

Back . v. 27 no. 1 + musical supple.

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2011 with funding from Boston Public Library

~~RECEIVED~~ MUSIC
Return volume, when bound, to _____

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
BINDING INSTRUCTIONS

Author _____
Title DWIGHTS
JOURNAL OF MUSIC

Volume 27 + 28
Number _____ Part _____
Year 1869
Call No. 4040.220

SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS

Volume incomplete. Bind with stub
PLEASE REBIND

Volume incomplete. Bind without stub
Color RED - MUSIC

11-16-33

PLEASE EXPEDITE

D W I G H T ' S

21040-52
12/1

JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

VOLS. XXVII AND XXVIII.

BOSTON:

PUBLISHED BY OLIVER DITSON AND COMPANY, 277 WASHINGTON STREET.

1869.

Periodical

4040

, 220

vol 27-28

1867-1869

INDEX.

Abert : his "Astorga" and other works. 112
 About Fugues. 70, 79, 113
 Adams, C. R., the American Tenor, in Germany. 95
 Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein, the, at Meiningen. 115
 A Man of the Time: H. F. Chorley. Orchestra. 298
 Amateur Vocalists : a Rehearsal with. From the German. 100
 American Musical Fund Society, Annual Meeting. 263
 A Musical "Doppelgänger" or Fetch. Loud. Mus. World. 307
 A Musical Wanderer : L. Böhner. 125
 Andrew, John A. Memorial Services in honor of, at Boston Music Hall. 149
 Artistic Instruction : Nature and Object of. From Marx. 86, 89
 Auber, at eighty-six, 106, 220; his last opera, "Le Premier Jour de Bonheur," 211; his works. 252
 Bach, J. S. : his Works, by Hilgenfeldt, 3, 26, 34, 147; Portraits of, 147; his Christmas Oratorio, 405; his "Passion Music" in Paris, 249; how Mendelssohn brought it out in Leipzig, 386; Mass in B minor, 364; Teccata in F, 14, 206; Cantatas, 30; Arias, 30, 151, 167, 366, 375; Triple Concerto, 30; Orchestral Suite in D, 74; Chorals, 79, 150; Magnificat, described by Robert Franz, 94, 102, 110, 118, 126; Minuets, Gavottes, Sarabands, &c. 230, 255
 Bains, Abbate : Hiller's reminiscences of. 99
 Barnett, John Francis : his Cantata on Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" 108, 181
 Baton, The. Loud. Orchestra, 9; do. 323
 Bavarian Sitting, The : Wagner and the King. Tomahawk. 155
 Beethoven : his Biographers, 177, 182, 185; Thayer's Life of, reviewed 1, 9; Extracts from 33, 41, 49; Nobl's "Youth of B.," reviewed, 177, 185; his Letters, according to Nobl, reviewed, 266, 273; B. and Baroness Erman, 292; his 9th Symphony (Wagner), 3; do. (J. S. D.), 5, 6, 22, 253; do. (Schumann), 331; do., 243, 244, 252; Heroic Symphony, 15, 351; 2nd do., in D, 374; 5th Symphony, 150; 7th do., 218, 219; 8th do., 390; Quartets, "Rasounowsky," 204, 222, 382; last do., 415; Sonatas, in C-sharp minor (Berlioz), 66, (E. E. N.), 233; in A flat, op. 26, (by A. Kiehlbeck), 226; in A flat, op. 110; Sonatas (piano and cello), 215; Trios, 414; Violin Concerto, 382; Triple Concerto, 206; Piano Concertos, 166, 182, 398; Overtures : "Weihe des Hauses," 126, 142, 351, 414; to "Coriolanus," 190, 366; to "Prometheus," 380, 398; Missa Solemnis, in D. 378
 Bennett, W. Sterndale : his "Woman of Samaria," 107; Overture, "The Naiads," 206; do. "The Wood Nymph," 379
 Berlin, Musical Institutions of. 194, 201, 209
 Berlioz, Hector : Extracts from, 66; his Overture to "Waverley" (Schumann), 11; his Requiem, 302; "Sinfonie Fantastique," 313; "L'Enfance du Christ" 405
 Böhner, Louis 125
 Bonn, Music in, during the Last Century. (J. W. Flayser). 1
 Boston : the musical year (ending May, 1867), 38, 46; Musical prospect (1868-9), 310; Music in its Public Schools. 11, 43, 46, 78, 183
 Boston Common : Music on. 287, 301
 Boston Music Hall Association : Annual Meetings. 60, 87, 263
 Boston Music Hall, Sculptures for, presented by Miss Cushman. (J. S. D. in the Atlantic Monthly). 210
 Brass Bands. 286
 Catholicity of Music, The. J. S. D. 279
 Celtic Music. By W. S. B. Mathews. 169
 Cheap Music. Loud. Orchestra. 123
 Cherubini : his Overture to "Mœda," 151, 390; to "Anacreon," 198; his "Mœda," (Loud. Times). 299
 Chinese, The : their musical capabilities. 20, 28
 Chorley, H. F. Orchestra. 298
 Choron : Anecdote of, by Jules Janin. 80
 Christmas Music. Once a Week. 405
 Church versus Stage. G. W. Tryon, Jr. 354
 Composing for the Voice. By Mme. Seiler. . . . 212
 Concertos for the Piano. Schumann. 58, 330
CONCERTS IN BOSTON :
 B. J. Lang : Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," (posth.) 215
 Boston Choral Union. 270
 Boston Conservatory. 23, 31, 127, 271, 343
 Camilla Ives. 7, 391
 Carlyle Petersilea : "Schumann Solos" 3
 Complimentary to Robert Franz 3
 Ernst Perabo. 15, 23, 31

Gazzaniga, De Meyer, Listemann. 215
 Great Organ. 29, 111, 819
 Handel & Haydn Society : Easter Oratorios (Rossini's "Stabat," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Elijah"), 23; "Samson," "As the Hart pants," &c. 151; "Messiah," 166, 275; "Moses in Egypt," and "Elijah," 191, 206; Triennial Festival (1868), 223, 228, 242, 245, 273, 292; Season of 1868-9, 311; "Judith Maccabæus," &c. 324, 350; "Elijah" 379
 Harvard College : Puerian Sodality and Glee Club. . . . 391
 Harvard Musical Association : Symphony Concerts, 14; for the Orchestra ("Choral Symphony"), 6; for the Cretons, 22;—Third Season, 111, 126, 134, 142, 151, 158, 166, 174, 182, 190, 198, 206; Complimentary to Carl Zerkahn, 214; for the Cretons, 223, 230;—Fourth Season. 310, 324, 343, 350, 378, 386, 374, 382, 390, 398, 406, 407, 414
 Leopold de Meyer. 118
 Memorial Services in honor of Gov. Andrew. 149
 Mendelssohn Quintette Club. 7, 111, 119, 187, 174, 191, 206, 222, 32, 290, 407, 415
 Miss Addie S. Ryan. 7, 15
 Miss Adelaide Phillips. 267
 Miss Abbe Topp, 232; do. at Brookline. 263
 Miss Kellogg. 351
 Miss M. A. Mackie, Complimentary. 233
 Miss S. W. Barton. 270
 Mr. C. Henshaw Smith. 39
 Mr. Liebling's Quartette, "The Two Cadis," with Concert, for the Cretons. 27
 Mr. G. F. Hall, Complimentary. 15
 Mr. J. Falkenstein : Catholic Music. 119
 Mr. Listemann's Quartet Matinees. 30, 47, 114
 Mr. Oscar Pfeiffer. 47
 Mr. Parker's Club of Amateurs, 31, 167, 231, 282; Trio Solos. 17, 414
 Mr. Beck's Annual Concert, 29, 222; Sacred. 127
 Mrs. F. E. Curv (Barry). 275, 343
 Mile, de la Motte and her pupils. 15
 New England Conservatory. 7, 15, 21, 27, 37, 373
 Oe Bull. 10, 226
 On the Common. 257
 Orchestral Union. 7, 15, 23, 171, 183, 191, 199, 206
 Orpheus Musical Society. 55, 134, 147
 Otto Dresel's Piano Readings. 215, 222, 3, 4, 247
 Parepa-Rosa, Mme. 111, 14, 143
 Public School Children. 78, 188, 27
 Pupils of the Institution for the Blind. 274
 Sinfonia Filomena. 319, 32, 342
 Wolf Press, Complimentary to. 27, 21
CORRESPONDENCE :
 Berlin, Prussia. 47
 Bre. Klyn, N. Y. 21
 Chicago. 141, 181, 22, 235
 One month. 132, 342, 357
 Farmington, Conn. 132
 Florence, Italy. 132
 Gloucester, England. 132
 Hartford, Conn. 132
 London. 22
 Nazareth, Pa. 132
 Newburyport, Mass. 132
 New York, Conn. 132
 New Orleans. 132
 New York. 132, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000

German Critic, a, on Musical Critics. Loud.
Musical World. 257
 German Singing Clubs in New York. 36
 Germany, Theatres in, 42; in cheerful Sabbath, 83; Concerts at the Spas. 308
 Goldschmidt, Otto : his Oratorio "Ruth," 109
 Gounod, Charles : his "Roméo and Juliet," (Loud. Review), 37; do., 38, 81, 86, 153, 159; his Career, (Once a Week). 124
 Gregorian Music : its Original Source. (Loud. Choir). 131
 Handel & Haydn Society, Annual Meetings. 47, 51, 263
 Handel, as an Oratorio Writer. (E. Newman). . . . 179
 Handel, his "Judith Maccabæus," (By Fred. Heller), 74; "Samson," 246; his MS. scores, 261; his Fir work music, 272; "Israel in Egypt," 275; Autograph Score of his "Messiah" photographed. 309, 312, 323
 Harpsichord and Piano. Pauer's Historical Concerts. 164
 Harvard Musical Association, Annual Meeting. . . . 184
 Harvard University, Music at Commencement. . . . 79
 Haunts of Harmony in London. Once a Week. . . . 10, 19, 26
 Hauptmann, Moritz : his death, 183, 187; Ferd. Hiller's Tribute to. 217
 Haydn : his Symphonies, 158, 190, 304, 358, 367, 374, 390, 406
 Haydn and Hans Sachs. 307
 Helmholtz, H. : his Theory of Sound, the Voice, &c. explained by Laugel, 337, 345, 353, 369, 377
 Her Majesty's Theatre, destroyed by fire. 164
 Hesse, E. C. : his Saeks, Anecdote of. 307
 Hiller, Ferdinand : Musical Letters by, 73, 82, 90; Three Evenings with (from the Garten), 97; his reminiscences of the Abbate Bini, 99; his tribute to Hauptmann, 217; do. to Rossini, 378; His Chat with Rossini, 379, 386, 394, 402
HINTS FOR YOUNG OPERA COMPOSERS, FROM THE
 S. 321, 329
 Holland, Musical doings in. 324
 "Individual Speculation" in Musical Art. 54
 Joachim, Joseph : a Picture of, 104; in London, 24; his Hungarian Concerto, played in Boston, 367; as a leader in Quartets. 406
 Karolmeister, A. of the Seventeenth Century, 145, 153
 Keller, Clara Louise, in London, 140; in New York, 397; in Boston. 351
 Kiehlbeck, Franz : O Quary. 96
 Kleptomaniacal Choir Boys. I. H. O. Testa. 146
 Laelmer, Franz : his Orchestral Suite in E minor. 141, 199
 Laugel, Auguste : translations from his "La Voix, l'Oreille et la Musique," 247, 245, 238, 309, 377
 "Lauliger Horatius" : its authorship. 322, 356
 Leipzig : its new Opera House, 312; Gewandhaus Concerts. 343, 373, 412
 Listemann, Bernhard : his violin playing, 367; Quartet matinees. (See Concerts).
 Liszt, Franz : his Sibon, 284; Bravura Studies; L. at Leipzig (Schumann), 12; a visit to Rome, 91; his Symphony-Poems, 116; his "St. Elizabeth," 116; his Oratorio of "Christ," 133; Concerto in E flat, 162; "Fifteenth Psalm," 305; his title of Abbe, 408
 London : its Musical Halls, 10; (See Haunts of Harmony), 115; P. Harmonic Society, 52; its Street Music. 315
 Macfarlane, G. A., his Christmas Concert. 495
 Madrigals, in New York, 394; do. (by G. W. Childs). 499
 Marx, J. B. : Translations from. 86, 89
 Mellon, Alfred : Death of. 21
 Mendelssohn : Reminiscences of, by Prof. J. C. Lobe, 17; do. by E. Devrient, 385, 386, 393, 401; Posthumous works, 32, 133, 154; Letters to Bärmann, 234, 241, 250, 258, 266; M. and Meyerbeer (by Schumann), 50; Letter to Baroness Erman, 292; his Organ Concerto for the Bach Monument, 374; how he brought out Bach's Passion in Leipzig, 386; his "Mereestill" Overture, 15; "Melina," do., 190; "Trumpet" Overture, 213; "St. Paul" (Schumann), 51; do., 253; "Son and Stranger" (H. Hunkler aus der Fremde"), 222; 95th Psalm, 245; Piano Concertos (Schumann), 59, 190; Hymn of Praise, 246; Reformation Symphony, 154, 162, 207, 205, 262, 354, 378; 8th Book of Songs without Words, 153, 156, 215; Otto. 206
 Meyerbeer : his "La Jeunesse de Goethe," 314
 Meyerbeer's "Inspirations," 318
 Military Bands : Contest of at the French Exposition. 84
 Modelles, U. : his Concertos, 18. 159, 330
 Musical Light. 192

Mozart, his "L'Oca del Cairo," in Paris, 61, 129; "Jupiter" Symphony, (Ombraheff), 121; do., 136, 142; Symphony in D, 190; Concerto for two pianos, 151, 374; Quintet in B flat, 174; Letter of M. about the Requiem..... 328
Mrs. and Miss Hog, at the Philharmonic (N.Y.) Eve Post 192
Musicians' Letters: Nohl's Collection..... 138, 139, 162, 233, 241, 258, 265, 266, 273
Music: in Bonn, during Beethoven's Youth. (A. W. Thayer), 1; at the French Exhibition, 21, 38, 53, 64, 69, 84; in Vienna in 1793, from Thayer's Life of Beethoven, 33, 41, 49; in a French Country Church, (Mrs. Sartoris), 104; in Public Schools, Boston, 43, 46, 255; in Spain, 286; among the Blind, 254; at the Central Park, 260; in Motley: Offenbach Orchestra 159
Musical Form. W. S. B. Mathews 66
Musical Festivals: Mr. Harrison's in New York, 54, 64, 255; in Aix-la-Chapelle, 61; Handel Triennial at Crystal Palace, 269, 271, 274, 279; of the Lower Rhine, 72, 268; do. by P. Hiller, 73, 82, 90; at Meiningen, 94, 116; at Hereford, 101; Boston Handel & Haydn Society, triennial, 223, 238, 243, 245, 251, 253, 259, 262, 263; Sängerkunst at Chicago, 268; Congress of Artists at Altenburg, 280, 302, 303, 313, 322; at Gloucester, England, 324; at Schwerin..... 338
Musical Institutes, Conservatories, &c. Leipzig, 45; Paris, 93; in New York and Boston, 103, 127, 270
Musical Library in Philadelphia, (Mr. Drexel's) 392
Musical Conventions, in Burlington, Vt., 96; Worcester..... 340
Musical Novelists, A word to. Pall Mall Gaz. 341
Musical Fancies. Lond. Review 131
Music, the Catholicity of. J. S. D. 278; as a part of Education..... 346
MUSIC IN VOL. XXVII:
No. 2--11. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," concluded, 145--184 12--26. "Songs without Words"..... 1--62
MUSIC IN VOL. XXVIII:
No. 1--17. Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," Concluded..... 63--128
18--26. Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm: "Come, let us Sing"..... 1--36
MUSIC ABROAD: (See also CORRESPONDENCE.)
Aix-la-Chapelle..... 61, 72, 73, 82, 90, 221
Altenburg..... 280, 302, 303, 313, 322
Amsterdam..... 157, 221, 245, 252, 324
Angsburg..... 62
Baden-Baden..... 77, 272, 294, 320
Berlin..... 22, 38, 70, 117, 133, 148, 165, 193, 201, 209, 213, 341, 407
Bremen..... 245, 262
Breslau..... 294
Brussels..... 56
Buda..... 70
Buenos Ayres..... 304
Carmarthen, Wales..... 128
Cologne..... 140, 148, 157, 165, 245, 268, 272, 293, 344, 381
Copenhagen..... 165, 262
Darmstadt..... 78
Dessau..... 381
Dresden..... 54, 77, 118, 334, 344, 381, 413
Düsseldorf..... 413
Elberfeld..... 221
Florence..... 62, 93, 100, 215, 272, 284
Frankfurt..... 132, 327, 364, 413
Gloucester..... 324
Gotha..... 70
Halle..... 70, 205
Hamburg..... 245, 381
Hereford, England..... 101
Biregsham, "..... 107, 169
Hildesheim..... 70
Innsbruck..... 294
Konigsberg..... 292
Lausanne..... 62
Leipzig 22, 29, 45, 70, 132, 148, 157, 165, 168, 183, 187, 205, 221, 237, 242, 272, 279, 312, 320, 344, 349, 373, 406, 412
London..... 2, 3, 10, 13, 19, 20, 23, 26, 29, 38, 52, 56, 59, 61, 64, 68, 76, 78, 86, 91, 115, 117, 140, 149, 156, 162, 164, 165, 171, 181, 193, 200, 204, 213, 220, 235, 237, 242, 244, 261, 269, 271, 274, 279, 280, 285, 293, 300, 315, 320, 249, 364, 370, 372, 380, 388, 397, 406, 413
Manheim..... 221, 320
Meyence..... 62
Meiningen..... 94, 115
Milan..... 117, 214, 262
Munich..... 62, 133, 140, 148, 214, 245, 262, 272, 279, 281, 285, 291, 294, 344, 381, 398, 413
Naples..... 93, 117
Paris..... 14, 21, 32, 37, 53, 61, 64, 69, 77, 80, 84, 88, 93, 103, 117, 129, 133, 139, 149, 156, 205, 211, 221, 249, 259, 262, 293, 320, 328, 371, 378, 409, 416
Posth..... 77, 294
Prague..... 140, 328
Rome..... 163
Schwerin..... 262, 327, 398, 413
Sonderhausen..... 62
St. Petersburg..... 211, 320
Stuttgart..... 294, 413
Um..... 140
Venice..... 62
Vienna..... 22, 95, 117, 133, 148, 157, 344, 415
Wienmar..... 77, 94, 140
Wiesbaden..... 95
Worms..... 183, 262
Zurich..... 94

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE: (See also CORRESPONDENCE.)
Baltimore..... 302, 351, 350
Bangor, Me..... 32
Brookline, Mass..... 245, 308
Brooklyn, N. Y..... 181
Buffalo, N. Y..... 330
Burlington, Vt..... 93
Cambridge, Mass..... 79
Charlestown, Mass..... 352
Chicago..... 220, 261, 288
Cincinnati..... 264
Cleveland, O..... 325, 368
Farmington, Conn..... 16, 71, 393
Hartford, Conn..... 64, 240
Keene, N. H..... 88
Milton, Mass..... 111, 325
Milwaukee..... 64, 135, 176
Mobile..... 264
New Haven..... 160, 176
New London, Conn..... 32
New York..... 15, 31, 36, 64, 112, 120, 127, 136, 143, 180, 181, 192, 190, 207, 224, 255, 260, 280, 288, 312, 316, 319, 333, 344, 352, 360, 391, 403, 415
Newport, R. I..... 103, 303
Northampton, Mass..... 71
Philadelphia..... 8, 16, 48, 103, 125, 136, 144, 160, 290, 245, 320, 335, 343, 351, 360, 391
Poughkeepsie, N. Y..... 168, 224, 264, 271, 368
Providence..... 55
Salem, Mass..... 29
St. Louis..... 120, 207, 264
Washington, D. C..... 247
Worcester, Mass..... 16, 160, 224, 244, 308
Neruda-Normann, Mme., the Swedish Violinist. 221
New Choral Society in New York..... 316
Nilsson, Mlle. Christine..... 61, 67, 261
Noble Singers at Exeter Hall..... 76
Nohl, Ludwig: his "Youth of Beethoven" reviewed (Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung), 177, 182, 185; his Collection of Beethoven's Letters, reviewed..... 265, 273
Offenbach, Jacques, and his burlesque operas, 132, 180, 188, 248, 288, 291, 308, 399; "La Grande Duchesse," &c., in Boston, 174, 191; "Robinson Crusoe," 180; "Chateau de Toto,"..... 259
Offenbach Madness, the. (Philad. Bulletin)..... 317
Opera House (New) in Paris, its decorations..... 139
Opera in Boston. Italian, Strakosch Troupe, (Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Miss Philipps, Brignoli, Susini, Fortuna, &c.), 23; Lagrange-Brignoli troupe, 151; Marezek's do., (Parepa-Rosa, Hauck, Bellini, Ronconi, Baraglia, Pancani, &c.), 759; Eichberg's Operetta "The Two Cadis"..... 207
Opera in Philadelphia. German, (Johannsen, Frederici, Rotter, Rimmer, Habelmann, Hiermanns, W. Fornes, &c.), 48; English, 144—in New York, 103, 144, 352; French Opera in New Orleans, 197; Italian, in St. Petersburg, &c..... 211
Oratorio. A Contribution to its History, by E. Naumann..... 146, 154, 163, 170, 179
Organs at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, 39; in Chicago, 68, 220; Great Reed Organ by Mason & Hamlin, 48; Mr. Buck's in Hartford, 64; at Elizabeth, N. J..... 127
Orphéonistes, in Paris..... 80, 133, 156
Pacini, Giovanni: Death of..... 160, 188
Parlor Concerts in Philadelphia..... 365
Patti, Adelina: her Career. (Pall Mall Gaz.) 300; her marriage..... 301
Papendick, George. Obituary..... 79
Persiani, Fanny Tacchinardi: Death of..... 54
Petrella: his "Carnival of Venice"..... 16
Pfeiffer, Oscar, the pianist..... 407
Pitch, The, in Music. Letter of Sims Reeves, 372; do. of Heri Manns, 396; do. of J. Barnby, 396; further discussed..... 404
Pleyel, Mme: her piano playing. (Schumann)..... 330
Piano-Fortes: American, at the French Exhibition, 63, 88, 159; Mr. Trastour's "Piano-Automaton," 130; Mr. Lang's Lecture on..... 136
Programme Music. Schumann 17
POETRY:
"Beside a Streamlet" Fanny Raymond Ritter..... 1
Hymn to Joy, from Schiller. J. S. D..... 4
G. L. S., by J. G. Whittier. Atlantic Monthly 41
Othello at the Botton Theatre, May 18, 1807. E. J. C. Advertiser 43
June Roses..... 57
The Lake of the Lilies. Fanny Raymond Ritter..... 49
Pygmalion's Statue. J. R. London Spectator 59
Tygodals Bestaet. (In memory of G. Papendick). W. 81
Crete. B. V. A..... 89
Mendelssohn Chas. L. Gumpert Sund Dispatch . (Philad.)..... 105
To a Portrait of my Mother at the Harp. J. T. Sargent..... 97
The Castilian Prisoner. Fanny R. Ritter..... 129
Draping the Flag (Death of John A. Andrew). W. Transcript 134
Two Words Aug 12, 1865..... 137
"I stood before his silent grave" (Tribute to J. A. Andrew) Julia Ward Howe..... 150
"What God does, surely is well done." German Hymn. J. S. D..... 150
Song: "I do confess that thou art coy"..... 161

An Incantation Scene. Commercial Bulletin 211
Long-Flow On his sailing for Europe. O. W. Holmes Advertiser 249
Unspoken. A. A. C..... 257
The Footsteps of Song. Julia Ward Howe..... 276
Translations from Ulund: "Death Song," "Song of Absence," "The Vale of Rest," "Morning Song." W. 297
The Music of the Spheres..... 313
Lauriger Horatius..... 322
The Nineteenth Century. C. P. Cranch. Atlantic Almanac 320
Merle and Maiden. Paraphrase. Fanny R. Ritter..... 355
Quartet Playing. The brothers Müller and the Florentine party, by L. Köhler..... 57
Relation between Poetry and Music..... 280
Religion in Germany..... 83
Reinecke, Carl: his "King Manfred". 93, 106, 113
REVIEW:
Krüger's "System der Tonkunst," 31; O. Jahn's "Gesammelte Aufsätze," 31; "The Greeting," New Glee Book by L. O. Emerson. W. S. B. M., 111; Lobe's Catechism of Music, translated by Mme. Ritter, 120; Thayer's "Chronologisches Verzeichnis der Werke Beethoven's," 120; "The Voice in Singing," by Emma Seiler, 176; do., 226 (J. S. D. in N.A. Review), do., 282; "Beethoven's Leben," by L. Nohl, 177, 185; Köhler's Studies for the Piano, 189; "Medusa" and other Tales, by Mrs. Sartoris, 311; Kreissle von Hellborn's "Life of Schubert," translated by Arthur D. Coleridge..... 410
Ristori, Mme.: in Comedy..... 73
Ritter, F. L.: His Symphony in A, 256, 357; his Historical Recitals, 271, 415; Concert of his Compositions..... 357, 365
Rossini: his Hymn for the Great Exposition, 69; a Visit to, 139; a Letter to his Admirers, by A. K., 203; his letter about Wagner, 304; his death, and sketches of his career, 350, 356, 361--3, 370; his legacy, 371; Mass to his memory proposed by Verdi, 372; his funeral, 378; his conversation, reported by F. Hiller, 379, 386, 394, 402; Wagner's view of him, 396; his "Petite Messe"..... 409
Ruhinstein, Anton, the pianist..... 78, 285
Sacred Music. By H. C. Lunn..... 301
Schubert, Franz: his Unfinished Symphony in B minor, 22, 199, 214; Symphony in C, 171, 182; "Tragic Symphony," 214, 217, 236; Overture to "Fierabras," 182; "Song of Miriam," 364; Music to "Rosamunde," 244; Symphony, No. 6, 364; Quartet in G, 381; Life of, by Kreissle von Hellborn..... 410
Schumann, Mme., and her London Critics. (Illustrated Times), 2; as a Pianist..... 242
Schumann, Robert, translations from, 11, 17, 50, 58, 330; in England, 370; his "Cologne" Symphony, in E flat, 388, 398; first Symphony, B flat..... 414
Schütz, Heinrich..... 145, 153, 323
Seiler, Emma: Extracts from her book "The Voice in Singing"..... 172, 196, 202, 212
Shall we be a Musical People? J. S. D..... 135
Smart, Sir George: Death of. Lond. Times 3
Sontag, Henrietta, her first debut..... 75
Southard, L. H. and the Academy of Music in Baltimore..... 303, 360
Spohr, and the Conductor's Baton (from his Autobiography), 323; in London, (do.)..... 333
Stabat Mater, the, of various Masters. Fétis 403
Sullivan, Arthur S.: His music to "The Tempest," 380
Sunday Music. Lond. Orchestra 306
Taste in the Metropolis. Philad. Bulletin 150
Thalberg, S. (By Schumann)..... 330
Thayer, A. W.: His Life of Beethoven..... 1, 9
Thomas, Ambrose. His opera "Hamlet"..... 221
Thorup, Andreas T.: His death in N. Bedford..... 231
Three Pianists: Mme. Schumann, Arabella Goddard, Charles Halle..... 242
"The Heavens are as Brass!" Brass Bands, &c. 286
Theatre Orchestras. Transcript 85
Tomaschek, J. W., 411; his "Eclogues," for piano, 415
Topp, Alida, the pianist..... 243, 246, 262, 263, 350
Two Sisters. chapter from Rau's "Mozart"..... 227
Urso, Camilla..... 7, 382, 291
Verdi. His "Don Carlos" 14, 59, 71; "La Forza del Destino," 66, 69; and Rossini... 372
Veron, Dr. Louis. Orchestra 124
Vienna: its Music in 1793. A. W. Thayer, 33, 41, 49
Wagner, Richard, 229; his Programme to Beethoven's 9th Symphony, 3; his "Meistersinger von Nürnberg," 279, 281, 291, 294; "Love Feast of the Apostles," 322; Mr. Chorley's impressions of his "Lohengrin," 327; W. on Rossini..... 396
Whitten, Miss Anna S.: Her singing..... 359
Wilhelm, August, the Violinist..... 90
Welsh Eisteddfod, The..... 122, 128
Weber, Carl Maria von. Reminiscences of, by Holtz , 194; W. at Munich (by J. Ella)..... 260

Dwight's ³²⁸²⁸ Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 679.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 2.

Thayer's Life of Beethoven.*

(Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung).

IV.

The article from the Bonn Zeitung, which we have given in the last two numbers, contains, according to its title, only an abstract of Thayer's first two Books, ending with a brief notice of Beethoven's first visit to Vienna. We resume the thread of the narrative where Beethoven went to Vienna a second time, never more to leave it.

"Like the great number of students and young people," says Thayer, "who came there every year to find teachers and instruction, had this small and slender, swarthy and peck-marked, black-eyed and black haired young musician of 22 years journeyed to the capital, to pursue the study of his Art still further with the small and slender, swarthy and peck-marked, black-haired and black-eyed old master." Beethoven in fact is said to have had even more of the Moor in his aspect than his teacher Haydn. At first we find him occupied with setting up his domestic establishment in young bachelor fashion. A little Diary ("Tagebuch"), the existence of which was quite unknown till now, gives us a purely human peep into the beginning of Beethoven's Vienna life, and makes him appear as rather an orderly young man, who regularly writes down his expenditures and from time to time draws the balance between cash in hand and current or fixed monthly expenses. At the same time he seems to have had the design to make himself liked as an elegant young fellow: we find in the Diary the address of a dancing master! But he must soon have felt somewhat low in spirits, for not only did the 100 ducats fail him, which had been promised him in Bonn, but presently a Job's message came, to the effect: that his father had suddenly died, and this raised a question about the salary which he had thus far received for the father and the brothers, who had removed with him to Vienna. Fortunately, through the mediation of his friend Franz Ries, in Bonn, the payment was for a while continued; but only for a few months, and then every shadow of support from that quarter is lost, and the young artist sees himself thrown back upon his genius and his industry.

The main object of his stay in Vienna, Haydn's instruction, was kept in view from the outset. It began soon after his arrival (November 1792), but only lasted to the end of the year 1793. It is already well known, that teacher and scholar were never able to entirely suit each other. Beethoven wanted to become firmly grounded in theory; but Haydn does not seem to have been the man for that. He allowed violations of the strict rules to pass unquestioned in the pupil's exercises, while at the same time he wounded the young artist, who already stood firm in his way of composition, by what he deemed unnecessary remarks about his works. Moreover, the suggestion that he should call himself "Pupil of Haydn" on the title page of his Sonatas (Op. 2), which Beethoven declined to do, made the relation still more difficult between them. It appears, nevertheless, that Beethoven wanted to keep on pleasant terms with Haydn, and would now and then treat him with chocolate or coffee,—which entry, "for me and Haydn," occurs several times among the expenditures. It is known that Beethoven at the same time took lessons of Schenk, and then, on account of Haydn's departure for London, "was given over" by him to Albrechtsberger (January 1794). Probably Beethoven took lessons on the Violin also of Schuppanzigh; for the Diary contains the memorandum: "Schuppanzigh 3 times per W. (Week?), Albrechtsberger 3 times per W. (Week?)." Thayer thinks, that the lessons with Albrechtsberger also did not extend much over a year, partly because Beethoven was already greatly taken up with other occupation, partly because the larger half of the book of Studies, which has been preserved, falls within a much later period. Thayer confirms the statements of G. Nottebohm about "Beethoven's Studies," for instance, what he says of the good understanding between the scholar and the new teacher.

The condition of music at that time in Vienna, to which the author devotes the second Chapter of this Book, is already known through several writers, such as Otto Jahn and others. We know that the Italians reigned in the Court Opera, while the other opera companies, such as those of Schikaneder and Marinelli, were already far gone in decline. The church music seems to have stood "upon a very low standpoint." Public concerts there were none, with the exception of those old "Academies" for the benefit of widows and orphans of musicians. On this side, therefore, Beethoven could expect but indifferent advantages for the future. So much the more active was the semi-public and private musical life in Vienna, particularly through the lively musical feeling of the many wealthy potentates, who spent a part of the winter in Vienna, and some of whom even in summer lived not too far from Vienna in the country and there, partly through their own larger or smaller Gesellschaften, partly by the active participation of themselves and their friends, cultivated music with great zeal. These were the circles in which Beethoven had at first to gain a foothold and knew how to gain it. Thayer brings before us the musical amateurs who distinguished themselves in those years and describes the way in which they practised music.

It is not to be wondered that Beethoven soon conquered this field for himself. He was already known even from Bonn to many of the nobles; he was the "pupil of Haydn;" also in high favor with Count Waldstein, whose ties of relationship reached into the highest circles of nobility. Moreover it is remarkable that no such eminent piano player and accompanist, no such interesting composer had appeared since Mozart. One can imagine what an impression those three Trios, Op. 1, made in these circles, and how our young composer's skill in the Variation form immediately won him many warm admirers. While Beethoven was not exactly avaricious with such trifles and did not even hesitate to write dances for a charity ball of the "Society of Plastic Artists," which made him an uncommon number of friends, he was on the other hand greatly inclined to hold back in the publication of his larger works. He wanted the Trios Op. 1, and then again the first two Concertos, to become well known in various ways, before entrusting them to a publisher. About the publication of these Trios Thayer communicates some very interesting documents, which exhibit the Beethoven of that time in the character of a decidedly good business man ("einen ganz guten 'Rechenmeister'").

After all this, we believe that we may expect from the continuation of this new description of the life of Beethoven many an important disclosure about the master's outward fortunes and his inward development of character; and we look forward to the coming volumes with a longing interest.

The Baton.

(From the London Orchestra.)

The earliest practical use of the bâton in London orchestras, superseding the beat of the foot and motion of the leader's fiddlestick, was in 1826, when the opera of "Obéron" was produced at Covent Garden, under the direction of its composer—Weber. The bâton used upon that occasion is said to be among the relics of Weber, in the possession of the lately deceased knight, Sir George Smart. Unlike the formidable weapons which are now used in concert orchestras, the bâton of Weber—similar to those now in use in Germany—was short, and served all the legitimate purposes for which a bâton is required. The modern system in London concerts of wielding a long stick, stretching forth both hands and distracting the attention of the audience, with no very definite mode of making the beat intelligible to the performers, is highly objectionable and quite unnecessary. In large theatres, with the complex elements on the stage and in the orchestra, and in the direction of monster festivals, the case is different. Yet, on all occasions, the beat should be decisive, systematical, and intelligible. In no case should the bâton in motion deviate from the established rules of marking the divisions of the bar. The important use of the bâton is to mark the changes of time, direct the accompaniment of recitatives, and guide the performers in passages of mixed rhythm which abound chiefly in modern lyrical music. The advantage of the bâton over the obsolete system of beating time with a fiddle-stick and the feet of the leader is acknowledged; but in the hands of persons neglectful of the legitimate system of making it serve its real purpose, always visible, and intelligible in its beats, conducting becomes a positive nuisance. There is no need of raising or lowering the bâton beyond the motion of the wrist, and as for those wild gyrations above the head and below the elbow of the conductor, the swinging about of his body, with both hands outstretched, and a suppressed "hush" to impose observance of a pianissimo, they are quite unnecessary. The conductor should be placed so that every member of the orchestra shall see the motion of the stick; and one of the chief qualifications of a conductor, apart from his experience in orchestras, is to know thoroughly the score of the work to be performed. The list of foreigners who have successively yielded the baton in England includes names of European fame: Weber, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Moscheles, and Wagner.

* Ludwig van Beethoven's Leben, von Alexander Wheelock Thayer. Nach dem Original Manuscript deutsch bearbeitet (von Dr. H. Deiters). First Volume. Berlin: F. Schneider.

Since the Philharmonic Concerts were first established (thanks to the talent and influence of Mr. Costa), there has been a complete change in the character of our English orchestras, and what was once considered a satisfactory performance of a symphony would not in the present day escape criticism. The organization and discipline of bands have seldom engaged the attention of English musicians, nor is there a single treatise in the English language on the structure of orchestras, and the just balance of voices and instruments in combination. It is seldom that a new institution, or the remodelling of an old institution, affords a conductor the free choice of musicians to form a complete and efficient band. Mr. Costa has alone enjoyed these privileges in England. In forming the band at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, in 1847, he had the unprecedented advantage of including the élite of the performers at Her Majesty's Theatre with the choicest professors of other bands, making together the most numerous and effective lyrical band in Europe. In remodelling the vocal and instrumental resources of the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts Mr. Costa introduced the best artists of his opera band to assist the amateurs, and the result of his discipline and organization at Exeter Hall, the Royal Italian Opera, and the Philharmonic Concerts, when under his direction, are too well known to need discussion. The improvement of orchestral performances since Mr. Costa first swayed the baton at Her Majesty's Theatre, some thirty years ago, is most remarkable. Revived operas that required half a dozen full rehearsals under the old system are now produced with two or three. It should be mentioned that in all his professional duties Mr. Costa is the most punctual of artists, and by his example others are taught to be equally punctual. He knows the value of the musician's time during the short harvest of the musical season, and no unnecessary trouble is given to his hand at rehearsals. His scores are systematically prepared, and trifling errors in execution, arising from faults in the copy, are noted quick as thought for the copyist to examine. When necessary, the band is instructed to repeat an intricate passage without recommencing the entire movement, and thus time is economized and the performers are spared those delays which, under the direction of less skilled conductors, they are often doomed to suffer. No wonder, therefore, that Mr. Costa is deservedly popular among artists and with the musical public of England, for his admirable organization and discipline of choirs and bands.

[From Once a Week.]

Haunts of Harmony in the City of London.

Music-halls are a development of the "Free-and-Easy" which no doubt claimed lineal descent from the "Mug-house Club," described by De Foe in his "Journey through England." Every Wednesday and Saturday a mixture of gentlemen, lawyers, and tradesmen met in a great room in Long Acre, where they drank "nothing but ale," each gentleman having his separate mug, which he chalked on the table as it was brought in. A harp played continuously at one end of the room, and from time to time some member of the company would rise and entertain the rest with a song. The guests were seldom less than a hundred in number, and order was maintained by a "grave old gentleman in his own gray hairs," and within a few months of ninety years old.

The "Free-and-Easy" is now going out of fashion, but specimens still exist near Sadler's Wells Theatre, in Swallow Street, Piccadilly, and in the Waterloo Road. Of these, the first-named is supported by the Jewellers' Society, and meetings are convened every Saturday evening. On entering, a visitor is expected to deposit a penny in the plate at the door, and the money thus collected serves to provide an annual dinner for the aged inmates of the Jewellers' Almshouses. The day before Christmas eve the old people call at the room where the meetings are held, and receive their money. The regular supporters of the institution are allowed to be present and watch the proceedings.

The weekly re-unions take place in an upper room, furnished with one or two mirrors, and a good many gaslights. The tables and benches are ranged on each side of a slip of oil-cloth which extends up the centre of the apartment, and connects the chairs of the president and his colleague. A couple of fire-places diffuse the requisite degree of warmth; and the piano, near which the vocalists stand, occupies a vacant space between two windows, and facing the door by which the visitor enters.

The performers are mostly amateurs. A young gentleman volunteers a song or a recitation; he commences an entirely new and original version of the "Death of Nelson," breaks down in the middle of the second stanza. He coughs. "Extremely sorry, gentlemen, but—" "Try back, try," cries the audience, encouragingly, and the vocalist is nerved to fresh efforts by wholly undeserved applause. He bows his thanks, makes a passing and mysterious allusion to the weather, and suggests the propriety of attempting a fresh piece. His arguments prevail, and everything goes like clockwork till the end of the last verse but one, when there occurs another fiasco. An energetic old gentleman twists his shoulders to and fro in the most alarming manner, and exclaims, with increasing emphasis, "Try back, try back, try back! The young musician, thus adjured, commences a third piece, and ends it amid tumultuous applause. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that his repeated failures were not so much the result of accident as of a deep-laid design. He loves the sound of his own voice, and not content with one song, aims at displaying his versatility in several.

We remember an elderly gentleman of begrimed appearance who flourished at the harmonic meetings in question, and whose pleasure it was to favor the company with recitations from the "Man of the World," delivered with a most undeniable Scotch accent. Popularly regarded as a cobbler, he was much more remarkable for the peculiarly sombre tint of his shirt-sleeves than the extraordinary talent with which he read selections from "Pickwick" and "Little Dombey."

A pianist at a "Free-and-Easy" is expected not only to perform instrumental solos, but to "vamp," or extemporize an accompaniment for the various performers.

The chairman is elected week by week, and distributes cards among his friends, who rally to his support, and form a clique ready to applaud every effect, good, bad, or indifferent.

Sometimes a professional gentleman will volunteer a song, and his efforts are sure to yield unbounded satisfaction.

In connection, we may add that there is not much in the way of eating done at the "Free-and-Easy" here alluded to, but there is a fair quantity of drink consumed, and it is worthy of remark that the audience is wholly composed of the male sex.

There is a harmonic meeting held "every evening throughout the week" in a first-floor room at a tavern in Swallow Street, Piccadilly. The audience is mainly composed of gentlemen's servants and low betting-men. Intruders are apt to meet with rudeness, and a prolonged sojourn on the premises may entail consequences the reverse of agreeable. The performances are more remarkable for coarseness than for humor, and the "powerful company" described in the programme as "including the first talent of the day" is made up of fifth-rate professionals, in receipt of insignificant salaries, or aspiring amateurs, who "give their services for the sake of practice." The accompaniments are rendered upon a piano and violin, and when the vocalists have concluded their entertainment they deign to mingle with the audience and refresh themselves at the expense of their admirers.

There are "Free-and-Easies" in country towns, at which young ladies who can play the piano and have a tolerable voice command extravagant salaries, ranging from a pound to thirty shillings a week. In some instances they are provided with board and lodging in their employer's house, in which case the food is seldom too abundant, and the single apartment, without being overcrowded with furniture, may be airily situated on a third-floor back. The duty of ladies in the position described is to be present in the hall during the entertainment, to perform solos on the piano, sing songs, and accompany the amateur vocalists, who are generally common workmen, agricultural laborers, and "navvies."

About twenty years ago the list of metropolitan concert-rooms was headed by the "Cyder Cellars" and "Evans's." The entertainments to be found in these places were none of the most select; and whilst the latter has been altered and purged of its iniquities, the former has disappeared altogether. The surviving establishment, half soper-room half music-hall, and one of the lions of London, is situated at the western extremity of the Piazza, Covent Garden. It is subject to peculiar and stringent regulations. Ladies are not admitted except on signifying their names and addresses, and even then they only enjoy the doubtful privilege of watching the proceedings from behind a screen. The whole of the performances are sustained by the male sex, and an efficient choir of men and boys sing glees, madrigals, ballads, and selections from operas. The accompaniments are supplied on the piano and harmonium. The comic element is contributed by Mr. Whatkins—possibly the Herr Pio Whautkini of ordinary music-halls. A celebrity of the establishment was Herr von Joel, famous for his imitations of "de trosh, de blackbird, de lark, and de naehingall." After years of service he retired from the platform, but his name was retained on the salary list, and he employed himself in handing round cigars for the benefit of the visitors.

The new hall, one of the most elaborately ornamented in London, was erected under the auspices of Mr. Green, the present proprietor, and from designs by Mr. Finch Hill. Its proportions are grand, and the decorations, which have been described as "sufficiently classic," entailed an outlay of about £5000. To Mr. Green is due the honor of having raised the tone of the entertainments so as to render them not only innocent, but intellectual. On the occasion of our last visit we heard standard music, English, German and Italian, performed with admirable precision, spirit and delicacy. Books containing the words of the songs are left on every table, and previous to the commencement of each composition its number in the collection is held up to public view in front of the platform.

Gentlemen anxious to engage in conversation are recommended to confine themselves to the café department, for in the body of the hall unmusical vocalization meets with no favor. The so-called café is a spacious room supported by pillars, and hung round with paintings of celebrated actresses. For this art collection we are indebted to the enterprise of Mr. Green. Previous to the erection of the new hall, the chamber thus adorned was used as a singing-room.

During the early portion of the century the apartment in question was held in high repute as a dinner and coffee-room. It acquired the name of the "Star," from the number of men of rank by whom it was frequented. It has been said that previous to the formation of clubs it was no unusual circumstance for nine dukes to dine there in a day. The present hall, to which the "café" department forms a species of vestibule, was built on a plot of ground at the rear of the Covent Garden Hotel. It was erected at a time when the improved quality of the performances attracted more visitors than could well be accommodated in the music-room. The garden, which during the last stage of its existence degenerated into a receptacle for stunted and sooty shrubs, was famed for having been the property of the well-known Sir Kenelm Digby (1662). At a later period it contained a cottage in which the Kembles occasionally dwelt, when in the fall tide of their popularity at the neighboring theatre. According to tradition it was in this cottage that their talented daughter, Miss Fanny Kemble, was born.

A curious head, described in certain numbers of the Guardian for the year 1713, and designed as a box for the reception of literary contributions, was purchased by Mr. Richardson, the late proprietor of "Evans's," against the Duke of Norfolk, and treated to a post of honor above the chimney-piece in the old music-room. It bore a fanciful resemblance to a lion, and its claws were of the most formidable description. It was put up at Button's Coffee House in July, 1713, removed to the Shakespeare Tavern in 1781, and bought by Mr. Richardson on the 8th of November, 1809. It was described by its proprietor as being "indeed a proper emblem of knowledge and action," for it was "all head and paws." "Its features," adds the writer, "are strong and well furrowed." The "whiskers" gained the admiration of every one that saw them.

It may interest our readers to learn that the present proprietor of "Evans's" directed the chorus at the first performance of Mendelssohn's "Mid-summer Night's Dream." He likewise superintended the choral arrangements for the same composer's immortal "Walpurgis Night."

It is but doing Mr. Green justice to add that he is zealous in carrying out the views with which he commenced his enterprise, and we recommend "Evans's" to the notice of "sturdy young men" who admire a high class of music, see no harm in a good supper, but avoid theatres and the ordinary run of music-halls. The performances commence at eight and conclude about one. The accommodation is excellent, the company select, the waiters are attentive, and the refreshments of the best quality.

It was on a moist and gloomy evening within the last six weeks that we crossed the River Thames in a mood unusually pensive, and threading divers of those tortuous and fragrant thoroughfares familiar to the students of penny novels, found ourselves in full view of that neglected fane of Thespian mummery—the Bower Saloon, and in close proximity to Mr. Price's patent night-light manufactory, and that popular place of resort the "Fine Arts Gallery and Canterbury Hall."

And whence did this structure derive its name? The archiepiscopal residence is in its immediate vicinity, and we believe that it is in this circumstance that we shall discover a reply to the query.

A few steps more and we had crossed the threshold, but our hopes of a fresh and sudden accession of liveliness were doomed to disappointment. The evening was as yet but little advanced, and area, stalls, and balcony were alike almost deserted. The waiters moved listlessly to and fro, and flourished their napkins as if to ward off the approaches of sleep, and the young ladies behind the bar either assumed contemplative attitudes and stared straight forwards in a fixed and stony manner, as if they were looking right through the back of the stage at some object on the far horizon, or with a view of dispelling ennui conversed with one another in low tones, and performed feats of dexterity with complicated bundles of needlework.

We strolled towards the "Fine Arts Gallery," and tried to console ourselves by examining Mr. Hughes's great picture of the "Riot in Hyde Park." We ascertained that on payment of an extra sixpence we should acquire the right of inspecting a cheerful design on the subject of the Santiago catastrophe, but our spirits were sufficiently depressed already, and we preferred confining our attention to gigantic Quintus Curtius on an alarmingly fiery steed, and the various heathen divinities, emblematic figures, and scrawling monstrosities, without which no public picture gallery can be reckoned complete.

We paused for a moment in front of a view of the Thames from Waterloo Bridge, and then turning, suddenly discovered that, with the exception of one or two young gentlemen, who wandered despairingly up and down the room, and occasionally diversified their proceedings by vanishing through one door and reappearing a moment afterwards at another, we had the premises wholly to ourselves. In the meantime, the "company," represented by divers ladies and gentlemen in evening costume, were chanting what we at first took to be a funeral dirge to organ accompaniment. Our meditations assumed a deeper tinge of melancholy, and we were forcibly reminded of Westminster Abbey on a week-day.

When the introductory chorus—for such was the composition to which we have adverted—came to a close, we rushed post-haste up-stairs to secure a good seat in longing anticipation of that part of the programme which referred to "opera, ballet, burlesque, and pantomime, by all the best artists in London." But alas! for those who put their confidence in hand-bills. An elderly gentleman, in black, stepped forward, and glided into a plaintive melody, with piano-forte accompaniment, and having his coat tails towards an Italian landscape rather the worse for wear. No sooner had he retired than the chairman rapped vigorously with his hammer, and he reappeared to moderate the very exuberant spirits of a very scanty audience, by means of a second song as depressing as the first. Upon this we resigned ourselves to circumstances, and gathered what consolation we could in examining the architectural peculiarities of the building and the manners and customs of those by whom it was tenanted.

"The Canterbury," though a spacious and well-arranged hall, has not much pretension to beauty. The decorations are of a cheap and meagre description, and a prevalent drab-tint is the reverse of inspiring. On each side, and at one end, are projecting galleries; at the other is a stage of moderate dimensions. The ground-floor, divided into stalls and area, is supplied with tables and chairs; the balcony is reached by a handsome staircase, rising from a spacious vestibule fitted with a refreshment bar; and the picture-gallery is on the extreme left as you enter. The audience, which is perfectly well-behaved, seems to muster in force between half past nine and ten, the hall being nearly empty during the earlier stages of the proceedings, and densely crowded from about eleven till the fall of the curtain.

The frequenters of the Canterbury are, as may be imagined, the reverse of aristocratic, being for the most part petty tradesmen, clerks, shop-lads, mechanics and soldiers. Whole families may occasionally be seen in attendance, and since, as in most halls at a distance from the West-end, the olive branches are as sufficiently represented as the parent stem, the comic songs are at times interrupted by penetrating tokens of disapprobation from a baby-in-arms. The taste of a Canterbury audience, though based upon correct moral principles, is the reverse of discriminative. A form of entertainment that would be coldly received or hissed off the stage at the Oxford, affords the most genuine satisfaction on the other side of the water. Comic songs only redeemed from utter imbecility by a lively tune, are greeted with uproarious applause; and a popular air, vigorously performed by the band, seems to yield more genuine delight than a selection from "Faust," or even the eternal "Orphée aux Enfers." The Canterbury has acquired a deserved reputation for an ingenious form of entertainment, introduced, we believe, by the enterprising Mr. Vanderveldt, and comprising the joint attractions of ballet, spectacular display, and vocal and instrumental music. A piece that achieved great popularity, and bore the mystic title of "Ko-ko-ri-ko," was of this cast, as was also another known as "Kifun-to-fun," which we had the pleasure of witnessing, and enjoyed immensely.

But to resume our narrative. The gentleman in black having sung himself hoarse, we were informed that an eminent comedian would appear in a tragically burlesque, upon which the Italian landscape curled itself up and vanished into the theatrical heavens, and made room for a second landscape of the fine old English type, with the usual allowance of trees at the wings, and the conventional semi-circular arches by way of apology for clouds. In the middle of the stage stood an uncomfortable contrivance suggesting the idea of a superannuated trunk shrouded in canvas, but intended to portray a rustic couch composed of mud, turf, stones, and similarly sleep-provoking materials. The band, which was sitting on one side of the stage, plunged into what was fondly held to be an air of much merriment, and by so doing brought on a gentleman curiously appareled, who, after singing one or two verses of a song in a way to deprive the words of all significance, commenced a not very entertaining burlesque of Mr. Charles Kean, and other tragedians, of minor celebrity. A vigorous piece of ranting aroused the enthusiasm of the audience, by whom the performance seemed to be accepted in perfect good faith as a legitimate effort of high tragic art. Richard III. having been disposed of according to precedent, the chairman brought his hammer into play, and the "great comedian" returned to sing a comic song, which apparently yielded intense gratification, though the purport was wholly undistinguishable. After this the Italian landscape returned from the "flies," and a young lady essayed her powers in a ballad, the waiters supplying an ad libitum accompaniment by walking up and down the gallery, and requesting the occupants thereof to "make their orders." When this portion of the entertainment had been brought to a close, another "great comedian" appeared, and achieved instantaneous popularity by thrusting his hat over his eyes, and assuming a nasal twang of particular humor. His song bore sarcastic reference to the comparative advantages of the married man and the bachelor, and elicited tokens of marked approval; encouraged by which the singer returned, in a tight fitting costume of shiny material and a damaged felt cap, and to the air of the "Donkey Cart," promulgated some remarkable theories with regard to the independence and high moral status attaching to the vocation of a sweeper boy. The applause with which this last effort was greeted set the pewter pots and tumblers dancing in the most alarming manner, and affairs grew worse rather than better when the popular favorite reappeared in a gigantic shako and tarnished suit of regimentals. He had just begun to brandish a broken sword, and hobble about the stage with bent knees and shoulders well rounded, when we rushed despairingly from the building, trusting that the entertainment might improve as it progressed, and pursued by the strains of the band, which had struck up a medley compounded of "Tramp, tramp, tramp" and "When Johnny comes marching home."

(To be continued.)

Music in the Boston Public Schools.

(From the Annual Report of the School Board, by Rev. R. C. WATERSTON, 1867.)

VOCAL AND PHYSICAL GYMNASICS.

This department in our schools unites, upon philosophical principles, the best exercise of the vocal organs, with a thorough system of physical training. Professor Monroe, by his instructions, has not only conferred great benefit upon the pupils, but has rendered valuable service to the teachers; enabling them to carry out his plans; developing the physical powers; and aiding, in a remarkable manner, the management and modulation of the voice in reading;—thus laying a good foundation for the instructors of music, the advantages of which cannot fail to be seen, even by the most superficial observer.

INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC.

Much as has been done, for instruction in music through former years, we believe that never was the whole system so complete as at the present time. Formerly, there were separate plans, conducted by teachers who had no uniformity of method or purpose. Now, under the general direction and supervision of the Committee on Music (of which it is enough to say that Dr. J. Baxter Upham has been the efficient chairman for the last nine years) the three departments of Primary, Grammar, and High Schools, have been placed in the hands of Messrs. Zerrahn, Sharland, and Mason, all able teachers, peculiarly adapted to their work, possessing individual gifts, and acting in unison with each other,—each with a remarkable faculty of imparting knowledge, and awakening enthusiasm in the minds of the pupils. The science of music, in its elementary principles, is taught, even to the younger children, in so thorough a manner, as will leave nothing to be unlearned; inducing a readiness to advance, with perceptible rapidity, under the instructions which will follow. The school-festivals at the Music Hall are among the most gratifying occasions which occur in this city. They are a sufficient proof in themselves, of the proficiency of the pupils, and the appreciation of the public.

Music, as conducted in our schools, exerts now an elevating and refining influence through the whole process of education. It is not only the cultivation of one of the most marvellous and beautiful gifts, God has bestowed on his children; offering a constant resource, (a joy and a solace, for all the coming discipline of life,) but it is more than this,—it is an actual help in the development and culture of all the other faculties. The whole mind moves with greater ease and success because of the influence thus exerted. The mental faculties are sympathetic; the spirit of music, blending with, and flowing through all, like a subtle magnetic life. As there is a hidden harmony in all created things, melody being elicited by wind and wave; thus, wrapped up within the nature of the child, are powers, which never work so harmoniously, and therefore so advantageously, as when this gift is allowed to develop itself in unison with the whole educational process. It is more than a mere pleasure, even when pursued as a recreation. According to the etymology of that word, it may become RECREATION,—melody, with the breath of life, re-creating the whole nature. Have we not felt this? Is there, at any time, a prevailing listlessness, a sense of exhaustion or languor? Call up the delightful exhilaration of music. How will one verse of a spirited song dispel the clouds, sending sunlight through every mind!

What a new interest does the cultivation of music in the schools throw into the affections of home! How many firesides possess, through this gift, an added charm! Separate as the schools are from the Church, yet it is pleasant to remember that every church, and the Sunday school connected with each church, has the advantage of all the knowledge of music that has been thus gained. The correct ear and disciplined taste, united with the well developed and richly-modulated voice, has come from the School. Thus a new power has been unconsciously introduced from the school into the Sanctuary, kindling into added fervor the services of the house of God. Whenever the voice of the great congregation unites in anthems of praise; in that full tide of melody, sweeping onward like the waves of the sea, we have one of the grand results of the teaching of music in our public schools.

So, also, the perceptible growth of a truer musical taste in the community, and the increasing desire for a higher order of music, has come, in part, from the same source, and will doubtless show itself more and more.

The constant, systematic, thorough teaching of music to more than twenty-seven thousand children, in every walk of life, through a whole city, and that persistently, from one generation to another, must produce an influence for good, which cannot but be widely and deeply felt.

Translations from Schumann.

(By "M. E. von G." for the London Musical World.)

BERLIOZ.

Overture to "Waverly." Op. 1.

What a contrast to Bennett is Berlioz, that raging bacchanal, the terror of the Philistines, to whom he is simply an awful monster with hungry eyes. But where do we find him to day? By the crackling hearth of a Scotch country house, amongst huntsmen, dogs, and merry country girls!

Before me lies an Overture to "Waverley," Walter Scott's delicious story, which in its charming length, its romantic freshness, its purely English stamp, is still my favorite of all the modern English novels. To this, Berlioz has made his music. People will ask, "To which chapter? to which scene? why? with what object?" Critics always want to know just what composers themselves cannot tell; and often do not understand the tenth part of what they criticize. Good heavens! when will the time come that we shall no longer be asked what we mean by our divine composition? Search for consecutive fifths as much as you please, gentlemen, but do leave us in peace. Here, however, the words on the title-page afford some clue—

"Dreams of love and ladies' charms
Give place to honor and to arms."

This puts us a little on the scent; but at the present moment I should like, above all, for an orchestra to strike up the overture, while a party of readers sat round to test it by the story. It would be easy to describe it—either in a poetical style, by depicting the manifold scenes it suggests to me; or by dissecting the mechanism of its construction. Each way of explaining music has its value; at any rate, the first has not that dryness which, in the latter, is a fault or a virtue, as you happen to take it. But Berlioz's music must be heard; even looking at the score does not help one much, and it is useless to try to gain any idea of it on the piano. Often the whole point of a passage lies in an instrumental effect; in handfuls of chords dashed off in some peculiar manner; in strange complications, which no one, even with the most practised ear, can distinctly represent to himself by the mere sight of the notes on paper. If one thoroughly examines the thoughts, and considers them separately, they often seem commonplace, even trivial; but as a whole, in spite of much to offend and startle a German ear, the music has for me an irresistible charm. In each of his works Berlioz is different; in each he has ventured on new ground. I hardly know whether to call him a genius or a musical adventurer. His lightning flashes grandly enough; but it leaves an awful smell of sulphur behind it. One minute he lays down big propositions and truths; and the next, off he goes into mere schoolboy nonsense. To a person who has not attained to the first beginnings of musical culture and feeling (and the greater number of people have not), he must simply appear a fool; and doubly so to professional players* who, for nine-tenths of their lives, move in one regular round, and on whom he makes demands such as no one else ever did. This explains the resistance his compositions have met with, and the fact that it takes years for one of them to reach the light by a proper performance. But the Overture to "Waverley" will make its way more easily. Everybody knows the story and its hero; and what can be plainer than the motto—

"Dreams of love and ladies' charms
Give place to honor and to arms" ?

I sincerely trust that the Overture may become known in Germany; it can injure none but those poor creatures to whom nothing, however good, can be of any use. It is curious, by the way, that this Overture bears a distant resemblance to Mendelssohn's Meeresstille.

Berlioz's remarks on the title-page should not be overlooked. He calls this Overture his "Opus 1," and says that he cancels his previously published "Opus 1" ("Eight Scenes from Faust"), and that the Waverley Overture is henceforth to be so considered. But who can tell whether, at some future time, the second "Opus 1" will also please him no longer. One should therefore, make haste to become acquainted with the work, which, in spite of some youthful weaknesses, far surpasses, in greatness and individuality of invention, any instrumental music which France has lately produced.

LISZT.

Bravura Studies, arranged for the Pianoforte, from Paganini's Caprices. (In Two Parts).

The original work is entitled, "24 Capricci per Violino solo, composti e dedicati agli artisti da N. Paganini. (Euvre 10)" Twelve of these, adapted for the piano by Robert Schumann, appeared as long ago as 1833 and 1835. An arrangement of some of them also appeared in Paris, but I do not remember by whom they were done. Liszt's collection contains five of the Caprices and an adaptation of the celebrated "Rondo à la Campanella." His aim was no mere pedantic imitation, or simple filling out of the harmonies of the violin part; the piano and the violin produce their effects by different means. The all-important task was to produce the same effect by whatever means. Every one who has heard Liszt knows how thoroughly he understands the capacity and qualities of his instrument. It must, therefore, be most interesting to see the compositions of the greatest violin-player (as far as regards bravura playing) of this century, treated by the greatest piano-player of our day. A glance at the collection, with its wonderful array of notes, ranged up and down like the rafters of a house, is enough to show that we have no trifle to deal with. It is as if in this work Liszt had wanted to disclose all his experiences, and to bequeath to posterity every secret of his playing; in no better way could he have manifested his veneration for the great deceased artist than by a work like this, so carefully worked out even to the smallest details, and reflecting the spirit of the original with perfect fidelity. If Schumann aimed rather at bringing out the poetical side of the compositions, Liszt, without neglecting that, has chosen rather to reflect its mechanical difficulties. He very rightly entitles the pieces "Bravura Studies"; since they are just suited for playing in public as show-pieces. But there are not many who could thoroughly master them; perhaps not more than four or five in the whole world. However, the difficulty will not prevent people from attempting them. Many are glad to approach even tolerably near the highest summits of executive perfection. When we closely examine this collection, there is no doubt that its purely musical worth often bears no proportion to its mechanical difficulties. But the title "Study" answers for much in this case. We are to practise diligently, whatever may be the cost.

* I have often found that it is amongst professional musicians one meets with the most obstinate narrow-mindedness; though, on the other hand, they are seldom wanting in certain sound qualities.

These are, perhaps, the most difficult pieces ever written for the piano, as the originals are for the violin. Paganini probably meant to express this in his charmingly short dedication, "Agli artisti," as much as to say, "We are accessible to artists only." Thus it is also with the present arrangement; none but real artists of high standing could make anything of them. From this point of view alone can they be judged. We must forego a regular analysis and comparison of the arrangement with the original; it would take too much space, and is best done with both before one. It is interesting to compare the first Study with Schumann's arrangement of the same, a comparison to which Liszt expressly invites us by copying the latter, bar by bar, next his own. In the Italian edition it is the sixth Caprice. The last number contains the Variations, which also form the last number in the original edition, and probably suggested to Ernst his "Carneval de Venise;" from a musical point of view, this one is to me the most interesting of the whole; but even here, in the small space of a few bars, one finds the most prodigious difficulties, such as even Liszt himself would have to study. Whoever can master these Variations, so as to play them in the easy playful style which they require, and make them go like scenes in a puppet-show, may travel all over the world, confident that he will return with golden laurels, a second Liszt-Paganini.

LISZT AT LEIPZIG.

Would that it were possible for me, my distant friends, my unknown readers, and all you who can never hope to hear this great artist for yourselves, and yet eagerly treasure every word concerning him, would that it were possible for me to give you a picture of so gigantic a character. But the difficulties are great. His outward man is the least hard to depict. It has been often attempted, and his head has been compared to Schiller's and Napoleon's. And inasmuch as all extraordinary men seem to have a look in common—especially that of energy and force in the eye and mouth—the comparison is not entirely inaccurate. In particular he resembles Napoleon when young, in the well-known portraits of General Bonaparte—pale and lean, with a marked profile—the expression of the whole figure concentrated in the brow. He also bears a remarkable likeness to the late Ludwig Schunke—a likeness extending to their common art; so much so that while Liszt was playing it often seemed to me that I was listening to something I had heard before.

So much for his exterior. To characterize his art is indeed a task. It is not to be described as playing of this or that style: it is rather the utterance of a great intellect to whom nature has for once given the power to conquer and rule, with the harmless implements of art instead of the ordinary deadly weapons. There are many remarkable artists of the last generation, and others still alive who in many respects equal Liszt; and yet are one and all inferior to him, because they have not his energy and boldness. One often hears a wish expressed that Thalberg might enter the lists with him. But it is only necessary to look at the heads of the two men to predict the result of the contest. I recollect a well-known Vienna artist saying that his countryman Thalberg had the face of a beautiful high-bred lady, with the nose of a man; but that Liszt might sit to any painter for a Greek god. And there is something of the same difference between their playing. As a player Chopin comes nearer to Liszt—at least he is not a whit behind him in fairy-like delicacy and grace; but nearest of all artists are Paganini and Malibran, from both of whom he confesses to have adopted very much.

At the present time he is some thirty years of age. The successive steps of his career are so well known to my readers, that I need not recall them. Suffice it to say that he arrived in Leipzig already covered with an amount of honor which falls to the lot of none but artists, and with his reputation firmly established. It was thus difficult to say anything to add to his fame; but it was not so difficult to endeavor to damage it a little, according to an ancient practice of the mean and the pedantic. And the plan was actually tried. It was surely not Liszt's fault that the announcements were so made as to mystify the public, and that there were mistakes in the arrangement of the concert. But these things were employed by a well-known anonymous lampooner to excite public feeling against him, and he was accused of coming to Leipzig only to satisfy an inordinate love of gain. We dismiss, once and forever, such unworthy accusations.

The first concert, on the 17th March, was a remarkable sight. The audience were crowded together pell-mell. The very room did not look like itself, and the orchestra was filled with seats for the public. In the middle sat Liszt. He commenced with the Scherzo and Finale of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony;"—a strange choice, and on several accounts, not a happy one. In one's own private room, with a friend or two, it is possible to forget the orchestra in the transcription, which is certainly most carefully done; but in public, in the very hall in which one had heard the symphony over and over again, played by the band in the most finished style, the comparative weakness of the piano was severely felt, and the more severely the more strenuously it endeavored to render the masses of orchestral sound. A simpler and more suggestive arrangement would probably have been more effective. But it served the purpose of exhibiting the master on his own instrument, and all were content; they had, at least, seen the lion shake his mane. The noble animal was soon to do mightier things. His next piece was a Fantasia on themes by Paganini, played in truly extraordinary fashion. But I would willingly have exchanged all the astonishing and audacious execution displayed in this for the magical delicacy with which he interpreted the Study that followed it. With the single exception of Chopin, I repeat that I know no one to approach him in this style. He finished with his well-known "Chromatic Galop," and then, as the applause still continued, played the equally well-known "Bravura Waltz."

Liszt was too exhausted and unwell to give the concert announced for the next day. But, in the meantime, a musical festival was in preparation, of such a nature that neither he himself, nor any one else present, should ever forget it. The giver of the festival—Mendelssohn—had avowedly chosen the programme from compositions unknown to his guest, viz., Schubert's Symphony in C; his own Psalm, "As pants the Hart;" the Meeresstille Overture; three Choruses from St. Paul; and, for the wind-up, Bach's Concerto for three pianos, to be played by Liszt, Hiller, and himself. The whole thing had a completely impromptu air, and it occupied three thoroughly delightful hours, such as one can hardly hope to enjoy again for years. At the end Liszt played a solo, and wonderfully too. The party separated in a state of delight and excitement, and the cheerful and bright expression which lit up every face shone, as it were, like a thank-offering to the giver of the festival for his homage to the talent and fame of his brother-artist.

Liszt's most genial performance, however, was yet to come. This was Weber's Concertstück, with which he opened his second concert. On this evening the whole audience, both professional and non-professional, were in the most cordial humor, and the enthusiasm which prevailed during the piece, and at its conclusion, surpassed well nigh everything before witnessed. He started the concerto at once with a force and majesty of expression befitting a procession to the battle-field, and carried it on with increasing power, bar by bar, until he seemed to dominate over the whole orchestra, and to lead it on in triumph.

At this moment he really looked like the great commander to whom we have already compared him, and the shouts of applause might well have been mistaken for "Vive l'Empereur!" Besides the Concertstück, he gave a Fantasia on themes from the Huguenots, Schubert's Ave Maria and Serenade, and finally, at the demand of the audience, the Erl King. But the Concertstück was the glory of the whole performance.

Who it was that suggested the crown of flowers which was handed to him at the close by a favorite lady singer, I know not, but it was certainly well deserved. None but a narrow and spiteful nature could carp, as some have carped, at a friendly act of homage like this. To give you, my friends, the pleasure which you this day enjoyed, this great artist had sacrificed years of his life: of the labor his art had cost him you know nothing: he gave you the best he had, his heart's blood, his very utmost, and you grudge him, in return, a paltry garland!

Liszt, however, would not remain in debt. He was evidently much pleased with his warm reception on the second occasion, and immediately stated his readiness to give a third concert for any charitable institution that might be selected. Accordingly, on Monday last, he played for the benefit of the Society for the Relief of decayed Musicians, as, on the day before, he had done at Dresden for the poor. The room was crowded to suffocation. The object of the concert, the programme, the co-operation of the most favorite artists, and, above all, the presence of Liszt himself, combined to excite the public sympathy. He arrived from Dresden in the morning, and although fatigued with his journey and with the long performance of the day before, went immediately to rehearsal, so that he had only a short interval before the commencement of the concert. Repose he had none. It is absolutely necessary to mention this, for the greatest man is, after all, but human, and the evident exhaustion with which Liszt played in the evening was but the natural consequence of his recent labors. He showed his friendly feeling by choosing for the concert compositions by three persons present, Mendelssohn, Hiller, and myself. He selected the new (D-minor) Concerto of the first, some Studies of Hiller's, and several numbers from an early work of mine, called "Carneval." It will astonish many a timid performer to hear that he played the greater part of these pieces practically at sight! The "Studies" and the "Carneval," indeed, he knew slightly before, but the Concerto he had not seen till a day or two previously; and, in fact, it was impossible for him to have found time in that short period for any proper study of it. I ventured to hint my fear that the rhapsody of carnival-life would make but little impression on a general audience; but this he dismissed at once, by saying that he hoped it would. Nevertheless, I still believe he had deceived himself.

And here I may be allowed a word or two on this composition of mine. It owed its origin to the accidental circumstance that the name of a small town in which a musical friend of mine resided contained letters answering to the same notes as those of my own name; and this suggested to me one of those jeux d'esprit which, since Bach set the example, have been common enough in music. It was composed, piece by piece, just at the time of the Carnival of 1835, but my motive throughout was serious, and the inter-connection of the whole is close enough. Afterwards I added titles to the different pieces, and called the whole collection "Carneval." It contains many things which may charm individual hearers, but the moods of the music change too rapidly to allow of its being followed by the general public, who dislike being disturbed every other minute. This fact, as I have already said, had not been sufficiently considered by my good friend Liszt; and though he played with so much interest and geniality as probably to affect people here and there, yet the audience at large remained unmoved. With Hiller's Studies it was very different. Being in a familiar form, they readily made their way, and two of them—in D flat and in E minor—were received with great favor. Mendelssohn's Concerto we already knew in all its tranquil and masterly clearness, through the performance of its composer. Liszt played it, as I said, almost at sight, a feat in which it would be impossible for any one to imitate him. His powers of execution came out in full glory in the last piece of the programme—the "Hexameron"—a set of variations by Thalberg, Herz, Pixis, and himself. It is truly wonderful to think where he can have found strength to repeat, as he did, fully half the variations, and then, to the rapture of the audience, to wind up with his Galop!

In conclusion, I have only one thing to regret—that he did not give the public an opportunity of hearing him in any of Chopin's pieces, which he plays incomparably and with the greatest affection. In his own room he cheerfully plays anything one asks for, and often I have listened to him there with astonishment. He left us on Thursday morning.

Music Abroad.

London.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. (From the Times, March 9). A very interesting novelty was introduced on Monday night, in the shape of an Ottet, for string and wind instruments, by Schubert. Some will, doubtless, think it strange that this remarkable work should never till now have been heard at the Monday Popular Concerts, but they can hardly have taken into consideration the extraordinary number of compositions, in almost every form, which have been brought forward at St. James's Hall since February 1859. It should not be forgotten that even Mozart and Beethoven have left many splendid pieces that still await a hearing; that Haydn has, at least fifty quartets wholly unknown to the large majority of Mr. Chappell's supporters; that Spohr has a very great number to select from, and that Mendelssohn is not by any means exhausted. The movement on behalf of Schumann has of late introduced a new element, and while the degree of absolute merit belonging to that master is and is likely to remain a vexed question, his works are not frequently allowed to take precedence of others about which there could possibly be no question at all. Not only Schumann, but Schumann's protégés and imitators have been admitted; and only the other night we were favored with a specimen of Herr Johannes Brahms, about whom Schumann openly preached as the new light that was to clear up all difficulties. Nevertheless, the Sestet in B flat, for string instruments, of Herr Brahms fell dead, admirably as it was played by Herr Joachim and his associates.

That Schubert was one of the most wonderfully gifted of musicians is beyond dispute. His six hundred songs alone would have proclaimed that; but now one great instrumental composition after another, in the shape of symphony, quintet, quartet, sonata, &c., comes to proclaim it with tenfold emphasis. Not the least convincing among them is the Ottet introduced for the first time on the occasion under notice—a work of genius, if there ever was one. The two movements—Andante with variations and minuet with trio—omitted from the seven of which the entire work consists, are comparatively unimportant, although none who are acquainted with them can deny their beauty. They are, however, in the manner of Spohr, a manner which happily Schubert very rarely adopted. On the whole, therefore the Ottet may be said to have enjoyed a fair opportunity of appreciation; and, thanks to its splendid execution by MM. Joachim, Ries (violins), Blagrove (viola), Piatti (violinello), Reynolds (double-bass), Lazarus (clarinet), C. Harper (horn), and Winterbottom (bassoon), the audience were well initiated into the countless beauties of detail which keep up its interest from one end to the other. The applause at the termination was enthusiastic, and two of the movements—an exquisite Andante in B flat, and a Scherzo with trio that might have been signed "Beethoven"—would cheerfully have been listened to again by the whole room, so engagingly melodious is the one, and so full of vigorous life the other.

Herr Joachim added to the attractions of the concert by the most magnificent performance even he has given of J. S. Bach's marvellous Chaconne with variations; the thunders of applause that followed compelled the unequalled artist again to come forward and play the opening prelude to one of the same composer's solo sonatas. The pianist was Herr Ernst Pauer, whose classical taste was manifested in his choice for solo of the Fantasia in F sharp minor by Mendelssohn. The other instrumental piece was Beethoven's trio in E flat, No. 1, Op. 1, played by MM. Pauer, Joachim, and Piatti.

(From the Morning Star, March 20.) Mme. Arabella Goddard took her annual benefit on Monday evening, and once more evidenced her untiring zeal for the art of which she is so bright an ornament, by producing for the first time at these concerts, Beethoven's stupendous pianoforte sonata in B flat major, Op. 106, written by its illustrious composer late in life, and during a season of great adversity, inasmuch as this very work had to be sold in London to meet the then existing necessity Beethoven had for funds. He says in his letter to his friend and pupil, Ferdinand Ries:—"Don't forget Sonata Op. 106, and the money." The work, however, has hardly ever been played, as it contains passages insurmountable even to most professors. It opens with a pompous allegro; the theme, which is particularly striking, is worked through several progressions of harmony until the scherzo is reached, which is of the truly Beethoven kind, playful and spirited throughout. This at last gives way to an adagio in the remote key of F sharp minor, which, perhaps, is the most impassioned movement ever written for the piano. Beethoven seems, as it were, to have taken his favorite instrument into his confidence, and knowing, as we do, the anguish of his mind at the time of its composition, it would seem that he poured out his soul in this wonderful lamentation, as it winds its way through the various transition of keys, until, apparently wearied with itself, it dies in a pianissimo effect. The listener is only awakened from his reverie as the concluding allegro risoluto is dashed off, which being in the fugue style, it brings about that charming antagonism of ideas which Beethoven knew so well how to treat. The climax of the finale is reached in a majestic passage built upon the original theme. Mme. Goddard, by this exertion of her splendid talent in producing an almost unplayable work, has earned the thanks of all amateurs, and has achieved the supremacy over all living pianists. The fair performer seemed to linger on the pathetic tones of the great adagio movement with a fondness that spoke with an eloquence we can only record, but which it is impossible to describe. When Mme. Goddard retired after this remarkable display, a perfect ovation followed her, until she was compelled to reappear on the platform, in acknowledgment of applause as hearty and genuine as we have ever heard accorded to any artist on any occasion. The concert opened with Mozart's quartet in D minor, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, performed by Messrs. Joachim, Ries, Blagrove, and Piatti. The last named gentleman also performed a sonata in C major, by Boccherini, in such a manner as to obtain an encore for the finale. The concert concluded with the Krentzer Sonata, played, of course by Mme. Goddard and Herr Joachim. Mr. Cummings sang Handel's "Deeper and deeper still," from Jephtha, and a novelty in the shape of a song called "The Sonnet," written by Mendelssohn in 1831, and now for the first time published. Mr. Benedict was the conductor.

OLD PHILHARMONIC. (From the Orchestra, March 16.) The Philharmonic Society inaugurated its fifty-fifth season on Monday, Mr. W. G. Cousins appearing for the first time in the post of conductor, vacated by the retirement of Professor Sterndale Bennett. The late conductor retired with the respects of many of the Society's well-wishers; for his personal friends outnumbered even his admirers. As a conductor Professor Bennett might have attained a higher position if his abilities in other respects had not thrown those special talents into the shade. Mr. Cousins has undertaken a task of considerable difficulty, to which, however, we consider him fully equal. Despite occasional cavillers and lukewarm supporters, we fully accredit Mr. Cousins with the power to deal with any emergency; an opinion further substantiated by his successful debut on Monday. The ordeal was no light one: Mr. Cousins had before him the hostile and censorious as well as the friendly; but the issue left but one opinion—that the new conductor is the man for his post. His beat is firm and decided, he possessed full control over his band, and was evidently master of the task before him. In the first piece of the programme, the C minor Symphony of Mendelssohn, composed in 1824, when the composer was between 14 and 15, the qualities of conductor and band were put to the test; but Mr. Cousins was evidently acquainted with every note. A stronger trial was Beethoven's glorious Symphony in A, but one which was no less successfully surmounted. An overture of Professor Bennett's—the "Naiads"—was given as a little memorial compliment, which was perfectly appreciated by the audience; and Cherubini's "Incense" made up the programme. Herr Joachim was in good force, and his fine playing showed to great advantage with the orchestral accompaniments played in such a manner as to preserve a correct musical perspective. The vocalists were Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. H. Cummings.

HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR. A second extra concert was given, when the "Antigone" was repeated, omitting the bulk of the read text, which Miss Kate Saville previously delivered. The execution was highly satisfactory—finer if possible than on the first occasion. A miscellaneous selection followed, including the overtures to Cherubini's "Deux Journées" and to "Oberon," and an admirable playing by Mr. Charles Hallé of Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in C. Miss Ada Jackson sang very well, and Mr. Cummings was in excellent voice.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON. The ninth season commenced March 20. We had the "Walpurgis-Nacht" cantata executed in a style which only had one defect—the solo singing of Mr. Leigh Wilson, who was inaudible beyond the first half dozen rows of stalls. Miss Julia Elton was discriminating, if her audience were cold; Mr. Lewis Thomas sang carefully and well. Haydn's familiar symphony in E flat was performed with much gusto, and the elaborate andante found general favor. A quaint and pleasing effect was attained in Schumann's vocal piece, "Gipsy-Life," sung by eighty choristers and full orchestra; it provoked an encore. Mme. Schumann's playing formed a strong point d'appui; the delightful concerto by Mozart, in D minor, and the Choral Fantasia of Beethoven brought out her elaborate and delicate style of playing and her wonderful bravura.

Paris.

OPERA. Of Verdi's new piece, "Don Carlos," the correspondent of the Orchestra writes (March 20) as follows. Verdi's imagination like, that of his own gypsy Azucena, seems still haunted by the whirling music of burnings at the stake:

As regards the lyrical portion, I can only repeat my first impression: it is indifferently dull, and its dullness is only relieved by a lively trio, a great march, and the one air for mezzo-soprano. Of the libretto there is a little more to be said, though but small redeeming things. I told you the plot was Schiller's, and so it is, but there are deviations from the original, which I find on comparing notes; and the librettists' interpolations, omissions, and alterations are not improvements. But as no one ever reads, and few can understand the plot of an opera, or are disposed to criticize the dialogue, let that pass. The first scene represents the forest of Fontainebleau. The ground is covered with hoar frost, which gives to the scene as dreary an aspect as the Bois de Boulogne in the famous picture, "The Duel after the Masquerade." Elizabeth of Valois (Madame Sass) has escaped from the neighboring castle, from whose turrets the lights are gleaming, to meet her lover in the forest. The season is somewhat inopportune to billing and cooing; but they impart their loves in a duet which was scarcely audible, since it was drowned by a running accompaniment of opera doors being slammed, and by obese Frenchmen waddling their way to their stalls and putting more punctual people to intolerable annoyance and inconvenience. This is always the case in Paris; for men will smoke after dinner, and ladies must take many last lingering glances at their mirrors, give finishing touches of pearl powder, readjust their chignons, and hold post-prandial consultations with their maids. We must therefore suspend our criticism on the first act. The second is dull enough. A monk roams about the dreary corridor of the St. Just Monastery. He murmurs his resolve to save his grandson from Philip's wrath; and from this we glean that from under that monkish cowl gloom the once-dreaded features of Charles the Fifth, the monarchical Brother Ignatius. In the next scene the Marquis Posa (Faure) duets with the Don, who entrusts him with a letter for the Princess. She has become his father's bride, and the Don's respect for his papa does not dispel his intention to become a correspondent in a divorce case. The Don has evidently some dread of M. Vandal, since he enjoins his Mercury to be specially mindful of the missive. In the next act he delivers it to the Queen, and flirts with the Princess of Eboli, her lady of honor, whilst the Queen reads her love-letter. This trio is gay, impassioned, sparkling—Verdi all over. In its delineation of the combined expression of contending passions blending in exquisite harmony, it recalls the glorious quartet from "Rigoletto;" for ever and anon the fierce wail of blighted love is heard through the badinage of the courtly danger. The next act is ushered in by a ballet in which Gallic disjecta membra are displayed with their wonted prodigality. The scene, however, is of surpassing splendor, and displays with marvellous exactitude the architectural beauties of the Plaza and Cathedral at Valladolid. The gloomy King Philip marches at the head of a brilliant retinue with his bride; gladness beams upon that gloomy brow; his bosom's lord sits lightly on his throne, for no odor is so grateful to the nostrils as the flesh of a roasted heretic, and the steak is already prepared; the fires gleam in the Plaza, and a goodly batch of accursed Protestants stand ready to be grilled. Don Carlos enters at the head of a Flemish deputation: he asks for some privileges for those provinces, and for mercy for the heretics. The King has no mercy, no privileges. His son draws his sword, and seems as though he would renew M. Lemaire's parricidal exploits; but he is disarmed, and the King goes off with his retinue to his congenial amusements, his pious and paternal pleasures being sweetened by the reflection that his son is in a dungeon, whence he would never emerge. The march which escorts this pageant is magnificent in its melody; it may become popular as the marches in the "Prophète" and "Faust," without, however, resembling either; and exquisitely beautiful is the Queen's prayer for the souls of the heretics as they writhe at the stake during the auto-da-fé. The last act is a wild confusion of discordant sounds. They who had fallen asleep—and their name was legion—dreamed that they were in the Tower of Babel, and the wakeful fancied that they were in the Exhibition, where the clang of myriads of hammers vibrates on the tympanum with the howls of angry exhibitors, who find some rival installed in their vicinity. And amidst this wild confusion of wind and stringed instruments, spirit-stirring drums and ear-piercing fifes, the curtain fell, and from a lively recollection of past favors, the cries were loud for Verdi; but Verdi knew and felt that he had failed. He had made off in despair: but people saw a fine face behind a black beard in one of the boxes, and gave a thundering reception to the owner, who turned out not to be Verdi at all, but Baron Billiog. Such is popularity. Meanwhile "Don Carlos" is a fiasco, as results have proved. The stalls for the first representation were sold at 150f. in the morning, and rose to 600f. in the evening. The other night many stalls were empty, and there will be still many more aching voids at the subsequent representations.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 13, 1867.

Concerts.

THE HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION brought its second series (of Eight Symphony Concerts) to a successful close on Friday afternoon, March 29. All of these occasions will remain memorable with true music-lovers; but scarcely one of them proved more delightful than this last. The only fault was that in length it largely overreached the usual two hours. This was the programme:

Toccata in F, composed for Organ. Bach.
Arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser.
Concert Aria: "Non temer," with Violin obbligato.
Mozart.
Miss J. E. Houston, and Mr. Wm. Schultze.
Piano-forte Concerto, in G, Op. 58. Beethoven.
Hugo Leonhard.
Third Symphony: "Eroica," in E flat. Beethoven.
Andante Spianato and Polonaise Brillante, Op. 22, for Piano, with Orchestra. Chopin.
Hugo Leonhard.
Overture: "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" (Becalmed at Sea; a Breeze; Happy Voyage; Coming into Port). Mendelssohn.

The Bach Toccata rolled along more grandly even than it did last year, and in the orchestral form is certainly more clear to most ears than upon the Organ. How full of hearty, healthy life it is! It gives you a sense of generous, exhaustless power, of genius ten-fold stronger by its fond conformity to law, or rather of genius instinct with law, true to itself and that at once. Beautiful and grand and joyous it rolls on in rich, full waves. We heard the pianist say (during its rehearsal) that it put him in the right state to play afterwards, it "sounds so comfortable and makes one feel so comfortable." And so indeed it proved when his turn came.

What fitter place than this, then, to do justice to Mr. LEONHARD'S admirable playing of Beethoven's fourth Concerto, the most poetic, finely imaginative of them all, in G? His execution of the same task was one of the choice experiences of last year's concerts. Then we thought no praise could be too much for his rendering of it, and we were moved to write: "In technical respects and in poetic, nice conception and feeling of every beauty, in thoroughly musical and vital touch, it lacked nothing, nor, as a whole, could we conceive of its being played better. The Allegro is extremely difficult, a series of fitful passages" (all products of one creative mood, however, and related by close logical affinity), "short flights of fancy, delicate and bold, in which a certain wilful plenty of bravura is thoroughly vitalized with poesy,—coruscations and reflexions, as it were, from the highly charged orchestral background where the continuity of the main theme is all the time kept up. These passages were played with perfect precision and fine accent, no exaggeration and no falling short; even those double trills in the same hand, which one would think too much for any mortal fingers, came out clear and even; and the elaborate cadenza by Moscheles, in which he struck out great chords with such Beethoven-like fire, made great effect. The Andante, short as it is, and simple, is a piece of transcendent beauty, full of meaning. Here the musing, subdued cantabile passages, in answer to the repeated stern call of the orchestra, were so purely musical and chaste that, in this interval of ideal, inward music, we forgot for once all about execution, to be made pleasantly aware again of its triumphs, in a lighter form, by the graceful Rondo Finale, with another Moscheles cadenza. Mr. L., we believe, had never played with orchestra before, and he at once placed himself in the front rank." Has he not kept the place? And could anything be farther from the fact than the disparaging record which certain newspapers have made of his performance of the same work this second time? In comparing our unreserved praise of last year with the fresh impression this time, we cannot find it in the least exaggerated, and therefore do we recall it now. Indeed the artist seemed to do even better than before, and in clear, vital touch, in light and shade, in exquisite finish, in intelligent, intelligible conception and feeling of the work as a whole, to have gained, if that were possible. Such possession with the spirit of the whole, such mastery of every detail, was enough to ask of any interpreter:—and yet it has been hinted that he came to it unprepared! Such was not the feeling of the audience, judging by the breathless attention and the spontaneous applause; and surely not of artists and musicians, who compared notes together with delight after it. In the piece from Chopin—Andante for piano alone, followed by brilliant Polonaise with orchestra, the performer still grew in favor and was recalled with great warmth and unanimity.

The Aria: "Non temer," in which Mozart seems to have worked up some of the superabundance of lyrical inspiration for which he could not find room in his first great opera "Idomeneo," has only been heard here once before, in the superb singing of Parepa-Rosa. It is in the largest, noblest, highest dramatic style of the composer, an anticipation of the true Donna Anna vein. Miss HOUSTON had a trying task and made a good success in it. She threw herself into it with feeling, and, while her rendering was unequal, partly from want of greater weight of voice, there were passages which came out with right dramatic ring and fervor. It was an earnest, sincere lyric effort, and went to the heart. Perhaps the richly ornamental Violin obbligato part, which Mr. SCHULTZE played so finely, caught the light too much to allow the voice due prominence. Orchestrally and vocally, taken all together, it is a noble piece, and we hope that another time the opening recitative may not be omitted.

The "Heroic Symphony," third of the nine, and first of the great ones, in which Beethoven was all himself and like no other, had not been heard here for some years. It is more seldom played than any other but the ninth, and, for some reason hard to explain, it seems to excite less enthusiasm in a general public. Yet it is one of the grandest, richest and most beautiful of symphonic creations; altogether noble and heroic in its whole intention, setting with a steady, broad, resistless current toward its end. Possibly the somewhat broken up, ingenious character of the last movement, with its variations, its polyphonic, learned air in the working of two themes, may distract and fatigue the mind at last after the clear and unmistakable splendor of the first Allegro, the profound, universal, great grief (with visitations of divine hope) in the Marcia funebre, and the exciting multitudinous stir of the all-alive Scherzo. But from beginning to end the whole work is crowded with beauties, and new ones reveal themselves on every hearing. This time we think the Symphony was better appreciated than ever before in Boston; Mr. ZERRAHN had given it a careful rehearsal, and the orchestra were well up to their task.

The Mendelssohn Overture was also a revival of long ago. "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" it has been common to translate its title, thereby conveying a wholly false and absurd idea of its meaning; for how could there be a prosperous voyage over a calm sea? It is one of the most picturesque of Mendelssohn's overtures, and one of the most graphic and delicious instances that exist of the descriptive power of instrumental music—not descriptive in a clap-trap literal way, but in a true sense, which describes emotions and hints pictures, left however to the option of the hearer's free imagination. It is a musical picture in richly blended, now subdued, now freshest colors. First, the long-drawn, indolent drowsy harmonies, with sense of satiety of quiet in them, recall the feeling of being becalmed at sea; but the art is too interesting, too much poetry there, to let it become tedious. Then the rising of a breeze, which seems to creep through all the sails and tackle of the good ship, and set all in fitful, confused motion, till every thing at last takes one direction, and with buoyant rhythm, and exhilarating melody, on we go merrily before the wind; a plenty of side thoughts catch and charm attention for a moment; snatches of cantabile from cello, bassoon, &c., heard now and then amid the general on-sweep, suggest song and serenade and sentimental, happy times on deck, under the stars; now the wind is smart and ruffles all with a good will; now the motion is as smooth and tranquil as an infant's sleep; and now what mean those great sighs, in full chords, repeated higher and higher, that spring up so uncalled and so significant? Every one who has been bounding cheerily along in mid ocean must have heard them, and they reveal a true instinct of what is characteristic in ocean life. Mysterious sounds of an appalling grandeur; but merrily on we bound, forgetting them; and with salute of guns and blaze of trumpets we are sailing into port. One of the happiest renderings which our orchestra have ever given us was this.

And fitly with this music came the good ship Symphony Concerts, with flying colors inscribed "Harvard," safely into port at the end of this second happy and eventful voyage.

A proper celebration after landing, with grateful testimonial to the gallant crew (the orchestra) was the performance of the Ninth Symphony, with "Hymn to Joy," yesterday; a Festival with that same picture Overture for frontispiece; of which next time.

MISS ADDIE S. RYAN'S CONCERT, at Horticultural Hall, March 30, was a well-earned and hearty compliment to herself, and an occasion of real musical interest, as the programme shows:

1. Allegro from Quintet in B flat Mendelssohn. Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
2. Festgesang an die Künstler Mendelssohn Orphens Musical Society.
3. Aria. From Titus Mozart. (With Clarinet Obligato by T. Ryan)
4. Piano Solo (Andante spianato and Polovizse) Chopin. Mr. Leouhurl.
5. Tyrolese Song H. Proch. Miss Loring.
6. Duet. Liebesgarten Schumann. Miss Ryan and Mr. Kreissmann.
7. Part Songs. { a. Die Kypelle Becker. b. Jagerslust, Astel.
8. Songs. { a. Morgenruss Mendelssohn. b. Rheinisches Volkslied. } Miss Ryan.
9. Violin Solo. Tarantelle E. Schubert. Mr. Meisel.
10. Aria. From "Die Entführung" Mozart. Mr. Kreissmann.
11. Duet (From "Cosi fan tutte") Mozart. Misses Loring and Ryan.
12. Second Finale. From "Robert le Diable," Meyerbeer. Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

The concert began late, and we were only able to hear the first three pieces. Mendelssohn's noble chorus to words from Schiller's "Ode to the Artists" (sung here some eight years since at the Schiller Festival) was well sung by the "Orphens," and made as effective as the hall would allow. Miss RYAN had chosen admirably in her Mozart Aria, and sang it with rich, warm, sympathetic voice and good style and expression, though, from accidental cause, with not entire freedom from constraint. It was however, a highly creditable and rewarding effort.

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC. This suddenly arrived institution (already, we are told, extremely flourishing in a business way) inaugurated itself by a "Grand Vocal and Orchestral Concert," in the Music Hall, on the same evening, March 30. The programme was rather mixed, and not much after a Leipzig or any classically educational model; but it contained some sterling things, and others interesting for their novelty, with a long array of soloists. An orchestra of fair size, under ZERRAHN, opened the concert with the "Hebrides" overture and closed it with the Finale from the Fifth Symphony. Miss HORTON sang again the "Vai tener," with Mr. H. SREK for Violin Obligato, and with more favor than before, it seems. Mr. J. K. PAINE had a warm reception at his first appearance since his good experience with his Mass in Germany, and his performance of his Organ Fantasia and Fugue in E minor was encored. Mr. WILKING played a couple of Organ pieces ("Transcription, by Best, from Schumann, and Pastorale of his own.) Mr. J. W. WHITNEY sang "If with all your hearts" (Elijah) with artistic style. The Benedictus from Haydn's 15th Mass was sung by Miss HORTON, Miss STERLING, Messrs. WHITNEY & WISCH, with Organ accompaniment by S. P. TUCKERMAN.

The vocal point of interest, however, was the singing of the new Contra, Miss NETTIE STERLING, from New York. Too late for her first piece, an Aria by Mercadante, we only heard her in the "Three Fishermen" ballad (sung for an encore), and in one of Mr. GOLDBECK'S "Love Songs," called "Invocation," a short, dramatic declamatory piece, in modern style, and quite effective. The lady has one of the richest, clearest and most serviceable contralto voices that we have heard for a long while; not the air of Adelaide Phillips, nor the refined soulful expression of Miss Cary; but we should say real power and promise; a power as yet somewhat external and needing among other things, to get imbued and penetrated with the influence of good music.

Lastly we come to the chief feature of the evening, Mr. ROBERT GOLDBECK'S Piano Concerto in D, played by himself, for the first time with orchestra. The Directors of the new Conservatory, we suppose, would hardly affirm that their own original compositions should be often put on trial in concerts for the education of the taste of their pupils; no doubt, they would agree with us that Conservatory Concerts, of all others, should be classical. But as Mr. Goldbeck is a new man among us, assuming directorship in an institution with ambitious name and claims, it is but natural that he should wish to present his testimonials in the shape of a composition in large form. Of his piano forte performance we can speak with decided praise; his execution is remarkably clear, brilliant, even, well sustained; and he stands well at once among the best pianists of this now piano famous city. Of the Concerto as a composition it is harder to speak with certainty after a single hearing; but these are our observations. The first movement (Allegro con spirito) has good, decided themes, well worked up in the main, with a little too much of the fragmentary modern operatic sort of episodes, à la Liszt, Meyerbeer, &c., and so contrived as to keep the piano always in the most conspicuous light; orchestration clever, somewhat crude. We liked this movement the best; as having more of pith and point than the others. The slow movement (and yet not slow, Andante quasi Allegretto), pleasing enough, but not sufficiently contrasted either in character or tempo with the first. The Finale is a Pastorale, which we did not like; forced and awkward couplings of low bassoon and high oboe tones (how different from Beethoven in the Trio to the 9th Symphony Scherzo, and unequal in comparison); themes salient but not finely imaginative; orchestral coloring harsh and often coarse. Once or twice a leading phrase of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony turned up, and one longed for it to go on. On the whole, we should say, a work which shows musicianship and talent, but not settled in its direction, led astray by false sensational models, able to return we hope, and needing yet to be refined and clarified. But these are only notes of first impressions.

Mr. PERAYO'S Extra "Schubert Matinée," March 28, was mainly a repetition of the sixth (March 9), and drew a crowd of enthusiasts. Hummel's "Septet," Schubert's E flat Trio, and his Sonata in F minor (printed as four Impromptus) made even better impression than before. The vocal contributions were by Mr. RUODOLPHSEN, who sang Schubert's "Infantlied" and "Froches Blumen" in his best style.

ORCHESTRAL UNIONS. The sixth concert offered Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture and Mozart's E-flat Symphony. A young lad, Master SCHREMMANN, a pupil of Mr. EICHLER, made his debut as a violinist, in a Variation piece by De Bériot, leaving a most favorable impression. His tone is pure and true, and execution even and sustained and graceful. This week gave us Cherubini's fine Overture to "Anacreon," now a favorite, and Beethoven's 8th Symphony. Miss CLARA F. JOY, a pupil of Mr. LANG, made her first trial in public and performed Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise in a really artistic manner, at least for a pupil. Much may be expected of her.

We were sorry to lose the Concert Complimentary to Mr. G. F. HALL, lately returned from several years of vocal study in Europe. His Baritone is said to be of the noblest quality and excellently schooled. Signora GIULIA and Sig. LAMBERTI assisted. Selections all from Donizetti and Verdi, except the two fine orchestral pieces ("Molinsina" overture and E flat Symphony of Mozart), conducted by Mr. LANG.

CROWDED OUT Italian Opera, and much besides.

NEW YORK. Falshio was given last Thursday by the Germans at the Stadt Theatre, with Mmes. Johannsen and Rotter, and Messrs. Himmer, Himmer, Formes, Weinlich and Grosehel. Hermanns was to appear this week in his great part of Falstaff in Nicolai's "Merry Wives." Robert has been given too, in splendid style, with Mlle. Seelig as Ahee, Mme. Rotter as Isabella, and Himmer as Robert.

A novelty at the Academy of Music (Maretzek's troupe) has been Petrella's comic opera "The Carnival of Venice." The Albion says of it:

The plot is simple, but wisely selected in respect of comic opportunities. Signor Mazio, [Bellini] removes to a secluded retreat near Venice for the purpose of isolating two daughters, Albina and Rouelle [Misses Kellogg and Ronconi] from certain persistent admirers. Leaving home, and depositing the keys of the mansion with a stupid old servant, Cola [Signor Ronconi], his back is no sooner turned than the daughters, aided and abetted by a maiden aunt, Mimosa [Mme. Natali-Festa], wheedle Cola into allowing them to visit Venice and participate in the Carnival. There they meet the deceived father, and, after sundry most humorous adventures, the party return home. The last act is occupied by a final and determined attack on the rural retreat, by the lovers, Orestes and Pygades, [Baragli and Marra] and the commander of the fortress is compelled to surrender at discretion. Then the happiness of the lovers and tableau. The best portion of the first act is the buffo trio "Fascia grazia," especially the concluding movement commencing "Signor, credetemi," and is likely to become very popular. The gem of the opera occurs in the second act, when the daughters and the aunt induce poor Cola to sin by taking them to the Carnival. The music is in the form of a scena and quartet for two soprani, mezzo-soprano and primo-buffo, and is both effective and original. The ante-finale of this act, beginning "Desse son, non reggo pin," in which the entire dramatis personae take part, is one of the liveliest and most pleasing numbers—far more so than the somewhat ponderous one with which the act really ends. The third act affords Signor Ronconi an opportunity for displaying his apparently endless comic resources. In the last scene occurs a passage, "Ogni madre," which is one of the best pieces of buffo-writing extant. The ladies in the opera rather contribute undistinguishably to the general harmony, than shine in particular morceaux. "Il Carnivale" differs from "Crispino" chiefly in this very absence of detached arias for individual artists, and in the great amount of ensemble music. The music is throughout of the lightest and most dance-like, and the composer has caught the facile gaiety of the national character in its "hours of ease."

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 5.—The following was the programme of the 2d Concert of the Mendelssohn Society, given last Saturday evening at the Musical Fund Hall.

Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.	Germania Orchestra.
95th Psalm.....Mendelssohn.	Grand Cantata for Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.
Spring Song, "Song without Words," No. 6.....Mendelssohn.	Germania Orchestra.
Duet from Sappho: "Sweet Tears".....Pacini.	La Carità, Soprano Solo and Chorus.....Rossini.
Four-Part Song, "Early Spring".....Mendelssohn.	"The Hour Departs," Chorus.....Mendelssohn.
Grand Choral Fantasia.....Beethoven.	For Piano, Solo, Chorus and Orchestra.
Piano, H. G. Thunder.

By these performances, which were mainly experimental, and which, so far as the Society is concerned, have been successes, Mr. Louis, and his able and experienced coadjutor, Mr. H. G. Thunder, has demonstrated their fitness for the difficult task assumed by them of organizing and disciplining a new singing society. The "Mendelssohn" has already taken its position as an amiable and prosperous rival of the older "Handel and Haydn," and there seems to be sufficient esprit among its members, as well as energy in the direction, to ensure the stability of the organization. The Society numbers among its members several soloists of great promise, whose first appearances have been made under its auspices. Two of these, Misses Gormley and Forbes, possess voices of unusual power and sweetness, and will, doubtless, soon occupy a prominent position among our Philadelphia singers. These ladies are both pupils of Mr. Thunder, long and favorably known as one of our most intelligent and thorough musicians, whose performance of the Beethoven Choral Fantasia at this concert let me not omit to commend.

The Parepa-Rosa and Brignoli opera is the attraction for the coming week, Travatore, Norma, and The Barber being promised for the first three performances. Our people will regret the substitution of Patti-Strakosch for Adelaide Phillips in these representations.

Mr. Carl Roesse, pupil of Mr. Wolfsohn, announces a concert on Friday evening, April 12, at the Musical Fund, with this programme:

Piano Solo, Scherzo, B flat minor, op. 21.....Chopin.	Mr. Carl Roesse.
Songs, { a. I hear a small bird calling.....Mendelssohn.	{ b. Op. 243, No. 4.....Franz Abt.
	Miss Augusta Roesse.
Violin Solo, Les Echos.....Leonhard.	Mr. Wenzel Kopta.
Cavatina, (Elene di Colosa) "Dio che leggi".....Petrella.	Mad. Clara Brinkerhoff.
Rondeau brillant, (E flat, op. 62.....Weber.	Mr. Roesse.
Suabian Air—"s Schwabenmadel, The Suabian Girl.Proch.	Miss Roesse.
Violin Solo, The Witches' Dance.....Paganini.	Mr. Kopta.
Song.....Schumann.	Mad. Brinkerhoff.
Piano Solo { a. Wanderstunden, op. 80, No. 2.....Heller.	{ b. Schubert's Shakespeare Serenade.....Liszt.
	Mr. Roesse.
Song, "My Pretty Bird".....Rees.	Written for and Sung by Mad. Brinkerhoff.
Duo for two Pianos, Invitation to the Dance, (arr. by F. W. Braner.....Weber.	Mad. A. May and Mr. Carl Roesse.

Mr. Kopta, the principal attraction, has created quite a sensation by his performances elsewhere, and his debut here is awaited with much interest.

The "Germania" for their Rehearsal to-morrow afternoon, present this programme:

Overture, La Part du diable.....Auber.	Romanze, Corno Solo, (Mr. Dunn).....Voss.
Vorstaedler Waltzes.....Lanner.	Symphony, Consecration of Sounds, (Fisale).....Spohr.
Overture, Antigone.....Mendelssohn.	Introduction and Duet, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolaï.
Fisale to "Arlele".....Emanuel Bach.	MERCUTIO.

FARMINGTON, CONN. The pupils of Mr. KARL KLAUSER, the excellent teacher at Miss Porter's young ladies' school, who for many years has done so much to keep up a high classical tone among them, gave a Soirée on the 29th of March with the following choice programme:

Overture to "Egmont," for 8 hands.....Beethoven.	Autumn, Duet.....Mendelssohn.
Ballad in G minor, op. 23.....Chopin.	Fantasia and Fugue in C.....Mozart.
Torchlight Procession.....Meyerbeer.	Duet and Chorus.....Bishop.
Finale from op. 13 (Etudes symphoniques), arr. for four hands by Karl Klausner.....Schumann.	Polonaise, C sharp minor, op. 26, No. 1.....Chopin.
Song.....Schubert.	Andante and Scherzo from Symphony in C, for 8 hands.....Schubert.

Equally interesting were two concerts given at the same school (April 1 and 2) by Messrs. Mills and Thomas, of New York, who, though crowded with business before their departure for Europe, managed to pay a farewell visit to their friend Klausner's pupils. These were the 31st and 32nd of the regular Chamber Concerts; programmes as follows,—

SOIREE.
Sonata, E flat, piano and violin.....Mozart.	Sonata, G minor, op. 22, for piano.....Schumann.
Romanza for violin, in G, op. 49.....Beethoven.	Romanza from the E minor Concerto, op. 11.....Chopin.
Fantasia Impromptu, op. 66.....Chopin.	Sonata [Kreutzer], op. 47, for piano and violin.....Beethoven.

MATINEE.
Sonata in E, op. 12, No. 3, piano and violin.....Beethoven.	Paraphrase, "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Liszt.
Sonata for violin in G minor.....Tartini.	"Des Abends," from op. 12.....Schumann.
Valse in D flat, op. 64, No. 1.....Chopin.	Sonata for piano and violin, A minor, op. 105, Schumann.

WORCESTER. On the evening of Fast Day the "Choral Union" (composed of the old "Mozart" and "Beethoven" Societies), gave a concert to an audience which packed Mechanics Hall. The first part was miscellaneous: A Mendelssohn Organ Sonata (Mr. H. E. Parkhurst); Cavatina from I Puritani (Mrs. Smith); Scena and Aria by Mozart (Mrs. Munroe); Air: "O rest in the Lord," from Elijah (Do.); Song by Balfe (Mr. James Whitney); and choruses from Elijah.

Part II. consisted of the music to Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," adapted to the wholly different subject of "Engendi" by the sanctimonious squeamishness of our English cousins. It was sung without orchestra, with good piano accompaniment by Mr. B. D. Allen, Carl Zerrahn conducting. The Spy says it was exceedingly well performed.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Hail, glorious Apostle. (Hymn for St. Patrick's day). T. Comer. 40
A glorification of Ireland's great apostle, whom we all reverence. There are quite a number of verses, which go rapidly to the spirited air of "St. Patrick's day in the morning." Arranged for chorus.
- Full of Fun. Song. H. Paul. 30
About a man whose invincible good nature, and funny ways, caused people to shake their sides for twenty miles around, when he began to joke.
- Fairy visions and dreams of beauty, (Ah! s'estinto). Cavatine. Mercadante. 60 Quite difficult, yet not beyond the reach of any one with a flexible voice, and would, probably be very effective as an exhibition piece.
- Harvest day. Trio for female voices, "Harmoniennes." Concone. 40
Another of a very charming series, with an elegant movement of melody. The merry harvest maidens sing as they swing the sickle, and do not forget to drop, now and then, a handful for the gleaner. English words, as in the song above, by J. C. J.
- Beautiful bird, sing on. Song. T. H. Howe. 30
- Somebody's heart. Song. C. A. White. 50
Two good songs, by well-known composers.

Instrumental.

- Rhine Wine Lancers Quadrilles. Godfrey. 60
Godfrey's compositions are getting to be widely known, and he can hardly be accused, so far, of making one poor piece. Try this while it is new.
- La Venus aux Carottes. Quadrille. Marx. 40
An odd title, but the music is spirited and pleasing.
- West-end Polka, by D'Albert. For 3 performers by Rimbault. 75
It is a very pretty sight to view three young performers at one piano, with their nimble fingers keeping time together. This new piece, which is brilliant and not difficult, is excellent for practice, and good every way.
- Palermo Quadrille, by D'Albert. For 3 performers, by Rimbault. 75
Like the above, very brilliant, and a useful lesson piece.
- Mendelssohn's Wedding March. For 3 performers by Rimbault. 75
Needs no commendation or description, farther than saying that the triple arrangement makes it very easy, and quite within the reach of ordinary players.
- Falling spray. Fantasia. L. M. Hervey. 50
Very effective, as played by Mrs. Hervey, and will, doubtless, be a favorite.
- Mabel Waltzes. Piano and Violin. Godfrey.
Excellent for home concerts. The two instruments agree wonderfully well, when fairly played.
- Daisy Dean Quickstep. C. Farringer. 30

Books.

THE QUINTETTE ORCHESTRA. A collection of Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Contra-Dances, Polka Redowas, Schottisches, Mazourkas, and Serenade Pieces. Arranged for Two Violins, Clarinet, Cornet and Bass. In five books. (One for each instrument). For the Set, complete. $6.00

A fine collection of new and favorite music, for small orchestras.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double the rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 680.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 3.

Translations from Schumann.

(By "M. E. von G." for the London Musical World.)

(Continued from page 12).

PROGRAMME-MUSIC.

The difficult question how far instrumental music will avail in the representation of thoughts and situations is often regarded in too narrow a spirit. It is absurd to suppose that a composer takes up his pen with the miserable intention of expressing or depicting this or that actual fact. But for all that, no one should underrate the force of external influences and impressions. An idea will often act unconsciously on the musical imagination; the eye will often influence the ear; and the eye, being the most active of our organs, keeps constantly intruding the outlines of objects amongst the melodies and harmonies, which, as the music advances, become shaped and moulded into definite forms. The more the musical element associates such external thoughts and images with itself, the more poetical and picturesque will be the composition; and the more imaginative and strict is the conception of the composer, the more will he arouse and rivet his hearers. What is to prevent Beethoven, in the midst of his conceptions, being suddenly possessed by the idea of immortality? Why should his imagination not be kindled by the image of a mighty hero in ruin? Or why is some other composer not to be inspired by the recollection of happy times gone by? Are we to be ungrateful to Shakespeare because he has evoked from a young musician a work worthy of himself? or, in a word, shall we be unmindful of Nature, and deny how much we owe to her beauty and her majesty? Can music tell us nothing of Italy, of the Alps, of the ocean, of a spring morning?

It is even possible for music to derive a charm from images so minute as to make it surprising that they can be expressed. I was told by a composer that while writing a certain little piece he was continually haunted by the image of a butterfly swimming down a stream on a leaf, and this gave his music a delicacy and nuance which nothing could infuse but an actual image of the kind. In such exquisite genre-painting Schubert was a master; and I cannot resist recalling how a friend of mine, with whom I was playing one of Schubert's four-hand marches, on my asking if he had not definite figures before his mind, answered by saying: "Certainly; I am at Seville, a century ago, among the dons and donnas, promenading in trains, pointed shoes, rapiers, and all the rest." And the remarkable thing is, that I was myself seeing the same vision! Pardon me, reader, and despise not my poor parable.

Programme, or no programme, the one question is, "Has the music anything in it? above all, has it genius in it?"

REQUISITES FOR A GOOD PERFORMANCE.

Think for a moment what circumstances must concur in order that a fine composition may be heard in full dignity and glory! There must be, first, in the work itself, real, deep intention, and ideality in the composition; next, enthusiasm in the execution; thirdly, excellence in the performance—the whole orchestra playing like one man; fourthly, an inward craving and necessity on the part of both giver and receiver, audience and artist, the exact mood hit at the moment; fifthly, a thoroughly happy combination of all circumstances of time and space, comfort in sitting and hearing, &c.; sixthly, the power of evincing and communicating one's impressions, feelings and ideas, and of seeking one's pleasure reflected in the faces of one's friends.

Such a coincidence is almost like throwing six dice, and each turning up six.

MISCELLANEOUS.

1.

Composers, like mothers, often love those of their offspring best which have given them most trouble.

2.

A man who is acquainted with Shakspeare and Jean Paul, will make very different music from one whose sole instructors have been Marpurg and the contrapuntists; and the same is true of one who has mixed in the full stream of life and another who believes the Professor of his native town to be the ideal of all possible excellence—even though the abilities of the two are equally good, and their studies equally zealous.

3.

The Song is perhaps the only branch of music in which any really important progress has been made since Beethoven.

4. COMPOSING FOR THE STAGE.

A young Composer who attempts for the first time to write for the Stage has two things to keep expressly in view:—first, to employ all the skill that he is master of; and next, so to employ it as to make an effect and please the public. The first of these is too often the ruin of the second. How much that one has learnt and is able to do must be suppressed and relinquished when the object is to please and excite an audience! . . . An opera is no trifle. Set down the best musician to write for the theatre for the first time, and he will make a hundred blunders. He is bound not to do too much. He must give his singers opportunities for repose. His orchestra must have its proper pauses. The mechanical business of the stage, and the laws of the boards what consideration and experience do they not require! Before the composer can think of display, the manager must be satisfied. How much fine music has often to be sacrificed because the composer thought only of his music, and not of the boards he was writing for. Much weary labor must indeed be gone through before a piece can come before the audience in a really effective shape.

Reminiscences of Mendelssohn.

BY PROF. J. C. LOHR.

(Translated for Every Saturday from Die Gartenlaube.)

It was the beginning of November, in the year 1821, when three members of the Weimar Court Band, one of them the writer of these lines, in obedience to a summons from His Excellency the Privy-Counsellor von Goethe, were ushered by the servant into the well-known room, in the front of his house, opening upon the Frauenplan.

Three desks stood ready for us at the side of the opened piano. Upon the latter lay a bundle of manuscript music-notes. Curious as I always was and still am, in all matters connected with music, I turned over the leaves of the different pieces, and read: "Studies in double Counterpoint"; on another sheet, "Fugues"; on a third, "Canons." Then came "Quartet for the piano, with accompaniment of violin, bass-viol, and violoncello." On all the pieces was the name, "Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy." The notes were written in a firm, neat hand, and so far as I could tell by a rapid, cursory examination, the composition showed an expert, educated artist. The name Mendelssohn was unknown to us as that of a musician.

We had taken our instruments from their cases, and were busy tuning them into accord with the piano by way of preliminary, when there entered a tall man, who, on account of his still, military carriage, might well have been taken for an old-fashioned cavalry sergeant. He was not, however, a stranger to me.—I had visited him the year before in Berlin.—It was Professor Zelter, the well-known director of the Berlin Musical Academy, Goethe's intimate friend and companion.

He greeted us all courteously, myself as an "old acquaintance."

"I have come first, gentlemen," he continued, "in order to make a request of you in anticipation. You will presently become acquainted with a lad, of only twelve years old, my pupil, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. His skill as a performer upon the piano, and still more his talent for composition, will probably arouse in you some enthusiasm. The boy is, however, of a peculiar disposition. The loud applause of an audience of amateurs produces no impression upon him, but he is eagerly on the watch for the judgment of real musicians, and accepts every such criticism as genuine coin; for his childish nature is still too inexperienced to be able to distinguish between good-natured encouragement and well-merited approbation. Therefore, gentlemen, if you should possibly be excited to the height of a song of praise,—what I at the same time equally hope for and dread,—I beg you to pitch it in a moderate key, with not too loud an accompaniment, in fine, in C sharp, (a mistranslation for C major?—E.D., the most natural note in the scale. Thus far I have been able to guard him from vanity and too high an estimate of his talents,—those execrable enemies of all artistic progress."

Before we could make any reply to this somewhat singular address, the lad Felix came springing into the room, a handsome, brilliant boy, with a decidedly Jewish cast of features, slender, and active. Rich, wavy black hair fell upon his shoulders; genius and animation sparkled in his eyes. He looked at us a moment inquisitively, then came to us, and gave his hand to each with friendly confidence, as if we were old acquaintances.

With Felix had also entered Goethe, who returned our respectful bow with a friendly greeting.

"My friend," said he, waving his hand toward Zelter, "has brought with him a little gentleman from Berlin, who has already given us to-day a great surprise as a musician. Now we shall also make his acquaintance as a composer, and in this I must ask your co-operation. Let us hear then, my child, what thy young head has produced," he continued, gently stroking the lad's long, glossy locks.

The latter ran immediately to his notes, placed our parts before us on the music-stands, opened the principal part upon the desk of the pianoforte, and took his place quickly on the stool before the instrument. Zelter stationed himself behind Felix, to be ready to turn the leaves of his notes. Goethe some paces to one side, with his hand behind his back. The little composer glanced toward us with sparkling eyes, we laid the bows upon the strings of our instruments, an inclination of his dark locks, and the performance began.

Goethe listened to every note with the keenest attention, but without remark, except perhaps at the end of a piece an occasional "Good" or "Bravo," which he accompanied by a kindly nod of approval. Mindful of Zelter's warning, we also only by our gratified looks manifested our approval to the child, whose countenance glowed with an ever-deepening flush, as the performance progressed.

When the last composition came to an end, Felix sprang from his seat, and turned to each in succession with a questioning look. He seemed to wish to hear some expression of opinion as to his performance. Goethe, however, probably instigated by Zelter, took up the conversation, and said to Felix,—

"Bravo, my son! The countenances of these gentlemen," motioning toward us, "express plainly enough, that your compositions have pleased them well. Go, now, into the garden, where they are awaiting you, and refresh and cool yourself, for your face is flaming!"

Without reply, the boy darted from the room.

As we looked inquisitively toward Goethe, to see whether we were to be dismissed, he said,— "Remain a few moments longer, gentlemen. My friend and I wish to hear your opinion of this lad's composition."

A conversation of some length then ensued between us, the details of which I am indeed no longer able to give, after the lapse of so many years, especially as I find no memoranda of the same in my note-book. Many expressions and sentences, however, have remained impressed upon my memory; for my later and more intimate relations with Mendelssohn frequently gave me occasion to call to mind my first meeting with him.

Goethe expressed his regret that we had on this occasion made acquaintance with the little fellow only in concerted pieces. "Infant musical prodigies," said he, "are now-a-days, as far as regards technical skill, no longer so great rarities; but what this little man achieves in the execution of fantasias, and of pieces at sight, borders upon the wonderful, and I could never have believed it possible for one of such tender years."

"And yet in Frankfort you heard Mozart when still only in his seventh year!" cried Zelter.

"Yes," rejoined Goethe; "at that time I was myself only twelve years of age, and most certainly, like all the rest of the world, I was in the highest degree astonished by his extraordinary proficiency. What your pupil, however, already achieves, bears the same relation to the performances of Mozart at that age, which the uneducated language of a man does to the lisping of an infant!"

"Certainly," said Zelter, smiling, "as far as mere manual execution is concerned, Felix plays at sight, as simple exercises, and without missing a single note, the compositions by which Mozart in his day transported the world with astonishment. But still, many others can do this also. What I look at, however, is the creative genius of the lad, and, gentlemen," continued he, turning to us, "what think you of his quartet composition?"

We declared on our part, with fullest conviction, that Felix had shown many more original thoughts than had Mozart at the same age; for the latter had then produced nothing but clever imitations of what already existed. Accordingly, we had a right to conclude that the world would have, in this lad, a second and greater Mozart, and that the more surely, because he was in full enjoyment of exuberant health, while all other outward circumstances were favorable.

"May it be so!" said Goethe. "But who can say how a soul may develop itself in the lapse of years? We have seen so many talents, giving such fair promise of future achievements, go astray and deceive and disappoint our high expectations. From such sad issue, however, we may hope that this youthful genius will be guarded by the teacher whom good fortune has given him in Zelter."

"I strive to be very strict with the boy," said Zelter, "and, even in his own independent labors, seek to hold him in check by the curb of rigid counterpoint studies. But how long can this continue before he escapes my discipline? Even now, I can teach him nothing more of essential importance,—and once free, then first will it be manifested in what direction his own guidance will lead him."

"Yes, and especially," said Goethe, "is the influence of a teacher a problematical matter. Whatever the artist creates, which is truly great and original, he can only find within himself. To what teachers do you think Raphael, Michel Angelo, Haydn, Mozart, and all world-renowned masters, have owed their immortal creations?"

"It is true," remarked Zelter, "many have begun like Mozart, but as yet no one has equalled him in subsequent achievements." (Of Beethoven no mention was made, and therefore we have not instanced his name.)

"Felix has imagination, feeling, and technical ability, all in an eminent degree. In everything that he does, he manifests good, sometimes charming, and certainly far from puerile ideas, but as yet it is only pretty music, which still creeps upon the earth: we do not yet hear in it the accents of genius. In this I have not deceived myself. Do you not think so, gentlemen?" As he himself had expressed the opinion, we could not but assent. Still, I ventured to add, "In Mozart's boyish compositions, too, these accents were not yet audible."

I also hazarded the question, whether this quartet, as we had heard it, was entirely the child's own work.

"Yes, indeed," rejoined Zelter; "every note written by his own hand, and—created too, entirely by his own mind."

"What you have heard, he has just completed, without any assistance whatever. I know well the practice of many teachers. In order to exalt their own skill in teaching, they revise and correct the productions of their pupils until little or nothing remains of the ideas of the latter, and then give those out as the work of the scholars! This is nothing but disgraceful swindling and charlatanism. They deceive not only the relatives of their pupils and the public, but also the pupils themselves, who readily imagine that they have done everything themselves. It is an evil which has already proved the ruin of many a talent really of a high order, and hampered it in the higher development of its powers. My pupil, however, I leave to his own resources; I let him do what he is able to do at the time. In this way, the desire of creating remains ever fresh and active, because, at the time of its production, he is content with what he has done, and the pleasure which he takes in his success is not embittered by criticism. This comes soon enough of itself. The judgment grows and expands, and with this comes the inducement to fresh and better production. In this way, has this lad of twelve already written more than many a man of thirty. Let it turn out as it will, there they are, the necessary steps, which no one, not even the greatest genius, can do without or spring over. If Heaven shall only guard for us this rare plant from all baleful influences, most assuredly will it unfold itself as a bright exemplar of genius and beauty!"

This is all I can remember of that conversation.

SEVENTEEN YEARS LATER.

The boy had grown to a man. I had watched with interest the constant rise of his reputation and fame; had enjoyed with ever-increasing sympathy his compositions as they appeared one after another, each one more important, more elaborate than its predecessor; but for seventeen years I had not seen their author personally. Now, he was the celebrated Director of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, which by his talent and ability had been raised to such pre-eminence. On all sides the performances of this orchestra, under the baton of Mendelssohn as leader, had become renowned as the very best which could be heard in the way of exact, spirited, energetic, and delicately-elaborated execution of concerted music. What wonder that I longed to participate in this pleasure? So I set to work and wrote a composition for grand orchestra, and when it was completed applied by letter to Mendelssohn, with the request that I might be allowed to bring it forward in the Gewandhaus. I spoke of no pecuniary compensation, but only expressed the wish that I might myself direct the rehearsals and performance of my composition.

I soon afterward received a friendly letter from Mendelssohn, in which he informed me that my composition had been received with favor, its performance decided upon, and that it would also be very agreeable to the direction if I myself would bring it before the public. I mention this letter particularly, on account of a paragraph which characterizes his nature, so noble, amiable, even tender, and ever ready to render assistance to the utmost of his power, especially to those of his own profession. He writes: "It seems to me desirable also, that a remuneration—enough at least to cover some portion of your travelling expenses—should be offered to you, although you say nothing of this. Our means are, it must be confessed, very limited; nevertheless I thought this might not be unwelcome to you, and I also understand that the directors are of the same opinion." This was in November, 1838.

Soon afterward I came to Leipzig with my piece. Mendelssohn received me in the most friendly and cordial manner, and during the rehearsals assisted me with his advice most zealously, in order to render the final execution of the piece as perfect as possible. When on the eventful evening he came to me in the orchestra, and perceived the state of nervous excitement in which I was, he said,—

"You seem to be anxious."

"Indeed I am, most keenly anxious," I rejoined.

"Ah, bah!" said he, "there is no need of anything of that sort. Your work is good; that you know, as a matter of course. As to how the public may receive it to-day, what will that amount to? Do we ask better fortune than has so often befallen the greatest masters of all times with their very best works?"

My composition received, as the Leipzig criticisms said, a succès d'estime. I was most thoroughly disheartened, and from that time forward renounced the pleasures of composition. . . .

Subsequently I passed many a happy hour with Mendelssohn. He came frequently to Weimar, and on these occasions he played his most recent compositions for us and some of his most particular friends, either at my own house, or that of the then music-master Montag. But he always forbade any larger assemblies at such times.

"Let us have some music this evening," he used to say, "but quite by ourselves. If need be, we must be able to pull off our coats and play in our shirt-sleeves." One evening I did not come home from the rehearsal of an opera until ten o'clock. With a beaming face my wife met me with the question,—

"Who do you think has been here? Mendelssohn! He was passing through the city." (if I am not mistaken, this was on his bridal tour to Frankfort.) "and was sadly disappointed not to find you. 'I'll tell you what, my dear Frau Lobe,' said he, 'I will spend the two hours which I have to wait here, before the post goes out, with you, and, if agreeable, will play something for you,' so he seated himself at the piano, and for two whole hours, almost without interruption, played the most beautiful pieces for me alone, and extemporized divinely!"

One may well imagine that my wife has not forgotten nor ceased to be proud of that evening. At another time we had some music at Montag's house. Mendelssohn played his D minor trio. Then we undertook a quintet of my own composition, and in this he played the second violin very correctly and skillfully. Where opportunity offered, however, he sought in other ways, also, to do me some kindness or service. Thus, for example, he spoke most favorably of the above-mentioned quintet to my noble patroness and benefactress in many ways, the Grand Duchess Maria Pawlowna, whereupon that gracious lady remitted to me a very handsome present, "in consequence," as she wrote, "of an honorable recognition of your professional exertions by Dr. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy."

TWENTY-SIX YEARS LATER.

It may perhaps be little known that this vigorous, healthy man, active to an extreme degree, always so cheerful, so happy in all his relations, and recognizing so clearly his good fortune, was at times impressed with the presentiment of an early death. When he was bringing forward his "Paulus" in the Cathedral at Weimar, we were sitting together one day after a rehearsal in his room at the "Erbrprinz," and I—at that time an arrant hypochondriac—remarked that I would enjoy but little of his later compositions. He rejoined,—

"O, my dear friend, you will outlive me many a day!" I laughed at this assertion of his, but he interrupted me most seriously and decidedly with the words, "I shall not live to be an old man!" And then, as if he repented of this declaration, his features assumed their most cheerful expression, and he changed the conversation to a discussion of the rehearsal just ended, in which he especially dwelt upon and extolled the cordial and ready co-operation of all those associated with him in this performance.

How could I dream at that moment—when my companion was in but his thirtieth year, and the fulness of health—that a few years later his prophecy would be fulfilled. In 1846 I removed to Leipsic, and found him in glowing health and spirits, unceasingly active in every direction, enjoyed many an entertaining and instructive conversation with him, and one year after, in 1847, when only in his thirty-eighth year, twenty-six years after my first meeting with the handsome, spirited lad at Goethe's house, the great musician was borne from his residence in the Königsstrasse, to the Pauline Church. Among the mourners who followed his bier was the writer of these lines.

Hauts of Harmony in the City of London.

(Continued from page 11).

A contemplative stroll down the New Cut, Lambeth, served to restore our equanimity, and, trusting to find entertainment in the west, we hailed a passing "Hansom" and drove to the Oxford. The entrance to this popular place of amusement is sufficiently showy, if not in precise accordance with architectural rules. To the majority of our readers it is doubtless familiar; they have noticed it on their way to and from the city, and persons passing at a certain hour have possibly marvelled at the amount of litter, including dust, corks, and fragments of paper that are being swept from the arcade on to the pavement, or over the trousers of unwary pedestrians. At the end of an arched and richly decorated passage, the sides of which are ornamented with Ionic columns rising from gilt pedestals, springs a double staircase leading to the balcony, and beneath it are doors respectively conducting to the stalls and area. As regards its internal appearance, the Oxford is a mass of columns, arches, mirrors, chandeliers, gilding and paint, so combined as to form a whole generally pleasing, but with no great respect for received rules of art. The refreshment-bar and supper room are on the left as you enter, and in conspicuous positions in front and on each side of the stage are numerous private boxes, handsomely fitted with crimson drapery. An audience at the Oxford is of a superior stamp to one at the Canterbury, and is almost wholly composed of the male sex. We believe, however, that the prices of admission are at both halls much about the same, being sixpence for the area and a shilling for the balcony and stalls.

At the time of our arrival, which was a little after nine, a negro gentleman, in conventional costume, was in the full tide of a comic song, the precise import of which we were unable to catch, and whereof the intervals between the verses were embellished with one of those complicated salutatory movements familiar to the initiated as a "break down." The song being ended, the chairman arose, and "begged to call attention to a selection from Maillart's opera, "The Light Dragoons." Upon this, the curtains in front of the stage entrances were drawn aside, and divers ladies and gentlemen comprising the band, chorus, and leading vocalist, appeared. The latter assumed a position facing the audience; the instrumentalists occupied a slightly raised platform in their rear, and the members of the chorus fell into order at the sides—the ladies in front and the gentlemen behind. The conductor, who stood near one of the proscenium boxes, glanced round to see that everything was in working order, waved his wand to secure the requisite degree of attention, stamped lightly but decisively on the floor, and the performance commenced. It is not within our province to comment at length either upon the quality of the music, or the manner in which it was interpreted; it will be enough to remark that though containing much that is lively and agreeable, the "Light Dragoons" is rather deficient in originality, and so far as we can judge from the selection, inferior to the opera of "Lara," by the same author, which was produced a year or two ago at Her Majesty's Theatre. With regard to the merits of the performers, every one did well, but the honors of the evening were reserved for Miss Russell and Mr. A. St. Albyn. It may be as well to add, that the selections at the Canterbury are rendered by the same artists as those at the Oxford.

The opera being ended, a lively little man, in evening costume, hustled forward, and met with deserved applause in some amusing "character" songs and burlesque representations of popular singers. He was succeeded by Mr. Reynolds, of the Coldstream band, who played effectively on the cornet, and at the conclusion of a ballad sung by Miss Fitzhenry—a tall young lady, in a green velvet gown with a white satin border—the chairman wrapped decisively with his hammer, and announced a performance by the "great comedian" who had made such painful efforts to burlesque Mr. Kean, at the Canterbury. His entertainment—a mixture of prose and doggerel rhymes—was received with marked coldness, but a supplementary effort proved too much for the good-nature of the audience, and the unlucky performer retired amid a pelting storm of hisses. However, he re-appeared, and upon the restoration of silence, offered such remarks as he judged best calculated to appease the general indignation.—"He was extremely sorry; he had done his best, had never met with such treatment before, and trusted that there was no ill feeling in the matter. He had but lately returned from Scotland, and had been absent from the metropolitan stage for many years. Further than this, he was so extremely unwell that he ought never to have left his bed." Whereupon an energetic individual, of obtuse perceptions and an enviable power of lung, exclaimed, "Give us another song, old boy; never mind the goose hissing." But the motion was overruled—the "great comedian" retired, and as even merited failures have a depressing effect upon the spirits, we invested a spare copper or two in refreshment, and soon afterwards quitted the hall.

The entertainment that had resulted in such unpleasant consequences was of an exploded and witless kind, which depended for effect upon grotesque attitudes, a nasal twang, hideous contortions of the countenance, and an extravagant costume. It treated of the peculiarities of the various young ladies with whom the comedian professed to have been at different periods of his life enamored. The audience endured a great deal of rubbish with laudable equanimity, but the straw which broke the back of their patience was the following exasperating effort of the comic Muse, recited to the air of "The Cork Leg":

She was my beautiful Isabella,
I knocked him down with an umbrella,
He tumbled over into a cellar,
And then he cried out, "That's the fellow!"

—a statement that aroused general indignation, and led to a fiasco for which the rhymester may have been more to blame than the vocalist. It is consolatory to reflect that compositions of the kind above quoted are things of the past, and that, though there is still room for improvement, the popular taste has progressed, if only a little.

Let those who regard matters terrestrial with a "jaundiced eye" seek a remedy for their depression in a timely visit to the Alhambra. It is certainly the most cheerful as well as one of the best-conducted places of amusement in London. Its architectural peculiarities need no description, for those who are unfamiliar with the building in its present state, have probably visited it either when it was used as a Hippodrome, or struggled under difficulties as the Royal Panopticon of Science and Art. As a music-hall, it is not only admirably appointed and superbly decorated, but, unlike most theatres, it is seldom unpleasantly hot, and enjoys a happy immunity from offensive odors. The heavy chandelier which formerly hung from the dome has been replaced by an arabesque border of gas jets, and a central light so arranged as to diffuse but little heat, though it is at once picturesque and useful. The band is one of the finest in London, and if strictly classical music comes not within its scope, you may hear selections and favorite overtures performed in a manner to satisfy the most exacting connoisseur. The Alhambra ballets are not to be spoken of lightly. They are triumphs of art—salutary, pictorial, and mechanical. The glories of such productions as "King Dragonfly" and "The Balrush Fens" set powers of description at defiance. The "comic pantomime ballet," brought out at Christmas, abounded with fun and bustle. The most astonishing feats were performed by a showily-attired individual, who impersonated a "swell" of an undeveloped type and peculiar habits; and to judge from the applause of the audience, the Clown, Harlequin, Pantaloon, and Columbine were as efficient as any in London. In "The Mountain Gorge" we have an Eastern ballet, and some useful hints to Mussulmans and Cretans. We learnt from it that guns are not only of service in a fight, but wonderfully effective in a dance, especially when handled by ladies; also, that there is a degree of picturesqueness in an encampment by moonlight, which can be duly appreciated only when we are in perfect good humor with ourselves and neighbors, and untroubled by any fear of the provisions falling short. The overhanging rocks, mountain defile, clear moon, and luminous atmosphere are marvels of scenic art, and all thoughts of the painter's brush or mechanical contrivances are effectually forbidden.

Whatever your position in the Alhambra, you will always see and hear to advantage. As much cannot be said even of our smaller theatres, and it should be remembered that the vast building in Leicester square is capable of accommodating as many as 5,000 persons. Had we space, we might enlarge on the new and convenient "crush rooms," the improved means of access to and egress from the various parts of the building, the "greatly-enlarged" supper-room, "upwards of a hundred feet long," and the civility and attention displayed by every one connected with the establishment. The terms of admission are moderate, and range from sixpence for the upper balcony to three or four guineas for a commodious private box. We may add that, for the convenience of those who object to mixing with the crowd, reserved seats have been provided, price four shillings each. Mr. Strange certainly supplies the best and cheapest evening's entertainment in London. There is constant variety, and everything is good of its kind. More than this we cannot say, unless it be further praise to add that the Alhambra Palace is about the only redeeming feature of Leicester square.

On the site of an old-fashioned inn, known as the White Lion, which formerly stood in the Edgware road, and within half a mile of the Marble Arch, there has been erected a handsome and spacious music-hall, bearing the title of The Metropolitan. Its internal arrangements slightly resemble those at the Alhambra, though of course on a diminished scale; and whilst the prices of admission are surprisingly moderate—being sixpence for the area, ninepence for the balcony, and a shilling for the stalls—the accommodation is excellent, and the entertainments generally of a superior order. Of late, the whole of the interior has been brilliantly re-decorated, the audience has gained in respectability, and the refreshments have undergone a marked and much-needed improvement.

There is a stage, supplied with a picturesque act-drop and a fair stock of scenery, but too limited in extent to allow of extraordinary spectacular display. The band, though small, is efficient; and the entertainments include the usual allowance of serio and would-be comic songs, gymnastic feats, and theatrical dancing. "Mythological ballets" were attempted at one time, but have been wisely discontinued. "Sextilian," not inaptly termed the "wondrous," performs extraordinary feats with hoops and half-filled tumblers to an air from Haydn's "Seasons;" and the sensational element is supplied by a gentleman of reckless tendencies, who imperils his own limbs and other people's heads also by his "deeds of daring" on the "flying trapeze."

The "Jolly Nash" gains the thorough good-will of the audience, and not only enjoys a double encore, but has to apologize for not complying with further demands. The popular favorite seems to possess but a moderate share of talent, though much tact. He has an air of frankness and good-humor which pleases his listeners immensely. He affects the hearing of a sociable host entertaining his friends. When the audience joins in a chorus, he smiles and keeps time with his hand. He is always apparently anxious to gratify reasonable desires; but when his friends are exacting he excuses himself, though in such pleasant terms as to carry conviction to every one, and arouse a fresh enthusiasm.

There are a couple of curious music-halls opposite the barracks at Knightsbridge. They are respectively entitled The Sun and The Trevor; and if the former is the most decorously conducted, the latter is decidedly the most amusing. The Sun has lately been re-built, and is now a commodious, well lighted, and admirably-ventilated hall, in a composite style of architecture, of which the most prominent features appear to be columns of Gothic extraction, and classical friezes delineative of utterly impossible men on conventionally impossible horses. The passage at the entrance is of a gorgeous and bewildering description, and conducts to a spacious vestibule, whereof the roof is supported by a couple of elderly gen-men, who from the waist downwards are formed after the manner of mermaids. The hall itself, though spacious and substantial, savors much of the chapel. The "stalls" are approached by an underground passage, suggestive of the catacombs at Kensal Green, and having reached them, and glancing backwards, you observe a large gallery, resembling the spacious organ-lofts of old-fashioned churches. It is occupied by both civilians and military men, refreshing themselves with creature comforts, and attentively regarding the business of the stage.

The chairman, who occupies a raised seat in the "stalls," is strict in enforcing order, and it is pleasant to observe the snug little party which gathers round the table whereat he presides. In addition to being an energetic and courteous manager, he apparently possesses the gift of mental abstraction to an extraordinary degree, and even during the progress of a comic song, he may be observed making notes and abstruse calculations with a degree of calmness at once unique and impressive.

The performances usually commence with an operatic selection, and conclude with a composition of sterling merit—say the "War March of Priests," from Mendelssohn's "Athalia." It may be doubted whether music of so ambitious a cast comes within the scope even of the "greatly enlarged" orchestra, and we might have fancied that the audience would have preferred a waltz or a polka; but the conductor probably decides for the best, and it is gratifying to think that classical music is already on its journey to Hammersmith.

The "company" at the Sun, or Knightsbridge Music Hall, appears to be made up of a few "stars" and a good many "sticks." Amongst the former are the D'Aubans and Wards, who "brought the house down," in a species of farce, followed by some clever dancing, Sextilian the "inimitable," and the "great Vance." With regard to the last-named gentleman, if his merits have been unduly enlarged upon, they have also been unduly depreciated. His conceptions, though farcical, are seldom offensively extravagant. He does himself mischief by yielding to a clap-trap habit of "gagging," or extemporizing witticisms, for the delectation of the "groundlings." If he could conquer this propensity, he might sink in the estimation of the "area," but would escape destroying some almost perfect illusions. In his delineation of a self-satisfied member of the beau monde he is peculiarly happy, and the artist is effectually lost sight of in the character represented. There is an ease and nonchalance in the performance that are irresistibly charming. Though the minutiae of the picture are filled in with extraordinary care, there is no undue straining after effect, and some of the most significant touches are the more admirable from being apparently spontaneous. The "make-up" is perfect; every gesture is appropriate, and the affected drawl and conceited strut are sufficiently marked, but not so decided as to degenerate into buffoonery. In "Coster-monger Joe" there is much to admire, particularly the nervous fidgeting of the hands, the crafty smile, rapidly shifting changes of countenance, and gradual merging of awkward slyness into unabashed impudence. The "Life Guardsman" is a capital piece of costuming, and the dancing scene is life-like and humorous. The "great Vance" has an average voice, which he employs effectively. We have been told that he is not popular with the "profession," but then he has enjoyed an extraordinary degree of success, and a prophet is rarely held in esteem by those of his own calling. His mannerism is closely copied by the majority of his censurers, but he possesses a certain quaint originality which is incapable of being reproduced in other persons. We are acquainted with one gentleman, who is a fair imitation so long as he refrains from action and keeps his mouth closed, but though clever in his "make-up," his performances sooner or later degenerate into unmeaning buffoonery, and though there may be something particularly mirth-provoking in a squint, it is one of those efforts of genius to which recourse should not be had more than half-a-dozen times in five minutes.

ARTHUR OGILVY.

(To be continued.)

The Musical Capabilities of the Chinese.

A curious production of the London Missionary Society's press, at Hong Kong, has just been received by the Rev. John Curwen, of Plaistow. It is a small tract, containing about a dozen of our most favorite psalm tunes, such as Keil, Parrant, S. Michael's, etc., printed in the Tonic Sol-fa Notation of music, with Chinese characters to indicate the Notes. A gentleman connected with the Civil Service in Hong-Kong has originated and conducted for some months past a Tonic Sol-fa singing class in connexion with Union Church. In a letter, which accompanies the little book, there is the following very interesting information:—"As I believe this to be almost the first attempt to teach the reading of music to these wonderful people, perhaps you will allow me a few words of explanation. Chinese hymns are naturally in sevens. All other metres are importations. Therefore, nearly all the tunes I send you are sevens. Begin at the wrong end of the book and read from right to left. The Chinese themselves have no tunes and no idea of music. Their instruments can produce only two or three notes, and their singing is screeching in falsetto to no kind of tune. About six months ago, it was proposed to commence a singing class, in the hope of forming a choir for the Chinese service at Union Church. With the help of Dr. Legge (London Mission) and Mr. H. Alog, a good number were gathered of all ages. A large "modulator" (pictorial representation of the scale used by sol-faists), was prepared. An attempt had been made before to use our method, but the young gentleman who conducted it knew no Chinese, and Dr. Legge no music, so it fell through. Sheets of lessons were used at first. When these became cumbersome, Dr. Legge kindly printed the tune book. In the sight singing, if the tune be an easy one, as St. Michael's, Tallis, French, it is positively sung the first time without error; if a difficult one, two or three trials may be required. Difficulties have been met with peculiarly to the people. The conventional terms of 'high' and 'low,' were utterly unknown to them. Why, they asked, should a shrill note be 'up,' and a grave note 'down?' Their voices are harsh to a painful degree, and their talent for flattening wonderful. They must never be asked to go above D, and after half-an-hour's singing, lose all command of their voices. They also incline to bawl. The notes fa and te (subdominant and leading note), give them great trouble. Many cannot sing them, and most take ingenious ways of evading them. All, however, are willing to try. The class has now been introduced into our beautiful church, as a choir for the native service, and after a short struggle with the old principle, of each man singing as was good in his own eyes, the service of song is improved and improving."

Music Abroad.

London.

OPERA. The annual proclamations of the rival managers are out, as loud and long as ever; and indeed the Royal Italian (Covent Garden) actually opened on the 2nd inst. with Norma; the principal role by Mme. Vilda, who won her English success in that last year; the other parts by Mme. Sherrington, Signor Naudin and Attri. Faust was to come next. Mr. Gye promises but two new pieces: Gounod's Romeo and Juliet (with Adelina Patti), and Verdi's Don Carlos (with Pauline Lucea). The list of engagements furthermore includes: Mlle. Frizzi; Milles. Ackermann and Nau (first time in England); Miss Morensi (American); Mlle. Liebhart, and Mme. Dall'Anese; Messrs. Mario, Neri-Baraldi, Naudin, Fancelli, Rossi, Marino, Cotigni, Guadagnini (the last three new to England), Ronconi, Graziani, Ciampi, Fallar, Tagliafico, Polonini, Cappon, and (another first appearance) Bagagiolo. Of course Costa is conductor.

Her Majesty's opens this very day (the 27th), and Mr. Mapleson's proclamation is in spread-eagle style worthy of our Gilmore. For prime donne asso. luto he announces Titiens, Mlle. Nilsson (first appearance in England), Mlle. Ubrieh, from Hanover, Milles. Sinico, Giacconi, from Genoa, and Ilma de Murska. For mezzo-sopranos and contraltos: Mme. Demerie-Lablache, Mlle. Eracleo (new), from Madrid, Mlle. Martelli (new), from Lisbon, and Mme. Trebelli-Bettini. For tenors: Mongini, Hohter, Tascari and Gardoni; baritones and basses: Gassier, Santley, Pandolfini, Bossi, Foli and Rokitansky. The operas promised are: Verdi's La Forza del Destino (first time) and I Lombardi; Rossini's Tell, Scmiramide and Donna del Lago; Spontini's Vestale; Nicolai's Falstaff; Mozart's Don Giovanni and Nozze di Figaro; Gounod's Mirella; Meyerbeer's Dinorah and Huguenots; Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia; Beethoven's Fidelio; Weber's Oberon and Freyschutz; Cherubini's Medea; Bellini's Sonnambula. Sig. Arditì is conductor still.

The recent Concert record of London is so rich in interest that we must copy largely:

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. Herr Manns, the conductor of these popular entertainments, seems to have done more than any man to overcome the English prejudice against Schumann. Lately he has brought out Paradise and the Peri. The Musical World, still harping on the "laborious dullness" of this beautiful Cantata, says:

Nevertheless, the Schumann question is just now the most significant musical question of the day, and Herr Manns deserves the gratitude of the thinking public for allowing them such excellent opportunities of judging for themselves. With the symphonies and overtures he may be said to have made way; but, unhappily, his occasional choros is by no means so efficient as his instrumental orchestra. Thus, while the instrumental part of the music was more satisfactory on Saturday than heretofore, the choral parts were not much better. Nor can it be forgotten that on the first introduction to England of Paradise and the Peri, at the Philharmonic Concerts, the music of the Peri was undertaken by Mme. Lind Goldschmidt, and sung in such a style as to make rivalry altogether hopeless. A more fatiguing part was never written for a human voice; and this, on Saturday, was evidently felt by Mme. Lemmens Sherrington, notwithstanding her bright, flexible voice and great musical ability. The other soprano was Miss Robertine Henderson, who does whatever may be assigned to her, important or subordinate, invariably well; Miss Julia Elton was the contralto; Mr. Cummings—with music as ungrateful and ineffective in its way as that of the first soprano—tenor; and Mr. Lewis Thomas principal bass baritone. The whole cantata, with the exception of a baritone air and a chorus, in the third part, was performed; and the effect was indescribably heavy. Nevertheless, the last movement in the second finale obtained an encore from a minority of the audience, which was accepted with eager alacrity by Herr Manns.

The same article goes on to show how interesting, otherwise, the Crystal Palace concerts are:

Far more interesting was the repetition, at the preceding concert, of the exquisitely beautiful entr'actes from Schubert's Rosamunde, with the addition of an air de ballet, which, in spite of its unaffected simplicity, was quite worthy of the rest. Such ballet music would make the fortune of many a composer who aimed no lower than opera itself. On this occasion Mme. Rudersdorff sang the romance, which, as before, was unanimously called for again. At the same concert Herr Joachim gave a magnificent reading of Beethoven's violin concerto; the first of the four overtures to the opera of Leonore (Fidelio), in its way as interesting as any of its successors, was performed; and Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's deeply felt, admirably written, and brilliantly scored overture, In Memoriam, was repeated, creating even a livelier impression than at first. This work, more than any other from his pen, justifies the high expectations we have always entertained of the young composer. In addition to Beethoven's concerto, Herr Joachim played the quaint and charming middle movement from his Hungarian concerto, the whole of which would have been still more acceptable, besides the prelude to J. S. Bach's violin sonata solo, No. 6, as arranged by the composer himself with orchestral accompaniments and styled "Sinfonia." In the way of pianists we have had, of course, Mme. Schumann, who, with Beethoven's great concerto in E flat, invariably shines, and in compliment to whom, at the same concert, her late husband's very original and striking symphony in D minor (No. 2) was included in the programme, as well as the finest of Mendelssohn's concert overtures, Die Hebriden (Fingal's Cave), which never, in our remembrance, has been so perfectly executed. Miss Madeline Schiller, at another concert, gave the admirers of modern pianoforte music a genuine treat by her brilliant execution of the fourth concerto of Professor Moscheles, who (pianists should be reminded) has published several other concertos besides the "G minor" and that with the "Grenadier's March" as theme for finale, the one chosen for the occasion by Miss Schiller. To have done with pianists, at another concert the second and most difficult pianoforte concerto of Mendelssohn was admirably played by Mr. Franklin Taylor, who has more than once distinguished himself at the Crystal Palace, but never so conspicuously as by his fine performance of this splendid work, into the spirit of which he entered thoroughly, his reading being as artistic as his execution was correct and effective. On the same day the symphony was Beethoven's No. 1, the overture Wagner's Tannhäuser—to name two things in music more utterly opposed in every respect than which would be impossible. Which of the two is really music?—might be asked; for certainly both are not. Add to all these fine things a violin concerto of Spohr, executed in the noblest and most "classical" style by M. Sainton, who was, perhaps, never playing so uniformly well as now; Beethoven's Eighth Symphony (in F); Professor Bennett's concert overture, the Niads, and other pieces too numerous to specify. The fact is that the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts form a musical season, and a rich one, of themselves, and are enough to tempt any "fiancé," with leisure at disposal, to take up his residence at Sydenham for the sake of them.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The appointment of Mr. Cousins as Bennett's successor in the conductorship is far from being unanimously approved; but there seems to be a disposition to give him a fair trial, and the first concert, as we have seen, went off well. In the second concert an Orchestral Suite by Bach was played. The World says:

The series of concerts promises well. The directors are exhibiting unusual spirit. They have commissioned M. Gounod, Mr. Benedict and Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, to write new works expressly for the society; and last, not least, Professor Bennett has consented to add a slow movement to his symphony in G minor, and thus to complete a composition from every point of view remarkable. Beethoven's Choral Symphony is to be given at the fourth concert. At the second (on Monday), among other things, the same master's fourth symphony was performed; and Mlle. Mehlig, the new pianist, who was last year so successful in one of Hummel's pianoforte concertos, played the concerto in D of Mendelssohn.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON. The first concert of the season offered Mendelssohn's Waldpurgis Night, Haydn's Symphony in E flat (not one of the "Twelve"), Mozart's Piano Concerto in D minor, Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, Schumann's "Gipsy Life" Chorus, and Wallace's Maritima overture. There was a chorus of 80 professional singers with a splendid orchestra, conducted by Alfred Mellon (whose death is reported only a few days later!). The critic above quoted, says:

In the concerto and fantasia the pianist was Mme. Schumann, whose preference in the former of Mozart's authentic version to the fancifully embellished editions of Cramer and Hummel merits especial recognition. The effect must always be infinitely better thus, inasmuch as it is impossible for us to know how Mozart may have embellished his own melodies or varied his own passages, and it is quite certain that no one else could do it in the same manner, or in any other manner as well. Mme. Schumann, who introduced two cadenzas of her own, the first of moderate length, the second vexatiously brief, played with her accustomed energy, and was received with the accustomed favor. In the Choral Fantasia neither the chorus nor the orchestral accompaniments were all that could be wished.

MR. S. A. CHAPPELL'S Grand Orchestral Concert on Thursday night, in St. James's Hall was a brilliant success. A finer performance than that of Schubert's great symphony in C, by the Crystal Palace Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Manns, was never listened to. The "triple concerto" of Beethoven, with MM. Halle, Joachim, and Piatti at the solo instruments, was also a real treat, and perhaps Herr Joachim played Spohr's "Dramatic Concerto" better even than when he last performed it. The singing—by Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Cummings—was excellent, and the concert ended brilliantly with the brilliant overture to Oberon.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR. Mr. Henry Leslie's second performance of Antique (St. James's Hall) was even better than his first. On this occasion only so much of the dialogue was recited as comes immediately into connexion with the work of Mendelssohn, by which a great deal of time was gained and the effect of the music in no way impaired. A few sentences of narrative explained the leading incidents, scene after scene; and these, like the retained dialogue, were delivered by Mr. Wallworth in a thoroughly unsophisticated manner. The audience seemed to like Antique even better than before; for not only was the magnificent "Hymn to Bacchus" encored, but also the beautiful "Ode to Eros" (sung by Messrs. Cummings, F. Walker, Chaplin Henry, and Smythson). After this success, for which Mr. Henry Leslie has labored so zealously, the Edipus must surely follow. The concert was otherwise highly interesting, including among other things, Cberubini's overture to Les deux Journées and Weber's to Oberon, Beethoven's fourth piano-forte concerto (in G), played with wonderful neatness and accuracy by Mr. Charles Hallé, though somewhat carelessly accompanied by the orchestra; and songs by Miss Ada Jackson and Mr. Cummings.

THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS ended in a benefit to Mr. Arthur Chappell, the director, with a very remarkable programme; the leading piece being Bach's Concerto in D minor for three pianos, played by Mme. Clara Schumann, Mme. Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé. (Mosecheles, Thalberg and Mendelssohn played it in London in 1844; here in Boston it was played in 1853 by Jaell, Scharf-enberg and Dresel). The Morning Star says:

Steadily and simultaneously, as if the three keyboards had been worked by one pair of hands, the piece proceeded, the five stringed instruments which formed the orchestra of the occasion (played by Messrs. Joachim, Blagrove, Ries, Piatti, and Reynolds) supporting the piano-fortes with the most unremitting precision, and the audience remained spell-bound until the last bar came to an end with one of those ringing effects peculiar to the time and school of which John Sebastian Bach was so illustrious an example. Then rapturous cheers broke forth, together with verbal utterances of intense appreciation, and a summons for the performers to appear again ran through the hall, which was responded to first by Mme. Schumann and Mr. Hallé, and then by our English pearl of artists, Arabella Goddard. It is impossible that an event more thoroughly splendid and perfect of its kind can have taken place at any public entertainment in the world.

The other performances, which constituted a bill of fare prodigious in length as in quality, have charms which will be recognized by the briefest allusion. There was Beethoven's tuneful serenade trio in D major (Op. 8), played by Messrs. Joachim, H. Blagrove and Piatti, in the finest style of those well-matched coadjutors; there were several of those irresistible tit-bits from Bach's harpsichord lessons, which Mr. Charles Hallé executes with such loving care and neatness; Spohr's graceful Barcarolle and scherzo for violin, given with Herr Joachim's own rapture-raising tone and expression; a nocturne by Chopin, and the scherzo from Weber's pianoforte sonata in A flat, performed by Mme. Schumann; and Bocherini's melodious violoncello sonata in A major, played, of course, by Signor Piatti, and now heard for the eighteenth time at these concerts. Miss Edith Wynne fulfilled the not too grateful task of singing four songs, alternating with the instrumental pieces of the most engrossing kind, in a manner which won unanimous approbation. Lastly, there was Haydn's string quartet in D major, Op. 61, No. 1, with the favorite quatuor cantino, of all things best calculated to bring a season to a jubilant termination.

DEATH OF ALFRED MELLON. After a brief but severe illness Mr. Alfred Mellon died on Wednesday night, at a quarter to twelve, at his residence in "The Vale," King's Road, Chelsea. The indisposition that proved fatal was a relapse from a previous illness which had lasted through a great part of the autumn and early winter of 1866, and from which it was hoped he had entirely recovered. By the death of Mr. Mellon the musical profession has lost the most generally and justly esteemed of our English orchestral conductors. From his first arrival in London, some three or four and twenty years ago, his aptitude for this department of the musical calling was manifested; and much of his experience was gained by directing the small orchestra of the Adelphi Theatre. His first independent undertaking was the Orchestral Union, under which name a society was established whose concerts, with a small but well-balanced orchestra, conducted by himself, speedily obtained a wide and legitimate reputation,—a reputation more than confirmed when, the numerical strength of the orchestra being materially increased, he was enabled to give some of the finest performances of classical music that had ever been heard in England. Indeed, although Mr. Mellon held a high position at the Royal Italian Opera from the first, it was to the Orchestral Union that he chiefly owed his well-earned fame as a conductor. This led to his being engaged as musical director to the Royal English Opera, originally set on foot by Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison, at the Lyceum Theatre in 1857, and afterwards removed to Covent Garden,— a speculation which, though it did not terminate prosperously, proved of real service to English operatic music, and, with more liberal support from the public, might have laid the solid foundation of a national lyric theatre. As a conductor of opera Mr. Mellon was no less eminently gifted than as a conductor of orchestral music; and this was shown at a later period when, at the head of the musical department of the English Opera Company, it was his duty to prepare for representation not only several English works of importance, but also the English version of Meyerbeer's Africaine. Mr. Mellon's great ability was, perhaps, never more emphatically proclaimed than at the concerts of the Musical Society of London, which he directed from the beginning, and at which he had, perhaps the grandest orchestra under command that up to that time had ever been assembled in a London concert-room. Even now the magnificent performance, under his direction, of Spohr's great symphony, the Consecration of Sound, is remembered; and many are the triumphs in a similar direction which he subsequently achieved. His ability as a caterer for the public amusement was favorably exemplified by his Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre, where the judicious intermixture of "classical" with "popular" music, as well as the admirable performances of his orchestra, met with unanimous recognition. In addition, moreover, to other various duties, Mr. Mellon had recently accepted the conductorship of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, celebrated among the first musical institutions in the country. Here his talent, zeal, and indefatigable attention to business produced the same good results as elsewhere, and his loss will be severely felt.

As a musician Mr. Alfred Mellon held a distinguished and well-earned position. Under Herr Molique at Stuttgart, he made himself master of all the technical resources of his art, and many compositions from his pen, in the shape of quartets, &c., showed his ability to use them to excellent purpose. As a man he was universally esteemed, and as a friend his loss will be long and earnestly regretted. He died at the age of 46. It is hardly necessary to add that Mr. Mellon was the husband of one of the most popular and admirable actresses of our time.—Times.

Paris.

MUSIC AT THE FRENCH EXHIBITION. We learn from the statement recently published by the Imperial Commission that the music at will be represented at the Exhibition in the three-fold view of its composition, execution and history. French and foreign composers are invited to send in two works intended to celebrate the great event of the year, the first to be a cantata for orchestra and chorus, and the second a Hymn of Peace. A special "committee of musical composition" will be entrusted with the duty of selecting from the works contributed those which are most worthy of performance during the Exhibition. Two gold medals, two of silver, and two of bronze, with six certificates of merit, will be presented to the most worthy of the competitors; but an honorarium in the more tangible form of 10,000 francs will be awarded to the composer of the hymn selected for performance at the inaugural ceremony. A second committee in three sections will make arrangements for orchestral and choral concerts; festivals of the orphéonistes, or as we should call them, choral societies; and for performances by military and other bands. These concerts, in which all nations are invited to take part, will be held in the nave of the Palace of Industry, in the month of July next. Six gold medals, twelve of silver, twelve bronze, and six certificates, will be awarded to those who take part in these performances. The third special committee is to organize a series of Historical Concerts, in which a small number of the most eminent artists will perform the most remarkable musical works of different ages and different countries, and they also will receive medals and certificates. The distribution of these will take place on the 1st of August. The following are the chief members of the three committees mentioned above:—1st, "Musical Composition"—M. Rossini, president; MM. Berlioz, Carafa, Félicien David, George Kastner, Keber, Ambroise Thomas, and C. Gounod as secretary. 2nd, For arranging the Orchestral and Choral Concerts—M. Félicien David, president; MM. Victor Massé, L. Rodrigues, and George Hainl as secretary. For the Orpheonistes' Concerts—M. Ambroise Thomas, president; MM. Boieldieu, Jules Cohen, Leon Feret, G. Hainl, and Laurent de Rillé as secretary. For the military and brass bands' performances—General Mellinet, president; M. Emile Jonas, secretary. For the Historical Concerts.—M. Pétis, president; MM. Clement, Delsarte, Gevaert, Reyer, Wekerlin, Vervoitte, and Gastinel as secretary.

[The Inaugural Ceremony failed and there was no Hymn of Peace on the first of April.]

Germany.

VIENNA. Camilla Sivori, after twenty-two years absence, has been drawing crowds.—The Abbé Liszt has composed a grand Mass for the coronation of the Emperor of Austria as King of Hungary.—Two movements of an unfinished Symphony, in B minor, by Schubert—a posthumous work—have been published by Spina (and in London by Ewer & Co.), which, the Athenæum says, are “original, if ever Symphony was; distinct and captivating in idea; peculiar in treatment; here and there diffuse, but instinct with that fervid, unborrowed spirit which is given to only the favored few.”

On the 18th March a Historical Concert was given by Johannes Brahms, consisting of works by Sebastian and Friedemann Bach, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms, besides songs by Franz, Brahms and Gräner.—On the same evening, the 8th “Aesthetic Soirée of Czeke, with divers singers and pianist; programme insignificant.—On the 25th, Matinée of the “Academic Singing Society,” with Frä. Carina, from Pesth, and the court orchestra: “Roman Song of Triumph,” by Bruch; parts of the 98th Psalm, by Wüllner; two Horatian Odes, by Taubert; Scotch song, by Eyrich; “Die Hoffnung,” by Veit; Chorus by Engelsberg, and Volkmann’s Scena for Soprano solo: “Sappho.”

The number of concerts has been frightful. Zellner, too, has given a first historical concert, aiming to show the progress of dramatic music from its beginnings down to a certain epoch. He had “the flower of the aristocracy” for audience, who “listened with religious silence” to interesting fragments, German, French and Italian, carefully sung by Mmes. Bettelheim, Krauss, de Murska, Ann Schmidler, MM. Walter and Mayerhofer. Zellner himself played some of Bach’s organ pieces on the harmonium. A brilliant opening, it appears, in all respects.—Mlle. Carina (from Pesth) has had fine success at the Opera in Faust and the Huguenots.

BERLIN. Two new works by Kiel: Missa Solennis and Te Deum, lately brought out, are pronounced by the local critics the most important music of the kind that has appeared since Mendelssohn,—far more so than Kiel’s Requiem.—The Symphony Soirée of the royal orchestra (20th ult.) offered a Suite by Bach, Schumann’s Genoëva Overture, Beethoven’s 7th Symphony, &c.—March 22. Festival Concert by Biltse: Schumann’s D-minor Symphony and Abendlied (with string orchestra); Romance, by Warlamow, for ’cello and harp; Tannhäuser overture, &c.—23d. Second Orchestral Evening of B. Scholz, with Jean Becker and Chiostrì (viola), the Vocal Club of Kullak’s music school and Liebig’s Orchestra: Suite by Handel; Irish choral song by Scholz; Mozart’s Double Concerto for violin and viola; Chorus by Cherubini; Mendelssohn’s Violin Concerto; overture to Egmont.—24th. “Monster Concert” of Biltse’s orchestra: Beethoven’s C-minor Symphony; Weber’s Invitation, &c. (Berlioz); unperformed pieces from L’Africaine, &c.—25th. Nineteenth Quartet Soirée of Hellmich; Tausig’s Concert, and second Soirée of Rokicki, with Frau Schmidt-Bidó, Zürn and Nöldechen: songs by Rubenstein, Franz, Schumann, Schubert, &c.—26th. De Ahna’s last Quartet evening.—27th. Valesca von Facins sang Schubert’s Cyclus, “Die schöne Müllerin,” entire.—28th. Second Soirée of Kotzold’s society: Madrigals and choruses by Hassler, Dowland, Donati, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Hauptmann, Schlottmann, Vierling and Ehlert; Variations for two pianos, by Schumann, &c.—29th. Concert of the Court pianist Mme. Johnson-Gräver, with orchestra; and of Cath. Baum, with Bendel (the Lisztian pianist) and Rehfeld.—31st. Rokicki’s third Soirée, with Becker’s Florentine Quartet: Schumann’s E-flat Quartet; Violin Sonata by Raff; B-flat minor Trio by Volkmann; songs by Franz, Schumann and Schubert.

At the Royal Opera the performances during the last week of March were: Fidelio, with Mme. Harriers-Wippern; Violetta, with Mlle. Artôt; Spontini’s Cortez, in which the tenor Niemann is said to be incomparable; Midsummer Night’s Dream, with Mendelssohn’s music; Fra Diavolo, with Mme. Lucca. Wachtel has been re-engaged for five years.

LEIPZIG. The programme of the 19th Gewandhaus Concert (March 28) was composed of Cherubini’s Wasserträger Overture; Aria from Mozart’s Figaro; scenes from Schumann’s Genoëva; and Beethoven’s 9th Symphony. Among the new things produced lately at these concerts was a Te Deum by Julius Rietz. Wilhelm, the young violinist, has appeared with the utmost success.—Langert’s opera, “Des Sanger’s Fluch,” has not answered expectation.

Dwight’s Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 27, 1867.

End of the Concert Season.

Our season has come to an end. A very remarkable season, rich beyond precedent with Oratorios, Symphonies, Chamber music—especially piano music (Schubert and Schumann, as well as Beethoven, Chopin and Baeh)—and it has ended grandly. We have had two remarkable musical seasons in Boston. One was in the time of the old “Germania” orchestra, some fifteen years ago, when nearly every week in the winter gave us its orchestral concert, with “all the nine symphonies” and many more, concert halls continually crowded, and corresponding activity in Oratorio and other kinds. That was a great spring forward in a classical and high direction; but the Germanians dispersed, the means grew less, and the enthusiasm cooled away and tastes became distracted. And now again we have had a season even more remarkable; not only for the great number and variety of fine works and composers represented, and for the uniformly large support of every kind of concert and of opera, but for the wider and more real appreciation in the audiences of what was good, and the sincere zeal with which so many have to some extent studied and sought to understand what they heard, or thrown themselves heart and voice into the choral ranks in Oratorio, Ninth Symphony, &c.

To close the season grandly, we have had within a couple of weeks Beethoven’s “Choral Symphony” revived, and two grand Oratorio nights, besides other things of interest.

SYMPHONY CONCERT EXTRA. The Harvard Musical Association, to crown their rich, successful season of nine concerts (including that for the Cretans), gave a tenth on Friday afternoon, April 12, both for the sake of bringing out the Ninth Symphony, and by way of thanks and benefit to the orchestra who have served them so faithfully and well. The audience was large and of the most inspiring character, alive to all best things; and the concert was, artistically, and in the matter of pure, high, sympathetic pleasure, a great success. Perhaps materially it was as good a success as could be expected for an extra concert at the end of such a fatiguing round of musical excitements, and with the double-bar of two great Oratorios full in view. The Music Hall should have been crowded, as on the Cretan occasion, to realize the solid benefit designed for the musicians; as it was, it was in that sense a moderate benefit, while in a moral sense, as an inspiring, memorable occasion, it must have done them good, as it did their audience, and raised them in their feeling of the dignity of their profession.—This was the programme:

Overture: “Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt.” (Beethoven) at Sea; a Breeze; Happy Voyage; Coming into Port. Mendelssohn.
Aria, “Non più andrai,” from “Le Nozze di Figaro.” Mozart.

Mr. F. J. Rudolphsen.
Polonaise, for Piano-Forte, in E major. Weber.
Transcribed with Orchestra, by Liszt.
Mr. B. J. Lang.

Beethoven’s Ninth (or “Choral”) Symphony, in D minor.
a For Orchestra alone: Allegro, Scherzo, Adagio Molto e Cantabile, alternating with Andante Moderato.
b Finale, for Orchestra, with Chorus and Soli.

The short and brilliant First Part kept the concert within the usual two hours. Mendelssohn’s picturesque Overture, capitably rendered, charmed even more than before, and of course was heard with keener appetite at the beginning of the feast. We need not describe it again. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN sang Non più andrai (in German) with telling voice, artistic style and a great deal of spirit; it seemed indeed too short. Mr. LANG even surpassed his last year’s rendering of Liszt’s highly colored transcription of the brilliant Weber Polonaise, with the introductory slow movement which Liszt has borrowed from the other Polonaise (in E flat). In fine manipulation, brightness, clearness, conveying the whole spirit of the thing with utmost ease and grace, we hardly know how such a performance could be excelled. The ingenious, at times fantastical orchestration, too, was on the whole well done, though the pretty jingle of the triangle, which brightens up one passage, lost its effect by not coming sharp upon the beat.

This bright little First Part, costing no effort of attention, made a good relish for the great Symphony—Beethoven’s last word in this his fullest form of utterance. Meanwhile the stage, on both sides of the orchestra, was heaped up with chorus singers, nearly 300 of them, all aglow with expectation of their work; and the four solo singers (Mrs. SMITH, Mrs. CARY, Mr. JAMES WHITNEY and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN) took their places in the front; Mr. ZERRAHN raised his baton, and the great Symphony began, summing up, and recalling here and there in brief, vivid hints, all that we had heard in all the other Symphonies—that is to say, all of essential spirit, character and tendency,—not, of course, literal reproduction. In the first movement, with its stern Fate voice ringing through the void and chaos of those rustling fifths, its sweet pleading strains of reeds and flutes, whisperings of hope, heroic and exultant resolution, endless pursuit amid denial and distraction of the ideal, glimpses of true Joy, have we not the vein of the C-minor and the “Eroica” again? But this time more complex, with a greater multitude of themes brought into service, and worked out together with such wonderful unity and beauty and grandeur. But we have said enough before now—too much perhaps—in description of this Symphony, and will forbear. Naturally the first movement sounded somewhat duller than the rest, and was no so clearly apprehended by the most; partly because it is so crowded with themes and so complex in structure; partly because it needs to be looked back upon after reaching the height of the whole work in the "Joy" Chorus, to make its sense and bearing quite intelligible; and partly because the orchestra, full as it was and doing its best with a good will after very patient and laborious rehearsal, still needed greater mass, while (by the absence of the Quintette Club) we were reduced to two violoncelli against six double basses. Still it made with most a deep impression, raising expectation marvellously.

In the Scherzo we have again, still springing up afresh, the buoyant spirits of his other Scherzos (7th and 8th Symphonies especially), and in the Trio, with its characteristic bassoon and oboe and horn passages, the Pastorale. This movement went quite well, especially the repeat.

The heavenly Adagio, with its alternation and variation of two rhythms and two lovely melodies, went best of all and was most truly felt. Here the soul is poised in pure upper air, above earthly cares and grossness, filled with serene ecstasy, a foretaste of celestial bliss. But here too thought of sadness, of the unattained, recurs: then trumpet tones of high resolve and grander search, and the lovely vision is dismissed; for the solution is reserved for another trial, where human voices are called in, the instruments (double basses) at first almost finding the gift of articulate speech, and the "Joy" tune (Schiller's Hymn), first hummed by double-basses, then taken up by the bass voices, gradually possesses the whole band and choir, the quartet of soli lending illustration to new phases of the thought in different verses, until the climax of the whole is reached, the realization of true Joy in the sublime thought of human Brotherhood and the embrace of all Mankind, in which is felt the near presence (as if face to face) of "the Father who dwelleth above the stars!"—At this point, the crystal harmony of voices, in long, religious tones was indeed finely realized, and the effect was thrilling. Generally, too, the choral parts were more successful than in any previous performance we have had; perfect they can never be without long familiarity with the work, keeping the same voices in practice; and even then the voices must be picked ones, some of them exceptional, to cope with music strained up (by inevitable force of its enthusiasm) to so high a pitch and demanding so much. But the singers had grown enthusiastic about the Symphony in the rehearsals, and many of them had nourished the fire by listening to the rehearsals of the instrumental portions and thus getting filled with the spirit and meaning of the work, so that they sang with the heart and the understanding. For the four soli of course the task was the most trying; but they acquitted themselves most creditably, earning the sincere thanks of all by the artist-like loyalty with which they merged themselves in a common effort to do justice to Beethoven's greatest work.

The Orchestra never proved themselves more worthy of the compliment meant by this concert. This was their thanks. The solo artists, all, must have credit for the free offer of their services. But above all, Mr. CARL ZERKAHN, who had given all his zeal and energy to make the most of his means, vocal and instrumental, to bring out the Ninth Symphony (about which he has always been an enthusiast) in the worthiest possible manner, and to make the performance memorable, so that the Symphony may haunt our minds and call hereafter for more frequent repetition. He must have won the hearts of all the chorists in those difficult rehearsals; and they enjoyed the work, the initiation into those great splendors, so well, that we may surely count on them another year to do the same thing even better. It ought to be done at least once a year.

We are sure the Ninth Symphony was felt, as it never was before in Boston. And among the signs of progress we have hailed with pleasure the appreciative tone of the newspaper notices—very unlike that which prevailed in former years. We wish we had room to copy one or two, they seize the spirit of the Symphony so truly; the unbelieving Philistines, who are wont to sniff at such a work, now find discretion the better part of valor and keep silent.

EASTER ORATORIOS. The Handel and Haydn Society, armed with the powerful Parepa-Rosa magnet, besides other good soloists, the full Orchestra of the Symphony Concerts, and the Great Organ, drew vast crowds into the Music Hall, on Saturday and Sunday evenings, 20th and 21st inst. On Saturday Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise; on Sunday, Elijah.

The Stabat Mater, too sensational and secular to retain any hold (except some passages) on the religious sentiment, and too much hacknied as the only "sacred" venture of Italian Opera troupes, whose managers would have them make hay Sundays as well as all the week, was fraught with anticipations of omni, we must confess. But the performance was so much better, as a whole, than ever before, that we enjoyed it all for once. To be sure, we are not much edified by Cujus animam, especially when sung by a tenor voice like Mr. WHITNEY'S, which, though sweet in quality and artistically used, lacks weight and power for it. Nor can any voice regularize into life for us that other concert hack, the Pro Pœcatis; Mr. REDOLPHSEN (who came to the relief of Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, the latter being hoarse) would have done it if anybody could; he certainly sang it nobly. But the opening chorus, the unaccompanied Quartet: Quando corpus, and the Incantatus, in which both Mme. ROSA and chorus were sublime, came upon us as good as new. It was well enough in itself to leave off Rossini's weak and dry Fugue Finale; but that involved putting the Quando corpus and the Paradisal glories before the Incantatus, and that again involved a transposition (of key) in the latter. Hardly justifiable, though the effect was not, as bad as one might have supposed. Mr. WHITNEY'S bass was firm as a rock in the Quartet (and wherever he took part,) and it was sung so nicely that it had to be repeated; it is the gem of the work, and is just one of those pieces which will bear an encore, going best the second time, like the Trio in Don Juan. We have never heard the soprano parts more splendidly sung than by Parepa; and Mrs. CARY'S pure contralto, which she always uses with such elastic style and feeling, told uncommonly well; we have no more truly musical and soulful singer. The Chorus was fuller than usual, and in this easy work, compared to the oratorios on which they have been studying, the voices came out round and clear and unanimous, so that the ensemble was inspiring.

The "Hymn of Praise" is a far greater work and never fails of its effect when it is so well performed. The Orchestral Symphony charmed more than ever. One or two of the choruses might have been taken a shade less rapidly to advantage; there is still some scrambling and confusion in such places as the latter part of "The Night is departing." But nearly all was strikingly effective. Mme. ROSA'S bright voice was electrifying in the glad announcement that leads in that chorus; and everywhere both she and Mrs. CARY lent their best powers to the music. Mr. Whitney for the tenor recitative lacks dramatic force and weight of voice, but he did all with feeling and good expression.—We have rarely known a more enthusiastic audience than that was.

"Elijah" has come to be one of the best known and appreciated of all great compositions among our music-loving people. The performance was uncommonly spirited and clear; the great choruses, backed by the thousand throats of the great organ, extremely effective. Mme. ROSA, of course, had full field for her glorious voice and talent in the chief soprano part throughout; in the fine melodrama of the boy looking for rain in the soprano "Holy, holy," opening the Quartet in "Heaven, Heaven," and in the concerted pieces we have heard nothing nearly so satisfactory since Jenny Lind in London. The Angel Trio, with three such voices as PAREPA, Miss HOUSTON and Miss PHILLIPS, gave even new delight. The contralto tones of the last named lady seem to have reached their perfect ripeness, richer and larger than ever; and the rendering of her solos was so admirable that we could wish her always at hand for such noble service. Yet we must be allowed one qualification of this praise; was not expression sometimes over wrought and too Italian for the chaste, quiet fervor of such music? In Italian Opera the music serves the singer; here the singer must be nought, the music and its aspiration all in all. In other words, such music, without ceasing to be sympathetic, must be impersonal. But on the whole we have no contralto in the country at all equal to Miss Phillips, and we charge it to Opera, not to her, that her too infrequent Oratorio efforts do not satisfy us in every sense.

Miss HOUSTON did excellent service in some of the smaller soprano parts,—always, like a true artist, ready to take a secondary place for the good of the whole. Mr. JAMES WHITNEY seems to grow into better rapport with the Music Hall, for his tenor solos came out with more power than his previous efforts, while he truly caught the spirit of the music. For the great central figure of the whole, the Prophet, Mr. REDOLPHSEN'S telling voice, clear, tasteful execution, and just sufficiently dramatic expression, were highly satisfactory. His lower bass tones, to be sure, are hard, but the upper half of the voice rich and musical.

And so ended, grandly, at least as far as great music is concerned, another musical season, the richest Boston ever knew—if we except Opera. The Handel and Haydn have done well this year; they have given us not only the Messiah and the Creation, but Jephtha, Judas Maccabæus, St. Paul, Elijah, Hymn of Praise, the Forty-second Psalm, and Stabat Mater. Shall we at last screw up our courage to begin on Bach?

OTHER CONCERTS of the season's close have been: a pleasant Matinee of the Boston Conservatory; the Orchestral Union Concert, (last and best, with Morceville overture, Weber's Concertstück capably played by Miss ALICE DETTON, Gade's first Symphony, &c.); and PLEYER'S Soirée, aided by the charming singer, Mme. FREDERIC;—to all of which we must refer hereafter, and save a corner for the following, which was crowded out last time,— ITALIAN OPERA. Boston has had a week of it, under the management of Mr. Max Strakosch. The people thronged to Traviata and to all, chiefly for the sake of hearing Mme. PARLA ROSA, who sang, triumphantly, each night Traviata, Norma, Il Barbiere (fine opportunity for FERRARI), and Lucia passed before our record can begin. We heard Don Giovanni, and can truly say it was the worst performance as a whole we ever witnessed of that masterpiece; orchestra, chorus, leadership, all the *ensemble*s, bad; even the final Ghost scene feebler than we thought it possible to make it. But there were great redeeming things. Mme. ROSA'S Donna Anna was superb, especially her singing of the Letter aria, "Non mi dir," and the dramatic scena: Or sai chi l'onore. Miss PHILLIPS fully shared the vocal honors by her capital Zerlina, while her acting was out of the reach of all the rest. It was pleasant, too, to see Mme. PATTI-STRAKOSCH in her old character of Elvira, looking just the same; and to hear her, for her voice has regained the sweetness it had lost seven or eight years ago, and her style, though a little inert, was always graceful and artistic. SASSINI'S noble voice is far gone, and his Leporello was clumsy and unmusical. BRIGNOLI was soundly hissed for keeping the stage waiting, but atoned for it by his fine singing of "Il mio tesoro," which was encored. SIG. FORNARA deserves only sympathy and thanks for undertaking the great part of the Don, which he never did before, at two days' notice, and with his light baritone. In singing he is always a true, tasteful artist, and his bearing gentlemanly and unegotistic. Lu ci darem was beautifully sung.

Norma (repeated on Saturday) is one of the best of rôles for Mme. ROSA. In singing and in dignity of bearing and of action, it was admirable and recalled the noblest Divas.

Music in London and Paris.

PARIS, MARCH 27. At the "Monday Popular Concert" in London on Monday, March 11, we had Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, op. 95; Weber's Pianoforte Sonata in A flat major, op. 30 (beautifully played by Charles Hallé; Sonata for violoncello by Boccherini (played by Piatti); and Beethoven's Trio in D major, Op. 70, No. 1. Joachim, Ries, Blagrove and Piatti were the quartet party.

On Wednesday evening, March 13, Mr. Henry Leslie gave an Orchestral Concert at St. James Hall. The programme included, among other things, Mendelssohn's Antigone (with orchestra of 75 and male chorus of 225), Von Weber's Overture to Oberon, Cherubini's Overture to "Les Deux Journées," and lastly, Beethoven's superb pianoforte Concerto in G, played from memory by Charles Hallé. This was the feature of the evening, and I need scarcely say that Mr. Hallé's playing was perfection itself. As an instance of his perfect self-possession and knowledge of the concerto in the orchestral score, I may mention that in the last movement the first violins did not come in on time; this was after a long and intricate solo passage by Mr. Hallé. Mr. H. perceived the difficulty, and very dexterously repeated the passage, whereupon the orchestra took the "cue" and came in correctly. There were but few who noticed this little episode.

On Saturday evening (the extra Monday Popular Concerts are given on Saturday) we had Beethoven's Septet, and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor, the latter played by Mme. Schumann, Strauss, and Piatti. The Boccherini Sonata for violoncello was again given, and Mme. Schumann played (as a solo) Chopin's Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55, No. 1, and Grande Polonaise in A flat, Op. 53. She received a tumultuous encore and, in response, played Chopin's fairy Impromptu, in A flat, Op. 29.

On Monday Evening, March 18th, the programme was: Sonata in A major, Op. 47, (commonly called the "Kreutzer") played by Joachim and Arabella Goddard; the Boccherini violoncello Sonata; Beethoven's tremendous piano-forte Sonata in B flat major, 106 (Mme. Goddard), and Mozart's heavenly Quartet in D minor, No. 2; the Mozart Quartet was played with a most marvellous precision and clearness, and the Allegretto was delicious in its sadness.

In my next letter I will give you a synopsis of the Paris Concerts, of which there are very many just now. It may interest your readers to know that Charles De Beriot (son of the eminent violinist, who is lying here in Paris) is making some little sensation with his piano-forte playing. Mr. De B. has much talent, but his execution has a certain crudity, which further practice will undoubtedly tone down.

Harry Sanderson is in London in very poor health. Welhi arrived in Liverpool last week, per steamer China. Messrs. Chickering and Steinway are both in this city, and as soon as the Exposition opens we must, I suppose, look out for a war of the Roses.

F.

PARIS, APRIL 2. The past week has been crowded with concerts, and most of them of a classical character. On Sunday, March 24, there was a Séance of Chamber Music at the Salle Pleyel, with the following programme: Trio (Piano) in A major, Haydn; 4th Quartet, C minor (strings), Beethoven; Sonata, G major, Piano and Violin, Mozart; and Quintet, E flat major (strings), Op. 4, Beethoven. The performance was a very good one, but there was a "scrapiness" and want of tone which grated terribly upon my ears.

On Tuesday afternoon, March 26, M. Pasdeloup gave one of his popular classical concerts at the Cirque Napoleon. The programme included a Chorus and Overture by Wagner; Chorus, "Le Départ," Mendelssohn; Air de Prométhée (ballet), Beethoven; Largo et Finale, Haydn; Aria from Sonnambula (very well sung by Laura Harris); Weber's Overture to Der Freischütz, and a Chorus and Overture, by Meyerbeer.

By the way, they have produced Mozart's "Magic Flute" at the Chatelet Théâtre Lyrique, with a gorgeousness and splendor that defy description. The costumes are superb, and the scenery and all the stage appointments are really superb. Verdi's new opera, "Don Carlos," has also just been brought out at the Italian Opera.

On Wednesday evening there was another séance of chamber music at the Salle Pleyel, and the following works were given: Trio, B flat major, Op. 97 (Piano), Beethoven; Quartet, D minor (strings), Mozart; Sonate (for Pianoforte alone), C sharp minor, Op. 27, Beethoven, (played very finely by Herr Ernest Lubeck); and Quartet, E minor, Op. 44, (strings) Mendelssohn. Again the stringed instruments were scrappy and untrue in tone; this seems a common fault in the Quartet playing here. The Mozart Quartet (the one played at the London Monday Popular Concerts by Joachim, Ries, Blagrove and Piatti on March 18) was rendered with some approach to precision and delicacy of tone, but the other works were botched.

On Friday evening I attended still another séance at the same salon, (different performers upon each occasion). The programme embraced: Quartet, E minor, No. 8, (strings), Beethoven; Trio, (Piano), F major, St. Saens, (the pianist of the evening); Adagio (Piano solo), Beethoven; and Quintet, G minor, (strings), Mozart. The Beethoven Quartet was murdered outright. The Trio is a weak and futile composition. The Adagio was most admirably played by M. St. Saens, and the Quintet was quite well rendered.

On Sunday afternoon, March 31, M. Pasdeloup gave the last of the popular classical concerts at the Cirque Napoleon. The programme was superb—"Jupiter" Symphonic, Mozart; Andante Religioso, Mendelssohn, (this was delicious, and was encored à voix); Struensee music, Meyerbeer; Concerto, E minor, (violin, M. Montardon), Rode; and lastly Beethoven's glorious 5th Symphony, in C minor.

This gives you a pretty complete record of musical events up to date.

F.

We heartily share the opinion and hope expressed in the following article from the Transcript:

MRS. AMES'S BUST OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN. A copy of the bust of President Lincoln, by Mrs. Joseph Ames of this city, has, within a few days, been placed in the State Library for the inspection of the Legislature. This bust is regarded by all who have seen it, who were familiar with the face and character of Mr. Lincoln, as the best of the many attempts that have been made to perpetuate, on canvas or in marble, the features of the late President. It certainly recalls him to the memory of those who have seen and conversed with him more vividly than any other.

The bust has in it the dignity of expression which he had; the eyes have the solemn sadness which his eyes had; the mouth is divested of the caricatured expression and size which all photographs present, and shows the firmness, and at the same time the mildness and the tenderness, that were such conspicuous elements in his character. While this bust has not the coarse exaggerations of his features that are seen in many of the portraits, neither, on the other hand, has it the emaculated and finical look that can be observed in some others.

In brief it is such a portrait as might be expected from an artist of genius who had abundant opportunities of seeing and intimately knowing the subject of her art. Mrs. Ames (the wife of the distinguished painter, Mr. Joseph Ames of this city, who also painted Mr. Lincoln) had rare opportunities for seeing the late President to the best advantage; and, at the time of his assassination, had arranged with him to give her several sittings for this bust.

Though deprived of this aid, it is evident that her work was to a great extent already complete, so vivid was the image conceived in her mind, as the work before us attests to-day.

A copy of this noble bust in marble has been ordered by the Senate of the United States, and the artist hopes to receive orders from other bodies for other copies, so that she may be enabled to execute them in Italy where alone such works may be done satisfactorily and advantageously to the artist. It is hoped that the Legislature of Massachusetts will avail itself of this opportunity to perpetuate in marble, the memory of the martyr President.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- They blossom there, up there. Song. Chandler. 35
Quite an elegant piece, with a fine melody.
- O may we meet again. Song. M. C. Thayer. 30
- O sing the same old song. " " " 30
The first is one of those sweet "home songs," sung by a sister for an absent brother. The second is for one who "would not learn another lay. Her old song still delights her."
- I will extol thee. Quartet from "Ave Maria," Gounod. 40
Gounod uses material furnished by Bach, and the piece is a very acceptable one for quartets.
- Ave Maria, for Baritone or Contralto. Southard. 35
A fine melody. Solo throughout.
- What said the angels, love. Song. M. Keller. 30
A charming title, which the song does not belie.
- Softly o'er the rippling waters. Guitar. Haydn. 40
A favorite song, well arranged.
- Hark! the goat-bells are ringing. Duet. Smart. 50
Carries one to the heights of the Alps, to sing with the mountain maidens. Good music.
- Sweetly sleep, and dream of me. Serenade. Tane. 30
Very sweet melody, and otherwise a good serenade.
- I love to dream of home and friends. Song.
W. Seibert. 30

This is the author of "Beautiful Lena," and "Blue Eyed Leoline," and he has evidently struck a vein of good songs, of which this one is worthy to be with the others. Smooth, flowing melody.

Instrumental.

- Andante moderato, for Piano. Paul Becker. 35
- Berceuse for Piano. " " 35
Two rather difficult pieces, of which the first has a succession of bright thoughts striking out clearly. The second has not so clear a melody, but will sound well under the hands of a good performer.
- Brightest smile. Caprice, N. Cawthorne. 60
Of medium difficulty, and pretty, Good lesson piece.
- Les Huguenots. Grand Fantasie. S. Smith. 1.00
Mr. Smith, ladies and gentlemen! With a grand, bright concert piece!
- Faust galop. 4 hds. Bellak. 35
- Shadow song. " " 35
- Chime of bells. " " 35
- Coronation waltz. " " 35
Bellak has not forgotten the beginners in music. Get all four, as they are easy.
- Barbe-bleue Quadrille. D. Godfrey. 60
From Offenbach's opera of Blue-beard. Very bright.
- Fairy-land Polka. L. H. Hatch. 30
A very taking little piece, and quite easy.
- Silver Spring Galop. W. G. Lemon. 50
Good lesson piece.

Books.

LIBRETTO OF STABAT MATER.

Noticeable as one of a series of Oratorio Librettos, and has a large proportion of the beautiful melodies, which rank among the sweetest of sacred songs, as the old Latin poem is one of the sweetest combinations of musical lines.

A good Libretto, with the leading ideas and airs, helps amazingly in the understanding and enjoyment of an Oratorio as well as an Opera. Librettos to Messiah, Creation, Elijah, and other Oratorios are in preparation.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 681.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 4.

Robert Franz.

SKETCH OF HIS LIFE BY LISZT.

Franz was born on the 28th of June, 1815, at Halle, on the Saal. The state of things in the paternal house afforded him but little poetic stimulus; on the contrary, all that did not belong to the practical utilities of life in the sense of the last century, was regarded as unprofitable and injurious. His youth passed uneventfully, and he was indebted only to mere chance opportunities for the awakening of his musical capacities. Being already fourteen years of age, he was obliged, and that without any support upon the part of his relations, to acquire the elements of music, as well as he could, in his own way, and upon his own responsibility. Later, when his inclination to music became more decided, it was no longer possible indeed to withhold from him a teacher; but naturally, as a consequence of the views then prevailing, the cheapest musical pedagogue was engaged for the first beginning, and, as might have been foreseen, the gifted pupil soon outstripped the teacher.

A change had soon to be made in instruction and in method. And this necessity repeated itself so often, that in the space of four years the young Franz had studied with all the music teachers in Halle, and learned all he could from each of them, without being able to call his own any great capital of knowledge and ability. How indeed could he derive any solid profit, any lasting guidance, from this continued intercourse with various yet equivalent mediocrities? This his sound youthful insight saw so truly, that he considered himself, in spite of his numerous lessons, as left entirely to himself; in his first attempts he followed only the humor of his own suggestions, and so, out of the disadvantages of his position, he derived the incalculable advantage of accustoming himself to let the individual impulse alone decide in the choice of his matter and the form of his thought, instead of a commencing his mind, like so many talents, to mere imitation, and then resembling a manumitted slave, who needs years of apprenticeship to learn, not only how to enjoy, but how to actually possess and use the freedom that has been given him. How many all their lives remain such freedmen, and never attain to the natural noble movement of the freeman and educated! His firm, clear understanding guarded Franz from arrogance and error, in this independence left him by the incapacity of his teachers. He indulged in neither complaint nor ridicule about so manifest a want of outward aid. Indeed, he found himself in this freedom, as in his natural element, and used it discreetly to give self-possession to his powers, accustoming himself to fix his eyes upon a goal, and slowly, steadily, consistently to seize the means for reaching it.

Such a state of things in the earliest years of his artistic strivings, more than all later influences perhaps, determined the autodidactic character of his talent. The chosen ones of the Muse, the predestined artists know, like the bees, how to suck sweet aromatic nourishment out of the flower cups which contain deadly poison for others. But dry study did not satisfy him; the rigid thought answered but imperfectly to his yearning, as a dumb beauty would have left his heart muffled. Written music was to him but a body without soul; he needed hearing, that he might see his ideal realized. However much the so-called earnest musicians may affect to despise virtuosity, yet it is none the less true that every really called musician cherishes the want of this same virtuosity: feels the impulse in himself to hear, to bathe, as it were, in waves of tones, to cradle himself upon their illimitable element, to sail through their pure ether, to let their fragrant breath smooth his untold wings, to envelop himself in the cloud shapes of their fairy land, to listen to their tragical or touching dialogues, to transport himself into their world of expressive atoms, glowing and sparkling like the magic formulas of a celestial speech. Franz wanted to hear music made, and to make music himself; he gave himself passionately up to organ playing, and on Sundays ran from one church to another, to relieve the respective organists on single choral verses.

In those days he was attending the Halle Orphan House Gymnasium, and his studies there formed his principal occupation, the so-called serious side of his life, upon which his parents laid the greatest stress, while they always considered his attachment to music as only a harmless monomania, from which they would gladly have seen him delivered, since such idiosyncracies always hinder a young man from the attainment of that well-varnished, well-mannered, comfortable Philisterei, that coveted goal of all good fathers of a family, in whose train they can with tolerable certainty anticipate a fixed position, a respectable marriage, a decent exterior, a decent living, and finally a decent burial for their son and heir. The professors of the gymnasium treated the Art-dallings of their pupil with still greater severity than he had experienced under the paternal roof; his secret musical amateurship became the butt of many witticisms and there were plenty who would call him "Fool." The Cantor of the institution had appointed an hour for music lessons for the more gifted pupils; Franz felt himself drawn toward him; he was so cramped and narrowed by the boggy water of mental inactivity, that whoever let him pass without caressing his artistic passion became welcome to him; in a short time his musical protector invited him to be his accompanist. The compositions of Handel, Haydn, Mozart kindled a new flame in him, and cast the first gleams into the dim confusion of his ideas, which no one helped him to clear up, and in which he had in vain sought light himself. This is one of those favors which fate vouchsafes to those under its protection, renewing for them in the most urgent moment, through men or events, the drying marrow of their faculties.

Trembling with enthusiasm, possessed by the sounds which had entranced him, Franz now ventured, without having mastered even the rudiments of harmony, counterpoint, or any sort of thorough theoretic knowledge, nay, without even a clear recognition of their necessity, upon his first attempts at composition. Now, as before, he remained left to himself, and, without explanation or advice from others, worked along at random. The impulse to produce so far predominated in him that at this time the order of importance in his different labors was reversed. Until now, in spite of his more and more overweening bias toward music, in spite of the tendency of his mind to bury itself in musical problems, and devote to them in truant secrecy his leisure hours, and even a portion of the time allotted to more serious studies, still these latter had appeared to him the central purpose of his being; he loved his parents too well to allow an opinion directly opposed to their own to take root in him, and not to accept patiently the conviction which had been instilled into him from childhood, that it was his duty to acquit himself obediently of his Gymnasium studies. But now the spirit of resistance began to get possession of him; he felt, with all his tractableness that these studies could not be useful to his genuine development, and he lost more and more the power of giving himself up to them with interest and success. Soon there ensued hard conflicts in his soul between his natural modesty and yieldingness, between his habitual obedience to his parents and the thought that he was squandering his time, was losing his best years at the Gymnasium. For this evil he knew no better remedy than to abandon the course thus far pursued, and under the eyes of a master of music begin a new period of study, in which his choice naturally fell upon a composer, who at that time enjoyed a great celebrity, and who lived not far from Halle: Frederic Schneider. What artist, who has become so in spite of the narrow views of a tender and prejudiced family, cannot at a glance behold all the phases of the conflict which Franz had to fight through, before his wish was gratified without an open rupture with his friends? He finally left the Gymnasium, in which he had already worked his way forward into the higher classes, and betook himself to Dessau, with the purpose here by persevering study to regulate, clear up and bring into order his indefinite and fragmentary musical ideas; although even now neither he nor especially his family dreamed of the possibility that he would choose music for his calling, for the great end of his life. In such an idea they thought there was nothing to be feared, for they did not once suppose it practicable. He was not very clear in his own mind as to how far his resolution would carry him. His first thought was, to quit the hated school, to give himself up to music undisturbed; in this perhaps a tendency to composition, which had germinated in him, was not without effect.

In Dessau we find repeated, although with a change of form, nearly the same phenomena which characterized his earlier relations to Art. The rules and theories, which were taught him and unfolded to him, still repelled him; he did not thrive with them, and he began, after the regular lessons, other labors, which, like his first artistic efforts had a resemblance to the spider in the weaving of its web, in that he drew the material out of himself. It were superfluous to say that Schneider found but little pleasure in this singular method, and found fault with the dangerous example of such independent strivings. It was not long ere Franz came into the position of a persona ingrata. For compensation he won other sympathies.

If there are masters whom unfettered, youthful partizans rejoice to follow with almost blind devotion, and, inflamed with a noble courage, seal their doctrines with their own names, with their heart's blood, marching with reckless enthusiasm beneath their banner, such masters stand upon the most dangerous outposts of Art, and fight with a courage which is called desperation by their adversaries, but which in successful cases justifies the saying of Virgil: Audentes fortuna juvat. About such masters, who rather found schools than keep up schools, there is always an overflow of the fresh pulses of young life: the surrounding air, laden with electricity, favors the outblooming of all faculties and starts blossoms of spiritual delight, which awaken and strengthen a consciousness of his own worth in every participator, and therefore remains so dear and not to be forgotten. For Schneider such a feeling would have been rather strange and distant. He did not feel the need of living in an atmosphere in which the mind follows independently its own direction, and thus his school lacked one of the most indispensable requisites of Art. In a heavy, stagnant, close mental atmosphere, free development is impossible to the pupil. Then there form themselves, under the very eye of the master, but without his knowledge, groups of dissenters, who bind themselves together without any clear idea of the revolutionary character of their strivings, without more than a mere suspicion that out of their union will arise convictions and tendencies, essentially diverging from those of the master. So it was with the pupils under Schneider. It could not fail to happen that Franz finally attached himself to such a group, and he himself confesses, that the atmosphere he breathed among those young people (making a great deal of music behind the back of their teacher, who would have been more annoyed by the kind of their music, than by the secrecy of the production) was the only favoring element to his true progress. His studies in harmony and counterpoint were for him only a heaping together of materials, which he was one day to use in the production of quite different pictures than those set him for a pattern. During his two years' residence in Dessau, (1835-7,) he composed really a great deal, and in his attempts of that period it is interesting to trace the painful squirming of a young imagination under the school fetters and the necessity to shake them off.

(Conclusion next time.)

Bach's Works.

(From "JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH; his Life and Writings—Adapted from the German of C. L. HILGENFELDT, with additions from other sources," as published in the London Choir.)

(Continued from page 13.)

The existing works of this great man are unusually numerous, and contain specimens of all periods of his artistic career. We are thus enabled to take a retrospective view of the progress of his ideas from their dawn to their full growth and development. An examination of the various styles adopted by Bach gives us also a safe rule for the classification of his works according to their greater or lesser degree of artistic merit; and this inspection shows us clearly three distinct periods in the art career of Bach's life.

The first period embraces all those compositions which, in spite of a certain excellence, yet want a sufficient finish to give them elevation. They cling too much to certain forms, and contain useless and trivial matter, showing a regard for the common taste and fashion of the time.

The period of Bach's life in which these pieces were composed was between the years 1703 and 1717, when he was at Arnstadt and Weimar. He himself thought nothing of his works during this period, and whatever compositions exist they can only command such interest as one naturally takes in the first works of a great musician. At Weimar, however, Bach made good use of his time, and study and practice did much to bring him forward. This is proved by the works of the second period.

At Köthen he had the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the works of the best modern masters. The compositions he wrote here bear the stamp of higher cultivation and increased maturity. The spirit of artistic self now began to assert itself, and unsubstantial and conventional things—such as arise from the fashionable taste—are no longer found in his works. Some of these may be called perfect, as they have not been surpassed by his later writings. As this period comprises the whole duration of his official sojourn at Köthen—viz., from the year 1717 to 1723, it has been called the "Köthen-period," as the former one is known as the "Weimar-period."

The third and last period comprehends his most perfect creations of art, and extends from his appointment at Leipzig to his death—viz., from 1723 to 1750, and is called the "Leipzig-period."

A critical comparison of the works of Bach, on the basis which we have just pointed out, alone gives us sufficient knowledge of the period in which each particular work is to be placed. More special dates are to be found in the manuscript copies which exist; and the works of his contemporaries—Walther, Matheson, Mitzler, Em. Bach, and others—give us many notes in this respect.

It would, of course, be impossible to fix the precise dates to all Bach's various works, but an approximate one may always be given. In many of the copies of his works we find a variety of readings and variations. Some of these, no doubt, were occasioned by the errors of copyists, or by the fancied corrections of incompetent persons. A close acquaintance with Bach's writings, however, will easily enable us to restore the original text.

Bach himself, as we have said, frequently altered and corrected his own works. Even those that were printed he subjected to frequent alterations and revisions. We have an instance of this in his "Wohltemperirte Clavier" (The Well-tempered Clavichord) of which a variety of readings are extant.

Of his larger works, very few were published by Bach himself, but all these bear the stamp of mastership. These consist of the four volumes of "Clavierübung" (Exercises for the Clavichord); the "Sechs Choräle" (six Choral Melodies of different kinds, for organ with two manuals and pedal); "Einige Kanonische Veränderungen" (Some Canon Variations on the Christmas Hymn, "Vom Himmel hoch da komm ich her," for organ with two manuals and pedal); and the "Musicalisches Opfer" (Musical Offering), dedicated to Frederick II., King of Prussia.

Of the smaller things printed by Bach himself, we have only the sixty-nine chorales with figured bass, printed in 1727, and dedicated to Professor Hademann. "The Art of the Fugue" ("Die Kunst der Fuge") did not appear till after the author's death, but was, for the most part, engraved by one of his sons during Bach's life time.

