And now she hovers, like a star, between
Her deeds of love, her Saviour on the cross!

Beneath the cares of earth she does not bow,
Though she hath oft-times drained its bitter cup,
But ever wanders on with heavenward brow,
And eyes whose lovely lids are lifted up!
She feels that in that lovelier, happier sphere,
Her bosom yet will, bird-like, find its mate,
And all the joys it found so blissful here
Within that spirit-realm perpetuate.

Yet sometimes o'er her trembling heart-strings thrill
Soft sighs, for raptures it hath ne'er enjoyed;
And then she dreams of love, and strives to fill
With wild and passionate thoughts the craving void.
And thus she wanders on,—half sad, half blest,—
Without a mate for the pure, lonely heart,
That, yearning, throbs within her virgin breast,
Never to find its lovely counterpart!

JANE T. WORTHINGTON.

THIS lady, the wife of Dr. F. A. Worthington, a physician of Ohio, whose maiden name was Jane Tayloe Loman, was a native of Virginia. Her writings in prose and verse appeared frequently in the Southern Literary Messenger. Her compositions were in a vein of excellent sense and refinement.

MOONLIGHT ON THE GRAVE.

It shineth on the quiet graves
Where weary ones have gone,
It watcheth with angelic gaze
Where the dead are left alone;
And not a sound of busy life
To the still graveyard comes,
But peacefully the sleepers lie
Down in their silent homes.

All silently and solemnly
It throweth shadows round,
And every gravestone hath a trace
In darkness on the ground:
It looketh on the tiny mound
Where a little child is laid,
And it lighteth up the marble pile
Which human pride hath made.

It falleth with unaltered ray
On the simple and the stern,
And it showeth with a solemn light
The sorrows we must learn;
It telleth of divided ties
On which its beam hath shone,
It whispereth of heavy hearts
Which "brokenly live on."

It gleameth where devoted ones
Are sleeping side by side,
It looketh where a maiden rests
Who in her beauty died.
There is no grave in all the earth
That moonlight hath not seen;
It gazeth cold and passionless
Where agony hath been.

Yet it is well: that changeless ray
A deeper thought should throw,
When mortal love pours forth the tide
Of unavailing woe;
It teacheth us no shade of grief
Can touch the starry sky,
That all our sorrow liveth here—
The glory is on high.

LUCY HOOPER.

MISS HOOPER was born in Newburyport, Massachusetts, February 4, 1816. She was carefully trained by her father, and was wont in after life to attribute her facility in composition to the exertions of this parent. At the age of fifteen she removed with her family to Brooklyn, where the remaining ten years of her life were passed.

Most of Miss Hooper's poems were contributed to the Long Island Star, a daily paper, where they appeared signed with her initials. She was also the author of a few prose sketches, collected in a volume in 1840, with the title Scenes from Real Life, and a prize essay on Domestic Happiness.

Lucy Hooper died on Sunday, August 1, 1841. The estimation in which she was held, was touchingly shown in the numerous testimonies to her gentle excellences published after her decease, prefixed to the volume of her Complete Poetical

Works, published in 1848.* Among these we find verses by Whittier and Tuckerman.

Lucy Hooper was a devout member of the Episcopal Church, and many of her poems are naturally drawn from the incidents of its ritual. Others are of a descriptive or reflective character.

THE DAUGHTER OF HERODIAS.

Written after seeing, among a collection of beautiful paintings (copies from the old masters, recently sent to New York from Italy,) one representing the daughter of Herodias, bearing the head of John the Baptist on a charger, and wearing upon her countenance an expression, not of triumph, as one might suppose, but rather of soft and sorrowful remorse, as she looks upon the calm and beautiful features of her victim.

Mother! I bring thy gift,

Take from my hand the dreaded boon—I pray
Take it, the still pale sorrow of the face
Hath left upon my soul its living trace,

Never to pass away;
Since from these lips one word of idle breath
Blanched that calm face—oh! mother, this is death.

What is it that I see

From all the pure and settled features gleaming?
Reproach! reproach! My dreams are strange and wild;

Mother! had'st thou no pity on thy child?

Lo! a celestial smile seems softly beaming
On the hushed lips—my mother, can'st thou brook
Longer upon thy victim's face to look?

Alas! at yesternorn

My heart was light, and to the viol's sound
I gaily danced, while crowned with summer flowers,
And swiftly by me sped the flying hours,
And all was joy around:

Not death! Oh! mother, could I say thee nay?
Take from thy daughter's hand thy boon away!

Take it! my heart is sad,

And the pure forehead hath an icy chill—
I dare not touch it, for avenging Heaven
Hath shuddering visions to my fancy given,
And the pale face appals me, cold and still,
With the closed lips—oh! tell me, could I know
That the pale features of the dead were so?

I may not turn away

From the charmed brow, and I have heard his name

Even as a prophet by his people spoken—
And that high brow, in death, bears seal and token
Of one whose words were flame:
Oh! Holy Teacher! could'st thou rise and live,
Would not these hushed lips whisper, "I forgive?"

Away with lute and harp,

With the glad heart for ever, and the dance,
Never again shall tabret sound for me;
Oh! fearful mother! I have brought to thee
The silent dead, with his rebuking glance,
And the crushed heart of one, to whom are given
Wild dreams of judgment and offended Heaven!

CATHARINE LUDERS.

A NUMBER of brief poems of a delicate and simple turn of expression and of a domestic pathetic interest have appeared from time to time in the magazines and the Literary World, by "Emily Hermann." The author is Mrs. Catharine Luders, lately a resident of the West, in Indiana.

THE BUILDING AND BIRDS.

We are building a pleasant dwelling,
And the orchard trees are set;
Yellow violets soon will open,
With tiny streaks of jet.

The wild-cherry buds are swelling,
And the brook runs full below;
Dim harebells in the garden,
And crocuses are in blow.

In the tops of the tulip-giants,
In the red-bud and the oak,
The spring-birds are all beginning
The pleasures of home to invoke.

They've built in our little parlour,
Where the floor was lately laid,
And it pleased us to give them shelter
In the nice new nest they made.

Those merry grey forest-rangers
To the green West now have come,
Wayfarers, like us, and strangers,
To build them a pleasant home.

They've reared a domestic altar
To send up their hymns at even;
Their songs and our own may mingle
Sometimes at the gates of heaven!

PLANTING IN RAIN.

We planted them in the rain,
When the skeleton building rose,
And here we sit, in the sultry day,
Where grateful shadows close.

We read in our pleasant books,
Or help the children play,
And weave long wreaths of dandelions
When the down is blown away.

The murmuring bell we hear,
For lowing herds are nigh,
With softened twilight in our heart,
And memories gone by.

Wild doves and orioles
Build in the orchard trees,
And where, on earth, are people poor
Who greet such friends as these?

They at our porch peep in
And sing their roundelay,
While bright-eyed rabbits near the steps,
In their nimble, fearless way.

In autumn, with apron in hand,
Cornelia waits near yon tree,
To catch the fruit from the grateful root,
Here set by our brothers and me.

Thus, where dense thickets rose,
And mouldering trees have lain,
Much happiness dwells for human hearts,
Under vines that were planted in rain.

THE LITTLE FROCK.

A common light blue muslin frock
Is hanging on the wall,
But no one in the household now
Can wear a dress so small.

The sleeves are both turned inside out,
And tell of summer wear;
They seem to wait the owner's hands
Which last year hung them there.

'Twas at the children's festival
Her Sunday dress was soiled—
You need not turn it from the light—
To me it is not spoiled!

* 8vo. pp. 404.

A sad and yet a pleasant thought
Is to the spirit told
By this dear little ruffled thing,
With dust in every fold.
Why should men weep that to their home
An angel's love is given—
Or that before them she is gone
To blessedness in heaven!

ESTELLE ANNA LEWIS.

Mrs. LEWIS was born near Baltimore, Maryland, at the country-seat of her father, Mr. J. N. Robinson, who died while his daughter was in her infancy. He was a gentleman of large fortune, and of strongly marked qualities of character. His wife was a daughter of an officer of the Revolutionary war.

Our author was educated at the Female Seminary of Mrs Willard at Troy, where she added to the usual accomplishments of a polite education, a knowledge of Latin and even the study of law. During these school days, she published a series of stories in the Family Magazine, edited by Solomon Southwick at Albany. Leaving the seminary in 1841, she was married to Mr. S. D. Lewis, a lawyer of Brooklyn, N. Y., in which city she resided till her removal to Europe in 1858.

Estelle Anna Lewis.

Her first volume of poems, chiefly lyrical, The Records of the Heart, was published by the Appletons in 1844.

In 1846, Mrs. Lewis published a poem, The Broken Heart, a Tale of Hispaniola, in the Democratic Review. The Child of the Sea, and Other Poems, appeared from the press of Mr. George P. Putnam, in 1848.

In 1849, The Angel's Visit, The Orphan's Hymn, The Prisoner of Perote, etc., were printed in Graham's Magazine. In 1851, appeared in the same magazine, The Cruise of Aureana, Melodiana's Dream, Adelina to Adhemer, a series of sonnets from the Italian, and during the same year, a series of sonnets entitled, My Study, in the Literary World. In 1852, the Appletons issued the Myths of the Minstrel. In 1854, Mrs. Lewis published in Graham's Magazine, Art and Artists in America, a series of critical and biographical essays. An illustrated edition of her Poetical Works was published in 1857.

The poems of Mrs. Lewis are marked by a certain passionate expression, united with the study of poetic art. Besides piquant letters on travel, literature, and art, contributed to American journals under the name of "Stella," she has written three tragedies: Helemar; or, The Fall of Montezuma (N. Y., 1863); Sappho of Lesbos, 1868, which was accepted by Mme. Ristori; and The King's Stratagem; or, The Pearl of Poland (Trübner & Co., London, 1873). An illustrated edition of her poems was published by H. G. Bohn in 1866.

MY STUDY.

This is my world—my angel-guarded shrine,
Which I have made to suit my heart's great need,
When sorrow dooms it overmuch to bleed:
Or, when aweary and athirst I pine
For genial showers and sustenance divine;
When Love, or Hope, or Joy my heart deceive,
And I would sit me down alone to grieve—
My mind to sad or studious mood resign.
Here oft, upon the stream of thought I lie,
Floating whichever way the waves are flowing—
Sometimes along the banks of childhood going,
Where all is bud, and bloom, and melody,
Or, wafted by some stronger current, glide,
Where darker from the steeps and deeper flows the tide.

Yes, 'tis my Cáabá—a shrine below,
Where my Soul sits within its house of clay,
Listing the steps of angels come and go—
Sweet missioned Heralds from the realms of day.
One brings me rays from Regions of the sun,
One comes to warn me of some pending dart,
One brings a laurel leaf for work well done,
Another, whispers from a kindred Heart.—
Oh! this I would not change for all the gold
That lies beneath the Sacramento's waves,
For all the Jewels Indian coffers hold,
For all the Pearls in Oman's starry caves—
The lessons of all Pedagogues are naught
To those I learn within this holy Fane of thought.

Here blind old Homer teaches lofty song;
The Lesbian sings of Cupid's pinions furled,
And how the heart is withered up by wrong;
Dante depicts an infernal world,
Wife opening many a purgatorial aisle;
Torquato rings the woes of Palestine,
Alphonso's rage and Leonora's smile—
Love, Beauty, Genius, Glory all divine;
Milton depicts the bliss of Paradise,
Then flings apart the ponderous gates of Hell,
Where Satan on the fiery billow lies,
"With head uplift," above his army fell,—
And Avon's Bard, surpassing all in art,
Unlocks the portals of the human heart.

GREECE—FROM THE CHILD OF THE SEA.

Shrine of the Gods! mine own eternal Greece!
When shall thy weeds be doffed—thy mourning cease?

The gyves that bind thy beauty rent in twain,
And thou be living, breathing Greece again?
Grave of the mighty! Hero—Poet—Sage—
Whose deeds are guiding stars to every age!
Land unsurpassed in glory and despair,
Still in thy desolation thou art fair!

Low in sepulchral dust lies Pallas' shrine—
 Low in sepulchral dust thy Fanes divine—
 And all thy visible self; yet o'er thy clay,
 Soul, beauty, lingers, hallowing decay.

Not all the ills that war entailed on thee,
 Not all the blood that stained Thermopylæ—
 Not all the desolation traitors wrought—
 Not all the woe and want invaders brought—
 Not all the tears that slavery could wring
 From out thy heart of patient suffering—
 Not all that drapes thy loveliness in night,
 Can quench thy spirit's never-dying light;
 But hovering o'er the lust of gods enshrined,
 It beams, a beacon to the march of mind—
 An oasis to sage and bard forlorn—
 A guiding star to centuries unborn.

For thee I mourn—thy blood is in my veins—
 To thee by consanguinity's strong chains
 I'm bound and fain would die to make thee free;
 But oh! there is no Liberty for thee!
 Not all the wisdom of thy greatest One—*
 Not all the bravery of Thetis' Son—
 Not all the weight of mighty Phœbus' ire—
 Not all the magic of the Athenian's Lyre—
 Can ever bid thy tears or mourning cease
 Or rend one gyve that binds thee, lovely Greece.
 Where Corinth weeps beside Lepanto's deep,
 Her palaces in desolation sleep.
 Seated till dawn on moonlit column, I
 Have sought to probe eternal Destiny;
 I've roamed, fair Hellas, o'er thy battle-plains.
 And stood within Apollo's ruined fanes,
 Invoked the spirits of the past to wake,
 Assist with swords of fire thy chains to break;
 But only from the hollow sepulchres,
 Murmured, "Eternal slavery is hers!"
 And on thy bosom I have laid my head
 And poured my soul out—tears of lava shed;
 Before thy desecrated altars knelt,
 To calmer feelings felt my sorrows melt,
 And gladly with thee would have made my home,
 But pride and hate impelled me o'er the foam,
 To distant lands and seas unknown to roam.

THE FORSAKEN.

It hath been said, for all who die
 There is a tear;
 Some pining, bleeding heart to sigh
 O'er every bier:
 But in that hour of pain and dread
 Who will draw near
 Around my humble couch, and shed
 One farewell tear?

Who watch life's last, departing ray
 In deep despair,
 And soothe my spirit on its way
 With holy prayer?
 What mourner round my bier will come
 "In weeds of woe,"
 And follow me to my long home—
 Solemn and skow?

When lying on my clayey bed,
 In icy sleep,
 Who there by pure affection led
 Will come and weep—
 By the pale moon implant the rose
 Upon my breast,
 And bid it cheer my dark repose,
 My lowly rest?

* Lyreurgus.

Could I but know when I am sleeping
 Low in the ground,
 One faithful heart would there be keeping
 Watch all night round,
 As if some gem lay shrined beneath
 The sod's cold gloom,
 'Twould mitigate the pangs of death,
 And light the tomb.

Yes, in that hour if I could feel
 From halls of glee
 And Beauty's presence one would steal
 In secrecy,
 And come and sit and weep by me
 In night's deep noon—
 Oh! I would ask of Memory
 No other boon.

But ah! a lonelier fate is mine—
 A deeper woe:
 From all I love in youth's sweet time
 I soon must go—
 Draw round me my cold robes of white,
 In a dark spot
 To sleep through Death's long, dreamless night,
 Lone and forgot.

JULIA WARD HOWE.

THE father of Mrs. Howe, Samuel Ward, the New York banker, whose liberality was freely expended on public-spirited and educational objects, as the Historical Society, the University, and Stuyvesant Institute of New York, was born in Rhode Island, a descendant of an old soldier of Cromwell, who settled in Newport after the accession of Charles II., and who married a granddaughter of Roger Williams. Their son Richard became Governor of the State, and one of his sons, Samuel, was from 1774 to 1776 a member of the Old Continental Congress. This Samuel left a son Samuel, who served in the war of the Revolution, and was with Arnold in his expedition to Quebec. He was the grandfather of our author.

Julia Ward Howe

Her mother, a daughter of the late Mr. B. C. Cutler, of Boston, was a lady of poetic culture, a specimen of whose occasional verses is given in Griswold's Female Poets of America.

Miss Ward, after having received an education of unusual care and extent from the most accomplished teachers, was married in 1843 to the distinguished Philhellene and philanthropist of Boston, Dr. Samuel G. Howe, with whom she has resided in Europe, under peculiarly favorable opportunities for the study of foreign art and life. A volume of poems from her pen, Passion Flowers, published in 1854, is a striking expression of her culture, and of thoughts and experience covering a wide range of emotion, from sympathies with the "nationalities" of Europe, to "the fee griefs due to a single breast."

An appreciative critic in the *Southern Quarterly Review has thus characterized the varying features of the book.

"The art is subordinate to the feeling; the thought more prominent than the rhyme; there is far more earnestness of feeling than fastidiousness of taste:—instead of being the result of a dalliance with fancy, these effusions are instinct with the struggle of life; they are the offspring of experience more than of imagination. They are written by a woman who knows how to think as well as to feel; one who has made herself familiar with the higher walks of literature; who has deeply pondered Hegel, Comte, Swedenborg, Goethe, Dante, and all the masters of song, of philosophy, and of faith. Thus accomplished, she has travelled, enjoyed cultivated society, and gone through the usual phases of womanly development and duty. Her muse, therefore, is no casual impulse of juvenile emotion, no artificial expression, no spasmodic sentiment; but a creature born of wide and deep reflection; of study, of sorrow, yearning, love, care, delight, and all the elements of real, and thoughtful, and earnest life."

THE CITY OF MY LOVE.

She sits among the eternal hills,
Their crown, thrice glorious and dear,
Her voice is as a thousand tongues
Of silver fountains, gurgling clear.

Her breath is prayer, her life is love,
And worship of all lovely things;
Her children have a gracious port,
Her beggars show the blood of kings.

By old Tradition guarded close,
None doubt the grandeur she has seen;
Upon her venerable front
Is written: "I was born a Queen!"

She rules the age by Beauty's power,
As once she ruled by arméd might;
The Southern sun doth treasure her
Deep in his golden heart of light.

Awe strikes the traveller when he sees
The vision of her distant dome,
And a strange spasm wrings his heart
As the guide whispers, "There is Rome!"

Rome of the Romans! where the Gods
Of Greek Olympus long held sway;
Rome of the Christians, Peter's tomb,
The Zion of our later day.

Rome, the mailed Virgin of the world,
Defiance on her brows and breast;

Rome, to voluptuous pleasure won,
Debauched, and locked in drunken rest.

Rome, in her intellectual day,
Europe's intriguing step-dame grown;
Rome, bowed to weakness and decay,
A caunting, mass-frequenting crone.

Then th' unlettered man plods on,
Half chiding at the spell he feels,
The artist pauses at the gate,
And on the wonderous threshold kneels.

The sick man lifts his languid head
For those soft skies and balmy airs;
The pilgrim tries a quicker pace,
And hugs remorse, and patters prayers.

For ev'n the grass that feeds the herds
Methinks some unknown virtue yields
The very hinds in reverence tread
The precincts of the ancient fields.

But wrapt in gloom of night and death,
I crept to thee, dear mother Rome;
And in thy hospitable heart,
Found rest and comfort, health and home.

And friendships, warm and living still,
Although their dearest joys are fled;
True sympathies that bring to life
The better self, so often dead.

For all the wonder that thou wert,
For all the dear delight thou art,
Accept an homage from my lips,
That warms again a wasted heart.

And, though it seem a childish prayer,
I've breathed it oft, that when I die,
As thy remembrance dear in it,
That heart in thee might buried lie.

Mrs. Howe published a second volume of poems, entitled Words For the Hour, in 1856, marked by the same passionate struggle for expression as the first. It was followed by two plays: The World's Own, 1857; and Hippolytus, a Tragedy, 1858; as well as by contributions to the Atlantic Monthly, the New York Tribune, and other periodicals. Those to the first named, depicting the details of a voyage to Cuba in company with her husband and Theodore Parker, the latter then failing in health, were gathered into a volume—A Trip to Cuba, 1859.

A third—and her best—volume of poems, Later Lyrics, appeared in 1866; comprising Poems of the War; Lyrics of the Street; Parables; Her Verses, a Metrical Romance; and Poems of Study. Her next work was: From the Oak to the Olive; a Plain Record of a Pleasant Journey, from London to Athens, 1868.

Of all these writings, the sublime "Battle Hymn of the Republic" has most deeply touched the popular heart, and has become an immortal part of American literature. Mrs. Howe, in a lecture at Detroit in the spring of 1871, thus detailed the circumstances of its inspiration: "I was on a visit to Washington, during the first winter of the war, with Governor Andrew and other Massachusetts friends. We had been spending the day in the soldiers' camps on the Potomac, and I heard the 'John Brown Hymn'* sung and played so often that its strains were

* "John Brown's body lies a mouldering in the grave,
John Brown's body lies a mouldering in the grave,
John Brown's body lies a mouldering in the grave,
His soul is marching on."

continually sounding in my ears. As the words in use seemed an inadequate expression of the music, I wished very much for an inspiration which would provide a fitting rendition of so beautiful a theme. But it did not come, and I retired to bed. Early in the morning, before daybreak, I awoke, and my mind in a half-dreaming state began at once to run upon the rhythm of the "John Brown Hymn." Very soon the words commenced fitting themselves to its measure, and the lines spun off without further effort. I said to myself, "Now I shall lose all this unless I get it down in black and white." I arose, groped about in the dark, got such stationery as may be found in the room of a Washington hotel, sat down, and wrote, as I frequently do, without lighting a lamp, the Battle Hymn of the Republic."

*BATTLE-HYMN OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord:

He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;

He hath loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swift sword:

His truth is marching on.

I have seen Him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps;

They have builded Him an altar in the evening dews and damps;

I can read His righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps.

His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel, writ in burnished rows of steel:

"As ye deal with my contemners, so with you my grace shall deal;

Let the Hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel,

Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;

He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment-seat:

Oh! be swift, my soul, to answer Him! be jubilant, my feet!

Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,

With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me:

As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,

While God is marching on.

*OUR COUNTRY.

On primal rocks she wrote her name,
Her towers were reared on holy graves,
The golden seed that bore her came
Swift-winged with prayer o'er ocean waves.

The Forest bowed his solemn crest,
And open flung his sylvan doors:
Meek Rivers led the appointed Guest
To clasp the wide-embracing shores;

Till, fold by fold, the brodered Land
To swell her virgin vestments grew,
While Sages, strong in heart and hand,
Her virtue's fiery girdle drew.

O Exile of the wrath of Kings!

O Pilgrim Ark of Liberty!

The refuge of divinest things,

Their record must abide in thee.

First in the glories of thy front

Let the crown jewel Truth be found;

Thy right hand fling with generous wont

Love's happy chain to furthest bound.

Let Justice with the faultless scales

Hold fast the worship of thy sons,

Thy commerce spread her shining sails

Where no dark tide of rapine runs.

So link thy ways to those of God,

So follow firm the heavenly laws,

That stars may greet thee, warrior-browed,

And storm-spiced angels hail thy cause.

O Land, the measure of our prayers,

Hope of the world, in grief and wrong!

Be thine the blessing of the years,

The gift of faith, the crown of song.

*THE PRICE OF THE DIVINA COMMEDIA.

Give, — you need not see the face,

But the garment hangeth bare;

And the hand is gaunt and spare

That enforces Christian grace.

Many ages will not bring

Such a point as this to sight,

That the world should so requite

Master heart and matchless string.

Wonder at the well-born feet

Fretting in the flinty road.

Hath this virtue no abode?

Hath this sorrow no retreat?

See, beneath the hood of grief,

Muffled bays engird the brow.

Fame shall yield her topmost bough

Ere that laurel moult a leaf.

Give: it is no idle hand

That extends an asking palm,

Tracing yet the loftiest psalm

By the heart of Nature spanned.

In the antechamber long

Did he patient hearing crave:

Smiles and splendors crown the slave,

While the patriot suffers wrong.

Could the mighty audience deign,

Meeting once the inspired gaze,

They should ransom all their days

With the beauty of his strain.

With a spasm in his breast,

With a consummate love alone,

All his human blessings gone,

Doth he wander, void of rest.

Not a coin within his purse,

Not a crust to help his way,

Making yet a Judgment Day

With his power to bless and curse.

Give; but ask what he has given:

That Posterity shall tell, —

All the majesty of Hell;

Half the ecstasy of Heaven.

*BLUSHES.

I cannot make him know my love;

Nor from myself conceal

The pangs that rankle in my breast,

Sharper than flame or steel.

Could I but reach a hand to him,
My very finger's thrill
Would close, like tendrils, round the strength
Of his beloved will.

Could I but lift mine eyes to his,
My glowing soul, unrolled,
Would flash like sunset on his sight,
In fiery red and gold.

Yet pause, my unfecked soul, and think
How vexed Penelope
Forsook her nuptial joy, that love
Should wait on modesty.

For gentle souls must keep their bounds,
Nor rudely snatch at bliss:
The very sun should lose his light
In giving it amiss.

So, when I die, cross tenderly
My palms upon my breast,
And let some faithful hand compose
My tired limbs to rest.

But thou shalt fold this kerchief white,
And lay it on my face,
Saying, "She died of love untold;
But she is dead in grace."

THE NEW EXODUS.

"Forsake this flowery garden!" the frowning Angel said;

"Its vines no more may feed thee, compel from stones thy bread;

Pursue the veins deep buried that hide thy wine
and oil:

Fruit shalt thou find with sorrow, and children
rear in toil."

Oh! not in heathen vengeance the winged apostle spoke;

Nor savage retribution the blooming fetters broke.
Man had an arm for labor, a strength to conquer pain,

A brain to plot and study, a will to serve and reign.
That will with slow arraying confronts itself with fate,

The pair unconscious twining the arches of the State.

Earth keeps her fairest garlands to crown the tireless spade;

The fields are white with harvest, the hireling's fee is paid.

From tented field to city, to palace, and to throne, Man builds with work his kingdom, and makes the world his own.

All welded with conditions is empire's golden ring:
The king must keep the peasant, the peasant feed the king.

The word of God once spoken, from truth is never lost;

The high command once given, earth guards with jealous cost.

By this perplexing lesson, men build their busy schemes:

"The way of comfort lies not, kind Eden, through thy dreams."

I see a land before me, where manhood in its pride
Forgot the solemn sentence, the wage of toil denied:
"To wealth and lofty station some royal road must be;

Our brother, bound and plundered, shall earn us luxury.

One half of knowledge give him for service and for skill,
The nobler half withholding, that moulds the manly will:
From justice bar his pleadings, from mercy keep his prayers;
His daughters for our pleasure, his sons to serve our heirs."

Again the frowning Angel commandeth to depart,
With fiery scourge of terror, with want and woe
of heart;

"Go forth! the earth is weary to bear unrighteous feet;

Release your false possession; go, work that ye may eat.

Bring here the light of knowledge, the scale of equal rule;

Bring the Republic's weapons, the forum and the school:

The Dagon of your worship is broken on his shrine;
The palm of Christian mercy brings in the true divine."

So from your southern Eden the flaming sword
doth drive;

Your lesson is appointed; go, learn how workmen thrive!

Not sloth has fee of plenty, nor pride of stately crest:

But thou of God beloved, O Labor crowned with rest!

ALICE B. HAVEN,

The author of numerous poems and tales, and of several volumes published under the name of "Cousin Alice," was born at Hudson, New York.

Alice B. Haven.

Her maiden name was Bradley. She early became a contributor to the periodicals of the day.
In 1846 she was married to the late Joseph C.
Neal, the author of the Charcoal Sketches. Upon his death, a few months afterwards, she took charge of the literary department of Neal's Gazette, of which her husband had been a proprietor, and conducted it for several years with ability. Her articles, poems, tales, and sketches, appeared frequently during this time in the leading monthly magazines. A volume from her pen, The Gossips of Rivertown, with Sketches in Prose and Verse, was published in 1850. The main story is an illustration of the old village propensity of scandal, along with which the traits and manners of country life are exhibited in a genial, humorous way. Mrs. Haven is also the author of a series of juvenile works, published under the name of "Cousin Alice." They are stories written to illustrate various proverbial moralities, and are in a happy vein of dialogue and description, pervaded by an unobtrusive religious feeling. They are entitled, He'n Morton's Trial; No Such Word as Fail; Contentment better than Wealth; Patient Waiting No Loss; All's not Gold that Glitters, or the Young Californian, etc.

In 1853 Mrs. Neal was married to Mr. Samuel L. Haven, and has since resided at Mamaroneck, Westchester county, New York.

TREES IN THE CITY.

'Tis beautiful to see a forest stand,
 Brave with its moss-grown monarchs and the pride
 Of foliage dense, to which the south wind bland
 Comes with a kiss, as lover to his bride;
 To watch the light grow fainter, as it streams
 Through arching aisles, where branches interlace,
 Where sombre pines rise o'er the shadowy gleams
 Of silver birch, trembling with modest grace.

But they who dwell beside the stream and hill,
 Prize little treasures there so kindly given;
 The song of birds, the babbling of the rill,
 The pure unclouded light and air of heaven.
 They walk as those who seeing cannot see,
 Blind to this beauty even from their birth,
 We value little blessings ever free,
 We covet most the rarest things of earth.

But rising from the dust of busy streets,
 These forest children gladden many hearts;
 As some old friend their welcome presence greets
 The toil-worn soul, and fresher life imparts.
 Their shade is doubly grateful when it lies
 Above the glare which stifling walls throw back,
 Through quivering leaves we see the soft blue skies,
 Then happier tread the dull, unvaried track.

And when the first fresh foliage, emerald-hued,
 Is opening slowly to the sun's glad beams,
 How it recalleth scenes we once have viewed,
 And childhood's fair but long-forgotten dreams!
 The gushing spring, with violets clustering round—
 The dell where twin flowers trembled in the breeze—

The fairy visions wakened by the sound
 Of evening winds that sighed among the trees.

There is a language given to the flowers—
 To me, the trees "dumb oracles" have been;
 As waving softly, fresh from summer showers,
 Their whisper to the heart will entrance win.
 Do they not teach us purity may live
 Amid the crowded haunts of sin and shame,
 And over all a soothing influence give—
 Sad hearts from fear and sorrow oft reclaim?

And though transferred to un congenial soil,
 Perchance to breathe alone the dusty air,
 Burdened with sounds of never-ceasing toil—
 They rise as in the forest free and fair;
 They do not droop and pine at adverse fate,
 Or wonder why their lot should lonely prove,

But give fresh life to hearts left desolate,
 Fit emblems of a pure, unselfish love.

THE CHURCH.

I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife.—REV. XXI. 9.
 Clad in a robe of pure and spotless white,
 The youthful bride with timid step comes forth
 To greet the hand to which she plights her troth,
 Her soft eyes radiant with a strange delight.
 The snowy veil which circles her around
 Shades the sweet face from every gazer's eye,
 And thus enwrapt, she passes calmly by—
 Nor casts a look but on the unconscious ground.
 So should the Church, the bride elect of Heaven,—
 Remembering Whom she goeth forth to meet,
 And with a truth that cannot brook deceit
 Holding the faith, which unto her is given—
 Pass through this world, which claims her for a while,
 Nor cast about her longing look, nor smile.

Mrs. Haven died at her home at Mamaroneck, August 23, 1863. Her habitual literary employments were much interrupted in her last years by illness; but she found time, in the intervals of domestic cares, and journeys undertaken for health, to add to the series of juvenile books already mentioned, the stories, Out of Debt, Out of Danger, and Where There's a Will There's a Way, and to publish occasional poems and sketches in the magazines. A deep feeling pervades these later writings, which unite with the graces of a feminine mind the earnest convictions of Christian experience. These qualities are especially observable in the portions of her private diary which have been published since her death, in an instructive and amiable biography, entitled "Cousin Alice: a Memoir of Alice B. Haven."

 Two posthumous volumes have appeared: Good Report: Lessons for Lent, 1867; and Home Stories, 1868.

CATHERINE WARFIELD—ELEANOR LEE,

"Two Sisters of the West," as they appeared on the title-page of a joint volume, The Wife of Leon and Other Poems, published in New York in 1843, are the daughters of the Hon. Nathaniel Ware, of Mississippi, and were born near the city of Natchez. Miss Catherine Ware was married to Mr. Warfield of Lexington, Kentucky; Miss Eleanor to Mr. Lee of Vicksburg. A second volume of their joint contribution, The Indian Chamber and Other Poems, appeared in 1846. The part taken by either author in the volumes is not distinguished. The poems in ballad, narrative, and reflection, exhibit a ready command of poetic language, and a prompt susceptibility to poetic impressions. They have had a wide popularity. Mrs. Lee died about 1850.

I WALK IN DREAMS OF POETRY.

I walk in dreams of poetry;
 They compass me around;
 I hear a low and startling voice
 In every passing sound;
 I meet in every gleaming star,
 On which at eve I gaze,
 A deep and glorious eye, to fill
 My soul with burning rays.

I walk in dreams of poetry;
The very air I breathe
Is filled with visions wild and free,
That round my spirit wreath;
A shade, a sigh, a floating cloud,
A low and whispered tone—
These have a language to my brain,
A language deep and lone.

I walk in dreams of poetry,
And in my spirit bow
Unto a lone and distant shrine,
That none around me know,
From every heath and hill I bring
A garland rich and rare,
Of flowery thought and murmuring sigh,
To wreath the mine altar fair.

I walk in dreams of poetry:
Strange spells are on me shed;
I have a world within my soul
Where no one else may tread—
A deep and wide-spread universe,
Where spirit-sound and sight
Mine inward vision ever greet
With fair and radiant light.

My footsteps tread the earth below,
While soars my soul to heaven:
Small is my portion here—yet there
Bright realms to me are given.
I clasp my kindred's greeting hands,
Walk calmly by their side,
And yet I feel between us stands
A barrier deep and wide.

I watch their deep and household joy
Around the evening hearth,
When the children stand beside each knee
With laugh and shout of mirth.
But oh! I feel unto my soul
A deeper joy is brought—
To rush with eagle wings and strong,
Up in a heaven of thought.

I watch them in their sorrowing hours,
When, with their spirits tossed,
I hear them wail with bitter cries
Their earthly prospects crossed;
I feel that I have sorrows wild
In my heart buried deep—
Immortal griefs that none may share
With me—nor eyes can weep.

And strange it is: I cannot say
If it is wo or weal,
That thus unto my heart can flow
Fountains so few may feel;
The gift that can my spirit raise
The cold, dark earth above,
Has hung a bar between my soul
And many a heart I love.

Yet I walk in dreams of poetry,
And would not change that path,
Though on it from a darkened sky
Were poured a tempest's wrath.
Its flowers are mine, its deathless blooms,
I know not yet the thorn;
I dream not of the evening glooms
In this my radiant morn.

Oh! still in dreams of poetry,
Let me for ever tread,
With earth a temple, where divine,
Bright oracles are shed:
They soften down the earthly ills
From which they cannot save;
They make a romance of our life;
They glorify the grave.

SHE COMES TO ME.

She comes to me in robes of snow,
The friend of all my sinless years—
Even as I saw her long ago,
Before she left this vale of tears.

She comes to me in robes of snow—
She walks the chambers of my rest,
With soundless footsteps sad and slow,
That wake no echo in my breast.

I see her in my visions yet,
I see her in my waking hours;
Upon her pale, pure brow is set
A crown of azure hyacinth flowers.

Her golden hair waves round her face,
And o'er her shoulders gently falls:
Each ringlet hath the nameless grace
My spirit yet on earth recalls.

And, bending o'er my lowly bed,
She murmurs—"Oh, fear not to die!—
For thee an angel's tears are shed,
An angel's feast is spread on high.

"Come, then, and meet the joy divine
That features of the spirits wear:
A fleeting pleasure here is thine—
An angel's crown awaits thee there.

"Listen! it is a choral hymn"—
And, gliding softly from my couch,
Her spirit-face waxed faint and dim,
Her white robes vanished at my touch.

She leaves me with her robes of snow—
Hushed is the voice that used to thrill
Around the couch of pain and wo—
She leaves me to my darkness still.

Mrs. Warfield has, in recent years, published several romances which have been widely popular. These are: The Household of Bowverie, or The Elixir of Gold, a Romance, by a Southern Lady, 1860; The Romance of the Green Seal, 1867; The Romance of Beauseincourt: an Episode extracted from the Retrospect of Miriam Montfort, 1867. The latter is dedicated "to the memory of my Sister Eleanor, a Southern lady, happy to have been spared by an early death the sorrows of her country." Miriam Montfort, A Novel, appeared in 1873.

SARAH S. JACOBS,

Born in Rhode Island, the daughter of a Baptist clergyman, the late Rev. Bela Jacobs, is remarkable for her learning and cultivation. She has long resided at Cambridge, Mass. There has been no collection of her writings, except the few poems which have been brought together in Dr. Griswold's Female Poets of America.

She is the author of Nonantum and Natick, a popular history of the New England Indian tribes, 1854, reprinted under the title of The White Oak and Its Neighbors, 1869; and a Memoir of Rev. B. Jacobs.

