DEATH OF GENERAL LYON.

It becomes our painful duty to chronicle the death of Brigadier-General Nathaniel Lyon, whose portrait and a sketch of whose life appeared in our issue of the 10th instant. He fell at the head of his little army of 5,000 men, in a desperate fight at Wilson's Creek, Missouri, on the 10th of August, while leading a charge against the rebel forces under Ben. McCulloch, numbering 25,000 men. The circumstances of his death are given in the account of the battle printed in another column. In his fall the country has sustained a severe loss, for General Lyon was one of the very few men whom the exigencies of the time seem to have raised up to be leaders in this war for the preservation of the Union and the vindication of the Constitution and the laws. A painful reflection will be raised in the minds of the American people by the statement of a correspondent of the St. Louis Democrat, writing from Springfield the day after the fight, in which General Lyon was killed, and which leaves the impression that the battle was fought against fearful odds, as a reinforcement, rendered necessary by Government neglect and apathy. Says this correspondent:

"On Wednesday—two days before the battle—he said to me, 'Well, I begin to believe our term of soldiering is about completed. I have tried earnestly to discharge my whole duty to the Government, and appealed to them for reinforcements and supplies, but, alas! they do not come, and the enemy is getting the advantage of us.'

Should future developments prove that General Lyon was not properly supported in his efforts to crush out rebellion in Missouri, the people will hold the General Government responsible for his blood. How long are our officers to be compelled to fight the battles of the country with forces numerically inferior to those of the rebels, and sacrifice their lives in unequal and fruitless contests? How came it that General Lyon was left with less than 6,000 men to keep down local treason and rapid invasion in Southern Missouri? Was it for the same reason that but 18,000 men of the 250,000 volunteers, of which the Secretary of War boasted in his report of July 4th as at his orders, were launched against the rebel strength at Manassas?

The country will not easily forget that while a hundred regiments of volunteers were refused acceptance, the Government had failed to bring an equal force with the rebels into actual conflict.

The Tendencies of the Struggle.

THE important military events of the past four weeks have greatly overshadowed the action of the Government and the people. Yet that action has been most significant and important, and is no respect more so than in the indications which it affords of a change in the character and purposes of the war.

Up to this time, in theory and practice, it has been, on the part of the North, a war for the vindication of the Constitution and the integrity of the Union. And although some have been as blind or as ignorant as not to know that Slavery and the issues raised in its behalf have been and are the bottom of all our existing as well as past difficulties, yet the Northern people have endeavored to close their eyes to the fact, and have tried to convince themselves that the basis of the struggle, throughout, restored, and prosperity secured for the future, with little if any change in the status of Slavery, as it existed at the outset of the war. And although knowing that the Constitution is the greatest source of weakness to the rebellious States, and that an edict of emancipation of slaves in any or all of those States would be a most deadly and decisive way of dealing a blow of annihilation to the Federal authority, yet the public mind has refused to entertain such an expedient. Not that any one would hesitate to recommend or adopt it as a means of saving the Northern State, but from considerations of mistaken friendship, and a repugnance to the idea of the horrors of a servile war of such terrible and bloody force. We justly shudder in contemplating the results of a servile insurrection, or an uprising of the slaves, even under the restraining influences of the Federal forces.

But it is not to be disguised that this reluctance to crush out rebellion with its own instrumentalities, and bury it with its causes in a common grave, is mainly due to the sympathizers of the Rebels, on-es and land; and that depriving them of whatever claims, real or sentimental, they may have had on our sympathies and forbearance. The Government has hitherto practised on men and women of Northern birth, who have been found on Southern soil, the employment of bodies of savages against the Northern soldiery, and their attempts to seduce the Western Indians into an appeal of their cause; the organization of negro regiments, and the piratical raids attempted on our commerce—all these have contributed to overcome Northern disinclination to visit on their heads the full measure of the punishment they have provoked. Measures of repression, which we before refused to consider are now breezing familiar to our minds, and the propriety of a resort to them is freely discussed. The public is rapidly preparing for the conclusion that the Government, in its Legislative branch at least, appears to be in no respect behind the people.

On the 9th of July, Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, induced Congress to take a long stride in the direction we have indicated, in the passage of a resolution, by a vote of 92 ayes to 55 nays, declaring that "it is no part of the duty of soldiers of the United States to capture or return fugitive slaves."

And again in the Senate, on the 22d of July, an amendment was made to the bill for the confiscation of the property of rebels found in arms against the Federal Government, providing that slaves employed in any way in aiding the rebellion shall be forfeited by their masters. The vote on this amendment was ayes 32, nays 6.

Under this provision a very large portion of the slaves of Virginia must become forfeited, and be thus emancipated, either on the conclusion of the war, or as rapidly as the Federal forces occupy the State. The wisdom and policy of such a law, under the actual condition of the country cannot be called in question. The Government must exert all its powers and means of repression, in and out of the field, in order to put down a rebellion on its foundation of Slavery. And the South, which claims and holds the negro as property, cannot consistently object to his being put in the same category with other property. Technically, the owner of a horse, whose stable is the property of treason, has in fact the country enters on a stupendous scheme of Emancipation.

The Sinews of War—$150,000,000.

AMONG the most important results which the rebels anticipated from the repulse at Bull's Run, and which they excitingly proclaimed as victories, was the total, or nearly total, break which they seem to have believed that reverse would give to the National credit. Their newspapers announced the huge appreciation which would take place for war purposes with open sneers, and projected their elbows into each others' sides (figuratively speaking), as much as to say "Don't you wish you may get the money?" Exempt aware of their own financial weakness, and finally conceived of the shallowness of Cobb's cotton loan expedient, they felt sure that the failure of the Union arms in the American Government would soon be reduced to the same miserable shifts with themselves, and make a show of paying its obligations by forcing the people to accept its issues of inconvertible paper currency. They so far undervalued the prestige and position of the United States, and so far overestimated the consequences of a single disaster (as they seem to regard the loss to fort the affair at Bull's Run), as to believe that public credit and confidence had disappeared, and that capital, always timid and seldom patriotic, would close its coffers and its counting houses at the first appearance of need. This illusion, however, has now been dispelled by the prompt and sweeping action of the combined banks and moneyed institutions of New York, Boston and Philadelphia. Through their representatives, in a meeting held at the American Exchange Bank in this city, on the 16th inst., they resolved to take the whole of the loan of $150,000,000, authorized by Congress, at par; one-third, or $50,000,000, to be paid in at once; another $50,000,000 in 60 days, and the remainder at the end of 90 days thereafter. The Government obligations take the form of Treasury notes bearing 7 3-10 per cent. per annum. The three cities above-named will deliver the following proportions: New York, $30,000,000 of each instalment; Boston, $15,000,000; Philadelphia, $5,000,000.

By this action the Government is supplied with funds at the rate of a million of dollars per day, for the next four months, at the end of which time the people expect there will be something to show for the money. Meanwhile, the Treasury is relieved of heavy batteries, furlive and futile commanding, at long range, on fortifications steadily growing up on the south bank of the Potomac, and attacks by land and water on the defences of the nation entrenched in positions of their own choosing. With the superior resources at the command of the Government, and the unanimity and earnest people, the Government will prove unworthy of its trust if, by the 1st of January, the arms of the Republic are not marked victoriously at Richmond, Charleston, the open cities of Charleston and the levees of New Orleans. One of the resolutions adopted at the Bank Convention, on the 16th, expresses the feeling of the country in the premises:

Resolved, That this meeting, in assuming the grave responsibility of furnishing means to sustain the Government in the important crisis, feel bound to say that the financial ability of the United States its conclusive expectation that the Government will, by the energetic and vigorous prosecution of the measures of its officers in every department of administration, as to insure vigor, integrity, economy and efficiency to the unanimous termination of the war.

Printed Treason.

THE country is waking up to the reality of war. It protests against threatening armed rebels, taken in the overt act of treason, on the slightest technicalities. The Secret over the right bands and affirming that they will fight no more against the Government; while Union men, peaceably at work in their shops, are dragged locked up in prisons and fetid tobacco warehouses, and threatened with the rope, in case Southern cut-throats and pirates brought on the same prisons are executed by the authorities prescribed by the laws. It protests against treating spies to a gentle reprimand, and then letting them off to renew their traitorous practices. It protests against the sympathy shown by mailmen, to the utter disorganization of the Federal army. It insists, also, that printed treason, as well as spoken and acted treason, shall be effectually put down. The Northern States possess about Two of the organs of the Secessionists and rebels in the North have lately been suppressed by outraged communities, namely, the Democratic Standard, published in Concord, New Hampshire, and the Democratic Standard, published in Concord, New Hampshire. The office of the latter was demolished on the 22d inst. and that of the first on the 23d of August. In New York popular patience has not yet been wholly worn out, and the rebel organs follow their unholy pursuits with impunity. It is not likely that they will meet with violence, but there is a prospect, as well as a hope, that they may be reached in a legal and proper manner. At any rate, the Grand Jury have presented the Journal of Commerce, the News, the Day Book and the Freeman's Journal of New York, and the Eagle of Brooklyn, as aiders and abettors of treason, which, in view as such authorities as Chief Justice Taney quoting the language of some of these papers, the Jury declares that "if its utterance in the streets or through the press, is not a crime, then there is a great defect in our laws, or else they were not made for such an emergency."

In St. Louis (Mo), the organ of the rebels, the Herald, has been summarily suppressed by order of Provost Marshal McKinstry, in virtue of the following emphatic order addressed to Col. McNeil commanding the Home Guard:—"You are hereby ordered to suppress the newspaper called the Missouri Herald. I will not allow the publication of the same from the date of this order." It should be observed, however, that St. Louis has been formally placed under martial law.

THE WAR IN GEORGIA.—We have received, rather late in the day, an account of the celebration of the 4th of July, by the citizens of the Talbot Battalion resident in the city of Guatemala. Our correspondent mentions, as a compliment, that the flag of the foreign representatives—Mexico and Canada—were united for the first time in honor of the anniversary. A dinner, dance, and a variety of patriotic toasts were drunk, and all the proceedings of the day. We have only room for a single "Response," which was given on the occasion of the sympathetic Mexican flag, of Tuesday, the war-ran, during the late Provincial excitement, on the platform at "On the Christian as he is?"

Once on a time they swore to place
A bell beneath the White House throne,
To warn the god of idols of their Coming, and make him leave his home.
But long ere that bell could be cast and hung
Each one ceased to be a Christian.

THE TEXAS MARTIAL LAW.—The following is the order issued to the publishers of the Galveston News, on the 3rd September, by the Rebels, in the Texas martial rule, and will go far to convince our readers that we are involved in a contest with a people who are determined to rule rebel obedience in letter as the essential constituent of success:

"By General Order No. 3, I am charged with the present rule of the acts of incendiarism on the part of the Seventy-sixth Regiment. Without attempting to justify the lawless conduct of the men, it is only just to say that the following facts are known to me:

"That these acts have thrown disgrace upon the regiment and the service, and that the officers of the regiment will give five to the utmost endeavors of the most adjoined committee. The regiment has forever upon the Commanding General a full and complete vindication.

"The acts are ordered to lay down their arms and return to duty. All who do not will be dealt with as deserters, and shot down. The officers will be held responsible for the conduct of their men.

"The officers of the regiment are taken from them, and will be returned only when their companies in the field shall have proved by their conduct their fitness for duty of a soldier—orchestrate and when, on the field of battle, they shall have proved their fitness for command. The regiment at the present is to be sent to the Governor of New York, to be placed in the archives of the State. A short service will be left to history.

DEATH LIKE THAN SERVE.—The falsity which induced the Secretary of War to refuse volunteer regiments proposed upon the condition that they were all others with increasing and rotting conditions, seems to be giving place to a more correct appreciation of the wants of the service, and the duty of the conscious and permanent. Witness the following despatch to the Governor of Wisconsin:

"WASHINGTON, August 13, 1861.

"To Governor RANDALL—Let all the organized and armed men in the State of Vermont without delay. Give him a full supply of field artillery and small arms.

"The utmost promptness is desired.—Adjutant the Department of your

"SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War."

CONFUTING.—On the 15th, the commissioners of the fire establishment was dissolved, and the engines, hydrants, and other property of the city was transferred to the New York Metropolitan Police, originally commanded by Colonel Bendix. The Police Brigade is stationed in the Fifth Avenue, and the men in question is managed by a body of seamen of the regular service, from the Navy Yard, under the command of Lieutenant Commander A. H. Parker, U. S. N. Fire Delegate is now a powerful battery, and has been of much service in the attendance to the rebel-threatened Navy Arsenals. It will prove of great efficiency should the rebels undertake to attempt an attack on Washington.

THE DEFENCES.—When General Garnett was killed in Western Virginia, his body was taken care of, embalmed and sent home in his friends. And when Colonel Coleman was killed by the rebels, the time that were cut off the body were implanted.

NO QUARTER.—General Pillow, reported to be in command of 15,000 rebels at Belmont, Mo., has issued a proclamation to his troops, in which he says that in which he not only repeats the old slander on the Northern troops that no quarter is given to prisoners, but proclaims that "no quarter" will be given to the Union troops who may fall in his power. His language is as follows: "I have resolved to place our determination to be free, and unalterable here to strike after the heavy trend of the invaders foot. Then by her own hands rifle the dead, and plunder and pocket her own fair women from the foe whose forces should enter Sumpter inscribed with 'Beauty and booty' as their motto, and proclaim that no quarter will be given to the rebels, but no quarter will be shown to troops invading under such a banner."

THE FOOD BUT NO DEAD.—The adage that a horse could devour the dead is not of universal application. It is supposed that the rebels who were killed in Washington expedition, of which Jefferson Davis was the arch inventor, and which expedition ended in the rout of the rebels and the loss of 1,000 of the victorious hosts of Jefferson Davis & Confederacy." But the birds are not dead. A Mr. Randall, of Mt. Pleasant, Westchester County, says that he has lately, without the concealed in approaching a new $20,000 church at Darien's premises to put up a fence around the property. Upon the top of it to the steamer Perth, with the fresh flesh of England some thinly packed away in a large quantity of ice. The fence was immediately hailed, and a large flock of eagles" soon many other on board, became, in fact, "light," and while on that occasion he has not yet had the splendid opportunity of A. P. D. Fox, the one organist of which was his present agent on his landing in New York, on the 15th, he has had many opportunities of seeing the same species of rebellious import, which have given him an excellent prospect for a position in the service of the Confederate. Mr. Beverly, a gentleman who remembered that "when the waters in the well sent in" or rather, that when himself's in the well sent in.

THE PRIZE NATIONAL HOUSE.—A committee consisting of Hon. Gal ac C Torpedo, Charles Rice and Hamilton Fish sit on the head, and Mr. Maxwell B Field sit on the tail, of the competitive designs for the new marine Hotel at Newport News, for which a prize of $500 was advertised. The committee have just published their report, stating that they received nearly 1,000 answers to competition for the prize, of which about one-third struck them as worthy of examination. Of these they selected twenty, according to their own standard of excellence, and they accordingly invited themselves of a consultation to the selection of the best of the twenty, and to place the name of the successful author on it. A hymn which still has such a hold on the hearts of the people and to become the favorite tune for the service of the Church of England, and to be sung in all the churches of the country. We will now, in the course, the lightning from a cannon's mouth, and the mountains shall not be covered with a dense fog. National anthem, which the late Governor Everett, when he delivered an address in honor of Scott Key, "Hail Columbia," or even "Antioch and Liberty."

DOMESTIC ITEMS.

CORTLANDT GROVE, of Missouri, has ordered an election on the first Monday in November next, for the purpose of re-organizing the Government of the State. The Legislature, and also the voting the status of the people upon the question of the Ordinance of Secession, which the late Convention of the latter citizens of the State, as well as the Legislature, were duped from office.

THE removal of the flagstaff in the afternoon concerts at Central Park made with much favor. These entertainments are an opportunity for hearing good music, of which large crowds avail themselves.

The appropriations made by the late extraordinary session of Congress for the support of the war were as follows:

For the Army	$166,038,305
For the Navy	63,384,230
Contingent for the War Department	255,455
Total	$259,675,990

The appropriation for civil purposes is $535,400.

The Louisville (Ky.) Democrat makes the following statement: "Some time last week two men from the First District went over to Camp Boone, to look around, and perhaps with the intention of joining the Confederate army. Not liking the appearance of things there they were about to leave, but were informed they could not return. They were blindfolded, and would have been shot but for the interference of the Colonel in command. These men, one of them named Jones, a man of family, were then taken over into Graves county, and blindfolded and shot. One died immediately, and the other lingered thirty-six hours, and although his wife was near him, she was not permitted to administer to his suffering. He lay in the sun, where shot, until death came to his relief. Can any Sepoy surpass in cruelty and inhumanity such conduct as this? There is the most trustworthy authority for this statement."

There are 900 colored contrabands now in Fortress Monroe of the following classes and value:

	NUMBER.	VALUE.
Able-bodied men	300	$300,000
Old men	30	—
Women	175	87,500
Children	395	118,500
Total	900	$506,000

The statement that the rebels have enrolled several negro regiments for the war against the Government has never been fully credited in the North. It has, however, been distinctly reaffirmed by the Washington correspondent of the New York Times, under date of the 16th. He says: "To-day a negro arrived in our lines, and was brought to General Mansfield's office. He is one of the celebrated negro regiment. He fought at Bull's Run, and made his escape with a servant of Beauregard, after the battle, and succeeded in reaching Point of Rocks after great privation. He states that a regiment of 1,000 slaves were brought from the Cotton States, and the perfection of their drill led to the organization of two regiments of negroes from South-eastern Virginia. Before the battle they were compelled to drill three hours a day, and for several hours beside were put to work in the entrenchments."

The law of Congress increasing the pay of non-commissioned officers and privates makes the salaries of the men hereafter as follows:

	PER MONTH.
Ordance Sergeant	$26
Sergeant Major	20
Quartermaster's Sergeant	25
First Sergeant	24
Sergeant	21
Artificer	19
Private	15

The rations are computed at $9 a month, and the clothing at about $3, or $36 a year. When in actual service the soldier does not require the whole of his rations or clothing, and all that he does not take he receives the cash value for. The annual pay of a private is now about $324, with the prospect of a suitable bounty at the close of the war.

Great complaints are made, and with justice, of the inefficiency of the blockade of the rebel ports. The following is a list of the privateers the names of which are known:

Steamer Coffee,	Steamer McRae,
Steamer Sumter (reported captured),	Steamer St. Nicholas,
Steamer William H. Webb,	Brig Jeff. Davis,
Steamer Calhoun,	Schooner Dixie,
Steamer Music,	Schooner Petrel (blown up),
Steamer Winslow,	Schooner Savannah (captured),
Steamer Gordon,	Schooner York.
Steamer Marion.

Besides these, four others have been seen whose names are unknown, to say nothing of those of which nothing has been yet heard, but which are undoubtedly afloat along the coast or in mid ocean, or near the shores of countries where our foreign trade is chiefly carried on. It appears that these privateers are for the most part vessels of light draft, and that when in danger they enter the inlets, where ships of war cannot follow them. One noted rendezvous of theirs is Newbern, N. C.

The returns of the recent Kentucky Legislative election, as far as heard from, foot up as follows:

	UNION.	SECESSION.
Senate	22	2
Total	81	16

One of the gunboats contracted for on the 20th of July, by Mr. John Englis, was launched from the foot of 10th street, on the 17th. She is to carry 13 guns, and will be ready for sea by the 1st of October.

General Scott issued a general order on the 17th, uniting the Military Departments of Washington and North-eastern Virginia, including Maryland as far as Bladensburg, into one Department, to be called the Department of the Potomac, and to be under the control of General McClellan, who is ordered to proceed to organize the troops in the Department in divisions and independent brigades. This order will soon be followed by another, establishing stated periods for division and brigade drills, and the troops will thus become accustomed to moving in large bodies, while their officers will obtain a more perfect knowledge of what may be expected of them on the field of battle.

Attempts have been made in some quarters to fix the odium of burning the village of Hampton on the Union troops. A telegraphic despatch in the New Orleans Delta of the 10th, dated from "Richmond, Saturday, August 10th," however, fixes the responsibility of this act of vandalism where it belongs. It is as follows: "The village of Hampton, outside Fortress Monroe, was entirely burned on Wednesday night last by order of General Magruder, Virginians themselves applying the torch."

SOUTHERN ITEMS.

Rebel Losses at Bull's Run.—Official reports of the killed and wounded of eight rebel regiments during the battle at Bull's Run exhibit the following figures:

	Killed.	Wounded.
Five Mississippi regiments	60	202
Two Virginia regiments	24	105
One North Carolina regiment	22	46
Total	106	353

Conscription in Virginia.—John Letcher, the rebel Governor of Virginia, is not satisfied with the disinclination of the people to volunteer in the rebel army. He has been compelled to issue a proclamation calling out the Militia to the extent of ten per cent. of the white population, as ascertained by the census of 1860. The volunteers from each county are to be credited as part of this ten per cent., the remainder of which will be impressed into service.

Banishment and Confiscation.—The following ordinance, thoroughly Mexican in its character, was recently passed by the rebel State Convention sitting at Richmond, Virginia:

"1. Be it ordained, that any citizen of Virginia holding office under the Government of the United States after the 31st July, 1861, shall be for ever banished from this State, and is declared an alien enemy, and shall be so considered in all the courts of Virginia.

"2. Any citizen of Virginia who may hereafter undertake to represent the State of Virginia in the Congress of the United States, in addition to the penalties of the preceding section, shall be deemed guilty of treason, and his property shall, upon information by the Attorney-General in any court in this Commonwealth, be confiscated to the use of the State."

The War on the Potomac.—The Charleston (S. C.) Mercury thus dampens the expectations of that portion of the rebel constituency who fancy that the big skirmish of Bull's Run will prove the decisive conflict of the war:

"Let our people not deceive themselves with the notion that either the first or second battle of Bull's Run is decisive, or likely to terminate the campaign on the Potomac. Facts do not justify such hopes, nor does our position warrant the expectation. Washington is not taken. It is strongly entrenched, and Scott has available many more troops than ourselves. The forces that have just been routed will be rallied, reinforced and brought back into the field, with every precaution and advantage that generalship and military resources can furnish."

Judge Catron.—The venerable Judge Catron, of Tennessee, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, was lately driven from his home in Nashville, by the so-called Vigilance Committee of that place, because he would not resign his seat as Supreme Judge. He was compelled to leave his aged wife behind him, she being too ill and feeble to be removed.

The Telegraph in the South.—The rebel Congress convened at Richmond, Virginia, has passed a law putting all the telegraph lines of the South under the direct control of the rebel Government. The following is an extract from the act: "During the existing war the President is hereby authorized and empowered to take such control of such of the lines of telegraph in the Confederate States, and of such of the offices connected therewith, as will enable him effectually to supervise the communications passing through the same, to the end that no communications shall be conveyed of the military operations of the Government to endanger the success of such operations, nor any communication calculated to injure the cause of the Confederate States, or to give aid and comfort to their enemies."

Contraband Slaves.—The rebel Congress at Richmond has passed the following resolution: "Resolved by Congress, That the committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into and report on the expediency of prescribing by law, while the facts are fresh and susceptible of proof, some uniform mode of taking, authenticating and preserving the evidence of the abduction or reception by the enemy, of slaves owned by any of the Confederate States, as also of the age, sex and value of said slaves, to the end that indemnity may be hereafter exacted from the enemy."

A Mystery.—There seems something significant in the following from the Richmond, Virginia, correspondence of the Charleston, South Carolina Mercury: "The Government seems zealously to conceal everything they can from the public here. Up to this day no report is made of the wounded or dead, nor will they allow those who have sons and brothers at Manassas to go to ascertain their fate, and administer to their necessities if wounded. All we learn is from the newspapers, which obtain their information chiefly from the wounded who are brought here. The death of Colonel Fisher, of North Carolina, was not known until his body arrived, on its way to North Carolina."

Mr. Russell.—The Vicksburg Sun devotes an elegant paragraph to the correspondent of the London Times, as follows: "The last that was seen of Russell, barrister, LL.D. and S.N.O.B., he was in full retreat from Manassas. We hope that he managed to preserve his notes so as not to draw on his imagination for his facts, as he did during his summer tour. If he is ever caught south of Mason and Dixon again, we bespeak a warm reception for him—warm tar covered with feathers—another essentially American institution."

The Rebel Strength.—The New York News has the following estimate of the strength of the rebel forces, which, however, must be taken with considerable allowance for sympathetic exaggerations. "The South have in their army 210 organized regiments, comprising, together with independently organized and enrolled companies of infantry and cavalry, about 150,000 men. These are apportioned among the States, according to local estimates in the respective States, as follows:

Georgia	22,000	North Carolina	20,000
Louisiana	14,000	Virginia	65,000
Mississippi	18,000	Florida	3,000
Texas	9,000	Maryland	1,000
Tennessee	25,000	Missouri	22,000
South Carolina	15,000	Kentucky	1,500
Arkansas	10,000
Alabama	18,000	Total	243,000

We have included the estimated number of 22,000 men in Missouri, bearing arms under the call of Governor Jackson, making 243,000 active men in the field against the Federal Government. Mr. Hooper, of Montgomery, Secretary of the Confederate Congress, places the present number of well armed and drilled troops at 250,000."

Financial Movements.—The merchants, bankers and traders of the Seceded States, met at Macon, on the 29th of July, to consult upon their financial crisis. They have issued an address, in which they state that their present struggle is as much for commercial as for political independence. They lament that the North has, by their superior industry and attention to business, taken the management of their own affairs out of Southern hands. This, they say, must now be remedied. They therefore call a mass convention of merchants, traders, bankers and others, for the 14th October, at Macon, for the purpose of devising some plan for establishing a system of credits between the Confederate States of America and foreign countries, which may be practicable and available to all desiring to use it, and which will also command the hearty support of the citizens of our whole country. We opine it will be very difficult to devise a plan to restore credit to States already famous for their doctrine of optional payment, and presided over by the Lucifer of Repudiation, Mr. Jefferson Davis.

PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT.

Non-Intercourse with the Seceding States.

Whereas, On the 15th day of April, the President of the United States, in view of an insurrection against the laws, Constitution and Government of the United States, which had broken out within the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas, and in pursuance of the provisions of the act entitled "An Act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose," approved February 28, 1795, did call forth the militia to suppress said insurrection and cause the laws of the Union to be duly executed, and the insurgents have failed to disperse by the time directed by the President, and

Whereas, such insurrection has since broken out, and yet exists within the States of Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee and Arkansas, and whereas the insurgents in all the said States claim to act under authority thereof, and such claim is not disclaimed or repudiated by the persons exercising the functions of Government in such State or States, or in the part or parts thereof in which combinations exist, nor has such insurrection been suppressed by said States,

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, in pursuance of an Act of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, do hereby declare that the inhabitants of the said States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi and Florida (except the inhabitants of that part of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany Mountains, and of such other parts of the State, and the other States hereinbefore named, as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by the forces engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents), are in a state of insurrection against the United States, and that all commercial intercourse between the same and the inhabitants thereof, with the exceptions aforesaid, and the citizens of other States and other parts of the United States, is unlawful, and will remain unlawful until such insurrection shall cease or has been suppressed, that all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise coming from any of said States, with the exceptions aforesaid, into other parts of the United States, without the special licence and permission of the President, through the Secretary of the Treasury, or proceeding to any of said States, with the exceptions aforesaid, by land or water, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to or from said States, with said exceptions, will be forfeited to the United States, and that from and after fifteen days from the issuing of this proclamation, all ships and vessels belonging in whole or in part to any citizen or inhabitant of any of said States, with said exceptions, found at sea or in any port of the United States, will be forfeited to the United States; and I hereby enjoin upon all District Attorneys, Marshals and officers of the revenue and of the military and naval forces of the United States to be vigilant in the execution of said act, and in the enforcement of the penalties and forfeitures imposed or declared by it, leaving any party who may think himself aggrieved thereby to make application to the Secretary of the Treasury for the remission of any penalty or forfeiture which the said Secretary is authorized by law to grant, if, in his judgment, the special circumstances of any case shall require such remission.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in the city of Washington, this 16th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-sixth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Foreign News.

The news of the battle of Bull's Run has been received in England, and of course has had a depressing tendency. Mr. Russell's account completely reflects very severely upon the Union troops, but the English are too practical a people to jump to conclusions on a single reverse, since no nation has fought longer against misfortunes and blundering than themselves. Lord Palmerston declared in Parliament on the 6th, that the collection of the duty on a single cargo on the deck of an American ship-of-war, would vitiate the blockade. The Queen had prorogued Parliament, and while expressing her regret at the state of American affairs, had reiterated the determination of the British Government to preserve the strictest neutrality. It is needless to add that the news of our repulse at Bull's Run had caused the greatest excitement in Liverpool, the head-quarters of Northern and Southern merchants.

The Paris press seemed to be of opinion that Louis Napoleon would acknowledge the Southern Confederacy, but the wisest politicians felt assured nothing in this direction would be done without the co-operation of England.

The British press strongly denounce Mr. Belmont's proposed loan, declaring it as contravening the Queen's Proclamation of neutrality. A little consideration should show John Bull, that having 500 millions of dollars invested in our railroads and other public securities, he is equally interested with ourselves in the welfare of the Union. Mr. Bright has made a liberal speech.

France is apparently tranquil. The Emperor was at Vichy, semi-convalescent. The press, with the exception of the Moniteur, were denouncing Lord John Russell's gratuitous speech about the transfer of Sardinia from Victor Emanuel to Louis Napoleon. There was an under-ground opinion that France was really more favorable to the Southern Confederacy than even England, but it was mere speculation. There had been an unseemly dispute between General de Goyon, the Commander of the French troops at Rome, and Abbé Merode, the Papal War Minister, in which the two disputants had nearly come to blows. It is said that the Emperor was very much annoyed, since the War Minister of Pope Pius had spoken of the eldest son of the church in very uncomplimentary terms. The rest of Europe offers nothing of interest to this side the Atlantic. The discontent in Warsaw and Hungary remains as usual—wide-spread and threatening.

Affairs still continue very unsatisfactory in Japan, the Tycoon trying to evade his treaty obligations by every means in his power.

Considerable disgust was lately caused at Spa by the decision of a wager of 2,000 francs, between Baron Dumesnil and M. Bernard, of Liege, the latter having backed his horse, a cob of the Ardennes breed, to run a distance of forty-eight leagues against a half-bred English horse belonging to the baron. The maximum time allowed was sixteen hours. The horses started at half-past eight in the morning, and were to go three times to Liege and back. The English horse did two thirds of the work, but broke down at Cuener, and is not expected to live. The cob did the whole distance, but died from exhaustion while being led to the stable. Such acts of cruelty surely do not come within the limits of legitimate sport.

Latest Intelligence.

The War Department has ordered all regiments and parts of regiments to proceed with all despatch to Washington, at the expense of the United States Government. A very important order has likewise been issued by the Secretary of State, as follows:

"Until further notice no person will be allowed to go abroad from a port of the United States without a passport either from this department or countersigned by the Secretary of State. Nor will any person be allowed to land in the United States without a passport from a minister or consul of the United States, or, if a foreigner, from his own Government, countersigned by such minister or consul."

Due time is to be allowed for its promulgation in countries from whence the passengers arrive.

General Butler, who resigned his command in Eastern Virginia to General Wool on the 19th, took upon himself the responsibility of paying the New York regiments stationed under his command at Fortress Monroe and Newport News.

The steamer Pocahontas was fired on from the rebel batteries near Aquia Creek, on the 17th. This is the first time the rebels have attempted to interrupt the navigation of the Potomac. It is believed that they are attempting to close the river by batteries at Mathias Point.

The Navy Department is displaying great activity. There are between thirty and forty vessels of war building at the various shipyards of the North, and over fifty purchased steamships and sailing vessels rapidly being fitted for war purposes, besides those that have already gone to join the blockade.

Major-General Sanford has resumed command of the First Division of New York State Militia, and has issued an order (August 19th) to the Colonels of the various regiments to report to him the condition of their commands with reference to their full organization and preparation for duty.

The St. Thomas papers publish an official notice from the Danish Government, excluding privateers from all the ports of the Danish West Indies.

The report of the death of the Hon. Alexander R. Boteler, late representative in Congress from the Harper's Ferry district of Virginia, is not correct. It was his son, bearing the same name, who was wounded in the foot at Bull Run, and died of lockjaw.

The Superintendent of Police has directed the arrest of every soldier roaming the streets, who is not able to give a good account of himself, as a deserter.

Major-General Butler is on his way to Massachusetts, to recruit a new division of 5,000 men to serve during the war.

Advices from Kentucky state that the new Union Legislature will request Senators Breckinridge and Powell to resign.

The sureties of George N. Sanders, late Navy Agent in this city, have been sued by the Government, on an alleged default of $21,000 in the accounts of Mr. Sanders.

C. F. Jackson, the runaway rebel Governor of Missouri, has issued a proclamation from some place in Virginia, declaring "the political relations existing between the people and government of Missouri and the United States totally dissolved." It happens, however, that the State Convention of the people of Missouri some time ago "totally dissolved" all connection with Mr. Jackson, and elected Mr. Gamble in his place. Jackson seems to think that he owns "the people and government of Missouri." He is evidently a fool as well as knave.

There are the following regular National forces now in New York:

The Memphis (Tenn.) papers place the rebel loss in the fight against Gen. Lyon at Wilson's Creek, at 800 killed and 1,200 wounded. In proportion to the numbers engaged, this battle was four times as bloody as that at Bull's Run.

The Treasury Department will immediately begin the gradual issue and employment of United States notes of the convenient denominations of fives, tens and twenties, payable on demand in specie, on presentation at the branch offices of the Treasury designated in the corner of each note.

The following is the only paragraph in the Queen's Speech, proroguing Parliament, which relates to the United States: "The dissensions which arose some months ago in the United States of North America have, unfortunately, assumed the character of open war. Her Majesty, deeply lamenting this calamitous result, has determined, in common with the other powers of Europe, to preserve a strict neutrality between the contending parties."

Colonel McCunn, of the New York 37th regiment, has been tried by court martial in Washington, on a charge of unofficerlike conduct, found guilty, deposed from his command, and broken of all military rank.

Lieutenant F. G. West, of the United States Navy, resident of New Rochelle, New York, has committed suicide by taking laudanum. Cause, domestic trouble.

The Jeffersonian, a Secession sympathizing newspaper, published in Westchester, Pa., was "cleaned out" by a committee of the people, on the night of the 19th.

A careful computation of the killed, wounded and missing on both sides, since the commencement of the present troubles, gives the following result:

	UNION LOSS.	REBEL LOSS.
Killed	768	1,132
Wounded	1,844	3,130
Prisoners	1,216	1,242
Total	3,828	5,503

Among the 250 officers of volunteer regiments who have resigned under the new order of things at Washington—which is changing our army from a political to a military standard—177, or more than two thirds, are from the state of New York.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

A sarcophagus, intended for the royal mausoleum at Frogmore, has arrived in London. It will enclose the coffins containing the remains of her late Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent (the mother of Queen Victoria), and is of blue marble of very fine quality. The principal part is formed from a block of some six tons in weight, hollowed out to the requisite depth entirely by the chisel. On one end there is a monogram of the letters Alpha and Omega, encircled by a serpent, executed in the early Christian symbolic style, and on the bevel of the top, on one side, an inscription in English, setting forth the titles, age, &c., of her late Royal Highness, an inscription in German occupying the other side.

The storehouse of scenery of the Opera, Paris, destroyed by fire on July 10, contained 133 sets of scenery, beside other properties; the loss amounted to 750,000 francs. The scenery of "Semiramis," "Tannhauser," "La Sylphide," "La Juive," "Orfa," "La Reine de Chypre," was destroyed; but that of the operas now being played was kept in a different place, so that there will be no interruption of the performances.

The Irish census, just published, discloses the fact that during the last ten years the population of Ireland has decreased 787,842, or 12.02 per cent. upon the gross amount. Within the period mentioned, no fewer than 1,230,986 Irishmen sailed from ports of the United Kingdom, 1,174,110 of whom were represented as permanent emigrants.

Count Cavour's confessor, Brother Giacomo, visited the Pope soon after the statesman's death. On learning that the count had made no recantation, Pius grew exceedingly angry and threatened the monk with the terrors of Holy Office, unless he either reported that Cavour had recanted, or signed an acknowledgment that he had failed in his duty as confessor. The monk's only answer was, "Would that all Christians could die like Cavour!"

A solid bar of silver, bearing date 1532, of the value of £125, was discovered at Erith, by some grubbers, at the foot of an old decayed tree. By the consent of the owner of the land, and no claim being made by the Government, the bar was sold and the proceeds divided among the finders of the treasure.

What sporting men will consider an absurd exhibition took place a few nights back in the forest of Fontainebleau—a stag hunting at the night! The hounds were duly turned out, the huntsmen were at their posts, the courtiers in costume of green and gold proceed to the rendezvous, and their Majesties were present. A stag was let loose, but he didn't run far; the hounds could not maintain the scent, the huntsmen made blunders—everything, in a word, went wrong. It was perceived that a stag-hunt by night was an impossibility. The newspapers have been "invited" to say nothing of the ludicrous affair.

LANDING OF UNION TROOPS AT PARKERSBURG, WESTERN VIRGINIA.—From a Sketch by our Special Artist accompanying Gunboat Expedition's Command.

SCENE IN ADAM'S EXPRESS OFFICE, AT FORTRESS MONROE—THE VOLUNTEERS RECEIVING LETTERS AND PARCELS FROM HOME.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GEN. BUTLER'S COMMAND.

PARKERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

PARKERSBURG is a thriving post village on the Ohio River, and is the capital of Wood county, Virginia. It is situated at the mouth of the Little Kanawha River, and altogether presents a most picturesque appearance, the houses being very neatly built, and well placed. It is about 100 miles from Wheeling, and 238 miles from Richmond in a direct W. N. W. direction. It contains a court-house, churches of several denominations, a bank, a printing-office and several steam mills. Its population is nearly 4,000. It has excellent turnpike roads to Staunton and Weubester, and the north-western branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad terminates here. Our view represents the arrival of Union troops during the present campaign, previous to the total clearance of the Kanawha Valley from the presence of Wise and his Rebel troops.

SCENE AT THE OFFICE OF ADAMS'S EXPRESS, FORTRESS MONROE.

It is only those who have relatives in camp who can tell the feverish anxiety of the troops to hear from those they love at home, and from whom a few months since they had fondly hoped nothing but death could ever them sever. Alas! duty, a principle as immovable as death to the honorable mind, has stepped in, and demanded the sacrifice of separation from all a man holds dear—a separation which may be only for a season, but, alas! may also be for all time. We need hardly describe a scene which so thoroughly explains itself. The name of Adams's Express will henceforth be a household one, both to the donor and receiver of good things sent to the absent soldier.

HON. FRANK H. PIERPONT, GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

HON. FRANK H. PIERPONT, who has been recently elected Governor of Virginia, in place of John Letcher, who vacated his office by his treason to the United States Government, is a resident of Marion county, one of the strong Union counties of North-western Virginia. Mr. Pierpont has been a member of the General Assembly of the State, and has had considerable legislative experience. He is a considerable-in-law by profession, and occupies a good position at the bar. He is yet in the prime of life, being about forty-five years of age. He has a fine personal appearance, a full form and florid complexion, and is an earnest public speaker. He was a warm supporter of Bell and Everett at the last Presidential canvass, and is now an unconditional Union man. He was a member of the Reform Convention, and was a zealous opponent of Mr. Carlisle in his efforts to effect, at that time, the organization of a Provisional Government.

HON. FRANK H. PIERPONT, ELECTED GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA BY THE UNION CONVENTION AT WHEELING, IN PLACE OF JOHN LETCHER.

TAKING AWAY THE COLORS OF THE Seventy-Ninth New York Regiment.

A WASHINGTON correspondent thus describes the taking away of the flag of the 79th New York Regiment, which they had carried with so much honor at Bull Run, but which they subsequently discredited by open mutiny at Washington. "The scene during the reading of the order of Gen. McClellan was exceedingly impressive. The sun was just going down, and in the hazy, uncertain twilight the features and forms of officers and men could scarcely be distinguished. Immediately behind his sad was General Porter, firm and self-possessed. Colonel Stevens was in front of the regiment, endeavoring to quiet his rather nervous horse. In the rear of the regulars, and a little distance apart, General Stokes sat carelessly on horseback, coolly smoking a cigar and conversing with some friends. At the time during the reading a murmur passed through the line of the mutineers, and when that portion of the order directing the regiment to surrender its colors was read, a private in one of the rear lines cried out in broad Scotch tones, "Let's keep the colors, boys!" No response was made by the remainder of the regiment. Major Sykes at once rode up the line to where the voice was heard. It would have been more than the soldier's life was worth had he been discovered at the moment, in pistol range, by any of the officers."

MUTINY OF THE SEVENTY-NINTH NEW YORK REGIMENT.

THE word "mutiny" is a terrible one to military ears, and will strike with peculiar emphasis upon the European tympanum. It should, however, be remembered that our voluntary system materially modifies its significance, and what a strict disciplinarian might consider as unpardonable has many palliating circumstances. A state of real war is so strange to our citizens that they do not as yet realize its necessities, and cannot understand its duties. A little wholesome reflection will soon show our citizen soldiers the folly and danger of tampering with the solemn responsibilities of discipline.

The Seventy-ninth, or Highland Regiment, had behaved with so much steadiness at the unlucky Bull Run battle, that the news of a motley in its ranks caused more than usual surprise. The ostensible grievance is that the soldiers were promised a furlough, in order to see their families, arrange their affairs, and elect their officers, the death of Colonel Carnduff having necessitation of others, having left several vacancies. It is observed that the regiment was very unwilling to been called in the Sickles Brigade. These circumstances so much influenced the minds of the men that, when they received orders to cross over into Virginia on the 16th instant, a large majority flatly refused to march a step. When this was reported to General McClellan he ordered the attendance of four of infantry, cavalry and artillery, under the command of Provost Marshal Porter, to surround the camp of the 79th Regiment, and disarm, and dismount their arms. It is said that the 79th Regiment, Colonel Markham, was ordered by General Scott for his squadron, the veterans passed, and said "Suppose that we should refuse to march, what will you do?" The victor of Gunner replied, "I have force to compel them!" Gen. Scott signed the order. An eye-witness thus describes the complete scene:

"This order was executed by General Porter in excellent style. When he had his men in position, he ordered them to load, and in a good deal scattered. Suddenly they found themselves surrounded by artillery, cavalry and infantry. Immediately Porter told Colonel Stevens to order his men to fall in. The order was given. The obedient regiment of the Sickles Brigade—Colonel Stevens, welcomed General Porter, and were in line with their arms; he ordered and then dismissed by Colonel Stevens. When this order to fall in was given, the men obeyed promptly. General Porter then took up the line of march for the city. The obedient regiment were ordered to camp in the rear, and the disobedient were ironed and put under guard. It was soon shown that superior discipline had been used to induce most of the disobedient to take up which they now regret. They are accordingly returned to their duty.

Our artist has sent two excellent sketches of this untoward event—one representing the arrest of the mutineers, and the other the conveying them to jail. It is to be hoped that this example will not be lost upon other regiments, who may have similar loose ideas of discipline. At the same time, every military authority should remember that they are equally bound to fulfil their part of the contract by giving proper furloughs, promptly granting proper officering and wholesome rations. These conditions fulfilled, and we are convinced the Union army will be invincible.

GREAT BATTLE AT WILSON'S CREEK, MISSOURI.

A GREAT battle was fought in Missouri on the 10th inst., near Wilson's Creek, on the road to Springfield, the capital of Greene county, between the Unionforces, under General Lyon, numbering 5,000 men, and the combined rebel army, under General McCulloch and Price, numbering 25,000 men. The rebels were led by General Lyon, in command of the centre, supported by General Sigel and Major Sturgis. The rebels were commanded in the great disparity of numbers, the rebels were driven from their position and had entirely to retire, leaving their dead, wounded and prisoners. The victory, however, was dearly purchased, General Lyon, the leader of the brigade, was killed. The loss of just killed, and between one and two hundred wounded. Major Sturgis is reported to be killed. The rebel loss is reported to be very heavy. Federal reinforcements were hurrying forward to Springfield to relieve that the rebel army had retreated.

After the fall of General Lyon the command devolved upon Colonel Sigel, who, with the remainder of the troops, numbering about 5,000 men, retreated to Springfield, and there awaited the attack of the Union cavalry did not pursue the rebels, but returned to Springfield. Sigel fell back upon Rolla, where he was joined by reinforcements, and the rebels, it is supposed, will not attempt to follow. It is believed that General Sigel will have command of the entire force shall have been placed on something like a numerical equality with that of the rebels. Missouri is now safe, and the rebels Creek must be regarded as only second in importance to that before Manassas. The following account by a participant is written on the 11th, five days after the battle:

On the night of August 9th we had a camp of 5,000 men united in the cause of our country, and ready to do battle for the right. Our position was in a military point of view the most well-nigh impregnable, but from the rebel position we were only 1,000 men. Our force was divided into two brigades of about six regiments each, and a very large body of cavalry. Our brigade was commanded by General Lyon, and the other by Colonel Sigel. Our camp was situated on the banks of Wilson's Creek, a little branch of the Missouri River, and the surrounding country should not have come to us, we had left them without a struggle.

General Sigel, with six pieces of cannon, his own regiment and that of Colonel Salomon, and a large body of cavalry, was ordered to march to Springfield, passing round by a circuitous route—a distance of twenty miles, and there to attack the rear of the rebels, while General Lyon attacked them in front, opening the battle.

General Lyon, with the volunteers composing the Missouri 1st, Iowa 1st, Kansas 1st and Missouri 2d, and a battalion of regulars, and a battery of Captain Totten's flying artillery, three or four companies of mounted Home Guards, a force of 5,000 men, marched at midnight, and took up his position and his guns to protect Sigel, by flanking the rebel attack from marching upon his rear, and to attack them in front.

Sigel's force had marched all night, and had arrived at the point of crossing over the hills to join the enemy, but a portion of our column had already commenced the attack by the time Sigel had arrived at the point of crossing over, at which time we should reach camp about eight hours. He also came in sight of the rebel camp, and commenced the attack with his artillery, and the General Lyon, seeing that Sigel had commenced the attack, and that the rebels were in force, so pressing an attacked us opposite to our camp, etc. The rebels were drawn up in battle array on the hills overlooked us the south, and were said to be full as large as our force, and in fact, from the number of their camp fires, we supposed that they outnumbered and had a battle, following the woods on the creek, since where from the top of the hills the rebels could fire down upon us, and we could not get at them.

Lyon opened the left on the south, sweeping in a side-westerly direction, Captain Totten's battery on the right, and the Missouri 1st and Iowa 1st, as to run off a party of rebels south of that direction. Colonel Blandowit, with a gun, guarding the rear of the left wing, and Colonel Salomon with his movement in the direction of the rebels. His appearance in full view caused a halt in the rebel ranks, and a battle ensued. The rebels were commanded by Generals Price and McCulloch, and were said to be 25,000 strong, drawn up in battle array on the south. We had completely surprised them. The evidence of that was in our camp—tents standing, fires burning, and the breakfast and all the utensils of cookery were active, and they were in one point to camp, were put into confusion and driven from their position.

On the flanks of the first ridge, on the eastern side of the valley, Colonel Salomon, with the Missouri 1st, and Colonel Blandowit, with the Iowa 1st and artillery, met the rebels in battle array, and the battle commenced. Here the contest, and the deadliest rebels disputed rapidly, firing two divisions with a terrible effect. Here the only casualties occurred in the Union ranks, particularly in the Iowa.

The rebels were thus thrown, and were soon met by a well-supported regiment of Iowa men, Missouri 1st, and Totten's battery, and the rebels were driven from the hill, and were seen gathering on every thicket. Captain Totten's artillery was then brought into action

"Your eyes are Satan's eyes, and put me in mind of other days. Your eyes will curse you over the world. Eyes like yours cursed me. Go."

I went at his bidding, and joined Augustus in the kitchen. Augustus looked at me sharply, and, biting his finger-nails thoughtfully, began to question me.

"You have spoken to him?" he said. "You seem scared."

"Oh, no! I am only a little surprised at his manner. He seemed to remember me."

"Ah! He wanted to know who you were."

"Yes."

"And you said?"

"That my name was Master Henry. Then he seemed to fancy that he had been mistaken, and called me common."

"Was that all?"

"No. He called me back again, and his face looked wild and dreadful. He said that I had Satan's eyes, and that they would curse me over the world, as they cursed him."

"Pshaw! he raved, he raved! Heed him not; yet do not forget him. By and bye, you will understand him better. He is not a bad fellow, but he is light-headed."

"You keep him?"

"No."

Augustus uttered the monosyllable indignantly; then he continued, placing a heavy hand on my arm, and making his scar look hideous with concentrated feeling,

"Listen to me. I am a scamp now, and years ago I was a scamp; but I had a heart then, and I have one now. I made a slip, and he pardoned me. I made another slip, and he pardoned me again. Had I been less of a scamp he would have saved me. Well, time passed on, and a moment came when he had a fall, and when I made enemies. It happened, strangely enough, that his enemies were my enemies, and that we had wrongs to avenge in common. We vowed to hunt our enemies down. We were buried for a time, but now we've come to life again, like the risen dead. We are hunting them down now."

"And they are——"

"Nameless. By-and-bye they will be remembered. Their names are written down in his madness. Their names are branded here—in this scar. Their names are written in fire on the heart of Mrs. Martha Timbs. They are written yonder, in the churchyard, on that grave. Lastly, they are written on a face that blushes with a living lie, and on the torn bosom of a little girl. Enough."

"And is your friend upstairs nameless too?"

"Aye; till the time comes. We must call him something, however, and we will call him Ornamel."

"Ornamel!"

"Yes. He knows himself by it now; he had once a name which—I thank goodness!—he has forgotten. But come, we have had questioning enough for one day—to breakfast."

That day passed quietly enough, neither Augustus nor myself budging out of doors. The next, and the next, glided just as evenly, and I saw no more of Ornamel. His wants, which did not seem many, were ministered to by Sarah, whose cheerfulness and good-nature, by the way, tended very much to enliven my mind and spirits. She asked no questions, inserted her Ego into no conversations, made no comments. But she was a nice cook, and her smile was reassuring as her cookery.

Be it confessed, however, that my juvenile mind was in a ferment. I was but a boy, but (oddly enough, my early isolation considered) a courageous one. My inner life, in its intensity, seemed to have a negative influence on my physical life, and to make me bold. Augustus I trusted, chiefly because he hated those whom I detested.

I told you, in my last chapter, that I ran away from home to avoid my Golden Skeleton, little dreaming (I was ignorant of metaphysics) that I was forced to take my Golden Skeleton with me. Well, on the fourth day of my stay with Augustus, I became curious about Ornamel, and (it followed as a matter of course) I found that my Skeleton had taken up his quarters in Ornamel's room. On the fifth day, curiosity tempted me to have a look at it through the keyhole. The door of the room was closed and locked, and the keyhole was my only resource.

The man was sitting, with his back towards me, at the table. The table was strewn with papers, and he was writing busily. He was interrupted ever and anon by his wheezing cough, and I thought to myself that he could have very little life left in him. This was a mistake; he had a purpose, which kept life in him, even by tugging at the very roots of life.

I made up my mind, then, that my Golden Skeleton was lurking, in all its shining nakedness, in Ornamel's apartment. There it was, with Ornamel, looking ghastlier than ever. Oh, that I could have freed myself from it, forgotten it, buried it!

I was suffered to walk about the house as I pleased, inside it, and into a little neglected garden, enclosed between walls, at the back. There were no other houses very near to us, and we lived secluded, while Sarah did the marketing.

I had been just a week with Augustus, when he coaxed Ornamel to take a stroll into the back garden for fresh air. This he did with some reluctance, as I judged from a whispered conversation carried on upstairs. At last, wrapped up to the chin, and with a large wide-awake over his eyes, he came down stairs, and began pacing with Augustus in the garden aforesaid. He seemed very nervous, and glanced sharply round now and then, as if afraid of spies or eaves-droppers.

In his absence, curious beyond endurance, I crept up to his room and entered.

The table was strewn with the same sheets of foolscap, and with others; but on all the words "Barnard & Co." were written, over and over again, in the same handwriting. This time my eye fell on a small bit of note paper, dirty and crumpled, which seemed like a scrap torn from the end of an ordinary letter. Here, too, I found the signature, "Barnard & Co.;" and this one looked like an original, from which the others had been copied.

I was looking it over, when I heard a loud cry at my back. Turning round, I met the ghastly white face and foaming lips of Ornamel. Before I could draw my breath or make a movement, he sprang with a shriek at my throat.

"Spies! Robbers! Murderers!" he shrieked.

He caught me with his long, bony hands, and pressed his sharp fingers on my throat. In vain did I try to free myself. The room swam around me, my eyes started from their sockets, my blood burned, my brain whirled. He was strangling me. Suddenly a strong arm tore him from me, and, released from his hold, I fainted away. I recovered almost immediately, to see Augustus wrestling and tussling with Ornamel.

Augustus was the stronger as well as the cooler of the two, and he soon had the best of it. Ornamel fell beneath him on the bed, sobbing and moaning like a child.

"Mercy!" he shrieked. "Spare me! Indeed you are mistaken! Kill me, if you please; but have mercy! have mercy!"

He was seized with a violent fit of coughing. Augustus released him, the fit passed over, and Ornamel sat on the corner of the bed looking blandly around him.

"Now, look here, governor," said Augustus, shaking his finger at him. "This won't do at all. You'll get us into trouble, you will, with your nonsense; and it must be put a stop to. I send up an innocent young orphan to put those things of yours to rights, and you next door to murder him. It won't do."

"He's a spy!" cried Ornamel, in a whining way.

"A spy! Hear him! Look into those innocent eyes of his, and tell me he's a spy. Pooh! He's as guileless as a sucking-pig, and can neither read nor write."

"His eyes are like hers, and they haunt me. I hate him!"

"Hear him!" soliloquized Augustus. "It's enough to make one's blood turn cold. I hire an orphan to clean knives and house boots—an orphan who can neither write nor read—and here you take away his character for no thing. There's gratitude!"

Glancing at Ornamel just then, I was again struck by the resemblance of his face to that of Sister Elizabeth. It wore a sad expression, like that of the portrait. I thought it best to leave the two men together; my presence did not seem necessary. So I walked down stairs and into the garden. Shortly afterwards Augustus joined me.

"Master Henry," he said, quietly, "have you ever heard of Peeping Tom of Coventry?"

"Yes, Mr. Augustus."

"Well, then, haven't I told you that matters can't be explained yet and that you're too young to understand them. Peeping Tom lost his eyes by looking at the naked truth; and you'll get into trouble if you don't remain in the dark—there!"

"I'm very sorry, Mr. Augustus, if I have caused you any annoyance."

"That will do. No apologies. It isn't your fault if this state of affairs can't last. You've roused the old fellow's suspicions; and Ornamel, when suspicious, is dangerous."

"I am sure that I meant no harm, Mr. Augustus."

"I dare say not. Nevertheless, you must have something else to think of. I'll see what can be done. In the meantime, come along."

I went along. He led me up into my bedroom, and from a cupboard therein took a small sort of clothes—a pair of moleskin trousers, a torn moleskin coat and a brown cloth waistcoat.

"Now, then, let me see. Is your shirt clean?"

Clean it certainly was not, and I immediately told him so.

"All the better," he said. "Take off that suit, then, and put on this one."

I felt some disgust at the old suit; it was dirty and vulgar. Augustus saw my disgust; but told me that a change was absolutely necessary. So I made the change immediately. Glancing into the looking-glass, I saw that the metamorphosis was perfect. There is a great deal in clothes, after all. I was now as vulgar and common a village youth as could readily be found in a day's march. I only required a little mud to make me perfect.

Augustus surveyed me with a look of admiration—whether for my vulgarity, or for his own art in producing it, I am quite at a loss to decide.

"You'll do!" he murmured, approvingly. "Well, Master Henry, you can now stroll about out of doors; but take care not to speak too much, or you'll betray yourself. Keep a quiet tongue in your head, and you're safe. I'm pretty sure, too, that it won't suit their plans to hunt you out, so you need not be frightened."

"Am I to go out and walk, then?"

"Of course you are. And mind how you walk. Don't kick the paving stones as if they were dogs, and don't hold your head high. Slouch, if you can. This way."

Here Augustus bent his shoulders, let his hands dangle heavily, bent his knees, and imitated the gait of a vulgar awkward youth. I copied his manœuvres, and he clapped me on the shoulders, approvingly.

"Your own father wouldn't know you now," he cried. "Go in and win. I thought you could never stand indoors coddling, and so I've arranged the matter in this way."

"Shall I go out now?"

"You may as well. Come back in an hour or so to tea, and let me know how you get on. You couldn't manage to quarrel with a butcher, could you?"

"I would rather not," I answered, smiling at the question.

"Ah, I thought so. A black-eye would have made you perfect; but never mind. There's nothing to be afraid of."

So, imitating to the best of my abilities the awkward stride of a clodhopper, I walked out of the cottage. Turning at the gate, I saw Augustus standing at the bedroom window, watching me, and grinning approval on my acting.

I strolled along the road, but avoided the neighboring village. The clodhoppers appeared to take me for one of themselves, and made no comment. A baker's boy, passing, tried to fraternize with me; but I did not encourage his advances. I was annoyed, too, by a very small boy, who began throwing stones at me.

The ordeal, which I passed on the first occasion unscathed, was repeated; but I always took care to avoid the more frequented localities. Day after day I walked out in my vulgar boy's attire, and day after day I returned, very little refreshed in mind. The quiet listlessness was getting too tiresome, and my ardor to unearth my Golden Skeleton, and to smash it to pieces, soon assumed the shape of morbid misanthropy. Sated with change, I began to ask myself whether Augustus had not some sinister motive in taking possession of me, and whether he was so disinterested an ally as I had at first imagined. Several questions soon after this presented themselves to my mind. How did Augustus live? What possible object could he have in taking such strict care of Ornamel? In what manner was Augustus connected with my past life?

I was presently made aware, however, that Augustus was not the idle fellow that the velveteen coat and waistcoat (which he still wore, or seemed to wear, for they were exactly like those in which he had first appeared to me) might have led me to imagine. He made wine or speculation, and sold them to the trade.

I got heartily tired, I say, of my uneventful life, and longed for excitement. In the course of my deliberations, I pulled out the paper which Mrs. Martha Timbs had given me on the evening of my departure from home. On it was written, in a clear female hand,

MADAME TINKALLETTI,
11 Little Leopard Street,
Camden Town,
London.

I was to write to Mrs. Martha Timbs at that address, then. Secretly procuring a sheet of paper, an envelope, and pen and ink, at the shop of a grocer, who dealt in stationery, I succeeded in producing the following epistle, which I wrote at night in my little bedroom, and popped into the post next day:

"DEAR MRS. MARTHA TIMBS—I am among friends, but I feel very unhappy; they are very kind to me, but I should like very much to know what I am to do now I have run away, and lost all my money, because I was unhappy, and thought that I had better do something dreadful. Your obedient servant,

"MASTER HENRY BROWN."

I was a boy of nearly sixteen; but my education had been none of the best, and the above was my first attempt at a composition of the kind. I added a postscript, to the effect that Mrs. Timbs had better send her letter to the post-office, to be called for. Day after day I called for the expected epistle. At the end of a week it came. It ran briefly thus:

"I knew where you were, and that you were among friends; but if, as you say, you are unhappy, you had better come here. Tell your friends that I have asked you to come. They know me."

This letter, in spite of its emphatic tone, seemed satisfactory. I took it home with me.

"Mr. Augustus," I said, finding him in the kitchen, "I am going to leave you."

Augustus did not seem surprised. He nodded his head in a reflective way.

"Well?" he said, seeing that I paused, in my embarrassment.

"I thank you very much for your kindness. I thank Sarah very much too. I hope you have no objection to my leaving you?"

"That depends. Where are you going to?"

"I am going to London, to Mrs. Martha Timbs."

"I thought so. When?"

"Whenever you are willing that I should go. Have you any objection?"

"None. Answer straight, Master Henry. When are you going?"

"I cannot quite say."

"Will to-morrow do, or the next day?"

"The next day."

"Very well, then, you shall go. You are right; it is better. Stay; it is necessary that you should go alone. Will you be able to find your way when you reach London?"

"I think so."

"You must do so, at any rate. Consider the thing settled for the day after to-morrow."

Little more was said on the subject. It was decided for me that I should go in my old suit, and leave my respectable clothing. This was rendered the more necessary, because, there being no railway station in our village, I would be compelled to take the train at Caverford. It was also proposed that I should leave the cottage at dusk and walk my five miles in the evening. Being of a courageous disposition, I accepted the proposal.

I was puzzled by Augustus still more than ever. Arguing on the basis of his previous language, I had anticipated some opposition on his part; but I was agreeably disappointed. He appeared cordially to approve of my plans of proceeding; I persuaded myself, therefore, that he himself was in communication with Mrs. Timbs. On this supposition I began to believe in him again; for I had a great belief in Mrs. Timbs—chiefly, I think, because she was a woman, and I was led to believe women tender-hearted.

I had spent only a few shillings of my money, and was consequently in a position to defray all expenses. I felt rather proud that this was the case.

The evening of the third day came, and Augustus again alluded to the subject of my journey. He was sitting in his old place by the fire, smoking.

"You were to go to London this evening," he said. "Have you changed your mind, or are you ready?"

"I am ready."

"Good! I like people to be decided. Remember, you take nothing with you but those clothes on your back. She'll look after that. Are you ready now?"

"Yes."

"How about money matters? Don't deceive me."

"I have far more than enough," I said, showing him my six golden sovereigns. I regretted to see his eyes sparkle rather greedily.

"You'll do nicely," he said. "Well, the train passes at ten, and it's now half-past six. Take a good three hours to do the distance. I'll see you half way."

I had not seen Ornamel since the day that he found me in his apartment, and I did not see him before leaving. I wished Sarah heartily good-bye; and Augustus and I sallied out into the gray glooming together.

It was an autumn evening, and the country landscape grew dark below with a clear moon above. The shadows fell, lengthy and vast, interspersed with silver moonbeams. We trudged swiftly along the road, in the direction of Caverford. We had time enough and to spare on our hands, but (for some reason of his own) Augustus hurried me. It was about nine o'clock, when, about a mile and a half from Caverford, Augustus parted with me.

"Remember, Henry," he said, grasping my hand, "that all this is for the best. We'd set matters right to-morrow, but it's impossible! The good time is coming. Remember, above all, that you are among friends."

"I do—I will."

"And, by all you hope and live for—by the mother that bore you, and by the hand that has cast you down—do not forget the man called Ornamel."

He stalked back through the shadows, leaving me alone on the quiet road. Half courageous, half frightened, I trudged on, with the moonbeams about me.

The churchyard lay on the hither side of the village, at some little distance from the dwelling houses of the villagers. In its precincts grew six huge elms, which shaded the graves. Passing the spot quietly, and rather timidly, I felt an indescribable impulse to visit my mamma's grave—or, say rather, the grave of the lady who had told me on her deathbed that she was not my mamma.

Nervously and noiselessly—nervous and noiseless in my awe for the mystery called death—I approached the low wall which separated the churchyard from the highway. I was about to clamber over into the enclosure, when I startled at the sight of a dark figure, standing not six yards from me, reading the inscription on the grave—

"SACRED

"TO THE MEMORY OF——"

It was the figure of a man, whose back was turned towards me—a man wrapped up in a heavy great coat, long and dark. His shadow fell full length on the tablet as I gazed, and he did not hear me. I crept back into the shade, with my eyes looking over the wall, and watched him. In another moment he turned his profile towards me, and I recognized the face of Monsieur Charles. His face was very white in the moon; but there was a smile upon it. He was muttering to himself aloud, spurning the green sod as he did so.

"She was growing dangerous," I heard him say; "and women's tongues too often spoil the works of men's heads. Bah! why rake up excuses? Is Conscience the jade that fools take her for? I know not. She is no acquaintance of mine; I repudiate her, that Conscience, la méchante dame sans merci. Well, the woman died, as other women die. She was dangerous, and she died."

I became conscious of a dark figure, crouching out of his sight, behind the tablet on which he was gazing so eagerly.

"We are dust, all of us, like this; but she was a woman—a niggling, nervous, chicken-hearted woman. She was not to be trusted. And the boy, too—the querulous, dreamy boy—the poor fool began to pity him. And pity, as I know to my cost, is a dangerous commodity."

The dark figure rose to its knees—it was that of a veiled woman.

"What am I doing here?" considered monsieur, my uncle. "Moralizing? No. Mourning? No. Plotting? Yes. I have new ends to serve, and must keep my eye on the boy. He cannot be far away, and I knew those who can soon set eyes upon him. The enemy lives; but should the boy be with him, I care not. I could hang the rascal. He cannot harm me. Should he come forward with his old woman's tale, the laws of England would hold him mad."

The dark figure rose to its feet, but was still hidden from the eyes of Monsieur Charles.

"As for her, let her sleep in peace. She served my ends; she died in the nick of time."

The veiled woman rose her height, threw back her veil, and, leaning over the tombstone, gazed at monsieur—like an apparition of the risen dead.

"Mercy!" cried monsieur, falling backwards on the green tomb; "she has arisen!"

The woman's face, now unveiled, was pale as snow; but the eyes were flashing like fire. The moonbeams fell upon it, brightly, ghastlily. It was the face of my dead mamma.

PERSONAL.

MAJOR-GENERAL WOOL has been assigned to the command of the South-eastern Military Department of Virginia. Gen. Butler, it is understood, will remain at Fortress Monroe for the present. Gen. Wool's experience in the war of 1812, and the important service rendered by him in Mexico, give confidence that wherever he commands there will be efficiency and discipline in the highest degree.

THE President has appointed Major Randolph P. Marcy, Paymaster United States army, to be Inspector-General of the Army, with rank of Colonel. Capt. Marcy's skilful march of an important train through Utah is not forgotten.

PRINCE NAPOLEON, when lately in Washington, paid a visit to the rebel camp at Manassas. It is stated that he was received with great enthusiasm, saluted with captured guns, and entertained hospitably by Gens. Beauregard and Johnston, with whom he breakfasted. He declined their pressing invitation to visit President Davis at Richmond. At departing he was saluted with artillery, but in reply to the expression of a hope by Col. Stuart that he would interpose a good word when he got home, the Prince very properly replied, "I know nothing."

IT is considered a significant fact in regard to the mental condition of Queen Victoria, that she recently gave a concert at Buckingham Palace in honor of her daughter and guest, the Princess of Prussia, and, when all those who were invited had arrived, instead of entering the apartment where they expected her, ordered a carriage, and taking with her one of her daughters, the Princess Helena, went to pass the night in a country house she owns at Richmond, from which she returned next day. Prince Albert did the honors of the concert, to the great surprise of the guests, for whom this singular incident of course furnished a theme of conversation during the evening.

HON. T. R. A. NELSON, lately a member of Congress from Tennessee, and one of the leaders of the Unionists of the Eastern portion of the State, has been arrested by the rebels in the vicinity of Cumberland Gap and carried a prisoner to Richmond, charged with treason to the "Confederate States." Mr. Nelson presided at the late Convention of the people of East Tennessee, when it was resolved not to recognize the unconstitutional proceedings whereby Tennessee was declared out of the Union.

AN intimate friend of the late Count Cavour relates that the great statesman once expressed himself in regard to Louis Napoleon in these terms: "He has no definite policy. He has a number of political ideas floating in his mind, none of them matured. They would seem to be convictions founded upon instinct. He will not steadily pursue any single idea if a serious obstacle presents itself, but will give way and take up another. This is the mot de l'enigme to his policy. It is by steadily keeping this in view that I have succeeded in thwarting his designs or inducing him to adopt a measure. The only principle—if principle it can be called—which connects together these various ideas, is the establishment of his dynasty and the conviction that the best way to secure it is by feeding the national vanity of the French people."

MME. LAGRANGE is in Paris. It is said that she is in treaty with the impresario, M. Bagier, to sing in Madrid during the next season.

MRS. LINCOLN'S visit to Long Branch has caused a great sensation along that "seagirt shore." It was designed that 34 little girls, all dressed in white, should receive her at the depot, but only 27 could be found and got ready in time. Jenkins, of the Herald, states that "next Wednesday or Thursday, a grand ball will be given at the Mansion House. As Mrs. Lincoln is a great admirer of music, never misses an opportunity to visit the opera, and has already delighted the habitués of the White House by a few recherché private concerts at Washington, it is designed to secure Carlotta Patti, the only rival of Adelina, for a grand concert in Mrs. Lincoln's honor, to be given some time next week. This was undoubtedly the object of Grau's visit here last week, of which I wrote you, and we may shortly expect to see him here again. Grau's terms, however, always rise with the occasion, and he has such a gem in Carlotta that he is fairly master of the situation. I think she will come, however, as negotiations are already in progress. Mrs. Lincoln cannot but be pleased with such an entertainment. Mrs. Lincoln designs to remain here for about 10 days. Carriages and riding ponies have been provided for the whole party, and I am sure that there is every disposition and every arrangement to make their stay here comfortable and enjoyable."

"E PLURIBUS UNUM."

By John Pierpont.

The harp of the minstrel with melody rings
 When the Muses have taught him to touch and to tune it;
But though it may have a full octave of strings,
 To both maker and minstrel the harp is a unit.
  So the power that creates
  Our Republic of States,
 Into harmony brings them at different dates;
And the thirteen or thirty, the Union once done,
Are E Pluribus Unum—of many made one.

The science that weighs in her balance the spheres,
 And has watched them since first the Chaldean began it,
Now and then, as she counts them and measures their years,
 Brings into our system and names a new planet.
  Yet the old and new stars—
  Venus, Neptune and Mars,
 As they drive round the sun their invisible cars,
Whether faster or slower their races they run,
Are E Pluribus Unum—of many made one.

Of that system of spheres, should but one fly the track,
 Or with others conspire for a general dispersion,
By the great central orb they would all be brought back,
 And held, each in her place, by a wholesome coercion.
  Should one daughter of light
  Be indulged in her flight,
 They would all be engulfed by old Chaos and Night
So must none of our sisters be suffered to run,
For, E Pluribus Unum—we all go if one.

Let the demon of discord our melody mar,
 Or Treason's red hand rend our Union asunder,
Break one string from our harp, or extinguish one star,
 The whole system's ablaze with its lightning and thunder.
  Let the discord be hushed!
  Let the traitors be crushed!
 Though "Legion" their name, all with victory flushed
For aye must our motto stand, fronting the sun;
E Pluribus Unum—though many we're one.

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Lucille's engagement was indeed a complete triumph, and the manager reaped rich profits. Nightly the house was filled to overflowing, while the rival Venoni sang to empty benches, and the manager who had lured her from her engagement sighed with empty purse over the failure of his scheme, and with others of his craft tampered with Lucille for a higher remuneration to leave her engagement.

While the journals teemed with encomiums on her voice, her beauty, her elegance, and crowds watched as she passed through the corridors to catch a glance of her closely-veiled figure, murmured accents of admiration assailed her on all sides, and many a man whose lofty birth and fortune caused hundreds to bow at his slightest nod, would have deemed himself honored by handing the great singer to the carriage waiting to convey her home.

Home! It is a thrilling word, a word the rich, the poor, the strong and the feeble nurse in their hearts as a place of hope and love, a word the weary nourish as a haven of rest.

Home! what did it seem to Lucille as she entered her small, dark parlor, so dimly lighted, contrasted by the scene of glitter, of show and homage she had quitted. She drew her cloak tighter round her as she threw herself exhausted on the sofa.

"So cold and dreary," she murmured. "None to meet me after my night's trial—for trial it is, though the task seems easy. My child, why am I robbed of you? My husband, why does not your presence and welcome greet my return? A word from you would cheer me. For though you might accuse me of disgracing your name, your heart is too noble to withhold your forgiveness where you know the sacrifice has been all my own. Jules, why do you absent yourself so often? Ten long days you have been away. Alas! what is home without those we love to share it with us?"

She looked gloomily round. "It is a heartless world," she added, "yet its pleasures draw the best and noblest into its vortex." She pressed her hand to her bosom; a restless spirit had made its entrance there, and home for a time had lost its charms. Had it been a palace, her sensations would have been the same, for her heart longed for communion, the communion of those whose interests were her own.

She still lay on the couch, the thoughts of years flitting like whirlwinds through her brain, when a knock, the well-known knock of her husband, sounded at the outer door. In a moment she was on her feet, the tears in her eyes were chased from them, the chill of despondency was gone, and though her hand slightly quivered, in his ardent pressure warmth was restored to it, and the home so lately sad and lonely was decked with charms that love and peace can only shed over it.

"You do not upbraid me, Lucille, for my long absence," said D'Almaine, after the first greeting, "though I richly deserve your censure for keeping so long from you."

"What has detained you?" she asked. "You are pale and out of spirits. Have you received letters? My father! Emile! Say, are they well? A cloud is on your brow. Speak."

"Both are well," he replied. "But my uncle, the old admiral, who has so long and kindly interfered with the king for the restoration of my property, is ill, and from what I understand, on his last bed of suffering."

Lucille, though she knew the death of the good admiral would be a severe loss to them both, did her best to soothe him by observing that he might yet recover, and carry the point with his royal master.

D'Almaine was of too sanguine a temperament to dwell long on the dark side of a picture, and in talking on the cause of his unusually long absence and other casual matters, regained much of his habitual gay humor.

"Why, what is this?" he said, looking at the well-stocked plate-basket Rose was just removing from the sideboard. "Why, here is a goodly addition! I understood, when I left town, that our resources were exhausted."

"The cards have been well shuffled," she replied, laughing, "and, as you predicted, the best share of trumps has fallen to us."

"Hush! this is folly!" he exclaimed. "What means it, Lucille? You speak in riddles, when straightforward words are more applicable. It is unlike you to jest on points of importance."

He spoke with great impatience of manner, and looked sternly at her. She bore his earnest gaze, but replied, in a tone slightly tremulous,

"Jules, spare me for the present. I have much to tell you; but not to-night—to-morrow, or any other time, no matter when. Our fortunes are mended. This much I will say, and though you may condemn me for my folly, all connected with it is so strictly honorable, that you will hardly, under the circumstances, blame me. Oh, do not look so harshly at me, or I shall, in fear, remain silent; for dark looks and harsh words are so strange to me, that I shall sink under them."

Drawing near to him, she timidly let her head fall on his shoulder. He raised it, and looked into the depths of the clear blue eyes that shrank not beneath his flashing glance. In a moment the flash was gone, the brow unbent, and a deep crimson crossed it that a thought unjust to one so pure should have dared to find entrance in his bosom for a moment. He pressed her hands, and said, hurriedly,

"I ask no questions. Tell me what and when you list, only pardon me for doubting your truth for a moment."

"This is in your own generous spirit," she said. "I will not now begin to practise reserve with you. Let me tell you all before we sleep. It will relieve me for you to share my secret, for it has weighed down my heart like lead for the last ten days;" and she pressed her hands on her bosom, as if with the determination to master the reluctance that rose almost to check her utterance.

"No, no!" he said. "Let all be silence to-night and my rest peaceful; for if you tell me our necessities have been relieved through a gift from the De Paleron estates, I shall be inclined to spurn you as unworthy to bear the name of D'Almaine, or the honorable though more humble one of De Vernot." And he fixed his eyes with searching earnestness on her while speaking.

"It proceeds not from that source," she replied. "Rest secure in the assurance; for, like yourself, I am too proud to better our fortunes through the source which ruined them. But it is late; I feel exhausted, and inadequate to the task of conversing longer to-night on this or any other subject."

Taking up her candle, she left him. His eyes followed her till the door closed on her, when he sank into a deep reverie anything but pleasurable, and when he awoke from it fire and candle were both out.

As D'Almaine took up the Times lying on the breakfast-table, on the following morning, he exclaimed,

"Have you heard of this famous singer, Lucille? It is years, not in the memory of any living man, I understand, since one has been so popular in England. They seem each time she appears to find a fresh charm in her. Have you read the inexhaustible praises bestowed on her."

"Yes," replied Lucille, with some confusion, "I have read a little and heard much; but the encomiums are too elaborate to credit implicitly. I suppose she is what is termed a star, and the manager, at the expense of the public, is making the most of her."

"That remark is unlike you," said D'Almaine; "for you are so curiously apt to find out merit where it is difficult to discover it, that I more than wonder you should pass over this gifted singer so coldly."

"Have you heard her?" she asked timidly.

"No," he replied. "What say you to accompanying me to-night to the opera? I can command Livesay's box for the occasion, I know; and I long once more to see you in your proper sphere, mixing with the graceful and noble of the land."

A thought, rapid as the wind, flitted through her brain. She would go with him, and let him discover what she felt so reluctant to breathe a hint of to him. Turning, with a voice slightly tinctured by the hesitation she felt at practising anything like deception, she replied,

"The manager is an old friend of my father's—they fought together the battles of France. His box is at our service, I know; for he has frequently offered it to me."

"But why test the manager's good nature at a time like the present, when Livesay's will be unoccupied?" asked D'Almaine.

"But it is too conspicuous," said Lucille, "and I should be exposed to the gaze of so many, while the manager's box is private, and, when you desire it, quite shrouded from the public. Dear Jules, let it be the manager's box, and I will willingly go with you to hear this celebrated Venoni."

"I suppose I must consent," he returned, impatiently. Then added, good-humoredly, "Never did a woman possessed of your charms take such pains to conceal them. For once gratify me, and let them blaze in their full splendor to-night, to make me envied."

She shook her head resolutely; but a sigh escaped her that she dared not grant the desire prompted by true affection.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

D'Almaine returned from his club to an early dinner at the cottage, and at seven o'clock a plain, neat, hired brougham conveyed him and Lucille to her Majesty's Theatre in the Haymarket. On the way the count was unusually chatty, and did not notice the extreme taciturnity and want of ease of his wife when the vehicle drew up to the stage door. The manager was there to receive her, and his wife stood in the entrance with Rose, who had gone earlier, to conduct her to her dressing-room. She drew the former aside, and in a few words stated to him her position with D'Almaine. The manager, with the vivacity of a Frenchman, took the hint; and after Lucille had whispered to her husband in a faltering tone, "I would speak to this lady before I join you," D'Almaine was conducted to the manager's box, who unperceived, by his flow of language kept him in discourse.

At length, at a break in the conversation, D'Almaine exclaimed, "But what detains my wife? Pray allow her and madame to join us, and let them finish their discourse here."

"I will send the ladies to you," said the manager, who had heard the tinkle of a small bell to summon him away, glad of this opportunity to escape.

When alone, D'Almaine stepped to the front of the box. The house was already full; and among the numerous fashionables he was soon recognised by many.

The gay and handsome Frenchman was a favorite whenever he appeared, and bows and friendly nods showered on him from all sides; and several came round to shake hands with him, and to expatiate on the merits of the syren Venoni. Thus occupied, the curtain arose amid loud plaudits, and during the buzz each found his seat, anxious to be in it when she made her appearance.

D'Almaine again withdrew within the box, and as the singer entered and bent gracefully and modestly to the greetings, like all present he felt spellbound as she advanced towards the lights; but the witchery had a far different cause that fastened his look on the form before him. He rubbed his eyes; was it a vision that had deceived him, and he raised his glass to be more certain.

The glass, however, fell from his hand, for the turn of that queenly head that had won his first admiration was no illusion. Furtively he glanced round. Every glass was levelled at her; she stood there a public spectacle; she, the wife of his bosom; she who till this moment he had believed had shrunk from the fixed gaze of all but himself. He rose, stamped his foot hard on the floor beneath it, and a few hissing words issued through his clenched teeth.

"It is profanity for a creature so chaste, so sensitive, to be exposed to it," he muttered; "I will drag her from their libertine, polluted gaze."

But hush, all is silent as the grave. A few low notes fall upon the ear, then again is profound silence. Again the notes, low and clear, fall on the expectant ear; this time they rise with all their power, trilling as the lark, melodious as the nightingale, they echo from the lofty columns, vibrate on all hearts: the singer has mastered her emotions. Oh, the ordeal of a first appearance was as nothing to the anguish she endured this night, knowing as she did that she was trampling on the kindliest feelings of her husband's nature. While the melody continued, D'Almaine seemed rooted to the spot; but as it ceased and the house rang with its spontaneous burst of admiration, fire was on his brain, within his heart. He rushed into the street, and like a maniac paced the colonnade. A hand was laid on his arm, he turned, it was the manager, and with a fierce look he shook it from him.

"It is you have done it," said D'Almaine; "she dared not. Mercenary wretch, you have made her a public spectacle, a show to all who will pay their money to you to look at her; but you shall answer for it; you shall know what it is to insult a Frenchman though he is an exile. Prepare."

The manager was a patient, friendly man, and, really feeling for his proud nature, by dint of soothing persuaded the count to re-enter the house and repair to the dressing-room of Lucille. On entering he banged the door, and with long and hasty strides paced the apartment till his fiery spirit somewhat cooled. He then flung himself on the sofa, and, covering his face with his hands, endeavored to shut out thought by the very means he took to augment it, still dwelling on his supposed wrongs.

Lucille's hand lingered long on the handle of the door before she turned it, and when she did she entered the room with so noiseless a step that she was leaning over her husband before he was aware of her entrance. She pronounced his name gently, and he turned with a convulsive start. Their eyes met; anger flashed from his, but she gazed tenderly into them till the flashing subsided and a mist came over them, then she glided into his arms; but he did not respond to her embrace. She then crept more closely to him, and said,

"I have wounded your feelings, your heart is sore. Oh! have some pity for what mine feels, and pardon me."

"Pardon you," he exclaimed, and his arms tightened round her; "ah, that is easy, but can I forgive myself? My thoughtless extravagance is the cause of this disgrace."

"Disgrace!" she retorted; "this is indeed false pride, my husband. Do not call an honorable mode of earning money by such an undeserved epithet."

"Undeserved epithet," he exclaimed; "is it not disgrace for a wife of the ancient house of D'Almaine, a house that never but from inadvertence had a blemish on its escutcheon, to be doomed to stand before a fickle public, a candidate for fame."

"Better that," she replied impressively, "than stand before the world a beggar, with the stain upon our character that we were fed by honest tradesmen, without even an existing hope that we could make them a return."

"Ah," he returned, softened, "I know your worth, the sacrifices you are capable of; but I cannot, will not submit to your continuing this hateful existence. Surely among our friends, our wealthy friends, one may be found to assist us for a time without this degrading resource."

"Among your wealthy friends," said Lucille, rising proudly from his arms. "As your wife, Jules, the loftiest spirit of the two, turn from the friends you dream of, the friends you would depend on, to true independence, though it be to the resource of a voice bestowed on me by my Creator that I might fly to it in the hour of need."

He looked at her with a degree of awe as she stood before him with upraised head, nostrils slightly distended, and curled lip.

"In the hour of need," he murmured. "And this you have done for me; I know it, Lucille, for your father's home was open to you. I thought long since I had divined the nobleness of your character, but each new trait tells me its depths are unfathomable. But you must break this engagement. I speak not now in pride, but in tenderness. The exertion is killing you. Your wasted form, your pale cheek, tell a tale I would close my eyes to."

"It is not the trifling exertion I undergo has paled my cheek and drooped my form," replied Lucille. "No, dearest husband," she added, "they have another, a deeper cause—but think not of it," and she again sunk into his arms, saying to herself, "it will, alas for him! unfold itself too soon."

As he held her tightly in his embrace he repeated, "Lucille, this engagement must be broken."

"Not so," she returned calmly, "you must surmount your pride. For me not to carry out my engagement would be unjust to the manager, to the public and ourselves. Let us home now; my duties here are ended for to-night, and I trust before twenty-four hours have elapsed to have persuasive power ample enough to lead you to acquiesce in my plans."

"Ah, let us home," said D'Almaine, "for this place is hateful. When I entered it three hours since, I little thought the anguish that it was to bring upon me."

Muffling her and himself closely in their cloaks, D'Almaine hurried her away.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

It was an arduous task for Lucille to overcome her husband's repugnance to her engagement, but she accomplished it. However, D'Almaine consented, and attended her to and from the theatre, though pride had still its ascendance over him, with the collar of his large cloak raised, so that the lower part of his face was concealed, and his travelling cap drawn low over his forehead, and tied by its broad bands under his chin, he passed with her without a suspicion being entertained that the proud Count D'Almaine was leading his wife from her nightly avocation in the character of the celebrated singer Venoni. But amid the triumphs which reigned around her Lucille's health was gradually, but surely declining. She crept to bed faint and weary, and in the morning rose from a sleepless couch, weak and languid.

"It is not the exertion that makes me thus," she thought; "for what is it? A few hours alternate nights; yet still I go to it with reluctance, and am relieved when it is over; but it will soon end; and then to Germany and my dear father. Perhaps I may recruit there."

The "perhaps" was uttered in a doubtful tone, and she thought of her husband and sighed.

At length the last night of Lucille's engagement was announced. Never was water to the parched traveller of the desert more joyfully seen than the approach of this night. The day before D'Almaine had been called to Dover on business of importance from France, and the support his presence ever gave seemed to die now he had departed.

With Rose Perre, Lucille departed for the theatre. The idea that she was going there for the last time gave an elasticity to her step, an animation to her whole appearance, which it had long wanted. The house was densely crowded, and never had her voice sounded clearer or more melodious; and when she came forward to take her leave the plaudits were deafening.

The Queen, who had honored the house with her presence, commanded Lucille before her; and Lucille, who would gladly have dispensed with the honor, was led to the presence almost passively.

It is needless to say how generously Lucille was received. Her Majesty, while telling her she should appoint a day for her singing at the Palace, took a bracelet from her arm and clasped it, with her usual gracious condescension, round the wrist of Lucille. She pressed the magnificent gift to her lips with gratitude, bowing her acquiescence to attend her Majesty when she might deem it proper to honor her with her commands, though with anticipations that she should never fulfil her promise.

"What a beautiful bracelet," said Rose. "And the Queen, how kind and gracious to bestow it with her own hand. Will monsieur the count allow you, madame, should her Majesty send to you to wait upon her?"

"No, he would not," returned Lucille, shaking her head mournfully; "but he will not be called upon for a refusal, unless like the dying swan I sing to the last."

Rose felt a cold shiver run through her; but the carriage stopped, and she alighted quickly to give her aid to her mistress.

Lucille on entering the house retired to her chamber, and sinking into a chair, pressed her hands to her temples.

"Oh, this pain!" she cried; "and my cough, too sorely it increases. Would that Jules may return to-morrow; for now we possess the means, I would seek without delay the air and change that may for a time invigorate me. Oh, Rose!" she exclaimed, "if I could but see my child, or be assured she was under safe guardianship, I should pass from life calmly."

"Oh, madame, do not speak of dying," said Rose. "Rouse your energies," she added, in a vain effort to conceal her feelings; "live to embrace your child; for I am as sure she will be restored to us as I am that I was mad when I parted with her."

"Energy!" she returned, encouraged by the speech of Rose. "I have seldom lacked it, and it shall not forsake me now." She rose and walked firmly across the room; the light shone on the bracelet hanging on her shrunken wrist, she touched it with her lips. "Happy wife, happy mother!" she breathed softly; "blessed in both characters; long may you hear them—your country's pride and hope." Again her eye fell on the bright gems, and from them to her arm. "Oh, me!" she added, "this thin arm once would have filled the bauble out; now—but why moralise, or wonder at the work of Heaven. I trust my husband will return to-morrow." She dismissed Rose, and sinking on the bed fell into a restless sleep. She was awoke from it by a ringing on the door-bell. "It is the count!" she cried. Never seemed he more welcome; and sitting up, she listened to hear his voice.

Rose Perre was quickly at the door. Lucille heard a strange voice, and quitting the bed, she was at the door as Rose reached it. Rose held up a letter. "This should have been here," she said, "three hours earlier, but the messenger was thrown from his horse, and consequently delayed. It is from Monsieur D'Almaine."

"Give it to me!" said Lucille, snatching the letter, and hastily breaking the seal. As she unfolded it, a sensation of fear came over her. "Is it not strange," said she, "that he should have written, when, if he is able, he will surely come to-morrow—and by express, too? I fear some new misfortune. Read it, Rose; for a film seems to spread over my sight."

Rose took the letter and read the following few hurried lines:

"My dear Lucille—Nothing but necessity keeps me from you, a few hours longer; fearing you might expect me to-night, I send this express to quiet your fears. But in the morning expect me with the lark, for I have such good, such glorious news for you, so unlooked, so unhoped for, that I think it expedient to warn before I see you. Adieu, a few hours longer. Ever yours,

"Jules."

While Rose read, thought rushed like a torrent through Lucille's brain.

"What is it, Rose?" she said, tremblingly, when Rose had read it a second time, and she had herself run her own eyes over it. "What is this good, this glorious news? Has he seen or heard from the Batistes? That must be it!" she continued. "He has heard of our child—the child of so many tears, Rose. I shall see my child, I am again a happy mother. Look through the blind. I see morning already dawning. Oh, what a sunrise it will be to me!"

The hours seemed interminable, before the first pale beam of morning fell upon the window, and lighted with the semblance of health her wan cheek, and then how long after she counted the tardy minutes. Oh, for the heart of an anxious mother!

Lucille's eyes were still on the timepiece when D'Almaine's knock sounded on every portal of her heart. She rose to meet him, her step faltered; she leant on the back of a chair or she had fallen. He dashed open the door; pride and exultation glowed on his fine countenance as he caught her, almost fainting, in his arms.

"My Lucille!" he cried, "toil and watching are past. We shall again rest in the home of my ancestors. But——" and the paper he held fell to the ground. "You are ill! Rose! Eugene! water! She faints!"

"No, no," said Lucille, faintly, but rallying herself. "It is nothing—the surprise, the expectation. Tell me—I am strong now—what of her—what of Birdie? for it is of her you would tell me. And Eugene here! Is he the bearer of the tidings?"

D'Almaine clasped her thin, cold hands, once so symmetrically beautiful, between both his own, and bowed his head upon them for several moments in silence. At length he murmured,

"How devoted, how undying is the love of a mother! Not so a man's. Filled with his own selfish pursuits, the object unseen is forgotten or remembered so apathetically, that pleasure, as it passes, fades it from his view. My wife, how willingly would I forego the satisfaction with which these papers (pointing to some Eugene held in his hand) have given my proud heart, to pour one drop of hope into your bosom. Alas! they are but a grant from the king, a full and free pardon and restoration of my estates. The fate of our child is still in uncertainty."

A short time she remained inanimate in his arms. In a moment the heart yearnings of home had been crushed; but severe as was the shock, she was too unselfish to dwell on it to cloud the bright future opening on her husband. She congratulated him with ardor, and with pleasure welcomed Eugene to England.

Eugene, who with pain had been silently watching her altered appearance, said, when she addressed him,

"Madame D'Almaine, you are ill. The count must hasten with you from England. France, I hope, will restore the health England has robbed you of."

"Yes," said D'Almaine, gloomily, "my country has done me justice; I can return to her. But her justice has been too tardy, for what is wealth and country, if the wife of my youth, she who has shared with me the storms of adversity, and dried the tears of affliction, is not with me to give them charms?"

"La belle France! our beloved country!" she interrupted, with a burst of enthusiasm. "The thought of returning to you will brighten my eye and lighten my step. Oh, we will lose no time here. I shall be well so soon as my feet touch the land of my fathers."

The animation of her manner gave a hectic flush to her cheeks, a lustre to her eyes. It is beautiful to hope; and as D'Almaine and Eugene saw the fallacious change, hope beamed on the countenances of both.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Before the sun mounted to its meridian, D'Almaine had dispatched letters to two of the principal physicians of London. They answered his call promptly, and as his earnest gaze fastened on the countenance of each, as his finger pressed the feeble pulse of his wife, neither pen nor painter could give force to the deep, unavailing agony, which seemed crushing him with its overbearing weight. He listened in silence—words had deserted him. In their opinion medicine was useless in a case like hers, but something might be hoped from a change of air and a warmer climate.

"Oh, give me hope!" said D'Almaine, drawing a deep breath. "Say she will live, and take all else from me!"

Lucille, who felt for him, though she could not say hope, did her utmost to reconcile him to an event she was too certain was irremediable. She busily assisted Rose Perre in preparations for their departure, and was at times cheerful almost to gaiety.

After an unquiet night, harassed by incessant coughing, as daylight broke through the dark clouds, Lucille fell into a heavy slumber. D'Almaine, whose night also had been restless, lay in feverish and exciting meditation, till finding it impossible to lie longer, he stole quietly from his bed; he moved mechanically to the window blind and drew it aside, a broad sunbeam flashed through the glass, and gleamed broadly on the pale and sleeping Lucille. Fearing it would wake her, he turned to let down the curtain; but he stood immoveable; that broad beam told a truthful tale, it showed the ravage care and illness had made on their victim; at the sight his lips became white and cold, his eyes fixed, and a whirl of agony, such as he had never felt or dreamed of before, chilled the current of his heart. He gazed with such intensity of thought, that he feared at length what he most dreaded had happened—she lay so pale, so still; he raised the lace of her cap, then put his cold, trembling fingers on her heart. The touch awoke her, she looked up and smiled, he breathed again, and uttered a low but fervent, "Thank God!"

Lucille's first words were, "Have you written to my father?"

"Yes," he replied; "I told him to meet us at Dover, but not to wait there if we had not arrived, but to come on to London. I named the route we should take, and recommended this plan to him, knowing the presence of your father ever works a charm on your health and spirits, love."

"You are right, Jules," said Lucille; "from infancy till I chose another, dearest, my father was all I had to love. Oh, I hope nothing will prevent his coming; but I am better to-day, that sleep has wonderfully recruited me. I shall rise early."

"Blessed words!" he returned, fervently. "May they prove auspicious."

As they sat together that day, Eugene D'Almaine, now a fine young man of twenty years of age, possessed of some of the best feelings of human nature, who was in mourning for his father the old admiral, sat near them, an interested listener to their conversation.

"You are certainly better, dear Lucille," said D'Almaine, his sanguine temperament deriving comfort from the flush on her cheeks which gave animation to her whole being. "Yes, you are better," he continued; "your eyes and complexion bespeak it, for they are beautiful as when first I looked upon them. All will be ready the day after to-morrow to quit this place. We will go at once to the south, to your own valley, Lucille, where the flowers are always blooming and the sunshine temperate; yes, to your own sweet valley, where the glades are always green, and you were the brightest wild flower among them, till I plucked you and bore you from them. Oh, what a world of woe we have both seen since then; but we have borne it together, dearest, and together we will sip the honey drops in the refuge we have won. And the cottage, the vine-grown cottage, I will write and have it prepared for us. How calmly we shall rest beneath its roof—the roof under which our first vows of love were breathed!"

"What lovely visions you are creating, Jules," said Lucille. "Ah, if we could but realize them, and who can tell," she added; but she checked herself, and continued, "but let us speak of other things, of our child if she be yet spared to us, Jules, before we quit England. You must give me your word, your sacred promise, that now you are free, have wealth abundant, and power to go where will or pleasure lead you—you, I say, the father, the rightful protector of this dear child, will search her out. Ah! though you be weary, sad and hopeless in your wanderings; still must you prosecute them till she is found; this, I say, this you must promise me."

"I promise," he answered, solemnly, "that as soon as you are well, and that I can leave you with safety to the care of others, my search shall commence, nor shall it end till I ascertain if she live, or is beyond our care."

"And I," said Eugene, in the same tone, "will be my cousin's companion in his wanderings; we will together seek her, trusting in heaven to guide us to the haven of our hopes."

"Enough," said Lucille. "Heaven will guide you. But, Jules," she added, "I have another promise to crave," and her voice was low and quivering; "this child, so long torn from our care and guidance, should you find her, it may be sunk, fallen from the level of goodness, of virtue, yet must she not be spurned?" Here her voice became firm and commanding as she proceeded. "No," she exclaimed, "though her calamities may disgrace the house she has sprung from, she must be cherished by her father; for if her course is vicious, which heaven in its mercy, forbid, we must remember it was her fate, not her will."

Exhausted by her energy, Lucille's head sank on the sofa arm, and D'Almaine tenderly wiped the dew from her forehead.

"Desist, dear Lucille," he said, "desist from this sad subject, it exhausts you; have my word now, in health it shall be renewed. Let it satisfy you that every wish about your child is re-echoed by my own bosom, and if diligence and love can restore her, she will one day sit between us round our domestic hearth."

"Happy, happy day," she cried; at the same moment, a tress, bright as ever sun shone on, fell from beneath her cap, and rested on D'Almaine's hand. He looked on it fondly, and kissed it with all the ardor of his nature; a smile spread itself over the face of Lucille, and, taking up a pair of scissors, in an instant it was severed from her head and touched by her lips.

"Take it," she said; "keep it for the lost one, it is a relic hallowed by the lips of her parents; and now we will speak of gayer scenes of the Chateau Noi, of Emile and Madeline, my early friend."

D'Almaine anxiously entered on other topics, and, assisted by Eugene, the invalid's words were soon in summer wandering from scene to scene of happier days; not so her thoughts, they strayed not without the narrow compass of the house she knew she should not quit living.

The day after the morrow came, but Lucille was too ill to rise. D'Almaine sat beside her bed, ministering to her smallest want.

"Has my father come?" she asked several times, each time more anxious; at length she heard a footstep on the stairs, she sat up and listened; the step was familiar to her, for she said in a quick tone, "It is he!"

At the same moment Monsieur de Vernet entered. He was pale and travel-worn, and he cast an anxious momentary glance on D'Almaine; but, without noticing him, approached the bed hastily.

"Father!" said Lucille, in the same quiet voice.

He put his arm round her, and drew her tremblingly and close towards him.

"My child, my Lucille!" he cried, "the thing dearest to me on earth; is it thus I see you?"

"You see me happy," she replied. "Am I not surrounded by those I love. But, my mother?"

"Not well, or she would have come with me;" "but, had she known all; what would have kept her away?" he added, and his voice died into a murmur.

"Father! father!" again repeated Lucille; and the smile deepened round her mouth. "I have watched long for your coming. Now I can sleep, Jules. No one places the pillow like you. There—that is comfortable;" and allowing her head to sink on the pillow, she crossed her hands on her bosom, and slept.

Long and in silence sat the husband and father; except at intervals, when on tiptoe they rose, thinking they saw her move; and deep sank the sun in the horizon, yet still sat the watchers; when Rose Perre, who had been weeping and watching with the rest, came near the bed.

"Hush!" said D'Almaine, "lest you wake her. This sleep will renovate her."

Despite of remonstrance, Rose drew herself nearer still. She touched the marble forehead; it was cold as its resemblance, but scarcely colder than Rose's own, as her fingers rested on the folded hands of Lucille, whose grasp had already relaxed, and the faded flowers she had gathered off little Blanche's grave had fallen from them. She uttered a short, sharp cry. The husband and father rose in perturbation. Rose had fainted. Lucille was at rest!

THE WORLD UNDERGROUND.

The excavations carried on by Mr. Farrer, M.P., Mr. Joseph Robertson, of the General Register House, Mr. Chalmers, Aberdeen, and others, in the Tumuli, near the Standing Stones, at Stennis, Orkney, have resulted in the discovery of some very interesting remains. Large subterranean galleries have been found, faced with stone slabs, whereon are several inscriptions, in the Runic character, in a fine state of preservation. The discovery is expected to throw considerable light on the history of our Pictish forefathers. A bowl-barrow, near the large quarry of Bookan, not far from the Standing Stones, was opened, and a circular building was found in it, containing four kists, arranged around a central kist, from which there was a small passage, leading towards the outside of the building. There were human skeletons in three of the kists, and a lance or spear head of flint and fragments of small rude clay vessels lay in the centre kist, but no bones. The covers of the kists had fallen in and crushed their contents.

During the past three months considerable progress has been made in exploring the ruins of the ancient cities of Phœnicia. In January last, Dr. Gaillardot commenced at Saida and M. Ernest Renan at Sour, and the operations at these places are now complete, with the exception of the excavation of the great necropolis at the former place. Remains of the Crusaders were found at both places, but none above ground of the Phœnicians. Gigantic blocks of granite, marking the limits of the ancient port of Sidon, still remain; also, on the plain, to the east of the site of the old city, a subterranean Salon has been discovered. Here, in 1855, the sarcophagus of Eschmunazar, in the cavern of Apollo, was found. This is the only great inscribed Phœnician sarcophagus hitherto discovered. Portions of another have been found in the same place by M. Renan. Also, in the rock caves of Sidon, some of which are anterior to the time of Alexander, sarcophagi of various forms, some of terra cotta, ornamented with garlands, have been discovered. Other remains of different epochs have been examined, and portions have been sent to Paris. Some of the sculptures, &c., resemble those of Egypt, others those of Nineveh and Persepolis. Among the objects found in the caverns and sent home are many articles of dress and common use, Phœnician coins, and a leaden sarcophagus of good workmanship.

Mrs. Lincoln, after a short stay at the Metropolitan, in this city, has gone to Long Branch. During her visit to New York she called upon the Princess Clotilde.

The Prince Napoleon has gone West on a visit to the prairies. On Wednesday, the 14th of August, he dined with Mayor Wood—on the 15th, at the Union Club. It would seem from all reports that the son of Hortense, and the brother of Mathilde, is eminently a genial man.

The famous cricketers, who visited America in 1858, have made an engagement to play with the players of Australia in 1862.

General Wool passed through New York on the 16th of August, on his way to Fortress Monroe, where he resumes the chief command. Despite his great age, he looked full of health and vigor.

A German paper says: "The Duke of Saxe-Coburg has proclaimed first marksman of Germany M. du Looaw, of Dusseldorf, who, in the recent national rifle match at Gotha, hit the centre 151 times out of 302 shots, and gained 120 prizes in money, and nine others." This is very poor work compared to our Berdan and his famous regiment.

Even the Sultan is "going ahead" of brother Jonathan in naval affairs. He has ordered four armor-clad iron steam frigates of war to be immediately built for him in England and Scotland.

A scion of a royal house, now in Paris, young, but celebrated for his oration and mal-àpropos remarks at the same time, was presented, a few days ago to one of our principal peintres de genres, Sir Edwin Landseer; and on the son of the brush making his obeisance, the great personage remarked, "Ah, I remember your name! Very glad to see you. I always was so fond of animals!"

The Soldier's Treasure—Great Gift for a Soldier.—It is seldom that we have seen so valuable a gift as the Soldier's Belt. This is fastened by an elastic string, and supplies warmth and sustenance to the wearer. Being filled with aromatic ingredients, which are absorbed into the system by contact, it has all the invigorating effects of a stimulant, without any of its ulterior evil consequences. While it is restorative in its results, it is also calculated to sustain a soldier on a march; and, by strengthening the abdominal muscles, it virtually acts at once as nourishment and tonic. The aromatic warmth it supplies prevents chills and fevers, and counteracts the evil results of sleeping on the grass and in an ill-fed state. Every person who wishes to do a soldier a service should present him with one of these belts, since they retain their virtue and efficacy for at least a year. The New York agent is Mr. Frazier, 35 Dey street.

Mr. H. F. Eastman, of Rochester, writes to his sister that he has escaped from his forced service in the "Prince William Cavalry" in the rebel army in Virginia, and has found shelter in Washington. He adds: "I deserted, and am now here, bound to be revenged. I want to get up a company of as desperate fellows as ever looked down on the muzzle of a gun, and go right forward with the Federal army."

On the new Sultan's accession to the throne, his mother purchased the most beautiful slave woman she could find in Constantinople, loaded her with jewels, and presented her to Abdul Aziz. "Take that woman away!" said the Sultan, sternly, "I have one wife, whom I love. Let me hear nothing more of such presents!"

An invalid General of the Italian army went, a few days since, to Turin, to take leave of an august personage, previous to carrying himself, his scars and his rheumatic pains to the baths of Genoa, according to his yearly custom. "Well, General, you are off to Genoa?" "Yes, sire, I am going in hopes of getting another grant of life." "I wish you success, my dear general; but mind, if the baths of Genoa do not set you up, I invite you to come with me in the spring, and try the waters of Venice."

"The extraordinary character of the drill practiced by the Fire Zouaves is happily hit off," says an English paper, "by a literary Fire Zouave: We get up at two in the morning, and have somersault drill for two hours by squads, then by companies, and then we form in regimental line and turn fourteen sommersaults forward and fourteen backward, to the tap of the drum, keeping exact time, loading and firing revolving rifles at a target as we come forward, and firing at another target as we go back, with a revolver in each hand. If any balls are found more than an inch and a half from the centre, the man is discovered and put on columbiad guard for the day—this means keeping guard all day with two-inch columbiads tied across his shoulders. After sommersault drill, we have jumping and firing in the air by platoons for two hours. At the word of command the platoons jump thirty-three feet straight up, firing at an object fifty yards in advance the instant they reach their extreme altitude. This sort of practice, the colonel thinks, will be remarkably useful in firing at an enemy concealed behind breastworks."

(d) A fatal error, which throws away an easy victory.

(e) White evidently overlooked that the King blocked up the diagonal of the Bishop, thus preventing him from stopping the advance of the Pawn.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

Billiards in California.—A new billiard saloon has been opened in San Francisco by Messrs. Daniel Lynch and M. E. Hughes. It is situated on Montgomery street, opposite the new Metropolitan Theatre. The saloon is entered by a spacious stairway, faced with Sienna marble, is one hundred and thirty feet by thirty-five, and contains eight tables with Phelan's cushions. The room is magnificently furnished in all its details, marble mantels, rich mirrors and sketches of California scenery, painted by the landscapist Butman. Some of the tables are made of California laurel. The lighting of the room is admirably arranged, each table being surmounted by a dome eight feet in diameter, covered with a horizontal ground glass dome light. No expense has been spared to make it one of the most elegant saloons in the United States. Mr. Lynch is well-known as the most accomplished player in California, and Mr. Hughes is also well-known in connection with billiards in the Golden State. They cannot fail to achieve a success commensurate with their enterprise in preparing so elaborate a temple for the amateurs of billiards in San Francisco. A full and artistic description of the room is found in the California correspondence of Wilkes's Spirit.

American v. French Billiards.—Some amateurs in America have been somewhat mortified by the seeming inferiority of American billiards to the game as played in France, and as illustrated by M. Berger in his late exhibitions in this country. A little reflection, however, will convince them that the science in America is not in so backward a state as a superficial view would lead one to imagine.

The professional billiard-players of the United States, with a generosity which does them the highest honor, submitted to this seeming deterioration of their game during the time of M. Berger's stay in this country. As M. Berger, to use his own words, came to this country "not as a challenger, but as a friend," the billiard-players of the United States, one and all, received him as a friend, and acted with him as such for his own sole benefit. They consented to play with him, with his own balls, on his own table, machinery with which the practice of a quarter of a century had made him perfectly familiar, and which was entirely new to them.

They are all habituated to larger balls, and a more extensive superficies. The difference which so great a change makes in the game of any billiard-player, any tyro who has played three consecutive weeks on the same table and with the same balls can fully appreciate.

There are players in this country who were most anxious to test their skill with M. Berger on their own tables, with their own balls and at their own game, and who, they think, without desiring in the least to detract from M. Berger's great ability at the French game, would have achieved a different result on an American table and with balls of the average American size. They did not press their desire, however, for they wished, above all, to do everything in their power to make M. Berger's visit as pleasant and as profitable as possible, and to act up to the highest requirements of American hospitality.

Billiards by the Seashore.—The noble game does not lack votaries at the watering-places. At Long Branch it is the favorite amusement of both ladies and gentlemen, who take a great interest in it. On Friday evening, 9th inst., a billiard exhibition was given by Messrs. Kavanagh and Geary, at the request of the ladies and gentlemen sojourning at the Branch. Mr. Phelan, who is staying with his family at the Metropolitan, consented to play a game with Mr. Kavanagh on the evening in question. The billiard-table was set up for the occasion in the parlor of the hotel, and a brilliant audience of ladies and gentlemen assembled to witness the performance. Among those present were his Grace Archbishop Hughes, Very Rev. Dr. Starrs, Signor Brignoli, of the Italian opera, George Wilkes, Esq., editor of Wilkes's Spirit, and several other notabilities.

The entertainment commenced by a game of 500 points between Messrs. Phelan and Kavanagh, which was won by Mr. Kavanagh. The playing was not as brilliant as it might have been, owing to the humidity of the atmosphere, the consequent dampness of the cloth clogging the march of the balls.

Mr. Kavanagh then made several of the famous masse shots, à la Berger. The rationale of each shot was explained to the audience by Mr. Geary, in a manner which rendered the mode of the execution comprehensible even by those who never took a cue in hand.

The ladies and gentlemen present expressed themselves highly gratified with the entertainment. Archbishop Hughes paid marked attention to the various shots executed. The Archbishop has a billiard-table in the archiepiscopal residence, his physicians, on account of his feeble health and the exhausting nature of his onerous duties, having prescribed billiards as a gentle relaxation. We have seen it stated in the French papers that his Holiness the Pope, whose health has been delicate for some years, was advised by his physicians, about two years since, to take gentle exercise at billiards for a couple of hours each day, a piece of advice which his Holiness has adopted with the best results.

Espionage in Paris.—A few days ago Mrs. B., an English lady, entered a bookseller's shop, the owner of which was known to be hostile to the present dynasty. She remained a short time inside, and then came out with a small parcel in her hand. She did not notice any one following or watching her; but, on reaching her hotel, after making two or three small purchases on her way, she was accosted by a police-agent, who followed her into the courtyard and peremptorily required her to give him the parcel she had brought out of the bookseller's shop. Mrs. B., in her surprise and astonishment, mechanically gave the parcel up, which was immediately opened, and inside were two books, "Paul and Virginia," and an abridgment of Buffon. Collecting herself, however, she added immediately after, "You have no right to do what you are doing, and I will complain to the Prefect of Police." The man, who was clearly ashamed of himself—a rare phenomenon in a mouchard—apologized and returned the books, with these words: "Madame, I mistook you for a French lady. These are not the books I am ordered to watch over. I sincerely beg your pardon; but, croyez moi, I am only acting up to my orders, and dare not disobey."

THE PRIVATEER SUMTER.

Our correspondent at Cumpas has sent us a photograph of this famous rover of the seas, as she appeared when taking in coals at the wharf at Cumpas. The remarkable success of this daring pirate has given her an almost romantic interest, such as attaches to the buccaneers of old. The original name of the steamer was the Habana, which was commanded and partly owned by Captain McConnell, and was employed first as a mail steamer between New Orleans and Tehuantepec, and recently between Havana and New Orleans. She is an American built vessel, and although a propeller, is a very fast boat. She usually made the run between New Orleans and Havana in fifty to sixty hours. The news about her sale to the "government" of the Southern Confederacy, and changing her name from Habana to Sumter, was published in the New Orleans and Havana papers in May or June last.

Her later career is too well known to need any notice. On the 30th of June she ran the blockade from New Orleans, and although pursued for several hours by the Brooklyn, managed to escape. We next hear of her taking nine prizes into Cienfuegos, Cuba; these have since been given up by the Spanish authorities. Her last appearance was at Curaçoa, where she arrived on the 16th of July, in quest of coals and provisions. There was at first some hesitation as to her being admitted, as her flag had no national recognition, but the Dutch Governor having consulted his officers, and having received a letter from the commander of the Sumpter, stating that he was a regularly commissioned ship of war from the Southern Confederacy, he was allowed to come in. After coaling and refitting, the pirate vessel sailed for the Mona Passage, on the 26th of July. The summary dismissal of Mr. Jessuron, the United States Consul at Curaçoa, indicates that he was deficient in his duty in not protesting against the entrance of the pirate vessel. Curaçoa is an island on the northern coast of Venezuela, belonging to the Dutch. It is 40 miles long, and about six in breadth. It is famous for its salt, coffee, sugar, and a certain cordial which goes by its name. It contains about 16,000 inhabitants, of which 9,000 are slaves.

There is a report of the capture of the Sumter by an United States frigate off Curaçoa, but the account, which comes by the way of St. Thomas, although circumstantial, lacks confirmation.

CLARKSBURG, VIRGINIA.

Clarksburg, the present headquarters of General Rosencranz, a post village, capital of Harrison county, is situated on the west fork of the Monongahela River, at the mouth of Elk Creek, about 220 miles north-west of Richmond. It is built on a high table land environed by hills. It has several churches, academies, two printing-offices and many fine stores. Stone coal abounds in its vicinity. The North-western Railroad, a branch of the Baltimore and Ohio, passes through it. It has about 2,000 inhabitants.

For a short time Clarksburg has been the headquarters of General Rosencranz, although it is expected he will shortly leave for Beverley. The situation at present is briefly this: The Cheat Mountain Gaps, the key to this whole country, are held by a strong force—a portion of General Reynolds's Brigade—the remainder of which is stationed at Beverley, Huttonville and in that vicinity. Other portions of General Rosencranz's command are scattered over almost the whole of the north-western part of Virginia, guarding the railroad lines from Wheeling and Parkersburg down to Grafton, and thence eastward through the Cheat River country, Oakland, Altamont and almost to Cumberland, occupying the Kanawha Valley by General Cox's Brigade, and holding towns like Weston, Buckhannon, Summersville, Philippi and Bealington.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER LX.

Philip Avon was right. It was no phantom he, attended by Tubal Kish and two officers, followed to the Chace. It was in truth Erle on his way to pay a visit to the old library once more, less with the anticipation that he should again meet Lady Maud there than with the hope that investigations which he intended to pursue would result in discoveries important to his future prospects.

He had slept long and soundly in Violet's chamber in the old tower, and when he awoke, refreshed and strengthened by his slumber, he found a repast of a simple kind, but clean and palatable, spread upon a table near to him.

Having partaken of it, he sought Eldra, but could not discover her; he called to her, but the tower only echoed his voice.

He stood at the window and watched the moon rise. As he did so he thought of his past night's adventure, what he had heard in the picture gallery, what he had seen in the library—for though, in the latter place, all that he had witnessed appeared to be the wild workings of an excited brain, enwrapt in a dream, it was yet vividly remembered, and was in all respects so striking in its suggestions, and so marvellous in its portents, as to urge him powerfully to seek a repetition of the wonders in his waking hours, or at least some confirmation that the dream was in reality but an inspired vision.

As he marked the progress of the moon sailing grandly and silently across the heavens, frosting the slow-moving tree tops with its silvery light, there suddenly recurred to his memory the strange, low, long drawn thrilling note of the horn which Violet had softly winded to bring Cyril Kingswood to her side—a sound which, when he heard it, had so moved him. He started as though even now it quivered in the air with prolonged and plaintive note, and he listened with intense attention, but nothing caught his ear save the sorrowful wail of the wind as it soughed through alley, brake and covert.

The illusion, if such it was, served to bring to his memory a throng of incidents common but of a saddening character. When he heard that note he stood in Kingswood Hall full of hope and aspiration, glowing under the first ardent impressions of love, and burning beneath the smart of undeserved insult, eager to establish those undefined rights which Ishmael had so sternly informed him it was his duty to assert, and deeply anxious to occupy the position which an inward and irresistible feeling told him he was entitled to fill. Then he had daily access to Lady Maud—then he could watch a fair, refined countenance, note its delicate mutations, its clear, ingenuous expression, and the soft and exquisite rising blush when her eye met his.

For the moment an immature wish rose up in his breast that he had pursued a different course, followed the counsel of Cyril Kingswood, tided over his quarrel with Philip Avon, and remained at Kingswood. But as the pale, malignant face of the son of Black Walter of Hawkesbury presented itself to his vision he scouted the wish, and felt rejoiced that he had pursued the path the promptings of his nature had directed. He, with but little reflection, preferred his present position, and proudly accepted all its risks past and to come, its uncertainties and its indications of future struggles.

The revelations of Eldra occupied also a very prominent space in his thoughts, for they, he felt convinced, referred to his mother. It seemed quite clear to him that the Erla named by the old woman was his long, unknown parent, and he was moved to this conclusion by the chain of circumstances which seemed ready prepared to his hand.

Eldra related that Lord Kingswood, upon whom his presence had made so powerful an impression, had in early life, by accident, encountered Erla, and had become enamoured with her beauty. He had repeatedly sought her, and whispered words of love in her ears. When removed from the Chace to Huntingdon he had followed her, and had prevailed upon her to fly with him thence, and they were married.

A deadly sickness seemed to seize him. Eldra, though she had stated that a marriage had taken place, appended to it a qualifying "but." But what? Was he to draw the inference that the marriage, in some way, had been invalidated, and that he was truly a nameless creature, a living evidence of his mother's shame, his only inheritance her wrongs? He bit his lips until the blood came, and he clenched his hands until the nails penetrated the flesh in them too.

A horrible confirmation of the fact appeared to exist in the part Vernon had played. He had characterised himself as the truest friend Erle's mother had known; he had betrayed the most intensely vindictive feeling towards Lord Kingswood and all connected with him, save himself, Erle.

It was Vernon who had taken upon himself the charge of his education, and it was he who, at an appointed day and hour, brought him before Lord Kingswood, an object at once of terror and despair.

The bitterness and the hatred which he evinced when the name of Lord Kingswood was mentioned might be traced to the very possible circumstance that he had loved Erla too; that he had entertained some impression that his suit was favored, and at this very period Lord Kingswood had snatched her from him. If he had loved her deeply and passionately, it was not surprising that he should possess feelings of the deadliest animosity against Lord Kingswood, and should do his utmost to blast his happiness in return; but at the same time all these possibilities and suppositions seemed to confirm his worst apprehensions. If Lord Kingswood had been legally married to his mother, what possible reason could there exist that he should be up to this moment not only unacknowledged but absolutely repudiated by his father? On the other hand, if they were not legally united, the object of the mystery and secrecy was plain enough.

He found it exceedingly painful and unpleasant to pursue these reflections, deeply interesting to him as the question was which they involved. He felt, however, that it would be necessary to follow up the clue he had obtained as immediately as possible, for the doubt upon his birth was as maddening as to clear it from stain would be blissful.

He saw clearly enough that upon the issue depended his future intercourse with Lady Maud. Honorably born, no matter under what occult circumstances, he could, without reserve, invite her to become his; but if his birth had taken place beneath a cloud of disgrace, farewell to her—to hope—to all the honors, awards, position the world might have to bestow. Of legitimate birth, he could dare and defy any trial fate might have in store for him; basely born, he would not struggle against the smallest eddy in the stream of life, but let its current bear him even where it pleased.

He remembered that Eldra had spoken of the archives of the Kingswood family. He felt it would be important to him to make himself master of them, and the inclination to visit the old library, in which she stated they were kept, was thus increased. Provided with a lamp, he believed that he could, in the dead hour of the night, roam the old library at will, could search for the volumes he was anxious to examine, pore over their pale and musty pages, make himself master of their contents, and when he had extracted all the information they could afford him, he could then return to the tower and learn from Eldra all she had left untold—all, indeed, that she could communicate to him, which would not only serve to convince him that Erla was his mother, but would assure him that she had been rightfully married to Lord Kingswood.

In this hour of cogitation, so full of solicitous and disquieting thoughts, he did not forget old Hengroep's extraordinary recognition of him at Gray's Mount, his subsequent statement that he had watched his progress throughout his school-life, and his gratuitous assertion that he was his friend—his devoted friend.

"He must know much," he muttered. "Employed and trusted by Ishmael for years, he can, without doubt, fill up any gap which may occur in the researches I am about to make. I will seek him. My destiny is now receiving its final direction. Everything which has happened since I quitted my school-home—everything by which I am surrounded—assures me that 'the dawning must be nigh,' to which the ruffian Tubal Kish and the old woman residing here have respectively referred. Let it come! But may Heaven, in its infinite beneficence, cause it to be the herald of a bright day!"

The evening wore slowly on, and, unable to endure the troubled thoughts which incessantly succeeded each other in his mind, accompanied by wild, fantastic images, and a strange, nervous thrilling through his frame, he quitted the room and made one more ineffectual search for Eldra, and then he passed out into the Chace, drawing the door of the tower closely after him.

His swiftness of foot, and his knowledge of the secret entrance to the subterranean passages which led into Kingswood Hall, enabled him to baffle Philip Avon and his myrmidons—for a time at least.

He adopted the Birchwood entrance in preference to the old postern door because he knew the hour of midnight had not arrived, and though never after nightfall were any of the domestics known to approach the ancient portion of Kingswood Hall, he wisely determined not to incur any hazard of being seen even by Tubal Kish, whose ferocious scowl, although it was mingled with an expression of awe, he had noted that day as indicating sanguinary intentions against him, if he could only be certain that he was actually flesh and blood, and not the shadowy phantom said to haunt the Chace.

He little dreamed, however, that the wisdom of this precaution saved him from being seized, brutally maltreated, dragged like a felon to the common lock-up of Hawkesbury, and subjected to the tender mercy of Black Walter Avon, acting under the malevolent influence of his son.

Once more he stood alone in silence and in darkness in the ancient library, this night resolved, if possible, not to give way to the feelings which the solemnity of the place, the hour and certain appearances, really natural, but apparently supernatural, were calculated to inspire, but to concentrate his mind upon his enterprise, and to question whatever his eyes beheld until he had, by close investigation, determined what it really was.

And now alone, calm and resolved, he detected that the strange, lurid light which filled the extensive chamber, was occasioned by the rays of the moon forcing their way through the dim, dust-encrusted, lozenge paned windows, and that, therefore, the unearthly glare which had enabled him to see every object so distinctly in the picture-gallery on the previous night, had its origin in the same cause. Its abrupt withdrawal had been effected by the sudden whirl of a storm-cloud before the face of the moon; and the tints of rose-bloom and livid blue, which had seemed successively to lend a natural glow and a ghastly aspect to the portrait of Kingswood of Kingswood, were but the dyes of the stained glass in the windows, as, in turns, the light falling through them, cast their hues upon the visage. He smiled as he remembered what thrilling effects had been produced from very natural causes. While yet a contemptuous curl rested upon his lip, he turned his eye upon the statue of the Lady Maud, and the face, so exquisitely chiselled, seemed to look corpse-like and ghastly from the pale blue tint of the dye which was thrown by the glass upon it.

Again a smile curled his lip, but it faded away; the blood rushed back to his heart, and a cold thrill ran through every nerve in his frame as he suddenly heard the rustle of silk sweeping past him, and the light beat of small feet pattered on the floor, the sound growing fainter as they receded, until he could no longer distinguish them.

Whatever natural causes might have produced some startling effects, here was one which much disconcerted him. For this, at least, his reasoning faculties declined to furnish him with an explanation. It was the third time he had heard these strange, thrilling sounds, and heard them distinctly, too.

His sight to the end of the library was unimpeded; the atmosphere, it was true, was something hazy, but it was yet clear enough to assure him that no visible object had passed him and proceeded down the centre of the apartment. He heard his heart beat as audibly as he felt it throb violently, and this, perhaps, because he was unable to fathom the meaning of what he heard. It was not a delusion of the eyes, for he had seen nothing, nor of the imagination, for he had heard the sounds distinctly, not once, but thrice, in different places and under dissimilar circumstances.

He laid his clenched hand upon his swelling breast, and murmured, with deep emotion,

"My life upon it, the vision of last night was no dream; the wild and singular mysteries by which I am surrounded; the awful visions connected alone with the traditionary history of this House, which present themselves to me when in a state not of sleep, but ecstacy; the successive corroborations of my resemblance to the most noted of the race, not less than to Lord Kingswood—all tend to confirm me in the belief that I am the heir of this proud lord; and are so many incitements to me to set about the task to establish it. In spite of all hazards, natural or supernatural, I will attempt it. If I am to lift the doom from this stricken House, it is needful that I should make myself master of the history of the circumstances which wrought it, and what must be done to remove the curse which seems clinging to the innocent and to the guilty alike? And so for the archives!"

As the last whispered words faded from his lip, he kindled his lamp, and at the very instant the wick shot up into a flame the bell of the turret-clock gave forth the first stroke which proclaimed the hour of midnight. At each stroke the sonorous tone of the bell rang quivering through the building, and seemed to add greatly to the solemnity of his situation. He, however, stood calm and self-possessed, resolved to suffer no emotions of horrified awe to interfere with the prosecution of his purpose.

It must not be imagined that he overlooked the questionable character of his position or his proceedings. He was here like a thief in the night, an unbidden, unwelcome visitor. Taking advantage of the superstition of the domestics and the solemn hour of the night, he had stolen into this reputed haunted old library, and was about to search and to ransack over receptacles, books and papers, without having the permission, and, indeed, in defiance of what he knew to be the wishes of Lord Kingswood; but he justified himself by the exceptional character of his position, with the conviction that he was suffering under great wrongs—wrongs which would remain unatoned unless he obtained their redress, and the only path open to him to accomplish it was that which he was now pursuing.

He took his lamp in his hand and commenced to examine the various large tomes which were ranged along the shelves, the backs dusty and discolored, but the lettering upon them yet plainly legible, with the intention of finding where the archives of the family rested.

His anxious search was after some time rewarded by the discovery of the important volumes; and he found, on examining them, that a volume was devoted to the life of each baron. He ran his finger impetuously along the back of each book to find that one which recorded the achievements, and probably recounted the crimes and the follies of that Baron of Kingswood whose name he bore. He was grievously disappointed to find it was not there. He looked hastily through the succeeding volume, but he found within it but one allusion to Erle, Baron of Kingswood, surnamed "The Bad." The records were painful. Bertram of Kingswood, who succeeded Erle, appeared to have lived a wild, reckless life, and to have met a violent death at the hands of one Sir Philip Avon, of Hawkesbury, whose father, known in the county as "Black Walter," had, in mortal combat, slain Erle, Baron of Kingswood.

Erle was somewhat startled to find the name of Philip Avon there recorded, especially in connection with deeds of blood—not that, judging by the character of the descendant, who bore the same name, this ought to have surprised him, but at the coincidence that he—a Kingswood, for he had no doubt of that now—had been engaged in sanguinary contest with an Avon, and had yet, he felt, to pass through the ordeal of another desperate encounter with him.

A long and vain search for the missing volume decided him in the impression that it had been purposely removed, perhaps destroyed. Old Eldra had spoken of a gap in the history, and this was no doubt the one of which she had spoken.

It seemed, however, improbable to him that the book had been lost or mislaid. No doubt it had been frequently referred to, and therefore the probability that some one of those who, since the death of Bertram, had succeeded to the title, had placed it under lock and key in some secure place, unknown, perhaps, to those of the line who had followed him.

Erle suddenly remembered the antique chest, and a thought flashed through his mind that it might be there.

A vague impression seized him that he had looked within the chest, and there had beheld a sight which curdled his blood with horror; but he tried to chase it away, as if it was some wild, dreaming fancy, and he slowly advanced towards the tall, ancient, grim looking piece of furniture, with the intention of examining the contents, even if they should prove to be of a nature to paralyze him.

As he reached it he started back in wonder, for he saw rise up slowly from its side a gray, dusky figure, which for an instant kept a bowed attitude, and then suddenly flung off from its head the folds of a mantle, and discovered the face of old Eldra. Her eyes seemed to gleam with a supernatural light, as in a low, solemn tone, she said,

"What seek you here?"

He instantly recognized her, and as instantly recovered his composure.

"That which you told me I should find within this chamber," he answered.

"What is that?" she asked.

"The history of Erle, Baron Kingswood of Kingswood," he rejoined.

She shook her head.

"I told you not that," she replied, hoarsely. "The records of his life live only in that statue of the unavenged!" She pointed to that of Lady Maud. "In the blood-stained staircase of the forest lodge, in the terrible date which glistens upon yon pedestal, upon this chest, upon yon crimson-stained window-panes, in the doom which yet clings to the house. His life was written in his acts; but those acts were so hidden and secret, save in their dreadful results, that unless he himself committed them to paper they are yet unwritten."

"What were his crimes?" inquired Erle.

"They are unknown excepting to Him to whom all things are known," she replied.

"You mystify me," he said, impatiently. "What of those dreadful results? Surely they gave some clue to the crimes?"

"No," she answered, laconically.

"What were they?" he repeated. "Communicate them to me. I may, perhaps, find a thread which may lead me to the facts."

She approached him closely.

"Know you not in whose presence you stand?" she asked, with singular emphasis.

He raised his hand heavenward, and said,

"In the presence of Him whom alone I fear."

She pointed again to the statue.

"I am fluttering on the borders of another world, and I see what you cannot see," she said, with deep solemnity in her voice. "She, the Lady Maud, a sad, sorrowful, to me palpable spirit, stands there regarding you with wistful, melancholy eyes, and there," she added, turning abruptly, and pointing to the centre of the chamber, "a gloomy, misty shadow, stands he who has doomed the race; and is it in their presence you would have recited his dire crime and her bitter, unatoned wrongs?"

A singular, cold, crawling thrill ran over his frame as she spoke with marked and earnest emphasis, and motioned with her finger almost vehemently. He mechanically turned his head in the direction in which she was pointing, even as if he expected to see the phantom of which she spoke; but no dusky, horrible-looking shadow stood between him and the opposite wall.

"I see nothing supernatural near to me, dame," he said; "I recognise the figure of the Lady Maud as a statue, but nothing more. Were, however, the spirits of both before me now in this fitful and solemn hour, it would surely be a fitting time for me to hear the story which has brought the doom upon the house of Kingswood, and by it learn, perhaps, how the unavenged may be avenged and rest in peace."

He started as he concluded, and once more every nerve in his body thrilled, for close to him he heard the sound of rustling silk and the soft pattering of a light footstep.

"Heard you that sound, dame?" he exclaimed, in a sharp, hissing whisper.

She clutched his arm, and said, in as low a tone as his own,

"See where she sweeps along. She points to the hunting-lodge with impatient gesture. She is gone."

As she concluded, the old woman bowed her head upon her trembling hands. He waited until he had somewhat recovered his own self-possession, and then said, hurriedly,

"The story, dame? What are the cruel wrongs of Lady Maud, and how can they be avenged?"

"If that were known they would long since have been avenged," she returned, with a groan. "All I can tell you I have gathered from traditionary fragments, handed down verbally by those who have successively inhabited in misery and degradation, like myself, the Warder of Kingswood Chace. It is supposed that Erle of Kingswood himself wrote the records of his crime, and that he concealed them in a small ebony box, which he secreted no one has ever been able to discover where——"

"A small ebony box!" exclaimed Erle, breathlessly.

"Aye," answered Eldra, "the counterpart is represented in the portrait at the hunting-lodge. Every Kingswood having access to this library has searched in vain for it. I, who have secret access to this place by a way and by means I may not divulge, have searched this library o'er and o'er in the still night time, with the phantom of Erle of Kingswood following my movements and glaring at my futile labors."

"The history of the doom of Kingswood within that box?" ejaculated Erle, clutching closely the one he had found in the gallery, and a remembrance flashed through his mind that he had seen within it a roll of vellum.

"So saith tradition," responded the old woman. "The Kingswood, male or female, who discovers that box, will possess the secret of lifting the doom, and may hope to end his days in calm happiness. The spot yet by me unsearched is yonder ancient chest, but, alas! I have no means of opening it——"

"Hush!" whispered Erle, suddenly; "there is the beat of footsteps upon the staircase. Follow me."

Ere he had concluded, the old woman, who appeared to have caught the sound too, darted with an agility which surprised him to a dark corner of the library, and appeared to vanish. He himself suddenly extinguished his lamp and took his way to the secret door which had admitted him, and by which he could regain the ancient apartments adjoining them.

He had barely stepped through the opening and closed the door, and the spring with a sharp click had sprung into its place, when he heard the burried tramp of many men echoed by the vaulted roof of the old library.

Through a small crevice in the door he was enabled to catch a glimpse of the ghastly visage of Philip Avon, as it flashed past him filled with malignance. There was a smile of rancorous vengeance upon it, which boded evil to Erle if he encountered him, but as he noted it, a smile of intense scorn quivered his upper lip, and he moved slowly away.

"I will sort unto the old chamber," he said, musingly, "they will not look for me there, and when the fruitless search has ended, I will return thither and peruse the manuscript I have within this strange old box."

He seemed instinctively to know the sudden incursion into the library was intended for himself. He was at a loss to imagine how Philip Avon should have discovered his presence at Kingswood, but he thought of him and of the circumstances with a species of apathetic contempt, when it would have been wisdom to have displayed the greatest circumspection.

He entered the ancient bed-chamber; the darkness was intense, but he had no difficulty in finding the great old fashioned bed. He flung himself upon it with the intention of resting for an hour wrapt in thought. He sank into a profound slumber.

He dreamed.

He was in the Chace, the moonbeams lit the trees up with their cold silver light. He stood suddenly face to face with the phantom Baron of Kingswood, and the spectre shrank from him; he followed it through glade and alley, brake and thicket; at last it paused and stood before the door of the old hunting-lodge. The grim spectre broke into a wild discordant laugh, which grated so harshly and discordantly upon his ears, that he awoke.

Awoke to find the eyes of Philip Avon gleaming into his own, to see his sallow face, yet more pale and livid with intense vindictiveness, turned towards him at the foot of the bed, while there was a dozen other eager faces crowding round, gazing upon him with looks of half affrighted astonishment.

HUMOROUS, GLEANINGS.

Simple minded people believe that false eyes, like false teeth, are mechanical contrivances merely, intended to supply a deficiency in appearance; but, my youthful hearers, you will look into a great many false eyes that have sight and intelligence before your hair is gray, and my earnest hope and prayer is that you may never look out of false eyes.

Such was the spirit of opposition between the proprietors of two rival coaches, that one was lately advertised to carry passengers to Liverpool at the following rates: "Inside, what you please; outside, ditto!" This seemed to carry the matter as far as it would go; but the other party were not to be discouraged, and in a short time they issued placards, stating that their coach would take passengers at the following rates: "Inside, nothing at all, and a bottle of wine included; outside, ditto, ditto!"

"Mr. Child, the banker, desiring to hire a valet, one of those gentry presented himself, and inquired what wine Mr. Child allowed at the second table.

"Port and sherry," replied Mr. Child.

"I like a glass of Madeira, sir," returned the valet.

"Why," said Mr. Child, "there is the curate of the parish who cannot afford himself a glass of wine of any sort."

"Ah," replied the valet, shrugging his shoulders, "I always pitied that sort of gentleman."

In the Paris Court of Correctional Police, recently, a lady, by no means young, advanced coquettishly to the witness-stand to give her testimony.

"What is your name?"

"Virginie Loustalot."

"What is your age?"

"Twenty-five."

(Exclamations of incredulity from the audience.)

The lady's evidence being taken, she regained her place, still coquettishly bridling; and the next witness was introduced. This one was a tall grown young man.

"Your name?" said the judge.

"Isadore Loustalot."

"Your age?"

"Twenty-seven years."

"Are you a relative of the last witness?"

"I am her son."

"Ah, well," murmured the magistrate, "your mother must have married very young."

A Good Rejoinder.—A worthy clergyman was roused from his sleep at five o'clock in the morning by loud talking at the side of a fish-pond in his grounds. His reverence put his night-capped head out of the window, and saw three men standing by the side of his pond.

"What are you doing there?" said he.

"Fishing," said they.

"But you are trespassing on my land; you must go away."

"Go to bed again," was the rejoinder; "your Master was not in the habit of sending away poor fishermen."

The good clergyman could, of course, only turn in again.

Trying the Color.—An old lady from the rural districts went recently to a linen-draper's shop and began examining a piece of cotton print. She pulled it this way and that, as if she would tear it to pieces, held it up to the light in different positions, wetted a corner and rubbed it between her fingers, trying if the colors were good. Then she paused awhile, seeming yet not entirely satisfied. At last she cut off a piece with a pair of scissors she had dangling at her side, and handing it to a tall, gawky-looking girl, of about sixteen, standing beside her, said, "Here, Lizzy Jane, you take an' chaw that, an' see if it 'fades." Lizzy Jane put it into her mouth accordingly, and dutifully went to work.

ADVANCE OF GENERAL ROSENCRANZ AGAINST THE REBELS AT RICH MOUNTAIN.

GENERAL MCCLELLAN, after driving the rebels under General Garnett, in Western Virginia, and driving them beyond the Alleghanies, involved the surprise of a large body, strongly entrenched, at Rich Mountain, in a position commanding the turnpike over Laurel Hill. He detailed Colonel, now General, Rosencranz to surprise them. This, in turn, involved a circuitous march through the dense forests of Laurel Hill, part a wild and broken country. General Rosencranz's column of 1,000 men was guided by a woodman, named Hart, who knew the mountain by such an intimate acquaintance with it, and it was very cold. At noon we came upon their pickets, and after dispersing the disposed charge by our regiment, immediately opened the action." The result of the battle is well-known. It ended in the utter rout and final capture of the whole force under Pegram, with a loss of 150 killed and 300 wounded. The sketch is by our Special Artist who accompanied General Rosencranz's column.

Important Financial Movements—The National Loan.

NEW YORK is the first great financial centre of the continent, the second of the world, and its action is of first importance in all that concerns money and the means of obtaining it. We have already, in a few numbers, recorded the steps taken by the metropolitan banks with the banks and moneyed institutions of New York, in connection with those of the surrounding cities, have taken up the Government loan for $150,000,000, authorized by Congress, for the efficient prosecution of the war. But there are some facts connected with this loan which are not generally understood, but which are of interest and importance to the people at large.

In the first place, the entire amount of $150,000,000 is to be issued within four months in sums of $50 and upwards, to suit investors, in the form of Treasury bills having three years to run, and bearing seven-three hundredths per cent interest per day—cents per day, for $100 invested—thus affording an easy way of computing the interest due. The interest on all bills above $50 is to be paid quarterly in New York, on the $50 bills it is to be paid annually. To ensure the prompt payment of interest Congress has provided an ample fund from augmented duties on many articles previously free, or nearly free of duty, and by the levy of an income tax. No investment could be safer, and very few more profitable for the same period of time. The interest is more than double that carried by the securities of the British Government.

But there is another financial movement of the Government which has perhaps a greater popular interest, and which cannot fail to be of universal utility. We refer now to the issue, also authorized by Congress, of Treasury notes of the convenient denominations of $5, $10, $20, payable in specie, on demand, at the branch office of the Treasury designated in the corner of each note.

In the present disordered condition of the currency, this medium, convertible with certainty into specie, and which will have a uniform value, will be found a great public convenience of incalculable utility. Hitherto banks have been established all over the land in which the highest security for the redemption of their issues, as fixed by law, has been a certain per centage of National stocks—the latter, of course, holding the highest value, and constituting the main reliance of the public. But now, instead of taking somebody's promise to pay on the strength of Uncle Sam's securities which he ought to hold and is pressured to hold, we deal direct with Uncle Sam himself, and know precisely where we stand. In other words, instead of getting a dubious currency at second hand, we get a sound one from a known and unquestionable source—convenient, safe as well, and worth precisely as much as St. Louis as in New York.

The new system will be best for brokers. Patrick can now send five dollars from Chicago to his sister in New York without subjecting her to a loss of fifty cents before she can convert her Chicago bank note into specie. Under the issue of three notes, furthermore, is a corresponding addition to the aggregate circulating medium of the country, and must, in an obvious and direct manner, assist all departments of business. Our New York banks afford us but a small amount of circulation; only $7,414,000 against $62,000,000 of specie, and $70,000,000 of capital. We are consequently in great part dependent on the issues of country and distant banks, of the value of which we are ignorant. The Secretary announced in the morning our purpose to be a worthless scrap of paper at night. But with a Treasury note in hand we know we have a positive and convertible value, "specie payable at the office of issue."

And here we may, without impropriety, state a few significant facts about the financial condition of the country. We have nothing to fear from the suspension of specie in the corresponding months of last year, in round numbers, decreased our imports $24,000,000, increased our exports of produce $25,000,000, and diminished our exports of specie $25,000,000. In other words, as regards our business relations with the outside world, we are $74,000,000 better off than we were during the first six months of 1860. We have bought less and sold more, and proved that we have in ourselves all the elements of financial independence. The specie in the vaults of the banks of New York from $30,326,000 on the 20th of December last, to $62,202,000 on the 17th of August. Under this condition of things, notwithstanding the difficulties of the times, exchange has remained permanently depressed. The Government issues, in the way of bills and Treasury notes, must materially assist a revival.

The Battle at Wilson's Creek.

We are naturally enough inclined to exaggerate circumstances occurring in our midst or near at hand, and correspondingly inclined to underrate those which occur at a distance. Hence we dwell constantly on the affair of Bull Run, and recur seldom to the more bloody struggle at Wilson's Creek, in Missouri. Yet, in point of importance, should inquire the confidence in the courage and steadiness of our volunteers more than compensating for the loss of the battle, the fact that the circumstances of the fight from Bull Run have given rise. We venture the assertion, that considering the composition of the opposing forces, and the numerical superiority of Gen. Lyon's little army (only 5,000 against 24,000), there has been no battle fought in this century with greater bravery, steadiness and determination than that which resulted in the defeat of Wilson's Creek. They defeated a body of men, in the open field, nearly if not quite, five times their own number, compelled them to destroy their camp and abandon their guns to the victors, and were only prevented from following up the victory and utterly dispersing the rebels, from utter lack of fresh troops and cavalry to be unbroken in the hour of victory. In little wars where courage and devotion were worthy of the most tried and trusty veterans were as much due to the volunteers of Lyon, as the shameful retreat from Centreville was due to a lack of it on the part of the men engaged at Bull Run.

We believe the statement of McDowell's army was as good as that of Lyon's, and that the force organizing under McClellan, when properly officered and properly directed by a single clear head, will prove itself equal to any body of troops in the world, of equal numbers.

As we have said, the rebel force at Wilson's Creek numbered 24,000 men, besides the Missouri militia under Governor Price, who commanded the Missouri rebels in the action, reports of whose loss have been, in round numbers, 800 killed and 1,200 wounded, besides the loss of Generals Lyon and Price, who commanded the Missouri rebels in the action, reports of whose loss have been, in round numbers, 800 killed and 1,200 wounded. From all accounts, it seems certain that the rebels' loss in killed and wounded was not far from 4,000.

The loss of the Union forces, which numbered scarcely to have been 233 killed, 721 wounded, and 291 missing—or, a total of 944 killed and wounded. This, a loss of one-fifth, or 20 per cent. of the whole force, is in accordance with what determination the battle was fought by Lyon's heroic band. It is almost invidious to designate any particular regiment for praise, where all did so well; but we cannot refrain from alluding to the 1st Iowa, the 1st Kansas, and Col. Frank Blair's St. Louis regiments, as splendid examples of undaunted bravery and endurance. The first went into the fight with 1,117 men, lost 186, 137 wounded, and four missing—a total loss of 189 men, or about 20 per cent. of the whole number. The Kansas and Missourians fought with corresponding determination at Solferino, their aggregate loss would have been 80,000 instead of 30,000. But the gallantry of the Irish regiment, commanded by Col. Mc. Louis regiment. At first the first and last shot in the action, and was steadily engaged. It entered with 736 men, and came out with a loss of 315, of whom 177 were killed or 189 wounded, two captured and 15 missing—a total loss in killed and wounded of upwards of 40 per cent. Had the Irish and Americans fought with equal tenacity at Solferino, their loss would have been 160,000 men instead of 30,000.

The 1st Missouri regiment equally distinguished itself. It went into battle 770 strong. Its loss was 291, of which 90 were killed and mortally wounded.

It will be seen by Bull Run and carping Frenchmen to remember these facts, when elevating their nasal extremities in deprecation of our brave volunteers.

The Sentiment of the Country.

THE Boston Transcript has given expression to the unanimous sentiment and opinion of the country in an article on the Cabinet, and the necessity of a change in the heads of the Departments of War and the Navy. Lamenting that we have no great, cool, executive, leading intellect in the Cabinet, such as the exigencies of the country demands, it says of the Secretary of War, that, apart from the notorious fact that appointments in the Army and immense contracts have been made by him from personal considerations, and without regard for the public welfare, "he stands convicted, on the showing of four all-important months, of clear, short want of executive capacity;" and it urges, justly, that the absolute lack of public confidence in him is the strongest unfavorable fact for his post, demand from the President, on the supreme ground of national interest, his prompt dismissal from office. "Go home and plant corn!" was his answer to the officers of a recruiting party from Wisconsin, who solicited his influence by the department. "Go home to the speculations in banks and railways, and fat contracts, in which your life has been spent, and in which you have grown rich!" should be the language of the President of the United States to Simon Cameron. As the Transcript truly says:

"The nation cannot afford to trust him to contracts and postal revenues and improvement through other discredited means like Senators. We feel no hesitation in saying that the country would have more confidence in the Government if Mr. Cameron were out of it, and we have a conviction of the public opinion which, we still maintain the whole majority of the 31 of 20,000,000 of people."

As regards the Secretary of the Navy, the same paper continues, with still greater force, and with equal justice:

"The Secretary of the Navy the people believe to be honest; the whole country knows him to be a gentleman, endowed, above all, with patriotism. Nobody considers more perfectly entirely his executive faculty. Energy, deliberation, promptness, comprehensiveness, are all there. But the great war ever had a pioneer duty or more ample as ours. The enemy had to be met on the land and on the water. The Navy, in the first place, to prevent foreign marine war against the Government. But, secondly, the Navy would have entirely every honest contract made by the Secretary for hiring and purchasing vessels. Boards of survey, with high and honorable names, our redoubted chiefs, on their personal honor, and without charge for services, have examined and reported upon the value of the vessels purchased. Nevertheless, the most enormous contracts have been made, in the most loose, unbusinesslike manner, and in some cases, as we have been informed, without any written contract at all. Secretary Welles, a man of business habits, and who would have remedied before this the evil of Hay, is not actively buying vessels and preparing to sell out bales and other miscellaneous to smaller harbors of the rebels.

"The people who are immensely important duty which our Government had imposed upon it, in connection with publicity—the enforcement of the blockade—who for them until within a month hardening as old system, instead of organizing it into a new one. Not to the late brains, we can be the history of the Navy the most plainly culpable and most unforeseen disaster of the war—that of the Norfolk Navy Yard. Its ships—forty, and that with a number of cannon turned upon us at Norfolk, or Pensacola, at Mare-Island, and the Gosport Navy Yard, Norfolk, Va., and the Navy Yard at Pensacola, Fla. Besides the stated ordnance stores, there were at the navy yard last, by the Secretary's own showing in the mind, every nine men out of Washington feared it, and were deterred only by the presence of a few marines. Ammunition, also, it was necessary, even if we had the brain, in point to further instances of the specific deficiencies of the Navy.

"The people have neither the time, money nor patience for these vast Secretary's Departments, with their immense patronage, and their immense expenditures, to be conducted in the old, slow, dilatory, and indifferent manner. They will—and, it we have another great battle, or if England or France should threaten our blockade, they will—insist upon the one-third part of the patronage and contented system—they will demand, in language rising from impatient outcry to fierce denunciation, that the Secretaries of War and the Navy shall put other approved patriots and statesmen in put in their places. Let it be done at once, and the country will be saved. Let it be done at once, and the patriotic and noble heart of the people will be satisfied. Let it be done at once, let it be made the imperative condition of a future loan, on terms made disadvantageous by further delay and disaster."

Mr. Jefferson Davis on the "Spoils of Victory."

THE Richmond (Va.) Enquirer of the 24th of July gives an account of the visit of Jefferson Davis, on the previous day, Mr. Jefferson Davis, from Manassas Junction, and reports the substance of a speech which he made to the people who had gathered to welcome his return. Among other things, it says:

"He pronounced the victory great, glorious and complete. He said we had whipped them in fair fight, on open ground, and had driven them back in the opposition. In reviving in the vastness and importance of our capture, he said we had taken provisions for an army and munitions for a host. Among the trophies of the field were the splendid equipages of the commanding officers, and he alluded to the various decorations to equip a large army, batteries of wagons and artillery, and he said that the spoils of victory were in themselves enough to feed an army of 50,000 men for 10 months."

A careful calculation of the effect upon the amount of provisions would weigh 36,500,000 lbs., and require over 12,000 wagons and not less than 48,000 horses for its transportation! The official return does not show that the Government lost half as much on the retreat from Bull Run. But the best commentary on Mr. Davis's statistics is contained in the following proclamation of Jefferson Davis issued the day after the battle, calling, with threats, on the people for something to eat!

"PROCLAMATION, ARMY OF POTOMAC, MANASSAS, July 22, 1861.

"COUNTRY—Soldiers of the army of the Potomac! In the name of your country, it is with confidence that for the purpose of infinitely greater, hum and grim longer for the food which you require.

"It is now necessary that the people should know wherein they can the privilege of your rich country will be glad to have an opportunity thus to furnish supplies for our gallant troops. It is primarily necessary in the counties of Virginia, and others back in succession until the invaders of her soil.

"By order of Gen. BEAUREGARD.

"The Richmond papers will please copy, and the Southern press their assistance, therefore, if necessary, it is expected that the country must be completely with all their energies to the relief of their subjects.

"Respectfully, Colonel, your obedient servant,

"A. A. Adjutant-General.

"To Colonel A. T. M. HILL, Commander in Militia, Loudon county."

Rebel Loss at Bull Run.

No official statement has yet been published of the loss of the rebels in killed and wounded at Bull Run. Scattered accounts from the insurgents themselves indicate that it was considerably larger than the loss of the Army of the Union forces:

"The loss in our (North Carolina) Sixth regiment is as follows:
Killed.....	7	Wounded..... 31
Mortally wounded.....	3	Missing..... 2
Severely wounded.....	5
Slightly wounded.....	11
Aggregate.....	59

Another of the regiments slightly injured not worth mentioning, as the report."—Richmond Dispatch, July 23.

"I have no certain data upon which to go in estimating killed and wounded, but from all I can learn our loss in killed will not exceed one to one hundred and 500 wounded, 1,000. Of the enemy the killed must have been at least 1,500, and wounded at least double that number."—Letter from Beauregard's Adjutant, Messmer Correspondent of Mobile (Ala.) Advertiser.

"In the battle of Manassas, on the 21st inst., upon reliable authority, that the total loss of the Confederates, in killed, wounded and missing, will not exceed 1,500 men, and that the loss of the enemy will be at least 5,000 men. This is a terrible array for here been some exaggeration."—Memphis (Tenn.) Appeal, July 25th.

"From the best information we can collect in our possession, we are inclined to think that our loss in killed on the field was only between 600 and 800. This is a great loss, but it is small when we look at the result of the battle. That is the opposite with which they charged upon us—at least double of the enemy. Our wounded will not exceed 1,500, and may not reach 1,000. Very many of these are only slightly hurt in the head, face, arms, neck."—Richmond Correspondence of New Orleans Picayune, July 25th.

"The Confederate loss in killed, wounded and missing, within the limits of the enemy must not have been less than several thousand. Three Spaws, however, say we have not lost more than 1,500 in the loss of battle—and that is estimated each when the enemy gave way. The Washington Artillery, of New Orleans, which fought with such distinguished gallantry, lost 40 killed and 100 wounded. Five fell upon the ranks of the 1st Mississippi regiment. The Quitman Rifles, of Georgia, lost 30 killed and wounded. The 4th Alabama regiment lost a total of 200 killed and wounded."—Correspondence of Charleston Courier, Fairfax Court House, July 23.

"Colonel Fisher, a graduate of West Point, now in this city, and who was shot in the back with a bullet ball in the hand on Sunday, says that he was a member of Major Wheat's battalion, and one of four members which constituted that command there were not more than one hundred that escaped death and wounds. Wheat was killed on the field. Fisher was shot down by his side."—Richmond (Va.) Enquirer, July 25th.

"Among the killed was Captain Imboden, Lieutenant Terrance, Captain Imboden, Captain Ratcliff, Captain Bishop, fought with desperation, and he thinks his command was nearly all killed and wounded."—Richmond (Va.) Enquirer, July 25th.

"We are very sorry to hear of the sad fever which befell three noble companies, members of the South Alabama regiment, in the recent Manassas battle. Out of 150 men, 100 were killed and wounded, and 50 died. The whole loss of the regiment was nearly 600."—Mobile Register, July 25th.

"The Louisiana regiment suffered severely in the battle."—Richmond (Va.) Enquirer, July 25th.

President Davis telegraphed to his wife that the result of the battle was a "dearly bought victory." From late Southern papers we make up the following list of field and regimental officers killed, from which it will be understood why he pronounced it a "dearly bought victory":

Officers Killed.—General Bernard E. Bee, South Carolina; Colonel B. H. Hollins, South Carolina; Colonel Stephen D. Fisher, South Carolina; Brigadier-General E. K. Smith, Brigade Army; General Francis S. Bartow, Georgia; Colonel Lamar, Georgia; Colonel Jenkins, Second Virginia Regiment; Colonel Slaten of General Johnston's staff; Colonel Francis J. Thomas, of Baltimore; Lieutenant-Colonel Hampton, of Johnston's Brigade; Major Edward Willard, Louisiana Battalion.

Colonel Preston's Regiment, Fifth Regiment, First Virginia Volunteers; Colonel Gardiner, Colonel Hunton, Colonel Kemper, Colonel Terry, Colonel Corse's, Seventh Virginia Regiment; Colonel Jones, Fourth Alabama Regiment; Colonel F. C. Bowen, Georgia Regiment; Colonel Bell, Fifth Alabama Regiment; Major Seawell, Aid to General Beauregard.

ALL the world has laughed at the amazing nothingness of Canada politics. Now all America—which is good fun—was right out in the hot haff, and has been a laughing at Canada's politics. Last week, on the 22d of August to wit, in the House of Commons, that "the final settlement of claims to the site of the Provincial Penitentiary at Kingston, and the transfer of the part at which it occupied." The building does not seem to know that the measure be accompanied by a condition that the establishment of the blockade, as was expressly stated in Congress. With regard to the efficacy of the blockade, the general of a government that will not pay a part of what is undecided, and should have to go home in the first place. It may yet be done and at once relieve Lord Palmerston's mind from any fears of a difficulty arising out of a definite blockade.

A RIDGE FIGHT IN SAVANNOR.—A correspondent writes from old Saybrook (Conn.), under date of August 26, that the ridge fight which attempts to raise a division sentence at last place, under the disguise of a white flag, brought on the 23d of August—with the Rhode Island Regiment, and until the constitution and the laws are submitted, and a Government of our fathers restored. The Secession is supposed to have concentrated about 30,000 men, of the same stamp, from the town of April. Nearly 1,500 people were on the ground. The meeting opened by the reading of a portion of the daily orders of ministers, and did so, substituting a regular Union speech from Captain Hadley. The Rhode Island Regiment carried the day splendidly from Bull Run—for the real-lustrous hostages procured for the occasion by your correspondent of Connecticut, hailing from Hartford, whose name escapes infamy only by being unknown.

BRILLIANT SKIRMISH NEAR POINT OF ROCKS, VA.—On the 5th of August a brilliant skirmish took place ten miles south of Point of Rocks, in Virginia, between a detachment of the Confederate army, under Colonel Evans, and 54 Virginia cavalry, which resulted in the loss of five killed, eleven wounded, and seven taken prisoners, as reported on the part of the Rebels. No one was hurt on the side of the patriots.

ALLEGIANT TO HIS OFF SOLDIERS.—The act of Congress of July 29th, authorizing the volunteer forces in the service of the United States the system of substitution, and to receive, muster in, or take enlistments except by which the family of the volunteer may make such payments of his pay as he may request. It is not necessary that the soldier should be present at the time authorizing the father to draw monthly such portion of the soldier's pay as he may designate, of the soldier's family, and the balance to the soldier himself. It is per month, exclusive of food, clothing, &c., all of which is provided by the Government, and is in addition to a per month of clothing, and a bounty of $100, each man ought to be able to save a better fit at least 5 per month for his family in the State. The act of Congress of July 29th, is a wise and just measure, but will obviate the difficulties and disputes which have arisen in paying our volunteers, and in transmitting money to their families.