The compositions of Bach remaining unpublished at his death, as well as the original manuscripts of those already printed, passed, with some few exceptions, into the hands of his two sons, Friedemann and Emanuel. Some few were given to his pupils, Kirnberger and Kittel. Those which Friedemann Bach possessed were soon dispersed in the world, as we have already related; Emanuel, on the contrary, carefully treasured up his father's bequests, had them classified and bound, and a descriptive catalogue placed with them. At his death, in 1783, they passed into other hands, fortunately of those who were able to appreciate their value. The catalogue which Emanuel had made was published by his widow in 1790.

Emanuel Bach's collection of his father's works for the greatest part became the property of Nägeli of Zurich, who gave the world the benefit of many of these by publication. Counsellor Gaehler of Altona, a great admirer of S. Bach, also purchased many manuscripts; and Forkel took the opportunity of increasing his collection. Two later collectors of Bach's manuscripts were Pöhlchau, a music master of Hamburg, and Gerber of Sondershausen, the well-known editor of the "Musical Lexicon." Pöhlchau's part, about the middle of the present century, passed into the library of the "Joachimsthaller" school at Berlin, where already were the collections of Kirnberger and his noble pupil the Princess Amelia of Prussia. At Berlin there is preserved the greatest collection of Bach's manuscripts. Another fine collection is still possessed by the Nägeli family; and the St. Thomas' School at Leipzig contains many of the vocal works written for that establishment. Some few manuscripts are in private hands; but of these hereafter.

Immediately after Bach's death his sons published "The Art of the Fugue," and in 1765 and 1769 Emanuel published the "Collection of Four-part Choral Songs" in two volumes.

Thirty years later, or thereabouts, A. F. C. Kollman, organist of the German chapel, St. James's, London, a native of Hanover, and formerly connected by friendship with Emanuel Bach, published the first edition of the "Well-tempered Clavier." Another edition appeared about the same time from the house of Simrock of Bonn; and in 1800 George Nägeli advertised a collection in which the works of the most celebrated composers would appear, and amongst them many of those of J. S. Bach. This great work was never accomplished; but the house of Nägeli published a number of his single pieces, and for the first time the "Six Clavier Sonatas" with violin accompaniment. The fourth volume of the "Clavier Practice" appeared in 1802, at Weimar, without any publisher's name, as did also the "Six Sonatas for Violin alone."

The publishing firm of Kuchel (now Peters), at Leipzig, gave particular attention to Bach's organ and clavier works. Since the beginning of the present century they have occupied themselves with this laudable purpose. They have given to the world a complete collection of his glorious organ compositions, under the supervision of Griepenkerl and Roitzsch, and at the same time a collection of his clavier works, under the care of Czerny and Griepenkerl. These editions are deservedly esteemed for the beauty of the printing, and the care and diligence bestowed upon them by the learned editors.

The firm of Breitkopf and Härtel of Leipzig has also issued many of Bach's works; whilst Andre of Offenbach and Haslinger of Vienna have each done homage to the genius of the great master by the publication of correct editions of his compositions. But, perhaps the most glorious monument to the memory of the great master yet achieved is the noble edition of his works now in course of publication by the German Bach Society.

(To be continued.)

Haunts of Harmony in the City of London.

(From Once a Week.)

II.

We were compelled by want of space, to bring our last paper to a somewhat abrupt conclusion in the course of a treatise on the "Sun" and "Trevor" Music-halls, Knights-bridge. We shall resume our observations by remarking that when the performances at these establishments have been brought to a close, which, as a rule, happens at about quarter to twelve, the audience adjourns to the spacious bar of a tavern communicating with the premises, and in the midst of a seething crowd of soldiers, mechanics, low "horse gents," half-drunken cabmen, slatternly women and dissipated shop-boys, you may observe an elderly gentleman attired in a costume resembling that of a park-keeper, to whom malt and spirituous liquors are assiduously handed by open-mouthed auditors, and who, acting as a sort of Mercury during the performance, is regarded with that mingled awe and admiration which the British public is always so ready to extend to any one even remotely connected with the stage.

The ladies and gentlemen who have attended the performances at the "Trevor" usually drop in towards the close of the evening, and compare notes with their friends at the "Sun." The entertainments at the last-named establishment are of a more variegated description than those at the rival house, and included on the occasion of our visit a spirited and marrow chilling performance, by a couple of gentlemen and a Newfoundland dog; the low comedian being murdered and thrown behind the scenes about every two minutes, and coming to life again towards the conclusion of the piece, in time to visit the ruffian with poetical justice, to an accompaniment of barks and plunges on the part of the dog.

A large proportion of the audience both at the "Sun" and the "Trevor" is of a military cast. You may observe three or four fine young fellows seated at a table, and might mistake them for gallant and distinguished officers, if you hadn't an inward conviction that they were merely "soldier-servants" in their master's cast-off wearing apparel. They puff their pipes, sip their brandy-and-water, and criticize the performance in the most majestic manner; and if any one of them fails to produce the desired impression on the minds of the fair sex, he straightway adjourns to the barracks, and presently returns to dazzle and command in his undress uniform.

Thus far of the general aspect of a few of the leading music-halls, the entertainments therein provided, and the individuals by whom they are patronized. We shall now step from the auditorium to the stage, and endeavor to furnish our readers with an insight into the early struggles and adventures of those who aspire to the proud position of public performers and popular favorites. We shall begin by detailing the experiences of a couple of young men who sought to win their way to fame in the capacity of "duologue duettists," but as true merit is always bashful, we shall make use of fictitious names, and dub our friends for the nonce Messrs. Jones and Smith. Both of these gentlemen had been educated for the stage, and in endeavoring to establish a reputation as theatrical dancers and pantomimists, had travelled much, and starred times out of number. Meeting once in the vicinity of the Haymarket they paused to compare notes. Mr. Jones had retired from the dramatic profession in despair, feeling convinced that unless an artist has marked talent, his chances of success are uncomfortably small, and had opened a lodging-house, which would have answered better if it hadn't been in a chronic state of emptiness. Mr. Smith was out of an engagement, and testing the capacity of his wife and family to subsist on that cheap and digestible article of food for which the chameleon is said to possess such a peculiar fondness. Jones whose inventive powers were possibly quickened by reduced rations, suggested that, as his friend possessed a real talent for low comedy, they should endeavor to better their condition by starting something in the music-hall line. Smith had no objection, but hinted that he was quite without funds, and that there would be some difficulty in finding any one to make the necessary advances. However, his friend, who was of a saving disposition, and had managed to lay by a few pounds, proceeded to re-assure him upon this point, and so, after an inaugural banquet in Jones's kitchen, an adjournment was proposed to the sanctum of Mr. Merriek, a composer of duologue pieces, who dwelt with his wife and child in a single room on a third-floor back, in Plough Court, Lincoln's Inn Fields. This gentleman, who had already made Jones's acquaintance, having written some songs for a young lady, whom he had endeavored to bring out as a "serio-comic," courteously requested his visitors to be seated, and a quart of ale having been sent for at their expense, stated that if either of them could propose a subject he would be happy to write thereon at the extremely moderate rate of twenty shillings an entertainment. Smith hesitated for a moment, and then, as the subject of the Atlantic cable was engaging public attention, proposed that the piece required should have some reference to that great international enterprise. The "duologue" having been supplied, rehearsals took place in Jones's kitchen, and when the aspirants were tolerably perfect in their parts, they forwarded an application to the manager of the Metropolitan Music Hall, and stating that though they were members of the theatrical profession, they had not confined their exertions to the stage, inquired concerning the chances of a first appearance. We must here pause to remark that managers have a particular objection to dealing with amateurs. If self-satisfied ladies or gentlemen wish to make a venture in London, a preliminary step of absolute necessity, and likely to damp their ardor, is a month or two of practice in the country. But to resume. It was agreed that on the night of the following Wednesday, when there was to be a waiter's benefit, and the proprietors had special licence to keep the hall open till 3 A.M., a debut might be ventured. In order to get into proper working trim, Messrs. Jones and Smith made a preliminary appearance at "Lamb's," in Oxford street, and as their entertainment abounded in radical sentiments, and the audience was anything but aristocratic, achieved a decided success. "Lamb's," we may observe, is an establishment situated at no great distance from the Princess's Theatre. Instead of paying so much for admission, you purchase a three-penny refreshment ticket for the "good of the house." The dresses, we may add, were hired from Mr. May, of Bow street, at the rate of five shillings a night.

The next evening, our friends hastened, all anxiety, to the Metropolitan; but, owing to some mistake in the transmission of a letter, their appearance had to be postponed from 12 o'clock till 1, and when the eventful hour arrived, the audience was at once drunken, noisy, and spiteful. A gentleman, whose father was a pantomimist at the Adelphi Theatre, had just danced with great success—having distributed three pounds' worth of tickets amongst his friends—but when Messrs. Jones and Smith appeared to commence their "great and original duologue entertainment," they received what is professionally termed the "goose." In other words, they were hissed, or, to borrow from their own expressive vocabulary, "eh-y-iked." Bearing in mind the condition of the audience, coupled with the circumstance that the new-comers had failed to purchase the requisite number of "free admissions," we cannot be surprised at the fact. However, as they were rather desperate, they persevered, and might have soothed the popular animosity had it not happened that the nether garments of Mr. Jones, who personated a British tar, were of a build so peculiar, that he could dance only with difficulty, a circumstance that provoked the risible faculties of the spectators, and caused the whole entertainment to be brought to a speedy and disastrous conclusion. Further than this, the "Metropolitan" audience, which considered itself select and aristocratic, had no sympathy with the extremely liberal sentiments that had won the hearts of the "great unwashed" in Oxford street. Groans and hisses prevailed, and Messrs. Jones and Smith broke down so utterly and unmistakably, that they apologized to the manager for having appeared at all.

However, with the next day came fresh resolutions, and agreeing to keep the fact of their fiasco in the background, they applied by letter to the manager of the "Oxford," who, with his usual courtesy, appointed an interview. Our friends laid in the requisite amount of Dutch courage through the medium of three pennyworth of pale brandy, and repaired to the hall, where they were met by Mr. Jonghmans, who inquired whether they were in a position to appear on the following evening. They replied in the negative; the fact being that they had no money left, and couldn't hire the dresses. Upon this they were told to call at the Canterbury in a week's time, with the view of giving the management "a taste of their quality."

Now a music-hall during the day-time abounds in influences the reverse of enlivening, and when Messrs. Jones and Smith complied with the above invitation, the sun shone dimly in the Westminster Road, but something like a November fog prevailed in the Fine Arts Gallery. The decorations looked coarse and dingy; there was an appallingly loud echo, and the stage was denuded of its charms. A few carpenters busied themselves with repairs in the balcony; glasses were being washed out at the refreshment bar, and sundry professionals scattered here and there about the building, watched with languid interest anything in the way of rehearsal that might be proceeding on the stage. Our friends were depressed, but armed with the valor of the desperate, they proceeded with their entertainment, and as the eighteen or twenty "pros" in the body of the hall condescended to applaud, they retired in high spirits, shook hands in anticipation of coming triumphs, and celebrated their victory in an extra three-pennyworth of pale brandy.

In the evening they called, by appointment, on the conductor, who thought he could obtain them a hearing, but as a gentleman of excessive modesty and surprising pulmonary vigor chose to sing five songs in succession, Mr. Jonghmans had to return to the "Oxford" to lead the "operative selection," leaving our friends almost as badly off as ever, and but little comforted with the assurance that they had a chance of procuring an engagement when a new company was organized in about six weeks' time.

In the meanwhile, having learnt that band parts were required, they called upon the musical conductor at the "Raglan," in order to have them prepared. Having acquainted that gentleman with their position, he expressed surprise at their not having applied to the "governor"—meaning the estimable Mr. Hart—a hint that our adventurers acted upon at the first favorable opportunity. An "appearance" was graciously recorded, and a not very select audience testified extreme approbation of the thrilling sentiments conveyed in the great duologue entertainment. A chance of an engagement loomed ahead, but again the financial condition of the duettists stood in the way of a substantial success. Nearly five pounds had been invested in a concern that had not yet brought in a farthing; the speculators had no means of immediately raising fresh funds, and by the time the entertainment was again in working order, Mr. Smith had procured an engagement as harlequin at a transient theatre, and to the indignation of his partner, not only left him in the lurch, but even neglected to answer his letters.

It is worthy of remark that the aspirants to music-hall celebrity are almost entirely at the mercy of the "agents." These gentlemen, on being paid a fee, refer to their books, and can, if they choose, procure you an early engagement. If the worthy to whom you have applied feels prepossessed in your favor, he will provide "a good berth," that is, work and wages for six weeks at a convenient distance. When the first engagement is concluded, he will find you another within easy reach. Thus you may be moved from Birmingham to Manchester, or from Edinburgh to Glasgow; whereas, if you fail to give satisfaction, you may be shifted from Dublin to London, perhaps from thence to Hull, and back again.

Should you chance to offend an agent by taking any other situation than the one offered, he will effectually blank your intentions by communicating with the manager who has engaged you, and dropping a few hints to your prejudice. "So-and-so may be well enough in his way, but I could provide you with a better artist at considerably lower terms." A manager seldom cares to offend an agent, lest, when he is anxious to procure fresh talent, and has a difficulty in finding it, the great man should withdraw his assistance. Accordingly, you may find yourself dismissed at the end of a week for some fault of which you are perfectly unconscious. On applying to the agent, and stating your grievance, he will simply answer: "You chose your own road; now keep to it," and it is not necessary to insist that unless you are backed by one of the fraternity, your chances of success are hardly worth considering.

In conclusion, we must draw a distinction between the leading music-hall agents and the unconscionable rogues who, taking up their quarters at a public house, profess to be the media of communication with theatrical managers. We are acquainted with a gentleman of the former type, who feels that he has a position to maintain, and conducts his business in style. He has fitted up a front parlor as an office, and is rapidly making a fortune by procuring engagements for artists, in return for a booking fee of eightpence, and five per cent. on each week's earnings.

If you offend an agent, he will erase your name from his list, and then, as we have before remarked, "Woe betide you." If, on the other hand, you are bent on securing his good opinion, hand him a sovereign when required to deposit the preliminary fee, and say nothing about the change. The chances are that he will penetrate your motives, appreciate your delicacy, and pocket the eighteen and sixpence.

A certain comic singer of note, whose portrait is to be seen in most music-shops, commenced his career by playing utility parts and acting as a supernumerary in small country theatres. If he had talent it was not recognized, and the dramatic profession expressed no regret when he deserted the "boards" and took to singing at a low concert-hall in Liverpool. In process of time he was exalted to an establishment of higher pretensions, and, being lucky enough to scrape a little money together, laid it out in advertisements, and by degrees managed to pull himself into notice. Gifted with consummate assurance he procured a situation as clown at one of the leading West-end theatres. During the progress of a rehearsal the manager was led to suspect that his newly engaged "star" was not quite up to the mark. He was convinced ere long that he fell lamentably below it. He fretted in silence for a time, but at length yielding to his irritation, inquired sarcastically as to the clown's estimate of his own merits. The great luminary, in no wise disconcerted, briskly replied that he regarded himself as one of the most rising performers of the day. "Indeed!" returned the exasperated manager; "and if you want to know what I think, I believe you are a confounded impostor." However, the engagement had been contracted, and the provincial star filled his pockets. Some while after this he procured a situation at The Metropolitan, Edgeware road, and introduced a vulgar and senseless ditty that hit the taste of the populace, and is still to be heard on the barrel organs. From one step he advanced to another, and is now in receipt of about £30 a week.

A short while ago we came across two young men who had encountered in their pursuit of fame adventures deserving of record. After some months spent in playing utility parts at a theatre in the north, they found themselves suddenly thrown out of employment, and reduced to the necessity of "blinking." By this term is denoted the condition of those who earn a precarious livelihood by giving entertainments, generally musical, at the bar or just outside the door of a public house. If the proprietor is generously disposed, he will reward the wanderers with a jug of beer, fancying that they attract customers, and either after or during the intervals of the performance they endeavor to collect money by appealing to the generosity of the audience.

Our two friends, who were living at the appalling rate of a pound of bread and half a pint of beer a day, and were endeavoring to journey to London, sought to recruit their finances in the manner described, but occasionally met with rebuffs that were particularly disheartening to those who had neither shelter for the night nor materials for a supper even of the most meagre description. On one occasion they entered a roadside inn, and endeavoring to find favor by addressing a worshipful company of "navvies" as "gentlemen," proposed giving some representations of the lark upon a penny whistle. The suggestion having been favorably received, the performance commenced, and ended amid tumultuous applause; encouraged by which, the hungry wayfarers proposed an imitation of the thrush. However, this was condemned as being merely the lark over again, and a representation of the blackbird gave such general dissatisfaction, being in fact a third edition of the "herald of the morn," that the luckless performers found themselves summarily, and not too courteously, shown out of doors.

However, necessity roused them to fresh exertions, and entering a second inn they proposed giving imitations of popular actors, stating that they were members of the dramatic profession out of an engagement and journeying towards London, and that for some time past they had been performing at one of the principal theatres in the northern counties. The proposition gave pleasure, and affairs went on swimmingly so long as the representations were confined to "stars" at a distance, but an unfortunate attempt was made to imitate Mr. Charles Pitt, who had lately been travelling in the neighborhood, and a critical navy exclaimed, "Noa, noa, I don't know 'bout 'tother chaps, but darned if that be loike Charley Pitt;" so the unfortunates were expelled for the second time, and again found themselves penniless in the high road.

However, by some supernatural means they managed to reach London, and procured an engagement at Lamb's, in Oxford street, where they worked a couple of "turns" a night, each performance lasting about half an hour, one being at the commencement, the other at the close of the evening, and received the extremely remunerative salary of fifteen shillings a week. It was at Lamb's that we made the acquaintance of these indefatigable aspirants to fame, and it was at the same popular place of amusement that we had an opportunity of witnessing their "unprecedentedly successful entertainment," which was of a nature thrilling and melodramatic. It had reference to the adventures of a Cockney, who, having emigrated to Australia, seized an early opportunity to wander into the "bush." Whilst there, he was attacked by a dog of a peculiar breed—one of the luckless duetists fantastically attired—and, having beaten it off, he was confronted by a furious bushranger, who, in the deep tragic accents of the penny stage, expressed a desire to become possessed of his personal property. As a matter of course, a terrific broadsword combat ensued; but at the moment when the vanquished Cockney lay on the ground, and the robber was preparing to despatch him, a startled exclamation burst from that amiable gentleman, and, in quivering accents, he demanded his victim's name. On hearing it, he growled mysteriously, "It must be so," and proceeded to inquire, in tones deeper than before, "And had you not a father?" "I had." "Know you his whereabouts?" "Alas! he emigrated to Australia, wandered into the bush; we thought him dead. [Tremendous agitation on the part of the ruffian]. "It must be! Yes!—it is! My own, my long-lost boy!!" [Embraces ad libitum and eccent amid tumultuous applause.]

The duologue duetists were anxious that we should purchase the copyright of their entertainment for half a crown! We declined the offer, but gave a little spare cash to the performers, who then, feeling that there was an occasion to be improved, indulged in a lengthy dissertation regarding their late trials, and the impossibility of gaining a satisfactory footing in London. Considering the utter want of talent on either side, this last conviction failed to inspire us with an extraordinary degree of astonishment. The heavier of the two "heavy" gentlemen then complained of the condition of his wardrobe, and hinted that, if we had any cast-off garments, they would prove eminently serviceable and welcome. He then proceeded to inform us that the whole of his own and his friend's misfortunes were attributable to the fact of his having "gone mad" when on a provincial tour, a circumstance that resulted in the utter break-down of the entertainment, though he felt convinced that, with a little management, it might be made an extremely payable concern, and, in fact even then he was looking forward to an engagement at Belfast—a nice little trip, from London to Belfast!—where he and his friend were sure to earn between three and four pounds a week, and so on, ad nauseum.

What became of the two duetists, we have never been able to learn, but a couple of gentlemen resembling them in many particulars are still to be seen in a shady nook near the bar at the end of the hall, where they converse confidentially regarding their prospects, and from time to time, turn their heads towards the stage, either for the purpose of taking hints, or condemning the performance as inferior to their own.

Young girls toiling in the provinces lead but a sorry existence, and during the winter months it is no joke having to plod through snow and sleet from wretched lodgings to the cold hall and back again. They are usually engaged to sing a couple of "turns," one early in the evening, the other late. During the interval they are perhaps sent to "the front," i. e., amongst the audience, and it is an understood thing that if drink be offered, it must not be refused. No matter if vice be encouraged, it is "for the good of the house." The second "turn" is frequently a failure, and for obvious reasons. But the proprietor has lost nothing, and if his victim didn't drink, she wouldn't long keep her engagement. Poor girls! in a year or two their voices are completely cracked, and they have no resource but the work-house or the streets. It is not one girl in ten that can stand the ordeal of life in the country. It is consolatory to reflect that in leading establishments such as the Oxford and Alhambra, proceedings of the kind we have referred to would be quite without precedent.

With regard to the origin of the various performers, they have a rule sprung from the stage or the "saw-dust;" their fathers have been strolling actors, clowns, harlequins, acrobats, etc. We could name some clever gymnasts now in receipt of good salaries who formerly earned a livelihood by wandering from town to town, or from village to village, and performing in the London streets. Some of the best acrobats are foreigners, and the high-sounding Italian names in the programmes are not always fictions.

In halls where there are musical selections, the leading tenors and soprano are generally broken-down members of English or Italian opera companies. The exertion of singing in a selection is comparatively small, the vocal powers are not severely taxed, and though the position is hardly one of éclat, it brings in between five and six pounds a week. A lady, once a "star" of some magnitude at the Italian Opera, condescended to take an engagement at Day's concert-room, in Birmingham. A leading tenor at one of the principle London music-halls held a post of honor at Covent Garden Theatre.

At leading establishments it is usual to employ one or two really excellent singers to maintain the reputation of the house, and a gentleman or lady in such a position is able to earn from fifteen to twenty pounds a week. The great advantage of a situation of this kind is that the performer has a regular salary to depend upon, whereas if he aimed at a more dignified position, say as a member of a travelling opera company, or an attendant at concerts, his earnings, though they might be in some instances large, would, as a rule, be extremely precarious.

The chairman at a music-hall is generally a "professional." He may have been the principal basso, or the pianist. He announces the titles of the different pieces, and if a disturbance occurs, he is supposed to exert himself in endeavoring to quell it. He must be a man who can face an audience, and if there is a delay in the arrival of any performer, he is sometimes required to "take a turn." His salary may vary from a couple of pounds to fifty shillings a week.

At good halls it is usual to hold a lady or gentleman in reserve, to supply an unlooked-for hiatus in the performance, and the occupants of such a post earn a weekly salary of from thirty-five shillings to a couple of pounds. The attendants at a music hall are usually old soldiers, or policemen who have been tempted from the "force," by the prospect of higher wages. They are men of sober and respectable character, rarely, if ever, broken-down members of the theatrical profession.

ARTHUR OGILVY.

Music Among the Chinese.

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

It is claimed for the Chinese by T. Taylor Meadows that they are "the best misunderstood people in the world," in which he is not far from right. Your issue of April 18 contains an illustration of this, in the (selected) communication "received from a gentleman in Hong Kong," concerning the musical powers of the Chinese.

The writer "believes his to be the first attempt to teach the reading of music to this wonderful people," whereas in the mission schools of the Episcopal church at Shanghai it was taught many years ago, both to boys and girls, and with complete success; so much so, that not only was singing by the notes of our ordinary European notation practised, but Chinese organists performed in both the school and mission chapels.

Our Presbyterian friends at Ningpo did much the same thing; and as long as 1858 they even went so far as to publish a psalm-book of some two hundred and fifty tunes, with specimens to the same "tonic-sol-fa method." How long before this the Roman Catholic missionaries had taught their students I cannot say; but I can vouch for the fact that some very elaborate mass-music was sung by Chinese choristers in the cathedral at Shanghai, accompanied by an organ made with bamboo pipes.

Another unfortunate statement of "the gentleman in Hong Kong" is that "the Chinese themselves have no tunes and no idea of music." Almost any book on China contradicts this mistake—Barrow, Du Halde, Des Guines or Williams; and Doollittle gives us an account of the existence of social musical clubs for practice among Chinese youths.

The fact is that music as a study, has existed and been held in very high esteem among them for at least twenty-two hundred years. Confucius cultivated it (about 500 B.C.), and found analogies between the relations of the three principal strings of the K'ung and those of the ruler, the minister and the people of a country; so that these names were given to the strings to designate them, and the great sage declared that he who could harmonize upon the K'ung could rule over the empire. So much for the Chinese having no music.

As to the assertion that they "have no tunes," this is one of the strangest of the many strange statements made concerning that much-misrepresented people. Why, the empire is full of tunes, and very tuneful they are, after their fashion—which fashion is not ours, however, but more nearly that of the older Scotch minstrelsy. Let any one listen to the old tune of "Farewell to Lochaber," performed (as it often is) by a regimental fifer, and he will get a very good idea of the general "style" of Chinese music. Indeed, the common fife—without keys—gives the Chinese musical scale very nearly; the difference between it and our diatonic scale being that the semitones are not distributed as with us, nor do the intervals coincide exactly with ours; that is, while the first, fourth, fifth and octave correspond with ours, the second, sixth and seventh do not. But they have, and they use, the eight intervals, though the fourth and seventh (as in some Scotch tunes, for instance "Roy's Wife,") are often not brought in.

Again: our "gentleman in Hong Kong, who is engaged in teaching a tonic sol-fa singing-class there," says their instruments can produce but two or three tones. Now, if any of your readers will take the trouble of calling at Carhart & Needham's in Twenty-third street, they can see some Chinese musical instruments (which have a compass from E flat (first line and treble) to A flat in alto; and an examination of the accompanying specimen (which I took the trouble to reduce from the Chinese notation to our own), will show that they write for two notes beyond that range.

In short, they have an exceedingly elaborate system of musical notation, and a great fondness for what is called amongst us "the opera"—excepting the ballet parts, which their ideas of decorum lead them to distast.

At a polite entertainment the guests have handed to them an ivory tablet, with the names of some of their classical "operas"—so to call them—and a selection is made for the orchestra, which proceeds at once to go through some composition that may consume an hour or two in the performing; the musicians sometimes playing, sometimes singing, according to the exigencies of the occasion.

It was the desire of finding what music the Chinese might have among them capable of adaptation to the purposes of Christian psalmody, that led me to study the subject during my many years' residence at Shanghai; but I found nothing susceptible of such adaptation except a few strains from the Buddhist litanies, which bore a strong resemblance to some of the ruder forms of the Gregorian (or Ambrosian) chant.

I have trespassed too long on your columns; let my excuse be the desire of correcting that cluster of mistakes to be found in the extract on "the Musical Powers of the Chinese." They would naturally have the effect of adding to the already extreme and very foolish disparagement of a people the most numerous on the face of the globe, and one whose civilization is altogether the best the world has ever seen, apart from Christianity.

Allow me to mention a case in point both musically and nationally. While visiting with my family the beautiful temple-grounds near Hong-Chow—the Chinese terrestrial paradise—we formed the acquaintance of a mandarin of medium rank, whose wife had the manners which would have been recognized as those of a lady anywhere, and who himself was devotedly fond of music.

I had my melodeon with me (one of Prince's), and as a natural consequence Mr. Dzan and myself became quite intimate for the time being. Subsequently, he volunteered me a visit at Shanghai; and also sent a very handsome musical instrument as a present, together with some beautifully-written manuscript music.

I returned this visit some time afterward, taking my melodeon in the boat with me; and when arrived at the landing near his residence, he begged me to have the instrument carried up to the house, that the ladies of his family might (from behind their screen) "have the delight of hearing it."

I consented, and spent some time in accompanying him—in unison, of course—while he played his own instrument—a flute, I think. "Ah!" exclaimed he, in a moment of ecstacy at the success of our performance, "if only our two countries could harmonize like our instruments—what happiness!"

I have heard less enlightened and benevolent wishes expressed on this subject than that of my musical mandarin friend, especially among the Christian ladies and gentlemen of California.

I remain, yours respectfully,

EDWARD W. SYLE.

Rectory, Pelham, N. Y.

Music Abroad.

Leipzig.

The 20th and last Gewandhaus Concert occurred on the 4th of April and opened with Beethoven's festival Overture in C, op. 124. Fiäulein Bettelheim, Contralto, from Vienna, sang an aria from Gluck's Ezio, Schubert's "At the grave of Anselmo," "Infant-halt," &c. The second part consisted of Gade's last largo work, his Cantata "The Crusaders."

In the 20 concerts, besides two for charity, the following works have been performed:

Symphonies: 5 by Beethoven (Nos. 3, 5, 7, 8, 9,—precisely the same as in our Boston Symphony Concerts); 2 by Mendelssohn ("Scotch" and "Italian"); 2 by Gade (B flat and C minor); 2 by Schumann (B flat and D minor); one each by Mozart (D major, without Minuet), Haydn (G major), Rubinstein ("Ocean"), Naumann, Rheinberger ("Wallenstein").

Overtures: 3 by Cherubini (Abenerrages, Amercon, Wasserträger,—ditto again Boston!); 3 by Mendelssohn (Athalia, Hebrides, Mecressille); 3 by Beethoven (Leonore, No. 2, Fidella, and Op. 124); 2 by Schumann (Genovra, and Fest-overture on the Rheinweinlied); 2 by Weber (Euryanthe, Oberon); one each by Rossini ("Tell"), Gluck, (Lydigenia), Volkmann (Fest-overture), Jadassohn, Kalliwoda (Fest-overture), Wagner (Faust), Tausch.

Other orchestral pieces: Concerto for string instruments, two obligato Violins and 'Cello, by Handel; Passacaglia and Toccata by Bach (instrumented by Esser); Entr' acte from Cherubini's Mohu: Suite No. 2 (E minor) by F. Laeher; March from Rossini's "Siege of Corinth"; fragments of a Symphony by Schubert; Symphonic Fantasia by Ferd. Hiller; Adagio from Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; Rakoczy March from "La Damnation de Faust" by Berlioz; two Entr'acts from Schubert's "Rosamund"; Dances of blessed spirits and of Furies, from Gluck's Omphale.

Choral Works: Mendelssohn's Hymn: "Hear my prayer"; Ensemble and chorus from Rossini's "Siege of Corinth"; Scenes from "Frithjof's Saga" by Max Bruch; Bridal Hymn by Hermann Zoppf; Ave Maria by Carl Reinecke; Handel's oratorio "Esther"; Tu Domini by Rietz; "Wächterlied," by Fritz Gernsheim; Scenes from Schumann's "Genoveva"; Gade's "Crusaders."

Arias: 7 by Mozart; 5 by Handel; 2 by Rossini; one each by Bach, Gluck, Haydn, Spohr, Stradella, Randegger, Rossi, Marcello, Wagner, Meyerbeer, Rode (Variations), Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Boieldieu.

Songs (Lieder): 7 by Schumann; 6 by Schubert; 6 by Beethoven (Liederkreis); 2 by Kjerulf; one each by Handel, Pergolese, Haydn, Kirchner, Alabieff, Rubinstein, Brüll.—Not one by Robert Fernz!

Instrumental Solos, with and without accompaniment: Piano-forte: 4 by Bach, 3 by Beethoven, 6 by Schumann, 4 by Liszt, 2 by Mendelssohn, 3 by Hiller, 2 by Hummel, 2 by Derffel, and one apiece by Mozart, Rameau, Kirnberger, Couperin, Handel, Scarlatti, Chopin, Kirchner, Weber.—Violin: 2 by Spohr, and one each by Mendelssohn, Schumann, Viotti, Vieuxtemps, Ernst, Rust, Paganini.—Violoncello: one by Davidoff.—Oboe: 2 by Schumann.—Harp: Parish Alvars, &c.

The solo pianists were: Meses. Clara Schumann, Johnson-Gräver, Frä. Menter, and Herren Derffel, Reinecke, Ehrlich, Hiller, Tausig, Leitert; the violinists were: Meses. Charlotte Decker and Francisca Friese, Messrs. Brandt, David, Joachim, Wilhelm, Haubold.

Of the above named compositions, 21 were produced in the Gewandhaus for the first time.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. Mendelssohn's Lobysang closed the series on the 90th nlt. A writer in the Musical World sums up thus:

There have been twenty-four concerts since the 6th October last, and at each of these some one or more works of importance have been presented. Handel's Abgander's Feast (twice), Haydn's Tempest, Macfarren's Christmas, Schumann's Paradise and the Peri, and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," were the principal large vocal works performed; while of symphonies all those of Beethoven, with the exception of the 9th, have been played, as well as the following:—Haydn—C minor (No. 9), D (No. 7); Mozart—C major (Jupiter); Schubert's B minor (unfinished); Mendelssohn—Baldin and Scotch (so-called); Spohr—Power (Consecration of Sound); Schumann—No. 1. B flat, 2. C major, 3. D minor; Gade—No. 1. C minor. Overtures and concertos of all the great masters have been given, and the following eminent instrumental soloists have at different times appeared: Mme. Arabella Goddard (twice), Mme. Schumann (twice), Mlle. Anna Melilig, Miss Madeline Schiller, Herr Joachim, Herr Ludwig Straus (twice), M. Sauton, Signor Piatti, M. Dannreuther, Herr Wilhelmj (twice), Herr Hartvigson, M. Oscar Beringer and Mr. Franklin Taylor. The sole drawback to the orchestra during the previous seasons—a deficiency of stringed instruments—having been remedied from the commencement of the series just closed, Mr. Mann was able to satisfy the requirements of the most exacting, and, thanks to his untiring energy and the constant opportunities for united practice, he has now under his control a band that may not only fairly challenge competition with any in England, but may take honorable rank with any of the great continental orchestras; and I believe that I not only express my own individual opinion, but also that of every connoisseur who has attended these concerts regularly, that such performances of great orchestral works have never before been heard in this country, and that it is not hyperbolic praise to say that they have been as near perfection as it is possible to attain. What, for instance, could be finer than the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven on Saturday last? From the first note of the bright, cheerful allegro, with which it opens, to the end of the final allegretto, every note had force and meaning, while the exquisitely reposeful andante and the wonderfully-real storm held all hearers spell-bound. I think, in truth, there were few in the room who would not have been delighted to hear the whole symphony again from beginning to end. It was hardly fair to Mr. Sullivan to place the selection from his MS. opera, The Sapphires, Nelvia, immediately after Beethoven's gigantic work; nevertheless, our clever young composer's music came well out of the ordeal, and pleased so thoroughly that one felt inclined to say, "If so much why no more?"—and failing the "more," the audience asked for (and obtained) a repetition of the song, "Love will be master," sung by Miss Edith Wynne, whose thoroughly sympathetic and musical voice is always sure to win.

Herr Straus was warmly and deservedly applauded for his violin solo, adagio and rondo from Vieuxtemps' concerto in F-sharp minor (No. 2); and that Mlle. Enequist and M. De Fontanier further contributed to the vocal portion of the programme, which opened with Spohr's overture to Jessonda, and closed with Schumann's overture to Manfred.

THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON, discouraged by want of patronage, as well as by the untimely death of its conductor, Alfred Mellon, has dissolved.

ORATORIOS. During the last weeks of April the National Choral Society performed Elijah (with Santley, Mme. Suchet-Champin, Miss Lucy Franklin and Mr. Leigh Wilson: Mr. Martin conducting), and The Messiah (Louisa Pyne, Miss Palmer, Mr. Kedge and Mr. L. Thomas). On the 1st of May, Mr. Martin was to conduct a Choral Festival of 5,000 voices at the Crystal Palace.—The Sacred Harmonic Society has given its thirty-fifth annual Passion-week performance of the Messiah (Meses Rudersdorff and Sauton-Dolby, Messrs. Reeves and Santley), and a second performance of Benedict's Legend of St. Cecilia, followed by Rossini's Sabat Mater.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The third concert attracted a larger audience to the Hanover Square

Rooms. The two symphonies were Schumann in D minor (No. 2) and Mendelssohn in A major (the "Italian"). The last was so familiar to the members of the orchestra as to present little, if any difficulty to the new conductor; but the first was a very different matter, and Mr. Cusins may be congratulated on the talent and readiness with which he acquitted himself of the task of directing its performance. Both symphonies were played with remarkable spirit; and those who find amusement in balancing and comparing the respective merits of Schumann and Mendelssohn had a fair opportunity of indulging their peculiar taste. The great majority of the Philharmonic audience, if applause may be accepted as criterion, were for Mendelssohn. The overtures were Beethoven's magnificent Egmont, and the Ruler of the Spirits (Rubensald)—perhaps, after Der Freischütz, and not forgetting Oberon or Egyptische, Weber's very finest dramatic prelude. The concerto was Beethoven's No. 4 (in G) for pianoforte, played with splendid energy by Mme. Schumann, and though not accompanied by the orchestra throughout with such uniform carefulness as might have been desirable, received with unanimous marks of satisfaction at the end. The singers were Meses. Enequist and Drasdil, soprano and contralto. Mlle. Enequist selected for solo the great and trying recitative and air of Donna Anna, from the last act of Don Giovanni, and sang it in so artistic a manner as to justify her choice. Mlle. Drasdil, who has a voice, the quality of which stands in no need of effort to reveal, chose the sombre "Spirit song" of Haydn; and the two ladies together gave the long and showy duet, "Serbami ognor," from Rossini's Semiramide.

MADAME SCHUMANN has given two "Piano forte Recitals" at St. James's Hall, interesting if only on account of the specimens of her late husband's music which were included in the programmes, and which she played as perfectly as any music could be played, and with no less enthusiasm than technical ability. These comprise the Arabesque (Op. 18), which had already been applauded at the Monday Popular Concerts; the "Circular," or Scènes Hippiques (Op. 9), an attempt on the part of Schumann at the humoresque in music, with which Mr. Charles Halle was among the first to make English amateurs familiar (at his "Recitals"); the Etudes en forme de Variations (Op. 13—dedicated to William Sterndale Bennett), Mme. Schumann's own admirable performance of which at the Monday Popular Concerts, in 1865, is still remembered; two canons from the Stadion für den Präludium (Op. 95); and several vocal pieces, confided at the first "Recital" to Mlle. Bramer, and at the second to Mme. Sauton-Dolby. All these afforded deep gratification to the admirers of Schumann's compositions—among the instrumental specimens more particularly, the two canons, and among the songs "Frühlingsnacht" (Mlle. Bramer) and "Moonlight" (Mme. Sauton), each of which was asked for again. Mme. Schumann also played the Sonata Appassionata and the Moonlight Sonata of Beethoven; solo pieces by Bach, Scarlatti, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Henselt, and, with Signor Piatti, Mendelssohn's great sonata in D major, for pianoforte and violoncello. The vocal music was accompanied by Mr. Zerhini. Though not crowded, both "Recitals" were well attended. Mme. Schumann now leaves London, after her third, and by no means least successful, visit. She must be aware by this time, that those who told her she would meet only enemies might have more honestly told her she would meet only friends.—Mus. World.

MR. HALLE'S RECITALS. During his forthcoming series of "Piano-forte Recitals" Mr. Halle is to play at each recital a solo sonata by Schubert, and one of the duets for piano and violoncello of Beethoven or Mendelssohn.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, APRIL 12. Since the date of my last letter there is very little to record. Don Carlos is still running at the Italian Opera and Romeo and Juliet (Gounod's last) is still un-produced; the regular musical season here is now drawing rapidly to a close, and there would soon be a complete dearth of musical news, were it not that a sort of supplementary season commences at Easter this year by reason of the crowds of people who are here to attend the Exposition.

The said Exposition is as yet very incomplete, and will not be in absolute working order before May 1st; however, there is even now much to interest the visitor, and the sensation which our American Grand Pianos are producing here is something positively amazing. Those manufactured upon the European plan of construction are vastly superior to any which are made here, while those gotten up upon the New American system have excited the wonder and admiration of the jury, the piano forte makers and of the general public. The three leading manufacturers, Erard, Pleyel, and Herz, have expressed their delight and surprise at these new products of American industry and skill, and M. Erard has requested permission to adopt the salient points of the new system. America has truly inaugurated a new era in piano forte making. The Erard and Pleyel pianos are, without doubt, fine instruments, but there is lacking in them that volume and richness of tone which one finds in the American grands.

The Cabinet Organs, also, of Mason & Hamlin are well spoken of, and are regarded as surprising proofs of the superiority of American machinery, it being a well known fact that the European Cabinet Organs are all made by hand.

At the Athenæ was given, on Friday evening last, an orchestral concert under the direction of the omnipresent Padeloup. For programme we had: 1st Symphony, C major, Beethoven; Suite d'Orchestre, Massenet; Concerto for piano, Ravina, (played by the composer); and the "Ruy Blas" Overture by Mendelssohn. The Suite by Massenet was in the modern French style, all trombone, kettle-drum and triangle; the Concerto was well intended, but was quite weak and lacked unity; the Rondo (Finale) was mediocre, and resembled greatly a common polka with fiddles obligato; the Symphony and Overture need no comment, they were most admirably played.

On Wednesday evening, April 10, a Quartet Concert occurred at the Salle Pleyel. For programme we had: Quartet, B flat major, (piano), Weber; Quintet, C major, Op. 29, (strings), Beethoven; Sonata, (piano and violoncello) D major, op. 58, Mendelssohn; and Trio, E flat major, (strings) Mozart. The Mendelssohn Sonata was the feature of the evening, and was really well played by Mme. Massart and M. Jacquard; the Allegretto Scherzando (2d movement) produced a marked effect.

Patti is still singing here. Lanra Harris and Jenny Kempton are also here. Harry Sanderson will be here in August. Joachim appears at a concert here on Friday evening, April 19th. The Congressional agitation on the subject of wearing or not wearing court suits at court presentations is creating much difficulty here. Americans generally hail the Senate resolutions as a step in the right direction, and as soon as formal instructions shall have been received by our ministers here and at other courts, there will be a large delegation of black coated and white neck-tied gentlemen at future diplomatic receptions, dinners, balls, and the like.

The weather here is really abominable. Since the 22d of March there has absolutely been but one day when it was possible to be in the streets for an hour without raising an umbrella. This is April weather, and reminds one forcibly and unpleasantly of the same in America.

F.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 11, 1867.

Robert Franz.

The most unique, perhaps the most beautiful concert of our year occurred, unannounced and private, at the Chickering Hall, on Friday afternoon, May 3. Nearly four hundred admirers of the most original song composer of our times, feeling a debt of gratitude to him for many of the sweetest inspirations and much of the finest culture of their lives, and touched by the report of his increasing deafness and his straitened means in consequence, eagerly took the tickets—say rather the (five dollar) shares in this testimonial of respect and sympathy for ROBERT FRANZ. It was meant simply as a gift, the gift of friendship—such songs make their author many friends, in a near sense, though these may never see his face nor hear his voice—the coupling of a Concert with the act was only to give it grace, give as it were musical expression to the common feeling. The offering was further swelled by several contributions of a hundred dollars each (one of them from the Orpheus Club), and, as the expenses were trifling, the sum of about $2 000 was the gratifying net result. Not a few held tickets who renounced the pleasure of attendance, knowing too well that the concert room could not hold all.

It was an act worthy of our music-loving city. The prime movers were: first, that intimate friend of Franz, and kindred spirit, who introduced the songs here fifteen years ago, and who by the earnestness of his convictions about them and his rare power of playing their peculiar accompaniments has done so much to make them more known and appreciated here than in any city—even of Germany till very lately—OTTO DRESEL—wherever he goes the songs of Franz are sure to take root; then Mr. KREISSMANN, who for years has so identified himself with these songs by his admirable singing of them; these, and those other classical pianists, LANG and LEONHARD and PARKER, always ready at the call of Franz or Bach (two names which here have grown to be almost inseparable). These were the managers, and the programme was as choice as they could make it.

Cantata, "Liebster Gott, wann werd' ich sterben." 1st movt.	J. S. Bach.
Concerto for three Pianos, C major (accompaniments arranged for a fourth).	J. S. Bach.
Alto Aria, "Wohl euch, ihr auserwählten Seelen."	Bach.
Song, "Im Rhein, im heiligen Strome," op. 13.	R. Franz.
Songs, a. "Nun holdt mir eine Kanne Wein,"	Robert Burns, op. 1.
b. "Wie sehr ich Dein," op. 13.	R. Franz.
c. "Die Rose, die Lilie, die Taube," op. 34.	R. Franz.
Two-Part Songs, a. "Wenn ich ein Vöglein war,"	Schumann.
b. "Im Aehrenfeld,"	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Melusina,"	Mendelssohn.
Songs, a. Supplication, "Weil auf mit, op. 9.	R. Franz.
b. May Song, "Zwischen Weizen und Korn," op. 33.	R. Franz.
Quartet from Fidelio.	Beethoven.
Songs, a. Die Lotusblume, op. 25.	Robert Franz.
b. Aufbruch, op. 35.	Robert Franz.
c. Abends, op. 16.	Robert Franz.
d. Im Sommer, op. 16.	Robert Franz.
Overture, "In the Highlands"	Gade.

Choice selections, and in very able hands. Four excellent singers (Mrs. HARWOOD, soprano, Mrs. J. S. CARY, contralto, Mr. KREISSMANN, tenor, Mr. SCHRAUBSTAEDTER, bass); the four pianists above mentioned, with four fine Chickering Grands—these were the interpreters. And all went to a charm; at least such was the sense of the delighted audience. The piece from the Bach Cantata—a sort of harmonized Choral, serious and serene, snatches of song between long pauses filled by instrumental symphony, was sung by the four voices, and the accompaniments were played on the four pianos from the full score, one taking flute and oboe parts, another violins, &c. Bach's thought was reproduced thus in its integrity, and the effect was extremely beautiful and novel. The commingling of the characteristic figures kept up by the several instruments, light and delicate and cheerful, was like a grove full of birds, especially in the long prelude, and seemed to tell how cheerful is the prelude in a Christian's thoughts to the great change.

The triple Concerto in C was played as it was some three years ago by the same artists in one or two of Mr. Dresel's Concerts, he representing the string accompaniments on a fourth piano. It was like bathing in fresh, exhaustless floods of melody, commingling currents setting in from all directions. The four keyboards seemed to be of one instrument, and the eight hands moved with one will; it was healthy, sure, serene old Bach that played to us! The Alto aria is one from the sets of nine for each kind of voice which Franz arranged from the score of various Bach Cantatas, Masses, &c., and is the first of the series reprinted here by Ditson to English words: "Well done, ye good and faithful servants." The broad, sustained melody, rich and tender and devout, was admirably sung by Mrs. Cary, who gave herself up simply to the spirit of the heart-felt, noble music. This too was accompanied on four pianos; and this ended the Bach portion,—the musical foundation (so to say) of Robert Franz.

The happiest possible transition to his own endless, almost Shakspearian variety of fresh new Songs in every mood, was that very simple, perfect one, so rich and solemn, so poetic, which reflects the images of Heine's serious love song as clearly as "the Rhine, the holy stream" itself, in rich sunset glow, reflects the old cathedral that contains the picture of Madonna, surrounded by "flowers and angels" and in which the poet sees "the eyes, the lips, the cheeks" of his beloved. This too Mrs. Cary sang with chaste and exquisite expression.

And now the Franz songs were poured out in profusion and variety. The next group of three and the four before the end were sung with genuine fervor, in his best voice, inspiringly, by Mr. Kreissmann. "Weil auf mir, du dunkles Auge," and the witching, arch little May Song of Goethe, were sung by Mrs. Harwood, completely carrying her audience away, and she was obliged to raise the enthusiasm to a yet higher pitch by giving the breezy, sunshiny, rapturous "Im Wald, im Wald."

The pieces from other composers, thrown in for relief, were all greatly relished. The two-part songs, given with fine life and delicacy by the two ladies, were delicious; and the Fidelio Quartet: "Mir ist so wunderbar," accompanied by Dresel and Leonhard, hardly escaped an encore. The Overtures were played on two pianos by eight hands,—full, singularly clear reproductions, in all save color, of the orchestral score. The "Melusina" was familiar; that by Gade proved a delightful new acquaintance.

We fancy this report from Boston will pleasantly startle the quaint old German town of Halle (Handel's birthplace), where Franz works and sings, unworldly and retired as the old Leipzig Cantor, not courting present fame or wealth, quietly abiding his time, rich in his family, his Muse and Bach—of whom he is, since Mendelssohn, the deepest reader and most quickening interpreter; his own fresh rills of Song, pure emanations of original genius, most modern of the modern, do not denote him more truly than this sympathy of his whole soul with Bach. Alas that he should be growing deaf! Ever since that fatal locomotive screamed in his ear (some sixteen years ago), all loud sounds, as of the full organ, have been unbearable to him, and, becoming insensible first to the highest tones of the scale, he has gone on losing tone by tone downward. This incapacitates him for the various Conductorships which have been his main stay, rather than the slender remuneration for his songs and Bach arrangements. May this our greeting, of Boston artists and art-lovers, cheer the noble Singer as his songs have many a time cheered us!

Mr. C. HENSHAW SMITH is the name of a young amateur pianist, organist also at Dr. Putnam's Church in Roxbury, to whom a very pleasant little complimentary Concert was given on Monday evening at Chickering's. It was meant as a Godspeed on his departure for San Francisco, where he proposes to make music his profession, principally as teacher. The part which the young man took in the concert (his first public effort, we believe) was modest, simply the piano part in that bright first Trio of Haydn (in G), which was a clear and facile, though not ripe performance, and his whole appearance was simple, gentlemanly and winning. At any rate he seemed to have the sympathy of a large and refined audience. All the rest was done by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, who played the first Allegro and Adagio from Beethoven's B-flat Quartet (op. 18) and Schubert's Quartet (posthumous) in D minor; and by Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, who sang, in admirable style, two capital selections. The first, however, "Lasci' ch'io pianga," from Handel's Rinaldo, was better suited to her large, rich organ tones, than the song of the page: "Voi ch' sapete," in Mozart's Figaro, which we associate with voices of a lighter calibre. The Handel piece had to be repeated.

We must go back merely to record the matter—no room for the manner—of several concerts which we had to pass over in our last. And first,

Mr. J. C. D. PARKER'S Vocal Club of amateurs sang on two successive Monday evenings to an invited company the following choice programme: Part I. Salve Regina, by Hauptmann; Slumber Song from Schumann's "Paradise and Peri" (Soprano Solo, Miss LORING, and chorus); Songs, Mrs. HARWOOD; Part-Songs: "Good Night," Schumann, and "Hunting Song," Mendelssohn; Spring-Fantasia (piano solo and quartet), by Gade. Part II. The Walpurgis Night (Eve of the First of May), by Mendelssohn—the solos by the Messrs. WISEN.

Mr. PERANO'S Piano-forte Soirée of April 18 (his last concert for the season) offered: a Prelude and Fugue in D minor, by Mendelssohn; Schubert's great Sonata in B flat major (four movements); and the sixth Partita of Bach in E minor, (consisting of Toccata, Allemande, Courante, Air, Sarabande, Gavotte and Gigue);—all greatly relished, especially the last. Moreover the sweet singer of the German Opera, Mme. FRIEDERICI-HIMMEL, sang "Doh rieu," from Figaro, Schumann's "Du mein Soele" and "Spring Night," and for an encore "The Wanderer," the last with remarkable power, and all with fine fervor, though some of the higher notes were almost too piercing for the small concert room.

Both of the new "Conservatories" have had Chamber Concerts, for their pupils chiefly. The "Boston Conservatory," at Chickering's, April 13, gave: Beethoven's E-flat Trio, op. 70, played by Messrs. EICHBERG, LEONHARD and H. SUEK; a couple of Franz Songs and Schubert's "Erl-king," sung by Mr. KREISSMANN; Variations, from the 4th Beethoven Quartet (Messrs. EICHBERG, FORD, H. and A. SUEK); a Scherzo and Andante Spianato of Chopin (Mr. Leonhard); the Haydn Trio in G; and a harp piece by Miss MARIE HARTLEY. All, except the lady, are teachers in the institution.

The more mixed programme of the first Soirée of the "New England" rival was this:

Cabinet Organ and Piano, "Pénée Religieuse," Battman Song, Air with Variations, Rhode. Piano I. Symphony, J. S. Bach; 2. "On Wings of Song," (Transcribed by Mendelssohn), Liszt. Song, "With Verdure clad," Haydn. Piano, "Lake Melodie," Goldbeck. Duo for Harp and Piano. Six Preludes, J. S. Bach, with accomp. of second Piano by R. Goldbeck Song, "L'Estasi," Arditi. Piano, "Eulogy of Tears," (Trans. Schubert), Liszt. Cabinet Organ, Piano and Violin, Brisson: Fantasia on the "Pardon de Ploermel."

New Works on Music.

LETTER FROM A. W. THAYER.

Trieste, March, 1867.

DEAR DWIGHT,—I wish to call your attention to two volumes which are probably still unknown in the United States, as they have but recently appeared from the press of Breitkopf & Härtel, in Leipzig.

The first, of about 500 pages, 8vo., by Dr. EDWARD KRUEGER, is "System der Tonkunst." I have often thought of the necessity of some epitome of musical science,—which would be a good basis for instruction in our colleges, when the divine science shall once find entrance there—and have made myself pretty familiarly acquainted with the productions of the press in that direction, from the cheap penny little volume of Fétis, years ago, on to the present time. Now, at length, I think the right book has come, and I can only hope that it will soon find a competent translator. Such a translator is one who not only is fully able to give the German again in English, but one who has knowledge sufficient to give examples from English and other composers well known with us, corresponding to those from German authors. Not that he should change the author's text, but that he should add in notes either in the margin or at the end of the chapters, that which would adapt the book specially to the use of American students.

It should be strictly a text-book. The instructor should be a man of wide-reading knowledge in the history of music, as well as a thorough contrapuntist; so that the text-book might be but the skeleton of the body of science, which his classes should be enabled by him to master.

Of course the reading of common music at sight, some preliminary knowledge of harmony, and the simple rules of musical composition, should be required of the student before taking up the study of the system; just as a certain degree of knowledge upon other topics is required before the pupil is admitted into college.

It may be said that such a professor and such pupils are of "the things that are not." Perhaps so; but suppose such a professor should be sought.—How long before the demand would create a supply? And as to pupils, in my time we could have given such a professor a very respectable class in old Harvard. I will leave you to reflect upon and carry out these ideas, and turn for a moment to Dr. Krüger's book. The best idea I can give you of it will be by a glance at the table of contents.

A short philosophical introduction, then

Book I. Nature and Spirituality of tones.

1. Some remarks upon Art in general, and upon various Arts, and then, specially, Music.

2. Rhythm and Harmony,—what is Music.

3. Natural tones.—Consonance.—Dissonance.—Vibrations, peculiar phenomena, &c., &c., and thus we reach

4. The Scale.

Book II. Music as an Art. Here we have

1. Melody,—its genesis—analysis—Rhythm—Metre—Quantity—Accent, &c., &c.

2. Musical Syntax—thirty pages of very rich and suggestive matter, but it will take too much space to continue to particularize.

Sixty pages upon Harmony follow, and twenty-two upon Rhythm.

Now comes the Doctrine of Forms:—

Variable forms,—as the Prelude, the Fantasia, Recitative, &c., &c.

Determinate forms,—the Song form, Simple Song, Air, Rondo, Variation, &c., and Accompaniment.

And so we come to Counterpoint, Imitations, Canon, Fugue, and finally to the Motet, Cantata, Suite, Sonata, Symphony, Oratorio, Opera, with analytical remarks upon some of Handel's Oratorios and Mozart's Operas.

I need hardly speak of the abundant proofs of vast research which this work exhibits on every page, and of the clear logical progress of the author from simple tones to the grandeur of Handel's Israel in Egypt and the magnificence of Don Juan.

That this is not an A, B, C book for beginners you have already seen; that it is "meat for men of full age"—not "milk for babes"—is perhaps manifest. I shall be glad to hear hereafter the opinion of some of our cultivated German musicians upon it, for it is not to be doubted that a work like this will find some purchasers in the United States.

The other volume is: "Gesammelte Aufsätze über Musik" (Collected Articles upon Music), by OTTO JAHN. Of course every body, whose studies lead to that kind of knowledge, knows who Jahn is:—Professor at Bonn; the great archaeologist and philologist; the author of the great Biography of Mozart; one of those men whose stores of learning fill us with wonder, and whose capacity for labor, with astonishment. In addition to his philological studies in his youth and early manhood, he made a special study of music, both at Leipzig and in Berlin under Dehn, and fitted himself by profound contrapuntal study for his labors since in the field of musical history and criticism, as few, if any, of his contemporaries have done.

This volume contains the following articles:

1. Biographical Sketch of G. C. Apel, a great organist and composer for the German Protestant church.
2. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."
3. "Elijah."
4. Wagner's "Tannhäuser."
5. Berlioz's "Condemnation of Faust"
6. "Lohengrin" (Wagner).
7. 33d Music festival of the Lower Rhine.
8. 34th " " " "
9. Mozart—paralipomenon.
10. "Leonore" or "Fidelio."
11. Beethoven in Malkasten.
12. Beethoven and the new Edition of his works

Of these Articles the 4th, 6th, and 12th are of very great interest; the two upon Wagner's operas altogether the best that have been written. They judge those works in the lights afforded by a fully competent knowledge of German literature (to criticize the texts) and of musical science, combined with common sense, an article which in general has sadly failed when Wagner's compositions have been the subject of discussion.

If "St. Paul" and "Elijah" were not so well known with us, and had not already so often been the subjects of excellent articles, I should count these by Jahn as also of uncommon interest.

The volume is not large, only 337 pages; but it is "full of meat." I recommend it heartily to those who read German and care for this branch of literature.

A. W. T.

New York. Parepa and Peralta—the musical chime of the two names will be worth something to Maretzok another season; but now his season's done. "Angela Peralta" (says the New York Musik Zeitung) "is the name of a new prima donna who has appeared at the Academy of Music and brings the season to a close with a certain clat. She comes from Mexico and Havana. Her voice, to be sure, is no longer young, but it has a certain Schmelz, to which one gladly yields himself. Moreover she sings with taste, understanding and correctness. She knows what she wants, and she never wants more than she can accomplish. She is a cultivated singer. We would gladly have availed ourselves of her earlier. With the exception of Parepa the lady singers of the Italian Opera have not been very attractive. Miss Kellogg, to be sure, is a clever artist; but there is a certain tiresome monotony in her performances. She has not made progress, and it would seem to be about time that she should appear before a foreign public; here she is such an enfant gâté, that she must in the end lose all earnestness in Art.

"Mme. Peralta has appeared three times: in the Sommambula, the Pardant, and Lucia. She seems fond of singing the Bellini operas; and as she does this with success, she earns at all events an honorable place among the singers of the day; for it presupposes for more artistic ability, to make Bellini's parts effective, than it does Verdi's."

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY celebrated its 25th Anniversary last Saturday evening by a concert at Steinway Hall. The noble orchestra of ninety, under BERGMANN, is said to have done its best; especially in Beethoven's C-minor Symphony (a reminiscence of the Society's first concert 25 years ago), and in Liszt's "Les Préludes." Of the rest the Tribune says:

The cantata of Frithjof's Saga, a fine work by Max Bruch—the breath of the Norlands and the mystery of the Sagas running through its choral chapters—was sung at length by the Liederkranz, Mme. Rotter, Mr. Frederick Steins, and a tasteful tenor whose name does not appear on the bill, giving acceptable soli. The Liederkranz has never acquitted itself more ably, and it is seldom that choral performances are so deeply and delicately, and, at need, so vaguely and darkly shaded. The work must be heard many times before final judgment, and, of course, it is the intention of the Society to repeat it often. The programme still further included a Concerto for two pianos, by Mozart, delightfully played by Mr. William Mason and Mr. Emile Guyon, and Weber's beautiful and inspiring Jubilee Overture. There was, beside, an almost irrelevant but respectable oration by the Rev. Franklin Johnson, sandwiched between Beethoven and Mozart, and suffering to the extent of the contrast.

Mr. Harrison's "Grand Musical Festival" of a week, beginning June 3, is announced in full. Monday, the Messiah; Tuesday, Hymn of Praise, and a new Forty-sixth Psalm, written for the occasion by F. L. Ritter; Wednesday, Creation; Friday, Elijah. All the Oratorios to be conducted by Mr. Ritter. On Thursday, an Orchestral Concert: Beethoven's "celebrated" Eroica Symphony (Bergmann conductor), and Liszt's "Les Preludes" (Carl Rosa conductor). Saturday, Miscellaneous: Orchestra under Anschütz, Grafalla's Seventh Regiment Band, and Drum Corps (!!). There is a long list of solo-singers, including Mme. Rosa, Mme. Ritter, Messrs. Castle, Simpson, Thomas, Campbell, &c. For pianists: Miss Gilbert, Mr. Pattison, Pease and Colby; solo violinists: Wenzel Kopta and Rosa; organists: Morgan and Conolly. Chorus (Harmonic Society) of 300 voices; Orchestra of 90.

BANGOR, ME. We are pleased to learn that:

"A Choral Festival was held at Norombega Hall, commencing Tuesday, April 23d and continuing four days. The "Messiah" was given on Thursday evening, and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" closed the Festival on Friday evening. The soloists were Miss J. E. Houston, Mrs. J. S. Cary, Mr. James Whitney and M. W. Whitney of this city. The instrumental assistance was The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, with Mr. A. Stein, contra basso. The Chorus numbered two hundred voices. The Conductor was Mr. F. S. Davenport of Bangor. The chorus rehearsals were entirely devoted to Oratorio music, no Church music nor glee music being introduced. It was a great success and has done much for the cause of musical art in Maine."

This lifting of the old-fashioned psalm-singing and psalm-book selling "Convention" into an Oratorio Festival was, we understand, purely the enterprise of Mr. Davenport, and initiates a movement in a right direction. It is high time that the great musical gatherings in the large towns should use their powers and opportunities in studying and bringing out real masterworks of Art, instead of longer taking their turn at the old machines for grinding out trashy psalm-tunes by the thousand every year. Voices they have, and zeal; and even with imperfect instrumental means they may do much to bring the oratorios of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn home to the people.

NEW LONDON, CONN. Mr. Ralph Beecher Doane, organist of St. James Church, had a benefit concert on the 30th ult. at Lawrence Hall, which seems to have been a considerable event for that region. Two hundred persons went to it from Norwich on a special train. The Norwich Bulletin says:

The great feature of the concert was Mr. Petersilea's playing. In the first part of the programme he performed Thalberg's variations on a favorite air from "Elisir d'Amour," and subsequently an elaborate and brilliant composition by Chopin. These selections afforded a fine opportunity for the display of the strength, firmness and delicacy which are so happily combined in his style. He plays with great ease of manner, and with little apparent effort, and with a reserve of force which is equal to any demand of the score. Mr. Suck, violinist, gave to the "Ballads and Polonaise" by Wieniawski—a beautiful composition—an enthusiastic and graceful rendering, being well sustained in the accompaniment by Mr. Petersilea. He afterwards played the popular "Sounds from Home," and received an encore. Miss Loring appeared in an aria from "Wm. Tell," and in "Spring Time," a song by Fesca. She has a pure soprano voice and rendered her selections in good style. Miss Addie S. Ryan sang a cavatina from "Tancredi," and a song composed for her entitled "Many a Time and Oft." She is a contralto, has a highly cultivated voice, and a finished style. She was warmly received.

Mr. Doane sustained, with the exception above mentioned, the thankless and often unappreciated duty of accompanist. He however performed a solo, and took the second part in a duo with Mr. Petersilea. The fact that the concert was undertaken for his benefit, and the intense enthusiasm with which he entered into and arranged all the preliminary details, enlisted the interest of the audience in his behalf. He certainly labored most ambitiously to gain the public approval and he deserved it. His solo was an Andante and a Presto movement from Mendelssohn. His touch is not as crisp and vigorous as that of Mr. Petersilea, neither has his style that character, and in playing upon the same stage with that gentleman he exposed himself to a comparison which would not have been risked by anybody with less artistic enthusiasm and determination than himself. His touch is marked rather by delicacy and sprightliness than by precision and energy, by tenderness and expression rather than brilliancy—at least that was the impression gained from the not altogether favorable test of last evening. He is an artist of great promise, and we hope he will give us another hearing. It will be a friendly one. . . . We understand concerts are to be given by the same company in this city, Hartford, Saratoga, etc.

MORE WORKS OF MENDELSSOHN. The long controversy between Mendelssohn's musical executors and his wholesale London admirers, who claim that all he ever wrote should see the light (even in spite of his own wishes while he lived), seems to be at last settled in favor of the latter. The London Daily News has the following:

"Our musical readers will learn with pleasure that the house of Messrs. Ewer will shortly publish some important works of Mendelssohn, which his executors have only just decided on allowing to appear. The first composition to be brought out will be the concert overture in C, known as the 'trumpet overture,' from the frequent recurrence of a characteristic passage for that instrument. This work was written in 1825, and was performed at the Dusseldorf musical festival in 1833, and two or three times by our Philharmonic Society, but was withheld from publication by Mendelssohn himself. The most important promise, however, is that of the production of Mendelssohn's great Reformation Symphony, in D minor, a work composed in 1830, in celebration of the German Reformation Festival. Mendelssohn wrote the Reformation Symphony during his stay in Rome, probably incited to the composition, as Mr. Benedict says in his memoir of the composer, 'by the sight of the monastery in which Martin Luther, whilst still an Augustine monk, had been resident.' As the work was the result of the same period that produced the materials for his Italian symphony, as Mendelssohn has said to have been much pleased with it at the time, and as he frequently played a transcript of it on the piano-forte to admiring hearers, among whom were some of the most eminent musicians of the day, it is fair to assume that this symphony, so long withheld, will prove a rich addition to the already published works of its composer. Others of his posthumous works are also promised for publication, comprising an eighth book of Lieder ohne Worte, besides some detached songs and piano-forte studies. In the present comparative dearth of creative musical genius, the prospect of the appearance of such art treasures is most welcome and gratifying, and it is to be hoped that their publication will lead the way to that of others of the many works of their composer which still remain in manuscript."

On Miss C. Laura Harris's appearance at the Italiens in Paris, in place of Mlle. Patti, ill, M. Eschardier makes the following remarks in La France Musicale: "It is a deplorable remark, that of producing on the stage of the Theatre Italien artists unknown or untried, whom the provinces could hardly support. Thus we had, a few days ago, the pain of hearing, in the "Sonnambula," in the stead of Mlle. Patti, who at two o'clock only in the day announced herself ill—probably on account of the unsatisfactory state of the treasury—an American Mlle. Harris, worthy at the most of figuring on the stage of the Bouffes-Parisiennes. Imagine a wee little girl of eighteen years, with a thread of thin voice, which rises, rises, like the continuous chirp of a grasshopper, without cause and without aim; a slight figure; a childish mien; and all this devoid of study, method, intelligence, or spirit; and you will have something of an idea of the new Amina."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Thinking, ah! I'm fondly thinking. C. A. White. 30
A pleasing reminiscence of boyhood's years. Good music.
- Love hailed a little maid. Ballad. W. Ganz. 40
A piquant rencontre, charmingly described. A decidedly pleasing song.
- Parted friends may meet again. Song.
W. W. Gilchrist. 30
A piece of excellent sentiment.
- Happy hearts are free. Concert song. K. Menz. 30
A very powerful and brilliant song, and well calculated for a strong voice and energetic manner. Only moderately difficult.
- Whom but Maud should I meet. Song. Balfe. 50
Tennyson's words make music almost in themselves, but Balfe has shown a fine appreciation of the master in this exquisite arrangement.
- Clear and Cool. (The Brook.) Song. Dolores. 50
Words by Kingsley, and the song is very impressive and of a high order. Capital for Contralto voices.
- Found dead. Song. W. H. Day. 40
Very pathetic and plaintive.
- Something sweet to think of. Song and Chorus.
Dr. Ordway. 30
Dr. Ordway's compositions have attained a great popularity, and this and his other recent songs may well circulate as freely as the others.
- Leaf by leaf the roses fall. Song. A. Yane. 40
Very beautiful in every way. Illustrated title.
- Golden smile of parting day. Song. M. Keller. 30
- Heart broken child. " " 30
Well written. The last a temperance song.
- I'll forgive thee, "bye and bye." S'g. Musgrave. 30
Very well turned is the phrase, and nicely accompanied by the music.
- Meet me early. Ballad. Guglieno. 30
Either early or late, he was pleased to see her.
- The Brook. (Wohn). "Maid of the Mill."
Schubert. 40
One of the songs included in Schubert's "Cycnus," wherein the pretty maid figures in almost every one of about 20 songs. Very taking.

Instrumental.

- Carousal. Paraphrase of "We won't go home till morning."
S. G. Pratt. 60
A clever piece, in which the jovial songs of the toppers, the groans from the "dead men" under the table, and the subsequent head-aches, are skillfully rendered into music.
- Iona Waltz. T. E. Garrett. 30
Very sweet. Moderately easy. Key of E flat
- Don Juan. Fantasia brillante. Leybach. 1.00
Favorite melodies from the great opera, well arranged.
- Mabel Waltz. 4 bds. (Social hours.) Bellak. 35
Fine for learners.
- Fête Hongroise. S. Smith. 60
Brilliant arrangement of a Hungarian Mazurka.
- Keller's Am. hymn. Trans. By Grobe. 50
In Grobe's well-known and useful style.
- L'Jet d'Eau. (Drops of Water). S. Smith. 75
Arpeggios and runs in profusion, like diamond drops from the fountain.
- Wood Chapel. (Wald-kapelle). Spindler. 75
Shows Spindler's usual exquisite taste.
- Flee as a bird. Trans. by Grobe. 50
Beautiful melody, finely arranged.
- Alice Galop. A. Jannotta. 30
Alice's fingers may galop over this with great satisfaction.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 682.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 5.

Music in Vienna in the Year 1793.

Translated from Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

We begin with the musical Drama. The enthusiasm of Joseph II. for a German national Opera (to which we are indebted for Mozart's Seraglio), did not prove of long duration, and the Italian opéra buffa regained its place in his affections. The newly engaged company were in a condition however to perform Mozart's Figaro and Don Juan, as well as Salieri's Arar.

On the evening of the 13th of March, 1790, Leopold II. arrived in Vienna, to ascend the throne of his deceased brother; but for a while no change occurred in the court theatres. Before the 5th of July he had not entered any theatre, and the first opera which he attended was Salieri's Arar (Dec. 21), in the company of his guest, King Ferdinand of Naples. But when he had become sufficiently well settled on the Imperial throne, had succeeded in setting aside Joseph's numerous reforms, had brought the Turkish war to a close and happily got through with his various coronations, he turned his thoughts also to the theatre. "The Emperor had it in his mind," writes the actor Lange (Biography, p. 167) "to raise the stage to the highest pitch both in regard to the variety of plays and the splendor of each individually, and for that end he spared no expense. Singers of both sexes were enrolled for serious Italian Opera; and a company of dancers for a Ballet under the ballet master Mazarelli, was engaged." Salieri, although then but 41 years old, and enriched by the observation and experience of 20 years in the conducting of the opera, received gracious leave, according to Mosel, but, according to other and better authorities, directions, to withdraw from the Opera orchestra and confine himself to his duties as director of the sacred music in the court chapel, besides the composition of one opera yearly, should it be required. The Vienna Zeitung of Jan. 28, 1792, mentions the appointment of Joseph Weigl, Salieri's pupil and assistant, then 25 years old, as "Kapellmeister and Kompositur at the Royal Imperial National Court Theatre, with 1000 florins salary." The title "Kompositur" was an empty one; although already favorably known to the public, he was forbidden to write new operas for the court stage; for this end "famous masters" were to be drawn to Vienna. A first fruit of this new order of things was the performance of Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto (Feb. 7, 1792), with which, and with good reason, Leopold was so enraptured, that he gave the performers a supper and ordered them back into the theatre to do the opera over again. It was one of the Emperor's last theatrical enjoyments; on the 1st of March he died, and his wife likewise on the 15th of May following. Accordingly the court theatres were closed for the greater part of the time from March 1 to May 24; and yet during the thirteen months, which ended with the 15th of December, Italian Opera had been given 180 times (134 times in the palace and 46 times in the Kärnthnerthor-theatre), the Ballet 163 times; so that, inasmuch as no innovations entered for the time being, there was an abundance for a young composer like Beethoven to hear and see in these branches of Art. All accounts agree, that the opera company at that time was of uncommon excellence, and their performance, with that of the distinguished orchestra, proved the value of the long experience, the refined taste, the indefatigable zeal and the profound knowledge of their last leader, Salieri. As Beethoven found the opera in the first week of November, 1792, so it remained during the next two years; exclusively Italian, but of the first rank.

Just at that time, by a special stroke of uncommonly good fortune, a smaller, private theatrical enterprise had been so successful, that after ten years it was able to build and occupy the best playhouse in Vienna, and for some time to surpass the royal theatre in the excellence and splendor of its operatic performances; we mean Schikaneder's Theater auf der Wieden. In the year 1793, to be sure, the company was weak, its house small, its performances bad enough.

Of Schikaneder and his company a writer of that time says: "The two theatres of any note (beside the court theatres) are that of Schikaneder on the Wieden, and that of Marinelli, or the so-called Casperl, in the Leopoldstadt. In both were given German plays and German operas. As regards decoration, costume and execution of the orchestra, there is plenty to see and hear in both theatres; so much the worse the sing-song and the acting there. As the Italian operas are performed so excellently in the court theatre, neither of the German theatres perhaps dares to translate and serve them up; on the contrary everything in these theatres is enchanted, full of magic; thus for example we have the Magic Flute, the Magic Ring, the Enchanted Arrow, the Magic Mirror, the Magic Crown, and more such wretched necromancy, the sight and hearing of which is enough to turn one inside out. Text and music dance their pitiful measures side by side—except the Zauberflöte—so that one does not know whether the poet sought to surpass the composer, or the composer the poet, in mere nonsense scribbling. To which add, that these miserable productions are still more miserably represented. Mozart's excellent music to the Zauberflöte is so murdered upon Schikaneder's stage, that you would fain run away for pity. Not a single singer, male or female, is to be heard there, who is above mediocrity in singing or in action. The same is the case with the German Opera in Marinelli's theatre; only he has two or three singing persons who are tolerable."

Schikaneder's Capellmeister and composer was J. B. Henneberg; Marinelli's was Wenzel Müller, who had already opened the long series of his 227 light and popular compositions to texts of magic and broad farce.

Some two weeks after Beethoven's arrival in Vienna (Nov. 23), Schikaneder (falsely) announced the one hundredth performance of the "Magic Flute," an opera, whose success a few years later put his theatre upon an entirely new footing and brought Beethoven into a different relation to him than that of an ordinary visitor indulging his fondness for the comic, and (according to Seyfried) heartily enjoying the bad music that went with it.

The best dramatic composers of Vienna, not already named, must here have passing mention. Besides Cimarosa, who left Vienna a few months later, Beethoven found there Peter Dutilleu, a Frenchman by birth, but an Italian musician in culture and position; he was engaged as composer for the court theatre. His opera, Il Trionfo d'Amor, had been performed there on the 14th of November, 1791, and his Nannerina e Padellino had come upon the stage quite recently. Ignaz Umlauf, composer of Die schöne Schusterin and other once not unpopular operas, had the title of a Capellmeister and composer of the German court opera, and was Salieri's substitute as capellmeister in the church music of the court chapel. Franz Xaver Süssmayr, well known by his connection with Mozart, was just then writing for Schikaneder's stage; Schenk, for Marinelli's theatre, or for the private theatres of the nobility; and Paul Wranitzky, the first violinist and so-called music-director in the German court theatre, composer of the then famous Oberon, composed for the Theater auf der Wieden, exercised his very respectable talent both for Marinelli and for Schikaneder.

The Church Music of Vienna seems to have held a very low stand in the years 1792-3. Yet there were then in Vienna two composers, whose names are still important in the history of music, and who devoted themselves almost exclusively to this branch of the art: the court organist Albrechtsberger, who some months later, through the death of Leopold Hoffmann (March 17, 1793), became musical director at St. Stephen's church, and Joseph Eybler, some five years older than Beethoven, who had just become Regens chori in the Carmelite church, from which he was called two years later to a similar but better situation in the Scottish church.

Public concerts, in our present sense of the word, can scarcely be said to have existed at that time, and regular subscription concerts were rare. Mozart gave a series of them; but after his death there seems to have been no one in the musical world of great name enough to engage successfully in such a speculation. Single subscription concerts, given by virtuosos, and annual ones arranged by some of the best resident musicians in Vienna, of course occurred then, as they have done before and since. The only actual public concerts, properly so called, were the four annual performances in the Burg-theatre, two at Christmas time and two at Easter, for the benefit of the widows and orphans of musicians. These concerts, principally arranged by Gassmann and Salieri, were never exclusive in their programmes: Oratorios, Symphonies, Cantatas, Concertos, everything that could increase their attraction, found acceptance. The stage was filled with the best musicians and singers of the capital, and the excellent orchestra was equally ready to accompany the playing of a Mozart or that of any infant phenomenon of the moment. Risbeck heard, ten years before, that the number of participants in orchestra and chorus upon some occasions reached 400; a statement which looks rather like exaggeration.

A very unusual, half-private concert, also, was arranged in the year 1793. The reader of the biography of Mozart will remember, that he connected himself in 1782 with a certain Martin, to give a series of concerts during the morning hours in the ball of the Augarten, in which most of the performers were dilettanti, and for which the music was furnished from the library of the Vice-president von Kees. These concerts found such response, that they were renewed for several years; there were commonly twelve of them. "Even ladies of the highest nobility let themselves be heard. The auditorium was very brilliant, and all went on with such order and decorum, that every one according to his powers gladly contributed to the support of the institution. The entire proceeds of the small subscription went to defray expenses. Afterwards Hr. Rudolph undertook the direction." This man, then still young, and a good violin player, was director when Beethoven came to Vienna; and one could still see the unusual spectacle of princes and nobles putting themselves under his lead in the performance of orchestral music, before an audience of their own rank, at the unusual hours of from 6 to 8 o'clock in the morning.

From the above it is clear, that Vienna promised no particular advantages to the young musician either in opera and church music or in public concerts. Other cities equalled Vienna in the first two regards, and London was at that time ahead in all, in the number, the variety and the magnificence of its concerts, as it is to-day. It was another field in which Vienna surpassed all competitors. As Gluck, twenty years before, following the impulse given by the French Rameau and the English Dr. Arne, had begun the great revolution in Opera music, which Mozart completed, so Haydn, building on the foundation of the Bachs and supported by Mozart, effected a new development of pure instrumental music, which was destined to reach its highest point through the genius and the boldness of the young man who was now his scholar. And as before, with Gluck, so now again Vienna was the arena of the contest and the victory; for a contest preceded, ere the victory was complete.

(To be continued).

Bach's Works.

(From "JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH; his Life and Writings—Adapted from the German of C. L. HILGENFELDT, with additions from other sources," as published in the London Choir.)

(Continued from page 26).

Before proceeding in our specification of Bach's extant works, we shall take a survey of the various species of composition in use in his time, of which some are obsolete, or have received new appellations in more recent times.

We commence with the "Prelude," also called Preambulum, which in the time of Bach meant the introduction to a chorale or fugue, played on the organ or clavier, its chief aim being to enable the singers to pitch their note, and the instrumentalists to tune without creating disturbance.

According to old Erhard Niedt, in his "Musical Guide," "the organist may regulate its length at his pleasure." "But," adds Mattheson, in his edition of the work, "I would rather have it as short as possible, especially when the master is not at home."

By the name of "Ouverture," was understood a somewhat longer composition for instruments. It was used as an introduction to a secular work, of a certain prescribed form, invented by the French. It usually commenced with a short, slow movement, which led into a quicker one. The latter was often treated like a fugue.

The "Sinfonia" commenced with an introductory movement of "short and powerful phrases of some twenty or twenty-four bars." This was followed by a movement of quicker tempo of some fifty or sixty bars, which, however, contained "Reprises." The conclusion was a still quicker movement.

The "Sonata," according to Niedt, was a sort of prelude played before the voices commenced. It consisted of an adagio, followed by an allegro, to which, at the beginning of the last century, some other movements were added ad libitum. It continued an independent piece until it was displaced by "Suites," and "Concerts," but remained on the organ and clavier.

The "Toccatà," always for the organ or clavier, was of a larger form than the "Prelude," and intended to display brilliant execution. It was plentifully provided with shakes and imitative figures occupying the attention of both hands. It belongs to the now so-called "Concert Pieces."

We have next the "Fantasia," which was, in the first place, undoubtedly an extempore performance. The player was neither bound to the tempo nor the key, but roamed away according to his genius or whim, giving his ideas free course.

The "Capriccio," or, as it was called in the time of Bach, the "Caprice," was much akin to the fantasia. It chiefly required a little more ornament of figured or fugued passages.

The "Fugue," at first, was only a sort of prelude. It served chiefly as an introduction to a choral song, where it had to work out the two first "strophes" of the canto fermo. In Bach's time the fugue was a test of the ability of an artist as to his skill in counterpoint. To do this required technical knowledge, but little else. Bach, however, besides rendering his fugue with perfect technical skill, treated it æsthetically. A characteristic theme; a melody uninterrupted, and growing out of this theme; freedom, ease, and fluency, combined with inexhaustible richness of modulation; unity, and yet variety of style, and such life spread over the whole, that to the performer and hearer the tones appear to be those of spirits;—these are only a few of the qualities of Bach's art in this style.

The term "Invention," given to some of Bach's works, is an abbreviation of a title which runs thus—"A Sincere Guide, in which, to the amateurs of the Piano, is shown a clear way to perform in a pure style in two parts, and at the same time to receive good Inventions," &c. The contents of this work consist of short cantabile phrases, that by imitation or transposition may be worked out into whole pieces, so that the young composer is shown how to treat a musical idea, and is guided by the study of these phrases to musical invention.

We now arrive at the "Suite," an invention of the French for the clavier and other instruments. It consists of a succession of pieces in the style of the then usual dance melodies, namely, the Allemande, Courante, Sarabande, and in conclusion, a Gigue.* This is the most useful grouping of the "Suite." Sometimes it is preceded by a prelude, and often it contained minuets, passe-pieds, burlesques, &c.

The "Allemande" is a kind of air in which the time is beaten in four, and slowly. It is said to have originated in Germany, but this is not certain.

The "Courante" is an antiquated French dance, written in three-two, or three-four time, and consisting of many running passages.

The "Sarabande," as the name indicates, originated in Spain. Its melody is in three-four time, of a slow and serious expression. It consists of sixteen bars, divided into two parts.

The "Gigue," at one time a favorite dance with the English and Spanish, is of a cheerful character, in six-eight, twelve-eight, and sometimes in three-eight time. It was used in the suite in the place of our modern scherzo.

The "Minuet," still in use, was originally a slow dance of two parts, each of eight or sixteen bars. It was so much liked during the last century, that it made its way into the modern sonata and symphony. Haydn has left us the best specimens of the modern minuet.

The "Passe-pied" is an antiquated French dance. It has been replaced by the more modern minuet, which is based upon the same rhythmical principles.

Of the peculiar dance movements of this period we must still mention two others—the "Ciaccona," or "Chaconne," and the "Passacaille," or "Passaglia."

The first is a moderately quick movement in three-four time, of a pleasing and highly rhythmical character. It was a great favorite in Spain and Italy. Handel wrote a Ciaccona in G major, with sixty-two variations.

The "Passecaïlle" is like the former, but slower, and with a longing, tender melody. It is usually in the minor mode.

Towards the period of Bach's death the "Suites," in addition to the above-mentioned characteristic melodies, contained an allegro, an andante, and sometimes a presto movement. With this arrangement the "Suites" were called "Parthien." Afterwards these characteristic pieces were lost sight of, and from the "Parthien" came compositions of a series of melodious movements loosely combined, called "Divertissements." Next arose a new and important composition in a grander style and more strict character—the modern "Clavier Sonata."*

Apart from the "Parthien" are the "Partites," which arose about the middle of the seventeenth century. At first a short cantabile melody was chosen, and the "variations" were called "doubles." The harmony of the air remained unchanged, and the variation was limited to the melody, which was worked out and ornamented with all sorts of graces and bravura passages.

From the "Choral Partite" came the figured choral composition, of which we have so many specimens from the mighty hand of Bach.

(To be continued.)

Robert Franz.

SKETCH OF HIS LIFE BY LISZT.

(Concluded from page 26).

After his return to his father's house, Franz was in a great dilemma. He had not as yet acquired any of those faculties which make a man pass current in the world. He could not and he would not any longer court a civic position, which would have made him the respectable five-hundredth wheel in the social machine of his country. He was determined, come what would, to remain a musician, since he already looked upon himself as such, and indeed as completely such. Meanwhile his best labors betrayed too much the groping scholar, and reached not that degree of clearness and effectiveness which the public requires. His shy, retiring nature was not fitted to seek satisfaction in the successes of salons and coteries, in affairs of love or business. He suffered without resistance under the calumnies to which such organizations are exposed, which, in their want of brilliant outward qualities, become shy of men, and often feel themselves robbed of their resources in the very moment when there is the most pressing necessity for making them apparent. Like Rousseau and Schiller, his thoughts came just as he left the house; or, as we heard him say himself, he usually thawed out when it was too late. His state of mind was aggravated by bitter remarks, which his friends and relations did not spare him when it was demonstrable that his musical studies so far had produced only negative results, and that his career might, in the common way of viewing things, be called a failure. This situation became the more painful, since in Dessau he was affected by one of the most dangerous evils of every conservatoire: to wit, self-sufficiency. Too often any expressed distrust in his talent, in his future, only increased the inward reserve of his nature. Instead of growing more expansive in his family circle, he returned more and more back into himself, became more and more strengthened in his striving after independence of the opinions of others, more and more determined to rely solely on himself. It was for him a period full of conflict, suffering and doubt, full of toil and renunciation. It might have operated destructively upon him, for how hard it is to hold one's ground against so many opposing influences! But here it was a mother's tender sympathy, the womanly gift of intuition, lending such a sacred charm to the pure instinct of her love, that held him up and saved him—he who only needed some stay in a loving heart to raise the lever of his energy, his outward power.

* The first attempt at a "Clavier Sonata" was by Johann Kuhnau, Bach's predecessor at the St. Thomas' School, in 1695. It consists of three movements—an allegro, changing into a fugato; a simple adagio; and an allegro; after which the first movement is repeated. Kuhnau wrote seven more sonatas in the same year. Bach did not imitate them, preferring the freer form of the "Suite."

About this time he first learned to know and to admire Sebastian Bach and Franz Schubert. While he became penetrated with the genius of these two, he gradually lost that self-sufficiency which he had brought with him from Dessau, and not much time passed before all the Dessau compositions were put aside. A close acquaintance with these masters, a continual reference to what they had done, and a comparison of it with his own sketches, operated depressingly upon his artistic consciousness, and nourished disheartening doubts in his own productive faculty. But he received them all the more deeply into his enthusiastic soul, into his ripening understanding. Singular example of sincere love for Art! By this means he escaped the petrification which might have ensued from an indefinite prolonging of the conflict between unappreciating friends and morbid self-reliance, which so easily degenerates into empty conceit.

Moreover, he now found in Halle that intellectual movement, that constant coming and going of ideas, that ebb and flow of the most various views, which he had lacked in Dessau. Even if the public musical life there was of slight importance, yet the university offered mighty elements of spiritual nourishment, such as one would have sought in vain at that time in any other part of Germany. One remembers the activity developed in the thinking youth of Halle then, which found its most remarkable expression in a periodical review, whose philosophical opinions made an epoch. Ruge and his followers had called forth a great activity in cultivated circles, which naturally began to pervade every sphere of intellectual life. If Franz did not immediately attach himself to the new ideas just germinating, if he did not discountinate them by speaking and by writing, still he exercised his analytic and sympathetic reflection upon all that there was noble and fruitful in these investigations of philosophic freedom. He quickly perceived that the artist must not limit his survey to the objects which he has to treat; that it must be injurious to him to remain a stranger to the atmosphere of ideas which surround him, and not consider his art as a part of the great whole, in the midst of which we live, identifying himself with the universal interests, newly quickened by the new inquiries.

The favorable influence which his participation in this intellectual struggle exercised upon him cannot be mistaken, and this moment thus became of such paramount importance for his life-purposes thereafter, as to regulate his whole relation to the world and to Art by a fixed rule. It may also be maintained that Franz became the musician whom we now admire, not through his studies in Dessau, but through the solitary period which he passed in Halle. Not that we would question the necessity and usefulness of the elementary notions acquired in the school of Schneider. They were as indispensable to him as his first gymnasium studies, without which he would not have been capable of following the philosophical debates, of which he was a dumb but eager witness. But Franz himself has told us that, had the stiffness, immovableness, and narrowness of the Dessau principles remained unmodified and unexpanded in him, he would never have been Franz, would never have acquired the courage to assert his individuality, to hold himself not pledged to do as others had done, and let himself be taken in tow by famous authorities. He would have yielded to the cheap counsels which rained from the lips of would-be patrons; for it is not always necessary to lie upon Job's dunghill to be like him surrounded by the empty speeches of friends. He would perhaps have lent an ear to those well-meant but ruinous insinuations, which continually point us to the success of others, urge us upon others' ways, without knowing whether we are able to walk upon them; for if the animal kingdom is divided into different classes, which live in different elements, much more so is it with independent talents; the organization of each one is too peculiarly constituted not to forfeit its own inborn originality and excellencies in the atmosphere of another. Franz became convinced of this truth, while he reflected upon Art in all its broad relations. Then, summoning up again the courage which he had lost through being long buried in Bach and Schubert, shaking off the yoke of old formulas, unlearning the false importance which attaches to certain secrets of the trade, when we take them for the highest initiation, he resolved to seek his way, and before all things to perfect his intellectual self. He saw that the form is a soft wax, in which the business is to impress our relief, and that the more finely the relief is cut, the better will the impress show itself. The form, which he had been told to look upon as the essential thing in Art, now lost forever in his eyes its unalterable character. He recognized all the idolatry of taking the image for the god, the means for the end, and of attaching more consequence to the quality of the wax than to the beauty of the object it should set before us. Thus he found himself in that right frame of mind, at once bold and modest, which hope incites and true self-knowledge keeps in bounds. From the moment when the form appeared to him only as the indispensable medium of the idea, he formulated to himself the impregnable position of the necessity of maintaining a beautiful equilibrium between form and thought, and of only giving expression to such thoughts as are worthy of a fair form.

Whoever has labored for long years to penetrate the close web of philosophical systems, in order to apply their consequences to the domain of Art, and whoever has succeeded in formulating the ideas thence derived in such high-hearted, comprehensive, fruitful principles, must naturally feel a desire not only to communicate them, but to spread them, and in the consciousness that they contribute to the ennobling of Art, to win proselytes to his opinions. Franz sought them the more zealously, inasmuch as he had not yet wholly lifted himself out of that despondency into which he had been plunged by the conviction that he was incapable of production and not possessed of the necessary qualities for a composer. But this propagandist spirit drove him out of his retirement, and he saw himself all at once surrounded by a circle of young people, who to a certain artistic culture brought a lively enthusiasm for Art; and he formed the focus of a group which occupied itself especially with music, with its task in social life, its ethical mission and title. They were not content with making music, and decidedly good music; they busied themselves with drawing an aesthetic profit from it. Franz found more and more pleasure in these abstract intellectual exercises, which in the sequel he exerted himself to apply to his own works, in which he attained to a self-criticism, such as is quite too seldom met among our artists, who either satisfy themselves with the expression of their feelings, without having tried them and refined them, or else take delight in rounded forms, forgetting to lend them a significance through feelings.

For six long years Franz felt no impulse to take pen in hand; he was occupied upon one task which the elders so often erroneously suppose completed at the gymnasium, and which in our time especially every creative artist must fulfil with love and conscientiousness. He strove for the enlargement of his circle of ideas, for the attainment of a higher standpoint, from which the whole relation of Art to the past and present of society may be surveyed; from which one may see how far Art has already fulfilled its mission, and what will be its problem for the future; from which one may learn to seize its starting point and to anticipate its goal. So long as a thinking artist is not clear in his own mind upon all these points, the wish to produce upon his own account must slumber in him. Above all there reigns in him a kind of insatiable curiosity, an incessant thirst, which study does not quench, but only the more violently kindle. The musical culture of our composer had nothing more to suffer during this period, while his mind was more occupied by generalizing thoughts than with special labors. He did not come to a stand-still in the admiration of Bach and Schubert, but he followed attentively the unfolding of the school which was at that time called the Romantic. In Leipzig the practical and literary efforts of Mendelssohn and Schumann formed a circle full of life and motion round themselves, and the influence of their neighborhood extended soon to Halle. Frequent echoes carried there the tone of the capital and were eagerly caught up. Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Henselt, and other names at that time perhaps less highly placed, though often mentioned, excited sympathy and respect in Franz. He took up into himself all that he found in them that corresponded to him. To this work of assimilation with the works of his contemporaries, whose spirit answered to his own, and whose form bore the stamp of their time, he was especially indebted for the restoration to himself, for a less inexorable process of comparison, of judgment, as also for the need of burying himself again entirely in his own way of feeling, so as to let it appear freely in a work of Art; for the impulse to express himself, instead of tracing out in others' works what came near to his own moods of mind, as he had done in the last years.

But was this result due only to the various phases of the intellectual life? Must we not also recognize the influence of personal experiences in these conspicuous moments of his artistic career, by which we measure his direction? Can we realize the whole impression of his works without thinking of the colorings which were cast upon his soul, upon his imagination, by the prismatic light of golden hopes, of shining fortune, or the dark clouds of sad disenchantment, bitter gloom? The moment in which Franz felt himself newly urged to composition was not merely of importance in the history of the unfolding of his talent; it coincided with a moment of deep passion, which, seizing upon every fibre of his soul, excited the poetic chords to new vibrations. He loved, with all devotion, such as could germinate in his pure, noble nature. He dreamed of a happiness; softly its wings touched him, and then it flew away! This catastrophe of his inner fate determined his complete maturity. He broke away from all the involvements of uncertain wishes and uncertain hopes; pain steeled and concentrated his mind, and gave him that sacred fervor, that energy which leaves the soul all its freedom, so that it may confirm this freedom with its every power. With these newly awakened powers he felt himself called to take his place among the men of action, and to speak his own language in the name of his own inward inspiration. An impulse, whose authority he could not mistake, drew him to the lyrical, and particularly to the song form; for what he felt and thought most powerfully took this form involuntarily. Far from stopping to make choice of a kind, from weighing its external advantages and disadvantages, he began without once thinking of publicity, and only wrote to make an outlet to his overpowering feelings—pour son plaisir. His close, uncommunicative habit made this mode of expressing himself doubly necessary to him. And now it was found that these long years of voluntary abstinence from all production had not only been no injury to him, but had helped to preserve all the freshness of his nerve. His constant musical occupation had not allowed him to forget the secrets of the trade learned at school, while his persistent inward toil had been sufficient to free him from all chains of prejudice.

This time, too, as in so many other instances, it was the self-love of his friends, more active than his own, that determined him to publish his first works. Schumann, to whom he then stood nearest, led him before the musical world with that friendly recognition which affects us so pleasantly in his writings. Franz perceived that from this moment his relation to Art had entered upon a new stadium. It was no longer exclusively the point with him to satisfy himself in his compositions; his artistic productions must now learn to find limit and proportion in the views and feelings of others. Personal acquaintance with the great men of the day, with Schumann and others, paved the way for him upon the side of self-examination and self-esteem. He entered deeper into reflection on himself and his relation to the public. The result of this reflection was the firm adherence to the path which he had entered, the clear conviction that only in this path could he become of use to Art, and, what is the same thing, to the world. With this resolution was coupled as a natural consequence a second: namely, never to write for the mere sake of writing, and still less from any motive of gain or vanity; but only when the inner voice, the longing after the ideal, the holy stimulus, which urges us to seek in Art the transfiguration of our noblest impulses, compelled him to it and made him sure of the inspiration, without which we can neither feel love for the beautiful nor find its fitting forms. And who will say that he has not been faithful to this noble vow? Who can find among his creations a single one which betrays other motives? So far from violating his vow, he exposed himself much more to another danger—that of a too great intensity of feeling, a too constant self-absorption, a too exclusive meditating upon his own inner consciousness. The alterations which he afterwards made, from sure and well-weighed reasons, in his compositions, are abundant proof that he soon saw and avoided this fault.

Now that he had fairly begun his career as a composer with merit and with honor, his outward life of fever but little variety. He made a happy marriage, and found in the domestic hearth, adorned with gentle virtues, that clear, equal atmosphere which is most favorable to intellectual labors. True, he found no lack of manifold local opposition and antipathy, which only serve to remind one of the proverb: "No one is a prophet in his own country." Every one who knows the narrow circle of ideas in a small city, will readily imagine that few understood the interest and the use which a musician found in occupations which had no connection with his vocation; for even in this year of grace 1855 there still exist good people who believe that artist and mechanic are one and the same thing, and that to become a good painter, sculptor, or musician, one has no need to seek for himself a wider horizon than that of the workshop, like the tailor and the shoemaker. Franz was accounted odd, original; nay, they went so far (and this is a characteristic trait, which we may find in many an artist's life, and may serve as one useless hint the more for pedantic blockheads in the age to come,) as to whisper into one another's ears that such an eccentricity of character could only proceed from a tendency to insanity! Certainly his greatest hindrance was the fact that he resided in the city where he had been born and brought up. The multitude will not forgive genius, that it unfolds itself with the chasteness of the plant, whose blossoming is slowly prepared, which opens its calyx to the lap of night, and then to the clear day, to our astonished eyes, displays the splendor of its full bloom. It vexes them that they have passed by a flower with closed petals, without divining its worth, its beauty, and they deny the same, in order to evade the painful feeling that they did not foresee it.

Thus years passed on. Franz found abroad the sympathy which he deserved, while his native land disputed note by note his merit. Only very slowly did another view break out a path for itself in the criticism of the men of Halle, so hard was it for them to treat with more respect this single man, so sparing of his words, whom they had been accustomed to regard as one of those fantastical, harmless, useless, visionary characters, upon whom the merchant, the bureaucrat, the industrial, the scholar, the soldier look down with an infinite hauteur, because they cannot comprehend why he is there, and still less why he looks down still more haughtily on them. The efforts of our master to expend his intellectual activity in his own little circle for the good of Art, won for him gradually the respect of his townsmen, as fast as his praises and his growing popularity abroad imposed silence on their prejudices. They even appointed him organist in one of the parochial churches, music director to the Gesangsverein, music teacher at the University, and gave him the direction of the society concerts. In time, however, Franz may hardly be contented with the sphere of action offered in his native city. But however much is left for him to desire he must look with real confidence upon the musical nucleus collected around him, which has learned to distinguish commonplace products, manufactured in the routine of trade, from higher works of art inspired by true enthusiasm. This circle will expand from year to year, and form for him an intelligent, sympathetic, admiring and devoted public, such as seldom any one can claim with greater right than ROBERT FRANZ.

German Singing Clubs in New York.

(From the Evening Post).

THE LIEDERKRANZ.

The Deutsche Liederkranz, one of the most prosperous German clubs of the city, whose annual masked ball at the Academy of Music is one of the important events of the season to ball-goers, has its abiding place on Fourth street, two large dwellings having been turned into one building for its occupancy. On the basement floor are refreshment tables, billiard tables, a bowling alley, &c., and above are a reading room, parlors, reception rooms, ladies' parlors, and a hall of rehearsal eighty feet long, fifty feet wide and thirty-five feet high. At the front of the room is a banner about ten by fifteen feet, emblematic of the society.

The name Liederkranz signifies "a wreath of song," and the device painted on the banner is a large crown of laurels with ends united, and a Grecian lyre in the centre. A broad ribbon is twined round the wreath, on which are inscribed the names of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Weber, Handel, and other famous composers. On the right side is a banner on which is painted the figure of a woman, life size, representing the Spirit of Song, and on the left another representing the Spirit of Pleasure strewing flowers. Each banner is ornamented with appropriate inscriptions.

The Liederkranz has about nine hundred members, among whom are included ladies. Only a small part of this number, however, are active members. The chorus consists of sixty members, who rehearse in the large hall mentioned, and a chorus of forty ladies rehearse in a room on the second floor, and often take part in the musical exercises of the Liederkranz. The rehearsals in the large rooms are varied by dancing. The society has also an orchestra of amateur players numbering forty pieces. Tuesday and Thursday evenings are the regular occasions for rehearsal. The club is the soul of hospitality. No waiter is allowed to take an order from a guest. With its masquerade, its mid-summer-night festivals, which are held once or twice a year at some one of the larger gardens in Yorkville or Harlem, and which are exceedingly brilliant and select; its summer excursion to some pleasant country place; its regular concerts and private hops, it manages to furnish its members a comfortable amount of entertainment during the year. Its officers are: President, William Steinway; Secretary, F. Koch; Treasurer, George Nembach.

THE ARION.

The Arion is younger than the Liederkranz, and is thought to partake somewhat more of the energy of youth. There is between them a generous rivalry, which has the effect of rendering each club more vigorous and attractive. The Arion was organized in 1854 by thirteen gentlemen, who seceded from the Liederkranz, and immediately proceeded to establish a singing society on their own responsibility.

They have prospered greatly, and have now a fine chorus of forty-five voices, and about four hundred non-active members. Unlike the Liederkranz, the club has no female chorus. It has its quarters at the Germania Assembly Rooms, using the large ball-room for all special occasions.

The Arion gave its first annual masquerade in 1855 at the Chinese Assembly Rooms. The hall was given yearly at the same rooms until Irving Hall was built, when in 1861 and 1862 it was given at that place. In 1863 it was given at Niblo's. Since then the masquerade has been given at the Academy of Music, and from the first has never failed to be an immense success. From the first of January till the time of the ball, the Arion holds weekly or fortnightly carnival meetings at the Germania Assembly Rooms, which are exceedingly unique and entertaining. Each gentleman attending wears a fool's cap, and from among them a council of fools is chosen. A band furnishes music, and the ladies and gentlemen sip their wine as the exercises proceed. The walls are hung with grotesque pictures bearing sarcastic reference to public men and public events, and every odd design for amusement and surprise is adopted. The council of fools direct the exercises.

The platform for speakers last year represented an old woman holding a tub, and the speakers stood in the tub; this year it represented a huge meerschaum, the speaker standing in the pipe. From these extraordinary forums they fulminate jokes against all peoples and things under the sun, from the President to the Chief of Police. For, though the greater number of the members of the Arion are ardent Republicans, they are, as might be surmised, not at all in favor of the Excise law; and, therefore, not only democratic politicians and Congressmen, but also the Board of Excise and the Chief of Police receive their due share in this inoffensive bombardment of witticisms. The paintings of the club are mostly done by Nichola Meister.

Some time after the occurrence of the annual ball a masquerade sociable is given, which also swells to the dimensions of a ball, though no tickets are sold, and the whole expense is paid by the club. In the summer there are two summer night's festivals, and also fortnightly entertainments on Saturday nights at some of the up-town gardens, at which there are singing and dancing. There are also gatherings on Christmas and on other holidays. The Arion also takes cognizance of public events. It had a very solemn and impressive ceremony on the occasion of the funeral of President Lincoln in this city. There are generally two grand concerts in the fall. The regular rehearsal evenings are on Tuesday and Friday. At the Singsfest in Buffalo in 1860, in the contest with other singing clubs, the Arion received the first prize. The dues are the same as those of the Liederkranz: initiation, $25; annual fees, $12. The following are the officers: President, C. F. Triacca; first vice-president, J. O. Hundt; second vice-president, A. Rueckel; treasurer, F. A. Mensing; finance secretary, A. Reickelt; corresponding secretary, R. Schindler; recording secretary, L. Grill; librarian, L. Herder; musical director, Carl Anschütz.

THE HARMONIE.

The finest house owned by any German club, if not indeed by any club in the country, is that recently built and furnished by the Harmonie Club on Forty-second street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues, fronting the Reservoir Park.

The Harmonie Club was organized in 1852, and had formerly a house in Eighth street, opposite the Mercantile Library building. The new building was begun in September, 1865, and was finished at the end of January, 1867. Its cost, not including the land, has been a quarter of a million of dollars. The architect was Mr. Henry Fernbach. The lot is one hundred and four feet front and one hundred feet deep; the building eighty feet front and one hundred feet deep. Twenty feet are reserved on the Fifth avenue side for a summer garden and arbor, to be planted with vines and flowers; with refreshment tables at the sides and a fountain in the centre.

On the basement floor is the library, the room for the board of management, a kitchen, and a fine and spacious bowling-alley. The library comprises about five thousand volumes in German, French and English, and members may take the books to their homes the same as in the Mercantile Library. The entrance hall on the main floor is twelve feet wide and eighty feet deep, with doors opening on each side to the gentlemen's reception rooms, parlor, dressing rooms, reading room, and private dining rooms for small social parties. The hall leads at the end to the billiard room, which extends the whole width of the house, eighty-four feet, and is about twenty feet wide.

On the second floor is the large hall and concert room, about 60 feet by 84, with high ceiling and a gallery. It is the most splendidly finished room of the kind in America, and the members claim that it is not surpassed in Europe. No expense has been spared in frescoing, in immense mirrors, in chandeliers, and in every sort of decoration, to add to its brilliancy. The frescoing alone cost $5,000. There are five chandeliers, with two hundred lights, one in the centre and one near each corner of the room. Connecting with the hall room are ladies' parlors and dressing rooms. On the same floor also is the everyday dining room or restaurant. One pair of stairs above, on the floor which communicates with the gallery of the great hall, is a large dining room running along the whole front of the house, capable of seating about five hundred persons, and on the floor above another dining room of the same size. These are intended for use on the occasion of grand balls or concerts. Many of the floors of the rooms are of beautiful inlaid work, and have no carpets. All the rooms are elegantly furnished.

The club numbers about three hundred and twenty-five members, and is limited to four hundred. The German language is principally spoken. The affairs of the club are under the control of a board of management. During the winter season there is usually a reception, ball or concert, about once every fortnight. It does not occur on a regular day, but is appointed by the board of management, and notice is sent to the members. During the winter there are generally four or five grand balls, attended by perhaps five hundred or more persons. The concerts are given by the best artists who can be procured. At the last which was given, Thomas, Wolfsohn and other distinguished artists were engaged. Sometimes a little dancing occurs after the concert. There is a glee club of ladies and gentlemen also formed among the members. The officers are: President, M. Siegmann; Vice-President, L. Wackenheim; Treasurer, Julius Binge; Secretaries, L. Cahn and M. Bayer.

THE ALLEMANIA.

The Allemania is a very thriving German club which has been in existence about ten years. Its last abiding place was in Lafayette Place, whence it removed to the fine building now occupied by it on the south side of Sixteenth street, near Union Square. It is about thirty-seven feet front; and, with the extension, one hundred and seventy-eight feet deep.

The building is owned by the club, and has been bought and fitted up at an expense of over a hundred thousand dollars, subscribed by the members. The most noticeable room of the house is the exceedingly handsome and convenient hall, about thirty-five feet by eighty feet, with a neat stage—about twenty by twenty-five feet—for various performances by the members. Saturday evening, April 13th, two very entertaining pieces were played by members. Short operas are also performed occasionally.

The Allemania is the only large club which has a stage for theatrical entertainments. The Progress, a German club in Twenty-third street, however, gives occasional private performances. This hall is also used for concerts, orations and soirées. The first soiree since the completion of the hall was given March 5th. Regular receptions are given every Saturday evening, and, as with all the German clubs, the members share the enjoyments of the club with their families or lady friends. There is a billiard room, a bowling alley, and a fine dining room. The rooms are open every day. The officers are: President, I. Hamburger; vice-president, Wm. Demuth; secretary, E. H. Wimpfheimer; treasurer, L. Ilfveler

THE GERMANIA.

The Germania Club is composed of a large number of our German citizens, and is conducted in a manner somewhat similar to the American social clubs. It has a large house at No. 104 Fourth avenue, at which it has a reading room, restaurant, billiard room, &c. The officers are: President, C. Holzappel; secretary, W. Vogel; treasurer, F. Hoffbauer.

THE PROGRESS.

The Progress is a pleasant club of two hundred and fifteen members, having the house No. 193 Twenty-third street, between the Sixth and Seventh avenues. It is social, and gives dramatic and musical entertainments and summer picnics and excursions. The club has its own restaurant and other conveniences for social enjoyments. It is mostly composed of young men in business. The officers are—President, Otto Wolfsohn; Vice President, Mr. Forsch; Secretaries, Philip Frank and Mr. Maas; Treasurer, Mr. Bronner.

THE ASCHENBROEDEL.

The Aschenbroedel is a club composed exclusively of musicians, many of them belonging to some of the orchestras of the theatres. Whenever musicians are wanted for any large orchestra they can also be obtained at this club. The club has occupied for nearly two years a pleasant house, No. 74 East Fourth street, near Second avenue. There is a restaurant, billiard room, library, &c., and the members number about three hundred. Most of all the principal German artists of the city belong to this club. The president is Francis X. Diller; secretary, W. Gebhardt.

Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."

From the London Review.

... MM. Barbier and Carré, the composer's librettists, have followed Shakspeare's version of Romeo and Juliet, and even his diction, very closely. The opera is laid out in five acts, with pretty nearly the same persons in the drama as in Shakspeare. Act I. is in one set scene, representing the masque at Capulet's house, the stolen march of Romeo and his friends, the first meeting of the lovers, and the recognition of Romeo by Tybalt. Act II. is also in one set, representing the famous balcony scene, and is devoted entirely to the meeting of the lovers. Act III. is divided into two scenes: first, a front scene, representing Friar Laurence's cell. Here takes place the celebration of a mass service by the holy father and his friars, then the marriage of Romeo and Juliet. The second scene, a set, is in the street outside Capulet's house, and the business transacted in it comprises the double duel between Mercutio and Tybalt, and Tybalt and Romeo, the arrival of the Grand Duke, and the banishment of Romeo amidst the mutual recriminations of adherents of the Montagues and Capulets. Act IV. is a set, representing Juliet's room. The action includes a grand love scene for Romeo and his wife, the swallowing of the potion by Juliet, and the despair of the household in finding the hope of the Capulets dead. Act V. comprises a front and a set scene. In the former Father Laurence learns that his instructions to Romeo have miscarried; in the latter, the "tomb of all the Capulets" is seen, Romeo poisons himself, Juliet awakes only to find her lover dying, and the opera ends, as does the drama, with their death.

M. Gounod prefaces his opera with a slight introduction in his usual manner, to which the standard overture is utterly repugnant. In this particular instance, however, its musical interest is heightened by the introduction of a chorus narrating, exactly as Shakspeare excites it in his prologue, the legend of the unfortunate lovers of Verona. This chorus is unaccompanied; and it will always be found difficult, from its extreme length, to get it sustained in time, recited as it is nearly on a monotone, the orchestra coming in with an occasional chord. The first act is full of a charming musical and dramatic interest. The waltz—or rather mazurka—strain to which the curtain rises is one of those catching motifs so plentifully scattered through Faust, serving as symphony to a joyous dancing chorus for mixed voices in the composer's happiest vein. The entrance of Juliet with her father is marked by a beautiful exclamation for the tenors and basses, expressive of their admiration of the young girl. This is echoed by the soprano, and Juliet is introduced in a few words by Capulet. The childish delight of the debutante (for such she is) is delightfully expressed in a short aria in 8-4 time, and then Capulet, rallying Paris, his intended son-in-law, for not dancing, sings a jovial strain to the guests, "Allons! jeunes gens; allons! belles dames," the refrain of which is repeated in chorus. The music of Capulet, we may here remark at once, is admirably characteristic—full of bonhomie, hospitable intention, and yet not lacking a certain tenderness where Juliet is the subject. The dance is resumed, and by-and-bye, Romeo, Mercutio, and a small band of friends, to act as semi-chorus, enter on their prank. Romeo is rather disturbed by a presage of misfortunes induced by a dream, which gives occasion—the stage being free—for the ballad of "Queen Mab," sung by Mercutio, sotto voce, to a wonderfully descriptive accompaniment of full orchestra pianissimo. Of the many quaint and clever things Gounod has done, this is one of the quaintest and cleverest. Juliet and the other guests re-enter—Romeo is struck by her beauty, manages to crave an interview, which by-and-bye gives rise to a charming duet, in the shape of a madrigal, "Auge adorable." This simple little number will, we can safely prophesy, enjoy an extended popularity both on the stage and off. The remainder of the act is taken up by the recognition of Romeo by Tybalt, the despair of Juliet at finding who the stranger is she already loves and the répente of the refrain of Capulet's song, to which the act-drop descends. This act is admirable in every respect. There is not a redundant note, and the stage business is full of excitement.

In the second act, M. Gounod approaches more closely to the crucial test in which so many have failed. Here Romeo evades his friends, and seeks his mistress. The entracte to which the curtain rises in the Balcony scene is a species of reverie, or rather cradle-song (to speak descriptively), in 6-8 rhythm, orchestrated with the most voluptuous softness, in perfect keeping with "moonlight on a lady's bower." Romeo's serenade, which naturally occurs here, is exceedingly effective. One phrase is full of passion, and will have an immense effect, sung with the requisite voice. Juliet appears at the balcony, and soliloquizes exactly as in the play. Romeo announces his presence, but scarcely has he done so, when a noise off is heard, and the lovers retire only in time to escape discovery by a number of the servants, who suspect that Romeo is lurking about. The Nurse is brought on (she has previously appeared in the first act), and after a few comic insinuations that it is her beauty which allures young scapegraces thither, and a choral invocation of wrath on the heads of the Montagues, the intruders go off. Romeo reappears, meets Juliet, and the anticipated duet begins in earnest. It is an attempt—both on the part of the librettist and the composer—to realize, passage by passage, the exquisite picture limned by Shakspeare, and we believe that the effort is entirely successful. Gounod has managed to portray a young girl's heart in this opera, most marvellously. In the first act Juliet's music is that of an innocent; in the second it is still innocent, but a thought more tender; in the latter portion of the work it rises to dignity which the catastrophe demands. The ensemble of the Balcony duet, "De cet adieu si doux est la tristesse," is upon an exceedingly simple theme in A, 3-4 time, and is worked out in a long decrescendo on the word "jusqu'à demain"—sinking to a mere whisper, the effect of which is simply beautiful. It has all the poetry of the duet in Faust with more delicate manipulation. After the long good night, the instrumental reverie which began the act is resumed piano, and Romeo recites a prayer in monotone for his love as she retires, and the curtain descends.

Act III. opens with ecclesiastical music. A cavatina, with chorus, for Friar Laurent, in the severest Church manner, is followed by the entrance of Romeo, and subsequently the marriage of the lovers. The invocation for the father (prima basso cantante) is exceedingly fine, and is followed by a trio and quartet for Romeo, Juliet, the Nurse, and Friar Laurence, in canto fermo, which is very effective. The second scene of this act begins with a page's song—the page in question being invented for Romeo, to bear the burden of the mezzo-soprano music (of contralto music there is none). This song, in 2-4 time, and in the orthodox two verses, is a pretty fable, extemporized by MM. Barbier and Carré, on the amours of two doves—and in a sparkling refrain, "Gardez bien la belle," the page (rather imprudently, we think), warns the Capulets to look after their dove, who will otherwise escape them. On this follows what M. Gounod calls his finale, but which will be more easily understood if we describe it as consisting of several long recitative scenes, and finishing with a chorus. The scenes in point describe the duels between Mercutio and Tybalt, and Tybalt and Romeo. Here, no doubt, the composer felt that he was treading on delicate ground, after the duel trio in Faust; at all events in Romeo and Juliet the quarrels are rapidly accomplished in recitative, and the fighting is as rapidly done to allegro passages for orchestra. No great point is made of Mercutio's death. The inhabitants throng in—the women, and then all the chorus, invoking imprecations on the feud that costs them so much blood; the rival houses also expressing, by the voices of their respective retainers, their undying hatred towards each other. A brilliant cortège, quite worthy to be a companion march to the famous procession music of the Reine de Saba, is now heard off, and the Duke and Court appear. The Duke censures the rioters, banishes Romeo, and, with the répente of the double quartet and chorus, the act ends. On the whole, we recognize less of Gounod in this part of the opera than in any other, and trace a strong resemblance to certain portions of Meyerbeer's Huguenots in the ensemble at the close of the act.

Act the fourth is full of beauties. The prevailing tone is sadness—for Romeo has to leave his mistress—she has to counterfeit death and seek the tomb to meet him again—and the climax of the act is the despair of Capulet over the supposed dead body of his child. The grand duo is written more in what may be called form, than anything of this nature Gounod has yet penned. The first ensemble, in 12-8, is exceedingly elaborate, and worked out patiently and consistently. It expresses their mutual passion for each other, and is followed by some of the composer's loveliest descriptive writing, on the charming episode of the lark and the nightingale. All this is done exquisitely, and the last ensemble, a farewell, is written, 4-4 time, largely and powerfully. Of its effect on the stage there can be no doubt whatever. Juliet's grand air occurs in this act, and is in fact a drinking song, preface by a long recitative description of the horrors she may encounter in the vault after drinking the potion. Love, however, prevails, and animates her aria—"Je bois a toi!" This number is not, in our opinion, effective, vocally considered, and is written in an exceedingly dull manner. The despair of Capulet—the huge music in the orchestra—are all perfect, and fitly wind up an act full of rare beauties, both musical and dramatic.

The tomb scene in the last act consists entirely of a duet. Here Gounod has narrowly considered the exigencies of the situation, and has, to our thinking most judiciously, thrown this fourth and last duo into purely dialogue form. There are only a few bars of ensemble, when, in the delirium of love in death, they recall a passage of the marriage hymn of the third act. This is most artistically done, along with a strain of the lark from the duo of the fourth act. In this manner, and by eschewing every temptation to delay the march of the plot by concerted effects, M. Gounod hurries on the tragic end of the opera. It had been supposed that an apotheosis of the lovers would follow; but it does not appear in the score we have seen. Probably the master feared that after Faust, Le Reine de Saba, and M. Nelli, even the sound of angelic harps would be tame and conventional. If this was his view we entirely agree with him.

Such is a brief and necessarily imperfect account of the new opera, the production of which has been awaited so long and so anxiously by the musical world. We may remark on it, in conclusion, that it is by far the most contented and elaborate work written by its gifted author. His eccentricities are toned down in such a manner that they are entitled to be considered as an inseparable part of a style thoroughly and boldly original. In Romeo and Juliet will be found the old distaste for elaborate finales, without which it has hitherto been thought no great operative reputation could be gained. But no man can be equally great in all directions; and if Meyerbeer or Verdi would have written a stronger third act than we find in the new work, we question if either of them could have written the gracious love-music which, after all, is the one great condition of Romeo and Juliet. In the instrumentation Gounod has surpassed himself—and what that means every student of orchestration will know. That the work as a whole will greatly enhance its composer's reputation, we do not for a moment doubt; and we have equally little hesitation in predicting for it an honorable abiding place in the lyrical theatres of this country.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Correspondent of the London Orchestra (April 24) begins his letter thus:

"I am thoroughly sick of the Exhibition and the Pianos-Chickering—especially the latter. You hear nothing now but of Chickering pianos; you read nothing now but Chickering-pianos; and I believe some enthusiasts would eat Chickering pianos, if they were digestible. You know how insufferable an American is, when he gets upon his "institutions." Well, the Chickering piano is an American institution, and Paris is full of Americans; so you can imagine how we are worried with the unending praises of that instrument. The papers too—the French papers—are shameful toadies, and fill their columns with Chickering. I believe the Messieurs Chickering are over here from New York, and carry about a portable piano with them into society, for the purpose of impressing everybody with its superiority to all other instruments from the days of David downwards. I only hope I shall not come across them; that's all!

The same writer chronicles the success of Gounod's Roméo and Juliet (described on another page):

The execution was first-rate; Mme. Carvalho is the ideal Juliette, graceful, impassioned, tender, and full of fire; nor has her voice ever sounded to better advantage. Her part was a round of ovations. Michot delivered himself of some effits de force which were not expected of him; in fact he was too eager; his voice will never stand against such a strain if he do not curb his impetuosity. Cazaux, Puget, Troy, Barré, and the rest worked arduously and well. Decorations, costumes and the general mise-en-scène first-rate, for no expense has been spared by the Lyrique directorate.

At the Opera, the "Africaine" has been resumed, for the purpose, as it was said, of giving some repose to the artists who perform in "Don Carlos"—the greater part of the said artists, however, being heard both in the one opera and the other. Mlle. Battu played Sélika with much talent. When "Don Carlos" was resumed, there was a thin house, and a considerable diminution of the ordinary receipts. The Opera Comique is still playing "Mignon" and the "Fils du Brigadier," and occasionally the "Voyage en Chine;" but as these are beginning to be somewhat usés, we are told to look for the coming "Etoile du Nord" and "Robinson Crusoe" by way of a refresher to the habitués of this house. At the Italiens "Columella" is frequently given; and there are good houses when Adelina Patti sings with the famous tenor Fraschini, but on other occasions the attendance is comparatively small. The Bouffes is closed, and it is not yet precisely known under whose auspices the theatre will re-open. Report says that Offenbach is likely to connect himself with it, in which case there might be some hope of a revival of prosperity for this place of amusement.

The competition opened by the Imperial Commission of the Exhibition, in order to obtain a Cantata and a Hymn of Peace worthy of France and the great events of the summer of 1867, closed on the 15th. The productions of the successful candidates are to be sung at the grand international festival to take place in the month of July next. The poets—if we are to call the competitors poets—have responded to the call of the Imperial Commission with an excessive empressement. They have sent in the words of no fewer than 3,500 cantatas, and taking the average length of these at 100 verses, we have 350,000 verses. Then, of the hymns of peace there are 2,500. The extent of the poetry of the latter having been limited, the authors have been obliged to restrict their inspirations to three strophes of eight verses each—that is, for the 2,500 hymns 60,000 verses—in all 6,000 productions and 410,000 verses. The special literary and musical committee have not shrunk from the enormous magnitude of the task imposed upon them in having to decide upon the merits of so vast an accumulation of manuscripts. Under the presidency of M. Auber they set bravely to work, and are incessantly engaged in their laborious investigations, being actuated with the strongest desire to arrive at a just decision. The successful candidates will each receive a price of 5,000 fr. and a gold medal.

London.

The Choir, of May 4, gives us the following brief summary of a fortnight's music.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Fra Diavolo, L'Africaine, Un Ballo in Maschera, and Masaniello have been the operas of the past fortnight. In the first two Mlle. Lucca sustained the chief role. In Un Ballo Mlle. Nadi made her debut as Oscar. Her figure is very small—almost childish, in fact—but her voice and style of singing enabled her to do ample justice to the music, and she promises to be a useful addition to the company. Signor Graziani was the Renato.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE was opened for the season last Saturday with Mozart's Nozze de Figaro, one of the most potent attractions in last year's programme. The "cast" is nearly the same as before, with Mlle. Titiens as the Countess, Mlle. Sinico as Susanna, and Mr. Santley as the Count. How Mlle. Titiens sang "Dove sono" we need hardly state; her voice is as fine as ever, and her remarkable power of vocalization still magnificent. The same must be said of Mlle. Sinico and Mr. Santley, who were loudly encored in the duet "Crudel perche," and in other places. Mr. Charles Lyall, whose agreeable though light tenor voice we have frequently mentioned in our concert notices, made his first appearance as Basilio, one of the smaller parts of the opera. He sang and acted well, though he hardly had a fair opportunity of showing his powers. The band and chorus, under Signor Anliti, were as excellent as ever.

CRYSTAL PALACE. On the 20th ult. Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was performed at the first of the two extra concerts, the orchestral portions of the Sinfonia-Cantata being splendidly played under Mr. Mann's direction. The choruses were not so satisfactory. Last Saturday the winter concerts were brought to a definite conclusion by a magnificent performance of Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7. . . . The concert-room was densely packed, anxious listeners stretching their necks into the doors to catch a note. A novelty was introduced in the programme in the shape of a new Pianoforte Concerto from the pen of Mr. Benedict, who conducted his work in person, and received a hearty welcome from the audience and the band. Mme. Arabella Goddard gave a fine interpretation of the Concerto, which consists of three movements—allegro moderato, andante, and rondo allegretto. It abounds in brilliant passages for the pianoforte, and it is well suited to Mme. Goddard's splendid powers of execution. We shall hope to renew our acquaintance with it on a future occasion. The vocalists, on Saturday, were Miss Edith Wynne, whose very fine singing of the famous scena from Der Freischütz, with the lovely air well known in its English version as "Softly sighs the voice of evening," received a well-deserved encore; Miss Bramer, who chose two songs by Mozart, and Mr. Wilford Morgan, the new tenor, who was more successful in Molière's serenade than in the "Slumber song" from Masaniello. The overture to William Tell closed, what was, in our opinion, rather too long a programme, although we could hardly have wished to lose a number from it. The 1st of May is the signal for the directors to put forth their programme for the coming season, so far as music is concerned, will contain the usual features—opera concerts, choral festivals of the Metropolitan schools, and in addition a grand festival concert on the 26th of June, under Mr. Costa's direction, at which the artists from the two opera houses, and all the musical celebrities of London will appear. The proceeds are to be devoted to the fund for restoring the portion of the Palace recently destroyed by fire. The directors' policy has always been pro bono publico.

BERLIN. The Symphony Soirée of the Royal Orchestra, on the 29 ult., celebrated the 25th year of these concerts. Besides various classical works, there was a Prologue spoken by Johanna Wagner, and 25 new Variations composed expressly by Taubert. Of the 238 Symphony Soirées thus far given, Capellmeister Taubert alone has conducted 209.—In the preceding Soirée were given Cherubini's Abencerages Overture, Beethoven's Egmont music, and his Septet with all the strings of the orchestra (14 first violins), and wind instruments. The execution is said to have been a marvel of virtuosity.—The second Cecilia concert, under Radecke, gave Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens;" Schumann's piano Concerto, played by Ehrlich; the Loreley finale and the 42nd Psalm of Mendelssohn.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 25, 1867.

Music in Boston.—Review of the Season, 1866-7.

That the past season has been richer than we ever before experienced, both in the number of concerts, the quality of programmes, and the general excellence of performance, our columns have continually shown. Equally remarkable is the short, decided manner in which this rich season has come to a close; earlier than usual, for very naturally there was a simultaneous surcease of appetite after such continuous high living. The end was noble, worthy of the whole—the Ninth Symphony and the Oratorios—well could we be content to leave it there, with the best last. And so the musical season, as we look back upon it, has a certain wholeness; we see it round and ripen and like a ripe fruit drop at once. With more than usual satisfaction we may count up the works of master composers, in all forms, which these months have given us. The list of fine works which have been heard in Boston will compare not meanly this time with that of any European city.

I. ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

From Nov. 23 to April 12, the Harvard Musical Association have given ten "Symphony Concerts," eight in the regular subscription series (only six last year), beside the benefits for the Cretans and for the Orchestra. This orchestra numbered 52 instruments. The popular Wednesday Afternoon concerts of the Orchestral Union (about 30 instruments) began later than usual, last week in February, and were eight in number; they might have gone on a month longer to advantage, had not other engagements of the Music Hall prevented. Every one of these 18 concerts has given us a good Symphony, as well as other good things. Here is the list:

a). SYMPHONIES. (Symphony Concerts): Beethoven, Nos. 3 (Eroica), 5, 7, 8, and 9 (Choral);—Mozart, in E flat, and the smaller of the two without Minuet, in D;—Schumann, No. 2 (C major), and 4 (D minor);—Gade, No. 1 (C minor).—Orchestral Union: Beethoven, Nos. 1, 5 and 8;—Mozart, in E flat, and in D major;—Mendelssohn, in A minor;—Gade, in C minor (twice).—Beethoven's No. 7 was heard again in Mrs. Cary's benefit concert.

b). CONCERTOS. Symphony Concerts: Beethoven, for Piano, No. 2, in B flat (B. J. Lang), No. 4, in G, (H. Leonhard); for Violin, in D, 1st movement (Carl Rosa);—Mendelssohn, Violin, (twice, C. Rosa and Camilla Urso);—Schumann, in A minor (O. Dresel);—Henselt, in F minor, op. 14 (C. Petersilea);—Norbert Burgmüller, in F-sharp minor (E. Perabo);—Hummel, in A minor (J. C. D. Parker).—Orchestral Union: Mendelssohn, for Piano, in G minor (Petersilea);—Weber, do, in E flat (H. Daum), and Concertstück (Alice Dutton).—The Mendelssohn Violin Concerto was also played once more by Mme. Urso, in a miscellaneous concert given for her benefit. The second Concerto of Beethoven, and those by Schumann (in the complete form), Henselt and Burgmüller were new to Boston:

Besides these the Parepa concerts (very miscellaneous in their programmes) brought us: Spohr's Violin Concerto in G (Rosa); single movements of Schumann's piano Concerto (played by Mills); do. of Chopin's in E minor; Military Concerto by Lipinski (Rosa); part of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto (Rosa), &c. And a concert of the "N. E. Conservatoire" had for a novelty Mr. Goldbeck's Concerto in D (piano), played by himself.

c). OVERTURES. The Symphony Concerts have given: Gluck: Iphigenia; Mozart: Zauberflöte, Idomeneo; Weber: Euryanthe; Beethoven: Leonora (No. 3), Egmont; Mendelssohn: Hebrides, Melusina, Ruy Blas, Meeresstille (twice); Schubert: Fierabras; Schumann: Genoveva; Cherubini: Anacreon, Les Abencerages, Wasserträger.—The Orchestral Union: Mendelssohn: "Midsummer Night's Dream," Hebrides, Meeres- stille; Cherubini: Abencerrages, Anacron: Beethoven: Egmont: Weber: Freyschütz, Ohrzon.—The Bateman, Gilmore, and other miscellaneous concerts swell the list by the Overtures to Heinrich aus der Fremde (Mendelssohn), Nozze di Figaro, Don Giovanni, Semiramide, "Merry Wives" (Nicolai), and more not readily recalled. Of course there are always a plenty of the lighter sort.

d). MISCELLANEOUS. Piano with Orchestra: Schubert's Fantasia, op. 15, as arranged by Liszt (B. J. Lang); Mendelssohn, Rondo, op. 29 (Perabo); Andante spianato and Polonaise, op. 22, Chopin, (H. Leonhard); Weber's Polonaise in E, transcribed by Liszt, (Lang). These were in the Symphony Concerts. In the Orchestral Union: Perabo played Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor, and Miss Joy (pupil of Lang) the Andante Spianato, &c., of Chopin.—Under this head, too, we may mention the Toccata in F by Bach, orchestrated by Esser; Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante, piano with orch.

II. CHAMBER MUSIC.

Concerts of this character, mostly in Chickering's hall, have been very numerous. We have missed to be sure the hoped for series by Mr. Dresel, and by Messrs. Leonhard and Kreissmann. But we have had four concerts by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club—a smaller allowance than we have been wont to, to be sure, of string Quartets, &c.,—but never more choice; eight piano concerts by Ernst Perabo, seven of which were called "Schubert Matinées; five "Schumann Soirées" by Carlyle Petersilea; three "Beethoven Matinées" by Hermann Daum; a Chamber concert, by Mme. Parepa-Rosa and her husband, with Otto Dresel; and other occasional ones,—that in honor of Robert Franz, for instance. Among them all, as well as in the larger concerts, we have heard for the first time many solo or concerted pieces by great composers, particularly Schubert and Schumann. Thus of

J. S. BACH: The Chaconne, for Violin; Violin Fugue in G minor; Air and Gavotte, violin and piano; Prælium in A minor, piano; Gavotte, violin; Concerto in C, for three pianos, (accompaniments on a fourth piano); Prelude and Fugue in E major, and do. in A minor, from "Well-tempered Clavichord;" Partita, No. 6, in E minor (7 movements).

HANDEL: Suite in D minor, piano.

HAYDN: String Quartet in B flat, op. 69; 1st Trio (in G), piano, violin and 'cello (3 times).

MOZART: Quintet (strings) in G minor.

BEETHOVEN: Quintet in E flat, op. 4; Quartet, No. 10, in E flat, op. 74 (twice); Sonata in C minor, violin and piano; Sonata, op. 47, ("Kreutzer"), 3 times; Sonata in A, 'cello and piano; Sonata in F, horn and piano; 15 Variations, with Fugue, piano, op. 35, E flat (twice); Grand Sonata, op. 106, in B flat; Sonata for piano and 'cello, op. 102, No. 1; Sonata, piano and 'cello, in F, op. 5, No. 1; Sonata for piano, op. 31, No. 2, D minor; Trio, op. 70, No. 2, E flat; Sonata, piano and 'cello, op. 5, No. 2, G minor; Sonata, piano, op. 10, No. 3, in D; Trio in B flat, op. 97 (twice); Sonata, piano and violin, op. 24, in F; Sonata, piano, op. 26, A flat; Quartet in B flat, op. 18; Sonata, piano and viola, op. 30, No. 1.

HUMMEL: Grand Septuor, D minor, piano, viola, horn, &c. (twice).

MENDELSSOHN: Piano Trio, D minor, op. 49; String Quartet in D, op. 44; Piano Trio, C minor, op. 66; Prelude and Fugue in E minor, piano, from "Notre Temps"; Prelude and Fugue, in D major; Mohsina Overture, arr. for 4 hands.

MOSCHELES: "Les Contrastes," for two pianos, with 8 hands.

SCHUBERT: Piano Trio in E flat, op. 100 (twice); Do. in B flat, op. 99 (twice); Rondo for piano and violin, in B minor; Fantasia, op. 15, piano; Sonata, op. 122, E flat; Sonata, B major, op. 147; Sonata, op. 120, A major; Sonata in C minor (dedicated to Schumann); Rondo in E minor, op. 84, No. 2, (four hands); Fantasia in F minor, op. 103 (4 hands); Fantasia in Sonata form, in G, op. 78; Variations (4 hands) on an original theme, in A flat, op. 35; Sonata, F minor, op. 142 ("Four Impromptus"), twice; Sonata in B flat (posthumous); String Quartet (posthumous) in D minor.

SCHUMANN: Toccata for piano, in C, op. 7; String Quartet, in A, op. 41, No. 3; Fantaisie, piano, op. 17 (in three movements); Sonata, F sharp minor, op. 11; Sonata in G minor, op. 22; Concerto in A minor, op. 54 (with piano accompaniment); Variations for two pianos; Fantasia-Bilder, op. 26 (5 pieces); Quintet in E flat, op. 44 (piano and strings); three Romanzas, for oboe and piano; Adagio and Allegro, op. 70, for horn and piano; Canon, in B minor; Etudes Symphoniques, in form of Variations, op. 13; Abendlied, arr. for violin and piano by Joachim.

CHOPIN: Rondo; Fantasia-Impromptu, Csharp minor, op. 66; Concerto in E minor, with piano accomp.; Concerto in F minor, with quintet accomp.; Prelude, No. 15, op. 28; Etude, No. 5, op. 10; Scherzo in B minor (twice); Polonaise, Csharp minor; Andante spianato and Polonaise; Berceuse, Waltz, &c., &c.

HEISELT: Piano Trio, in A minor, op. 24.

WIENIAWSKI: "Legend" for violin.

DESSER: Sonata for piano and violin, in B flat.

RUBINSTEIN: String Quartet in F, op. 59.

RICHTER (of Leipzig): Sonata, piano, op. 27.

BERGER: Sonata, op. 7.

NORBERT BERGMUELLER: Duet for piano and clarinet, in E flat, op. 15.

This was the instrumental music, although we are not able to make the list entirely complete. We have yet to enumerate the Oratorios, &c.

ORGAN CONCERTS in the Boston Music Hall are still kept up every Wednesday and Saturday noon. The crowd of other musical engagements has prevented our giving much attention to them for some months past, and the slight additions to the familiar repertoire have rendered it unnecessary. The performers for the most part have been Mrs. Frohock, Mr. LANG, Mr. THAYER, Mr. WILCOX, or Mr. WHITING. The programmes show frequently a single piece of Bach, frequently one of the six Mendelssohn Sonatas, now and then an organ Concerto of Handel (Mr. Thayer), but oftener extracts from his Oratorios, and those of other masters, French Offertories, variations, transcriptions of Overtures, Symphony movements, choruses, songs, &c., &c. Naturally, in so many concerts (it has gone on now for three years and a half), and with so many organists, the greater part of what is fairly available for such use has been used over and over. To the real lover of organ music it is a comfort to feel that he can drop in now and then and hear a good Fugue or Toccata of Bach, or something else that is edifying.

Last Wednesday the routine was somewhat varied by the return to the Organ, after long absence (mostly in Germany), of Mr. JOHN K. PAINE, who played with all his rare mastery the great Passacaglia, with its wonderful variations, in C minor, and a lovely Choral Variation (Choral Vorspiel) of his master, Bach; a Theme with Variations by Thiele; as well as an elaborate and very effective Fantasia and Fugue, and a sweet and tranquil Larghetto of his own composition, besides improvising to the great satisfaction of the little audience who had come out on one of the stormiest of days to hear him.

Mr. A. P. PECK has his Annual Benefit Concert this evening at the Music Hall. All our concert goers know who Mr. Peck is, and have reason to feel obliged to him. The duties of Superintendent of that Hall are not light, demanding a clear head and unruffled temper, and Mr. P. has done his part in the manifold catering for our musical enjoyments to the satisfaction of all parties. He should be remembered; the more especially now, because he was a loser to a considerable amount, by robbery, during the recent fire in the ticket office. He announces a very attractive list of artists: Miss KELLOGG, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, Miss NETTIE STERLING, the new New York Contralto, Mrs. H. M. SMITH, Mrs. J. S. CARY, Miss C. E. Joy, the young pianist, pupil of Mr. Lang; Mr. GUSTAVUS HALL, the fine baritone lately returned from Europe; Messrs. M. W. WHITNEY (basso), and JAMES WHITNEY (tenor), Mr. E. M. HINDL, Mr. WILCOX, for the Organ, and Mr. HOWARD M. DOW, accompanist.

SALEM, MASS. Last Monday evening this old town rejoiced in its first "Symphony Concert," given by Mr. M. S. DOWNS, with the aid of Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS and "the Boston Symphony Orchestra," under the direction of Mr. B. J. LANG. The object was to raise funds towards the erection of a new music hall, which Salem surely ought to have, for it is now a city, and has some very musical people, sending quite a delegation always to our Oratorios and Symphony Concerts in Boston. The occasion is said to have been in every sense most successful. This was the programme:

Symphony No. 5, Op. 57	Beethoven
"Oh mio Fernando," from "Favorita"	Donizetti
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Cuban Song	Grainger
Concert Waltz, "The Village Swallows"	J. Strauss
Bridal March	Mendelssohn
Wedding March	Mendelssohn

THE CHICKERING PIANOS are evidently attracting the chief attention in the musical instrument department at the French Exposition. Witness the reluctant confession of an Englishman—so English—under "Music Abroad." Our own correspondent (in our last), though he gives no names, must mean the Chickering; for by "the American system" in pianos we take it we are to understand the complete iron frame, first invented and patented by Jonas Chickering thirty years ago, and used by other makers since the patent ran out.

The Timescript publishes the following:

The Great Organ in the Plymouth Church Brooklyn, N. Y., is the largest instrument ever built in the United States. Its success must be very gratifying to its builders, who have received the following letter from Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, pastor of the church:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 7, 1867.

Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook, Boston, Mass.:

Gentlemen—In reply to your request, it gives me great pleasure to express my admiration for the noble organ which you last year placed in Plymouth Church. It has given the utmost satisfaction, and even the criticisms that have been made upon it were complimentary: for it assumed that it belonged among the very first of remarkable organs, and it was criticized from that high point of view. I have yet to hear one member of Plymouth congregation speak of it but with delight and enthusiasm.

For myself, though I was well pleased from the first, yet every week my pleasure is renewed, and my appreciation of its noble qualities deepens. I owe you an unpayable debt of gratitude, and it ought to afford you great satisfaction to know that you have built an instrument so admirable and grand, that, hereafter, it must be mentioned in every history of the organ, and continue, for generations, to be quoted as among the triumphs of skill.

Some of the best effects, particularly in the bass, are much curtailed by the position in which it stands. If this seem to some faults of the organ, we know them to be faults of the place where it is constrained to stand.

I shall always be grateful to you for this labor of love, as I am sure it was, as well as of great skill, and shall count that church happy that secures your instruments. I am, truly, yours,
HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, APRIL 22.—We are just now deluged with concerts: concerts in the open air, ditto within doors, at all hours and at all sorts of places. Last Sunday M. Alard gave his 5th Séance of Chamber Music at the Salle Pleyel. The programme included Mendelssohn's Piano Trio in C minor; Beethoven's Quartet in D major, op. 18, No. 3; a Theme from the "Magic Flute" arranged for piano and 'cello by Beethoven; and, lastly, Mozart's Quintet in G minor, with the lovely Finale. M. Diemer was the pianist.

On Thursday evening Joachim gave his 1st Séance of Chamber Music at the Salle Pleyel. The programme was very fine, and I give it in due form:—

Quartet, E moll, op. 59, (strings).....	Beethoven.
Trio, B dur, op. 97, (Piano).....	"
Jaell, Joachim, Jacquard.
2 Lieder, ("Wonne der Wehmuth,".....)	"
("Mignon,".....)	"
Mme. Joachim.
Romance, Violin solo, G dur.....	"
Quintet, C dur, op. 29, (strings).....	"

All Beethoven, as you see, and a rare treat it certainly was. The Trio—in particular—was very admirably done, and the lovely Adagio is a masterpiece of elaborate treatment. Mme. Joachim has a superb contralto voice, full and rich in quality, and sang the Mignon with a passion and abandon which are—haply—rare.

On Friday afternoon the reign of out-door musical entertainments was fairly inaugurated by a concert in the Champs Elysées, at which were given the following selections:

1st movement, 5th Symphony.....	Beethoven.
2nd movement, 5th Symphony.....	"
Clarinet Concerto.....	Von Weber.
Movement.....	Haydn.
2nd movement 1st Symphony.....	Beethoven.
1st movement 2nd Symphony.....	"

Certainly not dear at one franc, which was the admission fee.

In the evening Padeloup gave an orchestral concert at the Cirque Napoleon, and here are the attractions:

Portions of Lobgesang, with Chorus, Soli, &c.	Mendelssohn.
Adagio, Quintet, op. 108.....	Mozart.
(4 Clarinet and string orchestra).
Violin Concerto, E minor.....	Mendelssohn.
M. Joachim.
1st Part of "The Creation".....	Haydn.
Suite for Violin.....	Bach.
Minuet.—Gavotte.—Presto.
Inflammatus, (Stabat).....	Rossini.

The immense building was crammed and packed with people an hour before the commencement of the Concert, and hundreds were unable to gain admittance. The attractions of the evening were the solos of Joachim. Never have I heard such a marvellous thing as his rendering of the Mendelssohn Concerto. The vast audience of more than 4000 persons was breathlessly quiet, and every note was perfectly distinct even in the more remote portions of the auditorium.

When he had finished, I was fairly appalled by the earthquake of applause which greeted him. The tumult lasted three or four minutes. These enthusiastic Gauls cheered, waved their hats, their handkerchiefs, and acted like a parcel of madmen. The Bach Suite was wonderfully quaint and beautiful, and it was an interesting study to see how lovingly the artist played, as if in tender reverence for the dead master. F.

Music in the Moravian Villages.

NAZARETH, PA., MAY 6.—You will probably be pleased to learn that a musical enthusiasm survives all the mutations of time in this ancient village of Nazareth, a Moravian settlement that began in 1740, and that the love for the fine art of tone is cultivated by both young and old.

The musical history of our place dates back as far as 1785, when the Principal of Nazareth Hall instituted a "Collegium Musicum," which had its weekly reunions, and soon gathered around it all those who had a fondness for hymns of joy and gladness, the bassoon, flute, clarinet and all stringed instruments. Since those early and simple days many changes have taken place in these homes of the Zinzendorfian people. The appreciation of the beautiful in the forms of a purely aesthetic religious culture has, in some degree, waned into more sensuous shapes, and the most fascinating creed, the most child-like, yet purest faith, is mingling with the dross of a gaudy and commonplace worship.

But amidst all this decline music yet lives. Although it has passed through numerous pauses of neglect and indifference—when the works of the great masters were laid on the shelf, and the violin, violoncello and flute were discarded and forgotten,—ever and anon some new genius springs up, and inspires all around him with the love of tone.

At this time we are fortunate in having an excellent Sextet of brass wind instruments under Mr. Beitel, who to the ease and self enjoyment of a practical musician, adds the most admirable skill and precision. In addition to the wind instruments of our Sextet and military band, the Männerchor of Nazareth Hall, consisting chiefly of the tutors of that aged institution, can vie in point of classical selections and perfect training with most of the German clubs of the adopted Vaterland.

Then we have some reputable pianists, violinists, flautists, who delight our little musical public. When a concert of both vocal and instrumental music is given, the young ladies graciously lend a helping hand, and thus the tout-ensemble becomes attractive, and frequently challenges the attention of a veteran critic who may chance to lose his way by wandering into these retired precincts.

Last, but not least, is the youthful Männerchor, consisting of the boys of the Hall, under the guidance of their teachers, who act their part to the general satisfaction of the audiences attending the entertainments, as they are called, which are invariably given at the close of a session.

A few evenings since we had a pleasant soirée offered us in aid of the Southern Relief Fund, the programme of which was as follows:

Chorus, "Schäfer Abend".....	Müller.
Orchestra, "Träume auf dem Ocean".....	Gung'l.
Männerchor, "Frosch Cantate".....	Henning.
Trio, Le Chalet.....	A. Miné.
Vocal Duet, "Theorie and Praxis".....	Schafer.
Orchestra, Pot Pourri from "Norma".....	Bellini.
Violins, Flute and Piano. Quartet.
Dialogue by 3 pupils. "Hob and Noh."
Chorus. March.....	Salle.
Orchestra, Pot Pourri from "Ernani".....	Verdi.
Quartet, "Der Kranke Peter".....	Kuntz.
Trio, "From "La Fille du Regiment".....	Donizetti.
Orchestra, Pot Pourri from "Il Trovatore".....	Verdi.

In our sister village, Bethlehem, music constitutes a large portion of recreative thought, and, in addition to the respectable body of dilettanti to be found there, schools of musical instruction are numerous, and great facilities offered to those who seek proficiency in the art. Many celebrities repair to Bethlehem to hear and be heard, and the whole intellectual atmosphere is redolent of harmony.

During the past winter the Philharmonists produced, and afterwards repeated twice, Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," which they claim to have introduced to the notice of an American public. How true the claim may be, I cannot say, having no data on the subject.

Here, as well as at Nazareth, the struggle is with the onward moving spirit of the age, with the "as the world goes," and in consequence, the "Star Spangled Banner" draws a larger audience than Beethoven's Ninth Symphony or Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." J. H.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

If I were a voice. Song.	R. King.	35
A beautiful poem, happily united to music.
Liebhart Polka. "Come, come."	R. Mulder.	60
A fine polka, in the first place, and the words which are set to it are elegant.
Douglas, tender and true. Song.	Lady John Scott.	30
Author of words unknown. The song likely to be widely known. One of the best of its kind.
Withered flowers. Song.	Schubert.	35
Shower of tears.	"	35
Both belong to the series of "The Maid of the Mill," and are fine specimens of delicate sentiment.
Italy. Bright are the plains. Song.	Mendelssohn.	30
The Husband's song.	"	25
The Homespell.	"	25
The first gives vent to the young composer's enthusiasm on his visit to Italy. The second and third are good "home songs," the homely title of the second hardly indicating its sweet musical character.
Bear him forth through the night. Song.	"Irene."	30
O handmaids of Irene. Song and Chorus.	"	30
The first full of deep pathos, and the second very lively. May be sung as a "dialogue chorus" in which form it is used in the "Queen of Seba," or "Irene."
Passing my door. Song.	H. Abank.	30
Come and meet me darling. Song.	F. Berger.	30
Watching.	W. G. Westbrook.	30
Alike in this, that they are in that peculiar style which is most likely to be popular.
Sing me to sleep, mother. Song.	Anna Burchard.	30
Come back to Kathleen.	"	30
The heart can ne'er grow cold.	"	30
The same commendation may be given to these as to the last, and they are by one composer.

Instrumental.

Wedding March from Mendelssohn.	Jaell.	90
The well-known march, made into a sort of fantasia.
The Onset. Galop militaire.	Alphonso.	30
En Avant. Pas redouble.	Favarger.	50
Bright stirring pieces of medium difficulty.
Hilda waltz, simplified.	4 hrs. Bellak.	35
Bolero. "Festival and Birth-day."	W. Iucho.	40
Useful for practice, and, of course, well arranged.
Neither are difficult.
Quinsigamond March.	J. C. Murdock.	35
Gen. Shaler's March.	E. C. B. Holder.	30
Both are quite bright and pretty, and not hard.
Ladies' reception March.	Nathagle.	50
Sounds from Panama.	Anna Burchard.	30
Anita Waltz.
Birth-day Polka.
Panama Schottisch.
Three pieces of very graceful character, by a lady composer.
Night-breezes. Nocturne.	G. D. Wilson.	35
By a good musician and teacher; pleasing and useful.
Le Souvenir Waltz.	C. De Janon.	50
A "sentimental" waltz, but, although carrying a simple, graceful melody along, is quite brilliant. Of medium difficulty.
Tarentelle.	W. Kuhe, op. 117.	60
To be played very swiftly, and a good specimen of the kind of piece. Fine for practice.

Books.

THE MUSICAL SCALE. By Horace P. Biddle.	$1.25
A theoretical work of great interest and value. The theories advanced are quite original, and forcibly presented.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 683.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 6.

G. L. S.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

He has done the work of a true man,—
Crown him, honor him, love him.
Weep over him, tears of woman,
Stoop manliest brows above him!

O dusky mothers and daughters,
Vigils of mourning keep for him!
Up in the mountains, and down by the waters,
Lift up your voices and weep for him!

Take up the burden, O Cretan,
Mourn for thy free provider!
At thy feet by the war-storm beaten,
Drop thy tears of snow, O Ida!

For the warmest of hearts is frozen,
The freest of hands is still;
And the gap in our picked and chosen
The long years may not fill.

No duty could overtask him,
No need his will outrun;
Or ever our lips could ask him,
His hands the work had done.

He forgot his own soul for others,
Himself to his neighbor lending;
He found the Lord in his suffering brothers,
And not in the clouds descending.

So the bed was sweet to die on,
Whence he saw the doors wide swung
Against whose bolted iron
The strength of his life was flung.

And he saw ere his eye was darkened
The sheaves of the harvest-bringing,
And knew while his ear yet hearkened
The voice of the reapers singing.

Ah, well!—The world is discreet;
There are plenty to pause and wait;
But here was a man who set his feet
Sometimes in advance of fate,—

Plucked off the old bark when the inner
Was slow to renew it,
And put to the Lord's work the sinner
When saints failed to do it.

Never rode to the wrong's redressing
A worthier paladin.
Shall he not hear the blessing,
"Good and faithful, enter in!"

—Atlantic Monthly.

Music in Vienna in the Year 1793.

Translated from Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

(Continued from page 34.)

The example given by the Imperial family of Austria through so many years had produced its natural effect, and musical knowledge and taste were generally diffused among the princes and nobles of the empire. Some of the wealthier princes, like Esterhazy, maintained complete musical institutions, even to an Italian Opera; others were content if they could have in their family chapel a musical Mass with orchestral accompaniment; where that was impossible, there was at least a small orchestra organized, frequently composed of household officers and servants, who were selected with regard to their musical abilities; and so on down to a band of wind instruments, a string Quartet, and even to a single organist, piano-player or violinist. What was said in an earlier chapter about music as a necessity for the courts of the ecclesiastical princes, applies in a great measure likewise to the secular nobility. At their palaces and country seats in summer some entertainment had to be provided for many otherwise tedious hours; and in their city residences during the winter they and their guests could not eat, dance and play cards all the time; here music got to be a universal and a favorite resource; at any rate it was the fashion. Besides persons of high birth, those also who occupied a high social position by their talent, culture or wealth, followed that example, and opened their saloons to musicians and music-lovers, mostly moved thereto by a real, sometimes by an affected taste for the art, at all events supporting it and furthering its progress. Hence arose an uncommonly great demand for chamber music, vocal and instrumental, but especially the latter. The demand brought with it the supply, by encouraging genius and talent to work in this direction; and so the Austrian school of instrumental music soon attained the first rank in the world.

During some months of the year Vienna was filled with the high nobility, not merely of Austria, but from other parts of the German empire. Those who spent the most of their time at their own little courts came for a short time to the capital; others reversed the habit, making the capital their usual residence and visiting their estates only in the summer. Many a noted composer, who stood in the service of the former class, was in this way brought occasionally for a short time to the metropolis, as Mozart by the archbishop of Salzburg, Haydn by prince Esterhazy; by the latter class distinguished composers or virtuosos, who lived in the city, were frequently taken into the country for the summer, and then they were treated as equals and lived like high gentlemen. Thus Salieri was the guest of prince Schwarzenberg, Schenk of Auersperg; Mozart travelled with Liechnowsky to Berlin, Dittersdorf with Count Lemberg to Troppau; Gyrowetz visited Count Fünfkirchen, and many others in a similar manner.

A further means of furthering the Art was the ordering and purchasing of compositions, and not merely from composers of established fame, like Haydn, Mozart, C. P. E. Bach, but also from young men yet unknown, who thus received the double benefit of pecuniary support and the opportunity to show their ability. Thus prince Kraezalkowitz and Count Batthyani bought of the young Gyrowetz his six Symphonies; Esterhazy ordered of him three Masses, a Vesper and a Te Deum; Auersperg employed Schenk's talent for his private theatre; and as for chamber music, the catalogues of private collections of those days contain long lists of manuscript works, which had been ordered or purchased of composers now entirely forgotten.

Instrumental virtuosos, who were not permanently engaged in the service of a prince or a theatre, sought as a rule the reward for their studies and exertions in the private concerts of the nobility. If they were composers at the same time, they brought their compositions to a hearing in such concerts. The reader of the life of Mozart will remember how directly he depended upon this resource, to earn a living for himself and family. One may say that, except in London a musical public, as we now understand the expression, did not exist in the year 1793; in Vienna at least, with its 200,000 inhabitants, a virtuoso seldom ventured to announce a concert, for which he had not already obtained a subscription, sufficient to secure him against loss, on the part of those in whose residences he had already produced his talent with success. Thus Mozart, in a letter to his father (1783) announcing his three subscription concerts, mentions 5 engagements to play at prince Galitzin's between Feb. 26 and March 25, and 9 at Count Johann Esterhazy's for March; and in the following year Leopold Mozart writes to his daughter, that her brother's piano between the 10th of February and the 12th of March had been carried at least 12 times to the theatre, or to prince Kaunitz's, or to Count Zieby's. BEETHOVEN, "remaining without salary in Vienna until he be recalled," found in these opportunities and in his lessons a rich income.

But this circumstance requires some further observations.

About 12 years before Beethoven came to Vienna, Risbeck, where he speaks of Art in that capital, had written: "Music is the only thing in which the nobility show taste. Many houses have a special band of musicians to themselves, and all public musical occasions show, that this department of Art stands in distinguished estimation here. Here four or five great orchestras can be brought together, all of them incomparable. The number of virtuosos proper is small; but as regards orchestral performances, one can scarcely hear anything finer in the world. I have already heard from 30 to 40 instruments play together, and they all give such a correct, pure and distinct tone, that you would think you heard a single supernaturally powerful instrument. One stroke animates all violins, and one breath all wind instruments. . . . There are about 400 musicians here, who are divided into certain companies and often work together many years unseparated." (I. 279.)

How many such orchestras were still kept up in 1792-93, it is now perhaps impossible to determine; those of prince Lobkowitz, Schwarzenberg and Auersperg may be named with certainty. Count Heinrich von Haugwitz and no doubt also Count Batthyani brought their musicians with them, when they came to the city for the season. The Esterhazy Kapelle, which had been dismissed after the death of Haydn's former master, ems to have been not yet renewed. Prince Grassalkowitz (or Kraezalkowitz) had limited his to a "Harmonie-Musik," a union of eight wind instruments (oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns), as was then very customary. Baron Brunn had such a band, which had to play during dinner time, as during supper in Don Juan; this accessory to the scene Mozart had added from frequent personal experience. Prince Carl Liehnowsky and others had also their own string Quartets.

The grandees of the Bohemian and Moravian capitals, Kinsky, Clamm, Nostiz, Thun, Buquoi, Hartig, Salm-Pachta, Spork, Fainkirchen, Troyer, &c, vied with the Austrian and Hungarian nobility. Many of them had also palaces in Vienna, and as the majority, if not all, of them passed a part of the year there, and took with them some of the more skilful members of their orchestra, to render chamber music, and to form the nucleus of a company when Symphonies, Concertos or large vocal works were to be performed, they contributed their part as well to the musical, as to the political and social life in the metropolis.

In one respect no change had taken place since the visit of Kapellmeister Reichardt, ten years before (1783). "The nobility [he says] was perhaps the most musical that ever was; the whole gay people took part in the joyful art, and its light, easy disposition, its sensual, pleasure-loving character demanded alternation and an enlivening music everywhere. Owing to the generosity of the court and nobility, the general prosperity of the public, and the incredible cheapness of the means of living, a multitude of artists from abroad could visit Vienna, and support themselves for life there without any fixed engagement: a thing possible in Berlin at the most only for music teachers and especially for teachers of the piano, all of whom at that time, and certainly with reason, were bound to the school of Bach."

In another respect a change had occurred: in the character of the music performed. "Vienna was certainly at that time," he says, "next to Paris, the first city in Europe for practical music, and it lacked nothing but a greater variety in the works presented. The works of foreign masters penetrated there with very great difficulty,—as it is everywhere the case, where people imagine they possess the only true Art and the best taste and in fond self-complacency limit themselves to a single kind. Until then it had been so also with Berlin; or where the composers, as in Vienna and Paris, lived by their productions."

The following ten years, after this judgment was pronounced, had produced a great change, and alternation was no longer a desideratum. Those astonishingly fruitful last eight years of Mozart fell within this period; his own compositions were uncommonly various in their character, and had set up models, which compelled other composers to follow in the way which he had opened. Haydn had just come back, enriched with the experiences which he had gathered during his first stay in London. Van Swieten had during his stay in Berlin learned to appreciate the works of Bach and Handel and their schools, and exercised since his return to Vienna (about 1778) a decided and powerful influence on the musical taste there.

Thus were all the conditions precedent for the full bloom of Art in Vienna fulfilled at that time; and in one field, that of instrumental music, in a degree unknown in other cities. The extraordinary results in point of quantity produced in those years may be measured from the trade catalogue (1799) of a single music-dealer, Johann Traeg, which in Symphonies, Symphony-Concertos and Overtures (the last in a minority) contains the uncommon number of 512. Whoever is disposed to regard the so-called "Programme Music" of our time as something new, need only read the announcements in the newspapers of those days, to see superscriptions of Symphonies in almost endless variety, as: La Tempesta, La Bataille, Siege in Vienna, Portrait musicale de la nature, King Lear, "Ovid's Metamorphoses" (12 Symphonies by Dittersdorf), and so on.

Perhaps it was only the pressing fancy of the young man from Bonn, which had dreamed once of the possibility of carrying instrumental music still beyond the limits reached by Haydn and Mozart; perhaps these dreams had been but vague and indeterminate impressions of a something unknown which must yet be reached, and that by paths thus far concealed. Admitting such a possibility, then was the time and Vienna was the place for the arrival of a great creative genius in this field, as London had been 50 years before in Oratorio for Handel.

(To be continued.)

Theatres in Germany.

Our neighbor, the Saturday Evening Gazette, has excellent letters from Leipsic, signed "E. L. S." Here, for instance, is one, which we commend to the attention alike of our theatre-goers and our puritans:

Leipsic, April 10th, 1867.

If a person would see the drama in its best dress, and learn to what a state of perfection the theatre can be brought by wise management and a correct appreciation by the people whom it should instruct and amuse, he must come to Germany. With us there is such a tendency to wholesale denunciation of rational amusements and such a general horror of the stage and its connections, that the theatre rarely attempts to suit the tastes of the higher classes, but contents itself with accepting the situation in which New England straight-jacket-morality would place it, in dealing out third class comedies and pantomimic spectacles. There are a few noble exceptions, but I think I have not exaggerated the general standard of our American play-houses. In England it is much the same, though there are very many better playwrights in England than with us, and two theatres at least in London, the Haymarket and St. James, whose managers have succeeded in keeping the stage clear of the trash at which fall fifty thousand Londoners in other theatres nightly shake their sides with laughter. That there is a great deal of licentiousness connected with the French stage, I do not deny, but it is of the licentiousness that Americans chiefly hear. It is easier for a correspondent to exercise his wit in a description of Cora Pearl than in criticizing a good comedy. France thinks as a rule more of her literary men, and honors them more than any other country, and while the plays of Seribe, Girardin and Sardou are extant, good comedy will not go begging in the chief theatres. Moreover, the immorality of which we hear so much springs from the people, not from the stage. The stage is not a leader, but a mirror which faithfully reflects the society of the day. If it is supported by lovers of sensation and pantomime, why it must alternate Milles, Zoe and Western with "The Black Crook" and "Naid Queen." Those who denounce it so perseveringly as a sure path to destruction and a snare and pitfall in the way of the virtuous, might employ some of their wasted breath in reclaiming the people who force it to the position which it now dishonorably occupies.

As soon as one enters Germany he perceives a change. He is surprised at finding an opera company in every town which boasts fifteen thousand people. He will find great actors very rare, but the stock companies most excellent. Throughout the year the drama and opera alternate, both companies occupying the same stage, each playing three or four times a week. Let us commence with the opera. In Berlin and Vienna one can hear one hundred and thirty to forty operas a year by the finest singers in the world and unequalled orchestras; operas never sung and rarely heard of in America are found in the repertory, and the companies are so immense that an opera is rarely repeated so often as in our little representation of two weeks or a month's duration. The two finest tenors in the world are now engaged in Berlin, Wachtel and Niemann, and, for Germany, receive tremendous salaries. Niemann is bound by contract to sing four months during each year, for which he receives six thousand dollars (this is in Deutschland, please remember), and is allowed to pass the remaining eight months in singing as "gast-spieler," or as we term it, in "starring."

A most admirable system prevails in Germany of pensioning aged actors and opera singers, provided they keep to their contracts and remain as supports of single theatres. For example, Niemann, when no longer fit for singing, will receive a pension varying with his length of service, but amply sufficient to support him and enable him to end his life in comfort. Nearly every theatre throughout Germany has this provision, and it obviates in a great measure the necessity of paying enormous salaries, as an actor, if faithful, will never be left a beggar when the public is satiated with him. The condition of their remaining by one theatre is of course necessary, but the tediousness of such an arrangement is relieved by the months (three or more each year) when the actor or singer travels about as "gastspieler." Thus some of the principal singers in London, during the season there, are members of German companies, who, nevertheless, are very willing to pocket two or three hundred English sovereigns an evening during their vacation.

It would at first seem impossible that enough first class singers could be found to supply the theatres of Germany, so numerous are they, but music is so extensively cultivated and the twelve musical conservatories so rich in pupils of talent that the demand is supplied, and in no meagre way. The orchestra, chorus and ballet are almost certain to be well trained and efficient in any German opera, and this is something to be proud of when a repertory of thirty different operas is given in five months, as is the case in this city. Also, if you are in some insignificant city where permanent singers cannot be obtained, you will be sure of hearing some of the finest talent in the country once at least during the year by means of this propensity to "star" it, and such towns are always on the look out for singers of promise from the conservatories, whom they can keep to themselves a little while, until their fame spreads and they leave for glory and a large salary.

There is the same variety in the theatrical department as in that of the opera. A great part of German play-houses are taken by subscribers, and the plays therefore must be constantly changed. These subscriptions are in the highest degree convenient, as one can pay for one, two or four representations a week as he pleases, and obtain his ticket at the same rate as if he subscribed for each night of the year. For example, I bought a ticket last fall which entitles me to a seat every third representation, whatever it may be. I have gone very regularly for five months for the sake of learning the language quickly as well as for amusement, and during five months have heard only two operas and three theatrical representations a second time. I admit that in remaining another year I should notice a great deal of repetition; but if the pieces are good, which is the case here, this is to be desired. As I said before, there are few actors who can compare with Booth or Wallack or Davenport, but usually one of these actors is supported at home with a company so miserable that it requires all their genius to prevent the play from falling lifeless upon the stage. Here, when "Hamlet" is acted, the hero is not first class, but his supporters, even Rosencrantz and the second grave digger, are perfect, and there is consequently a consistency and solidity about the play which more than makes up for the deficiency of Hamlet himself. The Germans require this; the journalist thinks it his duty to correct in his daily critique the humble members no less than the chief performers.

The plays themselves are remarkably good, most of them native; but once a week one hears a translation from the English or French. I have only seen four broad farces during my stay in this city or in Dresden, and the only thing approaching a spectacle was a magic fountain upon the stage, upon which parti-colored light was thrown from an electric lamp. The prices are very low and the accommodations excellent. The audiences as a rule are dressed as with us, neither more or less, and seated as in our theatres, with but few private boxes. A stranger would doubtless think them very stingy of their applause, and indeed that enthusiasm which takes our theatres by storm is hardly ever seen here. No singer when encored repeats the aria as with us, but bows merely, and often when an actor receives an encore after fainting or killing himself, the curtain on rising discovers him in the same position in which he was last seen, and the audience is relieved from seeing a dead hero jump up and bow.

This observance of common sense rules, the excellence of the plays and actors in Germany, is owing to the interest taken in such matters by the people. The theatre is either the property of the city or partly endowed by the Duke or King in whose dominions it is. As the actors are paid from the State or city, it behoves the people to see that they are good, and that the theatres themselves are as perfect as possible. As they support them they deserve to find therein good entertainment, and gentlemen of talent and experience are always appointed to the management; those having direction of the Dresden and Leipzig theatres are noblemen. Though of course there are exceptions to this, yet as a rule Germans go to the opera and theatre, as to a musical concert, or gallery of paintings, to gratify a refined and educated taste.

(From the Daily Advertiser).

Othello.

AT THE BOSTON THEATRE, SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 18, 1867.*

Upon the shore, it seemed to me,
I watched the invisible air
Stir up a luminous tropic sea
To a vast storm of agony,
And anger and despair;
With dashing of the waves upon the shoals,
And shrieks of tortured pines upon the height,
And cries for help of perishing wrecked souls,
And lines of lightning in the night.
O, Shakespeare, King-magician,
Because truest to the heart of man!
Thou didst live again, one hour,
No longer a dead page;
But vital with the utmost power
Of tenderness and rage.
The simple and the complex that we are,
Alike are simple unto thee;
And that which lies most near or flies most far,
Within thy grasp is equally;
The foot-worn pebble and the proudest star
Preserving due degree
What unpaid debt of gratitude
To thee, reality of classic dreams;
Thou antique grace of attitude;
Apollo, young, and bright with all his beams;
Divine of mould and stature;
A genuine artist, being a pure man;
Showing such perfect pictures of base nature,
As only noble natures can!
Thee, also, passionate volcano, pent,
But overflowing into dreadful mirth,
Or wrath so human that it seems divine;
And we gaze on in aching wonderment,
As passion after passion has its birth,
And moulds the plastic features to its sign—
Cry of the tiger, murmur of the dove,
Jealousy, forgiveness, murder, love!
'Tis vengeance coiling snake-like round his foe,
Or burning like an arrow to his mark;
The spark through crafty channels eating slow,
The blasting mine ignited by the spark,
The stifling nurture of Italian palaces,
The growth of climates, barbaric, large and pure,—
The one, the subtle intellect of Venice is,
And one, the dusky grandeur of the Moor.

E. J. C.

Music in the Boston Public Schools.

In School Committee, Sept. 11, 1866.

The Committee on Music ask leave to submit the following as their Report:

In reviewing the operations of the school-year which has just closed, your Committee find cause for encouragement and satisfaction in the general progress which has taken place in this department of instruction. They believe that some real and solid advantages have been gained,—first and foremost among which has been the adoption by a large and hearty vote of the School Board, of the order appended to the preceding Report of the Committee, making it the duty of every teacher in the Primary Schools to devote at least ten minutes in each session to regular instruction in Music. The further introduction of the music charts into both Primary and Grammar Schools has been accomplished as rapidly as circumstances would permit. More unity, method and uniformity of teaching has prevailed; and a greater interest and appreciation of this branch of their work is beginning to be perceptible, on the part of the teachers especially.

* When the great German actor, Bogumil Dawson, played Othello to Edwin Booth's Iago.

In the Primary Schools, under the faithful and intelligent supervision of Mr. Mason, the plan of a more thorough and comprehensive instruction in music is now for the most part permanently established, and is already showing forth its beautiful results. The Chairman of the Committee on the Annual School Report gave, last year, in the body of his Report a resumé of the programme of instruction in singing in the Boston Primary Schools, as adopted in the sixth, fifth, fourth and third classes. This programme, with some present modifications, and as now carried out more fully in the plan of instruction through the second and first classes, may very properly be re-inserted here.

It is as follows:

PROGRAMME OF ELEMENTARY INSTRUCTION IN SINGING IN THE BOSTON PRIMARY SCHOOLS.

Requirements for the First Year (Sixth and Fifth Classes).

(1). Pupils should be taught to sing by rote all the exercises and songs with words of the first seventeen pages of "Hohmann's Practical Course in Singing," Part I.; also to sing the scale, ascending and descending, by the scale names, One, Two, Three, Four, Five, Six, Seven, Eight, and by the syllables, Do, Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La, Si, Do.

(2). They shall be taught musical notation from the black-board,—the pupils to copy the notes and other signs upon their slates to the following extent, viz:—

(a) Notes, short and long,

(b) Measures, Bar and Double bar,

(c) Rests, short and long,

(d) The Staff, Degrees (Lines and Spaces),

(e) The G clef,

(f) The first six sounds of the scale, in the key of G, written upon the staff with the g clef.

(g) The signification of the following letters, p, mp, f, ff, mf; also the repeat

(3). Music charts for daily practice.

(4). Other songs and exercises at the discretion of the teacher.

Second Year (Fourth and Third Classes).

(1). Continuation of Songs through Hohmann's Part I., by rote, with a view to the pupils' learning the same by notes; also the following additional characters in musical notation:

(a)

(b)

(c)

(2). Double, triple, quadruple, and sextuple time, including Accentuation and manner of beating the time.

(3). Music charts for daily practice; also miscellaneous songs and exercises at the discretion of the teachers.

Third Year (Second and First Classes).

Pupils for transfer to the Grammar Schools should be able

(1). To sing all the songs and exercises in Hohmann's Practical Course, Part I., by notes.

(2). To describe, by its intervals, the Major-Diatonic Scale.

(3). On hearing a musical phrase, to tell in what kind of time it is; also to describe double, triple, quadruple and sextuple time, including accentuation and manner of beating the same.

(4). To write, at dictation, the whole, quarter, and eighth notes, and their corresponding rests.

(5). To write the staff, and the g clef in its proper place upon the staff.

(6). To write, at dictation, upon the staff with the g clef the notes representing the following sounds or pitches, g, a, b, c, d, e, f, g, a, b, c, d, e, f and g; also f, g, a, b, c, d, e, f and g.

(7). Music charts (second course).

(8). To sing, at sight, simple melodies in the keys of C, G, and F, Major.

(9). To write the scales of C, G, and F, Major, upon the staff with g clef, and their proper signatures; also to name the pitches of the sounds composing these scales, in their order.

(10). To explain the use of the $\frac{2}{2}$, $\frac{3}{2}$, and $\frac{2}{4}$.

Book, Hohmann's Practical Course, Part I.

Of course it has not been possible for the music teacher to give his personal attendance every day of every week, in each of the two hundred and fifty schools of this grade. Nor indeed, has it been practicable or expedient for him to visit some of the remotest of them more than once or twice during the year, if at all. During the greater part of his time his efforts have been concentrated mainly upon certain groups of schools—four, five, or six, or more in the different districts, dividing his time as nearly as possible equally and impartially among the various portions of the city,—and, as fast as the teachers of the schools visited become interested themselves in the subject and their capacity for this teaching demonstrated, leaving them to carry on their work, with an occasional visit for inspection or counsel,—himself passing on to other groups of schools, to set in motion the same train. In many instances the regular teachers have caught up, with remarkable aptitude and facility, the method of the master, and his genius for teaching and for interesting children—and this by no means among those teachers exclusively who are what is called musical themselves,—the aptitude to teach, successfully and intelligently, the first rudiments of the art, being found among those who are most conscientious and apt in communicating a knowledge of all the other branches of school instruction committed to their care. We feel greatly inclined to point out and mention by name those schools wherein the greatest success has been achieved in this speciality, were it only to show how invariably they would prove to be the best schools in all respects, and also to call by name some in which the least interest and care has been manifested in carrying out the instructions of the Board in this regard; but we must defer this part of our duty to a future Report.

Among the most important of the immediate results of such teaching, in those schools where the regular teachers have absolutely and faithfully given the due quota of time and attention to the programme of musical instruction,—a result not unlooked for and one to which the attention of the Board has been called in anticipation in the previous Reports of this Committee,—is the gradual but sure eradication of the prevailing sing-song "primæval La-di-da," as it has been called. The extent to which such habits of listless and unmeaning sing-song utterance prevails in some of our own schools of this grade, even at the present day, pervading every performance in reading, in spelling, and in recitation, may be exemplified in the following illustrations, taken at random and noted down on the spot in certain schools which shall be for the present nameless. In spelling, take for example the word thunder. It is given out by the teacher: the pupils pronounce it after her and proceed to spell it after the following fashion:

E Minor.

"Thun-der, t, h, u, n, thun, d, e, r, der, thun-der"

The tempo depends upon the peculiar temperament of the teacher; it is generally rather dragging and heavy, and the strain being in the minor-key, the most energetic teacher, without the aid of musical training, cannot long resist its influence. Of measure, there is none.

In the recitation of arithmetical tables, the tune is of a rather livelier cast, usually in the major-key, and the rhythm is more marked, thus:

(a) Addition tables:
C major.

1 & 1 are 2, 4 & 1 are 5, 12 & 1 are 13, etc.
2 & 1 are 3, 5 & 1 are 6.
3 & 1 are 4,

(b) Subtraction tables:
G major.

2 from 3 leaves 1, 2 from 6 leaves 4, etc.
2 from 4 leaves 2,
2 from 5 leaves 3.

(c) Multiplication tables:
C major.

5 times 1 are 5, 5 times 3 are
5 times 2 are 10.
5 times 4 are twen - ty, etc.

(d) Division tables:
C major.

3 in 9, 3 times, 3 in fif - teen, 5 times, etc.
3 in 12, 4 times.

These faults are not confined to the Primary Schools; but, if not eradicated, will creep up among the lower grades of the Grammar classes, adding vexatiously to the disturbing elements that are to be dealt with, as best they can be, in the earlier stages of Grammar-school instruction. It is but justice to state in this connection, that wherever the co-operation of Mr. Munroe—the accomplished teacher of Vocal Culture and Physical Training—has been practicable, and his admirable exercises in the formation of the voice and the development of tone put in daily practice by the teacher, this vicious habit has proved vastly more amenable to cure.

A word in this place as to the mistaken notion, on the part of some, that it requires a good deal of practical knowledge of music in order to be able to teach it successfully. The Committee have already expressed their dissent from this dogma in the present and in former reports. Of course, the possession of a fine musical culture on the part of the teacher is a great aid in this branch of instruction, and gives interest and zest to the work. But such accomplishment, to more than a very moderate extent, as we have seen, is not essential to success; and the neglect to carry out the Rules of the Board as to daily attention to this subject can find no valid excuse upon such ground. The capacity to teach the elements of Vocal Music (as this Committee have often mentioned in their Reports) is now required of all new candidates for the office of teacher in our Public Schools. Nor is it a very difficult matter for any one to acquire the knowledge and capacity sufficient to enable them to impart instruction to children in this interesting art intelligently and with pleasure to themselves. "Granting," says Currie, "that a thorough familiarity with singing is best acquired when it has been practised from infancy upwards so as to become a habit, nature does not withdraw the gift permanently from those who have set no value on it on emerging from infancy, or who have not had the habit formed by their early instructors. It is a matter of experience that children of whatever age, almost without exception, and without much difficulty, attain to the perception of 'tune.' And the adult, the teacher for instance, who may wish to acquire it may acquire it if he will; all may do so except those who have some organic defect. The difficulty will be considerable, more or less, according to the completeness or length of time he has allowed his capacity to remain dormant,—just as it would be if he had to acquire his power of language at a mature age. But he may acquire it, and, what is more, he can judge for himself whether he may or not; if he can distinguish that one note differs from another in pitch and length, he has musical capacity sufficient, to say the least, for all his purposes."

In some of the school districts, the Music Teacher has, at the request of the Chairman of the District Committee, met the teachers as a body on some half-day in each month for the purpose of normal instruction in his speciality; and some such plan, if generally adopted throughout the city, would, in the minds of your Committee, prove of great service. To the same end the teachers have been encouraged to visit such schools as have shown the greatest proficiency in their musical exercises, in order to observe and acquire the method of instruction. All this is well, and it might, perhaps, be better if some still more efficient general plan of normal teaching should be devised, a conscientious attendance upon which should be required of all teachers.

If we have dwelt somewhat at length on the manner and method of musical instruction, as now established in the Primary Schools of Boston, it is because we attach to it such essential importance, and because of our earnest desire that the masters and subordinate teachers may co-operate with us in our efforts to carry the system thoroughly and efficiently into operation in ALL the classes belonging to this division of our school system. It is here, as we have so often said, that instruction in music, if we ever expect it to attain to anything like a satisfactory result as a part of our Common School teaching, ought to begin, and its foundations to be laid broad, deep and sure. Thus, and not otherwise, can be ensured such useful and practical knowledge of the art as we aim to furnish to every graduate of the Grammar and High departments of our Schools.

In the Intermediate Schools, of which there are at present only eleven in number, the same plan of instruction is now in operation—as far as possible—with, in some instances, most remarkable and gratifying results.

In the Grammar Department, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee in a previous Report, the charge and responsibility of the musical instruction now rests upon Mr. Sharland, who divides his time equally among all the schools of this grade, himself personally instructing the first and second classes. Under the energetic and efficient direction of this gentleman, instruction in music, in addition to the usual lessons of two half-hours each week with the upper rooms, is being extended as rapidly as possible to all the lower classes of this department. In seventeen of the twenty-one schools comprised in this division, namely, the Adams, Bigelow, Bowditch, Bowdoin, Boylston, Brimmer, Chapman, Dwight, Eliot, Everett, Hancock, Lawrence, Lincoln, Mayhew, Prescott, Quincy and Winthrop schools, some attention to music is thus given during a portion of every week by the regular teachers, with such assistance from the music teacher as can be spared from his arduous duties with the upper classes. This is certainly a gain upon what has hitherto been accomplished; for, although the Rules and Regulations explicitly require such attention to the musical instruction of their pupils on the part of the assistant teachers, very little, if any regard has been paid to this requirement.*

The Committee are aware that serious difficulties have hitherto existed in the proper carrying out of this rule. These difficulties, they believe, will hereafter be in great measure removed, since, with the close of the present year, the progressive plan of musical instruction in the Primary Schools will have reached up through all the grades of those schools, and will be felt in the promotions to the Grammar Schools. But, to insure a proper and systematic attention to this branch of study, it should have in all the classes its fixed and appointed time in some portion of each day's programme of study, as has already been many times urged by the Committee in their previous Reports. Ten minutes in each session faithfully given to such instruction in this speciality by the regular teachers in every room, following, indeed, the same plan that has already been fulfilled in the case of the Primary Schools, would be sufficient; and this would seem to us a very moderate demand for a subject of such general interest and importance, as will appear when contrasted (in connection with the time given to some other school studies) with several of the best of the European Schools of a grade corresponding to our Grammar department, as given below.

* Sect. 12, Chap. X of the Regulations [of Grammar Schools] reads as follows:

"Two half-hours each week in the Grammar Schools shall be devoted to the study and practice of vocal music. Instruction shall be given to the first and second classes by the music teachers. Musical notation, the singing of the scale and exercises in reading simple music, shall be practised twice a week by the lower classes under the direction of the assistant teachers; and the pupils shall undergo examinations and receive credits for proficiency in music as in the other studies pursued in the schools."

Table showing the relative proportion of time devoted to Arithmetic, Geography and Music, in the Public Schools of Berlin, Potsdam, Leipzig and Weissenfels.

SUBJECTS OF STUDY.	WEISSENFELS.			LEIPZIG.			POTSDAM.			BERLIN.
	Hours per week.			Hours per week.			Hours per week.			Hours per week.
Arithmetic..... Geography..... Music.....	1st Class.	4	3	4	4	4	4	3	3	3	3
	2d Class.	4	2	4	4	3	4	3	3	3	3
	3d Class.	4	2	4	4	2	4	3	3	3	3
	4th Class.	4	1	4	4	1	4	3	1	3	3
	1st Class.	4	3	4	4	3	4	3	3	3	3
	2d Class.	4	2	4	4	2	4	3	2	3	3
	3d Class.	4	2	4	4	2	4	3	2	3	3
	4th Class.	4	1	4	4	1	4	3	1	3	3
	1st Class.	4	3	4	4	3	4	3	3	3	3
	2d Class.	4	2	4	4	2	4	3	2	3	3
	3d Class.	4	2	4	4	2	4	3	2	3	3

In comparison with the above we give below the time now devoted to these studies in the various classes of three of our own schools of this grade. These schools are taken by the Committee from among the seventeen in which, as we have said, some attention is given to music in all the classes. They are up to the average standard of excellence.

Table showing the relative proportion of time given to Arithmetic, Geography and Music in three of the Grammar Schools of Boston.

SUBJECTS OF STUDY.	SCHOOL C.				SCHOOL B.			SCHOOL A.
	Hours per week.				Hours per week.			Hours per week.
Arithmetic..... Geography..... Music.....	1st Class.	4	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	2d Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	3d Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	4th Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	1st Class.	4	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	2d Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	3d Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	4th Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	1st Class.	4	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	2d Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1
	3d Class.	3	3	3	1	1	1	1	1	1

To test the operation of this plan, in connection with the curriculum of studies required in our own schools of this grade, the experiment has been faithfully tried in one or two instances, and the results, as affecting the general interests of the school, have been carefully regarded. The testimony of Mr. Sheldon, master of the Hancock Grammar School, under whose hearty co-operation such instruction has been daily carried out in every room in his school during the past year, is interesting and to the point.

Says Mr. Sheldon, in a letter to the Committee, in reply to their inquiries on this subject, "It affords me gratification to give my testimony in favor of the practicability and value of your efforts to inaugurate and carry forward a thorough and scientific system of instruction in vocal music, as an element of popular education in the public schools of Boston. I am confident that a strictly scientific course of instruction in vocal music is not only practicable, but imperatively demanded, in view of the high mission the schools of Boston ought to fulfil in the work of practical and refined culture. The advantage of such a system would be almost universal, since, in a school of about one thousand girls, less than a dozen pupils were unfitted, from all causes, for attaining to a fair degree of success in this department of culture. This number would have been reduced, provided musical instruction had been begun at the age fixed for the admission of pupils to the Primary Schools by the Rules and Regulations of the School Board. My experience and observation lead me to conclude that the time devoted to the study of vocal music tends to advance and further the progress of the pupils in the other branches of study, rather than retard. Especially is this true in regard to speaking and reading, which consists of essentially the same elements as singing and should be taught in conjunction with it. Vocal music is one of the most useful agencies in the discipline of a school. The 'music chart' is, in my judgment, a far better appliance, generally, than 'the roll,' in securing that harmony between teacher and pupils, and a happy spirit and temper of mind, which would prevent most of the petty cases of wrongdoing, for which punishment is so often inflicted in our schools. The influence of vocal music we find to be toward the formation of a cheerful and amiable character, and the development of that strength and moral power which is necessary to a life of usefulness.

"Our plan is to assign eight or ten minutes of each day of the school-year, to be devoted exclusively by all the teachers of the school to instruction in vocal music. We found that it employed muscles and intellect profitably, developed a taste for the artistic and beautiful, and called out the perceptive and constructive faculties of the soul more than any other single study taught for the same length of time.

"Within a very few years, should this system, recently so auspiciously introduced into the Boston Schools, be faithfully and persistently carried forward by the School Board, teachers and people of the city, I feel confident in predicting that the pupils, generally, of the same age and advancement, would read and express in singing tones written music at sight, as readily and more correctly than they would the text of their School Readers in speaking tones. And my earnest hope is that the work so well commenced here may be pushed forward until the children of the humblest citizen of America, as they graduate from our schools, may be found trained in all respects so as to be able to compete with and rival the pupils of the best schools of the Old World."

After such practical confirmation of their views, your Committee give notice of their intention, at an early day, to bring before the Board an order requiring that a definite and specified time—at least ten minutes in each session—be devoted daily to instruction in music in all the schools of the Grammar department, being substantially the same order, in spirit and form, as that recently passed in reference to the Primary Schools. In the nature of the case, without such specified and allotted time no well-arranged programme for musical study could be marked out for the Grammar Schools, and none such now exists. At present, as far as is practicable, the music teacher, as has been before said, is endeavoring, by devoting a portion of his own time to the work, to give a proper direction to such instruction throughout the lower rooms. By the present requirements of the Rules, two half-hours a week must be devoted by the music teacher to personal instruction in his specialty in the first and second classes of each school of this division. All below these classes are divided, for the purpose of musical instruction, into two parts, to each of which the music teacher devotes a half-hour, at such time as his engagements with the upper classes will allow, in inspecting and giving direction to the teaching,—the regular teachers in all the lower rooms being expected to devote some portion of each day to this branch of study.

The want of a proper text-book in the Grammar Schools is beginning to be severely felt. In the lower classes, as in the Primary Schools, the music charts furnished by Mr. Mason, with illustrations and exercises from Hohmann, Mainzer, Wilhelm and Hullah, in some degree supply this want. Not so in the two upper classes. There, as has been previously stated in our Reports, it has been a permitted custom for the music teacher to use such book in illustration of his method of teaching as in his judgment was thought best,—the pupils supplying themselves with the books whenever required. The text-book now so used in the upper classes is an adaptation of the excellent system of Wilhelm, by John Hullah,—which follows admirably upon the plan of Hohmann now in use in all the Primary and the lower grades of the Grammar classes. Connected with these progressive exercises of Wilhelm and Hullah is a variety of well-adapted pieces of music selected and most of them arranged by Mr. Sharland,—the whole forming a comprehensive and handsome volume for the pupil. This book the Committee have recommended through the Committee on Text-Books for adoption by the Board as a necessary and important aid in the existing stage of musical education in our schools. And while on this point the Committee would again refer to the views expressed by them in a former Report (see printed volume of the School Report for 1861), in which they express their hope that before long they may possess a manual of music adapted expressly to our system of Public School instruction. Such manual, in three parts, adapted to Primary, Grammar and High School instruction, they believe must sooner or later grow out of the present efforts to adopt and carry out a thorough and progressive plan of musical tuition in the schools of Boston—which, when completed, should be recognized and adopted as the uniform text-books of the school, and be furnished to them at the cheapest rate, free from any trammels of copyright, or the interests or emoluments of any individual, author, compiler, or publisher.

In the Girls' High and Normal School, as heretofore, this department of instruction is under the charge of Mr. Zerrahn. Here the Committee have observed, with pleasure, a growing interest and appreciation, on the part of the pupils, in their musical tuition from year to year. This is only the natural result of the more thorough attention to this subject in the Primary and Grammar departments. Under the hands of an accomplished master and musician, the pupils now acquire by practice a fulness and roundness of tone, style and method of delivery, a good degree of facility in the reading of more difficult music in two and three parts, and some knowledge of musical form and composition. Two lessons a week, of an hour and a half each, are apportioned equally among the three classes of this school.

In the Training Department of this school, for the present located in Somerset Street, normal instruction in the art of teaching music, illustrated by lessons to Primary pupils, is given by Mr. Mason.

J. BAXTER UPHAM,
JOHN P. ORDWAY, R. C. WATERSTON,
FRANCIS H. UNDERWOOD, W. H. CUDWORTH.
Committee on Music.

Music Abroad.

Leipzig.

The annual examinations at the Conservatorium took place as usual in April; concerning the first of which we have received the following translation from the Leipziger Tageblatt of April 12.

"On the ninth of April, the first of the annual public examinations of the Conservatorium der Musik took place in the Gewandhaus Hall. The programme comprised five pieces for the piano, two for the violin, and one for the violoncello. In the first named Messrs. Ernst Eulenberg, of Berlin, (A minor Concerto by Hummel, 1st movement); Max Wogritsch, of Hermannstadt, (Concert-Polonaise, Op. 56, Moscheles); James Wilson, of Newport, Rhode Island, (Rondo Brilliant in E flat, by Mendelssohn); George Hodorowski of Poltawa (A flat Concerto by Field, I. movement); Gustav Kogel of Leipzig, (E-flat Concerto, Beethoven, I movement); and Charles Heap, of Birmingham (II. and III. movements of the same Concerto). The violin was represented by Messrs. Lehr of Bukarest, and Dawydow of St. Petersburg; the violoncello by Mr. Julius Hegar, third, of Basel.

"The large audience of invited listeners (generally only seen here on similar occasions) signified their approval of all the performances, but especially (very naturally) those of the two youngest and smallest (Dawydow and Hodorowski, the former of whom is fourteen, the latter thirteen years old) by enthusiastic applause. With this simple notice our report might perhaps be considered, by many, quite sufficient. A reporter, however, who has always deemed it his duty to take not so much the opinion of the more or less select Gewandhaus public (to whom still, in equity and fairness, a certain knowledge of art, developed by long and steady attendance upon good musical entertainments, cannot be denied), as to receive for his guide the principles of the art itself, judges it to be in the interest as well of this art and the music school, as also of the young artists themselves to enter into a more searching and discriminating discussion upon the efforts of the latter.

"The Examination at the Institution, which is indebted for its high renown to Mendelssohn Bartholdy, as chief founder and first leader, in whose present list of teachers, such celebrated names as Moscheles, Moritz, Hauptmann, Ferd. David and E. F. Richter, are found, requires indeed a closer and more attentive observance than other schools, which cannot boast so distinguished a position. For we may rightly here expect and claim that such an Institution correspond with its world-wide fame, and the solution of this question we are enabled, for the most part, to find in these Examinations.

"Above all, every criticism must have a firm basis; it is accordingly our duty to define our position well, before we examine more closely this, as well as later, following Exhibitions. In our day it is no more allowed the creating, nor the executing musician to content himself with mere outward appearances, without clearly and precisely showing the inner motive of the same. From the artists of the present, not simply the mere technical skill is required, but also intelligence and an appreciative interpretation of the music. Even in the study of technic, indispensable to such interpretation, we claim that he must try to investigate and master the spirit of the tone-art through its materials. Without this intellectual element the technic sinks to a mere handicraft. The dexterity of the hands alone, when not sustained by the inspiration of the soul, even if the written marks of expression be ever so carefully and precisely given, are far from forming an artistic representation. The "How" of the performance is almost of secondary importance. Does the scholar feel it to be in consequence of genial intuition (which unknowingly is often manifested in children), or in consequence of the explanations of a master, himself deeply imbued with the true meaning and spirit of the tone language—if the scholar, we say, feels himself inspired by the "Why"—i.e., by the intellectual necessity of those shades of expression, so these will certainly influence his innermost understanding, and involuntarily impart themselves to his fingers. Thus following the inspired impulse he will find the correct manner of expression. Mere technical general directions and precepts alone can never assist here. This much to our readers in advance, as preparing the way for a correct appreciation of the following: Among the pianists mentioned above, Messrs. Heap, Hodorowski, Wilson and Wogritsch distinguished themselves by a more or less intellectual comprehension of the "Why." With Mr. Heap (a young man of 20-21 years) it appears already as the result of inner feeling and soul; with young Hodorowski (the boy) apparently only from the intuition of hereditary and unusual talent; with Mr. Wogritsch, the natural talent may yet also prevail, although the inner sense is already distinguishable, while in Mr. Wilson (a young man of more matured years) we see the full result of reflective intellect. In the case of the four above named gentlemen, the fruit of the school—the purely technical power—is only to be regarded as commendable in connection with the touch, the influence which the inspired impulse involuntarily exercises upon the fingers, and which as it stands in the closest relationship with the individual character of each artist, appears accordingly variously modified. The playing of Messrs. Eulenberg and Kogel, on the contrary, displayed only the result of severe technical school and commendable industry, and perhaps from this point may claim corresponding recognition. Only we could have wished from Mr. Kogel a somewhat soberer appreciation of the situation, of which, among other things, his occasional glances toward the audience could not well be considered as an exact indication.

"Of the violinists, Mr. Lehr represented the respectable technic gained through industrious study. Young Dawydow, however (in spite of his youth), possesses in addition to fine technical skill, the intuition of indwelling talent, with indications of an early, ripe and acute intelligence. Mr. Hegar, finally,—whose control of his instrument gave token of excellent school—appeared, with reference to inspired interpretation, to stand upon the same ground with Mr. Heap."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 8, 1867.

Music in the Public Schools.

We copy to-day in full the Annual Report (written by Dr. Upham) of the Committee on Music, embodied in the very elaborate Annual Report of the School Committee, a formidable document of 350 pages. It must surely be read with interest by all who believe in Music as an important element in popular education; and if well read and pondered, it must go far to convert some who are still unbelievers. It shows what hopeful, and indeed remarkable, progress has been made, not only in our High and Grammar schools, but in nearly every one of our 250 Primary schools, in teaching nearly every child to sing simple music both by rote and by note, by that rare teacher, Mr. L. W. Mason, who seems to have been sent into the world on just this mission, to show how to win the children, and their teachers too, to music; what wonders are wrought at the same time by another equally gifted teacher, Mr. Munroe, in building up the voices, together with the health, of the young; how happy the children are made by this exercise, and how much more cheerfully, with willing hearts and clear minds, they go from it to their other studies; how it promotes the love of order, by giving them the taste of rhythmical experience; how one by one the doubting members of the School Committee and the heads of Schools have come to see and own the good of it, and how, pleased and inspired by what they saw, the teachers in the several rooms of nearly all the schools, have made themselves scholars of the gentlemen alluded to, and have qualified themselves to carry on the exercises in the same spirit in their several class rooms. So that vocal Music—of course in its very simple, rudimentary stages, not in the higher sense of Art—has at length become a vital part of our whole common school system, and the Committee, testing their ideas by abundant practical experiment, have gained courage to establish the Rule that among the indispensable qualifications for the office of a teacher in whatever grade of schools must be a certain power of teaching music,—a rule which is fast becoming efficacious throughout.

The time asked for this exercise is so little in a week, that the loss would be but trifling even if it did no good. No one pretends that it does harm, and the general testimony of teachers and competent witnesses is, that it is doing incalculable good. By the tables in the Report it will be seen that we do not yet give more than half as much time to music relatively to other studies, as they do in the schools in Germany, to which our foremost educators have long pointed as the best models. But it is wonderful how much may be done in half hours, in ten minutes, if done daily, with live energy, and on a sound and natural system. We have now a School Committee with whom it is a conviction and a thing of conscience; we have found the two men (and we should name a third, Mr. Sharland, who follows up Mr. Mason's good work in the Grammar Schools), who in themselves impersonate the art of teaching children music; we have got the children interested, glowing with the sense of daily progress, and hundreds of their teachers heartily participating in the work; the idea, the faith is fast taking possession of the community, becoming a part of public opinion, leavening the whole mass. Shall there be any falling back? The moment just before complete success is always an anxious one. The School Committee do well, therefore, in their annual Reports to still reiterate their plea, re-state their arguments, fortified by new experiences, that a good work so well begun, so full of promise, shall be protected to the end; that no neglect, no cavils of doubting Thomases or partisan opponents, shall be allowed to arrest the plant midway in its growth.

This Report is the more significant in view of a recent agitation in the School Board of the question of abolishing that Musical School Festival, which has proved so inspiring now for years. Happily it was but a small minority of discontented ones. Such restless spirits there are always to raise doubts and opposition to all æsthetic schemes of culture, and to whatever does not square with the most literal and hard utilitarianism. Are they not providential stings sent lest we fall asleep in good works that require faith and persistent labor!

It is one of the incidental, but not final, fatal, difficulties of a popular government, where all claim a voice, and nothing ever gets entirely beyond discussion, that there will be agitators who, perhaps for the mere sake of self-assertion, would delight in pulling down anything at all fine and ideal, looking to the moral and spiritual elevation of the race, which it has cost zeal and toil and sacrifice and years to build up. No doubt, there could be found thriving and influential people in this city, who would like to have the Public Garden, or even the Common, dear to every child, cut into building lots and sold, because in one (very narrow) sense they can be looked upon as superfluities. For this very reason, to soothe this acrid restlessness of a competitive democracy, to harmonize tastes, feelings, hearts, where interests divide, to round off the sharp corners of the Yankee character and manners, to pervade the social mass with that instinctive reverence which goes with the sense and culture of the Beautiful, do we need Music in our schools.

Music in Boston.—Review of the Season, 1866-7.

(Concluded.)

Having counted up our wealth in instrumental music, under the two heads of Orchestral and Chamber Music,—to which we might have added a long list of Organ compositions, of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, &c., as well as the French Offertoires of Batiste Wely and the like, but that it would be essentially a repetition of the list we printed for the year before,—we come now to the larger and the smaller forms of vocal music; limiting ourselves, as before, to such works and authors as may be considered classical, and whose performance marks the progress of taste and culture in a sound direction. For it would be an endless and an idle task to count up all the sentimental songs and ballads, the hacknied common-places from Italian operas, tours de forces merely written to show off a singer, which figure in no end of miscellaneous "popular" concerts, and which always, everywhere, have their audience, just as the sensational and shallow melodramas flourish even in communities where Shakspeare is well known and felt. We begin with the noblest.

III. ORATORIO.

Boston still looks to a single source for all its opportunities in this kind. The old Handel and Haydn Society, in spite of its chronic infirmities, has grown in earnestness and power as well as numbers. It now musters a chorus of 500 voices for its ordinary performances,—a number which a few years since came only at the call of a great Festival—and it has already had two Festivals greater than that now going on in New York,—higher in character, of course, than any individual speculation like the latter (catering to heterogeneous crowds by announcing military bands and "Drum Corps" side by side with the Messiah and Elijah!). Our old Society is not yet all that it should be, as none know better than its own directors, who have been doing all they can, and with encouraging success, to better it. The quality of voices and the choral discipline certainly improve from year to year; while in the choice of music the standard has been kept very high.

This year, (there being no Festival—that will come next Spring), the number of public Oratorio performances has been six. The works produced have been: Handel's Messiah (our annual Christmas custom) and Jephtha, which, though given here many years ago, may be counted the novelty of this season; Haydn's Creation; Mendelssohn's St. Paul, Elijah, and Hymn of Praise: this last with Rossini's Stabat Mater made up a single concert, as they often do in England. In Jephtha, the Creation, Elijah, the Stabat and the Hymn of Praise, we had the benefit of Mme. Parepa-Rossa's noble voice and style; in Elijah we had also the superb contralto of Miss Philipps; in St. Paul and Jephtha, a tenor, Mr. Simpson, was borrowed from New York; for the rest we have been served, not greatly, but for the most part faithfully and well, by relying on our own resources ("home talent"): Miss Houston and Mrs. H. M. Smith for soprani; Mrs. J. S. Cary and Miss Kate Rametti, for contralti; Mr. James Whitney and Mr. W. J. Winch, for tenors; and Messrs. Rudolphsen, M. W. Whitney and J. F. Winch, for basses.

Jephtha was the only new accession to the repertoire. St. Paul was the new thing of last year. The Creation and Messiah, great and never to be forgotten, are very old stories with us,—so much so that it would cost a miracle, at least a new inspiration, to lift the chorus out of the old unconscious habits, faults and all, in singing them. Even Elijah and the Hymn of Praise are getting to be as familiar as household words with all our music lovers. Two great obstacles there always are to widening the field of our acquaintance with great works of this kind, to studying and bringing out other great works which by their intrinsic worth have quite as great a claim on us as any in our list. First, the mass of a chorus are too lazy to set to work with mastering energy upon a difficult new work, even by Handel's contemporary and at least his equal. Then, the material economy of such a Society, the eye to outward and immediate success, so easily forgets the real excellent first purpose, of learning things and doing things for Art's sake, being tempted by some splendid opportunity, as the chance presence of a famous prima donna, into doing the easy old thing over again for the hundredth time just for the sake of presenting her; the people pay and crowd the hall so to hear the singer, the singer being the first question, the music subordinate; the prosperity is so intoxicating, so easily won, that the same round of Oratorios bids fair to repeat itself indefinitely; indeed have not these few, which we all know by heart, proved just the right sort of background on which to display the Nightingales and Divas whom we are all so crazy about, that we do not care whether we ever know Sebastian Bach or not? Perhaps for that we need a new Society, some smaller, earnest club of singers, who would devote themselves to this speciality of learning the Passionsmusik, the Magnificat, the Christmas Oratorio, or some few of his three hundred sacred Cantatas. We confess we sometimes wish that the Handel and Haydn Society would either become a great deal better, made up entirely of earnest spirits, or so much worse, that we might without ceremony dispense with it and build up another on a new foundation. We have rejoiced more than once of late years at the infusion of new wine into it; but perhaps, after all, new wine needs new bottles.

IV. OPERA.

Here the account is beggarly. The German Opera, which promised so well, fell to pieces, and though many of its elements have several times been drawn together again in New York and Philadelphia, our Theatre has not been open to them. We have had no Fidelio again; no Hilf mir Tell; no Mozart opera, except one bad performance of Don Giovanni; no Weber, no Cherubini, none of the sterling good things which we have waited long in vain to know.