BENEDETTA.

By an old fountain once at day's decline
We stood. The winged breezes made
Short flights melodious through the lowering vine,
The lindens flung a golden, glimmering shade,
And the old fountain played.
I a stern stranger—a sweet maiden she,
And beautiful as her own Italy.
At length she smiled; her smile the silence broke,
And my heart finding language thus it spoke:

" Whenever Benedetta moves,
 Motion then all Nature loves,
 When Benedetta is at rest,
 Quietness appereth best.
 She makes me dream of pleasant things,
 Of the young corn growing;
 Of butterflies' transparent wings
 In the sunbeams rowing;
 Of the summer dawn
 Into daylight sliding;
 Of Dian's favorite fawn
 Among laurels hiding;
 Of a movement in the tops
 Of the most impulsive trees;
 Of cool, glittering drops
 God's gracious rainbow seers;
 Of pale moons; of saints
 Chanting anthems holy;
 Of a cloud that faints
 In evening slowly;
 Of a bird's song in a grove,
 Of a rosebud's love;
 Of a lily's stem and leaf,
 Of dew-silvered meadows;
 Of a child's first grief;
 Of soft-floating shadows;
 Of the violet's breath
 To the moist wind given;
 Of early death
 And heaven."

I ceased: the maiden did not stir,
 Nor speak, nor raise her bended head;
 And the green vines enfolded her,
 And the old fountain played.
 Then from the church beyond the trees
 Chimed the bells to evening prayer:
 Fervent the devotions were
 Of Benedetta on her knees;
 And when her prayer was over,
 A most spiritual air
 Her whole form invested,
 As if God did love her,
 And his smile still rested
 On her white robe and flesh,
 So innocent and fresh—
 Touching where'er it fell
 With a glory visible.

She smiled, and crossed herself, and smiled again
 Upon the heretic's sincere "Amen!"
 "Buona notte," soft she said or sung—
 It was the same on that sweet southern tongue—
 And passed. I blessed the faultless face,
 All in composed gentleness arrayed;
 Then took farewell of the secluded place;
 And the tall lindens flung a glimmering shade
 And the old fountain played.

And this was spring. In the autumnal weather,
 One golden afternoon I wandered thither;
 And to the vineyards, as I passed along,
 Murmured this fragment of a broken song:

" I know a peasant girl serene—
 What though her home doth lowly lie!
 The woods do homage to their queen,
 The streams flow reverently nigh
 Benedetta, Benedetta!

" Her eyes, the deep, delicious blue
 The stars and I love to look through;
 Her voice the low, bewildering tone,
 Soft winds and she have made their own
 Benedetta, Benedetta!"

She was not by the fountain—but a band
 Of the fair daughters of that sunny land.

Weeping they were, and as they wept they threw Flowers on a grave. Then suddenly I knew
 Of Benedetta dead:
 And weeping too,
 O'er beauty perished,
 Awhile with her companions there I stood,
 Then turned and went back to my solitude;
 And the tall lindens flung a glimmering shade,
 And the old fountain played.

JANE ERMINA LOCKE.

Mrs. Jane Ermina Locke was born at Worthington, Hampshire County, Massachusetts, April 25, 1805, the daughter of Deacon Charles and Deborah Starkweather. She married Mr. John Goodwin Locke, of Ashby, Massachusetts, October 26, 1829, and in the following year removed with her husband to Buffalo, New York. In 1833, Mr. and Mrs. Locke returned to Massachusetts, and settled in Lowell, where they resided till 1849, when they removed to Boston, in which place, with her family, Mrs. Locke passed the remaining years of her life. Her constitution was always delicate, and for fifteen years before her death she suffered almost constantly from disease, to an extent which but for her energy of character and power of will would have wholly precluded the discharge of her household duties. Her disease gradually assumed a pulmonary character, and she died of consumption at Ashburnham, Massachusetts, whither she had gone a few days previously for health, March 8, 1859. She had seven children, four of whom survived her.

In person Mrs. Locke was small and delicately formed, and considerably below the medium stature. Her manners were refined and graceful, and partook largely of the simple and child-like nature that marked her mind and character. Her literary tastes were early developed. She began to write when she was fifteen, and contributed to the columns of the magazines and newspapers. In 1842 she published a volume of Miscellaneous Poems, which were favorably received and widely circulated. In 1844 a poem for children appeared, entitled Rachael; or, The Little Mourner. In 1846, a poem, entitled Boston, was published, a production of merit, descriptive of the moral and philanthropic associations of the city, and of the lives which have conferred honor upon it. In 1854 she wrote and gave to the public a poem called Daniel Webster, a Rhymed Eulogy, occasioned by the demise of the great statesman; and in the same year, The Recalled in the Voices of the Past, and Poems of the Ideal, made its appearance and passed to a second edition. In addition to these poems she wrote many fugitive pieces, both in prose and poetry, including reviews, critiques, essays, prefaces, introductions, stories, and letters. Among these miscellaneous articles was an extended and carefully prepared historical and biographical preface to a reprint of "The Coquette, or History of Eliza Wharton," which was republished in Boston in 1855. Mrs. Locke's writings were marked by vigor of thought and expression, by invention and imagination.

JOHN GOODWIN LOCKE.

John Goodwin Locke was born April 1, 1803, at Ashby, Middlesex County, Mass. He was educated at the Academy in New Ipswich, N. H., and studied law with his father, Hon. John Locke, of Ashby, who was a member of Congress from the Worcester North District from 1823 to 1829. Mr. Locke relinquished the law from defective vision and entered other pursuits. He resided a few years in Buffalo, N. Y., and in 1833 removed to Lowell, Mass., where he was City Auditor of Accounts and Clerk of the Council from 1840 to 1849. He removed to Boston in 1849, and was in the Custom-House there till 1853, when he was appointed General Agent of the Massachusetts Board of Alien and State Pauper Commissioners, having a general superintendence of the State charitable institutions. This office he held till 1861. The next year he was appointed a commissioner to take bail in Suffolk County, which office he long held. In 1853 he resumed the practice of the law, making the laws relating to paupers and pauper settlements and the maintenance of bastard children a specialty. While at Lowell he twice revised the ordinances of that city, and in 1862-3, in connection with Hon. George P. Sanger, he revised and consolidated all the city ordinances of Boston, and collated all the State municipal laws. In early life he wrote a number of spirited poems. He took an active part in politics for many years, being of the old Whig school, and wrote much for the papers on this subject. In 1853 he completed and published a genealogy of the Locke family, in one large octavo volume of upward of 400 pages, entitled the Book of the Lockes. This work had been in preparation for nearly ten years, and has been highly praised for its research, arrangement, and accuracy. He died at Boston, July 22, 1869.

ELIZABETH C. KINNEY.

Mrs. ELIZABETH C. KINNEY is a native of New York, the daughter of Mr. David L. Dodge, a merchant of the city. She is married to Mr. William B. Kinney, editor of the Newark Daily Advertiser, where, as well as in the magazines and literary journals of the day, many of her poetic compositions have appeared. In 1850, she accompanied her husband on his mission as Chargé d'Affaires to Sardinia. A fruit of her residence abroad has been a narrative poem entitled Felicita, a Metrical Romance; the story of a lady sold into Moorish captivity by her father, who is rescued by a slave; and after having passed through a sorrowful love adventure, dies in a convent. The numerous occasional poems of Mrs. Kinney were collected in a volume in 1867, entitled Poems. Bianca Cappello, a tragedy founded on Italian history, and written during her eighteen years' residence abroad, was printed in 1873.

THE SPIRIT OF SONG.

Eternal Fame! thy great rewards,
Throughout all time, shall be
The right of those old master bards
Of Greece and Italy;
And of fair Albion's favored isle,
Where Poesy's celestial smile
Hath shone for ages, gilding bright

Her rocky cliffs and ancient towers,
And cheering this New World of ours
With a reflected light.

Yet, though there be no path untrod
By that immortal race—
Who walked with Nature as with God,
And saw her face to face—
No living truth by them unsung,
No thought that hath not found a tongue
In some strong lyre of olden time—
Must every tuneful lute be still
That may not give the world a thrill
Of their great harp sublime?

Oh, not while beating hearts rejoice
In music's simplest tone,
And hear in Nature's every voice
An echo to their own!
Not till these scorn the little rill
That runs rejoicing from the hill,
Or the soft, melancholy glide
Of some deep stream through glen and glade,
Because 'tis not the thunder made
By ocean's heaving tide!

The hallowed lilies of the field
In glory are arrayed,
And timid, blue-eyed violets yield
Their fragrance to the shade;
Nor do the wayside flowers conceal
Those modest charms that sometimes steal
Upon the weary traveller's eyes
Like angels, spreading for his feet
A carpet, filled with odors sweet,
And decked with heavenly dyes.

Thus let the affluent soul of Song—
That all with flowers adorns—
Strew life's uneven path along,
And hide its thousand thorns:
Oh, many a sad and weary heart,
That treads a noiseless way apart,
Has blessed the humble poet's name
For fellowship, refined and free,
In meek wild-flowers of poesy,
That asked no higher fame!

And pleasant as the waterfall
To one by deserts bound,
Making the air all musical
With cool, inviting sound—
Is oft some unpretending strain
Of rural song, to him whose brain
Is fevered in the sordid strife
Tha' Avarice breeds 'twixt man and man,
While moving on, in caravan,
Across the sands of Life.

Yet not for these alone he sings:
The poet's breast is stirred
As by the spirit that takes wings
And carols in the bird!
He thinks not of a future name,
Nor whence his inspiration came,
Nor whither goes his warbled song:
As Joy itself delights in joy,
His soul finds li'e in its employ,
And grows by utterance strong.

SARA JANE LIPPINCOTT.

This lady, whose productions in prose and verse are known to the public under her nom de plume "Grace Greenwood," was born at Onondaga, in the State of New York, of New England parentage. Her early years were passed at Rochester, New York. Her father afterwards removed to New Brighton, a picturesquely situated village in Beaver Co., Western Pennsylvania, where she has since chiefly resided. In 1853 she was married to Mr. Lippincott, of Philadelphia.

Grace Greenwood

Two series of Greenwood Leaves, portions of which were originally contributed as letters to the New Mirror of Messrs. Morris and Willis, have been published in Boston by Messrs. Ticknor and Co., who also issued a volume of the author's Poetical Works in 1851. Mrs. Lippincott has also published Haps and Mishaps of a Tour in Europe, including an enthusiastic account of numerous European friends of the author, and several juvenile books, History of My Pets, Recollections of My Childhood and Merrie England.

The prose writings of "Grace Greenwood" are animated by a hearty spirit of out-of-door life and enjoyment, and a healthy, sprightly view of society. Her poems are the expressions of a prompt, generous nature.

ARIADNE.

[The demi-god, Theseus, having won the love of Ariadne, daughter of the king of Crete, deserted her on the isle of Naxos. In Miss Bremer's "H— Family," the blind girl is described as singing, "Ariadne à Naxos," in which Ariadne is represented as following Theseus, climbing a high rock to watch his departing vessel, and calling on him in her despairing anguish.]

Daughter of Crete, how one brief hour,
Ere in thy young love's early morn,
Sends storm and darkness o'er thy bower—
Oh doomed, oh desolate, oh lorn!
The breast which pillowed thy fair head
Rejects its burden—and the eye
Which looked its love so earnestly,
Its last cold glance hath on thee shed—
The arms which were thy living zone,
Around thee closely, warmly thrown,
Shall others clasp, deserted one!

Yet, Ariadne, worthy thou
Of the dark fate which meets thee now,
For thou art grovelling in thy woe—
Arouse thee! joy to bid him go.
For god above, or man below,
Whose love's warm and impetuous tide
Cold interest or selfish pride
Can chill, or stay, or turn aside,
Is all too poor and mean a thing
One shade o'er woman's brow to fling
Of grief, regret, or fear.
To cloud one morning's rosy light,
Disturb the sweet dreams of one night,
To cause the soft lash of her eye
To droop one moment mournfully,
Or tremble with one tear!

'Tis thou should'st triumph—thou art free
From chains that bound thee for awhile—
This, this the farewell meet for thee,
Proud princess, on that lonely isle!

"Go, to thine Athens bear thy faithless name!
Go, base betrayer of a holy trust!
Oh, I could bow me in my utter shame,
And lay my crimson forehead in the dust,
If I had ever loved thee as thou art,
Folding mean falsehood to my high, true heart!

"But thus I loved thee not. Before me bowed
A being glorious in majestic pride
And breathed his love, and passionately vowed
To worship only me, his peerless bride;
And this was thou, but crowned, enrobed, entwined,
With treasures borrowed from my own rich mind.

"I knew thee not a creature of my dreams,
And my rapt soul went floating into thine;
My love around thee poured such halo beams
Had'st thou been true had made thee all divine
And I, too, seemed immortal in my bliss,
When my glad lip thrilled to thy burning kiss.

"Shrunken and shrivelled into Theseus now
Thou stand'st—the gods have blown away
The airy crown which glittered on thy brow,
The gorgeous robes which wrapt thee for a day.
Around thee scarce one fluttering fragment clings,
A poor, lean beggar in all glorious things!

"Nor will I deign to cast on thee my hate—
It were a ray to tinge with splendour still
The dull, dim twilight of thy after fate—
Thou shalt pass from me like a dream of ill,
Thy name be but a thing that crouching stole,
Like a poor thief, all noiseless from my soul!

"Though thou hast dared to steal the sacred flame
From out that soul's high heaven, she sets thee
free,

Or only chains thee with thy sounding shame—
Her memory is no Caucasus for thee!
And even her hovering hate would o'er thee fling
Too much of glory from its shadowy wing!

"Thou think'st to leave my life a lonely night—
Ha, it is night all glorious with its stars!
Hopes yet unclouded beaming forth their light,
And free thoughts welling in their silver cars,
And queenly pride, serene, and cold, and high,
Moves the Diana of its calm, clear sky.

"If poor and humble thou believest me,
Mole of a demi-god, how blind art thou!
For I am rich in scorn to pour on thee,
And gods shall bend from high Olympus' brow,
And gaze in wonder on my lofty pride—
Naxos be hallowed, I be deified!"

On the tall cliff, where cold and pale,
Thou watchest his receding sail,

Where thou, the daughter of a king,
 Wait'st like a breaking wind-harp's string—
 Bend'st like a weak and wilted flower,
 Before a summer evening's shower;
 There should'st rear thy royal form
 Like a young oak amid the storm
 Unerushed, unbowed, unruined!
 Let thy last glance burn through the air,
 And fall far down upon him there,
 Like lightning stroke from heaven!

There should'st thou mark o'er billowy crest,
 His white sail flutter and depart;
 No wild fears surging at thy breast,
 No vain hopes quivering round thy heart!
 And this brief, burning prayer alone,
 Leap from thy lips to Jove's high throne:

"Just Jove, thy wrathful vengeance stay,
 And spee! the traitor on his way!
 Make vain the siren's silver song,
 Let nereids smile the wave along!
 O'er the wild waters send his barque,
 Like a swift arrow to its mark!
 Let whirlwinds gather at his back,
 And drive him on his dastard track!
 Let thy red bolts behind him burn,
 And blast him should he dare to turn!"

 "Grace Greenwood" has given her later years to lectures, to correspondence for the Tribune, Times, and Independent, and to editing The Little Pilgrim, a magazine for children. Her juvenile stories have been repeatedly gathered into volumes. These are: A Forest Tragedy, and Other Tales, 1856; Stories and Legends of Travel and History, for Children, 1857; Stories from Famous Ballads, 1860; Bonnie Scotland: Tales of Her History, Heroes, and Poets, 1861; Stories of Many Lands; Stories and Sights of France and Italy, 1867. In the latter year a number of her graceful and more elaborate sketches were reprinted in Records of Five Years. New Life in New Lands, a record of travels in the West, appeared in 1873.

THE BABY IN THE BATH-TUB—FROM RECORDS OF FIVE YEARS.

"Annie! Sophie! come up quick, and see baby in her bath-tub!" cries a charming little maiden, running down the wide stairway of an old country house, and half-way up the long hall, all in a fluttering cloud of pink lawn, her soft dimpled cheeks tinged with the same lovely morning hue. In an instant there is a stir and a gush of light laughter in the drawing-room, and presently, with a movement a little more majestic and elder-sisterly, Annie and Sophie float noiselessly through the hall and up the soft-carpeted ascent, as though borne on their respective clouds of blue and white drapery, and take their way to the nursery, where a novel entertainment awaits them. It is the first morning of the eldest married sister's first visit home, with her first baby; and the first baby, having slept late after its journey, is about to take its first bath in the old house.

"Well, I declare, if here isn't mother, forgetting her dairy, and Cousin Nellie, too, who must have left poor Ned all to himself in the garden, lonely and disconsolate, and I am torn from my books, and Sophie from her flowers, and all for the sake of seeing a nine-months'-old baby kicking about in a bath-tub! What simpletons we are!"

Thus Miss Annie, the proude ladye of the family; handsome, haughty, with perilous proclivities toward grand socialistic theories, transcendentalism, and general strong-mindedness; pledged by many a saucy vow to a life of single dignity and freedom, given to studies artistic, æsthetic, philosophic, and ethical; a student of Plato, an absorber of Emerson, an exalter of her sex, a contemner of its natural enemies.

"Simpletons, are we?" cries pretty Elinor Lee, aunt of the baby on the other side, and "Cousin Nellie" by love's courtesy, now kneeling close by the bath-tub, and receiving on her sunny braids a liberal baptism from the pure, plashing hands of babyhood,—"simpletons, indeed! Did I not once see thee, O Pallas-Athene, standing rapt before a copy of the 'Crouching Venus'?" and this is a sight a thousand times more beautiful; for here we have color, action, radiant life, and such grace as the divinest sculptors of Greece were never able to entrance in marble. Just look at these white, dimpled shoulders, every dimple holding a tiny, sparkling drop,—these rosy, plashing feet and hands,—this laughing, roguish face,—these eyes, bright and blue and deep as lakes of fairyland,—these ears, like dainty sea-shells,—these locks of gold, dripping diamonds,—and tell me what cherub of Titian, what Cupid of Greuze, was ever half so lovely. I say, too, that Raphael himself would have jumped at the chance of painting Louise, as she sits there, towel in hand, in all the serene pride and chastened dignity of young maternity,—of painting her as Madonna."

"Why, Cousin Nellie is getting poetical for once, over a baby in a bath-tub!"

"Well, Sophie, is n't it a subject to inspire real poets, to call out and yet humble the genius of painters and sculptors? Is n't it an object for the reverence of 'a glorious human creature,'—such a pure and perfect form of physical life, such a starry little soul, fresh from the hands of God? If your Plato teaches otherwise, Cousin Annie, I'm glad I've no acquaintance with that distinguished heathen gentleman; if your Carlyle, with his 'soul above buttons' and babies, would growl, and your Emerson smile icily at the sight, away with them!"

"Why, Nellie, you goose, Carlyle is 'a man and a brother,' in spite of his 'Latter-Day Pamphlets,' and no ogre. I believe he is very well disposed toward babies in general; while Emerson is as tender as he is great. Have you forgotten his 'Threnody,' in which the sob of a mortal's sorrow rises and swells into an immortal's pean? I see that baby is very lovely; I think that Louise may well be proud of her. It's a pity that she must grow up into conventionalities and all that,—perhaps become some man's plaything, or slave."

"O, don't, sister!—'sufficient for the day is the worriment thereof.' But I think you and Nellie are mistaken about the pride. I am conscious of no such feeling in regard to my little Florence, but only of joy, gratitude, infinite tenderness, and solicitude."

Thus the young mother,—for the first time speaking, but not turning her eyes from the bath-tub.

"Ah, coz, it won't go! Young mothers are the proudest of living creatures. The sweetest and saintliest among you have a sort of subdued exultation, a meek assumption, an adorable insolence, toward the whole unmarried and childless world. I have never seen anything like it elsewhere."

"I have, in a bantam Biddy, parading her first brood in the hen-yard, or a youthful duck, leading her first little downy flock to the water."

"Ha, blasphemer! are you there?" cries Miss Nellie, with a bright smile, and a brighter blush. Blasphemer's other name is a tolerably good one, — Edward Norton, — though he is oftenest called "our Ned." He is the sole male representative of a wealthy old New England family, — the pride and darling of four pretty sisters, "the only son of his mother, and she a widow," who adores him, — "a likely youth, just twenty-one," handsome, brilliant, and standing six feet high in his stockings. Yet, in spite of all these unfavorable circumstances, he is a very good sort of a fellow. He is just home from the model college of the Commonwealth, where he learned to smoke, and, I blush to say, has a cigar in hand at this moment, just as he has been summoned from the garden by his pet sister, Kate, half wild with delight and excitement. With him comes a brother, according to the law, and after the spirit, — a young, slender, fair-haired man, but with an indescribable something of paternal importance about him. He is the other proprietor of baby, and steps forward with a laugh and a "Heh, my little water-nymph, my Iris!" and, by the bath-tub kneeling, catches a moist kiss from smiling baby lips, and a sudden wilting shower on shirt-front and collar, from moister baby hands.

Young collegian pauses on the threshold, essaying the look lofty and sarcastic, for a moment. Then his eye rests on Nellie Lee's blushing face, on the red, smiling lips, the braids of gold, sprinkled with shining drops, — meets those sweet, shy eyes, and a sudden, mysterious feeling, soft and vague and tender, floods his gay, young heart. He looks at baby again. "'Tis a pretty sight, upon my word! Let me throw away my cigar before I come nearer: it is incense too profane for such pure rites. Now give me a peep at Dian-the less! How the little witch revels in the water! A small Undine. Jolly, is n't it, baby? Why, Louise, I did not know that Floy was so lovely, such a perfect little creature. How fair she is! Why, her flesh, where it is not rosy, is of the pure, translucent whiteness of a water-lily."

No response to this tribute, for baby has been in the water more than long enough, and must be taken out, willy, nilly. Decidedly nilly it proves; baby proceeds to demonstrate that she is not altogether cherubic, by kicking and screaming lustily, and striking out frantically with her little dripping hands. But Madonna wraps her in soft linen, rolls her and pats her, till she grows good and merry again, and laughs through her pretty tears.

But the brief storm has been enough to clear the nursery of all save grandmama and Auntie Kate, who draw nearer to witness the process of drying and dressing. Tenderly the mother rubs the dainty, soft skin, till every dimple gives up its last hidden droplet; then, with many a kiss, and smile, and coo, she robes the little form in fairy-like garments of cambric, lace, flannel, soft as a moth's wing, and delicate embroidery. The small, restless feet are caught, and encased in comical little hose, and shod with Titania's own slippers. Then the light golden locks are brushed and twined into tendril-like curls, and lo! the beautiful labor of love is finished. Baby is bathed and dressed for the day.

"Well, she is a beauty! I don't wonder you and Charles are proud of her. O, Louise, if your father could have seen her! She is very like our first baby, the one we lost, at nearly — yes, just about her age." Here grandmama goes out, tearful, leaving spedunconscious her Parthian shaft; while, with a quick sob, which is neither for the father long dead, nor the sister never known, the young mother clasps her treasure closer and murmurs, "O, my darling, my love, my sweetest, sweetest one! stay with me always, always! O, I would that I could guard and shield you from every pain, every grief, — make your sweet life all beauty, love, and joy!"

Baby hardly understands this burst of sensibility, but the passionate embrace reminds her of something. She asks and receives. Like a bee on a lily-flower, she elings to the fair, sweet breast, murmuring contentedly now and then. Presently, the gurgling draughts grow less eager, the little hands cease to wander restlessly over the smooth, unmantled neck. The little head is thrown back, the blue eyes look with a satisfied smile into the brooding mother-face.

Next, her lips all moist with the white nectar, baby is given, with many an anxious injunction, into the eager arms of Auntie Kate, who, followed by a supernumerary nurse, bears her in triumph down hall and stairway, and out into a garden, all glorious and odorous with a thousand roses.

Here, on a shawl, gay-colored and soft, spread on the grass, under an acacia-tree, the little Queen of Hearts is deposited at last. Here she rolls and tumbles, and sends out shrill, sweet peals of laughter, as auntie and nurse pelt her with rose-buds and clover-tufts. Sometimes an adventurous spirit seizes her; she creeps energetically beyond shawl-bounds, her little province of Cashmere, makes a raid into the tall, inviting grass, clutches ruthlessly at butter-cups, breaks into nunneries of pale pannies, and decapitates whole families of daisies at a grasp. Sometimes, tired of predatory incursions, she lies on her back, and listens in a luxurious, lazy ecstasy to the gush of the fountain and the song of the robin, or watches the golden butterflies, coming from and going to nobody knows where, as though they had suddenly bloomed out of the sunshine, and died away into it again.

Away down the garden, in the woodbine arbor, by the little brook, sit the young collegian and fair Nellie Lee, talking very low, but very earnestly, on a subject vastly interesting to them, doubtless, for they seem to have quite forgotten baby. Yet her presence in the garden hallows the very air for them, gives a new joy and beauty to life, new sweetness to love.

The golden summer morning wears on. Papa is away with his fishing-rod; mamma sits at a window overlooking the garden, embroidering a dainty little robe, and under her cunning fingers the love of her heart and a thousand tender thoughts grow slowly into delicate white shapes of leaf and flower; grandmama is about her household duties, the tears of sad memory wiped from her eyes, and the light of the Christian's calm hope relit therein; Annie is in the library with Plato, but unusual softness lurks about her mouth, and she looks off her book now and then, and throws about her a strange, wandering glance, dreamy and tender to sadness; her sisters are in the drawing-room at their music, gay as birds; the lovers are we know where; and baby is still under the acacia-tree. But the white lilies are beginning to droop a little heavily over the sweet blue eyes, and she will soon drop away into baby dream-land.

All nature blooms, and shines, and sounds gently and lovingly, to humor her delicate senses; human love the richest and tenderest is round about her, within reach of her imperious little voice. God breathes himself into her little heart through all things,—love, light, food, sunshine, fragrance, and soft airs. All is well within and without the child, as all should be for all children under the sun, for every sinless, helpless little immortal, the like of whom Christ the Lord took into his tender arms and blessed. But how is it, dainty baby Floy, with thousands of thy brothers and sisters, as lovely and innocent as thou? Are there not such, to whom human love and care is denied, to whom nature seems unkind, of whom God seems forgetful, for whom even Christ's blessing is made of no avail?

*THE YOSEMITE VALLEY—FROM NEW LIFE IN NEW LANDS.

At the beginning, I would say, Let all mere lovers of pleasure, fond of benders and unbenders, all bon vivants, all dainty and dandiical people, all aged, timid, and feeble people, all people without a disciplined imagination, keep away from the Yosemite. The entire trip will prove to all such a disappointment and a drag, weariness, and hardship, and the valley itself a great hollow mockery of wild, vague, extravagant hopes—the biggest man-trap of the world. When you hear a traveller ask of the Yosemite, "Does it pay?" you may set him down as not fit to go there. But to men and women of simple minds, to healthy, happy natures, to brave and reverential souls, in sound, unpampered bodies, to "spirits finely touched," I would say at the beginning and finally, Come to the Yosemite, though you have compassed the world all but this; come for the crowning joys of years of pleasant travel; come and see what Nature, high-priestess of God, has prepared for them who love her, in the white heights and dark depths of the Sierras, in the profound valley itself, the temple of her ancient worship, with thunderous cataracts for organs, and silver cascades for choirs, and wreathing clouds of spray for perpetual incense, and rocks three thousand feet high for altars. . . .

The only drawback to the enjoyment of the ladies of our party was the discovery that the great Chicago monopoly had, by the means of an avant-courier despatched before daylight on a fiery mule, secured all the side-saddles, and that we must tarry there indefinitely, or take to the Mexican saddle, and riding en cavalier, both for our excursion to the Big Trees and our longer journey into the valley. So, with a tear for the modest traditions of our sex, and a shudder at the thought of the figures we should present, we four brave women accepted the situation, and, for the nonce, rode as woman used to ride in her happy, heroic days, before Satan, for her entanglement and enslavement, invented trained skirts, corsets, and side-saddles. We were fortunately provided with strong mountain suits of dark flannel and waterproof, which fitted us for this emergency, and for any rough climbing we had a fancy for; and that was not a little. Well, after a trial of some fifteen miles the first day, and twenty-six the second, we all came to the conclusion that this style of riding is the safest, easiest, and therefore the most sensible, for long mountain expeditions, and for steep, rough, and narrow trails. If Nature intended woman to ride horseback at all, she doubtless intended it should be after this fashion, otherwise we should have been a sort of land variety of the mermaid. . . .

Only a few miles from Paragoy's, and we were on Inspiration Point, looking down on the mighty Mecca of our pilgrimage,—on awful depth and vastness, wedded to unimagined brightness and loveliness,—a sight that appalled, while it attracted; a sublime terror; a beautiful abyss; the valley of the shadow of God!

It seemed to me as I gazed, that here was Nature's last, most cunning hiding-place for her utmost sublimities, her rarest splendors. Here she had worked her divinest miracles with water and sunlight,—lake, river, cataract, cascade, spray, mist, and rainbows by the thousand. It was but a little strip of smiling earth to look down on, after all; but ah! the stupendousness of its surroundings! There were arched and pillared rocks, so massive, so immense, it seemed they might have formed the foundation-walls of a continent; and domes so vast they seemed like young worlds rounding out of chaos.

The trail down from Inspiration Point is steep, rough, and somewhat perilous for inexperienced riders; but I prefer it, for its variety, and cool, shadowy places, to the shorter new trail by Glacier Point, which is wide, even, monotonously good, and almost wholly without shade. On our way down, our guide pointed out to us a large hollow tree fitted up with modern conveniences, in which a real hermit had kept house for some years. Disappointed in love or politics, he retired from the world to this rather public spot, where, finally, he died by his own hand. He left a large trunk, but with little in it.

This trail enters the valley near the Bridal Veil. Beautiful Pohono had dressed herself royally in rainbows to receive us. The sight of this fall, in the height of its summer glory, and the surpassing loveliness of the valley through all the five miles that remained for us to ride, charmed away our fatigue and restored us to vigor and gayety. We forded countless streams, cold as snow and bright as sunshine; we passed through forests of blooming azaleas and sweet wild roses and wondrous ferns, grand natural parks of oak and cedar, groves and avenues of locusts and pines,—indeed, of all sorts of trees; for the variety of foliage in the valley is wonderful. Much of the way we rode along the rapid Merced, a passionate, tumultuous stream, pushed on by cataracts. We readily recognized all the great rocks, from Watkins's magnificent photographs,—the "Sentinel," the "Three Graces," the "Cathedral Spires," the "Three Brothers," and "El Capitan," bluff and lordly, shouldering his way to the front. At the second hotel—Black's—dear friends ran out to meet us with a joyous greeting, and we felt at home even before we reached our pleasant quarters at the Hutchings House, and received from Mr. Hutchings the hearty, happy welcome he so well knows how to give. . . .

The Bridal Veil is my favorite Yosemite cataract. There is for me a tender, retrospective charm in the name. Just opposite to the Bridal Veil is the lovely little trickling cascade called the Virgin's Tears. Had the sight of the floating, flouting Veil anything to do with that lachrymose condition? We, who reached the Veil, lingered about it for hours,—read and slept, botanized and shouted poetry in each other's ears. When the rainbows came, we went far up into the very heart of the splendor. We could have jumped through the radiant hoops like circus performers. Of course, we got well soaked with the spray, and had to hang ourselves out on the rocks to dry.

ALICE CARY — PHEBE CARY.

ALICE CARY was born in Mount Healthy, near Cincinnati, in 1822. She first attracted notice as a writer by a series of sketches of rural life in the National Era, with the signature of Patty Lee. In 1850 she published, with her younger sister Phebe, a volume of Poems at Philadelphia.

A volume of prose sketches—Clovernook, or Recollections of Our Neighborhood in the West—followed in 1851. A second series of these pleasant papers appeared in 1853. A third gleaned from the same field, for the benefit of more youthful readers, was made in 1855 in Clovernook Children. Lyra, and Other Poems, was published in 1852; followed by Hagar, a Story of To-day. She has since published two other stories—Murried, not Mated, and Holly-wood—and a new collection of Poems in 1855.

Miss Alice Cary has rapidly attained a deservedly high position. Her poems are thoughtful, forcible, and melodiously expressed. In common with her prose writings, they are drawn from her own observation of life and nature.

PICTURES OF MEMORY.

Among the beautiful pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
Is one of a dim old forest,
That seemeth best of all:
Not for its gnarled oaks olden,
Dark with the mistletoe;
Not for the violets golden
That sprinkle the vale below;
Not for the milk-white lilies
That lean from the fragrant hedge,
Coquetting all day with the sunbeams,
And stealing their golden edge;
Not for the vines on the upland
Where the bright red berries rest,
Nor the pinks, nor the pale, sweet cowslip,
It seemeth to me the best.

I once had a little brother,
With eyes that were dark and deep—
In the lap of that old dim forest
He lieth in peace asleep:
Light as the down of the thistle,
Free as the winds that blow,
We roved there the beautiful summers
The summers of long ago;
But his feet on the hills grew weary,
And, one of the autumn eves,
I made for my little brother
A bed of the yellow leaves.

Sweetly his pale arms folded
My neck in a meek embrace,
As the light of immortal beauty
Silently covered his face:
And when the arrows of sunset
Lodged in the tree-tops bright,
He fell, in his saint-like beauty,
Asleep by the gates of light.

Therefore, of all the pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
The one of the dim old forest
Seemeth the best of all.

MULBERRY HILL.

Oh, sweet was the eve when I came from the mill,
Adown the green windings of Mulberry Hill:
My heart like a bird with its throat all in tune,
That sings in the beautiful bosom of June.

For there, at her spinning, beneath a broad tree,
By a rivulet shining and blue as the sea,
I first saw my Mary—her tiny feet bare,
And the buds of the sumach among her black hair.

They called me a bold enough youth, and I would Have kept the name honestly earned, if I could;
But, somehow, the song I had whistled was hushed,
And, spite of my manhood, I felt that I blushed.

I would tell you, but words cannot paint my delight,
When she gave the red buds for a garland of white,
When her cheek with soft blushes—but no, 'tis in vain!

Enough that I loved, and she loved me again.
Three summers have come and gone by with their charms,
And a cherub of purity smiles in my arms,
With lips like the rosebud and locks softly light
As the flax which my Mary was spinning that night.

And in the dark shadows of Mulberry Hill,
By the grass-covered road where I came from the mill,
And the rivulet shining and blue as the sea,
My Mary lies sleeping beneath the broad tree.

NOBILITY.

Hilda is a lofty lady,
Very proud is she—
I am but a simple herdsman
Dwelling by the sea.
Hilda hath a spacious palace,
Broad, and white, and high;
Twenty good dogs guard the portal—
Never house had I.

Hilda hath a thousand meadows—
Boundless forest lands:
She hath men and maids for service—
I have but my hands.
The sweet summer's ripest roses
Hilda's cheeks outvie—
Queens have paled to see her beauty—
But my beard have I.

Hilda from her palace windows
Looketh down on me,
Keeping with my dove-brown oxen
By the silver sea.
When her dulcet harp she playeth,
Wild birds singing nigh,
Cluster, listening, by her white hands—
But my reed have I.

I am but a simple herdsman,
With nor house nor lands;
She hath men and maids for service—
I have but my hands.
And yet what are all her crimsons
To my sunset sky—
With my free hands and my manhood
Hilda's peer am I.

MISS PHEBE CARY has, like her sister, been a frequent contributor to the periodicals of the day. She published in 1854 a volume of Poems and Parodies.

COMING HOME.

How long it seems since first we heard
The cry of "land in sight!"
Our vessel surely never sailed
So slowly till to-night.
When we discerned the distant hills,
The sun was scarcely set,
And, now the noon of night is passed,
They seem no nearer yet.

Where the blue Rhine reflected back
Each frowning castle wall,
Where, in the forest of the Hartz,
Eternal shadows fall—
Or where the yellow Tiber flowed
By the old hills of Rome—
I never felt such restlessness,
Such longing for our home.

Dost thou remember, oh, my friend,
When we beheld it last,
How shadows from the setting sun
Upon our cot were cast?
Three summer-times upon its walls
Have shone for us in vain;
But oh, we're hastening homeward now,
To leave it not again.

There, as the last star dropped away
From Night's imperial brow,
Did not our vessel "round the point?"
The land looks nearer now!
Yes, as the first faint beams of day
Fell on our native shore,
They're dropping anchor in the bay,
We're home, we're home once more!