DOMESTIC ITEMS.

THE revenues from the New York State Canals for the years 1860-61 amounted to $4,620,000, and the expenditures to $2,000,000, leaving a net revenue for the current year of $2,620,000. The saving in one year for the present year is about $1,000,000.

THE German Lederkranz held their Midsummer's Night Festival in Jones's Wood, in this city, on August 7. Another was held on the 14th, being called by unknown natives "the monthly." The monthly was somewhat more numerously attended than the festival, and was a very pleasant affair. The music of the monthly was good, and the dancing was excellent. Among the East River's Rhenish appearance, and it may manifest some old valued heroes on May when we shall have the Festival of Festivals.

THE question of suppressing the publication of the New York Daily Day Book, and of the New York Weekly Day Book, both of which are conducted by the Government, and though its determination is not announced, it is probable that their suppression will be ordered. The Day Book is known to be in possession of the Government that these papers have been established for the purpose of misleading the people, and that the Government has been forced to provide a means for their publication, in connection with the enemy with information of troop plans and movements. The other Rebel news papers have been suppressed, and the Day Book will probably follow.

THE Slack county Democrat, a Secession paper in Canton, Ohio, was entirely destroyed by some volunteers of that place on the 22d inst.

COL. E. D. BAKER, from Oregon, has received the appointment of the California regiment intends to raise a brigade of 4,000 men. Some of which are to defend the Pacific coast, and others to join the Army of the Potomac under his direction. It has been decided that the regiment is not to represent the quota of California, but is to be raised entirely by private subscription, and should not now be spoken of as the California regiment.

THE State Department has issued the following explanatory notice:

"The regulation of the Department on the 9th inst. on the subject of passports, was promulgated immediately to meet the unanticipated change produced by the act of Congress, approved on the 5th inst., which for the first time transferred to the General Government the control of the foreign relations of the Secession. If, however, in any special case, the interest of a person should be supposed to be in any way affected by the rule, the Secretary will be glad to receive such proofs to be obtained until communication can be had with the Department in regard to the matter.

(Signed) W. H. SEWARD."

THE bark Caroline, of Boston, Schmidt, late Dupree of Boston, from Aden 26, and arrived at Boston. The crew make the following report. On the 15th of June, in lat. 2 N., long. 42 W., they fell in with a large bark, which they took to be one of the Rebel privateers. She hailed them, and they hailed the vessel name, Montgomery, of Boston, with the name letters on, and therefore they kept on their course. The bark was apparently deserted, and the end of the pilothouse and bulwarks on the aft. Center there also a screw down on the deck. The crew of the Caroline say that they are positive that the bark carried a boat with mast, sail, provisions, &c., and remained in sight for two hours after they passed her. They are also positive that the vessel could not be assigned for the Secession navy of Cowboy. She was not over 300 tons.

SOUTHERN ITEMS.

THE rebel Congress has prohibited the exportation of cotton, sugar, rice, molasses, or tobacco, except through their ports. The prohibition is to be retained one of the enactments of the blockade, and is limited by several penalties imposed by the Secession Congress. The object of the prohibition is to enable the Secretary of the Government of any merchant or railroad are engaged in the transportation of Southern produce to Europe.

THE Charleston papers insist that numerous ladies' ball dresses were taken at Bull Run. Why not? Every one knows that all the rebels had to have some of it Richmond, on the Monday night following the battle. One of the Charleston papers says that the ladies of that city are in a state of excitement, as they are impatiently awaiting the return of their dresses. These are the items of utmost interest in the history of the war. Let us have a full account of the number and color of the ladies' dresses in a Kentucky stocker."

THE Savannah (Georgia) papers state that an India rock, lately taken by the privateer, was then at Jacksonville on the coast of Florida, by a blockading vessel. It was abandoned by the prize crew and afterwards boarded from the war vessel and set on fire. She is said to have had a cargo of wool, fine and woollens, valued at $100,000 in gold in London.

THE Secessionists are endeavoring to bribe Tennessee into joining the Southern Confederacy. The Memphis Appeal of the 16th inst. says on this case Tennessee. The Memphis Appeal of the 16th of August says: "Memphis is the key to the Mississippi Valley, and the Confederate States cannot afford to let it fall into the hands of the enemy. It is very easy to fortify it, and it is very easy to defend it. Let the people of Memphis and the surrounding country turn out and work for a few days, and the work is done. In saving this city a central point, it already possessing the other requisites of accessibility and healthiness. This is rather unfair in Richmond, unless the rebels despair of making Virginia safe on their side.

THE classic Secession Muse "makes an effort," as poor Mrs. Leathey was urged to do, in the columns of the faithful Kentucky Bluff of August 20th. The historian and of the subject will suffice to show the origin of the whole:

To Wood and Scott will never speak,
But on the field will be seen,
That Wood, well fly, and Scott will die
Before he'll turn his back.

Keep on your shirt, "nobody hurt,"
Calm your fears and your fright,
Or you'll catch hell with cloud shot,
Or a Minie bullet bright.

COLLEGE SUSPENSIONS.—The New Orleans True Delta says: "Of the colleges and universities of the South, Georgetown, the suits of Alexander College, at Clarksville, Tennessee; the Universities of Mississippi, Louisiana, and the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, have suspended sales, in each case the war is not carried on at once."

NEWSPAPERS.—The Confederate States Almanac has been superseded and every paper in Charleston, New Orleans, Memphis, Nashville and Montgomery have suspended publication. Only one paper in a divided state now, and there in the interest of all other publications.

A SOUTHERN lady, lately visiting at Newport, returned to "Dixie" a few days since, with a large number of Yankee notions full of letters from the rebel signatories of that city. She has written back that "Jeff Davis" is the only man there who is not a fool. Such was "a cruel" letter. He (she and any cross from one to the other to us."

WAR ITEMS.

THE President has appointed the following additional Generals in the army: Brig.-Gen. Rosecrans, Brig.-Gen. Schenck, Brig.-Gen. Lyon, Brig.-Gen. Sherman, Brig.-Gen. Pope, Brig.-Gen. Sumner, Brig.-Gen. Heintzelman, Brig.-Gen. Franklin, Brig.-Gen. Keyes, Brig.-Gen. Fitz-John Porter, Brig.-Gen. Banks, Brig.-Gen. Hunter, Brig.-Gen. Frémont, and General James W. Denver, of California, to be Brigadier-Generals.

THE following are the terms of parole given by the surrendered officers and men at Hatteras: "We, the undersigned officers and men of the late rebel forces at ——, do, on our word of honor, solemnly pledge ourselves that we will not, by arms, influence, or otherwise, during the existing hostilities between the United States and the Confederate States, or any of them, in any term or manner whatsoever."

JEAMES DAVIS, a soldier, captured at Bull Run, very released on condition of taking the oath, which he did, and was released. He is a native of Cornwall, England, of Scotch, and other countries of the rebel forces in the field of battle.

It is stated on the authority of responsible parties in New Orleans that Commodore Farragut has received the thanks of the Secretary of the Navy for his gallant conduct in the late fight. Other United States officers of the Rebel Secession Army, are in the act of resigning their commissions in the United States Army, and are now in the service of the Confederate States, or any of them, in any term or manner whatsoever.

SUPPRESSION OF REBEL NEWSPAPERS.—The country is waking up to the great fact that we are in a state of war, and that treason, spoken or printed, as well as acted, must be repressed with a strong hand. Freedom of the press is a great boon; but when the press endeavors to undermine the public credit, to sow discord among the soldiery, and to encourage rebellion by words of sympathy, it becomes an enemy to the nation, and ought to be deprived of its immunities. If the law cannot reach it, we may be sure that the people's instincts of self preservation will find a way of doing so. The process of "clearing out," as exemplified in the case of the Bridgeport (Conn.) Farmer, the Jeffersonian in Pennsylvania, Bangor (Me) Democrat, &c., is not a pleasant alternative; but unless the Government suppresses treason by regular means, nothing is more certain than that the people will do it by irregular means. It becomes, therefore, doubly the duty of the Government to prevent popular violence by preventing the necessity for its display. We are glad to find that the authorities have finally awakened to their duty in this regard. It will be seen from the accompanying orders from the Post-office, that the circulation through the mails of the Journal of Commerce and other New York city papers, mentioned in the late presentation of the Grand Jury of this city, is prohibited. The same exclusion will no doubt be visited on other rebel organs in the North; and should this remedy not be effectual, we presume severer measures will be resorted to, for which, in our opinion, the laws against treason afford ample warrant. The order prohibiting express and other companies from carrying correspondence for the rebels is one of the first importance. This, in conjunction with the seizure of all the boats on the Potomac, will pretty effectually cut off the insurgents from their usual sources of information as to the plans and purposes of the Government.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Aug. 22, 1861.

SIR—The Postmaster General directs that from and after your receipt of this letter, none of the newspapers published in New York city which were lately presented by the Grand Jury as dangerous, from their disloyalty, shall be forwarded in the mails.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
T. B. TROTT, Chief Clerk.

To the Postmaster of New York city.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Aug. 14, 1861.

The President of the United States directs that his proclamation of the 16th inst., interdicting commercial intercourse with the so-called Confederate States, shall be applied to correspondence with those States, and has devolved upon this Department the enforcement of so much of its interdict as relates to such correspondence. The officers and agents of this Department will, therefore, without further instructions, lose no time in putting an end to written intercourse with those States, by causing the arrest of any express agent or other person who shall, after the promulgation of this order, receive letters or papers to be carried to or from those States, and will seize all such letters and forward them to this Department.

IMPORTANT ARRESTS IN WASHINGTON.—Mr. James Berrett, Mayor of Washington, has been arrested for treason, and sent to Fort Lafayette. Mr. Richard Wallach has been elected to fill the vacancy by the Board of Aldermen and City Council, in joint Convention. A number of women of respectable position, but strong rebel sympathies, have also been arrested in Washington, for holding treasonable correspondence with the rebels. Among them is Mrs. Gwin, wife of the late Senator from California; Mrs. Phillips wife of a former member of Congress from Mississippi, now in the rebel army; and Mrs. Greenhow, widow of a former translator and clerk in the State Department. All these ladies were high in favor with Mr. Buchanan and the Floyds and Cobbs of his Cabinet, and it is alleged controlled to a large extent the patronage of the Government. It should be understood that these ladies are subject to no greater rigor than confinement to their own houses under a guard which prevents too large a communication with the outside world. Mrs. Gwin, it is understood, undertook to send to the rebel Generals plans of the fortifications around Washington. A number of officers, naval and military, who have lately tendered their resignations, the usual first step towards joining the rebels, have had their treasonable purposes thwarted by immediate arrest. Traitors of all sorts will now begin to find out that war is a game that two can play at.

The report that Colonel McCunn, of the New York 37th Regiment, had been broken by a Court Martial is untrue. He has been honorably discharged.

Commodore W. D. Porter, who was lately removed from command of the sloop-of-war St. Mary's, on the ground of rebel sympathies, has voluntarily returned to Washington, to vindicate himself from the charge, which he indignantly denies.

It will be remembered that Mr. Breckinridge presented, with some parade, a petition to the Senate, purporting to be signed by 600 citizens of the United States, in the neighborhood of Niagara Falls, praying for the adoption of some measure of compromise with a view to conciliate the rebel States. It turns out that the document was a forgery.

On the morning of the 23d experiments were made at the Rip Raps with Sawyer's rifled cannon. One of the shells thrown burst in the midst of the rebel camp at Sewall's Point, cutting down the flagstaff and creating considerable commotion among the rebels.

An attempt was made by the rebels at Cumberland, Md., on the evening of the 23d, to capture ex-Governor Thomas, while he was addressing a collection of Union men before a hotel in that place. The Union men were too strong, however, and not only drove off the Secessionists, but continued the work by the destruction of the office of the Alleghanian, a rabid Secession newspaper.

Two attempts were made in Connecticut, on the 24th, to raise peace flags—another name for rebel emblems. The first was at Stepney, ten miles north of Bridgeport. According to previous announcement, a meeting was to have been organized after the raising of the flag. No sooner was the flag hoisted, however, than the Union men made a rush for it, pulled it down, and tore it into shreds. A Union meeting was then organized, which passed a series of Union resolutions. At night the Farmer newspaper office, published in Bridgeport, was demolished.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.—The arrival of the Hibernian at Farther Point gives us the news from Europe to the 16th of August. A late number of the London Times, in its city editorial, dwells upon the supposed financial difficulties accumulating against the Federal Government, and says that the most earnest wish of the friends of America must be that the difficulties thus in sight may accumulate with sufficient rapidity to bring the North and South to reason. The London Globe denies by authority the statement that Admiral Milne has reported the blockade of the Southern ports ineffective, and adds that no general report on that subject has been received. Catharine Hayes, the vocalist, is dead. The special agents of the Cotton Supply Association had reached Egypt, and were to have an interview with the Viceroy on the subject of cotton cultivation. There was a vague report of a growing coolness between France and Austria, bearing an ominous resemblance to that which preceded the late war.

THE LATE COLONEL NOAH L. FARNHAM, OF THE FIRST REGIMENT NEW YORK CITY FIRE ZOUAVES.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.

COL. NOAH L. FARNHAM.

COLONEL NOAH LANE FARNHAM, who succeeded the lamented Ellsworth in command of the First Regiment of New York Fire Zouaves, and who died on the 14th inst., in Washington, from injuries received at the battle of Bull Run, was born in Haddam, Connecticut, June 6th, 1829. He removed, with his parents, to New York in 1833. After finishing his education at New Haven, at the age of 18, and being of a military turn, he joined the City Guard, and was on duty two nights during the famous Astor Place riots. He remained two years in the Guard, when he joined Fire Engine Company No. 42, and afterwards Hook and Ladder Company No. 1, of which in 1854 he was chosen Foreman. In 1856 he was elected Assistant Engineer of the City Fire Department, in which capacity he served three years, filling his position with success and honor. Having formed an intimacy with several gentlemen of Company B, of the Seventh Regiment, he accompanied that regiment to their encampment at Kingston, as a volunteer private. In 1857 he joined that regiment, and while in the recruit class was elected second sergeant. He was afterwards elected second lieutenant, and on the resignation of Captain Shaler, of Company B, was promoted to a first lieutenantcy, which he held at the time the regiment departed for Washington.

After Ellsworth made his flying visit to this city with the Chicago Zouaves, Farnham was impressed with the value of gymnastics as an aid to the soldier, and he organized a company of gymnasts, whom he intended should assume the Zouave dress and drill, take the tour of the Eastern States, not encamping in cities, but selecting the wildest and most secluded forests and mountains. When Ellsworth visited West Point with his Zouaves, Farnham's company, of the Seventh Regiment, acted as their escort. Both companies were reviewed on the parade ground of the Military Academy by Jefferson Davis and Colonel Hardee. During this trip the acquaintance between Ellsworth and Farnham sprang up and rapidly ripened into intimacy. They were sworn friends from that time, and Colonel Ellsworth took the earliest opportunity after the formation of the Zouave regiment to induce Farnham to accept the second place in the regiment.

Farnham did not at first wish to leave the Seventh, as a hundred intimacies and friendships connected him with his old comrades. He therefore went on with it to Washington, where Ellsworth insisted upon his taking the Lieutenant Colonelcy in the Zouaves, and Farnham finally accepted. The Zouaves, in receiving their new Lieutenant Colonel, were delighted, for the new officer was one of themselves, whose courage and talent were known to them by long years of acquaintance in the department. In his discipline he soon proved himself more careful and untiring than even Ellsworth himself, if that were possible.

When the order was issued for the advance of the army of Gen. McDowell on Manassas, Col. Farnham was confined to his bed by illness. He, however, insisted on placing himself at the head of his regiment. His horse was shot under him, and he received wounds and bruises, which induced brain fever, resulting in his death, on the 14th of August. His remains were brought to New York, and the funeral ceremonies took place at Grace Church, Fifth Avenue, on the 17th inst. after which they were conveyed to New Haven for interment.

OUR own papers, copying from the English press, have been lately indulging in "Alexandredumasish" accounts of that Monte Christo of assassins, Lawyer Roberts, who, out of misplaced attachment for the mistress of Major Murray, attempted to murder that high toned moral military hero. Another English paper, either out of a love of truth or utter malignity, thus demolishes the poetical picture: "An absurdly exaggerated description of the two rooms in which this drama of blood was enacted has been given in some quarters, and in one or two points the incorrectness of the account is calculated seriously to mislead. The sumptuous furniture, including articles of virtù, would be overvalued at £100. The pictures are chromo-lithographs; the bronzes are of the poorest character; and, with the exception of a few carved pieces, the furniture is cheap and modern. A tawdry stuffed chair, belonging to a drawing-room set, such as Tottenham Court Road dealers advertise for a very low price, which is in a very rickety condition, had been broken simply by being sat down upon. With regard to the escritoire, said to have been forced open, the article in question would be more accurately described as a cabinet, and is minus a lock; but this has evidently vanished long ago, the wood being too rotten to hold a screw."

The London Review says: "As readers and politicians, we are all of us 'used up.' It is only when a more than ordinarily abominable case comes before Sir Cresswell Cresswell, or a murder has been committed, to which there is no clue to motive or perpetrator, that the gentle public, male as well as female, finds out that there is 'something' in the papers. The jaded attention is immediately aroused, and millions of people, who care nothing for Kings, Emperors and Presidents, and all their doings or misdoings, or for long speeches in Parliament, think, talk, and read of nothing else but the piquant scandal, or the terrible mystery, that has shocked or startled society out of its drowsy indifference." This is the same passion that made an old lady send for her doctor, as she was sure she was dangerously ill, "since she had lost all relish for murders!"

LORD WALTER BUTLER, an Irish peer, and formerly a distinguished officer in the British army, died in Dublin on the 20th of July, of delirium tremens. He was in his forty-seventh year.

PROFESSOR LA MOUNTAIN, THE AERONAUT, RECONNOITRING THE REBEL POSITIONS NEAR FORTRESS MONROE.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

PRACTISING WITH THE SAWYER GUN AT THE RIP-RAPS.

THE Rip-Raps, on which Castle Calhoun is in course of erection, and which is in advance of Fortress Monroe, being between it and Sewall's Point, is an important position, as with guns of a proper calibre it can completely command and destroy the enemy's batteries on Sewall's Point. General Butler has given special attention to this point, and various kinds of ordnance have been experimented with, and as far as we can learn, the Sawyer rifled cannon and the Hotchkiss shell have proved the most complete and effective. The trials have been made in the presence of General Butler, Mr. Russell, of the London Times, and other distinguished visitors, and some of them were pronounced remarkable by Lieutenant Baylor, who has charge of the ordnance department in the absence of Captain Dyer.

A BALLOON RECONNAISSANCE AT FORTRESS MONROE.

THE first time balloons were used for the purpose of reconnoitering was by Louis Napoleon, during the Italian war. With true American aptitude, we have adopted it, and, as usual, improved upon it, by attaching an electric telegraph, which makes it available on the field of battle. Our Artist has sent us a sketch of one of Professor La Mountain's ascents, in a field between Fortress Monroe and Hampton. The utility of these aerial observations in an open country is very great, as they protect our troops against a surprise.

THE FEDERAL STEAMER MOUNT VERNON

Reconnoitering the Unfinished Batteries on Mathias Point.

IT is now, as usual, when too late, acknowledged, that had the gallant Captain Ward's advice been followed, the rebels would not have been able to erect their batteries on Mathias Point. That the Federal authorities were fully alive to its importance is evident, since the Freeborn and the Mount Vernon were sent several times to make observations. Our Artist, who was on board the Mount Vernon, has forwarded a sketch of the last trip it made to report the progress of the enemy's batteries. Owing to the thickness of the wood very little can be seen, but there is quite enough visible to demonstrate that they have erected a battery of some light guns, since their firing hither to has not come near to the other side.

THE VOLUNTEER NURSES AT THE NEW YORK CITY HOSPITAL.

THE Volunteer Nurses who are at present going through a course of training at the City Hospital, will be recognized by Government through the influence of the Women's Central Association; said course have passed over fifty, but from unsuccessful and other causes, this number is considerably diminished. The most rigid inquiries are made with regard to the moral character and capacities of those who are admitted. Some of them are women of education and high social position, who enter the service without the desire or expectation of remuneration. They will be obliged to adopt a hospital dress, and must undergo one month's training and be thirty years old, though from the appearance of some it would require considerable faith to believe that they were thirty.

Some of the ladies are becoming quite proficient in the art of bandaging and the other duties appertaining to their humane and responsible position.

THE GREAT BATTLE OF THE WEST, WILSON'S CREEK, MISSOURI—REPULSE OF THE REBEL CAVALRY BY A SECTION OF ARTILLERY UNDER CAPT. TOTTEN, U.

EDWARD SOTHERN.

Two gentlemen has made such a widespread notoriety, as an actor, in this country, that we deem it no more than proper to present him to the readers of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper. No doubt he is, in all and every respect, an English gentleman. He affects the part, he personates the character he plays, in every scene on the stage. This, perhaps, makes him a polysophistic, but, like a certain class of writers, he moves in the same circumscribed course and century of progress which is most generally accredited to American life as our other nationality. The mind of this gentleman seems seldom at rest, and day or night he is unceasingly planning some new scheme or perfecting some improvement on settled and accepted modern acting. Whether this be a theory of our own or not, we believe that the movements of others—generally those with measured brain—Mr. Sothern exhibits a restless energy, which, when combined with observation and perspicuity, which marks his acting at once as studied and natural, which is a bold combination of individuality, indeed, as a rep and a perpetuator of genuine practical jokes, Mr. Sothern has a claim of merit which few of his professional brethren will acknowledge, with a sly "tweak of the nose and a blackeye of the eye," but which, nevertheless, is his undoubted and undeniable due.

The subject of our sketch was born in Liverpool, England, in the year 1832, and was sent to the University of Oxford for the customary sunny limbo, he seceded from the classics at an early period. Possessing a strong love for elocution, and a natural talent for mimicry, not knowing where else to devote his time and his talents, he came to this country, and made his first professional appearance at the National Theatre, Boston, in the year 1853. His success in the country he was engaged by Mr. Wallack, in this city, where for some years he was merely recognized as a valuable, yet, comparatively actor, without anything special to recommend him to the particular notice of the public. It was not until he burst upon the dramatic world as a most wonderful artist. Having been to a certain extent "kept down" in the metropolitan theatres, he came through the engagement of Matilda Heron, and the revival of Lester Wallack in the play of "Rosedale," and "Lucretia Borgia." Mr. Sothern was selected for the part, and the magnificent acting displayed on the occasion not only astonished the public, but perfectly amazed the critics.

From this moment the field was his own in the above line of business; and, in a few months later, again there was rung, in loud and clear accordance, the old English measure to intimate bewilderment—tarradiddlepottoes. His theatrical and concert engagements, wherever he was the theme of conversation on every side by the then poets of the day—E. L. B.—it was generally conceded that he alone was possessed of genius of so commanding a nature as to make his performances an institution almost throughout the country. The school being in the nascency degree, and the public taste unformed, Mr. Sothern was acknowledged as the most prominent star of the American boards. Without a movement or word that the most insidious notoriety might not say in a drawing-room, Mr. Sothern managed to keep his audiences in continual state of laughter, and during the second run of the "American Cousin," his introduction to everyone was tightly exercised, being a compliment unparalleled, perhaps, in the annals of the stage.

It is understood that Mr. Sothern shortly leaves us for London. Whether his talented talent will be relished by the English public, we cannot say; but we believe he will make a great fit with all lovers of good and purely original acting; and should he otherwise appear in high comedy or juvenile parts, we have no fears for the result, or that he will be classed as the most brilliant and finished of the French school style of actors that has been seen by the British public for years.

Notwithstanding the lamentable state of affairs in this country at the present time, Mr. Sothern has proved about the only star that can attract great audiences to whose every direction he goes; and those who have once beheld his masterly rendition of such parts as Armand, Jules Deslys, in "Camille," Count de Keroine, in "The Angel of Midnight," the Kischen, in the "Florists of the Danube," and the greatest of all, Mr. Lord Dundreary, in "Our American Cousin at Home," will never fail to hail his appearance among them as the return of one of the most original and best actors of the age.

THE GREAT BATTLE OF THE WEST—REPULSE OF THE REBEL CAVALRY.

We have in our hand a very full account of this important battle, one of those already, in proportion to the numbers engaged, that has ever been fought on this continent; but we will be seen from the facts presented in the article in our editorial column. It was a signal victory, achieved by the coolness, and determination of a handful of men, but of which the full truths could not be respected owing to the lack of men and means for pursuing it the flying enemy. We have already given views of two leading incidents in the battle, the death of Gen. Lyon and the charge on the camp of the rebels, when the latter was shot on the mid-battle. The present view represents the action at the moment of greatest danger to the Union forces. Gen. Lyon, dismounting the retreat, rallies:

The greatest danger to our troops was at the time when a regiment of rebel cavalry charged from the woods towards our ragged and unbroken train. Only one company of our troops, Captain Wood's Dragoons, had to encounter the second Kansas Regiment and the Missouri Dragoons. They formed immediately, and coolly prepared for the attack. Captain Totten, U. S. Artillery, got his guns in position, and again, under cover of the broadsword, made a position where he was unseen by the advancing enemy, and opened with three 30-pdr. guns. This for raked them from the woods and was terribly effective, throwing them into disorder and forcing them to retreat. But for this they would have struck the troops must have thrown our columns into confusion. It decided the fortunes of the day."

TARRING AND FEATHERING MR. AMBROSE L. KIMBALL,

Editor of the Essex County Democrat, at Haverhill, Mass.

The origin of tarring and feathering is lost in antiquity, or at least in the dark ages of history; the practice, however, is of universal use—from one end of the globe to the other. It was known to flourish most in the South and West, although we have also had instances of the North and Eastern States. The last case of which happened on the 25th August, in the town of Haverhill, Mass., a short distance from the residence of the author of "Snow Bound." Mr. Kimball, the editor of the Essex County Democrat, had surely tried the loyalty and patience of the community by his violent denunciations of the Union and its defenders. The publication of the 17th of August, containing the notice of the president's proclamation, and a Committee waited upon Mr. Kimball, and by a unanimous vote requested him to discontinue the publication. This he decidedly refused to do. He was, therefore, taken down from his office by order of the Eagle House. A spectator gives the following description:

"After remaining every article of clothing but his drawers, he was completely covered with a coat of tar and feathers, after which, he was mounted on a rail, and was conveyed to Northern street, in front of the office of the Democrat, and directly under the American flag, bobbed which, as the writer quoted lottery, he has described the Government of the country.

"He was required to cheer the flag, which he did; after which the crowd moved in the direction of Washington street, and on the bridge he was allowed to dismount and walk through it, when he again mounted the rail and was carried to the house of Mr. Johnson, Esq., who was called out, but the nature of the exercises there we were unable to learn.

"Returning to town, a halt was made in front of the Eagle House, when the question was again submitted, if he regretted his conduct, to which he replied in the affirmative; when, by request, he knelt down, and, reciting the Lord's prayer, closed with a confession and admission: 'I am sorry that I have published what I have, and I promise that I will never again write or publish articles against the North, and in favor of secession, so help me God.' After this he was conducted to his home."

MY GOLDEN SKELETON

CHAPTER XI.—DOMESTIC JARS.

IT was the face of my dead mamma; yet, rather, the face of the living, who has left it, now breathed, like the ivory memory. The beams of the moon fell upon it, making the features dimly distinct. The pallor, the calm, the stillness, and a shade thinner, than the lady's figure had looked in health; but there could be no mistake in the well-remembered face.

My hair stood on end, my blood ran cold, my eyeballs started from their sockets, and I shrank back with the utmost force of my little sight. Mother! Did no her face like a coward as he was, and fled from the apparition, and, as I did so, the figure had passed behind a large tombstone, and was no longer visible.

Directly it was out of sight my blood seems to flow more freely and I recovered the use of my limbs. Slipping back to the house I was swiftly away in the direction of the railway station. When I got to the platform of it I had had not been to wait; and I was in a fever of anxiety best monsieur, my uncle, should come to the spot in the interim. My great fear was not at what I had seen, and so great was my fear of my legal protector, that I asked for, paid for, and received a day-return, a freedom ticket. The clerk gave a loud laugh, then frowned a dark frown, and finally, handing me my ticket, glanced suspiciously at my red bookish clothes.

It was midnight when I reached London; the city lay around me in its great sleep, beneath my feet. I scarcely knew what to do, when I had ascertained that the sheds of Madame Tinkbelle's was Lorot basted forward into the shop, and began talking in what pere to the young lady. In a moment or two he returned.

"Mr. Timbs does not at the present moment occupy my humble household; but she is not far away, and I have ordered her to be sent for. She yawned comfortably.

I made myself as comfortable as possible. Mr. Lorot having inquired if I had breakfasted, I replied that I had had a cup of coffee and a roll at the coffee-house. Then ensued a general conversation, which lasted for about two hours, at the end of which time I was desirous to be effect that Mrs. Timbs was unable to come round until the afternoon, and that I was then on no account to go without seeing her.

I soon ascertained that Mr. Lorot's fickle-teaching and canvassing for orders was not of any importance to him, and that he was only sitting at home with me all that day as a convenience to me. I found him a most agreeable people, who (more than probably) desired the return of certain moneys which had been advanced to him on the security of my uncle's name. He was a widower, and Madame Lorot, or Tinkabelli (a thin, pinched woman, with reddish hair, and a face like a fox), was childless, and a scold, given to eating and chasing her better half. I soon ascertained, moreover, that Mr. Lorot had a very strong dislike to the whole French people, regardless of which—probably for the reasons given by the jolly man—he appeared a very good fellow.

That day passed slowly enough; for Mr. Lorot, good-natured as he was, was not calculated to be tedious. I suffered from the heat, too, cramping a monosyllabic into the conversation here and there. But my thoughts were full of the form that had appeared in Little Leopard street. I was thinking of my past life, of the women who were connected with it, of the present, and of the strange perplexities with whom my fate connected me. Where was that most beautiful face? Where was Mrs. Tinkbelle? I had not seen her for years, but I knew she was still unpleasantly vivid in my imagination. Could he be dead? Was it her ghost, who had thus appeared to me, regarding her as dead? Or death? I was in doubts about the death, but I was in still greater doubt about the ghost. Could it be that Mrs. Tinkbelle had called Gravesend and returned to her—but was he mad, and why did he live in seclusion with the vehicle-proprietor? Was he married? Was he related to her? I seemed to be two and beside. I dwelt in a place of phantoms, while palpably living things were all around me, and there cast them by me before me to the clouds above me.

I was in the midst of these reveries when Mrs. Martha Timbs, dressed in a faded black dress, a soiled black bonnet, and an old brown shawl, which had once been bright scarlet, came to see me. She held out her hand, queerly said without a smile, and then sat down upon a chair, saying:

"You have come," she said, "as I expected."

Mr. Lorot and myself out of the room and closed the door quietly behind him. Mrs. Timbs sat down opposite to me, and, in a low, harsh, broken voice, she addressed me as follows:

"Your friends in the country are, I suppose, aware of your absence?"

"Yes," I replied. "I did what you told me to do, and let them know that you had invited me to town."

"And they agreed?"

"Yes. They seemed rather pleased that I had made up my mind to go to sea."

My companion looked her polite, and seemed plunged in reflection. Then she sighed, it seemed to me, pained by some bitter thought, throwing a strange shadow in the recesses of her sunken eyes. Then she looked at me, and, after a moment's hesitation, she said:

"My poor boy!" she murmured, placing a slight hand on my shoulder, and gently tenderly upon my face, "my poor boy! I fear that you are not happy with me, anyway."

"I am sure I am not."

"Master Rose," she went on, cried, "clouds have passed over your young life; but you are as innocent as your mother's babe. You have suffered, but you do not know the world. It is a bad world; it is full of wretches and villains. Better to die—better to die, than to herd with them, than to feel your blood mingling with theirs. It is, I say, a bad world."

I was rather surprised to hear Mrs. Timbs come out after this fashion, but I said nothing: I simply shook my head and signed dorply, to express my belief that the world was very ill-deeded.

"Hearts are broken, babies are trampled upon, men are murdered, women are worse than murdered; while Sin goes about with a blush on his face, money-making, and rolling in her ill-gotten gains. Better to die in childhood—better never to be born at all.

Her eyes, her bony voice rose, her face turned pale, and she tore her full height.

"Poor boy, better you were born or thought of Master Henry, the heart of mine was broken. But I lived on, as the world lived for, and all that. I lived on, dear, with the broken heart burning in me only and slightly. I have lived on, dear, to this day, to say to you with devils. I lived on, because the devils beckoned me downwards, and I turned not to them."

I was in still greater dumb astonishment.

"You have been," she went on, "sent to me by you, for I see that you know. I know nothing of sin, and I know neither happy. I know nothing of sin, and I know no more than I have done. You cry, you have been prepared for it, and may be better prepared for it."

She sank down on the chair, with her head in her hands, and I saw that her form was full trying; that she was in trouble. But I sat still and grave, quite still.

"Pshaw!" she said, after a few moments. It is time to leave this gloomy room. Come!"

I put on my cap and stood up, ready to depart.

"Tinkabelle," she went on—"Lorot, and what others for some days. I doubt much whether he would like to see you at his house. But I will see him to-morrow-noon. To-night, at least, I can make you pretty comfortable. To-morrow we will make other arrangements.

She led the way into the front shop, where we found Mr. Lorot.

"The young gentleman is going home with me, Lorot," said Mrs. Timbs.

Lorot nodded approval, and then nodded farewell.

"Good evening, Mr. Lorot," I said, bowing out a friendly head.

"Good evening, my dear sir," said Lorot, grasping the friendly hand vigorously. "I am the solicitary of Mr. Lorot, he several things by before.) "And remember," he continued, "that you are always welcome to my humble house. I am not rich, but I shall be delighted to see you."

"Come, my young friend," I replied. "Good evening."

Mrs. Timbs lived in a quiet street hard by, and was the only occupant of a small house. When I entered it, I was surprised. I mean that the house seemed her own, and that she kept no servant. She lived in a small sitting-room, plainly though neatly furnished.

A little man, with a fair, handsome face, and no legs to speak of, and with very gray hair, was seated in one corner of the room. He had a book in his hand, and appeared more I had ever seen before, but I recognized it nevertheless. It was the face of Brousseau, the dwarf whom I had seen in company with Madame Tinkbelle's Parisian establishment. Mrs. Timbs said something to him in French. He looked up with a smile, and nodded to me.

"You have met before," said Mrs. Timbs, turning to me.

"Yes," I replied.

"And you have not forgotten him, it seems. He is quite an old-fashioned, and has thought it to pay me a visit. He speaks no English; I presume he did not know me in the form, but keep his face fixed on me, and he was the first to grasp. I was rather surprised to find that he was acquainted with my business; but I thought it better to volunteer no comments.

We had some bread and cheese and porter for supper. Supper over, Mrs. Timbs took out cards; Brousseau got down, and played with me. I was rather surprised at the dwarf's dexterity at the fair, but planning up quite every hour and then.

"Poor Brousseau," Mrs. Timbs spoke to me, but looking quietly at the subject of her remarks. "It is seldom that he is allowed out, and he is as much a child as he is a dwarf. He has cannot understand us. He cares not for haute and amusement, and he loves quiet. Broussais is deep, though, very deep. Is it not so Broussais?"

Broussais expressed in pantomime his consciousness that her words were directed at him, and his entire ignorance whether the words were complimentary or otherwise.

"I knew your mamma, Master Henry, long ago. I knew her when she was young and beautiful. I knew her too, afterwards, when she had grown old."

She spoke reflectively, as if talking to herself; but her strange eyes were fixed on mine.

"I knew her living, and I saw her dead. Dead! I can hardly persuade myself that she is dead."

The room swam round me, and my blood burned.

"And I," I cried, "have seen her since she died—seen her on her own grave!"

"In dreams?" said the woman, suggestively.

"Not in dreams. A night ago, when coming here, I saw with my own eyes, in the churchyard yonder—I saw her ghost."

The woman turned red and then pale, and her fingers twitched nervously.

"Pshaw!" she murmured. "You have dreamt of her, Master Henry—that's all."

"No! Coming hither in the evening, I passed the churchyard, and thought I would go and look upon her grave. I crept to the wall, but shrunk back afraid; for my French uncle was there, talking to himself aloud. I slipped back behind the wall, and listened."

"Go on."

"He talked of her, saying she was unfit to keep secrets; that she was better dead; that he pitied, but could not trust her. The moon was shining. Then the black ghost arose, quietly, from behind the tombstone; but he did not see her. He talked on. Then she leant over the stone, threw back her veil, and looked my uncle in the face; and he fell with his face on the grave, shrieking, and calling for help."

With a cry of wonder or horror, Mrs. Timbs sprang to her feet.

"She has arisen!" she murmured, hoarsely, pointing to Broussais.

I looked at the dwarf. He had arisen to his feet, trembling, and deadly pale.

"She has arisen, and she will hunt him down!" cried Mrs Timbs.

"Vraiment!" said Broussais, reseating himself, and gazing fixedly at the fire.

There was a long pause, during which I puzzled my poor brains to conjecture whether or not Broussais was conscious of the meaning of my words. Mrs. Timbs spoke at last apologetically, as if she had read my thought:

"Broussais was alarmed, I think, and feared that something was the matter."

She spoke to him in French; he looked up, nodded his head, and smiled.

"Yes; he was frightened by my manner. Well, Master Henry, I was foolish. What you saw was but a dream after all, and you must forget it."

I protested; but my protestations were of no avail. Mrs. Timbs had grown quite calm and sceptical, and would not listen to any of my imaginative theories. There was another awkward pause.

"Master Henry, stranger things than that happen daily," said she at last; "but we wave them away, we avoid them; if we were to think of them often we should drive ourselves mad. We wave them away, therefore, and forget them. Say then, with me, that your eyes have deceived you. Let us change the subject."

I made no answer; but acquiesced, by a gesture, to the proposal.

"Very good," she said. "Henry, if you will listen, I will tell you a story."

I smiled, and nodded my head, rather astonished at her desire to play the romancist.

"Years ago, before you were born, there were sinners in the world, plotting against you. They are nameless. There was a happy man, happy and rich, who fell into the hands of those sinners, was deceived by them, and made to sin with them; but the rich man had a beautiful wife who loved him, and who tried to save him—in vain."

I looked at Broussais; he was still gazing fixedly at the fire.

"She tried to save him, in vain. He sinned, being forced to sin, and blasted his good name for ever. He was sent across the sea to atone for his sin, and the beautiful wife that loved him was left behind in her sorrow."

She spoke calmly and decisively, looking me fixedly in the face all the while.

"But he left money behind him, and the lady was rich beyond measure. Then the lady had a baby, a boy, whom she loved dearly for his poor father's sake. Then the news came over the seas that the father was dead; and the lady and the child put on mourning clothes, changed their names, and went abroad. It so happened, however, that the sinners pursued her, hunted her down, and tore her boy from her. When she sought her boy back again, they thrust her roughly away, and said that she was mad."

Why were there tears in the eyes of Broussais? Why did he hide his face in his hands?

"The sinners plotted vilely to break the mother's heart, and robbed the boy of the riches that should be his by right. They plotted so well that neither man nor woman could prove their guilt, or can prove it till the time comes. The mother lived on, the victim of a foul plot, helpless to aid herself or her flesh and blood. The tale has no end, for the end has not yet come."

She removed her glance from mine, and fixed it on her knitting. After a pause she continued:

"I will tell you something more, Master Henry. Years ago, before you were born, there was a poor sister and a brother who loved each other, and were happy. But the same sinners—those who crushed the rich man, and plundered his wife—stole in upon them. The brother fell into evil courses; the sister, who (as Heaven would have it) loved one of the sinners with her whole heart and soul, was wronged, and stamped into the dust, when the sinner spat upon her."

Broussais was gazing at the speaker with a strange, scared look, half pity, half entreaty.

"It so happened, Master Henry, that the wrongs of the rich man and his wife became the wrongs of the ruined sister and the wild brother. Brother and sister plotted together for years and years, while the sinners believed the brother dead. At last he came to life again; not alone, for the shadow of the rich man was with him, helping to hunt the sinners down."

She turned paler and paler as she spoke, till her face was like the undriven snow. Broussais seemed violently agitated.

"You are young, Master Henry, and cannot thoroughly understand; but a day is coming when you will know all."

"Tell me," I said, excitedly, "have I seen the rich man and his wife?"

"You have."

"And the brother and sister, and the sinners they are hunting down?"

"You have seen them all; but you have still another to see. Ask no more questions, for I cannot answer you. You will soon know all."

I made no answer, but hung down my head in thought.

"Only remember this," cried Mrs. Martha Timbs fiercely. "If you are made of flesh and blood, the knowledge you seek will make an angry demon of you. It will goad you on till the end, and that end may be a terrible one. It will absorb both body and brain, till you have done what fate has left you to do, and have hunted the accursed ones down."

At a gesture from Broussais, the woman paused, till she became quite calm.

"Enough of this," she said. "Broussais there dislikes to see me agitated. The poor fellow is very simple. See! there are tears in his eyes. He is quite a child."

There were tears in his eyes, certainly; but I was not too young to be blind to the thought that the reasons assigned for them were rather absurd ones. Besides, I was in high doubt whether Broussais was quite the child that Mrs. Timbs described him to be. My own opinion was that he knew a little too much, even for a child of his age.

She began to converse with him in French, and I saw by his face that their talk related to the previous conversation in English.

I confess that I was puzzled and bewildered by Mrs. Martha Timbs, by Broussais, and by the dark, mysterious narrative of the former. Do what I could, there were incongruities in that narrative which I could not reconcile to my own experience; and yet I was sure that the events alluded to concerned me materially.

While we sat together, silent but full of strange thoughts, I heard a slight movement behind me at the door. Turning round hastily, I caught sight of a white head and a jolly face, which were thrust into the room. The mouth was wide open, the eyes were distended in petrified astonishment. I had seen the face years before. It looked older and less jolly than when I had last looked at it.

Enter Mr. Timbs. Consternation!

"Timbs!" cried the woman, with a cry of fear or surprise.

Broussais said nothing, but (strange to say) looked Mr. Timbs fixedly in the face. Timbs, however, gasped and panted for some time, quite unable to articulate.

"I thought so," he murmured at last. "I suspected these pretty little goings on, and luck has brought me back in time to see 'em with my own eyes. Wife, who plots against her lord and master; Frenchman, who encourages her, and swindles his lord and master; boy in moleskin, who—— Why, good gracious!"

He had recognised me, and was quite overcome by the recognition. He sank into a chair.

"Now, then," he gasped, savagely, at Mrs. Martha, "explain. What are you about?"

Mrs. Timbs looked fiercely at him, curled her lip, but made no answer.

"Obstinate, are you? Wait a bit, my woman; you and I have a little bill to settle, and I'll take it at compound interest. In the first place, however, I takee possession of this here boy, in the name of his lawful uncle and guardian."

He rose up and seized me by the collar. I looked appealingly at Mrs. Timbs.

"Leave him alone!" she cried, tearing his hand away. "No man shall harm the boy in this house. Stand back, you wretch. You've got my blood up at last, and will find me dangerous. Off!"

She seized a table knife, and stood before me, brandishing it. Broussais did not interfere, but watched us quite calmly.

The jolly man shrank back, cowed by the fiercely flashing eyes of the woman. Then, summoning up courage, he brushed past her and again seized me. With a cry of anger and hate, she drew the knife across his wrists, inflicting a slight wound. With a moan of pain, he fell back. Mrs. Timbs folded her arms and looked at him.

"May you bear that mark with you to your grave!" she said, slowly. "It's the first letter of the long account I am preparing for you. It is written in blood, Timbs, and the blood in which it is written will itself be the settlement."

"Curse you!" growled Timbs. "You'll be sorry for this."

"Why don't you call in the police?" sneered his wife. "Why don't you have me taken up and convicted, and sent to prison? Why not?"

"Why not, indeed?" cried the jolly man, wrapping a huge red pocket handkerchief around his bleeding wrist.

"Because you dare not. You coward, you! Ain't you sorry that the worm you've been treading upon for years has turned upon you at last? Don't you grumble because the poor worm has taken the part of the little innocent boy there? Tell your master, man, that I defy him and his, and that God—who takes care of poor wronged people—will help me to bring him to an account. Oh, you coward!"

In point of fact, Timbs did not appear particularly courageous just at that moment. He seemed perfectly stunned and bewildered.

"Look here!" he said, edging towards the door, "if you don't suffer for this, my woman, I'm a Hottentot! Now turn as pale as you please, for I'm going to leave you. I go straight to a certain party, I tell him that you are plotting against him with the Frenchman here, and I tell him you're trying to cram your nonsense into that there boy. Good-bye! You know a certain party better than I do; so you'd better make your will."

He said this in a bullying, blustering way. The woman only smiled and sneered. When he had finished, she walked close up to him and shook her clenched hands in his face, saying:

"Tell him that I am only too anxious to settle accounts with him: that if he comes to me, it will save me the trouble of hunting him down; that sooner or later, he must go down on his knees to me—aye, to me—and sue for mercy. For yourself, be at rest; I will not stain my hands with you. You are a coward, and I scorn you."

"We shall see," muttered Timbs, who looked at that moment as if he saw double.

"Tell him, too, that the dead have arisen from their graves to haunt him. Tell him what he already knows, that the dead are on his track now, ready to avenge the wrongs of this boy. Tell him that his murdered wife has arisen to torment him for ever."

Mr. Timbs stood pale and transfixed for one moment in the doorway, then, with a fierce oath, he rushed down stairs.

Broussais arose and shook his clenched fist, savagely. In an instant, however, the angry light faded from the eyes of Mrs. Martha Timbs, and she fell forward with her face on the table, moaning and sobbing bitterly.

THROUGH THE RED SEA.

"UNDER THE CLOUD AND THROUGH THE SEA."

So moved they, when false Pharaoh's legion pressed,
  Chariots and horsemen following furiously—
Sons of old Israel, at their God's behest,
  Under the cloud and through the swelling sea.

So passed they, fearless, where the parted wave,
  With cloven crest uprearing from the sand—
A solemn aisle before—behind, a grave—
  Rolled to the beckoning of Jehovah's hand.

So led he them, in desert marches grand,
  By toils sublime, with test of long delay,
On, to the borders of that Promised Land
  Wherein their heritage of glory lay.

And Jordan raged along his rocky bed,
  And Amorite spears flashed keen and fearfully
Still the same pathway must their footsteps tread—
  Under the cloud and through the threatening sea.

God works no otherwise. No mighty birth
  But comes by throes of mortal agony;
No man child among nations of the earth
  But findeth baptism in a stormy sea.

Sons of the Saints who faced their Jordan flood
  In fierce Atlantic's unretreating wave,
Who by the Red Sea of their glorious blood
  Reached to the Freedom that your blood shall save!

Oh, Countrymen! God's day is not yet done!
  He leaveth not his people utterly!
Count it a covenant that He leads us on
  Beneath the cloud and through the crimson sea!

BILLIARDS.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—All questions sent to Mr. Phelan in reference to the rules of the game of billiards will in future be answered in this column. It would be too much labor to send written answers to so many correspondents.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. T. M., Schenectady.—In English pool. You can have the ball removed in that case.

W. McB., Taunton.—1. It is no protection. 2. He must keep his body, in playing, within line of the two end pockets at the head of the table.

MARKER, New York city.—The case mentioned is one of those which comes under the rule.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

Buffalo, 16th August, 1861.

M. PHELAN, Esq.—Dear Sir—I have seen a statement in Wilkes's Spirit to the effect that the balls played with by Messrs. Berger and Seereiter, in their exhibitions in Detroit and other places, were 2⅜ inch balls. I have always found Mr. Wilkes's paper reliable in matters of amusement or sport, yet I subsequently read in the same paper a communication, signed "Spot Ball," contradicting that statement, and saying that the balls used by [illegible] were the identical balls used by M. Berger in all his exhibitions in this country. Can you clear the matter up? T. S.

Answer.—What we know of our own knowledge is, that we saw the balls with which Messrs. Berger and Seereiter played in Buffalo; that we, ourselves, played with them; and they were 2⅜ inch balls. Before playing with them, we asked Mr. Seereiter what size they were, and he told us they were 2⅜ inch balls. You must have remarked that in the same issue which contained "Spot Ball's" letter, the editor of Wilkes's Spirit replied, editorially, that the statement with regard to the size of the balls was made on the authority of M. Berger himself. M. Berger's relative, M. Guillermin, who accompanied him, or [illegible] yet in this country, when questioned by us on the matter, stated positively that in Buffalo and Detroit the balls used by Mr. Seereiter, in all his games with M. Berger, were the full size American balls.

THE AMATEUR TOURNAMENT.—The score of the various games is as follows:

Around the table	128
Four ball carom	164
French game	20
Carom pool	124

ANDERSSEN AND KOLISCH.—Messrs. Anderssen and Kolisch played a match at the London Chess Club, the first winner of four games to be the victor. Final score—Anderssen, 4; Kolisch, 3; Drawn, 2. This, we think, settles the question that Kolisch is no match for Morphy. The following is game the first, for which we are indebted to Herr Lowenthal, chess editor of the London Era.

22 Kt tks Kt	P tks Kt	And Mr. Kolisch resigns.

(a) Up to this moment the opening is conducted with care and accuracy by both combatants. This move, however, appears weak; it loses time.

(b) An excellent move, and finely conceived. The effect will become apparent as the game advances. The Knight here occupies a most commanding position, both for attack and defence. The feature of Mr. Anderssen's play, that is most worthy of notice, is the excellence of his openings. He invariably disposes his forces so as to be prepared for any emergency, and to take prompt advantage of the slightest error his adversary may commit. The move in the text is a good illustration of our remark.

(c) Finely played. The Bishop is here advantageously placed. The move retards the development of Black's forces, but at the same time protects White from any aggression on the part of his adversary.

(d) The position here is one of great interest. It is so complicated that the utmost skill is required for both attack and defence.

(e) At the first glance, playing the Knight to Rook's fourth seems to promise some advantage to Black. Looking more closely, however, we find that on White's replying B to K 5, he avoids all danger.

(f) Upon examination this will be found far superior to Kt to B 4.

(g) Herr Anderssen, with his usual accuracy, selected the best move, having in view the advance of the K B P.

(h) An excellent move, the beginning of complicated positions. In fact, from this point to the end, the game abounds in situations of remarkable interest. The able manner in which the Hungarian conducted the game, against an adversary of pre-eminent qualities, fully entitles him to our highest praise.

(i) A good retort; White's contemplated manœuvre is thereby rendered perfectly harmless.

(k) In order to be enabled to advance the K Kt P with safety.

(l) The position here is very instructive, and all this is well calculated by the German master. Either R tks P, or Q to Q 3 would have involved Black in difficulties, extrication from which would have been impossible, because, had Black played in the first place R tks P, White would have replied, with great effect, Q to Q Kt 8 (ch), and if Q to Q 3 White would have rejoined with Rook tks Kt P, checking, &c.

(m) A move which causes White great embarrassment.

(n) Finely played again. It defends the Pawn at K 5, and at the same time opens the diagonal for the Bishop, which is thus brought into active co-operation.

(o) Exchanging Queens would have been bad play; it would have abandoned the advantage in position already obtained by Black.

(p) This move loses an important Pawn, but there seems no better play.

(q) It is obvious that White dared not capture the proffered Rook, on account of Black's formidable reply, Q to Q 8 (ch), &c.

(r) The play on both sides throughout this critical end game will well repay the student for his time and labor in examining it.

(s) Ingeniously conceived. The move secures a speedy and successful termination.

MISCELLANIES.

OIL WELLS IN CANADA.—The people of Canada are rejoicing over two great discoveries. The Montreal Gazette says: "The Enniskillen Oil Wells of Upper Canada are the latest wonder, and a wonder moreover to be regarded with interest by the Province. The most remarkable of these rock wells have been opened within these last ten days, and furnish oil with considerable quantities of gas, but without any water. Some which have been opened a week (July 30th) have afforded from 400 to 400 barrels of pure oil, and after extracting this amount the well has filled up again in a few hours to the surface, and in two is now flowing over into the adjacent creek. It is impossible to say what amount of oil these wells would furnish if wrought continuously, but the supply seems to be enormous. It is worthy of remark that the oil wells of Canada are in a much lower geological formation than those of Ohio and Pennsylvania. Those rise for the most part from the Upper Devonian sandstones, while the wells sunk in Enniskillen are in the Hamilton shales, and even seem to have reached the underlying Devonian limestones, which with perhaps the addition of the Silurian limestones, we conceive to be the source of the petroleum both in Canada and the adjacent States. It is evidently connected with the undulations subordinate to the great anticlinal axis which we have traced through Western Canada, and which permit the accumulation of the oil elsewhere diffused through the rocky strata."

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.—Mr. Jonblesque communicates to the London Times a graphic description of a visit to the great wall of China: "Another day's journey brought us to Chalaou—a hamlet at the foot of the great wall. The road for the last fifteen miles had been so bad that we were obliged to leave our horses at Nankau, hiring in their place Tartar ponies. Nothing less sure-footed than these shaggy, hardy little beasts could have carried us through those rugged mountain paths, which we would have done on foot but that one mile's march over the sharp rock which forms the pavement would have left us shoeless. At daybreak on the following morning we climbed the highest peak of the mountain range, and there, standing on the top of the great wall, reflected upon the stupendous folly of this wonderful work of human industry, which is said to have cost the country 260,000 lives from sheer physical exhaustion. The wall, which is built of stone and brick, is twenty feet high and fifteen feet broad, surmounted by a double parapet, loopholed on the north side. As far as the eye can follow the mountain range it winds over the ridges of the precipitous black rocks like a gigantic serpent crawling along, and with its breath poisoning all around; for, turn where you will, nothing meets the view but the desolate, dreary tract of rock, unrelieved by a blade of grass or a tuft of moss, and huge boulders strewing the base of the mountain sides. It was the whim of a tyrant to build a wall where nature had already built a barrier far more effectual than anything that human art could construct. However, there it remains, after a lapse of nearly 2000 years, a monument of the cruel folly of one man, and the patient industry and sufferings of many thousands. Having made an abortive attempt at a sketch, and tried in vain to discover one redeeming feature in this vast scene of desolation, I secured my brick, and descending to the pass, remounted to proceed homewards. Our guard could hardly believe his senses—certainly he doubted ours. When at Nankau mine host inquired what we were going to the great wall for. Our honest answer met with no credit. Were there not walls everywhere? Was not the wall of Pekin much better worth looking at? And then, as for shooting, why come so far for game when it could be bought in Pekin at our very doors? His impression evidently was that we had some sinister project in view; but when we returned with the bricks the old man simply burst out laughing, and set us down for a couple of harmless lunatics."

AN INCIDENT IN A COUNTRY TOWN.—

A pig whom, rushing down the street,
  A butcher boy did pursue,
Rushed into—what an odd retreat!
  A shop where kept was a Jew.
And there the pig did stick and stay,
  They could not get the pig away.
"How wonderful is Nature's ways!"
  Said they who saw the touching fact;
"The sense as that there pig displays!
  No Christian couldn't wiser act."

BRIGADIER-GENERAL FRANZ SIEGEL, OF MISSOURI.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL FRANZ SIEGEL, whose military genius was so remarkably exhibited in the battle at Carthage, Missouri, on the 5th of July, and whose bravery at the bloody battle of Wilson's Creek, on the 10th of August, has called forth the admiration of the people, is a native of the Duchy of Baden. He is not only a brave man, but a practiced and experienced soldier. In the revolution of 1848 he was commander of the republican forces in the Grand Duchy of Baden, under the provisional government of Hecker, Struve and Brentano, and only combined the campaign with great skill. The insurrection having been finally suppressed by the Prussian army, Siegel made his escape to this country, where Hecker and other of his compatriots also found refuge.

For several years past Colonel Siegel has resided in St. Louis, and on the first call of the President for troops to defend the government against the rebels, he entered the field, raising a regiment of German volunteers, and was made its first commanding officer, but his present honors, it appears, were soon won, and both entered as privates in Siegel's regiment. This prompt and patriotic movement of the German population fired the ambition and their fellow-countrymen in Illinois, who immediately organized a Jager regiment to that State, and sent for Hecker to become their commander. At first Hecker declined the offer of a command, declaring that he had no higher aspiration than to serve as a private under his old friend Siegel, in whom he had more confidence than in himself, but yielding to continued solicitation, procured his dismissal from Siegel's regiment, and proceeded to Illinois, to assume the Colonelcy of the Jagers.

General Siegel is comparatively a young man, and has active military life, and the experience gained in European warfare, eminently fit him for the command in which he has already given proof of rare ability and singular coolness in the hour of danger. He will be thoroughly heard from in this campaign.

It is an interesting fact in connection with his history that he was earnestly solicited to take the command of a German brigade in the city, but declined, alleging as a reason that there was a broad field of operations in Missouri, and that he could be more useful there than elsewhere. He was right in his conjecture, and the battle of Carthage and the glorious defense of St. Louis rather than leave them, assured that they were the men to give excellent accounts of themselves. His judgment is confirmed by the admirable steadiness of the soldiers in the affair at Camden Point. For his bravery and skill in that affair he was raised by the President to the rank of Brigadier-General.

GENERAL BEN McCULLOUGH.

THIS notorious man was born in Rutherford county, Tennessee, in 1814. His ancestors emigrated from North Wales. McCullough took early to the life of a frontiersman, and was a scout in the service of Stanberry and Brown Vieto. He resigned his staff appointment September 5th, 1841. After the war was over he returned to Comanche county, and was made United States Marshal of Texas by President Parsons. When Mr. Buchanan decided to send an army to put down the Utah rebellion, he appointed Mr. McCullough one of his Commissioners.

At the breaking out of the present rebellion Ben McCullough raised a regiment of Texas dragoons and called them the Texan Rangers. He then joined the rebel forces, under command of General Price, and was present at the battle of Springfield.

LIFE AT LAKE MAHOPAC—GREGORY'S HOTEL.

Poon is the spirit which finds no sympathy with bright lakes and running streams, and there are few indeed of the denizens of our cities who do not long, when the sultry summer days come on, for the invigorating atmosphere. Bottle-nosed is almost universal, that the mountains and wooded hills, sloping down into pure crystal and streams have their birth, are only to be found for away in New Hampshire or Northern New York, and are only to be visited at an expenditure of time and money which few can afford to incur, and to make. Not before Nature has been at her great city of New York, with its myriad surroundings, that such is not so. Its metropolitan centre of the West on World, destitute even in this regard. She has reserved in her neighborhood a region of hills and valleys, forests and sparkling waters, almost Alpine in some of its aspects, with its picturesque beauties still free, upon it, where the jaded citizen can bathe his brow in the fresh mountain air and his limbs in waters rolling cool and clean from beneath moss-covered rocks, under great trees coeval with the discovery, and gladden his eyes with unwritten verdure, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot." You can, nevertheless, by taking the train at such a region within two hours of your cobwebbed office. We talk of hours, and mile after mile is the true measure of the relations of places. You may be in the country in a moment, and you may have enterprise wondered what that hill, cloth of hills and mountains extending back from Cold Spring, concealed, and whether or not it lived among their fastnesses, and what they did there?

Well, that wonderful country is Putnam county, and among its hills the Croton River gathers its sparkling tributaries before going on through aqueducts of brick and mortar, and iron pipe and lead over into your bedroom closet. It is a country high and cool, and has a hundred lakes glistening in an emerald setting of forests and meadows, clear and pure as crystal. There is Glenida and Gleed, but shortest of them all is Mahopac, still retaining the name that was given it by the Indians. Although but 6 miles from the Croton, its surface is more than 600 feet above the river, and its highest steeples, or summits of 900 feet above the sea. Supposing it by way of the Harlem Railroad, that the other lounge the cars at Croton Falls, and the lakes carriages five miles further, through a picturesque grazing country, to the inns. Or it may be reached from the Hudson River, or the railway running on its bank, by way of Peekskill; but that route is the longest and most roundabout of all. From either direction, second in comfort, and, having reached the depot, you are at once in the midst of the scenery, the inns and shanties before the railway, a fleet of wagons, some miles in extent, in endless broken by jutting promontories, and its surface relieved by islands, enlivened in primitive forests, against the dark green of which the white sails of rapidly gliding boats stand out in strong relief.

There are lakes with bolder features of scenery around them, but there are few in the world combining so much of the picturesque and the beautiful, with just enough of wildness to show us that it is still unbeseemed, and a place where solitude can be courted and found, as well as society and social pleasure.

Surrounding the lake, at points favorable for their fine views, are a number of hotels and large boarding-houses, where people who have found out the secret of the place come with their families to spend the summer months, and bless their children with pure air, exercise and wholesome food. Chief-est among the hotels, however, even on Mahopac is Gregory's, among the islands of Putnam, in the Gregory House, which, with its numerous cottages, is on the eastern shore of the lake, with green lawns and trees sloping down to the very edge of the water, along which are always moored a line of boats, light to row, gay in color, and blooming with flags and awnings. Here the visitor may enjoy all the peculiar pleasures of a watering-place, with the advantages of charming country and facilities for boating; and what, in our judgment, is better than all, wholesale principles under the luxuries and beauties of the sweet little island Putnam. Our host of the Gregory (who is not above his business, but esteems it exhibit present honor to do what he has undertaken well) is always ready to assist the enthusiastic picnicker with those essentials to temperance—champagne, for instance, lobsters, chickens and champagne—for some one aware, and to the fisherman, and bobbin for a living, we are reduced to the extremity of scratching on such poor food and drink as these. We shall have to more pleasing than a tree around Putnam, with a quiet afternoon, when boats are to be discovered, moored up in every shady nook, while their occupants swing lazily in hammocks beneath trees, and smoke the immemorial cigar, or imbibing the cool champagne! Not always smoking, however, nor always drinking; for the ladies (God bless them!) form a majority of almost every party, and seem to find as keen an enjoyment in the fragrant rosaceæ of Petrea as their lords and lovers. We say fragrant rosaceæ, for the earth is carpeted with winter-greens and ordered over with birch and hemlock.

But to return to our hotel—a thing, however, we seldom do at Mahopac until late in the evening—a meal de corridore freely with gossiping promenaders, by moonlight, or sitting with dancers and dimly with music. You want the latest news, then there is the—who goes for frog?" You hate only to apply to Mr. A. E. Whytead, in the office, and he will tell you, with the latest telegraphic word, "Frogs!" as the door. He holds one thread of the great web of intelligence, and strives to which element light and air have until of our land, from the Aroostook to the Prairies will stamp you with the news from the city—a twinkling, or eastern John to send up the thick boots and wide-brimmed hat, which, in your ignorance, you did not dream would be of all things useful on the range of the steep hills and rocky Petrea.

It rains to-day. Heigho! There is nothing in the morning papers which the enterprising newsmen at Mahopac is not on hand by mid-forenoon. But, fortunately, we can walk on the broad piazza, or bowl—if you take the hills—even if we can't play billiards—for these humanitarian devices for killing time have penetrated even to Mahopac! but, mind, only as a resort in a rainy day, or an expedient for absence.

But we must cut short our reminiscences of Mahopac, and dropping all reminiscences, let us say, what hundreds will support us in saying, that for a week or a season of relaxation spent in a beautiful and healthful portion of the country, not too far away from the city, with the most delightful boating and excellent accommodation, no place is more favorable than Gregory's Hotel at Lake Mahopac. And so say we all!

CHARGE OF THE FIRST IOWA REGIMENT AT Wilson's Creek.

We have taken occasion elsewhere to notice the gallantry of the 1st Regiment of Iowa Volunteers, at the battle of Wilson's Creek, near Springfield, Missouri. We now give a full and spirited engraving of this regiment, under the command of Colonel Lyon fell. Seeing a numerous body of rebel cavalry about to attack General Lyon rode up to the 1st Iowa, and said, "Ask boys, until they are close, then fire and then rush with the bayonet, for a leader," and we will follow him to victory!" On came the enemy, confident in his superior numbers.

time was in a line, "Don't lead you myself, my brave boys!" ejaculated Lyon, and threw himself in their head, shouting, "Make ready! Fire! Charge!" Our Artist, who was on the field, has quickly delineated the exciting scene. A moment afterwards the brave Lyon fell dead in the midst of his gallant soldiers, who pressed on wildly to avenge his death, and drove the rebels in disorder from the field.

ANCIENT, IN TRUE.—A correspondent of the Morning Herald writes: "I can give you a capital anecdote about Mr. Lincoln's election. The night previous to the meeting of the Convention at Chicago, which nominated him, I was seated in a circle of ladies in this city, when Mrs. Lincoln, of Boston, entered the room. She was immediately introduced, and her good man at breakfast. Accordingly, but firmly, informed him that politics were losing the ladies and bothering his brains and drinking about at the rumshops—that she did not like it. She had to it said they the children up, and 'Now, Abraham, let me tell you that to-day's Convention will be a close affair. If you come home before that hour, well and good; if not, I will not get up and let you in.' Two o'clock came that night, and, true to her word, Mrs. Lincoln was in bed when her children. About an hour later Mr. Lincoln knocked at the door. He knocked once, twice, and even a third time, before an upper window was raised, and the sighing of a female head looked out. 'Who is there?' 'Me.' 'You know what I told you. Abraham?' 'Yes, I know.' 'I have got something pitched to tell you.' 'Let me in.' 'I don't care about that. It is none politics to-night.' 'But it is very important.' 'Can't help that. Politics are stinks, and I have been nominated for this Presidency.' 'Oh, Abraham, this is awful. Now I know you have been drinking. I only suspected it before, and you must go and sleep where you got your liquor,' and down descended the window with a flash. True enough, the next day confirmed the news that the next anecdote-teller of the village had really been nominated to ride over millions."

THE PUBLIC HOUSE, having that Mace, who is it succeeded Soper as "Champion of England," is soon to be engaged, has offered to fight him for £1000 a side. He says: "In consequence of the sudden retirement of Heenan from the pugilistic arena, and the meeting of my fight with Soper, I would put myself in training to fight any man in England for £1000 a side, or £500 a side, at the option of the challenger. In the case I would relinquish to him, out of the sum stake, £2,000 for his expenses, and give him a bond to £2,000 more, guaranteeing against any private interference with the fight in any shape. If on the other hand, I am required to go to England, I only expect the same allowance and no guarantee."

A FAITHFUL DOG.—In the Passaic Journey they have published an account of a dog which followed his master's dead Rockaway. Before the train passed, he had run 17 miles and Passaic Bridge, 7 miles beyond.

SECTION OF FORT RUNYON, VA., GUARDING THE ROAD TO ALEXANDRIA, OCCUPIED BY THE TWENTY-FIRST REGIMENT N. Y. S. V.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GEN. M'CLELLAN'S COMMAND.

SCENE AT FORT RUNYON—BATTERY GUARDING THE ROAD TO ALEXANDRIA.

FORT RUNYON named after the commander of the New J regiments which were formerly stationed there, entirely common .s the road to Alexandrio. Our Artist hos sent ns n sketch of the battery erected on this important point. By the lost occounts it was occupied by the Twenty-first New York Volunteers. The spot is a most pictnresque one, commanding a splendid view all around, the background being the Potomoc and Washington.

FORT ALBANY, ON ARLINGTON HEIGHTS.

WE hove so often illnstrated and described Arlington Heights that we have now merely to say that one of the most imposing of its fortifications is Fort Albany, a sketch of which in its formation wa publish.

THE CLARENDON HOTEL, SARATOGA.

THIS splendidly furnished hotel was opened for the first time lost season, and has since received such distinguished patronage as to entitle it to be clossed omong the first houses in the conotry. Although not as large os some others (hoviog only accommodation for obout 600 goests), yet its arrangements are so perfectly systematized as to render it a model for neatness and comfort, and to make it one of the most desiroble places to spend a few days oway from the noisy din and bustle of city life.

The Clareodon is the best situated hotel in Saratoga—its position being clevated, with an open space in front. Its piazza is one of the finest we hove seen in America. On the grounds attached to it are a spring of mioeral wo'er, possessing good medicinal properties—batbs, o bowling-alley, billiard-room and shooting gallery.

As to the internal orrangements, they are under the immediate superintendence of the present proprietor, Mr. Robinson, on whom they reflect much credit. The dinners ore well got up, comprising all the delicacies of the season, and what is still more commendable, they are well served. The wines are of the usual choice brands with which we are familiar in New York, and moy be hod at moderate prices.

A band of good musicions is in attendance twice a day—in the afternoon and io the evening—which circumstance tends not only to enliven the place, but to give to it that air of enchantment for which it is distinguished.

AT o recent sitting of the Academy of Sciences at Poris, M. Leverrier, the celebrated astronomer, expressed himself as follows in reference to the late comet:

"We do not know this comet; it is the first time it visits us; and those who have endeavored to predict its course, determine its distance from the earth, and measure its tail, have either deceived themselves or the public. Three elements are necessary to calculate the orbit of a comet: first, the exact position of the star; then its velocity; and, lastly, the variation of velocity produced by the mass of the sun.

"I coused the comet to be observed on June 30, and then on the night of the 1st and the morning of the 2d instant, in order to determine the variation of the velocity. These three observations would have followed too closely upon each other for the calculation to be attempted, were it not that the comet moves very rapidly. On the 3d, at 10 A. M., M Levy brought me the result of his calculations, and we then obtained an insight into the orbit of the comet. Mr Hind has since sent me the orbit calculated by the English astronomers, which perfectly agrees, in all but two minutes, with our results. It is now positive that this is not Charles the Fifth's comet; and, moreover it resembles none of those already observed. This circumstance will contribute not a little to throw confusion upon the little we know of these erratic bodies. I cannot yet say whether this comet is periodical or not, its orbit up to this day has been too cursorily determined to enable us to pronounce it elliptical, parabolical, or even hyperbolical. At any rate appearances are against its return, for the orbit is nearly perpendicular to the plane of the ecliptic, while those of periodical comets usually form a very small angle with the plane. It is only now we can determine the distance of the comet from the earth, and the length of its tail. On the 30th of June the line joining the centre of the sun with that of the comet made an angle of four degrees with that joining the centres of the sun and earth, the length of which is known. The angle which this line formed with the visual ray, drawn from the eye of the observer to the centre of the comet, was twenty-four degrees. The triangle thus formed may, therefore, be calculated, and it gives us the distance of the comet from the earth, amounting to between six and seven millions of leagues (about 17,000,000 of English miles). The length of the tail might be similarly calculated. The comet is rapidly moving away from us, and it is, therefore, not surprising that its brilliancy has diminished. On the 10th it will be equally distant from the sun and earth; we shall soon lose sight of it, and astronomers only will be able to follow it for about a month longer. It presents a singular peculiarity. M Chacornac has studied the nucleus with one of M Foucault's telescopes: instead of its being hollow like the half of an egg shell, like most of the comets already observed, it presents the appearance of a sun composed of fireworks, the bent rays of which burn in the same sense. Moreover, the comet has not drawn nearer to the sun. These are all circumstances calculated to introduce great complications into the theory of comets."

THE following was the ideal of a perfect life, according to the judgment of a Frenchman, who had seen the different capitals of Europe: "I should like," he said, "to be an English peer till thirty-five, a French marshal till fifty, and then I would become a cardinal of Rome, and never die."

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF

WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Five days after, a hearse and a mourning coach containing four persons, and a single carriage following them, were seen to move slowly from a cottage in the Fulham road and take the road to Brighton. The next day a coffin was conveyed on board a Dieppe packet; five persons composed the train which followed it, and one of the five, as soon as the velvet pall was thrown over the coffin, seated himself at its head, and, with bent form and folded arms, remained during the passage immoveable as a statue.

"Dear me," said a lady to an honest sailor, who was adjusting a rope near, "how melancholy and unpleasant. Had I been aware that a coffin was on board I certainly should have waited for the next packet. Pray who is it?"

"A French lady, the Countess D'Almaine," replied the sailor, in a low voice.

"The Countess D'Almaine," said the lady; "and who is it sits so near the coffin?"

"Hush!" said the man. "Do not speak so loud; though, poor fellow, he is too grief-stricken to hear you. It is the count."

"The count!" responded the lady, in a suppressed tone. "And that military-looking man with one arm, who seems like a sentinel, without for an instant taking his eyes from the coffin, who is he?"

"That is the lady's father," said the man, brushing a bright drop from his cheek with his hard hand. "Poor man, she was his all, they say, his only child."

"Indeed," returned the inquirer; then, after a pause, in which her eyes wandered from one to the other, she added, "and the handsome youth sitting near the widower? From his pale cheek and anxious look, he must be a near relative."

"A cousin," said the man.

"And that female in deep mourning, whose face is covered with her crape veil and who rocks herself in her seat, she must be one of them," continued the lady.

"Yes, it is a companion or humble friend, I think," said the man; "at least that, I believe, is what Lord Livesey told the captain. That active looking man yonder, who has managed everything for them, like a true friend, he has been all to them in their trouble, they say," he added in a lower tone. "The count was an exile; he has not seen his native country for some years, poor fellow. His journey home is a sad one; they say his wife was more to him than the restoration of his estates."

"Have they no child or children?" asked the lady.

"One," was the reply; "but it was lost or stolen. It has not been heard of for five years. And the loss of that child," he added, "made their father a widower. The great have their troubles as well as the lowly. I don't know why they are envied," he added, musing as he walked away.

The lady sighed, drew her veil down, and though her eyes were not withdrawn from one or other of the party, she spoke not again during the short voyage.

As the procession moved slowly along the great avenue of the Chateau de Noi, the tenantry that had known and respected Lucille had stationed themselves on either side, each with something about him bearing the semblance of mourning. They were there, too, to hail with pride the return of a beloved master; but all was dead silence at the exile's approach. As the insignia of woe passed between them, every hat was reverently raised, every eye was fixed upon the hearse, every tongue was hushed. It was a cold gloomy greeting to the wanderer. On the entrance to the chateau stood the servants, and among them, as D'Almaine glanced towards them, he singled out the old housekeeper.

"You here, Madame Santarre!" he cried, with feeling. "Have they left you to me?"

"Yes," said the old woman, in a quivering voice. "He has left the old withered tree standing, but has cut down the beautiful blossom."

D'Almaine passed her quickly, and was entering the grand saloon when she added, "Not there, not there, monsieur. The best room is for her; let us give her all we can while she is with us."

"Right, right," said D'Almaine, in a scarcely audible tone. At that moment Emile, who had been trying to summon calmness to meet her brother, rushed into his arms.

"My brother, dearest Jules!" she cried, and would have added "Welcome," but she could not pronounce the word; she knew in his present feelings it would have been only grating.

"Emile," he said, returning her embrace, "this is kind, I did not expect to see you; but you were ever my own dear sister. Our mother, is she well?"

She shook her head as she replied, "She would have been here, for she is remorseful; yet she could not look upon you in your affliction, Jules."

Charles de Bleville stepped forward, they exchanged a friendly shake, while Emile, who had flown to Monsieur de Vernet, who had entered, was silently but unconstrainedly weeping on his shoulder.

In a few days Lucille was consigned to the family vault. When the father and husband returned from that mournful ceremony it was awful to look on the pale faces of both; the strong men were bowed down, they clasped each other's hands, but neither had a word of comfort for the other.

"Eugene," said D'Almaine, who was the first to speak, "have you given orders for our departure? To stay here another hour is impossible, but wherever I go all places will have the same gloom for me."

"Go with me to Germany," said De Vernet; "it is the spot most free from the scenes we have witnessed."

"Her birthplace," said D'Almaine, and he shook his head, then added, after a pause, "Father, I will go to Waldenberg. Its mistress, who has wept so many bereavements, may teach me a lesson of resignation. When will you be ready to depart?"

"As soon as the carriage is ready," he replied.

D'Almaine bowed and left the room; it was to visit the suite of rooms occupied by Lucille while she resided at the chateau; everything was as she had quitted the night she had assisted his escape from prison. The rooms had been long closed, the chateau uninhabited, till Madame Santarre, who at first with the rest of the servants had been banished from it, made petition to be allowed to return to the rooms she had occupied so many years in it. Her petition was granted and though fires were lighted in the apartments, and they were kept free from dust, she would not allow anything to be touched in them. Therefore on D'Almaine's entrance all looked as if Lucille had but just quitted them.

A shawl was lying on the bed, her bonnet on a chair, books scattered about, and her desk open, with a half-finished letter to himself, which she had sat down to write to him the day she had not visited him at Rouen. He glanced over the lines; they were simple and confiding, as her style ever was. He caught them up, and placed them with a burst of feeling in his bosom, then passed from the rooms to the nursery. Here he was forcibly reminded of his twofold loss. The large Leghorn hat of Birdie, filled with flowers, not as she had gathered them, fragrant and blooming, but scentless and withered as D'Almaine's hopes; a small shoe, a broken doll, a torn book, and several other articles appertaining to childhood were lying about in careless disorder. He took each article up separately, each had its own peculiar remembrance attached to it, and he lingered long amongst them, till thought became too bitter to bear.

"My wife, my child," he murmured, "if one were but left, happiness would not be quite departed."

As he crossed the hall, Lion, the large Newfoundland dog, came bounding towards him, and by a thousand demonstrations of affection showed that he recognised his old master.

A throb of pleasure beat through D'Almaine's heart; it was like the greeting of an old tried friend who had shared his misfortunes, and as he patted the animal, he exclaimed,

"Lion, you here, too; have you too found your way to the house of mourning?"

"I took possession of him when you went to England," said Eugene, "and left him under the care of Madame Santarre when I came to you with the King's pardon. I gave orders that he should be kept tied up while you were at the chateau, but I see he has broken his chain, he must have heard and recognised your voice."

"He shall go with us," said D'Almaine. "Monsieur de Vernet," he added, "Lion was their pet; you will not object to him going to Waldenberg?"

De Vernet shook his head as he led the way to the carriage.

As the carriage turned round the serpentine walk the three travellers looked on the noble structure they were quitting, and although all their sensations were different, one was prominent in their minds; that of De Vernet and D'Almaine was, that from henceforth it would be associated with too much gloom and regretful remembrance to be visited by either of them again, and both in moody silence seemed taking his last look at it.

CHAPTER XL.

Seven years have elapsed, with but little transpiring to interest D'Almaine, and Eugene has spent the greater part of that period in travelling over Europe in the vain search for the child and her new protectors, while Batiste and Madeline, in the New World, are prosecuting an equally unsuccessful search, and the hope of ever discovering her was all but extinct in the bosoms of all.

The Countess D'Almaine, a prey to remorse, and in a measure blaming herself as the cause of Lucille's early death, had buried her pride and greatness in a convent, passing her latter life in privacy and gloom.

The count was still a handsome man, and though he had reached his forty-third birthday, his hair and moustache were black and glossy as the plumage of the raven, his eye flashing, his deportment lofty, and his smile soft and winning as a woman's. He was sitting in his study with Eugene, who was considered the heir to the D'Almaine estates, for too many nets had been spread for D'Almaine without success to doubt that he was no marrying man, and single ladies looking out for rich husbands had sometimes calculated upon their success with the handsome Eugene D'Almaine.

D'Almaine was conning over a letter he had just received from Lord Livesey, asking him to meet him at Florence; it had come at a time when other subjects more agreeable interested him, and he was debating in his mind which to abandon—Lord Livesey's invitation or an excursion with one of the royal princes into the Low Countries. Eugene had observed him several minutes, when he at length broke the silence.

"Your letter, cousin, appears to cause uneasy deliberation," said Eugene. "Is it official?"

"No," returned D'Almaine, smiling. "Nothing of so much importance. I was merely asking myself whether I should meet Livesey in Italy or go with the duke to Flanders."

"And you have decided on the latter," said Eugene.

"No; I shall go to Italy," said the count: "I have business there, and shall leave you to manage with the duke in regard to my absence. Your presence will be better suited to the youthful prince than mine, and will prove perfectly satisfactory to you both."

"As you please," said Eugene, "but when do you think of returning?"

"When the Chambers meet," replied D'Almaine, "probably earlier, for I have seen every nook and corner of Florence, and unless Livesey has a liking for the place, and desires to keep me near him, I shall quit it in a day or two probably. I shall not stay long enough to write from thence."

"When do you leave Paris?" continued Eugene.

"I shall give orders to-night, to have all ready to start after breakfast," replied D'Almaine; "unless," he added, "you like to accompany me and require longer delay."

"I thought you had arranged for me to go to Flanders with the duke," said Eugene. "If you have, I should like the arrangement better, for, like yourself, I do not care about Italy."

"True," said D'Almaine, "I had forgotten my first plan. Go to Liege, and I'll be off to Florence, and on our return from our travels we shall both, I hope, have some adventures to record. Who knows but you may bring home a little fraulein from Belgium."

"Tush!" returned Eugene, shrugging his shoulders. "Independent of the antipathy I have to fat frauleins, who in the name of Heaven, cousin, would marry a poor fellow like myself?"

"Who would marry a poor fellow like yourself?" repeated D'Almaine, indignantly. "I should say the heir to the D'Almaine estates was not to be scorned."

Eugene shook his head. "Presumptive heir!" he replied; "but, cousin, you are still a young and handsome man, you may marry a second time."

"Never!" returned D'Almaine, impressively; "there exists not the woman worthy to fill the place of my ever lamented Lucille. You may marry in full confidence, Eugene, of being the next in succession."

The following morning the count departed for Italy, and had been in Florence about a week, when one day being at an exhibition, he sat near two ladies. One appeared in middle life, the other considerably younger—perhaps only in the bud of womanhood, for both were too closely veiled for him to see sufficient of their faces to judge of their ages; both were tall, elegant looking women, and the one apparently the youngest, from being slighter and more airy in her movements, was particularly graceful.

D'Almaine was much interested in both, and ever an admirer of female beauty, he kept his eyes continually on them, and another traveller like himself seemed equally struck with them, and regardless of the observation he excited, and the annoyance it gave the ladies, kept close to them, once or twice jostling against them and speaking in an undertone to both. At length, too greatly annoyed by his rudeness to remain in the room, they moved towards the door; but the man, indefatigable in his system of intrusion, still followed them closely, and as they turned a landing took the opportunity to withdraw the veil aside from the face of the younger. Both ladies were seriously alarmed at this insult, and clung close to each other, fearing he might attempt farther incivility.

D'Almaine, who had also followed the ladies, witnessed what in Italy is considered an outrage, and indignantly approaching, with one arm dexterously hurled the intruder down a low flight of stairs, and politely offered his protection to them to conduct them from the rooms. The man who was the cause of this introduction, seeing the elder lady take the count's arm in fright, concluded it was one who had a right to protect her, and fearing a further encounter, made his exit with all possible expedition.

After some slight hesitation, permission was given to D'Almaine to see the ladies home, and while walking with them through several streets, he endeavored to draw them into conversation, but both were equally unwilling, probably from their late alarm, to proceed further than offering their thanks for the service he had so opportunely rendered. Passing through the suburbs, they crossed a field, then came to a small neat dwelling enclosed in a garden, with a small portion of meadow land, on which grazed a jennet of great beauty. The ladies stopped before the white gate, and the elder one, handing a card to D'Almaine, on which was inscribed "Signor Strozzi," said, "Here is my brother's card, signor. I pray you to excuse me asking you to enter, as he is from home at present; in a few days we expect his return, when most assuredly he will be delighted to render you his thanks for the service you have done us."

D'Almaine gave his own card in return, and more disappointed than he chose to express, received their renewed thanks as they passed quickly through the gate. He watched them till they entered the house, hoping before he lost sight of them, that a kind breeze would blow aside the veil of the younger lady, for although she had been nearly silent, he had caught the sound of a very soft voice, which uncommonly interested him, and once through the veil he detected a pair of Italian eyes glancing furtively towards him.

The next day Lord Livesey proposed quitting Florence for Naples; and to his astonishment D'Almaine, who had before abused the town with great vehemence, declared his intention to remain in it another week; and as his lordship had an appointment at the last named place, D'Almaine was inclined to remain unobserved, it was settled that Livesey should return to Florence in a fortnight, and that they should then take their departure for France.

Three days elapsed, but not without D'Almaine having several times ridden past the abode where he had left the ladies; but the Venetian blinds were always so closely drawn that not a vestige of anything human was visible, when on the fourth day, among the cards left at his hotel, he perceived Signor Strozzi's. His heart bounded with unusual pleasure at the sight; had it not been too late in the day to make a call, he would certainly have returned the signor's immediately. As it was, he inquired from the master of the hotel about him, and learned that the signor was in the church, that his sister, a very amiable lady, and his niece, an orphan, who was very handsome—so report said—resided with him.

The following morning, earlier, perhaps, than etiquette warranted, found D'Almaine at the white gate where he parted from the objects that had been scarce absent from his thoughts since. As he alighted from his horse, he searched for his cardcase, but finding he had left it at his hotel, he merely gave his name to the servant, who disappeared, and quickly returning, ushered him into the house, and throwing open the door of a room on the ground floor, told him to enter.

CHAPTER XLI.

D'Almaine advanced midway into the apartment before he perceived its occupants were not aware of his presence; the domestic had forgotten his name, and had left him to introduce himself. He would have felt the awkwardness of his position, had not his senses been engrossed by the group which presented itself.

A man of about forty, of extremely prepossessing appearance, who by his dress seemed the village pastor, reclined in an easy chair, reading to a lady who might have been a few years younger, who, while listening to his subject, plied her needle most industriously. A short distance from them a girl, apparently seventeen, reclined in careless indolence on a sofa; she held a book, but, as it seemed, more with the intention of keeping in awe a small, beautiful Italian greyhound than to peruse its contents. She was dressed in a white gros de Naples dress trimmed with black velvet, which contrasted admirably with her smooth, white throat, round wrists and very lovely hands. Her eyes were large, dark and sparkling, and a wilderness of glossy black hair had escaped from its comb and wandered in rich, careless curls over her shoulders, while a very small foot peeped from beneath the folds of her dress and rested on a crimson velvet ottoman, on which slept a beautiful spaniel, which the greyhound, in sport or jealousy, was endeavoring to awaken by biting his ears and pulling his tail.

"Have done, Fido," cried the girl, touching the dog with her book. "I will not allow him to be disturbed. He is neither so young nor frolicsome as yourself. Let him sleep unmolested, I say."

The words were accompanied, as the animal persevered in his play, with a slight pat with the book, which was increased, as, turning from the sleeping animal to the jet curls wantoning over the sofa pillow, he made an attack upon them; and while she was rescuing the curls, the dog, in very wilfulness, seized the book, and carrying it to the centre of the room, commenced tearing it to pieces. With an exclamation the girl arose, the dog barked, and in an instant there was a general clamor.

Signor Strozzi, disturbed in his reading, ordered the ejectment of the animal, exclaiming, "How is this, Marie? If you cannot keep your pets in order, I beg for the future, while I am reading, that they may not form a part of our society."

At that moment the glance of the three was fixed on D'Almaine, who, although the most awkwardly situated, as a man of the world quickly recovered from his temporary confusion, and stepping forward, in a few words explained that he was there, as he supposed, through the servant having forgotten his name, and left him to introduce himself.

While Signor Strozzi and the lady were apologising and welcoming the count, Marie, in the utmost confusion, was collecting her dishevelled hair to the best of her ability beneath her comb, which she had but imperfectly managed, when the signor, who saw his visitor's eyes turned towards her, said, smilingly, "Marie, come forward. Signor D'Almaine will excuse you, as we did not expect the honor of his visit. Come, child, and give your deliverer the welcome he expects and merits. My niece, signor, Marie Strozzi."

Marie approached, her cheeks slightly flushed, and offering her hand frankly, reiterated her uncle's welcome. D'Almaine looked admiringly on the little hand, placed as confidingly in his own as if they had been accustomed to meet thus for years as old and tried friends. An indefinable sensation came over him, and for several moments a host of thoughts rushed through his brain; but he was recalled to himself by Marie withdrawing her hand.

"Excuse me," he said, in a broken voice, "but in gazing on your hand, signora, I had forgotten the present in the past. I never saw but one hand to compare to yours, and that was my deceased wife's."

Then, quickly changing the subject, the conversation became general with the three, Marie having taken the opportunity to withdraw to collect the whole of her straying tresses within the limits of the broad comb which usually confined them.

D'Almaine, a man of the world, was soon at home with his new friends. Several weeks passed, and Lord Livesey had returned to England, but the count still loitered at Florence; for, almost unknown to himself, the interesting Marie had woven a web around him, which he in vain tried to free himself from. There was a charm in her presence he was unwilling to allow even to himself, and when he forced himself to keep from her a day, he was restless and discontented until he again saw her. It was not love, no, D'Almaine was too well versed in the passion to be assured of it, yet he felt it would be impossible to quit Italy without her.

"If I could but persuade the signor," he reasoned, "to accompany me to France, I should be happy, and it would be to his interest. I have it in my power to make it so. I will try him; then I shall see Marie as now, daily.

With the promptitude of the idea D'Almaine put his hat on, and in less than ten minutes after was exerting his powers of persuasion to induce Signor Strozzi to visit France, and accept a piece of preferment, then vacant in the vicinity of the Chateau Noi. But the good curé was satisfied with his means, and could not be induced by fair promises to leave his native country.

"We have enough," he said, "and a trifle to spare for a portion for Marie when she marries. Why then should we quit our country to add to our store, and seek a grave in a land we have no right to?"

"A portion for Marie when she marries," rung in D'Almaine's ears all day, and at night he heard it in his dreams. "When she marries," he repeated, the first thing as he started from his bed; "and why by such means can I not secure her to myself? I will ——" He stopped, but quickly added, "Marry! outrage Lucille's memory by a second choice? Impossible! Besides, the feelings I entertain for Marie would not warrant me to offer her my hand. I do not love her with such a love; she is graceful, beautiful, loveable, and I would be always near her to advise and benefit her, but not as her husband."

He leant his head on the table in bitter reflection. "Yet, to allow another to carry her off, to bear her to his own home would be madness. But I must analyse my own feelings. That I love this beautiful girl is without a doubt, but with how different a love to what Lucile inspired me! I have no jealous misgivings when she converses with younger men than myself. I would rather watch her in the dance than be her partner, and yet the idea of losing her stirs up a host of unruly ideas within me. In short, I cannot willingly give her up. I cannot see her torn from me for ever, and yet I must, unless by marriage I secure her to myself."

Harassed by these conflicting feelings, at one time deciding to propose to Signor Strozzi for her, then to tear himself away for ever from Florence, which he heartily regretted ever entering, noon found him still in the same tumult of indecision, and his horse, which he had ordered to ride over to the parsonage, was announced.

"Take him to the stable again," he cried. "I shall not go out to-day."

It was the first he had passed alone since his arrival on the Arno, and it was long and irksome; he missed the sensible conversation of the pastor, the shrewd, pleasant remarks of his sister, but above all, the merry laugh and lively sallies of their niece.

"It must be so," he said, pacing rapidly the room; "Fate wills it. I must propose for her; that shall decide me. If she refuses me, I will quit Florence immediately; but should she accept——"

He stopped short, drew his desk towards him, and with a ghastly smile playing over his features, penned a few words, expressive of his wishes, to Signor Strozzi. After dispatching them, he retired to his chamber. Sleep was long courted without success, his thoughts were so mixed with the living and the dead; his conduct seemed to outrage the memory of Lucille; but then it was to obtain Marie—and scarcely knowing which way his hopes bounded, whether for a refusal or acceptance of his offer, he waited morning's approach with feelings very unlike those of a lover.

A London paper has the following sarcastic hit at the present mania the English have for foreigners playing Shakespeare's plays: "At the other theatres very little is doing. That remarkable, and by no means creditable, feature of the age, M. Fechter's 'Hamlet,' continues at the Princess's, and will continue there, we suppose, till M. Fechter learns better English, and then the attraction will, of necessity, have ceased." It is the same here, our fashionables run away with the foreign counts for the "dear broken English they speak!"

The Parisians seem to be unduly fond of the Devil. The title of a play preparing for one of the Paris theatres is "The Beauty of the Devil!"

The Pictorial History of the War," which is published by Frank Leslie, New York, is a work of great interest to all who would keep pace with the events of the day. A record of passing events, well executed, has the additional merit of being valuable in after years.—Boston Courier.

It will be a complete pictorial history of our present civil strife, and as to the ability with which it will be executed, it is enough to say that it is under the editorial charge of the late Hon. E. G. Squier, who is well known to the public as a writer and historian.—Boston Transcript.

Two numbers have already appeared, which, so far as the matter and engravings are concerned, have never been excelled by the American pictorial press.—Boston Traveller.

All who subscribe for this splendid historical work will possess a full and complete history of every transaction connected with the stirring scenes now being enacted.—Cincinnati, O. W.

It will give a complete picture of the war, with all the leading incidents, battles, sieges, marches, &c., with a stronger chronological order, and more permanent value and permanent history of the times. Accurate portraits of the leading officers, maps, battle scenes, &c., &c., in every number of this valuable importance and interest, and for preservation it will be invaluable.—Gem and Saturday Journal, Cincinnati, O.

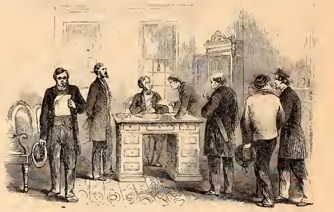
THE POPULAR LOAN—ENTRANCE TO THE ASSAY OFFICE, WALL STREET, NEW YORK.



MR. CISCO'S ROOM IN THE ASSAY OFFICE, WALL STREET, NEW YORK.

THE PEOPLE'S LOAN TO THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

A direct appeal from the Government to the people for money to carry the nation through a great crisis is a modern expedient; the earliest instance on a large scale being that of Louis Napoleon, a few years ago, when he found that the financiers wished to control his policy. When he announced his plan, the financial world smiled incredulously. The Emperor, however, understood his people best. The People's Loan was a wonderful success, and has done more to strengthen his Government than Magenta or Solferino. It has made every lender interested in the permanency of his dynasty. Mr. Chase, therefore, judged the American people correctly when he made the following announcement:

Office of the Assistant Treasurer U. S.,
New York, Aug. 26, 1861.

Institutions or individuals wishing to subscribe for the three years 7 3-10 per cent. United States Treasury Notes, can do so at this office, in the following way, and upon the following terms:

1. Payment must be made in gold at the time of subscribing. The amount to be paid is the principal of the notes desired, together with interest on the same at the rate of one cent per day on each $50, from the 19th of August (the time fixed for the date of all the notes, and when interest upon them commences to run), up to the time when the gold is paid. Where the subscriber resides out of the city, and has no agent in New York, he may make [illegible] by draft, payable here, in favor of John J. Cisco Assistant Treasurer [illegible] States, which draft must be for the principal and interest as above, from the said 19th August up to the day of its collection

2. Upon the receipt of payment, a certificate in duplicate will be given or sent, the original of which certificate must be forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, together with a letter specifying in what denominations the notes are desired. The denominations issued will be $50, $100, $500, $1,000 and $5 000. The notes will then be sent from the Department in Washington to any address requested as soon as they are ready, which will in no case be earlier than the 10th of September. The duplicate certificate is to be retained by the party subscribing, as a voucher.

3. The notes will be made to the order of the party named in the certificate of deposit. They will have semi annual coupons attached, payable when due at the Treasury at Washington, or at the office of one of the Assistant Treasurers of the United States. Such deposits are to be held subject to the general order of the state treasurer alone. The best coupon will be paid with the next.

4. Every notice may be redeemed at any time before maturity at the maturity thereof for an equivalent amount of Treasury Bills of per cent. bonds, having 20 years to run. The interest, and no more, when they may be presented in sums not less than $500.

JOHN J. CISCO,
Assistant Treasurer United States

Noble have all classes responded to this semi-patriotic and semi-financial appeal, and that success which will show that in all great emergencies a popular Government cannot be better than devised when with the confidence of the people it can command their purses. Public scenes at Mr. Cisco's office we publish to-day, was much impressed by the universal enthusiasm which there present. In one corner was an old lady, who dived into her bosom, and brought up an old stocking, the material gift of a long life of industry and economy; her sighs burst the stocking with a new emotion, she placed it in the hand of one of the clerks, and left the office with a smile on her face for her glittering treasure. A short time afterwards, an old Jerseyman was seen, basking over his wide, open, sunny countenance, as if satan Curtius when he sprang into the fabulous abyss.

The plan is very simple. The millionaire has merely to fill up a form of letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that he believes it to be his duty to assist in the defence of his country, and has to send to be address Treasury notes of whatever denomination he selects. This is placed in an official envelope, addressed to the Secretary, and the applicant himself sees to its being mailed. In the same manner the poor man has mailed what little sum he could afford to invest in the shape of the Treasury notes.

The Sub-Treasury is open every day, seven days the whole amount required is $50,000,000. Government will be taken, and there will be no necessity to deposit securities. Already we quote the Herald's directions:—"Let the Sub-Treasury department, over which Mr. Cisco presides, be located at the corner of Nassau and Wall streets. Within the cool, deep shades of the granite building reigns that perfect order and quiet which is necessary to the due and faithful transaction of the your business is with Mr. Cisco, you turn to your left, upon entering from Wall street, and find yourself in a long, cool, darkish, private office. Behind a low table sits Mr. Cisco, a pleasant, amiable looking man, upon whose capable shoulders devolves the Secretary must has been carried on for 15 years, without a single blunder or mistake, although they are by no means a sinecure. Let the office be as which carelessness and infallibility is rather a matter of instinct than of education. In spite of his multifarious and onerous duties, you will find the gentleman ready to give you any information you may desire in regard to the Sub-Treasury."

The State of Kanawha.

CONTRARY to the best judgment of most, but in consonance with the wishes of many, the Western Virginia Convention, by a vote of 59 to 38, passed an ordinance on the 20th of August, subject, however, to another ratification, establishing the 35th western counties of Virginia as an independent commonwealth, to be known as the State of Kanawha. These counties, all of which are situated on the Ohio River, comprise the entire valley of the main chain of the Alleghanies, embracing that anomalous district projecting up between the Ohio River and Pennsylvania, and known as the "Pan Handle," and extending downward to about latitude 37 deg. 20 min. Only unmistakable Union counties are embraced in the new State, although provision is made in the ordinance for admitting such other counties as may desire to be included. It should be premised that for various reasons, one of which was the exclusion of slaves under a certain age from taxation, five Western Virginia has several times attempted to sever her connection from Eastern or slaveholding Virginia. Once, if we mistake not, an act for separation came within one vote of being carried—John Letcher, the present rebel Governor of Virginia, supporting the measure.

The matters for separation, therefore, have not arisen altogether from present complications. They have nevertheless been patient and conclusive, viewed from the Western Virginia standpoint. In the first place, the counties comprising the new State constitute a rich lumber, mineral and grazing district, in parts well adapted for the cultivation of cereals. It now here produces the tropical or semi-tropical staples, for the successful cultivation of which the Eastern counties of Virginia and the counties composing the new State have a vast population, according to the census of 1860, of 281,788 souls, of which less than 5,000 are slaves. The country is therefore, practically, a free country, and as such opposed to the Secession heresy. The total population of Virginia, under the census referred to, was 1,593,199, including 490,865 slaves, leaving a white population of 1,102,274. So that in losing the population of the new State, amounting to 281,986, Virginia is shorn of about one-fourth of her white inhabitants. She will, however, have at least 20 other counties, embracing nearly the whole of Middle Virginia, or the Valley of the Shenandoah, to which she can look to for help for her glittering treasure. A short time afterwards, an old Jerseyman was seen, basking over his wide, open, sunny countenance, as if satan Curtius when he sprang into the fabulous abyss.

The plan is very simple. The millionaire has merely to fill up a form of letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that he believes it to be his duty to assist in the defence of his country, and has to send to be address Treasury notes of whatever denomination he selects. This is placed in an official envelope, addressed to the Secretary, and the applicant himself sees to its being mailed. Great National Work.

FRANK LESLIE'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR OF 1861.

Edited by Hon. E. G. SQUIER, late U.S. Minister to Central America.

No. 6 of this magnificent work is now issued, containing a Record of Events, Incidents of the War, Official Documents, &c., up to the 15th of July. It contains Portraits of Jefferson Davis and the actualities of the War, and an amount of reading matter equal to an ordinary duodecimo volume of 350 pages. Among other valuable matter, it contains a full account of General McClellan's brilliant campaign, in Western Virginia, with illustrations taken by a Special Artist on the spot.

N.B.—Since the Battle of Bull Run it is informed that the back Numbers have been reprinted, and full sets can now be supplied. Larger Editions are printed, so that all orders can be promptly supplied in future.

☞ The Maps and Engravings, many of them of monumental size, in the entire work profusely illustrate the text.

One Hundred and Seventy-four!

Price 25 cents per Number.

A Dollar sent to FRANK LESLIE, New York, will secure the first Four Numbers of this Work, and the First Eight Numbers, including full Northern and Southern accounts of the Battle of Bull Run, with Maps, Illustrations and the Official Reports complete, will be sent for Two Dollars.

The State of Kanawha.

CONTRARY to the best judgment of most, but in consonance with the wishes of many, the Western Virginia Convention, by a vote of 59 to 38, passed an ordinance on the 20th of August, subject, however, to another ratification, establishing the 35th western counties of Virginia as an independent commonwealth, to be known as the State of Kanawha. These counties, all of which are situated on the Ohio River, comprise the entire valley of the main chain of the Alleghanies, embracing that anomalous district projecting up between the Ohio River and Pennsylvania, and known as the "Pan Handle," and extending downward to about latitude 37 deg. 20 min. Only unmistakable Union counties are embraced in the new State, although provision is made in the ordinance for admitting such other counties as may desire to be included. It should be premised that for various reasons, one of which was the exclusion of slaves under a certain age from taxation, five Western Virginia has several times attempted to sever her connection from Eastern or slaveholding Virginia. Once, if we mistake not, an act for separation came within one vote of being carried—John Letcher, the present rebel Governor of Virginia, supporting the measure.

The matters for separation, therefore, have not arisen altogether from present complications. They have nevertheless been patient and conclusive, viewed from the Western Virginia standpoint. In the first place, the counties comprising the new State constitute a rich lumber, mineral and grazing district, in parts well adapted for the cultivation of cereals. It now here produces the tropical or semi-tropical staples, for the successful cultivation of which the Eastern counties of Virginia and the counties composing the new State have a vast population, according to the census of 1860, of 281,788 souls, of which less than 5,000 are slaves. The country is therefore, practically, a free country, and as such opposed to the Secession heresy. The total population of Virginia, under the census referred to, was 1,593,199, including 490,865 slaves, leaving a white population of 1,102,274. So that in losing the population of the new State, amounting to 281,986, Virginia is shorn of about one-fourth of her white inhabitants. She will, however, have at least 20 other counties, embracing nearly the whole of Middle Virginia, or the Valley of the Shenandoah, to which she can look to for help for her glittering treasure. A short time afterwards, an old Jerseyman was seen, basking over his wide, open, sunny countenance, as if satan Curtius when he sprang into the fabulous abyss.

The plan is very simple. The millionaire has merely to fill up a form of letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that he believes it to be his duty to assist in the defence of his country, and has to send to be address Treasury notes of whatever denomination he selects. This is placed in an official envelope, addressed to the Secretary, and the applicant himself sees to its being mailed. In the same manner the poor man has mailed what little sum he could afford to invest in the shape of the Treasury notes.

The Sub-Treasury is open every day, seven days the whole amount required is $50,000,000. Government will be taken, and there will be no necessity to deposit securities. Already we quote the Herald's directions:—"Let the Sub-Treasury department, over which Mr. Cisco presides, be located at the corner of Nassau and Wall streets. Within the cool, deep shades of the granite building reigns that perfect order and quiet which is necessary to the due and faithful transaction of the your business is with Mr. Cisco, you turn to your left, upon entering from Wall street, and find yourself in a long, cool, darkish, private office. Behind a low table sits Mr. Cisco, a pleasant, amiable looking man, upon whose capable shoulders devolves the Secretary must has been carried on for 15 years, without a single blunder or mistake, although they are by no means a sinecure. Let the office be as which carelessness and infallibility is rather a matter of instinct than of education. In spite of his multifarious and onerous duties, you will find the gentleman ready to give you any information you may desire in regard to the Sub-Treasury."

The Battles of Bull Run and Alma.

The English papers affect to treat the fight at Bull Run as an insignificant affair, in a military sense. Following the lead of Mr. Russell, who was present at the battle of the fight, and who knew knew next to nothing of its details, they affirm that there was really no fighting, no charges either of infantry or cavalry, no artillery practice worth the name, no exploits usually ascribed to a well-contested engagement. Yet the loss on the Federal side—and on the rebel side, also, was proportionately as great or greater—shows that it was a bloodier action than that of the Alma in the Crimea, where, according to their own account, the French and English fought with equal degrees of valor, and fought with each terrible energy, that they have hitherto failed to find words strong enough to adequately describe the conflict. There were "deposits of dead," "carpets of carnage," "streams dyed knee deep in each rank and file," "mangled bodies," "dreadful slaughter was fearful;" "devastating valleys from the Russian infantry, advancing through the ranks of the whole line of battle," and, and descended the regiments"—and yet the whole loss of the combined British and French army, in killed and wounded, in the "great battle of Alma," was only 3,243, and of this, while the loss of the Federal troops in the "insignificant skirmish" at Bull Run, was proportionately 1,987 out of 18,000. In one case the loss was six per cent., and in the other ten per cent. of the numbers engaged. The affair at Bull Run was, therefore, nearly twice as severe as the "bloody and terrific battle of the Alma."

"RIFLES!"—This word, which we confess is not eminently classical, is yet the one by which we can properly characterize the late order of the Secretary of War, issued, however, in prosaic form. A few days ago we called attention to the new rifle-cannon or bore the United States without a proportion—the object being to obtain a weapon of the rebels in the communications with Europe—our chartered Secretary, who ordained himself with the notion that breech and muzzle-loading guns were the best, and that rifles were a humbug, nonsense, public-men-under-study, everything lower between the United States and Heaven from the date of the Mexican war. We can almost see the expansive spy order only as a definite way of informing the rebels how they may keep up the communications with Europe—by sending in their rifles for inquiry. When Mr. Lincoln makes up his mind to dispense with Cameron and Welles, he had better do it in common decency, and include Mr. Seward among the objects.

REBEL LOSS BY BULL RUN.—We are gradually getting at the facts in relation to the rebel loss in the late overwhelming the retreat of the vanquished generals. The Augusta (Ga.) Sentinel gives an official report of the 13th, 4th, and 5th regiments of the Georgia brigade, the whole of which numbered up to 1859. As the Union army took but few prisoners, nearly all of these must have been killed. The 13th lost 14 out of 400; the 4th lost 27 out of 400; the 5th lost 22 out of 400. The southern papers have already mentioned 43 of their regiments, and as the majority of these fought, and as being ordered nearer or less into. Assuming each regiment to have had 700 men, instead of 400, the rebel loss would be 1,000 killed, 2,400 men, apart from the 5th regiment, &c., and Johnston's reserves, at least 30,000 more. The total Union force engaged was not more than 30,000, so that 30,000 of the rebels must nearly have been put than 50,000. At Wilmot's Creek they were 20,000 to 1,000, and 3,000 to that.

WHITE PLACES.—While the rebel sympathizers in Connecticut and elsewhere are raising white flags, the symbol of peace, which we hope to see in every town and village, the loyal men of Tennessee are indicted by it from their houses because they will not display the rebel flag, the emblem there of ruffianism and disgrace; 214 of them recently fled from East Tennessee in the night, traveling on foot through the mountains to Danville in Kentucky. Then they met there many were hunted out and with their scanty clothing in rags. The hospitable people of Danville, Ky., received them with open arms, and with one of their number, an old man, made a brief speech, and said that they had left their property, their homes, their country, their homes, their wives, and fled through the mountains to old Kentucky, to escape the Secession pistols, who were chasing them like wild beasts to the mountains of the Cumberland. They might have all remained at home, lived well and been remembered, by merely hoisting a "white flag." "But," said the old man, pointing to the flag that waved here by, "our dear years I have looked up to those Stars and Stripes," and, if the last man falls, I will look up to them as long as I can no longer." There is a moral in this movement for Northern traitors to profit by.

THE NEW LOAN.—The success which has attended the new loan is the most extraordinary in the annals of financial affairs. Already, even before the notice are ready, thirty-seven hundred applications have been received for it from the subscribers, amounting to a total gift and the old woman with her stocking of gold," the applicants are thronging to the office of the Sub-Treasury. The Attorney-General of the United States has decided that the new loan is free from taxation by State or local authority.

WILLIAM RUSSELL, LL.D., &c., &c.—This gentleman was the text of the many sermons to go to Bull Run, and among the first to leave. The letter of Mr. Gladstone, in which he complained him on the battle of Waterloo from Cockroaches, on the evening of the action, pronounces all the stories of the battle of Bull Run as exaggerated in the "Times," and he will be able to sell and sell, on absolutely untrue. He says:

"We have made the most diligent search into every enquiry, without avail, and without suspicion that the army was hoaxed and in fright. The detail was not known at any one time, but in the course of the day. Mr. Russell's letter to the army would fall back and encamp for the night, only to renew the battle the next day.

A correspondent of the Providence Journal, who was in the action, sustains all that is asserted by Mr. Russell. He completely upsets all that the Secretary of St. Russell has committed in printed on the "case of the flight" with his honor-bound duty as a newspaper correspondent.

"Mr. Russell, according to his own account, was in Washington at 11 p.m. Sunday night, and at that time was aware that the army was then engaged in the battle of Centreville, by his own reported own quarters, were fighting from daylight to dark, and that the battle was not considered a success. And yet Mr. Russell, at 11 o'clock at night, was in Washington, and had time to make the most minute observations upon the condition of the army, and to write a letter to the London Times, in which he says nothing—in this not see how he would have."

Nothing is more certain than that the whole story of Mr. Russell's experiences and sayings and doings, as he way back from Bull Run, as printed in the London Times, is a tissue of falsehood.

SUFFERING ENTOMOLOGY.—For months after certain of the Southern States were in open rebellion, the Government continued to afford seem mail facilities to the people of the "Confederate States." Finally, however, that wicked and treasonable privilege was withdrawn, and the mail was transported on the postal lines by Express and Transportation Companies, which carried on a lively trade to the exchange of letters North and South. The Postmaster-General has now put a stop to this. The game was that known as "Heads I win, tails you lose!" for the rebels supervised all letters coming North, while we allowed all those going South to pass unchallenged. Of course the few Secession papers North, which have not yet been "cleaned out," will deny this, and for their benefit we clip the following from the Mobile (Tenn.) Advertiser of the 12th:

"We learn that instructions have been received at the Express Agency here that a supervision of letters is deemed necessary. This is done in pursuance of an order from Major-General Polk, and Major Forsyth has accordingly appointed Mr. R. Miller supervisor of letters from this city. Parties wishing to send letters out of the Confederate States, will therefore have them endorsed by him before they can be sent forward. Of course letters presented to Dr. Miller must be unsealed, so that they can be examined and certified to understandingly."

The Seat of War.—The Cotton States, which precipitated the country into civil war, have adroitly transferred the battle-field from their own soil to that of Virginia and Missouri—States in which the Union sentiment is either strong or predominant. It should be the policy of the Government to "carry the war into Africa"—in other words, to visit its horrors on the heads of those who provoked it, in South Carolina, Georgia and Louisiana. A floating column of 10,000 men, with transports at their command, could make a descent on almost any point on the Southern coast they might select as most vulnerable, and by recalling the rebel forces for local defence, prevent the banking up of their regiments on the line of the Potomac and in Missouri.

A Change Required.—No single act in the power of the President to perform would go so far to inspire the country with confidence, fill up the ranks of the army, and strengthen our finances, as the prompt dismissal of Messrs. Cameron and Welles from the Departments of War and the Navy. They have been tried and found wanting, and in times like the present we must have men, in all responsible public positions, in whom the people have faith. Could the army of the Potomac have been reorganized and its morale restored by General McDowell? Probably not. A change became necessary, and McClellan, who enjoys public confidence, was called to the Capitol. We know the result. A corresponding one would follow the substitution of General Banks for Cameron as Secretary of War, and almost any live man of this generation for the magnificent venerable flowing beard that droops over the Navy Department, like moss from a decayed hemlock.

One of the worst signs about the South is the depravity and brutality of their women. We hear on all hands how they take advantage of their privilege and insult our prisoners. Surgeon Stewart, of the First Minnesota regiment, concludes a history of his sufferings in these words:

"I would here say, in the spirit of awarding sheer justice even to enemies and traitors, that the officers of the enemy who visited us at the church, all treated us well and considerately; and I may say the same of all their officials, the military, with whom we came in contact everywhere, saving and excepting the senior official before mentioned, who was superintending the collection of the wounded on the battle-field, and excepting also the lower state of their mob, and the women of all ranks."

As Dickens once said of a bad woman, "There is nothing human about her but her hoops."

The New York Times, of the 1st September, says:

"Lacking, as we do that system by which the Ministry of England is held to a direct and minute accountability, the only way in which we can know of governmental mismanagement is by the vague but unmistakable indications which grow out of its great excess."

There is a growing conviction in the public mind that every member of our Cabinet ought to be in Congress. Had this been the case the present gigantic conspiracy never could have been consummated, for not even the Virginia brass of a Floyd could have stood before the fire of questioning which would have greeted him every night in Congress. As the matter now stands, our corrupt ministers can retire for four years behind their official entrenchments, and in this rapid age four years are ample to ruin not only a world, but a solar system.

We have in another paragraph alluded to the wonderful imagination displayed in John Bull Russell's Bull Run romance. We trust we have done it with sufficient good temper to win his Celtic regard. As a set-off to our previous remarks, we beg to quote the following very remarkable paragraph in his still later letter of the 29th of July:

"There is scarcely a department, high or low, of the public service of the United States in which there is not 'treason'—I mean the aiding and abetting the enemy by information and advice. It is openly talked in society—its work is evident on all sides. I went into the private department of the Post Office the other day and found there a gentleman busily engaged in sorting letters at a desk. The last time I met him was at dinner with the Commissioners of the Confederate States at Washington, and I was rather surprised to see him now in the sanctum of the Post-office, within a few feet of Mr. Blair, of the sangre azul of Abolitionism. Said he, 'I am just looking over the letters here to pick out some for our Southern friends, and I forward them to their owners as I find them;' and if the excellent and acute gentleman did not also forward any little scraps of news he could collect, I am in error. Again, a series of maps prepared with great care by Gen. McDowell's staff are given out to be photographed; and are so scarce that superior officers cannot get them. Nevertheless, one is found in the tent of a Confederate officer, in the advance of Fairfax Court-House, which must have been sent to him as soon as it was ready."

Mr. Russell is now at Washington—he should be asked to point out this friend of the Confederates who forwards the mail to Southern traitors, who sits within a few feet of Mr. Montgomery Blair, and of whom Mr. Russell has so very peculiar an opinion. If Mr. Jeff Davis has the appointment of clerks in Mr. Blair's office, we suggest it is only fair that Mr. Cameron should appoint Jeff. Davis's generals.

DOMESTIC ITEMS.

The Committee raised by Congress to inquire into the extent of treason in the several departments of the Government have reported the number of disloyal employees as follows, nearly all of which have been removed: State Department, 3; Treasury Department, 67; War Department, 34; Navy Department, 13; Post-office Department, 22; Interior Department, 32; Attorney-General's Department, 10. Total, 188.

The following is a comparative statement of the exports, exclusive of specie, from the port of New York to foreign ports for the week and since January 1st.:

	1859	1860.	1861.
For the week	$1,248,531	$2 021,402	$2,275,158
Previously reported	41,650,344	56 572,056	81,716,273
Since January 1st	$42,898,875	$58,593,458	$83,991,431

The Boston Traveller has a letter from Salisbury, N. C., which states that four members to the United States Congress have been elected in that State. The writer says that the people of North Carolina are fast throwing off the Secession yoke, and that they will soon be sufficiently strong to announce without fear their determination to take a stand for the Stars and Stripes. There is a Union League throughout the State, which embraces many thousands of loyal men, and to them is attributed the reaction which is now taking place.

Brig. Gen. Yates, commanding the New York Depot of Volunteers, has issued the following order. It will be seen from it that the day of tailors, engravers and mechanics assuming command, and becoming officers, has passed:

GENERAL ORDER—NO. 3.

State of New York, Depot of Volunteers,
New York, August 28, 1861.

Persons designated for company officers will be required to present themselves for examination within ten days from the time they are so designated in all cases where they have not been previously examined. If they do not so present themselves a new election will be made. The examiners will be at the Depot daily at ten o'clock a.m. By order of CHAS. YATES,
Brigadier-General Commanding S. Department.
Thos. Allcock, Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

The recent attempt to get up a Peace Meeting in New Jersey, on the 29th of August, was an amusing failure. Mr. English, whose patriotism it seems has evaporated in Indian and Revolutionary ballads, had to wrap himself up in the American flag and entrench himself in a cellar; at all events the enemy's cannon were spiked, and Mr. Busteed ("Richard's himself again!") made a strong Union speech—so much for Peace and Secession in the Jerseys.

It appears that Col. Tyler's Seventh regiment of Ohio had two affairs with rebels at Cross Lane. The first was on the 21st ult., a skirmish in which only 14 men were engaged. The second was on the 26th, when 15 were killed and 40 wounded. On the first affair the Cleveland Plaindealer says:

"Intelligence has been received of a disastrous skirmish in which 14 men from Company K, National Guard), 7th regiment, under Captain Schutte, were engaged on the 21st inst., near Cross Lane, Virginia. They were surprised by the Richmond Blues, who killed privates John Rolfe and John Shoesaler, wounded and took prisoners the Captain himself, Sergeant Bolm, and privates Henry Taubel, George Weissenbeck and F. Bruckmeln. Corporal Greble, George Drazol, Lewis Demil and Andrew Malcher were also wounded, but not severely, and made their escape. Capt. Schutte is said to be mortally wounded."

The "happy family" in Fort Lafayette is becoming quite large—every day we see

One more Secessionist
Caught in the net,
And by talking rash treason
Gone to Fort Lafayette—
Lock them up tenderly,
Watch them with care—
From Patrick, the banker,
To Berrett, the Mayor.

The Fifty-fifth Regiment N. Y. S. M., Colonel R. de Trobriand, consisting of 650 men, took leave of their encampment at New Dorp on the 31st ult., and embarked shortly after three P. M., direct for Amboy. They go to Washington, where their ranks will be recruited from this city.

Another gentleman has taken up his residence in Fort Lafayette—Lieutenant W. H. Ward, formerly of the frigate Macedonian, who several weeks ago resigned his position. On his arrival at this port, on board the storeship Relief, he was taken into custody by order of the War Department.

It is semi-officially given out that the Administration will not close the rebel ports, as authorized by Congress, but will rely entirely upon the blockade, which will be made sufficiently efficient to silence all scruples on the part of foreign powers.

Major-General Hunter, U. S. A., left this city on the 2d Sept. to assume command of the Illinois forces. He is accompanied by his nephew, Lieutenant Samuel W. Stockton, of the 2d Cavalry, and other members of his staff. General Hunter has so far recovered from his wounds that he is fully able to take the field, and, with the overwhelming forces placed under his command, we may expect again to "hear from Hunter's column on the right" before many weeks.

Seven gunboats of the Western rivers have already been commenced, four at Carondelet, near St. Louis, and three at Mound City, on the Ohio, near Cairo. The designs are furnished by Mr. Pook, naval constructor, the boats will be ball proof. They are intended to be ready for delivery at Cairo on the 5th of October. The dimensions will be as follows: Length, 175 feet; breadth of beam, 51½ feet; depth of hold, six feet. Each boat will mount sixteen heavy guns, carry a suitable number of men to work them, and draw not more than six feet of water. The hull, all the upper portion of the boat enclosing the machinery, will be plated with iron two and a half inches in thickness. The cost of each boat when completed will be $89,000.

SOUTHERN ITEMS.

The Governor of Tennessee, Isham G. Harris, has issued an order to the clerks of the County Courts of that State, instructing them to require the constables under them to make "diligent inquiry at each house in his district for all muskets, bayonets, rifles, swords, &c.," and forward them to the military authorities at Knoxville, Nashville and Memphis. A reward of one dollar is to be paid for each weapon thus collected, whence it is to be inferred that weapons of war are not over-abundant in that part of Secessia over which Harris is Governor.

The French part of the New Orleans Bee opposes the purchasing of the cotton crop by Confederate shinplasters, and shows conclusively that the scheme will prove a failure.

The surrender of Fort Fillmore, in Arizona, to the Texan Secessionists, according to the Mesilla Times, proves to have been a most disgraceful and cowardly, if not criminally dishonest proceeding. It is stated that eleven companies of United States troops, mounted and foot, mustering 700 effective men, surrendered to 280 Confederates four pieces of cannon, army equipments, 200 cavalry horses, mules and wagons, and 270 head of beef cattle.

From Missouri we learn that a large body of rebels, estimated variously from 2,500 to 3,000, under the notorious Martin Green, have taken possession of Palmyra. A train of cars, with arms for the Union troops, was fired into, near Palmyra, and forced to return, though no damage was done.

The latest news from New Mexico is per Santa Fe Express, bringing $20,000 in gold dust. The 750 United States troops that surrendered to the Texans have been released on parole, the Texans retaining the horses of the cavalry and the arms of the infantry. Col. Canby had arrested Gen. Wm. Pelham and Col. Clemens at Santa Fe, they being suspected of furnishing information to the Texan troops below El Paso. Col. Clemens took the oath of allegiance and was discharged, but Gen. Pelham refused. Col. Canby had suspended the writ of habeas corpus in the Territory, and abandoned and burnt Fort Stanton.

By the arrival of the mail steamer Matanzas we have news from Matanzas. The British schooner Aighburth had run the blockade off Newbern, arrived on the 12th, and sailed for Charleston on the 25th. The sloop Noank, with the Secession flag flying, is also reported arrived, having run the Charleston blockade with the Secession flag flying.

News from Fort Pickens has been received by the storeship Release, Commander Fraile, which left Rosas Island on the 2d inst. She has experienced very heavy weather. She left the Colorado and Niagara at Pickens, and the bark W. H. Wall and schooner Joseph M. Lane. At Key West she left the Macedonian, Preble and Crusader. The Release brings as passengers, First-Lieut. Wm. M. Graham, U. S. A., from Fort Jefferson, and Mr. W. H. Ward.

The Savannah Republican of the 19th ult. says: "Within a week from to-day no Federal fleet will be able to enter a harbor or inlet, or effect a landing of troops on the coast of Georgia. Month after month elapsed and the State, with all the boasting of its chief executive officer, and with over a million in his hands for the purpose, did absolutely nothing for our protection. The Confederate authorities, to whom the matter has been turned over, have recently been industriously at work, and the fortifications all along the coast are nearly complete."

The Tallahassee Floridian says: "On Wednesday the U. S. steamer Mohawk brought the sloop Sloat, lately captured by her, up to the outer buoy below St. Marks, where the crew of the steamer scuttled the sloop and sunk her across the channel, first having cut her deck to pieces with axes. The steamer then went out again to her old anchoring place. A boat from Fort Williams went to the sloop and succeeded in getting off her rigging and some other articles. The place where the sloop was sunk is four miles and a half from Fort Williams, out of reach of the guns." The channel at the mouth of the St. Marks is very narrow, so that the sinking of a hull in it will effectually obstruct the passage of vessels into that port.

A correspondent of the Boston Traveller, from Salisbury, N. C., under date of August 8, says: "Your readers will probably have heard, before this reaches you, of the successful movement by which several Union Congressmen have been elected from North Carolina. Four members are known to be elected, and returns are looked for showing the election of others. The voting was done upon the regular day prescribed by statute—the first Thursday in August—and was conducted in due form and manner. Prudence, of course, suggests the non-publication of names at present; for, although safe enough among their friends at home, the gentlemen might be subjected to annoyance or arrest in passing through Tennessee or Virginia to Washington."

The official vote on the question of ratifying the new Constitution of Georgia foots up as follows: For ratification, 11,497; against ratification, 10,637; majority, 860. From nine counties there are no returns, and in others only one or two precincts voted.

There is a report that the Southern chivalry, with its usual magnanimity, has succeeded in terrifying Parson Brownlow into becoming a rebel. The first threat was to hang him. This he laughed to scorn; but the villains then swore they would murder his daughter; this reached his heart, and the bloodthirsty fiends gained their unwilling victim. History has no parallel to the crimes which have engendered and sustained this infamous rebellion.

Mr. Edmondson, of Springfield, Mo., had his horse taken from him by the rebels, and its value nominally handed to him in Confederate scrip. Upon his application to General Price, the horse was returned, and he handed back the scrip. "Never mind," said the officer, "it isn't worth a damn, anyhow."

Secession letters say that Governor Harris, of Tennessee, has called for 30,000 more men, and they are rapidly coming in. The design is to subjugate Eastern Tennessee and drive the National troops out of Western Virginia.

WAR ITEMS.

The assurance from Washington now is that the Government has determined to organize the Union men of Kentucky, and put that State on a war footing. General (late Colonel) Robert Anderson has started west, to assume command of the military department composed of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. He is directed to establish camps of instruction at Lexington, Frankfort, Louisville and at other points.

Hon. Daniel S. Dickinson, of New York, well known as the "Democratic War Horse" of this State, recently made a powerful speech on the war, its causes and consequences, in which occurs the following paragraphs bearing on the so-called "Peace movements" of the rebel sympathisers: "I cannot afford to turn away from my duty because a political opponent is acting with me, nor to stay back from a duty because a political friend deserts me. No; I must go on and discharge a great duty. I hold it to be the first duty of every citizen, of every party, to aid in restoring—if restored it can be—this great and good Government. Let every American citizen, instead of crying Peace, Peace, when there is no peace, rally upon the ramparts until Secession is silenced—until the roar of artillery has ceased. Then we shall have peace—enduring, perpetual peace; and as monsters are seldom born of the same generation, we shall have no more of this Secession in the present century or the next. This Government is the Government of the American people. It is ours to use, ours to enjoy, but it is not ours to subvert."

Hon. A. W. Bradford, recently nominated by the Union men of Maryland for Governor, has accepted the nomination in a letter from which the following is an extract: "Feeling, as I have ever done, the clearest conviction that all the interests of Maryland find their surest guarantee under the Constitution of the United States, the fearful circumstances that now surround us only enforce that conviction, and must demonstrate to all that not merely these ordinary interests, but the very salvation of our State and her immunity from the devastations of civil war upon her own soil, are all at this moment intimately identified with the maintenance of that Constitution, the support of the Government now engaged in defending it, and the adherence under all circumstances to that Union of the States which it was its chief purpose to perpetuate."

By an arrival from Antigua, in the British West Indies, we learn that quite a demonstration took place there recently, at the hoisting of the rebel flag from the building of the consignees of a Southern vessel. The American captains in port insisted upon its being hauled down, and the people responded by tearing it into pieces.

Quite a serious fight took place on the night of the 19th of August between a party of Union forces, who left Bird's Point, Missouri, on the evening previous, and attacked a body of rebels 600 strong, who had concentrated at Charleston, on the Cairo and Fulton Railway, 20 miles to the westward of Bird's Point. The Unionists numbered 300 men, and the rebels were speedily dispersed, with a loss of 15 killed, 85 wounded and 40 prisoners. The Federal loss was one killed and nine wounded.

The railway train carrying U. S. troops on the Hannibal and St. Joseph's Railway, Missouri, having been fired upon near Palmyra, General Pope ordered General Hurlburt to occupy the county with a military force, quartering the troops on the inhabitants. He gave the inhabitants six days to find and bring in the offending parties, and if they were not produced a contribution was to be levied on horses, mules, provisions, provender, &c., to the amount of $10,000 on the residents of the county, and $5,000 on the inhabitants of Palmyra. Before the six days expired, nearly half the people of the county were scouring the woods for the offenders.

The secrecy and quietness with which all the movements of our armies are now made are in the highest degree gratifying. It is clear that we have learned something by experience. We know that a pretty large number of troops have gone to Washington or to General Banks's division, but no parade is made about it in the papers, and probably no one even of our omniscient correspondents can tell how many regiments have already responded to the call issued by the Secretary of War.

Massachusetts has maintained her reputation for patriotic promptness. Within a week after Mr. Cameron's call appeared, asking for more men, six regiments, nearly, if not quite, all of them unprepared to march, were either on the line of the Potomac or are on their way thither.

The Oswego Gazette, a Democratic paper, is "opposed to the war," and says that it "would therefore crush by the whole power of the nation, its authors, who commenced it by robbery and treason, and by cannonading Fort Sumter." It is "in favor of peace," and to that end would put down rebellion with the strong arm of the law. It is "opposed to taxation," and therefore would make the war as short as possible by bringing the whole force of the Government to bear upon it.

The French Press is very much divided in its appreciation of the battle of Bull Run. The Patrie says: "Though the triumphs of the Confederates confirms us in the opinion we professed from the start upon the American affairs, it is difficult to find in it the decisive importance usually attending, in Europe, a great victory. The military results of the day do not seem to us calculated to exercise a decided influence upon the coming events. It is clear that the enthusiasm and anger of the North will be enhanced, and that brilliant victories will avenge this defeat."

Wiley Edward, John C. Gray and William T. Andrews, of Boston, have been in Washington, endeavoring to persuade the President that he ought to change his constitutional advisers. It is said these gentlemen represent the sentiments of the prominent monetary interests in Boston, who demand that the heads of the War and Navy Departments must come off before they will risk their capital further.

Judge Mason, the Democratic nominee for Governor of Iowa, accepts the nomination, in a letter from which we extract the following paragraphs: "In all its legal requirements, the Government must be obeyed and sustained, whatever may be the consequences. No citizen can rightfully disregard the authority of the National Government, when acting within the constitutional limits, merely because it was counter to his own notions of any particular subject. We must not, therefore, withhold our services, our property, or even our lives, when called for by the proper authorities to aid in carrying on any war in which the country may be engaged."

A man named Walter W. Kelley was recently arrested in Harrisburg, Pa., on his way to Europe, suspected of going over to make purchases for the rebels. His baggage was searched, but nothing was found to implicate him. He was finally ordered to strip, when a number of false pockets were detected in his under shirt, concealing drafts on New York for upwards of $100,000. The letters containing the drafts were sewed up in the pockets, and the whole had been ironed out, to give the garment a close fit, and prevent the notes from obtruding. A number of treasonable letters were also found.

Messrs. Ross & Tousey, the well known newsdealers of this city, have published a card, stating that they will not circulate any of the newspapers "presented by the Grand Jury as disloyal to the Union."

The 1st Regiment U. S. Chasseurs, Colonel John Cochrane, Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Shaler, left New York for Washington on the 27th.

General McClellan has reviewed, in detail, every brigade of troops now at the capital, thus publishing to the men, in the best and clearest way, that in taking command of the army of the Potomac he intends giving it the closest personal attention. The reviews have shown that the orders issued a month ago for the thorough drill and exercise of the troops have had valuable results. The men and officers are now effective soldiers, the different regiments are finely disciplined, and the condition of the entire army is far better than before the battle of Bull Run.

The mutineers who were lately started from Washington en route to the Dry Tortugas are announced to have reached Fortress Monroe, and have temporarily been sent to the Rip-Raps, until an opportunity offers to forward them to their destination.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the North American we have European intelligence to the 3rd August. The absorbing topic in Europe was the American crisis. Public opinion in England was more and more settling down into a steady adherence to the Northern cause. The British Government, backed by that sombre squeaker, Punch, and the London Times, arcades ambo—seems willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike. These pretend to be indignant at the Canada Annexation cry, but they very well know that was merely the suggestion of a newspaper and not the voice of the people. Had it been so, we should not have waited for our moment of weakness to utter the threat. Despite the latent wish of the British aristocracy to cripple our power by dividing us into two separate Confederations, it yet revolts at the insane complacency with which the South insists that the necessities of the Manchester mills will compel England to recognize a slave power and go to war with a free one. The South overrates its importance.

The Pacha of Egypt offers every facility to the British for the cultivation of cotton, and the most herculean efforts are being made to encourage its growth in every available spot. The Nicaraguan Consul has been instructed by his Government to offer land to all foreigners who will settle in Nicaragua for the purpose of planting cotton. The best judges are of opinion that in five years Europe will be perfectly independent of the Southern States for either cotton or tobacco. This would indeed punish the conspirators, and hoist the engineer on his own petard. The rest of the news is quite uninteresting to us. We may mention, as a promising sign, that money is so plentiful in England, that the Bank has reduced the rate of discount to 4½ per cent. This, of course, will make our loan all the more attractive here.

Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Florence, the "Irish Boy" and "Yankee Girl," left on the 28th in the steamship Persia, on a protracted foreign tour. They will visit, during their absence, Great Britain, Ireland and Australia, returning by way of California.

In the death of Catherine Hayes, the musical world will find no ordinary loss. She was a native of Ireland, born at Limerick, in 1820, and died near London on the 12th inst., in the 42d year of her age, after a brief illness, caused by the breaking of a blood-vessel. Her musical career extended over 20 years: in opera she first appeared in Marseilles in 1845; in 1849 she visited London, with a first-class continental reputation, and at once acquired a high position. Her visit to this country, in 1851, is well remembered; here her success was only second to that of Jenny Lind. She then visited California, the Sandwich Islands and India, and returned to England in 1855. In 1857 she married Mr. Bushnell, her professional agent in this country.

A correspondent at the headquarters of the 5th Pennsylvania regiment writes that one of their vivandières will be Miss Eliza Wilson, daughter of Col. Wilson, of Menomonie, Dunn county, Wis., a wealthy lumberman, and former State Senator. "Eliza," he observes, "is decidedly smart and intelligent, of medium size, amiable, 20 and pretty. She dresses in clothes of such pattern as the military (not millinery) board have ordered for nurses in the army, which is the Turkish costume, as near as I can judge—the same which sensible ladies favored a few years since as a national style. The color is bright brown, no crinoline; dress reaches half way between the knee and ankle; upper sleeve loose, gathered at the wrist; pantalettes same color, wide, but gathered tight around the ankle; black hat, with plumes or feathers of same color, feet dressed in morocco boots."

One of the most terrible effects of war is the misery and desolation it carries into our homes. The murderous madness of the battle is sufficiently dreadful, but the agony is short, nor the nature of the strife carries off half its horror. Wellington said that "the man who could ride over the field of a battle his sensibilities blunted, and feel it another, was a fiend!" But painful as such a scene must be, we do not think it prevents the wretchedness of war. The reaction which war—and especially civil war—carries into the household is constantly more appalling than the shock and pain of the battle or a Sebastopol. The broken-up families, the heart-rendings, the crime and desolation it carries into the quiet homesteads of the land are its more fearful penalties. Judged by this rule, the enormous wickedness of the Southern rebellion rises above any crime in all the revolting proportions it will bear in history, when the names of Nero, Borgia, Caligula, Louis XI. of France, and Napoleon will not share with John Brainerd, Benedict Arnold, Herod and Nero, the infamy of their crimes.

We have in our personal paper gone into the details of this reflective mind, in far more eloquent than a sermon. It brings the miseries of war home to every one of the thousand contributors of relief to the destitute families of the gallant volunteers who are now fighting for our national existence. Women who never yet knew what it is to receive favor are compelled by tarrying children to turn supplicants to the charitable—and we thank God that for the misfortune of the public to the sufferings of the wives and children of the soldiers uncommon generosity has been exhibited than that due to the traitors themselves. In bringing this suggestive scene before our readers we have but the desire that it may quicken the benevolent impulses of the public, and remind it of the duty it owes to those who are making their lives free for the protection of their homes. The least they can do is to alleviate the privations of the bereaved families, and comfort the hearts of those who feel that they are not shedding their blood for so ungrateful country.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON

CHAPTER XII.—GRAVE THINGS.

The title of this chapter is no attempt at a pun. By "Grave Things" I mean, not tidings from the grave, but grave things from the land of the living. I left Mrs. Brassens' house in a state of mind to be interesting in the last chapter. Pale, however, determined to be brave, I walked home, and with the help of my pillow, cried myself, dear reader, out of misery.

Anxious and long was our consultation relative to the return of the agreement from Messrs. Wilkins and Wright. Mr. Brassens and Tinkle, the angry demon seemed to have passed his departure from the office, quiet reigned once more in the bosom of the Brassens' household. Memories, if quite satisfied with the result, and, when the time arrives, will have a very pleasant one to look back upon.

"I only him!" cried Brassens, in English. "I'sh upon him and him!"

"You bet," said dear Mrs. Tinks, triumphantly. "Brassens's speaking this time in the right way, and I'm sure you'll be glad to hear that he rules his native tongue almost as well as his own."

But you may recognise a little of the latter in the former.

Brassens came towards me, holding out both hands, and his eyes were glistening.

"My boy, my boy," he cried, "you have overcome the vile in the stern hands. Not for long shall you thus be fettered about, but for love of me, and for love of your mother, you must bear them to-day. But we wish to visit them with a deeper punishment by bringing them to bear."

"It is so," said Mrs. Tinkle, calmly. "We must wait."

"We must wait and bear," echoed Mrs. Brassens, "but the time draws nigh when it is our interest to spring. In the meantime, we must deliberate what is to be done."

"Suppose," I said "suppose——"

"Well, suppose," echoed Mrs. Tinks, with a smile of and encouragement.

"Suppose I write to return to Mr. Augustus."

Brassens shook his head and whistled; Mrs. Tinks shook her head and sighed.

"Mr. Augustus is no longer at the spot where you left him; and even if we write to him, your proposal will be considered a joke."

"Then what can be done?" I cried, aghast. "I see no other course."

"I will tell you," urged Brassens, brilliantly. "You shall become a youthful fascinator."

"A what?" cried Mrs. Tinks and I in a breath.

"You have talent, and will soon multiply it tenfold by impudence. Go upon the stage."

"Absurd," said Mrs. Tinks.

"Not so. If a man wishes to escape from his creditors, his best plan is to become a provincial actor. In the same manner, a prosecution is thus avoided by selling plays and writing for the stage. His enemies, dear woman, will never dream of going there to seek him. His friends will always be sure to find him out. Let Mr. Lee kiss go upon the provincial stage, under an assumed name—say that of Wilson."

"Better still," observed Mrs. Tinks, "that he should enter a provincial theatre, in some other capacity than that of an actor or actress. He is clever and tolerably educated, and could be useful in a thousand ways."

"But how?" interposed I, not clearly perceiving the plan of procedure.

"There, indeed, I am at a loss," returned Brassens. "I must refer you to the lady, experienced in matters of this kind. Let me, of third party, of whom I have heard favorable reports, but whom I personally know to me, do this."

"As if" added he in a tone of comparative conviction.

"Lord, I could tell you many experiences," said Mrs. Tinks, thoughtfully; "but to be logical, and not to be confused, this tongue is too talkative, and he is too impatient."

"Circumstances may lead to a hopeless case," said Brassens, pardonable little fib (your judgment will suggest what fib), and no place is out of hearing to do good things."

"It might be done," murmured Mrs. Tinks. "We will think it over. Tonight, dear Brassens, Henry must go home to rest. In certain knowledge, Tinks cannot communicate with that villain to-night; for there is no chance for Gilbert till the day to-morrow to-day. He has not courage enough to return here alone. To-morrow evening, at the latest, he may return. Then we can talk over matters between us."

"Sensible once," suggested Brassens. "No time is to be lost."

"I will go now."

"Good! We will wait patiently, Henry and I, until you return."

"Stay; I have something more to say," she observed. "I have a question to ask. Master Henry, you are being babbled about in a strange world; you are fighting in a great storm. Now tell me, on your soul, as to your own benefit what you go never to suffer for your own benefit, or great error, or would you rather live an easier life, with those whom it will be to your duty to toil to atone most for also constant?"

"Of my own will," I answered; "I place myself entirely in your hands."

"You are conscious that we are friends to you and yours, and that it is your interest to wait?"

"I am."

"You consider present poverty immeasurably better than comforts at certain heels?"

"Immeasurably better!"

"Enough. You have a true conscience, and are wise. I will go home and see Lovell."

If the dear reader imagines for one moment that my Golden Skeleton had left me, he or she is grievously mistaken. I had found it with Grasmere in the room ry. I stood it with Mrs. Martha Tinkle in the room as. I felt the tendrils of ivies that deprived of the opiate comforts riches may procure. The cons and gruesome of the Skeleton of grave and solemn things, and of the future that I felt thoughtful.

"It is not good," said Brassens, suddenly, "that Charles may be in London."

Mrs. Brassens seemed rather alarmed at this suggestion. After reflection, she answered:

"It is not good, and not probable. Still the suggestion must not be forgotten."

"Among women, all things considered, it is unsafe to allow Mr. Brassens' proposals here for another moment. He must pass the night with us, Mrs. Tinks."

"You are wise, Brassens," said Mrs. Tinks, rising. "Let Henry go with you, after my return from Lovell's. Is that agreed?"

It is agreed."

Mrs. Tinks passed out of the house, leaving an aloe in the room that I have forgotten to mention, waving his hard in an almost commonplace remarks, and then subsided into silence. He was a man of sixty, of slender proportions, but evidently exhibited knowledge of the English tongue, his quiet, thoughtful determination, and his whole appearance, that he was a man to be trusted. He was well acquainted with my history, and with that of my relations. I had known him for many years, and liked him. He appeared to do duty Tinks. Who was he? What was he? There were different to the eyes of every one I knew in history. He scarcely remembered me; but I kept him and tended him, carefully hiding him from the observation of my friends. Brassens, Mrs. Tinks, and myself, not yet come when he should be brought forward, in his service, to receive the benefit of his wonderful powers. I was quiet and and stayed myself to make him comfortable. Once settled down and with his pipe, he looked at me with a curious, busy eye—evidently in the fatigue of a memory of many years. Presently, Day story, night after night, he worked patiently in his own peculiar way, which had been his way for many years before, in the school formed him exact.

"I should could be more favorable on a early rule, but for one shortcoming—he suspected everybody. To his plain, he suspected everybody in the world, and was trying to account for it. To this suspicion he attached Master Henry and (once) myself. His plan was to watch us, and to watch us in a manner peculiar to his state of mind in criticism to all the past—description in all the present; but now and then in the remembers. It is true, he was apart, with his face in his hands, sobbing like a little child. This was the remembrance of his wife, and of the days when she and he dines like good."

I was pleased with surprise—for I had seen too many wonders to be surprised at anything—that Augustus on this occasion expressed himself in a manner so unlike his usual way, which was that of a vicious seaman.

"Poor Mrs. Grasmere!" murmured Brassens, shaking his head reflectively.

"Yes, this fit of remembrance I encourage him, by pointing out, kindly, the evil of his past; and he seems, in his cold, dreamy way, to take comfort from the words. Then, he will sit for hours with his head in his hands, thinking of his wife. Brassens's theories is practice to the old critter. Listen to!" It is true, he has been a sailor, but he is a man of feeling, and I believe that on the row, that I cry blind in my own heart, 'Hey Heaven have mercy on me!' and I believe that Heaven will do it. Yes, Heaven have mercy on them—for I, who look at him in his woe, shall have mercy on them!"

[Nor I," cried Mrs. Tinks, rising to her feet, and striking the table with her hand, "nor I!"

Brassens said nothing, and I also was silent.]

"Then," I continued, "I tell him that dear Henry had left as he dressed himself and stole down stairs. I heard him, and stepped to the door.

"Where are you going?' I asked, grasping his arm firmly.

"'I am going to Brassens,' he said, in a low voice.

"'I thought it better not to thwart him. He was in a block, and desperate.

"'I will go with you,' I said, snatching up my cap and opening the door.

"He looked at me in a weak, doubtful manner, but helplessly consented that I should accompany him. He seemed to have no logic on together.

"'Are you afraid?' asked the man called Grasmere.

"I perceived that the question was addressed to myself, and that I should be a double spirit him without telling him so whatever I did. I answered that I was not afraid, and remained where I was. The moon was shining brightly last night. It fell brightly on his face, and I could see that he was pale. He left the door, and began to beam, with thick shadows here and there. It fell upon him in his darkness, like a ray of hope. However, he seemed unconscious. He soliloquised.

"Lonely walk. Half a mile distant from my dwelling-place, in the centre of the highway, with the moon upon it, I became conscious of a dark figure following me cautiously behind me. The eyes of the man called Grasmere were on the ground, and he did not notice me. I, however, had noticed him, and knew at once that it was the figure of a woman. It came swiftly towards us, as if flying from something behind it. Presently, I heard the voice of a woman; the veil thrown black, the dress torn. It came nearer, I saw, with the moonlight on it, and recognised the face. It was a face which I had seen long years before.

"The woman spoke, and I heard, perhaps. Then Grasmere looked up. The man and woman stood gazing at each other for so instant, and I saw the moonlight on a recognised face. Shaker. It was cloud, throwing up he arms in terror.

"'Mercy!' cried the woman, as he groaned. 'She has arisen! She has risen! She has come!'

"Then, backwards, fainting and moaning. Hastily stooper to help, but I remembered that I had left the door open, and left my hold. When I looked up the woman was gone. My hands remained upon the face of the man called Grasmere, who was looking for her; but she was nowhere to be seen.

"I left the man to his own thoughts and his own's head, coming louder and louder, along the road. Quick as thought, I raised Grasmere and placed him on the footpath, where he fell down. A horseman rode by at a gallop. He passed in a moment, but I saw that he was dressed in a recognised fashion. Shaker. It was the pair, second face of a friend of ours—Mr. Leonard Charles.

"Mr. Leonard Charles! Dressed like the cousin of a strange dream. There was a long pause, during which we all looked at the fire in Brassens's grate.

"And that is the story?" said Brassens at last, breaking the silence at last.

"That is the story, my man, and I cease hither to-night to-morrow."

Mrs. Tinks was white and cold, but she seemed firm as stone.

"It is as I suspected," she said, "but I am not afraid."

"From the jaws of death!" muttered Augustus.

"I see, too, that you have found double friends. I plucked up courage to say.

"Under the ghost of my woman?"

Augustus glanced at me sharply, and then answered in an undertone.

"Yes, I see your mamma's ghost."

"Is the story quite ended?" asked Brassens, absently.

"Not so," said Mrs. Tinks, rising. "Let us go home northward, and that he has not gone alone. No, if there were eyes to see, and ears, to hear, I would not go alone. Let us go all to our Heaven, have requested to swallow their victim."

He is not going to swallow me!" cried Mrs. Martha Tinks, rising her height, pale and cold, and pointing upward; "and may Heaven, which pities the innocent, aid us in so doing!"

Whereupon Augustus and Brassens also rose to their feet, and said Aloud.

CHAPTER XIII.—PENTORA MYLNTTON.

Fortune is proverbially a fickle old woman. Her predictions are as generous as they are false, and her fulfilment as scanty in exact proportion to the greatness of her promises. She is as false as woman herself, and as treacherous as Satan. Perhaps, I should be invariably thus censured. Fortune, nevertheless, finds large credit in the estimation of many, both of the present and past, for all reliable investments, give me Baring Brothers. Now, this outburst against Fortune has (I confess it) its origin in the far past. I saw a great golden morning, which soon melted away into gloomy shadows. Yet I, who had not eighteenpence to call my own, was haunted morning and night by a skeleton, any one of whose ribs would have covered a large life assurance. I could not catch the skeleton and examine it. It flitted before me, beckoning me on to a precipice. I only knew that it was made of Gold, and that it was made of a Gold I was forbidden to touch.

Broussais had a distant relation, who resided in a rather fashionable watering-place on the west coast of England. I shall call this watering-place Tortonquay. The name of Broussais's relation was Badger. He was a very fat man, Badger and kept a grocer's shop. He was an ignorant, bumptious man, Badger, but he gave his customers full weight. In brief, he was a very fair specimen of your honest English tradesman, and had a sharp eye to his own interests.

So it turned out that I parted with Augustus and Mrs. Timbs the very next day, and was taken by Broussais to Tortonquay. Before we started Augustus set out in search of Mr. Timbs, with the determination to bring that deceptively jolly individual to his senses.

We journeyed down to Tortonquay by rail, and we arrived there early in the evening. We found Badger in his shop, beaming behind a rather imposing counter. He did not appear to recognise us as friends, until Broussais called him "my dear Badger," and asked him how he did, besides putting sundry questions about the female Badger and the little Badgers. Gradually the face of the honest tradesman softened, and he stretched out a horny hand of welcome. I scarcely know how it happened, but in less than half an hour it was arranged that Badger was in want of an assistant, to serve in the shop, and that I would be just the sort of young gentleman to occupy the post. There was a great deal of whispering, and much nodding and winking, larded with occasional frowns and smiles, between Broussais and Badger; and I am sure, not only that I heard the jingle of money, but that money passed from the dwarf's hand into that of the honest tradesman.

"Remember, my dear young friend, that this cannot last long," observed Broussais, leading me into a corner of a coffee-house, to which we had adjourned. "In the meantime, keep up your heart, and be assured that all is for the best. I have so arranged matters that you will find yourself pretty comfortable. You will lodge with Badger, my relation. He's not a bad fellow, Badger, and you're sure to like him. Are you satisfied with my arrangements?"

I answered in the affirmative, thanking him, at the same time, for his exertions on my behalf. He pooh-poohed the notion of gratitude, when I talked of that cheap commodity. I really felt under a deep obligation. But, after all, my position and prospects considered, I fear that my gratitude agreed, in some measure, with Voltaire's definition of the word—"A lively sense of favors to be received."

That very evening Broussais left Tortonquay, consigning me to the care of Badger.

I decline going into a minute description of the Badger household, and its domestic economy. It (the household, not the economy) included Mrs. Badger, a woman whose chief peculiarities were flesh and good-nature; two little boy Badgers, with pug noses, and one little girl Badger, with a squint, and a pink-faced baby Badger, whose normal condition of mind developed itself in vocal discord. The Badger house was small, like the Badger servant, who was small too; but it was clean and comfortable. In a very short time I became quite domesticated; and, will you believe me, I became so happy as to perceive beauty in the baby? In the company of these vulgar people I began, for the first time, to relish close human relationship. I forgot my troubles; I almost forgot my skeleton. They were very worthy people, the Badgers; and they gave a good deal of moral relief by cutting my straight laces.

I forgot to state that I had been rechristened by Broussais. My name at Tortonquay was Henry Widgeon. In the domestic parlor I was called, familiarly, Widgeon. In the shop I was known to customers as "Mr. Henry." I received a small weekly salary, over and above my board; and I at last experienced the delight of earning my own bread and butter.

In the shop, I say, I was known as Mr. Henry, or Mr. Badger's "young man." Hear it ye stars and planets! I was not yet seventeen, and I was a "young man." I'm sadly afraid that this consciousness of manhood made me saucy. I'm sadly afraid that I once or twice cast amatory glances at pretty housemaids who came to make purchases in the shop. I'm sadly afraid that my heart throbbed and my fingers trembled while I was making up packets of tea or slicing the ham for the servant-maid who lived just over the way. I'm sadly afraid that I boxed the ears of one or two small boys, who tried to play practical jokes upon me and to detract from my commercial dignity. I'm sadly afraid, in fact, that I was beginning to treat my Golden Skeleton, when it appeared, with less awe than it had previously won at my hands.

Tortonquay was not quite so fashionable as either Brighton or Boulogne. Yet it was visited during the summer season by numbers of people who had nothing to do, and who wished to do it pleasantly. It was rather looked down upon by stuck-up Cheltenham; for it was darkly whispered that certain bank defaulters had once found in the very heart of its society a quiet and safe hiding place. But I've no hesitation in saying that this was a libel. Certain it is, that the sharp, conspicuous angles of snobbery were rubbed away by the ever-encroaching feet of commercial men. Tortonquay, in fact, had its under-circles and its upper ten-and-twenty. I belonged to the former; the latter were so few in number, that I could soon distinguish them on their arrival.

My happy state of union with the vulgar Badger family led me to institute odious comparisons between vulgar people and the people who rolled past me in carriages. I was certain that the vulgar people were the happier; and on that wrong premise, I came to the conclusion that the vulgar people, being happy, must be virtuous, and that the rich people, being unhappy, must be vicious. All the rich people, I fancied, had their Golden Skeletons. That dark beauty with lines on her young face, would purchase, in a husband, twelve thousand pounds' worth of misery; while Miss Mary Ann Badger, when she wedded, might squint blessedly through a nursery door into paradise. The young gentlemen, of my own age, who had money, or expectations, seemed disgusted with life, with love, with all things, save tobacco; while I, transplanted into vulgar soil, and transformed into a young man in the grocery line, believed in every pretty pair of ankles which twinkled across the threshold of the shop. I said to myself that Fortune was all a deception, while Golden Skeletons existed; that the scales and cheeseknife made music sweeter than all the gleaming guineas of Mammon; and that I would prefer being a poor Badger to a rich Brown. Mrs. Badger's only skeleton was a skeleton key; for—probably for the reason that there was nothing in the house to tempt a thief—she was dreadfully afraid of burglars.

I had only been a young man for some weeks, when my attention was called to an individual who entered the shop, purchased some figs, and sat down on a teabox to eat them. This worthy was a stout little man of about forty, with very black hair, eyebrows and moustache, a very Jewish nose, and a guttural way of speaking. He wore a very thick watchchain, and had rings of gold on his fat fingers.

His method of eating his figs was peculiar. He would take up one between his thumb and forefinger, hold it up to his eyes, glance suspiciously at me, then eat one side of the fig, hold it up to his eyes again, frown at me, and, finally, finishing the fig, stare me quietly out of countenance.

His visits were repeated. During one of them he got into friendly conversation with Badger. During the conversation, he observed that "Your young man, sir," had a shape and air which was decidedly above his position. Those hands, sir, were as white and delicate as a lady's, and his language, sir, was that of a lad tolerably well-educated. While making these remarks, which Badger dismissed as unworthy of comment, the jewelled and Jewish individual shook his head once or twice with an assumption of deep meaning. I felt particularly uneasy, for there was that in the manner of our visitor which did not at all please me. He looked dangerous.

Fortune, whose proverbial fickleness I alluded to at the commencement of this chapter, appeared to have so willed it that I should not be permitted to rest, for any length of time, in any given locality, whether the surrounding circumstances were pleasant or unpleasant. I was drifted about by fortune's changeful breath, like something of gossamer lightness. I lost all my power to resist extraneous influences. I was passive in the hands of the Fate which had closed around me when, as a very little boy, I first became conscious that I was haunted.

Directly my unknown visitor began to eat figs before Badger's counter, the charming reality of my vulgar happiness faded away into that unsubstantial dreamland wherein my Golden Skeleton wandered ever restlessly. I was certain that the incubus hand of Fortune was again descending upon me, and that I should again be dragged back to the old associations. My fears were soon confirmed by a word or two which passed one evening between the visitor and myself. He was staring at me in his insolent way, when my blood flushed up suddenly, and I spoke out.

"You seem, sir," I said, trying to sneer, "to have taken a great interest in my welfare. I can't conceive for what reason."

"And do you know," murmured my visitor, appealing to the ceiling and pointing to me, as if I were part of the stock-in-trade, "do you know that I've been waiting here, day after day, on purpose to hear you say this?"

"Indeed!" I exclaimed, with as much surprise as indignation.

"Yes, indeed. I've waited to hear you say it, and you've said it. Now I'm going to speak to you. I've been sent by a friend of yours, to find you out and report progress."

BRILLIANT ACHIEVEMENT IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Capture of the Forts and Batteries at Hatteras Inlet, on the Coast of North Carolina.

