughts.

He walked to the window and gazed out upon the scene yet scarcely visible; then he cast his eyes over his own figure, and discovered that he was attired as he had been the day previously.

Rapidly everything which had happened to him the night before recurred to him, and threw him into a state of great mental excitement. He remembered all up to the sudden vanishing of the female figure which had in such an awful and supernatural manner presented herself to his amazed eyes, beyond that—nothing.

How or by what means he had regained his own bed-chamber he knew not, nor, strain his brain as he would, could he recollect an incident connected with it.

He had seen enough, however, to determine to see more, and his next visit to the ghastly old library he resolved should be that very morning, and in the light of day.

He was not superstitious; he did not believe in the indiscriminate wandering of perturbed spirits but he did believe that there existed in heaven and earth more than was dreamt of in the world's philosophy.

It was not at Kingswood he had first seen visions. He had kept, boy as he was, midnight vigils when others slept. What he then beheld, what strange and mysterious visitations he had, he kept concealed within his own breast. But it was noted that when others spoke derisively of the spirits of the dead, the phantoms of those near and dear who had departed from the world, he joined not in the mockery, but, with a face grave and sad, would walk away and remain alone for some hours.

He had a conception that he had a remarkable destiny and a mission. He imagined that already he had received revelations, and there were others of far greater import to come. The events of his life had already been of a wild, strange and improbable character; they had formed him to expect marvels, and he was prepared to seize every opportunity to meet with them. He considered that the occurrences of the night before was but an event half worked out, and he trusted to the day to complete what the night had left unfinished.

He yet clutched in his hand the quaint old Gothic key, and he persuaded himself, though he could not recall the circumstances, that he had intuitively closed the door he had unlocked with it, and pursued noiselessly the passages and corridors leading to the chamber he now occupied.

He prepared for another visit, changed his habiliments, and waited anxiously until the servants had prepared his breakfast and had retired with it.

As he was about to quit his room, at a moment when he anticipated the servants would be occupied far from the quarter he intended to inspect, he was startled by the appearance of Pharisee, who stood at his elbow before he discovered him.

"Upon what errand do you seek me?" asked Erle, rather brusquely.

Only one fiery gleam shot forth from the valet's eyes, and he turned them upon the floor.

"I thought you would like to hear how Mr. Cyril is getting on," he exclaimed, in a smooth tone.

"Naturally," returned Erle, in a softer manner. "Has the fever of the brain abated?"

"Oh, yes," returned the valet; "he is quite himself again, as far as the brain is concerned, but he is very low and melancholy, so very reserved—so very unlike his usual frank, open manner."

"Indeed!" ejaculated Erle, with an air of surprise, which appeared to strike the valet as something strange.

"It is even so," he rejoined. "And what both Lord and Lady Kingswood consider so remarkable is, that he emphatically declines to offer the slightest explanation of the circumstances which led to the ruffianly attack upon him. Perhaps you, sir, can throw some light upon the matter, as you were the first to discover him," he added, artfully.

"No," returned Erle, curtly and coldly.

"The gamekeeper fastens it all on the back of some poaching ruffian, who is one of the wonders of Kingswood Chace, known as Tubal Kish," continued Pharisee; "he is constantly up to mischief, and though he is constantly lurking in the Chace, neither dogs nor men can catch him. There is quite an expedition of gamekeepers, beaters and dogs off after him this morning."

"I hope they will catch him," observed Erle, in a tone of indifference.

"I am sure I hope they may," rejoined the valet, with affected earnestness, and then added, abruptly, "you must be very dull here, sir."

"Very," responded Erle, emphatically. "I intend presently to take a stroll in the wood; and I shall proceed to it by the outlet, of which I possess the key, given to me by you."

"Ah!" replied the valet, with a creeping smile. "Yet a stroll in the wood is dull at best; I intended something very different to that."

"What do you mean?" inquired Erle, eyeing him curiously.

"I have some reason to believe that Lord and Lady Kingswood will shortly return to London, taking Lady Maud with them," responded the valet. "Mr. Cyril, probably, if well enough, will return to college. You, I think—I say—I rather imagine—will remain here alone throughout the winter season, and if you are dull now, what will you be then?"

Erle's brows slightly contracted.

"I can amuse myself," he said, in a frigid tone.

"But London is such a delightful gay place," persisted the valet, in an insinuating voice, "all festivity, life, enjoyment and pleasure. There are hundreds of young ladies lovelier than Lady Maud, and without her pride——"

"Silence, fellow!" interrupted Erle, in a haughty and indignant voice. "How dare you speak thus to me? What encouragement have I given to you to be thus impertinent? Pray confine your speculations to your own brain. At his own time Lord Kingswood will no doubt confide his intentions to me. Leave me, I wish to be alone."

Pharisee's face changed to a saffron hue, and his features seemed to contract. Master, however, of his emotions, he bowed with affected humility, humbly begged pardon, and slunk out of the room, very much as if he was greatly abashed.

His real sensations were of a very different nature, a feeling of malicious resentment filled his breast, and he placed the disdainful rejection by Erle of his suggestion at the commencement of an account which he determined should have a quittance in full ere it was closed.

Left thus alone, the impulse to renew his visit to the old library returned again to Erle with irresistible force, and he hesitated for a moment only, ere he, with rapid step made his way to the haunted wing, as it was termed by the household.

As he entered the gloomy old sitting-room, he saw at a glance that it had not been entered by any one since he quitted it, but he started on discovering that the black oaken door he had the night before opened remained open.

He advanced into the narrow passage, which he could now perceive was intended for a secret communication, and closed the door behind him.

The darkness was as dense as the night before but he quickly made his way to the end, and found the door which had admitted him into the library also open.

He reflected with mortification that he must on the previous night have fled back to his own room like a frightened deer.

He entered the library and gazed around him with an emotion of awe. The light entering dimly through the diamond panes, encrusted with the dust of centuries, and though every object was sufficiently clearly visible, it caused a gloom to pervade the spacious chamber, which, added to the extreme stillness that reigned, communicated to it a strange air of solemnity.

He closed the second door which led into this ancient structure, and then turned his eyes slowly around him. Still in the same spot in the same attitude, stood the white female figure which had so moved him the night before.

A blush of shame and humiliation burned on his cheek as he detected that it was a marble statue.

He hurried towards it, and examined it with great interest and admiration.

It was a fine specimen of sculptural excellence. The attitude was graceful, the figure sweetly proportioned, the drapery arranged with masterly skill, and the chiselling displayed high finish.

But it was the face which most deeply attracted his attention. Not so much that it was young, delicate and lovely, but rather because its expression was so mournful, even though a sweet smile played upon the lips.

The features were like those of the portrait in the bed-chamber—singularly so. They resembled also—whose? He could not remember, yet they were fresh in his mind. He taxed his memory, but he could not readily succeed and so gave up the investigation.

The figure stood upon a pedestal on the front of which was a tablet, containing the words in a line—"Ye Ladye Maude."

Beneath was the date, 1555. Underneath were the words, "The Unavenged."

This statue Erle immediately conjectured to be that of the Lady Maud of whom Pharisee had spoken as having been the victim of the bad Baron of Kingswood, and he regarded it with an air of interest which almost amounted to fascination.

The motto, too, ran through his brain repeatedly, and gazing upon the soft, sorrowful face, he wondered who should prove the avenger, and when the hour of retribution was to come.

At length he quitted the figure, with a sigh he could not repress nor account for, and advanced to one of the old cases in which the books were ranged. As he did so a faint cry caused him to direct his eyes to the further end of the apartment and there he beheld another Lady Maud standing in an attitude of unspeakable amazement and terror.

This time, however, it was a living, breathing Lady Maud, and he advanced with a slow, gliding step towards her.

She sunk half fainting upon a stool near to her, and he saw by the ashy whiteness of her countenance that she was all but swooning with terror.

"Do not be alarmed, Lady Maud," he exclaimed, quickly, in a low, reassuring tone. "It is I—Mr. Gower."

She rose up and tried to smile, while she extended her hand to him but the words died ere they reached her white lips.

"Pray be seated and recover yourself," he exclaimed. "This is a strange gloomy old room, drear enough to scare any one. My presence here, I know, must have been very unexpected, but still Lady Maud I am real flesh and blood."

This was all said readily and fluently enough, and it had the desired effect, for Lady Maud drew a long breath, hid her face for a moment in her handkerchief, and then, looking in his eyes with a singular sweetness of expression in her own, she said, with a soft smile:

"I ought not to be alarmed at your presence; rather it ought to create within my breast at least a sense of protection. But—but—" She paused.

Erle urged her to proceed.

"Your appearance here is so sudden—so strange," she continued, with a perplexed mien. "I have been in this old library for some little time; I saw you not when I entered; I heard not your arrival, but raising my eyes—I cannot tell why—I beheld you confronting me."

"No wonder you imagined me to be a spectre," he returned, with a smile, and then added frankly, "I possess, Lady Maud, perhaps, unfortunately, a very active spirit of inquiry, a circumstance ministered to its cravings, and I have just discovered a mode of gaining access to this apartment by a communication which is evidently a secret one."

She regarded him with an expression of surprise.

"I have been in the habit of coming here for years," she replied, half musingly, "because I am fond of the strange old lore I find in some of the books here, yet I know of but one approach. That has long been disused. I—I do not think that any one but myself is acquainted with this taste of mine, or my visits here. Indeed, I believe Lord Kingswood would scarcely approve of it. Yet I see nothing objectionable in it, and I often steal here for an hour in the morning. But Mr. Gower, you did not enter by the same way as myself—you could not."

"I did not, Lady Maud," he replied. "Nevertheless, I am very glad that we have met, and I am rejoiced that it should be here, for I am not fond of the society of strangers for whom one cares nothing. Here I can speak to you in earnest sincerity without the expression of my features being inquisitively examined or my words caught up by ears for which they were not intended. I am, in truth, Lady Maud, glad to see you again, for your presence here, and yet more your looks, assure me that you are nearly recovered from the effects of your perilous situation a few days back."

"Indeed, Mr. Gower," said said, with unreserved warmth, the tears springing into her eyes as she instinctively held out to him both her hands, which he as instinctively took, "I am glad to meet you, and as you observe, here, because at least here I may indulge in the free expression of a grateful heart, and tender you, with the most fervid warmth, my best thanks for your noble efforts to save me. I wish you to be assured that the service, so high and so important as it proved, can never be effaced from my memory."

"Your gratefulness, Lady Maud," he returned, speaking in a rich and impressive tone, "pains even while it pleases me. I wish for no reward even of simple thanks for the part I played in what might have been the tragedy of the Chace. Yet I wish you to think well and kindly of me. I do not desire you to remember the service, yet I should be grieved if the event passed from your memory, for then I should be forgotten by you."

Lady Maud listened to him with downcast eyes, for his orbs, so large, so brilliant, so eloquent in their expression, rested on her sweet face with a gaze too earnest for her to sustain. But yet she listened to him with a quiet joy—that undemonstrative joy which, perhaps, is the more delicious because it thrills the whole frame without making any outward sign.

She was pleased to hear these observations from his lips. She wondered why he wished her to think well and kindly of him. Did she not? Love is not of slow growth in young hearts. Still she could not understand why he should be so anxious that she should not forget him.

She raised her clear innocent eyes to his.

"We are very new friends, Mr. Gower," she said. "I have rendered you no service. I have extended to you only common civility. Why do you wish me to think kindly of you?"

It was a point-blank question, and for the moment disconcerted him, especially as he discovered that he had possession of both her small white hands still.

He had no desire to part with them. It was felicity indeed to be honored by their gentle touch. Yet he was embarrassed at retaining them after their presence had forced itself abruptly upon him.

Possibly he turned pale and red by turns, and his voice might have been a little unsteady when he spoke, yet he answered more readily than might have been expected of him.

"We are new friends, Lady Maud," it is true," he said still earnestly, "but we are friends—friends, I hope, in the acceptation of that word, which alone makes friendship desirable and valuable. Until now I have made no friend in my view of the sentiment. I would not for worlds force my friendship on any created being yet my heart yearns to have some one who would take more than a common interest in my life, who would sympathise with my disappointments, cheer me in my trials and share in my happiness. We all, I presume, desire to stand favorably in the opinions of others, yet how much more anxiously do we wish this when it is a friend whose high estimation we covet. That, Lady Maud, is why I wish you to think kindly of me."

Once more Lady Maud's eyes sought the floor. Friend! It was a pleasant word, yet a cold one. She liked her cousin Cyril much, and he was a friend; yet it seemed to her that Erle had a stronger claim upon her goodwill even than Cyril, for he had saved her life, and the word friend did not seem to express sufficiently the distinction in her estimation of the two. Lord Kingswood was her guardian and, of course her friend, yet how could he and Erle stand in the same category in her esteem. Lady Kingswood, too, was her friend but a smile curled her lip, and she did not care to pursue the investigation.

Well it was a barren word that same friend. Still, the language gave her no other, and so she was prepared to accept it and ratify it with her fair hand, when, lo! she discovered that he still held both in the gentle pressure of his.

She was, in her turn, a little startled by the discovery, and slightly confused. In her confusion she pressed his hands and then snatched her own hurriedly away, looking hastily and timidly around her, as if she expected to see Lord Kingswood gazing sternly, haughtily and like a grim tyrant upon them both, but he was not there, so she said in a trembling voice,

"Mr. Gower, I fear that I shall make but a poor substitute for such a friend as you need. To my sense the obligations of the word—if I properly comprehend its meaning—are boundless, and I am most likely to fulfil them very, very inadequately; yet—yet I wish you to believe that—I do not decline—that is, I am anxious to try—to attempt—oh, Mr. Gower, I am at a loss to convey my meaning. Only believe I am very grateful to you, and if that comprehends friendship, you are entitled to mine in its truest and sincerest spirit."

And she proved it by vanishing from the library with a sudden abruptness which prevented his offering to detain her.

Now the library looked gloomier, darker drearier than ever. He wondered why she fled, and he felt disturbed that she should do so even while in the act of acknowledging that she would be to him that friend for whom his unfilled heart so longed. She was certainly embarrassed, perhaps she did not desire their relations should be of so close a nature; perhaps he had stepped beyond the limits of his position, for she was a lady of high birth and he——

He turned as cold as death, and then to fever-heat. He made a fiery, impatient gesture.

"I may seek her friendship on equal ground—I feel, I know I may," he cried, with sudden impetuosity.

Then he thought again that her manner would have betrayed her if she was averse to the close intimacy of friendship, and she had been gentle, even tender, in her demeanor to him. But she had fled from him, and that perplexed him; and so he tortured and vexed himself, until, in despair, he gave up the attempt to work out a solution.

He examined some books, but he returned them to their places, and he, with light step pursued the path she had taken, but he found a closed door to bar his progress, so he quitted the library and wandered out into the Chace, thence back into his own rooms, and passing a sleepless night, together with a morning that seemed to [illegible], he at length took an opportunity to return to the library. Lady Maud was not there.

He searched the recesses, he moved the massive draperies by the windows, as if in the hope that she had concealed herself behind some one of the hangings and he should discover her, but she was not so hidden.

At length he took a book from one of the cases, and seating himself near a window, his eye went over half a dozen pages, line by line but the eye of his mind saw only the form, the face, the sweet, smiling, gentle Lady Maud.

And he aroused as out of a dream to find her before him, regarding him with a half-frightened, yet very friendly expression of countenance. He rose up and greeted her with a quiet but very earnest welcome.

"I did not think you would be here," she said, in a soft undertone.

"Nay, you could have been sure of my coming," he answered.

"Yet I quitted you so hastily, yesterday. I did not say farewell, or even that I might come here again to look over these deeply interesting old books," she observed, not trusting her eyes to look in his face.

"Why, Lady Maud, did you quit me so suddenly?" he inquired, in the same subdued, musical voice.

He asked such questions! Lady Maud's cheek burned. She felt something like a culprit accused of a high misdemeanor, and she really did not know why.

"I do not know, Mr. Gower," she at length replied, with a sudden frankness. "Lady Kingswood scolds me at times for a want of self-possession. I suppose my fault prevailed over my courtesy, yesterday. Do you forgive me?"

With a smile Erle offered his hand, and she accepted it for an instant and for a touch. Somehow that shaking hands appeared a very formidable ceremony, though it was a mere testimony of friendship.

Then they proceeded to converse on various topics and in a more easy style than before. Lady Maud gave him much information respecting the relations between herself and Lord and Lady Kingswood and also cousin Cyril. She spoke in warm, high, praiseful terms of the latter; of his general happy, cheerful disposition; of his truthful and noble spirit. Yet she spoke in such a tone that Erle was pleased with her eulogiums.

And he told her of his early days at school, of his lonely isolation, of his high hopes, his gorgeous dreams, his speculative theories, and his ambitious yearnings. She listened with deep interest to his glowing words and to his fervid eloquence. She seemed fascinated by his voice as by his revelations; and when the time arrived for them to part, they lingered near to each other, their hands trembled beneath the pressure that each found it unable to refrain from giving, and they met again only to prove how quickly their friendship had taken root and would be blossoming.

Strange, with all their talk in the many meetings after this they had in the library, the name of Philip Avon never passed the lips of either. Yet it was not forgotten. Erle had kept the appointment Philip had forced upon him, even though he had learned that he continued dangerously ill; but, of course, he came not. Erle, however, knew that he would come as soon as he obtained strength, and now Philip was not more eager for the meeting than he was himself.

And it happened one morning in that lone library, not so long after they had first met there, that Erle proposed that they should together peruse some of that ancient lore of which Lady Maud had spoken. She, pleased at the proposition, selected a book containing histories of Saxon days written in quaint language.

They sat side by side, and together read down the pages, commenting on passages as they proceeded. The subject embraced the story of a boy and girl who met accidentally in an old Saxon tower. It traced their first acquaintance on in a more familiar relation, thence how it had become a fast, firm and earnest friendship.

To both the story seemed to possess a singular charm, for it was told in truthful and expressive language.

It went on to show how this friendship had been maintained through bitter trials, difficulties reverses, and vicissitudes of all kinds, always coming forth brighter, purer and stronger after the severest test of its endurance. And then it told how, at length, this constant, faithful, loyal friendship proved to be in that disguise, love!

The eyes of Lady Maud and Erle uprose at an instant, and met in one long, passionate gaze, then a film seemed to come over her eyes, and her head drooped upon his shoulder.

He pressed her lips with his own with a sudden, impetuous fervor.

Both suddenly rose up, and she looked into his face as one looks into vacancy, when roused from some wild, extraordinary dream.

Then pressing her hands to her temples, she uttered a wild, despairing cry, and fled from the library.

He sunk down, and laying his hand upon that old book, covered his burning eyes with his cold, cold hands, and trembled violently.

CHAPTER XV.

Look upon this picture and on this.—Shakespeare.

Erle Gower remained for some little time in the abashed, bowed, prostrate position into which he sunk when Lady Maud, with an aspect of dismay and despair, fled from him.

The solemn stillness of the ancient chamber was broken only by his convulsive breathing, occasioned by the intensity of the emotion which not only overpowered but seemed to paralyze him.

But there swept through his brain such a whirlwind of tumultuous thoughts, such a torrent of wild imaginings and maddened reflections, that immediately, like a fiery steed, spur-goaded, he leaped from his seat, and paced the lone, dreary apartment with irregular and impatient strides.

Love! To him hitherto it had been but a name an intangible emotion, whose nature, proportions, limits were unknown to him. In his heart there had long been a void of whose existence he was conscious, a yearning, a secret instinct to attach himself to some one human being, but affection had never been extended to him, nor had it hitherto been called up within his breast. His relations with others had been of a purely social character, and of the commonest kind, until his arrival at Kingswood, and the secret interview with Maud in that old library had commenced. Then he was conscious that between him and her those social relations assumed a different aspect, still only such as friendship pure and simple would originate and soon enhance.

He felt that within his breast there was germinating a feeling of dislike—perhaps an emotion more powerful—to Philip Avon; it seemed to him principally to be excited by an impression that the latter resigned to monopolize that fair friendship he intended should be the spring and spirit of his own life.

There dawned not upon him one simple flash of light to disclose the true meaning of his warm sentiment at those eyes so sweetly beautiful, the face so wondrous fair, and form so refined and graceful. Nor did it strike him that the incessant recurrence of her image to his mind, the craving to be in her presence, the reluctance with which he parted from her, had any motive or source other than pertained to friendship.

The story in the book had opened his eyes gradually, his own impulsive passionate pressure of her lips had completed the work. Now he knew his heart was irrevocably gone, and the structure of his happiness had been raised upon a quicksand, which had engulfed it even before a single beam of sunshine had illuminated it for one brief moment.

His quick and active intelligence now revealed all to him. He loved Lady Maud from the moment his eye rested upon her confused flushed face, when, craving his pardon for mistaking him for cousin Cyril, she stood in the doorway of the apartment where they met, prepared for flight. He understood now the nature of his antipathy to Philip Avon, and why he could not feel at ease with, or quite friendly towards, Cyril Kingswood.

The discovery was a terrible revelation to him; he comprehended only too vividly his position. He saw at once that Lady Maud was no mate for him, and that in promptly resigning all hope to gain her, it was his duty to keep hidden in his heart the secret which an accident had betrayed, but betrayed only to themselves.

And so he determined, though his heart should break—as break he felt it must—never to reveal to another what that morning had unveiled to him.

But to stay at Kingswood, to be occasionally in her society, perhaps left at times alone with her, or be seated by her side, where none could overhear the words that might fall from the lips of either, was an ordeal to which he would not subject himself and would spare her.

Yes, he decided that the only truly honorable path open to him was to quit Kingswood at once and for ever. Conscious that his coming had been of a mysterious character, he did not wish his going, for the sake of Lord Kingswood, should have the same complexion, and he formed the resolution to see his lordship immediately and arrange with him the mode of his departure and the future scene of his lone and isolated life.

He turned his inflamed eyes about the room ere he took his last farewell of the time-blackened walls, and a terrible, heartrending groan burst from his lips. He sank upon the seat where she had sat, bent his head over the book she had read with him, and kissed with quivering lips the place where the gentle hand had rested.

He read down once more the last lines of that story of the maiden and the youth in which the conversion of friendship into love had revealed the true state of his own heart, and the characters seemed written in letters of fire.

Oh, but they were so truthful, so convincing, so overpowering, that he was left with no loophole by which he could escape from his assumption that love, and not friendship only, was the sentiment with which Lady Maud had inspired him.

He hastily wrote a few words on the broad margin of the leaf, and then conveyed the book to the place whence it had been taken.

In returning he saw upon the floor a glove—it was one Lady Maud had dropped in her flight; upon the reading-desk lay a flower—one she had gathered, and, perhaps, by accident, placed near to his hand.

He pressed both to his lips, and placed them next to his heart.

Once more a long, sorrowful survey of the antique chamber and its grim appointments was taken by him because that he believed he now looked his last upon it. In the coming time, blank and drear as it promised, it might not be that he should forget this scene, but he yet was anxious to fix upon his memory the shape and form of every object with its surroundings, situated where he had parted with her for ever. Therefore his sad eyes rested upon each spot with prolonged and steadfast earnestness.

Most of all did they dwell upon the seat on which they had sat together in such close proximity—she leaning upon his shoulder, and with her soft eyes perusing the contents of that page which he read in a voice low, rich and musical—where, in truth, she, with him, had arrived at that startling dénouement which drew from her a gaze into his eyes so intense and thrilling, and from him that impulsive commission of an indiscretion which made his cheek the hue of scarlet even to remember, and yet to regret only, that it might have occasioned her pain and apprehension.

Those alone who have suddenly met with some treasure dearly prized, to have it abruptly snatched from them, can measure the agony with which he had found love an inhabitant of his heart, only to see its object torn from him for ever. They will understand the emotion which made him compress his hands, his lips quiver, and his eyes grow humid, as he bent his last longing, lingering gaze upon that seat now so desolately vacant, and, disregarding all other considerations of pride fortitude, to give way to a burst of weakness which no mental or bodily torture could have forced from him in the presence of another human eye.

And while bowed in anguish upon that seat he was startled, and his blood chilled by a long, low, unearthly moan, which sounded in the chamber as though some one near to him was in mortal agony.

He sprung to his feet and gazed around him, but nothing met his gaze save the marble statue of the Lady Maud of olden time, and he was forced to attribute the sound he had heard to a sough of the wind through the groined oaken rafters which supported and adorned the ceiling of the library.

Dismissing the incident from his mind, he quitted, with a heavy heart, the silent weird-looking chamber, carefully closed and locked the doors after him, restored the quaint old key to the spot among the carvings where he had discovered it, and returned to his own apartment in the modern part of the building.

All these latter movements were purely mechanical; his mind was not occupied by them. He replaced the key whence he had taken it, under a mere instinct that he should never again enter the library, and he returned to his own chambers because it seemed to him that he re-entered them to make preparations for his departure—his connection with Kingswood and those it contained having ceased for ever.

Yes, upon that one determination his mind was centred. It seemed to him that he hungered to fly from the place but withal a certain species of pride held him back from any design to attempt this stealthily. With a yet further depression of spirit, he scarcely knew why, he felt that such a step would be more unnecessary than impolitic, for Lord Kingswood would be only too glad to get rid of one whose presence had already evidently occasioned him great uneasiness and embarrassment.

It was with a terrible sense of desolation there crept over him a belief that the whole world repelled him from its bosom, rejected him, flung him back upon the hard shores of his desert life, to live on alone, unloved, to die unremembered.

It was at this moment he felt a soft hand laid upon his shoulder. His quick eye caught the flowing drapery of a woman's garments, and with a thrill of excitement he sprang to his feet.

With a sigh of disappointment he perceived that Lady Kingswood stood before him.

An impression flashed upon his mind ere he noticed face or form, but the impression was a false one, for it was not her whom he had expected to see who now stood confronting him.

Plunged as he had been in deep abstraction, centred as his thoughts were on one object of contemplation, he could not help observing that the eyes of Lady Kingswood were fastened upon his face with an expression in which intense scrutiny, alarm, agony and resentment were all commingled.

Her eyes flashed brilliantly, augmented in their vividity, perhaps, by the rapid motion of her full eyelids. Her nostrils were widely inflated, and her bosom heaved and fell with some strange inward perturbation.

He bowed coldly and formally to her, but she laid her hand, hot and feverish, upon his, and gazed, with a piercing glance, in his eyes.

Twice or thrice she was about to make some passionate exclamation, but by an effort—a great effort—she checked herself, and said, in a voice which trembled in its utterance,

"I have been making inquiries respecting you, Mr. Gower, and not being quite satisfied with the replies I have received, it suggested itself to me to visit you, and from your own lips to learn the information I am anxious to obtain."

He placed a chair for her, which she occupied, and then pointing to the open door of the apartment, she said,

"Oblige me, Mr. Gower, by closing the door, and by taking a seat near to me."

Still coldly, and with a feeling amounting to indifference, as well as with the action of one whose mind is pressed down by a single but absorbing, crushing thought, he obeyed her.

Again she gazed in his face, and perused its lineaments with an interest which, by its earnestness and persistency, embarrassed him. His large, deep-hued, thoughtful eyes fell beneath her steadfast look, and he sat in silence, wondering why she thus regarded him, and what it betokened.

She placed once more her fevered hand upon his, and as before, it seemed distasteful to him, and he shrank from it, though he feared it would be rude to draw his own away.

"Mr. Gower," she said after a moment's hesitation, "I hardly know how to commence. Yet you who have already proved yourself capable of great achievements, will, I have no doubt, prove yourself equally capable of displaying those minor, though important qualifications, which embrace a generous consideration, practical common sense and a liberal interpretation of the views and motives of those by whom you are encountered."

A faint smile passed over the features of Erle; Lady Kingswood was adept enough in the art of defining the meanings of variable facial expressions to perceive that it was a bitter smile.

She was not daunted or even surprised at this. It occurred to her, situated as he had been, and even was now, that he might have fruitful cause for displaying scorn as well as bitterness.

She therefore passed it by without remark, but continued:

"You will hardly be surprised that I should touch but lightly upon your brave and daring rescue of my poor little pet, Lady Maud. She is a charming, winning, innocent, loving child, and I should have been truly grieved to part with her by such an untoward accident as that which befel her. I am, therefore, exceedingly grateful to you for your successful efforts to rescue her from a shocking death. And poor dear little soul, she is, I believe—though really I must confess she speaks very, very little about the affair—grateful, too, as, of course, she is bound to be. But, Mr. Gower, if grateful to you for her safety, what sentiment ought I to entertain for the recovery, and, therefore, rescue of my beloved and only boy Cyril? A mother's thanks embody much, I know, but still they appear to me to convey very, very inadequately the warm feelings with which your search for, and, I suspect, the rescue of my dear Cyril from the hands of some ruffianly assailant, has animated me. I am, therefore, at a loss for expressions——"

"To compliment me, Lady Kingswood, for what your gamekeeper would, in a few minutes more, have done equally well, if not better," interposed Erle. "Pardon me, Lady Kingswood, but I hope that you have not sought me with such an object as you now intimate."

She regarded him with a look of surprise, not so much on account of his words, for those she could attribute to a native modesty of disposition, but because he rather hastily withdrew his hand from beneath her pressure—wherefore, she could not, by perusal of his features, quite understand.

"I admit, Mr. Gower," she rejoined slowly, "that I did not seek you for such a purpose alone, although naturally it was my chief incentive to pay you a visit. It is easy to perceive that with you it is best to proceed openly without circumlocution, and without disguise. You are young, Mr. Gower, but your course of education seems to have placed an old head with a hard-so—a young face—upon youthful shoulders, therefore I will be plain with you. After testifying to you the depth of my gratitude for Cyril's restoration to us let me ask you to add to that gratefulness by elucidating the mystery of the transaction."

Erle shook his head thoughtfully.

"Cyril is fast recovering," she continued, quickly, "though not convalescent, and the physician has ordered him change of air and scene. Change of scene, Mr. Gower, because there is some pressure upon his mind. What originated that pressure?"

Erle opened his eyes widely.

"Lady Kingswood," he rejoined, with promptitude, "my acquaintance with Mr. Cyril Kingswood is recent and slight. Your question is rather singular, is it not?"

"No, Mr. Gower," she replied, keeping her eye fixed upon his face. "Young men, when their characters, tastes and inclinations assimilate, rapidly form friendships in which there is a very immediate and unreserved communicativeness. Cyril has conceived a very strong liking for you, has spoken of you enthusiastically, and, indeed, entertained the most friendly sentiments towards you. I therefore ask you as a favor to impart to me the nature of the attraction which led him to the Chace, a few evenings back, and was, of course, the forerunner of his disaster."

Erle looked grave.

"Lord Kingswood," he said, quietly, "has already put a similar question to me."

"Indeed!" ejaculated Lady Kingswood, sharply.

"And I have informed his lordship that it is not in my power to answer him."

Lady Kingswood mused for a moment, then she said:

"Possibly, if you consider yourself bound by a species of romantic honor—a mere boy's promise not to reveal the weakness of a boy."

Erle colored.

"I do not comprehend your meaning, Lady Kingswood," he said, naively.

Her ladyship smiled sarcastically at what she considered his affected innocence. She turned upon him a mocking glance, a sly, furtive look, which only a woman of her temperament could give.

"Were you ever in love, Mr. Gower?" she asked, abruptly.

His countenance crimsoned to a flame, and then it became as pale as ashes. His breath went and came, although he compressed his lips, in short gasps.

Had Lady Maud been deeply wounded and offended by the passionate impulse which had impelled him to press his lips to hers, in the first moment of his discovery that he loved her, and had she revealed it complainingly to Lady Kingswood?

His brow felt as if compressed with a band of heated steel, and then his veins as though all the blood had been abruptly withdrawn from them.

Again the mocking smile curled the lip of Lady Kingswood. He was more simple and innocent than she had believed him to be.

"Some little village beauty, Mr. Gower, has run away with your fancy!" she exclaimed, as, showing her white teeth, she bent upon him a gaze such as he found it impossible to withstand.

"Indeed, no," he answered, eagerly.

"Nay, never tell me," she returned, with a laugh, by no means angry. "I read human nature too closely, and with an experience too well confirmed, to entertain any doubts upon the matter. You have stolen out of school at eventide, to walk in green lanes and golden cornfields with a fair, golden-haired, pretty young rustic, to pluck flowers to adorn her tresses with, and to indulge in castle-dreaming, never believing how completely the visionary structure will be one day demolished. Ah, well, well, I do not ask from you a revelation of those little sly passages in your life, but I do ask you," she added, with abrupt emphasis, "to tell me who Cyril went to meet in the Chace?"

By this time Erle had recovered himself, and he said, in an even tone—

"Indeed, Lady Kingswood, no earthly inducement would cause me to violate a confidence once reposed in me; but I may, in this case, at once frankly and freely answer you, I do not know."

"Oh fie, Mr. Gower," she returned, raising her finger reprovingly, "remember your own incident with Lady Maud."

Again a flush of crimson overspread his face.

"My incident with Lady Maud?" he stammered, interrogatively.

"Yes," returned Lady Kingswood. "Pray do not blush so. My pet Maud has told me all. Oh, but she has no secrets from me."

Erle felt his cheeks glow more fiercely than ever, so fiercely, indeed, that his eyes watered. He remained silent.

"You remember, upon your return to the park, after your flight with Lady Maud through the Chace, you lost your way, Mr. Gower," she said, eyeing him wistfully.

He bowed.

"You there encountered a young female," she continued.

Erle breathed again, and bowed affirmatively, with less constraint.

"Lady Maud observed her with very discerning eyes I assure you," her ladyship added laughingly; "for it would be absurd to deny that she is very, very much attached to Cyril; and between you and I, Mr. Gower," here she shrugged her shoulders, "she is, I may almost say, absolutely engaged to Mr. Philip Avon, of the Avons of Hawkesbury. The family is an ancient, the connection so good, inasmuch as the lands and the income are immensely large, and Mr. Philip is so passionately in love with her, that it is a match upon which I and Lord Kingswood may be said to have set our hearts, and, indeed, I am sure Lord Kingswood would not listen to a protest or even a prayer from Lady Maud in opposition to it. That, however, by way of episode."

Episode, indeed. She little knew how every word of that episode seemed like a poisoned dagger plunged into Erle's sensitive heart.

"Lady Maud," her ladyship went on to say, "when this young female of whom I spoke just now undertook the task of conducting you by the nearest path to this, took the opportunity thus afforded her to observe rather closely this young sylvan stranger, and she assures me that she was pretty enough to be very attractive, and sufficiently graceful to lend a charm even to her rustic habiliments. It is a strange fact to have met with such a girl in such a place, yet stranger to learn that she was evidently acquainted with Cyril's name, and that the mention of it appeared to be the inducement under which she played the part of the guide. Lady Maud asserts as much as this; do you confirm it?"

Erle felt that he had no alternative but to reply in the affirmative. He readily detected that Lady Kingswood had colored and exaggerated Lady Maud's motives in relating the incident, and he was at a loss to perceive in what way he should be committing himself with Cyril by acknowledging the correctness of Lady Maud's statement. He certainly felt the very reverse of a disposition to deny it.

Lady Kingswood cleared her throat.

"The lady was fair," she observed.

"Very fair," Erle replied.

"Handsome and attractive in feature and appearance," she added.

"Yes," returned Erle musingly, "her charms were of a singularly fascinating character. It might have been the wild, romantic spot in which we encountered her, the sombre aspect of the masses of leafless trees whose wide-spread intervening branches formed a roof above us, between the interstices of which the daylight could scarcely struggle, which invested her with a peculiar fascination. One would rather have taken her to have been a spirit of the woods than a mortal, if it were not that such evil superstitions have been long exploded."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Lady Kingswood, dwelling on the word. "Do you not now see the attraction which drew Cyril to the lovely Chace, and which has so disastrously resulted?"

"What explanation does Mr. Cyril offer?" inquired Erle, rather anxiously.

"None," returned Lady Kingswood, with peculiar vivacity, "none; not a word. He refuses to answer a single question put to him. He preserves the most obstinate silence, and appears the very incarnation of misery. I am, therefore, the more anxious to fathom all the circumstances connected with this event. Tell me, I entreat you, Mr. Gower, has Mr. Cyril made any confession, any statement to you, regarding the young person of whom we have been speaking?"

"Not a sentence, upon my honor, Lady Kingswood," he returned, emphatically.

"Have you no conception who or what she is?" she asked, anxiously.

"Only from what I heard fall from the lips of your gamekeeper," he rejoined.

"Ha!" she ejaculated, with an air of eagerness, "What name did he give to her?"

"The Wonder of Kingswood Chace!" was the reply.

Lady Kingswood started to her feet, her face became pale, and then a most livid. A thrill of terror—horror, rather—appeared to paralyse her limbs, and a slight groan burst from her lips.

She pressed her hands over her eyes for a moment, and then sharply withdrawing them, she said, in a fierce and resolute tone,

"I will hunt this secret down."

Then she turned to Erle, and with a strangely grave face, yet white as marble, she said to him,

"There is another to tear up by the roots, and it shall be done, even for your sake as my own. Attend me."

These remarkable words were uttered in a haughty and authoritative tone, and he yielded to her obedience.

She left the apartments, and descending a flight of stairs, pursued a corridor which led to the ancient portion of the building.

He knew its direction well; he wondered why she took it, and what it portended.

On they proceeded, as though making for the apartments he had occupied upon his first arrival at Kingswood Hall, but ere they were reached she turned off in another direction, descended a new flight of stairs, and paused before a pair of antique oaken folding-doors most richly carved.

"Be good enough to open those doors, Mr. Gower," she exclaimed, as she pointed to a massive bronze handle.

He complied with her request, and with an arduous exertion of strength, he succeeded in forcing the bolt back, and one of the doors of its own weight slowly swung on its hinges, until it fell back into a recess which had been formed to receive it.

Lady Kingswood, with a face of ashy whiteness, motioned to him to enter, and he obeyed her.

He found himself in a spacious vaulted chamber, or gallery, hung with portraits, life-size, dim, and discolored by age. On pedestals were figures of men clothed in complete armor, and arranged in various parts were implements of war, extending back to a manufacture of very early date. The ceiling was draped with banners and other trophies, and the windows were emblazoned with armorial bearings and escutcheons which were formed of stained glass of the richest dyes. They lent a gloom to that which the diamond-encrusted diamond panes threw over the gallery, only that hues of violet and amber, and crimson and amethyst, fell upon various objects, and communicated a solemn, monastic aspect to the whole chamber.

Erle felt a strange sensation of commingled awe and pride as he paced down the many-deviced, inlaid oaken flooring, which had not yet so lost its ancient polishing but that it reflected the contents of the room as though it had been a pond or placid lake.

Lady Kingswood followed him with a hurried but trembling step. Nevertheless, a powerful inward urging of the character of an irresistible impulse impelled her forward, and she even passed him, pausing not until she arrived at a portrait of an ancestor of the House of Kingswood. The picture was in a singularly fine state of preservation; the lineaments of the face, clearly and sharply defined, were strikingly handsome, but there was an expression of stern haughtiness somewhat marring the noble dignity which the forehead, the large, beautiful eyes, and the well formed features contributed to produce. Lady Kingswood paused abruptly before it. She seemed to cower affrightedly, as, pointing to it, she said, in a husky, half-suffocated voice,

"The bad Baron of Kingswood."

The words had hardly quitted her lips, when the sounds of hurried footsteps racing down the gallery startled both.

They turned hastily, and with astonishment behold Lord Kingswood advancing towards them with furious haste. Behind him with swift, gliding, cat-like step, followed his valet, Pharisee.

"Lady Kingswood, are you conscious of what madness you are guilty?" Lord Kingswood cried, in a voice of thunder.

She drew herself up haughtily at the sound of his voice. Her flashing eyes glanced rapidly from the portrait to the clear, open, manly countenance of Erle. Her eyes dilated, her bosom heaved, her whole stature seemed to increase in height. She clutched the wrist of Lord Kingswood with painful vigor, and with the attitude of a Cassandra, she pointed to the picture, exclaiming, in a hissing whisper,

"Look there!"

With unsteady eyes and knitted brows, his lordship turned a kind of awe-stricken gaze upon the portrait. Ere it had rested there an instant, he was startled by Lady Kingswood directing her finger to the face of Erle, and ejaculating, in shrill, thrilling tones,

"Behold!"

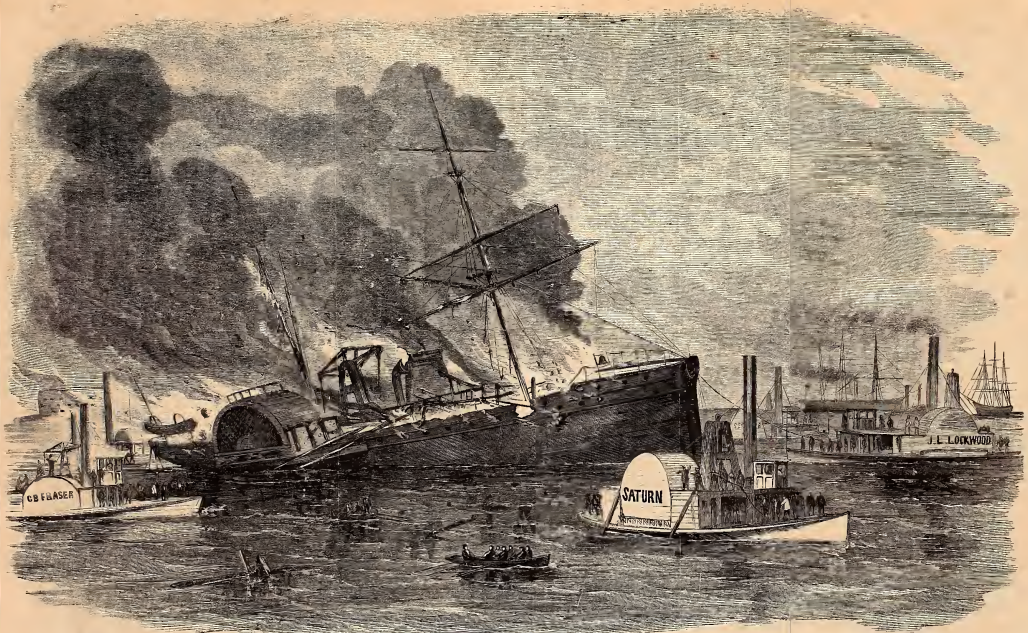
Lord Kingswood turned his wavering glance in the direction in which she pointed, and at this moment Pharisee officiously opened the upper part of one of the casements. A broad gleam of light fell upon Erle's face, bringing it out with brilliant prominence from the dusky atmosphere in which it had been before but dimly seen.

"Tell me, my lord," cried she, with rapid energy, "who is the father of that boy?"

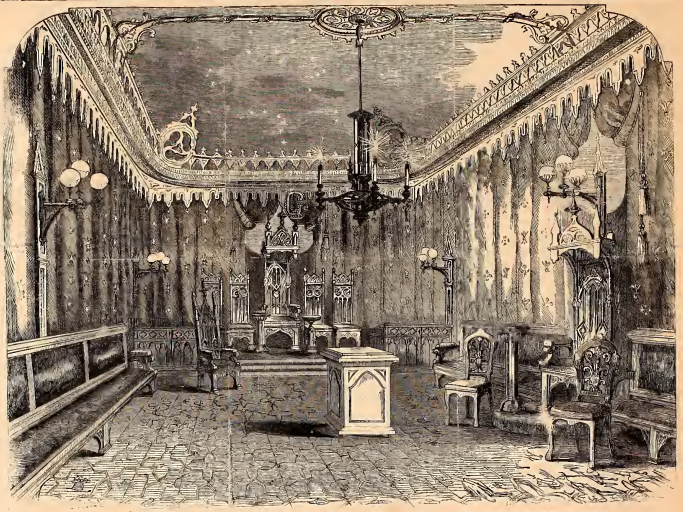
Lord Kingswood's face was overspread with a deathly pallor, a thousand grim and terrible memories forced a turbulent rending passage through his distracted brain. He trembled beneath the gleaming flash of her piercing eyes, but ere he could force even a stammered monosyllable between his parched lips, a fierce and furious gust of wind rushed howling through the opened casement, tore through the gallery with tremendous violence, was filled with clanging uproar among the suits of steel armor hanging against the walls, and, seizing the portrait upon which they had been gazing, it wrenched it from its fastenings and hurled it to the ground with a thundering crash.

Lady Kingswood uttered a piercing shriek, forced from her by terror and fright, and sank prostrate in her husband's arms, as though by a lightning-stroke she had been smitten dead.

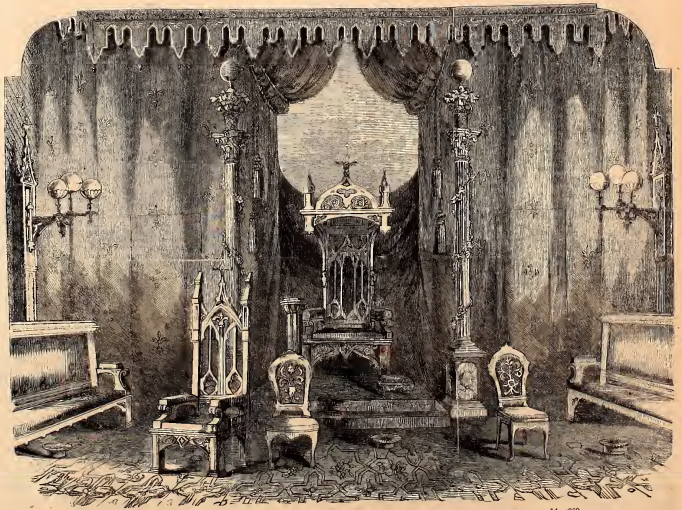
(To be continued.)



BURNING OF THE NEW SOUTHERN STEAMER, JOHN P. KING, AT PIER NO. 4, NORTH RIVER, NEAR THE BATTERY, ON THE MORNING OF TUESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1860. See Page 90.



NEW HALL, DESIGNED FOR HOLLAND LODGE, NO. 8, OF F. A. M., LOOKING TOWARD THE EAST—DEDICATED ON FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 14, 1860.—SEE PAGE 90.



NEW HALL, DESIGNED FOR HOLLAND LODGE, NO. 8, OF F. A. M., LOOKING TOWARDS THE WEST—DEDICATED ON FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 14, 1860.

GREAT GARIBALDI MEETING AT THE COOPER INSTITUTE.

The most noticeable feature in modern civilization is the sympathy of one people for another. It would seem now as though the life of freedom were breathed into the great human body all over the world, and that the struggle of one limb roused a corresponding action throughout the entire frame.

On Tuesday, a large and most influential meeting was held at the Cooper Institute. Upon the stage of the Hall the only decoration was the American and Sardinian flags—a decoration at once simple and suggestive.

At about half-past seven the United States band from the Navy Yard, Brooklyn, inaugurated the proceedings by playing a lively polka, which was followed by the Garibaldi rataplan, composed by Signor Muzio.

The meeting was called to order, and the Hon. J. A. Dix was unanimously chosen Chairman.

After the applause had subsided, Mr. Dix made a short but most appropriate address, in which he briefly stated the wonderful career of Garibaldi.

Judge Dean then read the list of Vice Presidents, which comprised many of the leading names of our city.

For Vice Presidents were:

Wm Cullen Bryant, Auguste Belmont, D. Appleton, Alex W. Bradford, Moses H. Grinnell, Cyrus Curtis, James Gallatin, James Harper, H J Raymond, Wm M Evarts, James Watson Webb, Benj F. Manierre, Gerard Hallock, John T Hoffman, Myron H. Clark, Caleb Barstow, Erastus Brooks, John Q Jones, Wm. P. Lee, Wm Curtis Noyes, J. McLeod Murphy, Wm. A Seaver, George P Morris, Dr. Lewis A. Sayre, Carlisle Norwood, Thos. Tileston, R H. Arkenburg, Bayard Clark, Wm. C Church, Emanuel B. Hart, D. A Hale, J H. Hobbrook, Wm H H. Marshall Lefferts, Robert S. Hone, John Van Buren, Elijah Ward, Stephen Cambreling, Greene C. Bronson, Wm. F. Havemeyer, Watts Sherman, James Gordon Bennett, John J. Cisco, Isaac C. Kendall, Truman Smith, Edward Pierrepont, Horace Greeley, Andrew H. Mickle, Elijah F. Purdy, John B. Haskins, George Briggs, Wm. C. Alexander, John W. Barbour, Benjamin Brandreth, Wm. V. Brady, Ambrose C. Kingsland, Oswald Ottendorfer, Mathew Morgan, Gustavus A Conover A V Stout James T. Souter, Geo W Vanlan, James R. Spalding, Hiram Walbridge, C. J. Brown, Oliver Charlick, Abraham Duryea, Isaac Dayton, Simeon Draper J H. Hollister, N. C. Graham C. Godfrey Gunther, Francis Hall, I. C. Addington, John A. Stewart, Samuel Blatchford.

The Secretaries were:

Gotham B. Abbott, James Harper Jr., E. Magauran, G. Minnelli, Julius Stahel, [illegible], J. Norton, Wm. Conkwright, L. L. Britton, Erastus Lyman, Frank Leslie, Wm. P. Putmer, C. L. Tiffany, H. P. Whitney, A. F. Wilmarth, Eli P. Norton, D. Dean, John Hopper, John Fitch, G. S. Hollenshead, J. R. Gillmore, J. C. Burnham, F. P. James, Geo. G. Lake, Wm L. Newell, J. H. Richards, Egbert L. Viele, Amor J. Williamson, J. S. Southworth, J. W. Curtis.

Mr. Norton then read the address, which is too long for our colums.

Mr. Luther Marsh then made a spirited appeal to the large assembly before him, and was frequently interrupted by the most enthusiastic applause.

A fine ode, written by Mr. Ross Wallace, was sung by Mr. Guilmette, to the soul-stirring tune of the Marseillaise, after which the band played Hail Columbia.

The Chairman then introduced Professor C. Hitchcock, of the Union Theological Seminary, one of the most eloquent advocates and believers in Italian freedom and unity.

After the Professor had addressed the meeting, there were loud calls for James T. Brady, and considerable regret was expressed at his absence.

Cheers were then given for Garibaldi, the Liberator of Italy, and the crowd quietly dispersed.

BURNING OF THE NEW STEAMER JOHN P. KING, AT THE BATTERY, NEW YORK, DEC. 18.

About four o'clock on Tuesday morning, the 18th Dec., the new steamship, John P. King, was discovered on fire at Pier No. 4, North River, close to the Battery. When the fire was discovered there was only the private watchman on board, and his attention was called by a strong smell of fire and smoke. The flames were first noticed in the engine-room. Upon reaching that part the watchman found the room in one blaze; he immediately communicated the alarm, and the firemen were promptly on the spot. Several hook and ladder companies were soon on hand, and as the gang plank of the steamer was out of reach their ladders were thrown from the pier to the ship, and in this manner the gallant firemen got on board the burning steamer. As the Vanderbilt, Havre steamer, was on the other side of the dock, great fears were entertained for her safety, and with admirable celerity the doomed steamer was towed into the stream, there to burn without setting fire to other vessels.

When the John P. King reached the stream the flames spread with great velocity, and an endeavor was made to scuttle her, but the effort proved unavailing. Another attempt made on the other side was more successful, but she did not sink with the rapidity expected. In this condition she floated about for a considerable time, and it was evident from the tardy manner in which she settled down that very little of her would be left unconsumed. It was therefore resolved to run her aground near the Battery and thus enable the firemen to work upon her from the shore, she was consequently hauled round to a point a little south-west of Castle Garden Emigrant Depot, and grounded in about fourteen feet water. Before this time, however, the smokestack came crashing over the side, breaking down the hulwarks. The topmast then followed, carrying with it a large portion of the rigging, which falling into the water was towed ashore. Several steam tugs now came to the assistance of the blazing wreck, and the firemen worked with a will and energy seldom seen. Nos. 47 and 38 did excellent service, and by the aid of boats the hose was transported to the decks of several steam tugs, and thence across to the forward part of the vessel where the fire now raged with terrible force. The fire in the stern part of the ship was effectually checked about noon, when the entire upper-deck was one field of charred wood, through portions of which the lower-deck was to be seen, strewn with the broken furniture of the saloons.

It is needless to observe that the news of the fire had spread throughout the city, and the exciting scene was witnessed by an immense crowd of spectators from the Battery. Our artist, who was on the spot very early, has made a most thrilling and correct sketch of the splendid but disastrous sight. She now lies a noble wreck in ruinous perfection, her beautiful proportions being still visible in her partial destruction. Nothing with certainty is known of the origin of the fire. On the day previous a party of gentlemen accompanied her in her trial trip down the bay, and she returned to the Battery about four o'clock in the afternoon, everything having gone admirably. She belonged to Spofford, Tileston & Co. and was destined for the Charleston trade. She was built by Jacob A. Westervelt & Sons, and valued at one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. She is insured for only seventy-six thousand dollars.

She was two hundred and thirty-seven feet long, thirty-eight feet broad, and twenty-one deep. She was fifteen hundred and thirty tons burthen, and drew thirteen feet water. Her fittings-up were of oak, and in a most costly style. Her machinery will probably be saved. Captain Adams, formerly of the James Adger, was her commander.

OPENING OF THE NEW ROOM OF HOLLAND LODGE, NO. 8, F. A. M.

The beautiful new Lodge-room, situated in the rear of No. 8 Union place (3d story), fitted up by the Standing Committee of Holland Lodge, No. 8, of Free and Accepted Masons, was dedicated with great eclat on last Friday evening, 14th instant. The ceremony of dedication was admirably performed by M. W. John W. Simons, Grand Master of Masons, assisted by the M. W. Grand Lodge of the State of New York.

Brother George W. Morgan, the very eminent organist, presided at the harmonium, and was aided by an excellent choir and the large number of brethren present.

The Master of the Lodge, W. Joseph N. Balestier, in the course of the evening, made a brief address, in substance as follows:

"Most Worshipful Grand Master and Brethren—It is usual on occasions like this to pronounce an oration; but it has been deemed expedient to occupy the time with melody rather than oratory, and my remarks will, therefore, be very brief.

"Although this hall was fitted up by Holland Lodge, it is but just to say that the fraternity are indebted for it quite as much to Pacific Lodge as to Holland. And that indebtedness is mainly due to that eminent and esteemed Mason, R. W. Brother Banks, Master of Pacific Lodge. It was under the auspices of Brother Banks that the room was built, and the admirable arrangement of the ante-rooms originated with him. This beautiful arching ceiling, except its decoration, was designed by him, and to him is due the fact that all the officers occupy their proper positions.

"The Standing Committee of Holland Lodge are also under great obligations to Brother Banks for the great interest he has manifested during the progress of the work. For the general character of the fitting up the Standing Committee of Holland Lodge are alone responsible, and have endeavored to perform their work with what taste and judgment they could command.

"The workmen employed have performed their duties very creditably. Brother Gambling's fresco-painting speaks so loudly in its own favor that I need not dwell on it. The harmonium and secretary's desk, made by Messrs. Carhart, Needham & Co., are extremely elegant in design and elaborate in finish, and will bear the closest examination of connoisseurs. Of the quality of the sounds dispensed by this beautiful instrument you have had an opportunity to judge, and, I am sure, your verdict will be favorable. The carved oak chairs and benches, the chandelier and brackets, of the same material, are from the factory of Messrs. Laun & Kimbel, in Twelfth street. The taste displayed in this work proves that Messrs. Laun & Kimbel are capable men in their profession. The beautiful marble altar is by Mr. Hourlier, of Broadway, and reflects great credit on him. The carpets of all the rooms and the curtains are from the establishment of Messrs. A. T. Stewart & Co., and I have good cause to thank their workmen for the admirable manner in which the carpets were matched and put down. Moreover, this part of the work gave the Committee no trouble beyond giving their order. The furniture in the parlor was made by Messrs. Stillwell & Hazelton, and, we doubt not, will be generally admired for its neatness. Nor should we forget those whose work does not show, but is extremely useful—Mr. Ellison, the gasfitter, and Mr. Smith, the carpenter.

"The entire cost of fitting up the parlor, Lodge-room and ante-rooms will approach four thousand dollars, and nothing has been done on credit.

"Most Worshipful Grand Master—In behalf of Holland Lodge I desire to thank you and the M. W. G. L. for having so kindly performed the solemn and beautiful service of dedication, and I can assure you that in the whole body of subordinate Lodges there is none more faithful and zealous in the good cause than the one I now represent.

"I could wish, sir, that another voice than mine had addressed you. I could wish that the most eminent, the most influential and the best beloved member of old Holland, he whom I have just succeeded in office, had consented to delight this audience with his eloquence at this time. But since he thought it the proper duty of the actual Master, I cannot lose the occasion to pay a slight tribute to the solid worth, the conspicuous ability, the Masonic zeal and the excellent heart of the R. W. John J. Crane, M. D., Junior Past Master of Holland Lodge. He is a man whom we delight to honor, and our good wishes will ever attend him, whether in respect to his brilliant professional career or his progress in the affection and respect of our beloved fraternity."

To this Address the M. W. Grend Master answered in a speech of great power and eloquence, particularly dwelling on the proud history of Holland Lodge, the great names associated with it, and the expectations entertained of its future career. In the course of his remarks the Grand Master paid a beautiful tribute to the worth of Brother Crane, and to the members of the Lodge generally. His remarks upon the beautiful white marble altar were particularly touching and eloquent, and were fully appreciated by the intelligent audience.

We now present a brief account of Holland Lodge, of which it is our pride to be a member.

This ancient and distinguished Lodge was chartered in the year 1787 by the Prince of Orange. In that year its chief officers were—John Meyer, Master; Henry Benson, Senior Warden; and Henry A. Coster, Junior Warden. Among its most eminent Masters have been R. L. Vandenbraek, De Witt Clinton, John Jacob Astor, Ebenezer Irving, Elias Hicks (who was Master thirteen years), William Irving, Jr., Chancellor Nathan Sanford, William Henderson, John Abrams, John Pintard, John Stagg, Jr., Stephen Price, John F. Roorback, Abraham Lott, William Delafield, A. S. Glass, John Rodman, Edmund Kortright, Edward Seaman, Thomas Longworth, George Davis, Benjamin R. Winthrop (who held the office thirteen years), William H. Milnor, Frederick Fawcett and John J. Crane.

Among the Wardens occur the names of Wilmerding, Moore Lawrence, Van Slyck, Birch, Livingston, Clarkson, Low, Vredenburgh, Jones, Underdonk, McLean, Van Wyck, Varick, Robertson, Wilcox, Speyer, Ogden, Heard, Fay, Gardinier, Willis, Gibson, Varnum, Baretto, Lang, Wyckoff, and others connected with the old families of this city.

Among the members are hundreds of names distinguished in the social circles in New York in the olden time. It would consume too much space to enumerate any considerable number of these names. It is gratifying to know that many of the descendants of the old members are at this day members of Holland Lodge.

We have not space this week for an extended account of the new Lodge-room and its accessories. Our illustrations will give a general idea of the Lodge-room. But in addition to these is an elegantly furnished parlor fronting on Union Square for the use of the several Lodges occupying the premises.

The following Masonic bodies will occupy the new rooms: Holland, Arcana, Crescent, Continental, Concord, Benevolent and Pacific Lodges, Metropolitan Chapter, and Cœur de Lion and Columbian Commanderies.

Officers of Holland Lodge, No. 8 chosen Dec. 10, 1860.

Joseph N. Balestier, W. M.; Jotham Post, S. W.; Charles A. Rapallo, J. W.; M. B. Spaulding, Treasurer; A. W. King, Secretary; H. S. Taylor, S. D.; J. S. Reynolds, J. D.; Charles D. Mead, Chaplain; Samuel B. White, George F. Woodward, Stewards; Henry Walters, H. A. Weeks, Masters of Ceremonies; J. G. Davies, Organist; Greenfield Pote, Tiler.

Standing Committee.—R. W. John J. Crane, Henry H. Ward, the Master and Wardens.

THE CONTEST FOR THE CHAMPIONSHIP BETWEEN AMERICAN AND ENGLISH BOATMEN.

Some time since a challenge was published to the champion rower of the Thames, England, by the champion of our own waters, Joshua Ward, of Newburg. Negotiations were for some time pending, but it is now announced that the English champion, Chambers, will come over next spring, prepared for a friendly and determined contest for the rowing supremacy of the American and English rivers.

This contest will excite the interest of all classes, for it is free from all objectionable features. The parties engaged are fine specimens of manhood, and the sport in which they are about to contest for supremacy is recognized as manly, healthful, and free from every taint of brutality and immorality.

As many of our readers will be curious to know something of the method of conducting a boat-race and the kind of boats used, we have engraved one of the English race-boats, the rower being Henry Kelley, the ex-champion of the River Thames, from a sketch taken by our artist when in England. The race-boat is a mere shell, so light that a man could take it under his arm and walk off with it, but it is as strongly built as is consistent with its excessive delicacy. It has, literally, no keel, and it requires such exquisite balance on the part of the rower, that an ounce of weight too much either way and the boat turns over. No one inexperienced could sit in these race-boats for one instant. So fragile are they that every inch of the fabric trembles with each sweep of the sculls. Speed is everything, and in their construction the uttermost possibility seems to have been obtained.

The regulations of the race are very simple. The stakes and the distance being decided upon, the locality of the contest is then fixed. If the course is out and return, say five miles, a flag-boat is placed at that distance, which has to be rounded on the return home. The struggle is who shall round the stake-boat first, and the man who has the inside track, if both men are equal, has a certain advantage. This position is decided by tossing up. Fair rowing is demanded, and no fouling is allowed. The judge's boat is at the starting point and his decision is absolute.

It will thus be seen that a boat-race is simply a trial of skill and muscle, and that the tendency of the interest it will cause will be to increase the popular desire for manly and healthy amusement.

THE GREAT HONDURAS OPAL.

This magnificent gem, the largest opal in America, and one of the finest, if not the largest in the world, measures two inches in length, lacking a tenth of an inch, and is one inch and four-tenths wide. The largest heretofore known in this country—lately if not now belonging to Messrs. Tiffany & Co.—was a little over an inch in diameter, and was valued at $2,500. There is one among the crown jewels of France, but smaller than that which we have engraved, valued at $7,000. The opal has been described as "a truly regal gem, combining within itself an original beauty and a fellowship with all other stones; at one moment, shedding the pale light of the moon, at the next flashing as the sun." The one under notice belonged for many years to the statue of the Virgin in the oratory of one of the convents of Guatemala, which was sacked by the Mexican troops of the army of Iturbide, when they evacuated Central America. It was taken by a common soldier, who retained it concealed, not daring to make known an act regarded by his countrymen as sacrilegious, until early in the present year, when on his deathbed he revealed its existence, and requested its return. As the convent to which it belonged has been suppressed, it has been ordered to be disposed of for the benefit of the mission of Lacandon. What a history of vicissitudes and changes is that of most of the finer jewels of the world!

A BRIEF NOTE ON ROCKING CHAIRS.

We presume that it is a fact known to but few of our many readers that that most comfortable and popular institution, the rocking chair, is of American origin, it having been—as we are informed, after some little research as to its history—invented and put in primal use among the first settlers of this Continent.

Though it has been claimed that it was suggested at first by the device of a nervously excited, and, perhaps, partially bedridden community to obtain a means of securing repose by a soothing, gentle movement, yet we think we have tolerably creditable authority for asserting that the first idea of rocking or oscillating furniture originated in the "dug-outs" or "sap-trough cradles," in which the dusky sons of the forest were lulled to slumber in infancy by the aboriginal matrons.

A short period after the pleasing effects of rocking-chairs had been practically demonstrated, their use as an article of furniture became general, and, up to but a few years since, no set of parlor or drawing-room equipment was considered complete without the inevitable rocking-chair.

From this country it was introduced into England and France, as well as other European countries, where it met with great favor and came into general use; and now, throughout the civilized world it is classed among the necessities of every well-furnished dwelling.

Since the time when rocking-chairs first became extant no important change had been made in them as originally deviced, and, consequently, the various objections urged against them, that they impair the nap or pile of fine carpeting, by pressing it down or sliding over it, bruise or otherwise mar furniture, their general uncouth appearance, their constant liability to dangerously pinch the fingers of creeping children or the paws of unlucky felines venturing in too close neighborhood to their long protruding rockers, besides many other faults, had the effect of almost entirely banishing it from the parlor, until a recent ingenious invention, producing precisely the same agreeable effects, without one of the above objections, has perfectly restored this most valuable and time-honored fireside comforter to its former status and importance.

Our illustration represents a group of newly improved rocking-chairs, manufactured by Terry & Wells, 652 Broadway, the centre of which formed one of the drawing-room set placed at the disposal of and used by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, on the occasion of his recent visit.

Dukes and Fools.—There is a well known case of mystification, caused to English ears by the use of Scotch terms, which took place in the House of Peers during the examination of the magistrates of Edinburgh, touching the particulars of the Porteous Mob in 1736. The Duke of Newcastle having asked the Provost what kind of shot the Town Guard, commanded by Porteous, had loaded their muskets with, received the unexpected reply, "Oh, just sic as ane shoots dukes and fools wi'." The answer was [illegible] as a contempt of the House of Lord, and the poor Provost would [illegible] suffered for his misconception of his patois, had not the Duke of Argyle [illegible] (who must have been considerably amused) explained that the worthy chief magistrate's expression, when rendered into English, meant to describe the shot used for ducks and fowls.

MADELAINE.

(For Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.)

By Alpha.

Wilt thou not strive to love me, Madelaine—
  And take thy haughty feet from off my heart?
Is there no spark of feeling in thy breast—
  Wert thou from human passion born, apart?
Oh! as I gaze on thy imperial beauty,
  Thy form so moulded to love's pure desire,
How do I long for that Promethean power,
  To melt thy icy heart with flashing fire.

Wilt thou not strive to love me, Madelaine?
  Do I not own a regal love for thee?
With what a lavish affluence I throw
  My very soul before thy sovereignty!
Do I not how my brow down to the earth,
  And subjugate the freedom of my will—
And lift my eyes, humid with tremulous tears,
  Which ebb and flow with every pulse's thrill!

Wilt thou not strive to love me, Madelaine?
  I cannot languish like a lovesick boy,
Nor waste in love's distress the fuel of my soul—
  My youth's rich prime, for barren hopes destroy.
Whatever wealth my nature hoards in store
  Of brain or heart, I consecrate to thee;
This sacrificial offering is all
  That love can ask of blind idolatry.

Wilt thou not strive to love me, Madelaine?
  And bend thy nature from its proud resolves?
Love is an alchemist whose subtle power
  From icy coldness, passion warm evolves.
The love which breathes out from my passionate heart
  Must wake a whispering echo in thine own—
So I will crush out longing, watch and wait
  For the first murmuring of a passion-tone.

THE PHANTOM WITNESS.

(Continued from p. 94.)

"The landlady of The Wheatsheaf will depose that, as she was passing the door of the room occupied by the sisters, she heard them conversing, and with an incidental curiosity she paused to listen, when she heard the prisoner say, 'I shall go to the wall, and shall not get a husband, all on account of your little Ernest, when I intended to make uncle Ralph take to me—or make me his favorite—and leave me all his money.' These, the landlady will tell you, may not be the exact words used; but she will swear to you, as she has already sworn to the justices, that they are very near, and contain the sentiment that was uttered. Collateral fact the second, then, my lords and gentlemen of the jury, is, that the knife which did the deed of blood belonged to the prisoner, and was bought by her at Colombo, in Ceylon. Gentlemen, God aid and help us all to get at the truth in this matter! I have no more to say."

The attorney-general sat down, not adding one word to his bare statement of these facts on which the case rested.

A cold perspiration sat on my brow. How fearfully strong was the case, and what had I to rebut it with? Nothing—nothing! What if Brown had absconded? What if Brown had been swallowed up by an earthquake? His absence or presence made but little account in such a case. He had only seen what others saw—he could add nothing to the evidence of the landlord and the landlady of the inn. I felt as if my very heart paled as I saw the blank, half-terror-stricken countenance of the jury, and fancied that in every whisper they indulged in to each other the word "Guilty" might be found.

The junior counsel for the prosecution now rose, and called out, "Jacob Wilts!"

There was a slight bustle, and the landlord of the inn got into the witness-box.

He merely deposed to the coming of the sister and child to The Wheatsheaf, and the alarm in the night, and the finding the dead body of the child, as stated.

The attorney-general then glanced at me, and I rose to cross-examine.

"Had you any other guests in The Wheatsheaf on the night in question?"

"Yes, sir. A Mr. Brown."

"When did he come?"

"About an hour after the ladies."

"Was he a stranger to you?"

"Quite, sir."

"Where did he sleep?"

"At the far end of the gallery, about fifty paces off the ladies' room!"

"You can go down now, but I shall want you again."

"Yes, sir."

Martha Wilts, the landlady, was the next witness examined, and she confirmed what the attorney-general had stated. Her account of what Anna had said made a strong impression on the jury, and when I rose to cross-examine her, I felt that that was the point to attend to.

"Now, Mrs. Wilts," I said, "you have said many a thing in jest to your husband, and he to you, no doubt?"

"Lord bless you, yes, sir!"

"And meant no harm?"

"Not the least, sir."

"Of course not. Now can you recollect anything you may have said to him, or of him, in that harmless way lately?"

"Oh, dear, yes, sir! When he takes a drop too much, I am very apt to say that I hope that the next will choke him, but I no more mean it than you do, sir."

"And of course, by the tone in which you say it, he knows it is only a joke?"

"To be sure!"

"You speak it in something of the tone of the prisoner at the bar, when she said she should never get a husband!"

"Just so, sir."

"That will do. You can go down."

Mr. Brown was the next witness called, and no one appeared. I was resolved to make the most I could in favor of the prisoner out of this disappearance of Brown, although I feared it would not be much, but it was not then time to take notice of it. The name of Brown reverberated through the Court, and the passages, and the adjacent street, but no Brown appeared.

The attorney-general then himself rose and said, "It is now my most painful duty to call Mrs. Rachael Seaton. It is a duty I would fain have avoided if possible, for no one can feel more sensibly than I do how sad to her must be the task of being summoned for the prosecution in this case, but it cannot be helped, and I therefore call Mrs. Rachael Seaton."

With a slow and melancholy step the poor mother got into the witness-box, but she kept her eyes upon Anna, with a longing, tender glance, until the judge said, mildly, "Witness, you must look this way."

Then she gently turned from observation of Anna, and they could all see the tears stealing down her cheeks.

"Sirs—sirs!" she cried, "this should not be! You will understand, sir, that he was my boy—my only one! You cannot understand how—I—loved him—because—because that is hidden here—here in my poor broken heart! But when I, the mother—when I, who am to long time, you see, sirs, have lost all—all I had in the world—when I declare that Anna is innocent, you should listen to me. Last night, sir—it was at the same hour last night—he, my babe—my own dear——Oh, heaven, these tears scald me! If I could only die now—now—now!"

How she wept—what a passion of grief was there! and throughout all the court you might hear sobs and faint cries, until the judge wrapped his mantle over his face and leant back in his chair, and all was still but the voice of grief in that court.

The attorney-general then said faintly, "I will ask nothing of this woman."

Then I rose.

"Madam! madam!"

My voice sounded hollow and strange, in the midst of so much grief and such sounds of tears, and the poor woman started, and looked up at me.

"Ah, yes!" she said. "I pray you—I pray you!"

She had recognised me as acting for the defence, and she meant to say that she would speak to me; and then, before I could ask her anything, she went on—

"Sirs, all listen to me. I did not see the murderer of my precious darling; but I saw his shadow. It is ever present to me now—like a phantom it goes with me wherever I may go. Last night, too—oh, you will say that was a dream, but dreams are of heaven's making, as well as waking thoughts—I saw him then—my little angel! Oh, what light was there! The light of heaven in the dear eyes and on the little face—the shining colors from the wings of God's archangels were about him—my own dear little one. He came with heaven's sunshine on his brow. I heard his voice—so soft, so low, so beautiful, and he said that she was innocent, and had ever loved him."

"Sister—dear sister!" cried Anna. "I did ever love him—I am innocent!"

There were cries and sobs now in the court, and twice I tried to command my voice to speak before I could say to her, "Madam—madam! that shadow you saw on the night of the murder, tell us of it."

"I will, I will! I saw it on the wall. The tall, broad shadow, or phantom of a man."

"What was it like?" interposed the judge. "Tell us, madam, what it was like, if you can?"

"I will, I will. What is this?"

Mrs. Seaton looked around her and up at the windows of the court with a shudder.

"It is nothing," said I. "A thunderstorm is about to take place. That is all."

For the last few minutes the court had been gradually getting so dark that it was scarcely possible to see from one side of it to the other, and scarcely had the last words passed my lips when a flash of blue lightning, that was perfectly bewildering in its brightness, lit up the place, and was followed by such a peal of thunder, that the building in which was the court-house appeared to shake to its foundations.

A scene of some confusion occurred in the court, by the efforts of some to leave, and by some females fainting.

A loud voice then cried out close to the door, "Make way there—make way. Out of my way, I say! I cannot—I will not stay here! We shall have the place about our ears! Out of my way!"

A man who had been sitting in an obscure corner close to the jury box, tried to fight his way out of the court.

Then a voice called out, "That is Brown."

It was never discovered who uttered those words, but I called out loudly, "Detain that man! He is a witness in this case, and duly subpœnaed; and being in court, can be compelled to speak. Stop that man!"

Brown was pounced upon by several officers, and brought forward.

"What is this for?" he cried. "What have I done? Ha! ha! A prime joke this!"

The attorney-general sprang to his feet.

"You are our witness," he said. "My lord judge, may we have lights?"

"Lights!" said the judge. "I cannot see my notes."

The darkness of the court increased each moment, and the thunder again, like the discharge of heavy ordnance, rolled over the building.

"I have nothing to say," cried Brown, "no evidence to give, I tell you. I was fast asleep, and heard cries, and went to see what was amiss; and then I saw just what the landlord and landlady saw, and no more no less."

"Lights, there!" cried the judge.

"Yes, my lord," said a voice.

A man appeared with a light with which to ignite the chandelier.

What shrieks are these? Oh! sounds of terror—wild laughter——cries of exultation mingled with horror!

It is the bereaved mother.

"Look! oh, look! There—on the wall!—near to you, my lord judge! This is God's mercy! It is heaven's testimony—the Phantom Witness! I know it well. There is the murderer's shadow!"

There was a strange, shouting cry in the court. The counsel all rose from their seats, and the judge looked askance with amazement on his face.

Cast on the wall of the court by the light that had been brought, was the shadow of the man Brown. Huge and exaggerated, there it was; and as he shrunk down in the vain hope of escaping its production, Mrs. Seaton had seen it, even as she had seen it cast on the wall of the corridor of the inn by the oil lamp in the passage, as he shrunk away with the blood of the innocent child upon his soul.

Brown then made a frantic effort to escape, but he was overpowered and secured in a moment. The storm-clouds passed over, and a long, broad beam of sunshine streamed into the court.

"Not guilty!" cried the jury, with one voice; and in another moment Anna was in the arms of her sister.

Then a tall, pale old man stood up by the side of the judge. It was Sir Ralph Heritage, the high sheriff, who had risen from his sick bed, and arrived in the court during its darkness from the storm. "You are my unhappy son, and now I have a key to all these horrors. You have done murder, lest a new claimant on my affection should arise in the person of the poor child you have destroyed. My lord judge, this is my deathblow. Take me home, you who have compassion."

The high sheriff sank back on the bench, and when they went to raise him they found him but a corpse.

* * * * * * * * *

The motive of Richard Heritage in committing the dreadful murder at the inn was now but too apparent. He was tried and convicted in due course, but managed to procure a deadly poison, and evaded the sentence of the law.

A will of Sir Ralph Heritage was found, which left the bulk of his property to the poor murdered child, so that his male relatives put in their claims, but a sufficient sum was secured for ease and competence both to Rachael and Anna.

Poor Rachael! She only lived one year, and then she went to see, not in a dream, but in reality, the sunshine of heaven on the face of her baby boy.

THE HAUNTED FIELD;

OR,

FATHER AND SON.

(Continued from page 82.)

"Mary Sedley," I said, somewhat sternly, taking up a watch and other things which she had just laid on the table, "where did these come from?"

"Oh, never mind; give them me. They are——"

"Mary, they are plunder, the fruits of a highway robbery, and the robber was——"

"No, no, no," she shrieked. "I will not believe it," she cried, divining my next speech.

"Now be calm, and let me tell you. I heard the greater part of what passed between you and your husband just now. The man he named to you is a notorious receiver of stolen goods. And read this," and I handed her the placard.

She read it.

"My God! this is worse than all," she wailed. "I have starved and suffered well nigh unto death; yes, almost to death; Oh, thank Heaven! but this is terrible."

"Now," I resumed, "there is but one course to be pursued. This ruffian has tortured you long enough. You must be released from him."

"How?"

"How? Why, through the law. He will be transported for life for this offence."

"But he is not in prison yet."

"No, but he soon will be. He is coming here to-morrow night, you know, and I shall have the officers ready for him."

"Ah, true," she said, staring vacantly at me. "I had forgotten. Yes; you would do that, of course."

She seemed bewildered, and, having learned from her that she expected the old servant to return immediately, I thought it best to leave her.

As I passed from the cottage, I pondered her strange look, and lingered at a short distance. The door opened gently. I saw her come forth, look about, close the door, and then run in the direction of the "haunted field" at the top of her speed. The idea immediately occurred to me, "She is seeking Sedley, to warn him against coming to-morrow night." I followed. It was perfectly dark, but her white dress enabled me to keep her in view. The field was reached. She wandered about, but found no one. She crossed again into the road, I still following as quietly as I could. Suddenly she stopped. She had come upon Sedley walking onwards. She touched him on the back, and he sprang round with a cry of alarm and an oath.

"It is I, Mark—I, Mary. I've had such a run, I can hardly speak; I want to tell——"

"You've followed me, have you? Curse you, body and soul. There," and he felled her to the earth.

"Mark, one word," said the victim, in a voice but little above a whisper. "It was to save——"

"What, you won't cease chattering? There, and there, and he kicked her as she lay. "Now go home."

Great God of Heaven! Through the mouth of that murdering villain was uttered the most merciful injunction which had fallen upon poor Mary Sedley's ear for many a long day—"Go home"—and she went home—to God.