Italian Opera, making its headquarters in New York, still visits us for a few weeks at a time, playing every night in the week, and two afternoons besides; the repertoire about the same as usual, with now and then one of the latest fashions from Paris, such as L'Africaine. We have had two visitations, each for a fortnight, of MARETZKE'S TROUPE, consisting of Miss Kellogg, Mme. Carmen Poch, Miss Amalia Hauck, Miles Ronconi, Stella Bonheur, Stockton and Mme. Natalie-Testa; tenors, Signors Mazzoleni, Baragli and Testa; baritoni, Ronconi and Bellini; bassi, Antonucci, Dubrenil, &c. They gave the following operas:

Bellini's Sonnambula; Donizetti's Lucyria Borgia, Lucia, Elisir d'Amore, Pavetta; Verdi's Trovatore and Ernani; Rossini's Il Barbiere; Gounod's Faust; Auber's Fra Diavolo; Herold's Zampa (first time in Boston); Meyerbeer's Huguenots and "Star of the North" (twice); Ricci's Crispino e la Comare.—The prima donna in opera seria, as Lucyria, the Verdi roles, &c., was Mile. Poch, new to our public, who made a good mark. In such roles as the Sonnambula, Prasceovia in "Star of the North," &c., it was the young and beautiful Amalia Hauck, who instantly became a favorite and is a singer of rare promise. Miss Kellogg took the lead as usual in all light and playful pieces. Mme. Testa did the Azucenas, Maffeo Orsini's and other contralto parts. Sig. Ronconi was the great card, inimitable of course in the Barber, Dr. Dulcamara and Crispino. As conductors, Herr Bergmann and Sig. Torriani alternated; now and then Maretzek in person.

Then for a single week came the MAX STRAKOSCH TROUPE, consisting of Mme. Parepa-Rosa, with her quondam associates of the Bateman Concerts, Brignoli, Ferranti and Fortuna, strengthened by Miss Phillipps and Sig. Susini. They performed the Trovatore, Il Barbiere, Lucia, Don Giovanni, and Norma twice.

We have only to add the nice little experiment of "PARLOR OPERA" in the Music Hall, when Don Pasquale and Lucia were each given twice (in English), and the "Bohemian Girl" once, by Miss Riddell, Mr. J. Whitney and Mr. Farley, tenors, Mr.

Rudolphsen, Dr. Guilmette and Mr. M. W. Whitney, basses,—and our record is complete.

V. OTHER VOCAL MUSIC.

J. S. BACH: Alto Aria: "Erbarme dich," from the Passionsmusik (Mrs. Cary with orchestra.)

Cradle Song, from Waldnachts-Cantata (Do.)

Quartet (with orch. parts by 4 pianos): "Liebster Gott, wann werd' ich sterben," 1st movement of Cantata.

Aria: "Wohl euch, ihr ausgewählten Seelen," (Mrs. Cary).

Aria (with violin obbligato): "Frohlocke, mein Herz," (Mme. Rosa).

HANDEL: "Lascia ch' io pianga," Air from Rinaldo (Miss Phillipps), twice.

"From mighty kings," from Julius, (Mme. Rosa).

"So shall the lute," " " " "

Other solos from Oratorios.

STRADILLA: "Pietà, Signore," (Sig. Fortuna).

GLUCK: Aria: "Che farò," from Orpheus.

MOZART: Priest's Chorus: "O Isis."

Concert Aria: "Non temer," (Miss Houston with orchestra).

Bass Air from Fedora: "Solche hergelaufenen Lullen," (Mr. Rudolphsen).

"Deh vieni" do. (Mrs. Cary, Mme. Frederici).

"Non più andrai," (Rudolphsen, Ferranti).

Duet: "Cruel, perché," (Mme. Parepa and Fortuna).

Catalogue Song: "Madanina," (Ferranti, 2).

Duet: "La ci darem," (")

Air: "Batti, batti," (Parepa).

"Non mi dir," (")

"Il mio tesoro," (Brignoli).

Song: "The Violet," (Miss C. Loring).

Air: "Porgi amor," (Miss Barton)

"Voi chi sapete" (Miss Phillipps).

"Non più di cori," from Tro, (Miss Ryan).

Tenor Air: "Costanza," from the Savala, (Mr. Kreissmann)

Duet from Cosi fan Tutte, (Misses Loring & Ryan).

BEETHOVEN: "Hymn to Joy," in 9th Symphony.

Quartet (Canon), from Fidelio.

Dervish Chorus in "Ruins of Athens."

Duet, (Soprano and Bass), " "

Scena: "Ah! perfido," (Mme. Rosa, Mrs. Smith).

"Aclaida," (Brignoli, Rudolphsen).

Pizarro's Air in Edipo, (Rudolphsen).

"Gott, deine Götter," "Basslied," &c., from 6 Sacred Songs, (Rudolphsen).

"Mignon," op. 75, No. 1 "

"Opferlied," "

Song of the Quail. (Miss Houston).

CIMAROSA: Duet: "Se fiato," (Ferranti & Fortuna).

CHERUBINI: Ave Maria, (Miss Farwell).

WIBER: Scena from Die Schütz, (Miss Fisher).

"Un obidie Wolke," do. Mme. Rosa).

Ellin Chorus from Ovevo.

ROSSINI: Prayer from Moses.

Trio: "Ziti, zitti "

Duet: "Quis est homo," from Stabat.

"D'un bell' uso," from Turco in Italia.

"Danque io son," from Il Barbiere.

"Un segreto," from Concetto.

Romanza from "William Tell."

Tarantella: "Gia la Luna," (Ferranti).

Cavatina: "Don magnifico," (")

Aria: "Bell' raggio," (Para-Rosa).

"Pro peccatis," from Stabat.

"Largo al factotum," (Il Barbiere).

MILSTEDTSOHN: "Walpurgis Night," (Parker's club).

114th Psalm: "When Israel out of Egypt came," double chorus, (d.)

Schiller's Ode "An die Künstler," (Orpheus).

Double Chorus from Demipus: Praise of Athens.

Angel Trio from Elijah.

Part-Songs: "The Nightingale," "Forest Birds,"

"Hunting Song."

Two-part Song: "May bells," &c.

Songs: "Zuleika," "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," "Morgengruss," "First Violet," "Spring Song," "How oft the young have wandered."

SCHUBERT: Chorus, 23d Psalm, (Orpheus).

"Et incarnatus," Trio and Chor. from Mass in E flat, (Parker's Club).

Barcarolle, (Miss Abell, Miss Loring).

Thekla's Lament, (Miss Ryan).

"Thine is my heart," (")

"Aufenthalt," (Rudolphsen).

"Ye faded flowers," (")

"Du bist die Ruh," (Miss Bennett).

"Every Soul at rest is sleeping," (Miss Loring).

"Shakespeare's "Hark, the Lark," (")

Serenade, (Miss Farwell).

The Wanderer, (Mme. Frederici).

The Erl King, (Mr. Kreissmann).

SCHEFFERS: Part Song: "Good Night."

Schlumber Song, solo and chor. from "Paradise and the Peri," (Parker's club).

Duet: "Liebesgarten," (Miss Ryan and Mr. Kreissmann).

Delicitation (Widmung): (Mrs. Smith, Frederici, Miss Abell, Mr. Kreissmann).

Spring Night, (3 times).

"Night Song," (Miss Loring).

"The Nut Tree," (")

"Up from my Tears," (Miss Ryan).

"Sonnenschein," (")

"One Look, one Word," (Rudolphsen).

ROBERT FRANZ: Kyrie à capella (soli and chorus).

Schlumber Song, words by Tieck.

"Now the shades are falling."

"Zwischen Weizen und Korn," (Goethe).

"Wind er wohl noch meiner gedenken."

"Er ist gekommen," (Rückert), sung often.

"Willkommen mein Wald," do.

"In Wald, in Wald," do.

"Im Rhein, im heiligen Strom," (Heine).

"Nun holt mir eine Karre Wein," (Burns).

"Wie sehr ich lein."

"Die Rose, die Lilie, die Taube."

"Weil auf mir, du dunkles Auge."

"Die Lot-Blume."

"Auf ruck."

"Amenis."

"Im Sommer."

GADE: Spring Fancasia, piano solo and quartet. Parker's Club.

"Reiter-lieder," (part-songs).

FERD. HILLER: Chorus of Warriors, from Oratorio "Jerusalem."

Aberleil, for 2 soprani.

HAUPTMANN: Song Reonna, for choir.

SACRED CONCERT. On Sunday evening, June 16, a concert of classical sacred music will be given at the Church of the Unity (Dr. Hepworth's), complimentary to Mr. J. E. PARKERS, who will leave for Europe in September to pursue his musical studies. Several of our best artists will assist.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The Advertiser has the following report of the annual meeting, Monday evening, May 27, in Bunstead Hall:

The president, Dr. J. B. Upham, presided. After the records of the last meeting had been read, the treasurer, Mr. George W. Palmer, presented his report, which exhibited receipts the past year amounting to $12,495.50; expenditures $9,627.63; leaving a balance of $2,867.87.

The report of the librarian, Mr. George H. Chickering, was next presented. The report stated that the additions to the library during the year were not quite as large as in most years, while the subtractions, or "abstractions," had been larger than they should be. Among the additions were 225 copies of the Stabat Mater, an 1160 copies of Jephtha, all in hand-book form, containing the music of the complete works in vocal and piano forte score. The Jephtha was imported from London, and generously presented to the society, with the necessary orchestral parts, by the president, Dr. Upham.

The president next submitted his report, giving an abstract of the doings of the society during the year.

Nine regular meetings of the government had been held during the year, and the society had been called together five times. At all these meetings a gratifying harmony had prevailed. Thirteen members had been admitted, eight discharged, and four resigned. There had been thirty-two rehearsals with good attendance; and six public performances in the Music Hall, participated in by choruses of five hundred voices, and orchestras of fifty aided by celebrated singers, and attended with good success. In speaking of the proposition which had been mooted in the board of government, to publish the annals of the society, the president expressed the opinion that that work should not be much longer delayed, since none of the original members of the society were now living, and it would every year become difficult to preserve the records. The president spoke of the evil of absenteeism at some length, saying that although it had been considerably lessened, it still prevailed to such an extent as to be a great obstacle to further achievements by the society. After speaking of some other matters of minor importance, in which improvement might be made, the report alluded to the triennial festival of the society, to take place during the coming year; and expressed a hope that while the ordinary work of the season might not be neglected, the festival might be made successful in all respects.

After several members had spoken in high commendation of the suggestions of the president's report, it was voted to print it in pamphlet form for distribution.

The report of the trustees of the permanent fund—Judge Patnam, Nathaniel Harris and the president of the society—stated the value of the fund $2,208 21.

The meeting proceeded to the election of officers for the ensuing year, with the following result:—

President, J. Baxter Upham; Vice President, O. J. Faxon; Secretary, Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer, Geo. W. Palmer; Librarian, George H. Chickering.

The above were re-elected. For Directors, instead of the old Board, as given by the Advertiser, the following were chosen:

O. Frank Clark, Theophilus Stover, Charles H. Webb, D. L. Laws, E. C. Daniell, R. M. Lowell, Stephen Somes, Oliver B. Lothrop.

PHILADELPHIA. The German Opera troupe (from the Stadt Theater, New York) closed last Saturday a series of performances at the Chestnut Street Theatre, which appear to have given great delight. Certainly the repertoire of those two weeks is worth all that the Italian Opera gives us in five years. It included William Tell, Don Juan, Fiddio, Nozze di Figaro, and La Dame Blanche, as well as the Huguenots, the Jewess, Robert le Diable, Faust, Masanello, Merry Wives of Windsor and Stradella. In Don Juan, Mme. Johannsen was Donna Anna; Frederici, Elvira; Rotter, Zerlina; Habelmann, Ottavio; Wilhelm Formes, Don Juan; Hermanns, Leporello. Faust had the old cast: Frederici, Himmer and Hermanns, with Johannsen as Siebel and W. Formes as Valentine. In the Jewess, a new prima donna, Mme. Seelig made a successful debut. A new tenor, Bernard, sang the music of Raimbaud acceptably. There was a chorus of 40 voices, and a good orchestra, conducted by Herr Neuendorf. The Bulletin says of the performance of Rossini's masterpiece:

Herr Himmer acted and sang in the part of "Arnold" in the most effective manner; and Wilhelm Formes, as "Tell," was also good, though his voice is scarcely strong enough for the music. Weinlich was excellent as "Walter," and Mr. Chandon, a new arrival, was equally good as "Gesler." The graceful music of the fisherman was well sung also by Mr. Bernard. Mme. Johannsen as "Matilda," sang the exquisite romance which alone gives interest to the role, very well. Mme. Frederici sang and acted nicely as "Hedwig." Mme. Rotter's excellent, energetic manner made the part of "Jemmy" one of the most important of the opera, and her strong, resonant voice told with fine effect in the concerted pieces. The chorus and orchestra were good, and every real lover of music that was there confessed to have enjoyed a rare treat. Strange to say, the audience was not large, the Academy habitué apparently ignoring all operatic performances that do not take place in their own building.

GREAT REED ORGAN. Messrs. Mason and Hamlin are constantly adding to the attractiveness of their elegant warerooms, at 154 Tremont street, and one may pass a very agreeable hour or two in examining and admiring their superb Cabinet Organs, which have now attained such world-wide fame. The enterprising firm have just completed the largest reed Organ ever made, which is truly a magnificent instrument, whether we consider its tone, power, or the completeness of the entire work.

It consists of sixteen complete sets of reeds or vibrators, twenty-two stops, two manuals, and complete pedal key-board. The following detailed description of each will afford an idea of its compass, its peculiarities of tone, and the mechanical devices employed.

The stops are arranged as follows:

UPPER MANUAL.
Viol d'Amour,	Fifteenth,
Hautboy,	Vox Humana,
Flute.
LOWER MANUAL.
Diapason 16-ft.,	Cornet Anglais,
Diapason 8 ft.,	Bassoon,
Bourdon,	Euphone,
Gamba,	Principal.
PEDALS.
8-feet.	16-feet.	32-feet.
MECHANICAL STOPS.
Full Organ,	Pedal Coupler,
Tremulant,	Forte Upper Manual,
Manual Coupler,	Forte Lower Manual.

The compass of each manual is five octaves, each stop in the same comprising sixty-one vibrators, and having its own peculiar tone. Many of the above stops closely resemble those of the same nomenclature in pipe organs, and the variety and beauty of the combinations of which they are susceptible, is really surprising. The Viol d'Amour is an 8 ft. tone from CC to ce in alt. It is the softest in the organ, very smooth, and equals in effect the corresponding stop in a pipe organ. The Hautboy, as a solo stop, is of a very rich quality of tone, quite clear, and resembles the Italian Oboe. It is an 8-ft. tone. The Flute is a 4-ft. tone, from C to ce in alt. It has a silvery and flute-like quality, and is very fine, either as a solo stop, or combined with others. The Fifteenth draws a 2-ft. tone, from c to ccc in alt. It has the clear, shrill quality of the piccolo, and, when combined with an 8-ft. or 16-ft. stop, the effect is striking. It is rarely used as a solo stop, but is intended for effect in the full organ, or combination with one or more stops. The tongue of the smallest reed of this register is but 1-32 of an inch long. The Vox Humana is an 8-ft. tone from CC to ce in alt. Its effect is quite indescribable, designed, as its name indicates, to resemble the human voice.

The 16-ft. Diapason is a rich, sonorous tone, of great depth and power, giving body to the full organ, and is necessary as a foundation stop. It is a 16-ft. tone, from CCC to c in alt.

The Bourdon, also a 16-ft. tone, possesses the qualities of the preceding stop, with the exception of its having less of its depth and fullness, but like it, adds body and richness to combinations in which it is used.

The 8-ft. Diapason and Gamba are 8-ft. stops. The tone of each is quite sweet and mellow, possessing the rich, diapason quality so indispensable in all organs.

The Cornet Anglais and Bassoon answer for one set of reeds of 8-ft. tone, the latter drawing the lower octave and a half. This is the only set of reeds in the organ that is divided.

The Euphone is a remarkable stop, its tone being very peculiar, entirely different from that produced heretofore by any free reed. It is quite penetrating and crisp, though not sharp, and adds greatly to the brilliancy of the full organ. It is an 8-ft. tone. The Principal is a 4-ft. tone, an octave above the Diapason, and is mainly used in combination with other stops, to produce a sparkling effect.

The Pedal Key-board has a compass of twenty-seven notes, which is as complete as that of the largest pipe-organ. It operates three sets of reeds, 8-ft., 16-ft., and 32 ft. tone respectively. The lowest tone of the 32-ft. is CCCC.

The names of the mechanical stops clearly indicate their use, and require but a brief notice. The "Full-Organ" draws the complete power of the two manuals independent of the various stops. The "Tremulant" acts on the Cornet Anglais alone. The "Forte Upper Manual" and "Forte Lower Manual" are separate swells, one for each manual, while the two combined can be operated by the foot. Each stop works on the pneumatic principle, a new feature in reed instruments.

The case of this organ is an elaborate affair, richly ornamented with walnut carvings, and gilt pipes in front. It stands 12 ft. 3 in. high, is 6 ft. 9 in. wide, and 3 ft. 3 in. deep. An elegant carving representing the various instruments from which the stops are named surmounts the top, the whole presenting a very beautiful appearance.—N. Y. Mus. Gazette.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Let me come home, Father.	W. C. Baker.	40
Capable of great expression. Illustrated title.
Thou art lovelier than the blossoms.	Song.	S. Glover. 30
Tell me, darling, that you love me.	S'g & Cho.	35
Elaine's song, "Sweet is true love."	Song.	W. C. Hay. 40
Three very taking songs.
T curtain flutters to and fro.	Song.	Adrian. 30
O, what shall I do, dear.	"	Herreshoff. 35
Then you'll remember me.	Comic. Music from	"Bohemian Girl." 30
Of different styles, but all good.
Dreams of the West.	Song.	C. G. C. Collins. 30
A fine, hearty, Western song.
Queen of the Sea.	Cavatina.	"Black Crook." Jannotta. 35
Little Fanchon.	Song & Cho.	W. F. Wellman. 30
Two reminiscences of the stage, the last "suggesting" Maggie Mitchell.
Paddle your own canoe.	For Guitar.	Mack. 30
He's coming to me.	"	" 35
Fine melodies for guitarists.
Questions. (Frage.)	Song.	25
The Pilgrim's song.	"	Mendelssohn. 20
Harvest song.	"	" 30
German songs of solid merit.
Ave Maria.	Song.	R. Franz. 30
Along the far horizon.	"	" 30
Thou that art so pure and bright.	Op. 37.	" 30
Franz's songs are perfect mosaics of jewels, and better liked every day. In the third one, all the lines rhyme.
We miss thee from our cottage home.	Song.	M. B. Leavitt. 30
Excellent "home" song.
The children's King.	Song.	Gounod. 40
A child's ascription of praise. Peculiar and pretty.

Instrumental.

Dexter Waltz.	G. W. Turner.	30
Summer noon Waltz.	E. Mack.	40
Sprightly pieces, not difficult.
Maggie's Secret Waltz.	E. Mack.	35
Contains the melody of a favorite song.
Social hours.	4 hand pieces by	Bellak.
Blue Bird Polka Redowa.		35
Wearing of the Green.	Quickstep.	35
Jolly Dogs Polka.		35
Crispino Galop.		35
Four very pretty duets, well arranged for learners.
Nocturne. Op. 27.	Chopin. Nos. 1 and 2, each	40
One needs but to mention these to recommend them. The only trouble is that none but good players can master them completely.
Mirella Waltz.	Cooté.	75
A nice arrangement of opera airs. "Mirella" contains much sweet music.
Angelina Polka.	A. Jannotta.	40
Rough shod Polka.	W. H. Weed.	35
Not especially rough, after all. Bright melodies.
La Promesse.	Valse brillante.	T. O'Neal. 35
Really brilliant, and of medium difficulty.
Rocking Waves and Whispering Breezes.	Variations.	C. A. Moody. 50
A very graceful melody elegantly varied. This lady composer has been very successful.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 684.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 22, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 7.

For Dwight's Journal of Music

June Roses.

O roses rare, that year by year
Unfold your buds of tender hue,
You know not that you bring me near
To all my heart holds true.

Long ago a lady fair,
Gentle, sweet and unassuming,
Star among the maidens rare,
Set my soul to watch your blooming.

Spiders, weave your wizard spells;
Spirit odors, faint and fair;
Lilies, swing your silver bells;
Sing your sweetest, nightingale.

Moon and stars, O swifter move,
While I watch my roses growing,
Nearer, nearer bring my love
With your coming and your going.

O my white rose, so dear—so dear!
For whom my pulses come and go,
Close in my heart from year to year
Forever bud and blow!

June 5th, 1867.

Music in Vienna in the Year 1793.

Translated from Thayer's Life of Beethoven

(Concluded from page 42)

The music performed in private concerts embraced all kinds, from the Oratorio, the Opera, the Symphony, to piano-forte variations and the simple song. Such concerts during Beethoven's second winter in Vienna (if not, as some relate, during his first) were arranged by princes Lobkowitz, Liechnowsky, Lichtenstein, Esterhazy, Schwarzenberg, Amersperg, Kinsky, Trautmannsdorf and Sinsendorf; by Counts Appony, Browne, Ballassa, Franz and Johann Esterhazy, Czernin, Hoyos, Erdody, Fries, Strassaldo and Zichy; by the Countesses Hatzfeld and Thun; the barons Lang, Partenstein, van Swieten and von Kees; the Hofraths Meyer, Greiner, Paradise; by Fraulein Martinez, the banker Henikstein and others. Those among the best musicians and composers, too, whose circumstances allowed it, gave private concerts, in which they made themselves and their works known, and to which their colleagues were invited. O'Kelly, the Irish singer, who was the first Basilio in the "Marriage of Figaro," met Mozart for the first time in an assembly of this kind at Kozeluch's, where the then favorite composers Vanhall and Dittersdorf were also present.

Franz Joseph Max, prince Lobkowitz, was, at the time when Beethoven came to Vienna, a young man (born Dec. 7, 1772), and had just married a daughter of prince Schwarzenberg. He was a violin-player of considerable facility and such a devoted lover of music and the drama, that he squandered his whole income on them and in 20 years became completely bankrupt. Being just of Beethoven's supposed age he entered into extraordinarily intimate relations with him; occasionally they had disputes and differences with one another, as if born of equal rank.

The reigning prince Esterhazy was that Paul Anton, who after the death of his father (Feb. 25, 1790) broke up the musical establishment at Esterhazy and dismissed Joseph Haydn after 20 years of service. He died on the 22nd of January, 1794, and was succeeded by his son Nicolas, a young man, just five years older than Beethoven. Prince Nicolas inherited his grandfather's taste for music, engaged an orchestra again, and was soon known as one of the most zealous furtherers of Catholic Church music. The best composers of Vienna, Beethoven included, wrote Masses for the Chapel at Esterhazy, where they were performed with great splendor.

Count Johann Nepomuk Esterhazy, of the middle line at Frakno," was a man of 45 years; he played the oboe well, and, what redounds to his honor, he had been a true friend and protector of Mozart.

Of Count Franz Esterhazy, a man of 35 years, Schonfeld in his "Annals of Music" says: "This great friend of music gives in certain parts of the year very great and splendid Leahs, in which for the most part great and sublime works are performed, especially the Handel choruses, the Saculus of Emanuel Bach, the Stabat Mater of Pergolesi, and the like. These occasions always bring together a select company of the best virtuosos."

It was not the then reigning prince Joseph Kinsky (who died 1788, in his 48th year), who at a later period became a distinguished patron of Beethoven, but his son Ferdinand Joh. Nep., then a blooming boy of 11 years (born Dec. 4, 1781), upon whose youthful taste the power, beauty and novelty of the works of that master made a deep impression.

Prince Carl Liechnowsky, the scholar and friend of Mozart, had every Friday morning a Quartet performance in his house. Schuppanzigh, son of a professor at the Royal School and then a young man of 16 years (if the musical lexicons are to be trusted), played the first violin; Louis Sina, a pupil of Forster and also still a very young man, the second; Franz Weiss, (who on the 18th January 1793 completed his 15th year), the viola; and Anton Kraft, or his son Nicolas, a boy of 14 years (born Dec. 18, 1778), the violoncello. It was in fact a Quartet of boy virtuosos, of which Beethoven, who was some years older, could make what he pleased. The wife of the prince was Marie Christine (28 years old), one of the "three Graces," as George Forster calls the daughters of that Countess Thun, in whose house Mozart found such high appreciation and warm friendship, and whose noble qualities are so much praised by Burney, Reichardt and Forster. The princess, as well as her husband, belonged to the best dilettanti in piano playing.

Hofrath von Kees, vice president of the Court of Appeal of Lower Austria, was still alive. "He," says Gyrowetz, speaking of a somewhat earlier period, "was considered the first friend of music and first dilettante in Vienna, and gave social concerts twice a week in his house, where the first virtuosos who then chanced to be in Vienna, and the first composers, like Joseph Haydn, Mozart, Dittersdorf, Hoffmeister, Albrechtsberger, Giannovich, &c., were assembled; there Haydn's Symphonies were performed." In Haydn's letters to Madame Genzinger (Haydn in London, by Karajan), von Kees's name frequently occurs, the last time in a note of Aug. 4, 1792, in which the writer mentions that on that day he was to dine at the Hofrath's. This distinguished man left behind him at his death (in January, 1795) a very rich collection of music, consisting, according to the auction advertisement, of Symphonies, Concertos, Arias, Choruses, Church pieces, and whole Operas, which had been collected with great pains from various owners, or sought out for him by masters, and part of which were only to be found in his possession." The list of authors numbers in all 138 names, among which scarcely one of the important instrumental composers down to that time is wanting.

Gottfried, Baron van Swieten, son of the famous Dutch physician of Maria Theresa, "is to be regarded," says Schonfeld, "as a patriarch in music. His taste is purely for the grand and sublime. He has himself, many years ago, written 12 fine Symphonies, [as still as himself," said Joseph Haydn]. When he is present at an Leah, our half-connoisseurs never lose sight of him, trying to read from his looks (not intelligible enough perhaps to everybody) what sort of an opinion they should pass on what they have been hearing. He gives every year some very grand and splendid musical occasions, where only pieces by old masters are performed. He is especially fond of Handel's style, of whom he for the most part gives great choruses. At the last Christmas festival (1794) he gave such an Leah at prince von Pau's, where an Oratorio by this master was performed." Neukomm told Professor Jahn (Life of Mozart, III. 370), that in concerts, the moment that any whispering began, his Excellence, who used to sit in the front rows, stood up full length, turned with solemn dignity to the delinquent, measured him a long while with severe look and slowly sat himself down again. That always had the desired effect. Van Swieten had some peculiar ideas of composition: he had, for instance, a partiality for the imitation of the sounds of nature in music, and compelled Haydn to imitate the frogs in his Sonatas. Haydn himself confirms it, when he says: "This whole passage, regarded as an imitation of a frog, did not flow from my pen; I was forced to write down this French rubbish. With the whole orchestra this wretched thought soon disappears indeed, but as a piano-forte arrangement it cannot stand. I trust the reviewers will not deal too severely with it; I am an old man and cannot look that all through again." But at any rate van Swieten must have the glory of founding in Vienna the taste for Handel's Oratorios and Bach's organ and piano music, and thereby adding a new element to the music of that capital. The expenses which such oratorio performances involved, however, were not, as Schonfeld seems to intimate, disputed by him, but by a society, which had been called into life through him and of which he was permanent secretary. Among its members were princes Lichtenstein, Esterhazy, Schwarzenberg, Auersperg, Kinsky, Trautmannsdorf, Sinsendorf, Counts Czernin, Harrach, Erdödy and Fries; in their palaces as well as in van Swieten's house (next to the hotel zum Römischen Kaiser, then called "zu den drei Hacken," in the Renngasse), and sometimes in the great halls of the Imperial Library, the performances took place at midday before an audience of invited guests.

Fräulein Martinez, who occupies so prominent a place in Burney's description of his visit in Vienna, a pupil of Porpora, in whose music lessons, forty years before, the young Joseph Haydn was employed as accompanist, was still living in the Michaels-haus and gave musical parties every Saturday evening during the season.

"Herr Hofrath and Kammerzahlmeister von Meyer," says Schönfeld, is so distinguished an amateur of music, that everybody about him in the chancery is musical, and among the artists may be found even a Raphael and a Haasebka. It can easily be conceived therefore, that a great deal of music is made both here in the city and at his place in the country. His Imperial Majesty himself has been present at such entertainments."

These sketches will suffice to illustrate and confirm the remarks which have been made above about Vienna as the central point of instrumental music. We must now name some of the more important among the great number of composers in this branch of the art, whom Beethoven found there.

Of course HAYDN stood at the head. The next in rank, but at a wide remove, was Mozart's successor in the office of an Imperial chamber composer, LEOPOLD KOZELUCH, a Bohemian, then just 40 years old. Although now forgotten, and, as Beethoven expressed it, "misérable," he was at that time famous in Europe through his Quartets and his chamber music. How great his fame in England was, we shall see below.

A man of less celebrity with the multitude, but of solid talent, whose knowledge far exceeded that of Kozeluch, whom Beethoven prized in a high degree, calling him twenty years afterward his old teacher, was EMANUEL ALOYS FOERSTER, a Silesian, then 45 years old. His Quintets, Quartets and similar works were highly valued, but at that time known for the most part only in manuscript.

ANTON EBERL, five years older than Beethoven, a Viennese by birth, had in his sixteenth year composed two Operettas, which had been performed in the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, and one of which had won for the composer the applause of Gluck. He appears to have been a favorite of Mozart, and strove so hard to write in the style and spirit of this master that some of his works were printed by dishonorable publishers under Mozart's name and circulated through Europe. In 1798 he accompanied Mozart's widow and her sister, Madame Lange, on their journey through Europe, and won for himself in other cities the renown as a pianist and composer which he possessed in Vienna; His strength was instrumental composition, and we shall presently behold him, for a moment, as a Symphonist snatching the palm away from Beethoven!

JOHN VANHALL, whose name was so well known in Paris and London, that Burney 20 years before this sought him out in his attic chamber in a suburb of Vienna, was as inexhaustible as ever in production. Gerber in his older Lexicon (1792) says, that Breitkopf and Härtel at that time possessed 50 of his Symphonies in manuscript. His fecundity was like that of Haydn; his talent of such a kind that—all his works are now forgotten.

It would be useless to continue the list further. But one more fact, significant as to the musical taste and culture of the higher classes in the capital, may be added. During the winter 1792-3 there were 10 private theatres of amateur companies in operation there, of which the most important were in the houses of Edlen von Stockhammer, Kinsky, Sinsendorf, Strassaldo, and the bookseller Schrambl. Most of these companies produced Operas and Operettas.

Translations from Schumann.

(By M. E. von G. for the London Musical World.)

MEYERBEER AND MENDELSSOHN.

To-day I feel like a bold young warrior drawing his sword for the first time in a real quarrel! It seems as if this little Leipsic, where already some few great questions have already been discussed, were to be the umpire in music also, for it came to pass that the two most important compositions of our day have been performed here, probably for the first time in the world together—namely, Meyerbeer's Huguenots and Mendelssohn's St. Paul. On such a subject where can one begin or end? Of competition between them, or preference of the one to the other, there can be no question. Our readers know too well the tendency of these pages, and that when we speak of Mendelssohn we have no thought for Meyerbeer, so diametrically opposed are the paths of the two. They know also that to characterize the two it is only necessary to attribute to the one that which is wanting in the other—talent alone excepted, which they possess in common. It is enough to make one think there must be something wrong in one's upper story to see the success of Meyerbeer in our sound, musical Germany, and to hear people, otherwise estimable enough, and even musicians, who can take delight in the quiet triumphs of Mendelssohn and yet can say of this music—"There is something in it."

It was with my mind full of the lofty art of Schröder Devrient in Fidelio that I saw the Huguenots for the first time. Who so dull as not to rejoice in a new thing, and to know the pleasures of hope? Had not Ries written with his own hand that there was much in the Huguenots which might rank with Beethoven? And what said others? And what said I? Well, I fully agreed with Florestan when he clenched his fist at the stage, and let fall the words that "in the Crocifitto Meyerbeer might be reckoned a musician, but that since the Huguenots he has become a mere mountebank." It's impossible to express the disgust with which we were filled by the whole thing, though we always tried to overcome it—we were quite worn and wearied with the worry. And, although after hearing it oftener, many happier and more excusable things discovered themselves, yet my final judgment remains the same; and I must continue to say to those who venture to place the Huguenots by the side of Fidelio or the like music, even though far below it, that they know nothing of the matter, nothing, nothing! I should never think of attempting to convert them. That would be out of the question.

A witty writer has said that music is equally in its place in a church or a gambling house. Now, I am no Puritan, but is there any good Protestant who would not be shocked hearing his most precious hymn shouted out on the stage, or at seeing the bloodiest tragedy in the history of his faith degraded to a mountebank farce for the mere sake of getting cash and applause? In fact, the whole opera is revolting, from the overture with its ridiculous, common-place, mock sanctity, to the finale, after which we ought all to be burned alive on the spot!* After the Huguenots, nothing is left but to have executions of criminals, and exhibitions of loose women on the stage.

We have only to go through it all to see its drift. The first act is an orgy of dissolute men with (mark the charming taste!) one, and only one, woman, but veiled amongst them. The second act is another revel, but this time women bathing, and (for the sake of the Parisians) a man blindfold in the middle of them. The third act is a farrago of profligacy and religion; in the fourth the massacre is arranged, and in the fifth it takes place in a church. Debauchery, murder, and praying make up the whole of the Huguenots. It is vain to look for one permanently pure idea, or one true Christian emotion. Meyerbeer nails up the hearts of his characters for all the world to see, and says—"Look, there they are, pray come and handle them!" Throughout, all is artifice, outside show and hypocrisy.

And the heroes and heroines of the piece!—cell and St. Bris alone excepted, who are not sunk quite so low as the rest—what are they? First, there is Nevers, a thorough French libertine,* who makes love to Valentine, then jilts her, and at last marries her: then Valentine herself, in love with Raoul and marrying Nevers, swearing† to be true to the latter, and yet allowing herself to be betrothed to Raoul; next, Raoul, in love with Valentine, rejecting her, and making love to the Queen, and after all taking Valentine to wife; and lastly, the Queen herself, Queen of all these puppets! And people put up with all this just because it's pretty to look at and comes from Paris—though, surely, our modest German women won't look at it! And all the while the most knowing of composers rubs his hands for joy.

To describe the music itself no amount of books would be enough; every bar is overdone, and something might be said about each. To startle or tickle his hearers is Meyerbeer's highest aim, and with the mob he succeeds perfectly. As to the choral, which is interwoven into the opera, and about which the French are so mad, I declare that, if one of my pupils had brought me such counterpoint, I would have entreated him with all my might never to do it worse. Even the common-people are saying how deliberately stale, and studiously superficial it is, and how Marcel's continual roaring "Eine feste Burg," smells of the blacksmith's shop.

A great deal has been said about the "Benediction des poignards" in the fourth act. I grant that it has much dramatic power, some striking and spirited changes, and the chorus especially produces a great external effect; situation, scenery, and instrumentation all conspire, and, the horrible being Meyerbeer's element, he has written with real fire and love of his subject. But examine the melody from a musical point of view, and what is it but the "Marseillaise" a little dressed up? Again, what art is there in making an effect in such a situation with such means? I am not blaming the employment of all means in their proper places; but it is absurd to talk about a "grand effect" when a dozen trombones, trum-

* See the concluding lines of the opera—
Par le fer et l'incendie
Exterminons la race impie!
Frappons, poursuivons l'hérétique!
Dieu le veut, Dieu veut le sang,
Où! Dieu veut le sang!

* Words such as "Je ris du Dieu de l'univers" are mere trifles in the libretto.

† D'aujourd'hui tout mon sang est à vous, etc.

pets and ophicleids, and a hundred men's voices in unison are all doing their loudest close by. I must mention one truly Meyerbeerish piece of calculation. He knows the public too well not to be aware that too much noise at last becomes tiresome, and see how cleverly he counteracts it. Directly after every great crash he has whole arias accompanied by a single instrument, as much as to say—"See how much I can do with a little. Look, you Germans, look!" Unfortunately we cannot deny that he has some wit.

But we should never have time to go through it all in detail. Meyerbeer's very sensuous tendency, his extreme unoriginality and want of style, are as well known as his ability in dexterous arrangement, brilliant display in dramatic treatment and command of the orchestra, and great fertility in form. It is not difficult to point out in him Rossini, Mozart, Herold, Weber, Bellini, even Spohr,—in short every possible music. But his special property is that notorious, fatal, bleating, offensive rhythm, which runs through almost all the airs in this opera; I had begun to mark the pages where it occurred, but at last grew tired. However, that the piece contains better things and even occasional grand and lofty passages it would be mere spite to deny; Marcell's battle-song is effective, and the page's air is lovely; the greater part of the third act is interesting from its lively scenes among the people, so is the first part of the duet between Marcell and Valentine from its strong character, also the sextet, and the mocking chorus from its comic treatment: in the fourth act the "Benediction des poignards" has great individuality, and above all, the duet which follows it between Raoul and Valentine is admirably constructed, and abounds with ideas. But what do all these avail against the vulgarity, exaggeration, want of nature, immodesty, and un-in- modesty of the whole? Thank God, we have at last reached the limit, there can be nothing worse behind, unless the stage is turned into a gallows: and this terrible cry of a great talent tormented by the spirit of the time, awakes a hope that things will now mend.

II.

And now a few words on something nobler—a thing to bring a man into tune again with faith, and hope, and love of his kind—under the shadow of which, the weary soul may rest as under a palm-grove, and see the glowing landscape spread at his feet; I mean the St. Paul of Mendelssohn, a work of the greatest purity, the offspring of peace and love. It would be a mistake, besides being unfair to the composer, to compare it, even remotely, to the oratorios of Handel or Bach. They are alike just as much as all kinds of sacred music, all churches, all pictures of the Madonna are alike; but Bach and Handel had reached maturity when they began to write, whereas Mendelssohn was still a mere youth. The work of a young artist whose imagination is overflowing with graceful images, and to whom life and the future are still full of charm, cannot fairly be compared with a work of an earlier and severer period, by one of those divine masters who, from their seats among the stars, looked back over a long and hallowed life.

I have already spoken at length of the general treatment of the subject, of the adoption of the choral from the old oratorios, of the distribution of the choruses and solos among the actors and spectators, and of the characters of the several personages. It has been rightly remarked that the chief drawbacks to the general effect of the work are to be found in the first half; that the subordinate part of St. Stephen, if not absolutely throwing St. Paul into the background, diminishes his importance; that Saul is presented more in the character of a convert than of a convertor; also that the oratorio is too long and might with advantage be divided into two. A most inviting subject for the critics is the poetical manner in which the appearances of our Lord are treated (by a chorus of troubles and alms); but surely such speculations only spoil the idea, while it would be impossible to wound the composer's feelings more easily than in this, one of his most beautiful inspirations. To my mind nothing can be more appropriate than to represent God as speaking with many voices, and revealing His will through a choir of angels; just as in painting, His presence is indicated more poetically by cherubs hovering in the upper part of the picture than by the representation of an old man, or by the so-called sign of the Trinity, &c. Where the reality is unattainable, it is surely allowable to use the most beautiful symbol within reach. It has also been objected that some of the chorales in St. Paul lose their simple character by the ornaments with which Mendelssohn has adorned them. As if chorales were not just as well adapted to express joy and confidence as earnest supplication! as if there were not every difference between such a choral as "Sleepers, wake," and such another as "In deep distress;" or as if a work of art had no purpose to fulfil beyond those of a parish choir! Then, again, people wanted to make out that St. Paul was not even a "Protestant Oratorio," but only a "Concert Oratorio," which suggested to some wag the happy middle course of calling it "a Protestant-concert-Oratorio."

It is always possible to make objections, and even plausible ones, and the industry of the critics deserves every respect. But granting all that can be said, how much there is in the oratorio with which the most captious can find no fault! Besides its ruling spirit, the deeply religious feeling which pervades it, consider the masterly way in which, from a musical point of view, every situation is brought out, the uninterrupted flow of noble melody, the intimate connection of words and sounds, speech and music, so that the whole thing seems actually embodied before you; think of the grace which it breathes throughout, the admirable grouping of the characters, the endless variety of color in the instrumentation; realize its perfectly mature style and playful mastery over all forms of composition, and then say if there is any cause to be discontented.

I have only one thing to add. The music of St. Paul is, on an average, so easy to understand, so popular and so effective, that it almost seems as if the main idea of its composer throughout had been to interest the public. Now, noble as this aim undoubtedly is, it may, if indulged in, rob his future compositions of that power and inspiration which is found in the works of those who, regardless of either aim or limits, gave themselves up singly to their great subject. Lastly, it must not be forgotten that Beethoven wrote a Missa of Othello as well as a Missa Sabina; and bearing this in mind, we may well believe that as Mendelssohn the youth has written a fine oratorio, Mendelssohn the man will write another that shall be still nobler. Till then let us be content with what we have, and profit from it, and enjoy it.

* A prophecy since fulfilled in the Evangelist.

Fifty-Second Annual Meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society, Boston, May 27, 1867.

REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT, J. BAXTER

UPHAM, M.D.

Gentlemen, Members of the Handel and Haydn Society:

By the recent revision of the By-laws, it is now made the duty of the President of this society to present, at its annual meeting, a written report, giving an abstract of the doings of the society for the year, and offering any suggestions and recommendations which the occasion may seem to demand. In compliance with the letter and spirit of this requirement, I beg leave to submit the following:—

There have been nine regular meetings of the Government during the year, to attend to business, and to consult in various ways for the interests of the corporation. The society has been five times called together for the admission of members and the transaction of other business. At all these meetings a gratifying degree of unanimity and good feeling has prevailed. Thirty-one gentlemen have been admitted to membership during the year, eight have been discharged, and four resigned.

The rehearsals—thirty-two in number—were commenced in Bamstead Hall on the 30th day of September, and have continued weekly without interruption, and with the addition of the usual extra meetings for practice prior to a public performance, until Easter. These rehearsals have been, on the whole, more punctually and more fully attended than at any previous season within my recollection,—a certain and sure augury of good for the future.

Six public performances in the Music Hall have taken place, of which the following was the programme for the season, viz.:

Nov. 25.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul.

Dec. 23.—Handel's Messiah.

Feb. 17.—Handel's Jephtha.

Feb. 24.—Haydn's Creation.

April 20.—(Rossini's Sabaot Mater, and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise.

April 21.—Mendelssohn's Elijah.

These great works have been presented after much and careful preparation, with a liberal expenditure of means, under an experienced and accomplished conductor, in a manner worthy of the highest praise, and of which I do not hesitate to say would reflect honor upon any city in the world. They have been participated in by a chorus numbering now nearly five hundred efficient voices, an orchestra of fifty instruments, and with the accompaniment of an organ in the very first rank of excellence, under a master's hand. Among the solo artists, in addition to those resident with us, and whom we at all times honor and respect, a Paepa and a Phillips have delighted to lend their aid. The audiences have been commensurate with the occasions; they have been drawn, not alone from our own appreciative community, but largely also from distant towns and cities; and I am happy to add, as you have learned from your Treasurer's report, that, for once, the season has resulted in a satisfactory pecuniary success.

In the list of oratorios above given, it will be seen that an addition has been made to our yet too limited repertory. The Depth of Handel was performed by us, in the season now just passed, for the first time. It is to be hoped that in future our musical horizon will be extended, till all of the acknowledged master-works of Handel at least shall be comprised within its scope; and I think the time is not far distant when we may venture beyond, upon some of the great choral achievements of Sebastian Bach.

The library, as appears by the report of our excellent Librarian, is in good condition, and, notwithstanding some mysterious losses, which are greatly to be deplored, is still in the way of growth and improvement.

It may be proper to speak, in this connection, of a proposition which has more than once been mooted in the meetings of the government, and which I earnestly hope may soon be carried into effect. It is the preparation of the annals of the society for publication. Such a history would, I doubt not, be a most acceptable possession to all the present and past members of our venerable association, and would not be without interest to others who have at heart the welfare of the cause we are endeavoring to support and to advance. The time for such a work, if it is ever to be accomplished, ought not to be much longer delayed. Our earliest associates are rapidly passing away. All the original members are now dead. In a brief while, it will be impossible to find among the living any in whose memory lingers a picture of the early trials and struggles through which our now sturdy and vigorous manhood has been attained. I would recommend this subject, therefore, to the serious consideration of the future board.

Suffer from me now a few words of comment, bearing upon the present condition and future prospects of the society. It has been my custom in these reports both to praise and commend where commendation was just, and freely to point out any faults and defects that seemed to exist, with a view, if possible, to suggest their remedy. Such criticisms and comments have always been received in the same spirit of kindness and good-will with which they have been offered.

One of the crying evils upon which I have many times animadverted, is that of absenteeism at rehearsals. In this, as I have said, I have observed the past season a manifest change for the better. Still the fault exists, and is now as ever (I say it unhesitatingly) the chief obstacle in the way of our rapid advance towards a more perfect interpretation of the great works we have, for so many years, been endeavoring to understand and to appreciate.

I am aware of the difficulties which, in an association like ours, stands in the way of an absolute attendance, on the part of every member, upon the meetings required, during the seven or eight months of the year, for practice and rehearsal, nor are such delinquencies confined, by any means, to our body. They are recognized and felt in every association of the kind where the members voluntarily band themselves together for a kindred object. And, as a consequence, the most rigid rules have often been adopted, to anticipate and to obviate, if possible, the difficulty. The London Sacred Harmonic Society, for this reason, found it expedient to have printed and sent to every member a circular, from which I quote the following:—

"It is quite obvious" (say the Committee) "that the efficiency of the public performances must, in a great degree, depend upon the attention previously bestowed at the rehearsals; and that the reputation of the society and its claims for public support are liable to be materially affected by the neglect of those means which rehearsals alone afford, for acquiring a thorough knowledge of the music which is there practised, and a facility in executing it with becoming accuracy and expression. However much reason there may be for congratulation upon the general character of the society's performances, and for considering them as at least equal to any others of the same kind in this country, it cannot be denied that there is still room for further improvement, and that occasions do happen in which many of the peculiar features of a composition are not properly developed, through want of that regular and combined attention at rehearsals, which is absolutely essential to a correct and effective performance. The Committee feel it their imperative duty, not only to urge the importance of this subject upon the notice of the members and assistants, but to endeavor, also, to check the inconveniences which have resulted from a neglect of it." And the Committee, in commenting upon this appeal, say further, that "inasmuch as punctual attendance at rehearsals can alone secure efficiency of performance, they feel that they would not be acting up to their duty to the society, if they should hesitate to dispense with the assistance of any members who did not comply with such reasonable and essential requirements." And they subsequently went so far as to require their candidates for admission to pledge themselves beforehand to the conscientious observance of these obligations; this in a society similarly constituted with our own, but by some twenty years our junior,—a society, too, whose meetings for practice were, at that time, held on some evening in every week throughout the year.

I have hitherto felt an embarrassment in urging this subject upon the attention of members at our meetings, arising from the fact that those who most needed such admonition were the ones most likely to be then absent; and the same remark will apply at the present time. It might be well, therefore, if we were to imitate the example of our London associate in this respect, and send a similar appeal to every individual member of our society. Did we but insist with equal pertinacity upon such constant and punctual attendance at our evenings for practice, who knows to what a summit of excellence it might be possible for us to attain?

I have heretofore alluded to the disposition manifested on the part of some members to leave their places in the choir, at a public performance, before the end of the oratorio; and I am glad to be able to record a marked improvement in this respect, for the season just closed. I wish I could say as much for those on whom has devolved the duty of rendering the more prominent roles in our oratorios. Such indecorous haste in leaving the platform, as is sometimes seen on their part, ill comports with the dignity and sincerity of a true artist. Aside from the bad example it sets to the house, it cannot be looked upon with indifference by either the orchestra or chorus. It is to be hoped that, hereafter, in their engagements with artists of whatever standing or renown, the government will stipulate for their presence, at all events, till the close of the performance. Let me heartily commend you for better remembering your part of this duty. Be assured it is known and recognized by that appreciative few in every audience who would not willingly have the closing periods, which a great composer has patiently added to his immortal works, shorn of a single ray of their glory.

One or two more points of minor consideration, perhaps, but which are yet, in my estimation of sufficient importance to be mentioned here, and I have done with this part of my subject.

The number of our active and associate members—of those, I mean, who occasionally, at least, participate in the rehearsals and public performances of the society at the present time—is not far from six hundred. Counting, in addition, the names which are enrolled upon the Secretary's list, but who rarely appear at any of our meetings, the aggregate far exceeds this number. In such large masses, unless the utmost order and system is observed, there must needs be some hurrying and crowding in the formation of the choir at a public performance. Some instances of discomfort have arisen from this source, during the past season, which have come to my notice. It was, in part, to obviate difficulties of this nature, that, a few years since, the staff of Superintendents, so called, was organized, having charge of the several departments of the chorus. As our numbers increase, the duties of these gentlemen become more important and more arduous. It becomes a question, even now, whether it will not further subserve the comfort and convenience of every member of the chorus, if the plan of numbering the seats of the choir, in both the upper and lower halls, be adopted, so that each member shall henceforth occupy, at all times, at rehearsals and in public performances, his own appropriate place. This is the plan pursued in London, and elsewhere, in associations of similar extent with our own, and serves the double purpose of a more just and orderly disposition of the members in taking their seats, and in some sort registering their presence or absence whenever required.

And while upon the subject of the duties of superintendents, I would again suggest that they acquaint themselves with the name of every one belonging to the department under their especial charge, so as to be able to report the attendance or non-attendance of every member at the meetings of the society. A very little exercise of observation and memory will enable them to do this without difficulty.

I would call the attention of the examining committee to the fact that, in order to the proper balancing of the chorus, there is still room for a considerable increase among the tenors; while, at the same time, the other parts might be rendered more efficient by the judicious addition of a limited number of really good and telling voices.

I cannot forbear a word of commendation, in this place, upon the liberal policy adopted by the government, during the past season, in furnishing, at all our public performances, the fullest and best orchestral force at their command. For their ability to do this, we are largely indebted to the enterprise and liberality of the Harvard Musical Association, in the education of the orchestra, and the encouragement they have given to orchestral performances of the highest order, by their admirable series of symphony concerts, established within the last two years.

And we see good reason to hope, in the thorough musical education which is now being given to the pupils of our public schools, and the further opportunities for musical study and practice, in the conservatories which have lately sprung into being, that, for the future, our elements of growth, both choral and orchestral, will be abundantly increased.

A new edition of the Act of Incorporation and By-Laws of the society, containing the amendments recently adopted, together with such as may be added at the present or a future meeting, will soon be published, and placed in the hands of every member; and it is hoped that a more familiar acquaintance with the rules and regulations of our association, as thus set forth, will have its beneficial results.

It is a matter of congratulation for us, that, this year, the income from our special fund is left intact. An important consideration will be brought to your notice this evening, having reference to the prospective increase of the fund from the society's surplus receipts. I will not discuss this question in advance; but will venture the hope that a way may be found to add to the investment, from time to time, from the moneys not needed for the current operations of the year, with the belief that our example may, sooner or later, be followed by others outside our immediate circle.

In conclusion, I would call your attention to the fact that the coming year will furnish opportunity for the first in the regular series of triennial festivals, which, I believe, is to be the policy and purpose of the society to adopt—and of which the great festival of 1864, in commemoration of the birth of the second half-century of our existence, may, perhaps, with propriety, be considered the auspicious beginning. To that occasion we still look back with pride, as to a new starting-point in our own life, and an acknowledged era in the musical history of our country. I would advise that the main features of the programme should be early marked out and determined upon by the incoming Board, and the preliminary steps be taken in season to insure for it a success, artistically, at any rate, equal, if not superior to that of any former achievement. At the same time, I hope that the ordinary work of the year may not be materially interfered with, and that the regular concert season be not shorn of its goodly proportions, but that all things appertaining thereto be provided for, decently and in order, with unabated zeal and in its proper time.

With these words, gentlemen, again congratulating you upon the auspicious circumstances under which we have met together this evening, thanking you one and all for the part you have taken in the labors of the year now brought to a close, and with an earnest wish for your continued prosperity and success, I respectfully submit my report.

Music Abroad.

London.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. The Pall Mall Gazette prefaces its review of the season (to the 1st of June,) with a brief history of the old society, as follows:

The Philharmonic Society is now in its fifty-fifth year—the oldest existing musical institution of the kind in England. Its first concert was held in the late Argyll Rooms, in 1813. The origin of the society was very much like that of the Paris Société des Concerts at the Conservatoire. The best musicians clubbed together for the love of their art, moved principally by a desire to hear the symphonies and overtures of the great masters efficiently performed. It was agreed, in order to avert professional jealousies, that each concert should be conducted by a different professor. Conducting them was not what it is now. The conductor sat at the pianoforte, and occasionally played from the score of the work in hand. The duty of beating time devolved not upon him, but upon the leader, or first violin (chef d'attaque, as the French style it), and this was accomplished, of course, with his fiddle-stick. The baton was not then known. Here, then, were at once two absurdities—the fact of having two conductors, which was virtually the case, and the change both of leader and conductor at each successive concert. Nevertheless, the first union in a single body of the most expert orchestral players the country could boast produced so great effect that there was little inclination to pick holes in the general scheme. The concert of Monday, March 8, 1813, was a triumphant success. It began with Cherubini's Overture to Anacreon, included a string quartet, a serenade for wind instruments by Mozart, a chaccone by Jomelli, a march by Haydn, a string quintet by Bocherini, a vocal quartet by Sacchini, a chorus from Mozart's opera, Idomeneo, and symphonies by Beethoven (the first of the "Nine") and Haydn. So long a concert would not be tolerated now; but it put every one in raptures at the time, and the Philharmonic was established from that night. Its history since has often been told. There were eight concerts in the first season (Mr. Salomon—Haydn's Salomon—presided at the first); and, with the exception of a brief period, some few years ago, when the number of concerts were reduced to six, there have been eight annually ever since. There are eight now; and it is to be hoped there may be eight every year, so long as the Philharmonic Society (not long, many think) is destined to endure. It has done a world of good for music, although its influence has been exercised chiefly upon a limited circle of amateurs. But this very limited circle has exercised an influence outside; and so the time has come that the Philharmonic Society is rather a venerated institution than a necessity. It has got rid of its old habits; but, unfortunately, it has not maintained its position as the foremost society in England for the performance of orchestral music.

Spohr was among the first illustrious foreigners who animadverted upon the strange method of conducting adopted at the Philharmonic. In a letter, dated "London, 1821," he says:—"The manner of conducting at the theatres and concerts here is the most preposterous that can be imagined."—(Selbst-Biographie). And he was quite right. Spohr, however did much to improve the state of things; as did Weber after Spohr; and most of all, Mendelssohn after Weber. Experiments were successively tried with Herr Moscheles and the late Sir Henry Bi-hop, each of whom in turn was appointed conductor of a series of concerts; but neither answered the purpose. The Gordian knot was ultimately severed by Mr. Costa, who accepted the post of Philharmonic conductor in 1846, and held it from that year till 1854—when, for reasons that they have never made public, he resigned it. Mr. Costa was succeeded, in 1855, by Herr Richard Wagner, the Musician of the "Zukunft," the prime favorite of his Majesty of Bavaria, and one of the greatest musical charlatans that ever existed. All Mr. Costa had done for the Philharmonic orchestra was undone by Herr Wagner, who conducted the symphonies of Beethoven without book, and had "readings" of his own which no one else could understand. One season of Wagner was enough; a second would have virtually swamped the Philharmonic, and that distinguished adventurer was not re-engaged. The place was now offered to, and accepted by, Mr. Sterndale Bennett, afterwards Professor Sterndale Bennett (Cambridge Professor of Music), and subsequently Dr. Sterndale Bennett. Professor Bennett held the position for eleven years, brought the Philharmonic back to its old state of discipline (which had been sadly disturbed by Herr Wagner), and when deprived of the flower of his orchestra through an imperious edict of Mr. Gye—who just then, having instituted his Monday performances at the Royal Italian Opera, would no longer concede the privilege accorded time out of mind to these classical concerts no matter by what manager of no matter what institution—made a new orchestra for himself, which is at present, it can hardly be denied, a formidable rival to the old one.

Professor Bennett held the baton of the Philharmonic for eleven years—till the end of the season 1866, in short—and then resigned it. Why Mr. W. G. Cousins should have been appointed to fill the place left vacant by so eminent a man it is impossible for any one uninitiated in the arena of the Philharmonic to guess. Had the question of choice been put to those of the outside world who take an interest in the proceedings of the society, it is more than probable that the name of Mr. Cousins would not have occurred to a single person. Mr. Costa out of the arena, there was the late Mr. Alfred Mellon; there were also Mr. Benedict, Mr. Halle, Signor Arditì; and last, not least, Mr. Manns, of the Crystal Palace, under whose direction the finest orchestral performances in England, if not in Europe, are to be heard. But the Philharmonic directors selected Mr. Cousins. . . Unless Mr. Cousins turns out to be another Mendelssohn, or at least another Mellon, as conductor, this step will be likely to hurry, rather than to arrest, the catastrophe which so many believe to be impending. One would have thought that the best chance of averting it lay in the appointment of a first-rate conductor on the retirement of Dr. Bennett. This chance, however, the directors have thrown away.

What we have said is by no means, be it understood, intended in disparagement of Mr. Cousins. He may turn out—who knows?—as good a conductor as any we have named. He is known in the musical world as a thorough musician, accomplished in many ways; and all who wish well to the society will hope that he may prove equal to the responsible task he has undertaken. Five concerts have been given; but it will require as many seasons to show whether Mr. Cousins is absolutely the right man in the right place. He has to go through the principal symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Spohr, and to persuade the subscribers not only that he is well acquainted with them, but that he is able, with one rehearsal (all that the Philharmonic laws provide for), to ensure a sufficient performance of whatever happens to be set down for him by the directors. Up to the present moment the new conductor may be congratulated on a far success. Symphonies by four of the masters just named have been played, as well as one by Schumann (in D minor), for the most part, vigorously enough, but without a shadow of refinement. Among these symphonies was the No. 9 of Beethoven, the Choral Symphony, a more generally satisfactory performance of which has certainly been heard. At the same time it is only just to state that the fifth concert (on Monday week) exhibited a marked improvement. As this was a good average specimen of the entertainment to which for more than half a century the Philharmonic Society has accustomed its subscribers, what remains to be said may as well apply to it as to any of its predecessors. The programme comprised the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, and the two movements (Allegro moderato and Andante con moto) from Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. The symphony of Beethoven was given in a manner less open to criticism than any other work of the kind that has been heard at the Philharmonic Concerts this season; parts, indeed, were admirably played. Still better, in some respects, were the movements from Schubert's symphony—a work which, had it been happily completed in the same strain, would indubitably have ranked among the masterpieces of instrumental music. The Allegro was taken too slow, and the Andante too fast; but beyond this we have not one objection to offer. The chiar' oscuro of orchestral performance seems now be confined exclusively to the Crystal Palace, where, not long since, under Herr Manns, these delicious fragments of Schubert were first introduced to an English public. At the same time we have not lately heard so near an approach to it at the Philharmonic Concerts, which, when chiar' oscuro was not dreamt of, were regarded in England as the ne plus ultra. For this we have to thank Mr. Cousins. There were two concertos at the fifth concert. The first, the driest if not the least ingenious, of all concertos—that in D for violoncello, composed by Herr Molique expressly for Signor Piatti—was played by Herr Grützmacher (violinist to the "King" of Saxony) in such a manner as could have left no doubt in the minds of his hearers that Signor Piatti was the greatest violinist in the world. Herr Grützmacher is clever, beyond a question; but he is not a Piatti—far from it. The other concerto was the very familiar No. 1 (in G minor) of Mendelssohn, which has seldom been dashed off with easier assurance, and as seldom with less absolute refinement, than by Herr Alfred Jaell, one of those pianists from abroad of whom it would not be very difficult to find a more or less favorable specimen in almost any considerable German town as far as the uttermost frontier of "Fætoland" may now be presumed to extend. Herr Jaell played the first movement best. The Andante was heavy in touch and exaggerated in expression. The Finale was begun with great fire and brilliancy, but towards the end became so much too quick that Abbé Liszt himself would have failed to make the passages distinct; and Abbé Liszt's fingers are even more lissom than the fingers of Herr Jaell. The vocal music was contributed by Mlle. Sinico, Mme. Demerle-Lablache, and Mr. Tom Holber. Mme. Lablache sang "Vedrai carino" a minor third too low. The effect of such a transposition, from bright to sombre, may be imagined. Mr. Holber gave "La mia Letizia" (I Lombardi) in the lachrymose manner to which he has accustomed us at Her Majesty's Theatre; and Mlle. Sinico received a well-merited encore for her animated and charming delivery of the "polacca" in the second act of Der Freischütz. About the lengthy duet from La Gazza Lupa, it is charitable, at least, to say nothing.

The concert terminated with a very fine performance of Cherubini's brilliant overture to Luciano—a prodigy in its day, and a pleasant thing to listen to even now.

The Times says:—

Mr. W. G. Cousins, the new conductor, shows progress at each successive performance, and may fairly be said to have established his position.

At the sixth concert (on Monday next), besides Mozart's Jupiter symphony, Beethoven's No. 8 (in F), and the overture to Otello, the programme contains a new MS. overture called Mormon, composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society by Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, and Mr. Benedict's new pianoforte concerto in E flat, to be played by Mme. Arabella Goddard. The singers are Mlle. Ubrich, Mme. Trebelli Bettini, and Signor Gardoni.

MR. CHARLES HALLE has resumed his Pianoforte Recitals at St. James's Hall, in London. This time Beethoven does not exclusively absorb the programmes, though at every Recital, as a matter of course, the name of the greatest of all composers for the piano, as for the orchestra and string quartet, will appear at least once or twice. A most interesting feature in the plan of the series just commenced is the introduction of one of Schubert's solo Sonatas at each Recital. As Schumann wrote ten grand Sonatas, besides the so-called "Fantaisie Sonata," op. 78, which is finer, perhaps, than any of them, it may be presumed that Mr. Halle intends to introduce on certain occasions two, instead of only one of these original and captivating works. Another distinguishing and attractive trait is that at each Recital there will be given one of the Sonatas for pianoforte and violoncello of Beethoven, or one of those by Mendelssohn. But, as Beethoven composed only five such Sonatas, and Mendelssohn only two, we may presume that at the eighth Recital Mr. Halle will favor his hearers with the air and variations in D of Mendelssohn, or at any rate with one of the three airs with variations, for the same combination of instruments, which Beethoven has left. Either will be good. No surer proof of Mr. Halle's intention to render the execution of these duet Sonatas as perfect as possible could be adduced than the fact of his having engaged as his co-operator, during the eight Recitals, the incomparable violinist, Signor Piatti. The programme of the first Recital was extremely attractive. There was a Sonata of Beethoven, No. 3, op. 10 (in D), which Mr. Halle has frequently played at the Monday Popular Concerts. This was followed by three numbers from John Sebastian Bach's renowned "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues," in all the keys, major and minor—known to Germany as "Das wohltemperirte Clavier" (The well-tempered Clavier), and in its way the most precious gift bequeathed to the art of music. The specimen of Schubert was the Sonata in A minor, one of those which Robert Schumann pronounced "glorious," published as No. 1, though by no means "No. 1" in order of composition, seeing that it was written in 1825, three years before Schubert died (in his 32d year!). This Sonata is original and beautiful from the opening to the termination; but, if one movement could be singled out from the rest as indubitably Schubert's own, it is the second—a lovely air with variations, which, though no one variation resembles another, are each as lovely as the air itself. The violoncello Sonata of Beethoven, included in this programme, was naturally the first of the five—No. 1, op. 5 (in F), composed in 1797, when Beethoven was 27 years old, for the celebrated French violinist, Dupont, and dedicated to King Frederick William II., grandfather of the present King of Prussia. The last piece in the programme was a Polonaise in E flat, by Herr Stephen Heller, a composer about whom Schumann prognosticated favorably some thirty years ago. There were no songs at this Recital. At his second Mr. Halle gave, among other things, another Sonata by Schubert (in D, from the same set); the delicious Sonata in F major, of Mozart (No. 3, beginning in three-four time, and consisting of three movements); and the second of Beethoven's violoncello Sonatas—op. 3, in G minor.—Times.

THE OPERA. This season has hitherto been as bare of novelty as the patronage given to musical entertainments generally has been deficient in pecuniary results. A severe depression influences the world of entertainment; everything is as flat as it well can be. The scarceness of money resulting from the financial calamities of last year is doubtless the reason of this; but be the cause what it may, the complaint of managers at the badness of the times is general. At neither opera house have we novelty to chronicle: the production of "Don Carlos" is expected next week at Covent Garden, and some amount of interest derivable from the new work may possibly increase the attendance, which has hitherto been poor. This week we have had the return of Mlle. Patti, after an indisposition of a week. She reappeared in the "Bambino," and sang with her usual brilliancy, which has lost nothing from her late illness. Nothing important has occurred: "Faust," "Norma," and "Tra Davido," continuing the stock pieces. On Thursday, an extra night, "Don Giovanni" was given with the following cast:—Donna Anna, Mlle. Frizzi; Donna Elvira, Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington; Zerlina, Mlle. Adelina Patti; Don Giovanni, Signor Cotogni; Leporello, Signor Ciampi; and Don Ottavio, Signor Mario. At Her Majesty's Theatre "P. Torato" has been performed, and on Saturday "Otello," is to be done; Sir Ham, Signor Mongini; Otello, Signor Gardoni; Scherzino, Mr. Santley; Padavan, Signor Gassler; L'Faro, Signor Bossi; Entina, Mme. Trebelli Bettini; Puck, Mme. Demerle-Lablache; Mormon, Mlle. Baumeister; and Rozza, Mlle. Titius.—Orch. June 1.

Paris

The Commission for organizing the Historical Concerts at the Universal Exposition, have judged it useful to initiate the public into the history of musical art, from the thirteenth to the end of the eighteenth century, in the various departments of religious music, opera, symphony, chamber music, and that of the dance. With this view they have decreed at the outset, that the pieces destined to figure in the programmes of the historical concerts shall be principally chosen from the works of the following authors:

- 15th Century. Josquin Desprès.
- 16th Century. Nicolas Gombert.—Clemens, non papa.—Jennequin.—Roland de Lassus (Orlando Lasso).—Palestrina.
- 17th Century. Cavalli.—Monteverde.—Carissimi.—Legranzi.—A. Scarlatti.—Lulli.—Lalande.
- 18th Century. Keiser.—Campra.—Marcello.—Rameau.—Handel.—J. S. Bach.—Vinci.—Leo.—Galuppi.—Pergolèse.—Gluck.—Philidor.—Piccini.—Monsigny.—Haydn.—Sacchini.—Bocherini.—Paisiello.—Grétry.—Cimarosa.—Viotti.—Dalayrac.—Mozart.—Méhul.

These concerts are to begin in June, and will comprise twelve sessions. Six of them will be devoted, under the form of concerts, to the hearing of the most important works in all kinds. These concerts will embrace the musical periods, century by century, from the end of the 15th to the 19th exclusive. Six others will be given to the most genuine works of religious music, of the liturgical drama, the opera, popular music, chamber and dance music, and may, if necessary, take the form of musical and literary conferences. These pieces will go back to the 13th and come down to the present century, as follows:

Vocal Section. Chants for two and three voices; Christmas Chants, Chorals, Lieder, French and Spanish songs; melodies with or without accompaniment of lutes, violas, &c.; religious and dramatic music.

Instrumental Section. Dance Music: Pavanes, Sarabandes, Gignés, Gavottes, Minnets.—Chamber Music: Pieces for the clavichord, Duos, Trios, Quatuors, and all the compositions commonly classed under this category.

The Committee consists of MM. Fétis, President; Delsarte, V. President; Felix Clément, Gevaert, Reyser, Vervoitte, Weckerlin and Léon Gastinel, Secretary.

Meanwhile the great Exposition rings, and Paris and all Europe rings, and all America, with the Piano-forte rivalry, in which our American exhibitors, the Chickering and the Steinways, appear to be ahead; but which ahead of which it doth not yet appear, so point-blank contradictory are the newspaper reports; nor will it probably appear before the first of July, when we hope to announce our Boston manufacturers the winners. At all events the Chickering pianos have won fame and admiration there such as is worth many golden medals. Of course the music played there on these noble instruments is seldom of the noblest kind; the atmosphere of an Exhibition, with its competitive crowd, is about as favorable to true Art as a race course or a ring. It is the flash pianists who do the execution upon such occasions,—human extensions of the instrument, they might be called,—and not (for the most part) artists, in the high, human sense, who have music in their souls and want an instrument to express it. The great end here is, not to make music, but to display the instrument and make it famous; which is done quite as much by blowing as by playing with the fingers.

The first of the Conservatoire Concerts, specially arranged on the occasion of the Exposition, took place on the 2nd June, and consisted of: Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Chorus from "Castor et Pollux," by Rameau; portions of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; a Motet by Bach for double chorus, unaccompanied; and Weber's Oberon overture.

A bust of Liszt, modelled recently in Rome by our esteemed Boston sculptor, Thomas Ball, and placed in the midst of the Chickering pianos at the Exhibition, was uncovered there with musical ceremonies, in the presence of an admiring crowd.

FANNY TACCHINARDI PERSIANI. This great singer is dead, one of the last of the vocalists; not to be compared with the Garcia sisters in point of fire and fervor, neither with Sontag and Cinti-Damoreau in charm. She was plain as a woman, insignificant as an actress, yet one of those who vindicate and recommend their art in spite of Nature. Her age is given in the Gazette Musicale as forty-nine. She might have been fancied older, but she can never have looked young. Her voice (to condense a character offered in a recent book on opera-matters) was an acute soprano mounting to E flat altissimo, acrid and piercing rather than sweet, penetrating rather than full, and always liable to rise in pitch; one, too, which never willingly blended with other voices. Her father, Tacchinardi the tenor, knew every secret of his art, and the most, if not the all, that he knew, he imparted to his daughter. Her voice was developed to its utmost capacities. Every fibre of her frame seemed to have a part in her singing. There was nothing left out, nothing kept back. She was never careless, never unfinished, always sedulous, sometimes to the edge of strain, occasionally in the employment of her vast and varied resources rising to an animation which amounted to that display of conscious power which is resistless. The perfection with which she wrought up certain songs, such as the "Sonnambula" finale, or the mad scene in "Lucia," has been very rarely approached. She had the finest possible sense of accent. She had taste, extraordinary variety and facility in ornament, and always managed to throw some expression into her embroideries and flourishes. Her first appearance, if the notice of M. Fétis be correct, was at Leghorn in 1832. She crossed the Alps and appeared in Paris in 1837, and in 1838 came to London as the other prima donna to Mme. Grisi. For many years she alternated duty with that lady, till compelled to leave the stage by loss of voice.—Athenæum, May 11.

All the historical violins seem coming into the market. On Tuesday, Messrs. Puttick & Simpson had to dispose of, among other noticeable instruments, the Amati, given by King George the Fourth to M. François Cramer,—Mr. Goding's Guarnerius violin, christened by Paganini "the Giant,"—another Guarnerius, which belonged successively to Tartini, Paganini and Dragonetti (no mean pedigree this!),—another Guarnerius, described as Mori's favorite instrument,—a fine old tenor (known as the Digby tenor. Is it wise on the part of those desirous of getting their real value for these costly instruments, to allow so many of them to come into the market at the same moment?

DRESDEN.—Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto has been revived with great success. The Committee of the Tonkünstlerverein has published its report of the doings of the Society from April, 1866, to Easter, 1867. The report is highly gratifying. At the four public performances, no less than nine very important works were performed by the members for the first time: "Sonata for Piano and Violin" (Op. 35), Kiel; a "Concerto Grosso," Handel; a Symphony, Wilhelm Friedrich Bach; "Suite in Canon form," J. Otto Grimm; "Ciaccone for Violin and Piano-forte," Vitali (arranged by Herr David); Sonata, Rust (1795); Concerto for two Violins, Handel; Quintet, Hoffmann; and Suite for Violoncello Solo, Bach. Besides the above four performances there were seventeen meetings for practice. The total number of works performed were 61, 33 being performed for the first time. Including 15 honorary and 9 foreign members, the Society numbers 164 ordinary, and 76 extraordinary members.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 22, 1867.

"Individual Speculation."—The New York Festival.

Music to-day, in every country more or less, especially in ours, is in constant danger of falling into the hands of the Philistines. Trade is the reigning interest of this century, the real master behind all governments and all religions; and Money, Fortune, is its God. Art was hitherto held sacred; in Art one could be disinterested, could work from pure and generous motives; the artist at least is a freeman, we supposed. But no; the shrewd eye of the tradesman, seeing that Art, that Music has attractions for the crowd, that money can be made by it, forthwith presents himself, unmusical, unartistlike, all worldly as he is, and undertakes to "run" this fine "machine" as he would any other, upon speculation, for his own ends, not for ends of Art. If he can seduce artists to sing or play chiefly such things, in such ways, amid such surroundings, as shall pay him best, of course he will do it, and it lies in his policy to pay them so well that their artist conscience shall soon learn to wink at what would once have shocked them.

Art has its business side, like everything else. The artist often needs his man of business, as he may need a housekeeper, a steward or a coachman. Public musical performances, concerts, oratorios, festivals, require business management, financial economy, much running about, and outside preparation. But it is a question of vital consequence to the very existence and idea of Art, whether the artist or the business man be principal; whether Art employ business, or business employ Art. The end, the passion of all Art is Beauty, the Ideal, the Divine in form or language, the end of Art performances is to present the Ideal to the world, to inspire the love of it in the hearts of the people, to lift men out of their fatal commonplace and teach them the perennial joys of the Imagination. The end of the impresario and the professional concert manager and speculator is no such thing. He is glad to borrow whatever halo of the ideal and the sacred there may be, in the vague popular regard, about art and artists; of course he counts this into his capital; but the end for which he would use them is anything but sacred or ideal; little recks he what sort of music he gets up, whether he give negro minstrelsy or Jenny Lind, whether the opera be by Balfé or Mozart, provided it will bring most money into the house; and the nearer he can tempt the Diva towards the minstrel level in her programmes, thus trading at once upon two opposite elements, the low taste of the many and the ideal halo which surrounds a great artistic name, with the more glee does he rub his hands and chuckle. No doubt artists sometimes fail of due recognition or success, in their unworldliness, trusting solely to their own merits and good programmes; and when the bland, seductive "agent" comes along and tells them what a great mistake they make, that Art for Art's sake "never pays," they lend a willing ear and commit their cause entirely to his management, finding that this means "success," and that by reconciling their consciences to all his arts of trumpeting, inflated advertising, procured puffs, his cunning ways of getting up an excitement wholly out of proportion to the occasion, they actually make money. To a certain extent this may be well, and they may owe him a fair debt of gratitude. But here comes in the danger. The manager, or impresario, is commonly a person who makes success, outward success, the all in all; the artist soon finds that the manager, the speculator, and not himself, is virtually the maker of the programmes; that only so much of his art is called for as will help to keep up this "success"; and that the easiest way to do it is to repeat hacknied things, lower his taste and striving to the popular demand, study mere "effect," for which trickery is often more available than true art, and how to entrap applause at any rate by any sort of clap-trap.

We must confess we deprecate this tendency to let the control of musical matters pass more and more into the hands of speculating managers. These carry too much stir and bustle with them for the calm and true enjoyment of music. They raise too much wind; the spirit of Art is of too modest and sincere a character to bear the excitement of their always "grand" occasions. Art loves quiet occasions, wholesome, temperate excitements, and hates false display. But business, using art and artists for its ends, will hear of nothing quiet, nothing not on an outwardly grand scale and dazzling to the crowd; it trades upon factitious enthusiasms, fevers. It matters not how many great names are strung together in an announcement; how many famous artists, even worthy of their fame, are put into a concert; if the spirit in which it is given be not an artistic one, it will be a bad concert. Good artists there may be and good pieces by good masters; but the cloven foot of the unbelieving business Mephisto will peep out somewhere, and betray the unreality of the whole affair; perhaps a piece of irrelevant virtuosity worked in here; or some stale sentiment sandwiched between two good things there, so as to spoil the savor of them both; perhaps merely the false way in which things good in themselves, that is, good in their places, are put together, a forced jumble showing no singleness of purpose, but a desire to be all things to all men; perhaps a pervading egotism, the interpreter claiming more notice than the author; perhaps more affectation than sincerity in the homage paid to noble authors in the selection; and then the traps set for cueores, to be used, when caught, as advertisements!

All these things, too often present as exceptions in concerts planned for Art's sake mainly, are always present, are the rule, in what we may call managers', or business, concerts. The sincerity of Art is sacrificed; the tone of an artist is sooner or later lowered, his artistic principle tacitly foresworn, his faith in the Ideal damped, or benumbed into indifference; the very fibre of his nature, once so fine, grows coarser, after he has joined one of these concert-giving caravanseries, which travel up and down the land, "doing a splendid business," led by the wand of some great managerial magician. They help their artists ("their artists!") to get rich; they draw crowds of people into concert rooms who otherwise would never stir for music—such is their plea; and there is some truth in it. But do they try on the whole to raise the taste for music? do they encourage, strengthen the purer aspirations of the artist? Do quiet, pure artistic enterprises, concerts given with disinterested aim by institutions, or by uncompromising artists, flourish better in the fields where they have been and—not sown, but reaped? To the artists, under these auspices, their very successes are demoralizing: (noble exceptions only prove the rule) how must it be then with the easily seduced and ignorant public? Your Barnum, Ulmann, Bateman, makes of music a fashion and a fever for the moment, and would fain, like Joshua, have the sun stand still, that he may longer reap the golden harvest: the next who follows in his footsteps finds it harder work, and must resort to means and proclamations still more extraordinary; and so through this succession of brave speculators, each out-vying the last, music, in its public manifestations, gets to be nothing if not extraordinary, like rope-dancing and jugglery. Call you that a proper school of Art? Is that the way a nation is to get its musical education?

Nor is the inroad of the speculator limited to musical performances; he takes hold also of the work of musical education, perceiving that so many have a wish to learn, and to learn easily and cheaply. And forthwith he proceeds to organize and engineer it on a "big scale," after the tendency of trade; great music schools are started; more "Conservatories" (so-called) have sprung up in New York and Boston within a year or two, than have grown to consequence in Europe in as many centuries; nothing quiet, modest, small will answer; we must do a big business; and, as in business every big dealer cannot be content with moderate prosperity, but must still strive to swallow up all rivals, so in the matter of music schools we see the same entrepreneurs establishing their branches and their name in many cities far apart, as if greedy to monopolize this sort of jobbing for the whole vast country. We do not wish to prejudge experiments or motives; we wait to see what time will bring forth. The fruits will be of mixed character; they cannot be all evil; but we cannot help mistrusting educational movements in which the business element is so particularly prominent. At least it becomes one to be cautious, and before praising, wait till he can satisfy himself whether it is education as the end employing business as a means, or whether it is business for its own private ends exploiting education.

But we have been drawn further into this discussion than we intended; and it would take several papers to treat it upon all sides fairly, and make all the qualifications and exceptions, and those disavowals of personal imputations, which we hope will be understood. Having, in our last, used the phrase "individual speculation" in brief allusion to Mr. Harrison's Great Musical Festival of the first week of this month in New York, we felt bound to explain our meaning, and to give reasons why, without (of course) impugning the character or motives, or questioning the musical enthusiasm of a gentleman whom we never knew, we were led to mistrust the pompous announcements of the said Festival, partly because they were pompous; partly because the style in which the press (musical and daily) proclaimed the thing as the first attempt at a real Festival in America, pleasing to ignore the fact that two have been held in Boston, of greater magnitude and with something nearer to artistic purity of programme; and still more because it was, at any rate purported to be, purely the enterprise and in the interest of an individual concert manager or impresario; so that the fair inference was, that the whole thing was undertaken primarily in the interests of business, and only incidentally in the interests of Art. We have since learned, that while Mr. Harrison generously risked his capital, the idea itself, the artistic conception had sprung up before that in the brain and heart of Mr. Ritter, the accomplished, earnest musician who conducted all the Oratorios, in his capacity as conductor of the Harmonic Society, and who contributed a couple of large compositions of his own to the occasion. It was doubtless generous in the man of means and business experience to help the man of ideas to realize them; but none the less do we consider the example dangerous,—the more so in proportion to its (outward) success. If great Festivals of Art, whole weeks of Oratorio and Symphony, are to pass into the hands of speculators, and to be exploited, traded upon for private purposes, like other concerts, operas and shows, who shall undertake to reconcile the conflicting claims of Art and business? If these things are to be managed by men who only seek success, and who are as glad to get it in the mere name of Art, as by the fact of Art, what guaranty will there be of high, sincere artistic character in programme or performance?

As to the New York Festival, all accounts agree that it was a great financial success; Steinway Hall was crowded night and morning for a week. As to the artistic success reports differ greatly. Certain it is that careful and repeated counting of the chorus, in Elijah, made out not over 170 voices, and in the orchestra but 50 instruments (In the Boston Festival of 1864 the chorus numbered 500, sometimes more, and the orchestra exceeded 100). There was but one concert with grand Symphony (the Trova); here we had three; while the several miscellaneous concerts or matinees were of too medley and commonplace an order to distinguish them from ordinary Bateman, Calmore or McGilgenen concerts. Many speak in high praise of the conducting of Mr. Ritter, and one critic loudly asserts (claiming the credit of adviser, teacher, for himself!) that for the first time the tempi of the Messiah were rightly taken; while others found the times so absurdly slow that the great choruses seemed scarcely to acquire momentum. But as we did not hear, it is not for us to judge. We have no doubt there was a great deal of sincere enjoyment of great music, and that Mr. Ritter and Mr. Harrison, and the artists (Mme. Rosa, Mme. Ritter, &c.) who assisted them with zeal, have done a real service in inspiring New York audiences with a respect and love for noble oratorios which they hardly knew before.

We should be glad to get trustworthy and more intelligible estimates of Mr. Ritter's compositions. The press, as usual, is non committal. He is an artistic character, a man laboring for Art in earnest. Whether he have creative genius we need not be in haste to judge. His efforts are entitled to respect. From several good private sources we have heard his Overture, "Othello," pronounced original and strong; while his "Forty-sixth Psalm" seems to have called forth more timid compliments. It is called "scholastic," "musician-like," "according to rule," a "very creditable effort," and all that. We fain would, but we dare not, print a letter from an admirer which we have received about these two works, because after much plausible, intelligent praise, the writer even seems to put the Ritter Psalm upon a level with the Lobossang of Mendelssohn, which followed it. We will quote what he says, however, of the "Othello" overture:

"It is a worthy composition, well conceived, and carefully and artistically wrought out. There are fine dramatic points in it and an orchestration modern and very effective. The introduction is interesting. Almost recitative-like it begins, engrossing your attention from the first, until it brings in the two leading motives. They are in fine contrast. While the first is a nucleus, mighty and strong, the second is an exposition, exceedingly lovely and tender. These are interwoven, growing in the working of that vehement passion, higher and higher, and more and more intense, until that fearful climax is reached, the deed is done. Nothing is left—a close, sombre, deep and hallow (?) brings the work to its end.

"True to its prototype, the whole work grows naturally, develops itself in logical consistency, in unity and with vigor."

On the whole, we are inclined to put more faith in a correspondent who wishes we had heard the "Othello" overture, calls it a noble work and is proud of it, but thinks the Psalm, "although solid, pleasing and effective, less original, and more like a work of Brahms, or Raff, or others of that ilk."

PROVIDENCE, R. I., JUNE 13.—During the past season the Messiah has been brought out once, and the Creation twice by a large and very effective chorus and an orchestra of twenty five performers, which in the two performances of the Creation was increased by reinforcements from your city to the number of thirty eight. The choruses were rendered in a manner creditable to the singers and their Conductor, and showed unmistakably that although our city has hitherto been behind her neighbors in musical culture, she is by no means destitute of native talent, which if properly directed and developed will soon give her an equal position among her sisters as a fosterer of the Art.

The solos were well sustained by Misses Houston and Ryan, and Messrs. Hazelwood, Guilmette and Whitney. These Oratorios have been given under the direction of Mr. Eben Tompée, Director of the Providence Conservatory of Music, which gentleman has also given us a series of classical Chamber concerts, in which the favorite Mendelssohn Quintette Club have borne a very important part, assisted by Messrs. Lang, Perabo, Petersilea and Goldbeck as Pianists; and Misses Smith, Barton, Ryan, and Mr. Hazelwood as vocalists. Among the many good things given at these concerts were the Quartet in A, No. 6, op. 18; the Quintet in C, op. 29, and the Sonata in F sharp major, op. 78, by Beethoven; the Quintet for piano and strings in E flat, op. 41; and the Quartet in A, No. 3, op. 41, by R. Schumann; the Quintet in G minor, by Mozart; Piano Trio in D minor, op. 47, by Mendelssohn, and the Grand Septet in D minor by Hummel.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 685.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 8.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Lake of the Lilies.

At the shadowy heart of the ancient forest
A jewel-like lakelet lies concealed,
Deep, pellucid, azure, tremulous,
Clear to the smile of the sky revealed
As the splendid eye of a fair enchantress
Flashes willy through tangled hair,
So this lakelet, from leafy tresses,
Bright with wonderful light doth glare.
And under the coolness of sylvan shadow,
Its marge with lilies is sprinkled o'er;
Fairy flotillas, slow rocking at anchor,
Perfect pearls on a sapphire floor.

Blossoms pure and pale?

Water elves are they!

Lilies on the lake,

Floating day by day;

But when shades grow long,

Moved by magic change,

Each becomes an elf,

Sweet, and fair, and strange.

Wave-dewed woman forms,

From the lake they glide,

Springing each to each,

Clinging side by side;

Through the long moonrays,

In and out they play,

Elfin pelting elf

With the sparkling spray;

Cloudlike, on the wind

Floating, laughing low,

Whorling round and round,

Light as drifts of snow.

Though by day they lie

Rooted and resigned

Unto each cuprice

Of the wave or wind

All the warm night long,

Rounds of waw and grace,

Undulations wild,

Airy paths they trace,

Not low-bending corn,

Grass-grown, wind-blown leas,

Arrowy flight of bird,

Spring of chamois free,

Not the wave that swells

Over ocean's breast,

Not the cloud that floats

Down the sunset west,

Not the white-sailed bark,

Flocking summer seas,

Willow boughs that rock

In a wanton breeze,—

Nothing moves on earth

With so wild a grace,

As those dancing forms;

Lovely water-flys!

Naught so perfect-fair,

Save in dreams, we see;

Charmed motion rare,

Sweet as melody!

When o'er the glimmering lake of the lilies

The silver lamp of the moon grows pale,

Slowly, slowly, the gray mist gathers,

And folds the elves in a shadowy veil

And when, in the warmth of the morning sunlight,

Vapor floats from the lake away,

Fringing its margin, the water-lilies

Dreamily, placidly, softly sway;

Censets brimming with exquisite incense,

Cool, and dewy, and spotless white;

Fresh and blooming as innocent children,

Newly awakened from slummers light.

FANNY RAYMOND RITTER

Quartet Playing.

THE QUARTETS OF THE BROTHERS MUELLER AND THE FLORENTINES.

[We translate the following article, by LOUIS KOEHLER, from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik Leipzig, May 31, 1867.]

The so-called Florentine Quartet of Messrs.
JEAN BECKER, MASI, CHIOSTRI and HILPERT

just now attracts the most intense interest of the musical world, and in social circles occasions lively controversies in comparison with the Quartets of the older and the younger Brothers MUELLER. * * * *

JEAN BECKER is a native of Mannheim and is settled with his family at Strassburg. HILPERT, a Nuremberger and pupil of the Leipzig Conservatory, was living as a violoncellist in Zurich, when, at the instigation of Becker, who was then in Florence, he removed to that city; here Becker has found suitable Quartet comrades in Signor Masi, a violinist from the Roman territory, and Signor Chiostri, a violinist of Florence. Thus of two Italians and two Germans in Florence was formed the Quartet which is named after that city: Becker and Masi the two violins, Chiostri the viola, and Hilpert the violoncello.

Becker, the founder, a world-renowned concert violinist of the noblest culture, remained still the soul of the Quartet. The two Italians stood somewhat remote from the German Quartet literature: the ripe Beethoven, Schumann, were rather foreign to them, and the later Beethoven for a long time wholly unintelligible. If Hilpert was at first incomparably beyond them, yet he too first received through Becker the key to the understanding, conception and mode of treatment of Beethoven's last as well as of Schumann's Quartets. I give these data as I remember them from oral communications.

And here we will introduce some remarks about the Brothers MUELLER, which may also serve comparatively for other Quartets of importance which performed in public in their time, and to which certainly belongs a share of the merit of furthering the art of Quartet playing.

The older Brothers Mueller were four sons of one pair of parents in Brunswick. I know this positively, for I, myself a Brunswicker, still knew the grey-haired father (the musician Egidius Mueller) of the four older brothers; and with me the whole city knew, that they were "actual" brothers. This fact has been doubted, and there has been talk of a "supposititious brother."

The younger brothers, again, are all four sons of one couple. The father, Concertmeister Carl Mueller, was first violinist of the older Quartet. That this is equally true, and that here too there exists no supposititious brother, "cousin" or what not (as has been variously asserted), I know with not less certainty: for, as a youth of sixteen (who now, after 30 years, remembers that time with pleasure) I was in and out at Concertmeister Mueller's, and, in the Quartet practice of the boys Bernhard (now viola player) and Carl (now first violin of the younger Quartet), their excellent teacher, the violinist Kamm-musikus Mewes, used to employ me to help out the affair at the tenor or the second violin desk, while he himself officiated as violoncellist. The other brothers, Hugo (now second violinist) and Wilhelm (now violoncellist of the younger Quartet) were still very little fellows, who "played" to be sure, but had as yet no seat or part in the Quartet. At any rate all the famous Muellers are genuine blood relations.

This little genealogy was necessary here, not only to authenticate historically the family of the eight illustrious "fellows,"* but also as a text for a few artistic observations.

We may call the older brothers the fathers of the more modern Quartet playing. The most interior, thorough culture of every part (voice), in accordance with the spirit of the whole, such as is only possible through perfect uniformity of a sound technique, made the players brothers in an artistic sense also; a harmonious understanding blended them into a perfect unity, amounting to a sort of individuality.

The older brothers had much to find out for themselves, in regard to the conception and rendering of the Beethoven Quartets, from op. 59 onward, which were still but little practised or understood at their time; of models they had really none; they were their own original. The latest Beethoven Quartets they had to try to fathom in their own way; for Schumann they had no inward affinity. In those Beethoven Quartets, those revelations of the locked up inner world of a personality, which can now be regarded as the vital centre, the germ of a future which he already ruled ideally beforehand—in those Quartets the older brothers gave the keynote of the common mood and understanding; the technical realization of the idea was to them a difficult labor, brilliantly successful to be sure, but still evermore a "labor." They had done enough, and more than merely satisfied the best demand of their time. It is easy to perceive now, how the younger Brothers Mueller could study fine Quartet-playing, attain to an intellectual, deep conception, and strive after the ideal, since they were constant listeners to the older four. The style of rendering the earlier and middle Beethoven had entered, unconsciously, into their very flesh and blood; here, as well as in the Haydn and Mozart Quartets, they were perfectly receptive. But both in the Schumann and in the later Beethoven Quartets there was in reserve for them much work of their own in the way of living themselves into and reproducing those compositions; they mastered Schumann in the course of time, and continued to enter more and more deeply into the spirit of Beethoven; with wonderful art they disclosed the moody secrets (partly discovered by themselves) of works so long looked upon as riddles. They had to a good degree increased the collective Art-capital of the older brothers, had discovered new territory and successfully improved it.

In coming back now to the Florentines, we have first of all to consider Herr BECKER, as the representative of the Quartet.

What the eight Muellers had disseminated in their wide travels, what they had directly or indirectly introduced into wider string Quartet circles, thus establishing a common understanding and indeed a settled normal style, was for Becker an element already found. He had essentially nothing to think out and to fathom for the first time; his problem only was: how to dispose of the inheritance in the sense of his own individuality. He did this, as only a genial virtuoso can, who, in the possession of a not only perfectly formed, but even a peculiar technique, is able to reproduce something received so that it shall come out fresh and in a certain sense his own.

* Goethe said, that his countrymen, instead of disputing whether he or Schiller were the greatest, ought to rejoice in having two "such fellows."

Becker sets mere euphony, or beauty of sound, very high; he agrees therein with the principle handed down by the Italian school, which, we know, cultivates the charm of sensuous effect even beyond the utmost limits. Thus Becker was a proper magnet for his two Italians. Hilpert, for a German, seems in point of sonority to have assimilated well with his colleagues; here and there, to be sure, he has to hold back with his stronger strokes,—and yet the violoncello, even with its greater strength, is just the instrument to harmonize with softer sounding Quartet voices: indeed the Bass is for the most part the supporting ground, the firm foot for the rest, and even in obbligato playing it has always voices above itself.

Now if the Florentine Quartet, in its quality of sound, has decidedly the paramount and purposely cultivated character of the tender, the lovely—not however to the entire exclusion of the powerful: we must characterize the tone of the Mueller brothers Quartet, with all its beauty, rather as a nervous one; they cultivate beauty of sound as such less, than they direct their aim to characteristic expression. The Florentines are never inclined to sacrifice aught of tone-beauty to characteristic expression; sharp outline, strong contrasts are not the point with them. The Muellers on the contrary go boldly right into the matter, and make it a point to express hard, rugged, downright passionate parts with a corresponding mode of bowing, taking no especial thought of the fine sensuous effect.

With the Florentines, a sensuous beauty of form, a soft and tender kind of tone, is the material in which they clothe the thought, according to their personal feeling of truth; with the Muellers on the contrary, a firmer tone-material and characteristic delineation are the prominent peculiarity. Moreover the Muellers are the creators of the modern Quartet playing, whereas the Florentines are the receivers and continuators. Accordingly the two modes of playing are related to one another somewhat as the masculine and the feminine. The hard (major) energy there, and the soft (minor) tenderness here, are characteristic fundamental moods, proceeding from which, however, each of the groups draws to itself the peculiarities of the other. To pursue the comparison yet further, one might say, for example: the Muellers and the Florentines stand contrasted to each other like Schumann and Mendelssohn, like Beethoven and Schubert, like Joachim and Jean Becker, and so on,—but, be it borne in mind again, only in respect to their intrinsic natural disposition, apart from other more external peculiarities. Shall we mention these? Well then, to Becker we must attribute unconditionally a peculiar power of specific violin virtuosity; the first violinists of both the Mueller Quartets, formerly excellent solo players, have fallen off in that, while they have given themselves up almost exclusively to Quartet culture. You remark, so far as virtuosity is concerned, in the exceedingly fine and easy execution of so many technical difficulties on Becker's part a plus, which however is easily missed.—A comparison of the other players, the second violin of the Muellers with that of the Florentines, &c., would lead into small details in the weighing of opposite peculiarities. We may sum it all up in the remark, that with the Mueller Quartet, the nature of the men, their deep and earnest absorption into the very heart and vital meaning of the works, is an original and positive power; while, on the contrary, the Florentine Quartet has received into itself this already fathomed meaning and so is free for more convenient handling of the form.

This last remark I would apply especially to the later Quartets of Beethoven, in the rendering of which the Florentines excel in a peculiar manner. They play them as easily as Haydn's music. As the Florentines render them, a hearer who is at all musical finds no difficulty in understanding the meaning, entering into the mood, or seeing through the intricate complexities of form. With them the playing of these works is indeed play; whereas in the rendering of the Muellers, with all the high enjoyment, we always feel the earnestness of an original reproduction of the difficult music; we the hearers, in a certain sense, help in this reproduction—we have a harder time of it, but we also feel ourselves more deeply interested. The Muellers belonged to those whom we cannot highly enough honor, who had at first hand to find a true blending of substance and form, a true deciphering of just what Beethoven meant, and to realize it to the ear. The technical exercise of playing together with a beautiful precision, immensely as it weighs in the scale, was rather a mere external, secondary thing with them, compared with bringing out the spirit and poetic meaning. But the Florentines, after such genial pioneering in this last respect, found their chief difficulty in just the technical practice, moderated however by the fact, that their first violinist could play over every phrase to the uninitiated ones with the most beautiful and masterly understanding. Yet in spite of that, the Florentines, in point of execution, have had more peculiar difficulties than the Muellers; for the latter from their youth up had been imbued with the spirit of German, and especially of German Quartet, music, while the Italians (as members of an Opera orchestra) stood at a distance from it.

Here then is the place where I must shake hands, in spirit, with Signors Masi and Chiostrì, those good honorable men, in the name of German musicianship, with admiring recognition and with joy over the German sympathies of their true artist nature. What must not these gentlemen have lived through, inwardly, during the gradual mastering of that most difficult of tasks—to render beautifully clear to others that which was unknown, unintelligible to themselves! For of all nations the Italians, compared with the French for example, stand the farthest away from German music, and especially from the difficult music of Schumann and the last period of Beethoven! In fact it did cost Signors Masi and Chiostrì a long, long time to feel themselves at home in the Schumann and especially the latter Beethoven Quartets; they were au fait of all the other Quartet works and had been making successful concert tours in Switzerland for months long, during which time the later Beethoven Quartets, particularly those in A minor and C-sharp minor, were still not quite ripe for performance and were continually studied together even at the rate of six hours in a day. What a pure love for Art, what a deep-rooted tendency to the Ideal, Jean Becker must have had, to educate his friends up to that seldom reached height at which they now stand! He, properly, has made the Florentine Quartet, whereas the Mueller Quartets made themselves. Composed of men of different lands and different tendencies in Art, and therefore more universal and sympathetic in its style, the Florentine Quartet has decidedly a cosmopolitan character—in contrast to the brothers Mueller, who are of right old German, national nature, and who accordingly (as representatives of all the Quartet clubs of the Germanic stock) had given the tone in the most German of all Art.

We fancy we have indulged in as much comparison as our theme requires. And what is the result? How far does it serve to answer the question put in many ways: "Which party play the best, the Muellers or the Florentines?" In the first place I think, that they both must play, otherwise there would be something essential wanting. Each has something different, and each delights us. Which is the finer: a beautiful, ideal man, or a beautiful, ideal woman? Apollo, or Diana? Whichever of the two statues you may see (leaving sexual sympathy out of the account), that is the most beautiful; and if you see them both together you would not willingly miss either!

So it is also with our Quartets. It would afford an exquisite satisfaction to hear the Florentines and the Muellers play a Quartet piece by piece alternately. And if there could be added still a third set purely Italian, as the Quartet of Messrs. Chevillard-Maurice is specifically French, then we should have before us, in visible and audible sequence, the whole logical historical development of the Quartet-playing art, as it naturally sprang from German stock and grew perforce up to this cosmopolitan summit.

So here I close my observations, heartily greeting all my dear Quartet friends!

Translations from Schumann.

(By M. E. von G. for the London Musical World.)

CONCERTOS FOR THE PIANOFORTE.—Pianoforte music fills an important place in the modern history of the art, for in that branch the dawnings of a new musical era first appeared. The most remarkable musical talent of the day is to be found among piano-forte players; a fact which has been noticed of former times also. Bach and Handel, Mozart and Beethoven, grew up at the piano, and, like the sculptors who first model their statues in miniature in soft clay, they must often have sketched at the piano what they afterwards worked out in full for the orchestra. Since that time the instrument itself has attained great perfection. With the ever increasing mechanical tendencies of pianoforte playing, and with the tremendous impulse which Beethoven gave to this branch of composition, the instrument has also grown in compass and importance, and when it comes to have pedals added to it like the organ, which I believe it will, new prospects will open for composers, they will gradually free themselves from the support of the orchestra, and thus acquire greater independence, and more fullness and richness of tone. This separation from the orchestra has for some time been impending; in defiance of the symphony, modern pianoforte music intends to make its way by its own resources alone; and this may be the reason why so few pianoforte concertos and, in fact, so few original compositions with accompaniment have appeared lately. The Zeitschrift has since its commencement noticed almost all the pianoforte concertos; and in the past six years they scarcely amount to sixteen or seventeen, a small number compared to what they formerly were. Times change, and what was once considered an addition to the forms of instrumentation, as a great discovery, is now set aside without hesitation. It would certainly be a great loss if the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra were to fall into disuse; but on the other hand, we can scarcely contradict pianoforte players when they say that they do not need external help, and that their instrument produces its most complete effect alone. And so we must rest content till some genius shall discover a new and splendid way of combining the orchestra with the piano, so that the player may disclose all the riches of his instrument and his art, whilst at the same time the orchestra may not act as a mere spectator, but may enrich the scene with its various characters. One thing, however, we may fairly ask of our young composers—that if they abandon the solid, dignified form of the concerto, they should give us in exchange pieces equally solid and dignified; no caprices, or variations, but thoroughly finished and characteristic allegros, such as, at any rate, might serve for the opening of a concerto.

Till they do this we shall often have to resort to those older compositions which are so perfectly adapted at once for opening a concert, and for testing to the utmost the abilities of the player; such as the splendid concertos of Mozart and Beethoven, or, to admit into the select circle another great name still too little honored, one of Sebastian Bach's, or, to bring forward something new, some of those in which the footsteps of Beethoven have been happily and ably followed.

Amongst these latter we would place with due restriction two concertos which have lately appeared by J. Moscheles, and F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Both composers have so often been spoken of in the Zeitschrift, that they need no further introduction. In Moscheles we have the rare example of a musician who, though advanced in life and incessantly occupied with the study of the old masters, has taken note of each novelty as it appeared, and profited by the progress of events. His own innate peculiarities act as a check upon these influences, and thus, from a combination of the old, the new, and the individual, proceeds a work such as this concerto, clear and sharp in its outlines, approaching the romantic school in character, and yet original, and the very reflection of its author. Putting aside such fine distinctions, the concerto betrays its master at every turn; but everything has its time of blossom, and he is no longer the same as when he wrote the G-minor Concerto, though still the industrious, eminent artist, sparing no pains to make his work equal to the best. At the very outset he renounces all claims to popularity: the concerto is styled "Pathetic"—and is so; but what is that to ninety-nine among a hundred virtuosos? Its difference in form from other concertos and Moscheles' own earlier ones will strike everybody at once. The first movement never flags for a moment, the "tuttis" are shorter than usual, but the pianoforte is accompanied by the orchestra almost throughout. The second movement, with its slower interludes, seems to me rather labored; it is followed by the last movement which is of the same pathetic character as the first, but more passionate. In comparison to other new concertos this is not difficult of execution; the passages are carefully elaborated, but a little practice will enable even moderately good players to master them; when played with the orchestra the greatest attention is necessary on both sides, and an intimate knowledge of the score; such a performance, by displaying its artistic construction, will make the work interesting in the highest degree—as we remember with pleasure when we heard Moscheles play it at Leipsic.

The modern concerto writers deserve a special vote of thanks for not wearying us with finales made up of shakes and arpeggios. The old cadenza which formerly gave so much scope for the bravura of the player rests on a far sounder idea, and might still perhaps be made use of with success. And why should not the scherso, so familiar to us in the symphony and sonata, be used with effect in the concerto. It might introduce a sort of contest between the different solo instruments in the orchestra, at the same time that the form of the whole would undergo a slight change. No one could do this better than Mendelssohn, of whose second concerto we have now to speak.

Here, as everywhere, he is always the same, moving along with his own joyous step, and the sweetest smile in the world on his lips. The players will find it hard to display their wonderful powers of execution here; he gives them scarcely anything to do that they have not already done a hundred times before. It is their favorite complaint,—and to a certain extent they are right. The opportunity for allowing the player to display his powers in new and brilliant passages should not be lost sight of in concertos. But music should go before everything else, and the highest praise is due to one who always gives us this so richly. Music is the expression of a lovely nature; no matter whether it is expressed before hundreds or in the stillness of solitude, so long as it is indeed the utterance of a lovely nature. This is why Mendelssohn's compositions have such an irresistible effect when he plays them himself; the fingers might just as well be concealed, for they are only instruments by which the sounds are carried to the ear and thence make their appeal to the heart. It often seems to me that Mozart must have played like him. But though Mendelssohn deserves the praise that he always gives such music, we must not therefore deny that some of his works are slighter and less serious than others. This concerto belongs to that class, and I am much mistaken if it was not written in a few days, perhaps a few hours: just as when one shakes a tree, the ripe, sweet fruit at once drops off. People will ask in what relation it stands to his first concerto. It is like, and yet unlike; like, because written by a finished master; unlike, because written ten years later. Here and there, Sebastian Bach peeps out in the harmonies, but the melody, the form, and the instrumentation are all Mendelssohn's own. This joyous inspiration, though slight, is sure to please. It puts me in mind of those works which the older masters used to throw off when resting after their more serious creations. But our young composer must not forget how these old masters would then suddenly come forward with some splendid production,—of which we have full proof in Mozart's D-minor and Beethoven's G-major concertos.

Pygmalion's Statue.

O that story of the statue!

Statue, shaped with art so rare
That your sculptor gazing at you
Loved in spite of the despair,
Till sweet Art took Nature's breath,
Lent you life, and gave you death!

While he sighed, "Ah, fond beginner,
If indeed your hands wrought well,
Beauty should catch life within her,
Bird like break its ivory shell!"
One more touch—her breast behold!
Tremulous in the garment's fold.

But while fear and rapture mingled,
And the swift surprise of seeing
How those shuddering pulses trembled
With the first faint flush of being,

Out he bursts with sudden cry—
"She will change, grow old, and die!"

So to gain her was to lose her,
So to quicken was to kill—
Love sleeps heart-enshrined; but, use her,
She will wake to perish still.
Yet would I—who would not?—choose
So to gain and so to lose.

—Spectator.

J. R.

Verdi's "Don Carlos" in London.

It would not be easy to name more than two composers of distinction who have essentially changed their manner of thinking during their lives of labor. Gluck was one; Beethoven another, though less so than has been imagined. The fire and audacity and feeling for beauty which held out to the last—however in his later works obscured and shut up—were as clearly to be traced in his early pianoforte Trio in C minor, and throughout the second Sonata in A major of the first set of three Sonatas, as in his "Missa Solennis" or "Choral Symphony." At all events, if Gluck and Beethoven changed, Signor Verdi has not. He is more careful in his instrumentation than when he began—more ambitious in combination; but a certain original harshness and coarseness of nature remains, at variance with every principal of the fatal gift of beauty which adorns Italian Art, even when taking its sublimest forms, as in Dante's Divine Comedy and Michael Angelo's Sistine ceiling. That he has tried for truth in expression we concede, but it has been on stults; and truth often comes the most truly to those who are simple at heart, and will not (so to say) knit their brows and exaggerate their voices, whether that which requires display demands the expression of simple emotion or deep passion. To have resort to comparison, he is among Italian opera composers what Nat Lee was among English dramatists.

And this is illustrated in no small degree by his preference of the frenzied, the morbid, or the melancholy, in his choice of subjects. Look at the list of his operas, above a score in number; and, "Il Finto Stanislao" excepted, a work which died and made no sign, there is hardly a pretext of gaiety, beyond that of the courtesans' revel, in the first act of "La Traviata"—a hectic, vulgar piece of business at best. The artist who prefers to deal with battle, murder, sudden death, torture, tyranny, conspiracy, intrigue, gloomy grandeur, and hypocrisy, thereby exhibits the web and woof of his own predilections. Shakespeare could write "Lear," but could he not also write "The Comedy of Errors" and "As You Like It"? Handel could set Milton's "L'Allegro" as well as the immortal "Messiah"; Rossini the last act of "Otello" as well as his "Barbiere" (joyous as the beams of a fountain sparkling in the sun); but Signor Verdi has never been able to get beyond, in music, the style of "Tamburlaine."

Of this the published score of "Don Carlos" gives new proof, if proof were wanted. There was a certain vulgar dash in Signor Verdi's earlier operas—as in "I Lombardi," "Ernani," "Nabucco"—which carried the town, under the idea that a "second Daniel" was "come to judgment." But the young blood which moved this has apparently chilled; and what we have in its place (to judge from its writer's late operas) is a pretence to accomplishments which he has not yet thoroughly acquired, not relieved by that coarse, spontaneous crudity, or by those occasional glimpses of a more delicate spirit, which, in a period of great, yet not unprecedented decadence (opera having always had its ebbs and flows), seduced the play-going public into the conviction that another great composer had risen above the horizon. There has been no transformation of Signor Verdi's humor—merely a change from one to another form of it: nothing in any respect analogous to what was done by Rossini when, after being the most Italian of opera composers, he wrote his Swiss "Guillaume Tell" for the Grand Opera of Paris.

We may return to "Don Carlos" and follow the score (Paris, Esenlier), number by number, in illustration of what has been here said, and of our judgment now to be expressed, that it is a stale, dismal, and inflated work, as compared with "Ernani," "La Traviata," and "Il Trovatore" (Signor Verdi's best opera).

In performance the opera proved dull and noisy. It was on the whole well executed, thanks to Mr. Costa's care. Mlle. Lucie did not look the part of the Queen, but she sang the music exceedingly well. Signori Naudin and Graziani performed their graceless parts fairly well, but both are wanting in charm. M. Petit was suffering from hoarseness, but got through his work like an artist. The mise-en-scène was magnificent throughout, and a special call was raised for Mr. Harris, after the noisy and coarse finale to the third act. The whole of the first act was cut out, also the ballet and several other portions; but, as matters stand, the performance lasted until half past twelve. The couplets were awarded to Mlle. Frizzi in the "Canzone del Velo," to the Trio, "Trema per te, falso, figliuolo," and again to Mlle. Frizzi, in the Aria "O mia regina."—London Athenæum.

Boston Music Hall.

At the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders, June 12, the President, Dr. Upham, read the following Report:

Gentlemen,—Stockholders of the Boston Music Hall Association:—

I have thought proper, on this occasion, to depart from my usual reticence and to present to you, in writing, a brief Report, in which I shall endeavor, as concisely as possible, to pass in review some of the main incidents and facts in the history of the Association.

The Act of Incorporation of the "Boston Musical Hall Association," as it was somewhat quaintly styled in the original document which emanated from the State House, bears date May 2nd, 1851. This Act or Charter was accepted by the Stockholders at a regular meeting called for the purpose, on the 12th of June of the same year. Early in the Autumn work upon the building was commenced by the laying of its foundations, so deep and so broad and massive as to excite ridicule in some quarters, and in others a half-expressed doubt that its projectors would never live to see their work completed.

But in a little more than a year from the time of breaking ground, the structure was finished and ready for occupancy;—and, on the evening of the 20th November, 1852, it was formerly opened with appropriate ceremonies, to public use, at a total cost of $152,992.47. Since then some important additions and alterations have been made; some vexed questions as to the right of way and occupancy of the various passageways to the Hall have been settled; a covered corridor has been constructed from Tremont St., along what was formerly known as Bumstead Place; a permanent frame work of iron, adapted for a canvas covering, has been thrown over the entrance from Winter St., and suitable lanterns affixed at the outlets of both these passage ways.

In its interior, alterations have also been made from time to time. Gas pendants have been affixed to the balconies; the platform of the stage has been enlarged and strengthened, while the opposite end of the Hall has been materially changed by the taking away of the curtain wall in rear of the deep gallery, sinking the floor of this gallery, and supporting the balcony above by suitable iron columns, corresponding with those which uphold the structure below. Two choral stages, of amphitheatrical form, have been constructed at a large expense, and in such manner as to allow of their being put up and taken down and stowed away at pleasure. The largest of these will accommodate with comfort and safety the great choir of 1,200 pupils on the occasion of the Annual Festival of the Public School in July. Proper stagings for the stowage of these structures are made to depend from the ceiling in the cellar beneath the Hall. Moreover, machinery, with gearing work, has been put into the cellar to be used as occasion requires, in hoisting and lowering the seats:—all which additions and improvements have, from time to time, been carried in to the account of the current expenses of the Hall.

The Organ, with the necessary preparations for its reception, and the motive power in the cellar, stands charged at the present time with a cost of very nearly $60,000, of which sum $12,042.67 was obtained from outside contributions, the balance from our own funds.

I need only refer in a word to the gifts which have, from time to time, been made to us by our friends. The earliest contribution of this kind was made by Jonathan Phillips, who presented to the Association the sum of $1,000. This was placed to the credit of the Organ Fund, the nucleus of which, as you are aware, was formed from the net proceeds of the Opening Concert in November, 1852. The clock in the gallery opposite, was presented by our fellow citizen, Mr. Leeds. The beautiful cast of Apollo in yonder niche has, through the exertions of Mr. Edward N. Perkins, been permanently loaned to us by the Boston Athenæum. And for this peerless statue, in Munich bronze, one of the last and best works of the lamented Crawford, we are indebted, as you all know, to the princely munificence of Mr. Chas. C. Perkins. To these should be added a gift, yet in store, from that true and earnest Art-friend of ours, Miss Charlotte Cushman, now in Rome,—four richly wrought brackets, with devices symbolizing the lives and genius of Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, and which will suggestingly call, in the future, from other friends, for their appropriate statues in marble.

During the past winter a new use of the Hall has been found in the occupancy of its accessory rooms by the New England Conservatory of Music. Their accommodations have, however, been found too limited for their growing wants, and they have called upon the Directors for additional rooms, with the expectation that, if such can be furnished, the Conservatory may find its permanent abode beneath our roof. Your Directors have therefore, through their Executive Committee, had plans and estimates made by Mr. Snell, the accomplished Architect of the Hall, which plans have been examined by the Directors of the Conservatory, and deemed by them appropriate and abundantly ample for their accommodation.

In order to furnish such additional apartments, no interference with the occupancy of the present Hall is required. They may be built up upon and over the Ladies' Reception Room, across the large corridor, and would comprise a suite of six small rooms and two halls, with adjoining ante-rooms, to be approached by appropriate stairways—and so as not to interrupt by their occupancy the ordinary uses of the Hall.

All this can be done in accordance with the Architect's plans and estimates, based upon actual written offers from contractors for every portion of the work, for a comparatively moderate sum; for which the Conservatory are willing to pay a reasonable rent, exclusive of the cost of lighting and warming; and the Directors unanimously recommend that the Stockholders grant them the requisite authority to make such proposed improvements of their property. The financial aspects of the Association may be briefly stated as follows:

The average annual net income of the Hall for the 11 years prior to the construction of the Organ was $1,718.73. For the four years since it was placed in position, the annual net income has been $6,725.43. There are at present 1,000 Shares of Stock outstanding of the par value $100 each. There is a debt, with mortgage on Estate, falling due in July of this year, of $50,000, and there remained in hand on the first of June, as appears by the Treasurer's Report, the sum of $4,575.57.

The Organ has nobly stood the test of four years almost constant use, in a climate noted for its changeability and extremes of heat and cold; it is kept in tune and in repair by a competent artisan, Mr. Sturm, who is retained for this purpose at a fixed salary. Time is only proving the intrinsic and solid worth of the Great Instrument,—the rare excellence of its workmanship, and its right in all respects to claim companionship with the greatest works of its kind in all the world.

The Hall, with all its belongings and possessions, is at the present time in better condition than ever before. In its acoustic properties and its fitness for the various uses for which it is so frequently called into requisition, it has answered the ends for which it was designed, even better than its most sanguine friends could have anticipated. We trust it may long continue to fulfil the noble purposes of its founders,—a source of just pride to our city, and an honor to the Art to whose interests it stands pledged.

Decadence of the Drama.

The Tribune presents the following statement, which is worthy of the thoughtful consideration of every friend of the drama. Would that it applied only to New York!

It is, we think, rather a remarkable fact that at the present time in the City of New York, there is not a single dramatic performance given which a person of taste and culture can witness with entire satisfaction. Bits of good acting may, indeed, be noticed occasionally, here and there; and there is abundance of bright scenery for those who admire it. But no dramatic performance is given which depends for its attractiveness upon either the intrinsic merit of the drama or the art of acting. And yet we have upward of eight prominent theatres in active operation.

On the leading theatrical attractions of the city, due comment has been made, in these columns, from time to time. We have tried to do full justice to merits without being blind to defects. In the present instance, as heretofore, we do not overstate the truth. Thoughtful observers of the plays that are "running" must be unanimous in opinion that they contain but very little dramatic merit. The most popular of them is "The Black Crook," which it were a ludicrous pretense to characterize as a drama. A few odds and ends of incident, from "Faust," "Manfred," "Der Freischütz," etc., loosely knit together, afford occasions for the display of ballet dancers and scenery. In "Treasure Trove," at the Olympic, we see a less dazzling spectacle than "The Black Crook," and a play that is good as a comedy of the day, but not a standard work. Mr. Barnum has presented to his public, at the Museum, an actress whose sole claim to consideration appears to consist in her ability to ride a horse. Miss Western may be seen, also, at the Broadway Theatre, performing in the drama of "East Lynne"—a composition of the puerile "Stranger" school, and an actress that only a badly cultivated taste can endure. Elsewhere, a few well worn burlesques and extravaganzas, not particularly well acted, vie for patronage with the miscellaneous entertainment of the city.

Rightly used, the drama is a great power. Not only does it afford innocent amusement in hours of relaxation from the cares of life—which many persons appear to consider its sole utility—but it calls into play the finest faculties of the mind and the noblest emotions of the heart. In this way it is a constant and most efficient ally in that great cause of education, upon which the future of civilization depends. A well regulated stage has a significance for every mind, small or large. It portrays character; it illustrates the life of the passions; it revives the memorable periods of history; it recreates the dead and gone heroes of long ago; it inculcates the loftiest sentiments of honor and virtue; it holds up to emulation the highest ideas of character and conduct; it stimulates admiration of nobleness in man and purity in woman; it strengthens, in unsullied natures, an inherent reverence for the sacred idea of home, and for all the sweet domestic virtues; it rebukes in evil natures, the scoff, the sneer, and the self-brutalizing adherence to iniquity; it exalts freedom and the love of freedom; it interprets some of the most brilliant minds that have ever "put on mortality;" it enlarges, broadens, and elevates its votaries; it keeps pace with the progress of the age; and working shoulder to shoulder with the schoolmaster, the liberal clergyman, the philosopher, the poet, and the statesman, it helps to make the world happier and better.

Those who desecrate the drama by treating it as if it were a kind of corner grocery and grog shop, may, indeed, scout this way of considering the stage. They are the parasites who suck the life-blood of the dramatic oak. It is only worth while to consider them, however, when the time draws nigh for lopping them off. That time, we believe, is not far away. In thinking of the sad state of the drama, we must not lose sight of its lights of promise. There are those—laborers in the dramatic vocation—who appreciate the power of the drama, and hold it in due reverence. In them is our present hope. The old celestial spirit, the genius that gave us Shakespeare and the dramatists of "the spacious times of great Elizabeth;"

that glowed in England's dramatists toward the end of the last century; that has inspired a long line of illustrious players, from Betterton to Macready—this fire can never be quenched. It burns as brightly now as it has ever burned in the past; and though it be sadly true that New York, the metropolis of these United States, has not to-day a properly administered stage, yet do we most confidently believe that there is mind and energy enough in the better class of the players to redress this evil and to renew the ancient glories of the art. Our hope is in them. Not in the velvet coated gentry, who make picturesque boobies of themselves, upon the conspicuous street corners; but in the men and women who have adopted the profession of acting, in an intelligent and conscientious spirit; who know that mental culture, purity of life, refinement of manners, a wide range of reading, hard study, and self-sacrificing devotion to the highest aims of a worthy ambition, are necessary to the pursuit of the dramatic art, and must, in the end, crown them with the amplest success. These workers have been somewhat hardly used of late; having seen their places usurped by traders and half-naked women, and buffoons, and stage-carpenter dramas. But that which is good is sure to come uppermost at last. Already signs are not wanting that this fever of licentiousness and folly has nearly run its race. The Press, in various parts of the country, is uttering strong protests against it. The intelligent portion of the dramatic profession is becoming extremely impatient of it. Those protests will certainly continue, and that impatience will certainly increase. For the rest of the summer, our theatrical entertainments are likely to be various and fluctuating; but with the new autumnal season, we expect that a great and much needed change will be effected. It rests with the players to see that this is done, and we believe that they loth can and will redeem their art from the reproach which rests upon it now.

Music Abroad.

Paris

A little opera by Mozart, never before performed, called "The Goose of Cairo," was brought out about 1st of June at the Fantaisies Parisiennes. The Orchestra's correspondent writes of it: "L'Œu du Caire," otherwise "L'Œu del Caire," is a work not mentioned in the common biographies of Mozart, but not the less authentic for that reason. It was sold by the widow of the great composer with several other manuscripts, was made public some ten years ago, and all Germany recognized in it with gratification the hand of the master. Certain information makes out that it was written about the year 1784—that is to say between the "Entführung aus dem Serail" and "Le Nozze di Figaro," and that the success of the last work clipped the "Œu's" pinnons, and supplanted it at the opera house of Vienna, for which it had been destined. As unlucky a fate befel the book as the music; at all events, only one act out of three has been recovered; and out of these remains the piece of the "Fantaisies Parisiennes" has been constructed. Of course it is not fair in such a musical débris to look for the merits of a finished work; we must accept it rather as a curiosity than as a composition destined to advance the already superlative reputation of the composer. Apparently, too, the last act of "L'Œu" was never even finished. "Le Nozze," as I said, thrust it aside; and when Mozart wished to return to his "Goose," hoping to make it a golden one, the poem of "Don Giovanni" was put into his hands. Mozart jumped at the idea, and the "Goose" was once more laid on the shelf. The chef d'œuvre was written; the "Œu del Caire" temporarily forgotten; and four years afterwards Mozart wrote his "Requiem," and died. The unhappy "Goose of Cairo" remained undelivered, wanting its last act. The scene of the opera is laid in Spain. Don Beltram is "an old moustache," as Longfellow would say, who keeps, like Bartolo, his ward under lock and key until he may marry her. This ward, Signora Isabella, like Norma, has a lover, her guardian's nephew; and the young people, aided by a valet and soubrette, unite their forces to pull down the metaphorical towers and turrets with which the old guardian would imprison true love. The contest, however, is apparently vain until the Goose of Cairo arrives, a Deus ex machina. Don Beltram, it would appear, has been married before, and has lost his wife in a shipwreck. Just as he is about to sign the marriage contract with his ward, an enchanter, introduced by his nephew, Don Fabrice, arrives to present to the worthy old gentleman a marriage-offering in the shape of a Goose—a magnificent automaton, which, like the celebrated duck of Vaucanson, walks, cries, flaps its wings, eats, and—digests. This Goose is brought in in great state, and when called on to show off its wonderful capacities, exhibits its flanks, and lo! out pop Donna Beltram, the shipwrecked, and three children whom she has since her separation from the bosom of Beltram imported into the world. This buffoonery is amusing, and being expressed in flowing verse, goes well. As for Mozart's score, it sufficiently evidences, in its fugitive scattered way, the formed hand of the master. It is evidently no youthful work; the date of its creation is attested by the gracefulness of the phrasing, the maturity of form, and the richness of harmony. In the second act there is a brilliant finale in the Italian style; and an extremely pretty air for tenor must also be noted. The interpretation was exceedingly happily carried out by MM. Géralzer, Laurent, Masson, Mme. Géralzer and Mlle. Arnaud. The evening before the the opera had been rehearsed in the salons of M. Emile de Girardin.

"Athalie," with Mendelssohn's choruses, under the careful direction of M. Pasdeloup, is to be revived at the Odéon. It is said that Mlle. Artot will sing at St. Petersburg during the coming autumn season.

The receipts of the Theatre Lyrique hold a mean average of 7000 francs—that is to say, 7,900 with "Tamino et Juliette," and about 6,500 with "La Flûte Enchantée" or "Murtha."

AIX LA CHAPELLE. (From Corr. of Orchestra, June 11.) This week is a busy one for the ancient city of Aix, owing to the celebration of the Forty-fourth Niederrheinisches Musikfest, which has occupied all our thought and attention for the last three days. The Festival opened on Sunday with the performance of Bach's Suite for orchestra in D major, and Handel's "Judas Macchabees." The principal vocalists were Mme. Harriers-Wipperrn (soprano), Fr. Bettelheim (contralto), Herr Niemann from Berlin (tenor), and Herr Hill from Frankfort (bass). The conductors were Dr. Julius Rietz of Dresden and Herr. Ferd. Brenning of this city.

Bach's Suite, although originally written for the orchestra, has more the character of a stringed quartet with a sparing introduction of wind instruments. The five movements of a composition with compressed harmonies showed what effect can be produced by a polyphonic style of writing. Handel's Oratorio followed close upon Bach, and again evinced its solidity and power. We may admit that Handel's organ composition cannot be compared with Bach's honest Fugues and Toccatas, but in his choral works who can express sorrow, love and rage like Handel, or who impress the listener with admiration and wonder like him? The solo-singers left much to be desired, with the exception of Mme. Harriers-Wipperrn who seemed the only artist acquainted with oratorio singing. The choruses, excepting perhaps the two first, went well and with remarkable freshness.

The second day, Monday, brought the following programme:

Symphony in C minor	Beethoven
Missa Solemnis, D minor (Kyrie and Gloria)	Cherubini
Overture to Genevieve	Schumann
Scenes from Orpheus	Gluck
The Walpurgisnacht	Mendelssohn

To hear a symphony by Beethoven performed in the proper time and with the proper accentuation is a treat not to be found often out of Germany. The "Missa Solemnis," by Cherubini, is a noble work; the greatness of its conception can only be fully appreciated at High Mass. It seems that the remaining parts of the Mass are not so interesting, but the Kyrie and Gloria are longer than many an entire service. The performance was by no means perfect. The overture by Schumann was much appreciated, probably on account of its restless harmonies. This would make a far better illustration of infernal music [Fudge!] than that of Gluck's "Orpheus," which by comparison with Schumann is positively angelic. What a subject this would have been for Schumann! Mlle. Bettelheim as Orpheus did more justice to her part than the evening before in "Judas Macchabees." Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" finished this interesting concert in a splendid manner.

On the third day we had:—

Concert Overture	Fétis
Aria from Don Juan	Mozart
Concerto in D, Violin	Paganini
	Mme. Harriers-Wipperrn
	Herr Wilhelmj
Aria from Titus	Mozart
	Mlle. Bettelheim
Overture, Leonora , No. 3	Beethoven
Songs	Schumann
	Herr Niemann
Songs	Schumann
	Herr Hill
	Schubert

Ungarische Welsen	Violin	Ernst
	Herr Wilhelmj
Aria from Freischütz		Weber
Songs		Schubert
		Schumann
	Mlle. Bettelheim
Songs		Taubert
	Mme. Harriers-Wipperrn
Chorus		Handel

The Festival closed to-day with a Miscellaneous Concert, consisting mostly of songs by modern composers. Herr Wilhelmj, a violinist of high order, made a great mistake in choosing a concerto by Paganini on such an occasion. His technique is faultless. The overtures by Fétis and Beethoven were performed with great precision; and the many celebrities will depart from here invigorated by the hearing of some of the best musical productions of the two last centuries, done in a manner little short of faultless.

London.

OPERA. The success of Mlle. Christine Nilsson's début at Her Majesty's Theatre, on Saturday, can hardly be exaggerated. However high may have been the anticipation formed by our London opera-goers of the merits of the new prima donna, whose career is another exemplification of lowly born talent raising its possessor to a pinnacle of fortune and prosperity, these anticipations never overshot reality. The début was a success beyond what our cold audiences are accustomed to grant to operatic artists. In Spain and Italy they measure successes by the yards of "poesies," the stores of recalls, and the pounds of votive crowns and garlands. In England we dole out our praise more carefully: a cordial reception means something less than twenty redemands for the artist after the curtain is down, but also something more than a frenzied burst of emotion, as violent as transitory. It means a fair and prosperous career for the artist, so long as his capacities shall last—and even beyond the decay of those, for England is kind to infirm and invalided artists, "for the sake of and long scene." A reception, such as that given to Mlle. Nilsson on Saturday, is the sign-manual of position, wealth, and fame. With one step she has secured her footing in the public grace: it will be her own fault if she ever loses it again. It is perhaps unfortunate that "La Traviata" was chosen for Mlle. Nilsson's first appearance. There has been and will always be a strong feeling against the subject of this opera in England, and this rendered it a matter of comment that the debutante should have chosen so unpopular a character for a first appearance. Every available talent at Mr. Mapleson's command was brought forward to strengthen the cast, and even the commissionaire who delivers Violetta's note to Alfredo in the second act sang the few bars allotted to him with perfect articulation and in strict time. Without dwelling further at present on the other characters in the opera, we may say without fear of contradiction that Mlle. Nilsson achieved a genuine success. Her first entrance convinced every one that she was perfectly at her ease on the stage, and her first few notes created expectations which were fully realized during the progress of the opera. Her voice is a high, clear soprano, ranging from B flat below the lines to D flat above, the lower notes as in as F rather wanting power. Her vocalization is charmingly correct, her articulation perfect, and she has the power of holding a high note without any apparent effort. Her height is perhaps a little too great but her movements are excessively graceful, her expression most pleasant, and her dresses throughout evidenced great refinement of taste. Her singing of the "Libano" resulted in a genuine encore which was accepted; while the rendering of "Ah! j'ose e lui" and the brilliant finale of the first act caused her double recall when the curtain descended. In the second act she did not fall in the estimation of her hearers, but for some reason omitted the air "Non sapete" in her scene with old Geronte, possibly feeling how exacting its last twenty-two bars are. But in the third act her reading of the delicious "Adieu del passato" was all that could be desired by the most exacting critic. It was genuine singing without any apparent effort, and each note came from her heart finding a ready echo in those of the audience, as was evident from the moistened eyes. Had she sung this air alone, her reputation would have been established, and Mr. Mapleson might be justly congratulated on his excellent knowledge of what would succeed. The succeeding duets were given with no diminution either in vocal or dramatic energy, and at the fall of the curtain, there could be no doubt whatever of her being able to hold in England the reputation she has acquired in France. We are looking forward to seeing her as Marguerite in "Faust," a part which she will certainly look to the life, and which will certainly be more worthy of her powers and herself than the despised Dame aux Camélias.

Monday—an extra night—presented "Norma," the title-role held by Mlle. Tietjens. On Tuesday, "La Traviata" was repeated; on Thursday, "Fidelio" was given (a subscription night); and for Saturday, the third appearance of Mlle. Nilsson is announced, the opera to be Gounod's "Faust." The event is anticipated with considerable interest. "La Forza del Destino" is underlined; and there is reason to hope that this long-expected production of Verdi's will at length see light in England, and prove attractive to many of the composer's admirers. A single morning performance of the "Huguenots" is also announced for Monday.

The appearance of Mlle. Patti as Amina on Monday at Covent Garden drew a large audience, as it was announced that the representation this season would be confined to a single evening. In commenting on a performance so well known as this representation it is only necessary again to note that Mlle. Patti's voice and power have rather gained than lost by the wear and tear of an arduous life. She has acquired greater simplicity, has abandoned much of her ornament, to the general advantage of her style. Amina is perhaps her most successful rôle. Her coquetry, her artifice, her tenderness, and the passion and pathos which supervene on an unjust accusation, are admirably rendered. We could quote no better example of the thorough conception formed of the part than is afforded by her singing of "Son geloso," "Ah, perché non posso odiarti?" and "Non creda mirarti." As to her vocalisation, the rondo finale assures the possession of as full and plastic a voice as ever. The other characters were indifferently filled. The Elvino was weakly and insufficiently sung by Sig. Fancelli; and M. Petit sadly displayed his lack of capacity in the Count. The part of Rudolpho is in itself ungracious, but there is no reason why it should be put into other than efficient keeping.

"Faust," on Tuesday, with Mlle. Lucca and Sig. Mario, and "Le Nozze" on Thursday followed; on Friday "Don Carlos," on Saturday "Don Giovanni."—Orchestra, June 15.

Signor Cotogni, who appeared at the Royal Italian Opera for the first time, as Don Giovanni, achieved a fair success in a part which is one of the most difficult in the whole range of characters in the lyric drama. Signor Cotogni has a fine baritone voice, and style of vocalization; and, with a little more stage practice of the part, and the acquirement of greater ease and vivacity, he promises to be an acceptable representative of a part which is very seldom satisfactorily filled. Mlle. Adelina Patti, whose indisposition had caused the opera to be twice postponed, again played Zerlina, with all that grace and charm of manner, and exquisite vocal finish, which have for several seasons rendered her performance of the part a prominent feature in the opera.

THE CHARITY CHILDREN AT ST. PAUL'S.—The musical portion of this annual festival service was exactly similar to that of last year. Mr. Henry Buckland, vested in a surplice, took his place as usual in a lofty pulpit under the dome, and conducted the music with considerable energy. Mr. George Cooper presided at the organ, while the trumpeters and drummers rendered their valuable assistance. The Te Deum and Jubilate were sung to Mr. Goss's music setting, the children's voices coming out with great precision and power. The juvenile choir also joined in the Gloria Patri at the close of each psalm, and in the usual portions of the "Coronation Anthem." They sang Mendelssohn's chorale, "Sleepers wake," before the sermon, which was preached by the Bishop of Carlisle, and after it four verses of the 104th Psalm, and the "Hallelujah Chorus." The spectacle, looking at it merely as a "sight," is one of the most affecting which can be witnessed, and few can listen to the singing of the fresh young voices, softened down a little by the accompaniments on Hill's immense organ, without feeling that mysterious sensation which sometimes steals over us in spite of ourselves, and almost overcomes the strongest and hardest nature. The portions of the service given by the Cathedral Choir, who were assisted by the choristers of Westminster Abbey, the Temple, and the Chapels Royal, were anything but satisfactory. There was no precision, and a general hesitation even in the Amen after the prayers which was absolutely discreditable; in fact we can only repeat what we have so often said, that in neatness of style they would be surpassed by many a parish choir.—Choir.

A performance of Herr Schachner's Oratorio, "Israel's Return from Babylon," was to be given at Exeter Hall, for a charity. Two of the principal parts will be sung by a Duchess and the wife of a Bishop.

At Mr. Ella's last meeting of the Musical Union, Herr Auer played for the last time this season, with M. Jacquard, the graceful and solid violoncellist from Paris, and Herr Lübeck, the pianist. At the next concert, M. Rubinstein, we read, will appear.

NEW PHILHARMONIC. At the fourth concert a new Overture, by Mr. Mudie, was performed, of which the Athenæum says:

"The piece, which is written in a light and brilliant style, contains much flowing and graceful melody, and some very skilful instrumentation, and is the work of a thoroughly skilled and accomplished musician, who should be better known to the public." The other orchestral pieces were Meyerbeer's "Struensee" Overture and Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, and the programme also included Beethoven's E flat Concerto, splendidly played by Mme. Goddard, and Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for the violin, cleverly executed by Mr. Henry Holmes.

ITALY. The Gazetta Musicale of Milan announces that government has decided on withdrawing all theatrical subsidies. This is tantamount to the death blow of opera. Popular Concerts, under the direction of Signor Mabellini (who is a very fair director), have been given at the Pagliano, Florence, made up of the music of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Signor Rossini.

Signor Mercadante's "Vestale," which contains some of the composer's best music, has been given at Venice with great success. The singing of a new tenor, Signor Patierno, has been most highly praised.

MAYENCE. The Stadt Theatre closed on the first inst. During the past season, there were eighty-eight operatic performances given and no fewer than forty-two different operas. There were no new ones among these, but several old ones were revived. The following is a list of those performed:—Czár und Zimmermann, Undine, Der Freischütz, and Faust (Gounod), four times; Don Juan, Die Zauberflöte, Le Nozze di Figaro, Les Huguenots, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Stadella, La Fille du Régiment, Templer und Jüdina, Orpheus (Offenbach), and Il Trovatore, three times; Die Einführung ans dem Serail, Der Waffenschmidt, Obéron, Robert le Diable, Le Maçon, La Muette, Guillaume Tell, Martha, Jessonda, Johann de Paris, Die lustigen Weiber, Zampa and Les Deux Jouvènes, twice; Der Wildschütz, Le Prophète, Fru Diavolo, Gustavus, Lucia di Lammermoor, Le Philtre, La Dame Blanche, Fidelio, Das Nachtlager, Tannhäuser, Die Zigeunerin (The Bohemian Girl), Le Juive, Le Postillon de Lonjumeau, Die lustigen Schuster (Paer), and Norma, once.

MUNICH. Herr Richard Wagner returned to this capital a short time since. By order of the King, a small villa has been taken for him on the banks of the Starnberg Lake, and he is now there, employed in the completion of his new opera, Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg.

AUGSBURG. Dr. Otto Baeh is engaged in a three act national opera, entitled Leonore. It is founded on the old legend of The Spectre Horseman, partially used by Bürger in his celebrated ballad.

SONDERHAUSEN. Herr Max Bruch has accepted the post of Court-Conductor.

LAUSANNE. Schumann's Paradies und Peri was performed here last month.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 6, 1867.

Robert Franz.

The friends of the great Song composer will rejoice to learn that during the past Spring, in spite of the calamity of increasing deafness, he has been cheered by fresh and frequent visitations of the Muse. He has composed some forty songs since February. They compose themselves, whether he will or no; sitting or walking, or in his bed at night, he says, "new melodies keep humming and singing in my head and heart." Who would not be resigned to deafness, to find himself the medium of such gifts to the world!

The publishers of Leipzig and elsewhere are now eager to bring out his songs, which until recently they have thought it a generous favor to accept. The great house of Breitkopf and Hartel have already published the first set of the new ones, six in number, Op. 38, to words by Heine. Five or six more sets are in the hands of these and other publishers. Each Opus thus far has contained commonly six, sometimes twelve songs; and all but three or four of his published works are Songs; so that the Songs of Robert Franz now number more than 250!

And what Songs they are! Not one of them falls under the category of mere graceful, clever commonplace, or ever loses its freshness. They do not ring the changes upon the same old sentimental melody which runs through nine-tenths of the German songs so popular with young people of a certain age, and which are almost as much Italian as they are German. He never repeats himself; the little poems of Goethe, the songs of Shakspeare, are not more individual and each essentially a new creation. No wonder that to many his melody is at first so strange; they do not anticipate its turns, and when they would fall by habit into the old cadences it seems to elude and mock them! But let the singer woo it to closer acquaintance, let him enter fully into the spirit of poem, melody and accompaniment, all three, and he will find that this melody was strange only because it was fresh and true and original, that in each case this is the very music of the poem—the soul thereof set free in music.

And the test of it is, that, once captivated by a Franz song, you never weary of its charm. With all his peculiarity, you cannot charge him with mannerism. When he brings you a new Opus you are as sure of a fresh gift, as if he were a new person, or just come from a new country or a new world. These are real inspirations; these are sincere and genuine products; these fruits grow, and not all on the same tree, but scattered over wide fields of rich, deep, various moral and musical experience. And if they are full of poetry, of passion, of imagination, not less remarkable are they for chaste refinement of style, freedom from all empty ornament or rhetoric, and for a mastery of accompaniment which is profoundly learned in the best sense. For no man since Mendelssohn is so thoroughly imbued with the spirit, not the dry letter, of Bach. In his piano accompaniments, romantic, graphic, free as they often are, you very often feel a tendency to the polyphonic style, each part in the harmony moving with an individual significance; it is the blending of Bach, of the old contrapuntal art, with such free imaginative play of thought and feeling (most modern of the modern) as leads some (ignorantly, though not unnaturally) to class him with the so-called musicians of "the Future." But it is through this very quality in his accompaniment, this Bach-like refinement and concise working up of the essential motives, that his melody preserves itself in everlasting freshness, whereas more catching, popular strains, or tunes, haunt the ear to plague the mind at last, and keep singing themselves over and over until custom stales. His songs are at once naive and learned; and in the simplest snatch of melody which he flings forth, simple enough sometimes for a mere Volklied, you feel that it is a thoroughly informed and cultured, as well as a sincere, deep musical nature that has so kept its freshness. With such a man genius and culture still draw breath together.

From larger forms of composition Franz seems resolutely to abstain, though often urged to it, and doubtless full as capable as any, were he as willing to rush into Symphony or Oratorio with or without call. He must be the judge of his own calling; and is it not a great one to originate a whole new race of songs!

As modest as he is earnest, he has felt it in him and a duty to spend a vast share of his most precious hours and energy upon bringing the invaluable Art of Sebastian Bach nearer to an age which but begins to appreciate and understand him. His labors as arranger and editor of many of Bach's sacred works cannot be overestimated. Taking the scores as Bach left them, with much of the harmony but barely indicated or implied, he has written it out so fully in Bach's spirit, so successfully carrying out and thereby demonstrating Bach's intentions, that he has made these works for the first time really practicable for performance. He began with culling Arias for each of the four voices from Cantatas, Masses, &c., and condensing into a piano-forte part all that he found, if only sketched or hinted (or even only understood), in the instrumental parts of the score; in this way he has made accessible to singers who have earnestness enough to study and win their way to the heart of such treasures, nine Arias for each kind of voices. Also a set of Arias from the Passion Music; and a set of Duets. This led him further into preparing in the same way whole Cantatas, two of which are published; and then came the Magnificent, in full, of which he has also published an æsthetic analysis in a pamphlet. From Bach he passed to sterling, obscure, works of other great masters, and has put Astorga's Stabat Mater, Durante's Magnificent, &c., within easy reach. But his last and greatest service has been the preparation of a full score of the Matthew Passionsmusik, in which he has filled out the orchestral and organ parts with such consummate truth and skill, that this greatest of Oratorios is now in a complete state for performance by any Choral Society who have the will and means. Heretofore, wherever it has been performed, in Germany or England, some parts have had to be put to it, some omissions to be supplied, by the Conductor or Kapellmeister; now this work is done, and done perfectly, (so say the experts) once for all.

But it was not our purpose now to speak of Franz as a creator, nor of his great services as an editor and interpreter of Bach. In a third character he has proved the earnestness and soundness of his musicianship, winning respect and love in his quiet, quaint old town of Halle by his labors as a Conductor. In the autumn of 1849 he undertook the charge there of the Sing-Academie, into which he breathed a new life, in spite of seemingly insuperable obstacles, inspiring its members to enthusiastic efforts in the study and performance of the noblest choral works. For 17 years he was their wise and zealous teacher and director, until the physical infirmity of which we have spoken compelled him a few months since to resign. By way of exhortation and example to our own Oratorio and Choral Societies, we call attention to what Franz has done in Halle, drawing our information chiefly from an article in a recent number of the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.

It was no easy task to build up a Choral Society after the ideal of Robert Franz. Nothing could content him short of seeing them all work in the same spirit that animated his own musical activity. It would have been hard anywhere, and Halle was not particularly well prepared by previous musical culture, though it was proud of being the birthplace of Handel. The members who poured in in the first excitement of a new hope, soon dwindled away from such high and stern requirements, leaving neither voices nor pecuniary means enough for such performances as they contemplated (for, be it understood, the "Handel and Haydn" and "Harmonic" Societies of Germany are made up of singers who love their work well enough to pay for it themselves!); there were intrigues, too; as may well be supposed; and, worse than all, the male voices were drawn almost exclusively from the students of the University, a constantly changing body, so that it was almost impossible to form the traditions essential to such an institution, except with the female voices.

But these and other difficulties did Franz's perseverance overcome. His steadfast devotion to the cause chained pupils of both sexes to him; and this was formed the kernel of a faithful band, who followed him believingly on paths of more significance than they had dreamed of. The example was catching; difficulties overcome brought increase of power and zeal; and in a few years there was a choir, with which he could solve the grander problems, before which he could set the highest musical goals; a choir, which had in so peculiar a manner built itself up through him and upon him, which stood in such a personal relation to him, that it not only willingly followed his intentions, rapidly seized his hints, but even sang the most difficult pieces more easily when they harmonized with Franz's own musical peculiarity, and was slower to find itself at home in easier ones when they did not.

"How Franz led his chorus to the solution of such musical problems, no one can doubt who knows him by his own compositions or by the few words which he has occasionally published about works of Bach. True to his lyrical nature, he sought to draw from every musical piece its soul as it were, and to inspire others with what he had finely felt out, keeping the poetic meaning and the personal expression, as well as the musical form, before their eyes. And this he did with equal care even with works more out of the sphere of his musical sympathies, such as Romberg's 'Song of the Bell,' which we had to perform at a Schiller Festival."

The writer goes on to tell how many and what great and difficult works were brought out under Franz's direction by the Singakademie, naming of course only the more important. That he should direct attention almost the very first thing, and by preference, to the master who claimed his highest veneration, is not to be wondered. And so the Halle choir can boast of bringing out, under his lead, more of the Bach treasures than any other musical society. Besides a great many single solos and chorals, three Piano Concertos, six printed Motets, &c., they gradually mastered and performed 16 of the Church Cantatas, of late years naturally with the instrumental accompaniment elaborated by Franz himself. To which add the Funeral Ode (Trauer-Ode); the Magnificent, twice; the greater part of the great Mass in B minor, twice. The solo forces were not sufficient for the St. Matthew Passion, and only the concluding chorus was sung repeatedly.

Of Handel, too, the list is very rich, including the Messiah, three times; Samson, three times; Josua, twice; Judas Maccabæus, three times; Israel in Egypt, twice; Jephtha, twice; also the Dettingen Te Deum, the Hundredth Psalm, and many solo and choruses from L'Alligro ed il Penseroso and other works.

It has been the practice also of this Society, for a number of years, on the evening before the Totentanz (solemnity in honor of the dead) to sing alternately the Requiem of Mozart and that of Cherubini; both have now been given seven times. Moreover the Kyrie of Cherubini's Mass in D minor has been given; and from the great Mass (in D) of Beethoven, at least the Kyrie has several times been sung. Of Mendelssohn, the Elijah and the St. Paul, four Psalms, several Hymns, the Lobgesang twice, the Lauda Sion four times, the choruses to Antigon, the choruses to Æolipus, songs and other things, have been produced; and by Franz himself, the Kyrie à Capella, the Psalm for two choirs, and the choral or part-songs on various occasions. Of older works we may name likewise the Stabat Mater of Astorga, the Magnificent of Durante, the De profundis of Clari, Chorals by Evarii, &c. Nor were Haydn, Gluck and Romberg wanting; while of more modern compositions the list shows Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," given four times, and his last scene from Faust, twice; Gade's "Comala," Miiani's "Song of Triumph" and others things by Schubert. This is by no means all, but it is abundantly enough to disprove the charge of one-sidedness so often brought against Franz, at least in his character of conductor. His love of Bach has only made him the more quick to recognize the good things of the old Italian masters.

Good News! And yet it can be no news to our readers, for all must have seen, and read with joy, in all the newspapers, the short, significant despatch which came over the Atlantic wires this week, and which we print again for the pure pleasure of it:

PARIS, July 1, 1867.

The Chickering & Sons, Boston.

In addition to our Gold Medal, I have to-day received a decoration of the Legion of Honor which puts us at the head of all Piano Exhibitors.

C. F. CHICKERING.

We had already had the official list of all the prizes awarded at the Paris Exposition to American exhibitors. The gold medal list was headed by the names of our two leading Piano Manufacturers; our honors apparently, the name of Stenway & Sons being placed first. But now it appears that there was a new distinction in reserve, a very graceful one, which gives the firm of CHICKERING & SONS their due place at the head. This decoration was presented by the Emperor in person, on the grand day of awards, before 17,000 people. Descriptions of the splendid ceremony, the Emperor's speech, &c. are in all the papers; we have only room to copy this:

After the speech, the exhibitors who were to receive grand prizes, marched to the front of the throne each group separately, the first being fine arts. As each name was called, the recipient ascended the steps of the throne, bowing to the Emperor and Empress, received from Napoleon's hand the gold medals. These were passed one by one to Napoleon by Marshal Vaillant, until all the medals were given. Many of the recipients were called up again and received the decorations of the Legion of Honor, the same ceremony being gone through with as in the case of delivering the medals. The gold medals only were distributed by the Emperor. Altogether, there will be 18,500 recompenses to sixty thousand exhibitors. There are sixty grand prizes, nine hundred gold, three thousand six hundred silver, and five thousand bronze medals, and nine thousand honorable mention.

We have never entertained a doubt that "les Pianos Chickering" deserved all this, and we heartily congratulate these noble representatives of Boston, (we prefer to say American) ingenuity of art, as well as of such sterling social qualities and graces, on a success so honorably won and so conspicuously certified.

A well-known lady correspondent of the Chicago Tribune closes a very outspoken letter about the recent New York Festival, as follows:

Sunday evening saw the conclusion of the Festival, when a "Grand Sacred Concert" tolled the knell of departed joys. The concert was hardly "grand," nor was it even "sacred," notwithstanding that Rossini's Stabat Mater occupied the first part of it. Rossini is a delightful Maestro, and his Stabat Mater is a fine composition; but it requires a mental effort to consider it as sacred music, all its effects and finiture being modelled after the Italian operatic school, and the treatment which it generally receives increasing rather than diminishing this inclination toward the secular. Of the seven morceaux selected, but two were ably rendered on Sunday night, these two being the duct, Quis est homo, which, thanks to Parepa and Madame Testa, went more smoothly than ever before in New York, and the contralto cavatina, Fac ut portem, rendered by Madame Testa with an intelligence that surprised more than one. Had Madame Testa a voice, she would be an excellent singer; having none but what she has made, she certainly commands respect for having done so much with so little. Baragli's Cujus animam was unsatisfactory; the orchestra drowning the voice, and the voice evidently not conversant with the music. Antonucci was more iron-clad than ever in Pro peccatis, while the quartet of Sancta Mater could hardly have been worse sung, and Parepa's Inflammatum lacked fervor. Whenever enthusiasm is required, Parepa fails to produce any effect upon the critical.

Part second was devoted principally to what the New York Tribune aptly calls the "Demon of Gush." Signora Poch ranted and raved through a solo and a duet, in a highly sensational manner, and it is to be hoped all those who a year ago insisted that this lady knew how to sing were present on Sunday night and learned caution by the sad failure of their predictions. Signor Bellini likewise raved, but in a less degree, and showed what a wondrous difference there is between having a voice and being an artist. Then Carl Rosa performed a perfectly delightful concerto of Mendelssohn's, on the violin, executing it well, but somehow or other leaving out Mendelssohn's soul; and Geo. W. Morgan, the clever organist, introduced us to his overture of John the Baptist. The fiend within me remarked that it was the first time John the Baptist had ever received an overture, and added that, judging from the lively time, the overture must have been made to him while on a charger! I was greatly shocked by this irreverence on the part of my fiend, and strove hard to discover the connection between the music and the subject, but finally gave it up in despair. The fiend insists that it is intended as a "tone poem," descriptive of the pas seul executed by the daughter of Herodius. I repudiate the malice of the fiend in toto, though perhaps in this matter Mr. Morgan may be caught tripping.

On the whole, the Festival can not be called a musical success, however well it may have been patronized; but it is a beginning, which is something, and from this small beginning a truly great festival may finally be evolved. K. F.

HARTFORD, CONN. The Courant has the following account of "Mr. Buck's New Organ":

The new room which Mr. Buck has had fitted up in his house for the use of his pupils, and for private musical parties, is 32 feet by 18, and 13 feet high. In this he has had placed the new organ from the manufactory of Mr. Johnson, of Westfield, Mass. The organ, though small in comparison with many others in this vicinity, is unquestionably superior in its voicing and general appointments to any organ in this city, not excepting the new Masonic Hall organ by the same builder. The workmanship, arrangement and compass of the instrument fit it for music virtually impossible of performance upon many organs of much larger size. Persons familiar with organs may be interested in the following specifications:—

Compass of manuals, CC to A in alto, 58 notes. Compass of pedals, CCC to tenor F, 30 notes.

Great Organ.—Open Diapason, 58 pipes; Melodia, 58; Suble Flute, 58; Mixture, three ranks, 172; Clarionet, 46.

Swell Organ.—Open diapason, 46 pipes; salicional, 46; stopped diapason, treble and bass, 58; principal, 58; trumpet, treble and bass, 58; pedal bourdon, 30. Total number of pipes, 688.

Mechanical Movements.—Great to swell; swell to pedal; great to pedal; pedal check; engine; ratchet swell pedal; three combination pedals; pedal to leaf turner.

The organ is blown by water power, one of Stiles' water motors being used. This water motor consists of a double cylinder, containing three valves. These are so arranged that they open to receive the force of water, and close after throwing it off. The regulator, patented by William H. Topham can be easily adjusted to work to a heavy or light power, so that with a given stream of water, pipes of different sizes may be used. The bellows shuts off the water, as soon as full, so that there is no waste, and the water-gate is opened gradually or suddenly, according to the amount of wind required. A patent leaf-turner, invented by Mr. Clapp, of the firm of Clapp & Burdick, of this city, and sold by that firm, is used. This is turned by a pedal, and is quite an ingenious contrivance, capable of being applied to a piano, as well as an organ. The exhibition of the instrument was much enjoyed by those present Monday evening.

MILWAUKEE. The 16th concert of the Musical Society, under the direction of Prof. R. Schmelz, took place on the 7th ult., at the Music Hall, with this programme:—Part I. Symphony in C minor, Beethoven.—Part II. "The Reapers' lullaby," part-song for mixed voices, Schumann; Duet for Piano, Moscheles; soprano Aria, with orchestra, from Mozart's Figaro; Capriccio, for three violins; Hermann; "The Morning," quintet by Lachner; scene from Gounod's Faust, for violin, piano and organ; Male Chorus, "The Prayer," by Zöllner, with orchestra.

New York. The only concerts of importance lately have been the popular Sunday Concerts (Sunday Popular?) by Mr. Thomas's Orchestra, at Terrace Garden. During the absence of Mr. Thomas in Europe, Mr. Ehen has conducted. The first programme embraced:—The Overture to the "Vestals," by Spontini; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Entr'act from Schubert's "Rosamunde;" Allegretto from Beethoven's eighth Symphony; Fugue from Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony;" and many other pieces of light and pleasant music. Mr. Thomas has returned and resumed the baton.

Lovers of Mendelssohn, says an English paper, will be sorry to learn that numerous letters from Mendelssohn have been lately destroyed through ignorance of the value they possessed. On the death of a well-known English collector and patron of the fine arts his valuable property was disposed of by his niece. Among proof engravings, sketches in oil, water-color drawings, etc., the valuer, who is a musician, discovered a letter from Mendelssohn. The letter was full of interest, and inquiry was made to ascertain if there were no more, when the lady acknowledged that there had been a large collection, but that she, never having heard of the great composer, had destroyed them. She thus inflicted an irreparable loss upon his admirers.

THE GREAT EXPOSITION. The Committee on musical composition have unanimously awarded the only prize for a Cantata to M. Camille St. Saëns. The jury was composed of Auber, Ambroise Thomas, Berlioz, Felicien David, Prince Poniatowski, and many more. They devoted four sessions to examining the "one hundred and two" Cantatas sent in competition. Each session lasted from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M. Three other Cantatas obtained honorable mention. The same Jury, after examining the Hymns, which were 823 in number, declined to award any prize.

On the 16th of June, the Société des Concerts of the Conservatoire gave the second concert in connection with the Exposition. Programme: Beethoven's C-minor Symphony; Chorus from the Deux Aïeues, by Gicury; parts of Beethoven's Septuor; O Filii, double chorus by Leising; Overture to Freyschütz; Psalm by Mareello.

Rossini has composed a hymn—not that of Peace—to be executed on the 1st of July at the ceremony of the distribution of the Exposition prizes. He has chosen M. Jules Cohen as leader.

Gounod is writing a new opera, of which Francesca di Rimini is the subject.

Victor Massé is just now occupied with an opera on the subject of "Paul and Virginia," the libretto being found by those fertile scribes, MM. Michel Carré and Jules Barbier. This story, it may be recollected, was effectively treated, some sixty years back by Rodolphe Kreutzer.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Who will be my angel bride. Song. Webster. 35
There's a light at the window. " & Cho. " 35
Let me fold thee close, Mavourneen. " M. Keller. 30
When night is darkest, dawn is nearest. E. Land. 33
Four songs by able composers.
Charming Annie Bell. S'g & Cho. Starkweather. 0
I am waiting for thee. Song. C. Operti. 40
Our spirit friends. Song and Cho. W. A. Ogden. 30
A country life for me. Song. H. Clay. Preusse. 30
Minnie Wayne. W. A. Ogden. 30
Catch it on the fly. Base ball Song and Chorus. Starkweather. 30

A selection of charming songs sure to be popular.

Idle lay the Summer Sea. Tide Song. Marion Dix Sullivan. 30
Nelly Corec. Ballad. " " " 30
Charming and simple songs.
The Wishing Cap. Song. W. T. Wrighton. 30
Words by Mackay. Music sweet as sugar.
Gathering homeward, one by one. Song and Quartette. C. H. Pixley. 30
Very beautiful.

Instrumental.

First meeting. (Erste begegnung). D. Krug, Op. 226. 50
Confession of love. Der Liebe Gestandniss. " 50
Meeting again. (Wiedersehen). " 50
Belong to a set called "The Book of Love." Composed in excellent taste, and are something in the style of Oesten's "Songs of Love." Medium difficulty.
Priere et Chasse. Fantaisie du Freischütz. Rose Favarger. 75
Very rich and melodious. One of the best of compositions founded on these celebrated airs.
Fairy Stories, (Feen-Märschen) Waltzes. Strauss. 75
Brilliant, and in Strauss's well-known style.
Parisian Waltzes. H. L. Williams. 75
Elegant and graceful.
Dreams of the past. Waltz. R. Goerdeler. 50
Sallie's favorite Galop. A. R. Webb. 30
Pretty pieces, and not difficult.
Souvenir de Innsbruck. Tyrolienne for Piano. F. Bendel. 40
Neapolitan Song. Transcription. Jules Egghard. 40
La Retour. Fantasie for Piano. C. Van Tal. 30
L'Esperance. Song without words. " " 30
La Volceuse d'Amour. (The heart stealer). Polka Mazurka. C. Faust. 30
Five graceful pieces of medium difficulty.
Mugby Junction. Galop. Chas. Coote. 40
A brilliant kind of "railroad" piece. Play it "through on time."

Books.

Ecole Primaire. 25 easy and progressive studies for Piano. Foreign fingering. 2 parts. Duvernoy, ea. 75
Czerny's 24 short and progressive exercises for Piano. Op. 336. Foreign fingering. In 3 parts, each. 1.00
These valuable aids to the teacher will be welcomed, each in its own way. They are both good, and suited to pupils who have made but a moderate advance in their studies.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 686.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 9.

For Dwight's Journal of Music

Musical Form.

BY W. S. B. MATHEWS.

A musical work is almost a living creation; it possesses a body, and a soul. No other work of man is so truly alive—instinct with life. Indeed, who shall say how much or how little of the Divine enters into the composition of those glorious inspirations which we call Master-works?

Music gives us pleasure. A portion of this pleasure is derived from the determinate manner in which the various chapters, or sections, of the work are related, so as to become one whole. To the uncultivated ear, a single period of striking and simple melody gives pleasure. A second period of independent melody gives pleasure, but drives out the distinct impression of the one first heard. A second period may, however, be so constituted as to deepen the impression of the first. In order to this, it must bear to the first a certain inner relation of significance, as well as an outer relation of key and general style. The second period must be in unity with the first. Almost every musician can look back to the time when every extended composition was unintelligible to him, save in so far as a scrap of melody emerged here and there from the chaos and gave him a rallying point for his scattered thoughts. From beginning to end it was a steady stream of music. At length one perceives that the work, which was before so continuous, begins to manifest points of repose. After repeated hearings it is perceived to possess a certain orderly arrangement of parts. It is first seen to divide quite plainly into two or three chapters, each having, so to speak, its own point of crystallization, and all, again, bearing a determinate relation to each other. Finally, every period in the whole work is seen to bear a necessary or appropriate relation to every other; the leading and accessory ideas are seen in their appropriate relation; and thus it is that we begin to perceive the propriety and beauty of determinate Musical Form.

What, then, is Musical Form? What are its underlying principles? How are these principles manifested in the completed work? These are the questions which present themselves for our solution.

Several melodic phrases may be conjoined to each other in such a way as to form one whole melody or tune. In order to this, certain technical requirements as to relationship of key, motive, etc., must be complied with. Moreover, several melodic periods, or stanzas, may be conjoined into one piece; so that the listener feels that a unity is attained. And this, again, is possible only when certain technical requirements of form and organization have been complied with. Yet again, several compositions, each in itself complete and measurably satisfactory, may be so conjoined as to make one whole work, the several chapters of which visibly complement each other. This is seen in the Sonata, Oratorio, Opera, etc. And this possibility of consociative unity exists only in compliance with certain technical requirements of relationship, as before. The full statement of these several grades of laws, by which alone the several fragments in question can be associated into one whole, constitutes the doctrine of Musical Form. But before proceeding to notice the several musical forms a limitation must be established, viz.—The most perfect compliance with all possible definite laws in regard to the relationship of these several fragments—so far as regards their key, tempo, and general similarity or contrast—will not authorize us to associate into one whole melodies which have not a unity of spirit.

Musical Form is determined mainly by two governing principles:—"Unity, the type of the Divine Comprehensiveness," and "Symmetry, the type of the Divine Justice." The first requires that the entire work shall manifest a consistent plan; that the end shall have been seen from the beginning. However unexpected modulations or digressions may occur, we must be made to feel that they are not inconsistent with the fundamental intent of the piece. Symmetry demands that a due relation shall exist between all the several rhythmic divisions of the work; that one chapter shall not overshadow or be overshadowed by any other. Unity is manifested principally by the relationship of the keys in which the different divisions of the work are written, and by the similarity, or appropriate dissimilarity, of the motives employed. Symmetry is manifested in the appropriate extent or brevity of each several part, and in the general melodic balance of the work.

In accordance with these laws there have grown up two classes of musical forms—Determinate and Variable. It is difficult to draw any just line of relative estimate of these two classes of forms. The former are logical. The latter, fanciful and imaginative. Yet who shall say that fancy and imagination are more, or less, noble than a logical pre-determined order?

The Determinate Forms begin with the Period. Then follow the Song-forms of two and three periods. These are followed by the song-form with Trio. Next come the Rondos. The Rondo is the beginning of broad forms. The technical structure of these forms was quite fully considered in No. of this Journal, nearly two years ago. The Rondo is followed by the Sonata, a broader form, allowing greater scope for artistic light and shade. (See No. 636, of this Journal.)

The Rondo gives us a picture of a soul in one mood. The Sonata gives us three or four phases of the same artistic nature. It is necessarily in itself nobler than the Rondo. With the Symphony, which is the culmination of Sonata, the determinate forms end.

The Variable Forms are as variable in name as form. Most of them conform somewhat to the song-form or the rondo. In fact it is impossible to secure a high degree of artistic unity and symmetry in a composition without falling more or less into the rondo form. Wollenhaupt's "Whispering Wind" is almost a rondo of the second form. Wehli's "Bacchanale" is also a rondo of the second form, without coda.—The theme in this composition,—and also the episode—is a song-form of three periods, of which the first is repeated. To this class of forms belong Overtures, Fantasias, Nocturnes, Ecclesiastical forms, Opera, Cantata, and Oratorio. In the three forms last named are united all the lesser forms. The arias often assume the rondo form. The different numbers belonging to the same act of the opera are in as close sympathy with each other as are the separate chapters of a Sonata. There is yet another *quasi art-form which does not belong entirely to either of the classes named. This form is the Fugue. The rank of an art-work is measured by its pathos,—or expression. But the Fugue does not move in the plane of the Emotional; it belongs rather to the Intellectual. Again, as to the correlation of its periods, the Fugue has no determinate form. It is a fantasy; yet in its whole technical structure it is rather a creature of the intellect than of the heart. But the vocal fugue becomes a real art-work—whenever it assists in rendering the text more impressive. This one may feel in the fugue "And He shall reign forever and ever" in Handel's Hallelujah Chorus. But when it is so managed as to become simply the vehicle for the display of contrapuntal skill, it sinks again out of the plane of the Artistic into that of the Intellectual. This one may feel in the fugue "Cum sancto spiritu" in Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and in the "Amen" of the Messiah. In Bach one discerns the substratum of artistic feeling, but how is it overshadowed by the superabundant contrapuntal skill which he everywhere displays! How then, in fine, shall we define the real artistic value of the Fugue? We answer that no doubt a portion of the true artistic delight consists of "ideas of relation." These ideas we derive from the Fugue more than from any other musical creations. But the noblest and truest mission of music is to express emotion. When otherwise engaged Music has left the sphere in which she excels every other form of expression and contests on a lower plane a rivalry in communicating ideas rather than feelings—a contest in which she must ever come off conquered; for there she has adversaries with superior means. "Speech, for ideas; tones, for emotions," says a modern writer. We assign to the Fugue, then, a rank subordinate to that of the nobler forms—the Rondo and Sonata—in so far as it expresses less than they.

By universal suffrage of musical artists the Sonata enjoys pre-eminence over all other instrumental forms. It remains to suggest, as briefly as we may, some of the supposed grounds of this pre-eminence. In No. 639 of this JOURNAL—Art. Good Music—quite an extended statement of the theory of the elements of musical esthetics was made. To that we now refer as furnishing materials available for the determination of the present question. In brief we may say that the Sonata, and more especially its culmination, the Symphony, exceeds all other instrumental forms in the variety of impressions of beauty it may give us. From the same work we may receive ideas of unity, in its various grades, repose, moderation, symmetry, and purity. Moreover, it may give us "ideas of power" and "of relation." In no other work is the balance between Symmetry and Unity so well kept; and in the depth and variety of its expression the Sonata excels all other instrumental forms. Is it not, therefore, justly regarded as more noble than the rest?

* This view of the Fugue must be taken with a very large grain of salt.—ED.

(Translated for this Journal.)

Extracts from Berlioz.

I.

An admirable singer, the lamented SONTAG, at the end of the trio of masks in "Don Giovanni" invented a phrase which she substituted for the original one. Her example was soon followed;—it was too fine not to be,—and the singers of Europe adopted for the rôle of Donna Anna the intention of Madame Sontag.

One day at a general rehearsal in London, a conductor of my acquaintance, hearing at the end of the trio this audacious substitution, stopped the orchestra and turning to the prima donna, asked:

"Well, well; what is the matter? Have you forgotten your part, madam?"

"No, Sir, I am singing the Sontag version."

"Ah! very well; but may I venture to ask why you prefer the Sontag version to the Mozart version, which is the only one that we have anything to do with here?"

"Because it sounds better"!!!

II.

There is a work of Beethoven known as the Sonata in C-sharp minor, the adagio of which is one of those poems which human language cannot characterize. Its means of effect are very simple: the left hand plays softly broad chords of a sad and solemn character, whose length allows the vibrations of the piano to die away gradually in each; above, the first fingers of the right hand play in arpeggio a persistent accompanying figure, the form of which hardly varies from the first measure to the last, while the other fingers sound a sort of lamentation, the melodic flowering of this sombre harmony.

One day thirty years ago, LISZT in playing this adagio before a little circle of which I was one, undertook to travesty it, after a fashion he had then taken up, to catch the applause of the fashionable public. Instead of the long bass chords, the severe uniformity of rhythm and movement of which I have spoken, he inserted trills and tremolos, he hurried and slackened the time, disturbing by his passionate accents the calm of this sadness, and making the thunder roll through this cloudless sky, darkened only by the withdrawing of the sun. I was cruelly annoyed, I confess;—more even than I have been sometimes at hearing our unhappy singers embroider the grand air in "Der Freischütz,"—for to this annoyance was added the distress of seeing such an artist catch the tricks into which usually only commonplace players fall. But what could be done? Liszt was then like a child who gets up without complaining after a tumble, if you pretend not to see him, but falls to crying if you hold out your hand to him. He has raised himself proudly; and so years after, he no longer pursued success, but success was out of breath in following him:—the parts were exchanged.

Let us return to our Sonata. Lately one of those genial and cultivated men whom artists are so happy to meet, had assembled a few friends; I was of the number. * * * * * [Liszt had been playing a piece of Weber's.] As he ended, the lamp which lighted the room seemed on the point of going out; one of us went to relight it.

"Don't touch it," said I, "If he will play Beethoven's Adagio in C-sharp minor, this half-light will not mar it at all."

"Willingly," said Liszt, "But put out the lamp entirely and cover the fire, to make the darkness complete."

Then, out of this darkness, after a moment's pause, the noble elegy, the same which he had once so strangely disfigured, rose in its sublime simplicity; not a note, not an accent was added to the notes and accents of the composer. It was the shade of Beethoven, invoked by an artist, whose grand voice we now heard. Each of us trembled in silence, and after the last chord we still maintained the silence;—we wept.

Verdi's "La Forza del Destino," at Her Majesty's Theatre.

(From the Daily Telegraph, June 24.)

"On horror's head horrors accumulate" must surely have been Verdi's recommendation to the librettist when Piave set to work on "La Forza del Destino." Or perhaps the poet has received general instructions which he may have summarized into some such recipe as this: First catch a middle-age romance with plenty of action; boil it down to four acts, allowing all character, poetry, and interest to evaporate, but carefully straining off the assassinations; pour in plenty of Church business; mix the suicides and family murders well up with hymns to the Virgin and priestly benedictions; spice with dancing at frequent intervals; throw in curses and chants with a lavish hand; serve up hot and strong, and you'll have a very fair dish of Italian opera." In speaking of "Don Carlos," on the other hand, we alluded to Verdi's fondness for the horrible. But we must confess that we did not then know the "Force of Destiny." Here he absolutely revels in bloodshed. He pours it out with a desinvoltura that is perfectly charming. There is a something quite fascinating in the grace with which he sticks a hero, as a matador would a bull, looking round meanwhile for the admiration of bright eyes, and tripping off to the lightest of dance tunes. As to describing "La Forza del Destino" seriously, the story is much too rollicking and bloodthirsty for that. The mixture of homeliness and violent death is worthy of a domestic drama of the good old school. When the curtain rises we see a respectable-looking old gentleman seated with a lady, whose powdered hair shows her to be living in the middle of the last century. Father and daughter are on the best of terms, and nothing can exceed the affection with which he speaks the first words of the opera, "Buona notte!" which, by the bye, would be more appropriate as the last. Having said "Good night!" he immediately goes off, in order to allow the lover to come in. Don Alvaro, the tenor, is going to elope with the soprano, whose name of course is Leonora, that being the only appellation which the poverty-stricken Italian tongue can find for a prima donna who has any self-respect. We do not trouble ourselves about the name of the father, for, as he is indiscreet enough to interrupt the lovers just as they are on the point of starting on their honeymoon, we do not see much more of him. But there is originality in the manner of his "taking off." Novices in the dramatic art, like Da Ponte and Mozart have made Don Giovanni, in a similar peculiarly perplexing predicament, fight the Commendatore and stab him. But the hero of Piave and Verdi is made of nobler stuff. He assures the father that Leonora is "Pura siccome un' angelo"—we wonder how many times Verdi has set those highly original words—and, bidding him strike the guilty one, throws his pistol on the ground. But as it falls it goes off and kills the father, who has only just time to curse his daughter before he dies. Alvaro rushes off, crying out, "Unlucky weapon!" Leonora exclaims, "Ciel vieti," and the curtain falls. There is a Spartan simplicity about this act which is inimitable. One character, whose part consists of "Buona notte; ti maledico," being already disposed of, there is plenty of room for other members of the operatic troupe. We are introduced to them in the second act. Here we find a number of people carousing at an inn, among them a gentleman in black, who declares himself to be a student. But Preziosilla, a gipsy, tells us she knows better; and so do the audience, for they know that Verdi would not throw away a fine baritone voice on an untitled student. Sure enough, through a half-opened door, we catch a glimpse of Leonora, in doublet and hose, and she recognizes in the student a brother whom she seems particularly anxious to avoid. He, on the contrary, is, we guess from his inquiries about a certain traveller, "Was she seated on the mule, or rode astride," is just as desirous to find his sister for the purpose of avenging his father's death. Preziosilla, being a gipsy, of course sings a song and leads a dance, while, the ballet and the church always going together in opera, a procession of monks chant a dismal dirge. In the next scene Leonora seeks protection from a holy father. There is, of course, something piquant in the idea of a woman in male attire being received into the society of monks, and the padre assigns to her a hermit's cave in the rocks. The third act transports us from Spain to Italy, for no better reason than to give us a camp scene, with a capital tarantella danced by vivandières. In a battle that takes place behind the scenes, and the progress of which is watched with telescopes from the stage, Alvaro is dangerously wounded, but saved by the care of Don Carlo, the student of the preceding act, who finds that his friend is the murderer of his father. Alvaro, being a tenor, recovers quickly enough to be able to sing a martial song, and finish the act with a high chest C. The fourth opens with a comic scene between Fra Melitone and the poor people, to whom it is his duty, but not his pleasure, to dispense the hospitality of the monastery. Don Carlo, still intent on revenge, appears on the scene and challenges Alvaro, who, having taken the vows of a monk, refuses to fight until he is struck by his implacable antagonist. The duel takes place outside the grotto inhabited by the hermit Leonora, who, emerging from her retreat, is recognized by the combatants after Carlo has been mortally wounded. Calling his sister to him, he stabs her to the heart, and then dies happy. There is now no one to kill Alvaro; but as, of course, he cannot be allowed to live, he throws himself into a torrent, and all the chief dramatis personæ being thus made away with, the curtain falls.

The music with which Verdi has enlivened this wild story is so uniform in style that it is not worth while to analyze it in detail, and it may be sufficiently described in conjunction with the singers by whom it is so admirably illustrated. There is no overture, but the opera opens with a decidedly effective prelude. The characteristic theme of the allegro agitato recurs repeatedly, and may be meant to typify the force of fate; while that of the andante, a very graceful and expressive subject, reappears in Leonora's air of the second act, "Madre, pietosa Vergine"—the prayer in which, with the monk's chant of "Venite adoremus" for an accompaniment, she supplicates help from the "Mother of God." In the prelude to the ceremony of her induction as a friar this lovely theme is also heard in inexplicable alternation with full organ chords. This scene is one of the very best in the opera; the large, simple melody of the concluding hymn, "La Vergine degli angeli," well harmonized and effectively supported by a pizzicato accompaniment, proving really impressive. The part of Leonora is finely adapted to Mlle. Tietjens, who, in unusually good voice, gave splendid effect to all the very exacting music, and looked as well in her cavalier's costume, as in her feminine garb. Leonora does not appear at all in the third act, while neither her romance in the first, "Me pellegrina ed orfana," nor her air, with harp accompaniment, "Paee mio dio," in the last, offers any remarkable features; but Mlle. Tietjens made the most of every opportunity for display in a part which is probably even better suited to her than to its original representative, Mme. Barbot. Don Alvaro was written expressly for Signor Tamberlik, and as the opera has, we believe, been given nowhere since its first production in St. Petersburg, about four years ago, the character has been sustained by him alone. But the Roman tenor's voice has, in the meantime, lost much of its power, while that of Signor Mongini is as brilliant now as it was six years since. There is certainly no other Italian singer on the stage who could do justice to so terribly trying a part. In the very first act the beauty of his high notes, especially his B flat, and the perfect ease with which he gives them out, delighted his hearers and made them pleased even with the commonplace duet of the lovers, "Ah! seguirti." But his chief effects were in the third act. Alvaro's aria, "Or tu cho in seno," a melodious and characteristically Verdi-ish effusion, provided with a recitative and a long prelude, in which there is a pretty clarinet solo, produced a sensation, and the audience would gladly have heard it a second time. The bold melody of the finale with chorus, "S'affronta la morte," a parallel to the similarly placed "Di quella pira" of "Il Trovatore," was given out with such unstinted force, such reckless energy, that the singer could only just reach the C with which the piece and the act conclude. The famous "Ut de poitrine" was however attained, and the audience were in ecstasies, recalling the popular tenor with enthusiasm. Signor Mongini's voice is too noble to be lightly or thoughtlessly imperilled. Mr. Santley is perfectly admirable as Don Carlo. There is not the shadow of a fault to be found with any phrase that he sings in the whole course of the opera, but his most strikingly successful effort is in the scena, "Vero fatale del mio destino," the slow movement of which, on a frank and genuine melody effectively accompanied, is the best solo in the opera. It was splendidly sung by our English baritone, the elaborate cadenza, extending to the high G, being admirably articulated. Equally excellent and equally well fitted is Madame Trebelli in the part of Preziosilla, whose clever and characteristic canzone, "Al suon del tamburo," was deservedly applauded, and who led a rataplan with chorus with such spirit that it was vociferously enored. In this, which would not have been written but for a certain well-known rataplan in "Les Huguenots," as mostly throughout the opera, the fresh-voiced chorus singers proved themselves very efficient. It was largely owing to them that the preghiera of the second act, "Padre eterno Signor," a fine concerted piece, in which a double choir and five principal singers—the first soprano soaring high above the rest—participate, won its enthusiastic encore. Not only were the chief singers as excellent as they could be, but the subordinate characters were equally well sustained. Herr Rokitsky, though not in good voice, was an impressive Padre Guardiano; Signor Gassier was excellent as the comic Fra Melitone; no fault could be found with Signor Bossi, who presented Il Marchese, Leonora's father; Signor Poli was a good Alcalde; and Mr. Hohler exhibited some histrionic talent by his admirable make-up and demeanor as the pedler Trabuco. The scenery was sufficiently picturesque, the costumes new and appropriate, and more than usual attention had apparently been paid to the details of the mise en scene.

To all, and they are many, who admire and enjoy Verdi's early operas, "La Forza del Destino" will be a godsend. It abounds with facile and striking melody; it alternates between dashing, feverish brightness and strong, serious interest; is invariably dramatic, and is most admirably performed. Its success with the general public is certain. At the same time, we must confess that we long for something in opera that is spontaneously genial and unaffectedly lovely, after the series of ghastly and lime-light illuminated pictures which Verdi for twenty years has kept constantly before our eyes.

Mlle. Christine Nilsson.

Just twenty years ago a "star from the North" came to throw some rays of consoling light upon the at that time gloomy fortunes of Mr. Lumley. Opera-goers thought it was "all over" with the director and proprietor of Her Majesty's Theatre, and were about to chant his "Requiescat." But on a certain 4th of May, Jenny Lind appeared, and in an instant matters changed. "One glance"—said Robert Schumann, in 1836, announcing the appearance of an unknown work by Schubert—"one glance . . . and die Welt glänzt wieder frisch." With even more propriety might Mr. Lumley have uttered the same words in 1847, after the first few notes had issued from the throat of the "Swedish Nightingale," whose triumph enabled him for a period not only to make head against the formidable opposition instituted that same year at Covent Garden, but to ruin the first speculators and put their successors to many a shift.

Now in the present year, up to this moment, the fortunes of Her Majesty's Theatre have looked anything but bright. The old operas, even with Mlle. Tietjens as prima donna, have failed to "draw." One or two new singers, from whom more or less was expected, have afforded scant satisfaction. Signor Mongini, Mr. Santley, and Madame Trebelli-Bettini, the first with his magnificent voice, the others with their admirable singing, have been unable to stem the tide of ill-luck. The reproduction of Verdi's lugubrious "I Lombardi" only served to show that it had not been shelved without reason. The livelier "Fal-staff," which pleased so greatly three years since, and promised to become a stock piece in the repertory, was scarcely more fruitful. True, the cast of Nicolai's opera was inferior to that of 1864, when Giuglini played Fenton, M. Marcello Junca Falstaff, and Mlle. Bettelheim Mrs. Page—parts now represented with far less efficiency by Mr. Tom Hohler, Herr Rokitski, and Madame De Merie-Lablache. No matter what the cause, however, "Falstaff" did little for the theatre. The "Huguenots" itself appeared to have lost its charm; even Mozart's incomparable "Figaro," strongly cast, was powerless for good; nothing, in short, would take. At the moment, too, when Mlle. Tietjens was about to show (to her honor) how much more at home she is in Beethoven's "Fidelio" than in certain Italian opera parts in which she so curiously delights to exhibit, a temporary loss of voice shut her out from the arena. One gleam of hope was shed by the refulgent glare of Weber's "Oberon," which attracted an immense audience; but, owing it may be presumed to the indisposition of Mlle. Tietjens, an indisposition possibly aggravated by her zealous exertions on the night of that single performance, "Oberon" was not repeated. There was still a fine company; there was still Signor Ardi, with his orchestra, and still a chorus unmatched in Europe; but all was to little purpose. The old cloud again hung frowningly over Her Majesty's Theatre, shrouding the future in darkness. Nothing could attract the public. Everybody went to hear Patti, or Lucca, at the Royal Italian Opera; while the venerable portals of the elder house were swinging on their hinges, apparently only to let in the wind, like the door of Cenci's sombre castle in Shelley's tragedy—or at all events to admit privileged visitors, which, if not an equivalent for wind, is at best an equivalent for smoke. However, just as the crisis seemed inevitable, the 10th of June arrived, and with the 10th of June a complete reaction. A fair apparition, in the shape of another "Swedish Nightingale," turned everything topsy turvy, as if by magic. Mlle. Christine Nilsson has been announced from the beginning in the prospectus, but very little attention was paid to the fact. Mlle. Ilma de Murska had also been announced in the prospectus, but no Mlle. Ilma de Murska made a sign. Tired out, nevertheless, with the old and worn routine, when the name of Mlle. Nilsson was seen advertised in the bills of the day, operatic London awoke; the habitual frequenters rushed to the box-office; the privileged visitors were scattered like chaff; there was no more wind, no more smoke; the cloud was dispersed, and on the eventful evening the house was crammed to the roof by an audience for all the world like that which, so many years back, under similar circumstances, had assembled to greet the original "Swedish Nightingale." Christine Nilsson appeared, and though the opera was that naughty "Traviata," it was all the same. She came, she sang, she conquered.

The history of Mlle. Nilsson, in so far as it concerns the public, may be briefly told. She came out not long since at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris, as the heroine in a French version of the same "Traviata," and, as the representative of Violetta, obtained an undisputed success, although one of her most enthusiastic partisans (in the Revue des Deux Mondes) was compelled to say that "ce rôle de courtisane est médiocrement en harmonie, ce semble, avec les qualités qui la distinguent." "But"—adds Mlle. Nilsson's panegyrist—"le naturel et le comme il faut percent dans tout." This, it must be admitted, was but equivocal praise, although no one who had witnessed the performance of Mlle. Nilsson felt disposed to question the truth of it. It is not, however, to the "Traviata," nor to M. Flotow's "Martha," in which she also appeared as Lady Henriette, with signal success, that the interesting young Swede owes her Parisian reputation, but to a part, alike in a musical and dramatic sense, of a very different character from either. One of the various undertakings of M. Carvalho, manager of the Théâtre Lyrique, who has for some time been in the habit of bringing out French versions of German operas (with which, by the way, no end of liberties are taken by his adapters), was the production of "Die Zaubervögel," under the title of "La Flûte Enchantée." The part of Astreaflimmante (Queen of Night) was entrusted to Mlle. Nilsson, and her execution of the two celebrated airs, unexampled for difficulty, showed her to be mistress of an exceptional range and power of voice which, strong as was the impression she had already created, took musical Paris by surprise. That the long run of Mozart's fantastic opera at the Théâtre Lyrique was chiefly due to the singing of Mlle. Nilsson is undoubted. "Ce fut une révélation"—wrote an influential critic at the time—"cette voix splendide, virginale, juste, flexible, égale en sa rare étendue, modulant, trilliant à des hauteurs inaccessibles." Indeed French amateurs, almost unanimously, hailed "a phenomenon;" and although we are not quite able to understand what "modulant et trilliant à des hauteurs inaccessibles" may precisely signify, inasmuch as we never heard of modulating to a height, or trilling to a height, or reaching by any means to heights that are inaccessible, we are quite prepared to share the enthusiasm of the critic whose flowery sentence we have quoted. Christine Nilsson became the talk of Paris; and the words applied by an Austrian dignitary to the celebrated Madame Lange, for whom Mozart composed the airs in question—"Sie singt Sterne"—which the feuilletonistes freely translated "Les étoiles lui sortent de la bouche," were as freely applied to her. The Queen of Night, as exhibited under the features of "cette vierge du Nord," became the rage; the Sun of Italy for a time looked pale before the Polar Star, and the singing of Mlle. Nilsson made even the music of Mozart popular with the pleasure-loving sons and daughters of Latetia.

It is only natural that a reputation so brilliant, although almost literally achieved in one night, and by a single performance—for it was the second and most difficult of Astreaflimmante's airs that made the "hit"—should have roused the attention of our English managers; and it was simply a question at which of our Italian opera-houses Mlle. Nilsson should be offered the opportunity of revealing herself to London. With two young "absolute first ladies" of the highest pretensions, Mr. Gye thought probably he had enough on his hands; and so the chance has fallen to Mr. Mapleson, who, in the uncertainty that seems to attend the proceedings of Mlle. Ilma de Murska, stood greatly in need of something of the kind. And now that she has come forth under his auspices he has as good cause as had Mr. Lumley himself, twenty years ago, to exclaim with Schumann, "Ein Blick . . . und die Welt glänzt wieder frisch." Mlle. Nilsson has played to houses crowded to the roof. We wish she had made her debut in any part but that of Dumas the younger's phibetically sentimental heroine. She cannot, or at least does not, act the character; and no one will think the worse of her on that account. But to atone for the absence of a dramatic filling up, she sings the music, which here and there contains some of the melodious and touching that Signor Verdi has composed, in a manner very little short of perfection. Mlle. Nilsson has many qualities to attract. Her appearance is greatly in her favor; and no sooner was she seen and recognized than a murmur, like a foreboding of success, went audibly through the house. Pale, fair-haired, a little above the medium height, slender in frame, composed and graceful in bearing, she had won general sympathy before she opened her lips. The first sentence Violetta has to utter, in her part of the drinking duet with Alfredo ("Libiamo, libiamo,") confirmed the good impression, and discovered a pure soprano the mere freshness of whose tones would alone have exercised a charm, and at the same time not less bright and penetrating than youthful and unworn. As the opera proceeded, the exceptional attributes of this rare voice, as extended in compass as it is beautiful in quality, were one by one revealed; and the air and quick movement—or, to employ a conventional term, the caballetto—which bring the opening act to an end, the first in a minor key ("Ah, fors'è lui che l'anima,") given with heartfelt expression, the last ("Sempre libera,") in the more cheerful and animated major, with a finish, brilliancy, and characteristic individuality beyond praise, set the seal upon a triumph as genuine as it was undisputed. If music, "resina sensuum," as some philosophers hold, is the best remedy for melancholy—mentis medicina mesta—one would imagine that so accomplished a mistress as Violetta here showed herself might be her own doctor and effect her own cure. The impression produced by this display was unequivocal, and Mlle. Nilsson had already established her position in the opinion of all who heard her as a singer of the first rank.

We shall not attempt to follow the new comer step by step through the entire performance, because we feel convinced that she will find more favorable opportunities for the exhibition, not merely of her great natural gifts, but of her artistic requirements, than are presented in any part of "La Traviata," which we confess, in spite of the admirably dramatic and well-conducted finale to the second act, and a vast deal of pretty and elegant music, is an opera we should like to see banished now and for ever from the stage. Every character in the drama, with a single exception, is more or less contemptible; while that single exception, the elder Geronte, Alfredo's father, is unhappily an unmitigated bore. Mlle. Nilsson has been greatly lauded by one or two of our contemporaries for dispensing with all the little bits of byplay which let us into the secret of Violetta's incurable melody, and with other virtues of omission; but this only means that she does not play the character as the author intended it, as Madame Doche used to play it, in the French drama, and Mlle. Piccolomini, in the Italian operatic version; and that we are half left to believe that consumption has nothing to do with the matter, and that Violetta dies purely out of love, like "a maid forsaken and distraught." The wisest resolution, in our opinion, that Mlle. Nilsson could possibly adopt would be to abandon such parts altogether and confine herself to a healthier repertory.

In conclusion, let us not be over sanguine. Mlle. Nilsson has been compared with Jenny Lind. They are both Swedes, we are aware; but it is necessary to bear in mind that Jenny Lind's range of characters was varied and extensive—Italian, German, and French opera being equally within her grasp. Should Mlle. Nilsson prove equally versatile, it will be well for the art she professes, and even now, it must be admitted, adorns. Time, however, alone can show. The high estimate of her capacity entertained abroad may be gathered from the fact that she is engaged at the Grand Opéra in Paris to play the part of Ophelia in M. Ambroise Thomas's forthcoming opera of "Hamlet." We can much more readily picture to ourselves an ideal Ophelia in Mlle. Nilsson than a musical "Hamlet" from M. Thomas; but the distinction conferred thus early on the young artist is none the less. On the other hand, one thing is certain—Madame Miolan Carvalho will be glad to see her most formidable rival removed from the Théâtre Lyrique to another establishment.

Meanwhile Mlle. Nilsson's second part in London is Margaret, in "Faust." She, too, was "unfortunate"—but with a difference.—Saturday Review, June 15th.

A New Organ.

(From the Chicago Republican.)

The completion of the great organ in the Boston Music Hall was hailed as an event of national interest. It was a novelty, and crowds flocked to see and hear it. There was trace of Old World grandeur in its massive tones, that touched a new chord in American life. Other cities quickly caught the spirit. Brooklyn and Worcester have already their large organ's, and the Young Men's Christian Association now propose to devote fifty or sixty thousand dollars to the purchase of one for Chicago. The Jesuit church is also to have one, at a cost of about thirty thousand dollars.

Even admitting that a spirit of rivalry has much to do with it, these are significant facts in our musical history, and, taken in connection with the rapid revolutions in taste within the last few years, promise much for the future. It has not been very long since negro minstrelsy was the only distinctively American style of music. In the parlor, in the concert-room, in the streets, and even at church, translated into grave and solemn measure, its simple strains were heard. It had its merits. There was an occasional vein of real pathos in it, oddly contrasting with quaint outbursts of rollicking mirth. It pictured the moods of a mercurial race, of which Mr. Gottschalk has best caught the poetic side. But Ethiopian minstrelsy has mostly passed with the social phases that gave it birth, to be unearthed, perhaps, by some antiquarian of the next century, and held up like the lays of the Troubadours and Minnesingers, as a peculiarity of our civilization.

Next followed a deluge of moral ballads. Some one struck a new key. It touched the heart of the people, and forthwith the country was flooded with sentimental outpourings in bad poetry and worse music. Home and the family ties were the burdens of the song. Good subjects, certainly, but they suggested the stereotyped good little boy in the Sunday-school books. He gets to be dreadfully tiresome if he is good, and one cannot help cherishing the naughty wish to read about some bad little boy, if the bad little boy only won't be stupid. It was the first timid venture of Puritanism into the field of secular art, if art it could be called, and it probably was not thought best to make it too attractive. Still, it reflected a pleasant phase in our social life, and developed a few simple and characteristic melodic forms, of which the rest were diluted imitations.

The war brought its train of patriotic songs, modeled mostly after the same forms. These fulfilled their mission, and passed with the occasion. But the war brought also the maturity that ripens fast in great revolutions. Heroic deeds gave birth to heroic thoughts. The current of life deepened. After the storm, the "still small voice" was heard. But it sought more poetic forms. The soil was ripe to receive the seeds of an old art-culture that were cast broadside over the country through the great influx of foreign artists. It remains yet to be seen what shall spring up and bear fruit, and what shall need hot-house nurture.

But one of the most hopeful signs of the development of a solid taste is the demand for organs and organ music. Art, cherished from whatever idle motives of vanity or fashion, becomes a teacher. Love follows knowledge. The influence of the organ as a moral power, finds ample illustration. It is essentially the interpreter of sacred music, and naturally follows in the wake of strong religious convictions. Or is it a cause as well as an effect? It was the chief instrument of Germany in its evangelical era—the era that preceded Klopstock and Lessing, and produced Bach, the great master-spirit of the organ, and the creator of the Protestant type of music. Its influence has moulded the religious musical element, of which Mendelssohn is the best modern exponent, and is the basis of the grand choral music of Germany.

The instincts of France are more dramatic. Its taste is formed from the operatic stage. The organ is too grave for the impulsive French character. The orchestra is better adapted even to the brilliant Catholic service, and their organs are said to differ from the German in the predominance of the effective reel stops. But in England, the influence of the organ can be most clearly traced. English taste is proverbially solid, like her institutions, and verifies the words of the Chinese moralist, Confucius, who has aptly said, "Wouldst thou know if a people be well governed, if their manners be good or bad, examine the music they perform." England is eminently the home of the oratorio. Handel and Mendelssohn have always found there the largest audience, and the warmest admirers. She has also the finest Protestant cathedral service in the world. Without pretending to discuss the English creative genius in art it is safe to conclude that a taste which has grown out of strong moral convictions is on the whole a better model than that which has grown out of a civilization that always sleeps upon the verge of revolution.

The ultimate direction of American taste is scarcely yet determined, but there is a strong element in our social life which must find its best expression in the style of music of which the organ is the interpreter. A large organ naturally calls for a large choir. This suggests the possibility of a permanent choral society in Chicago in connection with the Musical Conservatory, which, sustained by a large organ, may bring out the great oratorios with suitable power. With such a central impulse, and a broader musical education, other choral societies would naturally spring up through the country, and we might in no great length of time hope for something like the English festivals, where thousands of voices join in the grand old master-pieces with a thrilling effect that can scarcely be conceived, and the hearing of which forms an era in a life-time.

Music Abroad.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The beautiful Palace, to help repair the ravages by fire, took a benefit on its own account in the last week of June. An enormous audience filled the middle transept and the galleries adjacent. The orchestra was filled by some 2500 singers and players, the very best that London could bring together. Very seldom has any concert united so many artists of the highest rank. The arrangements, as at the Handel Festivals, were superintended by the Sacred Harmonic Society. "The Crystal Palace," as the Times says, "has done a world of good for music, and it is only right that a moment of need musicians should come forward to lend a helping hand to the Crystal Palace;" which they all did freely. The first part consisted of copious selections from Elijah, Mr. Costa conducting. According to the Times:—

"A finer execution of Elijah, or rather of those portions of Elijah selected for performance, was never heard in this country. The choruses were superb, from "Help, Lord!" sequel to the inimitable orchestral overture, to "And then shall your light break forth," the natural termination of the oratorio and also of Wednesday's performance—one proof among many of the admirable discernment with which the selection had been made. We might dwell upon more than one of the choral performances—as, for example, "Baal, we cry to thee!" with its two wonderfully characteristic companions, "Hear our cry," and "Hear and answer, Baal," "Blessed are the men," and "He watching over Israel," which in the delicate observance of light and shade we do not remember to have been surpassed; and last and greatest of all, "Thanks be to God! He laveth the thirsty land," which might bear comparison with the most successful achievements at any of the Handel Festivals; but it is enough to extend that general and hearty commendation which is the just due of a performance almost from first to last irreproachable. The times, too, of each chorus were taken to absolute perfection. How the solo vocal parts were sustained by Mlle. Tietjens, Mesdames Rudersdorff and Sain-ton-Dolby, Messrs. Santley and Sims Reeves, may easily be imagined. On such an occasion it would be out of place to criticize the performances of these distinguished artists; but, happily, they brought such excellent goodwill to their several tasks that, under any circumstances, they would have afforded the most exacting critic little chance of exercising his functions. Enough that the selection from the two parts of Elijah—a very liberal one, including a large majority of the finest pieces—was heard with unqualified satisfaction from beginning to end; and the only regret was that, under such unusual conditions, the whole of the noblest oratorio of modern times could not be presented. The occasional "practices" at Exeter Hall of the "contingent 1,600," representing the quota supplied by London to the Handel Festival Chorus, have borne good fruits.

The second part was miscellaneous. It began with such a performance of Auber's overture to Masaniello as would have made its composer twenty years younger could he have heard it. The orchestra, some 450 strong, played as one man, under the energetic beat of a conductor born to sway the movement of vast masses—the orchestral generalissimo of Europe! The effect was "electric." The overture was called for again, amid a storm of applause, and repeated with the same precision and effect. Another "sensation" was produced immediately afterwards by Madame Grisi in "The Minstrel Boy." The emphasis and meaning thrown into this, one of the grandest of Irish melodies, by our old and always vividly remembered favorite, impressed itself on every hearer, and an encore as unanimous as it was hearty showed how thoroughly her efforts had been appreciated. Never was public performer received with more marked and significant favor. Then came the familiar duet, "Crudel perchè," from Mozart's Figaro, sung by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Signor Graziani, as it has so frequently been sung for the delight of crowded audiences at the Royal Italian Opera; and then Handel's marvellously brilliant "Let the bright Seraphim," executed in perfection by Mlle. Adelina Patti, with Mr. T. Harper as trumpet—a performance which excited the never-failing enthusiasm. The revolutionary duet from Masaniello, sung by Signors Naudin and Graziani, and the great scene of Leonora from Fidello, in which the noble voice of Madame Maria Vilda was heard with fine effect, followed next, and were succeeded by Mr. Costa's beautiful terzetto, "Vanne a colci che adoro," sung by Mlle. Adelina Patti, Signor Mario, and Mr. Sims Reeves. This was one of the most genuine treats of the day; and no wonder that it should be unanimously asked for again. To say nothing of Mlle. Patti, whose part it would have been difficult to fill so well, it was a treat to hear the greatest of Italian and the greatest of English tenors join their voices together in a piece of music so admirably calculated to display the best qualities of each. After the trio came Thalberg's brilliant piano-forte fantasia on "Home, sweet Home," played by Madame Arabella Goddard, as she had played it over and over again, and received with the favor to which she has always been accustomed since she first helped to make popular this very popular composition. The prayer from Rossini's Mosè in Egitto, glorious in its majestic simplicity, was admirably given by the choir and encoed as a matter of course. To this succeeded the air, with chorus, "Com è gentil," from Donizetti's Don Pasquale, in which Signor Mario, how it need not be said, sang the solo part; "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir," from Handel's Acis and Galatea, charmingly sung by Madame Sherrington (piccola, Mr. Rockstro); the magnificent air, with chorus, "Sound an Alarm," from the same composer's Judas Maccabeus, splendidly declaimed by Mr. Sims Reeves, who has long made it his own; the comic trio from Cimarosa's Matrimonio Supto, with Mesdames Grisi, Rudersdorff, and Sain-ton-Dolby, as Carolina, Elizabetha, and Fidalma; "O ruddier than the cherry," given with his accustomed spirit and gusto by Mr. Santley (bute, Mr. R. S. Pratten;) and, to conclude, the famous trio, with chorus, "See the conquering hero comes," in which the solo parts were undertaken by Mesdames Sherrington, Rudersdorff, and Sain-ton, a worthy ending to a concert almost unparalleled in variety of attraction. The only regret was that Mlle. Tietjens, who had delighted everybody present with her singing of "Hear ye, Israel," and "Holy! Holy!" in Elijah, had nothing put down for her in the "miscellaneous" selection.

The Prince of Wales remained through the whole of Elijah and until about the middle of the second part. The concert was a brilliant success, and it is hoped may prove of substantial advantage to the Crystal Palace.

MME. ARABELLA GODDARD. The London papers are ringing the praises of their favorite pianist, for giving a performance restricted to a selection from Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, except that Mme. Sainton-Dolby sang songs with words between the four groups of the wordless, each containing four.

OPERA. At Her Majesty's, the Nilsson had appeared in her second rôle, Gounod's Margaret, and with increase of admiration. They say she loses all recollection of herself in the Gretchen of Goethe. Mme. Trebelli was the Siebel; Sig. Gardoni, Faust; and Pandolfini, Mephistopheles.—The succeeding pieces were the Huguenots, Faust again, Traviata again, and then the long promised "Forza del Destino," followed by Faust, Murtha, Faust, &c., &c.

At Covent Garden, meanwhile, they had Sonambula, with Patti; Don Carlos again; La Favorita, with Lucca, Mario and Graziani; L'Africaine; Don Giovanni; Il Barbiere; Faust; Crispino, with repetitions of some of these. Gounod's Romeo et Juliette is in rehearsal.

Of Verdi's "La Forza" we have already copied one description, strongly condemnatory of the plot. Another critic says:

In ghastly, fierce, and strained combinations like this, Signor Verdi revels, but sometimes without even such inspiration as animates his better music. In "La Forza" all is violence and elaboration. Hardly a trait of pure individual melody is to be found from the first to the last; but in place of it, either reproductions of the most faded form of commonplace Italian caballetti, or passages with some interval affectively omitted (for the disappointment of the ear,) which have not the excuse of French Opera mannerism, since that belongs to the style of the country. Halcyon would have been untrue to his birthplace had it not been mannered. Signor Verdi is untrue to Busseto, his Italian home, because he is so. There is considerable ingenuity in some of the accompaniments, which, after all, are merely (in opera) subsidiary concealments of the meagreness of the melody. Those to Don Alvaro's great air are violent, barid, with a certain originality in them which reminds us of Weber's spread pianoforte phrases. But that the matter so elaborately dressed was not worth cooking, we are satisfied, and even in this branch of his labor Signor Verdi is as often audacious and experimental as successful. The best number in the opera—indeed, one of the best pieces which Signor Verdi has ever written—is the Quintet with double chorus, No. 9, Act 2. There is a certain dry humor in the music given to Fra Melitone, which, by the way, is exceedingly well wrought out by M. Gassier. The Tarantella, No. 25, is spirited; but we could not easily name anything more commonplace than the gipsy's rattaplan song and chorus. One or two other concerted pieces, in the writer's peculiar style, should be mentioned, but none equal those in "Nabucco," "Ernani" and "Il Traviatore." There is no want of earnestness in him; but blundering in the dark and walking forward in the bright light of day, imply different conditions of culture and progress. We may return to these Verdi operas again, since "he they white, or he they black" (as the nursery rhyme hath it), they are the works of one of the few living men who have the ear of Europe, and as such, claim deliberate consideration. But return does not imply becoming inured to defects and extravagances belonging to a time of false taste and decay. The performance at Her Majesty's Theatre is, in many respects, as good as could possibly be obtained for a work so violent and so complicated. Mlle. Tietjens and Signor Mongini were cut out by Nature to sing Signor Verdi's music, and did their best. Mme. Trebelli Bettini gave the voluble music of Pezziello, the gipsy, very well—as she always does; but the part is written inconsiderately high in more than one passage. Of M. Gassier's excellent performance we have spoken. Mr. Tom Holder and Herr Rokitsansky were out of tune. Due care had been taken to prepare the opera, and the public received it well. Whether the success is to last or not remains to be seen.