The rebels about two months ago erected two batteries at Ocracoke Inlet, which is in Raleigh Bay, and situated about 15 miles to the south of Cape Hatteras—one called Fort Clarke and the other Fort Hatteras. This inlet is of great importance, as it commands Pamlico Sound and Albemarle Sound, which communicate with Norfolk, Gosport and Elizabeth City in Virginia, and, of course, with all parts of North Carolina. The result was that the waters guarded by this pestilential inlet became a pirate's nest, from which issued with perfect impunity a swarm of Confederate privateers, who, after a murderous cruise, returned with their ill-gotten booty to sustain the Southern rebellion.

On Monday, the 27th of August, an expedition sailed from Fortress Monroe. It consisted of the frigates Minnesota, Wabash and Cumberland; gunboats Pawnee, Monticello and Harriet Lane; transports, Adelaide and George Peabody; the latter containing 5 0 of the 20th Regiment New York Volunteers, Colonel Weber commanding; Captain Jardine's company, 9th Regiment New York Volunteers, with 100 of the Union Coast Guard, Captain Nixon commanding, and 60 of the Second United States Artillery, Lieutenant Larned commanding, as a force to operate in conjunction with the fleet under command of Flag Officer Stringham, against the rebel forts at Hatteras Inlet.

On Tuesday morning this force arrived off Ocracoke Inlet, or, as it is sometimes called, Hatteras Inlet. On Wednesday morning the transports ran near the beach, two miles north of the inlet, and covered by the Monticello, Harriet Lane and Pawnee. About 300 men were landed through a heavy surf, the force consisting of Captain Larned's company of regular artillery, Captain Jardine's company 9th New York, two companies of the 20th New York, with Colonel Weber and Lieutenant-Colonel Heiss; a detachment of marines from the frigates, under command of Majors Doughty and Shuttleworth, and a detachment of sailors from the Pawnee, under Lieutenants Crosby and Blue, with Drs. King and Jones.

The gunboats swept the beach and neighboring copse of scrub oaks. All the boats being swamped and bilged in the surf, no more men could be thrown ashore. Meanwhile, the Minnesota and Wabash—the latter with the Cumberland in tow—steamed up to the front of one of the rebel batteries and took their position at long range.

At 10 o'clock the Wabash fired the first gun, the 11-inch shell, striking near the battery and bursting with tremendous force. The battery, which was of sand, covered with turf, and mounting five long thirty-twos, instantly returned the fire, the shot falling short. The Minnesota and Cumberland immediately opened fire, and rained nine and eleven inch shell into and about it.

At 11 the rebel flag fell beneath the well aimed fire of the Cumberland. An hour later the Susquehanna steamed into the conflict, and commenced a fire which soon silenced the rebel battery. Our gallant troops on shore here rushed into the fort, and raised the Stars and Stripes. The Monticello had in the meantime steamed in advance of the land force, and reached the inlet, when a large fort of an octagon shape, called Fort Hatteras, to the rear and right of Fort Clarke, already carried, opened fire. On the morning of Thursday the entire fleet commenced bombarding this fort, and with such effect, that at five minutes past 11 the rebels hoisted the white flag, and, after an ineffectual negotiation to secure the honors of war, surrendered at discretion. General Butler then landed at the fort, and took possession of it.

Articles of stipulation were signed on the flagship by Commodore Stringham and General Butler on the part of the United States, and by Commodore Barron, Colonel Martin and Major Andrews on the rebel side, and the latters' swords delivered up.

By the surrender we came into possession of 1,000 stand of arms, 35 heavy guns, ammunition for the same, a large amount of hospital and other stores, two schooners, one loaded with tobacco and the other with provisions, one brig loaded with cotton, two lightboats, two surf boats, &c.

We took 45 officers prisoners, many of high rank, among whom were:

Commodore Samuel Barron, late Captain United States Navy, Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Colonel Bradford, Chief of Ordnance.

Colonel Martin, 7th North Carolina Volunteers.

Lieutenant-Colonel Johnston, 7th North Carolina Volunteers.

Major Henry A. Gillman, 7th North Carolina Volunteers.

Major Andrews, artillery, late United States Army.

Lieutenant Sharp, late United States Army.

And several others, late army and navy officers, and 665 non-commissioned officers and privates.

The prisoners are on board the Minnesota, and will be carried to New York.

The two forts remain in the possession of the Federal troops; Fort Hatteras under command of Colonel Weber, and Fort Clark under that of Colonel Hawkins.

The enemy's loss in killed was 15, and wounded 42. On our side not a single man was either killed or wounded.

During the action a large steamer, with considerable reinforcements, was observed coming down the Sound, but these were prevented landing by Colonel Weber, who, getting some cannon into position, commenced firing on her. She, therefore, put back without accomplishing her object. It is said that 400 men were landed the night before the attack at the Fort.

RECEPTION OF GENERAL LYON'S BODY IN NEW YORK.

When the telegraph flashed the news of the battle of Wilson's Creek, near Springfield, Missouri, on the 10th ultimo, over the wires throughout this whole country, at the same time informing us of the death of the brave and gallant General Nathaniel Lyon, the liveliest anxiety was manifested as to what disposition would be made of his earthly remains. As soon as it was ascertained that the valiant leader was slain, Dr. Franklin, the surgeon of Gen. Lyon's command, endeavored to embalm the body, and had already commenced the process of injecting arsenic in the veins, but found it extremely difficult to accomplish his desire, owing to the ruptured state of the bloodvessels and the expected advance of the rebels, when Major Sturgis ordered a retreat on Rollo, and the corpse of General Lyon had to be left behind.

The lady of Hon. J. S. Phelps, residing some three miles distant from the battle-field, sent for the remains, on hearing the circumstances, had them brought to her farm and temporarily interred until subsequently claimed by the relatives of the deceased, under a flag of truce. The remains were then exhumed, placed in a metallic coffin, and transported to St. Louis.

Everywhere the greatest reverence was shown towards the glorious dead. The same honors were paid in Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, Jersey City and New York, at which place it arrived on Saturday, the 31st of August, at half-past two in the afternoon. It was received by the third company of the 7th regiment, and an immense concourse of spectators, whose silence revealed their sorrow and homage.

When the funeral cortege arrived in front of the Hall, Captain Price drew up his company in line, and the coffin was taken from the hearse by the Missouri soldiers accompanying the remains, and carried to their designated place. The undertaker had already placed pedestals in the centre of the room, upon which the corpse was deposited. Beyond the company of the 7th regiment and the members of the Common Council, no one was permitted to enter the room. Sergeant Legget posted his guard immediately, which were relieved every two hours.

The wooden box in which the remains of the deceased were placed was considerably shattered while on the journey to New York, consequently the body was put into a metallic coffin, painted to represent rosewood.

In the centre of the coffin was fastened a silver plate, bearing the following inscription:

GEN. NATHANIEL LYON,
Died August 10, 1861, aged 42 years.

The burial case was bedecked with the American flag. At the head lay the chapeau of the late General, in the centre a wreath of evergreens and immortelles, and at the feet the sword which was grasped in General Lyon's hand while leading his gallant troops. The escort accompanying the remains from St. Louis withdrew as soon as Captain Price took the body in charge, to their quarters at the Metropolitan Hotel.

DAY OF FASTING, HUMILIATION AND PRAYER.

Proclamation by the President.

Whereas, a Joint Committee of both Houses of Congress has waited on the President of the United States, and requested him to recommend a day of public humiliation, prayer and fasting, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnities, and the offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of these States, His blessings on their arms, and a speedy restoration of peace;

And whereas, It is fit and becoming in all people at all times to acknowledge and revere the supreme government of God, to bow in humble submission to His chastisements, to confess and deplore their sins and transgressions, in the full conviction that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and to pray with all fervency and contrition for the pardon of their past offences, and for a blessing upon their present and prospective action;

And whereas, When our beloved country, once, by the blessing of God, united, prosperous and happy, is now afflicted with faction and civil war, it is peculiarly fit for us to recognise the hand of God in this visitation, and in sorrowful remembrance of our own faults and crimes as a nation and individuals, to humble ourselves before Him, and pray for His mercy—to pray that we may be spared further punishment, though justly deserved; that our arms may be blessed and made effectual for the re-establishment of law, order and peace throughout our country, and that the inestimable boon of civil and religious liberty, earned, under His guidance and blessing, by the labors and sufferings of our forefathers, may be restored to all its original excellence: Therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do appoint the last Thursday in September next, as a day of humiliation, prayer and fasting for all the people of the nation; and I do earnestly recommend to all the people, and especially to all ministers and teachers of religion, of all denominations, and to all heads of families, to observe and keep that day according to their several creeds and modes of worship, in all humility and with all religious solemnity, to the end that the united prayer of the nation may ascend to the Throne of Grace, and bring down plentiful blessings upon our own country.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the United States to be affixed, this 12th day of August, A. D. 1861, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-sixth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

PROCLAMATION OF EDWIN D. MORGAN, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Albany, Aug. 22, 1861.

A conspiracy, not the work of a day, but the result of years of false, wicked and traitorous machinations, has for several months disturbed the peace of the State of New York and of the Federal Union. Its movements have been marked by violence and fraud. Wherever it has manifested itself it has disregarded the rights of citizens, coerced them into the ranks of its armies, and exercised an absolute control over person and property in utter defiance of the Constitution and laws of the land. Ambitious and designing men, disappointed in their personal aims, have been enabled, chiefly by misrepresenting the feelings of one portion of the country towards the other, to usurp and exercise a power which has become not only tyrannical and oppressive in several States, whose constitutional governments it has temporarily suspended, but dangerous to the entire Union; the pretences originally held forth as a justification for acts of lawlessness and treason have been laid aside; the intention of the leaders of this wicked rebellion to destroy the Union cemented by the blood of our fathers, is now fully manifest; and, elated by accidental success, they audaciously threaten the national capital. As chief magistrate of the State, it is my solemn duty to warn all good and loyal men of the dangers to which our institutions are exposed, and to urge upon them the necessity of an earnest and zealous co-operation with the authorities of the State and general Government, of a cheerful contribution of their means to support the public credit, and of active enrollment in the forces now being organized for the defence of the Union, convinced that the tranquillity of the country so wantonly disturbed can only be restored by the prompt and vigorous suppression of rebellion and treason, wherever they may appear. The representatives of the people of the United States, lately convened in Congress at the call of a constitutionally elected President, in view of the perils which surround the Union, have, by legislative enactments, provided for liberal supplies of men and means for the enforcement of the laws, and have thus invited a hearty and zealous response on the part of several States. New York has never wavered in her devotion to the Union. She prizes it on account of the many blessings which all parts of the country alike have received from it; on account of the memory of her patriot sons by whose blood it was purchased, and for the inestimable benefit it confers upon the present and secures to future generations. Her noble response to the call of the President in April last was such as preserved to her the proud title which she has long borne in the family of States. Another stage in the great rebellion has been reached, and the Government appreciating the dangers now menacing it appeals for aid. The whole country, the civilized world, now looks to the State of New York. Let the response be worthy of her history, let her answer go back in full ranks of earnest men, who, justly valuing the magnitude of the interests involved, temporarily relinquish their pursuits, and prepare to meet the crisis.

In witness whereof I have hereunto affixed the privy seal of this State at the city of Albany, this 22d day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one. EDWIN D. MORGAN.

GEN. FREMONT'S PROCLAMATION.

Gen. Fremont issued, at St. Louis, on August 31st, a proclamation to the effect that declares martial law throughout the State of Missouri; the disorganized condition of the State Government rendering it both proper and necessary that he should assume the Administrative powers of the State. The lines of the Army of Occupation are declared for the present to extend from Leavenworth, by way of the posts of Jefferson City, Rolla and Ironton, to Cape Girardeau on the Mississippi river, and all persons who shall be taken with arms in their hands within those lines shall be tried by Court-martial, and if found guilty of disloyalty to the Government, shall be shot. Thus far in the regular course. Gen. Fremont goes still further, and, in accordance with the law recently passed by Congress, declares that the property, real and personal, of all persons in the State of Missouri who shall take up arms against the United States, or who shall be directly proved to have taken active part with their enemies in the field, shall be confiscated to the public use, and their slaves, if any they have, shall be declared free men. The proclamation includes in its provisions all persons proved to have destroyed railroad-tracks, bridges, &c., and all persons engaged in treasonable correspondence, or in any way giving "aid and comfort" to the enemy. It also promises immunity to all who will immediately return to their allegiance to the Government. The object of the proclamation, Gen. Fremont announces, is to place in the hands of the military authorities the power to give instantaneous effect to existing laws, and not to suspend the ordinary tribunals of the country, where the law can be administered by the civil officers in the usual manner. He closes with an appeal to the public to sustain him in his efforts to vindicate the proper authority.

PERSONAL.

We take the liberty of doubting the following despatch, purporting to have been sent by Jefferson Davis to Dr. Ramsey, of Knoxville, Tennessee. Mr. Nelson is a man of far too high principle, and altogether too consistent in his devotion to the Union, to have said or done anything to authorise the despatch:

"Richmond, Va., August 18.

"Dr. J. G. M. Ramsey, Knoxville.

"Yours received. Mr. Nelson has acknowledged his obligation, as a citizen of the State of Tennessee, to submit to her late decision; and upon his promise to act hereafter in accordance therewith, I have ordered his release.

"Jefferson Davis."

The Richmond Enquirer states that Mrs. Henningsen, wife of the soi-disant General Henningsen, of filibuster notoriety, and the Major Dalgetty of modern times, now of Wise's staff, has arrived in that city. She came from New York via Louisville and Nashville. She was pretty closely searched, but succeeded in getting through with five revolvers, 500 ounces of quinine, and a galvanic battery.

We understand that Hermon, the wizard magician and sorcerer par excellence, is to make his appearance at the Academy of Music, for the first time, about the 4th of next month.

Daniel E. Sickles has at last received a commission as Brigadier-General, at the instance, it is said, of General McClellan.

A subscription has been opened in London for a testimony to Mr. Milner Gibson, in view of his services toward the final abolition—now effected—of all taxes in England on literature and the press.

Foreign journals announce that M. von Flotow is at work on a new opera.

Mrs. Edwin James, wife of a distinguished English barrister, was robbed a few nights since at her hotel at Long Branch of jewellery valued at $7,000.

Father Ventura, the celebrated French preacher, died at Versailles recently, in his 69th year. For years he drew crowds to the churches of the Madeleine and St. Louis d'Antin.

The London Critic says that during the late opera season "to such a fever heat had the desire grown to see Mdlle. Patti, that the public had scarce eyes or ears for any opera in which she did not sustain a chief part."

Lady Georgiana Fane is said to be preparing a book on this country. She will have seen it under extraordinary circumstances, and has had ample opportunity of judging of the character and manners of most of our prominent people, men and women. Her own shrewdness of observation and remarkable cleverness will, doubtless, make the volume of uncommon interest.

VIEW OF FORT LAFAYETTE, SITUATED AT THE NARROWS, NEW YORK HAR

FORT LAFAYETTE, NEW YORK, THE STATE PRISON OF THE REPUBLIC.

The entrance to New York harbor, commonly called the Narrowe, is defeuded by Forts Richmond and Tompkins on the Staten Island side, and by Forts Hamilton and Lafayette on the Long Island shore. The latter fort bas lately became famous as the State Prison of the Republic. It is built upon a shosl about 400 yards from Long Island, and is entirely surrounded by water. In shape it is quadrangular, with the angles pointing to the sea and shore, diamond-wise—hence it was formerly called Fort Diamond. Facing Fort Hamilton, which stands on the shore of Long Island, a little island, are two rows of heavy guns in bombproof casemates. On this side, which is less protected than the others, appear to be the barracks for the troops, and other necessary buildings, the roofs of which are seen rising above the walls of the fort. There are consequently no barbette guns here. This part of the fort, however, is completely commanded by Fort Hamilton, opposite which is the sallyport in one of the angles.

On the other sides guns are mounted en barbette, in addition to the heavy casemate guns below.

The principal State prisoners now confined here are:

Charles Howard, William Gatchell, Charles Hincks and John Davis, Police Commissioners of Baltimore, accused of being implicated in the Baltimore riots, and of a general complicity with the rebels.

Robert Muir, of Charleston, an agent of the Southern Confederacy, was arrested on the point of sailing in the Africa for Europa, with dispatches from Jeff. Davis and his Cabinet to numerous parties in Europe in bis pocket.

Thomas S. Serrill, of New Orleans, who was detected by means of his arrogant boasting on board the Persia, on his way from Liverpool. Bank bills to the amount of $200,000 were found on him; they

R, WHERE THE STATE PRISONERS ARE CONFINED.—TAKEN FROM FORT HAMILTON.

MAYOR BERRETT, OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

This gentleman, although considered a States' Rights man, was never suspected of being inimical to the Union till he was required, a few days since, in common with other officials, to take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government. This he declined, on the strange pretence that he had already taken it when he assumed his position as President of the Police Commissioners, which he in by virtue of his office of Mayor. In these times, it being impossible to "clasp logic with nice conclusions," as John Milton phrases "these dainty trifles," he was arrested, and, being brought to New York, was safely lodged in Fort Lafayette. In other respects Mr. Berrett has been esteemed a gentleman of honor and intelligence, and much respected by his fellow-citizens.

SHIPPING ARTILLERY AND TROOPS

At Bird's Point, on the Mississippi, for Ironton, Mo.

THE threatening attitude which General Hardee, who commanded the rebels near Cape Girardeau, on the Mississippi, assumed, after the battle of Wilson's Springs, towards Ironton, the terminus of the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad, rendered some movement necessary. General Prentiss having no force to spare from St. Louis, in consequence of the singular apathy of the Minister of War, consequently ordered four regiments and a sufficient force of artillery from Bird's Point. Our Artist accompanies his spirited sketch with this graphic account of the embarkation:

The order was received in the morning, at Cairo, just the same night, through the agency of Col. Oglesby (then commanding the post), and Quartermaster Black, five large steamboats moved up the Mississippi with four regiments and Smith's artillery on board. They landed the next evening at Sulphur Springs, and were immediately conveyed by railroad to Iron Knob, and occupied

MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN MISSOURI.

Ironton, half a mile distant—thus destroying the hopes of Gen. Hardee, who dared not attack them, but fell back to Greenville, a town about 35 miles to the south-west of Ironton.

Nor must we omit the following instance of General Prentiss's devotion to his duty. Our Artist says:

Gen. Prentiss, who had gone to pay a short visit to his home in Quincy, Ill., received a dispatch just as he landed there, ordering him to St. Louis. A special train was in readiness, and, true to his duty, he left his disappointed friends and family to take command at Ironton. Assistant Quartermaster Geo. Hatch arrived from Cairo, and with his admirable tact and promptness immediately ordered the necessary baggage train, so that in little more than a week an army of 10,000 men has sprung up in this vicinity, ready to take the offensive. One regiment, the 17th Illinois, Col. Ross, was ordered to take the advance post, and now occupies Fredericktown, 22 miles towards the south east, and the main body of the division followed immediately.

OUR MAP OF MISSOURI.

The position of affairs in Missouri at the present time fixes upon that State considerable public attention. We had hoped long ere this to have chronicled its entire freedom from rebel forces. Had General Lyon been properly supported after the battles of Booneville and Carthage, this would doubtless have been the case. As matters have been managed, the work has to be done over again. The public will perceive from our map the exact position of the two armies—the National and the Rebels. General Fremont's head quarters are in St. Louis, and by the last accounts Generals Prentiss, Siegel and Sturgis are at Rolla and Frederickton, prepared for every contingency. According to the Government statement, General Fremont has ample force to maintain his ground. This, however, is not sufficient; he should be made strong enough to drive the traitors out, as General Lyon intended. In our article on Pilot Knob we have given many of the distances the chief towns of Missouri are from each other. At the present time the southern part of the State is under the influence of Rebel hordes, led by McCullough, Rains, Price, Jackson and Hardee—all desperate and malignant traitors. Their troops are scattered about, near Cape Girardeau, Springfield, Greenville, New Madrid and Bloomfield. Their number is difficult to ascertain, accounts being so very contradictory. Some place it as high as 50,000, others as low as half that. We may therefore expect to have stirring news soon from Missouri.

MAP OF THE COAST OF VIRGINIA

And North Carolina, from Cape Henry to Cape Lookout, including Hatteras Inlet.

The brilliant success attending the National arms at Hatteras Inlet has called the public attention to its exact locality. We therefore give a map which will enable our readers to trace Gen. Butler's expedition from the moment of its departure from Fortress Monroe to its triumphal close. The coast of North Carolina and Virginia is defended by a narrow strip of land, which closes in as with an arm the Sounds of Currituck, Albemarle and Pamlico. From Cape Henry to Cape Lookout, there are five inlets; the two northern ones are closed, and the third has only two feet water; the chief, indeed the only entrance of any utility, is one about 16 miles to the south of Cape Hatteras, and which is called Hatteras Inlet. The water here is from 15 to 17 feet deep, and consequently this entrance has been the principal mouth from whence has issued so many of the Southern pirate ships, and which has supplied Norfolk, Suffolk—in a word, all Virginia and North Carolina, with whatever was wanted. A canal through the Dismal Swamp connects Elizabeth and James Rivers with the Atlantic through the Sounds already named. James River was therefore only half blockaded while Hatteras Inlet was in the rebel's hands. On the northern part of this inlet the rebels had erected two batteries—one called Fort Clark, and the other and larger one Fort Hatteras—over both of which now float the Stars and Stripes.

THE CAMPAIGN IN MISSOURI.

Our present number contains a map of the seat of war in Missouri, and two views, embracing the neighborhood of Ironton and the Pilot Knob. The public seems to have forgotten that General Prentiss, whose herculean labors at Cairo we have already recorded and illustrated, was, on General Fremont's arrival in St. Louis, about a month since, appointed to a more active command, and that, after collecting and drilling his troops at Ironton, he moved, on the 27th August, southward from that town, against those notorious traitors, Hardee and Jeff. Thompson.

The whole rebel force in south-eastern Missouri it is intended to drive back upon General Pillow at New Madrid, when it may be that, by the co-operation of the gunboats on the Mississippi and the forces at Cairo and Bird's Point, the entire rebel army can be cut off from retreat or reinforcements, and compelled to surrender.

The first fruits of this movement are that the rebels have abandoned Commerce and Benton, and retreated to Bloomfield.

LUCILLE DE VERNET:

A TALE OF WOMAN'S HATE.

CHAPTER XLII.

Signor Strozzi received the Count D'Almaine's letter with the proposal for his niece with satisfaction; it was an offer far beyond his anticipation; but not wishing to influence her acceptance of it without her free consent, he went at once to her, and without preface handed her the letter.

"What answer am I to return, Marie?" said her uncle. "Do you favor the signor?"

"Dear uncle," she exclaimed, "what a question! I have never thought of him but as your friend; but if you wish my thoughts on the subject, I think he is too old to wed a girl not yet eighteen. I do not like him as a husband; I should not, I fear, respect him as he deserves; but as my father or uncle, I could dearly love and respect him."

There was a shade on the bright face of Marie as she stood several minutes in deep thought. At length she spoke.

"Uncle," said she, "permit me to decide at once. Tell me, should I accept the count's offer, must I give up dear Italy, you and my beloved aunt?"

"I am compelled to say yes, to your question," replied her uncle. "Could we, ought we to expect that the Count D'Almaine would give up country, and the importance all men attach to the home of their fathers? If such a sacrifice is made, it must be on your part, Marie."

"Then I must decline what you think so glittering a proposal," said Marie. "I will not leave you to live with the stranger; his home, though grand, would be less welcome than the humble dwelling I share with you, and the simple name of Marie Strozzi sounds sweeter in my ears than the proud one of Countess D'Almaine."

He turned to offer another remonstrance, he was alone—Marie, fearing it had, with her quickest and lightest step, quitted the room, and slowly he descended to write a negative to D'Almaine. His answer was couched in as mild terms as possible, and set forth his niece's objection as one which all girls with her confined knowledge of the world generally possessed.

D'Almaine had waited impatiently the answer, in a frame of mind, in doubt with himself which would convey the greatest pleasure her acceptance or refusal of his hand; but when Signor Strozzi's letter came, doubt seemed to vanish. The fear of losing Marie, which had lain dormant the last twelve hours, revived with force, and he determined not to leave Florence without her.

Ever prompt in his proceedings, an hour after the receipt of Signor Strozzi's letter, D'Almaine was in close conversation with him in his library, and had urged his wishes with such success, that the signor had consented, if Marie could be brought to change her mind, upon the count's proposing that she should be accompanied by her aunt and uncle to France.

Marie was summoned to the conference; she could not raise another reason for her refusal, and before the count quitted the house of the Italian priest, his niece was his betrothed bride.

The morning of the wedding arrived; not such an Italian morning as we read of as seldom varying in the sunny south; it was dense with clouds, and a heavy mist falling, through a shade over objects both within and without doors. The party composing the bridal train had assembled, with the exception of D'Almaine, in the small parlor of Signor Strozzi, and each time the door opened every eye turned to it expecting the bridegroom. At length he entered; but oh, how unlike a happy expectant lover, eager for the gratulations of his friends! he was pale, with a strange wildness in his eyes, as if rest had been a stranger to him the last twenty-four hours.

After receiving the greetings of the party, D'Almaine retired to a window, and throwing it open, let the raindrops fall on his heated temples, in the vain hope of finding relief from the cold moisture. His night had been haunted by fearful dreams. Lucille had stood before him, as he last saw her, when she exhorted him so forcibly to rest not till he found his child; she accused him of seeking ideal pleasures at the expense of pure affection. She, who in life had never upbraided him, frowned darkly on him now. He awoke from this unpleasant vision to fancy one more fearful; Lucille was still with him, though this time she stood at the altar and Marie was by his side; the ceremony to the point when the ring is put on the finger of the bride, when the vision stepped between, and with finger raised deprecatingly and loud voice, forbade the marriage; he shuddered and hid his eyes; when he uncovered them he was alone in the holy edifice, and darkness was around him.

"How different was all," he thought, as the raindrops still fell on him, "when I led my own Lucille to the village church near Marseilles; how brightly shone the sun, how beautifully bloomed the sweets of life round us. I thought then nature's God smiled on my marriage, but now——"

A soft hand touched his, so gently, that at another time it would have passed unheeded; he turned quickly, and encountered the large dark eyes of his bride. There was a sadness, an anxiety in their expression as she said, in a low, soft tone, that it sounded almost childlike on his ears, "Signor D'Almaine, you are ill. What can we do for you?" "Come," she said, as she withdrew from his embrace; "come, if you are better, to the breakfast-table, for see, all eyes are on us."

"I am better," he replied; "I am myself again. There is a mysterious charm in your presence, Marie, which makes me forget all but the chance of losing you. With you by my side I have a blessed future before me; but," he added, and his voice quivered, "I have been before a bridegroom, have knelt at the altar with one as young and lovely as yourself; therefore, do not wonder, do not condemn me if, for a brief space, remembrance of the past has dimmed the lustre of the present moment."

A slight pressure of the fingers was her answer, as he led her to the table. The carriages were announced as soon as the meal was finished, and the assembled friends of Signor Strozzi were soon set down at the small church over which he presided.

D'Almaine looked proudly on the young and beautiful creature who already seemed to cling to him for protection, as they walked up the aisle to the altar, where Strozzi, who had preceded them, stood with his book before him. The ceremony proceeded in the usual way, till D'Almaine took the hand of Marie, when for a moment he stood like one paralysed, his lips white, his eyes distended, as their fastened gaze was on a ring upon her finger. The silence of that moment was intense; all were more or less affected by it, for all had their eyes fixed on the bridegroom. At length it was broken by D'Almaine, who spoke; but the voice was so hoarse and hollow that it could not be recognised as those clear, full tones usually falling from his lips.

"That ring," he said, "whence came it? Tell me, if you value mine or your own eternal happiness, tell me how it fell into your possession."

He grasped the hand of the frightened girl with such vehemence, that fear alone kept her from screaming. Without waiting an answer he wildly snatched it from her finger, and as she struggled to free herself from his firm grasp, added, "Girl, speak, I command you, whence came this ring?"

"It was my mother's," she cried; "the initials are those of her name," and drawing a miniature from her bosom, she added, "this is her picture."

Like a maniac D'Almaine tore it from her neck, and looked at it, as almost exhausted he leant on the altar railing for support, then exclaimed, "It is Lucille's! and the ring, oh heaven! in what a prophetic spirit she must have sent it to her child, as it was to save her from a deadly sin."

Amazement and curiosity collected the bridal party together. Marie was left standing alone, pale, cold, rigid as a statue. Signor Strozzi was the first to arouse himself from the fearful awe encompassing all in the holy precincts; he approached D'Almaine, and laid his hand humbly on his arm.

"I know not what it means," he said, "though I have a vague idea of something yet to be told; but here is nothing like guilt, unless it be attached to me. I feel I have, in my love and zeal for Marie, practised a mean and base deception in withholding from you all I knew of her birth; I should have told you all when you offered her your name and fortune; but proud of her, and loving her as if she were indeed connected to me by blood, I withheld from you the knowledge that no link binds us to each other, but what her forlorn situation had on my protection."

D'Almaine shuddered; his eyes gleamed wildly on him while he spoke. "Then she is not your niece?" he said, hoarsely. "Speak, sir. Tell me then, who is she?"

"That picture you hold in your hand is her mother's," said the curé.

D'Almaine caught Marie's hand, and, sinking on his knees before the altar, cried, "Kneel, girl, kneel with me, and bless heaven that it has been merciful to us, and interposed to prevent a marriage between a father and his child."

A wild cry escaped Marie as she shrank from her father's support. Strozzi raised her from the marble steps, but he thought her dead; for never was death paler, colder, or more still, than the poor girl he pressed to his aching heart. Making a passage through the bewildered throng, he bore her to the carriage, and, entrusting her to the care of his sister, hastened back to her father.

At length, but with difficulty, D'Almaine was conveyed to the dwelling of the repentant and self-accusing Strozzi, where for a fortnight the closed blinds, the noiseless footfalls, the pale, anxious faces hovering round the bed, and the low whisperings of all that approached it, told the fearful state the sufferer was reduced to.

Marie, young and ardent as in her days of childhood, soon recovered from the shock, and with both hands and voice fervently raised, she sat by her father's pillow, praying that if he arose from the couch of suffering it might be in the possession of his faculties, which the medical men in attendance gave no hope of.

When D'Almaine rose from his bed of sickness the lightness of his character had fled. Marie had read to him the Book of books, and its simple truthfulness hand entered his soul. The vanities of the world he had hitherto worshipped had lost a votary for ever. But he was changed too in appearance; the rich proportions of his form were gone—these, with returning strength, might again appear, but the raven locks were gone for ever; the well-formed head, which time had left untouched, had succumbed to the shock of that morning at the altar. They were white and silvery, as if four score winters had drifted their snows upon his brow.

As his strength recruited, D'Almaine was anxious to learn the particulars concerning his daughter from Signor Strozzi, towards whom he felt an irrepressible indignation for retaining the character of her uncle till it was forced from him by circumstances. Signor Strozzi felt that he deserved full censure for his conduct—conduct that might have brought upon him everlasting and unavailing remorse; he therefore stood before D'Almaine at their first meeting on his convalescence as a self accuser; and when the latter pushed aside the proffered hand with "Let us converse a little first, Signor Strozzi," the signor did not resent it, but humbly returned to the seat D'Almaine pointed to. Marie, who feared an altercation from the proud look of her father, stepped between them.

"Father!" she exclaimed, earnestly, "you will not permit yourself to harbor resentment against Signor Strozzi, who, with his sister, protected my helpless childhood. Think of the worthiness of his character, and what he has done for me. Had I fallen into different hands, your child would not now be near you to make this appeal to your justice."

"Marie is right," said D'Almaine, "there should be no ill-feeling on my part, at least, Signor Strozzi; and if for years you have robbed me of my child, it was done in the cause of philanthropy and the best feelings of humanity. From henceforth I hope no discord will disturb the harmony between us; but answer me with sincerity, did none of the numerous advertisements published ever meet your eye, none of my inquiries your ear?"

"On my honor all was to me dark as night!" he replied. "Had an idea entered my mind that parents were sorrowing for the child of my adoption, if my fortune had been expended in the event, I would have discovered them; but, unsuspicious of all but my first impressions, which were raised by the stout Englishman, that the poor child was thrown intentionally on the bounty of strangers, I considered I was performing my duty by protecting her as my nearest relative. I tremble when I think on the dreadful results it might have led to; but I have no further excuse to offer."

"Enough, signor," said D'Almaine, "let us remember the past with softened feelings, but we must quit here as soon as possible. In a few days I shall be able to travel. The late events I trust have not interfered with our former plans. The signora and yourself will go with us to Paris. Hasten, dear signor, our departure, for I shall not breathe freely till I once more breathe the air of France."

CHAPTER XLIII.

It was late in the afternoon of a cloudy, cold day in February when the carriage rattled over the stones of the courtyard of the Hotel D'Almaine. Eugene stood at the bottom of the broad staircase with his smiling welcome.

"Draw down your veil, Marie," said D'Almaine, as he stepped from the vehicle to embrace Eugene; "it is your cousin, and I wish you to take him by surprise."

Then, as he handed her from the carriage, he said to Eugene, "My daughter, one of the kindest and sauciest of little girls, but for her want of beauty," and he shrugged his shoulders significantly; "you must look for it, cousin, to find it, but I expect you will regard her for my sake, if not for your own."

Eugene, without noticing the remark, led the way to the salon, amid a bevy of servants, all anxious to gain a sight of the newly found treasure of their master; nor was the young man himself deficient in the same laudable curiosity to catch a glimpse beyond the wraps of the muffled figure before him. He offered to disencumber her of her furs, but a smart little waiting maid stepped forward with a request that she might conduct the ladies to their apartments.

Both Signora Strozzi and Marie readily accepted the offer, and followed the maid to the rooms prepared for Marie. It was her grandmother's suite of rooms, which we have before described, and the splendor of them on first entering dazzled the sight of the child like Marie.

Their toilette was soon completed, and they descended to the drawing-room.

Eugene hastened to meet Marie, and as the door opened he started at her appearance; it was like an apparition bursting out from the muffled form he had parted from so recently, but before he had recovered his surprise the object of it, to his mortification, was seated by her father. He watched an opportunity to lead her to the dining-room, but Marie, as if divining his thoughts, and determining to disappoint them, took the arm of Signor Strozzi.

In the evening, D'Almaine and Strozzi were in deep discussion on Rome in its bygone days; the signora, much interested, sat near, occasionally joining the discussion; consequently, the young people had to amuse themselves on their own resources. Marie turned over the leaves of several books, then threw them down listlessly, while Eugene amused himself with admiring her profile, as she sat half-turned towards him. At last, throwing down a book, she looked from the window, exclaiming, "Nothing but a paved court-yard to look out on. Paris is a miserably dull place. How many months in the year does my father pass here, monsieur?"

Eugene smiled at the earnestness with which the question was asked, but replied, "Nine months is the fashionable season, I believe."

"Nine months!" exclaimed Marie. "Why, I have only arrived to-day, and am tired of it. How do you amuse yourselves in your evenings at home; doing as we are doing now, I suppose? some conversing on the old times which weary one to death at school, without having them revived in our social moments, and the rest, doomed like you and me, to listen to them. Oh! a walk in the green fields, or beside the rippling stream, is worth a whole Paris season."

"It has certainly more romance in it," said Eugene.

"Romance!" said Marie; "say nature, for I am the most unromantic person in the world, yet I love the country for its very originality; but you have not told me your Paris home resources."

"We read much and converse more," replied Eugene; "and we sometimes play chess. Do you play, Mademoiselle D'Almaine?"

"I am a novice at the game," she replied; "my uncle has given me a few lessons, but he found me so stupid that he gave me up in despair."

The board was soon between them; and Marie, with a determination to conquer her dulness, commenced her lessons; and, whether her present instructor was more versed in the art of teaching than her former one, or, that being young and handsome, she paid greater attention to the game, is unknown; but certainly she soon gained an advantage over her opponent.

"Marie will soon excel her master," said Signor Strozzi, as he leant on the back of her chair; "that was a famous move; another such, and Monsieur Eugene is vanquished. Bravo, bravo, my dear!" he exclaimed, "it is yours. Monsieur's eyes are more on the slender fingers of his adversary than on his own moves."

"All jealousy, uncle," said Marie, archly, glancing towards Eugene; "you could not, or would not, make anything of me and now would raise war between me and my cousin, because he has found out some talent in me."

Eugene was confused; Marie took advantage of it, and rose a conqueror.

* * * * * * * *

As Marie entered her room a woman rose from a seat near the fire, and, with timidity, half advanced to meet her; then, stopping as Marie approached her, she held out her arms, exclaiming in a low, tremulous tone, "Birdie."

"Good Madame Perre," said the signora, offering her hand; but Marie had looked at Rose, and recognized her; and throwing herself into her arms, covered her face with kisses.

"Mother," she cried, "oh! Blanche's mother and mine. How happy your coming to see me has made me."

"Ah! she has not then forgotten me," said Rose. "She remembers and calls me, as she did when a helpless child, mother. Dear Birdie, you will always be the same," she cried, in broken accents.

"Mother," said Marie, still clinging to her, "how often I have thought of you when alone in the darkness and stillness of night. I have talked to you as though you had been present; yes, mother, you and the dear, tender, loving little Blanche."

"Dear Blanche," returned Rose, the tears dropping fast from her eyes; "she would now have been the same age as yourself, had she lived; but the little grave is still there, Birdie, that you used to sleep upon, and cover up so warm, when you quitted it, with your little torn cloak."

In the morning, before breakfast was taken away, Madame de Bleville was announced. With all the fervor of her girlish feelings she embraced her niece, laughing and crying by turns; at the end of every sentence wishing Lucille had lived to see this happy day.

"So you really cannot remember me!" she cried: "cannot recollect Aunt Emile? It is astonishing, when I should have known you anywhere; for, Marie, you are not at all altered, only in size; but Eugene, you remember Eugene——"

"No," said Marie; "but that is not strange, for he must have been but a boy then, and now he is a hands——" she stopped confused, but laughingly added, "now he is a tall, full-grown man."

"But the trout stream, the little fish and old Lion; these scenes have not faded from your memory, surely," said Eugene.

"Brother, take her to the old chateau," said Emile, "the scene of her childhood, and all will return to her."

"Some day," returned D'Almaine, "when I can make my mind up to look myself on those scenes, I will take her there, if she goes not there with another before."

His eye glanced towards Eugene, who leant over the back of a chair, watching Marie, who with her chin resting on the tip of her forefinger, and her large dark eyes fixed on her aunt, seemed recalling recollections all but faded from her memory, as she repeated, "The trout stream—and Lion."

It was the Paris season; and D'Almaine was too proud of his daughter not to introduce her to its gay circles, though Marie, brought up so quietly, would willingly have dispensed with the ceremony, could she have done it with her father's and her aunt's consent; but both thought it so necessary that some of the rust of country life should be rubbed off, to make her talk without blushing, and laugh less, and smile more, that Marie, though she feared she should be a dull scholar in fashionable accomplishments and manœuvreing, entered the world chaperoned by Madame de Bleville.

It was soon understood that Mademoiselle d'Almaine was a rich heiress. This, combined with her great beauty, soon made her sought for; and many noble and advantageous offers for her hand were received by D'Almaine. Many of these offers came from young and handsome men; and as Marie refused one after the other with the most unceremonious coolness, he began to wonder whether she was really a flirt, or if one who had not asked her had found favor in her sight.

He still wondered, while Marie, quite unconscious of giving uneasiness to her father by refusing what she termed the butterflies of a season buzzing around, hailed with delight the last ball which was to emancipate her from late hours, constrained habits, and the smoke and confinement of a metropolitan life.

"Are you engaged for the first quadrille?" asked Eugene, the morning of the ball, as he entered equipped for riding.

"Yes," she answered, in a tone intended to be careless, though it was tinctured with vexation, "I am engaged to Monsieur de Valmont. The engagement is of a week's standing."

"I regret it," said Eugene, "for I had promised myself the pleasure of being your vis-à-vis. But as your relative, your friend, you will permit me to point out to you the deserving from the undeserving—those that follow you for yourself, and those that seek you for fashion or fortune's sake."

"To whom do you allude?" she asked; "the Duke de Valmont, or Monsieur de Nonidi?"

"To both," he replied, "but particularly to the duke, who, under a handsome exterior conceals a specious character; and aided by his mother, an adept in all the arts likely to gain the favor of an inexperienced maiden, you may fall into their snares. But beware of the alliance, Marie," he continued, throwing aside his air of indifference to one of earnestness, "the duke is a spendthrift, a gambler, cold and heartless, and once in possession of your fortune—all he sighs for—you would be left to solitude, when you must bury your wrongs without complaint."

"I will impute your lecture, dear cousin, to its right source," said Marie, the slight shade which had hovered on her brow disappearing as she confidingly placed her hand in his, "and to show you how much I prize your advice, I will, unasked, promise not to answer yes to the man of my choice till I know that you approve of him for my husband."

Their eyes met as the last words were uttered, a deep vermilion spread itself over the cheeks of both, which told a tale to Marie she had been till then unconscious of; her hand fluttered in Eugene's firm pressure, her eyes drooped beneath their long lashes, and she would have given worlds to have recalled the words so innocently pronounced. She struggled to regain her hand as he said in an impassioned tone, "Marie, are you sincere in your declaration?" He checked himself, loosened her hand, and added, in assumed coldness, "I am not so unreasonable to expect such confidence, nor is it necessary, though nature revolts against such characters as the Duke de Valmont; there are many men both of rank and fortune worthy of you. Adieu! I have an appointment at two, and behold, the hand now points to the hour."

CHAPTER XLIV.

One hour after the departure of Eugene, though her tears were dried, Marie still rested in the same chair in deep reverie, so deep that her father entered, took a chair beside her, and had watched several minutes before she was aware of his presence. He gently touched the hand hanging listlessly on the arm of the chair. Startled she rose to her feet.

"Father, is it you?" she exclaimed. "How you alarmed me."

"Alarmed you!" said her father. "I merely awoke you from a deep reverie; tell me, Marie, were you dreaming over the number of hearts you have conquered the last few months?"

She blushed painfully, and would have smiled, but the smile died on her lips. Her father looked scrutinizingly, hoping to meet her glance; but she kept her eyes imperturbably on a small engraving she had taken from the table, and which she was industriously reducing to the smallest atoms.

"Will you be candid?" said her father, after he had watched in vain to catch her eyes, "and answer me the one or two questions I am desirous to put to you."

"I will," she replied, without looking at him.

"Well, then, to begin," said D'Almaine. "Is Eugene the favored lover who has induced you to refuse so many brilliant offers for your hand?"

"Father!" she exclaimed, tremulously, and hiding her face with her hands.

"Eugene, though successor to my title and estates, is at present poor; he is aware that a large part of property is disposable by my will, that I might even marry and exclude him from all inheritance, and with such ideas I have imagined he would, from pride and honor, forbear to ask the hand he might covet. I know not if I am deceived in him, if he clandestinely seeks your favor; if not, I believe him to be so just and honorable that there exists not another man I would so willingly, so freely intrust the future of my child with."

A sunny smile now parted the beautiful lips of Marie, she threw her arms confidingly around her father's neck, and in a voice so low that it scarcely reached him, said, "Father, Eugene has never breathed a word of love to me, but should he, have I your permission to follow the promptings of my heart?"

This was the confidence D'Almaine coveted, and which he had feared never to obtain from the long estrangement of his child; it was with happy feelings he briefly consented, and in timid consciousness Marie withdrew.

A few days after this dialogue Marie was in the library listlessly turning over the leaves of a book, vainly endeavoring to settle herself to read its contents, but thought followed thought so rapidly that throwing the book aside she seated herself to indulge in them. She was lolling with closed eyes in the high-backed leather chair, when Eugene, who had been seeking her, entered.

"Pardon me," he cried, "I fear I have disturbed you, but I have come to say farewell; it is my intention to quit Paris this evening."

"This evening!" she said. "This is indeed unexpected. You have soon grown weary of us all."

"Not so, cousin," he replied; "but I have business in Burgundy. My aunt left me a small estate there—so small," he added, with emphasis, "that I have not had sufficient curiosity to visit it yet, though I have been its possessor three years, and its rental of fifteen hundred francs my whole fortune; but now as I have determined on studying the law, I think it but prudent to put the old house in order, and make it my future residence."

"My father speaks of visiting Burgundy himself in the autumn," said Marie. "I wish I possessed influence sufficient to induce you to defer your journey till then, when we could all go together."

"Your offer is tempting, Marie, but I must have courage to resist it. Surrounded as you are by friends, who have a prior and deeper claim on your regard, my absence will scarcely be noticed."

"You indeed speak coldly, Eugene," she returned. "I am sorry I urged your stay, as you have misconstrued the motive, and turned it into ridicule."

Before she had well ended, her hand was on the handle of the door. He caught it, and drew her to the seat she had vacated.

"Do not leave me in anger, dear Marie; it may be long before we meet again." He hesitated as he took a small paper box from his pocket; then added, "I have brought a trifling remembrance to beg your acceptance of. It is so mere a bagatelle, Marie, that I feel ashamed to ask you to give it a place with your bijouterie, much less to offer it as a souvenir."

He displayed, with evident reluctance, a plain gold bracelet with "L'Amitié" on the clasp, in turquoises.

Marie looked at the motto, and thought had it been "L'Amour" she should have liked it infinitely better; but without comment she smilingly held out her arm to him to clasp it on.

Eugene was some time performing the office; the arm, so round and fair, was an object of admiration, and Marie's long curls all the time were dancing like furtive sunbeams, now on his cheeks, then on his fingers, that his lips lingered between the arms and the curls, longing, yet not daring, to fasten themselves on both. At length he succeeded in making the bracelet fit, but he still retained the hand. Marie, half playfully, half resolutely tried to withdraw it, saying, as she did so, in a slightly tremulous tone, "You will certainly put off that odious journey to Burgundy, Eugene. I fear my father will feel hurt and offended at your quitting our house so suddenly, and the Signor and Signora Strozzi will think it passing strange; while I—but there, what care you for my regrets on the subject; if you did you would never think of it again."

Eugene, who thought he had entered the library with his heart in an iron case, found it impossible to resist this ingenuous appeal; his disengaged arm, by a strange fatality, was in an instant round her waist, and the long, glossy curls were again coquetting with his cheeks and brow. He pressed her passionately to his bosom.

The explanation was short, but it satisfied the lover, and before they quitted the library, which was not till the dinner bell rung, Eugene had promised before he slept their happiness should be ratified by the consent of D'Almaine.

The marriage of Eugene and Marie was arranged to take place in a very few weeks after their betrothal, and invitations were at once despatched to Monsieur and Madame de Vernet to be present at the ceremony, an invitation which was not only gladly accepted by the worthy couple, but the venerable Baroness de Waldenberg proposed to accompany them to the bridal.

It was but rarely that the excellent baroness alluded to her past life, and the young Marie, when eagerly asking the meaning of that melancholy retrospect of the past, could find no one who could enlighten her on the subject. It was not till some years after that she was permitted by her grandmother to read that record of past sorrows, which the baroness had once promised the youthful Ella should be one day hers.

It was a sad tale of blighted hopes, and fair bright young creatures laid in a premature grave; but at the close of this long tale of varied fortunes, we can only give the reader a slight narrative of its principal incidents. The baroness herself had been on the eve of marriage, with a noble and beloved suitor, who was murdered on the wedding morning, to her deep and lasting agony. From that time she devoted herself to the care of two little twin stepsisters, the children of a much loved and deceased stepmother; but here again sorrow awaited her. They both became attached to one young nobleman, who though at first attracted by the sweeter and lovelier of the two, was discouraged by her retiring timidity, and married the other. Nina died of a broken heart, and the young Bertha (Ella's mother) was too much carried away by the gaieties and admiration of fashionable life, and lost both health and happiness by her own folly. At her early death the infant Ella had been taken by her aunt, who, as has been seen, well and nobly fulfilled a mother's duty to another's child.

* * * * * * * *

The little party at Paris were discussing with equal pleasure and surprise this unexpected addition to their bridal guests, when Madame de Bleville entered with beaming looks and a letter in her hand.

"Joys like troubles seldom come alone," she said. "Here is a letter from poor Madeline; she and her husband have arrived at Marseilles after a fruitless journey to Australia in search of our lost treasure, and to-morrow they will be in Paris. What joy is in store for the poor faithful Batiste!"

D'Almaine sighed as he took the letter from his sister. "Nothing is now wanting," he said, "but the presence of one who will never bless us with her angel company again on earth."

"My brother," said Emile, tenderly, "she will be among us, her pure spirit will watch over the bridal vow of her darling child. Do not throw away your blessings in vain repinings for the only one denied you."

D'Almaine kissed his sister's still fair brow, and as he looked on his bright Marie standing in a distant window with her lover, the cloud passed from his brow and he was comforted.

The Lombardo, of Milan, publishes the following curious letter, addressed to the Pope by an old woman, once a celebrated dancer:

"At the advanced age of 78 I humble myself in the dust, and bitterly deplore having occasioned many scandals by dancing in theatres during a period of five and twenty years, and having heaped up enjoyments and riches by the practice of that diabolical art. At this time, when the Roman Government is enduring such great anguish, I venture, unworthy sinner as I am, to come feebly to its aid with the trifling sum of 600 Austrian livres, which I offer as a contribution to St. Peter's penny, imploring at the same time his blessing and prayers for myself, my deceased father, my daughter Charlotte, and her son Eustagio and Elizabeth his wife, and all the children they may have, and finally for all my children and posterity, to the end that the good may triumph and the wicked perish. His Holiness's humiliated servant and sinner,

A tourist on Mont Blanc this season slipped, fell on his back, and then over. He slid down 1,500 feet at an angle of 45 degrees by measurement, at a velocity of not less than 60 miles an hour, over frozen snow covered by little peas of ice-like hail, and being brought up at a crevasse by the collected snow in his clothes, this, owing to the arrangement of his dress at the time of the accident, his trowsers being down, no doubt saved him, by tying his legs together. Dr. Metcalfe was sent for to St. Gervais late that night and arrived there at six A. M. the following morning. He found Mr B., a young gentleman of 19, in a state of collapse, wrapped in cold wet sheets, which were at once removed, and restoratives given until reaction set in. Sensible; no alteration of the pupil; face looking like that of a man four or five days in the water, covered with blood, much swollen; skin off the right side of the nose and face; forehead abraded; hands burnt black on the backs, swollen, the fingers as if the ends were ground down on a coarse grindstone; nails all right; arms and elbows clear from wounds, but bruised from under the left arm to the ankle; the sides scratched in every direction, as if with a sharp currycomb, the right side not marked so high; the calf of each leg on the outside is fairly burnt black and dead, back of the calf unhurt; nates burnt off by the friction, and sides of the thighs the same, these parts being red or white.

The London Press remarks apropos of our war, that, "After all, much as we may deplore the war both for its causes and its incidents, as the parent race of the contending parties, we cannot but hope to see each of them behave with the courage characteristic of their origin; and it is certain that Anglo Saxons seldom have submitted to a peace dictated by an enemy successful only in his first encounter."

The following advertisement has appeared in one of the London newspapers: "A gentleman who is about to leave the house in which he resides, and being desirous to return it to the landlord in the same condition in which he found it, will pay a fair price for 500 full-grown rats, an acre of poisonous weeds and a cartload of rubbish. The weeds to be planted in the garden, the rubbish laid on the doorstep, and the rats suffered to run loose through the house."

BRIG.-GEN. STERLING PRICE,
Of Missouri, Commander of the Rebel Troops at Boonville and Springfield.

STERLING PRICE'S first active service was when he accepted the Colonelcy of a regiment of Missouri cavalry raised by him on the Mexican War. He acquitted himself with such credit that he was made Brigadier-General of volunteers in 1847. He was wounded on the 24th of January in the battle of Cañada, New Mexico, where he commanded. Hughes was commanded at the battle of Sacate Cron de Rosales on the 16th of March, 1848. At the close of the war he resumed agriculture, and he consequently resigned his commission. His recent exploits are too fresh in the public mind to need recapitulation. He associated himself with the rebel Governor Jackson, and behaved ingloriously at the battle of Boonville, lying from the field to his own home. He was once, in conjunction with ex-Governor Jackson, Hales and McCulloch, raised a secession army in Missouri, which he trust will soon be routed by General Fremont, and utterly dispersed. He was born in Virginia, and was a Representative in Congress, from 1845 to 1847, for Missouri.

BRIG.-GEN. WM. S. ROSECRANZ
Commander of the Forces in Western Virginia.

THIS able and vigilant soldier, who has succeeded General McClellan in command of Western Virginia, spent his early youth in Ohio. Having a strong inclination for an active life, he entered the Military Academy at West Point, in 1842, and graduated in July, 1846, receiving an appointment as 2d Lieutenant of the Engineers. He was stationed at West Point as Assistant Engineering from September, 1843, to August, 1844, at West Point; Fortress Monroe, 1844 to August, 1845, Assistant Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, and of Engineering from that date to July, 1846, and again as Assistant Professor of Engineering, August 1847. He was commissioned 1st Lieutenant in March, 1853, but preceding no chance for the active employment of his talent, he resigned his position the next year, and devoted himself to commercial pursuits. Upon the breaking out of the present war he offered his services to the Government, by whom they were gladly received. He was immediately assigned to a prominent position under General McClellan in Western Virginia. Upon the recall of General McClellan to lead the armies of the Potomac, General Rosencranz assumed the chief command in Western Virginia. He is about 39 years of age.

COMMANDER W. D. PORTER.

IF has been the misfortune of several of our bravest and most loyal officers, during the present rebellion to fall under the suspicion of a leaning to Secession. General Harney, Lieutenant Sidney and Commander Porter are instances of this injustice. All of these have triumphantly vindicated their loyalty to their country. The means taken by the enemy to drive Commander Porter into the fatal act of Secession were more than usually atrocious, since forgery was resorted to. He, however, boldly freed his unmerited account, and vindicated his claim to sustain the honor of the flag he has so long and so faithfully served.

W. D. Porter was born in Louisiana, and entered the service in 1813. He has been actively employed at sea about 15 years, and is now commander of the St. Marys, a sloop of 22 guns, and forming a part of the Pacific squadron. His commission of Commander is dated 24th of September, 1855. He is an energetic and skilful sailor, and universally respected.

PILOT KNOB AND ITS SURROUNDING SCENERY, IRON COUNTY, MISSOURI.

THIS remarkable mountain is said to consist almost entirely of metal—indeed, a mineralogist about 20 years ago writes there was no ancient approach to a concrete mass of pure steel than the hill which is now called Pilot Knob. He height from the plain on which it stands is 647 feet, and from its summit a magnificent view can be obtained. To afford our readers some idea of its position, we give its distance from the principal cities. Pilot Knob is about 85 miles from Cairo, 95 miles from New Madrid, 75 from St. Louis, 110 miles from Jefferson City, 62 miles from Rolla, 59 miles from Cape Girardeau, and 15 miles from Fredrickstown. Our beautiful view would be incomplete without our Artist's most interesting letter, which is dated from Ironton, August 30th:—

BRIGADIER-GENERAL STERLING PRICE, OF MISSOURI, ONE OF THE REBEL COMMANDERS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY R. E. ROESLE, ST. LOUIS.

"Sitting on the porch of the well Cronay Hotel at Ironton, now the headquarters of Gen. Prentice, the eye naturally rests upon the noble mountain on our left, which forms the attraction of the landscape, rearing its rocky summit far above the surrounding hills. We cannot resist the temptation to visit it, and obtaining a few horses from the commissary, we start for the village, and mount our horses at once for the famed mountain of iron. The excursion for the last few days of the Iron Company are still in full force, reducing the huge stock of ore on hand, but the mines are not worked, and the Company will cease operations to a few weeks, when the remaining stock of ore will have been converted into bars of pure iron. There is a railroad to the mines at the top of the Knob, but the cars are not running. We are, however, told that we might possibly ride up to the mines on the cars, but that the ascent of the mountain on the engine of such a dangerous, we concluded to make the ascent on horseback, suggested that our horses, having larger lungs and more legitimate experience, would accomplish the undertaking with greater ease than we. So we started; our fiery steeds not taking the iron rails and wooden siders in their way, snorted and reared, while we were looking with considerable apprehension into the rocky gullies and hollows on both sides of the track, appreciating the damage we might possibly sustain by meeting with any sharp edges of the iron rocks. Our nerves were dangerously excited, and when we got up about 400 ft.; and in reality while rode nearer our horses, who began to rear and snort back, thus dragging over a yellow and getting uncomfortably close to the precipice. We, however, succeeded in getting them under safety, and concluded that it was very hard for horses to go up there, as we would lead them astride. On we went, leading our horses, but such a "scrape up stairs" A few hundred feet of climbing convinced us that "horseback" was the better conveyance, and on the next level we mounted, and on we went very well. The mountain, as we ascended, was found to become very steep, and we were looking down simply like a vast open quarry, still that the rocks have the appearance of solid iron. This mine has been worked about 12 years, but seems to be in very good order for the immediate necessity, and as the whole knob is iron the supply may be considered as inexhaustible. The mines are now worked by a force of the Pilot Knob Iron Company, one of the wealthiest stock companies in the State, John S. McIlvain, President; Hon. Francis Preston, Secretary; and H. B. Cronay, Manager. The ore is what is called "specular ore," and from 55 per cent. of pig iron is formed, consisting of only from 60 to 90 per cent. of metal. The ore is worked by a force of about 150 men, and the result is up to 1,000 tons per month, which yields 600 per cent. in a first furnace, and is highly magnetic. This mine is connected with the Pilot Knob furnaces by a horse railroad. There are two furnaces at the foot of Pilot Knob, producing 15 tons of pig iron per day. The engine mines and furnaces employ about 300 men. The company's monthly pay roll amounts to about $18,000 worth of goods per year. Besides the fair there 150 acres of land and employ 125 mules to do the hauling. But in a few days the furnaces will cease to be busy, the mines will be shut up, the mules are sent to the Government, and instead of the iron interest there will be nothing but the provisions and beds; the men will have to look for other employment, and Pilot Knob's furnaces will be idle.

"We have been rusted amidst these masses of iron, and the interests still rising above us, but we cannot think of returning until we have set our feet upon its topmost crest, so we tie our horses and follow a footpath winding up among masses of rock, until we reach the summit. The top of Pilot Knob consists in a huge mass of iron rocks, and the view from the summit is grand beyond description. The whole surrounding country lies beneath the keen gaze of the eye, and the scenery that presents itself to the view is one from the summit of this remarkable mountain. The view from the summit of this remarkable mountain is very extensive and striking; at the foot is Ironton, a little beyond is Arcadia, while many twelve miles or thereabouts distant stands Iron Mount, a small range, almost as notable as Pilot Knob; about 10 or 20 miles to the southwest is Fredrickstown, where General Prentice had his headquarters by the last accounts. Below lies a thread of light in the distance is the river St. Francis, which after flowing south finally empties into the Mississippi near Peyton.

PLANTING THE STARS AND STRIPES ON THE TOPMOST PEAK OF PILOT KNOB.

We publish to-day a very interesting sketch of the planting, for the first time doubtlessly, of the Stars and Stripes upon the summit of Pilot Knob, at which our Artist had the good fortune to assist. We can readily enter into the exhilaration of heart these gallant men must have felt as they saw the flag, for which they were perilling life and estate, expand to the breeze, and which they hailed as prophetic of the day when the wide expanse of Missouri, as far as their eye could reach, should not be darkened by the presence of a traitor! Our readers will perceive that the rugged grandeur of the bare rocks was not a little calculated to impress the minds of the actors present of this remarkable scene.

NOT YET.

By William Cullen Bryant.

Go country, unarmed of the earth!
Go realm to sudden greatness grown!
Not yet, not yet the hour is come
That shall forbid thee overthrown!
Shall traitors stir that proudest bow?
No, Land of Hope and Morning, No!

And we who wear thy glorious name,
Shall we, like recreant, stand aside,
While those who strike at Freedom's life
The deathblow at thy precious heart?
Forth pass the battle-cry, and lo!
Beside thee 'tis a gathering No!

And they who thundered, in our land,
The watchword that shall be its doom,
Hid deep in guilty, midnight councils,
In brave battle-ranged they stand and front,
They clanging arbors, from below,
Send up the hollow wrecking, No!

Rise then the gentle ties which long
Have held the sundered States in one,
And forged the kindly union so strong
For his high work to last—
Her mortal hand no act to throw?
No, by our fathers' memory, No!

Our booming mouths, our iron ways,
Our wide-spread fields of waving corn,
The hoarse Atlantic, with his prey,
The calm, broad Ocean of the West,
And Mexic-Gulf's surrendered Bay,
And look-Hispanic, mean, No!

Not yet the hour is nigh, when they
Who deny to Liberty a day,
Earth's noblest kingdom shall rue not;
"Tread meanly, creature to be no!"
So once art thou, like us, brought low?
No, nothing great but shadows, No!

For now, behold, the sun that gave
His every-other day
Seeing, as old, it grand and new—
Thus angled with its sun-ship—
On clouds above and below:
Writes, in man's sight, the answer, No!—N. Y. Ledger.

ERLE GOWER.

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The day had long since dawned, the sun was high, and he hours streamed into the old apartment, but Erle Gower was not awake. Fatigue, both of mind and body, seemed willing to plead to Erle's eyes the voyages of those by whom his art surrounded.

At first—for an instant only—he imagined the scene upon which upon the previous night he had been a witness of his dream, but a repetition of Philip Arne's act of vengeance soon banished the thought as a reality of the past.

He gave a heavy glance around him, and then, with a sudden bound, leaped from the bed, and hastily dressed himself. Then he paused for a moment in astonishing amazement, and soon within them, stood fiercely at bay.

He seemed perplexed, and, for a time, at a loss to comprehend. It startled him unusually early in the morning, and he was in a cry of alarm, from which he could not escape from the room was unexpected. Not so Philip Arne, for, with a look that bespoke his triumph, he took up a position in the doorway of the adjoining apartment to see his intruder progress. The despatic and fiendish expression of his features betokened all in other him, and exercised some fear, but not one sufficient to calm him.

With a contemptuous look at Erle, Philip Arne surveyed them, but without speaking a word. He was resolved to allow his victim to suffer the pangs of suspense, and, by mockhumber, and how he had suffered himself to be thus entrapped. Philip Arne, however, was not to be baffled. With his usual coolness he began:

"Well, you Tom and glass, that is the mockery reverse who has been prowling about in the dead of the night trying the plate-chest and the valuables, and who, I suppose, has been in the habit of doing so for some time past. Erle, I, examine that one night longer, a thinking, pitied, common burning thief!"

Philip turned a frown, and gave upon him.

"Coward and dastard!" he cried, between his set teeth. "We have yet an account to settle so long and I will not be cheated of it now. Speak!"

"Sir, I have no account to settle with you; you understand, which I" meant by the word. I have no desire to be in your company, and, therefore, I am leaving you. I do not fear you, Philip Arne, and I will not be insulted."

Erle waved his hand in mournful concern, a sad curving on the demeanor, he

"Wherefore is this demonstration? Why am I thus surrounded in so disgraceful a manner? If there be any just cause for such a request, I will submit to the person alone to demand it, no other."

"You will submit to me, Erle Gower!"

"I will submit to justice if my cause be just, and this to a judge at once!" he replied. "We do not ask you a reason for being here, we know as a robber is your art!"

Erle let an answer be hard, and his eyebrows almost touched his cheekbones, but he disdained to utter a single word in reply. He resolved, however, when the time came, not to accept to exact reparation for it.

Philip Arne smiled with a look of triumph.

"Lord Edgremont shall answer for that," he said, wherefore I am now he needn't send to which I have a claim but second to his own."

Philip Arne looked bewildered.

To him alone will I explain the cause of my appearance here," continued Erle, unheeding his meaning, "and to no other."

If a claim to be beneath The roof?" cried Philip Arne, contemptuously. "Why, you must be mad, Erle Gower, or you think me so. My wife has a wish to be alone in these last days of her illness, and I will not have the anguish her kindness of the Lady Maud; her ladyship offers our country cousin, and she wishes to be alone with her affectionate friend and companion."

A slight hand couldn't appeared on the forehead of Erle, and he turned like a forbidden box towards Philip Arne, who, seeing to create his insolence, continued:

"I deem you I will bring that about myself."

Mr. Prince afterward continually to roughly color Erle, but the latter heeded him to the proper, and, in a few words, he gave an account of his adventure.

At the second interval impressively, the servants were aroused, but Philip Arne sparing no hard and cold reserve, and, as he had to be first with such a hasty and intentional evidence, that he, too, answered his laugh upon the floor, and, as he could not deliver to Erle Gower, he would not be a party to the duel. He would not be a party to the duel. He would not be a party to the duel. He

INCIDENTS OF CAMP LIFE.

THE romance of war is a startling contrast to its reality. The two things scarcely resemble each other; nevertheless, the latter doubtlessly has its charms, otherwise one campaign would cure every soldier of his dream of glory. In our present number we have several illustrations of the contretemps of war. On page 277 we give one where the horses, having given up in a storm, that superior animal, man, showed how far two legs were superior to double that number, and dragged the baggage wagon on its way. On the same page we have another instance of what a feather-bed soldier has to expect in a real campaign, for our Artist has sketched the bivouac accommodations of the field officers of General Banks's division on their march from Hyattstown, when, overcome with toil, they laid down in the rain on some straw, and slept through the darkness and storm of an August night. Sometimes our gallant fellows have to put their shoulder to the wheel, and push the baggage train up the hill, as our Artist has drawn on this page. This lets us a little into the rough life of a soldier, and which nothing except an undying love of country could carry him through. On page 284, however, we have a pleasanter incident to celebrate, and that is where the natural ingenuity of the race comes out, and an impromptu oven testifies to our national cleverness, and ministers to the wants of the brave defenders of our flag. The regiment undoubtedly contains men whose names give them every epicurean indulgence, but we question if any French bread, fresh butter, with all the appliances of Delmonico, ever tasted so sweet as the newly-baked bread they got from the primitive oven pictured in our pages. Of a different description is our last illustration of campaign life, the scorching of the farmers' wagons before they are suffered to pass over the Long Bridge into Washington. This measure was highly necessary, for so cunning were the rebels that every means were adopted to give aid and information to the enemy. When we hear that women carried revolvers, gunpowder and percussion caps under their hoops, we can only regret that those instruments did not indicate the dignity of their calling, and "go off" ingeniously at their degraded position. Only last week a wagon-master in Baltimore was arrested charged with making waggons with false bottoms, in which he carried arms and a quantity of revolvers and a number of letters were discovered concealed. A few incidents like these we have pictured in, and the present number throws more light upon a soldier's life than all the biographies of Winfield Scott ever published.

Southern Barbarism—Employment of Savages in War.

HUMANITY blushes at the enormities practised by the rebels in their conduct of the war which they have initiated against the nation. We, in its mildest form, in the North, have said that the South seems inspired with a devilish ingenuity in enhancing its enormities. Firing into railway trains supposed to be carrying troops has been a favorite pastime with the skulking traitors of Missouri. A few days ago an ineffectual attempt was made to blow up a passing train, with all its freight of women and children, near Rolla City, and now we learn that they have taken a more diabolical outrage, which must cause a shudder of horror throughout Christendom—namely, the destruction, on the 16 last., of a railroad bridge on the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad, over Platt river, nine miles east of St. Joseph (Mo.), by which a whole passenger train, containing nearly one hundred inoffensive people—men, women and children—was precipitated into the river, and seventeen killed and others horribly mangled. It appears that the timber supports of the bridge had been nearly burned through, and the fire then extinguished, thus leaving no suspicious appearance about the structure, so that when the train entered the bridge it caught the whole of the weight, resulting in the fearful consequences above stated. It was subsequently discovered that some other bridges on the route to St. Joseph were similarly disabled, and the track destroyed for miles in hope, in order to prevent assistance being conveyed from the town to the wounded victims of this cowardly outrage.

In perfect keeping with these practices, so repulsive to every sentiment of humanity, is the attempt to employ the savages of the Western frontier, in arms against the Government of the United States. Every schoolboy remembers the indignant protest of Lord Chatham, in the British Parliament, against the proposition to employ the Indians in the war with the revolted colonies of the Colonists. "Who," he asked, "is the man that has dared to authorize and associate with our arms the tomahawk and scalping-knife of the savage? To call into civilized alliance the wild inhuman ravage of the woods, to delegate to the merciless Indian the defence of disputed rights, and to wage the horrors of his barbarous war against our brethren? My lords, these considerations cry aloud for redress and punishment. Unless thoroughly done away they will be a stain on the national character."

Yet the excellent which Chatham so rebuked nearly a century ago has been openly resorted to by the rebels, in their insane and demoniac attempt to destroy the nationality of the United States and the laws. The Memphis Avalanche, of the 20th of August, affirms that Albert G. Pike, as Commissioner from the rebel Government, has formed alliances with some of the more noted of the frontier tribes. "Even the wild Camanches," it adds, "a heretofore untamable, are about to be brought under the protection and influence of the Confederate Government, and mustered into its service. It will be a grand sight to see a cavalry brigade of these wild and fierce horsemen of the desert, fish ing the battles of the South! Our Indian army will strike terror into the craven hearts of our mercenary invaders!"

The Albert G. Pike here referred to, and who carried a commission from Jefferson Davis himself, has made a report to the rebel Government, in which he says, in which he says:—

"Notwithstanding a heavy outside influence, a treaty advantageous to both parties was made with the tribes of the Creek nation. Before entering upon the negotiations at the agency, I was called by a unanimous vote of the Council to go with the South, treaty or no treaty. The principal chiefs of the tribe went to the South from the beginning of the negotiation, and the action ratified their action by the treaty. The Creeks will be ready in a few days, and probably a half dozen companies of the Seminoles.

The Helena (Arkansas) Shield of the 10th of August mentions that a large force of Indians was at that date already in the field, destined for Missouri. It says:

"From the Hon. C.W. Adams, of this county, who arrived at home a few days since from the northern part of this State, we learn that on last Monday week thirteen hundred Indian warriors—Southern Indians—crossed the Arkansas river, near Fort Gibson, on the way for Medicine Bluff. These Indians were armed with rifle, butcher knife and tomahawk, and had their faces painted black and red, the other black. We also learn that a regiment of mounted Texans likewise crossed the Arkansas river at Fort Smith for the same destination.

In the presence of such facts, who can wonder that Missouri journals, like the St. Louis Republican, significantly ask if this is a "part of regularity" in warfare? It is proposed to woo that State into "the ambush of Secession?"

Finance, North and South.

JOHN BULL, who gauges everything by a money standard, has not yet fully recovered from the panic which he holds the pursestrings of creation. He believes fully, and rightly enough, that money constitutes the sinews of war, and that the nation which has the great motive power in all the arts and advancements of peace, Accustomed to mould the policy of Europe by loans and stipends, at a time when he is not fighting but himself, he fails to recognise the great fact that steam and its concomitants have built up other commercial and monetary communities besides London, and that New York on the one hand the centres of great financial systems nearly as grand and self-sustaining as his own. When France entered into the Crimean war, albeit as his ally, Bull did not relish the idea of the contribution that she would become his financial if not his military dependency. But the European money market is governed by no other measure of his policy, except the anticipated thrashing, by an appeal to his people in the form of a popular loan, wherein the smaller holder had the precedence of the capitalist. The result was a thoroughly independence of the English Bourse. Bull did not quite comprehend the monetary coup, but thought it, on the whole, "rather clever." He has not yet discovered where the money came from.

Indulging still his traditions of monetary sovereignty, J. B. has what he considers the assent of the United States could never assert its nationality and put down domestic insurrection, except by the aid of the cash which he alone could furnish, and he has put on nine accordingly. Thinking that the Government of the United States must, from necessity, come with hat in hand, bowing obsequiously to the money-changers for the appropriations voted so promptly and lavishly by Congress, he has commenced to knit his brows and button his pockets in advance. The Bank of England is importuned to discount freely for the United States to obtain in Europe anything like the extravagant sums they are asking for. Europe won't lend them!" And the Jewish portion of the London money-market has the hoax which Jeff. Davis invented, as a terror to Englishmen who may be inclined to change English three per cents into American sevens, fully in its mind. The consequence is that it will rest with it to prejudice the British markets, in advance, against the Yankee loan.

Meantime our quiet Secretary of the Treasury, with a calm reliance on the financial strength and patriotic spirit of the country, proffers for the experiment of Louis Napoleon, submits the wants of the Government to the American people, and in from a thousand counties and hidden depositories springs forth the golden fleece, which is to enable the Union to "crush out the spirit of the Hebrew lawgiver's wand! With a confidence and trust in the American Nation and its permanence which so exaggerated the monetary importance of the Old World, and made such unjustifiable prophesying ein weaken, THE AMERICAN PEOPLE voluntarily offer to their Government all the money it requires. The golden currency of Old England is left to Bourgeois channels. Every steamer from Liverpool brings its thousands and tens of thousands of golden sovereigns to glut our banker's vaults and clog the machinery of our trade. The first steals declared and potent, America is financially independent of England and of Europe. New York has already more money than all London may button its pockets, if the thinks it to be interest, or she may invest her hard earnings in bonds countersigned by Chase, or in the more tempting securities which he offers on premises to pay of Venezuela, worth twopence a ream, are substantial representatives of value!

In reference to the popularity of the loan, we copy a paragraph, for the special edification of J. B., from a daily city contemporary:

"The excitement in the popular subscription to the National Loan is on the increase, and the Sub-Treasurer and his assistants, to-day and yesterday, have had their hands full in receiving the latest instalment to the numerous subscriptions tendered through the forenoon. The Associated Banks have also been busy in receiving the sums which each Associated Banks for some means of relief in counting and receiving for the sums tendered as his share in payment of these subscriptions. The amount paid in to-day is of a most gratifying character, and the Sub-Treasurer has been compelled to employ extra clerks to assist him in the immense labor of counting the money. Not the least gratifying circumstance connected with this movement at the high decree of patriotic feeling manifested by the smaller class of subscribers. Many of the latter have come forward with their mite in coming to the assistance of the Government, and this duty is performed with the greatest alacrity. The newest subscription is for a recent events in the Administration and success of the Army and Navy of the country."

The Philadelphia Ledger of the 6th, describes the applications for the loan in that city as "a rush," and adds that the list of subscribers includes "members from all classes of society, mechanics, merchants and capitalists, and of all amounts from $50 to $5,000. Among the subscribers was one old Jack tar, who put down his hard earnings of $100, for the double purpose of patriotically aiding his Government and of securely saving something for a rainy day."

From Boston and Cincinnati in fact from every large city, and for that matter from every small one, we have corresponding reports—all proving that the money and the confidence exists for supporting the Government amply and cheerfully in all the expenditures necessary for restoring peace and reintegrating the Union.

On the other hand, the rebel Government is already bankrupt and discredited. It has resorted to the issue of paltry, irredeemable "shinplasters," which, however small in denomination, are still smaller in value. A correspondent of the Charleston (S.C.) Courier, of a late date, sensibly confesses to the financial troubles of that captious city. He says:

"The Legislature legalized the suspension of specie payments by the banks, and the consequence has become so scarce and so that the wants of the public called for and legalized the issue of small bills by the banks and individuals (five by the banks, and three by the State), which, as a factor, are doled out to the public, and printed contemptibly small, the majority of them being about the size of a watch-paper. The larger rent a twenty-cent bill, which was 'tattered and torn.' In the end the bills to be redeemed, and the answer was that they had no new bills. It appears at such a premium that the banks redeemed often at forty cents for one hundred dollars."

The Richmond (Va.) Enquirer is hardly less lugubrious on the same subject. It moans as follows:

"Gold and silver are now selling in the Southern States at from 16 to 15 per cent. for current bank bills. A sound and well-arm currency is as much the life blood and vigor of the Confederacy and the Government as healthy red blood is to the power and endurance of the body. The issue of a depreciated currency is just now more to be feared than all of Lincoln's legions. It is want of confidence in the currency that has caused the depreciation. It is deplorable that the banks should be exempt by law from the liability to redeem their issues in specie, and at the same time, still the very gold and silver with which it ought to be redeemed for it is the duty of the banks to redeem their issues in specie—is bought up by brokers and sent to Europe, or else it is hoarded by individuals and withheld from circulation. The banks are ready for a few dollars to crush the Government and the people. Shame!"

New Orleans reduces the dismal cry through the columns of the Delta, and in the following note of woe:

"Every bank, every turn and village corporation, even the State itself, and private bankers, are defacing the State with wretched currency, in order to get gold. Gold and silver, the true and silver are exactly bought at eight per cent. premium for those notes, and exported. The rebel Government has exported gold and silver to the amount of millions, but when it begins to decline it will be bought up by brokers and sent out as an investment, and all of which will fall upon the people and ruin them as effectually as the bonds of the corporation. And yet it was gravely proposed in the Legislature to issue $5,000,000 of shinplasters. Such is the sound sense and ear engaged in this gigantic fraud, and receive and pay out shinplasters as they do their own notes."

North Carolina.

THE capture of Forts Clark and Hatteras is likely to prove of more consequence as a publication than in military results. Late advices represent that thousands of the people of Eastern North Carolina are flocking to the captured fortress, and voluntarily subscribing to the oath of allegiance to the United States. White flags are displayed at every conspicuous point; the fort at Ocracoke Inlet, 40 miles to the south of Hatteras, has been abandoned, and every indication is to the effect that the Union sentiment is predominant and only required the dispersion of the rebels in arms to find expression. This, too, in the Eastern part of the State, where the secession fever has had strength enough for the Western part of the State, like Western Virginia, and the whole region between the Alleghanies, has never been, otherwise than thoroughly loyal. It is said that, at the late Congressional election, Union candidates were chosen in every district, and that the Union men will have a fair representation in the next Congress. Colonel Foster, who ran openly in one of the Western districts and was elected, is already in Washington, and has communicated that about three-fourths of the people are sound Union men, who only require Government support to redeem the State from rebel rule.

It is well known that North Carolina was forced into Secession by the same fraudulent practices which succeeded in Virginia and Tennessee, but which failed in Maryland, Missouri and Kentucky. An attempt was made at a State Convention, for the arrest of Secession, was made on the 28th of February last, but was defeated by the votes of the people's party. Taking advantage of the excitement created by the attack on Fort Sumter, and under the pressure of Virginia on one side and South Carolina on the other, the Secession Convention was summoned and made to secure a Secession Convention early in May, which was successful, and on the 20th of that month, this body, in violation of the constitution of the State, withdrew North Carolina out of the Union. But the heart of her people were never with the traitors at Montgomery and Richmond, and, as we have already said, the will be found to be loyal to the back bone. Like another, whenever the military despotism that weighs her down shall be lifted by the Federal arm. This is abundantly proved by the recent events at Hatteras, which gave special significance to the language of the Raleigh Register, the organ of rebellion at the capital of the State. It says that "for the credit of the State" it forbears "to describe the effect produced in the House of Commons by the reading of the despatch announcing the capture of the forts on Hatteras Inlet." In other words, Southern suppressed Union sentiment openly manifested itself when it became known that the Federal Government had the will and the power to strike a decisive blow, and treason in its capital no longer intended to contest itself with fulminating proclamations from the Capitol.

Sleeping on his Post.

ORIN INMAN advices from Washington convey the gratifying intelligence that Private William Scott, of Vermont, convicted by Court Martial of sleeping on his post, and sentenced to be shot, has had his sentence commuted by the President. We are glad to hear it, not because we disapprove of the strictest and severest punishment for the offence, but in the face of an enemy, but because we think big delinquents should be punished before little ones. There is no propriety in shooting Private Scott, while General Patterson is left to go at large. He slept at his post at Charlestown, in the Shenandoah Valley, and allowed Johnston, whom he was deputed to watch, to escape to Manassas, and turn the tide of battle against the Union forces at Bull Run, whereby the cause of the Union was disgraced, and the Capitol of the Nation imperilled. Six hours after General Scott, in Washington, was informed of the departure of Johnston from Winchester, and when his force was half-way to Manassas, General Patterson telegraphed to headquarters for reinforcements, on the plea that "the enemy had been reinforced, and was moving on him with 42,200 men!"

If ever there was a case of flagrant, unpardonable, criminal "sleeping on his post," it was that of Patterson at Charlestown; and so long as he escapes the penalty imposed on the offence by military law, we expect to see no privates shot for simple drowsiness.

Mr. Nelson, of East Tennessee, has at last gone over to the enemy. It is to be wished there had been more of the ancient Roman in him, but while we regret his defection we must not forget that circumstances have evidently prevented the Federal Government from extending to the loyal Tennesseeans that aid and succor which they had for three months so earnestly demanded, and which has saved Western Virginia to the Union. In his address to the Tennesseeans Mr. Nelson speaks with considerable bitterness of the apathy shown by the authorities in Washington:

"While I did not promise allegiance or active support to the Southern Confederacy, and will not advise you to assume any obligations contrary to your convictions of duty, I feel perfectly free to say that the failure of the Government of the United States for four long months to sustain us in our position, its apparent inability to do so, since the battle of Manassas, within any reasonable time, the deliberate action of our State in the August election, the assurances of public men that no test oath or drafting measures will be adopted or required, the mutual hatred which has grown up between the antagonistic sections of the Union, and the recent confiscation laws which have been either adopted or proposed on both sides, as well as other causes, have painfully impressed my own mind with the belief that, unless some wonderful and improbable change is effected, our beloved Union is gone for ever, and it is our policy and duty to submit to a result which, however we may deplore it, seems to be inevitable."

The War Loan in Canada.—The Canadians are investing so largely in the National loan as to cause considerable uneasiness for the solvency of the savings banks of Montreal and Quebec, which have been compelled to raise money at a great disadvantage, in order to pay depositors desirous of changing their investments.

The Hatteras Prisoners.—The prisoners captured at Fort Hatteras have been transferred from the Minnesota to Castle William and Bedloe's Island, where, although closely guarded, they are humanely cared for. Their rations are the same as those of the regular United States soldiers. Commodore Barron is at Bedloe's Island, at which he is allowed the liberty, under special guard, and resides in a small house intended for officers. Fort Schuyler will probably be filled up for any more prisoners that may be forwarded here.

The Vote of Approval.—The third section of the act of Congress, providing for "the increase of the pay of privates in the regular army and of the volunteers in the service of the United States and other purposes," approves the acts and measures of President Lincoln, consequent on the attack on Fort Sumter. It is as follows:

"Sec. 3 And be it further enacted, That all the acts, proclamations and orders of the President of the United States, after the 4th of March, 1861, respecting the army and navy of the United States and calling out or relating to the militia or volunteers from the States, are hereby approved, and in all respects made legal and valid, to the same intent and with the same effect as if they had been issued and done under the previous express authority and direction of the Congress of the United States."

Southern Tribute to General McDowell.—The Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle, reviewing General McDowell's report of the battle of Bull Run, pays that officer the following tribute:

"McDowell makes no display in his report, but it is a plain detail of his movements, and it shows that he arranged and fought the battle as well as any of Lincoln's Generals, with their troops, could have done, not excepting General Scott. He managed it admirably in every respect, and was very nearly successful."

The New York Courrier des Etats Unis contains a letter from the Editor-in-chief, who resigns his place now that he can no longer oppose the war and counsel treason through its columns. He says that since the Journal of Commerce, the News and the Day Book have deserted the cause, it is needless for a paper printed in a different language to oppose the popular sentiment, and he abandons the American people to their own fate. We think they will survive the blow.

The Privateer Jeff Davis.—This vessel which for two months has been so annoying to Northern commerce, was wrecked on the 16th of August, in endeavoring to cross the bar of San Augustine, Florida, to which port she belonged. She is a total loss, with her guns and ill-gotten spoils. It is believed that the wreck will prove a complete obstruction to the harbor, and become an efficient aid to the blockading fleet. It is a disgrace to the navy that she was not captured long ago.

An Empire Transferred.—As the Southern rebellion is unequalled for its wickedness, its punishment will be equally signal. Retribution already prepares to strike. Its fancied strength and chief temptation, cotton, has ruined it. It is impossible to observe the action of England without being convinced that she is about to call a rival to fill the throne hitherto occupied by that imperious despot, American Cotton. The South reckoned that cotton would terrify England into a recognition of a Slave Power, and a consequent war with the United States. She will find herself mistaken—instead of being considered the indispensable, she has become the superseded. Her madness has given her hitherto neglected rivals the opportunity they wanted. China, Algeria, Central America, and India have already received the encouragement which will virtually abolish slave labor in the Southern States. The sceptre has departed from Judah! and we may be sure much to England's satisfaction, for it has gone sadly against her pride to be so dependent upon one nation for her great staple. Henceforth her own colonies will chiefly supply her mills. Looked at in this light, the present rebellion assumes the appearance of a great step in human progress, accessary for the full development of American industry, freedom, and genius—as well as the perfect triumph of our Republican institutions.

Terror is always cruel. The Southern editors, judged by this standard, are in an agony of mortal fright. It is evident from the following extract from a violent article in the Montgomery (Ala.) Mail, that the Southern Confederacy are about embroiling themselves with foreign powers. The idea of compelling foreigners to fight their battles shows the extreme brutality to which rebellion has reduced them.

"We admonish these aliens, spies and villains, whether native or foreign born, not to lay the flattering unction to their souls that the outside platter of loathsome smiles and hypocrisy under which they think they conceal the treason and villainy which rankle in their black hearts, deceive us. We tell them that their cloaks are as gossamer webs—their treachery is exposed to the gaze of a public becoming more and more indignant every hour. We tell them that we cannot answer for the consequences which their meanness and enormous villainy may soon bring upon their detestable carcases. We advise them to make haste to take themselves, bag and baggage, to their own place, lest, like Judas, their journey be expedited.

"It makes our blood boil with rage to see men—men whom we know rejoice at the death and wounds of our kindred and our friends, received on the bloody field of battle. The very sight of these hypocritical traitors and spies makes us nervous. We pass them, and we could slay them as we would a mad dog. Still the compassion of our forbearing nature induces us to warn them of the storm of indignation and wrath which is gathering in portentous blackness, and which may burst in a sudden in terrible fury upon them. We put a small value upon our own life in this scale—we put much less upon the lives of hypocritical, perfidious and detestable spies and traitors."

Their worst enemy could not have written anything worse of them and their cause than this.

History of the War.—Frank Leslie is publishing an excellent Pictorial History of the War, which will commend itself to those who wish to preserve a reliable and faithful record of the present contest. It is well illustrated, and ably edited by E. G. Squier, the faithful and well-known historian. No one can do this work better than he, and we are glad that so able and impartial a pen has assumed the task. Issued semi-monthly, at twenty-five cents a part.—Lorain Co. News, Oberlin, Ohio.

New York State Democratic Convention.—The New York State Democratic Convention, which assembled at Syracuse on the 4th, adjourned on the 5th, after making the following nominations:

David R. Floyd Jones, Secretary of State.
George F. Comstock, Judge of Court of Appeals.
George F. Scott, Comptroller.
Lyman Tremaine, Attorney-General.
Francis C. Bronck, Treasurer.
Jarvis B. Lord, Canal Commissioner.
W. W. Wright, Canal Commissioner.
Wm. C. Rhodes, State Prison Inspector.

First among the resolutions adopted by the Convention is the subjoined:

Resolved, That in this crisis the watchword which should pass through the Democratic ranks calling them together and consolidating them in one erect and determined mass in defence of our imperilled country, is the sentiment of Andrew Jackson, that "the Union must and shall be preserved."

The Income Tax.—The Income Tax, authorized by Congress, goes into effect on the 1st of January, 1862, and is payable on incomes received during the present year. The 49th section of the law is as follows:

"The tax herein provided shall be assessed upon the annual income of the persons hereinafter named for the year preceding the time for assessing said tax, to wit, the year next preceding the 1st of January, 1862."

All persons, therefore, who, during the current year, are in receipt of incomes exceeding $800 a year, must pay their tax at the rate of three per cent. on the whole amount in excess of that sum. It is provided, however, that, in estimating incomes, all national, state or local taxes assessed upon property from which an income is derived shall be first deducted.

Increase in Railway and Canal Traffic.—The receipts of the New York Central Railway for the 11 months terminating Sept. 1st were $518,040 in excess of those of the corresponding months of last year. The increase on the Erie road is $508,428. The amount of grain passing through the Erie Canal since May 1st is 9,219,418 bushels in excess of the amount for the same period last year.

New York Subscriptions to the Loan.—The following figures show the daily subscriptions to the Great National Loan in New York city, for the week ending Sept. 7:

By Individuals.	Last week.	Previous week.
Monday	$340,000	$128,000
Tuesday	307,000	147,000
Wednesday	818,000	171,000
Thursday	575,000	200,000
Friday	347,000	174,000
Saturday	402,000	300,000
Total Individuals	$2,780,000	$1,220,000
Paid in by Banks	5,600,000	3,500,000
Total for the week	$8,380,000	$4,720,000
Total for the fortnight		$13,100,000
Previously—By Banks	$3,500,000
Individuals	566,000
		4,066,000
Total paid up to date		$17,175,000
Balance of first Bank guarantee		17,825,000
Total allotted to New York to 15th October		$35,000,000

Specie in New York City.—The stock of specie in New York, as returned by the Banks and Sub-Treasury, shews but slight variation from $54,000,000 in the last three or four weeks, viz.:

Specie.	In Bank.	Sub-Treasury.	Total.
August 17	$49,753,000	$4,380,000	$54,133,000
August 24	47,119,000	6,937,000	54,056,000
August 31	45,048,000	8,651,000	53,949,000
Sept. 7	42,000,000	13,094,000	55,094,000

Vanity Fair ridicules the Southern Commissioners in Europe in rollicking rhyme, and in view of their failure, past, present and future, concludes:

"So let her Yanceys once more brave the floods,
Her Dudley Manns pack up their Manly Duds,
And hasten home again!"

Vanity Fair also recommends that, as it has been proposed to get up a testimonial for Beauregard in England, one should be started here for Nena Sahib, the persecuted Sepoy patriot of India!

Divided Counsels.—A Fredericksburg correspondent of the New Orleans Delta complains of "divided counsels" in the rebel Government. While one portion is in favor of "a short, sharp and decisive war policy," there is another portion "who think that a delay of a few weeks will produce a peaceful and satisfactory settlement of this controversy without further bloodshed; that the intervention of the European Powers, the uprising of a peace party at the North, will effect this result; that the Northern people, now languid and discontented in regard to this war, might be aroused to gigantic efforts by a movement which, though not aggressive, in fact, they would so represent to their people, and perhaps excite a war frenzy surpassing that which followed the downfall of Fort Sumter."

The profundity of British ignorance of American affairs is fathomless. The last number of the London Dispatch, in an article on the war, bitterly hostile to the North, portrays our sufferings in strong language. Trade, it says, is in such a desperate condition that "New York paper can be cashed in Chicago only at a discount of 60 per cent." The national securities, it represents, are "29 per cent. below par," and the "Government reduced to the issue of dollar notes." We hardly need add that the Dispatch is in favor of Secession.

Here and There.—The Minister of War in France is a Marshal of the Empire, and the Minister of Marine is an Admiral of experience. The Secretary of War of the United States is a small politician, and a rather successful operator in railway jobs and wildcat banks; and the Secretary of the Navy is a still smaller politician, who was once a very poor editor in Hartford, and subsequently the holder of a $1,800 clerkship in the Navy Department, under Mr. Bancroft! The result, in the two countries, is precisely what might be anticipated—intelligence and efficiency in the one case, and ignorance and inefficiency in the other.

Union Victory at Lexington, Missouri.—Lexington, Lafayette county, Missouri, was the theatre, on the 29th August, of a brilliant action between the rebels, numbering 4,000 men, and a body of Home Guards and United States troops, amounting to about 430 men. The attack was made by the rebels early in the day, but after a short conflict the enemy was repulsed, with the loss of 60 men. There were only a few wounded on the side of the Union. The Union forces since then had been reinforced by an Illinois regiment, under the command of Colonel Marshall, and a portion of a regiment of Home Guards, under Colonel McClung, numbering in all about 1,200 men. This would make the Union forces nearly 1,700 men. There were also two regiments marching to join them from Jefferson city. When near Georgetown, the Illinois regiment was fired at by a person from a window, with a double-barrelled shot gun, and one man killed and another wounded. The person firing was captured, and proved to be Colonel Magoffin, the leader of the Secessionists in Pettis county. He is now a prisoner.

Dirty Hands.—The purveyors of the press are sometimes very funny. We have ourselves been very reluctantly compelled to allude to the "dirty hands" of some of the Cabinet, but now the Maine Republican publishes the confession of the Vice-President that his own hands are dirty, and not fit to be shaken by a neighbor. We quote the exact words:

"Since his recent return from the Capitol, one of his neighbors called upon Vice President Hamlin, at his farm at Hampden, Maine, and the Vice-President come up to him out of the cellar, and excused himself from shaking hands, remarking at the same time that his hands were dirty, for he had been picking over his potatoes."

Happy Republic! when in such times as these the wife of the President employs her leisure in shopping, and the Vice-President whiles away his leisure in "picking over his taters!"

It has been our painful duty to call attention on several occasions to the lax administration of the War Department. The Herald, of the 8th September, however, makes so serious a charge against Mr. Cameron that, if true, that eminent member of the Cabinet ought at once to be dismissed. The Herald says, alluding to the strife between the Governor of Pennsylvania and Mr. Cameron:

"The bitterness between these two chiefs has been so great, that the most important business letters concerning movements of troops reaching the War Department, known to emanate from Governor Curtin, and addressed to Simon Cameron, have not been opened."

If we should get rid of our War Minister without another Bull Run we shall be fortunate.

DOMESTIC ITEMS.

A pamphlet, containing all the information necessary in reference to subscriptions to the national loan, is being prepared, and will soon be published under the auspices of the Treasury Department.

The following sums were in the different depositories and branch mints of the United States in the seceded States at the time these States rebelled, and were stolen from the Government:

New Orleans	$576,404
Richmond	14,097
Norfolk	11,795
Wilmington, N. C.	6,088
Savannah	4,874
Mobile	18,2 5
Nashville	4,880
Galveston	2,881
Norfolk	1,413
Little Rock, Ark	53,692
Tallahassee, Fla.	678
Charlotte, N. C. (branch mint)	32,000
Dahlonega, Ga. (branch mint)	27,050
Total	$718,998

The steamer Northern Light, just in from the Isthmus, brought 30,000 stand of arms from California, a portion of the 50,000 stand sent to that State by Floyd.

The receipts of flour and grain by the railroads leading into Chicago from the West, during the six days ending August 26th, were as follows:

Flour	31 800	barrels.
Wheat	765,803	bushels.
Corn	1,290 272	"
Oats	95 953	"
Rye	9,161	"
Barley	2,050	"

Reducing the flour to wheat, the entire receipts of grain during the week amount to 2,323,089 bushels. Compared with former years, this is the largest amount of grain ever received in any one week in the history of the grain trade in Chicago.

On the 2d inst. a train of cars, one mile and a quarter and thirty rods in length, passed through Rochester over the Central Railroad for the West. It was drawn by five locomotives.

The following order has been issued by Lieutenant-General Scott:

Headquarters of the Army,
Washington, August 3.

The General-in-Chief is happy to announce that the Treasury Department, to meet the payments to the troops, is about to supply besides coin, as heretofore, Treasury notes, in $5, $10 and $20. They are as good as gold at all banks and Government offices throughout the United States, and most convenient for transmission by mail from officers and men to their families at home. Good husbands, fathers, sons and brothers serving under the Stars and Stripes will thus soon have the ready and safe means of relieving an immense amount of suffering, which could not be reached with coin. In making up such packages every officer may be relied upon, no doubt, for such assistance as may be needed by his men.

By command of Lieutenant-General Scott,
E. D. TOWNSEND, Adjutant-General.

A large meeting was recently held at Newport, Kentucky, which was addressed by Senator Johnson, of Tennessee. The following is the eighth resolution adopted by the meeting:

"We are for peace—every good Union man deprecating war; and we demand that this war shall cease at the earliest possible moment; that is to say, so soon as it can be obtained with American honor, so soon as all rebels lay down their arms and treason is properly punished, and our old flag floats over every foot of our soil. The last dodge of the Secessionists in this city for 'peace' is a trap too transparent to catch even the weak and simple."

At a regular meeting of the New York Chamber of Commerce, held Sept. 5th, the following, among other resolutions, was adopted:

"Resolved, That this Chamber pledges to Government its unfaltering support in a vigorous prosecution of the war until every rebel has laid down his arms, and every State has returned to its allegiance. The contest, it believes, admits of no other termination, since any other basis of peace would dishonor the nation and prove to the world that our cherished form of popular government is a failure."

The issue of the demand Treasury notes, $5's and $10's, is being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. About $250,000 per day is thrown out now, and the first of next week $500,000 per day will be issued. Ten clerks are employed in signing and countersigning them. For the signature of the whole issue of $50,000,000 of demand notes, the labor of one man for seven years would be required.

On the morning of the 6th of September, Gen. Grant, commanding at Cairo, with two regiments of infantry, one company of light artillery, and two gunboats, took possession of Paducah, Ky. He found Secession flags flying in various parts of the city, in expectation of greeting the arrival of the Southern army, which numbered about 4,000 men, and which was about 16 miles distant. The citizens, however, quickly tore down the flags upon the arrival of our troops. General Grant took possession of the telegraph office, railroad depot and the marine hospital, and at once issued the following proclamation:

"I have come among you, not as an enemy, but as your fellow-citizen. Not to maltreat or annoy you, but to respect and enforce the rights of all loyal citizens. An enemy in rebellion against our common Government has taken possession of and planted its guns on the soil of Kentucky, and fired upon you. Columbus and Hickman are in his hands. He is moving upon your city. I am here to defend you against this enemy, to assist the authority and sovereignty of your Government. I have nothing to do with opinions, and shall deal only with armed rebellion and its aiders and abettors. You can pursue your usual avocations without fear. The strong arm of the Government is here to protect its friends and punish its enemies. Whenever it is manifest that you are able to defend yourselves, and maintain the authority of the Government, and protect the rights of loyal citizens, I shall withdraw the forces under my command.

N. S. GRANT,
"Brigadier-General Commanding."

Latest Intelligence.

The Gubernatorial election in Maine was held on the 9th. Returns from 71 towns give Washburn (Rep.), 20,343; Jameson (Dem.), 8,161; Dana, (White feather), 5,205. The Legislature, as previously, is largely Republican.

Major-General McClellan has issued the following order in the case of Private Scott:

Headquarters of the Army of the Potomac,
Washington, Sept. 8, 1861.

Private Wm. Scott, of Company K, of the Third Regiment of Vermont Volunteers, having been found guilty by Court Martial of sleeping on his post while a sentinel on picket-guard, has been sentenced to be shot, and the sentence has been approved and ordered to be executed. The commanding officers of the brigade, the regiment and the company of the condemned, together with many other officers and privates of his regiment, have earnestly appealed to the Major-General Commanding to spare the life of the offender, and the President of the United States has expressed a wish that as this is the first condemnation to death in this army for this crime mercy may be extended to the criminal. This fact, viewed in connection with the inexperience of the condemned as a soldier, his previous good conduct and general good character, and the urgent entreaties made in his behalf, have determined the Major-General Commanding to grant the pardon so earnestly prayed for. This act of clemency must not be understood as affording a precedent for any future case. The duty of a sentinel is of such a nature that its neglect by sleeping upon or deserting his post may endanger the safety of a command or even of the whole army, and all nations affix to the offence the penalty of death.

Private William Scott, of Company K, of the Third Regiment of Vermont Volunteers, will be released from confinement and returned to duty.

By command of MAJOR-GEN. McCLELLAN.

Railroad Catastrophe.—On Monday a fiendish outrage was committed on the Baltimore Railroad train, by which several cars containing some of the Ira Harris cavalry regiment were thrown from the track, near Cockeysville, on the North Central. The engineer, a Baltimore man, and strongly suspected of being a rebel, upon seeing the fatal result of his recklessness detached his locomotive, and, leaving the train behind, hurried on to Baltimore, where he was arrested. The soldiers fired upon him as he escaped with his engine. His name is Frederick Gumback. We trust the Government will execute summary justice upon this ruffian and the Assistant Superintendent, Samuel D. Young. We regret to add that six of our gallant troops were killed and fifteen wounded. Both Young and Gumback have been arrested.

We have the gratifying intelligence from Washington that the Government intends soon to put afloat two more expeditions for the Southern coast. Their exact destination is, of course, not known, but it is surmised that South Carolina and Georgia will be the next recipients of Federal attention.

It is reported that ten regiments have been sent from Virginia to North Carolina to reassure the rebels, and resist the anticipated advances of the Federal troops.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER LXII.

Lord Kingswood, when he had turned the key upon Erle Gower, requested Philip Avon and those who surrounded him to keep the confinement of the former as a prisoner a secret for the present.

There was one person, however, who had watched with much though concealed indignation the whole proceedings, except the process of locking the prisoner in his cell, and listening to Lord Kingswood's injunctions to the servants to maintain secrecy. That person was Lady Maud's own maid.

She withdrew herself from the scene before the final turning of the key in the lock by Lord Kingswood, and made her way direct to Lady Maud's apartments, in one of which she knew she should be sure to find her.

Common-sense and a still tongue mostly keep company, and if the girl had her full share of curiosity, and perhaps a little more than her share of superstitious fears, she still possessed a certain amount of discrimination, which, exercised in every-day matters, but especially in her own private affairs, did duty for a very decent kind of worldly wisdom.

"I wish he would, my lady; for, as sure as my name is Susan Harebell, he wouldn't allow that horse to be shot," exclaimed the girl, emphatically.

Certainly not," exclaimed Lady Maud, with a heated flush upon her face. "Both my cousin Cyril and Lord Kingswood would be exceedingly angry if so cruel and brutal an act were committed. Mr. Philip Avon had neither the right to issue such an order, nor the power to have it executed, if he did arrogate the right to give it."

"Mr. Philip Avon, when he came here this morning, my lady," returned the girl, artfully working round to her point, "stormed at the grooms because his order has not yet been obeyed."

"Is Mr Philip Avon at the Hall now?" inquired Lady Maud, with a slight contraction of the brows.

"Oh dear, yes my lady," replied Harebell; "indeed, he has quite upset the whole household."

Lady Maud looked at her with an expression of alarm, but did not speak.

"Your ladyship does not perhaps, know that Mr. Philip Avon came here last night just after midnight with some officers, and said that burglars were in the old library."

"In—in—in the old library?" ejaculated Lady Maud, turning white.

"Yes, my lady—but, oh dear me, perhaps I ought not to tell your ladyship anything about it, as your ladyship is in delicate health," exclaimed the girl, cunningly interrupting herself.

"Everything, my dear Harebell!" cried Lady Maud, quickly; "everything, do not omit a single occurrence you may be acquainted with."

"Well, my lady, I do not know much, but what little I do I shall be happy to communicate to your ladyship," she answered. "You must know, then, that just before we were going to retire for the night, and while we were talking over how Lady Kingswood ordered Mr. Pharisee to be horsewhipped through deeper and more settled became her aversion to Philip Avon, and how fixed her determination to d rather than to become his!

Lady Maud was indeed greatly disturbed by what she heard—not so much upon her own accou as upon Erle's. She had formed a pretty just estimate of Philip Avon's vindictive nature, and she w fully prepared to learn that he had made to Lord Kingswood all the most malicious representatio respecting Erle which a wicked invention could construct. She had received from him abunda proofs that he knew by surmise of the love existing between herself and Erle, and she did not dou but that he would make the basest use of that knowledge, unprepared as he was to substantiate it proof. She had a presentiment that he had before Lord Kingswood preferred a charge against E of having surreptitiously endeavored to gain her affections.

It was her wish therefore to help Erle to escape if she could. She knew not how it was to be do but if it were to be done, and she the instrument to effect it, what happiness it would be to her!

Her thoughts, at first wild, vague, wandering, unconnected, took eventually this shape, and wh they had done so, the consideration how the escape was to be effected followed also.

It was necessary that she should see him and arrange the means for his flight. It did not, howev occur to her that he was locked within the chamber in the eastern wing, and that Lord Kingsw had got the key, nor did it suggest itself that the door of his prison was watched, likewise as was window, which overlooked the Chace without. She only got at a portion of these disturbing facts making her maid Harebell repeat the latter portion of her story. Then she comprehended indeed t Lord Kingswood was himself Erle's jailor, and that one of the servants was appointed warden with his chamber.

It was at this very moment, when both were silent and deep in perplexing thought, that a messe arrived from Lord Kingswood, requesting Lady Maud to attend him in his library.

Lady Maud grew pale and then flushed. She rose up and sank down in her seat again. She ha painful apprehension of his reasons for holding an interview with her, and she dreaded her want power to sustain it.

"Do not be alarmed, my lady. Remember, you know nothing about Mr. Erle's presence h until I acquainted you with it. And if I should be wanted to speak to it I'll say something I warr

THE FLOTILLA OF FEDERAL GUNBOATS FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RIVERS, UND

This discrimination enabled her to see the propriety of employing tact when bringing the incarceration of Erle to Lady Maud's notice. If it is true that a woman, without appearing to inform herself about them, will quickly become mistress of the habits of a beloved object, it is especially true that a servant, if attached, will, with seeming unconsciousness, soon conquer the secrets of her mistress, and in doing this, acquire a very shrewd conception of her inner nature. This young girl, having almost intuitively fathomed Lady Maud's secret, as instinctively knew that she must confine the discovery to her own breast, or at least not even broach the subject to Lady Maud; but at the same time she, with the art—in some instances bewitching—of her sex, knew how and when to speak of Erle in a manner pleasing to her young mistress, without giving her an inkling that she had realised the truth of the relation subsisting between them.

On the present occasion she, on seeing Lady Maud standing at the window of her sitting-room, gazing wistfully at the landscape beyond, her wishes carrying her beyond its limit, companioned by the only one who had, she believed, the power to make her happy in this world, took not the slightest notice of her, but appeared to busy herself by performing some of her duties in the room. She, however, furtively watched every motion of her young lady's, until she heard her heave a deep sigh and saw her remove from her station at the window and sink into a lounging-chair.

Then she coughed twice or thrice to draw Lady Maud's attention, and at last, finding that the latter raised her thoughtful eyes from the floor, and turned them upon her inquiringly, she said,

"Does your ladyship, if you please, know whether it is likely that Mr Cyril will shortly come down to the Hall?"

"I do not know. I don't think it is likely that Mr. Cyril will return to the Hall again for some time."

the park. Well, my lady, as I was saying," she continued, "Mr. Philip Avon came at the time I mentioned, and had some private talk with the butler, and then, after midnight, he came again with two officers, and then they and some of the men-servants hurried to the old library and searched it all over, and when they had done hunting, Mr. Philip Avon and the officers watched all night in the Chace, and then, when the sun was up, they came again to the Hall, and Mr. Philip said he was sure there was somebody concealed in the old part of the Hall, and the old library and old picture gallery were searched, but nobody was found; then the old chambers were thought of, and they hurried to them, and oh, my lady, what do you think—but lor', your ladyship can never guess what happened. When they went to ransack the old rooms, and they had got into the dreary, haunted old bed-room, they found asleep, in a slumber as gentle and peaceful as that of a tired child on a summer's afternoon, Erle Gower."

Lady Maud, striving her utmost, could not repress a groan. It burst agonised in tone from her lips, and she turned from the girl to conceal her emotion.

"It was Mr. Philip Avon who first saw him," continued the girl; "and when Mr. Erle, handsomer than ever, leaped off the bed and made his way into the next room, where he stood at bay, then Mr. Philip Avon taunted him cruelly. Such a scene followed! They all set on him, and he [illegible] only one by himself, and dragged him down the staircase to take him away to prison on the pretence that he was a thief, when—thank Heaven! my lady, Lord Kingswood arrived and saved him."

The tears stood thickly in the girl's eyes, as, clapping her hands together, she made the last observation.

Lady Maud trembled violently. She once or twice essayed to speak, but found the effort too much for her. She could only clasp her hands together and await the conclusion to this unwelcome and unfortunate event. How much

Mr. Avon won't quite like; and besides, my lady, by-and-bye I will——never mind, wait till yo me again, my lady. I shall know then something more than I have told you."

Lady Maud rose up and took her way to the library.

As she entered, Lord Kingswood rose up from his seat, advanced with a stern, haughty mien tow her, touched her hand coldly, and conducted her to a seat.

"Lady Maud," he exclaimed, in a tone that almost made her start, "my coming is some abrupt, but my engagements are so many and so various that I cannot direct my movements a
I am obliged to snatch opportunities when they present themselves; hence I come thus w apprising you beforehand. Lady Kingswood is somewhat peculiar on these points, and as I w have an interview with her, I must enlist you in my cause, engage you to plead my excuses t ladyship, and to use your persuasive eloquence to prevail upon her to see me at her earliest po convenience."

This preliminary was something so different to what Lady Maud had led herself to expect, tha could not help gazing up at him in surprise. He observed the expression upon her features misinterpreted it.

"Lady Kingswood is here, beneath this roof—Kingswood Hall—Lady Maud?" he exclaimed, sha

"Certainly, my lord," she answered quickly.

"Her ladyship has not quitted it, I presume, since her arrival?" he added.

"Not even to wander in the ornamental grounds, my lord," she returned, quickly.

"Her ladyship has recovered her health?" he continued, drawing a deep breath after Lady remark.

"Her ladyship is still in extremely delicate health," rejoined Lady Maud, shaking her head
"and much depressed in spirits," she added.

"I will soon restore her ladyship to a happier and livelier state of mind!" exclaimed his lord with a forced laugh. "You, too, Maud, shall recover your old smiles shortly, and Cyril will be amongst us, more sprightly than ever."

She looked up at him and said, with a boldness which surprised herself,

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

"I LEAVE no friends."

"Absurd, that remark; but never mind. Your uncle has sent me to look after your welfare."

"Monsieur Chartier!" I exclaimed, before I could conquer the impulse.

He took no notice of the interjection, but continued, talking and eating his pie.

"Your uncle writes me to tell you that he regrets there should have been a misunderstanding between you. He reposes in you every confidence, and desires to know if you will return home?"

"I will not, on any consideration."

The monosyllable was a confession of duplicity with the young gentleman as had been instructed to seek for. He looked at me with a sly, quiet smile, and shook his head doubtfully.

"Ah! my young friend, I have penetrated through your sheep's clothing, have I?" he muttered, munching his pie and washing disdainfully. "You have established your own identity, and have saved me a good deal of trouble. Bah! bonds."

He rose up, smiling, and held out his fat jewelled fingers. Scarcely knowing what I did, I held out my hand, touching him. With a sudden movement, he seized me by the wrist, and turning back the sleeve, revealed a slight scar near the elbow, the result of some accident in childhood. I felt both angry and ashamed; he gave a low chuckle and released me.

"You were my discoverer, be observed, in insolent apology; "and you must pardon me if I have caused you any annoyance. Good morning, sir."

I stared at him in amazement. He lounged out of the shop with a nod, and left me in a state of mind bordering on feeble idiocy.

CHAPTER XIV.—MY HEART IS TOUCHED.

The first idea that suggested itself to my mind was flight. But whither? I had no funds, and stood ten chances to one of starving in the great world, if I set foot in it alone. Should I make a confident of Bodger, senior? No fear by so doing I should relinquish him as a source of future of which I had been told to keep him entirely ignorant. If he was too fat to communicate with my London friends. Fortune, feckless woman, was against me, and had deserted me. I should be perpetually hunted down and driven into coverts by my terrible Golden Skeleton. Why should I have been poor, poor as Lazarus himself, that the face of my boyhood might be stained with such a peaceful hope of heaven?

The fact was, I was, like time, absolutely shunned. The steward, Wilmond, and the clerk hurried off to London, convinced me that to return to Monsieur Chartier would be to run my life in imminent peril. It was clear Monsieur Chartier was to be avoided or evaded as possible. He was a villain, I knew, and my property (what was left) was in his hands.

There was a beautifully-roofed esplanade in Portsmouth, and a small band played there, down which the upper ten-thousand were accustomed to ride and walk in the evening. I selected no one time more than another, when I could leave the shop without neglecting business, I strolled to the esplanade, and hoped to meet Miss Bodger.

I had been there rather less than half an hour, when my attention was attracted to a girl and a gentleman, who were seated on a bench some distance off.

The lady was possessed of a fair-haired—a gentle and beautiful blonde of about eighteen. Her eyes were deep, genuine blue; her lips were as red as the berries of the mountain ash. Her hair was braided about her forehead in plaited coils. It was elegantly dressed in light satin, and over it she held the gentlest and most elegant of Parisian bonnets. She, somehow, seemed familiar to me; but I could not at the moment make out when and where I had seen it before. Her companion, who was attired in the height of fashion, who looked worn and haggard, and who was thinking wickedly, was Monsieur Chartier.

His sentiments I could read at a glance by the image of that young girl produced the unpleasant impression caused by the sight of Monsieur Chartier. My heart fluttered and my face flushed; I felt a sensation between fear, yet in some measure akin to, that produced by the sight of "pretty homemaids. Who was she? What was she? Where had I seen her before? Forcé were the questions which buzzed like bees through my bewildered brain. Fortune, not I, was to answer them; and in the meantime my heart was touched, and my brain was puzzled.

She was really very pretty. She had a quiet, pensive, yet intelligent face, such as I could have been very much in a love-ding trick, which one shared with memory or myself. There was something holy and beautiful in her look. She seemed made to smooth the pillow of the sick and succor the helpless. Now, I was annoyed to find that a disposition seemingly to arrest was contradicted by a style of dress which, to say the least of it, was not pretty rich. But more of that hereafter.

They were talking earnestly together, when the eyes of monsieur met mine. I shuddered and then blushed. He did not appear to recognise me, but continued talking in his companion, gesticulating, as he did so, with the nervous energy possible to some people. Some time elapsed, and I thought I was forgotten, and riveted my eyes on the young girl's face. It was a face that haunted me; it seemed like something buried in a far off life. I was not in love with the maiden—I was in love with her connection with my past life.

After the lapse of a few minutes, another figure appeared in the far end of the esplanade, and I recognised the obsequious Jewish person who had visited me in my shop. He ensconced past, casting a quiet glance at me, and was soon in earnest conversation with Monsieur Chartier. I did not wait to see more. I rose from my seat, and hurriedly leaving the immediate neighborhood of the railway line, good-hearted Bodger, I went to bed directly, conscious that it was quite impossible to avoid the men I feared. I brought myself to the cold conviction of mind by reflecting on the charms of the young lady I had seen in the morning. Come what might, I was determined to ascertain who she was, and to unriddle the mystery of her connection with Monsieur Chartier. I resigned myself to my fate accordingly.

Early the next morning, just after the shop was opened, my Jewish friend hanged like the shop, placed in my hands a little note, and then lounged out again. The note, which was pink and scented, and was addressed to "Henry Brown, Esq.," the note ran thus:

"MY DEAR NEPHEW—Why avoid your good fortune? Why put your friends to the inconvenience of freeing your good fortune upon you? Your conduct, to say the least of it, has been in very bad taste. My love for your dear mamma, however, prevents me from punishing you too harshly. Return to us, and all will be forgiven, as all surely, great me an interview. I shall be able, in the course of a few moments, to prove how greatly you have been mistaken in your affectionate uncle.

"LEONARD CHARLES."

I turned this epistle over and over, undecided how to estimate its language. Was monsieur so consummate an artist in human nature as to conceive that the fact of his companion had accidentally met that the letter-scented note-paper would, by suggesting the idea of a lady friend, be a delicate bribe so as incentive to a visit? The address followed; it was that of a house situated in one of the most fashionable squares of Portsmouth. I pondered in a quandary of indecision.

At last I found myself in a frame of mind accommodating immediate action of some sort, and I was soon prepared to face an ordeal towards which my destinies seemed to draw me, willy nilly.

After the most careful toilet, dressed in my cleanest shirt and my best clothes, I knocked at the door of the house where monsieur was said to reside. It was a large house, with "Griffin" on the door plate. On asking for Mr. Leonard Charles, I was informed by a trim serving-maid that he had apartments elsewhere. Upstairs, therefore, I was escorted. I was ushered into a lonely furnished drawing-room, which was empty when I entered. Shortly afterwards monsieur entered.

He received me with kindness and good-nature, and shook my hand heartily. No gentleman could have ordered a manner more kindly and polite. I was pleased, but felt certain that he had some motive and in view.

"I am glad that you have relented, for your own sake," he said, with a good-humored smile; "but a little nothing in the world does no harm, but teaches us to better to appreciate the blessings we possess. Your conduct, in the first instance, was foolish and wrong; but I hope that you have intend to be wise. Shake hands again, and I shall not have conceived a better opinion of myself."

He spoke so kindly and with such genial goodness, that I felt ashamed of my face, which must have fully expressed my fear for and doubt of him. I blushed and stammered.

"Come, my dear Henry, have some confidence in me; I am not the sort to use you so reserved and diffident. Tell me, my boy, have I ever proved myself an enemy, or even a cold friend?"

I thought of my mamma's death, and of mamma's dying words. I thought of the churchyard grave, and of the spurn that grovelled on that grave. I thought of the conversations with Mrs. Martha Tibbs, and of Augustus's little story. And I shuddered at the idea of myself. I thought of the folly young face I had seen in the morning, and then I determined to waive my scruples, and to brave all.

"I have been foolish," I muttered, apologetically.

He blushed into a satirical smile.

"That is no answer to my question. But here, my dear boy, we will pound it down. Let bygones be bygones, and let us commence afresh."

"I am sorry, very sorry," I murmured, "to be a burden upon you."

"Henry, your mamma was my sister, and I love her still with all my heart and soul. Can I avoid feeling a deep and tender interest in the fortunes of her son? Can I help grieving that I see that son wavering in the paths of error? Believe me, no. Besides, I am your legal guardian, and am bound to look after you. You are a minor, you are a girl, and it is only my duty to use your property to your best advantage, but to see that you, who are prepared by early associations, to appreciate and enjoy it."

"It is so; and I thank you very much for your kindness!" This was mental deception. I am so far from believing in monsieur as ever I was.

"And I, for my part, promise to act kindly and honorably by you, till a day comes when you will be your own master. Permit me to introduce a person whom I hope you will consider your dear friend. Mr. Henry, my daughter, Elizabeth, my dear, Mr. Henry, of whom you have so often heard."

My memories had entered the room noiselessly, and had advanced to shake hands before I was aware of her presence. She was dressed in a fine afternoon dress, and looked positively lovely. We shook hands. The tips of her soft fingers tingled in mine, and I felt overpowered with a tide of confusion and embarrassment. I am delighted to meet so near and so dear a relation," she said, in a silvery tone.

"Cousins need not stand upon ceremony," observed monsieur; "and I hope you will regard each other as old friends. I have a little business to transact, and must leave you together for a few minutes. Adieu for the nonce, my dear nephew. Your return has filled me with spirits; I feel quite young again."

So he left the room. It might have been prejudice, but it seemed to me that the young lady brushed by Bodger, as if afraid of my proximity, as I stood, when he had gone.

To be candid, the situation in which I found myself was one of pleasure, slightly seasoned with nervous uneasiness. I had never been in the company of a young lady of my own years, and hardly knew how to converse with such a person. She seemed restless, and did not appear to be at her ease. I observed by observing reticently that the weather was very warm—an observation which I shortly afterwards contradicted, by saying that the weather was very chilly. Strange to say, my companion agreed in both contradictions. Then what had her ease the liked Portsmouth; and she said it was very nice.

Her face grew more and more familiar as the evening grew darker, as the timorous buoyancy, and it filled me with a strange sadness. Where and when, I asked myself, had I seen it before? The consciousness of its intimate connection with my past life grew more intensely painful, and I was more than once on the point of requesting permission to leave; but I felt that I could not do so with any other than "me." I said, timidly, "and must have a longer memory. Can you remember if we have met before?"

"I think that we have," she replied, thoughtfully. "It was long ago, when you were a very little boy, and I was a little girl."

"I thought so."

I spoke eagerly, for the words had supplied a defective link in my reminiscences.

"We were both very young," she continued; "and it was very, very long ago."

"It was. They said that I was a very little boy, and that you were going to be married to me. Your name," I added, "was Sister Anne Bradshaw."

They called me by that name long ago. Your own, I remember, was Brandon Ferguson."

She spoke quite tediously and coldly, as though the recollection were of little or no importance. But her words had the effect of withdrawal me, changing the whole course of my destiny.

Here was a beautiful woman, who had been my playmate and me beautiful by the time that of the Little Girl's Portrait. It loved me as he lavished upon her his warmest love. It was between her and a woman without cause. Sister Elizabeth had the face of an angel; but the temptation and the devil had entered into her heart, and destroyed her.

They told me," I said, after I had recovered from my surprise, "they told me that you were dead."

She uttered a few words hesitatingly, and shook her head in quiet dismal.

"I, also, were dead and buried. Strange to say, I have never been quite able to account for the report of my own death. Perhaps I was dead, and that what you were, or that we were relatives."

I never met with what you were, or that we were relatives."

"We are relatives," she replied, "and I am glad that you are shocked at my own innocent of this."

Shocking! Sister Anne, who had blasted the name of blinding me to the truth. He did not mention the relationship, but impressed me with the statement that you were much nearer than long ago, when I was a child."

"Such hypocrisy must be hypocrisy," she remarked. "I am now simply Elizabeth Charles, your cousin. Remembered, cousin Elizabeth, there is no mystery. Now let us talk of something else."

"Let us talk, then, of my uncle's place as regards myself."

A cruel, grinding fear of life for, alas, and a sense of shame impulsively.

"It cannot be," she cried: "it cannot be! Such a thing, whatever they may be, are hidden from both of us. Besides, why trouble ourselves about the past? Let us be brother and sister now and."

"Nevertheless, I am anxious to look into the matter of my property when I am led to understand that I am the rightful owner of more than forty-nine years of age."

I am not the rightful owner of property to become wife."

It was so arranged, I believe, that I should dwell with my father until I was twenty-one."

"Indeed! I was not aware, but certain misunderstandings appear to be amongst the agreement altogether."

"That is a matter," she observed, smiling, "you took a dislike to my father, and ran away from him."

"Exactly! I remember. I got out of the explanation so easily. "I was foolish and ran away."

"And that is quite forgotten," added my uncle, suddenly re-entering the room. "There is no reason that the arrangement should not be carried out. Mr. Ferguson, I am happy to say, will be delighted to hear your cousin promise to remain with us, until to, and by my wife as until your own home is ready for you to part company with us."

"Delighted, indeed," she answered, half surprised; "yes, of course, I shall be delighted."

"Then, Henry, Harry," said my uncle, shaking his forefinger at me, with a smile.

"I cannot."

"How?"

I have formed other ties, and have made friendships which render our connection impossible."

This, to me, was the end. It was honest and outspoken. Elizabeth took an appealing, sorrowful glance at my uncle, and then at me. I was not to be overcoming, and he had a great struggle before he could keep his countenance. "Which reminds me."

"Which what?" he muttered fiercely. "Pickpockets! cutthroats! and murderers! I have known such characters all my life, and I was one joy of them."

A new light, as it reflected, I think, from Elizabeth's face, broke in upon me. Could I have been deceived in Mrs. Yorke and Augustus? They were, at least, the only friends who had ever taken a tool of me. Now I thought of it, their behavior and never best of a character to deserve confidence. Mrs. Yorke's manner and demeanor have been rude and libellous once! It was genuine.

He saw the struggle that was going on in my mind, and in that tongue accordingly: carefully attending the image of his handsome daughter at every of the conversation I said.

"I have regretted, deeply regretted," he said, "your conduct of Ilkag for such conduct. But we must not be too severe on every one of decency, honesty or truth; men who are so are so vile as both to be unworthy of our notice. Women who are so are vile as to take a cruel delight in tattering the hearts of others."

"Nay, nay, but hear me, dear uncle," I said, "I am not bad, but not so bad as you paint them to be."

"Not bad! Why, you are being best herself, has taken a fancy to you, and you have repaid her kindness by running away from her home all her acquaintances. Treat her, and you would suffer and regret it."

"I made no answer—answer of any kind was out of the question—to such a reproachful conclusion.

"To think that you should have preferred the company of those disreputable to the kindness of a fond and elegant parent, to the society of blackguards to the society of gentlemen! the patience exercised by the world, of a world, to the contempt of which you do yourself and my dear child."

Monsieur objected, though I could swear there were no tears in them. I felt it necessary to step in with a salve, in the shape of my acknowledgment.

"I have been very foolish," I stammered. "I confessed as much yesterday."

"And I volunteer to be responsible for the future conduct," added. "For the future we will make no misunderstandings to arise. I am sure that my cousin has made up his mind to remain with us, the new domestic arrangements will be in accordance with us, in it not so, cousin Harry?"

There was a pause, during in her tone which caused my heart to beat and my face to flush.

"It is so," I said, resigning myself to her leading influence.

CHAPTER XV.—A STRANGE MEETING.

In spite of coincidence, in spite of experience, in spite of my own fear, I resigned myself to Fortune, and determined to be guided by the hand of events. Fortune was a good guide, now and then, and revealed the glittering phantom; and when I found the glittering phantom was not there left the matter to Fortune, and resigned myself to her.

However, my second day with Lantern, somehow or other, with Lantern, Monsieur, Badger, and I was made my own master. It was not a master I was to be, however, in the sense of being the head of the house and household. The short time I had spent in the Badger household had made me a perfect pupil of the art, and it was not in the face of Elizabeth when I had me to relinquish pursuits so even and happy.

But in the society of a refined woman like Elizabeth my charm which it was easy to impossible for me to be a rough and ready fellow. I felt a new life in her presence—a life full of pleasures asking and promising. I had also a new sensation—a sensation I had found it in her and beauty. That beauty seemed strangely akin to something I had known long ago, and which I had lost, and which I found it in her.

Had I fallen in love, as the vulgar term it? I fancy not. There was only in my feeling; and the sentiment was a sentiment which I had never felt before. The resonance of my life had been dull and gloomy, and my heart was pressing for more brilliant resonance. Love is a sentiment, and I was too young to be capable of love. It might, however, have arisen from that first dawning consciousness of which people prepares the fascination for love, and harmonizes the of one heart with those to which it was intimately mingled.

Enough to say, I was delighted to find one relation who (as far as I knew) at least possessed not the vices of my immediate relations. My pleasures at the discovery reconciled me to remorse, my uncle.

My uncle's household consisted at that time of himself, Elizabeth, Elizabeth's maid, and myself. Monsieur, as I have said, was a recluse but practically separated himself from his Parisian business, for the time being; and was living the life of a well-to-do gentleman. Monsieur's entry after I would not have been a bad one for a country squire, and returned in my fond cousin's house of Cavendish Square. I was, we must observe, received and dined in the room, seen when I left it, and was now surrounded by a beautiful garden and shrubbery.

Elizabeth presided over the domestic economy department—of course, with the exception of the privy purse, the undersubmit of the servants and the virceal mistress of the dining-room. Besides a cook, a maid-of-all-work, Elizabeth, and a boy who cleaned the knives. These were the domestics. We lived quietly and rather luxuriously, and were, within a month we went into London, and spent the season in a house in Cavendish Square. Our days were pleasantly interrupted, with success, to make me comfortable. I was not to hang out my shingle as a Veterinary Surgeon; that was much more luxurious, and felt much more attached with my profession.

Notwithstanding all this, I was so far conscious of the prudence of my conduct of past events, that I resolved to write to the post office some in whom I had promised to trust. Come what might, it was well to be in a position to communicate and Mr. Thorn. Mr. Thorn was a gentleman, having fulfilled the following little epistle. I one day furtively put into the post:

"DEAR HARRY.—Before this reaches you, you will have heard that I have returned to my uncle's, and that I am safe, and would not hear of my leaving him. I think you must have been mistaken in Mr. Augustus. He is not a bad fellow, and is very kind to me. You will have to Mr. Augustus, I remain, yours sincerely, HENRY BROWN. P.S.—Elizabeth sends her love to you. Adieu."

The evening after I had posted the above, I sat with my uncle and Elizabeth in the drawing-room.

"Harry," said my uncle, I said, innocently, "what has become of Mr. Timbs?"

My uncle lifted up his eyes and looked at me keenly, before replying.

"I presume that you are not over interested in your old personal."

"Not, indeed," I said, "but I remember he and I have had a little intercourse together. He has been doing business for me in Fife, and I have not had an opportunity of meeting him. I've no member him for."

"Certainly not."

"Yet it is a long time since you and he met last."

"An unpleasantness, I suppose," said Elizabeth, "a difference," broke in Elizabeth. "Papa, how can you have dealings with such low persons?"

"In business, my dear, one cannot be over particular. Timbs, although shabby, is honest. He has been very trustworthy, and I feel myself bound to serve him when an opportunity offers. But how does he come to be mentioned? Has he been writing to you, Harry?"

"On the contrary, I gathered that Augustus had seen the jolly man, and that the latter had thought town before undertaking any more business for me. Augustus, on the interview, described in an early chapter of this history, had prepared a story for me, and I was obliged to tell it. Timbs, however, had a strong hold on the jolly man.

"Then you had posted my letter I received this line in response:

"DEAR MASTER HENRY.—Stay where you are, but do not trust your protector. Beware, also, of the beautiful daughter you speak of. Yours, in haste, JOHN TIMBS. P.S.—Don't trust Mr. Augustus. MASTER TIMBS."

The epistle convinced me that I had acted wisely in listening to the overtures of my uncle; and, after its receipt, I felt much more free to open my mind to Elizabeth. I was in a very considerable state of that monsieur had some sinister end in view; but it was so evident that he was fond of his daughter, and that she was long. But no reasons threw me into an anxious perplexities—Beware also of the beautiful daughter you speak of. Yours, in haste, JOHN TIMBS. Words could Mr. Timbs mean by that sentence? Could Elizabeth be in any danger? Was there any mystery in her household?

Why impossible! Because (I argued) Elizabeth was innocent and beautiful, she could not be in danger. Her father loved her. Those were stale cogitancies, and left me as anxious as ever.

"Elizabeth," I said, "you have been my friend ever since before I understood that Elizabeth liked me and encouraged me; before I knew that I loved Elizabeth in my own heart, and showed me in another. We grew quite familiar, the brother and sister. We were not ashamed to confess our faults. For some reasons or other, or for no reason, both treated me as a child. I have become man; and it is because both treated me as a child, that I at length began to fancy I loved my cousin Elizabeth. Now, I am a man, and I feel that I love her as a man, and I am ashamed to confess that I love her."

Elizabeth's face became crimson, and she lifted up his glass, and pleased me. He had done so once before, on a similar occasion, when I had told him that I loved Elizabeth.

"Harry," he said, smiling, "this is your birthday."

"Yes, uncle," I answered, and I felt that I had my hand in the affirmative.

"Harry, my dear nephew, you are eighteen years old. May I put a question to you?"

"Most cheerfully."

"A year ago we drank your health, at a time when you were not in the best of health. You were then a child. Do you not think that you erred in trusting us so entirely?"

I hesitated for a moment before answering. He smiled encouragingly.

"I am satisfied," I replied, "that you have treated me most kindly and considerately."

"Are you sure, my dear uncle, I hope, with the turn that affairs have taken?"

"I am more than satisfied."

"Bravely said! Here, then, is this wine, I pledge you increased health and happiness—and you, Elizabeth, who has not taken to the world, may the lightning strike me if I don't make you a fortune!"

Elizabeth laughed, and took the glass to fragments on the floor.

"Papa, I beg of you," said Elizabeth, "with you happiness and all your property."

We were quite a little family party. We stood on no ceremony. We were a united family, and we enjoyed the holy union with the pudding. I acknowledged the toasts gratefully, half ashamed that I had ever doubted my uncle's love. I had been quite nothing of the world, and my troubles had come too early to make me very sharp-sighted.

Some little time after this—why or in what manner the feeling arose I know not—I became conscious that Elizabeth's manner to me. It indeed was setting her cap at me, and that monsieur, my uncle, was aware of it, and that he did not consider it unbecoming. This consciousness was, to say the least of it, attended with consequences which were not unpleasant. I was conscious that I was the object of almost monsieur, and rather quiet my day-to-day belief in the world, and in the goodness of human nature.

My uncle was abrupt-spirited, and quick-tempered; but he was also kind-hearted and generous. Elizabeth entirely changed it: she was cold enough at times, and was sometimes cheating me. Mr. Timbs, in his last letter, called Elizabeth the same. She was also beautiful. Those were the days of Pre-Raphaelitism, and Elizabeth was the real answer, wherever effect it right here and on a face of the Pre-Raphaelite school—pale, sometimes. Palpitation of the heart caused. Now that the reverses seemed proved, I felt that I was in love with Elizabeth, and that I was loved in return. I was not to fretless which, in some respect at least, resembled true love. I was not to be overcome with the feeling instead of intoxicating love, rather encouraged it. Elizabeth was so helpless, and yet so self-possessed; so gentle, and yet so human; and her presence impressed me with a delicious feeling of domestic repose. She was, if anything, a little too tame and passive; but I was a slow boy, and did not desiderate either eloquence, or what old Aubrey calls "a handsome face rules and governs." Elizabeth, indeed, it was her perfect repose that captivated my heart. She had been hunted and driven, shown-cast, abused by the world, and longed for some cool, quiet oasis to rest on.

The influence of my uncle, also, I perceive it had become impressive. I found myself unconsciously taking up his judgment on matters of every day life. He was a man of powerful character, while a powerful character, while a powerful character, while a my own mind, that it existed. Monsieur never played useless cards; of that I was sure. His cards were either always hearts or well-placed knaves, and, with these, he seldom failed to win the game. But, in the present instance, I troubled myself little about his plans, and had sufficient food for reflection in the knowledge that I, a boy of eighteen, had popped the question to a beautiful woman, and been forthwith accepted.

Yes, strange as the words sounded to my ears, I was an accepted suitor, or, rather, an accepted husband in embryo, who was called upon to sue no longer. My cousin loved me! She would marry me! To think that, by the time I attained my majority, I might be the father of a family! I pictured, in my mind's eye, the announcement in the newspapers: "On Sunday, the ——, at such and such a church, Mr. Henry Vanhomrigh Brown, of Caverford, to Elizabeth, only daughter of Leonard Charles, Esq., late of Paris." I even went so far as to wonder whether I should look so very young when dressed for the ceremonial.

One day, not long after I had made my proposal, and been accepted, I thought I would stroll past the village close by to the village farther away, in which latter stood the cottage wherein I had sojourned with Augustus. A year had passed since I had left that strange circle in Little Leopard street. I had grown a good deal since then; I was a tallish, slight youth, with light blue eyes and fair, curling hair; and, as I dressed well, must have looked quite the gentleman.

So I sauntered along the country road, in a musing mood. It was spring time. Buds were blooming, birds were singing and the sun was shining brightly. I passed into the churchyard for a moment, and stood above the grave of the woman who, on her deathbed, had said she was not my mamma.

"SACRED

"TO THE MEMORY OF ——."

As I stood there, the whole occurrences of that autumn night came back to me. I was in the land of the dead, and I seemed in the land of ghosts. I trod on the green graves, some new-made ones, and they seemed to my tread like the cold clay of corpses. O this iterated mystery of Life and Death! The sun rises, and the world slowly brightens to the zenith; and in an hour the shades are falling on the earth, and on our hearts, and the sunset, like the seal of God, is burning over the grave of day, with a forlorn Hic jacet!

I left the little churchyard with a bitter, not a softened heart; for, remembering the mystery of that grave and its occupant, and remembering what mine own eyes had seen above it, I rebuked myself for trusting in my uncle. But the feeling subsided, as it had done again and again before; for often, during the past year, I had strolled in my rambles to the churchyard, where my heart each time underwent the same change.

When I reached the further village, I rambled to the cottage where Augustus had lived. Glancing up at one of the upper windows, I met two wild eyes, which were looking at me fixedly through the pane, and I recognized the never-to-be-forgotten face of the man called Ornamel.

Surprised to find the man still living in that locality, so near to the abode of Monsieur Charles, whom Augustus seemed to have reasons for avoiding, I walked to the cottage door and knocked. The door was soon afterward opened by Augustus himself, who looked older by ten years than when I had seen him last. He was in mourning for some one. The black that he wore, and the weepers, were rusty and dingy, and he seemed a fit person to preside at the funeral where the pauper's bones were rattled over the stones so dismally. His cheeks were pale and sunken, and his eye was lowering and suspicious. He looked at me keenly for a moment, but did not appear to recognize me.

"Mr. Augustus?" I said, half doubtful of him, but holding out a gloved hand.

He glanced at me again, more keenly than before, and then the recognition came.

"Mr. Henry!"

"Yes."

"Come in," he said, shaking my hand quietly, as I entered the house.

He exhibited neither surprise nor pleasure at seeing me. He seemed to receive my visit in a prepared way, as a visit long expected. He led the way into the kitchen, which was empty and fireless.

"I didn't seek you, or send for you," he observed, with a gloomy smile. "I knew well enough that your fate would lead to us again in good time, and I waited. You have come, and I'm glad to see you; but it would have mattered little had you stayed away. In the end, we should have met; so I waited."

"I scarcely expected to find you in this place. I was led to understand that you had an object in keeping out of my uncle's way. Yet I find you still living in the neighborhood."

"Come this way," he said, not answering.

He grasped my arm and led me into a little unfurnished front parlor, the window of which opened, pointing to the road.

"You see the road; it passes our door. It is the highway, and winds down from the North. What think you? That highway is our reason for staying here."

"Indeed!" I ejaculated, really surprised.

"Morning and evening, day and night, we have our eyes upon the road there, one or both of us, watching. For Ornamel, whom you have seen, is still with me."

I mentioned the fact that, on entering, I had seen his face at the window.

"Of course you did," cried Augustus. "And why? Because I have said to Ornamel, whose mind grows clearer daily, that sooner or later one he knows will pass along here, from the North. Because I have bidden him watch for her and pray for her, and hail her for me when she passes by. Well, you see, this serves two purposes. It not only serves the main purpose of keeping a sharp look-out, it supplies a new interest to the man's mind, and takes him from thoughts which drove him mad in the first instance."

"But you must sleep!" I put this in delicately, as a suggestion.

"Of course. What I meant to say was (but I spoke in figures) that, in this spot we, ourselves unseen, are in the best position to pounce upon an object for which we have been waiting long years. Knowing, as we do, that the person we seek is helpless and bound, and in prison, as it were, but that the moment she frees herself, she will take this road from the North and pass on. Knowing, as we do, that the hue and cry will be after her, and that we shall be prepared to watch for her long before she reaches here. Knowing, as we do, that the enemy has no power to harm us, and does not even dream of the existence of one of us."

I was afraid to ask what, or who, the object or person might be, for which, or for whom, they were seeking so eagerly; but he saw my embarrassment, and, eyeing me keenly, said,

"We are seeking for a mad woman."

"Mad?"

"They say so. And those who cannot help her, seeing her break her bonds twice, and twice be driven by irresistible instinct into the lion's den, might hold her mad. Mad or sane, it matters little. We want her."

There was something sad and awful, not in Augustus's words, but in his manner. He was sad, like one pressed down with a great grief; he was fierce at the same time, like a lion preparing for a spring. He was not the Augustus of my childhood. He had grown less commonplace, and more dangerous.

"Actors talk of piling up the agony; and we are preparing to do it with a vengeance. Ghosts shall arise to aid us. Living and dead will be with us. Then blood will be shed."

He spoke not passionately, but calmly and maliciously; and I followed him back into the kitchen.

"You wear mourning," I remarked, seeing he did not allude to the subject.

It was passion, anger, not grief, that he expressed on his dark face, as he answered,

"Yes; I wear mourning. Do you know for whom?"

"No, indeed."

"One for whom my heart had been in mourning many bitter years. One for whom I would have died gladly, if I could have saved her a tear. Mrs. Timbs."

I sprang to my feet, with a cry of surprise and wonder.

"Is she dead?" I asked, eagerly.

"Dead—and buried," he answered; "dead and buried six months ago. God bless her!"

"And you are in mourning for her," I said. "Why so?"

"Why so?" he repeated, mechanically, gazing with an air of abstraction into the grate. "Because I have long accounts to be settled in her name, and receipted with blood."

There was a great deal of blood in his allusions that evening.

"May I ask with whom this account is to be settled?"

"With your uncle, Mr. Henry, with your guardian. Her death has precipitated matters a good deal. She was wont to bid us wait in patience over certain wrongs which we were trembling to wipe out instantly. Now that she is dead, there shall be no delays."

I was surprised and frightened, for he seemed so deadly and bitter. Moreover, I was growing contented with my rich and easy life, and did not feel disposed at that moment to lose my cousin Elizabeth. It was plain that a storm was brewing, which was destined to upset my prospects. So I did not look particularly pleased at the turn the conversation had taken.

"I am sorry, deeply sorry," I said, "that Mrs. Timbs is dead. She was a good and motherly woman. But perhaps it is better; she was very unhappy."

Augustus placed his hand on my shoulder, and there were tears in his eyes.

"She was my dear sister," he cried.

"Your sister?"

"Yes, Henry; and it is her wrong which has led me into your path, which has made your woes my woes, and given us a common revenge. You will understand this better soon. Enough to say, that the grass will not grow on her grave till I have settled accounts with the man who calls himself your uncle."

Stunned by the knowledge of this relationship, and sad with the news of the unhappy woman's death, I looked in a bewildering way at Augustus.

"My uncle!" I said. "What shall you do with him?"

"Kill him!"

"You don't mean murder? No; you are much too good for that?"

He laughed a hoarse laugh, but in a moment his face softened, and he drew his rough sleeve across his eyes.

"Too good, Henry?"

"You have always seemed so. I have always believed you good and kind."

"Henry, the kindness and goodness have long ago been beaten out of me; but it is the memory of a time when I was a tolerably good man that has made me anxious for your happiness. My poor boy, that happiness has not yet come, and I fear that I myself may be the means of dispelling some golden dreams you now entertain. Yet it is a duty, one for which you will thank me, when the time comes."

"I scarcely understand you," I murmured. "Of course, all this is a mystery to me. I even hesitate whether or not to inform my uncle that you have designs upon his life."

"Do so, then; and it will be of no avail. But do not imagine for one moment that it is your duty to do so. Did you know all, you would feel for Monsieur Charles a hate even more deadly than this hate of mine."

"I am, of course, puzzled again. I am always among the clouds when in your company."

"With regard to your wrong, I must be silent. With regard to my own, Henry, I will say thus much. Mrs. Timbs was, as I have said, my sister, and I remember a time when she was young and happy, and (as girls go) pretty. Innocent, too! Well, you are old enough to understand me, when I say that a man, whom she loved, deceived and spat upon her, and that that man, whom she died hating, was Monsieur Charles."

"Ah! I begin to perceive."

"She was innocent and poor, Henry, and he seemed so rich, respectable and soft-spoken, that she thought him an angel. He was a devil."

He clenched his teeth together and struck the table with his clenched hand. He looked so strange and eccentric, in his rustic mourning, that one labored under the impression that he was not sound in mind.

"He was a devil! He cast her from him, scoffing at her, and bound her, by a lawful bond, to a brute beast—Timbs. He bound her, for better, for worse, to a cowardly, mean, foul-spoken, beggarly dog—Timbs. He bound her to an ignorant, whining, thieving pettifogger—Timbs. Timbs was not to blame—he did not want a wife; but when he got her he spurned and abused her. He was a devil! He made her the wreck you saw. He was the author of the wrong which she died forgiving, and which I live to avenge."

I bent before this great torrent of passion, trembling.

"I shall kill him!" he cried. "Sure as the sun rises and sets, sure as Ornamel yonder raves with its rising, and sleeps with its setting; sure as Martha lived mourning, and died forgiving. I shall kill him! Ay, I'll grapple him, grasp him, and bear him with me to the grave to make atonement."

"I regret to hear this," I observed. "I must think over it all."

I then intimated to Augustus that it was necessary for me to leave for home, lest my absence should be noticed and commented upon. He abjured me, as we shook hands, to think well of him, and to remember that he had always proved himself my friend. I was quite bewildered, and told him that I could promise nothing, hope nothing, do nothing. So I left him.

A UNION LETTER FROM THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.

The Russian Minister, Mr. De Stoeckl, had an audience of the President on the 7th, and read to him the following dispatch:

St. Petersburg, July 10.

Mr. De Stoeckl, &c., &c.:

Sir—From the beginning of the conflict which divides the United States of America, you have been desired to make known to the Federal Government the deep interest with which our august master was observing the development of a crisis which puts in question the prosperity and even the existence of the Union. The Emperor profoundly regrets to see that the hope of a peaceful solution is not realized, and that American citizens already in arms are ready to let loose upon the country the most formidable of the scourges of political society—a civil war. For the more than eighty years that it has existed, the American Union owes its independence, its towering rise and its progress to the concord of its members, consecrated, under the auspices of its illustrious founder, by institutions which have been able to reconcile the Union with liberty. This Union has been faithful. It has exhibited to the world the spectacle of a prosperity without example in the annals of history. It would be deplorable that, after so conclusive an experience, the United States should be hurried into a breach of the solemn compact which, up to this time, has made their power. In spite of the diversity of their constitutions and of their interests, and perhaps even because of this diversity, Providence seems to urge them to draw closer the traditional cord which is the basis of the very condition of their political existence. In any event, the sacrifice which they might impose upon themselves to maintain it are beyond comparison with those which dissolution would bring after it. United they perfect themselves, isolated they are paralyzed.

The struggle which unhappily has just arisen can neither be indefinitely prolonged, nor lead to the total destruction of one of the parties. Sooner or later it will be necessary to come to some settlement, whatsoever it may be, which may cause the divergent interests now actually in conflict to co-exist. The American nation would then give a proof of high political wisdom in seeking in common such a settlement before a useless effusion of blood, a barren squandering of strength and public riches, and acts of violence and reciprocal reprisals shall have come to deepen an abyss between the two parties of the confederation, to end, definitely, in their mutual exhaustion, and in the ruin, perhaps irreparable, of their commercial and political power.

Our august master cannot resign himself to admit such deplorable anticipations.

His Imperial Majesty still places his confidence in that practical good sense of the citizens of the Union who appreciate so judiciously their true interests. His Majesty is happy to believe that the members of the Federal Government and the influential men of the two parties will seize all occasions, and will unite all their efforts to calm the effervescence of the passions. There are no interests so divergent that it may not be possible to reconcile them by laboring to that end with zeal and perseverance, in a spirit of justice and moderation.

If, within the limits of your friendly relations, your language and your counsels may contribute to this result, you will respond, sir, to the intentions of his Majesty the Emperor, in devoting to this the personal influence which you may have been able to acquire during your long residence at Washington, and the consideration which belongs to your character as the representative of a sovereign animated by the most friendly sentiments towards the American Union. This Union is not simply, in our eyes, an element essential to the universal political equilibrium, it constitutes besides a nation to which our august master and all Russia have pledged the most friendly interest; for the two countries, placed at the extremities of the two worlds, both in the ascending period of their development, appear called to a natural community of interests and of sympathies, of which they have already given mutual proofs to each other. I do not wish here to approach any of the questions which divide the United States. We are not called upon to express ourselves in this contest. The preceding considerations have no other object than to attest the lively solicitude of the Emperor in the presence of the dangers which menace the American Union, and the sincere wishes which his Majesty entertains for the maintenance of that great work, so laboriously raised and which appeared so rich in its future.

It is in this sense, sir, that I desire you to express yourself, as well to the members of the general Government as to the influential persons whom you may meet, giving them the assurance that in every event the American nation may count upon our most cordial sympathy on the part of our august master during the important crisis which it is passing through at present.

Receive, sir, the expression of my very deep consideration.

GORTSCHAKOFF.

The Secretary of State has delivered to Mr. Stoeckl the following acknowledgment:

Department of State, Washington, Sept. 7.

The Secretary of State of the United States is authorised by the President to express to Mr. De Stoeckl, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, his profound sense of the liberal, friendly and magnanimous sentiments of his Majesty on the subject of the internal differences which for a time have seemed to threaten the American Union, as they are communicated in the instruction from Prince Gortschakoff to Mr. De Stoeckl, and by him read, by his Majesty's direction, to the President of the United States and the Secretary of State. Mr. De Stoeckl will express to his Government the satisfaction with which the Government regards this new guarantee of a friendship between the two countries, which had its beginning with the national existence of the United States. The Secretary of State offers to Mr. De Stoeckl renewed assurances of his high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. Ed. De Stoeckl, &c.

THE GAMBLER'S CHARITY.

A professional gambler, who, in Europe, is reckoned to be one of the most astute manipulators of cards of the present day, once found himself seated, with half a dozen acquaintances, at the same supper-table with Herman, the prestidigitateur. The talk ran upon cards, and Herman displayed some of those tricks which are at the finger-ends of all who dabble in the magic art. The gambler looked on smilingly, and for some time said nothing. At length he turned to a gentleman who was sitting beside him, and said,

"These are very pretty tricks; yet I confess that I should like to play a game of picquet with Mr. Herman."

Mischief sparkled in Herman's eyes as he smilingly accepted the banter.

"For money?" the professional gentleman asked.

"Of course," was the reply. The gambler evidently thought that Herman did not know him. "You may name your stake, and I am content to play with my eyes bandaged."

"Perhaps," said the gambler, "you might consider" (and he smiled blandly) "25,000 francs too much?"

"Not at all," replied Herman. "But you will remember I seldom or never play for money. I am willing to make an exception in your favor, and expect to be paid."

"Sir!" said the gambler, half rising. But he recovered himself instantly; 25,000 francs was too large a sum to be perilled by a momentary ebullition of resentment. He also began to see that the game might possibly be a more difficult one than he anticipated.

The cards were produced.

"Do you wish my eyes to be bandaged?" inquired Herman, with a meaning smile.

The gambler looked dubiously at him, and was about to reply in the affirmative, but artistic pride (for even a gambler has artistic pride) forbade this. In the meantime, Herman's friends, although unaware of the gambler's profession, saw by the manner of the two that there was to be a severe trial of skill, and crowded around them. Herman laid his stake upon the table, or a representative of it. It was a gold repeater, which had been given him by the Emperor Nicholas, with his name and that of the donor engraved on it.

"You will not win," he said; "but if you do," and he laughed ironically, "I will redeem it to-morrow."

His adversary examined it, and then laid his stake, in bank bills, beside it.

It would be needless to describe the game. The gambler had provided the cards; he was an expert; he could deal and shuffle as only gamblers who are accomplished in the manipulation of pasteboard, can. All, however, was in vain. The game, to the delight of his friends, was Herman's. He placed the watch in his pockets. The gambler rose, and Herman took up the money.

"I have been cheated!" ejaculated his opponent, trembling with passion.

"M. de N——, you have not," replied Herman, in a coldly bitter voice. "You have merely been foiled, my good sir, with your own weapons. Had I been playing with any other individual present, I might not, M. de N——, have employed them; but with you I do, preferring to rob you for the benefit of charity, rather than that you should rob me for your own."

The following day M. de N—— was heard of as the princely donor of 25,000 francs to one of the principal hospitals of Paris. Herman had made the donation in his name. The story, however, got wind, and the society of the French capital found Herman's sarcasm deliciously piquant. "Gambler's Charity" became proverbial.

THE HUMORS OF WAR.

The facetious Prentice, of Louisville, has had a fracas with Mr. Roger Hanson. It appears that Prentice wrote a very sarcastic article upon the aforesaid Hanson, whereupon the latter sent him an invitation to meet him outside Jefferson county, to settle the dispute. Prentice thus answers the cartel:

"Louisville, Sept. 3, 1861.

"Roger W. Hanson—Sir: Yours of the 2d instant is received. You sought 'redress' for the very articles you complain of by publishing a scurrilous pamphlet, and, if you 'demand' any more 'redress,' you may get it in the same way or in any other way you can. I shall not appoint a 'time and place' for meeting you, for I wouldn't go two steps to meet or avoid you. As for killing you, I think that I have done that effectually already, and I don't care to waste powder and lead upon a carcase. They can be put to better use in these rebellious times. Respectfully, GEO. D. PRENTICE."

Not content with thus declining to slay the slain, Prentice comments thus upon the whole affair in the Louisville Journal:

"Our old friend Hanson wishes to be thought an honorable and chivalric gentleman, but he has evidently been trying to take an unfair advantage of us. With our characteristic courtesy, we have treated him in the correspondence above as if we supposed he actually wanted to fight us with guns, pistols, swords or bowie-knives, but he needn't flatter himself that we don't know better. He is only trying to get a cheap reputation for courage. In his late pamphlet he alluded to the little affair between us and himself and proposed that we and he should meet somewhere outside of Jefferson county and either fight it out, quarrel it out, or drink it out. And now he is undertaking to carry out that programme. He asks us to meet him outside of Jefferson to settle the affair, without saying or even intimating in which of the three ways previously indicated he means to have the thing done. Ah, the sly old fellow can't catch us that way. If we were to meet him, he would, as we said in our remarks upon his pamphlet, manage to throw some difficulty in the way of every other mode of settlement except 'drinking it out.'

Now we boldly say that we will encounter our fat foe in no such duel. Moreover, he is guilty of foul play. Gentlemen, when a duel is pending between them, esteem it a point of honor to abstain entirely from practising with the weapons they expect to use. But Roger, setting all the laws of chivalry at naught, is practising with bottles and tumblers from morning till night every day, and gives himself double practice on Sunday. We should be justified in posting him for his conduct. It is ungentlemanly. It is unmanly. It is cowardly. Roger should be ruled at once out of the honorable fraternity of duelists. We invoke them to call a meeting and expel him."

A Man and a Mu-ell.—The Little Falls (Md.) correspondent of the World gives an amusing account of a Rappahannock farmer whom he encountered in his peregrinations, in the first stages of convalescence from a "big drunk," and plodding his way homeward, mounted on what rural Virginians call a mu-ell:

"He was a Rappahannock farmer, who had converted all his surplus into cash, and come up to camp for a little spree and tarry with 'the boys;' got at gambling, and now found himself sober but cleaned out of all funds except a few 'state bank' shinplasters, with which he had purchased an old mule to carry him home. A far different animal from the gallant steed so basely lost at euchre! There he sat—a long, lank, despondent man on mule-back—looked at his legs and charger for a moment, and gave vent to the following soliloquy:

"'Here I am, 60 miles from old Rappahannock, a riding on a mu-ell! Low (hiccough) in purse and lost in (hiccough) reputation. If anybody can say that I (hiccough) owe him anything in this yere place, I freely (hiccough) forgive him the debt! If any landlord's got any (hiccough) bill against me I'll stay and (hiccough) heard it out! Get up, you blasted old mu-ell!'"

The "Anarchiad," a poem written in Revolutionary times by David Humphreys, Joel Barlow, John Trumbull and Samuel Hopkins jointly, printed in 1786, has the following paragraphs of recent application:

"Stand forth, ye traitors, at your country's bar,
Inglorious authors of intestine war!
What countless mischiefs from their labors rise,
Pens dipped in gall and lips inspired with lies?
Ye fires of rule, prime, detested cause
Of bankrupt faith, annihilated laws—
Of selfish systems, jealous, local schemes
And Union'd empire lost in empty dreams.
Your names, expanded with your growing crime,
Shall float disgusted down the stream of time,
Each future age applaud the avenging song,
And outraged Nature vindicate the wrong.