Strong man as I am and was, I had turned sick at the first terrific blow, and before I could cry out the second brutality had been committed. Then I shouted, and rushed forward. Sedley decamped, and I raised Mary, and ran with her, as quickly as I could, back to the cottage. The old servant was still absent. I laid the sufferer on her miserable couch, and leant over her.

She was dead. Terribly reduced and enfeebled as she had been, the violence had completed the tragedy. She was at peace. Her effort to save her husband had resulted in bringing liberty to herself. I threw open the little window, and as I gazed at the bright stars above me, I found myself again and again repeating—

"She is at peace. Thank God, she is gone home."

The old woman returned. I told her all that had taken place, and calmed her grief which, otherwise, would have been awkwardly uproarious, by promising still, sure vengeance on the murderer; at thought of which the devoted servant's eyes glistened, and she promised secrecy and strict obedience to all my commands.

The following night, our inspector of police, one of his men and I set out from the town for the cottage. It was wretched weather. The snow fell fast, the wind blew, and the cold was piercing. We arrived. In the course of the day Mary Sedley had been placed in her humble coffin, and by its side sat Nancy Wrekin watching; more faithful watcher never guarded the dead.

I was arranged that the constable should lie crouched under a hedge outside the cottage, while the inspector and I should remain in the bedroom, leaving only Nancy in the sitting-room, so that Sedley might be fairly in the house at the time of his capture, which would thereby be rendered more easy. Thus we were all placed, rather before nine o'clock, when the constable outside came to tell us that a struggle seemed to be going on a little distance off in the road; but he could only judge by sounds, for the night was so dark he could see nothing at the smallest distance.

The man had scarcely returned to his hiding-place when the door of the cottage opened, and a most unexpected arrival took place. The elder Mr. Sedley made his appearance. I met him as he entered. An alarming spectacle he presented. He was so bedabbled in snow and mud, with patches of blood, as scarcely to be recognizable.

"Good Heavens! Mr. Sedley," I exclaimed. "What, you? And in that state!"

"And you, Mr. Jones? Why, what in the world brings you here? My story is soon told. I have been longer about a journey than I expected, and as I was such a night and late, I was making for your town, intending to sleep there. But you have queer folks about. Coming along the lane, where it was so dark I could not see my hand before me, there fell upon the back of my head an awful blow. I dare-say the villain who gave it me spied, dark as it was, my plentiful crop of white hair, and that encouraged him to try to rob me. But he reckoned wrongly. I'm old, but I'm not weak, and with the aid of 'Finisher' here I'll match any man now."

Here Mr. Sedley exhibited a formidable cudgel, from the knob of which, on the pressing a spring, there started forth three or four little spikes.

"Well, I kept my legs and in a moment my enemy and 'Finisher' had made acquaintance. The scoundrel gave an awful groan and somehow managed to clutch me by the chest, and nearly settled me. However, I rallied, and then judging from his white coat, as well as I could, where his face would be, I brought 'Finisher' down upon him with my utmost strength. I believe it made an end of him. I hope it did. But I treated the villain to a third taste and then I left him."

"Heaven pity the wretch! Why, you must have killed him!"

"Dare say—need the imagine the trouble. But, old lady (to Nancy), if you could furnish me with—I feel a little shaken—but tell me, Mr. Jones, first in whose place am I, that you should be here at this hour?"

Mauled as he had been, I was really sorry to excite him further; but I was so afraid of his violent arriving that I answered at once—

"You are in your son Mark's cottage."

"Lord have mercy upon me! then Mary Sedley lives here—is in that other room, I suppose."

"She don't live here, but she lies in that other room."

"Eh?" he said, puzzled.

"Mr. Sedley" (and I could not help my voice trembling as I spoke), "come in with me and see her."

"No, no, no; I'll do nothing of the sort; I told you I wouldn't before. She'll plague me for assistance, and I'll give her none—not a penny."

"But you told me you would see her."

"I told you I would n't speak the truth, sir. In her coffin, I said, I would see her gladly, but never elsewhere—elsewhere never."

I threw open the door between the tiny rooms.

"Then see her in her coffin!" I cried; and taking advantage of his surprise, I moved him gently into the bedroom.

"My God!" he exclaimed, staggering from the coffin's side, "then she is really dead."

"You have your wish. No doubt you feel your anticipated pleasure. She is dead."

"After all," said the old man, recovering himself, "it is better so. My son is free. You said he was coming here. Why, what is the policeman here for—to watch the carpet?"

"Your son I expect almost immediately," I replied, "but I must tell you, there is no time to withhold; he comes as a felon, and he will go away a prisoner—read this placard."

He had great difficulty in doing it; but he saw enough to cause him to fall back against the wall, and groan in agony. Suddenly he sprang to the coffin.

"And this all through you!" he yelled, with demoniac fury, clenching his fist at the poor clay, and looking, besmeared as he was with blood, like a fiend incarnate. "You, you wretch—you who seduced him; you, who took him from his home, from me; who ruined him; who—What was that?" he asked, in a whisper.

"For the love of God, Mary, open the door," said a faint voice without; "I am dying — some water—some water."

"It is his voice. I know it—I know it," gasped the old man, clutching me by the shoulder. "I have not long thou it," and before any of us he had reached the door and opened it.

"Run away, Mark, run," he shouted. "They are waiting for you. Away for your life."

"He will never run again," said the inspector; and he dragged into the hut a prostrate body which lay outside.

Merciful Heaven! what a sight it was! A man in a long white coat, saturated at the upper part with blood, and his forehead almost undistinguishable from bleeding wounds.

"Lord! Lord!" moaned the wretched being; "I am quite blind now—water—water—I'm dy—dy——" And he died.

Then the little hut, and the country round, rung with shouts of "Mark! Mark! Mark! My son! my son! my son!" for reason left the miserable father, and escaping from our hold, he fled forth into the field, the darkness, the snow, the rain, reckless and mad.

He had slain his son, and in self-defence!

Mary was avenged.

HUMOROUS GLEANINGS.

What is the only wig a barber cannot make? An ear-wig.

When your hair gets into disorder, what heathen deity should it name? Curius.

An Irishman once observed that mile stones were kind enough to answer your questions without giving you the trouble to ask them.

"There, John, that's twice you've come home and forgotten that lard."

"La, mother, it was so greasy that it slipped my memory."

"Who's afraid?" said a young man to himself, in order to screw his courage to the sticking-place.

"Why you are," said the object of his affection, "or you would have taken courage six months ago."

A little girl was told to spell "ferment," and give its meaning, with a sentence in which it was used. The following was literally her answer:

"F-e-r-m-e-n-t; a verb, signifying to work. I love to 'ferment' in the garden."

An eccentric old gentleman, being waited upon with his surgeon's bill, cogitated some time over its contents, and then desired the man who called with it to tell his master that the medicine he would certainly pay for; but as for his visits, he should return them.

Dr. Currie (hot by name and hot by nature), when asked by a particularly inquisitive woman to tell her the precise meaning of the word "idea," about which she had been reading in some metaphysical work, but could not understand it, at last angrily exclaimed,

"Idea, madam, is the feminine of idiot, and means a she-fool!"

A miserly fellow in Brussels gave a large dinner recently. Just as the guests sat down, a piercing shriek was heard in the courtyard. The host hurried out, and returned pale, affrighted and his hands covered with blood.

"What is it?" was the inquiry.

"Alas!" he said, "a poor workman, father of a large family, has met with a terrible accident. He was knocked down by a cart and grievously hurt. Let us aid him."

A collection was made, and the guests contributed some low hundred francs. Poor dupes! It was the miser's ruse to make them pay for their dinner.

A queer excuse was made a few days ago by an old lady. The good woman was subpœnaed to appear as a witness in rather a delicate case. She did not come, and a bench warrant was issued for her appearance, on which she was brought into court. The judge thought it was his duty to reprimand her.

"Madam, why were you not here before?"

"I couldn't come, sir."

"Were you not subpœnaed, madam?"

"Yes, sir, but I was unwell."

"What was the matter, madam?"

"I had an awful boil, sir."

After a pause:

"Upon your honor, madam?"

"No, sir, upon my arm."

A Lady's Invitation to a Walk.—Cir-cum-ambulate.

Motto for a Flogging Schoolmaster.—Semper (h)idem.

An Odd Fellow.—Morpheus, for he is undeniably a Nod fellow.

Height of Sympathy.—When a crew of whalemen cry because they see whales' blubber.

A Serious Question.—What is it probable that sausages are made of, when a cat, at the smell of them, spits and sets her back up.

A Long Shot.—Paris has gone mad over "rifled cannon." The Charivari gives an illustrative drawing. An artilleryman has just fired a rifled cannon. A stranger asks if the ball hit the mark. The artilleryman replies that he will know the day after to-morrow—the ball is too far off to hear sooner.

Never too Late to Mend.—"My dear," said a young wife, returning from a ball, "I have learned one of the most difficult steps!"

"There is a step," replied the husband, "the most valuable of all; but it is one, I fear, you will never care to learn."

"Indeed, what step can that be?"

"It is a step into the kitchen."

Mrs. Partington came up to town to select a guardian for her precocious Ike, and remarked as follows: "How the world has turned about, to be sure!" said she; "it's nothing but change, I anger! Only yesterday, as it were, I was in the country, smelling the odious flowers; to-day I am in this big city, my olfactory breathing the impure exhalations of coal-smoke that are so offensory to hear. In hail of the singing of birds the bumbler busses almost deprive me of consequential uses. Dear me! Well, I hope I shall be resigned through all. They say that the moral turpentine of this city is frightful; but it is of no use to anticipate trouble beforehand: he may escape all harmonious influences that would have a tendency to hurt him; and, as the minister of the parish said, with sufficient training he may become a useful member of society; though training is bad generally, and is apt to make the young run to let like cripple-crowned hens. But he has genus—(looking at him)—it came natural to him, like the measles, and every day it is developing itself more and more."

Vaucanson invented for the performance of Marmontel's "Cleopatra" an asp which hissed itself with a hiss on the bosom of the actress who played the principal character. On the first performance of the tragedy a jester more struck by the hissing of the automaton than by the beauty of the tragedienne, exclaimed, "I am of the asp's opinion!"

THE HAUNTED FIELD;

OR,

Father and Son.

A STORY, ONE-HALF MAN, leaning over a churchyard wall, gazing pensively at a tombstone; in a right resolute old soldier, and a sad, sound, self-satisfied, well-to-do-citizen, who was more the gentleman in a retiring officer under the new poor law.

Boniface accepted it now Mr. Jones one weary afternoon.

"Why, Mr. Jones," hailed, "how poor you look—been up a clause 23rd for yourself, eh?"

"No, sir," he replied. "Where I shall rest my bones is a nut or which never troubles me. I'm looking at poor old Nancy Weekin's grave, to which she's long pointed this nine years."

"A pauper, was she?"

"Yes; but I have not chosen from the commencement of the union."

"Anything peculiar in her case, be-cause you know I'm fond of hearing your little histories."

"Yes, there was something very peculiar."

"Then you will not all about it."

And he walked on further to the town, Mr. Jones breaking into with the following narrative:

We relieving officers always have been, and I take it, always will be, thoroughly hated by the poor. The fact is, they accept our relief with the feeling that they have a right to it, and we are glad to relieve that we can help, and what we do give we would rather withhold. Now, while this applies to the regular or "settled" poor, as they are termed, in strange to the case with the vagrant poor, who merely receive some cold assistance—some bread or a night's lodging—and are sent on their way. Of course, some are, for the most part, a wretchedly degraded set, and often occasion considerable disturbance.

One November afternoon, several years ago, I was sitting in my little inner room in the union office, and my clerk was standing at the door, when there came a large party of ragged, cold, and consequently got on without help —was in the way. Even charitable relief. Suddenly I heard loud talking the next moment, looking through the glass partition, I saw a huge lump of foul and coarse flying betwixt me and my assistant's head. There arose the cry of "Thief!"

"Be able good with you, you hungry."

"I won't g—yes me the money, you villain!"

"You shan't have a farthing, you dreadful creature."

"Then I'll break every pane of glass in the house, and have some fresh air—I'm choking here like a furnace."

"Will you? I'll have you marched off pretty quick, my lady."

Here I made my appearance, and inquired the cause of disturbance.

"I can't make out whether she's tipsy or crazed," replied Mr. Flint, referring to an old woman standing at the door, with a bundle of rags under her arm. "She says she don't want anything for herself, but she must have five shillings for her mistress. Her mistress, forsooth! A pretty game we are coming to. A nice order her servant as the relief office, Mr. Jones, indeed!"

"How could another be of yours?" I demanded the old woman. "If my mistress did anything at the time, was the waste the money, and you give it me, you monster, or I'll tear the place—I'll smash the windows—I'll kill you with sweats," she yelled.

"You're a nice customer," said I. "Be off with you, or I'll send for police."

"I'm not going to let you."

"Then you'll please to walk away."

"No, I won't. I'll please to break the windows," and a pane was demolished as a twinkling.

"Ah, there's no amusing to me," cried I, hastily rising, and entering the a servant was going into a fit," I imagined in anger, but immediately the poor creature slipped from me on to the floor.

She did not reply, for she was in a fit, and double-quick for medicine, though not sure at her wanton mistress. The fit was fearfully removed by the workhouse.

It was dark when I left the union office and crossing to walk to my home which was about a mile out of the town. The last part of my way lay through a little piece of field, which had been left standing in the neighborhood. The ground was very uneven, and I had to walk very carefully that it should not stumble. I had traversed the field on night before, and my eyes, being accustomed to the darkness, I could perceive a white figure moving towards me, I felt an unusual perturbation over great my previous.

It was a woman, all in white, and crying bitterly.

"How, Mr. Jones, this is such an unusual hour for you to be out," I said to myself, and I felt the more surprised at the sight of the woman, evidently very ill and in great trouble. I inferred from her white habiliments that her mistress, of, to seek her some hours before to go into the town. Quickening a little more closely, I discovered her to be the mistress of the isolated old woman who had broken our window. The truth appeared to be, that this sister-of gentlewoman for she was evidently above the common rank), was in a state of utter destitution, and that she and her servant had been living on charity for some time. Their case was completely understood, and they had only been thrown upon their own resources in this neighborhood. The servant had called forth to-day, unknown to her mistress, to obtain relief, having no other resource, of her inquiry and examination requisite before assistance could be given. I further learned that this gentlewoman had a husband, who, five weeks before, had left with only a few pounds in his pocket, to the place from London, intending that he should send for me in a month's time.

"Then you are now expecting him?" said I.

"I am, sir, but I dare not—and so I was given I staggered on though I had been weak.

Wounded! Aye I was wounded. no more shining forth suddenly, re visited to me, I have not seen for years, but never forgotten—never forgiven—and never will be by me this side of the grave.

Mary Leslie and I had both been born on a village not miles hence. Sisted by each other in every respect, I would have made her my wife, but she was the daughter of a poor widow, and I was the son of a wealthy man. He entertained up a very distant relative with the son of a wealthy farmer. The farmer, who was fortune, left of the blame on Mary, and declared he was sinful sinner, who had wronged his son. I knew better. She was young, devoted, and Mark Smiley was a thorough villain.

And this poor love, my plaintiff pale, we were and wastly, was Mary's Son.

"Mary!" I gasped.

Then I looked on her in a moment, and with a will my throw her arms about me. She knew me also. The tale was short—the story soon told. I pleaded, and her love full of wagering. Such neglect, such cruelty, such fiend-ish ingenuity in malfeasance as had been exhibited towards her, such enduring and still-loving wife by her husband, I had never heard of. I was young, with all my experience of life, could not have comprehended. They had been in the depths of poverty, but still through pride or an impression of its probable inability, an application had been made to her husband's father for assistance. Indeed, Mary had written for assistance, and received back the packet from London for this town, giving no reason for the strange command, save that he was going a journey to which she could ask no company him, but that in a month's time he would go with her of my address whereto she should send him at a place he named.

Mary had written to him, and had not heard an words in a couple of two months, days of hard. Some scraps of furniture she had brought for a few shillings of the previous occupant. The woman she had with her was an old servant of her father's, who, when he left home, had left her with child and there was no help possible.

The convicted has deserted her, I thought. "Well, brother on."

We reached the miserable dwelling, and Mary having entered, I hastened to the workhouse, where I obtained a small order for relief, which being hastily conducted on the other side, I to bring her to consent for the broken window required in her my meeting with her mistress and the attendant circumstances, and despatched her to Mrs. Bailey forthwith, desiring her to lay a porter laden with necessaries of life for the night.

I knew the other Mary's child well I was, as she next morning I rose over to the village in which he resided, and told him my painful discovery. His emperment himself very pleased at the probability of seeing his son.

"Ah, Mr. Jones," he said, with warmth, "I already regards my youth as ever tried. Ah, what might he not have been had he not been ruined by that wretched, sinful girl!"

It made me mad to hear him speak thus; but it was not wise to quarrel with him.

"However that may be, sir," I said, "she is your son's wife, and I have said you her residence. Some one must be done for her."

"Do you expect me to do anything for her, Mr. Jones? Now, the poor boy's gone, I have no one to act me as help grow on."

"Certainly I did. Good Heavens, Mr. Smiley, the was your only—would have survived, had I not met her? Come and see her."

"Two. Mr. Jones, I will. When shall it be? Not with you but we know, and I'll come—with pleasure."

"Then I'll call for you," I shrank from the implacable old knave, and returned home.

It was evening when I reached the union office. My assistant was affixing a placard to the notice board outside.

"Here's a thing that has created a hubbub," he said, "and I suppose you don't" he said, and he handed me a copy of the placard.

It announced a highway robbery, committed some fifteen miles off, coupled therewith a description of the fellow, detailed clean particulars of the robber, and offered a large reward for his capture.

"Not much chance of the rascal's escaping," remarked Mr. Hicks.

"Why, here's a complete portrait: 'Slightly pock-marked face; upper lip; nose; one left cheek; very light hair; eyebrows and a beard, which, he'll be taken to, is certainly it."

"Well, I suppose he is," I said, and proceeded to busy myself writing. As I journeyed the to-and descriptive of the to-pet associated rather than as my mind. The reward was considerable, would be very much come to me. Had I ever seen such—many I had seen many such faces. The thing could be no connection. I was gratified to many with the exterior, as I have so formerly, at Mark Smiley. I was accordingly startled, and inquired to this, were there any man who had lately arrested, as follows:

I was in the "business field." On one side of me was a high bank, on the other a low hedge, and on the other side of the hedge, there ran a deadly two people talking. I listened, for the discussion was strange to that place, and at that hour.

"You miserable scoundrel!" was growled in a manner which I knew to be Joseph's. I had not heard it for years, but in a great mind to push my ear over the hedge, you never smiths chatterer."

"Indeed, Mark—" I heard Mary Smiley reply. "I couldn't help it. I was ill—really dying for want of food."

"Dying! you're always been dying! Where's the money, I say?"

"What now? Something! What I'm seeing me, is it? when the night might to make you happier than all quarrel. Now, take care! I only say take care!"

"There, I have done. Now, Mark, you've got the money, let me have it back. Pay, eh? Oh, well, well, only never in all. Now just tell me about those things. Where did you get it? I was to take them?"

"It was a road-mount house Lucy, in Hale's alley—just at the east of the town. You have you want such things, and he'd buy them. He'll ask no questions, and you can get a fair price. I'll come to you, and you'll have the money ready for me."

"But Mary, where did I find warrant to be entire? I won't not you upon where the notice come from, how do tell me where are you gone to, and how you've been living? Where's Mary and dear Mark, how can I see them?"

"How are you to live, eh? Look you, Mary, my love, if you behave me with any more questions, you shan't know again how I live—I to live. You go and do what you're told, that's enough for you. Now be off, double quick, Mary, I'll write to you. Good night, Mary. I'll have a comfortable visit him all to-night time. I'll see his friend, Mary, you see if I don't."

Then they seemed to separate. I watched about, and saw Mary enter her cottage. I followed her immediately, and knocked at the door.

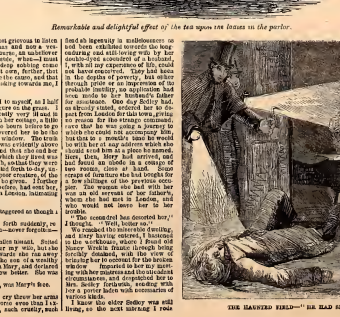
"Who's there?" she inquired, coming into chair; "how have I to-day?"

(Continued on page 93.)

A RECENT INCIDENT.

MISS SPANGLES—" Why, Biddy, how nice this tea tastes! What have you made it with?" (Biddy knows how to make tea, for the Croton being scarce she has made it with rum.)

Remarkable and delightful effect of the tea upon the tissues in the parlor.



THE HAUNTED FIELD—" HE HAD SLAIN HIS SON, AND IN SELF-DEFENCE!"

AQUATIC SPORTS—THE PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL BOAT-RACE, BETWEEN THE CHAMPION ROWERS OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND—PORTRAIT OF HENRY KELLEY, EX-CHAMPION OF THE THAMES AND YARE, WITH SKETCH OF SKELETON BOAT USED IN RACES.

THE PHANTOM WITNESS.

...was on my first overall—both the same size and the criminal paper of the Northampton Assizes were crowded with cases. . had two or three briefs in no great importance, for I was young at the bar, and yet at the Northampton Assizes I was only getting snatchery, nervous, pleasant work—I could not even...I never could think—make out sleep—at times, I could not think. A case was heavy on my soul—I felt weighed down as by a constant nightmare. I had a criminal case on hand. What hour just fifteen days to day, on account of the length of time it was supposed it would occupy, but it was coming on.

A fearful case; a responsibility was extremely present to my imagination, ...had not yet grown callous to human suffering—I could not then contemplate crime, suffering and retribution, with the merely critical eye of an artist in law—and I suffered accordingly.

A young girl—almost a child—her age was at that time—was to be put upon her trial for murder.

Ann Dorcas Heritage was committed for trial by the Northamptonshire magistrates, for the murder of John Adolphus Sexton, an infant, and her own sister's son.

I was retained for the defence.

Day and night—all mail time—in the hours that should have been time of recreation—at times when my other duties should have occupied me, I pondered over this case, and read and re-read the depositions, and toiled mentally still again to look like some wretch with an undiscovered crime rotting heavily upon his heart, and who walked and lived in bodily fear of detection.

Could she be guilty? I had seen her more than once—a mild, gentle, loveable, fair young girl, who did not appear to have more courage to have crushed an offensive fly.

But the evidence?

The evidence was awfully, emotionally against her.

I confess it for the reader. Before an envy-ous court on the occasion of this most remarkable trial, we will glance over the record exhibited against the troubled and ragging prisoner.

There resided on his own property, which comprised a beautiful manor house and park, and a large and productive farm, in the county of Northampton, a gentleman had one only son, whose manifestation of ill had estranged him from friends, relations, and finally from his father. But the father had long made it apparent to the world at large that he had been the best and the only son to whom he had heart to ca-ress him; and it was not till a high way robbery, in which Richard Heritage was unquestionably but a sharer, that Sir Ralph was compelled to tear from his home the one to whom his heart yet strongly clung, and to cast off from his name who has for years garnered up his best affections in a lonely way—Ann!

And so Richard Heritage disappeared, and years passed away, and only now and then came vague rumors that his son was a wanderer about from South America even to which he soon with adventurers at every clime and of every hue.

And Sir Ralph felt that he was getting old and feeble; his wife had been long since to the family vault of the Heritages. He was a lonely man, and it was with a pang of grateful tears that one autumnal evening he read a letter that had reached him from Cuyion, to say that his younger brother Alfred, who had many a long year ago sought that island as a home, with a sickly wife, was no more; and that the two children—orphans; and one a young woman—left brothers, or nearly so, and were coming to the home that they could. Sir Ralph, would give them encouragement to come home.

Sir Ralph Heritage had loved his brother Alfred—a gentle fellow when they had been children, living with mother and their sisters Dorcas.

Twelve years had elapsed, and mother and sis ers were both dead.

The sisters girl, Rachael, had married for love, and by whom she lived and widely sickness means of their union. Rachael, then, was a young widow, with an infant clinging to her for help. Her sister, Ann, it was who wrote in their uncle in Northamptonshire, detailing all those events; and it was that letter which produced the flood of tears we have mentioned from the tear-eyed old knight.

Would there ever be surviving ones and the little child be welcome? Would he open his heart to them? Would he? The very thought of their coming was now life to him, and he was even in vain for the first time in the memory of some of his servants on the day succeeding the receipt of Ann's letter from Cuyion.

Then the answer to that letter was all that could be wished by the sisters we may well imagine. It cost them ample means to come to England, and assured them of a fatherly welcome to Heritage Hall.

The time sped on, and the sisters, with the infant, reached England. They travelled post from Portsmouth to Northampton, and but for the accident of a breakdown of the post-chaise about two miles from Heritage Hall, they would, on a cold, tempestuous day in February, have closed with their uncle.

But a sweet-and the accident was advised to take, since it involved a very hilly district, the chaise encountered a mere front of a tree, which, in the dim twilight, was not observed until too late; and then a bolt so dislocated the machinery of the chaise that it was impossible to proceed further with it, and the party were fain to take shelter for the night at a roadside inn, named the Wheatsheaf.

The rain came down in torrents, and the wind howled through some neighboring copses, as if presaging, by its dismal tones, unheard-of evils to the unfortunate travellers then benighted in their journey.

The uncle's best room—it took the trouble to thoroughly to examine it, in the interests of my young clients—was sketchy to the extreme. It had two beds in it, and there was, down the centre, a huge crack in the floor, which, in an emergency, would convert the apartment into two.

It was into this room, then, at ten o'clock, on the wild spring evening, that the two sisters, with the infant, were ushered.

The rain rushed and beat against the two latticed windows as though to overwhelm was the whole and sole object of the storm; and the wind struck the large sloping roof of the house with such force as to make the more timorous ones believe that the roof would soon be at work in some and fashion above their heads.

The result was that the ill-opposed an affected more than usual, and cleared in the late confidence, and threatened such symptoms to relapse, as that they hastened to rest.

And there was the genus starving cares, the kind "Good night all" the "God bless you, Annie!" and "God bless you, Rachael!" and the little one was kissed and commended to the protection of the Almighty, and the sisters were left alone.

Some time the could not sleep, there was a position of nurse, and neither Ann called sob, "Rachael, Rachael! what is it? Why are you crying, when we are going to be happy?"

"I cannot help it, Annie! My heart is heavy—is very heavy! And yet how many we have to be thankful for, in the kindness of our uncle, who promises to make Heaven (the infant Alfred) our home!

And the Annie laughed and spoke as nothings, to calm her sister's spirits.

"To be sure, Rachael and I go to the well, and shall not get a husband and encourage of your little Ernest, when I fully intend to make uncle Ralph have no everything. Come now, go to sleep. Good night."

"Good night, dear!"

"Good night!"

This little dialogue was overheard by the sundry of the cum was nothing to hear, but it appeared on the depositions against the prisoner, and was a matter in favor of blood.

The sister slept.

The little Ernest slept on his sleep on the breast of his mother.

The rain still came down in torrents, and the wind still howled around the old inn. One o'clock had just been proclaimed by the old sad-dolorous clock in the bar, when sundry, landlord, a lumbermen and hostler were all aroused by such a succession of varying strokes, from the room occupied by the sisters, that they were all startled from their sleep, and thought that the house was being pressed by an armed soldier down by pressure and with the cry that the fight that was still burning in the basement of the inn, and that the house was on fire in the upper rooms.

The night that met they open was a terrible one. It was one that has prevented the no-one roseate inn into a melancholy room, for no one would sleep in it again.

The door of the chamber was wide open, and Rachael, the mother of the infant boy, was lying lifeless at the foot of the room on her face. Anna was sitting up in bed, looking scared and horrified; not seemingly not conscious than her hands, face, and the clothing about her, were blood-stained and dabbled.

"Murdered! murdered!—Murder!"

The landlord called loud for help!

Assistance, who had arrived, was on foot at the inn some hours after the sisters, and who had given his name as Mr. B—n, hurried along an access corridor, at the further end of which he slept, broke open the door.

"God Heavens!" he said, "what is the matter?"

Then the landlady uttered a terrible cry; and then, between the bed, on which Anna was, and the well, she killed the infant and murdered body of the little Ernest.

The little one was clutched in the heart with a red ornamental paper-knife.

The sisters had been robbed at Liverpool, or on board the vessel from Cuyion, of a trunk, in which the principal part of their wealth have been. But now few remained.

It could belonged to Anne, and she bought it at Colombo

She was the case.

In her recovery from a swoon, which lasted many hours, Rachael made the following statement. Soon after the little conversation we have recorded with her sister, she had gone to sleep with the infant in her arms, but sudden her restless and startled unconsciously she had easily withdrawn her from him, and had been persuaded that he slept soundly.

How long she had remained in sleep she knew not; but what awakened her was a faint kind of sensation that felt certain was the hot sound uttered by little Ernest in life. It seemed for on the moment to her that the pressure of the child was not with her, and mechanically put to bother of the room, which she dying upon.

She spoke no remarkable statement from Rachael. I give it in her own words.

On opening her door, I saw there was some light below (that was the oil lamp in the passage) that came up a strong reflection on the wall of the corridor, which was to the right hand. I thought that reflection, passing along it, as if stooping to avoid it, if possible, I saw the shadow of a man, large, and not very well defined, owing to its exaggerated dim-ness; but I saw the shadow of a man, and I passed away into the grass on the further end of the corridor and disappeared."

Awesome, then, by terror of the know not what, Rachael fell into the swoon in which she was used by the people of the inn.

Such was the statement of the half-distracted mother on the examination before the Northampton magistrates for her sister Anna, whose indictment of the murder of the child she declared herself as thoroughly satisfied of as of the existence of heaven.

Both Heritage was committed, and the sisters completely consumed h'm that, although Sir Ralph Heritage was out of his chair, and the sheriff was engaged in an house, where he took to the bail, he would not accept it, and that the prisoner would ever rise again.

Several of the women at the bar had shrunk from undertaking the defence of Anne Heritage, as the case was brought to me. I took it, and from the moment I did so I felt a conviction that there was some fearful mystery in it, which, unless concealed, would leave the youthful accused to be infamously murdered.

So I thought and pondered over the affair until I was afraid that my own mind would get into a state of abnormal condition, and I should be unable to do what human means could be for Anne Heritage.

The law but once before the trial. I shall never forget the mournful which she seized on me as I left my study door last night, saying, "They will im-ne, sir; but heaven knows that I am innocent! Oh, you will bring back to your Rachael her lit-ther dear, dear little lamb!—I should be glad to die; but as it is, I am very, very young to be murdered!"

Poor girl! my last task. I pressed her hand in mine, and my gagged out some common-place expression of hopeful consolation, and then I left her.

The case was fearfully strong against her. There was but one supposition in her favor.

The Alsatian—the phantom-like form seen by the soldier—who was he? Was it like Mr. Brown? Was and which was he? I framed him in my mind's eye, and could not match him. It all came to nothing. He was a commercial traveller for a house at Marseilles, and was supposed is trying to do business at North-ampton.

Several did succeed, to whom I wrote, but they were all out of town, and the chance upon by Rachael was either an orphan all-ill, his merely and by her to be seen to screen her sister, or was the work of her imagination, or the wretched relative of some of the people of the inn, who, blamed by her sister, were swearing in the hope.

The day of the trial arrived. The morning of the trial came, and, full of anxiety as I was, it came as positive relief to me. The Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer presided. He was a calm, neighboured judge, who never permitted his own ...ejudices—as some of his successors have done—to sway either law or justice; and soon what might of the matter, I knew the young prisoner would have a fair trial.

The court was crowded in every. A positive disturbance at the door attended the commencement of the proceedings for a full half hour, and it was only quelled by force.

The attorney-general had come down from London to prosecute on behalf of the crown, and the counsels' seats were so closely packed that no one could get between them to engage in the case.

The jury looked grave and half frightened.

The prisoner was pale and more reproachful than usual, and as for me, I felt sick at heart. And when the usual by-bled or both that prevailed the court let me know that the trial was about to commence, I felt as if my heart, it was since five minutes before I could muster up courage to look at her.

How pale, how wan, and yet how beautiful she looked!

Her fair hair was dressed in the most simple style possible, and she wore a dress of grey silk, which fitted closely around the neck, terminating in a narrow ruched frill. Her lips trembled, and her gentle eyes seemed to shrink behind their shrunken lashes as she met the gaze of friend and of foe in that crowded court—that is, if one so young, so fair and so innocent, could have a foe in it.

I could see the judge taking a long look at her beneath his bent-down brows, and then he rested his head on his hands and appeared in deep thought.

The attorney-general issued a scrap of paper over to table to me. It contained these words:

"The witness Brown has absconded—make what use of the fact you can."

I nodded gratefully, and I felt he would only just do his duty against the prisoner.

Then there was a strange half-sigh, half hush all through the auditory, and a lady in deep mourning came into the court.

It was the harassed mother. She went direct to the front of the dock, where was her sister enveloped in an dreadful a charge, and she bent over the front of it, with both her arms extended, as she cried,

"Dear, dear Anna, God bless you and prove your innocence, as I feel it!"

Anna was overcome by this, and she burst into a shrieking passion of sobs and tears. The sisters could only just embrace their arms together, and then Rachael resumed for some few moments until the judge said, in a deep, sad voice, "The court has been resumed in the case.

The clerk of arraigns, in a high, cracked, indifferent voice, proceeded to call the witnesses, and the prisoner stood at the dock in a chair that came on her feet beneath the dock.

Four counsel positions seemed wholly to have given way. Her fair face was hidden in her hands, and resting on the front of the bar.

It was a fashion to place a row of ornamental herbs on the bar before the prisoner in those days, and many there to insist, and sense of Queen, watered by her tears, fell upon her sister's lap as she sat beneath.

The first witness called was the landlord of the inn, who gave a full account of the events as narrated.

Anna did not move. The poor girl had not heard the question - has her sister rose, and in a mild, clear voice, said:

"She is not guilty, sir. He was my little one. He is in Heaven now; and if you take her life she will go to him sooner than I, on to that the judge. She is not guilty, sir."

The judge smiled, she just had by this time seized Anna by the arm, and whispered to her, when she looked up, hastily, and said—

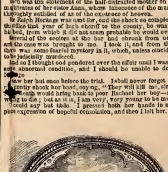
"Oh, no, sir, no, no! thousand times no!"

"The plea is 'Not guilty'" said the judge. "Be calm he."

The attorney-general rose.

The court was hushed. I never took my eyes off his for one moment while he spoke.

THE PHANTOM WITNESS—"IT IS HEAVEN'S TESTIMONY!"—THE PHANTOM WITNESS! I KNOW IT WELL! THERE IS THE SCOUNDREL'S SHADOW!"



THE OAXA HONDURAS OPAL.—SEE PAGE 90.

THERE A WELL! NEW AND IMPROVED ROCKING CHAIRS.—SEE PAGE 90.

"My lord and gentlemen of the jury the prisoner at the bar, Anne Bonney, by name, stands indicted by the name of Anne Bonney, &c., &c., for that she, on &c., &c., in the night time, &c., &c., upon the high seas, &c., &c., with force and arms, &c., &c., in and upon one John Rackam, in the peace of God and our Lord the King then and there being, &c., &c., feloniously, wilfully, and of her malice aforethought, did make an assault, and that the said Anne Bonney, then and there, &c., &c., with a certain cutlass of the value of one penny, which she the said Anne Bonney then and there had and held in her right hand, &c., &c., the said John Rackam, then and there, &c., &c., did strike, cut, and wound, giving to the said John Rackam, then and there, &c., &c., with the cutlass aforesaid, one mortal wound in and upon the left side of the belly of the said John Rackam, of the length of three inches and of the depth of three inches, of which said mortal wound the said John Rackam then and there instantly died, &c., &c., and so the jurors say upon their oath that the said Anne Bonney, him the said John Rackam, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of her malice aforethought, did kill and murder, &c., &c., against the peace of God and our said Lord the King, his crown and dignity, &c., &c."

(Continued on page 95.)

A ROCKING CHAIR WITHOUT ROCKERS.—The "receptive" Rocking Chair is sold by Terry & Wells, No. 335 Broadway, stand alone, and will not rock without rockers. They are made in all sizes, from an infant of the nursery size to the full grown man in parlours and counters, and per cent a complete appearance. Having been received only a few days ago by a cargo, and the stock not rapidly sold, we apprise all our advertising friends of the fact, that we have very convenient for handling them. Each chair is very comfortable, and they have been found very satisfactory as a library or writing chair, from the facility of the change of position, they relieve the fatigue of a long continued sitting posture, and the chair can be as a present to an aged personally invalid friend. The chairs are sold with rockers, which were capable as injuriously, and are every one may, in the one great feature of both new inventions.

Affection of the Throat.

FROM THE REV. S. J. P. AN-DERSON, Pastor of the Cumberland-street Church, Brooklyn.—"Since the first use of your Brown's Bronchial Troches or Lozenges, when compelled to preach through suffering my cold, they are very useful in relieving the throat, and I have frequently recommended them to public speakers of my acquaintance."

"I heartily unite in the above recommendation."—Rev. M. Schafer, Pastor of Christ Church, Brooklyn.

Sold by all Druggists throughout the country at 25 cents per box.

160 Pages Complete. Price 10 Cents.

Cloth, $1 00 Paper, 50 Cents.

BEADLE'S

Dime Biographical Library No. 1.

CONTAINING

THE ONLY COMPLETE AND RELIABLE

Life of GARIBALDI,

The Washington of Italy.

Complete in the form of

THE NEAPOLITAN CAMPAIGN, 1860.

Sent, postpaid, on receipt of 10 cts.

For sale at all News Depots.

BEADLE & CO., Gooney-line Book Publishers,
141 William St., New York.

For the Holidays.

BLAIR & WYETH'S

CONCENTRATED

Flavoring Extracts for Culinary Purposes.

We make the following Extracts for flavoring Ices and Desserts, which may be relied on for convenience and excellence, viz.:

GINGER, NUTMEG, ALMOND,
RED PEPPER, CLOVES, ESSENCE
VANILLA, ROSE, CELERY,
ALMOND, ORANGE, &c.

A trial only is necessary to be convinced of their superiority. They will be found of economical strength, by the account of their purity, to be quite as cheap as necessary to hand in the market.

Sold by all dealers in spices and confectionery in the trade.

Manufactured by BLAIR & WYETH, Philadelphia, for the trade of WILLIAM FRAZER & CO., No. 34 Broadway, New York. 956-62

VENTRILOQUISM.—Full instructions how to acquire this art in a few hours sent to any address for 3 dols. J. F. JACKSON, Canton, N. Y.

Special Notice.

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

REMOVAL.

The rooms now office of this Company has been removed from 64 to 218 BROADWAY, corner of Cedar-st. Between Nassau New York, by Mail—to Albany and Boston, Buffalo for the entire West and Southwest—at 7 A. M., 12 M., 11 P. M., 2:15 P. M., 5 P. M. and 6 P. M. Office open all the Evening and an hour earlier Special mail routes are also made for the safe and speedy delivery of Bullion, &c. &c.

WELLS, FARGO & CO.,
Chief Office 61 Broadway, New York.
Branches at 642 and 144 Broadway. 956-58

Concentrated Leaven

For making

Bread, Tea Cakes,

and

All Kinds of Pastry, &c.,

MANUFACTURED BY

EDWARD CHAMBERLIN & CO.,

Proprietors of Diamond Chemical Works,

No. 33 India St., Boston.

Concentrated Leaven

Is the result of several chemical research. Bread of all kinds raised by this powder is more delicious and nutritious, and especially, instead being, as raw flour is, difficult of digestion, it is the most healthful food for invalids, and the best adapted for those used but seldom to animal food.

SEE DIRECTIONS IN EVERY PACKAGE for making Soda Biscuit, Tea Rolls—Loaf Rye—Brown Bread—Breakfast Cakes—Sponge Cake—Soft Gingerbread—Plain Cake—Rich Cake—Plum Pudding—Delicate Pudding—Indian Pudding—Apple Dumplings—Apple Fritters—Rice Cake—Sponge Cake—Indian Cake—and every variety of Pastry.

For sale by Grocers & Bros, 59 North Front St., Philadelphia; Wm. H. Hayward & Co., 53 South St., Baltimore; and by all the principal Grocers in the country.

EDWARD CHAMBERLIN & CO., Agents,
No. 33 India St., New York.

265

A-thar's Home Mag-zine,

FOR sale by all the News Agents. Price 15 cts. a number. January number now ready. 215-66

SECRET OR NO SECRET.—I will send, on receipt of 25 cts., a recipe that will positively, by its action, restore any hair, which has not roots destroyed by age, to its original color. It will also cause to render the most bristly whisker as soft as silken hair. Address T. HILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia, Pa. 956-58

Private Rooms for Dying Hair and Setting Hair at BOCLE'S Hairdress, Factotum and Perfumery Warehouse, 44 Washington-st., Boston. Instantaneous Dye, producing no stain, and not to be washed off. Sample packages sent by express. 956-58

Dr. TWEEDY MADE EASY.—Or, How to Write a Lady.—Containing plain, common-sense directions for writing letters of introduction, correspondence of any kind, and on love, what, or upon courting, or otherwise. By a man who, by observation, has come to possess a pretty fair inkling concerning the matter. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 25 cents. Address T. HILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia, Pa. 956-58

Pianofortes.

A. H. GALE & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND WAREROOMS,

197 East Twenty-Second, N. Y.

Holloway's Pills

ARE the most searching remedy for deeply seated and long standing internal diseases ever out. They are composed of the most powerful vegetable aperients that can be combined with safety to the constitution, and are recommended to the afflicted as the best Pill ever offered to the public. Sold by all Druggists, at 25 cts., 62 cts. and $1 per box.

THE HERALD OF TRUTH.

Rev. RUFUS W. CLARK, Editor.

SPECIMENS FREE.

Specimen Copies of the HERALD OF TRUTH, an even gospel weekly paper, published at New York city, are ordered to be sent gratuitously to those. The paper publishes, in the interest of the Gospel, the Views and Movements of the Churches, and of all branches of the Evangelical Church, of the country and Europe, besides about 10 columns of other religious reading, by eminent Clergymen. Terms—$2 per annum; 100 copies, &c.

Address THE HERALD OF TRUTH, 218 Fulton-st., New York.

Write for a Specimen Copy, and address HERALD OF TRUTH, 218 Fulton St., New York. Vol. 3 begins Jan. 4, 1861. 956-63

Just the Article Wanted.

I AM NOW MANUFACTURING

A Good Family Sewing Machine for $30.

LIBERAL COMMISSION TO AGENTS.

Address R. THOMPSON, No. 5 Haymarket Square, Boston. 956

RHEUMATISM, NEURALGIA AND GOUT,

Permanently cured by Dr. LELAS'S ANTI-RHEUMATIC BANDS, which in many instances the worst sufferers immediate relief from pain, and in a few days effect a cure. Sent by mail. Price $3.

G. SMITH & CO.,
No. 625 Broadway, N. Y. 956

The Best Piano Instructor.

RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD

For the Pianoforte, with the new Instrumental Lessons, is universally acknowledged to be the best work of the kind ever published. Over 1,000,000 have been sold. Many Music Teachers and Professors in the City and country have recently become the only system or some time, generally used. Terms for examination, which will be sent, prepaid. Published by LIVEY, LEYDON & CO., Boston.

Sands' Sarsaparilla

WILL PURIFY THE BLOOD,

Promote a healthy circulation, strengthen the functional organs of digestion, and give a glowing state of health. Prepared by A. SANDS, Druggist, 100 Nassau-st., N. Y. 956

STAR OF THE

1861.

"GREAT IN WORTH OF WHITE GOOD."

The New York Mercury

FOR THE NEW YEAR.

In accordance with a time honored custom, the publishers of the NEW YORK MERCURY, the largest two-cent literary weekly in the world, make the opening of a New Year the occasion for issuing a complete index prospectus of the contents for 1861.

Although the patronage of the weekly press (being now in its twenty-third year), the MERCURY leaves with the first and viper of youth, as well as with the wisdom and dignity of mature years. Presenting, as it does, the entire details of current occurrences in short with the entertaining magazine of the great events of romance in the world—literature in the brilliant wit and humor of the choicest gems of the time—abundantly garnished with the rarest gems of native poetry—and dealing with "though a lit to amuse and much to instruct," it stands the great exhibitor of its name contributed to it, and because all over the country for its perfect adaptation to the use of a colonist to make or repress the most extensive domestic circle of people. It is here for perfect family, at the price, to every household—one quarter of hundreds of thousands of American homes.

The publishers and proprietors of the New York MERCURY have made the matter of its columns.

If we shall prove Genius wing his rapid flight, Rich deeds as shining from his shame of light."

and during the present year (1861) its grand, inimitable corps of writers—author unfold more around the hall of time point to the President and Vice President of the United States would be brilliant constellations of literary speculation will be materially reinforced. Thus, one of the prospectuses now appearing in that of the wits, waggish, quaint, whimsical, world-renowned and poignant

G. K. FHLANDER DUNSHEE, P. B.,

who contributes to the Mercury a side-split a series of humorous sketches, entitled Letters, Interviews, Rolling Articles, Collections of Fanciful, Flops, Pictures, &c., under a general and quaint nom de plume of "Phunnibee Lorenzo," a Messenger Boy at the Store."

The New York Dispatches are for the excellent illustrations of that prince of American artists, FELIX O. C. DARLEY.

Throughout the present year, this magnificent and famous Journal of American literature will contain glorious books from Sketch, Story, Poem, Gem of Epic, Song, Moral and Descriptive, Criticism, &c., by the most noted American and foreign writers, who have been engaged at great expense to write for the Mercury. We may name the following regular contributorial force:

G. P. MORRIS, COUNTY HAY CARLETON,
SIDES, F. B., DR. J. H. ROBINSON,
ARTHUR H. GRAINGER, A. B. DURAN,
DAVID H. BARBER, REV. M. E. ROBINSON,
FELIX O. C. DARLEY, J. A. VATTIN,
GRACE GARDENER, REV. R. S. HELCH,
GEORGE ARNOLD, W. G. EATON,
REV. R. B. BRYAN, GEORGE MASHAL,
REV. SUNDERLAND, HARLEY TUNG,
REV. H. SLACK, R. H. LOCKE.

Other celebrated writers will also contribute, making the Mercury a great focus of all that is Entertaining, Instructive, Witty and Wise.

Our special New YEAR'S GIFT to our readers will be a brilliant new novelette, entitled

CATHOLINA;

OR,

THE NICHE IN THE WALL.

A TALE OF LOUISIANA.

BY DR. J. H. ROBINSON.

The opening chapters of which will appear in the Mercury for January 5, 61.

The New York Mercury is sold by all Newsmen and Periodical Dealers in America. Its subscribers are supplied by mail at every Saturday morning, for $1 a year; three copies for $2, six copies for $3, eight copies for $4, with an extra copy free to the getter-up of the club. For specific terms, see reverse. Always write plainly the name of your Post-Office, County and State. We make terms to all agents, and keep books of same. Payment must invariably be made in advance.

Specimen Copies sent free to all applicants.

Address all letters and communications, postpaid, to

CALDWELL, S UTHWORTH & WHITNEY,
Proprietors of the New York Mercury,
256-57 40 and 42 Ann St., New York City.

Perfumes! Perfumes! Perfumes!

669 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The most delightful and pleasant Spirit and dry Perfumes for the present season, comprising the fragrance of the choicest sprig bokets, &c., as well as the most approved Bouquets.

MURRY VENDOR, MISS MC QUICK,
PARTAY GEM, WASHINGTON MASSOY,
And Other Choice Perfumes.

Also CONCENTRATED FLAVORING EXTRACTS for Pastry, Confectionery.

Ladies Patronage, the most respectfully invited by the undersigned lately, my choice Stock. CHARLOTTE RUSSE, CREAM CAKE, LADIES, the healthiest cake for Grooms and Brides.

To be had, wholesale and retail, at No. 669 Broadway, New York. EUGENE MURRY.
956-62 Late of the Astor House.

OFFICE

FOR THE SPECIAL TREATMENT OF

DYSPEPSIA-INDIGESTION,

48 East Twelfth Street,

(Near Broadway),

DR. BUTGER FOOTE.

SYMPTOMS.—Pains in the Stomach and Sides, Paleness and Sickness of the Face, Acidity of the Stomach in the Pit of the Stomach, particularly after eating Acidity—Sour Risings, Heartburn, Nausea, Vomiting, Loss of Appetite, Sour Belches, Heartburn, Loss of Appetite, Constipation and Costiveness, Pain in the Head, Dizziness, Drowsiness, Dimness of Vision, Low Spirits, Nervousness, Blues, &c.

Palpitation of the Heart—Frightful Difficulty of Breathing, Pain in the Left Breast, Cough—Coughing and Spitting Blood in the pit of the Stomach; Pains in the Back, Side and Limbs, Sudden Flushes of Heat, Chilliness, Shortness, Sleeping in the Head.

Dr. BUTGER FOOTE, Dyspeptic Physician, Nervousness, Trembling, Irritability, Nervous Dread, Hysterics, Paralysis, Epilepsy or Fits, Nervous Headache, Diseases of Women, Involuntary Discharges, Impotency, Diseases of the Urinary Organs, &c., &c.

DR. FOOTE (late of Boston), is prepared to cure your disease in the shortest time. Upon the receipt of a letter containing name and address you can procure it by mail, or express, with full directions for use. Dr. FOOTE has had many years experience in the treatment of the above diseases, and has cured thousands of cases that had been given up as incurable by other physicians.

Persons in remote parts of the country can be cured at home by addressing Dr. FOOTE, and strictly following his directions.

Persons in the city can be treated at their residence.

Terms—Consultation, $5.

Dr. FOOTE, 48 East Twelfth Street, (Near Broadway), New York.

L. DUBERNET & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

Passe-Partouts and Fancy Frames,

544 Broadway, between Spring and Prince Sts., New York.

Agents for Goupil, Bland, Walmsley and Colt Frames always on hand. 956

L. DUBERNET, J. DUBERNET.

600

335 EMPIRE 335

SEWING MACHINE.

PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.

SALESROOM, NO. 335 BROADWAY.

The Empire Sewing Machine is unlike any other in principle of its action. It produces the best and most reliable seam in use, alike on both sides. It is simple in its construction, durable in its operation, and perfectly reliable and free from liability to get out of order.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of tucking.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of quilting.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of gathering.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of hemming.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of felling.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of braiding.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of cording.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of binding.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of fancy work.

It is the only machine that will do a good job of everything required in family sewing.

It is the only machine that will do a good job on all kinds of work, from the finest muslin to the heaviest cloth

TADMAN'S CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE, for Chapped Hands and Lips, requires no artificial heat in applying it, as it dissolves readily when applied to the skin, cures in a few hours, and makes the skin delicately soft and white. Observe, the color is YELLOW, and the name, "CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE."
TADMAN & CO., DRUGGISTS,
268 Fourth av. and 4 Bleecker st. By mail 25 cts.
65-67

THE PEOPLE'S GREAT BOOKS.

20,000 Copies Already Sold.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES;

BY ROBERT JENNINGS, V. S.,

Professor of Pathology and Operative Surgery in the Veterinary College of Philadelphia, Professor of Veterinary Medicine in the late Agricultural College of Ohio, Secretary of the American Veterinary Association of Philadelphia, &c., &c.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES, although but Two Months issued from the press, has already received the unqualified approval of upwards of TWENTY THOUSAND purchasers, and is, undoubtedly, the most complete and reliable work on the Horse ever published. It tells you of the Origin, History and distinctive traits of the various breeds of European, Asiatic, African and American Horses, with the physical formation and peculiarities of the animal, and how to ascertain his age by the number and condition of his teeth; also of Breeding, Breaking, Stabling, Feeding, Grooming, Shoeing, and the general management of the horse, with the best modes of administering medicine; also, How to treat Biting, Kicking, Rearing, Shying, Stumbling, Crib Biting, Restlessness, and other vices to which he is subject, with numerous explanatory engravings.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you of the causes, symptoms and treatment of Strangles, Sore Throat, Distemper, Catarrh, Influenza, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, Pleurisy, Broken Wind, Chronic Cough, Roaring and Whistling, Lampas, Sore Mouth and Ulcers, and Decayed Teeth, with other Diseases of the Mouth and Respiratory Organs; also, of Worms, Bots, Colic, Strangulation, Stony Concretions, Ruptures, Palsy, Diarrhœa, Jaundice, Hepatirrhœa, Bloody Urine, Stones in the Kidneys and Bladder, Inflammation and other diseases of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Urinary Organs.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you the causes, symptoms and Treatment of Bone, Blood, and Bog, Spavin, Ring-Bone, Sweenie, Strains, Broken Knees, Wind Galls, Founder, Sole Bruise and Gravel, Cracked Hoofs, Scratches, Canker, Thrush and Corns; also, of Megrims, Vertigo, Epilepsy, Staggers and other diseases of the Feet, Legs and Head; of Fistula, Poll Evil, Glanders, Farcy, Scarlet Fever, Mange, Surfeit, Locked Jaw, Rheumatism, Cramp, Galls, Diseases of the Eye and Heart, &c., &c., and how to manage Castration, Bleeding, Trephining, Roweling, Firing, Hernia, Amputation, Tapping and other surgical operations.

THE HORSE AND HIS DISEASES tells you of Rarey's Method of Taming Horses; how to Approach, Halter or Stable a Colt; how to accustom a horse to strange sounds and sights, and how to Bit, Saddle, Ride and Break him to Harness; also the form and law of WARRANTY. The whole being the result of more than fifteen years' careful study of the habits, peculiarities, wants and weaknesses of this noble and useful animal.

The book contains 384 pages, illustrated by nearly One Hundred Engravings, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or, in cloth, extra, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men everywhere, in selling the above, and other popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

60,000 Copies Sold.

THE FAMILY DOCT ;

CONTAINING

SIMPLE REMEDIES, EASILY OBTAINED, FOR THE CURE OF DISEASE IN ALL FORMS,

BY

Prof. Henry S. Taylor, M.D.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR has reached the enormous sale of SIXTY THOUSAND copies, and wherever known is universally approved, both by the Faculty and others. In plain language, free from medical technicalities, it tells you how to attend upon the sick, and how to cook for them; how to prepare Drinks, Poultices, &c., and how to guard against infection from Contagious Diseases; also, of the symptoms of Fever and Ague, and Bilious, Yellow, Typhus, Scarlet and other Fevers, with the best and simplest remedies for their cure.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR tells you of the various Diseases of Children, and gives the symptoms of Croup, Cholera Infantum, Colic, Diarrhœa, Worms, Scald Head, Ringworm, Chicken Pox, &c., with the best and simplest mode of treatment; also, of Teething, Convulsions, Vaccination, Whooping Cough, Measles, Influenza, Consumption, Dyspepsia, Asthma, Dropsy, Gout, Rheumatism, Lumbago, Erysipelas, Cholera Morbus, Malignant Cholera, Smallpox, Dysentery, Cramp, Diseases of the Bladder, Kidneys and Liver, and gives the best and simplest remedies for their cure.

TAYLOR'S FAMILY DOCTOR tells you of the symptoms of Pleurisy, Mumps, Neuralgia, Apoplexy, Paralysis, the various Diseases of the Throat, Teeth, Ear and Eye; Epilepsy, Jaundice, Piles, Rupture, Diseases of the Heart, Hemorrhage, Venereal Diseases and Hydrophobia, and gives the best and simplest remedies for their cure. The best and simplest treatment for Wounds, Broken Bones and Dislocations, Sprains, Lockjaw, Fever Sores, White Swellings, Ulcers, Whitlows, Boils, Scurvy, Burns and Scrofula. Also, of the various diseases peculiar to women, and the best remedies for their cure, together with many hints for the preservation of the health

The book is printed in a clear and open type, illustrated with appropriate engravings, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or in substantial leather binding, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men everywhere, in selling the above, and other popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

150,000 Copies

Everybody's Lawyer

AND

COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS.

By Frank Crosby, Esq.,

MEMBER OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS IS the only correct Law and Form Book ever published that is equally adapted to all the States, and indorsed by over 150,000 purchasers. Old and imperfect works of a similar name, but much inferior character, have been foisted upon the public in place of this, and much dissatisfaction caused thereby. Give strict orders for FRANK CROSBY'S book, as published by John E. Potter, of Philadelphia, and refuse all others, or, what is better, send all orders direct to the publisher. It tells you how to draw up PARTNERSHIP PAPERS, BONDS and MORTGAGES, AFFIDAVITS, POWERS OF ATTORNEY, NOTES and BILLS OF EXCHANGE, and gives general forms for AGREEMENTS of all kinds, BILLS OF SALE, LEASES, PETITIONS, RECEIPTS and RELEASES.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the LAWS for the COLLECTION OF DEBTS, with the STATUTES OF LIMITATION, and amount and kind of Property EXEMPT FROM EXECUTION, in every State; also, how to make an ASSIGNMENT properly, with forms for COMPOSITION with CREDITORS, and the INSOLVENT LAWS of every State. The legal relations existing between GUARDIAN and WARD, MASTER and APPRENTICE and LANDLORD and TENANT; also, what constitutes LIBEL and SLANDER, and the laws as to MARRIAGE, DOWER, the WIFE'S RIGHT IN PROPERTY, DIVORCE and ALIMONY.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the Law for MECHANICS' LIENS in every State, and the NATURALIZATION LAWS of this country, and how to comply with the same; also, the Law concerning PENSIONS, and how to obtain one, and the PRE-EMPTION to PUBLIC LANDS. The Law for PATENTS, with modes of procedure in obtaining one, with INTERFERENCES, ASSIGNMENTS and TABLE OF FEES; also, how to make your WILL, and how to ADMINISTER ON AN ESTATE, with the law, and the requirements thereof, in every State.

CROSBY'S LAWYER AND COUNSELLOR IN BUSINESS tells you the meaning of LAW TERMS in general use, and explains to you the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Powers of both the General and State Governments; also, how to keep out of Law by showing him to do your business legally, thus saving a vast amount of property and vexatious litigation by its timely consultation.

The book contains 384 pages, and will be forwarded to any address, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1, or in law style, $1 25.

$1.000 A YEAR can be made by enterprising men selling the above popular works of ours. Our inducements to all such are exceedingly liberal.

As these books are unequalled in their mechanical execution, as well as the value of their contents, a certain and rapid sale follows their introduction everywhere.

For single copies, or for terms to Agents, with other information, apply to or address

JOHN E. POTTER, Publisher,
263-66 No. 617 Sansom St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$1.500 PER ANNUM.—Agents Wanted, local or travelling, in every Town and Village in the United States, for the sale of an article on which eighty per cent. profit is realized. For particulars inclose red stamp to Box 101, care B. Lockwood, Broadway Post Office, New York City 264-75

Two Works, Valuable to the Sick or Well.

SENT by mail; no pay expected until received, read and approved.
Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.
1. Six Lectures on the Causes, Prevention and Cure of Lung, Bronchial and Skin Diseases, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to a Hundred Years. 360 pages, 21 engravings. Price 50 cents, in silver or postage stamps.
2. A work on Heart Disease, Palsy, Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Dysentery, Cholera Infantum, Summer Diarrhœa of Children, Cholera and Cholera Morbus, Bilious Cholic, Costiveness, Diphtheria, Sore Throat, Scarlet Fever, Yellow Fever, and the diseases of elderly and old people, with Medical Prescriptions for nine of these diseases. The Prescriptions alone worth $500.

Why we grow Old and what Cures Disease.

168 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. Say which Book you will have, giving Name, State, County and Post Office.
265-68

WORTH HAVING

"The Mine of Wealth."

A Book that instructs how to make one article that three men are making each $15 a day from. Also two articles that are paying persons who travel from $6 to $8 a day. Also four articles that Agents are making from $3 to $5 a day with. The Book also contains 150 other rare and valuable recipes never before made public, some of which cost over $100. Price $1, sent free by mail for the price.
GARRISON & CO., Publishers,
263-74 126 Randolph St., Chicago, P. O. Box 3871.

$40. Parker Sewing Machine, $40.
FIRST CLASS, DOUBLE THREAD,
Rapid and Noiseless, under Patents of Howe, Grover & Baker, Wheeler & Wilson. Agents wanted.
Office, VERNON & CO.,
No. 469 Broadway.

IMPORTANT INVENTION FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.—For particulars address, inclosing stamp, DR. H. HIRSHFIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 438 Broadway, New York 263-71

Miscellaneous.

THE AMALGAMATION OF LANGUAGES.—There is a growing tendency in this age to appropriate the most expressive words of other languages, and after a while to incorporate them into our own; thus the word Cephalic, which is from the Greek, signifying "for the head," is now becoming popularized in connection with Mr. Spalding's great Headache remedy, but it will soon be used in a more general way, and the word Cephalic will become as common as Electrotype and many others whose distinction as foreign words has been worn away by common usage until they seem "native and to the manor born."

'Ardly Realized.

Hi 'ad 'n 'orrible 'eadache this hafternoon, hand I stepped into the hapothecary's, hand says hi to the man, "Can you hease me of an 'eadache?" "Does it hache 'ard?" says 'e. "Hexceedingly," says hi. Hand upon that 'e gave me a Cephalic Pill, hand 'pon me 'onor it cured me so quick that I 'ardly realized I 'ad 'ad an 'eadache.

☞ HEADACHE is the favorite sign by which nature makes known any deviation whatever from the natural state of the brain, and viewed in this light it may be looked on as a safeguard intended to give notice of disease which might otherwise escape attention till too late to be remedied, and its indications should never be neglected. Headaches may be classified under two names, viz.: Symptomatic and Idiopathic. Symptomatic Headache is exceedingly common and is the precursor of a great variety of diseases, among which are Apoplexy, Gout, Rheumatism and all febrile diseases. In its nervous form it is sympathetic of disease of the stomach constituting sick headache, of hepatic disease constituting bilious headache, of worms, constipation and other disorders of the bowels, as well as renal and uterine affections. Diseases of the heart are very frequently attended with Headaches. Anæmia and plethora are also affections which frequently occasion headache. Idiopathic Headache is also very common, being usually distinguished by the name of nervous headache, sometimes coming on suddenly in a state of apparently sound health and prostrating at once the mental and physical energies, and in other instances it comes on slowly, heralded by depression of spirits or acerbity of temper. In most instances the pain is in the front of the head, over one or both eyes, and sometimes provoking vomiting; under this class may also be named Neuralgia.

For the treatment of either class of Headache the Cephalic Pills have been found a sure and safe remedy, relieving the most acute pains in a few minutes, and by its subtle power eradicating the diseases of which Headache is the unerring index.

BRIDGET.—Missus wants you to send her a box of Cephalic Glue, no, a bottle of Prepared Pills—but I'm thinking that's not just it neither; but perhaps ye'll be after knowing what it is. Ye see she's nigh dead and gone with the Sick Headache, and wants some more of that same as relieved her before.

DRUGGIST.—You must mean Spalding's Cephalic Pills.

BRIDGET.—Och! sure now and you've sed it; here's the quarther and give me the Pills, and don't be all day about it aither.

Constipation or Costiveness.

No one of the "many ills flesh is heir to" is so prevalent, so little understood, and so much neglected as Costiveness. Often originating in carelessness or sedentary habits, it is regarded as a slight disorder of too little consequence to excite anxiety, while in reality it is the precursor and companion of many of the most fatal and dangerous diseases, and unless early eradicated it will bring the sufferer to an untimely grave. Among the lighter evils of which Costiveness is the usual attendant are Headache, Colic, Rheumatism, Foul Breath, Piles and others of like nature, while a long train of frightful diseases such as Malignant Fevers, Abscesses, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Dyspepsia, Apoplexy, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Hysteria, Hypochondriasis, Melancholy and Insanity, first indicate their presence in the system by this alarming symptom. Not unfrequently the diseases named originate in Constipation, but take on an independent existence unless the cause is eradicated in an early stage. From all these considerations it follows that the disorder should receive immediate attention whenever it occurs, and no person should neglect to get a box of Cephalic Pills on the first appearance of the complaint, as their timely use will expel the insidious approaches of disease and destroy this dangerous foe to human life.

Cephalic Pills, CURE Sick Headache, CURE Nervous Headache, CURE All kinds of Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented; and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Laxative, improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS

The genuine have five signatures of Henry C. Spalding on each Box.

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

All orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING,
48 Cedar St., New York.

PIANOFORTES.

JOHN B. DUNHAM,

MANUFACTURER OF THE OVERSTRUNG

Celebrated Dunham Pianofortes,

GRAND AND SQUARE.

MANUFACTORY AND SHOW ROOMS,

75 to 85 East Thirteenth Street near Broadway,

New York.

ESTABLISHED IN 1834.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five years, and prices are moderate.

ESTABLISHED 1843.

BOGLE'S CELEBRATED HYPERION FLUID overtops everything as the greatest restorer and best dressing for the Hair in the world. Ye who have been deceived by nostrums, try this and be convinced. It never fails. To be had at

W. BOGLE'S

Hairwork, Perfumery and Toilet Store,
202 Washington St., Boston, and for sale everywhere.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau Street, New York.

Nothing But Money.

A NEW SERIAL BY T. S. ARTHUR, is commenced in the January number of ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE, now ready and for sale by all News Agents. Price 15 cents. 265 66

Purify the Blood.

WITH corrupt, disordered or vitiated Blood, you must be sick all over. It may burst out in pimples, or sores, or in some active disease, or it may merely keep you listless, depressed and good for nothing. But you cannot have good health while your blood is impure. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA purges out these impurities and stimulates the organs of life into vigorous action, restoring the health and expelling disease. Hence it rapidly cures a variety of complaints which are caused by impurity of the blood, such as Scrofula or King's Evil, Tumors, Ulcers, Sores, Eruptions, Pimples, Blotches, Boils, St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, Cancer or Cancerous Tumors, Sore Eyes, Female Diseases, such as Retention, Irregularity, Suppression, Whites, Sterility, Syphilis or Venereal Diseases, Liver Complaints and Heart Diseases. Try AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, and see for yourself the surprising activity with which it cleanses the blood and cures the disorders.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL is so universally known to surpass every other remedy for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Influenza, Hoarseness, Croup, Bronchitis, Incipient Consumption, and for the relief of Consumptive Patients in advanced stages of the disease, that it is useless here to recount the evidence of its virtues. The world knows them.

AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS—For Costiveness, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Jaundice, Headache, Heartburn, Piles, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Worms, and in short for all the purposes of a purgative medicine.

Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by Druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.
264-66

Kennedy's Medical Discovery

CURES SCROFULA.

Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Erysipelas.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Canker.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Nursing Sore Mouth.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Humor of the Eyes.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Scald Head.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Running of the Ears.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ulcerated Sore Legs.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Lepra.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Rheumatism.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Salt Rheum.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Dyspepsia.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Bowels.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Kidneys.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Liver.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery has cured Dropsy.

When you are sick, and do not know what the matter is, perhaps you have an inward humor. Try Kennedy's Medical Discovery. For sale by all Druggists.

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S LOTTERIES!

AUTHORIZED BY THE STATES OF

DELAWARE,
MISSOURI
AND
KENTUCKY

Draw daily, in public, under the superintendence of Sworn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington, Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM

$2 50 TO $100,000!

TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $20.

☞ Circulars giving full explanation and the Schemes to be drawn will be sent, free of expense, by addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
OR
WOOD, EDDY & CO., St. Louis, Missouri.

Charles Heidsieck
CHAMPAGNE.

The undersigned have for sale the above popular Wine, for which they are

THE SOLE AGENTS FOR NORTH AMERICA.

The stock they have now on hand is identical to quality with that for which Messrs. CHARLES HEIDSIECK & Co received the first premium at the Bordeaux Exposition of 1859.

It is well known that the Wine Connoisseurs of Bordeaux are the first in the world. In informing the public of the fact that the Charles Heidsieck Champagne took the premium as above mentioned, and by the most preeminent Wine Growers and Merchants of the Champagne District, who had in the exposition samples of their best growths of Champagne, we believe we have announced one of the great merits. The medal conferred by the Judges of the Exposition can be seen at our office.

T. W. DAVIES & RENARD,
No. 109 Pearl St., N.Y.

263e

For the Holidays.

EVERY FAMILY should have one of our Assorted Cases, containing the Finest bottles of fine old Liquor, as follow:

1	Bottle O. P. Brandy,	1	Bottle Madeira Wine,
1	" Hennessy Gin,	1	" Scotch Whiskey,
1	" Port Wine,	2	" Old Bourbon do.,
2	" Pale Sherry do.,	1	" Jamaica Rum,
			Old Belfast Cherry Brandy.

ONLY BY FOR THE ENTIRE CASE,
DELIVERED FREE OF CHARGE.

GREENE & GLADDING, Importers,
No. 82 Cortlandt St., New York. 266e

The Most Useful Holiday Present,
GROVER & BAKER'S
Celebrated Noiseless Sewing Machine.
$40 and upwards. 495 Broadway.
GIVE THE BEST. 266 67e

SKATES FOR ALL KINDS, from 25 cts. to $25, and in fact everything in the Hunting line (except pinfeh) in immense variety, w suit all ages, sexes, tastes and purses. Purse Seines

COLWELL & WALKER'S, Harewood Dealers,
464 Broadway, between Grand and Broome Sts.
266 67e

Ladd, Webster & Co's
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH SEWING MACHINES,
250 Broadway, New York. 266e

A New Six Shooting Cartridge Revolver.
Weighing only 20 ounces.
For sale, wholesale and retail,
By JOSEPH MERWIN, Agent,
267 Broadway, N. Y. 263-66e

Smith and Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STORRS, Agent,
191 Chamber Street, N. Y.

THEIR PISTOL is light, has great force, is sure fire, shoots accurately, can be left loaded any length of time without injury, is not liable to get out of order, is safe to carry. Every Pistol warranted

CAUTION TO DEALERS.

Be sure and get the genuine—Smith & Wesson, Springfield, Mass.—none others genuine. All cartridge revolvers that bear the name are infringements. Suits are commenced, and all such infringements will be prosecuted. Be sure the cartridges have Smith & Wesson's patent on each end of the box. 247-72e

ESENWEIN'S
Tar and Wood Naphtha
PECTORAL

Is the only certain cure for all diseases of the Throat, Chest and Lungs. From the cures that are constantly being made by the use of it, have earned for it the name of the Wonder of the Age. It cures speedily and without fail Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Croup, Whooping Cough, Pulmonary or Bronchial Difficulties, &c. It is pleasant to the taste, and we guarantee it to effect. Its curative powers can be tested by ESENWEIN'S Tar and Wood Naphtha Pectoral Cough Syrup.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS PER BOTTLE.

Prepared only by
DR. J. ESENWEIN & CO.,
Druggists and Chemists,
N. W. corner Sixth and Arch Streets,
PHILADELPHIA.

And sold by every respectable Druggist and dealer in medicines throughout the United States and Canada. 266e

D. APPLETON, CASH & CO.,
Booksellers and Importers,
AND
Publishers and Stationers for Authors,
290½ Washington Street, Boston.
Up but one flight of stairs.
D. APPLETON. J. S. CASH. W. H. GITCHELL.

Sent Free! Sent Free! Sent Free!
NEW and Beautiful Art, for which we want Agents everywhere. Agents make $50 a month. Terms and Specimen sent FREE. Address, with stamp for return postage,
J. C. TODD & CO.,
Newark, New York.

PRAY YOUNG PASSENGER (to portly farmer)—"Now I imagine you consume a precious lot of that —What's-his-name's—food for cattle! That is—ha! ha!—of course—don't misunderstand me—ha! ha!—I mean your cows and horses and things—ha! ha!" (Agricultural grunts and does not appear to see the joke.)

SKATES FOR THE MILLION
From 25 cts. to $20 per Pair,
And everything in the Skating line.

SPORTSMAN'S DEPOT,
494 Broadway, New York.
SKATES GROUND AND REPAIRED.
Wholesale and Retail. 266-67e

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST PURE RYE WHISKEY. 135 Pulton St., Brooklyn. 262-65e

The Singer Sewing Machines.
IN order to place the BEST FAMILY MACHINES IN THE WORLD within the reach of all, we have reduced our LITTLE A, or DARNING NEEDLE MACHINE, beautifully ornamented, to $50.

Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machines, both of very general application and capacity, and popular with the family and manufacturing classes, reduced respectively from $125 and $150 to $95 and $100.

Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine,
For Carriage-makers and heavy leather work. Price, complete, $125.
Also, to complete the list, 00

ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,
excellent for manufacturing purposes; Needles Keys, and capable of every kind of work. Price, complete, with stand and drawers, $150. Circulars of that in which it is used, and the benefit of any other the one or as a gift.
Office, 458 B'dway. J. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway
6666

TRAVELLING AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new and valuable article required in every household. Salary paid or commission allowed. For terms and particulars address, with stamps, J. W. HARRIS, Box 100, Mass. 264-67e

Patented November 1st, 1859.

The tenements are
A, the distance
round the Neck.
B to B, the Yoke
C to C, the Sleeve.
D to D, distance
around the Body
under the armpits
E to E, the length
of the Shirt.

BALLOU'S
Patent Improved French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.
A New Style of Shirt, warranted to Fit.

By sending the above measure per mail we can guarantee a perfect fit of our new style of Shirt, and return by Express to any part of the United States, at $15, $12, $10, $8, $6, $5, per dozen. No order forwarded for less than half a dozen Shirts.

Also Importers and Dealers in MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS.

BALLOU BROTHERS,
1849 NEWSPAPER, 1860.
Wholesale Trade supplied on the usual terms.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,
FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.
For curing and preventing Baldness.
For removing Scurf and Dandruff.
For beautifying and making the Hair soft and curly.
In fact the very safe and effective compound of the kind in use.
Be sure and get the right article.
Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,
Price 25 cents per bottle.
Wholesale Depot, 65 Dey St., New York.
1m,
PROF. J. MILLER'S INSTANTANEOUS LIQUID HAIR DYE
Price 50 cents per box.
Warranted superior to all others.
Try them, and you will acknowledge the fact.

Exposition for the Holidays.
TIFFANY & CO.,
No. 550 Broadway—No. 70 Rue Richelieu Paris,
Respectfully invite the attention of all who anticipate the Christmas and New Year Greetings,
To the unprecedentedly large and varied stock of Jewellery, Silver Ware, Clocks, Bronzes, Porcelains, Fancy Articles, Stores, Leather and Dressing Portfolios, Dressing Cases, Papeteris and Diplomatic Cases, in Morocco, Elong, Bold or Leather, and innumerable basics in the way of

ETRENNES,
now open for the inspection of their Patrons.
The assortment of Jewellery in

DIAMONDS AND PRECIOUS STONES, SET AND UNSET,
is not only more comprehensive in design and costly in material than ever before, but never since offered in the American Public, and contains a choice and general than any single stock in any Old World mart.
The list of

WORKS EXCLUSIVELY ARTISTIC,
Comprise PIECES ORNAMENTAL OF GROVEL IN SILVER, designed in accordance with the finest approaches of art and utility.
BRONZES FOR THE MANTEL, NICHE OR CONSOLE, by Cla ssier, Barye, Fratin, Carrier, Rous Boulenez, Hioe, Monvernier, &c., designed and selected.
NEW BOUDOIR CLOCKS, after Jean Goujon, or on the exquisite Louis Quatorze and Louis Seize forms from the designs of Paul, besides a thousand adaptations from the antique or grotesque conceptions, in the shape of Inkstands Cups, Flower Vases, and Bonbonnes, &c.
In view of the fact that their Patrons inevitably regret the non-arrival of a late shipment of their Holiday Goods, TIFFANY & CO. would respectfully invite the instant favor of an early call. 266 67e

A. Rumrill & Co.,
264 BROADWAY.
THE RIGHT KIND OF A PRESENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
One of these fine, enjoined and chronometrically-rated three-quarter plate American Watches of the new series made by the

American Watch Company,
OF WALTHAM, MASS.
The finest and most durable time-keepers ever made. For sale only by A. RUMRILL & CO., at manufacturers' prices, by
A. RUMRILL & CO.,
264 Broadway. 266-67e

A CHRISTMAS PRESENT,
Willcox & Gibbs' Sewing Machine.
Every gentleman who will present his wife, or some industrious female who is toiling for an honest living, with one of

WILLCOX & GIBBS' SEWING MACHINES,
Will receive in return grateful thanks that cannot be estimated by dollars and cents. JAMES WILLCOX, Manufacturer, 695 Broadway, opposite St. Nicholas. 1666

JOY TO THE WORLD.
Clothes Washed in One Minute by
JOHNSON'S UNION WASHING MACHINE.
Patented April 10, 1860.
PRICE $8 TO $10.
A GOLD GEM OF PRACTICE. Washes every spot, tare and certain, without rubbing or boiling. Call and see it in operation at 497 Broadway, New York, and 162 Fulton St., Brooklyn.
J. JOHNSON & CO.,
Proprietors.
660

"WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES are certainly unrivalled."—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.
Office, 505 Broadway, New York. 660e

STEINWAY & SONS'
PATENT
OVERSTRUNG
GRAND
AND SQUARE
PIANOS
Are now constructed the best Pianos manufactured. Each Instrument warranted for five years.
Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. 6666

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 18, 24 and 36 tunes
PAILLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired, 21 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

New Popular Song.
"OLD DONALD OREY."
Words by "Peyton"—Sold as all the Music Stores, and next, genuine paid, to any part of the United States on receipt of Price, 25 cents. Published by HALLETT, DAVIS & BRIGGS, No. 333 Washington Street, Boston.
Agents for the above will be found in a few days, the new song of the Farmers, "SAIN' IN A BOTHER" Price 20 cts. 264-66e

SKATES.—The largest and best assortment of Ladies', Gentlemen's and Children's Skates in the city, at less than Broadway prices, at 179 Fulton street, Corner of Nassau. SAMUEL ROGERS & SON, Manufacturers. 266 67e

Superior Pianofortes.
ERNEST GABLER, MANUFACTURER OF PIANOFORTES, (with or without the Æolian attachment) No. 112 Seventy-Second st., between Second and Third Ave., New York.
Dealers and others are respectfully invited to call and examine my very superior instruments, made with full iron frame and every recent improvement in the mechanism and beauty of finish, evenness and power of tone. My instruments are warranted for three years, and I guarantee to sell at lower prices than any "Square Grand" made in this city. "SQUARE GRAND."
120 East Twenty-Second Street, New York. 264

THE ELECTROTYPING OF LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is done by PELOUZE & CO., 37 Park Row.