The Cary sisters made their home in New York city, for many years, the centre of one of the choicest literary and art circles of that metropolis. They earned a living by the pen, a pure and womanly pen, and in time secured a competence for their wants. They were enabled to gather a library rich in standard works, to gratify their refined tastes, and to relieve the needy with their charity. Although Alice was "pensive and tender," while Phœbe was "witty and gay," the former, strong in energy and patience, bore the chief responsibility of their household, and thus allowed her sister, more passive and feminine in temperament, to consult her moods in writing. Beside two books of prose—Pictures of Country Life, 1859, a series of tales, and The Bishop's Son, a Novel, 1867—an edited volume, Epitaphs for Monumental Inscriptions from Approved Authors, 1865, and Snow-Berries, A Book for Young Folks, 1867, Alice has also written Ballads, Lyrics, and Hymns, 1866, the standard selection of her poetry, which contains some of the sweetest minor poems in the language, and The Lover's Diary, 1868. The latter begins with "Dreamland," and ranges with a series of exquisite lyrics of love through the phases of rhapsody, rejection, despair, hope, and betrothal, to married life. She also left a novel completed in manuscript. Phœbe, besides aiding her pastor, Dr. Charles F. Deems, in editing Hymns for all Christians, 1869, prepared Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love, in 1868, a worthy companion volume to her sister's works. "Beside, Alice and Phœbe left, at their death, poems enough uncollected to give each name two added volumes, one, together, a book of child-poems. The disparity in the actual intellectual product of the two sisters, in the same number of years, is very striking. It is the result, not so much of mental inequality, as of the compelling will, energy, industry, and the patience of labor of the elder sister."*

The two sisters, who ever treated each other with considerate love and delicacy, were one in spirit through life, and in death were not long divided. Alice Cary, after months of hopeless illness, died at her home in New York city, February 12, 1871, in her fifty-first year. She was buried, after commemorative services at the Church of the Strangers, in Greenwood Cemetery. Phœbe, in the sorrow of this bereavement, wrote the touching verses entitled "Light," and confidently said to a friend: "Alice, when she was here, always absorbed me, and she absorbs me still; I feel her constantly drawing me." She died at Newport, Rhode Island, July 31, 1871, aged forty-seven, and was laid at rest by her sister's side.

LIGHT.

While I hid mine eyes, I feared;
The heavens in wrath seemed bowed;
I look, and the sun with a smile breaks forth,
And a rainbow spans the cloud.

I thought the winter was here,
That the earth was cold and bare,
But I feel the coming of birds and flowers,
And the spring-time in the air.

I said that all the lips
I ever had kissed were dumb;
That my dearest ones were dead and gone,
And never a friend would come.

But I hear a voice as sweet
As the fall of summer showers;
And the grave that yawned at my very feet
Is filled to the top with flowers!

As if 't were the midnight hour,
I sat with gloom oppress;
When a light was breaking out of the east,
And shining unto the west.

I heard the angels call
Across from the beautiful shore;
And I saw a look in my darling's eyes,
That never was there before.

Transfigured, lost to me,
She had slipped from my embrace;
Now, lo! I hold her fast once more,
With the light of God on her face!

NEARER HOME—FROM POEMS OF FAITH, HOPE, AND LOVE.

One sweetly solemn thought,
Comes to me o'er and o'er;
I am nearer home to-day
Than I ever have been before;
Nearer my Father's house,
Where the many mansions be;
Nearer the great white throne,
Nearer the crystal sea;
Nearer the bound of life,
Where we lay our burdens down;

* A Memorial of Alice and Phœbe Cary, with some of their Later Poems. By Mary Clemmer Ames, 1873.

Nearer leaving the cross,
Nearer gaining the crown!

But lying darkly between,
Winding down through the night,
Is the silent, unknown stream,
That leads at last to the light.

Closer and closer my steps
Come to the dread abysm:
Closer Death to my lips
Presses the awful chrism.

Oh, if my mortal feet
Have almost gained the brink;
If it be I am nearer home
Even to-day than I think;

Father, perfect my trust;
Let my spirit feel in death,
That her feet are firmly set
On the rock of a living faith!

 A WOMAN'S CONCLUSIONS.

I said, if I might go back again
To the very hour and place of my birth;
Might have my life whatever I chose,
And live it in any part of the earth;

Put perfect sunshine into my sky,
Banish the shadow of sorrow and doubt;
Have all my happiness multiplied,
And all my suffering stricken out;

If I could have known in the years now gone,
The best that a woman comes to know;
Could have had whatever will make her blest,
Or whatever she thinks will make her so;

Have found the highest and purest bliss
That the bridal-wreath and ring inclose;
And gained the one out of all the world,
That my heart as well as my reason chose:

And if this had been, and I stood to-night
By my children, lying asleep in their beds,
And could count in my prayers, for a rosary,
The shining row of their golden heads;

Yea! I said, if a miracle such as this Could be wrought for me, at my bidding, still
I would choose to have my past as it is,
And to let my future come as it will!

I would not make the path I have trod
More pleasant or even, more straight or wide;
Nor change my course the breadth of a hair,
This way or that way, to either side.

My past is mine, and I take it all;
Its weakness — its folly, if you please;
Nay, even my sins, if you come to that,
May have been my helps, not hindrances!

If I saved my body from the flames
Because that once I had burned my hand;
Or kept myself from a greater sin
By doing a less — you will understand;

It was better I suffered a little pain,
Better I sinned for a little time,
If the smarting warned me back from death,
And the sting of sin withheld from crime.

Who knows its strength, by trial, will know
What strength must be set against a sin;
And how temptation is overcome
He has learned, who has felt its power within!
And who knows how a life at the last may show?
Why, look at the moon from where we stand!

Opaque, uneven, you say; yet it shines,
A luminous sphere, complete and grand!

So let my past stand, just as it stands,
And let me now, as I may, grow old;
I am what I am, and my life for me
Is the best — or it had not been, I hold.

 GATHERING BLACKBERRIES.

Little Daisy smiling wakes
From her sleep as morning breaks,
Why, she knoweth well;
Yet if you should ask her, surely
She would answer you demurely,
That she cannot tell.

Careful Daisy, with no sound,
Slips her white feet to the ground,
Saying, very low,
She must rise and help her mother,
And be ready, if her brother
Needs her aid, to go!

Foolish Daisy, o'er her lips
Only that poor falsehood slips,
Truth is in her cheeks;
Her own words cannot deceive her,
Her own heart will not believe her,
In a blush it speaks.

Daisy knows that, when the heat
Dries the dew upon the wheat,
She will be away;
She and Ernest, just another
Who, she says, is like a brother,
Making holiday.

For the blackberries to-day
Will be ripe, the reapers say,
Ripe as they can be;
And not wholly for the pleasure,
But lest others find the treasure,
She must go and see.

Eager Daisy, at the gate
Meeting Ernest, scarce can wait,
But she checks her heart;
And she says, her soft eyes beaming,
With an innocent, grave seeming:
"Is it time to start?"

Cunning Daisy tries to go
Very womanly and slow,
And to act so well
That, if any one had seen them,
With the dusty road between them,
What was there to tell?

Happy Daisy, when they gain
The green windings of the lane,
Where the hedge is thick;
For they find, beneath its shadow,
Wild sweet roses in the meadow,
More than they can pick.

Bending low, and rising higher,
Scarlet pinks their lamps of fire
Lightly swing about:
And the wind that blows them over
Out of sight among the clover,
Seems to blow them out!

Doubting Daisy, as she hies
Toward the field of berries, cries:
"What if they be red?"
Black and ripe they find them rather,
Black and ripe enough to gather,
As the reapers said.

Lucky Daisy, Ernest finds
Berries for her in the vines,
Hidden where she stands;
And with fearless arm he pushes
Back the cruel, briery bushes,
That would hurt her hands.

He would have her hold her cup
Just for him to fill it up,
But away she trips;
Picking daintily, she lingers
Till she dyes her pretty fingers
Redder than her lips.

Thoughtful Daisy, what she hears,
What she hopes, or what she fears,
Who of us can tell?
For if, going home, she carries
Richer treasure than her berries,
She will guard it well!

Puzzled Daisy does not know
Why the sun, who rises slow,
Hurries overhead:
He, that lingered at the morning,
Drops at night with scarce a warning
On his cloudy bed.

All too narrow at the start
Seemed the path, they kept apart,
Though the way was rough;
Now the path, that through the hollow,
Closely side by side they follow,
Seemeth wide enough.

Hopeful Daisy, will the days
That are brightening to her gaze
Brighter grow than this?
Will she, mornings without number,
Wake up restless from her slumber,
Just for happiness?

Will the friend so kind to-day,
Always push the thorns away,
With which earth is rife?
Will he be her true, true lover,
Will he make her cup run over
With the wine of life?

Blessèd Daisy, will she be,
If above mortality
Thus she stands apart;
Cursèd, if the hand, unsparing,
Let the thorus fly backward, tearing
All her bleeding heart!

Periled Daisy, none can know
What the future has to show;
There must come what must;
But, if blessings be forbidden,
Let the truth awhile be hidden—
Let her hope and trust.

Let all women born to weep,
Their hearts breaking—all who keep Hearts still young and whole,
Pray, as fearing no denying,
Pray, with me, as for the dying,
For this maiden's soul!

 AN ORDER FOR A PICTURE—FROM BALLADS, LYRICS, AND HYMNS.

O good painter, tell me true,
Has your hand the cunning to draw
Shapes of things that you never saw?
Ay? Well, here is an order for you.

Woods and cornfields, a little brown,—
The picture must not be over-bright,—

Yet all in the golden and gracious light
Of a cloud, when the summer sun is down.
Always and always, night and morn,
Woods upon woods, with fields of corn
Lying between them, not quite sere,
And not in the full, thick, leafy bloom,
When the wind can hardly find breathing-room
Under their tassels,—cattle near,
Biting shorter the short green grass,
And a hedge of sumach and sa-safras,
With bluebirds twittering all around,—
(Ah, good painter, you can't paint sound!)—
These, and the house where I was born,
Low and little, and black and old,
With children, as many as it can hold,
All at the windows, open wide,—
Heads and shoulders clear outside,
And fair young faces all ablush:
Perhaps you may have seen, some day,
Roses crowding the self-same way,
Out of a wilding, wayside bush.

Listen closer. When you have done
With woods and cornfields and grazing herds,
A lady, the loveliest ever the sun
Looked down upon you must paint for me:
Oh, if I only could make you see
The clear blue eyes, the tender smile,
The sovereign sweetness, the gentle grace,
The woman's soul, and the angel's face,
That are beaming on me all the while,
I need not speak these foolish words:
Yet one word tells you all I would say,—
She is my mother: you will agree
That all the rest may be thrown away.

Two little urchins at her knee
You must paint, sir: one like me,—
The other with a clearer brow,
And the light of his adventurous eyes
Flashing with boldest enterprise:
At ten years old he went to sea,—
God knoweth if he be living now,—
He sailed in the good ship "Commodore,"—
Nobody ever crossed her track
To bring us news, and she never came back.
Ah, 'tis twenty long years and more
Since that old ship went out of the bay
With my great-hearted brother on her deck:
I watched him till he shrank to a speck,
And his face was toward me all the way.
Bright his hair was, a golden brown,
The time we stood at our mother's knee:
That beauteous head, if it did go down,
Carried sunshine into the sea!

Out in the fields one summer night
We were together, half afraid
Of the corn-leaves' rustling, and of the shade
Of the high hills, stretching so still and far,— Loitering till after the low little light
Of the candle shone through the open door,
And over the hay-stack's pointed top,
All of a tremble and ready to drop,
The first half-hour, the great yellow star,
That we, with staring, ignorant eyes,
Had often and often watched to see
Propped and held in its place in the skies
By the fork of a tall red mulberry-tree,
Which close in the edge of our flax-field grew,—
Dead at the top,—just one branch full
Of leaves, notched round, and lined with wool,
From which it tenderly shook the dew
Over our heads, when we came to play
In his handbreadth of shadow, day after day.
Afraid to go home, Sir; for one of us bore

A nest full of speckled and thin-shelled eggs, —
The other, a bird, held fast by the legs,
Not so big as a straw of wheat:
The berries we gave her she would n't eat,
But cried and cried, till we held her bill,
So slim and shining, to keep her still.

At last we stood at our mother's knee.

Do you think, Sir, if you try,
You can paint the look of a lie?
If you can, pray have the grace
To put it solely in the face
Of the urchin that is likest me:
I think 't was solely mine, indeed:
But that's no matter, — paint it so;
The eyes of our mother — (take good heed) —

Looking not on the nest-full of eggs,
Nor the fluttering bird, held so fast by the legs,
But straight through our faces down to our lies,
And, oh, with such injured, reproachful surprise!
I felt my heart bleed where that glance went,
as though

A sharp blade struck through it.

You, Sir, know
That you on the canvas are to repeat
Things that are fairest, things most sweet, —
Woods and cornfields and mulberry-tree. —
The mother, — the lads, with their bird, at her knee:
But, oh, that look of reproachful woe!
High as the heavens your name I'll shout,
If you paint me the picture, and leave that out.

 THE SUMMER STORM.

At noon-time I stood in the door-way to see
The spots, burnt like blisters, as white as could be,
Along the near meadow, shoved in like a wedge
Betwixt the high-road, and the stubble-land's edge.

The leaves of the elm-tree were dusty and brown,
The birds sat with shut eyes and wings hanging down;

The corn reached its blades out, as if in the pain
Of crisping and scorching it felt for the rain.

Their meek faces turning away from the sun,
The cows waded up to their flanks in the run,
The sheep, so herd-loving, divided their flocks,
And singly lay down by the sides of the rocks.

At sunset there rose and stood black in the east
A cloud with the forehead and horns of a beast,
That quick to the zenith went higher and higher,
With feet that were thunder and eyes that were fire.

Then came a hot sough, like a gust of his breath,
And the leaves took the tremble and whiteness of death, —

The dog, to his master, from kennel and kin,
Came whining and shaking, with back crouching in.

At twilight the darkness was fearful to see:
"Make room," cried the children, "O mother,
for me!"

As climbing her chair, and her lap, with alarm,
And whisper, — "Was there ever seen such a storm!"

At morning, the run where the cows cooled their flanks

Had washed up a hedge of white roots from its banks;

The turnpike was left a blue streak, and each side
The gutters like rivers ran muddy and wide.

The barefooted lad started merry to school,
And the way was the nearest that led through the pool;

The red-bird wore never so shining a coat,
Nor the pigeon so glossy a ring on her throat.

The teamster sat straight in his place, for the nonce,
And sang to his sweetheart and team, both at once;
And neighbors shook hands o'er the fences that day,
And talked of their homesteads instead of their hay.

 THE BRIDAL VEIL.

We're married, they say, and you think you have won me, —

Well, take this white veil from my head, and look on me:

Here's matter to vex you, and matter to grieve you,
Here's doubt to distrust you, and faith to believe you, —

I am all as you see, common earth, common dew;
Be wary, and mould me to roses, not rue!

Ah! shake out the filmy thing, fold after fold,
And see if you have me to keep and to hold, —
Look close on my heart — see the worst of its sinning —

It is not yours to-day for the yesterday's winning —
The past is not mine — I am too proud to borrow —
You must grow to new heights if I love you tomorrow.

We're married! I'm plighted to hold up your praises,

As the turf at your feet does its handful of daisies;
That way lies my honor, — my pathway of pride,
But, mark you, if greener grass grow either side,
I shall know it, and keeping in body with you,
Shall walk in my spirit with feet on the dew!

We're married! Oh, pray that our love do not fail!
I have wings flattened down and hid under my veil:
They are subtle as light — you can never undo them,
And swift in their flight — you can never pursue
them,

And spite of all clasping, and spite of all bands,
I can slip like a shadow, a dream, from your hands.

Nay, call me not cruel, and fear not to take me,
I am yours for my lifetime, to be what you make me, —

To wear my white veil for a sign, or a cover,
As you shall be proven my lord, or my lover;
A cover for peace that is dead, or a token
Of bliss that can never be written or spoken.

 MONA, SEVEN YEARS OLD.

When I remember the time we met,
I pause for a little, and give God praise,
That he, of his grace, in my life has set
That gladdest, goldenest day of my days.

Breaking out of her homespun gown,
Just like a wild-flower out of its bur;
Legs bare to the knees, and the shoulders down
To the waist, I marvelled and mused at her

Her hands had been kissed and kissed by the sun
Brown as berries: she held her hair
Away from her dove-like eyes with one,
And stared at me, straight as eyes could stare,

One moment, — then, being well content,
She dropt the tresses, that over the white,
Clear brow and sweet eyes came and went
Like shadows blowing across the light.

"A picture, such as the painter loves,"

I said, and passed, but she would not stay;
Those sweet eyes staring, round as a dove's,
Held me and haunted me all the day.

One foot on the other, bare and brown, —
The shining fall of her dead-leaf hair, —
Legs and shoulders out of her gown, —
She held me and haunted me, everywhere.

IN DESPAIR.

The sun comes up and the sun goes down,
And day and night are the same as one;
The year grows green and the year grows brown,
And what is it all, when all is done!
Grains of sombre, or shining sand
Sliding into or out of the hand.

And men go down in ships to the seas,
And a hundred ships are the same as one;
Backward and forward blows the breeze,
And what is it all, when all is done!
A tide, with never a shore in sight,
Setting steadily on to the night.

The fisher droppeth his net in the stream,
And a hundred streams are the same as one;
And the maiden dreameth her love-lit dream,
And what is it all, when all is done!
The net of the fisher, the burden breaks,
And alway the dreaming, the dreamer wakes.

MONA'S MOTHER.

In the porch that brier-vines smother,
At her wheel, sits Mona's mother.
O, the day is dying bright!
Roseate shadows, silver dimming,
Ruby lights through amber swimming,
Bring the still and starry night.

Sudden she is 'ware of shadows
Going out across the meadows
From the slowly sinking sun, —
Going through the misty spaces
That the rippling ruby laces, —
Shadows, like the violets tangled,
Like the soft light, softly mingled,
Till the two seem just as one!
Every tell-tale wind doth waft her
Little breaths of maiden laughter.
O, divinely dies the day!
And the swallow, on the rafter,
In her nest of sticks and clay, —
On the rafter, up above her,
With her patience doth reprove her,
Twittering soft the time away;
Never stopping, never stopping,
With her wings so warmly dropping
Round her nest of sticks and clay.

"Take, my bird, O take some other Eve than this to twitter gay!"
Sayeth, prayeth Mona's mother,
To the slender-throated swallow
On her nest of sticks and clay;
For her sad eyes needs must follow
Down the misty, mint-sweet hollow,
Where the ruby colors play
With the gold and with the gray.
"Yet, my little Lady-feather,
You do well to sit and sing,"
Crieth, sigheth Mona's mother.
"If you would, you could no other.
Can the leaf fall with the spring?
Can the tendril stay from twining
When the sap begins to run?
Or the dew-drop keep from shining
With her body full o' the sun?"

Nor can you, from gladness, either;
Therefore, you do well to sing.
Up and o'er the downy lining
Of your bird-bed I can see
Two round little heads together,
Pushed out softly through your wing.
But alas! my bird, for me!"
In the porch with roses burning
All across, she sitteth lonely.
O, her soul is dark with dread!
Round and round her slow wheel turning
Lady brow down-dropped serenely,
Lady hand uplifted queenly,
Pausing in the spinning only
To rejoin the broken thread, —
Pausing only for the winding,
With the carded silken binding
Of the flax, the distaff-head.

All along the branches creeping,
To their leafy beds of sleeping
Go the blue-birds and the brown;
Blackbird stoppeth now his clamor,
And the little yellowhammer
Droppeth head in winglet down.
Now the rocks rise bleak and barren
Through the twilight, gray and still;
In the marsh-land now the heron
Clappeth close his horny bill.
Death-watch now begins his drumming,
And the fire-fly, going, coming,
Weaveth zigzag lines of light, —
Lines of zigzag, golden-threaded,
Up the marshy valley, shaded
O'er and o'er with vapors white.
Now the lily, open-hearted,
Of her dragon-fly deserted,
Swinging on the wind so low,
Gives herself, with trust audacious,
To the wild warm wave that washes
Through her fingers, soft and slow.

O the eyes of Mona's mother!
Dim they grow with tears unshed;
For no longer may they follow
Down the misty mint-sweet hollow,
Down along the yellow mosses
That the brook with silver crosses.
Ah! the day is dead, is dead;
And the cold and curdling shadows,
Stretching from the long, low meadows,
Darker, deeper, nearer spread,
Till she cannot see the twining
Of the briars, nor see the lining
Round the porch of roses red, —
Till she cannot see the hollow,
Nor the little steel-winged swallow,
On her clay-built nest o'erhead.

Mona's mother falleth mourning:
O, 't is hard, so hard, to see
Prattling child to woman turning,
As to grander company!
Little heart she lulled with hushes
Beating, burning up with blushes,
All with meditative dreaming
On the dear delicious gleaming
Of the bridal veil and ring;
Finding in the sweet ovations
Of its new, untried relations
Better joys than she can bring.

In her hand her wheel she keepeth,
And her heart within her leapeth,

With a burdened, bashful yearning,
For the babe's weight on her knee,
For the loving lip of glee,
Sweet as larks' throats in the morning,
Sweet as hum of honey-bee.

"O my child!" cries Mona's mother,
"Will you, can you take another
Name ere mine upon your lips?
Can you, only for the asking,
Give to other hands the clasping
Of your rosy finger-tips?"

Fear on fear her sad soul borrows,—
O the dews are falling fair!
But no fair thing now can move her;
Vainly walks the moon above her,
Turning out her golden furrows
On the cloudy fields of air.

Sudden she is 'ware of shadows,
Coming in across the meadows,
And of murmurs, low as love,—
Murmurs mingled like the meeting
Of the winds, or like the beating
Of the wings of dove with dove.
In her hand the slow wheel stoppeth,
Silken flax from distaff droppeth,
And a cruel, killing pain
Striketh up from heart to brain;
And she knoweth by that token
That the spinning all is vain,
That the troth-plight has been spoken,
And the thread of life thus broken
Never can be joined again.

 CONVERSATION.*

Forgive me, but I needs must press
One question, since I love you so;
And kiss me, darling, if it's Yes,
And, darling, kiss me if it's No!

It is about our marriage day,—
I fain would have it even here;
But kiss me if it's far-away,
And, darling, kiss me if it's near!

Ah, by the blushes crowding so
On cheek and brow, 't is near I guess;
But, darling, kiss me if it's No,
And kiss me, darling, if it's Yes!

And with what flowers shall you be wed?
With flowers of snow? or flowers of flame?
But be they white, or be they red,
Kiss me, my darling, all the same!

And have you sewed your wedding dress?
Nay, speak not, even to whisper low;
But kiss me, darling, if it's Yes,
And, darling, kiss me if it's No!

ELISE JUSTINE BAYARD.

MISS E. J. BAYARD, the daughter of Mr. Robert Bayard of Glenwood, near Fishkill, N. Y., is the author of a number of poems, several of which have appeared in the Knickerbocker Magazine and Literary World. She married Mr. Fulton Cutting, and died about 1850. The following is noticeable for its thought and feeling, and no less for its happy literary execution.

* These four poems are from A Lover's Diary. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1868.

FUNERAL CHANT FOR THE OLD YEAR.

'Tis the death-night of the solemn Old Year!
And it calleth from its shroud
With a hollow voice and loud,
But serene:

And it saith—"What have I given
That hath brought thee nearer heaven?
Dost thou weep, as one forsaken,
For the treasures I have taken?
Standest thou beside my hearse
With a blessing or a curse?
Is it well with thee, or worse
That I have been?"

'Tis the death-night of the solemn Old Year!
The midnight shades that fall,—
They will serve it for a pall,
In their gloom;—

And the misty vapours crowding
Are the withered corse enshrouding;
And the black clouds looming off in
The far sky, have plumed the coffin,
But the vaults of human souls,
Where the memory unrolls
All her tear-besprinkled scrolls,
Are its tomb!

'Tis the death-night of the solemn Old Year!
The moon hath gone to weep
With a mourning still and deep
For her loss:—

The stars dare not assemble
Through the murky night to tremble—
The naked trees are groaning
With an awful, mystic moaning—
Wings sweep upon the air,
Which a solemn message bear,
And hosts, whose banners wear
A crowned cross!

'Tis the death-night of the solemn Old Year!
Who make the funeral train
When the queen hath ceased to reign?
Who are here

With the golden crowns that follow
All invested with a halo?
With a splendour transitory
Shines the midnight from their glory,
And the pean of their song
Rolls the aisles of space along,
But the left hearts are less strong,
For they were dear!

'Tis the death-night of the solemn Old Year!
With a dull and heavy tread
Tramping forward with the dead
Who come last?

Ling'ring with their faces groundward,
Though their feet are marching onward,
They are shrieking,—they are calling
On the rocks in tones appalling,
But Earth waves them from her view,—
And the God-light dazzles through,
And they shiver, as spars do,
Before the blast!

'Tis the death-night of the solemn Old Year!
We are parted from our place
In her motherly embrace,
And are lone!

For the infant and the stranger
It is sorrowful to change her—
She hath cheered the night of mourning
With a promise of the dawning;
She hath shared in our delight
With a gladness true and bright:
Oh! we need her joy to-night—
But she is gone!

CAROLINE MAY.

THIS lady is the daughter of a clergyman of the Dutch Reformed Church of the City of New York. The chief collection of her poems is included in a few pages of Mr. Griswold's Female Poets of America. She is the editor of a Collection of the Female Poets of America, which appeared at Philadelphia in 1848, and of a volume, Treasured Thoughts from Favorite Authors. In 1864, a volume of Poems was published.

THE SABBATH OF THE YEAR.

It is the sabbath of the year;
And if ye'll walk abroad,
A holy sermon ye shall hear,
Full worthy of record.
Autumn the preacher is; and look—
As other preachers do,
He takes a text from the one Great Book,
A text both sad and true.
With a deep, earnest voice, he saith—
A voice of gentle grief,
Fitting the minister of Death—
"Ye all fade as a leaf;
And your iniquities, like the wind,
Have taken you away;
Ye fading flutterers, weak and blind,
Repent, return, and pray."
And then the Wind ariseth slow,
And giveth out a psalm—
And the organ-pipes begin to blow,
Within the forest calm;
Then all the Trees lift up their hands,
And lift their voices higher,
And sing the notes of spirit bands
In full and glorious choir.
Yes! 'tis the sabbath of the year!
And it doth surely seem,
(But words of reverence and fear
Should speak of such a theme.)
That the corn is gathered for the bread,
And the berries for the wine,
And a sacramental feast is spread,
Like the Christian's pardon sign.
And the Year, with sighs of penitence,
The holy feast bends o'er;
For she must die, and go out hence—
Die, and be seen no more.
Then are the choir and organ still,
The psalm melts in the air,
The Wind bows down beside the hill,
And all are hushed in prayer.
Then comes the Sunset in the West,
Like a patriarch of old,
Or like a saint who hath won his rest,
His robes, and his crown of gold;
And forth his arms he stretcheth wide,
And with solemn tone and clear
He blesseth, in the eventide,
The sabbath of the year.

HARRIET WINSLOW SEWALL.

THE following poem was brought into notice a few years since by Mr. Longfellow, who included it in the choice collection of minor poems, The Waiif. It was printed there anonymously with the omission of a few of its stanzas. The author was Miss Harriet Winslow, since married to Mr. Charles Liszt; and now Mrs. S. E. Sewall, of Melrose, Massachusetts.

TO THE UNSATISFIED.

Why thus longing, thus for ever sighing
For the far-off, unattained and dim;
While the beautiful all around thee lying,
Offers up its low, perpetual hymn?
Wouldst thou listen to its gentle teaching,
All thy restless yearning it would still,
Leaf and flower and laden bee are preaching
Thine own sphere, though humble, first to fill.
Poor indeed thou must be, if around thee
Thou no ray of light and joy canst throw;
If no silken cord of love hath bound thee
To some little world through weal or woe;
If no dear eyes thy fond love can brighten,—
No fond voices answer to thine own;
If no brother's sorrow thou canst lighten
By daily sympathy and gentle tone.
Not by deeds that win the crowd's applauses,
Not by works that give thee world-renown,
Not by martyrdom, or vaunted crosses,
Canst thou win and wear the immortal crown:
Daily struggling, though unloved and lonely,
Every day a rich reward will give;
Thou wilt find, by hearty striving only,
And truly loving, thou canst truly live.
Dost thou revel in the rosy morning,
When all nature hails the lord of light;
And his smile, nor low, nor lofty scorning,
Gladdens hall and hovel, vale and height.
Other hands may grasp the field and forest;
Proud proprietors in pomp may shine:
But with fervent love if thou adorest,
Thou art wealthier;—all the world is thine.
Yet, if through earth's wide domains thou rovest,
Sighing that they are not thine alone,
Not those fair fields, but thyself thou lovest,
And their beauty, and thy wealth are gone.
'Nature wears the colours of the spirit';
Sweetly to her worshipper she sings;
All the glory, grace, she doth inherit
Round her trusting child she fondly flings.

ELIZABETH LLOYD.

MISS ELIZABETH LLOYD, a lady of Philadelphia, is the author of the following poem, which recently attracted attention in "going the rounds of the press." It was stated in the newspapers to have been taken from an Oxford edition of Milton's Works. She is now the widow of Mr. Robert Howell, of Philadelphia.

MILTON ON HIS BLINDNESS.

I am old and blind!
Men point at me as smitten by God's frown:
Afflicted and deserted of my kind,
Yet am I not cast down.
I am weak, yet strong:
I murmur not, that I no longer see;
Poor, old, and helpless, I the more belong,
Father Supreme! to Thee.
O merciful One!
When men are farthest, then art Thou most near;
When friends pass by, my weakness to shun,
Thy chariot I hear.
Thy glorious face
Is leaning toward me, and its holy light
Shines in upon my lonely dwelling-place—
And there is no more night.

On my bended knee,
I recognise Thy purpose, clearly shown;
My vision Thou hast dimmed, that I may see Thyself, Thyself alone.
I have naught to fear;
This darkness is the shadow of Thy wing;
Beneath it I am almost sacred—here
Can come no evil thing.
Oh! I seem to stand
Trembling, where foot of mortal ne'er hath been,
Wrapped in the radiance from Thy sinless land,
Which eye hath never seen.
Visions come and go;
Shapes of resplendent beauty round me throng;
From angel lips I seem to hear the flow
Of soft and holy song.
It is nothing now,
When heaven is opening on my sightless eyes,
When airs from Paradise refresh my brow,
The earth in darkness lies.
In a purer clime,
My being fills with rapture—waves of thought
Roll in upon my spirit—strains sublime
Break over me unsought.
Give me now my lyre?
I feel the stirrings of a gift divine:
Within my bosom glows unearthly fire
Lit by no skill of mine.

CAROLINE CHESEBRO'.

MISS CHESEBRO' was born at Canandaigua, where she has always resided with her family. Her first literary articles, a series of tales and sketches, were written for Graham's Magazine and Holden's Dollar Magazine in 1848. Since that time contributions have appeared from her pen in The Knickerbocker, Putnam's, Harpers', and other magazines, and in the newspapers, to which on two occasions, in Philadelphia and New York, she contributed prize tales. In 1851 she published a collection of tales and sketches, Dream-Land by Daylight, a Panorama of Romance. The title is suggestive of the fanciful, reflective, and occasionally sombre character of the work, qualities which also mark Miss Chesebro's later and more elaborate productions, Isa, a Pilgrimage, The Children of Light, and The Little Cross-Bearers, tales, each occupying a separate volume, and written with energy and thoughtfulness. The scene of these writings is laid in America at the present day. They are grave in tone, and aim rather at the exhibition of mental emotion than the outward, salient points of character.

THE BLACK FROST.

Methinks

This word of love is fit for all the world,
And that for gentle hearts: 'other name
Would speak of gentler thoughts than the world owns.

It was a clear, calm night. Brightly shone the innumerable stars: the fixed orbs of giant magnitude, the little twinkling points of light, the glorious constellations—in their imperial beauty stood they, gazing upon the mysterious face of darkness—a clear, calm, terribly cold night.

Winter had not as yet fairly set in. There had been no snow, but it was very late in the autumn, and the grass, and the flowering shrubs and trees, looked as though they had each and all felt the cruel breath of the Destroyer, as he pronounced the doom upon them.

People rubbed their hands, and talked with quiet lips of the hard winter coming, as they hastened, in the increasing shadows of the night, to their homes. The children, warmed and gladdened by the bright fires that were kindled on the hearthstones, romped, and frolicked, and prophesied, with knowing looks, about snow-balling, sleigh-rides, skating, and all manner of fun. The young girls met together, and talked merrily of coming gaieties; the old man wondered whether he should see another spring-time; and the poor crept to their beds at nightfall, glad to forget everything—cold, hunger, and misery—in sleep.

Midnight came. More and more brightly shone the stars—they glowed, they trembled, and smiled on one another. The cold became intense—in the deep silence how strangely looked the branches of the leafless trees! how desolate the gardens and the forest—how very still the night did seem!

Close beside an humble cottage, under a huge bush of flowering-currant, had flourished all the autumn a tiny violet-root. And still, during the increasing cold of the latter days, the leaves had continued green and vigorous, and the flowers opened.

There had been an arrival at the cottage that day. Late in the afternoon, a father and mother, with their child, had returned from long wandering in foreign lands.

A student had watched their coming. In the morning, he had gathered a flower from that little root in their garden, and now, as he sat in the long hours of night, poring over his books, he kept the violet still beside him, in a vase which held the treasures of a green-house, and his eyes rested often on the pale blue modest flower.

At nightfall, a youthful form had stood for a moment at the cottage-door, and the young invalid's eyes, which so eagerly sought all familiar things, at last rested on those still living flowers—flowers, where she had thought to find all dead, even as were those buds which once gave fair promise of glorious opening in her girl-heart! Unmindful of the cold and dampness, she stepped from the house, and passed to the violet-root, and, gathering all the flowers but one, she placed them in her hair, and then hastened with a shiver back to the cottage.

In the fast-increasing cold, the leaves that were left bowed down close to the earth, and the delicate flowers crowning the pale, slender stem, trembled under the influence of the frost.

The little chamber where Mary lay down to rest, was that which, from her childhood, had been set apart for her occupation; a pleasant room, endeared to her by a thousand joyful dreams dreamed within its shade—solemnized to her also by that terrible wakening to sorrow which she had known.

She reclined now on her bed in the silentness, the darkness; but she rested not, she slept not. The young girl's eyes, fixed on the far-off stars, on the glorious heavens, her thoughts wandered wild and free, but her body was circled by the arm of Death.

She had not yet slept at all that night; she had not slept for many nights. Winter was reigning in Mary's heart—it had long reigned there. She was remembering now, while others nestled in the arms of forgetfulness, those days that were gone, when she had looked with such trust and joy upon the years to be—how that she had longed for the slowly-unfolding future to develop itself fully, completely! how she had wholly given herself to the fancies and the hopes of the untried. Alas! she had reached, she had passed, too soon, that crisis of life which unfolds next to the expectant the season of winter—she had seen the gay flowers fading, the leaves withering, the glory of summer pass. And yet how young, how very young she was!

Gazing from her couch out upon the "steadfast skies"—thinking on the past, and the to-come—the to-come of the dying! Yet the thought of death and judgment terrified her not. Surely she would find mercy and heart's ease in the Heaven over which the merciful is king!

But suddenly, in the night's stillness, in the coldness and the darkness, she arose; and steadfastly gazed, for an instant, upward, far upward, where a star shot from the zenith, down, down, to the very horizon. She fell back at the sight, her spirit sped away with that swift glory flash—Mary was dead!

In that moment the student also stood beside his window. The fire in the grate had died away, the lamp was nearly exhausted; wearied with his long-continued work, he had risen, and now, for an instant, stood looking upon the heavens. There was sadness and weariness in his heart. The little violet, and the travellers' return, had strangely affected him: for once he found not in his books the satisfaction which he sought: he felt that another life than that of a plodding book-worm might be led by him. His dreams in the morning hour were not pleasant as he slept. They were solely of one whose love he had set at naught for the smiles of a sterner love; of one whom he now thought of, as in the spring-time of his life, when she was all the world to him. And now that she was come again, and he should see her once more! ah, he would bow before her as he once had, and she, who was ever so gentle, so loving, so good, would not spurn him: she would forget his forgetfulness, she would yet give to him that peace, that joy which he had never quaffed at the fountains of learning!

Up rose the sun, and people saw how the Black Frost was over the earth, binding all things in its hard, close, cold embrace. Later in the morning, a little child, passing by the cottage, paused and peeped through the bars upon the violet-root. Yesternight, when she went home from school, she saw the flowers blooming there, the pale, blue, faint-hearted looking flowers—and now she remembered to look if they were there still. But though she looked long and steadfastly where the sunlight fell beneath the currant-bush, she could not see that she sought for; so passing quietly through the gate, she stooped down where the violets had been, and felt the leaves, and knew that they were frozen; and it was only by an effort that she kept back the fast-gathering tears, when she looked on the one flower Mary had left, and saw how it was drooped and dead.