"What madness prompts, or what ill-omen'd fates,
Your realm to parcel into petty States?
Shall lordly Hudson part contending powers,
And broad Potomac lave to hostile shores?
Must Alleghany's sacred summits bear
The impious bulwarks of perpetual war?
His hundred streams receive your heroes slain,
And bear your sons inglorious to the main?
Ere death invades or night's deep curtain falls,
Through ruined realms the voice of Union calls;
On you she calls!—attend the warning cry—
Ye live United or divided die!"

AFTER THE FIGHT AT MANASSAS.

By Sarah Helen Whitman.

By the great fields where carnage grew
The solemn dews of night fell down,
By the heart that's full of woe,
Yearling, Manassas, Manassas!

By our country's common blame,
By our silent years of shame,
By our earlier and latest breath
Under dynasties of Death,
Mercy, Lincoln!

By the sin we stared down
Till it forgot itself to wane,
By the cause yet unproved,
By the hope that remained,
Mercy, Lincoln!

By our southern hard betrayal,
As Manassas' bloody pall,
By our wrongs unatoned,
Our dead heroes, hearts-enthroned,
Lincoln, Lincoln!

For Rhode Island's gallant stand—
Her "unprincipled band" to—
For the dear, leather banner,
Now mine to sell, whether Sumter
Thunderous, Sumter!

For our boys that know and fear,
For their "gallant Regiment,"
For their dear, brave and true,
For their praise on every tongue,
Thunderous, Lincoln!

By the hope that suffers long
And always finds long sorrow strong,
By all the country that's dead,
For the dear new flesh of the world,
Given us, O God, the victory!—Providence Journal.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT HATTERAS.

A correspondent of the Evening Post, an officer of the frigate Wabash, gives a graphic description of the attack on Forts Clark and Hatteras, and their surrender. His account of the second day's bombardment is very spirited:

"In the morning of the eighth we were again under way. Again we led the attack, and fired the first gun upon the fort on the main. For three hours we kept up a steady fire, and then the pennant was gone. The flagstaff was fully shot away, and the flag, the glorious emblem of the Union, remained for hours after, and during changing into the fort would cause the rebels to cheer with defiance. Shells were seen to fall around, the embrasures were knocked out of all recognition. A letter to Secretary Welles was found, signed by Barron, Forts, and the commander of the fort, and addressed to Flag-officer Stringham. But the fort was in a dead carnage—a scene nothing but a surrender was left for them. At about seven o'clock in the morning a white flag was hoisted, and we ran that the enemy were desirous, the fort and talking to the leader. A large boat of a gun was sent to the beach and began to move about unmolested. At the same time, with our glasses, we perceived a man rush upon the ramparts, and, waving a white flag, run down the inside of the fort to the gate. Again and again he waved the handkerchief to engage a shot. Then, after the rebels, he rushed up, run among the parapet with a staff in his hand, took in the pennant, and from it the white flag was made fast. All the surrender was announced. Short upon shore received the rebels. 'Cleared away' pieces from the fort, and the fort was in our possession. Such was the result of a forty-eight hours' bombardment.

"Our troops were landed, and marched to the troops, but expressed his desire to deliver his sword to Commodore Stringham. He was, together with Major Andrews, put on board the Cumberland, and taken on board the flagship, where Mr. Stringham received his sword and formal surrender of office. He says that the fire upon him was terrific. His magazine was so far rent. The rebels had a force of about eight thousand men. He says the end whenever the smoke parted from our guns. The fire has been and held the fort. Our loss is very small, and the rebels' loss is very great. Fifty-five have been buried, and the remainder are scattered over the island, principally by a shell striking it, and blowing the carriage into splinters.

"The wounded and dead were taken on board the Wabash, according to the accounts with death we killed, the wounded, 31. Most of the wounded are killed during the first day's bombardment, and the rest by the fire of Stockton and Washington.

"On the 29th the whole Fort Hatteras, was intended to be an offensive one, and all the arrangements were made for the embarkation of the troops of success. Within the walls and ready to be mounted were 21 guns of the heaviest calibre. The rebels had evacuated the fort, but they had not already been utterly routed, and were in various stages of preparation for service.

"After the bombardment General Butler was ready to move on to full operations. Immediately our troops were in full possession of the fort, and the rebels were on board the steamers and were easily away. Eight Hatteras fell on board, and hastened the various lightboats and steamers to the fleet. Our troops were landed, and marched to the troops, but the rebels were not to be found. Our troops were then marched back to the occupation of the battery. As a task from a fort of operations no place could be more well-chosen or advantageous. We should keep and hold this place at all hazards."

THE GUNBOATS AT CAIRO.

Several gunboats have been built for service on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, which present a very odd appearance. They are all of the same model and arrangement.

Names.	Length.	Beam.
Cincinnati.....	200 feet.	72 feet.
A. O. Tyler.....	165 feet.	50 feet.
Lexington.....	165 feet.	50 feet.

They draw but 4½ feet of water. Their armament is 10 guns each, 42 and 32-pounder, and each has 180 men. Their bottom are sunk in the hulls; bulwarks built of 6 inch oak plank; and the hull of each is covered by 24 wrought-iron plates. They are not intended to engage batteries, but to cover the landing of troops, the troops to cover on the river, and to protect them. The flotilla is under the command of Captain John Rogers, U. S. N., (a son of Commodore Rogers,) who has the rank of service all his life, supported by Lieut. Phelps, in command of the Conestoga, and Lieut. Stembel in command of the Tyler. The sailing master is Mr. Dunbar, of the Lexington; Mr. Hoel of the Tyler; and Capt. Hord, of the Lexington—all old and experienced river captains.

HOUSE OF DETENTION IN WASHINGTON

For Women under the Provost Marshal.

The house which the Federal authorities have occupied for the females, whose active complicity with the rebels has compelled the Government to place them under restraint, is a large mansion situated at the corner of K and 14th streets, Washington. It was the residence of Mr. Corcoran, but it is not known whether or not he is considered as one of the most malignant of Secessionists. In addition to its once fair hostess, there are Mrs. Phillips, whose husband is the gentleman situated by Mr. Russell of the London Times, as sending letters in the Post Office to send to his Secession friends—her daughters, Emily and Caroline, Mrs. Hetzel, widow of the late Captain Hetzel of the U. S. A., Mrs. Hawley, and two others whose names are not given. With the usual gallantry, Mr. Lincoln has merely deprived them of their liberty of movement, and all persons will be astonished at the extent to which females have used by the rebels in threat unconfidentiality, and the means to smuggle the Southern Confederates had dreamed the enormity of the sex by converting them into spies, entrepreneurs and traitors.

UNION CAVALRY RECONNOITRING NEAR HYATTSTOWN, MARYLAND.

There are few sights more picturesque than a detachment of cavalry winding along the road to some quiet little village. Nature and man seem then so little in harmony, that the contradiction becomes strikingly attractive. Our present sketch contains a scene of this kind—a detachment of Union cavalry, sent by order of General Banks, reconnoitring in the neighborhood of Hyattstown, a village in the northern part of Maryland, and situated on Bennett's Creek, about 36 miles to the north-west of Washington. The appearance of General Banks' cavalry, there are very few open Secessionists in that neighborhood now.

COLONEL ALFRED M. WOOD, Of the Brooklyn Chasseurs, or 14th Regiment New York State Militia.

This gallant officer—who is now a prisoner in Richmond, having been captured at Bull Run—was born in the township of Hempstead, Long Island, in the year 1817, and after eight years ago he joined the 14th Regiment, and in 1854 was elected Major. In 1856 he was made Lieutenant-Colonel, and two years afterwards he became Colonel. For six years he occupied the responsible position of Collector of Taxes and Assessor for Kings County, and in 1859 was elected Alderman of the First Ward of Brooklyn by a large majority. The Board of Aldermen made him the complimentary offering of a horse and harness. When the Government called for troops to suppress the rebellion, Colonel Wood led his gallant men to defend the Capital. At the memorable battle of Bull Run he was taken prisoner, and forwarded to the prison in Richmond. Previous to his enlistment, he was a great ta-te for agriculture, and owns a farm of 70 acres in Queens county, Long Island, which is said to be one of the model farms of that island. He has a wife and family.

DOMESTIC ITEMS.

From a full fortnight before the ship Alliance sailed from Halifax, for Liverpool, with the Confederate Commissioners on board, the most deadly hostility to the Yankees was manifested by the rebels in that city. Not only did they keep the steamer, and a quantity of guns lately arrived there, under the strictest guard, but the gloomiest forebodings of the enterprise would have tempted the naval authorities to have watched the Alliance's departure. But they were not to be disappointed in the opportunity for the Queen's Proclamation of strict neutrality. The vessel was cleared for Nassau, and when she got outside the harbor, she hoisted the Confederate flag, and steered for Liverpool direct! Would it not be well to introduce the cash of allegiance at once?

A case of the Scottish Rite Masons, in this city, brought before the Supreme Court, involves the question whether Masonic fees can be sued for in the courts. "Masons are not litigious."

Mayor Symmes was excited for one of the unreasonable persons who, a few years ago, would have been sent to a lunatic asylum for a few days because minor offence. Nuisance was believed to be the cause, but he contended that it was the Constitution of American hair dye.

The Hartford Courant suggests that if Ben McCullough is not dead, he perpetrates a joke that is. Ha, ha!

Major-General McClellan lately took three German officers from New Hampshire to Washington with him, because he could trust them to his own suit. He did this, as he said, to show that the foreign men in the army were to be treated with the same kindness as the native. A rebellion, and that this adopted citizens, so far as he was concerned, should be on the same footing as the native born citizens of the country of his Republic.

The Rev. Mr. Cox, a Canadian, and a fighting man in our Mexican war, three months ago offered to the Government's brigade of 5,000 colored men, but was refused.

Patent Nonsense has been invited by Gov. Andrew of Massachusetts, to join his staff, with the rank of Colonel. Mr. Nonsense declines to say, "For a long time I have cherished the Andrew's probing sympathy, and would be glad to join his staff, but I am afraid that I am not fitted for the position." Mr. Nonsense is a native of Alabama, and will leave in by hour a touching and confiding remembrance."

The Indian Commissioners have made terms with a contract with Messrs. W. H. Webb & Co., shipbuilders of New York, for the construction of two iron-plated steamers, to be built at the navy yard, Brooklyn, Long Island and Powell, as represented by the State and the Warner, the performers but to cost no more than $1,000,000 each. The vessels are to be finished in the month's time, in two and a half years.

The rank of Major-General, now the army of the Potomac are now issued in the two ring dozen at Washington. Some idea of the bulk of the work may be formed from the fact that the number of blanks of these 3,000 kinds of brief, 3,000 varies of post, 3,000 persons of color, 3,000 of the Secretary of War, and 3,000 of the Adjutant-General's office. It is estimated that the number of blanks issued during 1861 will exhaust all their names in twelve days.

SOUTHERN ITEMS.

The Memphis Argus of August 5th publishes the following proclamation from the Mayor of that unhappy city:

"In the Congress of Mississippi have repeatedly been made in an excitement of the city, for protection against indecent parties who have come to impress citizens into service against their will on account of their political opinions. Such acts are a disgrace to the community, but never has there been a more intolerable case than that of Mr. Hereby notify any citizen who may wish a pass within the city of Memphis to call on me, and I will furnish him the same. And will not be responsible for any one found after yesterday by any of these cutthroats, as they may be called, who have not a pass from me.

JOHN PARK, Mayor."

The tendency, what is nowhere English, the truth of the statement that the Mississippi has been lowered by the late rains.

The Richmond Whig states that "the fortifications erected around the city are of the most substantial and formidable character, and, in connection with the mailed batteries and mines at various points, would make the approach of a hostile army hideous and destructive in the extreme. Due to a hundred night sentries to depict the wiping out which these extensive works would engage against. A few hours are given to the attack, and upon these a force of several hundred men are now engaged.

Galveston, Texas, has been blockaded since the 2d inst. Up to August. The batteries of the place opened a fire upon one of the Federal vessels, which was returned. The Federal fleet consists of the steamers Brooklyn, the Montgomery, the North Carolina, sailed at and Hatteras, off Galveston, will be closed in the afternoon. He then stood for the batteries, which opened a fire upon him. He returned the fire with his broadside guns, but perceiving that he was about the utmost people of the town more than the vessels in the harbor. The South Carolina is the first vessel, the Savage Canal, headed, of course, by the English Consul, got up a petition to the Governor to have the vessel detained, but the Governor declined to do so, and the vessel sailed on the 2d inst. for Charleston.

The Mobile Register says that Gen. Braxton Bragg has been appointed to the command of the Department, and is expected to command by telegraph General R. S. Anderson, of South Carolina.

The Mobile Tribune of the 3d states that the guns were embarked on board the steamer Fashion, and that the President had left for Pensacola from Fort Pickens, and that he had left, then a civilian, and had left the last name now doing damage, and the men accordingly left quietly. The Mobile Tribune says that the Fashion is a steamboat, and that it is now safely steaming the ft.

The Mobile Register gives a brief summary of a new measure act of the Southern Congress. It says: "The Secretary of the Treasury, under special circumstances, is authorized to issue a certificate of the Treasury upon the act also provides for a tax of fifty cents on every hundred dollars of the value of all property, real and personal, in the Confederate States, for the current expenses of the Government. All the slaves also, employed on land, mine, gold washes, gold and silver plate, pianos, pleasure carriages, all the effects of corporations, all the effects of banks, all the property of Colleges, schools and charitable institutions are also exempt. Real estate are to be taxed in the State in which property pays. Land is to be assessed at its true division, under a chief collector, who will have superintendence of the assessment and collection.

The army correspondent of the Louisville Courier (a Secession paper) writes from Cumberland Gap, Tenn., August 26th, as follows: "Our troops are in fine health and spirits, and the whole position is impregnable. We possess no more advanced lines than before the 23rd of July. Aside from the skirmish on the 23rd, there has been much to remember since our army has availed on that hills. We barely hold our own."

The rebel Congress has passed a measure to aid the necessities of the population of having recorded in a system of rigorous imprisonment, and have appointed commissioners to take the management out of the hands of the State authorities. The Memphis Avalanche says: "In many an out of the way place in the country, where the people are poor, and have to work for a living, there are no jails, and as well as no means of keeping, when arrested and children depend entirely upon them for support."

The Richmond Dispatch says that the Confederate States have received other notice from the county clerks of the respective counties of Virginia, that the registration of property in the Secession counties of Virginia is now and lands will be collected.

The Richmond Whig says that the county assessors the passage of the following resolutions by a Virginia Convention at that city:

"Resolved, That the county assessors is highly important and requisite for persons residential the South to vest the free State of the Federal Government, and that the Legislature be requested to pass an act to carry the same into effect.

"Resolved, further, That in future any resident of Charleston and to vivisity who shall go to any of the northern States, unless with permission from the consul of the Commissioner, shall not be permitted to return to our community without the consent of the Commissioner, and of the Mayor of the city.

Mr. Abernathy, a captain in the 10th Mississippi regiment, writes from Camp Pickens, Va., under date of August 24th, to the Memphis Argus, and gives an account of the sickness in the rebel army. He says: "Since we have been encamped here we have had a great deal of sickness among the men, owing to the dreamily that this d'ease and death have prevailed among the troops. Our regiment has lost about 100 men since we have been here, and the sickness is still raging. Our regiment has been the most healthy of any troops that were elsewhere unknown. In great of this I will mention that out of 1,000 men that left Memphis with the regiment, we have but 500 men to commence that house ordinarily turned out on drill and parade from 65 to 70 men do not turn out at all. Our regiment is not the only one in Camp Pickens and suffering consequent upon the movement of General John Bell's division at Camp Pickens, and the sickness is not confined to any particular portion of the camp, but is equally distributed all over the camp. Nearly every day each of monthly prayers on the death of some Southern hero who has fallen in the cause of liberty, and the last one where given after the battle of Manassas as the last military honor paid to the dead."

Jefferson Davis commemorated the early laughtr victory of Bull Run in the papers of Richmond, stated that the rebels had captured "complete with the exception of the guns." In the following paragraph, from a Richmond letter to the Charleston Mercury, it is seen by contrast how any Southern statement of the number of Federal troops engaged in the battle of Bull Run is grossly exaggerated. Our letter writer, presumably Mr. Rhett and secondly, rather greatly underrates the number of Federals engaged:

"Beauregard's victory was achieved against fearful odds. The enemy numbered nearly 60,000 men, and we had but 30,000 to meet them. The battle was fought on Sunday, and on Monday the rebels were almost panic-stricken. Beauregard's victory was achieved against fearful odds. The enemy numbered nearly 60,000 men, and we had but 30,000 to meet them. The battle was fought on Sunday, and on Monday the rebels were almost panic-stricken.

The Nashville Banner has the following notice of the Confederate Congress, which is not complimentary to that body: "The Act of Congress passed at the present session of that body, and which will be duly promulgated in the Confederate States, is the most unconstitutional, unjust, and tyrannical act that has ever been passed by any body of men claiming to be free. It is a direct violation of the Constitution, and is calculated to the broad sight of the act. A common letter press printer would be ashamed to put his name to it. They would be more disgraced by the act than the rebels had been arrested on the printing offices in the city than a notice to a bailiff to arrest a man for a misdemeanor committed in his presence.

Five negroes, at the instigation of two white men, murdered their master, in Lowndes county, Alabama, on the 4th inst. They were tried before Judge Lynch, who rendered a verdict of burning at the stake, which was duly executed.

Going to the pressure of the times, says the Charleston Mercury, the Confederate Government has reduced the pay of its officers. The new scale is as follows: Generals receive the same pay as Colonels, and Colonels are to be paid $1,000. The Quartermaster Generals has also been cut down to about half the former salary. The salaries of other officers have been proportionately suspended.

The report of the managers of the St. Charles Hospital, in Richmond, shows that they have received into that estable thereto such the list of August 26, the following number of sick and wounded soldiers:

From South Carolina.....	67
From Georgia.....	27
From Mississippi.....	163
From Alabama.....	1,000
From Louisiana.....	1,000
From Tennessee.....	1,000
From North Carolina.....	1,000
From Texas.....	62

Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, of McClellan's army, who was killed at Wilson's Creek, was formerly a Major in the U. S. A., by distinguished himself in the American war, that which he was stipulated Parliament. He was an Englishman by birth, but came to this country as a very early age.

The Cincinnati Commercial, of August 29, says that Isaac N. Fowler, the defaulting New York Postmaster, is presently located in the city of Troy, in Hawes-Street, where he is engaged in the Post Office, and employed as one of the Messrs. Burtus, Fisher & Co., the wealthy hosiery and manufacturers. Mr. Fowler's principle are now in Montreal, but Mr. Fowler has entire charge of their affairs.

WAR ITEMS.

A DIABOLICAL attempt to destroy life was made on the railway eight miles from Rolla, Missouri, on the 23th of August. A keg of powder had been placed on the track, buried beneath the surface of the soil, which was exploded by the detonation of percussion caps on the rails. The concussion was severe, blowing the engineer off the engine, and throwing up a large quantity of dirt; but no person was seriously injured, and no great damage done to the engine. The act was no doubt perpetrated by the miscreants whose system of warfare is the cowardly one of shooting pickets from ambush and firing volleys into railroad cars.

It is said that the Secretary of War, at the commencement of the battle of Bull Run, implored the 4th Pennsylvania regiment to "strike for their homes," and they did so at the rate of ten miles an hour.

CORPORAL DIX, of the 3d Iowa regiment, while out on a scout with five men, near Hicksville, Missouri, on the 29th of August, was surrounded in a farm-house while at dinner, by 25 rebels, who demanded the surrender of his party. This was refused, and the rebels made an attack upon them. The fight was severe, but the Federal troops maintained the position in the house, driving the assailants from the ground with a loss of seven killed and five wounded. Corporal Dix, on the Federal side, was killed, but none of the others were hurt.

THE following is a recapitulation of what has been done by the Navy Department, since the breaking out of the rebellion:

Vessels purchased	78
Vessels chartered	10
Steam sloops building	8
Gun-boats building	23
Vessels fitting out	35
Naval vessels on the way home	12
Vessels on blockade duty	81
Vessels on Pacific coast	8
Guns of blockading fleet on duty	697
Men of blockading fleet	0,212
Prices paid for purchased vessels	$3,524,572

ON the 1st of September five Union soldiers, stationed at Cedar Creek (Va.), accepted an invitation from some young ladies to dine with them at their residence, three miles beyond our pickets. While there they were surprised by fifty mounted rebels, who, having been apprised of their engagement, surrounded the house and took them prisoners, dragging them out of a smoke house in which they attempted to conceal themselves. Two of the men thus captured by the young Delilahs were privates in Col. Hecker's regiment, and three were in Col. Alexander's. One of the former was shot near the house, and his body was recovered by our troops. The ladies had also invited a captain and lieutenant, but they were both on duty and unable to leave, and therefore escaped the trap.

THE following is the official report of the number of inmates of the Government Hospitals in and around Washington, Aug. 30: General Hospital, Washington, 174; Seminary Hospital, Georgetown, 183; Union Hospital, Georgetown, 183; Columbia College, 250; General Hospital, Alexandria, 135; Hospital Kalorama, 24. Total, 905.

PERSONAL.

COL. JOHN STROTHER, father of David A. Strother ("Porte Crayon"), a gentleman nearly 70 years of age, and an officer of the 1[illegible] U. S. Infantry in the war of 1812, proprietor of Berkeley Springs, Virginia, has been arrested by the rebels and imprisoned in Richmond, on account of his Union sympathies.

WILLARD'S HOTEL (Washington), under the management of Messrs. Sykes, Chadwick & Co., has already greatly improved. The table is better, and bills are actually made out now without any extra charges for articles which the guests have not had.

MRS. FANNY BURROWS, aged 93, a native of Groton, Conn., who was twelve years old at the time of the battle of Fort Griswold, and assisted in making garments for the revolutionary soldiers, is now knitting socks for the Rhode Island Volunteers in Providence.

AT last accounts Alexander H. Stephens, Vice-President of the rebel Confederacy, was at Manassas, attending a sick brother, who is Lieutenant-Colonel of one of the Georgia regiments.

CONGRESSMAN ELY, of N. Y., one of the outsiders captured at Bull Run, is still at Richmond, and has to take his turn in cooking and carrying water for the prisoners.

MRS. EMILY ELLSWORTH, wife of Hon. Judge Ellsworth, of the Supreme Court of Connecticut, died at Hartford, on the 30th of August. She was the eldest daughter of the distinguished Noah Webster, LL. D.

ON the 4th inst., ex Governor Briggs, of Mass., at his residence in Pittsfield, in attempting hastily to take down a coat hanging in a room, discharged a gun standing behind it, the shot carrying away his left jaw, and inflicting a very serious if not fatal wound.

THOMAS W. ATKINSON, the well-known Siberian explorer, died at his residence in Lower Walmer, England, on the 13th of August.

GEN. BUTLER has written a letter to his ancient political associates in Massachusetts, in which he says: "When I left home I left all politics, in a party sense of the term, behind me, and I now know no politics in any sense, save as represented by the question, how best to preserve the Union and restore the country in its integrity. Peace is desirable to all, and to none more so than the soldier who has left his friends and his home to do his duty to his country. But however desirable, it is not to be purchased upon any terms save the recognition of the authority of the Federal Government over every inch of territory which ever belonged to it. Upon no condition whatever, other than this, would I consent to peace. A peace involving the disintegration of the Union, or until the supremacy of the Government is for ever established, would be simply a declaration of perpetual war of sections. Were the Southern Confederacy to-day acknowledged in the fulness of good faith, two months would not elapse before causes of war would arise, sufficient not only to justify, but to demand a renewal of the conflict. No two months have passed, in the last ten years at least, in which outrages have not been committed upon Northern men in the South, which, had they been perpetrated by a foreign nation, would have demanded a redress of grievances, under pain of a suspension of diplomatic relations. But we have borne these outrages because there was no tribunal to the arbitrament of which we could submit them, and it was against the genius of our people to appeal to arms. Therefore I see with pain, upon the part of some of those with whom I have acted in political organizations, a disposition to advocate peaceful settlements wherein there can be no peace. Therefore this war must go on, not for the purpose of subjugation—but if those who have commenced it bring upon themselves that condition as an incident, it will only be another illustration of the fruit of sowing the wind. Besides these there are no other politics."

MR. GERARD HALLOCK, who has so long been connected with the New York Journal of Commerce, has sold his interest to Mr. Stone, the commercial editor, and Mr. Prime, one of its chief contributors. The paper, under its new management, has been restored to the privileges of the mail, and it is understood that it will sustain the Government in the prosecution of the war.

BAYARD TAYLOR, who had been spending the last three months at Gotha, Germany, with the relatives of his wife, is expected home by every steamer. Immediately upon his return, he will join one of the divisions of the National army as the war correspondent of the Tribune.

IT is stated by the Washington correspondent of the Express that an appeal to Mrs. Lincoln has been drawn by an earnest and strong-minded Union woman, to desist, for the time, from pleasure-seeking and frivolous display.

COL. WALRATH of the 12th N. Y. Regiment, accused of cowardice at Bull Run, has been acquitted of the charge by the Court Martial convened to try him. The Court gives its opinion "that Col. Walrath showed himself on the occasion a good officer and a brave man."

DR. PALMER, formerly of the Atlantic Review, and who edited a recent translation of Michelet's "L'Amour," is now a surgeon in the rebel army.

IN a most delightful article on Lord Herbert, Mr. Willis, says, with a charming simplicity entirely in keeping with his artless nature: "The romance of his life lay in the deep affection he entertained for Caroline Norton, which she is supposed to have reciprocated. Why they never married was known only to themselves. The surmises of friends, the conjectures of enemies, were equally at fault on that matter. They both guarded their secret jealously, sacredly." The goose that put his head in the bush to hide the rest of its body, is nothing to an editor when he gives himself up to fine and fashionable writing. The secret, which was known only to themselves, and which they guarded so sacredly, was known to all the rest of the world as well. Mr. Norton was married in 1827 to Mrs. Norton, and is still his wife. English noblemen, or Dundrearys, are very great fools, but they are not such fools as heedlessly to indulge in bigamy.

FOREIGN NEWS.

BY the Africa, off Cape Race, six days later intelligence from Europe has been received. She left Liverpool on the 31st of August, and Queenstown on the 1st inst. It is announced that the army in Canada is to be reinforced by 2,500 men, in the course of the present month. The London Times still harps upon the cotton question, and urges that the Government shall strain every nerve to develop the cultivation of the staple in India. The London Daily News has an article upon fugitive slaves, and concludes that the Federal cause is henceforward to be identified with the abolition of slavery. News of the exploits of the Sumter had been received from the West Indies. It is reported that the privateer has captured forty vessels and destroyed them, causing great excitement there. Queen Victoria had left Ireland for Balmoral. Wheat and corn are to be admitted into the ports of France, temporarily, free of duty. The subject of brigandism in Italy has been made the matter of a diplomatic circular from Baron Ricasoli, who says that the trouble in the Neapolitan provinces is inspired from Rome; he asserts that the Government will not pause in its efforts for the unity of Italy. Cardinal Antonelli is preparing an answer to the circular. A pamphlet on Rome has made its appearance in Paris, and created a sensation. An appeal is to be made to the people in case the Pope refuses to make the guarantees demanded. The affairs of Hungary remained unchanged. Finland demands a separation from Russia. The Emperor of Russia has sent a rescript to Poland, very conciliatory in its tone. Cotton and Breadstuffs were firm. Provisions dull. Consols 92¾ @ 92⅞.

THE mounted diamonds of the late Sultan of Turkey have been brought to the "hammer" in London, a strange transformation, which the wildest of Arabian Nights' dreamers could hardly have dreamt of. The first day's sale realized nearly £9,000, gold-mounted snuff-boxes forming the prominent objects of the sale.

THE Manchester Cotton Supply Association is getting to work in Egypt. The principal hindrances are the want of labor and capital. Machinery must supplement the labor of the human hand, and advances to the natives will be the means of giving them capital and stimulus, too.

WHILE the dividends of the great English lines are retrograding, French railway property is rapidly improving. The shares of the leading French line—the Paris, Lyons and Mediterranean—have advanced from 930l., at which they stood in January, to upwards of 1,000l now. In the same period the London and North-western stock has receded from 101 to 91.

A LATE London paper states that the silver belt presented to Heenan, but not paid for at the time of presentation, and therefore not retained by him, was sold by public auction amongst a stock of unredeemed pledges. It was knocked down at 51 guineas. The original value of the belt was 100 guineas, and it weighs between 50 and 60 ounces.

WHILST the Emperor of France was at Vichy, he was taking a walk on the banks of the Sichon and lost his way. A laborer chancing to pass at the time, His Majesty made the necessary inquiry of him.

"Second to the right and then first to the left, Sire," said the man.

"What! you know me?"

"Yes, and have had the honor for years past."

"Where."

"Your Majesty, of course, does not remember me, but you were once the cause of my passing two days in the black-hole; for when you were at Ham I was a soldier there, and was punished for passing you in a pound of tobacco."

"Well," said the Emperor, "it shall be my turn now," and in a few days afterwards the man was installed in a well-stocked tobacconist's shop.

IT is sometimes supposed that imprisonment for debt has been almost abolished in England, but the official returns show that in the past year there were committed to the prisons of England for debt and on civil process no less than 11,068 men and 639 women, in all 11,707; and, large as the number seems, it never was so small in any year since 1856. In the five years, 1851–55, the annual average was 7,347; in the five years, 1856–60, it has been 13,630.

THE London Spectator has this paragraph under its heading of "News of the Week": "The American Congress has voted the men and the money required by the President, and twenty per cent. more, and the House of Representatives has affirmed by 92 to 55 that it is 'no part of the duty of officers to capture fugitive slaves.' The hand moves slowly on the dial, but it moves, and when the finger passes the hour, the knell of Slavery will ring out with a clang which will startle Europe."

A VOICE FROM OLD ENGLAND.—The author of "Tom Brown's School Days at Rugby," concludes a letter to Macmillan's Magazine in the following words:

"It is the battle of human freedom which the North is fighting, and which should draw to them the sympathy of every Englishman, and make him cast to the winds all Morrill tariffs and angry talk about Canada, all bad manners and hard words. If the North is beaten, it will be a misfortune such as has not come on the world since Christendom arose. An empire will be founded in these Southern States on the simple base of slavery, having no other starting point or principle whatever than their right to enslave men of their own flesh and blood. It is of no use to speculate upon what the acts and policy of such a State will be. The world will see that soon enough, should it arise. Meantime the Northern States stand alone between us and it, and the greatest misfortune which can happen to us and to mankind will be their defeat. God grant that they may hold on, and be strong! God grant that they may remember that the greatest triumphs have always come, and must always come, to men through the greatest humiliations. God himself could not set men free but through this rule."

THE French Court of Cassation, corresponding to our United States Supreme Court, has just pronounced a decision of considerable importance as respects religious freedom. It amounts to this, that Protestants may lawfully educate their own children by the employment of private tutors. Strange as it may appear at this date, the right to do so was heretofore denied by the ecclesiastical authorities, and two inferior courts gave decisions in favor of the latter. The dispute arose in the department of Haute Vienne, whose people feel joyous over the great victory.

THE deepest deposit of guano is 70 feet. According to Humboldt, a deposit of three centuries would not exceed one-third of an inch in thickness. By an easy mathematical calculation, it will be seen that at this rate it would take almost countless centuries to form the deepest guano bed.

IT is said the proprietress of the Soho Theatre is the celebrated Albina di Rhona, a Servian Princess.

THE Siamese Ambassadors know nothing of European art. The Emperor has ordered for the galleries at Versailles a large painting representing their official presentation at Fontainebleau, and in it, of course, the artist has been obliged to represent some of them only in profile. But they made vehement objections to being made to figure, to use their own expression, "with only one eye!" The artist remonstrated with them, and at last, though not without great reluctance, they consented to be painted in profile; but they only did so on the express condition that a certificate should be given to them, in French and Siamese, to the effect that it was not of their own free will that they were represented with one eye only.

THE DRAMA AT HOME.

THEATRICAL affairs in the city, notwithstanding "the times," look well for the coming season. The principal event will, of course, be the opening of WALLACK'S NEW THEATRE, which is expected to take place about the 20th inst. The edifice, in its interior arrangements, will combine all the improvements, as regards comfort and acoustics, which the experience of the veteran manager can suggest. It is arranged to accommodate a large audience, without sacrificing that air of coziness essential to the proper enjoyment of the play, be it tragic or comic, and which gave to the "old stand" in Broadway a principal charm. Ample provision has been made for the exit of the audience—an important consideration in all respects, but especially as regards the contingency of fire. Mr. Wallack, it is understood, will retain all the established favorites of his old troupe, besides infusing some new blood—an annual necessity, by the way, in every theatrical company. The opening piece will be a new one from the pen of Tom Taylor, the author of "Our Yankee Cousin." ......Seven and nine are magic numbers. Miss KEENE "runs" on the first, and will this season substitute "The Seven Sons" for "The Seven Sisters," which had so long and profitable a run last season. She opens on the 16th, with a company consisting of herself, Mrs. J. H. Allen, Mrs. Lotty Hough, Miss Sarah Stevens, Mrs. Chanfrau, Mrs. Marlowe, Mrs. Dillon, Miss Burke, Miss Frances, Miss Everett, Mr Burnett, Mr H F. Daly, Mr. Levick, Mr. Peters, Mr. Dillon, Mr. G. H. Stoddart, Mr Marlowe, Mr Goodrich, Mr Bilby and Mr. Richardson.......MRS. JOHN WOOD opened the Winter Garden successfully, on the night of the 9th, with a grand spectacular piece, "Cinderella," in which Mrs. Wood's voice finds excellent play. She is efficiently assisted by Miss Ada Clifton, Mrs Bascomb, Mrs. W. R. Blake, Miss Lothian, Mr. Lewis Baker, Mr. Dolly Davenport and Mr. Harry Pearson; a new orchestral conductor, Mr. Koppitz, also presides in the orchestra..... PROF. HERMAN, the prestidigitateur (look well to your jaws, oh, reader!), commences a series of occult exhibitions at the Academy of Music, on the 16th. His conjurations are effected without the aid of the usual apparatus of the minor professors of the Black Art, and are of a higher grade than we have been accustomed to—quite different from the ancient and threadbare mechanical trickery of "inexhaustible bottles" and rabbits cut out of the centre of a loaf of bread.

ART, LITERATURE, MUSIC AND THE DRAMA ABROAD.

AMONG the novelties of the winter operatic season in London will be, it is said, an opera by William Vincent Wallace, "The Rose of Zurich," earlier in date than "Lurline" and "The Amber Witch." Mr. Wallace is said to be engaged on another opera, with Mr Planché as collaborateur.

MR. DELMON GRACE, employed by Mr. Boucicault for the part of Salem Scudder, in his drama of "The Octoroon," will take his departure for England on the 14th inst., in the City of Baltimore. Mr. Jamieson, engaged for the part of Uncle Pete, will also soon depart.

MR. VINCENT NOVELLO, the head of a large family of musicians, died recently at Nice, aged 80. All organists, here as well as in Europe, have his arrangements of old cathedral music, and the beauties of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Hummel and other German composers, as voluntaries. Among his numerous family are Mrs. Cowden Clarke, Miss Clara Novello, and the musical publisher, John Alfred Novello. The deceased was for many years attached to the musical staff of the chapel of the Spanish Embassy, London, and took much interest in the proceedings of the Philharmonic Society, of the council of which he was a member.

A NEW volume is announced to appear in London on the Natural History of Ceylon, by Sir Emerson Tennent, with numerous illustrations from original drawings, to be entitled "Sketches of the Natural History of Ceylon," and comprising anecdotes illustrative of the habits and instincts of the mammalia, birds, reptiles, fishes, &c., of the island.

THE Baroness Vigier (in her maiden days Mlle. Cruvelli) has just appeared as an amateur composer by publishing some vocal variations on a Tyrolese theme.

SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON is said to receive 100 guineas for each weekly instalment of his "Strange Story" in All the Year Round.

THE Journal de Frankfort says: "It may be remembered that a Duke of Wurtemberg some time since married at Hamburg a Mdlle. Frassini, a singer at the opera in that city. A few days since the Prince de Loewenstein-Wertheim, following the example, visited Hamburg for the purpose of celebrating his marriage with an actress, a native of that city, Mdlle. Amelie Williravo."

THE Government of the King of Italy have resolved to hold an exhibition of Art and Industry at Florence in the months of September and October. Italy will see for the first time the works of her artists and the products of her industry collected together under the roof of a Crystal Palace. An official announcement has been circulated, which specifies the following as the principal features of the exhibition: It will be divided into three departments—Agricultural, Industrial and Artistic. It is calculated that there will be about 5,000 contributors. In the Artistic Department the works of artists deceased during the last 20 years will be exhibited, as well as those of living artists. The Cattle Show will comprise not only the products of the peninsula, but also those of Sardinia and Sicily. Two thousand workmen are now engaged upon that part of the Palace of Industry which is to hold the works of painters and sculptors.

MISS PATTI is to receive £200 per night for singing at four concerts to be given at the Birmingham Musical Festival.

MR. EDWIN BOOTH has arrived in England, and would appear for the first time, at the Haymarket, in the character of Iago.

THE Chevalier Ira Aldridge, K. S., the negro tragedian, is about to proceed to Russia, to undertake a series of those Shakespearean performances which have been crowned with such brilliant success in numerous foreign capitals. He will fulfil engagements in various parts of Prussia, Austria and Russian Poland, as well as in Moscow, St. Petersburg and Odessa; and overtures have been made him to appear in Paris, under illustrious patronage.

Christy's Minstrels were recently engaged especially by the Mayor of Southampton, to appear before their Imperial Highnesses, the Archduke and Archduchess of Austria.

BILLIARDS.

Edited by Michael Phelan.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—All questions sent to Mr. Phelan in reference to the rules of the game of billiards will in future be answered in this column. It would be too much labor to send written answers to so many correspondents.

☞ Diagrams of Remarkable Shots, Reports of Billiard Matches, or Items of Interest concerning the game, addressed to the Editor of this column, will be thankfully received and published.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. P., Windsor, Vt.—Your idea is far from new. It has been practically applied long since.

Q., Wilmington, Del.—The stroke, if made as described, is foul.

J. S., Milwaukee.—It is entirely out of our line.

NOTA, Cleveland.—You will find such information as you desire, in full, in the number of the Billiard Cue for the present month.

THE WORLD OF BILLIARDS.

WEAK NERVES.—A man with weak nerves will never be a uniformly successful billiard-player. To be able to play on all occasions with his full strength, a man must have his nerves under perfect control. Players who are in the slightest degree excitable or nervous are often unable to play before spectators, and should never attempt to play for money. Inferior players have been reduced, from nervous excitement, to a state bordering upon prostration; and instances are known where they have been incapable of imparting to a ball even sufficient strength to enable it to reach another. Players of every grade, however, may be found who suffer from this cause. A game was once played on which large sums were depending. The game was called, was repeated by the player. He hesitated, again demanded the score, the marker called it. The player then gave a safe miss, when his opponent lacked but one of the game. On another occasion, a game was played in a room crowded with spectators, and most of them were interested in the result. The player required but two points to complete the game, and an easy shot presented itself. The player, in a state of nervous excitement, actually played with the red ball! Two gentlemen were in the habit of playing together for nearly two years in a certain room. One day a spectator offered a large bet on the result, which, to the astonishment of all present, one of the parties accepted the proposal. He played his game coolly, and won the bet. The other gentleman made a trifling bet; during the progress of the game he evinced the greatest anxiety. The two players lacked but one each of the game; the marker called the score, and the gentleman who had made the trifling bet, on hearing the announcement, actually fainted away. "Faint heart never won fair lady," nor anything else.

WHAT AN ENGLISH WRITER SAYS OF BILLIARDS.—A recent English writer says that billiards may be reckoned as a science, the practice of which not only improves and strengthens the mind, but gives tone and vigor to the body. A good, active player walks about two miles an hour round and about the table. The act of striking the ball provides exercise for the arms, opens the chest, and compels a certain degree of motion in all parts of the body. In fact, he knows of only two instruments, the use of which brings all the muscles into play, and they are the spade and the billiard-cue. A friend of this writer had an only daughter, who, from the effects of a fall in her infancy, had contracted a high shoulder, which proved a real deformity as the young lady approached womanhood. Her father consulted the most eminent physicians, but the only specific they could recommend was exercise. The young lady rode, and danced and walked, and ran, and played with the skipping-rope, and used the dumb-bells till she grew rosy-faced and plump, but the high shoulder still remained to mar her graces. A young medical student happened to visit the young lady's father, and the old gentleman spoke of the only thing which spoiled his happiness—his daughter's deformity. "Now," said the student, "you have tried many remedies, but none of them touch the part affected. Riding and walking are excellent kinds of exercise, but they don't bring the right muscles into action. Let me recommend billiards." The old gentleman took his advice, and quietly set about erecting a billiard-room. The student taught the young lady to play, and in less than a year the deformity was so far reduced as to be scarcely perceptible. The English writer vouches for the truth of the cure, of his own positive knowledge. Ladies, make a note of it!

THE LONGEST MATCH EVER PLAYED IN ENGLAND.—The longest match ever played in England was between a French gentleman and Mr. Bedford. It consisted of 300 games, of 21 up. When 200 games had been completed, Mr. Bedford, suffering from fatigue, requested that a number of games should be named, at the expiration of which the match should cease. To Mr. Bedford's astonishment, his opponent named 83 more. The match occupied two days and a night, during which period the French gentleman took nothing but fluids.

THE REPUBLIC OF ANDORRE.—Very few people are aware that, in spite of all the changes which have taken place in France during the last 80 years, there actually exists, in one corner of the Empire, a diminutive republic, founded 1,000 years ago! The statement is proved by the French Budget recently published, in which figures a tribute paid to the Treasury by the Republic of Andorre, in virtue of a treaty concluded under Louis I. (Louis le Debonnaire) about the year 810, by which the inhabitants of Andorre, recognizing the suzerainty of France, agreed to pay 960 livres (francs) per annum for the privilege of exporting some of their products. This tribute was suppressed at the commencement of the Revolution of 1789, but was re-established in 1806, at the request of the Andorreans themselves. The Republic of Andorre is composed of two valleys of the Pyrenees, between Foix and Urgel. It is still governed by a constitution and laws, which have never been changed since the days of Charlemagne. The Government is composed of a sovereign Council of twenty-four members elected by the parishes. This Council holds five annual sessions. It chooses a syndic, or presiding officer, who retains office for life or during good behavior. The capital of this peaceful little state, by whose example greater Republics might profit, is called Andorre, and has a population of 2,000 souls. The total population of the Republic is 15,000.

A RECONNOITERING DETACHMENT OF GENERAL BANKS'S CAVALRY—HYATTSTOWN, MARYLAND, IN THE DISTANCE.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ATTACHED TO GENERAL BANKS'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 282.

FORT HATTERAS, NORTH CAROLINA.

In the second edition of our last number we published a sketch by Mr. Kaulbach, of Max Weber's regiment, representing the bombardment of Fort Hatteras. We now present our readers with one of the Fort, taken since it has been in the possession of the Union troops. We have given so full a description of the Fort, that we have now only to add a few facts. Our map last week has made the public familiar with its location, which is on the inner side of the north-western beak of Hatteras Inlet, commanding the approaches from Pamlico Sound, and, in conjunction with Fort Clark, from the Atlantic. Since it has been in our possession we have made it much stronger by additional works, more guns, and an entire alteration of plan. More we are not at liberty to add. The strip of sand on which it is built varies in width from about 600 yards to about a mile and a half, and is spotted here and there with a kind of scrub oak, which at first were considered masked batteries. Our correspondent informs us that "the mosquitoes are something worse than rebels, and much harder to beat, for they stand their ground manfully, and have drawn more blood than their Southern fellow-creatures, the Secessionists."

Fort Clark, where the Ninth regiment, under Colonel Hawkins, is stationed, is about 700 yards to the north of Fort Hatteras, and is also materially strengthened since the 29th of August. With the vessels of war anchored in the offing, and inside the Inlet, all attempts to recapture either of these forts would be abortive in the present condition of the Confederate Navy. Since they have been in our hands nearly a thousand of the North Carolinians have come forward and taken the oath of allegiance; and the fact that the rebels have abandoned Fort Morgan on Ocracoke Inlet, about ten miles to the south, is evidence how little the Confederates rely on the adherence of North Carolina.

GENERAL BANKS REVIEWING GENERAL THOMAS'S BRIGADE, NEAR SANDY HOOK.

OUR Artist, now with Major-General Banks's staff, was present, a few days ago, at a very interesting review, near Sandy Hook, Maryland, the headquarters of General Banks. We are not justified in giving the full particulars in the present juncture of affairs, and consequently only add that the admirable manner in which General Thomas's brigade acquitted itself drew forth from General Banks the highest encomiums. It was a beautiful and striking scene—the thundering tramp of the artillery as it rattled past the General and his staff, while the Blue Ridge Mountains in the distance formed a background at once massive and grand. Although General Banks has seen no active service, he has in him all the qualities which make a great soldier. It was a deep misfortune to the country that he did not assume his present position three months earlier.

"FRESH BREAD!"—IMPROMPTU OVEN BUILT BY THE NINETEENTH REGIMENT, NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS, IN GENERAL BANKS'S DIVISION, WESTERN MARYLAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ATTACHED TO GENERAL BANKS'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 279.

"For you, my lord, and Lady Kingswood, and my dear cousin Cyril, I hope and I pray that it may be so; for myself, the prospect only looks gloomier than ever."

"Why so, Maud?" he asked, regarding her with grave, almost stern attention.

"Because, my lord," she answered, "I presume your views respecting the disposal of my hand are unchanged as always."

"I have not, Maud," he replied emphatically.

"Then, my lord," she returned, with equal firmness.

He snatched, and thrusts of fate, and he bit his lip. Could there be method, after all, in Phillis Arden's insolence? He fastened his eyes upon her face to see if he could read there any clue to the truth of Phillis's assertion, but he saw that it was pale and unexpressively white. He noticed, however, that her eyes were fixed upon some object resting upon his library table, and he followed their direction with his own.

She was looking at a key—a large, old-fashioned, iron-bladened key—the key of the chamber in which Phillis had been confined.

"Why do you so studiously regard that key?" he interrogated, sharply. "Do you know it?"

"I do not," she said, hesitatingly.

A thing birth spread itself over her face. She did not know it by sight, yet some strange instinct told her that it was the key that kept Rose in confinement.

"I am reminded," said Lady Kingswood, musingly, "of a statement which has been made to me in as preposterous, as wholly impossible, that I do not, I confess, award it scarcely a portion of belief. I am assured that Lady Kingswood is more than I am, Love. I am very desirous of having some conversation with her. You will please to say, Lady Maud, I must confer with her, and that I will wait upon her in her own apartments, if she will be so kind as to appoint a time when she would name the earliest moment for the interview. Anyone upon her birthday that I can accept an escort, attired to no doubt. Your lordship will be good enough to seek Lady Kingswood herself, and bring to me an answer at the earliest possible moment."

Lady Maud in silence obeyed him and proceeded to Lady Kingswood's chamber her vision painful to both, and little likely to end in a solution satisfactory to either. I bring you a message—"

"My dear Maud, you erroneously interpret my words," interposed Lady Kingswood. "I do not say that what I am about to say will necessarily have reference to the subject of our last conversation, but it will follow on naturally new form altogether, and, perhaps, will have to little effect, because it will arise to you in the shape of advice."

Lady Kingswood paused for a moment, for her voice faltered at the last word.

Lady Maud did not speak, but the word "advice" had a strange, unpleasant effect on her ear.

Presently Lady Kingswood said,

"Maud, you have a heart young, guileless, pure, innocent and unsullied. You have been, fortunately, less contaminated by the frivolities of your station than many of your set moving in the same sphere. You have been spared, therefore, the temptations which accompany fostering attentions, low-bred flattery, and unmeaning compliments. You have been spared, in short, all that I am not, and the opposite one. Love temptations, because in pleasing to your human nature to create a sensation; especially is it attractive to womanly nature. She knows with inward delight that she has fascinated many, and he feels with silent exultation the homage paid to her by those where court is held by the rich and celebrating to be highly flattering. What is should be deemed humiliating. Having once permitted herself to become intoxicated by the incense of flattery, she is ever after in danger of being overcome by every fresh manifestation, and if they are not at once rewarded, she tries to secure them by miserable artifices derogatory to her self-respect. Betrothed to one, she seeks to command the worship of a host; she craves, eventually, to care for any one human being, even him to whom she may be united by the love too exacting to make. It is would be joy to live for him, so would it be to die for him, did his happiness or his honor need it. This is woman's love. Such is the love which I bear for you. Do you, my fancy-love, find an illustration of your song?"

"I do—I do, Lady Kingswood, in very surprisingly I do," cried Lady Maud, excitedly. "If I am young, if my youthful hopes and aspirations are unacceptable of being deceived, I am not deceived in that I love. Discreetly, Lady Kingswood, will I part with home, name, rank, wealth, all for him. I have no parents—had have not known parents to love. I have never felt a tender sentiment for any one but him. Therefore, I am not likely to be deceived in there ones my life. My deep attachment does not, in what, he has said to me, in the way he has acted to me, in the service he has rendered me, in the tenderness he may have professed for me. It is not that he is handsome in person, noble in mind, generous in thought, and gentle in the honor that I love him. I have ever known him such, and I am nothing being attached by them; in him they are evidences which add to the force of my affection. But, oh, Lady Kingswood, many of me to my mother—and he protected none otherwise than qualification, I should still love him!"

"He would never have won your love without them, Miss," exclaimed Lady Kingswood. "Yes—yes—"

Lady Maud's hand trembled on her shoulder, as she murmured,

"I love him, Lady Kingswood, and I love him for what I am not to do. I have no other thought—no other hope than what is centred in him, and if I love no one, then shall I never love!"

"I fear, Lady Maud," exclaimed Lady Kingswood with a shudder, "it is even so for you. You have surrendered your maiden love—it is lost for ever!"

"Not lost! Oh, no, Lady Kingswood," interposed Lady Maud—"given bearded by the plumbers of a large antique key, which she would have given worlds, if here, in bestow, to have had in her possession for one solitary hour.

Lady Maud had left little portable and less inclination for the task in—not once her by Lord Kingswood. She had not took Lady Kingswood since she had delivered to her, with such warmth of affection, the message from Lord Kingswood, and she had not seen her since, although she had in the course of curiosity, had in the interval of fruitful arrangements. Lady Kingswood had spoken to her on daily, and even harshly; notwithstanding that she had frowned her haughty and angry soul before she quitted her, the Kingswood of the best had kept her from sinking her eye she had laid down to repose or when she had risen from her couch in the morning.

She found Lady Kingswood in her drawing apartment, pacing it slowly and thoughtfully. She turned at Maud entered, and stood motionless. Her face was very pale, and seemed to be that she had been weeping. Her eyes were red, but even so, it was in the worn purposeful of grief she had displayed on quitting London for Sophie.

Lady Maud hesitated, and then stood still, she uncertain how to address Lady Kingswood; and the elegance of her form, to see whether she was still in no angry mood with her, but in her countenance and pair, she saw that all Lady Kingswood's hauteur, all her pride, all her stern anger had fled, and that she stood in no overbearing attitude before her.

All Lady Maud's reserve vanished. She ran up to Lady Kingswood and took her hand—it was burning hot.

"You are ill, Lady Kingswood, very ill!" she exclaimed.

Lady Kingswood dropped her arms about her, laid her head upon her shoulder, and sobbed like a child.

"I am glad, Maud, you have sought me, for I wish to speak a few words to you—to serve, perhaps, for the last time that I shall ever speak."

"Lady Kingswood," interrupted Lady Maud, expressing what she was about to say, "upon me, I have heard already an opposition of your views respecting my future. I know the warmth with which you have taken them, and I believe you to be actuated by a pure motive in what you have said to change my heart, they must change my nature ere they do. Therefore, let us not further discuss a subject painful to both, and little likely to end in a solution satisfactory to either. I bring you a message—"

"My dear Maud, you erroneously interpret my words," interposed Lady Kingswood. "I do not say that what I am about to say will necessarily have reference to the subject of our last conversation, but it will follow on naturally new form altogether, and, perhaps, will have to little effect, because it will arise to you in the shape of advice."

Lady Kingswood paused for a moment, for her voice faltered at the last word.

loving, and tender of your happiness, no devotion, no services of affection, no thoughtfulness to secure his earthly felicity, no constancy of ministration to his comfort and to his joys which you can bestow upon him, can overpay his deserts. Be sure, too, that all your solicitous efforts to secure his happiness will end in the accomplishment of your own."

Lady Kingswood sank into a seat, as if exhausted by her efforts to converse as much as by her emotions.

Poor Lady Maud was much affected by Lady Kingswood's concluding words. Presently Lady Kingswood lifted up her downcast head, and said,

"I am ill, dear Maud, and unable to maintain a conversation further with you. Come to me about this time to-morrow, I—I will talk with you again?"

"Shall I send for medical advice for you, Lady Kingswood?" asked Lady Maud, hastily.

"No—no," returned Lady Kingswood, in a low, sad tone; "my illness is of the mind, Maud."

"Has aught specially disturbed your mind this morning?" inquired Lady Maud, hesitatingly.

"No," replied Lady Kingswood. "Why do you ask?"

"Mr. Philip Avon has been here," she replied, in the same manner. "I thought you might have had an interview with him, and his rudeness——"

"No," replied Lady Kingswood; "I have not seen him, nor have I been informed of his arrival. I do not wish to see him; and if he should inquire for me, you will please give instructions that he be informed I am not well and cannot be disturbed."

"I will do as you wish, Lady Kingswood," answered Lady Maud; "but before I depart, let me remind you that you have made no allusion to my errand to you."

"What errand?" inquired Lady Kingswood, almost listlessly.

"It was a message from Lord Kingswood," returned Lady Maud.

She was startled by the manner in which Lady Kingswood sprung from her seat.

"Lord Kingswood?" she repeated, almost wildly. "When did it come? how? who brought it? what is it?"

"Lord Kingswood is here," replied Lady Maud, with an air of surprise.

"Here! What, at Kingswood Hall—beneath this roof with me! me! me!" she exclaimed, with passionate emphasis.

"In the name of mercy, Lady Kingswood, what has happened?" cried Lady Maud, "you terrify me when you look in this way at me. Lord Kingswood wishes very anxiously to see you; he requested me to say that he had some matters of the utmost importance to communicate to you."

"I comprehend his lordship's anxiety to see me."

"Indeed, Lady Kingswood," responded Lady Maud, "his lordship begged of me to prevail upon you to grant him an interview; he has something to communicate to you, which, he said, would be calculated to restore you to your native health and spirits."

"Some cunningly-forged lie, no doubt," rejoined Lady Kingswood, bitterly; "some cozening, speciously-framed tale to delude me. But I have heard too much already, and wish not to have it crowned by his justification of himself."

"I know not what to say, Lady Kingswood," said Lady Maud, with a perplexed air. "Both your ladyship and Lord Kingswood speak to me in riddles. I am at a loss to understand what is meant beyond that Lord Kingswood desires greatly to confer with your ladyship, and your ladyship seems very much indisposed to comply with the request."

"What if I were to see him, he cannot alter the past!" exclaimed Lady Kingswood, between her teeth; "he cannot make reparation for a wrong that is irreparable; he cannot expiate that which is unatonable. He may attempt to patch up and mend a broken heart, but he cannot make it whole again."

"Yet would it not be at least kind to hear him?" urged Lady Maud.

Lady Kingswood shook her head.

"His lordship said something about asserting his prerogative," added Lady Maud.

"He threatens, does he?" said Lady Kingswood, with a contemptuous smile.

Lady Maud clasped her hands appealingly, but said nothing further.

Lady Kingswood mused for a minute, and then suddenly, and with a strange emphasis, said,

"Well, Lady Maud, he shall have his prayer granted. I will see him! oh, yes! I will see him!"

"When?" inquired Lady Maud, eagerly.

"To-morrow, Maud, to-morrow, just one hour after you have visited me," she replied, with a peculiar expression. "Say to-morrow—and now leave me. I shall faint if I attempt to carry on this conversation longer."

She warmly, passionately embraced Maud, and then, pointing to the door, sank, sobbing hysterically, into a chair.

Lady Maud, gazing at her sorrowfully, slowly retired from the apartment.

CHAPTER LXIII.

NEITHER Lord nor Lady Kingswood had spoken to Lady Maud in direct terms of Eric Gower; both had alluded to him; but while the first had promised to recur to the subject again, the latter seemed to have exhausted it and intended to return to it no more—nay, she had done more, for she had abandoned all wish to see her united to the odious Philip Avon.

She knew well that Lord Kingswood, incited to address her on the hateful subject of Philip Avon, would first speak of it as a matter settled—would, moved by her hostility, proceed to reason with her, then argue with her, and ultimately conclude by sternly commanding her to fulfil his injunctions. Philip, on the other hand, would sneer at Eric, taunt her, scoff at, insult her. He would defiantly deride her rejection of his hand, and address her as if she were already his.

She therefore addressed a note to Lord Kingswood, in which she pleaded her own weak health as an excuse for not conveying to him Lady Kingswood's answer in person. She then communicated Lady Kingswood's assent to meet him and the time she had appointed for the interview.

Anxious as Lord Kingswood had been to have an interview with Eric after his arrangement with Sir Harris Stanhope and his conference with old Pengreep, he was grievously disconcerted to find him at Kingswood Hall.

He had a strange, almost insuperable repugnance to meet him alone in the ancient chamber in which he had caused him to be confined, and an almost equal unwillingness to put to him a proposition which, if he accepted, would be a surrender of his birthright, beneath the roof of Kingswood Hall.

He did not wholly give up his original intention of seeing and conversing with Eric alone before he despatched him to London; but after some consideration he determined to postpone the interview until the following day.

He fancied that it would have a salutary effect upon the youth to keep him for four and twenty hours at least in solitary confinement. Lord Kingswood believed that, vexed by confinement and neglect, Eric would be tempted to listen to reason—that is, reason from his lordship's point of view. So he decided that he would not seek an interview with him until the following morning.

While deeply abstracted in these ruminations, Lady Maud's maid, Harebell, appeared with the note her young mistress entrusted her to carry to him. She placed it in his lordship's hands, and stood still, close to the library table, while he perused it, as if waiting for a reply.

She, too, fastened her eyes upon a large antique key which lay within reach of her fingers.

Lord Kingswood read the note with seeming satisfaction. A cold, proud smile curled his upper lip as he said to the girl,

"You will present my thanks to Lady Maud St. Clair, and inform her ladyship that the appointment shall be kept."

"If you please, my lord," said Harebell, curtseying, "Benson, the gamekeeper, who is watching the door of the goblin room in the eastern wing, told me to ask your lordship whether the young gentleman who had been put in there is to have anything to eat while he remains?"

"Oh, by all means, certainly," replied Lord Kingswood, quickly. "Let refreshments be served to him at regular intervals."

"I beg your pardon, my lord," said Harebell, slightly raising her voice, "but Benson says, if the young gentleman is to have dinner served up to him, how is he to take it into the room while the door is locked?"

"Oh, aye, true—I forgot," responded Lord Kingswood, taking up the key, which seemed to fascinate Harebell in so strange a manner. "This is the key of the room; give it to Benson," he said, handing it to her. "Tell him that on no account, nor on any plea, is he to permit the inmate of that room to leave it, neither is he to admit within it any other person than himself, on pain of dismissal. Let this key, when the refreshment has been served, be returned to me."

"Yes, may it please you, my lord," exclaimed the girl, taking possession of the key with much avidity, adding, "Benson wants to know, too, if you please, my lord, that when the young gentleman has had his supper will there be any occasion for him to wait?"

Lord Kingswood mused for a minute or so, and then said,

"No—no, it will be unnecessary. Let him be careful, before he retires for the night, that the door is secure; that will be sufficient."

"Thank ye, my lord," responded Harebell, with a sharp, quick curtsey, and she disappeared from the apartment.

Arming himself with a gun, and taking a dog with him, Lord Kingswood quitted Kingswood Hall for the Chace, as if to enjoy an hour's shooting alone, for he would not permit any one to accompany him.

Harebell in the meantime returned to her young mistress, and knocking at her chamber door, begged to be allowed to say a few words to her.

Lady Maud was hardly pleased at the interruption, for, with her burning cheek laid upon her hand, she was trying to contrive some mode of communicating with Eric. She, however, rose up and gave admittance to Harebell.

"What do you wish to say to me, Harebell?" she inquired.

"Why, if you please, my lady, I took your note to Lord Kingswood, and his lordship presents his thanks to your ladyship, and he will keep the appointment," answered Harebell.

"You could have told me that at any time, Harebell," said Lady Maud.

"So I could, if you please, my lady," she replied; "but any time would not do for the favor I want to ask of your ladyship."

"Favor, Harebell? What is it?" responded Lady Maud.

"Does your ladyship know Benson—the gamekeeper Benson?" asked Harebell.

"I do—by sight," rejoined Lady Maud.

"Well, my lady, it is Benson who has been set to watch the goblin chamber in the eastern wing, where the poor young gentleman is locked in."

"What of Benson, tell me, Harebell?" she exclaimed.

"Why, you see, my lady," answered Harebell, "when I carried your ladyship's note to Lord Kingswood, I don't know however it was, but I lost my way in the corridors and came right upon Benson, who, with a gun resting on the hollow of his arm, was keeping watch outside the door of that horrid ghost hole. I was like to faint at first with fright, but Benson held me up and told me not to give way to my feelings, and so I wanted to know what he did there, and he told me; then I wanted to know who was to give Mr. Eric anything to eat to keep him from starving, and he said he didn't know, he had no orders, and so, my lady, I thought as I went to the library I would ask Lord Kingswood, and say it was Benson who wanted to know what he was to do about it."

"And his lordship's reply? Quick, quick, my good girl," exclaimed Lady Maud, eagerly.

Harebell held up the antique key, and swung it backwards and forwards by the handle.

"That is his lordship's reply," rejoined Harebell, with dancing eyes and the display of a very even row of white teeth.

A thousand thoughts—a world of wishes—rushed through Lady Maud's brain at sight of that key, but she felt that she dare not ask for it, nor even display any anxiety respecting it. Harebell was not actuated by similar feelings.

"The favor I have to ask of your ladyship is," she continued, still with a peculiar, mirthful shrewdness in her smile, "to permit me to take this key to Benson, and bid him supply Mr. Eric with whatever refreshment he requires."

"Oh—yes—certainly," exclaimed Lady Maud, hesitatingly, distressed to think she could not properly invent a stratagem to communicate herself with Eric without making a confidant of this girl.

As if Harebell read her thoughts in her expressive features, she said,

"I beg your pardon, my lady," returned Harebell; "but the fact is, all the household like Mr. Eric, and they would do anything for him they could without offending Lord Kingswood. Now, he has been treated cruelly enough already to-day, and somebody therefore ought to treat him with kindness, so I thought that if your ladyship would just write two or three lines to him to ask what refreshment he would like, and when he would wish to have it—it would, my lady, seem to him, lonely and miserable as he must be, that he is not forsaken by all the world."

Why, it was the very stratagem that Lady Maud could not think of until thus put before her very eyes and into her hands.

Her heart was too full to speak, but Harebell's quick glance detected the large tear which had sprung into her eye. She hurried to her desk without a word, and sat down to write.

In a burst of excitement she wrote a few hurried, passionate, loving lines, expressive of the agony his position occasioned her, and breathing a hope that Heaven would permit them to meet once more ere it sundered them for ever.

She would not even read the note after she had written it, but with cheeks of the hue of the carnation, she handed it to Harebell, and bade her hurry with it to its destination.

"Where are you going, pretty little Suky?" exclaimed the spoken-of Benson, "all eyes," as he gazed on her pretty face.

"I want to go into that chamber," she said.

"My orders are to let no one in or out," he said, "and I must obey my orders, even though so pretty a wench as thou bid me nay."

"Did you think Mr. Gower was to be suffered to starve here all day?" she exclaimed. "No, gamekeeper, he is not. Lord Kingswood has given the key to me. I am going to ask Mr. Eric what he would like for his dinner, and then I shall carry it to him, and when that is done I am to give the key to you until supper-time. Lord Kingswood's orders are that, while you have the key, you are not to admit a soul into that room, nor to let the inmate of that room depart from it on any pretence whatever. When the bell rings for supper, I shall come again and take the key back to Lord Kingswood, and you may then retire to your bed."

"My bed, wench? what, in yon corner, I suppose?" returned the gamekeeper, with a sneer. "I be to watch here all the night."

"Lord Kingswood ordered me to say that a night-watch was unnecessary," rejoined Harebell, emphatically. "So that when I take the key the last thing, you may go your way to your hut in the forest."

A moment more and Harebell passed into the room, where she saw Eric standing leaning upon his elbows on the window-ledge, and looking out thoughtfully into the Chace.

She began talking to him about what kind of refreshment he would like to take, and he rather impetuously declined taking any, but she raised her finger in a cautioning manner, slipped Lady Maud's letter into his hand, and in an undertone asked a message back in reply. He was only too enraptured to have the opportunity of sending one, but there were no writing materials in the room.

He had, however, a pocket-book, and he tore a leaf from it, and was about to write upon it, when Harebell stopped him.

"It is necessary to be very cautious," she whispered. "Be careful what you say, I might lose the paper or it might be taken from me. Don't you think, sir, it would be better if you were to say to the young lady herself all that you wish to write?"

"It would, indeed," exclaimed Eric, with eager anxiety; "but how is an interview to be accomplished?"

"Leave that to me," returned Harebell. "All you have got to do is to write on that bit of paper, and beg Lady Maud to come to you and speak with you, if only for five minutes. I'll do all the rest."

Eric seized her hand and wrung it. Then he wrote in terms of passionate entreaty for Lady Maud to grant him an interview, if only for a few moments, as Harebell had suggested.

He handed the note to the girl, who hastily slipped it down her bosom, and then whispered,

"We shall not be here until after nightfall."

Raising her voice, she requested to know at what hour she should bring him some refreshment, and on replying "a few hours hence," she quitted him, turned the key in the lock, and then handed it to Benson.

She turned abruptly down a flight of steps, for she saw Philip Avon, with a scowling visage, advancing towards the chamber in the eastern wing.

Harebell was prepared to find her young mistress eagerly expecting her. Poor Lady Maud! she was no adept at the art of dissimulation, although she endeavored to accomplish her aim without admitting Harebell to her confidence. Abstracted, perplexed and distressed, Lady Maud had almost determined to run all risks and confide the real state of her heart to Harebell, when the latter, engaged in repairing some antique lace, said abruptly,

"This old point, my lady, reminds me of the old ancient chamber in which there pines a fair young lord locked in with an old, ancient key. Poor young gentleman, he looked so piteous, and begged so hard to be able to interchange a word with your ladyship, that if it was poor I, I don't know how I ever should refuse him."

"I know not how to grant his request," exclaimed Lady Maud, in distressed accents. "The room is locked and guarded, and if Lord Kingswood were to know that I had visited him he would be so very angry with me."

"So, my lady, perhaps he would be if he knew that your ladyship had written to him," rejoined Harebell. "Whatever Lord Kingswood may think and say, there can be no harm in just hearing what Mr. Eric has to communicate to your ladyship."

"But how is it to be arranged?" inquired Lady Maud.

"I relieve guard," Harebell said. "When Ben on goes off duty, I go on. That is to say, my lady, I take the key of the room from Benson, to return it to Lord Kingswood, and between my receiving the key and giving it up to Lord Kingswood, you shall see Mr. Eric."

"Thank you, my good Harebell. I will place my trust in you, and I will go to see Mr. Eric to-night," said Lady Maud.

"Of course you will, my lady, and happy will he be. Poor gentleman! it will be something to cheer him while in that awful, lonely, ghostly, horrid room," rejoined the girl. "Now that I know what we are going to do, now I shall know how to arrange," she added; "and if your ladyship will excuse me, I will make my preparations."

The sun was now sinking behind the distant hills, daylight had merged into twilight, the green foliage of the trees was fast changing into purple masses, and thick white mists were ascending from the valleys. Lady Maud sat wearily watching, believing the day would never end. Kingswood Hall was solemnly quiet, there was not a sound to be heard within the building, as there appeared not to be a leaf stirring without. The shadows grew longer and deeper, the pale, golden, greenish hue of the sky was changing into a violet tint, when Lady Maud was startled by finding Harebell at her side.

"Oh, my lady!" she exclaimed, almost out of breath, "there has been such a to-do—such a disturbance! What a terrible man Mr. Philip Avon, of Hawkesbury, is!"

"What has happened?" she inquired.

"I forgot to tell your ladyship that I met him advancing along one of the corridors as I quitted the eastern wing to-day, to bring you a note from Mr. Eric. I turned out of his path, and he did not see me; but it seems he went direct to Benson, and directed him to admit him to Mr. Eric's room. Benson referred him to Lord Kingswood, and Mr. Avon went into a passion, and called Benson names. Benson don't like to be called names. So he was firm, and Mr. Avon went out into the Chace to search for Lord Kingswood. Not being able to find him, he makes for Benson again, and this time he told Benson that he would throttle him and then take the key from him. But Benson put his gun to his shoulder, and pointing it at Mr. Avon, he very respectfully told him that he would blow his brains out if he attempted to touch him, and so Mr. Avon went away muttering vengeance against him."

"Has Mr. Avon left Kingswood Hall?" inquired Lady Maud, nervously.

"Oh, yes, my lady; but Benson thinks he will be back again, and that therefore he had better wait on the watch for the remainder of the night."

"How very unfortunate," she murmured. "I shall not be able to—to—see—to comply with Mr. Eric's request."

"Oh, yes, my lady," rejoined Harebell, quickly; "for if he comes back again, he will be told that Lord Kingswood has got the key; he will then have to find Lord Kingswood to get it, and will also find, when he does see him, that he has not got it. When he returns to the chamber in the eastern wing, I suspect that it will not be of much consequence who has got it. If you please, my lady, wrap yourself in your large cloak and hood, and be ready to depart from here directly you hear the nine o'clock servants' supper-bell ring. I must go to Benson to obtain the key, and then I will conduct you thither."

At the time appointed she made her appearance, and on they went, slowly and silently, until at length they paused at a door.

Harebell produced a ponderous key, and inserting it noiselessly into the lock, she turned it without sound, suffered the door to gently open, and admitted Lady Maud into the room. She drew the door to again, turned the key once more in the lock to secure it, withdrew it, and glided silently away.

Lady Maud, on finding herself within the small, old chamber, uttered a faint cry of alarm.

Before her stood a figure in all respects resembling a phantom.

The moon had risen, and its white, shining beams streaming through the window, fell upon the clear, open, handsome face of Eric, as he stood erect, motionless, peering towards the softly opening door.

Eric sprang forward and encircled the enshrouded figure in his arms. He drew her to the moonbeams, and she let fall the hood from her head, so that the silver rays gleamed on her fair, sweet young face, and he saw that her clear, lustrous eyes were bent upon his tenderly and lovingly.

"Sweet Lady Maud! dearest and kindest, how shall I thank you for this most generous and tender condescension?" he said, in a rich, earnest voice.

"Nay," she said, faintly, "I am but too, too joyful at having the opportunity, through the happy management of my maid, to interchange a few words with you. Oh, Eric, how I grieve that you should have been so insulted, so wickedly outraged as you have been this morning!"

"By Philip Avon, yes!" he exclaimed with stern bitterness; "but never heed it, sweet Maud. I treat his contumely with scorn. Still I cannot conceal from myself the respective positions in which we stand," he said, firmly. "You are young, beautiful, of high rank and assured position, the heiress of a name and fortune. I stand for the moment nameless and penniless—a fugitive, wandering in secrecy, and persecuted when I appear. Thus, my suit to you at first sight appears to be not only preposterous in its nature, but, on my part, the act of a designing scoundrel——"

"Eric!" ejaculated Lady Maud, with astonishment.

"And so, indeed, it would, dear Maud, if I were in very truth a nameless, penniless adventurer; but Heaven be thanked, I am only fortuitously so," he rejoined, quickly. "I have a name and rank, and ere long I will establish my title to it. In the interim, however—deep as my love is for you, Lady Maud, blissful as your face and form are to my eyes—I hold it to be an imperative duty that I should separate myself from you entirely, refraining from all personal interviews or communications, until I, having a name not less noble than your own, being of equal rank and wealth, can come forward and say, Lady Maud St. Clair, I love you tenderly, deeply, enduringly. I offer to you my hand, my heart, my life."

"You are sanguine, dear Eric, of being reinstated in your rights; I am not. You have told me that you have no friends——"

"But you, dearest!" he exclaimed.

"Lord Kingswood is wealthy, powerful and inflexible," she continued. "Measured against his strength, your greatest efforts must fail, and you must be crushed."

"I neither fear him nor his power," he said; "I dare the struggle, and I shall come from it victorious."

"Oh, Eric!" she returned, passionately, "my heart is bursting—breaking beneath this roof! All here for whose opinion you need care, save myself, are arrayed in bitter hostility against you. In the eye of Heaven, by your vow and my own, I am your wife! take me with you hence! I will cheerfully, gladly give up all I hold here, station and wealth, to share your fate. Take me, Eric; I have the means of flight. I have a small fortune of my own which Lord Kingswood cannot touch, and I have a wealth of love for you surpassing all the treasures of the world."

A sharp, hurried tap at the door interrupted her, and a voice breathed hissingly through the keyhole,

"For mercy's sake, Lady Maud, secrete yourself, Lord Kingswood is approaching the chamber."

Before Eric could think of a recess to answer this purpose, the door was struck a violent blow with some weapon, and the voice of Philip Avon, thickened by intoxication, cried,

"Hallo, you fox in the trap there! I want to worry you! Open the door or I'll break it in!"

(a) The game is well opened on both sides, the moves being made in strict accordance with the theoretical analysis laid down by the authors.

(b) Mr. Anderssen explained to us that he made this move without due deliberation, being of opinion that P to K B 5 would have given him a fine game.

(c) We believe that P to K B 6, instead of the move in the text, would have led at least to an even game.

(d) Mr. Kolisch does not fail to take immediate advantage of his adversary's weak play; Black's position is now very superior, and with due care victory must be certain.

(e) The best move under the circumstances.

(f) Played with Mr. Kolisch's usual ability; after this move the game is irrecoverable.

(g) R to Q 1 would have been unavailing, since Black would have replied with B to K 4, and if White had then taken Q Kt P with Rook, Black would have rejoined with Rook taking the Bishop, and winning a piece.

POLES v. PRAYERS.—We heard, a night or two since, a tolerably good story of a couple of raftsmen. The event occurred during the late big blow on the Mississippi, at which time so many rafts were swamped, and so many steamboats lost their sky riggings. A raft was just emerging from Lake Pepin as the squall came. In an instant the raft was pitching and writhing as if suddenly dropped into Charybdis, while the waves broke over with tremendous uproar, and expecting instant destruction, one of the raftsmen dropped on his knees, and commenced praying with a vim equal to the emergency. Happening to open his eyes for an instant, he observed his companion not engaged in prayer, but pushing a pole into the water at the side of the raft.

"What's that yer doing, Mike?" said he. "Get down on your knees, now, for there isn't a minit between us and purgatory."

"Be aisy, Pat," said the other, as he coolly continued to punch the water with the pole; "be aisy now! what's the use of praying when a feller can tech the bottom with a pole?"

BETWEEN Rood and the coast of Syria the Greeks used to water their ships at a submarine fountain. Another has been discovered recently by Mr. Wm. A. Booth off the coast of Florida. It is a boiling fresh water spring, twelve miles north by east from St. Augustine, and eight miles off shore. The water boils up with such great force that it can be seen at a distance of two miles. When first seen it has the appearance of a breaker, and it is consequently generally avoided, but there are five fathoms of water between it and the shore. Ten fathoms of water are found to the seaward, but no bottom is found at the spring itself with thirty fathoms of line. The water in the spring is fresh and by no means unpalatable. When the St. John river is high this spring boils up from six to eight feet above the level of the sea, and it has been many times reported as a rock with water breaking over it.

GREAT CURE.
Dr. Leland's
ANTI-RHEUMATIC BAND!

Permanently cures Rheumatism in its various forms, Gout and Neuralgia, also Nervous Affections, Spinal Complaints, General Debility, Impurities of the Blood, and a cure sure to follow in all Female Diseases.

It is a convenient and elegant Band or Belt, and requires no medicine compound, to be worn around the body, about the waist, regulating, adjusting itself, accommodating to any size, and can be worn without injury in the most delicate condition. It is the proper habit of living or regimen, and the proper means for drawn from the system without the use of medicine, and the proper remedy for all diseases arising from impurities of the constitution, and gives temporary relief only, by stopping the system and weakening its vitality. It will commence the medicinal properties contained in the Band, being at a proper temperature for the system, and will be found a most powerful absorbent, through the pores of the skin, to come into direct contact with the blood and general circulation, and not first pass through the process of digestion, as other remedies would, and only to detract from their curative powers, but we begin the thorough and complete work at the very fountain—first striking the impurities of the blood, and the result will be a healthy circulation, and the whole system will be strengthened and invigorated, and the cure permanent, by thus restoring the parts affected to a healthy condition. The Band is also a most powerful Anti-Bilious Remedy. Cannot bring the primary cause of a large part of the Liver, Stomach, Nervous and Bowel Complaints, Dyspepsia, and will entirely relieve the system from its pernicious influence.

Moderate cases are cured in a few days, and the most obstinate yielding unlooked for relief. Sent by mail to any part of the country, with full directions for use, by sending a letter from the principal office of

FORTUNE'S EDITION,
With 90 Engravings,
Compiled for a graduate of the U. S. Military Academy and by the Chief Officer of the Militia of the State.

The Volume is designed to explain and illustrate all that the Infantry Soldier needs to practice, to render him capable of properly filling his place, as the idea of military organization. The Author has had in view the fact that many Soldiers are well versed in theory, in their examinations for rank, and shown a lamentable ignorance in problem of every-day practice. This Volume is designed to meet this want, and to lay down the principles and accuracy of movement requisite for the most efficient discharge of the Soldiers, Officers and Privates.

Whether which will instruction to practice the Privates and Officers of Militia companies, and to be a guide to them in the general requirements of an inspection, together with the Infantry Drill, sufficiently described and illustrated to furnish each Soldier with such a will render the Soldier master of his place, and perfectly self-reliant when brought sharply in contact with the more disciplined soldiery armed, he will be successful and victorious.

As both Messrs and Mills Market are used in the U. S. army as full information is given in the Manual of Arms for each, together with numerous Illustrations of the various positions of the Soldier and his piece during the execution of the several movements.

The Author has also been taken to make an instruction of what has received official sanction, all the Exercises and Drills being in strict conformity with the latest regulations of the War Department, embracing all the improvements in Military Science, by which greater celerity of movement and greater precision are attained. Many unnecessary commands are omitted, thus rendering the Drill more simple, and the Soldier more proficient in the Exercises and Volutions of the U. S. Service, and a valuable item book for all who desire to become familiar with the Infantry Drill and Regular Army Rules.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1861, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 305.—Vol. XII.] NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 21, 1861. [PRICE 6 CENTS.

The Publisher of Frank Leslie's Newspaper to the Public.

OWING to the largely increased circulation of his various publications, involving as it has done considerable additions to his establishment, and in view of the augmented business duties incident to the prompt and satisfactory management of his affairs, the Editor and Publisher of this Paper has found it necessary to make new arrangements for its conduct, and such as are as satisfactory to himself, as he has no doubt they will prove to be to the public. Conscious that the times are momentous in themselves, and fraught with momentous consequences, he is ambitious to secure their full and truthful illustration, and also to render his paper a reflex of the National feeling, and a faithful ally of the National cause. He is equally anxious to make it, in its literary character, fully equal to the requirements of a refined and cultivated public. To this end, he has great satisfaction in announcing that he has secured the services of Hon. E. G. Squier as the future Editor of his Newspaper. Mr. Squier is too well known through his public services, and has a literary and scientific character too well established on both Continents to need a word of introduction or commendation here. His name is a sufficient guarantee that the Newspaper will be conducted with vigor, independence, judgment and impartiality. While it will discuss public affairs with freedom, it will avoid mere partisan influences, prejudices and objects, and devote itself only to what may be regarded as the best interests of the country. Not doubting for a moment the ultimate triumph of the present great National movement, and the reorganization of the Republic under higher and better auspices than before, in accordance with the more advanced sentiments of the age, and in conformity with the severe teachings of experience, the Newspaper will lend its efforts to the success of the one and the perfection of the other, with whatever of ability or influence it can command.

As regards the department of Illustrations, the Publisher, who was the first to establish an Illustrated Paper permanently in this country, has only to add that this department will continue to receive his constant and active attention. When the present war broke out, he determined to secure its pictorial illustrations fully and faithfully, and to that end, at a cost which would appear almost fabulous to general readers, placed a competent corps of artists in the field, at every interesting and important point of operations, north, south and west, to whose activity and ability the columns of the newspaper bear satisfactory witness. These efforts have been responded to by the public so completely as to involve not only the employment of additional artists, but the building of a number of additional presses for working the paper, of new and improved construction, so that now his establishment has the completest and best printing machinery of any similar establishment in the world, and of a capacity to meet promptly the public demand for the paper, hitherto often impossible.

With improved arrangements in every department, augmented facilities, and a rapidly increasing patronage, the Publisher congratulates himself on being able to publish in future, as he has done in the past, the leading Illustrated Newspaper of America, with no rival in Europe, with the possible exception of the London Illustrated News.

General Fremont's Proclamation—Emancipation.

On the 31st of August, General Fremont issued a Proclamation from St. Louis, declaring, among other things, that the military, real and personal, of all persons in the State of Missouri who shall take up arms against the United States, or who shall be directly proven to have taken an active part with their enemies in the field, shall be confiscated to the public use, and their slaves, if any they have, are hereby declared free men." We have now a Proclamation from General Halleck, dated the 30th, and giving practical effect to that of General Fremont, in the case of The son L. Sneed, of St. Louis, convicted of having "taken an active part with the enemies of his country," whose two slaves, Frank Lewis and Hiram Reed, are, consequently, "declared to be free, and are hereby discharged from the said bonds of service." This is the first proceeding under the Act of the late Congress, entitled, "An Act to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes," which we publish on the following page:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person claiming to be entitled to the service or labor of any slave, under the laws of any state, shall employ such person in aiding or promoting any insurrection, or in resisting the laws of the United States, or shall permit him to be so employed, he shall forfeit all right to such service or labor, and the person whose labor or service he is thus found shall be thereforth discharged therefrom, any law to the contrary notwithstanding."

A literal construction of this law would only authorize the emancipation of such slaves as have been individually employed by their masters in the rebel service, to prove which would probably in most cases be impossible, or at least involve long and complicated investigation. General Fremont, rightly interpreting the sentiment of the loyal North, and adopting bold measures, has given the law the only application which can be of practical use, and of the present emergency. For it is idle, discouraging to all earnest men, and damaging to our cause throughout the world, to discriminate, or to quote the distinctions between the property of the rebel property and uniformity to the slave. We unlikify ourselves, and justly incur the charge of weakness and vacillation, and, what is worse, subject to the charge of cruelty and wickedness, when we foolishly confiscate the ships and houses, and cattle of the rebel in arms, and yet refuse freedom to his slave, whom he chains as property, and sends into the rebel camps to fight for him against the nation.

It has been intimated that the Government would disapprove of General Fremont's proclamation. We disbelieve the report. Considerations of policy, or false notions of constitution, may have hitherto induced the Government to entertain such "distinctions"—for it is in this distinty way that a portion of the press speak of the atrocity of Slavery—with great circumspection, and to affect a desire to keep their country out of the contest just as if the whole world does not know that Slavery is at the beginning and the end, is the very essence and body, the motive and sustaining power of the present struggle on the part of the rebel States. But we hope the stern teachings of the past five months have taught it the folly of making a purpose which must source or later be avowed, and through the cessation of which alone can the country be restored, and its peace and prosperity secured.

We have sung hosanna to the Union, and have hailed with the Star-Spangled Banner right gradily, and proclaimed to mankind that it was only to uphold the one and perpetuate the other, that we have rushed to the red fields of war, and poured out freely our treasure and our blood. But we have failed to arouse the enthusiasm of the nation, and have not always secured their sympathy. At home, whatever of real strength we have had, apart from the whole-some patriotic flush of our youth, has been derived from the conviction that the result of the war must be, for the pacification of Slavery as a power in the State, and a circumscription of its limits; and secondly, ultimate emancipation.

We do not mean to say that any one contemplates these results as the work of a day, or through any violent disruption of existing social and political relations and organizations. But we do not suppose for an instant, that any reconstruction of the Union can be effected with Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas and Missouri as Slave States. The war will settle the question of Slavery within their borders, whatever may be their future political connections. It will determine whether the slaves of Missouri, and one-third of those of the other States named, have either escaped or been removed to the Gulf States. And it is to be more than the pure theory of the political, short of Slavery must be driven, to gather and break.

To this end Government has been driven too, and the proceedings under it, will largely contribute. Let it be known far and wide that the treason of the master is the freedom of the slave, and the loyalty of the slave will protect at the peril of their slaves until victory perches on our arms, and we are enabled to fix their future destinies, with due regard to the interests of the master, and those of the slave, and the permanent peace of the Union this shall be proclaimed and understood, we can afford to despise the hostile policy of foreign Governments, for we shall be sure of the hearty sympathies of their people, even under the ban of despotic power must respect; and we shall bring to the war a purpose, a will, and a principle, superadded to the old patriotism and love of freedom, before which the rebel haste will disappear like dew before the sun. General Fremont has laid the axe at the root of our present difficulties. He has acted promptly and consistently sustained on the whole line of our military operations, from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains, the cause of the Union and of humanity will have triumphed, and the prosperity, and its ultimate triumph will be assured, amidst the acclamations of mankind. The strength of the South consists in a settled, well-defined purpose, intelligible to all the soldiers, and in support of which they are capable of making any sacrifice, and ready to resort to any means. Our weakness is in a divided sentiment, a double aim, and through such overpowering means as a just God has put in our hands. Slavery has embroiled the country for half a century, disorganized its social and political life, demoralized its politics, corrupted its councils, and finally raised its impious hand against the best Government the world ever saw. Let it die!

After the above was written and put in type, a painful rumor was spread through the daily press that the Government, regarding the Proclamation of General Fremont as transcending his authorities and powers, had countermanded and superceded him in his command. The rumor has proved to be true only to this extent — the President has ordered the Proclamation of General Fremont to be modified in accordance to the strict letter of the law, as quoted above. That is to say, no slaves are to be freed, except such as have been individually employed by the enemy, "in aiding or promoting" it, "in aiding or promoting insurrection, or in resisting the laws of the United States." The letter of the President, making this order, is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., Sept. 11, 1861.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN C. FREMONT:

SIR—Yours of the 8th, in a sent to mine of 2d inst., is just received. Assuming that you upon the ground, have the better judge of the necessities of your position than I could at this distance, on seeing your proclamation of August 30th for the first time, I make no objection to it; the particular clause, however, in relation to confiscation of the property, and liberating the slaves of rebels, appears to me to be objectionable, in its nonconformity to the Act of Congress passed the 6th inst., upon the same subject. Allow me, therefore, to request you of your own motion to modify that clause so as to conform to the provisions of said Act. Should you perceive objection to this modification, as to me it seems but fair to say, that I suppose it will be constitutional, and will be valuable and effective upon the confiscation question involved. And I request that you will observe, that in this modification I do not object to the liberating provision, as to persons heretofore held as slaves by rebels. "As an act to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes, approved July 17, 1861," and that said Act is conceived in the very language of the modification I propose.

Your obedient servant,

A. LINCOLN.

Probably the President felt that a strict discharge of his duty, in an administration of the laws, required him to make this order; and there is no doubt that the proclamation of "discretion and expediency," whose counsels have precipitated the country into war, have strongly urged him to take this step. The fault is but with the President and his Cabinet, and not the Act, which is but a half-measure, and, like all half-measures, bad in policy. As it stands, it preserves the whole machinery of Slavery, leads to an unconditional confiscation of their slaves could have done, while it fails to enlist the sympathies or inspire the action of the people, and will necessarily tend to weaken and destroy it or weaken it as an element of political disturbance and national insecurity. As it stands, it contributes in no degree to retain the allegiance of the border States, or to repel the support which our enemy would otherwise receive from the sympathy of all civilized nations, to say nothing of the more effective energy and renewed zeal of the people of the North, so fully evoked by the fact that Slavery is the sole origin of our troubles, and the "cause and essence of all our woes." The best of Congress, at its coming session, will be the amendment of the law, so as to meet the exigencies of the time. By December, it is to be hoped, will be developed the strength of the forces around to the reality of the present struggle. It will not be too late to retrieve the errors of a false and dangerous moderation.

Kentucky Rowing for the Union.

A DESPERATE effort is now in progress in Kentucky to precipitate that State into Secession, or falling in that, into civil war. The traitor Governor, Magoffin, openly, and the traitor Senator Breckinridge covertly, are invoking every means fair and foul to bring about this result. The new Legislature fortunately, fresh from the people, refused to receive the last message to that body, Magoffin, after a long and studied denunciation of the North and the National Government, and after exhausting every appeal favorable to the rebels of the South, nevertheless said, "My respect for State rights and State sovereignty will make me bow in respectful submission to the majority of her people, so long he I am a citizen of Kentucky." The sequel has shown the hollowness and falsity of this, as of every other protestation this double-dyed traitor has made.

It will be remembered that some weeks ago Brigadier-General Polk, in command of a division of the rebel army, occupied the town of Columbus and other commanding positions on the Mississippi River in Kentucky, in consequence of which General Grant, the Union commander at Cairo, proceeded on the 6th to occupy the town of Paducah, on the Ohio. Up to the time, out of respect for the position of neutrality which Kentucky, under Magoffin's inspiration, had assumed, the Government had abstained from military operations on her soil. The occupation of Paducah became, however, a strategic necessity, consequent on the prior movement of the rebels.

On the 12th the following resolutions, calling on the Governor to expel the rebels, were presented, and passed the Lower House of the Legislature by a vote of 71 to 23, and subsequently passed the Senate by a vote of 26 to 8:

Resolved, That Kentucky's pretax and neutrality have been treacherously violated by the rebels in the unlawful and hostile occupation they have grossly insulted the people and Legislature of Kentucky; and that the honor of the State cannot; therefore,

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, that the Governor be requested to call out the military force of the State to expel rebels from the Commonwealth.

Resolved, That the United States be invoked to give that aid and assistance, the protection against invasion which is granted to each one of the States by the 4th Section of the 4th Article of the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That General Robert Anderson be, and he is hereby requested to enter immediately upon the active discharge of his duties in this military district.

Resolved, That we pledge to the people of Kentucky by the ties of patriotism and honor, by the ties of common interest and common destiny, by the memories of the past, and by the hopes of future national existence, to assist in rejecting and driving out the wanton invaders of our peace and neutrality, the lawless invaders of our soil.

Notwithstanding his affected defiance for the will of the people of Kentucky, Magoffin vetoed these resolutions and returned them to the Legislature, by which, however, they were passed over his veto by a two-thirds majority. Following up this decisive action, the House instructed the appropriate committee to bring in a bill making it a felony to aid the war by enlisting troops for the rebels, or inducing men to do so, or by joining or serving with any company with the intent to join the Confederates. Also providing that invasion of Kentucky by any Confederate force forfeits soldier and officer with death—the Act to go into effect in ten days, but not to be applicable to those who return to their allegiance within sixty days.

These emphatic proceedings inspire us with confidence that the scheme of forcing Kentucky, the best and most chivalrous of the Slave States, out of the Union, will fail. Already, at the head of 8,000 men, is reported as still holding his position, disregarding equally the protests of Kentucky and the order of recall of the Governor of the State, Brigadier-General Grant encamps at Paducah, in the name of the United States, while throughout the State the Union men, convinced that "neutrality" is no longer possible, are rallying to the national standard. They have formed several camps, which are rapidly filling with soldiers. In one camp five miles from Louisville, Kentuckians were seen on a week, each regiment numbering one thousand men, all thoroughly armed and equipped. There are also two regiments of loyal Kentuckians at Camp Dick Robinson. This looks like a decision on the part of the people not to be overridden by the rebels, and gives significance to the letter of the well-known and patriotic Kentuckian, Garrett Davis, addressed, under date of the 5th, to a member of the recent People's Convention of New York. He says:

"These peace meetings with us, and I presume everywhere, are more apt to work for treason, and we shall so treat them. I no no good all the time I can spare from my family, if the rebels dare make a war upon us we will sweep them clean, and that rapidly. We are wide awake, and duly armed, and as well as we need be for anything. The Union, the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws must be had, or the Government will fall, and Kentucky and citizens trampled under foot."

The Union vote of 97 guns was fired in the Park of this city, on the 14th, in honor of the 71 members of the House of Representatives and the 26 Senators of the Legislature of Kentucky who voted for and passed the Joint resolutions quoted above.

The Coming State Election.

SEVERAL attempts have been made by a portion of the leaders of the Democracy of other days to commit what remains of the party to an organization on a quasi-hostility to the war, and to give aid and comfort to the rebels by mouthy declarations in favor of peace, and against the extraordinary measures which the Government has been compelled to take for the preservation. It seems that a majority of the members of the Democratic State Committee are of this semi-Secession stamp. The Breckinridge element, also, they refused to accede to the proposition of the Republican State Committee, which was to unite no distinctive party nominations at either side, but to run on a rigid sound Union ticket of members of all parties, throwing aside, during the present vital struggle, all partisan issues and designations. These refusals have been in a degree broken under circumstances, inasmuch as the Republican party is, and long has been, in an unquestioned majority in the State. The so-called Democratic Convention accordingly met, nominated a ticket for State officers, and adopted a series of milk-and-water resolutions, strongly disturbed with Secession sympathy. Disgusted with the action of the organizations for peace, and reflection on the cause of Executive power.

But the Democrats mistook the times, and the spirit and temper of the times. That deference for the South, or what its opponents have called subservience to the South, which until 1860 was a Democratic weakness, no longer exists. It has disappeared under Southern assaults on the Constitution and the National integrity, and the old leaders seek in vain to evoke the spirit which once responded to their call. A number of the nominees of the Syracuse Convention, including Mr. Tremaine, nominated for Attorney-General, and Mr. Francis, nominated for Attorney-General, have declined, and in the meantime (on the 10th) a People's Convention, presided over by Mr. Alvord, an old Democrat, and made up of members of all parties, has nominated a ticket regardless of party, and pledged only to the

A number of the nominees of the Syracuse Convention, including Mr. Tremaine, nominated for Attorney-General, and Mr. Francis, nominated for Attorney-General, have declined, and in the meantime (on the 10th) a People's Convention, presided over by Mr. Alvord, an old Democrat, and made up of members of all parties, has nominated a ticket regardless of party, and pledged only to the Union, the open support of the Government, and the vigorous prosecution of the war, as follows:

Attorney-General, Daniel S. Dickinson; Secretary of State, Horatio Ballard; Comptroller, Lucius Robinson; Treasurer, William B. Lewis; Canal Commissioners, F. A. Alberger and B. F. Bruce; State Prison Inspector, Abram B. Tappan; State Engineer, William B. Taylor; Court of Appeals, William B. Wright.

This ticket was subsequently adopted by the Republican State Convention, and it may be called the Ticket of the People of the State of New York—for the faction which endeavors to cry peace and compromise, when there is no peace, and compromise is spurned, is too insignificant in character and numbers to be denominated an opposition. A corresponding faction attempted to run a candidate for Governor in Vermont, not long ago, who received something less than 3,000 votes. In Maine, the candidate of the same stamp was defeated by nearly 30,000 votes, and we shall be disappointed if Mr. Dickinson and his co-nominees are not elected by a popular majority of at least 200,000 in the State of New York, in the coming November election.

Maryland.

NOTWITHSTANDING that in the late Congressional election the popular voice declared for the Union by a decided majority, the hold-over State Legislature has continued to do all in its power, aided by leading rebel sympathisers in Baltimore, to plunge Maryland into the same vortex with Virginia, and inaugurate civil war within its borders. The opportunity for consummating this fatal act has not yet occurred, and the recreant Legislature has adjourned from time to time, in the hope that an occasion would offer favorable to their purposes. Its last adjournment was to to the 17th of this month, when it seems to have been concerted that a "Declaration of Independence," à la Tennessee, was to be rushed through, and instant adjournment made, in concert with an open demonstration on the part of the Secessionists in the State, supported by a movement across the Potomac by the rebel army. Of course, such action is not within the competence of the State Legislature, even under the loose ethics of rebellion, but would give them a pretext of some faint plausibility whereon to act. The plan, however, bunglingly contrived and not likely to succeed, has been effectually thwarted, so far as the traitorous Legislature is concerned, by the arrest, under the authority of the Government, of ten of the leading rebels of that body, together with Mayor Brown, of Baltimore, Henry May, the sole rebel sympathising Member of Congress from Maryland, and the editors of the Baltimore South and Exchange, both bitter Secession journals. Most, if not all, of those traitors have been transferred to that hospital for sick patriotism, Fort Lafayette. We trust this vigorous blow will not be followed by the usual period of inaction, but be supported by a firm and consonant policy. Maryland lies between us and the Capitol, and we must allow no movement within its borders which shall for a moment divert the attention of General McClellan from the rebels in front, or embarrass his operations against them. We could wish that this task of vigilance and duty of repression were confided to younger hands than those of General Dix. In common with a number of our most respected and most deservedly respected leaders, he belongs to a past generation, and it is impossible that his perceptions have escaped being blunted, and his energies impaired by years. This generation may profit by the counsels and advice of that which has preceded it, but its salvation can only be worked out by its own young strength and activity. We cannot believe that the lessons taught us by Cadwallader, Patterson and McCauley have been entirely lost; and although we would not insult General Dix by classing him with those imbecilities, yet he will consult his own reputation by quietly giving place to a younger and more vigorous officer. General Scott has gracefully stepped aside for the youthful McClellan; and it is undeniable that the only men to whom the nation now looks with confidence and hope are Fremont, McClellan, Banks and Rosencranz, all comparatively young men, and exponents of the living generation.

JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.—This gentleman, late Vice President of the United States, made a speech at a barbecue, at Richmond, Ky., on the 30th of August, in which he openly counselled disobedience to the laws of the country. His organ, the Louisville Courier, reports him as follows:

"He insisted that Kentucky ought not to pay any portion of the direct tax—first, because she had no hand in inaugurating or carrying on the present war; secondly, because the tax was levied to pay the interest on a debt unconstitutionally created, without authority of Congress, in support of an army and navy unconstitutionally raised."

This advice to Kentucky to nullify the laws is by no means the only act of treason of which Mr. Breckinridge has been guilty. His entire conduct in the Senate, during the late extra session of Congress, his speeches and votes, were all calculated and no doubt designed to give "aid and comfort to the enemy." We regard Fort Lafayette as a swindled institution while John C Breckinridge is outside its walls.

COMMODORE McCAULEY.—A Washington correspondent of the Times has endeavored to "vindicate" the conduct of Commodore McCauley, who commanded at Norfolk when the Navy Yard at that point was burnt. He had better try his hand at the vindication of some more hopeful subject—say Benedict Arnold. The only question in the public mind is whether McCauley was imbecile, a coward, or a traitor, with a strong tendency to believe him one and all.

SHORT AND SWEET.—General McClellan made this little speech to the Federal army, on the 10th:

"Soldiers—We have had our last retreat. We have seen our last defeat. You stand by me, and I will stand by you, and henceforth victory will crown our efforts."

This may be interpreted in tolerable rhyme as follows:

We have had our last defeat;
We have seen our last retreat!
Stand by me, and I'll stand by you,
And 'twixt us both we'll put 'em through!

AS MIGHT HAVE BEEN EXPECTED.—A certain Lieutenant G. W. Alexander, captured with the "French lady" in Baltimore, and confined in Fort McHenry, some time ago applied to be transferred from the cells to the guard-house. This was granted, on his giving his written parole that he would not undertake to escape from the house at night. On Sunday evening last he broke his parole and escaped. Every sense of honor and sentiment of manhood seem to have disappeared under the moral canker of Secession.

NAVAL INEFFICIENCY.—An officer in the Gulf Squadron writes to a daily contemporary from Pensacola, as follows:

"We have just received the news of the destruction of the apparatus of the lighthouses at Cape Canaveral, Jupiter Inlet and Cape Florida. The expedition is proceeding south, and by this time Carysford reef and Sombrero lights are also destroyed, that being the design of the party whose forces are a schooner and two barges, thoroughly armed and equipped. Where is the Navy? And what are they doing? Nothing! There have been in this port, or are here now, the sloops Preble and Vincennes, frigate Santee, steamers Water Witch, Rhode Island, Keystone State, Crusader, Wyandotte, and schooner Wanderer; in all, nine vessels, a hundred and six guns, thirteen hundred men. Within a week this tremendous force has been here, and within two hundred miles of us a million of property has been destroyed, and several valuable and important lights have been put out. Why these have not been protected I do not know; but our mistakes are becoming too numerous and very unfortunate. This should be known and attended to. Some of our officers want stirring up. One of the lighthouse keepers was a passenger in the schooner that brought the news. The destruction of these lights is a most outrageous piece of vandalism. The lights, though in our charge, are really the property of the world, for vessels of every nation passing up the Gulf Stream have a most important interest in them. The destruction is inexcusable."

THE NATIONAL DEBT.—The following statement of the debt of the United States was laid before the capitalists of Philadelphia by Hon. S. P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury. The statement comes down to the 2d of September:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.—The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald has felt it a duty to defend the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Welles, from the popular clamor. He says that there is no truth in the story of his having written to his brother-in-law, George D. Morgan, for 10,000 horses to supply the 20 new gunboats of 500 horse-power each, ordered by Government, recently. It does not appear that there was any contract actually entered into for the horses; while the anxiety as to where so many could be got on short notice, to say nothing of the difficulty of getting hay and oats to feed them, was very natural. And as regards the criticisms on Mr. Welles's absence from his post during these troublous times, everybody knows that they are malicious as well as impertinent, inasmuch as the Department of the Navy suffers no detriment from his absence. The business goes on just as well when he is away as when he is in Washington. One would think his age, at least, might shield him from denunciation. Very few men live to be as old as he is, and those that do ought to be respected. There has been nothing more ungenerous than the censure of Mr. Welles for not sending reinforcements sooner to our garrison left at Fort Hatteras. Mr. Welles is too experienced a man to be caught in such a trap. He has been a close observer of public affairs for nearly three quarters of a century, and he believes that men's lives should not be risked in war—that is, not many of them. His idea is, that the men left at Hatteras Inlet were sufficient, if they should succeed in continuing to hold it, for the present; while, if they are to be massacred or taken prisoners, the less there are of them the better. If it should turn out that they are perfectly safe, just as soon as that is known to be the case, others will be sent down there with them, and additional rations. And as to the clamor of merchants about sending a competent fleet to sea, to sweep it of privateers, these persons forget that the ships belonging to the United States Government are put into the hands of Mr. Welles as a sacred public trust, and that he is responsible for their safe keeping, as well as having them properly painted and newly coppered when they need it. Let the Sumter and a few others of the worst of the privateers run aground, like the Jeff. Davis, or get wrecked, as they are very liable to when the equinoctial storms come on, and you will see that Mr. Welles will not be behindhand in getting ships enough under weigh. Do not forget that not one of the 70 odd ships recently captured by the pirates belonged to the Government, a fact which will be a standing monument to the prudence of Secretary Welles for some time to come.

CORRECTION.—It is not correct that Floyd ran away from Rosencranz at Gauley's Bridge. True to his instincts, he stole away.

A PROPOSAL TO THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.—Some time ago the fishermen of Marblehead and vicinity offered the services of themselves and vessels against the Southern privateers. That offer was declined by Secretary Welles. We understand that the same patriotic and enterprising class of men have another proposal to make of a still more advantageous character. but are deterred from sending it in to the Navy Department from a repugnance to encounter a second refusal. They are ready, it is stated, to enter into a contract with the Government to sweep the ocean of privateers and to close all the inlets of the Southern coast for a million of dollars—defraying all their own expenses.

TREASURY NOTES.—The Secretary of the Treasury has addressed a circular to the various Assistant Treasurers to the following effect:

"Under the act of July 19 and August 5 last, Treasury notes of the denomination of five, ten and twenty dollars have been, and will continue to be issued, redeemable in coin on demand of the offices of the Assistant Treasurer at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and at the Depository of Cincinnati. These notes are intended to furnish a current medium of payment, exchange and remittance, being at all times convertible into coin at the option of the holder, at the place where made payable, and everywhere receivable for public dues. They must be always equivalent to gold, and often and for many purposes more convenient and valuable. A sufficient amount of coin to redeem these notes promptly on demand will be kept with the depositaries by whom they are respectively made payable. And all deposit and collecting officers will receive them, enter them on their books, and pay them to public creditors as money. Large amounts of the notes of small denominations are rapidly being issued and distributed."

NO COMPROMISE.—The advocates of "peace" and compromise in the North will do well to reflect on the language of the Southern leaders and rebel press. The following passage from the New Orleans Crescent is only a specimen: "If the Northern people suppose we are fighting for compromises or terms, they had as well get rid of that little delusion at once. We are fighting for independence and a separate nationality. If we were allowed to dictate our own terms for a further union with the North, we would scorn and spurn the proposal!"

FRANK LESLIE'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE for October is just out, price 25 cents. It contains not less than 40 elegant engravings, full illustrations and descriptions of the Fashions, and a vast amount of interesting literary matter. The following are only two or three selections from numerous flattering notices of the press:

"This popular monthly has no less than 40 pleasant illustrations to grace its pages, and add to its beauty. The fashion plates are attractive and will please the ladies."—Smyrna (N. Y.) Times.

"'Verona Brent,' a charming story of wonderful interest, is finished, and another of equal interest—'The Lady Lisle'—is commenced. The number contains other good stories—a score or more—and a great amount of valuable and interesting reading besides, so that all tastes may be suited. The fashion department is full and complete, as usual—abounding in knick-knacks, rich and rare, for the especial delight of the ladies. Of the embellishments, which are numerous, we simply note the beautiful fashion plate and a fine portrait of the lamented Ellsworth."—Waterville (Me.) Mail.

"The last number of this beautiful Magazine and Gazette of Fashion is on our table, with its usual quantum of 96 pages of highly artistic plates and interesting and entertaining reading matter, both European and American."—Cayuga (Canada West) Sentinel.

"This journal of art, literature and fashion has a beautifully colored frontispiece of the fashions, besides numerous fine wood engravings. The literary contents, in prose and poetry, are sufficiently varied to suit the tastes of all classes of readers. There is an illustrated and descriptive department also, devoted to ladies' fashions, the mysteries of which we do not pretend to explore, but it cannot fail to be highly interesting to lady readers as it contains a piece about 'Styles for the Month,' 'Things Seen and Talked About,' 'Descriptions of Fashions,' &c., with 'pictures to match.' These are wonderful days for illustrations, and Leslie seems to be bringing the pencil and the graver into almost as frequent use as the pen, which, combined, aid vastly in smoothing and adorning the path of knowledge, once deemed so rugged and so difficult to pursue."—Weekly (Mich.) Clarion.

MAPS OF THE WAR.—J. H. Colton and Co., of 172 William street, have just published various maps, which are indispensable at the present time, as they enable the reader to follow with living interest the important naval and military operations now in progress. They are at once cheap and reliable.

THE EIGHTH CENSUS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, in advance of the official publication. Compiled and compared with former censuses, by Dr. Fisher. Published by Messrs. Colton & Co. This is a most timely publication, and should be in every office and editorial room.

WE think the Government owe to the public some explanation of the circumstances attending the release of Mr. Serrill from Fort Lafayette. The Evening Post says, after relating his release from custody upon taking the oath of allegiance: "There is testimony of such a character that it is not improbable that Mr. Serrill's notes may yet be confiscated. In this case he will be invited by the proper Court to endorse the notes, which are payable to his order, and if he should decline, he can be committed for contempt. At all events, the Government may deem it advisable to keep possession of the post notes till the insurrection is suppressed." It would thus seem that Mr. Serrill owes his liberation to his money.

LORD PALMERSTON, with his usual sagacity, saw through the cause of our disaster at Bull Run, and improves the occasion to warn the volunteers of England against a similar mishap. At a banquet given recently to him in honor of his installation as Warden of the Cinque ports, he thus alluded to the absolute necessity of strict discipline and military organization:

"Discipline alone can render valor and strength capable of victory. Why, our cousins in America as individual men are as brave as any that tread the earth. They are of the same stock as ourselves, they are descended from the same parents, are animated by the same spirit, and prepared to encounter equal dangers. But when thousands of men as personally courageous as any race in existence get together, each man wanting that confidence in his comrades which discipline and training can alone supply, they exhibited to the world that unfortunate rapidity of movement which took place at Bull Run."

We can afford to smile at the jibes of the French and English scribblers, when the foremost man in England understands and avows the true state of the case. Bull Run may have saved us from a greater disaster, and it certainly will not change the policy of the Premier of England.

A GENTLE HINT.—Although the most celebrated English green is called Lincoln, our own excellent Lincoln has none of that color about him. His last joke is sending nearly one-half his cabinet to London as Commissioners to the World's Fair. They are to start early in next July. Among the number are Mr. Seward, Caleb Smith, Kennedy, of the Census Bureau, Wallach, Mayor of Washington, and Mr. Everett. We surmise that the latter has been appointed without asking Mr. Bonner's permission. We are not informed whom Jeff Davis will send. Toombs, Cobb, Wigfall and Floyd would worthily represent the South. Should anything be stolen from the Grand Exhibition, the London police will then know where to look for it!

THE New York Daily Times had a very alarming article on the 13th Sept., which was calculated to strike terror into all who are afraid of the Nephew of his Uncle and the French fleet. It was a "Te Deum" over the narrow escape we had just had of driving Louis Napoleon frantic by giving a grand public ovation to Prince de Joinville, our saviour on this occasion being the Brazilian Minister, who, with tears in his eyes and horror in his face, begged the American Eagle not to rush thus madly into the arms of perdition and parley vous! Will it be believed that all this arose out of the fact that our excellent Collector, Hiram Barney, merely went down in a little steamer to assure the Prince that he was not going to search his royal baggage. Whether this plump invitation to smuggle is a compliment to the Orleanist or an insult to Louis Napoleon, is a question for casuists and Custom-House officers to decide.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—On Monday, the 16th, Mr. Hermann commenced his Prestidigitations to a most crowded and delighted audience. His sleight-of-hand is so wonderful as really to deserve his sesquipedalean title. Indeed, we consider it a very happy one, since the manner in which solids exhale beneath his touch are almost miraculous. Even the traditional tricks, old as Cagliostro and young as Professor Anderson, assume a novelty, from the wonderful manner in which they are accomplished. But no description can do justice to his merit—only the eye can understand, and even they look bewildered. All the beauty and fashion of the city were present on the opening night, and the entertainment promises to be popular.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

ADVICES from St. Louis of the 13th report a desperate fight between the Louisiana and Missouri troops under General Hardee, in reference to the conduct of the latter in the battle of Springfield, the Louisianians charging the Missourians with cowardice, and treating them as cowards in camp. The Louisianians charge that while they were fighting the Missourians actually stole their horses and fled. General Hardee was falling back on Pocahontas and the Missourians were dispersing.

THE steamer Spaulding reached Fortress Monroe on the morning of the 13th, from Fort Hatteras. The Susquehanna and Pawnee were still there. The defences had been put in complete order, and the guns spiked by the rebels were ready for service. Four British vessels had run into the inlet with merchandise for the rebels, not knowing of the change of sovereignty, the Federal flag having been temporarily hauled down. Pilots were offered the vessels and every facility for getting in. They did not discover their mistake until too late. Two of the vessels, the Susan Jane and Harriet Ryan, were from the British Provinces, and had valuable cargoes consisting of molasses, shoes and clothing.

THE intelligence from Richmond is important, as it states that 156 of the prisoners taken at Bull Run had been sent from that city to Castle Pinckney, Charleston harbor. It also appears that a number of prisoners had attempted to escape, but that only Captain Hurd and his two companions had been successful therein.

THE soldiers on the Potomac are sending home money to their friends as fast as they get their pay. An Indiana regiment sent $2,00? in gold to Evansville last week, and on the 10th inst. the members of the Eleventh Massachusetts regiment gave Mayor Wightman, of Boston, upwards of $5,000 to take home for distribution among their families.

THE Union majority over Secession Democracy, in Maine, is 27,525.

GOV. MAGOFFIN has issued the following Proclamation, in obedience to the resolutions lately adopted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

"The Government of the Confederate States, the State of Tennessee, and all others concerned, are hereby informed that Kentucky expect the Confederate or Tennessee troops to be withdrawn from her soil unconditionally."

THE Spanish Minister at Washington has assured the Secretary of State that the report of a proclamation by the Captain-General of Cuba, recognizing the rebel flag in Cuban ports, is entirely unfounded. No such proclamation has been issued. What has been done is simply to enable vessels to enter without regular papers when they hail from a port on the Southern coast in possession of the rebels, rendering it impossible for regular papers to be procured. Of course no such vessels could be afloat, but those escaping the blockading force. There was no intention to extend any leniency to the pirates—at least so the Spanish Minister is said to represent to the Secretary of State.

GENERAL REYNOLDS and the Union forces repulsed the rebels under General Lee, on the 14th, near Canoux Ferry. Union loss, one man. The loss of the enemy unknown, as they carried off their dead and wounded with them. The attack made by the rebels was along the whole line of the Cheat Mountain position. Wise and Floyd are in full retreat.

A DESERTER from the rebel camp at Columbus reports that Gen. Johnston is ready to march on Paducah, Kentucky, with a force of 10,000 men. Generals Price, Raine and Claib Jackson are combining in a grand force of 20,000 to attack the Federal lines near Jefferson city; Jackson intending, it is said, to make that city the capital of the State.

HOWARD AND GLENN, editors of the Baltimore Exchange, have been sent to Fort McHenry.

MR. McMASTERS, editor of the Freeman's Appeal, formerly Freeman's Journal, was taken to Fort Lafayette on the 16th. His indignation was extreme.

GENERAL FREMONT had put Colonel Frank Blair under arrest for treating him with disrespect.

THE pirate Sumter was at Surinam on the 21st of August, and had threatened to fire upon the town if she was not furnished with coals and other supplies.

THE Charleston (S. C.) Mercury of the 3d inst. has the subjoined carefully compiled estimate of the population of that city, just completed.

BRINGIN IN SOEK REBEL PRISONERS TO WASHINGTON BY UNION TROOPS.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S COMMAND.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL JUSTUS M'KINSTRY,
Provost Marshal of St. Louis, Missouri.

When General Fremont, with his usual promptitude, put Missouri under martial law, he chose as his Provost Marshal Brig.-Gen. McKinstry, an officer of judgment and vigor, and who had for many years been in the military service of his country.

Justus M.-Kinstry was born in New York, and entered West Point as cadet, in 1833. He was made 2d Lieutenant of the 1st Infantry, on the 1st of July, 1838 and became Assistant Commissary of Subsistence in September of the same year. In April, 1841, he was promoted to 1st Lieutenant. In March, 1847, he was appointed Assistant Quartermaster with the rank of Captain. In the Mexican war he commanded a company of volunteers, and was brevetted Major for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco. He also distinguished himself at Cherpultepec. At the commencement of the present rebellion he entered heart and soul on the side of his country, and is now carrying out the policy of General Fremont with his characteristic fearlessness. He was recently created a Brigadier-General. In our editorial column we have commented on the recent special edict of General McKinstry, which safeguards the slaves of Mr. Snead, of St. Louis, who had been proved a traitor to his country. These acts of justice and retribution will make rebellion so unprofitable as it is wicked.

ARRIVAL OF REBEL PRISONERS IN WASHINGTON.

It is pleasant to know that the accounts current some time ago of the cruelties practiced by the rebels towards their captives were erroneous, as it would have entailed upon them a retaliation terrible to contemplate. So far as our treatment of Confederate prisoners is concerned, it is impossible to find any fault. Indeed, if we are to credit what we hear, more sympathy has been shown, especially in Washington, for the rebels who have fallen into our hands, than for our own wounded soldiers. Our Artist has sketched a group of Confederate soldiers who were recently captured near Washington. One thing is undoubted, that very many of the rebel pickets have voluntarily placed themselves in our hands, and still more have declared that they were forced into the rebel ranks.

MUNSON'S HILL, NEAR WASHINGTON.

During the last few weeks, Munson's Hill, six miles out of the Chain Bridge, has become a spot to which all eyes have been directed. It is on the northern side of the Leesburg turnpike, about one mile from Bailey's Cross-roads, where our pickets are stationed, and about three miles this side of Falls Church, which is in full possession of the enemy. It commands no road excepting the Leesburg turnpike, the Columbia turnpike being sheltered by thick woods up to the crossing. Its defences are unimportant, being simple breast-works, of considerable extent, but not ditched, and not embrasured for artillery. Those who saw the deserted works at Bairds' Court House and Centreville will understand just how little these are worth, for they are of exactly the same order. The elevation of the hill is not very great, and its summit can be approached to within a few hundred yards from the north under cover of heavy woods. At present its only distinction lies in its proximity to our lines. It is the nearest of a series of defences which have been planted along the Leesburg road, and which extend to some distance above the Chain Bridge. The rebels, however, hold positions nearer to the Potomac than Munson's Hill. Four miles beyond the Chain Bridge, opposite our right, they have a small force, and their pickets approach a little nearer. Thence they run down, through hedges and fields, irregularly, toward the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, which they hold, up to the spot where it is crossed by the Four Mile Run. In this neighborhood they have strong pickets, which frequently come into collision with those sent out upon our side from Bull's Roads. Bull's House, a little to the west of Bull's Roads was a point of perpetual contention. From the Four Mile Run the rebel outposts cross directly to Munson's Hill, on the slope of which they descend to within a half mile of Bailey's Roads. From this point down to Benton's Tavern they hold the Columbia turnpike, and thence stretch across in almost a straight line to near the mouth of Occotoak Run, the last place at which our pickets meet them.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. M'KINSTRY, U. S. PROVOST MARSHAL OF ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY JOHN B. WHEELER, ST. LOUIS.

CAMP OF THE GARIBALDI GUARDS.

One of the most remarkable effects of the present war for the preservation of the Republic is the universal response made by the diverse nationalities, which have merged their future in that of our own. It argues well for the justice of our cause, and the spirit of the age, that the freemen, who have shaken off the dust of their tyrant-ridden fatherlands, have rallied around the flag of their adopted country. Foremost among these are the Irish, Germans, and the numerous refugees who have fought under the banners of Kossuth and Garibaldi. The latter noble band of exiles have formed themselves into a regiment called the Garibaldi Guards, and placed themselves under the command of Count d'Utassy, who distinguished himself in the war for Hungarian freedom. This fine body of men is remarkable for the number of trained men it has in its ranks, at least one-half having fought in European battle-fields. It comprises Frenchmen, Italians, Hungarians, Germans, Swiss, Irish, Scotch, and a few English who served in the Crimean war. When reviewed by the President, on their arrival in Washington, they were highly complimented. They now form part of General Blenker's brigade, and are stationed near Roche's Mills, in a most picturesque spot, rendered more so by the foreign tastes of some of the Garibaldians. One of our sketches illustrates this peculiarity, where Swiss huts have been erected, carrying back, in their minds' eye, many of its brave members to the land where the Rose des Roches only finds peak to peak. The cleanness shown by those men [illegible] our day of trial is a grateful return for that aid and sympathy we have ever shown to the cause of European freedom.

GENERAL ROSENCRANZ AND HIS STAFF.

We present to our readers to-day a most interesting and valuable sketch of General Rosencranz and his staff, a sketch rendered all the more interesting by the recent brilliant triumph he has gained over the Mercury of the rebels—Floyd. We regret that our space will only allow us to enumerate the names of the gallant men who so efficiently carry out the plans of their chief.

Joseph Dorr, Jun., Private Secretary; Captain C. King-Drury, Jun., aide-de-camp; Captain N. P. Richmond, Adjutant; and last, but not least, Captain Charles Leib, Quartermaster, to whom our artist is under special obligations.

Gauley Bridge, the scene of their last exploit, is a post village of Fayette county, Virginia, and is situated just below the junction of the Gauley and New rivers, about 300 miles west of Richmond, and 36 miles above Charleston. In Memoriam.

A cross to transpierce smothers worship,
Deep-toned numbers with rapture ringing;
And all the world enrobed as the lily.
When he! a pause in the singing.

* * * * * * *

A pause, a sigh, then a crown of gladness,
So hath mother risen to forget!
Folded to rest in the land she loved best.
Where all the Florist be greeted.

Where the green forest, dark-cloaked and glossy,
Hugs the sunny hills of Florence, 'tis there
Up to crown the pure brow of the woman,
Who of the dead is up a her life.

So hid he rest, saw the singing is ended,
And hushed are the voices that sang;
But the music of her deeds shall not be forgotten,
Nor forced from the sight of thy heart.

Flint her to rest, sing! thy triumph is won!

Well did she love thee with heart's true devotion;
Never a song of her pleading failed to reach
Thy ear, and to thrill through the hearts of thy people;
So, in the land of the poet, she sleeps.

In the lone hall of the pure immortal,
Soon each relative her fame shall be seen;
Now on the brow, or purple of fame, the laurel
Florence, bestow thy sweet shell be one!

CHAPTER LXIV.

Lord Kingswood, after quitting Kingswood Hall, made his way at a rambling pace, and in a thoughtful mood, across the park to Kingswood Abbey.

The remainder of the night he passed until he reached the old hermitage.

He gave a sort of, and a singular feeling of awe stole over him as he looked upon the silent-covered scene and the dark sky remained to him luminous whenever it was.

Lord Kingswood, as he entered the hermitage, was startled by a sound, and death, and as it seemed in his ear.

"Ha! ha! ha!" It was the hollow laughter of a fool maniac," he exclaimed, emphatically, "as how loud the echoes and cause of our end. It was here I first saw her face of more than mortal beauty, and how much of happiness has it not since created for me—how much misery—how much happiness! I passed since that hour! I have been constantly haunted by the expression of that face, and the sound of that voice, which has been ringing in my ears like a magic melody! I have been constantly haunted by the expression of that face, and the sound of that voice, which has been ringing in my ears like a magic melody! I have been constantly haunted by the expression of that face, and the sound of that voice, which has been ringing in my ears like a magic melody!

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed Lord Kingswood, in the tone of all of fear, yet, in blood-curdled, "I believe, quickly. "Where is the man who dares to speak to me of my future Kingswood of Kingswood."

As he concluded he turned from the old fashioned window upon the doorway, and then started back as if he had seen a ghost.

Before him, in the doorway, stood Lord Kingswood, his pale cheeks. But the white hair of his head, and the long white beard that descended upon his breast, made him appear more than ever like a ghost.

"Erle!" he said, in a low tone.

"I," she cried, "Lord of Kingswood, I would be reminded if ever you had to do to me more than you have done. You shall not, my lord."

"Erle," he continued, recovering from the astonishment that caused for a moment, "I have been in search of you. I have been in search of you. I have been in search of you.

CHAPTER XVI.—CONTINUED.

The open air refreshed me. I seemed to pass late it from a chamberdoor of dead men's bones. Glancing up from the road, I again met the fascinating eyes of Oriental. In her mien, and around looking through me into vacancy. As I walked away mechanically, the clear blue sky seemed full of the eyes of Oriental, and their radiance dazzled me.

However, my uncle, had sharp eyes, and at dinner he noticed that something unusual had occurred.

"You look pale, nephew," he observed. "In anything the matter?"

"I am not well; my brain swims! I have the headache."

"Nothing more serious, I hope?" inquired Mrs. Kitchiner.

"And the heartache," I replied, looking at her, and conferring up a sickly smile.

"It is the heyday of youth, and means mischief," laughed my uncle, jocularly eyeing me.

I was now distinctly conscious—conscious, in spite of myself—that I secretly wished Oriental Kitchiner to be my wife.

Moreover, my uncle, hey day as I felt pale, and shrinking from him, as from something polluted. On the day I proceeded more clearly how he had woven me in his toils, and how helpless I was to move from them. I felt sick, nauseated. He had a strange power over me; I could not rid myself of his influence. He was a mystery and a terror to me. I remembered the sad, fearful story of poor old Hannah, the big late fire, of Mrs. Tuke, and I hated him for her sake. I loathed and feared him.

My fear and loathing for my uncle, which, in the presence of Oriental, I could not conceal, much annoyed Mrs. Kitchiner. Always ready to take displeasure of him incensed, my love for her, and for fresh discoveries, and more and more hateful. I pitied her. She seemed too lonely and peaceful and too weak of will, to be the herald of such a father. She was helpless, and I loved her. My every thought was consecrated to her, and the sorrow she sometimes showed on her face was an anguish with my own.

This love for the one, being opposed to hate for the other, quickened it, and I was aware that Elizabeth while aware that her father was a villain, relished with at least some refreshment. Could I be privy to a plot which threatened my uncle's life, while on the eve of a marriage with his child? Should I forsake Elizabeth, and leave Monkford Cheshe to his fate, by joining Augustus? Or should I expose Augustus's plans, so far as I knew them, and tell my uncle of the man called Oriental?

I spoke one morning to Elizabeth on a subject which was nearer to my heart, determining, as I did so, to be guided by my decision by her conduct on that occasion.

"Elizabeth," I said, "do you really think that Elizabeth loves me?"

"Yes, I do. I think that she loves you. Henry, with her whole heart and soul."

"Suppose, uncle, that I were to change my mind, say a sudden, and should not like Oriental her?"

He looked at me, with lifted eyebrows, as if puzzled, as he answered, smilingly,

"She would break her heart."

"Uncle, I don't believe in broken hearts?"

Mood, she was a coquette.

Scowled about Oupid at eighteen! Well, well. But what did you mean by the question, then?

"I wished to know what might happen supposing circumstances should prevent this marriage."

"Circumstances will do nothing of the kind."

"I have not," I said. "By-the-way, uncle, I have news for you."

"News for me? Where?"

"From London. I have heard that a person would you know, a former friend, is dead."

He seemed somewhat perturbed, but simply said,

"Whom?"

"Mrs. Tuke."

He looked at me so fiercely and wickedly that I almost regretted having introduces me the topic. Then he said,

"I was aware of it," he muttered. "Tuke, poor fellow, did not fail to let me know. And he had not a family affliction. How came you to hear of this?"

Stammering and blushing, as I rutu ued a lying answer to his always ready suspicion.

"I saw it in a newspaper."

"Strange! The deaths of such commonplace people are seldom publicly chronicled."

"I have learned my own, though, changing the subject, "and by the wrist.

"Both dead, nephew, no, now. You're here in extraordinarily with my enemies."

I hung down my head and returned no answer. He was pale and angry.

"Once and for all, beware! I'll have no plotters in my house. You know me! Henry, you are ungrateful. I swear you in the time of need I rescue you from the hands of assassins. I treat you as one of my own family, and I give you my niece in marriage! and this is your gratitude."

I grew quite courageous, and looked him full in the face.

"I know you must know, then," I observed, calmly, "now that I have never, since my arrival in this house, ceased to be harbored against me. The other day I was brought home insensible, and I believe, was the people pretending to be dead, and I had gotten acquainted that Mrs. Tuke, and Mr. Tuke, and the rest—and my beloved—"

"If you are honest and true," he said, "you will tell me where you got this news from."

"Be excused. I can say no more."

"And you listened to them?"

"Yes."

"They spoke words to my prejudice?"

"They did."

"Did you repudiate those words?"

"I did."

Which was false; but I was cowed by my uncle's manner.

"Enough then. Tuke and Mrs. Tuke are dead and buried. I will see to it."

And he left me with a malicious twinkle in his unintelligible grey eyes.

Two nights after this I first became cognizant that Monsieur Caroline's house was haunted.

I slept in a little back room, on the ground floor, which looked out on a lawn. It was a white and quiet little room, and my sleep in it was usually sound and peaceful. I was not persuaded, in those bright summer nights, to pull up the shutters, and tend to let the crystal bright moonlight flood the room.

Well, two nights after the conversation with my uncle, I awoke. Mrs. Tuke had a dream, and Mrs. Tuke was a lie. I dreamed that I was again a little boy, fatherless and motherless, and that I was young very ill by the side of a golden river, in a bed of woven flowers. (I had read my Bible, and knew whom he was.) My life, as in fact it in my dream, was not painful or feverish; it was the simple consciousness of perfect weakness, mingled with a delicious sense of cool repose. But ever me beat a fair lady, very young and beautiful, who seemed like, and yet unlike, my mother. She fanned herself my manner; and she held cups of the cool water to my lips, while her eyes, always fixed on mine, flashed into my soul with a wistful and fearful intensity. Far away, on the other side of the golden river, I could see Mrs. Mark Tuke, in her usual black dress, standing at the feet of Monsieur Charles, who had a bale of linsheets strewed him. Thus the eyes of the beautiful lady were peculiar to me; and I turned away from them, moaning and frightened, and shivering. Then I awoke.

I awoke in the quiet sweet darkness, splashed with light, of the early spring night, filled the little room, and I could see the great square window, with its trees beyond, plainly. Something moved near me, with sound, and I felt alarmed. Then I became conscious that a dark object was standing between the window, and that a face was gazing into the chamber. I could not see the face, but I could feel it turned upon me. Half deafened, and fainting, I sprang out of my bed in my night dress and crept to the window. The figure did not move her, as I drew near, I perceived it was that of a woman. Nearer still I became conscious of a wistful and scared face, very like the one I had seen in my dream. Nearer still I kept to it, with the pane between us. Stooping down, I looked at it wildly, and my face was certain that the ghost came in no spirit of animosity to myself personally.

So I of course determined not to make a confidant of my uncle, nor of any one. Thereupon, I resumed the morning manner allotted my pale, haggard face.

"Worse and worse," he said, in a sympathetic tone. "My dear nephew, I really think you are very ill; you look quite ghastly. I had better call in Doctor Portlock."

It is unnecessary: I feel tolerably well in myself, and my face belies me."

Then your face belies you in a most plausible manner," said Elizabeth, looking at me somewhat in mock fear.

He was dropped the subject, however, through my smile was evidently annoyed. As I walk-ed out in the garden after dinner my uncle was engaged in close conversation with Oriental. His shadow fell upon me throughout the day. When I entered the churchyard and looked over their tombstones I found it was behind me. As I walked away, it fell upon the tablet. It pursued me in-doors at last, and I found it in the drawing-room, as I sat in it were, and was dropping it after me.

Berfectly my uncle had ordered suspicions by his conversation with me, and was fearful of the sum events were taking. But I was honest and straightforward, and I was very very very very much afraid on the strange, ghostly eyes of my dead mother. With a quiet, half-audible emotion, in a cold perspiration, I sprang back, and as I did so, to rest the gaze by main force from the roof of the apparition. The figure placed its finger on its lips as I did so, and drifted away into the darkness. I pressed close to the window to follow it with my eyes, but it was gone.

When I went became conscious I was lying on the floor of my room, with the cool breeze of the dawn about me. I arose and ground around me, deliberately.

I remembered the occurrences of the night fresher back to my mind, and I remembered how the figure had appeared to me in life, and I remembered how the figure had appeared. I knew of the ghost in "Hamlet"; and I had read Shakespeare. Could my memory's ghost be revolving for life? Had appeared for the purpose of arousing me of a crime committed? Could she come me to be the instrument of her revenge for having been foully murdered? Could my uncle be the object of her search?

However that might be, the consciousness that something awful was known to humanity, and me singular to bewilder me. On the contrary, it held over all my faculties, and gave me determination. I would not be scared from my purpose. I would not be driven from my room. I would wait patiently until my mother's spirit chose to express its desires to me, and then I would strike home. Of course, I must have fallen into a deep sleep, in which I lay, with close reluctance that I heard voices.

Sleeping heavily. Could it be fancy? or did I really hear a stealthy footstep creeping up-stairs past my door? I listened again, but the sound ceased.

A minute afterwards, I heard it again. There was no mistake this time; and I could distinctly hear the door opened cautiously by an inch or two, and then closed. My courage left me, and I sprang to the window of the room, and leaped out into the dark. The air was cool and balmy, and nothing human was to be seen.

Again! A stealthy foot was creeping upward, pausing every now and then, as the sounds announced.

My uncle's room was directly above mine, and thither, after a minute or more, I heard the footsteps moving. But they were not my uncle's footsteps, of that I was certain.

Scarcely knowing what I did, but fascinated, as it were, by my fear, I opened the door of my room and he led out into the passage. No one was visible; but I fancied I heard a low breathing above me. Mechanically, and unconsciously, I found the door of my uncle's room stealthily opened. I crept up stairs, and, in my excitement, I found myself in the room upon the first floor.

Fortune favored me. The stairs were hidden in gloom, but the chamber in which my uncle slept was slightly moonlit. Crouching down on the stairs, with my head just above the topmost flight, I was able to see into the room. I distinctly saw the figure of a woman, and recognised the woman as the ghost I had seen the night before—no ghost now, I was sure, but a woman of flesh and blood.

She stood at the foot of the bed looking at him. He was hidden from me by darkness, but I distinctly heard him breathe in sleep. My heart throbbed quickly through all its pulses; for I feared her presence there might arise from deadly motives. That the man and woman were enemies, I was sure. That they feared each other, I surmised. What, then, but revengeful purpose could tempt the one to come into such close proximity with the other?

I had no time to reflect on my own position—on the relationship the midnight visitor bore, or seemed to bear, to myself. She had the face of my dead mamma, softened and slightly idealized. But at that moment I could make no attempt to solve the mystery, or to guess at its cause.

Some minutes passed before the figure again moved. The face, which I could not see plainly, was turned upon the sleeping man, and the air of the whole figure was one of meditation. But I shuddered from head to foot as she passed round to the head of the bed, bent silently over the sleeping man, and touched him.

"Charles!"

It was a sad, clear, musical voice, that spoke in a whisper, but put me in mind of churchyard chimes.

"Charles!"

The voice went through my blood like ice; for it was sweeter and wilder than the voice of my quondam mamma. I strained my eyes across the darkness, and listened hotly.

There was a movement, as if the sleeper stirred. Then she touched him again; but, as he sprang up in bed, with his shade against the window, she drew back into the shade of the bed-curtains.

"Who is there?" he said in low tones, but calmly and audibly.

I saw him turn to the door, and start as he saw it standing wide open.

"Who is there?" he said, in a louder voice than before; but the voice shook this time.

I could hear his hot breathing. The dark figure of the woman rustled out from the bed curtains and stood some yards from him, with a pale face, on which the moon shone dimly, looking fixedly at him.

"Is that Elizabeth?" he whispered, in a voice that shook and wavered.

"No," answered the voice.

The figure did not move.

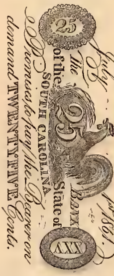
"Who and what are you?"

"One who has come a second time to demand justice, and to warn you."

Why did he not alarm the house? He sank back on his elbow, gazing at her, and I felt that their eyes met. He repressed a cry of fear and sprang out of bed.

"Then it is——"

With a savage yell of rage and terror he clutched the woman by the skirts.



FACSIMILE OF A NOTE ISSUED BY THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, FOR TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.—SEE PAGE 302.

"Stand back!" she cried, still in a whisper, drawing something bright and glistening.

He released her and fell back, like a beast waiting for a spring.

"I would not have your blood upon my head," murmured the woman; "but I tell you, Charles, to beware. Charles, make amends now, and all the long years of agony shall be forgiven."

"Bah!"

There was more terror than contempt expressed in this monosyllable.

"Listen, Charles. This cannot go on for ever. Twice have I left my living grave, and twice have I come to my worst enemy to demand justice. Again I demand it. Take care!"

He made a spring at her, and she had drawn back, with uplifted hand.

"You must and shall hear me, or I will alarm the house. You know well that I fear you not, and that I am desperate. Answer me! Where is my boy?"

"Dead!" growled the ruffian, in reply.

"It is false," she whispered. "He lives—my boy lives! Ignorant of your sin, ignorant of my existence, he lives. Answer, Charles, have you done him justice?"

"What do you mean?"

"You know what I mean. Has he, or has he not, been robbed and deluded?"

"I told you that he was dead."

"Liar!" she cried. "He lives, as I said, and he is in this house."

But before she could say more he had sprung upon her and grasped her arms with both his hands. She did not attempt to scream, though she made several ineffectual struggles. Something falling rattled on the floor.

"Let me go!" she murmured, in a helpless way.

In spite of her former courage, she seemed like one whom habitual restraint had rendered abject and submissive.

"Let you go!" he muttered, flinging her on the floor, and holding her. "Not yet, my fine madam. So you would have murdered me, would you—murdered me in cold blood? But I've got you, and this time you don't escape me in a hurry. We cannot permit mad people to roam at large this way, threatening the lives of peaceful householders."

"Have mercy, Charles!"

Something in the tone of that imploring voice, mingled with the allusions thrown out during the previous conversation, fired my blood. I stole quietly into the room, and winding my long arms around my uncle's throat, dragged him from the woman. So we writhed together on the floor.

The woman seemed stunned with surprise. A moment afterwards she collected herself, and rushed down stairs. Mad with rage at the thought that she was escaping him, my uncle dashed both his hands into my face. My face bled, but I held him fast.

"Help! murder!" he screamed, at the top of his voice.

There was a rustling in the passage without, and Elizabeth, pale and trembling, entered the apartment with a lighted candle in her hand. At sight of her I let go my hold, and we rose to our feet. My uncle shrunk back, and glared at me savagely.

"Henry! father!" cried Elizabeth, "What is the meaning of this?"

Monsieur, his lips foaming, his eyes flashing, pointed fiercely at me.

"Ask him," he cried.

She looked appealingly into my face, but I made no answer.

"He would have murdered me!" cried my uncle. "He crept up to my room in the dead of night, and would have murdered me as I slept."

The lie staggered and stunned me. At this moment Elizabeth stooped down and lifted something which glistened from the carpet. It was a common carving knife.

"He can't deny it, and you hold the proof in your hand. He would have murdered me."

"It is false!" I cried.

"Hear him!" said my uncle, with a savage sneer. "He denies it; but there's your proof."

I grew quite calm and pale, for I now saw my danger. But there was much of sadness in my emotions.

"Elizabeth," I said, quietly, "do you believe this?"

She looked from one to the other in a weak, wan way, but returned no answer.

"You are silent: you believe me guilty. But remember, I have denied that man's charge. I would not have his blood on my head for all the world. But that is enough. I shall leave this accursed place this moment, and will never more darken its threshold again."

And I moved to the door. But my uncle, having recovered all his natural strength, sprang after me, and gripped me with an arm of iron.

"Not so," he said, firmly and bitterly. "You don't escape me in this way."

Elizabeth looked appealingly at him, but he did not relax his hold.

"What do you want with me?" I asked, with an assumption of firmness.

"Never mind. Time, my dear nephew, will enlighten you on that head. In the meantime, you don't leave this house. Boys who attempt to cut throats with carving-knives, at the dead hours of the night, must not be suffered to go unpunished."

I had neither strength nor courage to resist him. He pushed me into a little dressing-room, which communicated with his own bed-chamber. Then I heard him pass, with Elizabeth, out of the larger room, and lock that door also.

Then I wept. I sat down, with my face in my hands, and shed bitter tears. I felt very injured and miserable; doubtless I had cause to feel both. My thoughts principally followed the footsteps of the woman I had rescued. How had she entered the house? How had she escaped from it? The egress seemed answered, in one way, by my open window; but the ingress was a mystery.

The front door lay just below the room in which I was imprisoned. I was startled from my meditations by hearing that door open, and, looking out, I saw my uncle pass from the house with a servant of his, his groom. I could hear them talking, but I could make out few of their words. "Escaped lunatic." "Wife." "Jumped through the window." "Left." "Right." "Five pound note, if you overtake her." These were the fragmentary words which I caught at intervals. Then they separated, going in different directions.

I felt sure that the mysterious woman was the object of their pursuit, and chafed and fretted in my fears for her safety. I fell with all my weight against the closed door, but it did not yield. Then I struck it repeatedly with my clenched fist, till my hand bled again.

All was of no avail. I sat down, trembling, and doggedly awaited the worst.

To whom could the woman have alluded, in making the inquiry about her boy, and in averring that he was then under that roof? To whom but to myself? Could the woman be indeed my supposed mamma risen from her grave? or could she, by some means or other, have avoided death at the last moment?

The last supposition was preposterous. I myself had seen her stretched out, stiff and cold, on her deathbed, and I could not possibly have been deceived in the matter. My eyes, at that time, had been much too sharp to be made the fools of the other senses. There was some terrible mystery.

At first, in my extremity, I forgot Elizabeth, to whom I had pledged my love. Could she possibly believe me guilty of attempting her father's life? Certainly, circumstantial evidence was against me; but if she really loved me, she would, in the very face of such evidence, believe in my innocence. I felt my own love cool as I encouraged these reflections. Something of the wickedness of my uncle fell like a shadow on her innocent face.

I was startled by hearing the door of the outer room open. Light footsteps came towards the inner door, which opened in its turn. Elizabeth, very pale and calm, stood on the threshold, with the light in her hand. Silently she beckoned me to her.

"Go!" she whispered. "My father will not be back for some time, and you have time to make your escape. I know that you are in danger."

"Elizabeth!"

I uttered the word out of a full heart, pleadingly. It was the last vague appeal of a dying love, and the love expired with her answer, for she waved her hand, as if deprecating reply, and I was surprised to see her lip curl scornfully.

"Go!" she repeated; "I would not have him harm you, but I have never loved you. Go!"

"You have never loved me?"

"Loved you? You are a boy; and he wished me to marry you for his own purposes. Loved you? Are you mad? Go, boy. I know you are innocent of the attempt upon his life, and for that reason I have come to release you. Go, go, go!"

She added the last words impatiently, waving me away as she spoke. I slunk away like a beaten cur, casting one bitter glance at her cold face. She followed me down stairs.

"Take what you want," said Elizabeth, pointing to my chamber door.

"I will take nothing!" I muttered, with angry determination. "This roof is accursed!"

"As you please," she answered, with a slight sneer. "You yesterday held a different opinion."

"Remember, Elizabeth," I said, for I was wroth, "that you have made an enemy of one who would willingly have proved himself your friend. Your disclosure might have been made more kindly."

An expression of pain, which suddenly stole across her features, was covered by a gesture of impatience.

"You have wilfully and cruelly deceived me," I continued, bitterly.

She laughed in a low, helpless way, and then bit her lips nervously.

"Just so," she answered. "We have wilfully and cruelly deceived you. What more could you expect from us? Did you imagine that our behavior towards you was dictated by kindness?"

"Then you confess to guilty motives! Oh, that I had known this before! You are both guilty."

"Yes, both. It is as well to be candid with you; for it is useless to continue the deception any longer. We had chestnuts to take out of the fire, and used you as a cat's-paw. Go!"

I was worked to frenzy by her cool, cold and deliberate manner, spiced as it was by ill concealed scorn and well-affected amusement.

"Then, farewell," I cried. "We had an account to settle, and you have enlightened me as to the items. Take care!"

"Pray do not threaten; for my candor must convince you that we do not fear you. Do what you please. We have always thought you weak spirited."

"We shall see."

She had opened the front door for me. I seized my hat from the stand and rushed out. The door was softly closed behind me. I felt alone in the wide world.

Whither to go I knew not. I had some three or four shillings in my pocket; that was all. I thought of Augustus, and walked rapidly away in the direction of his cottage. It was past midnight. I had just passed the churchyard, when some one broke through the roadside hedge and stood before me, panting. I immediately recognised Augustus, of whom I was in search. He came up to me, with a strange wild look on that rough face of his.

"This is a night of terrors," he whispered, grasping my hand. "Why are you abroad?"

I was about to enter into a summary of the occurrences of the night, when he interrupted me:

"Have you seen Ornamel?"

I gave a gesture of surprise at the question, and answered in the negative.

"He is abroad, and I'm looking after him. He means mischief."

I here broke in to give him an account of what I had witnessed—the midnight visitor, her entry into my uncle's room, their conversation, and the scene which followed. He evinced no surprise.

"Yes, she is again at large, and Ornamel is on her track. They advertised her escape, and we watched for her. Ornamel saw her first, and fled after her. It was then that I missed him, and followed."

"What is to be done?" I asked, anxiously.

"Hush!"

He bent down, listening, holding up his finger to enjoin silence.

"Come this way," he said, leading me back to the churchyard. We entered, and crouched down in a dark corner among the tombs.

"I heard footsteps," he said, in a hot whisper. "Wait!"

There was a solemn pause, during which we listened attentively. All we heard for some moments was our beating hearts. Then we became conscious that some one was approaching us from the fields behind. A minute afterwards the figure of a woman appeared, clambering over the wall. It entered the churchyard, and crouched down silently in a distant corner. It was that of our midnight visitor.

Immediately afterwards we heard other footsteps coming in the same direction. Then my uncle leapt the wall, and stood peering about him in the enclosure. He walked across the churchyard, and looked over upon the highway.

"Richard!" he said, in a loud whisper.

"Yes, your honor," answered a rough voice, which I recognized as that of the groom.

"She passed this way. Keep along the highway, with your eyes sharp about you, while I reconnoitre here."

"All right, your honor."

"Remember, a mad woman; but don't give the alarm unless necessary. Keep on straight to the next village. If you see her, detain her; hire a carriage and bring her to me. Never mind the expense. And remember, there is a reward offered for her apprehension."

"Yes, your honor."

The man ran at full speed along the road, and was soon out of hearing. Monsieur's unfortunate habit of talking aloud here manifested itself. He turned round, peering among the tombstones, and talking to himself. Luckily, he did not happen to come in our direction. Augustus crouched in the darkness, gripping me convulsively, and I could see his eyes flash fire.

"Curse her!" soliloquized my uncle, as he stumbled among the graves. "Curse her for a fool! Does she think to escape me by this folly? I'd hound her to the furthest corner of the earth. This state of things can't last. We must get rid of her somehow."

Here he came plump against a rakish-looking tombstone, which he greeted with a blessing. Then falling forward, with a succession of strides, he stumbled against the woman, where she lay in the darkness. She gave a scream and rose to her feet. He started back, with a cry, surprised and frightened at the suddenness of the meeting. Augustus grew more and more excited.

"Found at last!" cried my uncle, making a spring at his victim.

The woman fell on her knees before him, and clung about his feet.

"Have mercy, Charles!" she moaned. "Have mercy!"

He spurned her with his heavy boot, and seized her savagely by the arms.

"I've got you at last, my lady—safe! and this time you shan't escape me so easily. Rise and come along. Rise, I say! You won't?"

"Have pity, Charles! For the sake of old times, have pity! I've suffered enough."

He was dragging her to her feet, when Augustus sprang forward and touched him on the shoulder. Both men stood erect looking at each other. Monsieur was pale and nervous. Augustus was pale and perfectly collected.

"Who are you?" asked monsieur, savagely, "and what do you want?"

"I'm an old friend of yours; and I want to prevent you from injuring the helpless woman there. There, I've answered your questions, and you must answer mine. By what authority, my man, do you lay violent hands on that woman?"

"By what authority do you question me?"

"Look at me!" said Augustus, thrusting his face close to that of monsieur.

"Eugene!" muttered monsieur, stepping back, as if aghast.

Augustus (by which name I shall continue to call him yet awhile) became facetious. When he became facetious, he became vulgar.

"Exactly! Eugene himself, in the flesh, and no thanks to you that he isn't out of it. I hope my old friend continues well."

"Once more, what do you want with me?"

"Much. In the first place, my man, I might want to put a few questions to you about a lady friend of mine. Secondly, her name might be Martha. Thirdly, I might be desirous of asking you how she is, bodily and mentally."

Monsieur committed himself by muttering an ungentlemanly oath.

"Don't get out of temper. Now, do you know that I've heard that this lady friend of yours—and her name might be Martha—is dead and buried?"

"What then?" said my uncle, who was gradually recovering his composure. "What then? I had no hand in her death."

"False!" cried Augustus, plunging into a torrent of passion. "She was murdered!"

"Not by me."

"By you! She died by a slow poison, administered year by year at your hands. Curse you, for a lying villain! But there, I've done with you for the present. By-and-bye, we shall meet again, and you shall not escape so easily."

Here I stepped forward, and met my uncle's eye. It burned fiercely upon me; but he made no observation. I here became conscious of a dark form cowering in a distant corner.

"And this—for a lady she is—goes along with me to a place of safety. By-and-bye, perhaps, we shall have something to say to you together. In the meantime, farewell."

All this time the woman had lain on the ground, moaning and sobbing. She rose to her feet now, and prepared to follow Augustus, whom she seemed to recognize.

"Stop!" cried Monsieur Charles, authoritatively. "That woman is my wife."

The dark form I had noticed just before now sprang forward.

"Liar!" cried the voice of Ornamel. "She is mine!"

Half dressed, with his white hair streaming around his ghastly face, Ornamel sprang at Monsieur Charles, and plunged his long, sinewy fingers in his throat. The two men fell, and rolled over and over on the grass, struggling and writhing. The woman had swooned away on the appearance of the man who claimed to be her husband.

COMMODORE S. H. STRINGHAM.

COM. SILAS H. STRINGHAM, whose portrait we publish to-day, is one of those rare men, Christian warriors. What Havelock was in the British Army, Commodore Stringham is in the American Navy—one of those who, regarding war as a terrible necessity, carry into the performance of its duties a grave and religious spirit. Such men, like the Ironsides of Cromwell, are indeed invincible. This conscientious nature he inherited from his parents, who were citizens of Newburg, Orange county, State of New York, where the subject of our present sketch was born in 1796. On the 15th of November, 1809, he entered as midshipman in the frigate President, then commanded by the gallant Captain Rodgers, and he has consequently been fifty-two years in service, twenty-six years of which have been passed at sea. In 1830 he was appointed to the command of the Falmouth, on the West India squadron.

In 1835 he sailed from New York in the John Adams, to join the Mediterranean squadron, and returned in 1837. In the same year he was appointed to the Porpoise, to go in search of a pirate that was annoying our merchantmen on the coast. In 1842 he commanded the Independence, which was attached at that time to the Home squadron, and on the 8th of September, 1847, he was made Commander and took charge of the Ohio, sent to Brazil on special service, for the purpose of conveying to that country the American minister and his suite. From this post he succeeded to the command of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and on the breaking out of the Mexican war he resumed his position in his old ship, the Ohio, and led the squadron at the taking of Vera Cruz and Castle San Juan d'Ulloa.

In 1852 he sailed in command of our squadron to the Mediterranean, from whence he returned in 1855, and was ordered to the Charlestown Navy Yard as Commandant, holding that position some four years; upon leaving there he was the recipient of various testimonials of regard from all classes. Upon the incoming of the present Administration he was summoned to Washington, and when it was decided to blockade all the Southern ports, he was ordered to his present station, reaching from Key West on the south to Cape Charles, at the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, on the north, with the Minnesota, a forty-gun steamer, as the flag-ship, and some twenty-five vessels in all, manned by 3,500 sailors and marines. The fleet is the most important ever put in commission by the Department.

His latest, but not his last achievement, we trust, has been the reduction of Forts Hatteras and Clark. After the capture he brought the prisoners he took there in the Minnesota to New York, and is now again in command of his vessel, and about to start upon another and equally important expedition.

In person Commodore Stringham is of medium height, and compact, athletic frame, of manly bearing and frank demeanor. In a word, he is a sailor, a gentleman and a Christian. Although in his sixty-fifth year, his temperance has left him twenty years younger in constitution than his years indicate.

NAVAL PRACTICE BATTERY AT THE NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON.

OUR present number contains a sketch of what is called the Naval Practice Battery, where our young gunners rehearse before they go into the terrible ordeal of battle. Simple as the loading and firing of a gun may sound, it is an operation which tries the nerves, and requires the utmost nicety of adjustment. It is really and truly as much an act of science, if properly done, as the most delicate surgical operation. We need not say anything about the Dahlgren gun itself, having both illustrated and described it in our paper of the 27th of April, 1861, and indeed our present sketch speaks for itself.

MAP OF THE VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA COAST.

WE give to-day a completer map of the present scene of Naval operations. We have so fully described the localities that we have now merely to say that a recent survey gives the following depth of water at the various inlets: New or Oregon Inlet, 3½ to 5 feet; Hatteras Inlet, 15 to 17 feet; Ocracoke Inlet, 8 to 10 feet; Old Topsail Inlet, which is the entrance to Beaufort, and guarded by Fort Macon, has from 17 to 21 feet. It will therefore be seen how necessary it is to secure Old Topsail Inlet without delay. Fort Macon is the most important of these inlet forts, mounting 48 guns. We hope soon to announce its capture and occupation by our troops. A correspondent of the New York Daily Times says:

"I learn from a native of Beaufort, North Carolina, now resident here, that Hatteras Inlet was formed in 1846, up to which time the road passed over it. And it seems that another storm broke over it in 1854, by which the channel was considerably deepened. It is now the best inlet to the sounds. For half a century the North Carolinians have discussed the utility of opening an inlet at Nag's Head, which is not far south of Norfolk, and many a Congressman has flattered himself and his constituents that he could induce the General Government to undertake the work. It used to be thought, I remember, that about a million dollars would be sufficient to open a deep ship-channel. It is probable that a tenth part of the sum would have sufficed, if we are to judge by what nature has accomplished at Hatteras. It was only necessary to dig a ditch two or three feet deep, and a mile or less in length, to initiate the channel. The next storm would accomplish the rest."

THE NATIONAL BONDS AND THE BOGUS SHIN-PLASTERS.

AN old writer has said that coins are very good standards of national solidity. This is perhaps too flattering to American vanity, since it gives the American eagle too great an elevation over the Spanish dollar, French franc, Turkish piaster, Russian rouble, Indian rupee, and, not to put too fine a point upon it, the British sovereign, we do not mean the Madonna of England, the Lady Victoria, but that sovereign which commands $4 82 in every honest exchange office. We give to-day two facsimiles or portraits, which so completely illustrate Shakespeare's famous lines—that he must have had in his mind's eye the proofsheet of our present paper, which places in financial juxta-position the real Simon Pure with the false. The old saying of "All Wall street to a Bowery peanut" has never had a better translation. They are significant of the two causes. The National note represents the dignity of the Union—the Confederate shinplaster the straits to which a wicked conspiracy has reduced what was once part of a great nation. Artistically considered, the comparisons are equally odious. Looking at them, there are few men, with their eyes and brains, who would not rather invest a $100 in the one than 25 cents in the other! One thing we may promise, that, as valor is always magnanimous, whenever our misguided rebels of the South cry for "quarter," General McClellan will doubtless give it—upon their renouncing the error of their ways, and returning to their duty.

"Look on this picture and on that—

OBITUARY.

EX GOVERNOR GEORGE P. BRIGGS, of Massachusetts, who was recently severely wounded by the accidental discharge of a shot-gun, died at Stockbridge on the 12th. He was born in Andover, Berkshire county, Mass., April 12th, 1796. He commenced life as a hatter's apprentice, but his indomitable energy led him to abandon his trade for the purpose of acquiring a liberal education. He spent a single year in an academy; fitted himself for the prosecution of legal studies by the reading of borrowed class-books at the light of a log-fire after his labors in the short winter days; entered an office as errand boy, but made such progress that in 1818 in his 22d year, he was admitted to the bar. In 1831 he was elected a representative in Congress from Massachusetts, and officiated as such till 1843, being Chairman of the Post-office Committee during the 27th Congress. In 1843 he was elected Governor of Massachusetts, and since his demission of that office has been one of the most successful, energetic and respected lawyers in New England. Although for 10 years past somewhat retired from the busier arena of public life, he is a loss to Massachusetts of one of her strongest and most important citizens.