Agents Wanted—to engage in the sale of beautifully ILLUSTRATED WORKS. Circulars, giving full information, with Terms to Agents, and a full list of my Publications, sent on application. Address
GEO. G. EVANS, Publisher,
439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
Quicker for Publishers' Notice.
263-66 No. 25 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 267—Vol. XI.] NEW YORK, JANUARY 5, 1861. [Price 6 Cents.

GREAT EXCITEMENT IN CHARLESTON.

Fort Moultrie Evacuated—The Guns Spiked—The Gun-Carriages Burnt—Captain Foster left in Charge with a few Men—Colonel Anderson in Possession of Fort Sumpter.

On Thursday, at noon, New York was thrown into a state of terrible excitement by rumors which grew and grew, that Fort Moultrie had been attacked by the citizens of Charleston, taken and burnt. Expressions of regret predominated greatly, as it was feared that compromise would now be entirely out of the question. By degrees, as the telegraphic dispatches arrived slowly and meagrely, the excitement subsided in a measure, but expectation was feverish as to what the morrow would bring forth.

Up to the time of our going to press the only facts positively known were, that on Christmas night Colonel Anderson evacuated Fort Moultrie and took possession of the almost impregnable Fort Sumpter, which, though not fully armed, is still armed sufficiently for all purposes of defence. Before abandoning Fort Moultrie, the commander had all the guns spiked, rendering them of no practical use to any who may come after him. The gun carriages, of which there were a vast number, were ordered to be burnt, the fire and smoke from which doubtless gave rise to the report that the fort had been destroyed. It is positively asserted that in abandoning Fort Moultrie and taking possession of Fort Sumpter, Colonel Anderson acted upon his own responsibility. Whatever his reasons were, he doubtlessly deemed them sufficiently grave to warrant his acting without orders, but he will assuredly have to render a strict account for this bold and important strategical movement.

It is said that the authorities of Charleston have taken possession of the telegraph and assumed its entire control, therefore we remain in anxious uncertainty as to what action was taken after the abandonment of the fort, the burning of the gun carriages and the defiant seizure of Fort Sumpter, at the moment, too, when the South Carolina Commissioners were on the way to Washington, authorized to settle all matters of dispute.

We give in this number accurate pictures of the interior and exterior of Fort Moultrie, together with the exciting scenes which which have transpired there. The following description of the two Forts, Moultrie and Sumpter, with the map which we engrave, will show their relative strength and position:

Fort Moultrie.

This fortification is an enclosed water battery, having a front on the south or water side of about three hundred feet, and a depth of about two hundred and forty feet. It is built with salient and re-entering angles on all sides, but until the works now going on there were undertaken the south wall could have been easily scaled, owing to the accumulation of sand from the beach. Some improvement, however, has been recently effected in this respect. The outer and inner walls are of brick, capped with stone, and filled in with earth, making a solid wall fifteen or sixteen feet in thickness. The work now in progress consists in cleaning the sand from the walls of the fort, ditching it around the entire circumference, and erecting a glacis, closing up the postern gates in the east and west walls, and instead, cutting silly ports, which lead into strong outworks on the south-east and south-west angles, in which twelve pounder howitzer guns will be placed, enabling the garrison to sweep the ditch on three sides with grape and canister. The north-west angle of the fort has also been strengthened by a bastionette, to sustain the weight of a heavy gun which will command the main street of the island. The main entrance has also been better secured, and a trap door two feet square cut in the door for ingress and egress. At this time the height of the wall, from the bottom of the ditch to the top of the parapet, is twenty feet. The ditch is from twelve to fifteen feet wide at the base, and fifteen feet deep. The nature of the soil would not seem to admit of this depth being increased, quicksand having been reached in many places. The work on the south side is nearly finished. The counterscarp is substantially built of plank, and spread with turf. The glacis is also finished. It is composed of sand, and covered with layers of loam and turf, all of which is kept firmly in place by the addition of sections of plank nailed to uprights sunk in the sand, and crossing each other at right angles—making squares of about ten feet each. The purpose of the glacis, which is an inclined plane, is to expose an attacking party to the fire of the guns, which are so placed as to sweep it from the crest of the counterscarp to the edge of the beach.

SPIKING THE GUNS IN FORT MOULTRIE, CHARLESTON, S. C., PREVIOUS TO THE EVACUATION OF THE FORT BY COL. ANDERSON AND THE U. S. TROOPS.

(Continued on page 104)

BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM

HAS again become the popular resort of EVERY LOVER OF THE WONDERFUL, THE CURIOUS AND AMUSING,

And is now attracting more attention, and receiving more visitors than every other place of Amusement in New York. Everything novel, curious and and interesting is secured by Mr. Barnum, and presented to his visitors in addition to the 850,000 Curiosities from every part of the world, and the which take place every afternoon at 3 o'clock, and every evening at half-past 7, by a full and complete dramatic company. At present the two LIVING AZTEC CHILDREN, the most curious, wonderful and interesting human beings the world has ever produced; the LIVING WHAT IS IT? or MAN MONKEY; the two ALBINO CHILDREN; the GRAND AQUARIA; MONSTER SNAKES; LIVING HAPPY FAMILY, &c., &c., are all on exhibition, and yet the price of admission to the whole is only 25 cents. Children under 10 years 15 cents.

SPLENDID DRAMATIC ENTERTAINMENTS

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 5, 1861.

ALL Communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	17 weeks	$ 1
One do.	1 year	$ 3
Two do.	1 year	$ 5
Or One Copy	2 years	$ 5
Three Copies	1 year	$ 6
Five do.	1 year	$10

And an extra Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

WE shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, they giving us credit for being en rapport with everything that transpires or exists in all parts of the United States. The columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching information. To save labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Foreign News.

THERE seems to be a pause in the rapid march of European events, but the world quietly moves for all the silence. Italian affairs seem to be growing more and more complicated. Bombalino still holds his ground in Gaeta, and the English press openly accuses Louis Napoleon of fostering the difficulty in order to pave the way for the Murat's restoration to the throne of Naples. It is so manifestly against the interest of France, or rather of its despotic ruler, to have Italy free and united, that it is natural to suspect the Mysterious Man of the Tuileries of any scheme to prevent it. Garibaldi has openly announced his determination to recommence the war on the 5th of March, and he demands half a million of men to lead. There is a greater degree of grandiloquence in Garibaldi's last proclamation than we like to see; but if he means to sweep the foreigner from Italy, he will need the half million.

France is rejoicing over the enlarged sphere of action granted to the Press by Count de Persigny, whose address we have noticed in another column.

The Empress Eugenie has returned to Paris, after her tour in Scotland and England, much improved in health, but with impaired spirits. The journals report that her mind is laboring under religious melancholy, caused by her sister's death and the perilous position of the Pope.

The Emperor of Austria remains firm against any sale of Venetia. Hungary is in an excited state. Every day an insurrection may burst out. It is openly stated by the German papers that, in the event of Hungarian insurrection, Russia would occupy the chief strongholds in that country. This would bring the French and English declaration of non-intervention into direct clash with the action of the Czar.

From China, the news received through St. Petersburg is that the Emperor has returned to Pekin, and that the Allies have made peace with the Flowery Race. This, however, requires confirmation. The allied army was encamped upon the walls. The spoil found in the Emperor's palace was immense, but the exact value was not quoted.

India is again in a troubled state, in consequence of the attempt to levy an income tax. At Bombay the native merchants had closed the bazaars in consequence. It was contemplated to make Bombay the capital of all India, instead of Calcutta, as at present.

Accounts from New Zealand state that the natives still continued the war against the British, and it was feared it would be necessary to exterminate them.

Railroad cars are now regularly established in Melbourne, Australia, principally through the energy of our countryman, Mr. Train, who has a branch house established there.

The death of the Earl of Aberdeen is also announced. He was in his seventy fifth year. He was premier of England at the commencement of the Crimean war, and was one of the most bigoted of the Tory peers.

News from Japan has been received to the 30th October. The Japanese have refused to extend the benefits of their treaty with the Americans and English to the Prussians, and Admiral Eulenberg, who is there with two Prussian ships of war, does not know what to do. Prince Mito, whose recent rebellion against the Tycoon and his ministers is fresh in the public mind, is dead. It is rumored that he was poisoned by his enemies.

The Canoda brings the intelligence of the arrival of the Japanese Ambassadors at Hong Kong, where they had created an interest somewhat inexplicable, as Japanese are not unusual visitors in that port.

CONGRESSIONAL MATTERS.

IN the Senate on Monday, December 24, Mr. Pugh (Ohio) offered a joint resolution in favor of holding a convention to amend the Constitution. It was referred to the Select Committee of Thirteen. Mr. Nicholson, of Tennessee, made a speech on the perilous condition of the country. He maintained that a demonstration of force against South Carolina would be equivalent to a declaration of war against that State—a position difficult to gainsay. Mr. Davis then offered a resolution which he had previously submitted to the Special Committee of Thirteen, to the following effect: "That amendments be made in the Constitution declaring that property in slaves be recognized as such, and stand on the same footing in all federal and constitutional relations as any other species of property; and that such property shall not be affected by any local laws in any State, and that in no case shall such property be impaired in any State or Territory." This resolution was ordered to be printed. The Senate then adjourned till Thursday, the 27th December.

In the House, a letter, signed by Macqueen, Bonham, Boyce and Ashmore, members for South Carolina, was read, in which these gentlemen withdrew from the House. The Speaker, however, has ordered their names to be retained on the roll, not recognizing the act of secession. A message was received from Secretary Thompson, of the Interior, announcing the alarming Bailey defalcation in the Indian funds. A committee of five was ordered to investigate this affair. Mr. John Cochrane, of New York, then moved the restoration of the Missouri line, and declaring that any attempt to coerce a State would be to levy war and precipitate a revolution. After some conversation, Mr. Cochrane withdrew his resolution. The House then adjourned to the 27th December.

The Committee of Thirteen appointed by the Senate to consider the present alarming state of the nation has proposed nothing of a practical nature to meet the difficulty. Nor yet has the Committee of Thirty-three appointed by the House made any progress in their onerous labors. Both parties stand very firm in this unhappy crisis, the Republicans declaring they have no compromise to offer; and Mr. Toombs, one of the Thirteen, has telegraphed to Georgia that secession is the inevitable policy of the South, and which he recommends to Georgia.

The Great Defalcation.

President Buchanan is certainly unfortunate. To add to his troubles we have the announcement of a fraud in the Interior Department, which may be one million, or may be three millions of dollars. At present the authorities confess to $870,000. This has the honor of being the largest thing of the kind we have had in our history. Of course there are several sides to this affair—not two, but half a dozen. While one party malignantly accuses the Secretary of War of direct connivance, another puts the more pleasing face of a simple irregularity or error of judgment upon it. The bare facts are the arrest of Mr. Russell, the eminent government contractor, and that of Mr. Goddard Bailey, the clerk in whose keeping were the bonds thus irregularly, inadvertently, or it may be, fraudulently, abstracted from the Government safe. Mr. Floyd's friends thus explain the matter. Mr. Russell, the Government contractor, has made engagements with the War Department to the extent of some millions, to be paid from time to time as the work was done. In order to enable Mr. Russell to raise money, Mr. Floyd has given him conditional acceptances, which not being so negotiable, as the Reserved Bonds of the Indian Fund, were deposited with Mr. Bailey for an equal amount of the more available article. What Mr. Russell has done with the enormous amounts he has thus anticipated remains to be seen. As Mr. Secretary Floyd will have to explain his agency in this remarkable affair, it would be premature to say anything on the subject till then.

Industry Irrepressible.

WHILE those who are most interested in the political questions and troubles of the day have before them at present little save the exciting anticipation of breasting a storm, either for victory or death, there are among us, from Mexico to Maine, hundreds of thousands who ask anxiously, "How long is this to last?" and who wish to know when in any event the ordinary course of business and of manufactures will be resumed.

It is indeed somewhat extraordinary that, during the flurry of a business panic, few seem to remember the fact that the laws of society, like those of nature, are never radically suspended. The world tosses about so tumultuously on the foaming, spuming waves, as to entirely lose sight of the great depths beneath, which must some time be calm. A financial panic or crisis, no matter what its cause, is actually nothing more nor less than a suspension of the principle of exchanges. Goods are no longer bought, because every one anticipates poverty, and consequently they are not manufactured. An immediate disorganization of currency and values results from this. There is a general clog, the machinery of industry works no longer.

But in an industrial country this cannot last. Thirty millions of people with grain grown, mills in working order, railroads running and specie in abundance, may suffer terribly for two or even six months, but there is a tendency in disorganized exchanges to re-arrange themselves, just as there is in manufacturing skill to produce. History has shown that even civil war, when it has become an understood evil, has not stopped industry. During the middle ages wars were an essential portion of the course of the age; but the great manufacturing line of cities, from Genoa through Nuremburg, Augsburg and the Low Countries, worked and sold, even when the artisan sat at his loom sword-girt. Innate industry is irrepressible. It is said that truth crushed to earth will rise again—the same is as applicable to the inherent tendency of labor to produce. And there never yet was seen on earth such exuberance of industry, such recuperative force after financial disaster as is possessed by the American. People who begin to rebuild burnt houses before the conflagration has exhausted itself, will never suffer their country to languish a prey to paralyzed exchanges. In a few weeks, come what may—in any event whatever—the course of demand and supply will be again running more evenly, and the grand process of mending up will be carried on as of old. We find opinions equivalent to what we have said in the journals of half the States in the Union, in those of New Orleans as of Boston. Nature cannot be repressed.

EDITORIAL GLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS.

A Daily Paper has the following very accurate statistics: "At the opening of the twentieth century New York will have a population of 6,500,000, and will then be the most populous city in the Christian world, and will almost challenge any Asiatic city to rival her." As Asiatic cities are very slow in their increase of population, Pekin having been some 2,000 years in reaching 2,000,000, the deduction that she will increase 4,500,000 in forty years is not according to Cocker! Such are the loose statements of our modern editorials! Their philosophy is on a par with their facts.

The Art Critic of the Tribune has a very original method of arriving at the health of an artist. It is by looking not at his tongue, nor by feeling his pulse, nor yet by his general appearance. It is by a critical examination of his paintings. In noticing Leutze's picture of the "Cavaliers" the critic of the Tribune says: "The game in this picture has a very toothsome look. Every one can see that none but an artist with a healthy appetite and a powerful digestion could have painted such succulent-looking objects." In future, if we wish to gauge an artist's digestion we shall set him to paint a leg of mutton, instead of eating it!

Look Out for Sneak-Thieves.—The importance of a careful attention to front door locks at this season can hardly be over estimated. Thousands of sneak-thieves are hanging around the dwellings of our citizens, watching to become familiar with the habits of the various inmates, and keeping an eye on the patrolmen in their showy uniform as they pass around their respective beats. The majority of door locks are very liable to be picked, and unless special attention is paid to fasten the door by other means, there will be but little safety against prowling thieves. Many persons are having Valentine & Butler's new Rotary Locks placed on their doors, as they are a complete foil to the most expert of the burglarious tribe. Not less than fifty petty robberies by sneak-thieves and vagabonds have been made within the past few nights in private dwellings. On Wednesday evening the basement door of the residence of our friend, Mr H. L. Stuart, was entered, while the servant was absent for a few minutes, and the table silver overhauled and a portion of it carried off so silently, that Mrs. S., who was alone in the parlor above, had no suspicion of anything unusual occurring. The utmost vigilance should be observed, and all suspicious loungers and pretended pedlars should be spotted. These fellows call in the middle of the day, when they are not likely to meet with men, and thus, by impudence, are often able to make observations which facilitate their future villainous operations.

PERSONAL.

PROFESSOR DRAPER, President of the University Medical College, has withdrawn his resignation, and resumed his lectures.

THE magnificent residence in the Champs Elysées where the Duchess da Alba died has been purchased by one of the Rothschilds for six millions of francs.

DEXTER, the Boston sculptor, is engaged on a bust of Governor Banks.

LEUTZE has finished his fine picture of the landing of the Cavaliers in Maryland. It is pronounced by all who have seen it to be a very fine effort. It is for Mr. Connolly, the wealthy tobacconist of New York.

JUDGE THORNE, of Vincennes, Ind., a well-known politician, was recently burnt to death in his own house.

GEORGE SCHARF, who lately died in England, aged seventy-two, was the first artist who practiced lithography in England. He was a German, but had resided in England nearly fifty years.

THE Empress Eugenie, for a Papist, is remarkably liberal. During her recent visit to Dunkirk she attended the Protestant church, as there was no Catholic one in the town. She was attended by the Duke of Athol, and seemed very devout. The clergyman prayed for her health.

MR. CHURCH has commenced his painting of the Iceberg. He has been studying for this for two years. It is to be the same size as his picture of the "Heart of the Andes."

DAVID STUART, the gay Lothario of the Burch divorce case, has commenced an action against Burch for defamation of character. He lays his damages at $50,000.

MADAME COLSON, the prima donna, has had two narrow escapes—one from burning, and the other stabbing. Her dress took fire, but she extinguished it, severely burning her hand. Her next mishap was to fall on a dagger, and wound her arm.

MADAME PATTERSON BONAPARTE, the first and only legitimate wife of the late Jerome, is now in Paris.

SCRIBE, the famous French playwright, after fifty years of unceasing activity, has retired from his profession of dramatist.

THE Rev. John Cooper Ward, the nephew of General Elijah Ward, has accepted a call from the Frankfort Church, New York. He is a very eloquent and amiable man, and deserves the compliment paid him.

THE Americans in Liverpool have lately given John Brougham, our popular dramatist and actor, a splendid supper, at which Beverley Tucker, our Consul at that port, presided.

SOME of the Southern papers are very indignant with the Convention for leaving Columbia on account of small pox. A man may be more afraid of losing his beauty than his life.

THE Committee appointed to investigate the charges against Alderman Green have dismissed them all as being false and frivolous.

MAYOR WOOD was married on Thursday last to Miss Mills, daughter of the wealthy grocer. She is at once rich, beautiful, ambitious and accomplished. We congratulate his Honor upon this auspicious event.

A ROOM is to be fitted up in Derby's New Institute of Art as a lounging place for artists, literary men, editors and other triflers.

THE copyright of Webster's Dictionary is worth $30,000 a year.

SENATOR ANDREW JOHNSON was burned in effigy in Memphis, Tennessee, on Christmas Eve.

OLE BULL is giving concerts in Southern Sweden. At the University town of Lund he was welcomed as warmly as when he first visited it eighteen years ago.

DR. FRANCIS is lying very ill at his house in New York.

D. T. VALENTINE, the venerable Clerk of the City Hall, who has retained his position amid all the storms of politics, has been authorized by the Common Council to prepare his usual valuable Manual.

A PORTLAND lady has in her possession a unique and beautiful copper medal, struck by the French in honor of the American alliance during the Revolution. It is about two inches in diameter, bears on one side a fine bold head of Liberty with the staff and cap, and on the other Minerva interposing her shield to protect an infant, representing America, against the British lion. There are appropriate mottoes in Latin, and the dates of Burgoyne's and Cornwallis's surrenders.

RALPH FARNHAM, whose interview with the Prince of Wales is fresh in the public mind, and whose portrait we published in No. 263 of our Illustrated Newspaper, died on the 26th December, at the residence of his son. He was aged one hundred and four years five months and nineteen days. He was the last survivor of Bunker's Hill.

OUR WEEKLY GOSSIP.

Another Word about the Ice Carnival.

ONCE more we are upon the ice—yes, literally upon the ice, and a pretty mess we made of it. It was about the time of Jackson—no hardly so long back as that—say a little later, that we last disported on the "outer edge" and cut indescribable figures on the smooth surface of the still water. We were somewhat younger then, a trifle lighter—say fifty pounds—and we had considerably less lime in our bones, and an overplus of lime is not favorable to the display of excessive agility. But our former triumphs were fresh in our memory, and we had profound confidence in that skill acquired at the cost of many parti colored contusions on various parts of our body, caused by involuntary concussions with a harder substance. We do not publicly pretend to be infallible, and we are therefore free to confess that we exhibited a slight amount of over-weening confidence in our powers as a gymnast on this occasion, and after a few trials, we privately pronounced ourselves as Pickwick did Winkle—a humbug. Be that as it may, whatever of undue confidence we felt before we tried the ice was quickly taken out of us after we had tried it.

Intent on astonishing the skating world in general and a few private friends in particular, we supplied ourselves with a pair of Conover and Walker's English skates, which connoisseurs in that line pronounce the finest in the world, and equipped with the heaviest bat-wing overcoat we could find, we started for Central Park.

How the Park Commissioners Humbugged the Public.

When we arrived at the Park we found about ten thousand people who, we are sorry to say, were profanely cursing the Park Commissioners. It is rather hard upon the Commissioners, we confess; in summer they are berated because they plant stumps instead of trees, and in winter they are sent to the uttermost perdition for not providing ice. Hard as it is, however, they deserve it all, for a more wrong-headed—not to say pig-headed—set of mismanagers never encumbered a public institution. The ice was good enough last week, but under the pretence of making it better, they broke it up and flooded it, and as the frost did not come exactly as they wished it, there was no ice upon the people's holiday, and over fifty thousand citizens were deprived of an innocent enjoyment. Some said that it was a Sabbatarian movement to prevent the people from doing anything else but pray on Christmas day; others said that the tender hearted Commissioners were afraid that the ice would break beneath the weight of the crowd. To this we say—bosh! It was a Central Park blunder—another added to the innumerable blunders which have caused millions of needless expenditure to the public, and have brought unspeakable ridicule upon all concerned in the (mis)management of the affairs.

Consolation to be found Elsewhere.

Although the frost would not freeze the Park pond, it kept its sharp tooth on all the surrounding waters, even on the large creeks where the tide ebbs and flows regularly. How is this Messrs. Commissioners? There is a barefaced falsehood somewhere as well as a blunder. Well, we transferred ourselves to the well frozen creek at One Hundred and Ninth street and Third avenue. The place was alive with people, and the merry shouts of laughter springing out of pure animal enjoyment infected us with the hilarous spirit of youth, and tripping on the ice with the elastic step of an eighteen-year older, we proceeded to put on our skates. Much has been said about the difficulty of making both ends meet, and not unjustly, for we found the process of doubling ourselves up for the purpose of boring our heels, securing on our skates and strapping them up, one of exceeding difficulty. First we sat down and commenced gimlet-boring, but our food receptacle revolted against the unusual pressure. We then knelt down and with an amount of discomfort not to be expressed, we succeeded by back boring and a vast expenditure of temper and perspiration in making the necessary holes for the screw of our skates. To complete the operation we had to lie on our back and by an extraordinary series of gymnastic contortions, in which our legs played a curious part in the air, we at last succeeded in fixing the irons in a tolerably ship-shape manner. Well, here we pause, out of respect to the sensations which agitated us, before endeavoring to assume a perpendicular position. Slowly and cautiously we arose and using our arms as a balance pole, we finally got straightened up, with our feet on our skates and our skates on the ice. There we stood, helpless, powerless and immovable. We hardly dared look to the right or the left for fear the beautiful slippery skates should start off on their own account. We regret to say that we lavished a few silent imprecations on Conover & Walker for tempting us with such fascinating but (apparently) unmanageable articles.

It seemed that every eye was directed towards us—that we were the centre of observation; and, as one after another glided past us, we smiled a ghastly smile and tried to look unconcerned. We even essayed a whistle, but we only got as far as the form of the mouth. The silent agony of our position grew more and more intolerable, until at last, when we saw nothing but the backs of our skating friends, we made a dash with our right foot and found ourselves flat on our back! Thanks to our heavy overcoat no damage was done, but the concussion sent the blood tingling through our veins, we laughed right out, and, as no one observed us, we took heart from that moment and went in with a will. We tumbled to the right and to the left, we made involuntary spread eagles, which the most able contortionist might have envied, and we sat upright to avoid a worse fall; but with every effort we gained power and control, and succeeded in getting across the pond then along the pond after a fashion, and ended by stepping over our ankles in the ice water and mud at the sides. However, with all our mishaps, we enjoyed our skating bout amazingly. We had gained the control of our feet, kept the control of our temper, achieved an uncontrollable appetite, and had learned two lessons—not to predicate present conquests upon past triumphs and that nothing is impossible if you make up your mind not to "give up the ship."

How Mayor Wood got a Wife and a Checkmate at the same time.

We are not going to tell how Mayor Wood got a wife, because we look upon that transaction as specially private and nobody's business. Suffice it to say that our honored Mayor was married on Friday, the 21st inst., and had to conform to that custom which demands from every one who can afford it, a marriage trip. But our Mayor has a precious fold to take care of, and in that fold are several black sheep who are apt to run very riotous when the shepherd is away. The worst of the matter was that to one of these black sheep he would be obliged to leave the care of his fold, in fact to delegate his power. What a fix for a new-made married man to be in! Urged on by love one way, and held back by the fear that some mine would be sprung upon him if he left, it is not difficult to tell how his dilemma ended—a lady being in the case of course he went and—left his flock behind him. The disturbed state of his mind may be better understood when it is known that he burst into poetry, the following having been sent us, supposed to be in his handwriting, and dropped by him as he got into the carriage:

A HURRIED THOUGHT.

(Imitated from Scott's Hasty Plate of Soup.)

All men are Fortune's puppets—all
Obedient to her beck;
I fly to love, but leave behind
Of troubles, full a Peck.

The lines are not remarkable, but they assume importance when the author is considered. The double entendre in the last line has probably rarely been equalled in delicate and subtle application, the point being that peck is a measure, and Peck is also the individual left behind to administer the duties of the Mayor! Do we overestimate the joke? We think not. The poem is still further remarkable from the under tone of prophecy which pervades every line; it bears strong internal evidence of having been written under the influence of a solemn warning—a warning which the sequel has fully justified. For, no sooner had the Mayor got fairly clear of New York than accidental Mayor Peck turns out the travelling Mayor's pet City Chamberlain, and appoints in his place Mr. Devlin the well-known and wealthy clothier. The appointment was received with shouts of laughter by the assembled Aldermen, who saw that provisional Mayor Peck had sprung a mine upon the absent official, and for sake of the joke they confirmed his appointment.

Of the character of the transaction the less said the better. It may be justified by the code of honor recognized among Aldermen, but it certainly would not pass among gentlemen.

The subject struck Our Poet as admirably adapted to heroic verse, and he has permitted us to copy the following lines:

"Fernando Wood turned out bold Stout,
And gave to Platt the keeping of the tin;
The Common Council now have turned Platt out,
And let their natural friend the Dev'l-in!"

We have no apology to make for our poet; the subject was not favorable; the times are hard; poetry is quoted very low, indeed, and it is probably the best he could do for the price.

A Bohemian Melody.

AU REVOIR.

'Twas but a year ago to day!
We drank love, then, as revellers wine:
Love was our life, we used to say;
I quaffed from your lips, you from mine.

The parting hour struck like a knell:
The dark ship seemed a funeral car:
I strove in vain to say—Farewell;
Your lips closed mine with—AU REVOIR!

To those two words of hope I clung
As clings a wrecked one to the spar:
Forgive me, for my heart was young,
And youth trusts woman's au revoir.

Last night we met again—we two,
Alone! . . None save the stars may tell
How yields the old love to the new,
And "Au Revoir" becomes "FAREWELL!"

We copy the above from the Saturday Press, one of the sauciest, wittiest and most independent papers in New York. If we are to credit the gossip of the coteries it is the organ of the Bohemian fraternity, its editor being a gipsy of very high caste. There are a great many snobs in literature, and, as is the way of the world, many of them occupy the prominent places. These are wont to drop the corners of their mouths, elevate their eyebrows and shrug their shoulders when the Bohemians are mentioned; but, judging by their contributions to the Saturday Press and other popular publications, the Bohemian fraternity absorbs pretty nearly all the young, fresh and original talent in our midst. Many of them are keen trenchant writers, with a strong natural impulse to explode old falsehoods, and fight a good fight for truth and right. They are no respecters of persons, certainly, and they live as pleases themselves, each man having a sort of roving commission, signed by himself, in which the rules laid down are not, strictly speaking, rigid. They earn what they live upon, and spend it as they like, and they are eminently companionable among their equals; but they are a merciless set of dogs when a pretentious commonplace cur presumes to desecrate the portals of their sacred den. Their independence, which is their marked characteristic, offends a majority of the powers that be (Good Lord! that they should be), who love to be courted; but the fact is patent that in them we have the young life of literature, strong, vigorous and healthy, and through them the hope of a future in which drivel shall not be worshipped, nor twaddle crowned.

But we have chiefly to do with their poets to-day, and of these many have made their mark. From the author of "Au Revoir" we have seen some exquisite gems of verse, well modelled, finely polished and strong in thought. The poem quoted is not nearly up to his standard, but it is a charming conceit charmingly expressed.

We are tempted to quote once more from the same source, but we will take George Arnold this time. He is somewhat more pretentious in his style, but he possesses the elements which form the true poet. He has a broad, keen and appreciating love of Nature, and many of his verse-pictures are touched in with a master's hand. His coloring is rich and his contrasts powerful. Like Gardette, he is too often led away by pretty conceits, but even in these he is earnest, and gives evidence of greater things.

THE TRYST.

BY GEORGE ARNOLD.

On speary grass and starry bloom
The tiny globes of dew are lying,
The broad moon rises through the gloom
Of twilight haze, and night-winds, sighing
In long drawn whispers, say to me
'Tis eventide—She comes to thee!

A heavy fragrance floods the air
Where crimson roses climb and cluster;
Heaven seems more near, and Earth more fair,
The broad moon shines with holier lustre,
A white robe through the dusk I see—
O, Joy! O, Love! She comes to me!

PALINODE.

Athwart the West, where dies the day,
A stormy rack of cloud is drifting,
And round the uplands bleak and gray
The wind its mournful voice is lifting;
With weary moan it says to me,
"'Tis night, but she comes not to thee!"

Sharp thorns now grimly deck the bough
Where clustered once the crimson roses.
With roses once she wreathed this brow
Where now a thorny crown reposes.
A bitter past alone I see—
Ah, Heaven! She comes no more to me

From Bards to Babies seems to be a natural transition, so without apology we proceed to discourse of one of the latest novelties in the way of invention, which has just made its appearance at 510 Broadway opposite the St. Nicholas Hotel. It is called the Patent Spring Baby Tender, and owes its paternity to the ingenuity of Dr. Brown—which Dr. Brown we are not informed. The Baby Tender, however, promises to be an attraction and an institution with mothers, babies and nurses, as it will, we are assured, take care of a baby until it is two years old almost entirely, leaving mothers and nurses to work, skate or go a shopping ad libitum. Seriously, it is nothing more or less than tending babies by machinery, or, in other words, it is a machine that combines a couch, a cradle, a swing, a baby-jumper, a chair, a table, a play and work stand, a hobby-horse and a carriage, all and each in a single adjustable piece of baby and nursery furniture, tasteful, convenient and elegant in the extreme. Truly Dr. Brown is the Santa Claus we have long been looking for in the Gothamite world of Babydom. May he never have fits!

DRAMA.

WINTER GARDEN.—Mr. Jefferson made his first appearance for the season on Monday last, as Rip Van Winkle, in the play of that name, and with great success. This gentleman's return to the metropolis is a subject for congratulation among theatre-goers, as he is probably at present the best comedian on the stage. The drama has been put upon the stage with considerable care, and will doubtless enjoy a long run.

WALLACK'S THEATRE.—"The Fast Men of the Olden Time" has been reproduced here as a holiday piece. Of course we miss John Brougham in his great part of Buckingham; but otherwise the play is a repetition of its old success, which is saying a good deal.

MISS KEENE still keeps the "Seven Sisters" on her bill, and the crowds are as dense as ever. It will run for many weeks yet.

BARNUM'S MUSEUM.—Barnum is quite a "household word" in the mouths of our children, for the performances now there give Christmas in its full glory. Never have we seen happier faces than those lately seen there. It was worth the admission merely to see the juvenile delight pictured in the many thousand countenances every day seen there. Aladdin's palace never seemed more wonderful to its fortunate creator than does Mr. Barnum's famous Museum to Young America. What with curiosities, natural and artificial, and the dramatic entertainments in the lecture-room, it would take a week to look over them instead of a day. Parents and guardians should take their young troops there to give them a perfect treat.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

Opera—Alboni—Mario—Badiali—Dumas and Guns—Beaumont the Director—The Actress and the King—The American Panic in Paris.

I HAVE been to hear the Matrimonio Segreto. I have heard Alboni, Zucchini and Badiali in it, and on the same evening Mario and Ronconi in the Barber—that is to say, a part of each performance. One can do very well in Paris with enterprise and a carriage. Well, Alboni sang with verve, expression and grace. Gardoni did Paolino very well. Badiali, as of old, if not always very wonderful in voice, was at least wonderfully passable or wonderfully well up to his work. For a man of one hundred and eleven years, this is well—one may say remarkable. There are persons who pretend to have read in ancient chronicles of one Badioli who sang not only in Pasiello's first pieces but long previously, in the compositions of Alessandro Stradella, who himself still lives, by the way, in an opera—and even in the Orfeo—that first Venetian work in which a plot was set to music. Certain it is that he is a very old man, my lords—an old man—but a very remarkable old man. Probably, after all the young tenors and baritones of the day have gone to their rosewood, Badiali will still say to the stage, Cesarem vehis.

There are so many anecdotes current in which Alexandre Dumas silences somebody, that it is quite refreshing to hear one on the other side. A few days ago a gentleman, once in the service of the Duke d'Orleans, met M. Alexandre Dumas in Naples and in the Via Toledo. It was a few days, by the way, after the evacuation of the Palace of Chiatamone.

"Ah, my dear Dumas, are you there?" said the Parisian. "They tell me that you are no longer the Superintendent of Museums. What is your present business?"

"My dear sir, I am as Beaumarchais once was, a seller of guns."

"Ah, so much the worse. I would have preferred that you would, like Beaumarchais, sell good prose." Then turning away, he added, "After all, my dear Dumas, one can only sell what one has in the shop."

An eminent man seldom comes before the public in Paris without having a joke or anecdote either for himself or of another being attached to his name. Well, M. Beaumont is the bran-newest or brannest-new of the theatrical directors of Paris, and they have the following to tell of him:

On the morning after his installation, M. Beaumont, at 9 A.M. was pacing his cabinet when his servant—the celebrated domestic in red plush—entered.

"Will you have breakfast?"

"Breakfast, indeed! It's well worth while to be director and not receive pieces. I thought that there were always lots of people waiting with tragedies and comedies and things!"

The domestic opened a door, and in they rushed headlong. Tragedists, comedists, vaudevils, and all the other dists and devils. It was very late when the director had his breakfast.

While eating it, there entered one great dramatic author.

"I wish to see M. Beaumont."

"Have you come on play acting business?" inquired the servant

"Yes—hurry."

"Now, do you know I really think you'd better come to-morrow. M. Beaumont must by this time have bought as many pieces as will serve him for to-day."

There is a severe thing about Dumas in the last Figaro. It says that Alexander the Great loved Bucephalus; Augustus, a parrot; Virgil, a butterfly; Nero, a starling; Commodus, a monkey; Heliogabalus, a sparrow; Honorius, a chicken; Garibaldi, a nigger!

The following recent anecdote, now in circulation, is very French: A very fascinating young actress recently left her family here in Paris to fill an engagement in Belgium. While there, a certain crowned head—not Leopold's—saw the belle and induced her to resign her contract with the manager, and enter into a left-handed alliance with himself.

The lady's father belongs to a Parisian theatre. The story became known to his comrades, and when he entered the foyer he was saluted by a thousand congratulations, many sincere, others ironical.

"Come," said X—— to him, "you've hot cakes baking for you."

"I do not eat such cakes," replied the père, with touching dignity. "But," he added, changing his tone, "it is certainly a very fortunate thing for my daughter!"

Would you believe that this is given as an illustration of proper feeling, combined with common sense, by a contemporary paper?

What are you about there on your side of the ocean? Gloomy, distracting rumors of political convulsions have reached us here, and all Americans in Paris, at clubs and bankers' rooms and soirees are in a flutter. To be three thousand miles away from home and not to know whether to go home or remain is decidedly troublesome. Of course the general faith is that the trouble to result from your election will blow over; but there is dread of trouble resulting from the mere agitation. I trust it may be the case. America is a great puzzle to France—but any failure to import our silks and pay for them is perfectly intelligible here. May we all get well out of our troubles, is the hope of your PANUROE.

A DEPUTATION from England has been sent to Caprera to invite Garibaldi to visit London and some of the principal cities. As he has a son at school near Liverpool, it is considered probable he will accept the invitation.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ON Saturday morning, the 22d Dec., the body of a pedlar was found murdered lying in Brevoort's Lane, near Calvary Cemetery bridge, Queens county, Long Island, nearly opposite to 27th street, East river. His skull was broken in, and he presented a horrible spectacle. He was a native of Bavaria, and well-known in the vicinity. As none of his property was missing, it is supposed that revenge and not robbery was the motive.

A TERRIBLE and as yet mysterious murder has been committed in Troy. The victim is Horace B. Sargent, book keeper for the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad, who was found robbed and murdered in First street, near St. John's Church, about ten o'clock on the evening of the 24th Dec. A man, evidently the assassin by his flight, was seen standing over the body by a young man named Burns, but while the latter bent down to see what was the matter with Mr. Sargent, the murderer made his escape. The deceased had a fearful gash on the head. The authorities have offered five hundred dollars for the arrest of the murderer.

THE murderers are having the tables turned upon them at last; after having, through the complicity of the Judicature, monopolized the right of slaughter for some years, they are beginning to realize the horrors of punishment. No less than three homicides were condemned on the 23d December—Timothy Shay, for murdering a man named Larry; Francis Hoffman, who brutally killed Mrs. Shoma her husband's herself; and Samuel Finlay, for murdering his wife. All these were condemned to imprisonment for life with hard labor.

A SAILOR named James Mathews was found dead in the rear of No. 37 Cherry street, on the morning of the 26th December. He had fallen out of the window when intoxicated.

THE police of the Sixteenth ward ought to be severely censored for the attack made by the roughs of that ward upon the fire company No. 34, on Christmas day, on the corner of Tenth avenue and Seventeenth street. It is quite enough for the gallant men to risk their lives in the discharge of their duty at the scene of conflagration, without being attacked on their way.

OAKEY HALL has demanded the trial of his client, Charles Jefferds, for the murder of Walton and Matthews. The delay in this case is certainly very remarkable.

COLONEL RUDLER, the colleague of Walker, the Nicaraguan filibuster, has been pardoned. How is it that the friends of the man of destiny have neglected to follow up their pursuit of Commander Salmon, who betrayed Walker into the hands of his cowardly murderers?

THE report that Levi Woodbury, the defaulting postmaster, was alive, turns out to be a canard. That unfortunate official has been in his coffin for months. The avidity of the public to swallow these enormous sells is a very remarkable proof of our credulity and ignorance.

IN Brooklyn, on the 28th, a man named Kirwan very nearly beat another named Lynch to death. Both drunk, as usual. Kirwan was taken to jail, and Lynch to the Hospital. Thus it is that the sale of a glass of bad rum renders it necessary to keep up two expensive establishments.

CAPTAIN PERKINS, of Worcester, Mass., has received $300,000 from the Russian Government for damages in the non-fulfilment of a contract to receive firearms during the Crimean war.

A GENTLEMAN recently visited the hospital in Downieville, California, to witness a post mortem examination. He consented to assist the steward to bring the subject down stairs. He took the feet, and holding them one in each hand above his head, started down the stairs, the steward following with the head end. The man stumbled and his hands came down. The legs of the dead spread and shut again, clasping his neck, and he fell to the bottom of the stairs fainting, bestridden by the corpse. It required all the restoratives in the institution to bring him to.

THE custom of drunken men insulting ladies ought to be put an immediate stop to. On the 26th, as Mr. Taylor, of Hudson City, his wife and two ladies, were waiting in the railroad depot, Jersey City, a rowdy named Edward Davis entered, and commenced insulting the ladies by indecent proposals and foul language. Mr. Taylor, of course, put him out of the room. The rowdy soon returned, and attacked Mr. Davis, whose jaw he fractured. The mischief being done, the police arrested the ruffian, with great promptitude.

A MRS. JOHNSON lately received a letter from California, out of which dropped a newspaper cutting; upon reading it she fell senseless to the ground, for it was an account of her son's execution for horsestealing. A more careful examination discovered that the letter was from her son himself, stating that a man had assumed his name, and been hanged. As for himself he was alive, and doing well, as a proof of which he sent her an order for $100. This little romance of every day took place in Chicago.

CORRUPTION is the prevailing epidemic; it rages everywhere, the chief spots being New York and Washington. There is a deficiency in the Iowa funds, but as the amount is only $7,000 it scarcely deserves this paragraph, except as a straw showing the way the wind blows.

A COUPLE were married in Hartford, Conn., last week, after a separation of more than twenty-five years. They were born in England, "loved not wisely but too well;" the girl's parents refused to let them marry, even to save disgrace, the young man came to America, got rich at Cleveland, and visited a friend's house in Hartford, intending soon to take the steamer for his fatherland. While passing a pleasant evening, a lady called, and the mutual attraction between the pair, thus casually introduced, was so strong that they each inquired about the other; and the upshot was that the man, aged fifty years, married his old sweetheart, aged forty-six, who was residing in Hartford with their own son, a young married man of about twenty-five years.

A BRIGHT mulatto, claiming to be a fugitive slave, escaping from Alabama, stopped some six weeks ago at a farm-house in Rushville, Ill., and not having the regular papers, was arrested and committed to jail. In pursuance of the statute, he was, after waiting six weeks in jail, sold for the term of one month to the highest bidder. Some one intimated to Reuben Alpin that he should hire him to drive team to the river, especially as he, Alpin, was a Kentuckian. Reuben asked Charley, "If I hire you to drive team for me, will you run off the first chance and leave the team?" "No, master," answered Charley, "I promise you I won't leave the team!" Reuben didn't invest.

AN Irishman named Patrick Hickey, and his wife, who have been living in Hartland, Niagara county, for ten years past, have nine children, of whom eight were born within the last eight years. The eldest is only twelve years old. Mr. Hickey is seventy years of age, and his wife about forty. During their residence in Hartland they have been located on the farm of Mr. Daniel Barker, of whom Mr. Hickey hired a house and four acres of land. Previous to Mrs. Hickey's last confinement, Mr. Barker said that if Mrs. Hickey presented her husband with three children at one birth he would give the old couple a deed of the house and land upon which they live. The condition was complied with, and the property has been transferred, by deed, according to agreement.

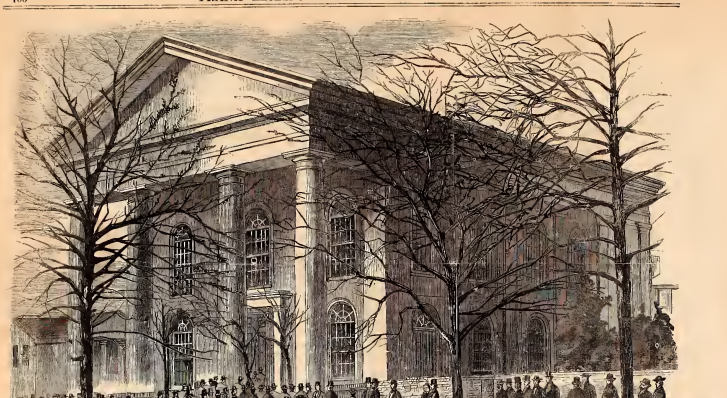
FOREIGN NEWS AND GOSSIP.

THE rapid decision which both the Queen and the Prime Minister arrived at with reference to the gift of the Garter to the Duke of Newcastle, took some of the nobility by surprise, especially those who thought they had an equal right to the distinction. The Duke of Newcastle has, however, once declined the Order of the Garter. There was a vacancy after the close of the Crimean war, and as the Duke was the secretary of State for War when it commenced and during a considerable part of its progress, Her Majesty paid his grace the high compliment of offering the blue ribbon to him. But a considerable difference of opinion had arisen among the statesmen who composed the original war cabinet, and there was, doubtless, some irritation and considerable wounded feeling. The Duke had retired from office in the height of the war, and, with a high-mindedness all must admire, his grace, with every feeling of gratitude for her Majesty's gracious kindness, declined the proffered honor. It is no wonder, then, that the selection of the Colonial Secretary on this occasion was immediate.

ACCORDING to the recent report of the British Emigration Committee, the number of persons who have quitted the United Kingdom during the last forty-five years amounts to 4,917,498. The emigration was most considerable in the year 1852, when 368,764 persons left their native land to seek a home elsewhere. The great majority of the emigrants are Irish, and a sum of not less than $50,000,000 has been sent to Ireland from America alone to assist intending emigrants in accomplishing the voyage to the New World.

M. DE PERSIGNY has addressed a memorandum on the Liberty of the Press. It is very able, elaborate and subtle, and yet it is full of practical good sense. He candidly declares that the Emperor wishes the Press of France to be as free as that of England, but in order to render the freedom compatible with the safety of the State, it is absolutely necessary that the French Press shall imitate the example of their British neighbors. He reminds the French writers that the English Press does not attempt to overthrow the dynasty or the constitution, but confines itself to its legitimate sphere of fearlessly discussing the government measures, and the exact condition of public affairs. He draws the great distinction that exists between endeavoring to overthrow Lord Palmerston, or any other Minister, or their Ministry, and endeavoring to subvert the ruling family. If the French Press will limit itself to the candid discussion of Government measures, the Emperor will be glad to see it released from all censorship or shackles. Persigny, however, concludes by stating very frankly that should any anti-Napoleon opposition be apparent his will continue whatever it ever has been. We are bound to admit that the distinction drawn by this able Minister of Napoleon is eminently just. A revolutionary Press is the greatest curse a nation can possess.

A MELANCHOLY tragedy was acted a few months since in a vessel on her way from India. She was off the Cape, and the weather being sultry, the captain told the steward to open the window in the store room, which opened from the dining-room, and was in the stern of the ship. The steward having gone, the captain told the steward to bring some wine. The steward, after a pause, went into the store room, shutting the door of the room the captain and his passengers were dining in. The captain waited patiently for some time; and the steward not appearing, he told the cabin-boy to go into the store-room and see what kept the man so long. To the surprise of the boy no one was there—nor was the unhappy steward ever heard of afterwards. He had thrown himself into the sea from the window. It afterwards proved that he had stolen the wine and much of the plate, and unable to face the shame of detection, he had committed suicide.



THE BAPTIST CHURCH AT COLUMBIA, S. C., WHERE THE GREAT SECESSION CONVENTION WAS FIRST HELD, DEC. 17, 1860.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH AT COLUMBIA, S. C.,

The Place of Holding the Great Convention.

THE building of which we present to-day an accurate engraving has taken its place in history. Remarkable, not for any peculiarity in its architectural construction (as one glance at our picture will show), nor for the sum to which it has hitherto been put, it yet derives considerable celebrity from the solemn conclave which recently sat within its walls, that will carry its name adown all the tide of time.

As the old State House at Philadelphia, where the compact that binds these States together stands forth in a mimitia of record on our country's annals, so will the historian of the future hang his rosary of associations about the building where that compact was finally annulled and the Union of these States for ever sundered.

In the long future, when this generation shall have passed away and other generations shall have followed it, these two buildings will be looked back upon with a contrasting interest—one as the scene of the framing of the Constitution of the United States, the other as the scene of that Constitution's utter abrogation. And it is in our character as chroniclers of contemporaneous history that we to-day stamp upon this page the outward semblance of this last-named building.

The Baptist Church of Columbia is, as we have said, not at all a remarkable building, per se. It will suffice for us to say, in description of it, that it has been built but little more than a year, and that the cost of its erection was twenty-two thousand dollars. For the rest, it is a commodious edifice, and capable of accommodating some fifteen hundred persons.

An accident that occurred only two nights before its occupancy by the Convention had well-nigh rendered such occupancy impossible, and deprived the church of that historic fame that is sure to cling about it. It seems that the congregation of the church, in their desire to make everything as comfortable as possible for the delegates, had had a new and additional heater put into the building. In the preliminary trial that was given this new heater on the night of Saturday, the 15th December, the flames were carried up the pipe that was only designed for the passage of smoke, and so communicated with the adjacent woodwork. In a moment that part of the building was in a blaze. The alarm was at once sounded, however, and the fire was extinguished before it had done other than trifling damage, although at one time lively fears were entertained that the whole structure would be destroyed.

The Baptist Church of Columbia is situate on Plain street, a few yards from its intersection by Sumter

THE WINTER FASHIONS.

THE latest intelligence from Paris declares that expense and beauty are on the increase, and that this winter Fashion requires a degree of expense quite unknown of late years. Garments are to be richer, but less eccentric.

The Chapeaux Mousquetaires, Tudor and sans façon are to be abandoned to children. For them latter very elegant Tudors, with long plumes, are the style. With these young girls wear the Corsican Matelot, composed of a striped petticoat in alternate stuff, a sort of linen shirt puffed out, forming a corsage, and a looped belt on one side. Little boys, instead of the petticoat, wear loose pantaloons of the same stuff.

Their mothers are wearing this winter very large bonnets, slightly advancing in front and very much ornamented within. The fashionable colors are vanille, grains or corn color and violet.

The corsets are less warm than ever, whereas are very fashionable and are very suitable for the Reine Gabrielle, a novelty of last winter a guimpe of lace and tulle, sleeves complete the costume, and the hair gathered in long folds in a bee veule.

Besides are very much the fashion; they are made of chenille, silk, velvet; a beautiful one is made of gold thread, with a knot of illusin leather in front. Leather belts are very common, and the same material is employed in corset bows, ornaments of dresses, &c. The large comb is overlooked with jewellery and enamel. Many eccentric innovations in jewellery are noticed.

Cloth paletots with great buttons and side pockets are more the rage than ever. Everybody wears them. No fashion was ever before so general. As it is a most comfortable garment, very stylish and spirited, and not necessarily expensive, since the most fashionable women have them made of cheap, strong cloth, the mode is not to be regretted. The old fashioned dressmakers and fashion editors stand aghast at this new, daring and lively style, and abuse it vigorously. One critic declares it to be "only fit for American women." Another compares it to "the garments which Murrieta Bloomer wished American ladies to wear." But all agree that all the most elegant Parisian dames wear the foreign fashion with eagerness.

Among other fashionable outer garments are the Paletot de Soie Métalisée, the Semiramide, the Lindjeree and the Iolin, all of them very pretty and picturesque, yet common-sensible garments. Some efforts have been made to revive morning dresses of the Louis XIV. style, puffed at the shoulders and ending in one petite queue—"a small frill." But these recent extravagances are to be confined to the domain of the Quartier Breda.

Hoops are much less worn, and there is hope that another season may see them decidedly unfashionable, at least in Paris. Colored petticoats or Balmorals have revived, and are in very general use.

ANCIENT RELICS.—A letter from Athens states that the excavations at Eleusis, Egypt, have led to some interesting discoveries. Under the ruins of a marble edifice, a human skeleton was found, and near it were several broken weapons, precisely like those discovered in the ancient tombs of France and Germany; among them were a knife, an axe and a spear. The skeleton, in all probability, is that of a man employed in demolishing the temple. This discovery seems to confirm the much disputed assertion of the Byzantines, who affirm that the temple of Eleusis was destroyed by the hordes of Alaric, A. D. 300. In the foundations of a small church at Athens, where the Archæological Society has been making excavations, a marble slab has been found, with an inscription, in which the Athenians do honor to the youth under the dominion of Herpillus, then reigning over Argos, because they had presented one hundred books to the library of Ptolemais." At Megara a colossal torso, quite uninjured from the hips downwards, has been found. It belongs to the best epoch of art under Pericles, and is thought to be part of the statue of Apollo, spoken of by Pausanias, in describing the temple on the hill where the statue was found.

PLAN OF THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, S. C., SHOWING THE RELATIVE POSITION OF THE SEVERAL FORTRESSES.

PREVAILING FASHIONS FOR THE WINTER SEASON—MORNING, EVENING AND OUT-DOOR COSTUMES.

ERLE GOWER;

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

CHAPTER XVI.

But all things carry the heart's messages
And know it not, nor doth the heart well know,
But nature hath her will, even as the bees,
Blithe go-betweens, fly singing to and fro
With the fruit-quickening pollen; hard if these Found not some all unthought-of way to show
Their secret each to each. And so they did,
And one's heart's flower-dust into the other slid.—Lowell.

LADY MAUD, with Erle's passionate kiss yet burning on her quivering lips, fled from the weird library to the sanctitude of her own little boudoir, gaining it she knew not how. She nestled with pale face, startling eyes and panting heart upon a soft-cushioned couch standing in a shadowy recess in her apartment, even as an affrighted fawn cowers in its leafy covert after a flight from an unfamiliar footstep.

The event of a moment will convert an unreflecting girl into a thinking woman. An impulse of the heart, perhaps too often, snatches a veil from the impenetrating eyes of youth.

A word, a motion, changed Lady Maud from an innocent, guileless child into a sentient creature—if something less than woman, yet more, much more, than girl.

She covered her face with her hands, her cheeks glowed with hectic warmth, she breathed with difficulty, and a tremor, not unpleasing, pervaded her frame.

When she withdrew herself from the embrace of Erle, an embrace impelled by her own yielding to that influence which the sudden application of the story they together read engendered, she uttered a despairing cry involuntarily, because it seemed to her that the dark menacing form of Philip Avon interposed with fierce gestures between them.

She up to this hour, had listened to the soft flattery of Philip Avon with indifference but not with dissent, because Lady Kingswood had prepared her to receive them as the preliminary advances to a proposal of marriage. She had accepted them without any distinct notion of the importance to be attached either to their meaning or to the marriage which had been planned.

Accustomed to pay deference to the wishes of Lord and Lady Kingswood in minor affairs, she had, without a demur, yielded to the proposition submitted—rather imposed upon her—to become the wife of a man for whom the only impression she entertained beyond apathy was a feeling of dislike.

There was a floating idea in her mind that she would far sooner be united to her cousin Cyril, for he was handsomer, gayer, franker, in all respects a more pleasing and loveable creature. But with this notion also came a conviction that he was destined for another, could never be more to her than he had been or then was, and that her liking for him would never be suffered to stand in the way of an alliance with Philip Avon.

Now Erle stood in a very different category. At her first embarrassing interview with him she felt herself to be strangely smitten with his appearance. At her subsequent meeting with him she was animated by a desire to steal glances at his face undiscovered, without being conscious that she was possessed by any such unrecognised inclination. A strange, hitherto unknown pleasure filled her while seated by his side, and her thoughts of him after he had saved her life were of a tumultuous character, absorbing all other contemplations and reflections.

She in her sweet disturbing, sought the old library, because, in its monastic silence and gray, dusky twilight, she could, without interruption, conjure him up to her vision dignified and graceful in mien and wondrously handsome in feature, but she found him there in the reality.

Still the intercommunion was in all simplicity regarded by her but as a delicious association with one she esteemed, only the pleasanter for being secret, because it was free from intrusion.

Now her eyes were opened.

Her liking, her esteem, her friendship for Erle were, in her innocency, but love symbolised. Her heart had acknowledged him from the first moment she saw him, but it was not until the word Love, which seemed to be written in words of electric light, met her gaze—it was not until he, by an impetuous, uncontrollable urging pressed his lips to hers that her mind saw with the eyes of her heart.

And so she cowered tremblingly upon the soft, cold couch, awakened to the discovery of the possession of a secret, whose wondrous influence on her future life she was as yet wholly unable to realise.

To one fact she became instantaneously and vividly alive—it was that her dislike to Philip Avon had increased tenfold, even yet more as she remembered that she had tacitly assented to accept him as her husband. A rebellious spirit sprung up within her, and with it a resolve to act to him in a manner at once so cold and reserved that he would promptly resign all pretensions to her hand.

She did not reflect that opposition mostly fans the flame of love, or that neither Philip, Lord nor Lady Kingwood were likely to see matters from her point of view. She could only see through a medium of rose-bloom the face and figure of Erle, and a future in which, conducted to him through some difficulties and, perhaps, many trials of faith and firmness, they would be united.

Yet a girl in her thoughts, she was at heart womanly in this: she feared not, cared not, for any danger, sufferings, sharp tests of endurance and patience, so that the young, new love kindled within her fond heart should be at last rewarded by the possession of the object of its adoration.

She felt that no change of circumstance would daunt her, no prospect of those inflictions which darken the prosperity, the ease, the comforts of social life. She was womanly in that her love rose superior to any unfavorable condition of existence into which it might lead her. It was the warm unselfish romance of her girlhood which beheld, in the possession of the being she loved, the subjugation of all the ills which might attend its progress or surround its realisation.

She knew nothing of poverty, toil and trial but what she had witnessed in her occasional visits to London or to the hovels of the most miserable of the tenantry in the vicinity of Kingswood; yet she could form a fair notion of the horrors which the contrast of a change from her present position to such a condition would impose, and she shrunk not from the contemplation of their endurance if they had to be borne for his sake.

Her reasoning took this strange course, owing to misgivings and strong doubts instinctively entertained by her that Lord Kingswood would not sanction her love for Erle, because he had no such wealth and county influence as Philip Avon. Indeed, she could not disguise from herself the impression that Erle was not only a family secret, but one of a painful kind.

She was too well acquainted with the expression of Lord Kingswood's features and his manners not to readily perceive this, and likewise that his lordship would be very glad to be rid of one whose presence, from some hidden but powerful motive, was most unwelcome.

She pitied Erle, and would have been overjoyed at soothing his bruised spirit, and she certainly found her antipathy to Philip Avon strengthened, because he possessed those worldly advantages which Erle lacked.

Hour after hour did she sit and ponder thus, and as Cyril was ill, and neither Lady Kingswood nor his lordship visible, save at a cold and formal dinner, immediately after which they separated, she had the opportunity of indulging in the same description of thought day after day.

At length a week had passed, and her anxious eyes had not once fallen upon the form of Erle.

She had gazed from her window upon the lawn slope, the park glades, the garden terraces, with a yearning to behold him, to watch him, to gaze with admiring eyes upon him, unseen. She peered out at early morn, at midday, and when the sun was declining, but saw him not.

She glided about the corridors occasionally, and with purposeless errand, if he were not there, into apartments into which he might have wandered, but she did not meet with him

Each day she thought of the drear old library, and a glowing blush lit up her cheek when the thought presented itself. She wished, yet feared, to meet him. Perhaps she feared more that he would not be there if she visited it again. At all events, she strove to dismiss the thought, because she re-enacted always the scene which had taken place within its solitary precincts, and with difficulty she kept down the incitings of an inclination which did not acknowledge the supremacy of her will.

But a week is an age to the imagination of one who loves when it is a question of absence, and Lady Maud began to entertain an impression that she should never see Erle again. Perhaps her precipitated flight had brought offence, and he now, in consequence, studiously avoided her. She felt that she would be both grieved and vexed if such an effect had been produced by her conduct.

One morning, about the old time of meeting with him, she found herself within the grim and silent chamber alone. A spirit in her feet seemed to have borne her thither. She gazed around her with shivering fear, but her anxious eyes were not rewarded by beholding him in his accustomed place.

She sat herself in the seat where they had sat together, and she waited.

Waited hopelessly, for he came not. No sound of footfall, known or strange to her timid ear, disturbed the solemn stillness of the antique hall. She was alone—alone with the living words of a past age.

Aye, her eye wandered in search of that book which had, in revealing the loves of others, unfolded her own. She saw it in its place on the case, and impulsively moved towards it. With a throbbing heart and trembling hand she drew forth the book, and with it took her way to that seat whereon she sat when the thrilling words its pages contained unveiled her eyes.

There was no intention in the whole proceeding. Her movements had been mechanically performed under some vague, undefined impression that the glowing language which had taught her she had a heart, even by a knowledge of its loves, must be perused and stored in her memory for reproduction at some future period—probably an eventful epoch in her life to come.

At the very place where they had ceased to read did she open the book.

There was some pencilling on the broad margin. She knew that it had been recently placed there, and she readily guessed whose hand had inscribed the lines which met her eye.

With suspended breath and with eager avidity she read as follows:

"Your eyes may again fall upon this page—I feel that they will. I entreat your pardon; for oh my rash, frenzied indiscretion, was no intended insult, but the passionate impulse of a fond heart, which, seeking a loving reciprocity, found unexpectedly the object of its adoration. Aye, I, too, have found friendship but another name for love. I love—oh, I love deeply passionately, truly. I dare not ask reciprocity—I do not. I see, I know that it may not be, yet I may ask a thought in gentleness, a memory in kindness, and a prayer in pity. The reflection that this hope may be granted will cheer a lonely wanderer in desolation and despair."

The face of Lady Maud bowed on the old page, and she sobbed bitterly. Many times did she read those pencilled words, written in no unsteady hand. With tearful eyes she copied them, and placed the words she had copied in her bosom.

Then she, too, wrote on the margin beneath the lines she had transcribed, and her words were,

"Pardon! for the proud offering of such a heart as thine! Nay. It is not a word befitting thy lips. Am I not indebted to thee for life itself? If thy friendship hath proved to be love, shall mine be less generous, tender, devoted? Oh, speak not of desolation or despair. Oh, my love, my heart acknowledges no other lord but thou."

With blushing neck, face, forehead, she wrote those words with rapid haste, and amid falling tears. Then she turned her humid eyes restlessly and swiftly round her, hurriedly pressed her lips to the sentences he had written, restored the book to its old place, and then fled from the silent, grim old library, even as she had done when she quitted it with Erle's kiss burning on her lips—even as now it did.

Flushed, disturbed, excited, she entered her little sanctuary, with the intent of remaining there alone enjoying and feeding those fond thoughts which she had been unable after all to peacefully indulge in within the solitary chamber she had visited for that purpose.

Further disguise from herself was useless. She loved Erle, and she had penned the acknowledgement in a place where his eyes might meet with it she knew not how soon—it could not be too soon if it spared him that desolation and despair which he had so touchingly mentioned.

Even while she thought this, she was summoned to a reception-room by a servant sent to her by Lord Kingswood.

For a moment she hesitated, but a latent hope of seeing Erle induced her to follow the man-servant almost immediately.

She entered the room, and beheld in it, to her dismay, Philip Avon and Lord Kingswood only, and they were engaged in a close and earnest conversation.

Philip Avon was ghastly pale, but his cheek flushed when she entered the room.

He instantly quitted Lord Kingswood, and advanced towards her, and his bright, dark eye seemed to peruse her fair features with a stern, suspicious scrutiny, as if there he could read all that had occurred in his despite during his temporary illness.

She paused as he approached, nay, rather shrunk back as he drew near to her, and he bit his nether lip passionately, for his quick eye detected her involuntary movement.

"Lady Maud," he exclaimed, touching her reluctant hand, and pressing it as she withdrew it somewhat hastily, "I am glad to find that you have not suffered from your untoward accident, and I am equally pleased to be able to assure you that my own mishap has been productive of the inconvenience only of confining me to my chamber for a short time, an inconvenience which has been chiefly vexing because it has precluded my offering to you that tribute of respectful attention I, of all men, was most anxious to pay."

"I am rejoiced to think, Mr. Avon, that your accident was less severe than I understood it to be," replied Lady Maud, with downcast eyes and in a formal tone. "I regret, however, it should have happened at all, and especially that I should have been the occasion of it."

"And I regret it, too," he said, with marked emphasis. "Believe me, Lady Maud, but for the cursed obstinacy of my horse, mine would have been the hand to have saved your life. No interloper should have crossed between myself and your safety."

Lady Maud's face crimsoned, and she said, with grave haughtiness,

"If, sir, by that most ungracious word, interloper, you allude to Mr. Gower, you may take my word that I, at least, am thankful he was near to me on that momentous occasion."

"That person's name I do not desire to repeat in your presence, Lady Maud," rejoined Philip Avon, brusquely. "I hardly expected it to fall so roundly from your lips. I hope I shall never hear them mention it again."

"I do not understand you, sir," she returned, with evident indignation, and her eyes fell upon Lord Kingswood, who listened in uneasy embarrassment.

"Pardon me, Lady Maud," answered Philip, with the same abruptness of speech, "but I am particular in the choice of associates. I like to know whence they spring; besides I hate men who are mere dependents, cringing for the crumbs that fall from their patron's table."

Lady Maud's face and neck crimsoned again. She turned her eyes upon Lord Kingswood, and said, with lips that quivered so she could scarcely articulate,

"Surely, my lord, you do not hear Mr. Avon's observations as applied to Mr. Gower. He appears to labor under some singular misconceptions which force him into insults. Your lordship will probably, explain them away, so that Mr. Avon may not forget his own position in condemning that of a gentleman of whom he appears to know nothing, and whom, in disparaging, he most unjustly traduces."

She turned to quit the room in haughty anger.

Philip hastily arrested her departure. He saw that his temper had carried him too far, and he said,

"Stay, Lady Maud, I pray you. I had no intention, I most earnestly assure you, to offend you. I shall some day cure myself of my bluntness, even at the expense of my honesty. But I hope that you will pardon and forgive me if I have unintentionally offended you."

"Excuse me, Mr. Avon," she answered, coldly. "Good morning."

"Nay, Maud, do not go—remain, remain; Mr. Philip wishes to speak to you," suddenly exclaimed Lord Kingswood, ringing a bell violently as he spoke. "I will hereafter set him right about Mr. Gower; that is an affair of little moment. Mr. Avon desires some conversation with you upon matters which supersede all others. Oh, Pharisee," he exclaimed, as the sleek valet glided into the room and made up to him, "find Lady Kingswood, and inform her ladyship that she would oblige me by stepping here as quickly as convenient to her."

"Lady Kingswood has just conducted Mr. Gower to the portrait gallery of your lordship's ancestors, my lord," returned Pharisee, in a low tone but sufficiently clear to be heard both by Philip Avon and Lady Maud.

Lord Kingswood started as if bitten by a serpent.

"Is her ladyship mad?" he exclaimed, between his teeth, and rushed out of the room with frantic haste.

Pharisee glanced furtively at both Philip Avon and Lady Maud, and then glided like a fiendish phantom after his master.

Lady Maud felt a pang of vexation at this intelligence. She knew not why. Wherefore did Lady Kingswood press her attentions so upon Erle? There was something very strange in such conduct from her.

Before she could answer herself this unpleasing question Philip Avon touched her upon the arm to recall her from the sudden fit of abstraction into which she had fallen. She started and drew back. He gazed at her with surprise and anger which he strove to keep from bursting forth. She had not treated him thus distantly previous to the arrival of the accursed Gower. Though he hated her apparent fondness for her cousin Cyril, still she had not suffered it to prevent her being gentle and agreeable in her behavior to him. Now she acted to him as if he was positively distasteful to her.

Afraid of the personal attractions of Gower, he had risen from a sick bed before it was safe even to do so, in order that he might declare himself, and secure Lady Maud.

He was sure of Lord Kingswood's assent, and resolved to employ his influence to obtain Lady Maud's; to wring it from her if that were necessary; and now that he found himself alone with her, he decided upon quenching any presumptuous hopes Erle might entertain respecting her by at once making a formal proposition.

Accordingly, as with a slight, haughty bend, she sought to pass him, he placed himself before her, and said,

"Lady Maud, I have especially requested Lord Kingswood to obtain for me a private interview with you. His lordship consented, as you find by his request for your presence here, and at my wish we are alone, in order that I may lay before you a confession of which I have for some time wished to disburthen myself."

Lady Maud looked at him with a frightened aspect.

"You must excuse me, Mr. Avon," she exclaimed, hurriedly, "I cannot listen to you now—I—I see my cousin Cyril upon the lawn; I have not spoken to him since his illness. Do not think me rude in leaving you; Lord Kingswood will be here in a few minutes——"

Philip Avon interrupted her.

"Lady Maud," he exclaimed, with a malignant scowl upon his sickly face, "this is the merest subterfuge; I must be plain, even at the expense of being for the moment, less pleasant than I would wish to be. My business with your ladyship is of far greater moment than a girlish offering of congratulation to a stupid fellow who has got his head bruised in a brawl in the wood, or to discuss the merits of an obscure personage pitchforked into a noble house.

Lady Maud looked at him in speechless surprise.

If he thought to woo her, as William the Norman did Matilda of Flanders, he found out his mistake speedily.

"Sir," she exclaimed, with a dignity ennobled by her indignation, "I am unequal to the task of defining the limit to which an insult may be extended without giving offence. I decline further to listen to you."

She swept past him with a swift, gliding step, and in another instant was gone.

He clenched his hands, he smote his breast, the veins on his forehead swelled like cords, foam bubbled from his lips. For a moment it seemed that the tremendous inward struggle he was enduring would slay him. At length a species of howl burst from him, and he muttered between his gnashing teeth,

"I see it all. The hound has improved the occasion, and with battered, honied words, has lured his tercel. Oh, but we will have our meeting yet. Let Providence spare him, I will not. Ho! there!" he cried, with harsh tones, as a servant passed the door. "Conduct me to Mr. Gower's apartment; I wish to speak with him."

With hasty step he hurried from the room, and followed whither the servant led.

CHAPTER XVII.

'Tis to create, and in creating live,
A being more intense, that we endow
With form our fancy, gaining as we give
The life we image, even as I do now.
What am I? Nothing: but not so art thou,
Soul of my thoughts, with whom I traverse earth
Invisible but gazing, as I glow,
Mix'd with thy spirit, blended with thy birth,
And feeling still with thee in my crushed feelings' dearth.—Byron.

THE sudden blast of wintry wind which created so wild and deafening a clangor as it swept fiercely through the antique gallery, committing havoc on rusty hauberks, surcoats and mouldering banners, seemed to have expended its fury when it hurled to the ground the portrait of the bad Baron of Kingswood.

With the uproar of the falling picture, the gust died away in one long, mournful moan, which the arched roof echoed again and again.

In a paroxysm of mortal fright Pharisee fled, and Lord Kingswood was left alone with his senseless wife and unacknowledged son.

In horror, as in amazement, each stood regarding the other, until a dead and almost awful stillness prevailed once more in the old gallery.

Erle was the first to recover himself, and he advanced towards Lord Kingswood, as if to assist in the recovery of Lady Kingswood, but his lordship motioned him away with vehement gestures.

"Stand back!" he cried, with angry fury. "Thou art here as a curse to me! I summoned you not, but you appear as a destroying spirit, come to crush my peace and annihilate my hopes. Go—leave me—away! quit Kingswood for ever! I will dare all, endure the worst realization of my wildest apprehensions, rather than continue to submit to the torture of thy accursed presence. Go, wretch! a lifetime cannot repay the evil you have already wrought here!"

Erle felt, as he listened to this vituperative burst from Lord Kingswood, as if every word had stabbed him. Wonder, pride and haughty resentment struggled with a desire to preserve a show of respect to the rank and position of Lord Kingswood as the head of the house of Kingswood. Nevertheless, it was impossible for him to conceal the agony which this indignity inflicted upon him, and even Lord Kingswood, excited as he was, almost cowed beneath the gleam of indignant wrath that flashed from Erle's glittering eyes.

He, with a strong effort of the will, however, controlled his bitter anger, and with a mien of dignified loftiness, he said,

"I go, my lord, at your bidding; thine the responsibility, not mine."

He strode towards the door, and, moved by an irresistible influence, he turned and faced Lord Kingswood, who had watched him stalk away with something of the same demeanor he would have gazed at the slow evanishment of a spectre.

He extended his hand pointedly to Lord Kingswood.

"A higher power than yours directs my future," he exclaimed; and raising his voice, he added, emphatically—"My lord, we shall meet again!"

"We shall meet again" was re-echoed through the gallery, it seemed by another voice, but without heeding it, because it seemed to him that the vaulted roof had flung back his words, he departed, and hastened to his own chamber, leaving Lord Kingswood alone still supporting the lifeless form of Lady Kingswood.

He flung himself upon a seat with a purpose of allaying, as far as he could, his irritated and perturbed feelings, before he determined upon the direction he should pursue on leaving Kingswood.

Goaded almost to madness as he had been by the stinging words of Lord Kingswood, he still did not intend to be so unwise as to act with precipitate recklessness. Remain beneath the roof which then sheltered him longer than imperative necessity compelled him he would not. But where to go?

He had the address of Ishmael Malpas, but he recoiled from making any use of it. Ishmael might, as he had declared himself to be, prove a friend, yet not in the sense in which he interpreted the word. During his past life he certainly had educated, clothed and kept him, but had never visited him. He had placed him beneath the roof of Kingswood Hall, but upon what terms?

His forehead burned and his cheeks tingled as he recalled Lord Kingswood's latest words.

No; he decided that he would not seek Ishmael, but fight his own way in the world, with no other aid than his head, his good right arm and a stout heart.

Still, with a burning flush upon his forehead, he thought of the mystery which surrounded his birth.

"Better let it remain to me a mystery," he said, with a burst of emotion, "than I should have to hear matters, every word of which would contract and petrify my heart until it became a deadened mass of stone."

And thus he sat and pondered. One charm alone had bound him to Kingswood, but that had been rudely dissipated; what mattered it to him where henceforward he wandered!

It occurred then to him that Lord Kingswood's valet, Pharisee, had spoken to him of London, and he remembered that he had heard strange stories respecting the mighty city; how humble boys had risen to mighty wealth; how a village boy of wild, irregular habits, had won India for England; how equally humble youths had commanded fleets and vast armies, leading them to great victories, by which they were themselves immortalised.

A glow of enthusiasm pervaded his frame and lighted up his eloquent eyes.

"Thither will I go," he cried, earnestly. "The prize of fame and honor will not be denied to him who zealously, ardently and unceasingly seeks to win it."

Within an hour from that time he had packed his valise and had despatched it by one of the men working in the grounds to the railway station, situated a few miles distant, there to await him.

"A few hours," he soliloquised, "and I shall be far from all who have known me, and among strangers, caring less for me even than those I have parted with. So be it. I bear with me at least a memory they cannot rob me of!"

He drew from his breast the flowers and the glove he had found in the library, and he pressed them to his lips.

A low, contemptuous, harsh laugh grated upon his ear as he did this, and raising his moistened eyes, he beheld Philip Avon standing in the doorway.

"Love tokens, by all that is namby-pamby!" exclaimed his unwelcome visitor, scornfully. "Pray, from what pretty fool did you purloin them?"

Erle rose up, and sternly regarding Philip, restored the flowers and glove whence he had taken them.

"I am told, sir, that you are a descendant from an old family!" exclaimed Erle, his anger obtaining the mastery. "I do not believe it. A gentleman, I am sure you are not; a boor's changeling, doubtless. You could not otherwise be so obtusely ignorant of the commonest courtesies of life."

"Dog!" ejaculated Philip Avon, fiercely, advancing towards him.

Erle raised his hand to put him back.

"Remain where you are," he said fiercely and disdainfully. "This is not the spot at which you appointed to meet me; this floor is not the ground on which to settle the hostility to me which you have paraded, unless you desire to raise suspicions you profess to desire to avoid."

An oath intemperately escaped Philip's lips, and he clenched his hands as though he designed to strike Erle to the earth. The latter, however, only regarded him with more contempt than before, and continued in a tone of voice which made Philip writhe with torture:

"I kept the appointment you made. I wandered about the deserted glade morning after morning, from dawn until long after the sun had tipped the trees, but as I might have expected, the solitude was disturbed by my own step alone."

"Illness kept me confined, raging within my chamber," champed Philip furiously. "You knew it, and lorded the ground like a pigeon of the woods which flies at a footstep from the spot on which it has been strutting."

Erle's lip curled yet more scornfully.

"I was pacing on the appointed spot this morning at dawn; and you—you are well enough to swagger here like a Gascon—less his courage."

"Now—now this moment, we can adjourn to the Chace," exclaimed Philip, foaming at the lips.

"No," replied Erle, coldly. "I am not anxious to raise suspicions: too many of the household are about. To-morrow, at dawn, I will be at the place named, and alone."

With a chuckling growl of vindictive hate, Philip rejoined:

"Oh, but I will be awaiting you to-morrow at dawn in Kingswood Chace."

"To-morrow, at dawn," repeated Erle.

With a triumphant fire in his black eyes, and a scowl of hatred on his brow, Philip, waving his hand with a contemptuous gesture, hurried from the apartment.

But for the following morning's engagement thus contracted, Erle would have taken his departure from Kingswood too; as it was he flung himself again in his chair to remain beneath the now hated roof yet a few hours longer.

He had an impulsive wish to pay Cyril a visit, to say a few words to him ere they parted for ever for he liked him, notwithstanding his first unfavorable impression, but he restrained the inclination for fear he would put some question to him concerning Philip Avon which he might find it difficult to answer.

He therefore kept his chamber, and watched the red sun sink down behind the distant hills, with the sad feeling that upon its rising its ruddy beams might either tint his lifeless limbs in their last repose upon the green turf in the Chace, or his retreating form as he made his way towards the haunts of men, the most friendless stranger among the homeless and the outcast.

In the gray dusk he sat, his thoughts wandering from his earliest childhood, through his boyish tasks, struggles, few pleasures, even down to his meeting with Lady Maud; there they rested and nestled.

Should he not write a word to her? No. He had written all he cared, or indeed he could say, upon the margin of that leaf, upon which he felt sure she would again cast her sweet tender eyes. What more could he say? He loved her, and he prayed her kind remembrance of him. That remembrance would hang over his forest grave, if he fell, like a wreath of immortelles above the tomb of one beloved, or it would shine before him, if he lived, as a lodestar leading him on to high and ennobling actions, that he might, though never more his solicitous eyes might be gladdened by her presence, become worthy of that gentle memory.

Wearied out by excitement and over-wrought reflections, he sank into a fitful, disturbed slumber, from which he started to find Lord Kingswood's valet, Pharisee, bending over him, scrutinising with strange eagerness every feature of his face.

He rose up, and Pharisee fell back, assuming a respectful attitude. Erle eyed him for a minute curiously, and then said, with evident surprise, "Why do you visit me at this late hour, Pharisee?"