But a sadler sight, and one more full of meaning, was presented in the pleasant chamber, whose window opened on the yard where the blossoming bushes grew. For there a woman bent over the bed where another frost-killed flower lay, moaning in the bitterness of grief, the death of her one treasure!

Still later in the day another mourner stood in that silent place, thinking of the meteor and the violet. It was the student, he who in remorse and anguish came, bemoaning the frost-blighted. Too late, too late, he came to tell his love—too late to crave forgiveness, too late to soothe the broken-hearted! Now stood he himself in the valley of the shadow of woe.

And the snow and the storms abounded. Winter was come!

Miss Chesebro' died at Piermont, her residence on the Hudson, February 16, 1873. Her later works, which show conscientious study and a continual growth in power, were: Victoria, or the World Overcome: A Novel, 1856; The Beautiful Gate, and Other Tales; Philly and Kit; Amy Carr, 1863; Peter Carradine, 1863; The Foe in the Household, republished from the Atlantic Monthly, 1871.

EDWARD MATURIN,

The author of several historical novels, and of a volume of poems of merit, is the son of the celebrated Irish novelist and dramatist, the Rev. Charles Robert Maturin. He has for a number of years been a resident of New York, and has married an American lady.

Mr. Maturin has published Montezuma, The Last of the Aztecs, a spirited prose romance, drawn from the brilliant and pathetic history of the Mexican chieftain, followed by Benjamin, the Jew of Granada, a story the scene of which is laid in the romantic era of the fall of the Moslem empire in Spain, and in 1848, Eva, or the Isles of Life and Death; a historical romance of the twelfth century in England, in which Dermot M'Murrough acts a leading part.

In 1850 he published Lyrics of Spain and Erin, a volume of genuine enthusiasm, and refined though irregular poetic expression. The author, who shows much of the poet in his prose writings, finds in the stirring historical ballad of Spain and the pathetic legend of Ireland his appropriate themes.

The latest productions of Mr. Maturin were Bianca, a passionate story of Italian and Irish incident; Melnoth, the Wanderer; Sejanus, and other Roman Tales.

THE SEASONS—FROM A POEM "THE WOODS."

What spirit moves within your holy shrine?
'Tis Spring—the year's young bride, that gladly pours

Above—around—an effluence Divine
Of light and life, falling in golden showers—
And with her come the sportive nymphs in dance
Like waves that gambol in the Summer's glance,
Untwining bowers from their Winter's sleep,
Unlocking rivers from their fountains deep,
Tinting the leaf with verdure, that had lain
Long-hid, like gold within the torpid grain,
Chanting her choral song, as Nature's eyes
First greet the bridal of the earth and skies.

The Spring is past;—and blushing summer comes,
Music and sunshine through her scented way;
The birds send gladly from their bowered homes,
Their pæan at the birth of flowery May!
From close to shut of Day; yes, far and near
The spell of mystic music chains the ear;
All Nature, from her bosom pouring forth
Sounds such as make a Temple of the earth
Returns in one full stream of harmony
The angel-echoes that she hears on high—
Beautiful Summer! fling thy crown of flowers
O'er this dull earth through winter's weary hours;
Let them not fade—oh! let not sere and blight
Darken thy prism'd couch with shade of Night;
Let not thy music ever break its spell,
Like heaven-bound pilgrim bidding earth "Farewell!"

Oh! silence not thy music—let thy flowers
Be earth's bright stars responding to the skies;
Wreathing her graves with those immortal bowers.
Thy rosy hand 'twined 'round the Dead in Paradise!

Oh! not a vision here but it must pass
Like our own image from Life's spectre-glass;

Summer is faded, and the Autumn sere
 Gathers the fallen leaves upon her bier,
 And, like the venom'd breath of the Simoom
 That turns Zahara's desert to a tomb,
 Breathes on the buried Summer's shrined abode,
 And leaves a spectre what she found—a God!
 'Tis thus, ye woods! your melancholy tale
 Hath more of truth than rose and lily pale,
 When the bright glories of the summer vie
 To make the earth a mirror of the sky.
 In Autumn's time-worn volume do we read
 The sacred moral—All things earthly fade;
 And trace upon the page of every leaf
 That first and latest human lesson—grief!
 But hark! that dreary blast that rolls
 Like heart-wrung wailings of unburied souls,
 'Tis winter's breath
 That comes from the land of Death
 Where the Arctic fetters the main;
 Like the lightning it darts
 When its meteor parts
 And dissolves, like the cloud in rain;
 And now pale Winter cometh frore
 From the dark North's drear and lifeless shore;
 And round his form, trembling and old,
 Hangs his snow-robe in drifting fold,
 As that ye see on the mountain-height,
 Like Death asleep in the calm moonlight—
 His diadem gleams with the icicle bright,
 And his sceptre of ice to destroy and to smite;
 Like a monarch he sweeps from the mount to the vale,
 In his chariot that glistens with hoar-frost and hail:
 His palacè the iceberg adorned with spars,
 Like a wandering heaven all fretted with stars.

WILLIAM ROSS WALLACE

Is a native of Lexington, Kentucky. He received his education in Indiana, studied law and came to New York, where he has been since a resident. In 1848, he published Alban, a Poetical Composition, "a romance of New York, intended to illustrate the influence of certain prejudices of society and principles of law upon individual character and destiny.* In 1851, he published Meditations in America, and other Poems. They are mostly marked by a certain grandeur of thought and eloquence of expression. He has written many poems for Harper's, the New York Ledger, etc. In 1862 he published: The Liberty Bell, a Poem; illustrated.

OF THINE OWN COUNTRY SING.

I met the wild-eyed Genius of our Land
 In Huron's forest vast and dim;
 I saw her sweep a harp with stately hand;
 I heard her solemn hymn.
 She sang of Nations that had passed away
 From her own broad imperial clime;
 Of Nations new to whom she gave the sway:
 She sang of God and Time.
 I saw the PAST with all its rhythmic lore:
 I saw the PRESENT clearly glow;
 Shapes with veiled faces paced a far dim shore
 And whispered "Joy" and "Wo!"
 Her large verse pictured mountain, vale, and bay,
 Our wide, calm rivers rolled along,
 And many a mighty Lake and Prairie lay
 In the shadow of her Song.

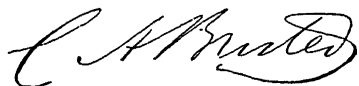

* Griswold's Poets of America, Art. Wallace.

As in Missouri's mountain range, the vast Wild Wind majestically flies
 From crag to crag till on the top at last
 The wild Wind proudly dies.
 So died the Hymn—"O Genius! how can I Crown me with Song as thou art crowned?"
 She, smiling, pointed to the spotless sky
 And the forest-tops around—
 Then sang—"Not to the far-off Lands of Eld
 Must thou for inspiration go:
 There Milton's large imperial organ swelled,
 There Avon's waters flow.
 "No Alien-Bard where Tasso's troubled Lyre
 Made sorrow fair, unchallenged dwells—
 Where deep-eyed Danté with the wreath of fire
 Came chanting from his Hells.
 "Yet sometimes sing the old majestic themes
 Of Europe in her song enshrined:
 These going wind-like o'er thy Sea of Dreams,
 May liberalize the mind.
 "Or learn from mournful ASIA, as she lies
 Musing at noon beneath her stately palms,
 Her angel-lore, her wide-browed prophecies,
 Her solemn-sounding psalms:
 "Or sit with AFRIC when her eyes of flame
 Smoulder in dreams, beneath their swarthy lids,
 Of youthful Sphynx, and Kings at loud acclaim
 On new-built Pyramids.
 "But know thy Highest dwells at Home: there
 Art
 And choral Inspirations spring;
 If thou would'st touch the Universal Heart,
 OF THINE OWN COUNTRY SING.

CHARLES ASTOR BRISTED,

The only son of the late Rev. John Bristed and Magdalen Bentzon, eldest daughter* of the late John Jacob Astor, was born in New York in 1820. He entered Yale College, where he took the first Berkeleyian prize for Latin composition solus in the freshman and sophomore years, and divided the Berkeleyian classical prize of the senior year with A. R. Macdonough, a son of Commodore Macdonough. He was a frequent contributor at this time to the Yale Literary Magazine. Having completed his studies at Yale, he went to England, and passed five years at the University of Cambridge, taking his B. A. degree at Trinity College in 1845. At Trinity he gained a classical prize the first year, the under-graduate and bachelor prizes for English essays, and the first prize-cup for an English oration. He was also elected foundation-scholar of the college in 1844. In the university he gained the under-graduate's Latin essay prize in 1843, and was placed eighth in the Classical Tripos of his year.

Having returned to America, he was married in 1847 to the daughter of the late Henry Brevoort, one of the earliest friends and collaborators of Washington Irving.

Mr. Bristed was at this time and afterwards a frequent contributor of articles, poetical translations, critical papers on the classics, and sketches of society, to the Literary World, Knickerbocker, the Whig Review, and other journals. Mr. Bristed edited in 1849 Selections from Catullus, a school edition, by G. G. Cookesley, one of the assistant-masters of Eton, which he revised, with additional notes.

In 1850 he published A Letter to the Hon. Horace Mann, in reply to some reflections of the latter on Stephen Girard and John Jacob Astor, in a tract entitled "Thoughts for a Young Man."

In 1852 appeared The Upper Ten Thousand, a collection of sketches of New York society, contributed to Fraser's Magazine.

At the same time Mr. Bristed published two volumes of a graver character, Five Years in an English University, in which he described with spirit, in a knowing, collegiate style, the manners, customs, studies, and ideas of a complex organization and mode of life but little understood in America. In a rather extensive appendix to the first edition of this work the author added a series of his college orations and prize essays, and of the examination papers of the university. The work was an acceptable one to scholars, and those interested in the educational discipline on this side of the Atlantic, as well as to the general reader.

Of late years Mr. Bristed has passed much of his time in Paris, and in the summer at Baden-Baden. In a frequent correspondence with the New York Spirit of the Times he has recorded the life of Europe passing under his eye, in matters of art, literature, the drama, and the social aspect of the times.

The writings of Mr. Bristed exhibit the union of the man of the world and of books. His pictures of society are somewhat remarkable for a vein of freedom and candor of statement. As a critic of Greek and Latin classical topics he is diligent and acute, displaying some of the best qualities of the trained English university man. He has also published numerous occasional clever poetical translations of classical niceties from Theocritus, Ovid, and such moderns as Walter de Maup.

Mr. Bristed, who has resided at Washington, published in 1867 The Interference Theory of Government—a book denunciatory, on principle, of the tariff, and of prohibitory liquor laws. A volume of fugitive articles was privately printed by him at Baden, in 1858, entitled Pieces of a Broken-down Critic. He died January 14, 1874.

He had of late been a frequent contributor to the Galaxy, both anonymously and under his signature of "Carl Benson." In 1872 he brought out a revised edition of his Five Years in an English University. A volume of Anacreontics was printed for private circulation.

HENRY R. JACKSON

Was born at Athens, Georgia, in 1820. He is the son of Dr. Henry Jackson, formerly professor of natural philosophy in Franklin college in that state. He was educated to the bar, and early held the office of United States district attorney for Georgia. At the commencement of the war with Mexico he raised at Savannah a company of one hundred men, called the Jasper Greens; marched to Columbus to form a regiment; wa-lected colonel, proceeded to Mexico, and served with distinction. On his return he was appointed Judge of the Superior Court of the Eastern District of Georgia. For five years he was Resident Minister at Vienna, to which he was appointed in 1853. During the rebellion, he served as brigadier-general in the Confederate army.

In 1850 Mr. Jackson published a volume, a collection of fugitive verses, Talulah and other Poems. Its themes are chiefly local, and of a patriotic interest, or occupied with the fireside affections. The expression is spirited and manly. His Georgia lyrics, and his descriptions of the scenery of the state, are animated and truthful productions.

THE LIVE-OAK.

With his gnarled old arms, and his iron form,

Majestic in the wood,

From age to age, in the sun and storm,

The live-oak long hath stood;

With his stately air, that grave old tree,

He stands like a hooded monk,

With the grey moss waving solemnly

From his shaggy limbs and trunk.

And the generations come and go,

And still he stands upright,

And he sternly looks on the wood below,

As conscious of his might.

But a mourner sad is the hoary tree,

A mourner sad and lone,

And is clothed in funeral drapery

For the long since deal and gone.

For the Indian hunter beneath his shade

Has rested from the chase;

And he here has woo'd his dusky maid—

The dark-eyed of her race;

And the tree is red with the gushing gore

As the wild deer panting dies:

But the maid is gone, and the chase is o'er,

And the old oak hoarsely sighs.

In former days, when the battle's din

Was loud amid the land,

In his friendly shadow, few and thin,

Have gathered Freedom's band;

And the stern old oak, how proud was he

To shelter hearts so brave!

But they all are gone—the bold and free—

And he moans above their grave.

And the aged oak, with his locks of grey,

Is ripe for the sacrifice;

For the worm and decay, no lingering prey,

Shall he tower towards the skies!

He falls, he falls, to become our guard,

The bulwark of the free,

And his bosom of steel is proudly bared

To brave the raging sea!

When the battle comes, and the cannon's roar

Booms o'er the shuddering deep,

Then nobly he'll bear the bold hearts o'er

The waves, with bounding leap.

Oh! may those hearts be as firm and true,

When the war-clouds gather dun,

As the glorious oak that proudly grew

Beneath our southern sun.

HENRY W. PARKER.

THE REV. HENRY W. PARKER, of Brooklyn, New York, is the author of a volume of poems pub-ished at Auburn, New York, in 1850. It is a delicate book, with many proofs of refinement and scholarship, while a certain philosophical texture runs through it. An appendix contains several ingenious and fine-thoughted prose papers.

In 1851 Mr. Parker recited a poem, The Story of a Soul, before the Psi Upsilon Convention at Hamilton College.

 A volume of Verses by H. W. P. was issued in 1862.

THE CITY OF THE DEAD.

Go forth and breathe the purer air with me,
And leave the city's sounding streets;
There is another city, sweet to see,
Whose heart with no delirium beats;
The solid earth beneath it never feels
The dance of joy, the rush of care,
The jar of toil, the mingled roll of wheels;
But all is peace and beauty there.

No spacious mansions stand in stately rows
Along that city's silent ways;
No lofty wall, nor level pavement, glows,
Unshaded from the summer rays;
No costly merchandise is heaped around,
No pictures stay the passer-by,
Nor plumed soldiers march to music's sound,
Nor toys and trifles tire the eye.

The narrow streets are fringed with living green,
And weave about in mazes there;
The many hills bewilder all the scene,
And shadows veil the noontide glare.
No clanging bells ring out the fleeting hours,
But sunlight glimmers softly thro',
And marks the voiceless time in golden showers
On velvet turf and lakelets blue.

The palaces are sculptured shafts of stone
That gleam in beauty thro' the trees;
The cottages are mounds with flowers o'ergrown;
No princely church the stranger sees,
But all the grove its pointed arches rears,
And tinted lights shine thro' the leaves,
And prayers are rained in every mourner's tears
Who for the dead in silence grieves.

And when dark night descends upon the tombs,
No reveller's song nor watchman's voice
Is here! no music comes from lighted rooms
Where swift feet fly and hearts rejoice;
'Tis darkness, silence all; no sound is heard
Except the wind that sinks and swells,
The lonely whistle of the midnight bird,
And brooks that ring their crystal bells.

A city strange and still!—its habitants
Are warmly housed, yet they are poor—
Are poor, yet have no wish, nor woes and wants;
The broken heart is crushed no more,
No love is interchanged, nor bought and sold,
Ambition sleeps, the innocent
Are safe, the miser counts no more his gold,
But rests at last and is content.

A city strange and sweet!—its dwellers sleep
At dawn, and in meridian light,—
At sunset still they dream in slumber deep,
Nor wake they in the weary night;
And none of them shall feel the hero's kiss
On Sleeping Beauty's lip that fell,
And woke a palace from a trance of bliss
That long had bound it by a spell.

A city strange and sad —we walk the grounds,
Or seek some mount, and see afar

The living cities shine, and list the sounds
Of throbbing boat and thundering car.
And we may go; but all the dwellers here,
In autumn's blush, in winter's snow,
In spring and summer's bloom, from year to year,
They ever come, and never go!

CHARLES G. EASTMAN,

OF Vermont, for some time editor of the Vermont Patriot at Montpelier, is the author of a volume of Poems published in 1848. They are marked by facility in the use of lyric and ballad measures, and many are in a familiar sportive vein.

A PICTURE.

The farmer sat in his easy chair
Smoking his pipe of clay,
While his hale old wife with busy care
Was clearing the dinner away;
A sweet little girl with fine blue eyes
On her grandfather's knee was catching flies.

The old man laid his hand on her head,
With a tear on his wrinkled face,
He thought how often her mother, dead,
Had sat in the self-same place;
As the tear stole down from his half-shut eye,
"Don't smoke!" said the child, "how it makes you cry!"

The house-dog lay, stretched out on the floor
Where the shade after noon used to steal,
The busy old wife by the open door
Was turning the spinning wheel,
And the old brass clock on the mantel-tree
Had plodded along to almost three,—

Still the farmer sat in his easy chair,
While close to his heaving breast,
The moistened brow and the cheek so fair
Of his sweet grandchild were pressed;
His head, bent down, on her soft hair lay—
Fast asleep were they both, that summer day!

JOHN ORVILLE TERRY,

OF Orient, a village of Suffolk county, Long Island, published in New York in 1850 a volume of characteristic rural life, entitled The Poems of J. O. T., consisting of Song, Satire, and Pastoral Descriptions, chiefly depicting the Scenery, and illustrating the Manners and Customs of the Ancient and Present Inhabitants of Long Island. The book answers to its title. The verses are written with ease and fervor, though sometimes carelessly, and have a genuine flavor of reality in the portraits of individuals, the various characteristics of nature and the seasons, the sea, and landscape. In his patriotic and satirical effusions, the author has something of the spirit of Freneau.

AUNT DINAH.

Embowered in shade, by the side of a wood,
The cot of aunt Dinah delightfully stood,
A rural retreat, in simplicity drest,
Sequestered it sat like a bird in its nest:
Festooned with the brier, and scented with rose,
Its windows looked out on a scene of repose,
Its wood all in green, and its grass all in bloom,
Like the dwelling of peace in a grove of perfume.

Tho' the skin of aunt Dinah was black as a coal,
The beams of affection enlightened her soul;
Like gems in a cavern, that sparkle and blaze,
The darkness but adds to the strength of their rays;

Or the moon looking out from her evening shroud,
Or the sun riding forth from the edge of a cloud,
So benevolence shone in her actions alway,
And the darkness of life became radiant with day.

What tho' she were poor, aunt Dinah's estate
The world was unable to give or create,
Her wealth was her virtues, and brightly they shone,
With a lustre unborrowed, and beauty their own;
Her nature was goodness, her heart was a mine
Of jewels, more precious than words can define,
And she gave them with such a profusion and grace,
Their light gave complexion and hue to her face.

Aunt Dinah has gone to the land of the good,
And her ashes repose by her favorite wood,
But her lonely old cottage looks out o'er the plain,
As if it would welcome its mistress again;
And long may it stand in that rural retreat,
To mind us of her we no longer may meet,
When we go after blackberries, joyful and gay,
And forget the kind hostess who welcomed us aye.

CHARLES OSCAR DUGUÉ,

THE author of several volumes of poetry in the French language, is a native of Louisiana, born at New Orleans, May 1, 1821. His parents were both Americans by birth, of French descent. He was early sent to France, where he was educated at Clermont Ferrand in Auvergne, and at the College of St. Louis in Paris. While a student, he wrote verses, which Chateaubriand commended for their noble and natural expression, without affectation or extravagance. Thus encouraged, on his return to New Orleans, he published in 1847 his Essais Poétiques, the topics of which are descriptions of Southern scenery, sentimental and occasional poems. In 1852 he published two dramatic works, on subjects drawn from the romantic legends of Louisiana;—Mila ou La Mort de La Salle, and Le Cygne, ou Mingo, an Indian plot, in which Tecumseh is one of the characters. In the same year he took the field as editor of a daily paper in New Orleans, l'Orléanais, in which he advocated the Compromise Resolutions. Mr. Dugué is now a member of the bar at New Orleans. He has written a manuscript work, entitled Philosophie Morale, which is to be published in French and English.

XAVIER DONALD MACLEOD.

MR. MACLEOD is the son of the Rev. Alexander McLeod, a Presbyterian clergyman of eminence, who emigrated to this country in 1794, and the grandson of Niel McLeod, the entertainer of Dr. Johnson at Mull in the Hebrides. Mr. McLeod was born in the city of New York, November 17, 1821, and took orders in the Episcopal Church in 1845. After being settled for a short time in a country parish, he in 1848 visited Europe, where he became a Roman Catholic. Since his return in 1852, Mr. McLeod has devoted himself to authorship, a career which he commenced at an early age, having contributed tales and poems to the New Yorker in 1841. He has published Pynnshurst, his Wanderings and his Ways of Thinking, a romance of European travel, The Blood-Stone, a story of talismanic influence, Les-cure, or the Last Marquis, and the Life of Sir Walter Scott, prepared from the Life by Lockhart.

 His last works were biographies of Fernando Wood, and of Mary Queen of Scots. He was subsequently ordained to the priesthood in the Roman Catholic Church, and died from injuries received in a railroad accident near Cincinnati, July 20, 1865.

E. G. SQUIER.

EPHRAIM GEORGE SQUIER was born in the town of Bethlehem, Albany County, New York, June 17, 1821. He is a lineal descendant of Cornet Auditor Samuel Squier, one of Oliver Cromwell's lieutenants, who figures in the Correspondence, the "Thirty-Five Unpublished Letters of Cromwell," communicated to the historian Carlyle, and published by him in Fraser's Magazine.

The younger sons of this Samuel Squier emigrated to America, and their descendants took an active part in the colonial events which followed the Restoration. The great-grandfather of our author, Philip Squier, served under Wolcott in the capture of Louisburg; and his grandfather, Ephraim Squier, fought side by side with Col. Knowlton at Bunker Hill. He was also with Arnold in the terrible winter journey through the wilderness of the Kennebec, in the expedition against Canada. He lived to be one of the veterans of the war, dying in 1842 at the venerable age of ninety-seven. The father of the subject of our present sketch is a devoted Methodist minister in the northern part of New York and of Vermont. In his youth, Squier obtained his education according to the New England fashion, by working on the farm in summer, and teaching a common school in winter. At eighteen, we find him attempting literature in the publication of a little paper in the village of Charlton, Saratoga County, while more seriously qualifying himself for the profession of a Civil Engineer. The disastrous period of 1837-39, which put a stop for a time to all works of public improvement, necessarily diverted Mr. Squier from the career which he had marked out for himself. His knowledge of engineering, however, has since been of the most effectual service to him, in his investigations both at home and abroad, and has contributed much to their success. Diverted in this manner from his profession, Mr. Squier next made his appearance in print, in 1840, as the editor of a monthly periodical in Albany, entitled Parlor Magazine, which lasted a year, and which was succeeded by the Poet's Magazine, based upon the idea of making a contemporaneous collection of American poetry, a sort of National Anthology. But two numbers were issued.

His next effort was of more pith and importance, in his contributions to and virtual editorship of the New York State Mechanic (1841-2), published at Albany, and occupied with the interests of the mechanics, and a change in the prison system of the state, injurious to their callings. At this time he prepared a volume of information on the Chinese.*

In 1843 he went to Hartford, Connecticut, and

* The Chinese as they are, &c., by G. T. Lay; with Illustrative and Corroborative Notes, Additional Chapters on the Ancient and Modern History, Ancient and Modern Intercourse, &c. By E. G. Squier, 8vo. Albany. 1842.

for two years edited the Hartford Daily Journal, an ardent advocate of Henry Clay, as a type of American character; and to his duties as editor added the part of an efficient organizer of the Whig party in Connecticut.

Early in 1845, Mr. Squier accepted the editorship of the Scioto Gazette published at Chillicothe, Ohio, with which he retained his connexion for nearly three years, interrupted only by his election as Clerk of the Legislative Assembly of the State during the winter of 1847-8. Immediately upon his arrival in Ohio, in conjunction with Dr. Davis, he commenced a systematic investigation of the Aboriginal Monuments of the Mississippi Valley, the results of which he embodied in a voluminous Memoir, which was published by the Smithsonian Institution, and constitutes the first volume of its Contributions to Knowledge.*

Previously to this, the researches of Mr. Squier had attracted the attention of the venerable Albert Gallatin, at whose request he prepared a Memoir on the Ancient Monuments of the West, which was published in the Transactions of the American Ethnological Society, and also in a separate form.†

E. G. Squier

The work published by the Smithsonian Institution, in the number, variety, and value of the facts which it embodies, is undoubtedly entitled to a front rank in all that relates to American Archæology. The memoir of Mr. Caleb Atwater published in 1820, in the Transactions of the American Antiquarian Society, was, previously to the appearance of this work, the only authority

* Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley, comprising the Results of Extensive Original Surveys and Explorations. By E. G. Squier, A.M., and E. H. Davis, M.D. 4to. pp. 400.

† Observations on the Aboriginal Monuments of the Mississippi Valley, the Character of the Ancient Earthworks Structure and Purposes of the Mounds, etc., etc. By E. G. Squier.

on the subject. In the language of Mr. Gallatin, "it is very incomplete, has many mistakes, and is in no degree comparable to the work published by the Smithsonian Institution," which has been accepted as a standard in the department to which it relates. The results of Mr. Squier's inquiries into our Western antiquities are briefly;

1st. That the earthworks of the West are of a high but indeterminate antiquity; one, nevertheless, sufficiently great to admit of physical and natural changes, which, in historic regions, it has required thousands of years to bring about.

2d. That the ancient population of the Mississippi Valley was numerous and widely spread, as evinced from the number and magnitude of the ancient monuments, and the extensive range of their occurrence.

3d. That this population was essentially homogeneous in blood, customs, and habits; that it was stationary and agricultural; and although not having a high degree of civilization, was nevertheless possessed of systematic forms of religion and government.

4th. That the facts of which we are in possession, suggest a probable ancient connexion between the race of the mounds, and the semi-civilized aboriginal families of Central America and Mexico, but that there exists no direct evidence of such relationship.

Upon the question, What became of the race of the Mounds? Mr. Squier has not, we believe, expressed an opinion. His writings, however, imply a total disregard of all hypotheses which would ascribe the ancient monuments of the Mississippi Valley to others than a purely aboriginal origin, as idle puerile fancies.

The "Ancient Monuments" was followed by another publication from Mr. Squier's pen by the Smithsonian Institution in 1849;—Aboriginal Monuments of the State of New York, from Original Surveys and Explorations, under the auspices of the New York Historical Society, a work which was afterwards enlarged in a volume entitled, Antiquities of the State of New York, with a Supplement on the Antiquities of the West. This work established that the small and irregular earthworks, and other aboriginal remains, north-east of the great lakes, were to be ascribed to a comparatively recent period, and were probably due to the Indian tribes found in occupation of the country at the time of the discovery.

When General Taylor became President in 1848, Mr. Squier received the appointment of Chargé d'Affaires of the United States to the republics of Central America, in the discharge of which he negotiated three treaties with Nicaragua, Honduras, and San Salvador respectively. As an ardent advocate of American rights and interests, as well as of the political independence of the Central American States, he secured a personal influence on the Isthmus which has been directed to several objects of political and general interest, amongst which the opening, on most advantageous terms, of two new inter-oceanic routes, is not the least. His dispatches, published under order of Congress, fill two considerable volumes. He nevertheless found time, in the short period of his official duties, which were brought to a termination on the death of General Taylor, to make various explorations into the antiquities of the country, an account of which, as well as of his general political and social observations, etc., is included in his two valuable volumes entitled Nicaragua; its People, Scenery, and Monuments, published in 1852, which in original investigation, spirit of adventure, and picturesque narrative, is a companion to Stephens's Incidents of Travel in Central America and Yucatan.

Mr. Squier had previously, in 1851, published his volume, The Serpent Symbol, or the Worship of the Reciprocal Principles of Nature in America, the object of which seems to have been to show that the many resemblances, amounting in some instances to identities, between the manners, customs, institutions, and especially religions, of the great families of men in the old and new world, were not necessarily derivative, or the results of connexions or relationship, recent or remote. On the contrary, that these resemblances are due to like organizations, influenced by common natural suggestions, and the moulding force of circumstances.

On the publication of the work on Nicaragua, Mr. Squier visited Europe, where he was introduced to the chief geographical and ethnological societies of England, Germany, and France; made the personal acquaintance of Humboldt, Ritter (who has introduced a translation of his work on Nicaragua to the German public), Lepsius, Jomard, Maury, and the remaining leaders of archaeological and geographical science. The first diploma of the Geographical Society of France, for 1853, was awarded to Mr. Squier, who was at the same time elected associate of the National Society of Antiquarians of France, an honor which has been conferred upon only one other American, the Hon. Edward Everett.

While in Europe Mr. Squier kept up his taste for antiquarian investigations by an examination of the remains at Stonehenge, the results of which were communicated in a paper to the American Ethnological Society. He also, in conjunction with Lord Londesborough, made some interesting explorations amongst the early British barrows of the north of England, near Scarborough.

In 1853 Mr. Squier again visited Central America for the purpose of investigating the line of an inter-oceanic railway, which his deductions on his previous visit had led him to consider possible, between some convenient harbor on the Gulf of Mexico and the Bay of Fonseca on the Pacific. The result of this special point of investigation has been communicated to the public in Mr. Squier's preliminary report of the Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway Company, of which he is Secretary. His further observations and adventures, at this time, are included in the two works which he has prepared, entitled Honduras and San Salvador, Geographical, Historical, and Statistical, with original maps and illustrative sketches, and a more personal volume, Hunting a Puma, comprising adventures, observations, and impressions during a year of active explorations in the States of Nicaragua, Honduras, and San Salvador, Central America. The numerous illustrations to these works are remarkable for their merit. They are from the pencil of the artist, Mr. D. C. Hitchcock, who accompanied Mr. Squier on his journeys as draft-man. The various vocabularies, plans, drawings of monuments, and other archaeological materials collected during this last expedition, it is presumed will be embodied in a separate form.

Besides the writings which we have enumerated, Mr. Squier has been an industrious contributor to the periodical, newspaper, and scientific literature of the day, on topics of politics affecting the foreign relations of the country with the States of Central America; the antiquities and ethnology of the aboriginal tribes of the country, in various journals, and in the Transactions of the American Ethnological Society, of which he has been a prominent member.

In 1863 Mr. Squier was appointed United States Commissioner to Peru. Eight years later he was chosen first president of the Anthropological Institute of New York. His recent works comprise: Waihua, or Adventures on the Mosquito Shore, 1855; The States of Central America, with a Chapter on the Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway, 1858; Monograph on the Authors who have Written on the Languages of Central America; Tropical Fibres: Their Production and Economic Extraction, 1861; Is Cotton "King"? Sources of Cotton Supply, 1861; and a new edition of Honduras, Descriptive, Historical, and Statistical, 1871. He is understood to be the editor of Mr. Frank Leslie's publications.

ELISHA KENT KANE,

THE eminent Arctic explorer, was born in Philadelphia, Feb. 3, 1822. He took his degree at the Medical University of Pennsylvania in 1843; entered the United States Navy as assistant surgeon, and was attached as a physician to the first American embassy to China. Availing himself of the facilities of his position, he visited parts of China, the Philippines, Ceylon, and the interior of India. He is said to have been the second, if not the first person, having been certainly the first white person, to descend the crater of the Tael of Luzon, suspended by a bamboo rope around his body, from a projecting crag, two hundred and three feet above the scoriae and debris. Upon this expedition, or one which followed it to the Indian Archipelago, he narrowly escaped with his life from the Ladrones who assailed him, sustained successfully an attack of an entire tribe of savages of the Negrito race, and was exposed to hardships under which his travelling companion, Baron Loe of Prussia, sank and died at Java. After this he ascended the Nile to the confines of Nubia, and passed a season in Egypt. He travelled through Greece on foot, and returned in 1846 through Europe to the United States. He was at once ordered to the coast of Africa, and when there, in 1847, made an effort to visit the slave marts of Whydah. He took the African fever, and was sent home in a very precarious state of health, from which, however, he recovered sufficiently to visit Mexico during the war as a volunteer. He made his way through the enemy's country with despatches for the American Commander-in-Chief from the President, with the notorious spy company of the brigand Dominguez as his escort; and, after a successful engagement with a party of the enemy, whom they encountered at Nopaluca, he was forced to combat his companions single-handed to save the lives of his prisoners, Major-General Torrejon, General Gaona, and others, from their fury. He had his horse killed under him, and was badly wounded; but was restored to health by the hospitality and kind nursing of the grateful Mexicans, particularly the Gaona family of Puebla, by whom he was thus enabled to remain on service in Mexico till the cessation of hostilities.

When the first Grinnell Expedition for the recovery of Sir John Franklin was projected in 1850, Dr. Kane was appointed senior surgeon and naturalist of the squadron, composed of the Advance and the Rescue, which set sail from New York May 22 of that year, under the command of Lieut. De Haven. After traversing the waters of Baffin's Bay to Melville Bay the expedition crossed to Lancaster Sound and Barrow Straits, and ascended Wellington Channel, where the notable discoveries were made which have given to the map of the world the names of Maury Channel, Grinnell Land, and Mount Franklin. The winter was passed by the expedition imbedded in the ice floe. From the thirteenth of January, 1851, to the fifth of June, the vessels drifted a distance of six hundred miles, when the ice pack immediately surrounding them was broken up in Baffin's Bay. At this time Dr. Kane met Lieut. Bellot, the young French officer whose melancholy fate in the Arctic Regions in August, 1853, was so greatly enhanced to the public mind by the successful results of the efforts at discovery which were announced at the same moment with his death.

D. S. KANE

He was then attached to the Prince Albert of the English expedition. After visiting the Greenland settlements of Proven and Uppernavik, with an unsuccessful attempt, against floes and icebergs, to resume the search through Wellington Channel, the expedition returned to New York in September. The duties and scientific employments of Dr. Kane during the voyage were arduous and constant. After his return he employed himself upon the preparation of his journal for publication, and bringing before the public in lectures at Washington and the chief Atlantic cities, his views in reference to another attempt at Arctic discovery. His account of his voyage, The U. S. Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin; A Personal Narrative, was written and left for publication in the hands of the Harpers, when he sailed on his second Arctic expedition from New York, on the 31st May, 1853, in command of the Advance, fitted out by the liberality of Mr. Grinnell of New York, and Mr. Peabody, the wealthy broker of London. His design on this voyage was to advance to the head of Baffin's Bay, and in the winter and spring of 1854 traverse with dogs and sledges the upper portions of the peninsula or island of Greenland, in an endeavor to reach the supposed open Polar sea.

The publication of the book which Dr. Kane had left behind him was delayed by the burning of the edition, just then completed, at the great fire of the Messrs. Harper's establishment in Cliff and Pearl streets in December, 1853. The stereotype plates were saved, and the work was published in the spring of 1854. It is written with great fidelity and spirit, in a style highly characteristic of the life and energy of the man. Its descriptions are vivid, and its felicity of expression remarkable, illuminating to the unscientific reader the array of professional and technical terms with which the subject is appropriately invested. There is a frosty crystallization, as it were, about the style, in keeping with the theme. The scientific merits of the work are important, particularly in the careful study of the ice formations, on which subject Dr. Kane has mentioned his intention to prepare an elaborate essay for the Smithsonian publications. Not the least attraction of the book are the numerous careful drawings and spirited illustrations from the pencil of Dr. Kane himself.

Dr. Kane has also been a contributor to the scientific journals of Europe and America. In 1843 he published a paper on Kyestine, which was well received by the medical profession.

ARCTIC INCIDENTS.

I employed the dreary intervals of leisure that heralded our Christmas in tracing some Flemish portraits of things about me. The scenes themselves had interest at the time for the parties who figured in them; and I believe that is reason enough, according to the practice of modern academics, for submitting them to the public eye. I copy them from my scrap-book, expurgating only a little.

"We have almost reached the solstice; and things are so quiet that I may as well, before I forget it, tell you something about the cold in its sensible effects, and the way in which as sensible people we met it.

"You will see, by turning to the early part of my journal, that the season we now look back upon as the perfection of summer contrast to this outrageous winter was in fact no summer at all. We had the young ice forming round us in Baffin's Bay, and were measuring snow-falls, while you were sweating under your grass-cloth. Yet I remember it as a time of sunny recreation, when we shot bears upon the floes, and were scrambling merrily over glaciers and murdering rotges in the big t glare of our day-midnight. Like a complaining brute, I thought it cold thee:—I, who am blistered if I touch a brass button or a ramrod without a woollen mit.