PERSONAL.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE, the popular English novelist, author of "Framley Parsonage" and "The Three Clerks," has again arrived in this country. He is a brilliant novelist; but when he undertakes travels, and the discussion of practical subjects, he sinks beneath contempt.

HON. DAVID TOD, formerly Minister to Brazil, and a loyal Democrat, has been nominated for Governor of Ohio. A Republican is nominated for Lieutenant-Governor. Party lines are rapidly being swept away, as they should be, till a peace is conquered.

MAJOR GENERAL HUNTER, of the U. S. Army, arrived in Chicago on the 4th instant, and established temporary headquarters at the Sherman House. He is still suffering from the wound he received at Manassas. He was complimented with a serenade on the evening of his arrival. He is to take command of a division of the army yet to be designated.

MR. JAMES C. DERBY, formerly of the publishing firm of Derby & Jackson, has been appointed Consul to Porto Rico.

THE Prince de Joinville was a passenger on the steamer Africa, now at this port. He is accompanied by his son, whom he designs (with the permission of the Government) placing in the United States Naval School at Newport.

THE Hartford Courant states that General Lyon left, by will, all his property, valued at $30,000, to the Government. He has thus given all that a man could give for his country.

GRISI has sung in London over 900 nights during the last thirty years; 93 times in "I Puritani," 82 times in "Don Giovanni," 79 times in "Norma," 97 in "Lucrezia Borgia," 78 in "Les Huguenots," 41 in "Semiramide."

THE Hon. Henry Barnard (says the Hartford Times) has been appointed Librarian of the Watkinson Library, and it is probable that he will soon visit Europe to purchase books. It will be remembered that the late David Watkinson left a legacy of $100,000 to found a library of reference in Hartford.

COLONEL JOHN FITZ ROY DE COURCEY, an English officer of distinction, has tendered his services to the Government, and they have been accepted. Colonel De Courcey commanded a Turkish regiment during the Crimean War.

COLONEL LEWIS WALLACE and his Indiana Zouaves are again in the field, this time for the war. Their exploits in the Cumberland neighborhood are not yet forgotten, and we shall doubtless hear of them again from Missouri.

CHARLES HENRY FOSTER, Congressman elect from North Carolina, has tendered the President a full brigade of loyalists from that State.

THE Diritto of Turin publishes intelligence from Caprera to the 7th of August, giving some account of Garibaldi's health and opinions on affairs in general: "General Garibaldi, who had been attacked with his rheumatic pains, remained in bed for several days, and until the 4th never left the house. Since that day he has resumed his walks, and now nothing remains of his complaint but a slight pain in his left hand, which will shortly disappear by the use of the vapor bath. Very much grieved at what is going on in Naples, he makes it the subject of long conversations with the companions of his solitude and with the frequent visitors, Italian and foreign, who urge him, but in vain, to leave the island. He has formally declared that he will not do so unless compelled by events. He receives a great number of addresses and letters from all nations who are laboring for the great cause of independence and of liberty. Requests for advice are sent to him from all sides, and he gives it according to that political intelligence which up to the present time has prevented him from committing an act which was not for the dignity and welfare of his country."

GENERAL HEINTZELMAN, one of the officers of division at Bull Run, is to have command of a division in the army.

MR. FAULKNER, our late Minister to France, who was for some time under arrest in Washington, has been transferred to Fort Lafayette.

GERMANY has lost one of her most eminent female scholars, Frau Dr. Heidenreich, née von Siebold, died at Darmstadt recently. She was born in 1792, studied the science of midwifery at the Universities of Gottingen and Giessen, and took her doctor's degree in 1817, not honoris causa, by favor of the Faculty, but like any other German student, by writing the customary Latin dissertation, as well as by defending in public disputation a number of medical theses. She took up her permanent abode at Darmstadt, where she was universally honored as one of the first living authorities of her special branch of science.

OUR latest advices from London, by the Africa, inform us that Lord Monck is about to succeed Sir Edmund Head as Governor-General of Canada, and that the English Government is about to despatch an army reinforcement of 22,500 men to that province during the present month. Charles Stanley Monck, Viscount and Baron Monck, of Ballytrammon, Wexford, in the peerage of Ireland, is the eldest son of the third Lord Monck, and was born on the 10th of October, 1819. Lord Monck succeeded to the estates of his father and the peerage on the 20th of April, 1849.

MONSIEUR J. E. SOUCHARD, French Consul in Boston, has been created by Napoleon III. a Knight of the Legion of Honor.

ACCORDING to the Turin correspondent of the London Times, the ex-Queen of Naples is "a character." He says she goes about in man's clothes, "smokes like a sailor and swears like a trooper." She hectors her sister-in-law, and has pitched battles with the princes and princesses of the house of Bourbon. Though robbed of her sceptre she disdains to handle the distaff; she carries her dread revolver at her side; she delights in the exhibition of her skill; she aimed at a cat the other day, in the Quirinal garden—a fine Syrian cat, gray, long-tailed and hairy—who was basking in the morning sun (the Queen is up at five o'clock), on the wall hanging over the grotto of fountains and waterworks, which are one of the seven wonders of the City of the Seven Hills. Purring, and stretching, and gamboling, did the unwary tabby luxuriate in the sense of blessed existence, when the Queen took aim and fired, and the poor thing leaped up in the air, hit through her head, and dropped down like lead into a basin of water beneath.

OUR amiable young friend, the Prince of Wales, is under hard drill in Ireland. In no one single respect is an iota of distinction as to drill or camp duties made between him and any other captain of a company. Wet or dry, hot or cold, he has to tramp along whenever he is ordered out, and take his share of the fatigue and roughing which a long day's drill so impartially accords to all in every regiment, whether guards or line, officers or men.

THE Boston Transcript relates that among the throng of applicants for the Government loan at the Treasurer's office was Wesley Bishop, a negro, who has been for some years employed in a glass establishment on Merchants' row. "Clad in his working-day garments, his good-humored countenance beaming with an honest purpose, he placed upon the counter his little bag of gold—a portion of his hard-earned accumulations—with an evident feeling of satisfaction that he could contribute something to sustain a Government which, although it had at times seemed to have forgotten that his race had rights to be protected, he yet felt it to be his sacred duty to sustain."

COLONEL JOHN W. LOWE, of the 12th Ohio regiment, who fell at the head of his regiment in the thickest of the fight in Western Virginia, on the 10th instant, was a man of much intelligence and undoubted bravery. He served with distinction in the Mexican War. He has a brother living in Vanderbilt avenue, Brooklyn.

THE body of Colonel John A. Washington, who was shot on the 11th, was sent to his family on the 16th, under a flag of truce.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART.

M. LOUIS BLANC has published the eleventh volume of his Historie de la Revolution Francaise. The work is spoken very highly of. Among the questions which M. Blanc is said to have settled is the one that Robespierre certainly did not attempt to commit suicide on the night before his execution. The pistol shot which Robespierre received was fired by a gendarme named Meda, who was promoted for the deed.

SIR G. C. LEWIS, notwithstanding his onerous official duties, first as Secretary of the British Home Office, and lately as Minister of War, has found time during the session to write "A Historical Survey of the Astronomy of the Ancients," and is now busy revising the proof-sheets from the press.

A VERY valuable little pamphlet has just been published in London entitled "Colliery Explosions, and a Means to Prevent Them." The author, Mr. R. H. Hughes, proposes to ventilate mines and collieries by forcing fresh air to their various parts by means of pipes under pressure. Air, he says, may be supplied to mines by an apparatus very similar to that by which gas is furnished to towns. In 1859, 905 colliers lost their lives in the United Kingdom, and in 1860 the number rose to 1,109. The deaths caused by explosions of firedamps were four times as numerous in 1860 as in the preceding year.

A LETTER on the nomenclature of the minor planets, by Mr. J. R. Hind, appears in a late number of the Monthly Notices of the British Royal Astronomical Society. He expresses his dissent from the proposal of M. Le Verrier, the director of the Observatory at Paris, that the present system of giving the new planets classical names should be discontinued, and that they should be simply named after their discoverer, and numbered; thus Astræa would be (5) Hencke; Thetis, (17) Luther; and so on. Mr. Hind also strongly objects to such names as Maximiliana and Angelina, which, he says, ought to be rejected, or, if these be allowed, it should be with the understanding that no future infractions of the rule should be permitted.

THE French Academy gives every ten years a prize of 20,000 francs ($4,000) for the work deemed most highly representative of French literature. This decennial prize has been awarded to M. Adolphe Thiers, historian of the French Revolution, of the Consulate, and of the Empire. But the eloquent little hermit of the Rue St. Georges happens to be immensely rich, so he has generously declined the money, and begged the Academy to apply it to some other purpose of literary usefulness. It has been proposed to bestow their munificent honorarium on some other author or authoress. The chances oscillate between M. Jules Simon and Mme. George Sand.

SIR BENJAMIN BRODIE, it is said, intends to retire from the presidency of the Royal Society of Great Britain, a post which for so many years he has filled with honor and distinction. Ill health more than old age has led the illustrious man to take this step. Who is to be his successor? General Sabine was talked of, a savant in every way qualified to preside over the F.R.S.s when a whisper arose that Lord Brougham would accept the presidency if elected. Lord Brougham has long passed his eightieth year, but he is still hale and active; his frame is still vigorous, and his intellect shows no signs of decay.

SUBMARINE volcanic action in the Atlantic Ocean near the Equator has been for some years going on. We have now two accounts of it, observed by ships but a few miles apart from each other—the Dallas, Captain Wikander, and the Melbourne, Captain Cowie, on March 20, 1861. The latter says: "We were startled by a heavy and loud rumbling noise, and at the same time felt the ship tremble from stem to stern, which lasted four or five minutes. The noise resembled more the low grumble of distant thunder than the harsh, grating noise produced by the ship taking the ground." The Dallas lost her false keel by the shake or collision.

THE long electric telegraph line connecting the southern ports of China with America is in the course of rapid construction by the Russians, under the superintendence of the Colonel of the Romanoff family known by his beautiful maps of the Amoor country, in Asia.

Published by order of the Legislature of that State, from actual surveys made of each County at a cost of more than ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS and TWENTY YEARS' TIME. This map is the size of Lloyd's Southern States Map, four feet square, and is the only real good map ever made in America. On this Map of Virginia is shown every Mountain, every Ridge, every Wagon and Stage Road, every Canal, every Natural Curiosity, every Creek and River, and the names of them, every County Seat, every Town, every Village, and every Post Town, every Mountain Pass and every Ford is marked down and the altitude of the Mountains, every Lighthouse on the Potomac, and every Inlet and Island are shown, and the Bars and Shoals, every Fort, Battery and Stronghold is marked down.

Every Railroad and every Station on the Railroads, and the distances from Station to Station, are laid down from official authority.

This Map is engraved on Steel, and is the only real valuable map ever made in America.

ITS HISTORY.

The State of Virginia commenced this Map in 1780, and completed it in 18.8. It was afterwards corrected up to 1859 and taken to the Government Engraver at Washington City to be engraved. It was just finished when the State of Virginia seceded from the Union. The Governor of that State sent to Washington and seized the plates and took them to Virginia when only five hundred copies had been struck off by the engraver. These Maps are now in my possession, excepting one which Gen. Scott uses constantly, and another which the Tribune Editors have.

Any one ordering this Map, and not satisfied with it, can have their money refunded.

Price per Copy, $1, or ten Copies for $5.

Lloyd's Military Map of the Southern States of North America, AND GAZETTEER OF SOUTHERN COUNTRY, (FOR THE USE OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT),

Showing the entire South, from Mason and Dixon's Line to the heart of Mexico.

Drawn from actual Surveys, showing every foot of the Southern Country from Delaware to the banks of the Rio del Norte, Mexico. Every County and County Seat, Town, Village, Fort, Navy Yard, River, and Towns and Landings on the Rivers, Lake, Swamp and Mountain is marked down. Every Railroad completed up to 6th day of July, 1861, and all those projected are exhibited on this Map, every Station, and the distance from station to station, is marked distinctly. More than 3,000 towns on the Mississippi, Red, Arkansas and Ohio Rivers, are laid down on this Map. All the information in the Departments at Washington City, in regard to the last Coast Surveys, were used in perfecting this Map, every inlet and creek is shown. The Forts and Arsenals are all laid down on Lloyd's Map correctly, from official documents in the War Department.

The Gazetteer of the Southern States, Cities, Villages, Mountains and Rivers, giving a correct sketch of each village, where and how situated, its population, military strength, all from the last census, is alone worth ten times the price of the Map, and is printed on the back of the large sheet map without extra cost. This matter which we give to the public on the back of this Map, is equal to an octavo book of 300 pages information that would alone cost $10. All for 50 Cents, Map included; 3 copies for One Dollar; or by the hundred copies at one-half off the retail price.

Lloyd's Military Map of the Southern States

Is acknowledged by Civil Engineers to be the best drawn and most accurate of any map ever offered to the public before. The surveys for this map were made by Civil Engineers of the Southern States; and the information of the Railroads, Stations and Distances were furnished by Southern Railroad men themselves, and can be relied on as correct. In fact this is the only correct Map of the Southern Country ever drawn. The people of the Northern States can see correctly at a glance the preponderance of the Southern country over the Northern and Western States, and will more fully comprehend the reason of the Southern States uniting, by glancing westward at the rich plains of Mexico, which are exhibited on this map.

Lloyd's Military Map is the only map in America that shows Vienna, Newport News, Pig's Point, Matthias Point, Bull Run, Rich Mountain, Beverley, Newport News, Manassas Junction, Fortress Monroe, and every other place of interest in the Fifteen Southern States.

The public will please understand that this map was not rushed out for the purpose of supplying the people with an imperfect map during the present excitement, but has been under way for more than one year, and is now ready for the public, after a long and tedious work in surveying, drawing and engraving, and is believed to be the only reliable and full map of the whole Southern country ever issued.

Can be sent by mail anywhere in America. Agents can sell 50 copies per day. Send money for sample Map. No Postage Stamps taken, unless for odd change. The postage on the Sheet Edition is only one cent per copy to any part of the country. Can be rolled and folded without injury.

The Mounted Edition will have to be sent by Express. Agents supplied at the following rates per dozen—Sheet Edition, $3; Cloth Pocket Edition, at $7; Mounted Edition, at $18. Terms, Cash.

Sample copies are sold at retail price. ☞ Registered Letters only are at our risk. Enclose a stamp to prepay each copy ordered. Write your names plain, give your place, county and State, to avoid all mistakes. We do not send any more Maps C.O.D. by Express—for the reason many have refused to take them when so ordered—as we have been great losers by it. ☜

☞ Nearly everybody in America has bought Lloyd's Railroad Map, and this is the strongest evidence that I can offer that my Southern Military Map is the best map ever drawn and engraved in America. ☜

GREAT CURE.

Dr. Leland's

ANTI-RHEUMATIC BAND!

Permanently cures Rheumatism in its various forms, Gout and Neuralgia, Stiffness and Nervous Affections, Erysipelas, General Eruptions, Impurities of the Blood, and a sure cure for the evil effects of Mercury.

It is a conveniently arranged Band or Belt, containing a medicated compound, to be worn around the body, about the waist, equally affecting all parts, wherever the disease may be, and can be worn without injury to the most delicate person. No change in the proper habits of living is required, and it entirely removes the disease from the system without the fallacious use of powerful internal medicines, in such cases, which weaken and destroy the constitution, and give temporary relief only, by stupefying the system and deadening its vitality. By this treatment the medicinal properties contained in the Band, being of a highly aromatic and volatile nature, and capable of being readily absorbed through the pores of the skin, come into direct contact with the Blood and general circulation, without first passing through the process of digestion, which would tend, not only to detract from their curative powers, but to impair the internal organs and derange the digestion also—thus avoiding the injurious effects, so often the result of internal remedies, and effecting a perfect cure by purifying and equalizing the circulation of the vital fluids and restoring the parts affected to a healthy condition. This Band is also a most powerful "Anti-Mercurial Agent"—Calomel being the primary cause of a large part of the Stiffness, Neuralgic Pains and Rheumatics, so prevalent—and will entirely relieve the system from its pernicious effects.

Moderate cases are cured in a few days, and we are constantly receiving undoubted testimonials—to which we invite inspection at our office—of their efficacy in aggravated cases of long standing.

FRIGHTFUL CATASTROPHE AT THE CONTINENTAL THEATRE, PHILADELPHIA.

Seven Actresses Burnt to Death.

THE Continental Theatre, in Philadelphia, on Saturday evening, the 14th of September, was the scene of one of the most appalling accidents in the annals of the stage. We have had, at rare intervals, the distressing case of one dancer being burnt while exercising her vocation, such as Chas Wheeler, in London, and Adele Lehman, at Niblo's Garden, but never before has the journalist had to pen such a wholesale horror as that which has recently occurred on the stage of the Continental Theatre. As we have made this calamity the subject of editorial comment, we shall here confine ourselves briefly to the facts.

The second act of Shakespeare's "Tempest," as every one knows, commences with a dance by the corps de ballet, whose members were engaged at the end of the first act in attiring themselves in the gauze and tarletan that form the ballet apparel. The dressing-rooms front upon Sansom street, and are on the second floor, nearly fifty feet from the footlights. They are reached by a flight of stairs running up from the side of the stage, and are three in number, communicating with each other. The inner of these rooms is devoted to the principal dancers. On one side of that occupied by the four chief artists is a large mirror with a gas-jet beneath it. Before this they arrange their poses. A row of pegs extend along the wall above the mirror, upon which the corps de ballet hang their walking dresses while wearing their stage attire. Upon a nail nearest to the right of the mirror Miss Ruth Gale had hung a tartan dress, which, in brushing to take down, caught fire. In an instant the poor girl's clothes were in a blaze. Shrieking with dismay, she ran across the room to her sisters, who, heedless of their own safety, enveloped with their bare hair do to extinguish the flames. Meanwhile with fright, she tore herself away from them, and rushing into the entire room, among the paste-scrubbers girls, their dresses also on fire. The scene of terror that now ensued baffles all description. Miss Rita Gale, who had first run into the hay-loft, and whose dress was speedily in a blaze, fled despairingly down the stairs, towards the stage. In the confusion attending the fire, Mr. Thomas Jefferson reminded up the cloth which represented the sea to the last scene of the first act, and wrapping that in it endeavored to smother the flames. Most dreadfully unfortunate girl had met with another accident, for in her anguish she had caught fluttering against the large plate glass, and lacerated herself in a frightful manner. At this moment the curtain was pushed hastily aside, and the stage carpenters, Miss Mellfide rushing upon the stage uttering the most piercing shrieks, and enveloped in flames. The attendants pulled down the slides to her aid, thus hurling up some more of the cloth which represented the waves, from the stage, wrapped it around her. The curtain was then hastily lowered, while many, alarmed at the scenario, arose and left the theatre. The immediate appearance of a new manager, Wheatley, who had heard of the fire on change, and that a few of the actresses had been slightly burned, calmed the excitement. The curtain was then held no longer retired than louder and more piercing shrieks were heard, which so terrified the audience that he again came forward to reassure them to disperse.

In the meantime the occurrences behind the scenes were of the most awful character. Upon the stage itself there was an unparalleled scene of horror—six or seven young ladies, with their clothes nearly all burnt off, their persons dreadfully scorched, rushing the whole building ring with their cries. Miss Hannah Gale was found in a recess behind the scenes, in a prostrate position with such force as to render her insensible. Miss Anna Nicholls sprung from the dressing room to the stage, and with more haste to the stage, a bright of nearly twenty-five feet, and was much hurt. Miss Phebe Forden was shockingly burnt, and Miss Clara Gilbert, from the dressing room, followed, and was caught by a spectator. In the course of an hour or two all the sufferers were conveyed to the residences of friends, with the greater medical skill.

Death soon claimed the sufferings of six of these unhappy girls. Anna McBride died at six o'clock on Sunday morning. Miss Phillips at one o'clock the same day. Miss Rita Gale survived Hannah Gale. Miss Benson died on four o'clock that afternoon, and in the course of the following night Miss Addie Gale died. Miss Frank Gale, the sister of Miss Rita Gale, is reported the seventh victim to unexpected accuracy. There are yet two in great danger, Miss Addie Gale and Miss Sofia Gale, the latter of whom Miss Kate Harrison are only slightly injured. Three other young ladies were likewise severely burned. Miss Rosa Greenwood, whose noble exertions deserve the highest praise, is recovering from his burns, which are not so serious as might have been expected from his dreadful sufferings.

The State of the Country.

THE LINE OF THE POTOMAC.—Affairs in and around Washington have undergone little or no change during the past week. Troops continue to reach the Union encampments, and the work of drill and organization is prosecuted with extreme energy. A single quick and wakeful eye watches the whole line of the Potomac, and neglects none of the movements of the enemy's numerous advance outposts, nor rapidly demonstrating the forces under Beauregard and Johnston. Open discontent prevails among the rebels, and while the Union armies and some of the States are only retained by party promises of a speedy forward movement on the Capitol, this fair discussion of the rebel Congress at Richmond is significant. To heal these, General Bragg was called from Pensacola to take the place of Mr. Walker, as Secretary of War; but the change has been made not improved matters. The Richmond Whig says:

"Freezing and starvation stare you in the face for the next winter, and you will have to choose between Abe Lincoln and the Devil before you get the bread for the million. The women have supported the war so far. You could not do it without them but for their labors. You have had the government for seven months and you confess your inability to do anything by your daily wages, and still you speak of confidence. It is a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. Let the press speak out plainly, and that soon, all is lost."

The Richmond Examiner of the 12th, not only confesses to the general demoralization and wretchedness of the rebels, but also the fact that, underneath the apparent unanimity of opinion in the insurgent States, there exists a profound local jealousy sentiment, only awaiting the opportunity, which it is to be hoped the progress of the national arms will soon afford it, of an open expression. This paper says:

"It is evident to every intelligent observer that the embittered remnant of the submissionists are not to be fully represented in the Congress, which is to meet on organizing a regular opposition to the government. It is to be feared that a less formidable opposition than that which has been invariably against southern rights and southern honor, will be found to have annihilated its numerical terror, or at least, erased it to dropper from public view, it exists with undiminished virulence, and awaits the opportunity to spring into light again."

KENTUCKY.—The present great centre of national interest is Kentucky. The loyalty of the majority of the people, by decisive and overwhelming votes, has discarded the false and unnatural position of "neutrality" which the rebel Governor and his subordinates had attempted to force upon it. Its course is consistent. This action was no doubt hastened by the occupation of Columbus and other important points within the limits of the State by the troops under the rebel General Polk, and the passes of the Cumberland Mountains by another rebel force under General Zollicoffer. Although these movements were made in violation of the neutrality which their personal and official influence and power to prevent and embarrass the action of the Legislature, and the people, in taking its proper position and decisions. Not only has it preemptorily ordered the rebels from the soil of Kentucky, but it has called General Anderson to the head of the military department, and requested him to drive the invaders from its borders. The General responded at once to the call, and on the 21st issued a proclamation worthy of the defender of Fort Sumter, in which he says:

"LOUISVILLE, Kentucky, Saturday, Sept. 21.

"KENTUCKIANS—Called by the Legislature of this native State, I have assumed the command of the forces. It is mine to enforce not to make laws, and God willing, to protect your property and your lives. The strength of the rebellion has been its hatred to your soil. Kentucky is a ranger. She has vainly striven to keep peace between the North and the South. She has failed. She has been pressed to be her friends, but who now seek to conquer her. No rule of action can be laid down for me except to do right by the people of the country. The invaders must, and God willing, will be driven from your soil. Kentuckians, I am one of you. Your cause is mine. I repeat to say, a Kentuckian, making war on Kentucky. Every one who now suffers to the support of such a war is a traitor to his friend. Bills on banks in this city will be received as the flag on fathers loved, and which has shielded my infancy. Kentuckians, I am one of you. I have no higher ambition of all that is dear to freemen. Let us trust in God and do our duty as did our fathers.

"ROBERT ANDERSON,
"Brig.-Gen. U. S. A."

Meantime General Buckner, one of the friends and confederates of Governor Magoffin, has called in the aid of a body of rebel troops, and is now marching upon Bowling Green, in the southern part of the State, openly battering civil war. The consequence has been a general arming of the people, the advance of the troops under General Anderson, and of the Union levies, and the commencement of a movement which must speedily result in the expulsion of the rebels, and a transfer of the seat of war into Tennessee. In this movement Kentucky will be watched with breathless interest by the nation. If successful, as we have no doubt it will be, it opens the way to an efficient support of the loyal citizens of Eastern Tennessee, and pushes the Federal authority down to Georgia, into the very heart of the Rebellion. The action of the Legislature in repudiating the following concluding paragraph of a report of the Committee on Federal Relations, on the war tax of Congress, which was adopted, in both the Senate and House, by overwhelming majorities:

"The war was begun by South Carolina, out of the Confederate States, was more after what States united with her in the war. Her people of these States have been fighting against the Government of the United States. They have brought armies into the States of Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, to the National capital, and threaten to seize it, and to subvert the Government. They are fighting to destroy it. Kentucky and Kentuckians are determined to defend that Government, and to maintain its authority, its constitution, and its laws, its Government. It is the work of almost divine wisdom. No opposition to the Government of the United States. Kentucky will oppose both at home and abroad, and give them a cause which was supported by the whole power of the State. The effort now being made to overthrow the Government is unspeakably wicked, and has no parallel in the history of the world. Kentucky will not forsake against a Government which has been her boast and her pride, and which has conferred upon her unexampled blessings and the hopes of the people."

MISSOURI.—Affairs in Missouri are very far from being in a satisfactory condition. A strong opposition has sprung up against General Fremont, not so much on account of his late proclamation regarding the confiscation of slaves, as of alleged inaccessibility and exclusion, and, what is far more serious, neglect in properly supporting the various small detachments of troops in different parts of the State harassed or attacked by the insurgents in overwhelming numbers. They have been neglected, it is charged, and the State allowed to be overrun by the rebels. On the 18th General Lyon arrived at Jefferson City by General in the neighborhood of St. Louis, to enable him to carry out some gigantic plan of his own down the Mississippi River. The difference between him and General Fremont, the head of the Union movement in Missouri, have become so serious that he has placed the troops under command of Brigadier-General Sturgis, forbidding offers, and other allegations. Rumor announces that the Government at Washington, regarding the movements of General Lyon as premature, has ordered him not to be perilled by personal interests and ambitions, is deliberating on transferring General Fremont to another field of service. The only military operation of importance at present going on in the State is the siege of Lexington, on the Missouri River, 300 miles above St. Louis, by a large body of rebels, said to number 30,000, under General Price. The town is defended by between 3,000 and 4,000 national troops, under Colonel Mulligan. He has sustained several attacks, the severest being on the 18th inst. The rebels have thrown up their entrenchments, and closely pressed. A bayonet charge by the Irish brigade, numbering 900 men, however, broke the parapets, and drove them back, with heavy loss. To General Price's summons to surrender, Colonel Mulligan replied, with more force than elegance, "Go to hell!" It is said that there is no precedent for such happiness in military annals, but that General Price interpreted it as a declaration of his request. At latest accounts, reinforcements were hastening to Lexington—4,000 men under General Lane, and a still larger force under General Sturgis, being on their way. If Colonel Mulligan could hold his position for a few days, it was believed at St. Louis, on the 21st, that he would not only be relieved, but that there would be surrounded and compelled to surrender.

Telegraphic advices have been received since the above were written, announcing the surrender of Col. Mulligan. The particulars of the event are given elsewhere.

CALIFORNIA.—In the election just held, California has proved herself true to the Union. Leland Stanford, the Union candidate for Governor, is elected by 3,000 plurality. Both Houses of the Legislature are overwhelmingly Union. The vote in San Francisco was 16,000, of which Mr. Stanford received 11,000.

The United States and Foreign Powers—Spanish Presumption.

SPAIN has been the first of foreign powers to seize upon our domestic troubles as an opportunity for manifesting its hostility, and advancing what it regards as its interests. Conceiving that there can be no more exceptional at home to trouble us than about matters of no immediate interest, it has "annexed" the republic of Santo Domingo, including the magnificent Bay of Samana, which is the finest harbor and the most important naval position in the entire West Indies—a measure to which, it will knew, the United States could not fail to be hostile, and to which, under ordinary circumstances, it could not fail to oppose the most intervention. But this is not all. Presuming on its impunity in this case, it has now taken another step positively hostile to the United States, and in the most degree favorable to the rebels. The Captain-General at Cuba has issued a circular admitting vessels bearing the rebel flag, equal rights, in the ports of that island, with those of nations "having no consuls accredited within the territory of Cuba." In other words, it opens the ports of the island of Cuba to rebel cruisers and rebel prizes the free entrance of the piratical vessels called "privateers." Further than this, reasons are current that Spain, incited by other European governments, will go to some character to, but do not care to risk it, is preparing to openly recognize the so-called "Confederate States."

It is to be hoped that Spain has no special cause of liking for this country. Our example, no doubt, set that revolution in motion which deprived her of all her colonies on the continent, and it is natural to contemplate that the last remnants of her power in the Antilles have been several times seriously thwarted by unsanctioned expeditions from the United States. But Spain should not forget that the failure of these expeditions was owing not to her strength, but to the repression exercised by our strong Government, and maintained from the first. Every aggression or attempt at aggression on Spanish rights, from this country, originated and was suppressed from the South alone, and it was made in the interest, real or supposed, of what should be "Southern Confederacy" succeed in establishing itself, there is no shadow of doubt that its successful arms would speedily be turned to secure for it the long coveted acquisition of the Spanish conceits in cancrusos, and the kicks and cuffs of half a century, from all sorts of power would be avenged. Spain has expelled it; yet nothing is more certain than that any Southern State, single-handed, could occupy and hold all the Spanish possessions in the West Indies against the entire European and unprincipled power, whose first act would probably be her own dismemberment.

There is every report of this question which foreign powers generally, now throwing off their masks and revealing their hitherto concealed envy and hate, will do well to remember. The war, even if it ends in the dismemberment of the country, will nevertheless leave us a great nation, with half a million of trained soldiers in the field, and a huge and efficient navy on the ocean. It will leave us with an army equal to that of France, and with the power and disposition to punish our enemies and reward our friends. If there is one element of security remaining to us for affairs, she can easily have it by countenancing the intrigues and affronts of that most effete and contemptible of nationalities, the bankrupt and beggarly Government, Spain. By the encouragement by foreign interference from securing in our own way the beneficent purposes of our organization as a Government, we shall not lack the ability to make ourselves the scourge and terror of interlopers. We profess to be able to settle our own affairs without the counsel or aid of other powers, and wish to be left free to do so. Damage to their interests or property—recall. "Hands off!" in two words, is the sum and essence of our foreign policy. We are neither deaf nor dumb to offering from other powers, assistance or counsel, and hardening our muscles for new, and, in our history, unprecedented efforts; and in a twelvemonth, even as bankrupt as we will be, we will be able to meet any power with which foreign insolence may provoke, or foreign interference challenge.

LESSONS WHAT OF FIRE.—The lesson taught by the recent terrible accident in the Continental Theatre of Louisville, which we publish in full elsewhere, should be lost on the public. Within the past year several frightful accidents of a similar character have occurred in this city, resulting from insufficient precautions taken to prevent, or subdue, the inscrutable case of Mrs. Longfellow, the wife of the poet, from the taking fire of the light materials of modern dresses, especially when all persons are in a blaze, and panic and wild confusion in the crowded aisles and narrow doorways—the very thought of it causes a shudder! Accidents from the footlights of a theatre are usually guarded against, that a neglect of the necessary precautions should be severely punished. As to those resulting from undue expansion of feminine skirts, they can only be prevented by a wholesome reform of popular taste in dress, under the severe instructions of experience.

DECREASE IN BRITISH EXPORTS TO AMERICA.—While the aggregate increase of British exports generally, for the month of June last, was $5,060,000 over the same month of last year, the decrease of exports to the United States was from $3,650,000 in June, 1860, to barely $684,000 in June, 1861, a diminution of five-sixths or over 80 per cent. This decrease was made up as follows:

Cottons	$718,000	$52,000
Haberdashery	355,000	51,000
Hardwares	145,000	243,000
Linens	490,000	20,000
Iron	875,000	185,000
Silk	45,000	25,000
Woollens	1,032,000	110,000
	$3,650,000	$684,000

DISTINGUISHED FOREIGNERS IN THE UNION ARMY.—The Count de Paris and the Duc de Chartres, both sons of the Duc d'Orleans, and the first heir apparent to Louis Philippe, have entered the American army, and will probably be attached to the staff of Gen. McClellan. The Count de Penthievre, son of the Prince de Joinville, has entered the United States Naval Academy at Newport. The Prussian Prince Salm Salm, has been accepted as Colonel of Cavalry, but for the present is doing service in Gen. Blenker's brigade. Major Boussnwein, aide to Garibaldi, has also been commissioned to the same rank in the national service. The Montreal papers confirm the report that Colonel Rankin, of the British army, in command of one of the militia districts of Upper Canada, and a member of Parliament, has come to Detroit, to raise a regiment of 1,660 lancers, to be armed with sabre, carbine, pistol and a lance 17 feet long. He has power from the Government at Washington to proceed. Besides these, there are two distinguished Hungarian officers now serving in our armies—Gen. Asboth, on Gen. Fremont's staff, and Col. Stahel, who was at the storming of Comorn in '48, and is now commanding the Eighth New York volunteers. Col. Cozlay is the name of a third Hungarian about to enter our service. Two Prussian barons, one Von Radwitz, of Gen. McClellan's staff, and the other, Struve, the famous provisional governor of Baden, now a simple captain in the New York Eighth, represent their country's nobility in the American army.

A RECENT order of Gen. McClellan declares that firing on an enemy's pickets is contrary to the usages of civilized nations. He therefore orders that there shall be no firing on their pickets unless it becomes necessary to resist their advance or return a fire commenced by them.

CUBA AND THE REBELS.—The following is the text of the circular or proclamation of the Captain-General of Cuba, relative to the rebel flag:

HAVANA, August 31, 1861.

To the Collectors of Ports in the Island:

1st. Vessels with the flag of the Confederation of the South will be admitted into the ports of this Island for the purpose of legitimate trade, provided the documents which they present do not inspire the least suspicion of piracy, fraud or other crimes, which are punished by all national laws.

2d. Once in our ports, said vessels will be under the safeguard of the neutrality proclaimed by the Governor in the royal decree of 17th June, and cannot be molested in their loading, discharging, &c.

3d. All the authorities will consider the above vessels as proceeding from a nation having no consuls accredited in this territory.

THE STONES CRY OUT AGAINST THEM.—The two blocks of marble furnished by Tennessee and Louisiana respectively for the Washington Monument, bear the following inscriptions as an enduring reproach to their recreant donors:

"Louisiana—Ever faithful to the Constitution and the Union."
"Tennessee—The Federal Union; it must be preserved."

SOUTHERN VIEW OF "PEACE PARTIES."—The Memphis Avalanche of the 5th inst. pronounces the peace parties in the Federal States as "arrant humbugs," and says: "They may hold their conventions, whine about peace, and pass their canting resolutions until doomsday, but will never effect a peace on their terms. They may lick the feet of the tyrant if it suits them, but the South will continue to fight him, and against the Government of which he is the dictator, and against the people whom he governs, until she gets rid of them for ever."

THE UNADILLA.—The first of the new gunboats authorized by Congress, the Unadilla, made her trial trip on the 10th. She proved to be, in every way, a success. She was built by Mr. John Englis, of this city, her machinery being supplied from the Novelty Works. Mr. Englis made his contract for building her in Washington on the 28th of June. On the 30th he laid her keel in New York. In 42 working days she was launched, and in 63 days her engine was on board and steam got up. The building of 24 similar boats was let on the same day, and the Unadilla is the first in the water, nearly two weeks ahead of her contract time. Government pays Messrs. Englis $56,500, and the Novelty Works $31,500, making an aggregate of $88,000, without her armament.

EXAGGERATIONS.—Mr. Russell, "special correspondent" of the London Times, has been charged with a tendency to exaggeration. This is no new failing with that gentleman. In his account of the famous charge of the "Light Brigade" at Balaklava, he said, "Of the 607 light dragoons, above 400 were killed, wounded and missing." The final official accounts show that the loss in killed, wounded and missing was precisely 220. When the man is favorably disposed, the following arithmetical formula will enable people to get at something like the truth:

Russell's story ÷ 2 = The Truth.

Where his prejudices enter into the proposition the following will probably be nearest the fact:

Russell's story ÷ 10 = The Truth.

The loss of the "Light Brigade" at Balaklava, that "fearfully sanguinary struggle," was something less, proportionally, than that of the Kansas regiments at Wilson's Creek.

COTTON.—The stocks of cotton in Liverpool on the 2d of August, 1859-'60-'61, were as follows:

	1859.	1860.	1861.
American	605,820	1,076,140	735,550
Brazilian	10,600	25,510	31,740
Egyptian	17,840	42,350	18,630
East India	35,940	95,410	243,570
West India	250	370	170
Total	670,450	1,239,780	1,010,660

Showing the increase to be mainly in East India cotton. This has increased over 100 per cent. each year. So far from there being any probability that British statesmen will wish to break our blockade this winter, the truth is that their real interest will consist in allowing it to exist in all its force. Furthermore, Bull needn't trouble himself about his American supply. A very fair crop has been gathered down South this year, and a considerable, if we are to believe the Southern press, the largest part of it, has been pledged to the rebel Government. We propose to take this bodily, and shall want a market for its sale. Johnny shall have his cotton, the old boy, so he shall!

"SHARP STICKS."—Some of the thick-and-thin Administration papers claim that "increased vigor has been infused into the War and Navy Departments." We think so too, but the saurians which encumber them have required a deal of pricking up. The "sharp sticks" of the press, to say nothing of the mutterings of popular indignation, must finally tell even on the ichthyosauri of politics.

THE 25TH NEW YORK (ALBANY) REGIMENT.—A correspondent, an officer in the 25th or Albany Regiment, correcting the statement that Fort Albany, Arlington Heights, was built by a Massachusetts regiment, gives the following interesting particulars about the 25th regiment:

"It is singular that the 25th New York regiment has had no notice whatever in any newspaper outside of the city of Albany. Now, it is a fact that the 25th built Fort Albany, without the help of any other regiment, being the smallest regiment in Virginia. We were the first regiment that crossed the Canal Bridge into Virginia, the 14th New York going along the river into the interior. We planted the first American color in Virginia; took the first rebel prisoners in uniform. When we left the fort it was completed, with the exception of clearing up and sodding. We mounted the guns. We not only did this, but cut down 40 acres of woodland, and also cut timber for the stockades of Fort Runyon."

METROPOLITAN ITEMS.

SEVEN hundred and sixty-five emigrants have arrived at Castle Garden within a week, making a total of 56,460 for the year—a decrease of 21 060 from the number for the corresponding period in 1860.

THE Committee appointed to amend the City Charter met on the 21st in the chamber of the Board of Councilmen. After transacting some routine business, the Chairman of the Convention announced that the standing committees would be appointed at the next meeting of the committee, on the 23d.

THE rate of tax has been officially determined by the City Supervisors at 2 per cent below the line of Fifty-seventh street, and 1–05 above. The warrants were signed and issued to the Receiver on the 23d. The tax will be extended forthwith on the books, and the personal book will probably be opened for payments in a few days.

A LUNAR rainbow, an unusual phenomenon, was visible on Saturday evening, the 21st. A shower came up from the east, and on the dark pile of massive clouds a perfectly formed bow, displaying the three prismatic colors, attracted the attention of numerous gazers—many of whom had never witnessed this unusual occurrence.

IT is estimated that by the rebellion not less than $200,000,000 of Southern indebtedness to this city was blotted out as in a night, and the prospect of its recovery has been and is so remote and dubious that it can hardly be considered property.

SOUTHERN ITEMS.

THE Memphis Avalanche says that one of the Louisiana companies in the battle at Manassas lost its captain. The company then unanimously elected the wife of the deceased to fill his place, and the lady, in uniform, passed through Memphis, on the 11th inst., on her way to assume command of her company.

THE correspondent of the Columbia (Ga.) Sun writes from Pensacola: "The court-martial which has been sitting at Barrancas for several days has at last finished its labors. Among the cases before the court were one for murder at Fort McRea, on the day when Gen. Bragg gave liberty to the soldiers, in honor of the battle at Manassas; and two for sleeping on their posts. One of the latter, a young man named Robinson, belonging to the Tenth Mississippi regiment (and I am sorry to hear, an editor) will be shot at Warrenton, in view of the forces, on Friday, the 30th ult. The other soldier, from the fact of his extreme youth and inexperience, has been sentenced to punishment for 60 days and then drummed out of camp."

THE New Orleans Picayune says the heavy growth of grass in some of the streets in that city, "would pay the mower for his trouble."

THE following paragraph appears in the Memphis (Tennessee) Avalanche of the 3d inst. "A procession of several hundred stout negro men, members of the 'domestic institution,' marched through our streets yesterday in military order, under command of Confederate officers. They were all armed and equipped with shovels, axes, blankets, &c. A merrier set was never seen. They were brimfull of patriotism, shouting for Jeff. Davis, and singing war songs, and each looked as if he only wanted the privilege of shooting an abolitionist."

THE Charleston Mercury of the 7th states that a number of the crew of the wrecked privateer Jeff. Davis have been arrested on a charge of conspiracy. It says: "We learn that a conspiracy existed among the passengers and a portion of the crew of the privateer to kill the captain and officers of the Jeff. Davis, and to take the vessel into the port of New York. This conspiracy has been discovered since the return of Captain Coxetter and crew to Charleston, and proof of the designs of the conspirators established by the affidavit of one of the crew. It is thought that the conspiracy had some agency in the stranding of the Jeff. Davis on the St. Augustine bar."

WAR NEWS.

Second Engagement at Booneville, Missouri.

A BRISK engagement occurred on the 13th at Booneville, Mo., between Capt. Eppstein, with 150 men, and 600 of the rebels. After a hard fight of an hour, the enemy expressed their readiness to make terms. They were compelled to withdraw two miles from the city, to promise not to molest Union people, and to leave the arms of the killed and wounded on the ground. They acceded to these terms, and the fight was not renewed. Their leader, Col. Brown, and his son, Capt. Brown, were killed.

Fight at Blue Mills, Missouri.

DESPATCHES from St. Louis, dated September 21st, state that two fights occurred at Blue Mills Landing, on the 17th inst. The first was between 500 of the 3d Iowa regiment, with one piece of artillery, under Lieut.-Col. Scott, and about 4,000 rebels. After a desperate struggle of an hour's duration, in which Scott lost 120 killed and wounded, and all his horses, he retreated slowly half a mile, drawing his cannon by hand. He subsequently took a position with his howitzer on an eminence, and waited for the enemy, but he did not pursue. Not long afterwards Col. Smith's command, with four pieces of artillery, approached Blue Mills by another route, and engaged and routed the rebels as they were about crossing the river.

Skirmish at Petersburg, Va.

A DESCENT was made on the 12th inst. upon a rebel camp at Petersburg, Hardy county, Va., by Capt. Kidd's company of cavalry from New Creek, Md., and a company of infantry from Fort Pendleton. The rebels only waited for one shot from a 12-pounder, and then fled. Several were killed and wounded, a number taken prisoners, and their camp and all its equipage were captured. On the same day a body of 250 rebels were attacked and dispersed at Barboursville.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Saxonia brings advices to the 11th inst. The outcry of the better portion of the English press against the policy of sending troops to Canada had had the effect of causing the Government to suspend the arrangement made for forwarding them for the present. Instead there was some talk of sending a combined Anglo-French naval and military expedition against Mexico, to obtain redress for alleged injuries to British and French interests. This expedition, it was anticipated, would receive the countenance and aid of Spain. Another rumor prevails that Garibaldi, through the United States Minister at Brussels, has received an attractive offer of a command in the American army, and that he had accepted it under certain mental reservations—one of which is doubtless, that he doesn't intend to come. Our journals make too much noise over a few titled nobodies whom poverty and national destitution have driven to our shores. Victor Emanuel and Garibaldi are in Naples, where they were received with the greatest enthusiasm. Fresh disturbances had broken out in Poland. England had bought of some African king a large tract of country for the culture of cotton, and the French Government was negotiating for a similar purpose.

PERSONAL.

MRS. C. MEARS BURKHARDT opened her new educational establishment for young ladies, corner of Madison avenue and Thirty-eighth street, on the 12th. The city affords no finer, more airy, or healthful position than this, and Mrs. Burkhardt's well-earned reputation for thoroughness in teaching the essential branches of education, while investing her pupils with the accomplishments necessary to their success in society, must retain for her elegant establishment the eminence it has so long maintained, despite the disturbed condition of affairs. Her school is equal in every respect, and superior in many, to any which the metropolis affords. We commend it to public patronage.

DODWORTH has opened his private academies for dancing and calisthenics at the corner of Fifth avenue and Twenty-sixth street, and at 137 Montague place, Brooklyn.

COL. EDWARD D. BAKER, United States Senator from California, has been appointed a Major General of Volunteers.

EX-GOV. MOREHEAD, of Kentucky, has been arrested and taken to Fort Lafayette, on a charge of treasonable practices. The New York Times remarks upon his arrest as follows: "Ex-Gov. Morehead may be a traitor, but he is not a hearty one. He is one by necessity. Neither is he a dangerous man. He is a good feeder, a fair drinker, a lover of cushioned chairs and '$10 000 a-year,' and would cheerfully exchange his cotton plantation and his politics to-morrow for a Union home and a good income on Brooklyn Heights. As a conspirator, he is not worthy to be mentioned the same day or the same night with Magoffin or Breckinridge, and we wonder that he was taken by the Government and they left."

MR. SOLOMON STURGES, of Chicago, has taken $100,000 of the national loan. Mr. Walter L. Newberry, President of the Galena and Chicago Railroad, $10,000. Mr. Wm. B. Astor, of this city, is reported to have taken $50,000.

MR. RUSSELL, the American correspondent of the London Times, in a recent letter, writes: "For good or for evil, the issue between the North and South is rapidly approaching to that which the South predicted and feared, and the North at first disavowed, and does not now altogether accept—the struggle, if it continues, will be narrowed to a contest between slavery and abolition."

ALEXANDRE DUMAS has turned pork merchant in Naples. His shop is in the most conspicuous and frequented part of the town; it is gilded and furnished with great splendor, being adorned with pictures whose themes are taken from the works of the great romancer. His sign is "The Three Guardsmen;" and inside beautiful girls sell sausages and hams, and tarts in La Tour de Nesle. These girls were at first dressed in fancy costumes so contrived that they scarcely seemed to be dressed at all. So the young men of Naples hastened to Dumas's shop to buy ham and sausages, and the police deeming it unnecessary for the purposes of the pork trade that so great an affluence of charms should be displayed, required the shop girls to wear a garment better adapted to the object for which clothing was devised by our first parents in Paradise. It is stated that if the police of Naples thought itself obliged to interfere, the dishabille of the assistants of Dumas must indeed have been complete.

THE report that Garibaldi intends coming to America is positively contradicted by Mr. Frank Vizetelly, artist and correspondent of the London Illustrated News. Mr. Vizetelly says: "Repeated endeavors have been made to induce Garibaldi to go to North America, to aid in defending the Union. You can positively contradict those who assert that he will go there. He will not go." [Then follow some allusions to the condition of European affairs, as restraining his departure, after which the letter continues]: "Beside this, even if Italy, Hungary and Poland were in the most flourishing state of independence and liberty, he would take no part in that struggle so long as the North failed to declare, formally, solemnly and irrevocably, that it would not lay down its arms until Slavery should be destroyed to its last vestige."

CAPT. BURTON, well-known to the reading public through his adventurous and daring journey to Mecca, and still later by a tour of exploration into Eastern Central Africa, on finishing the latter came to this country to recruit his health; he made a trip to the plains, to hunt the buffalo, and crossed over to California, stopping by the way to see Brigham Young and his army of polygamists. An account of this pleasure trip, which, it is said, will contain some novel particulars of Mormon life, will shortly be published by the Harpers. This volume, which will be called "The City of the Saints," will probably be the last that we shall have from Capt. Burton for some time to come, for we learn that on the 23d August he started for Fernando Po, Western Africa.

THEATRICAL AND MUSICAL.

THE theatrical campaign has opened in this city with all the eclat of the most favorable times, and there is every reason to believe, from present indications, that the season will be a profitable one. The capacious Academy of Music has been crowded during the entire week by delighted audiences, to witness the extraordinary feats of the Great Wizard, Hermann, whose success has been as remarkable as satisfactory. We say satisfactory, because it is understood that on the success of this series of performances hinged the question of opera or no opera for the winter. It has been decided, thanks to the Wizard. He has conjured right bravely, and we are to have a short season of opera. An arrangement has been concluded between Messrs. Ullman and Muzio, by which, after a short concert tour by the troupe, composed of Miss Kellogg, Miss Hinkley, and Signors Brignoli, Mancusi (Havana company) and Signor Susini, opera will be given alternately in New York and Brooklyn. The first performance will take place on the 17th of October, and the season will continue uninterruptedly until the 9th of November, when the troupe, under the direction of Signor Muzio, leave to fulfil their engagement at Havana......The Winter Garden has been quite as successful as the Academy of Music—Mrs. Wood disputing the favor of the town with the Prestidigitateur in the comico-scenico-comico piece, "Cinderella." Of course "Cinderella" will be continued so long as the people like it, and their favor seems in no way diminished by repetition. By way of heaping up attractions, however, the management have added a laughable piece, "New York Wives, or a Lesson for Gentlemen."......Laura Keene opened to a house jammed to overflowing on Monday night, with "The Seven Sons," a masculine counterpart of the successful "Seven Sisters" of last season. The scenery is new and splendid, the dialogue sparkling and rollicking, and the hits local and otherwise numerous and palpable. The butt of the piece is a certain Dr. Fussall (not Russell), who is a special correspondent, and gets stuffed and sold all through, while in the search of information, nearly as badly as the gentleman whose name his so much resembles. It is safe to predict for the "Seven Sons" a run equal to that of the "Seven Sisters."......Wallack's new and beautiful establishment opened with great eclat on Wednesday evening—too late for adequate notice this week......Forrest is about to fulfil a round of engagements, and opens at Boston on the 30th. Brady, the photographer, has just completed a series of admirable portraits of the great actor in his favorite characters......The Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn begins its concerts on the 2d of November. It now numbers nearly 1,100 members......A great variety of entertainments are offered this week at Barnum's Museum. The hippopotamus has not yet withdrawn his attractive person from the establishment......The Circus at Palace Garden continues to draw large audiences. Mr. Nixon has secured some of the best equestrians in the profession, and his programmes are in consequence all that can be desired......The London Weekly Times states that Boucicault's "Colleen Bawn" is to be produced at the Ambigu Theatre of Paris, at an early day......Mrs. D. P. Bowers, an actress from this country, has made her appearance at the Sadler's Wells Theatre, London......Madame Ristori, the eminent Italian tragedienne, has been engaged by Mr. Ullman, of the New York Academy of Music, for September, 1862, and is to bring her company with her.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

ON the 17th the propeller Fanny ran down to Ocracoke Inlet with a company of troops, who entirely destroyed the fortifications abandoned by the Confederates. The magazine was burnt and the cannon sunk. It is said that the Confederates were assembled in force at Washington and Newbern, and that 2,000 of them had landed on Roanoke Island, with the intention of destroying the lighthouse and the dwellings of the Unionists there. A detachment of 750 men, accompanied by a naval force, were about to leave Hatteras Inlet to prevent the inroad.

THE painful apprehensions entertained by the public, during the past few days, for the fate of Colonel Mulligan, the defender of Lexington, Mo., have been realized. That gallant officer, after an obstinate defence of four days and a loss of between 600 and 800 in killed and wounded, was obliged to surrender on the 22d, having been entirely deprived of water. His original force was about 2,500; that of the enemy under Price, not far from 14,000. The rebel loss is estimated at between 3,000 and 4,000.

A SEVERE fight occurred at Mariatown, Mo., on the 21st, between 600 Federal troops under Colonels Montgomery and Johnston, and 400 rebels, in which the latter were routed with heavy loss. Colonel Johnston was killed.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

THE magnificent fountains in the Place de la Concorde in Paris were of iron, and the water which plays over them contains lime, which soon coated them with a deposit of sulphate of lime. This obscured all the rich details of their ornamentation. These fountains have been taken down, and a layer of copper has been placed upon them by the electrotype process. This being bronzed gives the iron fountains all the beauty of bronze at a tithe of the cost. About 69 tons of sulphate of copper have been used in the process.

PARIS is lighted by more than 31,000 lamps. All but about 500 are gas lamps, the remainder are fed with oil. More than three times the light is now produced by the street lamps which was produced in 1850.

THAT gigantic plant, the Victoria Regia or Royal Lily, is producing a succession of its gorgeous blossoms in the aquarium of Kew Gardens, England. The leaves of the lily are three feet in diameter.

THE English Government last year paid £16,000 in the shape of "perpetual pensions." The custom of giving these hereditary acknowledgments to merit has now fallen into disuse. The last pension in perpetuity was granted in 1814 to the Viscount Exmouth and his heirs male. No pension is now bestowed for longer than three lives.

A LETTER from Chalons says, speaking of the French Emperor: "He looks older and stouter than he did in Italy, and seems to have some difficulty in walking. All this does not appear when he is on horseback, but is very visible on foot."

A LETTER from Constantinople of the 12th, in the Wanderer of Vienna, states that a woman named Theresa, a Sicilian by birth, was some time ago arrested for murdering a young man, her lodger. During the inquiry that followed her arrest it was ascertained that she had murdered fourteen other persons. She was sentenced to be strangled in front of her house.

AMONG other on dits afloat respecting Prince Alfred's recent trip to Liverpool on board the Arabia, is the following: His Royal Highness was so exceedingly taciturn and distant to the passengers generally, dining by himself when the others were on deck, and enjoying a smoke in the most out-of-the-way retreats, that a Yankee asked Major Cowell the reason of such conduct. He was gravely informed that "the Prince was acting under special instructions from the British Embassy at Washington." Subsequently Major Cowell inquired of the Yankee touching American matters, but was informed by him, in reply, that he must excuse him saying anything, as "the United States Government had particularly requested him to be reserved on such topics." Major Cowell could not but appreciate the tu quoque.

THE tribunal of a large town in Lower Styria has just had to decide on a somewhat singular case of breach of promise. The young, pretty and rich daughter of a baker became enamored of a gallant lieutenant in the army, and a marriage was soon agreed upon. The parents of the girl gave their consent, but on the express condition that their future son-in-law should give up his commission. This he agreed to, and hoped that the sacrifice would increase the affection of his betrothed; but alas! with his glittering uniform departed all the love of the fickle fair one, who positively refused to ratify the engagement. The lover, having thus lost both his commission and his wife, brought an action for damages against the parents, and the court condemned them to pay him a life annuity of 525 florins—the amount of his pay.

M. GRANIER DE CASSAGNAC, in an article on the cause of the high rents now paid in Paris, declares that there are at present ten thousand apartments vacant in Paris, a greater number than was ever before known, and he thence draws the conclusion that the present high rents are not caused by competition among tenants.

SLAUCHTER OF THE INNOCENTS;" OR, OUR SOLDIERS HELPING THEMSELVES.

The old saying, "All's feir in love and war," which in practice detes from Nimrod, but which Coleridge deeleres had first a classical voice in Aristophanes, has had its usnal illustrations in the present struggle. Morality is feeble hefore bunger, and possession being nine points of the law, carries the dey, when a scoutieg party finds itself in the midst of poultry end other live stock. Our Artist has sketched a scene of this kind, which happened near the camp at Bessyville, Missonri, in which the prospcet of a good dinner has triumphed over the niceties of meum and tuum. We do not here advocate or defend pig, geese or chicken stealing in the nbstract, but merely ssk the severest casuists, before they sit ie judgment on the celprits ie onr pictnre, to plsce themselves in the position of onr hungry heroes hefore they oest the first stone. Wellington, who carried discipline to n great extent, acknowledged, during his invasion of France, when a Franch fermer complained that the British soldiers had stolen all his fowls, that it wasn't right, and that it wes egainst his own proclamation, yet, as he had himself partaken of a roset chicken, which, no donbt, was pert of the stolen supplies, all he conld do was to pay for the ill-gotten luxury. We must, however, in justice to the Union troops, state that these instances of an impromptu commissariat ere very raro among the Union troops, and that the supplies thus irregularly obtained are invariably paid for. Our Artist adds, most emphatically, that on the present occasion the proprietor of the articles in question was fully reimbursed for "the slaughter of her innocents."

FORT ELLSWORTH, NEAR ALEXANDRIA.

This most formideble work of defonce is built on Shuter's Hill, an eminence about two miles from Alexandria, end named in honor of the lamented Colonel Ellsworth, hy whoso regiment it was commenced end principally constrected. It will provo one of the principal defences of Alexendrie, shonld the rebels advance in that direction.

FORT JACKSON, VIRGINIA,

Is one of the most important works which have been erected by the United States forces for the defence of Weshington, covering the appreach to the Long Bridge from the Virginia side. It is, in military phrase, a etrong tête du pont, to protect either the advance or retreat of troops ecross the hridge. It was bnilt simultaneonsly with tho works on Arlington Heights, end constitutes part of the eame system with them. Its site will he identified hy all visitors to Washington who have crossed the Long Bridge, hy the littla tevern shown in the picture, as the "watering-plece" for thirsty cab horses returning from Alexandria, end the terminus of the one horse railway leeding to that lively city. This spot wes selected as the site of a great city during the "flush times" of 1836; its foundations were laid by General Jackson himself, with great ceremonies, and it was called Jackson City. The city, es an Irishman would say, disappeared before it was built, and its name is only perpetuated by the fort which occupies its site.

BAILEY'S CROSS ROADS AND MUNSON'S HILL.

The advance position held by the Union pickets in Virginia is Bailey's Cross Roads, at the crossing of the direct road to Fairfax Court Hoose and the Leesburg turnpike, about five miles to tho south-west of the Long Bridge. It is evidently regerded by Generel McClellen as important strategicelly, end has been held by him with great tenecity. Never of high architectnral protensione, the few buildings thet remain show the dilapidation and ruin incident to war, end make the place less attractive than before. It is but ahout a mile from the rehel position on Munson's Hill, which is in full view.

PADUCAH, KENTUCKY.

This flenrishing city, the capital of McCracken connty, is sitnated at the confluence of tho Ohio and Tennessee rivers, and is connected with Mobile hy railroed. It hes a fine renge of warehouses, fronting the river, containe five churches, two banks and two newspaper offices. It hes elso a marine hospitel. Its position has given it many commercial advantages, which were fast operating to meke it one of the most progressive cities of the West. When, however, the rebels took possession of Columbns and Hickman, two important points in Kentncky on tho Mississippi, it beceme necessary to hold them ie check, end to prevent their flacking our great stronghold of Cairo, and with his usual sagacity and promptitnde, General Grant immedietely occnpied Paducah. This step, although en epperent invasion of the "sacred soil" of Kentucky, has since ree lived the entire approval of that loyal and gallant State, as expressed through her Legislature, and Paducah will, of course, be retained while the necessity for its occupation exists. Paducah contains about 8 000 inhabitants, very few of whom are tainted with the secession virus. It is 67 miles east from Cairo, and 220 from Louisville. It is named after a famous Indian chief, who formerly lived in its vicinity.

CAPTURE OF REBEL SPIES IN THE UNITED STATES MAIL COACH.

THE General McClellan adopted the stringent rule at present in force, it requires the eyes of Argus to detect the various methods employed by the Confederate leaders to gain intelligence of our army movements. Among the most common of these expedients, because of its apparent openness, was the stage coach, which has frequently was freighted with rebel spies. Our Artist was present lately when Lieutenant Wilson, of Company A, 19 S. Cavalry, at the head of a small detachment, stopped the U.S. mail coach about 12 miles from Washington, on the Maryland side of the Potomac, and arrested seven men and two women, all entertaining the deadliest secession sentiments.

CAPE GIRARDEAU, ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

CAPE GIRARDEAU is about 46 miles north-west of Cairo, and 160 miles south-east of St. Louis, 1,350 from New Orleans, and 960 from St. Paul's, Minnesota. It is also the terminus of a road which leads to Jackson, the capital of the county, and to Fredericktown, and from thence to Pilot Knob and Ironton. It thus forms the landing point where troops and supplies can be sent from Cairo to Central Missouri, as we illustrated in No. 285 of our paper, when, in a few hours, reinforcements were sent to aid General Prentiss, after the fatal but glorious battle at Wilson's Creek, where the heroic Lyon fell. This strategic point is now strongly fortified, and held by the Federal troops under the command of General Grant, who succeeded General Prentiss in the command of this division of our army. The St. Vincent College is located here. Cape Girardeau was formerly the seat of justice for the county, but was removed to Jackson for the convenience of the citizens. It consequently dwindled considerably after this arrangement went into effect, but latterly it has revived, and is rapidly improving by the natural force of trade on the river bank, where the landing is excellent. A stream runs mill there contributes largely to the improvement of the place. Some years ago an attempt was made here to work the spiral water wheel mill, but although admirably adapted for light work, the principle was not powerful enough to saw the heavy logs. The experiment was consequently a failure. Our view is taken from the foot on the Bluff, the opposite scenery being the eastern bank of the Mississippi, which intervenes between Hamburg and Thebes, two flourishing cities of Illinois, situated on the banks of that river.

FORT PRENTISS, CAIRO.

In the place of the old distillery, finished on each side by a few six-pound cannon, which occupied the extreme southern point of Cairo, the formidable fort, a view of which appears in our present number, now denies the approach of the enemy. The importance of Cairo as a strategical position was early appreciated by our Government, and Captain Benham, United States Engineer, was detached in the beginning of the war, to fortify the place. With the assistance of Colonel I. D. Webster, Engineer in Chief of the State of Illinois, a plan was soon decided upon, and from 50 to 600 men were busily engaged digging the trenches and throwing up the embankments. On the departure of Captain Benham, the work was left in charge of his first assistant, Mr. L. B. Gurney, a gentleman of thorough scientific attainments and practical experience in Engineering. Colonel Webster acting as Chief of the Department. Colonel Waagner, Chief of the Artillery, Western Army, a distinguished Hungarian artillerist, arrived at the same time to superintend the mounting of the guns, and to the untiring energy, talent and experience of these gentlemen, the rapid completion and splendid finish of the work is due. The old distillery was torn away, the banks thrown up, and one of the heavy siege guns mounted at the end of two weeks, and now, only two months after the first blow was struck, the work is nearly completed. All that vast amount of labor has been carried on without money, the engineering department has been left entirely unprovided with the sinews of war by the Department at Washington.

The complete armament of the fort will be from 16 to 30 heavy guns, the greatest number of which are now in position. An eight-inch columbiad is mounted in the centre of the fort, on an elevation, with complete traverse circle, and commands the entire circuit. The large range, broad deep ditches, well flanked faces, and steep profile make this fort the most formidable in our interior, and its favorable position at the junction of two great rivers, would make an attack by water exceedingly difficult, and only possible to an immense fleet, while its rear is strongly protected by equidistant, and will be still further secured by detached forts at the upper end of the city.

Between each two guns traverses are placed, to secure the men from exploding fire. The magazine is in the rear of the columbiad. It is built of 14 inch timber, sunk below the parade, and covered with nine feet of earth, perfectly bombproof, and secure in every respect. In the rear of the magazine are the casemate barracks, built on the same principle.

MAP OF CAIRO AND ITS VICINITY.

We give this week a map of Cairo and its vicinity, showing the more important strategic positions in its neighborhood, including Columbus and New Madrid, occupied by the rebel Generals Polk and Beades; and Cape Girardeau, Bird's Point and Pulaski, held by the national forces. Perhaps the most important of these positions, next to Cairo, is Paducah, the northern terminus of the Mobile and Ohio Railway. It was, no doubt, the intention of Gen. Polk, when he took possession of Columbus, on the 4th of September, to march a force to Mayfield and thence take the rail to Paducah. In this he was anticipated by General Grant, commanding the Union forces at Cairo. The importance of this occupation of Paducah may be estimated from the fact that from two to seven boats of provisions have been daily sent eastward from this point, for the past two months, besides military equipments and other supplies. Since the seizure of Columbus the Federal troops have occupied the low Kentucky shore, opposite Cairo, and erected a work there named Fort Holt. Holding Cairo, Bird's Point, Fort Holt and Paducah, and supported by a competent force of gunboats, the advance of the army up the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers is rendered simply impossible.

A NATIONAL HYMN.

Vanity Fair has produced a National Hymn through the aid of a mathematical formula. We recommend the adoption of this mode of composition, if the result is generally likely to correspond with the first specimen:

Men, who hear Niag'ra's sound,
Men, who tread the far Gulf's bound,
Ours is Freedom's hallowed ground;
Freedom's heirs are we.
From the White Hills of the North
To the Colorado forth,
One the mighty Nation's birth,
One its destiny.
Hark the watchword as we rally,
Over mountain, plain and valley,
God and Liberty!

Who hath sky of brighter gleams?
Broader lakes, or braver streams?
Eden-like, our wide land teems
With fertility.
Strong are we, with strength untold;
Span of iron, ribs of gold;
Firm on earth's foundations old,
Our security.
Hark the watchword, &c.

Now, the Eagle sweeping o'er
Our vast empire's wave-girt shore,
Sees one margin—hears the roar
Of one winding sea.
Ours the realm of rock and river,
Binding all with nought to sever;
God has made us one for ever,
By a wise decree!
Hark the watchword, &c.

By rich blood our fathers shed;
By the wisdom of our dead,
Pointing paths for us to tread,
In fraternity;
By past deeds of glory done;
By our name of Washington,
Hallowed is our Union,
Deathless it must be!
Hark the watchword, &c.

ERLE GOWER:

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER LXVI

WHEN Lord Kingswood satisfied himself by a rapid search of his wife's apartments that she had quitted Kingswood Hall, it became only too painfully evident to him that it was from him she had fled.

He despatched mounted servants in every direction to endeavor to gain tidings of her; and while they were gone he ransacked her desks, drawers, every and any place where he thought some paper, some scrap, scrawl, word would, like a flash of lightning upon a dark night, show him the path he ought to take.

But not a word upon a written paper, not a token, a trinket, a single article which tended to confirm the first suspicions that were raised by her sudden disappearance could be find. His search was long and carefully made, but it went unrewarded by the discovery of that he sought.

In a large case he found, heaped up in one heterogeneous mass, flung, as it were, contemptuously together, all the presents of various kinds—trinkets, rings, bracelets, diadems, to the value of some thousands of pounds—he had ever given her. He felt a spasm of pain in his heart as he recognised these baubles so huddled together as if worthless, but strangely enough he regarded it as conclusive evidence that she had quitted her home alone, perhaps to return to the bosom of her own family, which was one of elevated rank.

In the morning he despatched a brief message to Lady Maud, announcing his intention to proceed to London. Even as she received it, she saw from her window his carriage whirled at a swift pace down the avenue, and she saw his pale face look from out the carriage window and turn towards the pile of buildings like that of one who looks his last upon his home.

So she was left alone and unprotected, save by the servants, in that drear old hall. She would have been affrighted at her situation, but that she thought that Erle would be somewhere near her.

After what had transpired the evening before, she quite expected that her maid, Harebell, would communicate some intelligence to her respecting him, but the girl remained perfectly silent.

At length Maud, unable to endure her silence, her strange solemnity of countenance, asked her by a direct question, whether Mr. Gower was still a prisoner.

The girl, with a frightened look, stammered a negative. Then Lady Maud rushed past her, and so out of the room. The girl pursued her, but she had taught Lady Maud a near way to the lone chamber in the eastern turret, and she fled towards it with the speed of a deer.

The girl felt as if her limbs were palsied. She tried to be swift too, but her knees shook and tottered beneath her. She fell twice, but she uprose again, and staggered on after her young mistress, and at length reached the chamber door. With terrified eyes she looked within, and beheld Lady Maud standing like one who had been suddenly transformed into a figure of stone, her glazed eyes fixed upon a pool of human blood.

Presently she heard a low moan burst from her lady's lips, and then suddenly she saw her move from the spot to which she had appeared frozen, and follow the ghastly drops zig-zag upon the floor, down stone stairs to the doorway leading out into the park.

She bent down to the green, soft, waving grass, and here and there traced a crimson spot, until her eyesight left her, and she swooned where the body had been rested, and where there was a larger patch of gore than before.

Harebell reached her, felt her cold hands, her colder forehead, and then shrieked for help.

It was needless for the skilful physician who had been brought thither to ask what had occurred; it was enough for him to know that the brain had undergone a strain to which it had succumbed, and his directions were that she must not on any account be disturbed either by sounds or faces; that it would be proper instantly to communicate to Lord and Lady Kingswood Lady Maud's dangerous condition, but that it would be better for the present if neither attempted to see her.

"Pray, sir," said Harebell, "if you would save my dear lady, give your strictest orders to the servants in the hall not to admit Mr. Philip Avon here during Lord or Lady Kingswood's absence, on any excuse or pretence whatever."

"What is the meaning of this excitement?" he asked.

"Do not ask me, sir," she answered, entreatingly. "But, oh, if you would not kill my poor dear young lady outright, do not allow Mr. Avon to come near the Hall."

As he passed through the hall, he, in compliance with the request of Harebell, put the desired veto on Mr. Philip Avon's admission.

Philip Avon was very impartially hated by the household, so they pulled themselves together with the intention of resisting any attempt Mr. Philip Avon might make upon being refused admission, to effect a forcible entry.

In the meantime Lord Kingswood reached London, and his first task was to make some inquiries respecting Erle. He was startled with the answers he received, but though amazed and mystified, he was really not dissatisfied. Death might supervene—death not wrought by his means, might relieve him from more than one-half of his present care.

He ascertained also, without loss of time, that the Marquis of Chillingham was in London, and had not quitted it during his own absence; that he had gone through the usual official routine without deviation. But he learned also that Lady Kingswood had not returned to her father's roof, and that her family, as well as the world—the fashionable world—believed that she was yet rusticating at Kingswood Hall.

The action which had been commenced by Horace Vernon was postponed upon application to the Court, upon the plea of the unavoidable absence of a material witness, and Lord Kingswood laughed when he heard it. He did not laugh long.

Then came the news of Lady Maud's illness, of which he took little heed. He was given to understand that she was under the care of an eminent physician, and that he considered to be all that was necessary for her. He could do her no good if he made a journey to Kingswood Hall, to see her; besides, he hated sick chambers.

And thus he sat in a state of bewildering, anxious expectancy, when one evening—seated in his library alone—his valet, Pharisee, entered, and prayed him to grant him an interview, as he had a communication to make to him of the utmost importance.

"Proceed, Pharisee."

Pharisee drew from the breast pocket of his coat a leathern wallet, and from it he drew a paper, which he laid before Lord Kingswood.

He took it up. It was a note, and addressed to the Marquis of Chillingham. The handwriting was Lady Kingswood's, and the note that which she had entrusted to Pharisee in the picture-gallery of Kingswood House to deliver to the Marquis of Chillingham. At length, by an effort, he mastered its contents.

"There is no signature," he said hoarsely.

"Your lordship, I presume, recognizes the handwriting?" returned Pharisee.

"Most women write alike."

"The contents, my lord, speak for themselves," returned Pharisee; "but if your lordship is still in doubt, I can remove that doubt positively."

"Whose handwriting do you declare it to be?" he asked, grimly.

"Lady Kingswood's," replied Pharisee.

"Her ladyship speaks of an interview to the epistle," he said, huskily. "Are you acquainted with any particulars respecting it?"

"I am, my lord," returned his valet.

"There is also a trustworthy messenger spoken of. Are you the individual so honored?" inquired his lord.

"No, my lord. Pengreep," responded Pharisee.

"You must be mistaken," exclaimed his lordship.

"I am positive. I can give your lordship proofs," was the reply.

"What of the interview here mentioned? Know you aught of that?" inquired his lordship.

"I do, my lord," answered Pharisee.

"Did it ever take place?" interrogated Lord Kingswood.

"It did my lord, in this house," returned Pharisee. "Within the picture-gallery they met at the second hour past midnight. There, alone—alone, my lord—they remained together for more than an hour."

A groan burst from Lord Kingswood's lips, of such intense agony, that it seemed as though his life had gone out with it.

"Your lordship can hardly fail to recollect the night," he said, cunningly. "You were disturbed, my lord, by a loud scream. You hastened to discover the cause. You found Lady Maud St. Clair senseless on the floor near her own chamber. Lady Kingswood was bending over her. My lord, Lady Maud walked in her sleep into the gallery, and there disturbed my lady and the Marquis of Chillingham in their tête-à-tête."

"I remember the accursed night but too well!" gasped Lord Kingswood. "The interview you have acquainted me with cannot have been the only one which has taken place between these people, it must have been preceded by others."

"And has been succeeded by others, my lord," answered Pharisee, artfully. "The marquis and my lady have corresponded much together. They have indulged in clandestine meetings at Kingswood Hall during your lordship's winter sojourn there and since your lordship has quitted it."

"How recently?" asked Lord Kingswood.

"Up to a few nights since, my lord," replied Pharisee, in his sleek tone. "My lord marquis's gentleman told me that the marquis has been in the habit lately of leaving London by a special train late in the evening, and returning to London by daybreak by the same conveyance."

"Have you been able to obtain possession of any other letters than this?" he asked.

"I have, my lord," returned Pharisee, reproducing his wallet.

He drew forth a number of notes, and handed them to Lord Kingswood. They were all forgeries, executed with great skill by himself.

"I cannot explain, my lord, what part old Pengreep has played in this dreadful affair," he said, in a hypocritical tone, "but an accident revealed to me that he had possession of them, and I filched them from him. They are now yours."

Lord Kingswood opened one, and read it with burning eyes. Its contents appeared incontestibly to establish the guilt of Lady Kingswood. He leaped to his feet and shouted:

"Leave me, accursed knave. You can add nothing new to the damning torture you have inflicted upon me. I will hear no more. Go, go, for I shall strangle you, man, if you remain another moment."

"One word, my lord, ere we part," said Pharisee, assuming a bolder tone, "I leave England to-night and for ever. The paper your lordship signed in my favor is, I am advised, valueless, being imperfectly drawn up. I have therefore again to throw myself on your lordship's liberality to reward my many faithful services."

Lord Kingswood caught up a purse filled with notes and gold, which lay in an open drawer, and flung it passionately at him.

Pharisee snatched up the purse and pocketed it. He was about to utter an insulting speech when he observed the door of the room gently open, and the face of Mrs. Pharisee appear in the opening.

Before she caught sight of her husband, for whom she so much languished, he leaped at her, flung her on her back with violence, bounded over her and descended the stairs, he knew not how many at a time, with the lady of his name in full chase.

They were out of the house and away before, as the porter said, he "could see what the uperishuns was." Lord Kingswood passed the night in his library. In the morning he entered his carriage, bade his coachman drive him to the Treasury, as there he knew he should meet with the Marquis of Chillingham.

CHAPTER LXVII.

THE bullet which Erle received within his breast was well aimed, but it was not fatal.

When the fever had subsided, and all danger was over, his recovery was almost as rapid as had been his illness. Youth, native strength, a constitution that had been hardened from his childhood upwards by often severe physical exercises, all combined to restore him to comparative health in a very short time.

As soon as he was able to rise from his bed, he requested to be permitted to quit the house in which he was located; but neither the nurse who waited on him, nor the doctor who attended him, would hear of such a step.

He recognised the apartment in which he had been placed. He had occupied it before. It was the first chamber he had slept in in London, and he knew that the house of which it formed a part was tenanted by Sir Harris Stanhope and his family.

He could not imagine wherefore and by what means he had been brought back hither, but being here, he had a strong impression that the young and handsome face which had watched over him during his violent illness was that of Beatrice Stanhope.

He knew that his mind had wandered and that he had spoken incoherently; he was very solicitous to know of what his ravings consisted while she was present.

On rising one morning, the third after he had been able to leave his bed, he found the door of an adjoining room, which had previously been kept locked, ajar. He pushed it open, and entering the apartment, found himself in the presence of Sir Harris Stanhope.

"I congratulate you upon your recovery from a very sharp attack, Mr. Gower," he said, in a friendly tone. "You have had, I may say, two narrow escapes, one from a very deadly missile, and the other from a very dangerous attack of fever on the brain; but you, no doubt, bear a charmed life."

"I thank you, Sir Harris, for your kind congratulations," returned Erle. "I am as yet hardly competent to judge of the true nature of the escapes I have had, but I have no doubt I shall be able to appreciate their danger when I am better acquainted with it. I believe, however, that I am greatly indebted to you——"

"Oh, that is a little arrangement between myself and Lord Kingswood," responded Sir Harris.

"Will you do me the honor to explain to me the particulars of that little arrangement?" inquired Erle.

"I am at your service," returned Sir Harris; "and so be seated, Mr. Gower."

"To abbreviate a long story, Mr. Gower," he said, "I have known Lord Kingswood for thirty years, and, I may add," continued Sir Harris, "that I am acquainted with your secret history, Mr. Gower."

"It appears to me," said Erle, with a frown, "that my secret history, as you are pleased to term it, is a species of capital, employed for the furtherance of every interest except my own."

"You judge rashly, young man," rejoined Sir Harris; "but it is pardonable. Young as you are, circumstanced as you have been, it is not surprising that you should jump to erroneous conclusions. You are, Mr. Gower—pardon my plainness—wholly in the power of one who can and will prove to you a most excellent friend or a most bitter and merciless enemy. But you have promised obedience to his wishes, and I have no right, therefore, to assume that you have any intention to treat them in a hostile spirit. Now, mark me, Mr. Gower, your position with Mr. Vernon is one of the meanest and most abject dependence——"

"Sir Harris Stanhope!" ejaculated Erle, fiercely.

"Do not misinterpret my meaning," continued Sir Harris, calmly. "I say your position, without any reference to you personally; on the contrary, assured that you possess a high and noble nature, that you are actuated by generous and elevated sentiments, I appeal to you to throw off that galling yoke, and act independently, as becomes a brave and accomplished gentleman."

"Well, sir?" said Erle, coldly, as Sir Harris paused to take breath.

"Well, sir," iterated Sir Harris, "a path is now open to you to honor and to wealth. You have excellent intelligence, a cultivated mind, youth, activity and energy. I am prepared to place in your hands at any moment from today, a lucrative and honorable appointment in the Government of India, to provide all preliminary expenses, to fit you out and forward you to your appointed post with the equipments of a nobleman, and to engage that, in a comparatively brief term, you shall return to your native land rich, honorable, and master of a situation to which you may now perhaps lift your eyes hopefully, but which, without my aid, you can never conquer."

Erle mused for a minute. The temptation was great. It would be a grand way to win Lady Maud. He knew that she would be faithful to him in his absence; and he reflected on his return, loaded with the honors a clear head, a bold heart and great energy would obtain for him. His heart swelled at the thought.

Presently he turned to Sir Harris, and said, slowly and somewhat earnestly,

"What is the reverse of this pleasing picture?"

"You mean, of course, should you reject my proposition?" said Sir Harris.

"I do," replied Erle.

"I have told you," he rejoined, "that you are absolutely in the power of a merciless enemy. You will no longer be permitted to minister to the revengeful machinations of Horace Vernon, you will at the same time be thrust into the world as an outcast, hunted from place to place, knowing no peace nor no rest."

"Hold!" cried Erle, with a contemptuous gesture. "You are speaking of me as if I had neither will, energy, nor power of action—as if I had no voice to make my wrongs heard, no strength to battle with my persecutors——"

"Stay," interposed Sir Harris, hastily, in his turn. "We are discussing the reverses before I have pointed out the whole of the merits of the obverse. I have invested the appointment I have offered to you with the chances of honors and wealth; but there remains a yet greater and more fascinating inducement to accept the post than any I have named."

"What is that?" he asked, mistrustfully.

"I have it within you chamber. I will show it to you," he said, rising abruptly from his seat. "Attend me, if you please," he added, with a low chuckle.

He took hold of Erle's arm in a playful manner, and pushed rather than led him into an adjoining apartment.

Erle had barely entered, when Sir Harris, quitting his hold, retreated from the room, and closed the door.

Erle's eyes ran round the apartment; he saw a female seated at a table, apparently bending over a book or picture. The noise of his entrance caused her to turn her head, and seeing him, she immediately rose up and advanced towards him.

He looked behind him; he found that Sir Harris had disappeared, and that he was alone with Beatrice Stanhope.

He seemed at a glance to see the whole thing clearly, and he felt that had not his heart been already surrendered to Lady Maud, it would have tried his powers of self-denial to the utmost to have declined the appointment and the lady.

As Beatrice turned her pallid face to him, and gazed upon him with a melancholy expression in her large, dark, brilliant eyes, he recognised the face that bent over him watchfully, or had flitted about the room during his illness, and it was not possible to repress a grateful emotion taking possession of his breast.

She had been prepared by her father for this interview, and she had dressed herself with exquisite taste. Charming as she was naturally, her beauty was materially heightened by her admirably fitting dress, the arrangement of a flower, a ribbon, a trinket, and the elegance with which her luxuriant and glossy hair was disposed so as to perfectly suit the contour of her face.

She approached him with a joyous smile, and held out both her white, small hands to him. He took them, and she pressed his frankly and warmly, as though, independent of all other influences or emotions, she was really pleased to see him.

"I am so glad to see you thus again. I feared—I thought you would die."

"I should be glad to know," he responded, quickly, "how I might be able, if inadequately, to make, as a friend, an acceptable return for——"

"Playing the nurse when you were ill," she interrupted, with her low, musical laugh. "Pray consider that you have amply repaid me by getting well. Do not make any further allusion to it, Erle, because it makes me blush. Now, though roses on the cheek are desirable generally, they are not welcome when we know they have no business there. Sit down, Erle."

"Nay——"

"Do as your nurse tells you, like a good obedient boy," she said, forgetting her own injunctions to him. "There," she added, as he sank on to a couch, "that is proper, and—may I sit by your side, if you please?"

This was said in a light tone of banter, which disconcerted him and he was not any the more composed to find that, before he could reply, she placed herself so near to him that, when she spoke, her shoulder touched his.

The eloquent blood rushed into his face and crimsoned forehead and neck. He turned, cast his gaze out of the window, feeling that an eclaircissement was but the question of a very few minutes.

"Have you seen Carlton?" she said, as she found him remain silent.

He replied in the negative.

"He is going to be married," she rejoined, fixing her large dark eyes on his.

"To whom is he to be married?" he interrogated, hastily.

"Well, latterly Carlton has renewed his intimacy with Cyril Kingswood," she said, placing her hand, as if unconsciously, upon his shoulder, "and Cyril has been paying his addresses, as you are aware, to Miss Eleanore Cotton, the daughter of a merchant prince. Carlton was introduced to Miss Eleanore's sister, a pretty girl named Henrietta. She had a heart and no sweetheart—Carlton had a heart and at least twenty sweethearts beside. None of them cared for him, and he quickly perceived that Miss Henrietta did. A woman who truly loves, Mr. Gower, can rarely help betraying it to him who has won her. So he thought, to use his own vulgar axiom, that one live duck was worth twenty imaginary swans, he proposed—was accepted. The two papas have arranged matters, and Cyril and Carlton will, of course, be married together. Do you not wish them joy, Erle?"

"You are silent," she said, leaning her face upon his shoulder, "and cold. Oh, Erle! is this the way to treat me?"

"Beatrice," he said, in a low but clear, firm voice, "hear me—I am anxious that there should be no misunderstanding between you and I. You believe me, will you not, when I say that no earthly consideration would induce me to equivocate, color, varnish or tarnish the truth?"

"I have the very greatest faith in the integrity of your word," she answered, faintly.

"I esteem you, Beatrice," he continued, speaking with earnestness, "so highly that, but for one circumstance, the friendship I feel for you would have been passionate love!"

"In the name of heaven, what circumstance is that?"

"I loved ere I saw you," he replied.

She fell back upon the sofa in an almost lifeless condition. He approached her, but she waved him off. A minute, and she rose to her sitting posture again. She wiped the clammy, death-like moisture from her white brow, and said, in a feeble voice,

"Pray proceed, Mr. Gower; never heed my passing spasm."

"But I do heed it, Beatrice," he cried, in a rich yet tremulous voice. "I feel it almost as deeply as you do yourself. Do you believe that when I came hither, alone, friendless, with a heart bursting with cares—it is but little better now, Beatrice—I could be the daily, I may say hourly recipient of your gentle attentions, your sweet courtesies, your generous sympathy, your delicate services, and your unfailing amiability of temper, and not be drawn towards you by the very warmest ties of gratefulness?"

She caught his hand and bent her face upon it. She wept passionately. Erle bent over her.

"To have professed love to you would have been to deceive you and to bitterly wrong her whose love I have won, Beatrice," he said, in a soft, low tone. "You would not have wished this?"

"Not to have saved my life!" she exclaimed, rising up, and speaking with firmness.

"I thank you from my soul, Erle," she said, with emotion, "for this honorable explanation. It is noble of you—it is just to me. It is a disappointment, I own, such an one as I have never had, and, thank Heaven, such as I can never have again. It was a dream—delicious while it lasted. I am awake now, and, Erle, we are friends. We understand each other now; but to make our understanding complete, tell me, when you entered this room, was it with the special purpose of having an interview with me."

"I was unconscious that you were here," he replied.

"You have entered into no compact with Lord Kingswood to accept an appointment abroad, and with it my hand?" she asked, earnestly.

"I have not," he returned.

"Nor with my father?" she continued.

"Nor with him," he answered. "He did indeed offer me a post such as you mention, with a fascinating inducement, but there was no compact."

"I was the fascinating inducement, then," she exclaimed, bitterly; "and you were ushered in here to see whether it was worth your consideration. Oh, I see it all now," she added, a hot flush of crimson mantling to her brow; "I was to be disposed of like a chattel or an appointment!" and she dashed the tears of vexation from her eyes. "I acquit you, Erle, of being in any way a party to this degrading barter of my hand, but I will meet it in its own fashion. Farewell. It is probable we may never meet again; if we should, it must be as strangers. I will not risk a danger before which I may fall. Heaven bless you!" She flung herself upon his neck, and sobbed violently, as she gasped out, "May you be happy with Lady Maud St. Clair."

Accustomed to control her feelings, Beatrice withdrew herself hastily from his arms, wiped the tears from her eyes, and saying to him,

"I comprehend the difficulty in which you are placed," she rang the bell violently.

On a servant making his appearance, she said,

"Inform Sir Harris Stanhope I wish to speak with him."

The man disappeared, and almost immediately Sir Harris made his appearance, rubbing his hands, and smiling.

She drew herself up, and with a stern countenance and voice, she said,

"You laid before me, sir, a proposition with which my future condition was intimately connected. It was, in fact, a matrimonial engagement with Mr. Erle Gower."

"Precisely," returned her father, rather disconcerted by her manner. "Present prosperity and happy marriage between two young, handsome people, and glorious prospects hereafter."

"Of the glorious prospects and the ultimate object of the union, Sir Harris, I have not spoken to Mr. Gower," she continued, speaking in loud, clear tones, "and for this reason, sir, I have wholly altered my views upon the matter. I positively and most determinedly decline the honor of Mr. Gower's hand, and have decided that my destiny shall pursue an entirely different course to that which you have so carefully, without consulting my real happiness, intended and arranged for me."

So saying, without another word, she glided swiftly out of the apartment and hurried to her chamber.

Sir Harris turned passionately to Erle,

"What does this mean, sir?" he cried, with a burst of fury.

"I have no explanations to make," returned Erle, haughtily.

"But I will know," shrieked Sir Harris, foaming at the mouth.

Erle heard within a minute of his departure a terrible uproar, and on making his way to the scene where it was raging, he reached it in time to see Sir Harris Stanhope fall back in the arms of his servants in an apoplectic fit.

He gave directions to the servants to place their master in his bed, despatched messengers for a doctor and for Mr. Carlton Stanhope, and then he quitted the house and directed his steps towards the residence of old Pengreep.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

LORD KINGSWOOD'S carriage placed him at the door of the minister's official residence, and he leaped from it and stalked into the reception-chamber.

There was a meeting of the members of the Government that morning, to determine a question of Governmental policy, and there was an unusually full attendance. The Marquis of Chillingham was already there, and was seated in a chair by a table, surrounded by some ten or a dozen noblemen, engaged in, for him, a somewhat remarkably animated and lively conversation.

Two or three of Lord Kingswood's political friends greeted him as he entered, but he took no notice of them, and rolled his eyes wildly about the apartment, as if in search of some one.

The Marquis of Chillingham raised his gray eyes to Lord Kingswood's face, and took instant offence at the scornful expression of his features and the apparently insulting position he assumed.

He curled his lip so as just to show his teeth. He was not a person to be insulted even by implication. His rank was higher than Lord Kingswood's as well as his post in the Cabinet.

"You look white this morning, Kingswood," he said, slowly.

"You are a villain," responded Lord Kingswood, between his teeth.

"And irritated, too; I hope that a fresh difference with your wife has not made you pass an uneasy night," he added, sarcastically.

"You are a scoundrel!" shouted Lord Kingswood, in tones which were heard all over the chamber, "a base, mean, unworthy scoundrel!"

"You are mad, Lord Kingswood; I do not understand your meaning!" exclaimed the Marquis of Chillingham, haughtily rising up as he spoke.

"Treacherous, unprincipled wretch, do you understand my meaning now?" he cried, dashing his fist with such violence to the marquis's face that he was hurled to the ground with great force.

Their mutual friends interfered, and the Marquis of Chillingham was raised from the floor perfectly insensible.

"In God's name what has made you commit yourself thus, Kingswood?" exclaimed a nobleman, laying his hand upon his arm.

"I am Lord Kingswood!" he exclaimed, in a stern, imperious tone. "I will answer for what I have done in whatever fashion that prostrate villain, or any friend he may appoint, shall determine. I will await at my residence any communication which may be forwarded to me by you dishonorable poltroon, unless he be coward as well as shameless libertine."

He entered his carriage, which, with many others, was drawn up near the principal entrance to the building, and gave the order to the coachman to drive him home—alas! home to him no longer.

He had been but a brief space within its walls when he received a visit from Mr. Ebenezer Cotton. At any other time he would have received him courteously, and listened to him patiently; now his visit appeared to be singularly malapropos.

However, though at first he declined to see him, Mr. Cotton would not be denied, and made his appearance before him. Lord Kingswood, motioning to a seat, said, coldly and curtly,

"I can spare you but a few minutes, Mr. Cotton; your visit at this moment is singularly unfortunate."

"Unfortunate or not, and unfortunate it is as you say, my lord," he replied, in a kind of sleek voice, "it is a duty I owe to you to come prompt to you upon the present occasion. When I commenced business——"

"I have already told you, Mr. Cotton," rejoined Lord Kingswood, sternly, "that I am seriously engaged; be good enough to be so straightforward, in what you are about to communicate to me, that you leave me nothing to guess."

"That's my maxim, my lord," responded Mr. Cotton, slapping his thigh, "straightforward, to the point at once; and so here goes. My lord, your son, Mr. Cyril Kingswood, is engaged to be married to my daughter Nell——"

"I cannot now enter into any consultation respecting such trivial matters," exclaimed Lord Kingswood, peremptorily.

"But you must hear me," cried Mr. Cotton, rather more boldly, "and then, my lord, if we con't agree, our solicitors must settle for us."

"Proceed, sir."

"Well, my lord, the marriage is at an end—broken up—done for—can't take place!" exclaimed Mr. Cotton, in hurried accents, as if glad to get the announcement off his mind.

"What has happened?" replied Lord Kingswood, in an almost feeble tone. He expected some new blow, and Cyril's to be the hand to strike it.

"Why, my lord, my daughter Nell took into her head to fall in love with a young fellow she has known from childhood," returned Mr. Cotton. "He was with me once, but we had a precious row about a matter of judgment, in which, as it turned out, he happened to be in the right, and I wrong. Well, my Nell, my lord, unbeknown to me, has kept up a correspondence with him, and he having had the luck to work up a new material for women's dresses, has been successful, and is already a hundred thousand pound man. We don't, in Manchester, take a long time, if luck sides with us, to scrape that sum up. So he, having a home to shelter, and an income to keep her, she has shaken my dust off her feet and taken to his. In a word, my lord, she has left my home and married herself to Sam Everton, of Salford, better content to be plain Mrs. Everton than the next Lady Kingswood."

Rousing himself from his abstraction, Lord Kingswood said,

"What does Mr. Cyril Kingswood say to this circumstance?"

"That's one of the strangest parts of the mysterious affair," exclaimed Mr. Cotton. "So far as I can learn, he has aided and abetted my Nell in her scheme, and expressed himself delighted at her success, because he said that she united herself to the man she really loved."

Lord Kingswood passed his hands over his eyes, and muttered,

"It is better, perhaps, that this should have happened. It is clear we cannot alter the state of things. Let them remain as they are. Good-morning, Mr. Cotton."

What! not a word about breach of promise of marriage—damages—law, and all that! Mr. Cotton could not believe that Lord Kingswood really intended to take the matter so calmly, and he said, suggestively,

"But, my lord, there is a part, I presume, that you intend to play in this unpleasant affair?"

"There is, sir, and it is this," said Lord Kingswood, rising up and ringing the bell; "the engagement between your daughter and my son is at an end—so is our acquaintance. Good day! Mr. Cotton's carriage," he said to the servant who attended his summons.

"Oh, very well. Good day, my lord," said Mr. Cotton, rising up, feeling like a person who had been sold very much below his own estimate of his value.

Lord Kingswood, once more left alone, cast not a thought upon the communication he had just received. In the midst of a paroxysm of maddening thought, a servant appeared, and announced, in a loud voice,

"General Sir Gordon Wyndham."

The general took his hand and wrung it.

"I have just heard of the extraordinary and unhappy occurrence of this morning," he said. "I knew you would stand in need of a friend. I am here to take that position, if you have not already appointed one."

Lord Kingswood gasped once or twice with emotion. At length he said,

"I thought I had not one left."

"You should not have doubted me," said Sir Gordon, emphatically, and added, hastily, "I will put no questions to you. I will not wound you deeper than I perceive you are wounded already. I guess all. I must only express my regret that you did not at once send the fellow a challenge, and manage it quietly without a brawl. I hear that you called Chillingham names, and in your passion so far forgot yourself, and those by whom you were surrounded, as to strike him to the earth."

Lord Kingswood said, with more calmness than the general expected,

"All that I did was premeditated, Wyndham. I called him by his proper titles, that the world should know his true character, and I struck him to the earth because——"

He paused for an instant.

"What?" inquired the general, looking at him in some surprise.

"Because," exclaimed Lord Kingswood, between his set teeth, "he is an accomplished swordsman. I am not. I can cope with him with a barrel. I am the challenged. I choose pistols and ten paces. You understand, general."

Almost immediately after this, a nobleman, and an old friend of the Marquis of Chillingham's arrived, the bearer of a challenge, couched in brief but bitterly insulting terms.

After a short conference between the friends of the two parties, the preliminaries were arranged. The noble friend of the Marquis of Chillingham offered no objection to the weapon or the distance named by Lord Kingswood, he only asked for two or three days' delay, as the marquis had been shaken by the fall he had received, and his hand would therefore probably be unsteady. The point was at once conceded, and the Marquis of Chillingham's friend took his leave.

Sir Gordon Wyndham shortly afterwards retired also. He assured Lord Kingswood that as soon as the day, the hour and the spot where the hostile meeting was to take place were determined upon, he would communicate with him.

One—two—three days passed away without his lordship receiving the expected communication.

Lord Kingswood passed most of this period secluded in his library and engaged in writing. When he had completed his task, he made a packet of the papers he had written, and placed them in a small iron safe, which he locked, and then seated himself in his chair, in grim expectation of General Sir Gordon Wyndham's communication, like one who awaits a summons from the grave.

The general, however, came himself, and informed Lord Kingswood that the Marquis of Chillingham was sufficiently recovered to meet him, that a spot some distance from London had been decided upon; and that it would be necessary at once to depart, for, as it was, they would have to travel all night to reach the place of meeting.

"I care not how or where we meet, so that we do meet," he said, calmly.

At the same time he produced a key, and handing it to Sir Gordon Wyndham, he pointed to the small iron safe, and continued,

"Take that key, Wyndham, and keep it until the issue of the meeting between Chillingham and myself is decided. Should I fall, you will open that safe, and within it you will find a packet addressed to you. It contains my last wishes respecting one who has suffered some wrong at my hands, and for which I would make atonement so far as may be possible."

Lord Kingswood then handed to him a case of handsomely-finished duelling-pistols, which Sir Gordon likewise deposited in a place of safety. When they were disposed of, Lord Kingswood rang for his private secretary and for his steward, and gave them a few ordinary directions, as though he purposed leaving London for a short term. Having dismissed them, he said to Sir Gordon,

"I am ready to attend you, Wyndham."

Before, however, he could quit the room, a servant entered, handed him a letter, and retired. He tore it open, and read as follows:

"MY LORD—It is with inexpressible grief I have to inform your lordship that my poor father, while engaged upon some important service entrusted, as I gather from my sister, to him by your lordship to perform, was suddenly attacked by a fit of apoplexy, and though the greatest efforts medical skill could employ to save him were made, he sank beneath the attack, and expired to-day. In this moment of affliction your lordship's presence and counsel would be the greatest possible boon to my sister and myself. I have the honor to be, in deep sorrow, your lordship's humble servant,

CARLTON STANHOPE."

Lord Kingswood turned his back on Kingswood House for ever.

The dawn was breaking when they reached their destination. The air was cold, but the sky was bright and clear. The place selected was a lonely spot on some forest land which had been cleared to a considerable distance with the intention of appropriating it to agricultural purposes. Here and there were patches of tall fern, but the ground generally was level and very well calculated for the murderous object with which it had been sought.

The two opposing parties arrived nearly at the same time from different points. A gentleman, an experienced surgeon, accompanied the Marquis of Chillingham and his friend.

The conferences between the seconds were of a very brief character, and the ground was fixed upon without an objection being made.

While the pistols were being loaded, the Marquis of Chillingham and Lord Kingswood stood near to each other, and once each glared on the other's face. Lord Kingswood was pale and haggard, and his eyes were red and inflamed. The marquis was pale too, but his features were as composed as usual, and save a blue lump upon his forehead, there was no alteration in his accustomed appearance.

At this moment Sir Gordon Wyndham approached him, handed to him the pistol, and murmured—

"For God's sake, Kingswood, be calm, be calm! Your life depends upon it."

The Marquis of Chillingham took the pistol which was handed to him by his second, and balanced it in his hand.

"It is heavier than that I have been practising with," he soliloquised rather than addressed to his companion.

"Practising with!" echoed his friend with elevated brows.

No more was said; the two noblemen were placed;

the word was given; they parted, and took their places quickly, as if each was bent on turning and firing before the other had the chance, for neither to miss a vital part if possible.

The Marquis of Chillingham, with his arm and pistol still extended, stood motionless, as if watching the effect of his aim. Both seconds, believing that he had been missed, ran to raise Lord Kingswood, who was senseless. At the same instant blood gushed forth from the Marquis of Chillingham's mouth as if it was being pumped up, he swayed backwards and forwards for an instant, and then fell upon his face.

The surgeon who had watched him from the moment that he observed him keep his pistol hand extended, rushed up to him and turned him over. He placed his hand upon his breast.

"He has been shot through the heart. He is dead!" he exclaimed.

He left him upon the moist grass and went towards Lord Kingswood, and found that he had been struck in the hip. The marquis had misjudged his distance, owing to the weight of the pistol, by about two inches.

The surgeon bound up the bleeding wound hastily, and then, with the assistance of postilions, Lord Kingswood was convoyed, still senseless, to the carriage of Sir Gordon Wyndham, who decided to convoy him to some place of concealment until he should recover and himself determine what course to pursue.

The other second and the surgeon were left alone with the dead body of the Marquis of Chillingham.

THE REBEL IRON PLATED WAR STEAMER YORKTOWN.

THE Southern papers have lately given a very wonderful account of an iron plated war steamer they have been building. It now turns out to be our old acquaintance, the Yorktown, formerly of the New York and Virginia line, commanded then, as she is now, by Captain Parrish; her pilot being a Richmond man named Edward Moore. Her casing is of wrought iron plates of one quarter and one-third of an inch thick. Her length on deck, 250 feet; breadth of beam, 34 feet; depth of hold, 9 feet 6 inches; depth of hold to spar deck, 17 feet; draft of water at load line before plating, 11 feet 6 inches. Her frame is of white oak, chestnut, &c., which is fastened in the securest manner possible with copper and treenails. Her floors were moulded 15 inches, sided 15 inches, and her frames were 30 inches apart at centres. In addition to the above fastening, iron straps, diagonally and doubly laid, four and a half by three-quarter inches, ran throughout the hull, making her one of the staunchest of her class of steamers afloat. She is fitted with vertical beam engines, with cylinders 50 inches in diameter, and a stroke of piston of 10 feet. She has two flue boilers, and her water-wheels are 30 feet in diameter, and of cast iron. Her burden is 1,400 tons. She was built in New York, in 1859, by William H. Webb. Her machinery was constructed by the Morgan Iron Works, in the same city. She is represented as being well supplied with heavy guns on her sides, and rifled pivots fore and aft. These are well manned, the gunners having been in long and severe training. She is also well supplied with swords, pikes, cutlasses, pistols, and in short, every description of pirate arms.

THE MARCH OF GEN. PRENTISS' DIVISION FROM RONTON TO CAPE GIRARDEAU.

[The following pleasant letter from our Artist in Missouri, apart from its historic interest, will help to illustrate some of the scenes depicted in this issue of our paper.—Ed.]

After the few important attempts of the rebels under Jeff. Thompson to interfere with the navigation of the Mississippi by the occupation of Commerce, a little town about 30 miles below Cape Girardeau, they have a large force in that locality, while miles away from that point, and begun in fortify that place. General Prentiss, whose column undertook a demonstration against the rebels at Greenville, where the rebels were encamped in considerable force under General Hardee, immediately made a move upon the place on the morning of the 4th inst., regiments, five companies of cavalry and a battery of six guns. By the extreme rapidity of the march of the infantry, under Quartermaster General, the baggage train was got in readiness in a few days notice, and the division left Camp Benton, Ronton, on Monday, slowly over a stony country road, through a monotonous region, covered with dark pine forests and rolling hills, and encamped at accordingly poor.

We reached Fredrickstown, 30 miles from Ironton, the next day, and joined Colonel Ross's regiment, 17th Illinois Volunteers, who had occupied the place a week or more before. Fredrickstown is a small but handsome county town, situated in a hollow and fertile valley, and has a fine court house and jail, and a number of fine dwellings, and is surrounded by well-cultivated farms. It contains not more than three days' more marching, and was said to be used to foraging, and on this account the inhabitants had generally entered entirely devoted to Secession, the chickens, geese and bullocks suffered accordingly. At first the men were somewhat inclined to disobedience, but only as desirable additions to their fare; and it was successfully managed to listen to their orders, and to prevent the confusion of the confiscated articles, and questioned as to their legitimate. One fellow came marching into camp with a pig on his shoulders. "What the deuce did you shoot that pig for?" asked his colonel, halting him. "Why, sir, I thought it all the better for the men," was the answer. So he came out with a different guess. "Why did you shoot that goose?" "Why, sir, I couldn't help it," was the reply. But now, the want of provisions being pressing, permission had to be given to a few to forage, and the men were employed in offering a great deal of spare to the soldiers, and a good deal of ambiguous to the "women and children" of the rebels. A pretty fair test this whole section of country is inhabited by "loss whites" while the negroes are numerous, and the latter are all very intelligent, fine, strong, healthy looking fellows, and very jolly fellows. Some would be willing to run off, and all the children, but, while clinging to their masters, they are distant enough from the bullocks. The town was filled with strange coats, and here the waggons, which had been gathered together, were left, and here the largest share for their respective teams. Vouchers for provisions were given, and "Uncle Sam" was responsible for them. "In the Southern army," as the case might be.

After a few days' halt, the column marched Jackson, 10 miles west of Cape Girardeau, when General Prentiss rode in advance to the Cape, "where he was received with a salute of guns by General Fremont, giving him command, as reading Brigadier of General Grant's division.

General Prentiss' division is now encamped on the river bank, while he was coming through the backwoods, and regarding him and as he has been treated with the greatest courtesy by General Grant, and his reception to General Fremont, and rejoiced his troops at Cape Girardeau. The steamer Empress, from St. Louis, Cook took command of the column, and remained in camp at Jackson, awaiting further orders. The object of the march of the troops is south-eastern Missouri before the advancing column, and were concentrated at Cape Girardeau, Bird's Point, Cairo, and Hamburg, and abandon their attempts to "liberate" Missouri.

THE REBEL STEAMER YORKTOWN FIRING ON THE U. S. Ship Savannah, Cumberland and Louisiana.

The Yorktown, which was formerly one of the New York and Virginia line boats, has lately been converted into a rebel gunboat, and armed with iron, in imitation of the French and English ironclad frigates. Having placed herself in readiness for action, with Capt. J. Parish, with a compound crew of pirates, her great business is to destroy the Federal vessels which are now engaged in the Indianola vessels. For this purpose she steamed down the river for running of the Yorktown Savannah, the sailing frigate Cumberland, the gunboat Louisiana, and the steamer Savannah, and the Yorktown, and in great silence, like boys, stood in the way of this wall of iron. The correspondent of the New York Herald writes from the Newport News, that the Yorktown was not a match for the Federal vessels, and therefore addressed to come down the river, morning continued her intention, but evidently thought better of it, and began getting within range of her guns. She opened a fire on the Savannah, which was returned with great spirit and effect. Some balls were fired from the Savannah, but unfortunately her best gun for long distance was disabled. The Yorktown was only provided temporarily on a common gun carriage, and could not be elevated for a long shot. There was a good deal of firing on both sides, but it was said "nobody hurt," nor did a shot from either vessel reach "the spots." The steamer Yorktown was struck several times by shot from the Savannah, before planting a buoy to show the range of shot from where the Savannah was at anchor. The Yorktown, finding that the Federal ironclads are now at Newport News, and there is no fear that the war steamer will make a determined attack upon her, left.

The pirate was consequently compelled to put back to wait a more favorable opportunity. This is a severe blow upon the commerce, it will be a great disgrace to the Federal navy.

ART, SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

The London Athenæum is eloquent and enthusiastic over a recently published volume of Tennyson's. "Of the poetry itself," it says, "we feel but one spirit, Nobility. It rests—Here is poetry worth waiting for, a book which will be read when the hour of the present is forgotten. It has its song in simple and lofty strains, and its satire in words basically made of Saxon and with the sense of many poured over it. We put it aside at this moment, with a sense of gratitude to the author for the pain, while of the old are such wonderful talent, superb sense of the harmony of words, and the power of making them the vehicle of the most beautiful and the most delicate thoughts. Here are green memorials of the New World's young growth, and here are pictures of the Old World's old form of Attrition is poured out the ever-flowing fire of man, we see the alpha home nestling over the tranquil valley, and the Alpine cloud. We see the cruel glowing a most vivid red, the brown grain of the old barn, roses running up the old gray wall, and the sunlight on the ivy leaves. We see the sparkling light of the sea, and the sunset behind the mountains, and the sunlight on the evening cloud, the river full of sunshine, with the bright blue above and the lighter blue on the water. We see the sunlight on the sea, and the vessel in the mid country river. No American poet has more of the home-made and home-loving than Mr. Whittier. His poetry is not filtered from a German heiress, it is a spring-fresh from New World nature, and we gladly welcome his "springing courage."

The Emperor Napoleon has just purchased out of his privy purse the celebrated picture by Ingres, "The Source," which was exhibited in 1855. It represents the nascent nymph of the Fountain of the Source, two entire sources of which have been covered with publicity since the time of the invention of the barometer, and most casual visitors, paintings and hieroglyphics of the highest interest. It is from the rock, which has been recently erected to the greatest height, and the most extensive view of the city has been procured. It was also to the Spanish that were recently found the ancient Egyptian monuments, which are now in the Louvre Museum. It also supported that the Spanish had been Important New Historical Work.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Pictorial History of the War

OF 1861,

DESCRIPTIVE, STATISTICAL AND DOCUMENTARY.

Edited by E. G. Squier,

Late Minister to Central America, &c.

The Seventh number of this superb work has already been issued, and the Eighth number is ready or delivery. The design of this work is great and comprehensive. It is a thorough history of the causes and the progress of the War, from its initiation to the present time, derived from documentary evidence; illustrated by the first Artists of the age, and engraved in the highest style of art. It combines Historical Details with the Incidents, Anecdotes and Poetry of the War, carefully and judiciously selected with the most exquisite, graphic and correct illustrations.

The voice of the Press is unanimous in its praise of the great PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR, not only as regards its able literary editing, but as to its large, elegant type, thick and splendid paper, and superb printing. The Engravings of each part, numbering over thirty, consist of large Double and Single Page Cuts, Portraits, Maps, &c., and are of unequalled beauty and entirely authentic.

Each number contains sixteen Pages, each page measuring 23 by 17 inches

THE PRICE OF EACH PART IS TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

From whence subscribers in the city will be regularly served (semi-monthly) by Carriers, who collect on delivery of the Parts. Orders by mail filled at FRANK LESLIE'S Publication Office, 19 City Hall Square, N. Y., immediately on their receipt. Inclose One Dollar for the first four Parts.

Flattering Opinions of the Press.

It is something which will interest every true Patriot.—Piqua Register, Ohio.

This work will be of great value in after years, when peace and tranquillity again reign in the land.—Republican Standard, Mt. Clemens, Mich.

"The Pictorial History of the War," which is published by Mr. Frank Leslie, of New York, is an attractive work. All who wish to procure, in a cheap form, a record of passing events, will secure this publication.—Boston Courier.

The preparing of the History has been intrusted to Mr. E. G. Squier, formerly United States Minister to Central America, and a gentleman of established reputation in literature. Readers may be assured that it will receive full justice at his hands. The type used is large and clear, the engravings are among the most spirited and best finished of the art, and the whole design and execution of the work render it invaluable as a work of record and reference.—Norfolk Co. Journal, Roxbury, Mass.

It will be a continued illustrated history of our present civil strife, and as to the ability with which it will be conducted, it is enough to say that its management will be in the hands of the Hon. E. G. Squier, who is well known to the public as a scientific and literary writer.—Sun, Canada.

Two numbers have already appeared, which, so far as the matter and engravings are concerned, have never been equalled by the American pictorial press.—Boston Transcript.

All who subscribe for this splendid historical work will possess a full and complete account of every transaction connected with the stirring scenes now being enacted.—New London, C. W.

It will give a complete epitome of the war, with all the facts, scenes, incidents and anecdotes connected with it, arranged chronologically, so as to form a contemporary and permanent history of the times. Accurate and life-like portraits of leading officers and statesmen, plans and views of fortifications, maps, battle scenes, &c., &c. To families it will be of incalculable importance and interest, and for preservation it will be invaluable.—Gem and Gazette, Dexter, Penobscot Co. Me.

Send One Dollar to FRANK LESLIE, 19 City Hall Square, N. Y., and you will receive the first four Parts by return of mail.

GREAT CURE.

Dr. Leland's

ANTI-RHEUMATIC BAND!

Permanently cures Rheumatism in its various forms, Gout and Neuralgia, Stiffness and Nervous Affections, Erysipelas, General Eruptions, Impurities of the Blood, and a sure cure for the evil effects of Mercury.

It is a conveniently arranged Band or Belt, containing a medicated compound, to be worn around the body, about the waist, equally affecting all parts, wherever the disease may be, and can be worn without injury to the most delicate person. No change in the proper habits of living is required, and it entirely removes the disease from the system without the fallacious use of powerful internal medicines, in such cases, which weaken and destroy the constitution, and give temporary relief only, by stupefying the system and deadening its vitality. By this treatment the medicinal properties contained in the Band, being of a highly aromatic and volatile nature, and capable of being readily absorbed through the pores of the skin, come into direct contact with the blood and general circulation, without first passing through the process of digestion, which would tend, not only to detract from their curative powers, but to impair the internal organs and derange the digestion also—thus avoiding the injurious effects, so often the result of internal remedies, and effecting a perfect cure by purifying and equalizing the circulation of the vital fluids and restoring the parts affected to a healthy condition. This Band is also a most powerful "Anti-Mercurial Agent"—Calomel being the primary cause of a large part of the Stiffness, Neuralgic Pains and Rheumatics, so prevalent—and will entirely relieve the system from its pernicious effects.

Moderate cases are cured in a few days, and we are constantly receiving undoubted testimonials—to which we invite inspection at our office—of their efficacy in aggravated cases of long standing.

PRICE TWO DOLLARS. Sent by mail upon receipt of $2, or by express everywhere, with all necessary instructions from the principal office of G. SMITH & CO., 409 Broadway, New York, Sole Proprietors.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.

THE Advertiser having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe LUNG AFFECTION, and that dread disease, CONSUMPTION, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a SURE CURE FOR CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted; and he hopes every sufferer may try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

GALLANT EXPLOIT.

The Rebel Schooner Judith Burnt by the Federal Forces at the Navy Yard, Pensacola.

We illustrate to-day as daring a deed as any of the last war, the burning of the privateer Judith, on the 15th September, under the very guns of the Confederates. We avail ourselves of Major Vogdes', of Fort Pickens, spirited account of the affair:

"Three barges from the Colorado, containing 30 sailors and 65 marines, under the command of Lieutenant Russell, arrived at the fort shortly after dark last night. Captain Reynolds, of the marines, and one or two midshipmen accompanied the expedition.

"Upon each barge a 12-pound howitzer was mounted, loaded with grape and shrapnel.

"The officers and men disembarked at the fort, and remained on shore until about one o'clock, then again embarked and made their way towards the Navy Yard.

"Arriving within a few hundred yards, the boats separated, one making for the schooner Judith, lying alongside the dock, a short distance off from the battery, where the 10-inch columbiad is mounted. The second boat headed for the dock, while the third lay off a short distance, to cover the retreat with her gun.

"They were espied by the sentries when off a hundred yards or thereabouts, and hailed. The answer was given, "Guard boats!" and, as they had crept up near the island shore, some distance above the Navy Yard, and came down as if from Pensacola, they were mistaken for guard boats approaching from the latter place, until but a few yards intervened between them and their respective destinations. A sentry upon the dock first discovered the mistake, and fired his musket at the boat approaching him, then turned to give the alarm, but was stopped by a well-aimed bullet.

"The men sprang ashore just as the long call sounded to alarm the soldiers stationed there. The other sentries fled. The gun was reached, and one man, before prepared, proceeded to spike it. Just as he had most effectually completed his job, a Confederate officer, rushing ahead of his men, who were congregating, from all directions a few hundred feet off, confronted him. The marine turned, drew his cutlass, and cut him down; then hastily followed his comrades into the boat, and put off from shore, followed by a shower of musket balls. Meanwhile the crew of the other boat, which had taken the schooner in charge, were not quite so successful. On nearing the vessel, some 12 or 15 shots were fired at them, killing two, and, it is feared, mortally wounding three others. They kept on, however, under a galling fire, boarded the schooner, cut down two or three of its crew who failed to make their escape, then collecting all the combustible material they could find, set fire to it in the cabin, after which they cut the schooner loose and let her drift away from her moorings. They then embarked again in the boat, bearing with them one man, killed aboard the vessel, it is said, by mistake, he being taken for one of the rebels and cut down by his friends.

"Lieutenant Russell was wounded quite severely in the shoulder; Captain Reynolds was also slightly wounded by a musket ball while retreating. The enemy, several hundred strong, had by this time come together and kept up a rattling volley of musketry upon them. Word was now given to pay them back; the howitzers were brought to bear upon the dark mass congregated upon the dock, they quickly belched forth their contents, which did fearful execution. There is no way of estimating the result, but it is supposed that at least 60 or 70 were put hors du combat. The men now bent to their oars with a will, rounding the point of land on which Fort Pickens is situated. They headed off for their vessel, giving us, as they passed the fort, and receiving in return, three cheers each; three hearty cheers as never before broke upon the still morning air in the Bay of Pensacola.

"The schooner was completely destroyed. She was of about 250 tons burthen, and had on board one pivot and four broadside guns. Her loss will be very much felt by the rebels.

"The men killed in the engagement were buried upon the island. They were brave fellows, and the country will mourn their loss."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A PAGE of this paper does not always afford room enough for the many communications of the most important events and actions of the war. It is sometimes necessary to print double and even quadruple pages. This is unavoidable. A Saturday subscriber who wishes to read his paper on Sunday knows it is to be done without damage to those large and numerous establishments. The largest papers that we shall issue will scarcely exceed in size the illustrated and newsroom folio issued daily after the fourth fold, without any inconvenience to the reader, as the paper will complete in those sheets.

State of the Nation.

THE CAPITOL.—Troops still continue to be massed around the Capitol, and in certain avenues of access to the city, and no one else can either continue to agitate the local population, and are daily spread far and wide by the telegraph. The only movements of consequence, however, have been the occupation of Munson's Hill by the rebels (on the 25th), and the occupation of the abandoned works by the National troops. The enemy has also commanded a series of batteries on the south side of the Potomac, from Occoquan River to Aquia Creek, a distance of nearly 20 miles, from which they have every day fired on all passing vessels, without, however, inflicting any serious damage. Accounts differ as to the efficiency of those batteries, some representing them as completely closing the Potomac, and others as only a source of annoyance that can be easily avoided by a steamer's navy or dexterity. Taken in conjunction with the abandonment of the advanced positions of the rebels at Munson's Hill, it seems to imply a change in their plans, and a design to force a general action on their own ground, and with advantages similar to those which they possessed at Bull Run. It is presumable, however, that the rebel tactics will be met by others equally adroit, and the impending decisive battle fought with no inconsiderable odds against the rebels. The impression, however, seems to be general, on all sides, that a conflict cannot long be postponed. According to the best estimates, the respective armies number from 200,000 to 250,000 men—a total of 500,000 men—by many times the largest body of armed men ever gathered together on this Continent. The battle once opened will no doubt be fought to its ultimate results, and prove the issue of the present war. Upon it probably hinges the destinies of a great nation, and an unprecedented amount of momentous is has depended on any single event in the history of the world. We may well hold our breaths, in solemn suspense, as we watch the progress of events and the gathering of near approach of the Titanic struggle. On our youthful General and his inexperienced army rest responsibilities of fearful weight; but grant that they may prove equal to their support and adequate discharge!

KENTUCKY.—The position taken by Kentucky is an invitation to the General Government to advance and occupy it, and while they are rapidly moving to the support of the loyal men of the State under Anderson and Crittenden. A detachment of Ohio troops has crossed at Portsmith, and moved a short way into the interior, to assist in checking the further advance of the rebels under the renegade Buckner, from Bowling Green northward. The movements of the rebels in Kentucky are precisely of the same vandal spirit which has characterized them in Missouri and Maryland. Burning bridges, destroying railways, blowing up canal locks are the common incidents of their daily progress. Not to rule, they are determined to ruin, and the sanctions of peace, and the high achievements of civilization shall not save fired in their ruthless and unreasoning hate. The flight of John C. Breckinridge, and his reported adhesion to the rebels, will surprise no one who has watched his career and conduct. Few men ever attained so high a position as he once occupied with so small a modicum of real ability; and he now subsides into infamy without the recollection of a single act, either serviceable or of the utterance of a single noble sentiment to redeem, in ever so slight degree, a career to which that of Arnold is bright and glorious in the comparison. The rebel leader, Zollicoffer, killed B. Clay, less fortunate than Mr. Breckinridge, has been arrested, with a party of attendants, on his way to join the rebels. His conduct is undeniable, not so much from any linguistic attachment to his personality, as from the direction which he has endeavored by being upon the mountain road, to avoid the fire of the blood shed in Kentucky, in the civil war which a disregard of her obligations to the country, under the guise of a false "neutrality," has let loose upon her soil. On the 20th ult., the 17th of September, when a party of rebels endeavored to burn a bridge, protected by a small body of Home Guards. The loss of the rebels was seven, but their numbers were too great to be resisted, and the bridge fell a prey to the flames.

MISSOURI.—The course of affairs in Missouri has lately been in every way unfortunate, not to say disastrous to the national cause, to the degree of smarting the liveliest apprehensions for the safety of the State. The important town of Lexington, 250 miles above St. Louis, on the Missouri River, and commanding the route to Kansas, was taken by the rebels, 27,000 strong, under General Price, on the 21st September. The national forces, numbering barely 9,000 men, commanded by Colonel Mulligan, after a desperate defence of five days against overwhelming odds, were finally compelled, from exhaustion of water, having had nothing to drink for more than two days, except a small supply of vinegar. Previous to his surrender, Colonel Mulligan offered to take his army out to a level piece of ground and fight the rebel General in the open field, with the odds of four to one against him, but the challenge was declined and capitulation became an inevitable necessity. The gallant commander is said to have wept like a child when he found himself compelled to surrender. A large amount of stores, and a heavy sum of money, variously stated at from $200,000 to $600,000 fell into the hands of the victors. The rebels, unable to supply the prisoners with food, liberated them on parole, and they returned to their homes. The loss on the Union side during the siege was 136; the loss of the rebels was very heavy, reported by one of their surgeons at upwards of 1,000. By the Brownsville. The responsibility of this severe loss—severe in a political as well as material and military sense—has been directly charged on General Fremont, who, it is further charged, has not even reinforced Colonel Mulligan in time to prevent the disaster. There seems to be a general, almost universal opinion, that General Fremont, pulled up by the reins of power in the midst of his own, has neglected the more important trusts confided to his hands, and proved himself incompetent to the duties of his high station to which he was elevated through a meretricious reputation, created partly by accident and in part through the exertions of industrious friends and admirers. It is alleged that a timely intervention on his part could have saved General Lyon and prevented the disaster of Wilson's Creek—prevented, in fact, the whole train of events which have led to the present state of Missouri. Worse than this, it is openly hinted that Lyon was sacrificed, and the other Union leaders in Missouri placed in false positions where their credit could not be saved, in order that the part of General Fremont himself, and with some vague purpose of personal aggrandizement. Some of these allegations, it must be remembered, derive much support from recent facts, and to a certain extent justify public apprehension and suspicion. It is further said that the conduct of General Fremont in the present and the relinquishment of a commanding point on the principal line of water communication through Missouri, was a necessary part of a grand strategic movement of the rebel General Price, at which is to overwhelm and utterly annihilate rebellion and the rebel forces in Missouri. And it is added that the General has not yet the troops necessary to carry out his views, in order to carry out this deep laid scheme, which is to surpass the strategy of Napoleon in the completeness of its success and the decisiveness of its results. Whether there is truth in some portion of this movement will be made by General Fremont at once, and we should devoutly hope that it will be crowned with all the triumph which he contemplates and his friends anticipate. The fact is, the public only knows that a great State has been nearly overrun by the rebels while under the command of Fremont, and that we retrieve the ground which has been lost, and that speedily, it will be fortunate for his reputation if he shall fall foremost in the fray, with his face to foeman's steel, and his back to the enemy." The theory recorded of defeat in Missouri, it is but right to add, has been relieved by the brilliancy of several minor actions. On the 31st, General Lane, of Kansas, defeated the rebel Colonel Mulligan, surprised and routed a large body of rebels near Papinsville, with a loss to the latter of 60 killed, and 100 taken prisoners. He next attacked a second body of rebels, and also defeated and captured a large rebel supply train, and the treasury of General Rains, containing upwards of $100,000. The gratification issued by General Lane to his command was as follows: "After complimenting the troops for the purpose of his advance, and urging those in arms against the Government to disperse and come to him for protection, he concludes:

"Should you, however, disregard my advice, the stern visitations of war will be meted out to you with a rigor that will be felt. You will be canvassed your smiting for protection is a sham, and rest assured traitors will receive no favor at the hands of this army. The cup has been exhausted; treason will hereafter be treated as treason. The merchants of America will be protected in their rights, and those unlawfully harming helpers on the St. Joseph railroad, satisfies us that a treacherous spirit exists in the rebels which would slaughter to conquer. They shall be blotted from existence, and seat to that hell to which pawns for their infernal master, Jeff. Davis. I appeal to the people of Western Missouri, choose you between them. The one is a flame to devour, the other a light to illumine your path."

TENNESSEE.—Tennessee has been so long out off from communication with the loyal States, that little has been known of the condition of affairs there, beyond a large majority of the people of the eastern part of the State. It seems, however, that they are by no means shrogged in their opinions or attachments, but are only waiting a favorable point from lack of arms and the material aids necessary to the vindication of their principles. The full adhesion of Kentucky to the Union, it is hoped, will remedy this deficiency, and the publication of such a result, it appears from the Knoxville Register, a rebel organ, a meeting of the Union people of Eastern Tennessee are organizing and drilling under the rebel rule. An attempt made to disperse them in Green County was resisted, and a conflict ensued, in which several were killed on both sides. We look confidently to see the rebel forces expelled from East Tennessee before Christmas, as they certainly will be, if the loyal inhabitants of that region are meanwhile adequately supported by the national arm.

ON THE OCEAN.—A couple of brilliant exploits have added to the naval renown of the country. On the night of the 8th of September, a boat expedition from the United States frigate Colorado off Pensacola, under command of Lieutenant John Guest, entered and destroyed the rebel steamer Judith, a schooner privateer or war vessel Judith, which the rebels were fitting out at the Warrington Navy Yard. The Judith mounted four 42-pounders, and had a crew of 60 men. The loss of the attacking party was three killed and 16 wounded. That of the rebels is said to have been heavy. Two men were hung by the rebels next day, supposed to have been the servants who permitted the surprise to be effected. Another similar and equally successful exploit was performed by detachments from the gunboats R. R. Cuyler and Montgomery in the harbor of Apalachicola, Florida, on the 26th August. On the night of that day a boat expedition was fitted out from these two vessels, which entered the harbor, and captured and burned the ship Finland, loaded with salt. On their return the boats were chased by a rebel steamer and a privateer schooner, but escaped.

The rebel steam privateer Sumter has been heard from at Surinam, with the United States steamer Keystone State in full pursuit. The capture of the Sumter is confidently expected.

FORTRESS.—The rebels before Washington, despairing of the success of an attack on the Union forces in front, have fallen back from all their advanced positions. Upton's Hill, as well as Falls Church, have been evacuated, and are now held by the Union troops. The position of the rebels at these points appears to have been not very formidable. There were no signs found of guns having been mounted; their defences were simply rifle-pits, and were being made ordinances of some kind there, or any other protection except rudely constructed sheds. An unfortunate error on the part of two divisions of the Union troops occurred on the evening of General Smith's force from Chain Bridge to Falls Church. During the darkness of the night the Philadelphia regiment of Colonel Owens mistaking Captain Mott's battalion of Regulars, Baker's California regiment and two other regiments for a body of the rebels, opened a tremendous volley upon them, killing and wounding several. The California regiment returned fire with terrible effect. The disguise of Mott's battery were then ordered to load with canister, and were about to open a deadly volley upon the General's men, when the mistake was discovered, in time to avert a terrible slaughter.

The Impending Battle.

THERE is no doubt that there are at least 300,000 men drawn up against each other, in nearly equal numbers, in and around Washington. Many reports have been spread by rebel and national forces at 400,000. A struggle between these two immense armies cannot long be postponed. The integrity of the Union, the future of a great nationality, the fate of free Government, all depend on the success of the Union forces. On the other hand, the success of the long-studied schemes of ambition, for which the rebels have sacrificed honor and record of their perished bandsagainst the Government of their fathers, and the lives and fortunes of the rebel leaders, hang on the issue of the battle. They fight with halters around their necks, and will fight with the desperation of despair. The contest, when it comes, cannot fail to be on a scale as great as any recorded in history. The great battles of Napoleon were fought with inferior numbers. At Austerlitz he had but 80,000 men, and the combined Russian and Austrian armies numbered 120,000 men. At Jena his force was less than 130,000; at Wagram, 160,000; at Borodino, under the walls of Moscow, 120,000; and at Waterloo, but 80,000. The greatest numbers ever engaged in battle by Napoleon, was at Leipsic, in 1813, when he commanded 175,000 men against the allies, numbering 300,000 men, Austrians, Russians, Swedenburg 340,000. This struggle, which lasted three days, was known as the "Combat of the Giants," and ended in the overthrow of the great Napoleon. Wellington was present at the battle, and said at one time; Jackson never had more than 15,000; and Scott, until this year, never saw 20,000 men under his orders. The newest experiments in war have been those seen before Sebastopol, in modern times, was at the battle of Solferino, where the French and Sardinians numbered 145,000, and the Austrians 170,000.

"HOW HAVE THE MIGHTY FALLEN!"—On the 30th ult. James B. Clay, a son of Henry Clay, was arrested with 16 of his men, while on his way to join the rebel forces in Kentucky. Mr. Clay is a graduate of the Military Academy of the United States, was with the party, but succeeded in effecting his escape.

RESULTS OF THE CENSUS.—The Census of 1860 reveals some striking facts as regards population and its increase in the United States during the last decade. The total increase of population in the country was from 23 per cent. Great differences, however, are observable between the several States. Thus, in Texas, the increase was 60.7 per cent; in Nevada, 64.7 (the highest number); 3.34 per cent; then New Hampshire, 3.35 per cent; and next, South Carolina, 3.41; Maine follows with 3.74, and Massachusetts, 3.75, and, next powerful Virginia with only 12.27, while North Carolina shows only 14.35. Rhode Island, 16.92; Connecticut, 16.97; Kentucky, 19.27; Mississippi 8.1555, in 10,065 in 1860, or in a rate of increase of over 25 per cent; Oregon from 52,465 to 91,635, or 74.65 per cent; Iowa from 192,214 to 674,948, or 251.22 per cent; Texas from 212,592 to 602,432, or 183.80 per cent; Minnesota from 6,077 to 172,023, or 2,730.72 per cent; California 379,994 to 779,894, or 105 per cent, and Illinois over 100 per cent.

The average size of farms in the country is 33.41 per cent. In two States—Maryland and Delaware—they have decreased in number. In two States only are they of greater magnitude than in 1850—in South Carolina, where they number 67,241 against 291,628 of the white inhabitants, and in Mississippi, 66,604 to 354,699. The largest number of farms are found in Ohio, 216 to 8 (205,317), and the next in Georgia (202,385).

The total increased population of the country shows a very small increase, only 23.64 per cent.

TAKEN DEPUTY.—Old Samuel Johnson once said "he had undergone all the trials of a wife except that of bearing children, and he supposed he could then undergo." He (the wife) can be counted for Mr. De Witt Hamilton, sets, "I have undergone all the trials of a rival wife," in a letter to the press a man can be tried by a jury. It is a still more liberal one when he can be tried by a jury composed of women, and ought to be, that "by courts" Alas is just what we don't want. We pass over the blessed privilege of being a criminal. It was one that our forefathers fought for, and decidedly slight to be arrested, tried by juries whom sympathizers are like their own. "A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind," and in the case we do not believe that a man ought to be tried by his peers.

THE "PRIVATE MAN."—This farfetched, but in its exterior aspect and inherent consequences most modest, almost squalid resort of the radical leaders of the State of New York, has been called the "Richmond Armory of New York," is among the things past. It has started with the partisan organization of a club, and has been the nucleus of a political party. It is not every New Yorker, and in fact is ominous of that which impends over Tammany Hall when it is known that the wealth and the talent of the whole of that organization have been swallowed up for ever all the partisan questions with which it has been identified, and that it will need the reconstruction of a party organization and workwards. At present, thank Heaven, the North presents no variations of parties. The people, without regard to political affiliation, occupy a common ground of Union for the Constitution and the Laws. As the old Union Club, which was called the "Private Mess" of Tammany assumed, was with no doubt rouge themselves in different political camps, with different names, and not unfrequently with new leaders. Boss Tweed or Hugh will dominate soon, wherein customers will be packed, nominations fixed, bargains made, and, when all is over, the "Private Mess" will be called the "Private" of personal politics performed.

The Private Mess became the headquarters of a faction which split off from Tammany Hall in 1858, thirty-three years ago, since which time it has been a favorite resort of the inferior ranks of the Democratic party, through all its phases of "Locofocoism," "Barnburnerism" and "Hunkerism," down to its unreserved admission to "Dissolution," and the blazes on its banners, "The Union, it must and shall be preserved!"

The Private Mess of 1861 is not the Mess of 1858 by no more for ever! Whether it is to revive in all the splendors of marble and brown stone we have not; nor do we know what space the interior of its former quarters will afford for the toilets and amid the spirits of its multitudinous customers. At any rate, an old city landmark has disappeared with the letter of Democracy. As observed by a contemporary, "It has outlived many who helped to give it consequence, and now naturally follows its old friends and patrons to the grave."

We had in our last paper a fearful illustration of that most terrible of all accidents, burning to death. The Paris paper, Galignani, contains another proof of how careless ladies are of their own lives. With the present style of dress, they live in the most fragile of frames, and at the same time those most susceptible of destruction. Nevertheless, they will obstinately run the risk, when the lightest gossamer might be made indestructible by a simple chemical mixture almost costless. When will the ladies think it worth while to take care of themselves? We read:

"Another of those fearful accidents, caused by the extremely inflammable nature of ladies' summer toilets, occurred in Paris the day before yesterday. A foreign lady, staying at a hotel in the Rue Hyacinthe St. Honoré, was preparing tea for two female friends who had called to see her, when one of her sleeves caught fire from a spirit-lamp on the table, and all her dress was immediately in a blaze. Her two friends rushed out of the room, crying for help, which it was impossible for themselves to render. The waiters of the hotel were instantly on the spot, but before they could extinguish the flames the unfortunate lady was so dreadfully burnt that she expired the next morning, after dreadful sufferings."

As a pendent to the foregoing, we give this simple preventive: "Muslins, etc., steeped in a seven per cent. solution of ammonia, or a 20 per cent. solution of tungstate of soda and then dried, may be held to a flame of a candle or gas-lamp without taking fire. That portion of the stuff in contact with the light becomes charred and destroyed, but it does not inflame, and, consequently, the burning state does not spread to the rest of the material. The cost is very trifling."

"Bobbing Around."—Paragraphs are current in the newspapers to the effect that "the United States Minister at Brussels" has visited Caprera, at great expense, for the purpose of offering to Garibaldi "a command in the Union army." It is stated, in the telegraphic despatches of the Paris papers, with great circumstantiality, that "His Excellence Sanford" had specially chartered the steamer Dante, from Genoa, for his visit to Garibaldi, at "the price of 2,500 francs." It would not surprise us to hear that "Excellence Sanford," in an unexceptionable suit of black, had also visited Abdel Kadir, Schamyl, and even Nena Sahib with similar propositions! Such a procedure would be delightfully characteristic; but we protest against the Government of the United States being supposed for an instant to be implicated in any such nonsense. If "Excellence Sanford," who is "Minister resident" in Brussels, chooses to indulge to the luxury of notoriety, which many people mistake for reputation, by chartering steamers for 2,500 francs a trip, and dashing about with a palpitating air of business and responsibility, very well; but the Government should have it understood that it is not to be held responsible for his fussiness. We can fight our own battles without the aid of Garibaldi, or Abdel Kadir, or Schamyl, and when the President wants to send a message to an Italian subject, he probably will consult economy as well as propriety by employing the American Envoy to Italy, and not the "Minister resident in Brussels."

After the War.—The New York Herald, commenting on the unfriendly spirit manifested by certain European powers, pointedly observes: "At the conclusion of this war we shall have in the field over 300,000 veteran soldiers; and our navy will comprise over 500 ships of war, and we shall have a naval brigade of about 50 000 men. Let European governments be careful, then, how they treat us during the continuance of this war, for when we have settled our domestic troubles the slightest word of insult or provocation may let loose upon Canada or Cuba this terrible force, and sweep the last vestige of monarchical rule from this continent."

The War on the Ocean.—The number of vessels captured by the United States war vessels in entering or leaving blockaded ports, or under rebel colors on the high seas, is 52, valued with their cargoes at $1,917,200. The number of merchantmen and other vessels seized in Southern ports by the rebels, or captured by their privateers, is 64, valued, with cargoes, at £2,791,400. The war on the ocean, therefore, in respect of captures, shows a net loss of 12 vessels and $874,200 to the Union side—an additional commentary, if any were needed, on the inefficiency of our Navy Department.

The Rebel Army.—The New York Herald publishes what it regards as a complete table of the rebel forces, with their stations, giving a grand total of 279,100 men, of which it estimates that about one-half, or in round numbers 140,000, are on the Potomac.

Materials of War.—During the first three days of last week 6,000,000 cartridges were sent from the arsenal at Watervliet, opposite Troy, to the Union armies. Four complete six-pounder batteries and six thirty-two-pounder batteries were also completed and shipped.

The Oath.—A number of the political prisoners confined in the National Hotel at Fort Lafayette have been released on taking the following oath:

"I do swear that I will support, protect and defend the Constitution and Government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign, and that I will bear true faith, allegiance and loyalty to the same, any ordinance, resolution, or law of any State Convention or Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding. And further, that I do this with a full determination, pledge and purpose, without any mental reservation or evasion whatever."

"Let Justice be done though the Heavens fall!"—The Providence Journal, in commenting on the course of affairs in Missouri, and recapitulating the reverses we have suffered, concludes with the following language, which is only an expression of the universal sentiment of the New England and Middle States:

"Now it is very evident that somebody is to blame for the loss we have sustained during the past eight weeks. Who it is we cannot at this time and at this distance from the scene of action undertake to say. But the public are demanding in a tone that is not to be mistaken that the author or authors of these blunders shall not be suffered to peril our cause in the West. No matter what man stands between us and success. He must be searched out and known and set aside. Nothing can shield incompetency now. Let the inquisition be made and judgment fearlessly pronounced. If we have, as is said, a splendid army in Missouri, let us hear of it sweeping McCulloch and Price down into the land of bayous and alligators. If we have not men enough, let them be raised forthwith. If they do not volunteer, let them be drafted. At all hazards, at any price, let these rebels be turned back, let Missouri be set free, let the highway to the Gulf of Mexico be opened."

The Fire Flags.—The Mayor, in a communication to the Common Council, dated September 23d, encloses a letter from Captain Vickers, Provost Marshal of Alexandria, stating that he had "found in a pile of rubbish the flags presented by the city of New York to the Fire Zouaves," and wishing to know what to do with them. A fact so disgraceful needs no comment.

Allotment Tickets.—The War Department has made the necessary arrangements to carry out the act of Congress relative to allotments of pay. Hereafter the recruit, upon enrolling his name, has only to designate what proportion of his monthly stipend shall be given to his family, to have the necessary minute made, and the sum paid regularly. Large numbers of very desirable men have turned away from the recruiting station because the officer could give them no assurance as to provision for their families while they are absent on duty. Such assurance can now be had.

The Aztecs Outdone.—The land that produced the Aztec children has contributed another still more striking wonder for the curious—an Indian dwarf, 30 years old, but 17 inches high, born without arms or legs, yet perfect in health and speaking two languages. We understand that this extraordinary being is soon to be exhibited in New York.

Prince de Joinville.—The Prince de Joinville, whose recent arrival in this country has been the occasion of much comment, and whose son has entered the naval service of the United States, was the third son of Louis Philippe, and was born in 1814, he is consequently 47 years old. In 1838 he had reached the rank of Post Captain in the Navy, and at the bombardment of Vera Cruz was in command of the frigate Creole. He sailed with the expedition to St. Helena, in 1841, in command of the Belle Poule, and brought the remains of Napoleon to France. His report to the King on that occasion and the reply are as follows: "Sire, I present to you the ashes of Napoleon." Louis Philippe replied: "I receive them in the name of France." The Prince visited this country the year after, and afterwards went to Rio Janeiro, where he married the Princess Francesca of Braganza, the sister of Don Pedro II. In 1844 he commanded the French fleet on the coast of Morocco, and after the bombardment of Tangier and Mogador arranged a treaty of peace between the Moors and France. Since 1848 he has lived in retirement.

The National Eagles.—A correspondent of the National Intelligencer, referring to the difficulty of distinguishing the national and rebel colors in battle, suggests mounting a gilt carved or cast eagle on each flagstaff as a distinguishing emblem. He adds: "The eagle can be cut or cast so as to weigh very little; it need not be expensive, comparatively; may be placed on the staffs now in use, and recognized as far as the eye or glass can reach. No objection in reason can be urged against its adoption by the Government; nothing can be more appropriate, or more readily or cheaply procured, and, in the present low state of the mechanical arts in 'Secessia,' the emblem could not be soon or easily counterfeited or stolen."

The Ladies of Hoboken presented the Forty-fifth regiment New York Volunteers with a splendid "black, red and gold" stand of colors, on the 9th September, at Landmann's Park. The regiment is a German one, and one of the best that has left for the battle field. The Colonel, George von Amsberg, is a Hanoverian by birth, who, after finishing his education at the University of Gottingen, entered the Austrian army. He was attached to a Hungarian cavalry regiment, in which he held the post of Lieutenant-Colonel. When the Hungarian Revolution broke out, Colonel von Amsberg took the part of the insurgent Hungarians against the Austrians. He fought in most of the principal battles, and was made a Brigadier-General by Kossuth. At Villagos he fell into the hands of the enemy. By court martial he was sentenced to 19 years' imprisonment. After nine years' imprisonment in Hohen Asperg he was pardoned, under the condition to leave Germany. Colonel von Amsberg came about four years ago to the United States.

The ferocity of impotence is far beyond that of strength. A tiger is nothing to an angry editor, whose rage is always in inverse ratio to his power. The Kentucky Lexington Statesman has found it necessary to suspend its usual daily dribblings of treasonable venom. We cheerfully give its last editorial:

"We know the howl of joy with which this announcement will be met. If it gives you joy to see a free paper suppressed by its own voluntary choice, rejoice, for such you now see. For some time past this paper has been published at a loss, in consequence of the prostration of business generally. We have advocated peace. We known vast majority of the people in the slave States—in this State—agree with us in sentiment. We see what has been done elsewhere. We know that only a few days is left to us. It may be said that all we say is for harm and against the Government. Therefore we close our issue on this day. We do so in the sternest defiance to the most infamous and damnable tyranny that has existed on the face of the civilized earth within the last two hundred years. When the time comes that a free man can utter his sentiments without the Bastile to his face this paper will resume its old position. It is not the fear of the Bastile, but the hope that some good may be done to a down-trodden people by our silence for a time. As far as we are concerned, it is defiance to a tyrant and all his power. A free press has ever been the foe most dreaded by all usurpers. We hope it may be free again in this country."

We regret that the above did not come in time for the Budget, for it has one sentence which, for fun, "outjeremiahs Job." "It is not the fear of the Bastile, but the hope that some good may be done to a down-trodden people by our silence." If anything could reconcile a down-trodden people to whatever goes over it (to continue the rascal's metaphor) it is the silence of such rebel ribaldry as that which found utterance in the Lexington Statesman. It is really paying too dear that our waste paper should have the brand of treason on it.

Small Deer.—A number of people, presumably as a joke, some time ago addressed a petition to the Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, asking for the expulsion from the country of Mr. Russell, LL. D., etc., on account of falsehoods and "treasonable matter" contained in his letters to the London Times, of which he is special American correspondent. To this petition Mr. Seward has found leisure to reply in full, in a manner so serious and didactic as to make us suspect that he sees no joke in the affair at all. The gravity with which he declines to take any extreme measures against the "special correspondent," because "probably not 50 copies of the London Times ever find their way to our shores," and the owlishness with which he propounds such platitudes as "interference with the press, even in the case of an existing insurrection, can only be justified on the ground of public danger," are indicative of solemn earnestness worthy of Dogberry himself, or of an irony so deep as to as to defy detection. When the Abbé McMasters gets locked up for printing his spleen in a paper the name of which is hardly known beyond the small circle of his personal acquaintances, and when the "Bungtown Buglehorn" is suppressed by authority for treasonable utterances, we don't see why a mendacious correspondent of the London Times, "or any other paper," should be deprived of an equal and not unlikely coveted as well as deserved notoriety. The truth is, Mr. Seward has been engaged in a very small and a very silly business in answering what, if genuine and not intended as a satire, was a very silly petition; and it is to be hoped that his "engrossment with urgent public duties and cares," of which he speaks, will henceforth prevent the issue, if a proper sense of dignity fails to do so, of State papers on such contemptible subjects as William Russell, LL. D., etc. We present too many points for merciless foreign satire, in our conduct of the war and administration of the Navy, without calling on the Department of State for additional subjects for universal cachinnation.

Odd Fellows.—The total number of Odd Fellow Lodges in the State of New York is 610; number of members, 13,784; yearly receipts, $90,000, most of which is paid out in way of relief to the sick and widowed.

National Debt.—The following table shows the debt of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, at the close of the last war with Great Britain, and its probable amount in the coming year, together with the amount per head of the population at these three several periods:

	1787.	1816.	1862
Debt	$80,000,000	127,000,000	600,000,000
Per head	$20	$16	$16 66

A Southern Monarchy.—The following extracts from DeBow's Review, a well-known monthly exponent of Southern opinion, shadows forth some of the ideas of social and political reorganization which are floating in the minds of the Southern leaders, and which, should they be successful in permanently disrupting the Union, they will no doubt endeavor to put in practice. A nobility founded on property in slaves, with a subsidized army of "mean whites," and a King taken from some effete "royal family" of Europe, are among the plans of the great Rebellion. We would suggest young Bomba, late of Naples, as an appropriate Sovereign for the Empire of Cottondom!

"England," says the Review, "has once tried to dispense with nobility, and France twice, but each experiment was a failure. In America we have the aristocracy of wealth and talents, and that aristocracy is somewhat hereditary. The landed aristocracy of the South, who own slaves, approach somewhat to the English nobility. Time must determine whether the quasi aristocracy of the South has sufficient power, permanence and privilege to give stability, durability and good order to society. It is sufficiently patriotic and conservative in its feelings, but we fear wants the powers, privileges and prerogatives that the experience of all other countries has shown to be necessary."

DOMESTIC ITEMS.

Massachusetts has now in the field sixteen full regiments, seven unattached companies of infantry, and one complete battery of artillery. There are now in the State, in course of organization, six regiments of infantry, one regiment of cavalry and three batteries of artillery.

Iowa has six regiments of infantry and two of cavalry in the field. Three more regiments of infantry and one of cavalry are in camp, nearly organized, making a force of over 9,000 infantry and 3 000 cavalry, or, in round numbers, 12,000 men. Governor Kirkwood has just issued a proclamation calling for four more regiments, two of which are to be used exclusively on the borders of the State.

Connecticut has now five Brigadier-Generals in the field, viz.: Generals Totten, Mansfield, Benham, Sedgwick and Wright. They are all West Point men, and all but General Sedgwick members of the Corps of Engineers. Totten is from New Haven, Mansfield from Middletown, Benham from Meriden, Sedgwick from Litchfield, and Wright from Clinton.

Illinois has furnished 47 regiments, and is rapidly organizing 13 more, in addition to the thousands of troops she has furnished to Missouri regiments. In a short time she will have supplied the Government with 60,000 troops—and good ones, too—sturdy brave, docile, and loyal men, who are willing to fight for the Union, and suffer for it.

Michigan has organized 12 regiments, numbering 13,000 men, eight of which are now in the vicinity of Washington, and the other four will soon be ready to take the field. Besides these 13,000 volunteers, not less than 3,000 have left the State and united with other regiments.

The whole number of pupils at schools, both public and private, in the 15 slaveholding States in 1850 was 600,979; ditto State of New York, 727,222. Virginia expended in 1854 for the education of poor children $69,404, and for the maintenance of a public guard $73,159.

There is quite a flood of emigration from Western Texas and Missouri to the shores of the Pacific, as many as 60 to 70 wagons a day passing en route.

The Navy Department has accepted propositions from Messrs. C. S. Bushnell & Co., of New Haven; Merrick & Sons, of Philadelphia, and J. Erickson, of New York, for the construction of iron-clad vessels.

The first railroad in Oregon has just been built on what is called the "transit across the cascades." The road is of substantial construction, is three and three-quarters of a mile long, and most of it is on tressel work of a dizzy height.

The fact that the name of the colonel of the 4th Vermont Regiment is Stoughton, and the name of a captain of the regiment is Todd, has given rise to the following conundrum: Why are men so anxious to enlist in the 4th Vermont regiment? Answer—Because they can have Stoughton with their Todd.

The Cincinnati Annual Conference of the Methodist Church resolved their thanks to General McClellan for his Sabbath observance proclamation.

The Mayor of Leavenworth, Kansas, has issued a proclamation ordering all the stores in the city to close, and all business operations to cease between the hours of four and half-past six o'clock in the afternoon of each day, for the purpose of giving all persons time to perfect themselves in the use of firearms.

The Union sentiment continues to work disastrously upon the Secession journals and editors of the North, and in the loyal sections of the border slave States. Our lists now exhibit the following results:

Papers suspended by the authorities	17
Destroyed by mobs	10
Died naturally	6
Denied the mails	5
Changed to Union	7
Editors in prison	6

The Mississippi, a magnificent steamer of 2 019 tons, and the largest vessel built of iron in this country, was launched in Boston on the 10th. Her length over all is 295 feet; breadth of beam, 39 feet; depth of hold, 25 feet. She draws when light 8¾ feet forward and 9 feet aft, and when loaded her draft will probably be 16 feet. The hull is of iron up to the main deck, above which she is built substantially of oak timber. Beneath the main deck the vessel is divided into five water-tight compartments.

After the capture of Fort Hatteras, one of the shells was found to have pierced the rebels' powder magazine, without bursting. On examination, it appeared that the gunner, whose duty it was, had forgotten to tear off a small leathern cap, ordinarily put on for safety. This was the only shell thrown that did not explode. Had the cap been removed, the fortification would have been blown up, and not a handful of men left alive to be captured as prisoners of war.

The canal system of the State of New York is triumphantly vindicating the enlightened policy which persevered through all difficulties till "the enlargement" was substantially completed. Its present onward and upward course is illustrated in the contrast between the gross receipts of 1859, when canal trade literally touched bottom, and those of the present year, 1861—taking the 1st of September in each year as the standpoint for the previous twelvemonth:

1859	$1,814,368
1860	2,381,301
1861	3,366,822

The Military Department of Ohio will in future consist of Ohio, Indiana, and that part of Kentucky within 15 miles of Cincinnati. General Mitchell is to command, and has his headquarters at Cincinnati. So much of Virginia as lies west of the Blue Ridge is to constitute the Department of Western Virginia, under the command of General Rosecranz.

The Panama Railroad Company voted to invest $500,000 in Treasury notes. They have already taken $100,000, and propose to recall their deposits from London.

A lady of Columbus inquired of the spirit-rappers how many children she had. "Four," replied the spirit. The husband, startled at the accuracy of the reply, stepped up and inquired, "How many children have I?" "Two," answered the rapping medium. The husband and wife looked at each other with an odd smile for a moment, and then retired non-believers.

The whole valuation of the city of Providence is $56,896,500; the ratio of tax is 56 cents on each $100, and the entire tax $329,999 70. Last year the valuation was $58,131,800; tax, 56 cents; whole tax $325 538 08.

The corn (maize) crop of the United States in 1840 was estimated at 377,000,000 bushels; in 1850, 600,000,000; and in 1860, 900,000,000 bushels.

Hon. George A. Shaw, Inspector-General of Army Supplies made in New England, says that there are 70 mills now engaged in manufacturing cloth for the Government, and that the amount of goods ordered is about $20,000,000.

Foreign News.

The latest advices contain nothing of importance. England is in a state of profound political repose, the only questions engaging its attention being the American crisis and the Italian question, which now occupies a very subordinate place. France is equally quiet—the solitary ripple being a pamphlet on the eternal papal question, which, if reflecting the Emperor's opinion, bodes badly for his Holiness. Hungary is rapidly approaching another outbreak—the Government having ordered that the taxes shall be collected by military process. Rumors are still prevalent of the exchange of Sardinia for Rome, but nothing definite is known. It is not likely that Louis Napoleon would choose such a time for the only measure that could give England an opportunity of forming a coalition against him, and the joint expedition of France and England against Mexico is sufficient proof that he contemplates no grand European coup this year.

THEATRICAL AND MUSICAL.

Laura Keene's Theatre.—In its scenic features the new piece at this theatre is unrivalled by any which has yet been produced in this country. Neither pains nor expense has been spared to make them beautiful and effective. There are, moreover, some admirable groupings, and a sufficiently appetising exhibition of flesh-colored tights and twinkling ankles. But when we have said this, we have exhausted all that can be said in the way of commendation. The dialogue of the piece, for it has neither plot nor coherence, is the most abject, melancholy rubbish that was ever inflicted on the suffering ear of a disgusted public. Not a ray of wit or genius enlivens its dreary stupidity, and the sooner it is cut out, and the piece resolved into a series of tableaux, with music between, if only by an ordinary street organ, the better for the reputation of the theatre, and the more satisfactory to the public.

Academy of Music.—The Prestidigitateur, Hermann, has completely changed his programme, albeit the public were satisfied with it as it stood, and has introduced an entirely novel series of performances, if possible more remarkable and entertaining than the first. He is now assisted by the charming Mrs. Hermann, who "does" second-sight and clairvoyance in a manner that puts to shame all spirit-rappers and mesmerists. The Foxes may hide their diminished heads, and Andrew Jackson Davis go to planting congenial cabbages.

Winter Garden.—This old favorite holds its own against all competition, Mrs Wood still remaining the star ascendant and attractive. We learn that the management have a series of novelties in preparation sufficient to meet all the requirements of metropolitan audiences.

Miscellaneous.—It is reported that Signor Muzio, in conjunction with Signor Rissoli, is forming an opera troupe for a season in Havana, composed of the following artists: Prime donne, Miss Hinckley, Elena Kennett, Adelaide Baseigio and Mme. Massea; tenors, Lotti, Volpini, Tombesi and Bignardi; baritones, Ferri and Fellini; basses, Antonucci and Nertel......Charles Mathews has written a comedy called "The Soft Sex," which was extremely unsuccessful on the night of its production at the Haymarket Theatre, London. The author, however, remodelled and revised it very fully, and the piece is having a run. Its leading object is to show how weak and ridiculous women are when they assume to themselves the strength and attributes of men, and how irresistibly powerful and captivating they are when they adhere only to the softer and gentler charms and graces which properly belong to their sex.

Latest Intelligence.

Late advices from New Orleans, received at Cincinnati, state that Mississippi City has been taken possession of by our war vessels, and that all communication between New Orleans and Mobile by water is, consequently, cut off. This is a movement which the Louisiana and Alabama rebels have been anticipating and fearing for some time, and it was understood that vigorous measures had been taken to prevent it, under the supervision of the traitor Twiggs. All the important points on the Texas coast are also stated to have fallen into our possession. The details of these operations will be looked for with unusual interest.

Mr. Chase, the efficient Secretary of the Treasury, has returned to Washington from his visit to New York, having perfected his arrangements with the banks for the second $50,000,000 of the National Loan.

At noon, on Monday, the rebels moved in force, 10,000 strong, on the fords of the upper Potomac, but were repulsed with heavy loss. This seems to have been a concerted movement, and an attempt to accomplish the results which they failed to achieve in front of Washington.