"For more than one reason, Mr Gower," returned the man, with an obsequious air and a sidelong glance at him. "I must request your pardon if I appear obtrusive and officious; it is not my design to be either, yet I feel that the step I have taken, and the observations I may make may wear that complexion. I entreat you not to misconceive me. I have enjoyed the confidence of Lord Kingswood for many, many years, and that of her ladyship also—that is partly—partly Mr. Gower—for Lady Kingswood is of that sex which delights in reservations. I honor and respect both, but I honor and respect you, too, Mr. Gower."

Erle's lip curled.

"Respect and honor me," he said, bitterly; "I am an unknown, a creature to be placed in unfrequented chambers, to be located in sequestered quarters, to have prescribed limits set down for the controlment of my wanderings, to move in a circle whose point of contact at any part comes not in collision with the revolutions of my Lord of Kingswood's sphere. Honor me! for what, man? Am I——"

"A secret," interposed Pharisee, in a sharp, sibilant tone. "A secret, Mr. Gower. Pardon me for the observation. It is not a suggestion of my own, but the spontaneous presumption of the whole household. A secret which they believe you can reveal if you will. I, however, I——"

He paused, glanced furtively at Erle, and then made a figure with the point of his foot upon the carpet.

"Proceed," exclaimed Erle, impatiently.

"I do not believe that you are able to make, if you feel so disposed, this revelation."

"Wherefore?" inquired Erle, haughtily.

"Excuse me," replied the valet, with a slow inclination of the head, "some day I will be more explicit on this head."

"Some day" echoed Erle, bitterly, "still the same story."

Pharisee looked steadfastly into Erle's eyes, but with a sinister glance nevertheless.

"Be assured, sir, of one thing," he exclaimed, with a marked and peculiar emphasis, "there is one fact which cannot be kept secret from those who have eyes in their heads, and brains in their skulls; you are a Kingswood!"

Erle started, and turned a wild, eager and unsettled look upon Pharisee. A rush of thought raced through his mind. He remembered vividly at this moment Lady Kingswood's emphatic question to her husband in the ancient picture gallery. He recalled Ishmael's strange observations respecting the claim he had to be received beneath the roof which now covered him, and that it was a duty he owed to another to enforce that claim. A hazy remembrance of dreams with which he had been visited while sleeping in the old portion of the building crossed his brain. His face and lips became of the hue of marble. He stood motionless as a statue, and involuntarily he murmured—

"The heir of the race, by God's holy grace,
Shall solve the Wonder of Kingswood Chace."

"Ah! Mr. Gower, there lies the difficulty!" exclaimed Pharisee, shrugging his shoulders. "What is the Wonder of Kingswood Chace? Nobody knows. The present Lord Kingswood became Lord Kingswood after his father's death. He was the heir of the race; he has never solved the mysterious riddle nor his father before him. His father, by-the-bye, like all the heirs of this barony since the bad baron, lived unhappily and died miserably."

"A Kingswood!" ejaculated Erle, not seeming to heed what he said. "A Kingswood—I a Kingswood?"

"A veritable Kingswood, I'd be sworn," responded Pharisee.

Erle pressed his hand upon his forehead. If he truly were a Kingswood in what relation did he stand to Lord and Lady Kingswood and their son?

A hot flush of scarlet scorched his brow; a quiver of intense agony wrung his heart; a suffocating emotion almost rendered his voice inarticulate as he asked,

"Has Lord Kingswood been twice married?"

"I do not—nay, the world knows not that," returned Pharisee, musingly, as if a new suspicion rose up in his brain; "but," he added, "I do not believe, though difficult, it would be impossible to ascertain that fact. If it pleases you I will make the necessary inquiries, and acquaint you with the result."

Erle pressed his clenched fist upon his chest—

"It is a point upon which I greatly wish for information," he rejoined, rather as if soliloquising than replying to Pharisee's offer.

"You may rely upon me," returned the valet, with a promptness the celerity of which was a little remarkable; and he added, with some volubility—"Indeed, Mr. Gower, the object of my visit to you has some connection with an inquiry of this kind. To tell you the truth, sir, you are at this moment, if not the Wonder of Kingswood Chace, the Wonder of Kingswood. Every guest visiting here recently has betrayed an extraordinary desire to know who you are. They talk, they question, they surmise, until Lord Kingswood is flung into a paroxysm of frenzy, by the notice you have excited. His lordship's design, therefore, in order that his life may sail down the unruffled channel it has hitherto pursued as smoothly as before, was to keep you a prisoner in the unfrequented part of the household, and confine your rambles to the unvisited portions of the Chace. Circumstances have altered this intention——"

"What circumstances?" inquired Erle, sternly.

"Well, Lady Kingswood's uneasiness respecting you," he replied. "Lady Kingswood is yet comparatively young; she is exceedingly handsome; looks younger by much than she is. She is a lady one might love burningly—passionately—madly love——"

"Fellow! are you mad?" cried Erle, in a loud, fierce tone.

Pharisee's features seemed to congeal and turn blue.

"I—I—I—I—I beg a thousand pardons," he stammered—"a million pardons, for my exaggerated expressions—a—a—a—what I sought to convey was that Lady Kingswood's jealousy of Lord Kingswood might lead her to imagine many erroneous things. His lordship, quite aware of this fact, has determined to make such alteration in his designs respecting you, as to resolve to remove you from England to some far place where the climate would work a fatal result with more certainty than even knife or poison."

"I will not bear such villainous suggestions respecting his lordship from any lips—especially from yours. Leave me instantly. I will not further listen to you," cried Erle, angrily.

"I was fearful that you would misconceive me, Mr. Gower," observed Pharisee, deprecatingly. "I do not, I beg you expressly to understand, even by implication intend to assert that Lord Kingswood would dream of employing such horrible weapons to remove you from life, but I do assert that he is very anxious to be relieved from your presence."

"I know that," Erle replied, gloomily.

"I came here, therefore, to counsel you to take the first step," he continued, "to remove yourself—say to London—that is the place. Within its vast recesses and extensive districts you may remain, if you please, concealed, or you may, in its open and high places show yourself at will. There you may dictate terms to his lordship, here you would have to accept them. There, free and untrammelled, you can live as you choose, and roam where your fancy leads you, indulging in gaieties and pleasures of all kinds, for which, if needful, I will advance the money——"

Erle frowned, and with an imperious gesture, said, indignantly,

"Leave me. I have heard too much. Begone!"

"You misapprehend me, Mr. Gower," urged Pharisee, adopting a humble, obsequious manner.

"Do not misapprehend me," returned Erle, haughtily. "If you do not this instant quit me I will fling you out of my chamber. The fault was mine to listen to you, or I would do so now. Do not tempt me. Go!"

There was no possibility of "misapprehending" Erle's earnestness of his intention to keep his promise. Pharisee, therefore, shrugged his shoulders, bowed humbly, and retired, saying,

"I did all for the best. You will appreciate my motives some day, Mr Gower."

He closed the door behind him, and he bit his colorless lips, when alone, until the blood almost came.

"Aye," he muttered, "you shall know me better—you shall some day appreciate my motives, when I have more thoroughly gauged your nature, and I know how to work upon it to revenge your insult, boy. Base born, I will swear, and will prove at the moment when, crushing you, it crowns my fortune."

With noiseless steps he slunk away, leaving behind him the lamp which he had brought with him.

Leaving behind him, too, the fruitful source of distracting thoughts to Erle, who flung himself upon his couch, a prey to reflections and conjectures of a character almost maddening to him.

He tossed and rolled wildly, until, unable to endure the torture of mind he was suffering, he resolved to pass the remainder of the interval between then and his approaching meeting with Philip Avon in the cold air and black tree-shadows of the Chace.

He arose, threw a broad cloak around his shoulders, caught up the lamp, and without casting a glance even round his apartment, he stepped lightly out into the corridor, made his way to that part of the building where he had previously obtained egress to the Chace, and with the key he yet retained, unlocked the door leading to the flight of old stone steps.

He descended them, gazing, by the aid of the lamp, upon the ancient, crumbling stone walls which he had not before the opportunity of observing, and at length reached a door situated, he was sure, far above the depth to which he had formerly descended.

He applied the key he possessed to the lock, and the door opened readily. A blast of night air blew out his lamp, but he saw stars twinkling above him, and the sky, gray with the light of a crescent moon, slowly descended from the meridian towards the horizon.

This, then, was the door by which it was originally intended he should make his way from the rear of the building to the Chace; the one he had pursued was therefore a secret entrance, which he had discovered by accident.

He thought little of this; it was easy to conjecture that it had been formed in early and troublous times, when such precautionary modes of egress or approach were important to safety. Fastening the door he stepped out upon the grassy sward which extended in this part down to the very walls. The building threw a deep shadow upon the turf, extending for some distance, and to the limits of this shadow he proceeded, and then turned his face towards the building.

It uprose against the sky a solid but straggling mass, here castellated with turrets and battlements, there with pointed roof and pinnacled crests of an ecclesiastical character, and anon tall, square and compact, fringed with abutments, and overlooked by a campanile tower, from the sharply defined edge of whose dark, square, soaring form appeared a portion of the diminished disc of the moon.

He stood with folded arms, and gazed upon it long and earnestly. Many strange thoughts passed through his mind, mingled with hopes, aspirations and even simple wishes. The sombre, silent and solemn aspect of the building, which seemed to him to have contumeliously ejected him, gave the very saddest and most painful turn to his contemplations; and the remembrance that a few short hours would find him in the throes of a mortal struggle, tended to lighten but little his heavy dejection.

"Farewell, Kingswood!" he exclaimed, in a low and mournful tone. "It must be long ere again I look upon your tall turrets or tread your proud halls. It may be that I now look my last. I could have parted from you without a sigh. I could have turned my back upon you with a smile of scorn, but that you hold encased the fairest, gentlest, loveliest creature the breath of Heaven ever called into being. Yes, I could have quitted you with high disdain, but that within your walls I leave all that I have ever loved. Oh, Lady Maud—sweet, pure, innocent as beautiful—I cannot leave thee without a sharp pang of agony—I cannot tear myself from the spot wherein you dwell a star in the cold, gloomy shade of haughty exclusiveness, and not feel the full bitterness of my utter desolation."

For a moment his emotion choked him, but conquering it, he added, as he outspread his arms,

"Farewell, Maud, farewell! The Great Being who looks down upon me standing here, lonely and isolated from all the living world but you—and you save in thought—sees my heart, and He knows that in its unstained depths you reign queen, sovereign and supreme. That if I am spared in the coming encounter with a vindictive and merciless foe, there shall you still reign, your dominion unshared by other created being, or invaded by crime or any meaner vices; for I will thrust myself out of life rather than be guilty of an ignoble act which, by association, should shame the unflawed integrity of the kingdom you rule and shall ever. I go to my banishment—I go with a full, proud, but a sad heart. Oh, Maud! one thought of me when surrounded by the gay and happy—one thought while circling with the joyous throngs in brilliant, gilded saloons—one thought in the deep quiet of night in your silent chamber, while I keep my lonely vigil with earnest eyes turned to that fair star in the unclouded expanse of Heaven, most nearly in my vision representing your bright loveliness and lustrous purity. I ask but that, and the cares, the dangers, the hardships and trammels of toil, the bitterness of isolation, will set lightly upon the spirit whose only aspiration now is to greet with hopeful yearning the time when, in the better land—perhaps, for me, not afar—my shade may meet thy gentle spirit on fair terms of equal love and bliss unclouded. Farewell, Maud, dearest one and only beloved. May the blessings of a smiling Heaven be strewn as flowers in thy life-path. May thy gentle heart never, never know the cruel misery and the deadly anguish which now crushes mine. Farewell!"

He sunk upon his knees and clasped his hands fervently as he offered up to Heaven this orison; and when he had completed it, sprung to his feet, turned his back upon the Hall, and set his face to the dark and seemingly intricate mass of trees, whose boughs and branches, though shorn of leaves, yet screened from observation that secluded part of the old Chace where he had engaged to meet, for a passage of deadly strife, his malignant foe and rival, Philip Avon.

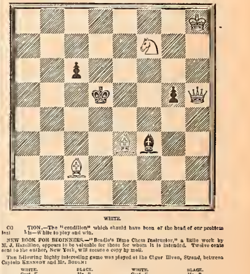
(To be continued.)

CHESS.

All communications and newspapers intended for the Chess Department should be addressed to T. Frere, Office of Home Life Insurance Co., 16 Wall St., N. Y.

PROBLEM No. 277.—By E. H. C., Baltimore. White to play and checkmate in three moves.

BLACK.



WHITE.

CO[illegible]TION.—The "condition" which should have been at the head of our problem last [illegible] is—White to play and win.

NEW BOOK FOR BEGINNERS.—"Beadle's Dime Chess Instructor," a little work by M. J. Hazeltine, appears to be valuable for those for whom it is intended. Twelve cents sent to the author, New York, will secure a copy by mail.

The following highly interesting game was played at the Cigar Divan, Strand, between Captain KENNEDY and Mr. BODEN:

WHITE. Capt. K.	BLACK. Mr. B.	WHITE. Capt. K.	BLACK. Mr. B.
1 P to K 4	P to K 4	24 Q to K B 3	P to Q B 4
2 Kt to K B 3	Kt to Q B 3	25 B to K B 2	P to K Kt 3
3 B to Kt 5	P to Q R 3	26 K to Q 3	Q R to Kt
4 B to R 4	Kt to K B 3	27 P to Q B 4	K to R
5 P to Q 4	P tks Q P	28 R to K (d)	Q to K Kt
6 P to K 5	Kt to K 5	29 B to Kt 6	B tks Kt
7 Castles	B to K 2	30 P tks B	B to Q 3
8 Kt tks P	Castles	31 B tks B (e)	R tks B
9 Kt tks Kt	Q P tks Kt	32 P to K 7	K R to K
10 Q to K 2	Kt to Q B 4	33 P tks P	Q tks Kt P
11 B to Kt 3	Q B to B 4 (a)	34 K R to K 2	K to Kt 2
12 Q Kt to B 3	Q to K (b)	35 R to K 6	R tks R (f)
13 P to K B 4	P to K R 3	36 R tks R	Q to Q Kt 8 (ch)
14 Q B to K 3	Kt tks K B	37 K to Kt 2	Q tks P (ch)
15 R P tks Kt	Q to Q 2 (c)	38 K to Kt 3	Q to Q 3
16 Q to K R 5	Q R to K	39 P to K R 4	P to Q R 4 (g)
17 Q R to Q	Q to K 3	40 P to K R 5	P to Q Kt 4
18 P to K Kt 4	Q to K Kt 3	41 K to R 4 (h)	Q to Q Kt 7 (i)
19 R to K B 2	P to K B 3	42 R to K 2	Q to Q B 8
20 R to K Kt 2	B to Q B	43 R to K 3	Q to Q B 7 (k)
21 P to K B 5	Q to K R 3	44 R to K 2	Q to Q B 8
22 P to K 6	Q R to Q	45 R to K 3, and draws.
23 B to Q 4	P to Q Kt 3

(a) Black's best play is, probably, to take K B with Kt here, and then play B to Q B 4 with an even game.

(b) A lost move, as the sequel shews.

(c) This shows that playing the Q to K sq was of no avail.

(d) By taking K Kt P with Pawn, White might have won a P for a time; but as Black would have replied with Q to K Kt 2, the Pawns being broken up would, in all probability, have fallen ultimately.

(e) Instead of this move, which allows Black to escape with a pretty even game, White should have pushed P to K 7, and then taken Q B P with B, having a decided advantage.

(f) Black's best play; from this point the positions become very instructive and interesting.

(g) Perhaps P to Q Kt 4 would have been better for Black, as he would have threatened by next advancing P to Q B 5, to move Q to Q 6, so as to exchange Queens whenever White plays Q to K B 6, the terrible move he is preparing for by advancing the Pawn on the K's file.

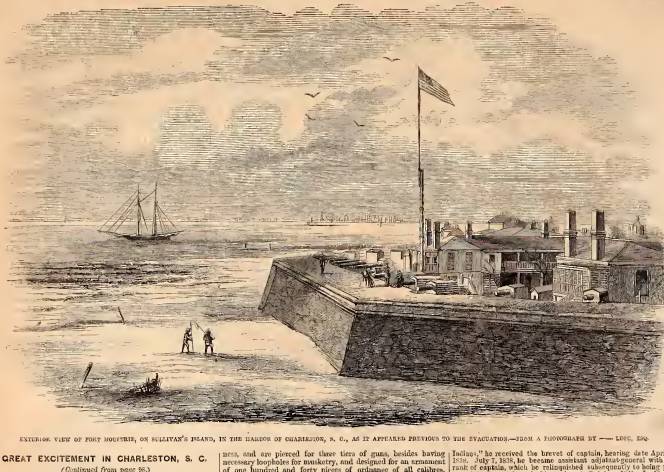
(h) To prevent Black's checking with Queen at K Kt 8, when White moves Q to K B 6.

(i) The only move to save the game, for had Black played any indifferent move, White placing Q at K B 6 would have given him a won game.

(k) The situation is very critical, for had Black instead moved Q to Q 7, White would have won the game by moving Q to K B 5.—Eds.

A YOUNG rustic told his priest at confession that he had broken down his neighbor's hedge to get at a blackbird's nest. The priest asked him if he had taken away the young birds. "No," said he, "they were hardly grown enough. I will let them alone until Saturday evening." No more was said on the subject; but when Saturday evening came the young fellow found the nest empty, and readily guessed who it was that had forestalled him. The next time he went to confession he had to tell something in which a young girl was partly concerned. "Oh," said his ghostly father, "how old is she?" "Seventeen." "Good-looking?" "The prettiest girl in the village." "What is her name? Where does she live?" the confessor hastily inquired, and then he got for an answer the phrase which has passed into a proverb, "Try that upon somebody else, Mr. Fisher of Blackbirds."

A MAN was mobbed the other day through a wag's saying that his wife was daily imprisoned in an iron cage. It turned out that the cage was a steel hooped skirt.



EXTERIOR VIEW OF FORT MOULTRIE, ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND, IN THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON, S. C., AS IT APPEARED PREVIOUS TO THE EVACUATION.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY —— LUCE, ESQ.

GREAT EXCITEMENT IN CHARLESTON, S. C.

(Continued from page 98.)

Fort Sumpter.

Fort Sumpter is one of the most powerful military works in the United States. It is built on an artificial island, immediately within the mouth of Charleston bay, between Fort Moultrie and the site of old Fort Johnson, of Revolutionary memory, and equidistant from those points about three-fourths of one mile. The ship channel leading from the sea to the city of Charleston is between Forts Sumpter and Moultrie, and is entirely commanded within half range by them. Between Forts Sumpter and Johnson the water is very shallow, only available for vessels of very light draft, and then only at high water. The artificial island on which Fort Sumpter is built is constructed of the refuse from the granite quarries of New England. Ten years were consumed in its completion, at a cost of half a million of dollars. The fortification is of a pentagonal form, built of solid brick masonry. The walls are fifty feet in height, and from eight to ten feet in thickness, and are pierced for three tiers of guns, besides having necessary loopholes for musketry, and designed for an armament of one hundred and forty pieces of ordnance of all calibres. Two tiers of the guns are under bomb-proof casements, and the third or upper tier open, or, in military parlance, en barbette—the lower tier for forty-two pounder Paixhan guns; the second tier for eight and ten-inch Columbiads, for throwing solid or hollow shot, and the upper tier for mortars and twenty-four pound guns.

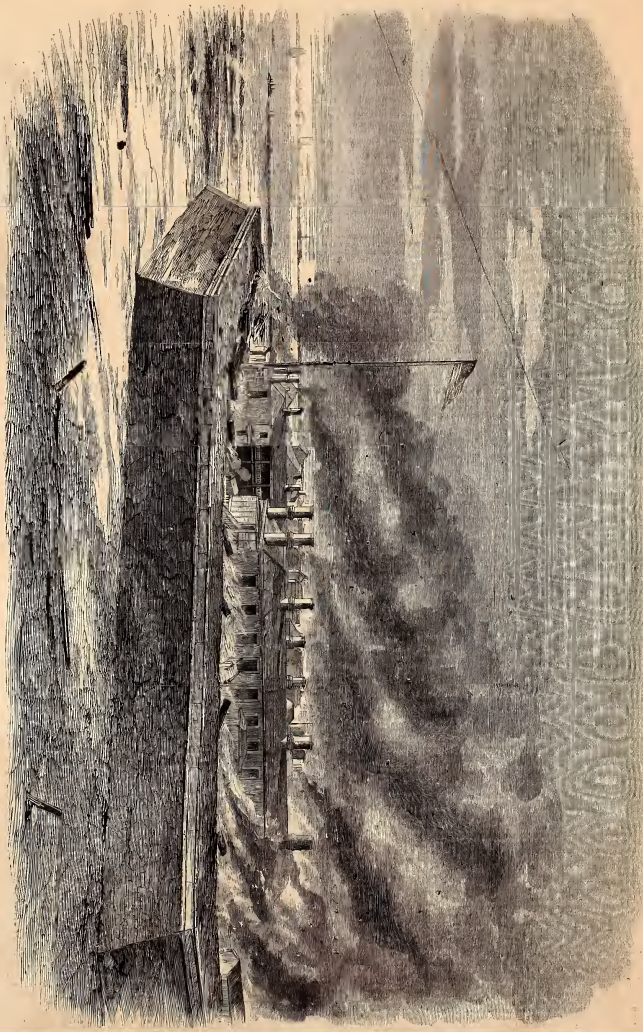
A brief account of the man who is now exciting so wide a discussion will interest our readers:

Major Robert Anderson, U.S.A., the commander of Fort Moultrie, was born in September, 1850, and graduated with high honor at West Point, July 1, 1825, the date of his commission as second lieutenant in the Third Regiment. He served in the Black Hawk war, and in 1836 was assistant instructor and inspector at West Point. In 1839 he became aide-de-camp to Major-General Scott, and in the following year published "Instruction for Field Artillery, Horse and Foot, arranged for the service of the United States." For gallantry and successful conduct in the war against the Florida Indians, he received the brevet of captain, bearing date April 7, 1838. July 7, 1838, he became assistant adjutant-general with the rank of captain, which he relinquished subsequently to being promoted to a captaincy in his regiment, October, 1841. In March, 1841, he was with the Third Regiment of Artillery in the army of General Scott, and took part in the siege of Vera Cruz—being one of the officers to whom was entrusted, by General Bankhead, the command of the batteries. This duty he performed with equal skill and gallantry, and he continued with the army until its triumphal entry into the city of Mexico, in September following. During these operations in the valley of Mexico he was attached to the brigade of General Cadwalader, which formed a part of General Worth's division. In the attack on El Molino del Rey, on the 8th of September, where he was wounded very severely, his conduct was the theme of especial praise, and for gallant and meritorious conduct in this battle he was promoted to the brevet rank of major, dating September 8, 1847. October 5, 1857, he was promoted to the position of Major of the Post Artillery, which he now holds. He is a man of "clear grit pluck" and high-toned honor, and a devoted lover of the Union.

Postscript.

The last news from Charleston states that Forts Moultrie and

VIEW OF THE RAMPARTS OF FORT MOULTRIE, CHARLESTON HARBOR, S. C.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY —— LUCE, ESQ.



EVACUATION OF FORT MOULTRIE, AND BURNING OF THE GUN CARRIAGES, ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND, BY MAJOR ANDERSON, U. S. A.

Pinckney were taken possession of by the South Carolina military, and that the Palmetto flag was flying over those forts, as well as the Custom House and Post Office. It was also said that the South Carolina Commissioners at Washington had demanded from the President the immediate surrender of Fort Sumpter, or this shall be their last interview, and they will return to South Carolina and prepare for the worst.

CAPTURE OF THE SLAVER SUNNY SOUTH BY THE BRITISH WAR STEAMER BRISK.

In the present day, when the navies of the world have driven piracy almost entirely from the ocean, or confined it within remote limits, the most exciting thing upon the wide waters is the pursuit and capture of a slaver. However right in principle the law which declares slavers to be pirates, it is indisputable that it has materially increased the horrors of the traffic, since the wretched slaves are generally thrown overboard to lighten the ship, to better the chances of escape when pursued. It is gratifying to know that the men principally engaged in this trade are Portuguese and Spaniards. The Persia brings us the following graphic account of the capture of the Sunny South on the 10th, August, in the Mozambique Channel.

At 11.30 A.M., on the 10th of August last, as her Majesty's ship Brisk, Captain de Horsey, bearing the flag of the Rear-Admiral the Honorable Sir Henry Keppel, K.C.B., was running to the northward in the Mozambique Channel, a sail was reported as seen from the masthead. Steam was got up without delay, and sail made in chase. It being hazy, the stranger was shortly afterwards lost sight of. When the weather had partially cleared the stranger was reported four points on our starboard bow, and the ship's course was altered in that direction. We were now going eleven knots and a half an hour, and the captain, feeling convinced that it must be something out of the common that could alter bearings in that distance at so short a time, proceeded himself, with his glass, to the fore-topmast-head, officers mounting the rigging.

That a general excitement prevailed was evident from the manner in which sails were trimmed, taken in, and set again. Hottentots and bandsmen, who on other occasions only looked at ropes, now laid hold of them with a will. The captain's order from the masthead to keep her away two points, showed that he had observed something suspicious—in fact, he had noticed a sudden alteration in the course of the chase, and pronounced her to be a long, rakish-looking ship, too large for a slaver, but that there was something very suspicious in the alteration of her course, the crowd of sail, and the unusual number of staysails.

At about three P.M. we could see her hull from the deck, and, carrying with us a fresh breeze, while she was in the doldrums, we closed her rapidly. When within half a mile we hoisted our colors, when every glass was pointed towards her peak, and all sorts of conjectures were made as to what colors she would show. No one could imagine that so large a vessel could be a slaver.

On closing under her lee, and when within a cable's length, a white package was thrown from her into the sea; and the experienced then exclaimed, "A slaver, and there go her papers!" A few minutes more, and we sheered up alongside to leeward of as beautiful a model of a ship as ever was seen. Some forty dejected-looking individuals, apparently a mixture of all nations, stood on her deck; still no colors, nor did she appear inclined to shorten sail or heave-to. The captain then determined to run ahead and lower the quarter boats to drop down and board; and as this manœuvre was being carried out a blank gun caused her to square the main-yard, which she did with studding-sails hanging to the yards, and luffed up into the winds.

It was an anxious five minutes to those on board while the boats were away. A small white ensign run up at her peak showed that she was a prize, and then a voice hailed us, "Eight hundred and fifty slaves on board!"

She proved to be the Sunny South, of seven hundred and two tons, built at New York in 1854, and sold at the Havannah in 1859, valued at twenty thousand dollars, and considered the fastest vessel in that port. She sailed from the Havannah, on the 5th of March, under the Chilian flag and name of Manuela, having cleared for Hong-Kong. Her slave-deck is seven feet high, and, although there were eight hundred and forty-six slaves on board, she was not at all crowded in comparison with other vessels so employed. In addition, she carried a crew of forty in all, including a captain, mates, pilot, and a doctor. Her dimensions are—length, one hundred and fifty-four feet eight inches; breadth, thirty-four feet four inches; depth, sixteen feet six inches. She was intended originally as a New York and Rio packet.

BRADY'S NEW PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, BROADWAY AND TENTH STREET.

For many years past Brady's Gallery has been one of the recognized institutions of the metropolis. No matter from which point of the compass the travellers come, whether from the South, West, East or North, one of the sights to be seen—one noted down before they arrived to be first visited is Brady's Photographic Gallery. We have known Brady in his various localities, have watched his gradual upward flight from place to place, and each change has been for the better until improvement has culminated in his present unrivalled location, and in his New Gallery, which is probably unequalled in the world.

The whole history of the Daguerrean Art is within the knowledge of the present generation, from its first feeble efforts to its uttermost perfection, and the beautiful variations which have sprung from it and eventually eclipsed it, as in the case of Photography. Brady made a brilliant reputation in his early experiments in the art, not only as an exponent of its mere mechanics, but in the higher attributes of taste, judgment and refinement—qualities which transform the mere dead transcript into a living picture. It is this fact more than any other which raised Brady to, and has maintained him in, the foremost position among the celebrated photographers of the world.

He has been actively engaged in experimenting and perfecting the art for over eighteen years, during which period he has accumulated more than ten thousand portraits of noteworthy individuals from every section of this country and from every quarter of the globe. This does not include the tens of thousands of private sitters whose plates have not been preserved.

Before speaking of his New York Gallery we must mention that he has had for several years a branch establishment—a very fine Gallery—in the National Capital, Washington. His first idea in establishing this branch in Washington was to secure greater facilities for adding to his New York Gallery, as all the distinguished men of America, European diplomatists, and the leading ladies of the country, were to be found in Washington during the sessions of Congress. His experiment, however, proved a great pecuniary success, and must be looked upon now as a distinct and independent establishment. Within the last few days he has taken a superb picture of the House of Representatives, with portraits of all the members of the present Congress. At any time this would be an important historical record, but in the present aspect of affairs its value can hardly be calculated, and it would be well that it should be purchased by the Government and placed in some conspicuous place in the Hall of Representatives.

Brady's New Gallery is situated on the west corner of Broadway, extending down Tenth street some one hundred and fifty feet. Lorillard's house is above it, on the north; Grace Church, the resort of the pious fashionables, is opposite it, to the east; and Stewart's New Store will face it directly to the south. It is in the heart of the city, and as a location for that peculiar business is certainly unsurpassed, nay, unequalled in the city. The Gallery is fitted-up in admirable taste, and is richly and handsomely furnished. A costly carpet covers the entire area, while elegant and luxurious couches abound in liberal profusion.

The elegant and artistic gas fixtures were specially designed and manufactured by Mr. Morgan L. Curtis, of No. 141 Elm street, with reference to the richness and harmony of the whole design of the Gallery. They are of the finest material, and the workmanship is of the first class in character, equal to the rarest specimens which Mr. Curtis has furnished to decorate the palatial residences and stores of many of our wealthiest citizens. Mr. Curtis brings much artistic taste and sound judgment to bear upon his business, and this combination has secured to him the first position among the manufacturers and designers of gas fixtures in the city.

The heating apparatus, consisting of a series of Littlefield's Heaters, was put in place by Tibbetts & Co., 690 Broadway, and is admirably designed to promote the health and comfort of visitors, a desideratum in such establishments seldom found. The ventilation, light and heat, being under complete control, give the finishing touch to this most artistic and altogether unique establishment.

But the crowning attractions of this splendid Gallery are the countless exquisite pictures which fill every available inch of the walls. So vast a collection of masterly photographs, plain and colored, was never before brought into one Gallery. The subjects are not of the common-place John Smith and John Jones sort, but to use the words of a brilliant writer upon the subject:

> Here may be found a historic collection of our great and venerable dead—many of them men who have led the van in the Revolution and whose memories are embalmed in the hearts of a grateful people. The ecclesiastics of America are well and ably represented in the compartment devoted to the remembrance of these great men. Here we find the portraits of some of the greatest American bishops and scholars of the United States, among whom the honored names of Hopkins, Doane, Delancy, McCoon, Anthon, Hawks, Cummings and Tyng are to be seen. The visitor can at a single glance observe all the principal merchants, bankers and millionaires of this city. He can see the Grinnells, Taylors, Aspinwalls, Whitneys, and a hundred others of the men who have earned large and princely fortunes in this country, and the pictures have the double value of being exact likenesses, true to life, and at the same time the highest specimens of photographic art. And so with every department of public life in this country. Our leading lawyers, medical men, orators, statesmen and others are duly and faithfully represented and if a casual visitor to the city were to spend two or three hours in this gallery he would leave it with better information concerning our mercantile and public men than he could collect after two or three years' residence in the country. The dead are brought back to life here so faithfully and so perfectly that those who knew them in the flesh can scarcely fail to recognise the impress of their shadows on the magic glass. The department allotted to the great and distinguished dead must particularly recommend itself to visitors. From the rude forefathers of the country, to the men who built up the superstructure of the republic on the foundations which they laid, and down to the men of the present day, when our power is spreading abroad with electric speed—every important face will be here found represented. The learned historians of America, her naval heroes and her conquering warriors are reproduced by the silent yet eloquent camera.

These superb works of art form a portrait-history of the times of incalculable value, as great in the variety of their subjects as in their artistic finish and marvellous perfection in detail.

The operating-rooms are replete with all the modern conveniences and improvements; among the latter we must mention the successful use of colored glass, which Mr. Brady has found to work with magical effect, and to enhance in an extraordinary degree the life-like beauty of his pictures.

One other point requires mention. There is a private entrance in Tenth street, for ladies in full dress, which leads directly to the operating-rooms, thus obviating the unpleasant necessity of passing, so attired, through the public gallery.

If Brady lived in England his Gallery would be called the Royal Gallery, for it was specially honored by a lengthy visit, by appointment from the heir-apparent of England, the Prince of Wales and suite. The Prince visited no other Photographic Gallery, that special honor being reserved for that establishment, acknowledged on all hands to be the first and finest of its kind in America.

In connection with our beautiful illustration of this famous Gallery, the visit of the Prince of Wales has peculiar and appropriate interest, and we consequently subjoin a brief account, from a contemporary, of that memorable occasion:

> At half-past twelve the carriages of the Prince and his suite were seen approaching from the direction of the Fifth Avenue, and a rush was made for the private entrance where they were to alight. His Royal Highness acknowledged the cheers of the crowd and the salutations of the ladies, through a long file of whom he had to pass, by uncovering and bowing frequently. On entering the splendid new gallery, which has just been completed at so much expense, the Prince gave expression to the gratification which the spectacle of this magnificent collection afforded him. He inspected, with curious interest, the portraits of the statesmen and literary and other celebrities of this country, pointing out to the members of his suite such of them as he had been familiar with by reputation.
>
> After remaining a short time in the gallery he was taken up to the operating rooms, where, singly and with different members of his suite, he gave the artists a number of sittings. First were taken three imperial groups of the whole party, with his Royal Highness as the central figure. Next was executed a full-length imperial photograph of the Prince standing alone. His Royal Highness had then a number of miniature photographs of himself and the young noblemen of his suite taken singly and in groups, to serve as cartes des visites. All the impressions were admirably distinct, the day being peculiarly favorable for the operation, and the members of the royal party to whom the proofs were subsequently shown were loud in their commendations of the accuracy and perfection of the apparatus used in the establishment.
>
> Returning to the gallery, the Prince again spent some time inspecting the collection. He seemed particularly pleased with the colored photographs, which are finished in the most elaborate style, and admitted to be chef d'œuvres of art. The collected heads of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives appeared to interest greatly the party, but more especially the Duke of Newcastle, who devoted a good deal of time to the examination of the portraits of politicians.
>
> Several large commissions were given by the Prince, the Duke, Mr. Englehart and other members of the suite, for immediate execution. Amongst those given by the Duke was one of the President and his Cabinet, and one of each of the Presidential candidates.
>
> Before leaving the royal party inscribed their names on the visitors' book. The following is the page as it stands inscribed—a proud memorial for Mr. Brady:
>
> OCTOBER 13.
>
> Albert Edward
> Lyons.
> Newcastle.
> St. Germans.
> Robert Bruce.
> C. Teesdale.
> Hinchinbrooke.
> Charles G. L. Eliot.
> G. D. Englehart.
> Hugh W. Ackland.
> G. F. Jenner
>
> As the Prince stood at the head of the staircase, on the point of taking his departure, an interesting incident occurred. An old man, bowed down and tottering with the weight of years, was presented to him by Mr. Brady, who stated that he happened to be in the palace on the night his Royal Highness was born. The Prince addressed him in the most kindly terms, and seemed touched by the circumstance. On leaving his Royal Highness extended his hand cordially to Mr. Brady, and expressed the great gratification he had derived from the inspection of his collection. The visit of the royal party lasted over two hours, and on entering their carriages they were greeted with enthusiastic cheers by an immense crowd which had been waiting patiently all that time to get a glimpse of the Prince

It need hardly be said that the éclat of so distinguished an honor brought the fame of Mr. Brady freshly and prominently before the country, into every section of which accounts of the visit penetrated, or that Brady's Gallery became the "lion" of fashion and its followers from all parts of the United States. Such were the results of the Prince's kindness and condescension, and as a necessary consequence, not only his Gallery but his extensive and commodious operating-rooms have been, and continue to be, crowded by people eager to be "taken" by the Prince's photographer—the man he visited, shook hands with and complimented so warmly. In conclusion, Brady's Gallery is a "sight" that every one should see.

CARRICKSHOCK;

OR,

A PLEASANT EXCURSION.

By Lieutenant-Colonel H. R. Addison.

"Harry, my boy, you have never been in the county of Waterford?"

"Never."

"Well, then," rejoined my gallant relative, Major Vokes, "you have now a good opportunity. I have some little business to transact there, so I've ordered my travelling carriage at six in the morning. We shan't be more than two days absent, therefore don't bring much luggage. The weather is remarkably fine, so we shall have a very pleasant trip;" and away went my excellent friend whistling a cheerful air.

Now, although Vokes took my assent for granted, I felt somewhat doubtful about accepting it. That I had often expressed a wish to see the country into which he was going I fully admit, and for this single reason I suppose he felt certain that I should snap at his proposal. But on the other hand, though I fully intended to see Curraghmore, yet I was by no means desirous of becoming the travelling companion of a man against whom a thousand oaths of assassination had been recorded; and as we were about to traverse Tipperary, a notoriously ill-disposed county, and going to a spot hardly fifteen or twenty miles from the scene of the most savage butchery that ever disgraced the annals of Ireland, namely, the murder of nineteen policemen and their officers, which had only taken place at Carrickshock the week before; I seriously hesitated about accompanying Vokes. So far from it, I should—in any other case—have not only given it up myself, but have endeavored to dissuade the worthy magistrate from his contemplated journey. I well knew, however, in his case, that the more vividly I portrayed the danger, the more delighted he would feel in courting it; so I held my tongue, and after dinner allowed myself to be persuaded, partly by coaxing and partly by the fear of being laughed at, into joining my friend. We accordingly started the following morning, and after traversing the wretched bog which stretches itself between Limerick and Tipperary, arrived in safety at the latter town without meeting with any occurrence worth noticing.

Vokes ordered a substantial breakfast, and appeared in high spirits. He did not, however, tell me the object of his mission, and I refrained from inquiring. That it was a pleasing one I drew an inference from his cheerful manner, and I already began to laugh at my foolish fears.

The meal over, we descended, and to my utter surprise I found two horses ready saddled, standing at the door. The carriage had returned to Limerick; we were to complete our journey on horseback. I should probably have asked some questions, but Vokes enforced silence on me by a look, so we mounted and trotted off on the road to Nenagh, which my friend readily found, from the directions afforded to him by the hostler of the hotel, a most respectable-looking young man. We had scarcely, however, proceeded above three miles, when Vokes turned, without any apparent reason, down a cross-road, and further increased his speed.

"What are you about? Where are you going?" cried I.

"Why, to Waterford, to be sure!"

"Why, I fancied you had changed your mind, and had intended to go to Nenagh—at least so you said."

The major burst out laughing. "Harry, I didn't think you were so soft. Why couldn't you see, with half an eye, that the hostler was a bad boy—a spy—so I threw him off the scent, by coming round this way. By this time there's more than one carbine loaded to shoot me on that road. Don't be flustered, there's no danger here. Yonder is the main road, and Sergeant Magrath waiting for us."

We were now joined by that active policeman, who was well mounted and admirably dressed as a groom. He had, however, a pair of holsters, out of which a brace of pistols appeared; but as many country gentlemen in those days carried arms when riding through the disturbed districts, this fact did not betray the sergeant's calling.

When we came to a certain spot, just beyond the thick woods of Bansha, Vokes paused. "There's Lismackew; just in that corner poor Baker was murdered in the middle of the day." I confess this little slaten-cat, and a subsequent full detail of the assassination, with which my friend favored me as we rode along, did not add much to my comfort, and I began to wish I had remained within the barracks at Limerick, where I was at this time quartered.

Presently a carriage dashed past us, surrounded by police. These men I recognised as belonging to Vokes's especial force; they, however, took no notice of him, but galloped away in eager haste.

"Bless me, major, what does that mean?"

"Oh, it's Quin, the approver; they are taking him to Kilkenny, to give evidence against Kennedy, the chief murderer at Carrickshock, who will be tried the day after to-morrow."

"But is this witness so unwilling as to require this guard?"

"By no means. My men surround the carriage to protect him, and even to do that they would not be able, if they had not relays of horses to enable them to gallop all the way. They go through no towns, and they travel too fast to be overtaken."

"But why?"

"Harry, my boy, you're as green as any Englishman I ever met. Don't you see that if they could be caught, they'd soon be surrounded, and the approver dragged out and torn to pieces."

I shuddered and rode on to Clonmel without uttering another word. Here we remained for several hours, Vokes evidently wishing to arrive late at Piltown, the cleanest and prettiest village in Ireland, which he now condescended to tell me was to be our ultimate destination; and where, according to his settled plan, we alighted at Anthony's snug hotel, about nine o'clock the same evening. We supped and went to bed. The room in which I slept was, however, unfortunately near the stable, and I was awakened more than once by hearing the voices of several persons conversing in a foreign language. This, though an annoyance, did not utterly destroy my slumbers; I was thoroughly tired, and did not rise till nine o'clock next morning. Vokes was seated at the breakfast table when I entered. He had evidently received and dispatched several letters before I came down. He was sending off a mounted policeman as I opened the door.

After our meal, Vokes proposed a stroll through the village, at the same time expressing his intention to call on some of the cottagers, whom he well knew, as he had resided for some time after his marriage at Belline, a very handsome mansion in the neighborhood, formerly inhabited by the brother of his wife, then acting as agent to the Earl of Bessborough, but who was now abroad.

We entered a very pretty cottage, and, to my surprise, I found the interior as clean and neat as any similar establishment in England. It appeared that the noble landlord insisted on this; he might spare a man who could not pay his rent—indeed, he often did so—but he inexorably evicted a dirty or drunken tenant, and thus made Piltown the prettiest and best village in the south of Ireland.

The old woman whom we called to see was almost blind, but she instantly recognised Vokes, and to him she related her griefs. Her grandson (a policeman) had been killed at Carrickshock, and she now hoped "the major" would get her a pension from government. She evidently believed he was all-powerful; and I fancy she was not far wrong in her conjecture.

In the next house we found two handsome girls. They had similarly lost their father, and the magistrate elicited important information from their loquacity. I now began to observe that my friend was anxious to ascertain the details of the affair, for in every cottage we visited he managed artfully to derive some information on the subject. On two occasions, the doors, as we approached, were slammed in our faces, and I could not help remarking that we did not meet a single male during the whole time we were out. On these points I questioned the major, who explained to me that the owners of the two residences where we had been excluded had both fallen at Carrickshock, but as they belonged to the murdering part, their relations refused him admission, looking upon him as a dangerous monster. I expressed my wonder that they should be thus acquainted with his arrival.

"My dear fellow, we had not gone to bed last night when every soul for ten miles round was aware that we were here, and it's precisely for that reason that all the men are out of the way. To-morrow or next day we shall probably see them back."

This was by no means reassuring; and though I said nothing, I felt vexed at the idea of remaining in Piltown for several days longer, which was evidently Vokes's intention.

During dinner my friend explained the affair which he was evidently investigating. It appears that about a week only before the then present time a party of nineteen policemen, commanded by a chief constable, went out after dark in order to seize some arms, which they expected to find at a certain farm-house. These men were dressed in uniform, and armed as soldiers, and fine efficient soldiers they were. They each carried a musket, a bayonet and thirty rounds of ball cartridge. Their officer was mounted on horseback, so of course they anticipated no danger, even in a country where every man's hand is against the law, and where every man—at least, it was so in those times—looked upon a policeman as his bitterest enemy.

The party, being disappointed in their search, were returning home towards nightfall, and had arrived at a spot on the mountains called Carrickshock, when they were met by a countryman, who volunteered to tell them where the arms they were in search of lay hid. The chief-constable fell into the trap, and ordered his men to turn down the lane, at the end of which the peasant stated the weapons were buried (as is often the case), and to which spot he would guide them. So down they marched, the commander going first, and beside him a civil officer, who had taken advantage of the strength of the party to serve some notices of eviction under the shield of their protection. The lane did not exceed a couple of hundred yards in length; it was narrow, and had a high bank on either side. It was what is generally styled a "borheen" in the south of Ireland, and admirably fitted for an ambuscade. Suddenly the guide gave a loud whistle and disappeared. In an instant the notice-server fell dead, while on either bank appeared a large party of men and women. Before the policemen had time to come to the "present," a volley had been fired into them, which told with fatal effect. They fired, but it was too late, the crowd had now rushed down and hemmed them in. The chief-constable was one of the first killed, and before five minutes had elapsed every policeman lay dead or wounded on the ground. The former were mutilated and dragged about with yells of triumph. The wounded were pierced with innumerable wounds. The arms were seized with avidity, and then the murderers (of whom only three I believe were killed) marched off, glorying in the act and even singing songs of delight. They left behind them the body of the civil process-server, the chief-constable and nineteen fine young men, several of whom were natives of this town.

I naturally inquired if the assassins had been seized, as they must be known.

"Known! to be sure they are. But what's the use of taking them up, when no one will give evidence against them? Oh yes, you may be astonished, but such is the state of Ireland. The man's life who identified one of the murderers would not be worth half an hour's purchase. So government has only got hold of one of them, a certain Kennedy, but although the case is clear against him, although it will be as clear as light, you will see that the jury will not dare to convict him. Even at this instant he is standing before them. But enough of this; let's go and take a ride. Here, waiter, order our horses out, and request the landlord to come up."

Mr. Anthony appeared.

"Anthony, I am going to take this young Englishman to see Belline; we'll take a gallop through the park and be back in two hours. We shall gain appetites by our ride, and would like something nice for supper. It is now eight o'clock, we should like to have it served at ten. Can you get us some trout? and mind there's a cucumber, you know how fond I am of it; and if its not too late for peas, let us have some."

The landlord (a most respectable man) promised all this should be attended to, and we descended and jumped on horseback. I observed that we had military saddles, and that holsters were attached to each. After the narrative I had just heard I confess I was not astonished at this; nor was I so when I subsequently found that Sergeant Magrath had a sword on under his horseman's cloak.

We rode direct through the grounds at Belline, and then went on to a road which led abruptly up the mountains. There was a wooded angle which hid the onward course of this mountain pass. Vokes walked his horse round it, but no sooner were we out of sight of the main route than he uttered an exclamation to Irish, and galloped on. The sergeant did the same, and, of course, I accompanied them.

"Ride faster, man, ride faster, we shall be missed; keep up, sergeant!"

"But why this haste?"

"You ride for your life. If they overtake us we are dead men; and even as it is, there may be parties out looking for us! Ride on, man—don't spare the spur!" And thus we galloped on over six miles of the most hilly road I ever met with. Vokes now pulled up. "Harry, my boy, I think we've distanced them; so now walk your horse a little, for we have a long ride before us."

"My good and respected relative, are you gone mad, or what does all this mean?"

"Simply this. I clearly heard the voices in the stables of which you spoke this morning."

"Why, you denied it."

"Yes; fearful of alarming you. The fact is, they assembled last night for the purpose of destroying me. But as they thought it might prejudice Kennedy's trial, they put it off until to-night. At eleven o'clock they are to shoot us as we sit at supper. The sergeant is to have his brains knocked out. In fact, every arrangement is made. Let me see, I find by my repeater it is past ten; they are now beginning to assemble, and will soon miss us; so we have no time to spare."

"But how is it they were so incautious as thus to proclaim their plans?"

"They spoke in Irish, a language I happen to understand. So there can be no mistake about it."

"Had we not better hurry on?"

"No, no. We are going up a terrifically bad road, let us go as easy as we can till eleven, and then, as they will have discovered our flight, we must ride as fast as our nags can carry us."

At this moment the moon burst forth, and we saw a ragged, barefooted urchin close to us. As is usual in Ireland, he at once joined the party and entered into conversation. Vokes whispered to me to be cautious. This I thought a ridiculous hint, but still I attended to it, though his "Cave canem" appeared uncalled for in the present instance.

"What's the name of the town yonder, Pat?" asked Vokes, who at once assumed an Irish accent.

"Where, yer'e honor?"

"Ah, now, can't you answer without making a bosthoon of yourself? Sure I'm a stranger, and I want to know."

"I'm thinking it's Newmarket! Is it through that town yer'e honor's about passing?"

At this moment the sergeant's sword clanked. The major uttered an exclamation of annoyance. The boy, however, did not appear to notice the sound, and went on talking.

We now came to a wind on the road. Round this we had to pass in order to arrive at Newmarket, which made the distance considerably above a mile, though, by cutting across the valley, the village might be reached to three hundred yards.

"Where's the boy?" suddenly cried the magistrate. We looked round—he was gone, but in less than a minute we heard three distinct notes whistled from the centre of the valley.

"Ride, ride on, now's your time!"

And away we dashed at full gallop. As we came in sight of the village we saw a fine fire blazing in the smithy, and lights in almost every window, but as we approached the smith's shop was suddenly closed, shutters were put up, and every light extinguished. It was evident we were betrayed.

"Keep up—keep up, Harry—that's all right!" and we dashed at racing speed through the town.

We had just cleared it when a shot was fired. The ball went through the sergeant's cloak, but did not injure any of us. When we had proceeded about a mile, the major pulled up.

"There, that will do—we are safe now; there is no fear of their following. There are not half-a-dozen men in the village, or they'd not have let us off so easy. Depend upon it, they are all gone to Kilkenny, to hear their comrade tried."

Vokes was singularly gifted with perspicuity. He calculated every chance, and drew inferences from apparent trifles. It was thus he sifted evidence, and seemed almost to foresee occurrences which to any other mind appeared unimportant and improbable.

We had not gone very far, when Vokes suddenly turned down a lane. As a matter of course I did the same. The major, to my surprise, jumped off his horse and beckoned Magrath to do the like; then, leading their horses up to me, he asked me as a favor to hold them for a few minutes. Of course I assented. In another moment the magistrate and the policeman were searching about for something which they appeared to have dropped. They examined about, and seemed occasionally to pick up something out of the mud. At length Vokes suddenly called out to his sergeant,

"I've found it—I've got it here—this will complete the evidence. If it fits his hand it will at once convict him. Oh, I am so glad I've discovered it!"

At this moment the moon burst through the clouds, and I glanced with horror at the object which Vokes held up in triumph. It was a human finger, or rather half of one, evidently severed from the hand by a sabre cut.

"What have you got?" demanded the major.

"I've a portion of skull with human hair attached to it. I've the stock of a broken pistol, and a knife rusted with human blood," said the sergeant.

"Providence preserve us!" ejaculated I. "Where are we?"

"In the Borheen of Carrickshock. Don't you see the bank all broken where the struggle took place? This dyke ran with human blood only a few days ago."

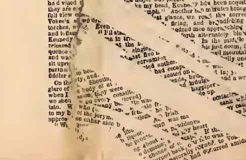
"Do let us go on; I don't like this place—it makes me shudder," said I.

"Well, as you like; I've got all I want. Here, Mick, take this finger, we'll fit it on Teddy Malony when we return. You may throw away the skull, but bring the knife along with you. Come, we'll warm ourselves with a sharp trot. We are only [illegible] eight miles from Kilkenny, where we shall sleep. Allons!" and away we [illegible]

We were [illegible] four miles of the city, when we heard loud shouts, mingled with [illegible] shouts; an extraordinary glare of light was apparent in the distance, [illegible] we one rains, and reduced our pace to a walk, wondering what it [illegible] the major was puzzled for a few minutes; at length he divined [illegible] my head, Kennedy has been acquitted, and they are [illegible] triumph." Another ten minutes brought us in full view [illegible] first glance, we read the correctness of Vokes's [illegible] bring, and brandishing lighted torches, [illegible] hundred men approaching. Drunk and inflam[ed] [illegible] forth alternately blessings on Kennedy [illegible]. In the middle sat the released [illegible] his just doom, in consequence [illegible] small mountain pony, and was [illegible] ally unequal to sit upright [illegible] his fair partisans [illegible] a wr[illegible] fiddler [illegible]

On the [illegible] By the glare of [illegible] when I [illegible] we shou[ld] [illegible] tain. [illegible] to my [illegible] approa[ched] [illegible]

"W[illegible] [illegible]



"Giggy-ma-gow," replied the major; "be alive, and there's no danger."

"What shall we do?"

"Follow me!" and, in one moment more, he had cleared a low hedge beside the road. We did the same, and, in another, we were all well concealed by a stack of wheat, which served us providentially as a shield.

On came the fearful multitude; they were now close upon us—they were not twenty yards from us—the slightest indiscretion, and we were dead men. It was a perilous moment. I do believe I trembled. The infuriated wretches were, however, far too excited to think of turning their eyes away from their hero; and I can now, in cool moments, believe that even had we not been thus luckily concealed, they would not have perceived us.

They were fully five minutes filing past us. They halted a couple of minutes, to raise a drunken man who had fallen, and seemed in no hurry to proceed. How I outlived that period I cannot divine; my every pulse seemed to stop, and I certainly did not breathe—at least, such is my impression.

Without a word, the major stealthily stole out, and, about a hundred yards in their rear, jumped back into the road. He and I succeeded in doing so without attracting any attention; but, unfortunately, the sergeant's sword was loose in its scabbard, and, as his horse sprang over, it gave a loud clank.

The crowd at once recognized the well-known sound; for an instant, they shouted, the "Army;" in the next, they cried out the "Peelers." They turned round, and saw us by the bright moonlight. Half-a-dozen shots were fired by them in as many seconds; but they were far too intoxicated to take good aim, so none of the balls or shot touched us. A party instantly quitted the main body and started in pursuit of us—a fact by no means pleasant, as these men, when sober, can run for a short distance almost as quick as a horse can gallop. "On! on!" roared the major; and again we started at our utmost speed, and soon left our pursuers far behind us.

In half an hour more I sat at supper, in Kilkenny, with my darling relative, who laughed at my agitation, and endeavored to assure me that it was "nothing at all!"

"It may not be," said I, as I drank his health in a glass of old sherry; "it may not be! But if ever you catch me on such an excursion again—if ever I accompany you on such a perilous trip—may St. Patrick withdraw his protection from Erin!"

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. S.—To be played over again.

M. S., Newburyport, Mass.—Send full particulars, and we can answer them.

LOGANSPORT, Ill.—The word "raccroc" is the French term for our old familiar expression, "scratch."

W. McC.—You are right. Refer to the rules.

*—Three.

SAM.—The point you refer to is one on which more misunderstanding has occurred in billiards than on any other in the whole scope of the game. We have done all we could to elucidate and put it beyond dispute. You will find it fully discussed in the "Game of Billiards."

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

BILLIARDS IN PHILADELPHIA.—Mr. Phelan has returned from Philadelphia, after having assisted M. Berger in inaugurating his entertainments in the Quaker City. On Saturday evening, December 8th, M. Berger played at the rooms of the Philadelphia Club, 75 points up, with Mr. Bird, in which Mr. Bird made 15 points. M. Berger afterwards played with Mr. Victor Estephe, 100 points up, Mr. Estephe scoring 32 points. On the evening of Monday, the 10th inst., M. Berger's exhibition to the gentlemen of the press took place in a room in Mr. Bird's establishment, which was placed at M. Berger's disposal by the proprietor, who kindly fitted it up at his own expense. From one hundred and fifty to one hundred and fifty gentlemen were present. The exhibition opened with a game between Messrs. Berger and Phelan, 100 points up; Mr. Phelan scoring 20 points. On Tuesday, M. Berger played with Mr. Victor Estephe, in the afternoon, a game of 100 points, Mr. E. making 24; in the evening, another game of 100, Mr. E. scoring 31.

On Wednesday afternoon an entertainment took place before the ladies and gentlemen of the Philadelphia Club. A game was played by Messrs. Berger and Phelan, 100 points up, in which Mr. Phelan scored 42. In the evening, Messrs. Berger and Estephe played 100 points up, the latter gentleman scoring 31 points. On Thursday afternoon, M. Berger played a discount game, 100 up, with Mr. F——, one of the best amateurs in Philadelphia, Mr. F—— scoring 21. In the evening, a discount game, for same number of points, with Mr. N. T—— was won by M. Berger, Mr. T—— scoring 42 points.

PHELAN'S COMBINATION CUSHIONS IN FRANCE.—M. Berger's admiration of the Combination Cushion was so great and his approval of it so unqualified, that he suggested to Mr. Phelan the idea of having it introduced into France, where, he was perfectly sure, it would achieve a wonderful success, and, ultimately, universal adoption. On M. Berger's representations, Messrs. Phelan & Collender agreed to have application made to the proper department of the French Government for the issue of a patent for the invention. We learn by the last arrival from Europe that a patent has been granted. M. Berger will be the sole agent for the sale of Phelan's Combination Cushions throughout the French empire.

We have received a letter from M. Berger, stating that he intended to leave Philadelphia for Baltimore on the morning of Monday, the 24th inst. He intended commencing his course of exhibitions in the latter city on the evening of that day. Mr. Phelan will meet M. Berger in Baltimore towards the close of the week, and will also assist him in his exhibitions in Washington, St. Louis &c. M. Berger's exhibitions in Baltimore will take place at Mr. McElroy's establishment.

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW.—We wish the readers of our column sincerely and cordially the compliments of the season. In bidding farewell to the old year, it is usual to cast a parting glance at its events. The year 1860 has been a remarkable one for billiards, and has had its share of noteworthy occurrences connected with the game. It has been marked by such interesting occurrences as the tournament of the American Universities at Worcester, Mass., the tournament in San Francisco, the visit of M. Berger, and the general interest in billiards caused by the exhibitions of his remarkable skill; the great tournament in New York, in which the best players in America contended. In England, the annual University matches have taken place with increased eclat, showing that the billiard excitement here has had an echo at the other side of the Atlantic. The billiard year of 1860 will be also remarkable for the participation of ladies in the pleasure of witnessing public billiard exhibitions of first class players, a pleasure heretofore almost entirely confined to the sterner sex. Several exhibitions have been given specially for the entertainment of the ladies. We hope the year 1861 may exceed that of 1860 in billiard interest, though if it only equals it there will be no cause for complaint. There is indeed good promise of rare amusement for the coming year, in the announcement of the grand Annual National Billiard Tournament, which is to take place in June, in this city, and for which, we understand, all the prominent players in the country are whetting their cues. We take the liberty of reiterating our wishes for the enjoyment of our friends during the coming year, and hoping that their pleasure may never be less.

Shot made by Mr. Kavanagh in the late Tournament.

SOME HOSS.—Once on a time, a Yankee, who was travelling through Kentucky, had a fine horse and no money. He had taught the animal to lie down or sit on his haunches, when the bridle was pulled very hard. Our traveller saw no way of replenishing his purse but by selling his horse, and this he resolved to do the first opportunity. As he was going slowly along, he saw a hunter at some distance from the road, whom he rode up to and accosted. In the course of the conversation he told the latter that he had an invaluable horse to sell—a horse that would act precisely like a setter when he was in the vicinity of game. Casting his eyes around, at the same time discovering some fresh rabbit tracks, he gave the bridle a jerk. The docile quadruped immediately lay down. "There are some rabbits here," said the rider, "I know by his ears." The Kentuckian, curious to test the reputed sagacity of the horse, searched around, and, sure enough, started three or four rabbits. He was greatly surprised, but the Yankee took the affair as a matter of course. To make a long story short, the wonderful horse changed hands on the spot, three hundred dollars being the consideration. His new owner mounted him, and, with characteristic hospitality, the Yankee agreed to accompany him home. They soon came to a stream, which they had to cross, and which was rather deep for horsemen. Judge of the Kentuckian's dismay, when, on pulling the bridle in the middle of the river, his steed subsided in the running waters as if he was a hippopotamus. "How is this?" he roared out, nothing but his head visible. The Yankee, who was mounted on the hunter's other horse, was not disconcerted in the least, but replied coolly, "Oh, I forgot to tell you he is as good for fish as he is for rabbits!"

ANY one who has lived in the West Riding will remember Emerson, the tailor, one of the oldest and best of his craft, as well as one of the jolliest—always as ready to take a joke as to give one. It used to be considered the "fair thing" to send persons to his shop for articles at variance with what usually constitutes the stock in trade of members of his profession. One day one of his friends encountered a greenhorn, who inquired of him where he could purchase a Jew's harp. Of course he was directed to Emerson's shop as the establishment where they kept the largest assortment at the most reasonable prices. Our friend proceeded to the place indicated, and found Emerson (who by the way is troubled with an impediment of speech), waiting on a customer, and after stating his wants was politely requested to "w-wa-wait a few mo-mo-moments." After despatching his business with the customer he gravely approached his new customer with a pair of glove-stretchers, and observed in a very mild tone, "W-we shall h-have to t-take your mum-mum-measure," whereupon he inserted the stretcher into his mouth, spreading open his countenance to the full extent of the "stretch," and with a face indicating the utmost seriousness remarked to the astonished customer, "Y-young man, we-we haven't ger-ger-got any of y-your siz-e."

"I WANT something for a hypocritical affliction," said Mrs. Partington to Dr. [illegible]. The doctor, with that smiling urbanity which is a distinguishing feature [illegible] the West-end, told her that he could prepare something that he thought [illegible] her. Filling a small bottle, he handed it to her. "This isn't the [illegible] syrup, is it?" she inquired. "Because," continued she, "that creates a nashus, and raises my expectations. I only want a simple tucubrat on for the throat." He assured her it was just what she wanted. She thanked him and departed.

HARPOONING A HIPPOPOTAMUS.

WE had been some nine months from home, and were nearly out of wood. Sailing lazily down the Mozambique Channel, but seeing no signs of sperm whales, we arrived at the Bazaruta Islands, whither the "skipper" had determined to go in search of a stock of wood. These isles are situated in the Mozambique, at but short distances from the mainland of Africa. They are thickly wooded, and but sparsely inhabited, both which circumstances contributed, in the present instance, to make them a favorite place of resort for our captain.

We sailed into the little bay formed by the islands and the neighboring mainland, about seven o'clock one morning; and after coming to anchor, furling sails and clearing a space in the hold for the reception of the wood, took axes in the mate's boat and proceeded to an inspection of the facilities for cutting and boating off firewood afforded by the different little islets.

It must be premised here that our ship lay at the distance of about two and a half miles from the mainland, the different isles being from half a mile to three miles distant.

To cut a supply of wood for a whaling cruise is a work requiring some days, and often weeks; and it had been determined that the first, and if need be the next day likewise, should be devoted to a thorough inspection of the facilities of the place, in order that we might work at as little disadvantage as possible. Consequently we (the mate's boat's crew) had been ordered to prepare for a general cruise. We provided ourselves with a store of bread and beef, filled the breaker with water, spread our sail to the light breeze, and pointed the boat to the nearest island.

Landing here, we found naught but a wilderness of low jungle, which was scarcely penetrable, together with a poor landing. We examined three or four of the islets, and having at last fixed upon a suitable place where to commence operations, were about to return on board, when the mate said, "Trim aft, Tom—there's a good breeze, fair coming and going, and we'll take a look at the mainland."

Accordingly the boat's head was laid shoreward, and we spread ourselves at full length upon the thwarts, enjoying an unusual treat of some cigars, which our chief officer had good naturedly brought with him.

When within about a mile and a half of the mainland we found the water shoaling, being then not more than three fathoms—eighteen feet—deep.

"I saw a black skin glisten in the sun just then," said the boat-steerer, who was aft, the mate having stretched himself upon the bow thwart to take a nap.

"It was nothing but a puffing pig," said he, drowsily.

"There it is again, and no puffing pig either, nor porpoise, nor—no," said he, with some degree of animation, "nor anything else that wears a black skin, that I ever saw before."

This had the effect of rousing us up, every one casting his eyes ahead to catch a sight of the questionable "black skin."

"There he blows—and there again—and over here, too," said several voices in succession.

"It ain't a spout at all, boys; let's pull and see what it is."

We took to our oars, and the boat was soon darting forward at good speed toward the place where we had last seen the object of our curiosity.

"Stern all!" suddenly shouted the mate, as the boat brought up "all standing," against some object which we had not been able to see on account of the muddiness of the water, the collision nearly throwing us down into the bottom of the boat.

As we backed off, an enormous beast slowly raised his head above the water, gave a loud snort, and incontinently down again, almost before we could get a fair look at it.

"What is it?" was now the question, which no one could answer.

"Whatever it is," said the mate, whose whaling blood was up, "if it comes within reach of my iron I'll make fast to it; so pull ahead."

We were again under headway, keeping a bright look-out for the reappearance of the stranger.

"There they are, a whole school!" said the mate, eagerly, pointing in shore, where the glistening of white water showed that a number of the nondescripts were evidently enjoying themselves. "Now, boys, pull hard, and we'll soon try their mettle."

"There's something broke water just ahead," said the boat-steerer.

"Pull easy, lads. I see him. There—way enough—there's his back."

"Stern all!" shouted he, as he darted his iron into a back as broad as a small sperm whale's.

"Stern all! Back water—back water, every man!" And the infuriated beast made desperate lunges in every direction, making the white water fly almost equal to a whale.

We could now see the whole shape of the creature, as, in his agony and surprise, he raised himself high above the surface. We all recognised at once the hippopotamus, as he is represented in books of natural history.

Our subject soon got a little cooler, and giving a savage roar, bent his head round as he seized the shank of the iron between his teeth. With one jerk he drew it out of his bleeding quarter, and shaking it savagely, sank down to the bottom. The water was here but about two fathoms deep and we could see the direction in which he was travelling along by a line of blood, as well as by the air bubbles which rose to the surface as he breathed.

"Give me another iron, Charley, and we'll not give him a chance to pull it out next time."

The iron was handed up, and we slowly sailed in the direction which our prize was following along the bottom.

"Here's two or three of them astern of us," said the boat-steerer. Just then two more rose, one on either side of the boat, and in rather unpleasant proximity, and before we had begun to realize our situation, the wounded beast unable any longer to stay beneath the surface, came up to breathe just ahead of us.

"Pull ahead a little—let us get out of this snarl. Lay the boat around, so—now stern all," and the iron was planted deep in the neck of our victim.

With a roar louder than a dozen of the wild bulls of Madagascar, the now maddened beast made for the boat.

"Back water! back water, I say! Take down this boat-sail, and stern all—stern all for your lives!" as two more appeared by the bows, evidently prepared to assist their comrade. He was making the water fly in all directions, and having failed to reach the boat, was now vainly essaying to grasp the iron, which the mate had purposely put into his short neck, so close to his head that he could not get it into his mouth.

"Slack out line till we get clear of the school, and then we'll pull up on the other side of this fellow, and I'll soon settle him with a lance?"

This was done; and as we again hauled upon the still furious beast, the mate poised his bright lance for a moment, then sent it deep into his heart.

With a tremendous roar and a desperate final struggle of scarcely a minute's duration, our prize gave up the ghost, and, after sinking momentarily, rose again to the surface, lying upon his side, just as the whale does when he dies.

His companions had left us, and we now, giving three cheers for victory, towed the carcase to the not far distant shore. It was luckily high tide, and we got the body up to high-water mark, where the speedily receding tide left it ashore.

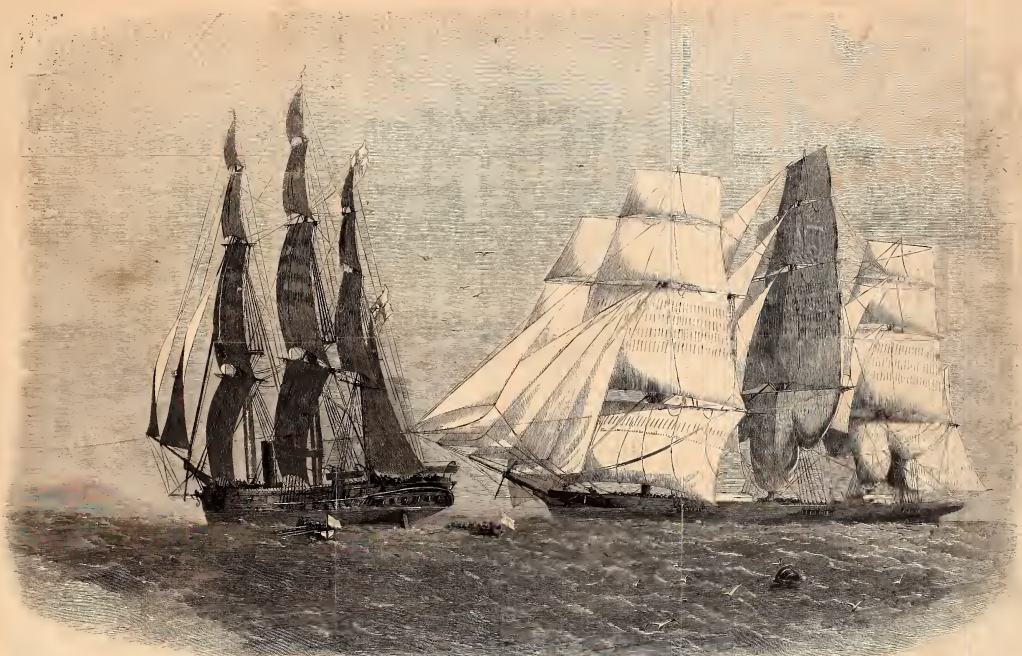
On measuring, we found our prize to be a few inches less than fifteen feet long, from his head to the commencement of his short, hairless tail. We could not measure his girth, but his bulk was enormous. His legs were disproportionately short, giving him, conjointly with his short neck and very large head an awkward, stolid appearance, which the agility he displayed in the water by no means justified.

We had not been long on shore when several natives made their appearance. They testified much joy at the sight of our prize, and went through a most lively pantomime, from which we gathered that the beasts were a great plague to them, that the meat was good to eat, and that they would like a portion. The hint was not lost upon us who had not tasted fresh beef for six months.

"What say you, boys; will you try a piece of hippopotamus steak?" proposed the mate, and as no one dissented, we got the axes, and after considerable chopping and hacking got off the head, when we were enabled to cut ourselves about twenty five pounds of what appeared to be tolerably tender meat off the fore-quarter of the animal.

Our steaks were cooked for supper, and whether it was that we were blessed with an unusually good appetite, or that the meat was actually well flavored, certain it is that they tasted delicious, and that we ate heartily of them.

M. B. BRADY'S NEW PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, CORNER OF BROADWAY AND TENTH STREET, NEW YORK.—See Page 106.



CAPTURE OF THE SUNNY SOUTH, SLAVE SHIP, WITH 702 NEGROES ON BOARD, BY THE BRITISH WAR STEAMER BRISK, IN THE MOZAMBIQUE CHANNEL, ON THE 10TH OF AUGUST, 1860.—See Page 108.

MISSING MAN.

L. D. Wilson, of Reading, Pennsylvania.

Mr. L. D. Wilson, whose portrait we publish to-day, left his home in Reading, Pennsylvania, on the 16th of June, 1860. He left for New York with the understanding that he would return in a few days, but from that time no tidings have been heard of or from him. His age is about thirty. He leaves a wife and three children.

Any information on the subject forwarded to Harvey Birch & Bro., Reading, Pa., or to the office, will be thankfully received, and immediately forwarded to his disconsolate wife and family.

GARIBALDI IN HIS RETREAT.

A Times letter in the Sun has the following: "I have just had an interview several days, I guess, with the gallant and genuine old sea-dog. The general has a nice cozy little cottage with two acres, passes him, and how he sees with him only his son and daughter, his friend Dobbs and his private secretary Basile. Two mules of letters he receives from all parts of the world to encourage and some of the enemies arrange proposals. Dr. Riboli, a distinguished physician of this city and a great admirer of philosophy, has written to Garibaldi exhorting him to allow his head to be examined by phrenology that he believes it to be one of the best organized and most remarkable head in the world, and has procured in the island. The son of the colonel of the Italian Legion at Monte Video passed some days on a visit with the general, and as the colonel was a great friend and companion in arms of Garibaldi when in America, every attention was shown to young Mr. Chiavo. When the general's pantaloons are old, he either sends a quote to draught at the jewelry, and an entire head pattern may be convey him in a vessel, he parcel out a postal, and before it is over he gives it to the first poor lad in his breast. Garibaldi, having the report, hurried up, and did not stop until he had given the poor boy, exercise in a few hours. No other reason can be assigned for Garibaldi's rash act than the general's enthusiasm for Garibaldi was so great that he could not bear to be separated from him."

FACTS EVERYBODY.—The number of languages spoken is 3,064. The number that can be learned to do it in one or of one men. The average of human life is 33 years. One quarter die before 7 years of age; one-half before the age of 17. To every 1,000 persons only one reaches 100 years of age, and more than one to 500 reach 80 years. There are on the earth 1,000,000,000 inhabitants. Of these 33,333 die every year, 91 924 die every day, 7 755 every hour, and 129 every minute, or every second. These facts are to be all balanced by an equal number of births. Marriages are regulated by the births, the weight, and above all, those who observe sober and industrious conduct. The rule is the same. Thus short ones. Women have more chances of life—possess a few days of fifty years to the men's fewer years. The number of marriages are in the proportion of 100 to 105. Marriages are more frequent after the expenses, that is, during the months of June and July, than in December. Marriages are generally more robust than others. Births and deaths are more frequent by day than by night. The number of men capable of bearing arms is not form 10 of the population.

EXTRACTS FROM PUNCH—TO CAPITALISTS.—Be best paper to invest in at the present time is railway s-tarvecrapes. Never was such interest can be derived from them than from any other investment. They will pay for your support and interest to your wives, children and friends a remarkable interest at the end of twenty years. Recommend them.

A QUERY FOR THE STATESMAN AND THE PHILOSOPHER.—In case of a dissolution of the Union, will anybody take the Sockery Cotton Velvet Dressing Vases? Let the curious buy a quantity and watch.

THEY FOR ANYWAYS INSTANTANEOUS VERS.—Are the tales made enough to make you laugh and asleep? A trial will be made on the first animal hospitals.

CONSUMING.—Two men made a bet as to the cost of cutting off eight in. Quoit and two hundred and six-pence, the other cut the hundred and more. He got the money. Query—Which of the two would say he? and we hope every-by-bit keep eating all day, till sold and Day's Patent Anthony's No. 301 Broadway, and bought their Stereo-graph Vases, their Photographic Albums and their gold pencil trains of Queen Victoria, Prince Albert, Co-Guelph, Garibaldi and all the celebrities of the day.

A ROCKING CHAIR WITHOUT ROCKERS.—The "Prospero" Rocking Chairs sold by Terry & Wells, N. Y. do. 52 Cortlandt, stand on patent rock without rockers. They are made to all the varies as styles of the ordinary arm-chairs used in parlors and c-mbers, and present a similar appearance. The easy movements are to be secured by a cam, and the chair held rigidly either upright or at any reasonable incline desired. The spring is very convenient for invalid chairs, for such persons can rest at any of these three positions with perfect satisfactory. As a library, or study chair, it is unsurpassed for the ease of body thereof obtained, relieves the fatigue of long confinement to the desk or writing table, and renders it as pleasant to an aged parent or invalid as to a child. Also, for sale, rocking chairs with casters to adjustably, and are ever in the way, as the one great feature of this new invention.

Bronchial Complaints, &c.

REV. D. F. LYLE-MOORE, Editor of the Chicago New Covenant, says of Dr. Wm. Brown's Bronchial Troches: "We have frequently had occasion to test the merits of Brown's Bronchial Troches, and have found them to be all that is claimed for the preparation for which they are recommended. For Bronchial affections, Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, or Sore Throat, we know them to be a superior remedy. Public speakers will find them useful in clearing the throat for reading, singing, because we have confidence in Dr. Brown, have a long acquaintance with him, and always with success.—Chicago Christian Herald.

$40. Parker Sewing Machine, $40.

Light and Noiseless, under Patents of Howe, Grover & Baker, Wheeler & Wilson. Agents wanted.

Office, VENNOR & CO.,
No. 707 Broadway.

Concentrated Leaven

For making

Bread, Tea Cakes,

&c.

All Kinds of Pastry, &c.,

MANUFACTURED BY

EDWARD CHAMBERLIN & CO.,

Proprietors of Shaw-mee Chemical Works,

No. 33 Indie St. Boston.

Concentrated Leaven

Is the result of careful chemical research. Bread of all kinds, made by using it, is light, more digestible and sweet, has an appetizing, nutrient taste, is free from sour, will retain its moisture longer than by any other process, and is a valuable preparation for the crisp and tea cakes and pastries.

DIRECTIONS IN EACH PACKAGE for making Plain Soft and Tea Rolls—Loaf Bread—Brown Bread—Buckwheat Cakes—Sponge Cakes—Soup Cakes—Cup Cakes—Lemon Cakes—Wafers Cake—Muffin —Light Puddings—Plain Cakes—Sponge Cakes—Rich Cakes—Short Cakes—Rich Puddings—Cream Tarts Cake—Sponge Cakes—Sponge Cakes—Indian Cakes—Sponge Cakes—Sponge Cakes—Sponge

Miscellaneous.

THE AMALGAMATION OF LANGUAGES.—There is a growing tendency in this age to appropriate the most expressive words of other languages and after a while to incorporate them into our own; thus the word Cephalic, which is from the Greek, signifying "for the head," is now becoming popularized in connection with Mr. Spalding's great Headache remedy, but it will soon be used in a more general way, and the word Cephalic will become as common as Electrotype and many others whose distinction as foreign words has been worn away by common usage until they seem "native and to the manor born."

'Ardly Realized.

Hi 'ad 'n 'orrible 'eadache this hafternoon, hand I stepped into the hapothecary's, hand says hi to the man, "Can you hease me of an 'eadache?" "Does it hache 'ard?" says 'e. "Hexceedingly," says hi, hand upon that 'e gave me a Cephalic Pill, hand 'pon me 'onor it cured me so quick that I 'ardly realized I 'ad 'ad an 'eadache.

☞ HEADACHE is the favorite sign by which nature makes known any deviation whatever from the natural state of the brain, and viewed in this light it may be looked on as a safeguard intended to give notice of disease which might otherwise escape attention till too late to be remedied, and its indications should never be neglected. Headaches may be classified under two names, viz: Symptomatic and Idiopathic. Symptomatic Headache is exceedingly common and is the precursor of a great variety of diseases, among which are Apoplexy, Gout, Rheumatism and all febrile diseases. In its nervous form it is sympathetic of disease of the stomach constituting sick headache, of hepatic disease constituting bilious headache, of worms, constipation and other disorders of the bowels, as well as renal and uterine affections. Diseases of the heart are very frequently attended with Headaches. Anæmia and plethora are also affections which frequently occasion headache. Idiopathic Headache is also very common, being usually distinguished by the name of nervous headache, sometimes coming on suddenly in a state of apparently sound health and prostrating at once the mental and physical energies, and in other instances it comes on slowly, heralded by depression of spirits or acerbity of temper. In most instances the pain is in the front of the head, over one or both eyes, and sometimes provoking vomiting; under this class may also be named Neuralgia.