"The cold came upon us gradually. The first thing that really struck me was the freezing up of our water-casks, the dip-candle appearance of the Lung-holes, and our inability to lay the tin cup down for a five-minutes' pause without having its contents made solid. Next came the complete inability to obtain drink without manufacturing it. For a long time we had collected our water from the beautiful fresh pools of the icebergs and floes; now we had to quarry out the blocks in flinty, glassy lumps, and then melt it in tins for our daily drink. This was in Wellington Channel.

"By-and-by the sludge which we passed through as we travelled became pancakes and snow-balls. We were glued up. Yet, even as late as the 11th of September, I collected a flowering Potentilla from Barlow's Inlet. But now anything moist or wet began to strike me as something to be looked at—a curious, out-of-the-way production, like the bits of broken ice round a can of mit-julep. Our decks became dry, and studded with botryoidal lumps of dirty foot-trodden ice. The rigging had nightly accumulations of rime, and we learned to be careful about coiled ropes and iron work. On the 4th of October we had a mean temperature below zero.

"By this time our little entering hatchway had become so complete a mass of icicles, that we had to give it up, and resort to our winter door-way. The opening of a door was now the signal for a gush of smoke-like vapor: every stove-pipe sent out clouds of purple steam; and a man's breath looked like the firing of a pistol on a small scale.

"All our eatables became laughably consolidated, and after different fashions, requiring no small experience before we learned to manage the peculiarities of their changed condition. Thus, dried apples became one solid breccial mass of impacted angularities, a conglomerate of sliced chalcedony. Dried peaches the same. To get these out of the barrel, or the barrel out of them, was a matter impossible. We found, after many trials, that the shortest and best plan was to cut up both fruit and barrel by repeated blows with a heavy axe, taking the lumps below to thaw. Saur-kraut resembled mica, or rather talcose slate. A crow-bar with chiseled edge extracted the laminae bidly; but it was perhaps the best thing we could resort to.

"Sugar formed a very funny compound. Take q. s. of cork raspings, and incorporate therewith another q. s. of liquid gutta percha caoutchouc, and allow to harden: this extemporaneous formula will give you the brown sugar of our winter cruise. Extract with the saw; nothing but the saw will suit. Butter and lard, less changed, require a heavy cold chisel and mallet. Their fracture is conchoidal, with hæmorrhagic (iron-ore pimpled) surface. Flour undergoes little change, and molasses can at -25° be half scooped, half cut by, a stiff iron ladle.

"Pork and beef are rare specimens of Florentine mosaic, emulating the lost art of petrified visceral monstrosities seen at the medical schools of Bologna and Milan: crow-bar and handspike! for -30° the axe can hardly chip it. A barrel sawed in half, and kept for two days in the caboose house at $+76^{\circ}$, was still as refractory as flint a few inches below the surface. A similar bulk of lamp oil, denuded of the staves, stood like a yellow sandstone roller for a gravel walk.

"Ices for the dessert come of course unbidly, in all imaginable and unimaginable variety. I have tried my inventive powers on some of them. A Roman punch, a good deal stronger than the noblest Roman ever tasted, forms readily at -20° . Some sugared cranberries, with a little butter and scalding water, and you have an impromptu strawberry ice. Many a time at those funny little jams, that we call in Philadelphia 'parties,' where the lady-hostess glides with such nicely-regulated indifference through the complex machinery she has brought together, I have thought I noticed her stolen glance of anxiety at the cooling doves, whose icy bosoms were melting into one upon the supper-table before their time. We order these things better in the Arctic. Such is the 'composition and fierce quality' of our ices, that they are brought in served on the shaft of a hickory broom; a transfixing rod, which we use as a stirrer first and a fork afterward. So hard is this terminating cylinder of ice, that it might serve as a truncheon to knock down an ox. The only difficulty is in the processes that follow. It is the work of time and energy to impress it with the carving-knife, and you must handle your spoon deftly, or it fastens to your tongue. One of our mess was tempted the other day by the crystal transparency of an icicle to break it in his mouth; one piece froze to his tongue, and two others to his lips, and each carried off the skin: the thermometer was at -28° .

Dr. Kane reached New York, on his return from his second Arctic voyage, as commander of "the Advance," October 11, 1855, nearly two years and five months after his departure from that port. His arrival excited great interest in the public mind, already stimulated by the record of his previous adventures; and when his journals and narrative appeared, they were received with unprecedented enthusiasm. This new work, to which he at once devoted himself with his accustomed energy, bore the title, Arctic Explorations: the Second Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin, 1853, '54, '55. It appeared, like his previous work, illustrated by an extensive series of animated engravings from the author's own designs, in two volumes 8vo, at Philadelphia, in 1856, and in a short time reached a sale by subscription of no less than sixty-five thousand copies. The book, recounting a remarkable series of adventures and discoveries, pursued by the author in delicate health, under the extraordinary severities and trials of a hitherto untraversed Arctic region, was written in the same terse, forcible, yet unaffected style which marked his previous narrative. It relates the story of the voyage accomplished the first season through the waters of Baffin's Bay, along the coast of Greenland, to the ultimate station of the brig at a spot in latitude $78^{\circ} 43' N.$, named by Dr. Kane, Rensselaer Harbor. From September, 1853, to June, 1855, an interval of twenty-one months, including two rigorous winters, this ice-locked, secluded spot was the home of our author. Thence the expeditions of parties on sledges were made, which resulted in the examination of the far northern coast-line, and the probable discovery of an open Arctic sea surrounding the pole. The endurance of the hardships of privation, of cold and disease, in these two winters, called forth all the skill, experience, and heroism of Dr. Kane, who, feeble as he was, struggling with as confirmed heart disease, bore up himself and sustained the health and spirits of his men. When the party was finally compelled to abandon the vessel, in the summer of 1855, their resources, physical and mental, were again severely tested in the journey by boats and sledges to the settled parts of Greenland. There they happily met the vessels sent out by the United States Government for their relief, and were brought in safety to New York.

The narrative of the expedition which established the author's high rank in the noble list of Arctic explorers, was barely finished when he was compelled to seek refuge from the exhaustion consequent upon its preparation in a voyage to Europe for his health. He embarked in the steamer Baltic, at New York, in October, 1856, and reached London with distressing symptoms of consumption. Hurrying away from the oppressive November atmosphere of the metropolis, and the scientific honors which awaited him, he sailed for a warmer climate in the West Indies. He reached Cuba by the way of St. Thomas on Christmas Day. There he was joined by his mother and brother, who came from his home to soothe his parting hours. He died at Havana, having just completed his thirty-seventh year, February 16, 1857. His remains were brought with the most distinguished funeral honors to the place of his birth, by way of New Orleans, Louisville, Cincinnati, Columbus, Baltimore, and were finally laid in the tomb of his family at the Laurel Hill Cemetery.

The firm, energetic, modest, truthful character of the man is shown in his writings, which will survive not only by the interest of the stirring incidents which they preserve, but by the style—the impress of the man—by which they are characterized. Had the author lived he would doubtless have accomplished much in addition, in rigorous scientific investigation, to which his attention in his later years was steadily directed. As it is, he has left a noble monument of the conquest of mind and spiritual energy over extraordinary difficulties and discouragements of ill health and bodily suffering.

A biography of Dr. Kane was published by Dr. William Elder, of Philadelphia, in 1858.

 THE RESCUE PARTY — FROM ARCTIC EXPLORATIONS.

“March 31, Friday. — I was within an ace today of losing my dogs, every one of them. When I reached the ice-foot, they balked: — who would not? — the tide was low, the ice rampant, and a jump of four feet necessary to reach the crest. The howling of the wind and the whirl of the snow-drift confused the poor creatures; but it was valuable training for them, and I strove to force them over. Of course I was on foot, and they had a light load behind them. ‘Now, Stumpy! Now, Whitey!’ ‘Good dogs!’ ‘Tulee-ee-ee! Tuh!’ They went at it like good stanch brutes, and the next minute the whole team was rolling in a lump, some sixteen feet below me, in the chasm of the ice-foot. The drift was such that at first I could not see them. The roaring of the tide and the subdued wail of the dogs made me fear for the worst. I had to walk through the broken ice, which rose in toppling spires over my head, for nearly fifty yards, before I found an opening to the ice-face, by which I was able to climb down to them. A few cuts of a sheath-knife released them, although the caresses of the dear brutes had like to have been fatal to me, for I had to straddle with one foot on the fast ice and the other on loose piled rubbish. But I got a line attached to the cross-pieces of the sledge-runners, flung it up on the ice-foot, and then piloted my dogs out of their slough. In about ten minutes we were sweating along at eight miles an hour.”

Everything looked promising, and we were only waiting for intelligence that our advance party had deposited its provisions in safety to begin our transit of the bay. Except a few sledge-lashings and some trifling accoutrements to finish, all was ready.

We were at work cheerfully, sewing away at the skins of some moccasins by the blaze of our lamps, when, toward midnight, we heard the noise of steps above, and the next minute Sontag, Ohlsen, and Petersen came down into the cabin. Their manner startled me even more than their unexpected appearance on board. They were swollen and haggard, and hardly able to speak.

Their story was a fearful one. They had left their companions in the ice, risking their own lives to bring us the news: Brooks, Baker, Wilson, and Pierre were all lying frozen and disabled. Where? They could not tell: somewhere in among the hummocks to the north and east; it was drifting heavily round them when they parted. Irish Tom had stayed by to feed and care for the others; but the chances were sorely against them. It was in vain to question them further. They had evidently travelled a great distance, for they were sinking with fatigue and hunger, and could hardly be rallied enough to tell us the direction in which they had come.

My first impulse was to move on the instant with an unencumbered party: a rescue, to be effective or even hopeful, could not be too prompt. What pressed on my mind most was, where the sufferers were to be looked for among the drifts. Ohlsen seemed to have his faculties rather more at command than his associates, and I thought that he might assist us as a guide; but he was sinking with exhaustion, and if he went with us we must carry him.

There was not a moment to be lost. While some were still busy with the new-comers and getting ready a hasty meal, others were rigging out the “Little Willie” with a buffalo-cover, a small tent, and a package of pemmican; and, as soon as we could hurry through our arrangements, Ohlsen was strapped on in a fur bag, his legs wrapped in dog-skins and eider-down, and we were off upon the ice. Our party consisted of nine men and myself. We carried only the clothes on our backs. The thermometer stood at —46°, seventy-eight degrees below the freezing-point.

A well-known peculiar tower of ice, called by the men the “Pinnacle Berg,” served as our first landmark: other icebergs of colossal size, which stretched in long beaded lines across the bay, helped to guide us afterward; and it was not until we had travelled for sixteen hours that we began to lose our way.

We knew that our lost companions must be somewhere in the area before us, within a radius of forty miles. Mr. Ohlsen, who had been for fifty hours without rest, fell asleep as soon as we began to move, and awoke now with unequivocal signs of mental disturbance. It became evident that he had lost the bearing of the icebergs, which in form and color endlessly repeated themselves; and the uniformity of the vast field of snow utterly forbade the hope of local landmarks.

Pushing ahead of the party, and clambering over some rugged ice-piles, I came to a long level floe, which I thought might probably have attracted the eyes of weary men in circumstances like our own. It was a light conjecture; but it was enough to turn the scale, for there was no other to balance it. I gave orders to abandon the sledge, and disperse in search of footmarks. We raised our tent, placed our pemmican in cache, except a small allowance for each man to carry on his person; and poor Ohlsen, now just able to keep his legs, was liberated from his bag. The thermometer had fallen by this time to $-49^{\circ}3$, and the wind was setting in sharply from the northwest. It was out of the question to halt; it required brisk exercise to keep us from freezing. I could not even melt ice for water; and, at these temperatures, any resort to snow for the purpose of allaying thirst was followed by bloody lips and tongue: it burnt like caustic.

It was indispensable then that we should move on, looking out for traces as we went. Yet when the men were ordered to spread themselves, so as to multiply the chances, though they all obeyed heartily, some painful impress of solitary danger, or perhaps it may have been the varying configuration of the ice-field, kept them closing up continually into a single group. The strange manner in which some of us were affected I now attribute as much to shattered nerves as to the direct influence of the cold. Men like McGary and Bonsall, who had stood out our severest marches, were seized with trembling-fits and short breath; and, in spite of all my efforts to keep up an example of sound bearing, I fainted twice on the snow.

We had been nearly eighteen hours out without water or food, when a new hope cheered us. I think it was Hans, our Esquimaux hunter, who thought he saw a broad sledge-track. The drift had nearly effaced it, and we were some of us doubtful at first whether it was not one of those accidental rifts which the gales make in the surface-snow. - But, as we traced it on to the deep snow among the hummocks, we were led to foot-steps; and, following these with religious care, we at last came in sight of a small American flag fluttering from a hummock, and lower down a little Masonic banner hanging from a tent-pole hardly above the drift. It was the camp of our disabled comrades: we reached it after an unbroken march of twenty-one hours.

The little tent was nearly covered. I was not among the first to come up; but, when I reached the tent-curtain, the men were standing in silent file on each side of it. With more kindness and delicacy of feeling than is often supposed to belong to sailors, but which is almost characteristic, they intimated their wish that I should go in alone. As I crawled in, and coming upon the darkness, heard before me the burst of welcome gladness that came from the four poor fellows stretched on their backs, and then for the first time the cheer outside, my weakness and my gratitude together almost overcame me. "They had expected me: they were sure I would come!"

We were now fifteen souls; the thermometer seventy-five degrees below the freezing-point; and our sole accommodation a tent barely able to contain eight persons: more than half our party were obliged to keep from freezing by walking outside while the others slept. We could not halt long.

Each of us took a turn of two hours' sleep; and we prepared for our homeward march.

We took with us nothing but the tent, furs to protect the rescued party, and food for a journey of fifty hours. Everything else was abandoned. Two large buffalo-bags, each made of four skins, were doubled up, so as to form a sort of sack, lined on each side by fur, closed at the bottom but opened at the top. This was laid on the sledge; the tent, smoothly folded, serving as a floor. The sick, with their limbs sewed up carefully in reindeer-skins, were placed upon the bed of buffalo-ropes, in a half-reclining posture; other skins and blanket-bags were thrown above them; and the whole litter was lashed together so as to allow but a single opening opposite the mouth for breathing.

This necessary work cost us a great deal of time and effort; but it was essential to the lives of the sufferers. It took us no less than four hours to strip and refresh them, and then to embale them in the manner I have described. Few of us escaped without frost-bitten fingers: the thermometer was at $55^{\circ}6$ below zero, and a slight wind added to the severity of the cold.

It was completed at last, however; all hands stood round; and, after repeating a short prayer, we set out on our retreat. It was fortunate indeed that we were not inexperienced in sledging over the ice. A great part of our track lay among a succession of hummocks; some of them extending in long lines, fifteen and twenty feet high, and so uniformly steep that we had to turn them by a considerable deviation from our direct course; others that we forced our way through, far above our heads in height, lying in parallel ridges, with the space between too narrow for the sledge to be lowered into it safely, and yet not wide enough for the runners to cross without the aid of ropes to stay them. These spaces too were generally choked with light snow, hiding the openings between the ice-fragments. They were fearful traps to disengage a limb from, for every man knew that a fracture or a sprain even would cost him his life. Besides all this, the sledge was top-heavy with its load: the maimed men could not bear to be lashed down tight enough to secure them against falling off. Notwithstanding our caution in rejecting every superfluous burden, the weight, including bags and tent, was eleven hundred pounds.

And yet our march for the first six hours was very cheering. We made by vigorous pulls and lifts nearly a mile an hour, and reached the new floes before we were absolutely weary. Our sledge sustained the trial admirably. Ohlsen, restored by hope, walked steadily at the leading belt of the sledge-lines; and I began to feel certain of reaching our halfway station of the day before, where we had left our tent. But we were still nine miles from it, when, almost without premonition, we all became aware of an alarming failure of our energies.

I was of course familiar with the benumbed and almost lethargic sensation of extreme cold; and once, when exposed for some hours in the midwinter of Baffin's Bay, I had experienced symptoms which I compared to the diffused paralysis of the electro-galvanic shock. But I had treated the sleepy comfort of freezing as something like the embellishment of romance. I had evidence now to the contrary.

Bonsall and Morton, two of our stoutest men, came to me, begging permission to sleep: "they were not cold: the wind did not enter them now:

a little sleep was all they wanted." Presently Hans was found nearly stiff under a drift; and Thomas, bolt upright, had his eyes closed, and could hardly articulate. At last, John Blake threw himself on the snow, and refused to rise. They did not complain of feeling cold; but it was in vain that I wrestled, boxed, ran, argued, jeered, or reprimanded: an immediate halt could not be avoided.

We pitched our tent with much difficulty. Our hands were too powerless to strike a fire: we were obliged to do without water or food. Even the spirits (whisky) had frozen at the men's feet, under all the coverings. We put Bonsall, Ohlsen, Thomas, and Hans, with the other sick men, well inside the tent, and crowded in as many others as we could. Then, leaving the party in charge of Mr. McGary, with orders to come on after four hours' rest, I pushed ahead with William Godfrey, who volunteered to be my companion. My aim was to reach the halfway tent, and thaw some ice and pemmican before the others arrived.

The floe was of level ice, and the walking excellent. I cannot tell how long it took us to make the nine miles; for we were in a strange sort of stupor, and had little apprehension of time. It was probably about four hours. We kept ourselves awake by imposing on each other a continued articulation of words; they must have been incoherent enough. I recall these hours as among the most wretched I have ever gone through: we were neither of us in our right senses, and retained a very confused recollection of what preceded our arrival at the tent. We both of us, however, remember a bear, who walked leisurely before us and tore up as he went a jumper that Mr. McGary had providently thrown off the day before. He tore it into shreds and rolled it into a ball, but never offered to interfere with our progress. I remember this, and with it a confused sentiment that our tent and buffalo-ropes might probably share the same fate. Godfrey, with whom the memory of this day's work may atone for many faults of a later time, had a better eye than myself; and, looking some miles ahead, he could see that our tent was undergoing the same unceremonious treatment. I thought I saw it too, but we were so drunken with cold that we strode on steadily, and, for aught I know, without quickening our pace.

Probably our approach saved the contents of the tent; for when we reached it the tent was uninjured, though the bear had overturned it, tossing the buffalo-ropes and pemmican into the snow; we missed only a couple of blanket-bags. What we recollect, however, and perhaps all we recollect, is, that we had great difficulty in raising it. We crawled into our reindeer sleeping-bags, without speaking, and for the next three hours slept on in a dreamy but intense slumber. When I awoke, my long beard was a mass of ice, frozen fast to the buffalo-skin: Godfrey had to cut me out with his jack-knife. Four days after our escape, I found my woollen comfortable with a goodly share of my beard still adhering to it.

We were able to melt water and get some soup cooked before the rest of our party arrived: it took them but five hours to walk the nine miles. They were doing well, and, considering the circumstances, in wonderful spirits. The day was most providentially windless, with a clear sun. All enjoyed the refreshment we had got ready: the crippled were repacked in their robes; and we sped briskly toward the hummock-ridges which lay between us and the Pinnacly Eerg.

The hummocks we had now to meet came properly under the designation of squeezed ice. A great chain of bergs stretching from northwest to southeast, moving with the tides, had compressed the surface-floes; and, rearing them up on their edges, produced an area more like the volcanic pedragal of the basin of Mexico than any thing else I can compare it to.

It required desperate efforts to work our way over it, — literally desperate, for our strength failed us anew, and we began to lose our self-control. We could not abstain any longer from eating snow: our mouths swelled, and some of us became speechless. Happily the day was warmed by a clear sunshine, and the thermometer rose to -4° in the shade: otherwise we must have frozen.

Our halts multiplied, and we fell half-sleeping on the snow. I could not prevent it. Strange to say, it refreshed us. I ventured upon the experiment myself, making Riley wake me at the end of three minutes; and I felt so much benefited by it that I timed the men in the same way. They sat on the runners of the sledge, fell asleep instantly, and were forced to wakefulness when their three minutes were out.

By eight in the evening we emerged from the floes. The sight of the Pinnacly Berg revived us. Brandy, an invaluable resource in emergency, had already been served out in tablespoonful doses. We now took a longer rest, and a last but stouter dram, and reached the brig at 1 P. M., we believe without a halt.

I say we believe; and here perhaps is the most decided proof of our sufferings: we were quite delirious, and had ceased to entertain a sane apprehension of the circumstances about us. We moved on like men in a dream. Our footmarks seen afterward showed that we had steered a beeline for the brig. It must have been by a sort of instinct, for it left no impress on the memory. Bonsall was sent staggering ahead, and reached the brig, God knows how, for he had fallen repeatedly at the track-lines; but he delivered with punctilious accuracy the messages I had sent by him to Dr. Hayes. I thought myself the soundest of all, for I went through all the formula of sanity, and can recall the muttering delirium of my comrades when we got back into the cabin of our brig. Yet I have been told since of some speeches and some orders too of mine, which I should have remembered for their absurdity if my mind had retained its balance.

Petersen and Whipple came out to meet us about two miles from the brig. They brought my dog-team, with the restoratives I had sent for by Bonsall. I do not remember their coming. Dr. Hayes entered with judicious energy upon the treatment our condition called for, administering morphine freely, after the usual frictions. He reported none of our brain-symptoms as serious, referring them properly to the class of those indications of exhausted power which yield to generous diet and rest. Mr. Ohlsen suffered some time from strabismus and blindness; two others underwent amputation of parts of the foot, without unpleasant consequences; and two died in spite of all our efforts. This rescue party had been out for seventy-two hours. We had halted in all eight hours, half of our number sleeping at a time. We travelled between eighty and ninety miles, most of the way dragging a heavy sledge.

The mean temperature of the whole time, including the warmest hours of three days, was at minus 41°.2. We had no water except at our two halts, and were at no time able to intermit vigorous exercise without freezing.

"April 4, Tuesday. — Four days have passed, and I am again at my record of failures, sound but aching still in every joint. The rescued men are not out of danger, but their gratitude is very touching. Pray God that they may live."

SAMUEL ELIOT,

THE author of a History of Liberty, was born at Boston, the son of William H. Eliot, December 22, 1821. He was educated in Boston and at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1839. He continued his studies in Europe. He formed the idea of writing a History of Liberty in Rome, where he spent the winter of 1844-5, and has since been engaged upon the work.

In 1847, he published in Boston, Passages from the History of Liberty, in which he traced the career of the early Italian reformers, Arnaldo da Brescia, Giovanni di Vicenza, and others; of Savonarola; of Wycliffe in England, and the War of the Communities in Castile.

The first series of his more elaborate history in two volumes, appeared in 1849 with the title, The Liberty of Rome. In 1853, this work was reprinted in a revised form as The History of Liberty: Part I. The Ancient Romans, and in the same year appeared two similar volumes relating to The Early Christians. These constituted two parts of an extensive work, of which three others are projected, devoted successively to the Papal Ages, the Monarchical Ages, and the American Nation. In 1856 appeared Manual of United States History, 1492-1850. This was afterwards extended to 1872.

The speciality of Mr. Eliot's historic labors is fully indicated in their title. It is to read the past, not for the purpose of curiosity, entertainment, or controversy, for the chronicle of kings and emperors, or the story of war and conquest, unless for their subordination to the progress of Liberty. His work is therefore a critical analysis rather than a narrative. It bears evidences of a diligent study of the original and later authorities. The conception of the work is a noble one, and it may without vanity be said to be appropriately undertaken by an American.

In 1860, Dr. Eliot accepted the presidency of Trinity College, Hartford, which he held four years. In 1873, he was Head Master of the Public High School for Girls in Boston.

As a specimen of the author's manner, we present a passage at the close of the history of Roman liberty with the establishment of the Emperors, and at the dawn of the new divine dispensation for all true freedom and progress of humanity in Christianity.

CLOSE OF ANTIQUITY.

Thus is our Era to be named of Hope.
CARLYLE, French Revolution, Book III. ch. 8.

The course of the olden time was run. Its generations had wrought the work appointed them to do. Their powers were exhausted. Their liberty, in other words, their ability to exercise their powers, was itself overthrown.

From the outset there had been no union amongst men. The opposite system of centralization, by which the many were bound to the few, had prevailed at the beginning. Weakened, indeed, but more than ever developed, it prevailed also at the end. To renew and to extend this system had been the appointed work of the ancient Romans. Not to unite, not to liberate the human race, had they been intrusted with dominion. It was to reduce mankind, themselves included, to dissension and to submission, that the Romans were allowed their liberty.

To such an end their liberty, like that of the elder nations, was providentially adapted. As a possession, it was in the hands not of the best, but of the strongest. As a right, it was not the right to improve one's self, but that to restrain others. It was the claim to be served by others. It was not the privilege of serving others. Much less was it the privilege of serving God. Struggling amidst the laws of man, instead of resting upon those of God, it was the liberty of men destined to contention until they fell in servitude.

There were exceptions. Not every one lost himself in the dust and the agony of strife. Not every generation spent itself in conflicts. The physical powers were not always the only ones in exercise. At times the intellectual powers obtained development. At rarer seasons, the spiritual powers evinced themselves. A generation might thus attain to a liberty far wider than that of its predecessors. An individual might thus rise to a liberty far higher than that of his contemporaries. Yet these were but exceptions. The rule, confirmed by them, was the tendency of men to a lower, rather than a higher state. Indirectly, they were led towards the higher state, for which the lower was the necessary preparation. But the passage was to be made through the lower. Every bad work that succeeded, every good work that failed, brought mankind nearer to the end of the prevailing evil. The advent of the approaching good was hastened by every downward step towards prostration.

From the masses of the clouds the light first fades away. It presently vanishes from the patches in the skies originally undimmed. Then darkness overspreads the heavens. Men fall supine upon the earth. The night of universal humiliation sets in. But the gloom is not unbroken. Overshadowed as is the scene, it is not overwhelmed. There still remain the vales where truth has descended. There still exist the peaks to which love in its longing has climbed. Desires too earnest to have been wasted, principles too honest to have been unproductive, still linger in promise of the coming day. Men were to be humbled. They needed to feel the insecurity of their liberty, of the powers which made it their right, of the laws which made it their possession. But they did not need to be bereft of the good which their laws and their powers, however imperfect, comprehended.

The day of redemption followed. It was not too late. It was not too soon. The human race had been tried. It had not been annihilated. Then the angels sang their song of glory to God and peace amongst His creatures. We may believe that when the morning came, the oppression and the servitude of old had left their darkest forms amidst the midnight clouds. Before the death of Augustus, the Business of THE FATHER had already begun in the Temple at Jerusalem; and near by, THE SON was increasing in wisdom and in stature and in favor with God and man.

The sea, as it were, whereon wave has pursued wave through day and night, through years and centuries, before our eyes, is thus illumined with the advancing light which we have been waiting to behold. And as we stand upon the shore, conscious of the Spirit that has moved upon the face of the waters, we may lift our eyes with more confiding faith to the over-watching Heaven.

JAMES T. FIELDS

Was born in Portsmouth, N. H., December 31, 1817. His partnership in the publishing house of Ticknor and Co. of Boston, whose liberal literary dealings with eminent authors at home and abroad he has always warmly seconded, has identified him with the best interests of literature.

James T. Fields

He is the poets' publisher of America, as Moxon has been of England, and like his brother of the craft in London, writes good verses himself. On two occasions, in 1838 and '48, Mr. Fields has delivered a poem before the Boston Mercantile Association. Sentiment and point, in good set iambs and clashing rhymes, are the approved necessities of these affairs. Mr. Fields's poems on "Commerce" and "the Post of Honor" are wanting in neither. An elegantly printed little volume, in the highest luxury of the press, contains his miscellaneous poems. They are truthful and unaffected in sentiment, finished and delicate in expression.

WORDSWORTH.

The grass hung wet on Rydal banks,
The golden day with pearls adorning,
When side by side with him we walked
To meet midway the summer morning.
The west wind took a softer breath,
The sun himself seemed brighter shining,
As through the porch the minstrel stept—
His eye sweet Nature's look enshrining.
He passed along the dewy sward,
The blue-bird sang aloft "good-morrow!"
He plucked a bud, the flower awoke,
And smiled without one pang of sorrow.
He spoke of all that graced the scene
In tones that fell like music round us,
We felt the charm descend, nor strove
To break the rapturous spell that bound us.
We listened with mysterious awe,
Strange feelings mingling with our pleasure;
We heard that day prophetic words,
High thoughts the heart must always treasure.
Great Nature's Priest! thy calm career,
With that sweet morn, on earth has ended—
But who shall say thy mission died
When, winged for Heaven, thy soul ascended!

DIEGE FOR A YOUNG GIRL.

Underneath the sod, low lying,
Dark and drear,
Sleepeth one who left, in dying,
Sorrow here.
Yes, they're ever bending o'er her,
Eyes that weep;
Forms that to the cold grave bore her Vigils keep.

When the summer moon is shining
Soft and fair,
Friends she loved in tears are twining
Chaplets there.
Rest in peace, thou gentle spirit,
Throned above;
Souls like thine with God inherit
Life and love!

EVENTIDE.

This cottage door, this gentle gale,
Hay-scented, whispering round,
Yon path-side rose, that down the vale
Breathes incense from the ground,
Methinks should from the dullest clod
Invite a thankful heart to God.
But, Lord, the violet, bending low,
Seems better moved to praise;
From us, what scanty blessings flow,
How voiceless close our days—
Father, forgive us, and the flowers
Shall lead in prayer the vesper hours.

Mr. Fields privately printed another volume of his poems in 1858, entitled: A Few Verses for a Few Friends. His later services to literature include a collection of the complete works of De Quincey, in twenty volumes, and the editorship of the Atlantic Monthly from 1862 to July, 1870. At the end of the latter year he withdrew from the active cares of publishing, and his old firm was reorganized under the name of James R. Osgood & Co. His Yesterdays with Authors, a charming series of personal memories of such distinguished writers as Thackeray, Hawthorne, Dickens, Wordsworth, and Miss Mitford, with an introductory article on Pope, appeared in 1871. This work of standard value was welcomed with the same marked favor that had previously greeted its separate papers when published in the Atlantic as "Our Whispering Gallery."

YESTERDAYS WITH AUTHORS.

THACKERAY.

Questions are frequently asked as to the habits of thought and composition of authors one has happened to know, as if an author's friends were commonly invited to observe the growth of works he was by and by to launch from the press. It is not customary for the doors of the writer's workshop to be thrown open, and for this reason it is all the more interesting to notice, when it is possible, how an essay, a history, a novel, or a poem is conceived, grows up, and is corrected for publication. One would like very much to be informed how Shakespeare put together the scenes of Hamlet or Macbeth, whether the subtle thought accumulated easily on the page before him, or whether he struggled for it with anxiety and distrust. We know that Milton troubled himself about little matters of punctuation, and obliged the printer to take special note of his requirements, scolding him roundly when he neglected his instructions. We also know that Melancthon was in his library hard at work by two or three o'clock in the morning both in summer and winter, and that Sir William Jones began his studies with the dawn.

The most popular female writer of America, whose great novel struck a chord of universal sympathy throughout the civilized world, has habits of composition peculiarly her own, and unlike those belonging to any author of whom we have record. She croons, so to speak, over her writings, and it makes very little difference to her whether there is a crowd of people about her or whether she is alone during the composition of her books. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was wholly prepared for the press in a little wooden house in Maine, from week to week, while the story was coming out in a Washington newspaper. Most of it was written by the evening lamp, on a pine table, about which the children of the family were gathered together conning their various lessons for the next day. Amid the busy hum of earnest voices, constantly asking questions of the mother, intent on her world-renowned task, Mrs. Stowe wove together those thrilling chapters which were destined to find readers in so many languages throughout the globe. No work of similar importance, so far as we know, was ever written amid so much that seemed hostile to literary composition.

I had the opportunity, both in England and America, of observing the literary habits of Thackeray, and it always seemed to me that he did his work with comparative ease, but was somewhat influenced by a custom of procrastination. Nearly all his stories were written in monthly instalments for magazines, with the press at his heels. He told me that when he began a novel he rarely knew how many people were to figure in it, and, to use his own words, he was always very shaky about their moral conduct. He said that sometimes, especially if he had been dining late and did not feel in remarkably good-humor next morning, he was inclined to make his characters villainously wicked; but if he rose serene with an unclouded brain, there was no end to the lovely actions he was willing to make his men and women perform. When he had written a passage that pleased him very much he could not resist clapping on his hat and rushing forth to find an acquaintance to whom he might instantly read his successful composition. Gilbert Wakefield, universally acknowledged to have been the best Greek scholar of his time, said he would have turned out a much better one, if he had begun earlier to study that language; but unfortunately he did not begin till he was fifteen years of age. Thackeray, in quoting to me this saying of Wakefield, remarked: "My English would have been very much better if I had read Fielding before I was ten." This observation was a valuable hint, on the part of Thackeray, as to whom he considered his master in art.

James Hannay paid Thackeray a beautiful compliment when he said: "If he had had his choice he would rather have been famous as an artist than as a writer; but it was destined that he should paint in colors which will never crack and never need restoration." Thackeray's characters are, indeed, not so much inventions as existences, and we know them as we know our best friends or our most intimate enemies.

When I was asked, the other day, which of his books I liked best, I gave the old answer to a similar question, "The last one I read." If I could possess only one of his works, I think I should choose "Henry Esmond." To my thinking, it is a marvel in literature, and I have read it oftener than any of the other works. Perhaps the reason of my partiality lies somewhat in this little incident. One day, in the snowy winter of 1852, I met Thackeray sturdily ploughing his way down

Beacon Street with a copy of "Henry Esmond" (the English edition, then just issued) under his arm. Seeing me some way off, he held aloft the volumes, and began to shout in great glee. When I came up to him he cried out, "Here is the very best I can do, and I am carrying it to Prescott as a reward of merit for having given me my first dinner in America. I stand by this book, and am willing to leave it, when I go, as my card."

As he wrote from month to month, and liked to put off the inevitable chapters till the last moment, he was often in great tribulation. I happened to be one of a large company whom he had invited to a six-o'clock dinner at Greenwich one summer afternoon several years ago. We were all to go down from London, assemble in a particular room at the hotel, where he was to meet us at six o'clock sharp. Accordingly we took steamer and gathered ourselves together in the reception-room at the appointed time. When the clock struck six, our host had not fulfilled his part of the contract. His burly figure was yet wanting among the company assembled. As the guests were nearly all strangers to each other, and as there was no one present to introduce us, a profound silence fell upon the room, and we anxiously looked out of the windows, hoping every moment that Thackeray would arrive. This untoward state of things went on for one hour, still no Thackeray and no dinner. English reticence would not allow any remark as to the absence of our host. Everybody felt serious and a gloom fell upon the assembled party. Still no Thackeray. The landlord, the butler, and the waiters rushed in and out the room, shrieking for the master of the feast, who as yet had not arrived. It was confidently whispered by a fat gentleman, with a hungry look, that the dinner was utterly spoiled twenty minutes ago, when we heard a merry shout in the entry and Thackeray bounced into the room. He had not changed his morning dress, and ink was still visible upon his fingers. Clapping his hands and pirouetting briskly on one leg, he cried out, "Thank Heaven, the last sheet of The Virginians has just gone to the printer." He made no apology for his late appearance, introduced nobody, shook hands heartily with everybody, and begged us all to be seated as quickly as possible. His exquisite delight at completing his book swept away every other feeling, and we all shared his pleasure, albeit the dinner was overdone throughout.

DICKENS.

No writer ever lived whose method was more exact, whose industry was more constant, and whose punctuality was more marked, than those of Charles Dickens. He never shirked labor, mental or bodily. He rarely declined, if the object were a good one, taking the chair at a public meeting, or accepting a charitable trust. Many widows and orphans of deceased literary men have for years been benefited by his wise trusteeship or counsel, and he spent a great portion of his time personally looking after the property of the poor whose interests were under his control. He was, as has been intimated, one of the most industrious of men, and marvellous stories are told (not by himself) of what he has accomplished in a given time in literary and social matters. His studies were all from nature and life, and his habits of observation were untiring. If he contemplated writing "Hard Times," he arranged with the master of Astley's circus to spend many hours behind the scenes with the riders and among the horses; and if the composition of the "Tale of Two Cities" were occupying his thoughts, he could banish himself to France for two years to prepare for that great work. Hogarth pencilled on his thumb-nail a striking face in a crowd that he wished to preserve; Dickens with his transcendent memory chronicled in his mind whatever of interest met his eye or reached his ear, any time or anywhere. Speaking of memory one day, he said the memory of children was prodigious; it was a mistake to fancy children ever forgot anything. When he was delineating the character of Mrs. Pipchin, he had in his mind an old lodging-house keeper in an English watering-place where he was living with his father and mother when he was but two years old. After the book was written he sent it to his sister, who wrote back at once: "Good heavens! what does this mean? you have painted our lodging-house keeper, and you were but two years old at that time!" Characters and incidents crowded the chambers of his brain, all ready for use when occasion required. No subject of human interest was ever indifferent to him, and never a day went by that did not afford him some suggestion to be utilized in the future.

