The state of the levee demands the serious attention of the city authorities and the council-particularly of the committee on levees, from whom no report has been pre ented during the ecason. tences arising from this neglect are annoying and oppressive? Why is the leves incumbered with offensive lumber of all kinds, mud, timber, paving stones, and many etceteras of fith, that prevent transhipments? Why are goods allowed to remain on the leves long beyond the period specified by the city ordinances?

When these questions are answerd, or the indicated evils remedied, we may propose other interrogatories. We shall he pleased to insert the complaints of our fellow citizens on these or other existing abuses.

THE TOWER OF RESCE by Meesers Dumes and Guillardet is one of the most appalling of modern dramas; and as re.

is one of the most appalling of modern dramas; and as represented at the American theatre in this city, its interest has rathed been increased by the alteration in the denouement, and the softening of the more objectionable of its features.

Bu'wer in his: France' gives a very good account of the details of the plot, and of the merits of the drama; but not having a copy of that work before us, we may be permitted to give a succinct synopsis.

The tower of Nesle was one of those feudatory castles where crimes might be perpetrated with impunity. A college now stands on its site, on the banks of the Seine. The period of the drama is laid in the dark ages. Margaret of Burgundy is represented as the wife of Lonis the 10th of France. Taking advantage of his absence she committed the 'oldest kind of crimes, the newest kind of ways;' had promps and panders to administer to her sensual pleasures—

Among my most intimate associates at the Bar, I enterfrence along my most intimate associates at the Bar, I enterfrenced in more sincere astesin for Antoina Lucroux, a young Frenchman about my own age, than for any other. This, as first was a bout my own age, than for any other. Thus, as first was a bout my own age, than for any other. Thus, as first was a first was a family name, which for more reason or other, he chore to conceal. Ho was an orrepressed to the senior and fer having recreated to this country in th pumps and panders to administer to her sensual pleasuresand assassins to execute her deadly beheats. The former decayed paramours every night to the tower of Neale; the latter butchered them when her lust was gratified, and cast their bodies into the river.

The drains opens with one of those decors of Philip Daul pay, a young nobleman arrived in Paris from the provinces on a visit to his brother Walter a courtier and lover of the queen-accompanied by a Captain Buridan. Daulnay and Buridan accept and keep the assignation; but Margaret was so pleased with the passionate arder of Philip that she wished to exempt him from the customary fate of her nocturnal paramours, till he scratched her face as a mark of recognition to prevent which had been all the deaths ordered; and now Phil.p's among the rest. Buridan escapes with a testimony of the assassination, written by Philip with his own blood on his tablit-which he subsequently confides to Walfer, as an incitement to vengeance. These brothers were, the sons of Buridan and Margaret by an early intercourse before the marriage of the latter, when the former was a page at her father's court; and ere both to secrete their crime had perpetrared the murder of that father. This deadty crime converted the sensual love of Buridan into profound hatred? and he exiled himself for many years. He knew not what c had become of his children; but he knew the destiny of Margaret; and had gone to take advantage of his secret, to work on the fears of the queen regent that he might be appointed prime minister, ere the return of the king; and then consummate the revenge of his hatred by an ample disclosure of her crimes.

It a visc accord from the court, the court of the king; and then consummants the revenge of his hatred by an ample disclosure of her crimes.

which had been written siter my own dictation, and with the nicest regard to future peace, but he even went so far in detection of her guilt, if she acted foully by him, and did not make him prime minister as a boon to keep her secret. She signed the warrant for his installation, and the death of his predecessor, but immediately afterwards working on the archious love of Walter (who had arrived at the tower to look for the corse of his brother), she acquires possession of the accusing tablet. Then he triumphed in her turn; and ordered Walter to arrest Buridan, who is instantly imprissioned. But the captain recognizing the turnkey as an old fendal vassal, bribbe him as a ready agent to seize possession of a certain box containing the proofs of the particide of a certain box containing the proofs of the particide of him. Margaret; and to present them in person next day to the king on his return. Curiosity and the pride of triumph throws off his incognite, and again proves himself the supenor designing villain. Her apprehensions release and restors him to his station as prime minister. This prison scene is admirably intense in representation.

That his hate might be more exprisitely vengeful he prosured the banishment of Walter Danlage, to whom that queen was so much attached; and feigned as a reason to Margaret a return of his youthful love for her, by which h prevailed on her to make an assignation with him at the tower of Neele. Both agreed, each intending the death of the other-Margaret having prepared her hired assassins ? and Buridan obtaining the order of the king to his guard to arrest all found in the tower. Buridan sends Walter to the queen, the better to accomplish the ruin of both; but learning in the interval, that Philip and Walter Daulnay were calm h both his own sone by the queen, the feelings of the father conquer those of the villain; and he hastens to prevent the effects of his schemes. He arrived too late: for he has scarcely entered the room through the window, ere the death ntended for him is perpetrated by the assassing on Walter, who staggers into the room as a memento of lust and murde to his own parents. In the Prench drama, both are immewithout any aid from poet c sentiments or grandiloquent fanguage to which no pretence is made; and are wildly fearful, sufficient to arrest and maintain the attention of the most lethargic or supine. Sympathy for the villanies portrayed is not sought nor coded; and after the denouement the auditor awakes as if from a trance in which he has been a passive agent in a dreadful drama.