For the treatment of either class of Headache the Cephalic Pills have been found a sure and safe remedy, relieving the most acute pains in a few minutes, and by its subtle power eradicating the diseases of which Headache is the unerring index.

BRIDGET.—Missus wants you to send her a box of Cephalic Glue, no, a bottle of Prepared Pills—but I'm thinking that's not just it neither; but perhaps ye'll be after knowing what it is. Ye see she's nigh dead and gone with the Sick Headache, and wants some more of that same as relieved her before.

DRUGGIST.—You must mean Spalding's Cephalic Pills.

BRIDGET.—Och! sure now and you've sed it; here's the quarther and give me the Pills, and don't be all day about it either.

Constipation or Costiveness.

No one of the "many ills flesh is heir to" is so prevalent, so little understood, and so much neglected as Costiveness. Often originating in carelessness or sedentary habits, it is regarded as a slight disorder of too little consequence to excite anxiety, while in reality it is the precursor and companion of many of the most fatal and dangerous diseases, and unless early eradicated it will bring the sufferer to an untimely grave. Among the lighter evils of which Costiveness is the usual attendant are Headache, Colic, Rheumatism, Foul Breath, Piles and others of like nature, while a long train of frightful diseases such as Malignant Fevers, Abcesses, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Dyspepsia, Apoplexy, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Hysteria, Hypochondriasis, Melancholy and Insanity, first indicate their presence in the system by this alarming symptom. Not unfrequently the diseases named originate in Constipation, but take on an independent existence unless the cause is eradicated in an early stage. From all these considerations it follows that the disorder should receive immediate attention whenever it occurs, and no person should neglect to get a box of Cephalic Pills on the first appearance of the complaint, as their timely use will expel the insidious approaches of disease and destroy this dangerous foe to human life.

Cephalic Pills,
CURE
Sick Headache,
CURE
Nervous Headache,
CURE
All kinds of
Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented; and if taken at the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits, they are valuable as a Laxative, improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of pain and suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS

The genuine have five signatures of Henry C. Spalding on each Box

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

All orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING,
48 Cedar St., New York.

OFFICE
FOR THE SPECIAL TREATMENT OF
DYSPEPSIA-INDIGESTION
48 East Twelfth Street,
(Near Broadway),
DR. RUTGER FOOTE.

SYMPTOMS.—Pains in the Stomach and Sides. Fulness and Oppression with a feeling of Weight or Load in the Pit of the Stomach, particularly after eating. Acidity—sour and bitter Eructations, Nausea, Vomiting of Food—of Sour Phlegm; Heartburn, Loss of Appetite, Constipation and Irregularity of the Bowels, a Sinking and Goneness at the Pit of the Stomach; Great Flatulence and Rumbling.

Palpitation of the Heart—occasional Difficulty of Breathing, with short dry cough; Fluttering and Beating (pulsations) in the pit of the Stomach; Pains in the Head, Back and back of the Neck; Sick Headache, Giddiness, Swimming in the Head.

Debility, Languor, Weariness, Indifference, Nervousness, Excitability, Irritability, Sleeplessness, Great Depression of Spirits, Fears of approaching Evil or Death, Melancholy Hypochondria, Frightful Dreams and Nightmare.

DR. FOOTE (late of Tennessee), begs leave to call your attention to his Special Treatment of this distressing complaint and to assure you that you can rely upon receiving immediate relief, and an effectual and permanent Cure. The study and experience of seventeen years, devoted principally to this one disease, has enabled him to master the hydra that has for ages baffled all the skill of the profession. Reliable testimonials of the most gratifying success furnished. Hours from 2 P. M. to 8 P. M. No charge for consultation. Treatment by mail. 266-59

L. DUBERNET & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF
Passe-Partouts and Fancy Frames,
544 Broadway, between Spring and Prince Sts., New York.
☞ Gilt, Ebony, Black Walnut and Oak Frames always on hand. ☜
L. DUBERNET, J. DUBERNET.
000

335 EMPIRE 335
SEWING MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
SALESROOM, NO. 335 BROADWAY.

This Machine is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanics. It possesses many rare and valuable IMPROVEMENTS—has been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced SIMPLICITY AND PERFECTION COMBINED.

The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:
1. Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2. Liability to get out of order.
3. Expense, trouble and loss of time in repairing.
4. Incapacity to sew every description of material.
5. Disagreeable noise while in operation.

The Empire Sewing Machine
IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.

It has a straight needle, perpendicular motion, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither RIP nor RAVEL and is alike on both sides; performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nansook Muslin, with cotton, linen or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as GLASS, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.

It requires FIFTY PER CENT less power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of twelve years of age can work it steadily, without fatigue or injury to health.

Its strength and WONDERFUL SIMPLICITY of construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is GUARANTEED by the Company to give entire satisfaction.

We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article to call and examine this UNRIVALLED MACHINE.

But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of

MERCHANT TAILORS,
COACH-MAKERS,
HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS,
SHIRT AND BOSOM MAKERS,
DRESS-MAKERS,
CORSET-MAKERS,
GAITER-FITTERS,
SHOE-BINDERS,
VEST AND PANTALOON-MAKERS.

Religious and Charitable Institutions
WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.

PRICE OF MACHINES COMPLETE:
No. 1—Or Family Machine.......... $50
No. 2—Small size Manufacturing.......... 65
No. 3—Large size Manufacturing.......... 60

Agencies Established:
WILSON & CO., 1 & North Ninth St., Philadelphia, Pa.
D. GRIFFIN, 14 North Gay st., Baltimore, Md.
JOHN B. PUSS, 2?2 River St., Troy, N. Y.
JAMES TOD, Commercial Buildings, Cincinnati, Ohio.
AGENTS WANTED.
000 T. J. McARTHUR & CO.

Liquid and Extract Triesmer,

THE genuine English preparations, purely vegetable, and pleasant to the taste, prepared by J. T. BRONSON, M. D., Holborn, London. Liquid TRIESMER is guaranteed to effectually eradicate all traces of premature decay, Spermatorrhœa, &c., restoring the functions of either young or old with an astonishing permanency. EXTRACT TRIESMER is warranted to cure in every case (for which mercury and sarsaparilla is used), infallibly eradicating all disease and impurities from the body. Price $1 per Bottle or Six Bottles for $5. Sent by Express to any part of the country. All orders must be addressed to DR. W. S. HOWELL, No. 149 Spring Street, New York City. 250-75

Boar's Head Six Cord Spool Cotton,
ESTABLISHED 1783.

Superior to any ever imported in Strength, Smoothness and Elasticity, for MACHINE OR HAND SEWING.

On Spools of 200, 500 and 2,400 Yards, the lengths warranted.

G. CARVILLE,
Sole Agent, 186 Fulton St.

A New Discovery
FOR THE
Retention and Radical Cure of Hernia, &c.
White's Patent Lever Truss.

This instrument, which is now offered to the public in this city, radically different in principle and action from all others in use, combining every valuable point in other Trusses, besides several points of the highest value never before attained. Among some of the advantages claimed for this instrument are these: It has a SOFT, PLIANT, METALLIC BOW; graduating pressure power PERFECTLY CONTROLLABLE, INWARD AND UPPER ACTION combined; no uncomfortable pressure on the BACK, and none on the SPERMATIC CORD; does not work out of place; PERFECTLY CLEAN; SMALLEST, LIGHTEST, CHEAPEST, most DURABLE shows least, holds the rupture in every case, requires less than one-half the usual pressure, and is a radical cure. The ABDOMINAL SUPPORTERS are on the same principle. Pamphlets gratis. Elegant rooms are fitted up for Ladies and Gentlemen by the Proprietors, GREGORY & CO., No. 25 Bond St., N. Y. for their adjustment.

These Instruments are also offered at wholesale by Messrs. D. S. BARNES & Co., Nos. 13 and 15 Park Row; Messrs. SCHIEFFELIN BROTHERS, No. 170 William St., and by all first-class drug houses throughout the country. nw

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

PUBLISHED for the benefit and as a warning to young men who suffer from Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, &c.; supplying the means of self-Cure. By one who cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. Single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Bedford, Kings County, N. Y., by inclosing a postpaid addressed envelope. 255 67

WHAT SHALL I DO FOR MY HAIR?—Use LYON'S KATHAIRON, USE LYONS KATHAIRON FOR THE HAIR. It is, beyond question, the finest preparation ever made. Its immense sale proves its excellence. Nothing has ever given such universal satisfaction. It restores, preserves and beautifies the Hair, and imparts a delightful odor. 261-73

A. LANGE,
PICTURE AND LOOKING-GLASS
FRAMES
AND
CORNICES FOR ROOMS
MADE TO ORDER, AND REGILDING DONE
206 William St., cor. Frankfort, New York.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE AND GYMNASIUM, YONKERS, N. Y.
Winter Session commenced on the 1st day of Nov.
TERMS:
Board and Tuition.......... $150 per Session.
For Circulars and particular information, apply to
V. N. WISEWELL
Yonkers, 1860

HANDSOME WOMEN.
TO THE LADIES.

HUNT'S "BLOOM OF ROSES," a rich and delicate color for the cheeks and lips, WILL NOT WASH OR RUB OFF, and when once applied remains durable for years, mailed free in bottles for $1.

HUNT'S "COURT TOILET POWDER" imparts a dazzling whiteness to the complexion, and is unlike anything else used for this purpose, mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "BRITISH BALM" removes Tan, Freckles, Sunburn and all eruptions of the skin; mailed free for 50 cts.

HUNT'S "IMPERIAL POMADE," for the Hair, strengthens and improves its growth, keeps it from falling off, and warranted TO MAKE THE HAIR CURL, mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "PEARL BEAUTIFIER," for the Teeth and Gums, cleanses and whitens the Teeth, hardens the Gums, purifies the Breath effectually, PRESERVES THE TEETH AND PREVENTS TOOTHACHE; mailed free for $1.

HUNT'S "BRIDAL WREATH PERFUME," a double extract of orange blossoms and cologne, mailed free for $1.

This exquisite Perfume was first used by the PRINCESS ROYAL OF ENGLAND, on her marriage. MESSRS. HUNT & CO. presented the Princess with an elegant case of Perfumery (in which all the above articles were included), in handsome cut glass with gold stoppers, valued at $1,500, particulars of which appeared in the public prints. All the above articles sent FREE by express for $5. Cash can either accompany the order or be paid to the express agent on delivery of goods.

CO., Perfumers to the Queen, Regent ... London, and 707 Sansom St., Philadelphia. The ... supplied.

THE READERS OF
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper

Desiring to purchase any article in New York, no matter how trifling or costly, can have their orders promptly and faithfully fulfilled by addressing

JAMES W. FORTUNE,
Care of Frank Leslie, Esq.,
19 City Hall Square, N. Y.

In all cases the necessary funds should be inclosed in the communication.

PIANOFORTES.
JOHN B. DUNHAM,
MANUFACTURER OF THE OVERSTRUNG
Celebrated Dunham Pianofortes,
GRAND AND SQUARE
MANUFACTORY AND SHOW ROOMS,
75 to 85 East Thirteenth Street near Broadway,
New York.
ESTABLISHED IN 1834.

Parties in the country wishing Instruments direct from the Factory, can be suited by describing by letter the quality of tone and touch desired.

Purchasers may rely upon the excellence of these instruments. They are warranted for Five years, and prices are moderate.

TADMAN'S CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE, for Chapped Hands and Lips, requires no artificial heat in applying it, as it dissolves readily when applied to the skin, cures in a few hours, and makes the skin delicately soft and white. Observe, the color is YELLOW, and the name, "CAMPHOR CAKE WITH GLYCERINE." TADMAN & CO., DRUGGISTS, 268 Fourth Av. and 1 Bleecker St. By mail 25 cts.

$1.500 PER ANNUM.—Agents Wanted, local or travelling in every Town and village in the United States, for the sale of an article on which eighty per cent. profit is realized. For particulars inclose red stamp to Box 101, care B. Lockwood, Broadway Post Office, New York City. 26..75

ESTABLISHED 1843.

BOOLE'S CELEBRATED HYPERION FLUID overtops everything as the greatest restorer and best dressing for the Hair in the world. You who have been deceived by nostrums, try this and be convinced. It never fails. To be had at

W. BOOLE'S
Hairwork, Perfumery and Toilet Store,
102 Washington St., Boston and for sale everywhere.

WORTH HAVING

"The Mine of Wealth."

A Book that instructs how to make one article that three men are making each $15 a day from. Also two articles that are paying persons who travel from $5 to $8 a day. Also four articles that Agents are making from $3 to $6 a day with. The Book also contains 161 other rare and valuable recipes never before made public, some of which cost over $100. Price $1, sent free by mail for the price.

GARRISON & CO., Publishers,
263-74 126 Randolph St., Chicago, P. O. Box 3871.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau Street, New York.

IMPORTANT INVENTION FOR MARRIED PEOPLE.—For particulars address, inclosing stamp DR. H. HIRSHFIELD, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 438 Broadway, New York. 259-71

Kennedy's Medical Discovery CURES SCROFULA.

Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Erysipelas.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Canker.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Nursing Sore Mouth.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Humor of the Eyes.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Scald Head.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Running of the Ears.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Ulcerated Sore Legs.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Rheumatism.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Salt Rheum.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery cures Dyspepsia.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Bowels.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Kidneys.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery regulates the Liver.
Kennedy's Medical Discovery has cured Dropsy.

When you are sick, and do not know what the matter is, perhaps you have an inward humor. Try Kennedy's Medical Discovery. For sale by all Druggists.

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S
LOTTERIES!
AUTHORIZED BY THE STATES OF DELAWARE,
MISSOURI
AND
KENTUCKY

Draw daily, in public, under the superintendence of Sworn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM
$2 50 TO $100,000!
TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $20.

☞ Circulars giving full explanation and the Scheme to be drawn will be sent, free of expense, by addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
OR
WOOD, EDDY & CO. St. Louis, Missouri.

DOESTICKS

TO APPEAR IN

The New York Mercury!

Remember that Q. K. PHILANDER DOESTICKS, P. B., will open the New Year in that great family Paper, The New York Mercury, with those wonderful Doesticks burlesques, which have placed him at the head of the humorists of the world. Dont miss the sublime, the inimitable Doesticks. Send two dollars immediately to CALDWELL, SOUTHWORTH & WHITNEY, of The New York Mercury, and secure a year's stock of Doesticks. 267o

THE

Fort Edward Ledger.

Advertisers who desire to attract the attention of the reading public in Northern New York, can find no better medium than the Fort Edward (Washington Co.) Ledger. Agents in New York, S. H. Pettengill & Co., 119 Nassau St. 267o

Charles Heidsieck CHAMPAGNE.

The undersigned have for sale the above popular Wine, for which they are

THE SOLE AGENTS FOR NORTH AMERICA.

The stock they have now on hand is identical in quality with that for which Messrs. CHARLES HEIDSIECK & Co. received the first premium at the Dordogne Exposition of 1859.

It is well known that the Wine Connoisseurs of Bordeaux are the first in the world. In forwarding the public of the fact that the Charles Heidsieck Champagne took the premium at above mentioned, backed by the most prominent Wine Growers and Merchants of the Champagne District, together with the Commissioners of their local government and stocks, we believe we furnish sufficient evidence of its great merits. The medal awarded to the Judges of the Exposition can be seen at our store.

T. W. BLYARD & BENARD,
No 156 Pearl St., N. Y.
267o

For the Holidays.

EVERY FAMILY should have one of our Assorted Cases, containing One Dozen bottles of fine Old Liquor, as follows:

2 Bottles S. O. P. Brandy,
1 " Holland Gin,
1 " Port Wine,
2 " Pale Sherry,
One Extra Cherry Brandy.
1 Bottle Madeira Wine,
1 " Scotch Whiskey,
2 " Old Bourbon do.,
1 " Jamaica Rum,

ONLY $12 IN ONE ENTIRE CASE.

DELIVERED FREE OF CHARGE.

GREENEY & HEADDING, Importers,
No. 62 Courtlandt St., New York. 267o

The Most Useful Holiday Present, GROVER & BAKER'S
Celebrated Noiseless Sewing Machine.

$45 and upwards. 495 Broadway.
GIVE THE BEST. 266-67o

SKATE. OF ALL KINDS, from 25 cts. to $25, and in fact everything in the Skating line (except pond) in boundless variety, to suit all ages, sexes, tastes and purses. Price list free.

GROVER & WALKER, Hardware Dealers,
266-68o 414 Broadway, corner Grand and Bowery.

Ladd, Webster & Co's
IMPROVED TIGHT STITCH SEWING MACHINES,
305 Broadway, New York. 302o

Smith and Wesson's Seven-Shooter.

J. W. STORES, Agent,
181 Chambers Street, N. Y.

THIS PISTOL is light, but great force, is sure fire, shoots accurately, can be loft loaded any length of time without injury, and is ready to use at order, a safe to carry. Every Pistol warranted

CAUTION TO DEALERS.

Be sure and get those stamped "Smith & Wesson, Springfield, Mass." None others genuine. All counterfeits prevented that land of the breech are infringements. Suits recommenced, and all such infringements will be prosecuted. No sale the outright who have Smith & Wesson's guarantee in each out of the box. 247-72o

SILSBEE, CASE & CO.,
Photographic and Daguerreotype
ARTISTS.
289½ Washington Street, Boston.

Up but one flight of stairs.

G. M. SILSBEE, J. G. CASE, W. H. GERTELL.
241-7o

Sent Free! Sent Free! Sent Free!

A NEW and Beautiful Art, for which we want Agents everywhere. Agents make $50 a month. Terms and Specimen sent FREE. Address, with stamp for return postage, L. L. BOND & CO.,
267-69o Lowell, Mass.

TRAVELLING AGENTS WANTED—To sell a new and valuable article required in every household. Salary paid or commission allowed. Address and particulars sent, with stamps, J. W. HARRIS, Boston, Mass. 266-68o

MISSING MAN.

L. D. WILSON, OF BRADFORD, PA., MISSING SINCE JUNE 16TH, 1860.—SEE PAGE 110.

SKATES FOR THE MILLION.

From 25 cts to $20 per Pair,
And everything in the Skating line.

ALLEN'S PROGRAM
SPORTSMAN'S DEPOT,
658 Broadway, New York.
SKATES GROUND AND REPAIRED.
Wholesale and Retail. 266-67o

The Singer Sewing Machines.

IN order to place the BEST FAMILY MACHINE in the World within the reach of all, we have reduced our LITTLE A, OR TRANSVERSE SHUTTLE MACHINE, beautifully ornamented, to $50.

Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machines,
both of very general application and capacity, and popular both in the family and manufactory. Prices reduced, respectively from $125 to $100 and $150 to $120.

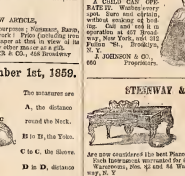
Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine,
For Carriage-makers and heavy leather work. Price, complete, $175.

Also, to complete the list, an

ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,
ane-qualled for manufacturing purposes; Noiseless, Rapid, and capable of every kind of work; Price (including iron stand and treadle), $110—cheaper, at this time, in view of its value than the machines of any other make as a gift.

I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway
606o

Patented November 1st, 1859.



The measurer are
A, the distance
round the Neck.
B to D, the Yoke.
C to C, the Sleeve.
D to D, distance
round the Body
under the armpits
E to E, the length
of the Shirt.

BALLOU'S
Patent Improved French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.

A New Style of Shirt, warranted to Fit

By stating the above measure per mail we can guarantee a perfect fit of our new style of shirt, and return by Express to any part of the United States, at $27, $18, $15, $12, $9, $6, per dozen. No order accepted for less than half a dozen Shirts.

Gents' Improved and Dashes in MENS' FURNISHING GOODS

BALLOU BROTHERS,
409 Broadway, N. Y.
Wholesale Trade exclusive to the world terms

Superior Pianofortes.

EORNEST GABLER, MANUFACTURER OF PIANOFORTES (with or without Harmonic Scales), 120 East Twenty-Second St., between Second and Third Ave., New York. Dealers and others are invited to call and examine. My scales are very superior instruments, made with full iron frame and warranted equal to any in the market for strength and beauty of finish, workmanship and power of tone. My instruments are warranted for three years, and I guarantee to sell at lower prices than any respectable manufacturer in the city. CONSTANTLY ON HAND, 120 East Twenty-Second Street, New York.

THE ELECTROTYPING OF LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is done by PELMER & Co., 31 Dutch Street.

A NEW YEAR'S PRESENT.
Willcox & Gibbs' Sewing Machine.

Every gentleman who will present his wife or sweetheart with one of these beautiful machines will be conferring a lasting favor.

WILLCOX & GIBBS' SEWING MACHINES,
Will receive a certain grateful thanks for sooner be substituted by dealers and cause JAMES WILLCOX, Metropolitan Buildings, 505 Broadway, opposite St. Nicholas. 265o

THE

Fort Edward Ledger,

Advertisers who desire to attract the attention of the reading public in Northern New York, can find no better medium than the Fort Edward (Washington Co.) Ledger. Agents in New York, S. H. Pettengill & Co., 119 Nassau St. 267o

JOY TO THE WORLD.
Clothes Washed in One Minute by JOHNSON'S UNION WASHING MACHINE.
Patented April 10, 1860.

PRICE $8 TO $10.

A CHILD CAN OPERATE IT. Washes every spot. Saves labor, without soaking or boiling. Can and will be in operation in 407 Broadway, New York, on and after Friday, N. Y.

J. JOHNSON & CO.,
Proprietors.
660

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRAND AND SQUARE PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured. Each instrument warranted for five years.

Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. 905o

A. Rumrill & Co.,
366 BROADWAY.
THE RIGHT KIND OF A PRESENT FOR THIS

HOLIDAYS.

One of these fine, selected and circumstantially-rated three-quarter plate American Watches of the new series, made by the American Watch Company,

OF WALTHAM, MASS.

The finest and most durable time-keepers ever made. For sale until January 1st at manufacturer's prices, by

A. RUMRILL & CO.,
393 Broadway. 266-67o

100 Pages Complete. Price 10 Cents.

BEADLE'S
Dime Biographical Library No. I.

THE ONLY COMPLETE AND RELIABLE

Life of GARIBALDI,
The Washington of Italy.

Complete to the close of

THE NEAPOLITAN CAMPAIGN, 1860.

Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.
For sale at all News Depots.
BEADLE & CO., General Dime Book Publishers,
2812o 141 William St., New York.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,

FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR. For curling and promoting Baldness.
For removing Scurf and Dandruff.
For keeping the Hair in any desired order and curly.
In fact for truly and real curative compound of the kind in use.
Be sure and get the right article.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator.
Price 25 cents per bottle.
Wholesale Depot, 56 Dey St., New York.
Sold by Druggists.

PROF. L. MILLER'S INSTANTANEOUS LIQUID HAIR DYE
Price 50 cents per box.
Warranted superior to all others.
Try them, and you will acknowledge the fact.

Exposition for the Holidays.
TIFFANY & CO.,
No. 350 Broadway—No. 79 Rue Richelieu, Paris,
Respectfully invite the attention of all who solicitate the

Christmas and New Year Greetings,

To the unprecedentedly large and varied stock of Jewellery, Clocks and Watches, Bronzes, Articles in Silver and Plate, Secrets, Brushes and other Porcelains, Dressing, Desk, Pocketing and Reticule Cases, in Ormolu, Enamel, Ebony, Buhl or Leather, and Stationerie Articles in the way of

ETRENNES,

now open for the inspection of their Patrons.
The assortment of Jewellery in

DIAMONDS AND PRECIOUS STONES, SETS AND UNSET, is not only more comprehensive in design and costly in material than ever before offered to the American Public, but more extensive and general than any single stock in any City House.

The Kit of

TOOLS EXCLUSIVELY ARTISTIC,

Comprises PRESS ORNAMENTAL OR USEFUL IN SILVER, designed in accordance with the finest appreciations of art and utility.

BUDGETS FOR THE MANTEL, NICHE OR CONSOLE, by Chevaigny, Barye, Feuchy, Carrier, Rene Boubeur, Meiss, Nieuwerkerque, Bernard and others.

NEW BOUDOIR CLOCKS, after Jean Goujon, or in the exquisite Italian style, Gothic or Renaissance, from the designs of Flat, besides a thousand adaptations from the antique or designed to order, in the shape of Bracelets, Gauge, Flower Vases, Ash Receivers, &c.

In view of the fact that their patrons inevitably recruit the experience of a late importation of their Birthday Stock, TIFFANY & CO. would respectfully invite the attention of an early call. 266-67o

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 15, 24 and 36 tunes
PURCHASED IN PARIS, Improved,
Harmel Boxes repaired. 21 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

New Popular Song.
"OLD DONALD GREY,"

Words by "Percival." Sold at all the Music Stores and news stands, postage paid, by any of the Music Stores and periods of the price by cents, by the Publisher, JACOB DOLL, 539 Broadway, New York. 267o

N. B.—Agents wanted will be issued in a few days, the new song of the Percivers, of "Hello" in a Railroad Race." Price 25 cts. 262-6o

TO THE LADIES.

Our lady readers will be pleased to find a fine complexion will find an efficient agent in BURDETT'S KALLISTON. Those who have used it are loud in its praises as a preparation which imparts a clear, soft and beautiful tint to the skin, without being attended by any injurious effects. Its pronounced one of the best ladies features ever prepared.—St. Louis Evening News.

Tiffany & Co.,
LATE
TIFFANY, YOUNG & ELLIS,
Fine Jewellery, Precious Stones, Bronzes, Silver Ware Ormolu, Clocks, Rich Porcelain, Articles of Art and Luxury
550 and 552 Broadway, New York.
SOLE AGENTS FOR LEVI LANT, HEED & CO

FINKLE & LYON'S
SEWING MACHINES.

Our Machines took the highest medal at the Fair of the Institute, in Boston, with the highest premium for the Lockstitch Machine ever.

They also took the highest premiums at the New Jersey State Fair, Trenton; Erie, Utica, N. Y., the Fraiker in Louisville, and are generally wherever exhibited.

Sale 428 & 430 Broadway.

SEWING UP 1000 BROADWAY 00c

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1860, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 275—Vol. XI.] NEW YORK, MARCH 2, 1861. [Price 6 Cents.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT ON HIS WAY TO WASHINGTON.

From Cincinnati to Columbus—Arrival at Columbus—Escorted to the Governor's Room—The President at Cleveland—The President waits Ex-President Fillmore at Buffalo—Arrival of the President at Albany—At Troy—Arrival at New York—The President at the City Hall, &c.

From Cincinnati to Columbus.

In our last number we left Mr. Lincoln at Cincinnati, which city he left on the 19th. His departure was attended with little ceremony. At nine o'clock the President elect with his family drove to the depot, where a large crowd had gathered. An eye-witness says that his appearance was careworn, and his face wrestled with wrinkles. It must be confessed that, although he travels only in the daytime, yet the labor is great, since the stoppages are very numerous, and he is obliged or expected to make a speech at all of them. On his way from Cincinnati to Columbus he made nearly half a dozen. The principal ones were at Hanover, Xenia and London, at all of which places there were great concourses of people. At Xenia they acted more like crazy people than American citizens. Here rather an amusing episode occurred. We quote from our friend Howard of the Times, and knowing his appreciation of the good things of this world, we cordially re-echo his sorrows:

"It was about one o'clock when we reached that point, and as we had breakfasted quite early in the morning, the anticipated and promised lunch was regarded most favorably by the several eyes of faith, and the various complicated digesting apparatuses that fleeted and uncomfortably moved from one to our most restlessly. Imagine the feelings of the President elect, of all the corporals, of the high and mightiest, of the four reporters and the unfilled hangers-on, when it was announced by the chairman of the gastronomic department that a lunch, varied and extensive in its duration, had been prepared, had been left on the table in the depot, and had been devoured by the voracious and Democratic crowd, who now, with well-filled paunches, with bread and buttery hands, and with the most comfortable abdominal sensations, were clamoring for a third speech from their dear old Rail-Splitter!"

The philosopher of the party seems to be the Prince of Rails, or the President Lincoln's eldest son, for the historian relates that he took out his memorandum and puffed vigorously.

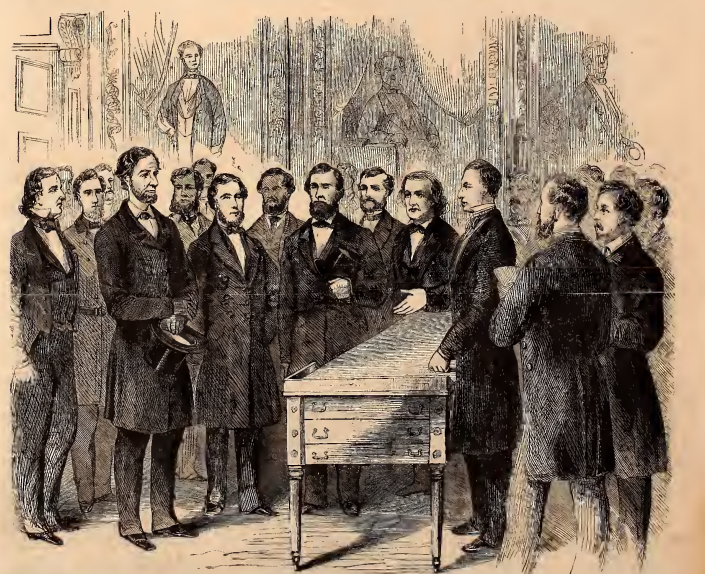
We have not space to dilate upon the little passage of arms between Miss Mary Jane Stuart and Old Abe, although it involved a nosegay and a kiss, nor will we say anything of the young damsel who begged the President to let his whiskers grow. The gravity of the occasion compels us to skip these episodes.

The Arrival at Columbus.

The State House of Columbus is a fine imposing building, and the reception was worthy the occasion and the people. Great credit is due to the various State and local officials who managed it, prominent amongst whom was Adjutant-General Curtington, of the State, on whom devolved the entire charge of the party during their trip through Ohio. Drawn up before the depot was a very fine array of military; at one end of the line was a cannon, which momentarily thundered out a hearty bow-wow-wow; carriages for the guests, one and all, little and big, were provided at the other end of the line, while far off, as far as the eye could reach, and in numbers so great that no mortal man could easily number them, stretched thousands and thousands of cheering, hurrahing, welcoming citizens. A fine band of music preceded the procession, and while the multitude rolled after, like the waves of the ocean, and their voices roared afar off like the sound of many waters, the President elect was drawn in hospitable triumph to the State Capitol.

He is escorted to the Governor's Room

Through lines of unarmed men, in which elegantly furnished cham-



FOR PRESIDENTIAL JOURNEY.—RECEPTION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN BY BERNARDO WOOD, MAYOR OF NEW YORK, AT THE CITY HALL, ON WEDNESDAY, FEB. 20TH, 1861.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR ARTIST ARTHUR

her Governor Dennison felicitously greeted him. After a general shake around Mr. Lincoln was led into the hall of the Legislature, where were sitting in joint session the two bodies—the Upper and the Lower—while in handsome circle vast numbers of smiling ladies with graceful courtesy waved their snowy handkerchiefs and gladdened the hearts of the nation's leaders by their encouraging smiles and bright, loving glances.

Lieutenant-Gov ernor Kirk had the honor of welcoming Mr. Lincoln, and may congratulate himself upon having drawn from the lips of the way Illinoisian a speech which, for kindly sentiment, and for cheering import, has not been equalled in many a day, and which, one feels sure as it has been said, "the right way round" in all parts of the country, has gladdened the hearts of patriots, and set to rest the fears of statesmen. After the speech it was open ice, and left a current of the western steps, from which point he commanded a splendid view of the whole of the magnificent Capitol Square as he passed through the crowd.

The same greetings, undaunted by the mud upon the streets, followed the carriage which conveyed him to the Governor's mansion, and his residence, where, in the family of his friend, and his immediate circle, Mr. Lincoln dined and subsequently received prior to the adjournment of the evening. In the evening he left for the city of Mr. Dennison, whose charming wife and daughters left a grace to the scene.

At seven o'clock the next morning the whole party started for Pittsburg.

(Continued on page 232.)

Barnum's American Museum.

UNPARALLELED ATTRACTIONS. EVERY AFTERNOON AND EVENING, at three and half-past seven o'clock, the Grand Allegorical Spectacle, entitled THE DRAGON OF WANTLEY, Mammoth Bear Scenes, Albino Family from Madagascar, Wool Is It Fairy Dwarf, Indian Seal, Living Sloth, Happy Family, the Elite Specialty Dancing Troupe, Double-Voiced Singer, and 500,000 Curiosities.

Admission 25 cts. Children under ten, 15 cents.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, MARCH 2, 1861.

All Communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 19 Dey Street, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	11 weeks	$ 1
One do.	1 year	4
Two do.	1 year	7
Six Copies	1 year	20
Ten do.	1 year	30

Any larger number at the same rate (see address) and an extra Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write in pencil the name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. The notice is rendered necessary from the fact that so many photographs are sent to us that, in the hurry of business, the country workmen send of explanatory matter, they prefer to credit the being on request with receiving that transparency or the one to which it refers. Rather the columns of our paper prove that we are up to the times in almost everything which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not so ubiquitous but that something may occur beyond the circuit of our far-reaching intelligence. To save us time and correspondence, photographs of persons (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

Foreign News.

England.—The Queen opened Parliament in person on the 10th. She was received with the usual demonstrations of loyalty and respect. She alluded to the satisfactory close of the Chinese war, and hoped that the moderation of European governments would prevent the recurrence of hostilities which had so lately broken peace."

The people, however, which most concerns us is the following allusion to our present trouble:

"Serious differences have arisen among the States of the North American Union. It is impossible for me to look without great concern upon any event which can affect the happiness and welfare of a country allied by so many subjects by descent and closely connected with them by the most intimate and friendly relations. My heartfelt wish is that those differences may be brought to a friendly adjustment. The interest which I take in the well-being of the people of the United States requires that I should add that my desire for the reception given by them to the Prince of Wales during his recent visit to the Dominion of America."

Mr. Gun, the novelist, British Poster and Bunbell, the artists, are dead.

France.—The Emperor opened the Session of the Legislature on the 5th of January. He is very happy. He says that his sympathy with an unfortunate benighted little nation that out of Gaeta fire a month, but finding his attempt to be serious, he had withdrawn it.

The London Times, in reviewing the speech, finds no serious evidence that it is concerning. It says the speech "gives no clue to the internal resources of the army and navy; no account of the foreign relations of the country, and no assurance of the cordial understanding which exists between France and Russia, but for the slighting hint of the policy which France is about to pursue. Both a speech composed in this manner and the fact that it is read to the united squadron at Gaeta shows how highly the policy of non-intervention can be thrown away and making of mere sympathies and antipathies; and, to conclude the future, who can feel reassured by being told that France will act on the principles of justice and justice, as it appears, is to be measured by her sympathy assumed, or as if any nation ever went to war proclaiming that it drew the sword in the interest of wrong and injustice?"

The Syrian question is to be settled by a Conference at Paris.

The Patterns and Police Napoleon sees a great deal.

The Princess Clotilde, who is said to maintain the faith of the late King of Prussia, was so offended at some remarks of the Emperor that he refused to attend the Court Ball.

Everything was very active in the army and navy department.

Lady and Children of Gens. still remain. The Court of Victims had received in Count Cavour's force.

Prince Carignan has gone to Nice di Gaeta. The journey is said to be in connection with negotiations for the surrender of Gaeta.

It is stated that in the Armistice the two armies are to remain—we presume for seven or eight days. An official report by General Rose announces that confidence and tranquillity were returning throughout the whole frontier of the Abruzzi.

It is stated to be Count Cavour's intention to propose the following four points to the Italian Parliament: First, a loan of 500,000,000 francs; second, the cession of Nizza; secondly, a declaration confirming the title of King of Italy upon Victor Emanuel and his heirs, the calling out of the national guard, and the general levy of all persons to be granted to the King for an unlimited period.

Sardinia has declared the ex-monarch of Naples a prisoner by the Royal Decree, and had arrested the Bishop of Sabina as hostage.

A telegram from Rome says: "The Pope has solemnly declared to the Prussian Government that Sardinia has no intention of attacking Venetia; he made no allusion to Garibaldi."

The General is reported to have been much dissatisfied with his reception at the Prussian Court.

Garibaldi.—He was currently reported and believed that the famous man had evidently left Caprera with his suite, and was on his way to Dalmatia; but the latest news contradicts this. On the 5th of February he was still among his cottagers and guests at Caprera; but how soon some flight of fancy may take him no one can foresee or conjecture.

Denmark.—The Diet had closed its sittings. The King, in his reply to the President of the Chambers, had said, "I thank you from my heart for my people will defend the province, and I shall defend it."

The usual official Berlingske Tidende observes:

"I should decrease rather more before Holstein without being called upon to do so by our sovereign and company in its wish, a violation of territory would thus take place, and the federal Diet would, in fact, have to declare war against Denmark. War at the present moment would be inconvenient for Germany, considering the complications which threaten it from the East, and would be opposed to the interests of a country, and recognize popular sentiments, without which a small people cannot make war. By a blockade we can now damage the commerce of Germany more than by a declaration of war. The Confederation must therefore now terminate either by war or by opposition."

Japan.—A Gazette of Japan of the 15th of January says news had been received more that the landing of the American Ambassador had been reported in Japan. As we have sent an Ambassador to Japan, and he Mr. Harris has been landed nearly three years, this must be an error.

CONGRESSIONAL MATTERS.

In the Senate on the 18th the Committee on Finance reported in the Tariff Bill extending the time for the payment of duties to three years instead of ninety days, keeping the present valuation. The Confiscation Bill passed by a vote of twenty-five to eighteen. The Conference Committee on the Deficiency Bill reported that they had come to an agreement respecting the amendments. The Chicago amendment has been stricken from the bill. On Monday the Tariff bill was again discussed. An amendment to reduce the duty on boots was agreed to, also a reduction on a duty of four cents per pound on tea and half a cent on coffee, and restoring the duty on sugar, was agreed to by a vote of 25 to 18. Mr. Johnson, the Chairman of the Committee on Finance, reported a bill appropriating $50,000 for the survey of northern water courses and islands in the Pacific Ocean and Behring's Straits, in view of telegraphic communication between this country and Europe. The bill was taken up on the confines of the Russian possessions, thus telegraphically uniting the United States with Europe. The bill was finally passed. Mr. Wade spoke on the State of the Union. The Senate bill regarding the Territory of Colorado was passed. The remainder of the session was occupied in discussing the Tariff bill.

In the Senate, on the 19th, the Tariff Bill was the only theme of discussion. In the House, Mr. Branch, from the Committee on Elections, offered, as the judgment of the House, that the existing treaties of the country should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with a view to conformity with the Constitution. The bill authorizing the President to accept the services of war steamers was then taken up. Mr. Stanton opposed the bill, and Mr. Sherman supported. The bill was strongly opposed by the Democrats, and the discussion was warm and excited. The bill was finally passed by a vote of 90 to 69. A bill which was decided in the negative by a vote of 68 to 105. The Senate resolution repealing the act of last session for the benefit of Dupont was adopted. The Naval Appropriation bill was taken up. The question being on agreeing with the Senate's amendments. The amendment providing for the construction of additional steam vessels was agreed to by a vote of 90 to 69. The existing steam was directed to scheme on the strait.

On the 20th, the Senate passed the Bill authorizing the discontinuance of the mails in States where the postal service is liable to be interfered with, over the routes in such States. The Senate bill for the relief (Dupont) was debated to decide to discontinue the mail service in the settled States, and make no appropriation for the service in the seceding States, except for the postal communication therein. Without taking action on the subject the bill was laid over. The Senate resumed the consideration of the Tariff bill, the amendment reducing the duty on sugar, and placing a duty on tea and coffee, was agreed to. The act to continue in force, &c., was passed by a vote of 25 to 18 and 18 to 25. Several other amendments were adopted, and the bill was passed by a vote of 28 to 14.

In the House, Mr. Brock, of Virginia, occupied the morning hour in an effort to speech in opposition to the bill empowering the President to call out the military forces of the country to enforce the laws in the seceding States. He characterized the Bill as a declaration of war against the seceded States. The Bill was finally passed. The House resumed the consideration of the morning hour resuming for the construction of seven steam sloops-of-war. The previous question was sustained. The bill was passed. The amendments were agreed by a vote of 81 to 58. In the evening session, Mr. Ruffin, of North Carolina, spoke in favor of the Crittenden resolutions. Mr. Branch, of Georgia, spoke of Mr. Buchanan as a driveler, and General Scott as guilty of usurpation.

FOUR CHANGES.—Senator Douglas has introduced a bill to change the qualifications of the body constitute, almost to vacillation. On Saturday the plan of adjustment was the subject of a long and most earnest debate. Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, moved to refer the whole subject to a National Convention in lieu of the committee's plan. Mr. Guthrie opposed the motion, and thought that the Committee of Thirteen should act on the resolution. The difference of opinion respecting the manner of the plan of adjustment of the resolutions was warmly discussed. Mr. Douglas, of Illinois, spoke briefly, but at also as that to be hereafter acquired. Mr. Beverly Johnson, of Maryland, said he should support the motion to refer to the Committee of Thirteen. Interlocutory from the operations of the compromise. The discussion lasted until late in the evening. The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, when several amendments to the Guthrie proposition were made, as well as a substitute for it, and other amendments also were all rejected. The bill is considered in a decisive danger of the Guthrie proposition. The discussion on Monday turned chiefly on the Crittenden resolutions, and was of an unsatisfactory character, as strong anti-compromise speech. He is, indeed, one of the Northern Secretaries.

On the 19th February may be called the day one of this famous Congress—for the whole sitting was spent in discussing whether the members shall go to dinner or not. Some of the members are in favor of a dinner, and declaration and argue and noisiness. Since drilling within Rome was thronging, and without was the sound of the cannon. Some of the members are with a warm and impetuous turn. It must, however, be conceded, that the public has lost all confidence in this assemblage.

THE SOUTHERN CONGRESS AT MONTGOMERY.

JEFFERSON DAVIS, the Provisional President of the Southern Confederacy, arrived in Montgomery on the 18th, and was received with honors. At the capital of Alabama was a complete session. He made twenty-five speeches en route. The tone of all was the same. He said that the Union was dissolved—that—that the South was determined to maintain their position, and make all necessary sacrifices to establish their independence. The Hon. Howell Cobb, in separation from the Union was complete, and that no compromise could or would be attempted. Mr. Davis's inaugural address was delivered on the 18th. It is considers to add that these utter sentiments were loudly cheered by large audiences.

On Monday, the 18th February, the important ceremony of the inauguration was performed. Mr. Davis took the oath of office in the presence of many thousand persons. At one o'clock, President Davis delivered his Inaugural Address. It breathed the same sentiments as the speeches he made on his journey. He declared that the South was convinced that the separation of North and South was a fact but, to wait on and end. "An agricultural people, whose chief interest is the export of a commodity required and actually consumed in other countries, can not truly judge in peace, and the fiercer trials which our accession will present, it is also natural to expect that no one section will feel more than another, although where the occupation of all is the same the reverse may be expected from the interchange of commodities. There can be but little rivalry between us as to which shall best supply the world with cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco. States on the American Union. Many, indeed, therefore, that mutual interest would prove a good and valued check upon the inconsiderate action of States, should steel the judgment or inflame the ambition of these States, we shall prepare to meet the necessary conflict with the consciousness that our cause is right and the confident trust that all the material interests of the country will support us in the maintenance of our position." Actuated by these motives, and guided by these principles, we have entered upon the duty of forming a permanent government. The separation of the Confederate States has been marked by no aggression upon the rights of those remaining under the United States. No arms have been received on check, the cultivation of our lands progresses as heretofore, and over peaceful relations with the world are unbroken. No change has occurred in the products of the staples which have constituted our exports, unless the enhanced demand for cotton, caused by the short crop in other countries, may have given additional inducements to planters to increase their crops. Our commercial relations with other States will remain undisturbed by the transmission to foreign markets, a certain portion of which would be delivered at its destination by vessels of the United States. Treating as a subject of mere curiosity the opposition created by separation in the Northern States, we call upon them to recognize the fact which they can not change, and to act as becomes a people situated as we are. We have intentionally forborne to enumerate the causes which have led to the present revolution. Nor is it necessary. The extent of our grievances is known to the world. Our remedy is in our own hands, and we are determined to apply it. Actuated by no hostile feeling, but anxious only to secure the full benefits of self-government, we have entered upon the untried path of experiment with a firm reliance upon the protection of Divine Providence, and with the hope that the common Father of mankind will so direct the councils of our people as to secure the happiness of our posterity."

Unpaid Thought.

WHEN a man endorses in letters or in politics obtrudes himself à la Lamartine on the public as a recipient of a heavy tribute, the world generally thinks that such a person ought to be paid for the good he has done, we are very properly disgusted. And we regret such an instance the more because it brushes the charity which would otherwise have been spontaneously given to many other deserving objects. The world, seeing a rich man begging to be made richer, exhibits against the aversive, folly and unthrift of genius, and the upshot is that one weak brother seriously injures a score of the more deserving.

If we look at plain facts and common sense we shall, however, find that there is a great deal more unpaid labor in the world than is generally supposed. Many a man of genius, a writer, a teacher, an art-critic, a journalist, a man urging improvements in agriculture or education, or a poet, who has not a very great influence on the world's affairs, is all the while unconsciously a benefactor and inquiry long directed to this subject in saying that the action on the world by men of this stamp is not merely enormous—it is fairly incalculable. It would be almost as unjust to the world as it was that strange plants sprung up in strange places—how germs developed themselves in soil whence all visible seed had been excluded—as it would be unjust at the same time to say that we went to be entertained with much philosophising on the spontaneous growth of genius. The microscope and statistics of general information have done away with much of this marvel. Thought, like love, is all penetrating.

> "Love the mountain
> And under the waves,
> Over the burning sands
> And in the desert caves."

Over and under all fly the white-winged soul-butterflies of printed sheets, awaking, like Psyche, life and light wherever they go.

Yet the world, almost to an individual, exacts of its leaders, its teachers, of the men who conduct its fields and opinions and tastes, that they shall do all this in a great measure at their own expense, and for the mere mercy, while the great mercenaries of an old age of destitution. Is not this the case with a great majority of those men of genius to whom the world has acknowledged its deepest obligations? What immortal benefactor of mankind can say man try than to leave the beaten track of industry and of money-making for the extremely dangerous career of exploring the fields of unexplored thought? A career of sacrifices, of expending art, of doing good? Possibly his books may sell; he may (if he will sacrifice the main question so as to be "entertaining") become popular; but the money of one American book who has made the author an unplying reputation, which has been translated into half the languages of Europe and called forth the encomiastic praise of a hundred leaders of reviews, yet from the sales of which the author never received more than a hundred dollars. According to the calculation of the world of which he is unfortunately benefited by this book, its author made a very poor investment of his years of study. And the more shame to the world for thinking so.

In England the obligations of the world to genius are occasionally admitted and honorably acted on. Mr. Cobden, who has devoted so much time and talent to the industrial and commercial interests of his countrymen, has been, and is, the recipient of substantial tributes from those whom he has obliged. With the harassing pressure of poverty removed, genius draws forth its richest fruits for the benefit of mankind. When we look around and see how limited is the number of such thinkers we are amazed at public ingratitude. Among our thirty-one millions of people more than two thousand years ago of the stamp to which we refer, and among these there are not in all probability two hundred who enjoy full facility for self-development, and for the exercise of their powers for the benefit of mankind. Take away the men of genius from a country and it becomes a wretched, characterless mass. Its citizens when viewed are not individually held to be of much account—they sink into mere nobodies. What is a German if you take from him competition with Lessing, Goethe, Schiller, and their like? What is no one so proud of as of our great men—and what costs us so little as this our greatest source of pride! Of all the accessories of life, that which is the most essential to man, there is not one more essential to a nation than its Men of Thought—yet for these men, for their support, you who read do not in all probability, either directly or indirectly, pay one single cent per annum!

EDITORIAL CLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS.

The World publishes a curious paper between two well-known citizens of Dublin. If Mr. Lincoln were elected, one of the parties was to use half a pint of vitriol into the American flour, and present it to the opponent. If Mr. Lincoln were not elected, the vitriol was to be given to the writer and present the word in the other of a Buffalo newspaper. The choice of the recipients of the vitriol is somewhat curious—the one is a Democrat—the like the vitriol-man regrets? Are they all Black Republicans? or Democrats?

announced, when Mr. Banks was elected Speaker, that a concord person had been chosen for that high distinction.

Alexander Hamilton Stephens, the Vice-President of the Confederate States of America, is thus described by a Montgomery correspondent of the Charleston Courier:

"The personnel of Mr. Stephens is very striking. He has the appearance of having undergone great bodily anguish, and his attenuated age and gray hairs contribute to give to his face a restless, nervous movement. His clear, piercing and figure remarkably slim. His forehead is much wrinkled, and his hair flow over the shoulders, which stoop very much. A habit of wearing the left forward to the left gives to his whole conduct an appearance at once remarkable and prepossessing."

We quote the above with the double purpose of giving a personal portrait of a famous man, and of showing in what spirit our Southern contemporaries are prepossessing to course. We are afraid the fair bribe of Carolina would not endorse his opinion.

Spinola, of Albany, is a way. During the debate in the State Legislature on Monday, as to the manner in which Mr. Lincoln should be received, he put pronunciation of the great question in the following manner:

"Whereas, There is an irrepressible conflict existing between members of the Republican party, as to the reception to be accorded Mr. Lincoln therefore,

Resolved, That we request Mr. Lincoln to switch off at Troy, and go straight to New York, and that the Governor be requested to telegraph to Mr. Lincoln to reject the request of the Senate."

The resolution died a-borning, but Spinola kept a steady face, and continued as follows:

"Mr. Chairman—His proposition is an eminently proper one. What is the use of bringing Mr. Lincoln down the monotonous aqueduct on a party row by-ing about the section which should have charge of him? A nice kind enough to see him over [laughter], for two members of a committee to be appointed to hang on to each other up. (Loud laughter.)

"Several members—Question! question!

"Spinola—I think you had better pass it. It is a very sensible proposition. (Laughter.) But if you don't want to see Mr. Lincoln, I'll withdraw it."

As the people of Albany did want to see the Coming Man of the White House, he did withdraw it!

We copy the following from the news by the Jura:

"The news from India is unimportant. Delhi has succumbed to the north-west provinces."

This is a true to show what the journalistic sensitive long street. A quarrel between Palmerston and Napoleon would have been considered important, but the surrender of millions is not a consolidated item.

Our Readers will observe that we announce a few of our wealthiest merchants visited Washington, for the purpose of saving the Union. Did these patriotic millionaires display their newly invented plans? If not, we suggest to them the following resolutions they described for New York:

"Under these circumstances we feel constrained to only suggest that all posts hit must be used to reinstate the charm of men at the North, who are soon to have an unpleasant time of it. We feel that we are not to be overcome with the insolent or frowning; of men who encourage resistance to every reasonable concession that could be offered, and to every act of justice.

"Many Representatives in Congress, patriotic and good men, need but to have the public sentiment of their States and of the country at their backs, in order to acquire strength other elsewhere, they took to the papers published North, and to the people, the necessity of prompt and decisive action, and the duty of your councils should recommend that it be carried through there equal otherwise established."

The telegraph is to-day that the merchants' meeting is good for this paper's cleaned Press of New York.

A Conscription movement given is pressing itself publishes for following list of legendary history:

"To the Editors of the ——" In Rev. Bridge Cosby, Wm., Feb. 15, 1861.

* * * I rules what for a living, and were hard to quite it, and have to live upon the income. I have [illegible] for the last twenty years, and have ground for £25; costs per bushel, to get a little money to send you for the ——."

The place it is dated from suggests whether it may not be a coding. At all events, the dead man is not turned loose upon society for the present. It is the most remarkable, and we suggest that the editors return the money forthwith. Ben Johnson himself could not have done it better, and what is that in saying one's lost for a newspaper? The man must have been cursed.

OUR WEEKLY SCOOP.

We did not at the Academy of Music.

We did not go to the Academy of Music on Monday, we went there to hear the charming music of "Un Ballo in Maschera," and as we were there first we selected that one particular seat which we like the most, and we tender him our thanks for the distinguished compliment. There was a very brilliant assemblage present, and a most unusual display of fashion and beauty. The house was also most considerable to the magnificent features of metropolitan society. There was but little appreciative applause during the performance, but a great deal to the right and to the left, so though undecided in which quarter the expected apportion would appear. But the Introduction passed over, and no sign of it, so we gave the audience credit for a desire to hear the music. Reigned song most charmingly, and Miss Hinkley verified her Ariadne like a bird. We were afraid of applause in the first act duet, bass and bare aroused us, and turning to the left, we beheld one thousand double-barrelled opera glasses directed at a box in the corner to the right. We followed the stream of glasses, and saw the largest amount of President the country has yet offered. We do not speak under oath, nor even in positive certainty, but we think that he was seven feet of President—at least calculating from the knees upwards. He never entered the house hiding in front of the box, and we only wish wished across our mind, that when he sat down he would put his feet on the cushioned front, that our calculations might be more accurate, and that we might so that of the length of our new President. There was much of him that we thought, if we ought only divide him up in sections, and so we did, and we saw his shoulders, and the correspondence being perfect between the two halves of our unannounced friend, that the north and the summary would cause, and the Union would ultimately be made whole.

The remainder of the music in the first act went for nothing. The audience was all the time looking at the President, and unanimity shortened, and for the time functionless. We all glared at Lincoln, we mentally observed that he was tall, and we thought that he had not yet seem to be in the least degree disturbed by the double-barrelled operation struck. He examined the house, and we are rather inclined to think that he did some good looking at the ceiling, but subject to his friends. He seemed to take a profound interest in his growing beard, he fondled it, he played with it, he looked over to the other side of his face as though he longed to stretch it out to regulation length. We are satisfied that he was not in the least degree annoyed by personal appearance. Well, perhaps it does, but that's a matter of opinion. Well, the curtain dropped upon the first act, and as yet there had been no unconstitutional demonstration of applause and a whirlwind of cries of "Lincoln! Lincoln!" And on the cries and applause, the President communed to himself himself, and on feet after feet unfolded itself before the public gaze more reclaiming his former self-possession. He looked on his acknowledgments and bowed them again. Calm and self-possessed he gave one the idea of power, stern, rugged and uncompromising, but still there was the smile entwined with the features, benevolent and kindly, giving the assurance that justice would be tempered with mercy, and that strict principle would be softened with love. He looked down which springs from a knowledge of the human heart and a sympathy with human weakness.

Before he recovered his erect position—he did not measure the time—the curtain rose, discovering all the artists and chorus of the Academy, and the band struck up the "Star Spangled Banner." What a shout of welcome went up to the roof as the well-known air was recognized by the people! The whole audience rose to their feet, up rose the President, from whom the top of the proscenium slowly descended the glorious flag of the Union, with its Stars and Stripes, and the voices grew hoarse with shouting, and the hands and waved while rapidly, and waved and waved handkerchiefs, and the faces of the people flushed and tears were in many eyes; and Americans felt that night the enthusiasm of loyalty—loyalty to their country—loyalty to their brotherhood, and loyalty to that glorious flag that has covered millions of freemen and has ever waved in the van of civilization and progress.

It was a scene such as we have never seen save in the Old Country. We Americans have too often sneered at that word "loyalty" but to the people of the Old Country it comprises love of the soil, love of kindred and home ties, pride in the deeds of their sons, pride in the memories of their dead, in the records of triumphs—a war and peace, and in all that comprises the nationality of a great people. This is loyalty, and this people greet the sovereign by her honor, the shunt is for the country they love, its honor, its glory, therefore the cheer, the shout, which is a cry—part of the whole. Our troubles now make us comprehend the meaning of loyalty—learn to be fond of our country—its institutions, its home, its homesteads; loyalty is its great Present, and loyalty and brotherhood is the great lesson which Academy of Music is before us. The chorus which rent the air in the Academy that night as the President elect rose up was the truthful response of the heart of the people, loyal to the traditions, the virtues and the glories of their common country, and to each loyal heart.

Our the land of the free and the home of the brave.

When the curtain fell three cheers were given for Lincoln, three for the Constitution, and three lend-mouthed, roaring cheers for the Union.

The Queen's Speech.

It is seldom that a Royal speech is made for from grim official precedent as to indulge in anything of a personal nature; but the speech of Queen Victoria on the opening of Parliament on its opening on the 5th of February contains an exception so gratifying to the brotherhood of literature that we feel it a duty to allude to it. It comes also at a time when such an exhibition of true Queenly enlightened is peculiarly appropriate. The Queen's sons have been quoted the passage worthless, and we need not, therefore, repeat it here. Suffice it to say that it is a noble tribute to the memory of the lengthened breadth of our Republic with unmixed satisfaction, and it shows the spirit of true chivalry which is ever ready to forgive to that genuine homely sentiment which a noble woman would feel on hearing of the death of a brother, even though he had died in arms of a hero carefully welcomed and affectionately entertained. It may truly be told that the Queen's sympathies are as wide as well as the Sovereign. That her kindly sentiments may be emulated by our American writers is not to be wondered at. Many of the best writers of those whose blood cemented the glorious fabric of our Union.

It is also pleasant to observe that the Queen's declaration of her Parliament, for in both Houses there was an unanimous sentiment of sympathy and admiration for the noble sentiment.

Lord Granville, one of the Cabinet Ministers, said that although many foreign powers had shown the greatest kindness and hospitality of their guest rival, he had not heard so narrow-minded but still generous sentiment as that of the Queen. The Duke of Argyle, one of the Queen and her Parliament, who lowered above worldly considerations, and who, in the midst of his own grief, felt the greatest unhappy position of our national affairs.

It is not to be wondered at that the best upon the hot-headed pill fellows, who, in their blind pursuit of vengeance, would destroy the great beacon of Liberty—the Union.

A New Sensation—If we could only have it.

Do any of you know Bronco Wollenkopf? You or no? The novelty says No. Well, then, you don't know a great deal. Wollenkopf is a good while ago—away back in the fifties—there was a young lad who was growing up in Germany. He was a boy, but he was a boy, but he had the quiet, earnest ways of a man. Reserved and thinking, Wollenkopf was a boy of artistic feeling. He studied hard, and we were satisfied, even at that time, that he only needed the opening fortune to make a name for himself in the world of music. He desired in his profession. There was one who viewed the matter in that to be an Old Man, and he was a man of great interest in the welfare of this young hero—so he sent him to Bronco Wollenkopf. Bronco has been a great man in his day and generation. He was a man was quite poor, but he was as able and a prosperous teacher, and he determined to give his young pupil the advantage of a European art education, so he sent him to Germany. Young Bronco has been at the head of the Philharmonic Society for many years and a people, whatever their social position, full of art feeling and the recognition of the beautiful. Wollenkopf, after four years' good by, and still young Bronco studied, every day developing his extraordinary musical genius, and he was the pride of his distinguished. He became known as one of the rising men, and his reputation spread in every direction. He was a favorite with the great masters, became familiar with their schools, but imitated none of them. He was a thinker, and he was a philosophical musician. In order to master all their difficulties and become a perfect interpreter of their works, he had to be a composer, and with his talents he genius accommodated he commenced his artistic career.

His success was great. He was applauded on several occasions, was very decided, and he was justly ranked by the most learned critics as one of the most promising young men among the great masters of the violin. A little later he went to Paris, and was received with the highest honors by the musical and literary people for his intelligent reading and his brilliant rendering of the classic compositions. He gave a concert in the Tuileries, but once publicly in Paris, when he was summoned back to America by the sickness of his father. Bronco Wollenkopf, Sr., died before his son reached. On his arrival in New York he contented himself for some time with hard practice and composition, and it was not long before from his shell by no offer from the management of the Academy of Music to accompany a distinguished artist on a tour through the North and South. His performances in every place elicited the utmost enthusiasm of the audience, and the press, one and all, spoke in the most appreciative frequently demanded. He rather more than shared the success with the distinguished artist, Madame Anna Bishop, the feeling revolted against this predatory existence, and he returned to New York, where he remained for a time, but he found by the many brilliant offers tendered to him by concert-tour speculators. Once he joined the Ullman Opera Company, and his performance he produced was profound. No violinist, since Paganini, ever appeared in a more remarkable manner. Then he was compelled to resign his place in the front rank among living violinists. We would hint from the above that Bronco Wollenkopf is coming to Gotham.

Bronco Wollenkopf is a slender youth of ordinary height, with a frank intelligent face, and an expression tinged by dreamy thought, but flashing with enthusiasm. He is a perfect master of his art, his whole frame seems nervously strung, and he feels so intensely the spirit of the composer that he seems to be in mystical organization with every nerve—the electric forces are so rapidly expended, that a single performance would exhaust ordinary men. He is a true artist, he has in him all the elements of a great artist. He has creative genius, a wonderful memory, a sympathetic temperament, and with all a steady, unfaltering perseverance, which ever urges him on to the accomplishment of his purpose. He is a musician, not a repertoire of all the violin compositions, and his own repertoire is not from the works of other composers, but from his own excited fancy. So wonderful is his memory that he can play by rote ever a single composition he has ever heard. He is a true artist, with taste and poetic sentiment, and an animated number of musical ideas, and he has the power of expressing them. He has a great sympathetic; his execution clear, brilliant, and he has the power of producing a tone which enables him to execute the most startling and difficult without effort. He has a great deal of originality, and brilliancy and characteristic; his conceptions smack of the age and artistically tender, and he adopts grand, sustained and powerful compositions.

We have reason to believe that a concert tour brings to bear upon the art which he has chosen. The combination is unusual, and appreciation of the highest order. Wollenkopf is unassuming, modest, and quietly alone in his own room, and he has the power of producing a tone which enables him to execute the most startling and difficult without effort. He has a great deal of originality, and brilliancy and characteristic; his conceptions smack of the age and artistically tender, and he adopts grand, sustained and powerful compositions.

We have received from a new contributor the following kindly, pleasant and clever poetic opsin upon the action of a music taste, its geniality and good feeling will make it welcome to all classes of readers:

Miss Carry—Our pure little Sister that's out in the Cold.

In the dewy heart of mankind with sympathy quivers
What tales of mysterious ideal are told,
When pity exists the pure human that labors,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

She is pretty and genial, and sings home what she's wanting,
Not loving in excuses—indeed she is bold—
She has a nice name pointed for starting or raising,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

The sun is the sun, and the moon is the moon,
Shine on the sunbeam, though of distant mould,
All the sky over heaven is the same and forever,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

How sad must the heart be that's without her
We sought her in Government, in play, and in wold,
As fair and as lovely as ever in fact,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

Shall wisdom and learning, and art of the science
Be cast down for ever with the lovely cold,
And can't we find room for our sister in heaven,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

No charges referring for her as reply to,
No charges referring for her as reply to,
And can't we find room for our sister in heaven,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

The worst of truth is, that George and Mary
Have left their sister to wander, and not to hold,
And why Miss Lee has more followers her story,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

Sure kindness becomes us, the big whirlwind brother,
Must bring our sister with him to our fold,
For we would be hard with the child of our mother,
Our poor little sister that's out in the cold.

ELIZ PRESLAR

Something New to Play.

We have something very charming in the way of pianoforte music to recommend to our readers this week. Pleasant music there are none but new compositions by William Mason, who stands at the head of the musical profession in this country. He is, in truth, the only American, if we except Gottschalk, whose works take rank with the best of the modern European writers. Mason, indeed, has studied his art assiduously in Germany, and being possessed of a fine musical organization, has thoroughly imbued himself with its esthetics, drawing from the purest springs those draughts of inspiration which make him a true musician, and accompanies when wooed with earnestness of a matured mind. Mason went abroad a boy, and he has returned to us a man, and an artist in fact.

His latest compositions are Dame Heroine. The first is called La Source, and is a piece of the first breath of spring morning, as joyous as the carol of the up-springing lark, and as picturesque as a mountain brook. It is full of sweet melody, and charming god-drops through rocky recesses. The most subject is sculptured throughout in the most delicate manner. The subject which gives an aerial lightness to the whole. The second subject is similar in its construction to the first, and is full of sweet and tender melody. It appears in the episode and in the coda. The coda is made the basis of a most delicate combination of the two subjects. The whole is beautiful, delicate and sustained, and brings the consideration of the most musicians. It does not possess startling effects, but is a delicate touch and an educated taste to render it justly.

The second piece is La Belle, it is tender, flowing and sentimental melody, richly harmonized and cleverly sustained. It is a twilight reminiscence of a happy past and a hopeful future. It is charming—it thought too light for serious, yet brought with gentle sadness. It is a love song without words, and is full of love. The piece requires a scholarly and loving interpretation. These Reverie pieces are dedicated by the author to Mrs. Frank S. Jay, and are cordially commend them to the attention of all lovers of good music.

FRYE & POND have also published the Circobelle Schottisch of Gottschalk, which is full of life, fire and spirit, and is a most melodious schottisch, brilliant and not difficult, and popular in its character, which will become widespread. Its arrangement is in perfect keeping, and are so well contrasted that the performer is not wearied by it. The Circobelle Schottisch is dedicated to Mademoiselle Celine de Jolon, son amore, and there are few who write more gracefully and sympathetically. The Circobelle Schottisch will certainly become very popular.

A Flowery Compliment to President-Lincoln.

There is some sense in the following epistle. As the telegraph wire was passing the St. Nicholas Hotel a young man forces his way through the crowd, and presenting a bouquet to Mr. Lincoln, expressed to him a magnificent bouquet. It was very large, and was composed of the most beautiful flowers. In the centre was a red star, within the points of which were letters forming the word "Union." It was graciously accepted by the President. This beautiful floral offering was the gift of Messrs. GRAVELLA & BROWN, 659 Broadway, who have constantly on hand the most exquisite bouquets at the Prince of Wales's ball. They are true artists in their business.

The Bond Street Homeopathic Dispensary.

We have received the Sixth Annual Report of the Bond Street Homeopathic Dispensary, and it is, in every respect, encouraging and gratifying. Over three thousand cases were treated gratuitously, and the diseases to which the patients were dressed and the character also and indomitable institution is supported entirely by voluntary contributions, and is under the management of a board of trustees and manager of the dispensary, Dr. Geo. Fullgraff, who is also physician in charge, and to whose skill and attention the success of the institution, where the poor can go for advice and medicine, is largely due. The report also contains a very able and eloquent tea highly of the benefits of homeopathy, and of the success which attends its practice, and we be pre to see a more liberal response to the claims which this noble charity has upon the community. Only by such liberality will enables them to indulge in the luxury of doing good.

The report also contains a valuable paper by Dr. Gallup of the dispensary a new instrument, called "Laryngoscope" the first one, we believe, made in this country. Its introduction is a great invention, and of great importance in diseases of the throat, through which it enables the physician to examine the throat, and to judge the nature and extent of the disease, hence giving him greater facilities in the treatment of diseases of the throat and lungs.

Many eminent physicians assist Dr. Fullgraff in the duties of the Bond Street Dispensary.

English Opera at Niblo's Garden.

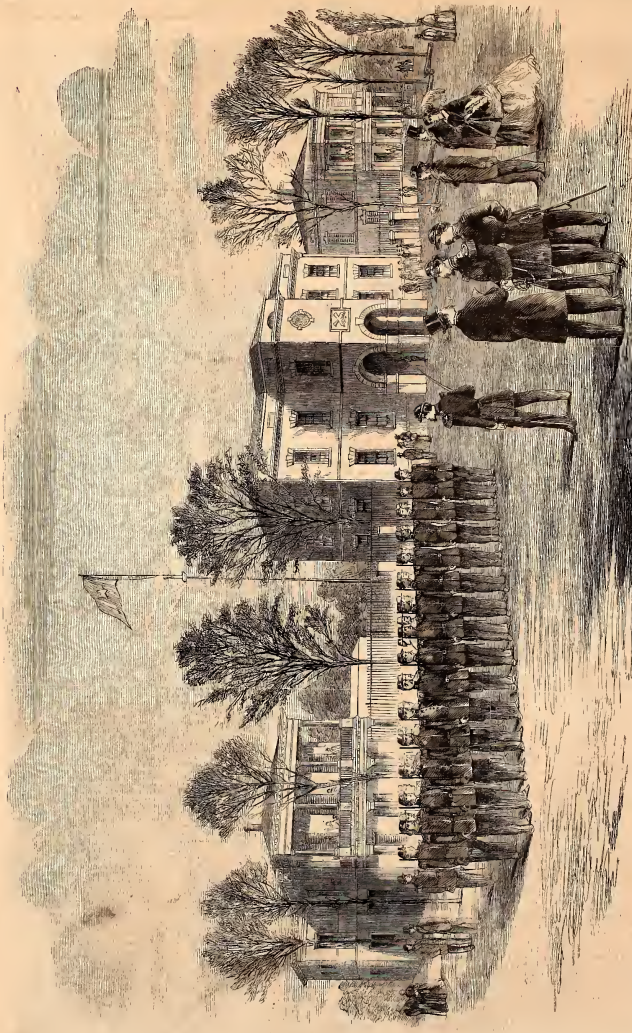
The "Bohemian Girl" was produced by Madame Anna Bishop's company on Monday night, and was received with favor. It was a wonderful improvement upon the previous opera. The choruses were sung with spirit and with excellent, and the scenery upon the stage with great care.

Madame Bishop performed the part of Arline for the first time, and exhibited a decided success. She looked and dressed the character admirably, and sang and acted the music better as we ever heard it sung before. Her "Burble Bistic" was a delicious piece of vocalization, and was one of the best performances of the song the entire role most admirably, and gave a life and a charm to the character that we have never before seen. Madame Bishop is a thinker knowledge. It must be classed among her most successful representations.

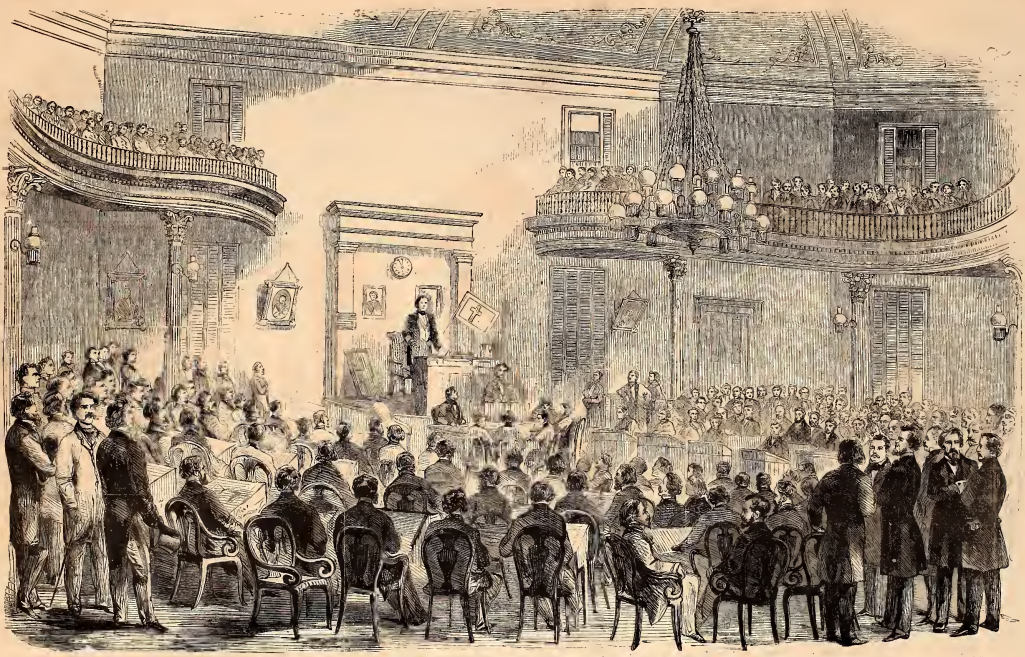
The Gipsy Queen found a most able representative in Miss Peine, and sang the music with great spirit and effect.

Mr. Miranda made a pronounced success, being encored in both ballads. "Then You'll Remember Me," and "The Pale Lord of Poland." Mr. Brookhaire Bowler was a most acceptable Florestan, and Mr. Aynsley Cook was the best Devilshoof we have seen since Seguin's time. He made it a marked character; too exaggerated perhaps, singing the music most effectively, and acting the action of the scenes with rare tact. The production of the "Bohemian Girl" was a decided success, and warranted the expectation every performing night last week.

The opera will be repeated, and will be the "Somnambulist," in which Madame Bishop will appear. We understand that "Don Giovanni" and "Fra Diavolo" will be produced, Madame Anna Bishop appearing in the former as Zerlina, and in the latter as Zerlina, and Mr. Aynsley Cook appearing as Zerlina. That cast will assuredly attract great attendance.



THE ARSENAL, AT AUGUSTA, GEORGIA—REVIEW OF THE CLINCH RIFLES, BY CAPT. C. A. PLANT, ON THE PARADE GROUND IN FRONT OF THE ARSENAL.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST IN AUGUSTA.—SEE PAGE 227.



THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY—SENATE CHAMBER IN THE CAPITOL AT MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, DURING OPEN SESSION—THE HON. HOWELL COBB PRESIDING.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 227

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Bonbe in the Grave," &c., &c., &c.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

To guilt consummate to be safe—Fearing.

Where should this mischief lie?—in worthless air?
It muteth no more, and yet it waits upon
Some god of ill, which—which?—Revenge.

As the very moment that the Marquis of Chillingham, surprised out of his usual frigidity, would have seized the hands of Edmund, the falling figure of Violet interposed, and he had no step took as before he had advanced.

Although betrayed into a momentary excitement, it was but momentary. The very following instant he beckoned with his finger to Edmund, and, over aside a long, superintendent dressing-table, which seemed to conceal a window, but in reality masked a door, and Edmund, leaving the senseless form of Violet, accompanied by the baronet and Erle, disappeared behind it.

The whole incident was so rapidly enacted that the two principal characters ranged in it were gone ere those who were the most quickly alive to it could comprehend it. Violet drew breath.

Quick, hurried, mental shapes of shock took form to long, painful folds, still and noiseless as before, lord Kingswood, Edmund, Erle, nor was the inspiration of his breath less deep than that of Lord Kingswood. Her attention had been wholly absorbed by the unlooked-for appearance of Erle; and it remained so until, like the shadow of a dark cloud, the figure of the baronet had vanished, interposed and hid it from sight.

But the face remained, the pale, clear, bright, haughty face—the disgraceful face, the face of two opposite natures, a God and a man—like mere vividly resembling that of her husband than did her own sister's.

Prazieve's fearful suggestion struck her to the heart like a poisoned arrow at the moment.

Oh, it was a sharp agony she suffered as she remembered his words even as if they were being spoken in her own ear. She involuntarily pressed her hands over her aching eyes, reading tears were streaming from them; but even in the bitter pangs she remembered her position in society, and made a desperate exertion of self control to conceal her emotions from the eyes of those of them who would not have behold it without making it the subject of an extensive comment. The sense of her position, however, almost thronged as they were by thoughtless, worldly, reckless and cold votaries of fashion, was the means of finding the way to a wild ebullition of overwrought feelings, and she made a choking effort to appear calm and passionless.

She removed her burning fingers from her fevered lids, and the glare of the lights blinded her—the loud clamor of the instruments, still performing a wild and joyous air, deafened and distracted her. Like those again a horrible, ghastly sensation of fear, but like the no longer visible. He and those who accompanied him had disappeared.

She had, however, seen only him. It was upon his face and form she had looked for weeks, and she could not mistake him for a spectator, he appeared abruptly before her, she noticed not what same side by which he left it.

Edmund she would not have recognized; Violet she did not know. It would have been impossible for her to have seen him struck with the unearthly beauty of Violet's face, with the delicate and rather symmetry of his head, with the graceful proportions of his form, which, exceptionable in taste, rendered her so much more like a fair, pure, immaterial spirit than a human creature, and she was doubtless, as all present were, have been startled by her singular aspect, but that she was wholly absorbed in Erle.

Erle alone attracted all her sense of vision, all her mental faculties. No matter that his face was pale, her eyes thus she beheld—thought of no one else—saw her husband.

To him centred how.

Him, Lord Kingswood, a Minister of the Imperial Government. Him, the husband of her own sister, the husband of a pale, fair, and powerful yet ringing in his ears. Him, the proud representative of a long line of aristocracy, the haughty, the unbending, the high-born scorning, slandering by her side as a beaten hound.

Before she could carry her attention from him, a figure was laid lightly upon her arm, and she observed the calm, set face of the Marquis of Chillingham close to her own, and the cold, clear blue eyes fixed upon her own.

"Lady Kingswood, will you permit me the honor to escort you to a seat I have ordered to be reserved for you?" he said, in calm, even tones. "I perceive your ladyship is not yet recovered from her debut here to-night, and I much wish to have your ladyship's opinion of my house."

Lady Kingswood, half suffocated, unable to utter a word, bowed her assent, and, with a composure of manner that she could not have smiled up into the marquis's face with an expression which made Lord Kingswood, who beheld it, positively shudder.

Lady Kingswood heard it. She beheld the inexpressible agony which brought the perspiration in large drops upon her husband's brow, the deathly hue upon his face, and for eyes glittered in revengeful triumph.

With lips quivering under the indescribable tortures he suffered, lord Kingswood turned to Violet, and, with a look of mingled despair but to Lady Kingswood, but Cyril had quitted his side, and was in the direction in which the Marquis of Chillingham had conducted Lady Kingswood.

As he moved off, a hand touched his. He turned as though a scorpion had stung him, but he found it was only a page who had expected to behold frowning malignantly upon him, only that of the Harris Stanhope.

His daughter's beautiful child rested upon his arm, but her eyes were bestowed upon him in the full glow of anxious observation that he had left her.