ELLA'S MUSICAL UNION. The sixth Matinée (June 18) was made famous by the first performance since 1859 of Anton Rubinstein, "the greatest of living pianists" (in the opinion of the Orchestra), a "composer of a vast collection of important works for the theatre and concert room." Vieuxtemps also took part, with Ries for second violin, Goffric and Hahn viole, and Jacquard violoncello; and, according to the Orchestra, there never was anything so fine as their rendering of the following programme:

Quartet, B flat, No. 69	Haydn.
Trio, C minor (Op. 66)	Mendelssohn.
Quintet in C (Op. 29)	Beethoven.
Nocturne, D flat	Chopin.
Capriccio, No. 3 (Op. 18), A minor	Mendelssohn.
Tarantella, B minor	A. Rubinstein.

PHILHARMONIC. The seventh concert of the Old Society was one of the most interesting yet given. The selections were: Symphony, No. 1, in E flat, Spohr; Prælude and Benedictus from Beethoven's great Mass in D, sung by Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Drasdil, Messrs. Morgan and Santley, with violin obligato by Mr. Blagrove; Scenes from Freyshütz, by Tietjens; Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, the piano part by Mme. Arabella Goddard; and for Part Second, Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night."

The third and fourth of Dr. Wylde's excellent New Philharmonic Concerts, in St. George's Hall, were as attractive as either of their predecessors. At the third we had Mendelssohn's earliest published symphony—the one in C minor, a marvellous work, the age at which it was composed taken into consideration. Dr. Wylde had the good taste to perform the original schizzo in this symphony, instead of the one arranged from the Ottavo by Mendelssohn, at the instigation of the Philharmonic Society. The overtures were Cherubini's Lionel Lincoln and Weber's Oberon, both executed with remarkable vigor. Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto was played in his most finished manner by Mr. Halle, who introduced, in the first and last movements, the composer's own cadences. Vocal music was contributed by the young and promising Mrs. Abbott and Mlle. Pauline Lucca, the last of whom was compelled to repeat the "Jewel-song" from Gounod's Faust.

At the fourth concert the symphony was that of Mendelssohn in A minor (the "Scotch") very finely played, and the schizzo encored unanimously. Mr. Henry Holmes, one of the best of our English violinists, gave Spohr's so-called "Dramatic Concerto" with remarkable neatness and brilliancy of execution, and with well-merited success. There were two concertos in this richly varied programme—the other being Beethoven's fifth and greatest for the pianoforte, which Madame Arabella Goddard has essayed so frequently in public that it is unnecessary to say more than that she played it with her accustomed brilliancy and deep poetic feeling and was unanimously called back into the orchestra at the termination. The overtures were Meyerbeer's elaborate and highly dramatic prelude to his brother, Michael Beer's, tragedy of Samson, and a new "Festival overture," in C, by Mr. T. M. Mudie, an English composer about whom, of late years, we have heard too little. Mr. Mudie is in every sense a distinguished musician, and his overture, though placed at the end of the concert, created a real impression. Its plan is unambitious and its style proportionately light; but it everywhere shows the hand of a master, both in its orchestration and the conduct of its details. Those who are acquainted with the earlier compositions of Mr. Mudie, more especially his symphonies in B flat, E, and D, his quintet in C minor, and his vocal settings of some of Petrarch's sonnets, could hardly have been surprised at this; on the contrary, their only surprise must have been that a musician thus accomplished and endowed should in these times of progress obtain so few opportunities of hearing. Dr. Wylde, however, has proved himself an adventurous explorer, and one of these days, perhaps, may favor us with one of Mr. Mudie's symphonies. The vocal music at this concert was contributed by Mlle. Sijnoo and Signor Gassier—the first of whom was loudly encored after her spirited delivery of the Polacca of Argonon, from Weber's Die Freischütz—well known to frequenters of Her Majesty's Theatre. At the fifth and last concert (on Wednesday night) the symphony was Beethoven's No. 7, the concertos Hummel's in A flat for pianoforte, played by Miss Kate Roberts, one of Dr. Wylde's most promising pupils, and Mendelssohn's for violin, by Herr Auer; the overtures were that of Signor Solima to his opera, Nardi del Tappi, and Weber's characteristic Pezziello. The singers were Madame Trebelli-Bettini and Signor Mongini, from Her Majesty's Theatre. Signor Schira's spirited, brilliant, and dramatic overture was finely played, and the composer loudly called forward at the end.—Musical World.

MR. HALLE'S PIANOFORTE RECITALS, in St. James's Hall, become more and more interesting as they proceed. The introduction at each of one of the sonatas of Schubert has proved a most interesting feature. Next to the sonatas of Beethoven those of Schubert rank indisputably highest for originality and rich variety of invention. Schubert has only left ten such works, but each in its way is a masterpiece. At the fifth recital (yesterday week,) Mr. Halle played the sonata in A minor, Op. 143, which, like its companions, was not published till after the death of the composer—and which the publishers inscribed to Mendelssohn, who, doubtless, would have preferred that compliment from Schubert himself. This sonata, a strange work in plan, but grand and forcible in expression, was finely played, and thoroughly appreciated by Mr. Halle's select audience. Another great attraction in the new series of "Recitals" is the introduction at each of a sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, the post of violoncello being held by that unrivalled performer Signor Piatti. The five sonatas of Beethoven for those instruments have now been all given, the one on Friday week being the second of Op. 102 (in D,) dedicated by the composer to his constant friend and patron the Countess Erdody. The last movement of this—an elaborately constructed figure—is reckoned among the Beethoven puzzles; but, in the hands of two such players as Mr. Halle and Signor Piatti, it comes out with crystalline clearness. The Beethoven sonatas being exhausted, the two by Mendelssohn are included at the sixth and seventh "Recitals" respectively.

Paris.

Nearly all the music of late has centered upon the Great Exposition; for instance: July 1st, the Festival of Peace, with solemn distribution of the prizes: Rossini's Hymn of "Peace," with six great bells and firing of cannon.—July 4th. Great Exposition Concert, conducted by Hallé, with 550 orchestra players and 500 Chorus singers: the Iphigenia overture with a new conclusion by Hal-vy (instead of Wagner's;) Hymn "to France," by Berlioz; Choruses from Jules Mævestras; the Prize Cantata, by M. St. Saëns, &c.—On the 5th and 7th, Festival Concerts of the French Orphonistes (male singing societies).—On the 8th, international competition of male singing societies; 6000 singers, including 340 French societies, the "Polyhymnia" from Cologne, the "Legia" from Liege, the "Orlando Lasso" from Halle, the "Tonic-sol-la" from England, the "Cecilians" from Geneva, &c.—14th, grand competition of brass instruments, 4000 blowers.—15th and 16th, competition of Havana music; and on the 21st, international competition of 12 military corps.

This is the eccentric title given by Rossini to his wonderful Hymn, a childish effort of his old age apparently, and which (by all accounts) was not impressive, and contained nothing to prevent its being forgotten as soon as it was heard.

A NAPOLÉON III
ET
A SON VAILLANT PEUPLE.
II Y M N E
AVEC ACCOMPANIMENT A GRAND ORCHESTRE ET MUSIQUE MILITAIRE, POUR LEYTON SOLO, UN PONTIF, LE
Chœur de Grand Prêtres,
Chœur de Vierges, de Solistes, et de Peuple.
A la fin
DANSE, CLICHES, TAMBOURS ET CANONS,
Excusez du peu!!
G. ROSSINI.
Passy. 1867. Paroles d'E. Pacini.

A contemporary states that M. Gounod has undertaken as the subject of his next opera no story less painful than that of "Francesca da Rimini." We cannot but feel concern at this. Convinced as he must be of his rare power in love tragedy, he might wisely recollect that its demands are great, not merely as calling for novelty in the treatment of a subject essentially monotonous, but that these mournful stories claim actors and actresses of a charm and accomplishment which are, to say the least of it, exceptional. What has become of the comic opera which he was to have written for the Opéra Comique? That M. Gounod has a fine vein of humor was clearly displayed in his "Médécin;" that he is a delicate master of what may be called Shandian pathos (in default of a better epithet) is proved in his settings of Branger's songs, where the music (this is saying much) adds to the words a beauty equal to their own. The world would rather have a good opera of mezzo carattere than the most high flown illustration of any episode in the Divina Commedia.—Athenæum.

Germany.

HILDESHEIM. The Musical World (London) has the following letter:

J. S. Bach's Matthæus Passion was lately performed in St. Michael's Church, Hildesheim, with the most gratifying success. That such a performance was possible in a town no bigger than ours speaks volumes for the ability and energy of Herr Nick, who, for the last ten years, has devoted himself to the cause of art here, and worked up the Vocal Association under his guidance to a state of great effectiveness. Herr Nick was ably supported by his professional visitors. Mme. Joachim sang the contralto music very finely; her execution of the air in the second part, the obbligato violin accompaniment being undertaken by no less an artist than Herr Joachim himself, produced more than ordinary effect. The other solo parts were given by a fair amateur of this town, Herr Denner, from Cassel, Herr Blatzmacher, from Hanover, and Herr R. Greber, formerly of Weimar.—At a party after the concert, Herr Joachim gave as toast: "May the brook of the most lofty sacred art, which has at last flowed to Hildesheim, never dry up, but ever continue to extend its vivifying waters!" To understand the above, the non-German scholar must be informed that the German for "brook" is "Bach."

BERLIN.—The opera will open here in the beginning of August with Auber's Part du Diable. The principal character will be sustained by Mlle. Grün.—A monumental stone has been erected to the memory of Mlle. de Ahna, whose premature death was so great a loss to the art. The artists of the Royal Theatre organized a musical festival for the occasion.

GOtha.—Spohr's oratorio of Die letzten Dinge was performed under the direction of Herr Wandersleb at the concert for the Freiligrath Fund.

LEIPsIC.—A new opera, Faustina Hesse, by Herr Louis Schubert, of Dresden, is to be given here next season.

HALLE.—The Singacademie gave a performance of Handel's Alexander's Feast at the commencement of the present month.

The Coronation Mass of the Abbé Liszt, performed at Buda the other day, says the Gazette Musicale, produced a great effect. It is written in a style differing from that of the Gran Mass. In it the orchestra plays the most important part. A singularity is to be noticed in the "Credo," sung in plain song as at the Church of the Dominicans at Rome, and simply accompanied by the organ, which follows the voices almost constantly without harmony.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 20, 1867.

About Fugues.

An old contributor gives us to-day another of his very clear and methodical papers on the subject of Musical Form. For the most part he puts things in their right relation, but there is one point on which we think his remarks are likely to mislead. He calls the Fugue a "quasi Art-form;" and by his development of the statement it appears that the quasi is meant to qualify equally the term Art and the term Form; that is, he denies that a Fugue has form and that it properly falls within the sphere of Art. We respectfully put in a few hints in plea for arrest of judgment.

1. Is the rank of a work of Art to be "measured by its pathos, or expression," and that only? Can you not with a moment's thought recall a hundred of the choicest pieces of such artists as Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, &c., not characterized at all by pathos? Expression they of course have, but not in that sense. What shall we say of the Mendelssohn Fairy Music? what of the Zauberflöte overture? what of a thousand exquisite things in hearing which heart, soul, imagination wander free, float in delicious reverie, forget the emotions of the hour, with all that is simply personal or dramatic, lose the sense of time and seem to realize eternity? Much of the purest, truest music simply sets the soul free, and gives play to an inner spiritual life, which is as much deeper than particular emotions, as these are deeper than cold formalism. It would be nearer to the fact to say: the measure of a work of Art, in Music as in other arts, is its spirit, its character, meaning, genius,—all summed up in the fullest sense of the word Beauty. Expression of course (if not defined by mere pathos or emotion) is an excellent criterion of genuineness and worth in any Art. But how many persons fail to find expression in that which happens to express something more or other than they may have experienced! Bach put his life into his Fugues (inasmuch as he mostly wrote in the fugue style); if you feel no life, no quickening soul there, does it never occur to you that Bach possibly had something deeper to express, some most sincere experience, some finer consciousness, then you in your most tuneful mood have felt the need of tones or words for? Can you not trust the mystical charm of beauty, that which haunts us in many a piece of music of which it would be hard or worse than idle to try to say what it was meant to express? Why not own its power, its charm, as we do that of Nature, of the waves rolling in on the beach (there is fugue for you!) of the broad landscape, the still night air, influences which takes possession of our souls, and yet we cannot analyze or understand them any better than a simple listener understands a Bach fugue, though it stir him to the depths of his soul and lift him above himself into the breath of higher life? To be sure one great secret of the charm of Nature is, that she sympathizes with all our soul's sweetest, grandest, most unalterable secrets, all our best moods and aspirations. Well, just so does a true piece of music, in that form which we maintain to be the most spiritual of all, the Fugue, or at least a piece conceived and wrought out in the spirit of the fugue form, a Fugue which has genius in it, like those of Bach, and not a mechanically made one (for mechanical imitations should not count in any kind of art.)—just so does such a Fugue, even though we cannot analyze its technical structure, seem to sympathize with the soul of the listener who is otherwise prepared and open to the influence as he is to that of Nature.

2. Much more so if, besides the spiritual susceptibility or inward *rappor*t, one has analyzed and studied; has learned to trace the leading theme, the secondary subject, throughout the tangled web, to recognize the imitations, the related thoughts and phrases, the climax of development, the close and rapid gathering in of all the motives at the end, &c. No poetic mind finds Nature loses beauty by any study of which his poor faculties are capable; on the contrary, the nearer we come to her the more we feel. And so it is with a fine Fugue, that has genius in it. The fact that its structure is technical, that it is governed by stricter laws than other forms, that the melodic motives are short and few, does not preclude being also a great deal more than that, does not empty it of such live soul and genius as there may be in its author; nay, if he be master of the art as Bach was, it may become second nature to him, he will revel in it as a native language, pliant to his every mood, and the product will be as spontaneous as a snatch of song—to such a master. The first question, after all, is that of genius. The next is that of culture, mastery of tools, economy of means; and this leads us to consider

3. The Fugue as an Art form. According to Mr. Mathews, "the Fugue, as to its correlation of periods, has no determinate form; it is a fantasy." But a fantasy, as surely as it has genius, has form of some kind; if you cannot find it in any code of laws, it is a law unto itself. Strange that what is objected to as being all law (mere contrapuntal skill and patience) should be suddenly so outlawed! The Fugue, we venture to suggest, is the vital principle of musical form; it is the prime secret of all form, the very soul of it. Whatever music does not more or less imply the Fugue principle, though it need not be strict Fugue, is likely to be poor and shallow music. For Fugue is simply development, the logical unfolding of what is latent in a germ, or theme. It is a music what the spiral law of growth is in the plant. It has its correspondences in other arts; in nothing perhaps so strikingly as in those wonderful creations of Architecture, which are the farthest removed from mere mechanics and geometry, which speak most to the soul and the imagination and almost seem alive and growing, yearning, soaring upward as we look at them, the old Gothic Churches. There is the Fugue in visible, solid form; the same precision in detail, the same endless echoing and imitation of motives and parts of motives, phrases, with quaint particulars, a thousand painted arches, clustered columns, spires and ornaments, all aspiring, growing to a climax, yet to the mind still hinting further growth, still seeming in the process of becoming, never absolutely;—utmost finish in detail mechanically, actually, but ideally suggesting still the infinite, the unattainable in time. This suggestion of the Infinite is what we would call the expression of the Fugue. (But mind, it must be a fugue of genius). So too it has its counter-types, or shall we say its phototypes in Nature; in the waves rolling up the beach, in the waves that run along a field of grain before the wind, in the tongues of flame losing themselves and reappearing as it all soars and seeks the sky.

Yes, in music the Fugue is the perfect type of unity in variety. It is Nature's own law; the true instinct of genius felt it out, obeyed it unconsciously by the inmost necessity of Art and of its own soul. True to nature, genius could not do otherwise; it was simply letting germs, seed-thoughts (motives, themes we call them technically) grow. To be bound always strictly to the Fugue form is pedantry; but not to know it, not to feel it, not to imply it even in free composition, is to forsake the real fount of inspiration. All the great composers, the real creators, whose works live forever,—Beethoven for instance, who seldom wrote fugues as such—working by a true instinct with Nature and the divine laws of essential form, or unity, still imply the Fugue in whatever form they write; they have its secret in them, its law is in their hearts, the soul of all their method; only they are so familiar with it that they need not literally present it. It lay at the basis of their culture. No one is fairly master of the free forms until he is master of the Fugue. That it is, wherever there is harmony, wherever there is more than one part, it is essential to true art that the parts move individually, that there be some contrapuntal texture; now all counterpoint implies fugue at bottom.

4. And now we see why one never exhausts the interest of a good fugue. There may be mechanical, dry fugues; but there are also live ones; a live one never gets hacknied, never dogs and persecutes the mind like popular melodies when too much ventilated through street organs and the like. For it treats its theme, develops, serves it up in such a way, as to make it a perpetual renovation and illustration of itself; and so invests it with perennial youth and freshness; it can no more bore you now, than can the themes, the motives, echoed and repeated throughout the whole upward floating, spirit-like mass of a Strassburg or Cologne Cathedral. All its possibilities of repetition are provided for, anticipated in this structural development, this contrapuntal transfiguration, lifting it beyond reach of the curse of commonplace, so that it cannot spoil. Right healthy music are the fugues of Bach, and hearty too. And this brings us back again to expression.

5. If Fugues were merely "intellectual," wholly out of the sphere of feeling, sentiment, expression, they would all affect us very much alike. On the contrary they differ in character, in mood, in sentiment, as widely as songs differ, or rondos, or Sonatas. Take the "Well-tempered Clavichord" alone; it furnishes varieties of many sorts. Some of its fugues are profoundly solemn and religious; some win you to a mood of calm and dreamy reverie; some to a musing melancholy; some bespeak a sad and contrite heart; others leap like a fountain in the sunshine; here and there is one fairy-like enough for Mendelssohn; others are triumphant, bold, full of resolve. Some are impassioned, agitato movement; but in the most the soul possesses itself in a serene tranquility. Healthy and strong they are as a rule, and at the same time refined and spiritual. Of course they breathe the spirit of their maker,—those which are not made mechanically. These were made poetically; there is tenderness, there is heartfelt piety, there are felicities of fancy, there is imagination in the fugues of Bach. Or take Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute": it there no poetry, no romance, more of the genial Mozart temper there? Why multiply examples?

"But 'the noblest mission of music,' you say, 'is to express emotion.' Is not here emotion? And is the emotion, or rather the sentiment, the feeling, the spirit, any the less real because 'intellectual' goes with it? Are intellectual emotions less pure, less real, less exquisite than simple emotions without intellectuality, which so readily run out into shallow sentimentalism?

6. Here remark an unconscious confusion of ideas in the writer of "Musical Form," misled by his own terms. Because to write or understand a Fugue requires exercise of thought, of close technical analysis applied to its elements and form, (and so does a Sonata, or any other complex form), he becomes alarmed with the notion that the Fugue proposes to express thoughts "ideas" (other than musical ones), thus entering into vain rivalry with speech! That is quite another thing. We have seen instances of that foolish pretension on the part of free, non-contrapuntal, non-classical composers; but who ever heard of a "programme Fugue"? No, just herein is the Fugue truer than any other form to the purely musical mission of music, less guilty of the sin of stepping down from this "higher plane" of music pure, having no end outside of itself, no end but music, to try to do the work of other arts or languages; except in the case of vocal fugues, like Handel's choruses, or Bach's, where there is a text to be illustrated, and these our essayist approves and counts them "real art-works."

The Orpheus Musical Society had their annual picnic at Fresh Pond on Monday last, and was well represented by its active and passive members and their ladies. The full Germania band furnished dance and promenade music interspersed with part songs by the Society. The pavilion was tastefully decorated for the occasion by Mr. Roeth. The festivities were prolonged till about nine in the evening, the full moon illuminating the grove, aided by Chinese lanterns.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS. A Festival Concert was given in this beautiful old town on the 11th inst., by the Northampton Choral Union, assisted by the East Hampton Musical Society and an Orchestra of 27 instruments, including the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Mr. T. W. Meekins was Director. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Cantata, "The First Walpurgis Night," with a printed synopsis on the bills, apparently condensed from a description in this Journal a few years ago. We are told that the performance was highly successful. Certainly it was a worthy aspiration for a young Society in an inland town to study and bring out a work of such importance. We understand that during the four years of its existence, it has given performances of Beethoven's Mass in C, Weber's Mass in G, the so-called Twelfth of Mozart, and Rossini's Sabat Mater. The "Walpurgis Night" is decidedly a step in a higher direction. Mendelssohn's Psalms, &c., will furnish much more good material.

The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, including "With verdure clad," by Miss Hattie M. Clarke; a flute solo, by Heindl; a Duet from Martha, Mrs. Meekins and Miss Shepard; a German ballad with horn obbligato by Mr. Hamann; Cavatina from Le Pré aux Clercs; Male Chorus: "Battle Song of the Ancient Saxons," by Rietz; and Overture to Martha.

FARMINGTON, CONN. We ask attention to Mr. Karl Klausner's advertisement for a lady teacher to assist him in the musical department of Miss Porter's School. The musical tone and character of the school stand high; and it must be not a small advantage to a lady rightly qualified to cooperate in the good work, and be within the influence of so sound and true a musician as Mr. Klausner.—There are other good services of his to Art to which we mean to call attention.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN. The Steamer City of Paris, arriving in New York, on the 13th inst., brought back Mr. Charles F. Daniels, of this city.

Mr. Daniels who is well known to our citizens as an accomplished and thorough musician, has for the past four months been pursuing his studies in Europe under the direction of Stephen Heller.

Verdi's opera, Don Carlos, produced in England for the first time on the 4th ult., is neither better nor worse than the later productions of this composer. That it is infinitely superior to his early work, I Lombardi, is indisputable; but we doubt whether Il Traviatore, La Traviata, or even Rigoletto will be eclipsed by Don Carlos. The story of the opera is not pleasing; but Signor Verdi must have strong excitement; and in this production we have not only a most complicated family love affair—in which neither male nor female characters are remarkable either for purity of thought or intention—but political and religious events are firmly woven in with the plot, so that the usual grand operatic "effects," to which the public are now so thoroughly accustomed, are plentifully scattered throughout, and the second act terminates with a great tableau, in which citizens, troops, and monks are grouped together, according to the approved modern style (the fashion of which was almost set by Meyerbeer), illumined by the electric light, and sensationally brought to a culminating point by an aria da sé, in which a few heretics are supposed to be roaring whilst the curtain falls. In the composition of this opera, Signor Verdi has thought more earnestly, and worked more zealously than in any of his former works; but that he has been as successful as he desired is open to doubt; for although when a great genius throws his whole energy and power into a composition, the result may be safely calculated, with a composer like Verdi, who has gained his fame by a few cantabile for catching melodies, interspersed with spasmodic vocal effects and coarse instrumentation, it often happens that his best and most lasting works are precisely those in which he has been least ambitious. The whole of the first act of the opera, as it stood in its original state, is now cut out, so that the curtain rises upon what was the second act, after a brief and exceedingly weak prelude; for, as usual in modern Italian operas, there is no overture. In this act the principal pieces are a dramatic duet between Rodrigo and Don Carlos, in which the former urges his friend to assist the Flemings in resisting the oppression of the Spanish tyrant (chiefly remarkable for the exquisite singing of Signor Graziani), a "Chanson du vole," said to a "Saracenic" ballad, and sung by Mlle. Fricci (so excessively crude, with its pertinacious G natural as a bass, in the key of A major, as to offend all sensitive ears, however the Moors might like it); a love-duet between Don Carlos and the Queen, admirably given by Signor Naudin and Mlle. Pauline Lucca (the climax of which is one of the best things in the opera); an exceedingly melodious Romance for the Queen, in F minor (deliciously accompanied by wind instrument), with a second movement in B flat major; and a duet between the King and Rodrigo, in which Philip is compelled to listen to the ultra liberal notions of Rodrigo, a composition full of effective declamatory passages, and winding up with one of those displays of what may be called the "mauscular" school of writing, for which Verdi is so remarkable. The second act contains a very excellent Trio, in which Don Carlos makes love to the Princess Eboli, in mistake for the Queen, and Rodrigo, after the discovery of the error, endeavors to act as peacemaker. This is one of the most effective pieces of writing in the whole work; and is evidently based on models which it has been the ambition of the composer to imitate wherever the construction of the opera will allow him to do so. The finale of this act we have already alluded to. It is undoubtedly clever, but noisy and over-instrumental to a painful degree. The unison-voice passage for the six Deputies has a good effect; but the choral power is one of too purely physical a nature to produce anything but a sensation of relief in the listeners when the curtain descends and leaves the eye and ear once more in repose. The fourth act brought Signor Bagagiolo, as the Grand Inquisitor, before us for the first time at this establishment. A duet with the King gave him an excellent opportunity of displaying a remarkably fine bass voice, which we hope to hear on a future occasion in a part of more pretension. This somewhat long composition is effectively accompanied by the grave instruments, both wind and stringed, the trombones, especially, being very felicitously employed. The act also contains an admirable quartette, and an impassioned solo, declaimed with so much energy by Mlle. Fricci as to be most enthusiastically red-manded. From this point the composer seems to have felt the effect of an over-taxed power; and the music gradually falls off in interest and merit. The scena of the Queen in the last act is simply commonplace; the final duet with Don Carlos, although containing some beautiful and melodious phrases, is by no means equal to the music of the early portion of the opera; and the fall of the curtain, therefore, produced but little actual demonstration of approval. With the audience, however, the work was thoroughly successful; the singers, as we have said, (including M. Petit, as the King), exerted themselves to the utmost; and although (little as we sympathize with the school of which Verdi may be said to stand at the head) we should ourselves prefer the spontaneous style of writing by which the composer first gained a widely spread popularity, his new opera is at least entitled to respect, as the earnest attempt of a composer to escape from a style which his better nature must have whispered to him was inartistic and unreal.—London Musical Times.

THE SONGS OF THE FREEDMEN. Our readers may remember that about five years ago we published a letter from Miss McKim, of Philadelphia, (now the wife of Mr. W. P. Garrison,) describing the songs which she had heard (and partly taken down) among the recently freed people of the Sea Islands. Much larger collections were afterwards made by Prof. Wm. F. Allen, of West Newton, and his cousin, Mr. Chas. P. Ware, of Milton. These three are now united, by common agreement, and have been very largely increased by accessions from all parts of the South. The basis still remains the "spirituals," such as were furnished the Atlantic by Mr. Higginson, who has kindly turned them over to the persons named above, that they may publish them, words and music, in one volume. The collection will be edited by Prof. Allen, who has written a preface of some length to illustrate the songs. Messrs. A. Simpson & Co., of the Agathynian Press, 60 Duane street, New York, intend to give the work their imprint (a guaranty of the highest style of typography), provided they meet with sufficient encouragement. The cost per volume will probably not exceed $1.75, and will be much less to those taking several copies. Orders may be sent to the firm with the above address. No one will question the urgency of preserving these transient productions of a highly musical race, and they will commend themselves for actual enjoyment to all lovers of music, as well as to lovers of the curious.

The Nation, of May 30th, alludes to the excellent project in these terms:

"The proper folk-songs of this country should be sought, we suppose, among the aborigines; but the capacity of the Indian for music does not appear to be equal to his reputed capacity for eloquence. The negro possesses both these gifts in a high degree, and it is singular that no one up to this time has explored for preservation the wild, beautiful, and pathetic melodies of the Southern slaves. Their secular songs, or what purported to be such, have in times past made their way into all mouths; but their "spirituals"—the genuine expression of their eminently religious nature—have only recently claimed attention. We are able to announce a collection, based on the Port Royal hymnody, and including the songs of as many Southern States as are obtainable, which will be published either in the course of this year or at the beginning of the next. The words and (whenever possible) the music will be carefully reproduced, and it is the aim of the editors to make the volume complete in both respects. Any information relating to this subject will be very acceptable to them, and may be sent to Mr. W. P. Garrison, Box 6732, N. Y. Post-office.

FORTY YEARS AGO. While the memory of our "Cretan Concert" (Boston, Feb. 18, 1867) is yet fresh, it will be curious to read the following programme of music given in New York during the first Greek revolution. It has been fished out of oblivion by the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser. But the great singer who took part in it had not then acquired her great name. Thus it reads:

ORATORIO FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE GREEKS, by the New York Music Society, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 28, 1827.
Conductors, T. Birch and I. P. Cole.—Leader, W. Taylor.—Organist, W. Blondell.

Principal singers, Signorina Garcia, Mrs. Hackett, Mrs. Sharpe, Mrs. Blake, Mr. Keene, and Mr. Howard.

PART I.

Overture.....Jomelli.
Chorus, "Arise ye people,".....Marseilles Hymn.
Song—Mr. Howard—"Sound an alarm,".....Handel.
Recitative } Mrs. Blake, } Comfort ye.
and air } Every Valley,.....Handel.
Air—Mrs. Sharpe—"My song shall be of Mercy,".....Kent.
Grand Chorus, "Hallelujah to the Father"—Mt. of Olives.....Beethoven.

PART II.

Overture—Artaxerxes.....Arne.
Chorus, "Awake to sounds of glory,".....Mozart.
Recitative and air—Mrs. Hackett—"Sound the Trumpet,".....Hummel.
Air—Mr. Howard—"Sin not, O King,".....Handel.
Song—Mr. Keene—"Lord, remember David,".....Handel.
Recitative and air—Signorina Garcia, accompanied on the organ by P. K. Moran—"Angels ever bright and fair,".....Handel.
Grand Chorus, "Hallelujah"—Messiah.....Handel.

The orchestra consisted of 27 instruments, and the chorus of about 60 persons.

It will be seen from the above programme that Signorina Garcia, afterwards the famous MALIBRAN, sang at that concert. She was then residing in New York, whither she had come with the operatic troupe brought to this country by her father in 1825, and was a great favorite with the public.

THE LOWER RHENISH FESTIVALS. An account of the forty fourth, which occurred last month at Aix-la-Chapelle, was copied in our last. The following historical review of these Festivals is from the Guardian (England):

The originator of these meetings in Germany is said to have been one Bischoff, organist of Grankenhansen and subsequently music director at Hildesheim, who some fifty-seven years ago assembled together the musicians in his province, and instituted a "Thuringian Musical Festival," which was held at Erfurt in the year 1811. In 1817 Johann Schornstein, the music director at Elberfeld, followed the example of Bischoff, collected together the musical forces there and in Dusseldorf, and gave a performance on a large scale in the former town, thus laying the foundation of the Rhenish festivals, the success of the Elberfeld one being so great that several of the most influential persons in the two towns took the matter in hand, and determined to give two grand concerts at Whitsunside, which should take place in biennial alternation at Elberfeld and Dusseldorf. The organization of these concerts exacted so much labor and trouble, that it was resolved to propose to a third neighboring town to take part in them, and an offer of co-operation was made to Cologne, which city at first declined the proposal. It was, therefore, at Elberfeld and at Dusseldorf where the four first festivals were held. In 1818 Burgmüller directed at Dusseldorf; in 1819 Schornstein directed—amongst other works Handel's Messiah, Beethoven's Overture Leonora (probably No. 2) and his Second Symphony—at Elberfeld; in 1820 Handel's Samson and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, under Burgmüller's direction, were in the Dusseldorf programme, and in 1820 Cologne offered its valuable co-operation, where the festival of 1821 was held, at which Burgmüller directed an oratorio, The Last Judgement, by F. Schneider, and Beethoven's C minor Symphony, &c. In the years 1822 and 1823 the same directors conducted respectively at Dusseldorf and Elberfeld. In 1824 Frederick Schneider of Dessau was requested to direct the festival at Cologne, when his oratorio, The Deluge, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the overture Coriolanus, &c., were given. In the year 1825 the eighth festival was held for the first time at Aix-la-Chapelle, which town then co-operated provisionally with Dusseldorf and Cologne, in consequence, it is said, of some disinclination manifested on the part of Elberfeld to continue its support. The festival of 1826 was at Dusseldorf, under the direction of Spohr and Ries,—the former bringing out his oratorio, Last Judgement, and the latter a symphony in D major. In 1827, the year in which Beethoven died, the meeting was once more held at Elberfeld. The C minor Symphony, and parts of the great Mass in D by that mighty master were given, under direction of Schornstein. From the time of the retirement of Elberfeld, Aix-la-Chapelle gave in its definite adhesion, and excepting from 1848 to 1850—the years of political disturbances—these festivals have occurred at Dusseldorf, Aix, or Cologne. In 1828, at Cologne, Ries directed his new overture, Don Carlos, and Klein of Berlin his new oratorio, Jephtha. At Aix, the next year, Ries conducted his symphony in F, and his oratorio, Der Sieg des Glaubens,—the "Eroica" was also given. In 1830 at Dusseldorf, Judas Macabæus (with Clasing's instrumentation), the Mount of Olives, &c., were given, Ries conducting. At Cologne in 1832 Handel's Samson, Beethoven's symphony in A, and a new "Fest" overture by Ries were performed, Ries again conducting. The festival of 1833 at Dusseldorf was memorable as having been conducted by Mendelssohn, then only in his twenty-fifth year. Handel's Israel was given, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, his great overture, Leonora, and a new overture by the illustrious conductor. It was on this occasion that a third performance was set on foot by Mendelssohn, who gave, as a supplementary concert, a performance on the third morning of the "Fest" week, at which the two overtures and most of the choruses and solos were repeated, and Weber's Concert-Stück" was played by Mendelssohn. No less than seven of the festivals were directed by the last-named composer, whose energy and genius gave of course great impulse to them. The following festivals were given under his direction:—At Cologne in 1835, at Dusseldorf in 1836, when he produced his oratorio, St. Paul, at Cologne in 1838, at Dusseldorf in 1839, when his "42nd Psalm" was given, at Dusseldorf again in 1842, when his Lobgesang was given, and lastly (the year before his early death,) at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1846, when Handel's Alexander's Feast, Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and a motet by Cherubini were included in the programme. At Aix in 1840 Spohr directed, in 1843 Reissiger, in 1851 Lindpaintner, who conducted also in 1854, in 1857 Liszt, in 1861 Lachner, and in 1864 Rietz, and Wullner of Munich. The other festivals which have been directed by eminent composers are—that at Cologne in 1847, when Onslow and Spontini presided, that at Dusseldorf in 1853, when Schumann conducted his splendid symphony in D minor, and Hiller his "125th Psalm." The latter composer directed also the festivals in 1855 and 1860 at Dusseldorf, and those of 1858, 1862, and 1865 at his own city—Cologne. The two Dusseldorf festivals, in 1863 and in 1866, were conducted by Otto Goldschmidt and Tausch, and have been, together with that in 1855, rendered for ever memorable from the fact that Madame Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt sang at them. The illustrious artist sang also at the twenty-eighth festival—at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1846.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Charming Annie Bell. S'g & Cho. Starkweather. 30
I am waiting for thee. Song. C. Operti. 40
Our spirit friends. Song and Cho. W. A. Ogden. 30
A country life for me. Song. H. Clay. Prusse. 30
Minnie Wayne. W. A. Ogden. 30
Catch it on the fly. Base ball Song and Chorus. Starkweather. 30
A selection of charming songs sure to be popular.
Idle lay the Summer Sea. Tide Song. Marion Dix Sullivan. 30
Nelly Coree. Ballad. " " " 30
Charming and simple songs.
The Wishing Cap. Song. W. T. Wrighton. 30
Words by Mackay. Music sweet as sugar.
Gathering homeward, one by one. Song and Quartette. G. H. Pixley. 30
Very beautiful.
Who will be my angel bride. Song. Webster. 35
There's a light at the window. " & Cho. " 35
Let me fold thee close, Mavourneen. " M. Keller. 30
When night is darkest, dawn is nearest. E. Land. 35
Four songs by able composers.

Instrumental.

- Parisian Waltzes. H. L. Williams. 75
Elegant and graceful.
Fairy Stories, (Feen-Märschen) Waltzes. Strauss. 75
Brilliant, and in Strauss's well-known style.
Priere et Chasse. Fantaisie du Freischütz. Rene Favager. 75
Very rich and melodious. One of the best of compositions founded on these celebrated airs.
Dreams of the past Waltz. R. Goerdeler. 50
Sallie's favorite Galop. A. R. Webb. 30
Pretty pieces, and not difficult.
Souvenir de Innsbruck. Tyrolienne for Piano. F. Bendel. 40
Neapolitan Song. Transcription. Jules Eggard. 40
La Retour. Fantaisie for Piano. C. Van Tul. 30
L'Esperance. Song without words. " " 30
La Volense d'Amour. (The heart stealer). Polka
Mazurka. C. Faust. 30
Five graceful pieces of medium difficulty.
Mugby Junction. Galop. Chas. Coote. 40
A brilliant kind of "railroad" piece. Play it "through on time."
First meeting. (Erste begegnung). D. Krug. Op. 226. 50
Confession of love. Der Liebe Gestandniss. " 50
Meeting again. (Wiedersehen). " 50
Belong to a set called "The Book of Love." Composed in excellent taste, and are something in the style of Oesten's "Songs of Love." Medium difficulty.

Books.

- Ecole Primaire. 25 easy and progressive studies for Piano. Foreign fingering. 2 parts. Duvernoy, ea. 75
Czerny's 24 short and progressive exercises for Piano. Op. 336. Foreign fingering. In 3 parts, each. 1.00
These valuable aids to the teacher will be welcomed, each in its own way. They are both good, and suited to pupils who have made but a moderate advance in their studies.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 687.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 3, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 10.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Ristori in Comedy.

So much has been written upon the rival merits of Rachel and Ristori, and so much discriminating criticism has been called forth, that another line in illustration of the comparison would seem unnecessary. There is one view of the subject, however, which has not been taken.

Nothing impressed me more on again seeing Ristori after an interval of eighteen years, than the immense superiority she displayed in melodrama and high comedy over tragedy. The memory of her former self was as unfavorable to her present personations as the memory of Rachel.

It was my good fortune to be in Florence in 1849, before she had acquired her Paris reputation, and night after night to enjoy her renderings of Scribe and Goldoni. The former suffered from translation, though enough of his wit and ingenuity remained to make his plays very acceptable. Goldoni richly deserves such an expositor, and those who only know him as one of the helps to the acquirement of the Italian language can form no idea of his merits. Ristori's arch humor, pathos and ease, added to her natural beauty and high-born air, eminently fitted her for genteel comedy. She did full justice to the beauty of her native tongue, and it was delightful to hear it flowing musically from her lips and observe how every mood and costume became her.

She did not always confine herself to skilful authors, but whatever she attempted was perfectly done. In one play particularly her triumph over a ridiculous plot was remarkable. A young lady of birth and fortune marries clandestinely an adventurer who proves to have been a confessionner! I forget the name of the playwright, though he deserves to be remembered for his originality and daring. Brigands have been considered fascinating for many years. Murderers are intensely popular. Music and language masters are dangerous. Exiles only inferior to murderers. Highwaymen and pickpockets have been idealized repeatedly, and Miss Braddon has even stooped to a groom and lifted him up into a hero; but writers have not recruited from the ranks of tailors, dancing masters or pastry cooks. Next to the daring of imagining such a plot was that of representing it, but it proved Ristori's power.

The easy grace and happiness of her appearance when she first entered in riding habit and hat, whip in hand, was bewitching. Then came distrust, anxiety and the gradual awakening to a sense of her folly. Her faithfulness in spite of deceit and treachery and her final throwing herself at the feet of the "pauvre noble" while pleading for her unworthy husband, were masterly. It was talent and a high order of talent, exerted in a poor cause.

In quitting her own peculiar walk, Ristori has incurred the disadvantage of not being so well supported. The Italians are peculiarly calculated to represent light and evanescent emotions. The calm, sad dignity of tragedy does not suit their mercurial natures. They are usually either still or exaggerated; I mean as compared with their comic delineations, for in all imitative arts they are superior to the Anglo Saxon race.

The impression of Ristori's great superiority as an actress was so vivid, that though on seeing Rachel two years after I acknowledged her wonderful powers, I fancied the Italian might rival her in tragedy, at the same time being convinced no one could surpass her. Therefore when the curtain rose last November at the Boston Theatre and we awaited her appearance in Judith, it was with an emotional interest. But the moment she appeared the high wrought expectation sank. The mere fluttering of the drapery, the hurried walk across the stage, the rapid words in which she announced the discovery of a spring to the perishing Israelites proved in a moment beyond doubt the superiority of Rachel. It was fine declamation, but the passion, the power, the classic attitudes of the French woman were not there.

Had we never seen Ristori in comedy nor Rachel in tragedy we should have been entirely delighted. As it was we were haunted by the wish that she had been faithful to high comedy; for what does high comedy demand? Culture, grace, imitativeness, a bright, sympathetic mind, and high powers of understanding. No one can deny her greatness in tragedy, but she was greater in comedy.

Had she been faithful to her gift and specialty, she would have been the acknowledged queen of that charming line of acting, and Rachel would have trod the stage some years longer, for there is no doubt her death was hastened by the poisoned shaft of envy.

Ristori can now lay claim to being the first tragic actress in the world, a proud supremacy which we insist could not have been given her while Rachel lived, for there was that in the fiery nature of the Jewess which enabled her to accomplish what no woman with a calmer temperament can do. If she stole the fire from heaven, it consumed her. If her ambition led her to superhuman efforts, it ate her heart away.

There seems to me no more melancholy picture than Rachel forced to witness the innocent triumphs of her rival. We recall Prometheus on his rock, Napoleon at St. Helena; and these pangs must have been aggravated by the injustice of the Parisian verdict. She knows she was the greatest in her own line, and the mad grief and jealousy at not being able to make others feel it, broke her proud spirit.

There never were two beings who more perfectly illustrated the difference between talent and genius than Ristori and Rachel.

Musical Letters by Ferdinand Hiller.*

THE FORTY-FOURTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL OF THE LOWER RHINE AT AIX-LA-CHAPPELLE.

The Festival began for me at the Central Railway Terminus, Cologne, where I met our respected old master, Moscheles, who had braved the night journey from Leipsic, in order that he might arrive the sooner on the harmonic battlefield. I enjoyed the pleasure of chatting away the time with him to Aix-la-Chapelle, and deriving fresh satisfaction at his undiminished interest in everything going on in art and life. The entrance into the bustle of our musical festivals has always something intoxicating about it, especially when a man rushes off direct from the railway carriage into the concert room. I was received by an energetical "Ho! Ho!" but it was soon evident that this was not intended for my humble self, but for Orpheus, the beautiful, and I regarded it as no evil omen. In fact, after Mlle. Bettelheim had moved the Furies and the auditors, I quickly found myself surrounded by dear friends and acquaintances. "Ah, Rheinthal!" Look, there is Cape Maister Scholz." "And Wallner?" "He is due to-day." "Tiens, voilà ce cher Gury!" What, have you been able to leave Paris and the Exposition?" "Yes; everything is to be found there, except such music as is heard here!" Now there rush in a host of enthusiastic Belgians. "Vous semez à notre poste, Monsieur; courez-tous les ans—Pannee proclaimée sera à Calonne, n'est-ce pas?" "I hope so, but a year, now-a-days, is a century. Who can tell what may happen!" I stand upon tiptoe in order to shake hands with the Cheruscus, who, under the name of Niemann, is now starring it in Germany. Rietz—Jupiter tonans—now leaves his place in the clouds to approach mere mortals, while, with a light step, Breunung winds his way through an Olympus full of Graces, to grasp the sceptre. The good-natured members of the Committee greet us most cordially; they seem in high spirits, and have good reason to be so. The critics, also, make their appearance from Germany and England, and France and Belgium and Leipsic—but from among them we miss one who for forty years attended these pleasant festivals and was, as it were, their historian: Professor Ludwig Bischoff. I once represented him in these columns (the reader will remember the circumstance), while he was on a visit to England. From the bourne which he has now gone to visit he will return no more.

* Translated from the Kölnische Zeitung, for the London Musical World.

This distinguished man had many enemies; now that he is gone, people appreciate the great loss they have suffered by his death. What stores of acquirements and talent were borne with him to the grave! Where is the pen that could work so effectively as a medium between the highest interests of our art and the public! Of those interests he never lost sight, and it was his unceasing endeavor to make his readers appreciate all that is beautiful and sublime in the works of our great masters. He always possessed the power of doing this in a new, forcible, clever, and universally intelligible style, and of thus exciting an interest for music even in those who originally cared nothing about it. He never sat in a concert room to criticize; he allowed what he heard to work upon him, and in the most advanced age possessed a keen susceptibility for fresh impressions—a susceptibility that is greatly needed by some even of the very youngest among us. Sometimes he may have been mistaken! But let the man who is conscious that this has never happened to himself cast a stone at him! He is reproached with having been now and then exaggerated in his praises, a fault felt with peculiar acuteness in Germany, where the fact of abusing anyone, and the more coarsely the better, is considered the particular office of criticism. But what he thought bad he never praised; what he thought good he never censured. I gladly seize this opportunity of paying a slight tribute of gratitude to the man who, for a long period, stood by my side and afforded me the most disinterested aid in my artistic efforts and enterprises, and, if any one observe, with a smaller or larger addition of irony, that I, more than any other man, am especially bound to do so, I most heartily and unreservedly acknowledge the fact. I feel convinced, however, that very many must—and, moreover, will—join me in these too few votive lines, for if the virtue of being just is ever given to us mortals it is towards the Dead.

Let us, however, return to life, full, fresh, and invigorating, such as we but too seldom find it—and nowhere more unclouded than in true cultivation of the truly Beautiful. That which renders our Musical Festivals of the Lower Rhine, if they are what they ought to be, and what, fortunately, they mostly have been, such important features in our civilization, is that, without petty aims and considerations, the object for which they exist is to secure the highest possible amount of appreciation for the sublimest kinds of art by representing them in the most effective manner. So many persons, too, from so many quarters, co-operate in them with such self-sacrificing devotion, with such unpretending dedication of their best strength, and with such ingenuous enthusiasm, that they are entitled to our deepest respect. It has often been remarked, but can never be remarked often enough, what great services are rendered to the good cause by the members of the Festival Committee; but of the enormous pains taken by them, of the long-continued and frequently laborious efforts necessary to prepare everything, to get together all the materials for erecting the airy monuments of our art, the uninitiated have not the slightest conception. Moreover I do not know where we shall find the genuine and warm love for art which exists in the hearts of the German people more plainly manifested than in the amateurs and the musicians who constitute the chorus and the orchestra. Such hard labor, lasting the whole day, and accompanied by a continuous silent or loud jubilation, is possible only where real enthusiasm exists. The trifling remuneration which is all that can be offered the members of the orchestra is by no means to be compared with what is expected from them, and most fearlessly do I assert that such a state of things is possible with German musicians alone.

The official report returns the number of the chorals at 407, and 123 as the number of the members of the orchestra. As the hall is not extravagantly large, but extraordinarily sonorous, the exhibition of power was very grand. The choruses had been admirably got up (by Herr Breunung, the Musik-Director of the Town)—the singers sang with as much spirit as exactness. Our beautiful, high-sounding Rhenish voices were once more heard to the greatest advantage—the sopranos especially exerted all their fascination. Rhenish singers, when in full swing, sometimes overstep a little bit the delicate line of beauty, and their energy then receives a certain touch of impetuosity—a weakness, if superabundance of strength may be so called, which is reckoned a hundred fold by the fulness of sparkling life that it brings to light—but, we should think, a weakness easily to be overcome. The magnificence of the stringed quartet at our Festivals is everywhere acknowledged—the like of such hosts of select Zündnadel bows are to be found assembled nowhere else. Anything may be done with them—the softest movements, the most stormy attacks—the more difficult, the better! A combined tone like steel, brilliant, steady, pure, and sterling—and then again gentle and ethereal like harmonica-bells. Above all are the first violins, the worthy companions of the crystal clear sopranos. Attached to the Concertmeister, Herr von Wenigsmann and von Königslow, of Aix-la-Chapelle and Cologne, as leaders, were a whole host of superior officers fighting in the ranks. The wind instrumentalists, too, were excellent—pure, exact, and possessed of good taste, and it is a remarkable fact that much as the brass was called into requisition, scarcely the slightest mistake occurred in it. But the defect, which, indeed, is to be found in many of the most celebrated orchestras, and which consists in the fact that, from the heights they occupy, trombones, and trumpets bray down their tones rather too obstreperously, was not always avoided here.

The Committee had succeeded in obtaining such a vocal quartet as is seldom to be got together. Madame Harriers-Wippern, the sweet soprano, who unites the mildest and most harmonious voice with the most admirable training; Mlle. Caroline Bettelheim, whose fine, full contralto appears to flow directly from a thoroughly musical soul; Niemann, the hero of heroic tenors, and Hill, with a baritone so soft, and yet so vigorous. The envious Demon whose delight it is to derange somehow or other the best undertakings of us sons of clay, endeavored, on this occasion, to play off his impish tricks, and, in the form of a grateful draught, to deprive the amiable contralto of her voice—but he did not succeed, being in the end compelled to fly before the energetic will and conscientious precautions of the fair young singer.

And Julius Rietz was the director of the Festival. I cannot help fearing that I shall be laughed at by my old, and somewhat sarcastic friend, if I praise him—but I will do so for all that. At least, I will express the pleasure one feels on seeing at the conductor's desk a man with knowledge and with will: who knows what he wills, and is able to carry it out. With him we have no anxious attempts; no grand airs to inspire respect; no clever phrases which advance nothing. On the one hand, the confident and necessary consciousness: "I understand what I am about"—on the other, the no less necessary conviction: "He understands what he is about"—and every thing goes off lightly, as though in play, and of its own accord, because it is an organized necessity that it must do so.

The second director of the Festival, my younger friend, Ferdinand Breunung, at any rate, I may congratulate upon the flattering success he achieved, and praise the sterling and varied talent which enabled him to be of such benefit to the Festival. In what a masterly manner he had conducted the preparatory rehearsals was demonstrated by the grand rehearsals. Without the thorough and conscientious preparatory training of the chorus, it would have been impossible even for St. Cecilia herself to have done anything. That Breunung is one of the first organists of Germany is one of the many true things known only to a few. I will return by-and-bye to his execution of the organ part, admirably arranged by himself for Judas Maccabæus. The pieces which it fell to his lot to conduct were sometimes extraordinarily difficult—but he swayed the masses with perfect certainty and discretion. During the numerous songs, too, sung on the third day, he sat at the pianoforte, a genuine maestro al cembalo, capable of satisfying the most varied demands—genuine and sterling.

The programme was a perfect galaxy of masterworks. Bach and Handel, and Gluck, Beethoven and Cherubini, Mendelssohn and Schumann, followed each other in almost historical order. Aught like criticism must be dumb at such a list—and, with all humility, I, therefore, hold my tongue. I cannot, however, refrain from citing a few lines from a letter which Felix Mendelssohn wrote to me on the 15th July, 1838:

"You will have already heard I was at the Musical Festival in Cologne. Every thing went off well: the organ produced a fine effect in Handel, and still more in Seb. Bach (it was some newly discovered music of his, that you do not yet know, with a pompous double chorus.) But, in my opinion at least, we wanted, also, the interest of something new and untried; I am fond of something uncertain, that affords me and the public the opportunity for an opinion—in Beethoven, Handel, and Bach, we know beforehand what there is; that must remain as it is, but something else must be added to it."

In Mendelssohn, also, himself, we know beforehand what there is—and the more interesting and significant have his words become for us.

The first day brought with it a magnificent performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus, and, as a kind of prelude, the Orchester-Suite in D major, by J. S. Bach. Of the five movements of which the latter is composed, the second, called an Air, produced, probably, the most pleasing impression. It consists of a broad, gentle strain, which was assigned by the composer to a solo violin. The great Bach, who, when he did not play his music himself, was, in all likelihood, but very seldom favorably impressed by the mode in which it was executed, would have been not a little surprised, had he heard this solo performed by a whole host of fiddlers together, as was the case here. In the other movements, also, the stringed quartet came out in all its fulness and strength, and the trumpets, which have a great part to sustain, carried it through with as much brilliancy as neatness. But it cannot be denied that the public were not particularly moved by the work, and it was impossible to be angry with them for it. When, now-a-days, an orchestra, and more especially, a Musical Festival orchestra, begins to move, people expect something else than what a Gavotte, a Bourrée, and a Gigue, even in their greatest excellence, can contain, and ought to contain—and the comprehension of the marvellous polyphony to be found in almost the smallest composition of Bach, is naturally not given to everyone. We musicians were greatly delighted, but we formed only an inconsiderable minority. It was a very different thing with Judas Maccabæus, one of the freshest and most popular works of Handel. Judas Maccabæus was written in a few weeks during the summer of 1746, for Handel flung all his greatest oratorios upon paper in a fearfully short time. It was produced for the first time on the 1st April, 1747, in Covent Garden Theatre, London. Dr. Thomas Morell, a clergyman, was the author of the words. There is a tradition that Frederick, Prince of Wales, the father of George III. suggested the subject, to celebrate the victory of his brother, the Duke of Cumberland, over the unfortunate Charles Edward, whose army was annihilated at the battle of Culloden (2nd April, 1746). But it is scarcely possible to see any points of resemblance, when the subject is, in the one case, the last combined effort of the poor, small Jewish nation, and, in the other, the final overthrow of her enemy by haughty England. Be that, however, as it may, of all Handel's oratorios, Judas Maccabæus is that one which enjoyed the greatest success during the composer's life, and was most frequently performed. English writers attribute a portion of this success to the great partiality shown for the work by the Israelites, who, "zealous admirers of music generally, took a more especial interest in a work that sang in such a manner the heroic courage of their forefathers." The book of Maccabæus is nothing more nor less than—what such books usually are. Anything approaching even a material conception of the grandiose pitch of enthusiasm to which the Maccabees had managed to work up their people is altogether out of the question. Songs devoted in turn to lamentation, hope, martial courage, and the intoxication of victory, with a continual reference to the power of Jehovah, follow one another in due order, and the whole range of emotions from despair to the highest pitch of gladness is presented to us twice in succession. Did we not find in the recitatives certain names, such as Antiochus, Gorgias, Lysias, and Nikanor, together with the historically characteristic mention of a prominent elephant, the oratorio might apply quite as well to any warlike enterprise of the Jews as to those undertaken by the Maccabees. But no; at the end there comes Capolemus, the Jewish ambassador at Rome, and offers on the part of the Senate friendship and protection (what was afterwards called a Rheinbund), and these suspicious assurances would cast a shadow upon all the joy of victory, supposing we could think of anything in the world but Handel's magnificent music. In this, more than in any other of his oratorios, the choruses outshine the vocal solos. The deep earnestness of lament, the heroic energy of martial ardor, and the elevating feeling of triumph, has Handel glorified in eternal melodies, and it by no means requires a musical education, as it is termed, but simply an open ear and heart, to be carried away by their magnificence. Prominent among the vocal pieces are the duets, which introduce several of the finest choruses. None of the airs stand on an equal elevation with them. Still Mme. Harriers-Wippen and Mlle. Bettelheim obtained thunders of applause for their masterly rendering of them, as well as of the duets. Hill proved himself to be the same as ever, and when Niemann burst forth with the words "Blast die Trompette, erhebt das Feldgeschrei," we could almost fancy that the roll of music in his hand had changed to a sword. The chorus, by the "schrecklich süßen Schall geweckt," sang in a style full of martial courage, "Wir folgen dir zum Siege," while the trumpets joined in with their blare, as though they would have blown down the walls of Jericho. But the greatest enthusiasm was that evoked by the celebrated choral song, "Sehet, er kommt mit Preis gekrönt" (which is to be found, also, in Josiah)—it had to be repeated.

It is well known that none of Handel's oratorios can be produced without omitting some things and supplying others, however strongly we may stand up for historical truth. Even the great composer himself arranged his works differently for the different performances of them, according to the quality and number of the vocalists at his disposal, and employed the organ and the cymbals, though the parts for those instruments are sometimes not found at all, and sometimes are merely suggested, in the scores. There exists great diversity of opinion as to how Handel's oratorios ought to be arranged now-a-days. That certain only of the solo pieces should be selected is a point on which all impartial and competent judges are unanimous, and the blind admirers of Handel will only be injuring their idol and his works, whenever they succeed in producing one of the latter without any curtailment. Leaving out of consideration the fact that very many of the airs are really insignificant, the singers of the present day are placed in a strange position with regard to them, a position in no way to be explained by stating it to be that of the theatrical as opposed to the oratorio style. The relation of the singers to the music is not the original one—for Handel's operatic airs and oratorio-airs are written in precisely the same style. But a very large number of Handel's solo songs are bravura pieces, and virtuosity, together with whatever is connected with it, constitutes, speaking strictly, the element of fashion in music. Now, since, at the present day (we may regret the fact, but so it is), we have mostly singers who are unable to master, far less to lend animation and expression to, these long-winded passages, we should compromise them and the performance generally, were we to compel them to sing the passages in question, unless, which is seldom the case, the airs are most closely connected with the pieces near them or with the whole action of the oratorio. In the last case, moreover, if necessary, a simplification or curtailment will always be preferable to the labored execution of what, to achieve its due effect, should appear spontaneously produced. We are compelled to cut out a great deal in the tragedies of Shakspeare and of Schiller, in order to fit them for theatrical representation, and the inward mental connection in one of Handel's oratorios is very far from being such as exists in those works.

At the performance, this year, at Aix-la-Chapelle, great reserve was manifested both as regards the omission of any of the airs, and the addition of certain wind instruments for the choruses. The recitatives were all accompanied on the piano (a pianino), with which, according to the historical tradition, the violoncello and the double-bass should properly have been united. But these instruments render the performance of the work more difficult than it otherwise would be, and, when thus combined with the piano, have always something perverse about them, and it was well done to set to work less historically. To most of the choruses and solo pieces, if not all, the organ was added—amid the sea of sound created by the large numbers comprised in the chorus and orchestra, it was not particularly prominent in the choruses, though it frequently contributed unnoticed to the beauty of the general effect. With regard to its employment in the airs and duets, there are one or two points to be remarked, and these are of a contrary purport. In this instance a great deal is to be said against its too frequent introduction. Above all else, there is the monotony of its sound, which becomes doubly objectionable when contrasted with the exceedingly delicate effects of light and shade required in vocal solos. Then on the present occasion there was also the great distance at which the organist was placed. This made a perfectly exact accompaniment extremely difficult—I should have said impossible, had not Brennung rendered it possible. But we ought not to feel the difficulty of anything when its perfection is to be sought in the most pliant submission. The soft registers employed by Brennung seemed to come from some higher regions, which they, in fact, did—but there was still something abrupt about them. The greatest difficulty was in adapting the organ accompaniments to the quicker tempo—while, from their nature, they were most appropriate and characteristic in calmly devout pieces. Taken all in all, there was, in the opinion of everyone among us, too much of a good thing.

But what course ought to be pursued with Handel's instrumentation, which is so sparse and stands so much in need of something additional? Ought we, as the historic party maintain, to add the piano alone to the airs and the organ only to the choruses? or ought the latter, if only sparingly, to be employed in the vocal solos also? Or are we at liberty to write supplementary parts for the wind instruments, and now and then introduce a few brass strains into the orchestra, when everything in the original score points to strength and power? I think that in every instance we ought to select what is adapted to the work, the separate pieces, and the particular circumstances under which the performance takes place, and, while doing so, to endeavor to avoid the additions of wanton arrogance as much as the pedantic humility of paltry non-interference. The presumptuous levity displayed at an epoch not very remote in getting up the performances of musical master-pieces (not those of Handel alone) may probably be regarded as vanquished—but let us not fall into the opposite extreme and make the spirit gave way to the letter. Fortunately, however, Handel stands firm in unshakable strength, despite all the various experiments that have been tried on him, from those at Sydenham to those at the smallest German towns—the fact is: nothing can kill him.

(To be continued.)

The First Debut of Henriette Sontag:

Translated from the "Gartenlaube."

With his fragrant coffee on the table before him, his finely-flavored pipe in his mouth, sat Herr Holbein, manager of the Prague Theatre; yet he felt no relish for neither of his favorites, and dark clouds rested upon his brow. Indeed, the position of manager is not one calculated always to color with rosetts the humor of its occupant. "A Prima Donna! A kingdom for a Prima Donna!" cried the poor, troubled man; for he had promised to procure one in place of his own who had fallen sick, and he knew not how he could keep his word. The celebrated tenor singer, Gerstacker—the father of the renowned traveler—who was visiting in the city, had so delighted the public with his magnificent voice and exquisite style that, in spite of the heat of summer, he was eagerly called for, to appear in opera. Now, without one to fill the place of the invalid soprano, this of course would be impossible. As it was expected of him to furnish the wanting element, was it wonderful that the manager's Mocha had lost its flavor, and that his brow was clouded? With a gentle knock at the door, his friend, the Capellmeister and Opera director, Herr Friebensee, entered, and the first sound meeting his ear was the almost despairing cry:

"It is well that you have come; help me, stand by me. A kingdom for a soprano singer, were it but for one rolé!"

"First give me the kingdom and then I will furnish the singer," was the laughing reply. "But what is the rolé?"

"Gerstacker has declared his willingness to sing 'John of Paris.' It is said to be one of his best parts; everything is ready for the representation, the only thing wanting is the Princess of Navarra."

"Only Donna Clara, Princess of Navarra? Why, I should say everything was wanting then," said

Friebensee, playfully, when looking up at the other's sorry face, he continued, still cheerfully, but consolingly, too, "Hold up your head, Holbein! I will see to the wanting trifle. I will provide you with a most serene princess. I have one among my scholars."

"Who, dear, who is this pearl?"

"Fetterl, Sontag's pretty little daughter. She is a little star, full of wisdom and talent—full of understanding and enthusiasm. She is just studying with me the rolé of the Princess of Navarra. So then, in five days—too long? Why, man, you are unreasonable! Well, then, in three days you can give the opera; that is, if Gerstacker will sing with the little one, for she is young—very young, indeed."

"And you think she will succeed—she will not disgrace us?"

"She! Disgrace us? Certainly not."

"Then it is decided. Your word is enough for me. Thank God, there is a load gone from my heart!" And the happy manager sprang joyfully up, while the Capellmeister took a speedy leave, and hastened off to his pupil.

At the house door he was met by the silvery, bell-like tones of Henriette's voice, and the old teacher's heart glowed with pleasure at finding his favorite pupil at her studies so early in the morning, and when she was not expecting him either. Softly he opened her door, and, unseen by the charming girl, who was sitting at the piano, stood eagerly listening, smiling with satisfaction when she sang a passage over and over until she had it perfect. At last, when she had finished a phrase of the most extremely difficult "colorit," with astonishing skill and sureness, he could maintain silence no longer, but heartily clapping his hands, he cried:

"You are a glorious girl, Fetterl, and in three days you shall appear as the 'Princess,' in John of Paris."

The young girl, who had sprung quickly up, and, all glowing with the praise and applause, hastened towards her teacher, now fell back in alfright at this startling news, unable to speak a word, plainly showing her feeling by her expressive face and clear blue eyes.

"My dear child, keep up your courage," said Friebensee, soothingly, when he saw her standing there, so pale and trembling; "Do you think I would have said you could sing the Princess if I had not been sure of it? And will you not do credit to your old friend and teacher?—shall he not be proud of you?"

A quiver of joy thrilled through the charming form of the young girl. The roses bloomed once more on the cheek that had been so pale—the roses of fresh, early youth, almost childhood; the eyes beamed with courage and enthusiasm; the whole face was illuminated as though transfigured by the pure dedication to art, and with a firm voice, Henriette said:

"You have said, master, that I can do it; your word shall not be brought to shame! I shall be ready in three days to appear as the Princess of Navarra."

"God bless you, my child!"

"Do you know that Gerstacker is going to sing 'John of Paris' to-morrow?" cried one passer-by to another. "I am hurrying off to get tickets. They say there is a large crowd around the box."

"But the first singer is sick; who is going to give the Princess?"

"Little Sontag, the daughter of the actress!"

"She? Why, it is not long since she was playing the rolés of children—she was always a fine child, but she must be very young."

These and similar expressions might be heard in the streets the day before the representation, and on the following evening, too, when, notwithstanding the intense heat, a large audience eagerly waited the artistic treat of hearing the distinguished guest in "John of Paris." At last Gerstacker appeared, and played and sang so that it was a pleasure to listen to him, and he was met by bursts of enthusiastic applause. Now and then acquaintances would remark to each other: "Poor little Henriette—poor child, how unfortunate that she should make her debut with so great an artist!"

And now the approach of the Princess was announced. All eyes were turned towards the door, on the threshold of which there suddenly appeared one of purest and loveliest apparitions that have ever been seen upon the stage. Two years later, when Henriette Sontag again appeared in public, a magic flower had grown out of the lovely bud, but even now combined such grace, loveliness and maidenly dignity, that all hearts were irresistibly drawn towards the being that looked more like an angel than might else. And when "John," overcome by the sight of the noble donna, sings:

"Lovely is she as a flower,
Tender goodness in her eyes,

And in every feature tower
Of reflecting glory the chief

—the eyes of the assembled audience were bent upon the young girl standing there as the embodiment of these words, and the murmur of satisfaction grew more and more perceptible.

With true womanly modesty, yet with neither awkwardness nor timidity, the princess advanced, and the first tones pealed forth from her rosy lips with a clearness, a sweet, ardent fullness, that possessed the power of spreading throughout the now excited audience the stillness of the grave. In Henriette's great blue eyes, the mirror of her pure soul, there kindled a yet brighter light than before, when the first soft "bravo" fell upon her ear; it had for her more value than a whole storm of applause, for it came from her teacher, the old Capellmeister, who, enraptured not only with the purity of her intonation, but the dignity of her bearing, could no longer repress his delight. The old man had no intention, however, that his softly spoken bravo should be the signal, as it was, for a burst of the most stormy applause that has ever yet been bestowed upon so youthful a candidate. This universal burst of applause at first not only surprised but confused the maiden, so that for one moment her voice trembled; but she bravely conquered her emotion, and then, encouraged by the recognition, the notes rang forth with yet more fullness, clearness and freshness, until a wondrously beautiful trill, of a roundness of tone and remarkable duration—so that the Capellmeister was forced to hold his breath in amazement—ended the exquisite aria, "With what wondrous ardor." From this moment the victory was sure, and with that aria the young novice in art had elevated herself to the rank of an artiste, and the great Gerstacker had to be content to share the triumph of the evening with a young debutante.

Henriette was received behind the scenes at the end of the first act by her delighted mother and her deeply moved teacher.

"I knew that my brave girl would not disgrace me, but I scarcely thought she would make her old teacher so proud," said the old man. "That was a trill! I thought it was never coming to an end; it would have terrified me had I not been so completely overwhelmed with joy. Such a little 'Baeküsch,' and yet she can sing so that I must take my hat off to her in reverence. Listen, Fetterl, one day you will have a rich harvest of glory and honor, and when they press the laurel wreaths upon your brow, think sometimes of your old teacher, then perhaps resting in the quiet grave!"

Deeply affected, the maiden silently bore the honored hand to her lips. And now both she and Gerstacker must again appear.

In the second act, the favorite Troubadour song caused great furor; John of Paris was obliged to repeat his part, but in case of the Princess once did not suffice. Da capo, and again da capo—for the third time Henriette must sing hers; the audience grew ever warmer in their enthusiasm—and it was not forced applause, nor feigned ardor, but the pure outburst of intense satisfaction, mingled in regard to Henriette Sontag with a joyful amazement that one so young could accomplish so much. Amid the tumult of rejoicing at the highly artistic treat—for never had Gerstacker been seen to such advantage—the curtain fell.

Thus ended the first, and altogether unpremeditated appearance of the youthful singer. Truly, no singer ever met with greater, better merited triumph; no woman's name ever shone more brightly amid the triple crown of greatest artist, truest, most excellent wife, and most faithful mother.

Now she rests from her labors—from her rich, varied life; but the name of Henriette Sontag still lives. May it long be honored!

Noble Singers at Exeter Hall.

In England Music and Charity have been made twin sisters, and for their lives not to be divided. Bishops and Archbishops come out industriously in the Lent season in sententious discourses on the duty of considering the poor; Prime Ministers take the chair at public dinners given in aid of those who print newspapers, and those who write in them; noble women, and even Royalty itself, condescend to preside over the stalls at the charitable bazaar; and never was there a time more to be remarked than the present for the sympathy manifested by our men and women of blood and race with the indigent and distressed. The "old religion" was essentially one of deeds, and charity was held to be its great act of faith. Its noble examples of churches built, hospitals founded, and schools endowed are not forgotten, and the Bishop of London is in a fair way of getting the million of sovereigns required for the additional churches declared to be necessary for his lordship's diocese. But music is the moving power in this generation, and church choirs, choral celebrations in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, the "Stabat Mater" and "Lauda Sion," at Moorfields and St. George's, the orchestral services at Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford, and the great meetings at Birmingham and Norwich—all tend to show that music is the true fulcrum for setting in motion the national sensibility. Music and Charity have drawn out again the ever to be remembered Crisi at the fine concert at the Crystal Palace the other day, and music and charity will send down Jenny Lind as Ruth to the ancient fane of Hereford.

We had imagined the days had passed for the singing of Lord Chancellors in parish churches, and should have as little thought of an Archbishop singing in Exeter Hall as another Cardinal Rohan dancing a saraband at one of Her Majesty's court balls. Not that our young Archbishop is unable "to take his part," as old Morley calls it, for his Grace (had he flourished in days gone by) might have sung his madrigal with the Grand Monarque, joined in a six-part mass with Charles VI., and passed a joke with Louis XI. on his choir-part of only three notes. But no Archbishop has yet sung in Exeter Hall, although we have one who sings well in his place in church, and can do so elsewhere whenever the occasion calls for the exercise.

As charity took the gracious and beautiful Empress of our now almost kindred country to the cholera wards, so last night it took one as gracious and beautiful, if not quite so exalted as an Empress, to Exeter Hall, to assist in the performance of a new oratorio, given in aid of a Hospital for the helpless and afflicted children of the poor. Mr. Schachner's oratorio of "Israel's Return" was given on Wednesday evening with her Grace the Duchess of Newcastle as the prima donna, the wife of the Bishop of Gloucester, Mrs. Ellicott, taking the second soprano. Her Grace belongs to the leading communion of the National Church, which seeks to cling to and imitate all that in the "old religion" is founded on scriptural truth and early tradition, and with which heroic action and delicate sympathy is both duty and privilege. Mrs. Ellicott—whose fine voice, chaste execution and extensive reading, made her a great favorite at the Cambridge University Concerts, when the Bishop was a Professor there—has long taken the Hospital, so to say, under her protection, and to her indomitable perseverance and (may we say) "pluck," the musical public owe the very fine performance of last night.

Thirty years ago or more, when the Amateur Choral Society of Exeter Hall first commenced its labors, the professional element was hotly antagonistic to the progress of the new institution. "Don't sing for those amateurs," said the late Tom Cooke to John Hobbs, "no good can come of it." The association has outlived Tom Cooke, and were we poets like Old John, we might metricize on St. Cecilia and say of the young elephantine Timotheus, "It drew an angel down."

The orchestra on Wednesday was a very brilliant affair. A numerous choral body—the Chapel Royal boys in their gold and scarlet, the ladies in white robes, and it only wanted the men in surplices, and the band in crimson cassocks and black sash to render it a sight for all London to rejoice over. Things take time—good things especially so; the blue, the red and the yellow are not going to be confined to the Opera House, nor are Meyerbeer, or Verdi, or Gounod to be the only composers whose music is to be assisted by the important aid of gorgeousness in color. The old oratorians at St. Philip's were dressed in full costume, the young ladies at St. Cyr also; let Exeter Hall take the initiative, and we should no longer see a platform of black and neutral tints distressing the eye at these great gatherings in town and country. In the days of Arnold and Crotch oratorios entire were thought dull and heavy—Haydn's "Creation" was even oppressive—and where there was no festival and no attraction, the negative repose of sable well suited the nature and character of the gathering. It is not so now. "Eli" is not brown, "Naaman" is not black, "St. Paul" is not copper-tone, nor is "Elijah" negro-head. There is no necessity to go on blundering in darkness and injustice for the sake of an extinct prejudice.

The band on Wednesday was that of Covent Garden-men, all good and true, and who can play. The composer himself conducted. The hall was well filled, some fifteen or sixteen hundred being present, testifying to the zeal of the patrons and patronesses of the Society and great attractions of the evening.

As it is the fashion now to notice the performers and the performance before saying a word of music, we commence our brief remarks with the singing of Her Grace of Newcastle. At the first public night of the Exeter Hall Society, Sir George Smart, conducting, Mrs. Shaw, then Miss Postans, made her first appearance, and so frightened was the debutante that she lost both head and voice; and we well recollect at an oratorio in Covent Garden, a popular soprano getting somewhat confused and wild, and cutting the Gordian knot by throwing her music at the head of the conductor and running off the boards. Her Grace sang in a sweet, sensible, and natural way—with a pure and persuasive tone of voice—at first somewhat veiled by the novelty of position. After the duet with Mr. Hohler, for which the calls of repetition were not to be denied, her voice became settled, and the next recitative was well—thoroughly well given. In the former portion of the oratorio her singing met with the acclamations it was entitled to from peculiar circumstances, but the applause warmed from the real earnestness of the vocalist, and in this recitative the beauty of the scriptural passage, the strength of the composer, and the revelation of true artistic power on the part of the vocalist, excited the audience to enthusiasm, and there was of course an encore.

Mrs. Ellicott's singing is marked by great accuracy and good taste, with here and there a just expression of powerful declamation. Her solo and her quartet parts were given faultlessly.

Mr. Schachner is well known as a great performer on the piano, and successful composer for that instrument. The Oratorio given on Wednesday is written in the true oratorio vein, abounding in counterpoint, and some of the choruses are far beyond the touch of ordinary hands. He has much improved the work since its first production and will no doubt be called upon for fresh and increased exertion.

American Art at the Exposition.

AN ENGLISH CRITIQUE.

The London Athenaeum speaks slightly of the paintings sent by American artists to the Paris Exposition. We quote:

The order of the catalogue of this great gathering next compels us to examine the Art of the United States of America, which may be described under two heads; first, that which is French in origin as in nature; secondly, that which is prose. The latter class comprehends much that is valuable, much that is interesting; but as it aims to be topographical in landscape, and merely illustrative in figure-painting, is by no means of the highest importance when we are reckoning up the wealth of the world in art. With this class rank the large topographical and meteorological landscapes of Messrs. Church, "The Falls of Niagara," "The Rainy Season in the Tropics," and, inferiorly to the last, as less effectively achieving a common aim, Mr. Bierstadt's "The Rocky Mountains," and Mr. J. F. Cropsey's "Mount Jefferson, New Hampshire."

There are spectacular pictures of the common sort, or scenes on a smaller scale, and valuable in their way. Better in painting, and finer in sentiment than these, is Mr. J. Hart's River Turris, Connecticut—a bright landscape, showing a gently flowing stream, its meadows and trees. In Mr. Kensett's Lake George, Autumn, is the besetting opacity of the United States practice in landscape, such as we find in common French art of the kind, and observe to be dominant in Germany, a defect which, apart from all other considerations, places the result in value far below even ordinary English landscape-paintings. In this way, the productions of Messrs. Hubbard and Gifford, who show us with spirit a grand range of blue hills, and one or two inferior painters, are below par. Nevertheless, it is undeniable that in some of these pictures are to be observed signs of pathetic purpose of their authors, without which all landscape is merely scientific or topographical. Now German-French landscapes, with which may be classed the works of our present subjects, are, when topographical, apt to be woefully dull and heartless. We decline to rank with art-work such things as result from this want of perception of something more than description can supply by brushes and colors. A man has no business to paint a landscape unless he means something by it of the pathetic sort; topography and scientific illustrations are good, but they are not art.

The better skilled painters who are grouped here with those above named are French in grain. As a rule, these men have a truer perception of the aims and value of art than their less fortunate, but, it may be, more original brethren. Mr. Whistler is eminent among these. Of him our readers know enough. It would be difficult to find an artist more intensely French than he. Mr. Lambdin's name we remember in Paris. His The Last Sleep, a lover at his mistress's death-bed—the best painted portion a closed balcony, the effect of the excluded sunlight, has many cleverly expressed points. Mr. McEntee is French to the core of his thought, and pathetic beyond the common in his picture of desolation and merciless ravage, Virginia in 1862—two wrecked houses in a wilderness, a river flowing through a waste. Mr. Whittridge's Coast of Rhode Island is exceptional to the common here, and in an original manner renders finely, but rather flimsily, the lapse of waves on the shore. The Pride of the Valley, by Mr. A. P. Gray, reminds one of the superior pictures of Ripplingill in its sentiment, which rightly pertains to a consumptive daughter and distressed parents; it has much better drawing than our countrymen could impart to a picture.

Mr. D. Huntington's Republican Court in the time of Washington, a large production, makes the critic respect the simplicity of its author even while he smiles at his primitive ideas of art. This is rather a collection of honestly-studied dresses and portraits without vivacity, although painted well, than a picture in the true sense of the term. Nevertheless, being honest, it is worth a legion of flashy French spectacular pictures, and an acre of its counterparts among ourselves. We look upon this quaint and Quakerish example as the sole valuable specimen of native-born United States figure painting on these walls, and are certain that the severe and unsophisticated principles it illustrates are the tools of genius, hopeful of the best art. Within his means and with his ability, the motto of Mr. Huntington is evidently "thorough." In other hands, here is the secret of power. So far as he goes he is happy. Generally, the defect of his countrymen appears in seeing in art nothing beyond its necessary office of representing nature, and seeing thus much prosaically. M. Mignot shows a sense of more than this in his Sources of the Susquehanna; but it would be better to call him a Frenchman than anything else. There is a precious but showy quality in Mr. W. Homer's Confederate Prisoners to the Front.

Art Culture in Boston.

(From the Boston Daily Advertiser, July 30.)

We have the pleasure to announce that the sum of $10,000 has been presented to the Boston Athenæum, by the will of a gentleman recently deceased, for the purpose of enlarging its fine-arts department.

This timely donation furnishes an occasion for considering the wants of the art interest in this city, and the various projects which are already under consideration for supplying the same. During the past twenty years the city and its suburbs have made immense strides in population and wealth; and in taste and expenditure for costly works of art there has been even a more marked increase. Ten valuable pictures are now purchased by our citizens, where one of equal value was bought twenty years ago. Has there been a corresponding increase in the number and the reputation of resident artists; of the means of educating art students, and in the capacity of galleries for the exhibition of the choicest productions of the pencil and the chisel? Most assuredly not. It is notorious that when a Boston artist acquires a national reputation, he removes to New York, and takes a studio at the painters' elysium in Tenth street, or finds his residence in Florence or Rome. There have been no increased facilities for studying art in Boston. Hence accomplished teachers turn their steps to New York, and promising students follow them, or depart for Europe. If we except the exhibition rooms of picture dealers, there has been no enlargement of the space for exhibitions since the present galleries of the Athenæum were opened nearly twenty years ago. Indeed the space is really less, for one of the large exhibition rooms at the Athenæum was taken for books several years ago, and it is understood that the statory room is soon to be devoted to the same purpose. The whole building will soon be required for books. Something must therefore be done, and without delay, or Boston will lose, if it has not lost already, the prestige it once enjoyed of being the seat of art, as well as of letters.

What is needed in Boston is not simply new exhibition rooms, but a School of Art, which shall provide suitable instruction for students under a corps of professional teachers, to which new galleries shall be an adjunct. Several such schools have recently been established in Philadelphia; and some of the western cities furnish better advantages for art students than can be found here. In New Haven a School of Art has just been opened as one of the departments of the college, and a building, planned expressly for this purpose—rooms for instruction occupying the first story, and exhibition galleries, with top light, the second story—has been erected at an expense of $175,000. The entire cost was paid by one gentleman, Mr. Augustus R. Street, who has since died, but who thus built for himself a monument more enduring than brass. The exhibition rooms are now filled with the choicest specimens of American and foreign art. Where is the solid man of Boston who will do the same thing for his own city?

Some years ago the project was canvassed of establishing a free art gallery; but it met with little encouragement on account of the great outlay of capital required. As the plan did not embrace a school of art, it seems hardly adapted to the requirements of the present day; and it may well be questioned whether the time has yet come for erecting a large free art gallery in this city. The friends of the measure also discovered that the chief patrons of art among us were already interested in the Athenæum, and deemed it desirable to secure the expansion of that institution rather than to found a new enterprise.

The trustees of the Athenæum, it is understood, have under consideration the enlargement of its fine-arts department. At the annual meeting of the proprietors in January last, a special committee was appointed to consider the subject, and this committee reported at a subsequent meeting, submitting a plan for erecting new galleries on an adjacent estate in Tremont place, which the Athenæum owns. This enlargement would supply rooms to replace the apartments already taken, and which it is proposed to take, for library purposes; but it would not meet the future wants of the institution, or the art interests of the city. Such was the feeling on the part of the committee and of the proprietors, and hence the plan was submitted without any recommendation. There seems to be little probability of its being carried out.

The questions therefore return: how shall the objects we have considered be accomplished, and who shall do it? In replying to these inquiries we beg to suggest that a new and spacious structure is needed which shall combine the two features of a School of Art and new exhibition galleries. The building should be an architectural ornament to the city. No site for such a building is available in the immediate vicinity of the Athenæum. The new land on the Back Bay, which is soon to be the centre of population, seems to be an appropriate location. A lot of land on the corner of St. James and Dorchester streets, containing more than two acres, and accessible on all sides by open avenues, has already been given to the city, and is, by the terms of the deed, dedicated expressly to the purposes of art, or as a public square. Upon this lot the city have expended during the past year, in filling, $32,000, as appears from the following extract from the Auditor's Report, page 38:—

Payments for filling in a lot of land on St. James street, opposite Huntington square, containing 126,594 square feet. This land was given to the city of Boston by the Boston Water Power Company, in accordance with the terms of an agreement between the State of Massachusetts, the Boston Water Power Company and the City of Boston, dated December 31, 1854, said land to be used either for erection thereon of a building dedicated to the fine arts, or as a public square, $32,000.

The money to erect the building and establish the Art School must be the free will offering of our citizens.

We would make one further suggestion, that the new enterprise be carried on through the agency of the Boston Athenæum. This corporation is composed of about eight hundred of our wealthiest and most influential citizens, and has a capital in real estate, securities, library and works of art, of the nominal value of $700,000, but of a real value of near a million dollars. All this property is held sacred to the objects of literature and art. The trustees receive no compensation for their services, and the proprietors no dividends. The finances of no public institution were ever better managed. It has the confidence, such as a new institution could not have, of our wealthiest citizens. The plan proposed is entirely within the scope of the purposes for which the institution was founded, and with which it has maintained the art interests of the city for so many years. Gentlemen of special qualifications and leisure are appointed to serve on its fine arts committee. The finances of this department have always been kept distinct from the general funds, and have never been appropriated for other purposes. Every admission fee, and every dime ever paid for a catalogue, can be accounted for to-day. An art exhibition is not, as many suppose, a money-making enterprise. Four-fifths of the gross receipts of the Athenæum gallery are annually expended in current expenses, and the small balance remaining is invested in new pictures and statuary, or is added to the fine arts fund. If any account was kept for rent, and the use of capital invested, the exhibitions would show a balance on the wrong side of the treasurer's ledger. The public, therefore, for many years have enjoyed the annual exhibitions of the Athenæum at the expense of the capital of the institution.

It may be said that the Athenæum is a private corporation, and that the plan proposed could be better carried out by separate organization. If the Athenæum were a corporation for money-making purposes, like the Boston Gas Light Company or the Fifty Associates, the objection would be a valid one. But is it possible to conceive of a corporation conducted on a more unselfish basis, or where the responsibility is divided among a larger and more influential class of citizens than is the Athenæum?

By carrying out the plan proposed through the agency of the Athenæum, the new galleries would start with the valuable collections it now possesses, and with the sympathy and confidence of its munificent benefactors.

The first object, however, is to secure the funds required, and when this is accomplished, the minor points to which we have alluded will readily adjust themselves to this main fact. Let us hope that the liberal donation we have announced foreshadows the speedy endowment of an art institution which shall maintain the ancient reputation of the city of Boston.

Music Abroad.

PRESTON.—According to report, the Abbé Liszt will give a series of nine concerts here in November, when, in addition to a number of his own works, he will include in the programmes Beethoven's Eroica and Ninth Symphonies.

WEIMAR.—On the 28th August will be celebrated the eight-hundredth anniversary of the Wartburg. It is proposed to give a performance under the direction of the composer himself, of the Abbé Liszt's oratorio, Die heilige Elisabeth, in the celebrated old fortress of the Thuringian Landgraves, of the "Münnesänger," and, though last not least, of Luther himself.

BADEN-BADEN.—With the exception of three Quartet Sarées, given by the Florentine society, including Herr Jean Becker and colleagues, who have afforded great satisfaction to a small but most select public, there have been as yet no concerts of any importance in the Conversationshaus. Mme. Pauline Viardot-Garcia, however, has long since resumed her Sunday Matinées, to which all the leading artists and the principal visitors enjoy free admission. The Queen of Prussia and the Grand Duchess of Baden have been to several of the Matinées.—The Theatre was opened a few days since by the company from the Royal Opera-house, Stuttgart, who proposed giving three performances.—The Italian operatic season will commence on the 8th August, and extend up to the 14th September. The artists engaged are: Signore Vitali, Grossi, Signori Nicolini, Delle Sedie, Zucchini and Agnesi. Among the works performed will be Crispino e la Comare, Ernani, L'Elisir d'Amore, Linda di Chamounix, Il Barbiere di Siviglia, and Faust (by M. Gounod).

ENGLISH SINGERS IN PARIS.—The choir of the Tonic Sol-fa Association of London responded to the challenge sent out some six months ago by the Emperor, who offered a prize of £200 to the choir (of any nation) which should gain the highest place in a competition in Paris. The competition came off on Monday the 8th, and the presentation of prizes which took place on the day following, is thus described by Le Figaro:—"By two o'clock all the singers had assembled in the Palace of Industry, the two prize choirs being seated in the centre, at the foot of the steps leading to the throne. At three the Emperor arrived, accompanied by the Empress and the Princess Clotilde. As soon as the Domine Saluum had been sung, the banners of all the competing choirs were carried in procession before their Majesties, being lowered as they passed the throne, as is done at a review. When the banners had passed, the prizes were given away. The Emperor gave the special prize, which had been decreed to the English Tonic Sol-fa Association, to a young English girl, who was much moved and covered with blushes. The two conquerors then sang the pieces which had gained for them the prizes so sharply and ardently contested for. Their Majesties then left." It should be added that the prize was given to a choir from Lille, in the North of France. It seems that the right of the English choir to the prize was disputed on account of there being ladies' voices among them, but their singing was of such a high order (these were the judges' words) that they had a special prize, a prize of "egalment" given them as narrated above. It consisted of a gold Exhibition medal, a silver gilt wreath, and a certificate. Mr. Proulman, the hard working conductor, received also another gold medal, and the Society of Orphéonistes presented him with their decoration of honor.

DRESDEN.—Herr Ullmann will give three concerts here at the beginning of September. His great star will be Mlle. Carlotta Patti; his minor constellations, Messrs. Vieuxtemps, Jaell, Papper, and Stockhausen. —The management of the Theatre Royal displayed great activity during the latter half of last month. The following operas figured in the bills: Le Philtre, La Part du Diable, L'Eclair, Faust (Gomod's), Il Trovatore, Figaro, Murtha, and Guillaume Tell.

DARMSTADT.—A concert was given here lately for the purpose of erecting a monument in memory of the celebrated Abbé Vogler, the master of Winter, Meyerbeer, Carl M. von Weber, and many others. The members of the Cologne Association for Male Voices, and Herr Ferdinand Hiller, who played several of his own smaller compositions, were the attraction on this occasion. The net receipts amounted to some 3,000 florins.

London.

The Saturday Review—like most of the London journals which are or would be wise on the subject of music—does not at all agree with the Orchestra's enthusiastic estimate of Rubinstein, the Russian Pianist, and finds fault with the closing concert of the Philharmonic series for introducing "music of the Future," to-wit, the Tamulhäuser overture and a Concerto by Rubinstein.

If an immoderate amount of boisterous cacophony is music, then the overture in Tamulhäuser is music; otherwise not. M. Rubinstein's concerto (his fourth) is even worse. The overture of Herr Wagner has at least a certain intelligible form—a beginning, a middle, and an end; but M. Rubinstein's concerto boasts nothing of the kind. There is no apparent reason why any portion of it should be where it is, instead of where it is not. Of the three movements into which it is divided—moderato, moderato assai, and allegro—the most objectionable is decidedly the last; but from beginning to end the concerto at best sounds like an improvisation, by a not very skillful improvisatore. M. Rubinstein has paid two visits to this country. The first was in 1843, when he was put forth as a boy-prodigy, but stood little chance against a greater prodigy, who came to London in the same year—the gifted and much regretted Charles Filtch. For fourteen years afterwards nothing was heard of M. Rubinstein; but in 1858 he undertook a second professional journey to England. The great promise of his boyhood had scarcely been carried out; and his playing, though marked by extraordinary mechanical facility, was by no means noticeable for any of the refinements indispensable to genuine "virtuosity." Now, nine years later, he has honored the country with a third performance; and, if his performance at the last Philharmonic Concert may be accepted as a criterion, he has rather receded than advanced as a pianist. Playing more ferocious (we cannot find an apter phrase) and at the same time more unfinished has seldom been heard. Happily, or unhappily, the concerto was of the same quality as the playing. M. Rubinstein clearly belongs to the school of Abbé Liszt; but he surpasses all the disciples of that gifted though eccentric artist in caricaturing his model. Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and the symphony in G minor of Professor Sterndale Bennett, now completed by the addition of a movement in D major (Romanza per le viole), separating the minuetto from the roudo finale, were the most important orchestral features at this concert. Graceful as is the new movement of Professor Bennett's symphony, we cannot hail its interpolation as an improvement. Either the work should be left as it originally stood, or a more developed movement—a regular slow movement, in fact—be added. At best the new romanza is a pretty conceit. The symphony, however, extremely well played, was admired as before (in 1864 and 1865;) the minuetto, which is full of charm and naïveté, was encored, and the composer was called on at the end. At the same time Professor Bennett is too gifted a man to treat his art with anything approaching indifference; and we can only look upon the added movement as a bonne plaisanterie. The singers on this occasion were Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Nilsson, and Mr. Hohler. An extraordinary sensation was created by Mlle. Nilsson's really wonderful execution of "Gli angui d'Inferno," from Die Zauberflöte, which, though she sang it in C minor and E flat (instead of D minor and F, as Mozart wrote it), was one of those legitimate displays that mark an epoch in an artist's career. She was compelled to repeat the whole; and now the operatic world will be anxiously looking forward to the revival of Il Flauto Magico at Her Majesty's Theatre, with Mlle. Nilsson as Astrafiamante.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. ON Monday His Imperial Majesty the Sultan of all the Turkeys [and crucifier of the Christians in Crete] visited this great establishment in State. For a description of the ceremony the reader may take any of our morning contemporaries (including the Morning Advertiser). The entertainment consisted of the first three acts of Masaniello, with the usual cast. Signors Naudin and Graziani were encored in the duet of the second act.

On Tuesday and Thursday Romeo e Giulietta was given for the third and fourth times.

Last night the opera was La Favorita. To-night Romeo for the fifth time.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE. ON Monday night the opera was Faust. On Tuesday night (owing to the fête in honor of the Sultan at the Crystal Palace), there was no performance.

On Wednesday Don Giovanni was repeated, and on Thursday Oberon.

To-night La Traviata. Il Flauto Magico will be given, with Mlle. Nilsson as the Queen of Night, on Tuesday next, and on Thursday Cherbini's Medea, with Tietjens.—Musical World, July 20.

They have also musically entertained the Sultan at the Crystal Palace; the Musical World says:

One of the great events of the day was the gift made by the Sultan to his entertainers of the sum of £1000. The Crystal Palace was opened with a variety of objects; but what it really exists by is music. Thus at every festival, at every entertainment to which it is desired to attract large numbers at high prices, the chief, and in the great majority of cases, the only attraction offered is a concert, or the performance of an oratorio. The Crystal Palace is nothing if not musical. Its artistic claims, such as they are, are entirely in connection with music; and to get a true idea of the munificence of our Eastern visitors we must remember that the Sultan and the Viceroys of Egypt have, between them, given to the Crystal Palace exactly three times what the British Parliament, after much deliberation and with much grumbling, has agreed to give annually towards the support of a National Musical Academy.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 3, 1867.

The Annual School Festival.

The Seventy-fourth Annual Festival (ninth of the Musical Festivals) of the Boston Public Schools was held, as usual, in the Music Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, July 23. To describe the beauty of the scene would be to repeat words and images which have in past years only fallen too far short of the occasion. Twelve hundred girls and boys, the former charmingly but simply dressed, all with faces full of youth, intelligence and promise, again rose tier upon tier on both wings of the Great Organ, and these were culled from all the schools as the best specimens of the vocal culture which has become more and more an element in our free school education. The number is necessarily limited by the capacity of the stage, and the whole arrangement of seats, the almost choregraphic unity in variety of movement with which these young companies are quietly and quickly marshalled into their places, the system of rehearsal in separate schools, and finally en masse, had been studied out and wrought out so thoroughly and wisely, once for all, by the first author of the idea and his co-workers of the School Committee and the teachers, that the machine moves now almost of itself. It is true there were some discouraging obstacles to contend with this year. An opposition, almost bitter, to the Festival, betraying half concealed hostility to the whole policy of teaching music in the schools, had sprung up in a portion of the Committee, and although the better faith and wisdom of the majority prevailed, it is yet no wonder that, in such a state of suspense, the usual musical preparations in the schools was delayed until the question could be finally settled and in fact almost to the last moment. Meanwhile Dr. UPHAM, the leading advocate and organizer of the Festivals from the first, had gone abroad, and the Festival Committee only a few weeks ago appealed to one of their number, Mr. F. H. UNDERWOOD, who, in spite of most exacting duties in another sphere, took the matter in hand with discreet energy, and, with the prompt cooperation of Mr. ZERRAHN, the Conductor of the Festival, and of Mr. SHARLAND, who has been for several years making the children in all the Grammar Schools masters of quite a repertoire of good songs and choruses in one, two and three parts; soon got all the questions of programme and arrangements settled and the cheerful and exciting business of rehearsal fairly in train. The result was a Festival no whit inferior to any in past years, while musically, we are safe in saying, it showed important progress, as it was bound to do after another year of trial and of constant improving upon the system of music teaching as a regular part of the school exercises. The modest but invaluable labors of Mr. MASON in the Primary Schools, and of Mr. MUNROE in all the schools, the former teaching the rudiments of song by rote and note to the youngest children, the latter disciplining the voice into wholesome and expressive habits, tell most convincingly in this mass singing, both in the precision and pure intonation thereof, and in the collective quality of tone. A larger and more musical volume of tone comes out, and it is used every year with more pliancy and skill, while there is at the same time a higher average of musical feeling and perception recognizable in the twelve hundred.

The scene, as we have said, was enchanting; the Hall was most tastefully decorated with pots and baskets of flowers and vines dependent from the ceiling; people were as eager as ever for admission, and as delighted with what they saw and heard; and there was a general feeling of thankfulness that the beautiful custom had not been ruthlessly sacrificed to a cavilling, uneasy love of change. The spoiler lays his hand upon too many things, destroys the fine trees in our streets and squares, disfigures our delightful Public Garden with huge, unsightly railroad bridges (of no sort of use) and the sweet sylvan lawns of the Common with stiff new paths: let him not meddle with the Children's Festival; enough that he spoils their playground!—The selection of Music too was uncommonly good; a mingling of the simple, grave and stately with the bright, graceful and attractive. The only fault was the old fatality of too much speech-making—quite as superfluous as the bridge aforesaid over the duck pond in the Garden. There was one live, hearty speech, which went to the hearts of children and all, that by the Rev. PHILLIPS BROOKS of Philadelphia; and it was short; but even that was unnecessary, in presence of the greater eloquence of the occasion and the faces and the voices of those children. The rest of the speaking was mostly for form's sake, well meant, sound and sensible in matter, but not needed there and then. Is it intended for the children? They cannot listen. For the older audience? They come to see and hear the children. There was one announcement, however, in the address of the Chairman, which, inasmuch as the music was to be followed, as hitherto, by the presentation of bouquets to the "medal scholars," was peculiarly pertinent to the occasion, and must have been grateful to all right-minded persons. It was to the effect, that the medal system is henceforth abolished; the love of excellence for its own sake, a generous emulation in the pursuit thereof, and no longer the mean ambition to outstrip rivals, is the motive that shall now inspire the pupil; this will make nobler men and women, and broader, sounder scholars, if not such glib and showy memorizers as before.

After an Organ prelude by Mr. SHARLAND, who was organist of the day, a solid and encouraging old German Choral: "Was Gott thut, das ist wohlgethan" (What God does, that is right well done), was sung by the whole 1200 in unison, the organ supplying Bach's harmony. This was the favorite Choral of the late King of Prussia, and we cannot forget how impressively it sounded on that clear, cold January day at Potsdam, at his funeral, played by the successive bands in the procession, each serving it with a different harmony, and finally, as we came away, how our ears were greeted by the same tune rained down from the sky as it were, transfigured, in two-part contrapuntal harmony, from the chimes above the church where Frederick the Great is buried. The children sang it well, with good intonation, and all together with a will, so that it was inspiring. But there was too great uniformity of loudness for the best effect; though this is better than to attempt light and shade at the risk of timid and untrue intonation. The best (were it practicable) would have been the alternating of a verse in unison by all, with a verse by a select choir in Bach's four-part harmony unaccompanied.

Next came the Invocation by the Chaplain, and the Chairman's address, and then a three-part Song: "Our Native Land," by Abt, fresh and pleasing, and the chorus: "Over the billow," from Mr. Kielblock's Opera "Miles Standish," which was sung last year, but with better effect this time both of voices and orchestra; the alternation of the buoyant sailor strain with the solemn hymn made a marked impression.

After another address followed the most charming and artistic of the musical selections, that fresh, pure opening chorus from Rossini's "William Tell," sung in three parts by the pupils of the Girls' High and Normal School. The exquisitely figurative and suggestive prelude and accompaniments were finely rendered by the orchestra, the voices sounded pure and maiden-like and sweetly blended, and the whole went with lilt and delicacy and good light and shade. These had been under Mr. ZIRBACH's personal training. An hour spent in their school room a few weeks since convinced us that music had not been taught there in vain. The young ladies part now with their teacher, whose other occupations as conductor, &c., claim his whole time, with sincere regret; fortunate for them, however, and for music in the schools, that there is so competent a gentleman as Mr. ECKHART to succeed him in the good work.

"The Quiet Night," a sweet and tranquil three-part song by Abt, sung by the whole; another address; and then the Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass (so called), sung with great life and energy by full chorus, with orchestra and organ, the instruments of course supplying the fourth part in the vocal harmony, brought the musical feast proper to an inspiring close. The address and presentation of bouquets by his Honor, the Mayor, the band playing the meanwhile, and the singing of Old Hundred by "the whole congregation," remained for those who had not already enjoyed their fill.—We think we shall bear no more of abolishing the Musical School Festival!

Obituary.

Music in Boston mourns one of its truest friends and most cultivated amateurs in Mr. GEORGE PAPENDIEK. Suddenly cut off in the prime of a useful, happy life, his sterling worth is more than ever felt, not only in the home which he made beautiful, now left so desolate, but among all who had the privilege to know him. A native of Bremen, from one of those German families in which Music and Art are so sincerely cherished, he came at an early age to this country, married a Boston lady of superior culture, and, after a short residence in Milwaukee, settled in this city, where he had become widely known and a valued part of the best social life. A man of singular refinement, cheerful, enterprising, modest, kindly, full of thoughtfulness for others, ever true to courteous instincts, he attached all with whom he came in contact. Repeatedly have we heard the remark: We never felt so much the death of one we knew so little. The haunts of good music will miss his sympathetic presence. He was an earnest helper in all our public efforts for raising music to the true dignity of Art; for years the leading spirit in the amateur orchestral society, the "Mozart Club," and a useful member of the Symphony Concert Committee of the Harvard Musical Association. He was a good amateur violinist, and many a classical quartet, trio, &c., has been enjoyed at his house. Every musician of artistic faith and purpose found encouragement in him.

Beautiful as well as very sad was the burial scene at Forest Hills last Tuesday. Hosts of friends were there to pay the last poor tribute of affectionate respect; among them a delegation of his Harvard Musical associates, a number of our leading musical artists, and the members of the "Orpheus," who sang solemn music at the grave. The little birds, too, sang, and sweetest sunshine fell, and springing grass and flowers breathed hope and sweetness all around, filling the very air with heavenly assurance, for these were receiving to themselves all that was mortal of a life in harmony with theirs.

"FAIR HARVARD." The Commencement music was as bad as usual. That is to say, it was inappropriate. We make no criticism on the band employed, but we do respectfully suggest that a mere military brass band at all is not in harmony with an academic, calm, refined occasion. When we walk in the procession of the alumni, in order of classes from the venerable heads down, through those dear old classic shades, it is simply irritating and discordant to hear the soldiers' march from Gounod's Toussaint brayed out by coarse brazen throats; in the Church, after prayers and literary addresses, the same boisterous, untimely harmony is still more aggravating, because so unescapable within walls; and then at that feast of wit and intellect, the Phi Beta Kappa dinner, to have the fine influence of each felicitous impromptu (sharp prompting, though, on the part of Mr. President), in the shape of speech or poem, suddenly and coarsely broken in upon by these ferocious blasts of tubas and trombones, (they having first prepared our minds, by way of overture, with all the ghastliest diablics of Der Froschsüßer, coarsely served up and caricatured in an interminable potpourri), is like a repeated letting down from the Symposium of the Gods into the fiery furnace of uneasy spirits the smoke of whose torments ascendeth forever.

Verily there are occasions where no music is far better than any but the right kind of music. Better bread without butter, than with butter that is loud and rancid as brass music out of place. Sentimental brass music will suggest itself particularly here. It is too much the custom of our people at festivals, dramatic performances, &c., to fill up all the intervals with music, without the least regard to fitness. After an act of Hamlet has taken full possession of your mind, out bursts a noisy dashing polka, or a coarse march, or a piece of senseless solo virtuosity from the orchestra; in German theatres we found it pleasanter with no music between the acts, unless it were musical illustration added to the play by kindred genius, like Beethoven's to "Egmont," or Mendelssohn's to the "Midsummer Night's Dream,"—pleasanter because the train of thought and feeling was not rudely broken; or if there was need of alternation, there was a chance to talk with neighbors undisturbed by irritating noise. Flies and mosquitoes are not more provoking than such music sometimes. We do it because it is the traditional and customary thing to do; we take for granted that we need it when we should be better off without it.

Speaking of another Festival we have complained of too much speaking; we have more often to complain of too much music. Music in its place is excellent; but out of place, it were better there were none. The truth is, a really musical person does not much relish music as a secondary thing to some other, a mere accompanying circumstance to fill up time, an "unconsidered trifle." Music to be enjoyable, must be principal, and claim attention on its own account by as good a right as sermon, speech or poem. Now an academic festival like the Commencement days at Cambridge, would seem to be the very occasion for introducing a reform in a custom now "more honored in the breach than in the observance" where taste, refinement, intellect preside over all else, why do they not take the music in charge? Why cater for the musical wants of these days precisely as one would for a military parade in the streets?

Cannot some gentler kind of music, more in the spirit of the hour, be easily provided? At the dinner, for instance, if fine speech carries us up to the point that we need the still finer, freer and more subtle language of pure tones, why shall not the Muse respond as artist, upon equal terms, with intelligent and sympathetic instinct, in the shape of a choice strain of vocal harmony, or quartet of strings, or even an apt (of course brief) selection from one of the masters of piano music, interpreted by artists (and Harvard has such among her own sons?) An orchestra, of course, would be the perfect thing, but perhaps out of the question for some time on account of the expense. At all events, a beginning in the right direction may be made negatively, by simply dropping out the music that is so disturbing, or by more discrimination as to the when and the how of its coming in. At the dinner we have referred to, we think every guest felt relieved when the musicians, having served their time out, shouldered their heavy instruments and went off free and happy; now we could resign ourselves to the spirit of the hour, and "go in" for a good time without alloy!

ERRATA.—The article "About Fugues," in our last, owing to our printer being in the midst of the confusion of moving to more convenient quarters, came out pretty thickly strewn with errors of the press. Thus: "unalterable (for unutterable) secrets"; "painted (for pointed) aches"; "phototypes," for phototypes; "it is a music (for in music) what the spiral law of growth is in plants"; always "becoming, never absolutely"—done, should be added; "more (for none) of the genial Mozart," &c., &c.

Mr. H. L. BATEMAN has announced the engagements which he has made during his late visit to Europe, from which we may augur that the coming season will offer us something novel as well as interesting in comic opera. Mr. Bateman has engaged an entire French company, including the orchestra and choros, for the reproduction of Offenbach's operas—"La Belle Helene," "Orphée aux Enfers," "Barbe Bleue," and others, including "The Grand Duchess," now running at the Varieties in Paris, and pronounced the greatest success of the season. Mr. Bateman's prima donna is Mlle. Tostée, a pupil of the conservatories and an eminent actress, who is at present starring at Bordeaux. The other members of the company are excellent artists, and enjoy a creditable reputation in Paris. The costumes to be worn in the new opera will be exact imitations of those now worn at the Varieties, and are to be made by the same parties. In all the minor details for the representation of these operas, Mr. Bateman has been as thorough in his preparation as in the more prominent matters; no expense has been spared.

Quite as interesting as the above to all lovers of music will be the announcement that the coming season will include a series of musical entertainments under the management of a well known directeur, to be given at Music Hall, the first performance occurring some time in January. The rest of these series will follow rapidly. The entertainments will mainly consist of English operettas, written by a composer who is the equal of Offenbach, which will be presented by vocalists of Boston, prepared for the task by competent instructors. In addition to the best resident talent, foreign artists of reputation who will be speedily engaged, will be employed in these concerts. Eve. Gazette, July 21.

LES ORPHEONISTES. The whole of France is organized into choral unions or orphéons. They take all sorts of names—sometimes they are orphéons—sometimes choral unions—sometimes a cecle or club—sometimes amateurs—sometimes friends. One set calls themselves Sons of Apollo; another the Children of St. Denis; others again the Hope of Paris, the Lyre of Roubaix, the St. Cecilia of some other place. Time was when the orphéons, who consist mainly of peasants, attempted no more than to sing the simple choruses of the Wilhem school. Now they can attack any composition of any school—the most elaborate works of the greatest masters. As a matter of fact what they chiefly attack are the compositions of French masters—Halévy, Adolphe Adam, Ambroise Thomas, Gounod, Félicien David, and Laurent de Rillé. It is rather a serious business to adjudicate upon the claims of more than two hundred choral unions, which are to be represented in Paris by eight thousand voices, all claiming the prize. The plan is to break them up into batches, and to hand each batch over to a separate jury.

MINSTRELSY AS IT WAS. Elegant musical young men now may be glad that they did not live four hundred and eleven years ago. This is how the King then supplied the vacant places in his band: "The King to his well-beloved Walter Halyday, Robert Marshall, William Wykes, and John Chiffe, safety. Know ye that We—considering how certain of our Minstrels have now lately gone the way of all flesh, and that we necessarily want others in their places for our solace—have appointed you, jointly and severally, to take (capitulum), wherever they can be found, certain youths, elegant in their natural limbs, and well taught in the art of Minstrelsy, and put them in our service at our wages. And we command you that you look diligently to the premises, and do them, and carry them out in the form aforesaid." Will ye, will ye, it was in those days. If either a horse or a minstrel was wanted for the king, he had to go.—Athenæum.

CHORON THE MUSICIAN. M. Jules Janin tells this anecdote: Once upon a time there was in this Paris, forgetful of everything, a respectable man, an ingenious, profound, affectionate artist, Choron, the musician. He delighted to look everywhere for promising intellects, well-gifted voices, and heads touched by Heaven. When he met any child which seemed to whisper confidence to his hopes, he hastily carried it home, and gave it a place in a school which (all poor as he was) he had opened at his own expense. He treated these chosen children with more than paternal tenderness. To the hungry child he gave bread, and he gave clothes to the shivering child. He lived smiling and charming with these petulant creatures, who often lacked attention, gratitude, and respect for him. Among Choron's numerous disciples were two especially who kept Europe attentive. One of these was little Gilbert, who became Duprez, and the first singer of the world, and the great Rachel. He found her one winter's day dragging in the street a guitar bigger than herself, and detecting on that juvenile brow genius's stamp, he carried her to his school. He wanted to make a songstress of her. She, directed by her genius, quitted the lyric drama for the written tragedy of our old poets. In fine she became Rachel, and had risen from triumphs to triumphs, carrying with her all Paris, and perpetually living amid enchantments and success. At the height of this immense joy she thought she should like to play her great part "Hermione," at the Grand Opera, and fill that vast theatre where her old comrade, Gilbert Duprez, kept the throng attentive and charmed to the inspirations of Rossini and Guillaume Tell. To hear was to obey this eloquent woman. So she played at the benefit of that respectable and worthy Massol, whose career was suddenly interrupted at the very time his voice was strongest and most beautiful. On this night there was a crowd at the Grand Opera. "Hermione" entered superb and triumphant, perfectly at home in this immense space. She herself alone was able to supply the places of the orchestra and choruses. She became intoxicated by her own passion. Had you seen her you would have likened her to some sublime storm in which her eyes flashed like lightning. It was one of the most admirable, perhaps it was the most admirable evening of all her life. She retired from the stage amid universal applause, whose thunders pursued her even to the dressing-room, where Helene's daughter laid down the royal mantle. She then closed her eyes to wait till her heart beat less rapidly. Why, how now? gently, heart! When at last she came to herself she caught a glimpse ('t was no vision of that great mind filled with phantoms) of the bust of Choron, her great master. That was, indeed, his timid, good-natured glance, his ingenuous smile, his very self. On his brow he bore a half-faded crown, and the crown suited well with those warm-hearted features. Now Mlle. Rachel's dressing-room was Duprez's own dressing-room. The opera had given it to the grand "Hermione," as the sole chamber it had at all worthy such a guest. The crown on old Choron's brow was placed there by his little Gilbert, by Duprez himself, who gave it to his gentle master after the unexampled success of his summons in Guillaume Tell. Suivez-moi! 'Twas the same very crown. Duprez prided it as the first gerdon of his glory. At the sight of this bust and this crown Mlle. Rachel (she had every noble instinct; happy was he who knew how to rouse them) was filled with ineffable emotion. In a second she was transported back to her earlier youth amid La Cité dolente (sorrow's city); the benefactions and the graces of the olden time were once more present to her mind. Her comrade Duprez's gratitude revealed her own ingratitude to her. She began to mourn it. Just at the moment the door of the dressing-room, in which Duprez seemed to conceal his noble action, noisily opened. The most beautiful danseuses of the ballet, before entering on the stage, brought to Mlle. Rachel the flowers and crowns thrown to her, and which filled the stage. She said to them, with a winning smile, "They are yours, and I am quite sure you will be at no loss to discover who threw them to you." They obeyed, and merrily bore away the beautiful flowers, which were twice useful in the same evening. Mlle. Rachel kept only one crown. It was braided in the antique manner of smallage and laurels wreathed with a spray of linden. When at last she rose to return home, she, with a charming hand, took possession of the crown which Duprez himself had, six months before, placed on his master's brow, and in its stead encircled Choron's head with her own antique crown. As Duprez was dressing for the stage next day he admired, without wondering overmuch, to see this happy metamorphosis. That very same day Mlle. Rachel's friends, seeing that withered crown already crumbling into dust, were tempted to make it the butt of all sorts of epigrams. The haughty tragic actress interrupted them with a royal gesture, saying, "I beg your pardon, gentlemen, but not one of you shall ridicule a crown of amaranth placed by Duprez, the singer, on the brow of our master, Choron."

Sax, the inventor of the numerous instruments with the prefix of his name—Sax-horns, tubas and ophons,—has again obtained the grand medal at the Paris Exhibition for a totally new class of instruments—trumpets and trombones with six pistons and independent tubes. This invention enables the performer to produce all the chromatic notes and to play in any key without the change of crooks.

The museum of the Paris Conservatoire has lately been enriched with two singular instruments. One of these is a portative pipe-organ, constructed in China about the seventh century—in other words when organs were unknown here or in France, since one was used at Compiègne for the first time in 757. The other instrument is a clavichin made for Marie Antoinette in 1790 by Pascal Taskin. This clavichin is remarkable for the ornamentation and carving; and what is more it is a precious relic of the martyred queen.—London Orchestra.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- O wearied dove. Song. W. G. Wrighton. 30
Launch the life boat. Song. A. Plimpton. 30
The path across the hills. Song. Mrs. Norton. 30
In the Grove I'll meet thee then. Duet. S. Glover. 30
Angels' home. Duettina. Mrs. Sinton Dolby. 40
The gift and the giver. Sequel to "The Stirrup Cup." Arditi. 60
A list of pieces by accomplished composers. You are safe in buying any or all of them.
Idle lay the summer sea. Song. M. D. Sullivan. 30
Bonnie Laddie. Ballad. C. A. White. 30
O help little Mary, the drunkard's child. Mrs. Parkhurst. 35
Baby's gone to sleep. Song. L. O. Emerson. 30
Sweet Coralie. Song. W. F. Heath. 30
Lilly Pearl. Song. A. Vane. 30
More ballad like than the preceding, and inclosing much quiet beauty.
New England Soldiers. Song and Chorus. C. A. White. 30
Maiden Blushes. Song. M. Keller. 30
A bold and gallant soldier. Song. J. Hopkins. 30
The Miller's Daughter. Song. Goerdeler. 30
The King and the Miller. Bass Song. M. Keller. 60
A mixture of energy and sweetness. Try them all. 30
The yaller girl that winked at me. 30
Smoke your pipe at home. G. H. Young. 20
Pretty little Sarah. Song. F. Maccabe. 35
A trio of good comic songs.
Thou who knowest how vain. (Tu che la vanita.) "Don Carlos." 50
O fatal dower. (O don fatale). " " 50
Ah! weep not. (Non piangea.) " " 40
In the lovely garden. (Nel giardin del bello.) "Don Carlos." 50
Carlo, sole joy. " " 40
Favorites in Verdi's newest opera.

Instrumental.

- Mugby Junction Galop. C. Coote. 40
Scoots over the line with much energy, and has a good fire in the engine.
La Serenata. Don Pasquale. Op. 22. J. Hopkins. 90
Une perle de Veniee. Barcarole. Valentin. 40
Reverie Schottische. E. Mack. 40
Three novelties, the first and longest being an arrangement of the famous serenade.
Simplette, for Guitar. W. L. Hayden. 25
Fairy wedding Waltz. " " 25
Guard's Waltz. " " 25
Mr. Hayden continues his good work of furnishing popular pieces for guitarists. A good selection.
Love's last dream. Reverie. F. B. Aubert. 40
" first " " " 50
Le Clairon des Zouaves. Polka militaire. J. Egghard. 50
Both dreams could hardly last when the Zouaves sound the trumpet, which they do here to an inspiring air.

Books.

- 25 STUDIES MELODIQUES. J. Concone. 2 books. Each, 1.00
Concone shows a beautiful taste in these, as in his vocal studies. Very agreeable practice, and not difficult.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 688.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 17, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 11.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Towards the East.

IN MEMORY OF GEORGE PAPENDIEK.

Towards the East, while song and light
The earth with summer beauty fills,
Looking towards his Fatherland,
We hear him to our Forest Hills.

We wreath with blossoms far and sweet,
The Viol which is silent now,
And lingering gaze through falling tears
Upon that calm and holy brow.

Oh friend beloved, only the form
Which held thy soul the earth receives,
While here 'mid tender songs we strew
The grave with flowers and summer leaves.

For thou art not withdrawn, and when Beloved and gifted ones once more
Strike the deep chords thy spirit loved,
Beethoven's vast, pathetic score,

Thou wilt be near; or when the gleam
Of winter fires thy home shall light,
Unto thy loved ones gathered there
Thy soul shall come on Christmas night.

No last farewell we breathe to thee,
We look towards the East again,
The Morning and the Fatherland,
And say, "Oh friend, Auf Wiedersehn."

W.

Gounod's Romeo and Juliet.

BY HERMANN STARCKE.

(Translated for this Journal from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (Leipzig).)

Every time there is a new opera brought out in Paris, we cannot resist the disagreeable impression which the full theatre makes upon us. These are not musically cultivated people who have come to hear the new work and form an opinion about it; it is a public which never was capable of judging and which, without having heard a note of the work, brings with it an opinion ready made. Accordingly the first measures of the overture seem to us more desperate than the most dangerous production of a circus rider. One can compare a composer, who writes an opera in three or five acts and has it performed on a Parisian stage, to the owner of a house, who is obliged to make as many jumps as there are stories to his house. First act: first story—a slight sprain; one can recover from it; second act: second story—a broken arm or an injury to the spine, still curable; third act: third story—if the unlucky man comes off this time without fatal damage, it must be miraculous, and miracles do not occur in these days. Gounod has just ventured upon five such leaps and broken neither arm nor leg; on the contrary, he perhaps never was so well as he is now. After seeing the new work of Gounod several times and reading through the score attentively, we cannot help protesting against the dithyrambic criticism which has received it with extravagant enthusiasm, an enthusiasm that seems to put wholly in the shade the effect of masterworks, like the "Iliad," the "Æneid," the "Divina Commedia," the "Tartuffe," the "Iphigenia," and "Alceste," the "Don Juan" and "Fidelio," &c., before which the most high-souled fanaticism has bowed to the dust. According to the Parisian critics nothing beautiful is left except the "Romeo" of Gounod. It is the poorest testimony which they can give of themselves, to fall into this tone of unmeasured eulogy about Gounod's work (which certainly contains much in its favor.) The most glowing enthusiasm must have sense and reason, before it can pass for judgment.

Allow us here to leave the Gounod question, for a moment, and state some particulars in regard to Shakespeare's drama, which perhaps are not yet generally known. That owes its proper origin to two Italian writers. In the first place, Girolamo della Corte published a work, similar to Shakespeare's, called "The Lovers of Verona." The same material was afterwards treated by the Italian poet Luigi da Porto. Later still, Shakespeare created his immortal work, in which at all events he made use of the above named authors. Girolamo della Corte relates the tragical affair between the Montague and Capulet families as historical; he even indicates the burial ground where Róméo and Juliet are supposed to lie buried and describes quite exactly a somewhat elevated place near Verona on which a convent may be found to-day. At Shakespeare's time there existed an English translation of Luigi's work by Arthur Brooke. This very probably served Shakespeare as the source, without his binding himself closely to its handling of the material. According to Luigi da Porto, Juliet awakes just as Romeo has drunk the poison; then follows between the lovers a great scene, rich in lyrical and dramatical beauties. Quite differently is the poison scene related by Girolamo della Corte. Romeo dies of the poison without seeing the awakening of Juliet. She, instead of ending her life with the dagger, swoons away in the despair which seizes her at the sight of the dead body of her husband. This act, with this poet, is full of the finest moments and the richest poetic thoughts. A not less effective scene is that where Girolamo represents the first meeting of the lovers. Shakespeare, without directly translating, has treated it in almost entirely the same way. Purely and alone the work of his genius is the Balcony Scene, which is found neither in Girolamo's nor in Luigi's drama, and which never yet has found its counterpart in ancient or in modern poets. The like of that could only Shakespeare's palette create.

Like nature with her ever lovely charms, this drama has tempted many musical hands to reproduce it. Already in the year 1793 the pianist Steibelt wrote a sort of melodrama "Romeo and Juliet;" the principal part was intended for a then celebrated singer, Mlle. Seïo. It was performed that same year in Paris at the Théâtre Feydeau, and thence stimulated many musicians to further attempts. Three years later appeared in Milan the Opera "Giulietta e Romeo," by Zin-garelli, which was chiefly written for the three Italian singers, the castrato Crescentino, the tenor Bianchi and Mlle. Grassini (aunt of Giulia Grisi.) In the same city, for the same theatre, and availing himself at all events of Zingarelli's score, Vaccai, in 1825, also composed a "Giulietta e Romeo," of which an aria (Andante: "Ah, se tu dormi") has maintained itself to this day, although the composer is forgotten by the public and musicians. Finally, in 1830, Bellini's "I Montecchi e Capuletti" was produced at the theatre in Venice. It was chiefly the two sisters Giuditta and Giulia Grisi who for a long time sang this work and helped to give it a lasting success. Hector Berlioz is, so far as we know, the only one who as a musician in his great dramatic Symphony has soared up to Shakespeare. [!] His score alone has shown itself capable to express Shakespeare's world of thought and render back in music the sublime impressions which the great poet calls forth within us on the stage.

Now as to this latest reproduction of the Shakespearean drama, the first thing to be said by way of preface is, that such people as Messrs. Carré and Jules Barbier are not capable of furnishing a text not unworthy of the original, to say the least; they have shown so long since in the "Faust" and "Mignon" dramas, which they have dragged down to downright farce. But also with regard to Gounod's score one must confess, if he takes them for witness, that something essentially different was expected, and that this work is nothing but a simple confirmation of the prophetic ideas of J. J. Rousseau. He and Voltaire, both of whom have written immortal pages upon the French lyric and dramatic opera and have unquestionably had a controlling influence on its development, predicted simultaneously the aberration of the opera. Who else but they must answer for it, if Gounod's work appears so weak and faulty! To say the plain truth, the fault lies with the "little church-bell."—In the old churches there is a little bell attached to the organ, which is put in connection with the officiating priest, who has to lead the choir, and of which the object is to warn the organist while he is playing of the entrance of the voices. Now as soon as this fatal bell rings, the unhappy organist is obliged to break off his improvisation and drop the theme which he has just begun. Unpleasant as this may be, the proceeding is necessary, for the church service requires in a certain respect quite as much precision as the putting of an opera upon the stage. The officiant determines the course of the church music as he pleases and sees fit, and the organist is pledged to submit to his arrangements, and is paid for that. If the bell sounds too early, then, for better or for worse, he must renounce the spinning out of his improvisation and try to effect a transition into the required chord as quick as possible. If on the contrary he has to wait too long for the bell, then he is obliged to lengthen out the thing per fus et u fus. For there he sits, his hands upon the keys, his feet upon the pedal, and his eyes fixed on the unmerciful bell, and he extemporizes all possible things, whatever comes into his head and feet: abruptly curtailed motives, senseless chords, passages which say nothing. In the anguish of his heart he often calls in the aid of the great pedal to make the finale as impressive as possible by means of its thunder!—If a composer has the mania to write an opera for a Parisian theatre, he must follow the inexorable will of the theatre director. The author is no longer master of his work. The director says to him in the most courteous manner: "I wish to have this or that dropped out, and this or that scene lengthened some ten to thirty minutes, so as to bring in some kind of a ballet or effect of decoration." Then the easiest and the only way for the composer is to comply with the given orders, if he have any intention, under such circumstances, of having his work put upon the stage. He can stay quietly at home during the rehearsals—the director takes care of all the rest.—One has only to see and hear the new Gounod opera and he will find this confirmed.

Most of the Imperial theatres, of which the French are as proud as ever were the Roman people of their name, are continually bringing out older as well as newer works according to the most arbitrary notions. A chief requirement before all things is the Ballet. Even Shakespeare they have not failed to bless therewith. In "Romeo and Juliet," as in every other work, the action is continually interrupted and suspended, at the moment when it is growing most interesting, by a ballet or some sort of decoration effect. The way of introducing this is extremely simple. If the principal characters are merry, the ballet takes part in their pleasures; if they are sad, you wish to divert them and—you dance.—We are wholly unaware that it is customary at Court and in great houses to dance when one is in bad humor and disposed to weep: but on the stage they dance and sing and leap while the fate of the principal persons is being decided behind the scenes. Preachers, soldiers, gods, devils dance; there is dancing at funerals—in short, they dance à propos de tout, as the French express themselves.—O Shakespeare, what has been made out of thy "Romeo!" What is left, by the Parisian workers-over of the text, of the comic humor of Juliet's nurse, what of Capulet's tenderness—and of his rage?—What has become of that swan song of all love, the balcony scene? Where is the humor of Mercutio and the dreamy fancy of Friar Laurence? Out of Romeo they have made a student, who gives his grisette a rendezvous in the garden of the Luxembourg.—Indignantly we ask those French botchers and gabblers, who has authorized them to call their job-work "Romeo and Juliet;" why have they not named it "Alfred and Lodoiska," or "Lisichen and Fritzechen!"—We have now a Shakespeare "Romeo," and another by M. M. Carré and Barbier; a "Faust" from the same shop and another from Goethe's; a Goethe's "Mignon," and a charivari by the above named workmen, to which they have given the same name. The Venus of Milo and the masterworks of Michel Angelo are hurled from their pedestals into the dust, and here and there a desperate urchin has the audacity to play with an arm or leg that has been broken off!

Compared to these melancholy experiments of the text workers, Gounod's music in certain moments certainly stands considerably higher. The best and most valuable piece in his opera is the introduction, which he calls Overture-Prologue; yet this designation seems unjustified, inasmuch as the chorus it contains relates the tragical end of the drama; the whole should much rather therefore have been called Overture-Epilogue. The music of this short introduction is beautiful and seizes hold of the hearer: but here Mozart's Don Juan has considerably influenced the composer. The Opera itself begins with a Polka-Mazurka, worthy of being danced at Kroll's establishment in Berlin. To this melody the chorus sings: "L'heure s'enrole," &c. The following air: "Ah, quelle est belle," is worthy and has grace and nobleness in its make. But its good impression is again completely obliterated by the following number, which seems insignificant, and to which is appended the no less unmeaning song, of the Capulets: "Allons, jeunes gens." The whole of this last part betrays undeniable descent from the Mozart and Haydn Minuets; but here the imitation lacks the peculiar accent.—The ballad "Queen Mab" is built upon curious, if not new, orchestral effects, which produce rather a bizarre than an original impression. If one will call to mind Berlioz's orchestral movement, he will find at once the difference between the two compositions. With Berlioz one sees and feels Shakespeare in the very first bars. This is Queen Mab, in the nutshell, drawn by "little atomies," with spider's webs for traces; here a fairy atmosphere floats round us. Gounod's Queen Mab on the contrary makes the impression of a clumsy person who disturbs and plagues us in our sleep. This ballad is followed by a pretty phrase: "O trésor," &c., to which is attached a Scherzo of the friends of Romeo: "Nous avons prévu ceci," two numbers of apt and tasteful invention, the only objection to which is, that they have been too much shortened and passages marked out without enough regard to the musical sense. After Mme. Carvalho (Juliet) has brought before the public a vocal waltz: "Je veux voir dans le rêve," which transports us to the Cafés Chantants of the Champs Elysées, there appears a Duo: "Ange adorable," sung by Michot (Romeo) and Mme. Carvalho, which is as cold and big as the icebergs and gives us various matter for reflection. Well may one ask here: Where is that fire of passionate love, which ends so tragically? It might be called a duo of automatons. The first Finale is just as poor and empty as the beginning of the act. Yet, taken together, this Act is the best of all, for here and there one finds a good musical phrase, possessing, sense and soul. The success, which this Act finds with the Parisian public, it owes to the rhythm so happily chosen for that public: Mazurka, Minuet, Waltz.

The Second Act begins with another very feeble number musically: "Lève-toi, soleil!" upon many happy moments in it there continually follow phrases cold and saying nothing. In the Balcony Scene, the tenor (Michot) does not give enough heed to his voice; he does not trouble himself at all about Juliet's reputation and seems to think he is not compromising her, if he does sing like Verdi's Troubadour in the third act. The chorus of the patrol: Personne, personne, &c., has a well marked rhythm, although the invention therein is not new. The following Duo, a failure at the outset, shapes itself a little more interestingly as it goes on. But the two lovers the whole time appear sleepy, heavy, icy cold. What delight the afficiant would have caused to all musicians, had he only pulled the little bell here in the second act!

If we speak of the Trio-Quartet of the Third Act, it is to accuse it of being an imitation of the Trio in the fifth act of the Huguenots. Compare the following Finale with La Fille du Regiment and with the "Blessing of the Poniards" in the Huguenots, and you will find not too much resemblance, especially to the latter work, in so far as Gounod does not transport us by his music into the Middle Ages; but the "Daughter of the Regiment" in point of rhythm does not stand a great way off. The Duo in the Fourth Act is certainly the worthiest and best piece of music in the whole; yet it owes the impression it makes more to the charming pianissimo of the voices, than to the intrinsic value of the theme itself. All the rest of this Duo is masterly and must carry every devout listener away with it. Most especially in the Allegro does the composer appear on a level with the great poet; the music, like the situation, is poetically and pathetically beautiful, and if Gounod had written nothing else but this, he would have proved that he possesses a great genius. Also in the following Quartet we find a very beautiful part, sung by Capulet. The Romanza of Friar Laurence, where he tries to describe the effect of the narcotic, is a complete failure. Now follows a March, played upon the so-called new Sax instruments, which is kept in a sonorous, broad style, but reminds us of much that we have heard before; besides, it utterly lacks the character of a wedding march. Of the whole chorus there is nothing further to be said, except that you find therein a deal of noise without sense. The fourth Act, again, ends cold and devoid of interest, and at the moment when Juliet is supposed to be dead, the chorus of some 200 persons indulges itself, after a long and tedious declamation, in shouting out the two words, "Juste ciel!"—and the curtain falls. Here would have been the moment for the composer to introduce a musical peroration, like that of the immortal poet. But the interest in the Fifth Act vanishes completely, and this is a sign of Gounod's dramatic weakness; for, after the Italian composer had created the fine number: "Ombra adorato aspetto," even Halevy in his Guido et Ginevra was able to offer something considerably finer than Gounod.

We have endeavored, in the above remarks, to give a general exposition of the worth of the last opera of Gounod. Here and there, only, musical beauties show themselves; and these not seldom seem like imitations of other masterworks; only, after the wont of the composer, they are skillfully disguised under the trompe-l'œil of a well invented and carefully elaborated instrumentation.

Musical Letters by Ferdinand Hiller.*

THE FORTY-FOURTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL OF THE LOWER RHINE AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

(Continued from page 75.)

With a work like Beethoven's C minor Symphony, it must be evident to everyone that no explanation, however poetical, can ever suffice for instrumental music of the highest class. How many performances have people attempted to fit to this Titanic production! We may take the most important events from human life and from history, but everything appears petty in comparison; and, if we indulge in reflection, or pure thought, in order to form from these sublime melodies a logical chain, it is just as though we were to pour water upon fire. The deliverance of the soul from what is common is the only programme of all true instrumental music; it is as noble as it is endless. The spirited performance of this symphony, which commenced the second evening, was one of the most brilliant points of the Festival. The public were most profoundly moved, and it was long before the tumultuous waves of applause were calmed. The spirit of Beethoven floated over the conductor and the orchestra.

* Translated from the Kölnische Zeitung, for the London Musical World.

After the deep impression produced by the symphony, the "Kyrie" and the "Gloria" from Cherubini's Mass in D minor had a hard task to maintain their ground, and the selection of these pieces cannot be considered a happy one. The D-minor Mass is deficient in some of those qualities which often distinguish Cherubini so highly. It is anything but concise, and its length is not the result of a mighty flow of thought so much as of reflective and artistic elaboration. Calculated for a small, but choice orchestra, it rebels, at least in many places, against being executed by large masses, which crush, rather than bring out with increased prominence, its individuality. This is a pity, because none of the works performed had made such large demands upon the conscientious zeal of the chorus. The pieces, too (under Breunung's direction), went admirably, and the soloists, among whom was, by the way, Herr Gobbels, the tenor, of Aix-la-Chapelle, did their best in the difficult concerted music. But the general impression was not exciting, though words expressive of the highest appreciation were heard from the lips of many accomplished amateurs. Especial applause was, on the other hand, awarded to Schumann's passionate Genoevera overture. Breunung was the Conductor. The orchestra played it with rare, I might almost say personal, devotion to their task; so that the execution of the work was not merely fiery and full of expression, but, despite its many perilous details, altogether blameless.

The scenes from Gluck's Orpheus are among the most important ever produced in the domain of dramatic-declamatory music. They afforded Mlle. Bettelheim ample opportunity for display.

This young artist, already celebrated, began her career as a pianist. It is no harm for a future prima donna to be conversant with Bach and Beethoven, and we only wish that very many had gone through a course of this description. Profound musical intelligence is manifested by Mlle. Bettelheim in every bar she sings. Her voice, extending over more than two octaves in compass, possesses rare fulness and still rarer equality of tone. Mlle. Bettelheim had previously shown in Julius Mæcedorus how varied were her conception and vocal art. With a facility full of grace she had given the air, "Die Freiheit nur allein gibt neue Pracht dem Sonnenschein," while, in the prayer at the beginning of Part Three, she expressed perfectly the high purity of a devout spirit. With invincible and joyous devotion she had sung at all the rehearsals, and done almost too much. Her performance in Orpheus proved that she was not less capable of the most passionate expression, and competent to grasp and realize the most delicate effects of light and shade in Gluck's recitative. Yet, in consequence of a cold, her voice was not completely under control—but she extorted double admiration from the initiated, for the great art by which she achieved everything with an organ not quite compliant to her will. Unfortunately there exists no process for photographing a voice, and whether we wish it or no, we are compelled to have recourse to phrases more or less empty, in order—not to convey the slightest notion of it. But that photography is able to seize on many beauties of another kind, and, at least, assist us, in remembering them, is a fact which most certainly many of those present in the concert room at Aix-la-Chapelle recollected and turned to account.

The second evening was brought to a close by Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Nacht, one of his most genial and original compositions, and, generally, a work that is unique of its sort. It was a real piece of good fortune that Goethe's poem, sparkling with life, and so magnificently constructed, both from a dramatic and a musical point of view, should have been left for Mendelssohn to treat, after being public property for half a century at the least. Among the things obtainable only with difficulty in this world are the right fiddle for a violinist; the right husband for a young girl; and the right poem for a composer. And although there have always been hitherto more violinists and maidens than composers, the last case is attended with by far the greatest amount of difficulty. In opera, Mendelssohn never succeeded in meeting with such a libretto as he required, and it is certain that it is owing to this circumstance that we are poorer by a work worthy to be ranked with Die Zauberflöte, Fidelio and Der Freischütz. In the Walpurgis-Nacht, however, he found a subject to satisfy his best inclinations, the joy of Spring and the free air of Heaven; the fantastic element, and the light of the heart, which can illumine every creed. It is not, however, "the high symbolical intention" which Goethe claims for his poem that entrances us afresh every time we hear this eternally youthful work, but "the joyous, unconquerable enthusiasm that glows, brilliantly and clearly, in it." This same joyous enthusiasm imbued the Conductor and those under him, and procured us a performance sparkling with life. Mlle. Bettelheim undertook the part of "an old woman from among the people"—and no one felt angry that she represented the old woman only musically. Niemann sang the air of the Youth, without a single tempo rubato, with as much conscientiousness as spirit, and even the anxious "Christian watch" without the least timidity, strange as he must have felt under the circumstances. The part of the Druid is one of Hill's best efforts; he is completely master of it, vocally and intellectually.—It was in a truly elevated frame of mind that we left the place where the Festival was held. Beautiful, sublime German art! "Who can rob thee of thy light!"

(To be continued.)

Religion in Germany.

NEW ENGLAND AND GERMANY CONTRASTED.—THE GERMAN SABBATH.—DUTIES AND PLEASURES OF THE DAY.—CHURCH LIBERTY.

(Correspondence of the Gazette.)

LEIPSIK, July 15th, 1867.

Mr. Dickens, in his work upon America, after speaking of the propensity of New Englanders to resort to religion as a strong drink, confesses himself very much puzzled to account for their furious denunciation of all rational and harmless amusements. Miss Martineau went a little further, and tells us that as we banish from our lives all other excitements, enjoyments and recreations, religion becomes actually the only outlet left us, and we must find our amusement, consolation, pleasures and quarrels in that one subject.

The Germans, frightened at the straight-jacket dispensation of the early reformers, branched off into all manner of beliefs, and founded all manner of sects, from which most of ours are copied. At last, however, they seem to have settled as a body upon the broad ground of rational, natural religion, which, to one fresh from the rigid bonds of New England, seems refreshing and delightful. They believe that religion does not consist in creeds or beliefs, in passing week days after one fashion, and Sabbaths after another, or in uniting with a church through some religious experience. A man with them is religious or not according as there is in his heart a desire for self-perfection, an incentive which urges him to some goal, some aim to which all his faculties are directed. If a German feels the power and omnipotence of God or Christ, but cannot embody this idea, it is not considered his fault. If this conception leads him ever onward, urges him to perfect himself and aid those about him, he is a Christian, no matter what his belief may be. He does his work of good unfettered and uncramped by doctrines and creeds. Why does he need them! Natural religion is founded on man's instinctive, free, unfettered worship of an ideal, whether that ideal be God or not. It is founded on the love and humanity of man to man, and what more does one need for his religion than Germans ask? We have prescribed rules and regulations, with which our minds are bound from infancy, and free, outspoken truth, instead of being sought after and honored, is crushed under the heel of public opinion. What man with us can stand out against our various sects and creeds without having directed against him the opprobrium of the whole community? What man is not forced, in self-defence and in order to maintain his position in society, to adopt the religion of his community?

Instead, too, of one grand, broad, common ground of worship, we must choose our religion from numerous rigid sects, which are divided by shades of belief, by rivalry, and often by hatred. If a member of one society in which his friends are common worshippers, finds himself unable to accept all its doctrines, he is no longer a Christian and a brother, but an unbeliever, and must withdraw to another society. How many, on this account unwilling to separate themselves from friends, are forced to accept a belief to which their hearts can never consent? How many, by camp meetings, those hot-beds of religion, are forced into a system which they do not understand, and from which, when once arrived at maturity, they dare not retreat? What but this is the cause of so much backsliding, consequent hypocrisy, and striving to keep up appearances, which are only a mockery? How much misery may this tyranny of religion engender in households of which the world knows nothing! It is the constant struggle between the demands of the soul for a true, open, honest expression of belief, and the restraints of friends or of public opinion. If in my small circle I have known such misery, how much may exist throughout the land? The Germans seem to have passed out of their narrow pale of belief, or perhaps they as a body were never in it. It is directly opposed to the German mind. They choose to worship God with the simple facilities which he has given them, rather than plunge into some dreary region of doubt, and clutching at faith with one hand and some church doctrine with the other, ride them like hobby-horses into heaven. Take their Sabbaths for example. They stand on the broad ground that the day was made for man, and not man for the day. Their poetical temperament, and their high cultivation in literature and art lead them to worship in some way the Almighty God. Very many of them, no matter what their belief, attend church in the morning, but the strictest relax themselves after dinner. I am in the family of the most New England-like German Christian that I have seen, yet he sees no harm in a pleasure walk or a visit in the afternoon. "The mornings I devote to my God," he said to me, "the afternoons and evenings to rest and enjoyment after the toils and cares of the week." This is the general mind of the people in the afternoon; the card-shops and promenades are full, and the mechanics and laboring people are seen by hundreds, not alone or in rum shops, but taking their whole family for a walk, or knitting under the trees in the beer-gardens, children and all, listening to music.

Now why is this not rational? Is it not better than compelling little children to attend two sermons and a Sunday school, or shutting them up with a tract to read and a hymn to learn? Is there a single New England child who does not look back upon such Sabbaths with the most lively horror? Is there one who would not have taken a sound thrashing if he could have slept from his Saturday night's bath tub to school-call on Monday morning? Is it probable (in case any objection should be made to the child's opinion,) that any religious love or enthusiasm could possibly find its way into his heart with such an amount of horror and disgust which he felt for the day. In Germany the shops are closed, not because it is wrong to open them, but because the Sabbath is for rest and quiet enjoyment. For this reason the museums and art galleries are all open and free, that those persons who have labored all the week may have an opportunity of instructing themselves in those works of art which are the pride of their land. How much the lower classes prize this privilege will readily be seen by one who walks on a Sunday through the museums of France or Germany. In England the same people crowd the gin-palaces, because the English people are too religious to sanction any such heterodox crime as the shutting up of rum shops and opening of art galleries upon the Sabbath. America can choose which of the two evils is preferable; for people will be amused or entertained in some way, and if innocent pleasures are debarred them, they seek illegitimate ones.

I have spoken many times in my letters of the very few excesses one sees in Germany, even among the students. With us a youth brought up in the strictest manner goes at eighteen to the city and engages in business. He resists for some time the temptations to enjoy in a rational manner the only day which he can call his own. Finally he yields so far to temptation as to take a walk, or visit a sacred concert, impelled thereto by his cares and labors of the week.

But these slight derelictions of duty are enough; he has passed the Rubicon; he has disgraced the circle in which he was reared, and his church look out at him with horrid eyes as at a Sabbath-breaker. What is the result? He feels at first the same as ever, he is not conscious of having committed any heinous crime, but the church tells him so, his pious relations tell him so, and finally, believing it, he goes on from bad to worse, becoming every week more reckless and desperate. Had he been left to himself, in all probability his greatest sin would have consisted in going to church in the morning and sailing down the harbor in the afternoon. Look at German students. Among the hundreds whom I see constantly, there are at the most a score whose religious lives approach the New England standard, but there are still fewer whose lives are vicious or depraved. With us as one class becomes too strict and severe in its demands, the other grows more lax. You cannot make a man serious by law, you cannot legislate him every Sunday into an arm-chair where he shall sit all day and think of the Pilgrim's Progress. But you can give him some middle ground to stand upon between the church and the rum-shop. The Germans do this by giving the people innocent pleasures, by removing the social tyranny which forces religion down the throats of our young people. Every child is baptized to distinguish him from a heathen, and that is the law of the land, but beyond it he is free. When he arrives at maturity it is customary to unite with the church, and this is usually done no matter what the private belief of the person may be. So it is common to find among church-goers and persons of regular standing as members of churches, those who represent every shade of belief. It is common to see men attending church who nevertheless laugh at modern religion and its absurdly small influence. Such a man was one of my professors here. "I attended church," said he, "to worship the Almighty, and inasmuch as I believe in him and worship him every day of my life I account myself a Christian." There is no public voice against such a man, although he could hardly have believed one of the articles of faith of the church to which he belonged. Another gentleman with whom I studied had been recommended to me as a worthy and religious man. I had also often seen him at church. He was nevertheless a deist with no belief whatever in revealed religion. "I profess a religion of my own," he said, "I love and reverence my God, and who shall deny me the name of Christian or refuse me the privilege of worshipping with my fellow men?"

This would sound strangely at home, but why is it not the true Christian doctrine after all? The Germans allow a man to believe as he wishes; every heart they say must be accountable to God, and not to a sect or the narrow minded members of a church; and thus with no rivalry or discord between followers of different creeds, with no coldness and inequality between church members and church-goers, they stand members of one Christian brotherhood in one universal church. There are many shades of belief, but they do not interfere one with another. Man can love God without signing a set of church documents, and be a true Christian without passing through the experience of a revival or camp meeting. Why should not our religion, which is an instinct in and a necessity to man, be a universal and common one whose only church articles are love to God and charity towards our fellow men? Then all this narrowness and superstition, this rivalry and bitterness of sects would be done away. This hateful practice of judging our fellow creatures by our own miserable standard, and picking flaws in hearts which belong to God alone would cease, and the abolition of religious tyranny be another grand step of our country on the road to freedom and happiness.

E. L. S.

Contest of Military Bands at the Exposition.

(Correspondence of the Daily Advertiser).

Paris, July 21, 1867.

The Imperial Commission have had another golden day and further brilliant success in the "European course of military bands" held this afternoon in the Palais de l'Industrie. For this great musical competition four prizes had been offered in the form of that number of gold medals worth 5000, 3000, 2000 and 1000 francs respectively. Ten bands entered the list, and Austria, Baden, Bavaria, Belgium, Spain, Holland, Prussia and Russia sent their choicest musicians to uphold their national honor on this occasion. The beauty of the weather and the fame of the meeting drew together an enormous crowd, and long before the doors were opened an immense queue extended from every entrance, till they all mingled together confusedly in the distance. The noble hall still retained the decorations that had been placed there for the first of July, and its appearance was most impressive. In half an hour from the time of the first entries every seat, and not only that, but every standing-place, was occupied, and I presume full 30,000 spectators were present. The scene was magnificent, and the centre, the galleries and the broad tribunes along the sides were crowded with a dense mass of people, who extended up and down the vast building as far as the eye could reach. No musician could desire a grander scene in which to display his utmost abilities. Yet this grandeur was mingled with not a little discomfort, for the Imperial Commission had sold tickets to every person who applied, and with ill-advised rapacity had omitted altogether to take into account the chances of their finding any accommodation in the edifice.

At a little past one, however, they saw fit to close the doors, and when every one present was at the extreme of hot and crowded irritation the bands began to arrive. One by one they entered the hall at the great western gates, and passing over the elevated platform before them, marched the whole length of the building to the places assigned them. The musicians from Baden came first. They were followed by the Prussians, a noble body of men and the largest band present, numbering no less than ninety performers. As they strode along in their blue uniforms, crowned with their famous helmet bearing a long crimson horse-hair crest, they were hailed with enthusiastic and tumultuous applause. Not only from the French, but from a multitude of Germans in the motley audience came their welcome, and from hundreds of voices on either hand were cries of "Die Preussen! Die Preussen!" accompanied by waving of handkerchiefs and repeated bravos. They were followed by the Austrians in a far more showy uniform of white, blue and gold, whose reception was hardly less enthusiastic. In fact, notwithstanding the heat, the dazzling glare of the sun and their contracted quarters, the audience were cheerful and gaily demonstrative during the whole of the long exhibition, and applauses were never scanty. The last to enter were the Russians, a sturdy and stalwart body, 71 in number, whose bearing greatly impressed the spectators, as with clashing swords and heavy tread they moved slowly forward in military order to their crimson benches. Their costume was the most showy of all, and their forms were well set off by white tunics profusely covered with orange bands, trousers of blue with a scarlet stripe, and large glittering brass helmets, each bearing an eagle in silver with expanded wings and a crown on his head. They were mostly young men, of fair complexion, ruddy with health, and their expression was rather impassive and heavy. The tempest of shouts that greeted their appearance did not seem to affect them in the least.

The preliminary arrangements having been finally completed, the Baden band first mounted the stage, which had been erected near the eastern end of the hall and directly in front of the stand occupied by the judges, and began the first notes of Mendelssohn's Finale de Loreley. But they quickly came to a stop. So vast is the Palace of Industry that those at the opposite end could hear absolutely nothing. It is as ill fitted for a concert room on this account as the Great Eastern for the merchant service, and this occasion well proved it. Obstreperous outcries, exclamations of Venez-ici! waving of hats and handkerchiefs, not to speak of an umbrella which a dignified paterfamilias solemnly unfurled and extended towards the musicians as if he would draw them towards him and "marshall them the way that they were going," all testified to the determination of the audience to have the band nearer the centre of the edifice if they could any way effect it. These were followed by a storm of "assis! assis!" hisses, protestations, cries of "il n'est pas possible," and oburgations in German, Spanish, English and every known tongue, from those who were located nearer the band. For full five minutes this wild confusion lasted, while the players, with true German phlegm, awaited the result. Again they began, and again the waves of fierce discord surged to and fro over the great ocean of people. Obviously the one half of those present who could not hear were resolved that the rest should share their privileges. But their indignation was at length exhausted by its own violence, and the fierce complaints gradually softened down to muttered growlings and then to perfect stillness as the first strains of Loreley, faint and delicate, became apparent to the ear. During the rest of the day the audience, having taken nothing by this riot, were tranquil and showed they had sufficient philosophy to make the best of their ill luck. Those that could hear listened with an attentive ear as the marvels of music were unfolded, while those most remote left their seats and added their unwelcome presence to the already uncomfortable multitude around the stage. They gradually overflowed the beautiful flower beds and, sitting and stepping upon them, destroyed the plants completely; the delicate brass railing that surrounded them they trampled under foot, and it was with great difficulty that the sergens de ville could prevent them from invading the seats of the musicians.

The Finale de Loreley was followed by the "Overture to Oberon," which every band was required to play in addition to a morceau of its own selection, as a common test of the capacity of all. At its close, which was closely accompanied by profuse applause, —and during the whole occasion, by the way, the people were by no means niggards of their approval —the Balbois descended from the platform and their places were taken by the Spaniards. These belonged to the first regiment of engineers and numbered 64. They were the least impressive of all both in their music and personal appearance. I think I never saw more inferior-looking men, and the uniform they wore was in the extreme of bad taste. They played fantaisies upon national airs, and their work was not ill done, which is all that can be said in their praise. At half past two the Prussians mounted the stand. They were older men than most of the other performers, with the exception of the veteran garde de Paris, and their large number may be accounted for by the fact that they were selected from two regiments, the Second of the Guard and the regiment of the Emperor Francis. This fact, combined with their great excellence as musicians, tended to make their notes more widely heard and more effective. Their piece was well selected and consisted of airs from Le Prophète of Meyerbeer. To those who listened to their strains it seemed as if nothing could surpass the exquisite time of the instruments and the true musical sympathy and feeling with which every performer interpreted the inspiring bequest of the great composer. The solos were given with a delicacy and clearness that excited the audience to irrefragable exclamations of delight. They could hardly await the conclusion before rising to their feet and cheering again and again in a tempest of noisy satisfaction. The "Overture to Oberon" was rendered with the same power. There was a vigor and confidence in the louder portions that always mark genuine musical talent and taste, while the more delicate chords seemed an air expanding as it were into tendrils and wavy spray of harmony with a luxuriance that to a cultivated musical taste was nothing short of momentary intoxication. Their whole performance lasted nearly three quarters of an hour, and to those who heard it proved a treat that they will never forget. At its close the music which had shown itself so powerful to "shake the dome," or equally to "draw the tear from hopeless love," received an ovation which caused the very roof to vibrate, and which did not cease till the Austrian competitors had fairly begun to perform their part in the great ceremonial.

I know not if it were by design, though it probably was, that the Prussians and Austrians were so closely contrasted during this occasion, but it is the fact. They entered together at the beginning, their seats were side by side, and the latter played directly after the former. The Austrians were 76 in number, and belonged to the regiment of the Duc de Wurtemberg. They were extremely youthful in appearance, and I presume two-thirds of them were not twenty years of age. They were fine looking fellows, with light hair, fair complexions, red cheeks, and altogether appeared extremely well in their showy costume of white and blue. They performed the overture to "William Tell," and did themselves infinite credit. It is a most popular and effective piece, full of those finer strains which delight a nice sense of harmony, while it possesses that musical clair-obscur, that broadly contrasted light and shade, which tells so well in its influence upon the masses. The players were fully equal to its correct and melodious rendering. I never heard it so well done. The difference between them and their last predecessors was hardly perceptible, either in point of style, wealth of expression or delicacy of feeling. The audience seemed rapt in silence, only at times interrupted by a movement or utterance of appreciative admiration, till the last "winding bout of linked sweetness" had died upon the ear. Then again, as before, they sprung to their feet, and with loud cries of bravo, bravo! bis! bis! made the vaulted roof rebound. But why attempt to describe what is really indescribable? Why seek to give in words that transient glow, burning, radiant, but perishable, which for the moment enables us to mingle our own less noble minds with the triumphs of the great, to warm our souls at the fire of genius? "There's beggary in the love that can be reckoned," and there's likewise beggary in the music that can be fitly set down in winged words, and its choicest strains drawn out along the dull formality of types. Their echo still remains in our hearts, and will ever sound in our ears across the wastes of time, but we cannot impart them to others.

At half-past three the Belgian band began their share in the day's labors by playing fantaisies upon "William Tell." Their performance, though good, was not particularly impressive. They were succeeded by their melodious brethren from Bavaria, who belong to the first royal regiment of infantry. As their imbecile King is now here, redolent of Wagner and every other unstatesmanlike and ignoble infatuation, it is not to be wondered at that they played a selection from one of the works of that composer. It was the introduction and nuptial chorus of Lohengrin, and was played extremely well. The audience were not, however, sorry to see them make way for the musical representation from Holland, who numbered 56 and who gave some extremely able airs from Faust. These were familiar to most of their hearers and thus gave great delight to the less fastidious and more unscrupulous portion who, as the eternal rum-tum-tum-rum-tum-tum, that one now hears from every street organ, was sounded again in their ears, hummed, thumped, or nodded a somewhat untuneful accompaniment, a popular fantasia sur fantasia. This all came soon to an end and the stolid Dutchmen left their nightingale's nest with no little applause, a large share thereof being an expression of heartfelt relief on the part of the real lovers of music present that they had finished.

And now public expectation was on tiptoe at the approach of the anticipated and, as it proved, the real triumph of the day. Those of your readers who have heard the inimitable music of the Garde de Paris in the gardens of the Tuileries and other localities in this city, will not be surprised that much was expected of them nor to learn that they fully came up to the general ideal. They played the Chœur et Marche des Fiancailles from Lohengrin, and that with an appreciation of its many beauties that could come only from long practice and devotion to their study. It hardly seemed possible that notes so soft, so clear, so full of meaning and passion, could come from the coarseness of wood and brass. At times they died away into the very echo of an echo, and yet palpable, the faint murmurs of distant waterfalls and rustling leaves, the quiet whispers of nature communing with herself while she builds, till wreaths of melody seemed to float through the air; at times over all came out strong and loud the triumphant blast of the trumpet that thrilled through every soul like that at the great awakening when the graves shall restore the dead that they contained before. It is on an occasion like this that one appreciates the enjoyment of which God has made the human mind capable and listens in silent adoration while the hidden germs of inner life are warmed into fruitful abundance by the fostering presence of genius. For a moment after the notes had died away the listening crowd admired the lofty sound, then as of old a present deity they shout around, and never was more unstinted and universal applause bestowed upon any successful effort. I will not try to describe it, but it was all that the strongest imagination can conceive.

The Russian band had courteously been placed between that of the Garde de Paris and that of the Guides de la garde impériale who were to play the last. They had chosen somewhat strangely, in view of the late circumstances, the overture of Vie pour le Czar by Glinka. It is a gay, sprightly and popular morceau, but it was brought too closely into contrast with the wonderful music that had preceded it. The Muscovites did well, but hardly equalled Austria or Prussia. Nevertheless they made a brave show in their brilliant uniforms, as, like Timotheus, they were placed on high, and their efforts were well received. The people cheered them to the echo, and when they descended one could infer that they were well pleased, though not a smile or wrinkle of expression had ruffled a single cheek so as to alter their placid stolidity.

Their successors came forward at half past five and played the six fantaisies from the Carnaval de Venise. From some cause an unlucky croûsse occurred in the midst of the piece, the cause of which I could not understand. Otherwise they played with their usual ability. This, I presume, many of your readers are well acquainted with, as they have for a long time given concerts every evening in the garden behind the Palais de l'Industrie, which forms for that reason a most agreeable resort for all pursuers of pleasure à la fincée. As the last notes of the overture smote upon the ear, the setting sun, sloping slowly towards the west, poured forth a flood of radiance strikingly in harmony with the scene. Broad bands of light descended upon the people through the open windows under the eaves. The profuse and gaudy hues of the great colored window at the end of the hall, blue and yellow, purple and orange, were lit up with a brilliancy too dazzling for the eye. The huge parti-colored oriflammes pendent from the ceiling undulated widely to and fro in the faint air, as if wafting to the sun a parting benediction. And still the players in their rich tunics of scarlet and gold played on, and we listened in solemn silence as the harmonious notes stole over us. Weary, hot and uncomfortable by sitting or standing for six hours, as many had done, yet they were not proof against the influences around them, and embraced by a feeling of common sympathy they listened as one man. It was a fitting close to a ceremonial so grand, that its last ending should accompany one of the great and mysterious operations of Nature, that melody so inspiring should hymn the sun to his rest.

The enormous multitude were long in quitting the building. Numerous as are its exits, 30,000 persons cannot leave any space with rapidity. Many remained to hear the final award of the prizes. The patience of these was severely tested, for the judges hesitated long—nearly an hour—before arriving at their decision. There was, probably, but little doubt in their own minds, as in that of the audience, that the Garde de Paris richly deserved the first prize and the only one. But it seems to have been decided from the outstart, and perhaps properly, that no French band should be distinguished in this way. From this it resulted that to reconcile all difficulties and give universal satisfaction, three first prizes were bestowed upon the Garde de Paris, the Austrian and the Prussian bands respectively, and three second prizes upon those of Russia, Holland, and the Guides de la garde impériale. It was not a very ingenious way of arranging the matter, and reminded one of Artemus Ward's method of dealing with a similar crisis when he made all his officers generals. The upshot of the whole thing is, that no one is contented, and as far as the great musical competition is concerned, all parties stand pretty much as they did before. Yet it has not been unfruitful. Europe will benefit by the "three first prizes," absurd as they seem, and we strangers here who have thus had the infinite treats of the present gala-days crowned with so delicious an entertainment, have every reason to be thankful.

Theatre Orchestras.

The fall and winter seasons of most of our theatres being about to begin, it might not be out of place to examine how the musical portion of their entertainment could be so improved as to make it a means of cultivation to those who do not or cannot attend musical performances of a higher class.

As many of our readers have perhaps no clear conception of the number and nature of the instruments that enter into the formation of an orchestra, they occasionally give that name to any musical organization consisting of wind and string instruments. Managers of places of amusement, who ought to know, and in fact do know better, turn this often to a ludicrous account by announcing on their play-bills, "Overture for full Orchestra," which full orchestra oftenest consists of from nine to twelve musicians.

The proper rendering of any orchestra music, classic or other, requires not less than the following number: 2 first violins, 2 second violins, 1 alto, 1 violoncello, 1 double-bass, 2 flutes, 2 clarinets, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons, 2 horns, 2 trumpets, 1 trombone, 1 pair of drums or tympani. Total, 21 musicians.

Even with this for a theatre orchestra large number, some music requiring additional instruments could not be performed if their passages were not given to other instruments of nearly the same compass. This is not always feasible—for instance, if all the instruments have important passages of their own to perform. Although not perfectly legitimate, yet without this rearranging no music but of the simplest kind could be given in our theatres. Such arrangements are generally made by German and French musicians, and the passages for instruments not in the orchestra are marked by smaller notes in the part of instruments having the greatest similarity of sound with the absent ones. Some of these arrangements, mostly of dance and operatic music, are cleverly done, and if rendered by skilled musicians, quite effective.

But only very few of our theatre orchestras have more than from ten to twelve musicians, and consequently these arrangements must be still further reduced, which is mostly done by simply omitting the parts unrepresented in the orchestra. Such small bands have generally but a simple string quartet, one flute, one clarinet, one trumpet, two horns, one trombone and one drum. Several of our theatre managers even go so far as to deprive their orchestras of horns and violoncello, those most important of harmony-sustaining instruments. The effect produced by such a combination may be guessed at from the absolute fact that the poorest arrangement of the poorest kind of music requires, besides the latter instruments, two clarinets and two cornets. Without these the performance of "civilized" music becomes an impossibility, no matter if leader and band be good or bad. A good musician never accepts an engagement in such an orchestra, but under the spur of absolute necessity and always at the risk of his artistic dignity.

The requirements of the English melodrama necessitate very frequently the presence of the musicians in the orchestra during the progress of the play. The entrance and exit of the virtuous yet suffering country maiden, of the grim traitor, of the burly English squire, must be marked by what the managers pleasingly style on the bills "characteristic music." It used to be formerly a matter of no little pride for a leader to be the fortunate possessor of a large collection of such small pieces, numbered and labelled: "Slow music," "mysterious music," "dreamy music," "thieves' pizzicato," "creeping murderers' music," "triumphant virtue music," "hunting music," "lively-dreamy music," "agitatos," "hurries," "dying music," "wild music," "angel and demon music," etc., all to be used at the fitting occasion. In one instance within our recollection, the "creeping murderer's music" was, through a pardonable mistake, played at the Apotheosis of Margaretha; while, as if to equal things, Camilla's Waltz sweetened on another occasion the dying pangs of Juliet.

It is needless to say that our good theatre leaders can and do write appropriate music where it is required. But by far the greater number cannot do so, and have no choice left but to borrow the needed music or else submit their musical listeners to a mild species of torture.

Once leader and band engaged, the manager ordinarily insists upon having none of that scientific music played between the acts, but music to please the million, which ukase means, alas! to play nothing but pieces already too familiar to the public by the art of the organ-grinder, forgetting entirely that the public, even the most unintellectual, has an instinctive knowledge of good and bad music.

We have often wondered at the, we might almost say, infallibility of the masses in musical matters. Whenever good music is performed, there are few but appreciate and applaud it. Even small orchestras have in Haydn's and Mozart's symphonies quite a choice of fine music of an easy comprehension. There is no earthly reason why a fragment of a Quatuor, Sextet or Octet might not be given occasionally. Several distinguished German masters, such as Lindpaintner, Hiller, Reissiger and others have written charming music for the express purpose to be played between the acts. If lighter music is to be given why not select from Strauss and Lanner, at least well-written dance music, rather than vitiate the public taste by a hodge-podge jumble of sixty operatic and other melodies, each of them without the slightest logical connection with the one that succeeds.

An intelligent manager ought, instead of preventing, rather to encourage his orchestra in the right direction: for between two equally well-directed theatres, the public will certainly patronize the one where the importance of good music is most recognized.

Does not the public at the concerts on the Common readily discern between poor and good bands, poor and good music? Does not their attentive silence whenever a good piece of music is performed show at least that the beautiful is as intuitively felt in music as in the art of the painter, the sculptor, actor or architect? Do the managers think their public less intelligent? If so, we believe they are mistaken.

1. There is no reason why, if music is needed at all in our theatres, good music and of a sufficiently strong orchestra should not be given.

2. To present, under the name of orchestra, a smaller number than from 16 to 18 pieces is an insult to the intelligence of the public and should be frowned down.

3. To degrade good musicians to the level and numbers of a common minstrel band shows that the manager does not believe in the progress of culture, and is consequently unfit for his duties.

4. To compel the musicians to play music distasteful even to the worst among them is unworthy of a well-conducted theatre that is desirous of the patronage of the intelligent.

A reform in music in our smaller theatres is sadly needed, and the more, since to counterbalance the injury done in them every evening to the popular taste, we have naught but our Symphonic, Oratorio and Chamber Concerts, all beyond the reach of most of our theatre goers.—Boston Transcript.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" (of which we give in another place a German's thoughtful criticism, after hearing it in Paris), has met with success in London. Of the way in which it was done, here is the Athenæum's account:

It may be stated as unfortunate that the "cuts" necessary to reduce M. Gounod's "Romeo" within reasonable limits, have necessitated omissions by which the balance of the composition is destroyed. The choral prologue behind the curtain, which forms part of the prelude or overture, has been suppressed. We deliver this up without regret; also the ballet music, and even Juliet's great air before she drinks the poison; but we must regret that the retrenchment of the concerted finale to the third act should have been found requisite; still more, that the nuptial march and Epithalamium, in the fourth act, have been taken away. It follows that a large amount of solidity and contrast is inevitably lost, and that, after the first act, the opera is virtually reduced to a dialogue, with a few snatches of song for the subordinate characters, a few morsels of chorus, and one concerted piece—that of the brawl. It is true that Juliet's avowals and Romeo's passions are expressed with a finish of detail beyond the reach of any one save M. Gounod; but the predominance of monologue and recitative, most richly accompanied, presses on the patience. Of the duets, that in the balcony scene is the best. The charm of the nocturne (p. 211, piano-forte score) proves less in representation than we had expected: its perpetual modulations end in wearying the ear. We should fear that the habit of introducing these was becoming chronic with M. Gounod, did we not recollect the delicious freshness and simplicity of the first two acts of the opera which preceded "Romeo."—"Mireille."

What is curious is the alternation of a peculiarity which cannot be called M. Gounod's sole property, with the one already pointed out. It is impossible to follow this "Romeo" without being aware of the many traces of Meyerbeer-ism which it contains. The sharp, ringing, broken staccato rhythm (the first example of which is, perhaps, the opening chorus of "Robert") has not been heard by Meyerbeer's successor in vain. There is no positive plagiarism in the scene of quarrel between the houses; but its color was anticipated in the Pré aux Clercs scene in "Les Huguenots."

M. Gounod's music gains essentially by being produced on the stage. So artfully are the occasional crudities of his harmony distributed throughout the score, that (when heard) they pass unnoticed, even as did Chopin's impure chords and progressions, when Chopin's own insinuating hands touched the pianoforte. Among many lovely passages, the loveliest is the symphony before the tomb of Juliet—a funeral march for youth and beauty, withal feminine, totally unfit for an analogous office had the victim been a Romeo. The execution of this beautiful prelude (not to praise at random) was the most exquisite performance we recollect in England—unique in its combination of pathos, accent and charm of tone. Yet the same public that applauded to the echo the tawdry and essentially inexpressive Marchineel prelude in "L'Africaine," let the movement pass with frigid indifference. The opening and close of the second act must not be passed over, as in M. Gounod's best manner.

Every resource that the Royal Italian Opera possesses has been brought to bear on the production of "Romeo." Mlle. Patti's Juliet leaves little to be desired. The part is a winning one, but the lady who has to sustain it, the first after Madame Miolan-Carvalho, does so at no common disadvantage, since every one agrees that her Juliet is among the most transcendent exhibitions of Art, and the nature overpassing yet animating Art, which the opera stage has seen. Mlle. Patti is charming; in the opening scenes of the love-tale girlish, timid, yet admirably graceful, her girlish timidity yielding by degrees to the power of "the mighty conqueror," and merging in an impassioned tenderness, an implicit trust, and a firm resolution to do, to dare, and (if need were) to die rather than for an instant to be false to the one absorbing interest which has possessed itself of her entire being. Every note of the music is wrought out by her to perfection. Her voice, besides being fuller, is younger than it was during her first seasons in England, when it seemed to us to have a certain phenomenon tone, as belonging to an organ preternaturally worked and developed. She has deservedly raised herself higher than she has till now stood, by this performance which, in fact, so far as the principal artists are concerned, is musically the mainstay of the opera. Signor Mario is a picturesque Romeo. His is the bearing which befits the son of a noble house. The stage has had no such lover as he. As a personation his Romeo will presently pair off with his Rosalind, since on his first taking up a part he is habitually apt to be uncertain in his effects; but the indication of the real character is throughout evident; and in the great scenes he is intense yet delicate to a wish, with a shade of extravagance. It is not his fault, still less ours, but the fault of the Old sorcerer with scythe and glass.

that we must speak of his acting before his singing. Signor Cotogni is bright and skilful as Mercutio, and gives the difficult song of "Queen Mab" (the main charm of which lies in the airy trickery of its accompaniments) with intelligence. Signor Bagagiolo, the Friar Lawrence, has a noble bass voice, and an effective stage presence; but his part has been so shortened as to deprive him of every opportunity of making an effect. M. Petit, as Capulet, is clever, but hard; his voice is not of pleasant quality. Signor Neri-Baraldi is Tybal. The page, Stephano, is Mlle. Nau, who he may be described, without hyperbole, as a miniature copy of what her mother was.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 17, 1867.

The Nature and Object of Artistic Instruction.

(From the German of Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century.")

We distinguish, in every work of art, its spiritual purport, and the material element in and through which that reveals itself. Both, however, are blended into one undivided whole, so that the work of art cannot be said to be in one part material, and in another spiritual. It is the spirit alone which has collected the material, and it is present in and penetrates the whole of this material, so far as it reveals itself in the work of art; while on the other hand, every portion of the external medium exists only for that purpose, and in that sense for, and in which, the spiritual idea reveals itself in the entire work. The Pastoral Symphony does not consist,—first of a number of sounds, melodies, harmonies, &c., &c., and then of the idea of rural life; but both constitute one whole; these ideas of rural life have called into being and have embodied themselves in just these melodies and harmonies.

As the spiritual and material elements in a work of art are one and inseparable, so in the act of artistic creation the whole man is present in his undivided and inseparable creative being, with his senses, his feelings, and clear perception, with his will and his action, with the whole amount of his past experience and acquisitions, as, kindled by the electric spark of creative love, they flash up and flow together into the form of the new work. It is this circumstance which shrouds in such deep mystery the origin and production of a work of art. Whence came that spiritual idea which the artist reveals? We may, indeed, show how it became accessible to him. In that Pastoral Symphony, to which we have before alluded, there are many representations of scenes of nature and rural life, the ideas of which must have been existing in the mind of Beethoven. But these ideas had been formed by personal impressions long before the work of Art was conceived and executed; they were familiar and dear to many other musicians besides Beethoven, who, nevertheless, did not feel themselves called to embody them in a work of art.

A special and altogether personal inclination was required, in addition to these ideas; and it was necessary that this inclination should be fired to that peculiar spiritual and sensuous ardor which is called inspiration, and that it should become active, through that peculiar power which we have designated by the term "creative love." And, besides all this, it was necessary that the artist should be in the complete possession of the power of formation; that is to say, that he should be acquainted with, and have full command over, all those combinations of sounds and instruments which constitute the practical part of musical composition, and which are as indispensable to the composer as language is to the poet.

I have here considered art in its highest phase, as creative art. Representative art, and even mere artistic understanding, are however of the same nature. Artistic understanding and representation are impossible without natural capabilities and acquirements of different kinds. I must be generally susceptible for art; I must have become capable of understanding the language of the particular work which I wish to study and perform; I must have so cultivated my mind as to be able to raise myself to the height of its idea; and lastly, by practice have acquired sufficient external skill for its proper execution. But, with all these natural gifts and preparatory acquirements, both the conception and performance of the work of art are imperfect and void of real life, without the presence of that electric spark which flashes up with the impetuosity and incomprehensibility of an original power at the moment that the creative spirit in the work of art comes into inspiring contact with my sympathetic mind.

Now the difference between Art instruction and other branches of tuition is plain, and the nature of its task lies clearly before us. The task of every other branch is limited, inasmuch as it occupies itself with a special and therefore limited capability of the learner. It conveys to his mind something not previously known, and provides for the prosecution of study; or it exercises his limbs in some more or less partial direction for the acquirement of certain descriptions of practical skill. Grammar conveys to the student the material of language (words), and shows him the laws according to which it may be multiplied and its specialities combined. It engages merely the understanding and memory of the learner, whose other capabilities and entire personality have nothing to do with its special task. The understanding and memory of the teacher, and the understanding and memory of the pupil, are the only things brought into action. The same is the case with every kind of technical training. Insight aided by experience and reflection—nay, mere attention and a natural turn for a thing, are all that are required by the instructor, and that are to be awakened and developed in the learner; all the other qualities, the entire man, as such, remain outside the field of training.

This, as the above retrospective glance at the nature of Art has shown us, does not suffice for an artistic development. It is not the possession of any or several special qualifications which makes a man an artist, or susceptible to art; but the entire man with all his powers combined constitutes the active principle of art. Artistic instruction, therefore, can be neither of a purely mechanical, nor a purely intellectual nature, nor can it be confined to some special form of mental activity.

In Art, sense and soul are one. Artistic instruction, consequently, cannot be either mere training or mere doctrine, the development of any particular kind of mental activity. It must be Education. It must lay hold of and educate the entire man; that is to say, it must draw him upward from a state of insufficiency to that position of sufficiency which artistic life and activity demand.

There is still another sense in which artistic instruction must be education. Doctrine, properly so called, concerns itself with the peculiarities of the learner only so far as to take notice of his aptness for its special subject, which it enables him, by an intelligent and methodical proceeding, to acquire with greater facility and certainty. For the rest, the individuality of the learner is to it a matter of perfect indifference; there is not one kind of mathematics or philosophy for some and a second kind for others.

In artistic instruction the case is different. It is true there is likewise but one Art and one law of Art for all. But every artistic act, after all, receives its last form and impression from the individuality of the artist out of whose nature and momentary condition it arises with electric suddenness and power. The spirit of Art is universal, as that of Humanity; but every one of its acts is strictly individual. It is I, and I alone, in my present condition, in whom this form, which they call my work of Art, awakens into life; and this form is nothing but itself; it is not a universal, but a strictly individual entity. Consequently, all artistic instruction must again be directed upon the individual person of the learner; it cannot transmit Art to "some one or the other;" but it has to bring up, to educate, this particular person for artistic activity, with a faithful preservation of all his individual peculiarities.

And now, all ye that know this and take it to heart—above all, ye, my fellow laborers in the paths of tuition—recognize what our calling demands from us! The educator must himself be an educated man; not merely a trained, but a really educated man; in his whole nature and ability a man of high culture and elevated ideas. This holds good in the educator as in Art itself. The whole soul in the person of the teacher addresses the whole soul in the pupil. The teacher knows, through the power of his self-consciousness, that what he artistically produces is no more than the immediate expression of his individuality; that in his work and its effects nothing can exist but what is peculiar to himself. He must therefore hold inviolate the person and individuality of his pupil, who, like himself, can only operate and produce according to the peculiarity of his organization. Let not these two be called teacher and pupil; they are master and youth standing towards each other in the spiritual relation of paternity and childhood. He who feels not this in himself, who enters upon his office divided, cold and void of affection, to him, either art itself is foreign, or ambition and desire of gain have been his calls to the profession; misconception alone has led him to his path. What unites the master and youth, is not merely the mutual pursuit of, and love for, the art (this tie is not wanting in any instruction); it is, independent of that consideration,—personal love.

Each beholds in the other the companion and chosen assistant in the mutual vocation in which his individuality is more important the more fully it is preserved. As a series of columns supports the portico of the temple, so youthful and master artists proceed together to the service of the sanctuary, all bearers of the idea which manifests itself in the union.

This is the soul and life of education for Art. Rather than education, however, it should be called artistic teaching; for this reason, that its object is only one branch of human development, while the term education implies the general development of the human mind, of which all special teaching and the various branches of education are component parts. It is in this sense that the problem of Art education, or artistic teaching, is to be understood. Man approaches man, a whole to a whole, the preceding artist to his successor, in close unity of mind and artistic consciousness, each recognizing in the non-infringement of his individuality the ground and root from which alone original Art works can be raised.

(To be continued.)

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. We have seen a Circular, signed by the Directors of the Music Hall Association, and addressed to the Stockholders, warning them "that an effort is being made to purchase their stock, by parties interested (as the Directors believe) in disposing of the property, or converting it to uses not contemplated by the original subscribers to the Stock," and earnestly advising them not to part with their shares.

We wish that this may prove to be a false alarm. But it is well known, that, though the Hall was built for Music, and though most of its stock was zealously subscribed for at the outset by music-lovers who sought no return for their money beyond the satisfaction of seeing a noble Music Hall established in our city, which should be sacred to Art forever, yet a considerable portion of the stock (say one third) fell into the hands of unmusical people, who only sought a profitable investment, and who were and are disposed to murmur so long as they get no dividends. Now what more likely than that outside speculators—the same for instance who have managed to get control of the Boston Theatre—should be on the watch to pick up shares, enter into a league with the disaffected ones, try to out-vote the original founders and turn the Music Hall into a great factory, or carpet warerooms, or whatever will pay best?

The need of a great Music Hall was felt here during the visits of Jenny Lind, and a plan was started in the councils of the old Academy of Music. But that failed, and the project was revived in January 1851, at the annual meeting of the Harvard Musical Association, where a committee was raised to procure plans, select and purchase a site and obtain subscriptions to stock. The cost of land and building was about $150,000,—real estate and labor being at that time very low. A mortgage was given for $50,000, and the remaining $100,000 was put into shares of $100 each. These were disposed of readily within sixty days. About one fourth of the whole was taken by members of the Harvard Musical, several warm friends of music taking from 25 to 100 shares each. But also a very large proportion was subscribed for in small sums by musicians and members of musical societies, according to their means. And all this was purely and solely that Boston might have a good place for good music.

For some years the expenses of the Hall exceeded its income. For several years past, since the Organ was erected, the income has been good; but, instead of dividends, this profit has been applied to the reduction of the debt and to improvements.

Would it not be worth more money for other uses? say the non-musical stockholders. If we surrender it to the greedy maw of trade, for instance? If we deal with it simply as property, and with no reference to the purpose for which it was built? Very likely. But Boston needs it for a Music Hall, for a temple of Art and all aesthetic festivals, far more than she needs an acre or two more added to the vast wilderness of trade. Think what we owe to the Music Hall! What memories of Symphony and Oratorio and great Festivals, what celebrations, School Festivals, floral exhibitions, harmonizing and inspiring influences of all kinds! What can we do without it? Where shall the Muse find refuge? Where is there a place for such another Hall? It would be suicidal policy to let it go. It would be flinging away the artistic progress of fifteen years; it would seriously disorganize, discourage the aesthetic social culture.

Now these facts have only to be made known to the music-loving people of Boston, they have only to be made aware of the danger, and they will instantly rally to the defence of an institution which every patriotic citizen would guard religiously as one of the sacred palladiums of our culture and our liberty. Music-lovers who now hold stock must not, will not part with it. But we have made these statements in the hope that the question may present itself seriously to other friends of Art, and that it may move them, both in love and duty, to get some of the Music Hall stock into their own hands, that ere long it may be wholly owned by those who mean to keep it sacred to its first end of Music and of Art. Let us offset the scheme to absorb the musical stock by an endeavor to absorb the non-musical stock and make it all musical and homogeneous. Then it will be impossible ever to divert the Hall from its true uses.

"But it already has been so diverted," some will say. "It has been let, time and again, for uses wholly unartistic." Yes, temporarily, but with what motive? Purely for the sake of saving it for Art. The disaffected stockholders had to be conciliated; income must be had, expenses must be met somehow. Is it not better that there should be bad music half the time, if thereby we pay for a home for good music the rest of the time? The end, the motive all the time is Art; but Art is still so poor that she must let out some of her apartments sometimes, or else have her house sold over her head. Patience, and it will come right in the end; Art will yet occupy the whole.

CREDIT. We copied in our last a piece from the German Gartenlaube, entitled "The first debut of Henriette Sontag." We took the piece precisely as we found it in other papers, and should of course have given credit also for the translation, had we then known, as we do now, that it originally appeared in the New York Leader, over the signature Franz Genger.

We forget from what paper we clipped the following, but we believe the compliment which it contains to be deserved:

PERSONAL. No one would have expected, from the style in which the telegraph mangled the name, that the recipient of the degree of Doctor of Music, bestowed by Yale College at the late commencement, was Prof. JAMES G. BARNETT, of Hartford, Conn., who numbers many friends among our citizens. The honor was entirely unexpected, and came as a spontaneous and merited acknowledgement of the services of a gentleman who has done probably more than any other one man to extend a cultivated musical taste in Connecticut.

An American Soprano, Miss JENNY BUCK, who has achieved distinction in Europe, and was educated (we believe) at the Leipzig Conservatory, is expected to arrive in this country in October and make her debut in New York.

EXPOSITION UNIVERSELLE. In Le Monestrel for July 21 we find the "Official List of Rewards" to exhibitors of Class X, which includes Musical Instruments and Publications. These are classed in the following order:

1. Decorations; under which head occur three names only, as follows:

MERKLIN, knight of the Legion of Honor (Great Organs). France.

SCHAEFFER, knight of Legion of Honor (associated with the house of Erard). France.

CHICKERING, knight of Legion of Honor, (Pianos). United States.

Then are named as hors concours (out of the competition), they being themselves members of the awarding jury:

SCHIEDMAYER (J. and P.), Stuttgart. (J. Schiedmayer, member of the Jury), Pianos and Harmoniums.

CAVAILLE-COLL, Paris. (Associate on the Jury). Organs.

DERAIN (A. F.), Paris. (Associate on the Jury). Harmoniums.

ERARD (Mme. Ve), Paris. (Schaeffer, associate on the Jury), Pianos.

HERZ (Henri), Paris. (Associate on the Jury). Pianos.

PLEYEL-WOLFF & Co., Paris. (Wolff on the Jury). Pianos.

VUILLAUME (J. B.), Paris. (Associate on the Jury). Instruments with a bow.

2. Grand Prize. Only one:

SAX (A. J.), Paris. Brass Instruments.

3. Gold Medals. Seven names:

BROADWOOD & SONS, London. Pianos.

STEINWAY & SONS, New York. Pianos.

CHICKERING & SONS, New York. Pianos.

SOCIÉTÉ ANONYME, (Merklín-Schütze & Co.), for the manufacture of great Organs. France and Belgium.

ALEXANDRE père et fils, Paris. Organs.

TRIEBERT (F.), Paris. Wind Instruments of Wood.

STREICHER (J. B.) & SON. Vienna. Pianos.

4. Silver Medals. A list of some 60 awards, including 24 for Pianos, 1 for Organs, 3 for Harmoniums (one from the United States, Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN); the rest for stringed and wind instruments, editions of musical works, &c.

5. Bronze Medals. 78 awards: 18 for Pianos, 3 for Organs, 4 for Harmoniums, &c., &c. Two from America: J. GEMUNDER, New York, for Violins, &c.; L. SCHREIBER, New York, for Brass Instruments.

6. Honorable Mentions. A long list; none from the United States.

There were also some fifty Bronze Medals and Honorable Mentions awarded to skilful workmen, employed in various piano and other manufactories in France.

It will be seen from the above that the Decorations are classed as the highest grade of honor; next comes the Grand Prize, awarded only to M. Sax; and third in grade is the Gold Medal. The piano-making house of Erard placed itself out of the competition by the fact that one of its members (M. Schaeffer) was on the Jury; but on this gentleman, as well as on Mr. Chickering, was bestowed the Cross of the Legion of Honor; why, if not by way of recognizing these two as at the head of all the makers of Pianos? The French have long regarded the Erard as the Grand Piano of all the world, beyond competition; by this act now they welcome the Chickering to an equal place beside the object of their own pride.

TURN FEST AND CONCERT.—Besides the usual Organ concerts, the only music of the week has been in connection with the German Turners' Festival. The Boston Turnverein had invited their brethren from other cities of the Commonwealth, and three days in the beginning of the week were spent in gymnastic exercises, prize exhibitions, picnics, music and all the wholesome, brotherly Teutonic ways of having a good time. The sight of them, in their cool and easy linen costume, marching through the streets, all strong and blooming with health, was refreshing. The last day (Tuesday) was spent in the Music Hall; the day was given to a prize gymnastic exhibition, the evening to the concert and distributing of prizes. Mark how intellectual the character of the principal prizes; we copy from the Advertiser:

The evening concert in Music Hall at quarter past eight o'clock was an appropriate finale to the Turnfest. It was given by the Boston Turnverein, in honor of their fellow societies of the Boston district, and was a splendid testimonial. The attendance was quite large, and the audience very appreciative and enthusiastic. The programme was as follows:

1. Overture, "Felsenmuehle," Reissiger, Germania Quadrille Band. 2. "Grass An Die Kuenstler," Mendelssohn, Orpheus Musical Society. 3. Organ, Fugue: R. A. C. H. Bach, Master H. Chelius. 4. Adagio from 3d Sinfonie, Mendelssohn, Germania Band. 5. "Im Fruehling" Fesca, Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen. 6. Waltz, Rheissagen, Germania Band.

Pyramid-Exhibition and Distribution of Prizes.

7. Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven, Germania Band. 8. "Die Stille Wasserrrose," Aht, "An Das Vaterland," Kreuzer, Orpheus Musical Society. 9. Organ, "Improvisationes," Master H. Chelius. 10. "Das Deutsche Lied," Kalliwoda, Schwur Deutscher Maenner, Mendelssohn, Boston Turners. 11. Fackeltanz, Flotow, Germania Band.

The singing by the Orpheus Musical Society was of the highest order, and drew from the audience the applause which it merited. M. Rudolphsen was heartily encored in his solo. The Boston Turners acquitted themselves well in their pyramidal formations, and some of the designs were quite effective. While they were on the floor the distribution of prizes took place. Mr. C. Lewison called upon the various successful competitors, who were escorted to the platform, where they received their prizes and the applause of their friends. Mr. Scholl, who gained the first prize, was crowned with a laurel wreath. The following is a list of the recipients of prizes:—

General Gymnastic Exercises.—First prize—Goethe's works, in six volumes—Wilhelm Scholl, of Boston; second prize—Schiller's works, in six volumes—Gustav Gutermuth, of Boston; third prize—copy of Goethe's Faust, Illustrated—H. Huber, of Boston; fourth prize—European History—Charles Gross, of Boston; fifth prize—photograph album—A. Landgraf, of Providence; sixth prize—a historical sketch book of Germany—C. Schwartz, of Boston; seventh prize—diploma—H. Harring, of Boston; eighth prize—diploma—J. Sieber, of Worcester; ninth prize—diploma—F. Honery, of Worcester.

High Jumping.—First prize—diploma—G. Gutermuth, of Boston; second prize—diploma—Fr. Weber, of Springfield.

Long Jumping.—Prize—diploma—to M. Hecker of Worcester.

Foot Race.—Prize—diploma—to A. Landgraf, of Providence. Rifle Shooting.—First prize—revolver—to H. Kuhn; second prize—meerschau pipe—H. Rahu; third prize—meerschau cigar-holder—W. Harring; fourth prize—pair vases—M. Sandberg; fifth prize—half a dozen silver spoons—W. Kammerer; sixth prize—smoking set—S. Scholpp.

Diplomas were also presented with the first six prizes for general gymnastic excellence. Complimentary mention was made of L. Baumann, of Springfield, and F. R. Becker, of Boston, for gymnastic exercises, and of M. Hecker, of Worcester, in connection with the foot race. The jumping, foot race and rifle shooting took place at Fresh Pond on Monday.

With the concert the Turnfest was closed; and thus was ended an occasion of much pleasure and gratification, unmarred by a single disagreeable feature for which our German citizens or visitors can be held responsible. The impressions which they have left are most favorable to them, and all will be glad to again welcome the Turners of Boston district to this city when the time for another festival arrives, or when any Turnverein desires to visit the "City of Notions" on its own responsibility.

FESTIVAL AT KEENE, N. H. The Cheshire-County Musical Convention commence a five-days Festival (their 15th) at 2 o'clock next Monday. The Conductors are Messrs. Carl Zerrahn and W. O. Perkins; the solo singers, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mrs. Jennie Kempton (recently returned from Europe), Mr. James Whitney, Mr. M. W. Whitney, and Mr. H. C. Barnabee ("Basso and humorous vocalist"). For accompaniments, the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and Mrs. M. D. Shepard, pianist. Of course there is a new collection of psalmody to be sung from and disseminated; this time it is called the "Church Bell"; but the singers have also laid out other and higher work for themselves, to-wit: Haydn's "Spring," from the Seasons, Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and Rossini's Stabat Mater,—which last is in striking contrast to the Puritanic psalm tunes.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

It was by chance we met. Song. H. F. Williams. 30
Who's at my window. " C. A. Osborne. 40
Moon behind the trees. Ballad. C. J. Wilson. 30
Love me for what I would be. Wallerstein. 30
Waiting for Father. Song & Cho. A. Weaver. 30
Marguerite. Ballad. R. Roden. 30
One hundred years hence. S'g. J. F. Spaulding. 30
Fare thee well. " J. Hopkins. 35

Songs of the kind that usually "suit the people," and worthy of more particular notice.

O'er the graves of the loved ones plant beautiful flowers. Song and Chorus. Dr. Ordway. 50
Dr. O. has a rare talent in choosing good subjects for his songs. This is destined to be very popular.

Dens Miseratur. "God be merciful." Southard. 60

In the Cross of Christ I glory. Solo, duet and quartet. G. H. Martin. 35

Guide me, O thou great Jehovah. Song and quartet. A. Andrews. 35

While shepherds watched their flocks. Qt. " 40

I would not live away. Song and Quartet. " 50

Shades of evening. " M. C. Thayer. 30

Beautiful and useful sacred pieces.

Journey Song. (Wanderlied). Mendelssohn. 40

Spring Song. (Frühlingslied). " 25

Ah! perfido! (Ah! faithless one.) Beethoven. 80

So must my darling be. F. Aht. 30

The pilot's daughter Jane. " 40

Of classical beauty, the third being grand and difficult, the last two more in ballad style.

Birds await the day. Song. C. Blamphin. 30

O my lost love! " Dolores. 35

My sweetheart when a boy. " W. Morgan. 40

A trio of fine songs.

Instrumental.

Corn flower Waltz, for guitar. Haydn. 30

First Love Redowa. " 25

Grand March from Faust, " 25

Three favorite airs, well arranged.

Petit ange, (Little angel). Nocturne. Egghard. 50

Serenade. Reverie caprice. A. Bernardel. 60

Tasteful pieces, for players somewhat advanced.

Coqueterie Galop. New Repertoire. M. Hassler. 35

Hurrah Sturm Galop. 4 hds. "Social hours." J. Bellak. 35

Up and down Galop. 4 hds. " " 35

Abdallah March. Turner. 30

"All Right" Polka. A. Andranke. 30

Easy and brilliant pieces.

Belgravia Waltz. D. Godfrey. 75

Sprightly, and no doubt first heard in the "aristocratic" quarter of London.

Snow nymph Polka caprice. J. Hopkins. 75

An agreeable reminder of cool weather.

Books.

FORTY-FIVE OPERA CHORUSES, from works of Rossini, Auber, Bellini, Donizetti, Gounod, Verdi, &c. By Edwin Bruce. $3.00

Mr. Bruce has faithfully elaborated these, which are the cream of recent opera choruses, and has arranged them in good style for the use of choirs and societies. The pieces cannot be sung without study, but are not difficult enough to frighten ordinary singers, and repay careful practice.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 689.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 31, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 12.

Crete.

A happy island in the Egean blue
To Hellas answered with a voice of streams;
Elysium glimmering with immortal dew—
A shadowed land of dreams.

Mysterious blossoms odorously bloomed
Where lonely surges moaned about the shore.
On cooler heights the sacred olives gloomed
Around a temple's door.

And maiden Ida, crowned above the waves,
Her pure brow lifted to the glowing sun,
And kept the secret of her winding caves,
God-haunted every one.

No more the Naiad slips a pearly arm
Through wreathing coral branches to the air,
Nor Eos, waking in eternal charm,
Unveils her radiant hair.

Fair Aphrodite's rosy curves of grace,
The wooing cadence of her subtle voice,
No more with Here's proud, imperial face
Bewilder, ask a choice;

But all the mountains echo dying cries,
The cities flare in minarets of fire,
And where the sea reflects the reddened skies,
The brook the cedar spire,

Down with the torrents flash the swords of men,
A ceaseless struggle writhes along the sand,
The Greek and Moslem grapple in the glen
Through all the homeless land.

A land of graves, an open grave it lies
With silent faces white upon the steep,
With woman-tresses trailed above their eyes—
Wide eyes that cannot weep.

No pause for sorrow in the weary night,
When crouching foes forbid the broken wail,
And, ghastly marbles in the moon's clear light,
The children lie so pale.

All woes of death, all agonies of loss
In shapeless horrors front the Summer's smile,
And wilder shouts, when high the crescents toss,
Ring down the dark defile.

Charge the pass of that ravine
Once again!
Sheaths await your lances keen—
Hearts of men!
See! they falter—they shall fly!
Sphakiotes,
Shame is ours, or victory!
At their throats!

We will fight while one remains!
Sons of Crete,
We will make our dying sweet!
Where the vine
Brimmed our cups with purple blood—
• Drink divine—
Moslem veins
Pour for us a warmer flood!

They have neared the further crest!
Is't a summons or a prayer?
Send the Pasha to his rest,
Learning best
From our daggers our despair!

Would ye grasp
At the bayonets we clasp?
Ye have said!
Come and take
When for Crete's beloved sake
We are dead!

B. V. A.

The Nature and Object of Artistic Instruction.*

II.

THE TASK OF THE TEACHER DETERMINED BY THE NATURE OF ART.

Now, examined more closely, in what way is this problem to be solved? Instruction finds in the pupil desire, knowledge, and ability; but not sufficient for the task, which is so other than to participate in the art according to the standard of the day. What is deficient, instruction should complete and render perfect. For this purpose, it must make the art known according to its various aspects and developments, must examine into the various capabilities and attainments of the pupil, and must arrive at a clear perception of his wants in regard to the development of his mind, and what should be imparted to him.

That the young student may grow to be a successful man and artist, the individuality of his nature must, in the first place, be preserved, and the separate capabilities and dispositions of his mind completed or strengthened when necessary. Instruction must enlighten and fortify the consciousness, charm and engage the feelings, awaken imagination, impart knowledge and impress the memory, sharpen and elevate the mind and the aptitude of the organs. All this must instruction separately and carefully accomplish; although we know the artistic act is neither in the consciousness nor in the feeling, nor in any other single faculty, but has its origin in the unity and completeness of all. So too it must divide the body of a work of Art into sentences, melodies, harmonies, tones, sounds, although it knows that a work of art is nothing single, nothing merely material, but is the duality of idea and sensuousness.

Here then we touch the point where the occupation of teaching diverges from the path of art. And with intrinsic necessity. For instruction is not art; it should equip, prepare one for it and lead to it. Preparation, however, demands a prominent view and classification of the object, and a selection and adaptation of the means. The teaching process begins with dismemberment, under the prospect and in anticipation of a future recombination and fusion. The artistic process begins with the unity of all co-operating powers; it is from this electric unification that, with the suddenness and indivisibility of lightning, the idea of a work of art, in its perfect form, flashes on the mind. This indeed is the essence, is the condition of an artistic act; and thereto teaching does not extend; this it neither has nor gives; it is its opposite. That which instruction immediately and in the first place conveys, can be no real work of art—the spontaneous creation from the mind of the imaginative artist. For upon whomsoever it operates, it first robs him of his own free self-existence, confines and disturbs in him, through its admittance from without, that oneness of all his powers from which alone the work of art, considered as creation, representation, or conception, springs.

* From Marx's "Music of the Nineteenth Century." Translated for this Journal by A. K.

This is the point at which the secret repugnance to coercive teaching, (and every kind of instruction employs coercion, inasmuch as it requires something or other contrary to the will of the learner), manifests itself, even in the best pupil, by no means without reason. By him, instruction is recognized as a more or less necessary assistance. But freedom of mind, spontaneous action from the immediate impulse of his own individuality and ruling frame of thought,—this is what he feels, with the most intense self-consciousness, as the condition of artistic action; that which has not emanated purely from himself he feels not as his own work. Even the struggle of the idea with the stubborn material,—the vexation, nay, almost exasperation,—the ardor and heat of the work—all that lies between the first vague intention and its final completion, which every true artist knows,—from all this he does not desire to be emancipated. Without it, he feels that art were mere play, or the artist—God, who has only to pronounce "Let it be!" and give the result no further care.

Such is the antithesis, the schism. And it is unavoidable where instruction is indispensable; the more needful and more searching the instruction becomes, with the growth of art in purport and development, the stronger the antagonism. In the beginning we looked upon artistic practice and instruction, or rather imitation and learning from dictation, as undistinguishable; the two were one and at peace. Now, what a way from national songs, which went from mouth to mouth, up to the choruses and finales of our operas and oratorios! from the harp of the bard up to the many-limbed host of our orchestra; from the horizon of the poets of nature—even an Æschylus or Pindar, who believed that beyond their country lay only barbarism and Cimmerian darkness, up to the view of a Shakespeare or a Goethe commanding the whole globe and the movements of centuries! Here no single individual's power suffices for our equipment; the individual would lose himself in a pathless wilderness. Instruction must prepare the way, must form a path; he who would not exhaust and lose himself in error, must necessarily seize her guiding hand, and, in a few months' submission and perseverance try to gain the treasure of experience and discernment that centuries have amassed and winnowed; and which now no one can dispense with, since he has entered into the artistic life and consciousness of the age.

This antithesis, this schism, is neither to be disclaimed nor put down, for it lies in the nature of art and of instruction. It is incumbent on us teachers to mitigate the pressure, to reconcile the difference and make it harmless.

This we can do, if in all the necessary subdivision and detail of instruction we maintain a clear recollection and feeling of the mutual fitness and unity which are essential to art. Where we practice skill, the spirit must be present; the practice itself must show the artistic mood and purpose; it must be pervaded by the breath of the feeling to which it seeks to lend a clear expression. When we awaken ideas in the learner, his breast must expand with a feeling of life; his inspired eye must already see the form which his thought shall perfect and transfigure. We must—I conclude with our first maxim—as whole men and artists approach the pupil as a whole man opening and dedicating himself to Art, as one becoming an artist, and keep awake and strong in him, as in ourselves, the sense of individuality and of artistic character as the one powerful and pure incentive. This feeling, however, is as far from any vanity, as Art itself. It is no other than the inward sense that we also, as from nature all uncorrupted men, are open to the wholesome influence of Art—that we have already felt it, that we may secure to ourselves this resource the more abundantly, the more decidedly and purely we devote ourselves to it.

In these maxims lies the reconciliation of the antithesis, where it is unavoidable. But this does not supersede the first duty: to avoid it wherever it is possible and as soon as possible; not dividing nor obliterating anything in the mind of the pupil, or in his artistic efforts, which does not appear absolutely to require it.

Instruction has done its best, when it has connected itself most intimately with the artistic life, with all its pursuits and exercises, just as the former life of the artist unconsciously flows into the course of his present actions. Then instruction advances as the equal sister and companion of art. As the life of the artist, with all his powers and means, flows together in the act of art, so this genuine instruction pours the past experiences and acquirements of art into the spirit of the artist, who is called to stand upon the pinnacle of life. He deceives himself in the outset, to whom this appears only as the "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal," to decoy others and set himself off to advantage.

The all-important thing is, that this principle be strictly carried out through all the individual branches of educational practice, and with all individuals who entrust themselves to our teaching.

Musical Letters by Ferdinand Hiller.*

THE FORTY-FOURTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL OF THE LOWER RHINE AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

(Concluded from page 83)

The words: "Wer Vieles bringt, wird manchem Etwas bringen, und Jeder geht zufrieden aus dem Haus," might have figured in the bills as the motto of the charming miscellaneous concert, somewhat British in its character, of the third day. We had two overtures, three choruses, two violin pieces, three airs, and (including repeats and additions) fourteen songs at the piano. But high as the thermometer may have mounted in the Hall, it was exceeded by the elevation which the temperature of the public reached in its enthusiasm. Perfect hurricanes of applause were the natural result.

The proceedings commenced with an overture by Fétis, the celebrated and venerable head of the Brussels Conservatory. This distinguished man had been invited to conduct his work himself, and it is a great pity that an accident prevented him from doing so. Many persons would, undoubtedly, have been pleased to pay the tribute of grateful respect due from them to the master who, during so many years, has done so much for our art. I leave to scholars the task of properly appreciating the services rendered by Fétis to the history and science of music—but even the most reluctant cannot help acknowledging his exertions in propagating the comprehension of our German art both in France and Belgium. The Revue Musicale, founded by him about forty years ago in Paris, first gave the impulse for a deeper conception of instrumental music in France, and, at the Concerts of the Conservatory, Brussels, which were got up and conducted by him, the eyes of our neighbors were first opened to the wonderful productions of Beethoven's genius. By the Concerts historiques, moreover, which Fétis gave in the principal towns of France and Belgium, the feeling for an unprejudiced appreciation of the various epochs in art was sharpened, and whatever has been done of the same kind since then, here and there, in Germany, and is now being carried out as a supplement to the Exposition at Paris, owes its origin to these concerts. Fétis's numerous compatriots, assembled in the Festival Hall, appeared, by the way, to be very much at home, for they manifested but little sympathy for the work of their prophet.

Mme. Harriers-Wippern sang the letter-air, as it is called in Germany, from Don Juan; the grand scene from Der Freischütz; and two songs: "In der Fremde," and "Der Vogel im Walde," by Taubert. Mme. Harriers is one of the first singers in Germany. Her voice possesses a truly magical charm, while her style is full of warmth without exaggeration, graceful without coquettishness, and brilliant without unbecoming boldness. An agreeable and noble feminine spirit permeates all she does. Her rendering of Agatha's air quite carried her hearers away—it was as gentle in the prayer, as fiery in the ecstasy of love. When she sang the "Vogel im Walde," some thought with Romeo, "It is the lark," while others asserted with Juliet, "It is the nightingale"—but it was really the combination of both, Mme. Harriers-Wippern, Royal Chamber-Singer, from Berlin.

In three songs by Schumann: "Waldesnacht," "Ich grille nicht," and "Die Frühlingsnacht," Niemann displayed the whole power of his tremendous organization. His rendering of "Ich grille nicht," more especially, quite electrified his hearers. As he stood before them, while the full, deep tones escaped from his breast, and all the agony of a broken heart burst forth from out each word, and the restrained reproach and the lament of the double misery of treason towards love penetrated, stronger and stronger, sharper and sharper, into the hearts of all those who were listening to him in breathless silence—the audience might well have fancied themselves transported from the concert room to the midst of a fearful tragedy, for which there is no solution save annihilation. "That is not merely song-singing," I heard some one remark. To speak the truth, I would most politely advise our young ladies and our sweet amateurs not to attempt any imitation of this style. But the standard of mere ordinary accomplishments, laudable as they are, must not be applied to any individuality so exceptionally gifted. The violence done us by artistic geniality is the only kind of violence we can accept with a thankful heart.