OCCUPATION OF PADUCAH, KY., BY UNION TROOPS, UNDER GENERAL GRANT, SEPTEMBER 6—VIEW OF THE NORTHERN TERMINUS OF THE MOBILE AND OHIO RAILWAY.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ATTACHED TO GENERAL GRANT'S COMMAND.

ARRIVAL OF UNION TROOPS IN PADUCAH, KY.

OUR last number contained a view of Paducah and a brief description of the place. We now continue our illustrations of the war in the West, by another sketch from our Special Artist, representing the arrival of reinforcements from Cairo, Illinois. The recent action of the Kentucky Legislature renders Paducah more important every day. Being within four hours' steam of Cairo, there is no fear of the Union troops meeting with a similar disaster to that we have sustained recently at Lexington.

The correspondent of the St. Louis Republican gives the following interesting account of the new floating bridge constructing at Paducah:

"The barges, for bridging at any point the rivers, have arrived here from Cincinnati, and are being rapidly fastened together, making a floating bridge of great sustaining power. They are laid side by side, and a platform, giving much the appearance of a plank road, passes over the middle. In a few days the Ohio here will be crossed by a highway, which, while affording passage for any number of soldiers and the heaviest artillery, can be moved at pleasure, or, as the exigencies of the day require, to points above or below. Now that Government has awakened to the importance of Paducah as a post for future operations, it becomes a wonder that the perceptive faculties of those in power have on this subject so long remained dormant. Commanding entirely the Tennessee River, a tributary navigable for hundreds of miles, an avenue of boundless wealth, and whose course is through a bitterly hostile country, with the mouth of the Cumberland but a short distance above, and the Ohio entirely under control, Paducah, easy of access from all points for Union purposes, becomes at once a centre of great military interest and power. Ever since the commencement of the war, until very lately, boats loaded with contraband goods have plied without interruption up the Cumberland and Tennessee, carrying aid and comfort of the most acceptable kind to the kingdom of the C. S. A. This is now impossible, and the occupation of Paducah will have the same effect, and almost as great a one, as that of Fort Hatteras. Paducah is the key to the enemy's territory here in the West, and over Kentucky's soil the armies will have to march that effect anything at present in the Confederate territory; and some move is already on foot that is expected to bring with it important results. Steamers now lying at the levee leave, it is understood, this evening for Evansville, and will bring down from there six thousand Indiana troops to this point. Activity prevails in every department, and evidently something's up. Any conjecture is under embargo, as there is one chance in a dozen that a guess might hit the truth. Two or three steamers are constantly busy towing the barges for the bridge into place, while others ply mysteriously off to points up and down the river."

SHELLING OUT A REBEL CAMP ON THE POTOMAC.

WE have had heretofore to compliment Lieutenant Tompkins, of the 1st United States Artillery, for his excellent services. We have now to illustrate a recent incident, where, observing on the other side of the Potomac a rebel camp, he fixed one of his guns, and after one or two trials, got the range so perfectly that they fled in the greatest confusion. Despite the start the rebels got by Floyd's complicity, it does not seem that their artillery has ever accomplished what ours has done. We have repeatedly compelled them to break up their camps, while they have never yet once reached ours. They may have a numerous artillery, but it is certainly not one of long range, as evidenced by Mathias Point, Sewall's Point and other places. Our guns on the Rip-Raps reach the rebel batteries, but not one shot has gone near Fort Calhoun.

REVIEW OF THE BERDAN RIFLE REGIMENT.

IT must be confessed that science, if not secretly provocative of ultra caution, yet takes from men that bovine daring which constitutes, in the public eye, the chief attraction of war and stamps men as heroes. And yet the agency of science in war is older than Archimedes, who, with his burning lens—if we are to credit Roman historians—set fire to the galleys of the enemy when they came within the focus of his silent battery at Syracuse. It is only within the last few years that the rifle has been brought to play its part en masse in war; a rifle, twenty years ago, was like a Toledo blade—too expensive for common use—and it is only within the last eight years that mechanical science has manufactured thousands to the one formerly made. This, of course, will in time equalise itself; but there seems to be little doubt that England's manufacturing skill saved her at Inkermann and the Tchernaya. Our wealth and skill will serve us equally well in the present unhappy conflict, for although the rebels, through the satanic villany of Floyd, stole a march upon us at the beginning yet we are fast recovering our ground, and every day will increase our advantages.

From the very commencement of the present war we have felt the want of that most necessary of all adjuncts to an invading army—sharpshooters—what the whiskers are to a cat, and the antennæ to an insect, sharpshooters are to an advancing corps. They are at once life and safety to the advance, and death and danger to the foe. Like all great commercial nations, the United States found herself terribly deficient in this most necessary arm, and the Government therefore accepted with promptitude the offer made by Mr. Berdan, one of the most celebrated of our shots, to raise a regiment of riflemen. He was, as a matter of course, appointed the Colonel. We have, from time to time, chronicled their progress in their camp at Weehawken, which their trials of skill made quite a famous spot—ominously inaugurated as it was sixty years ago by the death of Hamilton by the hand of Aaron Burr. Our present number contains a sketch of the review of Berdan's riflemen by General McClellan on their arrival in Washington. A spectator thus describes the scene our Artist has sketched:

"This afternoon an exhibition in target practice was given by Colonel Berdan's Sharpshooters at Camp Burnside. The target was about six feet long by three wide, with two men, life size, painted upon it and the distance fired was three-quarters of a mile. Out of 240 shots 130 hit the target, and nearly all the other shots struck very near it. Among those present were the President, who rode on the field in an open barouche, accompanied by the Prince de Joinville and Secretary Seward. The Prince's suite and two sons followed in a carriage. The party were received by the troops in fine style. The President reviewed the regiment. At a late hour Major-General McClellan and staff, including Generals Stoneman and Van Vliet, with Captain Barker's cavalry escort, arrived on the field. The General immediately rode up to the President and gracefully raised his hat and paid his respects to his Excellency and the Secretary of State. He next turned his charger and rode to the rear and dismounted, and then returned to the Presidential group, where he entered into conversation with the Prince de Joinville and suite, and the Prince's two sons.

"General McClellan walked down the lines of the troops, looking every man in the eye, and afterwards watched with interest the progress of the shooting. He complimented the men for their skill, and expressed his gratification to Colonel Berdan at the neatness and excellent discipline that pervaded the camp, which is greatly due to Lieutenant Colonel Mears, recently detailed from the regular army, and who has labored industriously to perfect the men in drill and camp duties.

"There were also present General McDowell and staff, General Meigs and staff, General Mansfield and staff, Colonel Scott, Assistant Secretary of War, and Chief Clerk Leslie, of the War Department, and numerous other army officers of distinction.

"Among the distinguished foreigners present was Captain Stevenson, commander of the celebrated field battery of Montreal. A large number of ladies and citizens of Washington were present. The affair was successful, so far as the shooting was concerned, and was highly interesting to the spectators."

REBEL SALUTE IN HONOR OF THE BATTLE OF STONE BRIDGE, FIRED IN RICHMOND.

A correspondent has sent us a sketch of the rejoicing manifested by the rebels when the news reached them of the battle of Stone Bridge, as they call the Bull Run fiasco, for it was won on both sides—indeed, as the victory remained with neither party, the less said about it the better. Our sketch is taken from the front of Gov. Letcher's mansion, and represents the firing of the salute from the front of the State House, in honor of the battle.

SAMUEL J. KIRKWOOD, GOVERNOR OF IOWA.

Samuel J. Kirkwood was born in Harford county, Indiana, in 1813 and received the usual simple education of the State. His father was a farmer, and young Samuel spent his days in agricultural and his evenings in more intellectual pursuits. But to a young and ambitious mind a rural life is only a vegetable state of existence, and in his 16th year the future Governor of Iowa was found serving ipecacuanha and mixing prescriptions in his brother's drug store in Washington city. A few years of this dry drudgery sufficed the future Governor, and in 1835 he went to Mansfield, Ohio, where, abandoning Æsculapius for Themis, he turned his attention from rhubarb to law. He was soon admitted to the bar, and such was his genial nature and close attention to the business of his clients, that he was elected Prosecuting Attorney for that district without any serious opposition. In 1851 he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention from Richland county. Here his moderation, vigor and admirable temper made him quickly conspicuous. In 1855 he removed into Iowa State, where his fame had already preceded him, and the very next year he was chosen to represent the Iowa City District in the State Legislature. In 1859 he was nominated by the Republican State Convention as its candidate for Governor, and elected by a large majority over ex-Senator A. C. Dodge.

Till 1854 Governor Kirkwood was a Jacksonian Democrat, but the progressive spirit of the age, and the unblushing corruption of the Democratic party, drove him into the Republican ranks. In manner and dress he is a simple, unpretending man. He is a plain and forcible speaker. He generally resides on his farm, which is one of about 1,200 acres, and two miles west of Iowa city, on the Iowa river. He is universally respected, and is called the Farmer Governor.

THE PULASKI MONUMENT, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

The noteworthy cunning with which the Cotton States have made Virginia their catspaw has concentrated upon that unhappy mother of Presidents so much attention, as to throw the other States quite into the background. This is, however, as much caused by climate as circumstance. The advent of winter will change the venue, and very soon Charleston, Savannah, Mobile and New Orleans will feel, in "their own proper persons," some portion of the suffering that others feel already, and will continue to feel, in the shape of commercial distress and family bereavements. It seems to be the general opinion that at this minute the hand of our official Jove is about to hurl a thunderbolt at either Charleston or Savannah. We therefore give our readers in the present number a sketch of the Pulaski Monument, in the city of Savannah, erected, it is hardly necessary to add, to the memory of that gallant Pole, who fought so nobly for the independence of that Union the infatuated rebels are now so madly endeavoring to destroy. When the rebellion first broke out, and the Charlestonians sank hulks at the entrance of their harbor, the selfish men of Savannah rejoiced, inasmuch as they hoped it would build up their port at the expense of their infatuated sister; but the blockade has entirely frustrated such hopes, and trade is quite at a standstill in Savannah. It was till the present year a place of much commerce, containing about 36 000 inhabitants. It is situated 18 miles from the sea, and 96 miles south of Charleston. Its chief staples are cotton and rice.

The monument commonly called the Pulaski monument is situated in Johnson or Monument Square. It is a fine Doric shaft of marble 53 feet in height. The base of the pedestal is 10 feet four inches by six feet eight inches, and the elevation is about 11 feet. The corner stone was laid by Lafayette during his visit to the United States in 1825. The needle which surmounts the pedestal is 17 feet high. Another and very elegant structure has also been erected to the memory of the gallant foreigner in Chippewa Square. Pulaski was killed in the attack made by the allied American and French armies in 1779, when the British held possession of Savannah.

GRAND REVIEW OF CAVALRY AND ARTILLERY IN VIRGINIA.

On the 24th of September General McClellan held a grand review of cavalry and artillery, which went off with great eclat. The troops consisted of two full regiments of cavalry, the 6th regular and the Keokuck Volunteers, together with seven companies of the Lincoln, Ira Harris and Cameron Guards as had their horses and sabres. These made up about 2,000 men, and in addition there were eight batteries of U. S. Regular Flying Artillery, comprising 48 heavy rifled and howitzer field pieces, with caissons, carriages, horses, riders and gunners, in full quota. The review was held on a broad level country one mile east of the Capitol, at about three o'clock, P. M. It will be remembered that the camps of these regiments are situated near the extremities of Seventh and Fourteenth streets, and consequently the troops had to ride about three miles before they reached their parade ground. The gave the inhabitants a capital opportunity of seeing them on their way to their martial scene of action. Thousands of men, women and children thronged after them, and it was a most animated scene. On the ground the troops were gathered over most of the area of the plain of Kalorama. President, his wife, and Mr. Cameron, and Generals McClellan and Scott, and the Duke de Chartres, with the suite of the Comte de Paris and Duc de Chartres—rode upon the ground, and were received with an gun.

few stores that remain open are principally for the accommodation of our troops. Terrible has this wicked little town paid for its senseless and malignant treason. The Town Hall, of which we give an exact sketch, is now devoted to military purposes, we hope so it is to be restored to its more legitimate functions. Alexandria is well defended by entrenchments around it, the principal of which is Fort Ellsworth, built on Shooter's Hill. We gave a view of this fortification in No. 300.

ACCIDENT ON THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.

On the evening of September 19th, about half-past eight, as a train, carrying Col. Forchin's 19th Illinois regiment, was passing over a bridge, near Huron, Ind., about 150 miles west of Cincinnati, 18 from Mitchell, and 52 from Vincennes, the bridge broke, and the train fell through, and the cars, crowded with soldiers, were precipitated into the creek. The bridge had a span of 60 feet, and was 30 feet high. The cars consisted, the engine No. F, G and I, mustering about 250 men. The killed were 38, and the wounded 107. It was at first thought that the bridge had been tampered with by the rebels, but a careful investigation has shown it was the result of that wicked indifference to human life which has caused most railroad accidents, but even exceeding those of New York, on the same platform with other criminals.

The Coroner's jury reports that after an examination of the bridge and others built of the same materials, they conclude that the accident was not occasioned by any insufficiency of timbers or iron work, but from the breaking down of the bridge when the train was west end of the bridge. As the locomotive, when it met no obstruction, got over the bridge safely, the latter end, we suppose from marks on the timbers, misplaced by bolts and crossties, which threw the remainder of the cars from the track as they entered the bridge, thus precipitating them against the truss and cords, and breaking the bridge down, and not from any weakness or decay of timber.

REMARKABLE DISCOVERY IN THE ALPS.

Travel is news from Switzerland, even an English paper, which painfully recalls the memory of a terrible catastrophe which happened on the Grand Plateau of Mont Blanc, on the 20th of August, 1820. On that day a party, consisting of Dr. Hamel and some gentlemen from Geneva, started up the mountain, accompanied by several guides. A descending avalanche swept off three of the latter, by name Auguste Tairraz, Pierre Balmat and Pierre Carrier, the latter of whom was a relative of the celebrated Jacques Balmat, the hunter of the mountain. From that day, up to the 15th of this month, not a trace of them was ever discovered; on that morning was discovered on the lower part of the Glacier des Bossons, a number of human remains and fragments of dress, accoutrements, &c., which have been recognized to have belonged to these hapless guides. These relics are stated to consist of:

1. An arm in the most perfect state of preservation, with the hand, fingers, nails skin and dried frozen flesh intact, in no ways discolored, part of linen shirt sleeve only gone. The length of this limb extends to the elbow.

2. Parts of two different skulls, with a good deal of hair remaining with the skin on both; one belonging to a fair man, the other to a dark one. The hair most wonderfully preserved in color, &c. One of these fragments was recognized by Julian Devouassoux (a nephew of the 1820 ascent), as being that of Pierre Balmat.

3. Part of a guide's knapsack, with sundry portions of a hunters attached to it.

4. An iron crampon, which the guides at that date strapped on their shoes when they crossed a glacier, to prevent slipping.

5. Several portions of guides' dress, namely, such torn portions of the clothes as would be worn away, all sandy dirtied pieces belonging to men of the guide class.

Two of the guides who accompanied the party of 1820 are still alive, and it is said that Dr. Hamel still survives in England. The most interesting circumstance in connection with this recovery of the remains of these long ago mysterious men is, that it is in exact fulfillment of Professor James D. Forbes's prediction, based on his observations and knowledge of the laws which guide the motions of the glaciers. Professor Forbes, it is stated, has recently visited the Chamouni guides that they might look out for traces of these departed men, and in the Lower Valley of the Glacier des Bossons after the ice-torrent, and the discovery, therefore, we may deduce a satisfactory demonstration of the glacier theory now accepted by men of science.

the line, and carefully scrutinized the equipment, arms and bearing of the troops. He then inspected the artillery, which is of a far heavier calibre than that used at Bull Run. Eight batteries, numbering 48 heavy guns, then rode in front of the line before the young Commander-in-Chief, and elicited his hearty approval. The shout the review, and by sundown the glorious pageant was over.

SCENE IN A STATION-HOUSE CELL, WASHINGTON CITY.

Since the appointment of the present Provost Marshal, General Porter, there has been a marked improvement in the whole discipline of the Washington. Till then, too many of our officers imbibed at Willard's and other fashionable bars, while their men drank at the lower groggeries. The result was a saturnalia of drunkenness and disorder in the streets, which reminded us of Bull Run. As a specimen of the fleeting material that once carried away and slept under the roof of the station-house, we give a sketch of one of the vigilant officers of General Porter. Inside is a coloured lord in the dormitory of a station house cell, our artist sketched on a stretch of the hospitality of the place which he found our early morning in the cell of a station-house. Such scenes are of course more or less common in all free countries during the hilarity of a soldiers' dissipation. Too much credit cannot be given to our energetic Provost Marshal for the desperate firmness he has shown during the trying inauguration of a system so novel to our great Republic.

TOWN HALL AND MARKET PLACE, ALEXANDRIA.

Even since the memorable 24th of April, when the chivalrous young Ellsworth, at the head of the ill-assured regiment of Fire Zouaves, took possession of Alexandria, it has remained in the possession of the Federal forces, most of the inhabitants having left. Its once well filled houses are now comparatively empty and closed up, and the

Another committee of practical men, appointed on the part of the road, made substantially the same report.

Murder is murder, whether directly thrown the means of the revolver and the knife, or hurriedly through the overpaid Railroad Director and his half paid employé. We commend to the attention of the Grand Jury the recent disaster in Lincoln, England, where the Secretary of the Brigadier Railroad has been committed to prison, and the signal man also, upon the testimony of the latter, and for manslaughter.

The correspondent of the Tribune, who passed shortly after this appalling accident, thus recounts the dreadful scene: "On the positive news, I enjoyed the melancholy privilege of witnessing, shortly after the catastrophe, the scene which on the accident train No. 1 now was buried upon sudden, frightful and inglorious death. To describe the shrieking and heartrending scenes transcends the power of words. Just in the grey dawn, in the midst of a thick and drizzling mist which added horror to still the hour, while the dripping leaves were burdened nature's tears for the unresisting slain, I stood at the fatal bridge. In the dense and lonely woods, and saw mangled and shapeless heaps which had once been men drawn by dozens from the wreck. Broken muskets, shattered cannisters, torn and bloody blankets, tatters of uniform dripping with gore, were scattered in wild confusion. Large deer were running in many places, and the wounded lay around these, writhing in agony, vainly trying to staunch the blood, while the dead lay motionless slowly along the ground or extending their bloodless, cold hands to the pitying sky above. Many a strong man's cheek was pointed out as having once been a gallant officer, while more than one poor fellow literally dismembered was still alive. No battlefield could surpass the scene in horrors, while every interesting feature, every resounding association of the battle-field—Hospital Service, the glad firing, the noble cause for which it is swept to die, the compensating deeds of heroism—all these were wanting. Sole the Illinois, that by the darkest hour of the need, we the more deplore you because you missed the rich excitement of death upon the battle-field, because to you the voice of death was not that proudest word in whose hollow tones are heard the thanks of millions yet to be."

GRIPE OF CONSUMPTION.—The new Act (24th and 25th Victoria, cap. 91) makes persons, on request of the Act being given to the person who has power, or he omitting from alleged immediate motives, to be even in criminal proceedings. Any person called in a witness to any court of criminal jurisdiction in England or Ireland, required or desirous to answer on affair, refusing or being unwilling from alleged unwholesome answer to be sworn, or to be personally bound by recognizance to appear and being sworn duly to answer, and to give evidence, may commit a serious offence, and be punished by imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years. Any person who, being a natural born subject of Her Majesty, or a denizen of the United Kingdom, or any part of the British dominions, and who also accepts any warrant, office or commission from any foreign prince, state or potentate, or foreign colony, or foreign authority, civil or military, exercising within the United Kingdom or any part of the British dominions any authority or jurisdiction, without the leave of Her Majesty, shall be guilty of felony. THE SWEET LITTLE MAN.

Dedicated to the Stay-at-Home Rangers.

Now, while our soldiers are fighting our battles,
Each at his post to do all that he can,
Brave young rebels and contraband cattle,
What are you doing, my sweet little man?

All the brave boys under canvas are sleeping,
All of them pressing to march with the van,
Far from the home where their sweethearts are weeping;
What are you waiting for, sweet little man?

You with your delicate marble complexion,
Fit for a colonel or chief of a clan,
You with your manly and resolute action,
Where are your shoulder-straps, sweet little man?

Say, has the bombazine counter designed you?
Gave he his love-lock a trifle and tan
Measur'd by calico and Gauze on the Common,
That is the cry for the sweet little man?

Give him for sword a fair ell of young muslin,
Each of them armed with deadly name;
Then shall the foeman from hamper and bodice
Almost by low logs at the sweet little man.

All the fair cohorts that follow the standard
Black the white footsteps he leaves and has,
Make him a colonel, a knight, or a field-officer—
Type is too small for the sweet little man!

Oh, but the Ageing-string dowels are the fellows!
Each of them kicks at the end of a span;
Handle your sticking-plaster bravely, you rebs!
That is the style for the sweet little man.

Have we a nation to save? In the first place
Have we a country? Of course we have can.
Briefly (as our lively thews'r always briefer)
We're going to whip the sweet little man.

Catch me confining my poems with strangers!
Those few remain who are known to the van
In the brigade of the Stay-at-Home Rangers
Have got a corner, may they stand by the man.

Such are the staff of the Mikado's wives,
Such were the dames in the tent-scene at Astley;
Theodore Hook recruits and loves cheery dancers
Brave as the whole of the Stay-at-Home Rangers.

Tield into the stirrups, my gunnery masters!
Some good practice before, and plenty after!
Fire is a charm in a moment of misfortune,
And in a battle, my sweet little man.

When the red flame of the last infidel thunders
Burns our encampment—after a battle,
When the cool work is—the chiefly sweetness,
Then will the Stay-at-Home Rangers be missed.

When the brave soldiers come back from the border,
How will he look who is missed from the throng?
How will he feel when he gets marching orders,
Signed by the lady he's most fain to please?

Fear not for him, though the rebels extend him—
Life's to be saved as well as a throne;
We can but brown-stitch coal-rake to protect him,
Till he shall fall for the sweet little man.

Now then, ship cheers for the Stay-at-Home Rangers!
Blow the great drum and the fife to the big man!
Fast in the field that is farther from fun at
Take your win to make game, sweet little man!

ERLE GOWER.

OR, THE

SECRET MARRIAGE.

By Pierce Egan.

CHAPTER LXIX.

Erle Gower, excited by his recent interview with Beatrice Stanhope, and as well by the sordid appearance of her father elsewhere in his mission to the Spa, was on his way to Pengerry's residence at Brighton. He was followed by the exact same by endeavour, to found the way long and laborious, and, therefore, the more difficult to trace. Erle Gower's mind was, consequently, difficult to read; but the reader will soon be made acquainted with it. Suffice it to say, that he reflected upon what he'd transpired between Sir Harris Stanhope and himself, and the explanation he had had with Beatrice, and was convinced that the letter in the hotel had a trap ordered him been laid by Lord Kingswood in spirit of revenge, for the disappointment he had met with in not succeeding in the plan agreed upon between them.

The door opened even while he thus reflected, and he perceived old Sarah Pengerry standing at the threshold, waiting, with a look of the most respectful appearance lighting up its wrinkled face.

Erle scrutinized the old woman's countenance up a flight of stairs to the room which led for a short visit across to his sitting-room. Old Pengerry pulled off his cap.

"Is Sir Harris Stanhope with Kingswood, Dobby first directed your steps hither; instead then, supposing you'd come to see me, I'd have no news to say that I know of, as I've not been out of doors until you have your own and I have mine—adieu!"

Erle stood himself at ease, and old Pengerry slid both hands into his shoulders, and stepping over him, looked into a fire.

"Sir Harris Stanhope is with Lord Kingswood," he said, to a short, reflective manner, "and Lord Kingswood, old boy, Horace Vernon, have subjected you to trial, but who but lord can tell the result?"

"I know full well of an opinion," returned Erle, "I was boldly manifested by Lord Kingswood, of Kingswood Hall, to end character in his own strong old enemy, by an affidavit, which I've no doubt will be forthcoming shortly. Fortunately the last such an oblique direction, placed from a rib, and passed through the heart, and the lungs, and the liver, and the kidneys, and finally entered the thick muscles of the back."

"An enemy," mused Pengerry, "an enemy," he repeated, with deep amazement. "Do you mean to say, Erle Gower, that you have to believe that Lord Kingswood placed a blind ruffian in the chaise to say you by a stranger?"

Unsentimentally and unfeared Erle, quickly and emphatically. "His lordship has been my enemy from the first moment I entered his presence."

Dobby no more spoke, but he pondered, he, I presume, took that mode of to clog the dreary sick reliance between us.

"Any," cried Pengerry, "I can't see why you should be so much annoyed that you had honor your head—Lord the brand, but so I perceived that you had a hole in your head, and that you had been shot through it."

Erle gave his attention to the Kingswood Hotel, you had wrestled a warrant, and the next day Sir Harris Stanhope, Lord Kingswood, and Horace Vernon, Esq., were all in the room, and Erle, you had been found against your life, and what is to place your name?

"Mr. Pengerry, Dobby," he said, "I am not to be found, I am returned Erle, briefly, "and the name of the individual who fired at me can be found in the person of Sir Harris Stanhope, and also in the person of Horace Vernon, Esq."

"You don't know, you can't tell," exclaimed old Pengerry, sharply. "One special reason you may be sure of, and that is, that you have been shot by you by, I presume, that the gunner's hiding person would be hastened."

"Sir Harris Stanhope," said Erle, "is not the man to do such a thing, but that the spirit in which you are alluding has nothing to do with the object of my visit to you."

"It appears to be very much connected with it," was Pengerry's rejoinder, somewhat pompous. "The third person is a witness, and a very important one, Erle. Any person who has been shot through the head, and who has lived to tell their could be the name of the third person, and that person is Lord Kingswood."

"It is quite evident, I see in this chamber that I had a serious and a deadly enemy," replied Erle, "and I am convinced that I have a serious and a deadly enemy in Lord Kingswood. I have taken up a place when the fire is said was the letter may be. It was a letter which I received from Sir Harris and in Kingswood Hall, and which I have in my possession. I have every as all within the household, to suspect a thing at times the most trifling, of importance. I have, in fact, made it a study to observe and to reflect, and not to overpass the most trifling circumstance which would enable me to investigate the cause of the plot by which I stood betwixt Lord Kingswood's wealth and the young lady to whom I am engaged. Now, I will tell you of those very ambitious, these machinations, which have and may still, I want both, I are and how. One, indeed, will suggest—and suggestion, I am of opinion, is the best—and do you remain in ignorance of the whole affair of the murderous thing. I, myself, will be the best judge of what is to be done. I will, if the latter, the worst could have or my advice. I am, therefore, to request that you will not interfere with me, or with my affairs, in regard to Lord Kingswood."

"I can do this, and I will, for your hour and mine is come I" exclaimed old Pengerry, with a peculiar calmness.

He rose and went out of the room with a hurried step and an excited manner, and re-arrived with the packet of papers which had been plucked from him by Horace and Albertina Pharaoe, see Virgo, and which he had recovered in an extraordinary manner.

"Your title, your estates, your name, honor, happiness are contained in this packet," continued Pengerry, "and I have kept it a secret for long-enough confessions. They were never lost, but, on the contrary, were placed with a growing sort of charity. They were all left in the hands of Lord Kingswood. But I had a complete real my results, by a kind of formal marriage romance, Mr. Albertina Virgo, and my housekeeper also, was placed as Mrs. Dobby. I discovered, by an accident, that Lord Kingswood had a clandestine intention with the view of Lord Kingswood. I detected that some plan was in agitation between them, and I was resolved to be on the alert. I discovered that the secret adopter Virgo was in Kingswood Hall Estates. This alarmed, I placed a watch upon my house, and my vigilance was rewarded by my spy detecting Phaeton and Virgo in the act of forcing the bureau, and opening the drawers, and enabled me to come up with them at the moment the robber of the packet was about to make his escape. I secured the packet, and here it is."

"Sir," he said, "my friend Erle, with sorrowful exclamation.

Old Pengerry looked at him with astonishment. "Did me how much of your history Vernon has communicated to you."

"Absolutely nothing," replied Erle, "a word or even hint," replied Erle, quickly.

"Then," replied," he rejoined with a sneer. "If you received any suggestion, comment, or communication regarding your origin from any other person?"

"No, with a sneer," replied Erle, "I have not as yet seen Lord Kingswood Hall and no intercourse with Dibs.

The owner of the old mansion was long-lost and remarkable affair upon old Pengerry. He listened with as memory at the time to every word Erle uttered, and when he had done, he sat for a few minutes in silence, with his head resting on his hand.

"Strange as a wonderful," he muttered. "The last fact said in his hour. There is no doubt!" He rose from his seat. "There is no room for disputation of course when both the power to make revelations as that which is revealed, Erle, young gentleman, I have the honor to address."

"Sir, Stanhope Hall."

"Erle, you are the individual before Erle, and said, as he commanded to open the packet which he had brought back with him.

"I have no book, in order that you may clearly comprehend your own history, and the motives which have been the cause of the plot laid for your life. The mother of Erle was young and exceedingly lovely. She was a kingswood, but by a very distant relation. Lord Kingswood was strongly to court her person, in being the son of her daughter and of Lord Kingswood—"

"Sir," said Erle, interrupting him, "I am aware of the circumstance of him to whom you address."

"If consequently," continued Pengerry, "could proceed to complete your identities—to your true mother of your father, and your right name."

"I am aware of the circumstance of him to whom you address."

"Sir, I am aware of the circumstance of him to whom you address."

THE HUMORS OF A PRISON—SCENE IN A STATION-HOUSE CELL, WASHINGTON, AFTER THE APPOINTMENT OF THE PROVOST MARSHAL, GEN. PORTER.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST IN WASHINGTON.—SEE PAGE 327.

As he counselled so Erle performed. He took the box in his hands, and knelt at the pedestal of the Lady Maud. Then he lifted the lid, and withdrew from within a parchment manuscript of several pages.

Erle turned his eyes to the manuscript. It was written in a rough, bold hand, but in a character which if he had not been learned in the written lore of the period he would have been unable to decipher.

He proceeded to read, in a low tone, quivering with excitement, as follows:

"I, Baron Erle of Kingswood, do here make confession to him, or to her, or to them who may discover the secret hiding-place in which I shall deposit this writing, of my most dreadful deed of guilt. My cousin, Lady Maud, of Brightstowe, deprived of both parents by the inroads and ravagiegs of murderers and plunderers acting under warrants falsely purporting to be signed by Henry VIII, of that day king, was brought up within the Hall of Kingswood, a charge left to my father and to my mother, to cherish and to protect. We were reared as brother and sister, and then it seemed that between us much affection did not exist. But when I sprang towards manhood I found that her exceeding beauty had won my heart in spite of her cold reserve. I was, perhaps, not fitted to play the soft wooer in a lady's chamber, for the wild sports of the chace were with me a passion; but I loved her. She who had been frank with me in childhood was coy when I appeared, or sought pretexts to evade my presence. I tried then to draw her attention to my love by garlanding her favorite white fawn with the fairest flowers I could gather. One eve I found her in a coppice with her fawn; she was caressing it, and she kissed the flowers I had placed around its neck. I broke through the thicket and threw myself at her feet. I told my love, and after I had passionately urged her to return my love, she imprinted a kiss upon my forehead, and I called her my own. She was not my own; at least, another claimed her. (Continued from page 331.)

"Walter Avon! Black Walter of Hawkesbury dared to lift his accursed eyes to her, to seek her, waylay her, to pour lying words in her ear against me! So that when she met me she would turn pale and weep, would shrink from my embrace, and too often gaze reproachfully at me. I did not then understand the cause. It was explained to me by a follower of Black Walter's, who avorred that the Lady Maud—spotless as the untrodden snow—met Walter Avon in the Chace, and wandered with him there. He told me further of an assignation they had made to meet at sunset, in the hunting-lodge, at that time without a tenant, for I had begun to lose my taste for sport, and preferred wandering alone and in cruel thought in the thickness of the wood. When I heard the ruffian's statement dark thoughts stirred within me. I resolved to attend the assignation too. The sun set that night in a glowing crimson flood, as if to foreshadow the terrible event in which I was to make so grim an actor.

I had sworn to myself that if I found the story true I would slay her, and hack him limb from limb. As I approached the thicket leading to the lodge I fancied I heard a woman's scream; but a bird flew away from a tree above my head, screeching as it wont. I thought no more o the scream—but my quick and practised eye caught sight of something moving towards the end of the thicket. I ran onwards at the top of my speed, breathless I reached the lodge, and found the door open. I heard a heavy footstep ascending the stone staircase, and I sprang up the steps. I entered a room and saw, seated on a chair, Walter Avon, with Lady Maud in his arms. Her face lay reclining upon his shoulder; blood mounted to my brain, ran into my eyes, through my veins, into my hands. Like lightning I unsheathed my sword—oh, God!—I buried it to the hilt in her body! As I drew it out, ensanguined with her blood, he leaped to his feet. I caught Maud—dead! dead!—in my arms, and I made a deadly blow at him, but only gashed his face. He drew a dagger, and retreated to the door. I followed, striking at him as we leaped, rather than descended the stairs. Then he turned and fled. I followed him, but, encumbered with the bleeding body of Maud, I could not keep pace with him, and he escaped I turned into a glade; I laid the lifeless body on the grass; I bound up the ghastly wound, and while in the act of lifting her, a ghostly monk from the Abbey of Kingswood stayed my hand.

"'Who has done this murder?' he said, sternly and fiercely.

"'If it be murder, then the act is mine,' I answered, angrily, for I liked not the bitter expression on his face

"'Cain,' he cried, pointing to her pale, calm face, 'she is thy near kith.'

"I raised my fist and felled him to the earth. He arose, blood rushing from his mouth, and levelling his finger at me, cried:

"'Accursed! The brand of Cain be on thy brow and upon thine hand. Thou shalt not rest on earth nor after death, thou nor thine, nor those to come after thee, until one bearing thy name shall mingle his blood with hers who now lies bleeding there. And so shall doomsday come ere one of thy now accursed race shall lift the doom you have called down upon them and their heirs for ever!'

"He fled from me or I should have slain him. But his words lay heavy on my soul. I raised the body of Maud from the crimson turf, and bore her by a secret passage into the chamber adjoining the library, and laid her upon the bed. All that night I tried to restore her to life but in vain. Then troubled thoughts of my fate, if charged with her murder, haunted me, and in much agony of mind I cast about what to do with the body. At length I bethought me of a chest which had been sent to me from across sea, of cunning device in respect to its locks. It stood within the library. Within that chest I placed the remains of Lady Maud, and locked it; the key I place in the ebony box with this manuscript. Years have passed since that dreadful time. Black Walter disappeared after that night of horror, no one knew whither; but I learned after his departure that I had been deceived; that he had taken steps to poison the mind of beloved Maud against me, and that he had on the fearful night on which I slew her, inveigled her to the wood. On meeting her there he, upon her refusal to speak to him, seized her with the intention of carrying her off; she fainted; he fled with her in his arms; I pursued. What follows I have recited. I have kept my dreadful secret. I dare reveal it in no other fashion than this, for I have a beloved boy upon whose name I would not cast taint. The loss of Lady Maud at the time caused great consternation, but as I conducted the search for her, no tidings were obtained respecting her. The monk perished miserably, having been set on by a mob of peasantry, and for aught I know, revealed not what he saw that night. I have caused a statue to be made to the memory of Lady Maud. It bears the date of her death, and I have appended to it the words, 'The Unavenged,' forasmuch as Black Walter hitherto hath escaped my vengeance. But he has returned to his home, he hath set rumors afloat concerning my crime, and I go to meet him in mortal combat. Should I fall I shall leave a Kingswood to draw atonement for Lady Maud from the blood of an Avon. For until a Kingswood shall hold the life of an Avon within his grasp, so long will Lady Maud remain unavenged, so long the doom rest on the House of Kingswood. I testify to the truth of what I have here written. Maud, murdered saint! have mercy on me! May God assoil my soul!

"ERLE, BARON OF KINGSWOOD."

There the document ended. Erle drew a long, deep breath, and rose up and gazed on the soft, sweet face of the statue. A tear sprang into his eye.

Pengreep whispered in his ear—

"Erle, Baron of Kingswood, fell by the hand of Walter Avon. So has it been down to the father of Lord Kingswood, who, it is whispered, met his death foully at the hands of the late Sir Philip Avon."

"So shall it be no longer, I swear," cried Erle, with intense emotion. "I have had the life of Philip Avon quivering on the point of my sword and fluttering round my bullet; I, a Kingswood, have drawn the blood of an Avon, and Lady Maud, the Unavenged, I will avenge you!"

"Come, come let us examine the chest," cried Pengreep, with trembling lip, "the secret is not yet all revealed."

Erle, highwrought by what he had read, found his hand tremble so he could scarcely turn the key in the lock. He well remembered the secret spot wherein to insert it. The sharp, sudden click with which the bolt shot back in the lock made them both start.

At the same moment the blood of Pengreep chilled, and his hair seemed to slowly rise up. He clutched Erle by the wrist, and whispered,

"Heard you that?"

Both at one instant heard the sweeping rustle of silk and the sound of light footsteps rapidly approaching them; but though they strained their eyeballs until they ached they could see nothing.

A solemn, deathlike stillness ensued. Erle silently pointed to the chest, and both exerting their strength, lifted up the lid. The hinges gave forth a harsh, grating noise as they raised it, and it fell back against the wall with a sound like thunder.

With hearts beating with violence, they paused and listened, but the same deathlike stillness reigned as before, there appeared no signs of interruption from the household.

Erle raised up the lamp, and they both cast their eyes within the chest.

There, coiled up, muffled as it were in a cloud of silk, which seemed to shrink into dust as they gazed upon it, lay a skeleton; a glittering gem sparkled upon the neck, and jewels and pearls gleamed upon the wrist.

A groan burst from the lips of Erle as he beheld the ghastly object crouching where it had been thrust on the night of the cruel murder—lying where it had been deposited, without moving or being moved, for three hundred years.

"The Ladye Maud," he murmured, in a deep and solemn undertone.

"The Unavenged avenged," exclaimed old Pengreep.

"Not yet," rejoined Erle, with knitted brows.

"The dawn has come!" responded Pengreep.

"Ay, and it shall be day ere long," said Erle, with a bitter emphasis.

Pengreep uttered suddenly an exclamation of horror.

"Holy Heaven!" he ejaculated, in accents of absolute terror. "Who comes here?"

He pointed down the library. Swiftly approaching them advanced a figure clothed in white.

Erle pressed his hand upon his heart to keep down its wild throbbing.

"The Lady Maud St. Clair!" he exclaimed, in scarcely audible tones.

OBITUARY.

HON. WILLIE P. MANGUM, of North Carolina, died at his residence in Orange county, in that State, on September 11, at the age of 69 years. For some years he had suffered with paralysis, and it is probable that the recent death of his only son, from a wound received on the field of Manassas, depressed his spirit to a point from which he could not rally. He was born in Orange county, North Carolina, in 1792, and graduated at the University of that State in 1815. He studied law, rose to eminence in his profession, engaged in politics, and was elected to the House of Commons in his State in 1818. In 1819 he was elected a Judge of the Superior Court of North Carolina, and from 1823 to 1826 served as a representative in Congress. He was elected a United States Senator in 1831, re-elected in 1841, and for a third term in 1848. In 1837 North Carolina gave him her 11 electoral votes for the Presidency of the Union, and during Tyler's administration he was President of the United States Senate. His political preference favored the Whig party, but since 1853 he has entirely abandoned the political arena and lived in retirement

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE DEFENDERS OF THE UNION.—This is the title of a very fine engraving just published by Goupil & Co., 772 Broadway, embracing portraits, well grouped, of Generals Scott, McClellan, Butler, Dix, Fremont, Siegel, Wool, McDowell, Banks, Heintzelman, Anderson, and Commodore Stringham. They are all truthfully executed, with the exception of that of Dix, which bears more resemblance to Lamartine than any other modern.

JAMES G. GREGORY (successor to Townsend & Co.), 46 Walker street, has published Key's "Star Spangled Banner" and Drake's "American Flag" in thin but sumptuous quartos, with all the glories of illuminated covers by Hows, wood cut illustrations by Darley, and music by various composers. Every taste is consulted in their production, and they are beautiful, useful, and appropriate contributions to the centre table and piano

WAR NEWS.

Storming of Romney.

ON Monday, September 23d, 500 men of the 4th Ohio regiment, one piece of artillery, the Ringgold Cavalry, and 400 of the 8th Ohio regiment, on Monday advanced from New Creek, Western Virginia, toward Romney. They found a rebel force 700 strong, at Mechanicsville Gap, and drove them out; they then passed on and stormed Romney, driving the enemy, 1,400 strong, to the mountains, with the loss of 35 killed and many wounded. The national loss amounted to three killed and 10 wounded.

Skirmish in Force near Washington.

GENERAL SMITH, with 5,000 men, on the 25th, made an advance beyond the Chain Bridge towards Lewinsville. The advance corps, consisting of 3,000 men and six pieces of artillery, halted about half a mile from Lewinsville. The guns were put in position on the right and left of the road, and skirmishers thrown out. The national forces then waited from half-past nine o'clock A. M., till three o'clock P. M., the enemy making no sign of an attack. In the meantime our men engaged themselves in loading wagons with hay and corn belonging to Lewinsville rebels. Finally the enemy appeared in force, consisting of at least four regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and six pieces of artillery, and opened a fire which was responded to. After the Union forces had thrown about twenty-six shot and shell, the rebels disappeared. The troops returned at five o'clock, with over 90 wagon loads of hay and one prisoner, and with the credit of having behaved admirably.

Fight at Papinsville, Missouri.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL LANE, of Kansas, surprised a superior force of rebels at Papinsville, Mo. on the 21st, and after a severe fight, routed them, losing 17 killed, and a large number wounded. The rebels lost 40 killed, 100 prisoners, and all of their tents, wagons and supplies.

Fight at Lucas Bend, Missouri.

FROM Cairo, we learn of a skirmish at Lucas Bend, on the Mississippi river, between a cavalry company, commanded by Captain Stewart, numbering 75, and a company of rebel cavalry. The latter were pursued into Jeff Thompson's camp at Belmont, with the loss of four killed, five captured, and many more wounded. The remainder scattered into the woods.

A German View of the War.

A LATE number of the Cologne (Prussia) Gazette, has an intelligent article on American affairs, from which we take the subjoined extract:

"The whole civilized world has an interest in this war. It is a war which the people of the Northern States, conservative by the nature of their industrial and political habits, could not longer put off; and it is a war which, under perhaps other names, many a nation of Europe will have to take up in its turn. It is with the United States as with us: the feudalism of the middle ages is arrayed in arms against the citizenship of the nineteenth century; an exploded theory of society is lifting up its head against the triumphs of our thinking, industrial and progressive century, the poverty-struck Don Quixotes of the Southern plantations give battle to the roaring windmills and smoking chimneys of the wealthy North. It is the supercilious noble in arms against the spirit of the century in which the citizen is supreme. In such an issue we can wish success only to the Constitutional Government."

PERSONAL.

A NUMBER of influential persons in California, admiring the noble and patriotic course pursued by Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, in the present conflict, have sent to Boston for his portrait, with the purpose of having a life-size likeness executed by one of their best native artists. The picture is designed for one of the public institutions of San Francisco.

REV. B. C. WARD, pastor of the Congregational Church in Geneseo, Illinois, has applied for and obtained authority to raise a company of infantry to be composed entirely of ministers of the Gospel. In his address to his fellow clergymen he says: "Christ now calls them out from behind their velvet cushioned barracks to meet the enemy face to face, with the hot shot of rifled artillery and the gleaming bayonet."

THE Tribune's Jenkins tells us that "Mrs. President Lincoln is engaged in qualifying herself for the more delicate exigencies of her exalted station. She is about to resume, under competent professors, the study of the French language, with which her early education made her familiar, but the practice of which has long been interrupted by the quiet but unceasing occupations of domestic life. We also understand that in other and similar ways Mrs. Lincoln proposes to add to the many accomplishments for which she is already distinguished, and which supply to the saloons of the White House its most brilliant adornments."

THE French Emperor and Empress are said to be fighting like cats and dogs over imputed derelictions of conjugal duty. The grandes dames of Europe refuse to visit the ci-devant Mdlle. Montijo. The King of Sweden saw no hostess at the Tuileries, for "when your royal visitors bring their royal wives I will be at home to assist in the reception"—and that is another cause of discord. So the story goes, half false, doubtless.

THE venerable Rev. John Pierpont, the poet, has accepted the position of chaplain of the 22d Massachusetts regiment.

THE Portsmouth Gazette, the oldest Democratic newspaper in New England, over 100 years established, gives notice of suspension, after one more issue, unless its revenues are largely increased.

THE Legislature of Virginia has repealed all the honors ever conferred upon General Scott, and ordered Scott county to be in future "Davis" county.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Evening Post says, "General Scott can never more take the field. He cannot mount a horse, he can scarcely ride in a carriage, but his mind is clear and vigorous, and his opinions are eagerly sought for. Still in his ashes glow their wonted fires."

PROFESSOR ALEXANDER DALLAS BACHE, Superintendent of the American Coast Survey, has been elected a Foreign Corresponding Member of the Academy of Sciences of the French Imperial Institute.

THE King of Prussia, commiserating the failure of the National Hymn Committee and the dearth of lyrical poetry in the Republic, has kindly sent over Prince Salm Salm. There is no story that he is in he stationed at Sing Sing.

THERE were two Barrons in the Revolution—Commodore James Barron and Captain Richard Barron—both in the Virginia navy. James had two sons, Samuel and James. The latter, late of the United States Navy, was the one who killed Decatur. It is his son, Samuel Barron, who was captured at Fort Hatteras.

MR. RUSKIN, the great art critic, is engaged on a volume of Swiss Sketches.

MR. ROSSITER, the painter, has made arrangements to receive at house, Cold Spring, a number of female pupils. The instructions of such an artist, and the picturesque charms of the scenery of the Highlands, will probably secure an early application from those anxious to avail themselves of such conspicuous advantages.

MEYERBEER has consented to compose a march for the opening ceremony in connection with the Exhibition of 1862.

REV. COL. MCCARTER, formerly of St. Paul's M. E. Church, in Philadelphia, is raising a regiment for the war, and has already enrolled 700 men.

LELAND STANFORD, the newly-elected Governor of California, is about 38 years of age. He is a son of Josiah Stanford, of West Troy, N. Y. He studied law in Albany, but for a few years past has been engaged in mercantile business in Sacramento.

MRS. SUSAN PARRISH, a wealthy and benevolent lady of this city, lately deceased, has left $1,000 to the Newsboys' Society.

COL. FRANK BLAIR has been released from arrest by Gen. Fremont, "for public reasons," and ordered to his regiment.

MESSRS. CHARLES MIEL, late of Harvard University, and Eugene Fezandie late Chief of Instruction in Paris, have opened an establishment at 10 Union Square, for instruction in the French language, through the medium of soirées, lectures and readings, beginning on the 1st of October. M. Fezandie bears the highest recommendations from M. Garcin de Tassy, and other distinguished members of the Institute of France

THE sanitary condition of the rebel army on the Potomac is described as shocking. The Charleston Mercury of August 22d says: "The frightful condition of the camp is the subject of universal interest and alarm. In the spirit of Spartan fortitude we are willing that our troops should be sacrificed, if need be, in the cause of the country. But that they should fall victims to the mismanagement of an inefficient department is utterly unendurable. It is not our business to depose and reform. But it is our duty to expose that inefficiency which is disastrous to the public welfare. Ten thousand lives are now in jeopardy through this folly. The fruits of the great battle of Manassas have been sacrificed to this almost criminal fatuity." A correspondent of the Savannah Republican states that "in a certain Mississippi regiment two-thirds of the entire command is on the sick list, and the deaths have reached as high as nine a day."

THE Government is now expending, it is said, about $1,000 000 per day. This sum is mainly distributed in the loyal States. Nominally, the outlay is to carry on a war, to crush out treason, to rub out rebellion. Practically, however, this immense sum is a premium to the industry of the loyal States. Not only do our brave soldiers and sailors receive an honorable recompense, but the money of the people employs our mechanics and operatives of many kinds, gives business to our factories and foundries, and to those who deal in all sorts of provisions and supplies. As the war goes on, its benefits to the home communities of loyal people will be more and more apparent.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

CHAPTER XVIII.—FACE TO FACE.

MY uncle was evidently on the point of being strangled, when Augustus interfered, by dragging Ornamel from his opponent by main force. The woman had recovered from her swoon and disappeared, before I thoroughly understood what was going on. I then saw Ornamel standing over Monsieur Charles, and casting a sullen, dissatisfied look at Augustus. Monsieur rose on his elbow and looked up savagely.

"You shall smart for this treatment," he growled. "Who is this madman?"

"Shall I tell you?" said Augustus, in a bantering tone; then, stooping down with a sardonic smile, he whispered something in my uncle's ear.

"It is false!" cried monsieur, looking overwhelmed, nevertheless. "Where are your proofs?"

"Rest assured we have them."

"Bah! who will believe you?"

"The law will."

Monsieur, in spite of his fright, seemed rather tickled by this last answer. Ornamel had suddenly disappeared; so he indulged in a harsh, uneasy chuckle.

"I say, do you know what that croak of yours put me in mind of?" asked Augustus, sneeringly. "The creaking of gallows-chains. Old jailor-bird, you're anticipating a day not far distant."

Monsieur Charles made no answer to this, but kept his eyes fixed on mine.

"My time is coming," he muttered fiercely, "and it shall come heavily for you, my fine ruffian, and the boy there. You've set your wit against mine, and it shall go hard with me if you don't smart for this night's work. Let the woman go. She is my wife, and I shall claim her at your hands shortly."

A cloud came over the face of Augustus, who seemed, for the moment, to see danger ahead.

"Perhaps you will; perhaps you won't," he muttered. "Don't forget, though, that if you drive us into a corner, there'll be blood drawn."

"I'll hang you all!"

"Dear me, how considerate. I fancied you'd sown all your hemp for your own consumption."

"Bah! I leave you to your reflections. Out of the way, boy."

He stalked along the churchyard, and, leaping the wall, walked along the road. Augustus and I followed, taking the opposite direction. Directly my uncle was out of sight, Augustus seemed troubled and perturbed in spirit.

"Luck seems against us," he muttered, bitterly. "What is to be done?"

"Why, you have the law on your side."

"No."

I looked at him in surprise; but he only shook his head gloomily.

"Law is his natural element; he revels in it, and always succeeds in it. I saw him smile to himself as he left us; and I'm certain a dangerous idea has crept into that bad head of his. What shall we do?"

"Go into court, tell the whole truth, whatever it may be, and come out again in triumph."

"Yes, in triumph—in the van. Who'd believe Ornamel, with his rambling imagination? Who'd believe me who have scamp written on my very face? Nobody. Who'd believe a gentleman of fortune with an innocent and humane expression to gild his fine clothes? Everybody."

"But the woman," I said, "the ——"

"Mad!" remarked Augustus, finally.

"It cannot be. Miserable, mysterious, but not mad."

"Mad, for the doctors say so. Mad, because she has been violent. Mad, because her story is an incredible one, which she has no written proofs to support."

"Ah!" I sighed in a tone of mingled conviction and incredulity.

"Of course it's out and out folly to imagine that he'll yield without striking a blow in his own defence. But what do I stand talking here for, when there is work to be done? Where is Ornamel?"

"He slipped away after the woman, while you were talking to my uncle."

"Worse and worse. Come, put your best foot forward. They must have gone in this direction."

As he walked, or rather ran, along the highway, I conjured Augustus to explain away the mystery of that night, on which seemed to depend the mystery of my past life; but he shook his head stubbornly, and answered only in riddles. I felt vexed to think he was so secret, and expressed my vexation.

"It is for your own good, my boy," he said, kindly. "I have no wish to awaken hopes which may be destined to disappointment. Better that you should be blind for a time, than that you should open your eyes to misery. Be patient, and all may, all will be well."

"But have you crimes to lay at my uncle's door—charges that will ultimately hold good in law?"

"We have; and if the law don't recognize them, we must prosecute them unlawfully."

"How?"

He smiled sardonically, but made no reply. I persisted—

"Little as I know about the matter, I'm sure that you won't gain your ends by violence."

"We shall have our revenge!" he muttered, with a grin. I thought him wicked.

"We shall have our revenge," he continued, "if we hang for it."

"I hope all will be in your favor, and that you will not be driven to extremes."

He turned upon me with a fierce and malicious suddenness.

"Why, man," he cried, "if I were to open my mouth now, and tell all I know, you'd kill him yourself. You'd kill him, I say, if you've an ounce of living blood in you."

"Again, is there no other means of satisfying your feelings? Bloodshed, at the best, is a fearful alternative."

He bowed his head. When he looked up again, the expression of his face was half sad, half fierce. His mind seemed wavering between sorrow and hate.

"Henry!" he said, pausing, and looking me full in the face. I stopped unconsciously. "Christian people have a doctrine which divides the world equally into tyrants and slaves. This doctrine, when an enemy smites us on the one cheek, steps in to request us to offer our enemy the other. Bah! Is bloodshed viler than torture of body and soul—than the slow poison administered under cover of a smile, and which, after long years of agony, ends fatally?"

"Perhaps not. But can bloodshed recover the victim of the poison you speak of?"

"It can cleanse away that poison from the blood of those connected with the victim. Enough. You are young, and your sufferings are and have been nothing. Martha will not rest in the grave until I have called her betrayer to account."

We walked on in silence, gloomy and perturbed. I pitied, but could not respect, the wild ravings of my companion. He was clearly a tolerably good man, who had been spoilt by the world's rough usage; and his standard of ethics was one very different from that by which lads of eighteen are accustomed to measure themselves.

Little as I loved my uncle, much as I loathed and feared him, my blood crept at the thought that I might, however unwillingly, be concerned in his death. I dreaded to be herded with those who held out such dark threats against him. Monsieur Charles, villain as he was, was nevertheless my uncle, his was my flesh, his was my blood. It seemed wicked in myself to further the punishment of his wickedness. It was clearly my duty to discourage his enemies at all hazards, and even to protect him.

But then I thought of Elizabeth, and my blood boiled. Most boys are rash, and I was no exception to the rule. How suddenly had she changed her whole nature, as it expressed itself in her words and manner! She had never loved me; she had led me on from folly to folly by pre-plotted dissimulation and falsehood, and this on her own confession. I tried to despise her, but could not. I tried to pity her, but could not. Although she had never really loved me, her bare confession of the truth stung me on my tender bump of self-esteem. I was a boy after all; a weak, despised, ordinary boy. And what possible motive could my cousin and my uncle have had in thus deluding me? If I answered this question by supposing that monsieur had encouraged my attentions to his daughter for the purpose of strengthening his hold on myself, I simply arrived at another and more perplexing question. What object, good or whisker, and my uncle in desiring to link me in such close connection with himself. My property, my money, "Twas the idea, I think, that made me sure that his object was a bad and selfish one.

"A captive," I said, suddenly grasping his arm. He turned with a strange look.

"Augustus, who is that woman whom we met to-night? Who and what is she?"

"The ghost of your dead mother!"

"Nonsense! She is made of flesh and blood, and is no ghost."

"She is the ghost of your own mother!"

"You speak in riddles. Why will you continue to mislead me?"

"I will be truth, Henry. Riddle or no riddle, I will speak no more."

"Then woman could not have died, after all. Let me be her child, relief and calm, and a sense of perfect lull down and buried in yonder churchyard."

"Doubtless," muttered Augustus, in a sepulchral tone of voice.

"Let this woman speak of lives; made of flesh and blood, and she draws breath like you and I. She seems to me to have known many dead by name. She has the features, but not the expression, of my dead mamma. Yet I cannot account for the fact that she still lives."

Augustus glanced about him. After a momentary pause, I spoke again.

"Augustus!"

He again turned upon me, with the strange scared look I had noticed before.

"Augustus, will you not speak to me? Will you not tell me?"

"I cannot, I will not, and I haven't with me. What is that woman?"

"She is the ghost of your dead mother."

Do what I could, I found it impossible to persuade Augustus to tell me more. Whether he did or no, he became reticent and moody. He quite perplexed me by his manner, and refused to sit with his inevitable statements. He was evidently scared, and I could not conceive what was the cause unless that his mind was unsound. And he ruled with supremacy, and I was powerless. An unpardonable error in listening for a moment to his statements! I began to feel myself actually hearing those witness against my father, and I was ashamed of myself. Could not I vainly reminded me of the words of Shakespeare, and the whole of that mysterious past, pertended me that my father's guilt was proved?

"She is the ghost of your dead mother."

He quite perplexed me by his manner, and refused to sit with his inevitable statements. He was evidently scared, and I could not conceive what was the cause unless that his mind was unsound. "He is too weak-headed to be relieved to wander about alone just yet. But he had scarcely gone, and will follow if he meets again with the woman you've been talking about. Indeed!

"He could not mean her."

"Yes; but in the way of meeting alone with her might be too much for him. You seem surprised."

The fact is that I had not looked upon the matter in that light. I had not considered that my uncle could have any motive for wishing to see the woman, and if I thought of it at all, I had put it down to some sudden whim. He seemed prepossessed with my father from the moment of his arrival, and I regarded it as a matter of course.

Just before we reached the cottage we met a motherly-looking but commonplace woman, whom I recognized as Mrs. Smith.

"You remember Sarah, Mr. Henry?" said Augustus.

"Oh, yes," I answered, shaking hands with Sarah quite affably.

"And you, Sarah, of course remember Mr. Henry."

Their changing color gave me the one of deep and terrible interest, he whispered,

"Has Ormand left?"

"No, sir," said Sarah, looking very anxious, placed her finger on her lips to enjoin silence.

"Alone?"

"Not alone, sir."

Augustus drew a long breath, and asked a question by the look of his eyebrows. Sarah replied. Then both cast a compassionate look upon me.

"I just wish you'd have to stay and to interrupt them," observed Sarah. "They are together, in his own room. Do not go there, sir."

"Are they quite calm?" asked Augustus, anxiously.

Calm as babies," said Sarah.

Augustus gave Sarah book as he entered through the house door.

"Follow me," he said Augustus, in a low whisper. I followed him upstairs and stood partly open. The door of Ormand's room was partly open, and we could see into the room. We heard no words, no sobs between the sobbing of women, and the heart-rending sobbing of women, and the heart-rending sobbing of women.

Augustus looked for close to the aperture. Then he did so, with a fiendly suppressed a cry of wonder and surprise.

"Look!" he suspected, scarcely audibly, and I looked.

Ormand was seated in a chair, with his face thrown forward on the table, clasped together while the woman, kneeling by his chair, wound her long white arms around his neck, and wept.

"Is she a dream?" murmured the voice of Ormand. "Is this a dream?"

"It is no dream, dear," answered the woman. "Thank Heaven!"

And she wound herself closer to him, weeping, and kissing his head.

"Come away!" said Augustus, beckoning me from the door.

No we left them, overwhelmed by their mysterious meeting.

CHAPTER XIII.—NOBODY'S GUARDED IS NOT HERE.

You may imagine how perturbed I felt in mind after the extraordinary discovery I had made. My heart throbbed eagerly, and seemed to beat in my head. I could not think of anything. The one was all that their joy was my joy and sorrow. It suggested all puzzled as an entangled skein to the questions of my sorts of absurd ones, and scared started when viewed by the light of my common sense. Again the in the closet I could not, for my wife were Mrs. Smith.

Fragrance led me down to the kitchen, and we seated ourselves by the fire.

"What is it, Sarah?" he asked, in a vacant way, as if he hardly knew to whom he was speaking. But then I shook my head in reply he trusted again.

"We must leave this place immediately," he said, when he decided here.

"Where shall we go to?" I inquired, innocently.

"Sarah, I must leave this place at once. Any delay here will be down upon me. In London we shall stand some chance of eluding him. Mark me, Henry, I am avoiding him because I fear to face him. I'm writing to him to-day. He is a miserable fellow-creature who cares served me a good turn. Should the old of the law be inclined to by our enemy, that miserable fellow-creature is he."

"You speak of Ormand."

"Yes. It is necessary to convey Ormand to some safe hiding-place. And the woman must go with him. Is he not her child?"

"Pardon me, I am not a child. I'm a child! What can be done?"

"Do as you say, my uncle has been criminal, he surely will not seek aid from the law, even as a prosecutor."

"You forget, if he wishes to get at all, the prosecutor must now be sought. The events of that night must upset all my plans, and I must be scared."

"So the woman has committed no crime, and cannot—"

"Stop!" cried Augustus, his eyes flashing fire. "There is a law and cry after her. She is an escaped lunatic!"

"Is she, then, insane?"

"I know not, she has escaped from a madhouse—where her truest words have been taken down by Dr. Hagden, Medical Superintendent, for the victim of dangerous delusions."

"I made my reply: for I was willing myself whether the woman was or was not conjoin madness. Augustus, I will now the golden opportunities may be on the alert to intercept us. Augustus, I would ask all I have to—"

"Explain."

"If my uncle is against me, and my pocket is nearly empty. I have scarcely more than enough to pay for the journey to London."

"Could not Ormand venture upon the journey alone?"

"Sheer madness. It would be worse than folly to trust him to himself. He is not to be helpless as an infant—though, to be sure, he is not quite so helpless as he was. He must be done."

"Then I see no other course than that you should go with him and care for the worst. For my pocket is even empty than yours. Sarah, I'll be bound, can't go: for I'm sure my uncle has no idea of my whereabouts."

"Then they would hound me down like a dog, sir," said Sarah, with a shudder.

He was white and savage, and he snapped his teeth like a wolf. Sarah was evidently terribly scattered, and he placed his head softly on my shoulder.

"Henry," he said, softly, "wild and strange as this may sound to you, I am hunted for my life. For the sake of the two miserable creatures upstairs, I must fly. God, my God, my head is all disordered. For wrong and collecting have met with a shock, and I cannot collect myself."

I was impressed by his calm, sorrowful face, and I felt very compassionate.

"Come what may, Henry, these two must be saved from the fate of each other. Two more blood of bitter tears may clear the account with Heaven, and wipe out the sin of crime in the heart of the woman. Yonder God, there is no time to lose. Sarah, you must go with him, and, at once."

"Two puzzle me more than ever."

"Sir, I will go, if you will leave have your eyes opened. In the meantime let the secret be kept close. Keep in your heart that you are the best friend of Ormand. Sarah, you are a good woman, and the sufferings of the woman who is weeping on the sofa are in safe hands."

So it was determined that we should stay where we were, and that Sarah should accompany them to London; and that we should take the next necessary to keep out of the way of my uncle as possible. Augustus would communicate with his good friends at home, and see what they could do to help him in the emergency. And so the interview was concluded, and I was left alone in the little room I had before occupied, and was left to my own reflections. Ormand and the strange woman.

Another New Local Story

NOW READY IN THE

New York Weekly,

(THE BEST STORY AND SKETCH PAPER PUBLISHED),

Entitled

THE DEFRAUDED HEIRESS;

OR,

THE STEPMOTHER'S PLOT.

By James Reynolds,

AUTHOR OF "THE SPOILED BRIDE," "LONE HAND," &c., &c.

In "The Stolen Bride" and "Lone Hand" or "Merrit of the Ocean," Mr. Reynolds gave evidence of great vigor of imagination, and placed himself in the front rank of living romancists; but in giving to the world "The Defrauded Heiress" he has placed himself in the front rank of the great writers of the day.

The story is one of a great ship, founded on fact, and in her voyage she encounters the fearful pirates of southern Spanish Main, and the adventures of the passengers and crew are graphically described. The plot is a most interesting one, and the incidents of the story, from beginning to end, are strongly portrayed.

The story in question, chronicles the adventures of a beautiful young heiress, who is deprived of her rights by the villainy of her stepmother, and the foul machinations of her own mother, who, in order to secure the property which the girl was entitled to at her own right, does not scruple to conspire to her treacherously ruin. The manner in which the heiress is at last proven to be the rightful owner of the property, and the villainy of her enemies is unveiled, holds the key to its human interest. It is not a story which does not abound in the purest morals. All the element he lives us with indignation, as he whose sense not with childhood tenderness and weeping, and we leave our heart's throbs widely with the pleasurable excitement of the moment, and the pleasant anticipation of the next outing. The poor but honest heroine is contrasted with the wicked stepmother, the woman of the world, the bold, dashing, fascinating, the ruthless man, the villain gambler, and the true gentleman, all pass in review before the reader, presenting a panorama of power that only to exciting the whole situation. From the first chapter to the concluding one, the interest and attention of the reader is held, and the paper wash a gift of regret that the story has ended so soon.

We think we may safely say that

THE DEFRAUDED HEIRESS

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1861, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 309.—Vol. XII.] NEW YORK, OCTOBER 26, 1861. [PRICE 6 CENTS.

Be Careful to Open this Paper before Cutting It.

Our Present Number.

Our present number is one which must arrest public attention in a very marked manner. It contains by far the most comprehensive and complete Map of the Southern and Border States that has yet been issued from the newspaper press of the country, showing not only the localities of every important action that has taken place during the present war, but the actual positions of the National and rebel forces, and of the blockading fleets and vessels. Apart from its usefulness for present and future reference, it presents a better epitome of the state of the country at this moment than could be derived from any written article, however careful and elaborate. It will prove of great value to our readers, enabling them to trace all future military and naval operations with ease and certainty.

We need not direct attention to the various authentic views and sketches which accompany the great Map in this number. The view from Munson's Hill shows the ground intervening between the National and rebel lines beyond the Potomac. Falls Church village, our advanced position, is also shown in a spirited and truthful sketch; as is the station of Fairfax at the junction of the railroads to the Potomac, where the rebels lately attempted to close the navigation of that river. Fairfax Court-House, the principal village in which the rebels is also illustrated, the Camp of Gen. Fremont at Jefferson City, Missouri, and the shelling of the rebels across the Upper Potomac, not to mention spirited sketches of the adventurous escape of some of our New York prisoners from Richmond, and the

"A REBEL TREED."—CAPTURE OF LIEUTENANT D. J. SEGAL, OF THE INSURGENT ARMY, NEAR FALLS CHURCH, BY LIEUTENANT-COLONEL WINSLOW AND CAPTAIN SHATTUCK, OF THE NEW YORK 87TH. FROM A SKETCH BY OUR ARTIST ATTACHED TO GENERAL MCCLELLAN'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 264.

What comic episode of "treeing a rebel."

All these views and sketches are authentic parts of the history of the times, from artists of acknowledged fidelity and ability actually in the field, and familiar with all the privations and dangers of the service. The sketch of the battle of Lexington, which we presented exclusively in this paper last week, is a remarkable story of that splendid fight, and must remain the side standard pictorial representation of that event.

In this number, also, is commenced a splendidly illustrated serial tale, "The Quaker Soldier," written by a writer of known ability, well-informed, not exclusively in the history of Germany and other European countries, but in the social peculiarities of our Northern States, and relating to a time when the excitement of the war will be at its highest pitch. Its title is sufficiently interest deepens with every chapter. It has never been published in this country.

Arrangements are in progress for the exclusive publication in this paper of a new and brilliant novel by the author of the most novelist of the age, of which due notice will soon be given.

We need not assure these circumstances that the Illustrated Newspaper opposes this week in now and elegant type, nor say more than that our engagements with all dependents shall keep pace with the generous encouragement of a liberal public.

TREEING A REBEL NEAR FAIRFAX.

OUR Artist has sent us so amusing an account of the capture of Lieutenant H. J. Segal, of the Confederate army, that we regret we can only condense his letter. Segal, it will be remembered, was on a scouting party of 30 men, under Captain Caldwell, of the Second and Colonel Wyndham, of the 3d Pennsylvania Cavalry. Falling in with a party of rebels, under Lieutenant Segal, near Falls Church, in the direction of Fairfax. As they were proceeding in silence and single file, down a lane, they heard the tramp of horses and the jingle of saber scabbards. The Lieutenant-Colonel and Captain, ordering their men to halt, rode cautiously ahead, and a short time one of them came upon an open space where they saw four rebels seated around a camp-fire. Segal, by the side of his men, and engaged in eating chestnuts. The Confederates saw him, and sprang upon their horses. The officer made a bold dash at Segal, "Charge!" by the time the scouting party had got up the four "sullied" lieutenant was in the saddle, and the rebels were seen scattering up the spoils of victory, which consisted of four sabers, two revolvers, four guns and blankets, which were on a horse tied to a tree by the roadside. A further search revealed its owner, perched among the limbs of a tall tree, in the greatest fright. He had climbed with his saber to lop off the fruit. A dozen rifles pointed at his head soon brought him to the ground, and he unceremoniously joined his fellows. When he got down, and felt safe, he began to "blow" with the Southern style. He said, when brought before General McDowell, coolly toasted that at the battle of Bull Run he had missed regularly on the last shot every day and always missed. General McDowell smiled, and said "that he would send him somewhere where he would not have another such chance for some time."

The State of the Nation.

"Watchman, what of the Night?"

WE present this week a Map of the Southern and Border States, showing not only the localities of every section of importance, but the lines taken and occupied by our army, but also the actual positions of every considerable force, National or rebel, now in the field, and the stations of the various blockading fleets and squadrons. It is a most important and suggestive document, which cannot fail seriously to arrest the public attention.

It is now six months since the rebels opened their impious batteries on Fort Sumter, and inaugurated Civil War. A great number of important events have occurred in that interval, too fresh in the public mind to require recapitulation. The progress question now is, What have been the net results of our efforts to vindicate the Union, the Constitution and Laws of our fathers, and how do we stand to-day? A glance at the Map which we publish will yield an answer, but one, we fear, little satisfactory to the patriotic heart of the country, little worthy of the devotion that has been exhibited, of the sacrifices that have been put forth by the people of the loyal States.

With the control of the entire Navy of the country, and with the means at its command to increase it to any extent, what have we achieved on the ocean? The humiliating fact, that while we have captured less than 60 vessels, wholly or in part owned by rebels, or engaged in their service, on the high seas, the rebels have taken upwards of 70 of ours, and these mostly on the high seas. We have destroyed two cockboats of privateers, while the Alabama, the Sumter, and the Sumter, for more than four, have defied our power, and mocked at our pursuit! Our blockade has become the byword of Christendom, and is likely to involve us in complications the end of which can scarcely be foreseen, and or the result of which our rhetorical but wholly unpractical Secretary of State is directly responsible.

How stand we on the land? Missouri and Kentucky are undoubtedly members of the Union, even according to Southern interpretation. And yet, two-thirds of the former and one-half of the latter are this day held by the insurgents. In compensation, we occupy, with varying fortunes, a fifth of Virginia. In other words, the rebels have made the soil of the loyal States the battle-ground of the war, and visited on their own heads the evils which should have been transferred to the territories of those who provoked it. The rebel flag flaunts in full view of the Capitol and the Presidential Mansion. We navigate the Potomac by sufferance. Cincinnati is entrenching itself; and Philadelphia is preparing for months to have its chief defences done. And even St. Louis—3,000 miles away from the heart of the rebellion—exposes in the security of fortifications which have been erected around it. Within the threat of loyal East Tennessee, one-third or more of the entire State, is occupied by the iron hand of the Rebellion; and the heart of North Carolina, in the midst of the loyal Free for the Union, lies under the dagger of the assassins of their country's interests. Even in the mountains, we have been compelled to fortress Monroe, in Virginia; it is true that we still hold the Tortugas, out of sight of the Florida coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, and Pensacola, on the main land; but the Rebellion, under a practical if not expressed condition, that we shall fester there in quiet, nor disturb the rebels while they pile batteries and fortify their positions at will. Arkansas spurns our authority; and the Indians of the border are passively allowed to join destinies with the enemies of the country, without an effort to counteract their machinations.

This is by no means an attractive outline; but there is the the Map, look at it. Trace the reverting line which defines the boundary of National authority, and see where it casts in on the territory of the loyal and rebel states respectively. Remember the enormous force placed on land at the outset—under 20,000,000 of people and they but 12,000,000, of which one-third are slaves, and another third our allies in sympathy and interest—and the consideration of the fact that we hold the entire navy and nineteen-twentieths of the maritime resources of the country! What a commentary on the fact that we have been overrun by hordes of volunteers, while the treasures of the country was heaped at its feet, hundreds of millions at a time, by a patriotic Congress unprecedented in its liberality and unanimity! We pour regiment upon regiment, and brigade on brigade, from north and west, and the rebels laugh at our efforts! We are told of things military, Washington, and we hear occasionally of a grand review, or of the occupation of some point vacated by the rebels, or of the capture of a few cannon, followed by painted Columbiads and formidable sections of stovepipe—the occupation being achieved at the trifling loss of a dozen killed and a score wounded by the mistake of one National regiment firing into another!

We wear the weeds of Bethel, Vienna, Bull Run, Wilson's Creek and Lexington, and we have to read the sad annals of Rich Mountain and Hatteras Inlet as a compensation!

Now the conclusion is irresistible, it forces itself home to the conviction of every thinking man, that if this season of thing continues for another six months, the war will resolve itself into what a hostile foreign press already claims it has resolved into, a "war of humiliation." It is, therefore, of vital importance to every man who has a dollar to pay, a voice to raise, a vote to cast or spirit for the great and glorious heritage of our fathers, to see that this SHALL NOT become a war of exasperation and boundaries, but an exemplar of vindication and of unity, of energy and dignity, thorough, effective, decisive and final. In doing this he must not be deterred from the severe requirements of his duty by the shallow cry of Conservatism, and peaceful counsels. "Don't embarrass the Government!" nor yet by vague promises, enforced by mysterious nods, of "something grand" on the eve of being done. Like those we can now but one standard of estimate, both of men and measures, success! We have no time to analyze causes and weigh circumstances. The country demands it. In the stern mandate of the people to those into whose hands they have confided their interests. "Nothing else will be done who SHALL succeed. THE NATION STIR NOT SAIL!"

Judged by this standard of judgment, as well as under a fearful, yet impartial analysis of the facts in detail, the present Administration is unworthy of the cause which it represents and of the confidence and support of the people. As a whole, it has proved itself unequal to the emergency. The stupidity of instituting a "blockade" of our Southern ports, instead of closing them as ports of entry, on every principle of international law, will be chargeable on the Secretary of State. By that act he created the rebels "a belligerent power," and invited all the complications with Foreign Powers which have since been unnecessarily blunder, and of which we by no means see the end. It is no longer possible to say that the authority for closing these ports did not rest in the Executive and his advisers, when it is notorious that the Executive was driven to do many things not constitutional by the pressure of the emergency, and which Congress has been called upon to sanction by ex post facto legislation. He "took the responsibility," and the country sanctioned his action.

Nor is the delinquency of the Secretary of State, and his absolute lack of a statesmanship adequate to our present foreign complications, limited to the embarrassment blunder alone. To say nothing of the minor, we had almost said contemptible military appointments, the letter of the paper about a mendacious correspondent of a foreign paper, while a generous and sympathetic communication from the Emperor of Russia was pigeon-holed, the Secretary of State has allowed dinner absurdities aside, what can be said of the folly of offending the first man and most powerful ruler of Europe, by solicitations and even by instructions to the vagrant representatives of the most effete and justly despised of all the dynasties which have afflicted Europe, the Bourbons?

But it is not our purpose to deal in personalities. The delinquencies of the Secretary of State are spread only to the ignorance, imbecility and inefficiency which have characterized the Administration of the Navy. Happily here, at least, absolute fraud and corruption have not been charged, although notoriously prevailed by minor officials. The department of War has the bad eminence of jobbing favoritism, contract-mongering, and the great and usual delinquencies and malpractices reflected from a head, distinguished only by wild-cat banking, railway jobbing, and all the sharp and selfish practices of a small Pennsylvania politician.

In the department of Finance the success of the Government has been decided and complete; and in those of the Post Office and Interior there has been neither censure nor complaint. What money the Government has required, whether to supply the wasteful extravagance of the Secretary of War or maintain an idle fleet, Mr. Chase has promptly supplied. The proof of his capacity is his success. Let Secretaries Seward and Welles do the same thing, and, treated accordingly. General Scott's plans and General McDowell's execution of them foiled at Bull Run; the same cause will be assigned for the necessity of reorganizing and reviving a beaten and dispirited army by giving it a new leader. The substitution of Dickinson for Secretary Cameron, the latter fitted for Cameron, and hardly worth more to the National cause than a hundred thousand men and a hundred millions of money. All history has shown that great national movements can only be controlled and efficiently directed by men representing the popular sentiment and inspired by the exertion of the exigencies they are called on to meet. It will be happy for the country if the President of the United States has the discernment to discover, and the courage to put in position, such men as do really represent the nation, and who have the energy, independence and ability to reassure its waning confidence, and to encourage arm, and inspire with boundless confidence, not to say the unfaithfulness and criminality of their predecessors in office!

The Great Naval Expedition.

IT has been for some time understood that a formidable naval expedition was preparing for operations on the Southern coast. Before these lines reach our readers it will have sailed for its destination. Thus, of course, will remain a matter of conjecture, but sooner or later, it may be ten days or it may be a month, we shall hear of a terrible blow inflicted on the flank of the rebellion, or of a great and important success. We look with confidence to a result which shall carry terror to the hearts of the rebel leaders, and from the ranks of which they have massed up, with so much effort, to the banks of the Potomac, into a thousand fragments. The blow may fall on New Orleans,* on Mobile, or on Charleston, or it would be a grand realization of retributive justice if the latter city were to fall under the mighty arm now wrathfully uplifted! It would be a fitting close to the rebellion—its most close. Such a but a great part of the suffering South, to know that the seat of war is transferred to South Carolina, and that that State and not the Northern States has been called to bear the horrors of the contest which it so wantonly provoked.

Some account of the formidable character of the expedition may be formed from the fact that not only the men have been detailed for its complement, and that it is composed of the flower of our war vessels and transports. Among the vessels that have been commissioned for the service in hand are the following: Flagship, steam frigate Wabash; steamers Augusta, Adger, Augusta, Seminole, Alabama, Curlew, Pettit, Mercury; gunboats Ottawa, Unadilla; transports Baltic, Atlantic, Calhoun, Vanderbilt, Empire City, Constitution, Quaker Queen, Peerless, Governor, besides a number of others, names unknown—altogether constituting the largest fleet ever concentrated on the shores of the United States. The Columbia, which sailed on the 12th, took out the 3d Rhode Island regiment, lately engaged at Fort Hamilton, and is supplied with sort boats and experienced pilots from Tom River, Long Branch, Squan and other places on the Jersey coast. On the 16th, the steamer Governor left Philadelphia for Annapolis, presumably to form part of the land force of the expedition. Simultaneously with the first reports of the operations of this fleet, we may expect to hear that the slumbering volcano of Fort Pickens has broken out in a tempest of shot and shell on the rebels encamped around Pensacola. Nor need we be surprised if at the same time the great army of the Potomac shall make its second advance on the hosts of Johnston and Beauregard. We are on the eve of important events. But what has been delayed by the nation is heart-sick of inaction, and of petty and indecisive battles. We must strike home now or never!

Cotton from Central America.

LATE English papers state that samples of cotton from Honduras, received at Liverpool in the Cotton Supply Association of Manchester, which has published a report, referring to the effect that "the cotton is the heaviest approach to New Orleans ever received from any country in the interior." The Association might have added that the famous "Sea Island" cotton of South Carolina is a native of Honduras, whence it was brought to the Bahamas, and thence to the United States. A quantity of Honduras growth, sent to England a number of years ago, on account of which appears in the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Arts," was pronounced fit for making the finest Nottingham lace, and was valued at from 2s. 3d. to 3s. per pound.

The ordinary cotton plant, which in South Carolina is an annual, being killed every year by the frost, rising only to a spread and height of eight or nine inches above the ground, is perennial in Central America, of from four to six feet in height and spread. The yield, according to experiments made in Honduras, is from 1,000 lbs. to Augusta or Sea Island variety is proportionably still greater. According to these experiments, the yield is two crops of 500 lbs. each per acre, or 1,000 lbs. per year; while in South Carolina the same description gives only one crop of from 150 to 180 lbs. per acre.

The ports of Honduras are no further from Liverpool and New York than are those of Mobile and New Orleans, and as the country has a healthful climate, and native labor, there is no good reason why duce cotton to meet all the requirements of connection.

"Chicamacomico."

THE Arabs reverence idiots. They believe that God has them in his special care. We believe so too; at any rate, we have lately had two notable instances which go far to prove it. A special Providence, which struck the enemy with blindness or with panic, alone prevented the little helpless detachment landed from the fleet before Hatteras from being completely cut to pieces, during the night previous to the bombardment of that fortress. "A miss is as good as a mile," and it turned out that gallant Max Weber and his diminutive command escaped. But instead of thanking the Lord, and keeping out of danger in future, somebody in command at Hatteras took the risk of tempting Providence a second time. So he sent a regiment—the 20th Indiana—forty miles or so up the narrow, desolate, wave-beaten, sun-bleached strip of sand called Hatteras Island, the angry Atlantic on one side, and the broad waters of Pamlico Sound on the other, to a place called Chicamacomico—a comico place certainly for a camp—forty miles from everywhere, and near nowhere in particular! And then he sent a little tub of a propeller with a cargo of stores to the 'Comico camp. Of course the propeller was quickly grabbed by the rebels in full sight of the camp at 'Comico. And the rebels thereupon waxed bold and sent over a large body of men to capture the camp at 'Comico—one detachment above and another below it—while their vessels shelled it from the Sound. Whereupon the commander at 'Comico took to his heels and fled towards Hatteras. Providence helped him; and while a deep sleep fell on his enemies, he passed them unobserved in the night, losing only about 50 men and all his tents and equipage! Naturally indignant at such a proceeding, the gunboat Monticello steamed up alongside the island, and pounded the rebels soundly with shot and shell, and justly punished their stupidity for having permitted the fellows from 'Comico to slip through their fingers. It was an exciting entertainment and safe withal; but what on earth was the 20th Indiana regiment doing or to do at 'Comico? We burned and blew up a good fort at Ocracoke Inlet which might have been occupied by this regiment comfortably and usefully, and sent it forty miles away on an exposed sand-spit? It is said General Mansfield has gone to command at Hatteras. None too soon, for Heaven may some day forget to protect its idiots!

THE UNIVERSAL SENTIMENT.—The narrow, carping and hypocritical policy which the Government and press of Great Britain have pursued towards this country, in this the hour of its peril, has produced its natural effect—the revival and intensification of popular hatred and contempt for the so-called "Mother Country." Senator Wilson, of Mass., only reflected the universal sentiment when he said, on passing through New York with his regiment, on the 9th:

"And I say here to-day, that their action [that of the banks of New York] is worth more to our cause in the Old World than a victory on the soil of the New. (Cheers.) For it says, in a manner that carping Englishmen can understand, that the men who control the moneyed interests of America have made up their minds to fight this battle to a successful issue. (Great cheers.) That nation of shopkeepers will run blockades when they can, but they will not break my blockade, nor attempt to do it. (Applause and laughter.) Sir, I want to see this war closed successfully; but after the criticisms which come from the other side of the Atlantic, as God is my judge, I say I do not want to do it through any favor of the men of the British Isles. (Great cheers, long continued.)"

OFFICIAL COMPETITION.—Gov. Morgan, of this State, who probably knows as much about military matters as most other thrifty but rather close-fisted members of his class—that is to say, the martial class of New York merchants—has been made a Major-General, ostensibly "to enable him to perfect the organization of the New York Volunteers." And now it seems the Governors of nearly all the Northern States, except Gov. Sprague, of Rhode Island, insist on being made Major-Generals also. The cost of a Major-General (including his pay, which is $5,484) is about $20,000 a-year. The gratification of Gubernatorial ambition in say 20 of the 22 loyal States would only cost us $400,000 annually! Gov. Sprague, who is a military man, and has proved his coolness and bravery in the field, declines both the honors and profits of a Major-Generalship. Gov. Morgan accepts; but it is said will forego "his perquisites." If he does, the legitimacy of his claim to the name of Morgan may well be called in question.

THE COMMERCE OF THE COUNTRY.—Statistics and estimates, gathered and made for the Government, show conclusively that the foreign demand for breadstuffs from this country must largely exceed the demand of any previous year. It is susceptible of positive proof that we must receive for our cereals, within the present fiscal year, more money from Europe than we have heretofore received for both food and cotton, and that, supposing we shall not this year sell one pound of cotton to Europe, we shall yet have a large balance in our favor, which will be payable in specie.

NEW YORK CORN EXCHANGE.—But few people not immediately connected with the trade are aware of the large business transacting in breadstuffs in New York, chiefly on European account. The following memorandum of the operations at the Corn Exchange on Friday, the 4th, will give an idea of it:

20,500 barrels flour	$110,620
305,800 bushels wheat	381,200
171,000 bushels corn	93,420
4,000 bushels rye	3,010
5,200 bushels barley	3,092
Total value	$591,662

THE WAR IN FRANCE.—The war is not confined to our own shores. On the 19th of August a duel was fought on the Seine, near Paris, between Capt. C. L. Moses, of Saco, Maine, and Hon. F. G. Farquar, of Virginia, the former a strong Unionist, the latter a rabid Secessionist, growing out of a heated political discussion. Farquar was killed at the first fire, and Capt. Moses was severely wounded. He succeeded in escaping from France and in reaching this country, but is still suffering much from his wound.

TREPIDATION.—The authorities of the Southern cities and seaports are exerting themselves to prevent the planters from sending forward their cotton, lest its accumulation should act as a bait for the Northern armies or the Union fleet. Gov. Moore, of Louisiana, in deadly fear that New Orleans should be made a tempting depot for the flossy commodity, has issued a proclamation prohibiting its introduction, and the military committee of Memphis has followed his example. It is clear that the principal Southern cities do not consider themselves by any means safe, and do not really despise "Lincoln's mercenaries" so much as they pretend.

THE INVITATION TO GARIBALDI.—The invitation to Garibaldi to "lead the American armies," which is said to have been made by Mr. Sanford, our Minister at Brussels, has provoked as much disgust and i[illegible] [illegible]ng Americans as it has excited ridicule among foreign[illegible] [illegible] says this preposterous story continues to circulate [illegible]pean press, and, with other similar statements, is pro[illegible] [illegible]pression that we are not only utterly destitute of the mili[illegible] [illegible] requisite for command, "but are ostentatiously proclaiming [illegible] necessity in this respect." The Herald says that no proposition of the kind stated has ever been made to Garibaldi "by any one having authority to that effect." Of course not! No Government would offer such a wholesale insult to its thousands of patriotic and competent officers. Garibaldi was a capital "free lance" in South America, and a very patriotic, daring and successful guerilla leader in Sicily; but he is in no way fitted to be a leader of large bodies of men, and, what is to his credit, never pretended to be. The mixing up of his name in this matter, and whatever of annoyance he may suffer in consequence, to say nothing of the contempt cast on American military genius by these alleged offers made by the "Minister Resident in Brussels," are to be charged to that distinguished diplomatist alone!

THE Paris correspondent of the Herald states that a number of Americans resident in that city, smarting under the ridicule and scandal created by the story that Garibaldi had been offered the command of the National armies, wrote to Mr. Marsh, our Minister in Italy, to ascertain the truth of the affair. Mr. Marsh replied that there was not a word of truth in the story so far as he or his Government is concerned, and intimates that there has been some impertinent intermeddling in the affair, which will some day come out. The correspondent goes on to say:

"The fact of the matter is this: That meddling Mr. Sandford, who—although his appointment was as Minister resident at Brussels, spends most of his time anywhere but there, and seems disposed to be eternally mixing in what does not concern him—has been to Turin, and from there went to Caprera, saw Garibaldi, and perhaps took the responsibility to make him an offer of service in the Federal army. It of course is not to be presumed that our Government authorised Mr. Sandford to make any such offer, but that it was done in obedience to his meddlesome instincts, which seem determined never to permit him to mind his own business. This is the main cause of the reports which have originated in relation to our Government and Garibaldi, although I am informed from a reliable source that the latter made a tender of his services, through Mr. Marsh, some weeks since. It was, of course, a delicate matter to refuse; it would have been absurd to accept; and while the matter was held in abeyance the Minister to Belgium must needs insert his busy fingers, and create all this disturbance, which has temporarily, at least, seriously injured us in the eyes of Europe."

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR OF 1861.—The 10th number of this great Historical work is ready for delivery. It contains complete accounts of the capture of Lexington, and views of the place and the struggle between the brave handful of National troops and the overwhelming force of rebels under General Price, together with much other interesting and valuable war matters. See advertisement on 15th page.

DOMESTIC ITEMS.

THE receipts of foreign gold and silver, and from California, at New York and at Boston for New York account, since January 1, are as follows:

Foreign gold entered at New York	$34,670,000
Foreign gold entered at Boston	7,636,000
California gold at New York	27,208,000
Total income of gold since January 1	$69,514,000

THE Union State Ticket in Ohio has been elected by between 50 and 75 thousand majority.

From Santa Fe, New Mexico, information has been received of an attack made upon Fort Fontleroy by 400 Navajoes. The troops in the fort, however, repulsed the rebels, killing 20 and taking 14 prisoners, suffering the small loss of but one wounded.

EX-PRESIDENT BUCHANAN offers $50 reward for the return of a silver-plated harness, which has been stolen from his carriage-house, and for the arrest of the thief. Some one inquires whether Floyd has been to visit him lately?

MISSOURI is one of the largest States in the Union. Its territory exceeds in extent the six New England States and the State of Delaware combined. It is divided into upward of 100 counties. The State extends about 285 miles from east to west, and 280 miles from north to south.

THE Washington (N. C.) Dispatch announces that Mr. Selby Spencer, of Hyde county, has succeeded in raising 10 or 12 bushels of green tea—the veritable China tea—on his premises the present year. The seed was obtained years ago from an English captain, and the Dispatch thinks that Mr. Spencer's experiment demonstrates that it can be successfully raised in North Carolina. It is said to make a beverage nearly equal to the China tea.

THE popular subscriptions to the 7 3-10 per cent. loan at New York continue on a liberal scale, reaching the past week nearly $3,000,000. The whole individual subscriptions at New York since the 19th August amount to $15,380,000. On Tuesday, October 1, the Associated Banks passed to the credit of the Government the additional sum of $35,000,000, being the New York quota of the second general guarantee upon the Treasury bonds.

A VERY brilliant review of cavalry and artillery took place in Washington, on the 8th. About 5,000 cavalry and 18 batteries of artillery took part, and the display was most satisfactory. After the review a most unfortunate accident occurred. As Cooper's Pennsylvania artillery were proceeding from the field to their camp, in passing along Pennsylvania avenue, and directly in front of the President's mansion, the contents of a caisson attached to one of the guns exploded, mortally wounding one soldier and injuring two others.

WAR NEWS.

The Battle of Chicamacomico—Bloody Rout of the Rebels.

FLUSHED by their success in the capture of the Fanny, the rebels organized an expedition consisting of six steamers and sailing vessels, carrying between 2,000 and 3,000 men, for the surprise and capture of the camp of the 20th Indiana regiment, at Chicamacomico, on Hatteras Island, 40 miles to the north of Hatteras Inlet. On the 4th the expedition reached its position, and, while shelling the camp, landed a large body of troops above the position and another body below, to cut off the retreat of the National forces, in case of an attempt to retreat on Fort Hatteras. Colonel Brown, finding resistance to the superior force of the rebels, supported by their flotilla, hopeless, retreated, with a small loss in the way of pickets captured, and under cover of night succeeded in passing the division sent to cut him off, unobserved, and reached Hatteras Light, 15 miles from Fort Hatteras, in the morning. Here he was met by Colonel Hawkins with 500 men, marching to his relief, supported by the frigate Susquehanna and the gunboat Monticello. The troops halted here, prepared, under the cover of the guns of the Susquehanna, to dispute the advance of the rebels, while the Monticello steamed along the shore to ascertain their position. Fifteen miles above the lighthouse she discovered them advancing along the barren, narrow, sandy spit which constitutes the island, and at once opened on them with her guns with terrible effect. They attempted to retreat, but the Monticello kept parallel with them, pouring in a constant storm of shot and shell. In vain they sought shelter in copses of scrubby trees and under cover of the sand hills—still the iron storm sought them out. Many waded out in the water, to escape the shot, while the main body retreated hastily towards their boats, and attempted to re-embark. Still the implacable Monticello played on their exposed flank with unabated fury, until the rebel flotilla came within range, when she directed her fire on the vessels composing it, sinking two schooners loaded with men, and seriously damaging their steamers, and compelling them to draw off out of range. This terrible bombardment was kept up until night lent its protection to the harassed enemy, and under cover of its darkness they got aboard their vessels and fled in dismay to the mainland, with a loss in killed and wounded estimated at some hundreds. Among the killed was Colonel Bartow, of Georgia, and a large number of officers. A correspondent describes the carnage among the rebels as horrible: "Their dead bodies strew the beach for miles, and the sand is covered with their muskets, knapsacks and blankets."

Attack on the "Billy Wilson Regiment" on Santa Rosa Island.

WE have the rebel accounts of an attack on the Billy Wilson regiment, encamped on Santa Rosa Island, near Fort Pickens, on the night of the 8th instant, probably in attempted retaliation for the surprise and destruction of the privateer Judith. The attacking party is said to have consisted of detachments from several Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama regiments. The Zouaves are credited with having fought with great bravery, and the rebels admit a loss of 10 killed and about double that number wounded. Indeed, the dispatch indirectly indicates that the rebels eventually got the worst of the fight, although they claim to have spiked the guns of the Zouaves, destroyed all their camp equipage, and committed great slaughter among them. It will be remembered that some time ago the Zouaves were moved some distance from Fort Pickens, and located in a somewhat isolated position.

Daring Naval Exploit.

ON the 10th, Lieut. Harrell, commanding the steamer Union of the Potomac flotilla, stationed at the mouth of Aquia Creek, learning that the rebels had fitted out a large schooner in Quantico or Dumfries Creek, and had collected a considerable body of troops there, with the intention of crossing the Potomac, determined that the schooner should be destroyed. He accordingly organized an expedition, and with one boat and two launches entered the mouth of the creek about half-past two o'clock on the morning of the 11th. The schooner was discovered some distance up, in charge of a single sentry, who fled and gave the alarm. She was immediately boarded and set on fire, and when her destruction was rendered certain, Lieutenant Harrell's men returned to their boats and pulled again for the steamer. Their position was fully revealed by the light of the burning schooner, and they were fired upon continuously from both banks of the narrow stream, but not one of them was injured, though their clothing in many instances was perforated with bullets. The success of the enterprise was complete.

Naval Engagement on the Mississippi.

THE gunboats Tyler and Lexington, while reconnoitreing down the Mississippi river on the 7th, fell in with the rebel gunboat Jeff. Davis. They chased her to within two miles of Columbus, Kentucky, when the batteries on the Kentucky shore opened on them. The rebels used some twenty guns, some of which were rifled cannon. The engagement lasted an hour. No damage was done to the boats. The rebel loss has not been ascertained.

Burning of Osceola, Missouri.

THE particulars of the burning of Osceola, in Missouri, by General Lane, are thus stated by a letter of September 30, from Jefferson City, Missouri, in the Chicago Tribune: "News came here this morning that General Lane had burned the town of Osceola, St. Clair county. The circumstances are thus related. Ten days ago he fought a body of rebels marching to join Price, at a place called Papinsville, on the Osage river, in Bates county. He rather got the worst of the fight, and lost the gallant and esteemed Colonel Johnson. He fell back toward Mound City, where he obtained considerable reinforcements, and then marched in quest of rebels. He pounced on several small bodies, captured their horses and other property, and continued to Osceola, which he entered on Wednesday last. While marching through the streets he was fired upon from the windows of the houses, some of his men were killed, many wounded, and he narrowly escaped himself, his horse being shot. He repaid this treachery and assassination by burning all that part of the place from whence the shots proceeded. A large number of contrabands were taken, and the troops were quartered on the subjects of Jeff. Davis."

PERSONAL.

IT is said that Brigadier-General Pierce, late commanding at Big Bethel, Virginia, is now serving as a private soldier in Colonel Fletcher Webster's regiment, thus giving the strongest evidence of his devotion to his country.

GENERAL SHERMAN has been ordered to the chief command in Kentucky. It is due to that gallant and distinguished officer, General Robert Anderson, that it should be known that this change has been made at his request, owing to the precarious condition of his health.

ADELINA PATTI has been invited to sing at the coronation of the King of Prussia next month, at Konisberg. Meyerbeer recently sent to ask if she would take the character of Dinorah, in his opera of that name, about to be performed at Berlin.

MAZZINI is engaged in writing "Memoirs of his Life and Times," a work which will embrace a good deal of the secret history of European events during the last thirty years.

THOMAS H. CLAY, youngest son of Henry Clay, does not follow his elder brother, John B. Clay, but has written a most patriotic letter, which closes thus: "The fiery cross is gleaming everywhere; the friends of the Southern Confederacy are fleeing from our borders, and what will be left will be pure gold with but little treasonable alloy. Beaten back from Kentucky, the war must be carried into their own territories, their leaders must be surrendered, and the Constitution and laws must be vindicated." Chip of the old block, all hail! Thus would have spoken gallant Harry!

OBITUARY.

COM. WM. H. BALL, U. S. N., died of disease of the heart on the 10th of September, while in command of the U. S. sloop of war Marion, when within two or three days sail of Fort Pickens. He was born in the city of Washington, 19th April, 1811, was appointed a midshipman, from the State of Ohio, and entered the service April 1st, 1825. His total sea service was 14 years and 7 months, and on shore and other duty 8 years. He was in the service nearly 33 years.

HON. KINGSLEY S. BINGHAM, United States Senator from Michigan, died of apoplexy, at his residence, at Green Oak, on Saturday. He was born in Camillus, Onondaga county, N. Y., Dec. 16, 1808. He received a fair academic education, and was early placed in the office of a lawyer as clerk, where he served three years. In 1833 he emigrated to Michigan and settled upon a farm. Elected in 1837 to the Michigan Legislature, he served five years as a member of that body. He afterwards served three years as Speaker of the same body. He was a Representative in Congress from Michigan from 1849 to 1851, and served during that time on the Committee of Commerce. In 1854 he was elected Governor of the State, and held that position till 1859, when he was elected to the United States Senate.

COMMANDER WILLIAM MAY, of the United States Navy, died on October 10th, at his residence on the Eastern shore of Maryland. Commander May was the fifth son of the late Dr. F. May, of Washington city, and is a brother of the late Captain Julian May of the United States Army, and of Colonel Charles May, distinguished for his intrepid conduct in the Mexican war, under General Taylor. Commander May entered the navy in 1831, and was promoted to a lieutenancy in 1842. He behaved gallantly in the war with Mexico, and was severely wounded by a musket ball shattering his right arm, in the attack on Tuspan.

THEATRICAL AND MUSICAL.

THE theatres, with the exception of the Winter Garden, present nothing new. "The Seven Sons," which is undergoing gradual expurgation, still holds its place at Laura Keene's Theatre. The novelty of the week at the Winter Garden is a grand spectacular piece, "Napoleon the Great," and the play of "Lavater," with Mr. Walcot as principal character. The first-named piece presents three fine tableaux—"Napoleon on the Rock of St. Helena," "The Attempted Escape of the Emperor," and "Napoleon's Chamber and Death."

AT the Academy of Music, Hermann, after delighting crowded houses for nearly a month with his prestidigitations, on the 17th gave place to the Muse of Melody, the occasion being Mr. Ullman's first benefit. The piece was the popular opera of "Il Ballo in Maschera." On Monday evening, the 21st, will be given two new operas, "Betly," by Donizetti, and the charming comic opera of "Les Noces de Jeannette," never before produced in this country, and a concert by Carlotta Patti—a musical combination unprecedented in the history of the Academy. We cannot doubt that a grateful public will respond with generous liberality to the appeal of the persevering and unselfish manager, and make his benefits what they ought to be, not only a tribute of regard to the man, but as an effective guarantee of a new and successful opera season.

"GREAT EXPECTATIONS" is having a splendid run at Barnum's Museum. It is well acted, and most of the characters are sustained with a truthfulness and vigor which would do credit to any stage. It is so rare now-a-days to find any piece which has a consistency and a rational development, that "Great Expectations" has the effect of positive novelty.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART.

TWO books on America, or relating to American matters, have lately made their appearance in Paris. The first is "Le Nouveau Monde: Scenes de la Vie Americaine:" The New World; Scenes in American Life, by M. Oscar Commettant, with a preface by M. Louis Jourdan, of the Siecle newspaper. The work consists of a series of detached chapters or stories, containing each, we presume, a certain amount of fiction; but the fiction is skilfully blended with the truth, and renders the whole exceedingly attractive. Both M. Jourdan and M. Commettant are decidedly opposed to slavery. They believe that in adopting this institution as one of the elements in our political structure the first legislators of the United States prepared unconsciously the calamities from which we are now suffering, and they blame particularly the Roman Catholic Church for conniving at the adoption of a system which is directly opposed to the fundamental principles of Christianity.

The second is "Thomas Jefferson: Etude Historique sur la Democratie Americaine," by M. Cornelius de Witt. The position of the author and the character of his undertaking have given him access to most valuable sources of information. Besides the printed documents which contribute to elucidate the life, labors and political career of Jefferson, he has been able to consult freely the diplomatic correspondence of the Duke de Choiseul, the Count de Vergennes, and other French statesmen, whose despatches are preserved at the Paris Foreign Office.

The great literary novelty of the season in Paris, however, is "Œuvres Complètes de W. Shakespeare," François Victor Hugo, Traducteur, Paris. The text in this translation is said to be rendered with fidelity and spirit, and the volumes have been received by the French public with remarkable favor. Their popularity is demonstrated by their extensive sale. The first translation of the great English bard into French was made by M. Letourneur in the 18th century, and all other translations, until the appearance of this of M. Hugo, were based upon Letourneur's version, and not upon English text. Letourneur's translation was so full of periphrases, circumlocution, and ignorance of his author, that it baffled M. Guizot's best efforts to bring it into anything like harmony with the original.

ELECTRO-STEREOTYPED AT CHROMOTYPE FOUNDRY, 1861

ENCOUNTER OF THE LAWYER AND THE JAILOR IN THE CEMETERY.

The Graveyard Secret;

A Narrative of Criminal Administration in Germany.

There are both just and unjust laws. For, even among the best, are the full and faithful exponents of right. But the most unjust law may be rendered harmless when administered by an intelligent and sympathizing judge, as the best may become perverted if the presiding magistrate be negligent or unscrupulous. And if both just and unjust laws exist, as there ever also both appeal and the exponents of them.

"Let us not then more a bus and my regular legislation as past times, upon the literature of any abuse in the administration of justice in lays gone by: let us not exclaim, in the spirit of the Pharisee, 'Such an abuse of power is impossible in our day!'"

Such was the tenor of a letter which I lately received from one of the ablest and most respected magistrates of Germany, forwarded with the accompanying manuscript, which he begged might be published. The events whose recital it contains took place in days long past, and have occurred at the present time; and their species in months elsewhere in the earth, or in interest. The manuscript begins:

CHAPTER I.—A GRAVEYARD ENCOUNTER.

At the period of which I write, I had just been admitted to the bar, and was proud of the liberal education which I had received; and, although not earning a farthing, I devoted myself to my profession with a degree of earnestness which ultimately secured its rewards. I was in the office of the chief magistrate of the little town in which I was born. This town was on an impoverished and sparsely populated district. But my future was not restricted by its narrow limits; the whole country was open to me, and I looked upon it as a domain over which I should exercise jurisdiction some day or other.

So, to become familiar with the district which I should, indeed, soon be my own, I decided, during my vacation, to travel over it on foot. It is a fine country, that, with the exception of a few of the most flourishing and greatest in extent of any in Germany.

"Shall you visit ——?" inquired my principal, on hearof her of my plans for the summer.

"Certainly," I replied. "I intend visiting that and every other town in which a court is held."

"I wish, then," continued my mother, "that you would make inquiries concerning a friend of my girlhood, called Nettchen Thalman, who resided in ——."

"Where, mother?"

"Oh, at least twenty years ago."

"Is she married?"

"Certainly."

"What is her husband's name?"

"I have really forgotten. He was a mechanician—a great genius, it was said. You will hear his name on landing here. Go and see Nettchen, and bring me all the news about her."

I could not repress a smile, it was excited by a remembrance which was brought to my mind by my mother's request.

Four years previously, when about leaving home to attend college, my father said to me at parting:

"Do not forget to pay your respects to Frau Schmidt, and remember me most affectionately to him as well as to his family. While I was pursuing my studies I was very much indebted to his house. Remember me particularly to his eldest daughter, the fair Augusta. But beware of her, she is a coquette, and has a dreadful fan. In times gone by she had designs on—— But I hope you will manifest as good prudence and reserve as did your father."

After having promised all my father desired I set out for the university, and in the very day of my arrival called upon Frau Schmidt.

Good Heavens! Was this indeed the "fair Augusta," who twenty-five years before had held sureties for my father, and against whom I had received such solemn injunctions to protect my heart? Twenty years to his more on a girl's beauty then my father could have supposed! It is true that her effect upon her property was not so decided, for in this respect the "fair Augusta" was unchanged. Only it was no longer with the flashes that she presented; she had now many gray hairs and too few teeth for that now; her thoughts and attentions were directed to God.

My mother, who spoke of her friend as if they had been parted but one or two years, recalled this souvenir to my mind, and made me smile. I, however, promised to attend to her commission, and then left to pursue the day following.

There was a journey this I was on the road leading to Z——. It was a fine, warm day, and I was in very merry mood. I had just left college, and gathering nuts and flowers, as I journeyed slowly onward. It was only an evening spent with friends, and the happiness because rather that I actually made more progress towards home.

I had intended to reach that town during the day, but was imperfectly familiar with it, and so made up my mind, on learning by the way that I would now scarcely hope to arrive there before ten or eleven o'clock.

The air was so refreshing, the night so beautiful, the landscape so brilliantly illumined by the moon's silvery rays, that I unwisely quickened my pace, finding a strange pleasure in prolonging my delightful journey.

But towards eleven o'clock dark clouds, charged with electricity, began to obscure the moon's rays, and presently a storm arose. I urged my steps therefore, for the prospect of being drenched to the skin, even if on August night, is not alluring.

It must have been about midnight when I perceived, on my left, a number of lights and the contour of several sombre objects—houses doubtless, the outlines of which were vaguely visible against the frowning sky. I supposed myself, therefore, from the hour and position, to be at Z——, the town of whose I had inquired the way. It rightfull, had informed me that the first straight road to the right led directly to the town, but that I could leave the highway by taking a bypath which led to an old convent situated on the south-ists of the place.

The night was too dark for me to see any distance in advance, so, finding a path to the left which seemed to lead in the direction where I had discerned the lights, I turned into it.

All at once the lights, which were now my only guides, disappeared from view, as if suddenly extinguished, and the conviction forced itself upon me that I had mistaken my way.

I endeavored to retrieve my steps, but so dense was the darkness that I could not succeed. I even certainly lost. I found myself in the midst of brambles and thorny bushes, tightly interlaced, and on singularly uneven ground. Enormous old gravestones presented themselves each other. I stumbled at every step, while my garments were caught at every turn by the thorns, and on putting my hands before me to feel my way, they became cruelly scratched and lacerated.

First I went to the right, then to the left, then I retraced my steps until in the vain hope of advancing in a straight line; but on every side I found myself struggling over eminences and depressions and entangled in by brambles on all sides.

Thus I had wandered about for fully from the clouds by which it was obscured, when, at a short light over the scene. At the same moment a clear and sonorous sound fell upon my ears. It was the church clock striking twelve, not fifteen steps from where I stood. I approached it, and found myself in a cemetery, in the midst of sunken graves.

The consciousness of being alone, at midnight, in a strange country, in a cemetery where the toppling tombs seem ready to open, is not pleasant to anyone.

Involuntarily I turned my head, expecting the graveyard to shift and gliostly tenants. But only was the moon and brambles around me, and a skull, on which I happened to tread, rolled a few paces from me and then fell on the ground heavily in my very face.

I was soon reassured, however, by the thought that after all I had strayed but little out of my way. The road which I had taken was the one designated by my father, and following it along the outside the walls of the cemetery, I had entered the burying ground itself. I was, therefore, in the suburbs of Z——, and had only to go towards the convent to find the right road to the town.

That locker me round the church, with a clock tower, and behind it rose the pointed battlements and frowning turrets of the old convent. I advanced, and, passing in total darkness. I endeavored, however, to continue on my way, when suddenly I heard a strange moaning sound. It seemed to come from the ground beneath my very feet. The sound was faint but perfectly distinct. I shuddered, and my face seemed to stand on end.

I stopped to listen, and heard the sound several times repeated.

It was the moaning of a living being, and it proceed from a deserted grave of another world." Was the tomb at my feet about to give up its dead?

I look around in search of a light or some other indication of life. The convent was certainly inhabited, the striking of the church clock proved that, but I saw no light in any of its windows. The night was as silent as it was dark.

The moans audibly recurred, but were succeeded by a cry of distress which was faint and smothered, but none the less painful to hear, on this wild and desolate spot.

I found myself at once under the influence of both fear and curiosity. The last impulse was the stronger of the two, while the former served me to the spot. I felt after a moment's reflection that it was almost impossible for me to leave the place, while my interference might be of hope so necessary to some suffering fellow being. I was just about to call out, when the cry of distress was heard, now ground reached by my ear. It was similar to that of a dog gnawing on its hinges.

After this I heard several moans, which seemed to issue from under my kind. Still I was unwilling to leave the spot without some attempt to ascertain the cause of the mysterious sounds which had ceased so suddenly, and which I could not but fancy had been heard from beneath my feet.

I was now entirely myself again. I struck the ground with my stick, exclaiming, "Is there any one?"

There was no response. All was silent. I struck the ground again.

"Who is there?" cried I; "who needs assistance?" and I addressed the question to the dead.

As I did this, there was a sudden movement, a short distance from me, and the tombstone rose as if some spirit were about to make its way through them.

"Who goes there?" I repeated.

No one replied, but the swelling among the headstones continued. I sprang forward and stumbled against a headstone, yet fancied I could discern the outline of a tall and slight figure hurrying rapidly from the spot.

I was motionless with astonishment, wondering whether the object which I had seen was a living being or a phantom, and, if the former, what its object could be in this solitary spot, at such an hour, and why he had vanished at the sound of my voice.

But I was roused from these reflections by the sound of footsteps approaching me. Involuntarily I grasped my walking stick tightly, yet against the object which I now saw advancing I at once felt that it could do but little. I could not avoid a shudder as I saw two red flaming eyes fixed upon me.

A sudden gleam of light at this moment disclosed to me that I was near a very high wall—the wall of the convent, on the other side of which I should have been, had I not strayed my way.

I now began to feel actual terror. All the old stories of monks, concealed and tortured, of nuns buried alive, which I had heard or read, recurred to my mind. I was aware, it is true, that over a hundred years before the monastic system had been abolished in the country, but even this failed to reassure me. For, so far as ghostand superstitions are concerned, I am one of the men who may think lightly of them at home and by daylight, is intinitely less courageous and incredulous at midnight, in an old cemetery. So I began to ask myself if the nuns which I had heard had not issued from the darkness like those of many hapless nuns or monks, the victims of the religious hallucinations of the Middle Ages, confirmed even might to watch and pray among the tombs.

As I grew accustomed to the light which had broken in upon the scene, I distinguished a figure, a tall, mysterious man, bending in one hand a dark lantern, the light of which had suddenly dazzled me, while in his other he grasped a formidable stick. And this side, in menacing attitude, stood an enormous dog, gazing at me with lowering, fiery eyes.

Although the man was gray, he seemed possessed of the utmost vigor, and his long woollen jacket and old fur cap, dropped over his eyes, contributed to give him a sinister and malignant expression.

"What are you doing here?" he inquired, in a hoarse, sepulchral voice.

Repugnant as was the man's appearance, and discourteous and threatening as was his tone, still my fears vanished in an instant. He was no phantom of the Middle Ages! And my self-possession, so insolently imperious, I was too familiar with not to set him down at once, in some subordinate official.

"My friend," I replied, "will you show me the direct road to Z——?"

His expression became still more dark and threatening. He answered me from head to foot.

"You called out a few moments ago?" he inquired.

"I did, indeed."

"Follow me?"

"Where?"

"You shall see."

"But, my friend——"

"I am not your friend!"

"Well, then, friend or enemy, I have no time to follow you. I am going to Z——, and have lost my way. Will you, yes or no, direct me to the road?"

He reflected for a moment, and then exclaimed,

"Come on!"

"You will show me the road to Z——?"

"Yes."

He set off at once. His huge dog, which had stood by during the conversation, now followed at a ferocious pace, and which seemed only to be awaiting his order to tear me in pieces, preceded him by a single step. They were well trained indeed!

I followed my guide along the wall.

"Where are we?" I inquired as we proceeded.

"Can't you see for yourself?" He tone was curt and harsh.

I made no reply to this, but I said, with a view to turn into conversation.

"Evidently, and try in future not to disturb the public rest by such shouts, or you will not get off so easily."

"Where could you have been to have heard me?"

"Mind your own affairs."

"Do you know why I called out?"

"I neither know, nor wish to know the reason."

"I heard moans issuing from——"

"Every fool fancies he hears strange sounds at night in a grave. Silence!"

"But what I heard might have been heard by the most rational man in the world. Moans——"

He turned on me suddenly at these words, and throwing the full light of his lantern upon my face, continued it with an air of menace, seeking apparently to read my very thoughts, and I believed (not without reason, perhaps) that he was debating in his own mind, not the propriety of disposing of me, but the time and manner of doing so.

His dog seemed to follow his thoughts, and gave a low naked growl. I must confess to a feeling of alarm. I was not quite sure as to my exact whereabouts, and perhaps, after all, I was deemed in equivocating company in advance of my land. But, although exasperless and indolence are the usual characteristics of these men, still there are those who are not to be thus. My guide, however, scrutinized on his way, and a moment after, pointing to the right, he said,

"Take that road, it leads to Z——."

Then closing his lantern, he left me in total darkness. He had as suddenly disappeared with his dog as if swallen up by the earth, and I remained in a state of stupefaction, in doubt as to whether I was sleeping or waking.

After having listened for a few moments and hearing nothing of my late companions, I advanced in the direction of some lights which I supposed were shining in the windows of the houses of Z——. In ten minutes I was at the inn door of the town.

My desire to obtain some information likely to throw light on my strange adventure was necessarily repressed until morning, for much as every one had retired at the inn, with the exception of a maid who seemed to see to the things to give any satisfactory information.

The Graveyard Secret.

CHAPTER II.—THE GRAVEYARD BY DAYLIGHT.

Next morning I hastened to question my host in reference to the convent and the graveyard. I resolved also to make inquiries concerning my mother's friend, although I had little hope of obtaining information concerning her.

"Have you a mechanician in your town?" I inquired of my host.

"Sir," he replied, with an amusing toss of his head, "our city can boast of two, both of considerable renown. One has not his equal in——"

"What are their names?"

"One is named Muller, and the other Schultze."

"Are they married?"

"Muller's wedding will come off next week."

"And the other?"

"He is a widower."

"Do you know his wife's maiden name?"

"Theresa Shrader. She died last year."

"Did you ever hear of one Nettchen Thalmann?"

"Never, sir."

It was evident there was nothing further to be ascertained in this quarter. My duty fulfilled to my mother, my next thought was to gratify my curiosity.

"There is a convent at the entrance to the town, is there not?" I queried.

"Yes, sir, but it has long been closed."

"Ah! since when?"

"For over a hundred years."

"Was it a monastery or a nunnery?"

"A nunnery."

"Is it inhabited at the present time?"

"It is our baily."

"The seat of the bailiwick?" I exclaimed, in astonishment.

"Certainly, sir," replied the host; then shrugging his shoulders, he added,

"We are still living under the old system; and though the inconveniences are universally admitted of investing a single man with the powers of judge and bailiff, still with us the administration of justice and of finance are conducted by the same person."

I continued without replying to the man's reflection on an abuse the evil consequences of which had come under my own observation:

"Do the employés of the bailiwick inhabit the convent?"

"All except two or three."

"Is there not among them a large, gray-haired man—a kind of giant, with a hard, sinister countenance?"

"I think I know to whom you refer."

"He wears a woollen jacket and fur cap."

"Precisely."

"And has a surly dog?"

"A black dog."

"You know him then?"

"Certainly. He is Martin Kraus, the jailor of the prison."

"The jailor?"

What light did this simple information cast upon my adventure of the preceding night, and a light so sinister and fearful!

Then it was the jailor who had dismissed me from the cemetery, when, responding to the mysterious moans which came apparently from the depths of the earth, I had betrayed my presence in that vicinity. He also must have heard those moans. Perhaps it was he even who had imposed silence on the poor wretch that uttered them, and who had opened the door which had grated on its hinges. What sufferings, physical and mental, must the poor prisoner have endured to indicate his pain in sounds so full of lamentation and despair!

But whence came those moans? from a cell in the old church? from some subterranean passage beneath the cemetery? Was it possible that justice had confined her prisoners in those sombre dungeons, the odious monuments of the barbarism of the Middle Ages? I could scarcely believe this, and yet it seemed the only way of accounting for the distrust of the jailor and his strange rough manner of replying when I referred to the sounds which I had heard. A strange presentiment came over me, that I had raised a corner of the veil which covered some dark mystery.

I continued to interrogate my host, giving myself little uneasiness as to whether or not he considered my curiosity strange or importunate.

"Are there many prisoners confined in the jail?" I inquired.

"About twenty. But they are only petty thieves or paupers."

"Where is the prison situated?"

"In a portion of the convent."

"Is it not near the old church?"

"No, sir; it is quite to the other side of the convent."

A little disconcerted by this reply, which upset my calculations, I continued, after a moment's reflection.

"Are there not some ghost-stories connected with the old convent?"

"Is there any convent about which some do not exist?"

"Do you know any connected with this one?"

"Sir," said my host, with so comic an air of self-sufficiency that I could scarcely repress a smile. "Sir, the belief in spectres and phantoms is a superstition which I abandon to the lower classes."

"But," I insisted, "it is not necessary to believe in them, to find them interesting."

"I have always considered these stories," he replied, "unworthy to occupy even the leisure moments of an intelligent being."

I had elicited all that I could from my host. It was only to the old convent, then, that I could turn for the key to this enigma.

Now, the principal object of my journey to Z—— was precisely to visit this place, and to have an interview with the chief magistrate, relative to the mode of administering justice in this town, one of the most important in my future jurisdiction. I also hoped there to obtain some information respecting my mother's friend.

I set out, therefore, for the old convent. Before entering it, however, I wished to examine, by daylight, the scene of my adventure of the preceding night. I easily succeeded in finding the road, and was not long in reaching the cemetery.

The old convent, now the seat of the bailiwick, was distant about five or six hundred yards from the town. It was a long, quadrangular building, with high and narrow windows. To the right, was an old abandoned church, surmounted by a heavy awkward clock, in a massive octagonal tower, which the hand of time had left almost intact; and on the same side, but farther behind, on a line with the convent, were the stables, and still farther on was a fine, large garden. These buildings were surrounded by a high, old wall, which, however, did not enclose the garden, hedged in by ivy, nor the church, the façade of which opened on the cemetery, contiguous to the garden, and was separated from the road by the wall referred to.

The cemetery, which had long previously fallen into disuse, presented that aspect of desolation which had so deeply impressed me on the preceding night. The graves, covered with weeds and bushes, were mostly destitute of headstones and crosses, and in many instances had fallen in. Vainly did I seek to identify the spot whence I heard the moans, every portion of the cemetery presented the same aspect—that of utter desolation and ruin.

My only landmark was the old wall, near which I had found myself. It was evidently that which separated the graveyard from the road. But although I examined every tomb in its vicinity, I found nothing to indicate the precise spot where I had met the jailor or from whence I had heard the mysterious sounds.

But what astonished me most was, that in the whole length of the wall I found only the gate through which the jailor had ushered me into the road. It was not through this that he entered the cemetery, for it was towards the right, in the direction of the garden that I had first heard the sound of his footsteps. I could not comprehend how he could have came upon me so suddenly, nor could I explain his instantaneous and mysterious disappearance.

The church, it is true, communicated with the cemetery, by a large portal and by a small side-door. But the portal, the hinges of which I carefully examined, was covered with cobwebs and dust, evidently the accumulation of years, while the small side-door, which doubtless led to the sacristy, was closed on the outside, with a huge bar of iron fixed in the wall.

There remained then, only the hedge, which separated the cemetery from the garden. But there was no opening in this, and the branches of ivy were tightly interlaced. Still, perhaps, a passage through it might have been practicable, but had the jailor reached me through the hedge I should certainly have heard a rustling sound, and even admitting that this had not impressed itself upon my mind, his sudden disappearance was none the less inexplicable.

In a word, in spite of my minute investigation of the cemetery, the enigma remained unexplained, and an unexpected incident complicated matters still further.

Wearied with the fruitlessness of my researches, I walked slowly away from the church, keeping close to the hedge of ivy, which was high and dense, and concealed me from the view of persons who might be in the garden, while the grass beneath my feet was so thick as to deaden the sound of my steps. When I had come to the end of the walk, a spectacle met my eyes which riveted me to the spot.

At the extreme end of the hedge was a small trellised doorway which I had not previously remarked, and which communicated with the garden and the cemetery. On the sill of this door stood two persons, one of whom was a girl of thirteen or fourteen, simply but elegantly attired. Although only a child in years, she had the roundness of form and the dignified and reserved bearing of a woman. But I was struck with the pallor of her face and the expression of sadness reflected in her magnificent eyes and on her delicately cut features. By her side was a youth of sixteen or seventeen, evidently her inferior in social position. His was one of those frail, delicate organizations which so early outgrow their strength. The angel of death had already marked him as his own, judging from his marble pallor, his sunken chest and hollow eyes.

On perceiving me, the young couple started and drew back. They had not thought me so near, and surprised by my sudden appearance, were confused and terrified. Their confusion and embarrassment convinced me that they must have been watching my movements, perhaps from the time of my entrance into the cemetery.

A sudden thought struck me. At first it was only a vague suspicion—a confused remembrance. But the more I reflected, the more distinct did it become, and the suspicion speedily vanished to give place to a certainty. The young man whom I now saw was the tall, slender youth who had fled from me on the preceding night. He also had recognized me. I could discern it in his looks. He had, doubtless, related the adventure to the young girl, and both had, consequently, watched my movements with curiosity. That which strengthened me in this opinion was the confusion which they manifested, and which was certainly unwarranted by the simple appearance of a stranger under ordinary circumstances, and they were conscious that I remarked all this.

I had not been able, it is true, to distinguish the features of the young man who had so strangely crossed my path, and should have felt puzzled to have explained by what means I identified him, and yet I was none the less sure of having done so. It was in my own mind more even than a conviction; it was a certainty.

Yet I could neither divine his purpose for being in the graveyard at such an hour, nor for avoiding me so mysteriously when I called out; nor could I comprehend the expression of melancholy so deeply imprinted on his features and on those of his fair companion.

As I had no pretext for accosting the young people, I left the cemetery and proceeded to the old convent, or, as the townsfolks now called it, the Baily. Here alone could I hope to find a clue to the mystery, which I decided to leave nothing undone to unravel. In spite of what I had learned from the innkeeper, I was convinced that the moans which I had heard proceeded from the prison, and that chance had put me on the track of some mysterious crime, in which the jailor and perhaps some of his superiors were implicated. I decided upon my course of action as I walked along, and the first person whom I inquired for was the chief magistrate of the bailiwick.

At this period this person was an infinitely more powerful individual than is the president of a tribunal or a director of police of the present day. He was then, within the limits of his jurisdiction, an absolute sovereign, a veritable autocrat.

CHAPTER III.—AN INTERVIEW WITH THE JUDGE.

The chief magistrate of Z—— was a stern but exceedingly intelligent man. His severity was imprinted on every feature of his face, while his love of order was apparent in his scrupulous neatness of dress and in his cold and reserved manners. Yet, in spite of this, I recognised in him a man whose early youth had been devoted to pleasure and dissipation.

He received me with extreme affability and politeness. And yet I fancied I traced a shade of annoyance in his face when I explained the object of my visit, and requested permission to inspect the baily, and to inform myself as to his mode of conducting its affairs.

He, however, promptly accorded me the permission I requested, and even had the courtesy himself to accompany me to the courtroom, and, register in hand, explain everything of interest to me.

In all parts of the establishment perfect order was observable. Every journal and every register was made up to the very day, and each clerk had his allotted task, to be completed at a certain hour.

In one of the corridors we met a man who was evidently in waiting.

"What is your business?" inquired the judge.

"The assessor summoned me to be here to-day."

"At what hour?"

"At nine o'clock."

"But it is already past that time."

"I was told that the assessor was engaged."

The judge opened a door.

"Assessor," he inquired, "did you summon this man at nine o'clock?"

The assessor blushed and stammered an excuse.

"I was occupied with important business which I could not postpone."

"This man has perhaps neglected some business of as great importance as your own, in order to be here at the appointed time," rejoined the judge. "Witnesses should not await your leisure, but rather you theirs."

And the assessor was obliged to give the man his immediate attention.

Several little incidents of the same kind occurred during my visit, which, though in themselves insignificant, were typical of the inflexible severity but extreme justice of the judge.

Consequently, I was totally unprepared for a little scene which subsequently took place in my presence.

The judge now conducted me to the registry, where the head-clerk was seated at a high desk, which overlooked a long table, around which were placed his subordinates. Among these was the youth whom a short time previously I had seen in company with the young girl. I recognised him from his pallor and languishing air. The recognition was mutual, for on seeing me he became still more ghastly, and his hand trembled so violently that it refused to hold his pen. His evident confusion did not escape the notice of the head-clerk, who bit his lips with anger and impatience.

He advanced to the post occupied by the delinquent, and inquired in a low but severe tone,

"Why did you cease writing?"

"I am ill to-day," was the youth's reply, in a feeble voice.

"I should think you might be, after vagabondizing all last night, and reaching your post so late this morning!"

The young man colored, and turned away to conceal his agitation.

The head-clerk's reprimand rendered me attentive to their conversation. The young man had passed the night out; which, if not an absolute proof of his presence in the cemetery, was at least a circumstance confirmatory of my suspicions.

"Since you will insist on going out at night, in spite of my prohibition," continued the chief-clerk, "I shall inform the judge of your misconduct. Your interests, as well as my duty, force me to do so."

He had spoken in so loud a voice that the judge turned, and inquired, "What is the matter?" but not in the severe tone which he had before assumed. On the contrary, his voice was so full of compassion and gentleness that it impressed me deeply.

The chief-clerk apparently did not remark this, for he exclaimed,

"Your honor, I have constantly to complain of Brunner; he arrived late at the office to-day, and has not written ten lines."

The judge was evidently annoyed, but he remained perfectly calm, and said kindly to the youth,

"Charles, I hope you will in future endeavor to give satisfaction to this gentleman."

This recommendation, which was scarcely uttered in a tone of reproach, did not seem to satisfy the head-clerk, for he continued,

"Your honor, he complains constantly of ill-health; but it is his his own fault. He passes every night out; even yesterday, the jailor saw him enter his room after midnight. This morning I inquired where he had been, but he refused to inform me; nor would he give any reason for his tardiness in reaching the office. Your honor shows him greater indulgence than he merits."

The judge frowned, and said more sternly to the youth,

"Charles, you are not doing your duty to your superior in withholding from him your explanations of your conduct."

The youth had neither spoken nor moved; his head was bowed over his paper, which was wet with tears.

The judge had just turned away, and was explaining one of the registers to me, when a side door opened suddenly, and the young girl whom I had met in the morning entered the room. She was evidently a prey to some strong emotion, and on seeing me she stopped suddenly. Her hesitation was only momentary, however, for she advanced to the judge, saying,

"Father, I have heard all—I was listening." And she raised her head proudly, as if to indicate that she had not been actuated by vulgar curiosity. "Charles was with me this morning; it was I who detained him. And I know where he spent last night. You, perhaps, can imagine, also, father, and cannot blame him. Now you know all."

The judge appeared to comprehend this explanation, which was perfectly unintelligible to me, and equally so, judging from their expression of astonishment, to the clerks. He became of marble paleness, and his glance, usually so cold and composed, quailed before his daughter's. In less time, however, than it has taken me to write this he had recovered his self-possession.

The judge's daughter was about to leave the room, when a sob from the young man caused her to change her purpose. Profoundly moved by the generous intervention of his young friend, he wept unrestrainedly.

The young girl sprang to his side.

"Oh, Charles, do not weep," she said, in tones full of compassion, while the tears glistened in her own eyes.

Then, turning to her father, she added,

"Let him come with me for a few moments; he is suffering so much to-day!"

"The judge knitted his brow, and said, gravely, to the young man,

"You may go with her, Charles."

"Thanks, father." And turning to Charles, she exclaimed, "Come with me," and, seizing him at the same time by the hand, she drew him away.

Although a mute spectator of this scene, I had watched it very closely. The generosity and courage of the girl in hastening to the relief of her young friend when unjustly accused, the dignity of her manner, her pity, so full of gentleness and sweetness for the poor sufferer, even to the firmness of her tone when addressing her father, had moved me deeply. And great had been my surprise at the manner in which the judge, that man so severe and inflexible, had listened to the explanations of his daughter, and yielded to her wishes. This almost passive submission to her will was evidently not induced by his love for her nor his friendship for the youth. To what could it then be attributed? This was a question which I found it impossible to answer.

SOUTHERN ITEMS.

The Richmond Dispatch states that the militia in Berkeley county, Virginia, having refused to join the army, peremptory orders were issued from military headquarters to force them in, or to treat them as deserters or alien enemies.

We have important information by way of Washington concerning the Bermuda, which so recently ran the blockade and entered Savannah. She is an iron-clad vessel of 1,500 tons burden; sailing from Liverpool on the 18th of August, she reached Savannah on the 16th of September. Her cargo contained 18 rifled cannon of 32 and 42 pounds; 2 Lancaster guns of 168 pounds weight; powder, shot and shells for this ordnance; 6,500 Enfield rifles; from 200,000 to 300,000 cartridges, 6,000 pairs of army shoes, 20,000 blankets, 180 barrels of gunpowder; a large quantity of morphine, quinine, and other medical stores. The cargo cost $1,000,000. The vessel is now fitting out as a pirate, to prey on the returning California steamers. It is said that Commander Totten is to have charge of her; also that two more iron-clad steam frigates are expected at Savannah, from England, by the 15th of the present month.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS.

Capture of the Propeller Fanny by the Rebels in Pamlico Sound.

One of the most annoying events of the week has been the capture of the Fanny, a steamer rendered historic by the surrender of Com. Barron, at Hatteras Point, on the 29th August. On the 1st October Col. Hawkins despatched her with two cannon, ammunition, supplies and and provisions to the camp of the 20th Indiana regiment, then stationed at Chicamacomico, a spot most ingeniously selected to encourage the enemy to either slay or capture our gallant troops. On board the Fanny were Quartermaster Hart and 25 of the Indiana regiment, Sergeant-Major Peacock and four of Hawkins's Zouaves. While they were landing their stores into boats, they were attacked, about five o'clock in the afternoon, by the rebel steamer Northampton and two rebel tugs, which came from the direction of Roanoke Island, and, after a brief engagement, the Fanny was surrendered to the enemy, for, owing to the shoal water, she could not go nearer Chicamacomico than four miles. It is a most suspicious circumstance that Capt. Morrison, who commanded the Fanny, and his crew took to their boats and escaped. When so little is known it would be premature to give an opinion, but a rigid inquiry should be made into the case, since to send a vessel like the Fanny in so defenceless a condition into so dangerous a locality was really courting the disaster which befel her. The value of the stores, etc., which were thus presented to the rebels is estimated at $50,000.

The Potomac Flotilla off the Mouth of Occoquan Creek.

The strong sympathy manifested by so many of the Marylanders for the rebel cause has rendered it necessary to prevent the possibility of any communication between the Secessionists of Maryland and the rebels in Virginia. For this purpose the Government has placed the Potomac flotilla at the most accessible point, thus holding in check the Confederate forces. Freestone Point is the place where batteries were some time ago erected by the rebels, with a view of interrupting the navigation of the Potomac.

View in Falls Village, Va.

By the recent withdrawal of the Rebel army, Falls Church has again come into our possession, and is now the headquarters of General Smith, who commands one division of our army. On the advance of the National troops on the 29th of September, an unfortunate collision took place between Baker's California regiment and Baxter's Pennsylvanians, each regiment mistaking the other as enemies. The error was not discovered till several volleys had been fired, and many killed and wounded.

Panoramic View of Falls Church and the Surrounding Scenery.

Munson's Hill, which was occupied by the rebels in their recent advance, and imperfectly fortified by them, is now held by the National troops, who are engaged in entrenching it in a formidable manner. It commands a wide view to the southward in the direction of Manassas, including Mason's Hill, the Village of Falls Church, and many other points which the events of the war have made famous.

Camp Lillie, Jefferson City, Mo.

Jefferson City, the capital of Missouri, is on the Missouri river, 142 miles from its mouth, 125 miles from St. Louis, and contains about 5,000 inhabitants. It is on the direct road of the Pacific Railroad. When the rebellion first broke out it was, of course, held by that arch-traitor, the then Governor of the State, Claib Jackson, but the activity of the heroic and lamented Lyon soon drove him from it, and the State capital has ever since remained in the hands of the National Government. The location of Jefferson City is very striking. On the towering hill which frowns over the Missouri stands the Capitol, built of magnesian limestone. The houses are very irregularly placed, looking more as though they had been thrown there rather than built. The town site is seamed with sharp ridges and deep hollows, running parallel with the river. These have been eagerly taken advantage of in constructing the fortifications. About a mile to the south of the city is the camp of Brig.-Gen. McKinstry, a portrait of whom appeared in our paper for September 21st.; 300 yards beyond are the headquarters of Major-Gen. Fremont, which are situated upon a beautiful slope, commanding a fine military prospect. It is called Camp Lillie, after his eldest daughter. Lillie Benton Fremont, a beautiful and brilliant girl of 15. At this minute many eyes and hearts are anxiously turned to Camp Lillie, where the Pathfinder is carrying out those plans the successful execution of which is so important to himself and to the Republic.

Escape of Union Troops from the Prison in Richmond.

AMONG the recent incidents of the war is the escape of James McHenry and Peter Reilly, of the gallant 69th regiment. They were taken at Bull Run. Being allowed to go out in Richmond to make purchases, they bought a couple of dark gray hunting shirts, such as are worn by the Virginian troops. In this disguise, on the 18th Sept. they passed the sentries in broad daylight, in company with Sergeant O'Donahue and other prisoners, and gained the suburbs of Richmond, travelling all night, and resting in the woods all day. After many narrow escapes the adventurers succeeded in reaching a hill overlooking Aquia Creek. During their journey they avoided habitations, and the only human beings they met was an occasional negro returning from a corn-husking spree. On leaving Richmond they had two pounds of crackers, which they made last them for two days. The rest of the time they lived on the ears of green corn which they roasted in the woods. On getting a view of the Potomac, they narrowly escaped a rebel cavalry picket. They skirted the shore, cautiously working upwards to Occoquan Creek, where they concealed themselves for three days in a fish-house, watching their chance of escape to the squadron, which they saw on the Potomac. Here they fell in with an old cooking pot, which enabled them to boil their corn. They also saw a sloop stranded in shore. No better chance offering, they constructed a raft, which, however, was not capable of bearing the whole party. Sergeant O'Donahue embarked alone on it, and was picked up by the Seminole and taken to Washington. The other two men, finding that O'Donahue did not send a boat for them, embarked on another raft, which they had constructed, and reached the Penguin. On the morning of the 30th September, at four o'clock, they were put on board the Yankee, and transferred to the Reliance, which carried them to Washington.

The Iron-plated Gunboat New Era.

THE New Era is one of three gunboats intended to maintain the supremacy of the National Government on the Missouri river. It is entirely plated with thick boiler iron, and carries 10 Dahlgren guns and 160 men. The lower part is made of heavy 10 inch oak timber, well seasoned. It will be observed that the principle developed in Charleston Harbor, that of placing the iron facings at an angle, so as to glance off shot, has been in part adopted in the defences of the New Era.

Shelling the Rebels across the Potomac.

ON Friday, 4th October, Major West, of Campbell's Pennsylvania Richmond Artillery, was ordered to shell a barn, in which there was every reason to conclude a large quantity of rebel provisions and supplies was stored. The Major, therefore, placed a Parrott gun on the heights of the Great Falls, and threw a few shells across the Potomac. Several of them fell into the barn, which had the effect of unhousing a number of rebel cavalry, who rode with all speed for the neighboring woods.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

CHAPTER XX.—CONTINUED.

LATER in the day I got up and dressed, and found Augustus in the kitchen.

"I have not distorted them," he said, gloomily; "but Sarah has been with them to see to their wants. They are quite calm, Sarah says, and are prattling away to each other, like little comforts, hand in hand. I am more certain than ever they cannot be again separated."

Augustus was not in a communicative mood. He was plotting, and he seldom divulged his plots until they were ripe for execution. Sarah, when she came to prepare tea, was in tears. She talked sadly and compassionately of the poor creatures up-stairs, and cast many wrathful and anxious glances at the stolid Augustus.

In the evening, while Augustus and I were sitting alone, the strange woman stole in upon us, and stood at the threshold watching us. The shadow of Ormanel was on the stairs behind her. I looked at her fixedly, and perceived more clearly that her face was gentler and softer, and to my more beautiful, than that of the lady who had professed to be my mamma.

Augustus started to his feet when he saw her, and looked at her nervously.

"Eugene!" said the woman, in a clear, hollow voice. "Am I right? You are Eugene."

"I am Eugene," answered Augustus, with a respectful sadness.

"Then we are old friends," she observed, holding out a thin white hand. "We are old friends. You have not forgotten me?"

"Forgotten you?" cried Augustus, taken off his guard. "Of course not."

"You last night rendered me a service which makes me your debtor for ever. I thank you, Eugene, from my heart; yet I fear that your interference was useless."

And she shuddered, as if some horrible picture had presented itself to her mind's eye.

"Last night, Eugene, I met one whom I had thought dead and buried. He seems to me, therefore, like one risen from the dead. But I suppose there is no fear for a strange dream."

"It is a strange reality," murmured Augustus, not meeting her inquiring look.

"So said to our meeting, that I almost wish it were the dream instead of the reality. Even now, I cannot bring myself to compare head to head."

She paused for a moment, and then, drawing closer to us, placed her hand with a pleading look on Augustus's arm, as she continued,

"Eugene, you have your wits about you. What are we to do?"

Augustus lowered his question with a self-composure for which I had not given him credit.

"Stay here. Keep hidden under this roof."

"Am I—are we—safe here?"

"Safe as in the Bank of England. Nobody shall harm you."

"I am afraid, Eugene; my blood runs cold. He said he would hound me out if I flew to the farthest corner of the earth, and I know he will do so."

"Curse him!" growled Augustus, with an impatient movement.

But the woman, who seemed cowed and helpless, knelt, with clasped hands, before him.

"Help us! help us!"

He lifted her gently to her feet, and placed her in a chair.

"Have no fear. Help you I will, if I'm hung for it. They shall not harm you."

"I should die now, if I was taken back to that horrible place. Save me!"

I was sitting in a dark corner, and she had glanced at me once or twice curiously. Her eyes now fell upon me, and she seemed trying to remember my face.

"Who is that?" she whispered, clinging to Augustus, and pointing at me.

I was quite astonished at the hardened falsehood which Augustus uttered so promptly.

"My friend. My cousin George."

She seemed partly satisfied by the answer, for her thoughts wandered again.

"And you will save me, Eugene—you will save me. But the boy, Eugene, the boy?"

"Is well."

"I remember his eyes, as I saw them last night, and your cousin's seem like them, Eugene."

Augustus laughed loudly, as if the notion tickled him hugely.

"Shall I see him soon? Oh, how I long to see him! I shall die if I do not see him."

DROP-PLATED STEAM GUNBOAT NEW ERA, ON THE MISSOURI RIVER, CARRYING TEN DARRIGNY GUNS.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ATTACHED TO GENERAL FREMONT'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 365.

"Of course you shall see him. Sarah!"

Sarah entered the kitchen.

"This lady will spend a day or two with us, and the new needs rest. Go with her, Sarah, to her room. Good night!"

He spoke kindly, but collectedly, and the woman obeyed without a murmur.

"Good night, Eugene," she said, and disappeared with Sarah. At the same moment the shadow of Ormanel flitted up-stairs. We heard a whispering of voices, and then all was quiet.

By-and-bye I also went to rest, on a bed extemporized on the kitchen floor. Before I undressed myself, Sarah entered the kitchen with her finger on her lips, and beckoned Augustus and myself up-stairs. She pointed to the door of what was once my room, and which stood partly open, and I understood by her gesture that the woman slept there. Just across the threshold, like a dark stone blocking up the entrance, lay Ormanel, wrapt in his old dressing-gown, and tossing and murmuring in his sleep.

Next morning, after an uneasy night's rest, I awoke, dressed and stood at my bedroom window, which looked out on the yard. A fine fresh sun was shining clearly, and the whole country landscape looked calm and beautiful. While I looked, two plainly-dressed men hounded down from the village, glanced sharply at the house, and, observing nothing amiss, knocked at the door. I heard somebody open it immediately.

The door was opened cautiously by Sarah, and the men pushed in without a word. Immediately afterwards I heard a scuffle, and rushed down-stairs to see what was the matter. Passing the woman's room, I found that Ormanel had disappeared from the threshold.

When I reached the passage I saw Ormanel lying on his back on the floor, bound and handcuffed. He was struggling violently, foaming whelp at the mouth, while one of the plainly-dressed men held him down. Where was Augustus?

This question was answered by Augustus himself, who appeared at the top of the stairs. In an instant the other plainly-dressed man had recoiled, drawn arms, and handcuffed him. He made very little resistance, but seemed stunned by his position. Sarah was crying. One of the men shouted out,

"Bill!"

A shabbier, rougher and more vulgar person now lounged into the house.

"Keep your bl-dy on that young gentleman. He'll come quiet, no doubt; but lay hold on him."

The shabby person thereupon took hold of me by the collar, and told me to come along.

"What is the charge?" I cried, aghast, now for the first time recognizing our visitors as members of the detective police.

"Assault and battery, with intent to murder," said one of the shabby men, winking at his companion, who grinned as if it was a very good joke indeed.

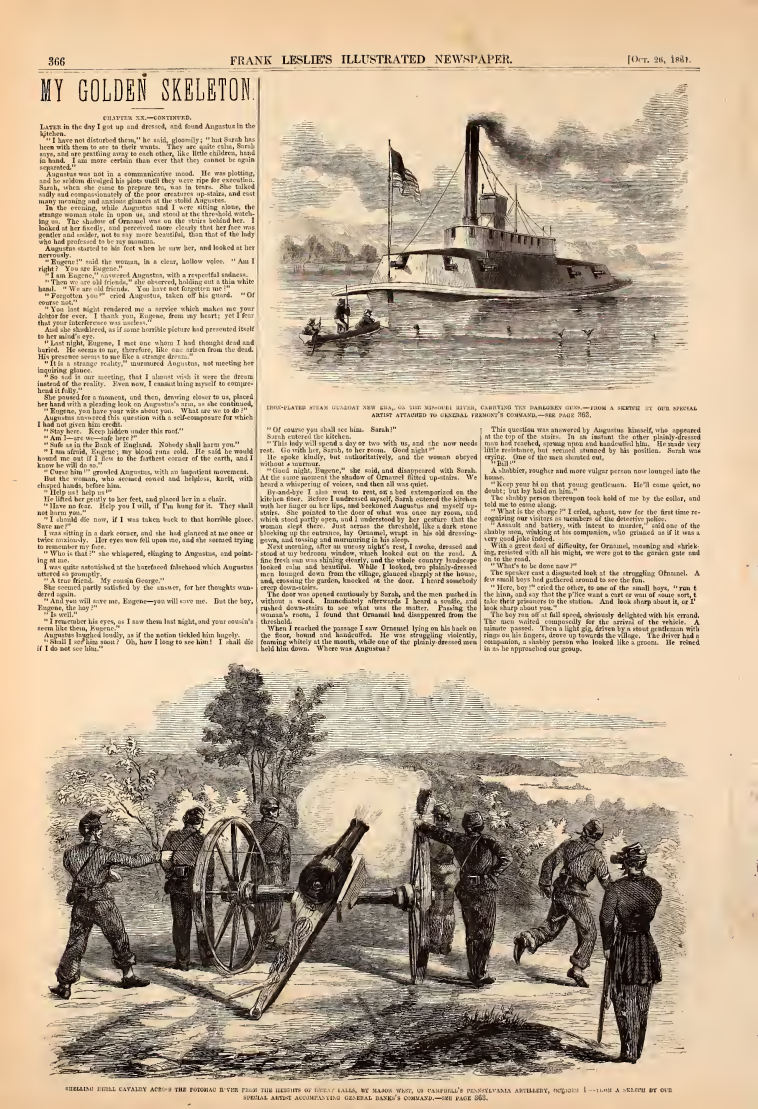
With a great deal of difficulty, for Ormanel, moaning and shrieking, struggled with all his might, we were got to the garden gate and on to the road.

"What's to be done now?"

The speaker cast a disgusted look at the struggling Ormanel. A few small boys had gathered around to see the fun.

"Here, boy!" cried the other, to one of the small boys. "run t' the hinn, and say that the p'lice want a cart or wan of some sort, t' take their prisoner to the station. And look sharp about it, or I'll look sharp about you."

The boy ran off at full speed, obviously delighted with his errand. The men waited composedly for the arrival of the vehicle. A quarter passed. Then a light gig, driven by a stout gentleman with rings on his fingers, drove up towards the village. The driver had a companion, a shabby person who looked like a groom. He reined in as he approached our group.



SHELLING REBEL CAVALRY ACROSS THE POTOMAC RIVER FROM THE HEIGHTS OF UNION LAND, BY MAJOR WEST, OF CAMPBELL'S PENNSYLVANIA ARTILLERY, SCHUYLER 1.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST ACCOMPANYING GENERAL BANKS'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 365.

"Prisoners?" he inquired of one of our captors.
The man touched his cap, and replied in the affirmative.

At this moment the strange woman, her dark hair flowing behind her, rushed from the cottage, shrieking loudly, and flung herself on the ground before the man who held Ornamel, begging and praying him to release his prisoner. The man shook her away roughly.

"Hold her, officers!" cried the stout gentleman, leaping from his gig with his companion. "This is lucky. She is a lunatic, and has escaped from the Pestlewaithe Asylum."

The woman crouched down, pale and trembling, cowed like a brute animal at its master's voice. She seemed too stunned to think or feel, and made no resistance to the stout gentleman as he raised her to her feet. She was lifted into the gig and placed in front, beside the driver, while the other man leaped up behind. She sat like a stone, without sense or motion, held by the man who sat behind.

During these operations Augustus had turned white with rage and fear, but he made no resistance. The horror and agony of Ornamel, on the contrary, expressed on his wild face and in his fierce cries, was horrible to witness.

"Officers, good morning," said the stout gentleman, throwing a crown to the nearest man, and turning his horse's head back in the direction whence he came. The gig then drove off.

"Bill," said one of the officers, in a philosophical tone of voice, pointing to Ornamel.

"Well?"

"I wonder this gent don't take pattern by that lunatic, and take it mild. She's a heap more to be pitied than him—(be quiet, won't you?)—though he is an escaped convict, and isn't likely to come out of this business with a whole skin."

CHAPTER XX.—PLANS.

Without delay we poor prisoners found ourselves being whirled swiftly towards the county town hard by, and we were soon luxuriating between prison walls. Ornamel, whose madness passed all bounds, was shut up in a separate cell, while Augustus and myself were caged together. Gloomy and dingy was the place into which we were thrust; but one sickly finger of the sun popped in and out through the window-bars, and seemed to beckon one out in a mocking way.

It was my first experience of the kind; and my impressions of the law and its administration had always been vague ones. There was something in the look of the jail, as we entered, which put me in mind of a pump. It was a rakish jail, and looked misanthropic. I say it put me in mind of a pump, which was for ever at work in the bowels of society, pumping up offenders by the bucketful. The analogy could be followed from the building to its inmates, for the building was full of smaller pumps. A popular author, with that brilliant sagacity for for which he is remarkable, lately demonstrated the affinity of the mute and the waiter, both of whom sprung up, like fungi, at the feet of the philosopher. I also have made my discovery, which I commend to the consideration of Mr. Darwin. I have detected the personal resemblance between the pump and the policeman—a resemblance which far transcends that which links the Regent street bewhiskered exquisite to poor M. de Chaillu's gorilla.

Augustus sat him down in a corner and said nothing. I had been surprised at the coolness with which that young man took our catastrophe, and at the ease with which he allowed himself to be floated by the turbulent wave of Fortune to the bar of the felon. I was the more surprised, because Augustus, generally speaking, was of a demonstrative habit of mind and body.

"Augustus," I said, timidly, "what is to be done?"

He lifted up a gloomy, thoughtful face, and started, as if from a reverie.

"Nothing," he answered, and subsided into silence, with a gesture which precluded further inquiry.

Was all hope, then, gone? That was the question which I first asked myself. Or had Augustus in view some plot whereby my uncle and his accusation might be circumvented? Augustus's manner, however, evinced, not the vivacity of hope, but the but the lethargy of despair. What if, after all, my uncle was in the right of it? What if my uncle was moral, and really believed his nephew a lump of ingratitude and wickedness? This could hardly be, if Elizabeth's last words were to be taken as evidence. But what would be done to us if we were convicted in law? And should poor unfortunate I share the fate of men who, for all I know, might both of them be outcasts and ruffians in the eyes of the legal functionaries?

After a pause, during which the above reflections ran swiftly through my mind, I spoke again.

"So Ornamel is a returned convict?"

"They said so."

"But did they speak the truth?"

Augustus rose to his feet, and paced up and down the cell. Then he spoke excitedly.

"They spoke the truth. Long years he was shipped abroad, with the scum of the land; and he has returned before his time. What then? They've driven him half mad among them, and, now, they have again got possession of him; he will die. He is doomed."

He had thrown off his former lethargy, and had become his passionate self in a moment.

"I was a fool!" he cried. "I ought to have anticipated this; I might have sworn that he would make the attack without warning. He has his thumb on us, firm. Ornamel is doomed."

"What can they do with him?" I inquired with an impatient gesture.

"Do with him! Send him back to a place where the roads are paved with cobras and rattlesnakes—where men die of lingering fever and heartache—where all things look foul to the eye, that the memory of home may mock the poor rascals with its beauty. Do with him! Ship him back, doubly branded and cursed, to the perdition he flew from, and dig him a grave there. Do with him! Kill him."

"Are there no chances that he may yet be treated mercifully?"

"None. Won't the present charge come up against him to prove him a ruffian unfit to go at large? Won't his wild ravings also go against him? And can't it be proved that he resisted the police in the execution of their duty?"

He spoke in a bitter, bantering tone, which made him seem reckless and evil. He went on more calmly.

"Ornamel being proved to be a criminal of the worst kind, what follows? It follows that Ornamel's companions can't be the most reputable characters in the world. It follows that Ornamel and I have wilfully degraded you to our level, in order to serve our own bad ends. It follows that any counter-accusations we might bring up will be set aside as unreliable. Counsel for the prosecution leads off with a telling speech, in which he makes your uncle an angel. The jury look at our wild faces, and shake their heads. Witnesses are called; it is proved that dark threats have been uttered on certain occasions."

"What witnesses?"

"Lying ones. That groom of his, I'll be bound, for one."

"Who else?"

"Timbs. Well, the jury returns its verdict, recommending you to mercy—which generally means that you get a little worse treatment than otherwise. Bah! I have done; but my time will come, and I care not. The only thing for which I reproach myself concerns Ornamel. I ought to have taken care to save him from the clutches of his enemies. He at least is lost."

A question which had been again and again on the tip of my tongue, now refused to be pent up any longer, and was put, almost unconsciously, into language.

"Once and for all, Augustus, let me ask you a question, which I beg and pray you to answer. I am strangely interested. Who and what is Ornamel?"

He put up his hands, as if to ward off a blow, and waved away the question.

"Don't ask me," he cried.

"I must and will! There is some new mystery. Who is that man?"

"If you value your own peace of mind—if you care for life, don't ask me."

"You only whet my curiosity. Speak, for pity's sake!" I cried.

He fell back against the wall, and hid his face in his hands, as he murmured hoarsely,

"Your lost and miserable father!"

I was not too stunned to question him as to the truth of this reply.

"This time I speak in no riddles," he said. "Alas! I would have spared you this truth, my poor boy. Yes, the man whom you have known by the name of Ornamel is your father."

My brain whirled and my pulses thronged. Ornamel, the returned convict, my father!

"Oh, can it be!" I cried, wildly. "Tell me, for Heaven's sake, was my father criminal.

"He was," said Augustus, sadly; but a load seemed taken off his mind.

"What was his crime?"

"Forgery."

"And his sentence?"

"Transportation for twenty-one years, only sixteen years of which have expired. He made some money out there; but the yearning for liberty was too strong, and he returned hither, expecting to find his wife and child in the land of the living. Both had disappeared; and, even now, he has only recognized the one."

"The mad woman?"

"True. He left her a mere girl, and on his return he found her an old woman; but he recognised her."

"Then the mad woman is my mother?"

Augustus hesitated, as if fearing to commit himself, and then gave the old, ambiguous answer.

"She is your mother's ghost," he said.

Whereupon I hid my face in my hands, and burst into bitter tears. Had I been older, and had the intensity of my grief been in proportion to more years, I could not have wept at all. As it was, I was young, and I wept. The tears relieved me. Augustus said nothing further; but sat down in his corner, ruminating darkly, and apparently satisfied that I knew the worst. Minutes passed by thus, till my full heart overflowed itself involuntarily, and I stammered out,

"And my mother, Augustus, my poor mad mother——"

"Is no more mad than I am," he broke in, quietly. "Be assured of that. She is the victim of a foul plot, which, please God, we shall yet drag to the light in all its hideousness."

"Not mad! Can this be true? Then it is my uncle that has——"

"Exactly. The culprit is your uncle. He shall account for it to you."

What strange web was this that I, poor little I, was vainly attempting to unravel? Ornamel, the weak-witted convict, my father! My mother the mad woman, whom Leonard Charles, who called himself my uncle, had nevertheless claimed as his wife! There was a mystery somewhere, which was quite beyond my vulgar comprehension.

It was, at any rate, clear from what Augustus had dropped that Monsieur Charles had the best of the game, and that it would be difficult to prove anything against our prosecutor. Augustus seemed to have no hopes that the issue of the trial would be favorable to ourselves.

That night passed. The next day we were taken before a corpulent, deaf gentleman, who bore the facetious title of justice of the peace. Monsieur Charles and (as Augustus had predicted) his groom appeared in the witness box, and swore to the assault, in which we were all said to have taken a part. The upshot of the whole affair was that Ornamel, Augustus and myself were formally committed for trial at the ensuing sessions.

The Authoress of "Loving and being Loved" compares a man to a silk umbrella in these quaint terms "A good man is like a strong silken umbrella—trustworthy and a shelter when the storms of life pour down upon us. A mere walkingstick when the sun shines—a friend in misfortune."

A great philosopher says in one of his letters: "I have told you of the Spaniard who always put on his spectacles when he was about to eat cherries, that they might look the bigger and more tempting. In like manner I make the most of my enjoyments, and though I do not cast my cares away, I pack them in as little compass as I can, and carry them as conveniently as I can for myself, and never let them annoy others."