He knew a word to say to you, Kingswood; will lend me your ear for a moment?" he exclaimed to Mr Harris, hurriedly, addressing his lordship. Then, turning to his daughter, he said, "Violet, my child, Caution will excuse you for attending to things into the unbending air of Lady Maud, he beckoned to the page.

Caution approached with Lady Maud upon his arm.

"Take charge of Beatrice for a few minutes, Caution," he said, in a hasty, quick tone. "I have some little matters to speak to Lord Kingswood privately upon."

Beatrice was conducted by the page to a seat, and Lord Kingswood led into a corner, where he was not likely to be overheard, as a conversation had elapsed.

"The boy—the boy," murmured Sir Harris Stanhope in his ear. "You are safe as yet."

A thousand recollections flashed through the brain of Lord Kingswood.

It was his turn now to clutch the wrist of Sir Harris Stanhope.

"The boy!" he gasped, hoarse with emotion. "Is he dead?"

"Hush, my friend, for an avenging spirit," returned Lord Kingswood, in low, solemn tones, which made the blood of the listener run cold. "An avenging spirit, Stanhope, which will close down upon you in your death hour as terribly and as pitilessly as upon me in mine."

"Sir, Kingswood," returned Stanhope, with lowly accents, "I never something to answer for, but not—"

"Peace," interposed Lord Kingswood, sharply; "this is neither time nor place to discuss the matter. It is enough that the curtain has given up the dead; that I have been fooled, tricked, cheated, betrayed by you from whom I've most reason—and you know it—of all the rest. But this I will settle with you at another time—"

"You wrong me, Kingswood," returned Stanhope, with an air of wounded pride. "I asserted much for you, Heaven knows—"

"We will leave the name of Heaven out, if you please," again interrupted Lord Kingswood, with bitterness.

"Was a mock affair, you know," whispered Sir Harris, quickly. "Can be proven this" said Lord Kingswood, sarcastically.

"I can," answered Sir Harris.

"Enough," ejaculated Lord Kingswood. "Do this, and you remove a mountain from my breast."

"I have already done it, Kingswood, as you know," continued Sir Harris Stanhope. "Years since—"

"But I you must do it now, Stanhope," interrupted Lord Kingswood. "You remember Horace Vernon?"

"Ye-s—now," answered Harris Stanhope, thoughtfully. "He has not been heard of for years."

He paused again, and for some moments. exclaimed Lord Kingswood between his teeth. "It was he who caught that young creature, Violet, in a snare, and brought up the sides of that boy who is born to be my curse."

The breath of Sir Harris Stanhope came thick and short.

"Horace Vernon living and here!" he ejaculated.

"Living, and here, on this stage," returned Lord Kingswood, with slow emphasis. "It is he who has suddenly produced the boy, who, like Nemesis, has risen from the grave to haunt me, to torment, and his dire intentions defeated. He is no less your bitter enemy than mine, Stanhope, and I hope he can judge well of you he can utterly destroy. He has wealth and power, and he can use it to crush you as he can me, and I believe we are both of us well as skilful—ruin my happiness."

The face of Harris Stanhope changed to many hues. He revolved in his mind which would be most conducive to his interest, to betray, or to defend Horace Vernon.

"I have long regretted that mad, youthful folly," he involuntarily exclaimed.

"Your repentance comes late," observed Lord Kingswood, drily. "If you had done this last year, or the year before, or even a month, or, remember, Stanhope—you will most bitterly repent your weak and unmanly conduct."

"Your lordship does not, surely, doubt me?" returned Sir Harris, in a hurried tone.

"I confess, after Vernon's stern assevention to me concerning the part you have played in this conspiracy, I do not," was the reply. "Your suggestion—I look much of the faith in you that I once possessed," replied Lord Kingswood.

"You have seen Vernon, then?" said Sir Harris, growing his fingers.

"I have," spoke with brief, terrible force Kingswood. "He appeared to me to be the Destinies last chastener. I is now awakening from a dream fully aroused, all who have wronged him or sided in wrong him will be made to suffer, and you, Stanhope, are not likely to escape."

Sir Harris Stanhope uttered an exclamation of uneasiness.

"Your lordship must excuse me, but I cannot, at present permit it, and no more," continued Lord Kingswood, in a almost inaudible tone, "Vernon has left me. He has gone to work his will. Remember well each important and petty circumstance, gather together all documents which relate to the boy, and be ready and stand firmly and bravely to your post. You cannot recall what has been done. Vernon is not to be appeased by gold, as I have suggested, or you are lost."

"Lost!" echoed Stanhope, with an expression of distrust on his face.

"No more here," interposed Lord Kingswood, almost petulantly. "If you must see me again, call at my house, and request an appointment, and I will attend to it. Closeted in my library, we can determine on some course of action. Vernon has left me, and on the matter, for Vernon is already acting, ay, and he will act too with remorseless energy, and he is a powerful enemy."

"You said Vernon was here, where is he?" inquired Sir Harris, with a manner of deep and anxious interest.

"That is a point, Stanhope, which has seriously disturbed me," answered Lord Kingswood, "but I have reason to believe that he personally acquainted with him. It seems to me that they have been in close conference for some time, and yet I am strongly inclined that I, who was Vernon's first, I thought almost his only friend, should be informed of it. Why, I cannot imagine, unless he has written to me?"

"Which is uncanny, my lord; your official position and my diplomatic office will afford a solution to the inquisitive gaze with which we are favored by the public. Vernon has, doubtless, written to you, but will be wise to separate now. Your lordship will hear from me in the morning."

"Enough," ejaculated Lord Kingswood; "for the present, farewell."

"Farewell, my lord," returned Sir Harris, and waving his hand, he turned from Lord Kingswood, and left him alone.

Beatrice Stanhope, who had been left by her father with Caution and the page, had been watching the scene which had taken place. Maud appeared to be in mood for conversation, and Caution relied on the page to entertain her, and he was not disappointed in the attention, scarcely a reply. Beatrice contented herself with keeping her eyes fixed upon the group which had attracted her attention, and concealed the envy to a private chamber, but it kept hidden from her use the tumultuous emotions of her heart.

It was something of a relief to her when her father came up and said,

"Arlice, love, there is to be some singing; you would, I know, like to hear it. Caution will take you into the room where the piano wood has already been escorted to seat by the Marquis of Chillingham."

"Oh, with pleasure, I am sure," exclaimed Caution, quickly. "Lady Maud is desirous of hearing Beatrice sing, and so am I myself, and your gracioussenself will extend to me the honor of escorting your ladyship to the apartment where the piano is?"

Lady Maud's eyebrows slightly contracted, and she hesitated. Beatrice looked at her father, and then at Caution, with her father's suggestion.

"Lady Maud, you will not be so cruel as to decline," chimed in Sir Harris. "I promise you you shall have a seat by the side of Lady Beatrice."

This promise seemed to decide her, and with a slight bend of assent she accepted the proffered arm of Caution.

"Beatrice," said Sir Harris Stanhope to his daughter, in an undertone, as he took her hand, "you will remain with me, and with Lady Maud," did you see Mr. Gower to-night?"

"I did, and was much surprised and displeased to see him—or, I imagine, any one present," was the reply, in a tone as low as his own.

"It was somewhat singular, certainly," rejoined Sir Harris Stanhope, "but I will see him to-morrow. Beatrice, my love, during the month or so that Mr. Gower was on a visit to Caution, you, of course, have seen much of him. Is he a favorite?"

"Many, sir," returned Beatrice, in a somewhat faint voice.

"I wish to know, my child, what you particularly," he inquired, thoughtfully.

"I am puzzled Beatrice, looking up at him with surprise.

"I mean, did you observe in features—the lineaments of his face anything which struck you as familiar?"

"Because me, my responded Beatrice, her face suffused with a burning blush. "What is to remark—"

"Nothing of a reply, nevertheless," exclaimed her father, impatiently.

"Sir, I—I—" stammered Beatrice, with some embarrassment. "I remember his features, certainly—quite well enough to recognize him again at any time, if I should meet him."

"You are already children, Beatrice," sharply subdued Sir Harris. "I wish to know if you observed anything in his face which made on impression upon your—your mind?"

"Sir, I—I—" stammered Beatrice, confounded to acknowledge so much, she returned, in a slightly faltering tone.

"Beatrice, I wish to know what you observed," repeated Sir Harris, in a tone which left no room for evasion.

"Sir, I—I—" stammered Beatrice, "but you still do not appear to comprehend my meaning. Did it occur to you that you had seen Mr. Gower before, and in a different character?"

"No! unhesitatingly so," she answered.

"Think," said her father, emphatically. "You know that you often me by inconsiderate replies."

The boy of scarlet, which a moment before had quitted the brow of Beatrice, again returned to it.

"There may," she answered, with some hesitation, "be many faces bearing in some respects resemblance to it, but none that I have seen even approached it as a counterpart."

Sir Harris's face wore a disappointed appearance.

"I am sorry to hear you say so, Beatrice," he exhibited in the park on that day on which, after riding with you, he abruptly quitted you, and you were not aware of his absence for a full half hour. Is it right? Did it not follow then or now remind you of one you knew well?"

"No!" she exclaimed, thoughtfully.

"That's all Beatrice sir, simply. "Here your eyes been closed, girl, in the presence of Cyril Kingswood or his father?"

Beatrice uttered an exclamation of surprise, vexation, even anger.

"I do recognize the resemblance now," she answered.

A very romantic theory of hers was now very abruptly demolished. It was true, as Caution Stanhope had declared, that he had interested her in the history of Erle before she met him, on account of his strange resemblance from old friends. When she met him, he first struck her as being singularly familiar to her, and as she knew that she had never encountered him in life, she began to fancy imagination that she had seen him in her dreams—upon which belief she built up a very romantic theory, which, however, Erle himself upon her father dissipated by one full sweep of his tongue.

There was certainly a remarkable resemblance between Cyril Kingswood and Mr. Gower, and the resemblance it inevitably was that had so much excited her. But here present was the same person by Vale.

She was displeased to be suddenly awakened out of so pleasant a conceit. Yet though it pained her, it consoled her to ensure herself that Erle was not the boy whom Lord Kingswood and Cyril might fancy have prevented her making the discovery her father had made to her.

Sir Harris Stanhope, wholly unconscious of what was passing in his daughter's mind, continued to speak.

"Did you ever hear Mr. Gower speak of Lord Kingswood?"

"Yes," she answered, unhesitatingly.

"Yet I remember that Caution said Cyril Kingswood expressed to him a wish to see Mr. Gower before he left Vale Royal."

"So I believe he did, but I think—in fact, I am sure—he did not explain to Caution what was the nature of what was the cause of his intimacy with him," replied Beatrice.

"Well, Beatrice, my love, the matter will visit us again," rejoined Sir Harris, patting her on the arm, "and he will be sure to pay to my daughter every possible attention. Lady Kingswood appears from as elegant young fellow like him. My little Arrice will then extract from him the secret of his visit to Caution Stanhope, as the case may be—with Lord Kingswood. Strange as it may seem, the Marquis of Chillingham is a friend of Caution's, and may be to you, my love. I need not repeat this conversation. You will remember that I am to be informed in the morning. Caution I am very anxious—mark me, very anxious—to secure; of that I am sure, Beatrice, you will be aware, to secure you in every way to her. Caution, follow up close. My dear Lady Maud, we shall within moments be joining you. Come, my love, this way."

Aye, three set Lady Kingswood in what might have been deemed the act of listening with the deepest attention to every word of a priority of place.

She revelled in a magnificently decorated armchair, one, indeed, of regal appointments, but she sat ill at ease. She saw not the elegance, the splendor around her, the gay throng of guests, nor did she observe the gracious, some satirical, some envious, some malignant, some admiring looks cast upon her by those who moved around and around her.

Edmund had not, heeded not the heated flatteries which the Marquis of Chillingham, with calm, imperturbable face, poured into her ear. Violet had not heeded Erle Cyril—she thought only of the words the marquis had uttered in an undertone to her husband, which appeared to have overwhelmed him.

So, then he knew it; perhaps all the world knew it—the whole aristocratic, fashionable world knew it, and he would be a subject—all knew it but her, who should first have known it.

Violet's head fell upon her hands and concealed her veins. She felt her trembling lips—was now in a burning fever, and soon frozen cold. She felt that she must retire from there into some place of quiekey and decision to all who smiled obsequiously in her face and laughed immoderately behind her back.

With flashing eyes she turned to the marquis, who had whispered in her ear the words which had made Erle Cyrus—she thought of the words the marquis had uttered in an undertone to her husband, which appeared to have overwhelmed him.

So, then he knew it; perhaps all the world knew it—the whole aristocratic, fashionable world knew it, and he would be a subject—all knew it but her, who should first have known it.

Violet's head fell upon her hands and concealed her veins. She felt her trembling lips—was now in a burning fever, and soon frozen cold. She felt that she must retire from there into some place of quiekey and decision to all who smiled obsequiously in her face and laughed immoderately behind her back.

With flashing eyes she turned to the marquis, who had whispered in her ear the words which had made Erle Cyrus—she thought of the words the marquis had uttered in an undertone to her husband, which appeared to have overwhelmed him.

"My lord marquis!" she said, abruptly, though in a scarcely audible tone, "you will excuse me if I leave you for a moment, and styled him his family escort. What did you mean by this?

"My lord marquis!" she said, abruptly, though quickly, "I trust my inadvertence has not given your ladyship any cause for displeasure."

"My lord marquis," she interposed, in a voice rendered husky by a sense of her position, "I must positively oblige me if you will reply to my question."

The marquis shrugged his shoulders.

"Your ladyship will remember that Mr. Gower occupied a position, and I think a very honorable one, in the 3rd Lancashire Regiment of Kingswood Hall," he replied.

"Mr. Gower!" she exclaimed, turning to Lord Kingswood, quickly, "but you spoke to Kingswood in a tone as if you were cousions that Mr. Gower was a family name—a name by which you were well acquainted."

The marquis remained silent, apparently admiring a brilliant ring upon one of his fingers.

"Lord Kingswood," Gower here re-sight to meet us, my lord marquis," she continued, turning her blazing eyes upon him.

He said that Mr. Gower was his brother's eldest son—"

"I assure you, Lady Kingswood, I did not," he answered.

"Then you said so falsely, my lord," she replied, sternly.

He bowed.

"Did you not, surely, at liberty to answer that question," he said, quietly.

"I must know. Oh, my lord marquis, I am frenzied, mad, about this wretched affair," she murmured, with considerable emotion. "I must, I will know the truth, whatever it may be."

The marquis bent his head a little nearer to hers.

"Then, Lady Kingswood, you have learned it at last," he whispered. "If so, he deserves no consideration, and you ought to punish him. Your ladyship will remember that I am to be with you in the next fever me with that meeting alone which I have prayed you to grant me, and I will explain all that you wish to know."

"I will grant you," she said, so hurriedly, that the words were scarcely audible.

"I assure you, Lady Kingswood, I did not," he answered.

"Then you said so falsely, my lord," she replied, sternly.

He bowed.

"Did you not, surely, at liberty to answer that question," he said, quietly.

"I must know. Oh, my lord marquis, I am frenzied, mad, about this wretched affair," she murmured, with considerable emotion. "I must, I will know the truth, whatever it may be."

The marquis bent his head a little nearer to hers.

"Then, Lady Kingswood, you have learned it at last," he whispered. "If so, he deserves no consideration, and you ought to punish him. Your ladyship will remember that I am to be with you in the next fever me with that meeting alone which I have prayed you to grant me, and I will explain all that you wish to know."

"I will grant you," she said, so hurriedly, that the words were scarcely audible.

"I will arrange it all," he whispered, smiling, as he still seemed to be regarding the ring upon his finger, and addressed upon his finger Kingswood and others are swarming up. Courage, do not lose your presence of mind, and all is well."

Before Lady Kingswood could reply, the marquis, with a profound bow to her and to Lord Kingswood, made their appearance in the room. Ebenezer Cotton had seized upon Edmund, and was introducing him to Lord Kingswood, with whom Lord Kingswood had found him, and the latter gentleman, Cyril, delighted to see Erle, had left the side of Violet, and was in close conference with Sir Harris's beautiful, and prized, for he indeed could not help it, daughter.

He took the hand of Lord Kingswood's side, and Eleanore, leaning upon him, looked wistfully and ruefully up in his face, for she grieved to see him so changed. Only two days ago he was a picture of health.

Immediately adjoining them sat Lord Kingswood with Lady Maud at his side, and Sir Harris Stanhope with his son and daughter between him and Caution, who, with the page, appeared to be retained the drudgeries and to give use "singing woman" the cold shade of their presence, as the Italians call it.

And now the voices were hushed and the orchestra appeared.

The first song was one of a merry sort, but the latter verses fell upon her, it seemed to him that Violet stood before him even as she had startled him in the garden a short time previously.

Another glance, however, told him that he had been mistaken. There were the same golden curls, the same contemptuous of pale-green robe, but, oh, not the same sweet, loving, innocent face.

Still, the deception was young, and fair, and timid. It was plain to trembled where the same circumstances would have forced her to give her confidence.

The simple played a plaintive prelude, and the young girl commenced, in a richly, melodious voice, to sing. Her tones were tremulous, but every word was clear and distinct.

They rang in Cyril's ears, and beat deathblows on his heart. The first verse ran thus:

"When we two parted
In silence and years,
Half broken-hearted
To serve two masters;
Pale grew thy cheek, and cold,
Colder thy kiss;
Truly that hour foretold
Sorrow to this."

Cyril felt his heart swell and ache; blinding tears opening into his eyes, and he was not sure if he should speak or not.

At the same time a low, convulsive sobbing close to her startled Lady Kingswood, and she, on looking round, to her astonishment, beheld Lady Maud striving to hide a torrent of hysterical emotion.

Ere she could move to approach her, a voice—but this of the singer, but one even more beautifully melodious, but wild, passionate and unearthly—gratefully, requested she would—

"Oh, how truly dost bear friends—Borrow to this."

They rang through the vaulted roof distinct, clear, forcible, and then died away, although the tones were those of a spirit flying rapidly from the scene where they were uttered.

While yet the last echo lived, the lady, in a paroxysm of every one present, was thrusting Cyril sternly from his seat and cried, in agonised accents:

"Violet, sir—for death, mine!"

He would have made a dart toward the orchestra, but a dark figure sprang before him, seized him fiercely and thrust him back, crying, in a low, fierce tone:

"No; see it life, nor death, hear!"

It was Julius Brand who thus confronted him; Schmael's eyes which glared in his; Schmael's hand which thrust him back into his seat.

He fell back as if paralysed, and in the confusion which ensued, no one saw how the tall, dark, Arab man vanished.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Of mortal love, joy, sorrow, hope and ire,
His hollow eyes shook forth a sickly light;
A
The other was a fell, benighted hour.
Just such a scene as Milton drew before:
By pride and wit, and rage, and matice bound;
So much for Satan, if none of God about.

PHARISEE, the more he brooded over the appointment he had made with the lad, Mr. Lord Kingswood, the more was his anxiety to keep it.

This mysterious personage evidently was in possession of important secrets which Pharisee considered it of importance to the success of his schemes to make himself master of. This secret object was the grandchild of a mad parson he had entertained some years past in Kingswood.

This indiue attachment had been created in his breast entirely by the voluptuous beauty of her person and expression, and by the other qualifications either of mind or position; for men and women are most blinded when they imagine they are making a show their passion, simply because they are ladies or gentlemen, and for no other reason.

This was not the case with Pharisee, and therefore his love was a more blinding, consuming frenzy—with a tendency to make him run into an excess however desperate and irreconcilable.

It is true that he himself considered he was not so, because his ferocious as were his instincts, he knew no more tremendous mode of revenging himself upon Lord Kingswood than to offer his hand to him that he had been the paramour of his highborn, proud, outdoor wife.

Like all men gifted with low, base cunning, he overlooked one or two considerations that to his more honest foe, he who killed Lord Kingswood had placed herself from her fatal tendency to believe the worst that could be said against her by her enemies, and as she even intended, and to credit the assertion of any one rather than him she was bound first to believe was a lie, and then the truth would it not sing fire from any such creature, but it sprang from the refined and pure nature of a lady, who would think the very thought of vile treachery in the weaknesses and foibles of women, knew how to resist upon them to her injury, but to whom such a thought had never brought over the ruin he created.

Nevertheless Pharisee had cool faith, not only in his own unerring, but in circumstances and the complexion which a skilful villain could put upon them, that he could win the confidence of the situation, he must become master of every little incident, but no encounter with Lord Kingswood would that be, for Pharisee, he was, as we have said, most anxious to secure his interview with the unknown child of Reverend Peregryn, and he considered that he entertained a belief the singular old stranger was in possession of some secret relative to the birth of Violet Kingswood which would ensure him, all of which it would be of extreme value to him to secure.

At ten o'clock on the night on which the incidents narrated in the last chapter took place, Pharisee stood before his accustomed mirror in part of Gray's Mansion. The front room of a neighbouring one-lamp house upon the door, and by the same light he was busily engaged in shaving his head.

This must be it," he mumbled, and glided up to the door.

He listened for a moment, but as the sound, which, being unanswered, after the lapse of five minutes, he repeated with no better effect. As he gave a single knock, and waited for very nobly, he came to the conclusion, at the end of a quarter of an hour, that he either had not been called or that no one was at home.

He therefore decided to make a louder and more forcible appeal to the knocker, which purpose he carried into effect, and which, effective, however, it could descend, the door was suddenly pulled open with such a violent jerk as to bring nearly off the hand thereof buried into the passage and its violent collision with a mug.

The next instant he was seized by the throat, his forehead with his collar with both hands, shook him fiercely. As he had not spirited his knife, and as his knocker, and as his throat was in a position his feeling, every time she shook him he knocked at the door, and that with a violence most fatally and dangerous to the door.

Such conduct much increased the ire of the lady, and naturally the commotion, until Pharisee, by a desperate effort, released himself, and retreated to the door, which, however, he had not time to protect to be still, gasped, muscular, and no mean match for one of the ill-fed feminine species.

"I don't understand this, madam!" he exclaimed, out of breath, as the verge of suffocation.

"Don't you?" she cried, shaking her bony fist, and wriggling her hard-featured face at him; "then I'll myself soon make you. We want none of your games here."

"My games," declared Pharisee, bewildered.

"Yes, your games," retorted the lady. "But I'm a match for the best of you. Come along with me, you villain, or I'll rap on the crown of night—I know what."

"Rap on what?" cried Pharisee, excitedly. "You cannot possibly tell the nature of my errand here!"

"Can't I, indeed? Then I'll soon tell you, with an expressive nod of the head. "Suppose I had been a child—which I don't happen to be quite—you'd have pulverised every soul, bar, or small parcel within your reach; as you see it is, me you've got a bragging'ster ready, an' we must go together, strong, or I'll bring a policeman to hurry you off, you low, sneaking thief, I will"

Pharisee shook with rage.

"Madam—woman—you are mad with drink!" he cried, utterly carried away by the unfounded fancies of the lady, and as he was once he not, live how! that is all I want to learn from you."

"Aha! of course I make the name put enough," retorted the lady of the house; "but I should like to know what you can want with—ah!" She interrupted her own query as a very wild scream.

It had her closed the tall old individual Pharisee had come to with—and he held between the finger and thumb of his left hand a sufficient piece of the lady's nose to make her pause, and, garnished with his presence. In his right hand he held a lamp, with it he made a most bewildering gesture to her, and in a low, fierce tone, requested silence then spoke to the lady:

"Madam, I am sorry to have hurt you, but I have been exposed to this gentleman's violence."

Virgo leaped aside, as if she expected that Neziah Pengregyn would take off the lobe of the rather large fleshy appendage at the side of her head, and cried:

Pharisee followed Pengregyn, who passed along the passage and ascended the stairs, while Virgo descended to her nic ternerly, prepared to refresh herself with a comforting measure, having a strangely powerful resemblance in its fragrance to brandy, and to spring out upon any other invader of her premises not properly qualified to make as much free with them.

Pharisee was not quite so much at ease with respect to this visit, after his reception from Miss Virgo, as he was before it, and he eyed every step during his progress up the stairs with distrust; but he could not help admiring the grand, but ruinous, he looked about him with inquiring and an evident readiness to make a bolt of it, if circumstances should in the least degree warrant a retreat.

The room he entered was dusty and dingy. It contained many iron boxes, with dates painted on the front of them, a table was covered with books, and a few chairs completed the furniture. The papers were strewn in hideous confusion. It was evident that the old gentleman had not been accustomed to any opposition in his apartment.

A glance showed Pharisee that the window had iron bars, and the door which admitted him was plated with iron, and sewn heavily.

Pengregyn sat down at the table and pointed to a chair.

Pharisee started up to Pengregyn, and laid his hand on his wrist.

"No trouble," said Pengregyn, in a low tone.

"No trouble," answered Pengregyn. "Besides, if it were, it is necessary to my safety. Sit down, sir, and tell me what business you have here now. What the sum take in the month very often lets out. What is your business with me? Be quick, sir, for I quickly lose the gift of acute hearing, and the not only exercises it but also tires it. Speak, sir. I don't know that the talks—that I am a patient, I do know that, but I mean to say I do not know the kind of person you are. Be quick, sir, for I talk, and I am not to be kept out. So, if you please we will shut the door close and listen it is."

Pharisee cast a look of astonishment at the old stinking at the heart, but he could not help himself, and was therefore obliged to take the best of it.

Sauce or thicke his eyes roved rapidly over the contents of the room, and it could not be denied that everything about his former presented the impression that he was in a lawyer's office—a very busy lawyer's office.

"You are a—lawyer, I presume" he at length faltered.

"Presume nothing," answered Pengregyn, with a grim smile. "My occupation is, however, mostly philanthropic. The world is indebted to me for the invention of lip reading, and help, I have for them—through a friend. When needy men come to me for assistance, and they do, I help them to the extent of seven months —perhaps four. We agree to name a day of payment, and the borrowers put it down in writing. If they do not pay on the day they take; then they find a kind friend to record their name on the little list I have here, and they get their money easily, and I gratify my philanthropy. I have nothing more on my friend."

"Do you lend this money for nothing?" inquired Pharisee, with astonishment.

"No—no—no—no—no!" grinned Pengregyn. "Not exactly for nothing—but I have no interest in it."

"When do you practise the law?" asked Pharisee with surprise.

"Law—law—I practise no law, sir," replied Pengregyn, "I only turned Pengregyn, still grinning. "I despise a man who don't keep his word. I am a—a—a—what you call it—a help, I help those who not paid, then I write a note, and follow it up with formal process and summons. Then I get my money, and I help the other, and then——" But we did not meet, Mr.—Mr. Lord Kingswood's left. What's your name, sir?"

"Pharisee," answered that individual, in a low, hesitating tone.

"Gently—gently, sir," cried Pengregyn, as he put a shudder. "I have made the necessary inquiries, and have found them satisfactory. You are the friend of Lord Kingswood's Kingswood's valet.

"Valet is the name of the devil have you been doing?" exclaimed Pharisee, starting up from a seat into which the moment previously he had subsided.

"Be seated, my friend; nothing but what is perfectly right and proper," answered Pengregyn, motioning to his seat. "I am a benefactor to make inquiries, and always perform my task in a manner which I am sure you will approve of in his face.

"Humph!" grunted Pharisee, not altogether satisfied. "Well, I have had no reason to doubt you, and as I said I never have any secrets from my friends. I have come to meet you by arrangement. You have written to me, and I have come to see you as you desired. Here are to Lord Kingswood. I have come to know what that is."

"And you shall know," answered Pengregyn, with cunning look. "Now, sir, I am ready to hear your business. Be quick, sir, for I am not to be kept out."

"You," replied Pengregyn, quickly.

"Yes, you," repeated Pharisee. "You might glean all you wished to know from me, and yet reveal nothing."

"Listen," said Pengregyn, "I have come with one gentleman upon the other. "I know the youth called Mr. Erle Gower; I know his father; I know Violet Kingswood."

"I know!" repeated Pharisee, incredulously.

"Did I not say so?" asked Pengregyn, with a shrug of the shoulders. "He, he! you are precise as to terms. Well, knew or know, it matters not to me."

"Oh, but it does," cried Pharisee, with excitement. "It is of the most momentous importance."

Very well," responded Pengregyn, "I will grant it is of the most momentous importance to you, and I will act that, and we will go on. I know where the boy was born and when."

"Before—before!" cried Pharisee.

Now, don't interrupt me, my good friend," exclaimed Pengregyn, with a smile, "or I shall be apt to get angry, and when I am angry, my hearing is apt to leave me."

Pengregyn suddenly stopped.

"Well?" inquired Pharisee.

"Is he dead?" said Pengregyn, in a low tone. "I was about to say, when you interrupted me, the name of the—a—boy's father."

Pharisee remained silent, and with his hand over his mouth and down his chin.

"Is he dead?" repeated Pengregyn, but old Pengregyn's eyes only twinkled; he made no other sign that he expected any answer to his question.

He proceeded—

"You see, I know a great deal that you do not, but still I wish to learn further, in short, what you know and I do not."

"I will tell you," answered Pharisee, "and will tell me a certain secret, to be put in the possession of the only individual whom I have mentioned, Violet Kingswood, the only person in existence which cannot possibly concern you?"

"Will you tell me the name, straight on to judge of that matter for myself," returned Pengregyn, in a rather decided tone, adding, "I am not accustomed to be trifled with, sir, and I am positive, secret for secret. Now, as you are reluctant to begin, I will open proceedings. The name of the boy's father—the name of Mr. Gower built from Kingswood Hall?"

Stop, stop a moment," cried Pharisee, eagerly. "You make a bold assertion. Will you—can you prove it?"

"I can," answered Pengregyn, with a confident nest of the head. "There—it shall was certainly born to Lord Kingswood before his wife was betrothed to Mr. Gower."

He! ejaculated Pharisee, excitedly, "you can prove that?"

"I can," returned Pengregyn.

"Can Lord Kingswood be acquainted with my lady at the time?" asked Pharisee quickly.

He! he! he! chuckled Pengregyn, with a malicious expression on his face. "Why, man, he was at the very time betrothed to her. He was betrothed to her, and married her, and, I tell you, before he even knew of the existence of the supposed mother of Mr. Erle Gower."

"This is good, that is very good, that is magnificent," muttered Pharisee, in soliloquy.

Pengregyn looked up at him under his bushy eyebrows inquiringly as heard these expressions.

"Oh, yes," he exclaimed, after a moment's pause, "Lord Kingswood married his wife under a mere intrigue, and after the birth of the child never again saw the mother."

"But the child?" asked Pharisee, anxiously.

"It was reported to have died years ago," answered Pengregyn.

"But this Mr. Gower," questioned Pharisee, "who is he?"

"Ah! you go on too fast," said Pengregyn. "You want to know too much for your position and information. Besides, don't you find this place very cold—very cold?" He observed a little extravagantly.

"There is no fire," observed Pharisee, looking round.

"We cannot trust one another when the wind is in the east, for then the smoke all rolls into the room instead of going up the chimney," remarked Pengregyn, rubbing his hands sharply. "The wind is in the east now, and it is bitter cold. What say you to a little hot spirits and water, sir, just to cheer us and thaw our tongues? Mine, I assure you, is struck so way, for fear of having an inch snipped off the tip of it, sir, by mistake."

Pharisee assented, at the same time urging Pengregyn to be quick, as he had business of the most pressing nature on hand that night.

From a shelf in an iron safe, which he carefully unlocked, Pengregyn produced a bottle of brandy and a glass, and then produced the "Watchdog" from the lower regions.

"Now, sir," said Pengregyn, in kind tones, "some hot water for the gentleman, my good friend, and some cold for me. You know my constitution, I think, sir."

Virgo, with her "awful frost," scanned Pharisee rather curiously as she left the room, and then, muttering of the dear, Pengregyn jumped off the floor and came down on both feet with a crash which made Miss Virgo jump and the "Watchdog" growl.

"Quick, Virgo, quick!" he cried, fiercely, "our time is precious." The hot water was produced very quickly produced, and the elongated spinster, with a sour expression on her face, disappeared. Pengregyn mixed the brandy and water, and, shaking off the remainder of it to be brandy and water to Pharisee boiling hot. He could therefore only sip it, but his manner to Pengregyn, produced as he saw that brandy had not lowered.

"Now, sir, to business," said Pengregyn. "I am glad to hear you say so. Now, I don't mind telling you that young tower is the son of Mr. Gower, who, they say, died in Kingswood Hall."

Pharisee reflected a moment, and then said,

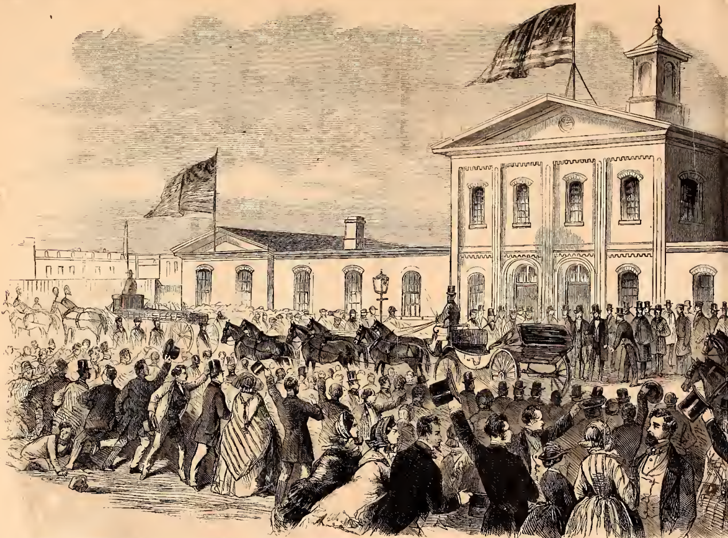
"Is the boy living?" he asked, with a groan, shot him before he was prepared, and stabbed him in several places afterwards, though he had not the heart to finish him.

"Ah!" ejaculated Pengregyn, "and this is the truth?"

"Yes, sir, it is the truth," he replied.

Now, pray, tell me—I only want a slight sketch of what took place—how you managed to get rid of him?"

Pharisee kept sipping his mixed spirits and water, and seemed to feel strengthened by the warmth of his body by the potation. He consequently communicated to old Pengregyn the information he had gained from Violet Kingswood's letter, the opening of the fire by the young stranger, which Pengregyn forced off, assuming him at the same time with a determination to have the boy's life, and the subsequent attack, and his attachment which overcame scruple, pity, ruth and remorse, and the boy's being pitched into the river, and his supposed death. Pengregyn listened to this story, which he received from Pharisee his acknowledgment of the hatred he bore to the child, and the fact that he had been employed by Lord Kingswood to despatch Clarkington was playing, and, in fact, the whole of his proceedings from the time he first saw Violet Kingswood, and when he concluded Pengregyn rubbed his hands together with delight, and when he concluded Pengregyn rubbed his hands together with delight, and when he concluded Pengregyn rubbed his hands together with delight



THE PRESIDENTIAL JOURNEY—RECEPTION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN IN NEW YORK, ON THE ARRIVAL OF THE SPECIAL TRAIN AT THE HUDSON RIVER R. R. DEP

THE PRESIDENTIAL JOURNEY TO WASHINGTON.

(Continued from page 226.)

Mr. Lincoln Arrives at Cleveland.

Mr. Lincoln arrived at Cleveland at half-past four P. M. on the 15th, and was received by an immense crowd. The President and party were placed in carriages, surrounded by a body of mounted young Republicans, and, nolens volens, put on a spirited charger, and in a few minutes after the arrival the procession was moving up Euclid street, one of the finest avenues in the West. Mr. Masters, the acting Mayor, welcomed the President elect on behalf of the city authorities, and Judge Andrews did the same on behalf of the citizens. Mr. Lincoln made a response in which the most remarkable thing was his declaration that the crisis was artificial.

Separate levees were held in the course of the evening by Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln. The and hands had got worse for the wear casions that he made that came to take defile past him at distance. The Pres must have produced favorable impression the praise of all that
ing the evening.
given to the Presider
ten P. M.

Our Special Artis
panied Mr. Lincoln fr throughout his rout
most spirited sketch at the great City of

Mr. Lincoln a

On February 16th elect arrived at Bu met at the door of President Fillmore. was a most cordial o surrounding the de and numbered at lea persons. It was he Hunter, of the Unit
one of Mr. Lincoln' shoulder dislocated went up Exchange to the American Ho
ings along the rou decorated. When h hotel he was welc speech by Mayor B
coln briefly replied.
the hotel were regu
by the crowd. In held a levee, and man serenade.

The next mornin
Fillmore called up and took him to the church the ex
President elect ro hotel, and were join
coln, when the par to Mr. Fillmore's pr to partake of a lunc

Mr. and Mrs. Linc
the hotel at two n spent the remainde their rooms. The upon by a number o ladies and gentleme of the afternoon—a
the most conspicuo
G. W. Clinton, A. M
Stevens, A. S. Bem
nam, D. S. Hunt, F.
Verplanck, N. K. Ha
N. D. Davis, M. C
Horn, M. C., and P.

Their Arrival

On Monday at s party left Buffalo, e
all along the route w enthusiasm. At B not make a speech,

RECEPTION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN AT CLEVELAND, OHIO—THE PRESIDENT ADDRESSING THE CROWD FROM THE BALCONY IN FRONT OF THE WEDDELL HOUSE.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST TRAVELLING IN THE SUITE OF THE PRESIDENT.

POT, THIRTIETH STREET, TUESDAY, FEB. 19, 1861—SUPERINTENDENT KENNEDY CONDUCTING THE PRESIDENT TO HIS CARRIAGE.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR RESIDENT ARTIST.

e former's arms
ot so much the on previous oc-
ds the thousands a look at him
t a comfortable sidential couple d a most a most on, judging from at saw them dur-
A supper was out and suite at is., who accom-from Springfield nto, has made a n of his reception

f the Forests.

at Buffalo.

h the President
uffalo, and was the car by Ex-
Their meeting
ns. The crowd
pot was dense,
st ten thousand re that Major
d States Army,
s suite, had his
The cortége
nd Main streets
tel. The build-te were gaily
e arrived at the med in a neat
emis. Mr. Lin-
The doors of arly blockaded
he evening he eceived a Ger-

g ex-President
n Mr. Lincoln, church. From President and o back to the
ed by Mrs. Lin-
y were driven ivate residence
h.

oln returned to clock P. M., and r of the day in y were called f distinguished n in the course
nong the latter
ns were Hon.
. Clapp, F. P.
is, James Pot-
J. Fithian, J. A.
ll, R. P. Larvin,
rover, B. Van Dorsheimer.

in Albany.

x o'clock the ad was greeted ith the greatest atavia he did
but bowed to

PRESIDENT LINCOLN IN BUFFALO, N. Y.—ARRIVAL OF THE PRESIDENT AND ESCORT IN FRONT OF THE AMERICAN HOTEL.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST TRAVELLING IN THE SUITE OF THE PRESIDENT.

the assembled crowd. At eight o'clock they reached Rochester, where there were gathered at least five thousand people. Here Mr. Lincoln said a few words expressive of his appreciation of the compliment paid him.

At Clyde he was received with a salute from a cannon and by a shouting and welcoming crowd.

On his arrival at Syracuse there were at least ten thousand persons, and a live eagle was placed on the platform.

Little Falls, Amsterdam, Schenectady, all were passed, the President receiving loud cheers at every town.

At twenty minutes past two the train arrived in Albany, where the Twenty-fifth Regiment, Colonel Bryan commanding, appeared on the ground, and a pathway was opened to the carriages and the platform cleared. Mr. Lincoln then appeared on the platform, and was received with deafening cheers. He was met by Mayor Thacher, who welcomed him in a neat speech. Mr. Lincoln replied in a few appropriate words, carefully avoiding the slightest allusion to politics. He appeared very pale and careworn.

The whole party then took carriages and drove to the Capitol of the Empire State, when Lincoln was conducted to the Executive Chamber, where he was introduced to Governor Morgan, the State officials and his staff. The Governor then led him to the top of the steps of the Capitol, where a storm of applause welcomed the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. The Governor then made a few remarks, to which the President elect replied. Mr. Lincoln then was conducted to the Assembly Chamber. After a few introductions the cortege then proceeded to the Delavan House, attended and cheered by an immense concourse of people. Here the Committee took their leave, and Mr. Lincoln received a few calls from particular friends. He then proceeded, accompanied by Mrs. Lincoln, to the residence of Governor Morgan to dinner.

After dinner he returned to his quarters at the Delavan House, where, during the evening, he received visits first of ladies and then of male citizens. The Delavan House was crowded to suffocation during the entire evening.

Mr. Lincoln and suite left Albany at eight o'clock on the 19th. The Burgesses turned out as an escort, and were much admired. Some of them are the handsomest men in the State. Mayor Thacher, Alderman Johnson, and some other officials conducted the party to the depot.

In consequence of difficulty in crossing the river, the special train was taken up to Waterford junction. Not many persons were out on the line of the road, except in Cohoes and Waterford, in consequence of the early hour at which the train started. At Green Island quite a number of persons assembled, and at Cohoes, the people turned out en masse, thousands of factory employees, including a large number of females, welcoming the train with hearty cheers. At Waterford there was also a large assemblage. No stoppages were made at these villages, but the train passed slowly through, affording the crowds an opportunity to gratify their curiosity and give vent to their patriotic feelings.

At Troy.

From Waterford the train proceeded to Troy, where the first stoppage was made. The new and spacious depot was found full to its utmost capacity, apparently fifteen thousand people being congregated inside, and as the train approached, a deafening roar of cheers and shouts greeted the arrival. A raised platform had been prepared to afford the vast crowd a better opportunity to see Mr. Lincoln; and ascending this he was welcomed by Mayor McConihe. Mr. Lincoln replied very briefly.

From Troy to Hudson.

Mr. Lincoln was conducted to the cars of the Hudson River Railroad. The Troy City Guards surrounded the platform.

Arrival at New York.

At a few minutes to three the great Rail-Splitter arrived at the terminus, Thirty-first street, New York.

Opposite the depot was a raised platform, on a level with the high fence, which had been erected by the employees of the Hudson River Railroad Company, and which was occupied by their families for the purpose of viewing the presidential party as they entered the carriages. In front of the depot in Thirtieth street, the twenty-five carriages supplied by Mr. Van Ranst for the procession were in waiting, as were also two express wagons furnished by Westcott, Dodge & Co., for the conveyance of the baggage of the party. The carriage in which Mr. Lincoln rode was an open barouche, drawn by six beautiful black horses, which were driven by J. L. Hewitt, who also had charge of the Prince of Wales's carriage. One of the baggage wagons was drawn by six white horses, and the other by four black horses.

Escorted by Colonel Sumner and Alderman Cornell, the President elect entered the carriage, into which also ascended Hon. D. Davis, of Illinois, Col. Sumner and Alderman Cornell. The procession then passed down Ninth avenue to Twenty-third street, then to the Fifth avenue, then to Fourteenth street to Broadway, and from Broadway to the Astor House.

There was little enthusiasm but much respect evinced. He was conducted to his rooms at the hotel, and said a few words. In the evening he made a longer address, but of little importance.

Mr. Lincoln at the City Hall.

On Wednesday Mr. Lincoln, attended by a part of his suite, breakfasted at Mr. Moses Grinnell's, and met a select few. It is said that he pretty plainly intimated that he did not intend to adopt the Abolition chair designed by some of his ultra advocates. Our Artist has in the present number shown what sitting on bayonets resembles. Soon after his return from Grinnell's he was taken by Alderman Cornell to the City Hall, where he was received by Mayor Wood in his usual bland manner. The Mayor stood behind the famous writing table of George Washington, and made a short address, full of force and meaning. Mr. Lincoln replied in an equally short but comprehensive speech. Our Artist has sketched the President elect at the minute he is being introduced to the Mayor by Alderman Cornell. The scene was very impressive, for never since the birth of our great Republic has any President been called upon to fill the Presidential chair at so momentous a crisis. It is not too much to say that the history of the world has no parallel to our present juncture.

After this had been completed Mr. Lincoln took his stand at the base of the statue of Washington, and received the citizens of New York. Till twelve o'clock he greeted every comer in the true democratic fashion of shaking hands, and then till one he exchanged the courtesy of a bow, and a few words. Our space will not permit us to quote a tithe of the things, good, bad and indifferent which were interchanged between the great Rail Splitter and his visitors. This ordeal over, he took leave of Fernando Wood, and returned to the Astor House, where he received a number of his personal friends, among which were our friend Barnum, Colonel Fremont, Fry, and other celebrities.

We must not omit to thank the courteous Janitor of the City Hall, Mr. George W. Roome, for his politeness to our Artist, who was thus enabled to give the public a sketch of this most interesting event. We think it, also, only right to add, that ours was the only Illustrated Paper which had an Artist present.

In the evening he visited the Academy of Music, but as we have mentioned this in Our Weekly Gossip we refrain from further remarks. On Thursday, at eight o'clock, he took his departure for Trenton, which he reached at noon. His programme is this:

Leave Trenton at half-past two P. M., and arrive at Philadelphia at four P. M.

Friday, Feb. 22.—Leave Philadelphia at nine A. M., and arrive at Harrisburg at one P. M.

Saturday, Feb. 23.—Leave Harrisburg at nine A. M., and arrive at Baltimore at one P. M.; leave Baltimore at three P. M., and arrive at Washington at half-past four P. M.

We conclude our brief accounts of the Lincoln progress with the following little domestic incident at Poughkeepsie: Mrs. Lincoln, who was recognised in the cars, was warmly welcomed by the crowd. In response she raised the window and returned the salutations of the people. "Where are the children? Show us the children?" cried a loud voice. Mrs. Lincoln immediately called her eldest son to the window, and he was greeted by a hearty cheer. "Have you any more on board?" "Yes," replied Mrs. Lincoln, "here's another," and she attempted to bring a tough, rugged little fellow, about eight years of age, into sight.

But the young representative of the house of Lincoln proved refractory, and the more his mother endeavored to pull him up before the window the more stubbornly he persisted in throwing himself down on the floor of the car, laughing at the fun, but refusing to receive the proffered honor of a reception. So his mother at last was constrained to give up the attempt to exhibit the "pet of the family."

Arrival of the Vice President.

Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, the Vice President elect, arrived in this city, via the New Haven Railroad, at half-past four P. M., on the 20th. He was received at the depot by a deputation from Republican Clubs of New York and Kings county, who had in waiting a carriage and four horses to convey him to the Astor House. Mr. Hamlin is accompanied by his wife and by a part of the Congressional delegation from Maine. Soon after his arrival at the Astor House he dined privately with Mr. Lincoln, spending over an hour at the table. After dinner he received a deputation from the Young Men's Central Republican Committee. Mr. Hamlin continued his journey to Washington on the 21st.

THE DEMON SPECTRE:

A True Ghost Story of Virginia.

Some years ago, while travelling with a friend through that portion of Virginia which forms the south-west corner of the State, we stopped for a day or two at one of those old-fashioned wayside inns which are now rarely to be met with beyond the boundaries of the Old Dominion. The weather was delightful, the scenery in the neighborhood varied and beautiful, our quarters more than comfortable, and as we had travelled many weary miles without making any lengthened halt, we determined to "put up," as the phrase is, in these parts, and recruit a little before proceeding on our journey, which had originally been undertaken more for pleasure and pastime than with any other object. We had adopted the fashion of the country, and were travelling on horseback, with a change or two of linen stowed away in our saddlebags and an overcoat and umbrella strapped behind, ready for use in case of emergency. Our horses were strong, well gaited and spirited, capable of carrying us safely over roads and through a country but little adapted to any other kind of locomotion, and enabling us to take bypaths and short-cuts through regions but little known abroad, though abounding with objects of remarkable and rare interest.

We had been sojourning with our kind and obliging host of the inn but a day or two, when one morning he informed us that one of his neighbors, who was a candidate for a seat in the State Legislature, would that day give a "fish-fry" to his numerous friends, personal and political, and that we had been invited to attend. Never having witnessed "a real old-fashioned Virginia fish-fry," we gladly accepted the invitation, and were soon on our way, in company with several others, to the place selected for the festival. A ride of a mile or two brought us to the place. It was a beautiful spot of grass, shaded with great oak trees, in one of those beautiful dells which abound in the mountainous regions of Virginia, and near it a clear mountain stream went murmuring and dashing along over its rocky bed.

When we arrived many had already assembled. Rustic tables and seats had been erected, huge fires were blazing in various directions, before which every variety of meat and fowl were roasting, while numerous parties, with line and net, were invading the sparkling waters of the brook for specimens of the finny tribe, with which to give name to the entertainment. Nearly every one present took part in the sport, and thus the greater part of the morning passed away. By noon, large numbers of delicious mountain trout had been caught; they were soon dressed, the tables spread, and all sat down to the tempting repast with appetites well whetted by the pure air and morning's exercise.

After dinner, while the apple-jack and old rye circulated freely, the candidates favored us with their views of State and Federal politics, into which, however, nothing offensive or personal was suffered to intrude, and then the remainder of the evening was spent in horse-racing, cards, social discussions on agriculture and politics, and such other amusements as the time and the place suggested. All passed off as merry as a marriage bell, and the pleasures of the day would no doubt have been drawn out into twilight and the early hours of the night, had not an approaching storm warned us that it was time to seek shelter elsewhere.

My friend had some short time before accepted an invitation to spend the night with an acquaintance he had met with during the day, and had gone off home with him, and I was about taking my solitary way back to the inn when a gentleman, with whom I had been in conversation during the evening, one of those specimens of genuine hospitality almost always to be met with in the Virginia planter, came up and insisted that I should accompany him home. He said that he lived but a short distance off, and urged, as an additional reason, that the approaching storm would overtake me before I could make half the distance to my place of destination. The argument was conclusive, and I gladly accepted his kind invitation. A short ride brought us to his mansion. It was a large, old-fashioned two storey brick house, consisting of a centre building, with two extensive wings, one of which was used as a kitchen and servants' hall. The building stood on an eminence, commanding an extensive view of the rich lowlands that surrounded it, and shaded by a magnificent grove of fine old forest trees. Supper was soon announced, and, after having done ample justice to the tempting fare set before us, we adjourned to the front yard to enjoy a cigar, accompanied by the fair lady of the house.

The threatened storm had passed by, and instead of coming over, as we had anticipated, was sweeping along a distant mountain ridge, much to the regret of my friend, who informed me that the tobacco crop stood greatly in need of rain. Various topics were introduced and discussed as we sat thus sipping our mint-juleps and puffing our highly-perfumed havanas, until at length we got upon the subject of dreams, supernatural visions and ghosts. I had never been a believer in such things, and expressed myself so very freely.

"No," said I, in reply to my friend's wife, who asked me if I had ever seen anything of the kind, "ghosts and hobgoblins have had their day, and, like other superstitions of a barbarous and ignorant age, have passed away with the great cause which usually engenders such beliefs; and like the idle tales of witchcraft, definitions and so forth, of former times, would have been forgotten long ago but for the pernicious teachings of colored servants, who are proverbially superstitious, and with whom children are too often heedlessly left by their parents."

My friend was silent and looked grave, while his wife looked at me with an expression so peculiar as to attract my attention. At length he said,

"I do not think any one who knew me a year or two ago would have charged me with possessing any inordinate share of superstition, and yet it is said that this very house in which we live is haunted—" and then, after a pause, in which he seemed evidently striving hard to bring himself to the acknowledgment, he said, "and I believe it!"

I was much astonished at the acknowledgment, and looked at him closely to see if he was in earnest. He was very pale, and seemed evidently troubled with some unpleasant recollections of the past. That he was joking I could not for a moment believe, and yet he was a man of superior intellect, well educated and refined, and in mental capacity much above the ordinary standard. My curiosity was much excited to know by what combination of circumstances a man like him should have become so fully possessed with what I could not help thinking was a very childish belief, and after some persuasion, in which I was seconded by his wife, he consented to gratify me. The ordinary bedtime having arrived, the lady arose and bid us good night. After she had retired, we replenished our juleps, lit a fresh cigar, and having resumed our comfortable armchairs, my friend began.

"I have always," he said, "resided in this neighborhood; having been born on a farm about twenty miles from here. When I was a boy I remember frequently to have heard it said that this place was the theatre of strange and unaccountable sights and sounds, and was even at that day known as the 'haunted house.' There was a dark tale of crime connected with one of the previous owners of the place, but as the circumstances had occurred long years before, and the man had since died, it had in a great measure been forgotten except by the older inhabitants of the neighborhood. Like many of the young men of my State I was sent at an early age to a Northern College, where I remained until my education was completed, only returning home for short periods each year during the vacation. On my final return home, after graduating, I found that the old stories about this place had been revived. The house had remained shut up for a long time, but had finally fallen into the hands of a new owner. This gentleman repaired the buildings, and had taken possession of the premises but a short time when he suddenly broke up his establishment, offered the place for sale, and removed from the neighborhood. Another purchaser was soon found, but in a few months he also left nearly as suddenly as his predecessor, without assigning any reason for his strange haste. The place was again and again sold with nearly the same result, until finally no new purchaser could be found. It was then offered for rent, but no tenant would remain in the house longer than a few weeks, sometimes only a few days, throwing up their leases, and often submitting to quite serious pecuniary losses for the sake of getting off. It again began to be rumored that strange and mysterious sights and sounds were of frequent occurrence there, and that the annoyance arising therefrom was so great that no one could be found willing to submit to it. The place was finally offered free of rent to any one who would live there and take care of the premises. Several tried it, but no one could be found who was willing to remain, and finally the place was deserted, and the house again shut up. It had remained in this condition for some years when it was once more put up at auction. I attended the sale. There were but few persons present, and no bidders. Seeing that no one seemed disposed to buy, I bid what under ordinary circumstances would have been considered a very small sum for the estate, and was much astonished to find that after a few minutes it was 'knocked down to me.'

"Several of my neighbors jestingly congratulated me upon my 'splendid purchase,' and wished me joy in my future abode among the ghosts and evil spirits of the place.

"Being at that time a bachelor, but little preparation was needed in the way of repairs, fixing up, &c., and I soon found myself the occupant of my new home. At first I used often to think of the stories I had heard of the place, especially when alone at night. But as days and weeks and months passed without seeing or hearing anything supernatural or unusual, I at length came to the conclusion that all that had been said was only the result of gross ignorance and superstition magnified by timidity and cowardice. I had absolutely seen nothing, and the long nights of winter passed without other sound than that produced by the howling of the wind about the chimney tops, or the scampering of rats through the empty rooms of my 'Bachelors' Hall.'

"About this time I was married. I had newly furnished the house, and everything was gotten in readiness for the reception of my bride. That room," pointing to the windows of one just above our heads, "being the most convenient and pleasant chamber in the house, I had fitted up with extra care for our sleeping apartment. My wife's family lived in an adjoining county. We were married in the morning, and immediately after the ceremony came over to this place, accompanied by our mutual friends. I had invited several of our neighbors to spend the evening with us, and most of us had retired to our rooms to prepare to receive our company (it was then about early candlelight) when the whole house was startled by a loud report like the discharge of a pistol, followed by a terrified scream from the ladies assembled in my wife's room. Everybody hastened to the spot. We found the ladies in a terrible state of alarm. They told us that while completing their toilets they were gaily chatting together when they were all startled by the explosion, which had taken place immediately in the room they were occupying. My wife had been sitting at the time before a large full-length mirror, placed between the two front windows of the room, with her back turned towards it, and upon examination they had found the mirror broken into a thousand pieces, and the fragments scattered over the floor. There, true enough, were the scattered fragments of the glass, but after a careful search nothing further could be found. We, however, assured the ladies that the accident could be easily accounted for—that the wooden frame of the mirror had shrunk by having a fire lighted in the room, and that the breaking of the glass from that cause had produced the explosion. Though I must confess that several of us, and myself among the number, were not at all satisfied with our own explanation. The reason assigned seemed, however, to allay the fears of the ladies, and the evening passed off without any further incident.

"A few nights after my wife awoke me in great alarm. She told me that she had been awoke from a sound sleep by hearing a noise in the room, that she had listened and had heard the tones of a female voice pleading apparently with some one, with great earnestness of manner, accompanied with frequent groans and sobs. That a rough, harsh voice seemed to reply, though neither were sufficiently distinct for her to catch any of the words. She was greatly agitated, and it was some time before I could soothe her, and I utterly failed to convince her that she was mistaken. Afterward this thing was of frequent occurrence. At length one night she awoke me in a fearful state of agitation and alarm, crying, 'Look—look there!' I looked in the direction indicated, and fancied I saw something resembling a thin white mist rapidly moving across the further end of the room. In a moment I was wide awake, and endeavored to persuade her that it was only fancy; but I could not divest myself of the idea that I had myself seen something not altogether natural. My wife told me that she had been awakened some short time before by what seemed to be an earnest conversation between two persons in the passage near our door; presently the door seemed to open, and a figure dressed in white glided in and paused for a moment near the foot of the bed. The form was that of a young female; her hair was long and dishevelled, her look wild and terrified, and in her arms she carried the body of a dead infant. She cast a most imploring look at my wife. At that moment she called me, when the figure at once moved off and disappeared on the opposite side of the room. Again and again the same occurrence took place, and each time my wife seemed more and more alarmed. I tried still to persuade myself that it was mere fancy on her part. I had as yet seen nothing unusual myself, except the occurrence above mentioned, although I must confess I had more than once heard sounds that could not easily be accounted for. We had now been married several months, and my wife was in that interesting condition in which ladies, and especially very young ones, are apt to have all sorts of strange imaginations. Her excitement was at times very great, so much so that I became seriously alarmed for her safety. I could not convince her that she had not seen a supernatural vision, and, as it only seemed to visit her in that room, I determined to change our sleeping apartment to another part of the house. We accordingly removed into the far wing where you see those lights. After that I was delighted to find that she was not again troubled.

"Some months passed by, and as nothing was heard of the ghost we began almost to believe that it was only fancy after all, when an old friend of mine came to visit us. Our former room being decidedly the most comfortable and best furnished room in the house, was selected as his chamber while with us. The day after his arrival, while at breakfast, he asked if some of the family had not been sick during the night, as he had heard a great deal of noise as of persons walking about, and at times groans and other indications of distress. I told him that one of the servants was very sick, which was the case, but did not tell him that he was far from the dwelling in an out-house, and that no one had been in that part of the house since he retired. Nothing more was said during the day about the noise. The next night between one and two o'clock (I had been called out from the house in the early part of the night and had not yet retired) I heard a door slammed violently to, and a moment after some one coming rapidly down the passage and up the steps towards our room. I hastily took up a lamp and went out to see what was the matter. I found it was my friend. He seemed greatly agitated, and his face was deadly pale. He told me he had been awakened in the same way as my wife had often been before; that he had seen the female figure enter with the dead child, had noted the imploring look; but at that moment a dark, terrible object had entered the door (he believed it was the devil); that the other figure uttered a piercing shriek and disappeared, when he too jumped out of bed and rushed from the room in extreme terror he scarcely knew where. No inducement could persuade him to again enter that room, and he slept for the remainder of the night in a room adjoining our own.

"The next day he seemed none the less impressed with the reality of what he had seen, stoutly declaring that it was no fancy, as he was wide awake at the time. What struck me as not a little strange was that I had known this gentleman for a number of years, having been at college with him, and knew well that he was not at all superstitious, and, so far from being timid, that he had always been considered daring even to recklessness.

"After this the noise in that room seemed to increase. At times the bell would ring violently. Then hurried steps would be heard as of persons moving about in great excitement. Then screams and groans, and at times a female voice as if pleading for mercy. I had the bell-wire from that room taken off, but it made no difference—the bell still rung. I then had all the bells in that part of the house unhung and taken down, but it made no difference, the sound as of bells ringing was still heard. I set a watch in every room, in fact resorted to every expedient that human ingenuity could devise, but to no effect, the sounds were still heard, and the mystery, instead of being solved, was only increased. We have never since occupied that room; sometimes a friend staying with us has requested to be put in it for the night; but I have never known even the most daring among them desire to repeat the experiment. That one night was always sufficient for them. The noise at intervals still continues, and I assure you on my honor that I am at this moment as utterly unable to account for it as I was the first night my wife called my attention to it."

Such was my friend's story. When he had finished I said to him that if he had no objection I would like to sleep in that room myself. He seemed somewhat astonished at my request, and tried hard to dissuade me from the attempt, assuring me if I did that I would repent it before morning. I was, however, somewhat excited by the juleps I had drank, and as I had made the request was obstinately bent on doing so, being influenced no doubt by the fear of being laughed at if I now backed out. He at length reluctantly assented, and as it was quite late proposed that after we had taken a "nightcap" we should retire. He accompanied me to my room. It was a fine, large apartment, furnished with everything that could contribute to comfort or luxury. Setting the lamp which he had in his hand on a table, he remained for a few moments in conversation, and then bidding me good night withdrew. I hastily undressed, blew out the light and jumped into bed. It is true I thought some of the strange sights and sounds that had been seen and heard in that room, but being very tired I soon fell asleep, when ghosts and all other visions were for a time forgotten.

How long I had been asleep I have no idea. I must have been for an hour or two when I suddenly awoke with one of those strange, indefinable feelings of dread creeping over me—a consciousness of some supernatural presence which every one at times during their lifetime has felt, and which it is as difficult to account for as it is to describe. The moon, which had before been obscured, was again shining out, casting rays of pale fitful light through the branches of the trees which overhung my chamber windows. Within the house a dead silence reigned, a silence which at that moment had something painful in it, while without not even a breath of air stirred the leaves on the surrounding trees.

The incidents of the conversation of the last evening came one by one back to my mind with startling vividness. I will not say that I was frightened, but I could not conceal from myself the fact that there was a growing feeling of dread creeping over me which was not at all agreeable, and against which it seemed for the time vain to struggle. Unconsciously I placed myself in an attitude to listen, when suddenly I was startled by the sounds of a light footstep passing the door. It paused for an instant, and then seemed to enter an adjoining room, and then for a moment all was silent again. Then the echoes of a heavy footstep ascending the stairs sounded along the empty passages. There was something peculiarly horrifying in the very tread. It seemed to have nothing of human life in it, but was like the march of the dead keeping time to the music of the grave. It passed the door and ceased, and all was again still. A slight rustling noise caused me for a moment to turn my eyes towards the window, when there, full in the pale moonlight, stood the figure of the lady I had heard described, with the dead infant in her arms. She was looking straight at me and never till my dying day shall I forget that look. It was all of horror, remorse and anguish that I had ever conceived. A moment and the step in the passage was again heard. One imploring look, and the apparition had vanished.

The step approached the door. It flashed across my mind that I had carefully bolted it, and had turned the key before retiring. The step paused. I heard the knob turn—the click of the lock, and to my horror the door slowly swung open. I looked, and my God! there full before me stood the demon spectre, tall, lank, deathlike, wrapped in a winding sheet which but half concealed the naked bones beneath, with hollow, fleshless cheeks and grinning teeth, with eyes of fire which blazed with all the demon hate of hell, it stood peering into every corner of the room as if searching for something. Presently it crossed along towards the foot of the bed, and, turning, those hellish eyes glared full upon me. I endeavored to spring from the bed. All power of motion was gone. Then I tried to scream, but my voice had left me. The cold damp of death stood upon my brow. I could neither speak nor move. The only power left me was to see, and my eyes followed every motion of the spectre.

Instantly it moved towards the window and stood for some minutes gazing out into the moonlight. Then it turned again and approached the bed so close that I could feel the cold and chilling damp of the grave-clothes upon me. During still in my eyes it stretched forth its long skeleton arms and fumbled upon which the cover seemed to have been drawn, and reaching forward placed it upon my face. The touch sent a shivering pain of horror through my very marrow. My blood froze; my heart stood still. I could stand it no longer. With one scream and a tremendous bound I sprang down from the bed.

It was broad daylight. The sun was shining full into my room, and my friend stood looking at me with astonishment. I had entered my room late, tally bringing me a glass of his famous beverage, and finding me in a sound sleep had hesitated for some time whether to awaken me. Finally resolving the point to suffer from an attack of nightmare, refused, on denial, my "night-cap" and the hearty supper of the night before.

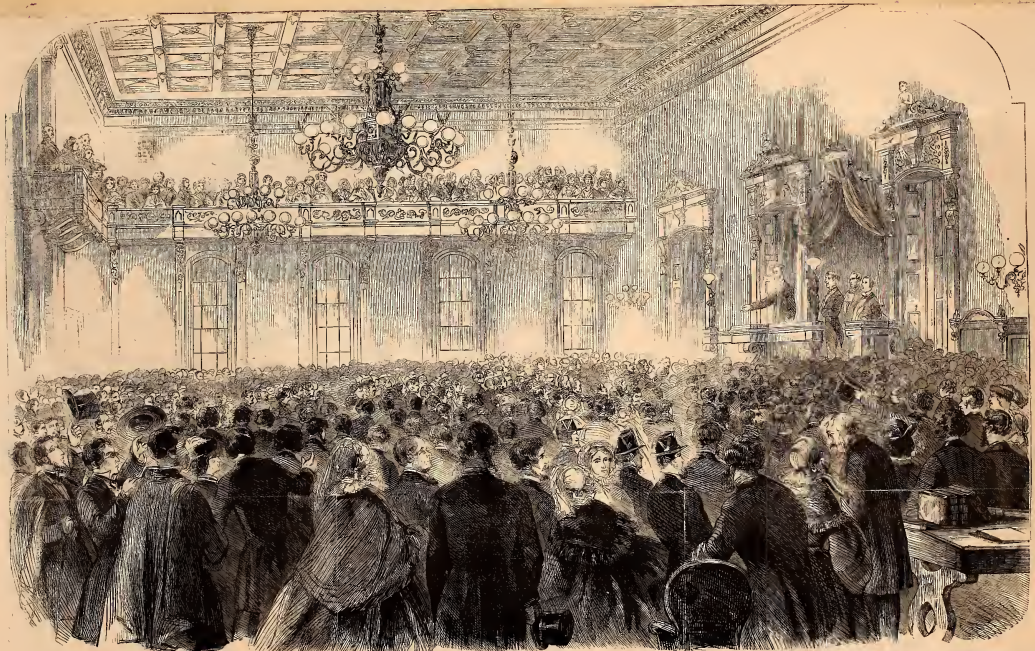
PERSONAL.

HOR has been the unhappy effect of our editorial troubles upon travel, that the proprietors of that fine hotel, the Girard House, Philadelphia, have announced their intention of closing it on the 15th inst.

The Buffalo Courier says that Capt. Dominie, who commands, in the name of the Federal Government, the steamer Michigan, on the Northern Lakes, is the whose mysterious disappearance some three or four years ago caused so much sensation. It is supposed that he left the steamboat in a fit of insanity, and was with whom she clinged. They are living in Florence.

Mr. Freeman Gooch, the well-known engraver, has nearly finished the marble rectangular standard for the remains of Henry Clay. It is of fine white marble.

The complete edition of Shorey and Wilkes' portrait works are published in the text and elegant blue and gold paper, at seventy-five cents per number. Either of these books can be had (free of prices) by remitting seventy-five cents, to accept, to the above address, and then 100, 150, 200, 250, 300, 350, 400, 450, 500, 550, 600, 650, 700, 750, 800, 850, 900, 950, 1000, 1050, 1100, 1150, 1200, 1250, 1300, 1350, 1400, 1450, 1500, 1550, 1600, 1650, 1700, 1750, 1800, 1850, 1900, 1950, 2000, 2050,



THE PRESIDENTIAL JOURNEY—RECEPTION OF THE PRESIDENT IN THE HALL OF THE LEGISLATURE OF COLUMBUS, OHIO—THE SENATE AND LEGISLATURE IN JOINT SESSION.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST TRAVELLING IN THE PRESIDENTIAL TRAIN.—SEE PAGE 225.

SCENES ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND,

Charleston Harbor, S. C.

OUR Artist, with our Correspondent, while on a visit to the Richland Guards, stationed on Sullivan's Island, made many charming sketches during his ten days' delightful sojourn with that gentlemanly and hospitable troop.

Of the sketches which we select this week, one represents the officers of the Richland Guards enjoying a sociable hour after dinner on the spacious verandah which encircles their quarters.

The other illustrates an incident which befell our Artist and Correspondent. They were proceeding with the officer of the night to visit the several posts, when they were suddenly challenged by a sentry, who demanded the countersign. They were, to use a familiar phrase, "stumped," having strayed apart from their companion, but they were relieved from their difficulty by the arrival of their friend, who gave the necessary password.

"Pass Frank Leslie's Artist and Correspondent!" said the challenger, and they passed.

The scene was one of rare beauty and interest.

THE RICHLAND RIFLES ESCORTING THE "AFRICO-INDIAN-MAN," AT THEIR QUARTERS ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND, CHARLESTON HARBOR, S. C. FROM A SKETCH TAKEN IN THE SPOT BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST NOW IN CHARLESTON.

THE GLINCH RIFLES

Review on the Parade Ground of the Arsenal, Augusta, Ga.

OUR Artist was fortunately present when Captain C. A. Platt reviewed the Glinch Guards, and we engrave his sketch of this interesting incident. The parade ground of the Augusta Arsenal is one of the finest in America, being nearly a mile square. It is well laid out, and overlooks the city and surrounding country. The view is splendid.

The Glinch Rifles are famous for their efficiency, and considered one of the best Companies in the State, holding the right of the Battalion Volunteer Companies.

They are named after General Glinch, the father of Major Anderson's wife. It was reorganized in 1851 by Captain S. C. Wilson, a veteran of the Florida War. It is at present commanded by Captain C. A. Platt.

CONGRESS OF THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY

Its Session at Montgomery, Alabama.

SHOULD the present unhappy difficulties not be arranged, the meeting of the First Congress of the Southern Confederacy will become an historical event of the highest importance. We therefore present to our readers a sketch of this memorable assemblage in full detail. In another part of our paper we have detailed the Inauguration of President Davis.

VISIT TO GARIBALDI.

IN connection with the two pictures in our last number, representing the island home of Garibaldi, the following letter from a Scotch gentleman, who has recently paid the Liberator a visit, will be found interesting. It is dated from the Island of Magnilcen, the nearest point to Caprera. The writer is Mr. John M'Adam, of Glasgow:

"I found the truly great man surrounded by his own family, his brother, a frank, hardy sea captain, and a few friends, discussing freely the incidents of the times, on which occasion, as on every other, he showed rare affluence of mastery. I was welcomed by Garibaldi in a manner which becomes a great man, and puts a plain man like myself at ease. He did honor to the good men who had sent me on this mission, when he placed me at every meal next himself, and spoke to me as he had so one of the two in his own room. I accepted this honor proudly and gratefully—pride in the country of Garibaldi could not speak too often, for the moral side is more than the material assistance, which it had rendered to Italy—and with gratitude to my countrymen who had sent me this substance of their sublime interest in time and humanity to the sorrowing exile. Seeing that he was somewhat occupied with the numerous morning receipt of letters, I left him with his two secretaries, to take a turn survey of his island home. And as you are aware of the approximate entertained in Britain as to any sudden attack on him, I examined on the highest dividing ridges to see whether facilities existed for his enemies from the opposite coast. The position is high, at the top of any body of men being found daring enough to attack him in front, and by any other way it would take a body of men hours to work their way, even in daylight, over the granite rocks, which, seaworn and honeycombed to their very middle, are evidently of volcanic origin.

"During the day the General was very much engaged, but towards evening he mixed with his friends, and conversed freely; and when by ourselves in his own room, feeding with his pets—his only inmate—he spoke feelingly and warmly for the British people, and the stand made by Lord John Russell in favor of Italy. After supper, more writing, then to bed, where for hours he sat dictating to his two secretaries. I dropped over to sleep, and when I awakened all was quiet; but some hours before day he was at work with them again, and so continued until the hours after daybreak. I mention this merely to explain how much he has to do, and to excuse him for any disappointment in his correspondents. Signora Teresa, the General's daughter, is a very pleasant and unaffected young lady, but she speaks no English, neither does her brother Menotti; he is taller than his father, has very much the look of a fine young sailor, is hired shirt and trousers, not dark, complexion; he bids fair to be a very strong man, is now twenty years of age, and you are aware he is already distinguished himself in the late campaign. Nothing pleased me more than his modesty and self-possession in the various circumstances which I saw him placed in among his father's friends, both at home and elsewhere. When I left the General, he bade me assure my friends that he hoped for better times to come among them, and that he took them for what they had done for his country, and he thank Joseph Cowen and the men of Tyneside for his sword and the telescope, which he has used through all the battles. I will reserve his remarks on the present circumstances of Europe for the consideration of the committee for whom I am acting; suffice it for the public that he is anxious but hopeful."

LADY FRANKLIN AT PANAMA.

ON the 21st ult. the United States steamer St. Louis arrived in this port, sixty days from New York, with Lady Franklin, wife of the late Sir John Franklin, and her niece, Miss Cracroft, on board. On the 23d her Ladyship visited Aspinwall, and met with a most cordial reception from Col. Totten and other gentlemen belonging to the Panama Railroad Company. She was well pleased with her trip across the Isthmus; and also visited the Island of Tobago, which is about nine miles distant from this city. On the evening of her arrival, Com. Wm. D. Porter, in company with some of his officers, visited on her Ladyship, and offered his boat to her service, for which she expressed her thanks, and remarked that she would like to pay a visit to Old Panama on the 25th. On that morning Com. Porter sent his gig alongside of the St. Louis, in charge of his secretary, and at eleven o'clock Lady Franklin, her niece, and Miss Cracroft embarked. The gig then returned to the St. Marys, and her commander joined the party. The day was exceedingly warm, but the boat did not seem to affect her ladyship, as she kept up a most lively conversation, and seemed in excellent spirits. There was a very heavy swell in the bay, and it was an impossibility for her ladyship to disembark, for, on her trying to extend the share of Old Panama, her surf arose to such an extent that any boat would have been dashed to pieces if it ventured to land. Com. Porter gave orders to keep the boat in as close as practicable to shore, for the purpose of showing her ladyship the ruins of Old Panama. At this time Miss Cracroft was desirous that the boat's head be kept to the surf, on which her ladyship wisely remarked, "If the boat is headed to the surf there is no cause to fear." She was delighted with the scenery and ruins, and remarked not the least deserted while the boat was plunging through the surf which was running very high. She was pleased as well as interested in information given by Com. Porter in regard to New Granada. The party returned to Panama City when there was a carriage in waiting to receive her ladyship and Miss Cracroft. When expressing the ride to Com. Porter and his secretary for their attention, &c., while visiting Old Panama, Com. Porter remarked, "Lady Franklin, we sailors must pay attention to the ladies' wishes." Her ladyship spent the rest of the day in driving around Panama and its suburbs, and unfortunately the carriage broke down, and on a gentleman expressing his fears for her safety she laughingly replied, "Oh, it is nothing; I am used to such accidents, as I have met with them frequently!" Fortunately neither of the ladies were hurt by this mishap. On the 24th her ladyship visited the flagship Lancaster, and was much pleased with the vessel, and expressed a desire to hear the band play the "Star Spangled Banner." which was performed in a manner to excite the praise of her ladyship and Miss Cracroft. On the 25th the St. Louis sailed for Aspinwall, when her ladyship and niece embarked. Before her ladyship left Panama she presented Mrs. Col. Totten, Mrs. Com. Porter, and Captain's Secretary on board, with a book, and one to Capt. Graham of H.B.M.S. Mutine.

"THE ROMANCE OF TWO WORLDS.

ABOUT the year 1837, Sir John Fenwick, of Fenwick Hall, England, married Clara Seymour. She was the daughter of a poor Cumberland clergyman, and of course brought to the union neither money nor inheritance. But she was beautiful and accomplished, and for seventeen years her husband loved her with a most passionate love. But at the end of that time two events took place, the result of which they had long hoped for—the death of his only son and heir, the true hero of this story—permitted Sir John and his wife to be confessed to the then but not won the offspring, not of her husband, but of a foreigner with whom, even during her husband's life, he had intrigued at Paris. Overlooking in his rage the obvious interest his sisters had in deceiving him, Sir John banished Clara Fenwick and son from his house. The former, after many pecuniary vicissitudes, died, leaving previously as at her wish to be a settled one, to act as an extensive ranch or farm on the borders of Texas. While residing there he was carried into captivity by the Indians, from whom he escaped, penniless and half naked; and we next find him in a lawyer's office, and subsequently the editor of a Texas Liberal newspaper. Here he made his brother's wrongs and his own claims known, was taken in hand by the British Consul, and ultimately by that gentleman introduced to the Prince of Wales, who, being convinced of the truth of his story, took him to England. Arrived there, John Fenwick, the younger, proceeded at once to Fenwick Hall, and there made himself known to the old man dead and that the other was fast dying, and in her agony of penitence or terror had confessed the existence of her son. The latter, on hearing her died, and the hero of this story, now Sir John Fenwick, Bart., writes most affectionately to his American friend, and invites him to be heir of them, and in his letter to its most favored of them says: "The property I send you will, I hope, entirely clear you of debt and make you independent for life."

FORTY MEN LOST IN THE SNOW IN ENGLAND.

PERHAPS no more severe weather was ever experienced on the Yorkshire moors than that which prevailed during the last week. The snowstorms were continuous and heavy, generally accompanied with thunder; and in some of the valleys the drifts of snow are still twenty feet deep. All traffic was stopped, and the carriers and grooms were driven off the moors by storms, and were picked up in the streets of Halton half dead with cold and hunger. Vast numbers of crows and other birds are found dead.

The works on the Rocedale railway, now in course of formation, have been entirely suspended, and the laborers reduced to great distress. Forty of them men were driven from the works to seek shelter at the Eskhit Hotel, on the bleak moors, where it seems they were snowed over and could not escape. Their continued absence caused a search party to set off on the moors, and by dint of great labor a passage was made to the hills, where, on the door being opened, the poor fellows were found in a very exhausted condition. They had been prisoners for two days and nights, and had eaten their last provisions and used their last fuel.

THE WINTER IN LONDON.