His favorite mode of exercise was walking; and when in America, scarcely a day passed, no matter what the weather, that he did not accomplish his eight or ten miles. It was on these expeditions that he liked to recount to the companion of his rambles stories and incidents of his early life; and when he was in the mood, his fun and humor knew no bounds. He would then frequently discuss the numerous characters in his delightful books, and would act out, on the road, dramatic situations, where Nickleby or Copperfield or Swiveller would play distinguished parts. I remember he said, on one of these occasions, that during the composition of his first stories he could never entirely dismiss the characters about whom he happened to be writing; that while the "Old Curiosity Shop" was in process of composition Little Nell followed him about everywhere; that while he was writing "Oliver Twist" Fagin the Jew would never let him rest, even in his most retired moments; that at midnight and in the morning, on the sea and on the land, Tiny Tim and Little Bob Cratchit were ever tugging at his coat-sleeve, as if impatient for him to get back to his desk, and continue the story of their lives. But he said after he had published several books, and saw what serious demands his characters were accustomed to make for the constant attention of his already overtaxed brain, he resolved that the phantom individuals should no longer intrude on his hours of recreation and rest, but that when he closed the door of his study, he would shut them all in, and only meet them again when he came back to resume his task. That force of will with which he was so pre-eminently endowed enabled him to ignore these manifold existences till he chose to renew their acquaintance. He said, also, that when the children of his brain had once been launched, free and clear of him, into the world, they would sometimes turn up in the most unexpected manner to look their father in the face.

Sometimes he would pull my arm while we were walking together and whisper, "Let us avoid Mr. Pumblechook, who is crossing the street to meet us"; or, "Mr. Micawber is coming; let us turn down this alley to get out of his way." He always seemed to enjoy the fun of his comic people, and had unceasing mirth over Mr. Pickwick's misadventures. In answer one day to a question, prompted by psychological curiosity, if he ever dreamed of any of his characters, his reply was, "Never; and I am convinced that no writer (judging from my own experience, which cannot be altogether singular, but must be a type of the experience of others) has ever dreamed of the creatures of his own imagination. It would," he went on to say, "be like a man's dreaming of meeting himself, which is clearly an impossibility. Things exterior to one's self must always be the basis of dreams." The growing up of characters in his mind never lost for him a sense of the marvellous. "What an unfathomable mystery there is in it all!" he said one day. Taking up a wineglass, he continued: "Suppose I choose to call this a character, fancy it a man, endue it with certain qualities; and soon the fine filmy webs of thought, almost impalpable, coming from every direction, we know not whence, spin and weave about it, until it assumes form and beauty, and becomes instinct with life."

HAWTHORNE.

I am sitting to-day opposite the likeness of the rarest genius America has given to literature, — a man who lately sojourned in this busy world of ours, but during many years of his life

"Wandered lonely as a cloud,"—

a man who had, so to speak, a physical affinity with solitude. The writings of this author have never soiled the public mind with one unlovely image. His men and women have a magic of their own, and we shall wait a long time before another arises among us to take his place. Indeed, it seems probable no one will ever walk precisely the same round of fiction which he traversed with so free and firm a step.

The portrait I am looking at was made by Rowse (an exquisite drawing), and is a very truthful representation of the head of Nathaniel Hawthorne. He was several times painted and photographed, but it was impossible for art to give the light and beauty of his wonderful eyes. I remember to have heard, in the literary circles of London, that, since Burns, no author had appeared there with so fine a face as Hawthorne. Old Mrs. Basil Montagu told me, many years ago, that she sat next to Burns at dinner, when he appeared in society in the first flush of his fame, after the Edinburgh edition of his poems had been published. She said, among other things, that, although the company consisted of some of the best bred men of England, Burns seemed to her the most perfect gentleman among them. She noticed particularly his genuine grace and deferential manner toward women, and I was interested to hear Mrs. Montagu's brilliant daughter, when speaking of Hawthorne's advent in English society, describe him in almost the same terms as I had heard her mother, years before, describe the Scottish poet. I happened to be in London with Hawthorne during his consular residence in England, and was always greatly delighted at the rustle of admiration his personal appearance excited when he entered a room. His bearing was modestly grand, and his voice touched the ear like a melody.

DONALD G. MITCHELL.

MR. MITCHELL was born in Norwich, Connecticut, April, 1822. His father was the pastor of the Congregational church of that place, and his grandfather a member of the first Congress at Philadelphia, and for many years Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Connecticut.

After being prepared for college at a boarding-school, young Mitchell entered Yale, and was graduated in due course in 1841. His health being feeble, he passed the three following years on his grandfather's estate in the country. He became much interested in agriculture, wrote a number of letters for the Cultivator at Albany, and gained a silver cup from the New York Agricultural Society, as a prize for a plan of farm buildings.

He next crossed the ocean, and spent half a winter in the island of Jersey, and the other half in rambling over England on foot, visiting in this manner every county, and writing letters to the Albany Cultivator. After passing eighteen months on the continent he returned home, and commenced the study of the law in New York city. He soon after published, Fresh Gleanings; or, A New Sheaf from the Old Fields of Continental Europe; by Lk. Marcel, a pleasant volume of leisurely observation over a tour through some of the choice places of Central Europe. Mr. Mitchell's health suffering from confinement in a city office, he again visited Europe, and passed some of the eventful months of 1848 in the capital and among the vineyards of France.

Donald Mitchell

On his return, Mr. Mitchell published in 1850, The Battle Summer, being Transcriptions from Personal Observations in Paris during the year 1848; by Lk. Marcel, a volume in which he carried the quaint brevity of style, somewhat apparent in the Fresh Gleanings, to an injudicious extent, coupling with this an unfortunate imitation of Carlyle's treatment of similar scenes in the History of the French Revolution. His next production was The Lorgnette, a periodical in size and style resembling Salmagundi. It appeared anonymously, and although attracting much attention in fashionable circles, the author's incognito was for some time preserved. It was written in a quiet, pure style, and contains some of the best passages in the author's writings.

During the progress of the Lorgnette, Mr. Mitchell published the Reveries of a Bachelor, a contemplative view of life from the slippered ease of the chimney corner. A slight story runs through the volume, containing some pathetic scenes tenderly narrated.

A volume of a similar character, Dream Life, appeared in the following year. In 1853 Mr. Mitchell received the appointment of United States Consul at Venice. He retained the office but a short time, and after passing several months in Europe, engaged in the collection of materials for a proposed history of Venice, returned home the summer of 1855. He is at present residing on a country-seat which he has purchased in the neighborhood of New Haven.

Mr. Mitchell's next publication, Fudge Doings, was originally published in the Knickerbocker Magazine. It consists of a series of sketches, in a connected form, of city fashionable life, in the vein of the Lorgnette.

LETTERS—FROM THE REVERIES OF A BACHELOR.

Blessed be letters!—they are the monitors, they are also the comforters, and they are the only true heart-talkers. Your speech, and their speeches, are conventional; they are moulded by circumstances; they are suggested by the observation, remark, and influence of the parties to whom the speaking is addressed, or by whom it may be overheard.

Your truest thought is modified half through its utterance by a look, a sign, a smile, or a sneer. It is not individual; it is not integral: it is social and mixed,—half of you, and half of others. It bends, it sways, it multiplies, it retires, and it advances, as the talk of others presses, relaxes, or quickens.

But it is not so with Letters:—there you are, with only the soulless pen, and the snow-white, virgin paper. Your soul is measuring itself by itself, and saying its own sayings: there are no sneers to modify its utterance,—no scowl to scare,—nothing is present, but you and your thought.

Utter it then freely—write it down—stamp it—burn it in the ink!—There it is, a true soul-print!

Oh, the glory, the freedom, the passion of a letter! It is worth all the lip-talk of the world. Do you say, it is studied, made up, acted, rehearsed, contrived, artistic?

Let me see it then; let me run it over; tell me age, sex, circumstances, and I will tell you if it be studied or real; if it be the merest lip-slang put into words, or heart-talk blazing on the paper.

I have a little packet, not very large, tied up with narrow crimson ribbon, now soiled with frequent handling, which far into some winter's night I take down from its nook upon my shelf, and untie, and open, and run over, with such sorrow, and such joy,—such tears and such smiles, as I am sure make me for weeks after, a kinder and holier man.

There are in this little packet, letters in the familiar hand of a mother—what gentle admonition—what tender affection!—God have mercy on him who outlives the tears that such admonitions, and such affection call up to the eye! There are others in the budget, in the delicate, and unformed hand of a loved, and lost sister;—written when she and you were full of glee, and the best mirth of youthfulness; does it harm you to recall that mirthfulness? or to trace again, for the hundredth time, that scrawling postscript at the bottom, with its l's so carefully dotted, and its gigantic l's so carefully crossed, by the childish hand of a little brother?

I have added latterly to that packet of letters; I almost need a new and longer ribbon; the old one is getting too short. Not a few of these new and cherished letters, a former Reverie has brought to me; not letters of cold praise, saying it was well done, artfully executed, prettily imagined—no such thing: but letters of sympathy—of sympathy which means sympathy—the παθήμι and the συν.

It would be cold and dastardly work to copy them; I am too selfish for that. It is enough to say that they, the kind writers, have seen a heart in the Reverie—have felt that it was real, true. They know it; a secret influence has told it. What matters it, pray, if literally there was no wife, and no dead child, and no coffin, in the house? Is not feeling, feeling and heart, heart? Are not these fancies thronging on my brain, bringing tears to my eyes, bringing joy to my soul, as living, as anything human can be living? What if they have no material type—no objective form? All that is crude,—a mere reduction of ideality to sense,—a transformation of the spiritual to the earthy,—a levelling of soul to matter.

Are we not creatures of thought and passion? Is anything about us more earnest than that same thought and passion? Is there anything more real,—more characteristic of that great and dim destiny to which we are born, and which may be written down in that terrible word—Forever?

Let those who will then, sneer at what in their wisdom they call untruth—at what is false, because it has no material presence: this does not create falsity; would to Heaven that it did!

And yet, if there was actual, material truth, super-added to Reverie, would such objectors sympathize the more? No!—a thousand times, no; the heart that has no sympathy with thoughts and feelings that scorch the soul, is dead also—whatever its mocking tears and gestures may say—to a coffin or a grave!

Let them pass, and we will come back to these cherished letters.

A mother who has lost a child, has, she says, shed a tear—not one, but many—over the dead boy's coldness. And another, who has lost, but who trembles lest she lose, has found the words falling as she reads, and a dim, sorrow-borne mist, spreading over the page.

Another, yet rejoicing in all those family ties that make life a charm, has listened nervously to careful reading, until the husband is called home, and the coffin is in the house—"Stop!" she says; and a gush of tears tells the rest.

Yet the cold critic will say—"it was artfully done." A curse on him!—it was not art: it was nature.

Another, a young, fresh, healthful girl-mind, has seen something in the love-picture—albeit so weak—of truth; and has kindly believed that it must be earnest. Aye, indeed is it, fair, and generous one,—earnest as life and hope! Who indeed with a heart at all, that has not yet slipped away irreparably and for ever from the shores of youth—from that fairy land which young enthusiasm creates, and over which bright dreams hover—but knows it to be real? And so such things will be real, till hopes are dashed, and Death is come.

Another, a father, has laid down the book in tears.—God bless them all! How far better this, than the cold praise of newspaper paragraphs, or the critically contrived approval of colder friends!

Let me gather up these letters carefully,—to be read when the heart is faint, and sick of all that there is unreal and selfish in the world. Let me tie them together, with a new, and longer bit of ribbon—not by a love knot, that is too hard—but by an easy slipping knot, that so I may get at them the better. And now they are all together, a snug packet, and we will label them not sentimentally (I pity the one who thinks it), but earnestly, and in the best meaning of the term—SOUVENIRS DU CŒUR.

Thanks to my first Reverie, which has added to such a treasure!

During the last few years, Mr. Mitchell has varied the routine of farm life at his country seat in Connecticut, by his contributions to Harper's Magazine and the Atlantic Monthly, where his articles have constantly appeared, and the occasional publication of a volume. Several of his recent works owe their origin to his rural pursuits.

My Farm of Edgewood appeared in 1863, a book pleasantly descriptive of the adventures of a gentleman in search of a farm, and his adventures in maintaining it, re-enforced by "curious and valuable information, founded on the results of actual experience, and in wise suggestions which indicate a mind of earnest purpose and acute observation."* A sequel to this, Wet Days at Edgewood (New York, 1864), is a series of sketches reviewing the poetical and other literature and past history of gentleman farming and agriculture. Seven Stories, with Basement and Attic, is the title of another of Mr. Mitchell's recent volumes. He has at present a novel of New England life and manners, entitled Doctor Johns, in course of publication in the Atlantic Monthly.

 In 1866, Doctor Johns, being a Narrative of Certain Events in the Life of an Orthodox Minister of Connecticut, was published in book-form, in two volumes. It was followed the next year by Rural Studies, with Notes for Country Places, and illustrations by its author, who is an artist in the study of landscapes by natural taste and culture. The aim of the latter work was "to stimulate those who live in the country, or who love the country, to a fuller and wider range of thinking about the means of making their homes enjoyable."

 ACCOUNT OF A CONSULATE—FROM SEVEN STORIES.

Julius Cæsar was a Consul, and the first Bonaparte; and so was I.

I do not think that I am possessed of any very extraordinary ambition. I like comfort, I like mushrooms; (truffles I do not like). I think Lafite is a good wine, and wholesome. Gin is not to my taste, and I never attend caucuses. Therefore, I have never entertained great expectations of political preferment, and lived for a considerable period of years without any hopes in that way, and with a very honest indifference.

And yet, when my name actually appeared in the newspapers, as named by appointment of the President, Consul to — Blank, I felt, I will confess (if I may use such an expression), an unusual expansion. I felt confident that I had become on a sudden the subject of a good deal of not unnatural envy. I excused people for it, and never thought of blaming or of resenting it. My companions in the every-day walks of life, I treated, I am satisfied, with the same consideration as before.

* New York Tribune, November 7, 1863.

In short, I concealed my elation as much as possible, and only indulged the playful elasticity of my spirits in a frequent private perusal of that column of the New York Times which made the announcement of my appointment, and where my name appeared in print, associated with those of the distinguished Mr. Soulé, Mr. Greaves (I believe), Mr. Daniels, Mr. Brown, Mr. McCrea, and a great many others.

I cannot accurately describe my feelings when the postmaster of our town (a smart gentleman of great tact, but now turned out), handed me a huge packet from the Department of State, franked by Mr. Marcy (evidently his own hand had traced the lines), sealed with the large seal of the Department, and addressed to me, Mr. Blank, Consul of the United States for — Blank. I took the postmaster by the hand and endeavored to appear cool. I think I made some casual remark about the weather. Good heavens, what a hypocrite!

I broke open the packet with emotion. It contained a notice (I think it was in the Secretary's hand) of my appointment to — Blank. It contained a printed list of foreign ministers and consuls, in which my name was entered in writing. In the next issue, I was sure it would appear in print. It contained a published pamphlet (quite thin) of instructions. It contained a circular, on paper of a blue tinge, recommending modest dress. I liked the friendly way in which the recommendation was conveyed; not absolutely compelling, but advising—a black coat, and black pantaloons. In the warmth of my grateful feelings at that time, I think I should have vowed compliance if the Secretary had advised saffron shorts, and a sky-blue tail-coat.

* * * * *

I have spoken of the arrival of a second American ship; such was the fact. I need not say that the papers were made out in the same style as the previous ones; I had now gained considerable facility in the use of the seal. Upon the payment of the fees I ventured to attach the seal to my receipt for the same. It was not necessary—it was not usual, even; still I did it. If the occasion were to be renewed, I think I should do it again.

Not long after this accession of business, which gave me considerable hopes of—in time—replacing the flag, I received a visit from an Italian gentleman just arrived from New York, where he had been an attaché on an opera troupe. He informed me with some trepidation that the authorities were not satisfied with his papers, and had given him notice to return by sea.

I asked him if he was an American: whereupon he showed me a court certificate of his intentions to become a citizen, dated a couple of days before his leave, and with it an imposing-looking paper, illustrated by a stupendous eagle. This last, however, I found upon examination, was only the instrument of an ambitious Notary Public, who testified, thereby, to the genuine character of the court certificate, and at the same time invited all foreign powers to treat the man becomingly. The paper, indeed, had very much the air of a passport, and, by the Italian's account, had cost a good deal more.

I told him I should be happy to do what I could for him, and would cheerfully add my testimony to the bona fide character of the court certificate.

The man, however, wished a passport.

I told him that the only form of passport of which I knew (and I showed the six blanks), involved a solemn declaration on my part, that the party named was an American citizen. The Italian gentleman alluded to M. Koszta and the New York Herald.

I expressed an interest in both; but told him that I had as yet no knowledge of the correspondence in the Koszta affair; that there had been no change in the consular instructions (and I showed him the little pamphlet).

I promised, however, to communicate with the Chargé, who might be in possession of later advices; and, in addition, offered to intercede with the authorities to grant permission to an unoffending gentleman to visit his friends in the country.

Upon this I undertook a considerable series of notes and letters,—by far the most elaborate and numerous which had yet issued from my consular bureau. I will not presume to say how many there were, or how many visits I paid to the lodgings-quarters of the suspected gentleman. I found it requisite,—to secure him any freedom of action,—to become sponsor for his good conduct. I need not say (after this) that I felt great solicitude about him.

The notice of "absent on business" became almost a fixture in the office window. I had written previously to the Department for instructions in the event of such application; I had never received them; indeed I never did. The Chargé flatteringly confirmed my action, and "relied on my discretion." I was sorry to find he relied so much upon it.

It seemed to me that an office involving so large discretion should, at the least, have better furniture. The stool, though now repaired, was a small stool. I sat upon it nervously. The "Statutes at Large" I looked on with pride and satisfaction. I had inaugurated them, so to speak, in the office. I placed my little Vattel by the side of them; I hope it is there now—though there was no eagle on the back.

To return to the Italian gentleman, I at length succeeded in giving him a safe clearance. I think he was grateful: he certainly wore a grateful air when he left my office for the last time, and I felt rewarded for my labor. It was the only reward, indeed. I received: if he had offered a fee, I think I should have declined. Was I not there, indeed, for the service of my countrymen, and of my intended countrymen? Of course I was.

The day after the Italian gentleman left I paid my office rent for the current month, besides a small bill the serving-man brought me for the caulking of the office boat. It appeared that it had grounded with the tide, and without our knowledge (there being no American ships in port), had remained exposed for several days to the sun.

Keeping the office in business trim, and sitting upon the office stool, I received, one day, a very large packet, under the seal of the Department. I had not heard from Washington in a long time, and it was a pleasant surprise to me. Possibly it might be some new and valuable commission; possibly, it might bring the details of the proposed change in the Consular system. Who knew?

In such an event I wondered what the probable salary would be at my post; something handsome, no doubt. I glanced at the "arms" of my country with pride, and (there being no American ship in port), broke open the packet.

It contained two circulars, embracing a series of questions, ninety in number, in regard to ship-building, ship timber, rigging, hemp, steamships, fuel, provisioning of vessels, light-house dues, expenses of harbor, depth of ditto, good anchorages, currents, winds, cutting of channels, buoys, rates of wages, apprentices, stowage facilities, prices current, duties, protests, officers of port, manufactures, trade facilities, leakages, wear and tear, languages, pilots, book publication, etc., etc., on all of which points the circulars requested full information, as soon as practicable, in a tabular form, with a list of such works as were published on kindred subjects, together with all Government orders in regard to any, or all of the suggested subjects, which were in pamphlet form; and if in a foreign language, the same to be accurately translated into American.

The accompanying letter stated that it was proposed to allow no remuneration for the same; but added "faithful acquittal of the proposed task will be favorably viewed."

I reflected — (I sometimes do reflect).

A respectable reply even to the questions suggested, would, supposing every facility was thrown in my way by port officers and others, involve the labor of at least six weeks, and the writing over of at least ninety large pages of foolscap paper (upon which it was requested that the report should be made).

I reflected, farther — that the port officer, as yet affecting a large share of his old ignorance, would, upon presentation of even the first inquiries as to the depth of the harbor, send me to the guard-house as a suspicious person; or, recognizing my capacity, would report the question as a diplomatic one to the Governor; who would report it back to the Central Cabinet, who would report it back to the maritime commander in an adjoining city; who would communicate on the subject with the police of the port; who would communicate back with the marine intendant; who would report accordingly to the Central Government; who would in due time acquaint the Chargé at the capital with their conclusions.

I reflected — that I had already expended, on behalf of the Government, more of time and of money than I should probably (there being no American ship in port) ever receive again at their hands.

I reflected — that life was, so to speak, limited; and that in case I should determine to give it up to gratuitous work for my country, or, indeed, for any party whatever, — I should prefer that the object of my charity should be a needy object.

I reflected — that I had given bonds in the sum of two thousand dollars (with sound bondsmen) for the stool, the blank passports, the pewter and brass seals, the small-sized flag, and the "arms;" and I examined them with attention.

I reflected — that while these things were in a capital state of preservation, and my health still unimpaired, I had better withdraw from office.

I therefore sent in my resignation.

I do not think there has been any omission in the performance of my consular duties; it involved, indeed, a more expensive charity on my part than I am in the habit of extending to the indigent. I trust that the Government is grateful.

In overlooking my books I find charges against the Government for nineteen dollars and sixty-three cents for postages and stationery. To make the sum an even one I have drawn on the Government (after the form prescribed in the consular instructions) for twenty dollars, making an overdraft of thirty-seven cents, for which I hope the Government will take into consideration my office and boat rent, my time and repairs to the consular stool.

Finding the draft difficult of negotiation upon the great European exchanges, I may add that I have carried it for a long time in my pocket. Should it be eventually paid, I shall find myself in possession, — by adding the thirty-seven cents to sums received in fees during the period of my consulate, — of the amount of some thirty dollars, more or less.

I have not yet determined how to invest this. I am hoping that Mr. Powers, who I hear wears the title of Consul, will find some pretty Florentine model-woman to make an "America" of. If he does so, and will sell a small plaster cast at a reasonable price, I will buy it with my consular income, and install the figure (if not too nude) in my study, as a consular monument.

I shall be happy to welcome my successor; I will give him all the aid in my power; I will present him to the ten-penny reading-room, and shall be happy to inscribe his name in advance at either of the hotels. I will inform him of the usual anchorage ground of American ships, so far as my observation has gone. I shall be pleased to point out to him, through the indulgence of my serving-man, the best grocer's shop in the port, and another where are sold wines and varnish.

Should the office-stool require repair, I think I could recommend with confidence a small journeyman joiner in a neighboring court.

He will have my best hopes for lucrative employment in his new position, and for happiness generally.

For myself, consular recollections are not, I regret to say, pleasant. I do not write "Ex-United States Consul" after my name. I doubt if I ever shall.

All my disturbed dreams at present take a consular form. I waked out of a horrid nightmare only a few nights since, in which I fancied that I was bobbing about fearfully in a boat — crashing against piles and door-posts — waiting vainly for an American captain.

I have no objection to serve my country; I have sometimes thought of enlisting in the dragoons. I am told they have comfortable rations, and two suits of clothes in a year. But I pray Heaven that I may never again be deluded into the acceptance of a small consulate on the Mediterranean.

* AN OLD STYLE FARM — FROM RURAL STUDIES.

The stock equipment of this farm of nearly four hundred acres, consisted of twelve cows, some six head of young stock, two yoke of oxen, a pair of horses, and a hundred and fifty sheep. I blush even now as I write down the tale of such poor equipment for a farm which counted at least two hundred and seventy acres of open land — the residue being wood, or impenetrable swamp. And it is still more melancholy to reflect that the portion of the land which aided most in the sustenance of this meagre stock, was that which was most nearly in a state of nature. I speak of those newly cleared pasture-lands from which the wood had been removed within ten years. In giving this description of a farm of twenty years ago, I feel sure that I am describing the available surface of a thousand farms in New England to-day. We boast indeed of our thrift and enterprise, but these do not work in the direction of land culture—at least not in the way of that liberal and generous culture which insures the largest product. I doubt greatly if there be any people on the face of the earth, equally intelligent, who farm so poorly as the men of New England; and there are tens of thousands less intelligent who manage their lands infinitely better. . . .

I come back to the old farm, with its meagre stock and its wide acres. Of course there was something to be sold. Farmers never get on without that. First of all, came the "veals"—selling in that day for some two cents a pound, live weight. (They now sell in the New York market for ten.) This bridged over the spring costs, until the butter came from the first growth of the pastures.

—How well I remember tossing myself from bed at an hour before daylight, Seth (by previous orders) having the horse and wagon ready, and by candle-light seeing to the packing of the spring butter—the firkins being enwrapped in dewy grass, fresh cut—and then setting forth upon the long drive (twelve miles) to the nearest market town. What a drive it was! Five miles on, I saw the early people stirring and staring at me, as they washed their faces in the basin at the well. Then came woods, and silence, but a strange odorous freshness in the air—possibly some near coal-pit gave its kreosotic fumes, not unpleasant; some owl, in the swamps I passed, lifted its melancholy hoot; further on I saw some early riser driving his cows to pasture; still further I caught sight of children at play before some farm-house door, and the sun being fairly risen, I knew their breakfasts were waiting them within.

After this, I passed occasional teams upon the road, and gave a "good morning" to the drivers. Then came the toll-gate: I wondered if the day's profits would be equal to the toll? After this came the milk-wagons whisking by me, and I envied them their short rounds; at last (the sun being now two hours high) came sight of the market town—city, I should say; for the legislature had given it long before the benefit of the title; and on the score of church spires, and taverns, and shops, and newspapers, and wickedness, it deserved the name.

I wish I could catch sight once more of the old gentleman (a good grocer as the times went) who plunged his thumb-nails into my golden rolls of butter, and said: "We're buying pooty fair butter at twelve and a half cents, but seein' as it's you, we'll say thirteen cents a pound for this," and he cleaned his thumb-nail upon the breech of his trowsers.

I am not romancing here, I am only telling a plain, straightforward story of my advent, some twenty years ago, upon a summer's morning into the city of N—. I recall now vividly the detestably narrow and muddy streets—the poor horse, (I had bought it of the son of our deacon,) wheezing with his twelve-mile drive—my own empty faint stomach—the glimpses of the beautiful river between the hills—and the golden butter which I must needs sell to my friend the grocer at thirteen cents! I hope he had never any qualms of conscience; but it is a faint hope to entertain of grocers. I knew a single naively honest one; but to him I never offered anything for sale. I feared he might succumb to that temptation.

After the butter, (counting some forty odd pounds in weight per week,) the next most important sale was that of the lambs and wool. The lambs counted ordinarily—leaving out the losses of the newly dropped ones by crows and foxes—some hundred or more. And nice lambs they were; far better than the half I find in the markets to-day. Nothing puts sweeter and more delicate flesh upon young lambs than that luxuriant growth of herbage which springs from freshly cleared high-lying wood-lands. In piquancy and richness, it is as much beyond the lambs of stall-fed sheep, as the racy mutton of the Dartmoors is beyond the turnip-fatted wethers of the downs of Hampshire. And yet these lambs were delivered to the butcher at an ignoble price; I think a dollar and a half a head was all that could be secured for animals which in the city would bring to-day nearly five dollars. The wool was bought up by speculators in that time, and the speculators were not extravagant. I remember very well driving off upon a summer's afternoon, mounted upon twelve great sacks of fleeces, and being rather proud of my receipts, at the rate of twenty-eight cents per pound. (The same wool would have brought two years since eighty cents per pound.)

After we disposed of the butter and the wool, and during the late autumn months, came the cartage of wood—some eight miles—to a port upon the river, at which four dollars per cord was paid for good oak wood, and five for hickory. At present rates of labor, these are sums which would not pay for the cutting and cartage.

I must not forget the swine—two or three venerable porkers, and in an adjoining pen a brood of young shoats—that would equip themselves in great layers of fat, from the whey during the hot months, and the yellow ears of corn with the first harvesting of October. Day after day, through May, through June, came the unwearied round of milking, of driving to pasture, of plowing, of planting; day after day the sun beat hotter on the meadows, on the plowland, on the reeking sty; day after day the buds unfolded—the pink of orchards hung in flowery sheets over the scattered apple trees; the dogwood threw out its snowy burden of blossoms from the edges of the wood; the oaks showed their velvety tufts, and with midsummer there was a world of green and of silence—broken only by an occasional "Gee, Bright!" of the teamster, or the cluck of a matronly hen, or hum of bees, or the murmur of the brook. All this inviting to a very dreamy indolence, which, I must confess, was somehow vastly enjoyable.

Nothing to see? Lo, the play of light and shade over the distant hills, or the wind, making tossed and streaming wavelets on the rye. Nothing to hear? Wait a moment and you shall listen to the bursting melodious roundelay of the merriest singer upon earth—the black and white coated Bob-o'-Lincoln, as he rises on easy wing, floats in the sunshine, and overflows with song, then sinks, as if exhausted by his brilliant solo, to some swaying twig of the alder bushes. Nothing to hope? The maize leaves through all their close serried ranks are rustling with the promise of golden corn. Nothing to conquer? There are the brambles, the roughnesses, the inequalities, the chill damp earth, the whole teeming swamp-land.

I have tried to outline the surroundings and appointments of many a back country farmer of

New England to-day. I am sure the drawing is true, because it is from the life.

THOMAS BUCHANAN READ

Was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, March 12, 1822. His boyhood was passed among the scenes of country life until the age of seventeen, when, after the death of his father, he moved to Cincinnati, and obtained a situation in the studio of Clevinger the sculptor. Devoting himself to the fine arts, he soon obtained some local reputation as a portrait painter, and in 1841 removed to New York, with the intention of devoting himself to the art as a profession. He went within a year to Boston, where, in 1842-4 he published in the "Courier" a number of lyrics, and in 1847 his first volume of Poems. It was followed by a second of Lays and Ballads in 1848, published at Philadelphia, whither he had removed in 1846. In 1848 he made a collection of specimens of the Female Poets of America, and has published an edition of his own verses, elegantly illustrated. He has passed some time in Europe with a view to the study of painting, and pursued that object with success in Rome till his return to Cincinnati in 1858.

T. Buchanan Read

A choice edition of Mr. Read's poems, delicately illustrated by Kenny Meadows, was published by Delf and Triibner, in London, in 1852. In 1853 a new and enlarged edition appeared at Philadelphia.

A later production of Mr. Read, published in Philadelphia in 1855, during the author's residence in Italy, The New Pastoral, was the most elaborate of his compositions. It is a series of thirty-seven sketches, forming a volume of two hundred and fifty pages, mostly in blank verse. The thread which connects the chapters together is the emigration of a family group of Middle Pennsylvania to the Mississippi. The description of their early residence; the rural manners and pursuits; the natural scenery of their home; the phenomena of the seasons; the exhibitions of religious, political, and social life; the school; the camp meeting; the election; Independence Day, with an elevating love theme in the engagement of a village maiden to a poetic lover in Europe; the incidents of the voyage on the Ohio, with frequent episodes and patriotic aspirations, are all handled with an artist's eye for natural and moral beauty. The book presents a constant succession of truthful, pleasing images, in the healthy vein of the Goldsmiths and Bloomfields.

The characteristics we have noted describe Mr. Read's poems in his several volumes, which have exhibited a steady progress and development, in the confidence of the writer, in plain and simple objects, in strength of fancy and poetic culture.

THE CLOSING SCENE.

Within this sober realm of leafless trees,
The russet year inhaled the dreamy air,
Like some tanned reaper in his hour of ease,
When all the fields are lying brown and bare.

The gray barns, looking from their hazy hills
O'er the dim waters widening in the vales,
Sent down the air a greeting to the mills,
On the dull thunder of alternate falls.

All sights were mellowed, and all sounds subdued,
The hills seemed farther, and the streams sang low;

As in a dream, the distant woodman hewed
His winter log with many a muffled blow.

Th' embattled forests, erewhile armed in gold,
Their banners bright with every martial hue,
Now stood, like some sad beaten host of old,
Withdrawn afar in Time's remotest blue.

On slumb'rous wings the vulture tried his flight;
The dove scarce heard his sighing mate's complaint;

And like a star slow drowning in the light,
The village church-vane seemed to pale and faint.

The sentinel cock upon the hill-side crew;
Crew thrice, and all was stiller than before—
Silent till some replying wanderer blew
His alien horn, and then was heard no more.

Where erst the jay within the elm's tall crest
Made garrulous trouble round the unfledged young;

And where the oriole hung her swaying nest
By every light wind like a censer swung;

Where sang the noisy masons of the eaves,
The busy swallows circling ever near,
Foreboding, as the rustic mind believes,
An early harvest and a plenteous year;

Where every bird which charmed the vernal feast
Shook the sweet slumber from its wings at morn,
To warn the reapers of the rosy east,
All now was songless, empty, and forlorn.

Alone, from out the stubble piped the quail,
And croaked the crow through all the dreary gloom;

Alone the pheasant, drumming in the vale,
Made echo to the distant cottage loom.

There was no bud, no bloom upon the bowers;
The spiders wove their thin shrouds night by night;

The thistle-down, the only ghost of flowers,
Sailed slowly by—passed noiseless out of sight.

Amid all this—in this most cheerless air,
And where the woodbine sheds upon the porch
Its crimson leaves, as if the year stood there,
Firing the floor with his inverted torch—

Amid all this, the centre of the scene,
The white-haired matron, with monotonous tread
Plied her swift wheel, and with her joyless mien
Sat like a Fate, and watched the flying thread.

She had known sorrow. He had walked with her,
Oft supped, and broke with her the ashen crust,
And in the dead leaves still she heard the stir
Of his black mantle trailing in the dust.

While yet her cheek was bright with summer bloom,
Her country summoned, and she gave her all,
And twice war bowled to her his sable plume;
He gave the swords to rest upon the wall.

Re-gave the swords—but not the hand that drew,
And struck for liberty the dying blow;
Nor him, who to his sire and country true
Fell 'mid the ranks of the invading foe.

Long, but not loud, the droning wheel went on,
Like the low murmurs of a hive at noon;
Long, but not loud, the memory of the gone
Breathed through her lips a sad and tremulous tune.

At last the thread was snapped, her head was bowed:
Life drooped the distaff through his hands serene;
And loving neighbors smoothed her careful shroud,
While Death and Winter closed the autumn scene.

PENNSYLVANIA—FROM THE NEW PASTORAL.

Fair Pennsylvania! than thy midland vales,
Lying 'twixt hills of green, and bound afar
By billowy mountains rolling in the blue,
No lovelier landscape meets the traveller's eye.
There Labour sows and reaps his sure reward,
And Peace and Plenty walk amid the glow
And perfume of full garner. I have seen
In lands less free, less fair, but far more known,
The streams which flow through history and wash
The legendary shores—and cleave in twain
Old capitols and towns, dividing oft
Great empires and estates of petty kings
And princes, whose domains full many a field,
Rustling with maize along our native West,
Out-measures and might put to shame! and yet
Nor Rhine, like Bacchus crowned, and reeling through
His hills—nor Danube, marred with tyranny,
His dull waves moaning on Hungarian shores—
Nor rapid Po, his opaque waters pouring
Athwart the fairest, fruitfulest, and worst
Enslaved of European lands—nor Seine,
Winding uncertain through inconstant France—
Are half so fair as thy broad stream whose breast
Is gemmed with many isles, and whose proud name
Shall yet become among the names of rivers
A synonym of beauty—Susquehanna!

THE VILLAGE CHURCH—FROM THE NEW PASTORAL.

About the chapel door, in easy groups,
The rustic people wait. Some trim the switch,
While some prognosticate of harvests full,
Or shake the dubious head with arguments
Based on the winter's frequent snow and thaw,
The heavy rains, and sudden frosts severe.
Some, happily but few, deal scandal out,
With look askance pointing their victim. These

Are the rank tares in every field of grain—
These are the nettles stinging unaware—
The briars which wound and trip unheeding feet—
The noxious vines, growing in every grove!
Their touch is deadly, and their passing breath
Poison most venomous! Such have I known—
As who has not?—and suffered by the contact.
Of these the husbandman takes certain note,
And in the proper season disinters
Their baneful roots; and to the sun exposed,
The killing light of truth, leaves them to pine
And perish in the noonday! 'Gainst a tree,
With strong arms folded o'er a giant chest,
Stands Barton, to the neighbourhood chief smith;
His coat, unused to aught save Sunday wear,
Grown too oppressive by the morning walk,
Hangs on the drooping branch; so stands he oft
Beside the open door, what time the share
Is whitening at the roaring bellows' mouth.
There, too, the wheelwright—he, the magistrate—
In small communities a man of mark—
Stands with the smith, and holds such argument
As the unlettered but observing can;
Their theme some knot of scripture hard to solve.
And 'gainst the neighbouring bars two others fan,
Less fit the sacred hour, discussion hot
Of politics; a topic, which inflamed,
Knows no propriety of time or place.