After Niemann had thus filled his audience with "delightful horror," Hill, who followed with one or two songs, was enabled to prove, most satisfactorily, that the sympathetically simple rendering of a pleasing romance can enchain the ear even after the strongest excitement. Niemann had been obliged to repeat his last two pieces—Hill added to his one by his nephew, Wilhelm Hill, which pleased universally, thanks to its agreeable melodic treatment.

With the word "Parto," Mlle. Bettelheim began her air—the more than well known air from Mozart's Tito. Was there a conscious allusion in this? I scarcely think it. Still so it is—she departs—Hymen snatches her from Apollo and the Muses, or, to express myself in homely German, she marries and retires from the stage, and it was in Aix-la-Chapelle that she appeared for the last time under the name by which she has made a name. However, it is as impossible for her to tear herself from music as from her own soul, and perhaps it is better for her talent and our art that henceforth she will sing only where she likes, and what she likes. I trust she will return very frequently to the Rhine, where she has made a regular razzia of hearts. The music she loves she will always find faithfully fostered here.

A pupil of the worthy Ferdinand David of Leipsic (whose violin class has become a regular nursery for great and little fiddlers), Herr August Wilhelm, of Wiesbaden, excited this evening, as on every other occasion, the greatest astonishment. Almost a mere youth (he is married, though!) every difficulty presented by the most difficult of all instruments has become mere child's play to him, or rather scarcely that. Any person might believe he was listening, calmly and patiently, though not perhaps without a certain spice of curiosity as to how the thing would go off, to some one who was using his arms and hands to play the violin. While the musicians at the furthest limits of the orchestra shake their heads, almost incredulously, at the passages of thirds, octaves, and tenths, at the infallible flag-olet tones, and, in a word, at the boldness and certainty of technical skill that has something fabulous about it, the young artist himself appears to take just as little interest in his own talent, as in the applause with which he is overwhelmed. But he is very wrong, for if he thinks nothing of the difficulties he overcomes, because they were never, perhaps, difficulties for him, the beautiful tones he lures from his violin should possess no less charm for him than for all of us. Or did not the pieces he played (a Concerto by Paganini, and "Ungarische Weisen" by Ernst) please him? Or was he thinking of Goethe's words: "You will never find a rhymester who does not consider himself better than every other, or a fiddler who does not prefer playing his own melodies?"—I do not know. Melodies of his own will come in time—and there are already so many beautiful ones that may be so beautifully played! At any rate, I take the liberty of saying a good word to Herr Wilhelm in favor of his talent. This deserves not only the applause of the public, but the particular and warmest sympathy of him on whom a kind fate bestowed it.

As is generally the case at our Musical Festivals, one of the finest choruses from the oratorio of the first day was repeated on the third. But this practice ought, once for all, to be abandoned, for it is something painful to remark how these pieces, torn from the context, transplanted to the midst of surroundings foreign to them, and sung by a weary and listless chorus, fail to produce their proper effect. After the "Vogel im Walde," one of Handel's choruses has a bad place. As we have borrowed their national anthem, we might as well imitate the example of the English, who end with it festivals like the present one—in the magnificent strains of "Heil dir in Siegerkranz," all excitement would find a satisfactory, nay, an elevating termination.

The practice of flinging flowers, which at some previous miscellaneous concerts was carried to such a pitch that anyone might have fancied himself transported to the midst of the Carnival at Rome, was on this occasion omitted. An undoubted step in advance! But the customary laurel wreath, cunningly smuggled in, for the conductor, was not wanting—it did not, however, set our good friend Rietz's temples in a glow, but fell round his shoulders. They are strong enough to bear it.

Shall I now speak of the joyous hours passed after the concerts in the rooms of the Liedertafel, the Refreshment Rooms, and the many other agreeable resorts in which Aix-la-Chapelle is so rich? Or of the supper, so fertile in toasts, offerred us after the last concert by the hospitable Committee? Such subjects are not included in the domain of "Musical Letters." I must however, alude to the good-natured, unclouded, festive tone that prevailed everywhere. It proved that—no; no more!

* "Musical Letters" by Ferdinand Hiller.

It was a beautiful Festival, and to all who contributed to render it such I hereby tender my warmest thanks.

A Visit to Franz Liszt at Rome.*

The building in which Liszt resides at Rome is of unpretending appearance; it is, and Fanny may have pictured such a place as Liszt's Sanseverino, a melancholy, plain little monastery. But, by its position, this quiet abode is so favored, that probably few homes in the wide world can be compared to it. Situate upon the old Via Sacra, it is the nearest neighbor of the Forum Romanum, while its windows look towards the Capitol, the ruins of the Palatine Palace, and the Colosseum. A life of contemplation—in such a site is forced upon one of its own accord. Why should not the change in the sentiments of a happy child of the world be connected with this profoundly serious world of ruins?

I mounted a few steps leading up to the open door of the monastery, and all at once grew uncertain what to do, for I saw before me a handsome staircase adorned with pillars, such as I should not have expected from the poor exterior of the building. Had not a notice in the form of a visiting-card over the large door at the top of the stairs met my eye, I should have considered it necessary to make further enquiries. As it was, however, I was able to gain from the card itself the information I needed. I approached and read: "L'Abbé Franz Liszt." So, really an Abbé. A visiting card half supplies the place of an autopsy.

After I had arranged my necktie and pulled on my gloves more tightly, I grasped courageously the green cord that was to summon the porter. Two servants, not in tail coats it is true, but clad in irreprouchable black, received me; one hastened to carry in my card, while the other helped me off with my top coat.

My ideas of a genuine monkish life suffered a rude shock. Wherefore two servants before the cell of a monk; or if attendant spirits, why were they not, according to monastic rule, simply lay brothers?

But I had not to trouble my brains long with these obtrusive questions, for I was immediately plunged into still greater mental confusion.

The messenger who had gone to announce me returned and ushered me in with a notification that the Signor Abbate requested me to wait a moment in—the drawing-room; yes, actually, a drawing-room, in the most elegant acceptation of the word. It wants nothing either of the requisites for northern comfort, or of the contrivances demanded by the climate of Rome, though glaring luxury appears scrupulously avoided.

I stood then in the saloon of the Commendatore Liszt! Abbé and Commander! The correct employment of the domestic titles rendered the first interview much more easy than it otherwise would have been.

I was by no means so inquisitorial in my survey as to be able to give a Walter-Scott-like description of Liszt's saloon. Darkness, moreover, prevailed in the large apartment, as, according to Italian usage and necessity, the window shutters were closed against the rays of the morning sun. I was attracted by the album table in the middle of the apartment more than by aught else. Upon it lay chiefly Italian works of a religious nature in votive bindings. That Liszt here, too, as Abbate, lives in the midst of creative spirits is proved by these dedicatory offerings.

The door was opened, and the well-known artistic figure advanced in a friendly manner towards me. That the skilful fingers of the great pianist pressed the hand of me, a simple writer, is a fact which, for the completeness of my narrative, must not remain unmentioned. The first and most immediate impression produced upon me by Liszt's appearance was that of surprising youthfulness. Even the unmistakably grizzled, though still thick, long flowing hair, which the scissors of the Tonsure have not dared to touch, detract but little from the heart-entrancing charm of his unusual individuality. Of fretfulness, satiety, monkish abnegation, and so on, there is not a trace to be detected in the features of Liszt's interesting and characteristic head. And just as little as we find Liszt in a monk's cell do we find him in a monk's cowl. The black soutane sits scarcely less elegantly on him than, in its time, the dress coat.

Those who look upon Liszt as a riddle will most decidedly not find the solution of it in his outward appearance.

After having interchanged a few words of greeting, we proceeded to the work-room. After compelling me to take an arm-chair, Liszt seated himself—apologizing to me by stating that he had a letter to despatch in a hurry—at the large writing-table. Upon this, too, lay a great many things more nearly pertaining to the Abbé than to the artist. But neatly written sheets of music showed that musical production formed part of the master's daily occupations. The comfortable room bore generally the unmistakable stamp of a room for study, of an artist's workshop.

The letter and the address were quickly finished and handed to the attendant to seal and transmit.

I mentioned the report connecting his approaching journey with the grand festival of joy and peace, the Coronation in Hungary. The popular maestro took this opportunity of giving me a detailed history of his Coronation Mass. He said that in the Prince-Primate Scitovsky he had possessed a most kind patron. In the course of a joyous repast, as on many other occasions, the Prelate had given lively and hopeful utterance to the wish of his heart that he might yet be able to place the crown upon the head of his beloved King, and, at the same time, he called upon Liszt, in an unusually flattering and cordial manner, to compose the Coronation Mass—but it must be short, very short, as the entire ceremony would take about six hours. Liszt was unable to resist this amiable request, he said, and, drinking a glass of fiery Tokay, gave a promise that he would endeavor to produce some "Essence of Tokay." After his return to Rome, he immediately set about the sketch. But the prospect of the desired agreement between the Emperor and the Hungarians had, meanwhile, become overcast, and his work remained as a mere sketch. Some months ago, however, he was pressed by his Hungarian friends to proceed, and so he finished the Mass. It was, however, a question whether it would be performed on the day of the Coronation, since there was a condition that the Monarch should bring his orchestra with him. Liszt said that he was perfectly neutral, and in no way wished to run counter to the just ambition of others—for, however the Abbé might be derided as ambitious, he added with a smile, he was not so after all.

In the course of this open-hearted statement, Liszt touched upon his relations to the present Prince-Primate of Hungary, and let fall a remark, which is the more interesting because it throws a light upon his position in and towards Rome. The Abbe-Maestro said, then, that he had entered on a correspondence regarding his retirement from the diocese of the Prince of the Church, who had in the interim been raised to the dignity of Primate, and had every reason to believe that he enjoyed the Prelate's favor. He needed, however, a special letter of dismissal in order to be received into the personal lists of the Roman clergy; to this, Liszt remarked, parenthetically, were limited all his clerical qualities.

I do not know more exactly what rights and duties are connected with this insertion of his name in the catalogue of the Romish clergy, though it appears that the nexus into which Liszt has entered towards the clerical world is rather an outward than a deep and inward one.

The cigar, which did not look, between the lips of the great musician, as if it had been treated with particular gentleness or care, had gone out. Liszt got up to reach the matches. While he was again lighting the narcotic weed, he directed my attention to the pretty statuette of St. Elizabeth, which had attracted my gaze when I entered the room. It represents the kind-hearted Landgravine at the moment the miracle of the roses is taking place on the love-gifts in her apron. It required no great power of combination to connect this graceful form, as an ovalation gift, with Liszt's oratorio of Elizabeth. The popular master named the German hand which had fashioned the marble and offered it to him. He was thus led to speak of his oratorio, and of the Wartburg Festival, for which it was originally intended, and at which, after Hungary had enjoyed the first performance, it would be performed a second time, most probably under the personal direction of the author. He spoke also of what he had done at the Grand-Ducal Court. I was peculiarly touched by his reminiscences, how "he had entered the service of a German prince," how he had "knocked about," for several years at Weimar, "without doing anything worth naming," how his Prince had respected and distinguished him, and had probably never suspected that a permanent sojourn could result from Liszt's trip to Rome, etc.

Here, where he moved in only a small circle—said Liszt, with marked emphasis, and again referring to the importance Rome possessed for him—here he found the long desired leisure for work. His Eliza- beth, he said, had here sprung into existence, and also his oratorio of Petrus, that was to be produced at the approaching grand centenary of St. Peter and St. Paul. He had, moreover, he remarked, notions which it would take him three years of thorough hard work to carry out.

He certainly knew, pursued the Abbé-Maestro, referring to his art-gospel, that, here and there, things, which in other places had met with some response, had been hissed, but he speculated as little on applause as he feared censure. He followed, he said, the path he considered the right one, and could boldly say that he had consistently pursued the direction he had once taken. The only rule he adopted in the production of his works, as far as he had full power, was that of not compromising his friends, or of exposing them to the disfavor of the public. Solely for this reason, he had thought it incumbent on him, for instance, to refuse to send a highly esteemed colleague the score of his Elizabeth, despite of two applications, etc.

I expressed to my friendly host my delight at his good health and vigor, prognosticating a long continuance of fruitful activity. "Oh, yes, I am quite satisfied with my state of health," answered the respected master, "though my legs will no longer render me their old service." At the same time, however, in an access of boisterous merriment, he gave the upper part of his right thigh so hard a slap that I could not consider his regret particularly serious.

Another of my remarks was directed to the incomparable site of his abode, which alone might make a middling poet produce great epic or elegiac poetry. "I live quietly and agreeably," was the reply, "both here and at Monte Mario, where there are a few rooms at my service with a splendid view over the city, the Tiber, and the hills," and, not to remain my debtor for the ocular proof of what he said, at least as far as regarded his town residence, he opened a window and gazed silently with me on the overpowering seriousness of the ruined site.

The amiable maestro then conducted me rapidly through two smaller rooms, one of which was his simple bed chamber, to a wooden outhouse with a small window, through which were to be seen the Colosseum, in all its gigantic proportions, and the triumphal arch of Constantine close by, overtopped by Mount Caelius now silent.

"A splendid balcony might be erected here," observed Liszt, "but—the poor Franciscan Monk has no money for such a purpose!"

Having returned to his study, I thought the time had arrived for bringing my first visit to a termination.

The thanks conveyed in my words on taking leave were warm and sincere.

I carried with me out of that quiet dwelling the conviction that in Liszt the true artist far outweighs the virtuoso and the monk, and that only such persons as formerly snobbishly shook their head because Winkelmann took service and found an asylum with a cardinal, can scoff and make small jokes on Liszt's cell and monkish cowl.

Music Abroad.

The London Operas.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The Telegraph of July 29 has the following review of the past season.

The last week has been the most active, and the last night the most brilliant, of the season that closed on Saturday. The theatre has been open every night of the last week, and five different operas have been played. On Monday "L'Africaine" was given, on Wednesday "Don Carlos," and on Friday "Faust." Mlle. Lucca in each case appearing as the heroine. On Thursday "Don Giovanni" was performed, while "Romeo and Juliet" was repeated on Tuesday and Saturday. The house was crowded on this last night of the season, not a place in any part of the theatre being vacant. The performance was in every respect more finished and admirable than on the first night of the production of the opera; Signor Mario was in rather better voice and he knew a little more of his part. He also looked even handsomer than heretofore, and acted with remarkable vivacity and power. Is it not a disgrace to all the other tenors of the day that they cannot, whatever their youth, tread the stage with the easy elegance of this veteran, and, like him, always rise to the histrionic requirements of the character impersonated? Whether Signor Mario simulates the assumed intoxication of Count Almaviva or depicts the feelings of Raoul, divided between the promptings of love and the dictates of honor, he is always emphatically a gentleman in bearing and demeanor. But the grace which is natural to him does not prevent his seizing on a dramatic situation and presenting it in the most forcible light. Again, there is no man on the lyric stage who can articulate like him. The words escape his lips without effort, and every syllable falls distinctly upon the ear in the most distant corner of the theatre. And when he sings in tune his phrasing has a peculiar charm of its own. At the same time it is indispensable that a singer should sing the music set down for him. And this Signor Mario in the new opera fails to do. It is scarcely too much to say that Gounod's Romeo has not been heard at all by those who know the work only by hearing it at Covent Garden. This is so serious an injustice to the composer, that not all Signor Mario's incomparable qualities can atone for it. We regret to hear that he is engaged for the coming season at St. Petersburg. His voice is already beyond his control. What will it be after a Russian winter? Signor Cotogni, the Mercutio of the east, has not yet learnt to make any effect with the Queen Mab song; but M. Petit, though still not nearly so admirable as M. Troy, is more at home in the music of old Capulet. Mlle. Nau's little voice is ridiculously out of place in Covent Garden, and Signor Bagagiolo, though he sings well, and has a magnificent resonant organ, is a little too emphatic, both for our ideal of Frair Laurence and for the music which is put into his mouth. When he consoles, it is with the air of a priest who is anathematizing the human race. In all these minor parts, as well as in the execution of the choruses, we miss the delicate beauties of light and shade which lent so infinite a charm to the performance of the opera at the Theatre Lyrique. This defect is chiefly owing, doubtless, to the want of the composer's personal supervision at rehearsals. And if he came, his mere presence would be ineffectual unless he had the power to insist on his suggestions being adapted. In that case, again, there would be little hope of an opera first produced in Paris on the 27th of April being brought out here on the 11th of July, so we are scarcely justified in calling attention to one side only of the picture. And if the general musical performance is inferior here, there are two points in which the Covent garden representation is infinitely superior—the mise-en-scène and the Juliet. It is not merely that the scenery is admirably painted, the costumes sumptuous, and both completely new, but there is an amount of intelligence displayed in the effective and natural building up of the scenes, in the designing of the dresses, in the harmonizing of the colors, and in the arrangement of the individuals and groups employed upon the stage, the like of which we have never witnessed in any other theatre; and for that merit our English establishment may in this case claim the entire credit. In "Don Carlos," as in "L'Africaine," the French scenes and dresses were simply copied; but the originality displayed in "Romeo" is infinitely more attractive. Of Mlle. Patti's Juliet it would be impossible to speak in too high terms. Just as when she first assumed the part of Gretchen she surpassed all other representatives of the character, so now she has in Juliet surpassed not merely Mme. Carvalho, the creator of the rôle, but herself. Of a truth, in no previous part have the manifold talents of the lady been so conspicuously manifested. With the insight of genius she seems to have looked through Gounod into Shakespeare, to have discerned the depths of the poet through the shallow medium of the musician, and to have reproduced in song the very Juliet of our dreams, the young Italian maiden, all passion and all constancy, whose image has never, in our generation at least, found realization on the stage. It is not merely that Mlle. Patti, with her limitless command of her powers, can infuse into every phase of her part the utmost possible expression, but she enters so thoroughly into the spirit of the music, and into the business of the scene, that every nuance of feeling indicated by the orchestra finds a reflex in her face. We do not speak specially of her singing, because it would be a waste of time to find fresh words of eulogy, nor does it imply much praise to record that the vocal valse "Ah! je veux vivre" was encored, seeing that the same compliment was paid to the commonplace and unbeautiful quartet of the third act. At the conclusion of the opera, Mlle. Patti sang the first verse of the National Hymn, the second being given by female voices, and the third by full chorus, and with this orthodox exhibition of loyalty, the green curtain fell upon the operatic season of 1867.

* From Herr Karl Birkenhüll's Federzeichnungen aus Rom. (Translated for the London Musical World.)

Between the 2nd of April and the 27th of July there have been 76 performances, but only 15 different operas have been played. The most popular has been "Faust," which has been repeated eleven times. Next in demand have been the new operas "Don Carlos" and "Romeo," each of which, as well as "L'Africaine," the last accession before these, has been played seven times. "Il Barbiere," "Fra Diavolo," and "Don Giovanni" have each been given six times, and all the rest less often. So that Gou-nod still remains the most popular composer at Covent Garden, and Verdi, if we may judge from the significant fact that no opera of his save, "Don Carlos" and "Un Ballo" has been given, is waning in public favor. The great and distinguishing feature of Mr. Gye's opening prospectus was the announcement of two untried operas, one of which was at that time unperformed, and the manager merits great praise for the determination which he has shown in keeping faith with his subscribers. But the necessary rehearsals have, we fear, had the result of restricting the repertoire within unusually narrow limits. Thus we have not heard "L'Étoile du Nord," in which Mlle. Patti was to have resumed the part of Catterina, which she sustained last year, nor has she appeared, according to promise, as Elvira in "Puritani," nor has "La Gazza Lutra," in which she used to play Minetta so charmingly, been restored to the stage. For the first time, too, since Mlle. Lucca made her début here, has she failed to appear in "Les Huguenots," the opera in which the little lady with the large voice first surprised and delighted an English audience. "Lucrezia Borgia," in which Mme. Vilda failed to increase her suddenly-acquired reputation of last year, has not been repeated, although announced; but little as we deplore this omission, we regret still less "Fidelio," a character to which the German lady must, with all due respect be it said, personally, at least, be singularly ill suited. But it is a great pity that a season should pass by at Covent Garden without a single performance of either "Guillaume Tell," "Le Prophète," or "Robert le Diable," merely for want of a tenore robusto. From counting up the omissions turn we, however, to the pleasanter task of referring, in the briefest terms, to what has been actually performed.

Madame Vilda opened the season on the 2nd of April with "Norma." Her voice was found to be as naturally magnificent, or nearly so, as when she astonished the habitués of Covent-garden last year; but there was a provoking absence of improvement both in her singing and acting that angred badly for her future. Norma was most admirably supported by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington—a highly-accomplished singer and sound musician, whose co-operation has throughout the season proved invaluable. She has appeared as the Countess in "Le Nozze di Figaro," as Elvira in "Masaniello," and as Inez in "L'Africaine," besides on some occasions doing duty for Mlle. Lucca in "Don Carlos;" and in every character the remarkable excellence of her singing has been universally recognized. Norma was only repeated three times, and Mme. Vilda has not appeared in any other character. On the second night Mlle. Lucca made her rentrée as Margherita in "Faust," and she has sung uninterruptedly throughout the season until the last night but one. There was much improvement perceptible in her singing in such operas as "Faust" and "L'Africaine," but she still lacks the vocal facility to do justice to music like that of "Fra Diavolo" and "La Favorita," while her treatment of Mozart in "Le Nozze di Figaro" is not beyond caviil. But there is a daring sauciness and a pretty winsomeness of manner about the clever, self-possessed little lady, which beats down all protest and laughs away all reproach. Her bright impudence in the darling costume of the page Cherubino and the suggestive naïvete of her acting in the bed-room scene of "Fra Diavolo" would alone suffice to attract all London to the theatre. But in the new part of the Queen in "Don Carlos," the new opera of Verdi, first produced on the 4th June, Mlle. Lucca proved again that she has tragic as well as comic powers, and if the music lay within her grasp, Elizabetha would be as effective a character as Gretchen. In "L'Africaine" a Signor Cotogni made his début as Nelusko. He has since tried his strength as Figaro in "Il Barbiere," and as Don Giovanni, but although he has a capital voice, considerable facility, and an apparently unlimited amount of self-confidence, he has failed to make good his claim to be considered a fair substitute for M. Faure. A M. Petit, who came out as Mephistophiles, his original character, has, in "Don Carlos" and "Romeo," sustained important parts with more success, and Signor Bagagiolo's noble bass voice we have already referred to above. For the same reason we need say no more about Signor Mario, who has appeared in "Faust," "Un Ballo," and "Don Giovanni," as well as in "Romeo and Juliet." Signor Naudin has proved serviceable in "L'Africaine" and "Don Carlos," but his voice has become more unsympathetic than ever, and he is not very superior to Signori Neri-Baraldi, Fancelli, and Marino, the secondi tenori of the troupe. Mr. Gye is sadly in want of a good tenor and a capable contralto. Mlle. Morensi, in spite of her fine voice and person, being quite unfit to undertake all the duties that devolve upon her. Mme. Frisci, who came out in "Un Ballo," made considerable impression by her dashing singing of the Princess Ebohl's songs in "Don Carlos," and resumed with success her character of Anna in "Don Giovanni." In Signor Graziari Covent Garden has the most lusciously beautiful baritone of the day; and if the singer and actor were at all comparable to the voice, every new character would be a new success. Signor Graziari found in "Don Carlos" a character, Don Rodrigo, whose music lay charmingly for his means, and to him, therefore, fell the lion's share of the applause. Of Mlle. Patti we need only say that, besides Juliet, she has appeared in "La Sonnambula," "Lucia," and "Il Barbiere," her rentrée in the latter opera on the 4th of May being the first great night of the season. The other exceptionally brilliant nights were on the 11th of July, when "Romeo" was produced, and the 15th, when the Sultan came in state to witness "Masaniello."

(From the Telegraph, Aug. 3.)

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On reference to the grandiloquent prospectus issued by Mr. Mapleson in April last, we are struck by the number of promises not performed. It was by the revival of grand masterpieces, which the lethargy of his predecessors had suffered to fall into comparative oblivion, that the present impresario restored in great measure the prestige which the old house formerly possessed. . . . By following out this plan he could eventually convert Her Majesty's Theatre into a temple for the celebration of music—a holy place to which connoisseurs would make pilgrimages, not only from all districts of London, but from all parts of Europe. That we are not imagining impossibilities we can prove by adducing the revival of "Medea" two years ago, when several of the descendants of Cherubini travelled long distances on purpose to be present at an event which they regarded as of the greatest importance. "Medea," a work but rarely given in Germany, even in the best directed theatres, was the great operatic event of 1865, and it was worthily followed up last year by "Il Seraglio," and "Iphigenie en Tauride." It was ominous, we thought, that in the voluminous prospectus of the season just closed, neither Mozart's lively comedy nor Gluck's somber tragedy was included, but en revanche many other interesting revivals were promised. Spontini's "Vestale," already announced for the preceding year, was again positively advertised, even the cast being given; "La Donna del Lago" was for the second time held out for our expectation; and "Guillaume Tell" was to be given for the first time in its integrity. . . .

Mr. Mapleson seems to have imagined that Verdi would please better than Spontini or Gluck, so both the operas by the composer of young Italy promised in the prospectus have been produced—and both have failed. "I Lombardi," brought out on the second night of the season, was practically a novelty. It had been suffered to sleep for fifteen years, and when it was roused it woke to find itself, like Rip Van Winkle, in the midst of a new generation that knew it not. They laughed at its long beard, and scoffed at the pain in its "elle-bow." They wished that the Lombards had never gone to the "first crusade," or, having gone to Jericho, that they had remained there. The opera-goers of 1867 care nothing about the semi-religious, semi-incestuous story that occupied the attention of the enslaved young Italy of 1840; and they have heard too much high-class music to listen with patience to the noisy tunes that were written for the amusement of the hour. "La Fozza del destino," a better opera, fared even worse. Brought out on Saturday the 22nd of June, in the very height of the season, and received on the first night by a crowded house, with every sign of enthusiastic delight, it drew but a scant audience on the second, and a third performance closed its brief career. . . .

Altogether, there have been only fifty-four representations, in the course of which eighteen operas have been played. In almost all of them Mlle. Tietjens has taken the principal part, still maintaining her supremacy among the lyric actresses of the day. In the "Nozze di Figaro," which opened the season, and in the "Troratore," which closed it, she was equally admirable, and between these two extremes she has sung in music of every school. In the ultra-Italian style of "I Lombardi" and "La Forza;" in the dramatic and essentially French music, albeit a German wrote it, "Huguenots;" in the thoroughly Teutonic and national works of Weber, "Der Freischütz" and "Oberon;" and in the grandest of all operas of any and every nation, "Fidelio;" Mlle. Tietjens has been alike capable and alike earnest. In undertaking the character of Pamina, subordinate in attractiveness perhaps to that of the Queen of Night, in "Die Zauberflöte," she not only added a remarkably well-fitting part to her repertoire, but showed a spirit which might be imitated to advantage by other singers. But "Medea" still remains her grandest impersonation, and, as we remarked on Friday last, in noticing its performance, it is much to be regretted that the opera was only given once, and then on one of the cheap nights, instead of during the regular season. Mlle. Tietjens has had no rival in her special line except a Mlle. Giacomini, a good singer, but with a voice, alas! by no means fresh, who appeared three times as Lucrezia Borgia, but in no other character. In this opera Mlle. Trebelli made her rebuté for the season, singing the tuneful music of Maffio Orsini as it has never been sung since "Albani the Great." A voice of luscious quality Mme. Trebelli uses with the most consummate skill, always being equal to any music, however difficult, and always ready to undertake any part, however small. Although she is the best Arsace, without any exception whatever, who has trod the stage in our generation, "Semiramide" has never once been given, nor has she had any very prominent part to fill. Mme. Trebelli's best characters have been Fatima, whose songs she sings delightfully in "Oberon," and Preziosilla in "La Forza;" but she deserves special praise for again appearing as one of the three Damigelle in "Flauto Magico," in which opera it is her lot always to sing in company with the two most discordant voices that ever tormented human ears. Mme. Demerle-Lablaeche has had considerable experience of the stage, and, in the absence of Mme. Trebelli, has been of use to the management. In tenors the company has been very rich. The most highly gifted and the most popular has been Signor Mongini, who has been present all the season, and who has taken part in almost every opera. He has, beyond all comparison, the finest tenor voice in Europe, splendidly full and round in tone, and perfectly equal in power. Throughout its extensive compass the voice is capable of obeying every bidding of its fortunate possessor. Signor Mongini, too, has a warm, passionate style of singing and much dramatic feeling. Unfortunately, he is frequently carried away by his emotion, and forces a voice that needs no forcing. If he would but moderate his energy he would be the finest male singer of the time. He surprised all his admirers last Tuesday by the sobriety of his declamation in "Medea," but "Il Trovatore" is still the opera in which he appears to most advantage. He has found a tolerably efficient aide in Signor Tasea, who may be described by the old formula Vox et præterea nihil. Mr. Hohler has manifested his good nature by undertaking subordinate parts, and replacing at short notice other singers. But he does not study sufficiently to do justice to his voice, the sweet quality of which excites expectations that are too seldom gratified. The most accomplished of the tenors engaged, and also the most useful, has been Signor Gardoni, whose co-operation in such operas as "Il Flauto Magico" and "Faust" has been of the utmost value. Mr. Sautley's repertoire is as large as that of Mlle. Tietjens and Signor Mongini, while he is infinitely more artistic than the gentleman with whom we have coupled him; and he is as ready as Mme. Trebelli to accept any part, however small. Thus he gives new force to the comparatively slight character of Nevers in "Les Huguenots;" undertakes buffo parts, such as Leporello and Papageno; sings the arduous music of Pizarro in "Fidelio" with a power that has not been rivalled of late years, and enacts Creon in "Medea," the ideal of a classic tyrannos, with sustained dignity and magnificent effect. No style is strange to him, and he is invariably as perfect in his part as though he had been singing nothing else all the season. If Signor Gassier's voice is not comparable to that of our English baritone, he at least is equally capable and ready, while Signor Foli, a young basso, promises to attain a high position on the stage; and Signor Bossi is most satisfactory in parts of secondary importance. A word of praise must be spared for Mr. Lyall, who has displayed much talent in many subordinate tenor parts, while Herr Rokitansky's noble voice has been heard in several which but for him would have been impracticable. Besides Sarastro, in "Il Flauto Magico," Il Commendatore, in "Don Giovanni," &c., he has, for the first time, impersonated Falstaff in Nicolai's "Lustige Weiber von Windsor," and has been, in every respect, a great improvement on his predecessor, Signor Junea. Signor Pandolfini may be dismissed without regret, and the secondo donna; Mlle. Bauermeister, who has a fresh, pleasant voice, is the only one who need be particularly mentioned.

But all these artistes, most excellent as the majority of them are, would not, it is to be feared, have saved the season, had not a young prima donna, with a lovely voice, great cultivation, a most prepossessing appearance, and with the distinction of manner which we instinctively associate with high breeding, arrived upon the scene, and saved the fortunes of the house. Although Mlle. Nilsson made her debut in "La Traviata," an opera which is eminently distasteful to many, and which was used up by the little lady, who first brought it to this country, the success of the fair Swedish singer was from the first evening assured. It was at once perceived that there was some trifling French blemishes in her manner of singing, and that she had not much dramatic intensity, but nevertheless, the charming quality of her voice, the perfection of her vocalization, and the charm of her manner, instantly seized the popular taste, and she maintained the advantage thus easily gained until the very end of the season. In Margareta and Donna Elvira she did not enhance her reputation; but she sang the two grand airs of the Queen of Night in "Die Zauberflöte" in admirable style, and found in "Martha" the character best adapted for the favorable display of all her personal and acquired gifts. Mr. Mapleson is, indeed, fortunate. Two years ago he suddenly secured the presence of Mlle. Irma de Murska, an erratic singer, who, for some strange reason, drew crowds to his house; and he has now replaced her by another soprano sfogato of vastly greater merit.

Without the hearty co-operation of an experienced, cultivated, and indefatigable musician like Signor Arditi, such performances as those of "Fidelio" and "Medea" would have been simply impossible. He drilled the orchestra into a state of great proficiency, while the chorus is the best that has been heard on any London stage in our recollection.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC. At the concert recently held under Herr Otto Goldschmidt's direction, the programme consisted chiefly of the MS. works of the pupils, among them being an overture in C major by Mr. Alwyn, a pianoforte sonata by Master Shakespeare, who played the first movement of it, and several vocal pieces. The prizes were distributed by Lady Wilton, and the Earl of Wilton gave a well-deserved meed of praise to Dr. Bennett and Herr Goldschmidt, for the energetic way in which they have presided over the Academy.

Paris.

PARIS CONSERVATOIRE. A writer in the France Musicale, writing on the recent examination for the annual prizes at the Paris Music School, remarks on the small proportion of pupils with tenor voices. This year there were a dozen baritones and basses, but only three or four tenors. Two of the former, MM. Maurel and Gaillard, gained the first prizes for singing. Among the tenors M. Victor, who only received an accessit, is said by the writer to have a very pure and delicious voice, giving great promise for the future. The young ladies' voices are described as being even better than usual, Mlle. Brunet-Lafleur taking the first prize. In the pianoforte classes the jury had to choose from fifty-four candidates—eighteen gentlemen and thirty-six young ladies. Among both sexes the excellence was so great that they adjudged three first prizes to the gentlemen, MM. Corbaz, Rerthemel, and Rambourg, and five to the ladies, Mlles. Wilden, Krazinska, Muller, Ceyrét and Lacroix. In the Opera Comique the sterner sex again were outnumbered, in fact this undue preponderance of ladies seems to be the case in nearly all the classes. The pieces selected for performance by each of the pianoforte students were Hiller's concerto in F minor, for the ladies, and Chopin's second concerto, in the same key, for the gentlemen. Of the successful candidates M. Gaillard and Mlle. Derasse are to go to the Opera Comique, and M. Maurel to the Grand Opera House.

THE PARIS SCHOOL OF SACRED MUSIC held its anniversary on the 26th ult., when a diploma of "Chapel Master," awarded by the Government, was given to one of the pupils. The vocal music performed was selected from the works of the great masters of the 15th, 16th and 17th centuries, and the pianoforte students played two of Beethoven's concertos.

MUSICAL PRIZES. An announcement has just been made by the Minister of Fine Arts, at Paris, which has considerable interest for French composers and indirectly for English musicians, as we may hope that our own Government will, in time, be induced to hold out similar encouragement to the profession. It has, we understand, been decided to offer three prizes in the course of next year, open only to Frenchmen. The first, in connection with the Imperial Opera house will consist of a double prize, one for a poem in three acts, and the other for its musical setting, which will be represented at the Opera. The second, in connection with the Opera Comique, will be a prize for the best setting of a comic opera in three acts, the libretto to be chosen by the director; and the third, under the auspices of the Theatre Lyrique, will be a prize for the best opera, the choice of libretto, and of the form, being left to the candidates. Each of the prize works will be performed within twelve months from the date of adjudication at the respective theatres, the directors of which will give a portion of the prize money—Choir.

M. Offenbach's new work, Robinson Crusoe, will be performed at the Opera-Comique towards the end of September.

The intended series of "Historical Concerts" at the Paris Exhibition will not be given, owing to a disagreement between the Musical Committee and the Imperial Commission.

Mlle. Nilsson is to sing in a new opera, "Les Bleuetts," by M. Cohen, before she goes to the Grand Opera to take the part of Ophelia in the "Hamlet" of M. A. Thomas.

The boarding which encases the facade of the Grand Opera, Paris, was to fall on the 15th inst. The crowning in bronze of the building has been transported from the Champ-de-Mars, where it was exposed; the busts of composers had been placed in their niches; and on the brown marble could now be read the following names in letters of gold: Monteverde, Durante, Jomelli, Monsigny, Grétry, Sacchini, Lesueur, Beaton, Boieldieu, Herold, Donizetti, Verdi, Paisiello, Piccini, Philidor, Rousseau, Campora, Cambert, Adam, Bellini, Weber, Nicolo, Méhul, Cherubini. These are only a tithe of the names to be afterwards added. By the way, La France Musicale is scornful of all the other Parisian papers for misspelling the names in the foregoing list. "Instead of Boieldieu," says La France, "they have put put Boieldien, with a trema on the first i; from Piccini they have taken away an n; lastly, instead of Paisiello, they have written Paistello!" The last fault is perpetuated on the stone itself, whence the names are simply copied. As for Piccini's name, La France's correction recalls the optional orthography of Mr. Weller. But while La France is so particular about putting everything down "with a Wee," how comes he to overlook Cherubini with an acute accent?—Athenæum.

WIESBADEN. The Athenæum has the following from one generally cautious on the subject of German music:

Herr Reinecke's opera, "König Manfred," was produced at Wiesbaden the night before last (July the 26th), with most complete and genuine success. It is, indeed, a very fine work, and quite surprised me. I had not the least expectation that he would put forth anything like the dramatic power which his opera evinces. It is a great five-act tragedy, with ballet, &c. Much of the recitative is accompanied after the modern fashion, but admirably accompanied, and for the most part well expressed. The choruses and aria's are vigorous and effective. There is no lack of graceful melody, well written for the voices. The orchestra is admirably treated throughout. The prelude to the fifth act, for stringed instruments only, con sordini, is exquisitely beautiful, and was encored with enthusiasm. On the whole, I have heard very few productions of dramatic music within the last ten years that have given me anything like the pleasure and satisfaction of "König Manfred."

FLORENCE. The People's Concerts at the Pagliano Theatre have met with a degree of success surpassing all expectations. They were established on the 17th May last. The orchestra, under the direction of the Cavaliere Mabellini, consists of a hundred picked musicians. Among the works that have pleased most have been Beethoven's Septet, and C minor Symphony; Mendelssohn's overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream; the Tannhäuser march; Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata; and Meyerbeer's overture to Straniero.

LISA'S Oratorio, Christ, was executed at Rome on the 6th ult., in the "Hall of Dante."

The Italian musical journals announce that Signor Federico Ricci is engaged on a new opera Luigia, which is, probably, to be entitled "Don Chisehotie e Sanzio Pandia,"—that Signora Doria has been singing in "Lucia," at the San Carlo, Naples, with Signor Castelli, a tenor from whom much may be expected—that Signor Miceli has received a commission to write an opera on the taking story of "Belshazzar's Feast,"—that Signor Schira is at work on a five-act opera, entitled "Lea," and that Signor Boccolini is to be looked to as a rising baritone.

WEIMAR. The operatic season is over, and the artists are reposing from their labors. The holidays of the orchestra, however, have not been of long duration, for the members of that body were ordered to co-operate at the Meiningen Musical Festival, and they have, also, to perform at the Wartburg Jubilee, when the Abbe Franz Liszt's Elizabeth will be executed, under the personal direction of the composer. The only novelty in the way of opera lately was M. Aimé Maillart's romantic opera of Lara. It was not particularly successful, and is not likely to hold a permanent place in the repertory. There were grand doings, on the 2nd June, to celebrate the "Golden Jubilee," as it is termed, of Professor Johann Gottlob Töpfer's official career. This celebrated writer on the theory of the organ, and famous organist, was born on the 4th December, 1791, at Niederosla, near Weimar. The King of Prussia, Wilhelm I. conferred upon him the Order of the Crown; Queen Augusta of Prussia, a former pupil of his, made a valuable present to the Töpfer-Fund, established for assisting poor and talented Seminarists in Weimar and Eisenach to pursue their studies on the organ; the Grand-Duchess Sophie of Weimar consented to become the patroness of the Fund, and promised a considerable yearly addition to it; his Royal Highness the Grand-Duke, Carl Alexander, presented with his own hand the Knight's Cross, first division, of the Weimar Order of the Falcon to the respected hero of the Festival; the corporation of Weimar presented him with the freedom of their city; the church authorities raised his salary as organist; and the University of Jena bestowed the honorary diploma of Doctor on him for his having been the first to propound a scientific theory on organ building. The various teachers in the Duchy offered him a magnificent Album, containing an account of all the principal forms of the organ. They made him, also, a valuable present. Herr Kühn, a bookseller, gave him a similar work, only of smaller dimensions. At the ceremony in the Seminary, Herr Mohnhaupt delivered a most successful speech in honor of the veteran musician, while the teachers and pupils offered him a number of handsome presents. At a grand repast that took place afterwards, Herr Töpfer was almost overwhelmed by an avalanche of complimentary toasts. The proceedings were brought to a close, the next day, by a grand concert of sacred music, under the direction of Herr Müller-Hartung. It was expected that Herr Töpfer would have delighted his hearers by extemporizing, for he is noted as an extempore performer, but contented himself with playing the organ part in his cantata, Die Orgelweihe. The choruses were brilliantly sung by the members of the Singacademie, who gave, also, Liszt's "Vater-unsere," and Christopher Buch's Motet, "Ich lasse dich nicht." The solos were confided to Mme. Wetzig-Weissenborn, Dr. Dittenberger, Herren Zech and Thiene. The last-named gentleman sang, moreover, Mendelssohn's air, "So ihr mich von Herzen sucht." The organ part in Liszt's "Vaterunsere," as well as in the immortal "Hallelujah" from Handel's Messiah, which Herr Töpfer had arranged for a chorus of male voices and concertante organ, was played by Herr Gottschalg, who performed, in addition, Herr Töpfer's most difficult organ composition, an unpublished Concert Fantasia on the choral, "Mache dich, mein Geist, bereit." Herr Werner, another pupil of Herr Töpfer's, performed the Concert-Fantasia, highly interesting from a contrapuntal point of view, "Was mein Gott will g'scheh allzeit."

MEININGEN. At the approaching "Tonkünstler-versammlung," or Meeting of Musical Artists, the works performed will be: "Was man auf den Bergen hört," Liszt; Symphony, Lassen; Symphony, R. Hol (conductor at Utrecht); Overture, E. Büchner; "Nirvana," Hans von Bülow; Overture to Timon of Athens, E. von Mihalovich (Pesth); Trio for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello, F. Präger; the 23rd Psalm, "Die Seligkeiten," and "Die Drei Zigeuner," Liszt; "Sappho," vocal scena, R. Volkman; Violin Concerto, Damrosch; Pianoforte Concerto, with Orchestra, F. Kiel; Duet for Soprano and Tenor from the opera, König Sigurd, and ballad; "Helge's Treue," Dräcke; Duet for two Pianofortes, A. Deprosse; Duets, Cornelius; Songs, Damrosch and Lassen; in the way of older works, there will be compositions by Méhul, Beethoven, Seb. Bach, Berlioz, Schumann; while the sacred music will be contributed by Palestrina, Clari, Fabio, Perez, Seb. Bach, and Pratorius. The artists engaged are Mlles. Emilie Wigand, Clara Martini, Spohr, Emmy Heinz; Herren Damrosch, Sgambati, Von Müde, Lassen, Kömpel, F. Grützmaier, Hohl dampf, Fessler, Ellers, Richter, Deprosse, and Seidel.

ZÜRICH. The grand Festival of the Confederation has gone off most brilliantly. It was under the direction of Herr Hegar. The soloists were Mlles. Borchard, and Wagner, Herren Stockhausen, Schneider, and Jean Becker. The programme included among other works, Bach's "Magnificat," Bruch's scenes from the Frühjohf Saga; Handel's Judas Macabehus; overture to Beethoven's Leonore; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; Schubert's Symphony in C major; Sonata by Rust; scenes from Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis; and songs by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Kirchner.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 31, 1867.

OUR MUSIC PAGES. With the last number the "Saint Paul" of Mendelssohn (Vocal and Piano Score) was completed. Having run so long upon great choral works, we now propose to alternate and give something for our piano-playing readers. Accordingly we commence to-day the publication of MENDELSSOHN'S "SONGS WITHOUT WORDS" (Lieder ohne Worte), and mean to continue the same, four pages at a time, throughout the Seven Sets of six Songs each.

Bach's Sacred Works.—His Magnificat described by Robert Franz.

Unquestionably the world is slow to seek or desire acquaintance with Sebastian Bach. That fugues played on full organ, with so little of marked accent in the entering of the parts, should not be clear to many, is not strange. But even our miscellaneous audiences have owned the power and beauty of some of his violin pieces rendered by a master hand; and now and then a sacred Aria, sung with style and feeling, has reached the general heart almost. We know too by report of the deep impression which his Passion music and great Mass in B minor have produced wherever they have been performed in Germany, and even in London. Here they have been scarcely called for. There is among us, it is undeniable, a certain dread of Bach; his entrance in a concert room is shrunk from, and the very name a bugbear; though a very considerable minority even here are getting rather deeply smitten with the love of him.

We verily believe that this avoidance is not founded in any intrinsic lack of truly human, interesting qualities in Bach's music; for those who know him know that there is no Art so sincere, so full of heartfelt piety, so sound and wholesome, so winning on acquaintance, as this Art of his, which so few learn to read. We verily believe that it is owing to the whole direction of our past musical education, which has pampered us with what is highly-colored, highly spiced, sensational, and not formed in us either the physical (by the ear), the mental or the moral habit of perception for this complex, seemingly impassive polyphonic style of writing. We need to be prepared for it; not necessarily by scientific study, but by beginning with the most appreciable, a little at a time, say a few four-part Chorals, and so gradually bringing our hearts into rapport with the style and spirit. It was even so in Germany, until Mendelssohn brought out the Passionsmusik.

We scarcely dare to hope that any of our Societies or musical educators (it is of no use to speak of "managers") will seriously undertake a Bach Oratorio or Cantata yet awhile. And yet we know the subject has been mooted in our Handel and Haydn Society, and earnestly by some of them in view of their triennial Festival of next May. Of course such music is not "popular," and perhaps never will be. But a great musical Society, with an avowed educational motive, and not merely one of pleasurable excitement or pecuniary gain, ought not to consult the popular pulse alone in all it does. It should do some things not because they will be popular, but because they are good, because it is well to know them. If they speak only to a portion of the public, to a few, so surely as they deeply interest and quicken them, so surely as they plant seeds there, they do really influence the whole culture of the time. If we went solely by popularity, no great master work of poet, artist or musician ever would be brought out or known except in studies or by hearsay. A musical Society should address some part of its season's programme (it need not be the largest) to the more advanced taste or even curiosity of its audience. A great Festival is a fit time for such an experiment. We do not know whether our old Society will have the courage to look Bach in the face; but it is something even to have begun to moot the question. Meanwhile, to keep the thought in that direction, we for our part here undertake the modest task of translating what ROBERT FRANZ has written about one of the shorter (that is, compared to the Passion) and perhaps more practicable of Bach's great sacred works, the Magnificat in D.

Although it cannot be denied that the interest in Bach's vocal works has increased of late years (i.e. in Europe), still, compared to the real worth of these artistic creations, this interest must be counted as but feeble and occasional. The reasons may lie partly in the technical difficulties here to be overcome; partly in the sketch-like form in which Bach has left these works to posterity; partly,—and this must be emphasized especially—in the somewhat pretentious habit of the public of to-day of estimating musical achievements mainly with reference to the immediate sensuous enjoyment they afford. The notion, that what cannot be "understood" at once must be deemed unsatisfactory and a failure, contrary to the nature of true Art, is unfortunately so wide-spread, and seemingly justified in thousands of instances, that one can scarcely wonder at the little sympathy with works, which are only to be comprehended and brought home to us by the most earnest and even self-denying devotion. Nobody is willing, on his own part, to carry anything to Art; he would simply be the passive recipient of pleasure and diversion from Art. Add to this now, that musical journalism has kept itself as good as altogether silent in regard to Bach's Church compositions generally, with the exception perhaps of the Matthew Passion and the B-minor Mass: that hardly one of the master's numberless productions in that kind has been the subject of an exhaustive discussion, such as would call the attention of larger circles to it, and the want of interest to which we have alluded has indeed a certain justification. Every one thinks he may take it for granted: "That which the Art criticism of to-day leaves so wholly unconsidered, cannot possibly answer the true wants of the present; we do better therefore to leave the interest in Bach's vocal works to the so-called 'connoisseurs and scholars;' the old gentleman no doubt has written them principally for them—they may be edified in them to their hearts' content!"

It is not our purpose to analyze the reasons of this peculiar attitude of criticism toward these works; it is enough to say that hitherto the public has been altogether destitute of the necessary instruction, whose mediating and adjusting influences would soon enough appear. We gladly resign ourselves to the hope, that there will at last be found those called to such a task, to pay an old and heavy debt to the great dead, and thereby introduce into our future culture elements, which surely will be rich in blessed influences.

Little as we can see the calling and capacity in us for meeting the evil as it should be met, still we hold it our duty to direct public attention to a work, which heretofore has waited in vain for the pen which should lay it warily to men's hearts.

True, there has been a rumor now for some time of its existence, and it has even been spoken of with great respect—but not on that account has it become one iota better known. As formerly the B-minor Mass passed for one of the most profound and grand of Bach's achievements, and yet, for all that, its quiet dream life could keep on in the Score all undisturbed, just so for years there ran a vague report of a celebrated Magnificent of the master. Perhaps here too that incomprehensible instinct may have reigned, which so mysteriously draws the human mind toward what is significant, and gradually prepares it for the understanding thereof.

Bach's Magnificent is one of the few among his Church compositions, which lay before the world in print before the editions of the Bach Society. W. Rust tells us (in his excellent preface to the first book of the 11th annual issue of Sebastian Bach's Works), that it had already appeared in score in the year 1811 (Simrock, publisher). To be sure, this edition differs from that of the Bach Society in not unessential points. It shows a different key, E flat major, instead of D major, and has none of the alterations, which evidently came later from the improving hand of the master. It will be understood of course, that the following examination is not based upon this edition, but upon the Score of the Magnificent as published by the Bach Society. . . .

The text of the Magnificent is the well-known song of praise of Mary in the Gospel of Luke, chapt. 1, verse 46-55: "My soul doth magnify the Lord," &c. Although the Bible puts these words in the mouth of a single person, yet, owing to their more universal meaning and the excellent contrasts they afford for musical treatment, they had already been used by the composers of the old Italian School for a larger Art-form, in which songs for single voices alternate with choruses. Bach has followed this precedent in his Magnificent: it lies before us in a succession of twelve numbers. We will first endeavor to submit each number to a separate consideration, and afterwards to form a fair conception of the composition as a whole.

1. The first number, a chorus in D major, 3-4 measure, treats the words: "Magnificat anima mea Dominum" (My soul doth magnify the Lord). In an extended prelude the master expounds the materials (themes or motives) on which the piece is founded, and which are afterwards brought into more full and conscious presence by the vocal setting. The orchestra, rich and brilliant for that day, embraces the stringed quartet, two flutes, two oboes, three trumpets, tympani, and, as in most of Bach's church works, the Organ. Each and every part is kept extremely individual and independent in its movement, and they group themselves in three distinct choirs: the string quartet, the wind instruments of wood, the brass instruments with drums. The Organ, from which it is well known that Bach used to conduct the church music, must certainly have served very distinct purposes: here supporting, there predominant, here softening and blending, there mediating, it was in the hand of the master the instrument par excellence through which he understood how to make his personal influence avail. It cannot be enough lamented, that Bach in the scores of his church music has left us no organ part fully written out; with that we should not only have the works in their completeness, but it would reveal to us new forms of expression, of whose depth and significance we can scarcely form a weak conception! No one certainly, who knows with what unheard of mastery Bach treated this instrument, will find this assertion extravagant.

In the three instrumental groups just mentioned, and in the most unconstrained manner, are now developed just so many motives, which dispute the course of the opening number between them. The soaring and elastic leading motive enters first in the oboes; with it is coupled without more delay an accompanying motive, brought in by the three trumpets; out of this again there is at last developed a short side motive, which plays an extremely active part in the subsequent working up. Bach is in the habit of so inventing his themes, that they shall admit of the most various transpositions and inversions: hence they are written according to the rules of double, triple, quadruple and quintuple Counterpoint. Especially does there reside in them a certain rhythmic, melodic and harmonic spring-power, which uplifts you at the outset with the exciting feeling: that here all will work itself out of itself through the indwelling vitality of the ideas, the themes, and that the ordering master hand will only intervene to guide, to guard against wanton, arbitrary digressions.

After a modulation into the Dominant, the prelude, concentrating its essential matter closely, returns to the Tonic, in which it makes now a full close. The chorus voices, 1st and 2nd Soprani, Alt, Tenors and Basses, two by two and without instrumental accompaniment, now seize upon a portion of the main motive, which is presently resumed again in full form by the orchestra, repeating note for note the first half of the prelude. We have already spoken of the remarkably independent and polyphonic conduct of the instrumental introduction; and yet it has been possible for Bach to go still further and to write into this complex score an almost wholly new vocal setting of five parts! If the great master, with his inexhaustible wealth, were not at the same time an equally unapproachable model of the noblest simplicity, such audacity could hardly have come off unpunished. But now how is it possible to our ear, to catch such a multiplicity of parts, to comprehend and feel as a unity all these different turns and passages, as they go swiftly whirling by?—What Franz suggests in answer to this question we shall see next time.

☞ We credited the translation of a fanciful story about Mme. SONTAG to one "Franz Genger" in the New York Leader, on the indignant showing of that individual. We are now shown a copy of Arthur's Home Magazine, in which the same version, almost word for word, appeared a year ago (July, 1866) as "from the German, by Auber Forestier!"

THE MUSICAL SEASON is approaching, but as yet we have only vague assurances and apprehensions of what it will bring. Among the really important things, of the permanent and quiet kind, rooted in our own musical life, the Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association will first take the field, beginning on Thursday, Nov. 7, and will be eight in number. The Handel and Haydn Society will give Oratorios at Thanksgiving and Christmas time, if not oftener; but their winter's practice will bear chiefly upon the triennial Festival of probably the first week in May.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club have got an "agent" and are going off concertizing miscellaneously through the West; but we still hope for classical concerts in the latter half of the winter.—The pianists, Perabo, Petersilea, Dresel too, we hope, and Leonhard, will give us chamber concerts.

Of the other kind, the "speculation" concerts of managers, there will be plenty, no doubt, but we have no room to speak of them now.

AN AMERICAN TENOR IN GERMANY. One of our sweet-voiced tenors, of whom Oratorio in Boston feels the loss, and who was a Boston boy originally, Mr. CHARLES R. ADAMS, after marked successes in many European theatres, singing in German, French, Italian and English, has been for some time a member of the Royal Opera in Berlin. Recently he has been visiting Vienna, and the papers there all speak in praise of his performances. Thus the Wiener Zeitung says:

"The second of July brought us Herr Karl Adams, Royal Prussian court opera singer, who for his first Gast-rolle had chosen the Arnold in William Tell. Herr Adams is an American by birth, who has had to learn his correct German here upon the spot, and has already mastered it so well that he hardly betrays his foreign origin. Happening to be in Vienna visiting some friends, he was heard in a private circle by court capellmeister Esser, and by him recommended to the manager Salvi, who is much inclined to experiments. Herr Esser's sound judgment can be trusted in such cases, and we have actually found in Adams a graceful singer, who possesses truly beautiful and well-nursed vocal means, adequate to lyrical parts, although his organ appears a little weakened from much travelling about. He is full of life and energy, has acquired great routine, and he betrays in everything the cosmopolite, the man who is at home in wide circles. We dare say, that a closer acquaintance with him will show more both of the light side and the shadow. That he inclines more to comic opera than to musical tragedy, his voice, outward appearance, temperament, all speak for it. The reception of the 'guest' was a very friendly one and coupled with a recall."

We translate also from the Vienna Musik-Zeitung: "At last we have again a tenor voice alike beautiful and pure! Herr Adams has also a favorable exterior, his delivery is correct, and his acting shows the right conception. The bright, clear ring of his voice in 'O Mathild!' had full effect, so that he had the honor of a recall; also in the duet in the second act and in the terzet he went victoriously through."—The artists associated with Mr. A. in Tell were Frau Dustmann as Mathilda, Herr von Bignio as Tell, Herr Pauli, another 'Gast,' from Pesth, as Ruodi, &c."

Again from the Neues Fremdenblatt: "Mr. A.'s material, to be sure, is not that of the heroic tenor, and in his delivery there is no trace of what we understand by genius; yet all his peculiarities work not unfavorably and deserve recognition in so far as you clearly see in them the results of zealous and industrious study. Mr. A. reminds one, on the whole, of Reichart—only not so feminine. His impression is agreeable."

Again, the correspondent of the Theater-Moniteur (Berlin), writes: "Herr Charles Adams, Royal Prussian court opera singer, has begun his 'Gast' engagement, as Arnold in Till, with the happiest success. The fine voice of the singer, which has gained essentially in fullness of tone since his former appearance here with Mlle. Artôt, is a subject of general comment; but not the less so the artistic culture and the tasteful delivery. His impersonation of the character also satisfies completely."

The Vienna papers speak of him as being in better voice and still more successful in Il Trovatore.

(From the New Bedford Mercury, Aug. 15).

OBITUARY. We are pained to notice the death of Franz Kielblock, of this city, which occurred in Boston on Tuesday last, after a brief illness. Mr. Kielblock was a native of Güstrow, in Mecklenburg, Germany, and left home at the age of twenty-four years, in company with Carl Zerrahn, now a highly esteemed citizen of Boston, to seek his fortune in this country. After his arrival here, he remained for two years a member of the Germania Band, which was organized in Europe previous to his departure, when, on account of ill health, he withdrew from the arduous duties of his position, and came to New Bedford to establish himself as a teacher of the various branches of his profession. A thoroughly educated musician, he at once found his time fully occupied in teaching, to which he devoted himself with enthusiastic zeal for seventeen years, and until within a few weeks of his death. He enjoyed a considerable reputation as a composer, mostly of fugitive pieces, though some years ago he brought before the public the opera of "Miles Standish," which would have attracted the attention it deserved, had the sensitive author possessed, with his recognized talent as a writer, some of the pushing obtrusiveness of an impresario.

There are many who will sincerely regret the loss of one who has done so much to cultivate a refined musical taste in this community, many who will miss the careful instruction of a conscientious as well as accomplished teacher, while others, who knew him best, will recall with pleasure, if sadly, the characteristics which made him a genial companion and a warm friend.

MUSICAL CONVENTIONS. There is some pretty shrewd common sense in the following comments of a Vermont paper (the Montpelier Atlas and Patriot, of July 4), on a Convention held the week before in Burlington, in that State.

The text-books adopted for use were the "Church Bell," a new publication from the pen of W. O. and H. S. Perkins, and the Oratorio of the "Messiah," an old work, from the pen of Handel. The intimate relation which the two works were made to bear to each other was, to say the least, calculated to excite, as indeed it did, sentiments of playful irony among the better musicians of the convention. The frequent passage which the convention made from "Hurrah for New England" to the "Hallelujah Chorus," was neither appropriate nor graceful. Tried by the "philosopher's scales," one page of the "Messiah" would outweigh more of the "Bell" than could be packed on Boston Common. Not that we object to the "Bell" any more than to other works of its class, but the balancing of the convention for four days between its "Mother Goose Melodies" and the "Messiah" was most severely inappropriate. The fact is, neither of these works meet the wants of the convention. It is no discredit to those comprising the chorus to say that, with few exceptions, they were wholly inadequate to the proper rendering of the music of the latter. Instead of four days of incompetent drill, they needed weeks of study and careful discipline. To accomplish more than they did in the time allowed them was an impossibility. The idea of introducing the "Messiah," therefore, with a view to producing it, was folly.

The introduction of that other work—the "Bell"—was equally ill-timed and inappropriate, and to expect either pleasure or profit to be derived from its use was a poor compliment to the capacity and tastes of Vermont singers. It was as much below the necessities of the case as the other was above them, and that's a good deal. The design of musical conventions is, we suppose, or should be, to improve the standard of music; to develop the ability of singers, and correct and elevate the taste. For one then—though it is no affair of ours—we seriously object to turning the rehearsing room into an exchange for the sale of a tenth-rate music book, and the paying of an inferior conductor an hundred and fifty dollars, or so, to come among us for a week, and "cry his own pot-tery." We know not how far the managers of the Burlington convention are responsible for their use, and certainly we have no reproaches for them at this time. If the mistake was theirs—which we do not believe—they will act more wisely next time, and not permit their own better judgment to be over-ruled by the avarice of some mere book-manager, or that personal ambition which seeks the name of "bringing out" the "Messiah," and other works of the kind, without the force and drill necessary to do them properly. What this convention needed—and what we hope the next one will have—was some intermediate compositions not beyond their ability to master, and yet sufficiently difficult to demand careful and diligent study in order to their proper illustration in public. And would the members realize this result, and have their convocations henceforth both pleasant and profitable, they must set their faces grimly and forever against the approaches of those who come bending under the load of books which smell of the printing office and the bindery.

TRIALBERG, the pianist, has obtained an honorary mention at the Paris Exhibition for his wines of Pausilippo, near Naples. The vine which produces them was planted there by Lablache, his father-in-law, from cuttings obtained in Burgundy.

The London Choir has the following:—"Picked up in the quadrangle of the Schola Musicae at Oxford, supposed to have dropped from the pocket of the Oxford Professor of Music—Why has the science of music always been held to be a difficult study? Because, by the verdict of antiquity, nemo repente fuit turpissimus—no one becomes a thorough bass man in a moment.

A German journal reminds its readers that in 1782 the Leipziger Zeitung contained the following curious notice, emanating from a writer of that town:—"A certain Mozart, of Vienna, has taken the liberty of denaturalizing my drama 'Belmonte and Constance,' in turning it into an opera libretto. I formally protest against this infringement of my rights, and reserve myself the power of further action.—Christopher Friedrich Bretzner."

GERMAN AND ITALIAN COMPOSERS.—The well-known saying of Carl Maria von Weber: "I compose as God wills, and Rossini composes as the public wills," characterizes admirably the artistic tendencies of most German and Italian operatic composers. The German operatic composer not unfrequently ignores, to his own disadvantage, both singers and public; he likes to give himself up entirely to his task, in which his own individuality is completely merged, and writes in the fond belief that his work is destined to last forever. The Italian composer, on the other hand, writes in the first place for certain singers; he does not think of a work of art lasting forever; he pays court to the exigencies of the day and of fashion, and takes his audience as he generally finds them. I honor the operatic composer who, renouncing outward success, has only an ideal circle of hearers in his mind; but I do not depreciate the value of the artist who thinks of the actual operatic public. That great genius, and worldly-wise man, Mozart, did both; he took into account singers and public, and created works of imperishable beauty. His dramatic works will, at any rate, endure as long as feeling for melodic beauty and musical characterization exists in the world of art. However people may of late have striven to limit such characterization, it can never be destroyed.—Berlin Echo.

PARODY ON "ROMEO ET JULIETTE." A very amusing travesty of M. Gounod's opera is just now being played with great success at the Theatre-Dejazet, at Paris, under the title of Rhum et Eau en Juillet. The piece is closely imitated, and the new music supplied by M. Eugène Déjazet.

A DISAGREEABLE QUESTION. Mme. Catalani, the celebrated singer, was for a long time manageress of the Italian Opera, Paris. But art sometimes came off very badly. A critic of the period used to commence every one of his notices with the Ciceronian phrase: "Quousque tandem abutere, CATALANI, patientia nostra?" "How long, Catalani, will you abuse our patience?"

A GREAT WRITER'S OPINION OF A GREAT MUSICIAN. Jean Paul said of the composer of Don Juan: "Every note of Mozart's is a round in the ladder of the spheres by which he ascended to the Heaven of perfection."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Come to me oft. Canzonet. F. M. Crouch. 35
A beautiful melody, well worthy the author of "Kathleen Mavourneen."
Ah! that beloved. (Ah! quel amata). Song. "Leonora." 30
I, though dead, speak. (Spento ancor). " 30
If 'tis true. (Ah! se è ver.) Duet. " 30
Nella calma. (In the calmness of a vision.)
Song. "Romeo and Juliet." 60
Let us hark. (Ascoltiam). " 30
In vain my wrath. (Al mio furor). Terzetto. "Don Carlos." 75

Six new opera songs "all hot" from translation. Buy and sing them while they are new. You have here the sadness and mysticism of Verdi, the brightness of Gounod, and the somewhat quieter beauty of Mercadante.

- When the thorn is white with blossoms. Von Weber. 40
When first I viewed that face so fair. (Nichts schöneres). Marschner. 30

Two capital songs, the last about the lady whose husband "never happened to think" that anything could be more lovely than the beauty and pleasant ways of his loved one.

- There's an empty seat at the table. Turner. 30
A popular ballad.

- The Fisher. Ballad. H. Aidé. 30
The fisher did not remember that any lovely lady had passed that way. Except the one, beautiful in death, that floated past in the stream. Very sweet and plaintive, with its "Waly, waly!" in the chorus.

- She danced like a fairy. Comic song. Dudley. 30
How I was taken in. " " L. Heath. 30
Amusing songs, furnishing material for harmless mirth.

- Merrily, merrily sing. Song. Laura H. Hatch. 30
Farewell, dear one. " Kate Comstock. 30
Meet me. Ballad. C. A. White. 30
Will papa come to night? Song. W. C. Baker. 30
"Songs for the people."

- Where are you going so fast, old man? Song. Covart. 30

- Sheridan's ride to the front. " 30
The first is a good, wholesome "moral" song, and the second a stirring description of the famous ride and battle. Good music.

- I'll forgive thee, bye and bye. F. Musgrave. 30
Very neatly put together, and will "tell" on a company when properly sung.

Instrumental.

- Don Juan. Fantasie Brillante. S. Smith. 90
Sydney Smith cannot well help making a piece brilliant, and here is fine material. The well-known favorites in the grand opera shone with new lustre in the effective composition.

- Hilda Waltz. Transcription. Kuhe. 60
A graceful arrangement of a favorite waltz.

- Theresa Quadrille. D. Godfrey. 60
Contains a few of the most popular of Mad. Theresa's songs, and is quite lively and taking.

- Mozart's march of triumph. Laura H. Hatch. 30
Quite simple, and is a pretty lesson for beginners.

- Harmonious Blacksmith. Arr. for Organ by G. W. Morgan. 1.00

This great honest melody fits kindly to the organ, and Mr. M. has done well to present it thus to the musical public.

- Prairie Rose Waltz. J. W. Turner. 30
Easy and pretty.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 690.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 14, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 13.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

To a Life Size Portrait of my Mother at the Harp.

BY JOHN T. SARGENT.

Shade of the Past! Vision of sunnier days,
When Youth, and Hope, and Beauty, and the rays
Of Joy were round thee, mother! Time severe
Hath changed the features feebly imaged here!
Those locks are greyer now! That placid face
Hath gathered wrinkles. Age has left its trace
Of furrows on that brow. Those beaming eyes
Are dimmer than they were. The woe, the sighs
Have chased that smile! That music moving hand
Has writ full many a darkened hope in sand!
That hallowed Harp, too! How, in bygone days
Its melodies rang out! What stirring lays Informed it once! What music used to thrill Along that stricken lyre! Alas! How still!
In school boy days I heard its tones divine
Filling our home like airs of Palestine!
And now that Harp, which then rang sweet and loud,

In some dark corner wears a sable shroud!
And yet, why mourn I? What although no more
Those sounds, melodious, move me as of yore!
What though the hand which waked them is withheld?

Memory still echoes every tone which swelled
Upon my youthful ear.—Ah yes, I find
It still hath music for the listening mind!
Symbol of sympathies! to me it seems:
For, when a joy elates me, there are gleams
Of light electric, as of heavenly fire,
Playing in flashes o'er the pictured wire!
That Harp, with songs accordant, seems to ring:
A mother's love tone trembles o'er each string!
And, so, if sadness shrouds me,—if a surge
Of sorrow sinks my soul, it sounds a dirge!
Mantled in clouds! with all its chords in rest,
It sounds a requiem to my wounded breast.
Yes! Then, Eolian like, it breathes a moan,
And gently soothes me with an undertone!
Thus, ever thus, my soul attentive hears
Those magic hints, like "music of the spheres."
At home, abroad, where e'er I roam or rest,
That Harp tone sounds monitions to my breast.
It seals my matin prayers, and seems to say
"A mother's blessing cheers thy livelong way."
And, as I muse, at evening's twilight hour,
Spirit of Sanctity! I feel thy power!
Yes! daily, as my orisons arise,
Thy music mingles with the sacrifice.
Matsins and Vespers, each, thy Harp attends;—
In benisons thy muse-like image bends
To guard and guide me, while my inmost soul
Glow by thine impulse, feels thy calm control.
Be ever thus! And, when, in act or thought
I go astray, be thy sweet influence sought.
If error wounds me, let the healing sight
Of thy dear presence win me to the right.
Be that my recompense, my rest, reward,
My mentor firm;—my conscience and my guard!
My Judgment framed! emblazoned! gleaming! all
Which King Belshazzar saw upon the wall!
And, when I die, to me the bliss be given
To hear that Harp amid the Hymns of Heaven!

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Three Evenings with Ferdinand Hiller.

Translated from Die Gartenlaube, by AUBER FORESTIER.

Music is of all arts the most purely human, the most universal.—JEAN PAUL

In a large, cheerful saloon, amidst ivy entwined statues of Bach and Handel, beneath the characteristic portrait heads of Beethoven, Mozart, Felix Mendelssohn and Schumann, opposite a luxuriant flower stand stood a Hartel Grand Piano. The candles had been taken away, even the great lamp over the table shed its light through a rose-tinted shade; the little group of ladies and gentlemen gathered together listened all breathless to a little tone poem—Ferdinand Hiller was playing his "Zur Gitarre."

Without it was autumn, the wind tapped hoisterously upon the window, the rain beat upon the panes; within all were dreaming of a warm summer night beneath Italian skies. The roses bloomed, from the lofty balcony there leaned a lovely female form à la Gullotta, the moonlight transfigured her flower face, and the elegant cavalier ardently confessed to her his love "zur Gitarre." It was a love such as is kindled only in the land where the citrons bloom, and these poor men of the North envied the happy ones, for orange blossoms are more fragrant than Forget-me-nots, whilst the Northern ladies sighed. Who could bring to them a serenade "zur Gitarre," in the land of rain and storm, of catarrh and rheum, of spiteful, envious neighbors?

I have never heard this enchanting musical "Déclaration d'amour" played by any one but the composer, yet it seems to me it could never fail in its effect. As concerned our little circle of that evening we were all charmed, as one is charmed at sight of the first nosegay of Spring, or by the long-missed voice of a dear friend. Hiller was constrained at once to repeat his song. He was then returning, laden with honor, wearied with all manner of festival suppers with "toasts" and laurel wreaths obligato, from Bremen, where his opera "Die Katalomben" had been represented for the first time with brilliant success; and now he was resting one evening in the house of a friend. Playing at resting that is, pleasantly chatting in a comfortable arm-chair, and for once making music not ex officio, but purely con amore. About three o'clock after midnight he must pursue his journey to Cologne; first, however, he meant to steal a little sleep. Now then the time must not be allowed to fly too fast, and yet it had been so long since all had met together, and there was so much to ask and tell. Hiller himself was as fresh and delightful when he talked as when he played, and during the little supper he was sparkingly gay. It was one of those evenings such as rarely fall from Heaven, hours which leave the fragrance of violets in the soul. Later we enjoyed a Beethoven Sonata from him, and then he played a few expressive little things—"Imputellos" he called them, of his own composition. In between these he lady of the house sang Hiller's "Hallfahet nach Korlaer," that beautiful tone illustration of Heine's poem, as well as Mendelssohn's Suleika songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, and finally the parting song: "Es ist bestimmt in Gottes Rath."

Midnight was long past, who would have believed it! With all vivacity musical, literary and other themes were yet discussed, piquant sketches of Paris life were traced by Hiller, who opened the reliquary of his memory to bring to light many a sparkling jewel. Meanwhile the narrator's eyes shone, and a merry smile played about his lips. All at once he sprang up and seated himself once more at the piano. Softly the hands stole over the keys; at first it was as a far off dream, but gradually the thoughts became connected, and the remarkable guest phantasied upon all the songs that had been sung to him. The church bells rang to the procession: "Das ist zu Köln an dem Rhein," the mother of God softly entered and laid her hand on the sick heart, then the west wind was borne over on glittering pinions. Suleika breathed, "Sag ihm, der sag's beschiden," like the voice of the nightingale arose Schumann's "Spring Song," Schubert's "Barcarole" passed lightly over; Rückert's exquisite love song by Franz, "Er ist gekommen in Sturm und Regen" stormed in, and finally came the lovely melody, soft and deep as a parting look:

"Wenn Menschen auseinander geh'n,
So sagen sie: auf Wiederseh'n!"

When Hiller arose there were tears in many a beautiful eye, and little hands were gratefully extended towards him. Suddenly this little scene of excitement was broken into by a man's voice that half playfully, half seriously said: "There is no help for it, my honored "Herr Capellmeister," the parting is at hand, in seven minutes the inexorable express train will start. It is past three o'clock!" This was the "jester" of the Play.

Ferdinand Hiller is a child of Frankfort, the tenderly loved son of cultivated parents, born in the year of the great comet and fiery constellations, and ardent and fiery has he remained. Various good geniuses have stood godfather to his youth: Goethe's hand rested upon the boy's head when he came to Weimar to take piano lessons of Hummel; Beethoven's dying eyes looked significantly upon him when the youth accompanied his celebrated teacher to Vienna, and stood with him beside the couch of suffering of the dying Titan. The profoundly learned founder of the Cecilia Society in Frankfort on the Maine, Schelbele, called Hiller his darling, and Aloys Schmitt prophesied for him a brilliant career. The grave, reserved Cherubini was thawed by this lovely artist nature, and the entire intellectual and musical aristocracy of Paris interested itself in the boy of scarcely seventeen, when his mother, to introduce him to this rich world, threw open a saloon in which often the most heterogeneous and attractive elements might be found together. What a scene for a painter, this union of grand heads and forms!

It is a winter evening. The fire burns upon the hearth. Without splendid equipages roll past, and by the light of the lanterns may be seen little rose-adorned heads, sparkling diamonds, fluttering garments at the windows within. Paris dances to day in the Tuileries, in the Theatre, in the Closerie de Lilas, in the Jardin d'hiver and who knows where beside. The great music room of the Hiller house is pleasantly warmed and lighted; there is dancing there, too, yet the dancers are only ten fingers, the fingers of Chopin. In a marble vase upon the table there are violets, the pure favorite flowers of a pure empress, shedding their fragrance around. An Érard Grand Piano stands in the middle of the room, in front of it sits the young, dreamy Chopin. He seems scarcely to touch the keys; as from the far-off distance floats a passionate, yet wailing dance melody, drawing nearer and even nearer, it grows louder as it approaches; he is playing his wondrous Mazurkas and fantastic Waltzes. Hiller himself, with his artist brow and twinkling eyes, stands beside the player, not losing the breath of a tone. Near the hearth, beside the cheerfully blazing fire, sits the venerable Cherubini, with absent mien, and yet listening in spite of himself to the magic sounds; it disturbs and yet fascinates him,—the concluding chorus of his Requiem is forming in his mind. Near him lounges Adolph Nourrit, the noblest "Pylades" to Gluck's "Orestes," who ever trod the stage. When he sang the celebrated Aria:

"Nur einen Wunsch, nur ein Verlangen," the ladies were not the only ones who were affected to tears. His voice was of a wonderful sweetness, and yet powerful, and his style, if less dramatic than elegiac, was nevertheless always noble and feeling.

On the other side of the fire-place the violinists Lafont and Bailliot had taken their places. Behind them arose the characteristic profile of the young Berlioz; a world of thoughts lie buried beneath his beautiful brow with its framework of dark hair. In the window alcove stands Ary Scheffer, the genial Painter, surveying the group with earnest eye. There is somewhat in his noble head that recalls the painter's celebrated picture, "St. Augustin with his mother, Monica." Not far from him in the darkest corner sits a pale man, in an attitude of almost hopeless depression, the cheek resting upon the slender hand, the eyes, with their far-off expression, plainly bespeaking the soul within. About the mouth there hovers an ineffaceable impress of pain, the expression of an endless "Heimweh," which renders the rare smile inexpressibly touching. The brow is of a lofty beauty, clear and light. It is the author of letters from Paris, of intellectual critiques, and enthusiastic reminiscences of Jean Paul: Ludwig Börne. Music is his female friend; of it he has said: "Music is prayer; whether given by the babe in hissing numbers, whether held by the rude child of Nature in rude form, whether by cultivated beings in passionate, soul-stirring words,—Heaven harkens to it with like satisfaction, and gives back as comfort to each the echo of his own feelings."

Chopin's playing was a wonder balsam for the soul of Börne. These ardent and melancholy spirits could not but understand and love one another.

Beside a table filled with exotic plants, from amidst whose luxuriance the statue of a Polyhymnia peeped forth, sat the chosen darling of the Graces and Muses, the poet of the "Book of Songs," Heinrich Heine. As his rival in the favor of the ladies appears the amiable, jocular composer of the "Barbiere di Sivilla," Rossini. Notwithstanding his weight, the rather corpulent gentleman was always "Figaro-ci, Figaro-là." Then the delicately moulded head of Heine was yet untouched by the devastating ravages of illness that later so cruelly destroyed all his beauty that the equalizing hand of death alone had power to smooth the distorted features. The blue eyes yet shone like stars, and the lips whispered the most bewitching absurdities, until a beautiful hand was laid upon his mouth. This time it was the lily fingers of the renowned and fascinating Delphine Gay, who in Paris was scarcely less celebrated as a woman than as authoress. Heinrich Heine kissed the little hand at once meekly and passionately, for it had brushed by his lips softly as a rose leaf just as Chopin's playing began. Now he had long forgotten the wanton sport. A deep melancholy was graven upon his brow, the head was sunken upon the breast, the long lashes almost touched the cheeks, many a beautiful eye at this moment rested upon the attractive profile. Perchance he dreamed poems to the phantastic melodies of Chopin. And over yonder, that young creature, that fairy-like being with the great Southern eyes and the waves of dark hair—that woman with the smile of a child and the movements of the Graces, with whom Maestro Rossini had just been whispering? Who else than Marie Malibran, the great singer, the genial, warm-hearted woman, the idol of Paris! The Countess Merlin, her friend and protectress, had introduced her into the little German saloon. Also many other celebrated and uncelebrated pupils of Garcia were there, Mesdames Lalande and Favart, and various flower-faces who had only to appear to excite the warmest admiration.

At one time, had not you look from the eyes of Beethoven made strong and firm the musician in Ferdinand Hiller, he would have turned renegade and gone over to Literature. Hiller himself confesses in one of his letters how mightily he was influenced by the intercourse of the most significant and diverse minds of the time.

"The intercourse with so many distinguished men," he writes, "was in the highest degree exciting; but the whole life of Paris, as well as politics, into which I entered with passionate interest, and the entire whirlpool of the undulating life brought me, so to speak, out of myself, and materially interfered with the development of my musical talents. More than once in moments of excitement I was tempted to hang the whole music upon a nail, and rush into one or another of the careers that seemed then so attractive."

Whoever is acquainted with Hiller's letters, and the truly German depth of thought combined with French lightness of style of his "Feuilleton" articles, must feel no less love for the writer, Hiller, than for the musician and composer; and whoever has heard him converse upon some inspiring theme, must wonder at him as a speaker.

Ferdinand Hiller composed when very young—as early as his tenth year—and always with the greatest ease; and it is an evidence of how deep the sunbeam of Goethe's friendliness had penetrated into his young heart that he chose as text to his first song, "Rastlose Liebe." With his seventeenth year he entered Paris as teacher in the "Institution royale de musique classique et religieuse," enjoying at the same time tuition in Harmony himself, and playing the organ in the church of the Sorbonne, when the scholars sang Mass there. Several concerts which he gave in the Conservatoire brought him abundant fame and honor. The elegant and artistic public that assembled upon such occasions became thus acquainted with Hiller's compositions, Symphonies and Piano pieces. French and German journals contained descriptions of the enthusiastic receptions the young German met with.

Many charming morceaux date at this period: Trios, Quartets, Songs, the alluring "Danse des fantômes," and the first reveries. A short sojourn in Frankfort on the Maine followed the intoxicating Parisian life; then a "dolce far niente" on Lake Como, whither the faithful mother accompanied her son (his father he had lost during his residence in Paris), and there arose his Oratorio "The Destruction of Jerusalem," then a winter in Milan, and then—a Spring time of love.

Many years ago there appeared at one of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic, a beautiful woman with dark hair, eyes like coals of fire, and a profile such as we often see upon cameos, but seldom in life; she sang the "Tarantella" from Rossini's "Soirées musicales" with brilliant voice and spirited execution: this was Mme. Antolka Hiller. At the same concert Hiller played one of his charming "Reveries." An amiable lady said to him afterwards, playfully: "Ah, now we know at last of whom you have always been dreaming so sweetly and mysteriously!"

Nothing could be more delightful than to hear Mme. Hiller sing the Soprano part of one of those original, fresh Quintets for Soprano and male voices, which Hiller composed in Rome in the early part of his wedded happiness. The idea of letting a female voice float in all its clearness above a Quartet of male voices, is so bewitching in its effect that one feels transported to a land of Spring, where high above all that creeps and flies, sings and buzzes around us, the fluttering lark soars aloft to the blue sky.

Hiller led the Leipsic subscription concerts at the time when Mendelssohn, with whom he was united by the closest ties of friendship, changed his residence from Leipsic to Berlin; but he soon emigrated to Dresden, in view of there establishing and directing a series of concerts. He had meanwhile composed Operas, divers Quartets of stringed instruments, Sonatas, Capriccios, Etudes, his beautiful Impromptus, as well as many songs. His "Destruction of Jerusalem" went out from Dresden over the whole world, and met everywhere with the warmest applause.

In the year 1850 Hiller accepted the honorable position of city Capellmeister and Director of the Conservatoire at Cologne, and there he has labored ever since, with the intermission of one winter, when he directed the Italian Opera in Paris. His creative Phantasia brings forth ever new blossoms, amongst which may be reckoned as one of the most delightful his "Operetta without words" for Piano with four hands. His opera "Die Katakomben" had its origin about this time, and his Symphony with the motto: "Es muss doch Frühling werden!" with its sister piece the joyous "Im Freien." Several large and small pieces of vocal music appeared now for solo and orchestra, the Oratorio "Die Gründung Roms" amongst others. Notwithstanding all, Hiller still found time to write the most exquisite æsthetic critiques, and many beautiful testimonies to the memory of departed great friends. Living friends also, celebrated and uncelebrated, alike find him always ready for merry or serious talk, and not only male friends, but also the, as is universally admitted, far more talkative female friends. Amiable, open-hearted, cheerful and self-sacrificing, he is ready at any moment to aid, by word or deed, all who apply to him personally or by letter for assistance. His house is now, as ever, the hospitable asylum of artists from far and near. At this moment—Tuesday evening, December 4,—he stands at the conductor's desk in the Gürzenich Hall in Cologne, baton in hand; it is his Oratorio "Saul" that he is representing for a second time to a crowded public.

And what a choice public it is that is listening to the splendid choruses, with the imposing instrumentation! How cheerful is the face of the great critic, Professor Bischoff, in the vicinity of the Orchestra! What a confusion of beautiful and less beautiful women, of civilian's dress and uniform, of youth and age! And then the female singers in white, the male in black! The orchestra, that numbers amongst its members many brilliant names, looks with fixed attention upon its lord and master, the chorus hangs upon his looks and the movements of his hand. With what evident delight do they all play and sing under his firm guidance!

Hiller stands very high as a conductor, and at the late Düsseldorf Festival gave ample evidence of his power. The little round man with the noble head becomes one of the great of the earth when he stands amidst the Orchestra. The people of the Rhine are proud of their Hiller, particularly, however, the citizens of Cologne, as the very soul of their Gürzenich concerts.

Reminiscences of the Abbate Bainsi.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.*

When, shortly after the commencement of the fifth decade of the present century, I had repeatedly attended Divine Service in the Sixtine Chapel at Rome, it was clear to me that most of the music of the old Romish school performed there was—not clear to me. As was the case with the majority of my German brothers in art, educated in the works of Bach, Handel, and their great successors, my relations to the old Italians were rather distant and superficial, though I had often played through, besides having now and then heard played, the better known, and, if I may so express myself, the more popular of their compositions. The pure and elevated nature of their strains impressed as much as their strangeness attracted me, and I determined to do all that lay in my power to penetrate the profoundest mysteries of their combinations. My first step was to pay a visit to the Abbate Bainsi.

Bainsi was well known as one of the leading investigators in the field of musical history. Starting, in his great work on Palestrina, from the wish to place in their true light the eternal services, rendered by this, his favorite, composer to the cause of art, he published unexpected information concerning the changes in sacred music before Palestrina; concerning the musical doings at the Council of Trent, and concerning Palestrina's life and efforts. The free use of the collections and archives of the Vatican had placed within his reach materials inaccessible to every one else, and he possessed the talent of turning them to account with as much erudition as acuteness. A large portion of his life, and the most considerable part of his income, were devoted to the task of editing all Palestrina's works in score. It is scarcely possible to form an idea of the restless investigation, the persevering labor, the passionate self-abnegation required. A great number of the immortal compositions of the extraordinary master were scattered to the four quarters of the globe, and to recover a single missing sheet frequently demanded whole years of search, and—comparatively speaking—heavy pecuniary sacrifices. Bainsi had been a singer from his youth, and for many years director of the Papal Chapel. This post had been conferred on him as an especial mark of distinction, it being the general rule for the Papal singers to take it by turns to direct the music at Divine Service. The reader will easily understand that such a man struck me as being the one from whom I could best hope to obtain satisfactory and useful information, as well as assistance in carrying out my artistic desires—and such was the case. Bainsi received me most kindly, and promised to do all he could. His suggestion that the best course I could adopt to penetrate into Palestrina's style would be to practice it myself, appeared to me perfectly just. Two evenings a week were fixed on, when he said I should always find him ready to look over my work—and for a whole winter I enjoyed the instructive society of this excellent man.

I cannot, of course, here dwell upon the specifically musical investigations which formed the principal staple of our conversations; indeed—though I am half ashamed to confess it—those investigations are not what I recollect most vividly. It is chiefly of the grand simplicity, the self-sacrificing pains, the calm kindness, of this unusual man that there remains in my mind a picture, deriving a peculiar coloring from the originality of very many views which he propounded with a kind of naive humor, and of which I should like to give a sketch. Perhaps many of my readers will gladly transport themselves with me for a few moments from the restless bustle of every-day life to the quiet chamber in which was passed an existence that, with all its unostentatious simplicity, wanted neither the power to do nor to bear. The highest excellence, after all, which it is granted man to attain is to have been, in one's own way, a perfect man.

Bainsi was, at the time to which I refer, sixty years old and of tall stature; though he bowed his head slightly, his bearing was full of vigor. His serious and rather strongly marked features had something energetic, nay, here and there, hard about them, but by a glance, and a smile, not perhaps exactly agreeable, could assume a particularly mild and kindly expression. Bainsi was not handsome, though he may in his youth have been a fine man. It was probably the still surviving recollection of this that caused him, on seeing an admirable drawing which my friend, the artist Rudolph Lehmann, had made of him, to exclaim: "O! O! how ugly!" His health was greatly undermined by the wearing labor to which he constantly devoted himself. A life which, as he himself expressed it, "he had spent between his writing table (scrivania), and the confessional" could not possibly be attended by satisfactory results. His digestive powers were impaired, and it required many, many hours for him to get over the effects of the very spare meal he took once every day. I often found him suffering from the most violent spasms in the stomach: at such times, he would make a slight sign with his hand, and I waited, with painful sympathy, in an adjoining room, till the crisis was over. This was scarcely the case, however, ere he began the conversation in the most friendly manner, calm and cheerful, laying aside, so to speak, the pain he had been suffering for hours, as though it were a book, the perusal of which had been interrupted. Frequently, also, I found him engaged in the prayers which were a duty for him of an evening. In this case, too, he would point to a chair and a score that he had got ready for me, and quietly continue his pious occupation. The following may serve as a proof of his really affectionate kindness. While he was looking, with conscientious earnestness, through my attempts, I was transcribing compositions by Palestrina, in order not to be doing nothing. The next time I returned, I would find, in Bainsi's hand, the words, which I had not had time in the evening to write myself, traced under the music. I hardly dared to thank him for taking this trouble, and felt quite touched to think he had done so.

After he had subjected my exercise to the strictest criticism, Bainsi used to begin chatting with us. In this, as in many other instances, I have to regret deeply not taking notes, for a very great deal of what he told me really possessed historical interest. The reader will easily understand this when he reflects that Bainsi had spent all his life in Rome, and that the year of his birth was the year 1775. He had served a whole series of Popes; had been brought in close contact with them; and struck me as having taken as unprejudiced a view of the affairs of this world as was conceivable in so firmly believing, and, in many respects, so zealous, a priest. Of course, he sometimes made assertions which, for people like us, sounded strange, not so much in themselves, as from their context.

Thus he told me, one day, the life of the then Pope, Gregory XVI., and I cannot deny that he told it in a somewhat irreverent manner. The minute details have escaped my memory, but there is one thing I know, and that is: that the Abbate attributed to very mundane chances the adoption by the future Prince of the Church of his sacred career. Gregory, he said, entered a monastery in which he mounted very rapidly from step to step, chiefly because the brothers had run away for fear of the French. The Abbate continued his narrative in the same strain, till, in perfect simplicity, I asked, "How did he become Pope?" "That was the business of the Holy Ghost," was the answer. I suppose I looked rather astonished, for, after a moment's silence on both sides, Bainsi continued, very seriously: "How do you think that the election of Pope can take place except through the Holy Ghost? Just reflect. There are a number of men seated together, not one of whom wishes the other to obtain so elevated a position, and yet the decision has to be unanimous! The Holy Ghost alone can effect such a result."—On the days of grand festivities, a military band is placed in the front gallery of St. Peters, where it plays as the procession passes along. I had attended the ceremony in the morning, and had gone away rather indignant, for, after an introduction in which the strains of brass instruments, suddenly bursting forth, had produced a very elevating impression, there came an operatic motive, which was very frivolous at such a moment and in such a place. On my mentioning this to Bainsi, he replied: "I am always preaching the same thing to them. When we are by ourselves, we know each other (ci conosciamo!). But, above all, the strangers! what can they say to it?" How much more neat and graceful such observations sounded in Italian than they do in my homely German translation, I am painfully aware, as I write them down.

Bainsi cherished a very grateful recollection of King Friedrich Wilhelm IV., whose acquaintance he had made when his Majesty was Crown-Prince, and of our celebrated Bunsen—both had displayed great interest and appreciation of music, which Bainsi regarded as higher than aught else besides. He had frequently conducted performances of his vocal choir in the Prince's presence. The evenings on which these performances were held belonged to the exceedingly small number of those which Bainsi had ever spent away from home, save when his duties summoned him to church or chapel. He was fond of referring to the cleverness and amiable disposition of the two men, and it was evidently his intimate acquaintance with Bunsen which had led him to adopt a feeling of great tolerance towards Protestantism. "There is something, however, I do not understand," he said, one evening. "Protestants are good Christians; they reverence the Redeemer as we do—how can they be so indifferent towards the Blessed Virgin? After all, she is the mother of God! That is what I cannot comprehend."

* Translated for the London Musical World.

Notwithstanding the extraordinary and energetic perseverance with which Bains had devoted himself to his historico-musical labors, he took great interest in many things most foreign to them. On one occasion I opened a book he had just been reading. It was a history of the Theatre at Valenciennes. "Do you busy yourself with the stage also?" I exclaimed, somewhat surprised. "I have certainly one of the largest collection of works in existence relating to it," he replied, "and I have read them all. The theatre interests me in the highest degree." "Do you ever go to the theatre?" I enquired, still more astonished. "I never set foot in one" was his answer. During my stay in Rome I directed a small German vocal association, composed exclusively of German artists, painters, sculptors, and architects. We resolved to give a concert for the Cathedral at Cologne, which was then regarded as the symbol of German unity (I had no idea it would ever be so near me). With his friendly good nature, Bains said I ought rather to give the concert for the church of St. Paul at Rome, then in course of re-building, as such an act would gain me many friends in that capital. In reply to proposals of this kind, I brought a "Miserere" by Donizetti, which the latter had formerly dedicated to the Pope, and which had been sent to Bains, for him to look through. It was written in the most modern style, with an orchestral accompaniment, and was not of the slightest use for the Papal Chapel. "Do you look it through again," he said, handing me the rose-colored score; "I do not understand such music, but it does not strike me as anything great." I beg pardon of the amiable master, Donizetti, but it was an extremely insipid production. "Why do you not dedicate something to the Pope?" said Bains to me. "Do so; at the worst you will receive a large heap of beautiful, and quite new gold pieces, which you can take with you to Germany." He did not know that nothing is ever carried home from a visit to Italy except golden reminiscences.

The interior of Bains's abode was remarkable for a simplicity and absence of ornament bordering on poverty—the large rooms alone, where his valuable library was placed, showed that a man occupying a prominent position lived there. The housekeeping was conducted by an elderly sister, who sometimes opened the door for me, and then disappeared like a shadow. During the winter, though the days were extremely cold, there was never anything in the shape of a fire, but always standing on the table was a tolerably large brazier, at which the old gentleman used to warm his hands. Bains had never travelled; the only time he had been absent from Rome was, I think, on the occasion of his making a trip to Bologna. The reader will, perhaps, be able to form some notion of the energy and endurance Bains displayed in the discharge of his duties, when I inform him that during the time of the French occupation, when the people sought, in preference to any others, those priests who had not paid homage to the foreigners, Bains frequently sat in the confessional eighteen hours a day. All his books and music, including the invaluable collection of Palestrina's works, scored by him, he bequeathed to the Minerva Monastery at Rome, where they will, at any rate, be well taken care of—perhaps, too well.

Bains composed in a variety of styles, though his compositions are not numerous. A "Miserere" of his is played alternately with those of Allegri and Bach, [?] during Passion-week, in the Sistine Chapel. It is an effective piece, but it proves how impossible it is for any one to step entirely out of his own time. Although Bains lived almost exclusively in the world of old sacred music, having read but little modern music, and, perhaps, never having heard any performed, if I except that which, so to speak, is walled to us through the atmosphere, the above "Miserere," which, as far as style goes, is written in the strictest spirit, contains a number of passages revealing the nineteenth century even to a person who is not a musician. Bains never referred, however, to his own compositions, and the distinguished place assigned to his "Miserere," was the result of the profound impression produced by it, at a rehearsal, in the Sistine choir. Towards my attempts in Palestrina's style the worthy man exhibited the most inexorable severity and it was not till about the end of the winter that I succeeded in writing a piece with which he was perfectly contented—I have preserved it as a memento of the pleasant days spent in Rome. After my return to Germany, I sent Bains a copy of the score of my Zerstörung Jerusalems, and subsequently the scores of Mozart's Requiem and Mass in C minor, as well as of Beethoven's Mass in C major. I cannot deny myself the pleasure of printing the letters I received from him, on the occasion, and I give them in the original text. On every account it is impossible for me to translate them. By publishing the first letter I may appear desirous of sounding my own praises—but I take the step with the consciousness that all I want is by his kind words, too flattering though they are for me, to complete the too imperfect picture of one I so respect. Here they are:

"Pregiatissimo Signore ed amico. finalmente per mezzo del Sr. . . . Pittore e Ritrattista ho saputo la di lei dimora in costosa patria, onde mi recai a dovere di dirgerle questa mia non solo per ringraziarla del graditissimo dono che mi favorì nella Partitura del suo Oratorio, La Distruzione di Gerusalemme, ma eziando per rallegrarmene seco lei avendovi ammirato i bellissimo Cori magistrali e degni tanto dalle di Lei artistiche cognizioni, quanto del moltissimo genio che vi domina per ogni dove. Jo la prego in nome della buona musica di non lasciare oziosi i talenti de' quali l'ha abbondantemente fornito la generosa man del Creatore, ma facendoli fruttare al fine nobile in reso da Dio, sostenere col suo esempio e con la sua opera il cadente buon gusto e la quasi perduta filosofia musicale. Tanto oso sperare dall'amore, che, quando ho avuto il bene di avvicinarla, ho costantemente in lei riconosciuto per ogni maniera di verità.

"La supplico, etc."

After this introduction, the second letter runs thus:

"Beniamo allo splendido dono, che mi ha con tanta generosità favorito, onde farmi ammirare le bellezze musicali della Germania sacra. Il Sig. Marstalla (Marstaller) Console di Prussia non era ancor giunto in Roma e fu prevenuto dalle di Lei pregiatissima di partecipazione: circa la metà di Ottobre è poi venuto e per mezzo d'un impiegato dell' Ambascia Austriaca di mia conoscenza mi ha recapitato il di Lei regalo, cioè la Partitura del famoso Requiem di Mozart, la bellissima Messa in C molle dello stesso Autore e la Messa del capriccioso Beethoven piena di accensioni pindariche felicemente condotte. La ringrazio sommamente e la mia collezione andrà quindi in poi superba per il dono e per la memoria del donatore. La prego, etc.

GIUSEPPE BAINI."

This worthy man died in the year 1844. His death was not merely a heavy loss for the Sistine Chapel; it was an irreparable one. His works and his name will live forever in the history of music.

A Rehearsal with Amateur Vocalists.*

Musical Conductors, in the service of reigning princes, Conductors whose subordinates are paid, and consequently can be punished, by a deduction from their salary, for any act of neglect, have no notion of the endless difficulties which the conductors of amateur associations have to go through before they can get up a performance; the audience, too, enjoy such a performance, and indulge in unrestricted criticisms on it, because they know nothing of the drops of sweat, produced by downright agony, frequently clinging to some particular number; in a quarter of an hour much has passed away forever that has been rehearsed, for months, with sighs and fears; the hours spent at rehearsal are a source of constant vexation to the Conductor; while even every military bandmaster has generally all his performers together, some of the executants, and those, as a rule, the most necessary, are always missing in amateur associations; while the former can confidently rely on perfect silence, attention, and obedience, the order of the day with amateurs is gossiping, inattention, and want of punctuality; yet while the bandmaster can severely censure the slightest fault, the conductor of an amateur society must only refer to the grossest neglect with considerable mildness, and cordial bou-houmie, if he would not "disgust" the members and lose their attendance altogether, etc. But enough of this; an example shall show what we mean. We will suppose that a mixed Solo-Quartet has to be rehearsed. After mature deliberation with the other persons concerned, the Conductor has fixed on a Sunday afternoon for the purpose, and given the two ladies their parts to take home—the gentlemen have intimated they do not require theirs. He waits at the appointed hour in the room where the rehearsal is to be held. There is a knock at the door; the Basso enters hastily, holding in his hand a letter from a friend who has invited him to come that very same day, to a christening festivity in X. "The coach does not start for an hour," he observes, "and by that time we shall have long since finished." True, if the others, also, had come. However, the bass part may be taken provisionally by itself. Meanwhile the Contralto makes her appearance, a somewhat aged spinster, in whose dress black and grey are the prevailing colors, her demeanor being marked by a certain dignified slowness of almost pietistic haut gout. "Ah, where can Mlle. N., our soprano, be?" she asks, in a mincing tone. "She must have met Herr A. again in the street, and is losing our valuable time by chattering with him. However, she need not fear your being very severe with her!" The reader must know that Mlle. N. is a beauty much run after in the town, though we do not accuse the Conductor of any partiality for her. The three wait a little, and the Bass drums upon the window. The Fair One, whose presence is so much desired, rushes in, at last, dressed to the death, it is true, but with a most engaging smile, and the politest excuses. "She had kept fancying the rehearsal was fixed for a later hour, and had only just recollected the time at which it was really to begin, etc." In her hurry, however, she has forgotten her music, and must sing from the Conductor's score. As a natural consequence, she is wrong at every bar. By the way, it must be stated that, in despair, they have begun rehearsing three parts only. The Bass keeps pulling his watch out of his pocket every instant, but the Tenor does not come! A messenger is despatched to his house, and is informed that the Tenor went out early in the morning, and left word that he was not to be expected home all day. "Good heavens! He has certainly gone into the country, while, with such magnificent weather, we are sitting in a desolate room, worrying ourselves with imperfect harmonies!" "A more fitting time ought to have been chosen for the rehearsal," growls the Bass, as though the unfortunate Conductor could have foreseen the fine weather, and the invitation to the christening feast. "I will tell him a bit of my mind," says the Conductor, menacingly. Poor fellow! the longer any one keeps you waiting, the more delighted you are at his arrival, and, when the criminal enters very jauntily in an airy summer costume, you rush up with the most friendly expression of countenance, and inform him you were afraid he had been taken suddenly ill. He assures you, however, that the train from L., where he has been breakfasting with a few friends, has only just got in, and you pour out all your wrath upon the head of the railway manager, who manages things so badly. All this time, the Tenor has his lighted cigar between his lips. Hereupon the Contralto, with a slight cough, complains of the smoke, while the Soprano declares she likes it, having been long since accustomed to it by her brothers and their friends. The effects of the breakfast upon the Tenor are evident in the first few bars of the Quartet, which is now rehearsed with all four parts; he sings persistently out of tune, and, at last, on account of unaccountable indisposition, requests that the piece may be sung two tones lower. This request is violently opposed by the Bass, who has already his hat and stick in his hand. The Conductor endeavors to arrange matters and transpose the piece one tone. This puts out the Contralto, who is too musical to sing correctly in a wrong key; so they begin afresh in the correct key, and go through the whole piece to the end. It sounds far from right. The Conductor wants to try it over again. But the Bass cannot stay any longer. "It will be all right," he observes consolingly, "the day after to-morrow. Bad rehearsal, good performance!" With these words, he hurries off. There are still two or three solos to be rehearsed. Mlle. N. begs the conductor to take her first, as she expects some one to call upon her. The Contralto remonstrates, because she has to attend a religious meeting, and was the first to come to rehearsal. The Tenor feels unwell; he has walked too fast he says. The Soprano, being very good-natured, is easiest to manage. The Conductor takes, therefore, the duet for the Tenor and Contralto. During the solo of the latter, the Tenor discovers that Mlle. N. has a bunch of neat golden charms. He begins playing with them, while the Contralto darts furious glances at him, and he forgets to come in at the right time. To help him, Mlle. N. sings the part in the upper octave. This sounds horrible. The Conductor gazes yearningly through the window at the blue sky and at the weathercocks, already gleaming in the golden rays of the evening sun; in the street below are heard the merry voices of children, and he thinks of the cool summer cellar, the echoing skittle-gallery, and the round table reserved for the regular customers. But he is still a captive. When he has, at last, dismissed the Contralto and the Tenor, the former to repair to her religious duties, and the latter to make up for what he has neglected in the afternoon, Mlle. N. still remains holding a thick piano-forte arrangement in her hand—she does not like singing from a part on account of the annoying pauses. The Adagio of the Air is sung with profound sentiment and melting fervor. "A great deal too much feeling!" an old Viennese master used to exclaim when a thing was spun out in this fashion. But our Conductor is obliged to praise the young lady, in order that she may be attentive in the Allergro. She does not keep time. It is true that she beats the tempo, but her beat is regulated by her own singing, so that, in a moment of irritation, the Conductor catches hold of her arm and guides her hand. Suddenly the door is thrown open, and Mlle. N.'s mamma sails in, with a sweet smirk upon her face. "Ah! I thought I should find you alone," she says. "I am very sorry to interrupt you, my dears, but our visitors here also wish to hear the air!" With these words, she points to two elderly females who follow her. These take possession of a couple of chairs, and Mlle. N. sings the air even more sentimentally and more out of time than at first. All kinds of songs are now demanded, and the Conductor has to accompany them. Meanwhile, the old ladies go on whispering to each other, and many expressions, such as "respectable settlement," "a steady young man," "honorable intentions," reach his ears, and cause him awful presentiments. "Must I put up with this, too?" he thinks, but he cannot justify himself without giving offence. At last, they rise, thank him, curtsying rather stilly, as they do, and sail off. The fine evening, however, is growing darker and cooler; the customers are already returning from the summer tavern in the country to their tavern in town; Mamma N. makes significant allusions among her acquaintances to the excellent match her daughter may contract with some one in the town. The result of all this is evident to the poor Conductor at the general rehearsal the next evening. A third of the tenors do not appear, and several young ladies are conspicuous by their absence. Incomprehensible! Our hero does not know that every one of the missing tenors had cast an eye upon Mlle. N., and that every one of the missing sopranos had, probably, cast two eyes upon him, and learnt sufficient from the statement of Mlle. N., which had been rapidly spread abroad, and duly garnished up with additional particulars, to entertain a sudden feeling of dislike for him, poor fellow, and to punish his supposed secret by wounding him in his tenderest point—non-attendance at the grand rehearsal. Had our friend a more delicate ear, and a calmer disposition, he would derive some explanation of the state of matters from the general whispering, which, on Mlle.'s entrance, rises into a most unmistakable sensation; but he is in that hateful state of excitement known only to those fellow sufferers who have conducted a grand rehearsal.

The public performance is far less fatiguing. The ball then rolls along its appointed course, which it is too late to alter; but the grand rehearsal, where, perhaps, all the executants meet for the first and only time, and where, in addition to the musical arrangements, so many troublesome trifles have to be settled, demands and exhausts the whole intellectual power of the Conductor.

After our friend has, for instance, given three taps with his conductor's wand, and five times most politely requested those present to be silent, he begins the first chorus. But he is immediately obliged to stop and ask the first and second basses not to stand mixed up together, but to be so kind as to separate, or else he has to beg that the ladies will be animated by a sisterly artistic feeling, and content themselves with one book between two. But many a fair member is short-sighted, or pretends to be so, and obstinately refuses to share her book with any one. The consequence is that the available parts are pulled backwards and forwards, and partially torn, while three or four persons are painfully peering, in many cases, into the same book. During the rehearsal, the carpenters are hammering away in the large hall close at hand, and when the Conductor balloons out, in a passion, for them to leave off making such a terrific noise—which prevents his hearing a note of the singing—the fat proprietor of the establishment appears and assures him that these preparations are indispensably requisite for the next evening, and that the workmen are not to be had at any other time. During the solos, the Conductor is again compelled to ask for silence, if only out of consideration for the soloists. The fact is, a new photograph is being circulated among the ladies, every one of whom thinks she is called upon to give her opinion of it, while a surreptitious beer-can is actually passed round amongst the men. But it does not strengthen their powers of endurance as much as it increases their longing for the smoking-room. Many of them do not wait for the final chorus, but leap down over benches and barriers, into the dark body of the room, where a few modest auditors are sitting, and disappear through a suspicious doorway, whence there issues an enticing odor of food and tobacco. With the last chord, the parts are thrown aside, and the majority of the members hurry out without any leave-taking. Only those who have some question to ask, or some demand to make, gather round our hero, who wipes the perspiration from his brow, and is at length left by himself, not to get cool, but to gather up and arrange the parts again, to correct some fresh faults that have been found in them, to tell the attendant to execute a hundred necessary trifles, etc. When at length, completely jaded, he enters the eating-room, the best dishes are already struck out of the list; some of the members to whom he has to speak on important subjects are playing Tarock, and only half listen to him; others state it as their conviction that a great deal ought to have been gone over again, etc. Our friend hastens home early, and out of sorts; sleeps disturbedly, and dreams of solo singers who are suddenly attacked with hoarseness, and send word to say they cannot sing; of passages taken up at the wrong moment; and of cues overlooked. May nothing of this come true, but everything go off successfully!

* From the Süddeutsche Musik-Zeitung.

Music Abroad.

England.

THE HERFORD FESTIVAL began on the 20th of August. The Orchestra reports of it as follows:

For the people of the vicinity the annual gathering is doubtless an entertaining event. Life in a cathedral city and in the outlying parishes is usually a dull sort of routine, on which the advent of an occasion like the present agreeably breaks. Thus on Tuesday morning the cathedral was crowded. The civic authorities were there in their robes of office; the members of the Three Choirs were there for musical purposes; a large congregation was there, drawn by the anticipation of the annual excitement. Dr. Wesley was there at the organ (his own Service in F being done early in the morning), and the Dean of Hereford was there for the sermon.

At noon the first performance of music commenced, and lasted till three. The singers were Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Patey-Whytock, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Last Judgment" (Spohr); Psalm 84th (Milton's version) (Spohr); Chorus, "How lovely are Thy dwellings fair;" solo (Miss Edith Wynne), "My soul doth long;" chorus, "Happy who in Thy house reside;" quartet (Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Patey-Whytock, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Weiss), "Lord God of Hosts, hear now my prayer;" chorus, "Lord God of Hosts, who reignst on high;" Anthem, "Ascribe unto the Lord" (Dr. Wesley), soli, Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Julia Elton, and Mme. Patey-Whytock. After luncheon, Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was grandly executed, the magnificent choruses producing their usual effect. Additional wind-instrument parts were supplied by Mr. G. A. Macfarren. Mr. Santley and Mr. Sims Reeves joined the musical forces; Mr. Townshend Smith conducted, and Mr. Done of Worcester, presided at the organ. In "Thou didst blow with thy wind," the style of Mlle. Tietjens told splendidly, and gained general admiration. Mr. Sims Reeves did not take part with Miss Elton in the duet "Thou in thy mercy," though his name was down for it in the programme. Mr. Montem Smith was the substitute. But Mr. Reeves delivered with great fire and grandeur his old success, "The enemy said," and made up for the former deprivation. Choruses and band went fairly.

The first miscellaneous concert, given in the evening at the Stire Hall, was not so well attended as was anticipated: the audience, however, were occasionally vehement in their applause. The programme was as follows:—

Part I.—Selection from Mozart; Symphony in D, No. 4; aria, Mme. Patey-Whytock, "L'Addio;" recit. ed. nria, Mlle. Tietjens, "Non mi dir" ("Don Giovanni"); aria, Mr. Sims Reeves, "Deh per questo" ("La Clemenza di Tito"); duetto, Mlle. Tietjens and Mr. Santley, "La dove prende" ("Il Flauto Magico"); song, Mr. Montem Smith, "The Violet;" Andante et variations d'une Sonate in A, arranged for voice by J. B. Wekerlin, Miss Julia Elton. Song, Mr. Santley, "On a faded violet" (Piat-ti); Romanza, Miss Edith Wynne, "Quando a te lieta" ("Faust") (Gounod); violoncello obbligato, Mr. G. Collins; song, Mr. Weiss, "I am not old" (J. L. Hatton); national air, Mlle. Tietjens and chorus, "Rule, Britannia" ("Alfred") (Dr. Arne).

Part II.—Overture, "Melusina" (Mendelssohn); song, Mr. Sims Reeves, "My Queen" (Blumenthal); Irish melody, Mme. Patey-Whytock, "The Meeting of the Waters; stornello, Mlle. Tietjens, "La Volubile" (Bevignani); solo violin, Mr. H. Blagrove, Romance in F (Beethoven); duetto, Miss Edith Wynne and Mr. Sims Reeves, "Tornami a dir" ("Don Pasquale") (Donizetti); ballad, Miss Julia Elton, "Little Fay, pretty Fay" (Barnett); song, Mr. Santley, "Oh! Mistress mine" (Sullivan); air, Miss Edith Wynne, "Where the bee sucks" ("Tempest") (Dr. Arne); chorus, "Home, there's a storm" (Sir H. R. Bishop).

The first went in a very dull manner; there was little interest in the minds of the audience in the symphony in D, and still less with the Wekerlin arrangement of the sonata in A—as great a musical as a verbal hash. Yet the performance of the former was altogether creditable, and even by the bucolic audience the exertions of Mr. Townshend Smith, who conducted, were recognized at last and applauded. The Hereforders woke up presently, when the songs came on, and finished by encoring every one indiscriminately—a compliment which was politely declined by Mr. Sims Reeves. The "Melusina"—a favorite concert-overture with Mendelssohn—was given by the band too hurriedly, and without attention to shade—faults which effectually destroy the charm of an otherwise attractive work. This overture might have been, and the violin solo by Mr. Blagrove was the chief instrumental feature of the programme. This excellent artist played with his wonted finish. Returning to the vocal portion, we may notice the melodious duet from "Il Flauto," which first roused the dull agriculturists to a perception of the merits of Mozart; Dr. Barnett's agreeable song, "Little Fay," sung and re-sung by Miss Elton; Blumenthal's popular song, "My Queen," which Mr. Sims Reeves would not rouse; and the "Violets" (plural), which went very well, especially Piat-ti's; and "Rule Britannia," which the Hereforders evidently thought "fine." This last was rapturously applauded and encored. In "The Meeting of the Waters" Mme. Patey-Whytock altered the end in order to show off her fine voice—an aim which she achieved at the cost of the melody. Dr. Arne's "Where the bee sucks," and Mr. Sullivan's "O mistress mine," found great favor. The vocal arrangement of Mozart's Sonata there are no terms too strong to denounce. It does not suit the voice, and it is thoroughly spoiled in the mangling. Miss Julia Elton could make nothing of it.

On Wednesday morning the "Elijah" was well attended—a circumstance due to the popularity of this oratorio, which ranks in public estimation next to the "Messiah." Every seat in the aisle and nave was occupied; for not only was the second-favorite oratorio to be done, but the co-operation of Mme. Lind-Goldschmidt with Mme. Tietjens was an event from which much was expected. The arrangements for the reception of the crowd were extremely inadequate, and much confusion and annoyance resulted. The issue of the morning brought no disappointment: the singing of Mme. Goldschmidt was full of feeling and effect. Her voice has of course suffered from time, but the intellect and culture remain as excellent as ever, and the satisfaction of all who heard her was pronounced. Of the oratorio, the second part was better in point of execution than the first, and the forte passages better than the piano. The choruses, however, were on the whole very satisfactory, and the time was taken rapidly and effectively by Mr. Townshend Smith, under whose baton all things went smoothly. Mme. Tietjens was in superb voice, evidently incited to her best by the lady who stood at her side. "Hear ye Israel," and "Be not afraid," were given with surpassing beauty. The chief defect about Mme. Goldschmidt's performance was the necessity of forcing the upper notes: time has dealt kindly with her; but the effect of time is apparent. The gem of the whole work, "Cast thy burden," was hardly so well sung as could have been wished: the voices strayed by ever so little, but enough to mar the effect. Mr. Weiss repeated his old excellences and his old faults; his higher notes were shaly and unpleasant. Miss Edith Wynne has a fresh and sympathetic voice, which would have told better if she had always sung in tune. Miss Elton gave an intellectual reading of her part, and sang the solo "Woe, woe unto them" in a highly finished manner; and Mme. Whytock was full of dramatic instinct. The whole of the tenor music was borne by Mr. Montem Smith, and it is no light praise that he sustained the burden so well. Mr. Smith's chief merit is his willingness: as a singer he is somewhat too sentimental; but his obliging disposition does good service to his brethren. On both Tuesday and Wednesday he stepped, in a most cheerful manner, between Mr. Sims Reeves and disappointment; for the latter gentleman was announced to sing the second part of "Elijah," but the promise was not kept. Mr. Smith sang it all. The collection of the day was £188 2s. 1d., which, added to the previous amounts collected, made a total of £341 15s. 2d. This exhibited a falling off of Hereford's benevolence, as contrasted with the magnanimity of her sister cities.

At the concert on Wednesday night, Mr. Sims Reeves was unable to appear, and there was no Acis for Galtea, as Mr. Montem Smith was already cast for Damon. But an absurd amalgamation was made, and Damon and Acis being rolled into one, Mr. Smith took the burden on himself. The serenata was capably supported by Mlle. Tietjens, Mr. Santley, and the above-named tenor. The second part of the concert was protracted with encores, and did not terminate till midnight.

On Thursday morning the Cathedral overflowed with visitors, anxious to hear the novelty of this year's festival—Mr. Otto Goldschmidt's pastoral, "Ruth." Those who had not previously been enabled to gauge Mr. Goldschmidt's capacities as a composer were much disappointed at the result. Not all the good singing of the artists cast for "Ruth"—Lind, Patey, Whytock, Santley, and Montem Smith (Mr. Reeves was still unwell) could render the work interesting. Mr. Goldschmidt has aimed high: his failure has been proportionate. Beyond mentioning the circumstance of this failure we cannot this week go, and must defer any further remarks on "Ruth."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 14, 1867.

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

II.

To those who wonder how it is possible for the ear to apprehend and follow such a multiplicity of parts as Bach has woven into the first chorus of the Magnificat (five voice parts, besides all the instruments, all treated polyphonically) Franz offers aid and comfort in the following suggestion:

We do not deem it indispensable, with Bach, to follow the web of parts in all the details. As in a Gothic Cathedral the numberless particulars and minute embellishments only serve to give life and motion to the great whole, but not to draw the attention of the beholder away from that, precisely so it should be with the polyphony of Bach. Bach's harmonies unfold themselves for the most part, in great, broad proportions—the fundamental basses show this clearly enough;—these great groups he evidently resolves by a melodiously flowing carriage of the parts into smaller groups, giving rise to a multitude of secondary harmonies, busily thronging this way and that way. Now whoever seeks to follow this fleeting, transitory essence, will soon be wrecked, because before one form has completed its whole outline, another is already pressing to the foreground, to give way as quickly to a third, so that all that is single and particular seems to elude the ear. The true significance of the detail, as well as of the whole, is lost by so listening to Bach. One must, much rather, seize upon those great proportions, seek to image them inwardly in his own mind, and from this firm basis learn to look with a sure insight into that seemingly confused, but really most richly artistic, organically developed complication of single parts. Then will those particulars in which the centre of gravity in every passage lies, those which have the decisive word to say, those which are the principal supporters of the artistic design, stand forth of themselves without difficulty, while that which is only intended to be subsidiary, and to round off the musical form in point of style, will cease to exercise any disturbing and bewildering effect. The secret of Bach's manner of leading on the parts lies in the close and intimate relation of each single part to the whole;—accordingly the understanding must keep in view, in the first line, the development of the whole, and seek through this to orient itself in regard to the particulars. Even for the musician, with the most searching study, entering into the smallest details, it will never do to leave this out of sight, unless he would run the risk of misunderstanding Bach.

Now here our first Chorus, in spite of the richest fullness and variety, unfolds itself essentially in the most simple forms. As a first change the Dominant is introduced, from which the chorus in its further course takes a side direction to the parallel key (or relative minor). From this the modulation swerves unconstrainedly back toward the Tonic, touches the Subdominant in passing, and finally makes a full close in the Tonic. Ornate melodic cadences mark the end points of the principal keys and give a tender lyric breath to the grand, majestic forms. After the vocal setting has come to an end, the orchestra comes forward again with an independent post-lude, which is taken from the second half of the prelude. We see how simply and with what comprehensive oversight Bach knew how to lay out the fundamental relations of his plan! Dazzling splendor and jubilant joy, as of each meeting each in the most graceful intertwining of tones, are the leading attributes of this first number. Keeping expectation on the stretch, it admirably prepares you for the following, and is like the festively decorated entrance to the temple, in which songs of thanksgiving and praise resound to the might and mercy of the Lord.

2. The next sentence brings a Solo (D major, 3-8 measure), which in a lovely manner flashes back as individual feeling the same emotions, to which the chorus has lent a broad and weighty expression. The voice part, a Second Soprano, treats the words of the text: "Et exultavit spiritus meus in Deo salutari meo" (And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour), and is accompanied by the string quartet, here and there interrupted by the Organ. A gently soaring motive, seconded in easy play by an intervening bass figure, which afterwards, as the whole goes on expanding, imparts itself ornamentally to the first violin, controls almost exclusively the development of this mild and tender Arioso. Here all so rounds itself to the most beautiful symmetry of forms, that the last half of each musical sentence seems to flow from the first half of itself. Such a bright, childlike joy, which runs along so wholly unobstructed and untroubled, could only spring from the absolute purity of a virgin heart.

3. Quite different is the character of the number which now follows, an Aria for the First Soprano (B minor, 4-4 measure), to which a Chorus is appended in the most immediate connection. The solo part is built upon the words: "Quia respexit humilitatem ancillæ suæ: ecce enim ex hoc beatam me dicent"—the chorus, on their continuation: "omnes generationes." (For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden, for, behold, from thenceforth all generations shall call me blessed). Plain and simple as the style seems in which the Air is outwardly disposed of—the song is only accompanied by an Oboe d'amore and the Organ—its depth of feeling is most touching. Bach conceives the text words not only within the situation in which they present themselves; his musical conception evidently reaches far beyond. In Mary he perceives not only the humble, lowly maid, to whom the Saviour of the world has just been announced and who in blissful peace enjoys the consciousness of this great boon—he rather, with a prophet's eye, sees in her that mother of God, whose Son is to bear and to atone for the sins of the world under a servile form. How else shall we explain the uneasy, fearful, plaintive tone that like a dark veil settles down over all the still repose and devotion? And still more is this mystical conception of Bach confirmed, when we take into view the character of the chorus that falls in so swiftly, in F-sharp minor, 4-4 time. In wild, eager haste the voice-parts rush in at the close of the solo piece and, as if driven by demonic forces, tower to such a colossal height of expression, that it is easy enough to imagine that the master seeks to bring before us here a world-convulsion of the most unexampled kind and from its remotest starting point. Perhaps there floated over his deep soul in the moment of creation the words of Christ: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword."

The extremely energetic theme is first seized by the Bass, around which the second Soprano, Alto and Tenor start off with a whirling motion. Then follow the further entrances of the theme, which constantly draws after it a powerful, wildly excited figure; they succeed each other in half measures blow on blow. A far reaching sequence crowds it tone by tone upward, till it at last finds a momentary point of rest in the parallel key, A major. But without rest or peace the heaving masses roar along in a new onslaught, which shapes itself, if possible, in still bolder and more gigantic proportions, hurrying toward another goal, the key of the Dominant, C-sharp minor. Thus far an angrily murmuring bass figure has roared below the voices, irresistibly (in obedience to that sequence) working its way up out of the dark depths. Suddenly the Halt! is given to the Basso Continuo: sharp and heavy orchestral strokes, marking the Dominant Chord of F-sharp minor on the first and third quarter of the measure with full force, follow, and so form a sort of Organ point, above and within which now the main theme is heard in the most fabulous contractions. Imitations in five-part Canon, in unison and in the octave, in swift succession on the quarter beats, press onward to a strange, uncomfortable hold (jermata), which forms in a certain sense the decisive crisis of our stormy chorus. For after this the voices, swiftly hastening to the conclusion, move with almost homophonous uniformity, as if blended into steadfast unity—the purification process, although after violent conflicts, is fulfilled in them!

(To be continued.)

The Coming Opera Season

Italian Opera, under Maretzek's direction, will open at the New York Academy on the 23d of this month. The repertoire, so far as yet whispered by the newspaper quid-nuncs, is not very inviting to those who love music in a deeper sense than that of fashion or of momentary sensation. For novelties are promised, of course, the two latest Parisian fashions: Verdi's Don Carlos and Gounod's Romeo and Juliet, also a Leonora of Mercadante's (not a word of one by Beethoven, commonly called Fidelio!), and some pretty trifles (we suppose they are) such as De Ferrari's Pipolo and Cagnoni's Don Bucefalo. Among the revivals are named Bellini's Romeo and Juliet; Donizetti's Belisario and Maria di Rohan; Meyerbeer's Prophet; Rossini's Otello. Of course too there will be the usual Verdi and Donizetti hacks, the Gounod Faust, &c., &c. Nothing first-class in the whole, except most likely, Don Giovanni, which no opera company can afford to shelve entirely. No Nozze di Figaro, nor Magie Flute, nor Scraglio of Mozart; no Fidelio; no William Tell; nothing by Weber, nor by Cherubini; none of those noble classical revivals which have redeemed the character of the London houses in spite of the "wide-weltering chaos" of trash! But then Italian Opera is a thing of fashion mainly, and must be expected to seek first to please the fashionable rather than the sincerely musical. If we only had a good permanently organized German Opera at the same time, which should carry out the promise of that which gave us Fidelio, &c., a few years since, we should not object to the Italian Opera in its peculiar province. But now it seems as if it must all go one way, and we were not to be allowed to associate with the word Opera any hopes of what is best in music,—when there are such noble operas in existence!

The real remedy, which we fear is far off, must lie in permanent local lyrical establishments, which may provide for this want with the same superiority to momentary popularities and fashions that our Philharmonic Societies do in Concert music. So long as we depend on private speculation (which is instinctively opposed to everything of quiet growth and permanence), we shall know Opera only by short, feverish seasons, in which advertising is the chief part, more froth than ale, the whole aim being to exploit each field in turn as hastily as possible, get all the dollars that can be got out of people's pockets in the smallest number of weeks, overdoing the thing by frequency of performance, and leaving the musical sensibilities of each little opera public utterly exhausted and demoralized for any healthy interest in the better music of unpretending, calm occasions.

Of Mr. Maretzek's New York season we gather further particulars from the Evening Post:

It is subdivided into two subscription series of twenty nights. The regular nights will be as heretofore, the Thursday performances at Brooklyn continuing as usual. The company engaged is a very large one, including in its list of principal singers seven prima donnas, four tenors, two baritones, one primo buffo, and two basses. The chorus has been enlarged and improved. The orchestra could hardly be bettered.

There are thousands who will regret the withdrawal of the name of Miss Kellogg, who has gone to win new lyric triumphs abroad, but her place will be supplied not only by Mme. Parca-Rosa, but by Signora Peralta, who became slightly known to us last season. The inimitable Ronconi has again been hired from a London engagement by Mr. Maretzek's more liberal offers. The public's old and ever trustworthy favorite, Bellini, who always does nobly, has been re-engaged, as a matter of course, and so are Antonucci, Baragli and Testa. Miss Hauck, Mme. Natali-Testa and Mlle. Ronconi are also re-engaged.

Of the new engagements, the first is that of Mme. Kapp-Young, a dramatic soprano, of whom much is expected, but little known here. Mrs. Jenny Kempton, a contralto, who graduated with honor from the concert room, and has been studying opera in Italy, is also engaged. Signor Anastasi, a tenor already pleasantly familiar to our public; Signor Pancani, a "robust" tenor of European reputation; Signor Paulo Mendini, a young Italian basso of great reputation, and Signor Orlandini, have been engaged.

The Opera will of course scenter its favors round in what New Yorkers like to call the "provincial" cities, by two or three weeks at a time, during the winter,—in short just as often as it will do to pass the hat round. In Boston, we are told, Maretzek will come to the new "Selwyn's Theatre," not yet completed; when, we are not informed.

2. There is also mention of another Italian Opera party, under the management of Max Strakosch, who has induced that admirable artist of former days, Madame LAGRANGE, to revisit America. He has also secured Signor BRIGNOLI, and it is said the concern is to bear the name of "The Lagrange Brignoli Combination."

3. Then comes Mr. Bateman's importation of the lightest and Frenchiest of light, farcical French extravaganza and burlesque, the humors of Offenbach, whom the New York Weekly Review calls "the presiding musical genius of the old world" (Heaven save the Old World, and the New!). He has brought all the requisite French singers and other outfit, and will open in New York, at the French Theatre, about the same time with Maretzek. Report speaks highly of the leading prima donna. It will be a novelty and no doubt amusing; at any rate we shall be able to see for ourselves whether the Offenbach celebrity is merely an idle fashion or something more. Mr. B.'s first experiment on the New York public will be Offenbach's latest, said to be his best work: "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein."—Of this, too, we are to have our turn at the new theatre.

4. Light English Comic Opera, at the Boston Music Hall, is among the things anticipated. About the middle of January it will begin, in a kind of "Parlor Opera" style, under the direction of Mr. JULIUS ETENBERG, who proposes to bring out his own clever, sparkling little operettas, the "Doctor of Alcantara," and some new ones, with fuller means of execution than heretofore.

5. There is a RETURNING English Opera, making Philadelphia its point of departure, with plans of traversing the country. Balfé, we suppose, is the type thereof.

6. Where is the German Opera? Where is Trudlo, and all the hopes it raised? Where are Frederici and Himmer and Habelmann and Hermanns, and the rest? Why will it not come and plant itself in Boston, and live on modestly and quietly and grow?

NEWPORT, R. I. An Amateur concert was given on Thursday evening, Sept. 5, by the residents and pleasure seekers of this happy isle, "for the benefit of the suffering women and children of the Island of Crete," unhappy isle upon the other side of the globe. It was the work of a few energetic ladies, whose sympathies were strong for freedom and humanity, even at that distance, and who, bravely overcoming many obstacles, brought it to a very successful result. The "Academy of Music" was well filled by the best part of Newport society, and the concert realized more than five hundred dollars for the Cretans. Musically, too, it seems to have given great pleasure. We are not at liberty to name the amateurs, as some of them took part on the express condition that they were not to be "published." There was a charming fresh soprano from Boston, who gave great delight by singing the rapturous "Ah! in glücklicher Herz" of Bach, as well as Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," and in a Donizetti Duet. There was also one of our ripest and finest contraltos, who sang Lachner's "Thou everywhere," and some ballads, with truest expression; and one of our best basses;—these last two very kindly went down at a few hours' notice to offset some serious disappointments in the programme. A gentleman from New York sang tenor solos (Italian) tastefully; there was fine piano playing by two Newport ladies, and a gentleman amateur of Boston did good service in the accompaniments.

TOO MUCH OF A GOOD THING PERHAPS. It is cheering to see how rapidly the interest in music spreads among the American people. But there is such a thing as overdoing it. Is there not danger that so many "Conservatories" (think of five already in New York, and one or more new ones threatened!) may tend more to sweep in vast numbers of superficial pupils, than to raise up a reasonable number of good musicians or to "conserve" the tone and standard of true Art? We should be sorry to see music rushed into merely as a new opening in business, like Petroleum and the various "fancies" which have slain their tens of thousands. At least we trust that none of our readers, (whom we are doing our humble part to make as musical as we can), are music-mad enough not to see the good sense of the following from the Transcript:

MUSICAL INCAPACITY. How many young persons we see who spend a vast amount of time in the practice of music, but who evince by their little progress that if they were to pass their entire mortal existence at their instrument they would never become good musicians. At best, they in the end can only succeed in the performance of a few pieces in a third rate manner, just to put their hearers in mind how much better they have heard them played elsewhere by others who had a real genius for the science of harmony. The conversation, too, of these misdirected ones is often a sad commentary upon misspent time. So great has been the sacrifice of their hours, that they have devoted but little time to reading, and the poverty of their general information is on the same plane with that of their skill in music.

Yet, had the minds of many of these young persons been turned in another direction, they would have been found to possess a capacity, a genius as eminent as their genius for music is defective. Had they been supplied with books, and encouraged in the work of storing their memories with useful knowledge, until they had become habitual readers, they might have been brighter ornaments to their social circle than any musical talent could have made them.

Musical practice, at best, is an alarming absorbent of time, and at that period of life when time is most valuable,—the years of youth, when the character and habits are in the process of formation,—the precious moments cannot be too carefully spent. We would say to every parent, weigh well the capacity of your child, and the probability of his success in the difficult science of music, before making too great a sacrifice of time and money in that direction.

The name of Mr. L. W. WHEELER, the well-known teacher of vocalization, has been added to the list of instructors at the New England Conservatory of Music for the ensuing year.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 9.—It affords me very great pleasure to be able to report that there will soon be no cause for the complaint, which has been hitherto too frequently heard here, of the dearth of instrumental concerts. With the exception, alone, of our Germania Rehearsals, and the three Evening Concerts, at each of which a Symphony was produced, given by Messrs. Jarvis and Schmitz, last season, there have been no opportunities presented, at least to the present generation, for becoming familiarized with orchestral music. A good orchestra is indeed a noteworthy rarity in Philadelphia. It follows from this, that on the part of our really intelligent people, little or nothing is known of the great works of Beethoven, Mozart or Haydn, nor, of course, of Mendelssohn, Schubert, or Schumann; of the others, scarcely have the names been heard. This is a melancholy confession to make, but it is pleasanter to make it now, than heretofore, since there is every reason to believe that the future promises an improvement for us in this respect. Our new Hall (the "Horticultural"), unsurpassed, I think, for beauty and acoustic properties by any similar place of the kind in the country, is to be put to an appropriate use during the ensuing season, by Mr. Carl Sentez, who contemplates giving there a series of Weekly Orchestral Concerts, with an efficient corps of our best performers, under his own direction; producing in regular succession the works of the masters. Mr. Sentez promises, as well, the presence of solo assistants, vocal and instrumental, at each concert. It is an undertaking in the proper direction, and I trust will meet with the most cheering encouragement. It will be no fault of Mr. Sentez if he is not properly seconded in his praiseworthy efforts to elevate the standard of popular musical appreciation. The first concert will be given on Thursday afternoon, October 3, of which I will send you a detailed account.

An event worth chronicling in your columns is the production of a mass of Gounod's,—the only one, I understand, which he has written,—by the Choir of St. Augustine's Church in Fourth Street. The Mass has not yet been produced elsewhere this side of the water. It is by no means a great work; in it the composer falls below even his own not very high standard, and although the effect, as a whole, is pleasing, it is not a composition that is destined to occupy a prominent place among works of its class.

It lacks originality, and is sensational; the few solos introduced are tame in the extreme, and the more striking effects are borrowed from the masters. Without entertaining a very exalted opinion of M. Gounod's merits as a composer, I am not exacting or too critical, in expecting something much better from him than this somewhat weak attempt at sacred writing. Nevertheless, as the production of one of the most popular of modern musicians, it possesses an interest which would not perhaps otherwise attach to it. The mass was very creditably produced on last Sunday, when I had the pleasure of hearing it. It was directed by Mr. Thunder, who presided at the fine organ at this church, assisted by a large and well trained choir.

Our New Musical Society, the "Mendelssohn," formed last Spring, held their annual meeting last week and permanently organized. They promise the production of the "Walpurgis Night," at their first concert in October.

Mr. Wolfsohn is still in Europe, but is expected to be in the city before the end of the month. He has in contemplation a series of Soirées, assisted by Mr. Kopta, and a 'cello player, whom he expects to bring with him from Germany.

Messrs. Jarvis and Cross have likewise been sojourning on the Continent, during the vacation, and are now on their way homeward. These gentlemen will also do something in the matinée or soirée way; so that with the "Germania," the Opera, and the other attractions promised, and herein already noted, the friends of music will have enough to occupy and interest them.

MERCUTIO.

In a late number of the Revue des Deux Mondes is an article by the well-known publicist, Henry Blaze de Bury, entitled "Shakespeare and his Musicians." The writer is closely affiliated with German musicians, and is especially convinced of the musical importance of the "prophet of Munich," Richard Wagner, the composer of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Rienzi," etc. He pitilessly exposes the decline of French music, and arraigns it for making of Shakespeare's characters, Goethe's Faust, and Schiller's Carlos inanimate corpses, on which to hang its miserable tatters. He charges the manufacturers of librettos with a "pure stérilité et impuissance," and pities the poor composers who condescend to thresh such straw. Unfortunately, the composers themselves were most to blame, for they sought out-of-the-way ideas and buried them under effect-straining situations, bravura pieces, marches, and dancing melodies, agreeable entr'acte music, ballets, and masquerades. Gounod is particularly censured as having transformed Gretchen into a Parisian grisette. The unworthiness of his new opera, "Romeo and Juliet," beside the treatment of the same subject by Bellini—to whom, however, the writer is not very favorably inclined either—is dwelt upon. Rossini in his "Othello" had been inspired at least by a spark of Shakespearian genius, but Gounod sacrifices feeling and character in order to make them the hot-beds of his parasitical creations.—Nation.

The death of Mr. Bartholomew, the librettist of Mendelssohn's oratorios, occurred on the 18th ult. He wrote the book of "Elijah" for Mendelssohn, but did not select the subject for the composer, as it has been erroneously stated. Mendelssohn was struck with the little volume of Elijah's career from the pen of Krummacker, the celebrated German preacher, and out of these materials prepared the outline for Bartholomew of the Prophet's career. The late Mr. Bartholomew also prepared the books of "Eli" and "Naaman" for Costa. His last achievement, the words of Mr. Costa's Ode to the Sultan, provoked a good deal of banter among the critics. The deceased author was certainly no poet, but he was a good and conscientious man, who earned the personal respect of all that knew him. His wife is well known in musical circles as Mrs. Mounsey-Bartholomew, an organist and composer of ability.—Orchestra, Aug. 24.

A PICTURE OF HERR JOACHIM.—In an article on the "Pictures of the year," the Saturday Review says,—"Violinists have not generally much reason to be thankful to painters, who rarely understand either the form of the instrument or the manner of performance. Mr. Watts seems to be an exception to this rule. His "Lamplight Study, Herr Joachim," is absolutely true in its interpretation of violin-playing. The instrument is held as a master holds it, and the hair of the bow presses with due force and touches the strings in the right place; the violin, too, is beautifully drawn. There is great power in the treatment of the face, but Mr. Watts has strongly exaggerated the greenish tones that occur in lamplight. Herr Joachim has so much green in his complexion as to remind us of nothing human, so far as color is concerned, unless it be Mr. Kinglake's written portrait of the Emperor Napoleon when under the influence of mortal fear. Joachim's face is green, his hair is green, his fiddle is green, and the hair of his bow is green. The eyes are lustreless, like lumps gone out, and the whole picture has the disadvantage of being terribly chilled in the varnish, so that it seems as if there were a smoke between us and it. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, it is a noble portrait; the massive head is grandly modelled, and the gravity of the face, as well as its expression of energy, justly rebukes the Philistines who consider fiddling a light and trifling occupation. To pass one's life in the interpretation of great music as Herr Joachim does, and to bring to the task some true greatness of one's own, is a destiny which, though beyond the reach of most of us, and outside of our faculties and tastes, is at least as noble as common business, and, perhaps, for the full development of modern civilization, almost as necessary."

MUSIC IN A COUNTRY CHURCH IN FRANCE.—We extract the following from "A Week in a French Country House," by Adelaide Sartoris:—"Our Sunday function went off very brilliantly, and was eminently successful. The church was crammed from one end to the other with the relations and friends of the young people who were the principal objects of interest in the ceremony. I found that it was not a confirmation service, but the taking of their first Communion by the young village children who had just been confirmed. And what with the part they took and the part that we took in the performance, I must say that I think it was altogether as unedifying a spectacle as I ever assisted at. Our programme was singular but effective. First came the glorious Tantum ergo, for which Monsieur Kiowski had sacrificed himself with such a good grace, and which went beautifully—Monsieur Jacques, with a roll of music for a baton, directing for all the world as though we had been in a theatre. Then Ursula sang her Marcellus Psalm, and the grave tones went surging over the church in great waves of sound, and sending shivers down one's spine. Then followed a trio—also by Marcellus—sung by Ursula, Monsieur Kiowski, and Monsieur Charles; this, too, was beautiful and perfectly devout. After it came Jeanne's and Madame Martin's sweet hymn to the Virgin; then a cantique by the village girls, as trivial and profane as the romances one hears upon the street organs, and very like them; then Ursula got up again and sang her Stradella love-song, transmogrified for the first three or four bars into an O Salutaris, and then suddenly flaming out into very earthly ecstasies in right good Italian. Fortunately it was a song with a Da capo to it, so that she was able to relapse into devotion and Latin again at the conclusion. It was a splendid piece of audacity and a splendid piece of art; but although I could not help being transported with it, my conscience kept putting up a regretful protest all the time, and I could not bear her doing it. However, she had never been taught anything but singing, and religion has to be learnt as well as everything else. The performance wound up with a quartet (the most serious they could find) out of Rossini's Tancredi, sung without any attempt at disguise in its native Italian. Mixed up with all this came bits of the regular mass music, executed in our tribune (but not by us) upon a little braying, fiendish old organ with about as much regard to time and tune as distinguishes the infant German band in London streets. Alternating with it came doleful gusts of nasal chanting from the officiating priests below. No one appeared to have the slightest idea what was the right moment for anything to take place, and we made three or four false starts, cropping out into O Salutaris and Amabilis upon improper occasions, and being rebuked for it and speedily reduced to silence by Monsieur le Curé, who kept up a series of mysterious telegraphic communications with us by means of his arms from the other end of the church, where he was (I suppose) praying at the high altar. Sometimes he graciously waved and beckoned; at other times he protested, and as it were thrust us back again into our seats; and once or twice he did something that looked uncommonly like shaking his fist at us, when we persisted in opening our mouths in the wrong place. His energetic and expressive movements were all we had to guide us, and I think it was wonderful that the music did not go worse astray."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Up, up, gallant youths! (Siu baldi garzon).
Bass voice. "Romeo and Juliet." 40
- O, love, with thy torch. (Amor, si la tua face) " 60
- Angel that wearest. (Angiol che vesté). " 60
- Three selections from Gounod's newest opera. The first who sing them will be best "posted up" as to the beauties of the music, which is one of the "sensations" of Europe, at present.
- Sweet! sweet! Song. G. B. Allen. 30
- A charming variation on the song of the little bird who cries "Sweet! sweet!" in the morning.
- Arise, my love, arise! (Wach auf, mein Lieb!)
Song. Ad. Neudorff. 50
- Pressed to your loving heart. (Alpenklage). S'g.
Hölzel. 30
- Two German songs with translations. One is tempted to call them unusually pretty, although there are too many good things of the kind to safely say so. The first is a free and fresh morning song, and the second is in the loveable Suabian dialect.
- Fair Newport. Song. W. Harland. 30
- The words are an emanation from the poet Bachelder, and the "fair" of "Newport" ought to do no less than sing the song which compliments them.

Instrumental.

- Tell me, darling. Quickstep. Dr. Ordway. 35
- A quickstep or march used to be the highest aspiration of our players and composers. Here is something with the old name, but finely wrought and very brilliant.
- Träumerei. (Reverie). Schumann. 25
- It is a pleasure to play these shorter pieces of Schumann, only to enjoy their exquisite workmanship. There is as much music in these two pages, as sometimes in a dozen more diffusely elaborated.
- Whispering Breeze Polka. C. J. Dorn. 30
- Has a kind of rushing, whispering sound, which comports well with the title.
- Amoretten tanze Waltzes. Gung'l. 60
- Brilliant.
- Beware! Waltz. J. S. Knight. 30
- Champagne Charlie. Polka. " " 35
- Mr. Knight has made two very fortunate selections of themes. "Beware" is Longfellow's "beware! take care! she is fooling thee!" set to music, or rather without the words. And rattling, clattering Charlie comes in splendidly in the quick changes of the polka.
- Maria Varsoviana. Planel. 30
- Olivia Polka. " 30
- Forget-me-not Waltz. " 60
- Three able compositions.

Books.

- THE GREETING. A collection of Gleees, Quartets, Choruses, Part songs, &c.
By L. O. Emerson. $1.38
- This will be found to be one of the most "usable" glee books brought out for many years. The music is easy enough to please the popular taste, which dislikes difficulty, and there is quite enough of character to it to please more exacting singers. It will be a welcome visitor to the "extra rehearsals" of choirs, and to musical assemblages generally.
- MOSCHELES' STUDIES. Op. 70. Book 2. 3.00
- These contain the results of many years experience of the veteran teacher. Almost unnecessary trouble has been taken, in providing two ways of fingering many passages, and the whole is carefully fitted for instructors and their pupils.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 691.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 28, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 14.

Mendelssohn.

BY CHARLES LEON GUMPERT.

["Yesterday I drove here and at night met with a wonderful organ, on which I could play "Schünke dich, O! liebe Seele!" to my heart's content."—MENDELSSOHN'S LETTER FROM SARGANS, September 3, 1831.]

There came into the church at death of day,
When angel shapes with vestments like to flames,
And crimson saints on pictured panes wide-arched Became as pallid ghosts in purple mist;
With silence and with twilight came there in
A wise musician, wizard king of tones,
Who passed into the organ in the loft,
The dusty, mould'ring loft, all choirless,
Where carven cherubim and seraphim
And imaged sacred symbols loomed up large.
He bowed and pressed the wasted, yellow keys,
With taper, waa, girl fingers; sudden then
His soul beheld a song-created light;
The lurid spaces, shade and twilight waned
Before his eyes. He felt no weight of gloom:
For life to him a splendid motet seemed,
Replete with happy music, sunshine songs,
And redolent of blissful cadences,
Arpeggios of laughter rambling in.
And earth a voice exultant seemed to him
That joined the singing planet chorons vast
With human song, an alto of high hope!
He smiling sat entranced and wove the wof
Of music, watched by staring cherubim
Then spurring to full life the monster there,
The organ, giant-voiced and grand in speech,
He improvised stupendous harmonies;
Created holy symphonies and wierd,
Majestic marches, fantasies sweet-rhymed
And dulcet, elfic, joy-voiced overtures,
The reminiscences of nightingales
Whose trebles thrill the dreaming birds at dusk
All perfect pastorals of precious peace,
Soft shepherd songs and lullaby of lute,
Ecstatic allegro of child delight
And torment-soothing fugues of quaintest sound,
While, pedal-trodden, glided rhythmical
His diapason thunder rolling strong.
He urged the massive keys to mould and make
The shapes his soul desired, as sculptors urge,
With coaxing finger, clay inane to live.
These be the varied moods he wrought in tune—
Sweet songs that need not words, but pregnant are
With love, expression, hope and holy praise!

LARGO.

With tone on tone and semitone I build up fair to Thee mine edifice of song,
And climb to Thee on notes that reach into Thy Heaven, massive consonance of strong Triumphant phrases, such as Miriam, 'mid the timbrel clangor, joy-ecstatic sang,
With happy chorus of delivered hosts, Thy Moses led, when shawm and sacbut rang,
And Thou didst save the nation. Oh! Most High!
I bend unto mine instrument to speak Thy praise, and from mine organ-altar here, with choicest chorals worthiest voicings seek
To consecrate to Thee an anthem sphere-reverberant, magnificent with chord
And wealth of tonic scale, that angel-wise shall soar and hover in Thy presence, Lord!

I praise Thee evermore! O! let Thy children mingle perfect unisons of love,
And modulate their griefs that are the undertones of life and dolorously move
As discord basses. Let the merry scherzo trebles of all joyance smoothly glide
Our sweet mooded burdens, soulful basses, harmonies of life beatified!

ANDANTE.

Arise, my puissant music, ever strong to strike and smite
The angry fiends and evil, lurking phantoms horn of night,
And demon shapes, Walpurgis witches, wrangling imps who bring
All discords hell-engendered! Oh! arise and soar on wing
Intense with lightnings, as an armed angel, floating grand,
To scatter vivid lances of great glory from thine hand
To haunts of gloom, where groping men do toil, and where there broods
An awful, stagnant silence! Awake! sweet-chored moods
And cheer the wearied souls of men, as cooling winds from sea
Float welcome to their brows in August heats!
They pray for ye!

ALLEGRETTO.

Al! magic pipes, that emulate
The wailing winds and singing seas,
And all the varied melodies
Of earth or heaven consecrate,
Repeat for me but merry songs;
No dismal hints of human wrongs!
Repeat the children's many joys,
In semi quavers of oboes!
With obligato of bassoon
And trumpet and sweet viol tune;
Repeat the hymns of Hebrides,
The harps that echo untamed seas,
The phrase expectant maiden hums,
Conscious her eager lover comes;
And delicate toccata fraught
With all delicious noted thought
Of marvellous Sebastian Bach!
The gates of melody unlock,
With all the soft, responsive keys,
My Abbé Vogler's reveries!

There sudden clashed a clanging bell, the hour
Aloud sepulchral wailed. The music died.
Again the old church night and silence wore;
The bellows boy awoke from tingling dreams;
The sexton too upstarted from his nook
And, thrilled to tearfulness, beheld emerge
A black-clouked phantom, that soft glided out
And lost himself in night. Then all was still!

—Sunday Dispatch (Philadelphia).

Recent German Operas.—Reinecke's "King Manfred."*

(Translated from the German for this journal).

In the history of Music, as in other spheres of human development, there are periods of transition, marked by the dying out of the genius

* Opera in 5 Acts by Fr. Reiber, music by Carl Reinecke Produced for the first time at the Royal Theatre in Wiesbaden which inspired the old works, followed by a "storm and pressure" period of seekers after something new, whether with a conscious, clear ideal, or only a vague anticipation. Unquestionably we find ourselves in such a situation as regards the Opera. In Italy, the period which began with Rossini is utterly effete, since Verdi is about written out, and no successor worthy to be named yet shows himself. Italians of taste and culture turn their eyes to Germany. Their publishers begin to reprint the better German works, and the younger Italians seek to acquire the German culture, having learned justly to regard that as the fresh spring, from which alone can flow for them a thorough reformation for their spent Art.

—France, in the grand Opera, had yielded the primacy to the eclectic and speculative Meyer-beer, and even in the comic opera, the properly national Art work, has seen composers of German antecedents, Herold, Halevy, Adam, dominate.
But we must not deceive ourselves about the artistic worth of the productions which have gone forth from Paris and had their run in all theatres during the last thirty years. On conventional grounds, produced with a more or less happy gift of invention and technical skill, mechanically, those works have only a relative worth in detail, while on the whole and in a great sense they lay no claim to the satisfaction of any sort of ideal requirements, which, apart from conventionalism, conceal another, deeper reason in themselves than a more or less amusing entertainment. At present Gounod is the hero of the day,—owing, essentially, to the success of his Faust, in which (thanks to his essentially German musical culture), he knew how to introduce, along with so many trivialities, some traits of that Romanticism which, until to-day, is met with in no other French score. Whether he will succeed, or how far, in fixing and deepening the tone which he has struck, and in becoming the French Weber, we must wait to see. The works, which have come from Gounod's pen since the Faust, justify no such hope.

In Germany, it is three names essentially, which seem to be epoch-making in the history of Opera: Mozart, Weber, Wagner. The first as founder of a German Opera in the classic style;
Weber in the Romantic style; and finally Wagnner, by his attempt to do away with the divided labor and produce the Musical Drama, at once poetically and musically, in great features, out of the motives contained in the subject matter and the persons.

Since Wagner, operatic production has had to choose between three ways. Either to attach itself to Wagner's predecessors, or to go with Wagner, or finally to seek out new and independent paths. This last seems now to be the effort of the more gifted young producers. But the independence, which they strive to maintain in their undertakings, can of course only be a relative one; for in the first place they are dependent, partly, on the susceptibility of the public; and then, just the most cultivated and most zealous among them must, on the principle: "Try all things, hold fast to that which is good," surrender themselves to eclecticism in the best sense of the word.

A glance at the German repertoire teaches, that since Wagner there have been no German operas created, which have held a lasting place upon the stage. Nevertheless the activity among the producers is just now very great. Among the works, which the last years have brought us, the most talked about have been: "Loreley," by Geibel and Max Bruch; "Des Sängers Fluch" (The Minstrel's Curse), by Meyern-Hohenberg and August Langert; "Astorga," by Pasqué and Joseph Abert. . . . Bruch's "Loreley," in spite of the various "protections" which the composer enjoyed, has not yet been able to find its way into one of our great court theatres, and its success in Mayence was not encouraging as to its acceptance here (in Wiesbaden).

"Des Sängers Fluch" unquestionably betrays a certain natural talent in the composer, and our Intendant, Herr von Bose, was not disinclined to accept it; but the political events of the last summer prevented.

Abert has sent his opera into the world with his customary aplomb and with that colossal reclame, in which he is even more a master than in composition. In our opinion the performance of "Astorga" is not without prospect of success with the great public, for everything in it is practical and made with a knowledge of trivial outward effects; on the other hand all depth and sanctity are wanting, and the hollowness of the whole can scarcely remain long concealed even to a not exacting public.

Under such circumstances our new Intendant, Herr von Bequinolles, has undertaken to put upon the stage the work of a composer, who by his previous achievements in all fields of musical art has won the honorable reputation of an artist in an earnest and ideal direction and furnished with all needed mastery in technical respects. This is the opera of which we here propose to speak, the five-act opera "König Manfred," by CARL REINECKE, the successor of Mendelssohn as professor in the Conservatorium and Director of the world-famous Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig.

Born in Altona on the 23d of June, 1824, Reinecke received his first piano-forte instruction from his father, who, a venerable old man of 73 years, is now here (in Wiesbaden) to attend the first performance of his son's opera. At the age of eleven Reinecke could already let himself be heard in public, and in his eighteenth year he made an art journey to Copenhagen and Stockholm, which was brilliantly successful. For the completion of his studies he then went to Leipzig, where his progress was much furthered by intercourse with Mendelssohn and Schumann. Next follow, during the years 1844-51, a series of journeys, partly alone, partly in company with the violinists Wasielewsky and Königslow, to North Germany; to Copenhagen, where King Christian VIII. appointed him court pianist; to Paris, where he made the acquaintance of Hiller, who engaged him as teacher of piano and counterpoint for the Conservatory at Cologne. In 1854 he went to Barmen as Music Director, in 1859 to Breslau as University musical Director, in 1860 to Leipzig in his present above named capacity.

Among the 92 printed works of Reinecke are found the Oratorio Belshazzar; a Battle Song for double chorus of men's voices; a Te Deum for the 50th anniversary of the battle of Leipzig; the operetta "Der vierjährige Posten;" a great number of songs for one or more voices; moreover a Symphony, the overtures to "Dame Kobold" and "Haddin," a Concerto for piano and orchestra, a Quintet with piano, a Trio with piano, a Concerto for the violoncello, two piano Sonatas with 'cello, two string Quartets, and a very considerable number of piano pieces for two and four hands. A large part of these works have become known in very numerous performances, and many of them enjoy a well deserved popularity. "King Manfred" is Reinecke's last work, and so at any rate the product of a cultivated mind, a ripe experience, a still blooming fancy and a noble will. The text was written by Fr. Röber in Elberfeld, favorably known by the dramas: "Henry IV.," "Tristan and Isolde," "Appius Claudius," "Sophonisbe," the "Märchen von König Drosselbart," a collection of dramatized German popular fairy legends, and numerous ballads, romances, songs, &c. The coöperation of the poet and composer is of old date. Röber also wrote the text to Reinecke's "Belshazzar."

The fortunes of Manfred, of the Hohenstaufen family, have been the subject of various historical monographs; among others, of a drama by Raupach. Undoubtedly the contest of this brave as well as fantastical man against the popes Innocent IV., Urban IV., and Clement IV., who sought the annihilation of the Hohenstaufen rule, excites a high tragic interest. Röber in his libretto merely treats of the last episode in the very eventful life of Manfred, which came to a bloody termination in the battle of Benevento (1266), and within these limits he makes use of all allowable poetic license.

In the first act we are transported to the environs of Naples. It is night. The fishermen on the shore are preparing to haul in their nets. To them come one by one several of the nobles banished by Manfred, as well as nuns from a neighboring cloister, among whom is Chismonde. Complaints about Manfred's government resound on all sides. Chismonde, who joins in them, shows nevertheless, after the men have retired and she is alone with her sisters, in a conversation with one of them, that she never has seen Manfred really, but only in a dream. Hence she betrays a sympathetic attraction toward Manfred, which she vainly tries to overcome. This attraction is nothing but the spark of love, which only needs the actual appearance of Manfred, to kindle into flame. But Manfred too, on his part, who has just appeared with his trusty Eckart and a Love Court of knights, ladies and minstrels in fantastical procession, feels an equally mighty attraction toward Chismonde. Surely he would soon have and hold her fast within his power, but for the arrival of a Cardinal with his train, who comes commissioned with a last demand on Manfred to change his attitude towards Rome.

(Conclusion next time).

Auber.

(From "Musical Letters from Paris," in the Berlin Echo.)*

The two Grand-Masters of Musical Art in Paris pursue a completely opposite mode of life. While Rossini enjoys his day by passing it in Olympian repose, Auber requires constant activity. The former avoids every kind of exertion which would wear out the machinery of his existence; the latter, on the contrary, seems to fear that indolence would cause the works to grow rusty and stop. Rossini, a refined symbol of the Italian dolce far niente, keeps at a distance the world, with all its enjoyments as well as all its serious affairs, and nothing can surpass the repose of his life in town except that of his life at his country-house. Auber, who is the incorporation of French restlessness, would, on the contrary, die, were he not to come constantly into contact with society; even during the heat of summer, the bustle of Paris possesses a greater charm for him than the idyllic monotony of a rural life.—Auber is 85 years old; we can not well suppose that, at such an age, his activity can be attended with any great advantage to art, but it is in itself a phenomenon. The grey-haired master retires to bed at one o'clock in the morning, and gets up regularly at five. A cup of tea for breakfast has to constitute all his nourishment till about seven in the evening, when he plays his part valiantly at a solid and set dinner. It is rarely that he can stay at home later than nine o'clock in the morning. He goes to the Conservatory, to the Senate, or to the Institute; lounges on the Boulevards, or takes a carriage-drive.

In his own house, Auber does not see so much company as Rossini, though his brilliant circumstances would render the duties of hospitality easy for him. Is this because he is not married? Yet there is an elegant and stately lady to whom people pay almost the honors due to the mistress of the house. The composer of Fra Diavolo, who grew up in a feeling of admiration for the fair sex, and is still susceptible to their charms, could not exist without having females about him. Auber receives incomparably fewer visits than Rossini. It is not every one who possesses the desire and the courage to visit a celebrated man before eight o'clock in the morning, especially when he is guarded by his household with fearful jealousy. The basis of the Auberian system of fortifications is a weird-like old housekeeper, who has guarded the composer's street door in the Rue St. Georges for the last forty years, by word and deed. This celebrated female demon looks upon every visit intended for her master as a personal insult to herself, and is capable of hurling, with outstretched arms, the affrighted stranger into the road.

Fortunately, I enjoyed, in the course of four months, plenty of opportunities for closely observing Auber in his social character as well as his character as an artist and a man of business. It was near the termination of the Italian operatic season. Adelina Patti, who, in her elegant residence of the Avenue des Champs Elysées, did not lead so claustral a life as she did, in 1863, in the Klostergasse, Vienna, gave her acquaintances a joyous farewell soirée. According to the custom of Paris and London, the evening-party was preceded by a dinner offered to a more restricted circle of friends. Besides some ladies living in the house, and friends of the hostess, Bagier, the manager of the Italian Opera; M. de Thal, Russian Councillor of State; Gustave Doré, the painter; and the famous horn-player, Vivier, occupied places at the table. Vivier's presence is a well-known guarantee for good-humor. Vivier enjoys everywhere the greatest popularity as an amusing companion, maker of jokes, and teller of anecdotes. A genuine original, to-day the lion of a drawing-room, to-morrow a "Bohemian," he is as much at home in the most smoke-begrimed public-house frequented by artists, as in the saloons of the Emperor Napoleon. A German speech, made by him towards the end of dinner, brought back vividly to my mind the similar talent of Alex. Baumann. Vivier, whose entire stock of German was limited to the words "meine Herren," arose with a glass of champagne in his hand, and, with a gravity that convulsed his hearers, began pouring forth a flood of nonsense, which no one understood, but which every one supposed to be German. The gesticulations and modulations, too, of German speechifiers on festive occasions were imitated with eminent comicality. The general feeling was worked up to such a pitch of hilarity that every fresh joke fell upon good ground. Such, for instance, was the ease with the proposal to drive off at once (in the darkness of the night) to Doré's studio, for the purpose of seeing his new picture, the Gaming Table at Homburg. Two fiances were quickly engaged, and we drove off to the studio which was situated close by in the Rue Bayard. The colossal genre picture in question, with nearly one hundred figures life-size, which was destined to be, some weeks later, the principal attraction in the Fine Art Exhibition, was standing, still unfinished, in utter darkness. It was rather funny to see Doré, with a lamp in his hand, mount the scaffolding and light up the picture from the right, while his color-grinder, perched upon a ladder, illuminated the left side. Doré, whose clever illustrations of Don Quixote, Dornröschen, and Dante's Divina Commedia have long been known in Germany, is a neat young man, with very prepossessing features and manners, one of those genuinely French artistic beings who combine the fullest enjoyment of life with the most astonishing industry. He urged us to leave as soon as possible the half-darkness of his studio and return to the brilliantly lighted drawing-room. This was already filled with a dazzling throng of beautiful women, popular artists and diplomatists glittering with orders. The celebrated vocalist, Grisi, had just entered with her three daughters, young girls as slim as fawns, with dark tresses, and eyes beaming with intelligence. They seated themselves near that dark centifolious rose, Carlotta Patti, and Maria Krebs, the German forget-me-not. The Marquis de Caux, one of the stars in the world of fashionable young Parisians, had, as leader of the cotillon, just clapped his hands several times, when there was suddenly perceptible a slight movement at the door, towards which all eyes were turned, and a little old gentleman advanced through the row of guests who respectfully made way for him. The young mistress of the house, with all the natural magic peculiar to her, hastened to meet him. This latest of all her guests, in faultless patent leather boots, and white cravat, with the rosette of the Legion of Honor in his button-hole, and his opera-hat under his arm, was Auber. Having greeted, with great politeness, the members of the family, he stood looking at the dancing a full hour. He then entered into several short conversations, right and left, till two handsome women compelled the gallant maestro to seat himself near them on the sofa.

* Translated for the London Musical World.

That a man of the age of eighty-five can make up his mind, several times a week, to relinquish, about ten o'clock in the evening, his comfortable arm-chair, dress, and deliver himself over to the pressure and bustling of a large party—this is something that astounds me more than La Muette di Portici. The papers may well continue to honor him with the stereotyped surnames of "ever-blooming youth," "youthful patriarch," and so on, only the reader must not suppose from these expressions that there is aught like foppery or undue desire to please about the composer. Such a supposition would be an act of deep injustice. No one can behave with greater seriousness and simplicity than Auber. The love of jokes, and the ever playful humor of Rossini are quite foreign to him, and even still more so the affectation and coquetry of a would-be young man, like A. W. Schlegel. His sharp glance, shooting out from beneath his thick eyebrows, as though from a bush, imparts even a certain amount of gloom to Auber's seriousness. Just as Rossini is open and loquacious, Auber is close, chary of his words, and formal. He is seldom seen to smile, except, perhaps, when conversing with ladies. His taste for brilliant society had full scope this season. I saw him, never tired, at the magnificent parties given by the Emperor to Marshall Vaillant, and by the ministers, MM. Rouher and Forcade; at the distribution of prizes of the Exposition; and, lastly, over and over again at the Opera. He seldom was absent from the Italians, whenever Adolina Patti sang, for he considers her the first living operatic singer. He used to be seen in the second row of stalls applauding enthusiastically; for her farewell benefit he ordered a splendid nosegay from Nice. When one of his own operas is performed, he never appears in the front of the house, but is fond of going behind the scenes. I met him there among the "fishermen of Portici," during a miserable performance of La Muette, which must have occasioned melancholy comparisons in his mind. But even he himself, the composer of this charming opera, gave us cause to bewail the ravages of time. Some new grand ballet music composed by him for the Market-scene in the third act, was so exceedingly weak and commonplace that it absolutely required a strong effort to believe that Auber was the composer of it. Far prettier, though still nothing very great, is a little simple andante, which Auber composed for Adolina Patti, and which she is in the habit of introducing in Il Barbiere di Siviglia.

Auber was chairman of the jury appointed to decide on the merits of the Prize Cantatas and Hymns of Peace—not a chairman in the bills only, like Rossini, but a really working one. It is true that he did not take part in the first rough task of playing through 200 cantatas and 800 hymns—the most inhuman barbarian would not have required him to do that—but he attended the last two long meetings, when the best of the compositions sent in were performed. Unfortunately he did not utter a single syllable in the way of an opinion or a proposal, but confined himself to conducting the voting in the Parisian fashion and to declaring the result. Our preliminary labors already mentioned were carried on next to Auber's study in the Conservatory; he could not get to it except through our room. We were thus able to observe him in the full swing of his activity day after day. Sometimes he came from the examinations in the singing or elocution classes, to hurry away forthwith to the classes of pianists or fiddlers; sometimes he conferred with the teachers or officials of the establishment—in a word, he was indefatigable. Only those who know this large and complicated institution can have any notion of the duties, if only of a formal nature, which it imposes on him. Auber was kind enough to take me to an examination of one of the classes. He sat with four professors at a green table, heard some dozen female pupils play their pieces, and after each piece, entered his verdict in the great book.

One of the few opinions I ever heard Auber express on his art afforded evidence of his having studied, and of his esteeming Gluck's music. Gevaert had just informed him that he was preparing Gluck's Armida for the Grand Opera. Auber praised the selection of this work, which he prefers to Alceste, and immediately cited the most prominent pieces of it. "But," he added, with animation, "how much has the author of the book, also, done! What verses, and what situations! Gluck is to be envied for such a libretto!" Is not this praise bestowed on the author of the book—Quinault—this envying laudation of a libretto two hundred years old, characteristic of a French composer?

One morning that I arrived somewhat too early at the Conservatory, I found Auber in his room, seated at the small table-formed piano, which, if I am not mistaken, once belonged to his predecessor Cherubini. Auber has very frequently composed on this instrument during the last twenty years; on this occasion, also it served him as a laboratory for producing a new opera, which is to be completed next winter. "C'est une imprudence dans mon âge"—the same words the old man had used when speaking to me several years previously. The polite duty of contradiction was somewhat difficult even then, but, on the last occasion, the words absolutely stuck in my throat. The melancholy weakness of Auber's last opera (La Fiancée du Roi de Garbes) and its complete failure, decked out by a general feeling of respect to look like a triumph, forbid our entertaining any hope of the new score. But the earnest purpose, and love of work possessed by the venerable composer, who, though overwhelmed with wealth and laurels, sturdily continues to produce, commands our admiration. I contemplated attentively the little shrivelled old man, as, glowing with inward fire, he got up and shut the piano. What times have passed over that white head! As a boy, Auber often saw Louis XVI., whose carriage his father painted and gilded. His first romances, written when he was twelve years old, were sung by gay ladies of the Directory in the saloons of Barras. His first little opera was played by a company of amateurs at Doyen's in Paris, sixty-two years ago. He then went to a banker's in London to study commerce, but, soon tired of the experiment, returned to Paris, and resolved to re-commence his musical studies under Cherubini. His first two operas in the Theatre Feydeau were failures. In after-years, Adolphe Adam, the composer of Le Postillon de Longjumeau, begged Auber for the scores. "What, in the name of Heaven, do you want with them?" asked Auber. "They are miserable attempts!"—"All the better," replied Adam; "I will show them to my pupils, whenever the latter feel desponding."

With the greatest delight have I again heard here in Paris La Muette and Fra Diavolo. In forty years they have lost nothing of their freshness and brilliancy. I felt happy at seeing him who created these works, and who, at his advanced age, still full of life, continues laboring on. He feels inwardly young. What does he care about the date of his baptismal certificate? "Poor Caradfa, how old he is getting!" whispered Auber to me, as his younger colleague entered the room where the jury met. Auber is greatly attached, though without timidity, to life. He sometimes expresses his feeling on this point with a certain amount of humor. "Death seems really inclined to make a clearance among the old operatic composers," he observed to a friend, on returning from Meyerbeer's funeral ceremony. "It will be Rossini's turn next."

Dr. Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria."

The first impression made upon most minds by the news that Sterndale Bennett had undertaken to write a work for the Birmingham Festival was one of unqualified pleasure. Wherever and whenever men discuss the condition of English music they speak of the foremost English musician with a mixture of pride and disappointment—pride in his great talents and in the undying works he has given to art, disappointment that those works are so few and far between. The promise of an addition to the number, therefore, was not only welcomed for itself, but accepted with a zest in proportion to its regretted rarity.

If this was the first impression, the next was one of doubt as to the merit of the selected subject. The story of the Samaritan woman seemed so barren of dramatic interest, so little likely to awaken sympathy, and to afford such small scope for musical treatment, that the composer's warmest admirers might well have been excused for doubting the result of his effort. This they would have done beyond question, had they foreseen the plan upon which the book is constructed. Nothing could well be more simple, or less ad captivandum. Had the librettist so pleased he might have taken liberties with the narrative either by expanding and intensifying its incidents, or by the introduction of characters not found in the sacred text. In either case he would have been supported by precedent, and the result, from a musical point of view, would have appeared more encouraging. But the librettist did nothing of the sort. He simply took the words of the evangelist John just as he found them, and, beginning with the 5th verse of the fourth chapter, incorporated the whole narrative (a short passage excepted), down to verse 42. Here and there, however, he has interpolated words from other parts of Scripture, and, in one place, three verses of John Keble's famous hymn, "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide," appear somewhat intrusively, but, under the circumstances, no one would wish them away. From this it is easy to see how entirely the success of the work depended upon Dr. Bennett's music.

In point of construction, the Woman of Samaria follows accepted models. That is to say, the comments upon such incidents as occur are made by the chorus, and the narrative passages are so divided as clearly to distinguish the several characters. Thus the words of the Lord are given to the bass voice, those of the woman to the soprano, and the connecting sentences of the evangelist are allotted to the contralto. As much of individuality is secured by this arrangement as circumstances made possible.

The "numbers" in the work are twenty one. Of these ten are given to the chorals, three are regularly constructed airs (for soprano, contralto, and tenor respectively), and the rest recitatives, many of which are so accompanied and written in such a cantabile style as to have a special importance. Not a single "number" is unworthy of notice, but I must content myself with a reference only to the chief among the twenty one.

The "introduction and chorale" give a fair promise of what is to follow. The former opens with an andante serioso in A minor, three-eight time, leading to an andante quasi allegretto in the same key, one being plaintive, the other agitated and impassioned, and both full of character. A pedal on the dominant of C major at length introduces the chorale (the subject of the allegretto still going on) for voices in unison. This chorale—which is the one known as "Luther's Hymn"—by a clever use of syncopation has the effect of being sung in common time against the triple measure of the orchestra. That effect is in the highest degree striking, without being at all confused. As given on Wednesday at Birmingham, the melody stood out in massive grandeur against the ingenious back ground which the composer's art had provided for it, and the whole predisposed everybody present in favor of what was to come. At the close of the chorale the andante serioso returns, in combination with the theme of the allegretto, and the "Introduction" finished in the key of its opening. The contralto voice then commences the sacred narrative with the words, "Then cometh Jesus to a city of Samaria," and is followed by a chorus—A major, common time—"Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," which is of larger proportions than usual. The leading theme is first given out by the sopranos, then repeated in harmony, and afterwards taken up by the basses and altos successively. Ending in the tonic key, the first part is followed by a striking episode, in C major, full of bold and massive harmonies. The return to the leading theme, by a repetition of the word "Blessed," is beautifully done, and from thence to the end (as indeed, all through) the chorals is pure devotional music of the highest order. The coming of the woman is next told in recitative; the words of Jesus, "He would have given thee living water," being followed by a short solidly written chorus—adagio, D major, common time—"For with Thee is the well of life." In this there is happily mingled a beauty almost tender, with a masculine breadth of style which would have delighted the old Church musicians. The conjunction is as uncommon as it is agreeable. Another short recitative then introduces the soprano air (in B minor), "Art thou greater than our father Jacob?" This I take to be the weak part of the work, the "fly in the pot of ointment," though, happily, a well-nigh innocuous one. The impression made by one hearing is that it is uninteresting, and by no means in keeping with what precedes and follows. The narrative goes on after this, with here and there most expressive recitative, to the point where Jesus tells the woman of her past misdeeds. A passage from the psalms, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me and know me," is then interpolated, set as a contralto air. This is one of the gems of the work, and neither the present generation nor those to follow will willingly let it die. As a religious melody it is a model, whether looked at for the beauty of its melody, its true devotional expression, or the depth of feeling it embodies. So thoroughly pure a specimen of its kind has not been heard since "O rest in the Lord." Following the declaration that the Father must be worshipped "in spirit and in truth," occurs a chorus in six parts—B flat, common time—"Therefore they shall come and sing in the height of Zion." This is another gem. The sopranos (divided) and contraltos open with a flowing theme in harmony, and are answered by the tenors and basses (divided). After a little more antiphony all the parts unite, their grand, solid harmonies upon the words, "For wheat and for wine, for wine and for oil" telling with fine effect. At this point the chorus culminates, the remainder, to the passage, "They shall not sorrow any more at all"—fading off to a pianissimo in gentle strains of almost ravishing beauty. All through this charming number the strings have a pizzicato figure in accompaniment, which adds materially to the effect produced. The declaration of Jesus, "I that speak unto thee am He," heralds a short chorus—adagio, E minor, common time—"Who is the Image of the Invisible God." The organ alone accompanies this, and its grave, severe style can therefore be imagined. That the chorus will find a welcome among lovers of true church music there can be no doubt, and its simplicity puts it within the reach of the most ordinary choir. The recitative next tells of the woman's return to Sychar, and her invitation to her neighbors to come and see Jesus. Then follows a chorus—E flat, minor, common time—"Come, O Israel, let us walk as sons of light."

After a fashion which he seems to love, the composer announces the theme in unison (trebles and tenors), repeating it afterwards in full harmony. Contrasting with its flowing beauty is an episode to the words, "Not as children of darkness," most aptly expressing the idea of the text by its sombre harmonies. The tenors then repeat the subject after which a series of bold progressions brings the chorus to a close. The incident of the Saviour's abiding at Sychar for two days serves to introduce the hymn before mentioned. Dr. Bennett has set the verses in G minor, common time—first as a duet for sopranos and contraltos, next as a trio, subject in the tenor, and, lastly, as a full chorus. He has evidently studied to combine extreme simplicity with the utmost earnestness of feeling, and in this he has succeeded. This "number" is destined to have almost as extensive a use as the hymn itself. Immediately following is a chorus for five voices—B minor, common time—"Now we believe." A fugal opening, of ingenious construction, leads to an ensemble passage (sempre grave) on the words, "This is indeed the Christ," and this, in turn, is followed by a resumption of the first subject. But the ending is most impressive of all. The voices, in unison on the tonic (B natural) declaim ff, "This is indeed the Christ," to an accompaniment which, beginning on the chord of G minor, ends (the bass descending by degrees) on that of C sharp, major. Then, after a pause, the voices still in unison, drop, pp, to the dominant on the words "the Saviour of the world," and the final cadence is reached. The effect is impressive in the highest degree. The tenor air, "His salvation is nigh them that fear Him" succeeds, and is a worthy companion to that of the contralto. A distinctive accompaniment for the celli is very noticeable throughout, and is remarkable for the masterly style in which it is written. Following this solo come the final choruses, "I will call upon the Lord," and "Blessed be the Lord God." The former is prefaced by the combined themes of the introduction, and is a vigorous piece of musical declamation. It is to the latter, however, that we must look for an example of Dr. Bennett's power as a writer of oratorio music. This is a fugue in D major, with a very bold and well marked subject, which the most untrained ear can readily distinguish, however wrapped up. In handling this theme Dr. Bennett has done so well as to make us regret he did not fulfil the promise held out by a solitary "inversion," and work the fugue out with all the device of which he is evidently a master. But though he declined to do this, he has risen in it to a very great height, and has given us a proof that the race of contrapuntists is not yet quite extinct.—Mus. World.

Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" in Music.

(From the London Orchestra, Sept. 7.)

The later of two novelties prepared for the Birmingham Festival enjoyed a better fate than its predecessor. Mr. John Francis Barnett woke up from the applause of Thursday night and found himself famous. Hitherto known only among a select and inextensive circle of musicians as a pianist of some skill; known beyond that as the nephew of John Barnett, the composer of the "Mountain Sylph," he has had the gratification of seeing his merit widely acknowledged, of hearing his name mentioned with approval by hundreds to whom it was previously unknown. His cantata on the "Ancient Mariner" has wrought this fame, and not without reason. The three encores and the two recalls of the composer were not injudicious tokens of favor, wrung from the mere complaisance of an audience, but rather the outpouring of a genuine admiration, awakened by a genuine work. Nor were the outside spectators alone in their warmth; for band, artists, and critics alike spoke highly of Mr. Barnett's work. To begin with the cantata at the starting-point, some exception must be taken to the subject chosen by the composer for illustration. In the race for libretti suitable for musical setting, a musician is often hard pressed; but to select a poem so eminently narrative and monological is to make a questionable choice. The success of Mr. Barnett in a harmonic point of view must not blind us to his want of eclecticism. Certainly success covers a multitude of faults; and this issue, we suppose, will inspire the composer and other musicians who regard all poetry as constituting so many "books of words," to set to work on Macanlay's "Lays of Ancient Rome," Byron's "Prisoner of Chillon," and Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis," with the view of reducing these to poetry. We shall look to see "Horatius" treated in this fashion: an opening chorus describing the oath of Lars Porsena, and the gathering of the Latines; a chorus of male voices, "Go forth, go forth, Lars Porsena, go forth beloved of Heaven," the baritone assigned to Horatius, and the soprano and contralto to such passages as, "On the house-tops was no woman but spat at him and hissed." Not less unsuitable is Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," a poem as remote from musical purposes as can well be imagined. This objection being recorded, it may be cheerfully admitted of Mr. J. F. Barnett, that he has done the best he could with an unsuitable subject. The poem is at once monotonous and infinitely varied; monotonous in its form, in its rhythm, and varied in the splendid images it calls up and the pictures it presents. The monorhythm, so to speak, has been well broken up by Mr. Barnett: the different scenes have received adequate illustration from his hands. Naturally the former process required a good deal of labor, and the heaviness of the strain is here and there perceptible. One may mark how much the composer would have been relieved by a break of the marching iambs into an anapestic lilt, or by a lengthening of the perpetual eight-six lines into a measure more suitable for recitative. But on the whole he has done wonderfully well. The partition of the poem will be best explained by the list of the seventeen numbers hers chosen, and of the artists who sang them.

Chorus (male voices)—"It is an ancient Mariner."
 Recit.—Mr. Sims Reeves, "By thy long grey beard."
 Recit.—Chorus (male voices), "He holds him."
 Recit.—Mr. Sims Reeves, "Hold off! unhand me."
 Recit.—Chorus (male voices), "Eftsoons his hand dropt he."
 Chorus—"The ship was cheered."
 Recit.—Mr. Sims Reeves, "The wedding guest."
 Chorus (female voices)—Bridal chorus, "The bride hath paced."
 Recit.—Mr. Sims Reeves, "The wedding guest."
 Recit.—Chorus (male voices), "And thus spake on."
 Chorus—"And now the storm blast."
 Recit. and Aria—Mlle. Tietjens, "The fair breeze blew."
 Recit.—Mr. Sims Reeves, "God save thee."
 Recit.—Mr. Santley, "With my cross bow."
 Aria—Mr. Sims Reeves, "Down dropt the breeze."
 Chorus—"About, about, in reel and rout."
 Recit.—Mr. Santley, "The steersman's face."
 Quartet—Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Patey-Whytock, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley, "The souls did from their bodies fly."
 Recit.—Mr. Santley, "Alone, alone, all, all alone."
 Aria—Mr. Santley, "O happy living things."
 Aria—Mme. Patey-Whytock, "O sleep, it is a gentle thing."
 Recit.—Mr. Santley, "And soon I heard."
 Chorus—"The upper air burst."
 Recit.—Chorus (male voices), "The loud wind never."
 Recit.—Mr. Sims Reeves, "I fear thee, ancient Mariner."
 Recit.—Mr. Santley, "Be calm."
 Quartet—Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Patey-Whytock, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley, "Around, around flew each sweet sound."
 Recit.—Mr. Santley, "Till noon we quietly."
 Duet—Mlle. Tietjens and Mme. Patey-Whytock, "Two voices in the air."
 Recit.—Mr. Santley, "And now this spell."
 Aria—Mr. Santley, "Swiftly, swiftly flew."
 Aria—Mr. Sims Reeves, "The harbor bay was clear."
 Recit.—Mlle. Tietjens, "And the bay was white."
 Solo—Mlle. Tietjens, and Chorus of female voices, "This seraph band."
 Chorus—"What loud uproar."
 Quartet and Chorus—Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Patey-Whytock, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley, "O sweeter than the marriage feast."

It will thus be observed that the "Ancient Mariner" was sung by Mr. Santley—with occasional appropriations of his monologue by Mr. Sims Reeves, Mlle. Tietjens, and Mme. Patey-Whytock, and the deliverance of other portions to the chorus; and that the interruptions of the Wedding Guest were given by Mr. Sims Reeves. Of course all individuality of character is lost, when the Guest is made to tell the Ancient Mariner himself a portion of the Mariner's story, and narrate how

Day after day, day after day
 We stuck, nor breath nor motion.

One can hardly be narrator and listener at the same time, except in cantata and oratorio. And this is one of the many incongruities which render a narrative poem, meant only to be spoken in the first person, unsuitable for musical setting.

The cantata opens with fifty bars of an instrumental andante sostenuto in E, changing into allegretto. Then a chorus of tenors and basses details how the Ancient Mariner "stoppeth one of three," the best man (Mr. Reeves) mildly objecting to the capture. The sailing of the ship is narrated by the chorus in 3-4 time in E, soprano, alto, tenor and bass; and an interruption illustrating the wedding festivities appealing to the impatience of the spell-bound listener is well marked by a Bridal Chorus, "The Bride hath paced," in 2-4 time. A transposition of the verses is here necessary to describe the storm-blast, then the fair breeze, a charming air in A for Mlle. Tietjens, and the coming of the albatross. The Ancient Mariner tells, in mournful recitative, how he shot the bird of good omen, and the tenor takes up the theme and describes the sinking of the breeze and the dead calm. We have now a cleverly scored chorus in D, 2-4 time, for the "reel and rout," the dancing of the death-fires and accompanying horrors. Much less successful (though the preceding is perhaps not wholly original) is the quartet, "Their souls did from their bodies fly," which is commonplace; but Mr. Barnett makes up for the deficiency by his setting of the verse "O happy living things," to an andante con moto, which was sung by Mr. Santley in a truly splendid manner, and achieved a deserved encore. A pretty melody is that which follows, and prettily it was given by Mme. Patey-Whytock. "The upper air burst into life," is a number forcibly describing the conflict of nature—a fine chorus, followed by a recitative and chorus for male voices, "The loud wind never. Very effective is the scoring eloquently suggested by the words "Around, around flew each sweet sound," of which the composer has framed a quartet in D: the various descriptions of melody mentioned by the poet being appropriately voiced and instrumented. A duet for soprano and contralto, "Two voices in the air," was superbly sung and drew down an encore. No passages in the cantata are more judiciously treated than the whole of this illustration of the music in the air with arpeggios for the violins and violoncellos con sordini: the effect is as well brought out as the conception is accurate. Among the subsequent numbers we have specially to notice the solo and chorus, "This scrupled band," a lovely morceau sung delightfully by Mlle. Tietjens. The work ends well. The quartet and chorus "O sweeter than the marriage feast," with its suggestions of the wedding in the orchestra and the marriage bells, gives place to a semi-religious, semi-moral bit of chorale, "He praveh best who loveth best," with which, supplemented by the full effect of voice, band, and organ, the cantata comes to an effective termination, the composer wisely abstaining from the (musically) anti-climactic description of the influence of the story on the listener. A single hearing was sufficient to stamp this work as one of great merit. There is little profundity in it; but it is pleasant, melodious, and full of genuine inspirations. The talent with which the poem is musically embellished is Mr. Barnett's excuse for having selected it for this sort of embellishment at all.

Mr. Goldschmidt's "Ruth."

(From the Musical World.)

There is something in the sight of a man addressing himself to the great and difficult adventure which calls forth our instinctive admiration. But there are, also, some adventures which we insist shall not be undertaken without qualifications awarded only to a few. In the knightly days, he who would do the deeds of knight-hood was first required to show himself worthy. Those days are gone, but their spirit remains; and when a man, only in his novitiate as an esquire, rides into the ring wearing golden spurs, we send our heralds to tell him he has made a mistake, and bid him begone. If a youthful bard indite sonnets "To his mistress's eyebrow," we can tolerate his mediocrity, but if he attempt an epic poem without sufficient means, we flagellate him as a warning not to do it again. So, too, if a musician make a modest appearance as a composer, we bid him "God Speed!" but when he comes before us with an oratorio which, weighed in the balances, is found wanting, he neither deserves nor receives any mercy. The composition of an oratorio is one of the things demanding first and foremost a careful overhauling of resources. If he who would undertake it can find within himself profound technical knowledge, lofty artistic feeling, great power of invention, and that kind of mental vision which not only sees the whole, but the relation to it of each part, then, by all means let him set about the task. But let him examine himself carefully, since it depends upon the accuracy of his conclusion whether or not he is to be adjudged guilty of an impudent assumption. A mistake on this point altogether fails of excuse. Something depends, however, on the nature of the subject selected. For a man to attempt the illustration of the passion and sufferings of the Messiah, or the tremendous plagues of Egypt, or the varied and stirring incidents in the life of Elijah is a different thing from essaying the same office for the simple story of Ruth, the Moabitess. So far Herr Goldschmidt has shown himself modest. He might have addressed himself to the opening of the Seven Seals, or the Deluge, or the Fall of Man, while he was about it. In that he did not, he must be accredited with having gauged his powers to a certain degree. The pity of it is that he attempted an oratorio at all. Before he set pen to paper nobody thought him equal to such a task, and nobody blamed him for the want of power. Now, the incapacity is proved, and with it another incapacity having relation to self-knowledge, which is not so much a misfortune as a fault.

To make matters worse for Herr Goldschmidt, the subject he selected is not only easy of treatment, compared with most others, but adapted to call out what ever latent power a composer may possess. Its sweet simplicity, its perfect naturalness, and the touching pathos of many of its situations stir up no ordinary sympathy, so that he who reads it must needs realize every incident it contains. We all know the marvelous effect this has in facilitating illustration or description; to say nothing of the zest which it enables the illustrator or describer to bring to his work. Looking at it thus, it is hard to see how a musical setting of so beautiful a story could fail utterly, unless such a failure were sedulously courted. One would imagine that a composer has only to open his heart and mind to its influences, and to write down the thoughts it spontaneously inspires, in order to be, if not profoundly learned, at least simple, natural, and pleasing. Nobody supposes for a moment that Herr Goldschmidt courted failure, or that in writing his work he did not labor with zeal and conscientiousness. He has shown us, however, that besides being unable to rise to the height of oratorio, he is, through some singular defect of organization, insensible to things which would help him on his upward path. Some composers fail because of their subject; Herr Goldschmidt has failed in spite of his. In either case the result is the same, but—with a difference.

Looking over the new oratorio (or "Sacred Pastoral," if the composer like it better) one is first impressed with the singularity of its construction. Ruth resembles nothing more than a piece of mosaic, or rather a Dutch chimney piece, in which each tile tells a different story, and has no connection with its neighbors except that of proximity. The same patchy and fragmentary character is found in the libretto, which is divided into a succession of short "fyttes," headed, "At Bethlehem," "In the Harvest Field," "At the Threshing Floor," &c. In this case, however, there is a necessity for such a defect, which would have suggested to a judicious composer the desirableness of providing a remedy, as far as possible, by the more symmetrical construction of his music. Instead of doing so, its influence upon Herr Goldschmidt has been in the opposite direction, and the whole work is a mass of undeveloped and unconnected thoughts, which fall upon the ear much like the snatches of conversation among the passers-by in a crowded street. Now it is a simple question like that of Naomi, "Who art thou, my dame?" then a tedious orchestral passage not "germane to the issue" in the slightest degree, and next comes the answer, almost every sentence of which is marked by an interlude after the almost exploded fashion of church psalmody. How inexpressibly wearisome this soon becomes no one needs to be told; nor is it necessary to point out how fatal to success was the inability even to sketch the outlines of an oratorio of which it is the sign and result.

Out of the twenty eight "numbers" in the work, ten are recitatives, many of them very long. The composer's treatment of these recitatives becomes, therefore, an important matter, having a formidable influence upon the character of the whole. It is to be regretted that he did not adhere to the "ancient lines" so well marked out by the masters of his art, who, except in rare instances, were content to provide the simplest means for the musical declamation of narrative. Only such are called for by the necessity of the case. Recitative in oratorio is but the thread that connects the various parts together, and its elaboration is both unnecessary and out of place. For some reason or other Herr Goldschmidt has failed to recognize this fact. He has, throughout, attempted to endow the narrative portions of his libretto with a musical interest they cannot possibly bear, and which, by the resulting odd association of ideas, becomes positively ludicrous. In doing so he has not been content with what is understood as "accompanied recitative." He has rather expanded it into a kind of descriptive symphony for the orchestra, the voice coming in now and then, like that of a showman, to tell what is meant to be described. Even if this were well done the effect would be open to question, for reasons not necessary to mention, since in the present instance it has been done badly. Some of Herr Goldschmidt's many interludes have no meaning at all, and others suggest ideas at variance with the connexion in which they are found. Take, for example, those in the opening recitative, where the tenor voice puts us in possession of the dry details respecting the earlier history of Naomi. Upon this passage, which appeals to sentiment about as much as does the multiplication table, Herr Goldschmidt has lavished an amount of orchestral tenderness which would have been far better employed elsewhere. As a rule, however, his interludes are successions of chords signifying nothing, but productive of much in the shape of weariness and impatience. After the Ruth recitatives, given though they be in the eloquent words of Scripture, I should turn with relief even to those we owe to Handel and Dr. Moell; which are at least interesting as showing how genius sometimes struggles unavailingly against wordy boredom.

Closely allied to his treatment of recitative is Herr Goldschmidt's peculiar management of the orchestra throughout the work. In either case he has set accepted canons at defiance with a result disastrous only to himself. As used by the great masters of oratorio, the orchestra is made strictly subordinate to the voices, and looked upon as an accessory intended to sustain and relieve the vocal parts, as well as to color the effects produced. This may be done in different ways, and in varying degree, but in no single case can it be said that the limits dividing the inferior from the equal have been exceeded. Even in the Creation, of all oratorios the one where the orchestra is most important, its subordination is apparent, though it must be admitted that such a result was only made possible by the consummate skill and judgment of the composer. Herr Goldschmidt has chosen to violate this rule. He has attempted to push his orchestra into a position of equality with, if not of superiority to the vocal music, and has thereby spoiled his work, for several good and sufficient reasons. In the first place by the fitful, erratic, and independent action of the instruments he has not only left the voices in great part unsupported, but has positively turned what might have been assistance into an obstacle. The orchestra is throughout felt to be a bore likely to come in at any moment—as a matter of fact it does come in at very many moments—and by distracting the attention of the singers, hinders them in their work. The result is that one is driven to regard the instruments and voices as antagonists rather than fellow laborers for a common end. It is true that, looking at the general character of the music, nobody can feel the slightest interest in either. The fact may be an ill compliment to Herr Goldschmidt, but it will afford a crumb of comfort to those who may have to hear his composition. Again, the orchestra, made thus prominent and intrusive, gives an added offence by reason of the indifferent music it has to discourse. It is curious to note with what singular recklessness Herr Goldschmidt has rushed into unnecessary difficulties. He is like a man who, having to ford a river, does so at the widest and deepest part, with the certainty of being laughed at even if he gets across. An oratorio constructed like Ruth is the most exacting of its kind, because the incessant use of the orchestra, as a principal, demands a power of musical description, and a fertility of invention given only to a very few. Among those very few is not Herr Goldschmidt. The preludes and interludes which form so large a part of his work are remarkable, save here and there a striking passage, for a monotony and a poverty of ideas which make their very existence a monument of the composer's self-delusion. Their special application very rarely appears. The architect of the Crystal Palace so drew his plans that any column or girder would fit equally well into a hundred different places. After the same fashion, though not with the same symmetrical result, Herr Goldschmidt's orchestral passages might be arranged anyhow and anyhow would be equally bad.

I should like, after all this necessary fault-finding, to be able to praise the vocal music which Ruth contains. But Herr Goldschmidt has barred the door against any such satisfaction. He has adopted in its literal meaning the cry of poor Pat: "I will be drowned, and nobody shall help me." Surely if he could not be other than fragmentary and incoherent—if he could not avoid treating the orchestra as I have shown he has treated it—it was in his power to write vocal phrases which should be singable and melodious. We were none of us disposed to be exacting on this matter. Nobody asked for the divine tunefulness of Mozart, the severe dignity of Handel, or the flowing grace of Haydn. But tone of some kind was expected. Pity for us that we should again have to learn how blessed he is that expecteth nothing. There is hardly a single theme in Ruth which falls pleasantly upon the ear, and not one likely to remain in the memory. This is the most fatal blot of all. Melody is the soul of music. There may be in a work everything else—ripe scholarship, great experience, an excellent judgment, but without melody it is no more than a perfect body wanting life. Far better a body maimed or deformed, if it but breathe and live, than such an one. Herr Goldschmidt offers us neither; for his Ruth is an unsymmetrical corpse.

But besides all this, and to take a lower view, the new oratorio is wanting in proofs of scholarship. Though it evinces in abundance, and much painstaking care; but the most zealous workman can do nothing without tools. Having invented such themes as was possible, Herr Goldschmidt seems to have been at a loss how to work them up. Of development, masterly or otherwise, there is little or none in the work. Of repetition in various keys there is plenty, but repetition affords a poor and sorry substitute for the power to present the same thought in ever-varying, always interesting forms. As examples of contrapuntal skill, the two or three fugal choruses in Ruth are of a very inferior order, resembling nothing so much as the exercises of a student endowed with poor abilities, or afflicted with an indifferent teacher.

After what has been said any detailed analysis of the work is unnecessary, because, in the first place, I should have to repeat myself, and next, as Ruth is not likely to be heard again, the result to the reader would hardly repay my trouble and his time. The foregoing general remarks have been made, not because they were demanded by the importance of the new oratorio, so much as because they enforce the moral of Herr Goldschmidt's failure. In some districts the farmers have a habit of nailing dead kites to their barn doors, pour encourager les autres. With the same benevolent object in view I have written this somewhat lengthy notice.

Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 28, 1867.

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

III.

. . . . In his church compositions Bach is aided by a treatment of forms which is peculiar to him. Not only does the form give him the means of presenting the subject; but he knows also how to introduce a symbolical signification; he can exalt the received forms by putting their main proportions into relation with the subject and its deeper meaning. Without hesitation we may lay it down as a rule: the deeper Bach appears in his formal combinations, the more certain we may be that behind the unusual expression lies concealed an equally surprising thought. To enter into the meaning of the words poetically will prove a short, sure way to solve the riddle. . . .

No one, who can accustom himself to this way of looking at the matter, will see any untenable hypothesis in the interpretation which we have suggested of the last Aria and Chorus; in words and notes alike is found the clearest confirmation. To be sure, most attempts at "interpretation," such as are often made in the case of instrumental works, are very wide of the mark and are apt to run into the most contradictory views; one, for instance, seeing in Beethoven's A-major Symphony the description of a merry wedding among peasants, while another deems it the greatest tragedy since King Lear! But in musical works of Art founded on a definite verbal text the case is different, and such attempts not only need no hesitation, but are sometimes even necessary. The word gives a distinct direction and meaning to the tone; it is a safeguard against arbitrary allegorizing and extravagance, and will reconcile divergent views far more easily than is possible in purely instrumental works.

But to come back to the Magnificat!

5. To the wild unrest of the number just described there now succeeds, in splendid contrast, a Bass Solo (in A major, 4-4 measure), with the words: "Quia fecit mihi magna, qui potens est, et sanctum nomen ejus" (For He that is mighty hath done to me great things, and holy is his name). Here all breathes warm and heart-felt thankfulness for the great things which the Lord hath done to us, and praises his holy name. The economy of this Aria is really admirable and could hardly be surpassed. A characteristic and expressive motive of the basso continuo, forming four measures, repeats itself continually in the most different positions and intervals through the whole movement. First it diverges to the Dominant key, from which, by a gentle transition, it reaches the parallel key, F-sharp minor. Then we are led into the Mediant, from which the Tonic springs again as if new-born. The voice part takes its material partly from this theme; partly it moves, calmly and full of dignity, in free and independent figures, which mount and float above it like the smoke of a thank-offering. The noble form of its cantilena gives us the desired opportunity of here inserting some remarks about the style and character of Bach's vocal melody.

It is a widely prevalent notion, that Bach treats his voice parts mostly in an instrumental manner: "he was exclusively an organ player, and has carried the customary organ style even into vocal composition," we often hear it asserted. Surely it is rather hasty, in the very nature of the case, to suppose a great artist capable of such absurd mistakes; moreover, in point of fact, our master's manner of proceeding is in direct contradiction to so thoughtless an assumption. When Bach composes for the organ he does not write in the piano-forte manner, and so vice versa; his way of treating the violin, the violoncello, the oboe, the flute, in short all the rest of the instruments, is so characteristic and so masterly, that no one now-a-days can seriously think of undertaking to surpass him. To be sure he often taxes his material to the utmost, but he never demands of it what it is impossible to execute! He not only knew most accurately the technical peculiarities of the instruments, but he had penetrated far deeper into the very nature and individuality of each. We can here appeal to competent authorities, such as Joachim, who actually maintain that Bach was far before his age in all that he has offered for the violin, for instance: that he had anticipated, both in thought and practice, all the possibilities of later technical developments. Now is it to be supposed that he was less well acquainted with the nature of that material for which he wrote the most intense things his rich soul conceived, the human voice—for that, too, is an instrument in its way—and that he used it more unfitly as if it were something comparatively lifeless, unorganic? The principal hindrance which the singer meets in Bach's cantilena, consists essentially in the traditional method of singing. Bach's vocal setting rests upon the ground of the old German music, which at an early period attached more importance to the words and sought to make them the precise bearers of the melody; in Eccard the contrast of a German and an Italian school in this sense is clearly manifest.

6. The next number of the Magnificat brings us a Duet between the Alto and the Tenor, in E minor, 12-8 measure, to the words: "Et misericordia a progenie in progenies timentibus eum" (And his mercy is on them that fear him from generation to generation). Here again Bach shows himself a deep interpreter of the words of the text, with a fine knowledge of the human heart. The tender mercy of the Lord in its effect on those who fear him is musically delineated in masterly outlines. The voices are supported by the string quartet—the violins and viola muted, the former doubled by the flutes. In this duplication the violins and flutes exchange their brilliant and softer tone-colors, as if Bach meant to indicate the at once elevating and soothing influence of the divine mercy on the heart that turns toward it. At the words: "timentibus eum," the instruments are mostly silent and leave the accompaniment to the Organ. The concluding turn of the voice parts is startlingly effective through the astonishing boldness of the modulation.

7. The following Chorus forms a grand contrast to this mild Duet. Its far reaching, powerful main theme, majestically entering in a compass of an octave and a half, first brings the words: "Fecit potentiam" (He hath showed strength). Against this "potentia," spreading itself in all directions, infinitely mobile, Bach offsets a motive on the words: "in brachio suo" (with his arm), which seems to embody an opposite and yet kindred element, a compressed force, self-poised yet tensely strained. The main theme, entering first in the Tenor, is attended from the outset by smart rhythmical blows of the other voice parts, with which the orchestra—but without trumpets and drums—joins in imitative beats. Then the Alto takes it, while the Tenor develops the counter-motive: "in brachio suo," and the other vocal and orchestral parts continue their strong rhythmical movement. The theme is now handed over to the Second Soprano, then to the Bass, afterwards to the First Soprano, and finally to the orchestra. The voices, however, which have already executed it, leave that rhythmical figure more and more to the orchestra and take an ever freer attitude in the richest contrapuntal forms, so that shortly before the entrance of the main motive in the orchestra they are all engaged in fully independent motion. Meanwhile two new accessory motives have introduced themselves on the word: "dispersit" (he hath scattered), symbolizing it in pictorial forms. The Continuo, for its part, supports this wonderful structure in rhythms proper to itself, and admirably corresponding to the character of the whole. At last one of the accessory motives of the "dispersit" remains alone upon the field and suddenly forces out, in a shrill chord broken short off, the word that completes its sense, "superbos" (the proud).

And here occurs a ease, which for the first time gives us occasion to express a modest doubt as to whether Bach has done the best thing. The text of the Vulgate gives the words: "dispersit superbos mente cordis sui" (He hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts) as if they belonged together, and therein follows the Greek original. Bach on the contrary separates them in the most violent manner, breaking short off at the word "superbos" and, after a long pause, setting against it, in a solemn Adagio, the words: "mente cordis sui." But perhaps the master was misled by the not precisely classical Latin, into referring "sui" not to "superbos," but to God. In that case he might possibly have attached to the whole passage this meaning: "He hath scattered the proud—with the breath of his mouth." Construing the text in this way, the musical course of the sentence is now fully justified and of perfect beauty. If this explanation does not satisfy, there would scarcely seem to remain any other, save to ascribe to Bach the bad taste of having wished to glorify "the proud" by the most mighty and sublime means of expression. We do not claim to be at all competent to decide the question, and gladly leave it to abler hands.

8. The chorus is succeeded by a Tenor Solo, in F-sharp minor, 3-4 measure, which in its essential features shows a kindred feeling. It treats the text: "Deposuit potentes de sede, et exaltavit humiles" (He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree). Here too Bach has not allowed the obvious antitheses to escape him, and has known how to present them energetically and characteristically enough.

(To be continued.)

Music in Boston.

Our season begins with a concert not so much addressed to Boston, as to the Western country and the world at large. The MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB, whose sphere has ever been the quiet one of classical Chamber Music, being now on the eve of a Western tour of some three months, will "inaugurate their 19th Season" on Monday evening with a concert in the great Music Hall. For their friends here this concert means Good-bye for a while, Auf Wiedersehen! What it "inaugurates" is the aforesaid Western tour. It is as if the Pleiades (dear little earnest, constant Quintette Club up there among the brighter but not sweeter stars, should "inaugurate" their million-billionth season by madly shooting from their sphere to race awhile with the sensational meteors and comets! We wish them true success, and that they may leave good seeds in all the towns they visit,—that is to say inspiring memories of the best kinds of music which they have been accustomed so long to interpret here.