THE scene on the Serpentine on Wednesday night was even more striking than any we had before witnessed. Nearly 1,000 yards, from the cascade to the bridge, were studded with tents, amusement ground, sweets, military contest tents, fires in large iron machines for "dwelling" cheap steaks, &c. Thousands of persons formed themselves into processions, headed by a band of bell ringers and a brass band, the after passing up and down the river for some time, while others going through some extraordinary evolutions, such as fast skating, "Highland fling," reels, and so "Female Volunteer Battle Race," &c., the whole party returned at "railway speed" to the east end of the river, and leaving formed themselves into military companies, they went through various exercises, and at length the word of command was to "advance." The ladies, the gentlemen and the regular then wheeled first to the right, then to the left, and, having formed themselves into an immense square, the spirit of the night began. Royal salute having been fired, the belligerents on the brave band struck up "God save the Queen," after which fire-works, consisting of rockets, Roman candles, crackers, squibs, &c., were discharged at one time. The first attack, as the enemy came on, was upon the spectators on the north and south shores, and several persons were singed by the fire-works which fell upon the fore and aft decks. A great number of rockets were also discharged over the river, and to the Receiving House with cat-tails, the latter to the extent of inches thick.

MOONLIGHT SCENE ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND, CHARLESTON HARBOR.—THE SENTRY CHALLENGING FRANK LESLIE'S SPECIAL ARTIST AND CORRESPONDENT, WHO WERE GUESTS OF THE RICHLAND RIFLES.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST NOW IN CHARLESTON.

A new fashion in ladies' stockings has come out in England. They are of woollen or cotton, but are parti-colored, as red and white, red and black, mauve and grey. When contrasting in color with the dress, the effect is said to be very pretty.

MARINE compasses used on board screw steamers are now made to float on glycerine, as being least affected by heat or cold, and less injurious to the copper hemisphere in which the compass case is made first.

JOSEPH YEARS, of Providence, is willing to subscribe $1,000, if nineteen others will subscribe a like sum, to try the experiment of raising cotton in United Africa.

A "general service of funerals" in France is conducted by a company in Paris, incorporated by law, managed by a director, with a fixed tariff of prices.

THERE are one thousand one hundred and two newspapers and four hundred and eighty-one magazines now published in Great Britain. Nearly one-half of the latter have a religious character.

MR. STAVELY, of Philadelphia, is now in Europe, attempting to introduce his plan of a fast line steamer, six hundred feet long, seventy-six wide, with two paddle engines, separate, and placed at the sides, and one screw at the stern under the centre. He proposes, with such a vessel, to cross the Atlantic in 36 hours. He is also the inventor of the marine governor, which works equally well whether sails it bows or stern.

WHAT IS IN A NAME?—From a description of the "Chinese Capital" is extracted the following selection of names of Parish streets: Peddlebibs-street, Dog-and-bitch-court, Cat-and-mouse-street, Barbarian-street, Board-of-Punishment-street, Dog-leg-lane, Bandy-legged-walk, Obedience-street, Water-wheel-street, Cow's-horn-bend-street, Cow's-tail-street, Cow's-mouth-street, Rattan-street, Goddess-of-Mercy-Temple-street, Mutton-street, Sugar-place-street, Old-servant-street, Pine-dove's-Immaculate-conception-street, Proboscis-street, Handkerchief-street, Stone-tiger-street.

AMERICAN invention continues to resort to the English patent office. Provisional protection for six months has been given to H. Bessemer, and B. R. Norton, of New York, for an improved archer's bow and bow-gun; to C. G. Harford, of Washington, for an instrument to improve the sense of hearing; to T. How, of Massachusetts, for an improved construction of fire-arms; to G. Holland, of Connecticut, for an improvement in clewing, reefing and working fore-and-aft to E. L. Green, of Massachusetts, for machine work on boot and shoe heels; to William Schmidt, of New York, for an improvement in pedestrary machines, and the application of them to raising water. No patents have yet been given to R. Shaler, of Connecticut, in his application relative to improved fire-proof safes.

PLACE on a sheet of white paper a piece of blue silk about four inches in diameter, in the sunshine; cover the centre of this with a piece of yellow silk about three inches in diameter, and the centre of this with a piece of pink silk about two inches in diameter; and finally cover the pink silk again with another circle of green silk about one inch in diameter, and cover the centre of the green silk with a circle of indigo about half an inch in diameter; in the centre of the whole make a hole with a pen. Then look steadily for a minute, on this central spot, and closing your eyes, put your hand about an inch distant before them, and you will appear to see the most beautiful color of colors that imagination can conceive, which colors will appear not only different from the colors of the silk, but will keep perpetually changing.

THE LATE DUKE OF NORFOLK.—His courtship and marriage have to the Russian court. Peerage. Travelling in Greece, when a young man, he was attacked with a dangerous fever. Sir E. Lyons, then British Minister to Athens, had the young nobleman removed to the house of Mary, where he found an affectionate and devoted nurse in Sir Edmund's youngest daughter, then in her seventeenth year. When, by care, health and strength, the young patient drank in delicious draughts of a potion prepared by his fair nursing "archer god." When the young heir to the ducal house sought an interview with Sir Edmund, that high-minded and honorable papa refused to sanction his suit. Sir Edmund did more—he immediately wrote to the parents of his guest, expressing his regret at what had occurred, and his conviction that the heir of the great house of Norfolk ought to find a consort in a nobler and older family than his own. He added that the young traveller was now well enough to be removed from Athens, and suggested that parents should be immediately made for his return home. The parents of the young man highly approved of Sir Edmund's conduct, the patient returned to England, and it was hoped that time and absence would do the rest. But the lover displayed a noble constancy, and found means to overcome the objections of his family to the marriage, which was accordingly solemnized in 1839, the bridegroom being then in his twenty-fourth year, and the bride only eighteen. The union has been a happy one, has been blessed by offspring, and the eldest son, now in his thirteenth year, is Duke of Norfolk. He will be brought up as a strict Catholic.

THE BINDING OF FRANK LESLIE'S NEWSPAPER.

We can now furnish uniform covers for Vol. 10 of the newspaper, in black muslin gilt, for fifty cents, or by mail, prepaid, for seventy cents. Also for title, copious index and list of engravings, price five cents; or taken by subscribers, by mail, eighty cents. No. 19 City Hall Square, New York.

Only Twenty-five Cents a Bottle.

Superior Old Tom or London Cordial

GIN,

Distilled under the immediate superintendence of Dr. Ritter, of London, for medicinal and private use.

DELICIOUS & GLADDING.

67 Cortlandt St., N. Y.

For sale by nearly all druggists and grocers in the city, and in most country towns. Also by A. S. PANCOAST, 305 Broadway, Agent for the Proprietors. 000

CASSELL'S

Illustrated History of England.

THE TEXT BY J. F. SMITH, ESQ. TO THE BEGIN OF EDWARD I., AND FROM THAT PERIOD,

By William Howitt.

In Fortnightly Parts at Twelve Pence, 25 cts.; Monthly Parts at One Shilling, 25 cts.; or in Volumes, 50 cts. each.

The Work will be issued in Monthly Parts, of six months' credit and twenty four pages each. The price of each vol. is 50 cents. Twenty Folios for the whole work.

"A splendid work. It will be an invaluable library."—New York Observer.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN, 37 Park Row.

The Union Clothes Dryer.

A New Invention—Useful, Cheap and Durable.

By which Clothes in large quantities may be dried in a yard, in room, or on the roof of a house. Can be hung and taken down in one minute without disturbing the lines. When not in use it can be compressed into a small compass and kept in a closet. No family should be without this novelty.

Price only $1 00 to $2 00.

The Union Clothes Dryer is pronounced by all unprejudiced persons to be one of the most useful and labor-saving inventions of the age.

J. JOHNSON & CO., Proprietors,
467 Broadway (near Canal St.), New York, and 322 Fulton St., Brooklyn. 000

Shaler's Flexible Roller Patent Floor Skates.

The use of these Skates requires a perfect knowledge of the art of skating on ice, as well as furnishing the most pleasing and healthful exercise ever presented to the public. Directions of Leaders in this city have become part of the Skate sent by the use of them.

The only place for the genuine article is 686 Broadway, N. Y. Call and see them, or send for a circular.

C. SHALER.

000

L. DUBERNET & CO.,

Manufacturers of

Passe-Partouts and Fancy Frames,

544 Broadway, between Spring and Prince Sts., New York.

482 Gal. Henry, Walnut and Oak Frames always on hand. 000

L. DUBERNET. J. DUBERNET.

ESTABLISHED 1843.

BOGLE'S CELEBRATED HYPERION FLUID

Is the best known preparation for the growth, restoration and beautifying of the hair in the world. To wise have been deceived by imitations, this caution is given. Sold by druggists and dealers.

W. BOGLE'S

Hyperion Hair and Toilet Store,

212 Washington St., Boston, and for sale everywhere.

Constitution Water,

THE ONLY KNOWN REMEDY for Diabetes, Irritation of the Kidneys, and Calculus, Irritation of the Bladder, and Gravel and Stone, of Painful Urinating Stone in the Bladder, Diabetes, Gravel, Brick-dust Deposit and Mucous or Milky Deposits. Price $1.

W. H. COCKE & CO., Proprietors.

MORGAN & ALLEN, General Agents,

No. 46 Cortlandt St., New York.

Price $1 per Bottle. 275-78

The Early Physical Degeneracy of American People,

AND THE EARLY MELANCHOLY DECLINE OF CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH.

Just published by

DR. STONE,

Physician to the Trey Lung and Hygienic Institute.

A Treatise on the above subject, the cause of Nervous Debility, Insanity and Consumption, a Warning of the Vital Fluids, the mysterious and hidden causes for Pulpitation, Impotency and Dyspepsia.

This is a book thrilling book, and is the most startling work ever published. It is more than ten thousand times of this class of medical medicine. It has been written from conscientious and philanthropic motives, and appeals most confidently to Parents. Guardians and to Youth, for it details timely aid to restore the shining SHATTERED WRECK, and a desire to steal the shadow and pacify childhood. Send two red stamps and obtain this masterly effort.

Full rot to Send and get this Book.

ADDRESS

DR. ANDREW STONE,

Physician to the Trey Lung and Hygienic Institute, and Physician for Diseases of the Heart, Throat and Lungs, No. 96 Fifth St., Troy, N. Y.

Compound Syrup of Phosphates

OR CHEMICAL FOOD,

Composed of the Phosphates of Lime Soda, Potassa and Iron.

This preparation was introduced by Professor Horsford, of the University of Pennsylvania, and has been extensively used with very gratifying results. 000

It is not intended as a popular remedy, but is especially adapted to the cure of those diseases which arise from a want of the proper elements of which the human body is composed. Upon examination it will be seen that the phosphates are the elements which enter into the animal, and does not contain by powerful acid.

The following testimony are a judiciously we give the existence of such testimonial, viz: 1½ grains at Prescription of from 2 grains of Lime, 2 of Soda, 1½ grains Phos. of Potassa, 2 grains Phos. of Soda, and 2 grains free Phos. Acid.

Manufactured by Blair & Myers, Philadelphia, for the trade of WILLIAM FLAZIER & CO., No. 74 Broadway, New York. 000

Diseases of the Throat and Lungs.

BY R. T. TRALL, M. D.

There is no doubt that the author has clearly traced the very prevalent and rapidly increasing class of diseases to their true origin, and pointed out the best and the only means of their prevention or cure. The style is concise, clear, distinctive, therefore, of the little book can hardly fail to be thoroughly understood by all. While in teaching, it is generally adopted by society, would at once arrest the fearful loss of consumptive life, and by its wise counsels, with new theories, are long, is rare, if not astonishing, and unfortunate.

In Contents contained: Preliminary Remarks—Forms of Consumption—Other Affections of the Throat and Lungs—Causes of Consumption in the United States—Symptoms of Consumption—Premonitions of Consumption—Premonitions of Consumption—Progress—Duration—Complications—Temperature and Climate—Clothing—Diet—Drinking—Exercise—Bathing—Sleeping—Medicine—Medicinal Agents—Inhalation—Surgery—Prevention.

Price 50 cents, or 15 cents.

FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA

Delicate Females and Young Children.

This famous purifier of the Blood is the cheapest, safest and best alterative and curative medicine they can take. Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton St., New York.

"HEALTH AND HAPPINESS IN THE SAME SADDLE."

—N. P. Willis.

From the Home Journal.

"Of all the child fashions we have ever seen, no article combines so many of those two requisites—health and happiness—as the Adjustable Patent Reel Spring Seat. The little fellow in the picture, Master A. Cranden, of Jersey City, is a common rocking-horse, as children's fancy will make it, and the spring seat, but unseen from on the outside, is so elastic that it is impossible to believe that the child never moves off it."

Sold by R. RINDSKOPF, Sole Manufacturer,

478 Broadway, New York.

DIRECTIONS FOR ADJUSTING.—Open the seat and the base sufficiently to allow the axle to go in its place; but raise or lower the front to suit the child.

Price $5 00.

Every Machine is warranted for one year. 275

EMPLOYMENT FOR ALL.—HOW TO MAKE MONEY.—SECRETS REVEALED!—Any person wanting the schoolboy treasure (worth ten times its postage stamp), will receive by return mail a book containing more than a hundred MOST VALUABLE SECRETS. H. V. CARRINGTON, Baltimore, Md. 275

NERVOUS DEBILITY OR SPERMATORRHŒA.—HOW CURED.—Sufferers of all nervous complaints, whether from excesses, Consult an "Old Physician," who has had a practice extending over twenty years, and will receive from that disease and restored the sick and suffering to perfect health. Nervous and Debilitated Males should not delay one moment before consulting him. Before commencing ANY medical treatment send your address to Box 179, Cincinnati, O. 275-78

Perfumes! Perfumes! Perfumes!

609 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The most delightful and genuine liquid and dry Perfumes for the present season, comprising the fragrance of the perfect and latest flowers, as well as the most favorite Bouquets.

HOUBIGANT'S EXTRACTS.

BRIDAL BOUQUET. JAPONICA.

Also, Concentrated Flavoring Extracts, for Pies, Puddings, &c.

French Brushes, the most approved food for infants.

Genuine Jelly, for chapped Skin. Chemical Barley Sugar Cure Plaster, an infallible cure for Corns and Bunions.

To be had, wholesale and retail, at No. 609 Broadway.

EUGENE DUFFY,

Chemist and Druggist.

The Greatest Number of the Budget yet.

JUST PUBLISHED,

NO. 23 OF

Frank Leslie's

BUDGET OF FUN,

BEING THE NUMBER FOR THE FIRST OF MARCH.

Its Illustrations are Serial, Political, Comical, Satirical and Original. Every Current Subject or Topic it hit off to a touch.

THE GRAND COMIC CARTOON

Is a masterpiece of Truth and Fiction, both so admirably blended that, Fact, Fancy and Comic Art, there is nothing where one ends and the other begins. It represents the Inauguration Procession at the Capitol, with President Abraham Lincoln (recently elected) at the head, carried shouldered him (taken on the steps) at that minute when Jefferson Davis and the Seven Cotton States, with the convenient hoss he be wedding by Buchanan, who expected to find the minister Plenipotentiary. There are also other political cuts equally good, and decidedly better, such as

Abe Lincoln Knocking Around on the Head,

GOVERNOR PICKENS SEEKING FOR ANDERSON TO TAKE A FOD,

Besides others too numerous to mention. In addition to these four epic Comic Cartoons there are Sixteen Pages of the very best Humorous Literature of the age, among which are two Great Romances.

The Finest Girl of Bloomsbury

AND

THE COMIC DEMON.

Such has been the success of

Frank Leslie's

BUDGET OF FUN

That an circulation exceeds that of all the other Comic Papers combined.

The BUDGET OF FUN is published at

Frank Leslie's Publication Office,

19 City Hall Square, New York.

Price Six Cents a Copy.

Dr. Marshall's Headache and Catarrh Snuff

HAS proved itself to many physicians and hundreds of patients to believe to be the only yet known for curing the Catarrh, Cold in the Head, the Headache, Nervous and other affections, purges out all obstructions, strengthens the Glands and gives a healthy action to the whole system. Sold by druggists generally. Dr. Marshall's HEADACHE SNUFF, is on every bottle. Sold by all Druggists. 272-84

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY Organent will force them to grow heavily in 16 to 40 days. Smooth faces need not apply without skin or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any part of the country. Address

A. G. GRAHAM, 100 Nassau Street, New York.

Reader,

PERUSE the following statement and then judge of the facts for yourself:

MESSRS. HOWARD, NORTON, & Co., a well-known citizen of this city, formerly Sylvester Graham, of Boston, who has been afflicted with Asthma for seven years, which baffled all medical skill, and was pronounced incurable, has been induced from the wonderful success of Dr. Sherman, who has been restored to health in a few weeks. After an interval of some months he has had a return of his disease.

Geo. W. Cross, of Harmony, Texas, had an eruption on his neck, shoulders, back and legs, which covered about one-third of his body. It kept the parts affected covered with a watery fluid, which dried and formed scales. The troublesome eruption has left no scars. Dozens of letters of this nature can be produced, and kept him in constant suffering. All vaunted and false pills could be found. Agent's Genuine Extract Sarsaparilla, which cured him. See what this shows some cases from the Messrs., but it is otherwise as clear as an island.

Mr. Wm. Lee, of the well-known lawyer of Richmond, Va., took a cold which settled on his lungs, and caused a cough, which he took no notice of, but which finally developed into a confirmed consumption. When ordered very low he commenced taking Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and was stopped from dying.

Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine. 275-76

Tiffany & Co.,

LATE

TIFFANY, YOUNG & ELLIS,

Fine Jewellery, Precious Stones, Watches, Silver Ware Bronzes, Clocks, Rich Porcelain Articles of Art and Luxury

No. 550 Broadway, New York.

Rooms of Paris, TIFFANY, ROBERTS & CO.

Do You Want Whiskers?
Do You Want Whiskers?
Do You Want Whiskers?
DO YOU WANT WHISKERS?
DO YOU WANT WHISKERS?
DO YOU WANT WHISKERS?
Do You Want a Moustache?
Do You Want a Moustache?
DO YOU WANT A MOUSTACHE?
DO YOU WANT A MOUSTACHE?
DO YOU WANT A MOUSTACHE?
IF SO, USE

The Subscribers take pleasure in announcing to the citizens of the United States that they have obtained the agency for, and are now enabled to offer to the American public, the above justly celebrated and world-renowned article.

The Stimulating Onguent

Is prepared by Dr. C. P. Bellingham, an eminent physician of London, and is recommended by him as the best article of

WHISKERS OR A MOUSTACHE

in from three to six weeks. The article is the only one of the kind used by the French, and in London and Paris it is in universal use.

It is a beautiful, economical, soothing yet stimulating compound, acting, as it does upon the roots, causing a beautiful growth of luxuriant hair. This is the only remedy based upon which has ever been presented to the public, for promoting a healthy growth of the hair on

PHYSIOLOGICAL PRINCIPLES,

PHYSIOLOGICAL PRINCIPLES,

BALD HEAD OR BARE FACE.

BALD HEAD OR BARE FACE.

Persons having tried the various preparations now floating the country, and having been deceived by them, should not be discouraged, but try one box of which is warranted to do all that is claimed for it.

BELLINGHAM'S ONGUENT,

BELLINGHAM'S ONGUENT,

BELLINGHAM'S ONGUENT,

If applied to the roots of the eyebrows, and eause to grow, it will cause the hair upon a bare crown of new form. Applied according to directions, it will force out of every hair root and restore crop hair to its original color—leaving it soft, smooth and flexible.

The Onguent is an indispensable article to every gentleman's toilet, and after one week's use they would not for any consideration be without it.

The Subscribers are the only Agents for the article in the United States, to whom all orders must be addressed.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR A BOX.

PRICE $1 A BOX.

PRICE $1 A BOX.

Send the following from the New York Herald.

"ATTENTION, YOUNG MEN."

We perceive by the advertisement of Messrs. Heenan & Co., of No. 24 William St., this city, that the renowned "Stimulating Onguent," invented by Dr. Bellingham, for a healthy stimulation in the growth of beard or whiskers, has now all at once become a perfect success in their economy. The high reputation of the article in London, Paris and other cities of Europe where it has been long patronized by experience in this country. It does not require any extraordinary length of time to test its merits, and to prove the results required of it in the growth of beard or whiskers. The British Volunteers have made such free use of it to attract the attention of the Prince of Wales. See advertisement of Messrs. HEENAN & CO., in another column.—Herald, Sunday, Feb. 17, 1861.

And from the Sunday Times.

A REMARKABLE SUCCESS.—The onguent of Bellingham has, in her time, and the country, of a more or less degree, which are tested according to the merits of the whiskers they are intended to produce, for more or less the side of reason and common sense, and, in reducing the beard to a correct shape, &c., moreover to be appointed. But in some cases nature refuses to produce the desired results. However, after all, in here is her aid, with Bellingham's Stimulating Onguent, a preparation warranted to produce a short moustache or whiskers in a few weeks. The preparation may be had at Heenan & Co.'s, No. 24 William st.—Sunday Times, Feb. 17, 1861.

Try one Box, you will never regret the Investment.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Or a Box of the Onguent (warranted to have the desired effect), will be sent by mail (free of charge), by first class), securely packed, on receipt of price and postage, 13 25. Apply to or address

HORACE L. HEGEMAN & CO.,
Druggists, &c., No. 24 William St., corner Exchange Place, N. York.

$100,000
IN FURNITURE,
At a Great Sacrifice,
BY DEGRAAF & TAYLOR.

Owing to the great decline in our Southern wholesale trade, leaving an immense surplus stock on hand, we have concluded to offer the whole

At Retail! At Cost!!

FOR THE NEXT THIRTY DAYS,

At either of our three stores, No. 82 Bowery, No. 469 Fourth Street and No. 141 Bowery.

The Monarch of the Monthlies!

FOR MARCH, 1861.

JUST PUBLISHED, NO. 3, VOL. VIII., OF

FRANK LESLIE'S

MONTHLY,

With which is incorporated

THE GAZETTE OF FASHION.

Price 25 cts., or $3 per annum.

Literary.

Vernon Brent; or, The Wayward Course of Love—con cluded.
Lake Neuf. Engraving.
A Curious Betting on Coats. Engraving.
Original Receipts in Daily.
"Under the Rainbow."
Table Affairs.

A Will full at the Cups of Good Hope
Hunting in the Presence of Queen Pocahontas—Scorning Your Offer of H. S. Smithwick and A. G. Bradford. Four Engravings.
The Valley of Chamonix. Engraving.
My First Happy Christmas.
Be Not Too Wise. By Martha Baxter Bent.
Sam Bentley's Christmas. Two Engravings.
The Roman Carnival. Two Engravings.
The Coral Reef. Engraving.
The Gambler.
The Sorcerer's Story. Engraving.
The Old Homestead.
The Mysterious Stranger.
Lady Evelina.
The Valley of the Innocents. Two Engravings.
Chronology of the Month of March.
Sailor Life at Sea. Two Engravings.
Secret Quotations.
Amusements of the Young People.
Editorial Gossip.
Mr. Bentley's Visit With the Sea Sirens—by Henry C. Watson.
Wonders Of Memory—by Henry G. Weaver; The Ocean—by Cornie's story—Engraving; The Minstrel's Wedding.
Comic Pages.—The Model Husband. Six Engravings.

List of Engravings.

Lake Neuf.
A Curious Betting at 40 Coats.
Hunting in the Presence of Queen Pocahontas—Scorning Hunting in the Presence of Scorning Your Offer of H. S. Smithwick and A. G. Bradford. Four Engravings.
Sam Bentley's Christmas. Two Engravings.
The Coral Reef. Sam Bunting and Stubbards among the Fishes.
View of the Valley of Chamouni.
Prepping the Gondola.
Sam Bentley's Christmas—Bob wears Button on Old Bunting's Waistcoat; Wishes, not yet in a Savory Girl after Dinner.
Mistress in the Kitchen.
The Happy Boy obtaining possession of the Coral Ring.
The Country Cousin's Story—"I Love You."
The Country Cousin—Sympathizing.
The Valleyed the Innocents. Two Engravings.
Sailor Life at Sea—Amusements. Two Engravings.
Comic Pages.—The Model Husband. Six Engravings.

Gazette of Fashion.

Review of Fashions; Stylers for the Month; Description of Colored Plate; Things Not to be Worn; Gaiety in Old Fashions; Answers to Correspondents; Dressing for Style; Dress of Children; Fashion Notes; Fashion Paragraphs; Description of Needlework; Description of Wood Engravings; Ship Building by Machine; The Week's Story; Miscellaneous.

Illustrations to the Gazette.

Colored Fashion Plate; Woven Rested Bead for the Opera or Travelers; Pattern for Bridle Work singles in Oblongs, Stools, Bags, &c.; Border for a Table Cover; Letter for a Book; a Reading and Basket; Pattern for a Knitted Red Quilt; Pate Elections; Ornamental Ribbon Work; Pattern for Braiding Dress Trimmings; Pattern for Thread Basket; Child's Dress, in Cashmere; Alphabet, a Pattern for Embroidering Handkerchiefs.

Each number of the Magazine contains over 100 pages in size, and the Gazette of Fashion, of the size, contains nearly sixty beautiful Engravings, and a superb colored Plate, which alone is worth the price of the number.

Subscriptions will be received for the Gazette and Monthly, and $3 per annum, or $1 50 for each half year, or 25 cents for a single number. Up a list of Five Subscribers will be sent to one address.

The publication of the Magazine is three cents and must be paid in advance. Subscribers at the office where the Magazine is received.

FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

STEREOSCOPE CAMERAS, Chemicals, Apparatus and everything complete for making Stereoscopic Pictures, with instructions, $25. Pamphlets, Outfits, Stereoscopes, and Views, C. J. VEVEY, 81 Broadway, New York. 357-61

NERVOUS DEBILITY or Spermatorrhœa cured by a Remedy of all poisons employ the by nature and Curable in Diseases of the Urinary Organs. Pamphlets sent free. Invalids can be cure you. Before endorsing, send stamp and your address to Box 1456 Washington, D. C. 357-78

SILSBEE, CASE & CO.,
Photographic and Daguerreotype
ARTISTS,
290½ Washington Street, Boston.
Up but one flight of stairs.
S. M. SILSBEE, J. G. CASE, W. H. CRYCHELL
261-74

335 EMPIRE 335
SEWING MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
SALESROOM, NO. 335 BROADWAY.

This Machine is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism. It possesses many rare and valuable requirements—has been examined by the most proficient experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY AND PERFECTION COMBINED.

The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:

1. Liability to get out of tension.
2. Liability to get out of order.
3. Unsightly, irregular lines at times in repairing.
4. Incapacity to sew every description of material.
5. Unserviceable noise while in operation.

The Empire Sewing Machine

IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.

It has a straight needle, perpendicular motion, makes the stitch on the principle of the hand, and is the most natural to imitate and easily performed sewing on all descriptions of material, from Lutwer to the finest Nainsook Muslin, with cotton, linen or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest machine.

The Empire Sewing Machine can run warm, and the best possible tension, a rose as smooth as satin, and is EQUALLY ADAPTABLE A NOVELTIES MACHINE.

It requires very little more power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of twelve years of age can work it steadily, without fatigue or injury to health.

No stranger will ever learn, without a course of instruction, in order it cannot impossible to get out of order, and is guaranteed by the Company to give satisfaction in every particular.

We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a first-class Machine to call and examine this one before purchasing elsewhere.

Be in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of

MERCHANT TAILORS,
COACH MAKERS,
HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS,
SHIRT AND BOSOM MAKERS,
AND
CORSET-MAKERS,
GAITER STITCHERS,
SHOE-BINDERS,
VEST AND PANTALOON-MAKERS

Religious and Charitable Institutions

WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.

PRICE OF MACHINES COMPLETE

No. 1—Or Family Machine,.....$10
No. 2—Or Half the Manufacturing,.....45
No. 3—Large the Manufacturing,.....80

Agencies Established:

WILSON & CO., 162 North Ninth St., Philadelphia, Pa.
B. GRIFFIN, 33 Main st., Buffalo, N. Y.
J. M. BOYD, 372 River St., Troy, N. Y.
JAMES DOD, 40 Commercial Building, Cincinnati, Ohio

AGENTS WANTED.

300 T. J. MCARTHUR & CO.

Liquid and Extract Trisenor.

THIS genuine English preparation, purely vegetable, and pleasant to the taste, prepared by A. E. BRISTOL, M.D., Bristol, Lucas County, Ohio, is guaranteed to effectually eradicate all cases of secondary cases, Spermatorrhœa, &c., restoring the functions of either sexes or all, with no consuming perspiration. Extract Tamarin is a certain remedy for all cases for which mercury is unsuitable in any kind of disease, and is entirely free from the body. Price $1 per bottle or six bottles for $5. Sent by Express to any part of the country. All orders must be addressed to DR. W. S. HOWELL, No. 349 Bowery Street, New York City 350-78

To Nervous Sufferers.

A NEW Mechanical Appliance, for the cure of Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, &c., (with or without Medicine). Price $1. Sealed, free from notice, by Post. Address, World's Dispensary, Printing House Square, New York City. Country visits as per 350-78

Superior Pianofortes.

TWENTY GUINEAS, MANUFACTURER OF PIANOFORTES (With or without 7 Octaves), 421 High Holborn, London, W.C., between Seven and Three Acre, New York. Dealers and others are respectfully invited to call and examine my very superior instrument, which will sell less than usual, and equal to any in the market. Every instrument bears my name and address on the fall board, and is warranted for seven years. Pianofortes for hire, and if purchased within three years the amount paid for hire allowed in the price. 214 EXPORT CASES.

GREAT CURE.
Dr. Leland's
ANTI-RHEUMATIC BAND

Is the only known remedy for RHEUMATISM, GOUT and NEURALGIA, and a sure cure for all NERVOUS AFFECTIONS. It is conveniently arranged about each limb, and is worn with ease and comfort. Price $4 per set. It reaches by mail, through the post office, and will be sent to a purchaser. Medical cases are cured in a few days, and we are constantly receiving testimonials of the efficacy in unprecedented cases of rare standing.

Try it, or be tied of Pamphlet gratuitously, or can be sent by mail or express direct from the Principal.

DR. LELAND, 289 Broadway, New York.

6. SMITH & CO., Sole Proprietors.

N. B.—Prescriptions Carefully Made Here. Agents wanted every where. 256-78

CASSELL'S
Popular Natural History,
Profusely Illustrated with splendid Engravings,

IS PUBLISHED ON THE 1ST OF EVERY MONTH.

Parts, 24 pages and 1 Tinted Plate, 10 cts.
Double Parts, 48 pages and 2 Tinted Plates, 20 cts.
Sections, 192 pages and 4 Tinted Plates, 40 cts.
Volumes, 384 pages and 8 Tinted Plates, Embossed Cloth, Gilt Sides and Leaves, $2 50.

The work will complete in Four Volumes.

"Really a beautiful publication."—New York Tribune.

"Its illustrations are not only numerous, but exquisite."—Bristol (Mass.) Farmer.

"We commend this work to our readers."—Cincinnati Gazette.

"This will be a valuable work."—Boston Daily Gaz.

"For high praise cannot be exceeded for bringing out in excellent and attractive a work."—Concord Independent Democrat.

"Calculated to connect the reader and the most untutored inquirer."—Philadelphia American Presbyterian.

"Its illustrations are very interesting and invaluable work."—Falls (Virginia) Intelligencer.

CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN, 37 Park Row, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent in every city, town and county in the United States and Canada for a new patent article just invented. It requires a capital of from $3 to $5, and is profitable and permanent business. Agents are now making from $5 to $10 per day. For more information, address, with stamp for reply, ROOT, DEMUTH & CO.,
215 3m 45½ North St., Baltimore, Md.

Begio's Hair Dye and Wigs.

A Unsurpassed and unapproachable. Its operation is instantaneous. Its effects are permanent. Try the one, and you will use no other, and be convinced.

Begio's Restore for Dyeing Hair and Dying Wigs at No. 6 Astor House, Broadway, and Tabby Parlors, No. 202 Broadway, New York. Wigs and Toupees made to order by mail. Bottles postage stamp for every. 300

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE and GYMNASIUM
YONKERS, N. Y.

Winter Session commences on 1st day of Nov

TERMS:

Board and Tuition, $150 per Session.
For Circulars and particulars address, apply to
M. E. WINCHELL, Principal.
Yonkers, 1859 300

MATRIMONY MADE EASY; Or, How to WIN A LOVE.—Containing Hints, counsels and directions for the selection of a suitable married, preservation of age, and the parties, whether agreeable or disagreeable, is a new work, and the secret, when acted upon, cannot fail to secure any man happy wife or any woman a husband. Mailed free for 25 cents, in cash or postage stamps. Address T. WILLIAMS & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia Post Office, Box 2,500.

IMPORTANT INVENTION FOR MARRIED PEOPLE, or for persons about marrying. Sent by mail, in sealed envelopes, free of charge, for 25 cents. Address, DR. F. HARRISON, Surgeon and Accoucheur, 431 Broadway, New York. 274-78

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

PUBLISHED for the benefit and as a warning to young men who suffer from Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, and the Secret Habits of Youth, by one who early became a victim to great excesses. Single copies may be had of the author, HOWARD, 152 Fulton, Bedford, Kings County, N. Y., by inclosing a postpaid addressed envelope. 271-13

THE READERS OF
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper

Desiring to purchase any article in New York, no matter how trifling or costly, can have their orders promptly and carefully filled by addressing

JAMES W. FORTUNE,
Care of Frank Leslie, Esq.,
19 City Hall Square, N. Y.

In all cases the necessary funds should be inclosed in the communication.

WOOD, EDDY & CO.'S
LOTTERIES!
AUTHORIZED BY THE STATE OF DELAWARE,
MISSOURI
AND
KENTUCKY,

Draw daily, in public, under the superintendence of Sworn Commissioners.

☞ The Managers' Offices are located at Wilmington, Delaware, and St. Louis, Missouri.

PRIZES VARY FROM
$2 50 TO $100,000!
TICKETS FROM $2 50 TO $20.

☞ Circulars giving full explanations and the Schemes to be drawn, with cost, free of expense, by addressing

WOOD, EDDY & CO., Wilmington, Delaware,
or
WOOD, EDDY & CO. St. Louis, Missouri.

Cephalic Pills,
CURE
Sick Headache,
CURE
Nervous Headache,
CURE
All kinds of
Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache may be prevented; and if taken in the commencement of an attack immediate relief from pain and sickness will be obtained.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act gently upon the bowels, removing Costiveness.

For Lassitude, Dizziness, Spots before the eyes, and all persons of sedentary habits they are valuable as a Laxative, improving the appetite, giving tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have given relief and relieved vast amounts of pain and suffering from Headache whether originating in the nervous system or from a derangement of the Stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS!

The genuine have five signatures of Henry C. Spalding on each Box

Sold by Druggists and all other Dealers in Medicines.

A Box will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of the

PRICE, 25 CENTS.

all orders should be addressed to

HENRY C. SPALDING,
48 Cedar St., New York.

THE FOLLOWING INDORSEMENTS OF SPALDING'S

CEPHALIC PILLS

Will convince all who suffer from

HEADACHE

THAT A SPEEDY AND SURE CURE IS WITHIN THEIR REACH.

As these Testimonials were unsolicited by Mr. Spalding, they afford unquestionable proof of the Virtues of this truly scientific Discovery.

MANSFIELD, CONN., Feb. 3, 1861.

MR. SPALDING,—Sir—I have tried your Cephalic Pills, and I find them so valuable that you be sent to me without delay. I want them for myself and for the neighbors, to whom I recommend them. Send me a dozen by mail.

Yours truly,
JAMES KENNEDY.

HUNTSVILLE, Pa., Feb. 6, 1861.

MR. SPALDING,—Sir—I wish you to send me four more box of your Cephalic Pills. I have received a great deal of benefit from them. Yours respectfully,
MARY ANN BRICKHOUSE.

SPRING CREEK, HUNTSVILLE CO., Pa., Jan. 31, 1861.

H. C. SPALDING,—Sir—You will please send me two boxes of your Cephalic Pills. Send them immediately.
Respectfully yours, JNO. S. SIMONS.

P. S.—I have used one box of your Pills and find them excellent.

BELLE VERNON, GEO., Jan. 24, 1861.

HENRY C. SPALDING, Esq.—Please find inclosed twenty-five cents, for which send me another box of your Cephalic Pills. They are truly the best Pills I have ever tried. Direct A. SIMON, P. M.
Belle Vernon, Wyoming Co., O.

HUNTSBURY, MASS., Feb. 15, 1860.

H. C. SPALDING, Esq.—I wish for some Cephalic or long shoe bills, as we have used a Pills now in the neighborhood before my acquaintance. If you have anything of the kind, please send to me. Also, for any directions, who is subject to severe Sick Headache (usually lasting two days), use every of an attack of one hour by your Pills, which I found better.
Respectfully yours,
W. B. WILKES

N.B.—A single bottle of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE will last a family for many months. 25c

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE!

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE!

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE!

SAVE THE PIECES

ECONOMY! DESPATCH!

N.B.—A Brush accompanies each bottle. Price 25 cts.
Address HENRY C. SPALDING,
No. 48 Cedar St., New York.

CAUTION

As certain unprincipled persons are attempting to palm off on the unsuspecting public imitations of my PREPARED GLUE, I would caution purchasers to examine before purchasing, and see that the fac simile

N.B.—SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE, 25c is on the outside wrapper all others are a swindling counterfeit.

OLD ART.—"Oh, it's all well enough to say, that I must support the dignity of my high office by Force—but it's darned uncomfortable sitting—I can tell ye!."

JOY TO THE WORLD.
Clothes Washed in One Minute by
JOHNSON'S PATENT WASHING MACHINE.
Patented April 10
1860.
PRICE $8 TO $10.
A CHILD CAN OPERATE IT. Washes every piece in a tub perfectly without rubbing or boiling. Call and see it in operation at 421 Broadway, New York, and 313 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
T. JOHNSON & CO.,
Proprietors.

Patented November 1st, 1859.

No measure are
A, the distance
round the Neck.
B to H, the Yoke.
C to C. the Sleeve.
D to D, distance
around the Body
under the armpits
E to E the length of the Yoke.

BALLOU'S
Patented Improved French Yoke
SHIRTS.
Patented November 1st, 1859.
A New Style of Shirt, Warranted to Fit.

By reducing the above measure per inch we can guarantee a perfect fit of our new style of shirt, and return by Express many part of the United States, at $12, $15, $18, $21, &c., as per terms. We enter five-sided for less than half address blanks.

Also Importers and Dealers in MEN'S FURNISHING GOODS

BALLOU BROTHERS,
409 Broadway, N. Y.
Wholesale Trade supplied on the usual terms

Sheet Music Fifty per Cent below the Usual Price.

MUSIC DEALERS and Piano Teachers should send for a Catalogue of the latest sheet Music, published by C. H. PETERSON & CO., Agents, 439 Broadway, N. Y.
Any Piece Music worth of 75 cts., four at-page Pieces will be sent on Specimen Copies. 372-76o

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator,
FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.

For clearing and preventing Baldness.
For beautifying and making the Hair soft and curly.
For preventing Scurf and Dandruff.
For keeping the head cool and healthy.
It is unequaled as a dressing.
It contains no sugar and gum like articles.

Prof. L. Miller's Hair Invigorator.
Price 75 cents per bottle.
Wholesale Depot, 56 Dey St., New York.

PROF. L. MILLER'S INSTANTANEOUS LIQUID HAIR DYE
Price 50 cents per bottle.
Warranted superior to all others.
Try them, and you will subscribe to the above. 364-76o

CHARLES HEIDSIECK
CHAMPAGNE.
This popular Wine, of which the undersigned are SOLE AGENTS FOR NORTH AMERICA, Received the First Premium at the BORDEAUX EXPOSITION IN 1855
The Medal awarded by the Judges was so rare as not offer 0000 T. W. RAYAUD & BERARD, 100 Pearl St., N. Y

GARDINER'S
Rheumatic and Neuralgia
COMPOUND,
A certain, safe and permanent cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia and Sick Headache. It is an internal remedy, driving out and entirely eradicating the disease, requiring no change in diet or business, and may be taken by the most delicate persons of the most delicate constitutions with perfect safety.
Principal Depot, 41 King St., Boston, Mass. P. C. WELLS & CO., 718 Franklin St., New York, Wholesale Agents. Sold by Druggists everywhere. 279-87o

BILLIARD BALLS, Ivory and Patent Composed Ivory, at reduced prices. Manufactured and for sale by WM M. WELLING, 418 Broome St. Send for a Circular. 376-78o

$100 PER MONTH and all expenses paid! AGENTS WANTED, in the above salary, to introduce a new article, entered according to an Act of Congress, Feb 7, 1851. State Agencies may be secured by addressing the proprietors. MARSH & CO., 124 Court St., Boston, Mass. 218-76o

NEXT OF KIN WANTED.
All Families who are heir to property in foreign countries, or have ancestors who have died leaving property in any country, should apply at the Treasury Enclosed, and at the Banks of Administrators, belonging to persons of the United States and English Colonies, in which their immediate attention is solicited—no matter how old the claim. A full record of all the names of all to property, and those to whom letters should be addressed in England, will be sent post free, on receipt of twenty-six or, or U. S. postage stamps, by return mail, by H. G. ADAMS & CO., sole Proprietors for United States, Liverpool, Eng. 376o

NOW WITHIN REACH OF ALL.
Grover & Baker's
CELEBRATED NOISELESS
Sewing Machine!
No family can afford to be without one.
495 BROADWAY, N. Y.
374-76o

The Singer Sewing Machines
Have taken the first rank in the FAMILY MACHINES in the WORLD within the reach of all, we have reduced the Prices A, as Improvements and Machines constantly ornamented, to $50

Singer's No. 1 and 2 Standard Shuttle Machine, both of very general application and capacity, and popular with in the family and manufactory. Prices reduced, respectively from $125 and $150 to $70 and $80

Singer's No. 3 Standard Shuttle Machine, for cabinet-makers and heavy leather work. Price reduced from $150 to $90
also, to complete the list, an
ENTIRELY NEW ARTICLE,
intended for manufacturing purposes; NOISELESS, RAPID and capable of every kind of work; Price (including iron stand and drawers), $110—cheaper at that in view of its vast superiority than the machines of any other make.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway
0000

TRAVELLING AGENTS WANTED.—Address J. W. ALEXANDER & CO., Boston, Mass. 369-76o

Dr. Brown's Patent Baby-Tender.

THIS article of Nursery Furniture is different from, cheaper, and supplies the place of every article here used for that purpose. It combines, by simple changes, WHICH may be twilight made, A SAFE, COMFORTABLE NURSING CHAIR, A BEAUTIFUL BABY-STAND, A NIGHT STOOL, NURSERY, A CRADLE, A CHILD'S CHAIR, A STEP STOOL, A STEADY SUPPORT AND PROMENADER, A PLAY AND WORK STAND. It is unlimited from the ceiling, or a graceful standard, by a steel spring; is cushioned and so requires no bedding, and is beautifully trimmed in various styles to suit the purse of the purchaser. Its ingenious adaptation to various purposes is all seen in washing. In bringing up one child, more than its cost, and saves the time and attention of mother and nurse.

It gives the child entire freedom of motion for body and limbs, insures a healthy action of the stomach and bowels, promotes digestion, induces natural motion and development of the muscles, preserving it from injury or the possibility of danger

It is compact, strong and durable, and in nurse saving the care of infants or children under three years old it is indispensable.

N. B.—The crowder child and by our nursery children's Tender, and will be found very much aid in their proper development, and enables us to dispense with the services of one additional nurse. Mothers, send for Home for the Friendless.

A. S. BROWN & CO., Warerooms No. 652 Broadway N. Y., between Bond and Bleecker Sts
Send for our Circular 0000

Thorley's Food for Cattle.
FOR Horses, Cows, Sheep and Hogs, the effects are produced in a few days. Will increase the quantity of milk 25 per cent. Agents Wanted. Depot, 21 Broadway, New York. 371-76o

Ladd, Webster & Co's
IMPROVED THREE-STITCH SEWING MACHINES
No. 377 Broadway, New York. 000o

LOCAL AGENTS wanted. No capital required L. S. FRAY, Madison, Conn. 376-78o

Unequalled for the Splendor
AND MULTIPLICITY OF ITS ILLUSTRATIONS.
CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY BIBLE.
Great demand for the First Volume.
Price, neatly bound in cloth, lettered, $5 50.
Price, beveled cloth boards, gilt edges, $ 00.
Free by mail, post paid, to any part of the U. S., on receipt of the appointed for every unoccupied district throughout the Union.
CASSELL, PETTER & GALPIN,
No. 37 Park Row, N. Y.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES,
WITH
IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENTS AT REDUCED PRICES.
Office, No. 505 Broadway, New York.
The following are the names and residences of the Agents for the sale of the Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machines in Boston:
G. S. Rice, Hanover.
M. B. Pomeroy, Rockland.
H. C. Hapgood, Lynn.
Chadwick & Co., Gardner
T. P. L. Bowman, Salem.
J. A. Beckman, Mechanics Falls
C. Varney, Lewiston.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.
We had heard a great deal in reference to the artificers a reclaim as a renovator of the human Hair, but were not disposed to make any of our readers the unfortunate victims of any unfounded assertion. A friend of ours who had lately been so ill as to have his head shaved was induced, at our suggestion, to give it a trial. The result is that in a week a very perceptible difference can be seen in the growth of the patient's hair. He says that it is also very highly esteemed as an emollient effect from his own experience, and is fully determined to continue the use.—Cincinnati Times, N. Y.

Cough Lozenges.
BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES—At this season of the year, when so many are troubled with Bronchitis, Influenza and Bronchial Affections, a simple remedy becomes a great blessing. We have recommendations from those who have used them, and we know from our own experience that they are the best article of the kind ever offered to the public. They contain medicine which will relieve the cough at once, and by their use many sufferers in a coming consumption, and prevent the accumulation of pulmonary complaints. Singers, orators, and all persons troubled with Hoarseness, may use them to advantage.—Portland Transcript.

TUCKER'S
PATES BRIDAL
GARNITURES AND VEILS,
Collars, Flouncings, Trimmings, and Bridal Furnishings are one of a peculiar character. 372-76o
132 Broadway.

FINKLE & LYON'S
SEWING MACHINES.
The Machines have the highest medal at the Paris and American Institute, with the highest premium for Sewing Machines in operation.
They also seem the highest premium at the New Jersey State Fair, at the Medical Fair, Utica, N. Y., and elsewhere, and on generally wherever exhibited. 0000 Lock-stitch Machines, $75
Rib Stitch " $100
Office, 505 Broadway

A. LANGE,
PICTURE AND LOOKING-GLASS
FRAMES
AND
CORNICES FOR ROOMS,
MADE TO ORDER, AND RE-GILDING DONE.
.06 William St., cor. Frankfort, New York.

THE ELECTROTYPING OF LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is done by PILMER & CO., 17 Beekman Street

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1861, by Frank Leslie, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 277—Vol. XI.] NEW YORK, MARCH 16, 1861. [Price 6 Cents.

THE HON. JEFFERSON DAVIS, PRESIDENT-ELECT OF THE NEW SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY, ADDRESSING THE CITIZENS OF MONTGOMERY, ALA., FROM THE BALCONY OF THE EXCHANGE HOTEL, ON THE EIGHT OF FEBRUARY 10TH, 1861, AND PREVIOUS TO HIS INAUGURATION.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 208.

THE HON. JEFFERSON DAVIS, PRESIDENT OF the Southern Confederacy, Addressing the People of Montgomery.

THE arrival of the newly elected President of the Southern Confederacy, Jefferson Davis, preparatory to his Inauguration, created the utmost excitement in the capital, Montgomery. He arrived on the 16th, and went direct to the rooms prepared for his reception at the Exchange Hotel. He was welcomed on his arrival at the depot to the hospitalities of the city by Judge H. W. Withers, who addressed him in glowing language as leader of the corporate authorities. The President responded in an appropriate and effective speech, which was loudly cheered by the people who thronged the place.

An immense crowd blocked up every avenue to the hotel, and vociferously demanded the presence of the President. The call was promptly acceded to, and President Davis appearing on the balcony of the hotel, addressed the people in the following words:

FRIENDS CITIZENS AND BRETHREN OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA:—Having come unexpectedly, not to mean necessity, to this place, but as it may be, of one to be, of mere convenience, I have not prepared myself to address you in the manner which I should otherwise have done. We have, henceforth, I trust, the prospect of living together in peace, with our constitution guarded and protected by the sovereign States who formed it. The way in which the future will be ordered is in the midst of storms; it may be that at this morning in sight with clouds and dark and rainy, we shall have an unclouded sky before we close it at the beginning; but as the sun rose, lifted the mists and dispersed the clouds, so I trust that the day will be ushered in, and we will be prepared as the Southern Confederacy entered upon its career, to unite the hearts of the people in earnest liberty and political equality. (Applause.) Hitherto, in what have nothing to fear or blame, because at times we have been compelled to act on the defensive, and to war abroad, because if war should come, and if we must again freedom in blood and groans to be won by battle and victory, as the Revolution has been won before, we are not dangerous ones, but will redeem the pledges they gave, and redeem, by the blessing and favor of Him from whom we hope that blessing, the soil from foe and restore as brightly as in 1776, to feel and to every other comfort. (Applause.) I will not longer detain you, but will say that I am grateful for the kindness that I should expect therefore, I will not longer detain you. I am unable to speak as my laughs, but I feel grateful as you, among other manifestations, for your present welcome. I will at this moment only say that I look forward to great duties therefore upon me by the kindness and confidence of the Congress of the Confederate States. I thank you, my friends, for the last manifestations of favor and appreciation which you exhibit on this occasion. Throughout my whole connection with the public service, I have received from my former brethren in regard and appreciation which I did not regard them as personal to myself, but as tendered to me as the humble representative of a cause which I thought was that of the Confederate States. I am deeply sensible of the high office to which I have been called all that I have at heart, of need and of trust. It is the experience of events, the knowledge of men, and the power to read the future by the wonder portents—if, so be again, necessity shall require that I shall assist some one in the ranks of the military. I have not sought place, and I have not shunned it. I [illegible] Now, my friends, thanking you for the manifestation of your appreciation, allow me to bid you good-night.

After a telling speech from the Hon. W. L. Yancey, the vast crowd, cheering again with hearty good will, quietly dispersed.

Barnum's American Museum.

SPLENDID DRAMATIC PERFORMANCES EVERY AFTERNOON AND EVENING, at Barnum's Museum. The Great Drama of the Drunkard's Children, the Living Statue of the Lion, Aztec Children, Monsieur Bonassa, Albino Family, Model Artists, &c. Would be Visitors will take notice, Living Seal, Living Happy Family, the Bird Speaking Horse, Beautiful Fish, Happy Family, and 500,000 Curiosities.

Admission 25 cts. Children under ten, 15 cents.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

FRANK LESLIE, Editor and Publisher.

NEW YORK, MARCH 16, 1861.

All Communications, Books for Review, &c., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, New York.

TERMS FOR THIS PAPER.

One Copy	13 weeks	$1
One do	1 year	$4
Two Copies	1 year	$7
Three do	1 year	$10
Five do	1 year (to one address)	$20

And an extra Copy to the person sending a Club of Five. Every additional subscription, $2.

NOTICE TO PHOTOGRAPHERS.

We shall be much obliged to our photographic friends if they will write to us their name and description on the back of each picture, together with their own name and address. This notice is rendered necessary from the fact that we receive photographs are sent us from our friends throughout the country without one word of explanatory matter, and we are frequently at a loss to know what and everything that transpires or occurs in all parts of the United States. To obviate any paper pecuniary loss to us, we intend to publish in every thing which occurs of public importance throughout the world, still we are not enabled to do this unless something is sent us to go upon, and the result of our not reaching information. To have labor and insure accuracy, descriptions and names (as above indicated) should, in all cases, accompany photographic pictures or sketches.

The Grand Inauguration Ball at Washington.

In order to do full justice to this magnificent spectacle, we have been obliged to withhold our illustration till next number, when we shall publish a splendid picture, with an accurate representation of the dresses of many of the prominent ladies of fashion there present.

Another New Story.

We call the attention of our readers to the beautiful new story which we commence this week. "Santa Maria" is a Venetian story of rare interest; its merits will well repay perusal.

Our Weekly Gossip

Has grown of illustrated matter this week compels us to omit Our Weekly Gossip. It will be resumed in our next.

Inauguration of the President of the Southern Confederacy.

We intended to publish in our present issue an engraving of the ceremonies attendant upon the Inauguration of Jefferson Davis, President of the Southern Confederacy, but the sketch by our special artist, who was present, did not reach us in time to enable us to do it justice. It will, however, appear in the next number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

CONGRESSIONAL MATTERS.

The Buchanan Congress drags on to close the interest seems to intensify, as it is but old matters are on their dotheed consecutive attention is paid to their disputing words. This is a popular fallacy—what a dying man says is the most weighty one for truths. In the Senate, on Thursday, the 28th February Mr. Crittenden, from the Select Committee, presented a report from the Peace Congress. After considerable debate, in which Senator Doolittle declared that it would serve as an amendment to the first article of the Peace Congress—a proposition to the effect that no State has a right to secede, and that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, the debate was adjourned to the next day.

In the House Mr. Corwin's amendment was the subject of debate. It was agreed to yesterday. The proposition provides "that no amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give Congress power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State." The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted—yeas 136, nays 65.

On Friday, the Peace Conference Committee was again before the Senate, but did not seem to meet with much favor. Senator Wade, the John Adams of the Senate, proposed to substitute for their resolutions his own anti-Seward resolutions. Mr. Hunter, on the other hand, offered an amendment in consequence of Mr. Crittenden. After considerable talk between sundry members, the Senate adjourned without coming to any decision. Mr. Seward's bill finding it every day being fleshed out. What a pity that we have only "blood and bones" of the Constitution, and that the "sinews" are wanting in the National architect, whose chief time ought to be "the Elms."

On Saturday the Senate spent the greater part of the day amending the Pugilist Bill—as Bill was passed by 29 to 28. Its extreme complaisance will very contagious among the Senators. It provides that a pugilist fighting in the place where he is said to have escaped; then away the power of the Sheriff to arrest—consequently, the fighter can't be arrested, except in case of a duel; and makes the fee of the judicial officer before whom he is brought, $10. In any case, whether he is fined or imprisoned. Another proposition remove two obstacles though not very important features in the old bill, but after the brilliant achievement at blundering, a bill unanimously passed. The reading of which gave no justice, which made the condition imperative on the demand of the Executive when the fugitive was found in any State, whether the demand was made by the decision majority of 116 to 67. The purpose Southern was to secure the rights of property against the Republican Party. Success.

On Saturday, the 2nd March, there was the usual excitement and confusion about the last days, as the Senate sat from 10 A.M. to Post-Office, Pension, Navy, Military Academy, Civil, &c., bills were passed. The House refused to concur in the Senate's bill to increase the salaries of the officers of the customs revenue. The resolution assuring Treaty, the Secretary of the Navy, for accepting the resignation of several officers who joined the Secession movement, then passed by 81 to 62. It is certainly not pleasant for a public minister to get out of office with the imputation of treachery.

The Senate continued its Sunday night session to nine o'clock on Monday morning, and the House sat all night, and adjourned at 8 o'clock.

The debate on Sunday night, on the motion to adopt the Corwin resolution, as it passed the House, was participated in by several members. The proposed amendment had been voted on and defeated, the original resolution was finally adopted by 24 yeas to 12 nays. Among the nays were Messrs. Douglas, Crittenden, Pugh, and they sailed by 19 yeas to 20 nays. Several efforts were then made to the Senate, and the committee on conference elected seven to the Tariff bill passed. At twelve o'clock Vice-President Breckinridge left the Senate chamber, after which Mr. Hunter took the oath as the new Vice-President, and the Senate was then declared adjourned sine die. Mr. Hunter then left with the chair, and the proclamation for the extra session was read.

The House sat all night, and all day. Great excitement and confusion prevailed, and, at sunset, in the hurry incident to the closing of a session, many bills were rushed through, and members left the House without the solemnity of a very important nature. At twelve o'clock Speaker Pennington delivered his closing address to the House, and announced the final adjournment of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-sixth Congress.

The President's Inaugural Address.

This important document, upon which was supposed to hang the fate of our beloved country, was delivered in Lincoln from the steps of the Capitol on Monday last, the 4th of March, dwelling all minor questions, he enters at once upon the present state of the country. He says that the South has by no way just for that his Government will prove inimical to their property, their peace or their liberty, and offers in proof thereof extracts of a conservative speech from his speech, and one speak of the Chicago platform, based upon the sentiments therein expressed. These he deems sufficient proof of his friendly feelings and just sense of his obligations to the people of the South.

Of the right to reclaim Fugitive Slaves, he considers it recognized, in the fullest sense, in the Constitution—a right which all Members of Congress have sworn to support. Whether this right should be enforced by the Federal or State Authorities, he believes could be easily settled by calm discussion.

He asserts that no State upon its own mere will has a provision in its organic law for its own termination." Dissolution is, therefore, impossible, unless with the consent of all the contracting parties. No one State can lawfully withdraw from the Confederacy, and all resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void, and that acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances. He therefore considers that, in view of the Constitution and the Laws, the Union is unbroken, and, to the extent of his ability, he will take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon him, the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States.

He repudiates all right to secede, and believes that no blood need be shed in sustaining his position.

He declares that the power confided to him will be used to hold, occupy and possess the property and places belonging to the Government, and collect the duties and imports; but beyond what may be necessary for these objects there will be no invasion, no using of force against or among the people anywhere.

Where the citizens of any State refuse to hold Federal offices, the Government will not intrude the people of such State by filling such offices by force. Where none seem disposed, will continue to be furnished in all parts of the Union.

He considers that, in view of the Constitution and the laws, the Union is unbroken, and he will take care that a fine of ten dollars per day for each cow fed on swill, the unscrupulous rascals have sold these diseased animals to be slaughtered for food. What are our inspectors about that this poisonous meat is not seized and the vendors severely punished? In such weather as this it only requires such food to commence a pestilence.

There is an occasional impudence in the telegraphic wires which partakes of the sublime. Every one knows the immense efforts made by Chase and Cameron to secure a position in the new Cabinet. As a proof of this we have only to note the fact, which proves that they had resolved to swallow each other like a couple of anacondas. Now just read their coy blushes as reflected through the telegraphic wires of their favorite organ:

"The appointment of Salmon P. Chase, Secretary to the Treasury Department, was definitely settled to-night. Cameron can have the War Department if he chooses. It is not known whether he will accept, but his friends urge it earnestly upon him. At ten o'clock Mr. Chase had not decided to accept the Treasuryship, nor is it settled whether Mr. Cameron will take the War Department if Mr. Chase does the former."

How must Chase and Cameron cry out, "Save us from our telegrams!"

Things seem to need Rarey at Charleston. The Daily Times has a correspondent in that city, and putting this and that together, we made out the following sentence:

"There is so great a demand for horses for the exigencies of the service, that a daring thief stole, at dusk, the horse of the Quartermaster, just after he had left him tied to a post in King street, our most crowded thoroughfare. A man who has so little respect for Quartermastership deserves a dose of hempen cord."

The Daily News is very properly indignant at the abuse heaped on Mr. Buchanan. It says:

"Mr. Buchanan is a scholar and a gentleman. He has filled, creditably, positions for which his successor is not socially qualified. His reputation in European and American society is something for an old man to remember with pride. Those who assail him personally, besides thereby establishing their intellectual and social mediocrity, exhibit a large share of ignorance and malacity."

We find the following in one of the English papers:

"A Berne telegraphic despatch of the 13th ult. says it was through the medium of the Swiss Consulate at Algeria, that Mr. Cobden proposed that Switzerland should mediate between the contending States of America. The Federal Council had declined the proposition, on the ground that it was not qualified for such an office."

If this proves to be the truth, Cobden must be insane. A mouse mediating between elephants would be equally apropos. "Too much free trade has made our Cobden mad!"

In spite of the hard times the newspaper business goes on increasing. One of the results of this fact is that the enterprising wholesale news agents, John H. Feeks & Co., have been obliged by press of business to remove to more commodious quarters, and are now occupying the large store, No. 24 Ann street. There they will have elbow room to accommodate that increase of business which their promptitude and enterprise so justly merits.

A New Excitement.—In 1850 everybody rushed to California after gold; in 1861 every one rushes to George C. Allen's, under the Brandreth House, for gold and jewels of every description. Allen is one of our old residents, a solid and reliable man, having carried on his business for over twenty-two years in Wall street, in a regular way; but now, in obedience to the spirit of the times, he offers an immense amount of rich and elegant jewellery at panic prices. There are several large show-cases marked, "Everything in this case, $1—$2," and so on up to five or six dollars. We examined the various cases, and were astonished at the excellent finish and the tasteful and elegant patterns of all the articles they contained. Brooches, breastpins, earrings, bracelets, lockets, studs, sleeve-buttons, rings, pens, pencil-cases, in short every variety of article in the jewellery line, in every variety of style. How they can be afforded at the price is one of the mysteries of the trade, as they are now offered at least forty per cent. below the usual retail prices. But a rapid sale for ready cash at this time is an inducement not to be resisted. The public appreciate the sacrifice, and literally "go in with a rush," for Allen's store is crowded from morning to night, and the cases are emptied and replenished two or three times a day. The jewellery fever is raging in New York. Mr. Allen has also a large stock of rich and costly jewellery, watches, &c., which is displayed in another portion of his store. Whoever sighs for adornment can gratify their tastes at Allen's store at a merely nominal expenditure.

The New York Weekly is making great strides to keep its high place in our weekly literature. Its stories are written by the most popular authors, and every class is appealed to. In addition to the startling works of fiction there are other features in this excellent paper which recommend it to the household, such as its editorials and melange of reading, which, independent of its capital stories, render it one of the best family papers of the times. Messrs. Street & Smith deserve the support of the public for their spirited management of the New York Weekly.

DRAMA.

Niblo's Theatre.—Mr. Forrest having now entered upon the sixth month of his engagement, it is proper that the journalist should devote something more than an ordinary paragraph to a success so entirely unprecedented in the history of the acted drama. There can be found no record of a career more remarkable than that of Edwin Forrest. Commencing at the lowest round of the ladder, he mounted, it is true, step by step, but with such lightning-like celerity, that early contemporaries stood amazed, and while still on the threshold of manhood, while the glory of youth was just verging into the splendor of maturity, he found himself not only famous, but surrounded by hosts of friends, by whom he was fêted, caressed and applauded, as never was actor fêted, caressed and applauded before or since.

Fortunately, Mr. Forrest was gifted with a large share of that invaluable commodity, common sense, and this ordeal of adulation, which would have turned the head of a weaker man, only served to inspire him with a still more unalterable determination to attain the goal upon which he had fixed his ambitious hopes. With this object in view, he devoted himself with unwearying assiduity to the study of his profession, never descending to indulge in any of the dissipations or excesses that have dimmed the lustre of so many histrionic luminaries. Acting only at such times as the public voice actually demanded his appearance, Mr. Forrest passed forward to new triumphs, and each year saw his fame shine further, clearer and brighter, his fortunes increase, and his good name grow more secure "in mouths of wisest censure." A liberal patron of literature, he strove long and earnestly to call into being a strictly American drama, and it was his misfortune, not his fault, that in this endeavor he failed. He was most prodigal of his means, of his time and of his advice, but the authors, to avail of these advantages, were not forthcoming. One or two tolerably good acting plays only rewarded his efforts. A truly great original tragedy, by an American author, has yet to be written.

Thoroughly in earnest in his determination to become the foremost actor of the age, Mr. Forrest, at the very outset of his career, willingly turned aside from the laurels that were being woven for his brow and the golden stream that was flowing into his coffers, and retired temporarily from the active duties of his profession, in order to cultivate his taste and improve his mind by travel. During this period, all that was beautiful and truthful in nature and art was made subservient to his studies. From the magnificent natural scenery of his native land he had already drawn a breadth and grandeur of conception, and now from the art shrines, rich with the glorious works of the mighty masters of the pencil and chisel, from the mouldering but imperishable splendors of the classic ages, and from the historical associations that are so intimately blended with each river, valley and mountain of the Old World, he gleaned the grace and elaborate finish which were alone wanting to render his personations superior to anything that had hitherto been witnessed on the stage. It is not to be wondered at then, that on returning to the scene of his previous triumphs he at once assumed the position never since questioned, of the first histrionic genius and most brilliant dramatic artist of his time.

Before closing these desultory remarks we would refer to one feature connected with Mr. Forrest's career, which, to the uninitiated, is as singular as it is unparalleled; we allude to the persistent and vindictive assaults of which he has been made the object, both as actor and man, by a certain portion of the public. From such exhibitions of petty spleen and malice, Mr. Forrest turned to his audiences and demanded their verdict upon his merits as an actor, and for a quarter of a century his appeal has been responded to by a success unprecedented in dramatic annals, culminating in the present engagement at Niblo's. As to his private affairs, he rightly judged that in them the public had no voice. Still unabashed, however, this miserable minority pursues the great tragedian with relentless hate, and with a pertinacity worthy of a better cause seeks to extort from him some recognition of their existence—what success they are likely to meet with in their laudable endeavors those who know Mr. Forrest best, best know. It only remains now in a few words to sum up our reasons for placing Mr. Forrest as a tragedian so far above all who have preceded him. In the first place, then, his genius is of the very truest stamp; in personal appearance, he presents a combination and a form, indeed, "where every god did seem to set his seal to give the world assurance of a man." His voice, as noble an organ as ever human being was gifted with, is capable of every variety of modulation, and his bearing graceful and majestic. To these qualifications add an intellect at once strong and brilliant, a mind thoroughly stored, not alone with the wisdom to be learned from books, but also with that higher knowledge gleaned from constant intercourse with man, and a keen insight into his thoughts, motives, passions; an iron will, and a thorough appreciation of the great minds with whose legacies his profession brings him constantly a communion, and we see a combination of qualities that finds no counterpart in the pages of dramatic history. We desired to follow Mr. Forrest through his principal rôles, but want of space forbids us that pleasure, and we conclude, therefore, by earnestly advising all admirers of "the youngest of the sister arts, where all their beauties blend," to avail themselves of every opportunity of witnessing the performances of its greatest exponent.

Winter Garden.—Last week Miss Cushman made her rentrée at this house, as Nancy Sykes, in a dramatic version of "Oliver Twist." As this was her first appearance in the part since the days of the old Park Theatre, curiosity was naturally on the qui vive, and the result was a house filled to repletion. Among the audience, too, we noticed many old playgoers, who are now rarely brought out, but when they do come add an air of dignity to any audience.

The play of "Oliver Twist" is about as bad a specimen of dramatic literature as it is possible to conceive. It has neither plot, interest nor unity, consisting merely of a collection of scenes (and those the most repulsive), from the novel after which it is named.

That Miss Cushman, however, should have made a success by her impersonation of the heroine, we do not wonder; we consider it a companion picture to her Meg Merrilies. Her make-up is admirable, and the rude energy she throws into the part renders some of its scenes thrilling in the extreme. The portraiture, it is true, lacks the pre-Raphaelite fidelity that Miss Heron invested it with; but, nevertheless, must be regarded as one of Miss Cushman's most successful impersonations, fully bearing us out in our often expressed opinion, that melo-drama, not tragedy, is this lady's forte. In fact, while she lacks the dignity of carriage and grandeur of conception necessary to a proper delineation of the great tragic rôles, her very angularity and style render her peculiarly fitted to enact such parts as Meg Merrilies and Nancy Sykes. The play is well acted. Mr. Wallack, as Fagin, making a vivid impression; he, like Miss Cushman, though he fails in tragedy, fully redeems himself in melo-drama. Mr. Davidge, as Bumble, is admirable, giving a picture that Dickens himself could find no fault with, and the remainder of the characters are fairly acted. The piece is put upon the stage with the same care as when produced for Miss Heron, the scene representing London Bridge and the final tableau being exceedingly effective.

"Oliver Twist" was played throughout the week to good houses, and replaced on Monday last by "Guy Mannering." Miss Cushman's powerful delineation of Meg Merrilies is too well known to need further comment.

Niblo's Garden—English Opera—Debut of Miss Watson.—We cannot but regret that the English opera season has been brought to a close at Niblo's Theatre. The public were only just commencing thoroughly to appreciate the increasing merits of the various performers when they are denied the pleasure of listening to them. That a pecuniary success commensurate with the artistic success should not at once have attended the efforts of Madame Bishop, is to be accounted for by many good and sufficient reasons, first and foremost among which is the fact of the opera nights being what are technically called "off nights." These "off nights" are terrible affairs for artists, pecuniary success seldom or never attending them on those occasions. If, however, the season commenced inauspiciously, a flattering increase in the number of the audience was observable on each successive evening, and on Saturday of last week the house was filled from parquette to gallery, to witness the debut of a lady previously celebrated in private circles, and who, if we mistake not, is destined at no distant day to take a front place in the ranks of English opera singers. We refer, of course, to Miss Eleanor Watson. This lady, a member of a family to whom the musical public of New York owe a deep debt of gratitude for their continued and conscientious endeavors to advance the art in this metropolis, has, of course, received a thorough musical education, and in addition thereto possesses a voice delicate in calibre, but clear, true and melodious, which she uses with admirable feeling and taste. Before she had sung a dozen notes all idea of failure vanished, and her delicious rendering of the charming ballad, "On yonder rock reclining," made not only success certain, but a success of the most flattering description. Throughout the opera Miss Watson fully confirmed the favorable impression made in the first act, being encored in the principal morceaux, and receiving the warm and enthusiastic plaudits of a very critical audience. Her acting was better than we had any right to look for from a novice, being at all times lady-like and refined, and altogether the debut may be regarded as a source of sincere congratulation to Miss Watson, her friends and the public. We trust we shall soon have an opportunity of assisting at her second appearance.

Barnum's American Museum.—While our President, Gulliver Abe, is about getting his White House Museum in order, President Barnum is reaping the fruits of his numerous crops of curiosities, and receiving hosts of admirers every hour of the day. What Seward is to Lincoln, Greenwood is to Phineas. What with the "What Is It?" and the thousand other curiosities, a month can be easily and agreeably passed at the corner of Ann street and Broadway. In addition to these, there is the new drama of the "Woman in White," which attracts large crowds. For further particulars see the Prize Rebus in Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun for March 15th. It is a triumph of ingenuity.

THE INAUGURATION OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN,

The Sixteenth President of the United States of America.

In presenting to our readers to-day a truthful and graphic picture of the solemnest and most interesting spectacle in the world, the inauguration of a man of the people to rule over the greatest republic of modern or ancient times, we briefly describe the ceremony we this day illustrate. In addition to the inherent importance of the event itself, the present unhappy condition of our national affairs gave it an additional interest and solemnity. For the first time in the history of our country the republic presented a broken front, and the inauguration took place in the face of an emphatic protest of six States against the accession to office of the President. All these considerations throw a momentous shade over the scene, which no one who witnessed it can ever forget.

The morning of the 4th of March, 1861, broke clear and beautiful, and though at one time a few drops of rain fell, yet the day turned out to be a very pleasant one, so far as the weather could make it. All business, public and private, was suspended, and the display of the national flag from innumerable buildings gave great liveliness to the scene. Hither and thither galloped and marched the volunteer soldiery, while the fife and drum and military bands made up an exciting picture which equally appealed to sight and ear.

As early as daybreak the crowds began to assemble in Pennsylvania avenue, and by eight o'clock the streets adjacent to Willard's Hotel and the Capitol were nearly impassable from the crowds of people.

The Procession formed.

At nine o'clock the procession began to form in front of the City Hall, at the corner of Louisiana avenue and Four-and-a-half street, under the charge of Chief Marshal French, who admirably fulfilled his arduous duties on this eventful day.

The Marshals were: J. J. Coombs, George H. Plant, John S. Paxson, James W. Deeble, W. Krzyzanowski, John L. Hayes, Lewis Clephane, Albert G. Hall, S. A. McKim, Foster Henshaw, Col. John S. Keyes, Hon. N. A. Thompson, William Simpson.

Besides these were thirteen Aids, twenty-nine Assistant Marshals, representing States and Territories, and eighty-three assistants who acted miscellaneously. The common uniform of these were black hats, black frock coats, black pantaloons and light buckskin gloves. The particular designations of the Marshals Aids were blue scarfs, white rosettes and blue saddle cloths, trimmed with gilt. Those of the Marshals were blue scarfs, white rosettes, white saddle cloths, trimmed with blue, and a baton two feet long, of blue color, with ends gilt about two inches deep.

The Assistant Marshals wore white scarfs, with pink rosettes, and had white saddle covers trimmed with pink. They carried batons of pink color, two feet long, with white ends two inches deep.

There was also a mounted corps of assistants to Colonel Selden, United States Marshal of the District, who were in attendance on Mr. Buchanan.

At eleven o'clock the cortége began its march through Louisiana avenue to Pennsylvania, past Willard's Hotel, where Mr. Lincoln was staying, up Fifteenth street, where it countermarched and returned to Pennsylvania avenue, where it halted opposite Willard's Hotel. The military now formed on two sides of the hotel, and the whole mise en scène was most animating and effective.

Mr. Buchanan Arrives.

At half-past twelve Mr. Buchanan arrived in the state carriage with liveried servants. Alighting at the ladies' door of the hotel, he proceeded to Mr. Lincoln's room. After a brief conversation they entered the carriage, the military presenting arms at their appearance, and the band playing "Hail Columbia." Senators Baker and Pearce were in the same carriage. The procession then moved in the following order:

Aids. Marshal-in-Chief. Aids.
A National Flag with appropriate emblems.
The President of the United States, with the President Elect and Suite, with Marshals on their left, and the Marshal of the United States for the District of Columbia (Colonel William Selden), and his Deputies on their right.
The Committee of Arrangements of the Senate.
Ex-Presidents of the United States.
The Republican Association.
The Judiciary.
The Clergy.
Foreign Ministers.
The Corps Diplomatique.
Members elect, Members and ex-Members of Congress, and ex-Members of the Cabinet.
The Peace Congress.
Heads of Bureaus.
Governors and ex-Governors of States and Territories, and Members of the Legislatures of the same.
Officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Militia, in full Uniform.
Officers and Soldiers of the Revolution, of the War of 1812, and subsequent periods.
The Corporate Authorities of Washington and Georgetown.
Other Political and Military Associations from the District and other parts of the United States.
All organized Civil Societies.
Professors, Schoolmasters and Students within the District of Columbia,
Citizens of the District and of States and Territories.

The military escort was under the escort of Colonel Harris, Colonel Thomas and Captain Taylor. Mr. Buchanan looked very grave, and scarcely opened his lips, while President Lincoln was pale and composed. The carriage in which the two Presidents rode was entirely surrounded by military, in order to prevent the possibility of any attempt at violence. We will now leave Presidents Lincoln and Buchanan on their ride, and proceed in advance to the

The Capitol.

At five minutes to twelve, Vice-President Breckinridge and Senator Foot, of the Committee of the Arrangements, entered the Senate Chamber, escorting the Vice-President, Hamlin, to his seat on the left of the Presidential Chair. Mr. Hamlin had walked with a friend to the Senate Chamber just as a private citizen—offering a marked contrast to the military pomp of Mr. Lincoln's progress. As the clock with its twelve shocks of sound proclaimed noon the hammer fell, and the Second Session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress was no more.

Vice-President Breckinridge then took leave of the Senate over which he had so worthily presided, and administered the oath to his successor, Hannibal Hamlin, and conducted that gentleman to the Chair. At this minute the Corps Diplomatique entered the Chamber, and their gay costumes gave an additional brilliancy to the scene. The tout ensemble now was very striking—in one promiscuous conversation were men of all parties—Wigfall, Chase, Crittenden, Wade and Wilson were in one group, all chatting as though they had never differed in opinion.

At thirteen minutes to one o'clock the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States of America were announced by the doorkeeper of the Senate. On their entrance, all on the floor rose, and the venerable Judges, headed by Chief Justice Taney, moved slowly to the seats assigned them, immediately to the right of the Vice-President, each exchanging salutes with that officer in passing the chair.

Arrival of President Lincoln.

At ten minutes past one an unusual stir outside announced the arrival of the President, and in five minutes more the Marshal-in-Chief, Major French, entered the Senate Chamber, ushering in the Presidents, Buchanan and Lincoln.

Senators Foot and Baker followed them. Mr. Lincoln then, with Mr. Buchanan, Foot and Baker, went straightway to the President's Room on the Senate Floor, where the dust, with which they were all covered, was brushed off. He then re-entered the Senate Chamber, and the line of procession was formed to the Portico in the following order:

Marshal of the District of Columbia, Judges of the Supreme Court, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, Committee of Arrangements, President of the United States and President elect, Vice President, Secretary of the Senate, Senators, diplomatic corps, heads of departments, Governors, and others in the chamber. When the word was given for the members of the House to fall into the line of the procession, a violent rush was made for the door, accompanied by loud outcries, violent pushing and great disturbance. In other respects the crowd behaved themselves with exemplary propriety.

They reach the Platform.

After the procession had reached the platform, Senator Baker introduced Mr. Lincoln as President of the United States to the vast assemblage before him. He was received with cheers. After a minute's pause, the President, Lincoln, put his hand in his pocket, and taking from it a pair of spectacles, read his Inaugural Address, which the reader has doubtless read every word of, but which he will find epitomized in another column.

President Buchanan and Chief Justice Taney listened with the utmost attention to every word of the Address, and at the conclusion the Chief Justice administered the usual oath, on taking which Mr. Lincoln was heartily cheered. Chief Justice Taney was much agitated—as well he might be, for this was the eighth President to whom he had administered those solemn words. The President was escorted back to the Senate Chamber, thence to his carriage, and the military, taking up the same order as in the morning, proceeded slowly to the White House. Mr. Buchanan accompanied his successor to the main hall, where the two Presidents, past and present, took a cordial and affecting leave of each other. Mr. Buchanan then drove to Attorney-General Ould's house, where he remained till the next day.

Thus ended the Inauguration of Abraham Lincoln of Illinois, and Sixteenth President of our Great Republic.

THE NEW CABINET.