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR OF 1861;

DESCRIPTIVE, STATISTICAL AND DOCUMENTARY.

Edited by Hon. E. G. Squier,

Late Minister of the United States to Central America.

This work is published in semi-monthly Numbers, its MAMMOTH SIZE allows of the largest Engravings, and it contains a complete epitome of the War in which the Country is involved, with all the Facts, Scenes, Incidents and Anecdotes connected with it, arranged chronologically, forming a contemporary and permanent History of the Time.

All Official and Important Documents, emanating North or South, appear in full, with complete and authentic Accounts and Illustrations of all the striking Incidents of the War, together with the Portraits of leading Officers and Statesmen, Plans and Views of Fortifications, Maps, etc., etc.

The Pictorial History of the War of 1861 is invaluable to Families, for in its magnificently illustrated pages even children can trace the course of events, while as a Work of Reference for all classes, its value and importance must increase with every year. In its completed form it will be one of the most magnificent Historical Pictorial Works ever issued from any press in the World.

Each Number is exquisitely printed on fine thick paper, in large clear type, and is stitched in a cover with a beautiful Illustrated Title Page.

Nine Numbers have been published, containing upwards of 250 Engravings, and matter equivalent to 2,300 Octavo Pages.

Published every fortnight. Terms, 25 cts. per Number. Two Dollars will secure the first eight Numbers, beautifully bound in limp cloth. The usual discount given to the Trade.

FRANK LESLIE, Publisher,
19 City Hall Square, N. Y.

Voice of the Press.

"It is a magnificent publication; its pages are about eighteen by twenty-four inches in size, printed on excellent paper, and containing splendid illustrations of the principal Scenes and Incidents of the War; Portraits of distinguished Military and Civil Officers, and Sketches of everything of interest connected with the Great Rebellion. It should be in the hands of every one, and the numbers should be preserved for binding; as, when complete, it will form a most beautiful and comprehensive record of this most memorable epoch in American History."—Anthracite Journal, Pa.

"This work is got up on a magnificent scale, large folio size, giving ample scope to the skill of his artists in illustrating Battles, Ships, Fortifications, and almost life-size Portraits of the leading Generals now in command of the grand army of freedom. It is not only one of the best, but the cheapest illustrated work ever published in America."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"One of the best things we have seen to enlighten the people in regard to the War is the Pictorial History published by Frank Leslie."—Nunda, N. Y., News.

"This work furnishes a complete Pictorial, Descriptive, Documentary and Statistical History of the War, in a compact form, not only for present instruction, but for future use and reference. It is to be published once every fortnight. The woodcuts are on the largest scale, and are got up with the usual carefulness and attention to accuracy which distinguish Mr. Leslie's publications. Of the Editorial Department, the fact of its being under Mr. Squier's direction will be a sufficient guarantee for its being all that a work of such importance demands."—New York Herald.

"The Mammoth Pictorial History of the War of 1861, published by Frank Leslie, is a valuable addition to the periodical literature of the day, at once entertaining to the home circle and useful to the historian and soldier."—New York Daily World.

To Subscribers—Our New Volume.

We have to remind our subscribers that the present volume will terminate with the next number. Now is therefore the time to subscribe for the New Volume, which will be one of spectal value and interest in its authentic illustrations of the leading incidents and events of the war. Our subscribers will not only have presented to them weekly the current history of affairs, but "the very form and pressure," from the pencils of experienced and competent artists, connected with every division of the Army on the land, and every expedition of the Navy on the sea. Our readers should not fail to be renewing their subscriptions if they would preserve a complete file of the paper, and a complete Pictorial Record of the Times, for such is the popular demand that it will not always be possible to supply back numbers.

To meet the altered conditions of the times, we have determined to send the Newspaper to Clubs at the following reduced rates:

Terms for Newspaper.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 50
Five Copies for One Year 10 00

One Copy will be sent, free, to each person sending us the money for a Club of Five Subscribers.

Terms for Newspaper and Magazine.

One Copy of the Newspaper and One of FRANK LESLIE'S Monthly will be sent for $3 00

In no way can a more beautiful and appropriate pictorial wedding matter be obtained for the same money as by a subscription for the Newspaper and Magazine. Besides its illustrations, the latter contains a great variety of exciting tales, and other magazine in the country, exclusively adapted for the family circle. It also contains a splendid Fashion Plate monthly, and a complete record of the Fashions, with engravings, showing all the novelties in all the articles of female dress.

Notices of the Press.

The State of the Nation.

WASHINGTON APPEARS to be our true PERIMEAC.—The rebel hosts before Washington have been circumscribed still more, and the National pickets now occupy nearly the same ad vanced positions as they did previous to the battle of Bull Run. The intention entertained of attempting to cross the upper Potomac and take the offensive, seems to have been abandoned, and the main force of the rebels is concentrated from the stronghold of Manassas Junction, on the line of Occoquan Creek, to the Potomac, and down that river, under the cover of the batteries, to Aquia Creek, where the position the enemy seems determined to await an attack, or rather to provoke one, by closing the navigation of the river. This is, to a certain extent, an admission of weakness, and yet it is probably sound policy in a military sense. General McClellan has now proceeded to him the General adapted to of fighting the enemy on ground of his own choosing, or of submitting to have the great water highway to the National Capital practically closed. In point of fact it is now practically closed. It is true, heavily armed vessels, with transports in convoy, have been running the gauntlet of the enemy's batteries for a week or two past, and will always continue more or less from thatcime. But now, these batteries have been multiplied and mounted with heavy artillery, so that the portion of the river is not only overwhelmingly dangerous, but next to impossible. The line of effective batteries extends from Freestone Point, on the Maryland shore, a distance of nearly 10 miles; and there are others at points lower down to Aquia Creek, but where the river is so wide that they can do but little damage. Besides these land obstructions, it is said that a chain has just been stretched across the channel, near the mouth of the Creek above named, while the river is commanded by the heaviest batteries. On the 19th of October, the steamer Resolute, with the schooners Fairfax and Lady Ann in tow, encountered this obstacle, and was unable to proceed until the Fairfax broke loose and drifted to the Virginia shore, where she was captured by the rebels. The Resolute at the same time being fired upon by the shore batteries, without being able in reply to render any assistance. She finally succeeded in getting over the obstruction, with the other schooner, after remaining on a argir for the batteries for upwards of an hour, during which time upwards of 150 shot and shell were fired at her. She as well as the Lady Ann, was struck several times, but no one on board was injured. It is difficult to imagine how a chain of sufficient strength to stop the progress of a steamer could have been stretched across the river without the knowledge of the Potomac flotilla, and it is still more difficult to comprehend the criminal inaction, to use no harsher term, which has permitted the rebels to erect their formidable batteries with impunity. We had supposed that such interference was only conceded to the rebels at Pensacola. It is said that a fleet of more than 50 vessels, loaded with Government stores, is now lying at anchor down the Potomac, unable to pass up to Washington. A splendid commentary on our naval supremacy and military foresight!

A brilliant affair took place on the 16th of October, at Ball's Bluff, Harrison's Island, on the Potomac between a detachment of 1,000 National troops under Colonel Geary and a body of 2,500 rebels under Colonel Ashby, in which the latter were defeated with heavy loss, including the loss of their commander. Amongst the trophies taken was a nine 32-pound gun, on which Colonel Geary rode back to his camp.

KENTUCKY.—The chief command of this Department has been transferred from General Anderson, in consequence of bad health, to General Sherman. The military affairs in the State have not, however, materially changed. The rebel General Zollicoffer still holds his position on Cumberland river, near the Mississippi at that point, while Zollicoffer and Buckner seem barely to hold their own at Bowling Green and Camberland Gap. The Union feeling is continue, and is rapidly augmenting. The Secretary of War arrived in Louisville on the 17th, and, on consultation with General Sherman, decided to withdraw from the advance into Kentucky of 8,000 men from Ohio and Indiana. There are about 20,000 National troops at a place called Nolin, on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, waiting for the reconstruction of a bridge at that point, destroyed by the enemy, to advance on the rebel camp at Bowling Green. Buckner, however, encamped at Bowling Green. Nolin is about midway between Louisville and Bowling Green.

MISSOURI.—The retreat of the rebel General Price from Lexington towards the Arkansas border is confirmed. The latest accounts represent that he had reached Osceola, where he had determined to make a stand, and await attack by the National forces under General Sigel. Price, according to last advices, were at Warsaw on the Osage river, in full pursuit. Rumors of reinforcements to Fremont is to be received soon, but not while in the face of the enemy, nor until he has had an opportunity of vindicating the readiness of his men in the field. Gen. Fremont has visited recently by the Secretary of War, under whose directions the following order has been issued, directly reflecting on the conduct of Gen. Fremont. If he does not resign on its receipt, he will evince a self-control, or prove himself capable of a sacrifice of self-respect to duty, such as few men are capable of before him:

"WASHINGTON, Oct. 24, 1861.

"GENERAL—The Secretary of War directs me to communicate the following as his instructions for your government:

"In view of the present condition of affairs in the Quartermaster's Department in the city, according to some $3,000,000, it is important that the money should be paid out for the public service with the least delay consistent with honesty and economy. You are, therefore, directed to make payments to persons entitled to receive them, as rapidly as the means supplied will enable you to do so promptly consistent with honesty and economy. You are further directed to use the utmost diligence in bringing to justice all persons who may be found to have defrauded the Government. You do not hold any commission from the President, and are not under bonds. All contracts hereto entered into by you are disapproved by the Secretary of War. The Senior Quartermaster here has been directed to make payments to you as they may be required.

"It is deemed proper that the second field work around this city, and you will direct their discontinuance; also those, if any, in course of construction at Alexandria. It is not deemed best, at present, that a number of commissions have been given by you. No persons will be employed by you, except such as may be necessary to the faithful and economical discharge of the duties of the Quartermaster's Department, with offices with ordinary troops. Colonel Andrews has been verbally so instructed by the Secretary of War, and Colonel Key is General Scott for the purpose of putting the troops.

"The creation of offices in your quarters in this city is to be at once discontinued.

"The Secretary has been informed that the troops of General Lane's command are entirely unprovided with overcoats. This is a fact of importance to the service, and it is the expectation that you will apply the necessary remedy.

"Major Allen desires the services of Captain Turnley for a short time, and the Secretary of War directs that Captain Turnley report to him. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

"To Major-General J. C. FREMONT, Commanding Department of the West."

ON THE SEA.—The public indignation was roused to a high pitch by the authentic intelligence of Nashville had run the blockade before Charleston, and gone on her way to Europe with ex-Senator Slidell, ex-Minister, ex-special Rebel Minister to France, and ex-Senator Mason as Minister to London. The relief in the report was strengthened by the additional intelligence that the Powhatan had left and Alexandria from this port, to intercept the Nashville, and convey her distinguished passengers to Fort Lafayette. It has, however, been ascertained that the Powhatan has got out at all, and the public is left in the profoundest of fogs. But this is not the only naval affair of sensation and doubt to which the public has been recently directed its attention. Rebel accounts have been copied, and we reproduce them elsewhere, to the effect that Com. Porter, of the Potomac flotilla, had taken a portion of our fleet off the mouth of the Mississippi river, and sunk the sailing sloop of war Preble, loaded with stone, to obstruct the channel. The vessels which were blockading New Orleans on the 4th inst., according to our latest reliable advices, were the sloop of war Vincennes, the sailing sloop of war Preble, 10 guns; steamer Water Witch, three guns; steam sloop of war Richmond, 14 guns; a schooner and a pilot boat, with gun-boat No. 2 and the steamer Kennebec in reserve, carrying 35 guns. This story was speedily followed by another, setting forth that the frigate Sabine had also been laid off the mouth of the Mississippi in a storm. It turns out, however, that the Sabine is at San Francisco, and advices have been received at Washington that although there had been some conflict between the vessels of our squadron off New Orleans and the rebel fleet of little craft, yet that none of the Union vessels had been captured, nor was the Preble sunk, as reported. Some of our vessels, however, had grounded accidentally went ashore, but it is not stated that they were driven to the extremity of being abandoned. On the aggregated report at first would lead the credulous to believe

THE DEFIANCE.—A letter has been published, purporting to be from John Ross, principal chief of the Cherokee nation, setting forth that at a mass meeting of 4,000 Cherokees, held at Tahlequa on the 21st of August, they declared their adherence to the rebel cause, and gave their authorities power to negotiate an alliance. In view of this action, a regiment of mounted men was to be immediately raised to meet any emergency which might arise. On the other hand, it is stated that about the latter end of September there came to Leavenworth, Kansas, 2,000 Creeks, 500 Seminoles, 1,000 Kansas, and tendered their services to him to fight in defence of the Union; but the General peremptorily refused to receive them, stating that he had no authority from the Government to accept them.

Arctic Explorations—Misdirected Efforts.

DR. HAYES, who sailed from Boston in June, a year ago, on a voyage of exploration to the Arctic Seas, has returned, not, however, before the intelligence of the loss of his astronomer, Dr. Sontag, and his carpenter, Mr. Carruthers. He advanced with his vessel no further than Smith's Sound, in latitude 79° 30', and reached by means of dog sledges in latitude 81° 35'. As a number of previous explorers, including Hudson 250 years ago, Perry in 1827, and Dr. Kane last winter, reached points as high or higher, it may be assumed that Dr. Hayes has added nothing of importance to our knowledge of polar geography, or to the store of observed phenomena. The problem of the "Great Open Circumpolar Sea," therefore, still remains unsolved, and no approach to its solution can be observed to result of the latest of abortive expeditions. The amount of energy that has been expended, and the enormous sums of money that have been voted, be so very sensible of the hundreds of lives that have been sacrificed in these Arctic expeditions, and of which the utmost success that could be anticipated by the most enthusiastic geographer could be but a barren and worthless result, should put a stop to similar future misdirections of effort, money and life. The "Open Polar Sea theory of a "Practicable Passage," and of possible, practical use, was demonstrated, very rational motive for combining "Arctic Exploration" with commercial objects. All these expeditions have been organized under the impulse of a love of notoriety, or for the purpose of verifying some fanciful hypothesis. Before Parry, Scoresby, the nurseries of Kennedy and Grinnells, in fitting out ships for the Polar Seas, whether with the pretence of search for Sir John Franklin or of making scientific observations in the Arctic, be inspired by a sincere regard for the missing navigator, or a real love for science, whereas their whole expenditure has rendered their gain more affected, only as a means of advertising their names to the world, and obtaining notoriety, and perhaps promotion. They have spent the money before Bonner invented his grand system of advertising, or they might have found it more economical and much easier to have obtained the notoriety of distinction, as the talk of the town, through the intervention of gorgeous cayhists and widely separated lines, in the columns of the daily newspaper.

A number of genial literary and scientific reputations have been rather cheaply made upon the strength of "Ice Seas and caving Mountains," "ice pack ice," and "floe ice" and "icebergs," fierce white bears and grassy Esquimaux, in hyperborean regions, at a cost comparatively little out of pocket six polar ice pockets, have been vigorously assailed by a score of sailpants for the same cheap honors, who feel sure they have especially contributed to science as the instruments of penetrating to the "Great Open Circumpolar Sea." Well, even if that hypothetical expanse of water does exist, what of it? Does it demonstrate that the earth's interior is a grand, glowing, molten mass. Must we therefore waste life and treasure in digging vast pits, 500 miles deep, in order to find out if the theory be correct? Let the barren polar secret, if there be one, rest unrevealed—at least until all other terrestrial fields of research and exploration shall have been exhausted. There is some sense in the operations of Dr. Livingstone in Africa, and the results of his explorations have, at least, a real value, in spite of his casting apothesis of negroes and negro civilization. We can forgive him for making out the Zambesi as the grandest of rivers, and the Nyassa lake called Lake Signal as the finest and most available body of water in creation, for he demands all as rain rubbish in order to establish a perfect theory of terrestrial structure. But we must confess our inability to discover the value to science, or the utility to mankind, of locating open seas or mountains of snow within the Arctic circle. There are a hundred untraversed and practically unknown portions of our own Continent, which deserve and invite exploration, and where a tithe of the energy and money wasted in Arctic follies could not fail of yielding important practical results as well as scientific ones. Such is the great region between the Lake of Terminos from the mountains of Guatemala, through the vast plains of Tabasco, Chiapas, Yucatan, Honduras, the upper waters inhabited by a strange people, descended, probably, from the soldiers of Palenque, bordered by richest lands, which are covered with the forests of precious woods and abound in new varieties of animal life; let the adventurous explorer go there, where his labors and sufferings may result in some real advantage to science and practical good to the world. It might not yield so much immediate and available notoriety for the manufacture of the printer's ink, paragraphs, chaff, and gossip, which furnish the money, nor so ready a reputation to the ambitious personage undertaking it; but there is really something to be explored in the Arctic Seas, which can claim in its rear years of hibernation among the ice, in vain efforts to discover an "Open Sea," which perhaps, after all, does not exist. Our Issue!

The National Hymn.

We have already alluded to the labors of the "National Hymn Committee," and to the fact that Rev. Richard Grant White however, one of the Committee, has contrived to make a volume out of the matter—specimen of arrant bookmongering by the way, albeit not without some entertaining features. It will be remembered that although the Committee failed to find any hymn among the twelve hundred offered worthy of receiving their exequatur, yet they did lay aside a dozen or so for a second consideration. Among these was one, accompanied by original music, from Richard S. Willis, as follows:

Anthem of liberty,
  Solemn and grand,
Wake in thy loftiness,
  Sweep through the land!
Light in each breast anew
  Patriot fires,
Pledge the old flag again—
  Flag of our sires!
Fling all thy folds abroad,
  Banner of light!
    Wave, wave for ever,
    Flag of our might!
    God for our banner,
    Freedom and Right!
      Amen! Amen!

Spirit of Unity,
  Potent, divine,
Come in thy kindliness,
  All hearts entwine!
Prove to our enemies
  Ever a rock,
And to each traitor scheme
  Ruinous shock!
Wake the old banner word!
  Shout it amain,
    Union for ever!
    Once and again!—
    Union for ever!
    God it maintain!
      Amen! Amen!

Shades of our forefathers,
  Pass through the land,
Clothed in full majesty,
  Terrible, grand!
"Faith, Hope and Charity"
  Rule in each breast!
Faith, in our Fatherland,
  Hope, in our Lord,
Charity, still to all
  Blindly who've err'd!
God save the Government!
  Long it defend!
    Thine is the Kingdom,
    Father and Friend!
    Thine be the glory,
    World without end!
      Amen! Amen!

There is another hymn, or rather a new version of an old one, which some unprincipled person slipped into Mr. White's hand while reading the proofs of his book, and which he has printed. If truth were the essential quality of a national hymn, it might well replace the rhythmic rubbish which John Bull really believes was engraved on the other side of the Tablets of the Law which Moses brought down from Sinai:

God save me, great John Bull!
Long keep my pocket full!
    God save John Bull!
Ever victorious,
Haughty, vainglorious,
Snobbish, censorious,
    God save John Bull!

Oh Lords, our gods, arise!
"Tax" all our enemies,
    Make tariffs fall!
Confound French politics,
Frustrate all Russian tricks,
Get Yankees in a "fix,"
    God "bless" them all!
        [Over the left

Thy choicest gifts in store,
On me, me only pour—
    Me, great John Bull!
Maintain oppressive laws,
Frown down the poor man's cause!
So sing with heart and voice,
    I, great John Bull!

The Cost of a "Sensation."

Our accomplished Secretary of State is evidently determined not to allow the Departments of War and the Navy, nor yet that of Finance, to have a monopoly of "sensations." If he can't have a grand review, or bombard a Hatteras, nor yet negotiate a $150,000,000 loan, he can certainly let off an explosive letter now and then, which shall prove quite a Columbiad in its way. The one about Russell, the newspaper correspondent, rather hung fire—in classical English, proved a fizzle. But Mr. Seward is not to be discouraged when notoriety is to be the reward of effort. He has tried a letter on the subject of frontier fortifications, which has been more successful. It has accomplished what was no doubt its first, if not only object, a sensation. It knocked down United States securities two or three per cent.—that was its recoil; but its echo is still to come from beyond the water. It will be resonant with the name of Seward, and prevent it from being forgotten—a great point with the Secretary. After informing the Governors of the frontier States (for the letter is addressed to them alone, and only published in the newspapers to save postage!) that our foreign affairs were never so delightfully safe and serene, he proceeds to tell them that they had all better go to work and fortify their respective frontiers, and enforces his injunction by a striking and original simile about the expediency of doing so before being assailed, or, as he words it, in diction slightly sophomoric, it is "obvious" that our ports and harbors on the seas and lakes should be put in good condition, "for any nation may be said to incur, voluntarily incur, danger in tempestuous seasons, when it fails to show that it has sheltered itself on every side from which the storm might possibly come."

On the whole, we think we may say that we think it "may be said!" In point of fact, we are sure that it "may be said," affirmed, or otherwise propounded, with, we may say, a large amount of truth, that, all things considered, it is, on the whole, prudent, or at least safe, to protect yourself from the ruffian behind while you are grappling with the traitor in front—especially in "tempestuous seasons," and particularly if you don't know from which side the storm may "possibly come!"

Mr. Seward winds up his letter by advising the Governors to go to work at once with their precautionary defences, and ventures to assure them that he thinks Congress will repay them all they may expend. We have no doubt of it; but there are bad people who respond, "Better open the Potomac," and who add with a sneer, "As our foreign affairs were never so cosy, why we can wait a month, till Congress meets!"

But, as we have said, our Secretary gained his point. He made a sensation! Witness the following paragraphs, the first from the money article of the Post, and the second from the Toronto (Canada) Leader:

"Mr. Seward's letter is the topic of the market, and nearly all the securities of the list are adversely affected. The decline in some of the leading shares is equal to four per cent. Governments gave way two per cent. under small sales, and considerable uneasiness is still observable."

"If preparations of this nature are to be carried on, on the South shore, British power on the North is bound not to lag behind. It cannot be an idle spectator of works avowedly intended to be a menace against its dominion."

Taking the total amount of our National securities on the market at $200,000,000 (and they are more), their depreciation, at the rate of two per cent., would result in a loss to the public of only $4,000,000! A trifling price for a "Sensation!"

The Blockade of Charleston.—A correspondent calls attention to what he regards as "an omission in the splendid and valuable map" which we published last week, viz., that no vessels indicating the blockade are placed off Charleston. That Charleston is blockaded nominally everybody knows; but that it is not so really is proven by the fact that vessels seem to go in and out with impunity. The latest exploit in running the blockade, if one exists, is that of the steamer Nashville, which is said to have had on board Messrs. Ex-Senators Slidell and Mason, rebel Envoys to France and England. The Government has despatched two or three gunboats to intercept the Nashville if possible, but their chance of doing so is small indeed. When we are satisfied that there is an efficient blockade of Charleston we shall be glad to correct our map to suit our correspondent. Meantime we must permit it to conform to facts.

Reward of Merit.—The country will learn with pleasure that Lieut. Russell, who led the boat expedition from the steamer Colorado, in cutting out and burning the rebel privateer Judith, in Pensacola harbor, has been promoted to the command of one of the new gunboats for his bravery. The following is the letter from the Secretary of the Navy announcing the promotion:

Navy Department, Oct. 4, 1861.

Lieut. John H. Russell, United State frigate Colorado, Gulf Blockading Squadron:

Sir—Transmitted herewith is a copy of a communication from the Department, of this date, to Flag-Officer McKean, commanding Gulf Blockading Squadron, in relation to the successful boat expedition despatched under your command to destroy the rebel privateer Judith. For your gallantry on this occasion the Department designs to assign you to the command of one of the new gunboats, and you are, therefore, detached from the Colorado, and you will proceed to Washington, D. C., and report yourself in person to the Department.

I am, respectfully, GIDEON WELLES.

To the Right About.—Mr. Russell, in his last letter to the London Times, says, that if they choose to exert their strength, the North can "subjugate" the South. And the Times itself, which predicted not long ago that we could raise neither men nor money to defend the Government, finally says, "In some respects, we must admit that we a little underrated their power." Really!

The Finances of the War.—The Hon. James Dixon, United States Senator from Connecticut, in an eloquent and patriotic speech recently delivered at a Union meeting in Hartford, dwelt with marked force upon the ability of the country to sustain the expenses of the war, and upon the security which the national loan offers as an investment. On this point he said:

"Look at England. You say our expenses are large, and so they are. Some estimate them at $1,000,000 a day. But what were the expenses of England during her war with Napoleon? From 1803 to 1816, with less than 18,000,000 of inhabitants, her expenses were $1,300,000 a day for a period of 13 years. For 100 days previous to the battle of Waterloo, her expenses were $5,000,000 a day. Of this vast sum a large proportion was expended on the continent of Europe, while our entire expenditure is at home. If, for 13 years, England could expend $1,300,000 a day abroad, cannot we do it for one or two years, if necessary—every dollar meanwhile remaining at home? Interest, therefore, no less than patriotism, requires us to subscribe for the loan."

Sons.—It is a "big thing" to be a son now-a-days. The son of Mr. Secretary of State Seward is Assistant Secretary of State; a son of General Fremont, having attained the sound judgement and abilities peculiar to the mature age of 16 years, is an adjutant, and not to speak of other remarkable relatives, sons, brothers, cousins and otherwise, we have now the information by telegraph—important fact—that "Walton J. Smith, son of the Secretary of the Interior, has been appointed Chief Clerk of that department."

The Providence Journal, with characteristic goodnature, tries to believe that Mr. Sanford did not go to Caprera, to invite Garibaldi to lead our armies. It says:

"Such egregious nonsense could be swallowed by no one who has any accurate knowledge of our affairs, but perhaps this is as harmless nonsense as the foreign editors can be amusing themselves with."

But suppose Sanford did perpetrate this "egregious nonsense," what then?

Scratch off their Names.—The following named persons, candidates for the State Legislature from this city, were last year members of that body, and on the 16th of April voted against the military bill putting the forces of the State at the service of the general Government, or dodged the vote, viz: John Callahan, William J. C. Kenny, Daniel Young, John Hardy, for the Assembly, and Luke F. Cozans, for the Senate. Mr. James Lynch has been nominated by some faction or other for Sheriff. He was a member of Varian's battery, which abandoned the army before Manassas on the day of the battle, because their three months were up, and left the field with the roar of the enemy's guns sounding in their ears! Let the voters of New York visit the present audacity as well as the past delinquencies of these men with their stern indignation!

The Secretary of the Treasury.—A London correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot writes:

"Nothing has contributed more to the favor and esteem in which the cause of our Government is held throughout Europe, than the admirable administration of the department of finance by Mr. Secretary Chase."

The Traitor Breckinridge.—Mr. Ex-Vice-President Breckinridge, an outcast from his native State, according to last accounts, was in the camp of the rebels, inciting them to a more active prosecution of the war, in which is involved the visitation of civil war on the gallant State to whose undeserved preferences he owes whatever he has of distinction. And yet this man, in a speech before the Legislature of Kentucky, on the 2d of April last, held the following language, speaking of the action of a majority of the people of Kentucky which has since been three time expressed by overwhelming majorities:

"I hold further, that when the majority utters its voice that her citizens are bound to acquiesce. I have seen with pain and surprise intimations that have been thrown out that a minority of the people of this commonwealth would add to our calamities the horrors of internecine war, if the majority should pursue a course opposed to their views. Let us not think of that, Mr. Speaker. That should be the last calamity that would afflict a commonwealth."

The Pacific Telegraph.—The telegraphic line to the Pacific is being carried rapidly westward. It already r[illegible] to th[illegible] of the Mormons in the Great Salt Lake valley. The first message [illegible] came over it was a despatch from Brigham Young to Hon. J. H. Wade, President of the Company constructing it, and was received in Cleveland on the 18th of October, dated on the morning of the same day. It is as follows:

"Sir—Permit me to congratulate you on the completion of the overland telegraph line west to this city; to commend the energy displayed by yourself and associates in the rapid and successful prosecution of a work so beneficial, and to express the wish that its use may ever tend to promote the true interest of the dwellers on both the Atlantic and Pacific slopes of our continent.

"Utah has not seceded, but is firm for the Constitution and laws of our once happy country, and is warmly interested in successful enterprises like the one so far completed.

"BRIGHAM YOUNG."

The War Illustrated.—Parts 8 and 9 of Frank Leslie's semimonthly folio, "The Pictorial History of the War of 1861," edited by E. G. Squier, Esq., are published, and can be had in Boston of all the principal periodical dealers. It is a fine work, got up on an extensive scale. The engravings are executed by the best wood artists in the country, from original drawings; the size of the work giving ample room for all necessary details. The portraits of our Generals are admirable likenesses, copied as they all are from recent photographs. The pictures in these two parts will be found extremely interesting, as they depict recent scenes of the war in the South and West. The text of the work is also valuable, as all the skirmishes and battles are described, from authentic sources. It is the cheapest and best work of its class ever published in America, and is every way worthy of extensive patronage.—Boston Evening Transcript.

ARREST OF BRITISH SUBJECTS FOR COMPLICITY WITH TREASON.

A very important correspondence relative to the arrest—under the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus—of British subjects, has just taken place between Lord Lyons and Mr. Seward in reference to the case of a Mr. Patrick, of New York, and a Mr. Rahming, who had arrived here from Nassau. Both these parties were sent to Fort Lafayette, but were subsequently released. Lord Lyons takes the ground that the Constitution of the United States does not sanction what he calls the arbitrary arrest of British subjects except when authorized by Act of Congress, and he remonstrates in the name of his Government against the "irregular proceedings" adopted in these cases, under advice from the legal advisers of her Britannic Majesty. Mr. Seward replies that the proceedings of which the British Government complain with regard to these gentlemen were taken upon information conveyed to the President by the legal police authorities of the country, and they were not instituted until after he had suspended the habeas corpus writ, in view of the perils of the State. For the exercise of that discretion he, as well as his chief advisers are responsible by law before the highest judicial tribunal of the republic, and amenable also to the judgment of his countrymen and the enlightened portion of the civilized world.

Mr. Seward further reminds Lord Lyons that, although the United States Government does not question the learning of the legal advisers of the British Crown, or the justice of the deference which her Majesty pays to them, nevertheless, the British Government will hardly expect that the President will accept their explanations of the Constitution of the United States, especially when the Constitution thus expounded would leave upon him the sole executive responsibility of suppressing existing insurrection, while it would transfer to Congress the most material and indispensable power to be employed for that purpose. And furthermore, that the President must be allowed to prefer to be governed by the organic national law, which, while it will enable him to exercise his great trust with complete success, receives the sanction of the highest authorities of our own country, and is sustained by the general consent of the people, for whom alone that Constitution was established.

Mr. Seward states that at the time of the arrest of Messrs. Patrick and Rahming, it was not known that they were British subjects; but he infers that the knowledge of that fact would have made no difference in the matter, when he says that "the safety of the whole people has become, in the present emergency, the supreme law, and so long as the danger shall exist to all classes of society equally, the denizen and the citizen must cheerfully acquiesce in the measures which that law prescribes."

DOMESTIC NEWS.

The Gunboat "Ottawa," Lieutenant-Commanding T. H. Stevens.—The Ottawa, on Saturday, 12th inst., made a trial trip down the Bay for exercise and target practice. The firing with 11-inch Dahlgren was excellent, at a distance of 2,000 yards, and the performance of the engine and vessel under sail and steam sufficiently conclusive to warrant the belief that the class of vessels to which she belongs will be found adequate in all respects to meet the wants of the occasion and the time. The greatest speed of the Ottawa under sail and steam, with a top-gallant breeze blowing, was about twelve knots.

We stated a few days since that the excess of the exports of the country for the year, above those of 1859 and 1860, would reach $50,000. The prospect is that they will exceed that in value. Last week the value of exports from this port alone was $3,000,878, against $1,095,690 in 1859 and $2,061,717 in 1860. The total value since January 1st, exclusive of specie, is $99,058,000, an excess of nearly $28,000,000 over that of 1860, and of $48,000,000 over that of 1859. At this rate the value of exports from the port of New York will not be less than $125,000,000 for the year ending December 31, 1861.

The Lawrence (Mass.) Sentinel says: "With the exception of the Atlantic, the manufacturing business of our mills is but little behind that of ordinary times."

A change has been made in the ten cent pieces that bear date this year from those heretofore coined. The figure of Liberty, instead of being surrounded by stars, is encircled by the words, "United States of America," which formerly were placed on the reverse of the piece.

The Mercer (Pa.) Dispatch gives a description of an extraordinary vein of oil tapped the other day on the McElhany farm, at a depth of 460 feet. It says: "A watch was held while it ran into a tank, holding by measure 108 barrels, and it filled the same in 55 minutes! At a fair estimate, taking this as a data, those who were working and watching about it are confident that in the first 24 hours it flowed 2,400 barrels of oil!"

The sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals of Washington, Georgetown and Alexandria, on the 11th inst., numbered 954, of whom 308 belonged to New York regiments, and 14 were officers. There was an increase of 43 from the week previous.

There was an immense crowd in attendance at the inauguration of the statue of Ethan Allen, at Montpelier, Vermont, on Thursday of last week. Governor Fairbanks presided, and the oration was delivered by F. E. Woodbridge, of Vergennes.

Two cargoes of free negroes, numbering about 400 in all, left this city October 19th in the bark King Brothers and the brig Flight, for St. Mark, Hayti, with a view to settle in that place, under the auspices of the Haytien Emigration Bureau, which offers the most tempting inducements to colored emigrants.

The Pontoon bridge at Paducah is gone. The Ohio has risen lately from 10 to 15 feet, and with such rapidity as to break up and carry away the bridge. It is said to be lodged somewhere between there and Cairo.

SOUTHERN ITEMS.

His Excellency, Governor Moore, of Louisiana, has issued an order to seize all the pork in New Orleans held by speculators, who had advanced it to the enormous price of $50 per barrel.

The Governor of North Carolina has issued a proclamation, prohibiting the exportation of bacon and leather from that State. The Richmond Examiner says: "We learn that, in pursuance of this proclamation, a large quantity of bacon and leather, en route for Virginia, the property of speculators, was seized at the depot of the North Carolina Railroad, in Raleigh. Another quantity of bacon, bought on speculation, and destined for a point out of the State, has been seized at High Point. These are measures of severity, although it is high time to resist and punish the multitude of speculators intent on taking selfish advantage of the necessities of the country."

The Richmond Dispatch publishes a letter from its correspondent in the Hampton Legion, who writes: "The most dispiriting news which has ever reached our camp is that we may probably go into winter quarters on this side of the Potomac—than which nothing could be more disappointing and dissatisfactory to the Southern soldiers, with the unmurmuring patience which they have endured the diseases that have decimated their numbers, and all the privation and wants of a first campaign; and now that a benign Providence has rebuked the disease, and health and vigor again returned to our ranks, they cannot appreciate the policy which would keep 250,000 Southern men—a number sufficient to do almost anything—inclosed in ice and snow five or six months to defend Virginia alone."

MUSICAL AND THEATRICAL.

Academy of Music.—Mr. Ullman's benefits have proved so profitable that he has resolved on a third. The 28th of October has been set apart for the experiment; "Betly" and "Les Noces de Jeanette," the bonnebouches for which the public mouth has so long watered, being adroitly transferred from night No. 2 to night No. 3. Expectation remains on tiptoe, and Ullman well knows that after one representation of these charming little operas, repetitions enough to constitute another "season" will be imperatively demanded.

Winter Garden.—The famous and taking play of the "Octoroon," which yielded so golden a harvest at this theatre a year or two ago, has been revived. It finds an audience more inclined to listen to its teachings than before, and its pathetic story gathers force from the circumstances of the nation. It cannot fail to have a run protracted and profitable. It is sufficient to say, as a guarantee of excellence, that Mr. J. S. Clarke plays the part of Salem Scudder, the Yankee.

Laura Keene still continues her conquering career, "improving in grace and a knowledge of the public taste daily," as evinced by a constant excision of the villainous text of the "Seven Sons."

At Wallack's the "King of the Mountains," in which Mr Fisher distinguishes himself by judicious, sustained and appropriate acting, draws full houses. His is the best piece of acting to be witnessed at present on the metropolitan boards.

Barnum's Museum.—A new drama, "The Angel of Midnight," which was very successful in Paris last season, and has since been performed in London at various theatres, as well as in the smaller cities of this country, is attracting crowds at this house.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

CHAPTER XXI.—WE ARE TRIED FOR ASSAULT.

The sessions were to come on in three weeks from that time; and not until about a week had elapsed did Augustus exert his energies in our favor. One day, however, he was called upon by a gentleman, with whom he was closeted for some time, and who afterwards had some conversation with me, and a word or two with Ornamel. This gentleman, who was fat in person and sharp in speech, was Serjeant Blubagge. We were afterwards waited upon once or twice by a pale, determined-looking young man, whose peculiarity was reticence. This young man was Mr. Taper Todd. Serjeant Blubagge and Mr. Taper Todd had been reserved by Augustus for our defence. It was Mr. Taper Todd's business to digest the briefs of our solicitor, and to arrange the facts. It was Serjeant Blubagge's business to disgorge the defence, in torrents of eloquence and rivulets of keen satire.

"I've not much hope for the result, Henry," said Augustus, "and at any rate your poor father must fall a victim to our enemy. But let us hope for the best. Blubagge is a favorite with old Sir Suaviter Backbite, and we could not be in better hands."

Ornamel grew quieter and saner as the days rolled on, until—although he talked rather incoherently—there was nothing in his manner to suggest a doubt as to his sanity. This change for the better was regarded with complacency by both Augustus and myself. We little knew the dark thoughts that were passing through the man's uneasy mind.

Both Ornamel and myself were entirely ignorant of the defence which Augustus and his counsel intended pursuing. The matter was left entirely in Augustus's hands. Against the assault we pleaded provocation. The indictment was filed against Eugene Danvers, Henry Brown and Henry Brown, jun.

The momentous day at last arrived, and we three entered the felon's dock together. Sir Suaviter Backbite, a gentlemanly little old man, as yellow as a guinea, occupied the bench. The body of the court was crowded, and the barristers fluttered about in a fever of business. I shall give the evidence in a very formal way. Mr. Serjeant Fumble and Mr. Felinn prosecuted, and the former rose up to address the jury after the usual preliminaries were adjusted.

Mr. Sergeant Fumble began by stating that this was one of the most painful cases in which he had ever been concerned, and ended by asserting that I was basely ungrateful, and that Mr. Charles, the prosecutor, was a philanthropist. He talked a great deal about low company, paternal kindness and domestic sorrow. He then described Ornamel as one of the grossest of ruffians, and Augustus as his equally vile accomplice. He grew so puffy and eloquent, indeed, that I could not understand one-half of his allusions, and was only conscious of a great buzz of words. He then began to examine his witnesses.

Mr. Leonard Charles, examined by Serjeant Fumble, said: "I am a gentleman of independent means, and the youngest prisoner is my nephew. I make the charge against him with the deepest sorrow, as he is dear to a member of my family. I have a wife, who for many years has been an inmate of a lunatic asylum. I produce the medical certificate of her insanity. On the 20th of last month, at midnight, my wife made her appearance in my house, having previously made her escape from the asylum, and attempted my life. I was about to secure her when my nephew rushed upon me, and had nearly succeeded in stabbing me with a carving-knife when my daughter interfered. (Carving-knife produced.) That is the instrument. My wife, in the meantime, made her escape from the house. I pursued her with my groom. We had nearly succeeded in securing her, when the three prisoners attacked me. The injuries on my face were inflicted in the struggle. With the assistance of my servant I afterwards made my escape. The next day I communicated with the police. My wife was shortly afterwards apprehended by the servants of the asylum."

By Serjeant Fumble—"Were you once called upon to give evidence against the elder prisoner in a case of forgery?"

"Reluctantly I was."

"The elder prisoner is your brother-in-law?"

"He is."

"Do you, then, attribute his attack upon your person to resentment caused by your conduct on the occasion of his former conviction?"

"I do."

"Have you had words with the youngest prisoner relative to certain vices in which he indulged?"

"Yes. I argued with him against the folly of keeping bad company."

"You quarrelled, and he threatened you?"

"Yes."

"You have since then been repeatedly in danger of your life?"

"Yes; I feared his violence."

By Mr. Felinn—"Of the prisoner Danvers I know nothing, save that he has been an associate of my nephew's."

Cross-examined by Serjeant Blubagge—"Yes; I have carried on business as a pawnbroker in Paris. I have had in my employ a confidential clerk named Broussais. I decline to state whether or not my Parisian connection has ceased. The eldest prisoner is my brother-in-law. We married sisters."

Serjeant Blubagge—"Was there a strong personal resemblance between those sisters?"

Prosecutor—"No unusual resemblance."

"Yes or no; was there a resemblance between the sisters?"

"A slight resemblance."

"Is the wife of the elder prisoner still alive?"

"No."

"When did she die?"

"Some years ago."

"Were you appointed her executor?"

"I was."

"Is the youngest prisoner the son of the elder prisoner?"

"Yes."

The face of Ornamel turned white as snow; he was quite calm now. He crept close to me and said nothing; then with an ineffable tenderness, he placed his hand in mine.

"The wife of the elder prisoner possessed property in her own right?"

"She did."

"Was the youngest prisoner her heir-at-law?"

"He was."

Serjeant Blubagge—"That will do."

Monsieur left the witness-box. The next person called was the groom, who lied right and left to support his master's evidence. How did my blood burn, and my brain whirl, when I saw that the third witness was Elizabeth Charles. She was very pale; but she glanced scornfully at me as she entered the witness-box.

Elizabeth Charles said—"I am the daugnter of the prosecutor, and the youngest prisoner is my cousin. He has lived with us for some time. I can swear that he has been treated with the greatest indulgence by my father. They quarreled lately on account of my cousin's excesses. I was awakened on the night of the 20th, by cries of 'murder.' Entering my father's room, I found him struggling with my cousin. On my interfering, the struggle ceased. The knife now produced dropped to the floor in the struggle. I cannot say whether it was dropped by the prisoner."

Mr. Felinn—"Did you believe that the prisoner had attempted your father's life?"

Witness—"I did not."

Sensation.

Mr. Felinn looked aghast, for a blow had been aimed at the prosecution.

Mr. Felinn—"What object, then, can you assign for the prisoner's attack on your father?"

Witness—"None."

Mr. Felinn shook his head, and handed over a slip of paper to Serjeant Fumble.

Serjeant Fumble—"Have there been certain love passages between yourself and the prisoner?"

Witness—"Really——"

Serjeant Fumble—"Answer my question."

Witness—"Yes."

Serjeant Fumble—"Really, my lud, had we been aware that this witness was prejudiced in favor of the prisoner, and that she would hesitate to give evidence——"

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

Mr. Felton—"There, witness, you may go down."

The Bench—"Bradly, Brother Pumble, I look upon this last a gross threum of your experience would talk of the hinvention of a witness to give evidence. Such an observation in a court of justice—"

Sergeant Bishopsgate—"Pardon me, my lud, but consider this witness—. Is it your own opinion that the knife was dropped from the hands of the prisoner hunette, your worther?"

Witness (with hesitation)—"I should."

Sergeant Bishopsgate—"That is enough."

The next witness called was Mr. Timbs. He was employed in business transactions by the prosecutor. Was acquainted with the prisoner Bronzie—thought he received his sister. Had heard Dennetson threaten "to do" for Mr. Charles. Knew the eldest prisoner was at present formerly convicted for forgery. Had heard the youngest prisoner express a deep hatred for his guardian. Knew the eldest prisoner was an associate of the worst society. Had repeatedly suggested to a friend of his named Skrimps, his conviction that the life of Mr. Charles was in danger.

Mr. Timbs was referred to go down unperplexed.

Alfred Skrimps said he was a printer. Knew the witness Timbs, and had seen him once with Mr. Charles. Could swear that he had heard the witness Timbs express his conviction that Mr. Charles's life was in danger.

Mr. Tuger Todd begged to ask witness if his friend had specified the nature of the danger he spoke of.

Witness could not say for certain. He believed, however, that Mr. Timbs had stated that Mr. Charles, being a pacificator man, would one day have a blood vessel.

This closed the case for the prosecution.

Sergeant Bishopsgate then rose to his feet. The jury had heard the case for the prosecution, and he hoped to say that a more entire and unsound one never came under his notice. He relied on the common sense and generosity of an unprejudiced British jury. He was sure that the noble bud on the bench agreed with him in believing that the case was conducted in a muddle.

Sir Sonniver smiled wickedly, and asked Brother Bishopsgate to come to the point.

His lordship (still the sergeant) might be assured that he would do unable the fitney charge with a breath. He (Sergeant Bishopsgate) begged the intelligent jury to observe that the whole engines of the prosecution had been brought to bear upon the youngest prisoner. The case against the other prisoners rested solely on the testimony of the prosecutor and his servant. The latter had regretably contradicted himself. Now, it had been shown that the prosecutor had a wife, who had been described as unsane; and it had also been shown that this person, having escaped from an asylum where her husband had placed her, had suddenly made her appearance in her husband's bedroom at midnight. Confessedly, the insane woman had attempted the life of prosecutor, and it would be his (Sergeant Bishopsgate's) duty to convince the jury that the weapon said to be dropped by the youngest prisoner had, in point of fact, been used by the insane woman in her frenzy. He would then call a witness to prove that even were the charge supported, the prisoners would have been excusable, comparatively speaking. Why? Because prosecutor was a man without goodness or principle—he would not say a criminal—and had been the author of a vile plot against the eldest and youngest prisoners.

Sergeant Bishopsgate then called Matilda Midgery, who said she was formerly in the Peckwaddle Lunatic Asylum. Had been accustomed to wait upon the patient, who went by the name of Mrs. Charles. Had heard, on the 18th day of last May, that Mrs. Charles was missing. Shortly afterwards heard of her reception. The knife was produced and been abstracted from the cook's kitchen.

Cross-examined by Mr. Felton—The patients were not let in the habit of using carving knives to cut their food. The knife might have been abstracted from the kitchen. Had known Mrs. Charles at a rather violent period.

The Sergeant next called Adolphe Brousseau.

At the mention of the name I looked at Augustus inquiringly, but the young man answered. The dead giant was glance at us as he took the witness-box.

Adolphe Brousseau said—"Up till this day I have been in the employment of prosecutor, as confidential clerk. I am a Frenchman by birth, but I have resided for many years in England. I knew the prisoners. I knew the wife of the elder prisoner, and I knew the wife of prosecutor. They were sisters, and they slightly resembled each other. I have visited the patient named Mrs. Charles. I can swear that that patient is not the wife of prosecutor. She is the wife of the eldest prisoner, Henry Brown." (Sensation.)

The Bench—"If these disgraceful exhibitions do not cease, I shall clear the court. Brother Bishopsgate, I don't see how the absurd evidence of this witness affects the point at issue."

Sergeant Bishopsgate—" Patience, my lud, and we shall shortly make our case clear to your lordships."

Witness—"The real wife of prosecutor lived at Cuxerford, and passed as the mother of the youngest prisoner, under the name of Brown. She died at Cuxerford, 14th March, 1855. She was buried in the same place, under the same name. She left a will, in which her real husband, the prosecutor, was named as her brother-in-law was appointed her executor. The patient called Charles was at that time in charge of the orphan. Prosecutor's object in so doing was to gain possession, through the boy, of certain sums of money, which the wife of the elder prisoner possessed in her own right." (Sensation.)

Cross-examined by Sergeant Bishopsgate—"I could not possibly be mistaken in the identity of the two women. I swear that the patient called Mrs. Charles is the wife of the eldest prisoner. I know the responsibility of my position. I swear that the wife of the eldest prisoner had been a victim of an atrocious plot."

A great deal of questioning and cross-questioning followed, in which Brousseau tacitly discomfited his adversaries. I will not attempt to describe my anxiety and wonder as the various facts were set forth. More was to come, however. Augustus looked firm and confident. Ormond was calm as stone.

Brousseau was allowed to go down with his evidence unimpugned.

Sergeant Bishopsgate—"Call Mrs. Martha Timbs."

Strange to say, even this summons failed to disturb the composure of Ormond and Augustus.

Plainly, Augustus (perhaps I had better now call him Eugene, as the real name is only had been deceiving me, and if so, he must have bewildered my uncle too. Eugene was an uncle-honour. There stood his sister, Mrs. Martha Timbs, in the flesh, before me. But she seemed to me like a ghost in the witness-box.

Mrs. Martha Timbs—I am by profession a dressmaker. At one time I was a lady's-maid in the house of the wife of the senior Brown. This was at Cuxerford. At the time I speak of, I frequented the prosecutor, my master's brother-in-law, and prosecutor's wife; but I had known Mr. and Mrs. Charles, who, before they married, been grossly deceived by him. Yes, there were certain love passages between Mr. Charles and me—been in correspondence, communication, by means of my husband, who is in prosecutor's employ."

Sergeant Bishopsgate—"Did you attend upon the wife of the prosecutor in her last moments?"

Sergeant Pumble—"My lud, I protest against the whole course of this witness, as being out of all order."

The Bench—"A great exception. Sergeant Pumble should Sergeant Bishopsgate; Mr. Felton should Mr. Tuger Todd. Witness and counsel." The consultation lasted for some minutes. At last the voice of the inquirer rose above all.

"Gentlemen, this event is indecent. I rule in favour of the prisoners; the witness must go down."

So, wifely-wily, Mrs. Timbs was compelled to leave the witness-box, and thus stoned the evidence for the defence. A great deal more cross-questioning and fencing ensued; but I have no power to follow the case further. I sat like a bewildered lamb, conscious of nothing but a great hum of voices around me. At last I heard the voice of the judge. Sir Sonniver was standing-up, and his summary was entirely in our favor. There was no evidence upon which to convict, he said; but he was sure the extraordinary disclosures which had been made that day would be brought more prominently under the eye of the law. The honest gentlemen who formed the jury retired for ten minutes. They returned, and, in reply to the judge's question, the foreman, in a full, courageous voice, said that we were—NOT GUILTY.

Thereupon a great nibi swan around me; and I just heard that Ormond would be detained, he said, at Her Majesty's pleasure, before I fainted quite away. When I came to myself I was in an entire chamber, and Eugene was holding me in his arms. A smile of half-indignant triumph lit up his dark face.

"We are safe?" I murmured inquiringly

"We are acquitted!"

"Yes. Fortune has favored us. Rose up."

"My father! he? I added coldly and deliberately, "Ormond is my father and husband!"

Eugene's face grew pale and lachrymose; he shook his head sadly.

"Try not to think of him, my boy. Everything that strikes a mummy can do shall, take my word for it, be done for him. Try not to think of him."

"My poor father!"

And I clung to Eugene like a child, and shed bitter tears.

"Listen!" he whispered. "Charles will be arrested, on my information, as he leaves the court to-day, charged with conspiracy, with intent to defraud. There's bail to Gilead for you!"

I thought of Elizabeth, and said nothing.

"And if that isn't consolation enough, let me tell you that your old persecutor, Timbs, may soon be arrested too. Hunted down! Hunted down! Oh, how I hungered for this day!"

"But will you get a verdict? In your evidence under oath, you sang and condoled—"

"Now that we have got a hearing, yes. Evidence? There's yourself, and myself, and poor

Martin, and Cruzucrd, said—and—the said women. Yes, the said woman (God help her!) whom we shall prove to be mine. Have no fear, my boy. It's no longer might against right, for right, being now proposed to spring, has a far better chance to win.

Then Eugene, in his facetious way, performed several antics, suggestive of malignant joy. Ultimately he became more serious and into a rehearsal, which stood waiting for us without. Before leaving the prison, however, we passed through a lobby lined with loyal gentlemen in wigs, among whom were the rival serjeants, Frankie and Bainbridge. Frankie was shaking hands with his late opponent, while Mr. Tager Todd stood unfeelingly by.

"Blessing, my boy," said Frankie, beaming with cordiality, "we shine at six. Good success at the Crown, and fair wine. Join us, and bring the old lady with you."

ATTACK OF THE REBEL BATTERIES AT EVANSPORT ON THE U. S. SLOOP SEMINOLE.

DESPITE the contradictions from time to time in the Administration papers, it appears that the rebels have established numerous batteries on the banks of the Potomac, which are capable of giving us considerable trouble. At all events, every one of our ships have to run the gauntlet of their fire. Judging from their efforts hitherto, there has been little harm done, but we have to thank their deficient gunnery for that. It would seem, however, from the subjoined letter of our Correspondent, who was on board the Seminole when the rebel battery at Evansport attacked her on October 1st, that the rebels are improving in this respect:

"UNITED STATES STEAM SLOOP SEMINOLE, } "FORT MONROE, Wa., Oct. 10, 1861.

"DEAR SIR—We left the Navy Yard at Washington at 8 o'clock six o'clock in the morning, steamed down the River, communicated with the Pocahontas, and then left for Mount Vernon, where we had to receive the officers of President Polk did not come up on time, so we found them deserted; but when we arrived within a mile of Evansport a rebel shot came whizzing and whistling through our rigging, but did no further harm. We immediately answered it with a shell from our "Long Tom"—a nine Dahlgren—which burst over one of the embrasures of the rebel battery. They then opened upon us with great energy, firing shot and shell at us, but they all passed over our heads, and fell in the water. One shot cut our mizen mast nearly through, so that it barely stood; another passed through the side of our ship, cutting our rigging and but surrounds the engine boatswain, breaking it up and passing between two officers, but hurting no one.

"Another shot cut away the main rigging, which passed very close to the heads of the captain and first lieutenant, who were standing together. Another shot struck the ship's side, passed through the engine room, and, not knowing the place closed so that they struck it the ship, and were taken out with difficulty. We suffered some damage, but are happy to say that no one was killed. One or two officers were slightly bruised with splinters. The firing from the rebels was excellent and their guns and carriages must have been made in England. Our large guns were excellent.

"At Evansport they have three batteries of about three or four guns each, making about 10 or 12 guns, all of which opened on us. Our battle is a splendid fellow, cool as a cucumber; he went around encouraging the men, and keeping them up to time. The officers and men behaved well, and were only annoyed that our force was so small as to prevent us from landing.

"The Pocahontas was ahead of us, and there a shell at Evansport, which left us to bear the brunt of the fight, as we got it all as coming up behind more slowly.

"In passing Matthias Point we scattered a few shell in there too, but it was not answered at all."

THE KITCHEN OF THE FREMONT DRAGOONS AT TIPTON, MO.

TIPTON, which is 35 miles from Jefferson City, 26 from Sedalia, and 12 from Osceola, City, is situated on the Pacific Railway, which passes through Jefferson City, and has its terminus at Sedalia. At all these cities large bodies of troops have been placed by General Fremont, so as to enable him to concentrate, at a very short time, any overwhelming force to beat upon the rebels. It is said that when the Secretary of War visited the camp at Tipton on the 10th October, he was much pleased with the soldierly appearance of the men, and the order which reigned in the camps. We are quite sure that had we published an epicure as the Hon. Simon Cameron seen the Kitchen of the Fremont Dragoons, which possibly he did, he would have admired the culinary department as much as the Flying Artillery, which is destined to make such havoc in the rebel ranks. Our Artist has made a sketch of the kitchen, when the array of cooks were in full preparation for the daily, but most important, campaign—dinner. We hope that our portrayal thereof will call up a Soyer to fulfil the gastronomic expectations of our gallant army.

JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI.

IN our last paper we gave a description of the capital city of Missouri, and have consequently to refer our readers to page 362. The sketch we publish to-day of Jefferson City is taken from the southern side of the Missouri, and shows the capitol in bold relief. The railway runs along the side of the river, to Tipton and Sedalia, at both which places Gen. Fremont has established camps. The last intelligence was that he had concentrated a large force at Warsaw, and was preparing to cross the Osage on pontoons to engage Gen. Sterling Price, who with Rains would await him at Osceola to give battle. A glance at the map given in our last issue will enable the reader to see the relative positions of the two armies, and that we are on the eve of great events.

MUSTERING THE CONTRABANOS AT FORTRESS MONROE.

HAD all our National Generals possessed the legal common sense of General Butler, the present issue of the war would have been much simplified. Without pronouncing a decision, General Butler most adroitly postponed the negro question by giving the colored race a negative definition, which would form at a more convenient season an admirable starting point. To whatever "complexion" it may come at last, all must admire the felicity with which the astute lawyer rose to the dignity of a statesman on the occasion referred to. As a living illustration of one of the aspects of the present conflict, we give a sketch of the contrabands, or niggers, going to their daily work at Fortress Monroe. The variety of the Ethiopian countenance is explicitly given, and while some remind us of the merry pair of George Cuiruiy in his sable mood, others wear the ponderous gravity of a New Jersey Justice. Doubtless the "nigger band" have never had so pleasant an existence as under their new state of contraband existence.

BIRD'S POINT FORTIFICATIONS, OPPOSITE CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

EVERY day demonstrates the importance of Cairo as a strategic point, and the Government is certainly doing all in its power to make it impregnable. On the Missouri side additional fortifications have been erected by the National authorities, a general sketch of which we give—the particulars we withhold for obvious reasons. We merely give the scenery as it appears from the Point. There is, however, very little evidence of the rebels taking such a hold by the horns as the fortifications around Cairo.

HATTERAS ISLAND AND ITS LIGHTHOUSE.

THIS island, which has lately expressed so large a share of public attention, we have already on occasion illustrated and described, as to have little to add. Its length from Hatteras Inlet, where Forts Hatteras and Clark are situated, to Hatteras lighthouse is about 12 miles; it then takes a northern direction, and extends to Loggerhead Inlet, a distance of 27 miles, making the total length of the island about 40 miles. Its width averages about one mile, although there are some parts which are above two miles wide, while at several points it is only about one-third of a mile. It was on one of these narrow slips of sand that the rebels suffered so severely from the Monticello's fire. It seems scarcely probable, but it is nevertheless a fact, that this miserable sterile strip of land which our gallant troops regard as "the ship of a desert," is the birthplace and home of nearly 1,000 persons, who make a living by fishing in Pamlico Sound. The only vegetation this barren place affords are dwarf shrubs and bushes, which are totally unfit to nourish upright trees. Nevertheless they are gratefully accepted. Captain Parrott, of the 9th regiment, says, that when he visited Fortress Monroe after the story of some time at Hatteras Island, he was positively impressed by the enormous thickness of a tree near Hampton, which was only 36 feet high! It is some consolation to know that our brave men now stationed on Hatteras Island have abundance of most excellent fish, and despite the occasional storms, the climate is moderate. Soon after the bombardment of Fort Stanton, the rebels blew up the lighthouse, with that murderous indifference to human life which has characterized them from the first, accomplished the deed. The rebels they could reach, and among others the lighthouse erected at Cape Hatteras.

VIEW ON THE POTOMAC, NEAR THE MOUTH OF SENECA CREEK.

SENECA CREEK flows from the north, in Montgomery county, Maryland, in a north-easterly direction. It is about 20 miles from Washington, and is found on the Potomac. At this point Colonel Lefferts's regiment, the New York 36th, is stationed, to keep a sharp look-out on General Beauregard's division. Our sketch represents Lieutenant Newton of Captain Terhune's B. F. Battery, preparing to shell a rebel camp on the bank of the Upper Potomac. The view from the point is very fine. In the centre and left are the Blue Ridge mountains, and at the foot is the Potomac, which, as we said, while to the right, in the distance, rise the heights of Harper's Ferry.

THE LOYAL INHABITANTS OF CHICAMACOMICO

Accompanying the 20th Indiana Regiment in their Retreat to Fort Hatteras.

IT must be conferred that even the commander of our National forces was embarrassed to receive the allegiance of the staple-minded, honest and loyal inhabitants of the inner Island of Hatteras, in general Secretary of War should have supplied him with the necessary means by which to test the loyalty of the people. Such loyalty has proved not only to be a delusion and a snare, but to many a death warrant, as we read that the brutal rebels, who rudely-vored to cut off the 20th Indiana regiment at Chicamacomico, arrogant themselves for their disappointment upon the few miserable inhabitants who fell into their hands. The Southerners seem to combine to a remarkable degree the stealthy and murderous treachery of the red Indians with the brutal insensibility of the black race; of the latter, we can only account for this cause for the cruelties which marked their murder of old Goodwin and his wife, of Chicamacomico. The scene our present paper gives of the retreat of the 20th regiment needs no description. It is an anathema upon the treason of the rebels and the carelessness of our Cabinet.

SUSPECTED APPEARANCE OF CHARLES BRUNNER IN THE DESERTED CHAPEL.

The Graveyard Secret;

A Narrative of Criminal Administration in Germany.

CHAPTER IV.—SUGGESTIONS DEEPENED—FRUITLESS INQUIRY.

The judge was too much a man of the world to make the slightest allusion to this little incident, and we soon left the room in which it had occurred.

As yet I had made no attempt to turn the conversation upon the murder—I was pondering nightly. Nevertheless, the event which had witnessed had still further stimulated my curiosity, and thinking the opportunity favorable, I said to the judge,

"Will you also kindly permit me to visit your prison? I have ever felt the liveliest interest in all that relates to criminal jurisprudence."

"I shall show them to you with the greatest pleasure. Our jurists neglect no study, at the present, this important branch of our profession."

He summoned a subordinate, and despatched him for the jailer.

"Have you any prisoners?" I inquired, while awaiting this personage.

He mentioned the exact number, which was, I believe, thirty.

"Are there any accused of capital crimes?"

"Four, though several. They are only confined for petty larceny, or assault."

"Then you have none among them who have been long in durance?"

"None have been here beyond six months."

"You, in my imagination—yet I fancied when I made the last inquiry that my companion started, and that before replying—which by the way he did in a calm, firm voice—he looked furtively and distrustfully at me.

"If I inferred not," I continued, not appearing to remark his distrust, "you have made the rights of criminals your special study?"

"Certainly," he replied. "I regard the special consideration of a judge. Without speaking of the holiness of the rights which he protects, it is not on object worthy of the deepest interest and the most profound study, the beneficent influence which a judge may exercise upon a criminal, when he considers him not as a scoundrel for ever shut out from the pale of society, but soon unfortunate being whose human sentiment, generic composition, and above all, a better education, might some day reform—not alone for God, but also for society and man?"

There was such a degree of warmth and sincerity in his tones, that I felt almost ashamed of using circumstances with a view to obtain by such noble sentiments. Yet I could not efface from my mind his momentary glance of distrust, so I continued in carrying out my first design.

"You have doubtless, in the course of your large experience, had occasion to make many important psychological observations?"

"What criminal can fail to have such opportunities, if he does not improve them?"

"Yes," I said, somewhat also, but to encounter much dissimulation and hypocrisy, much of intricacies of infinities assumed, and much madness feigned, to avoid punishment?"

"Oh, certainly."

"Perhaps even you may have witnessed cases of deep crime or passion which have resulted in insanity from long imprisonment?"

"Several times."

"Lately?"

"About two years since," he replied.

His suspicions entirely awakened by this, and again the expression of distrust passed over his face. I had certainly, in my impatience, overstepped the limit of ordinary prudence. Of course I had now so far put him on his guard that he would not allow the slightest word escape him in any way connected with the subject.

With the view, therefore, of turning a conversation which was evidently disagreeable to him, and through which I could elicit no new facts, I alluded to the commission given me by my mother.

"May I ask you, judge, for some little information which interests me personally?"

"It will give me great pleasure to furnish you with any information that I may possess."

"My mother requested me to make inquiries concerning a friend of her girlhood, who formerly resided here, yet no one in the town seems to know anything concerning him save a certain Herr Tiedmann."

Hardly had I pronounced the name when the judge—that man so calm, cold and reserved—became so fearfully agitated that I expected stupified. His face was livid, and he appeared ready to faint. But what marvellous self-command he had!

I had scarcely had more than time to observe this wondrous change when his ordinary manner returned, and he replied in an indifferent tone—

"I have no recollection of ever having heard that name before."

"The person in question married a merchant residing in this town," I continued.

He shuddered again, but was more on his guard this time, and he hastily interrupted me.

"What was her husband's name?"

"My mother has forgotten. The marriage took place some twenty years ago."

"I am really unable to give you any information respecting the lady you mention. I have never heard her name before, and never heard of her."

The jailer's arrival cut short our conversation. But without this interruption even, it would have been difficult to have continued it. The passage explosively mentioned the names of Northern Italy, Tiedmann, and I was quite as embarrassed as himself. Since my arrival at Gruen—calm and successful enough, and the most inexplicable of them all was the fear and confusion of the judge when I pronounced the name of my mother's friend. I was for a moment tempted to believe that there was some connection between this singular and my adversary in the monastery, for it is natural to embrace to bind together by some mysterious chain the events which excite one's curiosity.

The jailer was indeed my surly companion of the preceding night. His recognition was mutual, only I was prepared to see him, and he had not expected again to meet me.

Immediately we quitted the judge he involuntarily knitted his brow, and looked cautiously and meaningly at the judge. But the calmness of the latter reassured him doubtless, for he dropped his glance in a moment and assumed the passive air of a servant awaiting orders.

"Jailer," said the judge, "conduct us to the prison."

"At your honor's service," he replied, "but if you have the time I should like first to make a communication to you."

"Speak," replied the judge, in a tone which we took on a gesture which caused my suitor, for the judge at once stepped aside with me, and the jailer approached us in a strong tone. There was nothing in the manner of the judge to indicate that the conversation was unusual, and there was an involuntary glance at the jailer, I noticed that it was the subject of their conversation. What was the nature and importance of the night before to the judge? What was the jailer to believe or say?

Following the jailer, the judge advanced to where I stood with an air of calm politeness, in spite of which I could read upon his face an expression of anxious curiosity, still further confirming my suspicions, and I was convinced that I had to become more cold and reserved.

Unexpected business requires my attention for the remainder of the day, so I shall be unable to accompany you to the prison. I regret this exceedingly, however, and shall have felt pleasure in displaying its arrangements to one feeling so deep and intelligent an interest in criminal affairs."

This was a polite but decisive mode of bidding me farewell.

I waited for the secretary and Lieutenant Hilmers with whom he had conducted me through his establishment, and expressed my admiration of the order and discipline which reigned in all parts of the building.

We bowed and parted, while Martin Krauss, the jailer, conducted me to the prison. I was curious to ascertain for myself whether it was the same person who had been concerned in the scene of my nightly adventures.

I felt sure, at a glance, that it was, and I was delighted to find that I was not mistaken. Yet nevertheless, I had not forgotten my adventure in the cemetery, nor had time lessened my desire to discover the secret of which I had obtained a clue. I should harvest nothing concerning the judge or the jailer, nor had my mother revealed any intelligence of her early friends.

I had been occupying the position of assessor in a neighboring town about two years, when I received, from the Ministry of Justice, a letter marked "Immediate." It contained orders for me to repair at once to ——, to take charge of the bailiwick, as the presiding magistrate had been seized with a sudden and dangerous illness. I was also informed that I should probably arrive in that town (entered to the bail-postal arrangements) before my official nomination could reach there. I was directed, however, not to await its arrival, but to enter immediately on the discharge of my duties, and, if necessary, to produce the letter containing the supreme orders of the Ministry, to my warrant for doing so.

This was a most flattering my youth and the recent date of my nomination to the post of assessor, was a high compliment. But I appeared to me doubly precious, inasmuch as it enabled me to penetrate the mystery which, for years, had excited my curiosity to such a high degree. I own at last to a position to raise the veil which covered it, in spite of the judge and jailer.

I arrived at ——— after other hours, and, consequently, too late to enter on the discharge of my duties; and as it was my intention to take every one by surprise, and particularly the old jailer, if he were still alive, I passed the evening quietly in my own chamber, taking care not to step at the same time where I had staid during my former visit.

Next morning, at eight o'clock, the time of the opening of the halls, I presented myself there. I was curious to know whether the severe order established by the judge prevailed, even during his absence. Not a stroke in the face of all that the employés were already at their posts.

I inquired for the assessor, who was temporarily discharging the duties of judge. He was evidently indebted with the dignity of his new position. For evidently designating to enter me, he bustled.

"Who are you? What do you want?"

I handed him my letter from the Minister. Hardly had he glanced over it when he bowed most profoundly.

"Have the kindness," I said, in reply to him, "to install me in my new functions.

"As your seniors judge. What part of the building will you visit first—the treasury?"

"The treasury appears as if I doubted the probity of the treasurer."

"Very true. Where then do you wish to go?"

"To the prison, if you please."

"Judge the jailer here," he said, to a degradation.

I should now ascertain if Martin Krauss still lived! I awaited jailer's arrival with such anxiety, that the trembling of my heart was distinctly audible. Meantime, I inquired after the health of the judge.

"He is very weak," the assessor said, "having been suddenly seized with paralysis of the limbs, and several distinguished physicians have decided that there is no hope, and limit his life to three days at the utmost."

"Has he any family?" I next inquired.

"Only a daughter. His wife died years ago."

"How old is his daughter?"

"About nineteen years."

This was evidently the young girl whom I had met near the inn-bridge, and whose gracious and interesting features Charles Brunner had so deeply moved me.

The jailer now entered. He was Martin Krauss. The six years which had elapsed since my former visit had neither bowed his form nor shadowed his visage.

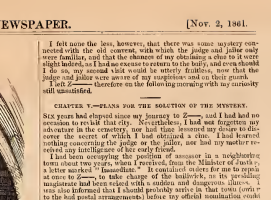
When he saw me, he could not restrain a movement of surprise and fear, and when the assessor informed him that I had come to supply the place of the judge, this man, ordinarily so cold and impassible, exhibited great agitation, and his face seemed to turn against the wall for support. In a single moment he seemed to have grown darker by ten shades, and his eyes and lids had lost their color.

The mysterious prisoner still lived! The jailer's terror was evidently on account of me.

"Does the judge wish to visit the prison immediately?" he inquired, in a tremulous tone.

"Certainly," replied my colleague, sharply, while he motioned to the jailer to be silent.

Evidently there was no hope of a solution of the mystery from that quarter. My search must therefore be made in the vicinity of the Church and the cemetery.



BOLA DESERTING THE JUDGE TO SAVE HER FATHER'S REPUTATION.

Unfortunately, before attempting this, I was obliged to repair to the office and make myself familiar with its offices.

And what precautions would not the jailer be enabled to take, meantime! What new difficulties would be met thrown in my way! Was it not these thoughts which led me so suddenly treasonand confronted him?

Besides Martin Krause, I found two other familiar faces. The head clerk and Charles Brunner, who occupied the same positions where I had seen them before. Brunner was paler and slighter than ever, with hollow cheek and eyes more sunken, while his respiration was so short and labored that it was painful. In the entrance to my face heading over his desk.

When I entered the room where he was seated he recognized me immediately, and his face became deadly white. But his emotion was not so great as before, for although his head trembled he still continued to write.

At last other hours were over, and the time which I had awaited with such lively impatience was at hand.

I was aware that such a person as a prisoner had been secretly, and in violation of the law, confined in the body of the old citadel, since morning only, in a condition to verify my suspicions. I was certain that that prisoner still lived; but his condition and terror manifested by Martin Krause.

But the jailer and jailer, the only persons acquainted with the secret, were aware that my suspicions were aroused; they knew that six years before, although without facilities of my kind, I had made an attempt to discover it. It was reasonable, therefore, to suppose, now that I was invested with the necessary power, that I would use it unsparingly to solve the enigma. And however unexpected my arrival, however unforeseen and terrible the surprise might have been to them, it was but natural to infer that they had used their utmost endeavors to close every avenue of detection.

True, the judge was upon his deathbed, and the jailer, deprived of his support and counsel, and restrained by fear of assuming too great a responsibility on his own shoulders, was, in a measure, paralyzed. Besides, he was occupied nearly the entire day by his duties in the prison, and had to fear my watchful eye. Had he then even conceived some criminal design, it was only at night that he could hope to put it into execution. And now was the time to thwart his purposes.

But how to do so? I had reflected during the day upon my future action. Many plans had suggested themselves, but on yet I had not definitely decided which to adopt.

I at first thought it would be well to summon the jailer, inform him of my suspicions and force him to confess the truth, by threatening, if he refused, to cause his arrest and a strict exploration to be made of the body. I hoped that the desire of shifting all the responsibility of the matter upon the judge, by a declaration that he had only carried out the orders of his superior, and above all the fear that the prisoner might perish with hunger through his neglect, might wrest the truth from his lips. And yet, to take this decisive step, I must possess the certainty that a prisoner was really confined in the old convent. Now I myself was perfectly convinced of this, but to others my reasons had been unsatisfactory, for my deductions drawn from a single word had seemed conjectures. There was a bare possibility that I was mistaken, and if so, should I not lose myself up for ever as an object of ridicule, and jeopardize perhaps my prospects for life?

Another plan was to play the spy upon the jailer's movements, but I was all too unfamiliar with the interior of the old convent, a veritable labyrinth of corridors and secret passages, to have a chance of surprising him. The idea presented itself to me also of returning, during the night, to the sanctory and listening for the prisoner's moans, and thus be guided to the spot where he was confined. But it was more than likely that Martin Krause, aware that my suspicions would turn upon the church and cemetery, had conveyed his prisoner to some other portion of the bulk, and I should thus pass the night in the graveyard to no purpose, without exciting the fair I cut of being discovered and becoming the talk of the town.

I at last determined upon a plan which offered equal chances of success, with the advantage of not being likely to compromise me.

CHAPTER VI.—A NIGHT SCENE IN THE CHAPEL—STRANGE DISCOVERIES.

It was nightfall by the time business was concluded. I then immediately sent for Martin Krause. He attended my summons at once, exhibiting no silentity, and awaiting my orders with the impenetrable air habituel to him.

"Jailer," I said, "you are, I believe, the oldest officer of the bulkwick?"

"Yes, sir."

"You were jailer here even before the judge's arrival?"

"I had been here ten years before his coming."

"And how many years in all, have you been in this establishment?"

"Thirty-six years."

"Always as jailer?"

"No, for eight years I was only an assistant."

"And have you, in turn, never employed an assistant?"

"Never."

"Why so?"

"A jailer rarely has that privilege. My predecessor engaged me because he was in ill health."

"You must be familiar with every portion of the bullwick?"

"Yes, sir."

"You shall guide me, then."

"At your orders, sir."

"Immediately?"

"At your orders, sir."

"Bring a lantern, or rather two, lest one should chance to get extinguished."

"At your orders."

"Have you a dark lantern?"

"Yes, sir."

"Bring it me, then."

"At your orders, sir."

"At your orders; yes, sir," these were the only replies I could elicit from this strange man, whose impassibility seemed unexampled. Not a muscle moved in his hard face, which appeared as if hewn out of stone.

Returning in a moment with the two lanterns, he inquired,

"Where am I to conduct you, sir?"

"To the old church."

"At your orders, sir," he replied, in a calm voice, lending the way.

Our exit the façade of the church, as I have before mentioned, opened upon the cemetery by a large portal and a small side door. The other opened on the court of the bulky, and in front of this door we stopped.

"Open this door," I said to the jailer.

He obeyed silently. The key turned noiselessly in the lock, and the door fell back upon its hinges without a sound.

This circumstance astonished me, as one of the employés of the bullwick of whom I had inquired the present uses to which the church was put, had assured me that it was never used or even entered.

Who usually keeps the key of this door?" I inquired.

"I have charge of all the keys of the bulk," responded the jailer.

"Do you often visit this church?"

"Once a quarter."

"For what purpose?"

"It is here that the prisoners' clothes are hung to dry."

The reply was plausible, if not true. I entered the church; it was bare and deserted. The altar was in a state of dilapidation. After a close investigation of the old building on the one side I walked across to the other side to the great portal. But on the interior as well as on the exterior the hinges and lock were so covered with cobwebs and dust that it had evidently and palpably been unopened for years.

"Have you the key of that door, jailer?"

"It has been for these fifty years," was the reply

I then went to the small side door, which did not open, as I supposed, into the sanctory, but into a chapel separated from the nave by an iron grating, the hinges of which were still in the wall.

On entering the chapel, I struck my foot against an iron ring attached to a flagstone, and nearly fell.

"What is this ring?" I inquired of the jailer.

"There is a well beneath that stone."

"A well in a chapel!" I exclaimed incredulously.

"This was the only portion of the bulky where water could be found. Cisterns only existed when it was used as a convent, and the judge gave orders for the boring of this well, some twenty years ago. But since then, pipes have been laid bringing us water from the city, and it is no longer in use."

And in confirmation of the truth of his assertion he raised the flagstone. I perceived a circular hole with damp walls, but which concealed the entrance to a subterranean passage rather than to a well, judging at least by the steps leading down into it. I held my lantern over the opening, but could discern no water. I remarked this to the jailer.

He made no reply to my observation, but picking up a stone threw it into the aperture. After striking several times against the well I heard it split against the bottom. Then was nothing further to be seen, yet my doubts were not dispelled. The steps did not appear to be in the centre of the well, they seemed to be cut in the same wall that I looked upon myself, after extending down to a certain depth, they might continue on under the floor of the adjoining room, passing beneath the church. I was strengthened in this opinion as I noticed a kind of handrail of iron, to facilitate descent. It was not from which prevented my making an immediate investigation, although such a feeling would have been quite pardonable under the circumstances, with such a companion and in such a place. But I did not wish to confirm Martin Krause's suspicions by an action which would so openly betray the object of my investigations, and, in case I was mistaken, cover me with ridicule. I contented myself, therefore, with questioning the jailer:

"What is the object of those steps?" I asked.

"To render access to the well easy when the water is low," replied he, descending a few steps, and throwing an iron chain from caller into the water.

A WAR INCIDENT—BURNING THE MASSACRE ON MUNSON'S HILL AT THE BREEZE OF THREE EVACUATION OF THAT POSITION, SEPTEMBER 29.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR ARTIST WITH GEN. MCCLELLAN.—[See page 382.]

He had a reply ready for every question.

I left the well, and approached the small side door of the chapel, which, as the render will doubtless remember, I described before as closing on the outside with a bar of iron, fastened into the wall. On the inside it was only fastened by a bolt, and a little above the bolt was a deep cavity, four fingers in width, which seemed to me to be of the same height with the iron bar on the outside. This circumstance I inspected well. I drew the bolt easily and noiselessly, and pulled the door towards me. It opened silently, drawing with it the iron bar, which slid into the groove.

This was an important discovery, which I wished to conceal from Martin Krause; so I pushed back the door hastily. When I turned he was ascending the upper steps of the well, and I could not divine from his manner whether he was aware of my discovery, nor if so, what effect it had produced upon him.

"What is that door used for?" I inquired, when he had closed the aperture leading to the well.

"It is never opened," he replied.

This response confirmed my suspicions even more than my discovery; it was now certain that this portion of the building supposed by every one to be unused and empty, was daily visited by the jailer, and for what purpose I clearly understood through the means afforded me had been in the cemetery. But where was the mysterious prisoner kept? This was the point I desired, but I could only ascertain this through Martin Krause's voluntary or forced confession. Although I had little hope of eliciting much from so resolute and tortured an individual, still I made the attempt.

As there was nothing to examine in the chapel, I had walked away, and had reached the church door when I stopped suddenly.

"Let us return to the chapel," I said.

"At your orders, sir," responded the jailer, calmly.

I walked straight to the little side door of the chapel, which I had unbolted, and threw it suddenly open, turning quickly upon the jailer, who looked on with the utmost composure.

"What does this mean?" I said, angrily.

The Graveyard Secret.

"To what do you refer, sir?"

"You assured me a few moments since that this door was unused."

"So I supposed it to be."

"Did you never open it?"

"No, sir."

"Jailor, do you remember our encounter in the cemetery six years ago?"

"Certainly, sir."

"In what portion of the cemetery did our meeting take place?"

"I have quite forgotten."

"How did you enter the graveyard?"

"Through the garden."

"What were you doing there at such an hour?"

"Making a tour around the buildings."

"For what purpose?"

"It is my business to watch over their safety."

"Why did you expel me so brutally from the cemetery?"

"It was my duty to do so; and as I then had not the honor of knowing you, sir, I beg you will pardon my impoliteness."

My last effort had failed, and despairing of success, for that night at least, I was about to move on, when I heard faint footsteps approaching the door of the chapel. They sounded like those of a person advancing cautiously for fear of being overheard. I imposed silence, by one commanding gesture, upon the jailor, and we concealed ourselves behind the door.

The footsteps continued to approach. After a moment's hesitation, caused doubtless by the streak of light emitted by our lanterns, I saw the tall, slender form of Charles Brunner cautiously pass through the door.

On perceiving him, the jailor sprang forward hastily, and in a voice vibrating with anger exclaimed:

"What are you doing here, Mr. Charles? What were you about in the cemetery?"

The young man started back with a scream. And to judge from his appearance, was almost overcome by terror.

"Come, reply; what do you want here?" inquired the jailor, moderating his tone. But as the youth made no response, he turned to me endeavoring to explain his sudden burst of anger, which contrasted so forcibly with his ordinary impassiveness.

"Excuse me, sir, but the conduct of this young man is so unpardonable, that I could not restrain my vexation. The judge, who loves him as a father, has so often forbidden him to go out during the night, because the chilly air is prejudicial to his delicate health, yet he will persist in doing so. Almost every night I have to order him out of the garden or the cemetery, and he always refuses to assign any reason for being in either."

I turned to the youth, and motioning him to enter the chapel, at the door of which he stood tremblingly, I said:

"Sir, I cannot suppose that you visit this cemetery from caprice alone. Perhaps if you will inform me of your motive for doing so, the judge or myself may grant you the permission hitherto denied you."

He raised his eyes for a moment, but with so terrified and anxious an air, that I was certain it was fear of Martin Kraus which prevented his speaking. So I hastened to add:

"Perhaps this motive is of a nature not to be communicated before every one?"

"Oh no, no sir," he cried, anxiously, as if fearful lest the jailor should suspect him of distrust. "I thank you for your kindness, but the judge is acquainted with my motive, as is also Martin Kraus, and I think on this account they will pardon my offence of to-night, as they have done on other occasions."

Saying this, he turned away, when a sudden noise arrested his steps. It was a sound which came from beneath the ground, and was so faint that it would not have been audible except for the extreme stillness of the place. It appeared as if some one was pacing up and down in a narrow space with the heavy impatient step of a wild beast in his cage. A smothered groan was then heard, and all again became silent.

Charles Brunner had listened with an anxiety heartrending to witness. His eyes were wild with despair, but suddenly endeavoring to overcome his emotion, he fixed them upon the jailor with a wistful inquiring glance, which the man responded to in a voice which, through rough, still betrayed some feeling.

"Well, well, Mr. Charles, why do you not return to the baily?"

Charles Brunner moved slowly and sadly away.

I had now ascertained for a certainty that there was a subterranean passage beneath the church, nor could I doubt that the sounds I had heard were the footsteps of an unknown prisoner. But knowing from what had passed, that it was useless to attempt to elicit any information from Martin Kraus, I determined to postpone further investigations until the morning, and meantime to conceal from him, as far as possible, my suspicions. So I said carelessly:

"Then you are acquainted with this youth's motive in visiting the cemetery, jailor?"

"No, sir; I do not understand what he meant by saying so. But the judge must know, and will, I doubt not, inform you with pleasure."

Whereupon Martin Kraus and myself parted for the night.

CHAPTER VII.—A WHISPERED CONVERSATION OVERHEARD.

It was now nine o'clock, and I was about to return to my inn, when it suddenly occurred to me that, in my impatience to satisfy my curiosity, I had entirely neglected all the requirements of courtesy. I had not personally made inquiries for the judge's health, and fearful, lest, in so small a community, where every action is observed, my forgetfulness might give rise to comment, I immediately wended my way to his apartments, which were in the second story of the old convent.

Finding the door of the latter open, I entered the dark corridor, and ascended the stairs quietly, in order not to disturb the invalid. Everything was silent in this part of the building, and ignorant as to whether I should turn to the right or left to reach the judge's room, I was about to descend the staircase in search of a servant to conduct me to it, when I heard whispering in the dark corridor.

One voice I recognised in a moment, from his painful respiration, as belonging to young Brunner.

"Did he remain long in the room?" he inquired.

"Nearly an hour," said a musical female voice, which I at once detected as that of the judge's daughter, for the tone in which she had, in years agone, said to her hapless companion, "Do not weep Charles, come with me," still rang in my ears.

They were alone there, alone in that dark, deserted corridor, and they had passed the time of life when such interviews are admissible! Yet it was no lover's meeting which I had surprised.

"Were they alone?" inquired Charles.

"Quite alone," was the reply. "I wished to remain, for his manner alarmed me, but my father dismissed me, while he closed the door after me."

To whom did they refer? I imagined that it was to Martin Kraus. It was ridiculous, perhaps, but he had occupied my thoughts so constantly since morning, and it was this idea which induced me to remain and listen to their conversation, since I felt justified in improving any opportunity of informing myself concerning the jailor's movements.

Charles Brunner continued:

"Then you were unable to ascertain the purport of their conversation?"

"I could make out nothing, although I listened at the keyhole. Their dialogue was carried on in whispers. Once only I heard my father's voice raised, as if giving an order, but the answer was, 'No, it is impossible.'"

"What did your father reply?"

"He repeated his order in a sterner voice. But judging from the tone of the response, I infer that he was still refused obedience."

"You say the interview took place this morning?"

"Yes, immediately after my father's successor left the prison. Oh, my God! my God!"

It was indeed of the jailor then that they were speaking! And Martin Kraus, although the judge lay on his deathbed, had hastened to inform him of my arrival the moment that he was at liberty.

"He was so excited that something remarkable must have occurred at the prison," the young girl went on. "I cannot repress a shudder even now, at the thought of his ferocious and terrified expression."

"Nothing extraordinary had then happened," said Charles Brunner. "But now, after the scene of this evening——"

"What do you mean?"

"Nothing, nothing."

"You are concealing something from me, Charles!"

"No, I am not. I know nothing."

"Charles, your tone belies your words; you are deceiving me. You have long hidden something from me. Why is this?"

"I have always told you that I knew nothing."

"True, but I have never believed you. From childhood I have known that there was some secret lying heavy on your heart—a terrible secret, since you would never confide it to me. Have I not often watched you, when you fancied yourself alone, weeping bitterly? Have I not often seen you glide into the cemetery at night, and remain on your knees, your ear to the ground listening, as if to some voice which spoke to you from beneath the tombs. And when I have surprised you in this attitude among them, you have always said, 'I am thinking of my father, and my thoughts are so sad that I feel better when I come to this spot to indulge in them.'

"And one day, when I discovered you upon your knees, listening to a sad moaning, which seemed to come from beneath the old church, you would have driven me from the spot; but as I insisted upon knowing the cause of your sorrow, you seized my hand, and in a tone which, from any other lips than yours, would have terrified me, said, 'Come, since you insist upon it, come and listen to these groans before learning the story you are so anxious to hear.' But the old jailor approached at this moment, and in his gruff voice inquired what we were doing there, and we both fled like terrified children, as we then were.

"And on the morrow, when I asked you to relate this strange history, you refused to do so, insisting that you had none to tell, and that I was absurd in supposing you to have been in earnest the day before. This happened ten years ago, Charles, and I have never since that time annoyed you by any inquiries, for I perceived that they caused you pain. But I did not believe you then; and I have never believed you since.

"You are concealing some dark secret from me, Charles—a secret which is wearing away your life. You turn away—you weep! Am I not right, Charles? You must confide this secret to me. I have a presentiment that it in some way relates to my father, and that it is on this account that you have thus long concealed it from me. He is dying, he knows this; he is so sad and restless, particularly since the jailor's visit. Perhaps, if I knew all, I might render him more calm, and console his last moments. Charles, if you love me, do not refuse me this; have pity on my father and on me!"

She ceased speaking.

"Rosa dear, dear Rosa," he replied, in a tone of supplication, "do not, I conjure you, ask this of me—not to-day at least. Believe me, the causes of my sadness are shadows without a substance, and simple illusions of my imagination. There may be something real at the bottom of all this; but I know nothing for a certainty, and, in spite of the length of time occupied by my researches, I have never succeeded in verifying my suspicions. Would you, then, have me increase your sadness by relating to you my imaginary sufferings? It is impossible, Rosa; besides, if a secret does exist, this night will see it unveiled."

"Then you will tell me nothing, Charles?"

"I have nothing to tell."

"Say, rather, that you do not love me."

"I not love you!" cried the young man, sadly. "Ah, Rosa, if you did but know! But this is madness—to return to your father. Did you see the jailor after he left him?"

"Yes."

"What was his manner?"

"As stern and impenetrable as ever."

"And your father, in what condition did you find him?"

"Very much agitated. Something seemed to weigh heavily on his heart. Several times he turned, as if desirous to speak with me, but he had not strength sufficient for the purpose."

"Then he told you nothing?"

"Not a word."

"Rosa, I must leave you now. Will you make me one promise?"

"Can you doubt my doing so, Charles?"

"Promise to continue to be my friend, happen what may."

"Do you suppose that I can ever be other than your friend?"

"Make me that promise, if you would not break my heart. I have not long to live. Promise me, also, Rosa, darling, that you will never forget me, and seal that promise by giving me your hand."

"Charles, I will never forget you; take my promise and my hand."

Just at this moment a door was opened, and a servant called, "Mademoiselle Rosa!" in a subdued voice.

"Here I am!" exclaimed the young girl.

"The judge has sent me for his successor, whom he wishes to see immediately," said the man.

"It is well, Frederick," said Rosa; "go in search of the gentleman, and conduct him into the blue chamber. I wish to see him for a moment before he visits my father."

However legitimate my motive for playing the eavesdropper, still I was unwilling to be surprised in this situation. So I hastened down stairs, and left the old convent without being discovered. While in the courtyard I met the servant, with a lantern.

"I was on my way to your hotel, sir," said he; "the judge wishes to see you immediately."

"I was just about calling to inquire after him," I responded.

"He is very ill, poor gentleman; and it is feared he will not survive the night."

I followed the domestic, who conducted me to the blue chamber.

A moment after, the judge's daughter joined me. I had thought her beautiful as a child, but how much more so was she as a woman. Her air of sadness seemed to lend additional charms to her loveliness.

"Sir," she began, "my father has expressed a wish to see you immediately. He tells me that he has an important communication to make to you. I may be deceived, but I believe its nature is very serious. I am here now to pray you, be it what it may, to render my father's final moments as free from pain as possible."

As she uttered the last few words, her voice, which up to that time had been firm, in spite of her emotion, now became so tremulous that she was forced to stop. She resumed in a moment, however,

"Promise me, sir, to spare my father's honor and to shield his reputation."

"Mademoiselle," I replied, "my conduct will prove that your request is superfluous. But I appreciate, none the less, the noble feelings which have dictated it, and you may rest assured that I will act with prudence and discretion."

"Thanks, sir, for my father's sake and my own," she answered, and led the way to the judge's chamber, where she left me.

RETURN OF WOUNDED PRISONERS FROM NORFOLK TO NEWPORT NEWS.

The United States steamer Express met by agreement, on the 7th October, the rebel steamer Northumberland, with a flag of truce, about 12 miles above Newport News, and brought down 57 wounded prisoners, who had been captured at Bull Run, and taken to Richmond. Their release was not due to the magnanimity of the rebel authorities, but rather to their inability to supply their wants. Their treatment while in the hospital has been of the roughest kind, they being compelled to sleep on the floor during the greater part of the time. Seventeen of the released prisoners who were unable to be sent home were taken to the Old Point Hospital. The others were forwarded to their respective abodes. A more terrible reproach upon war than these men present it is scarcely possible to conceive. A fine young man, his mother's idol, comes home with one leg, maimed for life; another has no arm; a third has had a bullet through his lungs, and cannot speak without every word costing its weight in blood. Well might that sweetest, and yet bitterest, of human writers say, that war sent back its legless and armless men merely to become the ornaments of society, and evidences that there were men who would risk a finger for a principle. We are pleased to add that President Lincoln has ordered an equal number of rebel prisoners to be sent in exchange, the selection to be made on the same principle as that inaugurated by the Richmond authorities—their utter inability to fight again.

Miss Charlotte Cushman, our American actress, has just left Paris for Rome, where she possesses a handsome residence.

THE U. S. WAR STEAMER MONTICELLO,

Lieut. Braine Commanding, Shelling the Rebel Troops on Hatteras Island.

We so thoroughly described the battle of Chicamacomico in our last number (page 355), that we have merely now to call attention to the graphic sketch which our present paper contains. It is from the pencil of Dr. Everts, one of the officers of the 20th Indiana regiment, who witnessed the appalling scene. The correspondent of the Tribune gives some very interesting particulars of this narrow escape of the 20th regiment from destruction. We will, however, not dwell upon it now, having editorially in our last said what we thought our duty required of us. It would appear from what the Tribune correspondent says, that Col. Hawkins entrusted to the discretion of Capt. Jardine, of his regiment, what should have been left to Col. Brown, of the Indiana regiment, viz., an order to retreat. We understand that Gen. Mansfield takes our view of the case. We must do Col. Hawkins the justice to say that, apart from the fact of placing the 20th regiment in so precarious a position, his arrangements were characterized by promptitude, and were crowned with great success. But still, as at the taking of the forts, the entire active merit belongs to the Naval Department, and Lieut. Braine was the hero of this achievement.

WAR NEWS.

Rout of the Rebels at Bolivar, near Harper's Ferry.

An affair of some importance took place on the south side of the Potomac, near Harper's Ferry, on the 16th of October.

Early in the morning the rebels showed themselves on Bolivar Heights, overlooking the ferry, and commenced an attack with ordnance upon three companies of the 13th Massachusetts, under Major Gould, stationed on the north side of the river. The firing was kept up for about three hours, when three companies of the 3d Wisconsin crossed the river, charged upon the enemy, and succeeded in capturing one of their cannon. They subsequently retreated in good order to the river, where they were reinforced by three companies of the 28th Pennsylvania, and, under command of Col. Geary, charged again upon the enemy, driving them from their position and recapturing the cannon—a 32-pounder Columbiad—with which they returned across the river. The National forces had but three pieces of artillery, served on the north side of the river, while the enemy had seven pieces, together with a force of infantry and 500 cavalry. They were completely routed, and driven back some three miles. The National loss was seven killed and wounded, while that of the enemy was not less than 150, including Colonel Ashby, who was in command.

Naval Fight near New Orleans.

We have rebel accounts of a naval conflict at the head of the Passes near the mouth of the Mississippi river, between a rebel flotilla, commanded by Captain Hollins, late of the navy, and some vessels of the blockading squadron, in which the rebels claim to have been successful. The only account of the affair is the following bombastic despatch from the rebel commander:

"Fort Jackson, Oct. 12th.—Last night I attacked the blockaders with my little fleet. I succeeded, after a very short struggle, in driving them all aground on the Southwest Pass bar, except the Preble, which I sunk. I captured a prize from them, and after they were fast in the sand I peppered them well. There were no casualties on our side. It was a complete success. Hollins."

Late advices from the South deny the loss of the Preble. A few days will give us all the particulars of the affair in an authentic form.

Brilliant Exploit off Chincoteague—12 Rebel Schooners Captured.

The United States steamer Louisiana, which has been off Chincoteague Island, has captured a dozen schooners, which had no clearance papers. On the 5th inst. two launches, sent to capture a rebel vessel in shore, were fired upon by a larger force of rebels, and one of our men was wounded. The fire was returned, and one or more rebels killed. The shot from the rebel guns burned up the schooner. The following official report of the affair has been received:

"United States Steamer Louisiana,
Chincoteague Inlet, Oct. 5.

"This morning, at 9 o'clock, we had a sharp conflict with the enemy, who, 300 strong, attempted to cut off two boats from this vessel, and 23 men, all told, which I had despatched to take or destroy a fine schooner, which I had reason to believe was being converted into a privateer. Fortunately I had gone in with the steamer at the same time, it being high tide, and was enabled to cover the return of the party.

"The boats, after passing through a terrible fire, finally reached the schooner, but finding her aground, made a breastwork of her, and opened a deadly fire, which, with the assistance of a few shots from our long range gun, drove t[illegible] nemy back to a distant cover with loss, and the boats, after fir[illegible] schooner, returned without further molestation. Acting-Mast[illegible] rness estimates the loss of the rebels to be at least eight in k[illegible] and wounded, as he saw that number carried off.

"Our loss was one seriously wounded, Acting-Master Hooker, and three very slightly. I have but praise to bestow on those engaged in the boats for their coolness and intrepidity when assailed by such overwhelming odds. They were yet some three hundred yards from the schooner when fired upon, but they preferred pushing on and returning through it, rather than fail in accomplishing their object.

"During the reconnoissance last night, two of their dispatch sloops were captured.

"A. Murray, Lieutenant-Commanding."

Recapture of Lexington.—On the 16th of October a detachment of 150 Missouri National troops surprised the 300 rebels in possession of Lexington, and recaptured the place, with all the sick and wounded, a large amount of arms, and two cannon. 100 of the wounded were sent to St. Louis by the steamer Sioux City.

Rebel Defeat at Lynn Creek, Mo.—A dispatch from Syracuse, Mo., reports that Gen. Wyman had arrived at Lynn Creek with 2,500 men, and there dispersed a body of rebels, killing several, taking 200 prisoners and capturing 18 loads of goods.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Etna brings news from the Old World to the 10th of October. If we may judge from Earl Russell's reply to a deputation of merchants who presented a memorial on Mexican affairs, England has no intention of joining France and Spain in their proposed interference in Mexican affairs. Lord Russell limits his programme to obtaining security for persons and property, and for the fulfilment of engagements. It is, therefore, probable that Spain will proceed alone in the Mexican invasion, with the possible co-operation of England and France's naval forces should she modify her plan. It is reported that Prince Napoleon had presented to the Emperor an important State paper on American affairs. Mr. Lindsay, a half crazy M. P., had in a public lecture advocated the intervention of France and England to bring about a peaceable separation of the North and South.

Mr. Vandenhoff, the actor, died on the 7th of October, aged 72. The Great Eastern is repairing. The Emperor of China is dead. There was great probability of trouble between the Japanese and the English, in consequence of the attack upon the British Consulate by some Japanese retainers of the Princes, in which Mr. Oliphant, the author, was seriously wounded.

PERSONAL.

The New Bedford Mercury states that Mrs. Samuel A. Frazer, of Duxbury, is now engaged in knitting stockings for soldiers in our army. She was employed 85 years ago in knitting stockings for the soldiers of the Revolution. She is now 92 years old.

A picture of the Fire Zouaves and Black Horse Cavalry, by Rosenberg, is now exhibiting at Wilmot's, in Broadway. It is a spirited and carefully finished composition.

The venerable Thomas Wildey, the founder of Odd Fellowship, died suddenly in Baltimore on the 19th October.

Page, the portrait painter, has turned his attention to the mechanical arts. He is now engaged upon a gun of his own invention which is said to be a very deadly affair.

Several English admirers of our countryman Hawthorne, author of "Transformation," "The House of Seven Gables," "The Scarlet Letter," etc., purpose presenting him with a testimonial of their esteem consisting of a beautiful marble medallion.

Mr. Vandenhoff, the celebrated actor, died recently at the age of 72 years.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Times says, that among the distinguished foreign officers who have offered their services to the Government is Changarnier. The wise and dignified policy which the Government has adopted in regard to foreign officers has already been stated, and meets with general approbation.

The Paris Italian Opera endeavored to secure "Little Patti," but the negotiations fell through. The American cantatrice has decided to give her voice a few months rest, and will not sing even at concerts; at least so say those who pretend to know.

FINE HEAD OF HAIR.

OF THE NUMEROUS COMPOUNDS constantly announced for preserving, restoring or reproducing the original color of the hair, there is only one which has ever given satisfaction to a very limited people, viz:

Fish's Inhalible Hair Restorative,

WITH A REPUTATION UNPARALLELED.

Confirmed on the insurance in public estimation; and the unanimous award of the last three years has proved beyond question that it possesses absolutely the following virtues, which are not claimed for any preparation of the kind save it. It harmonizes the hair more properties into the pores of the scalp, nourishes the Hair in its entire state, eradicates its growth, cleanses it from scurf and dandruff.

RESTORES AND SUSTAINS ITS NATURAL COLOR AND LUXURIOUSNESS

"It is susceptible of positive proof that we must receive for our cereals, within the present fiscal year, more money from Europe than we have heretofore received for both from our cotton, and that supposing we shall not this year sell one pound of cotton to Europe, we shall yet have a large balance in our favor, which will be payable in specie."—Providence Journal.

"One coincidence in connection with the war and the short crops in the Old World, strongly illustrates the fact that King Corn has deposed King Cotton in the sovereignty of the world, and that Europe has still to lean upon this country for assistance in the hour of her need, and that is, that no less than 1,377,566 bushels of grain, and 83,624 barrels of flour, worth at a fair estimate $2,350,000, have been exported from this port to Europe during the last week."—Herald.

This Heater is an admirable arrangement for Warehouses, where there is a basement, dining or reading room. It is not in the kitchen, and will occupy no more room than a grate. The hot air pipes are to be placed in the floor, and the heat passes up as in the picture or more, making them perfectly safe from fire. They are manufactured to suit square or circle models, and are simple in their arrangement, easily managed, consume but a small quantity of fuel, and can be regulated with very little attention, so as to diffuse the heat to the upper rooms of the house, as well as the room in which it is placed.
THIS HEATER IS WARRANTED TO GIVE ENTIRE SATISFACTION.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1861, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 311.—Vol. XII.] NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 9, 1861. [PRICE 6 CENTS.

To Subscribers—Our New Volume.

We have to remind our subscribers that the present volume will terminate with one more number. Now is therefore the time to subscribe for the New Volume, which will be one of special value and interest in its authentic illustrations of all the leading incidents and events of the war. Our subscribers will not only have presented to them weekly the current history of affairs, but "their very form and proportions," from the pencils of experienced and competent artists, connected with every division of the Army on the land, and every expedition of the Navy on the sea. Our readers should lose no time in renewing their subscriptions if they would preserve a complete file of the paper, and a complete Pictorial Record of the Times, for such is the popular demand that it will not always be possible to supply back numbers.

To meet the altered condition of the times, we have determined to send the Newspaper to Clubs at the following reduced rates:

Terms for Newspaper.

One Copy for One Year	$4 00
Two Copies for One Year	8 00
Five Copies for One Year	18 00

One Copy will be sent, free, to each person sending on the money for a Club of Five Subscribers.

DEATH OF COLONEL E. D. BAKER, U. S. SENATOR FOR OREGON, AT THE HEAD OF THE CALIFORNIA REGIMENT, BATTLE OF BALL'S BLUFF, OCTOBER 21.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST WITH GENERAL BANKS'S COMMAND.—SEE PAGE 289.

Terms for Newspaper and Magazine.

On Copy of the Newspaper and One of Frank Leslie's Monthly still a year for.....$4 00

In no way can so much interesting pictorial and reading matter be obtained for the same money as by a subscription to the Newspaper and Magazine. Besides its illustrations, the latter contains a greater amount of reading than any other magazine in the country, eminently adapted for the family circle. It also contains a splendid Fashion Plate monthly, and a complete record of the Fashions, with engravings, showing all the novelties in all the articles of dress.

Notices of the Press.

We consider Leslie's Monthly Magazine one of the best holiday publications in the country. It always has a fine steel-plate engraving, and is so interesting that we can hardly lay it down when we commence it.—[Mail Express.

Frank Leslie's Monthly is one of the best of the class of the publications we exchange with. It is prettily illustrated, and always contains a large amount of readable matter. A steel plate of Fashions, engraved with it makes it a welcome visitor to the table of the ladies.—[Boston Evening Gazette.

This magazine is the largest monthly periodical that we receive, and is one of the cheapest. We would advise those who are fond of illustrated monthly stories to send for Frank Leslie's Magazine.—[Alabama Ed. Reporter.

This magazine is got up with great care and taste, and contributes a large amount to be desired in a monthly publication.—[Ohio Farmer.

The paper of this beautiful magazine are enveloped with elastic fibres, and is of unusually strong surface; it is also remarkably free from specks and other engravings. This magazine is among the best for its cheapness, and the quantity of its matter.—[Journal of Prison, and Reformatory Discipline.

Barnum's American Museum.

THE attractions of this place are beyond precedent or parallel, embracing, besides all the other features, the great in the River Nile Aquat, daily, by the engraved spear of an eminent engineer, and their brilliant dives. DICKENS'S GREAT PERFORMING DOGS, are the last but not least of this popular trio. Admission to all as usual, only 25 cts. Children under ten 15 cts.

LIVING HIPPOPOTAMUS,

The State of the Nation.

THE week has been full of interest. In the West four bosoms of the National forces, under Fremont, Sherman, Anderson, and Buell, are concentrating their strength, in this inexplicable retreat, has nearly reached the frontier Arkansas. It seems almost impossible for him to escape, with the exception of Fremont the Missouri border. Thompson and Lowe have met with a signal defeat at the hands of Colo. Plummer and Carlin, and are thoroughly scattered. In the South the state of affairs remains as before. We already occupied Springfield, routing the rebels with a crushing force. Altogether, it seems probable that a month's time will suffice to expel the rebel invaders from the State, save their long stay has been a standing disgrace to the government and the country. In the South the rebels are at their opportunity. They were prepared to act when attacky abandoned her false position of neutrality while the Union forces had to be organized. They have had to scrape all the opportune moment, and now, so far from being able to take the offensive, it is doubtful if they can succeed in aiding their partisans. The army on the Gulf Shore is looking anxiously towards the coast, which is now removed from the sea, and do not elsewhere advance to the rear. Such has the slight attempt which they have made at anything beyond a skirmish been attended with encouraging results. The attack by Bragg on Lexington was a signal and depressing failure. In North Carolina, too, the signs are cheering, and conventions have in which the people of the country declaring their anxiety to adhesion to the Union, and repudiating, in emphatic language, the authority and acts of the insurgent Government.

The week has also witnessed the clearing up, in part at least, of the mysteries connected with the rebel attacks on the Rosa Island and the blockading fleet off Pensacola, the first the insurgents sustained a repulse so severe as to be called a victory, and the second a loss far greater than but the attack should have taken place at all, or being able, should not have resulted in the complete annihilation of the squadron, seems to have given rise to a feeling of recklessness or blind confidence on the part of the National set and forces. That the fleet in the Mississippi escaped destruction again seems to have resulted entirely from the cowardice of the lying Hollins than from any effort or prevision of or alert itself. The frightful Richmond was absolutely surrounded by the true Union Mississippi, which must have utterly managed not to have completed her destruction. But in most laughable circumstances, the whole affair ends in abandonment of the Vincennes by her captain, who attempted to blow her up, but unsuccessfully. The match had to be lit amidst fearfully wet out, and the ship was left to the Navy. Had Captain Hardy done his work better, the rebels would now be rejoicing over the destruction of the vessel, which they would have claimed as their own invention. At that time-honored institution, the military court Martial, has not been entirely unfruitful in the Army and Navy, we can conceive of no better opportunity for such and thus is afforded by the late affair in the Mississippi, and especially by the conduct of Captain Hollins. Is the rebel that owns well" but Providence will not always help those who do not help themselves.

From this rather cheering review of affairs in the West and South, we turn with sad hearts and sadder forebodings the Gigantic Failure at Washington. We do not now refer solely to the fearful blunder at Edwards' Ferry, attended as was with more circumstances of pain and horror than any they reveal of the war, but to the general disorganization that, while we have an Army of 250,000 men in and around the Capitol, and a new and powerful Navy at our command, we have yet permitted the rebels to close up the principal avenue to the Capitol, the Potomac river. We hear of grand reviews, and parades more extensive than have ever yet been witnessed on this continent, but of the lethargy and inaction which permits the rebels to eat off Washington from the sea, and to the force of the incomprehensible ignorance which repeats in an exaggerated form the bloody blunders of Big Bethel and Vienna! Winter is close at hand; cold engines and storms are the allies of the rebels; the hospitals and depressing the spirits of the soldiers. The roads of Virginia are fast becoming impassable to the artillery and supply trains of the army, and the transport service, which the people have gathered without who much cost and care on the banks of the Potomac, still rests idly within sight of the enemy's lines, under the incomprehensible and to the gigantic earthworks, or swelling the magnificence of our Republican Court by the formation of new regiments.

It will no longer do to repel the natural solicitude of the people and their anxiety for decisive movement concentration with the charge that the public is the bosom of the Government, by an arrogation of military profundity on the part of those directing affairs. The same common sense which guides the people in the affairs of farm, in the counting-house, the cabinet or the camp, tells us plainly enough that a great army cannot advance through Virginia during the winter's storms, and that to wait is but what is at hand. In the army, then, to take up its quarters for the season in Washington and Alexandria, and to require very little prescience to see that the war will become chronic, and, by spring, resolve itself into a simple war of boundaries. The rebels, meanwhile, strong in their diminishing in numbers through utter hopelessness of National support. In Virginia, North Carolina and Tennessee, will by that time have been subdued, or at least have so identified themselves to no apathetic acquiescence in an order of things beyond their power to prevent. These are not vague appreciations, but results which every man, capable of reasoning, knows must ensue, unless a speedy and decisive victory is achieved in Virginia. Such victory may grieve from that State before the setting in of winter. Caution in a great element of military success; but Enterprise is a greater; and we can only hope that the cities at Washington that distrust and misgivings begin to prevail in the hearts of the people, who have patiently and confidingly waited on their sentiments, the closing of the Potomac, the Potomac justifies, and misgivings for which the butchery at Edwards's Ferry, unhappily, gives too much warrant.

The great Naval Expedition, from Fortress Monroe. It comprises the Wabash, flag-ship, 15 steam frigates, 18 steam sloops, and numerous—altogether 50 vessels, under the command of Commodore Dupont. The land forces accompanying the expedition numbers about 20,000 men, under the command of General W. Sherman, who commanded the famous "Sherman Battery" during the Mexican War. Two thousand horses are embarked on the transports, with the proper artillery materials, and a vast quantity of artillery and stores. These transports also carry 1,000 of the runaway slaves who have found refuge at Fortress Monroe, and who will be employed at wages by Government as laborers. These preparations imply not only an attack on the Southern coast, but a long occupation. There seems to be every reason to believe in the success of the expedition; our only doubt arises from the fear that there will not be approach of winter storms. The expedition should have sailed during the quiet month of October.

The Disaster at Edwards' Ferry.

A DISASTER, infinitely more serious in proportion to the numbers engaged than that of Ball Run, was suffered by the National forces at Edwards' Ferry, on the Upper Potomac on Monday, the 21st October. The harrowing details are given elsewhere. They are briefly as follows: missing, including two colonels prisoners, and the gallant and chivalrous Baker dead, is the sad epitome of the results of the engagement—an engagement which the Southern coat has a pressure of impatient civilians," nor by any "insane cry" of "on to Richmond!" This true military incompetence arises from the fact that the responsibility for the error of the case have not been allowed to come forward in any exaggerated form; on the contrary, the omission of any official report of the affair, and the reticence of the military authorities of all the despatches relating to it, inspire a fear that we are still to learn the full proportions of the calamity. But still to learn the full proportions of the calamity. But taking the facts as published, they prove, not that a great military blunder has been committed, but a great military crime, for neither can it should be held responsible through the servility of a Court Martial. The notion is no longer disposed to accept the apologetic shibboleth of "accidents of war," or the discredit of its name, that "some one has blundered!" It is certain that the little handful of 1,100 soldiers which crossed the Potomac did not do so without orders. Who gave those orders? That is a question which the people have a right to have answered. The order to Col. Baker, which he is said to have received with the remark, "a terrible mistake, but I shall obey it." It is also said exists, stained with his blood. It is unfortunate that it is so, but let the people know who it was that sent the gallant Californians and the brave Massachusetts men into the "jaws of hell!" It is a question which, however painful, is a miserable scow, capable of carrying not more than 80 men, and two small canoes, were the sole means of transport with which a column of the United States army undertook to cross a deep and rapid river, in the face of an enemy in force on the opposite bank! History furnishes no parallel to such humanity, and as we have said already, the ignorance or incompetence which directed the attempt is without excuse or apology, and must be published as a crime of the first magnitude. No amount of praise of the gallantry of the slaughtered soldiers, and no extent of official concealment or prevarication, can either deceive the people or prevent them from demanding a right inquiry into the causes and circumstances of this most horrible butchery of our soldiers at Edwards' Ferry—all the more horrible, because unnecessary, and tending to no result except to spread distrust in the army and to destroy that confidence which is so essential an element of success in all warlike operations.

Bursting of Rebel Bubbles!

We have at last authentic accounts of the two great rebel victories, over which the whole South has been firing guns and uttering jubilations for the past ten days. The famous fight near the mouth of the Mississippi, in which the mundane thunderbolt destroyed the sacred ones, followed the usual gun the rest aground and then "peppered them well," resolves itself into this, "simply this, and nothing more"—no vessel was sunk at all, and the "peppering" consisted in a single shot received by the Richmond, which did no damage worth noticing! Hollins was always regarded as the greatest liar in the navy, but his new accounts have rankled him to exact himself!

The "victory" on Rosa Island, when over Billy Wilson's men on Santa Rosa Island proves to be pretty much the same affair as the "victory" on the morning of the 21st of October, and partly supplied Wilson's men, numbering less than one-third of their number. They succeeded at first in setting fire to some of the boats, but were assailed in turn by the forces described by three companies of regulars, and driven back to their boats in the wildest disorder, and with heavy loss. The Zouaves lost 10 killed, 40 wounded and 9 prisoners; while the rebel loss is admitted by themselves to be upwards of 30 in killed, wounded and missing! "A famous victory!"

The National Army.

It has been calculated, from reliable data, that the National troops now in the field, or on their way to the seat of war, number 512,000, as follows:

	Infantry.	Cavalry.	Artillery.	Total.
Fremont	15,000	3,000	1,000	19,000
Illinois	15,000	8,000		19,000
Indiana	15,000	3,000	1,000	19,000
Kansas	3,000	2,000	500	5,500
Kentucky	4,000	1,000	200	5,200
Massachusetts	30,000	2,000	1,000	33,000
Maine	8,000	1,000	500	9,500
Michigan	10,000	1,000	200	11,200
Minnesota	5,000	1,000		6,000
New Hampshire	5,000	500	500	6,000
New Jersey	7,000	1,000	500	8,500
New Hampshire	4,000		500	5,500
Ohio	25,000	3,000	1,000	29,000
Pennsylvania	31,000	4,000	800	35,800
Rhode Island	1,000	500	500	2,000
Vermont	5,000	1,000		6,000
Wisconsin	10,000	1,000	1,000	12,000
Total	204,000	35,500	9,500	409,000

In addition to the above, there are the State and Government troops in Kentucky and Missouri, which may be estimated as follows:

	Government.	State.
Missouri	10,000	25,000
Kentucky	10,000	20,000
Total	19,000	45,000

There are also 5,000 volunteers raised in California, 5,000 in Maryland, 2,000 in Delaware, and 10,000 in the District of Columbia, besides 10,000 regulars, which, added together, give the grand aggregate of 512,000 men. We ought soon to see some result commensurate to this grand armament.

The Triumphs of Peace.

PEACE gained one of its grandest victories on the 25th of October, when the Atlantic telegraph between Newfoundland and Ireland was completed. The following message from the Mayor of San Francisco to the Mayor of New York, was the first message telegraphed from the former city:

"SAN FRANCISCO, October 25.

"To the Mayor of NEW YORK:

"SIR: Knowing that New York reads greetings, and congratulate her on the completion of the telegraphic which connects the Pacific with the Atlantic. We are pleased to hear of both cities be increased thereby, and the projectors of that important work meet with honor and reward.

H. F. TEESDALE,

"Mayor of San Francisco."

An unbroken telegraphic line now extends across the continent at its broadest point, from Newfoundland to the Pacific. It is the longest line in the world, and will be regarded by many as one of the wonders of the whole circuit of the globe. "At One Place the wire begins, and continues on to the other." Both these cities are the Pacific Provinces and one new England States to the commercial emporium of the continent, across the Empire State, through the great valleys of the Ohio and the Mississippi, and through the great prairies of the West, over the sterile deserts as well, and through the passes of the great mountain ranges, as also in the bottoms of the rivers, along the Great Salt Lake basin and down the shining valleys of our Eldorado, until it meets the Pacific in the very portals of the Golden Gate. It is the very solder of a desolating war, which seemingly absorbs the whole strength of the nation, the splendid miracle of a people's power to outstrip the slow processes of history take their beginning from events which are unaffected by her victories or her defeats."

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The reorganization of the army under General McClellan has been thorough and complete. The troops were at first grouped in divisions of 10,000 men each, under a Brigadier-General acting as Major-General. A further consolidation has now taken place, by corps d'armée of two or three, and the commanding officers of three divisions, whose rank, until decided by the commissions, will probably be that of Major-General. Each Major-General and Brigadier-General will command a staff of from 20 to 30 officers, and each corps will consist of from four regiments, of 1,000 men in each, to more than 30,000 men. The number of corps has not been published. It may be stated, however, that Major-General McClellan will have under his direct command Major-General Sumner, Major-General Heintzelman and General Keyes, late of California, will probably be a third and fourth. General Franklin and General Andrew Porter are also spoken of as likely to receive commands. It would appear, therefore, from this outline that the army of the Potomac is organized to the basis of 100,000 men.

COURT MARTIAL.—Com. Poole, who commanded the Brooklyn off New Orleans, when the privateer Sumter escaped from the Mississippi, has asked a Court of Inquiry to determine the responsibility of the affair. Com. Poole is a brave man. We are glad to know that his request has been granted. We did not see to have the facts of the case in an official form. It still remains a mystery why Com. McCauley, who commanded at Norfolk when the Navy Yard was destroyed, and to whose pusillanimity or treachery we owe the loss of the Merrimac, has not been brought before a Court of Inquiry. Equally so why Patterson, who permitted Johnston to join Beauregard at Bull Run, has not been held to answer before a Court Martial. Apropos of Patterson, the Rev. Mr. Smith, Chaplain of Colonel Butterfield's regiment, which was under Patterson, in a meeting lately held in Utica, boldly charges him with treachery, and gives good reasons for regarding him as a traitor. He said that "There was but one opinion of Gen. Patterson among the soldiers of his division. That was that he was a traitor. He had heard the Rhode Island regiment call him traitor to his face, and hiss, and groan, and hoot him back to his tent. Mr. S. said that Patterson left his command at midnight, and intimated very strongly that if he had remained much longer he would have been in danger of assassination from his own men."

McCormick's Reaper.—The Commissioner of Patents has refused to extend McCormick's patent for his reaping machines, on the following grounds:

"1st. That the invention is one of great utility and importance to the public.

"2d. That the sums already received by McCormick, and the sums he is entitled to recover from infringements, together amount to an adequate remuneration."

Fire in the Rear.—A column of 8,000 men, under Gen. Sumner, is organizing in California for a movement through Arizona into Western Texas. Under the pressure of the army avalanche now gathered on the North, with a powerful fleet on the coast, and a column advancing from the West, the South must soon begin to realize the power of the Government it has defied and attempted to destroy.

Rapidity in War.—Posterity will hardly believe that in a single campaign all Italy was conquered; three armies successively destroyed; more than 50 colors captured, 40,000 Austrians forced to lay down their arms; and that all these wonders were achieved by a General (Napoleon) only twenty-seven years old, and at the head of a French army of only 30,000 men.—Boston Transcript.

Regicide.—It is a singular coincidence that attempts should have been made, almost simultaneously, on the lives of the King of Prussia and the Queen of Greece. Oscar Becker, the student, who attempted to assassinate the former, has been condemned to penal servitude for 20 years, and then to be banished the country. The would-be Greek assassin was also a student, aged but 17 years, and supposed to be insane. Becker, on the other hand, avowed a political motive—the furtherance of German unity.

Commentary on Mr. Seward's Fortification Circular.—Mr. Seward's sensation circular to the Governors of the frontier States has not only knocked down securities from two to four per cent. but has called out the following paragraph in the Canadian papers, indicating how it is regarded by the Government of Canada:

"The whole Canadian frontier is to be fortified; and Rear-Admiral Bayfield, who has been engaged in the survey of the lakes and the river St. Lawrence, will, it is said, determine the location of the fortifications."

Rhetorical Secretaries of State are dear luxuries.

Southern Civilization.—The death of General Lyon was celebrated at Montgomery, Alabama, by the firing of cannon, a display of fireworks and a torchlight procession.

The State of Kanawha.—It will be remembered that the Convention of Delegates from 39 counties of Western Virginia, which met in Wheeling, in August last, passed an ordinance separating themselves from Virginia as a new State under the name of Kanawha. This ordinance was submitted to the people for ratification on the 24th of October, and was approved by an overwhelming majority. A Convention is now to assemble to form a Constitution, which will also require to be submitted to the people, and if accepted by them, then referred to Congress for final action. There is no doubt but that the measure will be carried through all its stages successfully, and the new State of Kanawha duly admitted. Historical Virginia has ceased to exist.

Pictorial History of the War of 1861.—No. 10 of this magnificent pictorial work is issued, and No. 11 will be published in a few days. These numbers contain reading matter equal to 3,000 octavo pages, and contain 350 maps and engravings, some of them of mammoth size, illustrating every important battle and incident of the present war. We append one or two notices of the press, which is unanimous in commendation of this work as nearest complete, and in all respects the most magnificent of any now published. See advertisement on the 15th page:

"Testimonials from the highest authorities, and the universal voice of the press, place this history among the most remarkable works of the time, altogether unapproachable in the magnificence of its illustrations, and in accuracy, completeness and brilliancy of historical record."—West Chester (Pa.) Record.

"This is a thorough history of the causes and the progress of the war, from its initiation to the present time, derived from documentary evidence, illustrated by the first artists of the age, and engraved in the highest style of art. It combines historical details, with the incidents, anecdotes and poetry of the war, carefully and judiciously selected, together with the most exquisite, graphic and correct illustrations. The engravings of each part, numbering over 30, consist of large double and single-page cuts, portraits and maps of unequalled beauty, and entirely authentic."—St. Albans (Vt.) Democrat.

A Specimen.—As a specimen of the kind of remarks which the silly officiousness of Mr. H. S. Sanford, our "Minister resident" at Brussels, has called out, we extract the following paragraphs from the Illustrated London Times.

"Wanted, a General! This is not the first time in the history of the world that a nation unused to war has sought for a commander from among a more martial, if less fortunate people. * * What the North wants is enthusiasm; and it degrades itself by calling in foreign aid—not the aid of a foreign army, which would be derogatory enough, but of one foreign man. This does not look like the spirit by which battles are won!"

"High Considerations."—In reply to certain persons professing to be from Maryland, and who appealed to Jeff. Davis to send a force to their State to protect the women and children from "Federal outrage," Jeff. said that his heart bled for them, but that he was prevented complying with their request from "high considerations of political necessity." It is thought that these "high considerations" are about 200,000 in number, and under the command of Gen. McClellan!

The rebels in Richmond have sent back several hundred bales of cotton that had been forwarded to that city. They really can't be afraid of its being taken by "the cowardly Yankees!" But if not, why send it back?

What will the Army Eat?—Taking the regulation ration as the basis of estimate, it has been computed that the army authorized by Congress—500,000 men—will require for one year's support in the way of provisions, 684,000 barrels of pork, 200 pounds each; 1,110,625 barrels of beef, 200 pounds each, 5,239,583 bushels of wheat, computing five bushels of wheat to one barrel of flour; 456,250 bushels of beans. Supposing this army to employ but 75,000 horses, these would require 191,625 tons of hay, and 10,265,225 bushels of oats, or their equivalent in corn or barley.

Foreign Demand for the Loan.—The Evening Post says:

"We learn from good authority that certain foreign capitalists have offered Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, to take a $100,000,000 loan of the United States Government, at 6½ per cent interest. It would seem that the fulminations of the London Times have not succeeded in frightening anybody, for our credit is as good as ever it was abroad, and the money holders of London would be glad to see the Secretary accept their propositions."

What's the Difference?—Among the property belonging to loyal men lately confiscated by the rebels of Virginia, was an estate owned by William C. Rives, Jr., of Boston, consisting of 800 acres of fine land, fully stocked with negroes, live stock and implements; and another estate, owned by Francis Rives, of New York city, containing 800 acres and stocked with slaves; also a large estate of 800 acres, belonging to Mr. Sigourney, of New York city, with its negroes and live stock. Now it is passing strange that while the confiscation of the lands and negroes belonging to loyal citizens, by the rebels, is perfectly regular, the liberation of slaves of the rebels is "unconstitutional and impolitic."

WAR NEWS.

Rebel Vessel destroyed off Charleston.

The steamer Flag, on the blockading service off Charleston, on the 16th inst., ran the ship Thomas Watson ashore, while she was attempting to run the blockade with a cargo of salt, flannel and blankets. The cargo was taken out and the ship burned.

A Battle in Kentucky—Repulse of the Rebels.

A battle was fought in Kentucky on the 21st of October, at Camp Wild Cat, occupied by Gen. Garrard with 1,200 National troops, which was attacked by Zollicoffer, at the head of about 6,000 rebels. Zollicoffer made three different attacks, but was each time repulsed with considerable loss. The National loss was four killed and 26 wounded.

Fight near Pilot Knob, Mo.—Defeat of the Rebels.

The rebel forces in south-eastern Missouri, under Jeff. Thompson and Lowe, were badly defeated on the 21st of October, and Lowe himself was killed. This intelligence is contained in a dispatch received at Pilot Knob from Fredericktown, where the battle took place. The rebel force was estimated at 5,000, and their losses are stated to be heavy, while the National loss was small, and confined principally to the 1st Indiana Cavalry, of whom Major Gavitt and Capt. Hayman were killed in a charge upon a battery, in which four heavy guns were captured. The National troops engaged in this successful affair were detailed from Cairo, Cape Girardeau and Pilot Knob, and were probably about equal in numbers to the enemy. Fredericktown, where the engagement is reported to have taken place, is the capital of Madison county, situated on the right bank of the Little St. Laurence river, about one-third of the distance between Ironton and Cape Girardeau.

Capture of the Brig Granada.

The brig Granada, bound to New York from Nuevitas, Cuba, was captured off Charleston on the 13th of October, by the privateer Sallie, and the captain, second mate and two seamen were put on board the British schooner Greyhound, and were brought to New York. The Granada had 4,000 hogsheads of sugar and other cargo. The Sallie is a schooner of 148 tons, carries one gun amidships, and is manned by 33 men.

Futile Attack on the Blockading Fleet off New Orleans.

We published in our last number a flaming despatch of Captain Hollins relative to a fight which he pretended to have had with some vessels of the blockading fleet, at the head of the passes in the Mississippi river, on the night of October 12th, in which he affirms he sunk the Preble and drove the others ashore, where he "peppered them soundly." By the arrival of the steamer McClellan, which sailed from the mouth of the Mississippi, October 14th, we have the facts of the case. The vessels attacked by Hollins consisted of the steamers Richmond, Huntsville and Water Witch; the sloops-of-war Preble and Vincennes, and the storeship Nightingale. Hollins's fleet consisted of six gunboats, the battering-ram Manassas, and a large number of fireships, which filled the river from shore to shore. These latter craft, it will be recollected, are not mentioned in the rebel reports. The ram Manassas drifted against the Richmond, knocking a hole in her quarter and stern, but doing her no damage of consequence. This is all the sinking there was done. The squadron got under weigh, and drifted down the river to avoid the fireships, and while doing so some of the vessels got aground. These vessels were attacked by the rebels, but without damage in any respect, and were beaten off by the Vincennes, with two guns. No one in the squadron was killed or wounded, and the vessels were subsequently got off safely. Hollins's vaunted "naval victory," therefore, turns out simply to have been a failure of an attempt to destroy the National fleet by means of fireships.

Attack on Wilson's Zouaves—Utter Rout of the Rebels.

By the McClellan we have full accounts of the rebel attack on Wilson's Zouaves, numbering 500 men, encamped on Santa Rosa Island. The attack was made about half-past three on the morning of the 9th Oct., with a force of 1,500 men, conveyed from the Navy Yard in three large steamers. They advanced upon the Zouave camp in three columns, hoping to effect a surprise; but in this they were disappointed, for the picket guard, six hundred yards from the camp, discovered and fired upon them. This alarmed the camp, and doubtless saved the regiment, as the attack was made immediately afterward, with such effect that the Zouaves were forced to fall back, when the camp was set on fire. Reinforcements were now sent out from Fort Pickens, and the tide of battle turned—the rebels being driven with terrible slaughter on toward their boats, and thence to their steamers, during which time they suffered a galling fire from the shore. The Zouaves lost 10 killed, 16 wounded and nine prisoners; the loss of the regulars from the fort was four killed, 20 wounded and 10 prisoners. The rebel loss is estimated as high as 410, killed, wounded and missing. By their own statement it was 350. 35 were taken prisoners, among them three officers.

Rout of the Rebels at Romney.

Gen. Kelly, who distinguished himself in the attack on Philippi in May last, in which he was wounded, achieved another brilliant success over the rebels at Romney, on the 26th of October. He marched from New Creek, in Hampshire county, on the night of the 25th, and attacked the enemy at Romney on the next afternoon, routing them and capturing many prisoners, together with three pieces of cannon and all their wagons and camp equipage. The rebels, in their precipitate retreat, took the road toward Winchester. The National loss was but trifling. Subjoined is Gen. Kelly's dispatch:

"Romney, Va., Saturday, Oct. 26—P. M.

"In obedience to your orders, I moved on this place at 12 o'clock last night, attacked the enemy at 3 o'clock this afternoon and drove in their outposts, and after a brilliant action of two hours completely routed them, taking all their cannon and much of their camp equipage, and many prisoners. Our loss is but trifling, but cannot say to what extent. Brig-Gen. B. F. KELLY, Commanding."

Another Rebel Defeat in Missouri—Recapture of Springfield.

The town of Springfield, Mo., has been occupied by the rebels ever since the battle of Wilson's Creek. On the 25th of October, although garrisoned by 2,000 rebels, it was attacked and captured by Maj. Zagoni, at the head of 450 of Fremont's body guards. Subjoined is Gen. Fremont's dispatch:

"Headquarters, in the Field,
"Near Harmansville, Mo., Saturday, Oct. 26.

"Capt. McKeever, Asst.-Adjt.-Gen.:

"Yesterday afternoon, Major Zagoni, at the head of my guard, made a most brilliant charge upon a body of the enemy, drawn up in line of battle, at their camp at Springfield, 2,000 or 2,200 strong. He completely routed them, cleared them from the town, hoisted the National flag on the Court House, and retired upon a reinforcement, which he has already joined. Our loss is not great.

"This successful charge against such a very large odds is a noble example to the army. Our advance will occupy Springfield to-night.

"J. C. FREMONT,
"Major-General Commanding."

PERSONAL.

Late advices from England represent that Miss Florence Nightingale is so seriously ill as to preclude all hope of her recovery.

The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon has recently been lecturing on the Gorilla. The Saturday Review says that he "enters into the ape character with considerable appreciation of the part."

On the arrival of Victor Emanuel at Florence, the celebrated Piccolomini (now Marchioness della Fargna) sang a cantata composed for the occasion, the King listening with evident pleasure all the time while the words were sung: "Oh! if in thy career, O King! thou wert to take up arms against the stranger who reigns! Go! show thyself and he will fly." The crowd caught up the sentiment, and rent the air with shouts of "To Venice!" "To Venice"!"

It is stated that Madame Grisi intends venturing on the hazardous experiment of again visiting this country. We may admire the persistence with which she clings to the lyric stage, but her prudence may well be questioned. Better live in the soft light of traditional glories than risk a matured reputation.

Miss Julia Farrell, of Chicago, has had a verdict of $10,000 damages rendered in her favor, against an oculist, whom she alleged destroyed the sight of one of her eyes by an unskilful operation.

The Louisville Journal says: "It affords us pleasure to announce that Dr. William W. Strew, of Long Island, New York, assigned as surgeon to Brigadier-General Anderson's staff, has arrived in our city. He has high distinction as a surgeon, and he comes among us at the right time. For his professional merits and his devotion to the cause of the Union, Kentucky bids him a cordial welcome."

Edwin Booth made his first appearance at the Haymarket Theatre, London, on the 30th of September, in the character of Shylock. He was received with hearty applause. The Times says, "he is a judicious actor, and gifted with an excellent voice and expressive countenance."

Lieut. John H. Russell is to be assigned to the command of one of the new gunboats, as an acknowledgment of his success in the destruction of the privateer Judith, in the harbor of Pensacola.

The Legislature of Connecticut has ordered the portraits of Isaac Toucey, late Secretary of the Navy, and Thomas H. Seymour, late Governor of the State, to be removed from the walls of the State House, for their treasonable proclivities.

Mr. Russell, the Special Correspondent of the London Times, was arrested and fined the other day, in Illinois, for shooting grouse on Sunday. As he was leaving the court, a good old Scotchwoman put her hand on his shoulder and said to him, "Had ye been at the kirk yesterday, ye wadna been here to-day: and dinna be writing home ony mair lees aboot the war."

Jessie Fremont is the universal topic of correspondents at the Missouri headquarters. A Western "special" thus sketches the lady-general as he saw her at Camp Lillie: "She strikes one as rather masculine in general appearance, but this first impression is very soon and entirely dissipated in conversation with her. There is not a classical feature about her, and yet her face becomes interesting from the genial benevolent and pleasing expression which it assumes in conversation. When lighted up, it is full of sprightliness, vivacity and intelligence. Her manner is soft, persuasive and insinuating, and her voice uncommonly musical. But her chief outward attraction is her eyes, and she knows how to use them, as most women do. They are brown. Eyes so expressive of every motive are rarely met with. They lend a warmth and fervor to, and adorn and illustrate whatever she says. Indeed the play of her eyes and features, the glass of her ruddy complexion, and the melody of her voice, add the same effect to her conversation that variations do to a piece of music; and all this despite her really being a plain-looking woman when her countenance is in repose. She has great tact and self-possession, is ready, fluent and unembarrassed in speech and, without the least sacrifice of dignity, is perfectly free from any sort of conventionality."

Sam Houston has written a letter to the Richmond Enquirer, declaring his full sympathy with the rebellion. He says that he opposed Secession until Texas voted herself out of the Union, but that since that time he has obeyed the will of his constituents, and has "performed all the acts of a dutiful and loyal citizen of the Southern Confederacy."

Hon. Eli Thayer has received from Secretary Chase the appointment of General Superintendent of the agents of the National Loan for New England. He has already commenced his labors in Connecticut.

Hon. John C. Crittenden, the venerable and distinguished Kentuckian, has taken the field against the rebels. The Louisville Journal says of him: "He reached this city last evening for the purpose of having an interview with General Anderson. He intends to start next week for the mountains, and endeavor to arouse the hardy sons of the hills to take service for the Government, and repel the invaders from our State. The appearance of the venerable statesman in that quarter will occasion the greatest enthusiasm, and produce the most encouraging effects."

BOOK NOTICES.

Carthage and her Remains; being an Account of Excavations and Researches on the Site of the Phœnician Metropolis in Africa, etc.; by Dr. N. Davis. Harper and Brothers, New York, pp. 504.

This book, although by no means possessing the charm of narration of Layard's "Nineveh and its Remains," nor yet having the interest of that work as illustrative of Scriptural history, has scarcely a less value to the historical student. The capitol of a kingdom founded by the Tyrians, a city of wealth and luxury, and high art, which sent out a Hannibal to humble the pride of Imperial Rome on the plain of Cannæ, and among the ruins of which schoolboy oratory is accustomed to place Marius, as a symbol of solitude and hopeless despair—the remains of such a city must possess not only a deep interest, but their investigation must result in important historical illustrations. For centuries the site of Carthage has only been marked by a few scattered and shapeless masses of masonry, and its very name was unknown to the inhabitants residing on it. Time and the spoiler had destroyed all except what the pitying earth had concealed in its bosom. These hidden relics of her greatness and glory, few and frayed and broken as they are, Dr. Davis has restored to light and the admiration of this generation. Through the agency of the mattock and spade, the measuring line, the photographic apparatus and the pencil, he has brought before us vividly the plan and remains of the Temple of Baal, erected by the early settlers from Phœnicia, and the more elaborate remains of the temples and theatres of the era of Roman occupation. Its Coliseum, second only to that of Rome in its proportions and grandeur of architecture, is also second only to that in its present condition of preservation. Like that, it was the scene of cruel persecutions of the Christians in the earlier periods of our era, and of more than one heroic martyrdum. Dr. Davis takes us over the ruins of Utica and Zama, and the sites of the principal Carthaginian towns, and refreshes and enlarges our remembrances of the Punic Wars, in a pleasant yet scholarly manner, altogether producing a book which is a necessary pendant to what we call Ancient History, and without which no library can be complete. Desolation rests on most of the sites of old Carthagenean glory,

"——— Where the sloping hill and verdant plain
Have oft resounded with the sports of May,
Stalks the grand lion now, with proud disdain,
And yelping jackalls seek their scanty prey."

Maps.—We have received from Mr. G. Woolworth Colton a series of pocket maps, of the utmost value to the reading public:

1. County and Railway Map of 500 miles around Washington, showing the seat of war in the east.
2. Complete Map of the United States and Canada.

The latter is the clearest and completest map of its size that we know of, and will enable the inquirer to trace the operations of the respective armies with the greatest ease, besides being invaluable in other respects.

Mr. J. W. Higginson, 77 Chambers street, has published a very interesting map of the District of Columbia and surrounding country, from Aquia Creek to Harper's Ferry.

"Home, Sweet Home!"—E. Anthony, 501 Broadway, has published a striking card-portrait of John Howard Payne, author of the world-known ballad of "Home, Sweet Home." It should be attached to the music and words of that touching melody.

THEATRICAL AND MUSICAL.

Academy of Music.—The performance on Monday evening closed the brief three night, or Ullman season, at the opera. It has been successful, and will prove, we presume, the guarantee of another and more protracted season. One thing is certain, it has confirmed the reputation of Miss Hinkley and Miss Kellogg as first-class singers, as well as their position in popular favor. Miss Hinkley, it is said, in conjunction with Signors Brignoli, Mancusi, Susini, Muzio and Herr Mollenhauer, is to give a series of operatic concerts in Baltimore, Washington, Newark, Hartford, Springfield, Worcester, Pennsylvania and the principal Western cities.

Winter Garden.—The principal attraction of the week has been the "Octoroon" at the Winter Garden. It is a living play, appealing to existing and genuine feelings and sentiments. All that it portrays or suggests we know to be real, and our interest in it is precisely that which we have in the actualities of life. This is the secret of its success, and will be the element of its permanence, for this piece is not destined to an ephemeral existence. The circumstances of its production and success are a part of the history of the times. The part of Salem Scudder is admirably sustained by Mr. Clarke. It is a natural piece of acting, and far more truthful than the conventional stage interpretation of the Yankee by Mr. Jefferson. The petted plantation belle by Miss Fanny Brown was well looked and well acted. Nature has done much to predispose the public in favor of this young lady, and she appears to have talent enough to become one of the pets of the stage. Altogether, the "Octoroon" is well cast, well acted, and will well repay the patrons of the Winter Garden.

Miscellaneous.—Madame Grisi has been engaged by Strakosch to give a series of "farewell concerts" in our principal cities. She is expected here in January.... The new opera house in Buffalo will be opened early in December, for a ten weeks' season of opera.... The "Angel of Midnight," at Barnum's Museum, is spoken of on all hands as by far the best performance ever given in that establishment.... Mr. George Jordan is acting in London in Brougham's "Playing with Fire," and is rather severely criticised by the London press, which has long been waiting for somebody to abuse.... Mr. Edwin Booth is playing his round of characters in London, and seems to be gaining in public favor.... The Director of Police at Rome, M. Matteucci, is determined to have "well-regulated" theatres. According to the regulations for the autumn, "all applause or expressions of dissatisfaction are absolutely forbidden, bouquets are not to be flung on the stage, and the director is held responsible for the conduct of his artists." Why not forbid laughing and crying at once?

VIEW OF THE CAMP OF THE 20TH INDIANA REGIMENT, ALSO OF FORT HATTERAS, AND THE ANCHORAGE AT HATTERAS INLET, N. C., TAKEN FROM THE RAMPARTS OF FORT CLARK.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST AT HATTERAS.

HATTERAS INLET, N. C.

Camp Hawkins.

The commanding position occupied by Hatteras Island naturally lends an interest to it in the public eyes, enhanced by the fact that it was the first genuine success the National arms have had. We give in our present number a sketch of the camp near Fort Hatteras, which was formed when our troops occupied the island. It first received Col. Bendix and his German regiment. On their return to Newport News it was taken possession of by the 9th Zouaves, who vacated it upon the arrival of the 20th Indiana regiment, on the 5th October, the 9th removing to Camp Wool.

Camp Wool.

This camp, now occupied by the New York 9th regiment of Volunteers, is about two miles from Fort Hatteras, and is situated on the Pamlico side of the island, in order to be partially sheltered from the Atlantic gales. Besides, as any sudden attack must come from the Sound, it puts our troops in a better spot to keep a bright look-out. The 9th Zouaves is in an excellent state of discipline, and reflects great credit upon their colonel, Rush Hawkins, who fought his way bravely through the Mexican war. It numbers 1,046 men. Until the unfortunate capture of the Fanny it had not lost a single man, although it had been engaged in numerous skirmishes with the rebels at Newport News.

Chicamacomico.

One of the Indiana troops gives the following sketch of this island on the coast of North Carolina. The island contains some twelve houses, about 60 people; is three miles long, and half a mile wide. It is a wild spot, and notwithstanding the white sand that covers most of its surface, is luxuriant with vegetation and a heavy growth of small timber. The trees are loaded with wild grapes, and the persimmon tree yields its fruits bountifully. Huge box trees, such as decorate the borders of our gardens, thrive in wild beauty. Whortleberry bushes are as thick as grapes. It reminds one of Robinson Crusoe and the Island of Juan de Fernandez, this semi-tropical life in this lone island, the men gathering grapes, fruitful as those brought from Canaan; oysters may be had upon the beach for the trouble of picking them up; and a contraband nigger that followed us from Virginia, will do for the man Friday. To give still more resemblance, we have goats, pigs, chickens and ducks for our Robinson Crusoes to take care of.

THE LATE COL. E. D. BAKER, U. S. SENATOR FOR OREGON, KILLED AT THE BATTLE OF BALL'S HEIGHTS, VA.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.

THE LATE COL. E. O. BAKER, U. S. SENATOR FOR OREGON.

This gallant soldier, who found a hero's death on the 21st October, in the cause of the Republic, was born in England, and came, when he was only four years of age, with his parents and a younger brother, to this country. They settled in Philadelphia, in which city the subject of our present memoir was educated. He was apprenticed to a weaver when very young, and the loom is now standing where he worked for several years with the steady alacrity characteristic of him. The death of his parents leaving him his own master, he, with his brother, emigrated to Illinois. He was then in his 20th year, possessing a good address, great sagacity, a fair education, and correct principles. With that unaccountable infatuation which possesses so many of our young men, he devoted himself to the law, and studied with such assiduity that he soon became a prominent member of the Illinois Bar. This naturally introduced him to politics, and he had so gained upon the popular will that he was sent to the Legislature, of which he remained for eight years an able and influential member. When the Black Hawk war broke out he offered his services, and went through his first campaign with Mr. Lincoln, whose acquaintance he had found some time before in a lawsuit, where he was the victor. After his return from the Black Hawk campaign, he was sent to Congress, and was fulfilling his duties there when the Mexican war commenced. He was elected Colonel of one of the seven regiments sent by Illinois, a distinction missed by President Lincoln. He fought bravely through the war, and was so severely wounded at the Rio Grande, that his life was despaired of. He, however, recovered, and after a brief visit to Washington returned to the seat of war.

When peace was established he undertook to furnish men for the Panama Railroad, which he accomplished, but came back to New York shattered in health. Having regained his strength he went to California, and soon became the first legal practitioner there. His success was remarkable even for that rapid region, and he soon became the leader of the Republican party on the Pacific side. He was a firm friend of Senator Broderick, and his eulogy over his body was full of good feeling eloquently expressed.

In 1859 he went to Oregon and settled in Salem. He was chosen Senator for that State in September, 1860, and took his seat in Washington amid the congratulations of his friends.

When the present rebellion became a settled fact, he threw himself heartily into the cause. His speech at the great Union meeting in Washington Square must be fresh in our readers' minds. He raised a regiment and subsequently a brigade, and was appointed to a Brigadier-General's position, but he preferred to remain Colonel of his favorite California regiment. He was killed at the battle of Leesburg, on the 21st of October. In person Senator Baker was of medium size, and very active. His face was handsome and intelligent. His manners courteous, with a slight dash of the peremptory.

The death of Colonel Baker has called out the following general order from General McClellan:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
"WASHINGTON, October 22, 1861.

"The Major-General Commanding with sincere sorrow announces to the Army of the Potomac the death of Colonel Edward D. Baker, who fell gloriously in battle on the evening of Monday, the 21st of October, 1861, near Leesburg, Virginia.

"The gallant dead has many titles to honor. At the time of his death he was a member of the United States Senate for Oregon, and it is no injustice to any survivor to say that one of the most eloquent voices in that illustrious body has been silenced by his fall. As a patriot, zealous for the honor and interests of his adopted country, he has been distinguished in two wars, and has now sealed with his blood his devotion to the national flag. Cut off in the fulness of his powers as a statesman, and in the course of a brilliant career as a soldier, while the country mourns his loss, his brothers in arms will envy while they lament his fate. He died as a soldier would wish to die, amid the shock of battle, by voice and example animating his men to brave deeds.

"The remains of the deceased will be interred in this city with the honors due to his rank, and the funeral arrangements will be ordered by Brigadier-General Silas Casey.

"As an appropriate mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the usual badge of military mourning will be worn for the period of 30 days by the officers of the brigade lately under his command.

"By command of Major-General McCLELLAN,
S. WILLIAMS, Assistant Adjutant-General."

THE BATTERY COMMANDING THE CHAIN BRIDGE,

Washington.

War is a fearful and wonderful teacher of topography. Places and objects which a few months ago were known only to travellers, or these dwelling on the spot, are now "familiar as household words." Washington and its adjacent localities are to the majority of our readers now as well known to them as to their denizens. Among the most prominent spots is the Chain Bridge, which crosses the Potomac river at the Little Falls, about five miles above Washington City. It is the direct route from the camp at Tenallytown and Georgetown to Lewinsville and Langley, and is consequently a position of much importance. Our readers will perceive that the National Government has erected a powerful battery on the Maryland side, so as to sweep with utter destruction any hostile force. Now that the Federal Capital is safe, we trust Kentucky, Missouri and Tennessee will be rescued from the rebel hordes, whose presence is as unwelcome to the people of those States as it is humiliating to the National cause.

CAMP ZAGONI, MISSOURI

In our gallant soldiers had close to them, the gleeful grandeur of our premier union, in marching from Tipton to Warsaw, while in pursuit of the rebels, here delightfully contrasted with the stormy aspect of the times. The spot where Fremont's army rested after their first day's march from Tipton was eminently suggestive of these reflections. It is on the east prairie of Missouri, about 45 miles from Tipton, and two miles from Wheatland. The grand army of the West here pitched their tents on the afternoon of the 18th of October, and our Artist describes the scene in glowing colors. A brilliant sunset fell over the whole, which looked more like a monster picnic than the advanced corps of an army bent on the destruction of traitorous brothers. The rapidity with which the evening's meal for a marching regiment is prepared has something of the marvellous in it. Appetite quickens practice, and the air is soon filled with the merry scenes of military processes. Then comes the hearty enjoyment of food, which at another time would be revered by, but which now, under the circumstances of danger, is thankfully received. Not the least of a soldier's trials is the general long march and privation under which their fortitude now which plenty is not engendered in the human diaphragm.

We may as well mention that the camp is called after the Colonel of General Fremont's body-guard, whose gallant achievements at Springfield on the 25th October we have recorded in its proper place.

COLONEL JULIUS STAHEL

Is now in command of the First Brigade of the German Division on the Potomac, known as the Division of General Blenker. Julius Stahel—under which name the Colonel is known here—is a descendant of a family of the oldest nobility, and has served as soldier from his boyhood. In the Austrian army, he was, while yet very young, appointed 1st Lieutenant, and served as such till the breaking-out of the Hungarian war, when he at once threw up his commission, and joined his fellow-citizens in the struggle against Austria. He was at first attached to the staff of General Guyon, and afterwards to that of General Georgey. He fought throughout the campaign with undeviating courage, and did not abandon the cause till the surrender of his commander at Vilagos rendered the struggle hopeless. He then retired to Germany, and from thence to England, where he remained several years. He finally came to New York, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits. On the first outbreak of the present rebellion he offered his services to the 1st German Regiment, Colonel, now General, Blenker, to Lieutenant Colonel, and was promoted to the Colonelcy after Colonel Blenker received the commission as Brigadier-General. Colonel Stahel is 36 years of age, of small stature, but has eminently intelligent and large eyes.

COLONEL GEORGE VON AMSBERG,

Whose portrait we publish to-day, was born in the city of Hildesheim, in the Kingdom of Hanover, in the year 1817. After having graduated in the Polytechnical Institute of his native city, he entered the Austrian army. There he was, in 1839, promoted to a Lieutenancy in the Hohenzollern Chevaulegers; in 1841 he became captain of the 8th regiment of Hussars, and in 1848 Major of the same. In 1848, Major Von Amsberg, with his entire regiment, joined the Hungarians in their struggle to liberate themselves from Austrian tyranny. During this war he served some time as Adjutant-General of General Count Dembinsky, and as such was decorated after the battle of Szolnock, where he captured six Austrian guns. After having bravely fought in 21 battles, he was promoted to a colonelcy, and in the summer of 1849 he was made a Brigadier-General. On such he was at the head of 10,000 men against the whole Austrian army on the 2nd August, 1849, at the battle of Debreczin. After the capitulation of Vilagos he was with Colonel Perczel. Amsberg was confined in 16 years imprisonment by the Austrian court-martial, but was pardoned after nine years captivity, on condition that he left Germany. Von Amsberg then emigrated to the United States, where he was for some time engaged as riding-master in Hoboken, New Jersey. At the breaking out of the present rebellion he joined the 5th regiment New York State Militia as Major, and served as such during the three months' the regiment was engaged. He now commands the 45th regiment New York Volunteers, one of the finest German regiments that has yet left New York to fight against the rebels.

LIEUT. A. O HARRELL, OF THE U. S. NAVY.

This brave and loyal sailor was born in Virginia, and entered the Naval Academy at Annapolis, as a citizen of Tennessee, in 1836. His examination dates from May 12th, 1847. Left an orphan at a very early age, he was adopted by a relative, who, having some political influence, recommended him to select the Navy as a profession. Lieut. Harrell was reported some months ago with a very flattering offer from the rebel authorities, but "he remembered his oath and he loved his flag," and will prove true and loyal to the death. In our last paper, page 355, we gave a brief account of the gallant manner in which he beat a rebel schooner on the night of the 11th of October, but as the performers of daring achievements should be their own historians, we give his graphic but modest report:

U. S. STEAMER UNION, }
AQUIA CREEK, Oct. 13, 1861. }

SIR—I have the honor to submit the following report for your information:

Being informed of a large schooner lying in Quantico or Dumfries

ACTING BRIGADIER-GENERAL JULIUS STAHEL, COMMANDING THE 1ST REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS.

GEORGE VON AMSBERG, COLONEL OF 45TH REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS.

Creek, and knowing, also, that a large number of troops were collected at that point, with the view of crossing the Potomac River, as was reported to me, I considered it to be my duty to destroy her. With this object in view, I took two launches and my boat and pushed in for the vessel, as boldly as has ordinarily been my custom. The launches were commanded by Acting Master's Mate Charles Hall, and manned by the boats' crews of Lieutenant Harmer, of the Seneca, and the other by acting master Amos Foster, of the St. Louis. I also took with me the pilot of the vessel, Lewis Frum. Some difficulty was experienced in finding the entrance to the creek, which you will remember is very narrow. But after a search of about an hour, we succeeded in finding it, and, as it was rather shoal, until we discovered the channel, we were close to the shore in charge of a master, who fell at our approach and alarmed the camp. She had a crew and of mile and all the firearms complete in the cabin, which was enlisted together and fired, producing a beautiful confusion, but unfortunately rendering any position in the enemy, who commenced a rapid fire from both banks of their narrow and tortuous creek, which compelled us to abandon the launches, and we were forced their rear.

Our crews returned a rousing fire from the boats and two launches, gave three cheers, and pushed for the river with the light from the burning schooner guiding them on their way. He destruction was complete, and the vessel, which was one of the largest of the rebel privateers, with bills were a man killed, 5 others, of men and with each other in the performance of their duty. Acting Master's Mate Foster applied the match to the cabin of the deceased vessel.

Acting Assistant Surgeon, W. R. Russell, accompanied the expedition, ready, should his services be required.

I hope what I have done will meet your approbation, although I have not had the honor of your orders.

This little affair will show the enemy at least that we are watching him, and ready to meet and destroy his preparations for crossing the river at all times.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

A. D. HARRELL, Lieutenant-Commanding.

To Capt. S. F. Chauncey, commanding Potomac Flotilla.

Dumfries or Quantico Creek, for it is known by both these names, is about 22 miles below Alexandria, being situated between Occoquan River and Aquia Creek.

OUR MAP OF THE POTOMAC.

In our paper of the 26th October, No. 289, we published the most comprehensive map yet issued of the Southern Border and Western States, and so arranged it that the reader can ascertain at a glance the position of any town, river, railroad, or fortification. Washington and the country now occupied by the National forces on the Potomac present a most valuable and accurate view of the river Potomac and its adjacent parts; this combines the interest of a peace map with the utility of a map, since the scene is not distorted as in what are called half-war maps, but the distances are correctly given to scale. We enable the reader to follow in "his mind's eye" the entire campaign. Our map shows the exact position of the rebel batteries which now blockade the Potomac, also that of the rebel steamer Page, now lemoned between the National vessels, and likewise the Potomac Flotilla.

THE REBEL BRIGADIER-GENERAL WM. I. HARDEE.

This famous traitor, whose celebrity is more derived from his book which his neither readers are compelled thus far any real military genius or services, is a Georgian by birth, and owes his education and reputation to the Republic which he now seeks to destroy. He entered West Point in 1834, and was made Second Lieutenant of Dragoons in 1839. In April, 1839, he received the appointment of Assistant Commissioner of Subsistence, and in December was promoted to a full Lieutenancy. In September, 1844, he was made Captain. He was breveted Major for his conduct at Madrid, near Vera Cruz, and subsequently made Lieutenant-Colonel for his services at St. Augustine, August 20, 1847. He was also at the battle of Molino del Rey. In 1855 he was appointed by the War Department to superintend the publication of the "Rifle and Light Infantry Tactics," and which was published at the expense of the Government. In July, 1856, he was made Commander of the Corps of Cadets, and Instructor of Cavalry, Artillery and Infantry Tactics.

At the commencement of the present rebellion he fled from Washington and offered his services to the Confederate leaders. He was made Brigadier-General, and despatched to Missouri to co-operate with Price, Reine and McCulloch. He has performed no deed of any special note in his new command, and was by the last accounts with a small force in the south-eastern part of Missouri.

PROMOTION FROM THE RANKS.—Sometimes private soldiers of the French army in Bomarsund rise, by the chances of war, to be elevated through the following distinguished stations: Two sous, knapsacks, privates; nine, dukes; two, field marshals and one, emperor.

LIEUTENANT A. D. HARRELL, COMMANDING U. S. GUNBOAT UNION, POTOMAC FLOTILLA.

OBITUARY.