There Oakes, the cooper, with rough brawny hand,
Descants at large, and, with a noisy ardour,
Rattles around his theme as round a cask;
While Hanson, heavy-browed, with shoulders bent,
Bent with great lifting of huge stones—for he
A mason and famed builder is—replies
With tongue as sharp and dexterous as his trowel,
And sentences which like his hammer fall,
Bringing the flinty fire at every blow!

But soon the approaching parson ends in peace
The wordy combat, and all turn within.
Awhile rough shoes, some with discordant creak,
And voices clearing for the psalm, disturb
The sacred quiet, till, at last, the veil
Of silence wavers, settles, falls; and then
The hymn is given, and all arise and sing.
Then follows prayer, which from the pastor's heart
Flows unpretending, with few words devout
Of humble thanks and askings; not, with lungs
Stentorian, assaulting heaven's high wall,
Compelling grace by virtue of a siege!
This done, with loving care he scans his flock,
And opens the sacred volume at the text.
Wide is his brow, and full of honest thought—
Love his vocation, truth is all his stock.
With these he strives to guide, and not perplex
With words sublime and empty, ringing off
Most musically hollow. All his facts
Are simple, broad, sufficient for a world!
He knows them well, teaching but what he knows.
He never strides through metaphysic mists,
Or takes false greatness because seen through fogs;
Nor leads 'mid brambles of thick argument
Till all admire the wit which brings them through:
Nor e'er essays, in sermon or in prayer,
To share the hearer's thought; nor strives to make
The smallest of his congregation lose
One glimpse of heaven, to cast it on the priest.
Such simple course, in these ambitious times,
Were worthy imitation; in these days,
When brazen tinsel bears the palm from worth,
And trick and pertness take the sacred desk;
Or some coarse thunderer, armed with doctrines new,
Aims at our faith a blow to fell an ox—
Swinging his sledge, regardless where it strikes,
Or what demolishes—well pleased to win

By either blows or noise!—A modern seer,
Crying destruction! and, to prove it true,
Walking abroad, for demolition armed,
And boldly levelling where he cannot build!

The service done, the congregation rise,
And with a freshness glowing in their hearts,
And quiet strength, the benison of prayer,
And wholesome admonition, hence depart.
Some, loath to go, within the graveyard loiter,
Walking among the mounds, or on the tombs,
Hanging, like pictured grief beneath a willow,
Bathing the inscriptions with their tears; or here,
Finding the earliest violet, like a drop
Of heaven's anointing blue upon the dead,
Bless it with mournful pleasure; or, perchance,
With careful hands, recall the wanderin' g vine,
And teach it where to creep, and where to bear
Its future epitaph of flowers. And there,
Each with a separate grief, and some with tears,
Ponder the sculptured lines of consolation.

"The chrysalis is here—the soul is flown,
And waits thee in the gardens of the 'blest!'"
"The nest is cold and empty, but the bird Sings with its loving mates in Paradise!"
"Our hope was planted here—it blooms in heaven!"
"She walks the azure field, 'mid dews of bliss, While 'mong the thorns our feet still bleed in this!"
"This was the fountain, but the sands are dry—
The waters have exhaled into the sky!"
"The listening Shepherd heard a voice forlorn,
And found the lamb, by thorns and brambles torn,
And placed it in his breast! Then wherefore mourn!"

Such are the various lines; and, while they read,
Methinks I hear sweet voices in the air,
And winnowing of soft, invisible wings,
The whisperings of angels breathing peace!

Mr. Read divided the latter years of his life between Cincinnati, Philadelphia, and Rome, winning new and greater successes with his pen and pencil. This artist-poet died in New York of pleuro-pneumonia, after a short illness, May 11, 1872. His Sheridan's Ride, Drifting, and parts of the Wagoner of the Alleghanies—read throughout the country during the war, by the distinguished elocutionist, Mr. James E. Murdoch, for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission—have become popular favorites; while his portraits of Sheridan and his horse, and Longfellow's Children, hold the same high rank. His recent poems were: The House by the Sea, 1855; Sylvia; or, The Last Shepherd: an Eclogue, and Other Poems, including Lyrics and Airs from Alpland, 1857; The Wagoner of the Alleghanies: A Poem of the Days of 'Seventy Six, 1862; A Summer Story, Sheridan's Ride, and Other Poems, chiefly of the War, 1865; and Good Samaritans, a Poem, 1867, besides some minor contributions to magazines. Complete editions of his Poetical Works, in two volumes, were issued in 1860 and 1862; and in three volumes, in 1865 and 1867.

DRIFTING.

My soul to-day
Is far away,
Sailing the Vesuvian Bay;
My wingéd boat,
A bird afloat,
Swims round the purple peaks remote;—

Round purple peaks
It sails, and seeks
Blue inlets and their crystal creeks,
Where high rocks throw,
Through deeps below,
A duplicated golden glow.

Far, vague and dim,
The mountains swim;
While on Vesuvius' misty brim,
With outstretched hands,
The gray smoke stands
O'erlooking the volcanic lands.

Here Ischia smiles
O'er liquid miles;
And yonder, bluest of the isles,
Calm Capri waits.
Her sapphire gates
Beguiling to her bright estates.

I heed not, if
My rippling skiff
Float swift or slow from cliff to cliff;—
With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise.

Under the walls
Where swells and falls
The Bay's deep breast at intervals,
At peace I lie,
Blown softly by
A cloud upon this liquid sky.

The day so mild,
Is Heaven's own child,
With earth and ocean reconciled;—
The airs I feel
Around me steal
Are murmuring to the murmuring keel.

Over the rail
My hand I trail
Within the shadow of the sail,
A joy intense,
The cooling sense
Glides down my drowsy indolence.

With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Where Summer sings and never dies;—
O'erweiled with vines,
She glows and shines
Among her future oil and wines.

Her children, hid
The cliffs amid,
Are gambolling with the gambolling kid,
Or down the walls,
With tippy calls,
Laugh on the rocks like waterfalls.

The fisher's child,
With tresses wild,
Unto the smooth, bright sand beguiled,
With glowing lips
Sings as she skips,
Or gazes at the far-off ships.

Yon deep bark goes
Where Traffic blows,
From lands of sun to lands of snows;—
This happier one,
Its course is run
From lands of snow to lands of sun.

O happy ship;
To rise and dip,
With the blue crystal at your lip!

O happy crew,
My heart with you
Sails, and sails, and sings anew!
No more, no more
The worldly shore
Upbraids me with its loud uproar!
With dreamful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise!

* THE RISING—FROM THE WAGONER OF THE ALLEGANIES.

Out of the North the wild news came,
Far flashing on its wings of flame,
Swift as the boreal light which flies
At midnight through the startled skies.

And there was tumult in the air,
The fife's shrill note, the drum's loud beat,
And through the wide land everywhere
The answering tread of hurrying feet,
While the first oath of Freedom's gun
Came on the blast from Lexington.
And Concord, roused, no longer tame,
Forgot her old baptismal name,
Made bare her patriot arm of power,
And swelled the discord of the hour.

* * * * *
Each sacred hearthstone, deep and wide,
Through many a night glowed bright and full;

The matron's great wheel at its side
No more devoured the carded wool,
And now the maiden's smaller wheel
No longer felt the throbbing tread,
But stood beside the idle reel
Among its idle flax and thread.
No more the jovial song went round,
No more the ringing laugh was heard;
But every voice had a solemn sound,
And some stern purpose filled each word.

The yeoman and the yeoman's son,
With knitted brows and sturdy dint,
Renewed the polish of each gun,
Re-oiled the lock, reset the flint;
And oft the maid and matron there,
While kneeling in the firelight glare,
Long poured, with half-suspended breath,
The lead into the moulds of death.

The hands by Heaven made silken soft
To soothe the brow of love or pain,
Alas! are dulled and soiled too oft
By some unhallowed earthly stain;
But under the celestial bound
No nobler picture can be found
Than woman, brave in word and deed,
Thus serving in her nation's need;
Her love is with her country now,
Her hand is on its aching brow.

* * * * *
Within its shade of elm and oak
The church of Berkley Manor stood:
There Sunday found the rural folk,
And some esteemed of gentle blood.
In vain their feet with loitering tread
Passed mid the graves where rank is naught:
All could not read the lesson taught
In that republic of the dead.

The pastor rose: the prayer was strong;
The psalm was warrior David's song;
The text, a few short words of might,—
"The Lord of hosts shall arm the right!

He spoke of wrongs too long endured,
Of sacred rights to be secured;
Then from his patriot tongue of flame
The startling words for Freedom came
The stirring sentences he spake
Compelled the heart to glow or quake,
And, rising on his theme's broad wing,
And grasping in his nervous hand
The imaginary battle-brand,
In face of death he dared to fling
Defiance to a tyrant king.

Even as he spoke, his frame, renewed
In eloquence of attitude,
Rose, as it seemed, a shoulder higher;
Then swept his kindling glance of fire
From startled pew to breathless choir;
When suddenly his mantle wide
His hands impatient flung aside,
And, lo! he met their wondering eyes
Complete in all a warrior's guise.

A moment there was awful pause,—
When Berkley cried, "Cease, traitor! cease!
God's temple is the house of peace!"

The other shouted, "Nay, not so,
When God is with our righteous cause:
His holiest places then are ours,
His temples are our forts and towers
That frown upon the tyrant foe:
In this the dawn of freedom's day
There is a time to fight and pray!"

And now before the open door—
The warrior-priest had ordered so—
The enlisting trumpet's sudden roar
Rang through the chapel, o'er and o'er,
Its long reverberating blow,
So loud and clear, it seemed the ear
Of dusty death must wake and hear.
And there the startling drum and fife
Fired the living with fiercer life;
While overhead, with wild increase,
Forgetting its ancient toll of peace,
The great bell swung as ne'er before:
It seemed as it would never cease;
And every word its ardor flung
From off its jubilant iron tongue
Was, "WAR! WAR! WAR!"

"Who dares"—this was the patriot's cry,
As striding from the desk he came—
"Come out with me, in Freedom's name,
For her to live, for her to die?"
A hundred hands flung up reply,
A hundred voices answered "If!"

* SHERIDAN'S RIDE.

Up from the South at break of day,
Bringing to Winchester fresh dismay,
The affrighted air with a shudder bore,
Like a herald in haste, to the chieftain's door,
The terrible grumble, and rumble, and roar,
Telling the battle was on once more,
And Sheridan twenty miles away.

And wider still those billows of war,
Thundered along the horizon's bar;
And louder yet into Winchester rolled
The roar of that red sea uncontrolled,
Making the blood of the listener cold,
As he thought of the stake in that fiery fray,
And Sheridan twenty miles away.

But there is a road from Winchester town,
A good broad highway leading down;

And there, through the flush of the morning light,
A steed as black as the steeds of night,
Was seen to pass, as with eagle flight,
As if he knew the terrible need;
He stretched away with his utmost speed;
Hills rose and fell; but his heart was gay,
With Sheridan fifteen miles away.

Still sprung from those swift hoofs, thundering
South,

The dust, like smoke from the cannon's mouth;
Or the trail of a comet, sweeping faster and faster,
Foreboding to traitors the doom of disaster.
The heart of the steed, and the heart of the master
Were beating like prisoners assaulting their walls,
Impatient to be where the battle-field calls;
Every nerve of the charger was strained to full play,

With Sheridan only ten miles away.

Under his spurning feet the road
Like an arrowy Alpine river flowed,
And the landscape sped away behind
Like an ocean flying before the wind,
And the steed, like a bark fed with furnace ire,
Swept on, with his wild eye full of fire.
But lo! he is bearing his heart's desire;
He is snuffing the smoke of the roaring fray,
With Sheridan only five miles away.

The first that the general saw were the groups
Of stragglers, and then the retreating troops,
What was done? what to do? a glance told him both,

Then striking his spurs, with a terrible oath,
He dashed down the line, 'mid a storm of huzzas,
And the wave of retreat checked its course there, because

The sight of the master compelled it to pause.
With foam and with dust, the black charger was gray;

By the flash of his eye, and the red nostril's play,
He seemed to the whole great army to say,
"I have brought you Sheridan all the way
From Winchester, down to save the day!"

Hurrah! hurrah for Sheridan!
Hurrah! hurrah for horse and man!
And when their statues are placed on high,
Under the dome of the Union sky,
The American soldiers' Temple of Fame;
There with the glorious general's name,
Be it said, in letters both bold and bright,
"Here is the steed that saved the day,
By carrying Sheridan into the fight,
From Winchester, twenty miles away!"

FREDERICK S. COZZENS,

THE author of numerous popular sketches in the Knickerbocker and Putnam's Magazines, is a native of New York City. He early became engaged in mercantile life, and is at present a leading wine-merchant.

In 1853 he published a volume of sketches in prose and verse entitled Primitives, by Richard Hayward. It was tastefully illustrated from designs by Elliott, Darley, Kensett, Hicks, and Rossiter. He has since written a series of sketches for Putnam's Monthly, humorously descriptive of a cockney residence in the country, under the title of The Sparrowgrass Papers, which appeared in book-form in 1856.

Mr. Cozzens is also the author of a very pleasant miscellany published in connexion with his business, entitled The Wine Press. In addition to much information on the important topic of the native culture of the grape, it is enlivened by many clever essays and sketches in the range of practical æsthetics.

BUNKER HILL; AN OLD-TIME BALLAD.

It was a starry night in June; the air was soft and still,
When the "minute-men" from Cambridge came, and gathered on the hill:
Beneath us lay the sleeping town, around us frowned the fleet,
But the pulse of freemen, not of slaves, within our bosoms beat;
And every heart rose high with hope, as fearlessly we said,
"We will be numbered with the free, or numbered with the dead!"
"Bring out the line to mark the trench, and stretch it on the sward!"
The trench is marked—the tools are brought—we utter not a word,
But stack our guns, then fall to work, with mattock and with spade,
A thousand men with sinewy arms, and not a sound is made:
So still were we, the stars beneath, that scarce a whisper fell;
We heard the red-coat's musket click, and heard him cry, "All's well!"
And here and there a twinkling port, reflected on the deep,
In many a wavy shadow showed their sullen guns asleep.
Sleep on, thou bloody hireling crew! in careless slumber lie;
The trench is growing broad and deep, the breast-work broad and high:
No striplings we, but bear the arms that held the French in check,
The drum that beat at Louisburg, and thundered in Quebec!
And thou, whose promise is deceit, no more thy word we'll trust,
Thou butcher GAGE! thy power and thee we'll humble in the dust;
Thou and thy tory minister have boasted to thy brood,
"The lintels of the faithful shall be sprinkled with our blood!"
But though these walls those lintels be, thy zeal is all in vain:
A thousand freemen shall rise up for every freeman slain;
And when o'er trampled crowns and thrones they raise the mighty shout,
This soil their Palestine shall be; their altar this redoubt:
See how the morn is breaking! the red is in the sky;
The mist is creeping from the stream that floats in silence by;
The Lively's hull looms through the fog, and they our works have spied,
For the ruddy flash and roundshot part in thunder from her side;

And the Falcon and the Cerberus make every bosom thrill,
 With gun and shell, and drum and bell, and boat-swain's whistle shrill;
 But deep and wider grows the trench, as spade and mattock ply,
 For we have to cope with fearful odds, and the time is drawing nigh!
 Up with the pine tree banner! Our gallant Prescott stands
 Amid the plunging shells and shot, and plants it with his hands;
 Up with the shout! for PUTNAM comes upon his reeking bay,
 With bloody spur and foamy bit, in haste to join the fray;
 And POMEROY, with his snow-white hairs, and face all flush and sweat,
 Unscathed by French and Indian, wears a youthful glory yet.
 But thou, whose soul is glowing in the summer of thy years,
 Unvanquishable WARREN, thou (the youngest of thy peers)
 Wert born, and bred, and shaped, and made to act a patriot's part,
 And dear to us thy presence is as heart's blood to the heart!
 Well may ye bark, ye British wolves! with leaders such as they,
 Not one will fail to follow where they choose to lead the way—
 As once before, scarce two months since, we followed on your track,
 And with our rifles marked the road ye took in going back.
 Ye slew a sick man in his bed; ye slew with hands accursed,
 A mother nursing, and her blood fell on the babe she nursed;
 By their own doots our kinsmen fell and perished in the strife;
 But as we hold a hireling's cheap, and dear a free-man's life,
 By Tanner brook, and Lincoln bridge, before the shut of sun,
 We took the recompense we claimed—a score for every one!
 Hark! from the town a trumpet! The barges at the wharf
 Are crowded with the living freight—and now they're pushing off;
 With clash and glitter, trump and drum, in all its bright array,
 Behold the splendid sacrifice move slowly o'er the bay!
 And still and still the barges fill, and still across the deep,
 Like thunder-clouds along the sky, the hostile transports sweep;
 And now they're forming at the Point—and now the lines advance:
 We see beneath the sultry sun their polished bayonets glance;
 We hear a-near the throbbing drum, the bugle challenge ring;
 Quick bursts, and loud, the flashing cloud, and rolls from wing to wing;
 But on the height our bulwark stands, tremendous in its gloom,
 As sullen as a tropic sky, and silent as a tomb.
 And so we waited till we saw, at scarce ten rifles' length,
 The old vindictive Saxon spite, in all its stubborn strength;

When sudden, flash on flash, around the jagged rampart burst
 From every gun the livid light upon the foe accurst:
 Then quailed a monarch's might before a free-born people's ire;
 Then drank the sword the veteran's life, where swept the yeoman's fire;
 Then, staggered by the shot, we saw their serried columns reel,
 And fall, as falls the bearded rye beneath the reaper's steel:
 And then arose a mighty shout that might have waked the dead,
 "Hurrah! they run! the field is won!" "Hurrah! the foe is fled!"
 And every man hath dropped his gun to clutch a neighbor's hand,
 As his heart kept praying all the while for Home and Native Land.
 Thrice on that day we stood the shock of thrice a thousand foes,
 And thrice that day within our lines the shout of victory rose!
 And though our swift fire slackened then, and reddening in the skies,
 We saw, from Charle-town's roofs and walls, the flamy columns rise;
 Yet while we had a cartridge left, we still maintained the fight,
 Nor gained the foe one foot of ground upon that blood-stained height.
 What though for us no laurels bloom, nor o'er the nameless brave
 No sculptured trophy, scroll, nor hatch, records a warrior-grave!
 What though the day to us was lost! Upon that deathless page
 The everlasting charter stands, for every land and age!
 For man hath broke his felon bonds, and cast them in the dust,
 And claimed his heritage divine, and justified the trust;
 While through his rifted prison-bars the hues of freedom pour
 O'er every nation, race, and clime, on every sea and shore.
 Such glories as the patriarch viewed, when 'mid the darkest skies,
 He saw above a ruined world the Bow of Promise rise.

 Mr. Cozzens continued to edit The Wine Press for seven years, till he relinquished its publication at the breaking out of the war. A collection of sprightly essays from its pages, mainly on gastronomic and kindred topics, was issued in 1867, as Sayings of Dr. Bushwhacker and Other Learned Men. Acadia; or, A Sojourn among the Blue Noses, had appeared in 1858; and ten years later its author wrote his last work, a Memorial of Fitz Greene Halleck, which was read before, and printed by, the New York Historical Society. He died at Brooklyn, December 23, 1869, in his fifty-second year, having been born March 5, 1818.

 A LEAF FROM CHILD LIFE—FROM SPARROWGRASS PAPERS.

We have sent the children to school. Under the protecting wing of Mrs. Sparrowgrass, our two eldest boys passed in safety through the narrow channel of orthography, and were fairly launched upon the great ocean of reading before a teacher was thought of. But when boys get into definitions, and words more than an inch long, it is time to put them out, and pay their bills once a quarter. Our little maid, five years old, must go with them, too. The boys stipulated that she should go, although she had never gone beyond E in the alphabet before. When I came home from the city in the evening, I found them with their new carpet-satchels all ready for the morning. There was quite a hurrah! when I came in, and they swung their book-knapsacks over each little shoulder by a strap, and stepped out with great pride, when I said, "Well done, my old soldiers." Next morning we saw the old soldiers marching up the garden-path to the gate, and then the little procession halted; and the boys waved their caps, and one dear little toad kissed her mitten at us—and then away they went with such cheerful faces. Poor old soldiers! what a long, long siege you have before you!

Thank Heaven for this great privilege, that our little ones go to school in the country. Not in the narrow streets of the city; not over the flinty pavements; not amid the crush of crowds and the din of wheels; but out in the sweet woodlands and meadows; out in the open air, and under the blue sky—cheered on by the birds of spring and summer, or braced by the stormy winds of ruder seasons. Learning a thousand lessons city children never learn; getting nature by heart—and treasuring up in their little souls the beautiful stories written in God's great picture-book.

We have stirring times now when the old soldiers come home from school in the afternoon. The whole household is put under martial law until the old soldiers get their rations. Bless their white heads, how hungry they are. Once in a while they get pudding, by way of a treat. Then what chuckling and rubbing of little fists, and cheers, as the three white heads touch each other over the pan. I think an artist could make a charming picture of that group of urchins, especially if he painted them in their school-knapsacks.

Sometimes we get glimpses of their minor world—its half-fledged ambitions, its puny cares, its hopes and its disappointments. The first afternoon they returned from school, open flew every satchel, and out came a little book. A conduct-book! There was G for good boy, and R. for reading, and S. for spelling, and so on; and opposite every letter a good mark. From the early records in the conduct-books, the school-mistress must have had an elegant time of it for the first few days, with the old soldiers. Then there came a dark day; and on that afternoon, from the force of circumstances, the old soldiers did not seem to care about showing up. Every little reluctant hand, however, went into its satchel upon requisition, and out came the records. It was evident, from a tiny legion of crosses in the books, that the mistress's duties had been rather irksome that morning. So the small column was ordered to deploy in line of battle, and, after a short address, dismissed—without pudding. In consequence, the old soldiers now get some good marks every day.

We begin to observe the first indications of a love for society growing up with their new experiences. It is curious to see the tiny filaments of friendship putting forth, and winding their fragile tendrils around their small acquaintances. What a little world it is—the little world that is allowed to go into the menagerie at half price! Has it not its joys and its griefs; its cares and its mortifications; its aspirations and its despairs? One day the old soldiers came home in high feather, with a note. An invitation to a party, "Master Millet's compliments, and would be happy to see the Masters, and Miss Sparrowgrass to tea, on Saturday afternoon." What a hurrah! there was, when the note was read; and how the round eyes glistened with anticipation; and how their cheeks glowed with the run they had had. Not an inch of the way from school had they walked, with that great note! There was much chuckling over their dinner, too; and we observed the flush never left their cheeks, even after they were in bed, and had been asleep for hours. Then all their best clothes had to be taken out of the drawer and brushed; and the best collars laid out; and a small silk apron, with profuse ribbons, improvised for our little maid; and a great to-do generally. Next morning I left them, as I had to go to the city; but the day was bright and beautiful. At noon, the sky grew cloudy. At two o'clock, it commenced raining. At three, it rained steadily. When I reached home in the evening, they were all in bed again; and I learned they had been prevented going to the party on account of the weather. "They had been dreadfully disappointed," Mrs. Sparrowgrass said; so we took a lamp and went up to have a look at them. There they lay—the hopeful roses of yesterday, all faded; and one poor old soldier was sobbing in his sleep.

We begin to think our eldest is nourishing a secret passion, under his bell-buttons. He has been seen brushing his hair more than once lately; and, not long since, the two youngest came home from school, crying, without him. Upon investigation, we found our eldest had gone off with a school girl twice his size; and, when he returned, he said he had only gone home with her, because she promised to put some bay-ram on his hair. He has even had the audacity to ask me to write a piece of poetry about her, and of course I complied.

TO MY BIG SWEETHEART.

My love has long brown curls,
And blue forget-me-not eyes;

She's the beauty of all the girls—

But I wish I was twice my size;

Then I could kiss her cheek,

Or venture her lips to taste;

But now I only reach to the ribbon

She ties around her waist.

Chocolate-drop of my heart!

I dare not breathe thy name;

Like a peppermint stick I stand apart

In a sweet, but secret flame:

When you look down on me,

And the tassel atop of my cap,

I feel as if something had got in my throat,

And was choking against the strap.

I passed your garden and there,

On the clothes-line, hung a few

Pantalettes, and one tall pair

Reminded me, love, of you;

And I thought as I swung on the gate

In the cold, by myself alone,

How soon the sweetness of hoarhound dies,

But the bitter keeps on and on.

It was quite touching to see how solemnly the old soldiers listened, when this was being read to them; and when I came to the lines:—

"I feel as if something had got in my throat,
And was choking against the strap"—

Ivanhoe looked up with questioning eyes, as if he would have said, "How did you know that?"

* * UP THE RHINE — FROM THE SAYINGS OF DR. BUSH-WACKER.

"The clouds now began to break away — once more we see the distant peaks of the Siebengebirge and the castled crag of Drachenfels — a flush of warm sunlight illuminates the wet deck of the Schnellfahrt; the passengers peep out of the companion-way, and finally emerge boldly, to inhale the fresh air and inspect the beauties of the Rhine. As for the Miller of Zurich, he had taken the shower as kindly as a duck, shaking the drops from his gray woolly coat, as they fell, and tossing off green glass after green glass of Liebfraunmilch, or Assmanshauser, from either bottle. Betimes his pretty wife joined us, and walked on tip-toe over the wet spots; the sun came out, hotter and hotter; the deck, the little tables, the wooden seats, began to smoke; overcoats came off, shawls were laid aside; plates piled up with sweet grapes and monstrous pears, green glasses, and tall flasks of Rhine wine, were handed around to the ladies, and distributed on the tables; and the red-checked German boy whose imitations of English had so amused us, shouted the captain's orders to the engineer below, in a more cheery voice — Sto're! backor! forror!"

I had had an indistinct vision of a pair of whiskers at the far end of the breakfast table, brushed out à l'Anglaise in parallel lines, as thin as a gilder's camel's-hair brush. These whiskers now came up on deck, attached to a very insignificant countenance, a check cap, and a woollen suit of purplish cloth, such as travellers from Angleterre enjoy scenery in. Across the right breast of this person, a narrow black strap of patent leather wound its way until it found a green leather satchel, just across his left hip; while over his left breast, a similar strap again wound around him, and finally attached itself to a gigantic opera glass in a black leather case. All these implements of travel, with little else to note, paced solemnly up and down the now dry deck of the Schnellfahrt.

In the meantime, my glass, map, guide-book, were all in action, castle following castle, Rolandseck, Rheineck, Andernach, and all the glorious panorama, rolling in view with every turn of the steamer. And chiefly I enjoyed the conversation of my Miller of Zurich, whose plump forefinger anticipated the distant towers and battlements which he had seen so often, for so many times, in yearly trips upon the river. Nor was I alone, for from every standpoint of the deck were fingers pointed, and glasses raised, at the glories of the castled Rhine.

But in the midst of this excitement and enthusiasm, that purple traveller, with whiskers and straps, satchel and opera glass, walked up and down, unobservant of the scenery, miserable and melancholic, without a glance at the vineyards, or the mountains, or the castles. Then I knew that he was an Englishman, doing the Rhine.

He walked up to our table, where old Zurich and his pretty wife were seated before the grapes and the wine, where my shawl and satchel were flung — map spread, and guide-book open — and said, in that peculiar English voice which always suggests catarrh —

"Going up the Rhine, sir?"

"Rather," said I, dryly, (for I hate bores.)

"Aw!" — now the reader must translate for himself — "Forst time ye' beene h'yar?"

"Yes," I answered, "is it your first visit also?"

"Aw — no! 'beene hea-r pu'foh; sev-wal taimes. How faw'r goin, sawr?" (Don't talk of Yankee inquisitiveness.)

"To Mayence, and no further this evening." (Opera glass levelled directly at Ehrenbreitstein.)

"Gaw'ng to Hydl'bug?"

"I think so."

"Hydl'bug's 'good bisness; do it up in 'couple of awhrs."

Here old Zurich makes a remark, and says:

"Military engineers build, that other military engineers may destroy."

MYSELF. — "Are those yellow lines against the hill masonry? — parapets?"

OLD ZURICH. — "Fortified from top to bottom."

"Gaw'ng to Italy?" chimed in the camel's-hair whiskers.

"No" (Decidedly no.)

"Gaw'ng to Sowth 'f Fwance?"

"Probably."

"Wal, if 'r not gaw'n t' Italy, and you'r gaw'n to South 'f Fwance — gaw'n to Nip?"

"To Nimes? what for?"

"'F yaw'r not gaw'n to Rhawm, it's good bisness to go to Nim — they've got a ring thar."

"A ring?"

"Yas, 'ont ye know?"

"A ring?"

"Yas — snim's they got at Rhaome; good bisness that — do it up in tow hawrs; early Christians, y' know, and wild beasts!"

"Oh, you mean the Roman amphitheatre at Nimes — a sort of miniature Coliseum."

"Yaas, Col's'm."

"No, sir, I am not going to Nimes" — another look at Ehrenbreitstein and its shattered wall.

"Never be'n up th' Rhine before," quoth whiskers.

"No," — we are approaching the banks of the "Blue Moselle"

"Eh'nbreitstine's good bisness, and that sort o' thing — do t in about two hawrs!"

"I do not intend to stop at Ehrenbreitstein, and, therefore, intend to make the best use of my time to see the general features of the fortress from the river"

"Aw — then y'd better stop at Coblanz, and go t' Wisbad'n, by th' rail."

"What for?"

"Why, the Rhine, you know, 's a tiresome bisness, and by goin' to Wisbaw'd'n from Coblanz, by land, you escape all that sort aw-thing."

"But I do not wish to escape all this sort of thing — I want to see the Rhine."

"Aw!" — with some expression of surprise. "Going to Switz'land?"

"Yes."

"Y' got Moy for Switz'land?"

"Moy? I beg your pardon."

"Yes, Moy — Moy; got Moy for Switz'land?"

"Moy — do you mean money? I hope so."

"Ged Gad, sir, no! I say Moy."

"Upon my word, I do not comprehend you."

"Moy, sir, Moy!" rapping vehemently on the red cover of my guide book that lay upon the table. "I say Moy for Switz'land."

"Oh, you mean Murray."

"Certainly, sir, didn't I say Moy?"

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS is a native of Providence, R. I., where he was born in 1824. His grandfather, on the mother's side, was James Barrill, remembered as an eminent Rhode Islander, and for his Senator's speech in Congress on the Missouri Compromise Bill. He died at Washington, and is buried there in the Congressional cemetery.

At six years of age young Curtis was placed at school near Boston, and there remained until he was eleven. He returned to Providence, pursuing his studies till he was fifteen, when his father, George Curtis, removed with his family to New York. In a pleasant article in Putnam's Magazine, with the title Sea from Shore, our author has given an imaginative reminiscence of his early impressions of Providence, then in the decay of its large India trade.* Of late years manufactories and machine shops have supplanted the quaint old stores upon many of the docks; but the town, at the head of the Narragansett bay, is fortunate in its situation, upon a hill at the confluence of two rivers, sloping to the east, west, and south; and the stately houses of its earlier merchants upon the ascent towards the south, form as fine a cluster of residences as are seen in any of our cities.

In New York our author was smitten with the love of trade, and deserted his books for a year to serve in a large foreign importing house. Though not without its advantages, the pursuit was abandoned at the end of that time, and the clerk became again a student, continuing with tutors until he was eighteen, when, in a spirit of idyllic enthusiasm, he took part in the Brook Farm Association in West Roxbury, Mass. He remained there a year and a half, enjoying the novel experiences of nature and the friendship of his cultivated associates, and still looks back upon the period as a pleasurable pastoral episode of his life.†

From Brook Farm and its agricultural occupations, after a winter in New York, being still enamored of the country, he went to Concord, in Massachusetts, and lived in a farmer's family, working hard upon the farm and taking his share of the usual fortunes of farmers' boys—with a very unusual private accompaniment of his own, in the sense of poetic enjoyment, unless the poet Bloomfield's Farmer's Boy be taken as the standard. At Concord he saw something of Emerson, much of Hawthorne, who had taken up his residence there after the Brook Farm adventure, and a little of Henry Thoreau, and of the poet William Ellery Channing. It was at this time that Emerson tried the formation of a club out of the individual "unclubable" elements of the philosophic personages in the neighborhood, which Mr. Curtis has pleasantly described in the Homes of American Authors.‡

During these years, Mr. Curtis was constantly studying and perfecting himself in the various accomplishments of literature, and after two summers and a winter passed in Concord, he sailed for Europe in August, 1846. He landed at Marseilles, and proceeding along the coast to Genoa, Leghorn, and Florence, passed the winter in Rome in the society of the American artists then resident there, Crawford, Hicks, Kensett, Cranch, Terry, and Freeman. In the spring he travelled through southern Italy and reached Venice in August. At Milan he met Mr. George S. Hillard and the Rev. Frederic H. Hedge, and crossed the Stelvio with them in the autumn into Germany. There he matriculated at the University of Berlin, and spent a portion of his time in travel, visiting every part of Germany and making the tour of the Danube into Hungary as far as Pesh. He was in Berlin during the revolutionary scenes of March, 1848. The next winter he passed in Paris, was in Switzerland in the summer, and in the following autumn crossed into Italy, and went to Sicily from Naples. He made the tour of the island, and visited Malta and the East, returning to America in the summer of 1850.

George W. Curtis

In the autumn of that year he prepared the Nile Notes of an Howadji, much of which was written, as it stands, upon the Nile. During the winter he was connected with the Tribune newspaper, and the following season the Notes were published by the Harpers and by Bentley in London. In the summer of 1851 a travelling tour furnished letters from the fashionable watering-places to the Tribune, and the autumn and winter were spent in Providence, where a second series of Eastern reminiscences and sketches—The Howadji in Syria—was written, which was published by the Harpers the next spring, and the same publishing season the Tribune letters were rewritten and printed, with illustrations by Kensett, in the volume entitled Lotus Eating.

Returning to New York in the autumn of 1852, he became one of the original editors of Putnam's Monthly, and wrote the series of satiric sketches of society, the Potiphar Papers, which

* Putnam's Magazine, July, 1854. The passage is in the author's best fanciful vein.

† Some further mention of this peculiar affair will be found in the notice of Hawthorne. In the preface to the Blithedale Romance, Hawthorne calls upon Curtis to become the historian of the settlement—"Even the brilliant Howadji might find as rich a theme in his youthful reminiscences of Brook Farm, and a more novel one,—close at hand as it lies,—than those which he has since made so distant a pilgrimage to seek, in Syria and along the current of the Nile."

‡ The papers of Mr. Curtis in this volume, published by Putnam in 1858 are the sketches of Emerson, Longfellow, Hawthorne and Bancroft.

were collected in a volume in 1853. Besides the Potiphar Papers, he has written numerous articles for Putnam's Magazine, including several poetical essays, in the character of a simple-minded merchant's clerk, with his amiable, common-sense wife Prue for a heroine. Dinner Time, My Chateaux, and Sea from Shore, belong to this series, which appeared as Prue and I, in 1856.

He has also written for Harpers' Magazine a picturesque historical paper on Newport,* some tales of fashionable society by Smythe, Jr., and other papers.

In the winter of 1853 he took the field as a popular lecturer with success in different parts of the country.

In 1854 he delivered a poem before a literary society at Brown University, at Providence.

It is understood that Mr. Curtis is at present (1855) engaged upon a life of Mehemet Ali: a topic which will test his diligence and powers in a new department of composition.

UNDER THE PALMS—FROM THE NILS NOTES

A motion from the river won,
 Ebb'd the smooth level, bearing on
 My shallop through the star-strown calm,
 Until another night in night
 I entered, from the clearer light,
 Imbowered vaults of pillar'd Palm.

Humboldt, the only cosmopolitan and a poet, divides the earth by beauties, and celebrates as dearest to him, and first fascinating him to travel, the climate of palms. The palm is the type of the tropics, and when the great Alexander marched triumphing through India, some Hindoo, suspecting the sweetest secret of Brama, distilled a wine from the palm, the glorious phantasy of whose intoxication no poet records.

I knew a palm-tree upon Capri. It stood in select society of shining fig-leaves and lustrous oleanders; it overhung the balcony, and so looked, far over-leaning, down upon the blue Mediterranean. Through the dream-mists of southern Italian noons, it looked up the broad bay of Naples and saw vague Vesuvius melting away; or at sunset the isles of the Syrens, whereon they singing sat, and wooed Ulysses as he went; or in the full May moonlight the oranges of Sorrento shone across it, great and golden, permanent plane's of that delicious dark. And from the Sorrento where Tasso was born, it looked across to pleasant Posyllipo, where Virgil is buried, and to stately Ischia. The palm of Capri saw all that was fairest and most famous in the bay of Naples.

A wandering poet, whom I knew—sang a sweet song to the palm, as he dreamed in the moonlight upon that balcony. But it was only the free-masonry of sympathy. It was only syllabled moonshine. For the palm was a poet too, and all palms are poets.