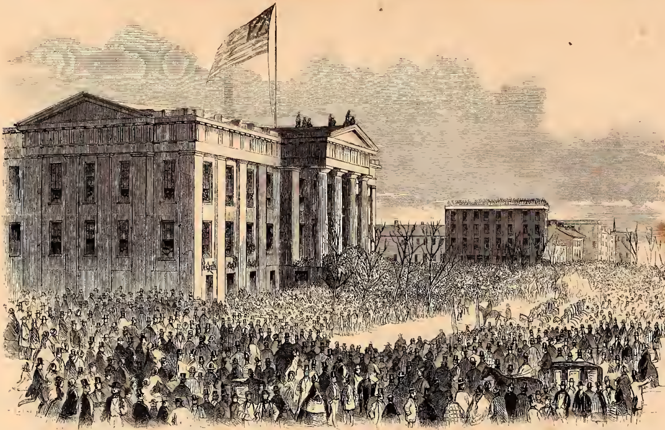
MR. LINCOLN has formed his Cabinet; they are all able and well-known men. How far Chase and Cameron can agree in the same cage remains to be seen. It has the look of a Compromise Cabinet.

Secretary of State	William H. Seward, of N. Y.
Secretary of Treasury	Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio.
Secretary of War	Simon Cameron, of Pa.
Secretary of Navy	Montgomery Blair, of Md.
Secretary of Interior	Caleb B. Smith, of Ind.
Postmaster-General	Gideon Welles, of Conn.
Attorney-General	Edward Bates, of Mo.

It is said that it required a great struggle to get Blair instead of Davis in the Cabinet. A deputation from Maryland called on Lincoln, and said that the admission of Davis into the Cabinet would revive Pluguglism and other Blood Tub manias. Davis, however, will be consoled by some lucrative appointment abroad. The nonchalance with which patriots now talk about the loaves and fishes would make the hair of our revolutionary fathers stand on end. It is, however, encouraging to know that our politicians do not add hypocrisy to their other virtues.

IN Philadelphia, a few days ago, a woman was found by the police lying dead in bed with her drunken husband beside her. The officer roused up the husband and told him that his wife was dead, when the brute replied that she was dead drunk, and struck the corpse in the face with his fist. He was arrested and taken to the station house. A little boy, three or four years of age, who had been sent out by the father for liquor while the mother was lying dead, was sent to the Northern Home for Friendless Children.

AS DR. CHABERT—so says the Daily News—was riding from Hoboken to Guttenburg, he was fired at by some men who endeavored to seize his horse. The balls whistled past him, but did no further harm.



RAISING THE STARS AND STRIPES OVER THE COURT HOUSE, LOUISVILLE, KY., ON WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY, FEB. 22, 1861, BY COL. J. H. HARNEY AND GEORGE D. PRENTICE, ESQ.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY WEBSTER & BROS.

THE FLOATING BATTERY IN CHARLESTON HARBOR, S. C.

IN a recent number we published a sketch of the floating battery intended to assist in taking Fort Sumpter, as it appeared at that date. The present sketch, just received from our Artist in Charleston, shows it in a completed state, as it will appear when towed into position to attack Fort Sumpter. The following description will give an idea of the formidable character of this floating battery:

This huge structure is made of sawed Southern pine timber, twelve inches square. It is something less than one hundred feet long, about twenty-five feet wide. The bottom is flat, into which the side timbers are framed, which go up, not perpendicularly, but at an outward inclination of about forty degrees, presenting an uneven slope on the outside. These side timbers, which are set endways, are about twenty-five feet long. On the upper end are framed other short timbers, which present the appearance of rafters sawed off at the length of from three to five feet. The timbers are to be framed into these short rafters, reaching downward into the flooring, thus forming a chamber to be filled in with some resisting material, which, with the thickness of the inner and outer frame, will make a wall of at least six feet in thickness.

The projecting timbers, or short rafters, are to form a covering or roof for the men at the guns. The sides are to be timbers bolted together, something in the style of a trestle bridge, and in all will be between three and four feet in thickness. It is not the design to roof the structure entirely over, but for the most part, with the exception of the covering, it is to be left open. The design is to let in six or eight feet of water, above which, around the sides, under the protection spoken of, there will be a raised platform for guns and men. The idea of the water, it is supposed, is to destroy the effect of the bombs which will fall into it. The opening in the roof probably has reference to the effect of the concussion on the men serving the guns. It will, when completed, present a very formidable means of attack on Fort Sumpter, in connection with Forts Moultrie, Pinckney and the land batteries.

RAISING THE STARS AND STRIPES

Over the Court House, Louisville, Ky., on the 22d of February, 1861.

IT was a great day of rejoicing—a perfect jubilee—in Louisville, Ky., on Washington's birthday. The whole mass of the people turned out in favor of the Union, and to assist in hoisting the American flag, the glorious Stars and Stripes, over the Court House. The Louisville Daily Journal thus describes the imposing scene:

From an early hour in the day the space before the Court House was crowded, and by the time the ceremonies were commenced, we do not think there were less than fifty thousand persons in its immediate vicinity; old and young, male and female, joined the throng; women with children in their arms brought them up to remember the glorious occasion, and "old age forgot its crutch" to join the patriotic assembly. From Third to Sixth streets, and at all intermediate crossings, the dense crowds rendered ingress and egress almost impossible, and it was with great difficulty that the marshal of the day and his assistants could keep a sufficient space of ground cleared for the military display. Our volunteer forces never looked more full in ranks, more complete in equipments, and more steady in their evolutions. The crowd continued to swell and increase until the hour appointed for the grand ceremonial of the day, and each heart seemed hushed in anxiety for the moment to arrive. Many an anxious glance was cast at the Court House by those who were wedged

(Continued on page 262.)

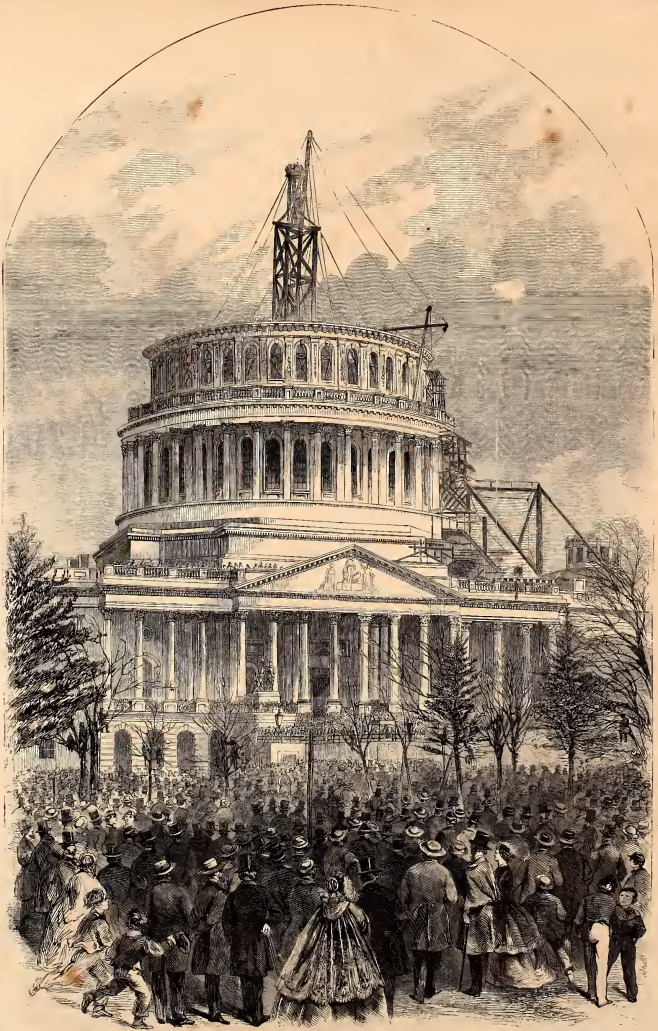
PRESENT APPEARANCE OF THE FLOATING BATTERY OF CHARLESTON, INTENDED FOR THE REDUCTION OF FORT SUMPTER.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST IN CHARLESTON.



VIEW OF THE CAPITOL, SHOWING THE PRESENT STATE OF THE DOME.—Taken during the Inauguration of Lincoln, Monday, March 4, 1861.—Photographed by Stacy.

RAISING THE STARS AND STRIPES
Over the Court House, Louisville, Ky., on the 22d of February, 1861.

(Continued from page 205.)

in some manner aroused it, and there was an interval of delay for which we can find no reasonable excuse. But the moment came at last, and the great event was in the memory of Washington and the post-Office Union which he founded. We hardly know how to approach a description of the ensuing scene.

The mil tary, consisting of the Seventh State, Captain Symmes; the Home Guards, Captain Ormsby; the Chicasaw Rifles, Captain Chenoweth; the Louisville Legion, Captain Morris and Lieutenant Quigley; the Washington Riflemen, Captain Bruce; the Louisville Life Guards, Captain Hays; the Louisville Guards, Lieutenant Frazier; the Kentucky Rangers, Captain Crossley; the Independent Guards, Captain Hall, and the Cadets of Chickasaw Institute, were formed in front of the Court House, at 2 o'clock precisely, at Bullock's Hotel corner, which was the rendezvous for the great event of the day, the hoisting of the American flag upon the Court House. The distinguished invited guests, whose exact proper age addressed to the Thieves of Green by the Rev. Dr. Craik of the Reverend Clergy, for patiently complying with the request to favor a portion from the present event of this promiscuous gathering.

James Speed, who then appeared, was received with the hand, and made a speech full of noble and national sentiments and loyalty to the Union, which was hailed with repeated bursts of applause, concluding with the following words:

"As the volcano has power established and support the order and harmony of the universe, so must the human command the principles and harmony, of social, political and religious freedom, embodied in the American Constitution and Union. Let us cherish and defend it. Let us be true to ourselves and to our fathers. Let us be true to the memory of Washington, and have respect of all the nations of the earth. Let us, then, be as our great love we justly may from of that Constitution and Union under that flag. Let us, therefore, taking the advice of our fathers, cultivate and cherish it with the kind attempts of the kindly and fraternal feelings which have existed so long between us on a faith in spirit, in justice, in God! Let this flag be ever present and never due. Whenever, in any way, the spirit of disunion and faction shall manifest itself, let it be met and plucked from the American mind and heart all traces of blank eyes on the streets below. Her flowers, her aviary, her music and books gave no pleasure now, could not pass the time away even—she could do nothing but sit in dreamy sadness and think of Emanuel. Where was he? What hardships had he to undergo? Could he find means of writing to her, or of sending some token of his love and remembrance? Could she find means of communicating with him, of sending him a line, a flower, or a lock of hair? Once in the first frenzy of her grief, a desperate thought had taken possession of her mind. She would leave father, mother, home and wealth and seek him, to remain with him, to comfort him, to share his prison if the need should be, his wanderings, his exile, and never, never be parted from him more.

She had grown calmer now. The religion that ruled her innocent, loving heart had told her that such would be a great falling off of duty, a sin in the eyes of God, a breaking of the commandment, which ordained love and obedience to one's parents. Her father was a stern, unloveable man; yet was he not her father, nevertheless, and her dead mother, would she ever be able to pray for her soul with such a weight on her conscience? No; she must bear it all, bear it and die. As she sat there, wan and fragile and despairing, it seemed as though Death, the consoler, could not be far off. She was roused from her reverie by the entrance of her father, who with flushed face and gleaming eyes, caught her in his arms and embraced her again and again. Quite speechless from surprise at this unwonted burst of parental feeling, poor Lucia submitted to it meekly, as she would have met his anger at another time, and tried to reciprocate his overflowing spirits with a smile.

"How pale you are, child," said the count, at last; "and now is the time when your cheeks should bloom like roses. We must find a lover for you, Lucia—is that what you have been pining for?"

"Oh, dear father," cried the poor girl, in great embarrassment, "I am not pining—do not be uneasy for me. I want—I have no wish to leave you——"

"No, no, all girls say so, and all the while kiss their hands to the young cavaliers at the back windows. But, Lucia, we will not hurry your wedding till—" he stooped down and whispered in her ear—"till every soul in Venice is free!"

Her thought flew to Emanuel.

"Oh, father, is such a thing possible? and will the prisoners be released?"

"Prisoners! yes, yes," he said; "but we must be free first, you know, and then we can do everything. And, Lucia, a step has been made to-day—we have joined hands with those we once hated of our own countrymen; there are no longer two factions in Venice—you understand?"

"The Pepoli and the Valletti are friends, God be thanked!" and with the mingled joy and hope her father's sudden words conveyed to her mind, and the crushing sorrow she had borne so many days in secrecy, the overwrought girl fell fainting into his arms. When she revived, her father was bending over her with unwonted solicitude, moistening her forehead, and holding a vinaigrette to her nose.

"Cheer up, my pretty Lucia," he said, again and again, "we must take more care of you, and not let you mope so much by yourself, or the cavalier will be discontented to find the roses all gone from your cheeks. Such a nice, gallant husband I have found for you! Cheer up!"

Left to herself, her mind was divided between the sweetest hope and the saddest apprehension. What if her father should force her to marry some one to suit his own interests? Should she confess her love for Emanuel, their clandestine meetings and vows? Could she do this? Could she be so brave? Would his stern heart be softened by her entreaties of forgiveness, and all be well? Alas! then came the dreary thought of Emanuel's imprisonment; of what use her father's consent, when he was torn from her, perhaps for ever?

(To be continued.)

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan,

Author of "The Flower of the Flock," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c., &c.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

A tide of wondrous and unwonted bliss
  Rolls back through all her pulses suddenly,
As if some seraph who had learned to kiss
  From the fair daughters of the world gone by,
Had wedded so his fallen light with hers,
  Such sweet, strange joy through soul and body stirs.—Lowell.

The old adage that "seeing is believing," is not always borne out by actual fact, or else why do we have the antithesis, "appearances are deceitful?" Poor Violet saw, as she believed, Cyril Kingswood in felicitous communion with Eleanore Cotton, she herself being no more remembered by him, and this presumption was confirmed, when, knowing that he saw her, she looked at him appealingly for one little word, one fond, gentle glance, and he turned from her with downcast eyes and a cold apathetic manner.

She saw this and believed her eyes. She remembered the hoar old wood illuminated by the radiance of his handsome face, beaming eyes and loving smile. She compared it with its expression now; she coupled it with the experience of Miss Virgo, so ruthlessly communicated, and then she saw and remembered, for the time, no more.

When she recovered her consciousness she was lying upon a couch in a small chamber alone, and ringing in her ears the words—

"Oh, how truly that hour foretold
  Sorrow to this."

Instinctively she repeated, with passionate energy, and as passionate grief, the words, dwelling with trembling fervor upon them, until they faded into sobs, into a bitter prostration of anguish, which broke down all barriers of control, and rendered her unconscious and careless of the outer world and its movements.

She heard the whispered words of Ishmael fall into her ear without heeding them. She was aware that she was enveloped in a cloak, hurried to a carriage, whirled back to a hated mansion to which she had been consigned as to a prison, and replaced in the solitude of her chamber, without a gesture or word of dissent. She was hopeless and careless now of life or any pleasure or joy it might offer her.

She had seen and she believed. Her heart was crushed. What, therefore, was the world to her?

Erle, too, had seen, but his believing took another form.

He had been prepared by Ishmael to expect to see Lord Kingswood and bear himself with lofty haughtiness of manner, in order that his lordship might perceive and comprehend that he was neither unknown, friendless nor powerless. The presence of Lord and Lady Kingswood at the Marquis of Chillingham's brilliant assembly augured also the presence of Lady Maud.

So, from the instant he entered the mansion of the marquis until his longing eyes were gratified, he glanced in every direction for the fair, sweet face of Lady Maud.

And he beheld it, shining, fair and beautiful—a star among the fair and beautiful.

A turn of his eye enabled him to see that her eyes were downcast, and that the expression of her face was that of one who either listened with deep attention to the airy words poured into her ear by her young, elegant and handsome companion, or that she was in a fit of deep abstraction.

He was rejoiced to find that her companion was not Philip Avon—he perceived that it was Carlton Stanhope—he could have borne to see her leaning, clinging tenderly to the arm of any one but Philip Avon.

He gnashed his teeth at the bare possibility of her doing so even by compulsion. He thought it not unnatural that she should listen even with pleasure to the soft flatterings of Carlton Stanhope; he was young, handsome, frank, full of animation and agreeable observation, which, if amounting to nothing in themselves, are always acceptable to the gentle sex. But he felt it to be odiously preposterous for her to submit to the repulsive attentions of Philip Avon.

He felt that, had he beheld her, in that mild, listening attitude, hanging on Philip Avon's arm, he should have forgotten all—wildly, madly risked the happiness of his future career, and dashed his fist in the hated fellow's face.

He did not suffer his eye to dwell upon her pale and beautiful features for more than an instant; he did not seek to catch her glance, he knew not why; he was unconscious, therefore, whether she had perceived him as he passed, and having once quitted the brilliant hall, glittering with gay and distinguished throng, he seemed to have no heart to re-enter it.

Once only he was moved to retrace his steps. It was by the thought that, Lady Maud being present, Philip Avon might be there too, though engaged at some other part of the salon at the moment he passed through it with Violet. Then he remembered the severity of the wounds he had inflicted upon him, and doubted that, even with youth and strength in his favor, he could have so far recovered as to mingle in scenes of excitement such as the Marquis of Chillingham's assembly.

He had an almost irresistible desire to know of the condition of Philip Avon. Since he had fled from the Chace, leaving his bleeding body upon the ground, he had not heard his name fall from any lip, and he wanted to know whether it was his purpose to resume his wooing to Lady Maud, what fashion it would take, and under what auspices it would be prosecuted—whether the Lady Maud would turn a dull ear to his offensive protestations, or whether, tender and yielding in her nature, she would obey the commands of Lord Kingswood and become his bride. He turned cold and sick, and then hot and furious, at the thought.

He, too, had a strange yearning to revisit Kingswood. He had a strong desire to re-enter the old library once more and again reperuse the words which had opened the eyes of his heart, and to try and discover whether Lady Maud had touched it since he, after writing those lines on the margin, had replaced it in its old resting-place on the time-worn shelf.

If she had?

He passed his hand over his heated brow, and drew a long breath.

If she had, she might have added a word—only a word—either as punishment for his temerity, or in delicious confession that she had not been offended by the spontaneous offering of a faithful, undivided, unselfish, adoring heart.

He yet had the key which, by the ancient butler, would admit him to the haunted chambers. There he could obtain the key of the library, and in the silent night, by the aid of a lamp, he could gratify his longing wish.

He decided to again visit Kingswood in secret and in the night. If seen, he would be regarded only as the phantom said to flit about the ancient portion of Kingswood Hall and to wander about the Chace.

This was a resolution which, though abruptly formed, could not be carried out at a moment's notice; but he determined not to lose any opportunity which might at an early period be available.

In the meanwhile he submitted himself patiently to the direction of Ishmael. He was already a finished fencer, marksman, rider, and, in fact, was master of all manly accomplishments; but still he attended persistently the best schools in which the various manly acquirements were taught, and practised untiringly all those higher and more desperate feats in horsemanship and the use of the small sword which few men dare to encounter.

It was as though he was preparing for some deadly encounter, or some more than usually hazardous adventure, and he occasionally startled his masters, bold proficients in their various arts as they were, by feats of daring which made them turn pale to witness. Fiercely animated while executing these passages, he subsided into a quiet, cold, reserved manner when his exercise was over, and caused those who witnessed him to marvel at his singular reticence and impassibility, as by the savage impetuosity with which he fought or rode.

It was a strange regulation of Ishmael's that himself, Violet and Erle should each take their meals in their own apartment. Whether it was to prevent the familiarity of association diminishing the awe he sought to inspire was left unexplained. Erle and Violet but rarely met, and when they did, only for a second unattended by Ishmael. When he visited either, which was but seldom, it was only with a view of enforcing some point of action which should aid in furthering his terrible and relentless designs upon Lord Kingswood.

One morning, however, Erle having equipped himself for a ride, resolved upon taking this opportunity to make a morning call upon the Stanhopes. Ishmael had urged him to cultivate the acquaintance of Sir Harris Stanhope, with this counsel—that he was to listen attentively to all that fell from the old baronet's lips, but to keep a padlock upon his own tongue on all matters relative to himself and those connected with him.

He was directed to reap, not to sow.

As he was about to quit his apartment he was startled by perceiving Violet just within the threshold of the door.

She had closed it behind her, and stood gazing upon him with her finger upon her lip.

He had not seen her since the night at the Marquis of Chillingham's. He knew that she had fainted, for he assisted to convey her to the couch upon which, under the superintendence of the Marquis of Chillingham, she was laid; but Ishmael had dismissed him with a few words, suggesting that, unused to the excitement of so brilliant a scene as that she had entered hand-in-hand with him, she had been overcome by it. From that hour to the present moment he had not seen her.

By inquiry he knew that she was indisposed, but he was not prepared to find her with a face so wan and woebegone, a frame so feeble and delicate that it seemed as though she would, unless at once supported, sink, from mere powerlessness, prostrate upon the ground.

And it occurred to him by an instantaneous flash of thought, that the natures of the best of the human race are selfish; that their instincts are selfish; that even the griefs, the sorrows, the joys and the pleasures of life, are but a long succession of selfish emotions.

He had been thinking of his future, of his past, of Lady Maud St. Clair, of the revelations which awaited him, of the position he should eventually take up in society, of everything but her who shared with him the mystery which hung over their origins, the cloud that rested on their fate, the thraldom which made him restive, and her—what he beheld.

A pang smote his heart, and a hot-flush of shame passed across his brow, as he felt that he had thoughtlessly neglected her, and that she needed the sympathy and the solace of friendship yet more than he did.

It seemed to her that he stood long regarding her, and she lifted her clasped hands entreatingly towards him.

"You, too, will not turn from me?" she murmured.

He advanced quickly to her, and she sank into his arms and sobbed upon his breast.

And he whispered gentle, soothing words in her ears, and he prayed her to calm and compose herself, and told her if she had sorrows and wrongs to unburthen that she might do so freely to him, for he would serve her as a brother.

"I have already promised you," he said, "that I would be a true and faithful friend to you, because there exists a common tie of sympathy between us. Ishmael has told us this for that we have both been deprived of even the knowledge of our parents, and have both been reared in isolation. He has entrusted you, indeed, in his absence to my keeping, and you will hardly have forgotten the words with which he placed your hand, Violet, in mine."

She upraised her moistened eyes to his, and she said, in low, tremulous tones, but strangely clear and distinct, words which made him thrill to the very marrow with awe.

"I scarce know what I am, or what thou art. I am not a creature fitted to this place. My home is in the woods, in the shadowy coverts, in the leafy recesses, where my eyes can gaze upwards and see the bright, free sky between the many-shaped interstices, where my hands can pluck the bright, glowing flowers, and my feet press lightly the softly yielding grass. I cannot bear this massive, solid house, these gilded, heated rooms, this pomp, these strange beings, waiting about us, watching our steps, our movements, glaring at us. Take me away."

"Violet!" he softly ejaculated, gazing uneasily at the wild expression in her eyes.

"Take me away," she whispered, clinging closer to him, and bending upon him a passionately appealing look. "You have power. You are the spirit who roams at night, and in the moonbeams in the Chace. I have seen your form in the misty hollows. I have seen you glide like a fleecy cloud down the glade. I have seen your solemn eyes upturned to my chamber window in the old hunting tower. I have heard your long, long sigh of agony—oh, how its prolonged, pitiful moan has made my blood curdle and my flesh crawl and creep! I have heard your bitter wail of repentance for her—for her lost to you for ever, for her you loved—and slew—slew. Oh, go—go—go. No, I dare not trust you, for even you raised the red right hand you bear to crimson it yet deeper in the heart's blood of her you sought to love. Love—love; oh, men never love, they woo only to deceive and to destroy. Go, I will not trust you!"

She abruptly wrenched herself from his embrace, and made for the door, but he placed himself before her. He turned the key in the lock, and he placed his hand gently upon her shoulder.

"Violet," he said, in his tenderest tones, "dear Violet, listen to me. Compose yourself. Think steadfastly what you are, and I will tell you what I am—I am no spirit. Neither are you, but a young, delicate girl, reared in the heart of a lone wood, and suddenly transplanted into the centre of a gay and exciting metropolis, which bewilders and terrifies you, and which saddens and prostrates you because you believe that within it you have discovered that man is treacherous, heartless, false, fashioned only to dupe, to plunder maidens' hearts, and to betray."

Violet, who had buried her face in her hands, withdrew them from before it, and raising it, said,

"It is so."

"No," he responded, emphatically.

She looked apprehensively around her. She turned her large eyes to the window, and looked up at the clear, sunny sky, and then spreading her hands to him, she exclaimed,

"Take me back to Kingswood!"

He took her hands in his, and looked sadly in her face. He remained silent, for his brain was full of strange, unutterable thoughts.

"It matters little what I am," she continued, in a plaintive voice. "Ishmael tells me I have a destiny to fulfil. Let me fulfil it there. I was happy there—I can be happy there again—in a grave. I ask only to be taken there to lay down and rest beneath a tree which overhangs the running stream, listening patiently to its never ending warblings. My happiness blossomed there—it perished when I was torn away from it."

She bowed her weeping eyes upon her hand.

He bent over her head, and whispered in her ear,

"Cyril!"

The effect was electric. She threw up her head with her white face turned towards him, and said, with bitter emphasis,

"Speak not his name to me; he is false!"

Erle gazed steadfastly into her eyes, and said;

"Who hath told you so?"

"I saw him," she answered, in a voice of forced articulation. "He turned his gaze from me. I appealed to him with beseeching look to speak to me—he turned from me coldly, silently, cruelly—cruelly!"

"Where did he do this?" he inquired, quietly but earnestly.

"In that great flashing, brilliant hall, where the sounds of music distracted my brain, and the throngs of human creatures bewildered me," she returned, excitedly.

"Yet you saw him?" he asked.

"And should had there been ten thousand lights and myriads of beings whirling and darting to and fro," she returned, quickly. "He, too, beheld me—and he would not speak one word. I would have dared all—even though I had fallen dead at his feet. I would have spoken to him, if but only one little word—his lips moved not even to speak to me."

"Violet," said Erle, with a tone of voice not stern, nor yet harsh, but so emphatic as to partake something of the character of both, "you have known Cyril Kingswood for years?"

"Since our days of childhood, when we first met in the depths of the Chace," she returned, in a faint voice.

"In all those years did Cyril ever break you a promise he had made?" he asked.

"Never," she replied, quickly and emphatically.

"He came to you at all times and seasons, in the storm as in the fair weather, in the driving sleet as in the sunshine; at the dawn, or at the sunset; never failing if he had promised?"

"Never," she returned, musingly. "He brought to me once a silver horn, and when I wished to see him, and he was not near, I sounded a note upon it. It was not always I could keep my tryst—the presence of Ishmael prevented me at times."

"But he came whenever you summoned him?" said Erle.

"Oh, yes. Ever—ever! I was as sure of his coming as of the sun at the dawning," she replied, eagerly, an expression of pleased remembrance passing over her features.

"And during all these years, Violet, he professed to love you?" he interrogated, earnestly.

"Indeed he did, fondly, ardently," she returned, faintly.

"And of the honor, the truth and the purity of his love you had no cause to doubt?" he asked, with a strong stress on the one most important word in the sentence.

She seemed to understand him, for a faint hue of crimson suffused her cheeks and forehead.

"He appeared to be honorable, and then all truth, as I take heaven to witness, to the purity of his love," she replied, speaking with ardor.

"When I met you in the moonlight, by the side of the stream of which you have spoken, and to which you have expressed a wish to return," continued Erle, gravely, "you said that Ishmael had separated you from Cyril."

"He did," she replied, in a low tone.

"In that hour what said Cyril Kingswood to Ishmael?" interrogated Erle, with a steadfast gaze upon her face.

Her countenance lighted up with a sudden enthusiasm. She clasped her hands together, and with animation, said—

"He upraised his hands to heaven, and said, 'If I have won her heart, my hand, my love, my life shall be devoted to her!'"

"And Ishmael?" asked Erle.

"Scorned, spurned him," she answered. "He fastened Tubal Kish upon him, and——"

"I know the rest," interposed Erle, and added with solemnity, "by the will of Providence, I broke through an impending thicket in arrest a ruffian's hand, grasping a wood knife, raised to plunge in his heart."

Violet uttered a low shriek of horror.

"The hand was that of Tubal Kish," continued Erle. "Cyril Kingswood, in his maddened struggles to rejoin you when borne from him, met with almost a deathblow. Tell me, Violet, and think before you answer me, what is there in all this conduct to raise a suspicion in your mind that Cyril Kingswood is false, treacherous, perjured?"

She uttered a faint cry and staggered back. She pressed her hands upon her temples and gazed on Erle affrightedly.

"For long years he has devoted himself to you," continued Erle, emphatically. "In every test—unintentionally, it is true, but not the less a test prepared for him—he has proved neither false, frivolous, weak, or infirm in his truth. You were separated from him, not he from you; what, therefore, is there in the history of the past that you should judge of him so harshly for one yet unexplained act of the present? What has he done beyond all extenuation or forgiveness, that you should weep your life away in hopeless sorrow? For your own heart, your own reason, your own hope in the future, find no plea for him? Do you believe the whole human race vile? No. Yet, if there are exceptions, why not he among them, Violet? You have seen strange and inexplicable things in your woodland life. You have beheld the bird chase the butterfly to destroy it—the hawk pursue the sparrow to slay it. You have seen the lightning stroke prostrate a fair and noble tree, and it has seemed to you strange and pitiful, and yet you have been taught that it is for a wise and beneficent purpose. Hard to believe, yet you have yet had FAITH in the wisdom and the goodness of Almighty Heaven. What is all your weeping and your sorrow, your repining and your heart-breaking? You are yet separated from Cyril by a stern edict of him who exercises power over you and over me. Would you have Cyril lack faith in you because he is kept from you, because he sees you not, knows not whither you wander, or with whom? Would you have him, upon an impression which might be explained away, believe you to be false, perjured, faithless?"

She wrung her hands, but could not utter a word.

"I, too, love," he cried, with sudden energy. "It may be that I may never more speak one simple word to her who holds my heart. I may never again touch her hand, or bend my fond eyes on hers, but I have unbounded faith in her spotless integrity. Though worlds divided us, I would laugh to scorn all calumnies, all imputations uttered to weaken my faith in her. She alone, by her words to me, more than by her acts to others, should undeceive me."

Violet, sobbing hysterically, leaned her head upon his shoulder. He took her hand and pressed it.

"Your position is a painful one, Violet," he added, gently and kindly. "You, as myself, are surrounded by mysteries which are like entangling webs, but I will cut my way free through them, and sister in isolation, in tribulation, in strange, undefined orphanage, I will lift you up to happiness with me, or heaven fail me when most I need its most beneficent aid."

"I am but a child in this strange world's ways," she murmured, through her tears, "but your words have made me stronger and more hopeful. I have been terrified by what I have been told; yet, oh, my own heart is faithful—and he so good, so generous, so noble, so pure—I will not believe he can be false to me."

"Yet we shall prove it," said Ishmael, harshly, as he suddenly appeared from a recess hidden by a curtain.

Violet shrieked, and retreated from him with a shudder.

An expression of indescribable pain passed over his face, and he almost closed his eyes, upon the lashes of which drops of moisture clustered thickly, as he said—

"Do not fear me, poor girl. Well, my lessons of the world are hard to counterfeit; I would save you from the agony of finding your faith to be a rotten reed; but take your own way now, indulge in your day-dream, the awakening will come, and too soon be it when it may."

He turned to Erle, who stood regarding him with a fiery and indignant expression on his features.

"I have played the part of the eavesdropper," he said, shrugging his shoulders. "I did not intend to, but I, too, have learned a lesson by it. Boy, you reason readily, but your reasoning would conduct an unsuspecting lamb into the rapacious jaws of a remorseless wolf. Violet, my love," he exclaimed, turning to her, and addressing her in kind tones, but with a totally altered manner, "I wish you to accompany me in a ride. You will join us, Erle. I have news for you which may probably go some way to upset your golden ego theories."

Violet turned a grateful look on Erle, as in placid obedience, she quitted the apartment, and he, with a frown yet upon his bright young brow, followed the footsteps of Ishmael as he, too, left the chamber.

(To be continued.)

OUR BILLIARD COLUMN.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. V. M., Detroit.—Your diagram was unfortunately lost after reaching the engraver. Will you send us a duplicate?

W. H. S., Williamsburg.—There will be no delay in furnishing you with a duplicate of the table manufactured for Berger, as there are several already finished. You had better call at the factory, 67 Crosby street, and judge for yourself about the size.

Morrisania, March 2, 1861.

Editor of Billiard Column—In reading the account of the Amateur Tournament, published this week, mention is made of an "around the table" game; will you define the term? and oblige yours, Tyro.

The around the table game is simply the American four ball game, with the pocketing of the red balls limited to once off the spot, or, as it is technically termed "barring the spot ball."

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

Billiards in the West.—Recent advices from Cincinnati inform us that Mr. Seereiter, of Detroit, and Mr. Tucker, of Milwaukee, have lately paid a visit to that city, and some fine billiard playing has been the consequence. Mr. Seereiter played a game of 500 points, caroms, with a very promising young player employed at the Buckeye Saloon, named Deering, and the Detroit player was beaten 165 points. Tieman also played several games at his rooms with Seereiter, and beat him the majority. There was also a public billiard exhibition given, the proceeds being devoted to a charitable purpose, in which all the above-named gentlemen participated. Tieman played with Parker and also with Deering, and conquered them both. Deering and Seereiter played together, and the Detroit champion was again defeated. Mr. S. seems to have played very badly in Cincinnati, or, perhaps, the players there are too strong for him.

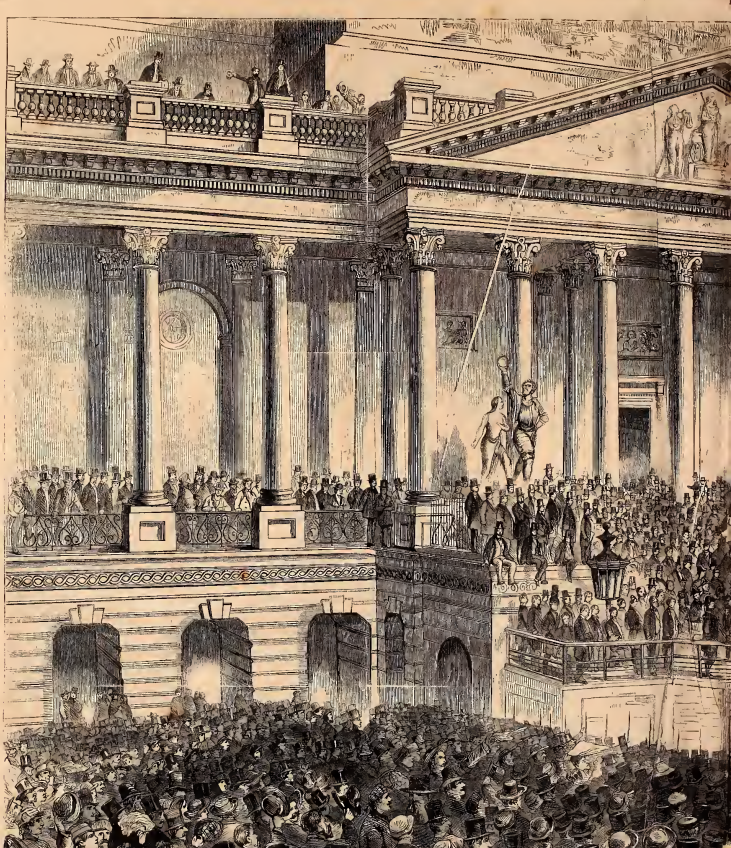
The Amateur Tournament, the progress of which we detailed in our column of last week, meets with greater favor than ever, and a great excitement was created last Friday evening at Phelan's by an extraordinary run, made by a young amateur, at the game of carom pool. This gentleman already stood highest on the list at this game, having made a run of 86 points a few evenings previous. On the evening in question, the player, in making the first stroke from the head of the table, left the cue ball in contact with one of the red balls, he attempted the difficult shot laid down in the accompanying diagram, and succeeded in making a fine stroke, and leaving the balls in the position marked A. In the diagram, ball No. 1 being the cue ball. From the break thus gained he made the astonishing run of 881 points, which, with the 7 already scored, gave him 888!—the last shot being missed by a each his play. With the exception of six 3 shots, the run was made entirely off the red and white balls; had they been the two reds, the score would have been over 1,000. The time occupied was about three quarters of an hour, and at the conclusion the player was warmly applauded, by an audience of nearly a hundred spectators, who, after the first hundred points had been made, gradually assembled around the table. This was as genuine and bona-fide run as could possibly be, there being not a foul shot or scratch made during the run.

The Tournament Bulletin stands, as we go to press:

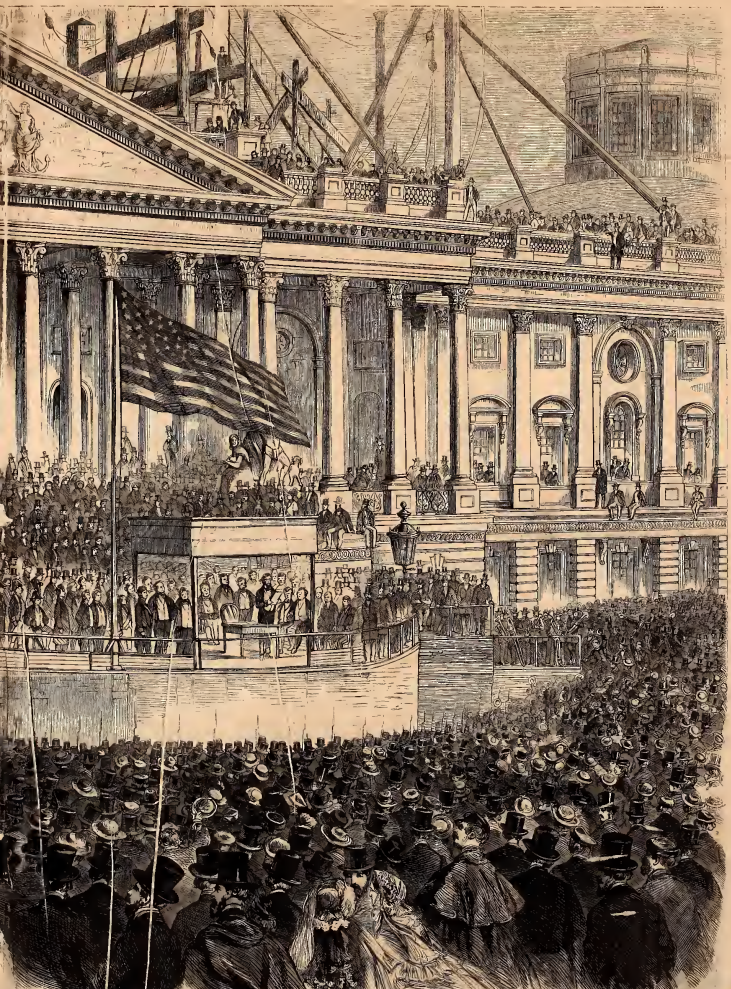
Around the table	67
Four ball carom	85
Three ball French	20
Carom pool	888

The run of 20 at the French game is also an extraordinary run, and will be found extremely difficult to beat. The prize table intended for this tournament will soon be up, for exhibition at Mr. Phelan's rooms, as will also the table intended for the prize next June. This latter table will be the handsomest ever manufactured in this country.

We have every reason to believe that the following named gentlemen, among others, will enter the lists of the tournament next June: Messrs. Tieman and Deering, of Cincinnati; Messrs. Bird and Estephe, of Philadelphia; Fox, of Syracuse, and White and Kavanagh, of this city. Should these players all enter, the contest will be grand indeed. If the health of Mr. Lynch (who played so finely in the tournament last year) will permit, he also will be of the contestants. He is improving in health, and, we hope, will be well enough by June to play with his usual strength.



INAUGURATION OF THE SIXTEENTH PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—SCENE IN FRONT OF THE CAPITOL AT WASHIN
OATH OF OFFICE FROM CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY, MA



NGTON, D. C.—ABRAHAM LINCOLN, PRESIDENT-ELECT, READING HIS INAUGURAL ADDRESS, PREVIOUS TO RECEIVING THE RCH 4TH, 1661.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY STACY.—SEE PAGE 250.

THE FIRST TEMPTATION.

OR,

MY FIRST TEMPTATION.

By Carrie Hoke.

CHAPTER IV.

Came came again, jasmin, bonding, bounding spring; but its warm, sunny days did not fill me with the same rich flow of animal life it had always brought before. Mrs. Wells said, I had grown sobery too children complained that I played with them no longer, and I was more thoughtful. Childhood was passing from me unnoticed. Coming events were casting shadows before, and that "some thing was owed," which "allows youth to be forgot," by a prodigality, owed to come again.

I was working in the garden, one morning, when I felt the magnetism of a well-known presence enter it, but I did not look up till it came near, and a low voice spoke my name.

He turned to see no one was near, and then bending, until his lips almost touched my ear, he said,

"Meet me by moonlight alone.
Do not be known to those who pass,
Move by moonlight alone.
And by the good world is dreamy and still.
Meet me when still slumbers lie,
Without loath breathing around,
Meet me when every eyelash sleeps,
And every heart forgets its woes."

"Do you understand?" Come to-night; I am going away, and not to appear until Monday. I will not forget, remember I trust."

I had not time to answer before he was gone, but I was to meet him secretly, and that was enough to make me breathe, under all the conflict that guilty joy and fear were having in my breast, and I felt that extraordinary consciousness which is born of more evil face from me in that hour.

I halted my faithful face again and again, and could not look at Mrs. Wells, but she should read in my eyes, or my beating heart, should tell it. It must would be revealed. I knew I was guilty, wrong to desire one who had been so kind to me and who still trusted me implicitly, and I knew I was to be punished for it; that to be wrong as one feels it who deceives for the first time, and sunshine and deeply dyed my soul. I was to be punished, and that unshaded whichings reached me from afar, but I could not yet realize the sunlight together that I should see, and the punishment of the next destruction.

I waited until it was still, and Mrs. Wells' heavy breathing showed she could not easily be disturbed, and then crept softly out, still unsuspecting the consummation that night was to bring.

The bashful flowers were sleeping, with folded petals and drooping heads, as I passed unseen, unseen, and the birds were all silent, but the soft, voluptuous moonlight, resting in the arms of dark-breasted night and odorous with the fragrance of summer flowers, breathed upon their chaste beauty unbedecked, while it hinted to me on its sip of secret light, quickly passing from the day to the dawn and the gull.

On this I felt something, for even my shadow disturbed me, as it followed along the path; but Mr. Wells was waiting at the gate, and once more my self-deceiving heart was overwhelmed with that very suspicious doubt vanished, and I trusted my erring master to my child's guide.

"I found you would not come," he whispered, and pressing my hand to his lips, led me on.

He seated me close to him, and did not speak until I could hear my heart to listen to the low, thrilling voice of silence.

"Ellen, you tremble; you are not afraid of me?"

"Oh, no!"

"You wonder," he continued, "that I sent for you, but I wished to anchor to be with you alone, I could not wait until Monday, and better I had left you to sleep. Is it so, darling? Have I done wrong?"

Had I thought it a thousand times, I could not have repeated the startling question in a manner by which it could be so, but I put my hands in mine and let that answer him.

"You are so kind," said he gratefully reverently as of Heaven, your hair, your eyes, your mouth, your forehead, your quiet, trusting voice. Oh, Ellen! I love to be with you, and if you could be always thus, I would think God and be content."

"You never have to go," I said.

No, I never have told you," he repeated, "the story was too sad, too bitter, but I will tell you now, Ellen, to-night.

"You seem so—oh, how long and wearisome they have been! my years to-night, as I sit here with you, and I feel as if I could be so quiet—all mine, and forever mine. I cannot tell you how she looked, only she was like you, and I loved her as I do you, and she was beautiful as you possessing. I poured out the whole wealth of my soul at her feet, and I loved her as I do you, and I doubted my faith, in the happy consciousness that she lived but for me—and my love was returned to only a woman could return it, and that but once."

"And she?" I asked.

"Oh, it she had died then, I might have forgiven myself this perjuring of my soul—I might have forgiven me for my sacrilege.

"It is an old story, but none the easier to hear.

"I had a rival, and in all the treachery and first love I never dreamed my friend could deceive or that my outward circumstances could have any influence to keep her from me.

"We were to be separated a short time, my first Ellen and I, and in my own way, I loved her. I knew how I should return, and I doubted not that she was more to believe me also.

"I went to her before I left, and trusted me. She would not even reveal the name of her murderer and mine, but my suspicions were confirmed, and I left her with a heart that was not doubted only, unable to wait, for delaying the hour of parting, but with a heart that was full of love for me, and this was right, evidently, before I became so exasperated, I could not tear out my power.

"Woman had but her choice, and among them all I had no choice left.

"In this morbid condition I met June; her quiet manner soothed her kind heart pitied me. She was surprised that I asked it, but willing to confide in one who appeared to be so interested in her, in her distant garments clad, often harms me more than this pity, in needed to be the object of sympathy.

"She did not love me then; she never loved me, and it was well she did not, for she would followed where I did not love much.

"Thus I lived, calmed in the dead sea of my despair, until a few months after I found a note upon my table. I knew the writing. I opened it to find that it was my whole heart thrilled beneath the touch, as though it had been the lips or her who had wrote it.

"The declaration was but a moment, but I knew the great gulf between us—all gulf is impassable as that which separates the damned from God's heaven, and the atmosphere grew stifling and how crushed, like a dread fear in my mind, a society that, for one inconsiderate act, condemned me to a life of wretchedness. I knew were that God, and not man, should part me from her.

"The letter was written in haste, and she had discovered her mistake, and only wished to confess that she wronged me in believing others, and she begged me, as I valued the great love that had once been, to forgive what a life of pain, on her part, must expiate. She knew her confession could not bring me back to her faith in me restored, she accepted the penalty.

"I tried to write her, but the pen mocked my desire, for self-expression and poverty and distance were the impediments of a change against my will. I made some feeble excuse to June, and in two hours I was on my way.

"The unavoidable delays of travelling seemed immeasurable, and the greatest spread of the railway most tormentingly slow, until I came in sight of her home, and then the atmosphere grew stifling with forebodings and sickened my heart, like the sound of the earth that falls upon the coffin of all we love in this world.

"I knocked at the door, and the sound was like a death-knell.

"The servant, in answer to my inquiries, said, 'Miss Ellen is ill, and none is allowed to see her.'

"I saw an old friend of hers and must see her.'

"Excuse me, she replied, with most formidable politeness, 'but I have orders with me to admit no one.'

"I must see her. I request more impatient than it was, and will see her.'

"My imperious manner disturbed her, and she looked somewhat frightened, yet she persisted.

"I wish you would go away. Miss Ellen was taken strongly were yesterday, and she would not know you.'

"Saying all remonstrance was useless, she left me standing in the hall, and through the opened door a wail reached me, and cold as the autumn wind sighing through leafless trees at midnight, and then I heard my name.

"Nothing then could delay me, and I hastened, unceremoniously, to her room.

"There was my Ellen, white as the pale conch upon which she lay. Her mother was watching beside her, vainly trying to soothe the wild ravings of delirium. She did not notice me when I took my bride she looked at me and then at her with a look so hopeless that I shuddered to see it. Her child was dying, and she knew it herself, and then with a groan she fell back senseless.

"The servants were all in the room, and overwhelmed by the kindness of the only one she could be truly my wife. My presence was needed, and looking up confidingly, as in the happy days gone by she was my child.

"I will come to-night. I know he will, the angels have told me so.' Then she turned her head away, and I left the room.

"He will come to-night—to-night. Oh, Clinton Wells, why did I love you, why did I trust you, why did I not remain shepherd and sheep? I watched and waited and prayed that my spirit might have rest, and so the hours passed.

"I knew you would come,' she said, with a sweet, and smile of welcome. 'I knew you would come to die alone.'

"And I could only clasp her in my arms and call her mine.

"Yes—yes, Ellen, I have, I have mourned, and breathing words of love and blessing, her life went out over to the bleeding fountain of my heart.

"I had listened intently, my head resting low upon his bosom, watching the pale face, and hearing the faint breath, but the sudden burning flood mingled with my tears, while I felt immolest rills, rushing from the heart of my darling, told me that my power was gone to replenish the exhausted fountain of his own.

"And this is why he is here, and this is why he is myself, and the thought, instead of giving me pain, made my heart leap in glad exhilaration to the consciousness that the one I once loved rose vastly through long years by one so noble and so worthy.

"Ellen, I have been thinking of you.'

"I come back to the desolate spot they called my home, scarred and wounded—scarred by the memories, wounded by no green coats, watered by no living stream—while I stood, almost at the entrance, a phantom of the past, and looked upon it. I felt a cold, cold hand and strove plaintively to kill and the fierce sun and lightning had scorched us to a blackened ruin.

"Oh it is sad, sad thing for one so young to be living thus, at least should be for one so young. I have no desire to see

"I deserve to be doomed for it, do I!" he continued, as if addressing some one.

"Damned or not, ten thousand hells shall not keep her from me, I swear it."

I did not shriek or scream, but writhing under a terrible, tangible presence, I rushed from it as from the jaws of death.

On, on I went, only wishing to blot myself out of existence; the dull owl hooted and mocked, the black shadows of the trees moved solemnly to and fro as if they mourned the fruits of sin, and the echoes repeated my despairing wail.

I stopped, where the mountain stream gave its first mad leap into the chasm below, and thus must I escape my first temptation.

Down, far down in the inky deep, where crazy imps danced to the mad chorus of darkness, giant arms, black and frightful, impotiently beckoned and extended to give me their fierce welcome; a cold hand seized me with a convulsive grasp. Shuddering, I drew back, and with a cry, agonizing as that which moved a world, I prayed, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"

Wet with the cooling spray that fell upon me, like the tears of angels, I arose from that prayer saved. A gentle presence hovered near and whispered of peace.

I went back to the house as the old clock was telling the hour of four, then the sound of my footfall and my beating heart was all that disturbed the deep silence. I passed the opened door where Mr. Wells was still sleeping; I dared not turn my eyes, lest the fatal spell might force my vacillating heart to yield again to weakness.

I took my satchel in my hand; the shrill whistling of the engine bade me hasten, and I obeyed.

The cars moved on with their full freight of human life, all going, and I—who knew and who cared where.

I saw Mr. Wells from the window; I knew, from the perplexed and troubled look with which he watched the hurrying cars, that he suspected the truth, too late to save his victim, and I leaned back in utter desolation, believing such sheltering arms would find me never again.

The air grew thick and stifling, a sea of faces whirled about me with divided, doubled and distorted features, and a stranger said, "You are ill," and offered me support.

"Your ticket, madam," said the conductor.

I half raised my head.

"Your ticket," he repeated, louder than before.

"The lady is ill," replied the gentlemanly stranger. "Do not disturb her."

"Where is she going?"

Of course he could not answer, and I endeavored vainly to separate a name from the chaos of my bewildered brain.

"You know where you are going, don't you?" he asked, eyeing me curiously.

I sank back into my former obliviousness, until I heard—

"Ellen, it must be her," and the arm of the stranger tightened around me.

I started up, but I could recall no familiar lines in that bearded face.

"Six years have changed me, Ellen, and I am no longer the boy I was when you saw me last; but look at me, my eyes and hair are the same."

"John, my brother," I faltered, "Heaven has sent you." And I hid my face in his bosom—a manly bosom—where I could fearlessly rest without danger of rousing the fiery throbs of passion to disturb the peace of its protection.

I told him all, of my temptation and my escape, and together we thanked the Infinite Father for his loving kindness; but even while I thanked, I felt the dull throbs of pain in the desolation of my heart's inner chamber, and yearning sighs echoed through its aching silence, for I could not forget the delicious joy that unlawful love had brought me; I could not tear away in an instant the artful work of years, and so I must listen to its mysterious voices, sadly singing, to the time of my falling tears, of what had been and what might have been.

CHAPTER VI.

Three years after and I was happy in my brother's home. I had learned life's bitterest lesson, but the syren lay powerless now, and my oft-banished love returned no more; sometimes I recalled its fearful tragedy that it might teach me to awaken only those life-chords, that, vibrating sweetly to the music of sinless love, lead higher and higher toward heaven and the angels; while those fascinating at first with delirious pleasure, thrill farther down in the lowest deep of woe.

Two years more and I had received no intelligence from the village where I had spent my early life. I had scrupulously avoided all communication with it, knowing the weakness that prays, "Lead us not into temptation," should not trifle when the heart pleads for sin, and though mine turned its longing eyes towards Sodom no more, I was still interested, for there my mother slept, and there my wicked love lay buried.

I had left Mrs. Wells; how had my strange conduct been explained to her, and what did she think of it? The little ones, too, that loved me first and truest, did they remember me? Poor little Annie! I could never forget how her sad thoughtful face reproached me as she said, "I wish papa loved me as well as he does you, Ellen; but he never wants me near him."

Chance brought me the desired information. I met a stranger, and in some way the conversation was directed toward the clergy, their relation to other men, the pernicious influence of free thought, unchecked by the strong hand of reason and principle.

"Not long ago," he said, "I was sailing rudderless toward the open sea where so many venturesome souls find shipwreck, when a circumstance checked me somewhat. It was this:

"The clergyman of our little town, Mr. Wells—you may have heard of him—a young man of growing reputation in the theological world, a man full of noble and generous impulses, of decided and promising talent, and in fact, possessed of everything a rising man could desire, but he grew tired of old things and plunged recklessly into new, until the restrictions of the church and society grew intolerable.

"For a time he preached in the old way, while with a few friends he talked privately of the new theories that absorbed him, but a man cannot deceive always, and little by little his new doctrines became incorporated in his Sabbath discourses, until his conservative hearers became alarmed, and we were soon a house divided against itself and brought to desolation.

"Mr. Wells, excluded from the fellowship of the churches, and stayed by no ballast of honor or principle, rushed into all manner of licentiousness.

"He left town in search of employment, but his name had everywhere gone before him, and he failed; but he did not return until the little he had saved was squandered with worthless women.

"He came back to his faithful and patient wife, wearied and discouraged, to madly start for another world that he might escape the punishment of this.

"He was found in the arbor, back of the house, weltering in his blood. Since then, I confess, free thought frightens me a little."

I felt the cold chills creep over me, and my heart stood still.

"You are cold by this open window," he said; "let me shut it."

Recovering my composure, I asked, "What became of Mrs. Wells?"

"Suffering, yet unrepining, she was devoted to her vagrant husband to the last.

"I saw her often; she wondered, she said, she could have lived so blindly, and then she spoke of some one she called Ellen, leaving her alone. I believe she went away while she, Mrs. Wells, was absent. I did not exactly understand the story, but it must have been bad enough, or else she loved her very much, for she never spoke of her without deep emotion.

"The society have given her the old parsonage—for they all esteemed her; she lives with the children, and a young lady, a beautiful creature, but the victim of that infernal fascination which Mr. Wells possessed above every other man I ever knew—a fascination perfectly incomprehensible to me—but I have made my story too long," he continued, and bidding me good morning, left me to thoughts he little dreamed of—thoughts of the friend I had deceived, a friend struggling in the lonely desolation of her poverty, yet remembering me with tears—thoughts of my own well-filled purse, and of the power God had given me to return the kindness of other years, and from an overflowing heart, now altogether grateful, I prayed—"My Father, I thank thee!"

THE END.

"You want nothing, do you?" said Pat. "Bedad, an' if it's nothing you want you'll find it in the jug where the whiskey was."

PERSONAL.

Another of our ancient citizens has descended to the grave. Mr. W. Fox, President of the Manhattan Gas Company, died last Friday at his house in West Farms, in his seventy-eighth year. He was one of the last of our merchants of the old school.

The Louisville Democrat announces a bloody duel fought on the 8th of February, at Duncansville, on the Georgia and Florida line, between Edwin Hart, editor of the Florida Sentinel and Crittenden Coleman, a grandson of Senator Crittenden. They were both killed on the spot.

The French papers notice that, on the 3d of February, at a convent near Boulogne, there died at a very advanced age the woman who, seventy years ago, was enthroned and deified in Paris as the Goddess of Reason. She had long repented of her earlier career. In her youth she was famed for her vices and her beauty—in her age for her piety and unearthly ghastliness.

The Norwich Bulletin speaks of the New London Star's new editorial force in the following manner. "The editorial department of the Star has been increased. It inventories now - one brain, one bowel, and one bottle of small-beer. The beer commenced working last week." To which the Star replies: "The poor rum on which the 'editorial department' of the Bulletin is run, 'commenced working' some time since."

Some facetious gentleman has been making free with the name of Professor Wise, of balloon fame. Not content with that, he added insult to injury by establishing a stand at the corner of a street in Memphis, Tenn., where he dispensed peanuts, candies and penny cigars to an admiring and purchasing community. Professor Wise has written from his home in Lancaster, Pa., declaring his peanut namesake as an impostor.

General Twiggs, whose recent surrender of his trust has caused such indignation throughout the army, was the third in military rank, Generals Scott and Wool ranking before him.

The well-known comedian and playwright, D. E. Dorlvage, died in Memphis, Tenn., on the 22d of February, in his forty-fifth year. He had left the stage and literature for several years, and had devoted himself to agriculture. He was as much respected in both his professions. He had served with distinction in the Mexican War.

The Philadelphia Press, in alluding to the movement of Mr. Lincoln in passing through Baltimore, states that when "Mr. Buchanan left Lancaster, four years ago, he was threatened by the rowdies of Baltimore with personal violence, in any number of anonymous letters, and it made such an impression on him that, in company with a few friends, he took a private carriage, leaving his escort and a dinner that had been prepared for him behind."

Misled by a Sabbath periodical, we published the marriage of our friend John Clancy. The Leader, of which he is senior editor, denies the soft impeachment. We are afraid, therefore, that our excellent County Clerk is not as happy as we made him out, and as he deserves to be, for however pleasant "single blessedness" is, it certainly cannot be equal to "double blessedness," so long as twice one are two.

We copy, with due censure, the following spiteful epitaph on our Ex-President. Requiescat in pace "At noon to-morrow, the effulgent nose of the President will be an unofficial one. The venerable and slightly spiteful Old Public Functionary, will, for almost the first time in his life, be without an office. In these hard times, the discharged servant—discharged without a recommendation—will find it difficult to procure another place."

It is with unfeigned regret that we record the death of William Montgomery Martin, of Columbia, S. C., who died from the result of a severe cold, contracted while working at Morris Island, Charleston harbor. He was a volunteer in the ranks of the artillery company, being a sincere and enthusiastic believer in secession. He was an able writer and a fine poet—his verses to an "Æolean Harp," are equal to Milton's Sonnet to a Nightingale. It is strange and sad that political troubles carry from us our bravest and our best, while old hack politicians who do the mischief are preserved.

Col. Corcoran, whose disobedience to military orders has subjected him to a court-martial, is dangerously ill. It is supposed that mental annoyance has caused his indisposition.

Capt. Meigs has been restored to his official position in Washington.

The wretch, Gavilt, who murdered Joseph L. White, at Panama, is to be tried for that offence. The United States Consul is to watch our interest in the matter. It appears that Gavilt's enmity was entirely personal, on account of White having succeeded in gaining a contract to gather India rubber, which he had failed in.

Ex-President John Tyler, after the adjournment of the Peace Convention, went to Richmond, and, after a serenade from the citizens, in a speech bitterly attacked the action of the Peace Convention.

Edwin M. Pierce, of Norwich, Conn., late editor of the Hartford Press, died of consumption on the 14th March, aged twenty-seven. He was a clever writer and a kind man.

The Sunday Courier says: "It is consoling to learn that, in spite of the crisis, every dollar of the stock of the Brooklyn Academy has been subscribed for and paid." We do not see the consolation.

The New York Zouaves have now their semi-weekly early morning drills, rising at four o'clock and marching in double quick time to the Battery. They have their regular evening drills every Tuesday and Friday. Some of them sleep at the Armory on the bare boards, in order to accustom them to military discipline. The armory being situated at the corner of Washington Square and Fourth street affords them easy access to the Parade Ground, where they drill in fine weather. They are forming a good library of books on military tactics and other subjects. They expect soon to number a hundred men.

Mr. Oscanyan, the Oriental lecturer, of literary celebrity, has returned from a very successful tour in the West.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Some two years ago we chronicled the mysterious disappearance of Dr. Rowe from the hotel in which he was staying in Oxford, Benton county, Ohio. King, the keeper of the hotel, said that the doctor had been called away to see a patient in some town about thirty miles off, and that was all he knew of the matter. As, however, the missing man had $2,000 about his person, it was strongly suspected that he had been murdered. After two years' quiet but active inquiry by a detective, it has been discovered that King, with the assistance of two men, Rogers and Haggett, inveigled the doctor to a farm-house on the pretence of seeing a patient, and that when there he was murdered. King has confessed, and the three villains are in custody awaiting their trial. They will doubtless be hanged.

There is a quiet earnestness in the Western method of ridding itself of rogues eminently reassuring to one class, and terribly suggestive to another. The Memphis Pioneer states that lately a Mr. Kimbro, a planter, saw a suspicious character hanging about. He was arrested, and some burglarious tools found on his person. He was warned to leave those parts, but he did not heed the advice. Two days afterwards he was found dead, hanging to the bough of a tree. His executioners are not yet discovered. He gave his name as Cornelius Watkins.

The Sunday Mercury has a very graphic account of the manner in which the plot against Abe Lincoln's life was ferreted out by two New York Detectives, Devoe and Sampson, who were detailed by Sup. Kennedy to proceed to Baltimore to find out what was going on. We do not consider it wise of the police authorities to show their secret machinery, and how was it that Mr. Kennedy knew there was a plot? We don't believe a word of it.

The deleterious nature of coal gas is not sufficiently guarded against. Last Thursday, a young man, working at the saleratus factory, Twentieth street and Tenth avenue, lit a fire in the counting-room and sat down. He was found some hours after in a state of insensibility. It appears that he had left the door of the stove open, and the damper was down. He died soon after he was discovered.

Some time since the Hudson County Artillery applied to Brigadier-General Hatfield for permission to form a third regiment. The General has now issued an order making them a special artillery regiment. A special election for officers has been ordered for Wednesday next, and it is understood that Captain Hexamer will be elected Colonel. This will be the first artillery regiment in the State.

A most infamous case of false accusation and arrest has lately happened at Bergen, New Jersey. A man, named Dickonson, who now and then quarrelled with his wife, was missing. As he had a few dollars in his possession, the shrew accused a young man, who had been seen in her husband's company the day he was missed, as being implicated in his disappearance. He was arrested, and was about to be committed to jail on the serious charge of murder, when a telegraphic dispatch came from Dover Plains, Duchess county, where his father resides, saying he was there and in health. Mrs. D. ought to be punished for her conduct.

Cozzan's famous and popular hotel at West Point was burnt to the ground on Friday, the 1st March. It was the result of an accident.

Six stevedores were arrested last week, charged with robbing the cargoes they were employed to unload. It appears that for six months numerous packages have been missed from Pier 44, North River, where the London, Liverpool and Philadelphia boats are loaded and unloaded. A detective was employed, and the six stevedores detected in their nefarious conspiracies. Finding the evidence so clear against them, they confessed their delinquencies.

Despite Beecher's preachings, the new Academy of Music, and its sixty churches and three thousand clergymen, Brooklyn is as unsafe for human life as a lion's den. A few days since, a most sober and respectable man, named John McCamrey, was brutally murdered in open day by a ruffian, John Cowan, and several others of the same class, because he would not go into a vile groggery den and treat the rowdy crowd. He leaves a wife and four children. The greatest curse to our cities are the corner groceries. No liquor ought to be sold in any place except licensed taverns.

The new Cuban railroad is to be built by a New York contractor, who recently departed for Havana with a hundred laborers. Another New Yorker has taken a contract, amounting to $5,000,000 for paving the streets of Havana. Mr. Thomas Winans, of Baltimore, well-known among steamboat men as owner of the cigar steamship, is said to possess a fortune of more than $12,000,000, which he accumulated mainly through a contract with the Czar Nicholas of Russia, for the construction of a railway between St. Petersburg and Moscow. We may also gratify our self-love by adding that the positions of trust on that railroad are filled by Americans. It is to Train that London and Liverpool owe their horse-railroads. Ferryboats are likewise about being inaugurated on the Thames.

A very exciting scene occurred on the 2d March at Pier No. 13 North River. A fugitive slave was brought down by two marshals to be shipped south. When he got to the wharf the negro appealed to the sympathies of the mob for protection. A policeman thereupon demanded to see the warrant for the negro's extradition. This the marshal had most unaccountably forgotten, and he went for it, leaving his sable prisoner in the hands of his associate marshal. Encouraged by the mob, the negro made tracks for the hospitable shores of New Jersey, pursued by the marshal, who, impeded by the mob, was finally tripped up. The darkey made his escape to Jersey City or Hoboken, where he was speedily put on the underground railroad.

At Sing Sing, recently, a man having buried his wife, called for his little girl, whom he had left at a neighbor's while he went through the mournful ceremony of the funeral. At midnight the neighborhood was aroused by the flames bursting from his house. Sad to say, both he and his little child were found burnt in their beds. It is supposed that he fell asleep while reading. Thus one week closed the graves of all the family.

The census of New Jersey foots up a population of 672,024, of which 644,080 are whites, 24,938 free colored people and eight slaves. Of the slaves yet remaining in the State, there are in Hunterdon county three, in Middlesex, one, in Morris one, in Passaic two, and in Somerset one. The largest county is Essex, containing the city of Newark, population, 98,875. The next in population is Hudson, containing 62,717. The total population of the city of Trenton is 17,221, and of this number 627 are colored.

THE OPEN DOOR.

(Continued from page 270.)

"Hallo!" I cried, 'what do you want here?'

"He plodded on round the corner without looking back, and, by the time I had reached it, he was gone.

"'Bolted into the plantation,' I said to myself, 'he might hide away there in a minute. No mystery in that. Next time I'll not scare my visitor off.'

"But, though I was convinced that the gardener himself was at the bottom of the whole thing, I could not catch him out. Once, indeed, I found the door open without any fault of his. It was a bright, moonlight night. I was going to bed, when I looked out of a staircase window, and saw distinctly a man hide himself behind a bush in the garden. Stepping into the yard, I loosed Phiz—it was his last exploit, poor fellow, for the next day he was driven over and had to be killed—loosing Phiz, I slipped along, in the shadow of the wall, and pounced at the intruder. He made straight for the garden door, which stood wide open. I could not catch him, though I was near enough to remark that he had only one arm—his legs made up for the defect—he ran like a hare, and the only success gained was by Phiz, who had a turn-up with his dog.

"But to return: I suspected the gardener of the whole thing, and, had he merely tried to keep my curiosity alive, I should not have cared; as it was, he scared the women so much, that not a servant staid. Evidently he liked short holdings and long intervals between them.

"It was a part of my agreement to keep him on when I took the place. Well as this arrangement ought to have suited him, he evidently preferred doing nothing on his own account to doing little more on mine. Indeed, I heard that the servants of previous tenants had been so worked upon by his report of the ghost, and their own supposed evidence of his visits, that their frequent changes must have made a very appreciable item in the drawbacks to the place, and, therefore, increased his chances of an idle interregnum.

"I expected the rather to detect him, as I had had some experience in ghostly apparatus when I was a boy, and, indeed, was very successful on several occasions with the brick. Don't you know the charm? Take a heavy, rough brick; tie a long, black thread round it, and put it on the floor, under somebody's bed; carry the thread under the door, and at night, when the candle is put out, and you know that your victim has settled himself between the sheets, though not yet gone to sleep, pull your thread a little—wait, and pull again. By judicious management, I have known a brick take, at least, a quarter of an hour to journey across the room. The creeping, grating sound it makes, unlike the step or movement of any living creature, is so miserably suggestive of something uncanny, that I have known great cowards come down the next morning as sallow about the gills as if they had sat up for a week.

"Holly is not bad, either; it makes a horrible and singular sound when rubbed against a window. I have thus silenced a room full of talkers for the whole evening. Kittens shut up in a piano create only passing distress; but a lanthorn, which throws a large disc of light for a considerable distance, may be so managed as to keep a hamlet in terror for weeks.

"Now, the appearances testified to by our cook one evening, when the door was open, answered so well to the effect of such an instrument, that I became convinced of the gardener's guilt.

"Taxed with it suddenly, however, he most positively denied having any hand in the matter. Cook gave warning, so did the housemaid. This was very tiresome, as the next would probably inherit additional suspicions.

"To settle the matter, therefore, I called the whole household out on the next occasion of the door being found unaccountably open, and walked through it backwards and forwards half a dozen times in their presence, shutting it to when I had done, and putting the key in my pocket.

"That same evening also I had them all out again, and, with a bull's-eye lanthorn, produced the appearances which had threatened to upset our relationship. Thus reassured, cook staid with us, and a fortnight has now passed since the expiration of the six months subsequent to my first defiance of the spell, which was, indeed, only a week after my coming to the place; but no chaffing or loss of credit shakes the gardener's professed belief in the danger of that act."

"Can you," said my friend, laying down his manuscript, "suggest any further means to dispel a superstition which has found believers in this village for the last score or so of years, and helped a lazy knave to additional months of idleness?"

"No," I replied, "unless you build up the door."

"That would be an admission of my own credulity," he answered. "No; I like giving the ghost his chance."

Thus speaking, he took up the newspaper which lay beside him, and I knocked the ashes out of my pipe, and was leaving the summer-house, when I heard him say, "Good heavens! look here!"

I turned quickly round, and saw him grow pale, while the paper shook in his hand. He pointed to a paragraph, which ran thus:

"This village," mentioning a place about ten miles off, "has lately been the scene of a horrible tragedy. A tramp was found in a barn, suffering from what at first appeared a fit, but afterwards proved to be hydrophobia. The man, who had only one arm, stated, in an interval of consciousness, that he had been bitten by a dog, which formerly accompanied him, and had subsequently gone mad; he had destroyed the animal, and put some balsam into the wound, which he thought had neutralized the venom, for the bite had speedily closed up, and he had felt no further inconvenience. But he died after great suffering."

"Look there!" said my friend, pointing with a trembling finger at the passage; "that was the man I tried to catch, and the same beast slightly bit my hand, when I dragged off my dog."

The death stroke had been given within the time.

In another month the house was vacant once more, and this morning I saw it advertised in the Times.

HON. JAMES SIMONS,

Brigadier-General of the Fourth Brigade of S. C. M., and Speaker of the S. C. House of Representatives.

We give in our present issue a striking likeness of the Hon. James Simons, Brigadier-General of the Fourth Brigade S. C. M. and Speaker of the S. C. House of Representatives.

General Simons is a native of Charleston, a descendant of the Huguenots, and his family is one of the oldest and most respectable in the State. His father was an officer in Colonel William Washington's cavalry, and distinguished himself at the battles of Cowpens and Eutaw, at the latter of which he was severely wounded. After the Revolution, he held the office of Collector of the Port of Charleston, under the appointment of General Washington.

General Simons graduated at the South Carolina College in 1832, with the first honor of his class, immediately commenced the study of the law, entered the bar at the early age of twenty-two, and soon became distinguished in his profession.

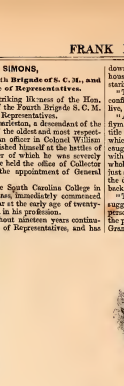
He has been in the Legislature about nineteen years continuously as a member of the House of Representatives, and has been uniformly Speaker whenever he has appeared without opposition for the last ten years, the robes of which office he now wears; and he is considered one of the best expounders of Parliamentary law in the country.

General Simons is Vice-President of the Cincinnati of South Carolina—the venerable and Hon. Henry A. Du Bessette being the President.

General Simons has been in the military service of the State for twenty-six years, and was Colonel of the First Regiment of Artillery at the time of his election as Brigadier-General.

The brigade of which he is the present commander consists of one regiment of artillery, one regiment of rifles and four regiments of infantry (one of which is the distinguished Seventeenth), and numbers about five thousand men in the aggregate.

The General is courteous in his manners, and much esteemed by his fellow-citizens.



HON. JAMES SIMONS, BRIGADIER-GENERAL OF THE FOURTH BRIGADE OF S. C. M., AND SPEAKER OF THE S. C. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES — PHOTOGRAPHED BY COOK, CHARLESTON.

THE OPEN DOOR.

Some few weeks ago—I write with the occurrence fresh in my mind—I paid a visit to a friend whose house had the reputation, not only of being haunted, but haunted by a ghost of a peculiarly venomous kind. It had the credit, he told me in his kind note of invitation, of being concerned in the death of at least two previous occupants of the place. "However," he added, "having rather a taste for ghost of this kind, I have kept a record of my investigations, which you shall hear; and if you think I have not laid the spectre sufficiently, we will join our forces, and utterly break the spell."

Two or three days after I had been under his roof, he came into the library with a small manuscript in his hand, and said, "If you are disengaged, I will read you my notes about this ghost."

"By all means," I replied; "only let me get my pipe before you begin." So I ran upstairs for it, while he threw up the window which opened on the lawn, and his wife gave some directions to the servant, who had entered the room to clear away the breakfast.

On my return, he called out, "I'm going to read it in the summer-house, and Mary, who has heard it already, shall skim the news off the paper, and give us the cream when we have done."

Arrived at the summer-house, I lit my pipe, flipped a spider off the seat, which had let himself down from the roof at the smell of a intruder, and put my feet up on the bench, while my friend, spreading his manuscript on the rough table which stood in the midst, thus began:

"To be let furnished, in excellent repair, and most salubrious situation, a country house, with good garden and outbuildings, near the Dorton station, on the Great Western Railway. Rent, thirty pounds. Inquire of Messrs. Lettum & Co., Baker street."

"Look there," said I to my wife, handing the paper across the breakfast table, with my finger on the paragraph, "what would you like, if fate put such a roof as I'll go and see about it this morning."

In an hour I got off the top of one of the Atlas 'buses, and presented myself in the office of the agents.

"Why is the rent so low?" I innocently asked. "Is there a scorpholite's nest near, or a small Upas hospital?"

"Nothing of that sort," replied the clerk; "we are instructed to say there is no drawback in the neighborhood, but good society, excellent fishing, a popular preacher, and a pack of hounds within easy reach. I believe, though, that the present owners, as eccentric gentlemen, let it for a low rent because he believes that it is haunted—an absurd fancy, sir; but all the better for the next tenant."

"This notion, I confess, made me rather take to the prospect then otherwise, and determined me to run down to the place and see for myself.

"We had for some time been looking out for a residence in the country, but hitherto we had gained nothing by the vexification of several advertisements, beyond a shrugg of sir for a few hours, down one of the many railroads leading out of London—one house was too damp, one too dark, others small, bleak, lonely, staring or tumble-down.

"The following day I went—half hoping the inspection would confirm a growing disposition to give the whole thing up, and live, not without precedent, in town.

"Arrived at the station, I yielded to the pressure of the solitary flyman, and bade him drive me to the Grange, for this was the title of the house I sought. We had not left the cluster of sheds, which had grown up near the station, above ten minutes, when I caught glimpses through a fence of a low, gray stone building, with multioned windows, half hidden in a clump of cedars, the whole set in the corner of a pleasant park-like paddock. I was just saying to myself, I wish the Grange may be like this, when the driver touched his hat, and said, 'Shall I drive you in by the back way, sir? the front is open.'

"This seemed an odd reason for choosing the approach he suggested, but I replied, 'Oh, yes, certainly!' thinking that the person in charge, most probably, lived somewhere in the rear of the premises I wished to visit—for we really had reached the Grange.

"As we drove up, I could see at a glance that the place had been untenanted for some time. The box edging had become a dwarf hedge; the gravel had piled up little tumuli of fine earth on the lawn, over which the grass had already crept; and the fruit trees were choking themselves with the luxury growth of barren wood. On entering the stable-yard, the wheels of my vehicle hamped unevenly over the stones with which it was paved, proving how deeply the rain had scooped out the soft soil in which they were first bedded. I noticed, too, that a horseshoe, nailed to the threshold of what appeared to be the stable-door, had become rough with rust, and established a little brown puddle, like the drops under the spout of a shabyteute pump, while a fringe of weeds had sprung up round the kennel of a former dog.

"Now no noise of dropping chain marked his interest in the advent of a stranger. There was not a sound in the place, except from some pert sparrows who had settled themselves in an empty dovecot, and the short puffs of the broken-winded fly-horse.

"'Shall I knock, sir?' said the driver.—'By all means.'

"Getting down, and giving a wet-sawdust slap to the hot beast, as an encouragement, he tapped at the door with his knuckles, and held his head on one side, to listen.

"'Louder than that,' said I, hearing no stir.

"So he knocked louder, till the fastenings rattled. Still no response. Justified by this delay, he put his thumb on the flat inch, and clicked it, pushing it at the same time; but though the upper part of the door gave about an inch, the lower remained firm, as if fastened by a bolt within, a few inches from the ground.

"'Please wait a minute,' said a small voice from about the height of his knee, but so clear it sounded as if it had come from lips on this and not on the other side of the door. The speaker, however, was inside, for the voice went on: 'I'll come in here directly, and undo the bolt; he has gone to see that no one comes through the door, because it is open.'

"'Who is your father?' said I, addressing the keyhole.

"'Death,' said the voice; 'Mr. Death.'

"This handle took off a little of the unpleasantness of the reply; but still, I thought, now I had better wait till he comes. Turning, therefore, to the driver, I said, 'I'll walk round, drive in by the front gate.' We should have found him there.

"'Ah, sir! I or you doesn't know half this place. No one ever goes in by that door when it opens of itself. Leastways, whoever does is sure to be acquainted with death within the next six months. The last pont but one as lived here walked through one day promiscuous like; and sure enough, he died three months and seventeen days afterwards. The last went out that way when he was a-leaving home, and got wrecked within six weeks.'

"Probably,' I said; 'most people who die or are wrecked have passed through an open door many scores of times shortly before.'

"'Well, sir, I don't know how it is, but so it is, and folk about here believe it.'

"This was a settler. Folk believe it! What better reason can be rendered for some more rational articles of popular faith? It is unanswerable. Folk is a universal sponge. Folk is king, pope, and master of the ceremonies.

"Having had my logic thus suddenly chopped up for me, there was nothing for it but to wait for Mr. Death.

"I hoped, for the sake of the fruit and flowers, he was not the gardener. While I listened for his step, I pictured his appearance. There was no doubt now of the house being haunted. I had just missed an interview. The ghost might even then be somewhere about the place. My reverie was interrupted by a heavy step along the passage: then came a pause; the door opened, and Mr. Death began to apologize for his delay.