CAPTAIN GEORGE COGGESHALL.—Captain Coggeshall, well known to the mercantile and nautical world, died in this city on the 24th of August last. He was the author of several works detailing his adventures as a merchant captain, and also wrote a very salable history of the privateers of 1812 during the last war with England, in which he actively participated.

MADAME ROSE CHERI.—One of the most popular and beloved actresses of Paris, Madame Rose Cheri, died in that capital on the 21st of September. She was born in 1818, and at the time of her death was the wife of M. Montigny, manager of the Gymnase Theatre, of which she was the chief ornament. Its simplicity and delicacy of style she most nearly resembled Mlle Agnes Robertson than any familiar actress of the English stage. Her first appearance in the metropolis was a failure, but she soon overcame the prejudice which existed against her and became the pet of an infatuated audience, on the 5th of April, 1837, at the Gymnase, and came before an impatient audience with the modesty of a child. When the company was done she was complimented before the curtain, and the name of Cheri was substituted for her own from motives of delicacy during the last year with England, in which he actively participated.

JAMES M. CHAUNCEY, father of the popular reader, and one of the pillars of the Reform drama, died recently in London. He came to this country in 1832, and for a long time was manager of the Bowery, then the theatre, but before this event had done a good deal of genteel old playing, beginning the actor's career at the age of 16. RULES ON THE ROAD IN PARIS.—An elegant "horse-breaker," known as Mademoiselle Anaïs, who is the model of shoeing of the Champs Elysées, in a dashing article, which appeared in the Figaro of the 6th inst., before the Correctional Police, charged with knocking over an old woman. For the defence it was stated that the conglomerate fee in Emile, the young man carelessly put in the way of the horse, and moreover, that the defendant had given her money to pay for the medical attendance of the old woman. The Public Prosecutor Anaïs's gallant humor and astonishment, she was sentenced to one of police regulation which prohibits "women and children" from being at all in the Bois. The fair delinquent indignantly protested against this law, and declared that she had not with five carriage accidents for life when going quietly to her shooting, whereas that on the 3rd inst. which led occurred when she bonnet. The case, however, was compelled enough to be her last man.

SHELLEY'S GRAVE.—We hear from Rome that the tomb of Keats is recently was about to be restored. Mr. Severn, the poet's friend, English Consul in that city, has resolved to give them his early attention. He has already had the stone which covers the remains of "Severn alone," with a medallion portrait on the front of it, for the simple beadsman which was placed over Keats's grave in 1821.

THE PRINCE is received that the English Court has sought the hand of a princess of Denmark for the Prince of Wales. The lady selected for it is said to be Alexandra, the daughter of Prince Christian, and of Hedwich-Louise-Jorge-Charlotte. The Princess was born in 1844, and her father is declared to be the Danish throne by Sir Winchester in treaty of 1853.

THE vintage of France will this year be magnificent. It is appearing carried on with great activity in the southern provinces and Burgundy. Everywhere the grapes are fine; their being very few have not ripened. No doubt is entertained that in all parts of the country the wine will be excellent, and of very superior quality; the scourge, therefore, to be some truth in the supposition that cannot prove favorable to the cultivation of the vineyard.

A LATE letter from Bordeaux (France), relates the following singular fact: "The steamer William Gilbert, for Bagota, Mo., is running up the river with a rebel flag flying at the fore, and so they at it all the way up to the city, and the stars and stripes at the stern. In the city, and the custom-house here went disagreed. The flag was hauled down in about half an hour, and the captain went on shore. When he got under weigh he go up to the city she could not paint the parallel until their glorious flag of lines and Stripes was hoisted at the stain so I she will be obliged to haul it a long as she remains in Texas

SUICIDE OF THE JAILOR ON THE GRAVE OF HIS VICTIM.

The Graveyard Secret;

A Narrative of Criminal Administration in Germany.

CHAPTER VIII.—A PEASEY'S REVELATION.

I RECEIVED myself in a large chamber, faintly lighted by a night-lamp. The bed-curtains were drawn, and I could not see the judge's face, but I recognised his voice, weak and altered as it was by the agonies of death.

"You are my successor, I believe, sir?" he inquired.

"I supposed, judge, by the fact that your recovery——"

"My recovery!——" he said, sadly, but did not conclude the phrase he had begun. "Let it be so, sir. I have no inclination to communication to make to you."

I did not be angered, and after a few moments he began.

"Permit me to ask you a question, sir. Did you visit Z—— some six years ago?"

"Yes, judge; and you yourself kindly accompanied me through your establishment, and explained to me your mode of conducting it."

"Six years ago, I believe, you manifested suspicions against the jailer?"

"Not without reason, I fear, judge."

"Did you again manifest them to-day?"

I do not know to what extent——"

"You did do so, I know. But this is not what I wished to inquire. Have you made any direct communication of them to me?"

"What I have seen has tended to increase them, but I have nevertheless formed no opinion."

"Is Martin Kraus convicted of this fact?"

"I know not; but I take it that he will not die without having had time to suppose to the contrary."

"Think likewise, then all is not lost?"

I might have asked an explanation of these words, but I now from his painful efforts that he was preparing to make some communication.

"Sir," he went on in a firm voice, "I have sent for you, to confide to you a secret. I could not die in peace if I knew that a few hours to live), and also to prevent an additional crime. Here are the bindrees, fixed, in the presence of witnesses."

"I was but twenty-five years of age when I became chief magistrate here. Obliged to quit the profession where I had led a life of dissipation, I still could not resolve to abandon it entirely, and in spite of my new duties I spent the largest portion of the year in my former house, leaving the charge of my affairs to my subordinates. I was too fond of pleasure not to dislike work. The result was, that business became entirely neglected, particularly that which especially devolved upon me. But I was a severe, honorable judge; I had highly and intellectually connected at court, and no one dared to make complaints of my neglect. Besides, I took care that my accounts should be exact, and, as you know, ministers do not trouble themselves by going much beyond this.

"A short time after my arrival in Z—— a mechanician established himself here, with his wife's name was Nettchen Zimmermann, your successor's friend, for whom you inquired six years ago. His name was Brunner."

What light this simple name afforded me!

The judge continued:

"The mechanician Brunner was an intelligent, laborious man—a genius, it was said, but an unfortunate genius. He made numberless inventions which are now universally adopted, and which enriched every one but himself.

"At the time I speak of, constructing but become very straitened in his circumstances. He was obliged to borrow of various persons, several times, and he had been seen mysteriously gliding at night into Brunner's house, who had suddenly become prosperous. No one knew how.

"I suspected him of counterfeiting, and believed that he employed men to distribute the false money throughout the country. But not being possessed of proofs sufficient to warrant an arrest, I caused his movements to be watched.

"A short time after this, an unknown person deposited a considerable sum of specie-money at the bank of a neighboring town, and ascertained that a few weeks before the same individual had recently visited Brunner. I concluded that this person was an accomplice of the house, and determined to conduct it myself. My curiosity had been excited, but I suppressed it, and left to Herr Schultz the managing the affair, and that I should attach great importance by it, inasmuch as he possible would not that strictly interested in the discovery and punishment of the delinquents.

"My suspicions were confirmed by the judicial visit to Brunner's abode. I found there various machines for the fabrication of false money. His wife declared that they had been employed in making, and had invented a new process of manufacturing copper and tin ornaments, and that they were to be called for within a few weeks. He also submitted having before made similar purchases for the same object. I attached no importance to these explanations, and immediately arrested him.

"At first, I pursued my investigations with the order of certainty and severity. But they did not tend to any result as regular as I had hoped, and I soon began to neglect the affair, and finally suspended it altogether for a time, that I might have a thought of it in my mind, and could be completely forgetting the prisoner.

"Eight years after this, the jailer, Martin Kraus, entered my office. He was then, as he is now, a stern, taciturn man, but he is an exact and faithful jailer, devoted to his trust to his duties. I remarked that for several days previously, he had been more than usually dark and gloomy. But on the morning to which I refer, he was absolutely cheerful.

"Judge, he said, 'Brunner's wife died last night.'

"I had not heard this news for years, and had entirely forgotten the prisoner. The jailer's words fell like lead on my soul.

"What has become of her husband?' I inquired.

"He died in prison recently.'

"But her income of her husband? I repeated.

"Died with him.'

"Died? Impossible!'

"He has been so these three years.'

"And you never informed me of this?'

"Why should I have done so? It was too late. You could not have called him to account. What could you have charged him?

"I should most certainly have done the latter.

"Yes, that every one might have said that the judge had for five years confined an innocent man without bringing him to trial, and that through bad advice this man died! Judge, judge, you were dear to me to have permitted this. No one in the world must know of your delinquency!'

"'But what have you done with the poor wretch?'

"I disposed of him three years ago.'

"How? you have——'

"He still lives, judge.'

"What have you done with him, then?'

"There are subterraneous passages under the prison, formally equal to the number of cells. In one of these I——'

"Yes.'

"Beneath the convent?

"The passage extended beneath the cemetery.'

"Well?'

"I above knew this, and this was the only place where he could be removed from all eyes. His voice, it is true, may be heard in the cemetery, but the sound is so indistinct that no suspicions can be excited.'

"But these passages are destitute of light?'

"Yes, judge.'

"Judge, your conduct is inhuman!'

"Sir, I have not the right to judge myself. This happened, remember, through no fault of mine. I supposed it of little consequence that a prisoner should be condemned to a degree of light and confinement, which, under the circumstances, he would undergo. What I have spoken owed to prevent his being condemned to a greater severity than that from your negligence. For this reason I confined him beneath ground and reported him so dead. He is still alive, judge, and I am his executioner! I dared not flee. What fruits had my negligence and inattention borne!

"'What was I to do? Allow matters to remain as they stood, and in order to save my reputation to condemn this man to such a horrible doom which since four years in a miserable death? and I had no longer the plea of ignorance to urge in my defence. Yet I was weak enough to leave matters in this state. I was afraid of the courage to cancel my silence, to exchange my position as judge for that of a criminal at the bar of justice, to stand my wife and daughter with misery and shame.

"'Besides, I considered Brunner in his dungeon, and sheltered myself from all reproach by entering his death on the register. I succeeded in doing my conscience by my words. I fulfilled my duties with the utmost fidelity and honesty, and I hoped, by my conduct in the future, to reclaim the errors of the past.

"'I took care that the prisoner should be brought from his cell to my own room. His health, unfortunately, was too feeble to permit of his undergoing a sudden change in position in my office.

"He was treated with my daughter, and loved her. I threw no obstacles in the way of their union, although I thought how great a hero he him had she consented to a marriage. But she cherished no love for the young man, and refused him. Then I scattered fresh gold and ornaments. I have often regretted this.

"Brunner was then my prisoner, and my daughter's fate. This was the son, to whom his mother, on her deathbed, had communicated the secret of his father's existence. I fulfilled my duties with the utmost fidelity and honesty, and I hoped, by my conduct in the future, to reclaim the errors of the past.

"I took care that the prisoner should be brought from his cell to my own room. His health, unfortunately, was too feeble to permit of his undergoing a sudden change in position in my office.

"Brunner was then my prisoner, and my daughter's fate. This was the son, to whom his mother, on her deathbed, had communicated the secret of his father's existence. He was then a student of law, and had been never succeeded in verifying them. He wandered at night through the graveyard, which was close to the prison, in search of his father's fate, but even had he done so, his love for my child would have prevented him from denouncing his father.

"I had, therefore, nothing to fear. Martin Kraus's fidelity was unbounded, and I never thought of his death. Still his dill I reflect on my own, and yet my time his here came, and it is too late to endeavor to repair it. Since my illness, I have constantly seen the spectre of my daughter, of God, besides, I wish to prevent the commission of a crime, and to save my son-in-law, my dear son, Martin Kraus would not have to commit murder—he was not one so much, and he will keep his vow—the moment that he is informed that the prisoner has escaped the prisoner have become a certainty. Brunner will have ceased to exist, and his body will have disappeared, without leaving behind a single trace. Do anything you can to prevent this new danger.'

"I have long hesitated before answering to you this terrible secret. I should not tell it you now, but that I should die and let this poor wretch continue to suffer, for to add to the enormity of my guilt. I received proofs of his innocence a few years ago. Perhaps, with his restoration to liberty, his reason may return. Set him free, then, and in fulfilling this duty, spare my child as far as possible; she is so good, so pure, her faith in me is so unshaken!"

He paused. He could speak coldly of the loss of life and even honor, but when his thoughts turned on parting from his child, and the heritage of shame that he was about to leave her, his voice sank almost broken.

After the strong man had indulged in a burst of bitter tears, he resumed:

"The entrance to the subterranean passages is in the old convent, beneath the staircase, and the one extending under the church is to the right of the entrance. At the end of this is a door leading into Brunner's dungeon. If Martin Kraus refuses to confuct you there voluntarily, oblige him to do so."

He hesitated, then continued:

"Spare, as far as possible, the old jailer. His blind devotion and fidelity to me have caused him to commit this crime. Now, sir, set us your duty and your honor counsel you."

He was silent, and extended his hand. I pressed it gently.

"Farewell," said he, "I cannot live through the night, and we shall never meet again. Have pity on my poor child!"

He turned away his head sleepily afterwards. His words was at last silent, but at what fearful cost! What a heavy responsibility now rested upon me!

I met the judge's daughter in the hall; she was awaiting me, and looked anxiously and inquiringly into my face.

"You received a long time with your father. Was he communicate to you? Will you not tell us?" she asked.

"Do not refer to our conference, lest you should distress me," I replied, evasively; "you will find him more calm, but he needs rest."

"Then, sir, you cannot repeat to me what my father has told you?"

"No, mademoiselle, but not from the reason which you suppose: your fears are unfounded. Some other time I shall explain myself more fully."

Saying which I hastened away.

What was I to do now? I had accepted a painful task indeed, which not judge, but the duties of my judge, but also my duties as man and a magistrate compelled me to execute at once. The judge apprehended a murder. Perhaps, he did not fear that Martin Kraus would commit it immediately, but I was far from feeling as confident of this fact as he was ignorant of it. I was aware even now of the scene that had taken place during the evening, in the old church.

I went at once to the prison. I was alone and unarmed, and I added myself if I was not voluntarily exerting danger; for if the jailer would not scruple to murder the prisoner in order to save the honor of his master, he would not also assassinate me, the more surely to conceal all traces of the terrible secret? But the judge's daughter, and the whole household, would suspect me, and have known which I would have inspired by manifesting fear, induced me to act alone, and I determined to do so. Besides, I had my duty to perform. What did my curiosity, my selfishness, be pardoned?

I went, therefore, direct to the prison, to Martin Kraus's own chamber, where he was sitting at a table by his window, with before the whole chamber with smoke.

I entered without announcing, but he manifested neither fear nor surprise at my visit. He quietly laid aside his pipe and rose, as if awaiting orders.

"Jailer," said I, "light your lantern."

"Shall I not light the dark lantern, sir?"

"Yes."

This done, I said,

"You will now conduct me to the subterranean passage beneath the old convent."

"At your orders, sir."

"To the passage extending beneath the cemetery."

"At your orders."

He opened a large wardrobe in a corner of the chamber, and after taking therefrom two keys, he closed it carefully; then, turning to me, proceed,

"I am at your service, sir."

He spoke in a firm voice, and so calm, and with such an air of indifference, that one would have supposed my order to have been the most natural in the world.

We left the prison. It was about eleven o'clock. The courtyard was deserted, and we met no one. Martin Kraus, no light was visible in my windows, save the feeble rays struggling from the sick man's chamber.

We walked to the principal door of the subterranean passage, beneath the staircase, meeting no one. The jailer opened the door. Within a degree of cold, which proved that he was accustomed to the task, and so descended the steps.

"Shall I have the goodness to precede you, sir?"

"No; since it," I responded, unwilling that he should suspect my fears.

He closed the door, placing the key in his pocket.

CHAPTER X.—A MATTER TO FALSE PRINCIPLES—CONCLUSION.

I FOUND myself in a large empty space, into which several corridors opened from different directions. The jailer entered one of these to the right, which, judging by its course, I supposed to extend beneath the church. This conjecture was evidently the proper reference to by the judge as I followed Martin Kraus. The walls were damp and dew-impregnated, and the vaulted roof scarcely allowed me room to walk upright.

The light given by our lanterns was too faint to permit of my seeing far in advance, but I could tell the end of the passage in a few moments. We walked on, in perfect silence, until we came to an arched door, covered with iron plates, which I supposed to be that of awaiting my orders.

I approached the door and listened, but the beating of my own heart was the only sound I heard.

The jailer remained motionless beside me, with a calm, indifferent air.

"Open this door," I commanded.

He did so immediately.

We were now in a large, vaulted room. The ground was covered with dust, the walls were damp and bare. But it was tenantless. No prisoner was in it, and I saw there any indications that any human being had ever existed here.

I turned without speaking to the jailer.

"What have you done," I inquired sternly, "with the man who was confined here by the judge's orders?"

"No one was ever confined here."

"You lie! Answer me, or I will punish you!"

"A person by that name died in prison twenty years ago."

"Martin Kraus, you have murdered him! Tell me, then, what have you done with the body?"

"The judge must have been delirious to have told you any such thing!"

"Do not attempt longer to deceive me, jailer. I know all, I tell you, and you will be lost if you persist. Confess the secret to me, I should to-morrow have made use of my power to discover it. You are aware of this, and you will be more generous to me than to another. Now, listen to me; for the preservation of the judge's reputation, for the honor of his family, things which would be destroyed by such a scandalous exposure, for you yourself, Martin Kraus, whose fidelity I respect, and whose devotion to your master I have proved to be unmatched will suffice the effair. But on one condition only, that you will place your prisoner in my hands, in order that he may be treated with justice and humanity. If you will do this, no legal investigation shall be made into your crime; but if you refuse, I will certainly avenge your master's and your own fearful guilt to the eyes of the world, and you will both for ever be blessed and dishonored! Now you have heard me, jailer?"

"I speak, sir, and I will do what you require of me."

"Have a care, jailer! If I am forced to cause your arrest, and the investigation which will follow, I shall be in possession of the secret, and should your prisoner die during this detention, I will make you responsible for his death, and you would not be guilty, but an odious and premeditated murder, which would lead you to the scaffold!"

"A prisoner to die, must first have lived, sir," etc.

"Have you then murdered him, wretch?"

"If any one but you, sir, accused me of——"

"Jailer, you are my prisoner, follow me."

"At your orders, sir," he replied, still coldly and calmly. What this man made of Iron, that he should be so inscrutable!

Before leaving, I again examined the place, unwilling to believe that all hope was lost. But my search was fruitless. In one of the angles, behind a small cask, among the wicked tools, I perceived a stone staircase, cut in the wall.

"I have found a way to escape by, Jailer ?" I asked.

"I do not know of it," was the reply.

"Come, I will ascertain," I answered, and I sprang up the stairs.

"What would you do, sir?" exclaimed the jailer anxiously; "stop! stop, I tell you, if you value your life!"

Certain that there was no danger by means of the prisoner, I ascended hastily, and the more so because the jailer, finding that I did not heed his warning, had stopped short.

But suddenly my head struck violently against an object which I had not foreseen, and resounded, I imagined, as if it would have fallen, had not the jailer, who was already by my side, seized me with one hand, while with the other he caught a lamp-post and hung me up dexterity on the ground.

I feared for a moment that I was about to lose consciousness, but the fresh air revived me, and rising with difficulty, I looked about me. I was in the side chapel of the church.

The trapdoor raised by the jailer was the entrance to the vault.

"What has happened ?" I asked, in my confusion.

"What but have you done?"

"You may see for yourself, sir," quietly responded my companion.

And descending a few steps, he held his lamp between me and the staircase. I then extended down into the well for a few feet, when there was a trapdoor, similar to that which was in the subterranean passages. I had struck my head against the iron framework which covered the well, and but for the intervention of Martin Kreuz I should certainly have fallen from the staircase into the water. He had saved me from a fearful death!

"Martin Kreuz," said I, in a voice vibrating with emotion, "you have saved my life—you are wise which renders me eternally your debtor; you will believe me, therefore, when I tell you that at all hazards I will protect the jailer's home and your own, and that happen what may, the secret which you have so carefully guarded shall never be revealed. This shall be as I caress to you! But in the name of Heaven, for my peace of mind, which will be lost for ever, if by my silence I become the accomplice of this crime; for the repose of your own conscience, which must be racked with terrible remorse, I conjure you recover to liberty the innocent man. I will even go free from here—for sir, that the mystery which now environs me will also shall never be discovered. Martin Kreuz, I ask this of you in the name of justice, in the name of the judge, who is consumed by remorse, but whose last moments you can thus render calm. Will have you done with the prisoner, my friend?"

"As I have already told you, sir, the man died twenty years ago. He was dead to me and to you."

He was a man of iron. For a moment I had hurried that he was troubled, but his imperturbable mask was soon resumed. God of Heaven, had I come too late!

"Jailer," said I, on a last resource, "you shall follow me to the judge's presence, and we shall see if fire to face with him, you will still dare to persist in your denial."

"At your orders, sir."

We returned to the old convent, and as we were about ascending to the judge's room, we met several persons leaving it.

"The judge is dead!" they exclaimed, as they passed us.

When Martin Kreuz heard these words, a sigh of relief escaped him, as if a fearful weight had been lifted from his breast. A moment after he disappeared, and I calmly sought for him in the cell and the courtyard.

I was both physically and mentally exhausted. Since morning my curiosity and my sufferings had been so frequently excited, that I felt myself incapable of further exertion.

I left the convent, and as the night air was cool and refreshing, I hoped by walking to calm the agitation of my nerves.

Unconsciously, I wended my way towards the graveyard, the solemn stillness of which is always accordant well with my gloomy meditations.

Midnight struck by the church clock, and on the last sound died upon my ears, I fancied that I heard a dull noise at the extremity of the cemetery. I listened. The noise continued at equal intervals. I directed my steps cautiously to the point from whence it proceeded, for a fearful presentiment had come over me.

As I advanced, the noise became more distinct. Some one was evidently digging a hole in the earth. The work was conducted in darkness, and with such earnestness that my footsteps were not heard. In a few seconds I stood face to face with the unknown workman.

It was Martin Kreuz. He had opened an old tomb to serve as a new sepulchre, and had just thrown in the last shovel of earth which was to close it.

"Martin Kreuz, what are you doing here?" I ejaculated.

He raised his head without the slightest manifestation of alarm. But his eyes were full of bitterest hatred.

"Sir," he replied, "you may cause this grave to be opened to-morrow; it is perfectly, to be found the body of a man which no one will be able to identify; but you will then remember here which can breach the honor of the judge or of his family."

And covering the grave lying by it, he replaced it to his temple. Before I had time to prevent it he had pulled the trigger, and Martin Kreuz fell upon the grave a corpse. He had come prepared for the worst.

I spread a true upon the body of the man who had so recently saved my life, and who had died the victim of a noble sentiment, the exaggeration of which had led him astray.

His cold and faithful hearts are unfortunately so rare, that we may be pardoned for mistaken them even in this form.

* * * * * * *

I concealed the manner of his death; caused the old jailer to be quietly buried, and left his crime to rest in silence and oblivion. Human justice would not now avenge the rights, and all remembrance of the victim have long since been effaced from the minds of men. Charles Brunnarr survived three years after a few months he died in the beginning of winter, bearing with him to the tomb the secret of his sadness and his sufferings. He died, to the end, had continued faithful and devoted to his affection.

Rosa, the judge's daughter, never learned her father's guilt. With considerable difficulty I finally succeeded in removing all her suspicions, and she believed that her father died as he also has never been distressing pecuniary affairs.

Now, in writing this history for you, I had never related it to any one but myself. I felt, as the judge, that he was unable in the office of assessor, wishing that he should become familiar at the very outset of his career with his grandfather's crime, that he might guard against negligence and inattention, which more frequently than injustice ever, are the rocks which wreck the probity of our judges.

THE END.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

CHAPTER XXI.—CONTINUED.

RAYNER amazed at the inconsistency of these legal practitioners, I rattled over the stones in the carriage, which put an end to all hearse, and which was driven by an intoxicated sorrel, who put me in mind of an undertaker.

We halted in an out-of-the-way street, at the door of an out-of-the-way inn, in the bar of which a number of convivial parties, whom I recognized as witnesses in a certain murder case, which had just been disposed of, were blessing themselves with a glass of hot brandy and strong ale, and varying their pleasure by words in dark references and to a person who was getting into a post-chaise upstairs and into a little, orderly sitting room, in which we found Mrs. Martin Tinder and Brownside waiting to receive us. Brownside was elated, though calm; but Martin was weeping bitterly, or joyfully, as it might be.

Eugene turned from her, and walked hastily up and down the room.

"Martha, you must and shall," he muttered, with a suppliant look. "Think, for a moment, of the mad woman and of her last life. Think of our benefactor in his chains. Think of the sorrow of our benefactor's child, and of his last hopes. Lastly, Martha, think of your own wrongs and of mine, and ask yourself if heaven does not call upon you to act with us."

Here Brownside rose and placed his hand soothingly upon Eugene's shoulder.

"Give her time, my man—give her time," said Brownside; "let her sleep upon it. She is overwhelmed by the sudden tears events have taken. When the time comes, rest assured, she will act."

Eugene would not be thus silenced, and again addressed, he lifted one of the woman's hands to his lips and kissed it tenderly.

"Be it so," he said; "and in the meantime let me be of good cheer."

So Eugene rang the bell, and when the waiter answered the summons, ordered a share of that good cheer of which the rustics were partaking. The waiter, in reality, brought a bottle of old cognac and pitiful fare to the effect of sharpening our appetites.

Martha was dull, and Brownside thoughtful, but Eugene and myself were in high spirits, and of equity, which, when in contact with the general dullness, made the cloud of our position more or twice show its silver lining. When the waiter had left us, having thus filling their soup of "A chimy night and the services of the cave," Eugene sipped the brightened and growled a little chorus. The conversation was now clear, and no further allusions were made to the peculiar position in which we all stood towards one another.

At last I ventured a remark relative to the disappearance and supposed death of Mr. Thinks. I expressed my surprise that she herself should be upon visible in the flesh. There upon Brownside and Eugene exchanged significant glances.

"I myself thought that we had lost her," said Eugene. "You must lay the deception upon the shoulders of Brownside there, who suggested it, and who had his own interests to serve in the matter.

I looked inquiringly at the dwarf, and he nodded his head encouragingly and affirmatively.

"Eugene is right" he exclaimed. "It was my suggestion that you should go over to Paris, and I conveyed to Thinks the first hint of her decease. I had recognized in the face of the dead woman, among the many features dressed in the letter, Thinks, in reply, expressed his gratification at my means to meet impending exigency, and was forced to come over to claim the body. This was just what I wanted."

"Your reason ?" I asked anxiously.

Brownside cast an anxious glance at Martha, who had laid her head upon the table in her open hands.

"My reason was, if you must know, a twofold one. In the first place, I designed to free our good friend Martha for a time from the hardships of her household."

It paused, as if fearing interruption. No interruption being made, he went on.

"My second reason, Mr. Henry, was vastly different. It was to put me more advantageously in my own explorations, and as events have acquainted you with many of the circumstances on which your past and future depend, I will explain. My object, then, in persuading our curiosity of Martin's death was to grant them on to further attacks in our direction, and to make them seek with impunity to crush certain of our friends by legal appeals to the law. The plan, as you know, has succeeded admirably."

"But in what manner could the death of Mrs. Thinks affect the prospects of the enemies you mention ?" inquired, eagerly. "Why should they attack us with impunity on her death?"

Brownside was about to reply, when Martha lifted her pale, sorrowful face, and replied for him.

"Because without me the evidence against Leonard Charles could scarcely hold together; because my testimony is necessary to his conviction by law."

"Exactly so," exclaimed Eugene.

"Nevertheless, Brownside is wrong. His plan has not succeeded; for I have already said, and for all, that I cannot give evidence against Leonard Charles."

Eugene was about to burst out into an angry exclamation, when the door of the room opened, and the waiter appeared, ushering in a visitor. We recognized this last worthy at a glance, and more almost with surprise at his efficiency. It was Mr. Kerbs. He entered, smiling and rubbing his hands together, and moved in a sliding manner towards a vacant chair.

"This seems mischief!" muttered Brownside, between his clenched teeth. I saw Eugene clench his hand behind him, and make a movement as if to knock down the intruder.

"Pimbs!" exclaimed Martha, looking at him with mingled surprise and horror.

"Patience, my dear, and let me explain," said Timbs, bowing with a kind of good-natured reverence. "I'm a blunt chap, and I hope your friends will excuse me for my good evening."

No wonder he seemed shrewd at the deadly silent faces that turned upon him.

"You see really too hard upon a fellow," he continued, apologetically—"you are really too hard. If you'll let me come to the point, I'll explain. Casting them dark looks at a chap that's endeavored to do his duty freely like to do the thing that's right. Oh, come now!"

Eugene glanced on his cane, and then his forehead with his pocket-handkerchief. There he was, however, and we all sat, and we all sat, for some minutes. At last he jumped to his feet.

"It's hard, precious hard," he repeated; "but I'll see what's give me a civil word, I'll go."

He was going nervously towards the door, when Eugene leaped up and pulled him back.

"Sit down!" said Eugene, pushing him by main force into a chair. "Now, then! What do you mean?"

"What do I mean?" repeated Timbs, in a bewildered way. "I want my wife."

Eugene, in affected surprise, drew back, whistled, and opened his eyes wide.

"Yes, I like this," he muttered. "You want your wife, do you? You've she, sir, with you?"

Timbs was speechless. He pointed to Martin, he reverend dumb. Eugene seized him by the coat collar, and shook him violently.

"You old villain! mind how you take the names of people in vain. My dear Martha your wife! Bah! Why, you scoundrel, if she'd been twenty thousand times your wife, this day's business would have separated her from you."

"Well, then, I'll speak," said Timbs, struggling. "Leave me decent, say. I'm not going to be treated in this way. It's folly, sheer, what I've come to do for Martha."

Eugene threw the man from him, with a gesture of supreme indifference and contempt.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

"Pshaw! I scorn to harm you; but don't you call this visit a little foolhardy?"

"Stay!" said Broussais, interfering with a bland smile. "Perhaps the man really means what he says, and is desirous of behaving in a proper spirit."

"Now, I call that reasonable," said Timbs.

"Talk to him yourself, then," growled Eugene. "His very face makes me sick as ditch-water, and I don't believe any of his nonsense. He's a humbug and a villain."

Timbs shrank away from the speaker, and looked sneakingly at Martha, who had again concealed her face. She seemed utterly oblivious of his presence.

"Now, look here!" cried the jolly man. "I don't attempt to defend what's past. I don't say that I've always done the handsome by Martha. In fact, I don't say that I'm an angel."

"I dare say you don't," remarked Eugene, with infinite humor.

"Now, you ought to be reasonable, you, all of you," murmured Timbs, in his injured way. "Why don't you, why won't you encourage a fellow to be moral?"

"Once more, my man," observed Broussais, quietly, "what do you want?"

"Martha, here, my wife!"

The woman leapt to her feet with a cry, and stood facing him.

"There, don't agitate yourself, my dear. You know I was always fond of you. Wasn't I now, Martha? Come, then. You can't deny it. Well Martha, being willing to forget what's past, and to take you back to my humble hearth, I've come to fetch you."

"Don't touch me, man, don't touch me!" cried Martha, "or I shall kill you!"

"Here's gratitude!"

"Go as you came, wretch that you are; go quickly, or you will find me dangerous. Sooner than feel your loathsome touch again, I'd have your cowardly blood."

"Here's affection!"

"Why, I'd think no more of killing you where you stand, man, than I should of crushing a wasp or an adder. You want the venom of the adder, and you lack the sting of the wasp. You coward, you! Go back to him who sent you. Tell him I mean to speak, and that no efforts of yours or his can now prevent me."

"Here's duty!"

But here Eugene caught the man by the throat, and pinned him in a corner. In vain did Timbs endeavor to scream for help. He was effectually gagged.

"Silence!" hissed Eugene, between his teeth. "Silence, I say, or I'll be the death of you. Answer my questions. Who sent you on this errand?"

"Myself, as I have told you."

"That won't do. Come, now. Who sent you?"

"Charles."

"I thought so; I was certain it was so. Look here, if you attempt to deceive me, you're a lost card. Tell the truth, and you may get off more easily. Why did he send you?"

"Wanted to squash the evidence. Let me go!"

"Not just yet. So, so! It seems that you have been instructed to get Martha out of the way, to prevent her appearance as a witness against the scamp your master. Am I right?"

"Yes."

Eugene shook the answer out of him, as he might have shaken it out of a sack.

"Very good," said Eugene, releasing him. "Martha has given you your answer, and you can go. We're sorry to have put you to the inconvenience. You needn't call again."

Timbs edged towards the door, quite purple with rage and exertion.

"I call this shameful treatment," he muttered. "Sure as I am a living sinner ——"

"You won't be a living one long, if you don't make yourself scarce; or your complexion will be so much altered, that your sweetheart won't recognize you."

"Bah! You'll repent of it."

"Why don't you go?" said Broussais, still quietly. "You have had your answer."

"Well, I don't go because the answer don't satisfy me. I want my wife; she's as much mine as this hat's mine, and I'll have her. Confess, now, it's rather hard that a man should be deprived of his own in this off-hand way. Now, mark you ——!"

We had nothing further to mark at that moment, for Eugene kicked him out.

"So much for Timbs!" said Eugene, re-entering the room and closing the door.

Martha had again sank forward on the table; but she was sobbing and weeping.

"What shall I do?" she murmured. "What shall I do? Oh, that I were dead!"

"Come, come!" said Broussais, soothingly, touching her gently on the shoulder. "You take this matter too much to heart. Charles deserves not pity—least of all, pity from you."

"I loved him, Broussais, I loved him. He treated me like a dog; but I loved him. It seems a sin to lift a hand against him. Heaven forgive him, as I do."

"Forgiveness is a mocking word, Martha," exclaimed Eugene. "It is out of place on your lips."

Here the door was suddenly opened, and Timbs re-appeared, attended by two constables.

"There she is!" he cried, pointing to his wife. "Seize her! bind her! manacle her! I arrest her for refusing to return to the house of lord and master!"

"Hold your tongue, you villain!" cried Eugene, springing at him fiercely.

But at this moment there walked into the apartment another policeman.

"You are friends of the prisoner called Henry Brown?" he asked, inquiringly.

"We are," said Broussais.

"He is dead! The prisoner, Leonard Charles ——"

"Ah!" cried Martha, leaping forward, eagerly. "What of him?"

"He is dead also. Come this way, all of you."

CHAPTER XXII.—THE HOUR OF RETRIBUTION.

IN less than ten minutes we were convinced that the messenger's assertion was true, and that my father had really departed this life. But on reaching the prison we learned more.

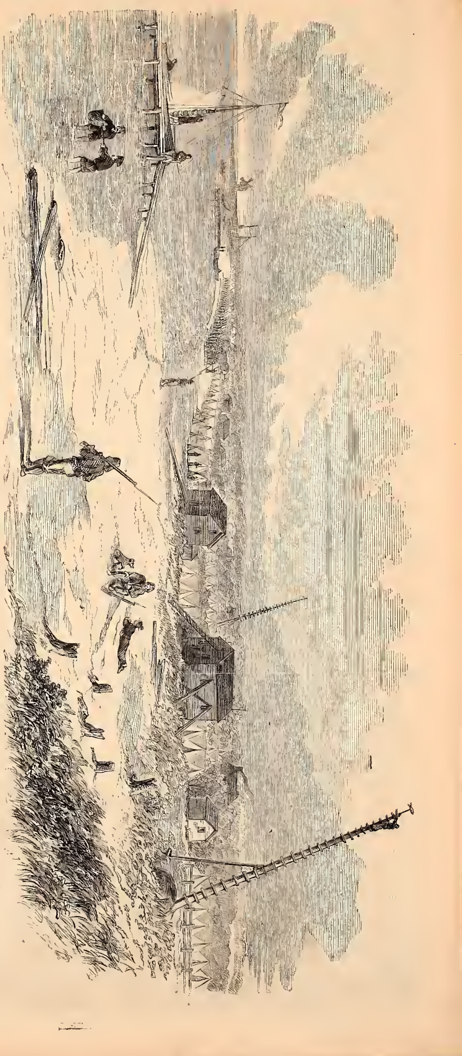
From what we learned afterwards, in various quarters, I am able to tell a strange story of a scene in which I personally was not an actor. This was how it all hapened:

After the trial was over, Ornamel was taken back to his cell. The prison and the court-house communicated with each other by means of an underground passage, which crossed underneath the street, from the court-house to the cells. Along this passage Ornamel was taken, in the custody of his jailor. I heard, afterwards, that he was quite calm and collected, as if his mind were pre-occupied with some strange determination. The jailor bantered him in his usual rough way, and, strange to say, Ornamel seemed to enjoy his jokes. Probably, to judge from what followed, he was desirous of conciliating the jailor's good opinion.

Half an hour afterwards Leonard Charles was arrested by special warrant on a charge of conspiracy with intent to defraud. It appears that Ornamel was aware that Charles would be arrested.

In the iron doors of the various cells in the prison small eyeholes are bored, for the purpose of allowing the turnkeys to observe at any moment what the prisoner is doing. When the jailor closed the door of his cell upon him, Ornamel stood still for an instant in the centre of the floor, as if listening to the retiring steps of the jailor. Fainter and more faint became the sound; at length it died away in the distance, and all was still.

Night was drawing on apace. Ornamel slowly looked around him, but still listened, as if in expectancy of some particular sound. Then he stepped noiselessly over to the little wooden bench which was to be his couch for the night. He lifted up the coarse coverlid and (still listening) he tore it into long strips. These he twisted into two ropes, upon each of which he made a running noose. One of these he folded up in such a manner that it could be easily opened out, and hid it in the breast of his coat; the other he placed in the far corner of his cell. This done, he paused and listened again more intently than before, as if to make sure that all continued quiet. No sound broke the almost solemn stillness, save the occasional opening and shutting of a door.



CAMP WOOL, TWO MILES FROM FORT CLARK, HATTERAS ISLAND, OCCUPIED BY HAWKINS' ZOUAVES, 9TH REGIMENT N. Y. V.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR ARTIST AT HATTERAS INLET.—SEE PAGE 389.

Apparently feeling satisfied that no one approached, he took a small piece of the coverlid which he had not used with the other strips and rolled it into a sort of ball. This he placed in one of his side pockets. Then, with a cautious tread, he crept over to the door of the cell and felt all over the upper part of it, till he came to the eyehole. This seemed to be what he sought, for he instantly placed his eye to it, and peered into the dusk of the passage.

He had not been thus posted at the door long when the footsteps of several persons were heard ascending the stairs from the ground-floor, and coming along the passage. The eye of Ornamel seemed to gleam with a fierce joy.

A strange thing must that one eye have appeared as it glared forth into the long, dark passage. Nearer, nearer came the steps—brighter, brighter grew the eye with its wild fire.

At the door of the cell, just before coming to that of Ornamel, the footsteps stopped, a key was turned, the door opened, and some one was shown into the cell. Ornamel appeared to be disappointed, for he had not been able to descry who was the prisoner. He now withdrew his eye from the hole, and placed his ear to it.

"It ain't quite so comfortable quarters as ye ha' been used to, sir; but I'll do what I can for yer," said the voice of the turnkey. "If ye'd like to order anythink, I may be able to get it for yer."

"Nothing, thank you, nothing," replied the mellow voice of Mr. Charles. "I would like to be alone in the meantime, that is all."

The turnkey was obsequious, for Mr. Charles had the appearance of a gentleman, who might have been falsely accused, and who, at any rate, could afford to pay for a kindness. So the jailor was somewhat disappointed when he heard the calm "Nothing, thank you," of his prisoner.

The door closed on Charles, and the jailor moved away, grumbling at the poor reception with which his proffer of service had been received.

Ornamel, as all again became silent, for a moment lost that extraordinary calmness and catlike quietness which had for some time pervaded his movements. He clutched convulsively with his long, thin hands at the massive lock of his cell door, as if he would wrench it off. The fruitless result of this effort seemed to recall him to his former state. He did not seem at all insane now. Rather like a man much wronged, determined to venture all, win or lose, in a last chance for retribution.

He stood as if pondering, when suddenly he heard the turnkey returning. He raised a sharp, shrill, hysterical cry of "Help, help! Murder!" The turnkey opened the door and looked in, at the same time inquiring, gruffly,

"What's the hullabaloo about now?"

"There, there," cried Ornamel, pointing towards the bed, as he cowered in the far corner of the room. "Take him away! take him away! He'll strangle me."

"Take who away?"

"Him! him there!"

"Who's him, and where?"

"In the bed there. Take him away. He will murder me."

The jailor, who had by this time entered the cell, now turned towards the bed; he missed the coverlid, and stooped down to see if it was lying on the floor. Ornamel sprung from his corner, and with his fist dealt the jailor one heavy blow on the temple, which stretched him senseless on the ground. He then took the rope which he had in his hand and pinioned the arms of the jailor tight behind his back, and with the ball which he had prepared gagged him. There was a pause—a long, breathless pause. Ornamel next lifted from the ground the keys which the jailor had dropped on being struck.

There was another pause. Still all was silent. The prisoner stole softly and slowly towards the door, went out, closing and locking it after him. He stood in the passage, calm, very calm, and listened. No one seemed to be stirring. He turned to the door of Mr. Charles's cell. He tried one of the keys in the lock—it was the wrong one; he tried another—wrong still; and another—and still wrong. He began to fear that he did not possess the proper key. He tried another; gently the bolt slid back. He gave the door a slight push; it moved inwards, and he could scarcely refrain from an exclamation of joy. Slowly, very slowly, he pushed it back, till there was an aperture wide enough to allow him to pass through. Then, bending down upon his hands and knees, he crawled noiselessly in.

Charles was sitting on his bed, his arms folded, and his head bent down on his breast. There was a strange, nervous twitching about the mouth, quite unusual with that calm man. Once or twice he nodded his head, and muttered something about "Come at last; come at last. Well?"

Ornamel fixed his keen gray eyes upon him, and as he gazed the expression which covered his countenance was not that of a madman, but one could scarcely think it was that of a human being, so intensely did it gloat, as it seemed, on the prospect of blood.

Presently Charles raised his head, and in doing so his eyes met those of Ornamel. He gave a little start—not much, but a quite apparent start—and a strange sort of graveyard chuckle resounded through the cell. Mr. Charles stepped as far back as possible, but did not, or could not, remove his eyes from those others. He saw them rise gradually, as it were, from the ground, up, up to a level with his own, then sink again, and flicker a moment. There was a swish, as of something sweeping through the air; a smothered cry; a scuffle, continued for a few minutes; the door of the cell was swung back to the wall, and something was dragged out. It was close to the railings surrounding the gallery. The struggle grew fiercer than ever. Then there was one wild shriek, and a falling of some heavy body on the stone floor beneath, with a crush and splash.

CHAPTER XXIII.—COUSIN ELIZABETH.

They found them where they had fallen, locked in the embrace of death, and hopelessly entangled by means of the rope which my father had made from the coverlid, and which was twisted in a running noose around Charles's neck. They found them bruised, battered and bleeding, mangled and torn, on the solid stone pavement of the prison. They had gone together to render an account of the sins and sorrows which had hurried them to the death in which their yet warm bodies lay sleeping. On the face of Ornamel, disfigured though it was, lay a strange wan smile of triumph. The lips were tightly clenched; the thin white hair was red and soaking; the eyes were wide open and aghast; but the unutterable calm overspreading all, showed that he had died with a sense that death had completed the purpose of his life. Black and distorted were the features of the other dead man, but the blood still seemed blushing over the face and forehead, crushed thither by the sinewy fingers of his opponent. He died as he had lived, with a blush upon his face, as though he feared, and was ashamed to fear, that the dead formed far too respectable a society for a person of his character to intrude upon without an apology. Such was the anomalous idea which suggested itself as I looked upon him.

It is impossible to describe in words, or even to remember with fidelity, the conflict of emotions which took place in my young bosom when I first heard of the catastrophe which had taken place within the walls of the prison. Indignant as I was at my own wrongs and those of my own family, I shuddered at the knowledge that the author of my being had gone to the grave with blood upon his hands. I was overwhelmed at the first prospect of my position. I could not, of course, at first realize in their full intensity the circumstances which gave birth to that strange tragedy; but I was already conscious that better and purer duties awaited me, and that the loss of my father would occasion in my future life a gap, which no more amenable pleasures could ever completely fill up. With him died a portion of that doubt which had been the mystery of my past life; that mystery which had involved the progress of so many strange events. I looked upon the dead form before me, and a strange, sad yearning for the father whom, till now, I had never known, took possession of my soul. I gazed upon the dead face, and thought of a time long ago, when a happy youth led a blushing damsel to the altar, and pledged himself to guide her through this many-sided world. I thought of the one error of his life, and of its consequences, the end of which was here represented by so much mere flesh and bone. I looked upon the face of the dead Charles, and thought of the influence which he had exercised over my fortunes during my short but eventful career. Need I say that the vision of a woman in fair hair, now, like myself, fatherless, passed before my mind's eye? I forgot the angry feelings with which I had regarded her since the night on which she opened the door of her father's house, and bade me go out into the world a penniless and, it might have been, a friendless youth. I judged by my own feelings what must be hers, when she heard of the manner of her father's death; and I at once determined that I should endeavor to do her a kindness by breaking the news to her, myself, as gently and at as early an hour as possible. But above all these serious thoughts was that of my mother. Where was she? How was she? How would she bear the news of her husband's death and of her child's life? Was she falsely detained in a lunatic asylum as Eugene told me? If so, how was she to be liberated? Could she be liberated? A hundred other questions in reference to this matter flashed through my mind, and I became thoroughly bewildered by their very unanswerableness. I became bewildered and perplexed, as well as sad, and knew not whither or from whom to seek relief for my oppressed heart.

We followed the constable who had come to the inn for us, into a room in the prison in which the bodies lay, on a number of forms placed close together for the purpose. My own thoughts and feelings were as I have described them. When I looked at Eugene, his face wore a blank expression, as if something had happened which his mind could not fully grasp. His eyes wandered over the room as if in search of something; at length they fell upon the upturned face of Charles. For a few seconds he gazed upon it; then his own countenance lightened up. He stepped over close to the dead body, and, placing his ear close to the breast, listened if there were any sounds of life. All was coldly still. He felt the pulse—no motion, no quiver of a muscle. His inspection, it seemed to me, had satisfied him, and, nodding his head two or three times, he leant over to me and whispered in my ear, with a voice which seemed to tremble with a mixture of sorrow and joy; and, in a sort of half-humorous way, he muttered,

"It is done! Might has succumbed, though poor Right has had a hard struggle for the victory; and her forces are considerably injured by the conflict. Well, it is a merry victory, and I at least am satisfied with the success. We needed something like this."

As he finished, he nodded grimly in the direction of the body of M. Charles, and smiled. I cannot say whether sneeringly or pleasedly. I did not think this was quite the way in which he should have conducted himself under the circumstances; but knowing what an incomprehensible mixture of different feelings and modes of expressing them existed in Eugene, I said nothing, but stood ignorant of what to say or do.

Martha was seated on a stool close to the body of M. Charles, sobbing, as if she would have wept the little life within her out. Broussais stood apart, quietly looking on.

"You see," said the constable, who, from what had passed in the court, recognized me as the son of the deceased Ornamel, "we just wanted you here to identify the men; and that being done, you will have to leave the prison, as it is very late. But you will have to attend the coroner's inquest to-morrow."

"Oh, yes," said Eugene, "we'll be there, certainly. Is there anything else you would like with us, now we are here?"

"Nothing more," replied the constable, looking at Eugene, as if he wondered what else there possibly could be wanted with us, and also as if he was slightly puzzled with the character of his interpolator.

"Come then," said Eugene, catching Martha by the shoulders, and giving her a shake; "this gent has got all he wanted us for; we have done all we can do; so now let us get back to the inn."

"No, no, do not take me away. I cannot leave him; I cannot leave him," sobbed Martha.

"Oh!"

"Eugene, Eugene, you never loved."

"Bah! I should not have been likely, at any rate, to love the girl who jilted me."

"You will break my heart."

"I thought that had been done years ago. Years ago, when a sweet-mouthed young gentleman poured molten words of love into your foolish ears; and when he had no more to say, or didn't feel inclined to trouble his brains about you, left you—to starve, it might have been. Martha, Martha, you are surely mad, or you never could talk as you are doing. Let us go."

I observed that though Eugene spoke gruffly and satirically, there was a genuine kindness lurking underneath all his apparent roughness, as if he would bully or joke her out of her melancholy. To what he last said she made no reply save by sobs and tears. He then somewhat impatiently said,

"Why, what is it you weep for? For the death of a man whose life was a curse to us all? Do you weep that he was not spared to complete his schemes? You are a loving woman, truly!"

He turned away from her, and stepped towards the door. Broussais, who had scarcely stirred from his first position during all this time, now advanced, and with the gentle grace of a mother removing the cloak from a firstborn's chubby little cheeks, drew Martha's hands away from her face. Then looking at her with a strange expression in his large, melancholy eyes, he asked her why she wept?

"Because he lies there dead."

"But you may love again; but you may forget a man such as he was, and love one worthy of you."

"Never, never!"

"Nay, nay," said Broussais; "you think so now, but you will be wiser. Come, rise and return to the inn with us, and forget all about a man of whom even you do not know the worst."

The kind words and manner of Broussais had the desirable effect of rousing her up, and after a little time we four walked solemnly back to the inn again. On the way there Eugene and I were together, while Martha and Broussais followed us at a little distance. The question of what was to be done about my mother was still uppermost in my mind, and without the slightest hesitation, I asked Eugene what he intended to do in that matter; for what had passed during that day and that night had made me more a man than had the five previous years of my life.

"Eugene," I said, "have you any plans?"

"Plans about what?" he asked, a little tartly, for he was ruffled at the persistent love shown by Martha for the man who had wronged her, and whom he so much despised.

"What is to be done in order to relieve my poor mother?"

"We must wait for a few days, until the men are buried, and until we can get time to have the news broken to her gently. One thing, however, she must never know—how he died, and who died with him. It would kill her, did she know of this night's proceedings."

I did not speak of this subject to him again that night. When we arrived at the inn there was a great bustle going on; evidently some strangers were arriving. We passed into the sitting-room, and were speedily followed by Martha and Broussais. I noticed that the former was calmer than she had been previously, and the latter was somewhat fidgetty and agitated. We did not remain long together, for we were very dull company for each other. No one of us seemed to be able to speak, and so we shortly separated, and retired to the respective sleeping apartments which had been allotted to us.

My room was situated at the top of the house, and at the back of the house. A small blind covered the under part of the window, which looked into some sort of a carpenter's or shipbuilder's yard. A rickety-looking washstand, containing a cracked basin and a jug with the lip broken off, stood close to the window. A solitary-looking chair was placed in an opposite corner, and on the wall above it was an iron clothespeg. Above the mantelpiece was a queer picture of some famous member of the P. R., standing in full battle order. A mockery of a carpet was on the floor, giving the room a dark, frowning appearance, which was materially enhanced by the dirty white curtains of the little four-poster bed. So many strange events had followed each other in such rapid succession during the day, that I had fallen into a dreamy, half-stupified condition of mind, and was unable to realize the full bearing of what had occurred. When I got into my room, and was alone, everything which I had seen, done and heard during the day seemed to make a grand charge at my brain, and an odd battle of ideas ensued. I got into bed, and lay gazing upon the few articles of the furniture in the room, till they assumed all sorts of incomprehensible shapes and figures. The curtains took the form of a man hanging; the clothespeg jutting out from the wall became a long, thin, weird arm of a witch, pointing mockingly at me; the P. R. man on the picture struck at some airy opponent; the broken-mouthed water jug kept nodding and nodding to the cracked water-basin, which seemed to rise and fall and spin round about alternately, while the rickety old stand chuckled and chuckled over the fun. Then they all got jumbled together, and the water-basin stepped up to the long, skinny arm, and hung itself lovingly upon it; the rickety washstand marched over to the broken-down chair, and the curtains rustled and rustled, and consciousness left me.

I was awakened in the morning by a loud hammering noise, and on opening my eyes, was at first unable to understand where I was, and what had brought me there. Gradually the whole of the incidents of the previous day dawned upon me, and I shuddered at the thought of the death of my father and the man who had been his evil genius through life. But I also remembered my determination to be the first bearer of the news to Elizabeth, and getting out of bed immediately proceeded to dress myself. I knew that she was staying at the principal hotel in the town. But had she not heard of the occurrence before? Whether or not, would she receive me? I determined at least to try, and without telling any one where I was going, I started for the hotel. On arriving there, I inquired for the lady whom I sought, and finding that she was within, sent my name up by one of the waiters. I was, however, too impatient to wait in the hall, and so followed immediately after him. When he gave my name to the lady, there was a moment's silence, and then the voice of a man, very guttural, said, as if he was ordering a dinner, or demanding to be shown some phenomenon—

"Show him up," and then, aside, "Parbleu! what does he want?"

I thought I had heard the voice before, but could not remember where; though as I entered the room, a vague feeling of having heard it under circumstances unfavorable to myself filled my breast.

Elizabeth was seated on the sofa, and sitting near her was a little stout man, whose face I had a distinct remembrance of having previously seen. He stared at me as if he would like to stare me out of countenance, which he ultimately succeeded in doing; and when he observed the victory, muttered a complacent "Ah!" and looked towards Elizabeth, as who should say, "Do you see that?" I felt a thorough repugnance for him from that moment.

My cousin did not rise from the sofa to receive me, nor did she even offer to shake hands. I was not surprised. I knew that she despised me, and did not think that she would like me any the better for the intelligence I brought, however good my intention might be. She looked upon me as she would have looked upon a menial whom she had ordered out of her presence, and who had disobeyed her.

"Pray, sir," she said, at length, "may I ask what secures us the honor of your unexpected company?"

"I come," said I, with a slight tremor in my voice, "as the bearer of sad news. I trust that you will believe in the kindness which prompted me to bear the message."

"Ho! bearer of bad news. Ah!" remarked the stout man. "Bad news, eh? Out with it, my good boy!"

Boy! I felt inclined to knock him down. My face was instantly crimson, and instead of outing with it, I stood stammering and stuttering, and quite incapable of speaking, at all events of putting any gloss on the occurrences of which I had come to tell.

"You seem agitated," said Elizabeth, not quite calm herself, for she began to fear that something serious had taken place. "Pray be seated."

"Thank you, it is unnecessary. I have very little to say."

"Then why don't you say it?" impatiently ejaculated the stout man, "and not stand blushing and stuttering there like a booby—as I have no doubt you are," he added, sotto voce.

This was the climax. I know not how I told what had happened. I have a faint remembrance of the pale face of Elizabeth looking bewilderedly on mine, and then suddenly bursting out into a torrent of lamentations, interlarded with upbraidings of me. The stout man jumped to his feet, seized me by the collar, and made me swear that what I had told was true. Then he shook the whole of the proceedings of the previous day out of me, and after hearing what had occurred in the court, turned pale, and ordered me away. I was not sorry to leave, and I think that just as I left the room, Elizabeth fainted and fell into his arms. So she was at least capable of loving her father. Might it not be that she had loved him too well?

I proceeded straight to the inn, my head being all the time filled with thoughts of Elizabeth and her future. What was that future to be? Where was she to find a home? How live? The little stout man puzzled me much, and when I entered the room of the inn where Martha, Broussais and Eugene were seated, I was still in a mystified state of mind. It seemed as if I should never be out of mist and uncertainty.

Martha was looking much calmer than when I had last seen her. Broussais was still the same quiet, retiring, good-natured being, and Eugene seemed to be in one of his merry moods. He inquired where I had been, and I was about to explain, when a boy entered with a telegram for Adolphe Broussais. After dismissing the boy, he opened the envelope, but had scarce read two words when he changed color; crumpling the paper in his hand, he sank into a chair, gasping the word "ruined." Suddenly he started to his feet, seized his hat, waved a hurried farewell, and rushed out of the room, down the stairs, and out into the streets, leaving "ruined" echoing in our ears.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART.

The great comet which attracted so much attention last summer, while it lay stretched across the heavens, is still seen, with a telescope, not far from the star Eta, in the constellation Hercules. It is entirely shorn of that wonderful appendage known as the tail, and nothing remains but a nucleus enveloped in a nebulous shroud, the whole not unlike in appearance the small planetary nebula.

Professor Airy, the British Astronomer Royal, has recently given a lecture about the great solar eclipse of July 18, 1860, in the course of which he stated the probability that there is a medium between the earth and moon, which, like our atmosphere, is capable of reflecting light.

An illustrated catalogue for the Great International Exhibition of 1862 is to be published in England by the proprietors of the Art Journal. The work is to be of like character to that of the Exhibition of 1851, issued by the same publishers.

Professor Loomis has noticed that, simultaneously with the magnificent auroræ boreales observed in the northern hemisphere in August and September, 1859, similar phenomena appeared in the horizon of certain parts of Australia. Struck with the coincidence, he was induced to consult all the registers of observations which he could obtain. He has thus arrived at a totally unexpected result, viz., every time that an aurora has been seen in the horizon of Hobarton an aurora has appeared the same day in the northern hemisphere, or, at least, such extraordinary perturbations were observed as are almost certain indications of the presence of an aurora in position more or less distant. If the number of these coincidences were not as yet too few, we should naturally be led to admit that an extraordinary aurora in the southern hemisphere is always accompanied by one in the northern; in the same way as all the causes which affect the magnetism of one pole of a magnet equally affect that of the other pole.

Dianium is the name given to a new metallic element discovered by M. Von Kobell. In March, 1860, he found a new metallic acid, which he called Dianite. From this, by chemical reactions, he has obtained dianium, the fourth new element, the three others being cæsium, rubidium and thallium.

MISCELLANIES.

Coal oil is an efficient and permanent destroyer of bedbugs. Apply with brush and feather to the places where they congregate. Gilt frames, chandeliers, etc., rubbed lightly over with coal oil, will not be visited with flies.

An Arab Feast.—Here is a dish offered hospitably to the traveller by a tribe of Arabs. A sheep has been bought for the feast. As soon as it was paid for, Suld, the effendi's slave, in a trice turned it over, and kneeling on it, severed its throat to the spine. With the last struggle the knife was run into the abdomen; ripping open which, he withdrew the stomach, liver and lights, and cutting open the former, and cleaning it by simply turning it inside out and shaking it, he then proceeded to cut it and its accompaniments into small pieces in a wooden bowl provided for the purpose from the nearest hut. Then taking the gall bladder as a substitute for lemon, and squeezing it over the whole, and adding a copious supply of the hot red pepper of the country, he served it up, still warm, by placing it on the ground before us, looking like a man well pleased with the feat he had performed. The effendi had already tucked up the sleeves of his right arm over the elbow, prepared to lose not an instant in the enjoyment of what to me at that time seemed an execrable dish, and calling out at the top of his voice "Bismillah!"—in the name of God—plunged his hand into the reeking mess, which he conveyed to his mouth as a child would a ripe peach. Ahoo Gadoum, in obedience to the invitation of the jolly effendi and myself, took my place at the feast, for such in reality it appeared to both of them.—Petherick's Egypt.

Beautifying Properties of Nile Mud.—This thick, greasy-feeling mud is thought to act beneficially upon other substances besides land; it is largely exported, dried in cakes, to all the harems in Turkey, and the mud, resoftened in water, is laid on the skins of the fair ones of Damascus, Constantinople, and the beauties of Circassia and Georgia, to give whiteness and lustre to their complexions. Certainly the water of the Nile has the most charming influence on the skin, especially during its thickest flow. When we ascended the Nile the water was of a deep rich brown, which had cleared before we returned to Cairo into a clear gray. It is the most delicious water in the world for drinking, even when very thick; you have but to let it stand an hour or so in a clay goolleh, and the most refreshing sweet water runs off, as agreeable to the taste as it is beneficial to the health.

SCRAPS.

Mourning Stores and Tombstones. — Dr. Wynter, in his book, "Our Social Bees" describes a "mourning store," and gives a colloquy in one of them, in which he took part:

"I produced my list of articles wanted. Scanning it critically, the proprietor said,

"'Permit me to inquire, sir, if it is a deceased partner?'

"I nodded assent.

"'We take the liberty of asking this distressing question,' he replied, 'as we are extremely anxious to keep up the character of this establishment by matching at once the exact shade of affliction. Our paramattas and crapes in this department give satisfaction to the deepest woe. Permit me to show you a new texture, which we term the Inconsolable.'

"'Is this it?' I inquired, lifting a lugubrious piece of drapery.

"'Oh, no!' he replied. 'The one you have in your hand was manufactured for last year's afflictions, and was termed the 'Stunning-blow Shade;' it makes up well, however, with our bereavement silk—a leading article—and our distraction trimmings.'"

Naturally enough, Dr. Wynter next went to a carver in tombstones, where he was shown a variety of patterns, and had explanations on the proprieties of their use:

"When the father of a family is called away on a sudden," explained the presiding genius loci, "we break the column off short with a rough fracture; if it has been a lingering case, we chisel it down a little dumpy. That, for instance," said he, pointing to a very thick pillar, fractured as sharp and rugged as a piece of granite, "is for an awful and sudden affliction —a case of apoplexy—a wife and seven small children."

John Bull wants us to open him a port,
His stock of cotton now so low has gotten,
To please John, we'll do something of the sort—
Open the port of every ship and fort,
And give him cotton there—our best gun-cotton!

Jones had been out to a champagne party, and returned home at a late hour. He had hardly got into the house when the clock struck four.

"One—one—one—one," hiccupped Jones.

"I say, Mrs. Jones, this clock is out of order, it has struck one four times."

A correspondent of the Boston Journal sends to that paper the following epitaph, which he says he found on a tombstone in Oxford, N. H.:

"To all my friends I bid adieu,
A more sudden death you never knew;
As I was leading the old mare to drink,
She kicked and kild me quicker'n a wink."

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR OF 1861;

DESCRIPTIVE, STATISTICAL AND DOCUMENTARY.

Edited by Hon. E. G. Squier,

Late Minister of the United States to Central America.

This work is published in semi-monthly Numbers, its mammoth size allows of the largest Engravings, and it contains a complete epitome of the War in which the Country is involved, with all the Facts, Scenes, Incidents and Anecdotes connected with it, arranged chronologically, forming a contemporary and permanent History of the Time.

All Official and Important Documents, emanating North or South, appear in full, with complete and authentic Accounts and Illustrations of all the striking Incidents of the War, together with the Portraits of leading Officers and Statesmen, Plans and Views of Fortifications, Maps, etc., etc.

The Pictorial History of the War of 1861 is invaluable to Families, for in its magnificently illustrated pages even children can trace the course of events, while as a Work of Reference for all classes, its value and importance must increase with every year. In its completed form it will be one of the most magnificent Historical Pictorial Works ever issued from any press in the World.

Each Number is exquisitely printed on fine thick paper, in large clear type, and is stitched in a cover with a beautiful Illustrated Title Page.

Nine Numbers have been published, containing upwards of 250 Engravings, and matter equivalent to 2,300 Octavo Pages.

Published every fortnight. Terms, 25 cts. per Number. Two Dollars will secure the first eight Numbers, beautifully bound in limp cloth. The usual discount given to the Trade.

FRANK LESLIE, Publisher,
19 City Hall Square, N. Y.

Voice of the Press.

"It is a magnificent publication; its pages are about eighteen by twenty-four inches in size, printed on excellent paper, and containing splendid illustrations of the principal Scenes and Incidents of the War; Portraits of distinguished Military and Civil Officers, and Sketches of everything of interest connected with the Great Rebellion. It should be in the hands of every one, and the numbers should be preserved for binding; as, when complete, it will form a most beautiful and comprehensive record of this most memorable epoch in American History."—Anthracite Journal, Pa.

"This work is got up on a magnificent scale, large folio size, giving ample scope to the skill of his artists in illustrating Battles, Ships, Fortifications, and almost life-size Portraits of the leading Generals now in command of the grand army of freedom. It is not only one of the best, but the cheapest illustrated work ever published in America."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"One of the best things we have seen to enlighten the people in regard to the War is the Pictorial History published by Frank Leslie."—Nunda, N. Y., News.

"This work furnishes a complete Pictorial, Descriptive, Documentary and Statistical History of the War, in a compact form, not only for present instruction, but for future use and reference. It is to be published once every fortnight. The woodcuts are on the largest scale, and are got up with the usual carefulness and attention to accuracy which distinguish Mr. Leslie's publications. Of the Editorial Department, the fact of its being under Mr. Squier's direction will be a sufficient guarantee for its being all that a work of such importance demands."—New York Herald.

"The Mammoth Pictorial History of the War of 1861, published by Frank Leslie, is a valuable addition to the periodical literature of the day, at once entertaining to the home circle and useful to the historian and soldier."—New York Daily World.

THORP & BUDD'S

Phœnix Heater.

This Heater is an admirable arrangement for Warming Houses, where there is a basement, dining or reception rooms. It is set in the fireplace, and will occupy no more room than a grate. The hot air pipes are carried through the flues, the registers come out in the fireplaces or jambs, making them perfectly safe from fire. They are manufactured to suit square or circle mantels, and are simple in their arrangement, easily managed, consume but a small quantity of fuel, and can be regulated with very little attention, so as to diffuse the heat to the upper rooms of the house, as well as the room in which it is placed.

To Subscribers—Our New Volume.

With this Number terminates Volume XII. of our Paper. Now is therefore the time to subscribe for the New Volume, which will be one of special value and interest in its authentic illustrations of all the leading incidents and events of the War. Our subscribers will not only have presented to them weekly the current history of affairs, but "their very form and proportions," from the pencils of experienced and competent artists, connected with every division of the army on the land, and every expedition of the Navy on the sea. Our readers should lose no time in renewing their subscriptions if they would secure a complete set of this paper, and a complete Pictorial Record of the Times, for such is the popular estimation that it is impossible to supply back numbers.

One Copy will be sent, free, to each person sending us the money for a Club of Four Subscribers.

Terms for Newspaper and Magazine.

One Copy of the Newspaper and One of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Magazine for One Year $4 00

In no way can so much interesting pictorial and reading matter be obtained for the same amount as by a subscription for the Newspaper and Magazine. Besides its illustrations, the latter contains a greater amount of reading than any other magazine in the country, expressly adapted for the family circle. It also contains a splendid Fashion Plate monthly, and a complete record of the fashions, with engravings, showing all the novelties in the articles of female dress.

Notices of the Press.

"We consider Leslie's Monthly Magazine one of the best ladies' magazines published in America. It always contains the most fashionable latest styles of dress, and everything that can be interesting to the ladies."—Saturday Post, Philadelphia.

"Frank Leslie's Monthly is one of the best if not the best, of the serials of our universal literature. It is profusely illustrated, and also contains a large number of readable articles. The 'Gazette of Fashion,' peculiar to itself, is the most complete and reliable of any of the ladies."—Wisconsin Daily Volume.

"The Magazine is very neatly printed and illustrated, and it is of rare excellence. We would advise those who are fond of the fashions to subscribe for it, as it is the best publication of the kind."—Ben Lind, Rochester.

"This magazine is got up with great care and taste, and combines all the requisites that it is desired in a first-class publication."—Bethel Union Courier.

"The pages of this beautiful magazine are crowded with choice literature and meritorious reading matter; it is highly embellished with fashion plates, and other engravings. The publication is conducted with skill in the world; every lover of literature will find it well selected, and especially every lady should subscribe."—Wisconsin Weekly Democrat.

Our Great War Map.

No. 11 of the "Pictorial History of the War of 1861" contains the splendid War Map published in No. 10 of the paper, and which is now out of print. It is finely colored, and is conceded to be the largest, best and most comprehensive map of the seat of war issued from the newspaper press of this country. The "Pictorial History of the War" is for sale by all newsdealers. Inquire for No. 11.

The State of the Nation.

THE criminal blunder of the advance across the Potomac at Balls Bluff certainly unaccomplished. The responsibility for ordering it are as contradictory as various; and although General Stone has made an official report of the affair, he fails to clear up the discrepancies or to fix the responsibility. His report is marked throughout by a painful effort at concealment. It is full of suppressions, and the impression would, like that of General Kelly on Romney, was directed by General Scott, without the knowledge of General McClellan. A few hint at the blundering orders of the Chief of Colonel Baker; but the prevailing impression is that the responsibility of the blunder belongs to General Stone. As we anticipated, all the accounts agree in the unpreparedness of the disaster. Assuming that now, at the end of two weeks, all the returns may have come in, we have an aggregate of 960 killed, wounded and missing, out of the 1,801 who crossed the river. The killed, including those drowned, there are many reasons to fear, will limit, if not reach, that of 200! This is pre-eminently a case for the scrutiny of a Court Martial; the Government owes it to the country to order one, and if General Stone does not demand one he may prepare to accept the responsibility of a military error gigantic and unreasonable, and by the side of which the blunders of Big Bethel and Vienna will look insignificance.

Affairs around the Capitol remain unchanged. The rebels are crowding closer to Washington, and have moved up recently to hold the National troops in check while sending off reinforcements to Kentucky, which offers a more promising field of action. Advocates of the "On to Richmond" cry as long as they can hold the Federal army in check they are substantially successful. They well know that if they can delay its movement up to the 10th of December bad weather and worse roads will render an advance to Richmond impossible. They will then secure all the advantage before the world of having successfully resisted the National power for a whole year, besides giving time for the chipper of secessionists to develop something in their favor. They are increasing the number and efficiency of their batteries on the Potomac, so as to render a sudden transfer of any heavy column from Washington to another base of operations on the James or York rivers impossible, besides cutting off the Capitol from the North and East, by way of the Potomac river, it has hitherto mainly derived its supplies. In one word, the Capitol of the Nation is blockaded; and we are now told that no movement will be made until the results of the great Naval Expedition are ascertained. Why the operations of the Army and Navy, in this case at least, should be made dependent on each other, is by no means clear.

The resignation of General Scott places General McClellan at the head of the armies of the United States; but It is said he will still retain the special direction of the Army of the Potomac. In view of the universal respect and admiration for General Scott, it must yet be conceded that the people hear of his retirement with a certain degree of satisfaction. Whatever his faults may be, he will be followed by greater concentration, consistency, unity and vigor, in the conduct of the war. It remains to be seen if General McClellan shall prove equal to the task of meeting the more fearful responsibilities, which this step of General Scott has devolved upon him. He has to act with a Government which, in its personnel, was not chosen by the people with reference to the terrible exigencies of the Nation, or with regard to the duties which it must meet. The Administration is mainly made up of small politicians, of moderate capacities, and not always of the best antecedents. Mr. Seward, whose genius has enjoyed any special reputation is the Secretary of State, whose dilletanti statesmanship has broken down abjectly before the realities of the position. Commodore Wilkes's blundering about Mocambo, he has subtilized into habits of unnecessary correspondence and indecision, which have destroyed what little remained of the public confidence. With a Secretary of War who is only keen on contracts, and a Secretary of Navy whose administrative talents are hardly equal to the duties of a Country Justice of the Peace—with such unpromising and incompetent colleagues, General McClellan will have to exercise all the genius which has won the earnest of all his energies to insure success in the great work before him. He possesses, to a certain degree, the public confidence, and is highly lauded by the decree of satisfaction on the part of the army under his command. The fact that he is a great organizer, and has the confidence of the prayer of 30,000,000 of people is, that he may prove equal to his trust.

The intelligence from the West continues to be favorable. The only drawback to the hopes which it inspires is the depression of Gen. Sherman, in command in Kentucky, as to the numbers of the rebels. Gen. Thomas, who has latterly made a visit of inquiry and observation in the Western Departments, under the direction of the Secretary of War, Gen. Sherman, it seems, considers Kentucky untenable, except with a National force of 200,000 men. He, however, proposes to fight "to the bitter end," and his resignation has evidently considers all efforts hopeless. All we can say is, that it is useless to entrust a command of importance to an officer who is already disheartened, and who considers himself beaten in advance. If Gen. Sherman has such exaggerated visions of rebel power, and such and misgivings as regards his own, there can be no doubt but some one with a less disordered imagination and more pluck, the better for the Union cause. Such a change will not happen but in any army with either spirit or confidence—both premature elements of success.

In Eastern Kentucky the defeat of the rebel General Zollicoffer has proved to have been much more decisive than was supposed. As will be seen by reference to the account published elsewhere, it was unexpectedly followed up, and converted into a bloody rout.

The victory of the national troops at Fredericktown in Missouri has turned out to have been more complete than was stated in the first report. Two hundred and thirty-eight rebels, including their Colonel, were captured, and the field where they fell. General Fremont, at last accounts, had not only entered Springfield, so gallantly captured by Major Sigengl, but had concentrated his forces there, was rapidly closing on General Price and McCulloch, who have effected a junction at Neosho, in the extreme south-western portion of Missouri. These rebels have chosen their ground to await Fremont's attack. Should he prove victorious, the war in Missouri may be regarded as at an end. Defeated in the interior of the east, he will be effective when he is requisite to clear the State, and transfer the war to Arkansas and Tennessee, where the seat of the rebellion is.

The rebels have achieved one success on the ocean. Messrs. Slidell and Mason have successfully run the blockade of Charleston in the steamer Theodora, and reached Havana, whence it will be easy for them to sail in the English packets for Paris and London, their respective destinations, as representatives of the so-called "Southern Confederacy." For we err in saying they "run the blockade." As the Government from all the evidence available, the blockade is entirely stylistic. It will be remembered that we omitted to designate a fleet off that harbor in the map which we recently published. It is said that the would-be Ministers were visited by the British Consul to full official custom, and most graciously received by the Spanish Captain-General. These facts throw somewhat new light on mark now, but are duly remembered, and will be properly settled for at no very distant day. It may be added, that the Theodora is a well known blockade runner, plying to Havana, had again arrived there commissioned in the same capacity for the other States, but was refused recognition by the Captain-General.

KING CORN!—LONG LIVE THE KING!

HEAVEN has put Europe under bonds to keep the peace towards the United States of North America! It may be a bad thing to be without cotton, but it is worse to be without bread. Purblind statesmen in England and elsewhere have thought it a fine thing to encourage the Rebellion. They have hoped to secure, in the disruption of the Union, two things: one grinding to their jealousy, the second antipathetic to their selfishness. With the success of the rebels would disappear that great power, which, not content with ruling the New Continent, might, in the vigor of its adolescence, dictate laws to the Old. With that success also, they could hope to secure not only an indefinite supply of cotton, but such favorable commercial relations" as should give them a market for their manufactures, which, under the Union, would be supplied from Northern looms and workshops. Hence they have wilfully closed their eyes to the great principles involved in the present struggle, and, in utter stultification of all their previous professions of philanthropy, have given their sympathies and influence to lay up a Confederation, of which the cornerstones would be Slavery and Repudiation.

It was to this end that Lord Lyons wrote his impertinent dispatch, insulting on immunity for men who abused their character as Envoys to cover the part of rebel spies and emissaries. It is to the same end that he is now constant cavilings about the efficiency of our blockade, with suggestions of amendment and other expedients for the purpose of breaking it. But, as we have said, Providence has interposed an effectual bar to all of these selfish schemes and stubborn purposes. It has smitten with blight the harvests of all Europe, while He has heaped up our granaries to overflowing. The want of cotton paralyzes the manufactories of Manchester, and the consequence is we have thus early learned to practice how palsied the looms of Lyons left the duty of "Bread! bread! give us bread!" already rises ominously from all the great centres of population, and within hearing of the Tuileries itself. "Last night," says a recent letter from Paris, "there were threatening meetings near the bakers' shops, uttering cries of bread! bread! which even the patrolling of large bodies of troops could not prevent." "The deficiency of grain in Europe," says the London Times, "is greater than has been supposed; and it is estimated that she will be compelled to spend £200,000,000 this year to make up the deficiency." And as regards England herself, the prospect is scarcely more promising. The potato crop in Ireland is nearly as bad as that of the dread year of the Famine. The wheat crop of England is far short of that of ordinary years. The Corn Exchange at Mark Lane tells us that the large British consumption of grain for the coming winter. The Mark Lane Express estimates that the Western nations of Europe will require to purchase Five Hundred Millions of Dollars' worth of cereals to supply existing deficiencies, and adds that large amounts must apply to the United States for supplying this enormous demand!

Cotton may be great, but Corn is the lord of the hour! An embargo on the latter article, which we are told, and which, if English and Spanish and French insolence and interference provoke it, we will lay, would plunge Europe into social and political revolution. Such a power has wisely ordered that in this, the hour of our peril, when Free Institutions are on their trial, when those who should sympathise with us seek only our humiliation, we have at our command the wealth of the Continent, and can "hold the bit in the mouth of the scorner;" and, more than at any other period in our history, hold in our hands the destinies of those who hate us! Thank God that by the time when this heaven-enforced dependence on us for the very food to support existence shall have passed away, and when an abundant harvest shall again reward the labors of the European husbandman—by that time we shall have crushed out Treason, and Rebellion, and Ingratitude, and be possessed of an army of veterans in war, and a navy large enough and strong enough to revenge the insults of our enemies, and compel the respect of the world!

The Baltimore and Ohio Railway.

THE great basis of operations for the National forces is a line formed by the Potomac and Ohio rivers, connected as they are by the Baltimore and Ohio Railway. Of the base ways of navigation and transport open, it is in our power, in the course of two or three days, to throw an immense force from Maryland into Kentucky and the valley of the Mississippi, or vice versa, and overwhelm the enemy in either direction, by the concentration of superior masses of troops. This is an advantage which is poorly compensated for, on the side of the rebels, by the long and circuitous Virginia and Tennessee Railway, which, from its distance, is by no means equal to the heavy work of transporting an army division with rapidity and certainty.

Yet, with all the obvious advantages of such a grand base of operations, we have permitted it to be broken at two points, by the destruction by rebel batteries, and Baltimore and Ohio Railway by irregular hands of rebels, half the way from Harper's Ferry to Cumberland. But we have been in time to prevent the use of railway by which Jefferson is overborne by rebel troops, and over which Johnson and Beauregard are now pouring reinforcements into Kentucky.

In it because Simon Cameron is interested in the railways of Central Pennsylvania that all the Government work in the upper section of Maryland and the West, whether in the way of troops or supplies, has to be carried through the roundabout route by way of Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Columbus, in Ohio? However this may be, and the suspicion is by no means an improbable one, it is the bounden duty of the Government to open the Baltimore and Ohio Railway. Disregarding all commercial and general interests, this is required by the highest military considerations. There is no part of the United States between Harper's Ferry and Cumberland, which requires protection, and here the rebels have not, nor can they possibly sustain, any heavy force. It is bad enough that Washington should be blockaded on the East, without being cut off from the West by an interruption of the principal and easiest line of communication with that important region. The Capitol now holds its connections with the loyal States by the tenure of a single line of railway, liable at any moment to be interrupted by accident or the torch of the bridge-burner.

Since the above was written, the following letter from our efficient Secretary of the Treasury has been published in the Cincinnati papers:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 18, 1861.

"Sir—I received to-day the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce, relating to the opening and protection of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, forwarded by you. It gratifies me to be able to say that I had anticipated their wishes by urging upon the President and the Administration the duty so clearly set forth by them. It is not easy to exaggerate the importance of the Baltimore and Ohio road to the interests of the great central valley, or its military value. Permit me to assure the Chamber, and the merchants and producers represented by them, of my zealous endeavors to promote the objects they so properly recommend to the consideration of the Government.

"Yours, very truly,
"S. P. CHASE.

Resignation of Gen. Scott.

LIEUT.-GEN. WINFIELD SCOTT has retired from his command of the American army, which has devolved on Maj.-Gen. McClellan. Subjoined are Gen. Scott's letter to the Secretary of War conveying his determination, the acceptance thereof by the President, and Gen. McClellan's General Order announcing the event to the army:

Letter of Gen. Scott.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
WASHINGTON, Oct. 31.

THE HON. S. CAMERON, Secretary of War:

Sir—For more than three years I have been unable, from a hurt, to mount a horse, or to walk more than a few paces at a time, and that with much pain. Other and new infirmities, dropsy and vertigo, admonish me that repose of mind and body, with the appliances of surgery and medicine, are necessary to add a little more to a life already protracted much beyond the usual span of man. It is under such circumstances, made doubly painful by the unnatural and unjust rebellion now raging in the Southern States of our so lately prosperous and happy Union, that I am compelled to request that my name be placed on the list of army officers retired from active service. As this request is founded on an absolute right, granted by a recent act of Congress, I am entirely at liberty to say that it is with deep regret that I withdraw myself in these momentous times from the orders of a President who has treated me with much distinguished kindness and courtesy; whom I know, upon much personal intercourse, to be patriotic, without sectional partialities or prejudices; to be highly conscientious in the performance of every duty, and of unrivalled activity and perseverance. And to you, Mr. Secretary, whom I now officially address for the last time, I beg to acknowledge my many obligations for the uniformly high considerations I have received at your hands, and I have the honor to remain, sir, with high respect,

Your obedient servant,
WINFIELD SCOTT.

Order by the President.

On the 1st day of November, A.D. 1861, upon his own application to the President of the United States, Brevet Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott is ordered to be placed, and hereby is placed upon the list of retired officers of the army of the United States, without reduction in his current pay, subsistence or allowance.

The American people will hear with sadness and deep emotion that General Scott has withdrawn from the active control of the army; while the President and unanimous Cabinet express their own and the nation's sympathy in his personal affliction, and their profound sense of important public services rendered by him to his country during his long and brilliant career, among which will be gratefully distinguished his faithful devotion to the Constitution, the Union, and the flag when assailed by parricidal rebellion.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Gen. McClellan to the Army.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
WASHINGTON, Nov. 1, 1861.

In accordance with General Order, No. 94, from the War Department, I hereby assume command of the armies of the United States.

In the midst of the difficulties which encompass and divide the nation, hesitation and self-distrust may well accompany the assumption of so vast a responsibility, but, confiding as I do in the loyalty, discipline and courage of our troops, and believing as I do that Providence will favor ours as the just cause, I cannot doubt that success will crown our efforts and sacrifices. The army will unite with me in the feeling of regret that the weight of many years and the effect of increasing infirmities, contracted and intensified in his country's service, should just now remove from our head the great soldier of our nation, the hero who in his youth raised high the reputation of his country in the fields of Canada, which he sanctified with his blood; who in more mature years proved to the world that American skill and valor could repeat, if not eclipse, the exploits of Cortez in the land of the Montezumas; whose whole life has been devoted to the service of his country, whose whole efforts have been directed to uphold our honor at the smallest sacrifice of life; a warrior who scorned the selfish glories of the battle field when his great qualities as a statesman could be employed more profitably for his country; a citizen who in his declining years has given to the world the most shining instance of loyalty in disregarding all ties of birth, and clinging still to the cause of truth and honor. Such has been the career and character of Winfield Scott, whom it has long been the delight of the nation to honor, both as a man and as a soldier. While we regret his loss, there is one thing we cannot regret—the bright example he has left for our emulation. Let us all hope and pray that his declining years may be passed in peace and happiness, and that they may be cheered by the success of the country and the cause he has fought for and loved so well. Beyond all that, let us do nothing that can cause him to blush for us. Let no defeat of the army he has so long commanded embitter his last years; but let our victories illuminate the close of a life so grand.

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN.

The current monthly pay, subsistence and allowance of Lieutenant-General Scott, while he is on the retired list, will be as follows:

Pay, per month	$270
Rations, per month	360
Allowance for servants, per month	90
Allowance for horses, per month	50
Total monthly pay	$770

—which makes an annual income of $9,240.

Our Illustrations.

THE publisher of this paper has spared neither pains nor expense to insure not only general but detailed accuracy in its illustrations. Apart from the large number of volunteer draughtsmen, and others in the army, whose contributions are paid for if accepted, he has special artists attached to every important military column, as well as on board the great fleet which recently sailed from Fortress Monroe. The public may be assured of the faithfulness and accuracy of the illustrations of the War. They are intended to form, as they certainly will do, an important part of the history of the times. There is not a volunteer in the service, officer or private, who fails to testify to the photographic truthfulness of the pictures published in this paper, as well of places and actions as of individuals. On this point, and to avoid any imputation of arrogance in this respect, we have only to quote the subjoined paragraphs from the Pana (Illinois) Public of October 24th:

"Many persons have inquired of us, 'Do you think the illustrations in Leslie's are correct representations—or are they mere fancy sketches?' We take pleasure in stating, upon what we regard positive knowledge, that the view of the battle at Lexington, Missouri, in the number of October 12th, is as correct as can be had on paper. The Pana boys—Charles P. Woodruff, Baptist Patton and others—who were in the engagement and have returned home, so pronounce it.

"Mr. Leslie's facilities for having views taken on the spot enable him to present to the public, at the earliest possible moment, facsimiles of the places, persons and battles he represents in his paper. Those who suppose the Illustrated Newspaper to be a mere pictorial should at once be undeceived. No paper in the country contains so complete an epitome of the news—so condensed as to give everything of importance stripped of its dross. It is edited by the Hon. E. G. Squier, a gentleman of intelligence, refinement and talent.

"Leslie's Pictorial History of the War is the ne plus ultra of publications, also ably edited by Mr. Squier, and should be in the hands of every person who desires a perfect and complete history of the present struggle, illustrated by magnificent engravings. It contains nothing but pure gold—all the superfluous and useless matter being sifted out."

THE PIRATES OF THE SAVANNAH.—The trial, in this city, of the captain and crew of the little privateer Savannah for piracy was concluded on the 31st of October, the result being that the jury, after a consultation of 24 hours, could not agree upon a verdict; four members out of the 12 being in favor of an acquittal, the remainder considering the prisoners guilty on some of the counts only. The facts of the case, it will be remembered, were these. The Savannah, a little vessel of some 50 or 60 tons, was fitted out at Charleston as a privateer, under a commission from the rebel Government. She got to sea on the 3d of June last, and on the next day captured the brig Joseph, laden with sugar, from Cardenas for Philadelphia. The Savannah was herself taken the same day by the United States brig Perry, and her officers and a crew of 12 men were sent to this port for trial. The fact of the offence was undeniable, the vessel, as it were, being "caught in the act;" but the question with the jury was, whether the act was or was not piracy. A new trial will undoubtedly be had, with a change in the venire.

The prize crew from the Jeff Davis, captured on board the Enchantress, were last week tried in Philadelphia and convicted of piracy.

GEN. SCOTT.—Gen. Scott has retired from his high rank, and, with his son-in-law, Col. Scott (who has already retired from active service on account of ill health), will soon sail for Europe to join his wife in Paris. Gen. Scott will carry with him into honourable retirement the love, esteem and gratitude of his countrymen. His retirement will also, it is believed, give greater consistency and vigor to military affairs in Washington, where, as Lieutenant-General, he had the power of interference, without the physical ability of execution. One of the causes of the step contemplated by Gen. Scott may be inferred from the following paragraph, from the Washington correspondence of the Herald:

"It is possible that after all Gen. McClellan may be compelled to winter his army in their present cantonments. Such a course, if adopted, will be owing to the influence of Gen. Scott's views, supported by Mr. Seward. The recent reports concerning the condition of Gen. Scott's health are quite true. The scarred and war-worn veteran has doubtless fought his last battle and rendered his last service to his country. The infirmities of age are upon him, and both his mind and body have yielded to time, the stern conqueror even of kings and heroes. But being still the Commander-in-Chief, the deference due to his views has hampered and fettered the action of Gen. McClellan, and has so deranged and delayed his plans that, after all his preparations, the latter may be compelled through sheer necessity to put his army into winter quarters on the ground they now occupy. Two or three facts in this connection are now so notorious, not only here, but also at Richmond, that it is idle to refrain from stating them. One is that General Stone got the orders for his recent movement toward Leesburg direct from Gen. Scott, without Gen. McClellan's knowledge. Another is that no less than 20,000 of McClellan's best troops have been withdrawn from Washington within the last three weeks—namely, 8,000 for the naval expedition, and 12,000 for service in Kentucky. Any person can see that such interference as this with the plans of Gen. McClellan must render them inoperative."

THE PRINCES IN OUR ARMY.—The following letter has been written by the Duc d'Aumale to one of his friends in France, announcing to him the resolution adopted by his nephews:

"TWICKENHAM, Oct. 7, 1861.

"MY DEAR FRIEND—My two nephews are aides-de-camp of Gen. McClellan, the Commander-in-Chief of the Federal army. I have this moment received the news. I am moved and delighted therewith. These young people are acting like persons of their age, their race and their country. The smell of powder attracts and draws them to the right side. They are fine young fellows. May God guide and guard them.

"HENRI D'ORLEANS."

POINTED.—Gen. Lane, of Kansas, is a man who keeps his word, as well as a man of force. That the rebels believe he will faithfully carry out his promises is evident from a circumstance which we find related as follows in a Western newspaper:

"At Tipton, Missouri, after using the contents of two rebel stores to relieve some Union families whom the rebels had robbed, Gen. Jim called the citizens of Pleasant Hill together, beneath the glorious Union flag, and entertained them with a live American speech. Pointing to the ensign he had raised, he said to them 'That flag has been your protection, and shall be still. So long as it remains here you are safe; but if it is cut down, by the Eternal, I will return and burn your town.' He then retired with all his men. The affair occurred two weeks ago, and, although the denizens of Pleasant Hill are said to be about all rebels, that flag is still waving over the town."

REBEL RHETORIC.—Since the war began we have had on our side some extraordinary specimens of composition and rhetoric, in the way of official letters, reports and proclamations. But even our own Billy Wilson is not a match for the rebels in style and language, although he has proved himself their equal in the field. Mr. Seward has done one or two pretty things in this line; but neither can hope to rival Gen. Jeff. Thompson, of Missouri, who made a very rapid if not very reputable retreat, the other day, in front of Cols. Carlin and Plummer. Just previously to enacting that somewhat characteristic movement, he issued this eminently characteristic Proclamation:

"HEADQUARTERS FIRST MILITARY DISTRICT, M. S. G.
"Camp St. Francois county, Oct. 14, 1861.

"Patriots of Washington, Jefferson, Ste. Genevieve, St. Francois and Iron counties—I have thrown myself into your midst to offer you an opportunity to cast off the yoke you have unwillingly worn so long. Come to me and I will assist you, and drive the invaders from your soil or die with you among your native hills. Soldiers from Iowa, Nebraska and Illinois, go home! We want you not here, and we thirst not for your blood. We have not invaded your States, we have not polluted your hearthstones, therefore leave us; and after we have wiped out the Hessians and Tories we will be your friendly neighbors if we cannot be your brothers.

M. JEFF. THOMPSON,
"Brigadier-General Commanding."

THE OTHER SIDE.—The stringent orders of the Secretary of War to Gen. Sherman, not to interfere with Southern slaves, do not appear to be conceived in the same spirit with Southern action as regards negroes. Witness the following auction notice published in the Richmond (Va.) Dispatch of October 11th:

"SERGEANT'S SALE.—In pursuance of an order of the Hustings Court, of the city of Richmond, made on the 16th of August, 1861, I will sell to the highest bidder, for cash, in front of the City Hall, on Monday, the 14th day of October, 1861 (that being court day), a very likely freeman named Washington Brown, ordered by said court to be sold into absolute slavery for remaining in the Commonwealth contrary to law.

"THOMAS U. DUDLEY, Sergeant of Richmond."

THE LAST OF HIM!—John C. Breckinridge has published a manifesto to the people of Kentucky. It is dated at Bowling Green, and he says it is written at the first moment since his expulsion from home that he could place his feet on the soil of Kentucky. In it he resigns his seat as a member of the Senate of the United States, saying, "I exchange, with proud satisfaction, a term of six years in the United States Senate for the musket of a soldier." The address is very long, and affirms, among other things, that "there is no longer a Senate of the United States within the meaning and spirit of the Constitution;" "the United States no longer exists—the Union is dissolved."

SOCIAL BROKERAGE.—The following advertisement, which appears in the London Morning Post, is perfectly in consonance with the social system which it illustrates. Everything is purchaseable in England, from a commission in the army to a position in the "best society."

"The widow of an English nobleman would be willing to introduce into the best society a young lady of fortune, who from her own station would be unable to move in the higher circles unless under the chaperonage of one in high position."

GEN. BAKER.—Thurlow Weed, of the Evening Journal, writing from Washington, October 26th, says:

"I was with the President last evening when the brother, son and nephew of the late Gen. Baker, who were with him, called to show his orders. These orders were on his person, and were crimsoned and consecrated by his blood. Though the blood partially effaces the order, enough is legible to vindicate his memory. It is sufficient to say that the orders were clear and explicit, and that they were gallantly, generously and literally obeyed. Gen. Baker, with inadequate means of transportation, went to the rescue of 000 Spartans, who were engaged with an enemy 4,000 strong."

GARIBALDI.—The following letter from Garibaldi has been published by the gentleman to whom it was addressed:

"CAPRERA, September 10.

"MY DEAR SIR—I saw Mr. Sanford, and regret to be obliged to announce to you that I shall not be able to go to the United States at present. I do not doubt of the triumph of the cause of the Union, and that shortly. But if the war should unfortunately continue in your beautiful country, I shall overcome all obstacles which detain me, and hasten to the defence of a people who are dear to me.

"G. GARIBALDI.

THE STRENGTH OF THE SOUTH.—We last week published a statement of the strength of the Northern army, viz: 512,000 men. According to the Herald's estimates, the rebels have 496,000 men in the field divided as follows:

Department of the Potomac	150,000
Department of Chesapeake and rest of Virginia	90,000
Department of Kentucky and Tennessee	117,000
Department of Missouri	60,000
On the line of the Mississippi	39,000
At Charleston, Savannah, Mobile and Galveston	40,000

According to the same authority the small arms in possession of the rebels amount to 898,000, which were obtained as follows:

Sent to the South by Floyd while Secretary of War	578,000
Seized in Southern Arsenals	100,000
Made in stolen Arsenals	20,000
Shipped from Europe	200,000

STRIKING A BALANCE.—A careful computation of the results of the various battles and skirmishes which have taken place since the attack on Fort Sumter, gives the following aggregate of losses on both sides, in "killed, wounded and missing:"

	National.	Rebels.
Killed	1,327	2,174
Wounded	2,062	6,780
Prisoners	4,601	2,899
Total loss	8,080	12,?59
Victories	47	32

From this table it will appear that notwithstanding our disastrous defeat at Bull Run, after actually winning the field, the odds are against the rebels, except in the matter of prisoners. The affair at Lexington, Missouri, however, and the treachery of several army officers in Texas, who surrendered their commands without firing a gun, will account for this excess of prisoners.

LESLIE'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR OF 1861.—No. 11 of this magnificent historical work is just issued. It contains, among other illustrations, a splendid colored war map, 22 by 30 inches, showing the positions of the national and rebel armies, the localities of all the battles and skirmishes that have taken place, etc., etc. The Manitowoc (Wis.) Daily Tribune says of this work: "It is the best history of the times extant, and being illustrated in Leslie's best style, is worth double its cost, which is only 25 cents per number. It is ably edited by Hon. E. G. Squier, and his experience is a guarantee that facts alone will be displayed in the pages of the history. It is what its name indicates, a History of the Times."

DOMESTIC NEWS.

THE Journal, of Providence, R.I., mentions the following as among the individual subscriptions to the National Loan in that city: Messrs. Brown & Ives, $160,000; Alexander Duncan, Esq., $100,000; A. D. & J. Y. Smith, $40,000; the Trustees of estate of Thomas L. Halsey, $20,000.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Buffalo Express writes that on Wednesday last a fountain well was opened on the Blood Farm, four miles from Oil Creek, in Venango County. A stream of oil, four inches through, spouted some 60 feet into the air before the workmen could remove all their tools, and quick as lightning burst into flame from the engine fire. Up to Saturday it had been burning with no diminution of force, a perfect column of fire and smoke. No persons were seriously, though some were slightly burned by the explosion.

THE political prisoners, numbering 108, were transferred from Fort Lafayette to Fort Warren, in Boston harbor, on the 30th October. Fort Lafayette is to be put in order and fully armed.

IN a recent case where one of the New York regiments took the fence rails belonging to a loyal Virginia woman, to use for firewood, Gen. Wadsworth issued an order requiring the regiment to go into the woods, cut new rails, and rebuild the fence destroyed.

JOHN C. RIVES, Esq., of Washington city, publisher of the Congressional Globe, gives $10 a month out of his own pocket to each of the families of the soldiers who have enlisted in the armies of the Union from the District of Columbia.

MURDER DF SIGISMUND FELLNER, THE GERMAN DIAMDND MERCHANT.

ON the 13th of September, Sigismund Fellner, a German Jew of great wealth, and about 40 years old, arrived in New York by the steamer Bavaria. During the voyage he formed the acquaintance of two sisters, Mrs. Marks and Miss Albertina Flaum, two Polish Jewesses. The younger, Albertina, aged 23, had great personal attractions and considerable vivacity of manner. Their intimacy became so peculiar as to incur the remarks of the passengers. Upon their arrival here, Fellner, as became his wealth, went to the Prescott House, while the sisters found a boarding-house at 45 East Broadway. Soon afterwards Fellner fell in with a Polish Jew named Radzki, whom there is reason to suspect was an acquaintance of the sisters. A few days after their arrival Mrs. Marks called upon Fellner, and demanded satisfaction for the seduction of her sister Albertina. It is said that she brandished a dagger, and received a large sum of money to mollify her feelings of "injured innocence." The gay diamond merchant consulted his friend Radzki, who advised him to throw the sisters off the scent by removing to his boarding-house, 4 Carroll street, Brooklyn. That evening the wealthy Jew took up his quarters there. On the 16th of October he disappeared, with his new found friend Radzki, and nothing more was seen or heard of him till his dead body was found near Applegate's Landing on the New Jersey shore, with 19 stiletto stabs in the region of his heart, either of them sufficient to cause death. On his person were found a large amount in gold, several articles of value, and a handkerchief marked Albertina Flaum, thus giving a clue to the identification of the body. When the accounts of the finding of this unknown body were published in the journals, Dr. Lowenthal, who had received letters from Fellner's family in Germany, requesting him to afford their relative any assistance he might require, as he was totally ignorant of our language, instinctively suspected the murdered man might be Sigismund Fellner.

Detectives Tieman and Farley, two of our most intelligent officers, visited Middletown, N. J., and examined the body. They found it to be that of Sigismund Fellner. They returned, and after considerable search discovered Mrs. Marks and Albertina Flaum at 45 East Broadway. They were arrested, and taken to the station-house of the 14th Ward, and confined in separate cells. Early on the morning of Saturday, the 2d of November, Albertina Flaum committed suicide by hanging herself in her cell. The supposed principal in this murder, Radzki, has not been apprehended. On Monday morning Mrs. Marks made an abortive attempt on her own life, by opening an artery in her arm with a penknife, but was discovered before she had bled to death.

RADZKI, THE ALLEGED MURDERER OF SIGISMUND FELLNER.

THIS person, whose portrait has been handed to us for publication by the police authorities, was one of the three months' volunteers in the 28th New York regiment. He is thus described by the police:

"Radzki, Polish Jew, 22 years old, five feet five inches in height; hair dark, cut short, no side whiskers, thin black moustache curled up at the corners of his mouth; a new skin on his hands, having been recently burned; dressed in brown coat, dark pants, and a low, round brimmed felt hat and red necktie. Two thousand dollars reward offered for his apprehension.

"JOHN S. YOUNG,
"Sergeant Detective Police, New York."

CASSIUS M. CLAY, Minister to Russia, has intimated that, in view of the attitude of the rebels, he would prefer to surrender his present commission as our representative to Russia, and enter the army in defence of the Government. We know that Mr. Clay is a better soldier than ambassador, and, therefore, hope his request will be attended to.

EDWARDS' FERRY, MARYLAND, ABOVE HARRISON'S ISLAND, ON THE POTOMAC RIVER, THE PLACE OF THE PASSAGE OF COL. BAKER'S REGIMENT, OCTOBER 21. FROM A SKETCH BY OUR ARTIST WITH GENERAL BANKS'S COMMAND.

THE OEFENCES OF CINCINNATI.

The natural good sense of the Buckeyes has determined them not to be taken by surprise, as some of their loyal Sisters have been. They have consequently sternly commenced throwing up fortifications around their chief city, Cincinnati. The erection of these defences has been made in accordance with the plans of Gen. Mitchell, which comprise a line of fortifications consisting of forts and batteries, now in process of construction. They are built upon a series of heights there described by our Artist:

"The Ohio river, from Columbus to Sodamsville, forms the segment of a circle, the length of the arc being nearly 12 miles, with a range of hills on the south of Covington and Newport for its base, at least nine miles in extent, and rising to an altitude of nearly 300 feet, completely commanding all the river and road approaches from the South.

"The first battery is at Price's Hill, below Mill Creek. There are two 32-pounders, barbette guns, mounted near the top, while at an elevation of 20 feet above is another battery, which with that upon Ludlow Hill entirely commands the river from the bend or shore at Fulton. Properly directed, a fire from these batteries would sink any fleet of steamers or gunboats brought against it, while the difficulty of approach to a bottle army would be too great to justify the venture.

"Fort Mitchell, located on the Lexington turnpike, is a bastion fortification in line one of two acres of ground. It is mounted with twelve 12-and 32 feet thick, and is surrounded by a ditch which is eight feet deep and 12 wide, and has a glacis or parapet, each capable of holding a battalion of men. Both of these parapets may be swept with a fire of musketry. These forts are constructed to resist any heavy projectile, and while they will only fall loyal reader as to the perfect security of the Queen City of the West."

THE PASSAGE OF THE POTOMAC AT EDWARDS' FERRY AND HARRISON'S ISLAND,

And the Battle of Ball's Bluff.

Two accounts concerning the late unfortunate affair at Ball's Bluff, on the Upper Potomac, are so confused and contradictory that it is almost impossible to give an intelligible account of it. It is certain, enough to know that some one blundered, and that out of the 1500 National troops which crossed the river only about 600 returned.

It is quite impossible to say, even at this moment, to whom the political or military responsibility for the Senator from Oregon, among the dead. The place where the action was fought is a point on the Virginia bank of the Potomac, about a mile and a half below Conrad's Ferry, and six miles above Edwards' Ferry, opposite a long narrow island in the Potomac river, called Harrison's Island. The idea of crossing the Potomac river to have been conceived by Brig.-Gen. Stone, commanding a brigade stationed between Edwards' and Conrad's Ferry, in consequence of hearing that Gen. McCall was advancing up the Virginia side of the Potomac, on Leesburg, which was supposed to be protected by a diminished rebel force. Gen. Stone seems to have intended not only to operate in this direction, but to cross the river at Edwards' Ferry, and to proceed to cross the river at Edwards' Ferry, and to proceed from Poolesville, his headquarters, to Leesburg. But, to divert attention from his real purpose, after making some reconnaissance, which seem to have been imperfect and unsatisfactory, he directed Ebets to be made as a point near the lower end of Harrison's Island, and to cross the river in small detachments at that point. Gen. Baker, who is a subordinate officer in command of the regiment numbering in all about 1,900 men, at the work at Harrison's Island. He received his orders in the afternoon of October 20th, and immediately sent over a mounting party of 38 men, under Capt. Philbrick, in the direction of Leesburg. The rebel within a mile and a half of the river, when they returned and reported "No enemy visible." Gen. Baker then sent over Col. Devens, with 320 men, and Col. Lee, with 320 more. His pursuit were fiercely and eagerly, and the disobedience of the subsequent disaster was mainly due. The entire means of transport from the Maryland shore to Harrison's Island, a distance of 200 yards, across a rapid river, were two scows, capable of carrying 70 persons each, and with which only the smallest could cross together. On the Virginia side of the island, the river, although but about 100 yards wide, was found to be fordable, the water being only about breast high. The opposite bank is high and slippery, divided by a steep bluff, from 40 to 150 feet high, covered with brush, trees and undergrowth. In the face of these obstacles, and with these inappropriate means, Gen. Baker's command commenced its fatal passage of the Potomac. At daybreak on the morning of the fatal Wednesday, Col. Devens, with the Massachusetts 15th and Col. Lee's Massachusetts 19th, had crossed their fire on Ball's Bluff, on the edge of a corn-field of about six acres in extent, surrounded on all sides by thick woods. In this position they were attacked by a considerable body of rebels, with whom an irregular skirmishing fire was kept up. At about noon the reinforcements began to come up, consisting of three companies of the Massachusetts 15th, 600 men, under Col. Wistar, and the California regiment, numbering 700, with two howitzers and one rifled cannon, under Lieut. Bramhall, of the 6th New York regiment. Meanwhile the rebels, evidently considering that the war was made, rapidly concentrated their forces on Gen. Baker's command, and at half-past two o'clock, P. M., the appearance of the field, as we are informed, was as follows: Col. Devens maintained his position, keeping up a constant fire of his regiment. Col. Wistar's regiment took place from below by Gen. Stone's main force, a portion of which, under Col. Gorman, crossed the river, and, however, without great difficulty from want of adequate means of transport.

It soon became evident to Gen. Baker that he was overpowered, and that there was no possibility of retreat with the miserable means at the command of crossing the river. No signs of an assault from Gen. Stone's force on the opposite bank, and the fire of the rebels was overwhelming and hopeless resistance. A wounded and overpowering fire poured in on the little band of isolated and intrepid soldiers. The enemy became bolder, and were pressing closer and closer on their victims. In the furious hope of breaking their lines by a desperate charge, at four o'clock, Gen. Baker led on his men, and fell at their head. To prolong the contest is now needless, but still the ground was firmly disputed by the National forces, until night coming on, Col. Cogswell, who succeeded to the command on the death of Gen. Baker, gave orders to form in column and cut their way down the river bank to Edwardes Ferry. With the hope of reaching Gen. Stone's command. At this juncture communication gave out on the left of the line, the weary troops knew not that the enemy had crossed in force in their rear, and the shouting of success ignorant rebels. An order was then given to retreat across the river to Harrisons Island, and Col. Devens deployed his 15th as skirmishers to cover the retreat down the bluff.

Here commences the saddest episode of the fight. The means of transport were inadequate even when the crossing was regular and in order, and filled utterly at the rush that took place. The scow was overloaded with wounded men, and the boat was swamped in the middle of the stream, many were shot while swimming the stream; many were taken prisoners on the bank, and on the evidence of several officers, many of the wounded were bayoneted where they were. They retreated to Harrisons Island, while covered by the Third Rhode Island battery they maintained their position. The brave Lieut. Bramhall, of the 6th New York, was one of the last to leave, having carried the guns of his section from gun to gun, dismounting their fire, and firing as coolly as if on parade drill.

Of the 1,900 who crossed the river in the morning, but a sad remnant reached the island and opposite shore on that sad night. Upwards of 200 were taken prisoners, more than a hundred were drowned, nearly the same number were killed on the field, or shot in the retreat, and upwards of 300 were wounded, many of whom were left on the field in the hands of horror which seized this most disastrous retreat and retreat. It was a fearful blunder from beginning to end, for which some one must ultimately be held responsible.

While these terrible scenes were enacting at Ball's Bluff, the division under General Banks was quietly passing the river at Edwardes Ferry, but not in time to save Baker and his gallant band. Why? Simply because the means of transport were inadequate. The only ferry-boat in existence which enacted the duties of Harrisons Island. Although meditating a movement of so much importance as that of crossing a broad and rapid river in the face of an enemy, General Banks had provided no boats or other means of transport, except two shaky scows, capable between them to carry about a hundred men, and a yawl boat holding ten. As a consequence, although the movement began early on the morning of the 21st, it was not over three regiments. But the bluntness did not stop here. Early in the evening the news of the death of General Baker, and the presence of an overwhelming rebel force on the opposite bank, reached Edwardes' Ferry, and at once orders were given for bringing back to the Maryland shore the troops which had crossed over. This was a work of extreme difficulty, and was done by the same means, occupying until midnight. At this time word was received at Edwardes' Ferry that General Banks was approaching with his column to support the movement of the day, and immediately the same troops which had crossed and recrossed were again sent across the river to the same scene. In the morning many valuable lives were sacrificed in all to 4,000 infantry, with a section of artillery, and a squadron of cavalry, were thrown across the river, and a small line of fortifications were thrown up to protect the bridge-head, which only a slight brush with a detachment of rebels, in which Gen. Lander was wounded. During the night—Tuesday, October 22d—the disposing army of Baker's disaster became known, and the whilste of the Leesburg railway bringing up rebel reinforcements from Manassas, sounded constantly in the ears of our troops. On Tuesday morning, however, General McClellan had arrived at Edwards' Ferry, and both with reference to further advance or a retreat, as circumstances might justify or require, ordered a bridge of boats to be thrown across the river. These were procured from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal on its banks, shot into the river and lashed together, forming a complete bridge over the stream. He, however, received such intelligence on Wednesday of the number and designs of the rebels, that he resolved to withdraw the national forces from the Virginia side, which was effected silently and safely on the same night.

Our engravings illustrate the position of our troops on the Virginia shore, on Tuesday, during the attack in which General Lander was wounded, and the successful retreat to the Maryland shore on the night of Wednesday, October 23d, by moonlight, during a high, cold wind-storm.

The advance across the Potomac was well enough planned, but was undertaken without prevision, and with blind, stupid, criminal neglect of the means necessary to insure a successful passage, or a safe retreat. Had these been provided, not only would the slaughter of Ball's Bluff have been prevented, but the probability is that Leesburg would have been in our possession, and our right wing in a position to threaten Manassas in flank.

GENERAL FREMONT'S ARMY CROSSING THE OSAGE RIVER, MO.

The rebel General Price, when retreating before Fremont, rightly believed that if he could put the Osage river between him and the National commander, and destroy the bridges across it, he could so delay pursuit as to make an easy escape into Arkansas. But he did not rightly estimate the resources or vigor of Gen. Fremont. When that officer approached the river at Warsaw, he rode forward through mud and rain 25 miles, viewed the stream, and gave prompt orders for bridging it, which were carried out so rapidly that within four days his entire force was able to cross and follow up the pursuit. At the point of passage at Warsaw, the Osage is 200 yards wide. Warsaw is described as a straggling town, on a high bank, which is cut up by numberless ravines, adown and up which the houses go wandering, as if striving to avoid each other's company, and in the effort had got stuck at various unlikely spots on their journey. There are two tumble-down "hotels," a very handsome brick building known as the Mechanics' Bank, a couple of stray churches with the least appreciable effort in the world at steeples, and perhaps a half-dozen houses of moderate pretensions to respectability. There are a few stores, but in all cases they have been taken possession of by the Government and their contents confiscated.

CONRAD'S FERRY, MARYLAND.

Conrad's Ferry, of which we give a sketch, is situated on the Maryland side of the Upper Potomac, about five miles above Edwards' Ferry. It is in the possession of the National troops. It commands a view of Harrison's Island, the scene of so much disaster at the battle of Ball's Bluff, and is immediately opposite to Leesburg Heights, the town of Leesburg being about five miles from the Ferry, on the south side of the Potomac.

EDWARDS' FERRY, MARYLAND.

Edwards' Ferry is on the Upper Potomac, about 35 miles from Washington, calculating the winding of the river, and has been the scene of several encounters, more or less severe, since the commencement of the present rebellion. On the 18th of May a sharp skirmish took place, in which the rebels were defeated. On the 9th of June a similar affair happened. It has, however, received a later distinction as the place where Gen. Banks successfully passed across the Potomac a column of 4,000 men, on the 22d of October, and of their successful withdrawal, under the cover of artillery, on the 23d, when it was found their position was untenable.

An officer of Gen. Baker's regiment, in a letter to Col. Forney, thus describes this celebrated spot:

"About five miles from Poolesville, on what is called the Leesburg road, is Edwards' Ferry. Leesburg is about ten miles distant, and is in the midst of a mountainous and charming country. It can be seen very plainly from an elevated field behind the house where I am now staying, and, as it nestles away in the blue hills, presents a pretty and attractive picture. The road to the Ferry is narrow, stony, and furrowed into deep ruts by the multitude of teams traversing it. Large forests of scant and neglected timber abound, and through these forests the path has been made. During my journey it was crowded with troops and transportation, which increased in number and density until we came to the Ferry. We suddenly come to an open country as we approach the Potomac. The Maryland shore is high, but gently rolling from the bank. Large meadow lands, well fenced in, slope down to the water. The Chesapeake Canal pushes its narrow, artificial and sluggish stream quietly along, and on the banks a few wooden buildings have been erected, apparently for the accommodation of those who manage the ferry in times of peace. The Potomac I should take to be from 100 to 200 yards wide. The recent rains had swollen it, and it had a yet turbid and angry look, the current being strong and incessant. The opposite shore was sparsely wooded, and swelled gently upwards in a neat and attractive bank, traversed by a narrow road which leads to the town of Leesburg."

MAP AND PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF BALL'S HEIGHTS, OCTOBER 21.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL BLENKER.

Louis Blenker was born in Worms on the Rhine, about 1815. He entered the army of Greece, in which he served several years under Otho, who became King of Greece in July, 1835. But, after being commissioned first Lieutenant, he left Greece, and returned to his native city, where he began business as a wine merchant. After the Revolution of February, 1848, Blenker was elected Colonel of the Militia of Worms, and joined the revolutionary movement in Baden. During the insurgent campaign his heroic wife was always on horseback by his side, bravely contending against the Royalist army of Baden. Blenker had at that time only 3,000 men under his command, which were attacked by 20,000 Prussians. Of course, unable to defend themselves against such superior numbers, Colonel Blenker crossed, with the remnant of his brave men, into Switzerland. There he remained until the end of September, 1849, when he was expelled by a special order of the President of the Helvetian Confederacy.

Colonel Blenker, accompanied by his wife, then sailed for the United States. He bought a farm in Rockland county, New York, where he lived until the rebellion broke out, when he came to New York, and was elected Colonel of the First German Rifle Regiment, 8th N. Y. V., which was one of the first that went to the seat of war. After the battle of Bull Run, where Colonel Blenker acted as Brigadier, and covered the retreat of our army, he was promoted Brigadier-General, and as such he now commands the German Division of the Army of the Potomac.

BURNING OF BARQUE THDMAS WATSDN,

Off Charleston, S. C.

On the 16th of October a suspicious sail was observed near Charleston harbor, by our blockading squadron, then consisting of the Roanoke and the Monticello. The vessel being signalled, hoisted English colors and made for the entrance, but the Captain, finding it impossible to escape, ran her aground, and escaped with the crew in his boat. A detachment was immediately dispatched in the cutters of the Roanoke and Monticello, and the vessel, which proved to be the Thomas Watson, of Liverpool, was burnt. She was loaded with stores for the rebels.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON

CHAPTER XXIV.—BROUSSAIS' STORY.

For four days Broussais was absent, and we were in a state of the most painful doubt as to his safety. Neither Martha nor Eugene knew the cause of his abrupt departure any more than I did myself. Eugene fled, after the first moment of surprise, guessed him, but Martha and I were left to ourselves, and some look to us quite gloomy, as the first effects of misfortunes had commenced. Having no means of receiving him, we had simply to wait until he should return or send some message. We could not understand what had happened to cause Broussais so much trouble, and we spent many hours conjecturing.

We were then employed on the night of the fourth day after that on which he had left us, when the door of the room opened, and Broussais entered. He was pale, very pale, and worn, fagged and wet—for it was raining hard outside, and the pot, pot of the big blobs of rain upon the glass of the window made so shiver, though we were sitting round a large fire. Broussais, too, looked without speaking for four or six minutes after the silence was so broken. Broussais looked sadly into the fire, and we three looked uneasily at him. At length Eugene spoke, laying his hand good-humouredly on Broussais' shoulder, and looking anxiously into his face.

"Why, man, what is the matter with you? Are you crazy, that you jump up and leave us without saying word; and return, so down sorrowful, and still without saying one word?"

"Am I crazy? No; though when you know what has occurred you will wonder that I am not."

"Eh! What has occurred? Is there another curse loose?"

"Yes. But perhaps the evil is not irremediable. I will tell you."

He was about to proceed with a narration of something, when Martha interrupted him, declaring that she would not allow him to sit there talking without changing his clothes and getting something to eat, and that as none of us had yet had tea we should have it there and then. So she bustled about, ordered the tea, and brought Broussais a cup. This he got on, smiling at Martha, and thanking her over and over again. Tea was brought, and our hearts were warmed by its genial influence, and the knowledge that we were released from trouble. Tea being finished, we all gathered round the fire again, and Broussais commenced his narration.

"You I am going to tell will, I think, be interesting to you all," he said, in his peculiarly soft voice. "It will interest Mr. Henry there, because it will relieve him from what might otherwise be a disagreeable impression; and it will interest you, Martha and Eugene, because it nearly concerns myself. Therefore, telling the reason of my absence leave taking yesterday, however, I will begin at the beginning, and cease to that in due course.

"I may tell you that I was born many of my first recollections are very sad. I was brought up in a wretched little hovel. My father drank heavily, and even in his drunken fits would sacredly abuse me. I would not have cared for that but it was from that he also abused my mother. For her sake I early determined to strike out for myself, so that I might protect from the brute which beyond her to a brutish and heartless son. This was not to be, for ere I had been able to do more than win a crust of bread for myself, by lobbing horses or running messages, my poor mother died."

Broussais paused, and, leaning back in his chair, wiped his face with his handkerchief, as if he did not wish us to perceive how deeply he was affected by the remembrance of his mother's fate. He then continued:

"Shortly after my mother's death, my father disappeared, and from that time I have neither seen nor heard of him. Left thus without a friend, my life became a strange one. How I managed to live I can scarcely tell; how begging, now message-running, or doing anything by which I could get a sous, I got through it somehow. I was often hanging about the doors of a certain maison-de-jeu, and sometimes got jobs to do for the clerks. It happened that they were in want of some one as a sort of porter, and being known, they, my being so much about the place, in the end I was engaged. My dexterity was somewhat remarkable for so young a lad, and I soon became a favourite with the clerks, who, being sufficiently aristocratic and gentlemanly, in which inquisitiveness one of the clerks assisted me. Gradually I rose into the position of a clerk, and my attendance upon me the confidence of my master, who was, as is almost unnecessary to say, Monsieur Charles. When I first got into the establishment it was very seldom in Paris, being much at other business in England. But latterly the number of his visits increased, and the length of his stay there lengthened. I believe the cause of this might be found in a fancy which he took for a young girl who resided in Paris, and who—"

SEE PAGE 407.

Broussais stopped suddenly, and looked over at Martha, as if he was afraid of having offended her. She looked pale, but was not otherwise visibly affected by anything that was said. Eugene, I perceived, knitted his brows, and stared fiercely into the fire.

"Well," Broussais proceeded to say, "we will pass over a little matter, which does not bear much on my story, though it was and is all in all to myself. M. Charles came to Paris, for the purpose (he said) of superintending the business; but I afterwards had reason to believe that there was another cause for leaving England. He had with him one child, a little, fair-haired girl, called Elizabeth."

I gave a slight start on hearing the name, and the mere recollection between us at our last meeting flashed through my mind. Broussais looked at me, half closing his eyes, and nodding his head, as he went on.

"One of my principal reasons for relating this portion of my life is that you, Mr. Henry, may be able to understand the daughter of Monsieur Charles in her true character. At the same time, in all the accomplishments which are the result of education she was far superior to servants, I became more and more acquainted with the nature of her father. It was not long before I discovered that he had some hidden sin which he was endeavouring to bury, and that no one, from which he could possibly escape, would stay him in his object. Many secret conversations took place between him and his fortune, Tonda, who lived, whether in England or France, I was unable to make out satisfactorily. I soon saw that Mme. Charles was fond of wealth, not that he might hoard it up, but that he might make a display with it; and I guessed that another object was to marry his daughter into some aristocratic family; but there was something still beneath all this, which I could not understand till a few years ago. He treated me with great kindness, treated me with the whole affairs of the house, and so fooled me. I would have done anything for him, and, when the time came, obeyed his evil command, as I had obeyed his good ones; though, thank Heaven! my heart was not too black to perceive at last the end at which he aimed, and to leave him.

"When Elizabeth was about eighteen years of age, Charles became acquainted with a young man of Jewish extraction, named Frenpole Dubreuse. This young man, who was some eight years older than Elizabeth, was wealthy. He owned this fact on account of receiving some information from my master to make inquiries concerning him. Of course, the results heralded, however, that he gambled deeply, and was reported to have lost nearly the whole of his property at rouge et noir. M. Charles invited him to his house, and he became a frequent visitor there. It was expected that he would marry Elizabeth; but shortly before the time appointed for the ceremony to be performed M. Charles made the discovery (so far had the matter gone) that Frenpole had lost his whole fortune, and was all but in bankruptcy. Charles was furious at very first. He knew that an explosion of français chevaleresque would be very annoying, without even garnishing, and, I suspect, he thought also that M. Charles would change his mind when he discovered, what was really the case, that there had been between himself and Elizabeth what in her French call a little flirtation."

"Can this be true?" I cried.

"Too true, as you shall learn. When M. Charles understood the state of the connection between his daughter and Frenpole, he was terribly enraged; but finding that something might be made out of Frenpole, and that he was pretty plain, if he broke off the affair, he let the business, intending to make him marry his daughter when it might suit his plans. He, however, altered his determination, thinking it would be better if you, Mr. Henry, married her, he rather be accountable that end, and also for the purpose of managing other matters, he said the Paris business, leaving Frenpole as one of the partners, and came to England. I had owed a little money from my salary, and not then thoroughly understanding the character of Frenpole, assented it in the business, and also came to England.

"You are aware of all that has taken place since we came, till four days ago, when I received a telegram, which stated that Frenpole had absconded with bills to an amount which would utterly ruin the firm if not stopped as some manner. It was also stated that he had dropped a note in the office, which showed that he had been acting under the orders of M. Charles, who, doubtless fearing the result of his measures in the event, was preparing to leave England hastily. Upon receiving the telegram, I, too, became uneasy lest, on my absence, and made all haste to the hotel, where I knew M. Charles was lodging. On entering the room I started from the waiter that Mlle. Charles had just left with a gentleman for the railway station. I posted down there, and found that the train had left found the London train had just passed, but that I could get a mail train passing in a quarter of an hour. I waited, and proceeded with it to Calais. When I arrived I had to wait for the steamer, and luckily I knew the hours at which Frenpole had lived when in London in former occasions."

"Was it he who trusted me to the greene's shop?" I interrupted; the concealment of that little green spot was the cause of my life drowning upon me, and Memory, with one of her subtle tricks, rendering the feeling of having been Frenpole's friend.

"Yes," said Broussais; "it was he, no doubt. I told that I knew the house at which he had formerly lived. I hurried to it, and entered the consecrated room. There was no one in it. I was about to leave it, when I saw the waiter, whom a man entered, whom I instantly recognised.

"M. Frenpole?

"Broussais?

"We stood staring at each other, without speaking; he was apparently overcome with fear, as I was with passion. At length he spoke in French:

"Ah! my dear Broussais, how are you? I am glad to see you, shall we shake."

"Sir," I said, almost foaming with rage, 'our greeting must be rather then that of friends.'

"Ah!" he said, coolly, lighting a cigar, but keeping a side look upon me all the time.

"I could say no more; his consummate coolness had thoroughly mastered me. I approached the bell, but ere I could reach it he laid his hand upon it, and looking at me curiously, said,

"May I ask if we meet accidentally?

"No, I said. 'I came here to seek you, and my reason for seeking you is to demand certain bills which you have in your possession. They are of no service to you, as payment has been stopped.'

"This did not seem to have any effect upon him, for he merely laughed relatively, or he said,

"'And do you think I will give them to you? Look you. I should not like to do you an injury—you are deformed enough already; but if you stir from the spot on which you now stand, until I leave the room, you shall take one step nearer to the grave outrageous.'

I could do nothing; there was no assistance at hand, and I was too weak to do anything. He left the room, and went up the stairs. I went out of the hotel in search of a constable. I had to go to one of the offices, where I procured the assistance of a sergeant. We drove back to the hotel, but before we reached it I saw Fish, and Francois and Elizabeth in it, turn down one of the by-streets. At the same time they observed me, they had got a good start, but we pursued. I urged the driver to go as fast as possible; whether he could not or would not go fast enough, I cannot say, but he did not manage to overtake them. They quickly dismissed us, and succeeded in doing so, for we lost sight of them, and could not find out at right. We still followed, and came to a station which they must have passed, but they were driving to the city. Thither we went, but without again getting sight of them. Immediately upon arrival there we made inquiries as to what vessels would be likely to sail that day. We were informed that there was one about to sail for New York, and we hurried in the direction in which it lay. When we were near the place, we felt the ash pod proceeded on foot. Going in the same direction, I saw the back of a man whom I thought I knew. After a short time I was convinced that it was Tinsley, and felt assured that we were on the right track. When we came in sight of the vessel, Tinsley was just going to walk into it by means of one of the goods gangways, which have no railings. When he had reached about the centre, he turned round, as if to look for some one; it was not long before he saw me approaching him hastily with the police sergeant. I believe, poor man, that the thought we were in pursuit of him, for he turned very pale, staggered, and fell over the side of the gangway into the water. There was an instant shout given of a 'man drowning,' and many ready and willing hands made every effort to get him out. But he had unfortunately got under the keel of the vessel, and when found, two hours afterwards, was quite dead."

Martha hid her face in her apron, and no one spoke. After a pause, Bronssin finished by saying that three days of fruitless search for Francois in London, he had returned fatigued and almost disheartened.

CHAPTER XXV.—THE SKELETON DISAPPEARS AND THE CURTAIN FALLS.

WHEN Bronssin had ended his narrative, we three, who had listened to him in rapt attention, sat gazing into one another's faces with eyes half averted. Fortune had been so extraordinarily merciful in discovering and utterly dispersing our enemies, that we could hardly realize our present position; but it we were rather ungrateful in heart on that occasion, I trust that all our hearts thanked Heaven for its mercy afterwards.

The news of the death of Mr. Poore, who was born a brute and who died a brute, appeared to cause Martha neither grief nor pleasure. She, like myself, was quite unable to realize the state of matters. She neither wept nor smiled; but more than once she told us that she was thankful and grateful that the ruin of the good Charles had been completed, not by her, but by death. She was sad and serious. If she grieved at all now, her grief was much less acute, and much more holy, than her bitterness and hate had ever been.

One mystery yet remains unexplained," I said, after a time.

You have never yet explained some of the circumstances which preceded my poor father's unfortunate end."

They looked at one another unfeignedly. Eugene was the one to speak.

"All then, shall be explained," said Eugene. "Speak, Martha! You are a woman, and therefore more able to soften the story we all know so well."

Martha was sitting at my side. She took one of my hands in her own, looked me tenderly in the face, and shook her head.

Bronssin then spoke.

"When you were a little baby, Mr. Henry," he said, in low tones, your dear father was comparatively well to do. He was a clerk in a large office, that of a prosperous agent; and among his fellow clerks, his superiors in commercial rank, was the man whom you have known by the name of Governor Charles. Charles was younger than your father by some years, but he was far older in the ways of the world. For I must tell you, Mr. Henry, that your father was somewhat too small-minded. He was dreamy, delicate and fond of books; he had little strength of character. You will pardon these reflections, for without them you could scarcely be able to understand what was to follow.

"Go on," I cried. "I beg you to dismiss all useless delicacy."

"All then, Charles and your father were identical in their first married sisters, between whom there was a considerable personal resemblance. The two brothers-in-law, as a matter of course, became intimate. It will be told, Charles was an inveterate and secret gambler, and he was lingering in the mind of your father, and in his heart as the object of joy. His means, my poor! When I tell you that Louise was the eldest child of the sisters, had inconvenient expectations, and when you remember the long years of deception which followed your father's transgression, you will be at no loss to understand."

"Ah!" I interjected.

"Charles had in vain sought to gain the affections of the elder girl, but she loved your father. On finding that our mother, knowledge resume of his own—supposed to the younger sister, was accepted, and married her. Previous to the marriage, Charles had lent your up all hope of winning the love of Louise, he had poisoned the mind of your father. After the marriage all his arts were exercised with one object—your father's downfall and ruin. Day by day your father was sucked deeper and deeper into the toils. He became a confirmed gambler."

"Yes."

"The dark result soon become apparent. He was ruined. Pervaded by the accursed Charles that fortune was about to change, in a fit of fear and madness, fearful for the fate of his poor wife and child, he forged the name of his employers for five hundred pounds, drew the money, and lost it the same night to the accomplice of his brother-in-law."

"And the cause of the first whose name he forged," cried I, "was Bernard & Co."

"Yes, truly. He had chased his all on a hope that fortune was about to change, and that he could meet the bill when it became due. The forgery was discovered. He was dragged into the fellow's dock. Among the witnesses against him was Leonard Charles. The case was an aggravated one, and the two desirous of making a severe example of such an offender. Your father was sentenced to transportation for seventy-one years."

There was a pause.

I hid my face in my hands and wept bitterly. The sad tales related my overburdened heart. Then the voice of Eugene broke in harshly:

"Now, you see, Leonard Charles, who was in complete ignorance of the events preceding a severe business in Paris, as the owner of a small maison de plaisir. His principal dealings were with rich men, or male boys, whom his associates had robbed at the gaming table. He had a lovely mistress Bronssin, whom he had served, and who was concerned in some of his villainies."

"Yes," murmured Bronssin. "But the mind of his clerk, named Bronssin, was not all evil; and he more than once took occasion to assist those whom his master had impoverished."

Eugene gave a kindly smile and nodded his head.

"Bronssin was unfortunate, not wicked," he said. "Well, in the employ of Bernard & Co. was a youth, who had been educated in a charity, and had a taste of odd work. The name of this youth was Eugene Dumvers. He fell into evil ways; he was too fond of pleasure. In a fit of remorse he once took money from the office—small sum, but sufficient to get him into trouble. The theft was discovered by your father, who replaced the money and screened the offender."

"And hence?" I cried, with a glance at Martha, "your late interest in his sin."

"Perhaps so. I was never a rank bad. I couldn't help feeling grateful to the man who had saved me from absolute perdition. Well, the kindness didn't redress me. I again robbed my employers, and this time my folly was discovered by Leonard Charles. He did what your father had done, but from different motives. He screened me, but he held his knowledge over me as a kind of evil—diabolic. From being employed by him to watch the motions of your father, I became acquainted with matters which opened my eyes a little. At the time an event occurred which changed the whole course of my life."

He glanced covertly at Martha, who was sitting left upon the table, and pale.

"Go on," she exclaimed; "I can bear anything now."

Business frequently called Charles to Paris. During one of his visits he became acquainted with my sister Martha, who was residing in the city in the capacity of lady's maid. She had been commissioned to bear him a message from me, and he won tokens by her greater favor. Knowing his hold on me—"

He deceived her!" cried Martha; "for she, at that time, was young and innocent."

"He deceived her!" repeated Eugene. "She believed him unmarried; she believed that he loved her. She listened to him, and he deceived her. And—but's—"

Not so," murmured Bronssin. "Although I myself was under the impression that Charles was a married man, I perceived that there was no guile in the unstained Martha. She was pure and innocent, however, and deceived him the pink of honor. I could not understand her. Why did I attempt to do so? Because I had one reason which transcended all reasons. I myself loved her."

I glanced at Martha; but she sat calm and immovable. Then I looked at Bronssin.

MY GOLDEN SKELETON.

with his deformed body and noble face. There was a tender light on the latter as he spoke.

"I myself loved her—deeply, devotedly; but you can all understand why I lacked courage to declare my passion. She so erred in her blind way, and I was helpless to aid her."

Here Eugene again broke in.

"But when I heard of the deception I was able to enlighten Martha as to the result, and I brought her face to face with the wife of Charles. She was dismissed with insult and scorn. I went to Charles, fiercely upbraided him, and threatened to disclose all his infamy. I was mad. Shortly after my interview with that man, I was sent on business to Marseilles, and my companion was the scamp called Timbs. Timbs was known to me as a merry, pleasure-seeking, vulgar party, who did occasional odd jobs for my employers, and who was also in the pay of Charles. We got quite convivial and friendly during our journey. Arrived at Marseilles, we rather neglected business, and spent our money in some low seaport haunts. Timbs had received his instructions. One night I was attacked in a small public-house close to the wharf, by the mate of an East Indian brig and his seamen, and by Timbs. In the scuffle I was felled by Timbs, and received a mark that has never left me."

He grinned as he pointed to the scar, the marks of which were still dark under his right eye.

"The upshot was, I was dragged on board the brig during the night and imprisoned in the hold. The brig sailed next day. They made me work like a dog morning and night, and half starved me. To make a long story short, we were driven by stress of weather into a bay in Madagascar. There, penniless and half-clothed, I was set ashore, and when the wind changed the brig sailed away. The rest is almost a blank to me. I managed to live somehow among those half savages. At last I made my escape in a vessel bound for the Cape, and in due time reached France. In Paris I again met Broussais, who advised me of all that had taken place during my absence. On the information I received from him, I came to England, and found you out at Caverford. You know what followed. Shortly afterwards the merest chance threw me upon the path of your father, who had escaped from the convict colonies and was hiding from the police. You know all the rest."

"Save that during Eugene's absence," observed Broussais, "Charles had hounded Martha into a match with Timbs."

Enough of this explanatory conversation. Piecing all my information together, I will now tell, as briefly as possible, how the web of villainy was further woven around us.

After my father's transportation, my mother, who had money in her own right, went to live with her baby in the country, and there it was that she lost her identity in that of her younger sister. She was half frantic with grief and terror, and was easily imposed upon by Leonard Charles. At last, on his information, which described her as his wife, she was transferred to a private lunatic asylum, while the real wife of Charles assumed the name of my mother, and separated from her husband wholly. Once or twice Charles and his wife met; but Charles continued to pass as her brother-in-law. Once my poor mother made her escape from the lunatic asylum, but was foolish enough to venture into the toils. She was immediately recaptured. At last, my pretended mother died, whether by false means or foul I cannot tell. Enough to say that in her last moments she repented, and refused to will away my right to her real husband and pretended brother-in-law. She died confessing her sin, having—unknown to Charles—poured the whole secret of that sin into the bosom of Mrs. Timbs, who had been called in to nurse her. After her death, it became my uncle's obvious object either to conciliate me, or get me out of the way. Being appointed my guardian, he adopted the former course. At last, when he saw no other way of binding himself to me, he called in the aid of his daughter Elizabeth, of whose history the reader already knows something. Using his legal guardianship as a blind, he had squandered a great portion of the property which came to me from my mother, and he wished to fence away any accusation on my part by becoming my father-in-law.

When we freed my poor mother from her tormentors, which we did as speedily as possible, and when I fully succeeded in recovering the remnant of her property, our work was done. Long confinement and constant heartache had really affected my mother's mind; but we easily procured her liberation. The state of affairs was broken to her by slow degrees. At last, able to bear her mingled pain and joy, she fell upon my neck, and clung there for the remainder of her quiet days.

We had still a small income to depend upon, my mother and I. We settled down in a quiet country place, whither came few rumors of the busy world; and there I busied myself to make my mother's last days happy, by softening the memory of her past. My poor mother! The agony had been too much for her strength. She did not live long to enjoy her better fortune; in less than two years from the date of my father's death, she passed away, blessing me. Before she died, we took care to have that obnoxious tablet removed from Caverford churchyard, and to substitute a plain stone in its place.

Every now and again, we heard tidings of our old friends, and of their progress in life. After my mother's death, I travelled a little, and finally settled down near London. I had scribbled now and then, between whiles, in my little country home, and I now turned my attention to literature. I have not been remarkably successful; but it has been relaxation, not success, that I have ever sought. The pleasure of scribbling fully compensates me for the difficulties attending publication.

And, thanks to my stars, My Golden Skeleton at length disappeared. I felt no longer the burden of oppressive riches. I became a thorough-going man of the world; a man of commonplace, dashed with pathos. I am a bachelor still; I am far too dull to care for a helpmate. But I am as happy as most men. So Heaven free all poor haunted lives from the Golden Skeletons.

You will not be surprised to hear that Broussais persuaded Martha to marry him. He had saved a little money from the wreck of his fortunes, and with it he commenced business in Paris as a tobacconist. He prospered, and Martha proved a good and faithful wife. Every time I go to Paris I visit their large shop in the Quartier Latin. I like Broussais, his wife, and his cigars. Broussais and his wife compose a portion of the small audience which likes my books. They will read this story, in its present and in its book form. For they read this periodical, and are very dear and intimate friends of the editor.

We had some trouble with Eugene, for he had always been of an erratic disposition. At last he settled down in a small hotel in the North of England. He never became either rich or corpulent. Occasional bursts of vagabondism emptied his purse every now and again. After living peaceably and busily for a few months, he would suddenly appear on the turf, and then go home, a sadder and a wiser man. He looked with a complacent eye on the late fight for the Championship, and I am told that he was one of the principal backers of Mr. Tom Sayers. But Sarah, to whom the reader has been introduced, and who was in reality his wife, has borne him children late in life, and he is fast becoming more domesticated.

The ambition of the good little dancing-master was ultimately realized. On the occasion of a visit to London, I found out the little gentleman, introduced myself, and ascertained that he was acting as ballet-master at one of the principal theatres. I had the pleasure of seeing Obadiah play Harlequin, and very well indeed he did it. When he took off his mask, I immediately recognized the blue eyes and the head of tow. His legs had fulfilled all their pristine promise; they had covered themselves with glory. I rushed behind the scenes to congratulate my old friend. He was fidgeting with ecstacy at the wing.

"That," said he, joyfully, pointing to Harlequin's spangles, "that is true fame. What's glory, unless it's tangible? and what's more tangible than spangles? O Obadiah, apple of my heart, bless the mother who sent you forth into the world, with your legs of genius foremost!"

Some years after I had recovered my property, I heard incidentally that François Dupesne had committed a serious crime, been convicted, and sentenced to the hulks. I was in London a year afterwards, in the winter. I had been at the house of a friend, and was returning home after midnight. My way lay through certain dark streets near the Haymarket. In one of these, in the light of the lamps, a gandily-dressed woman grasped my arm, and addressed me scarcely. Turning, I saw that the face was still beautiful, and I seemed to recognize it. While I gazed, the woman gave a slight scream of recognition, released me, and fled away into the darkness of a neighboring alley. That was enough. The face I had seen was that of Elizabeth Charles. I followed her, but she had disappeared. I made many vain attempts to find her out, and succor her; but I have never seen her face since that night.

THE END.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE DEFENCES OF CAIRO, ILL.

In No. 308 we gave a very interesting sketch of the building of Fort Holt, the part of Kentucky immediately south of Cairo. Our present illustration affords a complete view of how perfectly that important point of land, the southern extremity of Illinois, is now guarded. On the left is Bird's Point, Mo., in the centre is Fort Prentiss, Ill., while on the right is Fort Holt, Kentucky. This little sketch is curious on another account, it shows perhaps the only spot on the Mississippi where three great and powerful States can be seen at one glance. It is cheering to know that all of them are true and loyal members of the Union, despite the frantic efforts of a few traitors in Missouri and Kentucky to carry into their native States the horrors of civil war.

MAJOR BEN PERLEY POORE,

Of the 38th Regiment, Massachusetts.

The name of "Perley Poore" has for some years been of frequent occurrence in the public press, but somehow it has been introduced in a manner to convey the idea that its owner was more of a wag than the earnest and efficient worker his career shows him to be. He is a wit and a wag, but his fun and waggery spring up like crisp little wild flowers along the well-beaten road of existence, to cheer the senses and keep them hopeful and healthy. A brief sketch of his life, especially of the earlier portion, will show how intimately romance and reality are interwoven. It offers likewise an example very characteristic of Yankee pluck and adaptability, and may be read with benefit by every Yankee boy.

Ben Perley Poore was born in Newburyport, Massachusetts, November, 1820. While a boy he made a European tour with his father, and soon after his return, about the age of fourteen, left his father's house, like young Norval, determined to see the world and make his way in it by himself. Like most youths in the same predicament, young Ben found his way into a printing office, with the drudgery of which, copying manuscripts—for he was a fine penman—building fires and working the bellows at a church organ, he managed to sustain himself for over a couple of years. He attracted notice from the style which a fair education and European travel had formed in the boy. He was silent as to his past, and one day disappeared as suddenly as he had made his entrance into the town of Worcester. It was only known that he had written "to his father," telling him that he had worked earnestly. The result was a return to his father's house, a fine old homestead in his family for two hundred years, in which he still resides when "at home." His father now set up the youth of seventeen as proprietor and editor of a paper, from which he graduated into the Legation of Mr. Hilliard, United States Minister to Belgium.

Ben is of an inquiring disposition, and one of his first adventures was to walk to Venice, zig-zagging through Switzerland, Lombardy and Tyrol. Taking up his residence in Paris, he was appointed agent of the Massachusetts Historical Society to transcribe the documents in the Marine and Colonial departments relative to the history of his State. In 1845 he was appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts as Historical Agent of the State for the same purpose. In 1847 he returned, and the secretary's office contains the evidences of his zeal, industry and research in the possession of ten large folio volumes of transcribed documents, and two volumes of maps.

Writing of his early days, Major Poore gives a graphic contrast between the feelings of the printer's boy and the diplomatic attaché. He says he entered a printing office a spoiled "eldest son," who had devoted more attention to Shetland ponies and a juvenile infantry company, than to his books. "It used to be rather hard to wash rollers and bring wood, but we had a pretty good time after all. A piece of warm gingerbread, the regular donation of the subscribers at a baker's shop when there paper was handed in to them early in the morning, had far more relish than the sumptuous banquets tasted at royal entertainments within five years afterwards. The heart of the ill-clad running newspaper carrier was lighter and merrier than when it was afterwards encased in an old embroidered diplomatic coat." In token of appreciation for this exercise of his talents abroad, the Committee of the Legislature recommended that his salary be doubled. He came home quite a savant, having pursued his travels quite extensively in Palestine, Egypt, Greece and Asia Minor, as well as through the chief countries of Europe, with cultivated taste, picking up many valuables in his peregrinations. In 1849 he published a life of Louis Philippe, which is well spoken of, and has since been one of the most versatile and ingenious journalists of the day. He has likewise given much study to agricultural subjects; is Secretary to the United States Agricultural Society, and the able editor of the Quarterly Report issued by it.

From his youth he has been given to the charms of military pageantry. As he grew into manhood his love for it increased, and since his return from Europe, he has been identified with some of the very best military organizations of his State. He has served in the Legislature; has run for Congress; is a Thirty-third degree in Masonry, and is now in the field as Major of the 38th Massachusetts, where his ability, attention to business, military knowledge and various accomplishments qualify him to be a distinguished and popular officer. He will no doubt command as much respect from his brother officers as he has from his brother journalists.

GEN. NEGLEY'S BRIGADE STEAMING DOWN THE THE OHIO,

On their Way to Kentucky.

One of the most striking scenes during the war was the recent passage down the Ohio of General Negley's Brigade, consisting of the following regiments, all of Pennsylvania: 77th, Col. Hambright; 78th, Col. Stambrough; 79th, Col. Sewall. These were despatched in six river steamers to reinforce the National army in Kentucky, as there is now every probability of the rebels making that State a camping ground for the winter, if not driven out by our troops.

WAR NEWS.

Disbanding of Rebels in Missouri.

On the 27th of October Gen. Henderson, of the Missouri State Militia, marched on a body of rebels assembled at Dyer's Mills, near Concord. Before reaching them he was met by a flag of truce, and a proposition to lay down their arms and disperse, provided they would not be arrested or otherwise molested afterwards. Gen. Henderson acceded to the proposition. The rebels numbered upwards [illegible]

Skirmish in Kentucky.

From Cairo it is reported that a scouting party of 30 of the Illinois 28th engaged a party of rebel infantry and cavalry, 13 miles below Cairo, on the 26th of October, totally routing the enemy. Three companies of the Illinois 9th, on the same day, engaged 100 rebel cavalry at Saratoga, Ky., defeating them, and killing 13 and capturing 24.

The Battle of Springfield, Mo.

The loss on the part of Gen. Fremont's body guard of 150 men under Col. Zagoni, in their recent charge upon the rebels at Springfield, 2,000 strong, was 15 killed, 23 wounded, and 26 missing; the enemy lost 50 or 60 killed, and 40 or 50 wounded. If additional proof were necessary to establish the bravery of this handful of men who attacked so large a body of rebels, this statement would furnish it.

The Capture of Romney.

We learn from a Wheeling paper that Gen. Kelly, who took Romney recently, captured 400 or 500 prisoners, 200 horses, 3 wagon loads of new rifles, 3 cannon, and a great quantity of provisions and forage. He holds the place with 2,500 men.

The Fight at Camp Wild Cat, Ky.

The affair at Camp Wild Cat, Ky., on the 21st of October, proves to have been much more important than was at first supposed. The rebels numbered 6,000 infantry and 600 cavalry, chiefly Tennesseeans, under Gen. Zollicoffer. The National forces comprised Col. Garrard's Kentucky regiment, and the Ohio 17th and 33d Indiana regiments, under Gen. Shoepff. Two attacks were made on the National defences, which were repelled with terrible loss to the assailants, who were in turn attacked and put to flight, leaving their dead and wounded on the field. Their retreat finally became a rout, which was followed up with deadly effect by the Kentucky sharpshooters. A correspondent of the Herald describes it as follows: "Early on Tuesday morning the rebels began their retreat, closely followed by the National troops. The news of the battle had spread throughout the country, and the sturdy farmers roused themselves to keep their promise to Col. Garrard. 'You start 'em,' they said to him, 'and we'll keep 'em going.' Up to Friday night, the date of the letter giving this information, the news of the retreating army had come in all of one character, and detailing its utter destruction. The farmers had gathered along the road, to engage in their favorite pastime, which they describe as 'shooting crows on the wing.' From behind every bush and hill and tree and rock they were firing on the retreating rebels. The execution they have done cannot but be terrible. The letter indicated says the loss of the rebels in the retreat to Barboursville must have been fully 1,000 men. Two pieces of artillery and all their camp furniture, extra clothing, many weapons, knapsacks, &c., were left behind in the precipitate flight, while the road by which they retreated is strewn with the same articles and their dead. The immediate field of the battle was literally strewn with their dead, whom they did not attempt to carry off and did not remain to bury. The total loss of the rebels in the battle and retreat will reach 1,200 or 1,500 men. Among those be not surprised to hear the name of Gen. Zollicoffer."

PERSONAL.

Miss Wagner, who has her studio at No. 131 Ninth Avenue, unquestionably stands at the head of her art as a Miniature Painter in America. Her natural abilities have been improved and matured, not less by long practice than by patient and careful study abroad, until, as we have said, she has attained the head of her delicate and microscopic art. A visit to her studio will amply repay the lovers of truth and beauty in painting.

The Count de Sayre, lineal descendant of Count Rochambeau, of American Revolutionary fame, has tendered his military services to the President, and has been assured that they will be accepted. The same answer has been given to the Baron de Schonen, descendant of General Lafayette. It is expected they will soon reach the United States.

Miss Isabella Hinkley, our indigenous prima donna, was married to Signor Susini, on the morning of October 30th. She left with her husband, on the same day, for Baltimore, to fill a professional engagement.

Joey Gougenheim, a well-known and popular actress, has refused to play at a San Francisco theatre on Sunday nights. She publishes a card, in which she says: "I would rather be, as I am, deprived of my engagement—which was averaging $770 a night (gross receipts!)—than to act in violation of the law and my own convictions of right."

Gen. Leslie Coombs is now stumping Kentucky, making stirring, eloquent speeches to the loyal inhabitants. He will speak daily until the 10th November, when his official duties demand his presence in Frankfort.

Madame C. Mears Burkhardt's first reception of the season, in Madison Avenue, came off on Tuesday evening last, and her spacious drawing-rooms were crowded with the élite of the city, and many distinguished foreign notabilities. The instrumental and vocal music was very fine. Mr. Perrino sang a couple of English ballads with characteristic feeling and great effect, and two of Madame Burkhardt's pupils acquitted themselves with equal credit to their own musical abilities, and the skill and attention of their instructors.

John Brown, Jr., has one hundred men under his command at Cleveland, Ohio, intended for service, as sharpshooters in the 3rd Kansas regiment. George G. Hoyt, the young Massachusetts lawyer, who went to Virginia to defend old John Brown, is second Lieutenant in the company.

Miss Ada Phillips, of New York, under the Italianized name of Filippi, has obtained a two months' engagement at the Italian Opera of Paris. It is thought by those who have heard her that she will succeed.

A letter from Louisville to the Cincinnati Times says: "A Nashville paper, of the 10th, announces the death of Sam Houston on the 8th inst., in Texas. He should have died before he wrote his last letter, or lived to see our glorious Union once more restored."

It is stated that Col. Mulligan, who commanded at Lexington, is at liberty through an exchange of prisoners. It will be remembered that he refused to accept his liberty with his command, on parole not to serve again during the war.

Gen. Charles F. Havelock, late of the British army, and brother of the Gen. Havelock whose name is associated with the East Indian rebellion, it is rumored, intends offering his services to our Government in the present crisis.

We see it announced that Mr. J. M. Sanderson, the American Soyer, has been made Brigade-Commissary by Gen. Wadsworth. We congratulate the brigade on their good fortune. The only reason we can imagine why Mr. Sanderson's services were not earlier secured by the Government is, that they would have been invaluable, and, consequently, obnoxious to red-tapeism.

BOOK NOTICES.

Eighty Years of Progress of the United States, showing the various channels of Industry and Education through which the People of the United States have risen from a British Colony to their present National importance; giving, in a historical form, the vast improvements made in Agriculture, Commerce and Trade, Banking, Insurance, Manufacturing, Mining Interests, Modes of Travel, etc., with a large amount of Statistical Information, etc., illustrated by over 220 engravings. By Eminent Literary Men, who have made the subjects of which they have written their special study. L. Stebbins, 51 John street, 2 Vols., 8vo.

Such is the comprehensive title of a couple of elegantly printed volumes, which cover a very wide range of subjects of special American interest. Mr. Thomas P. Kettell, than whom no man is more competent, contributes the article on Commerce and Trade; Prof. McCay, late of Columbia College, S. C., the paper on Cotton, Henry Barnard, LL.D., whose whole life has been dedicated to the subject, that on Education; our townsman, T. Addison Richards, the Arts of Design; and Mr. James T. Hodge an elaborate review of the Mining Industry and Fur Trade of the United States. The work is, in fact, an industrial and statistical history of the country since the independence, encyclopedic in character and arrangement, but yet sufficiently complete for every practical purpose. It may be regarded as an epitome of the publication of the Census and the Patent Office, and of the proceedings of our Industrial Societies, compact in form, convenient for reference, and deserving a place in the hands of every reading and reflecting man in the country.

Life and Adventure in the South Pacific. By a Roving Printer. Harper & Brothers, New York, 12*mo., pp.* 354.

Sea adventures, as well as sea tales, have a perennial charm, particularly to landsmen, to whose experiences they bear the strongest contrasts. The ocean storm has more of the elements of sublimity than the tempest on land, and we read of it in a spirit more awed and hushed than of any terrestial phenomenon, the earthquake perhaps excepted. The varied climates through which the sea-traveller passes, and the lands and peoples which he visits so rapidly, interest us from their quick succession and contrasts, and lend a charm and vivacity to his narrative. By all this we mean to say, that books like that before us are always interesting to the reading public. This is specially so, not alone because it relates to a portion of the globe but little traversed and imperfectly known, but because of the simplicity and clearness of its composition, which is singularly free from attempts at rhetoric, or what is familiarly known as "high-falutin." It relates the experiences of a whale ship in the Southern Ocean, the modes of hunting, capturing, and utilizing "the leviathan," and the incidents connected with furtive visits to the Polynesian Islands, with illustrations of the character and habits of their people. It reads more like the narratives of Cook and the early voyagers than the "sensational" relations of modern adventure, and in this respect, as well as in variety of incident, has a charm which must commend it to public appreciation.

THEATRICAL.

All the theatres are pursuing their even course. At Laura Keene's the "Seven Sons" still holds its own, considerably expurgated...... The Winter Garden, which has been running "The Octoroon" with great success for two or three weeks, is obliged to withdraw it for the present, and substitute some novelty, in consequence of a previous engagement of Mr. J. S. Clarke, in Philadelphia. We cannot doubt that the new piece, which is said to be of a very effective character, will preserve the high attractions of this popular theatre.......The "Angel of Midnight" continues to draw delighted audiences, day and night, at Barnum's Museum.......Messrs. Mason and Thomas gave their first soirée concert at Dodworth's Hall on the 5th, to a large and select audience.......A short season of opera is anticipated, "by the consolidated artists," to commence on the 8th prox. Nous verrons!......The Old Bowery Theatre, under the management of Mr. Stickney, is catering very successfully for the popular taste. Ella Zoyara is performing some of her most admired feats; and De Lave, the rival of Blondin, walks the rope as "though it were his native element." The Stickney family is likewise very clever.

PERENNIAL COTTON TREE.

We have received a small consignment of this seed, which we offer at 50 cts. per pkt.

"Dr. E. G. KENDALL, the well known Agriculturist of the Cotton Tree in Maryland from most benefit from Southern Cuba, writes that the plant flourishes in that it can be protected from frost during the first winter of its growth.

A specimen of the Cotton Tree can be seen at the office of the Editor of Scientific Department of the Tribune, and to see it and obtain seed.

As the Perennial Tree the Perennial Cotton has for equal; its growth is compared to the willow; foliage those still resembled to the Silver Maple; flowers and fruit similar to the Upland Cotton.

The seed can be obtained at all seedsmen's, and by principal druggists, at our warehouse. A Pamphlet by Mr. Kendall is in press, and will shortly be for sale by us, demonstrating the importance of the introduction of this tree as a field of culture to the Southern States of the American Confederacy.

TOPOGRAPHICAL MAP

OF THE

STATE OF VIRGINIA.

Used by Gen. Scott.

Published by order of the Legislature of that State, from actual surveys made of each County at a cost of more than ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS and TWENTY YEARS TIME. The Map is the size of Lloyd's Southern States Map, four feet square, and is the neatly and good size ever made in America. On this Map of Virginia is shown

EVERY MOUNTAIN, EVERY RIDGE, EVERY WAGON AND STAGE ROAD, EVERY CANAL, EVERY NATURAL CURIOSITY, EVERY CREEK AND RIVER,

AND THE NAMES OF TIMES, EVERY COUNTY SEAT, EVERY TOWN, EVERY VILLAGE, AND EVERY POST TOWN,

EVERY MOUNTAIN PASS AND EVERY FORD

It marked down, and the altitude of the Mountains, every Lighthouse on the Potomac, and every Inlet and Island are shown, and the Bays and Shoals, every Fort, Battery and Signal Light is carefully shown.

Every Railroad and every Station on the Railroads, and the distances from Station to Station, are laid down from official authority.

The Map is engraved on Steel,

AND IS THE ONLY REAL VALUABLE MAP EVER MADE IN AMERICA.

ITS HISTORY.

The State of Virginia commenced this Map in 1780, and completed it in 1808. It was afterwards corrected up to 1850, and taken to the Government Engraver at Washington City to be engraved. It was just finished when the State of Virginia seceded from the Union. The Governor of that State sent to Washington and had the plates, and took them to Richmond. They only five hundred copies had been struck off by the engraver. Those Maps are now in my possession, except one which GEN. SCOTT sent to his country, and another which the Tribune Editors have.

ANY ONE ORDERING THIS MAP, AND NOT SATISFIED WITH IT, CAN HAVE THEIR MONEY REFUNDED.

Price per Copy, $1; or, 10 Copies for $5.

Price, mounted on linen, with rollers, and varnished ready, to be pocket cases, for the use of any officers and travellers, $2. The mounted edition must be sent by express, the others can be sent anywhere by mail.