The concert in the Music Hall, large as the place is, and better suited for an Orchestra, promises to be a really good one. Besides the Club itself, consisting of Messrs. W. H. SCHULTZE, CARL MEISEL, THOMAS RYAN, E. M. HEINDEL (a new member), and WULF FRIES, other good artists will take part, namely: Mr. C. PETERSILEA, the pianist; Messrs. DE RIBAS, oboe; ELTZ, bassoon; HAMANS, horn; and STEIN, double-bass; and a Quartet of singers: Mrs. H. M. SMITH, Miss RYAN, Mr. JAMES WHITNEY and Mr. M. W. WHITNEY. The programme is rich and for the most part classical. It contains two large works: the Nonetto by Spohr, and the ever welcome Septet by Hummel (Mr. Petersilea at the piano). The Quartet (in canon) from Fidelio and a couple of Mendelssohn Quartets are tempting vocal pieces surely, and still fresh. The two ladies will sing solos by Meyerbeer and Stigelli, and Mr. Fries will play a cello and Mr. Heindel a flute solo.—The Club will return before New Year, and then we trust we shall have nice classical Quartets, Quintets and Trios in the Chickering "Chamber" as of old.

The Harvard SYMPHONY CONCERTS will begin on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 7, at half past three o'clock. They will soon be formally announced. Meanwhile we may say that they will be of the same general character as before, presenting only the best in Symphony, Overture, Concerto, &c.; except that the space hitherto occupied in each concert (often the larger half) by the Piano will be more limited, and the vocal element called in oftener for variety. The Orchestra, in spite of the absence of the Quintette Club in the first part of the season, bids fair to be larger and better than ever before. It certainly will be, and the string department considerably strengthened, if the sale of season tickets warrants so large an outlay.

The PAREPA-ROSA concert troupe (under Mr. Harrison's management), composed of nearly the same elements as before, will visit Boston early in November. There is a chance, too, that THEODORE THOMAS and his Orchestra, from New York, may give a few concerts in our Music Hall in the latter part of October. The more the merrier; if they will play good Symphonies, and do their best, we may learn something by them.

The Great Organ is still played every Wednesday and Saturday noon, and commonly on Sunday evenings. There have been some excellent programmes of late, particularly those of Mr. Pearce, from Philadelphia, and of Mr. J. K. Paine. All our best organists take turns as hitherto.—Other movements are not yet developed. But we may count it certain that the Handel and Haydn Society will soon break through its reserve; that the pleasant Wednesday Afternoon Concerts of the Orchestral Union will come along in due time—we hope there will be more of them than last year; and that the various classical Chamber and Piano Matinées and Soirées will be as numerous and even choicer than before. For one novelty, Mr. Kreissmann has an idea of bringing out Schubert's very remarkable "Ossian" songs,—a capital idea, which we hereby adjure him to put into deed.

CONCERT AT MILTON. The Choir of the Unitarian Church (Dr. Morison's), under the spur of a zealous director in the person of the genial Colonel of the Governor's Cadets, Dr. C. C. Holmes, and aided by an energetic staff of musically cultivated ladies, has made this beautiful Blue Hills suburb musically famous hereabouts of late. Such an amateur concert (or professional either) has seldom occurred in a "country meeting house" as that of Saturday afternoon, Sept. 14. It was remarkable in the character of the audience, largely composed of refined persons thronging in over all the roads from pleasant summer residences and from the city. The unusual assemblage of fine, cultivated voices (mostly amateurs) and the well selected programme were not the whole attraction. There was a fine new Organ, built by Hook, to help defray the cost of which was one motive of the concert. Under the skillful hands of Mr. Wilcox it furnished the accompaniments; and very sweet, rich, organ-like in the best sense, its tones, of well contrasted colors, proved. Three, four, excellent sopranos, in solos, duets, trios, &c., two fine tenors, a thoroughly schooled basso, likewise, besides the very select choir, and Wulf Fries's cello, rendered the following selection with admirable effect throughout:

Improvisation, Organ.....	Wilcox
Gloria, from 3d Mass.....	Haydn
Jerusalem, Thou that killest, &c.....	Mendelssohn.
I will Magnify Thee. (Trio).....	Mosenthal.
Be ye Faithful unto Death.....	Mendelssohn.
Angels ever Bright and Fair.....	Handel.
My Song shall be always (Duet).....	Mendelssohn.
Father whose Blessing.....	J. Benedict.
Lord, have Mercy.....	Pergolesi.
Moses in Egypt, Prayer.....	Rossini.
Benedictus, Agnus Dei and Dona Nobis.....	Wolfer.
Ave Maria.....	Schubert.
To his Hands.....	Mendelssohn.
Solo.....
My Heart ever Faithful.....	Bach.
Prophet us (Trio).....	Curschmann.
Prayer from Der Freyschutz.....	Weber.
Spirit Song.....	Haydn.
Inflammatus.....	Rossini.

The "Jerusalem" air, the rapturous Bach song ("Frohlocke, mein Herz!"), the solo in the Inflammatus, and other important solo passages, were sung by a young lady from the South, who has been spending a year in Boston, whose voice and talent have seemed to us to contain finer promise than has yet sprung up among us. Sweet, rich, large, thoroughly musical and sympathetic, this voice is also of great compass; while the whole nature is truly and sincerely musical. We had hoped much from her in the near future for our Oratorio and higher concert music; but she is sent to Italy to study and we have lost her! We do not feel the right to name her; still less the other fair possessors of refined, bright voices who sang "Angels ever bright and fair," the "Prayer" from Freyshütz, the Ave Maria, &c. Mr. Wetherbee gave the piece by Pergolesi with artistic and true expression. Dr. Langmaid put feeling and sweetness into the Mendelssohn tenor air: "Be ye faithful," with cello obbligato; and Haydn's "Spirit Song" (so seldom heard of late) was beautifully sung by a young tenor undergraduate at Harvard. We wish we had room to speak of more. It was all good.

New Glee.

THE GREETING. A New Glee Book by L. O. EMERSON. Boston: O. Ditson & Co., 1867, pp. 200.

The American musical mind has a wonderful leaning to psalm tunes. The first efforts of composers are directed to the production of some new labor of this sort, whose chief glory it is to be so very like some already existing model, as to be out of the reach of adverse criticism. The tremendous volume of this psalm tune deluge, that has poured upon us within the last thirty years, is something fearful to contemplate. Tunes in every conceivable style, and in style inconceivable before. Tunes pretty, tunes ugly. Tunes high, and tunes low. Tunes in flats, tunes in sharps. Tunes strong—tunes weak. The latter how preponderant!

And then consider the use which these tunes serve. Although all nominally "sacred," scarcely one in ten was ever sung in church. They are really used as singing-school glees. Glees they really are, most of them, despite the "sacred" words.

And the Anthems. What an account is there for some one to settle! Or will the trembling composers be mustered en masse to render up their account? Who can tell! Such weary pages of musical platitudes as we have had to wade through! According to the well known theological formula, the "strength" of these works is "perfect weakness." And yet, despite this weakness of diet, we have become stronger. Taking the various church collections as a whole, we see that the recent works manifest an improvement over their predecessors, both in taste and in technical execution. The only retrocession, if there be any, consists in an apparent lack, latterly, of the religious earnestness of the earlier authors. And this is unavoidable! for now there is money in singing books. The earnestness of the present is a pernicious earnestness, not a religious.

Another good sign of the present state of taste is the greater attention given to Glees. Twenty years ago the singing of glees was almost unheard of in New England. A little later the English glees began to be sung under the auspices of Dr. Mason and Mr. Geo. J. Webb. But what sober, stately old glees were those! In point of dignity, to sing one of those glees was little more mirthful than to say high mass. Good, to be sure, but so proper! After a while, however, American glees began to be manufactured,—and some, composed!

The difficulties under which those early writers labored were not slight. Some of them had no knowledge of counterpoint or musical form, save what little they had got by "unconscious absorption." Yet they did as well as could be expected;—perhaps better.

The American Glee has generally been one of two things. Either a sprightly melody, so harmonized that the accompanying voices do nothing but accompany; or, a very blind and ignorant imitation of Mendelssohn's Part Songs, which are veritable ideal glees. The kind first mentioned is poor stuff. The effects to be attained on this system soon wear out. None of the parts have any real work, save the Soprano. The glees of the second class have suffered worst of all from the ignorance of their composers. Mendelssohn's Part Songs were composed by one thoroughly versed in all the resources afforded by simple and double counterpoint, imitation and fugue. To him, also, the various musical forms were well known; and he knew just how to employ each one, or what license to take, as his purpose required. With our composers in general there has been no such knowledge. Then too he had genius, which with us is rarer yet.

In the work before us there are sixty-seven Glees. All of these are new except perhaps four, which are European. Of these new ones Mr. Emerson claims 26, and Mr. L. H. Southard 25. The remaining 16 are from miscellaneous sources. It has been a great pleasure to the writer to examine this book, and it must be a still greater pleasure to use it, for the work is, in general, good. Mr. Emerson has a good number of popular, easy pieces, and quite a number of still more beautiful ones in a somewhat German style. Mr. Southard is well known as a thorough master of musical composition,—a man who knows how to express his melodic ideas; he is also known as a composer, fertile in ideas, fresh in invention. The present works from his pen are beautiful, and fully sustain his reputation. Young students in this kind of musical structure are pointed, with pleasure, to the tasteful form of the more extended of these glees. It is worthy of study to see how nicely the unities are preserved in the period relations, no less than how well each voice is kept occupied with something really pertinent to the subject in hand.

We congratulate the authors of the "Greeting" upon their success. W. S. B. M.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK unfolds a programme for this winter long as Leporello's Catalogue,—and as almost everything seems to be done in the name of one man, the impresario Harrison, we presume we are to consider him the master spirit of all these conquests. Not only has he captured the Parepa-Rosa couple with all their party, who have already "auspiciously inaugurated" (advertising critics' favorite expression) the season by a concert at Irving Hall in the old miscellaneous Bateman style; but he has taken Oratorio in charge and announces a series to be given at Steinway Hall (which they say has been much improved), as follows: Nov. 21, "Creation;" Dec. 12, "Elijah;" Dec. 25, "Messiah;" Jan. 23, "Samson;" Feb. 20, "Judas Maccabæus;" March 10, "St. Paul;" to which add Mr. Bristow's "Daniel" for the first time.—Then again, this wide-awake manager has secured for his concerts the "lion pianist" of twenty years ago, Leopold de Meyer, of "Marche Marocaine" memory, musician extraordinary to the Sultan, who "very unexpectedly," the papers say, walked into the music market of New York a few days ago. He is to play at Steinway Hall a limited number of nights, beginning Oct. 1, with Parepa, Rosa, and Thomas's orchestra assisting.

Said Thomas and orchestra also revolve round the Harrison sun. His programme of Symphony Soirées as announced, is worth copying:

1st Soirée: Symphony in D (first time), by Bach (Emanuel?); Aria from Gluck's Armida (1st time), sung by Mme. Parepa-Rosa; Introduction from 2nd act of Cherubini's Medea (first time); Recit. and Aria from Mozart's Figaro, Mme. Rosa; two movements from Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B; flat minor (first time); 5th Symphony of Beethoven.

2nd Soirée: Symphony in D, (No. 2 in Breitkopf and Härtel edition), Haydn; Piano Solo, by Leopold de Meyer; Overture in C, op. 124, Beethoven; Piano Solo; Schumann's 3d Symphony, in E flat.

3d Soirée: Beethoven's 8th Symphony; Piano Solo, De Meyer; Symphonic Poem ("Die Ideale"), by Liszt (first time); Piano Solo; Overture to Genoëva, Schumann.

4th. Overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven; Seena and Aria, op. 58 (first time), by Rubinstein, sung by Mme. Rosa; Ballade ("Des Sängers Fluch, Uhland), by Bülow (first time); Aria by Spohr; Second Symphony, in C, by Schumann.

5th. Beethoven's Eroica Symphony; Aria from Weber's Baron, by Mme. Rosa; "Gretchen," Karakterbild from the Faust Symphony by Liszt; Songs by Mendelssohn and Schumann; Overture to Benvenuto Cellini (first time), Berlioz.

We have named, of course, only the more prominent features of the multifarious Harrison-Steinway-Thomas concert schemes. Still outside of their widening vortex lie the classical concerts of the old Philharmonic Society, and the Chamber Concerts of the Mason and Thomas Quartet, whose programme we have not yet seen. Also Maretzek's Italian and Bateman's French (Offenbach) Operas, both of which began (we dare say, were "inaugurated") this week; and we dare say the "renditions" were fine and much applause, &c., was "donated" to the artists. The Italian opened on Monday, with its best, Don Giovanni, with Parepa for Donna Anna; Miss Hauck, Zerlina; Mlle. Ronconi, Elvira; Bellini, the Don; Ronconi, Leporello; and Baragli, Ottavio. Bergmann conducted. On Tuesday, I Puritani, with Signora Peralta, Bellini, Antonucci, &c. Wednesday, Rossini's Otello, for the new tenor Panecani, with Parepa, Bellini, Baragli, &c. Thursday, opening night, with Don Giovanni, in Brooklyn; Friday, Il Barbiere; to-day, Don Giovanni matinée.

Mr. F. L. Ritter is establishing Chorus-Classes in New York, an excellent plan for qualifying large numbers of persons to take part in Oratorios, Cantatas and other choral works. We congratulate Vassar College (at Poughkeepsie, N. Y.) in obtaining the services of so superior a man as Mr. Ritter as Director of the Musical Department in that large and liberal institution, which puts female education on an equal footing with that sought for by young men in colleges.

Musical "Conservatories" are the rage in New York as elsewhere. There were five of them before, doing "a great business," and now there is announced at least one new one, that of Mason and Thomas. Philadelphia has caught the fever and announces modestly an "American Conservatory."

Herr Abert.

Herr Eekert has now quitted the directorship of the Opera at Stuttgart, and is succeeded by Herr Abert. The latter, highly esteemed for his theoretical and practical talent, has fairly won his spurs by the success of his last lyrical work, "Astorga," in three acts, produced in 1865 at Stuttgart, and since given in various theatres throughout Germany. The history of this composer is singularly interesting and romantic. Born in 1832, at Gastorf, in Bohemia, he was destined by his parents to become a priest, and was early educated in a Bohemian convent. In this convent his passion for music disturbed his theological studies, and ultimately determined the young student to quit the college, and place himself under Kapellmeister Kitl, in the Conservatoire, at Prague. The progress of Abert in composition was rapid, and his first grand Orchestral Symphony, produced and played before the Professors, in 1851, first brought him into notice at Prague. The following year, 1852, Abert was engaged as contra-bassist in the Royal Chapel and Opera at Stuttgart. In this subordinate position he continued his studies of the great masters, and subsequently composed a second and third grand symphony. The Lyrical Muse now diverted his attention, and presently, the persevering youthful symphonist brings forth his first essay, "Anna de Landskron." This opera was given in Stuttgart, in 1858. Encouraged by the success of this his first musical drama, Abert produced in 1860 his second opera, "Le Roi Enrice," which made the tour of Germany. In 1860 also appeared his grand characteristic symphony, "Christoph Colomb," which spread the fame of Abert to Belgium, France and England, in which countries this composition was played with more or less success. Having achieved popularity in orchestral and lyrical compositions, he next succeeded in chamber music, with a Quartet for two violins, viola, and violoncello.

The crowning effort of the Bohemian contra-bassist however was the complete success of his third opera, "Astorga," which justifies his appointment as Kapellmeister at Stuttgart. The romantic part of his domestic history is no less gratifying than that of his renouncing the order of priesthood, and struggling for renown as a musician. By his talent, education, and amiable character, the young Bohemian soon became popular in the society of Stuttgart, and ultimately inspired one of the fair sex with a sentiment that awakened a genial sympathy, and led to their happy union. The wife of Abert is the daughter of the rich and popular proprietor of the excellent hotel that bears his name—Marquart. Being himself a dilettante, and fond of music, Marquart is very proud of the distinction earned by his gifted son-in-law, and every musical visitor to Stuttgart, if a friend of the composer, is treated by "mine host" with sumptuous hospitality at the artistic-banquets which are frequently organized during the summer months, and presided over by the present Kapellmeister, Abert.—Orchestra.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Ballad of Queen Mab. "Romeo and Juliet," by Gounod. 75
Thou who to dust. (Tu che degnasti.) " " 75
Ah! go not yet. (Ah! non partir.) " " 75
Go: already thou'rt pardoned. (Va: gia perdonata). Duet. " " 1.25
Since yesterday. (De Jeri indarno), " " 60
Another instalment of well selected portions of the new opera. The pieces contain many beautiful passages, and have been carefully translated by Mr. T. T. Barker.
Accursed forever. (Sia maledetto). "Don Carlos," by Verdi. 75
Verdi is strong in tragedy, and this with the other new songs of "Don Carlos," are rather sad, but the music is impressive.
The midnight harp. Ballad. W. Seibert. 30
Roar on, ye winds. (Brause fort). S'g. Guttman. 35
Two new songs by talented German composers.
Soft evening air. S'g & Chorus. W. L. Hayden. 30
A soft, sweet song, of the kind one naturally falls to singing of an evening.
Amid the silent hours of night. S'g. G. W. Lyon. 30
We have a Lion and a Fair-Lamb on the list this time. But the Lyon discourses most sweetly and delicately, and the Lamb the reverse.
As shadows dim. (Gia dalla mente involasi). In "Le Tre Nozze." Alary. 60
Perfectly sweet, and a treasure for all who have some little skill in vocalization. It is a sort of vocal Polka; and the Italian used to be sung by Mad. Sontag.

Instrumental.

- Clusters of Brilliants. Transcriptions by Z. Moelling, each, 30
Flee as a bird. Gently sighs the breeze.
Sounds of the sea. Weber's last waltz.
Tannhäuser Gr'd M'ch. How can I leave thee.
Wandering Jew W'tz. What are the wild waves.
L'Estasi Waltz. Angel Adie.
Fete de Gondoliers. Ye merry birds.
A dozen capital arrangements of popular airs, not difficult, and well suited to learners.
Harmonies de Soir. Morceau elegant. S. Smith. 75
Our Smith continues to manufacture the best of ware, and here is a structure of silvery sounds, well fitted together.
Route Polka. A. Fanchoux. 30
Our Favorite Polka. G. R. Peiffer. 35
Two spirited polkas.
Pretty Little Sarah. Schottisch. Wellman. 55
Little Sarah skips about charmingly here, and the air is admirably adapted to a lively dance.
Feu volage. (Wildfire) Galop. Fairlamb. 60
Vive L' Union. March caprice. " 50
Both are very spirited, the latter more powerful than the former, but both well worth learning.

Books.

GARCIA'S NEW TREATISE ON THE ART OF SINGING. A compendious method of instruction, with examples and exercises for the Cultivation of the Voice.

By Manuel Garcia. $3.00

This revised edition of the work of a celebrated teacher, is among the best of its class, and has an accurate and extended description of the method of producing the various tones and qualities of tone.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 692.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 12, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 15.

Recent German Operas.—Reinecke's "King Manfred."*

(Translated from the German for this Journal).

(Concluded from page 106).

The second act goes on to show us how Manfred's thoughts still turn on getting possession of Chismonde. He is in his palace and sends out a page to discover the abode of the beloved. In vain does Eckart remind him of the dangers which threaten his crown on the part of the Roman and French alliance; in vain his wife Helena exhorts him to reform; he hushes the anxiety of her and Eckart about throne and empire and, weary of the wife, puts her away. Meanwhile the Cardinal with the banished noblemen have learned of Manfred's purpose of abducting Chismonde, and the latter lie in wait for the king, who comes with Eckart and a few attendants into the cloister garden; but Eckart kills one of the ringleaders and puts the rest to flight. Manfred frees Chismonde and brings her to his Love Court.

In the third act the returning party are awaited in Manfred's palace, where already many devoted country people, besides a gang of ill-disposed sailors, have gathered to see the festivities in preparation. Helena, to avoid this painful meeting, betakes herself before Manfred's return to the castle at Benevento. The Love Court marches in, the king in the midst thereof disguised as Bacchus, and in his train a troop of Saracenic maidens, which is to be explained by the circumstance that the Saracens, still to be found about that time in lower Italy, were in alliance with Manfred. Now come jubilation, dance and feasting! Then the Cardinal appears and pronounces the sentence of excommunication against the King. Part of the company desert Manfred, the rest stay by him.

The fourth act brings us nearer to the catastrophe. Chismonde is no longer willing to be merely the King's leman, she will be Queen herself. But Manfred, to whom the serious side of life has powerfully presented itself, rejects her claims; he has gone back to the true love, the love of his wedded wife. But while he is marching forth to fight his enemies, Chismonde broods over a scheme to poison the Queen. Without the battle thunders, again for once, through the aid of the Saracens, decided in Manfred's favor. Could he only control himself to stay with the army, as Eckart advises him, the victory might be followed up; but a dark misgiving drives the King back to Benevento. There (in the fifth act) sits the Queen, her heart full of anxiety and yearning, in the lonely hall. Chismonde glides in to her in the disguise of a pilgrim and is about to offer her the poison, under the pretext of preparing a love potion for her. Manfred steps between them and prevents the crime. The King is reconciled with his wife. But in the meantime his enemies, through treachery, have got possession of the most important places, and are drawing nigh the royal palace. Deserted by the Italians, Manfred can rely only on the Saracens. He fights and falls. Chismonde, in a swoon, is borne back by the victors to the cloister. The Queen drinks off the cup of poison over the corpse of her slain husband. Charles of Anjou is proclaimed King.

It will be seen that the libretto avoids all mention of Manfred's children. The figure of Chismonde is finely invented to show the weakness of the King, who represents the tragical guilt thereof. The King's wife, apostrophizing the dear dead at the bier with words of lofty eulogy, puts herself to death, whereas history tells us that she languished through long years of imprisonment. It cannot be denied that the book on the whole is happily invented and scenically effective. Everything essential shows a sufficient motive. Episodes are as far as possible avoided. Nowhere is there any weight attached to mere externals; where these come in sight, it is constantly as foil, and not as substitute for action. The language, although not wholly free from reminiscences, is easily apprehended, euphonious, musical, and, without suffering from extravagances and redundancy, is yet for the most part in a lofty vein.

In regard to the musical treatment, the composer has, in the first place, disregarded all the received models. He has composed his text all through, making almost no use of recitativo secco, but writing for the most part singing recitative. But he has brought the special lyrical elements of the poem into a free musical form corresponding to their several requirements. In this he has of course had to employ repetition of the text, but on the whole he has done it discreetly and perhaps too sparingly; preludes and postludes he has introduced only at the beginning or the close of single scenes, and these are mostly independent in their contents.

From all this it will be seen, that the composer was perfectly clear in his own mind in entering the road he took, and that he has followed it consistently and—we do not hesitate to add—successfully. The earnest way in which the tone-poet has treated his task, both in respect of melody and harmony, is coupled with so much grace and fineness, that one's enjoyment is never for an instant disturbed. The rhythm, without being striking, is appropriate. The vocal writing shows the all-practiced master, and not less the instrumentation. Perhaps it has occurred only to us—who, in the interest of the composer, as well as for our own instruction, are looking out for any weaknesses—that he may have too anxiously avoided all that could have looked like an intentional culmination of effects.

As we go over Reinecke's opera in our memory, it is with joyful satisfaction we confess, that we have met with no dramatic work for a long time which had such a succession of beautiful and interesting parts to offer, as "King Manfred." The two larger instrumental pieces which occur in the opera are each admirably effective in its way; and the public gave expression to its pleasure by receiving the solid and yet very brilliant Overture, made up of motives from the opera, with long continued applause, and by requiring the prelude to the fifth act to be played da capo. Conspicuous in value and effect are: in the first act, Chismonde's Aria; the cabalet of Manfred and the Duet follows between Manfred and Chismonde. In the second act, the Duet between Manfred and Helena, particularly at the close, where Helena remains alone; the chorus of exiles: "Nun ist er in der Falle!" the Romanza of Manfred: "Was wilst du in der Leuzesnacht!" the Duet between Manfred and Chismonde. In the third act, the Ballet and the concluding chorus. In the fourth act, the aria of Chismonde, and that of Manfred: "O Siegsruf!" with its tranquil, melting close; the Duet between Eckhart and Manfred. In the fifth act, the Ballad of the Page; the Cavatina of Helena; the closing scene, with Helena's touching departure.

"What?" I hear it said, "An opera in the Italian repertoire has scarcely ever more than six or seven numbers that are musically tolerable or effective for the great public; and here in this German opera you talk of eighteen or twenty!" Yea verily! and for this reason we desire and hope that "King Manfred" may keep its place in the repertoire as long as the incomparably weaker work of some favorite Italian or Frenchman, though Reinecke be "only" a German!

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Fugue as an Art Work.

BY W. S. B. MATHEWS.

I.

1. The specific problem of this paper is to answer this question, so far as we may, namely:—What is the true rank of the Fugue as a musical work of art? Let it be understood that, throughout this paper, we understand by the term fugue, the Fugue in its highest development, which it received only at the hand of Bach; for the fugues of this Master are, we think, more individual and more free than others, and approach more nearly to the ideal of the fugue.

In this discussion we must build up our reasoning on axioms, intuitions, and postulates, about which opinions do not differ; for we have no authoritative treatise on musical taste.

2. The first question which meets us is: What kind of impressions or ideas may we get from music? To this question generally stated, John Ruskin has answered:—

"All sources of pleasure, or any other good, to be derived from works of art, may be referred to five distinct heads.

"I. Ideas of Power.—The perception or conception of the mental or bodily powers by which the work has been produced.

"II. Ideas of Imitation.—The perception that the thing produced resembles something else.

"III. Ideas of Truth.—A perception of faithfulness in a statement of facts by the thing produced.

"IV. Ideas of Beauty.—The perception of

* Opera in 5 Acts by Fr. Röber, music by Carl Reinecke. Produced for the first time at the Royal Theatre in Wiesbaden.

beauty, either in the thing produced, or in what it suggests or resembles.

V. Ideas of Relation.—The perception of intellectual relations in the thing produced, or in what it suggests or resembles."

In musical application the significance of these terms is thus taken:—When we perceive a musical work to have employed great technical or artistic powers in its production, we receive "ideas of power." Likewise from a virtuoso performance we receive "ideas of power"—namely, of great mental and bodily powers employed in the performance or in its preparation. This kind of impression is in itself noble. We are so constituted as to take pleasure in any exhibition of power, either bodily or mental; and the more worthily the power is exerted, the more worthy is our delight.

Secondly. When we perceive a musical passage to imitate something,—as, e.g., a bird-song, or one voice to imitate another—we receive "ideas of imitation." Haydn's "Creation" abounds in passages designed to imitate or suggest sounds in nature. The ideas of this class are regarded as less noble than any others in music, for reasons that we have not now space to consider.

Thirdly. A musical work depicts or suggests certain emotional states. In proportion as any particular emotional state is distinctly suggested, or impressed upon us, do we receive "ideas of truth."

Fourth. In what ideas of Beauty consist we have not now room to show in full. Reference is made to the paper on "GOOD MUSIC" in No. 640 of this Journal; or, still better, to the second volume of Ruskin's "MODERN PAINTERS," which volume alone to any student in Æsthetics is worth more than the price of the entire set. It must suffice here to say that in the contemplation of good music we experience very great pleasure, "not dependent on any direct and definite exertion of the intellect." This pleasure results from a perception of the beautiful, which may be merely of the blending or contrasting of tones of different timbre, and in the happy turns of melody and harmony; or may consist in an unconscious perception of spiritual types suggested by the music. Among the traits of typical beauty are these:—Infinity, Unity, Repose, Symmetry, Purity, and Moderation. These elements are typical of traits in the Divine. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that beauty of the kind first mentioned (blending of tones, etc.) is of physical relation only. The latter is a higher kind—a beauty perceived by the moral nature.

Fifth. Entirely distinct from the pleasures already enumerated, is the perception of the relations of design, significance, and fitness, between the different parts of the work. All the satisfaction we experience in tracing the manner of modulations, the happy imitations (considered as a device of counterpoint), the various resources of counterpoint, and the relation of successive melodic periods to each other,—the satisfaction derived from all these and many like sources, arises from "ideas of relation."

3. Again, with reference to the mind, or "subjectively," as some would say, all the impressions just enumerated may be classed into three divisions:—

I. Sensuous Perceptions.—The music sounds well, or it does not. To this class belong all questions of consonance or dissonance, tone-color, rhythm—all questions of hearing.

II. Intellectual Perceptions.—These are "ideas of relation," and "ideas of power," perhaps also "ideas of imitation," as enumerated and defined in the preceding chapter.

III. Emotional Impressions.—We perceive the work to depict certain emotional states and our own feelings are elevated or depressed to a consonance therewith. To this class belong the "ideas of truth" and "of beauty," according to the former enumeration.

4. It is now proper that we inquire which of these kinds of ideas is most noble, if, indeed, there be degrees of rank among them.

Now with reference to the classes of ideas enumerated in the second chapter it is to be said, that the three last named are regarded as most noble, and of these all are in some degree essential to any true work of art. Truth is of course essential to any real nobility, but is hardly a fit subject of comparison with other elements. Of the other two, I cannot resist the conviction that ideas of beauty are more ethereal, more angelic, more divine, than the simple perception of the intellectual relation of parts, however complicated or masterly these relations may be. And as this opinion will hardly be controverted by any person of artistic soul, we may consider it as accepted.

With reference to the enumeration in the third chapter it remains to say, that the two latter sources of pleasure (the Intellectual and the Emotional) must be regarded as superior, or of a higher order than the first. For by the common consent of enlightened mankind, those enjoyments which appertain exclusively to the physique are considered to be of a lower order than those which belong to the intellectual or emotional nature. The body perishes with the using. The soul is immortal.

5. We are now prepared to approach more closely to our main question, which we do by asking: How, in general, shall we determine the rank of a work of art? Ruskin has given a general formula of answer to this, in "MODERN PAINTERS," Vol. I. p. 12, (First American Ed.) "The art is greatest, which conveys to the mind of the spectator, by any means whatever, the greatest number of the greatest ideas, and I call an idea great in proportion as it is received by a higher faculty of the mind, and as it more fully occupies, and, in occupying, exercises and exalts the faculty by which it is received." If this be so, and if the conclusions arrived at in the preceding chapter be just, it follows that those compositions are greatest which most abound in ideas of Beauty, of Relation, and of Truth.

Thus far we seem to have come safely on our journey, but only now have we reached our main question.

II.

We have endeavored to show on what principles the rank of art-works is to be determined. The general result at which we have arrived, is that musical works are greater in proportion to the ideas of beauty and truth they communicate, rather than in proportion to any impression of masterly skill in counterpoint they may give us. In the discussion of the main question, therefore, (namely, as to the rank of the fugue) it becomes necessary in the first place to inquire: What are the traits of the fugue? And then from a comparison of these traits with the general principles already deduced we shall be able to solve our problem, to our own satisfaction at least.

The grand question is: What is the true position of the fugue in the world of musical art? Now this question is not one already determined (as some might hastily assume), as is evident from the fact that different composers—acknowledged Masters, too—have placed very different estimates upon the Fugue. Some have ignored it entirely. Others have cultivated it—Mendelssohn, for instance—only as a severe exercise in composition. Others, again, have employed it more largely than any other style of composition, as, for instance, Bach.

2. And here I pause to remark that in my use of the term the Fugue is not a distinct musical form. For I use the word "form" to signify "any plan in accordance with which several successive periods of melody are associated so as to form one whole." The form is the plan of period-relation of the work. The Song-form, Rondo, Sonata and Fantasia are distinguishable musical forms. Fugue is a system of counterpoint; and a Fugue is a composition in which the counterpoint is managed in accordance with the laws of that system. It is not the plan in accordance with which the melodic periods follow one another, that distinguishes the Fugue from other compositions, but the manner of the counterpoint, and this alone. Any work in which the voices bear strict fugal relations to each other, is a Fugue. Yet it is possible that a work be a Fugue, and still be, as to its period-relations, a veritable Sonata. Bach's organ fugue in E flat (the so-called St. Ann's, I believe) is almost a Sonatina.

3. And this leads us to a closer survey of the noteworthy traits of the fugue. The one great feature of the fugue is the counterpoint. It is this, as we have seen, that names the work. It is indeed the culmination of counterpoint. Cherubini says:—

"Such as it exists at the present time, Fugue is the perfection of counterpoint. It should comprise not only all the resources supplied by the different kinds of counterpoint, but many other devices peculiar to itself."

"All that a good composer ought to know, may be introduced into fugue; it is the type of all pieces of music; that is to say, whatever the piece composed, so that it be well conceived, regular, and conducted with good intention—it should without bearing precisely the character and form of a fugue, at least possess its spirit."

The fugues of Bach do have well-marked individualities of emotional tone. But they do none of them suggest distinct emotional states, or impress us, and elevate or depress the emotional condition of the listener to consonance with themselves, so decidedly as do many other works—certain of Beethoven's Sonatas, for instance.

Fugues are grand. Even the easy ones awaken impressions of power. They are restless, and when they cease it is not from an apparent fitness of necessary conclusion reached, but rather of arbitrary pause. For a fugue when "played, is not played out." You are conscious of no reason why it might not go on indefinitely—or, at least, as long as the counterpoint "holds out." It has a determined purpose, which is, to worthily magnify a given subject. In its extent, and in the determination of its period relations and paragraphs, it is strictly a fantasy.

4. Again. That last expression of Cherubini ("possess its spirit") calls us back to the delightful Editorial fantasy "About Fugues" in No. 686.

Certain compositions do possess much of the fugue spirit, yet are not strictly fugues. For example, the Finale of Beethoven's A flat Sonata, Op. 26, has much of this spirit. Now what impression does this Finale make upon us, as compared with other movements of the same work? The first movement, the Andante with variations, is full of soul. The Scherzo is purposely of small spiritual weight, in order to relieve the mind from what precedes, and preparatory to what follows. The third movement is the solemn Funeral March—a composition which with perhaps two or three others stands first of its kind. Now steps in the lively Finale, quick, impetuous, even mirthful. Two of the previous movements are full of spiritual meaning. While counterpoint has had a fair share of attention, it has been employed only in strict subordination to the "inner light." Impressions of Beauty and Truth have been foremost in the composer's intention. But now it is time to relieve the attention so severely tasked in this direction, and the resources of counterpoint are employed with a liberal hand to awaken impressions of delight more of the Intellect than of the Emotions. The melodic contents are significant, it is true, but they become infinitely more so in the manner of elaboration. This movement is needed to restore the spiritual equilibrium. From the whole Sonata, the soul awakens as from an elysian dream.

5. To conclude. From good Fugues we receive great pleasure. But it is clear to me that between the Fugue and Sonata there is a fundamental and radical difference, other than of form or counterpoint. A Sonata is a grand soul-picture. A Fugue is a grand piece of work. It may be a soul picture, too. But it is of a soul that is restless, striving after infinite development—a worthy strife, yet strife, after all; a Becoming, a never Is. To hear a good Sonata, rests one; a fugue invigorates, clears the head, but does not seem to me to afford rest. The grand task of the sonata is, to convey "ideas of beauty;" of the fugue, "ideas of power and relation." It follows, therefore as the former paper said, that the fugue is truly "less noble than other forms of musical art, in so far as it expresses less" of soul "than they."

That the Fugue does express less of emotion, but more of intellectual contrivance than some other varieties of music, is a matter of consciousness among the majority of thoughtful musicians. In any nation the number of those who do not coincide with this decision, may almost be counted on one's fingers. Now we can receive great pleasure in contemplating a neat problem in mathematics; but when one would seek to convince us of the wonderful amount of emotional expression and spirituality that is latent therein, we are reminded of the just remark of the poet, that

"Optics sharp 'twould take, I ween,
To see a thing that can't be seen."

That such optics are possessed by any, is to the "eleven obstinate men on the jury," a matter of profound admiration!

London "Music Halls."

(From "The Tomahawk.")

No institution has ever proved more thoroughly false to its early promise than has the "Music Hall."

We were told when the idea came first into notice, that its encouragement would assuredly exercise a beneficial influence over the progress of music amongst the lower classes; that many people, who now spend the hours of the night in dissolute indulgence at the public-house, would, in time, be weaned from their evil doings, and that the souls of our less wealthy fellow creatures would, in general terms, be ennobled through the gentle agency of art! In fact we were told all sorts of things, which, perhaps, we did not believe, and which have at all events, been proved by time to be not less fallacious than the great majority of predictions.

When the Canterbury Music Hall came prominently before the public, and set an example which has now been followed all over London—you may say all over England—the principal attraction which was put forward to catch the multitude was a musical selection from some well-known operatic work. The performance, we are free to confess, was somewhat coarse, but it was not wanting in a certain brilliancy and dash, and as there were one or two singers of passable merit engaged for these selections, we have no doubt but that with care and judgment the character of the entertainment might have been raised, and the taste of the public, as a natural consequence, improved.

Destiny has, however, willed it otherwise, and the Music Hall, as it at present stands, is mischievous to the art which it pretends to uphold. Operatic selections, it is true, are still to be heard, but they are, as a rule, so badly sung and vulgarly accompanied, that it were better for the cause of art that they should be omitted, and, in many cases, they appear to have died away—unheeded and unregretted—from the programme.

Nothing is listened to now-a-days but the so-called "comic songs," and, in sober earnestness, we must express our astonishment that human beings, endowed with the ordinary gift of reason, should be found to go night after night in order to witness such humiliating exhibitions. It is quite impossible to name anything equal to the stupidity of these comic songs, unless, indeed, it be their vulgarity. A man appears on the platform, dressed in outlandish clothes, and ornamented with whiskers of ferocious length and hideous hue, and proceeds to sing verse after verse of pointless twaddle, interspersed with a blatant "chorus," in which the audience is requested to join. The audience obligingly consents, and each member of it contributes, to the general harmony, a verse of the tune which he happens to know best. It not infrequently occurs that one of these humorous efforts is received with perfect silence, and under such circumstances, it might not unreasonably be supposed that the artist would refrain, from motives of delicacy, from making his re-appearance before an audience to whom his talents do not appear to have afforded unqualified satisfaction. We are all, however, liable to be deceived, and no matter how slender the amount of the success achieved, the gentleman who occupies the chair will announce, in stentorian accents, that "Mr. So-and-So will oblige again"—which he accordingly proceeds to do, in whiskers more alarming, and vestments, if possible, more hideous than on the previous occasion. This species of musical treadmill is continued until the exhausted singer has sung four songs, when (if he sternly refuse to sing any more) he is set free, and allowed to exercise, over other Music Halls, the improving influence of his talent.

It might be fancied, that in hearing a song from one of these hapless sons of mirth we must have reached the lowest pitch of jocular destitution; but this is not so, for, however deep the pain we endure from the male comedian, the suffering which we experience at the hands of the "serio-comic lady" is even harder to bear. Her very title is assuredly a misnomer, for there is nought of seriousness in her performance, whilst as for comedy—Heaven save the mark!—she knows not the meaning of the word! She appears on the platform and, with saucy bearing and shrill voice, howls forth some ditty about "cards in the Guards," or some "swell in Pall Mall," or, perhaps, she will tell you a domestic romance in which omnibus conductors, or policemen, or costermongers, form the important features. Wanting, alike, in point, grace, or humor, these songs can have no purpose save to indulge the degraded taste of the majority of those who nightly fill the Music Halls; amongst such of the audience as have been attracted in the idea that they would hear a rational performance, there can be but one feeling—pity.

We would gladly refrain from attacking women, but in this case, we cannot be silent, for we are satisfied that these songs are not only very stupid but extremely mischievous in their results, and those who sing them must claim at our hands any consideration on account of that sex, which they have outraged by such unsexedly and unwomanly performances. Graces in a woman, like hope in the human breast, should linger when all else is gone, and it is because these "serio-comic ladies" have no vestige of feminine refinement that we condemn them hopelessly and unreservedly.

Whilst on this subject, we are reminded, perhaps by contrast, of Mlle. Theresa, the diva of the Alcazar, in Paris, and, so far as regards pointlessness and stupidity, we are bound in truth to say that our remarks have no reference to her; she possesses that which, in a different walk of life, might have enabled her to obtain a high position as an artist. As it is she is only a Music Hall singer—but such a one! No actor can see her, no musician can hear her, without marvelling at the rare amount of talent evinced by her. That her sphere of art is a low one—perhaps the lowest—no one will deny; but her pre-eminence in that sphere is also undeniable, and, at the risk of shocking some of our readers, we venture to think that many queens of song now before the public, whose names are cherished by lovers of the opera, will find themselves matched and outdone before Mlle. Theresa meets her equal.

But let us leave the heroine of the Alcazar. In England there are numerous representatives of her faults, but we shall seek in vain for anyone who can afford the least idea of her merits. We had a twofold object in alluding to the Parisian Café Chantant, and, although the French Music Hall is liable to reproach in certain matters, we think that some things might with advantage be transplanted in England. Imprimis, you will find in most cases, a trim little orchestra of efficient performers, who rattle merrily through one or two overtures, a waltz, or a march, and so forth, and who, if need be, are fit to play a better class of music in fair style. There are generally singers of some pretension who are equal to the proper performance of romances and operatic airs, and, in short, the class of entertainment is such as reasonable folk may take pleasure in hearing. We wish that as much could be said for our Music Halls! Until, however, the entire organization of these places of amusement is remodelled, and until decent music and fair cultivation take the ground which is now occupied by buffoonery and vulgarity, no good result may be hoped for.

We have spoken our mind pretty plainly in this matter, and there are two and possibly more of these Music Halls which may not justly come under the strictures which we have passed upon the institutions in general. Of the exceptions which strike us, the Alhambra, with its well-mounted ballets and capital scenery, may be cited as one, whilst the music rooms known as Evans's in Covent Garden, constitutes the other. In the latter case, the audience consists of men alone, and the entertainment is made up of songs, glees and part-songs, executed by a well-trained choir, in which will be found boys with fresh and lusty voices, which it does one's heart good to hear. There was, it is true, a tuneful comedian there, whose name, we fancy, was Mr. Harry Sidney, but if we are right, he has taken his talents elsewhere, and at Evans's the visitor will now chance to hear good music well executed. The establishment is admirably conducted, and as for the beaming proprietor, may his shadow never be less, and may his hospitable snuff box never be empty!

It will be seen that we have not touched upon the more serious question of the evil influence exercised by the majority of Music Halls as they are now conducted, and we have purposely refrained from doing so. If the morality of a Briton is to be attacked, the best course is to make, in the first place, an appeal to his common sense. We have endeavored to point out the utter stupidity and worthlessness of the entertainments which are to be heard at these places all over London, and it remains for the public to contribute its quota towards a general reformation, so that, in time, the Music Hall may really furnish a home for music, instead of being, as at present, an insult to the art from which it has filched the name.

The Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein.

(Correspondence of the London Musical World.)

The meeting of the General German Musical Society held at Meiningen during last week proved one of unusual interest, as tending in some measure to show what is being effected in Germany by musicians of the present day. This society, which is under the immediate patronage of the Grand-Duke of Saxony, and owes its existence mainly to the efforts of the Abbe Liszt, was founded at Weimar in 1861 for the cultivation of musical art by the establishment of musical festivals, the revival of the less familiar works of undisputed merit by great masters, and the production of new works by living composers. Unlike our English festivals, which are avowedly projected in aid of some charity, or our concert-giving societies which can only be counted as trade concerns, and at which, consequently, as a rule, only such familiar works as are sure to attract the greatest numbers are repeated from year to year, this society, relying mainly upon artists for support, is independent of the general public, and therefore in a position to produce such works as, it is thought, may prove most interesting to musicians, without considering for a moment the wishes of the uninitiated. Under these circumstances the majority of the works produced at four concerts have been unfamiliar to the generality of the audience, if not actually new. Of the four concerts, two were devoted to orchestral works and vocal solos, one to Church music, and one to vocal and instrumental chamber-music. The orchestra, which consisted of the combined bands of the Courts of Weimar and Meiningen with some additions, under the able leadership of Herr Dr. Damrosch, of Breslau, was adequate for all requirements. Liszt, the accomplished man, the beau idéal of an artist, whose fascinating manners influence every one with whom he comes in contact, was continually present both at rehearsals and performances, and by his kindly counsel and advice materially aided both conductor and performers in the accomplishment of their by no means easy task. Having diligently attended the rehearsals, which commenced two days before the first concert, and were continued daily during the festival week, as well as having been present at all the performances, I may be allowed to venture an opinion on what I have heard, though so much of it has been new and strange. Undoubtedly the most important of the orchestral works were Hans von Bülow's overture, or, as he himself designates it, "symphonisches Stimmungsbild," Nirwana; Dr. Damrosch's violin concerto; Liszt's symphonische Dichtung, "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne;" and the "scene d'amour et fête chez Capulet" from Berlioz's "symphonie dramatique," Romeo et Juliet. As a work of art, Nirwana is a miracle of complicity, abounding in instrumental effects both new and striking. It is constructed on some half-dozen short rhythmical or melodious themes, one or more of which, either alone or in combination, are treated contrapuntally in nearly every bar, with extreme cleverness. Interesting as a musical study as the score of it is, the attempt to portray in musical tones a metaphysical idea of the utmost abstruseness, in the absence of spontaneity of idea and of continuous melody, results in an impression both dreary and unsatisfactory. Dr. Damrosch's concerto in F-sharp minor, admirably played by himself, proved to be a composition of remarkable freshness and effect, and free from all taint of eccentricity. The slow movement especially was full of poetic feeling, and, technically considered, exquisitely finished; the third, as rarely happens, forming an effective climax to the whole. Liszt's symphonische Dichtung, known in Germany as the "Berg" symphony, is an illustration of Victor Hugo's poem, "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne." The poet hears two voices: the one immeasurable and gloriously harmonious, choring jubilant hymns of praise to the Lord; the other dull and plaintive, and swelling into blasphemous cries and curses. The one says "Nature," the other "Humanity." These two voices are heard striving and contending for superiority, till at last they combine in a glorious hymn of praise. The theme is a magnificent one, and, as Liszt has conceived it, requires all the resources of the modern orchestra, including harps, bass clarinet, tam-tam and double-drum, which are employed in a manner at once original and strikingly sonorous, without the least approach to vulgarity. Though one misses the melodious continuity of the older masters, there is melody enough of a fragmentary character in it to ensure a thoroughly satisfactory general effect, provided one is prepared to be content with the absence of the compact traditional symphonic form. The applause which followed the most spirited and thoroughly finished performance of it imaginable was immense. Not less, and deservedly so, was that accorded to the scenes from Berlioz's Romeo symphony, a work more in accordance with the ordinary symphonic form, true to life and abounding in melody of the most telling and enchanting character, and one which may safely be commended to Mr. Manns for performance at the Crystal Palace in preference to any work heard at this festival. Of the other new orchestral works, including overtures by E. Büchner and E. von Mihaelovich, symphonies by R. Hol and E. Lassen, and a pianoforte concerto by F. Kiel, it is only necessary to say that for the most part they were evidently the works of practised musicians, who show no leaning towards a new school, and are to be commended rather for their constructive ability and knowledge of instrumentation than for the originality of their ideas. The only other orchestral work which calls for mention was Beethoven's triple concerto, which, admirably played by MM. Lassen, Kömpel and Grützmacher, never pleased me better. At a concert of sacred music held in the church, several interesting specimens of old works by Palestrina, E. Fabio, David Perez, J. Seb. Bach, as well as Liszt's setting of the 23rd Psalm and of the "Beatitudes," the two latter unpretending trifles, were beautifully executed by the Zalzungen choir. The chamber-music concert principally consisted of vocal duets by Schumann (Spanisches Liederspiel) and M. Cornelius, all charming and exquisitely sung, as well as of songs by MM. Damrosch and Lassen, alike beautiful. The instrumental selection of new works included Liszt's "Zwei Legenden," for the pianoforte, entitled "St. Francis of Assisi preaching to the birds" and "St. Francis of Paula walking on the waves;" some variations for two piano-fortes by A. Deprose; and a pianoforte trio by Ferd. Praeger of London, whose only peculiarity was the lucky fact of its being in one movement. As remarkable artistic displays, Herr Remenyi's performance of Hungarian airs on the violin, Herr Grützmacher's rendering of a suite and a sonata by J. S. Bach (both for the first time) on the violoncello, as well as Herr Wehle's playing of Leclair's sonata, "Le tombeau," for violin and pianoforte, will not easily be forgotten. On each occasion the theatre, in which three or four performances were given, was filled to its utmost limits, and the festival generally seems to have given universal satisfaction.

From Meiningen, after a two days' détour on foot through the most beautiful parts of the Thüringer-Wald, a region which, though seemingly unknown to English tourists, is well worth visiting, I came on to Eisenach in time to be present at a jubilee at the Wartburg, in celebration of its eighth centenary. For such a festivity no spot more rich in German historical associations could be named. Here, in the Castle of Wartburg, the ancient residence of the Landgraves of Thuringia, lived the pious St. Elizabeth of Hungary, with whose life and labors Professor Kingsley has familiarized English readers by his dramatic poem, "The Saint's Tragedy;" here the Minnesingers held their musical contests; and here Luther found an asylum from May, 1521, to March, 1522. The commemorative ceremonial of yesterday (the 28th) commenced with the celebration of divine service in the little chapel of the Wartburg, after which Luther's Hymn was sung in the courtyard by the assembled crowd. A banquet followed, and in the evening a performance of Liszt's oratorio, St. Elizabeth, by command of the Grand-Duke of Weimar, who seems to take a special interest in music and musicians, and who, on this occasion, has behaved with the utmost liberality, putting his palace in Eisenach at Liszt's disposal, and issuing invitations for the performance of his oratorio to as many as could possibly be accommodated. The space being limited in the Ritter-saal, where the performance, conducted by the Abbé himself, took place, there has been a repetition of the oratorio to-day in the church here, which, as it possesses no less than four galleries, one above another, was literally crowded to the ceiling, and for which second performance, though I was the fortunate recipient of an invitation from the Grand-Duke for the first, I have remained. A second hearing of St. Elizabeth, in every respect a noble work, has impressed me much in its favor. The subject, though in some points a painful one, is admirably adapted for musical treatment. The work is divided into six numbers or scenes. In the first, Elizabeth is welcomed at the Wartburg as the bride of Ludwig, son of the Landgrave, by a wedding chorus of remarkable spirit and beauty. In the second, snatches of a hunting-song introduce Ludwig, Elizabeth's stingy and suspicious husband, who on meeting her alone and far away from home, inquires what she is doing. Afraid to confess that she is on an errand of mercy, carrying bread and wine to the poor, she is at first at a loss for an answer, but on Ludwig's pressing to know the contents of her apron, replies "Roses." Ludwig, thinking to detect her in a falsehood, tears open her apron, when lo! roses fall out! the bread and wine having been miraculously changed into roses to cover her pious fraud. The two thereupon return thanks to God for His mercies. Of this exquisitely conceived scene, of course, the most is made. From end to end it is thoroughly beautiful. The character of the music now changes in scene 3, in which occurs a most spirited march and chorus of Crusaders, with whom Ludwig departs to the Holy Land. Subsequently news of his death is brought, whereupon his mother expels her daughter-in-law Elizabeth from the castle in the midst of a terrific storm, which the music wondrously depicts. Elizabeth, after spending the remainder of her days in tending and relieving the poor, at length dies. Thus an opportunity is provided for the introduction of a prayer, a chorus of beggars, and, on her death, of a chorus of angels. The work concludes with the saint's last obsequies: in the celebration of which the ecclesiastical music introduced has the most telling effect, and brings the whole to a satisfactory termination. Contrary to expectation, though an ecclesiastical as well as a Hungarian coloring is faithfully maintained throughout the work, there is no lack of beautiful and simple melody. When treating sacred subjects, Liszt has fully proved in this and other late works not only his willingness to abjure his former eccentricity, but also his ability to appear in a simple and natural light. The possession of such qualities as melody, simplicity, and general effectiveness will go far to recommend his St. Elizabeth, a work which, I am inclined to think, will some day be accepted as the best and most original of its kind that up to this date has appeared since Mendelssohn's Elijah.

Eisenach, Aug. 29.

C. A. E.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPT. 23. Early in October there is to be opened in Philadelphia a school of music upon the plan of the European Conservatoriums. "The American Conservatory of Music" the institution is called, and from the liberal scale upon which all the arrangements for a thorough course of study seem to be made, we may safely anticipate the achievement of much good.

A very strict course of study is to be pursued, no student being allowed to pass from the lower to the higher grades of classes without first undergoing a thorough examination. Much benefit can be derived by the study of the various branches in classes, and the school will also afford the best opportunities for private instruction.

The departments of Violin, Instrumentation and direction of Orchestra, and the German school of singing are under the charge of Mr. Carl Gaertner, our well-known violinist and composer. The Professor for Vocal music, of the Italian, is Signor Antonio Barilli, late of Rome, who comes to us from New York with a high reputation.

Mr. James Pearce, graduate of Oxford College, England, and now organist of St. Mark's church of this city, will teach Organ, Theory of Music, Harmony, &c. Piano lessons will be given by our first professors in classes and privately, and advanced pupils are also to have the opportunity of studying classical music with violin and orchestral accompaniment under the direction of Mr. Gaertner.

Connected with the school is to be a library of musical works free to the use of pupils and to those elected by the President and Trustees. There will be lectures delivered upon interesting musical subjects, and modern Languages and Elocution will likewise be taught.

Our musical public as well as the students of the Conservatory will enjoy the fine classical concerts to be held at the Hall of the institution. The "Philadelphia Classical Quintette Club" purpose giving twenty matinées directed by Mr. Carl Gaertner, commencing Saturday, November 2, and there will be also four grand soirées. Both matinées and grand concerts are given for the purpose of instructing and cultivating the taste of the student of the Conservatory, each pupil being entitled to free admission.

Altogether we look upon this institution as one calculated to effect much in a good cause. The earnest student has greatly needed such opportunities for study, and time will prove what the undertaking can achieve. Your readers shall be duly informed of all matters of interest concerning the Conservatory, its concerts, lectures, &c., that come under the notice of the faithful recorder.

UMPIRE.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., OCT. 4.—The "Heavenly maid," whose slumbers in the city of Elms during the summer have been deep and dreamless, has once more opened her eyes:—This time on the occasion of a concert by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, whose name and fame may not be entirely unknown to the Bostonians.

Here are the selections which they offered us on the evening of the 3d inst.:

- Overture, Bohemian Girl..... Balfé.
- Ballad, The day is done..... Balfé.
- Concerto, for Flute..... Briccialdi.
- Larghetto and Tema con Variazioni..... Mozart.
- Fantaisie for Violin, "Bird on the Tree"..... Hauser.
- German Song, "The Tear"..... Stigelli.
- Andante with variations. From Quartet in A, op. 18..... Beethoven.
- Fantaisie for Violoncello. "Souvenir de Healey"..... Seligmann.
- Tema con Variazioni, from posthumous Q't in D minor..... Schubert.
- Song, "Stay with me"..... Reichardt.
- Drinking Chorus. Ballad and Chorus..... Meyerbeer.

It will be seen that the programme is somewhat meagre, including but four good compositions, and even this list was curtailed by Mr. Fries, who very coolly informed the audience that the Beethoven Andante would not be given, it having been put upon the programme "by mistake."

But the masterly playing of this Quintet is well known, and it hardly need be said that, despite the above mentioned occurrence, the concert proved a very enjoyable one.

We cannot praise too highly the manner in which Schubert's "Tema" was played, the only apparent imperfection being a certain mistiness in detailing some of the finer passages; nor do we speak coldly and critically of this darkly beautiful "song of death" whose wonderful strains seem to reiterate, again and again:

—"The saddest story that art can tell,
Dante and Virgil in lurid gloom
Watching the Lovers float through Hell."

Why is not Schubert better known as a composer of instrumental music?—and why are he and Schumann always under-rated?

Mr. Heindl's rendering of Briccialdi's fine concerto was thoroughly artistic, and deserved the tumultuous encore which it received.

With regard to Mr. Schultze's violin solo, we would observe that whoever prostitutes his talents by the performance of such chaotic trash as "The bird on the tree," certainly does so at the risk of his reputation as an artist; and furthermore we would, in all kindness, suggest that when a player is encored, there exists—in some minds—an absurd prejudice against his responding with a selection the length of which very much exceeds that of the encored morceau.

In Bridgeport, on the 27th ult., Mr. C. F. Daniels began a series of Pianoforte Recitations, or "Matinées," with the following programme, which will commend itself to all observers:

- Impromptu. Op. 1..... C. F. Daniels.
- Romance. Op. 3..... Ernst.
- Elegie..... Chopin.
- Nocturne, "Les Zephyrs"..... Chopin.
- Prelude "L'Orage"..... Stephen Heller.
- "Hours of Elf-Land"..... Mendelssohn.
- Two Songs without Words..... Mendelssohn.
- "La Nuvola".....
- "Duetto".....
- Lebewohl..... C. F. D.
- Sonata Duo. Piano and Flute..... Kuhlau.
- The Rivulet..... Stephen Heller.
- Etude.....
- Cradle Song..... C. F. D.

Mr. Daniels was assisted on this occasion by Mr. Dabney Carr, a flautist of rare ability.

Of the next matinée—which will be given on the 5th inst.—this is the programme:

- "In the Woods,"..... Stephen Heller.
- "The Rivulet,".....
- "Hours of Elf-land," (by request)..... " "
- Mr. Daniels.
- "Break, break,"..... C. F. Daniels.
- "My love is like a red, red rose" (First time in America). Miss Brainerd.
- Five Woodland Pieces..... Schumann.
- Mr. Daniels.
- "Will he come," (First time in America)..... Sullivan.
- "Nut tree"..... Schumann.
- Miss Brainerd.
- Andante con variazioni..... Mendelssohn.
- Mr. Daniels.
- "Now the shades of night are falling"..... R. Franz.
- Slumber Song..... Miss Brainerd.
- Miss Brainerd.
- Value..... C. F. Daniels.
- Dedicated to Mr. Charles Halle, of London.
- Romance—by request.....

MERCURIUS.

P. S.—The Andante of Beethoven's was finally played by the Quintette Club. It was tucked on at the end of the programme, and, as I left the Hall immediately at the close of Schubert's Quartet, I was unaware of it when I wrote.

Music Abroad.

Paris

The Théâtre Italien appears to attract all the interest connected with music in the capital at the present time. And the attraction is almost entirely due to Mlle. Adelina Patti, if we are to credit the Parisian journals, who are unanimous in declaring the fair artist to be a greater favorite than ever, and to have proved herself entirely worthy of the increased favoritism. In addition to Amina, in La Sonnambula, Mlle. Patti has appeared as Norina in Don Pasquale, and Rosina in the Barbiere. In the latter opera the young prima donna had for her coadjutors, Signor Gardoni as Count Almaviva, Signor Cresci as Figaro, Signor Scalse as Doctor Bartolo, and Signor Bagagiolo as Don Basilio. The Figaro was tame and dull, and the new Basilio, notwithstanding his fine voice, had not depth or profundity enough for the music. On this account the great air, "La Calunnia," was the weakest thing in the performance. Mlle. Patti sang exquisitely, and made the old fiore. She introduced in the Lesson-scene the Laughing-Song from Auber's Mignon Lescaut, and, being encored, gave the romance of Mme. de Rothschild, "Si vous n'avez rien à me dire." Mlle. Patti has also played Violetta in the Traviata. Rossini's Semiramide, it is said, is in rehearsal for her, and L'Elisir d'Amore is announced in the bills; so that in reality the popular diva has no idle time of it. Moreover, the opera buffa of Prince Poniatowski, Don Desiderio, will be revised for her, with Signors Gardoni, Scalse, and Mercuriali, and Mlle. Rosello in the other principal parts. M. Bagier had intended to produce Tancredi, with Mlle. Grossi as the hero, Miss Laura Harris as Aménida, Signor Gardoni as Alfiero, and Signor Scalse as Orbazzano. Rossini, however, it is said, showed so strong a repugnance to the revival of his early opera—especially with such a novice as Mlle. Grossi in Tancredi—that the intention is dropt, and the manager will have to look for a suppliance elsewhere.—Il Trovatore will be produced for the début of Signor Mongini in his popular part of Maurizio, and Mlle. Patti will sustain the part of Leonora for the first time. Mlle. Derasse, three times first prize at the last competitions of the Conservatoire, made her début recently on the stage of the Opera-Comique as Isabelle in Le Pré aux Herbes. She somewhat disappointed her friends, but she was terribly nervous, and by no means did herself justice. Her appearance, however, pleased universally, and her voice is described as of fine quality and well trained.—Mme. Miolan-Carvalho, ou dit, is about to leave the stage. This intelligence requires confirmation. The popular Parisian cantatrice appeared, for the last time before her month's engagement, at the Théâtre Lyrique as Juliette, in M. Gounod's Roméo et Juliette. She goes to repose herself after the fatigues of the season, and will no doubt return for the winter session. There is no reason whatsoever why Mme. Miolan-Carvalho should quit the scene of her triumphs. Mlle. Christine Nilsson will belong to the Grand Opera by the time she returns.

M. Bagier intends bringing out Cressida and La Donna del Lago, both for his favorite contralto, whom, however, he cannot elevate to the front rank of artists by any amount of frequent presentation or significant emplacement in the performances. La Donna del Lago, with Adelina Patti as Elena, would be interesting on that account, and Signor Mongini would shine undoubtedly in Roderick Dhu. Moreover, the opera is one of the most delightful of Rossini's.—M. Hector Berlioz has been invited by the Grand Duchess Helena of Russia, at this moment sojourning at Paris, to pass six months this winter at St. Petersburg, to undertake the direction of the concerts of the Conservatoire. The eminent critic and composer has accepted the invitation, and will leave Paris for the great northern city in December.

The once celebrated cantatrice, Mlle. Marie-Lalande, has just died at Chantilly. She was born in 1798, and sang principally in the great opera houses of Italy, although she sang a season in Paris with Malibran, Pasta, Sontag and Lablache.

London.

On Saturday the Winter Concerts at the Crystal Palace were resumed under the direction of Mr. Manns. These concerts have long been justly apportioned a high place among competitors for public favor; and the care and eclecticism manifested in their arrangement rebound greatly to the honor of Mr. Manns and the directors whom he serves. If in the formation of his programme Mr. Manns shows a strong partiality for Schumann, and if in his desire to introduce Schubert to the public, by whom this musician is little known, he selects some of the works least likely to enhance the German composer's reputation, the weakness is but little blameable in one who has so powerful a regard for his compatriots and whose efforts to familiarize them to a British public are always conscientious if occasionally unsuccessful. True to his musical creed, he opened the winter season with a movement from the beautiful ballet music which Schubert wrote for "Rosamunde." In this a lovely andante in G major, in which the air is given to the wood instruments on a pedal bass, is specially fine; and this, together with the succeeding ballet air in the same key, received excellent interpretation at the hands of the executants. But those who seek a meaning in music, and demand that a work, rounded and complete in itself, should express a certain conception perfect to its logical conclusion—should present a picture finished even to the frame and glazing—must be sorely puzzled by these excerpts from a large work. Here is the entr'acte music, but where is the key to it—where is the drama itself, which is the only key? If Schubert's music is to be considered illustrative and dramatic, we must know the subject of the illustration, the plot of the drama; otherwise we cannot say whether the composer has succeeded in his purpose or not. Mere fragments, without indication of their sequence and purport, are to be taken only for what they are—broken pieces. Besides this ballet music we had the Scotch Symphony, played exceedingly well, and the overture to "Der Erlöscht," equally satisfactorily performed. The vocal part of the programme was given to Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Patey-Whytock, and Mr. Cummings. The second lady did remarkable justice to the contralto song from Benedetti's "St. Cecilia," "Father whose blessing," and was even better in a charming song from Mr. Sullivan's "Sapphira Nechava," an unpublished opera. This last was encored. Miss Edith Wynne also sang one of Sullivan's compositions, and Mozart's "Più che sapete." The Palace has benefited during the vacations by improvements made in the orchestra and auditorium, and the band has been augmented. This Saturday we shall have Beethoven's B flat Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Mercutio" overture, and an intermezzo from Gounod's "Columbe."—Orchestra, Sept. 23.

Professor Sterndale Bennett's new cantata, "The Women of Samaria," was finished with extraordinary haste, a portion of it being left incomplete until the last moment. Before sending it to press the composer has wisely resolved to revise a large portion of the work, and to rewrite some numbers.

VIENNA.—At the Carl Theater, Dittersdorf's opera, Doctor and Apotheker, first produced in 1787, has been revived with incontestable success. The music, though somewhat old-fashioned, and redolent of the periwig period, is exceedingly fresh and pleasing, more especially the charming duet, "Verlobte brauchen keine Zeugen," the dashing air, "Parasols," and the spirited concerted finale; but there can be no doubt that the admirable manner in which the opera was put upon the stage, sung, and acted, contributed a great deal to the triumph it achieved.

ITALY.—The following are the titles of the new operas which will, probably, be produced in Italy during the approaching autumn and winter. At Milan—Giocanna di Napoli, Petrella; Patiphar, Cagnoni; L'Isola dei Giardini (bulla) Dell'Argine; La Fanciulla (bulla), Cagnoni; Un Campo d'Erba (bulla), Lauro Rossi. Naples—Gli Avventurieri, Braga; Il Figliuolo prodigo, Serrao; Didone Abbandonata, Benvenuti; L'Esposizione universale (bulla), Filippi; Metastasio (grand fairy opera), Boita. Whether any of these works will ever be performed in any other place than that in which they will be produced may, judging from what Italian operatic composers have written of late years, fairly be doubted.

BERLIN.—The management promises us, during the ensuing season, Gluck's Armida, Alceste, and Iphigenia in Tauris, with a new mise-en-scène for each. In the way of absolute novelties we are to hear Des Singsers Fluch, by A. Langert, and Mignon, by Ambroise Thomas, with Mlle. Luca in the principal female part. Nothing is as yet concluded, I believe, as to the production of M. Gounod's last work, Roméo et Juliette. In connection with the Royal Opera-house I may mention that Herr Wachtel, on his return from a long leave of absence, has received, in consideration of his services at the Court Concerts last winter, a very handsome present from the King.

The Victoria Theatre is to open early next month for an Italian operatic season. The manager, Signor Pollini, has already arrived. The principal artists engaged are Signora Sarolta; Signora Rosa Pollini, from the Academy of Music, New York; Signora Moransi; Signora Gaspari; Signor Armandi, from Naples; Signor Bizzani; Signor Adriano Pantaleone, from Palermo; and Signor Carutti, from Milan. Signor Marchisio, also, will be a member of the company. The season will open with Verdi's Ballo in Maschera. This will be followed by Crispino e la Comare, by Ricci; Lenore, by Mercadante, and an opéra by Pacella, all three novelties for a Berlin Theatre.

The members of the Neuer Berliner Sängerbund, an association including Erk's Gesangverein; the Melodi; the Cælia; and the Acadamische Liederverein, did recently give their second summer festival in the gardens of the Schützenhaus. Besides a variety of songs, the programme included Mozart's Dorfmusikanten, and a comic scena by E. S. Engelburg.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 12, 1867.

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

IV.

9. The following number, an Alto Solo, in E major, 4-4 measure, again, is in strong contrast. Two flutes, the Continuo and the organ falling in occasionally accompany the melody to the words: "Esurientes implevit bonis et divites dimisit inanes" (He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent away empty). The Aria has that expression of mildness and repose, which stirs our soul so beautifully, without wearying by monotony. The flutes move mostly in sixths and thirds, holding fast to an extremely peculiar rhythm, and only now and then are offset against each other in ingenious play. The words: "implevit bonis," and then again: "dimisit inanes" are expressed in a masterly manner; the hungry ones ("esurientes") have as it were a cornucopia of blessings poured upon them, while the rich ("divites") come out empty with a barren figure. The course of the whole aria completes itself so naturally and quietly, the direct intervention of the Highest in the fate of mortals has so many heart-winning traits, that one is almost forced to complain that the beautiful number should glide past so swiftly.

10. The charm of the last piece is one that seizes upon you immediately. Bach follows it up with a conception, full of deep significance, which transports you into remote times, into another world, a movement which may well be regarded as forming the very central point and kernel of the whole. The primeval melody of the Magnificat, which the Church used also for the Benedictio,—its origin dates back into the 7th century—appears now in the oboes as canto fermo, with three female voices (two sopranos and an alto) mysteriously playing about it, to the words: "Suscipit Israel puerum suum, recordatus misericordie" (He hath holpen his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy). In gentle strokes the violoncello marks the fundamental harmonies, rather hinting than actual executing them. The canto fermo floats mildly gleaming, like a star, over the voice parts, lifting them as by a soft attraction to itself. The vocal setting, on its part, heaves and fluctuates towards it in lovely imitations, the several voices taking up the thread and passing it on to one another in artful involution. All seems to draw life and motion from the primeval sounds. For the two lines of the Choral the master uses two portions of accompanying matter: that is, to the first line the voices sing the "suscipit Israel puerum suum," and to the second line the "recordatus misericordie." Both divisions of the text, again, find their peculiar musical treatment. The motive to "suscipit Israel puerum suum" is employed directly and in the inverted form, a mode of representation which answers characteristically enough to the helping hand of the Lord; the "recordatus misericordie," on the contrary, develops itself without the use of such artistic means, and so all the more effectually glorifies the eternal mercy and compassion.

Although the voice parts in their circling movements sometimes cut across each other, yet these momentary hardnesses are always mitigated by the independent individual movement of each part, and rather serve to lend to the whole piece a certain extraordinary and mystical stamp. And this may have been precisely Bach's intention. The union of just those words, which describe the redeeming mercy of the Lord towards his servant Israel, with the venerable tones of the old Magnificat or (in the sense of the Church) the still more significant Benedictio, is surely not an accidental one and points to such a conception. If now we direct attention to the contrast of this number to the Chorus: "Omnes generationes," if we point out how in the two Christianity is first presented in its world-disturbing and then in its world-redeeming aspect, we thereby gain a new point of view, which shows Bach's immeasurable greatness in the clearest light.

The form and substance of the piece just analyzed have reminded us repeatedly of those imperishable words of Luther, which have such convincing efficacy because they proceeded from the deepest insight. He says:

"Where the natural Musica is sharpened and polished by Art, there we first see and recognize with wonder the great and perfect wisdom of God in this wondrous work of his called Music, in which this above all is strange and wonderful: that one voice sings the mere tune, along with which three, four or five other parts are sung, which as it were with jubilation playing and springing around the said mere melody, in all sorts of ways and sound, do marvellously embellish and adorn the same, and lead off as it were a heavenly dance, meeting each other friendlily and fondly hugging and embracing."

Powerfully confirming what precedes, there now sets in a Chorus, in D major, alla breve, to the words: "Sicut locutus est ad patres nostros, Abraham et semini ejus in secula" (As he spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed forever). Suitably to its contents, this text is used for a vocal fugue, energetically supported by the Basso Continuo and the Organ. That Bach is the unrivalled master in the fugue form, is universally agreed. And so here too he solves his problem with a playful ease and perfect skill. To the marrowy main theme: "sicut locutus est ad patres nostros" are one by one added various secondary motives, the first with the words: "Abraham et semini ejus," the second with: "sicut locutus est," and the third with: "in secula," which all unite together at the last entrance but one of the theme in the bass. The significant harmony of word and tone needs scarcely to be mentioned.

Bach's fugues are commonly written in a Counterpoint of as many kinds as there are voice parts employed. By an apt inversion of these the master with the simplest means often reaches the greatest effects. In general he works out his main theme in three, four or five parts, and gives to each single part a character as independent and as individual as possible: this material, almost exclusively, is discussed throughout the further course of the movement. Accordingly one might believe that here, after all, the mechanical prevailed rather than the organic. Up to a certain point this may be admitted; but then we must not overlook the way in which Bach knows how to invent his themes; he breathes into them such an elastic energy, that in all positions and relations they appear always fresh and new.

Towards the end our fugue moulds itself somewhat freely, and thus admirably prepares the character of the concluding number.

Leopold de Meyer.

A REMINISCENCE.

Twenty-two years! Much is changed in that time. Especially in the Art enthusiasms of a young people only beginning to become artistic. In music it is curious (in one sense sad, but in a better sense encouraging) to compare the present lukewarm interest in brilliant virtuosos, with the excitement which our first visitors of that sort used to create before the tribe became so very common. Ole Bull, for instance, and Leopold de Meyer—what a romantic Boanerges each was in his way, before we knew too much for miracles! The latter has suddenly re-appeared in New York, has been playing in several concerts, and the newspaper critics find him as rare a player and of as strong a magnetism as ever. Perhaps! But it is that whole kind of thing that fades out with such sure fatality. Who cares now for the showy Fantasias, the "Marches Marocaines," &c., however wonderful in execution, when he can listen, even here in little Boston, to the finest and the rarest that there is in the classics of piano-forte genius, with half-a-dozen capital pianists for interpreters?

There certainly was something remarkable in the playing of De Meyer; and we are tempted to look back 22 years and recall part of our record of a memorable evening. It was long before Thalberg or Jaell, or Hatton, or any of the famous ones had come; and it was when the modern virtuoso compositions, the Thalberg Fantasias, &c., were comparatively new to us and bound to have their run.

The wonderful pianist had no sooner established himself in commodious and elegant quarters in Boston, than the musical conoscenti were bidden to his rooms to have a preliminary taste of his quality. Some forty gentlemen were assembled, musical professors, critics, dilettanti, editors, in short the nucleus whose opinion is fame with our little musical world. With what feelings we went, may be judged from the views we have lately expressed respecting the whole modern tendency of music. The deepest in music we knew to be not of the order which makes triumphal processions through the world. Its true Holy Land lies quietly remote from these thronged public routes, its miracles are far less dazzling, its celebrities providentially reserved. Bach and Beethoven never had the success of these cosmopolitans! they were too deeply engaged. We went prepared to be astonished and delighted, to hear something which might compare with Liszt and Thalberg in point of execution, though not perhaps in deeper qualities. We were not disappointed.

The genial, hearty manners of the man established at once a most free and familiar relation between him and his guests. Hospitality and comfort did away with all stiffness, and created that happy harmony of circumstances in which every mind flings itself into its own easiest musical attitude, so that there is no gêne and nothing lost; for every man must cease to be a critic, and forget that he has any character to stand upon, and listen like a careless, all-accepting child, or music will turn away her glowing face from him. Thus sure of us, he seated himself at his grand Erard piano in the middle of his company. A picture of that group would form no unworthy addition to the engravings of similar scenes in the gilt-edged biography, with which his London admirers have furnished him as an introduction to our shores. To be sure, there were no crowned heads in the circle, except some for whom, we trust, there are crowns laid up in heaven; but there were many marked individualities, harmonized by the common sentiment of the occasion; there were experienced musicians, and younger aspirants for the honors of virtuosodom, trembling between hope of learning and fear of discouragement from what they were about to hear; there were retired, eccentric enthusiasts, and professional advertisers of prodigies; and there were older heads of small credulity about things loudly trumpeted, pledged like ourselves to the older faith in music, who seated themselves with as firm a determination of resistance as the softly cushioned sofas would allow; we could smile at them inwardly; for, in spite of our essays above alluded to, we had contrived, by a little reflection, as well as by a certain catholicity of nature, to rid ourselves of all that, and were in a mood to enjoy him and follow him as far as he would let us.

He is a short, stout, jovial, healthy looking man, of light, flying hair, and full, blue German eyes. He congratulates himself on his advantage in being the only one of the great pianists who is fat; this enables him to bear the immense amount of physical exertion and nervous excitement, which is the greatest wonder about his playing. Indeed his physique is extraordinary; he is himself a Grand Piano, and can stand any amount of violent vibration without any symptom of exhaustion. He has nerves equal to all the will and passion there are in him; he can safely dare to do all that he can do, the want of which condition seems to be all that prevents many from doing great things. What more would smothered genius ask for than to have his nerves?

He began. A soft trill in the highest octave, accompanied with the most delicate pianissimo runs, continuous, clear, cool, liquid, and distinct, as so many little mingled rills of water; nature herself could not satisfy the sense more perfectly; we were children with delight. By degrees he passed into some quaint, lively Russian airs, one of which acquired a movement not unlike the Galop Chromatique of Liszt: wonderful variations succeeded, with a constant accession of new force, till he smote the keys with superhuman energy, bringing out such a breadth of harmony, that not inaptly has it been said that he "tears up great masses of chords by the roots and flings them about with a furious joy." The workings of his countenance grew intense, every muscle seemed to protrude, and the brow almost to lift itself off the head; his whole body played, he would straighten back and look round in triumph upon his audience; he would rise from his seat as if upon a race-horse; and finally, with the whole instrument vibrating like twenty, he sprang up into the arms, as it were, of the audience, laughing and shouting, with as much delight as any of them, at the admirable thing which had been accomplished. Criticism was put to flight; the resisting gentlemen were taken off their feet, and there seemed a general impulse to fling their arms about each others' necks, as in Schiller's Hymn to Joy. Joy, indeed, was the sentiment of it; besides that, it had little other; it was the perfect gratification of the senses, and seemed to do one a physical good. No one stopped to consider that it was not the deepest sphere of musical expression; to regret any other sentiment would have been sheer pedantry. Enough that men, cold, stiff, conventional men, were surprised into joyous intimacy by the naturalness of the thing. He is the only musician who ever made us think of Handel, not for religious grandeur, of course, but for infallible health and power.

The next piece was a "Fantasia on the drinking song from Lucrezia Borgia," in style his own as before, only with still greater contrasts, if possible, of passages of unimaginable delicacy with others of tremendous weight, and with yet more uncountable raptures on the part of the hearers. His face after one of these exertions looks electric, as if you could not approach him without getting a shock. Then he sported with our Yankee "National Airs," which had the freshness of new musical curiosities to him, and furnished theme enough for some very magical capricci. The Overture to William Tell opened under his hands into a grand descriptive orchestral performance. Then came his famous "Marche Marcovine," one of his most original compositions, and a work, though simple and plain in its construction, yet of a breadth and fire entirely irresistible.

But the master piece of the evening began with a Fugue, in which he twisted together a subject from Bach with one from Handel, (so some of the excited old boys told us) and then wrought the whole out in the extreme of the modern style; it was an odd marriage of opposite extremes; exceedingly complicated, yet every theme and every note admirably distinct and individual; and altogether a feat which we could scarce credit on the testimony of our eyes and ears. This was truly great [? 1867] music, and converted the experienced and cautious judges.

We describe the experience of that evening simply as it was. We attempt no criticism; we venture no conjectures as to how De Meyer may compare with Liszt or Thalberg; we care not to settle his rank as a composer or performer. Whatever his sphere may be, he exerts the power of genius in that sphere, and therefore must be in harmony with true genius in all spheres. A certain air of vanity about him we can readily forgive; he accepts the fashions of the times, and frankly shows it. But that his music is a genuine thing, and that his skill quite distances all that we have heard, is undeniable.

— That was in November, 1845; but now?—Will it be: "Look here upon this picture, and on this?"

Concerts.

We have had a few scattering concerts, but as yet no real opening of the musical season in a large artistic sense. Any stray opportunity, however, is seized upon by the newspapers to drag out that pet big gun of their vocabulary, the word "inaugurate." So often has this word been applied of late to things whose beginning is their end, things which do not go on, and therefore have no "season," also to things very trivial, that "inaugurate" has become degraded into the flash dialect; as now commonly used, it is a mere vulgarism for the honest word begin.

The Music Hall concert of the MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB, on the 30th ult., was properly the prologue and show card to their "starring" tour Westward. It drew out a great crowd, which could be reported, and a host of flattering notices and bon voyages, which could be quoted in the multiplying mirror of Advertisement and flashed all over the said West: for has not the Club taken unto itself a cunning operator in that art, one of those nondescript products of a commercial civilization, called a "musical agent"?—Well, if they will only play their best music out there, perhaps the West, the Club itself, and Art may be the gainers; we sincerely hope so.

The concert was in many respects a good one, though of course not so enjoyable to a really musical audience as one of their quiet, choice little classical evenings at Chickering's. There was, however, much more of the classical than of the other kind in the programme, which was as follows:

- Nonetto—First movement in F, op. 31, Louis Spohr. For Violin, Cello, Bass, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon and Horn.
- Vocal Quartet from "Fidelio," Beethoven. Mrs. Smith, Miss Ryan, Mr. Jos. Whitney and M. W. Whitney.
- Concerto for Flute, Briccialdi. Edward M. Heindl.
- Song, "The Tear," Stigelli. Miss Ryan.
- Grand Septet in D minor, op. 74, Hummel. For Piano, Viola, Cello, Bass, Oboe, Horn and Bassoon. Piano part played by Mr. Carlyle Petersilea.
- Scene—Prayer and Barcarolle from the "North Star." Meyerbeer.
- Fantaisie for Violoncello, "Souvenir de Halery," Seligmann. Mrs. Smith.
- Waltz Fries. Wolf Fries.
- Vocal Quartets, Mendelssohn. Mrs. Smith, Miss Ryan and Messrs. Whitney.
- Adagio and Fiuale, from the Nonetto, Spohr.

The large instrumental pieces filled the Hall better than we could have expected, and yet they suffered somewhat. The impression of the Nonetto was injured, too, by separating the movements so widely; and in the first movement it was some time before the instruments got warmed together into sympathetic tune. Otherwise, it went remarkably well, and the composition proved to us one of the most interesting that we have heard by Spohr; the themes marrowy and concise for him, and worked up closely, with great economy of means, and at the same time clearly; it seemed in a healthier tone, with less of dogday lassitude than we are apt to feel with that composer.—The Hummel Septet is an un-failing favorite here ever since young Penalo played it in the Symphony Concerts two year ago. Mr. PETERSILEA played it clearly, firmly, brilliantly, but the accompaniment was not altogether felicitous.

We were sorry that WOLF FRIES had chosen so weak and stale a theme for his cello solo; such fine art and feeling as his seemed wasted on such a show-piece, skilful as the execution was. Mr. HERRMANN is a new member of the Club, and little as we regret that the day for flute solos has gone by, we did enjoy his admirably perfect execution; all thought of difficulty and short comings, waste of breath, &c. was for once forgotten; it was all clear, solid, and the low tones as beautiful as the high; correct in and phrasing perfect; light and shade, and a pervading good taste made the profusion of swift execution unobtrusive; nor do we remember to have heard a flute sing a simple melody more purely. Mrs. SMITH and Miss RYAN sang their solos remarkably well; the former has acquired great ease and purity of florid vocalization. But what we found most enjoyable in the concert, what told best there, was the Vocal Quartets. The wonderful one from Fidelio was truly well sung, and the mysterious, complex accompaniment well supplied by quartet of strings, reeds, horn, &c. And the two Mendelssohn four-part songs, even the familiar "Nightingale," were fresh and inspiring.

Here is a programme of Catholic music, originally performed at the laying of the corner stone for a Cathedral here, but repeated last Sunday evening in the Music Hall, by the combined Catholic Choirs of Boston and vicinity, assisted by the Germania Band.

- Introductory—Organ. Mr. J. H. Wilcox.
- Prelude, No. 1—"Harmoni Musik." Mr. J. H. Wilcox.
- Hymn—"Celestis Urbs, Jerusalem." Mr. J. H. Wilcox.
- Salve Regina, Tenor Solo. Mr. J. H. Wilcox.
- Mr. J. H. Farley.
- a. Hosanna, from Mass, O Regem Celi, Band. Palestrina.
- b. Antiphon, "Signum Salutis Poni." Beethoven.
- a. Prayer, Alto Solo by Ch. Eichler. Beethoven.
- b. Antiphon, "Mare Surgens, Jacob." Bach.
- Ave Maria, Cornet Solo by Mr. Henry Brown.
- a. Antiphon, "O Quam Metuendus." Spohr.
- b. Antiphon, "Pax Aeterna." Spohr.
- Offertoire for Organ. Battiste.
- Prelude, No. 2, "Harmoni Musik." Battiste.
- a. Antiphon, "Bene Fundata." Bach.
- b. Hymn, "O Sanctissima." Gordigiani.
- Am Charfreitag, Band. F. Schneider.
- Hymn, "Veni Creator." Bach.
- Rube Safft, Sweet Rest. Hammer.
- Quartet for Instruments.
- Te Deum, German Hymn.
- Irish National Air.

Mr. J. FARRINGTON conducted the whole, and many of the pieces were understood to be of his own composition. Without striking ideas, these were yet interesting, musicianlike in their quite contrapuntal structure, and well instrumented. We speak particularly of those two Preludes of "Harmoni Musik," as the Germans call music for bands of wind instruments. Some of the hymns and other choruses, mostly short, were also quite effective; others commonplace and formal, belonging we suppose to the routine of Church service. We are disposed to put an interrogation mark after the name Bach in one or two places there; but have not time to investigate the matter. The Palestrina piece, by the band, was solemn and edifying. The chorin singing, by near 200 voices, was some of the best that we have heard for many a day. We are sorry we have not room to say all the good we might of the solos.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS of the Harvard Musical Association. The sale of season tickets will begin at the Music Hall on Monday morning, at 9 o'clock.

Mr. Peck, of the Music Hall, announces to his friends a Concert for Sunday evening, Oct. 20, when Mrs. JESSY KEMPTON will give us a first taste of her rich and now highly cultivated Contralto, since her return from Europe. CARL ROSA, Sig. FIRANTI, MESSRS. LANG, THAYER, and others will assist.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, with CAMILLA URRO, will give a concert in the Music Hall on the 26th inst.

Mr. Harrison's PAREPA-ROSA troupe, strengthened by LEOPOLD DE MEYER, are to open here on the 4th of November.

The Handel and Haydn Society are rehearsing "Samson."

Lobe's Catechism of Music. Translated by FANNY RAYMOND RITTER. New York: Schuberth & Co.)

Lobe, as a writer on musical composition and aesthetics, is widely known and admired, but he deserves especial commendation for the clear and complete manner in which he has performed the difficult task of arranging the subject matter of this "Catechism." We do not know of any work, which, in an equally small space, explains the elements of music to the student in so comprehensive and satisfactory a manner as this. Of the merits of the translation we need not speak; Madame Ritter's name is a sufficient guaranty that her task has been performed with correctness, good taste, and musical understanding. We regret that the little work has not been more correctly printed; even on the title-page we find "Broadway" for "Broadway." A more carefully revised edition should be issued by the publisher. t.

LOWELL, MASS.—The Citizen has the following item:

VOCAL MUSIC IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The committee on music presented a communication expressing their gratification at the success attending the introduction of music in the public schools, and also introduced an order, which was adopted, providing that they be empowered to purchase pianos for use in each of the Grammar schools.

NEW YORK. Ernani, Lucia, Othello, and the Huguenots, are the operas for the week. Maretzek's first novelty for the season will be Don Buccafalo, by Cagnoni, and is to be produced soon.

The first public rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society will be given at the New York Academy on October 25th. The Society has just elected its officers for the year: President, Professor and Doctor R. Ogden Doremus; Vice President, U. C. Hill; Conductor, Carl Bergmann.

The Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn announces its first rehearsal for Wednesday, October 23d. The first concert will take place on November 6th. The pieces to be performed are Beethoven's fifth symphony, op. 67, in C minor; Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini;" theme and variations "Austrian National Hymn" (for string orchestra), Haydn; and Mendelssohn's "Trumpet Overture." Mr. Theodore Thomas is engaged as conductor for the season.

The St. Louis Philharmonic Society is re-organized for the winter season, under a new leader, Mr. Edmont Frechlich. The first concert was announced for Thursday.

The French Opera has taken a firm hold on the affections of the New Yorkers, and is doing a much better business than Maretzek's Italian Company. Offenbach's opera, "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein," excites frenzies of delight at each performance, by the lively nature of the music, the excellent singing, and the inimitable humor of the acting.

La Grande and Brignoli appeared at the Academy of Music in Pittsburg, on Wednesday and Thursday, in the Operas of "The Barber of Seville" and "Don Pasquale." The remaining members of the troupe are Susini, Maria and Sarti.

A complimentary benefit was tendered, on Tuesday evening, to Miss Caroline Richings, at the National Theatre, Washington, where she has been meeting with the most flattering encouragement. Benedict's Opera, "The Lilly of Killarney," was produced on Wednesday by the company, for the first time in this country.

BEETHOVEN. The following brief recognition of our old friend and fellow worker's good works, found in the Church Choirmaster and Organist (London), will gratify our readers.

Chronologisches Verzeichniss der Werke Ludwig van Beethovens. VON ALEXANDER W. THAYER. Berlin. Ferdinand Schneider.

Ludwig van Beethovens Leben. VON ALEXANDER WHEELLOCK THAYER. Nach dem Original Manuscript Deutsch bearbeitet. Erster Band. Berlin: 1866, Ferdinand Schneider.

Mr. Thayer's interesting and valuable chronological catalogue of the works of Beethoven, so frequently of late laid under contribution by the authors of the analytical programme of the "Monday Popular" and Crystal Palace Concerts, has at length been followed by the issue of the first instalment of his long-promised Life of Beethoven. As has seldom happened in the case of a new work, this has appeared in the form of a German translation of the original English manuscript. The impossibility of personally superintending the publication of his work in English, and in his own country, suggested this unusual course to the author, to whom the alternative must have been the relinquishment of the post he holds as American Consul at Trieste. Disappointing as this course must be to many Englishmen, the work, when it appears in English, will doubtless be all the more perfect for the fact of its having been preceded by the German edition, the publication of which, Mr. Thayer expresses a hope, will, by inviting criticism, not only enable him to substantiate the truth of doubtful points, but provide him with additional particulars. From the enthusiastic and conscientious manner in which, as is well known to those who are most interested in the matter, the accomplished American amateur has for the last sixteen or seventeen years devoted himself to collecting materials for a biography of the great German composer, it is easy to believe that in his book he asserts nothing as a fact, the truth of which he is not able to verify. Owing to the incompleteness and the unreliable character of all the existing biographies of Beethoven, just such a work as Mr. Thayer's promises to be when completed was most needed. Its early completion, and its appearance in English, are therefore much to be wished for. Only a small portion of Beethoven's remarkable career is disposed of in this first volume: as far as it goes, this is vividly depicted, with the utmost minuteness, in a plain, straightforward, and most interesting manner.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH MUSICAL TASTE.—In nothing is the inherent difference between the French and the English character more striking than in their musical tastes. The music of all nations which have produced music worth preserving is acclimatized with us, and we certainly exhibit no special preference for the works of our native composers. At the same time, the national taste inclines very decidedly to the music of Germany rather than to that of Italy. The fashionable world loves Italian music, but the heart of the nation is with the Germans, from Handel to Mendelssohn and Schubert, and in every concert at which the tastes of the more intelligent classes of English society are consulted the predominance of German music is almost universal. In France everything is different. The programme of the music performed in the Paris Exhibition building on the 4th of July was such as would be simply impossible in England. With the exception of a chorus from Judas Maccabaeus, every one of the twelve pieces to be performed is either the composition of a Frenchman, or of a German or Italian who wrote for the Parisian stage, or who has made Paris his permanent home. Gluck and Meyerbeer represent the former, and Rossini the latter class; while the rest of the pieces are the work of the native French writers—Berlioz, Auber, Gounod, David, Adolph Adam and Méhul. Of the specimens of Gluck's operas, the overture to Iphigenie en Aulide is well chosen to represent the orchestral forms of his day; but the short selection from Armida is by no means the best that could be named for performance by a monster band and chorus, being light and airy, and full of quaint, old-fashioned grace. But the performance of such a thundering piece as the chorus of soldiers in Faust, with two roaring orchestras, between these two specimens of antique music, and of the rattling drum-beating overture to Fra Diavolo, immediately after the selection from Armida, can have only one result; that is, to make the music of one of the greatest of dramatic composers sound poor, thin, and formal. Modern music of all sorts is noisy enough, and often intolerable with its blare of brazen instruments and beating of drums and cymbals, and French composers are worse in this respect than those of any nation. But to play these ear-splitting crashes in contrast with the purity and simplicity of Gluck's orchestration is as serious a mistake as was ever made at an evening concert at an English provincial festival; and more than that can scarcely be said.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Since the death of the Prince Consort, the Queen has played only sacred music, and that chiefly on the harmonium. The eminent musician who taught her this instrument is now engaged in arranging for it, for Her Majesty's use, all the modern oratorios by Costa, Schachner, &c. The arrangements are ultimately to be published.—Athenaeum.

The London Orchestra says: "The Americans are to have a great musical festival next year in Boston. Several of our oratorio singers—among them Mme. Sherrington—have been applied to by the projectors, and it is anticipated that the old country will be worthily represented among the principal artists taking part in the solemnity."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Vocal Beauties of "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein."
 Say to him. (Dites lui). Aria. 35
 Could I as a soldier go. (J'aime les militaires). Song. 60
 Behold the sabre of my father. (Couplets du Sabre). 30
 Ah! 'tis a famous regiment. (Ah! c'est un fameux regiment). 40
 Come ye pretty maids. (Waltz song). 30
 I wear upon my heart. (J'e t'ai sur mon coeur). 35
 Good night. Song and Chorus. 35
 Advance, in maiden beauty. (Nous amenons la jeune femme). Chorus. 30
 The Prince to marry is inclined. (Pour épouser une princesse). Song. 35
 And is it true? (Faut il que je sois bête.) 30
 La Grande Duchesse is the new sensation in the way of opera. It is by Offenbach, and though not pretending to stand among high-class musical dramas, is one of the most pleasing of comic operas, and is securing a great popularity. It is a chain of pretty little melodies from end to end. Of the above, "Dites lui" is strangely beautiful, and the Sabre song peculiar, and a gem of its kind. "Could I as a soldier go" is very easy and flowing, and the Waltz song capital to dance by. "The Prince to marry" finely his dismay at the saucy article in the "Gazette de Holland," and "Good night" is a very sweet serenade. "The famous regiment" is a bright, rattling, military air, and the rest are little piquant pieces of melody.
 Proud Fountainbleau. (Fountainbleau foresta). Song. "Don Carlos." 30
 I still can happy be. (Felice ancor is son). " 35
 And she has loved me not. (Ella giammi m'amo). 60
 Come, love, come. (Vien, ah, vien. Song. "Leonora." 30
 Thou recall'st not. (Non rammenti). Duet. " 35
 In the calmness. (Nella calma) Song. "Romeo and Juliet." 75
 Six selections from Verdi, Mercadante and Gounod's newest works.
 I wish I'd a string to my bow. S'g. H. S. Briggs. 30
 Annie dear. Song. M. Keller. 30
 Grumble, grumble, growl. Song. H. S. Davis. 30
 "Songs for the people."

Instrumental.

- Galop. "La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein." Offenbach. 40
 Polka Mazurka. " " " " 40
 Tostee Polka. " " " " 40
 Quadrille. " " " " 40
 Gems from the new opera. Very bright.
 Romeo and Juliet. Fantasia de Salon. Ketterer. 80
 " " " Waltz. Leonie Tinel. 30
 Two brilliant pieces, well worth playing, brilliant both, but in different ways, and of medium difficulty.
 Valse de Concert. "Sicily." C. J. Hopkins. 1.00
 Great and effective. Somewhat difficult.
 L'Orage. (Storm at sea). S. Smith. 1.00
 Has a distant resemblance to other storm pieces, but is very original in its arrangement, and not very difficult.
 Hawthorn Waltz. Van Oncklein. 35
 La Brillante. Polka de Concert. H. F. Hofer. 60
 Fine pieces, by good composers.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 693.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 26, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 16.

The "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart.

BY A. OULINICHEFF.

(Translated from the German for this Journal).

We come now to Mozart's last and most perfect creations in the Symphony kind: the works in G minor and in C. They are almost twin sisters, for they were produced only a month apart. Although these sisters are incomparably beautiful, they differ none the less in features and in character. A dilettante of the eighteenth century would have compared the younger to Minerva, accompanied by Apollo and the Muses; and the older to Venus weeping over the death of Adonis; and he would have recognized in the one all the attributes of the heart, in the other all the gifts of the mind.

* * * * *

The man of all kinds, all expressions, all contrasts, has bequeathed to us a last work, in which, instead of the elegiac ode (Symph. in G minor) with its most sorrowful outpourings, we find the Dithyramb raised to the highest pitch of splendor, of enthusiasm, of sublime Pindaric intoxication and bewilderment. The Symphony in C shows us what glorious inspirations lifted Mozart's soul from the things of to-day to a better morrow, in the midst of the sorrows which he has just related to us (in the G-minor), sorrows inseparable from a doomed and already wavering life, from which each one of his masterworks took away with it a part, and of which already he began to feel the end so near.

One might believe that the Symphony in C had been designed to glorify some extraordinary event in the annals of the world, some exceedingly happy and ever to be remembered victory! The loud ringing pomp of the orchestra, which makes itself remarked from the ninth bar in all its might, decidedly denotes the joyfulness of victory as the ground character of the work; but the Theme, which precedes this outbreak of victorious joy, is double. It consists of a sort of proclamation or fanfare, upon which follows a little questioning phrase in tied notes. That is the main thought, the fruitful theme, which by its developments impresses upon the great jubilation of the Allegro a quite peculiar stamp of spirituality and announces itself to the soul as a persistent striving after I know not what intellectual heights, which the poet burns to reach, but which he only reaches toward the end of the Ode. There is nothing more majestic and more splendid than the expansions, transformations and analyses of the two fragments of the theme. The one resounds like the cascade of a forest brook, which the echoes in multiplied tones repeat to the mountains; the other figure, ever pursuing, under different forms, the goal for which it strives, now dives under in the bass, now floats aloft upon the melody, and now, gathered up in a powerful unisono, it mounts and obstinately makes its way through the lists which are firmly held by the extreme voices of the orchestra and supported by the long-drawn tones of the trumpets. An inexpressible, sublime effect. The middle portion, one of the most beautiful examples of worked music, is for the greater part made out of an accessory thought. This is the precious, not to be forgotten song of the violins, with an accompaniment in pizzicato, which, first heard in the Dominant, now transposed into E-flat major and treated as a subject, here furnishes the contrapuntal matter. Toward the close this song reappears in the Tonic as melody with new charms.

Andante, F major, 3-4 time. Whether the slow tempo follows a piece of energetic or of sad expression, or comes in after the outburst of a jubilant enthusiasm, like the first Allegro of our Symphony, it always indicates that moment of repose, of rest, of enervation or of intermission, which succeeds a spell of strong emotional activity. Here the suspension of the Ode, the Andante, gives us the image of a tranquil blissfulness, the pure height of enchantment. The theme, full of the most ravishing expression, and as singable as a piece written for the voice, occupies less room than Mozart commonly allows to the initial thought, with its modulations, in the putting together of the piece; and this comes from the superabundance of accessory thoughts, the number and the peculiar euphony of the concurring motives. This multitude of fine melodic details, mingled with long passages of demisemiquavers and sextoles, these phrases self-multiplied in all their repetitions and imitations, spread over the piece a sort of twilight, while the ear loses itself with rapture, as the eye does in a thicket which the sunbeams penetrate perpendicularly, illuminating, enkindling and peopling it with a thousand fantastical forms. From time to time, though, some great opaque clouds obscure the blue of heaven. The soul feels the sting of a sudden pain, painful syneopations trouble the harmony, the Minor steps into the foreground and reigns through a succession of short-breathed and affrighted phrases; but these vapors without water, these unsubstantial shapes of terror, the humors of a moody wind, vanish as swiftly as they came. The sun prevails over all these impotent half-wills of the foul weather; his radiant face reappears with the theme, and the heart soars anew amid the beams of unextinguishable bliss. Mozart must have been satisfied with his Andante; we too are satisfied, and very much so; though candidly we must confess that we prefer that in the G-minor Symphony.

After the composer has rested in this sentimental meditation, full of charm, his fiery lyrical spirit is enkindled anew and breaks forth with impetuous, lively humor in the Minuet, Allegretto, 3-4, which they commonly take Allegro. It is made after the technical pattern of the older one in G minor, apart from the difference of the ideas, which is very great. The same nimble, noisy motives fill the two parts of the piece; but in the first they are presented in a simple melody, and in the second, which is much longer and more interesting, the composer has submitted them to the difficult test of wonderful contrapuntal play, after which comes a Coda of the wind instruments, not less wonderful than that in the other Minuet. The Trio is a graceful prattle, cut short awhile by some energetic phrases in the Minor, in which the obstinate tone, the E, blown in the octave by the trumpets, produces the finest effect.

Who could count the abominations which the learned ones of that day might have found in the Finale to the Symphony in C? How the fearful fugue with four subjects must have heated their poor brains! This was neither BACH nor HANDEL, it was none of their acquaintance; it was MOZART. Where could they have found a measure for him, who had shattered their square and compass? Some of their criticisms have come down to us as monuments of their confusion; some fragments which we have cited elsewhere, will suffice to give an idea of the difference between the old fugue (strict and regular) and the free fugue of Mozart, which does not subject itself to the methodical periods of the class and admits mixture of style. When we spoke of unity with variety as essential conditions of the fugue, we recognized that variety involved two principles: canonical imitation and contrast of melodies. Bach had exhausted the first means; Mozart understood how to win an advantage from the second, which contributed more than all else to lend to music a new organization. Mozart, who was not a less sharp-sighted canonist than Bach, but who was far more inventive [?] and incomparably bolder, wove into the contrapuntal web melodies so different from one another, that one hardly conceives it possible that they could legitimately stand side by side; and when the eye has finally convinced itself, one still asks whether it can satisfy the ear. A pardonable doubt, which the execution soon turns to enthusiasm. This Finale consists of four themes, which surely do not look as if they were made to dwell together. Let the reader convince himself:

At the end of the piece the composer brings them all four forward, and the answer to no one of them is wanting. The union of imitation and contrast certainly could go no further.

With such modulation, full of boldness and of genius; with such freedom of style, such incredible power of combinations; with themes so opposite in character and outline; with an orchestral accompaniment, in fine, consisting of from fifteen to twenty [?] voices and instrumented after Mozart's manner, the Fugue must naturally have expanded its effects and rendered itself applicable far beyond the utmost limits ever dreamed of by the contrapuntists old and new. The fugue is no longer the mere abstract expression of some sort of emotion; it can become picture, translate itself into action, paint a battle or anything that is positive, without any danger of falling into that kind of music which requires a programme.

To keep to our example, what then is the finale to the Symphony in C, which dazzles those who read and makes the hearer dizzy? It seems to me, that this Allegro is the sequel to the Grave (representing the emerging of Order out of Chaos) with which "The Creation" of HAYDN begins. Light has illumined the abyss; the laws of creation are in full force; suddenly the elements, indignant at the new yoke, attempt a gigantic revolution to win back the old anarchy. Fire, Air, Earth and Water one by one desert their appointed places and commingle in the vortex, in which the germinating Order seems to sink forever; a sublime spectacle to contemplate, like every great rebellion of matter against mind, its ruler. But this propensity to relapse into chaos has been foreseen; it serves, like order itself, the final ends of the eternal wisdom. The elemental forces may melt in one inextricable mass (the fugued portions of the piece), but they hear a voice which calls to them: "Thus far and no farther," and in a moment all is disentangled, and the young universe comes forth victorious and beautiful from the midst of this frightful confusion (the portions composed in the melodic style upon the same motives.)

Here we see the fugued style come out from the psychologically indefinite and abstract expression, within which it had so far confined itself, and by its union with the simple style, produce splendid analogies, to which neither the one nor the other could have attained singly. In this way Mozart seems to us the last word of the Flemish school, the primitive tendency of musical Art. Bach, who perfected the Fugue, so far as it was possible within the strict limits and the partially conventional forms, which the contrapuntists of the seventeenth century had prescribed to him, lifted the style to a very lofty height of grandeur and of science. Our hero enhanced this grandeur and this science by the wonders of his orchestral accompaniment and by the expansion which he gave to the principles of contrast. He understood how to make the fugue in the highest degree melodious and expressive, while he made it free. The old scholastic mould broke in pieces in his hands, and out of its ruins sprang its last and richest treasure, the queen of fugues, the work of works, the overture to Zauberflöte.

* * * We have recognized a material analogy, in this Finale, with the ways which Haydn has adopted in the Introduction to the Creation. But all musical resemblances of this sort necessarily have their roots in a psychological analogy, inasmuch as the phenomena of the soul always find their correspondences in the phenomena of the outward world; accordingly in this Finale we may find the triumph of Order in the final supremacy of a thought that wavers for a time amid the many and the formidable images besieging it at once. From lyrical enthusiasm the poet has passed into the state of ecstasy and clairvoyance; what he at first related, he now sees; his power of will, at first active and full of insight, becomes passive and mechanical; he seems to obey an influence from without, which subjugates, transports him, surrounds him with vast illusions and whispers to him words, of which he is the mere echo. The human event, which he has been glorifying, transforms itself into the second sight of the poet, with the whole series of causes that have induced it, with the whole chain of consequences that must spring out of it; the past, the present and the future appear to him united, yet clearly distinguishable, in this indivisible point in which they come in mutual contact, to reproduce each other and then die. The mind yields itself to contemplation of the divine origin and foreordination of events, of the motive springs and reactions, of forces and counter-forces, of the coöperation and the conflict of sympathetic and hostile influences, of the whole wonderful mechanism, in which at first it is aware of nothing but a vast, inexplicable confusion, resulting none the less, according to our first analogy, in moral order.

We see that nothing yields itself to interpretation more than the ideal meaning of pure music, and especially the meaning of a Fugue. Every one can explain it to himself in his own way, according to the idea or the image which the hearing may chance to awaken in him. But whatever interpretation one may give to the Finale of our Symphony, all will agree in one thing: that it will dazzle those who see it (in notes), and that it must make dizzy those who hear it; a dizziness of wonder and enthusiasm. One must needs hear this music to believe it possible; it seems not to be, if studied with the eyes.

An impartial but timid criticism might perhaps ask, whether Mozart has not misused his genius in this singular composition, in order, so to say, to be gigantic and sublime; whether we do not find in it an excess of boldness and transporting power, an excess of combinations and figures, of learned harmony and canon, a monstrous largeness in the laying out of the plan and details of the piece, a taxing of attention even to weariness, an overloading for the ear, and now and then an obvious and culpable contempt of the rules which still stand in force? The reader may be sure we would refuse, with the whole force of our conviction and our musical sympathies, to join in such a judgment. Does not this music give one all that he can properly demand of it? Is it not in fact an exaltation of the tripod, which seems almost like delirium, denoting a degree of intellectual clairvoyance foreign to the normal state of man? Is it not that tremendous and eccentric power of thought, that shatters all known forms of speech, to recombine them in new words, new constructions, like the things themselves which the poet has to say to one? Is it not, in a word, the Dithyramb raised by music to its highest efficacy! In our view the Fugue in C is the masterwork of Mozart in the Symphonic kind and the highest expression of the kind itself, the highest standpoint. It is also the last effort of our hero in this branch of Art. Since Mozart could no farther go, he composed no more Symphonies, and left to his followers the glory of lifting this kind even to the Drama, and of characterizing their productions by descriptive titles which the hearers never could have thought of.

[The author here proceeds to show his utter misappreciation of Beethoven, in which we will not follow him. It is quite as remarkable as his appreciation of Mozart, and quite as blind as that is (to borrow his own word) "clairvoyant."—Ed.]

The Welsh Eisteddfod.

The origin of the Eisteddfod, or Congress of Bards, cannot be estimated with any degree of certainty. The general voice of the learned, however, places it in the time of Gruffudd ab Cynan, who was famous for encouraging poetry and music. About the year 1100, this Prince invited a number of the most accomplished musicians from Ireland to assist him in forming a code of laws for reforming the manners and correcting the art and practice of the Welsh bards, who, it appears, for a long time had indulged in the worst disorders and abuses. Prince Gruffudd was Irish by birth, and had a natural leaning towards the music of his country; but, as none of the remains of Welsh melody can be satisfactorily traced to an earlier date than his reign, and as the 24 measures of instrumental music conformable to the laws of harmony were proposed and settled in a congress at which he presided, many writers, with some show of reason, claim for Hibernia the merit of having invented the most ancient and beautiful of the tunes attributed to Cambria, and of having first introduced the art of written music in contradistinction to that of simple improvisation. A further coloring is given to this presumption by the strong resemblance in style between the oldest Welsh and Irish tunes, and by the frequent employment of the minor mode in both. The question now is impossible to decide; nor has it any direct influence in the establishment of the Eisteddfod, which was a triennial assembly of the bards for regulating and amending the laws of poetry and music, conferring degrees on their professors, and contesting the office of chief bard, the successful candidate for which occupied the chair of the Eisteddfod until one more worthy and skillful than himself should be found to displace him. These meetings, in early times, were held at Aberffraw, the Royal seat of the Princes of North Wales, at Dinevawr, the castle of the Princes of South Wales, and at Mathral, the residence of the Princes of Powis. Notice of the Eisteddfod was publicly announced a year and a day in advance. Twelve umpires were selected by the candidates. These umpires were skilled in the Welsh tongue, in poetry, music, and heraldry. It was their office to propose a subject for the bards to sing upon, in any of the 24 metres, satire, personal abuse, and amatory effusions being forbidden. The bards were allowed a certain time to compose their poem, or piece of music, which they recited or executed in rotation before the umpires. The unsuccessful candidates were obliged to acknowledge their defeat in writing, and to pay homage and fees to the victor, who was installed forthwith in the chair of the Eisteddfod, as supreme head of the order. The personal attendance of the Prince at all the meetings, and the difficult conditions imposed upon the candidates, rendered the bardic honor a great distinction. Before the musical bard could rise to be doctor, the highest rank attainable, he was compelled to study three years as a novice, three as a graduate, and three as a bachelor; at the end of which period he was styled Disgub Disgylleidd, or Master of Music. The fourth and last degree, that of Doctor (Pwreidd Athraw), was obtained after three years' further application. A bard thus distinguished was supposed to know 40 cwlwm, 4 colwm, 20 cydgerdd, 4 caidair, 32 canuwm, and 4 gosteg, to understand all the laws and modifications of harmony, especially the 24 measures, and to explain them as they were written in the Llyr Dospwath, or book of musical divisions, to compose a canuidd which practised bards should be unable to criticize, and to describe all its properties, divisions, and sub-divisions, licences, rests, diatonic notes, flats, and sharps, and every change of movement through the various keys. The cwlwm was a symmetrical piece of music, with words; the colwm, a fundamental subject or theme; the cydgerdd, a composition in harmony, or parts; the caidair, a "masterly" piece of music (a somewhat vague definition); the canuidd, a song, or tune; the gosteg, a prelude or overture. Thus every doctor, to be worthy of his doctorate, was forced to exert himself in the composition of a tune, an amount of labor and ingenuity which now-a-days would render the distinction one of easy acquirement.

If the doctor was a harper he was supposed to know the three "famous" mwchwl, and the three "new" mwchwl, and to be able to play them in such a faultless manner that the established doctors should unanimously pronounce him competent as a performer, a composer, and a teacher. The mwchwl appear to have been the most elaborate and perfect pieces of music. The three "famous" or ancient mechul were equal to the four cohan or fundamental subjects; the three new mechul were equal to the four codair, or "masterly" pieces. Who originally composed these pieces, or what kind of pieces they were, it is impossible to make out; the researches of the bardic historians have left them enveloped in obscurity. As there appears to have been a prescribed number of each, we may suppose them types or formule, revered for their antiquity, which the bards were compelled to adopt as the basis of their own compositions, and hence we may explain why the Welsh, with all their boasted genius for music, like the Scotch and Irish, through a long succession of ages, left the art precisely where they found it. They produced a great many beautiful tunes which have outlived the names of their authors, and the dates of their composition can only be guessed at through the fog of tradition. In all probability these tunes are for the most part much more modern than it would please an antiquary to avow. Amidst a marked originality of style, the difficulty of adapting pleasing and natural basses to the majority of them is a powerful argument against those who insist that the early bards were skilled in counterpoint and harmony. All that the most assiduous explorers have been enabled to rake out of the ashes of the past fails to establish the shadow of a likelihood the other way. If the Welsh knew harmony at all, it must have been of the rudest kind. It is also confidently asserted that they were acquainted with the chromatic scale, but with due deference, we have seen no authentic specimen of their earlier music which enables us to agree with that opinion. The Llyr Dusporth, which contained all the acknowledged principles of the art, in what the Welsh pretend to have been its most flourishing period, might have informed us in these matters; but unfortunately the MS. is lost.

From what we have adduced, which at first sight would appear a great deal, it may be gathered that to rise to the highest musical distinction required on the part of the aspiring bards a memory sufficiently retentive to know by heart a certain number of received formule, and a fancy sufficiently lively to help its possessor to the composition of one canid, or tune; or, if an executant, to play these formule upon the harp, the only instrument highly esteemed by the bards, who consigned the pipe, the crwth (a small three-stringed harp), and the tabor, which they despised, to the minstrels and buffoons. In the history of bardic music we read a vast deal about keys, flats and sharps, &c., as well as about metres and measures (the measure was regarded as a corruption of the ancient metre); but if we are to credit Giraldus Cambrensis, secretary to Henry II., who wrote a Welsh itinerary, the bards only sang in one key—B flat—or at least they always began and ended in that key. Giraldus asserted that they did not sing in unison, like the musicians of other countries, but in parts. We agree with Dr. Burney, however, in doubting not merely the veracity of Giraldus, but his capability of judging. His own account bears absurdity on the face of it. He says (according to Edward Jones, author of the Musical and Poetical Relics of the Welsh Bards, and an enthusiastic advocate of Welsh music), "in a company of singers, as many different parts and voices are heard as there are performers, who all at length unite, with organic melody, in one consonance, and the soft sweetness of B flat." That there should be as many "voices" as performers depended, we presume, on the willingness and ability of the singers to make themselves audible; but that there should be as many "parts" is quite another affair. We are aware that Tallis, Bird, or Bull wrote a canon in 40 parts, as a trial of skill; but we never heard of any body of singers attempting to execute it, or any set of auditors desiring to hear it, as a trial of endurance. To write clearly in four parts requires the most profound acquaintance with the laws of counterpoint, and the highest facility in their application—while more than eight parts renders good harmony impossible, and only engenders chaos and confusion. We very much doubt whether the Welsh bards were a bit more skilled in part-writing than the Greeks, and we are quite sure that the zealous Giraldus was perfectly innocent of the matter. What he could discover "softer and sweeter" in B flat than in any other single note, moreover, we are at a loss to decide. It is a pity he did not attempt to explain his sensations more minutely.

One of the earliest and most famous Eisteddfods was that held by Rhys ab Gronuffydd, Prince of South Wales, in 1177, at Cardigan, when, in a friendly contention, the poetical bards of the north, and the musical bards of the south, came out victorious. At this assembly the most extensive privileges and franchises were conferred upon the bards. Music seems to have attained its highest perfection, according to Welsh notions, in the course of the 12th century, and by means of the Eisteddfod was preserved from degeneration until the death of the last Llewelyn, and the imputed massacre of the bards by Edward I. in 1270—an event commemorated by the poet Gray in one of his most celebrated pieces. From this period until the year 1400 no record of the Eisteddfod is extant. The bards appear to have devoted themselves particularly to heraldry; every rich and powerful chieftain had his own bard to apostrophize his pedigree in metre; and hence it is to be presumed the novel facility of the Welsh in tracing their descent to the remotest antiquity. The warlike deeds of the famous Owain Glyndwr gave a momentary revival to the spirit of bardism, and some poetry dedicated to that mystic hero, whose name has been made familiar in the mouths of men by Shakspeare, the bard of all countries, is still extant. But it was Henry VII., a Tudor, and a liberal patron of the bards, who revived the Eisteddfod, after a lengthened period of decay; and, on the 30th of July, 1523, Henry VIII. himself summoned the professors of poetry and music to an Eisteddfod held at Caerwys, in the county of Flint, "according to the old statute" (as the summons states) "of Gruffydd ab Cynan, Prince of Aberlraw." Again, after a long interval, Queen Elizabeth appointed commissioners to assemble an Eisteddfod, at the same place, in 1568, when Symmwnt Vychan was created the chief bard. The same commissioners summoned another in 1569. At these meetings the skilful bards were reinstated in their rights, and in the inclusive practice of their calling; the "not worthy" were commanded, on pain of being "apprehended and punished as vagabonds," to betake themselves "to some honest labor and livelihood." How would such a statute be received in these days, when bards of every nation and every degree exhibit their competency, or incompetency, "without let or hindrance?" It is probable that one or two further Eisteddfods were held in Elizabeth's reign, but the last Welsh harper of any celebrity, whose name we find recorded, was Twn Bach, of Glamorgan, who died in London in 1597. In the reign of George II., we read of one Powel, a Welsh harper, with whom the great composer Handel was so pleased that he wrote pieces for him, and introduced harp accompaniments, obligato, in some of his oratorios, expressly to make use of his talent. Can this Powel be the same as the Powell of whom we once had occasion to speak in a history of the Festivals of the Three Choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester? The last Royal summons for an Eisteddfod was that issued by Elizabeth, in 1569, from which period until 1798 the Congress of Bards was discontinued. In that year, however, some influential gentlemen of Wales, with considerable exertion, succeeded in reviving the time-honored celebration; an Eisteddfod was held at Caerwys, and premiums were allotted to the most skilful competitors. Since then the institution has been maintained, with few intervals, at the chief town of the Principality in rotation. About 36 years ago Mr. Parry, Bard Alaw, made the experiment at Denbigh of uniting some of the modern attractions of music with the ancient ceremony of the Eisteddfod. He was violently opposed by the exclusive Welsh party, and, of course, by the Welsh musicians, who preferred keeping the matter in their own hands. He effected his purpose, however, after some pains. Braham and Miss Stephens were among the singers, and a selection of sacred music was performed, in which those celebrated vocalists were assisted by a small orchestra and chorus. The innovation was warranted by complete success, and the only wonder is that Mr. Parry's example has not sooner led to great results.—London Musical World.

Cheap Music.

(From the London Orchestra.)

Among the many instances of cheap production within the last forty years, there is hardly any more conspicuous than that of printed music; it discloses, moreover, this peculiar feature, that whereas in most articles which have been greatly reduced in price, cheapness and inferiority are combined, in the supply of musical works the best and most classical are produced at the least cost. A Vocal Score of the "Messiah," which originally cost two guineas, can now be procured for a shilling; while the half-crown ballad of old is rarely marked at less than three or four shillings, and is actually sold to the public at half that price. The trashy productions in vogue in fashionable drawing-rooms are not materially cheapened; but the true lover of the art may indulge his taste at less than a tenth of the expenditure formerly necessary.

There are still we believe, one or two old publishing houses who rejoice in a limited clientele who pay the full marked price for the music they purchase; and the accounts of some few exclusive instructors are swelled by the music supplied to their pupils being charged at the rate indicated on their title-pages; but, as a rule, no one now thinks of paying more than the "half-price," at which music used formerly to be supplied to professors alone. The commencement of this reduction dates from about the reign of our Sailor King, when those who wished to economize were accustomed to purchase "new music at half-price" of a publisher named Shade in Soho-square. Shade's publications were mostly non-copy-right, were incorrectly engraved, and badly printed; but he drove a thriving trade for some time. Shade's success brought another publisher into the field—a Mr. Walker—in the same locality. Mr. Walker was an educated man, and a man of taste: he was also an author, and his romance of "The Three Spaniards," as exciting as the most sensational novel of the present day, was a marvellous favorite in the old circulating libraries. Walker produced a much better article than Shade; more correctly engraved, and with better paper and printing. His chief success lay in books of airs from Italian operas, easily and effectively arranged by Diabelli and others. These would be looked upon as contemptible in the present day, but they suited the powers and tastes of the hulk of piano-forte-players of the time, and were the chief means—in the dearth of operative barrel organs and music halls—by which Italian opera airs became known to the public.

In Sacred Music Mr. Vincent Novello, whose collections in that department were unrivalled in extent and variety, determined on abandoning the "half-price" system, and reduced the marked rate on the title-pages very considerably; the step was unpopular for a time with the professors, who found their profits reduced, while the increased sale amply compensated the publisher for what was practically but a very slight reduction to him. The public, however, were great gainers, though the title-pages were disfigured by indication of the "Reduced Price," a practice still in some cases continued by the present firm.

In a totally different direction a movement was progressing which has had the greatest influence in rendering cheap music available for the masses. Movable types had been in use in England and Holland for music printing from the early part of the 16th century, but they were exceedingly ugly, and only available for the simplest kinds of vocal music. This method had been greatly improved on in Germany, and one or two of the German founts had been brought to England. The music in the early numbers of the celebrated "Harmonicon" was printed from one of these founts, which was subsequently entirely remodelled by Mr. Clowes and rendered more available for general use. Three important serial works printed from this fount were published at one time: the "Messiah," destined to inaugurate a complete edition of Handel's works, by Messrs. Jones & Co., of Finsbury Pavement; "Sacred Minstrelsy," by Parker; and "The Musical Library" by Charles Knight. Both the last-named were under the supervision of Mr. Ayrton, and contained excellent selections of music, but of a somewhat too fragmentary character. At that time, however, the class to whom these works appealed were by no means inclined for large doses of classical music; and it was perhaps due to the smallness of the excerpts that Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Hummel and others were tolerated at all.

None of these three works achieved any permanent success. Handel's works reached only "The Messiah" and "Acis and Galatea," till some years afterwards, when Mr. Surman added "Judas Maccabæus," and commenced "Samson" and "Joshua," neither of which, however, got beyond the first number. The "Sacred Minstrelsy" reached only two volumes; and Mr. Knight's work came to an end after eight volumes—four instrumental and four vocal—had been published.

Shortly after this period, Mr. Davidson of Whitefrairs published at a very low rate sheet music printed from movable types, with great success. Pains were taken to hit the public taste; and though not being confined to any particular school, and aiming merely at producing that which would sell, the undertaking was successful, and to this day his publications have a constant sale.

The circulation of these several works made known, however, the great advantage of using types instead of pewter plates where large numbers were required, and from that time the use of the former method has been continually increasing, enabling the production of standard compositions at a price ludicrously low as compared with that of the same works printed from engraved plates.

We have no space to chronicle the cheap publications of following years, and we therefore pass on to the present time. The large publishing houses have been always reluctant to cultivate cheapness; but Messrs. Boosey took a leap in the dark in the establishment of their "Musical Cabinet," and have no doubt been astonished at the happy result. It generally needs but a leader to take all the music publishers in the same direction, yet only Messrs. Chappell followed the example for a long time. Though Chappell's "Musical Magazine" has hardly been as successful as its elder contemporary, there can be no doubt that generally it has been a success. Both publications make quantity and bulk their chief ground of appeal to the public, a dangerous plan where occasional failure is possible; for in many cases the loss upon one number of their issue must hence have a very heavy drawback on the profits of others. The quantity of paper and printing in some of these works is enormous for the shilling which buys it; it has been quite needless, also, except for the purpose of excluding competitors. Another large publishing house, however, has now taken the field in the same cause; and Cramer and Co., having laid the public under heavy obligations by reducing the price of first class pianofortes (of low-priced useless instruments there had long been a glut) appear to be in earnest in providing a supply of cheap music. Availing themselves of the type music and printing machine they have printed an edition of Cramer's "Pianoforte Tutor," at a tenth of its original cost, making it the first number of a thorough "Educational Course," which if carried out as begun—and some half dozen numbers are now before us—will be one of the best and most useful works of modern times. The singer is also to be provided for, as at half the price of Boosey and Chappell's works they have already produced their "Vocal Gems," of which more may be learned in our advertising and Review columns. And much more is promised in the same direction.

Of cheap Psalm and Hymn Books the name is legion; and one is bewildered at the choice offered, and astonished at the impossibility of finding a really good one. The two which now have the largest run are "Mercer" and "Hymns Ancient and Modern;" it would be difficult to find a worse Hymn book than the one, or a worse Tune book than the other. We fear there is no speedy hope of the want of a really good book being supplied.

There is much hearing on our subject to which we have not even alluded, including the excellent collections published under Mr. Hullah's auspices, and to much scattered part music, sacred and secular, in various forms. The cheap publications of the Tonic Sol-fa schools have also had great influence. We hope to return to the consideration of these and other matters on a future occasion. In the interim we may congratulate the musical public—and the public are now nearly all musical—on an amount of healthful and available pabulum, which renders them—unlike the unhappy City clerks—quite independent of any projected Cheap Feeding Company, and which promises to increase in quality in proportion as its price is lessened.

Dr. Louis Veron.

The world of catholic art and literature has lost a chief promoter of art in its widest and most various forms. So universal were the abilities of Dr. Louis Veron, the Frenchman who has just closed a long and eventful career, that he might have fallen under the sneer of detraction as a Jack-of-all-trades, but that undoubted talent silenced calumny itself. And then he was a Frenchman, and in France genius may be diffuse and many-sided. In sober truth Veron's capacities erred not by being limited. A physician, a quack advertiser, an opera manager, a keen politician; the keen foreseer of the success of Napoleonic schemes, the supporter of the coup d'état, the cast-off champion of the Emperor; a Voltairist and a gourmet, and the cicerone of Meyerbeer to the French public: what man's life will compass more opposite ends and aims than his? What man save a Frenchman, and among Frenchmen how few, could live thus for thirty years in the whirl of journals, opera houses, medicine and revolution, keep his head cool throughout, and retire with a modest fortune of £120,000? But Veron did this, and died universally respected, and—albeit once a pronounced disciple of Voltaire—in the odor of sanctity. His start was made by marrying the widow of a patent pill proprietor—the pate Régault: he then being a budding Æsculapius. He had done nothing remarkable up to this, beyond writing a treatise on children's maladies and practising as a surgeon; his marriage with the apothecary's widow gave him the first start. On the patent pill he lavished those literary talents which afterwards secured his success in every undertaking; he puffed and pushed the pate with invincible determination, and ended by making the drug and his own fortune. So much would have contented most bourgeois; not so Veron. He forsook medicine and went in for journalism; accepted an editorship and became a politician. He founded the Revue de Paris; joined the Constitutionnel; introduced Balzac to the world by giving his works first light in the columns of the Revue. What bold and brilliant service he did in this arena can scarcely be estimated: what warfare carried into the camp of the critics, what royal battles waged against bellicose journalists, what breathings of fire and flame against England, cannot be accurately determined, for much of Veron's writing was ephemeral—suited the time—and is gone. But France owes him a large debt for bringing out Balzac, and in after time, for introducing to the world Meyerbeer and Tagliioni. Successful as he had been in medicine and literature, he succeeded equally well in the cares of theatrical management. It is in this capacity that he claims a special corner in the records of dramatic art. In 1831 he became manager of the French Opera, and the dash and brilliancy which had carried him through other speculations carried him through this. Auber is indebted to him, Rossini is indebted to him; he brought out Halévy's "Juive;" he produced the "Huguenots" and "Robert le Diable;" he organized "La Sylphide;" he patronized the rising young actress Rachel, and introduced the Elsslers. Four years of these sagacious labors, and he wearied of operatic management, but not before he had left the name of a far-seeing man of art. Then, having increased his fortune, he entered the Assembly, and simultaneously took service under M. Thiers, in the Constitutionnel, and fought for the Opposition; but after the revolution his prophetic soul soon discerned the rising star—the embryo Emperor,—and he threw M. Thiers overboard and worked heart and soul for the approaching Empire. After his election Napoleon was ungrateful: Veron's services remained unrecognized, and in despair he abandoned politics, and threw himself with all a Frenchman's and a Veronesque impetuosity into gastronomy. He became a gourmet; cultivated cookery as he had once cultivated medicine and art; grew more solicitous of the fate of an entrecôte than of the destiny of Europe. His dinners were renowned, as might be expected from such a host with such a history; his dishes were irreplaceable, his conversation and anecdotes were excellent. In this peaceful manner he continued till Saturday last, when, surrounded by friends and living only in the esteem of men, he received the last sacraments of the Church, and calmly died. His career was eminently that of a Frenchman—something too shifty for our respect, purists may say, and yet he never altogether failed in whatever he undertook. His flighty medical youth brought him a wife, the wife brought him a pill, the pill brought him money, the money brought him opportunity for the exercise of a talent, versatile perhaps, but concentrated enough to do as much in a few years as other men achieve in a life. Each step was a rung in the ladder which led to enviable notoriety if not to fame itself; and if we estimate Veron's life by the service he performed to universal art, we shall find that it achieved results which can never be obliterated.—Orchestra.

[From Once a Week]

Charles Gounod.

Whilst the gracious love-music of "Romeo e Giulietta" is still fresh in the public mind, our readers may welcome a sketch of the life of its composer—a musician by whom celebrity has been achieved in the face of many discouragements, and who, in his treatment of the conceptions of Shakspeare, has been no less happy than in dealing with the masterpiece of Goethe. Charles François Gounod was born in Paris, June 17, 1818. He studied counterpoint at the Conservatoire, under Halévy, the talented author of "La Juive," and received instruction in practical composition, first from Lesueur, and afterwards from Paër. In 1837 he carried off a second prize at the "concours" of the Institute; and in 1839 obtained the first premium for his cantata "Fernand." Being chosen, in consequence of his success, government exhibitor, he proceeded to Rome and devoted himself to a careful study of ecclesiastical music. In 1843 Gounod visited Vienna, and had performed, in the Church of St. Paul, a mass in the style of Palestrina, for voices alone. Returning to Paris, he was appointed musical director at the church of the Missions Etrangères, a director the monastic garb, and, until 1851, remained in comparative obscurity, it having been announced that he had taken holy orders. But presently there appeared in the Athenæum a paper, which was then attributed to M. Viardot, the author of some esteemed works on art subjects, containing a notice of a concert given at St. Martin's Hall, and the production of four compositions by an obscure author named Gounod. The writer stated that the music reminded him of no other composer, ancient or modern, either by its form, its melody, or its harmony; that it was not new, if by such a term was meant eccentric or strange, and not old in the sense of dry and stiff; but that it was the work of an accomplished artist, and the poetry of a new poet. He then proceeded to remark that an evident and real impression had been produced upon the audience; but that it was from the music itself, and not from the reception accorded to it, that he felt justified in predicting for its author a far from common career. The paper from which the above is quoted was inserted in the Gazette Musicale de Paris, January 26, 1851, and aroused the more curiosity as M. Gounod's "Sappho," his first attempt at dramatic composition, was then in rehearsal, and soon to be produced at the Opera. On April 16 of the same year it was performed for the first time; but its success was not equal to that anticipated for it by the composer's friends, since, in addition to a faulty libretto, it labored under an incoherence of ideas, an excess of recitative, a persistent avoidance of conventional forms, an inexperience of stage effect, and a want of periodicity of phrases in the score. In plain language, "Sappho" was a failure; but the poetic spirit pervading nearly the entire work, and at times asserting itself in brilliant flashes, convinced competent critics that M. Gounod might safely reckon upon ultimate success. In 1852 some choruses, written for "Ulysses," a tragedy by M. Ponsard, were represented at the Theatre Français. They were also performed in London about a year ago for the benefit of the University College Hospital. The composer aimed at catching the antique character, either by means of the rhythm or by unusual modulations; but the music, though talented, was monotonous; and the chorus "Servantes infidèles" was the only one by which any decided impression was made in London or Paris.

In "La Nonne Sanglante," a grand opera produced for the first time on 18th October, 1854, it was apparent that M. Gounod had made steady advances as a dramatic composer, especially in respect to arrangement of ideas and instrumental coloring. But the music was unequal, and in parts decidedly weak. The features of interest comprised a duet in the first act, nearly the whole of the second act, and an air and duet in the third act. "La Nonne Sanglante," still performed at rare intervals, was succeeded by an attempt at comic music in a setting of Molière's "Le Médecin malgré lui," produced at the Theatre Lyrique in 1858, and in 1864 at Covent Garden. The score contains an ingeniously constructed tenor air at the commencement of the first act, an effective chorus of wood-cutters, an original and genuinely humorous song for the Nurse, some highly meritorious concerted passages, and a not wholly satisfactory overture. The instrumentation is charming throughout; but the finales are weakly constructed, and an affectation of antiquated forms impedes the flow of genial and expressive melody. More than once do we meet a foreshadowing of the love-music in "Faust;" and were the comedy more amenable to operatic treatment, "Le Médecin malgré lui," termed in England "The Mock Doctor," might have achieved a greater measure of success than it enjoyed.

On the 19th March, 1859, "Faust" was produced at the Theatre Lyrique in Paris, but by no means with the success to which its merits entitled it. The French public seems slow to appreciate art in its higher phases, and the verdict of Germany was required before Gounod's masterpiece could be accorded a genuine welcome.

"Philémon et Baucis," a three-act opera, performed for the first time at the Theatre Lyrique on the 18th February, 1860, comprises a delicious overture, a chorus of Bacchantes, frequently performed at the late Mr. Alfred Mellon's promenade concerts, and a few other agreeable morceaux, less generally known; but the subject of the drama is unsatisfactory, and real inspiration is less apparent in this work than in most others from the same pen.

"La Reine de Saba," a grand opera with a hopeless libretto, has never succeeded anywhere. It contains many salient features of interest, and, as regards pure musical merit, it is by some deemed superior to "Faust." It has occasionally been presented in a modified form at the Crystal Palace, but without scenery or costumes, and under the title of "Irene." It includes a magnificent march and cortège, some ingeniously instrumented ballet music, and one or two effective choruses. As a whole, however, it is deficient in variety, a fault chiefly referable to the character of the drama.

In 1864 "Mirella," an Italian version of the French "Mireille," elaborated by M. Michel Carré from the pastoral "Mireio," was produced with partial success at Her Majesty's Theatre. The music, though admired by the critics, never became popular; and the libretto, which was in five straggling acts, and more of an idyl than a play, proved insufferably tedious.

In Paris "Mireille" was afterwards compressed, and brought out with some success in a three-act form; but it has been a stranger to London since the season of its first performance.

M. Gounod, as we have already stated, originally gave his attention to church music, a style of composition that he has turned to account largely in "Romeo e Giulietta" and "Faust," and more sparingly in "Mirella." He is the author of masses, psalms, and motets for a single or double chorus, for voices alone, or combined with the orchestra. The grand mass of St. Cecilia has established its claims as a favorite both in London and the provinces, selections with organ and harp accompaniment being given periodically at one of the fashionable west-end churches. "Tobias," a "sacred drama," a setting of the psalm "By the waters of Babylon," and some minor pieces, were performed for the first time in England a little less than a year ago, but without creating any favorable impression.

In his dramatic compositions, the author of "Faust" exhibits considerable variety, rich and luminous orchestration, novel and refined harmonies, powerful choral effects and a remarkable spirit of poetry. His recitative is usually expressive; but he fails as regards breadth, force, and dramatic intensity. His melody is abundant, but seldom strikingly original; conventional forms are to a certain extent disregarded; and there is an evident distaste for the elaborate finales affected by writers of the Rossinian school. In "Romeo e Giulietta" appears the adoption of a theory indicated in "Faust" and "La Reine de Saba," and exhibited with no very pleasing results in the "Lohengrin" and "Tristan und Isolde" of Richard Wagner. The ideal of the drama of the future is the subordination of music and the other arts to poetry, a doctrine ably illustrated in the second and fifth acts of M. Gounod's latest opera.

It may be added, in conclusion, that the subject of our sketch married one of the daughters of the late M. Zimmerman. In 1852 he became manager of the "Orphéon," a choral réunion of the Communal Musical Schools in Paris; but in 1860 he resigned his post to devote himself exclusively to composition. A new comic opera, promised by him a year or two ago, has not yet been completed; and it is a matter as much of regret as of satisfaction to learn that M. Gounod should now be expending his energies on a musical drama constructed on so unpromising a theme as that of "Francesca di Rimini."

ARTHUR OGILVY.

A Musical Wanderer.*

Every one who has travelled during the last forty years through the beautiful country of Thuringia must certainly have met with an old man, who belonged, so to speak, to the characteristic figures of the landscape. Many persons may not so much as have heard his name, but merely have carried away with them the recollection of an individual somewhat deranged in mind; others, however, may have made themselves acquainted with the history of "the old Capellmeister," as he was always familiarly called. One thing is very certain: the old man led a restless wandering life, and was everywhere to be found, and everywhere at home throughout the length and breadth of Thuringia. In figure he was thin, of middle height, and bent a little forward. Plainly, nay, poorly clad, he went about carrying under his arm a paper parcel, which contained music for sale. His high, broad forehead, and noble features, however, stamped him as no ordinary man, but a closer examination discovered that mysterious contraction and expansion of the eyebrows said to be a sure sign of previous or present mental derangement, and peculiar to many unhappily so afflicted. He himself would naturally never admit anything of the sort, and if, through ignorance or carelessness he was ever reminded of it, his blue eyes flashed in a truly wondrous manner. For forty years the old man wandered uninterruptedly about Thuringia, besides undertaking long and romantic journeys elsewhere. It is not astonishing that, in the course of so long a period, such a striking personage should become, as it were, an indispensable part of the landscape. Any one fortunate enough to hear the strange old man—who had offered him, perhaps, not long before, a piece of music for a few groschens—playing the piano, or the organ, could not help feeling that it was an instance of no ordinary genius hopelessly ruined. Such, indeed, was the case. In his younger years, years, in the full strength of youth, Louis Böhmer, for he it was who was the old Capellmeister, ranked among the most remarkable professors of the musical art, and was the object of great expectations.

Tüttelstadt, in the duchy of Gotha, where he was born on the 8th January, 1787, was his principal residence during the forty years of his restless wanderings in Thuringia. His first musical studies were pursued under his father, an organist and parish chanter, and his talent for composition soon manifested itself. His attention was directed mostly to the scores of Bach, Fuchs, Kirnberger, Frescobaldi, etc., while Haydn and Mozart kept alive and imparted fresh energy to his musical enthusiasm. It was not, however, till he went to Erfurt, in his thirteenth year, to attend the Gymnasium, that he followed any regular plan in his musical studies. Soon after he did so, his decided vocation for music was plainly revealed. The most brilliant star in the musical firmament of Thuringia was, at that time, Louis Spohr in Gotha, whither Böhmer removed, in order to perfect himself under Spohr's direction. Spohr took a great liking to him, even procuring him the opportunity of appearing as pianist at the Court of Gotha, and very soon the young man had plenty to do as a music-master. In the year 1808 he went to Jena, where he remained two years. But he was then seized with his travelling mania, and after visiting his relatives, he set out, in the spring of 1810, upon his pilgrimage. He gave concerts in various large towns. At Nuremberg especially, he achieved a more than usually triumphant success. He intended to proceed to Vienna, but his plans were frustrated. His passport had not been visé by the Austrian Ambassador at Dresden, so, being obliged to turn back at Linz, he returned to Nuremberg. He was received with open arms by the friends his art had procured him, and speedily felt quite at home. He remained in this town six years, during which he resided, free from care, at the house of a friend, endowed with a taste for art, composing and playing in public very industriously, while his reputation continued to extend more and more. His works met with the most decided approbation, and were taken up by the leading publishers, such as Breitkopf and Härtel, Hoffmeister, etc.

* From the Neue Berliner Music-Zeitung.

Whether it was that the deaths of his grandfather and grandmother, of his father and mother, and of several of his brothers and sisters, which took place in rapid succession, proved too violent a shock for him, or whether bitter experience and events of another description obscured the entire range of his intellectual horizon,—one thing is certain: his fine artistic spirit began even then giving proofs of momentary derangement. The artist so highly esteemed by every one frequently fell into strange moods, which often degenerated into absolute delusions. It cannot surprise us that, under such demoniacal influence, he soon found it impossible to remain longer by his friend's hospitable hearth, but felt driven out into the wide world. Henceforth he never more found repose. At that period, by the way, the Fury of War brandished her torch over half Europe, and rendered a professional tour almost impossible. We see him there hastening in his flight, without stopping long anywhere, through Wurtemberg, Baden, Alsatia, and Switzerland, giving concerts only now and then in the larger towns. At length, through Wurtemberg and Bavaria, he again reached Leipzig, where he made a long rest. His concerts at the Gewandhaus excited universal interest, and such men as Roehltz and Gottfried Weber entertained the kindest feelings towards the genial musician. Böhmer gained, also, great honor and considerable sums of money by short trips to Weimar and Gotha, performing at the Courts of both places. In spite of all this, however, his hours of gloom returned only too often, and to the overcrowding of his soul was added in Leipzig a gony affection which for years caused the poor fellow most acute sufferings in the head. He soon felt that he could not remain in Leipzig, but must a second time go forth to seek an unknown and uncertain future.

He proceeded, in 1818, by the way of Frankfort, to the Rhine and conceived the bold notion of making, as virtuoso, a tour beyond the boundaries of Germany. It seemed as though, by this notion, Fate wished to open for him the door to happiness, to the friendly and flower-wreathed harbors of life, but his Evil Demon would not permit it. Böhmer first directed his steps to Hamburg. Here, as well as in Bremen and Oldenburg, whither he made some few trips, he met with tremendous success, the ladies especially exhibiting great enthusiasm for him and his genial performances. The wealthy lovers of art in Hamburg patronized him most warmly, and, in consequence of the reputation which preceded him thence, he met with a brilliant welcome the following year in Copenhagen. He now mounted, at one bound, to the pinnacle of fame and fortune. He resided at Court, and was the King's guest. It is to the influence of his Evil Demon alone that we must attribute the fact of his throwing up all this, and of his returning home, poor as a church mouse, in the most reduced circumstances. All Copenhagen, particularly the female world, had paid him the homage of unanimous approbation; he made a brilliant income and lived like a nobleman. But he suddenly tore himself away; set out on foot without bag or baggage; and for a long time wandered about on the high roads or in the forests. At length he returned to Copenhagen, and embarked for Rostock. Thence he walked to Schwerin, and from Schwerin to Hamburg. Never could he find rest; nay, he did not even dare to enter a house, but every day walked fifteen leagues or more. Without stopping anywhere he pursued his romantic way through Hanover, Hildesheim, and Nordhansen to Gotha, and the reader may conceive his condition on reaching that town. His luggage, which included several valuable manuscripts, was never forwarded him, though he asserted he had sent it off by the post from Copenhagen. How fearful his journey must have been may be inferred from the fact that once in the neighborhood of Hamburg he was nearly swallowed up in a swamp, having entirely lost his way in a wood, so dark was the night.

From this time he settled in his native town of Tüttelstadt, if, indeed, "settled" is the correct term, for it was now that his restless wanderings up and down Thuringia began, wanderings which lasted, almost without interruption, from the year 1820 to the year 1860, the year of his death, and caused him soon to be known to both old and young as "the old Capellmeister." There are numerous episodes and anecdotes related of him during this period. It is evident from many of them that he suffered more or less from delusions, but in many of them there speaks the highly gifted artist, who, in his endless and magnificent extemporizations on the piano could utterly forget himself and all around to dive down beneath the waves of tone. "Full of magic charm," says his poetical friend, Müller von der Werra, "were his chains of fanciful ideas, from which he frequently could not tear himself, sitting for days and sometimes whole nights and playing uninterruptedly on the piano. Had he not worn the clothes of a beggar, he might have been mistaken for some supernatural being."

For forty years, that is up to 1860, did he wander thus restlessly about. At the beginning of 1860 (on the 28th of March), he died rather suddenly in Gotha, in consequence of a severe cold caught on one of his peregrinations which he had been induced by a strange whim to undertake. His friend, L. Storch, the well known poet, had published a sketch of him in the Gartenlaube. Böhmer felt deeply offended because the occasional fits of mental derangement to which he was subject had been too plainly hinted at by his friend. He determined to go to Leipzig for the purpose of persuading the editor of the periodical in question to print another biography. All the arguments of his friends at Gotha were unavailing to divert him from his project. He started, but got no farther than Erfurt, whence he was obliged to return to Gotha. After keeping his bed for a short time, he expired, to find in death that repose which he had vainly sought in life.

His compositions are numerous; they all breathe the pleasing, light spirit of his great model, Mozart. Numerous, too, are, probably, his unpublished smaller productions, which he sold in manuscript during his wanderings. At any rate, many of his small songs have been vocally preserved by the lower classes in Thuringia, and it is said that many a melody entitled a Thuringian folk-song is due to him. We will remind our readers only of the universally known "Ach, wie ist's möglich dann," etc. It would, perhaps, be a difficult task to determine what foundation there is for the report that C. M. von Weber borrowed some of the finest melodies in Der Freischütz (even the "Bridal Chorus" for instance) from Thuringian folk-songs emanating from Böhmer. Though the rich genius of a man like Weber did not require to borrow from any one, still that does not say that strange strains of a national character might not have retained a firm possession of his ear, and, remodelled in his own mind, have been reproduced at the proper time. Böhmer himself is stated to have expressed similar sentiments on this subject. Many of his orchestral compositions deserve to be rescued from oblivion; they are very far superior to the mediocre productions with which the managers of our exceedingly numerous Garden Concerts are accustomed to overwhelm us.

CARL SENTZ is giving a series of orchestral matinees in Philadelphia. The orchestra is large, trained and well handled. The performance is usually made up of symphonies by Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn, though Wagner sometimes finds a place.

Mendelssohn's Reformation symphony is to be revived in London.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 26, 1867.

Bach's "Magnificat," described by Robert Franz.

(Concluded).

V.

12. With the "Sicut locutus est" Mary's song of praise is properly ended. But for a more definite rounding off of the Magnificat, the verse: "Gloria Patri, gloria Filio, gloria Spiritui Sancto. Sicut erat in principio, et nunc, et semper, et in secula seculorum, Amen." is added, once more summing up the whole in a grand, broad feeling.

This concluding piece is divided in its outward structure into two main parts, the first taking the words "Gloria Patri," &c., and the second the "Sicut erat in principio," (As it was in the beginning), &c. The five chorus parts, accompanied by the orchestra, with the exception of the trumpets and drums, which only come in at the "gloria spiritui Sancto," and the organ, break out at first in a short, energetic exclamation: "Gloria!" Thereupon the Organ, tasto solo, holds out the deep A as organ-point, upon which now an unprecedented tone-picture builds itself up. The Bass, followed by the other voice parts at intervals of half a measure, unrolls without further accompaniment a strongly soaring triplet figure, which, after traversing three bars, plunges into the "gloria Patri," flashing as with super-earthly splendor, when the orchestra again falls in with all its might, resuming that loud exclamation. These sweeping onsets are repeated on the organ-point E, only reversing the order in which the voices enter, to the "gloria Filio," and then again upon the organ-point B, but with a new motive, to the "gloria Spiritui sancto."—The voices in the eager rush of their ascent to the triune God seem to tumble over one another, until the need of community again unites them upon far-resounding five-six chords; they seem to wish to take heaven by storm, but to sink upon their knees, not crushed, but jubilant, before the eternal splendor. And here right clearly Music shows the power peculiar to itself alone, of representing highest transcendental moods in full reality; the expressive faculty of other arts is very far from reaching it in this direction.

After this introduction follows the second half of the chorus, with the words: "Sicut erat in principio, et nunc, et semper et in secula seculorum, Amen." Bach here turns back to the opening number of the work, letting its leading motive float before us once more in a condensed form. The satisfactory rounding off thus given to the whole work is worthy in keeping with the preceding traits of perfect beauty.

Having thus subjected each single number of the Magnificat to a special examination, with attempt to show its high worth, it now remains to us to consider the work as a whole. The fuller the discussion has been thus far, the shorter we can afford to make it now.

Each one of Bach's works shows the most consistent and decided mood, one thought, one tone of feeling running through the whole. To our time, pre-occupied so greatly by particulars, it is almost incomprehensible how the old masters, with all their love of detail, knew how to keep the eye always clear and free, so as never to neglect for that the general fundamental relations and their harmonious connection. Their artistic feeling was altogether unitary—a pure, transparent atmosphere spreads itself unclouded over their works; a uniform light, the reflection of the artist's own calm soul, pervades the world, with all its images, of their creation. Nowhere do you perceive aught that is accidental or superfluous; on the contrary each one thing so necessarily conditions every other, that all seems to have sprung as from a common central point. Our Magnificat confirms this observation. In all the variety that it affords in single parts, in the most violent contrasts that oppose each other, in spite of the ever growing climax, there still reigns in the whole a childlike naivete, which solves all difficulties as if in play and in complete unconsciousness dares to attempt the highest and achieves it. Bach was really a whole man, whose inner life could tolerate no contradictions; as in the detail of his music kindred elements shoot together as it were, and crystallize, rejecting everything extraneous, so instinctively with him the larger relations unite in one whole, which suffers nothing unharmonious to have part in it.

Before such manifestations all criticism ceases; it can only yield itself, a modest listener and observer, to the wonderful achievements of the Master; if it can exercise its negative attributes but sparingly on such works, it may interest itself in them all the more positively for that. In this sense we permit ourselves a few passing remarks.

In form the Magnificat is distinguished from many other church works of Bach by the particularly concise, short form both of the choruses and solo songs. The latter, especially, show a great precision of contour: if the ground form of the Aria, the trine division, is perceptible, still it appears rather indicated than actually worked out. This was partly conditioned by the text, which in the single verses offers but little of antithesis; partly by the general course of the work, which in its very nature moves on swiftly and decidedly.—In the same way the choruses, perhaps with the exception of the first, are kept very condensed and compact, and give most valid proof of what self-limitation Bach was capable upon occasion.

The treatment of the vocal parts must be called in general very happy and successful. Nowhere is the singer obliged to make use of the unusual registers of his organ; he can preserve its strength and freshness to the end. The melodies are for the most part easy to take up, always impressive, and thus facilitate an expressive rendering.

The orchestra, likewise, offers no especial difficulties: with the exception of the trumpets, of which to be sure things are expected which our modern technique can no more accomplish, all is convenient of execution.

Accordingly, so far as the work itself is concerned, the way is made smooth for bringing it fitly before the world: and we trust that it has only needed these hints to help secure it this its good right. It is certainly high time to work against the whole superficiality of taste by the revival of this and similar creations of the older Art. The performance of the Matthew Passion through Mendelssohn was an epoch-making act, which woke to new life the darling child of the Bach Muse lying in the stiff sleep of death: may such deeds soon be done, and in great number, with regard to similar works of the Master! A work of Art first gains its true significance when it can actually exercise before all the world the power which the artist has lent to it: he has done his duty, now let those, who call themselves his followers, do theirs! The public can only be the gainer by such efforts. * * *

Symphony Concerts.

The feasts of great orchestral music soon come round again. The Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, which have won so good a name by keeping up to their mark so truly for two winters past, begin again on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 7, with a larger subscription than before already secured and with prospect of a very interesting season. The programme of the opening Concert, partly by design, and partly as a short way out of unexpected difficulties in making up a programme, on account of disappointments in the hope of solo artists, will be an experiment. For once it is proposed to give a regular Berlin programme, after the model of the Symphony Soirées of the Royal Orchestra, which for many years have invariably consisted of two Symphonies and two Overtures,—nothing else. In this case, however, the strain of constant listening to full orchestra (imaginary to a great extent) will be relieved by a choice vocal solo between each Overture and Symphony. Whether such a selection can prove enjoyable to a whole audience depends entirely upon what Symphonies and Overtures are played. They must not be too long, nor "heavy" (in respect of poetry, meaning, beauty), and they must be well contrasted. These conditions, we think, are answered in the selection of this programme:

PART I.

Dedication Overture, (Die Weihe des Hauses,) op. 124.

Tenor Aria from the "Seraglio,"..... Beethoven.
Symphony in C ("Jupiter"),..... Mozart.

PART II.

Overture: "In the Highlands,"..... Gade.
Songs..... Schubert.
"Scotch" Symphony..... Mendelssohn.

Here the music of the first part is of the older classical period, in its highest bloom; while that of the second is modern and romantic, in its way also of the best. Both Symphonies have long been popular and always taking with a Boston audience; each is full of life, variety and sparkle in itself; for a good Symphony is not merely one long piece, it is a well contrived variety of pieces which relieve one another by contrast of rhythm, mood of feeling, color and whole character:—so much so that a Symphony is in itself the best type of a true programme. It is mere fancy, therefore, when people talk of the monotony of listening to a good Symphony! Besides, a Concerto is in form and length and genius (when it has any) a Symphony; and it is just in place of the usual piano or violin Concerto that we now put the second Symphony; the only difference being that there is not the extra-musical, personal interest about one artist brought virtuoso-like into the foreground.

All of the four pieces are new to these Concerts, and the two Overtures are wholly new to a Boston audience. That by Beethoven, written for the opening of a theatre in Vienna, is exceedingly grand, broad, solemn, almost churchlike in the beginning, with prominent passages for the four horns, the bassoons, the clarinets, &c., taxing the full powers of the orchestra, which work themselves up by degrees into an uncontrollable enthusiasm, that finds vent in a rapid finale with a vigorous, quaint Handelian sort of theme, that is wrought up contrapuntally together with a second theme. It cannot fail to excite and please. And it may be interesting to compare this ending of the Beethoven Overture with the famous fugue Finale with four subjects in the Mozart Symphony which follows.

The Gade Overture: "Im Hochland," is a short, delicious, perfectly characteristic and poetic tone-picture,—one of his most genial and happy works; no better prelude could there be, we fancy, to the Scotch Symphony of Mendelssohn.—As for the vocal pieces, the "Costanza" aria from the "Entführung aus dem Serail," is both in song and orchestral accompaniment about the loveliest and noblest of all Mozart's tenor songs, and we believe the person has been found to sing it as it should be sung.

Should this experiment of the two Symphonies take well with the audience, it will afford a capital resource whenever a nice plan of programme is upset, over and over again sometimes, by capricious uncertainty of the solo element; and this would allow us to hear so many more good Symphonies in the course of the winter; especially would it furnish the long desired opportunity of hearing more of the light and cheerful ones of Father Haydn; one of these would always give good appetite for a Beethoven or one of the more modern.

The matter of the rest of the eight concerts is not yet all determined. Of Symphonies we shall probably have (and perhaps in the order named, unless there should be two again in one concert) the No. 4, in B flat, of Beethoven; one by Haydn; the D minor again of Schumann; the great one in C by Schubert; another one (in B flat) by Gade; the first (in B flat) by Schumann; and finally the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, which cost too much pains and made too deep an impression last year to leave any excuse for letting such an experience lie unimproved.

New in the list of Overtures will be Cherubini's to Medea, and perhaps some others. CAMILLA URSO is bespoken for Beethoven's Violin Concerto, which she will no doubt render in as exquisite a style of art as she did that of Mendelssohn. Mr. LEONHARD will play Chopin's E-minor Concerto; Mr. LANG, the first of the five Beethoven Concertos, the only one that we have not yet heard; Mozart's Concerto for two pianos will be contributed by Messrs. PARKER and LANG; and there is hope that we shall hear again the great E-flat Concerto of Beethoven, that by Schumann, &c., for we have other masterly interpreters who know these concerts cannot spare them. Mrs. CARY, too, will give us some more of the sincere, deep melody of Bach and others; and other singers will be announced from time to time; for it is proposed this time to keep the piano-playing within more moderate limits, one piece only in a programme, and that of course with orchestra, and to call in the voice more often, if the fine voice, when found, prove not too coy.

Mr. ZERRAİN is earnestly schooling his Orchestra, which will soon be larger and stronger than ever before. Certainly the wind department is materially improved, and the strings will be at least as many and as good as before, and are likely to gain in number and quality as the concerts go on. We shall greatly miss the Quintette Club, to be sure; but they will resume their places ere long; if not, means will be found to make their places good, even if the Association have to "call spirits from the vasty deep."

Meanwhile, large as the subscription has been, there are plenty of good seats left; and every one now taken goes so far toward building up the orchestra into the full strength and proportions which Beethoven and the Music Hall demand.

Concerts.

BOSTON CONSERVATORY. The Teachers of this thriving young institution gave their pupils and friends a musical treat, on Wednesday afternoon, Oct. 16, at the Tremont Temple. Mr. THAYER opened with the smaller Bach Fugue in G minor on the Organ, which did not sound as if in very good condition,—at least to ears accustomed to the Organ of the Music Hall. Three movements from Schubert's wonderful E-flat Trio, op. 100, were excellently well played by Messrs. EICHBERG, A. SACK and LEONHARD, giving to true music lovers all the pleasure that such music could in so large a room. Mendelssohn's "Zeluca" and Schubert's "Posthorn" were sung in sweet, clear voice, with good conception, but timidly, by Miss POLAND. Next came a sentimental cornet solo, (Silva Maria, by Mercadante), skilfully played, with excellent tone, by Mr. ARBUCKLE, well accompanied on the piano by Mr. SHARLAND. Messrs. Eichberg and Leonard followed with the Adagio Cantabile and Scherzo from Beethoven's Violin and Piano Sonata in C minor, op. 30, No. 2. Mr. KREISSMANN sang the tender Aria graziosa of Pylades in Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, and, returning after some grotesque Organ variations on "Old Hundred," Schumann's impassioned "Du mine Sieh," instead of "Songs" (as set down on the bill) by "Franz." The whole ended with Mr. Eichberg's Ave Maria, for violin, piano, cabinet organ and cello, played by himself, Messrs. Dow, Thayer and Sack. Mr. Kreissmann's song pledges may well have been disorganized by the intervention of these Variations! And indeed all the classical pieces, always welcome to musical souls, suffered by intermingling with such things as that and cornet solos. That the taste of the crowd, so fresh and pleasant to look upon, was very juvenile and unripe, was plain from the fact that the only encore were awakened by the cornet and the pedal hurry-skurry on the Organ. With a little easy modification it would have been a nice concert.

Mr. PECK's "GRAND SACRED CONCERT," last Sunday evening, drew a large audience to the Music Hall, which has been so long under his faithful superintendence. There were not a few good things in the Concert, and some that would have been good by any name but "sacred." Sig. FERRANTI, frank, genuine Buffo that he is, pretending to nothing else, must have had an awkward sense of being in a queer position. But it is not so much the fault of the singers or the concert-givers, that all the concerts on a Sunday have to make believe "sacred;" it is the fault of the Law, or rather of the sustainers of the Law, of the strict Sabbatarianism which a part of a free people insist upon imposing upon the whole, who may be as religious, as virtuous and as wise as themselves for aught they know or have any right to assume. Certainly it is a tyrannical invasion of the rights of Art, which, to have life and truth, must first of all be free, and which, better than many of the Churches, knows how to use without abusing freedom. Is the experience of old Europe, then, so little worth in comparison with ours? And dare we pretend that all the genuine pervading piety of a people is on our side of the Ocean? Our common people may be more enterprising, more educated, more church-going, but are they better than the Germans, who spend their Sundays cheerfully, like grateful children of the Father? Can there not be airs from Heaven, quickening truth, in a Symphony, an Opera, and can there not be blighting frost in services and sermons? It is at least worth thinking of.

Well, Sig. Ferranti is delightful to hear, where there is no profession of seriousness. As it was he exchanged the Rossini "Don Margitico" for the Mozart "Non più andrai," as if that were a whit more sacred! He also sang Mattei's "Fisherman." While we are upon the men, we may as well say what a pure Italian-like ring there is to Mr. HALL's noble bass, and with what power and grace he sang the "Pro peccatis." Mr. MacDONALD, too, won favor by his clear, firm tenor in the air from Elijah; his singing gives good promise, though maturity of style is yet a good way off.

CARL ROSA seemed as popular as ever. He has gained in purity and sweetness of tone since he was here last, and played the "Trio du diable" of Tartini very beautifully; as well as the Andante Variations of the "Kreutzer Sonata" with Mr. LANG; the performance was highly enjoyable on both parts. The "Mouth Harmonica" playing of Professor WALLACH was truly a great curiosity, the tones exquisite.

But the chief feature of the concert was Mrs. KEMPTON's singing. Her rich contralto has lost some of its freshness while she has been abroad; but she has won instead that which is even better, a sound, ripe, noble style. Truly we have not heard "He was despised" sung with such elastic, artistic beauty, such simple yet sufficing expression, such absence of forced pathos, for a long time; she let the music tell its story in its own way, and that is far the higher kind of art, compared to what is called pathos on the operatic stage. Mrs. SMITH sang "Show me thy ways," by Torrente, and the "Quis est homo" with Mrs. Kempton, with clear, telling voice and easy execution, though a little coldly. And we were much pleased with Miss BARTON's voice, style and feeling in the English song "Ruth and Naomi."

NEW YORK.—The Philharmonic Society announces the larger features of its programme for the five concerts of the season. The orchestra, it is said, will be increased to one hundred active members. Here is the list:

Nov. 16.—Symphony, "Pastorale," by Beethoven; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Poem Symphonique, "Mazzeppa," Liszt.

Dec. 21.—Symphony in C, Schubert; Overture, "Othello" (first time), Ritter; Overture, "Calm at Sea and Happy Voyage," Mendelssohn.

Feb. 1.—Overture, "Jesonda," by Spohr; Choral Symphony, No. 9, Beethoven.

March 7.—Symphony No. 1, in G minor, Mozart; Introduction to "Lohengrin," Wagner; Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn.

April 18.—Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Schumann; Poem Symphonique, "Héroïde Funèbre" (first time), Liszt; Overture, "Freischütz," Weber.

NEW ORGAN, for the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Elizabeth, N. J. The Messrs. Hook have just completed an instrument for this church, which is so remarkably successful as to be worthy of a more than passing notice. For several days it was exhibited at their factory to admiring visitors by our leading organists and won the highest praise from both performers and audience. On Tuesday, the 14th inst., its many fine and admirable qualities were ably displayed through a very wide range of style by Messrs. J. K. Paine, S. P. Tuckerman and J. H. Willcox, of Boston.

The organ is enclosed in an elegant and imposing case of black walnut of much originality and beauty of design, displaying richly, yet delicately decorated front pipes of sixteen feet, and contains the following registers, pipes and appliances.

GREAT MANUAL.		SWELL MANUAL.
No.	Pipes.	No.	Pipes.
1	16 ft. Open Diapason, 58	1	16 ft. Bourdon (divided) 58
2	8 " Open Diapason, 58	2	8 " Open Diapason, 58
3	8 " Doppel Flöte, 58	3	8 " Stop Diapason, 58
4	8 " Viola di Gamba, 58	4	8 " Salicional, 58
5	4 " Octave, 58	5	4 " Octave, 58
6	4 " Flute Harmonique, 58	6	4 " Violina, 58
7	23 " Twelfth, 58	7	4 " Flauto Traverso, 55
8	2 " Fifteenth, 58	8	2 " Piccolo, 58
9	3 Rank Mixture, 174	9	3 Rank Mixture, 174
10	3 " Schaff, 174	10	8 ft. Cornopean, 58
11	8 ft. Trumpet, 58	11	8 " Oboe and Bassoon, 58
12	4 " Clarion, 58

SOLO MANUAL.
No.	Pipes.	No.	Pipes.
1	8 ft. Geigen Principal, 58	5	4 ft. Octave, 58
2	" Dulciana, 58	6	4 " Flute d'Amour, 58
3	8 " Melodia, 46	7	2 " Piccolo, 58
4	8 " Stop'd Diapason, div. 58	8	8 " Clarionet, 58

PEDALE.
No.	Pipes.	No.	Pipes.
1	16 ft. Open Diapason, 27	4	8 ft. Violoncello, 27
2	16 " Violone, 27	5	16 " Posaupe, 27
3	16 " (tone) Bourdon, 27	6	10 1/2 " Quint Flöte, 27

MECHANICAL REGISTERS.
1	Swell to Great Coupler.	6	Swell to Pedal Coupler.
2	Choir to " "	7	Choir to " "
3	Swell to Choir " "	8	Tremulant "Swell." "
4	Great to Pedal " "	9	Bellows Signal.
5	Great to Pneumatic " "

COMPOSITION PEDALS.
1	Forfe for Great Manual, bringing out the Full Organ.
2	Piano " " taking off all but 8 ft. Stops.
3	Great to Pedal Coupler.

Compass of Manuals from CC to A3, 58 notes.
" Pedale " CCC to D 27 "

SUMMARY.
No. of pipes in Great Manual,	928
" " " Swell " "	754
" " " Solo " "	452
" " " Pedale " "	162
Total No. of pipes,	2296
No. of Speaking Stops,	37
" Mechanical " "	9
Whole No. of draw-stops.	48

The pneumatic action is applied to the great manual, by which the touch, even with all the couplers drawn, is made as light and easy as that of a grand piano-forte. With this action the keys, instead of acting directly upon the pallets, are only required to open a little bellows (one to each key), which instantly expands and lifts all the valves belonging to the keys pressed down, or, if applied to the register action, adds or removes the stops required. Over the great manual, and within easy reach of the fingers of the player, there are some small ivory knobs by which the Swell and Solo manuals can be coupled to the pneumatic action when desired, a contrivance of the greatest utility and convenience. There is also in each manual a blank draw-stop with all its appliances and connections, including room on each wind chest for future additions whenever desired; this provision is of great importance, as there remains nothing to be added but the pipes which may be chosen.

In the power and grandeur of its diapasons, the clearness and resonance of its octaves and harmonies, and the proper quantity and quality of its reed stops, to give boldness and character, we believe this instrument to be unsurpassed by any previous efforts of its eminent builders.

The effect of the full organ is particularly satisfying; so clear and brilliant—éclatant—is its quality, yet without so well blended and balanced, that no stop has undue prominence, and to listen to it is a continual pleasure. The 16 ft. Open Diapason on the great manual imparts great dignity, and the Doppel Flöte and Flute Harmonique great breadth and fullness to the full-organ tone; and the Viola di Gamba gives a peculiar crispness and pungency to the stops of eight-foot pitch. The very complete Pedale, with its six stops, affords a full, abundant support to the grand pyramid of tone, and yet contains stops of rarely beautiful tone, perfectly adapted to the accompaniment of the softest manual stops.

Among so many beautiful and characteristic stops, or voices, as the Germans appropriately call them, it is hard to select any for particular mention; for some time past, however, the Hooks have been constantly improving in the voicing of string-like, or violin sounding stops, until in this instrument the stops of this timbre, as the Viola di Gamba in the great manual, the Salicional and Violina in the swell, the Geigen (or violin) Principal in the solo manual, and the Violone in the pedale, are so successful as to leave nothing further to be desired. The last mentioned stop is of remarkable beauty; when skilfully used it is difficult to believe that one does not hear the "bite" of the bow on the strings of a contra-basso. The Flauto Traverso in the swell has a lovely, clear, travelling tone, and the Flute d'Amour in the solo manual is also very beautiful. Of the reeds it is only necessary to say that they are the work of the Hooks, so renowned is their excellence in this special and difficult department of organ building.

Though this firm has erected many larger instruments, this, the latest jewel in the chaplet of their noble works, seems the brightest and most perfect.

May they continue to fill our temples with better and better specimens of their art, and may our people appreciate more and more their long continued endeavors to increase its dignity and to elevate it from its former low estate, until, when an organ is to be bought the question shall not be, who will build cheapest? but who will build best?

RIPIENO.

The Welsh Eisteddfod.

The annual fuss by which the Welsh delight to glorify themselves, fancying that thereby they are maintaining "the truth" of the Principality "against the world"—the Carmarthen Eisteddfod—is over. To every one except the speakers of blustering orations and the readers of dreary papers without value, the main life of the celebration must have lain in the musical contributions from Welsh singers and players who have learnt their art in England—such as Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Edmonds, Mr. John Thomas, and Mr. Brinley Richards. It is true that one gentleman, exclusively trained at home, known by the charming bardic name of "The Roaring Lion," figured on the occasion, and that an attempt was made by his section of patriots, ignorant of music, to disturb better performances, in order to force a hearing for his incompetent "native talent," although his exhibition might have been vouchsafed (our contemporaries assure us, and past experience confirms it) to show English-nurtured artists how not to sing. What do the violent orators, such as "Talhaiarn," who tickle local prejudice by talking of preservation and progress, and maintaining insulation and bigotry as righteous objects of patriotic Cambrian care, make of such facts? The Times puts the matter pithily when contrasting the proceedings of this Carmarthen "Mutual Admiration Society" with those of former meetings, at which a Brahm and a Stephens were called in to aid, or of later ones at Rhuddlan and (last year's) Chester. There was no orchestra this year. The triple harp seems falling into desuetude, only one competitor for the prize having presented himself. The best part-singing, as in 1866, was that of the Merthyr choir. A very young lady, Miss Moulding of Swansea, is said to have distinguished herself on the pianoforte. A sensation was excited by a letter from Mr. Edmund Yates, to whom the delicate task of adjudicating the prize for the best song in English had been entrusted. This conveyed the startling fact that the ninety-three specimens submitted for his perusal were, one and all, so devoid of merit, as to be utterly unworthy of any prize. The epistle has put the local blood up; and, in the true Little Pedlington style, an irate journalist warns Mr. Yates to tremble and anticipate just retribution, seeing that he will keep his eyes on Tinsley's Magazine. By way of setting a crowning seal on the absurdity, it was determined to ignore the malicious judgment of the invited English arbiter, and to hand over the ninety-three lyrics to be reconsidered by a Welsh gentleman and lady! Mr. Brinley Richards is said to have announced his determination to take no further part in celebrations so futile and foolish. He is wise.—London Paper.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The solitary tear. Song.	Carl Zerrahn, 70
Poetry by Heine, with translation, and music ably adapted.
Hurra for the sports of the field. Q't.	Waver. 35
Old farm house on the hill. Song.	H.B.Funk. 40
Mary Grey and I.	" " 30
To Kathleen.	" E. Linwood. 30
Good morrow to my love.	" " 30
Why art thou weeping.	" " 30
What Norah said. (Reply to Norah O'Neil).

We are growing old, my brother. S'g.	Fairlamb. 35
I've had pleasant dreams.	" " 35
I'll think of thee.	" " 35
Our paths were once together.	" " 35
The shepherd and the rose.	" " 30
From over the wave.	" Gaston Lyle. 35
If thou wilt remember. Song.	A. L. Traventi. 35
Little Jim. Ballad.	C. A. White. 30

A long list, but in the multitude of songs one can only notice by classes. These are "songs for the people" by persons who understand what "the people" like.

Pal o' Mine. Come Song.	Vance. 35
A clever, good bearded thing.
Robin Adair. Song for guitar.	Haydn. 30
Good arrangement.
The Lord's prayer. (Adaptations).	Clouston. 35
An excellent adaptation of the well-known words.
I have found thee. (Rilla). Song.	Gordigiani. 50
Finely finished Italian song.
My heart ever faithful. Song.	Bach. 40
It does a man good to hear Bach's robust music, and this, in oratorio style, shows the strong hand of the master.

Instrumental.

Monthly melodies, in the major and minor keys.	E. Mack, ea. 50
January March.	July Barcarole.
February Waltz.	August Polka.
March Galop.	September Varsovienn.
April Waltz.	October Schottische.
May Polka.	November Quickstep.
June Reverie.	December Mazourka.
Pupils who should take one lesson a month, would find these just the things; but they will be considered good instructive pieces for any one, and the quaint titles will help make them acceptable.
Grand Valse Brillante. "Romeo and Juliet."	J. S. Knight. 40
Gems of the opera, made to shine by Knight, so as to add lustre to nightly pleasures.
Between the mountains. Waltz.	A. Rottenbach. 30
Love's messenger. Polka.	Aubert. 50
Tout à vous. Galop.	G. P. Kimball. 35
La Perle de Nuit. Valse brillante.	Aubert. 40
Five specimens of dance music. About of easy-medium difficulty.
Crown of Glory. For Piano.	Aubert. 50
Tasteful and brilliant. Illustrated title.
Tell me darling. Quickstep. For brass band.	Bond. 1.00
Favorite melody.
Happy days. Pensée fugitive.	G. D. Wilson. 35
Merry bells. Morceau de Salon.	" " 30
Pieces of much merit and beauty. Medium difficulty.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 694.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 17.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The Castilian Prisoner.

Was this genuine Spanish romance (A. D. 1550)—doubtless founded on well-known facts, like the majority of folk songs.—the original source from which the plot of Gaveaux' opera "Leonore" was drawn? An opera only now remembered because its libretto was subsequently appropriated and immortalized by Beethoven.

—"Twas in May, the flowery May-time,
When the south winds softly blow,
When the larks are singing loudly,
Nightingales responding low,
When, to serve their noble ladies,
Lovers with a light heart go,
That they brought me here, a captive,
Hot with anger, worn with woe.
Long, long have I pined in darkness,
Breathing cold and fetid air,
Not of sun, and not of seasons,
Not of night or day aware;
Naught to soothe me, naught to comfort,
Save one distant birdling's lay,
Through the damp walls of my prison
Sometimes finding airy way,
Wafting round me morning memories,
With delight and love aglow;
Malison upon the archer
Whose sharp arrow laid her low!"—

If this were thy will, dread sovereign,
Well; for thou art lord and king;
If it were the governor's doing,
He hath done a treacherous thing.

—"Would some other bird could find me,
Lark, or thrush, or nightingale,
Like a friend to feel my sorrow,
Like a friend to tell my tale,
Bred among most noble ladies,
Versed in gentle ladies' lore,
Who for me could bear a message
To my sweet spouse, Leonore!
She would swiftly send to aid me
Silent axe, and viewless file,
Ope the doors and break my fetters,
Gaolers' cruel heart beguile."—

But the good king heard the story,
And the truth at once descried;
Freed the captive from his fetters,
Oped the dungeon portal wide.

FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

"The Goose of Cairo."

A POSTHUMOUS OPERA BY MOZART.

In a former number of our paper, says the editor of the Berlin Echo, we told our readers that Mozart's unfinished posthumous comic opera, Die Gans von Cairo (the Goose of Cairo), had been produced at the Theatre des Fantaisies Parisiennes, where it met with a very favorable reception. According to the Paris papers it has been very skillfully remodelled, that is to say, the plot has been condensed into two acts by M. Victor Wilder, and the omissions in the score have been filled up in the proper spirit of veneration for the composer. M. Wilder, to whom the notion and successful realization of the performance are due, gives the following details of the history of this opera from its commencement, and of his arrangement of it for the stage:—The Goose of Cairo is not, as might be supposed, says

M. Wilder, one of Mozart's youthful works; on the contrary, it dates from the most fertile and brilliant period of his career, the period which witnessed the birth of Figaro's Hochzeit, Don Juan, and Die Zauberflöte. Written in the year 1783, the place of this opera is between Die Entführung aus dem Serail (1782) and Figaro's Hochzeit (1786). Mozart, who unfortunately was doomed to die at the age of thirty-five, was then about twenty-eight. In addition to a large number of symphonies, sonatas, &c., he had already written a dozen operas, among which were Idomeneo and Die Entführung. It will no doubt interest the reader to learn under what circumstances Mozart composed The Goose of Cairo, and I may therefore be allowed to describe them. I will do so in the form of a notice intended to be placed at the head of the score. After twice travelling through a large portion of Europe, Mozart settled at Salzburg. The Archbishop had attached him to his person with a salary of 400 florins. In this small provincial town, where the great artist was exposed to the abuse and insults of his master, who treated him worse than the meanest of his servants, Mozart felt his genius was being suffocated. It was, therefore, with childlike joy that he received the command to follow his master to Vienna, which place he reached in March, 1781.

Vienna was then the true home of art. Joseph II. who was passionately fond of music, had collected in his capital an Italian operatic company which was unrivalled. The writers of that time are perfectly unanimous as to its excellence. "Our operatic company," says one of them, "is truly superior to all others in Germany and Italy, for, during his journey through the peninsula, the Emperor visited all the large theatres, and engaged the most celebrated virtuosos. It is not uncommon to find our second and third singers leaving Vienna to appear as prime donne in Italy." In addition to the opera buffa, Vienna possessed a second theatre. This was first devoted to German music. Unfortunately, there was a deficiency of good composers and good singers, and, with the exception of a few national works, translations formed the staple entertainment of the establishment. For a short time, Mozart restored its fortunes by his Entführung aus dem Serail. The reader may easily imagine what powers of attraction such a place as Vienna exerted upon the genial young composer. He trembled at the mere thought of having to return to Salzburg. But how could he avoid the sad necessity? Leopold Mozart, his father, attached great value to the Archbishop's four hundred florins, and dreaded his son's being exposed to the vicissitudes of life. He feared, too, that the fact of Wolfgang's breaking with his master might endanger the situation which he himself, Leopold, held at the Court of Salzburg. Under these circumstances, Mozart's permanent stay in Vienna became an exceedingly difficult problem. But the Archbishop's brutality succeeded in solving it. Most profoundly wounded in his dignity as a man and an artist, Mozart listened only to the voice of his just indignation. He bade farewell to the choleric Archbishop, and knocked at the hospitable door of C. Weber, whose daughter he was afterwards to marry. He now was settled in Vienna. After he had provided for his livelihood by lessons and concert-speculations, he turned his attention principally to the stage. He first thought of the national theatre. This was natural, as there were neither rivals nor any other serious obstacles in the way; besides, he could refer to the success of his previous work (Die Entführung). It appears from his correspondence that he had in his possession for some time a piece entitled Rudolph von Habsburg. He proposed, also, getting some one to translate a comedy of Goldoni's, Il Sercioro di due Patroni, but the German theatre was at its last gasp, and the Emperor had already condemned it to death. There was, therefore, nothing but the Italian theatre left.

Mozart's most ardent wish was to write an opera buffa. Despite his Germanic descent, his taste drew him to Italian art, for we must not forget that, though, as the composer of Die Entführung and Die Zauberflöte, he is the real founder of the German musical drama, we behold in him more especially the impersonification and last representative of the great school of men like Pergolesi, Paisiello and Cimarosa. Unfortunately, he had many obstacles to overcome in order to attain his end. The great thing to be first done was to overcome the prejudice entertained by Joseph II., who did not value Mozart's dramatic talent very highly, and did not care much for Die Entführung. The next thing was to conquer the intrigues of Salieri, who was greatly respected in Vienna, and enjoyed the especial favors of the Emperor. Finally, it was necessary to obtain a book. Being exceedingly anxious about the matter, Mozart wrote, on the 7th May, 1783, a letter to his father, complaining that he had read at least a hundred Italian pieces, without finding a single one of any use. For the moment there was nothing to be done with the Abbé da Ponte, who had promised him a piece, as the Abbé was then busily engaged on a libretto for Salieri. Mozart commissioned his father, therefore, to come to some arrangement about a book with Varesco. If he said, Varesco consented to write one, they might work together during Mozart's stay in Salzburg. In the month of July, Mozart really did set out for Salzburg, as he had married a short time previously, and wished to present his wife to his father. He found Varesco already at work, and carried away with him the first act and the plot of the two others to Vienna.

In his ecstasy in finally obtaining a libretto, Mozart set about his task with feverish eagerness. His ideas flowed easily and abundantly, and the first act was speedily finished. It was now that he thought over, for the first time, the whole plan of the piece, and became aware of the defects inherent to it. On the 6th December, 1783, he wrote to his father to say how pleased he himself was with the numbers he had completed, and what a pity it would be were such music never performed, as might be the case, if Varesco would not consent to certain indispensable alterations in his book. This letter gave rise to a long correspondence between father and son. In it, Mozart detailed the subject of The Goose of Cairo, suggested the necessary alterations, and spoke very sensibly of the value of the book. Unfortunately, Varesco was, to judge at least from Mozart's letters, an obstinate man, difficult to manage, and appeared moreover to be firmly convinced of the great merit of his work; in a word, he opposed every important alteration. The unhappy composer was in despair. Luckily for him, Da Ponte had quarrelled with Salieri, and was ready to fulfil the promise he had formerly made Mozart, and thus The Goose of Cairo was forgotten for Figaro's Hochzeit, and locked up in a dusty press with other manuscripts condemned to oblivion. If the reader bear in mind the correspondence mentioned above, together with the date, 1783, which marks a new period in the development of Mozart's dramatic genius, he will easily believe that the fate to which the unfortunate score was subjected was something to be deplored. In worth, if we look away from the frame, The Goose of Cairo may take its place by the side of the master's best efforts. Happily, it was not lost. While the earthly remains of the poor great man were flung into a pit where they could never be found again, his manuscripts, carefully collected by his widow, passed into the hands of André, who purchased them en bloc for 1000 ducats. His successor, and the present owner of them, Herr André, music publisher at Offenbach, published The Goose of Cairo in 1861, and it was then I conceived the notion of producing it on the stage. Starting from the same point as Varesco's piece, with the plot of which I was acquainted through Otto Jahn's work, I constructed a completely new libretto, guiding myself conscientiously by the existing musical numbers, so that, for instance, the endings of the acts corresponded with the analogous situations in the original book. As most of the numbers written by Mozart, especially the concerted ones, were out of proportion for a one-act opera, I thought I ought to extend my frame, and make the opera in two acts. It is true that this plan compelled me to interpolate in The Goose of Cairo three pieces not in the original work. Mozart wrote neither an overture nor an introduction, but at the very time he was busy on The Goose of Cairo he had an idea of setting to music an old opera, Lo Spaso delusa. He soon abandoned the project, but this overture and an introductory quartet, possessing, by a remarkable chance, a close resemblance to the first scene of The Goose of Cairo, were completed and fully scored.* This overture and this quartet occupied naturally the place of the absent introduction. Isabella's rondo, also scored, I found in one of the master's scores, of which the title and book are lost. The final trio (No. 6) concluded the first act of an opera by Bianchi, La Vilanella rapita, which was produced in 1785 at Vienna, and for which Mozart, like a terrible spendthrift, composed this delicious number. After doing thus much, I required a talented musician well versed in classical music, and impressed with the veneration due to the works of genius. Mozart's mode of composing is well-known. As he himself relates in one of his letters, when he was travelling, at table, out walking, or unable to sleep in bed at night, a stream of musical ideas kept flashing through his brain. Such as pleased him he retained in his memory, to work up subsequently. He seldom forgot them. He worked, therefore, always mentally at first, and did not take up his pen until his idea was quite matured. He then began his score; wrote the parts and the bass; and, reserving for a future period the task of fully scoring his work, contented himself with scoring certain passages and ritornelles, marking repeats, &c. This is the shape in which The Goose of Cairo has come down to us. A talented young musician, M. Charles Constantin, conductor at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, and a pupil of the composer, A. Thomas, undertook the delicate task of completing Mozart's instrumentation.

* These fragments were published by Herr André simultaneously with The Goose of Cairo.

Marvellous Musical Invention.

(From the Home Journal, Oct. 9.)

* * * Electricity is but in its infancy; its mission has not been half fulfilled. Constant experiment is teaching the student new discoveries of its usefulness, and has led to the latest and unexpected purpose to which it has just been put—that of producing music, such as no human agency can accomplish.

The manner in which the idea of this new invention occurred to the inventor is not devoid of interest. It was first suggested to him by noticing the operation of the telegraph apparatus in the back office of Messrs. Steinway & Sons' warehouses, in Fourteenth-street. Mr. Eugene Trastour de Varano, a native of New Orleans, now residing in this city, and a gentleman well-known in musical circles as a gifted pianist, as well as the author of a very successful work on the "Rudiments of Music," had, a few days previous to his discovery, exhibited to Mr. William Steinway, certain plans, on which he was then engaged, the object of which was a system for teaching musical sight reading by machinery. A caveat was already obtained, but the system was not made public on account of certain contemplated improvements which the inventor had not perfected.

On the day in question, a clerk was transmitting telegraphic despatches from Steinway's warehouses, in Fourteenth street, to their factory on Fourth Avenue, when the attention of Mr. Trastour was attracted by the process. While looking on, it occurred to him that the up and down movement of the "arm" which holds the pen, was very similar to that of the motion of the human fingers when striking the key notes of a piano-forte. This analogy came to him like a flash of light. He seated himself near the apparatus, and was soon lost in the examination of its different parts. He was at last aroused from his deep thinking by Mr. Steinway, who tapped him gently on the shoulder, and remarked: "You look as if you had found an improvement on this instrument." Mr. Trastour was startled by the remark, yet it is to be supposed that Mr. Steinway little thought, at the moment, that his apparatus had just given birth to the idea of the Electric Automaton Piano Player, or Pianoautomaton, as it is called; which we will now describe to our readers.

The instrument to which this name has been given, is a long wooden box, of the length and width of the keyboard of a piano-forte. It is so constructed that it can be easily and quickly fastened above the keyboard of any piano-forte, by means of clamps. The box is provided with a crank, which sets in motion a magneto-electric apparatus contained within it. By introducing, in an aperture, made for that purpose, the paper upon which the musical composition is to be performed is written, or rather perforated, a series of axial bars protrude from underneath the box and, in striking the keys of the piano-forte, perform correctly the musical composition contained on the paper so introduced. The instrument can cause these axial bars to strike the key notes with four different degrees of strength—from the pianissimo to the fortissimo; it can gradually swell the sound, when necessary, and afterward diminish it in the same proportion; it can cause the axial bars to strike the key notes either with a legato or staccato touch, and can produce diminuendo and crescendo passages without the help of the pedals. Each instrument has a pedal attachment, which can be clamped to the piano. A wire, connecting this attachment to the box situated above the keyboard, enables the instrument to use the loud or soft pedals as either is needed.

The instrument to which the name of Organautomaton has been given, is similar to the Pianoautomaton in its construction, and is governed by the same principles. The only difference being that one is constructed so as to play on the single key board of the piano-forte, and the other to perform on the three keyboards of church organs. The pedal attachment of the one is similar to that of the other, only it is longer, and has more pedals to act upon.

The patent of the inventor covers three different kinds of instruments: one which contains within it a magneto-electric apparatus, and which is worked by a crank; another provided with a galvanic battery, and also worked by a crank; and last, but not least, a self-acting instrument, which performs alone, without any winding up, or any visible or apparent aid. In inserting the perforated paper in the aperture of this last instrument, it pushes a small lever, which, coming in metallic contact, completes the electrical circuit, and sets in motion a small electric machine, and the instrument thus plays by itself. When all the musical paper has passed through the aperture, the lever, being no longer held up, falls down by its own weight, and the electrical circuit being broken, the instrument stops of its own accord.

The most ingenious, as well as the important part of the invention, is the roll of sheet music containing the notes of the musical compositions to be performed by the instrument. In fact, this roll of paper is the soul and motor of the instrument. The different combinations which can be devised on it, can be made to produce effects of execution on the piano or the organ which no living artist could think of attempting. For example, the instrument can be made, in this manner, to run a chromatic scale in octaves, thirds or tenths, from the lowest to the highest note of the key board, with a velocity which would cause the whole scale to sound like the snap of a whip, although every note shall have been heard distinctly and clearly. In the same manner the instrument can be made to produce the same effect, as if four, six, eight, or more hands were performing. It will easily be understood, therefore, that the roll of sheet music for the instrument is the most important feature of the invention, and that its preparation will, necessarily, create a new branch of industry; a consideration which, commercially speaking, renders the invention one of general public interest.

As most of the masses, oratorios, hymns, operas, dances, and all new compositions will be arranged on rolls of paper prepared for the instrument, the income to be derived from the sale of the music alone will be large. The process of preparing the paper rolls is so simple, that the performance of a musical composition will cost less than engraving the notes on paper, as is ordinarily done, and the oldest music, therefore, be supplied at a lower rate than the present publications; and the instrument itself is so simple in its construction, that its price will enable every owner of a piano to purchase it.

The advantages of the invention will be better understood when one thinks of the number of churches throughout the country whose congregations have not the means of sustaining an organist, and whose organ is consequently silent; of the quantity of piano-fortes in our parlors which are dumb for want of a performer. This invention brings within the reach of the poorest church the facility of securing, for a trifling sum, the services of something more than a skilful organist, and to every parlor the possibility of continually possessing a most brilliant pianist.

The instrument will not be confined to a certain set of airs, like a hand-organ, or to a limited repertoire like a human artist, but will play, "at first sight," the most difficult pieces which may be procured, without any previous study, and without hesitation.

To the student it will be a great help, inasmuch as it will perform correctly, and in the requisite movement, those musical compositions which they may desire to learn. To the singer it will be indispensable in efficiently accompanying any of their songs.

For balls and parties, it may even be preferred to a living artist, on account of its mathematical correctness of time in performing quadrilles, polkas, and dances.

For churches it will prove an economy, so far as the organist is concerned, and a great acquisition, on account of its inexhaustible repertoire of voluntaries, masses, oratorios, and hymns; also for its unerring efficiency in sustaining a choir.

To the public it will be a source of general enjoyment, and a means of popularizing the appreciation of fine music, as it will perform any and every musical composition, with strict regard to all the shades, accents, signs, and movements marked by the composers, and not, as is now the case, according to the whims and fancies of the different performers. It will accustom the public ear to the correct execution of the different musical compositions, and will surely elevate the standard of musical criticism.

Taste can be reduced to certain rules: all ascending passages from grave to acute, should be played crescendo; those descending from acute to grave should be played diminuendo; certain notes should be played louder, others softer. As the instrument is susceptible of four shades of forte and piano, can play crescendo and diminuendo, can use both pedals, and especially, as the most delicate shades can be effectively regulated on the roll of perforated sheet music, it will easily be understood that "Trastour's Pianoautomaton" will not perform like a hand-organ, a music-box, or other mechanical apparatus, but will play with taste and feeling, and effectually imitate a living artist.

This invention will shortly be given to the public, and Mr. Trastour will have the honor of not only creating a revolution in the musical world, but will assuredly be entitled to rank among the ingenious inventors of the age.

Music Fancies.

When Leigh Hunt spoke of the strains of a bagpipe as representative of "the agonies of a tune tied to a post," he said, we are convinced, not only a new, but a true thing. There is a feeling and a sense in a piece of music which cannot be hurt or violated without protest; the melody exclaims on its own score against its tortures, and will appear to shrink, to wriggle, to sigh, and to moan desperately, under bad treatment. When a vagabond assails the quiet of a street with his clarinet, you can hear the miserable Italian airs quivering first a reproachful remonstrance, and then emitting abrupt and dismal petitions for release; but the fellow shows no mercy to "Casta Diva;" on the contrary, he pursues that unfortunate tune up and down the scale, and seems to wring its neck with a vicious shake at the finish. Why should we not have a Society for the Suppression of Cruelty to Tunes? What base uses are not those poor brain-children turned to? Did their originators ever intend them to assist (with a monkey) in bringing coppers into the greasy cap of an organ grinder? Would not a Christy minstrel or so satisfy the wretches? If there are necessities in the case we might slightly abate the principle, and license the hawking of "Poor old Jeff," although not without qualms for the degradation of the ebony Belisarius. As for brass bands and their atrocities, they deserve the treadmill. It is bad enough to hear a tune racked by a single inquisitor; but when a mob, armed with cornets, ophicleides, trombones, and cymbals, surround it, make it run the gauntlet, and finally tear it asunder, the act becomes a crime of unmitigated atrocity. The tune, say, is started, and allowed about five bars law. The cymbals, however, are fastened to its tail, and the creature is bewildered, and refuses to go further. Then comes the butchery: a kick from the trombone, a bayonet thrust from the cornet, and a knock on the head from the drum.

Tune cruelty is not confined to the streets. Murders are committed in the drawing-room, especially under cover of "variations." The victim is frequently executed amidst a roll of obstreperous notes, which drown even its dying voice, as did the cruel rataplan played beside the guillotine on which the French King was beheaded. But there are exceptions. For instance, when a sound musician prepares a melody for display, if his directions are fairly carried out the effect is not unpleasant—quite the contrary. He throws a colored light upon the picture, or he gives it a charm of distance, or he surrounds it with a new and a brilliant atmosphere, or he—treating it as though it were a beautiful woman—offers bouquets of notes, or spreads out a parterie of chromatic flowers through which it passes; but he never interrupts, disfigures, or destroys it. Take a set of Chopin's waltzes. Listen to—or watch rather—the lines which the music illuminates, growing into beautiful shapes, which are your own thoughts in part. Here is "emotion singing." Here are moods pensivo and gay, joyful and sorrowful, starting into a life of sound. Poor Chopin! what a diary may be read in his music! What hysterical vehemence of passion, what sad uncertainties, vague ambitions, exquisite sensitiveness, and an almost morbid delicacy one can detect in the Tarantelle! Nobody could dance to that dismal piece of hilarity; it is as melancholy as the hearse-like rattle, and the mysterious minor chanting of the "Marche Funèbre" which Chopin wrote for his own obsequies.

Goethe called architecture "frozen music." The expression was truer perhaps than he suspected. Dr. Hay some years ago broached a theory of harmony and form, in which there was a wonderful conjunction of mathematics and poetry, and the Parthenon was made out to be literally "frozen music," and its proportions discovered to have been regulated by relative proportions of the diatonic scale. The walls of Thebes rose and the towers built themselves up to the sound of the lyre of Orpheus. Pythagoras insisted that the universe was but a gigantic organ. "There's music in all things, if men had ears." The poets are never done with this image. They use it in a thousand ways, even to the description of a woman's face. "The mind—the music breathing from her face," wrote Byron of his Zuleika, and he thought it necessary to explain his meaning in a note. "I think," the poet interpreting himself says, "I think there are some who will understand it; at least they would have done had they beheld the countenance whose speaking harmony suggested the idea, for this passage is not drawn from imagination but memory—that mirror which affliction dashes to the earth, and looking down upon the fragments only beholds the reflections multiplied." Moore, commenting on the same line, tells us that Lovelace wrote "the melody and music of her face," and old Sir Thomas Browne has it that "there is music even in beauty."

The best index to character may be found in music. Of course the man who has no music in his soul cannot be made out on this plan, but we have excellent authority in the words which follow the well-worn quotation that such a person has no character at all. Notice how great authors supply their book creatures with invariably significant instruments. A strong boy has a fanny for a cornet, a shy lad will take to a fiddle. A boy has been known to deliberately select the triangle as his instrument, and after working it in the college band for years, brought it home to play upon in the bosom of his family at vacation. Dr. Johnson used to put his ear to the drone of a bagpipe, and expressed great pleasure at the sound. "This was a queer taste, but it was more curious that he should with such a taste have been able to say of music—"That it was the only sensual pleasure without vice." Imagine the sensuality of the bagpipes!

Bos. "Pray, sir, did you ever play on any musical instrument?"

Johnson. "No, sir, I once bought me a flageolet, but I never made out a tune."

The gentleman whose claim to be considered a German scholar rested upon the fact of his brother's acquaintance with the German concertina, appears to have had as clear a notion of the language as the lexicographer had of the "tune." It would seem as if he considered, when he "bought him" the flageolet, he also purchased the airs that were hidden within it. When the "pilot of the literary whale" mentioned that he was subject to nervous disturbances on hearing music, and could weep at it, "Sir," said the whale, "I should never hear it if it made me such a fool."

Music, we are told, can cure sickness. Vignuel De Marville relates a story of a gentleman of distinction suddenly seized by violent illness, and instead of a consultation of physicians, "he immediately called a band of musicians, and their band of violins played so well in his inside that his stomach became perfectly in tune, and in a few hours was harmoniously becalmed." Here is a hint. Suppose "I Puritani" could be substituted for a pill, not only to purge melancholy but measles; or "Il Ballo" given for a bolus?

Can music speak? We are afraid not, at least, not distinctly. A clever essay in the Fortnightly Review, some time since, maintained that a tune, of itself, was colorless and vague. "There are no definitely agreed-upon successions or combinations of sounds which necessarily recall certain clearly understood ideas to the mind. We cannot express love by a major third, or anger by a minor third, or describe the skies by arpeggios, or gardens or fields by a diminished seventh." We remember the unfortunate "eries of the wounded" in the "Battle of Prague," and shudder at representative pieces, and the strident clangor and drumming of war quadrilles at monster concerts. The famous "Songs without Words" seem troubled with an effort to record vague and indefinite emotions in the terms of music, and the struggle possesses a sort of plaintive interest for us; it is as though a spirit desired to take shape and appear to us, and was only permitted to make itself heard. If music had a distinct character of its own, sacred and profane pieces would exhibit an intrinsic difference when played, but as a fact they do not. Many negro melodies are of Church origin, and, strange to say, the once popular "Dandy Jim" is not a native of Carolina but of Italy, where it has positively done service in High Mass. The tunes, like people, mix in strange company. "Don Giovanni" quavers libertinism in strains which suggest a Gothic cathedral. Music, however, no matter how reduced, retains some of the angel, and "Bones" occasionally raises his tenor with absurd words to certain intervals, which serve as an incantation to sentimental ideas very different from those contained in the stuff written for him.—London Review.

"The Original Source of Gregorian Music."

BY JAMES FINN, ESQ.

(From the London Choir.)

It is no new idea to refer the music of primitive Christianity to an eastern origin; but with some persons it seems to be a question of how far eastwards we are to go in search of the source of traditional Church music.

The option in their minds seems to lie between the Hebrew and the Greek derivation.

Now, in respect to the historical propagation of Christian doctrine, as gathered from the "Acts of the Apostles," we might imagine that, while tenacious of traditions received in childhood, these traditions would run in the separate lines of their original nationalities, Grecian or Hebrew.

But I think it may be fairly concluded that in matters of religious custom (we are now considering that of music,) they did not feel themselves at liberty to follow one or other of these schools indiscriminately, as merely a matter of national taste.

First, with regard to the Hebrew converts. Let us imagine these believers, three thousand in one day, besides large numbers on other days, converted to the true and perfected faith in Jerusalem, gathered into communities and holding religious services, "singing hymns to Christ as a god," as Tacitus expresses it. Is it to be supposed that they would resort to the Grecian idol temple for musical airs or chants, and not rather to the glorious ceremonial worship of Jerusalem and the traditional airs received from their fathers? nay, more, would they not look to the type as far as possible, which their Divine Lord and Master followed when he and the disciples sang the Passover hymn before going out to the Mount of Olives?

I think there cannot be two opinions as to this class of the primitive Christians.

Next, with regard to the class derived from Gentile nations in Greece or Asia minor: those of Corinth, or "the seven churches," when they came to be formed into public assemblies for worship, and to have "customs" of their own (see I Cor. xi. 16), under stringent apostolical injunctions to "keep themselves from idols" (I John v. 21.) and to "abstain from all appearance of evil" (I Thes. v. 22), even to abstain from eating meat offered to idols, lest they should wound the weak consciences of the brethren (I Cor. viii. 12.) surely it is not to be believed that they would have recourse to the ceremonial worship of the Temple of Diana, or to immoral celebrations elsewhere for musical airs in which to "sing hymns to Christ as a god."

Having accepted the prophets and psalms of the Jews, to them they would naturally look for aid in all that could render their services delightful or attractive. They could not but be aware of the Hebrew origin of their creed and its primitive teachers. Before conversion, the religion of Jesus had been to them "foolishness," but after embracing the faith that was sufficient to nerve them to willing martyrdom for its sake, they could have had no school of music ready at hand for use so well adapted to their object as the Hebrew.

I conclude, then, that the Grecian converts neither resorted to melodies inseparably connected with the worship of devils, nor invented a religious music of new character for themselves.

With regard to European nations embracing Christianity, it seems to be included within the opinions above alluded to, that they were obliged to choose between Hebrew and Greek sources for their sacred melodies.

If it could be shown that they derived the new religion at second hand through the Greeks, and with it the "customs" and characteristics interwoven with it, their music might also have been of a Greek character.

But, inasmuch as from the day of Pentecost itself there were believers who were "strangers of Rome," and inasmuch as on the arrival of St. Paul at Appii forum, there were brethren from Rome to meet him, inasmuch, also, as very shortly afterwards there were "saints in Cæsar's household"—we are certainly not limited to that idea. The European Christians, then of Rome, and afterwards of other nations, evangelized from the Eastern countries, were not driven to a Greek derivation for "customs" or music in their assemblies or churches—they had an alternative between the Hebrew school of music and an indigenous school of their own country, whatever that might be.

Having that choice, the same reasons would apply to them for rejecting the contamination of idolatrous worship, mainly the same as that of the Greeks, as the Greeks had in their country—in relation to whom the Europeans were contemporaries, not disciples or successors.

In confirmation of this my belief, reference may safely be made to that mine of genuine evidence in religious feeling and practice, the Roman catacombs, where among the inscriptions and emblematic designs, we find everywhere allusions made to the incidents of Hebrew Scripture as "part and parcel of Christianity," nay, the very root of it, but nowhere any leaning towards Grecian mythology, or even Grecian historical events or persons.

Roman Christianity was, therefore, based upon Hebrew Christianity, and not derived through a Grecian channel; and if Gregorian Church music be derived from the Roman Church, Gregorian music would have no connection with a Grecian origin.

The same may be said of other European nations, as Spain, Scythia, or Britain, who received the gospel from Asia direct, not from Greece.

From the little we know of music among the classical Greeks, of their musical instruments, and especially of the character of their hymns for worship, it appears to be entirely of a light and florid character. We may confidently assert that the Gregorian music bears no resemblance whatever to it, while it does partake of the grave and lofty essentials of Hebrew ceremonial; and at this point of the consideration I may mention that among the fragments of Rabbinical sayings in our middle ages, collected by Buxtorf in his "Florilegium Hebræorum," there is a metrical saying to the effect—

—'what saith

the art of music among the Christians?"

Indeed I was stolen out of the land of the Hebrews."

This last line is an adaptation, such as particularly marks a Jewish character, of a phrase from the Bible narrative of Joseph in the Egyptian prison (Gen. xl. 15;) but it shows what impression, as a matter of taste, the cathedral services of the Christians made upon a learned Jew, without reference to religious doctrine, in the correspondency in style, if not identity of melody, existing between their solemn music and that of the ancient Hebrews.

The above observations have all been made by way of reasoning, without consideration of the intrinsic nature of music.

Mr. Macfarren argues that the ancient musical system of the Jews, "like those of all Eastern people, differed from the Gregorian system in the division of the scale into smaller intervals than semitones;" but in order to assign a Grecian origin to the Gregorian music it would be necessary to show—first, that the Grecian music was not likewise framed upon a system of smaller intervals than semitones; and secondly, that Grecian music was framed upon the same system in general as that named the Gregorian.

But what proof is there that "the Jewish musical system, like those of all Eastern peoples, differed from the Gregorian in the division of the scale into smaller intervals than semitones?"

In the ancient Jewish music still in use, although the minor mode is common, the intervals are not different from those of our scale.

Perhaps this was just the difference between Hebrew and other Eastern music. At any rate, it is unreasonable to assume without positive proof that the Jews divided the scale into smaller intervals, as the Arabs do. They have differed from all other Orientals in their system of vowels in grammar, and have also invented an elaborate system of accents, indicating niceties at once of punctuation and of musical phrasing—why then should they not have differed from them in their development of the science of music?