The Tower of Nesle will this evening be performed for th benefit of Mr Russell, being the last performance of the

A calm observer of the affects on our cilizens of satirical works published by foreigners-particularly those of Great Britain, must be amused if not annoyed at the anxiety and recrimination evinced, yet also at the singular avidity with which such works are purchased and perused; for unfuring nately the national vanity of our citizens predominates greatly over what should be their national pride. They are perfectly indifferent concerning detailed accounts of their historical evente; of the natural beauties and resources of their country; and of the extraordinary progresses they have

The clerks in the office of the auditor's department of the treasury at Washington have presented a very compliment tary letter of approbation to Autos Krinnars, Esq; and in his reply he honorably and candidly appeals to them if he has ever endeavored at any time to coerce or direct their political ppinions, or sought to render the duties of his office subservient to politics—as had been alleged.

This affords the best answer to those expring politicians who meanly measure ethers by their own standard; and wish to have it believed that Mr Kendall will render the postoffic department a political engine. We have not the least uspit cim of such an object or design; nor can we be persuaded that any candidly believe that assertion, who know the horizontal correct of Mr Kendall, beloved by his acquaintance; and but rev 1 d by those who dread the results of his action who design to assail the designs of one whose first act in his office has to assail the designs of one whose first act in his office has to assail the designs of one whose first act in his office has to assail the designs of one whose first act in his office has to assail the designs of one whose first act in his office has been to remedy and prevent existing shusee; to present fair competition; and to elevate the credit and utility of that establishment. This is not the mode of action that would be adopted by one solicitous to accomplish covert designs.

Several days e apsed and no answer came. It was then, that, unknown to me, Lacroix despatched, on the heels of the challenge, a letter of fatal import to his own safety; and the chait enge, a fetter of ratal import to his own safety; and, without even consulting his second, posted throughout the city the name of his enemy, bestowing upon it the most opprobleus epitheta. When I first saw him after this he ria ly seemed beside himself with excess of anger; for stil tra ly seeme! Three evenings af or, passing near the house of the District Attorney, I saw his dead body borne along, the blood orzing from a wound received in the head.

'Who did it?' said one of the crowd.

Young Lacroix, was the reply.
I waited to here no more, but flew in a panic of to his own parents. Solide, but he gratefully declined the "a", adding that he thought his case too clear and simula to need the sid of any one. It was with great difficulty that I could induce him to permit me to cross question the witnesser:

His speech, unlike what we would expect from a French-mun, was shirt and dispassionate, and addressed itself almost entirely to the understanding of the jury :— Gentlement were his closing words when we or those of whom we are the representatives, yielded to society a certain portion of our personal liberty, it was an the extress condition that it should be secredly and effectually guarded. The month thereof is that such beams to be the case, be it through the waskings or an willingness of the law, that moment reman't thered; a that such because to be the care, we man't thered; a that such the law, that moment rether weakness or unwillingness of the law, that moment reverts to us our own original right to protect ourselves in our way and at every hazard. Among other things thrown under the common shield, was our house. This society has proved itself totally inadequate to save from insult. To you therefore, to me, or to our next neighbour, as the case may be, returns this precious deposit, dearer far than life and properly—things which the law can defend, to be held in the day appointed for execution.

When that day arrived, by his own request, I accompanied him to the scaffold. Our other companion was a pions and intelligent elergyman, the intimate friend of both, who had attended him since the hour of condemnation. I had frequently because nation. I had frequently been present at their interviews, and always found Lacroix tractable on every point but onc. He could not be persuaded to express the slightest contistion for the deed he was to expire with his life. "Yos," he would sometimes say, "you may prove its heinousness, from Holy Writ itself, if you choose, but do henousness, from Holy Writ itself, if you choose, but do not attempt it, unless you are willing, for the sake of cherishing a aprout, to tear up the parent plant. For nothing under Heaven, whatever he its oligin, can ever convince the that I have done wrong."

On our solenn route, the good and faithful man made what supposed the last, and certainly a most powerful, appeal to mortal hopes and fears, but in vain. Arrived at tile dreadful spot, "My dearest friend, said Legrix to me, may Heaven reward you, for I cannot, for love and faithfulness which stand the test of such an hour as this To me the disgrace is nothing, as no human being knowe who or what I am, and from you may God in his mercy avert every evil!