It is a fact that there are extremely ancient Hebrew melodies that have been from time immemorial sung in synagogues, which can be and have been reduced to staves, bars, and tones, according to our system and our scale, for modern practice, and I would recommend to the particular attention of Mr. Macfarren the collection of Sephardi synagogue music, edited by De Sola, together with the learned dissertation prefixed to the same.

For gratification of musical curiosity in a style not commonly known, that small volume well deserves attention; some of the airs there produced we have tested while in the East, and found them recognized as their own by Sephardi Jews of Jerusalem conversant only with their own synagogue melodies.

If such results can be produced by our notation from antique Hebrew composition in their hymns and canticles, most of which bespeak a period of high cultivation in the science of music, I confess that I have no difficulty in believing that the primitive Gregorian chants could have had their origin in Hebrew melodies such as the following:—

No. 1.

No. 2. SPANISH.

[The double bars have been inserted, so as to point out more clearly how easily this melody falls into the form of a double chant.]

The Hebrew synagogue music of the Sephardi section consists of plaintive or joyous airs traditionally preserved in connexion with their own definite hymns or anthems, and it must be remembered that Jews were settled in Spain before the Christian era, possessing their system of religious worship from the earliest times. It is very likely that they carried with them, as others had done to Babylon, the melodies used in the First Temple, "the Lord's song," which they would not sing for amusement of strangers. It is in the highest degree improbable that they would have allowed a single note to be altered, far less that they would have borrowed from either Greek or Christian. Indeed, they were unlikely to come into contact with Greeks at all. It is further to be remembered that Spanish synagogues in all countries still keep and use the melodies which their ancestors used in Spain more than three centuries ago, when they were banished thence, and some of them went back to Palestine.

The early Spanish Church music, say that of the Mozarabic liturgy, would probably furnish interesting illustrations of this subject.* It might be compared with the earliest of the Greek Church, and both with the old Hebrew music.

The result may be that all these, the Gregorian included, will be found to be tuneful daughters of a most venerable mother, namely, the Ritual of the Temple of Jerusalem, as ordered by David, or even of the Tabernacle, as ordained by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

* Cardinal Ximenes endowed a chapel at Toledo, expressly for keeping up this relic of national antiquity, just as there is an endowment in Milan Cathedral for preservation of Gregorian services. Possibly some of that Spanish music could still be brought to light.

Offenbach.

The name which at present is most widely celebrated throughout the theatres and concert rooms of Europe is unquestionably that of Offenbach. Wedding Music and the Drama together, after a fashion altogether unprecedented, he has produced a class of music, half-opera, half-burlesque, which belongs to himself alone. The burlesques of the old school are enlivened by popular airs or selections from the operatic stage, and the music is altogether of a light kind; but Offenbach when most in fun is most in earnest, and some of his best comical effects are brought about by elaborate concerted pieces, such as none of his predecessors would have dreamed of composing—save for the purposes of avowedly high art. A thorough master of melody and harmony, he has made them subservient to the spirit of grotesque humor, which preëminently characterizes the present age. We may almost call the middle of the nineteenth century the age of Offenbach.

Nor is the popularity of this most original genius confined to any class of the several communities which bear his creations with delight. No sooner has one of his masterpieces been produced at Paris than it is at once brought out at all the German capitals, to awaken the laughter and applause of everybody. Each of the works, on a large scale, which he has brought out of late, may be said to have marked an epoch. The effect of "Orphée aux Enfers" has not died out yet. After being performed on every stage of continental Europe, it has furnished quadrilles for the fashionable ball-room, tunes for the humble barrel organ, songs and choruses for the music hall. The people of the old world may truly be said to live and breathe Offenbach.

It is not enough to assert that this greatest of musical humorists is still in the prime of life and vigor. Each of his later works has been better than its predecessor, and the last, "La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein," brought out at the Théâtre des Variétés, the scene of his more recent triumphs, is the most successful of them all.

Jacques Offenbach was born at Cologne, on the 21st of June, 1819, and at the age of fourteen he became a pupil of the French Conservatoire. In 1847 he succeeded M. Barbereau as leader of the orchestra of the Théâtre Français, and at about the same time gave signs of a talent for composition, by setting to music the Fables of La Fontaine. These fables are, as a matter of course, committed to memory by every educated child in France, and, deriving a new charm from the music of Offenbach, they soon made their way through all the best circles of French society. Offenbach had also become celebrated as an artist on the violoncello. Nevertheless his career was then only just beginning, and his present fame dates from 1850, when he obtained the right to open the world-renowned Bouffes Parisiens. This theatre, erected in the Champs Elysées, at once became the rage of Paris; and, when summer had departed, and the brilliant Champs could be no longer visited, the hall in the Passage Choiseul, once named after M. Comte, became its winter home. The enterprising spirit of Offenbach has been fully commensurate with his genius: to secure vogue for his productions, he established competitions, offered rewards and prizes, and, in 1857-58, gave an impulse to his European fame by travelling to England and Germany with his own vocal company.

The pieces brought out on the opening of the theatre in the Champs Elysées, in the summer of 1850, were "Les deux Aveugles" and "Une Nuit Blanche." Thus was begun a long list of successes, among which we may name "Batnelan" and "Le Violoncelle," produced in the same year; "Tronib Aleazar," "Le Postillon en Gage," "Le Rose de Saint Fleur," "Le Financier et le Saretier," all produced in 1856; and "Croche Fer," brought out in 1857. These, which were opérettes of the lightest kind, were soon followed by "Les Baisers du Diable," a phantasmagoria in three tableaux, and then came the famous "Orphée aux Enfers," which drew crowds for three hundred successive nights, and furnished airs for the pianos of every fashionable drawing-room in Paris and London. Other popular works are "Le Chanson de Fortunio," "Le Pont des Soupirs," "Apothécaire et Perruquier," "Le Roman Comique," and "M. et Mme. Denis," the last in 1862.

In the season of 1864-65 Offenbach achieved a triumph in a theatre of larger dimensions, the Variétés, honorably known for many years as one of the chief temples to the comic muse. Here he brought out "La Belle Héloïse," an exquisitely humorous version of the old Homeric myth.

Offenbach's last and greatest success is "La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein," which was recently produced at the Variétés, and is now the grand sensation of Europe. It charms every ear and shakes all sides with laughter.—N. Y. Weekly Review.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

LEIPZIG. We translate the following from the Allgemeine Zeitung of Oct. 11.

"Yesterday the Gewandhaus re-opened its doors, which had been closed since Easter, and summoned the faithful to the first subscription concert of this winter's cycle. On entering, our eyes were agreeably surprised by a renovation of the hall, which has clad the familiar room in a new dress (Gewande), without marring its chaste simplicity, which held all distracting ornaments aloof. In the string quartet of the orchestra we were glad to see Concertmeister Dreyschock, recovered from long illness. The programme, for a Welcome, gave us first Weber's Overture to Euryanthe. Its tones swiftly, as with Faust's magic mantle, bore us away from the turmoil of everyday life into the moonlit realm of the Romantic, which Weber rules as most peculiarly his own domain; and the poetic, finely elaborated rendering of the work brought it before our inner sense with all the dreamed of majesty and splendor.

"The second part of the programme, on the other hand, led us upon true classic ground. It consisted of Beethoven's C-minor Symphony, the greatest Symphonic Poem, the richest in ideas, that ever was created. Here too the orchestra followed the bold flight of the master with penetrating understanding and an accuracy hardly to be surpassed. We would only hint to the trombones, that the fanfares of the Finale, powerfully as Beethoven makes them stand out, still belong always within the frame of a Symphony and therefore must be essentially distinguished from the crash of military Janissary music.

"Between the orchestral works two 'ghosts' appeared in solo performances: Fräulein Therese Seehofer, from Vienna, and Herr Henri Wieniawski, from St. Petersburg, both for the first time in the Gewandhaus. The former is a young singer of much promise, with an agreeable soprano voice, and already far advanced in its artistic cultivation. She won the applause of the assembly with the second grand aria of the Countess in 'Figaro's Marriage,' in which that Mozart-ish type of noble womanhood laments the loss of her youth's ideal in tones of such incomparably warm, deep feeling; and still more in the scena: 'Ocean, du Ungheuer!' from Weber's Oberon.—Herr Wieniawski, a Pole, who studied in Paris, and since 1860 has held the place of first solo violinist to the Emperor of Russia, counts among the renowned violin players of the present day. In Mendelssohn's Concerto he attested the excellencies of the Parisian school: elegance, grace, flexibility and tenderness of bowing, to a distinguished degree; equally obvious were the weak points of the same; the want of nerve and a sweetish manner without energy. Wholly contrary to German taste was his own Fantasia upon themes from Gounod's Faust: a virtuosic piece so superficial and tedious, so barren of all higher aspiration, the walls of the Gewandhaus perhaps never heard."

Another critic (in the Nachrichten) says of Wieniawski's Fantasia: "The motto of the tastefully renovated Gewandhaus, freshened up with new color: 'Res severa est verum gaudium,' should have been covered with a curtain during the performance of that composition."

A concert has been given by Professor Mulder, at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, in aid of the Cathedral Building Fund. The pieces performed were: Overture to "La Chasse du jeune Henri" Méhul; Paganini's air from "Le Nozze," Mozart, and fragment from the fifth act of "L'Africaine," Meyerbeer, sung by Mme. Lucca; duet from "Don Juan," sung by Mme. Lucca and Herr Verger; rondo brilliant in E flat major for pianoforte, played by Herr E. Pauer; and overture to "Le Siège de Corinthe," Rossini. Mme. Lucca was greatly applauded, and, in consideration of the alacrity with which she gave her services, has been presented with the honorary freedom of the City.

The following works were performed at a concert lately given in the Dreifaltigkeitskirche at Worms, Germany: "Overture to St. Paul," Mendelssohn; air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," from "The Messiah," Handel; prelude and fugue for organ, and sacred song, S. Bach; "Ave Maria," Schubert; recitative and final chorus from the first part of "The Creation;" "Ave Verum," Mozart; "Mit Würd' and Hoheit," from "The Creation;" duet and chorus from "Elijah," Mendelssohn; variations for the organ, Hesse; air from "St. Paul," Mendelssohn; and the "Hallelujah Chorus," from "The Messiah," Handel. The vocal solos were entrusted to Mme. Peschka-Leutner, Herren Hill and Ruff. The organ pieces were executed by Herr Lux.

The musical feuilleton of the now journal Süddeutsche Presse, which appeared on the 1st inst., is edited by Richard Wagner, who has given up the idea of expounding his theories in a special journal of his own.

Foreign journals assert that Wagner's comic opera, "Hans Sachs," which was to have been given at Munich on the anniversary of the wedding-day of the composer's "kingly friend," will be withheld, the work being just six hours long.

Simon Sechter, court organist and professor of the Vienna Conservatoire, died recently in that capital, at the age of seventy-nine. He was one of the most learned contrapuntists of this century, and has left a number of compositions. He enjoyed much reputation as a teacher, Thalberg, Vieuxtemps, Pauer and Doehler being numbered among his pupils. Schubert intended to study under Sechter, but his too early death prevented him.

The interest excited by the recent disinterment of Schubert's instrumental compositions, and the knowledge that a mass of manuscripts yet remain in Vienna, says the London Athenæum, have led to the departure of a known amateur, with a professor, for the Austrian capital, expressly for the purpose of research and examination. There has been no such treasure unearthed in our time.

Revivals of Gluck's "Armida," "Alceste," and "Iphigenia in Tauris" are announced as forthcoming during the winter season at Berlin.

The Saturday Review thus adverts to Ludwig Nohl's "Life of Beethoven." "The life of Beethoven is a subject of which the world seems never to tire, so numerous and important are the contributions made to it almost annually. Herr Nohl, known as a high authority on music in general, and as the biographer of Mozart in particular, is probably as well qualified for the task as any living man, unless it be the American Thayer, whose extraordinary diligence and knowledge of the subject are amply recognized by Nohl himself. The principal claim of the latter would seem to consist in his more elaborate investigation of the history of Beethoven's youth, which he considers to have been comparatively neglected by his predecessors, and which is certainly much less known than the painful history of the composer's latter days. He has collected a vast amount of detail, little of which can be regarded as irrelevant; his style is clear and fluent, the leading circumstances are ably narrated, the illustrations judiciously introduced, the biographer's own observations sensible and appropriate; and on the whole, whether destined to be ultimately superseded by Thayer's or not, it cannot be doubted that this Life of Beethoven will obtain a large and deserved measure of success. The two volumes now published bring the work down to 1814."

To condense our German notes—Herr Joachim has been playing at Hamburg; M. Rubinstejn at Leipsic. The four artists led by Herr Becker, who make up what is called "the Florentine Quartet," have given performances during the past "bath season" with success. A travelling orchestra is going the round of the principal cities, headed by Herr Bilsch, who, adopting an English title, advertises "monster concerts," with an orchestra of only sixty performers. Concerts have been and are being organized in aid of the Freiligrath Fund. The one at Darmstadt, the other day, was more than usually productive. Herren Brahms and Joachim are about to give concerts in company at Vienna next month. A new Philharmonic Society is to be founded in Berlin. While people interested or disinterested, as may be, are blowing up rumors of war between France and Prussia, one of the most redoubtable French military bands, which of late has been heard at Aix-la-Chapelle, Düsseldorf, Elberfeld, and other towns of the district, to every one's satisfaction, gave a concert the other evening in the noble Gürzenich room at Cologne, and was received in the most cordial fashion conceivable. A pianoforte "monster" concert, calling itself historical, was the other day given in the City of the Three Kings by M. Mortier de la Fontaine. The programme consisted of twenty pieces of music, ranging between the days of Dr. John Bull and the Abbé Liszt.—Athenæum.

POSTHUMOUS WORKS OF MENDELSSOHN. We translate from the Signale: "Mendelssohn's son, the young Dr. Carl Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who lives in Heidelberg, having been appointed Professor of History there, has been resting from his arduous labors for some weeks in Baden-Baden. He is at present occupied with the publication of a second series of the works left in manuscript by his illustrious father. The first of these, the Trumpet Overture, in C, (composed in 1826,) has recently appeared as op. 101; and others will soon follow. The first to be expected is a new book of 'Songs without Words,' composed between 1841 and 1845, that is to say in his last period. Next will come a posthumous Symphony, the so-called 'Reformation Symphony,' in D minor, written for the Festival of the Reformation in 1830 and at that time performed in Berlin and London. We have furthermore to expect a set of Etudes and a Piano Sonata (composed in 1827), besides a funeral March for wind instruments, which Mendelssohn wrote in 1836 for the funeral of Norbert Burgmüller. This beautiful March, arranged for orchestra, has been performed in Baden-Baden, exciting a lively interest among the friends of music.

An important posthumous work by Schubert has been published by Spina, of Vienna—the cantata of "Lazarus." It is planned on the scale of a full Oratorio, but only two parts are completed; the composer did not live to write further than the death bed, the house of mourning, and the grave. The grief of Jesus—the awe and glory of the miracle, are wanting. That which exists, however, shows Schubert's genius in its highest form; exceeding in sublimity, and equalling in originality and beauty, the finest portions of his Mass in E flat. In "Lazarus," however, as elsewhere, is to be felt his tendency to prolixity; arising probably from a want of opportunity to hear his compositions executed. The Athenæum says it is impossible to perform that wonderful fragment as it stands, but a selection of half a dozen numbers may be made with ease.

Paris

The San Francisco Music Monthly translates and condenses from the Paris Guide the following account of the Orphéon singing schools:

"The Orphéon furnishes to the youth of the Communal schools instruction in the elements of music, and by making them acquainted with the beauties of the best poetry, and revealing to them the primordial laws of harmony, cultivates the ear, and teaches them to speak their language with a purer pronunciation. There they acquire the taste for elevating recreations, and learn above all, how from the union of voices, may spring the union of hearts. For, at the Orphéon, all classes meet together—masters and workmen, townsmen and soldiers, rich and poor, peasants and citizens;—all liberal minds are interested in this useful institution, as yet hardly thirty years old. It is after the Liedertafel, of Germany and Switzerland, that the Orphéon has been modeled.

"The first German Liedertafel was founded at Berlin, in 1808, by the musician Zelter, assisted by Goethe; and another poet, none other than Béranger, contributed to the success of the Orphéon by proposing B. Wilhem as Singing Master in the schools of mutual instruction, when in October, 1818, the study of music was introduced into them. It was not until 1835, however, that the Municipal Council of Paris, ordered the introduction of singing into the Communal schools. Three years later, singing was regularly taught in all the universities.

"There remained the working classes, both at Paris and in the departments. At the suggestion, and under the eye of Wilhem, M. Hubert, an excellent professor, opened, in 1835, in the Rue Montgolfier, a course of vocal music for working people, and the pupils of these evening schools were able, at the end of a few months, to sing in chorus. This first success led to the opening of similar schools at the Halle aux Draps, the Rue de Fleurus, the Rue d'

Argenteuil, and elsewhere; and to-day, according to official documents, there are in France, 3,243 choral societies, numbering 147,500 singers.

"The Orphéon had thus, at its disposition, hundreds of tenor and bass voices to reinforce and complete the choruses of our Communal schools.

"The more the public performances were multiplied, the more clearly manifest became the interest felt in the cause of the Orphéon. In 1852, the functions at first discharged by B. Wilhem, and afterwards by M. Hubert, devolved upon the distinguished composer, M. Ch. Gounod. This eminent musician handed in his resignation in 1860, and the Orphéon, continually growing in prosperity, was then divided into two sections; that of the left bank of the Seine under the direction of M. Francois Bazin, and that of the right, under M. Jules Pasdeloup. M. Hubert was appointed inspector of the Communal schools on the right bank, and M. Foulon of those on the left.

"Such is, in brief the history of the establishment and progress of the Orphéon.

"Every Thursday evening, the adult pupils receive a lesson from their director, and, every Sunday afternoon, adults and children meet together to repeat the choruses. The division under the charge of M. F. Bazin meets at the Sorbonne; and the division of the right bank of the Seine has hitherto met in the hall of the Grand Orient Rue Cadet, but will soon be obliged to move.

"Every spring there is an exhibition of the progress made, at which, 1,200 chosen pupils, sing before the Prefect of the Seine and the Superintending Committee, the new pieces which they have learned. Their repertoire is very rich, for our best composers take pleasure in adding to it every day. Adolphe Adam, Halévy, M. Ambroise Thomas, Félicien David, Ch. Gounod, Fr. Bazin, and other masters have furnished for it fine choral compositions.

"Thanks to their directors, our Orphéonists cultivate by turns Pergolesi and Lesueur, Handel and Rossini, Gluck and Mendelssohn, Gretry and Weber, Mozart and Schubert, the old masters and the new, the Classical and the Romantic school."

A foreign critic writes: "The reprise of L'Elisir d'Amore, at the Theatre Italien, has recently been the principal musical feature in Paris. Of course, Adeline Patti was the Adina, and certainly it is one of her most finished and exquisite impersonations—perhaps, indeed, never so faithfully and bewitchingly sustained. And this may be averred in spite of the powerful reminiscences of Mme. Persiani, the original, Mme. Frezzolini and Mme. Bosio. Nothing more piquante, more graceful and refined, more coquettish and more truthful to nature has been witnessed on the operatic boards. As for the singing, it is inimitable throughout, and is in all probability the greatest vocal achievement of Mlle. Patti, who was well supported by Signor Gardoni in the part of Nemorino and by Signor Scalone in Indramont. Signor Agnesi played Serjant Belcore.

A short opera, "The Bride of Corinth," by M. Duprato, will be shortly produced at the Grand Opéra.

ROME.—A private letter to a gentleman in this city (says the San Francisco Music Monthly) criticizes Liszt's new Oratorio, as follows:

"On the 6th of July last, at 8½ p.m., there was given in the Sala Dantea the Commendatore F. Liszt's Oratorio of 'Christ,' with the accompaniment of a full Orchestra of 130 artists.

"The merits of the composition and its acceptability to the audience may be guessed at from the following facts: ten rehearsals were found necessary to prepare for the performance—(this shows the inequality of the parts); and when at last performed, the hearers showed the greatest irritation, and the evening ended in uproar and tumult. Many of the audience even demanded their money back.

"The fault of all this was thrown on the sopranos and altos (who were boys) and, in accordance with somewhat novel ideas of justice, they were deprived of their pay. During the rehearsals, entire satisfaction; at the performance, quite the contrary.

"The fault was not with the boys, but with the character of the composition. Liszt would do well to play the pianoforte, on which instrument he cannot be surpassed. We might even say, without hesitation, that he is the only one who possesses the art of playing on the piano; but he ought to abandon the attempt at composing for voices, unless he wishes to become the laughing-stock of Europe.

"There are many utterly ignorant of music who run after him, because of his renown as a pianist, and who one day will be obliged to confess their error. Public opinion cannot be suppressed; it will make itself known. Neither is it given to man to be perfect in everything. Liszt may run his fingers over the key-board; he possesses the mechanical part of music, but it does not follow that he can compose for voices.

"These two different branches are reached by different paths. Neither one of them supposes the other. The real scientific part of music, and especially that which regards the human voice, Liszt does not possess; and his works prove this to all unprejudiced hearers."

The writer says, elsewhere:

"The 'Sala Dantesca' is a hall here at which are given concerts, both vocal and instrumental, in order to dupe foreigners, and pocket a little cash.

"Old compositions, baptized by the name of this or that school, and assigned to any century, are performed; and to this amusement is given the name of 'Historical Concerts.' That you may know where we stand in the matter of vocal composition, it is only necessary to state that they have lately performed a piece of vocal music by Liszt!"

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 9, 1867.

Draping the Flag.

Saturday, November 2, 1867.

Oh, Flag! that o'er my quiet home
Has often floated, now I bind
On thee a mournful badge of woe,
As thus I give thee to the wind.

In hours of joy and glowing pride
I oft have flung thee broadly out,
Seeming to hear the rallying cry,
The bugle call, the victor's shout.

Yet ever, 'mid thy stripes and stars,
I saw the hero's life blood stream,
As from rebellion's hands were torn
These colors in the death fire's gleam.

Now, purified by blood and tears
From the dark blot of slavery's stain,
I ne'er had thought to gaze once more
Upon thy folds with bitter pain.

Yet soon with tears thy banner broad
Was closely bound by mournful band,
When the whole world with us deplored
The Leader, Father of our Land.

Again amid thy folds there floats
The mournful sign of household grief;
(Even so slight a token seems To wounded hearts a fond relief.)

Oh, Flag, thou art embalmed by tears,
And sanctified by Heroes' fame,
Yet on the record thou dost watch
None higher stands than ANDREW'S name.

Droop, then, 'mid thousand other signs
Which signal through our land to-day
What heavy loss befel the State
When in his prime he passed away.

Not passed away; his well earned fame
Shall with his country's banner be Entwined; to each true heart the sign
Of Faith and Hope and Liberty.

—Transcript.

W.

Music in Boston.

Mr. L. F. HARRISON'S first concert, last Monday evening, brought back to us Madame PAREPA-ROSA, and her husband, with Signor FERRANTI, and for a new and singular attraction the pianist whom we all thought so wonderful twenty years ago, LEOPOLD DE MEYER. It was the Parepa troupe somewhat shorn of its old proportions, and without an orchestra, so that there was no particular propriety in styling it a "Grand" Concert. But the Music Hall was remarkably well filled, and the favorites of two years past were very cordially welcomed. Mme. Rosa's cheerful, generous presence still bespoke the favor, which her noble voice and song confirmed. The voice was as clear, as pure, as all-sufficing as before, and the delivery as perfect; only at times, in stronger passages, it sounded a little hard, and in the strength we missed something of the old sweetness; not so at all in the mezza voce, which was singularly beautiful and even, with all her artistic fineness, certainty and ease of execution. We wished the selections had been better; they were mostly of the very ordinary English ballad kind:—"Tripping through the meadows," by Molley, set down as "new," but merely another specimen of that never new "Five o'clock in the morning" school, which sells so well and employs so many manufacturers in England;—a French Romance: "Si tu savais," by English (Irish) Balfe; a ballad or two more for encores,—all of course sung with spirit, and captivating to the less musical part of an audience. The one good thing was the little Duet: "Crudel, perchè finora," from Mozart's Figaro, which she sang with Ferranti.

Equally ordinary and without claim upon really musical ears and feelings were the violin selections of our friend Carl Rosa, whose very presence always wins one's sympathy, and whose playing this year, as we intimated before, by its greater evenness and smoothness and the absence of forced tone, shows the good influence of a more quiet, settled life. But beautiful and searching as were the tones, and fine the execution, one expects from such an artist something quite different from mere Bellini Souvenirs and fantastical Fantasias on themes from the Freyshütz.

But the object of most curiosity was the piano virtuoso, our old friend DE MEYER. As he hastened upon the stage, hat and gloves in hand, bowing and smiling, greatly changed by years, we knew him more by the fire of the eyes and by a certain vornehm air, than by anything else. Seated at the piano, the old ways and motions, the characteristic touch, so nervous, and in softer passages beautifully clear and limpid, the eccentric dash and energy, the wilful and superfluous force thrown into the accent of a single note; the exciting promise of now and then a marked opening and then the wandering away into indefinite prolixity of ornamental passage work (for all his pieces were of his own composition); but all the time an individuality, a mingled sense of a once fine but fitful fire and grotesqueness, brought back the man. He is still a remarkable player, but not what he was. Yet there is enough individuality about it to make it (for a while at least) interesting. If he would only play good music! But we suppose the virtuoso tendency, too long indulged in, becomes at last an unconquerable fatality, a sort of nightmare spell paralyzing the very will that would return. He did, to be sure, on being recalled, play a familiar thing of Chopin; you of course recognized the features, and yet half doubted them, so little was there of the Chopin soul. For the rest, his own "Depart et Retour" was delicate and tender, although somewhat commonplace, in the first part, and fiery in the second; and his Norma Fantasia, opening with a really stately transcription of the Druid march, soon began to wander, automatically, up and down the keys in thin conventional bravura, brilliant, but bringing no new thought, only at times starting by a fit of fiery accent. The Steinway piano, extremely sweet in tone when softly or moderately played, jingled as if taxed beyond its power in the strong passages.

The rosy, rollicking, rich-voiced Ferranti, put to it for new buffo songs, could only put us off with third-rate ones. Balfe's "Postilion" has not genius, without which fun is weariness; and that crying, scolding air from Fioranti's "Columella," relies on the quick, angry reiteration of the word "Femmine! femmine!" for any witty point it has, while the boo-hoo-ing was too buffoonish for an artistic concert. In short the Concert, as a whole, was not artistic, fine as the execution was, of course, with such superior artists. In place of Orchestra, there were Organ pranks at beginning and end by Mr. Thayer, and rather dry piano-forte accompaniment by Mr. G. W. Colby.

The second of the five Parepa concerts takes place this evening, and the third to-morrow (Sunday), when we look for a programme at least worthy of a week day.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The habits of a fortnightly paper compelling us to go to press upon the very Thursday of the concert, we cannot report yet of the first one. We can only speak from our knowledge of the programme (how rich it is, how well contrasted in its two parts, we have shown in our last) and of the rehearsals; and we doubt not we shall be able to say in our next that it did not disappoint the glowing hopes of the unusually large and generous subscription audience. We know pretty well, too, how fine a surprise the public will have experienced in the beautiful tenor voice and the true musical spirit of the young member of the Harvard Association, the last graduate taken into its ranks, the sweet college singer of a year ago, who now makes his debut in his native city, where he proposes to devote himself to the best classical (including Oratorio) music, Mr. GEORGE L. OS-GOOD.

To the full effect of that Dedication Overture (op. 124) of Beethoven especially, as well as of the "Jupiter" Symphony, the Gade "Highlands" "Overture" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, we do need a greater force of strings in our Orchestra. The musical means are not so great as the musical heart of Boston. But let the heart continue earnest and the means will come. Surely, a public, which gives nearly thirteen hundred season subscribers for eight purely classical Symphony concerts, deserves to have a noble Orchestra! And this large list has cost scarcely any effort; the simple knowledge that the good plan of pure programmes would be persevered in, and that the nucleus of the right audience was guaranteed beforehand in the very character of the Association that provides the concerts, has proved enough, as was anticipated, to draw the real music-lovers in such numbers. Verily we have not our fair share of good classical violin and 'cello players here, when larger cities, which abound in them, show so much less of the right sort of appetite. We are sure, there is room in Boston for a dozen first-rate orchestra musicians in the string department, including another fine Quartet for Chamber Concerts; and, with a little patience, they would find support here. The higher kind of occupation for such will steadily go on increasing; those who come, if they are competent, can take the first places, not a few of which are just now vacant.

The second concert (Nov. 21) reverts to last year's plan of programme—instead of two Symphonies, one Symphony and a Concerto. Part I. Cherubini's Overture to Medea (new); a Bacharia, sung by Mrs. CARY; Mozart's Concerto for two pianos, played by Messrs. LANG and PARKER. —Part II. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony (B flat); Songs by Mrs. Cary; Overture to Oberon. The Symphony in the third Concert will be by Haydn.

The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY are rehearsing Mendelssohn's 32nd Psalm, with selections from "Solomon," &c., for the Saturday evening, and "Samson" for the Sunday evening, after Thanksgiving. We are happy to learn that Mr. George L. Osgood is engaged for the tenor solos in the "Messiah" at Christmas time.

Shall we be a Musical People?

The following appeared some months since in the leading Methodist journal of this city, Zion's Herald. We must confess much sympathy with the ideas expressed in it, and it is certainly hopeful when Methodists begin to entertain them.

The love of music has become so widespread and so deep among us, that henceforth the divine Art must be counted among the vital interests of this people. Music must enter largely into the education of freemen. To love freedom and to trust to that as the very soul and principle of all our institutions, the keystone of the arch of all political and social order, and yet to neglect the culture of the ideal arts,—especially that art which is the most ideal, the most free, the most spiritual, and the most sympathetic of the Arts, the Art of Tones,—why, a great people might as well hope to live and realize true liberty without religion. The instinct of liberty in the individual, the pursuit of one's own pleasure (what he fancies his own life,) will always be more or less in conflict with the restraints of general order; freedom of thought, the free play of the inquiring and insatiable intellect will call in question every creed and system; the genial element in human nature will ever prove too strong for unæsthetic diet. Positive legal enactments, positive forms of religion, moral prohibitions can do much, can at least preserve a certain outward decency and show of order; but they cannot satisfy the great thirst of the soul, which is for a real taste of the divine life, of heavenly freedom, harmony and beauty even here in this world, amid these mortal cares and struggles, with and through as well as in spite of the natural man.

For, after all, our creeds, our politics, our social ambitions and distinctions, our very pursuit of the outward means of life, divide us: not even religion, in any recognized outward form or organization, can be said truly to unite men; yet the great inmost yearning of the devout soul is for unity, to be made one, consciously and freely, with the Life that is in God. Now in a republic, more than under any system, the free play which there is for every sort of competition, the "free fight" (to borrow a slang term) of individualities, the rush and scramble for distinction, and for wealth, the absence of the old paternal tenderness of governments providing for the children play things, beautiful amusements and surroundings, galleries of Art, parks, etc., makes it particularly indispensable to the whole social education that we promote in every way the culture of the Beautiful. It is not enough that we are taught right moral principles; we must form a taste for what is good and true and beautiful; a man's tastes mould him by a more unintermittent, unseen, silent pressure than even the convictions of his mind or traditions from without, or conscience from within. Let the American people grow up with a sincere taste for harmony and beauty, taste for Art, for Music, in the highest sense; let them learn through Art the meaning of the word genial, and in this culture we shall have the silent, sure corrective of so much that is violent, obtrusive and uneasy, so much that is prosaic, hard, pretentious, egotistic, in our national character. Sainthood is beautiful, heroism is beautiful; but they are exceptional also, they are sublime, and all cannot be sublime. But the sense of the beautiful in Art (and that is sure to quicken the sense of beauty in nature and in character), tends insensibly to round off the sharp corners of our offensive democratic individuality, to make us forget ourselves, to supply the unseemly lack of reverence which has been charged upon us, to fill us with the instinct of harmony, good order and good manners. Taste is conscience absorbed into the very nerve and fibre of one's life; with a sincere taste for what is beautiful, it is less easy to offend.

Our people, pre-occupied so long with the first cares of laying the foundations of their political and social fortune, were slow to recognize the need of æsthetic culture. Religion, politics and business—these were the only interests we dared to be in earnest about. But Art, the culture of the love of the Ideal, had to come in to keep these from becoming acrid and unendurable. Mere amusement, mere play without art or beauty, soon sinks to the bestial; we must believe in play, believe in amusement and in joy, as we do in the soul itself; we must believe in the senses if we would have the senses minister to the soul; and to believe thus we must have Art for a mediator; for Art shows us, sings us the Ideal in forms speaking to and through the senses. Art reconciles the spiritual with the material. Our people are becoming alive to this thought. There is, we verily believe, a great awakening among us to the need, the value, the divine influence of Art. A great activity in all the walks of Art is developing in this utilitarian people. Especially do we seem smitten of late with a love, or at any rate a strong desire, for that which is at once the most ideal and the most popular of the Arts, Music.

It would be presumptuous to call ourselves as yet a musical people, in the full sense, for instance, that the Germans are, or that the Italians were. But the vigor with which we seize upon all musical opportunities, both of enjoying and of learning, is fast becoming a great sign of the times with us; the activity goes on increasing in a compound ratio, that looms most formidably ahead. Certainly it is a social fact of great significance. Its value of course is in proportion to its earnestness, and we do not believe it is a mere passing fashion. There is a deep musical movement in this community, strongest and deepest just where there is the most of general culture and the most of faith and true humanity; strongest in New England, and in such centres of intellectual and moral life as Boston, and more or less all the great cities; but in the other cities we cannot help thinking that it is more an imported enthusiasm, while here it springs more sincerely from within, a deep-felt want of our whole social and religious nature.

Think of the oratorios, the operas, the concerts, in greater numbers and variety than ever, and of higher, purer quality, which our people of all classes have thronged to this winter, spending as if for a necessity and not a luxury when the question was of hearing a great artist or a great work of Beethoven, or Handel, or Mozart, or Mendelssohn! Think how classical the general appetite has grown (of course there is always at the same time a large audience for superficial medleys and all sorts of claptrap—there is everywhere, even in Leipzig and Vienna), how many symphonies we crave each season, how fond we are not only of "The Messiah" and the "Creation," (the two only oratorios known here fifty years ago, and which led the founders of our venerable Oratorio society to couple in its titles two names so remotely related to each other as Handel and Haydn), but also of "Jephtha," "Samson," "Judah Maccabæus," "Israel in Egypt," "St. Paul," "Elijah," "Hymn of Praise,"—all such great works, and only such—for it would be hard now to revive much interest in such a work as Neukomm's "David;" think how steadily the more sensational, "effect" music, tried here many times, as all new fashions are, has been losing ground in Boston programmes, while the true masters, those who wrought in all sincerity and not for to-day's applause, have held their own; think how the Chamber Concerts, where one hears music in its most abstract, pure form of Quartets, etc., for stringed instruments, or the piano-forte Sonatas of Beethoven and Schubert, and other classical works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin,—works of such rare genius and earnestness almost exclusively, to the avoidance of mere show-pieces and displays of wondrous feats of execution—have hardly found evenings enough in a week to give all the artists, each with a faithful élite of admiring listeners, a chance. Think how many admirable pianists, skilled interpreters of all the best that has been written for their instrument, whether solo or in concert with others, have found encouragement to settle down here, both as public players and teachers! Think, too, what pianos we have manufactured here,—how the Chickering Grands are the theme of wonder at the Paris Exposition now,—and what church organs, how many of them and how large and perfect; of the superlatively great Organ, one of the world's three or four best and largest, that stands all the time with ever so much quiet background of reserved force in our noble Music Hall; and think of the Hall itself, and of our many halls. Then finally think of the great music schools that have sprung up so rapidly among us,—two of them taking the ambitious name of Conservatory, and already boasting their three hundred and their five hundred pupils,—and of the eagerness there is among our young men and women, and even children, to learn all that they possibly can, within their means, of music theoretically and practically. It really seems as if all New England were fired with the idea of becoming en masse a musician. And so, naturally, at the same time music is becoming an immense branch of business, both in the way of trade and manufacture and profession. Verily there is machinery enough at work, and there is motive power enough behind it, to work out a great musical culture here. Blindly or wisely, a great musical movement is accumulating momentum at a formidable rate. The more important, then, that it should understand itself, that it should recognize true landmarks, and be kept in a sound and true direction.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—The Mendelssohn Quintette Club concerts on the 23d and 24th were very successful. Case Hall was filled on both nights with lovers of good music, and we can safely say, none were disappointed, for more really enjoyable concerts were never given in this city. We have not space to give the programmes, which comprised selections from Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Mozart, &c. The thorough sympathy of the Quintette Club, and the delicacy of their execution, renders their interpretation of classical music very nearly perfect. Miss Addie S. Ryan, who made her first appearance here in these concerts, proved herself an excellent artiste. She has a voice of rare compass and beauty, and seems to feel what she sings. She sang a number of charming English and German ballads in an admirable manner.—West. Mus. World.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.—The 167th regular concert of the old Musical Society (Oct. 12), with an orchestra of nearly fifty, had the following programme:

- Overture—Magie Flute Mozart
- Song for Soprano Reichardt
- Funeral March—(Orchestra) Chopin
- Male Chorus with Solo Quartet, (new) Alt
- Overture—Midsummer Night's Dream Mendelssohn
- Lorely—Scene for Soprano Solo, Chorus, etc. (Orchestra) Mendelssohn

We have just had seven nights of German Opera: Faust (of course,) Martha, Tiù du Rôgnant, Stradella, Der Freischütz, &c.

LECTURE ON THE PIANO-FORTE.—MR. B. J. Lang, the well known musical teacher, made his debut as a lecturer Saturday afternoon in Chickering's Hall. The lecture was delivered to the pupils of the New England Conservatory of Music, but there was quite a number of listeners outside of that now large circle. Mr. Lang's subject was, "The Piano." He gave its history from the earliest period, and traced its course and influence down to the present day. In relation to pianos, Mr. Lang quite disbelieves in the "Squares," and hopes they may be displaced by the "Uprights," the only kind, in his judgment, which should be tolerated. He thinks there are too many who attempt to learn to play the piano. None should do so who do not in some manner exhibit a talent for it. Mere practice, however long continued, will not make a player unless there is an original capacity behind it. When abroad Mr. Lang saw the best pianos of the world. Among the most exquisite was a Spanish; and the worst from Galway. He regards those made in Boston as unsurpassed in the world, and believes the perfection of piano construction has been about reached. A Boston piano, made by Boston mechanics, is good enough. Mr. Lang gave much good and practical advice as to learning and teaching the piano. He uttered some pretty severe things against some of the music of the day, and regarded miscellaneous concerts as crude and unsatisfactory. Entertainments in which a whole symphony is given he regards as something worth while to listen to. In this connection he commended the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association and Orchestral Union. The music of Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, and kindred composers was eulogized, while the "hodge-podge" school was kicked and cuffed with hearty vehemence. Touching those ornamental articles of furniture known as piano stools, he said they were abominations and ought to be banished. The ordinary chair with a back to it, against which an occasional rest could be had, was worth a dozen stools. Some of the English peculiarities of playing the piano were adverted to, and their absurdities pointed out. The English have their way in the matter of piano playing just as they do in some other things, and stick to it whether good or bad. As to the "art" of playing, and the manner, he said he could not state it. It defied language to express. It was a thing to hear, not to describe. He thought ladies were naturally better players and teachers than men, as they have a power to easily acquire and impart. Mr. Lang spoke about three-fourths of an hour in an off-hand and rather pleasant manner. The merit of his lecture was in the practical suggestions he threw out, which were evolved from his own experience as a teacher. He promised at the start that he should be crude, and he was a little so, but the information imparted was more than an offset. Some of his anecdotes were a little musty and not always apropos, but he gave on the whole satisfaction to his hearers. For a first attempt it was fair. But it is no injustice to Mr. Lang to say that he plays better than he preaches.—Post.

PHILADELPHIA. Mr. Carl Sents is giving Orchestral Matinees, in each of which a Symphony by Haydn or Mozart is the principal feature. Last week he gave Mozart's "Jupiter," which interests our Boston readers just now. A writer in the Evening Bulletin thus describes it for the Philadelphians.

The name of "Jupiter" has been given to this Symphony, probably, to indicate thereby its brilliant, majestic character. The first movement, Allegro vivace, common time, opens with a bold, defiant unisonous passage for all the instruments in two measures, which is followed by two measures taken by the string quartet, piano. Another four measures of slight variation from the preceding follows in the harmony of the dominant G. The following period, entering by a martial rhythm of the wind instruments, relieved by short rapid figures of the violins and violas intervening, is given a somewhat jovial expression. After a close on the second of the key, D, a new motive of soft, expressive character is introduced by the violins in the key of the dominant G, which is happily imitated by the basses, who, seemingly anxious to retain the beautiful first motive which has been so gracefully introduced by the violins, repeat it in the key of G. A vigorous incidental phrase, after a measure's pause for the whole orchestra, in C minor, soon passing, however, to the major, with intertwining of the first and second motives, leads to the end of the first part in the key of the dominant. The change from the dominant G to E flat is as simple as striking, passing through three notes only (g, f, b flat) in unison, and leads to new motives and frequent changes in harmony. Much wonder and admiration have been expressed in later times at the bold unisonous modulations occurring in Meyerbeer's works, and they have been regarded as something new; but here, and in other places in this Symphony, we have them in the greatest simplicity and in most imposing grandeur. An eminent German critic, whom we cannot quote at any length, says: "But this outer beauty is not the all-essential; a genuine noble thought, a solid strength and manly dignity, a brilliant marching on, are, by their daring and freedom, the characteristic attributes of the eagle."

The Andante Cantabile in three-four time, F-major, maintains such a peculiar grace throughout, that the violins and violas should be muted. It is rich in situations of effect, particularly in the suddenly changing shading of piano and forte, which seem impassionately to interrupt the even, quiet flow of the melody, but in reality only the more to elevate it. The three principal motives are interwoven in a masterly manner; the modulations and harmonies are exceedingly interesting and pleasing to cultivated ears, in fact, rich, exuberant and modern for all time.

The Minuetto Allegretto is the picture of a life-enjoying man, undisturbed by care or anxiety, cheerful, serene and joyous, yet not entirely free from longings, which seem to crop out in the Trio, which also is enriched by its beautiful harmonic concatenations. The Finale, Allegro Molto, in common time, contains the Fugue, which also is one of the distinguishing traits of this wonderful composition. Mozart stands in this noble work of art inimitable and unapproachable, for no other composer has ventured to introduce the Fugue form with such an elegant, free handling as pervades it throughout. It has been remarked of Beethoven, Spohr, Schumann, Gade, and others, that when they attempted to treat the Fugue in this free manner, they soon fell off from its support, as if they felt their strength insufficient to carry them through an elevation of thought and style from beginning to end of their work. But Mozart has left us another exemplar of this masterly command of never-failing resources of melody and harmony in the wonderful overture, The Magic Flute, a work which must sound as well a century hence as to-day.

The first four measures of the Allegro will bring to recollection the fact that this motive has already been used by Mozart in other works, in his Masses and in his Sonatas, only here it has arrived at its highest acceptation. A precise analysis, however, of this Fugato movement cannot be given here, for space fails us, and we should be seduced into paths wandering through tangled forests of combinations and beautiful melodic landscapes, o'er which we might linger longer than the patience of our readers might permit us. Let this suffice for the present, and although a Nægeli, from some hidden cause, may rant and abuse this grand work of Mozart, as "without style and full of platitudes and confusion," let us remember that he alone of all critics, of whatever time or clime, dared to bespatter with gall and bitterness a work which stands among its class as the mighty Jove among the gods of Mount Olympus. It is a Jupiter Tonans.

NEW YORK.—Mr. Theodore Thomas gave his first symphony soirée at Steinway Hall on Saturday evening week. The programme was exceedingly attractive, skilfully selected, and faithfully rendered. The opening piece, a "Suite in D," (overture, air, and gavotte,) by Bach, and performed for the first time here, is a charming piece of melody, pure and simple, and was handled with delicacy and grace. Cherubini's introduction to the third act of "Medea" is a composition worthy of the great Italian master, full of originality, deep and earnest, boldly conceived and vigorously marked out. It received full justice from the orchestra. The two movements (allegro and andante) from the unfinished "Symphony in B minor," are genuine specimens of the genius of Schubert, rich in melody, elaborate in modulation, and unmistakable in identity. The great feature of the evening, however, was the production of Beethoven's magnificent "Fifth Symphony," (so well known to the lovers of music,) which was grandly rendered. Never did Mr. Thomas's orchestra bend more earnestly to their work than in the interpretation of this sublime poem. It was clearly a labor of love, and, from beginning to end, the execution may unhesitatingly be pronounced faultless. It was a fitting culmination to such a programme, and Mr. Thomas deserves credit for placing the symphony at the close of the soirée, instead of at the beginning as formerly. Mme. Parepa-Rosa was the soloist. She appeared in two operatic selections, fully sustaining her well-earned reputation, and winning an unanimous encore in the aria from Mozart's "Figaro." The audience was thoroughly appreciative, and, though not as large as it should have been, yet, thanks to Mr. Thomas's indefatigable endeavors to cultivate a classical taste, was larger than it was wont to be in previous seasons. The whole affair was a decided success.—Sund. Times.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- And is it true? (Mon Dieu! que je sois bête).
"Grand Duchess." 30
- I wear on my heart. (J' ai sur mon cœur). " 30
- It is a legend old. (Legende du Verre.) " 30
- These melodies from the "Grand Duchess" are altogether charming and easily sung. The first contains Wanda's pretty fear of her General Fritz, the second, the Couplets on the Love letters, and the third the very popular Legend of the Great Goblet, often encored.
- Come then, join me, (Vieni con me.) Trio.
"Leonora." 30
- Varied and rich.
- Angel Millie. Ballad. H. A. Tuckerman. 30
- Another fine ballad.
- Sleeping, why art thou sleeping? Serenade?
J. M. Deems. 40
- It's a pity to be waked out of a sound sleep, even by a serenade; but if it must be, give us a nice song like the present.
- Festival Service of the Prot. Epis. Church.
Complete, 3.00
- The pieces are also published separately,
Te Deum, $1.75 Jubilate, 60. Thanks-giving chant, 40; and Gloria, 70.
Recommended to choirs.
- I am a merry maid. (Son giovin giuliva).
"Leonora." 35
- Upon this heart. (Vieni al cor.) 60
- Well selected from Mercadante.

Instrumental.

- Overture. Le Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein. 40
- Souvenirs de Wolfboro. Quadrille. Guder. 40
- Mill stream Mazurka. Wellman. 30
- Les Flots. (The billows.) Valse facile.
A. Disbeck. 40
- Here one may waltz while on the billows, or listen to the musical stream, or "quadrille" by the lake, at pleasure.
- Kittanning Mazurka. A. Schotte. 60
- Contains many passages of great beauty, and is the work of a talented blind composer.
- Nathalie and Amelie Waltzes. For Guitar.
Haydn. 25
- Easy, and nicely arranged.
- Damen Galop. (Ladies Galop). A. Parlow. 35
- A very sprightly piece, named in honor of the ladies.
- Young Dr. Balthazer. Polka Militaire.
Engelbrecht. 30
- This composer succeeds in infusing much elegance and taste into his pieces. Not difficult.
- Grand Duchess. Fant. de Salon. Ketterer. 75
- A very good resume of some of the brightest melodies of the opera.
- Snowflake Polka. "Chrysal gems." Kinkel. 30
- Fairy footsteps Waltz. " " " "
- Easy, and unusually attractive pieces for learners.
- Naiads Barcarolle. E. Mack. 50
- Charm du Salon. Caprice. Leybach. 50
- Glow-worm. Moreau. Osten. 50
- See the inside of these pieces for fifty cents worth of good music.
- Hilda Waltz. For guitar. Haydn. 25
- Well-known waltz, well arranged.
- Scales and Chords in all Major and Minor keys. 35
- Very convenient for teachers.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 695.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 18.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Two Words.

Oh dear beyond all grace of human speech!

What language can express thee—what approve?

Only two words come drifting to my reach:

My love! my love!

The farewell lingers 'till the lips are dumb,

Oh my love!

And long and longer with the hours that move,

The slender chain that binds us will become,

My love! my love!

The chain is slender, but I feel no fear,

Oh my love!

Whose faith I need no tender word to prove,

The days are weary—but the waiting dear,

My love! my love!

I ask for nothing—nothing hope to gain,

Oh my love!

I offer little—nothing can beque,

Only two words, from lips grown pale with pain,

My love! my love!

August 12th, 1865.

Music in Musicians' Letters.*

(From the London Chronicle.)

Lady Wallace has a real enthusiasm for musicians, and, probably, for music also, though her translations furnish evidence of her unacquaintance with even the rudimentary technicalities of the science. Before she published the present volume, she had already given us the letters of Beethoven, Mozart, and Mendelssohn. Like Herr Ludwig Nohl, the industrious gatherer of these collections, Lady Wallace seems to think that she is doing some special service to the art and science of music by making them known. And yet we find little relating to art in them, beyond such facts as these—that Haydn thought Mozart the first of musicians, and admired greatly Clementi's sonatas; that Mozart despised these sonatas, which, however, he honored by deigning to pilfer them; that Beethoven had a real admiration for Weber's Freyshütz, while Weber, in the early part of his life, could only find interest in Beethoven's earlier compositions, and thought his later ones—among which, as he wrote in 1810, he included the Symphony in B flat, and the Eroica—merely a confused chaos, an unintelligible struggle after novelty, illuminated with occasional gleams of genius and fancy. Such opinions are interesting as serving to show the wide interval between the creative faculty and the critical faculty in the artist's mind; but they have not the slightest tendency to show us on what principles the artist worked or what were the rules which he imposed upon himself. We get a much greater insight into Beethoven's way of working from the boisterous contempt of his criticisms on archaic pedantry in his Studien, or from his observation on the old rule which forbids the second voice to enter on so difficult an interval as the fourth—"I think singers ought to be able to do anything but bite their own noses." This was really a principle with him; and however smoothly his compositions may run in the ear of the listener, the unfortunate performer has often to lament the obstinacy with which the master refused to accommodate himself to human infirmity, or to write kindly for his instruments.

* Letters of Distinguished Musicians: Gluck, Haydn, P. E. Bach, Weber, Mendelssohn. Translated from the German by Lady Wallace. (London: Longmans.)

But in reality these collections of musicians' letters, which Herr Nohl has gathered and Lady Wallace translated, can in general only be thought to belong to a literature of art by those who seek a new and compendious way into its sanctuary. For art is supposed, besides the narrow way which leads up to its front door, to have also a back door, with a wide, easy road up to it, if it could but be found. Lady Wallace is an enthusiast for discovering this north-west passage—this way of understanding the works of great musicians, not as music, but as the mystical expression of their lives and thoughts. It is as though a man should try to become a Shakespearean scholar by studying the topography and antiquities of Stratford, or as if a collegian should literally follow Biron's advice, and attempt to draw his stores of learning not from the study of books, but from the pleasanter and easier occupation of gazing into a lady's eyes. Lady Wallace thinks to approach the musical creations of the great masters, and to understand their drift and their meaning, by reading their letters, and seeing how they expressed themselves to their publishers or their patrons. This mint and enmin she tithes conscientiously, but the weightier matters she neglects. What can she learn from a letter of Haydn's asking his correspondent to send him a symphony, when even in copying its opening bars she does not know whether it is in E flat or E minor? Or what musical profit has she gained from all her devotion, if she still thinks that the key of A flat is equivalent to "four B flat minor?" (p. 159).

The letters have their own biographical interest, but very little musical importance. There are, however, two wide exceptions to this sweeping conclusion. It is not true either of the letters of Gluck or of those of Mendelssohn. Both of these were, to some extent, men of artificial, self-conscious, and self-made genius, capable not only of reflecting upon the creative processes of their minds, but of communicating, or attempting to communicate, them to the world. It is only a genius of the second order that is able to do this. The greatest artists cannot teach their art, because they have not learned it. Their learning is generally rather a cutting away of their own redundancies than a gradual amassing of wealth. The genial artist by one flash of imagination projects himself further into space than the critical artist can do by years of patient toil. The genial artist produces in the lump, and files away the rough corners. The critical artist builds up his productions by the square inch, and works out his design by line and rule. Gluck, who was one of the greatest musical reformers that ever lived, can never be reckoned more than a musician of the second rank. It was a powerful critical faculty, which showed him where the faults of contemporary music lay, which enabled him to see the whole imbecility of its plan or want of plan, and which drove him to seek and to find a remedy. And it is precisely because he sought this remedy outside the sphere of music that he is able to express it in such clear sentences. "My purpose," he says, "was to restrict music to its true office, that of ministering to the expression of poetry." For him music was not a self-guiding art. It was not architect, but only decorator. And he sought in an extraneous art, in poetry, the guide which should tell him how to weave together the march and the dance, the rush and the reaction, the noise and the silence, the screaming discords and the murmuring returns of concords and sweet sounds, which are the materials of the fairy palace of music. The plan of his musical edifice was to be prescribed by the character of the poem; the details were to be governed absolutely by the words and dialogue.

His only purely musical principle was the constant preference of a "noble simplicity" to a "parade of difficulty at the expense of clearness." "I did not consider," he says, "a mere display of novelty valuable unless naturally suggested by the situation and the expression, and on this point no rule of composition exists that I would not have gladly sacrificed in favor of the effect produced." If we were to take a soliloquy of Hamlet, and after studying its organic rhythm, and the sequences and connections of its moods and passions, were to abstract these from the words, and to strive to represent them in their original order through the medium of music, we might possibly compose a very effective piece, but still one that could not be called a product of pure musical inspiration. It would be a transcript, an echo, not an original production. It would shine with a borrowed, not a self-generated light. That musical compositions of the highest order can be produced in this way, we have not only the dramas of Gluck to prove, but an example of such singular sublimity as the Credo of Beethoven's Mass in C, the music of which is so sensitive as to change its character with each word, breathing nothing but affection while it sings Paterum, and nothing but force while it shouts out Omnipotens, and yet by some hidden principle of order binding itself together, and out of these contrasted and contradictory elements building an edifice of the most continuous unity and most refined harmoniousness. Still in all such pieces the musical art is not supreme; she is a mere servant of a higher art, whose behests she faithfully works out. Gluck's rules cannot apply to pure music, where the musical idea is supreme, not governed by any extraneous dictation of rhythm or pathos.

Both Gluck and Mendelssohn were artists whose fancy was made of brains. Each of them had an exact knowledge of the place he was to occupy in the field of his art. Each of them tried to explain his position and to formulate his principles. But Mendelssohn is as obscure as Gluck is clear. Mendelssohn did not seek any extraneous guide for musical thought, but tried to deduce it from musical principles. He was quite satisfied that he had done so, but he quite fails in communicating his process of thought. Indeed, he only approaches to articulate utterance when he is false to his thought, and makes music depend on moral principles. Then his meaning becomes intelligible, though his theory is fanciful and false. It is in the sphere of music exactly what Mr. Ruskin's is in the sphere of the arts which appeal to the eye. One finds classical architecture to be licentious, meretricious, mocking, scoffing, profane, pagan, and diabolical; the other finds nothing in Auber's music but braggadocio, degrading sensuality, pedantry, epicurism, and parodies of foreign nationality. Music to Mendelssohn was a serious affair, and he considered that he was tampering with conscience and uttering an untruth if he composed anything that he did not feel. "Notes," he said, "have as distinct a meaning as words, even perhaps a more definite sense." For him, therefore, the musical sentence had sense, and the symphony, like a romance or a poem, stood on its own merits, had its own meaning, proclaimed its own dogmas, quite apart from any words that might be adapted to it. Thus much we learn from Mendelssohn's letters: that in music he thoroughly meant what he said; that his tones and modulations were a true transcript of his moods and thoughts. But what kind of moods and thoughts they were that were thus transcribed, and what was his secret for translating the blind feeling into articulate tone, what dictionary and grammar he used to help him—all this he has failed to reveal, however anxious he might have been to say it. And he has failed because the problem is an impossible one. One may note what Mendelssohn studied—how he studied Beethoven's last style, and meditated on the chord of the 13th, and analyzed Bach, and furnished up Martin Luther's hymn tunes. The technicalities of his art may be gathered from his musical works. But that which chiefly occupied his mind, and which he attempted to explain in his letters—its moral aspect and its æsthetic principles—he has failed to make known to us.

Weber was an art critic as well as a musician. But his criticism only tells us what he liked and disliked, what sounded ill or well to him. He never attempted to get to the bottom of things and explore any fundamental principles of his art that were not merely technical. He was a genial rather than a self-conscious artist. His mind was allied to the storm-and-stress school of Schiller's Robbers. Hence he had not the artistic squeamishness of Mendelssohn. It would be difficult to imagine the younger artist still bestowing his affections on a lady whom he had first loved for her artistic powers, after he had discovered that they were only mechanical, and that she had no feeling for art. Weber, however vexed he was when he found that Caroline Brandt's views of high art did not rise beyond the commonplace notion of its procuring soup, roast meat, and shirts, did not allow the discovery to prevent his courting and marrying her. For really, art was not much more to Weber himself. It was a delight, but not a conscience. It was an end, but it was much more a means—a means to fame, popularity, and wealth.

These letters, however, though they contribute very little to our musical education, are, in other respects, welcome reading. Mendelssohn is always delightful; his playfulness, his affectionateness, his fancy, and his polish make him one of the best letter writers of the century. Weber is lively and clever; Haydn is prudent, modest, but, withal, aware of his superiority, and liable to ebullitions of temper. Bach's letters are all on business. Both he and Haydn furnish short but very interesting autobiographies. Gluck writes like a scholar, who knows exactly what he has to say, and how to say it. All the writers were men of powerful intelligence, though their minds were devoted to that art which seems the most foreign to the intellect; and the letters deserve a place in libraries, as the records of great men.

Musicians' Letters.

(From the London Review).

The growing public interest in music and musicians is in no way more evidenced than by the publication, in recent years, of translations of memoirs and correspondence of foreign composers, which would have found few, if any, English readers a quarter of a century back. The letters of Mendelssohn, of Mozart, and of Beethoven, rendered by the present work and published by the same firm, have appeared within the last four years, besides, in the same interval, Spohr's autobiography and lives of Carl Maria von Weber and Schubert by other translators and publishers. So many publications of the kind within so short a period is sufficient proof of the increased importance attached by our reading and thinking public to an art which has for too many years, in this country, been considered in the light of a mere popular amusement rather than as a possible exponent of feeling and sentiment as pure and noble as those which find their expression in the hitherto more generally recognized forms of poetry and painting. The musician, that is, the creative musician, is now beginning to be recognized among us as holding as high a title to consideration, and exercising as high a mission, as the literary man or the artist; and all who derive any pleasure from the works of a great composer are now interested in such personal details of his career as can be gleaned from his memoirs and correspondence.

The present volume (collected by Dr. Ludwig Nohl) forms a worthy pendant to the previous works of the kind above referred to, and has a special interest as illustrating the lives and careers of five composers whose productions ranged from the middle of the last to the middle of the present century. The book commences with a series of letters by Gluck, the first of which (addressed to the Grand Duke Leopold of Tuscany) consists of his comments on his own opera of "Alceste"—the work in which he first realized that art revolution which was the result of his long and mature reflection on the artificial conventionalism and inapt expression of the dramatic music of the period. The philosophic and reflective power of Gluck's mind is nowhere more admirably shown than in his communication, dated Vienna, October 30, 1770, to the Duke of Braganza, to whom he dedicated his opera "Paride ed Elena." In subsequent letters, to Louis XVI., to Marie Antoinette, to Klopstock, to M. de la Harpe, and other celebrities of the day, Gluck's energetic thought and confidence in the truth of his principles and his art mission are most characteristically shown, including some interesting references to the production of his "Iphigenie" and "Armide," specially for the Parisian opera stage, and his well-known feud with the rival composer Piccini, which divided even members of the same family with all the animosity of a political quarrel. Rugged and self-asserting as Gluck was, he must also have been somewhat of the courtier, since, in some interesting extracts given from the diary of the unfortunate Princess de Lamballe, we are told that this uncompromising composer, whose self-confidence was almost arrogant, "often told her that he always improved his music according to the impression that it made on the Queen" (Marie Antoinette). Again, "he said to the Queen that the air of France had redoubled the powers of his musical genius, and the sight of her Majesty had given such a wonderful impetus to his ideas, that his compositions had become, like herself, sublime." Many such characteristic personal touches, as well as illustrations of his art career, are to be found in this interesting series.

The next portion of the volume consists of a few somewhat meagre letters of Charles Philip Emanuel Bach (born in 1714), son of the great Jobu Sebastian, and himself the immediate pioneer of the modern school of pianoforte music. A slight autobiographic sketch gives the few leading incidents in his most uneventful life, together with a passing indication of the principles which led him to adopt a style of expression rather than of scientific combination in composition and performance.

A rather copious collection of Haydn's letters forms the next portion of the volume, the first authenticated date being 1780. A large portion of these, addressed to the publishers—Artaria of Vienna, and Breitkopf & Härtel of Leipsic—are occupied with details of his business arrangements and contracts for the price of his compositions—the amounts in most instances standing in absurd contrast to the present estimation of the works. Even after the composer had become eminent we find him agreeing with the publisher Nadermann (October 25, 1784), to supply "three new and very carefully composed symphonies, neatly and correctly written out, for the sum of 150 ducats, payable at the end of November." Especially interesting are portions of his diary, and the letters relating to Haydn's visit to London, where he was at once received as a composer of world-wide fame. In a letter written from 18 Great Pulteney street, dated January 8, 1791 (only a week after his arrival), he says: "Every one seems anxious to know me. I have already dined out six times, and could be invited every day if I chose; but I must in the first place consider my health, and in the next my work. Except the nobility, I admit no visitors, till two o'clock in the afternoon, and at four o'clock I dine at home with Salomon." It was Salomon who brought Haydn to London, where the great composer produced his twelve grand symphonies at the then renowned "Salomon Concerts." In his diary Haydn records his presence at the Lord Mayor's Banquet (November 5, 1791), where, among much that appeared strange to the simple-minded German musician, he noticed that "the strangest thing of all was that one part of the company went on dancing without hearing a single note of the music; for first at one table, and then at another, songs were shouted, or toasts given, amidst the most crazy uproar and clinking of glasses and hurrahs." The civic festivities of the London of that day were doubtless not a little startling to the foreign visitor.

It is not a little remarkable that none of Haydn's letters refer to Beethoven, notwithstanding that he was, for a period, a pupil of Haydn. The grand and independent originality of the younger composer, however, could scarcely be appreciated by one who, however great, belonged to a school of art in which structural form and symmetrical proportion were absolute essentials. This is sufficiently evidenced by the well-known story of Haydn's disapproval of Beethoven's pianoforte trio in C minor (No. 3 of op. 1), by far the finest of the set of three to which it belongs. On the other hand, there are several passages in the letters and diaries of Haydn recording his intense admiration and reverence for the genius of his contemporary Mozart, whose death, in 1791, was bewailed by Haydn as a personal affliction as well as an irreparable loss to art. There is but little reference to Haydn's second visit to London (1794), also at the instance of Salomon; and the remainder of the correspondence chiefly relates to his oratorio, "The Creation" (produced at Vienna in 1799), which with the "Seasons" (brought out at the same place in 1801) formed the closing triumphs of the veteran composer, who died in 1809, at the age of seventy-six. This series of letters, like those of Gluck, includes a copy of the master's last will and testament.

The letters of Weber contained in the present volume, consist chiefly of those addressed to his friend and fellow-pupil, Gänsbacher; much of the interest of which has been forestalled by reference to the same materials in the biography of Weber, published two years and a half since.

Weber's correspondence commences with a letter dated "Freyberg, December 9, 1800," interesting as conveying to Artaria, the publisher, an offer to engrave music on stone—the practice of the then new process of lithography having, in his youth, for some time diverted Weber's attention from his musical studies. In the next letter, dated 1810, Weber informs Nüzeli (the well-known musician and publisher of Zurich), I have once more entirely devoted myself to art—and, speaking of his own musical tendencies, he states, "my principles differ far too much from those of Beethoven ever to come into contact with him." This strange want of appreciation, by a man of special original genius, of the productions of another of a far higher order of imaginative power, must ever remain an art paradox; more incomprehensible in the case of the innovative Weber than in the more formal Spohr, whose standard of excellence was the classical precedent of the finished structural school of Mozart. We need not follow Weber's correspondence over ground which has previously been more completely traversed in the biography above referred to, further than to say that it contains interesting details of his struggling art-life, and some passing references to his productions. The letters, however, only come down to August, 1825, nearly a year before Weber's final triumph in the production of "Oberon" in London, and his death here in 1826. The last communication given is a letter to his friend Bärmann, the celebrated clarinet player of Munich, for whom Weber wrote his beautiful duet sonata in E flat (for pianoforte and clarinet), besides concertos for his instrument.

The letters of Mendelssohn here given (now published for the first time) are mostly addressed to the celebrated clarinet-player just referred to, Bärmann of Munich. They commence with the date of 1826, when Mendelssohn was seventeen, at which age his compositions had already attracted much notice. Some of these communications, belonging to the period of his Italian tour (1831), are full of that genial vivacity which was a marking characteristic of his temperament until clouded by the successive losses of parents and relatives. Other letters are from Paris (1832), and fully bear out Mendelssohn's known want of entire sympathy with French musical art—almost the only antagonism (and this not a very active one) in his amiable nature. The letters are full of agreeable gossip and playful humor, but have slight reference to either his own or other great productions of musical art. There are doubtless many letters of more importance in this respect still withheld from publication; but, it is to be hoped, only temporarily, since so accomplished a writer and so acute a critic must have written much of value in reference to an art which he loved so dearly and practiced so gloriously. Of his modesty and severe self-judgment we have several traces. Even in a letter dated 1834, after he had produced many masterpieces, we find him saying, "Should I ever succeed in writing something entirely to my own mind (it need not give pleasure to any one else), then I shall be able once more to write a becoming, sensible letter, and gladly tell you about myself; but as yet I am much dissatisfied, and should like to try to write better, for my works often please others better than myself." Be it remarked that this was penned by one who had already composed symphonies, overtures, quartets, piano-forte pieces, and songs, which now rank as classical productions, and who was only then about to commence his first oratorio, "St. Paul." What a contrast to some recent instances of gentlemen making a sudden dash at fame by rushing at once into public with a crude attempt at this ultimatum of musical art and genius!

The volume is illustrated with good portraits of Gluck, Haydn, and Weber—that of Haydn, however, being somewhat more heavy-looking than the German likenesses to which we have been accustomed. The translation is executed with the facility and smoothness which have distinguished Lady Wallace's several previous productions of the kind; and the book should find a place on the shelves of all who are interested in music and musicians.

Decorations of the New Opera House of Paris.

The reports of the intended decorations of the new Opera House have been so extraordinary, that most people believed them to be exaggerated; this, however, is not the case, as the following list supplied by M. Garnier, the architect of the new building, to the Moniteur des Arts, will show:—The paintings ordered, and in course of execution, are, for the grand public saloon, ten subjects for the coverings of the ceilings from mythology and history: "Orpheus," "Education of Jupiter," "Bacchantes," "Judgment of Paris," &c., by M. Paul Baudry; "Parnassus," terrestrial and divine, to fill two large coverings; and ten oval medallions over the doors, by the same. A room to the left of the above, to be decorated by M. Delaunay, the ceiling with "The Glorification of Singing," and three tympani, containing the subject. The corresponding room on the other side, "Harmony," in a ceiling and three tympani, by M. Barrias. The great saloon for the ballet: four panels representing the various phases of the dance, and twenty portraits of famous dancers, by Gustave Boulanger. Grand staircase: four subjects, "Art," "Music," "Poetry," and "The Dance," in large compartments, by M. Pils; and twelve works in enamel, by M. Emile Solier, representing as many cities where famous operas have been produced, London included. A grand cupola, by M. Jules Lenepveu, "The Gods and Goddesses on Olympus," representing the symbolic arts; three landscapes by MM. Félix Thomas, Lanoue, and Harpignies. The above are all ordered, and the following are proposed to be added to the list:—Four grand panels, and three tympani, with figures on a ground of gold, for an anteroom; a grand allegorical ceiling for the Imperial saloon, and five panels for the antechamber to the saloon; panels and friezes for the Empress's boudoir; eight tympani in the Imperial vestibule. Smoking-room: eight historical figures, with plans, representing the eight places which have been used for operas in Paris; a ceiling and eight medallions for the large ice-room; friezes for the small ice-room; twelve panels, containing figures representing as many kinds of dances, for the café; and lastly, twenty portraits of celebrated singers, by Gérôme, de Curzon, Chiffard, Laëlin, Brisset, Giacomotti, Biennoury, Lévy, Au-ber, Leeonte de Ronjon, Balleroy, Ph. Rousseau, Monginot, Gendron, Landelle, Hamon, Marehal, Girard, Saintin, Wetter, Frangais, and Benouville. The sculpture is in keeping with the painting. On the principal façade of the building above, four groups by M. Maillot; below, groups representing the "Dance," "Harmony," "Comedy," and the "Drama," and "Singing" and "Music," by Carpeaux, Jouffroy, Perrand, and Guillaume; and in the centre, statues representing the "Idyl," "Elegy," and "Mythology," and "History," by Aizelin, Chapu, Dubois, and Falguères. On the two frontons of the same façade, figures of "Architecture" and "Industry," by Jean Petit, and painting and sculpture, by Gruvère. On the two lateral façades, frontons representing "Comedy" and the "Drama," by Girard; "Art" and "Science," by Maniglier; the "Drama" and "Music," by Otin; and "Singing" and "Poetry," by Cabet. The grand galvano-plastic groups, by Gummery, representing "Poetry" and "Music," supported by figures of Fame. Over the centre of the proscenium, a galvano-plastic group, "Apollo holding the lyre," and two allegorical figures, by Aimé Millet; and in the angles, "Pegasus restrained by the Muses." On the frontons of the Imperial pavilion, the arms of France, with attributes, by Pollet and Travaux. On the Imperial staircase, four "Cariatides," by Elias Robert and Mathurin Moreau. On the principal façade, gilt bronze busts of Mozart, Meyerbeer, Spontini, Beethoven, and Auber, by Chabaud; and of Halévy, Rossini, Quinault, and Scribe, by Everard. On the lateral façades, busts in stone of Cambra, Cambert, J. J. Rousseau, Philidor, Piccini, and Paisiello, by Hasse; Cherubini, Mehul, Nicolo, Weber, Bellini, and Adam, by Denécheau; Monteverde, Durante, Jomelli, Monsigny, Grétry and Sacchini, by Walter; and Lesueur, Berton, Boieldieu, Hérold, Donizetti, and Verdi, by Bruyer. Medallions on the façade, of Pergolesi, Haydn, Bueh, and Cimarosa, by Gummery. Two grand candelabra, allegorical of the moon and the stars, by Chabaud. In the interior of the building, four seated statues of Lulli, Rameau, Gluck, and Handel, representing Italian, French, German, and English music; artists not yet appointed. On the grand staircase, two "Cariatides" in colored marble, by Jules Thomas. In the grand saloon, two "Cariatides," flanking the chimney-piece, by Carrier Belleuse and Cordier. In the theatre itself, "Cariatides," at the Imperial and opposite boxes, by Cranck and Lepère. It is proposed, in addition to the above, to place twenty plaster figures in the grand saloon, with busts of living composers, bas-reliefs, and ornaments. Over the Imperial pavilion are eagles, by Caën, while others by Jacquemart and Rouillard crown the columns and guard the entrance.

A Visit to Rossini.

The friendly old gentleman, who was seated at the writing-table in his little study, rose with some difficulty, but with the most winning cordiality, and held out his hand to us. We soon forced him back again into his arm-chair. Suddenly he asked us if Mozart's monument in Vienna was completed, and also Beethoven's. We three Austrians were rather embarrassed. "I remember Beethoven remarkably well," continued Rossini, after a pause, "though very nearly half a century has elapsed; when I was in Vienna, I lost no time in going to see him." "But he did not admit you, as Schindler and other biographers inform us?" "On the contrary," said Rossini, correcting me, "I got 'the Italian poet,' Carpani, with whom I had previously been to Salieri's, to introduce me to Beethoven, who received us immediately and in a very polite manner. The visit, it is true, did not last long, for all conversation with Beethoven was absolutely painful. On the day in question, he happened to hear words than usual, and could not understand me, though I spoke in an exceedingly loud voice; perhaps, too, the little practice he had may have rendered the task of conversing in Italian still more difficult for him." I own that this statement of Rossini's, the truth of which was corroborated by many details, pleased me like an unexpected present. I had always been annoyed at this trait in Beethoven's biography, as well as at the party of musical Jacobins who glorify the brutal Germanic virtue of shutting one's door in the face of a man like Rossini. But there is not a word of truth in the whole story. We accepted with pleasure Rossini's offer to take us down stairs to the ground floor. We entered the light, spacious drawing room, with its fresco-adorned ceiling, and its lofty windows, through which rose-bushes peep. In the middle of the room there stands one of Pleyel's Grands. As we all know Rossini, for the last few years, has exhibited a great partiality for playing the piano, and this virtuosity deferred till so late affords him an opportunity for a continuous succession of jokes, several of which are stereotyped. He began at once to complain that Schullhoff would not give him a chance of getting on as a pianist. "It is true that I do not practice my scales every day like you young people, for when I play them the whole length of the piano, I fall off my chair either right or left. During the winter, Rossini gives six or eight musical soirées at his town residence, No. 2 Chaussée d'Antin. For an artist possessing so eminently the sense of the beautiful in music, the style of decoration adopted for his apartment is strikingly devoid of taste, with a touch of the baroque. Next to a copperplate engraving of the Madonna della Sedia is hung some Parisian ideal in a very low-necked dress, and all along the wall are bronze saucers with histories of the saints in relief. On the side-board, a crucifix rises out of a confused medley of small Japanese figures and Chinese pictures, for which Rossini appears to have a great partiality. In the way of portraits, the only ones I remarked were the small photographs of the King of Portugal and of Adelina Patti upon the mantel-shelf. Of Adelina Patti the maestro speaks with admiring esteem, always excepting her when he indulges in lamentations to the effect that the race of great vocal artists has completely died out. "Look there!" he said, pointing to the new opera-house, which rises, surrounded by scaffolding, before his windows. "We shall soon have a new theatre; but we have already no more singers. Shall you be better off when your new opera house is finished at Vienna?" To attend the soirées of the celebrated maestro is the ambition of every one in Paris. The most distinguished persons frequently take more trouble to obtain an invitation to Rossini's than to the Tuileries, and the papers never neglect giving, next day, an account of what took place. I was enabled to attend the last of these musical evenings, and own to having felt more honored than pleased. Rossini's residence is very far from being large enough to accommodate the number of persons invited. The heat was something indescribable, and the pressure so great that the most desperate efforts were always necessary whenever a fair vocalist (especially one of the weight of Madame Sax) had to make her way from her seat to the piano. A host of ladies, sparkling with jewels, occupy the entire area of the music-room; the gentlemen stand, jammed together so as to be unable to move, at the open doors. Now and then a servant with refreshments worms through the gasping crowd, but it is an odd fact that only very few persons (and those mostly strangers) take anything worth mentioning. The lady of the house, it is said, does not like their doing so. About the present Madame Rossini I have nothing further to tell than that she is rich, and was once beautiful. A boldly sculptured Roman nose rises, like a tower that has been spared, from out the remains of her former beauty; the rest was covered by brilliants. The programme of the concert (made up mostly, as was natural, of Rossini's music) included Italian and French vocal pieces, executed by the leading members of the opera, Mme. Sax, Mlle. Battu, Faure, and others. Two new Rossinian piano-forte pieces (played by a young virtuoso of the name of Diemer) were not so remarkable for originality, as for the piling up of difficulties in them. They bore the strange titles, "Deep Sleep and Sudden Awakening," and "Tartarian Bolero." The vocal pieces are more serious and beautiful. They are not unfrequently original, and invariably models as regards the treatment of the voice. The master of the house himself accompanied two of the vocal pieces on the piano with entrancing delicacy. Otherwise, on such evenings, he generally sits, silent and tired, in the little entrance room, with his old colleague Caraffa, or some other intimate friend, and is delighted if the pack of his adorers will leave him awhile in repose. I regret not having heard Rossini's new Mass. This work (like all the others, carefully guarded, and kept unpublished by its composer) is said to contain some very striking beauties. "It is not the kind of sacred music fitted for you Germans," said Rossini, on declining to accede to my request, "my most sacred music is never aught more than semi-serious." He calls his "Napoleon Hymn" (for the distribution of prizes on the 1st of July) "pot-house music" and his operas "antiquated stuff." It is, indeed, impossible to talk seriously with the celebrated maestro; he feels at home only in quiet jokes and mild banter; and when he jokes about his own compositions, it is always a matter of doubt whether he is laughing more at himself or at those whom he is addressing. Though we may blame the exaggeration in this grotesque self-depreciation, it is based on a motive of feeling which we cannot fail to recognize on looking more nearly into the circumstances of the case. Rossini lives in the midst of a system of uninterrupted adoration and petting. There are but few men in the world to whom such homage is forever being paid. His room is never free from visitors; the highest notabilities of aristocracy, wealth and art come and go. He is overwhelmed with costly presents and tender marks of attention; out of a hundred persons, ninety-nine think themselves bound to say flattering things to him. Were Rossini to receive all such expressions of admiration with the self-satisfied, vainly modest smile peculiar to so many celebrities—who, so to speak, refuse with one hand while they pocket with the other—there would be no existing in his house a quarter of an hour. Every one in it would be suffocated with incense. Serious disapprobation or warmth of feeling is not to be found in Rossini's character; he prefers knocking, with good-natured self-ridicule, the casket of incense out of the hand of his worshipper, and enjoys the latter's embarrassment. "What shall I call you?" lisped a young and beautiful lady, recently, when speaking with him; "great master? prince of composers? or divine genius?" "I had much rather," replied Rossini, with a confiding smirk, "that you would call me mon petit lapin!" Rossini never visits any one—never passes an evening from home—has been to the theatre only twice, probably, in twenty years; and as a matter of course, has not seen the Exhibition. Taking carriage exercise, receiving visits, and indulging in a little music constitute his sole occupations. He willingly allowed himself to be named honorary president of the musical jury appointed to decide on the merits of the prize cantatas and hymns of peace on the express condition that he would not be required to attend any of their meetings, or have the slightest thing to do. He said jokingly that he was willing to be elected a member of other committees on similar terms. The joyous maestro takes, perhaps, nothing quite seriously except the care of his health. He cossets himself up most scrupulously, and entertains the greatest horror of death. Woe to the visitor who causes him to defer a siesta, or any other important source of bodily comfort! "Allez-vous en!" he exclaimed lately to an unfortunate wight: "ma célébrité m'embête!"—From Parisier Briefe in the Neue Freie Presse.

Music Abroad.

London.

OPERA.—A short winter season was opened at Her Majesty's Theatre on Monday with the personnel of the Italian Opera, the principals being Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Sinico, Mme. Trebelli, Mme. Demerielablahe, Mlle. Baumeister, Signors Bettini, Gassier, Foli, Casaboni, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Tom Hohlor. Two singers, new to the London public, have also been secured—Mlle. Clara Louise Kellogg, from the New York Academy of Music, and Mlle. Clara Doria, from some of the principal cities in Italy. These will appear in the course of a few days. The opening performance was "Lucrezia Borgia," Mlle. Tietjens in the title-part, Sig. Bettini as Gennaro, Sig. Gassier as Il Duca, and Mme. Trebelli Maffeo Orsini. Such an opera, and in this wise cast, calls for no special comment: it is sufficient to state that the singers were in good voice, the audience warm, the house well filled. Sig. Bettini claims notice, for his Gennaro is a novelty to London. His assumption was a success: he looks well, sings well. Mlle. Tietjens came in for her usual share of applause. Band and chorus, if not strong, were efficient for the numbers; Sig. Arditì at his post again demonstrated the vigor and zeal of an accomplished conductor.

On Tuesday the "Nozze di Figaro" was given, on Thursday the "Barbier," on Friday "Il Trovatore," and on Saturday the Amerieu prima donna, Miss—or Mlle., as she is now to be called, by that mysterious rule which is so despotic in the musical world—Clara Louise Kellogg appears. Opera-goers are curious concerning her arrival, for a very favorable report precedes her, and Brother Jonathan is fanatico per la Kellogg.—Orchestra, Nov. 2d.

It is curious to note the ecstasies of the London critics about Miss Kellogg. Is it possible that so high a strain can hold out? Here is our veteran expert of the Times, for instance, (yet we were pained to read in a paper of the same date with the debut, November 2d, that J. W. Davison was seriously ill at Malvern:)

"Never did operatic heroine find so many admirable representatives within so brief an interval of time; and now we have to welcome, and right heartily to welcome, another in Mlle. Kellogg, the original Margaret of America, one well worthy to figure in the brilliant gallery. We are tired of making comparisons between one Margaret and another; and the distinctions after all are neither so broad in outline nor so subtle in detail as to be worth repeatedly dwelling upon. Enough that Mlle. Kellogg takes the exclusively sentimental view, in direct opposition to Mlle. Lucen. She appears to possess every requisite, physical and mental, for the full and satisfactory delineation of the character, unquestionably one of the most engaging in the entire repertory of modern lyric drama. Her voice is a legitimate soprano of extremely agreeable quality, flexible, as was shown by her facile delivery of the well-known apostrophe to the jewels in the garden scene, telling and resonant, rather than distinguished by any extraordinary degree of power, always at ready command, and—merit not to be overestimated!—always in tune. Mlle. Kellogg has a voice, indeed, that leaves little to wish for, [!?!] and proves by her use of it that her studies have been both assiduous and in the right path. She is, in fact, though so young, a thoroughly accomplished singer—in the school at any rate, towards which the music of M. Gounod consistently leans, and which essentially differs from the florid school of Rossini and the Italians before Verdi.

"One of the great charms of her singing is her perfect enunciation of the words she has to utter. She never sacrifices sense to sound, but fits the verbal text to the music as if she attached equal importance to each. Then her phrasing is highly finished, her cadences being so well rounded off as to satisfy the most tutored and exacting ear, and this notwithstanding an occasional tendency to drag the time and over-elaborate expression. Of the Italian language she seems a thorough mistress, and we may well believe that she speaks it both fluently and correctly. These manifest advantages, added to a graceful figure, a countenance full of intelligence, and undoubted dramatic capacity, make up a sum of attraction to be envied, and easily explain the interest excited by Mlle. Kellogg at the outset and maintained by her to the end.

"A favorable impression was produced in the very beginning by the brief reply to Faust in the scene of the Kermesse, which, nevertheless, was in our opinion a little overstrained for what is merely a quiet rebuff to the advances of a somewhat forward stranger. The garden scene, from the plaintive romance at the spinning wheel to the end, was full of genuine expression, and marked by high dramatic intelligence. Each salient passage was at once understood and applauded by the audience, and the curtain fell upon a success that left no further cause for apprehension. Mlle. Kellogg may have felt nervous in this important scene, but she rarely allowed it to be perceptible; and the perfect ease with which she executed the more trying passages of the 'jewel song,' beginning with the not always by every Margaret too evenly-balanced shake, showed an undisturbed command of her resources. The air was called for again unanimously, but wisely not repeated.

"Into the beautiful duet with Faust, the 'gem' of the opera, Mlle. Kellogg threw herself heart and soul, making every point tell—at times, perhaps, a little too much, as though she anticipated every point that was coming, a peculiarity, however, which may not be a fixed habit, but on such an eventful occasion attributable to a very natural anxiety. To desist from further particularizing, the last two scenes—the scene of the Cathedral, where Margaret vainly endeavors to pray, and that of the prison and the apotheosis, where the good triumphs over the evil principle—were alike forcible and impressive. In her delivery of the final trio, where the melody rises higher and higher as the resolution of Margaret grows in strength, Mlle. Kellogg exhibited tokens of a physical power which until then had been less apparent. In conclusion we may add that there was evidently not a dissentient opinion as to the merits of the new singer, who was called before the lamps after every act and overwhelmed with applause."

And here is what the News says of her:

"For many years past some of the best artists, vocal and instrumental, of the old world have been heard in the new, and America seems likely now to repay the obligation by sending us exponents of an equally high order. Mlle. Adelina Patti, it is true, is neither American by birth nor training, but she is inseparably identified with that country by her residence there since childhood, and the triumphant recognition and popularity which she first gained there. Mlle. Kellogg, however, is a native American who has never until recently been out of her own country; and, as above stated, has made no public appearance in Europe until the occasion now referred to.

"* * * * * This lady, indeed, appears to have every requisite to command here that popularity and success which she has enjoyed for the past four or five years in her own country. She is young; her face is full of intelligence and expression; her figure, of middle stature, graceful whether in repose or action; and her gestures and by-play were invariably appropriate and unembarrassed even under the inevitable anxiety of a first appearance. Her voice, commanding a compass of two octaves, is brilliant in its upper range without being weak in its lower tones—the quality resonant and sufficiently powerful even for the large space of Her Majesty's Theatre—while it possesses that rare sympathetic tone without which the most faultless execution and brilliant style must fail to realize the true object of musical expression. To these natural and personal advantages, Mlle. Kellogg adds that of finished training in the best school of vocal execution—her performance throughout having evidenced the thorough preparation of studentship in all those executive details so essential to the formation of a great singer, and so frequently neglected or hurriedly passed through by aspirants for such a position.

Germany.

(From the London Athenæum.)

"Tell it not in Herr Wagner's kingdom of Bavaria," writes our Correspondent, "that all which he and his subjects, kingly, priestly and lay, have written, said and done, has not availed to avert the invasion of the operas of that pernicious Italian, Signor Verdi—a composer not, like Herr Offenbach, to be tolerated by the sublime with placid acquiescence, as one licensed to delight fools of quality, silly students, and frivolous girls, but as shocking and serious in his way as the author of Lohengrin's self. What is more, Signor Verdi's music is as little genial to German singers as music can be, owing to the excess of southern accent required. No matter. After having left 'Rigoletto' at Frankfort, I found 'Il Trovatore' at Würzburg. It was some compensation, in the grand and rich cathedral there (which, by its splendor, not without much florid false taste, always seems to me the fit scene for Mozart's unequal Masses), to hear a burial-service, on a modest scale, so reverentially performed and so well chanted as to merit a note. The accompaniment of the organ was admirable for its resource, reserve and gravity. Here was the real effect for which so many composers have strained without success, and which has never been approached more closely than by M. Gounod in the opening of the church-scene in 'Faust.' To come back to the present plight of opera in Germany,—even in Herr Wagner's own capital, Munich,—his productions fare but badly. For October Festival there, an annual sort of fair, the operas chosen were Meyerbeer's 'L'Etoile' and 'L'Africaine'; Lortzing's 'Undine,' 'Norma,' and 'Le Nozze.' Calderon's 'Magico Prodigioso' was also played with incidental music by Herr Reimberger. While play-bills are our subject, 'Così fan tutte' may be mentioned as having been given at Frankfort; 'Il Barbier' at towns as widely apart as Hamburg and Augsburg; and in the latter town, a small Sing-spiel, with the title 'Franz Schubert'—another proof of the increasing interest gathering round the name of that man of genius. M. von Flotow's sickly 'Stradella' seems to hold the public at Cologne. It is possible that the very high terms demanded for the permission to represent 'Romeo and Juliet' may limit the performances of that opera in Germany, where everything that bears Gounod's name seems to excite curiosity. M. von Hulsen, the Government head administrator of Prussian operatic affairs, has thought it worth while to publish in the papers an explanatory manifesto. The opera, however, is to be given at Dresden."

"You have mentioned Herr Bilse's touring monster concerts. They are worthy of attention in spite of a name which raises false expectations, and is thus calculated to create a prejudice. Herr Bilse is wisely catholic in his programmes, showing himself afraid neither of the ancients nor of the moderns, and thus affording his public good opportunities for comparison. He conducts with no ordinary spirit and power. His band is not a very good one—only sixty in number, and the stringed instruments are overbalanced by the wind ones, especially in modern scores; many of them being in the hands of mere boys. But it plays con amore as a band inspired and controlled by the baton. The evening I heard it, it was severely taxed—first in Herr Gade's dreamy 'Ossian' Overture (so near, yet not quite, being a first-rate musical poem). Next came Herr Abert's 'Columbus' Symphony, now clearly established as one of the best modern German works of its class. This was wrought up superbly; and great was the impression made by the picturesque slow movement, 'Evening on the sea,' and the stirring finale. Thirdly, we had another work of the romantic school, the 'Tannhäuser' Overture. It was a real pleasure to hear orchestral music performed so earnestly, without the slightest affectation. The exhibition is one to rank with those by which Herr Manns has made himself famous in England, or (to take a German parallel) with that of the miniature band conducted by Herr Liebig, which pleased me so much, a few autumns ago, at Berlin."

To offer a few more foreign notes made on the spot—"The German winter season of instrumental music has set in," writes our Correspondent. "To judge from the programmes of orchestral and choral concerts, no less important than those of Berlin, Cologne and Stuttgart, the 'new ideas' have as yet not shot far. At the first Gürzenich Concert at Cologne, besides Cherubini's Overture to 'Les Abencerages,' which is as good as unknown in London, and besides other excellent but more familiar masterpieces, a new composition for voices and orchestra, by Herr Ferdinand Hiller, was performed; also Herr Gade's 'Frühlingsbotschaft,' one of the most graceful specimens of his peculiar talent. At Stuttgart, on a similar occasion, M. Félicien David's 'Desert' Symphony made up the second part; and Fräulein Mehlig played Chopin's Concerto in the first. In the North the violinists in request seem to be Herren Joachim, Lauterbach, and Wilhelmj; at Cologne was to be heard Fräulein Friese, of whose very great promise mention was made here after a hearing of her at Leipzig."

"While Herr Bilsé was giving his good Symphonic Concerts in Munich, another conductor, better known by name in England, though only as the successor of Strauss, Lanner and Labitzky, Herr Gung'l, was there with his 'ehapel' of musicians. His selections were amusing and miscellaneous. In those wonderful Caves of Trophonius, where the tobacco reek is so thick as to remind one of the Irishman's graphic description of a smell 'strong enough to hang a hat on,'—and where the beloved Bavarian drinkable is served at the allowance of some half-dozen huge glasses to each thirsty soul by smart looking bermaids in pinafores,—Herr Gung'l, who goes the round of 'the Shades,' ventures all manner of music, and attends to the execution of the same, whether it be frivolous or extra-mystical, with as much spirit as if anything more sterling than a polka was really responded to by his beer and tobacco public. It was strange in such a locality to hear Beethoven's Overture to 'The Ruins of Athens.' It was interesting, in spite of the suffocating atmosphere, to make acquaintance with the Abbé Liszt's 'Huldigung's' March. This might have been as noble a procession-tune as any in being; for its first thoughts have pomp, brilliancy and distinctness, suggesting regular motion, set off with rich and delicate instrumentation,—had not the writer been led away by the demon who is perpetually whispering in his ear, and tempting him into the commonplaces of crudity on the false pretext of warning him away from the commonplaces of platitude. There is in musical history no matter for deeper regret and graver speculation than the career and the compositions of this noble man of genius."

"Herr Leschetitzky's opera, 'Die Erste Falte,' was the other day produced at Prague; also, another new musical drama, 'Der Wald zur Herrmannstadt,' by Herr Westmeyer.—During the past month, 'Dinorah' has been played at Frankfurt; 'Tambhäuser' at Berlin, and 'Rienzi' and Halévy's 'L'Eclair' at Dresden; M. Auber's 'La Part du Diable' (an opera which, in Germany, retains a place not held by it in France) at Vienna. There, too, has been given Mr Balfe's best opera, 'Les Quatre Fils Aymon,' at Carlsruhe, Lortzing's 'Wildschütz' and 'Don Juan,' at Wismar, the imperishable 'Nozze' of Mozart; at Osnabrück, 'Don Juan,' at Bremen, Signor Rossini's 'William Tell,' at Cracow, 'Lucrezia Borgia,' at Düsseldorf, 'Norma,' at Augsburg and at Stuttgart, 'Martha,' in the Swabian capital, also, 'Rigoletto,' at Brunn, Lortzing's 'Waffenschmidt,' at Ulm, Lortzing's 'Czaar' and 'Il Trovatore,' and at Mannheim, Lortzing's 'Wildschütz.'—Having said that Herr Offenbach's burlesques are everywhere, it has been needless to swell the list with reiteration of their titles. To describe how they are vulgarized in translation and execution, and yet how they seem to supply a German want, would be no pleasant task, save for chroniclers of Mr. Croaker's family. There is danger in dogmatizing from data such as the above desultory list contains; yet they have a value and instruction. There is a consistency in their inconsistency, which it would be well worth the trouble of analyzing by any one not compelled to write to the moment of 'folly as it flies.'"

"The Guide Books stand in need of revision as regards what is to be met with in Germany north and south. Some twenty years ago the Michaelis-Kirche in Munich was reputed to be almost the only place on our side of the Alps where the choral unaccompanied Masses of the old Italian masters could be heard well executed. The writer has again and again tried in former years to verify this recommendation, (which still stands in the Red Book,) without success, and many other tourists have shared his disappointment. On the other hand, a very fine unaccompanied musical service was to be heard, a Sunday or two ago, at the Theater Kirche: fine as regards the execution;—the composition not being of extraordinary merit. But the charm of true pure, voices singing in concord, especially when given in conjunction with the stately ceremonials of Rome, defies analysis. There is no criticizing service music from hearing it in church. It becomes almost difficult to estimate its intrinsic worth when it is removed from the scene for which it was prepared. A place of worship, no matter what the creed, and a concert-room have, and should excite, different associations and emotions."

"A morning may be profitably given to Ulm by any one desirous of breaking the journey betwixt Strasburg and Vienna, especially if he takes interest in that great musical mystery, the organ. The enormous instrument built for the Cathedral by Herr Walkler, of Ludwigsburg (it has been said almost to the ruin of the builder,) is now to be heard, by appointment, for a fee of two Kronthalers (eight shillings, or thereabouts,) one-half of which goes to the fund in aid of the works of restoration in progress. The organ—curiously described in the Red Book as having one hundred 'pipes' (for stops)—deserves a place in the first rank of organs. The full sound is stupendous; and, by ingenious combinations, readily within reach of the player, any amount of climax is attainable. The tone of the choir-organ (to employ our English term) is also rich and sweet—perhaps not equalling that of the Silbermann organs, nor the admirable and picturesque instrument not far from Ulm,—Mynheer Gabelaar's organ at Weingarten; but far more satisfactory to English tastes than the thinner and more nasal tone, to which such skilled builders of the grand new French organs as MM. Dueroquet and Cavaille-Coll are not averse. With all this fullness, the upper octave of the great Ulm organ, when all its stops are drawn, is not made unpleasant by that shrieking indistinctness which we have too often to put up with in England. Of course there is no end of show or solo stops; some of these, however, are exceeded elsewhere, as at Haarlem, Fribourg, and one or two other places. The instrument has no common advantages of position, owing to the great height of the church. The supply of wind is equal to its requirements. It is fairly well exhibited by a player who takes obvious pride in his charge. Were Ulm not the picturesque old city it is, with a physiognomy of its own, the cathedral organ, it may be repeated, is well worth waiting a few hours to hear. But four-fifths of tourists calling themselves musical, it may be feared, would prefer to enjoy some coarse presentation of a hackneyed opera in translation."

The journals speak well of Mlle. Mille, at Weimar, as a singer of promise. This is the daughter of one of the most agreeable German singers in our recollection.—M. Roger is announced as engaged for one of the opera-houses at Vienna.—The newly-appointed state-conductor for the Käntner Thor Theater there, Herr Esser, is described as giving satisfaction.—Signor Marchisio, brother of the two well-known singers, has been singing luffa parts at the Italian Opera in Berlin.—A monument to Graun is in contemplation.—Mr. A. S. Sullivan's Overture 'In Memoriam' was performed at the second Gesellschafts Concert at Leipzig, under his own direction.—There is a rumor that Herr Rietz may succeed Herr Hauptmann in his functions at the music school there.—It would seem that the sum subscribed there in aid of the funds for Mendelssohn scholarships at Leipzig has been allowed to sink into the ground—otherwise, to have been absorbed—without reckoning or inquiry.—The new theatre is to be opened before New Year's Day.

Popular Concerts of orchestral music are coming into fashion everywhere. A series is to be opened in Brussels on the 17th of this month, directed by M. Simon, who already announces the programme for his first entertainment. This is worth citing for its originality and enterprise, which includes Cherubini's Overture to 'Ali Baba,' Herr Abert's 'Astorga,' a Scherzo by Herr Jadassohn (of Leipzig?), and one of Handel's Concertos.

'Mignon,' the best, because the least forced, of all the clever operas by M. Ambroise Thomas, after having kept the stage of the Opéra Comique for a twelvemonth, is now to begin its travels in Germany at Berlin, with Mlle. Lucia for the heroine.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 4.—The first Conservatory of Music Matinée came off at the New Horticultural Hall, Saturday, November 2, giving promise of a series of entertainments of the highest order. The programme opened with the great Beethoven Sonata for Piano and Violin, op. 47, in the difficult violin part of which Mr. Gaertner is the finished violinist, and the high-toned sympathetic artist. As Mr. Jarvis in the piano part also displayed much excellence, the Sonata proved a great treat. The other pieces in the programme were Schubert's "Wanderer," as Horn solo, performed by Heineman, and that lovely Mozart Clarinet Quintet, played by the Philadelphia "Classical Quintette Club," under direction of Mr. Gaertner. It was very pleasant to hear the Club once more, and the old attendants of years are looking forward to the rest of this series of twenty matinees with much pleasure.

The attendance was good, so that the Hall, although large for a chamber concert, was quite respectably filled. The stage was adorned with handsome bouquets of flowers, placed in the vases intended for use in the Horticultural displays, which struck us as a very pretty idea. It was interesting to watch amongst the audience the large numbers of the pupils of the Conservatory, for whose cultivation the concerts are given. On the very front benches sat a party of bright faced boys, who were doubtless attending their first classical concert, and amongst them might be noted more than one earnest little listener. It is an excellent thing for these children thus early in the course of their musical training to be made to listen to the works of the masters; for although they cannot, of course, be expected to appreciate, they will in time, from only hearing the highest and best, acquire a taste that will prevent their caring for anything else.

The Conservatory has had an unprecedented success in Philadelphia, which can only be accounted for by taking into consideration the unwearied labors in its behalf of the gentlemen associated in its direction, Mr. Carl Gaertner, Musical Director, and Mr. Jefferson E. Williams, President. To them are due the thanks of the public for the sixty free scholarships, for three years' tuition, offered to pupils of our public schools, as well as for the advantages to be derived from the entire institution. In the paying departments of the school there are five hundred scholars of different degrees of advancement, and as all the classes come under the supervision of Mr. Gaertner as musical Director, we may rest assured that the studies prescribed all tend in the true direction.

C. MERRILL.

CHICAGO, Nov. 4.—To furnish the musical news of this vicinity judiciously watered with tells, at first sight seems easy enough. And so it would be were it not for the "judicious" part of the programme. Seriously, every body is so busy out here, minding their own business, that little news is manufactured. Just now we are assisted by Max Strakosch and his troupe, who give us ten nights and two matinees of Italian Opera. Last week they gave Il Trovatore, The Barber, Norma, Lucia, Ernani, and, by way of da capo, Il Trovatore again at the matinee. Mme. LA GRANGE appeared successively as Leonora, Norma, Lucia and Elvira. Her impersonations were received with enthusiastic admiration by the brilliant and overflowing audiences of the past week. Although her voice is not quite so fresh as it once was, her lyric and dramatic talents are so great as to cause the audience to quite lose sight of whatever of short coming an impassible critic might discern. ADELAIDE PHILLIPS has appeared as Azucena, Adalgisa, and Rosina. In the first and last of these impersonations her success was "immense." Her Rosina is pronounced superior to any hitherto heard in Chicago. So also is La Grange's Norma. In his appropriate line we have had BRIGNOLI, with more than his previous success; SESINI, who has been nearly hors de combat as to his voice; MASSIMILIANI, RANDOLFI, MARA, COLLETTI, and SARTI. All of these have been well received. The chorus is fair, but light. The orchestra is fuller and better than we have usually had here in opera. Taken all in all, Chicago thinks Max Strakosch is a "brick," and pats him on the back and tickles his pocket accordingly. To-night is Martha; Don Pasquale, Lucrezia Borgia and Don Giovanni follow.

In the Sunday School and clap-trap line we have had concerts by four hundred children at Farwell hall, in the new building of the Young Men's Christian Association. These have been reasonably well attended. Perhaps I ought to have said "unreasonably well."

J. W. Adams is drilling a chorus in connection with the Chicago Art School, and a concert is on hand. This Art school has four "strings to its bow"—which is a very proper musical arrangement—teaching Music, Painting, Sculpture, and Elocution and Light Gymnastics. The later two come under the head of Oratory. It is suggested to add presently a theological chair of Heavy Gymnastics. Mr. Robert Goldbeck gave a piano-forte matinee in Crosby's Music Hall last Thursday afternoon. The programme embraced Beethoven's Sonata in D, op. 10, No. 3, Thalberg's Lucia, Liszt's "Misereve of Palestrina," Willmers' "Hungarian Rhapsody," and "Lake Mahopac," and an "Auld lang syne" and "Sogni d'Amore" of his own. Mrs. Carrington, a very pleasant soprano of local celebrity, sang Goldbeck's "Invocation" and Moelen's "Song of Home." Not being present I cannot give a more particular account. Next week we are promised your "Quintette Club."

And now by way of exhortation, suffer me a word to Bostonians and other Down-Easters coming west. If there is any human being more cockney-ish than one born "within sound of Bow bells" it is a Bostonian on the western tour. The rawness, greenness, boorishness, ignorance, stupidity and general mal-appropriateness they manage to discern in western people and ways, is so very surprising as to raise a suspicion that some of these parties look through colored spectacles. The order and motto of their going is emphatically "Nil admirari." All of which is respectfully submitted by

DER FREYSCHUTZ.

FARMINGTON, CONN., NOV. 14. Again we have been visited by the three Magi from the East, bringing rich offerings! Our annual little music feasts here (at Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School) are always an event with us, eagerly anticipated, and bearing fruit long afterwards; and so we like to spread the joyful news for the benefit of all who are like-minded. The programmes speak for themselves and for the object of our striving.

31st Concert, Nov. 13.

Sonata for Piano and Violin, A major, op. 47 Beethoven.
Variations Concertantes, for Violoncello and Piano, op. 17. Mendelssohn.
Romance, Scherzino and Intermezzo, for Piano, op. 26 Schumann.
Aria and Gavotte, for Violin, Bach.
Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, E flat, op. 100. Schubert.

32d Concert, Nov. 14.

Sonata for Piano and Violin, E flat, No. 380. Mozart.
Adagio for Violoncello Nardini.
Polonaise for Piano, E flat, op. 22. Chopin.
Sonata for Violin, D minor, Rust.
Presto Scherzando for Piano (Posthumous). Mendelssohn.
Trio for Piano, Violin and Cello, E flat, op. 70, No. 2. Beethoven.

The execution was, as might be expected of such artists, faultless. THOMAS, MILLS and BERGNER have for years belonged to "ours"; they play here as if were en famille, and with double zeal and enthusiasm for a public that meets them sympathetically. (By the way, the last appearance of Thomas and Mills, before their trip to Europe, was made here with us, and so was the first since their return).

In the way of novelties, they gave us this time a Violin Sonata by F. W. Rust (1739-96), a contemporary of Friedemann Bach,—a work in a large, broad style, somewhat in the Tartini school, and in respect to form distinguished by a charmingly sportive Gigue, which, interrupted by other movements, constantly comes back again. It is a grateful, but difficult piece, for violin players, and Ferd. David has done a good service in digging up this old treasure.

Also new was a Larghetto from a Violin Sonata by P. Nardini (1722-93), a pupil of Tartini. This is a soul-ful, noble song, which lost nothing by being transferred to the violoncello; both in melody and harmony it sounds quite modern.

The Intermezzo from the fantastical "Faschingsschwank in Wien" (Viennese Carnival), op. 26, of Schumann, is one of the most beautiful piano pieces that he wrote. In its dark, impassioned feeling it reminds us of the mood of the well-known song: "Ich grolle nicht." We commend it especially to all piano players.

As additions to the programme, Mills played the Romanza from the first, and the Larghetto from the second Concerto of Chopin; and Thomas played Schumann's "Abendlied," as transcribed for the violin by Joachim. κ.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 23, 1867.

Music in Boston.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT. Thursday Afternoon, Nov. 9. The third season of eight concerts, already guaranteed by 1,300 season subscribers, 250 more than last year, opened with such a goodly show of audience, and of the best kind, as makes it the duty of the Harvard Musical Association not only to persevere in the good work they have begun, but to neglect no means of strengthening and perfecting their orchestra, and making the concerts better and better, until their very character shall place them beyond the possibility of failure. Many think that this is already accomplished; it will not do to forget, however, that what does not go forward is pretty sure to fall behind. Surely no better encouragement could be desired than such an audience as that was; artistic sensibility, refinement, love for what is best, respect for what is nobly and sincerely meant, looked out from all those faces; they were true listeners, and the tone of the occasion seemed to pervade all. Through two long Symphonies you saw no sign of attention flagging; the smile of real pleasure did not fade away. There were some restless ones, to be sure, who left the Hall during the last minutes of the last piece, and, as the Advertiser truly observed, in its wholesome lecture the next morning, had the concert been only fifteen minutes long, instead of two hours and a quarter, such persons would think it necessary to get out in the thirteenth minute. Some doubtless had good excuse for going; but the majority on all occasions start up before the time is out, merely from the selfish motive of securing a clear exit before the crowd, not caring how much they disturb others. But a few dozen such disturbers do not destroy the fact that the mass of that great audience sat and listened with delight to the last note.—The programme was as follows:

Dedication Overture, ("Weihe des Hauses"), in C, Op. 124. Beethoven.
Tenor Aria, "Coostanze!" from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" Mozart.
Symphony, in C, ("Jupiter,") G. L. Osgood.
Overture, "In the Highlands" N. W. Gade.
Songs—
a. "Suleika" Schubert.
b. "Schöne Fremde" Schumann.
"Scotch" Symphony, in A minor, op. 56. Mendelssohn.

That Overture of Beethoven had been heard only once before in Boston. Mr. Zerrahn gave it at the end of one of his concerts in March, 1860, after the Seventh Symphony, one of Liszt's "Symphonic Poems," Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto, parts of a Chopin Concerto, &c. The note we then made of it was as follows:

"One is of course thankful to make acquaintance with another of Beethoven's famous overtures. That called "Die Weihe des Hauses" (the dedication of the house) is essentially an opening overture, and would have had much more effect at the beginning than at the end of a concert. It was written for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre in Vienna, and bears the opus number 124 among Beethoven's works, the Choral Symphony being op. 125. . . It did not strike us as at all comparable to the Leonore, Egmont or Coriolan overtures. The opening is solemn, festal, grandiose, but sounding common for Beethoven; after the fugue-like theme sets in, however, the real Beethoven fire kindles, and it grows more and more interesting to the end. A key to much of its peculiarity is found in the fact that in Germany it goes often by the name of 'the Overture in Handel's manner.'"

This time, hearing it at the beginning not only of a concert but of a noble series of concerts, and otherwise under more propitious circumstances, we think it did make a decided impression on the audience. By no means as perfect a work as the three above named, it opens solemnly and grandly, in a religious vein indeed (for some of the harmonies are church-like), attuning the mind to noble thought and exciting a great expectation; which the Handelian theme, bursting out with uncontainable nervous fire, and wrought up with exhaustless ingenuity, quite realizes. Now and then in its unexpected modulations it reminds you for a moment of the Leonore overture, and sometimes it touches the vein of the Ninth Symphony. It only needed a very powerful body of violins; otherwise it was played with vigor and precision, and it is a theme of general surprise that nine first violins (so many of the old leaders gone) could tell so efficaciously. Mr. ZERRAHN had rehearsed them earnestly, and they had gone into it with zeal.

The two Symphonies have been too often heard and discussed here, to need any description. Both were so well played as to bring out admirably the contrast between them. The one, pure musical creation, without thought of any purpose, perfect in form, concise, complete, felicitous in development, exquisite in detail and coloring, full of fascination. Well could the Englishman call it the Jupiter of Symphonies. And there is something essentially classical, as it were Grecian, in its smooth, rounded symmetry. The wonderfully complex Finale, with four themes worked up all at once in fugue form, never came out so clearly and enjoyably before from any of our orchestras; the individual vitality of each theme, each little fragment of a theme, was felt,—although of course a greater mass of strings would have been better. The exquisite wind passages, too, in the earlier movements, especially the delicious dialogue of the two bassoons, so thoroughly Mezzartish, must have stolen away the senses of the most obstinate anti-classicist.

The Gade overture: "Im Hochland" was a congenial prelude to the Scotch Symphony:—both perfect specimens of the modern romantic, picturesque vein of orchestral music. It is an exquisite strain of tone color; such rich, rare blending of instruments, fresh, wild, full of charming surprises, soothing and invigorating as wide mountain views. Once a great solemn silence makes itself audible as it were in the hush of all but an instrument or two; again all is life and jubilation; nature's holy quiet is invaded by the ringing hunting strain of enterprising mountain climbers.—The Symphony, too, often as it has been heard among us, became new for us, richer, finer, grander than ever. Of course the Scherzando, with its enticing, playful theme (so delightfully played by our new clarinet), and its marked and positively mocking emphasis of a little characteristically Scotch cadence, was the thing most applauded. But the large and rich unfolding of the first movement, the great crescendo where its elements swell to a storm, and most of all the deep, calm, solemn music of the Adagio (in which we scarcely missed our leading 'cello, so well did Mr. Suck's instrument sing the cantabile), held the hearer even more deeply spell-bound.

The vocal pieces between each Overture and Symphony made the concert longer by the clock, but only shorter to the sense and feeling. They formed a graceful and delightful recreation between the more earnest efforts of attention; for a good song costs no effort to the hearer. The selections, exquisite in themselves and rare, were beautifully sung. The spirit of each, especially the Lieder in the second part, was finely caught and rendered. Mr. Osgood's voice, though thus far lacking all the weight desirable in that great hall, has yet a singularly vital, telling kind of vibration, and a lovely quality of tone; if it is slightly nasal, there is a sort of purple, fruity bloom upon it, so that it seems all the more interesting. He has evidently studied well in his one year in Germany; his method is sound; he knows how to economize his power; and he flings himself into his song with such hearty, unaffected zeal, so full of its beauty, so forgetful of himself, that the pleasure you derive from hearing is really artistic and poetic; you are not taken physically by storm; it is not the cheap commonplaces of singing that bring the house down. Voice and style of singing show unusual refinement. As for power, there is more yet to be developed, we are sure; Mr. Osgood is very young; it was his first attempt in a great hall and with orchestra; a complete tenor requires the whole man physically and mentally built up and mature.—The Aria from Die Entführung, in which the lover waits with trembling, palpitating joy for sight of his Constanze (Mozart was wooing his own Constanze when he composed that most love-inspired opera) is perhaps the finest of all Mozart's tenor airs. Its expression is warm and true to the life; and how significantly and sympathetically the instruments in those little figures catch their breath and imitate the heart's quick beating! The accompaniments might have been played more sensitively, but the singer succeeded in carrying the song to the heart of his audience. Schubert's "Suleika," composed to one of the little Persian-like love poems in Goethe's West-Oestliche Divan, is about as perfect and thoroughly original a song as he ever wrote—for not a few of even Schubert's several hundred songs is commonplace. This was beautifully sung, and so was the impassioned little strain by Schumann. The singer was constrained to round off the little group by singing another of the most beautiful of Schubert's songs, called in French "Le Secret;" he sang it in English. The unsurpassable excellence of Mr.

DRESEL'S piano accompaniment, inspiring to a singer who has any soul in him, was of course a very important element in the success of these songs.

The Second Concert (past ere this appears) will show a material gain of power in the violin and 'cello part of the Orchestra, which will be felt in Beethoven's B-flat Symphony, and in the Overtures to Medea (Cherubini) and Oberon. The programme further includes a Mozart Concerto for two pianos, played by Messrs. LANG and PARKER; and a most noble, comforting Bach aria, Mozart's "Deh vieni," and songs by Franz and Dresel, sung by Mrs. CARY.

In the third Concert (Dec. 5.) the experiment of two Symphonies, which worked so well when we had long ones, will be repeated with two short ones; namely one by Haydn, in G, never played in Boston, and another one of Gade's, No. 4, in B-flat. As those do not employ the full powers of the modern Orchestra, the two overtures are selected with a view to supplying that contrast; they will be Weber's Euryanthe and Schumann's Genoveva, both very rich and brilliant, and needing to be better known, though they have appeared in the programmes of the two last years. For vocal refreshment, Mrs. JENNY KEMPTON, she of the rich contralto, who has come back from Europe an artistic, finished singer, with a noble style, will sing "Non più di fiori" from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito, and one or two smaller pieces.

Mr. LANG will play a Beethoven Concerto in the fifth Concert; CAMILLA URSO will play Beethoven's Violin Concerto in the sixth; HUGO LEONHARD, Chopin's E-minor Concerto in the seventh; and the Ninth Symphony will crown the season in the eighth.

ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY. Our old German Männer-Chor, still flourishing under Mr. KREISSMANN'S leadership, and only too prosperous with their great accession of "passive" members, invited their friends on Saturday evening, Nov. 9, to one of their pleasant Soirées. This time it was held at the Boston Museum, which was full. The programme, altogether choice, was largely composed of interesting novelties.

Hymn. "Herr unser Gott, erhöre unser Flehen." Schubert.
 Trio. Piano, Violin and Cello. E flat major. Schubert.
 Song. Barcarole. Schubert.
 Chorus. "Nachtgesang im Walde." Schubert.
 Chorus. Scenen von "Friedrich's Sage, No. 1 and 6." Max Bruch.
 Chorus. "Lebenstust." Hiller.
 Andante and Variations, from Sonata, op. 47. Beethoven.
 Song. a Maria. b. Am Rhein. c. Dedication. Franz.
 Chorus. "Ossian." Beschnitt.
 Duet. From the "Marriage of Figaro." Soprano and Tenor. Mozart.
 Chorus. "Auf dem Rhein." Kuckon.

The Schubert Hymn (Quartet and Chorus of male voices) was quite impressive, but, owing perhaps to the unaccustomed place and the heat, suffered in its rendering. The other choruses went better; especially the scenes from the new composer Max Bruch's "Friedrich's Sage," in which Mr. SCHRAUBSTAEDTER gave the frequent cantabile recitative with fine voice and expression; and the music was decidedly interesting, flowing naturally, very delicate and refined in style. We hope to hear the whole work, which is written for male voices. Mr. S. also sang, with his usual unction, the three songs by Franz. Another charming, happy composition was Hiller's "Zest of Life," a soprano solo, with background of male quartet, sweetly sung by a pupil of Mr. Kreissmann's, who also sang the Mozart duet with her teacher. Messrs. LEONHARD, EICHBERG and A. SUECK were the interpreters of the fine Schubert Trio and the "Kreutzer" Variations, and of course they were done artistically. Would that such choice feasts came oftener!

The HARRISON CONCERTS, as far as Mme. PARRA-ROSA was concerned, were mainly Ballad Concerts, addressed to a ballad public, which here as in any other city can always outvote the really musica public. She did sing "Deh vieni," and "Angels ever bright and fair;" but the rest was nearly all English ballads. And cannot a great singer show her quality even in a simple ballad? Certainly; but then it seems a pity that so great an artist should not be greater employed; there is so much of the finest music always waiting for such singers!

The other elements of the five concerts—we have spoken of the first—were the Buffo songs of Signor FERRANTI (who under the name of "Sacred Songs by Handel and Mozart" sang with a solemn face on Sunday evenings something in the very modern Italian taste,) and the instrumental virtuosity of ROSA and DE MEYER, whose playing was fine, but their selections, especially on Sunday, backbited and of the ad captandum order. We may except the Romance in G, of Beethoven, and (had it not been heard so often) the Haydn Souvenir, as played by Rosa. De Meyer, however interesting, would always work himself up into a grotesque furor, which of course pleased the groundlings. If ovoros are the measure of a good Concert, they were as thick as blackberries all the time. The Organ introduits and crits, had the grotesqueness, without the individuality which saved the veteran pianist.—Never mind, each kind of thing has its audience; we shall soon have Mme. Rosa in her great sphere of Oratorio.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY, in remarkably good force and condition, judging from the zeal shown in rehearsals, announce public performances for this and to-morrow evening. The first will consist of selections from "St. Paul" and the "Creation," besides Mendelssohn's beautiful Cantata: "As the hart pants," entire, Mrs. JENNY KEMPTON and Miss HOUSTON being the soloists. For Sunday evening, Handel's Oratorio, "Samson," with the same two ladies, Messrs. JAMES and M. W. WHITNEY and Mr. H. WILDE in the solos. The orchestra is that of the Symphony Concerts with its new accessions, Mr. LANG plays the Organ and CARL ZERRAHN conducts.

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.—The first concert of the Philharmonic Society, last Saturday evening, at the Academy of Music, appears to have been a great success. We copy from the Evening Post:

The orchestra numbered just a hundred performers, the list of whose names on the programme included a majority of the best known soloists in the city, while the direction fell into the hands of Mr. Carl Bergmann, whose equal as a leader of large orchestras it is difficult to find anywhere. With such material, under such leadership, the inspiration of the immense audience of Saturday evening was all that was needed to ensure a perfectly even, artistic and spirited performance, and this was exactly what was enjoyed on this occasion.

The opening selection was "Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony," whose massive grandeur, wonderful harmonies, tranquil and idyllic beauties, and delicate gradations of light and shade have never been more correctly and feelingly interpreted here. A single performance of this kind more than justifies all of the labors incident to the organization and training of a society like the Philharmonic, which conferred an inestimable public benefit by giving this great and incomparable work in a style so admirable. Mr. Richard Hoffmann played Mozart's Concerto (Op. 8, in D minor), with an orchestral accompaniment. The purity of Mr. Hoffmann's style of playing was never better exemplified, nor the remarkable quality of his touch. In these days, when the piano has to endure so much torturing at the hands of the gymnastic school of performers, it is delightful to hear a player who can interpret simply and with feeling such pure music as that of the concerto referred to. The other soloist of the evening was Mme. Camille Urso, who performed Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin (op. 64, in E) with all of her usual excellence of execution, and won a most enthusiastic storm of applause. In some respects she surpassed herself, and, in particular, exhibited somewhat more than her ordinary animation. As a mere executant she probably has no equal in this country. Such accuracy, exquisite taste and entire control of the resources of the violin as she displays would provoke a furor of admiration, were there more of that indefinable something which may be called inspiration or genius.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which transmutes into musical expression the spirit of Byron's famous poem, was given with animation, and a fine appreciation of its wild and supernatural elements. Somewhat more strong and less musical in its character was the "Poeme Symphonique" of Liszt, which concluded the concert. Those who like this class of music must have enjoyed the performance.

We cannot close without a word of commendation for the audience, which not only showed itself unusually appreciative, but was free from those pests of our public places of amusement, the people who advertise their lack of breeding by their annoying clatter. This is a nuisance which has been so observable of late that we are glad to be able to speak so well of a pleasing and bright exception.

Mareček's Italian Opera re-opened last week with Gounod's new work, of which the Weekly Review says:

To judge from the demonstrations of an immense audience, the first performance of "Romeo and Juliet," last evening, at the Academy of Music, was a complete success. This however is, to a great extent, due—as in the case of "Faust"—to the libretto. Operas on the same subject have been written by Zingarelli, Bellini, Vaccai, and others; but, on each occasion Shakespeare has been slaughtered by Italian librettists. The present edition, in operatic form, has not only the merit of following closely, act by act, the incidents of Shakespeare's tragedy, but the great beauty of adherence to the individuality of each character. The music of Gounod is original, in so far that it resembles no other compositions save his own. There is plenty of French sentimentality in it, and a strong flirtation is carried on with the new German school of the "future." Those who expect to find the martial strains and exciting choruses of "Faust" in this new opera will be somewhat disappointed; but they will be amply repaid in listening to the love duets, in the second and fourth acts, which far surpass the merits of those that mark similar situations in "Faust." It is impossible to give an elaborate criticism after one hearing of this opera; but we noticed, in the first act, a charming valse, sung by Juliet, and a madrigal for tenor and soprano, both of which are sure to become popular. The second act contains a romance for tenor, and a duet—representing the famous balcony scene—that is excellent. The third act seemed the weakest. The fourth contains another duet, between Romeo and Juliet, which is the gem of the opera, and the best thing Gounod has ever written. It will survive all his other compositions. The fifth act represents the tomb-scene, and consists of reminiscences of the preceding four acts—so well managed, however, in its effects, that the fifth act alone could be called a musical poem and, as such, a masterpiece. The performance was as good as a first performance could be. The honors of the evening were won by Miss Hauck, and Signors Pancani, Antonucci, and Medini.

New York abounds in concerts. Mr. Harrison's seventh Sunday concert, at Steinway Hall, presented Mr. Oscar Pfeiffer, the piano virtuoso, Mrs. Jenny Kempton, and the Herren Listermann, violinists, newly arrived from Germany.—Mr. Theodore Thomas, besides his classical Symphony Soirées, has opened, in a lighter vein, a new place for musical and other entertainments, called Lyric Hall.—At the first Philharmonic concert in Brooklyn (Saturday week), in the Academy of Music, they had Beethoven's fifth Symphony played by an orchestra of sixty, directed by Theo. Thomas, who was fêted, presented with a hundred dollar baton, bouquets, &c. Mme. Rotter sang the Scena from Der Freyschütz and the Romanza from "William Tell."—Several novelties are thus reported in the Review:

The Arion Society gave a very interesting concert last Thursday night, at Steinway Hall. It opened, under Mr. Carl Bergmann's safe direction, with Bargiel's overture to "Prometheus," which ought to be heard more often. Since Schumann, nothing better has been written in the old form. Mme. Kapp-Young sang the romance from "Robert," in a truly artistic style. This lady improves upon better acquaintance. She has a fine voice and expression, and could not fail to be successful with the large audience. The members of the society shared the same honor: they sang with taste and discretion, reflecting great credit upon their conductor. Unusual interest was felt in the first appearance of the young pianist, Mlle. Topp, who played Liszt's concerto in an admirable manner. Her technique is superb, but, what is still better, she has fire and soul. There is individuality in her performance, which stamps her at once as a true artist. She made deservedly a favorable impression.

Mr. Oscar Pfeiffer made his second appearance this season last Sunday, at Steinway Hall. He repeated his andante and rondo for orchestra and piano, which won him renewed sympathy and applause on the part of the audience, which seemed so well satisfied with the performance that it insisted upon an encore. Mr. Pfeiffer complied by rendering a new and charming polka of his, which perhaps better than anything else reflects the vigorous style of this pianist. The polka is brilliant, dashing, and very effective. In the second part of the concert he gave his "Lucrezia Borgia" fantasia and, as encore, his "Pardon de Ploermel." His success was such as his extraordinary technique, his powerful touch, in fact, his remarkable piano-playing fully deserve. For the first time, in this concert, we heard Mendelssohn's "Trumpet" overture, a very elaborate work, deficient in ideas, and not at all likely to enhance the reputation of the master. Mrs. Jenny Kempton sang several times. She has many good qualities, but her delivery is such as will, in our opinion, rather impair than enhance the beauty of her voice.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Richings Opera Troupe (English) still perform to crowded houses in the Academy. Linda, the Bohemian Girl, Cinderella, Martha, and Auber's Crown Diamonds have been the principal pieces of late. Mrs. Seguin is said to sing deliciously, and Messrs. Bernard, Seguin and Campbell to be very acceptable.—The feature of Mr. Sentsz's Orchestral Matinée, last week, was Mozart's G minor Symphony. Mrs. Behrens sang Robert, and Mr. Wm. Stoll, Jr. played one of Rode's violin solos.—The following programmes show of what material the public Rehearsals of the Germania Orchestra are made up:

Nov. 9.
Overture—God Save the King.....Schneider.
Thema, with Variations.....Haensel.
Die Sönderlinge—Waltz.....Lanner.
Meditation.....Seb. Bach.
Overture—Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn.
Aria—Shipwreck of the Medusa.....Reissiger.
First Finale from Attila.....Verdi.
Nov. 16.
Overture—Daughter of the Regiment.....Donizetti.
Thema with Variations.....Haensel.
Die Plotzen—Waltz.....Lanner.
Andante con moto from Third Symphony.....Mozart.
Overture—Rosamunde.....Schubert.
Duet—Semiramide—Solo for Clarinet & Bassoon. Rossini.
Reminiscences on R. Wagner's Tannhäuser.....Hamm.

Mr. Mark Hassler is giving popular afternoon concerts at Concert Hall, with a small orchestra.—Habelmann, the sweet German tenor, gives Operatic Concerts at Concert Hall. The Bulletin says of them:

Mad. Ackermann, the debutante of last night, proved to be a singer of remarkable powers. Her voice is a rich soprano of sonorous timbre, great sweetness and extended compass. Both her voice and manner are highly sympathetic and enable her to carry her hearers with her. Her opening air of Marguerite, in Faust, was rendered with skill, taste and effect, but did not tell upon the audience as it should have done, for the surprise in having before them such a fine cantatrice seemed to bewilder them. Mad. Ackermann sings again to-night, and we advise all to hear her. Mad. Johansen, Wilhelm Formes, Jean Louis, Mr. Habelmann and pupil also appear. Messrs. Habelmann, Formes and Louis—not to forget the amateur, who has a superior voice—sang most acceptably, as might be expected. The chorus and orchestra were good. To-night selections from the Puritani, Don Giovanni, Stadella, Night in Granada, and second act of Fidelio will be given. Mr. Habelmann sings a new song by Abt.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY began their season on the 21st inst., in Horticultural Hall, with Haydn's oratorio of The Creation, Mme. Parepa-Rosa taking the soprano part. Handel's Judas Maccabæus is announced to be given during the season.

THE MENDELSSOHN MUSICAL SOCIETY announce that they will give the first of a series of three subscription concerts at Concert Hall on Monday evening next. The overture to Dinorah, by Carl Sentsz's orchestra and the chorus of the society; a bass solo with chorus, by Costa; a female chorus from Wallace's Lurline; a four-part song by Mendelssohn; the Hallelujah chorus from Beethoven's Mount of Olives, and Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, played by Mr. Thunder and the orchestra, comprise the programme.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Here's a health to King Charles. S'g and Cho. F. Boot. 35
The combat approaches. Song. J. W. Wheeler. 60
There is a pair of little hands. Song. Keller. 30
The forgotten song. W. Ketchum. 30
Central Park skating glee. " 30
O Mary dear, I love thee still. " 30
She is so dear to me. " 30
My love and I. Ballad. L. Behrens. 50
Songs and choruses whose titles alone would recommend them. Good words to appropriate music.
Advance in maiden beauty. (Nons amencoes.) "Grand Duchess." 30
Discipline, 'tis my pride. (Piff, paf, pouff!) " 30
The first is a charming wedding march and chorus, and is commended to those who are about "to take the (bridal) veil." The second is capital, and highly comic.
Pretty little Sarah. For guitar by Haydn. 35
The birds will come again. " 40
Robin Bedbreast. " 60
Favorites, well arranged.
Abide with me. Sacred song. Rimbauld. 30
Nearer to thee. " H. Barton. 30
Angel's voice. " Hon. Mrs. Norton. 30
Great and Marvellous. Chorus. Merz. 1.00
Three fine sacred songs, and a 6-part chorus or sextet. All worthy additions to sacred music literature.
I'se a travelin' to the grave. Southern melody. Stockle. 3
Will do for a sacred "colored" song.
My own. Song. Perring. 40
Robin's song. G. B. Allen. 30
All along the valley. Song. Claribel. 30
Maiden's lament. " A. P. H. 40
Specimens of able compositions and melodies.
Shall I ever get married? Song. G. D. Spaulding. 30
Single gentlemen, how do you do? " 30
Sung "with applause" at the "bell-ringers" concert. Very piquant comic songs.
Gentle Amy Lee. Song and Cho. A. B. Hoag. 30
Good "song for the people."

Instrumental.

- Potpouri. Romeo and Juliet. Cramer. 75
Romeo and Juliette. Repertoire. Beyer. 40
" " Bouquet of Melodies. " 75
Players will do well to get acquainted with the airs of this opera, which bids fair to have a great popularity.
Swiss dance for piano. Gretscher. 30
Leap year Quickstep. "Crystal gems." Kinkel. 30
Charming Schottisch. " " 30
Silver star Quickstep. " " 30
Easy pieces, and the "Gems" are unusually good for learners.
Serenade Nocturne. C. W. Marston. 50
Charme de Salon. Caprice. Leybach. 50
Queen of the Fairies. Fant. Brill. Muck. 50
Three taking pieces, the last with a handsome title.
Orange blossom. Redowa. Muck. 40
Spirit of Air. Polka. " 40
Sweet music, tastefully illustrated.
Clare Waltzes. Von Olken. 75
Delta Upsilon Galop. J. S. Knight. 40
Stirring music for dancers, the last especially intended for collegians and their fair friends.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 696.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 19.

A "Kapellmeister" of the Seventeenth Century.*

It is not very often that we meet with a Kapellmeister, or conductor, who is all that he ought to be; that is to say, who does not care merely about properly filling his position, and performing punctually and conscientiously what is required of him, but is equally anxious for his subordinates; a prince on a small scale, who takes a greater interest in the weal or woe of his subjects than in his own. A nature of this kind is most plainly shown at a period when men are grasped by the powerful hand of harsh misfortune, when want and misery reign supreme, and all the bonds of society appear about to be burst asunder. Such a period, and such a model man in it, are without doubt the period of the Thirty Years' War, and the Kapellmeister, Heinrich Schütz. How he received his musical education in Venice; how he was entrusted by Fate with the musical-historical, or, rather, intellectually-historical task of transporting into Germany the new era just commenced in Italy, of bringing about an alliance between Italian and German art, of becoming the leading supporter and introducer of pleasing forms of Italian free art as opposed to strict, scholastic music—all this has been sufficiently discussed and appreciated on other occasions. We here want to contemplate the most important luminary in the then musical firmament of Germany when actively employed in his capacity of Kapellmeister: to record his ever willing and ever joyous self-sacrificing efforts for the members of the establishment under his charge.

The "chapel" at Dresden, where Schütz was engaged from the year 1617, may be looked upon as a model establishment for the period. As early as the commencement of the seventeenth century, we find, at the Electoral Court in the above capital, a complete chapel, which, under the name of the "Cantorei" (chantry) required for its support a considerable sum for those days (about 3,000 florins). It consisted of fourteen singers and nine instrumentalists. At its head was a conductor or chapelmaster (Michael Rogger), a vice-conductor, who was, also, Court-Cantor, and a preceptor (Andreas Petermann) for the singing boys. It will be seen from the constitution of the establishment that singing was greatly predominant, while instrumental music was only an unimportant department, still in the first stages of its development; what the Elector demanded above all things from his chapel was church singing, choral and solo. On this account, the members of the chapel were usually formed in the chapel itself, or, at any rate, they laid there the foundations on which, thanks to travelling, they might subsequently build. Chapel-boys and table-boys, as they were termed, used to be confided to the care of the conductor and of the eldest members of the chapel, in whose families and under whose superintendence they lived entirely, the conductor and members of the chapel being responsible for the boys' education, especially in a musical sense. For this they received rations, besides an extra salary of 25 florins for private instruction in singing. Singing was the principal consideration, and it was solely an aptitude for singing which generally regulated the admission of a candidate into the chapel. If one of the boys, however, was to learn a special instrument as well, his master was paid extra. This was, however, an unusual case, for, as a rule, the chapel and table boys were the sopranos and altists at the musical performances, and thus constituted the lowest degree in the musical corporation. Castrates were not then known in Germany; it was not till nearly the end of the Thirty Years' War that they first appeared on this side the Alps. When the boys' voices broke, and the boys could no longer be employed for the above purpose in the chapel, they learned some instrument, if they possessed the necessary natural talent. The most skilful among them were then generally allowed a certain sum to proceed to Italy, at that time the high school of music, in order to perfect themselves on the violin, theorbo, cither, etc., educate themselves thoroughly, and, on their return, become the leading instrumentalists in the chapel.

Every person who, in those days, seriously entertained the intention of devoting himself to art made his pilgrimage to Italy. Any one who had failed to go through his studies there was not regarded as properly qualified, or able to do anything really good. This was not mere prejudice, for it was in Italy that Palestrina, Gabrieli, and others had delivered music from the fetters of Netherlandish counterpoint, which threatened to crush it completely: it was there that the above masters founded those celebrated schools for composers which continued to flourish for centuries, and everyone endeavored to draw from these springs. Like others, Heinrich Schütz received his education in Italy, having studied in the Venetian school under Giovanni Gabrieli. There being no other course open for him, in the year 1589, when he was thirteen, he entered as chapel-boy the chapel of the Landgrave Moritz of Hesse, and, though his parents had determined he should receive a learned education, and he had gone in consequence to the university of Marburg, he was gained over by the Landgrave for music exclusively. This art-loving prince, well capable of appreciating the boy's great talent, offered Heinrich a yearly stipend of two hundred thalers if he would go to Italy, and study in one of the celebrated schools there. Schütz accepted the offer, and, in 1609, went to Venice, to become a pupil of Giovanni Gabrieli. What good use he made of his time is proved by the fact that, at the expiration of three years only, he was able to send his noble patron a book of five-part madrigals "with the especial praise of the leading musici in Venice" (mit sonderbarem Lobe der fürnehmsten musicorum zu Venedig). His venerable teacher died soon afterwards, and Schütz returned, in consequence, to Germany in 1613, with the intention of studying in secret several years longer, in order then to be able to come out at once with some work of importance. His parents and relatives, however, would on no account hear of his making music a "profession." They urged him to re-enter the learned career he had abandoned, and by so doing obtain some appointment in keeping with his merits. In a letter which he afterwards wrote, and in which he recorded the events of his youth, he says of himself: "But God the Almighty, who, without a doubt, had set me aside from my mother's womb for the profession of music, ordained that anno 1614 I should be summoned hither to Dresden, to attend the approaching christening of Duke Augustus, and, after the specimen I gave, the directory of the Elector's music was most graciously offered me in his name. My parents and relatives probably perceived with me the immovable will of God at work, and so set a goal to my wandering thoughts."

But the reader must not imagine that the matter was arranged so speedily and simply as is recorded in the words just quoted. Musicians in those days could by no means boast of so respected and favored a social position that such an appointment should be conferred as a matter of course. We know, from the case of young Mozart at a much later period in Salzburg, what treatment was considered at Courts proper for musicians, though Mozart's case was certainly a dishonorable exception. Schütz certainly went to Dresden, in 1614, to attend the christening festivities to which he alludes, but the thoroughly educated Hessian Court Organist had, so to speak, been merely sent as a loan by the Landgrave Moritz to his Electoral cousin, Johann Georg I, Elector since June, 1611, held the very promising musician fast, thanked his Landgravish cousin very heartily in April, 1615, for giving his organist up to him, and added: "We entreat you to do us the favor of graciously allowing Schütz to remain here a year or so, until we get those persons whom we have sent to Italy and elsewhere for the purpose of learning this art." Being compelled to do so, the Landgrave granted Schütz two years' leave of absence, but asked for him back before the time had expired. The long and short of the matter was, however, that Schütz could not be spared from Dresden. Though this and that member of the chapel who had been sent to travel might have returned from Italy as a skilful instrumentalist, Schütz towered so high above them all that such a tribute as the following was paid him: "If the music in the church and before the table is to be continued in the same style as hitherto, it is impossible to give up such a man, who is equally skilled in composition, in the use of instruments, and in the arrangement of the concert, in all which the walter knows no one superior to the above Schütz, who has already shown, to his especial credit, before his Electoral Highness what he is capable of doing." At length the Landgrave made a friendly and neighborly offer to share Schütz, who, he proposed, should act as chapelmaster at the Electoral Court at Dresden, but at the same time, retain his old place and duties at the Margrave's Court in Cassel, so that the Margrave also, might enjoy the musician's art on fitting occasions. Now Johann Georg was by no means a man calculated to bear up against the serious events of later times, but, as regards his personal requirements, and especially his musical pleasures, he was very stubborn, and not to be dissuaded from a resolve once taken. By dint of all kinds of argument and persuasion he at length succeeded in moving the Landgrave Moritz to cede him the musician altogether.

For fifty-five years was Heinrich Schütz the Saxon Elector's chapelmaster, attending with indefatigable care to the duties of the office "as the very best German composer and most admirable chapelmaster."

There now came ten years of the most comprehensive exertions on the part of the chapelmaster, then thirty-two, but in that time he succeeded in rendering the Dresden chapel one of the most celebrated of the age. It was increased to thirty-two members, the greater number of whom had been educated under his direction at Dresden, or at places which they had visited on their travels, while some had been sent for direct from Italy. After 1620, it became more and more the custom at the Courts of Germany to entice these singing birds, and give them salaries which for that time were enormous. Of course the singers augmented their pretensions in proportion, the more so when they perceived that regular jealousy and enmity were caused between different courts on their account.

The simple arrangements of the Electoral chapel at Dresden did not permit such extravagance. Despite the high position to which Schütz had raised his corpus musicorum, as he was fond of calling his chapel, the original expenditure of 3,000 florins had remained comparatively the same. The ordinary members had a salary of from 150 to 200 florins each; the vice-chapelmaster received 350 florins, and the chapelmaster 400, to which sundry additions were made in the shape of a tankard of wine, a load or two of wood, a court-coat now and then, a sum of money for special lessons, etc. In return for his services, Schütz was enabled to fulfil his long cherished and fond wish of making another journey to Italy. What, perhaps, contributed most to this result was that in the year 1627 he gave the most brilliant proof of his great talent and thoroughly solid education. This was neither more nor less than the composition of the opera of Daphne, the first German opera ever written. The text was translated into German, from the Italian of Ranuccini, by Martin Opitz, the head of the first Silesian school of poets, and Heinrich Schütz set it to music. The opera was produced at the festivities got up in honor of the marriage of the Saxon Princess Sophia Eleonora with the Landgrave George of Hesse. Unluckily, none of the music has been preserved. It perished probably in the great Dresden fire, 1760, during the Seven Years' War. The text, however, still remains. How immense a sensation was excited by this first opera is evident from the fact that, despite the unfavorable state of things at the time, all the more important towns competed with each other in appropriating this new branch of art.

* From the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung. ated by the London Musical World.

(To be continued.)

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY EMIL NAUMANN.*

We remarked on a former occasion how strongly developed, nay, perhaps more strongly developed than any where else, sacred plays appear to have been in the heart of Germany, in Bautzen, Dresden, Meissen, Zerbs, Torgau, Leipsic, and Eisenach. Now if we recollect that all these towns are situated in Thuringia and Saxony, that the roots of Protestantism are to be sought more especially in these two German provinces, and that, furthermore, Mysteries were first represented there in the German language, that is in the most popular manner, we shall instantly be struck by their intimate connection with the spirit out of which the Reformation grew. From this point of view, the Eisenach Mystery, already mentioned, of the Wise and Foolish Virgins, becomes peculiarly significant and prophetic. We find it represented, as early as in the 14th century, by the same monastic order to which Martin Luther was destined subsequently to belong, at the foot of the Wartburg, which, by the residence of the great Reformer there, was to become a watch-tower of the mind,* only a few hours' journey from Möra, the Thuringian village where Luther first saw the light of day, and at Eisenach, the town which gave birth to Sebastian Bach, the master who lent its purest and most sublime expression to the specifically protestant spirit in church-music, and consequently in oratorio.—The tendency of this same old sacred play stands forth in still more wonderful and presageful connection with Protestantism and Protestant art.—Throughout the rest of the world, the intercession of the Saints and of the Virgin Mary was considered in the 14th century capable of releasing from sin and guilt. The Augustine monks of Eisenach were the first who dared to preach a new belief. When the moment has arrived in this old play for the heavenly Bridegroom to approach, and the foolish virgins, who have sunk to sleep in the midst of a revel, to become aware, too late and full of dismay, that their lamps are forever extinguished, they call on all the Saints to intercede for them. An avenging Angel orders them back. The cry of woe, now louder than before, of these sinners, who perceive the jaws of Hell already opening, finds its way to Mary, the mother of God. She experiences a feeling of indescribable pity, and begs for pardon for the mourning creatures of her divine Son, who now appears. But even so illustrious an advocate finds her intercession fruitless on hearing the simple words of the Saviour, who says He has to fulfil his Father's will. Mary proceeds to utter reproaches that the Lord will not listen even to her, who has suffered so much for Him. Heremion Christ disappears, and the Angel, addressing the Queen of Heaven, pronounces imperiously the word, "Silence!"

Who will deny that, in this disappearance of the Saints and even of the blessed Virgin before the form of the Saviour coming forward so sublimely and grandly, and centering all importance in Himself, the spirit of the Reformation, like the first blush of morning, is already announced! We must be the more forcibly convinced of this by the fact that it was precisely the day for the performance of this sacred play, representing all power of remission in its nothingness, as well as convinced of the tremendous influence it exerted upon those living at the time. It is historically attested that Friedrich of the bitten Check died in consequence of the performance of this mystery. The vain appeal to the intercession of the Saints and of the Virgin Mary, at variance with the popular belief, wrought so strongly upon the Margrave, whose conscience probably sometimes proved a heavy burden for him when he thought of his father, that, interrupting the actors, he called out: By what means are grace and forgiveness of sins to be obtained, if the intercession of the holy Virgin is of no avail." A fit of apoplexy, caused by the mental shock he had sustained, threw him on a bed of sickness, which he never left to his dying day, the 16th November, 1324.

It was but natural that, with such a tendency of the sacred plays in central Germany, church-music, and oratorio particularly, when the Reformation took up both, should be developed in a closer connection with the Mysteries, than was the case in the Netherlands. In music, as in the old Thuringian play, Christ, and redemption through His death to the exclusion of all intercession, and hence, above aught else, the history of the Passion, became the central point of representation and of the increased depth of musical expression. It is, therefore, natural that we should find as early as the time of Luther, and caused partly by the powerful impulse emanating from him, examples of Passion music in Germany. The first of these compositions, which bore the name of "Passions," we meet with in the works of the German masters, Johannes Galiulus, born near Leipsic, in 1475, and Heinrich Isaak, born probably in the Fulda district, about 1489. We find them further in the works of Isaak's pupil, Ludwig Senfl, of Basle, whom Luther so admired, a composer who was born in 1490 and died in 1560, as well as in those of Luther's intimate friend, Johannes Walther, who was born at Torgau, in 1490, and died in 1555. All the Passions of these masters, as likewise those of their contemporaries, Cellarius, Eckel, and Lemblin, have Latin texts. We find, too, in these authors, as we do, also, in Hobrecht and Berchem in the Netherlands, an almost invariably four-part and, therefore, more lyrical treatment of their subject, which even now properly demanded a more marked epic-musical construction. It is the "Moralities" or comedies of the students and the schools, works immediately springing from the Mysteries, and, to a certain degree, presented to us merely as a translation of the latter into the spirit of the period that had just dawned, which first bear a really epic-musical stamp. Interesting in this light is The new, highly excellent, and thoroughly Christian Comedia of the State of Things in Heaven and Hell, by Andreas Hartmann, Theologian and Magister of Philosophy, which was performed at Torgau in 1599. We are distinctly informed that, after the Prologue, a "common Musica or playing of the Town-pipers" opened the piece. As the personages are distributed in choruses, it is very probable that the spoken dialogue was interrupted by choral-songs.* Belonging to the same category are, also, the sacred comedy of Esther (1604), and that of Joseph (1612), both due to the Theologian Andreas Cotta, who was rewarded for them by the living of Hartha.

While the above efforts were being made in the way of a popular representation of sacred or Biblical subjects, J. von Burek, or Burck, born in Magdeburg at the commencement of the 16th century, had in the domain of art music ventured to write Passions in the German tongue. The first of these appeared in 1568, and the second in 1577. He was followed by Lachner with a German Passion published in 1593, and we are thus gradually conducted to the great master, Heinrich Schütz, named, in accordance with the fashion of his time, Sagittarius, who was born in 1585, in the Saxon Voigtland, and who died at Dresden in 1672. It is in his Passions that we first meet with the artistic forms, which have, on the whole, maintained their ground in oratorio down to the present day. Schütz, too—like the Eisenach Mystery already mentioned, like Luther himself and all that was closely connected with him, and, lastly, like the first composers of Latin and German passions in our native land—we find again in Saxony. For more than half a century he was Capellmeister, at Dresden, of the Saxon Elector. If we remember, in connection with this fact, that the greatest number of the most important Moralities and Students' Comedies produced during the period of the Reformation belonged to Saxony, Thuringia, and the parts immediately adjacent, we shall once more feel convinced that the focus of Protestantism was likewise the centre of Protestant musical art, and it was on this account that oratorio, also, as a half Protestant art-product, derived from these provinces the most powerful incentives to further development.

But other influences, besides Protestant influences, had worked upon a master like Schütz, before he was capable of presenting the world with productions so full of thoroughly epic, and, within the limits of the Epos, dramatic life as his Passions. It was for this reason that we said Oratorio was only half the child of the Reformation.

To show that other factors co-operated in its creation we must once more go back a step.

* This piece, of which unfortunately we have not a copy, was published in 1800 by the author at Magdeburg and dedicated to the Council of that town.

(To be continued.)

Kleptomaniacal Choir Boys.

(From the London Orchestra.)

During the last two weeks the acumen of Mr. Elliott, the Lambeth police magistrate, has been tasked in the attempt to unravel the mysteries of a singular abstraction of property from various stalls in the Crystal Palace. For some time past the stall-holders in this splendid suburban bazaar had missed a number of articles, and the officials of the Palace Company had communicated with the authorities at the Lambeth office the fact that robberies had of late become very numerous, and that in every case of suspicion the alleged delinquent would be treated with such fare as the letter of the law would authorize. On the afternoon of Monday, the 4th inst., the young persons at the stalls of the opticians, perfumers, cutlers, and the other depots for the sale of articles of virtù and fancy, were put into a state of commotion by discovering that a raid had been made upon their properties; and suspicion falling upon some boys who were loitering about, a watch was at once set upon them, and in a short time that was seen which fully justified the apprehension of two lads named Greenwood and Higgs. Greenwood, it appeared, was a choir-boy of some years' standing in All Saints Church, Notting Hill, and obtained some sort of celebrity by his solo singing in that church. Both he and Higgs were of the choir school attached to the church, and on their appearance before the magistrate they were charged "with stealing an opera-glass, a microscope, a telescope, a globe, bottles of perfume, knives, a silver pencil case, a comb, a brush, and other similar articles, the property of the stall-holders in the Crystal Palace." After the evidence had been taken, the advocate for these young choristers directed the magistrate's attention to this "most exceptional case." The younger boy had evidently acted under the direction of Greenwood, the solo singer; and Greenwood, quite old enough to know right from wrong, was yet by bodily affliction incapacitated from taking advantage of this knowledge. It appeared that when Greenwood saw anything that it would please him to possess, he immediately suffered from a jactitation of the heart; his pulse became quick and jerking; and it would seem that

* From the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.

* Watch-tower; in the German "Wartburg." The "Wartburg" signifies "Fortress of the Watch-tower."—Ed. M. W.

these symptoms are one of the earliest indications of what, in medical nomenclature, is known as "imbriation of insanity." The first disturbance of intellect is, it is said, always accompanied by a perversion of moral habits. A change in the body takes place, there is great irritation of the nerves of sensation, and there is much inflammatory action in the tips of the fingers. The patient who suffers under this triple mischief, of aberration of the moral sense, a jactitation of the heart, and high irritation of the digital nerves, is in a state approaching either pyromania or kleptomania. Pyromania is that species of dementedness which urges its victim to acts of incendiarism. John Martin set York Minster in flames; he was a pyromaniac. There have been two churches lately burned down in Notting Hill, and those burnings have been attributed to pyromaniacs. The lawyers for the young alleged culprits never for a moment insinuated that Greenwood, his unfortunate patient and client, suffered under any hallucination for setting churches on fire. All that he maintained was that poor Greenwood, like Oscar the King of Sweden, and the celebrated countess at Frankfurt, and the no less distinguished countess in England, was a kleptomaniac, a miserable victim of hyperphrenia. Everybody knows that the will alone constitutes sin; and the head boy at Notting Hill Church suffered under an absolute want of control of the will with regard to the property of others for which he had a longing. The disease belongs to one of the mysteries of the inner mental life; and whether its beginning be subjective or objective, whether its origin was centrifugal or centripetal, doctors have not yet determined. As the dipsomaniac must drink, the monomaniac must prate, the pyromaniac must fire, so the kleptomaniac must steal. But as the pilfering was insane, it was only dangerous to the owners of the tempting property. Persons suffering under this carolomaniacal titillation of the tentacles could never be charged with petty larceny, for taking other people's property was simply the natural medicine of patients of this sort; such possession subdued the inflammation, quieted the heart, and soothed the nerves of the fingers.

In support of this theory of kleptomania was called the curate of the parish, who deposed that Greenwood was a good boy, and had carried off a prize, but being subject to epileptic fits, he could never keep his hands quiet, either at home, in church, or at school; and that without thinking he was doing wrong he would take any article, whether in the sight of a constable or not. The defence now became double, for epilepsy is not kleptomania. Epilepsy is a choking fit, a laryngismal spasm, accompanied with a screech so dimly melancholy that it scares dogs away, and so affects parrots that they drop off their perch. True it is that this disease often terminates in idiocy, but the boy Greenwood had not arrived at this point; he never pumped up to read the lessons, or got into the pulpit to preach the sermon, or seized an offertory bag; all that could be said for or against him was the fact of his being a simple kleptomaniac. He could gain prizes, learn his doses, sing them, and sing the right ones; he had a clear perception of right and wrong in his singing, and there was no aberration with him of the artistic sense, whatever there might be with regard to the moral. Besides, his case as a kleptomaniac is not at all an aggravated one. The disease in its most formidable shape will not permit the patient to eat anything that he has not first stolen. Greenwood would eat a dinner bought for him, just as he would sing his solo or chant his psalm. It appeared from evidence that is described as "voluminous" that the carpenter's son was well known as a kleptomaniac. But is there no remedy for this disease? Is it altogether incurable? Is restoration of the moral sense impossible in these cases? Was nothing done on the part of the authorities of All Saints, Notting Hill, to alleviate these digital irritations? Greenwood has, it is said, a fine voice and a fair reputation as a chorister. Choristers are in demand, and a boy of his natural and acquired endowments is worth at least fifteen shillings a Sunday. The solo boys well know this; they know that the thronged nave and aisles of the churches is the consequence of their singing, and that it is neither the prayers nor the sermon that brings together these crowds.

What if Greenwood never received a farthing for his singing, and the only return that he had for all his work was some instruction in the three R.'s? A small weekly salary, given as "medicine in sickness," accompanied by exercises in the Catechism, might possibly tend to arrest the progress of his disorder. Possession of fancy articles honestly acquired, the fruit of his own labor, might give rise to a clearer notion of moral sense; and, if persisted in, tend to a perfect convalescence. Choir churches most commonly bring in large returns, and yet how miserably paid are the officials chiefly employed in securing this result! It was but the other day that a scene took place between a bellows-blower and a high official in a church, respecting a miserable pittance of £1 a year, deemed a full equivalent for blowing the organ on Sundays, festivals, rehearsals, and general practising. And this in a church bringing in a revenue of £1700 per annum. What is worse, the poor bellows-blower is never treated as a member of the worshipping congregation, for he is put in a hole behind the organ, oftentimes in the dark, out of the hearing of every part of the service except the booming of the pedal-pipes, and all this that a sent or two may not be lost to the revenues of the church.

It is not so long ago that Mr. Ingham, of Hammersmith, committed a bellows-blower from this very All Saints for three months for stealing eighteen pence from one of the offertory boxes. What this man's salary was did not appear in the newspaper reports, but there was no defence set up of his being a kleptomaniac. His dementedness consisted in having a wife, and we know not how many children struck down with the small pox in the sad home he left for that time. Possibly a seat in the church beside his fellow Christians, a course of catechism, and pocket money, might have saved both the sin and the misery.

After all, kleptomaniacs are much to be pitied, for it seems with the medical authorities the disease is one of those things that follow on to the third and fourth generation. Kleptomania is too often the result of hereditary predisposition, and in cases where the great grandfather had been notorious for unconscious accumulations the disease has broken out with the great-grandson; but in this case accompanied with a total want of moral principle. If these things be true, diseases are great moral lessons, and doctors the most eloquent of preachers.

John Sebastian Bach.

(Concluding Chapters from His "Life and Writings," by C. F. H. B. S. S. S. S.)

X.—OPINIONS OF BACH'S CONTEMPORARIES.

In the eyes of those who believe that they must seek for the acknowledgment of an artist among his contemporaries, in the grant of splendid honors and enormous rewards, and in loud and general applause, Bach would appear to be every way neglected. Of all these distinctions very little fell to his share. But the question arises—Was the style of his works such as would demand such acknowledgment and praise? By no means, not even in its outward aspect. The scene of his functions was the church and the school, both (in his time, more than in the present) inaccessible to such rewards. But his mind, his wonderful and universal genius, it will be said, did not receive the ovation it merited. This, however, was not the case. If that which he created was not immediately accepted by the greater masses, it is only in the common nature of things—and to complain is foolish. Superior genius, in every range of the human mind, has only received in a later age perfect acknowledgment, and there is no reason why the age of Bach should have made an exception.

It has been said that this great musical genius had to be satisfied with a miserable organist's situation scarcely bringing him seventy thalers (ten guineas) a year!—that he suffered poverty and died poor!—that he was buried at Leipzig nobody knows where; these are assertions not proved. He who made them first must have been a perfect stranger to the period, circumstances, and condition in which Bach lived. The statements are not only untrue in themselves, but the conclusions drawn from them are erroneous.

Modest, contented, wanting little—in spite of the enormous superiority of his genius—Bach lived solely for his art, which, nevertheless, without his efforts, helped him to distinction, fortune, and honor. Already in the eighteenth year he was "Concert Master" at the Court of Weimar, and a year later organist at Arnstadt, where the emoluments were by no means insignificant. It is true his salary was small, but then he had the advantages of free residence, garden, land, tythes, and accessories of all kinds. Bach's fame spread, and he received favors of fortune without seeking them. When he took up his residence at Leipzig he was esteemed and honored in all circles. Artists and laymen paid court to him, and princes and dukes bowed to his reputation. Even Frederick the Great honored him with his attention when Bach visited him at Potsdam.

Bach was at no period of his life, after his eighteenth year, poor. His appointments supported him in ease and comfort, and enabled him to bring up an unusually large family. At his death, the universal esteem in which he had been held during life shone in an unusually splendid light. The whole of Leipzig mourned him. His memory was celebrated, not only by public musical performances, but individual offerings were made in commemoration of his mighty genius. Far beyond Leipzig was his death mourned. The centre, the great head of German music, was gone. Many a mourning cantata, and many a poetical elegy, expressed the feeling which seized the musical world at his departure.

It would carry us too far to record all the expressions of Bach's eminent contemporaries concerning his wonderful abilities. One need only compare what Adelung, Telemann, Mattheson, Marpourg, Mitzler, Burney, and others say, to see the estimation in which his genius was held in by artists of every class. So much to refute the unjust reproach thrown upon the contemporaries of Bach.

XI.—PORTRAITS OF BACH.

The finest and most lasting memorial of the mind of the great master who has formed the subject of our essay, are his works. But the other arts have not been idle, each in its kind helping to preserve the memory of Bach's genius to his many admirers. The poetical essays in this way belong to the last century, and their language and expression have now become obsolete. A most lasting memorial is preserved in the works of the painters and draughtsmen which have been handed down to us.

During his lifetime Bach was often painted. The oldest portrait is one which was in the possession of Kittel, Bach's last pupil. It passed into his hands from the Duchess of Weissenfels, and was regarded by him almost as an idol. It hung in Kittel's library over his clavichord, with a curtain before it, which was only removed on special occasions to gratify the wish of some favored friend or pupil.

A second portrait was in the possession of C. P. Emanuel Bach. It was painted by E. C. Haussmann, a famous painter of his time, and measured one foot eight inches by thirteen inches.

A third painting, also by Haussmann, is preserved in the saloon of the St. Thomas' School at Leipzig. It was presented by Bach, according to the statutes of that society, in 1747. It is a fine picture, representing him in the prime of life. The face is happy and contented, as if expressing joy at the realization of an idea, or the fortunate accomplishment of a work. In his hand he holds a music sheet, marked "Canon triplex a 6 voc." The painting is unfortunately much damaged by age.

A fourth portrait is deposited in the "Jochimssthal Gymnasium" at Berlin. It came from the Princess Amelia of Prussia, and was probably painted by Geber.

There are also some successful old copper-plate engravings and some lithographs. The oldest in copper, a good copy of Haussmann's picture (before mentioned), dates as far back as the year 1774. It is by J. C. Kuetner. The same picture has been again engraved by Bollinger. Both prints are very rare.

Several lithograph portraits have appeared in modern times. We may particularly notice one by S. Black after the picture in the St. Thomas' School, reproduced in 1840 by Hartung of Leipzig.

A finely modelled bust, eighteen inches high, has been produced by the statuary, Krauer. It is considered a good work of art. There is also a small bust, four and a half inches high, in biscuit porcelain, published by Klein of Leipzig.

XII.—CONCLUSION.

It occurs but seldom that a memorial is dedicated to an artist a hundred years after his death. A kindred spirit, one of the greatest musicians of modern times (now alas! gone from among us), Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, a devout admirer of Bach, first gave the impulse to erect a monument to his memory. His efforts were crowned by brilliant success, and on the 23rd of April, 1843, a noble memorial was uncovered in the space opposite the St. Thomas' School, Leipzig, where the great master had passed so many happy years in the patient exercise of his calling.* The uncovering of the monument was preceded by a concert arranged from Bach's works, by Mendelssohn, in which all the eminent musicians of Leipzig took part.

At this commemoration was present the last grandson of Bach, Wilhelm Bach, since dead, son of the so-called "Buckeburg Bach;" with his wife and two daughters. He was an old man, eighty-one years of age, who had long lived in retirement at Berlin, and who came over to assist at the celebration of the memorial to his great ancestor.

*The memorial, a richly ornamented canopy supported by elegant pillars, and surmounted by a bust of the great composer, was designed by Bendemann, of Dresden, and executed by the statuary, Krauer, of Leipzig.

Mr. Dickens's First Reading in America.

(From the Daily Advertiser, Dec. 3.)

Those who arrived early in Tremont Temple last evening, not having an audience to gaze at, had plenty of time to speculate and ponder upon the somewhat peculiar nature of the furniture for Mr. Dickens's reading, and so it is, perhaps, not remarkable that the fancy should have seized some of them that the curiously shaped crimson reading desk, with its methodical arrangement of water carafes and glasses, and with the background of crimson behind it, was the table of a conjurer, who would presently change the colorless fluid into ink and play other fantastic tricks with the senses of his audience. And these imaginative people were after all not so far wrong. Mr. Dickens proved himself a magician, though one of no common kind. At his bidding all his characters rose up one after another, not as filmy creatures, but in bodily tangible shapes; by the wave of his magical wand genius, his audience, albeit people not used to give their feelings free expression, were nevertheless led to laugh and almost weep in the same breath, and to burst out at every moment in those little signs of exhilaration and delight with which nature will at times assert herself, in spite of the trammels of what Mr. Turveydrop calls "Department."

Mr. Dickens began by reading "A Christmas Carol," very nearly, but not quite in full, as at first published. Everybody knows how Scrooge was visited on Christmas Eve by the ghost of his old partner, Jacob Marley, and by the three spirits of Christmas, Past, Present and To-come, and how his miserly heart was softened by the visions which these unwelcome visitors showed him. Everybody knows how Scrooge was shown the jolly party which old Fezziwig gave his apprentices; and the merry gathering at the nephew's; and the gay but humble festivities at the little house of poor Bob Cratchit. The story well illustrates Mr. Dickens's strongest point, his broad humanity and his power of drawing character; and shows least his greatest fault, exaggeration. Its tone is pure and healthy, and hearty and genial from first to last; there could be no better Christmas story written, and it is no wonder that Mr. Dickens, himself, has never given us its equal. It is a ghost story, as of right it should be, written as it is for such a season, but Mr. Dickens can hardly keep down his wit, even when he writes of the supernatural. Scrooge, looking through Marley, sees the buttons on his coat behind and has also grave doubts as to whether his spiritual visitor can take a chair. The warmth of Mr. Dickens's humor takes the chill off one's marrow very pleasantly, and his spirits have more bodily than other writers', if we may be allowed to use an expression generally applied to spirits of another sort. But at this rate, we shall never get on to the reading.

Promptly at the hour of 8, Mr. Dickens appeared and came briskly upon the platform. He simply said, "Ladies and gentlemen—I shall have the very great honor and pleasure of reading first to you this evening, 'A Christmas Carol,' in four staves," and then, laying his book upon the sort of pommel which rose from one side of his desk, he began to read quite rapidly. As he opened the narrative, people had time to see that Mr. Dickens's pictures, shown in the shop windows, are quite like him; that he is a little spare, though well formed, and that he has a face handsome rather for its expression than from its regularity of features; that he wears a moustache and a beard long, but not pointed, and that his complexion was a little florid, although this last might have been accidental. When he began, the peculiarity of a transatlantic accent was quite perceptible in the upward intonation at the end of his sentences, but as he went on, this impression quickly faded away, and indeed the peculiarity could not be detected in the dialogues, even by one watching for it. Mr. Dickens's reading is essentially dramatic. He takes no thought of the text spread out at his left hand, and gives up his whole soul to the personation of the characters, which he imitates in tone, looks, and even gestures. Thus, nobody could mistake old Scrooge with his hard, rough tones and pursed mouth, or Scrooge's nephew with his blithe, merry accents and careless face, and when Mr. Dickens all at once assumed the plaintive countenance and deprecatory voice of the poor clerk, Bob Cratchit, the illusion was so perfect that the whole audience burst into a round of applause. We have said that Mr. Dickens's reading was dramatic. So it is, but he is never theatrical; we hope we convey our meaning. Only once did he at all approach extravagance of tone or gesture,—where Bob Cratchit, after the death of Tiny Tim, breaks down in his efforts to bear the blow with resignation,—and here we think the audience observed the fault. Mr. Dickens does not act, after he is a little warmed to his work. He is for the moment the character who is speaking—and more than once these characters did not speak to a word the language set down for them. Mr. Dickens plainly sympathizes with the emotions which he excites in the audience, and his face ever and anon beams with fun, as he takes breath between the passages of some comical dialogue.

Mr. Dickens read, in conclusion, the trial scene from Pickwick, and we should like to tell how well he pictured to the audience the sleepy Justice Stareleigh, the profound and eloquent Sergeant Buzfuz, the blandly insane Winkle, the imperturbable Sam, and the distant beery bass of old Mr. Weller in the gallery. We should succeed very poorly even if we attempted such a description. It was pleasant, though, to notice how when Sergeant Buzfuz said "Call Samuel Weller," the whole audience began to applaud very loudly, as if that faithful servitor was really in the act of coming on the witness stand, in the flesh. It was a little disappointment that the voice of the cheery, moist-hearted Mr. Pickwick was at no time heard, but this was of course unavoidable.

It may seem to those of our readers who had not the good fortune to be present last night, that what we have said is only a fulsome panegyric. But we only echo the word which was in every one's mouth at the close, when we say that Mr. Dickens is no less wonderful as a reader than as a writer.

We have not thought it necessary to say anything about the fashion, beauty and intelligence of the audience, or about the cordial welcome which Mr. Dickens received. Everybody will take all this for granted. It was pleasant to see that people were punctually in their seats, and as for sitting to the close, none of them would for their lives have stirred before Mr. Dickens made his retreating bow.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

LEIPZIG.—The third Gewandhaus Concert dipped into the last century for much of its programme. The Neue Zeitschrift says: "It opened with the overture to 'Semiramis' by Catel (1773-1830), which, modelled upon Gluck, is quite dramatic and contains many significant and genial moments. Then followed an Aria from 'Lucio Vero,' by Gluck, sung by Fräulein Thoma Börs, from Hamburg, a pupil of Stockholm. The work itself is mainly in the Italian style, but shows a deeper dramatic character in several passages. The singer has a somewhat veiled, but pleasant voice, of good compass, and fair schooling, and was called out after her second piece, the 'Letter' aria in Don Juan. The other solo performances were in the hands of Concertmeister David, who played Mozart's Violin Concerto, op. 76, and a Sonata with unfigured bass by Pietro Nardini (1760), with all his usual taste and fineness. The evening closed with the B-flat Symphony of Beethoven."

A great deal of activity has reigned in musical matters lately. There has been the fourth Gewandhaus Concert: Overture: Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, Raff; Pianoforte Concerto, Schumann (Mlle. Marstrand); three pieces for the orchestra from the ballet of Prometheus, Beethoven; Violin Concerto, (Herr Deecke); Pianoforte Solos, Mendelssohn and Chopin (Mlle. Marstrand); and Symphony in C major, with the concluding fugue, Mozart. Next came a musical performance in St. Thomas's Church to celebrate the third centenary of the Reformation—cantata, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, Bach; the 95th Psalm, Mendelssohn; and choruses and air from The Messiah, Handel. The solos were entrusted to Mlles. Schilling, Martini, Herren Rehling and Hertzsch; this performance was succeeded by the second "Euterpe" concert: Overture to Schiller's Wallenstein, E. Buechner; "Sappho," soprano solo with orchestra (Mlle. Spohr); Solos for the harp (Mlle. Stör); the 23rd Psalm, Liszt (Mlle. Spohr); and Symphony in D major, Lassen.

MUNICH.—The so-called "Paris pitch," diapason normal, was tried for the time in Marschner's Hans Heiling, and generally considered an improvement on the old pitch.—Herr R. Wagner has completed the composition of Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg. The work will be put in rehearsal in the beginning of December, and the first performance takes place in February. Herr Beck, of Vienna, has been selected for the part of Hans Sachs. Meanwhile, the Musician of the Future himself has gone to Paris.

His friend, the Abbé Liszt, has returned to Rome.—On All Saints' Day, the members of the Royal Orchestra, under the direction of their conductor, Herr F. Wallner, gave a concert, at which they performed Missa a 5 voci, Johann Eccard (1598); "Offertorium a 8 voci," Palestrina; and "Graduale a 4 voci," Vittoria.

DRESDEN.—Herr J. Von Wasielewski will give this season, a series of six Soirées for Chamber Music. The first took place on the 27th October, when the pieces played were: Trio, Op. 1, No 1 (E flat major), Beethoven; Stringed Quartet (G major), Haydn; and Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 3 (B flat minor), Mendelssohn.

COLOGNE.—Ferdinand Hiller, who is one of the most genial of writers about music, as well as one of the first of living composers, has collected and published the interesting letters which have appeared during the last fifteen years in the Kölnische Zeitung, and many of which have been translated in our columns. The title of the book is: "Aus dem Tonleben unserer Zeit, Gelegentlich" (Out of the Tone Life of our Time, Occasional), by F. HILLER, (complete in 2 vols.), Leipzig: Mendelssohn, publisher.

A correspondent of the Athenæum writes:—Cologne is now one of the centres of German musical activity. This picturesque, thriving city, with its intelligent, if somewhat outspoken, burgher population—now much more vigorous and individual than the faded and genteel world of "good society" to be found in the small Court towns of Germany!—is doing good things for Art. Not to speak of the rapid progress made towards completing the Cathedral, which, they say here, is to be entirely finished seven years hence, even to the tops of its two spires—nor of the other judicious restorations in progress—it holds a place and a power of its own in the world of imagination to which this column particularly refers. I recently referred to the capital programme of the first winter Gürzenich concert. At the second, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given; at the third, which will fall on the anniversary of Schubert's death, it is in contemplation to repeat a portion of his Mass, which has already been given there. It is needless to add that all this music is safe in the hands of so excellent and experienced a conductor as Herr Ferdinand Hiller. There has never been a dearth of great instrumental players proceeding from the music schools of Germany. But the Cologne music-school may now send out some good singers—good professors who understand the real method of training the voice being attached to it. I heard a satisfactory example of this in a young lady, fresh from her schooling, Fräulein Scheuerlein, who sang, and sang well (so far as I followed it), the arduous part of Alice, in 'Robert,' with a pure, pleasing soprano voice, more elastic and less vehement than is the ordinary rule with the German criers of notes, male and female, who distractedly fancy themselves vocalists. The opera was not well given; but not having heard it for years, and never even in Paris performed "up to the mark," I was surprised, as almost with a new pleasure, by the brilliant vivacity of the music.

VIENNA.—Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris, which had not been heard here for 57 years (though frequently of late in Berlin and Dresden) has been successfully revived. The principal rôles were rendered by Mmes. Dustmann and Benza, and Messrs. Walter, Beck and Draxler. The choruses and orchestra are declared to have been perfect, and Esser, the conductor, won new esteem with the public by the minute care he gave to the representation as a whole. There was some thought of opening the new theatre with Iphigenia; but Gluck's Armida is the piece now proposed.—Mozart's posthumous opera, "The Goose of Cairo," first brought to light so recently at the Fantaisies-Parisiennes, is announced at the Carl-Theater.

BERLIN. The famous Liebig Orchestra has undergone a revolution. After so many years of Symphony, the members of the band, complaining that their leader and founder was too arbitrary, and having tried in vain to bind him to conditions, have deposed him and taken to themselves a new director in the person of Prof. Stern. Liebig has gathered around him a new orchestra and will still give concerts.—Joachim has given several concerts with Mme. Blume-Santer and Liebig's late orchestra. The programme of the second (Oct. 3) included Bach's A-minor Concerto, Violin Concertos by Beethoven and Joachim (the latter a new one, in G major), and Arias from Ilomeneo and Così fan tutte.—On the 4th occurred the third Quartet Evening of Hellmich, and the second Monday concert of Blumner, with the chamber singer Mme. Herrenburg-Tuezek and the violincellist Grützmaier from Dresden; on the 7th, the first Quartet Evening of De Ahna.—On the 6th, the first Soirée of the Dom Chor: Lotti's Crucifixus for eight parts; Responsorium by Palestrina, for double choir; the 100th Psalm, by Bach; Pater Noster, by Meyerbeer, &c.—On the 9th, Mendelssohn's Paulus was performed, in memory of the composer, by the Stern-sche Verein.

Nov. 2nd, second Philharmonic Concert of B. Scholz, with the lady violinist, Fräulein Frieso: Symphony in B flat by Volkmann; fragments of B-minor Symphony by Schubert, Violin Concerto by Viotti, &c.—On the 7th the first Salon Soirée of the "Symphonie-Capelle" (formerly Liebig's) under Stern's direction, with the brother and sister Frieso: Overture to Iphigenia (Wagner's arrangement), prize Symphony by Würst, &c.—11th, fourth Quartet Evening of Hellmich.—16th, third Philharmonic Concert of B. Scholz, with Clara Schumann: Orchestral Suite by Handel; Schumann's A-minor Concerto; Gade's "Message of the Spring;" "Song of the Woods," for chorus, by B. Scholz, &c.—On the 24, the Singakademie were to perform the Cantata "Gottes Zeit" by Bach and Cherubini's Requiem.

At the Royal Opera, Gounod's Faust, first performed here on the 5th of June, 1863, was given lately for the hundredth time. A number of new operas, not so likely to achieve their first hundred in a hurry, are in preparation; for instance, "Die Fäbier," by Langert; "Mignon," by A. Thomas; "Romeo and Juliet," by Gounod. Also the home-made opera by Würst, "Der Stern von Turan," is to be newly studied, with Lucca and Niemann in the chief parts.

Paris.

SYMPHONIES FOR THE PEOPLE. On the first Sunday of November M. Padeloup resumed his Concerts populaires, "which have now become (says Le Ménestrel) a real want for true musicians, more and more numerous from day to day. Since the Conservatoire can only open its doors to a small number of the elect, those not so favored take refuge in the vast Cirque Napoleon, eagerly grouping themselves in the great circles round the excellent orchestra of Padeloup. Of course he found all his faithful habitues at their posts, with ear and mind attentive. Of the well varied programme the piece expected with most curiosity was certainly the Rienzi overture, by Wagner—its first hearing in Paris. There is no disputing its uncommon power; but it is a brutal power, more apt to revolt the hearer than to subjugate him. Still it is in the first manner of the master, which in our opinion is his best." . . . "Then came the C-minor Symphony of Beethoven—a perfect chef-d'œuvre that, one of the seven wonders of music!—then the Hymn of Haydn, for stringed instruments, encored by acclamation; and finally some fragments of Meyerbeer's Steuensee, a tragedy of sombre and vigorous colors. The whole ended with the merry overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor, which made but a small figure by the side of the great works that preceded it."

The programme for the second concert was as follows: Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony; Air from Beethoven's music to the Ballet of Prometheus; Symphony in E-flat by Haydn (first time); Adagio from Mozart's G-minor Quintet, executed by all the strings of the orchestra; Hungarian March, Berlioz.

Third Concert: Beethoven's Heroic Symphony; Andante and Variations from the Imperial Symphony, Haydn; Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, by Schumann; Adagio from Beethoven's Septuor, executed by MM. Griszcz, clarinet, Espeignet, bassoon, Brunel, horn, and all the strings; Overture to Freyschütz.

OPERA. At the Grand Opera they have been playing Don Giovanni, a young tenor from the Conservatoire, M. Colin, making his debut therein. Voice "fresh and sympathetic, not robust." Mme. Marie Sass was Donna Anna; Mlle. Manduit, Elvira; Mlle. Battu, Zerlina; M. Obin, Leporello, and M. Fauro, the Don.—Rossini's Comte Ory has been alternating with "La Fiancée de Corinthe;" of which last named novelty a correspondent of the Evening Post writes:

In the Moniteur of this morning Theophile Gautier gives a feuilleton about the theatres. It so happens he has a charming subject for his delicate and artistic pen in "The Bride of Corinth," now played at the Theatre Imperial de l'Opera.

You, perhaps, remember Goethe's Bride of Corinth, sad and fascinating vision of the distress of a new religion and an old love, evoked by the genius of the poet? Has modern literature any note so vibrating with antique music, or does it ever touch the imagination more potently than in that strain of a mysterious love? Well, it has been dramatized and successfully set to music, according to Theophile Gautier. For myself, as yet, I know only that it has served as a motive of several beautiful paragraphs from his pen, which Goethe himself might welcome as a prose rendering of his subject.

It would be well if our own dramatic critics could profit by the example of the French litterateurs, and accept their function as a literary means capable of being the source of great pleasure to their readers. If the literary side of the contemporary Paris teaches anything, it teaches that Jules Janin and Theophile Gautier, certainly two of the most brilliant and artistic of French writers, find in the theatres of Paris the occasion of some of the most delightful writing—occasions for a natural expression of a most vivid sense of literary beauty—the beauty of fitting words to varied and natural sentiments—in truth, displaying all the charm of the exercise of a cultivated and artistic mind.

Theophile Gautier writes that the charming poem is written in true verse and "embroidered" with fresh and delicate music—fine pearls for the pit—by Duprats; and quoting a few lines written by Loele, he comments thus: "This verse, of a marvellous beauty and a sentiment profoundly antique, which mounts like a flame in the azure, purifies with its fire the idea (disagreeable to the modern man) of vampirism. I have no doubt that you will soon have the opportunity to judge for yourself how you like Goethe's Bride of Corinth transposed into an opera of one act; words by Loele and music by Duprats.

London.

The eighth of the Winter Concerts at the Crystal Palace brought forth a programme which contained little novelty, but the execution of which left nothing to be desired. The selection was as follows:

Overture (Preciosa)	Weber.
Aria, "Constance," (Il Seraglio)	Mozart.
Grand Scene, "Tacea la Notte," "Di tal Amor" (Il Trovatore)	Verdi.
Symphony in F, No. 8	Beethoven.
Songs, a. "Morgengruss"	Mendelssohn.
b. "Nach Sevilla"	Dessauer.
New Ballad, "Little bird, so sweetly singing," G. B. Allen
Concerto for Violoncello (the last two movements) Mollique.
Valse Brillant, (Il Ballo)	F. Schira.
Overture (Prometheus)	Bargiel.
Conductor	Mr. Manns.

The novelty of the concert was an overture by a compositeur incompris, Herr Bargiel, of Rotterdam, whose work, entitled "To Prometheus," was heard for the first time in England. In the words of Mr. Manns, "This young composer and his works are scarcely yet known even by name in England, and it will not be out of place to say that he was formerly Professor of the Conservatoire at Cologne, and has been for the last year or two "Städtischer Musik-Director" at Rotterdam, and that musical Germany classes him amongst the most worthy of its young composers, as his works have found their way into the programmes of the celebrated concerts of Leipzig, Vienna, &c." We doubt whether the "et cetera" will ever include London to any great extent. The present work seemed diffuse and purposeless: perhaps it was heard under disadvantages. We have honorably to record the action of Herr Reichardt, a gentleman, who, however much he is interested in the advertisement of his own songs, does not intrude them on serious occasions. His choice of vocal pieces at this concert was excellent; and as he was in good voice, no qualification can be made to the good things said of him. Not so irreproachable was Mlle. Liebart, who in her selection of G. B. Allen's ornithological trifle, erred by too much flippancy. Nevertheless it was encored, so shallow is popular judgment in respect of genuine art.

If longevity affords any claim, the Monday Popular Concerts have certainly a right to their name. On Monday the tenth season was opened in presence of a crowded audience, before whom the following programme was laid:

Serenade Trio, in D major, Op. 8, for Violin, Viola, and Violoncello	Beethoven.
Song, "Swedish Winter Song"	Mendelssohn.
Songs, "To Chloe," "May Dew"	S. Bennett.
Fantasia Sonata, in G major, Op. 78, for Piano-forte alone	Schubert.
Sonata, in D major, Op. 12, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Violin	Beethoven.
Duet, "Per valli, per boschi"	Blangini.
Quartet in D minor, Op. 76, No. 2, for two Violins, Viola, and Violoncello	Haydn.
Conductor	Mr. Benelict.

The masterful beauties of Beethoven's sonata—one of the three dedicated to Salieri—constituted the novelty of the evening. From its inspired Andante con Moto to the end the execution was irreproachable—a treat of the fullest magnitude. So with the Serenade Trio, now well known to frequenters of the Monday Populars. The Polonaise in this work was redemanded, and indeed the whole of the composition met with considerable applause. A good deal of interest was centred in Mme. Goddard's artistic interpretation of the so-called Fantasia Sonata by Schubert, a second performance, and one fraught with very pleasurable recollections. The quartet of artists were fully up to their work; Miss Cecilia Westbrook sang charmingly, and Mr. Cummings with his usual taste. In every respect the first concert of the season sustained the old prestige.

The Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society gave a performance at the St. George's Hall, on Monday night, of Mendelssohn's "Elijah."—Orchestra.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 7, 1867.

Memorial Services in Honor of John Albion Andrew.

Our Boston Music Hall never was the scene of a more impressive, sincere, beautifully inspired tribute, and never held a multitude more deeply moved, than on the occasion of the Eulogy upon the great-hearted Governor,—personal friend of all the people, far-seeing statesman, genial, loving, wise, true, noble man—pronounced before the City Government and hosts of citizens on Tuesday morning, Nov. 26. All the arrangements were in perfect keeping; to ear and eye, to sense and mind and heart all spoke significantly, with poetic and religious exaltation, of the one theme, of the great grief and the great faith springing out of it. Music, poetry, eloquence, sculpture, floral emblems, prayer, lent their aid to one uplifting, wholesome influence; all so fitly present, so suggestive of that life, which snatched away bodily, has passed into these forms to visit us henceforth more intimately. The good never die, even in this world.

We cannot speak too highly of the taste and feeling shown in the decoration of the platform by the ladies of the Church of the Disciples (of which Governor Andrew was a member) under the direction of Miss Lucy Goddard. The prevailing color, (so much better than the conventional black and white hung around the body of the hall) was a clear glowing violet or royal purple. Against such background the white marble busts, the ferns and flowers and green leaves, stood out transfigured, as against heaven's own warm, rich, positive, inspiring light:—how infinitely more sacred than merely negative funereal black! On the edge of the platform, in the centre, was placed Gould's bust of Gov. Andrew, in which the sweet and sunny side of his nature is beautifully caught. This was the centre of a group of heads, showing how many-sided were his sympathies, how largely related to the best. On his right was first a bust of the martyr President, by Mrs. Ames, and then that of Col. Shaw, the first effort of the young colored artist, Miss Edmonia Lewis, for whose race he was a hero and a martyr. These were balanced on the left by Brackett's head of old John Brown, and that of Everett, by Powers. We should have been glad to see the head of Quincy likewise; but another would have disturbed the balance. Beneath these busts, upon a broad background of purple cloth, which covered the whole front of the platform, floral emblems were arranged, appropriate to each. Under Andrew was a wreath of chrysanthemums within a circle of evergreen, meant (the Transcript says) "to typify the sunny life of the illustrious dead." Directly back of the bust, enclosing the Beethoven statue in its recess (also a fit presence there), a pointed arch of the same lustrous purple, overrun with delicate tracery of green vines, culminated in a star, "symbolizing the high position he had held in the State and Nation." Under Lincoln was a floral cross to represent Faith, "while a Maltese cross under the bust of Colonel Shaw indicated the sacrifice of his life in his country's cause." The anchor of Hope lay under the sanguine, patriarchal John Brown, and a civic wreath beneath Edward Everett. Between these symbols there were wreaths of evergreen, and immortelles and flowers, together with clusters of fern leaves exquisitely arranged in snow white conch shells, "in their bright colors indicating that Gov. Andrew died in the early autumn," and, why not add, telling the sympathy of all beautiful things in Nature with a life so sweet.

The body of the hall, as we have said, was more conventionally decorated. Yet there was much to relieve the black and white with which the balconies were hung. It was not all funereal; for this was not a funeral, but a commemoration; not the death, but the life of a true man was what we had met to contemplate. "At the front of the second balcony, in a very conspicuous position, an arch had been raised, bearing the name of John A. Andrew, underneath which was a shield with the word 'Union' upon it. The inscription at the right of the arch contained the statement that ex-Governor Andrew was born March 31, 1818; that on the left mentioned his death, Oct. 30, 1867. The seals of the city were displayed at proper intervals in front of the two balconies, which were fittingly draped with black and white cloth, looped by becoming rosettes [of royal purple]—the national ensign, arranged in tasteful folds, forming a beautiful addition."

We record all this with the more interest because the action of the City Committee in the matter gave signal evidence of the growing respect for Music in the community—Music in the highest sense, as an expressive Art, fit to figure, not as unheeded intermission and relief, but as an equal element, a mutual complement with Speech and Poetry, in bringing out the meaning of so solemn and significant an occasion. There was no blaze of brass bands in the streets, and no procession to create delay. All were quietly seated before eleven o'clock, the time fixed for the beginning. The old conventional way of covering the stage with dignitaries and distinguished guests had been sensibly dispensed with, and the whole space (with the exception of Mayor Norcross, who presided, with Alderman Slack, Chairman of the Committee, Weston Lewis, President of the Common Council, the Orator and Clergymen of the day), was given up to the Orchestra (of the Symphony Concerts), under Carl Zerrahn, and a chorus of about a hundred mixed voices, mostly from the Handel and Haydn Society, but strengthened by the hearty participation of some of our best solo singers. When the City consented to employ an Orchestra, instead of a mere band, it became a certainty that music would speak out of the very soul of the occasion, and help to blend together all the other elements, heightening the peculiar eloquence of each. And indeed, while the Eulogy was the main point of interest, the Music moulded the whole programme into order and consistency.

Precisely at eleven, the ceremonies began with a sad, pensive, tender piece upon the organ, played by Mr. J. K. Paine; it was the concluding chorus of Bach's Passion Music: ("We sit us down in tears and call to thee in the grave: Softly rest!") After an impressive prayer by the Rev. James Freeman Clark, the Funeral March from Beethoven's Heroic Symphony was played by the orchestra; and never before did we so truly feel the power of that wondrous composition as the grandest expression of a people's grief, bereft of a true hero, that can be found in music or in any other language. The whole audience felt the music and listened to the last note.

Then was read this little poem, woman's tribute, sadly true and simple, written by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe.

I stood before his silent grave,
And heard a record long and low,
How he was merciful and brave,
How his swift help sped to and fro.

Great deeds of heart were told of him,
And musings whispered at the fire,
Whose burden stirred in thought and limb
The energies of high desire.

The honors of the State were his,
The better crownings of esteem;
Faith yielded him her mysteries,
And Charity was not a dream;

And Hope her steadfast anchor threw
To match God's promise in the storm;
When billows roared and tempests blew,
He left us that consoling form.

No snare was in his ringing speech,
Nor malice in his sunny smile;
No passion, hidden out of reach,
Drugged his pure manhood with its guile.

A champion in our hour of need,
A prophet armed with forethought wise,
He flung our banner on the lead,
He gave our watchword to the skies.

Poorly our blended efforts try
To set his image in his room;
We lift the Poet's laurel high
To lay it on the Patriot's tomb.
And thus I said when, laid in earth,
His funeral song was asked of me:

"The world has few to match his worth,
And none to praise it perfectly."

This elegiac strain was fitly followed by the Chorus, full of comfort and of peace, from Mendelssohn's St Paul: "Happy and blest are they who have endured! For though the body dies, the soul shall live forever!" It was beautifully sung with orchestral accompaniment; though the greater breadth and fulness of thrice the number of voices was desirable. The stage would accommodate no more.

Then all were in a calm listening state for the Eulogy, by Edwin P. Whipple, which all who heard it then or have read it since, felt to be as nearly perfect as anything of the kind in their remembrance. In a short hour, wisely avoiding for the most part mere biography, it described the elements of that rare character, and out of them built it up before us in all its fulness, nobleness and beauty. It was in the fullest sense a eulogy; such praise it is rarely possible to bestow on man; yet every hearer knew that it was all true! A grand, encouraging, inspiring character! One feels immortal in the contemplation of such a life. The eulogy was all the more impressive that it was calmly analytic, though at the same time it was heartfelt and very earnest. There had been no end of tributes out of the full heart; this was the one we had been waiting for; this set the very image of the man before us. It was for music to continue the strain, thus eloquently begun, of Governor Andrew's life and character. And none so great for that, as Beethoven, and no music could so fitly follow up the eulogy, as that heavenly Andante of the Fifth Symphony, so reassuring and uplifting, so as with heavenly authority, with angel voices, enforcing the lesson of a great life, exhorting all to press forward to the prize of the high calling! Heavenly assurance is the key note of that Andante. And it was played as if all the musicians felt its meaning and how apposite it was; and we are sure it was never listened to with deeper realization of its power and beauty than just then.

Then the voices, supported by the full tones of the Organ, sang the Choral: "Was Gott thut, das ist wohlgethan," as harmonized by Sebastian Bach, to these words:

What God does, surely is well done,
On Him be our reliance!
O, may our will with His be one,
And bid the world defiance!
No foe can harm,
No fear alarm,
For God is always near us,—
Call Him and He will hear us.

What God appoints is surely right,
His will I would not alter;
If o'er rough ways, in darkest night,
He lead, I will not falter.
He reigns above,
And He is love!
His eyes do still behold me,
His tender arms enfold me.

It was well sung, for only a hundred voices, the rich, religious, buoyant harmony flowing smoothly and evenly along, with solemnizing, tranquillizing influence.

A benediction was pronounced by the venerable Father Taylor, the Seamen's Friend, and thus ended the most impressive, beautiful memorial services within our experience. It was good to be there. No one could have left that place with any conscious meanness in him unrebuked, or without new motive and new courage for a nobler life.

Music in Boston.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The second (Nov. 21) was perhaps the most enjoyed, and by the largest audience, of any thus far in the three winters. The Orchestra was materially strengthened, now numbering 56 in all, with 12 first violins, at the head of whom sat Mr. EICHBERG, whose return was generally welcomed, and whose presence seemed to give new life. (By the way, Mr. Eichberg has since been appointed by the Harvard Committee, to the office of Leader, or adjutant, under Mr. Zerrahn,—what in the German orchestras is called the Concertmeister, sometimes Foygiger (head and front of the violin force.) His function is to preside over all the string department, to ensure unity of bowing, in the manner of attacking and handling passages and phrases, &c.; and we have no doubt the fruits of such care and conformity to one head will soon appear in the more wholesome unanimity and vitality of the string quartet, which is the soul of any orchestra.—But to the second concert; this was the programme:

- Overture to "Medea" Cherubini.
- a. Alto Aria: "Well done, ye good and faithful servants, whom God hath called to homes above."—From a Cantata J. S. Bach.
- b. Song: "Im Rhein, im heiligen Strome." R. Franz. Mrs. CARY.
- Concerto for two Pianos Mozart (Cadenzas by MOSCHELES.) B. J. LANG and J. C. D. PARKER.
- Fourth Symphony, in B flat Beethoven
- a. Aria: "Deh vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro." Mozart
- b. Songs: "Weil' auf mir, du dunkles Auge," (Supplication). Franz "Come into the garden, Maud." O. Dresel. Mrs. CARY.
- Overture to "Oberon" Weber.

The orchestra never played better; the strings telling with more fullness and decision than before; only, in the B flat Symphony especially, the need of greater body in the middle parts is still felt. There is also still some lingering chronic infirmity in certain of the reed instruments; they need a quickening life to brace them up to sure and healthy pitch. But this will come, for there is a new life in the band, a spirit of improvement; the performers are all interested in their work. That fascinating Fourth Symphony, the lordliest of the nine! How eagerly its every tone was listened for, with glowing faces. The Overture to Medea is the fourth of Cherubini's which these Concerts have introduced or made for the first time appreciated here, and it is, both as to poetic substance and artistic symmetry, conciseness, clearness, perhaps his best. It was new to nearly all that audience. Full of suppressed passion, with a fine nervous fire delicately thrilling on the strings (for its is written mainly in the violin genius, the bassoons starting the quaint little theme for imitation now and then), concise and earnest, it reminds one not a little of the Coriolanus overture; that, however, takes hold deeper down with stronger grasp. The visionary, brilliant fairy overture to Oberon, capitably given as it was, was the right thing to end with.

The Mozart Concerto, for the two pianos, proved exceedingly effective. With nothing particularly striking in its themes, none of the great thoughts of Mozart, it is so full of grace and spontaneity, the passages are so happily divided and imitated from one piano to the other, the unity of form so perfect, and the sympathy of the orchestral voices so rich and delightful, blending their piquant individualities without losing them, that it was thoroughly enjoyed in all three movements. Mr. LANG and Mr. PARKER played it admirably. The first Cadanza by Moscheles is too long, and, interesting as it is in itself, not wholly in the vein of Mozart's composition. The second is shorter and more to the purpose.

With entire satisfaction we remember Mrs. CARY's singing, as well as the choice selections. If her contralto voice does not carry as much weight as some, if she compete at disadvantage with the cheaper and more outward qualities which catch but do not edify the crowd, she has those fine, interior qualities of the true singer, with the corresponding beauty in her voice, which rightly claim the sympathy, indeed the partiality, of true appreciative criticism. We have no contralto singing in public whose voice is so sympathetic, no singer of whatever kind of voice who sings in so sincerely, finely musical a spirit, with such pure expression, entering into the spirit of the song, with so little egotism. That Aria from Bach has the very soul of music in it, tender, sweet, heart-felt and pious. The instruments (string quartet and two flutes only, Mr. Dresel at the piano helping out the harmony) flow on in full, rich, even stream, most comforting to hear. The melody seems to summon its own accompaniment about it by pure sympathetic charm. Anything so unpretending, so free from modern ad captandum arts, while so artistically complex, had of course to be listened to with close attention; and it was; we are sure the listeners felt rewarded, and would welcome more of Bach after that taste of him. Franz's deep, rich, tranquil strain about "the Rhine, the holy river," made the right impression after it.

The singing which was best appreciated, however, was the Mozart Aria, which was exquisitely sung, and with Mr. Dresel's fine accompaniment, was even more admired than when the same lady sang it last year. Franz appeared again in his most simply melodious and profoundly serious phase, in "Supplication." Mr. Dresel's "Maud" was quite felicitous, delicately true to the poem, with a charming accompaniment, and was very much applauded.

The third Concert takes place while this goes to press. In the fourth (Dec. 19) the Symphony will be Schumann in D minor (given only once before;) another picturesque Overture by Gade, "Echoes from Ossian," will open and Beethoven's great Leonore, No. 3, will close the feast. And Mr. ERNST PERANO will play the great Beethoven Concerto in E flat (No. 5, sometimes called in England the Emperor Concerto)—Our hopes of CAMILLA URSO in the 6th Concert are, we regret to say, disappointed, as that lady is going to Havana; but the audience will be reconciled to the loss when they learn that OTTO DRESEL has consented to play at that time, probably the D minor Concerto of Mendelssohn.

ORATORIO. The Handel and Haydn Society had not their usual crowded audience at the first concert of the season, on Saturday Evening, Nov. 3. This was partly owing to the multitude of exciting announcements; partly (we are inclined to think mainly) to a spell of natural reaction and rest after exciting years; and partly to the miscellaneous character of the programme, which with the Directors of the Society was a mistake. The selections were excellent, but the continuity of interest was continually broken. This made it not always easy for the chorus voices to find their pitch at once with certainty. Moreover the impression of each chorus obliterated that of the one before, and left the mind distracted. The solos, especially, were thrown into bad perspective by the medley. Yet Mrs. KEMPTON, although suffering from illness and therefore a little tremulous, sang "But the Lord is mindful" and "O rest in the Lord," with power and feeling and with true conception; and Miss HORSTON sang "Jerusalem" very impressively. The Duet "O lovely Peace," from Judas, was finely sung, though the two qualities of voice do not blend perfectly. The Choruses, four from St. Paul, and "The Heavens are telling," from the Creation, have been sung better, but were still impressive. The Orchestra was unusually large, but, owing to the difficulty of perfect unison with the Organ pitch, some of the instruments sounded rough at times.—Mendelssohn's Psalm: "As the Hart pants," given entire, was much more enjoyable.

Handel's "Samson," on the next evening, drew a considerably larger audience, and on the whole went admirably. We have in times past made much of it tedious, but not so this time; it was judiciously abridged, and given with a great deal of spirit. The great choruses some of Handel's best, told most effectively. Miss HORSTON fairly carried her audience away by the clearness and brilliancy of her high tone, and by her sure and admirable singing in the ringing trumpet song "Let the bright Seraphim." In all her pieces she sang better than ever, but there she seemed inspired. Mrs. KEMPTON too won sincere applause in the part of Micah. Mr. JAMES WHITSLEY gave the touching tenor air: "Total eclipse," with expressive tone and style, showing careful study. This was his best effort, his strength hardly holding out for the entire part of Samson. Mr. H. WILSON has a strong, resonant voice, and did good justice to the part of Manoah; and Mr. M. W. WHITSLEY's ponderous bass was heard to good advantage in that of Harapha.

OPERA. The LAGRANGE-BRIGNOLI Italian Troupe, under the direction of Mr. Max Strakosch, occupied the Boston Theatre for a fortnight, exciting more interest than was expected, and really doing a good business. Mme. LAGRANGE, although her voice is sadly worn, is still one of the world's great artists; her finished style in singing, her admirable acting, with the bearing of a lady, still give a rare satisfaction in such parts as Mozart's Donna Anna and Lucrezia Borgia. Miss PHILLIPS, never in better voice, never more full of life and skill, sang Zerlina's songs capitably, and was excellent of course as Rosina, Azucena and La Favorita, though we did not witness these last. BRIGNOLI was in his best voice, and for once took uncommon pains and put life into his parts. SUSINI's basso is but a wreck, and he made a very coarse and awkward bullock of Leporello. The chorus was respectable; but the orchestra, under the capricious lead of an Italian by the name of Rosa, was far from satisfactory.

The RICHINGS English Opera which has had so long a run in Philadelphia, opened last Monday evening at the Boston Theatre, with a performance of Marta, which appears to have given very decided satisfaction. The "Bohemian Girl," and Wallace's "Mariana" have followed.

On Monday evening, MAX MARLTZER, having made peace with his chorus singers in New York, will open with his Italian Opera, at Selwyn's Theatre, for a short season of two weeks. Mme. PARELA ROSA is the principal star. The opening piece will be the latest novelty, Gonnoli's "Romeo and Juliet." Tuesday, Lucrezia Borgia; Wednesday, Romeo again; Thursday, Ferani; Friday, Don Giovanni; Saturday (Matinee,) the "Barber of Seville." Five operas, by five different composers, in the first week.

We have not left ourselves room, and if we had should lack the power to express the unqualified delight with which we have heard CHARLES DICKENS read, and reproduce before us, by apparently as fresh acts of genius as originally invented them, the characters in his novels, like live realities most individual and unmistakable. To us no reading ever had a charm to be compared with it. The professor of elocution may find faults in it; the voice is not that of Fanny Kemble, it is somewhat lanky; but it is rich and sweet, has heart and substance in it, and is wonderfully flexible and apt for imitation. The upward inflexion, "so English," in the rapid narrative portions, is not only rhythmical and economical in respect to time, but serves admirably to distinguish the connecting narrative from the actual impersonations, in which it disappears altogether. His heart and soul, his humor and imagination, his whole genial humanity are in these readings of his own creations, and because he evidently enjoys them as heartily as we do, we enjoy it all the more. And to set such a sea of life, as such an audience is; in such delicious motion, alternating between tears and laughter, with the artistic sense, the "higher law" of the Ideal, all the while approving,—that must have been to him a pleasure like condensing the sense of the world-wide success of all his writings into one perfect moment. But we have no room nor power—the piece from the Advertiser in another column will give our distant readers some idea of what sort of an event Mr. Dickens's first reading in the Tremont Temple was.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., NOV. 20.—Last week witnessed the organization of the "New Haven Philharmonic Society," numbering some 20 members, and composed, of course, mainly of amateur musicians.

We like to see ambition, and find no fault with the title of this club, though it does call to mind a little experience of ours concerning the great "American Bureau for Literary Reference"—which by personal investigation we found to consist solely of one dyspeptic looking young man and a chest of drawers. Success therefore to the N. H. P. S., whose advent we hail as a step at least in the right direction.

Meanwhile the "String Quartette" has shown signs of returning animation and given a concert of chamber music—which took place on the 8th inst., with the following programme:

- String Quartet in E flat, No. xiv. Mozart.
- Song,—Zuleika. Mendelssohn.
- Piano Solo,—Songs without words. "
- a. "Regrets." Book 1st, No. 2. "
- b. "The Return." " 7th, " 4. "
- Solo,—Andante con var. in D, Op. 17. Mendelssohn.
- Violoncello.
- Songs. R. Schumann.
- a. "Aus meinen Thränen sprissen." "
- b. "Ich grolle nicht." "
- c. "An den Sonnenschein." "
- Grand Quartet, in E flat, from Op. 16. Beethoven.
- Piano, Violin, Viola and Violoncello.
- Albert Mallon, 1st Violin. Bruno Pope, 2d Violin. C. W. Chapman, Viola. M. Steinert, Violoncello. Vocalist, Mrs. H. E. Dupee. Pianist, C. W. Chapman.

The effect of the String Quartet was—to state the case mildly—somewhat marred by the breaking of a string on the 1st Violin, which fact, together with a certain harshness and lack of unity in the performance, left a sense of something lacking.

In the Beethoven Quartet, however, the players seemed to enter more into the heart of things, and the piece—the Andante Cantabile in particular—sounded well.

The vocalist, we regret to say, persisted in singing Schumann's songs in villainous German, with a French accent, notwithstanding the fact that she had the English words before her eyes. Heine's despairing little love song was rendered "Ich grolle nicht," and phrased in a heartless, mechanical way, which, though it may do very well for the melodies of the late Stephen C. Foster, will not answer for Schumann.

The second of these Chamber Concerts will be given early in December, with this programme (the vocalist being J. Sumner Smith):

- String Quartet, op. 76, No. 1. Haydn.
- Vocal Solo,—Rondo. Mozart.
- "Deh, per questo istante solo." [La Clemenza di Tito.]
- Violin Solo.—Andante con moto from Op. 12, No. 1.
- Tema con var. Beethoven.
- "Gott Erhalte," from Op. 76, No. 3. Haydn.
- String Quartet.
- Song,—"The Message." Blumenthal.
- (Poem by Miss Adelaide A. Proctor).
- Piano Trio,—Op. 1, No. 2. Beethoven.

MERCURIUS.

CINCINNATI, O., NOV. 16.—Joyous the greeting and blessed the day, when old friends meet the same as of yore; and quicker the throbs and warmer the blood, when stirred by undying, familiar tune. Like a perfect June-day, like spring-time returned, the days seemed, when after many a year we first heard your Mendelssohn Quintette Club again; when flooding back came the festive memories of days that were filled with the delicious music of your artists; when Chickering's and Bumstead Hall, your Studio-building and the Music Hall were present again with their delights, and made us forget that we have them not, nor the wealth of melody that periodically fills and sanctifies them.

There is no need to speak of the playing of our friends in your paper. Nor would you, surfeited with sweets, believe how well they did for us, how our musicians alike and the audiences were carried away with delight. For to you their art is a thing as usual as the air you breathe, as the sweet sunlight that warms and quickens you. But to us it was exactly what dear Chaucer says of Rosalind. It " . . . seemed lich a thing celestial

In bounte, favour, port and sweetness mirour of delight, gracious to . . . " hear. They did well to come to us. And if you miss them, as you do, in your Symphony Concerts, do not forget that their mission here is an apostleship of true art and of noble beauty. Their playing has grown deeper, warmer, and it did not fail to preach loudly to people who had been satisfied before, because the standard was wanting whereby to judge and measure. At the three concerts we could attend they had good houses. As to the three others we can only echo the delight of musical friends. Haydn, Quartet in G, No. 75; Mendelssohn, Quartet in E flat, Quintet in B flat, op. 87; Beethoven, Quartet in E flat, op. 74; Schumann, Mozart, Schubert, the great masters all, not to forget Handel and Gluck, (Bach alone excepted), were heard again, and the pleasure was great and will be lasting.

And as we are speaking of apostles of art, there ought to be mentioned two other earnest and gifted men whom we have here with us. Mr. H. G. ANDRES, whose excellent playing was spoken of before by your correspondent, gave two concerts last spring that were not noticed. In them we heard: of Mozart, the Quartets No. 1 and No. 3, in E flat (the latter being the Piano Quartet); of Beethoven, the Sonata quasi una Fantasia, op. 27, No. 2; of Schubert, the Trio for piano, violin and violoncello, op. 99, and the Serenade; of Chopin, the Berceuse; of Spohr, a Violin Concerto and various smaller things. Mr. A. excels in a clean but sympathetic rendering of the masters; his touch is silvery and delicate, and his fancy is brilliant, as he proved by several of his own compositions. Of the Transcription of the German popular song, "Muss i denn zum Städtele 'naus," we spoke last year. This year we had a Fantaisie Militaire (published by A. C. Peters & Bro.), in B minor, full of bold, original thought and effective; and we are promised a Scherzo, which, if the first hearing deceive us not, will be equally good. Mr. A. is the director of the Caecilia Society, which lately (Nov. 7th) gave the first concert of their twelfth season. Haydn's "Spring," the Choruses, "Lord, Lord," and "How pleasant are the Messengers," from Paulus; Grimm's Cantata "An die Musik," represented the vocal; the Adagio and Finale from the Kreutzer Sonata by Beethoven, and a Transcription of Schubert's Les Adieux formed the instrumental part of the programme. We were prevented from attending.

Mr. GEORGE SCHNEIDER, the younger of the two artists, gave a concert, Nov. 12th, in which Miss DENNIE sang two songs, the only pieces not classical. The Messrs. Brand played with Mr. S. Mendelssohn's Sonata for Piano and Violoncello in B flat, op. 45; Schubert's Rondo for Piano and Violin, op. 70, in B minor; and Beethoven's Trio, op. 70, No. 2, in D major. M. G. Andres assisted Mr. S. in Schumann's Variations in B flat major, for two pianos, op. 45; and Mr. S. played Chopin's Ballade in A flat, op. 47. The concert was delightful, if we except the singing; and Mr. S. showed by his fine and delicate playing that he has made good advance on the road toward the Ideal.

The Symphony Concerts have begun again, and Mr. Hopkins, the gentleman who built the hall and pays the musicians, has made us thankful anew for the music we should not hear without him.

We only wish—vainly we are afraid—that the musical season, so beautifully opened by the week of pure delight furnished by your Mendelssohnians, may continue so propitious. It is barely possible that the critic of the Commercial may help us along, who has made the discovery that we might start just such a Quintette Club here, with the material we have on hand. We wish him sincerely "God speed." Many things are done that seem past belief. We are afraid however, that his remark is worth no more than his criticism. For he has discovered the greatest of all overtures. Listen Universe! It is Littolt's "Robespierre!" Pity that Beethoven used the motives of Mr. Littolt half a century before, in his Egmont. A great pity Mr. Commercial-Man, in truth. *†.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Yes, this night. (Oui, ce soir). Song or Trio. "Grand Duchess." 50
- Turn away, my merry fellows. S'g & Cho. " 35
- The first may be sung by one voice or three, and is the comic and savage conspiracy trio of Paul, Boum and Puck. The second represents the same grinding their daggers for the onslaught, and brings in frequently the pehi, pehi, of sharpening steel. Both are spirited and very amusing.
- Tender and true. Song. G. Lisle. 35
- A song for the "tender and true" to sing.
- She woke that morn in heaven. Song. L. Heath. 30
- How dear is home to me. Song. F. S. Clark. 30
- Two sweet home songs; only the homes differ.
- Gather flowers in the summer time. W. C. Baker. 40
- Nellie's grave. Song and Chorus. A. B. Hoag. 30
- Different, but alike in being quite beautiful, and likely to be popular.
- Forever. ng. S. D. S. 30
- The old love. " " 30
- Young Mary. " " 35
- Prayer and praise. " " 40
- A serious song, and a series of songs, embodying much originality, as may be guessed from the titles, and much good music.
- Hear I the ballad ringing. (Hör ich das Liedchen). Schumann. 25
- All night I lie dreaming. (Allnächtlich). " 25
- Short, but very sweet, and have carefully elaborated accompaniments.
- The three calls. For guitar. Haydn. 30

Instrumental.

- Lotta Polka. Mrs. Parkhurst. 30
- A very bright and sparkling thing, and not difficult.
- Robin and the Cricket. Mazurka. Pattison. 50
- Here we are among the songsters and the flowers, who give us sweet music.
- Romeo and Juliette. Potpourri. 4 hds. Cramer. 1.00
- Players will find this a most acceptable arrangement.
- Little Red Riding Hood. Galop. Mack. 50
- Has a charming picture of our little favorite, and has pretty and easy music.
- Fant. Brill. Sonnambula. 4 hds. Leybach. 90
- The music is well selected, and of course excellent.
- Potpourri. Grand Duchess. 2 Nos. No. 1. Mack. 75
- The first part of a fine collection of airs, containing about half a dozen good ones, with modulations, &c.
- Black key Polka. Mazurka. Herzog. 30
- Is in the key of five flats, and almost every key played is a black one. The melody is a very good one.

Books.

- Libretto of "The Grand Duchess of Gerolstein." 30
- " "Anna Bolena." 30
- " "The Carnival of Venice." 30
- Three more librettos for your musical library. The Grand Duchess is just now the rage, and the libretto is one of the most readable of all librettos, and contains fifteen of the principal melodies.

- Te Deum in F. H. K. Oliver. 1.25
- Not too difficult for execution by choirs of average ability, and contains a great deal of full, rich harmony.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 697.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 21, 1867.

VOL. XXVII. No. 20.

Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."

BY DR. EDWARD HANSLICK.

"Romeo and Juliet! Can finer matter for an opera be imagined, than this Solomon's Song of Love? Numerous composers, the Germans Steibelt and George Benda, the Italians Zingarelli, Vaccai, Bellini, and others, have found inspiration in it. Only one mountain stands in the way, and that is named Shakespeare! Who will fly after him, or seek to bear him higher in his flight? The more closely the composer cleaves to Shakespeare's own words, at the more risk to himself does he proceed. For musical purposes, therefore, I would rather choose a paraphrase, which should give merely the outlines of the Shakespearian action, filling them out unpretentiously with one's own diction. Gounod has followed the opposite view, keeping to as much of the original poem as is compatible with the vital conditions, musical and scenic, of an opera. From this point of view the libretto is formed with propriety and skill. It does not catch the fancy by the rich alternation of contrasted figures and scenes like Faust; but on the other hand it avoids unsuitable spectacular effects, like the Walpurgis Night, the final Transfiguration, &c.

Exacting critics, who perhaps would like to have the servants' talk and the "salsa dieta" of the nurse also musically illustrated, blame unfairly the caprice of the arrangement. The only two departures from the original worth mentioning consist in the transformation of the servant Balthasar into a "Page," and in the introducing of the wedding ceremony of Juliet with Paris, during which Juliet, stupefied by the drug, sinks down. The "Page" was necessary, to gain a soprano voice for the ensembles; the Wedding, to interpolate a picture of somewhat fresher coloring between the friar's cell and the vault of the Capulets.

Shakespeare's words are very frequently retained; Gounod has not even allowed the Prologue to escape him, but has used it for a musicopictorial introduction, the singular charm of which is not to be denied. After some sombre prelude measures of the orchestra the curtain rises, and we see before us a motionless pictorial group of young men and ladies, somewhat like the well known picture of Boccaccio's Florentine party. This chorus sings in simple, mostly unaccompanied chords the short Prologue: "Verone vit jadis deux familles rivales, les Montaigus, les Capulets," &c. The whole appears and vanishes, with the auditorium darkened, like a magical image of light.

The first act begins with the ball at the house of Capulet; Juliet sings out her artless gaiety in an aria, whose waltz-like character is justly found objectionable. Evidently this number (like the jewel aria in Faust) is a concession to Mme. Miolan-Carvalho, the powerful directress and prima donna of the Théâtre Lyrique. Romeo appears, masked, with his friends; Mercutio sings the description of Queen Mab. Then follows the first meeting between Romeo and Juliet, and then the strife between Tybalt and Romeo, which is quelled by Capulet. The second Act consists almost entirely of the Balcony scene, preceded by a short male chorus of the friends of Romeo and an Arioso by the latter. The rendezvous of the lovers at the cell of Friar Laurence, who unites them, opens the third Act; a mocking chorus and a song in strophes (Canzone) of the Page lead in the Finale, which ends with the fight between the two hostile parties and the death of Mercutio. The first half of the fourth Act is filled entirely by the great love duet of the young newly wedded pair, musically the most prominent piece of the opera. This is followed by an Aria of Friar Laurence, who hands to Juliet the benumbing potion, and the wedding ceremony with chorus, march and a short dance; the Act concludes with Juliet's supposed death. The fifth Act is played in the burial vault exclusively between the two lovers, over whose corpses locked in the last embrace the curtain falls.

We defer a close musical criticism of the opera the more willingly, as it is just about to be performed here (in Vienna), and we would not anticipate the first impression of the public and the critics. There can be no contradiction of the assertion that the composer has given himself to his difficult task with singular devotion and perseverance. Gounod is a very earnest man, somewhat inclined to enthusiasm, who comprehends the mission of Art from the highest standpoint and serves it with an almost religious zeal. On the composition of the Romeo, which he began immediately after the Faust, Gounod (with a few necessary interruptions for smaller works) has labored eight years, and surely with the purest striving to achieve his best. We must never forget that Gounod is a Frenchman, and cannot possibly quite emancipate himself from his nation's way of seeing and of feeling. Moreover Gounod—an enthusiastic worshipper and connoisseur of German masters—has approached the German operatic ideal and the hearty, genial character of our music more nearly than any other Frenchman.

With all due recognition of Gounod's artistically pure aim and lofty aspirations, we cannot at the same time conceal from ourselves, that his Romeo and Juliet on the whole betrays a weakening of the creative faculty. The wealth of melody, the freshness and vivacity of the Faust we find again only in the happiest moments of Romeo. These appear the most richly in the tender, lyrical scenes; where a high-strung and persistent dramatic strength is required, Gounod's strength is lame. This will be perceived in the quarrel scene and the Finale of the third Act, where a poor, almost note-for-note reminiscence of the mocking chorus in the Huguenots passes with our composer. Compared with the figures of Romeo and Juliet, which are executed con amore, the others fall off materially; Capulet's rather Philister-like honesty and Friar Laurence's monotonous unctious leave the hearer indifferent. Of fine, ingenious detail, of charming characteristic traits, we find rich store, as we should expect with Gounod. But his dramatic power in Romeo has short breath, and the musical invention not seldom a monotonous and feebly trickling flow. Both as to melody and harmony, Romeo reminds you strongly of the music to Faust: the finest number of the opera, the love duet in the fourth Act, is pervaded by the same sweetly narcotic Aëssia odor, which has made us so willingly captive in the garden scene between Faust and Margaret.

A "Kapellmeister" of the Seventeenth Century.*

(Continued from page 146).

The Elector for a long time refused his consent to the Italian journey; he now, however, yielded to the repeated and urgent solicitations of his Kapellmeister, and granted him permission to go. Schütz's efforts during this trip were not directed to gaining over and engaging distinguished singers or instrumentalists, but zealously observing, and, if possible, obtaining possession of all objects connected with music which could tend to improve the Dresden establishment, his beloved corpus musicorum. That his own means would not go far in making purchases is evident, but he did not hesitate incurring considerable debts, in the firm conviction that his art-loving sovereign would liberally supply the wanting funds.—As the fearful war, which had been raging in Germany for the last ten years, had hitherto pretty well spared the Saxon territory, the Elector made no demur, but acceded to Schütz's request to give something more than usual. Schütz first received four hundred and then three hundred thalers. But Schütz and his master were not destined to profit at once by the brilliant acquisitions made for the chapel, as, shortly after Schütz's return, Saxony became almost the focus of the war. Distress burst out, and in the following year the general misery was endless.

As a matter of course, any cultivation of art was, under such circumstances, out of the question. Where was the Elector to find the means of alleviating the wretchedness of a few musicians and their families, when he required his money so pressing for other things? In this crisis, it was Schütz who assisted the sufferers by word and deed; who, with kind arguments and not inconsiderable sacrifices, alleviated the deep misery of the members of his chapel. All his urgent representations at Court were insufficient to procure the payment of arrears, and how far could his own means reach? This fearful period strode with iron foot over musicians just as it did over other people, and the most heart-rending pictures are presented to our gaze. The musicians wanted the very necessaries of life; some went one way, some went another, and the chapel that had been created with such trouble and such industry was partially broken up. He would rather, Schütz writes, be "Cantor" or organist in his own little town than remain longer in such a position. If things continue thus, he said, he should be compelled to seek an asylum elsewhere, for he had already advanced at least three hundred thalers to the poor people.

It was not till after the year 1640 that there was a change for the better, though it was long before the distress ceased. In 1641, Schütz was able to make proposals to his sovereign for the re-establishment of the corpus musicorum. It was too costly a process to engage new members; so he admitted fresh chapel-boys and instrumental boys to assist the members who still remained. This was decidedly the cheapest and surest plan for establishing a new chapel. The Electoral Prince—afterwards Johann Georg II.—took a greater interest in music than even the Elector himself, and thus a new chapel gradually grew up, though its condition previous to the termination of the war cannot be described as particularly gratifying.

* Translated for this Journal from the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna.

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

It may easily be imagined that, after a period so full of labor and care, Schütz should yearn for repose, and we cannot feel surprised that, in 1651, when he was 66, he begged permission to retire. He was impelled to make this request principally by misunderstandings with the Italians, whom the Electoral Prince had attracted to Dresden for the purpose of forming a chapel of his own. Schütz, who was better versed than any one else in the Italian style, had to exert himself most actively in carrying out the Prince's wishes, till, at last, he was so over-burdened with work that he felt his strength stagger beneath it. He represented that his eyes were becoming feeble, and that he was by no means sure of being able to maintain in his old age any little reputation he might have achieved in his younger years; that scholars could not estimate the great difficulties of his post, as no studies of a similar nature to his were pursued at German Universities. Notwithstanding all his entreaties, the Elector would not let him go, although he gave him, in 1653, his pupil, Christoph Bernhard as a substitute. Even when Johann Georg I. died, in 1656, and the Prince's chapel entirely disappeared, being partially blended, by the way, with the Electoral chapel, Schütz was appointed chapelmaster, and performed the duties of that post during quite sixteen years, though, of course, not with his old strength and freshness. In this situation he gained, however, the affection and esteem of the Italians themselves in the highest degree, and, when the venerable old man died at the age of eighty-seven, he was accompanied to the grave by the love, gratitude, and admiration of all his friends and contemporaries.

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY EMIL NAUMANN.*

(Continued from page 146.)

It is a well-known fact that, even as early as the 13th century, a warmer interest began to be felt for the treasures handed down from classical antiquity, and the code of morals contained in them—a code opposed to the specifically Christian views of the Middle Ages. Until then almost exclusively confined to monasteries and school-divines, classical literature now began to be the intellectual property of poets, artists, intelligent princes, and other leading men. It is true that care was still taken, as is proved by Dante's poem among other works, to subordinate the elements of classical teaching to the views of the Middle Ages, so that the antique element could present itself effectively only as tolerated by the imagination, and not as independent, and, therefore, affecting the life of the Present in a new and independent manner. It did not do this till the 15th and 16th century, when in consequence of the discoveries in astronomy, at variance with the tenets of the Church, the discovery of America, the progress of the burgher class in commerce, art, and industry, and, above all, in consequence of the Reformation, the limits of the old ideas and the former state of things were everywhere broken through. As one of the most important results of these tremendous mental shocks and material revolutions was a new and joyous return to this world, a secularization in the best sense of the term, and therefore, an uninterruptedly progressive reconciliation of Christianity with the world, from that period down to the present day, as if, so to speak, the various peoples once more felt at home in their own country, their own language, and their own nationality, it was only natural that Antiquity should be more deeply, and, at the same time, more popularly comprehended in all the penitentiarity and originality of its teaching, than it was in the 13th century. It may be said that the partiality for Antiquity degenerated, in the 16th century, almost into mannerism. At Florence, Rome, and Venice, on festive occasions, public processions were got up, in which the figures of the gods and heroes of the Greeks traversed the streets. Raphael wrote his enthusiastic letter to Pope Leo X.; Michael Angelo sank into entranced contemplation of the Farnese Hercules; poets, painters, and sculptors, began to take their subjects quite as much from the world of ideas belonging to the classical times as to those of the Middle Ages. It was the fashion to compare the great ones of this earth with Mars, Caesar, and Titus, while the great ones themselves thought it an honor to raise their capitals, Courts, and universities into nurseries, where art and science, striking root in the Antique, might blossom afresh. Under such circumstances, it was only natural that the elements of classical culture should begin to influence music as well as other things. Here again, it is wonderfully and convincingly apparent how closely connected Poetry and Music have come down to us from the earliest period of history.

To revive the tragedy of the Ancients, an association of artists and lovers of art was formed, in the year 1580, at the house of Giovanni Bardi, Conte de Vernio, in Florence. It comprised among its members the Mæcenases, Vicenzio Galilei, Giacomo Corsi, Pietro Strozzi; the poets, Ottavio Rinuccini, Orazio Vecchi; and the composers, Emilio del Cavalieri, Giacomo Peri, and Giulio Caccini. One result of the efforts of this society was the composition of the first lyrical opera, Dafne, the poem by Rinuccini, produced at Florence in 1594. This was followed by the first tragic opera, Orfeo ed Euridice, the poem by Rinuccini, the music by Peri and Caccini.—As already stated, the sole object of these enthusiasts for classical Antiquity was to revive the antique Drama. They thought, therefore, principally, of enriching poetry rather than music, to which latter it was their intention to assign merely a secondary part. That music, however, should reap the largest harvest from their efforts, as it did, since an entirely new kind of composition, opera, sprang from them, is one of those wondrous phenomena of which we meet with more than one instance as the elements of progress appertaining to different epochs of civilization cross each other's path.

However little the rise of opera we have here described appears at first to have to do with Oratorio, every one must admit that it exercised a most important influence on the last named branch of art, when we show that precisely in these earliest dramatico-musical attempts was discovered the formula by virtue of which Oratorio was first enabled to attain the importance of an epic tone-poem; we mean developed recitative. This was like the recitations in the Mysteries at an earlier period; it first rendered possible any kind of musical narrative, and yet it was entirely different from them. The recitations somewhat resembled the responsories and antiphonies which were declaimed on the same tone repeated, and musically limited by the same initiatory and concluding formula, such as we find them, even at the present day, in the Greek and the Roman Catholic Church, or in the Synagogue. But in the dramatic recitative of the Florentines above mentioned, the object proposed was a musical rendering of the text not merely corresponding in a general way with the meaning to be expressed, but adapted to each particular word, so that free scope was left to musical fancy and invention, and the declamatorily or melodically developed phrase took the place of the monotonous psalmodic style.

While this kind of recitative assumed a more and more dramatic coloring in opera, especially where the object was to represent a sudden change in the feelings and impressions of the different characters, or to work up the situation to a dramatic climax by means of laconic and passionate interpellations and replies, it was, on the contrary, marked in Oratorio by a more staid and calmer bearing, such as the spirit of epic music demanded. It is true that, even here, though more broadly and diffusely treated than in opera, recitative serves to afford the personages introduced as speaking an opportunity for expressing an abrupt change of feeling, or sudden and deep emotion; its chief and powerful object was, however, to announce, to inform, and to narrate; to animate, and fully express the purport of the story; and to connect, with a due regard to form and style, as well as epically, the principal points now represented as more especially lyrical, and now as more especially dramatic, occurring within the framework of that story.

From recitative thus developed to the forms of the air and of the duet there was but one step.—Where formerly, in the recitative style, the sentiment willingly tarried awhile, and sought a resting-point, or found an opportunity for the utterance of its increased force, and, consequently, loved to spread out musically, in a melodic or pathetic manner, there now were introduced the air, the duet, the trio, etc., either as a developed lyrical, or a dramatico-musical fact, on attaining its complete expression. A great support for the development of the new art-form that thus arose was derived from the progress made meanwhile, up to a certain point, by instrumental music, which rendered it possible to accompany the recitatives, arias, duets, etc., in question, either on the organ or the manichord, or with string and wind-instruments, and to write a bass to them.

(To be continued.)

MS. Works of Mendelssohn brought to Light.

1. THE REFORMATION SYMPHONY.

(From the London Telegraph, Dec. 21.)

 A singular history is attached to the work to which we allude. The symphony in D minor—which, by-the-by, both begins and ends in the major—was written expressly zur Feier des Reformationsfestes, in celebration, that is to say, of the tercentenary festival of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, solemnized throughout Germany on the 25th June, 1830. But party spirit ran high then, and although Mendelssohn had completed the symphony in ample time, he preferred to postpone its production until it could be listened to without passion and criticized without prejudice. But when two years afterwards, on his return from Italy, where his well-known symphony in A major had chiefly engaged his attention, he visited Paris, he bethought him of the earlier work, and arranged that it should be given at a Conservatoire concert. In one of his letters he writes that he "is looking forward to the D minor symphony, which," he says, referring, doubtless, to the fact of its having been composed for a Protestant festival, "I never dreamed that I should hear for the first time in Paris." Nor did he hear it there. For the cholera broke out, Mendelssohn himself was attacked, the city was deserted, and the composer arrived in London without hearing his work performed. The above extract from his letters proves that the "Reformation Symphony" had never been given up to February, 1832, and it has been generally supposed that the work was never publicly performed. In the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, however, for February, 1833, we have lighted upon the report of a concert said to have been given in the preceding November, at which three new compositions of Mendelssohn—new to the people of Berlin, that is—were brought forward. These were the Reformation Symphony, the G-minor Concerto, and the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Strangely enough, it does not state who played the concerto or who conducted the symphony. We can have no doubt, however, that it was Mendelssohn himself, for he is reported to have played at the same concert one of Beethoven's sonatas. The few words which the critic bestows upon the symphony may be worth repeating, inasmuch as everything is interesting that relates to a great man. "The symphony," says the writer, "begins solemnly, is then wildly agitated (wild bewegt), and has a humorous scherzo and artistic and lively concluding allegro. The frequent strains of well known chorale melodies, e.g., 'Ein feste Burg,' are cleverly interwoven; nevertheless, a more solemn rather than stormily wild and gloomy character would, on the whole have imparted to this tone-picture a more engaging coloring."

* From the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung.

After such fashion was a great work by the foremost composer of his time commented upon in the most important musical periodical of Germany. If journalism reflected the opinion of the day, Mendelssohn can scarcely have been appreciated at his full value. The Reformation Symphony was never, so far as we know, repeated, and it is possible that its fastidious author had an idea of modifying it at some future time. Death, however, put an end to all such designs, and the executors of the composer, too careful of his reputation, refused to make the work public. Now that we have heard the Reformation Symphony we are utterly at a loss to understand the principle on which they have acted. They have given to us, at intervals, it is true, and with apparent reluctance, the music to "Athalia" and "Edipus," the "Lauda Sion," the "Finale to Loreley," the "Heimkehr"—known here as "Son and Stranger"—the Italian [symphony, the F-minor quartet, the B-flat quintet, and the overture to "Ruy Blas"—all compositions which Mendelssohn himself had abstained from making public. And yet they obstinately refused to publish or lend the score of a work which, as it seems to us, is as valuable as any of the above-mentioned treasures.

Lately, however, a change has come o'er the spirit of the dream, and, thanks to Herr Carl Mendelssohn, the son of the composer, the Trumpet overture, the eighth book of Songs without Words, and, lastly, the Reformation Symphony, have been given up in rapid succession. The announcement that the latter work would be given on Saturday last at the Crystal Palace produced almost as much excitement among musical people as the production of an undiscovered play from Shakespeare's pen would cause among play-goers. Not a corner of the immense concert-room was unoccupied, and among the audience could be discerned the familiar faces of all the connoisseurs, professional and amateur, in London.

We have not the hardihood to attempt the analysis of so important a work after a single hearing, nor can we venture precisely to denote its position among the symphonies which have been left to us by Mendelssohn. In one respect, at least, it seems to us to excel them all. It has a distinctly defined aim and object. It has been inspired by one grand idea, which, from the first note to the last, is never once lost sight of. Written to celebrate the Reformation, in the faith of which Mendelssohn himself was brought up, it depicts in brilliant colors the rise and progress, the past and future of Protestantism. It is, in fact, a drama, the action of which is carried on by the orchestra. And in this we see an illustration of the advance which has been made in the most popular art of modern times. In the early history of music we find that the instruments are employed as gentle, submissive handmaids of the human voice, the Queen of them all. Like willing slaves, they prepare the way for her approach; like considerate attendants, they support her on her progress, and give her time to breathe when she is tired; while, like discreet and well-trained courtiers, they lapse into hushed silence as soon as she opens her mouth. But, as time goes on, the "mechanical minded" instruments, like intelligent subjects of a weak monarch, pluck up a heart, and dare to let their voices be heard, even when royalty speaks. And so, in the orchestra as in the states, the spirit of insubordination and independence goes on increasing, until at length all the instruments combine, and form a republic in which none but the best man can play first fiddle. With these quick-tongued and eloquent citizens for actors, and with the stage for a concert room, does Mendelssohn play out the great drama of the Reformation.

He opens with a short andante of ecclesiastical character, the calm solemn beauty of which may denote the perfect contentment in which all nations lived when there flourished but one Christian Church. This slow movement, however, speedily gives place to an allegro con fuoco, in which is prominent a certain melody, which, taken from responses used in the Roman Catholic service, and much admired by Mendelssohn, may be supposed to symbolize that faith. But the mutterings of doubt begin to rise, and when these are quickly suppressed, they are exchanged for one of those long melodious phrases of wild, wailing melancholy such as Mendelssohn introduced into the Scotch Symphony, and which here may denote suffering to which the suppression of dissent gave rise. At the end of the elaborately written movement, however, the victory seems to remain with the established church, and here the first act of the drama concludes. But human nature cannot always be a prey to the sadness which waits upon serious doubt; so the second movement, an allegro vivace, is as lively as the first was sad. The scherzo—for such it really is—opens with a charmingly sparkling and exhilarating theme, and the merriment, as though it were the outpouring of exuberant animal spirits, gets more and more boisterous until, checked by a delicious phrase, which, stealing gently in, hushes the reckless confusion as though it were a voice from heaven, reminding the merry-makers that there is a peace above which far transcends the mere jollity of this life. Three times does this heavenly phrase recur, each time exerting the self-same tranquilizing influence, while the graceful flowing melody of the trio also arrests the prevailing cheerfulness of the movement; but gaiety at length gains the upper hand, and the coda is distinguished by a persistent playfulness that never flags.

The third movement, an andante, opening with a long and highly expressive melody, given out by all the string band, suggests most powerfully the despair of unbelief; but when this anguish has subsided into hopeless silence, the melody of the famous Lutheran chorale, "Eino feste Burg ist unser Gott," allotted to the flute solo, falls upon the ear with the softness of the "gentle dew from heaven." Once announced, though in never such tranquil tones, the melody that signifies the protesting tenets gains gradually in strength and purpose. It perpetually starts up from different regions of the orchestra with unanticipated effect. Often suppressed and often struggling with difficulty to make itself heard, it is never long silent. Like the pure faith it symbolizes, which no blandishments could corrupt and no persecution could root out, the melody makes itself everywhere felt. A most masterly fugue begins to cleave its stubborn, unflinching way through all opposition, and the scarcely less determined chorale follows close in the path thus rudely made. But the road becomes broader, and then the hymn begins to march victorious, pari passu, with the fugue. We have scarcely time to note the splendid skill with which the two subjects are worked together, for a brief reminiscence of the first movement, suggesting the hold which the ancient faith still has upon religious minds, reappears only to be speedily absorbed, and the grand chorale, having overcome all opposition, is finally given out with all the force of the full orchestra—a symbol of the certain ultimate triumph and universal supremacy of the Church of Christ, in its simplest, purest, and holiest form. With this noble announcement of the Lutheran hymn doth the Reformation Symphony conclude. It is, at least, a graceful fancy that the spirits of the departed still haunt the earth. The spirit of the mighty genius whose "counterfeit presentment" was on Saturday crowned with laurel must surely have been present when one of his noblest creations was awakened from long slumber to a second youth.

The symphony was throughout listened to with absorbed attention, the scherzo was enthusiastically endorsed, and Mr. Mauns, at its conclusion, was specially summoned to receive a tribute well earned by the marvellously fine performance of the orchestra he conducts so well.

II. EIGHTH BOOK OF SONGS WITHOUT WORDS.

Musicians will need no telling that this eighth book of the beautiful effusions for the pianoforte which alone would make their composer's name a household word to the end of time, has hitherto been kept from the public by his executors. The repentance and amendment of those individuals have been tardy, but—better late than never—they have now seen the error of their ways, and have given a first instalment of the dead musician's treasures to the world. Leaving the other works out of the question, it is hard to tell why the lieder were so long withheld. Not even the most inveterate detractor of Mendelssohn would say that they are unworthy of publication; and no one else would be likely to adjudge them unworthy of their author. On a smaller scale, and in all respects less ambitious than their predecessors, they undoubtedly are; but every one of them contains more or less of Mendelssohn's characteristic melodies, and, so far from doing his reputation an injury, will have an effect the very reverse. This new book gives the master a new claim upon the love and admiration of all who have learned to love and admire him for his works' sake. On account of reasons which will readily suggest themselves, the six "songs" were not taken on Monday in the order they are printed. What that order may be we do not yet know, and therefore we are driven to speak of them according to the numbers by which they are known on this special occasion. No. 1 is an andante un poco agitato in E minor, and has a pensive, melancholy, almost mournful theme, with the syncopated accompaniment its composer so often used. No. 2, an andante in C major, is marked by quiet, lovely melody, and unpretentious four-part harmony, examples of which will at once occur as being found in the preceding books. The allegro vivace in A major, which stood as No. 3, is thoroughly Mendelssohnian in its delicate grace and refined gladness, which a dash of the pensive makes more interesting. With this the religious peace and calm of No. 4—an adagio in D major—was in admirable contrast. Here, again, Mendelssohn has resorted to four-part harmony. The type of No. 5—an andante agitato in G minor—is very familiar. It presents the charming theme and the arpeggio accompaniment every pianoforte player knows so well. No. 6 is a presto in C major, brimful of joyous abandon, which dashes along its course (taking the listener with it), and never stopping to breathe till the end is reached, when, as on Monday, the listener wants to make the journey again. Such, in very brief, are the new treasures shortly to be placed within the reach of pianoforte players. We congratulate them on the prospect. As regards the manner in which they were performed, we must at once say that Madame Arabella Goddard discharged her responsible duty to perfection. That lady's task might well have made her nervous; for it is no light thing to come forward as the first interpreter to the world of a great master's utterances. In some sort, not only the credit of the performer, but of the composer also, rested upon her, and must have been felt in proportion to the already-acquired fame of each. But, whether nervous or not, Mendelssohn was safe in Madame Goddard's hands, and needed no better exponent. Each "song" came forth, for the first time, true to the composer's ideal, in expression no less than in execution, and was at once accepted as being so with the "unerring instinct" of such an audience in such a case.—Times.

The Bavarian Sitting.

SCENE.—In Apartment in the House of Wittelsbach.

On the Throne is seated the one and only Wagner, at his feet the King of Bavaria.

His Majesty, the King—High-honored and heaven-gifted poet: another deputation has brought its ever-respectful feet to our door, and awaits the world-celebrated honor of receiving my revered wishes in reference to the about-to-be-passed treaty, which has been accepted by the almost unanimous voice of our Lower House.

H. M. Wagner—Majesty, don't interrupt. I am just beginning the fifteenth act of my never-too-much-to-be-praised-and-admired operatic and dramatic entirety, entitled Blutwurst und Geseherl, oder Musikalische Katzenharmonie, by the only one Wagner—my honored self.

H. M. the King—How beautiful—how all-heavenly the title! Let us away to the mountains—to Starnberg—anywhere—where I may fill my eager-swallowing soul with thy real Wagnerian harmonies.

H. M. Wagner—Halt's man, Majesty. My new work will take three days and three nights to perform.

H. M. the King—All-beloved heaven, how delicious! The hangman take politics, and my brother of Hades carry off Bismarck. I would give up Nürnberg, Augsburg, and Bamberg for an overture from thee, Great Poet!

H. M. Wagner—Overture! Your Majesty is softening as to his royal brain. I never write overtures. Leave them to the cursed Italian-composition imitators. My genius awaits the descent, and not the rising of the curtain, to bring the all-stirring notes of the orchestra into play.

H. M. the King—But, Poet, even now I hear the door-knocking-knuckles of the different on-the-pavement-marshalled deputations. What must I say? Speak.

H. M. Wagner—Majesty, you're a decided fool. If your weak belief prompts you to these unseemly interruptions, I shall be guilty of a false discord—nay, I might even fall into a weak ebullition of melody, which might bring the Abbé Liszt's maledictions down on my to-noise-devoted head.

H. M. the King—But Poet-Brother, how can I decide without your consent? Hohenlohe is by no means conciliatory.

H. M. Wagner—Hohenlohe doesn't believe in the divine right of musicians of the future. Hohenlohe must be instructed. What's the row, Majesty?

H. M. the King—Divine composer—

H. M. Wagner—Stay, Majesty. A theme for five bassoons and thirteen side drums, in unison, flits across my Apollo-blessed brain. Give me my tablets.

H. M. the King—My noble Poet, I have that honor. But e'er thy seraphic inspirations vault on to harmonious back of Pegasus, strike the one chord in my people's heart through mine.

H. M. Wagner—In the name of all that's holy, Majesty, leave me alone, or I shall at once retire to the Court of Vienna.

H. M. the King—Heaven avert such calamity-pregnant disaster!

H. M. Wagner—Listen once, Majesty. Does Prussia threaten to tax the people's beer by a single kreutzer?

H. M. the King—Warum nicht gar! There's no fear of that.

H. M. Wagner—Then go ahead. Vote for Bismarck and Baierisch Beer?—London Tomahawk.

Music Abroad.

London.

ORATORIO. During the last week in November Elijah was performed both by the Sacred Harmonic and the National Choral Society. The former Society held in the same week its 35th annual meeting at Exeter Hall, the president, Mr. J. N. Harrison, in the chair.

The report, a document of considerable length, stated that the subscription list had been, as usual, as full as the committee considered it desirable to encourage; that the concerts had always been attended by crowded audiences, and that they had satisfied the committee that their exertions to maintain the society as the greatest choral institution in the world had been attended with success. Reference was made to the steps taken by the committee to maintain the efficiency of the orchestra, and it was stated that many of the elder members of the orchestra had retired, their places being occupied by younger members, who were only admitted after the strictest trial as to their ability and promise to attend rehearsals with regularity. The members were informed that the committee had entered into arrangements with the directors of the Crystal Palace for another Grand Handel Festival in 1868, and from the steps which were in contemplation in reference thereto no doubt was entertained by the committee that it would surpass its predecessors. Several of the oratorios and other works performed by the society during the past season had not been performed for several seasons, in addition to which Mr. Benedict's cantata "St. Cecilia," had also been performed by the society for the first time in London. It met with great success, and had since been performed at the last Birmingham Festival and at several other places in the country. Reference was made to the benefit concert undertaken by Mr. Costa and the society in aid of the fund for restoring the destroyed portion of the Crystal Palace. The thanks of the directors and of the shareholders of the company had been given to the committee, and it was hoped that the example thus set, and subsequently by distinguished foreigners, might be more generally followed.

The accounts of the society for the past year were read by the treasurer. The receipts had been £5091, 16s. 11d.; the payments for the year, including some considerable purchase of music and refitting the offices at Exeter Hall, £5,143 19s. 1d. The property of the society was valued at a little under £10,000, including £4,500 in the public funds.

The report was adopted, and the retiring members of the committee re-elected.

It was stated that the next concert would be the 500th given by the society in the large hall at Exeter Hall, and that the committee had requested Mr. Costa to allow his oratorio "Naaman" to be performed on this occasion as a slight mark of their esteem. Upon this a resolution was moved by Mr. Puttick and seconded by Mr. Hill that the receipts from this concert be handed over to the benevolent fund of the society, the society defraying the whole cost of the concert, and that the members and subscribers of the society be requested to aid in forwarding the benevolent object.

The cordial thanks of the members were given to Mr. Costa for his great exertions during the past year, to whom they offered their congratulations at the success with which those exertions had been attended.

Votes of thanks were then passed to the president, the treasurer, and other officers of the society; and the meeting separated without a dissentient voice having been raised during the two hours' proceedings.

CHAMBER CONCERTS. The second Monday Popular concert was interesting as presenting an eighth book of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, second of the books posthumously published. The programme in which these Lieder formed a part was as follows:

Quintet in A major, for clarinet, two violins, viola and violoncello. MM. Lazarus, Straus, L. Ries, Henry Blagrove, and Piatti. Mozart.
Song, "Where the bee sucks." Miss Cecilia Westbrook.
Arthur Sullivan.

Lieder Ohne Worte, book 8. posthumous publication; first time of public performance in any country. Mme. Arabella Goddard. Mendelssohn.
Sonata in D major, op. 58, for piano and 'cello. Mme. Arabella Goddard and Ignor Piatti. Mendelssohn.
Song "Puck, clouds away." Miss Cecilia Westbrook: clarinet obligato, Mr. Lazarus. Macfarren.
Quartet in C major, op. 74, No. 1, for two violins, viola and 'cello; first time at the Monday Popular Concerts.
MM. Straus, L. Ries, Henry Blagrove and Piatti. Haydn.

The eighth book contains six Lieder, the dates and localities of their composition being mostly indicated. No. 1 was written in London on the 12th of June 1842, and No. 2 on July 5th in the same capital. No. 3 was composed at Leipsic on the 12th of December 1845, and No. 4 is from an undated manuscript belonging to Mrs. Klingemann, the wife of an intimate friend of Mendelssohn. Nos. 5 and 6 were composed February 5th, 1841, and December 12th, 1845, the place not being named in either case. Of the collection it may be briefly said that they show more power and beauty than the seventh book, published after the death of Mendelssohn. In every case they are calculated rather to advance than detract from the fame of the composer. For the manner in which they were rendered by Mme. Goddard we have only unqualified praise. An encore awaited her for Nos. 3 and 6, and the applause at the end was most hearty. These Lieder are published by Messrs. Ewer & Co. The clarinet quintet of Mozart was given to perfection. Miss Westbrook ably filled the post of vocalist, and Mr. Arthur Sullivan supplied the place of Mr. Benedict as conductor. At the third concert on last Monday we had no special novelty. A fifth performance of Schubert's quartet in D charmed the auditory, being unexceptionably played by MM. Straus, Ries, Blagrove, and Piatti. A sonata in A major, for violin or German flute, composed by Handel, was introduced by Herr Strauss for the first time, and pleased considerably, notwithstanding its antiquated form. It is in four movements, with a piano forte accompaniment, not however Handel's. The adagio in F sharp minor is particularly fine. Mr. Hallé was the pianist, and selected Beethoven's sonata in G, Op. 31, a composition which he played with marvellous effect—especially the sweet and melodious adagio in C. Mr. Hallé was warmly welcomed. Mme. Sinico, the vocalist, gave us "My mother bids me bind my hair," "Non temer" with violin obligato, and Gounod's ever popular serenade, to which Signor Piatti's violoncello formed a good accompaniment.

The first of a series of "historical performances of pianoforte music" was given by Herr Pauer in Hanover Square on Wednesday. The programme, made up of certain compositions in consecutive order of production, was apportioned into two parts; the pre-piano or clavichord age, and the pianoforte age. In the first we had Kuhnau, Handel, S. Bach, and Friedemann, all of whom furnished specimens for Herr Pauer's illustrations; in the second part we had E. Bach, Hüssler, Mozart, Beethoven, Hummel, Liszt and Thalberg. It is needless to say that all the illustrations, which are too numerous for specification, were given by Herr Pauer with his usual careful and artistic style of playing. As the concert was a matinée the audience were mostly composed of ladies.—Orchestra, Nov. 30.

BURNT UP.—A cable despatch brings intelligence of the destruction by fire of Her Majesty's Theatre, the largest in London, and one of the largest in the world. There are more traditions and recollections attached to this house than to any existing theatre. It was the first home of Italian opera in London, when that class of entertainment was patronized solely by the exclusive English aristocracy. It was the scene of the early triumphs of the greatest artists that ever lived, Pasta, Malibran, Rubini, Tamburini, Viardot Garcia, Lablache, Grisi and Mario, Jenny Lind, and later, of Titiens, Piccolomini, and the ill-fated Giuglini; and the very week of its destruction witnessed the triumphant success of America's pet prima-donna, Miss Kellogg. Besides these great singers in opera, all the most famous dancers have graced its boards in the days when the ballet was an institution in London.—Fanny Elssler, Tagliioni, Cerito, Carlotta Grisi, and many others, and it was the only house in England where ballet was ever made popular. The early directors, men of great wealth, successively lost colossal fortunes in trying to build up Italian opera in London, and the later ones, without exceptions, failed to achieve any pecuniary success. The loss will be greatly deplored by the aristocratic music-loving community of Europe.

Her Majesty's Theatre had a seating capacity of over 6,000 persons. The lessee of the establishment was Mr. Mapleson, who had during several seasons past conducted Italian opera in opposition to Mr. Gye at Covent Garden. It was, as we have said, at Her Majesty's that Miss Kellogg made her debut last month, the season being an extra one, occasioned by the sitting of the Abyssinian Parliament. Mr. Mapleson has suffered a heavy loss through the destruction of his fine wardrobe, catalogue of music and scenery. The disaster is all the more untimely for him, since the last season had entailed a large deficiency which he had hoped through the Kellogg fi-rocce to repair.

It is not impossible that Miss Kellogg's contract will now be transferred to the Covent Garden (Royal Italian) opera.

The destruction of Her Majesty's Theatre must seriously affect the gay world in London, unless Mr. Gye shall determine to occupy the gap at once, by instituting a campaign for which he had made no preparation.

Paris.

THE ORPHEON.—In the correspondence of the Orchestra, November 26, we have the following account of this important institution for the recreation and refinement of the French people:

The Orphéon furnishes to the youth of the Communal schools instruction in the elements of music, and by making them acquainted with the beauties of the best poetry, and revealing to them the primordial laws of harmony, cultivates the ear, and teaches them to speak their language with a purer pronunciation. There they acquire the taste for elevating recreations, and learn, above all, how from the union of voices may spring the union of hearts. For at the Orphéon all classes meet together—masters and workmen, townsmen and soldiers, rich and poor, peasants and citizens;—all liberal minds are interested in this useful institution, as yet hardly thirty years old. It is after the Liedertafeln of Germany and Switzerland that the Orphéon has been modelled. The first German Liedertafel was founded at Berlin, in 1808, by the musician Zelter, assisted by Goethe; and another poet, none other than Béranger, contributed to the success of the Orphéon by proposing B. Wilhem as singing master in the schools of mutual instruction, when in October, 1818, the study of music was introduced into them. It was not until 1835, however, that the municipal council of Paris ordered the introduction of singing into the Communal schools. Three years later, singing was regularly taught in all the universities. There remained the working classes, both at Paris and in the departments. At the suggestion and under the eye of Wilhem, M. Hubert, an excellent professor, opened, in 1835, in the Rue Montgolfier, a course of vocal music for working people, and the pupils of these evening schools were able, at the end of a few months, to sing in chorus. This first success led to the opening of similar schools at the Halle aux Draps, the Rue de Fleurus, the Rue d'Argenteuil, and elsewhere; and to-day, according to official documents, there are in France 3,243 choral societies, numbering 147,500 singers. The Orphéon had thus at its disposition hundreds of tenor and bass voices to reinforce and complete the choruses of our Communal schools. The more the public performances were multiplied, the more clearly manifest became the interest felt in the cause of the Orphéon. In 1852, the functions at first discharged by B. Wilhem, and afterwards by M. Hubert, devolved upon the distinguished composer, M. Ch. Gounod. This eminent musician handed in his resignation in 1860, and the Orphéon, continually growing in prosperity, was then divided into two sections; that of the left bank of the Seine under the direction of M. François Bazin, and that of the right under M. Jules Pasdeloup. M. Hubert was appointed inspector of the Communal schools on the right bank, and M. Foulon of those on the left. Such is, in brief, the history of the establishment and progress of the Orphéon. Every Thursday evening the adult pupils receive a lesson from their director, and every Sunday afternoon adults and children meet together to repeat the choruses. The division under the charge of M. F. Bazin meets at the Sorbonne; and the division of the right bank of the Seine has hitherto met in the hall of the Grand Orient Rue Cadet, but will soon be obliged to move. Every spring there is an exhibition of progress made, at which 1,200 chosen pupils sing, before the Prefect of the Seine and the superintending committee, the new pieces which they have learned. Their repertoire is very rich, for our best composers take pleasure in adding to it every day. Adolphe Adam, Halévy, M. Ambroise Thomas, Félicien David, Ch. Gounod, Fr. Bazin, and other masters have furnished for it fine choral compositions. Thanks to their directors, our Orphéonists cultivate by turns Pergolesi and Lesueur, Handel and Rossini, Gluck and Mendelssohn, Gretry and Weber, Mozart and Schubert, the old masters and the new, the classical and the romantic school.

Germany.

VIENNA.—If any man living has a right to quote, in reference to himself, Virgil's well-known lines commencing :

"Sic vos non vobis mellificatis, apes."

that man is Sig. Salvi, ex-manager of the Imperial Opera house, Vienna. For months did he devote all his energies towards the getting up, in grandiose style, of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis;" for months did the scenic artist wield his brush, and the wardrobe woman ply her needle to aid in carrying out Signor Salvi's purpose; but first one obstacle cropped up, and then another, the upshot being that Sig. Salvi retired from the management without realizing his purpose after all. This was annoying enough, but how much more galling must be the fact that all the trouble and exertions of Sig. Salvi—about one of the most abused managers who had ever to battle with the caprices of prima donna, and the airs of primi tenori in Vienna—have gone to augment the fame of Sig. Salvi's successor on the managerial throne, Dr. Dingelstedt to-wit, who has just produced the opera in question, with all his predecessor's spic-and-span new scenery, dresses, and decorations. The revival met with a most warm and cordial reception. In the bills, Dr. Dingelstedt introduced a judicious novelty. This was a short historical summary of the work. In this summary he informs the public that "Iphigenia in Aulis" was first produced in Paris on the 19th April, 1774; at Vienna (in a German translation,) on the 14th December, 1808; and at Berlin, on the 25th December, 1809. Till the other day, it had not been performed in Vienna since the 30th of March, 1810. It may, perhaps, interest the readers of the Musical World to know that the following was the cast at the period of its first production in the Austrian capital. Agamemnon, Herr Vogel; Clytemnestra, Mad. Mille; Iphigenia, Mlle. Lauchner; Achilles, Herr Radtich; and Calchas, Herr Saal. On the present occasion, Herr Beck was Agamemnon; Mlle. Benza, Iphigenia; Mad. Dustmann, Clytemnestra; Herr Walter, Achilles; and Herr Draxler, Calchas. On the first night Herr Walter was evidently indisposed, and unable to do justice to his part or to himself, but he came out very well at the second performance. The other characters were satisfactorily supported, except that of Iphigenia herself. Mlle. Benza is admirable in light, joyous parts, but wants everything calculated to achieve success in lyric tragedy. By the way, there is a report that Gluck is the composer chosen to inaugurate the new Opera house, the Emperor having ordered that the spectacular opera, "Armida," shall be performed at the opening. Mozart's "Zauberflöte" has been given with Mlle. Siegestädt as Papagena. This young lady has long been a favorite in small parts and has now proved herself capable of satisfactorily undertaking more important ones. Not so successful was Mlle. Wilde from the Breslau Stadttheater, who appeared as the Page in "Les Huguenois." She was a decided failure. Mr. Adams did not display much feeling as Raoul, though he sang the music respectably. But what is the part of the young Protestant gentleman if not acted with spirit? Herr Rokitsky maintained his reputation as the roughest of Marcella, past, present, or future. In Verdi's "Trovatore," Herr Ferenczy made his re-appearance after an absence of several months. As far as it was possible to judge from one performance, his voice appears to have recovered its strength and quality; but whether the recovery is permanent is another thing. Throat-disease is not so easily cured. However, let us hope that in this instance the surgeons have really done their patient lasting good. It was said, some time since, that the manager of the Imperial Operahouse—whether Dr. Dingelstedt, or his predecessor, Sig. Salvi, the writer will not undertake to decide—had consented to produce Herr Bruch's "Loreley," on condition that Herr Bruch would incorporate with it the well-known finale left by Mendelssohn and, of course, omit his own. Whether Herr Bruch refused compliance, or the manager changed his mind, I do not know, but the probabilities are that Herr Bruch's "Loreley" will now be brought out as the composer wrote it.

Not long ago, Herr Knapp discovered in the lofts of the Burgtheater, of which he is a non-dramatic member, a collection of old scores. He was informed that they had been lying there many, many years. Glowing with the notion, and cherishing the wish, that he had come upon some unknown musical El Dorado, Herr Knapp rushes to Herr Esser, the Capellmeister at the Imperial Operahouse. Herr Esser immediately set about examining the mysterious collection. Alas! the scores were those of the regular stock operas by Lesueur, Persuis, Méhul, D'Alayrac, Catel, Grétry, Salieri, Gluck, Mozart, and Cimarosa, which used to be given at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre. On enquiry, it turned out that they had formerly been used there, and, when the theatre was let on lease, and ceased to be a government establishment, the scores, as Imperial property, were sent for safe keeping to the Burgtheater.

Great efforts have been made lately at the Theater an der Wien to restore what is here called "Spieloper," and in London "comic opera," to the place it once occupied in the estimation of the Viennese. The work chosen to inaugurate the experiment was "Des Teufels Antheil—La Part du Diable." Mlle. Geistinger was a charming Carlo Broschi. Herr Theodore Formes, however, was anything but a charming Raphael. It must be confessed that he acted well; nevertheless as singing, also, is required in opera, and Herr Formes has entirely lost his voice, his acting alone failed to convince the audience that the manager might not have found some artist more fitted for the part without expressly engaging Herr Theodore Formes, at a high salary, to perform it. Herr Formes appears to have felt himself that he was not a success, for he was content to let Herr Stampfer, the manager, cancel his engagement on payment of no more than 300 florins.

The manager, Herr Klerr, and the patentee, the Baroness Pasqualati, having at length patched up their quarrels, the Harmonie-theater re-opened its doors with "Die drei Kisse des Teufels," a one-act opera by Offenbach; "Karolina, oder ein Lied am Golf von Neapel," by G. zu Putlitz, music by P. Gumbert; and "Ein Kuss," by H. Wortell. "Die drei Kisse," etc., one of Offenbach's earliest efforts, was very favorably received. Herr Klerr conducted in person, and was warmly greeted on making his appearance in the orchestra.

The concert season bids fair to be a brilliant one. Herr Joachim will ere long be here, and a host of minor celebrities, also, have announced their intention of favoring the inhabitants of this capital. Herr Anton Rubinstein, who was known to the Viennese a quarter of a century ago as an "infant prodigy," began the campaign by a concert in the hall of the Musikverein. The programme was, naturally, of Anton Rubinstein, Rubinsteiny. There was Rubinstein's fourth Concerto with orchestra, in D minor; and there were songs by Rubinstein; and, last not least, there was a liberal amount of pianoforte playing by Rubinstein. The ex-director of the St. Petersburg Conservatory performed, also, at the first concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, when he selected Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, Liszt's "Don Juan" Fantasia. In the latter, he achieved anything but a triumph. The concert was more than usually interesting, from the fact of Herr Herbeck's re-appearance in the capacity of conductor. At the conclusion, Herr Herbeck received quite an ovation from the audience.

LEIPZIG.—The following pieces were performed at the fifth Gewandhaus Concert:—Overture to "Die Hebriden" and finale from "Loreley," Mendelssohn (Leonore, Mlle. Magnus, from Vienna); Turkish March; Dervish Chorus; and Solemn March and Chorus from "Die Ruinen von Athen," Beethoven; three songs from "Frauen Liebe und Leben," Schumann; and G-major Symphony, Schubert.—Herr Bille has given two concerts which were extremely successful.

COLOGNE.—On the 18th instant our Conservatoire had the great honor of a Royal visit, the very first one since its foundation. Her Majesty the Queen of Prussia, accompanied by their RR III the G. Duchess of Baden, the Princess William of Baden, the G. Duc of Weimar and Suite, came expressly from Coblenz to visit this very best musical-academy in Germany. Some Choruses for female voices by F. Hiller, as well as some Solos were beautifully rendered by Mme. Marchesi's pupils, and obtained the high approbation of the Royal party. Among the different splendid voices and talents, an American young lady, Miss Sterling, an extraordinary Contralto, produced a very great sensation on the occasion. A declamation, and some violin and pianoforte productions alternated with the singing of the ladies. Her Majesty the Queen, as well as her Royal suite, addressed repeated the most flattering compliments to Madame Marchesi as well as to Herr Ferdinand Hiller, the celebrated director of the Conservatoire. At the end of the Concert, F. Hiller had the honor to introduce all the different professors of the establishment to Her Majesty the Queen.

The second Gürzenich Concert brought out the Elijah of Mendelssohn. The performance was excellent on the part of the orchestra and chorus; not so was the case with the soli, Herr Hill (from Francfort) Bass, Frau Peschke-Leutner (from Darmstadt) Soprano, and Fräulein Keiss (from Minden) Contralto. The first quartet-soirée, which took place on the 12th instant, was a very brilliant one in regard to the quality of the programme as well as to the execution of it. The third Gürzenich Concert was highly interesting. The first part of the programme included selections from Gluck's operas and Chopin's compositions; the second part was exclusively dedicated to Schubert's compositions. A pianist from Stuttgart, Fräulein Mehlig, created a very great and due sensation. A new pupil of our Conservatoire, Fräulein Bodinus, came out for the first time in this Concert, and was triumphantly received by the crowded audience. She met with a great success on singing the air with female chorus from the Iphigenie of Gluck, as well as after delivering two Lieder of Schubert. Her voice, a pure Soprano, is not a very strong one, but it is sympathetic as her appearance is charming and her method a very pure one.

AMSTERDAM.—The first grand concert of the season, the Cecilia, was given on Thursday evening last in our municipal Theatre. The programme was exceedingly well selected, and included the following niceties:—1. Overture, Mercsstille und glückliche Fahrt (Mendelssohn); 2. Symphony in D (Haydn); 3. Overture, Michel Angelo (Gade), first time of performance at these concerts; 4. Symphony No. 3, Eroica (Beethoven); 5. Overture, Der Freischütz (Weber). Seldom have I witnessed such a beautiful performance as this one. There was, so to speak, one spirit animating the whole execution from beginning to end, every piece was played with extreme regularity, brilliancy, and firmness. It really constituted the very highest pitch attainable; a perfect orchestra rendering the pieces almost with perfection.

This superiority of the Cecilia band is chiefly due to Mr. Verhulst's untiring efforts, his energy, his severity. Fancy that when the last concert took place early this year, they immediately began studying the different pieces of Thursday's programme! First there was one rehearsal every week; it soon increased to three; in the last nine, however, there was a rehearsal every day, regularly at eight o'clock in the morning. Heavy penalties were enforced on absentees, who, though the band be very numerous, never escaped the watchful eye of the conductor. So it is practised year after year, and I have no doubt that the immense reputation of the Cecilia is principally owing to this rigid drill. The sweet Mercsstille and Haydn's gentle symphony were of course listened to with eagerness. There was evidently also much interest in the new overture, Michel Angelo, by Gade. Verhulst likes Gade, and Gade likes Verhulst. Is this mutual affection a consequence of their being both pupils of the same master—of Mendelssohn-Bartholdy? Very likely, for Gade is virtually the only living composer whose works are from time to time introduced at the Cecilia. Our excellent conductor has such strange fancies they say; because after all, I do not see why Schumann—and Wagner above all, should not be heard if Gade is almost every year, (I say Schumann, for, though dead, his music is always considered new, taking this word in its anti-classical sense). The Michel Angelo overture is a firm piece of music. I prefer it to Hamlet, which is in my humble opinion weak and vague. Curious difference between the two overtures; Hamlet, being an exclusively Danish subject, is not so Scandinavian as Michel Angelo, an entirely Italian one. The music of the latter composition makes us think more of Thor and Thorwaldsen than of the illustrious Tascan. It is thoroughly northern in its expression; a natural defect, but still a defect. The performance of Beethoven's immortal Eroica, the most beautiful piece of music that was ever conceived perhaps, delighted us all through its marvellous superiority. The familiar and magnificent overture, Freischütz, closed this highly successful concert in a very satisfactory manner. The theatre was crammed, no room whatever being left. The net receipts of the evening amounted to about £125.—Corr. London Orchestra, Nov. 25th.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, DEC. 9.—The second of Theo. Thomas' Symphony Soirées took place at Steinway Hall on Saturday evening, Dec. 7th. The orchestra numbered 80, and Leopold De Meyer was the soloist. The programme was as follows:—

- Symphony, No. 2, D major.....Haydn
- Piano Solo, Schubert's Serenade, transcribed and varied by Leopold de Meyer.
- Overture, C. op. 124, "Consecration of the House".....Beethoven.
- Piano Solo, a Nocturne, E flat.....Chopin.
- b. Soirée Musicale.....Rossini
- 31 Symphony, E flat, op. 37.....Schumann

The Haydn Symphony was charming in its melodious simplicity: the last movement, a quaint little rustic dance in common time, was given with great verve by Mr. Thomas's well-trained orchestra, as was also the Menuetto and its beautiful Trio in B flat major.

The Beethoven Overture offered a marked contrast to the first work on the programme: massive, grand, and full of rich harmony it was "solid food." The fugal passage at its close was given with great spirit, and the different voici were clearly and distinctly defined.

The Schumann Symphony is a most attractive work, full of ideas and rich in subtle harmonies. The 2d and 3d movements are especially attractive; the former—a delightful Scherzo in C major—is very winning. In the third phrase, where the pedal point remains persistently and resolutely on C, while the upper harmony moves through that and the relative keys, the pathetic, appealing character is very noticeable.

In the 3d movement (marked nicht schnell and really an andante con moto) a peculiarly graceful effect is produced by the setting off, as one might say, of two beautiful themes, the one against the other, by the string and wind orchestras. The whole movement is full of quiet and peace.

With regard to Mr. De Meyer's performance it becomes the duty of a faithful critic to utter a few unpleasant but necessary truths. It would be far better if at such a concert that gentleman should play music of a classical character. His selections could scarcely be dignified by that name, with the exception of the Chopin Nocturne, and that was murdered outright by the insertion of flourishes and embellishments which were thoroughly meretricious and totally devoid of the Chopin spirit. It may, perhaps, be superfluous to remark that it is useless for Mr. De Meyer to attempt to improve upon the works of the author just mentioned; any such attempt must result in failure; if we are to hear Chopin let us hear him, and not somebody else. Mr. De M.'s encores, also, were of a trashy character, the second one being apparently an ordinary (literally so) polka.

It is well that Mr. Thomas, with a most praiseworthy desire to please his patrons, should employ artists whom the musical world has acknowledged to be such, but it is not well that the character of such concerts as the Symphony Soirées should be lowered by such performances as those which I have mentioned; it is safe to say that such a display would not have been allowed in Vienna or London; nor, indeed, would it have been attempted there.

The audience, although not as large as could be wished, was an attentive and an appreciative one. The applause, however, was too indiscriminately bestowed, an error only too common with an American audience. F.

NEW YORK, DEC. 3.—Mr. F. L. Harrison began the series of six Oratorios, previously announced, by giving on Thanksgiving evening Haydn's "Seasons," with chorus by the N. Y. Harmonic Society, and with Mme. Rosa, and Messrs. Simpson and Thomas for soloists.

This is the least interesting of Haydn's two Oratorios, and it is difficult to imagine anything more barren and dead than the text, which is from Thomson with all the poetry eliminated. Yet, being Haydn's, the music cannot fail of being always fresh, sunny and healthful; breathing of Spring-time and violets, and green banks "whereon the wild thyme blows;" or, if of sorrow at all, it is a pure, trustful grief, a gentle, innocent sadness, like that of Nature herself. The music too has another claim upon our attention, for it is the inspiration of the master's declining years, and we know that, to him, the bird-songs and murmur of waters must have sounded faintly and afar. And so we are attentive and pleased, if not satisfied, though it is hard to realize that the same hand which penned this pretty music produced those sublime choruses, "Let there be light," and "The Heavens are telling."

Mr. Ritter was conductor and leader of orchestra, and the performance was a very successful one.

Next on the list we have Handel's "Samson," which will be given on the 11th of December, and from the number assembled to hear the "Seasons," we judge that Mr. Harrison's enterprise will be warmly supported.

The ninth Sunday evening concert [Dec 1st] witnessed the debut of a new prima donna, Miss Jenny Busk, whom we might easily believe to be a German, so faultless was her pronunciation in singing an aria from "The Magic Flute." She is, however, we are told, a native of Baltimore, and has recently returned from Europe, where she has received her education. Her voice is a pure soprano of excellent quality, with a freshness and flexibility which give promise of even more than she accomplished. Such faults of style as were discernible might easily be traced to a nervousness which on such an occasion was natural enough, and her reception was a very flattering one. Besides the Mozart aria, she sang the waltz from Romeo, and that difficult, because insipid ballad, "Coming thro' the Rye."

De Meyer coquetted with the piano, after his inimitable, half vexatious, half delightful fashion, playing of course his own compositions, and, in response to an encore, taking a theme from the "Duchess of Gerolstein," which he worked out in a very fanciful and brilliant manner.

Carl Rosa played the Ernst Elegie, and Mr. Colfield, at the organ, gave selections from Mendelssohn's Sonatas.

And now a word apropos of Sunday Concerts. We do not side with those who, having no idea of music, except as a means of amusement, would close the doors of the concert room on the Sabbath. On the contrary we know that there is more of truth in a Sonata of Haydn's or a song of Mendelssohn's, rightly understood, than in a score of sermons. We know also that all good music is, in a certain sense, sacred; but we wish to see all that belongs to the ball-room and all characterless piano-forte jugglery banished from the concert hall on the Sabbath, if at no other time. There is now certainly need of reform in this respect. A. A. C.

NEW YORK, DEC. 16.—The second Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert occurred on Saturday evening Dec. 14th, notwithstanding the keenness of the air and the snowed up condition of the streets, the audience was a large one, and the cheerful looking Academy of Music was filled with the beauty and fashion of the City of Churches. I append the programme:

2d Symphony, C major.....	Schumann.
Cavatina, "Se Romeo".....	Bellini.
Miss Florence Rice (Contralto)
Violin Concerto, Op. 31, (first time).....	Nieuxtempa.
Mme. Camilla Urso.....
2 movements from unfinished Symphony in B minor, (posthumous).....	Schubert.
Romance, Lullaby, "Sweet Spirit".....	Wallace.
Miss Rice.....
Violin Solo.....	Mme Urso.
Poeme Symphonique, "Les Preludes".....	Liszt.

In the Symphony we see the most admirable example of Schumann's genius. I shall reserve for a future occasion an elaborate analysis of the work, and have only space in this letter to particularize the 3d movement. I can but feebly attempt to describe the skill with which the serious and lovely theme is taken, (in one passage) now by the clarinet, now by the flute, and anon by the violins, when it merges into a sustained trill on high A by the latter instruments, gradually diminishing in sound, while softly steals in the oboe with the theme, the violins meantime slowly dropping down through intermediate semitones to E flat, and then vanishing into thin air. At the close of the movement occur two themes—or rather fragments of the first, the lower one taken by the contrabassi and sinking down, down into unfathomable depths. It is a complete and perfect poem.

The performance of the Symphony was in general satisfactory. There was, however, in the movement just mentioned, a certain shakiness in the high notes on the part of the violins.

In the two movements of Schubert's posthumous Symphony are plainly discernible traces of the genius which conceived the glorious work in C-major, of which Schumann said and wrote such noble and worthy things. The 2d movement (of the former), in E major, is quite Mendelssohnian in spirit and treatment.

Liszt's "Preludes" were doubtless interesting to those who can endure the orchestral works of that author.

Mme. Urso played with that admirable purity of tone and delicacy of touch for which that artist is so justly celebrated; had she a stronger bow there would absolutely be nothing to be desired. In the accuracy of her intonation she is second only to Joachim. The Concerto is a work of mediocre ability, noticeable only for abstruse harmonic changes, musician-like treatment and paucity of ideas.

Miss Rice sang badly. Her voice is hard and unsympathetic, and her method faulty. We would suggest to her that drawing is not taste, nor is it necessary to land upon particular notes with such hammer-like force.

The character of the programme is somewhat anomalous; it is evident that the standard of the Brooklyn Society is below that of the New York one. The former is, however, a younger institution, and one must not expect too much of taste while in a state of growth. F.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 21, 1867.

Symphony Concerts.

The third of the series (Dec. 5) appeared to interest the audience as much as any of its predecessors, although neither of the two Symphonies was a great one. Such an audience is in itself almost as harmonizing and inspiring as the music; indeed, with the one exception perhaps of that to which Mr. Dickens read, these Symphony audiences in character are about the best large audiences found anywhere. Better listeners to the best, we never knew; it is not their fault that a few restless exceptional ones disturb their enjoyment by coming in late or going out early. The orchestra still shows a better spirit and new signs of improvement. Never before has it been in so good a condition to make the following programme thoroughly appreciated.

Overture to "Genevra".....	Schumann.
Aria: "Non piu di fiori" from "La Clemenza di Tito".....	Mozart.
Mrs. Jenny Kempton.....
Symphony, No. 4, in B flat.....	Gade.
Symphony in G.....	Haydn.
Songs: a. "Allurement" (The Water Sprites).....	Dessauer.
b. "Hunting Song".....	Mendelssohn.
Mrs. Jenny Kempton.....
Overture to "Euryanthe".....	Weber.

The novelties were the two light but very pleasing Symphonies. Particularly charming was the one by Haydn, which is not found in the usual set of twelve composed for Salomon in London, and which we suspect was never played before in this country. It is a delightful Symphony; so bright and gay and full of frolic and imaginative humor in the quick movements; so deep and sweet and tender, at once serene and solemn, in the beautiful Largo (perhaps some of the audience recognized in its theme an old psalm tune of their younger days, which "Music-of-Nature" Gardiner had clipped out of it, and which in the early editions of the Handel and Haydn Collection went, if we remember rightly, by the name of "Milton"). The theme of the first Allegro is a short, almost trivial little phrase in itself, but it is worked up most felicitously, dancing like a sunbeam all about the walls. The third movement is a most genuine Minuet, as distinguished from the modern Scherzo; and the Trio, with its quaint and subtle play of melody, upon a drone bass in fifths, tickles the ear and fancy as the play of opaline colors does the eye. But the most humorous of all is the Finale, the subject of which is homely enough for a contra-dance (a country dance, if you will); but then the dancers are so fine, there is so much life and wit and genius, so much contrast of character, such a wealth of good spirits, such quick invention, quick perception of everything that can be pressed into the service, all in motion to the homely tune:—in other words it is so artistically worked up, with all the arts of imitation, illustration, contrast of instrumental colors, that it seems to swarm with happy thoughts. Haydn is not great or deep like Beethoven; his forms, his orchestra, are small compared with the more modern Symphonists; but our musical public began with Beethoven, and know him now so well that it is high time we supplied the blank in our education and made ourselves familiar with those perfect models of the symphonic art, as such, the Symphonies of Father Haydn. They are so wholesome and refreshing! And why must we always crave a great excitement? It is a good thing to be children when we can. Now this is drinking child-like joy from goblets that are masterworks of Art.

Gade's fourth Symphony is not at all comparable for genius and originality to the first, the well-known one in C minor. It has the charm of the same wild Northern mood; the same images and snatches of old song and tradition haunt the imagination; and the style of workmanship is the same. But it is a feebler effort of creation, a vain attempt to say something new out of a remembered inspiration. The only strikingly original thing in it is the Scherzo. Yet all the movements are beautiful, particularly the Andante, and the whole a very pleasing thing to listen to for a few times. It was no fault of Mr. ZERRAHN and the Orchestra if it was not highly enjoyed, for it was nicely rendered, as was the Haydn after it.

The great things of the programme were the two Overtures, both of which were played for the third season in these Concerts. They were better played, and their power and beauty more deeply felt, than ever before,—although the noise of late comers blurred the Giocosa picture for not a few.

Mrs. KEMPTON sang the great Aria from Tito with taste and feeling, in a large and noble style; and the delicious orchestral accompaniments went on a charm; the florid clarinet obbligato, running all through the piece, claiming especial mention for the beautiful tone and style in which it was played. The smaller songs were choice and very nicely sung to Mr. Dresel's accompaniment.

An interval of four weeks occurs before the fifth Concert (Jan. 16.) of which the main features will be the great C-major Symphony by Schubert; a Schubert Overture,—either that to "Fierabras," or one not yet heard, to "Alfonse and Estrella;" and the first of Beethoven's Piano Concertos, in C, played by Mr. B. J. LANG,—the last one of the five which yet remains unheard in these Concerts.

Italian Opera.

Italian Opera, as managed in this country, is not an improving institution. We had the best of it, that we seem likely ever to get, years ago. From year to year, as a rule, it all the time grows worse. The only thing that is learned by so much experience seems to be, not how to do it better, but how to do it cheaper; how to make what is third-rate pass with a sufficient number of paying people for first-rate; for if the real music-lovers, if the cultivated and refined become indifferent to it, there is always a fresh public, of would-be fashionables, nouveaux riches, who have a notion that it is "the thing" and of course all very fine. It does not improve, and therefore must deteriorate, because it is not an institution, but is left altogether to individual speculation,—so that advertisement has as much to do with its success as Art.

This is only general comment on the state and tendency of Opera in this country. It is not saying, that it never offers us anything good. Of course there must be something of real excellence on which to base an appeal even to an ignorant public, and the knowing ones must be to some extent conciliated:—how to do this the most economically, is the managerial problem.

The company at Selwyn's beautiful Theatre these two weeks past, has at any rate given a much better representation of Don Giovanni and of Il Barbiere, than we have had for a long time. Indeed, in most respects, the Don Giovanni was capital. Mme. PAREPA ROSA's all-sufficiency of voice, with her consummate vocal art, as well as fine dramatic verve and well-sustained, consistent action, made one of the most effective Donna Annas that we have ever known. The wonderful music and pathos of the first scene told for the first time almost for what it is worth. In the great recitative and aria: Or sai chi l'onore, she rose to thrilling heights of lyric declamation; and the "Letter" Aria (Non mi dir) was most nobly, beautifully rendered. She, although with less of the fine sympathetic quality than many singers in all else inferior, seemed to put life into the whole performance, so that all did their best.

Miss HATCHEK made a charmingly coquettish, girlish Zerlina, acting it to the life and singing very finely; nor had her voice lost any of its fresh, true, vibrating quality, as we thought it had in Juliet, a character entirely too ideal for her. Miss ROSCONI at least looked Elvira sweetly, and represented the part sensibly,—which seldom can be said of the Elviras; in the scene with Leporello she acted just right. Her singing is feeble, yet now and then, overcoming timidity, she gives a passage tellingly and sweetly, and the quality of the voice is musical and sympathetic. BELINI really made a capital Don Juan; his sonorous baritone told at all points, and his action lacked neither liveliness nor dignity; but he spoiled the simplicity of the Serenade melody. ROSCONI, in better voice than last year, made an exquisitely droll Leporello; if he make the farce sometimes too broad, as is the way with all of them, you still feel all the time that he is an artist. The orchestra, under Bergmann's sure bâton, was respectable; the choruses, scenery and all, uncommonly good, and there was more spirit than usual in the first finale (the Ball scene.)

We never liked Mme. ROSA so much as in Donna Anna, unless it were in Rosina. There she sang and acted with the greatest life and ease and fluency; and ROSCONI's Figaro and ANTONIOCCI's Basilio were so excellent, that "The Barber" was relished with a fresh zest. Sig. BARAGLIA did very creditably as Almaviva, as he did also as Don Ottavio; his voice is sweet, he sings with feeling, and has a nicely finished florid execution; only in large and even melody a weak tremolo besets him.

Of Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," which we heard only once, our first impression accords with that of the majority, we think. The opera as a whole falls far short of its home, and of Shakespeare. Musically it has fine passages, ingenious points of instrumentation, &c., but contains much that is trivial, more that is tame. Every one felt the family likeness with the Faust music; it is the same inspiration feebly recalled. Corresponding situations correspondingly treated: thus, the really fine thing in it, the lovers' duet in the fourth act, is the Garden Scene in Faust again, but not so good as that; the pretty Romanza of the Page answers to Siebel's song; Juliet's song of girlish joy in the first scene, a mere waltz, is not so interesting as Gretchen's Jewel aria; Mercutio's Queen

Mab song, an utter failure with all the fantastical strivings, hardly humors, in the orchestra, answers to Mephisto's drinking song; the fight in the third act, to that in Faust, but with strong suggestion of the Huguenots. Perhaps the most original and happy thought of all is the Overture with the chanted Prologue by all the dramatis personæ en tableaux vivants.—But these are mere impressions. The performance was fair. Sig. PANCANI, a big and burly man for a Romeo, has a tenor of good volume and sweetness, and sang with delicate and chaste expression. The Juliet was rather too doll-like.

Mme. ROSA has also sung in Il Trovatore and Norma; and there have been indifferent performances of Lucrezia Borgia, Crispino and Ernani. Another novelty, Petrella's comic "Carnival of Venice," we have not yet heard. The audiences were small until Parepa came.

Pianos at the Exposition.

We have not meddled much in the great controversy. In common, doubtless, with nearly all our readers, finding the newspapers full of it ad nauseam, we long ago had ceased to read. Moreover, with most musical persons hereabouts, we have come to our own opinions in our own way, hearing and judging for ourselves, and should prefer the average of Chickering pianos to any Steinway that we ever heard, in spite of French Juries, Mons. Fétis, or the Emperor himself. We never thought they needed any such endorsement. Merit makes its own way with or without medals. Indeed this medal competition at great Expositions stirs up excitement by so many questionable means, raises such a senseless clamor, such a dust, that calm, unbiassed judgment becomes almost impossible. How can one get a clear impression in such a turbulent arena? Anywhere else, in the concert rooms of one's own town, at home in his own house, can one judge better than in circumstances so exceptional. We wish the Emperor, should his ambition ever prompt him to give another World's Exposition, would have it absolutely without medals or awards; the comparison of products would be equally instructive, and the conclusions far more genuine.

But here has been a question of fact: Which party had the highest award? Touching which we once ventured, having got hold of a document not then published in this country, the "Liste Officielle des Reconnaissances," &c., to suggest an inference from it, which now appears to be the right one. In our paper of Aug 17, we translated a portion of the List, adding this comment:

It will be seen from the above that the Decorations are classed as the highest grade of honor; next comes the Grand Prix, awarded only to M. Sax; and third in grade in the Grand Medal. The piano-making house of Erard placed itself out of the competition by the fact that one of its members (M. Schueller) was on the Jury; but on this gentleman, as well as on Mr. Chickering, was bestowed the Cross of the Legion of Honor; why, if not by way of recognizing these two as at the head of all the makers of Pianos? The French have long regarded the Erard as the Grand Piano of all the world, beyond competition; by this act now they welcome the Chickering to an equal place beside the object of their own pride.

That this obvious interpretation was the right one is now definitely settled by the following:

PARIS, Nov. 19, 1867.

LETTER FROM MR. C. F. CHICKERING. My attention has several times been called to paragraphs and extracts in American journals, stating that the decoration of the Legion of Honor, which was conferred upon me on the 1st of July last, as the representative of the firm of Chickering & Sons, as an award from the Exposition Universelle, "was a mere personal compliment;" that I "had bought it;" that "it had nothing to do with the Exposition;" that "the order had been obtained by Mr. F. Chickering, who produced it personally, and upon personal application for the same, from the French Government;" that "it is a personal matter, outside of and without the slightest connection with the official awards of the Exposition;" that "I did not receive it till several days after the 1st of July;" and many other remarks of the same nature.

Knowing full well the source from which these statements emanate, and as the facts with official proofs had already been published, I had up to this time considered it unnecessary to make any denial of these reports; but, as I find that such statements are still being extensively copied and reproduced, I feel it a duty to myself and to the interests of the firm of which I am a member, to make a positive denial of all such statements, which are evidently written and published for the sole purpose of giving to this award a false and deteriorated value in the opinion of the American public; and in making this denial I beg leave to call attention to the following facts:

I never in any way, either directly or indirectly, asked for, nor did I ever use any influence, personal or otherwise, to obtain this high distinction.

My official notification of the award is dated June 30, 1867, and was received by me on the 1st of July. Its connection with the official awards of the Exposition can be understood from the following extract from the official organ of the French Empire, Le Moniteur, of July 2, 1867, which, in the list of awards, under the head of "Chevaliers of the Legion of Honor," places, among other names, that of "Monsieur Chickering, Factor de Pianos, Erposant," and its relative value can be seen from the following extract of the report of Mons. Rouher, French Minister of State and Vice-President of the Imperial Commission, read before the Emperor and the Public, at the distribution of awards on the 1st of July.

"Thanks to an activity which had surmounted all obstacles, the decisions demanded for the jury for the first of July are all rendered, and the result can be proclaimed to-day before your Majesty. The jury has distributed to the exhibitors 64 grand prizes, 883 gold medals, 3653 silver medals, 5656 bronze medals, 5801 honorable mentions.

"The present solemnity is crowned by the proclamation of still higher rewards.

"Your Majesty has deigned to award to the most eminent of the exhibitors of this pacific strife 'The Imperial Cross of the Legion of Honor.'"

It may be that the friends and correspondents who write in the interests of other exhibitors, who did not receive this award, know more of the value of the different recompenses than do those who occupy high positions in the management and government of the Exposition; but while I have the power to base my claims upon facts and proofs as well founded as the foregoing extracts, I shall still continue to claim and to announce as we have already done, that the Cross of the Legion of Honor is the "Highest Award" awarded by the "Exposition Universelle," and that Chickering & Sons are the only Competing Exhibitors of Pianos who have received the double recompense of the "Cross of the Legion of Honor" and a First Gold Medal.

(Signed) C. F. CHICKERING.

THE PIANOS. Conclusive Proof of the Highest Award to Chickering & Sons. The following letters have just been received from Paris by Messrs. Chickering & Sons, which clearly and very plainly prove that the Gold Medals at the Paris Exhibition were all alike and of equal value, and that the Cross of the "Legion of Honor" was awarded by a higher power than the Juries, viz.: by the Emperor, as a "Superior Award" over Medals for the superior merit of the Chickering Pianos:

Copy of a letter from Monsieur Fétis, Member and Reporter of the Jury of the 10th Class of the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867:

[Translation]

BRUSSELS, NOV. 19, 1867.

Mr. Chickering:

Sir,—I cannot refuse to declare, as member of the Jury of the 10th Class, that which is undeniably established by the Moniteur of 21 July, 1867, viz.:

That there is one single class of Gold Medals for the Exhibitors: that the Decoration of the Legion of Honor constitutes a recompense of a superior order, and that it had been accorded to you by the Emperor for the merit of your instruments.

Accept my salutation,

(Signed)

FÉTIS.

Member of the Jury of the 10th Class of the Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867.

Copy of letters from Ambroise Thomas and F. A. Gavaert, Members of the Jury:

Gentlemen:

I must tell you that whatever may be the Order in which the names have been inscribed in each kind of recompense awarded in the 10th Class, the Gold Medal—to speak of this one—is the First Medal. There are not two classes of Gold Medals.

Receive my salutations.

(Signed)

AMBROISE THOMAS.

I am completely of the opinion of my confrere Thomas.

(Signed)

F. GAVAERT.

NEW HAVEN.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul was performed on the 10th inst. by the Mendelssohn Society, with the aid of some of our Boston singers, who no doubt deserve the compliment contained in the following notice from the Palladium:

The chorus, numbering between eighty and ninety, sang the difficult music allotted to them with great steadiness. The first and second chorales were given with a good volume of sound, and the smoothness so requisite for this species of composition. Their lovely melodies, especially that of "To Thee, O Lord, I yield my spirit," evidently deeply impressed the audience. The very difficult chorus, "Rise up, Arise! and Shine!" was sung with much precision and force, as was also that in the same part, "The Lord He is Good." The Gentle choruses, so perfectly contrasted in style with the Jewish and Christian music, were also finely done. Mrs. H. M. Smith more than maintained the favor she had already won by her admirable singing at the previous concerts of the Mendelssohn. She was in excellent voice and delivered the numerous recitatives which fell to her share with much dramatic force and admirable enunciation—the latter a rare quality. The beautiful aria "Jerusalem! Jerusalem!" was sung with most delicate and touching feeling, and with a simplicity which showed the conscientious artist. Mrs. Smith also took the contralto air "But the Lord is mindful," and gave it with a rare depth of tone and beauty of expression. This is a vocal feat of which any singer might be proud. Mr. James Whitney rendered the tenor music very successfully; the air "Be Thou Faithful" was given with great tenderness. Of his brother, Mr. M. W. Whitney, we have only to say that he was in superb voice, and throughout the whole of his difficult part showed himself an admirable artist. We were willing to make allowance for the orchestra, composed as it was so largely of members of the recently formed Philharmonic Society, who have had, as yet, but slight opportunity of practicing together. They, however, did not need indulgence, performing their part very steadily, and giving every reason to anticipate for the new society a successful career, and that the day is not distant when New Haven will have an orchestra of its own. Dr. Anderson led with his usual ability.

PHILADELPHIA.—Mr. Wolfsohn has been solicited to repeat the series of Beethoven Matinees given in the season of 1865-66, and has engaged the Foyer of the Academy of Music for that purpose. A matinee will be given on alternate Fridays, commencing January 3d, and the course will end on May 8th.

The whole number of Sonatas composed for Piano Solo will be performed, and, during the series, songs of a character to correspond with the general style of these performances will be introduced.

WORCESTER, MASS.—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony stirred "the heart of the Commonwealth," last Saturday evening. It was a new emotion, and came in the "Grand Army Course of Entertainments." A small orchestra of 24 of the best Boston musicians, with Zerrahn for conductor, performed it to the great delight of all. The Second Part of the concert opened with the Overture to Der Freyschütz and closed with that of "La Sirene" by Auher; the intervening space being filled with songs, trios, violoncello solo, Strauss waltzes, &c.—The Lagrange-Brignoli Opera troupe performed Martha here last week, Miss McCulloch taking the place of Mme. Lagrange, who was ill.—The Mozart and Beethoven Choral Union announce the Messiah for Christmas night.

DEATH OF PACINI.—A dispatch dated yesterday, at Florence, mentions the death of Giovanni Pacini, the Italian composer. His opera of Saffo, played some years ago here and in other American cities, is the only one by which he is well known; but during his long life he wrote thirty or forty operas, most of which had considerable success. Pacini was born at Syracuse, in Sicily, in 1790, but going to Rome in his youth, he became known as "Pacini di Roma." He studied composition at Bologna, under Marchesi and Mattei, and, when 18 years old, produced an opera at Venice, which succeeded. In after years he wrote operas for all the principal Italian theatres. Madame Pasta sang in his Nobe at the San Carlo in Naples in 1826, and that is considered one of his best works. In 1830 his Giovanna d'Arco was produced at La Scala, with Rubini, Tamburini and Mme. Lalande in the principal parts; but it failed, and the failure so mortified and disgusted its author, that he refused to write any more operas, and he has lived in idle retirement ever since. His style was modeled on that of Rossini's earlier works, and is more distinguished by graceful melody than by learning or originality. In addition to his operas, Pacini wrote a number of masses and other religious and secular works.—Bulletin, Philadelphia.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- The Tender Green. Song. Carl Zerrahn. 30
German and English words, a highly finished character of composition, and a good melody.
- Gather flowers in the summer time. W. C. Baker. 40
- When leaves are falling round. Answer to "Leaf by leaf the roses fall." S'g & Cho. Bishop. 35
Two songs of, perhaps, equal beauty, and both decidedly good.
- As pants the hart. 42d Psalm. Solo and Qt. C. V. Morrison. 40
- Bow down thine ear, O Lord. Solo and Qt. C. H. Gerrish. 50
- But the Lord is mindful of his own. S'g. St Paul. 50
The first two authors will not wish to compare their works with Mendelssohn's. But it is a gratifying fact that our musicians are continually improving in skill, and these and similar compositions are good enough "to go any where."
- Absence. Song. S. D. S. 30
- Are you coming, Annie, coming? Song. Kate 30
Very pretty and taking.
- The fellow that looks like me. Song & Chorus. Arlington. 30
- Oh! my heart goes pit-a-pat. Guitar. Hayden. 30
Comic, pretty, and the last one already well-known.
- The Bird's Nest. Song. Cherry. 30
A very sweet and innocent song, suited to all ages.

Instrumental.

- The star thou lovest—Valse bril. Enrico 40
Has the composer's characteristic elegance of construction, and brilliant. Of medium difficulty.
- L'Africaine, Polka. Wayside Flowers. 4 hds. Russell. 35
- Le Rève, Quickstep. " " " 35
- Fairy Wedding Waltz. " " " 35
- Crispino Galop. " " " 35
Four very welcome little pieces, conveniently arranged for learners.
- The Oaks Polka. H. Tinsington. 40
"Handsome" Polka, and elegant title.
- Souvenir de Fête. Mazurka de Salon. Mercier. 50
Somewhat difficult, but graceful.
- Ye merry birds. Trans. W. C. Kidder. 75
The beautiful song is well known, and the transcriptions or variations are well managed.
- New Derby Galop. Marriott. 60
- Guard's Schottisch. Jack. 30
- Romping Galop. Kinkel. 30
Three pretty sparkles of melody, in which those fond of romping can go with the Guards to the Derby, and hear good music on the way.
- The last dream. Meditation religieuse for piano. Aubert. 50
A sweet, musical meditation, for those who like to "meditate" with their fingers.

Books.

- Vaccu's Practical Method of Italian Singing. Trans. by T. T. Barker. 2.50
Still another aid to teachers of vocal culture. An exceedingly valuable work.
- Libretto of Romeo and Juliette. By Gounod. 30
" Don Carlos. Verdi. 30
Don't go to the opera without one of this set in your hand. The enjoyment of hearing is greatly enhanced by being able to follow the melodies as they are sung.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 698.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 4, 1868.

VOL. XXVII. No. 21.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Song.

I.

I do confess that thou art coy
And hardly to be pleased or won;
Yet in thy very pride I joy,
Thou'lt yield to me—or yield to none.
Thy heart's a jewel, dear and deep,
And through thine eyes I saw it shine;
Thy lips may still the secret keep,
But thou art mine.

II.

The fairest lily in the wood
Were robbed of half that makes it fair,
If open to the day it stood
And wooed by every wanton air.
Thy heart's a jewel, dear and deep,
And through thine eyes I saw it shine;
Thy lips may still the secret keep—
But thou art mine.

Christmas, 1867.

Letters of Great Composers.

Letters of Distinguished Musicians: Gluck, Haydn, P. E. Bach, Weber, Mendelssohn. Translated from the German by Lady Wallace. (Longmans & Co.)

Mozart and Haydn in London. Von C. F. Pohl. (Vienna, Gerold; London, Williams & Norgate).

The first of these works is as pleasant a volume of light musical reading as has been lately laid before the public. It would serve no purpose again largely to descend on the peculiarities of Lady Wallace as a translator, seeing that there is small chance of their being amended. Her assiduity, however, is to be recognized as having done much to naturalize a large body of biographical material which can never henceforward be overlooked by those who deal with the masters of a lovely art. But it will not be safe to quote from her pages without close comparison with the originals whenever the meaning is at all obscure.

While going through these letters again, we have been anew struck by the credit done in them to a class of artists unjustly disparaged as deficient in intelligence and not rich in moral worth. The amount of industry and kindly feeling, the traces of keen observation they display among musicians, is worthy of all attention, and may be fairly propounded to those sour bigots, if such are still to be found, who have groaned over the debasing and enervating influences of Music as a pursuit. It would be as fair to decry the grave profession of Law, because unchaste Judges have sat in Courts where chastity had to be discussed,—as fanatical to demand that, because intemperance is largely abroad in the land, the vines should be torn from the hills. The world is becoming wiser in these matters than it used to be; and in the case under illustration good cannot but accrue from the publication of these unpremeditated utterances, confessions, and records of friendly intercourse. We are satisfied that the cause we are advocating would be strengthened could the correspondence be ransacked of musicians less distinguished than the five great men here grouped together.

Among these five Gluck is seen to the least advantage,—as a man pompous and self-engrossed, who met with small patience any opposition to the theories he propounded; theories, let it be added, of no such extraordinary novelty as he pretended; theories which he contradicted in his works with right royal insolence whenever it suited his views of effect so to do. It is possible, however, that Gluck was not precisely answerable for all that was written in his letters. In those relating to the famous Parisian controversy, he may have been helped by some of those eager paper-warriors who have been always busy in French green-rooms and French journalists' secret chambers. Such advocates rarely fail to exaggerate, to force facts, for the sake of brilliancy of period and climax. A tendency towards inflation is to be discerned in the dedications and rejoinders of Gluck. It may be urged that his humble origin, long struggle with life, and, lastly, the intoxicating patronage of that enchantress Marie-Antoinette might explain, if not justify, his vain glory when at last the gaze and the gold of the French public fastened themselves on him. But the humor of the second letter-writer in this gallery shows that Gluck's haughtiness may not have been of circumstances so much as of character.

No one will close this volume without increase of his love for the man Joseph Haydn. He was one, like Gluck, of humble origin and scanty education. His cheerful temperance and his unenvying industry are shown to have been as remarkable as his genius. His letters are delightful in their combined manliness and artlessness, and call up a picture of a state of society now, happily for patrons and the patronized, gone by; as regards himself of as useful, indefatigable a life of content without callousness or stupidity as the lover of artists could desire to look on.

He made, while a youngster, a bad marriage with the daughter of the wig-maker, Keller, and had to pay for its consequences all his life, in the form of incessant work. It is cheering to see how he could reconcile himself to a long household service of the Prince Nicholas Esterhazy, for whose baritone he was required to produce a supply of pieces, the number of which seems fabulous if there be no mistake in the figures,—and how, after so many years of bondage, he could, without servility or ignorance, enjoy all the profitable honor and glory of his London sojourns, which included lionism in the saloons of the rouged, over-dressed Mrs. John Hunter (whose canzonets he set so exquisitely), while her uncouth husband, the famous anatomist, stalked about, growling at his wife's foreign fancies. He equally enjoyed attentions from royal and noble personages; and sympathy from the sweet-hearted and prescient Burney, who, in him, as later in Mozart and Beethoven, could discern and appreciate the man of real genius. Nor can anything be better, because more thoroughly unaffected, than Haydn's perpetual praise and understanding of Mozart's genius,—than his patience with that inferior copy of himself, his pupil, Ignace Pleyel, who was brought to London by a speculative rival to Salomon, to be pitted against him,—than his homely, thoughtful will, religious in its justice and affection. A life of Haydn, with reference to his art and to his character as an artist, has to be written. But from this his sentimentalities, such as exhaled in his letters to Frau von Genzinger, must no more be left out than in any life of Burns can be the Ayrshire ploughman's inflated passion for his Clarinda. Haydn, though as uneducated a man as Burns, had a better taste in writing his raptures than our countryman had. It is fair to suggest, however, that neither would have written had their raptures been other than Platonic.

In pursuance of Haydn's career, the story of which has been re-opened by the English translation under review, we call attention to the second of the German volumes here coupled with it. Herr Pohl's book is written rather for his than for our country, as the details of our doings, artists and institutions, which he has collected with amazing industry, are to the English so much superfluous matter. It is to be regretted that they should be disfigured by such a disproportionate amount of press errors. For this reason, we shall be brief in our review, acknowledging as we should the great value of the work to foreign readers. It may tend to dispel the ridiculous ideas which so long prevailed in Germany as to the absence of sympathy for Music in this country. That Haydn was more caressed in its capital—and with no indiscriminating praise, but intelligently, by those whose regard was worth having—than he was as the retainer of Prince Nicholas Esterhazy, is clear from every page recording the events of his two visits. Nor less evident is the fact that his richest and loveliest inspirations were begotten and nourished among his London experiences. The Symphonies which he wrote for Salomon were many a flight bolder than any other of his orchestral works. His Canzonets to English words are the only single songs by him which live. They remain unapproached by those of any other writer. It was to the stimulus of England's oratorio performances that the world owes "The Creation." These things have been too ungenerously forgotten by the Germans. It is clear, too, that, in spite of our late hours and usages, which are found particularly hard to bear by those habituated to an easier manner of living, Haydn found keen enjoyment in England, apart from the substantial gains he gathered here. It has not been possible to go through his notes of his London pleasures and performances without contrasting him favorably with a later guest, who also was honored amongst us. It might have been predicted that a man who had seen so much of courts and cities as Spohr had done, from his youth upwards, should have had a wider and more genial feeling for others than one who only emerged from a very narrow circle after the time of life when habits are formed. But the two composers were as far apart from each other as selfishness from generosity. A more genial example of the temper which every artist would do well for his own happiness and success to cultivate could not be cited than that of dear old Haydn.

We must now return to Lady Wallace's collection. The letters of Philip Emanuel Bach are of far less value than those of Haydn, being merely matter-of-fact notes on business. The contributions of Weber to the volume are more interesting, as was to be expected from one who commanded the pen of a journalist as well as of a musical composer. They show the bright side of his character in his warm attachment to his comrade Gansbacher, and his gratitude to his master, the Abbé Vogler; but they also present indications of the incompleteness which we noted in the badly-written but interesting biography by his son. Unlike the author of "The Creation," Weber could be bitter and unjust to any of his contemporaries whom he fancied rivals. A certain chronic soreness—that most unfortunate of habits of mind for persons of imagination, tempting him to despond and to dwell "on hope deferred"—is to be discerned in the earlier letters. The details of his failing health, ascribable in part, we fancy, to the irregularity of his life before his marriage, are sad to read. On the whole, there is fever in these letters—but there was fever in the writer's music.

Nothing save their both reflecting the possession of rich, original genius could well be more opposite than the lives and the spirits of the composers of "Der Freischütz" and "Elijah." Mendelssohn's letters close this volume as with a strain of good cheer,—saddened though the same be by the recollection of the shortness of the happiest, healthiest, most brilliant, most complete life ever led by Poet. His reputation as one of the most charming among the letter-writers who have delighted the world will suffer nothing by the specimens here translated—principally addressed to his friend Bärmann, the clarinet-player. They are full of his liveliness, his enthusiasm, his shrewd, sound sense, his warm-hearted affection, and the admirable, never affected, choice of language which have so endeared him to every reader who knew him not, and deepened every precious recollection cherished by those who enjoyed the privilege of knowing him. The letters already published are only a part of those that exist. Even in what have been printed there may have been important omissions, out of respect to the feelings of persons who may be pained by a sharp epithet, which was often thrown out in the playfulness of the moment. We shall never cease to regret that, while those were alive who could have put together a rich store of anecdote and recollection, the detail of Mendelssohn's visits to England were not collected by those who had his memory in charge. The time is now past. Most, if not all, of his earliest hosts, and many of the friends to whom he trusted himself, heart in hand, with a frank unreserve which hesitated at expressing nothing, grave or gay, as it rose to his lip, have crossed "the bourne," and the store which could have been easily accumulated from their testimony has perished irrecoverably.—Athenæum.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony."

(From the London Times).

Mendelssohn's reasons for overlooking such a work, even could they be made known, ought to claim little consideration now. Of all the great musicians—and he is surely among the greatest—not one exhibited such reserve and self-denial about his own compositions. Now that he is gone, it is for his survivors to render him that justice, which, with far-fetched punctiliousness, he too often denied himself. It is quite enough for them to know that for so many years he kept by him the Italian Symphony, which at the most is inferior, if inferior, to the Scotch Symphony, to justify the lovers of his music in attaching small importance to the hyper-criticism he himself was wont to exercise in its regard. That any alterations he might have made in his pieces would have been alterations for the better, no one for an instant doubts. But he can make alterations no longer; and the world of music is only too grateful to take whatever he has left, satisfied that not a work from his pen exists that does not contain at least something too precious for oblivion. In no single instance, looking at what has already been selected for publication from among his posthumous manuscripts, has this failed to be the case; and till an exception comes to light we may fairly persist in believing that no such instance is at all likely to occur. One thing is certain—Mendelssohn left no instructions to his executors that his unpublished works should be destroyed. On the contrary, he carefully wrote out and dated every one of them. What then, is to be done? Let us suppose a case that is by no means impossible. The MSS. might change hands. The careful guardians who hold them might bequeath them to others less qualified to look upon them as a sacred trust. And it is not extravagant to suppose that they might possibly come into the possession either of persons indifferent to music, who would eventually dispose of them as useless lumber, or, still worse, of persons not indifferent to music, but indifferent to other considerations, who, without ideas of their own, would find in them an abundant supply of that in which they themselves were wanting. That half a dozen musical reputations might be built upon the contents of Mendelssohn's reliquie will, as things go, hardly be denied. But better times have come. The scruples of his survivors, whatever they were, would seem to be set at rest; and it affords us real pleasure to state, in correction of a widely-spread belief, that to Herr Carl Mendelssohn, the son, and another near relative of the illustrious master we are exclusively indebted for the works that have recently been produced (the Trumpet Overture, the "Songs without Words," &c.), together with others about to be produced, the publishers having no further hand in the matter than belongs to them simply as publishers. It is well to state this, which we do on the best authority, inasmuch as it will go far to remove an entirely erroneous impression—an impression calculated to give pain and umbrage where neither are deserved.

The grand symphony in D—the Reformation Symphony, so called—though still in manuscript, was performed Saturday afternoon, under the direction of Herr Manns, in presence of the largest audience ever assembled in the concert-room of the Crystal Palace. A more admirable performance was never heard; a more complete triumph has rarely been achieved.

To convey any clear impression of such a work without resorting to the aid of examples in musical type, which would be only of service to musicians, is impossible. Nor to ordinary readers would a technical description of its plan, divisions, and general development be of the slightest use. Mendelssohn himself insisted that the meaning of a musical composition could not be explained through the medium of any other language than its own, and that if that language expressed nothing to the hearer it would be to no purpose attempting to translate it into another. But now that the unburied work is the universal topic in musical circles, and, through the splendid performance at the Crystal Palace, may be said already to have established its claim to rank as one of the master-pieces of its composer, it would hardly suffice to inform the many who, not having been present, are curious about the result, that the symphony in D "is a very fine symphony, in three parts, composed for the occasion of the 300th anniversary of the Augsburg Confession." We shall, therefore, in as few words as practicable, endeavor to give some account of it, and to state the impression which two hearings, at the rehearsal and at the public performance, produced not upon ourselves alone, but upon the great majority of those who attended either or both.

The symphony begins with a movement—andante (in D major)—the gravity of which at the outset proclaims the work in hand to be of serious import. The opening phrase, led off by the violas, is immediately answered by the violoncellos, and carried on in that imitative style which we are accustomed to associate with the higher order of Church music. When this has been developed, or rather in the course of its development, the wind instruments give out unisonally a second theme in strongly marked contrast, which the stringed instruments answer by a soft melodious strain, modulating in full harmony to the dominant cadence. With this, twice repeated, the short introduction is brought to a pause. It may be stated here that the cadence, or response, in question formed part of a Roman Catholic Church service; that it caught Mendelssohn's attention at Dresden, and that, being much struck with it, he adopted the resolution of giving it a place in the symphony which was then engrossing his thoughts. Those who choose to speculate upon his poetical intention may discover in this introductory prelude the earliest indication of what is to follow—the dawn of a new faith, striving against the mental incertitude that precedes conviction. Nevertheless, solemn and impressive, it suggests rather peace than conflict. Not so, however, the movement that follows—allegro con fuoco in (D minor). Here all is conflict, and that of the stormiest. The opening, in unison, for all the instruments except trombones—a conspicuous feature of the principal subject—bears a close affinity to, nay, immediately springs from, the unisonic preamble (already noticed) to the second theme of the introduction. Its frequent occurrence throughout the movement, either identically or in a modified shape, keeps attention incessantly awake to the fact that the Roman Catholic faith, as Symbolized in its music for the church, is still the predominant question.

The two important themes upon which this magnificent allegro is built, though forcibly contrasted, lend themselves readily to its almost evident design—that of a prolonged struggle between contending principles. The first (in D minor) has the breadth and vigor of Beethoven; while the second (in A major), the announcement of which again seems to spring from the unison passage in the introduction, reveals the fascinating individuality of Mendelssohn. Both are wrought out with masterly skill, in the midst of subsidiary matter which may be taken to represent the fierce and obstinate contest that is being waged. Just as the climax would seem to be at hand it is arrested by the re-appearance (in D major) of the harmonized cadence from the Catholic Church service—as it were the last lingering look back at a once cherished belief about to be abjured. After four bars, however, assigned as before to the stringed instruments, the prevalent character of the movement is resumed in a coda, or peroration, equal in interest to what has gone before. The preamble to this coda is a sort of condensed epitome of the allegro con fuoco, in slower time, more sparingly instrumented, and soft instead of loud—as though the last reminder of the old faith had brought with it regret without conviction. The idea of this is altogether new, and as strikingly effective as it is new. The remainder of the coda is in the same style as the allegro, before the intervention of the Roman Catholic cadence. An exciting crescendo leads up to a fortissimo for the whole orchestra; and the movement proceeds in a more impassioned style, till, with a repetition of the unisonic preamble to a few bars of the opening theme, it ends, somewhat in the manner of the first movement of Beethoven's ninth symphony, which is in the same key. To say another word about it would be superfluous; enough that this first part of the Reformation Symphony is in all respects worthy its author. Equally so is the movement that follows (allegro vivace), consisting of a scherzo (in B flat), with trio (in G). Only Mendelssohn himself could explain what this movement signifies in the main design of his symphony—supposing that design (as is generally held) to have been in immediate connexion with the rise, progress, and triumph of the Protestant faith. It little matters now, however; and when we say that it is difficult to decide which of its two divisions, the scherzo or the trio, is the more charming, we have said all that is requisite. The audience on Saturday pronounced a decision emphatically favorable, by encoring the movement, which was accordingly repeated from beginning to end. It was hard to resist the influence of melody so frankly rhythmical and unobtrusively captivating.

The third and last section of the symphony consist of four movements, linked together so as virtually to constitute one organic whole. We know of nothing in music more speakingly pathetic than the opening (andante, in G minor), and we can easily understand how it may be intended to convey a feeling of despondency engendered by hesitating incertitude with respect to the most serious problem of life. In this movement the violins speak in eloquent tones that go straight to the heart, and stir it to its depths; and just as it pauses, with a brief and unexpected allusion to the second theme of the allegro, upon the major harmony of the key, the theme of the Lutheran chorale, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" (andante con moto, in the key of G), the first bars of which are heard from a single flute, unaccompanied, comes like a gleam of sunshine unexpectedly lighting up a chamber where before there had been utter darkness. Mendelssohn has recourse to the rough and popular version of this tune, not to that which appears three times in J. S. Bach's 371 vierstimmige Choralgesänge, and which Meyerbeer, overlooking the fact that the early French Protestants were not Lutherans, but Calvinists, has introduced in the Huguenots. How he has treated it; how, after the solitary flute has given out the first three bars, the oboes, clarionets, bassoons and other wind instruments alternately enrich the harmony, joined ultimately by the violas and violoncellos (divided), the violins taking no part until the variation that follows (allegro vivace, same key), in which to a triplet accompaniment of stringed instruments, the broken snatches of the theme are heard at intervals from clarinet, oboe, flute, &c., the whole culminating in the vigorous and brilliant preamble of the finale—allegro maestoso (D major)—must be left to the imagination of the reader. In the final movement itself the most ingenious devices of counterpoint are brought to bear upon themes the one more bold and striking than the other. Of these not the least important is the tune of "Ein feste Burg," which, however, does not make its re-appearance until the first subject, a fugal episode in the relative minor, and the second subject in the dominant major have been given out at length. From this point, however, the old Lutheran choral is heard struggling for mastery—now on one instrument, now on another, often seeming as if it would gain the victory, but as often, temporarily though never quite defeated. The second theme, first given out by the instruments of wood and brass alone, is of a jubilant character, as though to represent the inward conviction of one sure that in the end the truth must prevail. A fugal for stringed instruments occurs twice, the theme of which may recall that of an episode in the choros, "Be not afraid," from Elijah. On the second appearance of this fugue, when the oboes join in the delivery of the theme, and it is much more elaborately worked, the choral, "Ein feste Burg," dispersed among wind instruments, makes head against it; but the fugue goes on as independently as if it had encountered no antagonist, and the combination of the two is one of the most interesting and masterly points of the finale. Others might be cited, but we must be content to name the episode at the close of the first part, after the peroration of the jubilant second theme, where, first in snatches from isolated instruments, then in full harmony for the whole of the "wind," it pursues its way, to the accompaniment of a new and striking figure for the violins and other strings, staccato. To conclude, the working up of the whole, after the second delivery of the fugue, in combination with the choral, and the re-appearance of the second theme, in the ruling key of the movement, is in Mendelssohn's best manner. The climax is put off with grand effect, and when at length it is reached, the leading phrase of "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" being given out in lengthened notes by the entire orchestra, fortissimo, we feel that a noble effort has been nobly and thoroughly achieved.

Upon the relative position which the Reformation Symphony is entitled to hold by the side of its composer's other great works, we need not speculate here. That it will obtain very general acceptance, as among his best, we cannot reasonably doubt. Meanwhile, if first impressions count for anything, the enthusiasm excited by the audience at the Crystal Palace may be regarded as a significant fact. It should never be forgotten that this symphony was completed in 1830; and that, as Mendelssohn was born in 1809, it was the work of one who had not yet attained his 22nd year. But it did not require the Reformation Symphony to prove that in regard to precocious talent its composer stands forth as the most wonderful phenomenon of which the musical art can boast. The very idea of such a work being devised and planned out by a mere youth is extraordinary enough; the fact of its thoroughly successful accomplishment is still more extraordinary. But now that we have got it it can speak for itself, and, or we are greatly deceived, it will speak to future times. Often as it has been our agreeable duty to praise the orchestra of the Crystal Palace, and Herr Manns, its admirable conductor, we have never been able to do so more unreservedly than now. What would Mendelssohn himself have said to such a performance? At Berlin, in 1832, he could have heard nothing like it—nor, with deference, at Paris either, even when Habeneck was conductor of the orchestra of the Conservatoire, much less now, with M. Georges Hainl from Lyons, at its head.

(From the Athenæum.)

Yielding to none in our love for the fame and memory of the last of the great German composers, it may be recollected that we have not shared with many of Mendelssohn's friends and enthusiastic admirers their eagerness to bring to light the music which he withheld during his lifetime as incomplete. The case is not a common one. His orderliness and self-knowledge were as remarkable as his genius. His reserves, therefore, are not to be classed with the accidents and oversights which apply in other cases of posthumous manuscripts. Whereas Gluck, with all his boastfulness, exercised no care over his scores,—leaving interpolations unnoticed, faults uncorrected, and variations for his successors to decide on,—it was not so with Mendelssohn. The plea that an author's inventions must become public property, when once the breath has passed out of his body, however specious, is subject to limitations. There is something of authority after all in the Stratford-upon-Avon epitaph. Many wise and generous persons, however, have held diametrically opposite views in this particular case; and so it has come to pass that, in compliance with the pressure of their zeal, certain remains and relics are now appearing one by one.

The Reformation Symphony is probably the most important of the works left by the master which will see the light, since we cannot conceive that those who advocate the production of every scrap of writing which came from Mendelssohn's pen would dream of demanding the double pianoforte concertos which are in existence, or other of the items carefully noted by him in the Thematic Catalogue prepared by his own hand. That the production of the work at Sydenham occasioned an amount of musical excitement rare in England was to be foreseen. It is not exaggeration to say that it was hailed as a new treasure almost before it was heard, and received with an enthusiasm which makes remark or qualification next to impossible. It is already thought to be set in its place among its composer's greatest works. Our conviction, however, that much remains to be said on the subject, is so sincere that, no matter at what risk of unpopularity, it must be respectfully expressed. Let it be stated, further, that under better conditions an unfamiliar work was never given. Every nerve had been strained to do justice to the memory of the modern musician most—and most justly—beloved in this country.

Mendelssohn's music is in nothing more admirable than in the characteristic that, whereas it is never shallow, it does not torment the listener by mysticisms. He wrote by the golden rule, that to be great one must be clear—the rule of Michael Angelo and Handel, of Beethoven in his best period, and Mozart, every step in departure from which is (disguise it how the pedants of mysticism will) a step downwards. In the works of what he laughingly used to call "his rebellious toner" (as in his stringed quartet preluded by the Lied "Ist es wahr"), he was at times over-anxious to show his scholarship, not by "the sweet adulteries of art," but by ingenuities of knowledge and construction amazing in one so young, and which, it may be said, occasionally shut up that freedom of melody and idea which are indispensable to complete pleasure in music. That this was developed by many a stride with every year that passed "Elijah" shows, as compared with "St. Paul."

As the Reformation Symphony stands, we fancy it may have been composed and retouched at different periods. It does not present itself to us as an entire work. There is dryness in the first movement, and over-labor on a very limited phrase, howbeit disguised by the utmost felicity of instrumentation. The scherzo is charming, even among Mendelssohn's scherzi—the essential slightness, not to say frivolity, of the elegant theme of its trio being dressed with every orchestral device and grace conceivable: neither device nor grace forced a hair's breadth towards affectation or false effect. The slow movement is more mannered—a Lied ohne Worte scored. The Lutheran Chorale is wonderfully announced and amplified. Among the stories to which this Symphony has given rise, is one that Mendelssohn held it back, conceiving himself anticipated—or his idea pirated—by Meyerbeer, in "Les Huguenots." The finale is grand and spirited; but Beethoven had first written the finale to the C minor Symphony. The peroration is noble, rich, pompous—equal to, and in some phrases anticipating, the one to the violin Concerto. But, as a whole, "come what come may," cause is to be heard in this Symphony why Mendelssohn declined to send it forth, and cause may be found in it, should its settled acceptance fail to fulfil the expectations of those who have been immediate to announce its triumphant reception as among the masterpieces of symphonic art.

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY EMIL NAUMANN.

(Continued from page 151.)

The results upon Oratorio of the various antagonistic influences now at work, influences springing on the one hand from the especially epic-lyrical Mystery developed in Germany, and, on the other from the musical drama invented by the Italians, are first recognized in the cropping-up of an androgynous class of production, which cannot be designated either Opera or Oratorio, but which so powerfully affected the development of the latter, that we must on no account ignore it. Such effusions we find in the German Singspiele, as well as in certain school-comedies of the first half of the 17th century. We will mention among them: The spiritual Sylem Poem or Comedy, called "Seelwig," set vocally in the ITALIAN fashion by Johann Gottlieb Staden, Nuremberg, printed and published by Wolfgang Endtern in the year 1644. The parts of three Nymphs and Shepherdesses are given to the treble, those of a Matron and several Shepherds to the alto and tenor, and that of a Satyr or "Wood-Devil" to the bass. The whole is accompanied by fiddles, flutes, shalms, a horn, and a theorbo.—Not less remarkable is the Coburg comedy of Jerusalem delivered by the dear Prince, Gottfried, Duke of Bouillon,† the music of which is due to Melchior Frank—born about 1570 in Silesia, died about 1639—as we know, one of the most prominent masters of Evangelical Church-music. The comedy already bears the characteristic name of Actus Oratorius, which, however, as we shall see, was undoubtedly borrowed from Italy.

Much more purely and significantly affected in such labors than his German contemporaries by influences emanating from Italy, was Master Schutz. During the considerable period he resided in Venice and other parts of Italy, as pupil of the head of the Venetian school, the great Giovanni Gabrieli, he had adopted different and far purer notions both of Opera and Oratorio. While, on the one hand, he learned, on the spot, all about the commencement and effect of the former, from such men as Cavalieri (born 1550), Peri (born 1560), Monteverde (born 1560), and Carissimi (born 1582), profiting so much by what he learned that we owe him the first German opera,‡ on the other, coming as he did from Northern Germany, where people had accustomed themselves to seek a very deep significance in Oratorio, he brought to his task a degree of earnestness, and a moral elevation of sentiment, which, combined with Gabrieli's highly developed theories, could not fail to produce something imperishable.

It cannot, however, be denied that as regards epic construction and form even for Oratorio he still found much to learn in Italy. In that country Oratorio had a very different beginning to

* Das geistlich Waldgeleht, oder Freundspiel, genannt "Seelwig," gesungweis auf "Italienisch" Art gesetzt durch Johann Gottlieb Staden, Nuremberg, gedruckt und verlegt bei Wolfgang Endtern im Jahre 1644.

† This piece was performed on the 14th June, 1630, in the Collegio at Coburg, to celebrate the birthday of Johann Casimir, Duke of Saxe-Julich-Cleve-Berg.

‡ Rinuccini's Dafne, translated into German, and set to music by Schutz. It was produced at Dresden in the year 1627.

what it had in Germany. While, in Germany, we had to seek its roots in the Mysteries, in Italy we find its existence due to the very same impulses, springing from classical Antiquity, which gave birth to opera.

Goethe's "humoristic" Saint, treated by Goethe with such fondness in the description of his Italian travels, the worthy Philippus Neri—born in 1515 at Florence; died in 1580 at Rome—gave most strangely the name to this whole class of works. Neri erected, in the year 1558, near the church of San Girolamo della Carità, a hall for prayer or oratory, where he collected his followers for their spiritual edification. In order to elevate them by the aid of music, he secured the services of Johannes Annunecia, singing-master of St. Peter's in the Vatican, under whose direction the choral singing was cultivated. By the year 1575, the circle of Neri's followers had extended so considerably that by a bull dated the 15th July, Pope Gregory XIII. gave his sanction to the institution as: "Association of the Prayer-Hall," "Congregazione dell' Oratorio." From that time forward, the musical works performed there, and most of which, as we know, were founded on legendary subjects and words, were called off-hand, "Pieces from the Prayer-Hall," and, at last, still more laconically, "Oratorios."—Annunecia is certainly the first master who cultivated this branch of the art; he was followed, though not at first in the fully marked oratorical style, by Palestrina (especially in his pieces treating of the Passion for Passion Week), Giovanni Maria Nanino, Felice Anerio, Luca Marenzio, etc. In the works of Carissimi, 1582–1673, we already find Oratorio properly so called, the titles, such as Jephtha, the Judgment of Solomon, being important, inasmuch as they mark its emancipation in the choice of its subject, which had before been restricted, almost exclusively, to the Passion. Domenico Mazzocchi, born about 1590, even added an organ accompaniment. Both these masters were contemporaries of Schütz, who long outlived them. It is, therefore, more than probable that the free treatment of recitative in their oratorical works exercised a great influence on the Passion Oratorios composed by Schütz in 1666, when he had attained a very advanced age, though, in power and depth of expression, the German master left his Italian models far behind.

(To be continued).

Harpisichord and Piano.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette," Nov. 4.)

Herr Ernst Pauer, one of our most distinguished pianoforte professors, has commenced a series of "Historical Performances," the second of which takes place to-day (Wednesday) at the Hanover Square Rooms. One curious feature in these performances is the introduction of the harpsichord (or "clavering," as it is called in the programmes), on which, with stern logic, Herr Pauer insists on playing all pieces originally written for that instrument. There are, doubtless, numbers of persons who, as a matter of curiosity, would like to hear the harpsichord of our great-grandmothers; but if the masters who wrote before Clementi composed music for the harpsichord, that it should be remembered, was because the piano, that notable improvement on the harpsichord, had not yet been invented. Extend Herr Pauer's principle, and music written for the pianos of J. B. Cramer's time ought to be executed on such pianos as J. B. Cramer used; Beethoven's sonatas should be played on the pianos of the Beethoven period; while the most perfect specimens of the art of Broadwood and Erard should be reserved for the still more modern music of (say) Mendelssohn among classical composers, and Thalberg among composers of the fantasia school. Better still, in the same direction, would it be if Beethoven's sonatas could be performed on Beethoven's own piano, which, according to the Revue et Gazette Musicale, has been lately discovered, and is, of course, for sale. The works of every composer on each composer's own piano would be a fine basis on which to give a series of historical performances. The worst of it is that the requisite instruments would be difficult to obtain, and, perhaps, when obtained, difficult to play upon. Chopin's piano, for instance, had a very violent fall in the agitated autumn of the year 1863, from the second-floor window of a house at Warsaw; and all the Czar's horses and all the Czar's men can never put Chopin's piano together again. But Beethoven's piano, to judge from the paragraph on the subject issued by the actual owners and would-be vendors (who certainly ought to know), is in admirable condition; and we have a dim recollection of a slightly asthmatic harpsichord said to have belonged to Handel, which was exhibited at one of the soirées of the Musical Society of London. The programme does not give the age of the harpsichord on which Herr Pauer, at his first concert, played pieces by Kuhnau, Handel, Sebastian Bach, and Friedmann Bach; but, to avoid anachronisms, several harpsichords ought to have been employed, the oldest of which should have dated, at latest, from the beginning of the eighteenth century.

To all our objections, which we have presented freely enough and just as they have occurred to us, Herr Pauer might, no doubt, reply that all he does is to play harpsichord music on the harpsichord-pianoforte music on the piano. But on what instrument does Herr Pauer imagine that Bach himself would have executed his Italian Concerto, if Bach could have been present the other day at the Hanover Square Rooms? Certainly not on the harpsichord, "Bach's forty-eight preludes and figures are so well-known," says Herr Pauer in his highly interesting annotated programme, "his English and French suites, when played by Madame Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé, are so often admired, that a less known work may be more welcome, and may serve to show how great Bach could be while blending his individuality with a foreign style." This is all very well; but Madame Goddard and Mr. Hallé have always played the English and French suites on the piano; and, performed on the harpsichord, the Italian Concerto—with all the respect due to Herr Pauer's remarkable talent—cannot be heard to the greatest possible advantages.

The second part of Herr Pauer's first "Historical Performance" included—a sonata by Karl Philipp Emanuel Bach, Sebastian Bach's younger son, one of ninety-three written between the years 1779 and 1787; a gigue by Johann Wilhelm Hässler, a pupil of Emanuel Bach, who visited London in 1791, remained here a year or two, and afterwards went to St. Petersburg, where he settled and in 1822 died; Mozart's Fantasia in C minor (No. 2); Beethoven's Sonata in F sharp minor; an andante by Hummel (Op. 18); Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," the presentation of which is made the occasion for giving in the programme a lively sketch of the pianist and composer's very varied career; and, finally, an original barcarolle by Thalberg, "whom," says Herr Pauer, "it has recently become the fashion to ridicule; but any one," he adds, "who will take the trouble to examine Thalberg's compositions will find that he never wrote a commonplace one, and that, although his part-writing may sometimes occur strangely out of place, it is always clear and without fault. It will be evident," he continues, "to those conversant with the subject, in trying over Thalberg's music, that it has been composed on the piano and afterwards transferred to paper. Beethoven and Mendelssohn did not compose in that way, and it is possible Thalberg might have found it difficult to compose one of his well-known fantasias in any other." Nevertheless, Thalberg's results were good, and Herr Pauer concludes his excellent biographical and critical notices with the expression of a wish that Thalberg's best pieces, "the productions of one at least acquainted with the primary rules of musical grammar, were again in vogue, rather than the present trash which fills the windows, and, it is to be presumed, the pockets of the music-sellers."

Herr Pauer's "Historical Performances," especially when studied by the light of his programmes, will be found very interesting and instructive. The harpsichord is scarcely wanted. But everyone has his weak point, and a passion for the harpsichord may be the weakaest of Herr Pauer.

Her Majesty's Theatre.

The audiences who were leaving the various theatres on Friday, the 6th inst., were met by a spectacle on which they had not calculated. The "Old Opera House in the Haymarket," as it was familiarly called, was being lapped up by the fiercest tongue of fire that had ever brought swift destruction on substantial property and visionary hopes. To some, the spectacle was before them—raging, defiant, overpowering. For others, the record of the catastrophe was flung upon the skies. For miles round the metropolis there could be seen a glowing, trembling canopy of flame-colored cloud, which denoted what fiery ruin was being accomplished beneath it. At eleven o'clock the flames had full mastery of the noble edifice; by one, their progress was arrested, yet not till after a fierce struggle against water to destroy the east side of Waterloo place. But daylight had gone out on Saturday evening, and flames still revealed themselves here and there, ready for more mischief, but, cut off from an opportunity, quietly dying out.

In the last opera performed the night previous to that of the catastrophe, "Don Giovanni," Ottavio and Giovanini were sung by two Englishmen, Messrs. Hohler and Santley; Zerlina by an American, Miss Kellogg; and Donna Anna by a German, Mdlle. Tietjens.

The opposition to the first house was made early. Porpora, under the patronage of the nobility and gentry, opened Lincoln's Inn Fields; and when Handel left the Haymarket for Covent Garden, in 1735, the "nobility and gentry" faction occupied the Haymarket. At the end of about two years both parties were ruined, and Chesterfield bewailed the closing of the Operas as the suppression of an establishment which would be replaced by Conventicles, where abominable music would be set up for admiration. A quarter of a century later his enthusiasm had abated. "Whenever I go to the Opera," he wrote to his son, "I leave my sense and my reason at the door with my half-guinea, and deliver myself up to my eyes and my ears." He had got then to speak of the Opera as St. Evremont had spoken long before him: "Une sottise magnifique, mais toujours sottise!"

The queer old house, with its high, narrow windows and trellised railing, was destroyed by fire in June, 1789. As nobody had the slightest idea how that calamity came about, everybody came to be assured that an Italian "super," whose susceptibilities had been wounded, had confessed to a priest that he alone did it, out of revenge! The fine gentlemen met the blow with fine-gentlemanly indifference. "Have you shed a tear over the Opera House?" asked Walpole of the sisters Berry, "or do you agree with me that there is no occasion to rebuild it? The nation has long been tired of operas, and has now a good opportunity of dropping them. Dancing protracted their existence for some time! But the room after was the real support of both, and was like what has been said of your sex, that they never speak their true meaning but in the postscript of their letters. Would it not be sufficient to hold an After Room on the whole emplacement, to which people might resort from all assemblies. To be crowded to death in a waiting room at the end of the entertainment is the whole joy; for who goes to any diversion till the last minute of it?"

The first "Italian" house—where Horace Walpole and Gray and Lady Mary Coke and the Countess of Ossory figured, and criticized and made love and talked scandal, the house in which Sceneseo sang, and for which Handel and Gluck wrote their operas (to name but a few among the long list of brilliant associations of the last century), built by Sir John Vanbrugh—but burnt down in 1789. Till it could be replaced, Italian opera found its home in the Pantheon, then a theatre. That, too (as Lord Mount Edgecumbe's "Recollections" remind us), was destroyed in like fashion. The second Grand Opera-House in the Haymarket, opened in 1791, was built by one Novosielski (a Pole), and some twenty years later was revised, and its exterior beautified by Nash. As a theatre for the display of the voice, it was unequalled. When it was reared, the demands for scenic display in Italian Opera were trifling in comparison with those we have lived to see enforced during the last five-and-thirty years. The stage of late must have been felt as comfortlessly small and inconvenient. But the aspect of the theatre, especially when court plumes and full dress figured in the boxes and in "Fops' Alley," was brilliant and pompous in no common degree—a sight to be thought of and talked about even by those familiar with the grand musical theatres of Milan and Naples.

From the first, our Haymarket Opera House has commanded for its service all that was richest and choicest in Europe, before St. Petersburg and New York were thought of as markets, and before the great art of singing had followed the law of all arts, and, from a splendid noon, waned into a dull twilight. What a procession of queens of song rises as we recall the names of Billington, Banti, Grassini, Catalani (with her "five supplementary dolls,") Pasta, Sontag, Malibran, and the three last, but not three least, of the great vocalists, happily all living, Mesdames Grisi, Viardot and Lind! And what kings were there to match the queens? Only such consummate "singing-men" as David, Donzelli, Rubini, Lablache, and Signor Tamburini. Then, in the history of Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre, it must never be forgotten how, during many a long year, the performances were wrought up by Mr. Costa to a point of perfection utterly unknown till then in this country.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG. The 7th Gewandhaus Concert (Nov. 28) began with an Overture to Aladdin, a MS. work by a former pupil of the Conservatorium, C. F. E. Hornemann, a young Dane. The critics speak of it as a work of uncommon talent, fresh, original, imaginative, with a certain coloring of the author's nationality. A lady violinist, from Stockholm, Frau Nernda-Norman, who "takes first rank among her sister artists by the manly strength and fullness of her tone, its absolute purity, and by her faultless technique," played Rode's A minor Concerto and a Concerto by Viouxtemps. The Neue Zeitschrift, alluding to Mendelssohn's motto over the stage of the Gewandhaus hall, thinks that such parade pieces can hardly be called "res servata." Another novelty was the singing of a Swedish male quartet (called in to fill a gap in the programme). They sang national compositions by Lindblad and others, and though the voices were not remarkable for power or beauty, the ensemble is pronounced unsurpassable. Schumann's C-major Symphony formed the second part of the concert.

Bach's Truer Ode (Funeral Ode), and the Missa Solemnis by F. Kiel, were performed in the Thomas Church by Riedel's Society, in the latter part of November.—The third concert of the "Entero" consisted of the first act of Gluck's Alceste for the first part, and Beethoven's Heroic Symphony for the second.

COLOGNE. The third Gürzenicht concert came on the anniversary of Schubert's death (Nov. 19), and the programme consisted largely of his music: the great Symphony in C, the overture to Rosamund, and the Kyrie from his grand Mass.

COPENHAGEN. The Musikverein, besides its usual Concerts for all the members, gives seven subscription concerts this winter, consisting partly of orchestral and vocal, partly of chamber music, as follows: Bach: Concerto for piano and orchestra, in D minor; W. Bargiel: Overture to Medea; Beethoven: 4th Symphony, and Overture to "King Stephen;" N. W. Gade: "Ossian" Overture; J. P. E. Hartmann: "Die Goldenen Hörner," poem by Oehlenschläger, melodrama; Haydn: "Spring" from "The Seasons;" P. Heise: Symphony in D minor; Handel: Concerto for two violins and cello in G minor; Mendelssohn: Selections from "St. Paul," and Overture to "Ray Blas;" Mozart: Symphony, Concerto for violin and viola, Aria for Soprano with obligato piano and orchestra; C. Reinecke: Ave Maria for chorus and orchestra, Concerto in A minor for violoncello; Schubert: "Parting" Serenade, for Alto solo, female chorus and orchestra; Schumann: second part of "Paradise and the Peri;" Spohr: Overture to "The Alchemist." Chamber music: a Quartet and a Song by Haydn; a Sextet, for 2 violins and 2 cello, by Brahms; Beethoven's B flat Trio; and other things depending on the cooperation of Joachim and Grützmacher.

LONDON. At the Crystal Palace on Saturday, Mozart's symphony in G minor formed the feature and was magnificently performed before an audience not too numerous. The andante produced an especially gratified impression, so softly and delicately was it performed. Schubert's "March Militaire" in D, and the concert overture to "Marnion," by Mr. Sullivan, were also successfully given. Spohr's Concerto Dramatique, a work demanding all the resources of an artist, was satisfactorily performed by Mr. Henry Holmes.

The last of Herr Pauer's illustrative series of pianoforte performances—called Historical Concerts—was given on Wednesday. In the second, Herr Pauer took as specimens the harpsichord music of Lully, Scarlatti, Galuppi, Martini, and Paradisi, and the more modern pianoforte works of Clementi, Cramer, Field, Chopin, and Schumann and Keller. The third concert, like the others, was divided into two periods, the Clavecin age, and the Pianoforte era. The parts ran as follows:

THE CLAVECIN.

La Favorite, La Tendre Nanette, La Tenchreuse—
(1685-1732) Couperin.
Deux figures en Rondeaux, Deux Menuets, La Poule
—(1681-764) Rameau.
Fuga, in F—(1713-1780) Krieger.
Allegro, in E minor—(1721-1783) Kirnberger.

THE PIANOFORTE.

Andante and Variations—(1732-1809) Haydn.
La Consolation—(1761-1812) Dussek.
Capriccio, in G flat—(1767-1817) Moser.
Andante and Rondo—(1786-1826) Weber.
Study—(1794) Moschles.
Impromptu, Op. 142, No. 3—(1797-1828) Schubert.
Three Musical Sketches, Op. 10—(1816) Bennett.
Allegro Brillante for Two Pianofortes—(1809-1847) Mendelssohn.

The various illustrations were all played with that masterful appreciation of different and opposing styles which makes the thorough artist. In conception and execution Herr Pauer displayed true ability, while the letter-press of his lecture offered food for thought, and served to enchain the attention of the audience.

BERLIN. A correspondent of the London Musical World (Dec. 7) gives the following intelligence:

We are to have a revival, on a grand scale, and on the 16th of December—its artistic centenary—of Gluck's Alceste, with Mme. Harriers-Wippen in the principal female part. Then we are promised by way of complete novelty, Herr Langert's Fabius, and the Mignon of M. Thomas, with Mlle. Frederika Grün as the heroine of the first, and Mme. Lucca as the heroine of the second. M. Gounod's Rome and Juliet, as Shakespeare's title is written here, is also to be produced, Mme. Harriers-Wippen appearing as the fair daughter of the house of Capulet. The list concludes, for the present, with a revival of Wuerst's Stern von Taran, the leading characters in which will be sustained by Mme. Lucca and Herr Niemann.

You will be sorry to learn that Mme. Lucca was suddenly taken ill a short time since. It was on the occasion of the hundredth performance of M. Gounod's Marguerite, alias Faust. The gifted lady would not, however, disappoint the audience, and finished her part, but not in her usual brilliant manner. The Church-scene had to be entirely omitted. I am glad to say that Mme. Lucca's illness was nothing serious.

Mme. Lucca had sung the part of Gretchen, at the Royal Operahouse, forty-five times; Mme. Harriers-Wippen, twenty-seven; and Mlle. Artot, eight. It had, also, been sung by Mesd. Schmidt, Spohr, Horina, Orgéni, Garthe, Reiss, and Borehers-Lina. The Martha during all the hundred performances was one lady, Mlle. Gey. I should say that, by this time, she would be capable, if called upon, of going through the part in her sleep, especially as it is not a long one. Siebel was represented fifty-seven times by the late Mlle. De Anna; and twenty-one by Mlle. Gerieke, now Mme. Trunk (not a bad name, by-the-by, for a portmanteau maker's wife); and, also, by Mesd. Bähr, Grün, Frieb, Wille, and Hinela, a lesser number of times each. Seventy-seven times, was Herr Woworsky Faust; seventeen times, Herr Krüger; five times, Herr Niemann; and one time—Herr Himmer. Herr Salomon "gave the role" of Mephistopheles ninety-nine times, leaving only one single evening free for Herr Lindeck. Herr Betz, too, figured pretty often as Valentin, for he impersonated the part ninety-six times. On the remaining occasions, it was sustained by Herren Basse, Lang and Niemann.

Another noticeable event has been the revival of Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis after a long absence of fifteen years from the light of the stage. [A mistake: we heard it in Berlin in 1861, and the Iphigenia in Tauris also.—J. S. D.] The greatest possible credit is due to the management for having revived this opera, and revived it, moreover, in so perfectly satisfactory, nay, in so splendid a manner, for there can be no doubt that, when doing so, they were thinking more of the interest of pure and high art than of mere pecuniary success. This independence of money considerations is certainly a great point in favor of theatres and other art institutions being supported, at least partly, by State grants. It is all very well—and everyone knows it is very easy—to pitch into private managers for not producing works that are sure not to pay, though forever to be admired as monuments of immortal genius. It is not in human nature to do it. But to resume: Herr Betz was Agamemnon; Herr Niemann, Achilles; Mme. Harriers-Wippen, Iphigenia, and Mme. Jachmann-Wagner, Clytemnestra. Herr Taubert officiated as conductor on the occasion, and kept both orchestra and chorus up to a high standard of excellence. The opera was placed on the stage by Herr Hein. What a pity some of your schools in England cannot be transported en bloc to witness a performance of it. How it would improve their knowledge of classical costume and classical architecture, and what a pleasant mode of learning!

I just mentioned Mme. Jachmann-Wagner. That lady has appeared, also, as Fides in Le Prophète. Mlle. Börner was Bertha, and Herr Niemann, John of Leyden.

Among the operas performed since I last wrote, I may name as most worthy of record, Il Trovatore, with Mesdames Lucca, von Edelsberg, Herren Wachtel and Betz; and Don Juan with Mme. Lucca, for the first time, as Zerlina. The part is not one which makes a very heavy demand upon her powers. She both sang and acted charmingly. She was compelled to repeat the duet and the last air.

Crispino e la Comare has been produced by the Italian company at the Victoria Theatre very successfully. Signora Sarolta was a delightful Annette, and was well supported by Sig. Marchisio, as Crispino. This gentleman, who made his debut on the occasion, is no considerable addition to Sig. Pollini's company. He possesses a pleasing, sufficiently well-trained voice, and no small share of humor.—Among the other operas performed have been Un Ballo in Maschera, Il Trovatore, and La Favorita.

The manager of the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theatre has for some time been putting his trust, with considerable profit to himself, in M. Offenbach, whose Schöne Helene, Pariser Leben, Blaublut, and Fitzchen und Lieschen, seem to hold nearly sole possession of the bills, though it is true that Mozart's Gans von Cairo has been played a few times. "O monstrous! but one half-penny worth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!" quoth Prince Henry. "A deal of Offenbach and exceedingly little of any one else," say I. But the public pays its money and is, therefore, entitled to take its choice.—A promising young tenor came out here a short time since, as Paris in Die Schöne Helene. I allude to Herr Adolph from the Stadttheater, Pesti. I should not wonder at his being regularly engaged and becoming a great favorite.

At Kroll's Theatre, also, does the muse of M. Offenbach draw admiring crowds. The manager has revived an old one-act burlesque entitled Trambalcazar, first produced at the Bouffes Parisiens. The principal characters were well sustained by Mlle. Mejo, Herren Weiss, Bernhard, and Hesse. The other attractions have been the same composer's Du-mender Halle; and Die Verlobung bei der Lanterne, together with M. Suppé's Pensionat.

The concerts of the Philharmonic Society opened this season with a "bang." The programme of the first concert contained a name which acted like a magnet on the concert-going public. Herr Joseph Joachim was announced to play Dr. L. Spohr's Concerto in E minor, and J. S. Bach's "Clavicorn." To describe how he played is unnecessary, because you, Mr. Editor, and all your readers, know it already. To say that he was most heartily applauded is, also, rather superfluous, about as much so as stating that the mouth of May—out of England—is generally an agreeable mouth. But Herr Joachim has not contented himself with playing at the concerts of other people; he has given concerts of his own, to the intense satisfaction of all who love what is pure and great in art. Among other pieces executed by him were the Concerto in the Hungarian style, Bach's Violin-concerto in A minor, and his own Second Concerto in G minor (unpublished). The first concert commenced with the overture to Famula, by Cherubini. Famula is certainly not Cherubini's best work; it is inferior to Medea and Les Deux Jouvencés. Yet, in 1805, the Viennese looked upon it as a marvel of musical composition, and actually preferred it to Beethoven's Leonore!

Among the other noticeable concerts have been the Monday Concerts of Herr S. Blumner: the Concert of the Royal Cathedral Choir; the Quartet-Soirée of Herren de Anna, F. Espenhuin, J. B. Müller, and Dr. Braun; and the Matinées of Herr Fr. Bendel, all of which have presented the public with something worth hearing. The principal attractions at the first Monday Concert were Herr Lanterbach, a violinist from Dresden, who appeared in Berlin a year ago; and Signora Parisotti-Ciceroni, from Rome, who sang an air from Handel's Rinaldo: "Voi che sapete" from Figaro, and an original romance, "Il Fiore," by Fenzi. Her voice is no longer what it has been, but her method might be advantageously studied by many young aspirants now commencing their career, if they would learn how to make their voices last as long as possible. At the second concert of the series, Herr Friedrich Grützmacher, the violoncellist—from Dresden, if I recollect aright—played, with Herr Blümler, Beethoven's Sonata in A major, Op. 69; and, alone, a Sonata by Bonifazio Asioli, the precocious mass-writer of Corregio. He performed, too, a Suite for violoncello solo by J. S. Bach. The vocalist was Mme. Herrenburg-Tnezek. The prominent pieces at the Royal Cathedral Choir Concert were an "Antiphone," by Hassler; Lotti's eight part "Crucifixus," in my own opinion a particularly fine effort; and Mendelssohn's "Graduale." Haydn, Mendelssohn and Beethoven provided the materials for the four gentlemen of the Quartet-Soirée to exhibit their instrumental power on, while Mme. Blümler sang songs by Schubert and Schumann so charmingly at Herr Bendel's Matinée that she added most considerably to the value of the entertainment.

A great sensation was created in musical circles not long since by a report that there was a "split" between Herr Liebig and his well-known orchestra. It was at first discredited, but afterwards proved to be true. I am not acquainted with all the ins and outs of the case, but the following are the essential facts. The members of the orchestra made certain demands, to which Herr Liebig would not even listen unless fifteen members had been expelled from the orchestra. Hereupon the malcontents went and offered to transfer their allegiance to Professor Stern. The latter endeavored to bring about a reconciliation, but found the task impossible. Herr Liebig would not descend one iota from the high ground he had taken up. The consequence is that the orchestra Herr Liebig directed for five-and-twenty years has left him, and now obeys the baton of Professor Stern, who was at length prevailed on to accept the honorable post.

VALE.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 4, 1868.

Music in Boston.

CHRISTMAS WEEK brought with it the usual performance of Handel's "Messiah;" and the almost crowded state of the Music Hall on both evenings (the Saturday and Sunday before Christmas) showed that this great religious work of genius is as far as ever from losing its hold upon the affections of the great mass of serious music-lovers. The Handel and Haydn Society must by these performances more than have made good their loss by the unfortunate experiment of Thanksgiving week, and now feel in better spirits for the great winter's work, the preparation of the triennial Festival for the coming "wunderschönen Monat Mai."

On Saturday evening the chorus was in great force, certainly exceeding 400 voices; the orchestra, on a rather reduced scale of numbers, was yet quite effective on the whole; the great Organ, played by Mr. LANG, came in at the right moments to supply great depths of bass and background in the massive choruses; the four solo singers all were excellent, and Mr. ZERRAHN, who had made the most of the opportunities of training (though it is harder to unlearn habits in rehearsing these very familiar things, than it is to acquire better ones in new things), conducted with his usual ability. There were some omissions, for the most part judicious. We must protest again, however, against the omitting of that profoundly beautiful and touching chorus in the second part, "And with his stripes,"—if only because there Handel comes so near to Bach; but more because, without its intervention, the transition from the preceding chorus, "Surely," &c., to "All we like sheep have gone astray," is unprepared in point of modulation and painfully abrupt. Most of the choruses were sung as well as usual, some of them (old stumbling blocks, such as "His yoke is easy," and "Let us break their bonds asunder") considerably better. Others, and solos too, suffered from want of perfect unity of pitch between orchestra and organ.

The new point of interest in the solos was the first appearance in Oratorio of Mr. GEORGE L. OSGOOD, whose beautiful tenor voice, thoroughly refined style and true expression had won such favor in one of the Symphony Concerts. He gave "Comfort ye" in clear, pure, warm tones, with admirable declamation, and sang the air, "Every valley," with a fluency and evenness of execution remarkable for one so young in years and in this sort of experience. In "Thy rebuke," &c., he was almost equally successful, entering into the deep pathos of the music with true intelligence and feeling. We are sure he was clearly heard by all, and conveyed the sense and beauty of the music very satisfactorily; the only want was of greater weight and sustained power of voice—not by any means a thing to be counted first in the order of requirements, inasmuch as soul is more than substance. The want of power was materially felt, though, in the tasking and exceptional air: "Thou shalt break them." We could not feel, as some have been in haste to exclaim, that he "broke down" in it; but he did wrestle with the lion at disadvantage; and this, we fancy, was partly due to nervousness and partly to the fact that he had been overtaken with an air which properly and commonly falls to the lot of the Soprano. Mr. Osgood must not be discouraged; his physical development is by no means complete yet, and his career is but begun; he has a beautiful organ, already finely cultivated, and, what is best of all, a musical nature, with refinement and intelligence, and a love of Art for Art's sake by no means too common with those who bring voices and assurance to these high tasks. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY showed marked improvement in the bass solos, both in the rich and even quality of his voice, and in expressive delivery.

Madame PAREPA-ROSA, of course, was fully equal to her task in all the attributes of voice, consummate art of singing, and thorough familiarity with this as with all kinds of music. The voice was sweetest and the expression purest, we thought, in the opening pieces: "There were shepherds," &c. And "Rejoice greatly" was splendidly done. In the great air: "I know that my Redeemer" we still feel some lack of sympathetic quality, of depth of nature, of inspiration, such as make it impossible ever to forget how the Lind sang it. Other pieces too were marred by the introduction of cadences and little "effects," more in place in ballad singing. Even that high note to which the voice soared, as in spontaneous ecstasy, at the end of "Take his yoke upon you," beautifully as it was held out, was questionable, if only for the reason that it was too sure to "bring the house down," with an enforced encore, which was simply absurd, because it amounted to getting the same slow, sweet melody sung thrice over. Mrs. CARY'S rendering of it in the first instance, on the low key ("Come unto Him"), was not a whit less worthy of the compliment, and its quiet beauty deserved not to be outdazzled by any extra brightening of the Soprano part. Indeed Mrs. Cary's singing of her whole part was as truly edifying as a warm, rich, sympathetic voice, without great weight, but finely cultivated, and sincere, deep musical feeling, could make it. This lady loses herself in the music.

The second night was stormy, and reduced the audience a little, though not much; it seemed to have made greater inroads in the ranks of chorus. And yet, as it often happens for the reward of those who brave the elements in a good effort, the "Messiah" went on the whole with more spirit and precision than the night before. This time Mr. CASTLE sang the tenor solos, with greater power and volume of voice than Mr. Osgood, though not with more expression, nor so refined a quality of tone; but the effort was in every way highly successful; and so was that of Mr. RUDOLPHSEN in the bass solos. The rest was as before.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The fourth, Dec. 19th, consisted of just four solid instrumental pieces, and no more;—what Artemus Ward would have called a good "square meal" of music. But certainly no concert has been more enjoyed; it held the great audience in earnest, rapt attention from the first note to the last. The orchestra was in better condition than ever: the welcome face of WOLF FRIES was seen in the middle of the group, making us rich now in six violoncellos, as well as six double basses. We count a dozen first violins, good men and true, and when the other members of the Quintette Club return to us, the second violins and tenors will be brought into fairer proportion to the whole. The good fruits of Mr. EICHBERG'S adjutancy, or monitorship over the string department, already appear in greater unity of bowing and common understanding in the taking of phrases, while Mr. Conductor ZERRAHN can give a more undivided mind to the interpretation of each work as a whole. There was closer approximation also to true pitch in the wind instruments.

The first selection was Gade's "Ossian" Overture (Nachklänge aus Ossian), a wonderful tone picture in the way of instrumental coloring. It is one of the Danish composer's earliest works, and gave him fame before the "Highlands" Overture or either of his Symphonies had yet appeared. Hence we have here his individuality in all its freshness, before the wild northern inspirations, by turns tender and stormy, fairy-like or patriotic and heroic, bearing the burthen of old war songs as on the strong wings of the wind, could repeat themselves to mannerism. All that strings and flutes and reeds and mellow horns and hoarser brass could do to mingle and contrast the colors of a wild northern picture, and summon up its legend and its mystery, is here by a happy stroke of genius, and with masterful skill, availed of. Ossian's harp too is not wanting. Gigantic figures stalk through the mists, and when the orchestra swells from soft murmurs to a climax in that loud, resistless war hymn, you feel the likeness with that old Vikingir Völsled in the finale of his first Symphony.—Schumann's D-minor Symphony, op. 120, completed the first part of the concert. We described it so fully last year, that we need only say that the general impression of its power and beauty was confirmed; nearly all present followed the unbroken series of its movements, springing so logically from one germ, with sincere delight, and all with sincere respect; for Schumann's music, though some natures truly musical seem not to find themselves at home in it, more and more makes its genius felt. It was remarkably well played.

For the second part we had, first, the last and greatest of Beethoven's five Pianoforte Concertos, the greatest indeed of all Concertos, called in England the "Emperor,"—that in E flat, op. 73. In the first and last movements it is heroic; in its glorious enthusiasm it seems to tread on air; it moves onward and upward with a divine momentum; while the Adagio, a deep musing melody of infinite sweetness, singing itself at first on muted strings, is altogether heavenly. Out of its deep peace the uncontainable motive of the Allegro takes wings of energy and soars. It is as much an orchestral as a piano work; if you attend to the piano any more than to the other instruments, you lose the charm and meaning of the work, for it is all one creation. It has had masterly interpretation here before, and more than once (at the "Jubilee" Concert in honor of the Emancipation Proclamation, Jan. 1, 1863, at one or two of Mr. Zerrahn's Philharmonic Concerts, and in the first season of these Harvard concerts), so that many welcomed it as an old friend. This time the wonderfully rich orchestral parts—rich in images, ideas, as well as coloring—had much better justice done them than they ever got here before; and the young pianist, ERNST PERABO, achieved his arduous task in a way that made the audience enthusiastic. He played it without notes; but he had not merely trusted to that marvellous musical memory, that sure, firm, limpid touch, alike audible in the most delicate and the strongest passages, and that unlimited power of execution which makes it a matter of course for him to give a clear, unbroken reading of whatsoever music interests him, even without preparation; but conscientiously, in duty to the master and the occasion and himself, he had critically and carefully prepared himself, resolved to do his best; and it was the general feeling that he did it. Such a work, so played, is a rare feast.—The concert ended with the great Leonore Overture, No. 3, in C, which never can grow old, and this time was particularly well played. The greatest of Overtures after the greatest of Concertos!

The next concert comes at a month's interval, Thursday, Jan. 16. The programme, like the last, consists of four pieces: Schubert's Overture to Fierabras, Beethoven's first Concerto, in C, played by Mr. B. J. LANG, and Mendelssohn's Overture to Ruy Blas, form the first part; and the great Schubert Symphony in C, with its "heavenly lengths," the second.

AMATEUR SINGING. MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S Vocal Club still holds its own and more. It has become one of the institutions, and the feasts of music to which it invites its friends twice about new year, and twice in the Spring, are to be marked with a white line in our musical calendar. Again they have come round, and Chickering's Hall, on the last two Monday evenings, was filled with delighted guests. They spread before us the matter of their winter's practice in the most acceptable manner. The choir is even better than before; indeed we have never heard a choir of forty mixed voices so perfectly balanced, so purely musical in tone in all four parts, and finely blended; no part but was distinctly heard, albeit duly subordinated to the whole; no voice that did not tell. They have all practiced con amore, and have held together so long to good purpose.

The programme included first a Choral by Bach, wonderfully harmonized; followed by the Cradle Song from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," sung with true simplicity and beauty by Mrs. CARX, Mr. Parker accompanying on the piano, as he did everything except the part-songs. Then came one of the last studies of the Club, a Christmas Cantata, by Ferdinand Hiller, consisting of introduction, Soprano Solo (Angel of the Annunciation), Tenor Solo (a Shepherd), Chorus of Shepherds, with which, as it goes on, a chorus of Angels (female voices) mingles, and other choruses and solos. It is a very graceful, buoyant, happy composition, full of delicate beauties, but hardly of so marked a character as we had hoped; yet we must own that it improved upon acquaintance. A Trio and Chorus, to Latin words, from a Motet by Mendelssohn succeeded. Then a couple of very beautiful part-songs: "On the water," by Schumann, and Mendelssohn's jubilant and sunshiny "Forest Birds." Then a couple of Duets: "Frühlingsgrüss," by Gade, and "Herbstlied" by Mendelssohn, nicely sung by two young ladies. Then two more part-songs, an exquisite one by Gade, "The tranquil Water Lily," dreamy and mystical enough for Heine's little poem and one of Mr. Parker's own composition, to "The sea hath its pearls" by the same poet;—a most euphonious and rapturous strain of music, which had to be repeated. Then Mrs. HAYWOOD, whom we were once free to name, and trust we may do so now, let her rare voice and style be heard again in the "Spring Song" of Mendelssohn, and Schubert's Barcarolle.

After a short interval, the singers returned, divided into double chorus, and sang Mendelssohn's 98th Psalm: "Sing to the Lord a new-made song." We think it had never been heard here before, and certainly it is one of the noblest of his shorter Psalms; every image and sentence of the text is most vividly illustrated; the harmony and counterpoint singularly effective; and when it comes to "He shall judge the world with righteousness," the great voices fill the listener with awe. The whole was splendidly brought out.—Long may this rare collection of voices hold together, blended and animated by the same spirit, under the same excellent director!

NEXT IN ORDER. THE MENDELSSOHN QUINETTE CLUB, not spoiled by their triumphs out West, where their harmony was like oases in a thirsty desert, (to judge from the rhapsodies about them in the Western papers), have returned to their quiet, classical sphere and will commence their 19th season of Chamber Concerts (four), at Chickering's Hall, next Tuesday evening. The programme is a rich one, beginning with Mozart's B flat Quintet, op. 33, and ending with one of the last Quartets of Beethoven, the great one in C-sharp minor, op. 131. The intervening time will be filled by the Piano and Violin Sonata in F, op. 24, of Beethoven, played by Mme. NINA PIZZOTTI, a young pianist who comes well recommended from Dublin, and Mr. SCHULZE; Spohr's "Gesang Scene," for violin, transcribed for flute, and played by Mr. HEINDL, and smaller piano solos from Mendelssohn and Chopin.

On Thursday afternoon of the week following, comes the fifth Symphony Concert.

We are glad to hear that Mr. OSGOOD, the young tenor, who sings German Lieder so tastefully, intends to give a series of concerts in Chickering's Hall, with Mr. DRESSEL for accompanist; devoting one evening principally to Schubert, one to Mendelssohn, one to Schumann, one to Franz, with something of Beethoven and Mozart every time. An admirable plan, and sure to succeed.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 30.—Sunday evening concerts have hitherto been a novelty hereabouts. The first of a projected series of these entertainments, under the management and direction of Messrs. Mark and Simon Hassler, was given last evening at Concert Hall. The audience was a very large one, the hall being uncomfortably crowded, and was mainly made up of representatives of the respectability and intelligence of the city; so that the enterprise promises to prove a success. The undertaking was, in some measure, hazardous, in view of the inveterate bigotry that abounds in Philadelphia, the latest manifestation of which was the bitter, and for a while triumphant, warfare waged against the introduction of Sunday travel. Now, that the efforts of these so-disant protectors of the public morals have failed in the latter regard, they will, doubtless, renew them in an attempt to stop this last and equally unholly profanation of the Lord's day; only, however, it is safe to predict, to meet with the same mortifying discomfiture. This was the programme presented last evening:

"Procession of the Priests," from "Athalie" Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Ermont" Beethoven.
Air, "He was Despised and Rejected" Handel.
Mme. Elisa Lumley.
"Zug der Frauen," from "Lohengrin" Wagner.
"Evening Song," for Violin Obligato Schumann.
Mr. Simon Hassler.
Overture, "Oberon" Weber.
Solo for French Horn, "Hercule" Luebeck.
Mr. Kuestenmacher.
Larghetto, from 2d Symphony Beethoven.
Recitative and Aria, "Che faro senza Euridice" Gluck.
Mme. Elisa Lumley.
"Marche des Flambeaux" Meyerbeer.
Hymn, "Oft Hundst" Luther.
Organ and Orchestra.

The Orchestra, composed of some fifty or more of our best resident instrumentalists, directed by Mr. Simon Hassler, performed the several items assigned to them with considerable effect. A little practice together will do the strings no harm, and will make these performances something of which we shall have reason to be proud. Mme. Lumley is young, and has a fresh, very powerful voice, which she needs to control more than she seems able to do at times. Her singing of the Gluck Aria was so great an improvement upon the Messiah air, that we have a right to expect that the generally agreeable impression of her singing left upon the mind will be confirmed and enhanced at another hearing, when she shall have overcome the nervousness incident to a debut.

Mr. Sentsz's weekly Orchestral Matinees at the Horticultural still continue. The attendance has been encouraging and the performances satisfactory. On last Thursday the lovely sixth Symphony of Haydn—called by some the "Savoyard," wherefore I know not,—was given. On previous occasions the two Piano Concertos of Mendelssohn were performed by Messrs. Jarvis and Thunder, respectively, with orchestral accompaniments. Of each performance I have nothing to say but praise. The "Jupiter" Symphony is announced for this week, and Mr. William Stoll, Jr., a young and very promising violinist, whose performance of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto at the Germania, last Saturday, I particularly desire to note as a remarkably finished and interesting performance, will essay a solo.

In the removal of Mr. Herman Allen to Chicago, we have lost one of the most intelligent and competent of our professional musicians. Mr. Allen is the son of the well known and highly esteemed Professor Allen of the University of Pennsylvania, is the possessor of a thorough musical education obtained in the best schools abroad, and has been very successful in his native city since his return. With the true spirit of an American he has gone westward, where he will undoubtedly find a much more extended field of duty. He deserves the warmest welcome that the friends in his new home can extend to him. May he, happily, receive it! MERCURIO.

NEW YORK, DEC. 30.—The Second Concert of the N. Y. Philharmonic Society took place on Saturday evening, Dec. 21st, with this programme:

Symphony in C, Mendelssohn.
Pianoforte Concerto, F minor, Von Weber.
Miss Alice Topp.
Overture, "Othello" (1st time) F. Ritter.
Fantasia "Ruins of Athens" with orch. acc. Lasz.
Miss Topp.
Overture, "Calm at Sea and happy Voyage" Mendelssohn.

It is only within the last ten or fifteen years that this Symphony has been performed, and it is difficult to understand how such a noble work could have so long (Schubert died in 1828) remained unknown to the musical world. The opening eight or nine bars of horn solo are fitly entitled by Schumann "Horns of Elfland faintly blowing." It is easy to perceive how a work of such genius took so strong a hold as it did upon Schumann's admiration. In it there is the spontaneity of Mendelssohn, the depth and breadth of Beethoven, the elaborate instrumentation and peculiar quaintnesses of Schumann, yet, through all, the unmistakable individuality of Schubert himself.

When all the numbers are so admirable, it is impossible—without occupying too much space—to enlarge upon the merits of any particular one. The Allegretto in A minor (2d movement) is perhaps the most attractive. There is something unbearably sad in the measured, resistless and unceasing march of the low bass notes taken by the cellos and contrabassi. The theme itself is charming.

The Scherzo is finely worked up; the Trio in A, which breaks in upon it, being a gem. The Finale, grand and broad, is a sort of foreshadowing (to use that expression) of the closing movement in Schumann's C-major Symphony.

The "Othello" Overture, by F. Ritter, although written in a most careful, logical and musician-like manner, yet lacks freshness, spontaneity, originality.

Miss Topp, a young lady of twenty-one, and a pupil of Von Bulow, played the Weber Concerto with much rapidity of execution and firmness of touch. The element of tenderness and feeling seemed, however, in a certain degree lacking; further, there was a little uncertainty with regard to her playing precisely with the orchestra.

It may be heterodox to hold or to confess such an opinion, but the Concerto is certainly [?] a most uninteresting composition. Miss Topp played without score.

The orchestra, under Mr. Carl Bergmann's careful leadership, played admirably, every point of light and shade was faithfully observed and scrupulously rendered.

On Saturday Evening, Dec. 28, the Mendelssohn Union gave in Steinway Hall the first performance of Mr. G. F. Bristow's new Oratorio "Daniel." The orchestra numbered 60, and the chorus about 100,—60 male and 40 female voices. Mr. Bristow conducted, J. P. Morgan assisted at the organ, and the soloists were Mme. Parepa-Rosa, J. R. Thomas and Miss Hutchings.

Extended analysis is out of the question, and I can only say that the work is most carefully written and scored, and that many of the numbers are melodious and pleasing. The orchestral accompaniment to the chorus in A minor (No. 13) is excellent, somewhat Mendelssohnian in character; indeed there are strong suggestions of that master throughout the entire oratorio. The chorus No. 11 is very well worked up. The recitatives were all very monotonous, and were, as a rule, badly given. This was especially the case with No. 12, "To you it is commanded," which was belted by the "Herald" without regard to taste or tune.

In the chorus No. 18 it was very evident that the sopranos were by far too few, and their voices were drowned by the orchestra and the organ; it was also noticeable that the voices and instruments had not been drilled sufficiently together.

Daniel's Aria: "Break off thy sins," (No. 20) is a very attractive number, and was fairly sung by Mr. J. R. Thomas; he received an encore, and sang a portion of the Aria again. The effect of the repetition was slightly marred by the fact that the orchestra, through some misunderstanding, were not within hailing distance of the soloist: the result was a blur of sounds. The contralto Aria in F-sharp minor is very fine, and in the hands of a finished artist would have made a most decided impression.

Mme. Parepa sang with her usual ease and taste. Mr. Thomas did fairly. With regard to the tenor, a charitable silence shall be maintained. Miss Hutchings sang in a painstaking manner, but her voice is very unpleasant in quality, and has neither depth nor richness; her upper notes were hard and labored.

The audience was a very large and tolerably attentive one. The applause, however, very singularly, was of the mildest and most timid character; this may have been owing to ignorance as to where "the laugh came in."

It is greatly to be desired that the public should have another opportunity of hearing Mr. Bristow's works. With all the leading rôles assumed by competent artists, Daniel could not fail to make a stronger and deeper impression than it did. E.

VASSAR COLLEGE, POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.—Mr. F. L. Ritter, the accomplished musical director of this institution, has projected a series of musical soirées to be given by the pupils, resident lady music teachers, and artists engaged from time to time; the programmes to consist entirely of good music, like the following for the first Soirée, Dec. 17.

PART FIRST.

Overture to "Don Juan," arranged for 8 hands. Mozart.
"The Sabbath Morn'g," Mendelssohn.
Allegro and Adagio from the Sonata in F Major. Mozart.
Cradle Song, Good Night. F. L. Ritter.
Nocturne in B Flat. Chopin.
Song—"Thine is my heart." Schubert.
Sonata in D Major. Opus 31. Beethoven.
Wedding March, arranged for 8 hands. Mendelssohn.

PART SECOND.

Andante and Allegro from the Symphony in C.
(Arranged for 8 hands.) Opus 21. Beethoven.
Duet. "I would that my love." Mendelssohn.
Sonata in B Flat. Opus 22. Beethoven.
Song—"The Woods." Robert Frauz.
Andante from Sonata in G. Opus 11. Beethoven.
Mendelssohn's "On wings of Song," (transcribed for the Pianoforte by) Thalberg.
"Evening Song." Mendelssohn.
Overture to "La dame blanche," arranged for 8 hands. Boieldieu.

YANKEE ASSURANCE; LISZT.—The Western Musical Review (Indianapolis) has a letter from Leipzig, dated Oct. 25, 1867, of which the following is a specimen. The story is amusing, feel as we may about the "American tactics."

Liszt arrived here on the 12th, and took rooms at the Hotel de Pologne. The news of his arrival spread rapidly among the students of the conservatorium, and created no little excitement. In the same evening a party of four or five of the American students—prompted by a taste for the romantic as well as curiosity to see the famous pianist—started to find him. They traced him from place to place, until they came to the house where he was spending the evening, and it was their intention to wait near the entrance and thus catch a glimpse of him as he came out; but while they were endeavoring to learn positively whether he was in the house or not, they attracted the attention of the host, who came to the door and inquired what they wished?—They explained that they were students from America, who were very enthusiastic over Liszt and were anxious to see him; whereupon the host became suddenly thoughtful, and after a brief consultation with his wife, said,

"I think I may invite you in—h'm—yes; I think I may," and ushered them at once, notwithstanding their plain every day attire, into a brilliantly illuminated salon, where was assembled a large company in full dress. They found two young ladies playing Liszt's Poeme Symphonique "Les Preludes," as arranged for two pianos, while Liszt was sitting near and listening, and occasionally playing a few bars with them. Liszt was by no means displeased at the course which the young men had taken in thus visiting him without an invitation, and as they were treated to cake and wine, and bidden to make themselves "entirely at home," they passed a most delightful evening, studying the physiognomy and listening to the playing of this wonderful artist.

Encouraged by the experience of the previous evening, one of the party (Mr. James H. Wilson, of Newport, R. I.) called on Liszt at his rooms the next morning. His description of the affair is very laughable, and I regret that I cannot give it in full. He found people on the stairs trying to summon up courage enough to ask an interview, and upon entering the ante-room, he met several Germans standing in a row, like so many soldiers, armed with letters from Dr. Franz Brendel and other musical authorities, gravely and silently awaiting permission to enter. Mr. Wilson had no letter and relied solely upon "American tactics," (as the saying goes in Europe,) i. e. he sent in his card with "aus America" written upon it, and entered at once without waiting for an invitation. The "tactics" triumphed, and he was again very kindly received. He played Chopin's E flat Polonaise, and was highly complimented by Liszt, who played the piece through after him, making such remarks and suggestions as he deemed advisable, and honored him with an invitation to visit him in Rome.

It is the general idea in America that it is a difficult thing to gain an audience with such men as Liszt, and yet no one save an American dares to evince such a total disregard of German etiquette, as friend Wilson displayed on this occasion; but it is not displeasing to artists, and it is always successful.

Upon making his exit, the Germans who were patiently waiting outside begged to know how he got in, and were almost speechless when they learned that he had accomplished all without a letter or an invitation. He says it takes the German mind a long time to comprehend such a course of action.

Liszt wore, when I saw him, a suit of black, the coat being very long and cut after the usual fashion for a Roman Abbe, and a broad-brimmed silk hat, which looked rough enough to have been through a dozen campaigns. The only bit of color visible about his dress was a beautiful little rosebud, which was inserted in a button hole of his coat. In person he is tall and commanding, while his large eyes, peering out from under great over-arching eyebrows, and his long light-colored hair, combine to give him that lion-like air which has so often been remarked.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Nelly Wildwood. Song & Cho. M. S. Pells. 30
A very taking little ballad, and probably will be a great favorite. Make Nelly's acquaintance.
- Tantum Ergo. Duet. Tenor & Bass. Wilcox. 60
Another acceptable contribution to "Choir" literature. Mr. W. has a fine opportunity of proving his music before publishing, and what is good enough for his choir can hardly fail to meet with a welcome elsewhere.
- I'm 95. Comic song. 35
Queer enough, and portrays the unalterable determination of this single lady to die an old maid, which no one will doubt that she is sure to do.
- Sleigh-ride. Song and Chorus. Keller. 35
Just in season. Have it well learned before the next snow storm.
- Thee only, my star of heaven. Ballad. Farnie. 30
Smiles and tears. Keller. 30
Fit well in our series of graceful songs. Put them in your programmes of home songs.
- Moonlight Hour. Song. H. A. Pond. 30
Should the sleigh-ride mentioned above be by moonlight, this is just the song for the road. Fancy its melody, sung by some sweet voice, floating and echoing among the snow powdered pines!
- The Charming. (Frühlingslied.) S'g. Mendelssohn. 50
While we cannot say that the ex'g taste site of the Master would allow him to write anything but good music, at any time, some songs are more melodious than others, and this is above the average.
- Rondinella. The Prisoner and the Swallow. S. D. S. 50
A very neat and sweet thing, in short phrases. Has Italian and English words.

Instrumental.

- Grand Duchess. Galop. Knight. 35
" " Polka. " 35
The opera, which everybody will go to hear, furnishes much sprightly music suited to nimble feet; and Mr. Knight is all ready with these fine arrangements.
- Mabel March. Mack. 30
Serenade. Aubert. 35
Spirited and pretty marches, quite above the ones formerly so much admired.
- Blue Bird Waltz. C. De Janon. 35
A pleasing, warbling thing.
- Fairy Mazurka. Kinkel. 30
Rosy cheek Schottische. " 80
Mr. Kinkel is among the best caterers for beginners, and teachers may venture to use his pieces freely.
- Summer Garland. Mazurka. E. Mack. 40
Very pleasing, and has a very pretty title page.
- Chant du Zephyr. Morceau de Salon. Iucho. 40
Austrian Hymn. Fant. Brill. S. Smith. 75
For more advanced players, and skilfully arranged and composed.
- La Belle Helene. Repertoire. Offenbach. 35
La Belle Helene is one of Offenbach's light operas and a favorite. Players will be glad to be familiar with its melodies.
- Kunstler Leben. (Artist life.) Waltz. Strauss. 75 Full of life, and brilliant, of course.
- Une Perle de Varsovie. Fant. Brill. S. Smith. 65
This Smith has forged many silver chains of sound, but here he is among the pearls. We may be sure of a clear lustre when he is the polisher.
- Ukraina Mazurka. Zielinski. 75
Music of the Ukraine, and besides being good, is a novelty, and so desirable.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 699.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 18, 1868.

VOL. XXVII. No. 22.

For Dwight's Journal of Music

Celtic Music.

BY W. S. B. MATHEWS.

NATIONAL MUSIC; Art. III, No. XL. North British Review.

POPULAR MUSIC OF THE OLDEN TIME; Art. III, No. CCXLI. London Quarterly Review.

Articls MUSIC, Encyclopedia Britannica

Articls CELTAE, ibid

IRISH MELODIES, by Moore and Stephenson.

Whoever spends a Sabbath in the country, remote from towns and great routes of travel, more especially in the South, will hear a class of tunes which strike the unaccustomed ear as peculiarly wild. For the most part they are in the minor mode, and have a strange way of modulating. Yet in these curious melodies there is a certain pathos which one will seek for in vain in the more fashionable music. There is reason to believe that these strange old airs are of Celtic origin, and quite different from our common church music. It is here attempted to give some account of their peculiarities.

These airs seem to be naturally divided into three classes. In the first class belong those which are most widely different from our ordinary music. They are derived from this scale, which we consider the true Celtic Minor Scale.

It differs from our usual minor scale in having a major sixth and minor seventh, and in being related to the major key one degree below; whereas the German minor has a minor sixth and major seventh, and is related to the major scale a minor third above. This change in the relation of the sixth and seventh, and the consequent change in modulating to the relative major, account for the peculiarly wild expression that these melodies have to Teutonic ears. We give two melodies as examples. The first is more characteristic than the second. It is called Emory.

The second example is called Kedron.

Another class of these airs do not have the sixth at all, but by their progressions show unmistakably that they are found in the same scale as the preceding. Here again we give two examples. The first is called Tender Thought.

In accordance with the custom, I have given this tune the signature of the relative major, although the characteristic F sharp is not in the melody. The whole tenor of the melodic progression is such, I think, as to indicate the relative major to be G. The second example is like unto it, and is called Solemnity.

Still another class of these airs comprises those which, although founded on the same scale tones as the preceding, bear a relation to the nearest major key more in accordance with the German usage. Here are the two scales:—

Scale of Tender Thought.

Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La, Si, Do, Re.

Scale of Doolbridge.

La, Si, Do, Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La.

Of this class we give also two examples. The first is full of the gloomy pathos we should expect to find in the music of the Druids. The shadows of the oak and mistletoe, and the terrible sacrifices of this religion, are not foreign to such strains. It is called Idumea.

Slowly, with sustained tones

The second example has none of the sombre gloom of Idumea. It has tears, but they are those of affection rather than of grief. It is called Doolbridge.

In comparing these with any Teutonic minor melodies we cannot fail to be struck with the entire absence of that effeminate quality that characterizes the Teutonic minor. Of this effeminacy the Germans have implied their consciousness by their term for distinguishing the minor mode: namely molle, soft. The major they term dur, hard.

There are also Celtic melodies in the major mode. These commonly omit the fourth and seventh tones of the scale; and this has been regarded by some as a distinguishing feature, but, I think, with insufficient reason. Secular melodies of Scotland and Ireland have sometimes both these tones. The following is the Celtic Major Scale. The small notes indicate tones commonly omitted in sacred airs, but used at pleasure in secular.

The minor third seems to be a favorite progression in Celtic music. In the major mode they attain this progression by almost invariably striking the sixth of the scale before the tonic. Two of these melodies follow. The first is called Ebenezer.

The second example is probably the original form of Golden Hill.

The unmistakably Scotch character of this tune will, I think, be apparent to any observer. The inversion of the rhythm in the third measure, ♩ for ♪, is a Scotch peculiarity; and throughout we seem to hear the "benignant hum of that old worthy, the bagpipe," as has been humorously suggested. In the correlation of phrases these airs have the peculiarity that the last phrase is a recapitulation of the first, or something of much the same purport. In Teutonic airs, on the contrary, the correspondence is between the first and third, and second and fourth phrases.

Another noticeable peculiarity is the tendency of the modulations. In this music the favorite modulations are from the major to the relative minor, or from the minor to the relative major. But in German music it is more usual to modulate into the dominant or subdominant of the prevailing key. These modulations are scarcely ever made by Celtic melodies.

There is reason to believe that these Celtic scales are identical with certain ones used by the Greeks. According to the Greek system of musical science there were three genera in music:—the Diatonic, Chromatic, and Enharmonic,—and, omitting certain tones as directed by their scientific writers, their melodic scales were as follows:

DIATONIC SCALE. (Melodic form).

CHROMATIC SCALE. (Melodic form).

ENHARMONIC SCALE. (Melodic form).

The omitted tones were employed whenever, in the judgment of the composer, a good effect would result from their use. By inserting one of the omitted tones—indicated by the small notes—the Diatonic Scale becomes the Celtic Minor Scale in Re. This form of the Chromatic is identical with the Celtic major scale. The Enharmonic gives us the Teutonic minor scale minus the fourth and seventh.

There is another class of tunes found in our church music which are less peculiarly Celtic in structure and spirit than those we have been citing, yet have a very perceptible infusion of the Celtic east. Such are the Lowland tunes of the Scotch. Windsor, Avon, and Aylesbury are examples. Indeed I do not know of a familiar minor melody in all our tune repertory that is unmistakably Teutonic. Somehow, the German minor airs are so effeminate and depend so much upon harmonic support, that they have not been able to win their way to our people's hearts as tunes, simply. Those of them that are apparent exceptions to this sweeping charge are themselves relics of the Celtic races that overrun Germany in ages long gone by. Some of these tunes are evidently remnants of old English carols, which, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, were sung by itinerant minstrels, mostly of Celtic blood. The following air is a case in point.

GOLDEN CITY.

What can be more appropriate than this melody to Barry Cornwall's beautiful lyric, commencing:

"There is a land immortal,
The beautiful of lands:
Beside its ancient portal
A silent sentry stands.
He only can undo it
And open wide the door;
And mortals who pass through it
Are mortals never more."

Those of our readers who are familiar with Helmore's "Carols of the Sixteenth Century" will readily observe the similarity of quaintness between Golden City and the carol "Paul at Athens"* in that book. These carols, be it remembered, were the music of itinerant minstrels. The only itinerants who sing such strains nowadays are those of the white cravat. Can their nomadic life affect their musical taste?

Many of the structured peculiarities of this music may justly be referred, I think, to the fact that from time immemorial the bag-pipe seems to have been the musical instrument of the Celtic race. It certainly was known to the Greeks and Romans, and we are told by Scutonium that Nero, among his various musical accomplishments, was a bag-pipe-player. The well-known peculiarity of this instrument is that one or more tones are kept sounding throughout a musical performance, constituting what is called a drone. The upper tone of the drone is in unison with the lower tone of the chanter—as that part of the instrument is called which plays the melody—while the lower tone is an octave below. This constant buzzing of the tonic requires the whole melody to contain few tones not consonant with it. The Celtic scales are developed from one point of crystallization, the tonic; but Teutonic* scales crystallize around three points: the tonic, subdominant and dominant.

* Also given in Dr. Lowell Mason's "Hallelujah."

It does not appear that the Celts ever practiced part-singing, further than for a portion of the singers to perform a drone while others sang a melody. Like Nature's songsters, the Celts delighted to pour out their souls in tuneful melodies. The more civilized and artificial Tenton, on the contrary, delights in the changing devices of counterpoint and the rich luxuriance of modern harmony. Between two such beautiful charmers how shall we choose?

* Query. Why not Three-tonic, instead of Teutonic?

A Contribution to the History of Oratorio.

BY EMIL NAUMANN.

(Continued from page 164.)

If now we examine Schütz's four Passions, taken from the Gospels, and composed, a capella, when he was in his 81st year, compositions springing from so many artistic elements inherent in the period itself, or handed down by it, and from the harmonic combination of them, which was already taking place in the composer's mind, we cannot help confessing that it was these works which really prepared the ground on which oratorio could be raised to Bach and Handel, its last pinnacles. With the exception of the congregational part, we here find strongly marked the musical elements and the spirit characterizing Sebastian Bach's Matthäus-Passion. Here, as there, the separate personages introduced speaking the text of the Bible are, in opposition to the previous four-part system adopted for the whole Passion, treated as single voices, that is: represented by a recitative-like, or melodic, solo, though the form is scantier with Schütz than with Bach. In Schütz's Matthäus-Passion, this solo treatment rises on one occasion even into a formal and regularly finished "Duet of the false Witnesses." As was the case in Bach, and sometimes in the Mysteries before him, the narrating Evangelist, also, is musically personified. But the similarity between these two German composers, separated from each other by an entire century, is most astonishingly evident in the short "Jews' choruses," coming in with great dramatic effect, and full of passionate emotion, in the Passions according to St. Matthew of both. The parts of these choruses, consisting of musical exclamations, or characteristically and sharply marked tone-phrases, are, when examined in score, like each other, even as far as the eye is concerned, to say nothing of the fanatically enroaching and aggressive spirit embodied in them. In Schütz no less than in Bach, immediately Christ is introduced speaking, there is a wonderfully glorious and overflowing handling of the melody in the recitative, besides much more we might mention. But one great difference between them is that Schütz, who, considering when he lived, may be placed side by side with Bach even as an instrumental composer; was the greatest and first operatic composer, in Germany, while Bach was limited to sacred and instrumental music. Schütz was, therefore, there can be no question—though the fact in no way detracts from Bach's greatness—the more varied and more objective of the two masters, and for this reason we can speak of his subsequently exerting an influence upon Handel, who, for plastic objectivity, was superior to the ideal Bach. Only, as we shall see later, those Christian and classical elements, that Schütz, in his Operas and Passions, kept tolerably distinct, were destined to be blended by Handel in one and the same kind of work, namely, Oratorio, which, in consequence, then first rose to all the importance of a musical epic.*

Among Schütz's successors in Germany, we must distinguish Sebastiani, born at Weimar in 1622, died 1672. His Passion was probably the first in Germany that could boast of a complete instrumental accompaniment; 2 violins, 4 viols, 1 basso continuo, with organ, lutes, theorbos, and viola di gauba. We must likewise mention Johann Theile, born 1646, at Naumburg (the reader will remark that Saxony and Thuringia were still the scene of the development of this entire branch of art), died 1724.

While these two masters, who belonged principally to the 17th century, remained faithful to what in a German sense was a national tendency, as exemplified for oratorio in the retention of Luther's rendering of the text of the Gospel, a rendering so well adapted to the sentiments of Protestantism, and in the addition of a new and popular element, by the introduction of the congregational part in the form of those chorales, with which the people were all acquainted, and which they had sung for a century, we perceive oratorio at the same period in Italy becoming more and more restricted to art music properly so called, and a public previously schooled to understand it. The most eminent masters in this style are Marco Marazzoli, born at Parma, in 1600, died 1662, who produced about twenty oratorios; and the great Alessandro Searlatti, born at Trapani, Sicily, in 1659, died at Naples in 1725.

With the beginning of the 18th century we meet in Germany the forerunners of Handel; among others, Reinhard Keiser. This musician—born in a village between Weissenfels and Leipzig in 1673, died at Hamburg in 1739—rendered good service, by the way, to the development of opera in Germany. We possess no less than 116 works of a dramatic nature by him. He was, also, very fertile in the sphere of Oratorio, including oratorio itself and a cantata allied to it. We may mention his Christmas Cantata; his Passion on a poem by Broekes; his Passion according to the Gospel of St. Matthew, and his oratorios: Der für die Sünde der Welt gemarterte Jesus (Jesus the Martyr for the Sins of the World); Der zum Tode verurtheilte und gekreuzigte Jesus (Jesus condemned to Death and crucified), &c.—Mattheson, too, born in 1681 at Hamburg, died in 1764, who wrote 21 oratorios, and Telemann, born in 1681 at Magdeburg, died in 1767, though both saw the light of the world only three years before Handel, and so were friends of his, must be counted among his forerunners.*

To prove this, we need only remind the reader that Handel did not seriously devote himself to Oratorio till he had attained the age of fifty, while most of the labors of Mattheson and Telemann in the same field are to be referred to the middle age of both, and consequently may have influenced what Handel did.

While calling these men forerunners of Handel, we would not be misunderstood. Just as little can Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, or even Marlow, when regarded from a higher point of view, be termed the forerunners of Shakespeare, with whom all they have in common is merely a general likeness in the form, the persons, and the language of their pieces, a superficial connection of affinity, as regards the selection and treatment of their subjects, and a

* That Schütz carefully preserved this distinction is proved by the fact, among other things, that, notwithstanding he was one of the greatest instrumental composers of his time, and, as is shown by his Symphona Sacra written under earlier Italian influences, had formerly employed instrumental music in sacred compositions, he again, like the old masters, composed entirely a capella. How soon the epic element began to stir in him is demonstrated by works of his, which do not properly belong to the department of Oratorio, but which not only are related to it by name, but in spirit as well. Thus the first part of his Sacred Concertos, published at Leipzig in 1633, contains four songs for one voice with instrumental accompaniment, and these songs are characteristically described as, "in stilo oratorio."

* Among Mattheson's Oratorios, there are two Passions; among those of Telemann's, on the other hand, we find 44 specimens of Passion-music (some in the Cantata form), a Death of Jesus; a Resurrection of the Lord; a Resurrection of Zaccharias; The Shepherds at Bethlehem; Jerusalem Delivered; The Messiah; and a Last Judgment.

vague kind of family resemblance, characterizing generally their time and nation. Keiser, Mattheson, and Telemann did not furnish Handel with more than canvass, colors, and frames, that is, so to speak, the materials with which the great master was to work. In this instance, also, it is merely the outward habit which connects with immortal genius these men, who, however eminent in their own day, possessed only talent. With regard, however, to pregnancy of ideas, to realization and idealization of artistic form, to depth of feeling, or grandeur of sentiment, their productions compared to Handel's are like copper to gold.

Before considering the position occupied by Handel, whom we feel inclined to regard as the father of epic tone-poetry in the real and more restricted sense of the word, we have to say a few words concerning the place of his great contemporary, Sebastian Bach, with reference to Oratorio.

Johann Sebastian Bach, who, as we all know, was born in 1685, at Eisenach, and died at Leipzig in 1750, represents the acme of all Christian sacred music, as developed from the introduction of the Gregorian cantus planus, about the end of the 16th century till past the beginning of the 18th, that is: the last blossom of a development of more than a thousand years. We find, therefore, in his works, the results won by the great Netherlandish, Italian, and German masters, on the Roman Catholic side, in the 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, that is to say: before, contemporaneously with, and after the Reformation, in formal, artistic, and deeply intensive religious expression, and we find them combined with the evangelical and popular spirit peculiar to Protestant church music, which sprang from the song and the choral, the Passion Plays and the Passion Oratorios.* It is, therefore, self-evident that the master's tone-poems, epic as regards their form, but frequently dramatic, if we consider their passionate expression: his Matthaus-Passion, and his Johannes-Passion, like all other vocal works of his, must be permeated by a touch of thoroughly lyrical feeling, since such, as we have already shown, was innate in all church-music. What strikes us as dramatic are only the outbursts of pity, pain, idealized love, or sorrow in the composer's heart, worked up by him, on contemplating the martyrdom of the Lord, to the uttermost limits of feeling. We may mention as exemplifying what we have said, the tumultuous, and apparently so dramatic chorus, "Sind Blitze, sind Donner verschwunden," in the Matthaus-Passion, a chorus which is no more than the echo of the commotion in Bach's own mind, and the ideal congregation connected with him. But, looking back beyond Bach's master-piece, we can see the connection again with a more remote period of artistic-religious edification, which merely expressed itself in a more childlike and simple manner. In an old French Mystery, the Angels address to God the Father, who is sunk in slumber during the Crucifixion of his Son, the furious words: "Seigneur, n'avez-vous pas honte d'oublier tellement votre fils?"—We cannot, it is true, deny that the "Jews' Chorus" in the Matthaus-Passion is characterized by thoroughly dramatic life, but this, also, springs from a state of the composer's soul, wrought up by subjective emotion. Bach is so absorbed in contemplating the sufferings and the death of our Lord that the whole chain of events has become a fact immediately present to him, and is, therefore, portrayed to his inward vision in plastic fullness, and with the most expressive animation. The events on which not merely his own salvation but that of the whole world depends, are no more events long since past: he himself is an eye-witness of them, he feels them as directly actual and true. Thus his highly wrought mode of expression appears to be no more than the other side of that religious lyricism and ecstasy which is mirrored in the devout chorales, sometimes carried to too great a pitch of painful emotion in the treatment of the vocal parts; in the airs and duets, or even in the manner, so profoundly lyrical, in which the recitative of the narrating Evangelist is treated. If we remember, in conjunction with this, the way, characterized now, as it were, by timidity, now by growing confidence, and now again by child-like endearments, with which Bach addresses the Saviour, as he would his dearest friend, using such expressions, for instance, as "Ruhe sanfte, sanfte ruh," at the conclusion of the Matthaus-Passion; in the cantata: Gottes Zeit; or in the cantata of that son who possessed, perhaps, more inward affinity with him than any of the others, Christian Bach (1735—1782), "Ich lasse Dich nicht," where the soprano voices exclaim so fervently: "Mein Jesu!" besides asseverating with the whole chorus: "Ich lasse Dich nicht" we must feel convinced beyond a doubt that Bach was connected only in a secondary degree with epic poetry. This is apparent, moreover, from the limited number of his oratorios. Properly speaking, we possess only two, since we can scarcely include the Christmas Cantata among them. In these two works, also, Christ appears as the personal object of the love of Bach's soul, its friend and rock—as the one only central point of his thoughts and feelings.

How different it is with Handel, with whom we may conclude our sketch, since he stands before us as the real founder of the musical Epic, and, at the same time—like Homer—as the model, which never has been, and probably never will be, surpassed, of this whole branch of art.

The profound and characteristic difference between Bach and Handel is this: Bach represents the highest pitch to which the development of oratorio can attain under purely Christian influences only; Handel, on the other hand, is the very highest master of the style that of necessity resulted from the alliance of Christian civilization and humanity with the traditions of classical culture and views as handed down through the period of the Renaissance. If, consequently, Bach excels Handel in Evangelical enthusiasm, as well as in fervor of expression, if, in a far more subjective and more passionate manner, he gives himself up to Christ as the ideally Beloved One of his soul, that is to say, if he deserves to be called the first in every instance where the composer steps into the foreground with his own personal feeling, in Handel, on the other hand, we are first struck with that objectivity and varied power of exposition which, while seizing on the most opposite subjects with equally inexhaustible plastic capability, marks the epic poet whom we forget in his work; in Handel we are first struck with that greatness and boldness, that glowing heroism, distinguishing alike the hero, and him who sings the hero's deeds. It was, therefore, Handel who first showed us in music as in other arts, the epic tone-poem in all the purity of its kind, that is, freed from everything tending to restrict the work of art. This fact is the more significant, because, though, as we have already remarked, Oratorio was more favorable to transcendental subjects than the Epic, the Oratorio was not destined to gain the genuine epic type, before the national and heroic element took the place of sentiment more particularly subjective as the essence of the whole composition. As a matter of course, a great national deed, or a hero in all his sublimity, is not conceivable without a God, without moral precepts, and ideal grandeur, to which, in the case of Handel, must be added the fact that the class of subjects previously prevailing in oratorio, as well as his own feeling, caused him to find the most lofty theme, and the source of all that is great in the one primitive God of the Old and New Testament. But in the very fact that he did not treat that God merely according to the New Testament, or evangelically: not, in a word, merely canonically and subjectively, like Sebastian Bach, lies Handel's many-sidedness. For him the God of Joshua, Jephtha, Samson, and Solomon, though in his essence the same, is not, according to the period and nation portrayed by Handel, the New Testament God of The Messiah, but the national God of Israel, conceived entirely in the spirit of the Old Testament: a zealous God, who, by his miracles, though still more by the arms of the heroes aroused by him, shatters the Heathen like potshards; a God who takes vengeance even unto the third and fourth generation, leading His chosen people from punishment and repentance to victory and triumph. While, however, in the composer's soul, the humanity resulting from his Christian culture is wedded to the Heroic principle, he raises the story of the Jewish heroes, as Homer raises the Iliad, to the Universally-Human, or the absolutely Beautiful and Sublime. In the morally elevated and pure enthusiasm of such choruses as "O maeh' uns frei, von unserer Feinde Tyrannie!" in Julus Maccabaeus, or the nobly moderated delight at victory in the triumphal song, "See the conquering Hero comes," from Joshua, the most civilized people of the present day, thinking of the struggle for their freedom, or surrounding their hero after a well-won battle, might take part.

(Conclusion next time).

Schubert's Symphony in C.

From the Crystal Palace Programme.

The estimation in which the instrumental works of Schubert are now held in England is a remarkable instance of a sudden growth of reputation after a long period of neglect. Twenty years ago, it is not too much to say, that, except to an almost infinitesimal fraction of the English musical public, Schubert was known only as a writer of songs. No concert programme, even of the most dite of the musical societies, at that time ever included a sonata, a quartet, or a trio of his. His Symphony in C major had been rejected with ridicule by the leading band of the metropolis, even though presented to them by no less a judge than Mendelssohn himself—in fact, his existence as an instrumental writer was absolutely unknown to the public. Since that time, however, things have materially altered for the better. Schubert's Sonatas, Impromptus, Moments musicales, and other pianoforte works, are among the stock favorites at our most popular concerts, and divide the honors with those of Beethoven himself. His Quartets and Trios are now constantly heard, and within the last few years his great orchestral works are beginning to force their way to that high level in the popular favor to which their great merits and beauties fully entitle them. Of the last mentioned works the most important are his Symphonies. Of these he left behind him—in a more or less perfect state—nine, of which the following is a complete list:—

- No. 1, in D major
- " 2, in B flat, 1815
- " 3, in D, 1815
- " 4, in C minor—"Tragische Sinfonie,"—1816.
- " 5, in B flat, 1816.
- " 6, in C major, 1818
- " 7, in E, 1821
- " 8, in B minor, 1822.
- " 9, in C major, 1828—the year of his death

Of these, all but two (Nos. 7 and 8) are complete. Of No. 8, the two first movements alone were finished. The MS., as clean and unblotted as any fair transcript by a copyist, but with a singular grace and neatness in the writing, which marks the hand of the dear composer himself, breaks off abruptly at the 9th bar of the scherzo.

The allegro and andante were lately published, and are well known to the audience of the Crystal Palace Concerts, having been performed on the 6th April and 5th October last. No. 7 exists (if, indeed, it still exists), only in a sketch. It was last heard of in the possession of Mendelssohn, who is said to have contemplated, or evening commenced scoring it; but it would appear that it is no longer to be found among his remains. No. 9, the work—which is to be played to-day, was published at the instance of Schumann and Mendelssohn, in 1840. The remaining six are still in MS., in a dusty cupboard, in the house of Dr. Schneider, a well-known amateur of Vienna; and there the writer had the honor and pleasure of examining them during a visit to that city, which he was recently enabled to make through the kindness of the Directors of the Crystal Palace, always ready to adopt any suggestions for increasing the interest and worth of the Saturday Concerts. Dr. Schneider was good enough to permit copies of Nos. 4 and 6 to be taken, and it is hoped that before long an opportunity will occur of presenting some portions, at least, of one or both to the Crystal Palace audience, and thus effecting a revival hardly less interesting than that of Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony. I take the opportunity to mention that in the same cupboard I was fortunate enough to discover the whole nine numbers of Schubert's music to the drama of Rosamunde—of which portions have been already played here—in the original part-books, lying as they had probably lain since the first representations at the Theater an der Wien, 1823.

* Let the reader recollect the "Crucifixus" or the "Incarnatus" in Bach's B minor Mass, reminding us of the most powerful things done in this way by the great Venetian Lotti (1695—1749), and place them by the side of pieces from the purely Evangelical and Germanic expression of the Cantata: Gottes Zeit, and of the two Passions, or remember, in conjunction with the glorification—casting into shade the adoration of the Virgin by the best Roman Catholic masters—his "Magnificat," his arch-Protestant Christmas Cantata.

The original MS. of the Grand Symphony, No. 9, in C major, which is played to-day, is in the library of the Musik-Verein, in Vienna, where I examined it in company with Mr. Sullivan. The volume consists of 218 pages of oblong quarto. The handwriting, like Schubert's usual autograph, is perfectly neat and distinct, except where it has been altered by the composer. The alterations are confined almost entirely to the first three movements, but in these they abound. The fact of their existence at all is remarkable, because in general Schubert did not make alterations. His scores are usually very free from them. He appears to have written under the influence of a kind of immediate inspiration, without rough sketches or any of the other processes to which great musicians commonly resort—as Michael Angelo is said to have hewn his statues straight from the marble; and when once written he appears, as a rule, not to have returned to his work. Indeed, the rapidity with which his compositions succeeded one another was enough to render this impossible. In the opera of Fierrabras, the 1st act, consisting of 304 large pages, fully scored, was written in six days, between the 25th and 31st May, 1823; the 2nd act, 300 pages, in five days—between the 31st May and the 5th June. The last movement of one of his quartets, by no means restricted in length, was dashed off in the dead of a night in three hours and a half, the hour and minute of beginning and ending being carefully marked by Schubert himself. And as each of these compositions was no sooner completed than his fiery genius hurried him on to another, it is obvious that he could have had no opportunity of correcting. The C major Symphony, however, alone of all his symphonies, is an exception to this rule. He seems to have felt that it was to be his last and greatest work, and to have acted accordingly. Six years had passed since he threw off the two beautiful fragments in B minor above referred to. The interval was occupied by chamber music, operas, and vocal music of all descriptions; and now that he resumed the highest order of orchestral composition, the end was fatally near. This Symphony was almost literally the Song of the Swan. It was composed in March, and on the 19th November he was no longer alive. Was it some presentiment or approaching departure that made him so unusually careful to elaborate and correct his work? The first three movements are crowded with after-thoughts—the lovely opening phrase for the horns, which forms the theme of the introduction, has been altered; so has the subject of the allegro—and that after a considerable part of the movement was completed, so that the correction has had to be made over and over again. In the candante there are many alterations of minor moment; but the most remarkable of all is in the scherzo (pp. 173, 174, of the printed score), where a most original and characteristic effect is produced by the sudden introduction of a new melody, which after being played by the flute in the key of C flat, is then repeated by the oboe and first violin in C natural, a change which has an irresistible charm. The whole of this passage (twenty bars) is absolutely an after-thought, being crammed in between the lines of the music previously written. The fiery finale alone is free from corrections, the hand of the composer seeming to have hurried over it at as rapid a pace as that of the glorious music itself.

It is impossible in the limits of a concert programme to give any description or criticism of the entire work. Nor is it less difficult to single out any part of so splendid a work as this Symphony for especial notice, where all parts are alike full of beauty and greatness. But if the writer may be allowed to mention that which affects him most, he would say that the opening and the finale are, perhaps (though in entirely opposite ways), the most moving. There is something inexpressibly magical in the soft opening phrase by the horns alone, with the entrance of the strings at its close. In the slow movement there is a wonderfully touching passage, where the horn sounds faintly note after note, while the rest of the orchestra is all hushed and still, as if an angel had descended into the room and were gliding about among the instruments. But splendid as are the others, they are all eclipsed by the finale, which is one of the most glorious, if not the most glorious movement in the whole realm of music. It is one burst of impetuous passion from beginning to end, with a rhythm so strongly marked that it is impossible to resist its influence.

Nothing is said in any of Schubert's letters of his intention in this movement, or what picture or image

(if any) he had in his mind. But a legend exists in the possession of the writer, which, if of somewhat doubtful authenticity (as legends often are), may perhaps be pardoned as not inappropriate to the case. According to this legend, then, the finale represents the story of Phaeton and the Horses of the Sun. It opens with a clang of the wood and brass instrument and an airy loftiness well befitting an interview between two divinities on Olympus. His request granted, Phaeton mounts the chariot and tries a canter round with the horses. Then off they go, the team pulling hard, as horses of the sun should pull. Once or twice he manages to arrest their pace, but only for a time, and they soon resume their furious career. Then comes a passage, descending and diminishing, which conveys to perfection the feeling of the western sun, slanting down to the ocean. After this, the second part of the movement begins, and with it begin Phaeton's difficulties. The day is dying, and the chill airs of evening begin to blow from the sea. The steeds won't pull together, and begin to plunge and kick. At last off they start together, the luckless youth can no longer control them, and the movement ends with the tremendous plunge of team, chariot, and charioteer, into the waters of the Adriatic.—So far the legend, which each may accept or reject at will. But Phaeton or no Phaeton, all will allow that the finale is a perfect marvel of spirit and impetuosity, worthy to be the embodiment of any story.

Vocal Music.

(From "The Voice in Singing," from the German of EMMA SEILER.)

It is a matter of complaint among all persons of good taste, who take an intelligent interest in art, and especially in music, that fine singers are becoming more and more rare, while formerly there appears never to have been any lack of men and women eminent in this art. The complaint seems not altogether without reason, when we revert to that rich summer-time of song, not yet lying very far behind us, in the last half of the last century, and compare it with the present. The retrospect shows us plainly that the art of singing has descended from its former high estate, and is now in a condition of decline. When we consider what is told us in the historical works of Forkel, Burney, Kiesewetter, Brendel and others, and compare it with our present poverty in good voices and skilful artists, we are struck with the multitude of fine voices then heard, with their remarkable fullness of tone, as well as with the considerable number of singers—male and female—appearing at the same time.

 It appears that far greater demands were made upon singers then than now-a-days. At least, history celebrates, together with the great vocal flexibility of the earlier singers, the measured beauty of their singing, the noble tone, the thoroughly cultivated delivery, by which they showed themselves true artists, and produced upon their hearers, an effect almost miraculous.

On the other hand, how sad is the condition of vocal music in our time! How few artistically cultivated voices are there! And the few that there are, how soon they are used up and lost! Artists like Lind, and more recently Trebelli, are exceptions to be made.

Mediocre talent is now often sought, and rewarded far beyond its desert. One is often tempted to think that the public at large has wellnigh lost all capacity of judgment, when he witnesses the representation of one of our operas. Let a singer, male or female, only draw the notes sentimentally one into another, execute a tremolo upon prolonged notes, introduce very often the softest piano and just where it is entirely out of place, growl out the lowest notes in the roughest timbre, and scream out the high notes lustily, and he or she may reckon with certainty upon the greatest applause. In fact, we have become so easily pleased that even an impure execution is suffered to pass without comment. Let the personal appearance of the singer only be handsome and prepossessing, he need trouble himself little about his art in order to win the favor of the public. This decline of the art of singing is usually ascribed to the want of good voices, and this poverty of voices to our altered modes of living. To me it appears as the natural consequence of the whole manner and way in which the art of singing has been historically developed since its earlier high state of perfection.

 The art of singing rose in the course of the seventeenth century to an extraordinary height of cultivation, and was diffused more and more by means of the opera, then blooming, as we have said, into beauty. But in that brilliant spring-time of vocal art, it was not mere externals, such as beauty of tone, flexibility, etc., that were striven for, but, above all, the correct expression of the feeling intended in the composition. This rendered necessary to the singer the most thorough æsthetic culture, going hand in hand with the culture of the vocal organ. For only thus could he succeed in acting upon the souls of his hearers, in moving them and carrying them along with him in the emotions which the music awakened in his own mind. The dramatic singer was now strongly tempted to neglect the externals of his art for the æsthetic, purely inward conception of the music. Certain, at least, it is that to the neglect of the training of the voice (Tonbildung), and to the style of writing of our modern composers—a style unsuited to the art of singing, and looking only to its spiritual element—the decline of this art is in part to be traced. Mannstein says that, with the disappearance of those great singing masters, power and beauty have fallen more and more into contempt, and at the present day it is scarcely known what is meant by them. True it is, that a beautiful tone of voice (Gesangston), which must be considered the foundation and first requisition of fine singing, is more and more rare among our singers, male and female, and yet it is just as important in music as perfect form in the creations of the sculptor.

But the complete technical education of the earlier singers misled many of them into various unnatural artifices, in order to obtain notice and distinction. The applause of the public caused such trickeries to become the fashion among artists. The multitude, accustomed to such effects, began to mistake them for art. By the gradual disappearance of the male sopranists, instruction in singing fell into the hands of tenor singers, who usually cultivated the female voice in accordance with their own voices, which could not be otherwise than injurious in the uncertainty existing as to the limits in compass and the difference between the male and female organs of voice. As, in our days, people are apt to imagine that they know all about it and are ready to undertake anything, and as teaching in singing is generally best paid, the office has been undertaken by many persons who had not the slightest idea what thorough acquaintance with the organs of singing, what comprehensive knowledge of all the departments of music and what æsthetic and general culture, the teacher of singing requires. Very few persons indeed clearly understand what is meant by the education of a voice, and with what qualifications teacher and pupil should be satisfied. The idea, for instance, is very prevalent that every musician, whatever may be the branch of music to which he is devoted, and especially every singer, is qualified to give instruction in singing. And therefore a dilettantism without precedent has taken the place of all real artistic endeavor. Be this, however, as it may, such is the wide diffusion and popularity of music beyond all the other arts, that the want of singers artistically educated, and consequently also of a recognized sound method of instruction, becomes more and more urgent; and although we have in these times distinguished singers, male and female, as well as skilful teachers, yet the number is very small and by no means equal to the demand.

But now, as every evil, as soon as it is felt to be such, calls forth the means of its removal, already in various ways attempts are making in the department of the art of singing to restore it as perfectly as possible to its former high position, and if possible to elevate it to a yet higher condition. It was natural that the attempt should, first of all, be made to revive the old Italian method of instruction, and that, by strict adherence in everything to what has come down to us by tradition, we should hope for deliverance and salvation; for to the Italians mainly vocal music was indebted for its chief glory. Without considering in what a sadly superficial way music—and vocal music especially—is now treated in Italy, many have given in to the erroneous idea that any Italian who can sing anything must know how to educate a voice. Thus many incompetent Italians have become popular teachers in other countries.

The old Italian method of instruction, to which vocal music owed its high condition, was purely empirical, i. e. the old singing masters taught only according to a sound and just feeling for the beautiful, guided by that faculty of acute observation, which enabled them to distinguish what belongs to nature. Their pupils learned by imitation, as children learn their mother tongue, without troubling themselves about rules. But after the true and natural way has once been forsaken, and for so long a period only the false and the unnatural has been heard and taught, it seems almost impossible by empiricism alone to restore the old and proper method of teaching. With our higher degree of culture, men and things have greatly changed. Our feeling is no longer sufficiently simple and natural to distinguish the true without the help of scientific principles.

But science has already done much to assist the formation of musical forms of art. Mathematics and physics have established the principal laws of sound and the processes of sound, in accordance with which our musical instruments are now constructed. Philosophical inquirers have succeeded also in discovering the eternal and impregnable laws of Nature upon which the mutual influences of melody, harmony and rhythm depend, and in thus giving to composition fixed forms and laws which no one ventures to question. And more recently Professor Helmholtz, in his great work, "Die Lehre von den Tonempfindungen," has given to music of all kinds a scientific ground and basis. But for the culture of the human voice in singing science has as yet furnished only a few lights. The well-known experiments of Johannes Müller upon the larynx gave us all that was known, until very recently, respecting the functions of the organ of singing. Many singing masters have sought to found their methods of instruction upon these observations on the larynx, at the same time putting forth the boldest conjectures in regard to the functions of the organ of singing in the living subject. But they have thus ruined more fine voices than those teachers who, without reference to the formation of the voice, only correct the musical faults of their pupils, and for the rest let them sing as they please.

This superficial treatment of science, and the unfortunate results of its application, have injured the art of singing more than benefited it, and created a prejudice against all scientific investigations in this quarter among the most distinguished artists and teachers, as well as among those who take an intelligent interest in this department of music. It is a pretty common opinion that science can do little for the improvement of music, and nothing for the culture and preservation of the voice in singing. And the habit of regarding science and art as opposed to each other renders it extremely difficult to secure a hearing for the results of thorough scientific inquiry in this direction.