Yet when I asked the bard what the palm-tree sang in its melancholy measures of waving, he told me that not Vesuvius, nor the Syrens, nor Sorrento, nor Tasso, nor Virgil, nor stately Ischia, nor all the broad blue beauty of Naples bay, was the theme of that singing. But partly it sang of a river for ever flowing, and of cloudless skies, and green fields that never faded, and the mournful music of water-wheels, and the wild monotony of a tropical life—and partly of the yellow silence of the Desert, and of drear solitudes inaccessible, and of wandering caravans, and lonely men. Then of gardens overhanging rivers, that roll gorgeous-shored through Western fancies—of gardens in Bagdad watered by the Euphrates and the Tigris, whereof it was the fringe and darling ornament—of oases in those serene and deserts where it overfountained fountains, and every leaf was blessed. More than all, of the great Orient universally, where no tree was so abundant, so lovely, and so beautiful.

When I lay under that palm-tree in Capri in the May moonlight, my ears were opened, and I heard all that the poet had told me of its song.

Perhaps it was because I came from Rome, where the holy week comes into the year as Christ entered Jerusalem, over palms. For in the magnificence of St. Peter's, all the pomp of the most pompous of human institutions is on one day characterized by the palm. The Pope borne upon his throne, as is no other monarch,—with wide-waving Flabella attendant, moves, blessing the crowd through the great nave. All the red-legged cardinals follow, each of whose dresses would build a chapel, so costly are they, and the crimson-crowned Greek patriarch with long silken beard, and the crew of motley which the Roman clergy is, crowded after in shining splendor.

No ceremony of imperial Rome had been more imposing, and never witnessed in a temple more imperial. But pope, patriarch, cardinals, bishops, ambassadors, and all the lesser glories, bore palm branches in their hands. Not veritable palm branches, but their imitation in turned yellow wood; and all through Rome that day, the palm branch was waving and hanging. Who could not see its beauty, even in the turned yellow wood? Who did not feel it was a sacred tree as well as romantic?

For palm branches were strewn before Jesus as he rode into Jerusalem, and for ever, since, the palm symbolizes peace. Wherever a grove of palms waves in the low moonlight or starlight wind, it is the celestial choir chanting peace on earth, goodwill to men. Therefore is it the foliage of the old religious pictures. Mary sits under a palm, and the saints converse under palms, and the prophets prophesy in their shade, and cherubs float with palms over the Martyr's agony. Nor among pictures is there any more beautiful than Correggio's Flight into Egypt, wherein the golden-haired angels put aside the palm branches, and smiled sunnily through, upon the lovely Mother and the lovely child.

The palm is the chief tree in religious remembrance and religious art. It is the chief tree in romance and poetry. But its sentiment is always Eastern, and it always yearns for the East. In the West it is an exile, and pines in the most sheltered gardens. Among Western growths in the Western air, it is as unsphered as Hælix in a temperance society. Yet of all Western shores it is happiest in Sicily; for Sicily is only a bit of Africa drifted westward. There is a soft Southern strain in the Sicilian skies, and the palms drink its sunshine like dew. Upon the tropical plain behind Palermo, among the sun-sucking aloes, and the thick, shapeless cactuses, like elephants and rhinoceroses enchanted into foliage, it grows ever gladly. For the aloe is of the East, and the prickly pear, and upon that plain the Saracens have been, and the palm sees the Arabian arch, and the oriental sign-manual stamped upon the land.

In the Villa Serra di Falco, within sound of the vespers of Palermo, there is a palm beautiful to behold. It is like a Georgian slave in a pacha's harem. Softly shielded from eager winds, gently throned upon a slope of richest green, fringed with brilliant and fragrant flowers, it stands separate and peculiar in the odorous garden air. Yet it droops and soddens, and bears no fruit. Vain is the exquisite environment of foreign fancies. The poor slave has no choice but life. Care too tender will not suffer it to die. Pride and admiration surround it with the best beauties, and feed it upon the warmest sun. But I heard it sigh as I passed. A wind blew warm from the East, and it lifted its arms hopelessly, and when the wind, love-laden with the most subtle sweetness, lingered, loth to fly, the palm stood motionless upon its little green mound, and the flowers were so fresh and fair—and the leaves of the trees so deeply hued, and the native fruit so golden and glad upon the boughs—that the still warm garden air seemed only the silent, voluptuous sadness of the tree; and had I been a poet my heart would have melted in song for the proud, pining palm.

* In the number for August, 1854.

But the palms are not only poets in the West, they are prophets as well. They are like heralds sent forth upon the farthest points to celebrate to the traveller the glories they foreshow. Like spring birds they sing a summer unending, and climes where Time wears the year as a queen a rosary of diamonds. The mariner, eastward-sailing, hears tidings from the chance palms that barge along the southern Italian shore. They call out to him across the gleaming calm of a Mediterranean noon, "Thou happy mariner, our souls sail with thee."

The first palm undoes the West. The Queen of Sheba and the Princess Shemselnihar look then upon the most Solomon of Howadji's. So far the Orient has come—not in great glory, not handsomely, but as Rome came to Britain in Roman soldiers. The crown of imperial glory glittered yet and only upon the seven hills, but a single ray had penetrated the northern light—and what the golden house of Nero was to a Briton contemplating a Roman soldier, is the East to the Howadji first beholding a palm.

At Alexandria you are among them. Do not deery Alexandria as all Howadji do. To my eyes it was the illuminated initial of the oriental chapter. Certainly it reads like its heading—camels, mosques, bazars, turbans, baths, and chibouques: and the whole East rows out to you, in the turbaned and fluttering-robed rascal who officiates as your pilot and moons you in the shadow of palms under the pacha's garden. Malign Alexandria no more, although you do have your choice of camels or omnibuses to go to your hotel, for when you are there and trying to dine, the wild-eyed Bedouen who serves you, will send you deep into the desert by masquerading costume and his eager, restless eye, looking as if he would momentarily spring through the window, and plunge into the desert depths. These Bedouen or Arab servants are like steeds of the sun for carriage horses. They fly, girt with wild fascination, for what will they do next?

As you donkey out of Alexandria to Pompey's Pillar, you will pass a beautiful garden of palms, and by sunset nothing is so natural as to see only those trees. Yet the fascination is lasting. The poetry of the first exiles you saw, does not perish in the presence of the nation, for those exiles stood beckoning like angels at the gate of Paradise, sorrowfully ushering you into the glory whence themselves were outcasts for ever:—and as you curiously looked in passing, you could not believe that their song was truth, and that the many would be as beautiful as the one.

Thenceforward, in the land of Egypt, palms are perpetual. They are the only foliage of the Nile, for we will not harm the modesty of a few Mimosas and Sycomores by foolish claims. They are the shade of the mud villages, marking their site in the landscape, so that the groups of palms are the number of villages. They fringe the shore and the horizon. The sun sets golden behind them, and birds sit swirring upon their boughs and float glorious among their trunks; on the ground beneath are flowers; the sugar-cane is not harmed by the ghostly shade nor the tobacco, and the yellow flowers of the cotton-plant star its dusk at evening. The children play under them, and the old men crone and smoke, the donkeys graze, the surly bison and the conceited camels repose. The old Bible pictures are ceaselessly painted, but with softer, clearer colors than in the venerable book.

The palm-grove is always enchanted. If it stretch inland too alluringly, and you run ashore to stand under the bending boughs to share the peace of the doves swifiting in the golden twilight, and to make yourself feel more scripturally, at least to surround yourself with sacred emblems, having small other hope of a share in the beauty of holiness—yet you will never reach the grove. You will gain the trees, but it is not the grove you fancied—that golden gloom will never be gained—it is an endless El Dorado gleaming along these shores. The separate columnar trunks ray out in foliage above, but there is no shade of a grove, no privacy of a wood, except, indeed, at sunset,

A privacy of glorious light.

Each single tree has a little shade that the mass standing at wide ease can never create the shady solitude, without which there is no grove.

But the eye never wearies of palms more than the ear of singing birds. Solitary they stand upon the sand, or upon the level, fertile land in groups, with a grace and dignity that no tree surpasses. Very soon the eye beholds in their forms the original type of the columns which it will afterward admire in the temples. Almost the first palm is architecturally suggestive, even in those Western gardens—but to artists living among them and seeing only them! Men's hands are not delicate in the early ages, and the fountain fairness of the palms is not very slowly fashioned in the capitals, but in the flowery perfection of the Parthenon the palm triumphs. The forms of those columns came from Egypt, and that which was the suspicion of the earlier workers, was the success of more delicate designing. So is the palm inwound with our art and poetry and religion, and of all trees would the Howadji be a palm, wide-waving peace and plenty, and feeling is kin to the Parthenon and Raphael's pictures.

 Mr. G. W. Curtis has written little in book-form in recent years; but his graceful contributions to the periodicals published by the Harpers would fill many volumes. In 1856 he delivered a memorable address before the literary societies of Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., on The Duty of the American Scholar to Politics and the Times. Five years later appeared Trumps: a Novel, with illustrations by Hoppin. This romance of the foibles and follies of our fashionable life is a keen study of American society by a master of refined satire, rich in pure sentiment, and lacking, if at all, only in the power of passionate feeling.

As the editor and part proprietor of Putnam's Magazine, Mr. Curtis suffered the loss of his entire fortune by the failure of its publishers in 1867. In the year following he began a series of "Lounger" papers in Harper's Weekly; and since January, 1864, he has been the political editor of that journal. He is also the author of the genial and high-toned articles known as "The Easy Chair" in Harper's Magazine; and since the issue of Harper's Bazaar, he has written for it the papers on "Manners on the Road, by an Old Bachelor." Mr. W. D. Howells appreciatively delineated his spirit as a writer and a moralist in an article in the North American Review for July, 1868.

 MY CHATEAUX IN SPAIN — FROM PRUE AND I
 "In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
 A stately pleasure-dome decree."
 COLERIDGE.

I am the owner of great estates. Many of them lie in the West; but the greater part are in Spain. You may see my western possessions any evening at sunset when their spires and battlements flash against the horizon.

It gives me a feeling of pardonable importance, as a proprietor, that they are visible, to my eyes at least, from any part of the world in which I chance to be. In my long voyage around the Cape of Good Hope to India (the only voyage I ever made, when I was a boy and a supercargo), if I fell home-sick, or sank into a reverie of all the pleasant homes I had left behind, I had but to wait until sunset, and then, looking toward the west, I beheld my clustering pinnacles and towers brightly burnished as if to salute and welcome me.

So, in the city, if I get vexed and wearied, and cannot find my wonted solace in sallying forth at dinner-time to contemplate the gay world of youth and beauty hurrying to the congress of fashion, — or if I observe that years are deepening their tracks around the eyes of my wife, Prue, I go quietly up to the housetop, toward evening, and refresh myself with a distant prospect of my estates. It is as dear to me as that of Eton to the poet Gray; and, if I sometimes wonder at such moments whether I shall find those realms as fair as they appear, I am suddenly reminded that the night air may be noxious, and descending, I enter the little parlor where Prue sits stitching, and surprise that precious woman by exclaiming with the poet's pensive enthusiasm:

"Thought would destroy their Paradise,
 No more; — where ignorance is bliss,
 'Tis folly to be wise."

Columbus, also, had possessions in the West; and as I read aloud the romantic story of his life, my voice quivers when I come to the point in which it is related that sweet odors of the land mingled with the sea-air, as the Admiral's fleet approached the shores; that tropical birds flew out and fluttered around the ships, glittering in the sun, the gorgeous promises of the new country; that boughs, perhaps with blossoms not all decayed, floated out to welcome the strange wood from which the craft were hollowed. Then I cannot restrain myself. I think of the gorgeous visions I have seen before I have even undertaken the journey to the West, and I cry aloud to Prue:

"What sun-bright birds, and gorgeous blossoms, and celestial odors will float out to us, my Prue, as we approach our western possessions!"

The placid Prue raises her eyes to mine with a reproof so delicate that it could not be trusted to words; and, after a moment, she resumes her knitting and I proceed.

These are my western estates, but my finest castles are in Spain. It is a country famously romantic, and my castles are all of perfect proportions, and appropriately set in the most picturesque situations. I have never been in Spain myself, but I have naturally conversed much with travellers to that country; although, I must allow, without deriving from them much substantial information about my property there. The wisest of them told me that there were more holders of real estate in Spain than in any other region he had ever heard of, and they are all great proprietors. Every one of them possesses a multitude of the stateliest castles. From conversation with them you easily gather that each one considers his own castles much the largest and in the loveliest positions. And, after I had heard this said, I verified it, by discovering that all my immediate neighbors in the city were great Spanish proprietors.

One day as I raised my head from entering some long and tedious accounts in my books, and began to reflect that the quarter was expiring, and that I must begin to prepare the balance-sheet, I observed my subordinate, in office but not in years, (for poor old Titbottom will never see sixty again!) leaning on his hand, and much abstracted.

"Are you not well, Titbottom?" asked I.

"Perfectly, but I was just building a castle in Spain," said he.

I looked at his rusty coat, his faded hands, his sad eye, and white hair, for a moment, in great surprise, and then inquired:

"Is it possible that you own property there too?"

He shook his head silently; and still leaning on his hand, and with an expression in his eye, as if he were looking upon the most fertile estate of Andalusia, he went on making his plans; laying out his gardens, I suppose, building terraces for the vines, determining a library with a southern exposure, and resolving which should be the tapestried chamber.

"What a singular whim," thought I, as I watched Titbottom and filled up a check for four hundred dollars, my quarterly salary, "that a man who owns castles in Spain should be deputy book-keeper at nine hundred dollars a year!"

When I went home I ate my dinner silently, and afterward sat for a long time upon the roof of the house, looking at my western property, and thinking of Titbottom.

It is remarkable that none of the proprietors have ever been to Spain to take possession and report to the rest of us the state of our property there. I, of course, cannot go; I am too much engaged. So is Titbottom. And I find it is the case with all the proprietors. We have so much to detain us at home that we cannot get away. But it is always so with rich men. Prue sighed once as she sat at the window and saw Bourne, the millionaire, the president of innumerable companies, and manager and director of all the charitable societies in town, going by with wrinkled brow and hurried step. I asked her why she sighed.

"Because I was remembering that my mother used to tell me not to desire great riches, for they occasioned great cares," said she.

"They do, indeed," answered I, with emphasis, remembering Titbottom, and the impossibility of looking after my Spanish estates.

Prue turned and looked at me with mild surprise; but I saw that her mind had gone down the street with Bourne. I could never discover if he held much Spanish stock. But I think he does. All the Spanish proprietors have a certain expression. Bourne has it to a remarkable degree. It is a kind of look, as if, in fact, a man's mind were in Spain. Bourne was an old lover of Prue's, and he is not married, which is strange for a man in his position.

* THE JUNIOR PARTNER — FROM TRUMPS.

In his dress Abel was costly and elegant. With the other men of his day, he read "Pelham" with an admiration of which his life was the witness. Pelham was the Byronic hero made practicable, purged of romance, and adapted to society. Mr. Newt, Jun., was one of a small but influential set of young men about town who did all they could to repair the misfortune of being born Americans, by imitating the habits of foreign life.

It was presently clear to him that residence under the parental roof was incompatible with the habits of a strictly fashionable man.

"There are hours, you know, mother, and habits, which make a separate lodging much more agreeable to all parties. I have friends to smoke, or to drink a glass of punch, or to play a game of whist; and we must sing, and laugh, and make a noise, as young men will, which is not seemly for the paternal mansion, mother mine." With which he took his admiring mother airily under the chin and kissed her—not having mentioned every reason which made a separate residence desirable.

So Abel Newt hired a pleasant set of rooms in Grand Street, near Broadway, in the neighborhood of other youth of the right set. He furnished them sumptuously, with the softest carpets, the most luxurious easy-chairs, the most costly curtains, and pretty, bizarre little tables, and bureaus, and shelves. Various engravings hung upon the walls: a profile-head of Bulwer, with a large Roman nose and bushy whiskers, and one of his Majesty George IV., in that famous cloak which Lord Chesterfield bought at the sale of his Majesty's wardrobe for eleven hundred dollars, and of which the sable lining alone originally cost four thousand dollars. Then there were little vases, and boxes, and caskets standing upon all possible places, with a rare flower in some of them often, sent by some kind dowager who wished to make sure of Abel at a dinner or a select soirée. Pipes, of course, and boxes of choice cigars, were at hand, and in a convenient closet such a beautiful set of English cut glass for the use of a gentleman!

Boniface Newt remonstrated. His son was late at the office in the morning. He drew large sums to meet his large expenses. Several times, instead of instantly filling out the checks as Abel directed, the book-keeper had delayed, and said casually to Mr. Newt during Abel's absence at lunch, which was usually prolonged, that he supposed it was all right to fill up a check of that amount to Mr. Abel's order? Mr. Boniface Newt replied, in a dogged way, that he supposed it was.

But one day when the sum had been large, and the paternal temper more than usually ruffled, he addressed the junior partner upon his return from lunch and his noontide glass with his friends at the Washington Hotel, to the effect that matters were going on much too rapidly.

"To what matters do you allude, father?" inquired Mr. Abel, with composure, as he picked his teeth with one hand, and surveyed a cigar which he held in the other.

"I mean, Sir, that you are spending a great deal too much money."

"Why, how is that, Sir?" asked his son, as he called to the boy in the outer office to bring him a light.

"By Heavens! Abel, you're enough to make a man crazy! Here I have put you into my business, over the heads of the clerks who are a hundred-fold better fitted for it than you; and you not only come down late and go away early, and destroy all kind of discipline by smoking and lounging, but you don't manifest the slightest interest in the business; and, above all, you are living at a frightfully ruinous rate! Yes, Sir, ruinous! How do you suppose I can pay, or that the business can pay, for such extravagance?"

Abel smoked calmly during this energetic discourse, and blew little rings from his mouth, which he watched with interest as they melted in the air.

"Certain things are inevitable, father."

His parent, frowning and angry, growled at him as he made this remark, and muttered,

"Well, suppose they are."

"Now, father," replied his son, with great composure, "let us proceed calmly. Why should we pretend not to see what is perfectly plain? Business nowadays proceeds by credit. Credit is based upon something, or the show of something. It is represented by a bank-bill. Here now—" And he opened his purse leisurely and drew out a five-dollar note of the Bank of New York, "here is a promise to pay five dollars—in gold or silver, of course. Do you suppose that the Bank of New York has gold and silver enough to pay all those promises it has issued? Of course not."

Abel knocked off the ash from his cigar, and took a long contemplative whiff, as if he were about making a plunge into views even more profound. Mr. Newt, half pleased with the show of philosophy, listened with less frowning brows.

"Well, now, if by some hocus-pocus the Bank of New York hadn't a cent in coin at this moment, it could redeem the few claims that might be made upon it by borrowing, could it not?"

Mr. Newt shook his head affirmatively.

"And in fine, if it were entirely bankrupt, it could still do a tremendous business for a very considerable time, could it not?"

Mr. Newt assented.

"And the managers, who knew it to be so, would have plenty of time to get off before an explosion, if they wanted to?"

"Abel, what do you mean?" inquired his father.

The young man was still placidly blowing rings of smoke from his mouth, and answered:

"Nothing terrible. Don't be alarmed. It is only an illustration of the practical value of credit, showing how it covers a retreat, so to speak. Do you see the moral, father?"

"No; certainly not. I see no moral at all."

"Why, suppose that nobody wanted to retreat, but that the Bank was only to be carried over a dangerous place, then credit is a bridge, isn't it? If it were out of money, it could live upon its credit until it got the money back again."

"Clearly," answered Mr. Newt.

"And if it extended its operations, it would acquire even more credit?"

"Yes."

"Because people, believing in the solvency of the Bank, would suppose that it extended itself because it had more means?"

"Yes."

"And would not feel any dust in their eyes?"

"No," said Mr. Newt, following his son closely.

"Well, then; don't you see?"

"No, I don't see," replied the father; "that is, I don't see what you mean."

"Why, father, look here! I come into your business. The fact is known. People look. There's no whisper against the house. We extend ourselves; we live liberally, but we pay the bills. Every body says, 'Newt & Son are doing a thumping business.' Perhaps we are — perhaps we are not. We are crossing the bridge of credit. Before people know that we have been living up to our incomes — quite up, father dear" — Mr. Newt frowned an entire assent — "we have plenty of money!"

"How, in Heaven's name!" cried Boniface Newt, springing up, and in so loud a tone that the clerks looked in from the outer office.

"By my marriage," returned Abel, quietly.

"With whom?" asked Mr. Newt, earnestly.

"With an heiress."

"What's her name?"

"Just what I am trying to find out," replied Abel, lightly, as he threw his cigar away. "And now I put it to you, father, as a man of the world and a sensible, sagacious, successful merchant, am I not more likely to meet and marry such a girl, if I live generously in society, than if I shut myself up to be a mere dig?"

Mr. Newt was not sure. Perhaps it was so. Upon the whole, it probably was so.

Mr. Abel did not happen to suggest to his father that, for the purpose of marrying an heiress, if he should ever chance to be so fortunate as to meet one, and, having met her, to become enamored so that he might be justified in wooing her for his wife—that for all these contingencies it was a good thing for a young man to have a regular business connection and apparent employment—and very advantageous, indeed, that that connection should be with a man so well known in commercial and fashionable circles as his father. That of itself was one of the great advantages of credit. It was a frequent joke of Abel's with his father, after the recent conversation, that credit was the most creditable thing going.

JOHN WINGATE THORNTON.

John Wingate Thornton was born at Saco, Maine, August 12, 1818, and is a descendant of Rev. Thomas Thornton, of Yarmouth. He studied at Thornton Academy, Saco (an institution named in honor of his grandfather), and at the Law School, Harvard College, where he graduated LL.B., in 1840. He studied law with his uncle, Hon. John Fairfield, governor of Maine, and United States Senator from that State. For more than thirty years, he has practised his profession in Boston. He was one of the founders of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, and was its first recording secretary. He is now (1873), one of the vice-presidents of the American Statistical Association, and of the Prince Society for Mutual Publication. His publications, all relating to American history and antiquities, are Lives of Isaac Heath, John Bowles, and Rev. John Eliot, Jr. (1850); Landing at Cape Anne (1854); Ancient Pemaquid (1857); First Records of Anglo-American Colonization (1859); Peter Oliver's Puritan Commonwealth Reviewed (1857); The Colonial Schemes of Pop-ham and Gorges (1863).

In addition to these tracts and dissertations, which have been warmly welcomed for their judicious and exhaustive treatment by the students of American history, Mr. Thornton is the author of a volume of more general interest, which has attained a wider circulation—The Pulpit of the American Revolution; or, the Political Sermons of the Period of 1776, with a Historical Introduction, Notes and Illustrations (Boston, Gould & Lincoln, 1860, 12mo, pp. 537). It contains nine discourses, delivered between 1750 and 1783, beginning with Dr. Mayhew's discussion of the thesis of Unbounded Submission and Non-resistance to the Higher Powers, in particular relation to the trial and execution of Charles I., including various assertions of the right of self-government, elicited by the war of the revolution, by Gordon, Langdon, West, and others, and ending with Dr. Stiles's election sermon, The United States Exalted to Glory and Honor. The reprint of these forcible discourses is marked by critical exactness; the style of the curious original pages is preserved to the letter, while Mr. Thornton's ample prefatory matter and notes display extensive reading and research, and are always of interest and importance.

 Mr. Thornton has ready for the press a monograph entitled, The English Commonwealth the Reflex of New England, in which he traces the influence the Pilgrim exiles had in moulding the politics of the parent country. "On November 21, 1870, he delivered an address before the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, on the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the compact in the cabin of 'The Mayflower.'"*

FRANCIS PARKMAN.

FRANCIS PARKMAN, the son of an esteemed clergyman of the same name, was born in Boston on the sixteenth of September, 1823. After completing his collegiate course at Harvard in 1844, he made a tour across the Prairies, the results of which were given to the public in a series of papers, The Oregon Trail, published in the Knickerbocker Magazine, and afterwards collected in a volume with the title, Sketches of Prairie and Rocky Mountain Life.

Mr. Parkman next occupied himself with historical composition. Familiar with actual Indian life on and beyond the frontier, he naturally turned his attention to the many picturesque scenes of a similar character in our annals. He selected a subject of limited scope, and on comparatively virgin ground.

The History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac, and the War of the North American Tribes against the English Colonies after the Conquest of Canada, appeared in an octavo volume in 1851. The work attracted attention by its individuality of subject, respect by its evidences of thorough investigation, and popularity by its literary merits. Mr. Parkman at once attained a foremost rank as a historian. His volume is written in a clear, animated tone, giving in its pages due prominence to the picturesque scenery as well as the dramatic action of its topic.

* Drake's Dictionary of American Biography.

F. Parkman, Jr.

Mr. Parkman is at present occupied in the preparation of a History of French Discovery and Colonization in North America, a subject well adapted to his powers. (1855).

THE ILLINOIS.

We turn to a region of which, as yet, we have caught but transient glimpses; a region which to our forefathers seemed remote and strange, as to us the mountain strongholds of the Apaches, or the wastes of farthest Oregon. The country of the Illinois was chiefly embraced within the boundaries of the state which now retains the name. Thitherward, from the east, the west, and the north, three mighty rivers rolled their tributary waters; while countless smaller streams—smaller only in comparison—traversed the land with a watery network, impregnating the warm soil with exuberant fecundity. From the eastward, the Ohio—La Belle Rivière—pursued its windings for more than a thousand miles. The Mississippi descended from the distant north; while from its fountains in the west, three thousand miles away, the Missouri poured its torrent towards the same common centre. Born among mountains, trackless even now, except by the adventurous footsteps of the trapper,—nurtured amid the howling of beasts and the war-cries of savages, never silent in that wilderness,—it holds its angry course through sun-scorched deserts, among towers and palaces, the architecture of no human hand, among lodges of barbarian hordes, and herds of bison blackening the prairie to the horizon. Fierce, reckless, headstrong, exulting in its tumultuous force, it plays a thousand freaks of wanton power; bearing away forests from its shores, and planting them, with roots uppermost, in its quicksands; sweeping off islands, and rebuilding them; frothing and raging in foam and whirlpool, and, again, gliding with dwindled current along its sandy channel. At length, dark with uncurbed fury, it pours its muddy tide into the reluctant Mississippi. That majestic river, drawing life from the pure fountains of the north, wandering among emerald prairies and wood-crowned bluffs, loses all its earlier charm with this unhalloved union. At first, it shrinks, as with repugnance, and along the same channel the two streams flow side by side, with unmingled waters. But the disturbing power prevails at length; and the united torrent bears onward in its might, boiling up from the bottom, whirling in many a vortex, flooding its shores with a malign deluge fraught with pestilence and fever, and burying forests in its depths to insnare the heedless voyager. Mightiest among rivers, it is the connecting link of a diverse climates and contrasted races; and while at its northern source the fur-clad Indian shivers in the cold,—where it mingles with the ocean, the growth of the tropics springs along its banks, and the panting negro cools his limbs in its refreshing waters.

To these great rivers and their tributary streams the country of the Illinois owed its wealth, its grassy prairies, and the stately woods that flourished on its deep, rich soil. This prolific land teemed with life. It was a hunter's paradise. Deer grazed on its meadows. The elk trooped in herds, like squadrons of cavalry. In the still morning, one might hear the clatter of their antlers for half a mile over the dewy prairie. Countless bison roamed the plains, filing in grave procession to drink at the rivers, plunging and snorting among the rapids and quicksands, rolling their huge bulk on the grass, or rushing upon each other in hot encounter, like champions under shield. The wildcat glared from the thicket; the raccoon thrust his furry countenance from the hollow tree, and the opossum swung, head downwards, from the overhanging bough.

With the opening spring, when the forests are budding into leaf, and the prairies gemmed with flowers; when a warm, faint haze rests upon the landscape—then heat and seuses are intralld with luxurious beauty. The shrubs and wild fruit-trees, flushed with pale red blossoms, and the small clustering flowers of grape-vines, which choke the gigantic trees with Laocoon writhings, fill the forest with their rich perfume. A few days later, and a cloud of verdure overshadows the land, while birds innumerable sing beneath its canopy, and brighten its shades with their glancing hues.

Yet this western paradise is not free from the curse of Adam. The beneficent sun, which kindles into life so many forms of loveliness and beauty, fails not to engender venom and death from the rank slime of pestilential swamp and marsh. In some stagnant pool, buried in the jungle-like depths of the forest, where the hot and lifeless water reeks with exhalations, the water-snake basks by the margin, or winds his checkered length of loathsome beauty across the sleepy surface. From beneath the rotten carcass of some fallen tree, the moccasin thrusts out his broad flat head, ready to dart on the intruder. On the dry, sun-scorched prairie, the rattlesnake, a more generous enemy, reposes in his spiral coil. He scorns to shun the eye of day, as if conscious of the honor accorded to his name by the warlike race, who, jointly with him, claim lordship over the land. But some intrusive footstep awakes him from his slumbers. His neck is arched; the white fangs gleam in his distended jaws; his small eyes dart rays of unutterable fierceness; and his rattles, invisible with their quick vibration, ring the sharp warning which no man will rashly contemn.

The land thus prodigal of good and evil, so remote from the sea, so primitive in its aspect, might well be deemed an undiscovered region, ignorant of European arts; yet it may boast a colonization as old as that of many a spot to which are accorded the scanty honors of an American antiquity. The earliest settlement of Pennsylvania was made in 1681; the first occupation of the Illinois took place in the previous year. La Salle may be called the father of the colony. That remarkable man entered the country with a handful of followers, bent on his grand scheme of Mississippi discovery. A legion of enemies rose in his path; but neither delay, disappointment, sickness, famine, open force, nor secret conspiracy, could bend his soul of iron. Disasters accumulated upon him. He flung them off, and still pressed forward to his object. His victorious energy bore all before it, but the success on which he had staked his life served only to entail fresh calamity, and an untimely death; and his best reward is, that his name stands forth in history an imperishable monument of heroic constancy. When on his way to the Mississippi in the year 1680, La Salle built a fort in the country of the Illinois, and, on his return from the mouth of the great river, some of his followers remained, and established themselves near the spot. Heroes of another stamp took up the work which the daring Norman had begun. Jesuit missionaries, among the best and purest of their order, burning with zeal for the salvation of souls, and the gaining of an immortal crown, here toiled and suffered, with a self-sacrificing devotion which extorts a tribute of admiration even from sectarian bigotry. While the colder apostles of Protestantism labored upon the outskirts of heathendom, these champions of the cross, the forlorn hope of the army of Rome, pierced to the heart of its dark and dreary domain, confronting death at every step, and well repaid for all, could they but sprinkle a few drops of water on the forehead of a dying child, or hang a gilded crucifix round the neck of some warrior, pleased with the glittering trinket. With the beginning of the eighteenth century, the black robe of the Jesuit was known in every village of the Illinois. Defying the wiles of Satan and the malice of his emissaries, the Indian sorcerers, exposed to the rage of the elements, and every casualty of forest life, they followed their wandering proselytes to war and to the chase; now wading through morasses, now dragging canoes over rapids and sand-bars; now scorched with heat of the sweltering prairie, and now shivering houseless in the blasts of January. At Kaskaskia and Cahokia they established missions, and built frail churches from the bark of trees, fit emblems of their own transient and futile labors. Morning and evening, the savage worshippers sang praises to the Virgin, and knelt in supplication before the shrine of St. Joseph.

Soldiers and fur-traders followed where these pioneers of the church had led the way. Forts were built here and there throughout the country, and the cabins of settlers clustered about the mission-houses. The new colonists, emigrants from Canada or disbanded soldiers of French regiments, bore a close resemblance to the settlers of Detroit, or the primitive people of Acadia, whose simple life poetry has chosen as an appropriate theme. The Creole of the Illinois, contented, light-hearted, and thriftless, by no means fulfilled the injunction to increase and multiply, and the colony languished in spite of the fertile soil. The people labored long enough to gain a bare subsistence for each passing day, and spent the rest of their time in dancing and merry-making, smoking, gossiping, and hunting. Their native gaiety was irrepresible, and they found means to stimulate it with wine made from the fruit of the wild grape-vines. Thus they passed their days, at peace with themselves, hand and glove with their Indian neighbors, and ignorant of all the world beside. Money was scarcely known among them. Skins and furs were the prevailing currency, and in every village a great portion of the land was held in common. The military commandant, whose station was at Fort Chartres, on the Mississippi, ruled the colony with a sway absolute as that of the Pacha of Egypt, and judged civil and criminal cases without right of appeal. Yet his power was exercised in a patriarchal spirit, and he usually commanded the respect and confidence of the people. Many years later, when, after the War of the Revolution, the Illinois came under the jurisdiction of the United States, the perplexed inhabitants, totally at a loss to understand the complicated machinery of republicanism, begged to be delivered from the intolerable burden of self-government, and to be once more subjected to a military commandant.

 With the exception of one work — Vassall Morton, a Novel, published in 1856 — Mr. Francis Parkman has given the past twenty years to an exhaustive investigation of all accessible data for the construction of a series of historical narratives on France and England in North America. His purpose in thus tracing "the springs of American civilization" has been "to restrict himself to those where new facts may be exhibited, or where facts already known may be placed in a more clear and distinct light."

Three volumes of this series of historical monographs have appeared, and a fourth is in preparation. These are: Part First: Pioneers of France in the New World (I. Huguenots in Florida, with a Sketch of Huguenot Colonization in Brazil; II. Samuel De Champlain and Associates, with a View of Earlier French Adventure in America, and the Legends of the Northern Coasts), 1865. Part Second: The Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century, 1867. Part Third: The Discovery of the Great West, 1869. Part Fourth: Monarchy in America under Louis XIV, in press. A revised edition of The Conspiracy of Pontiac was issued in 1870.

By their thoroughness of research, revealing, in many cases, records in manuscript hitherto inaccessible; by their calm and judicious judgments; and by their picturesque narratives, these volumes have won an acceptance as classics in the department of early American history.

 FAILURE OF THE JESUIT MISSIONS — FROM THE JESUITS IN NORTH AMERICA.

With the fall of the Hurons, fell the best hope of the Canadian mission. They, and the stable and populous communities around them, had been the rude material from which the Jesuit would have formed his Christian empire in the wilderness; but, one by one, these kindred peoples were uprooted and swept away, while the neighboring Algonquins, to whom they had been a bulwark, were involved with them in a common ruin. The land of promise was turned to a solitude and a desolation. There was still work in hand, it is true, — vast regions to explore, and countless heathens to snatch from perdition; but these, for the most part, were remote and scattered hordes, from whose conversion it was vain to look for the same solid and decisive results.

In a measure, the occupation of the Jesuits was gone. Some of them went home, "well resolved," writes the Father Superior, "to return to the combat at the first sound of the trumpet;" while of those who remained, about twenty in number, several soon fell victims to famine, hardship, and the Iroquois. A few years more, and Canada ceased to be a mission; political and commercial interests gradually became ascendant, and the story of Jesuit propagandism was interwoven with her civil and military annals.

Here, then, closes this wild and bloody act of the great drama of New France; and now let the curtain fall, while we ponder its meaning.

The cause of the failure of the Jesuits is obvious. The guns and tomahawks of the Iroquois were the ruin of their hopes. Could they have curbed or converted these ferocious bands, it is little less than certain that their dream would have become a reality. Savages tamed — not civilized, for that was scarcely possible — would have been distributed in communities through the valleys of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi, ruled by priests in the interest of Catholicity and of France. Their habits of agriculture would have been developed, and their instincts of mutual slaughter repressed. The swift decline of the Indian population would have been arrested; and it would have been made, through the fur-trade, a source of prosperity to New France. Unmolested by Indian enemies, and fed by a rich commerce, she would have put forth a vigorous growth. True to her far-reaching and adventurous genius, she would have occupied the West with traders, settlers, and garrisons, and cut up the virgin wilderness into fiefs, while as yet the colonies of England were but a weak and broken line along the shore of the Atlantic; and when at last the great conflict came, England and Liberty would have been confronted, not by a depleted antagonist, still feeble from the exhaustion of a starved and persecuted infancy, but by an athletic champion of the principles of Richelieu and Loyola.

Liberty may thank the Iroquois, that, by their insensate fury, the plans of her adversary were brought to nought, and a peril and a woe averted from her future. They ruined the trade which was the life blood of New France; they stopped the current of her arteries, and made all her early years a misery and a terror. Not that they changed her destinies. The contest on this continent between Liberty and Absolutism was never doubtful; but the triumph of the one would have been dearly bought, and the downfall of the other incomplete. Populations formed in the ideas and habits of a feudal monarchy, and controlled by a hierarchy profoundly hostile to freedom of thought, would have remained a hindrance and a stumbling-block in the way of that majestic experiment of which America is the field.

The Jesuits saw their hopes struck down; and their faith, though not shaken, was sorely tried. The Providence of God seemed in their eyes dark and inexplicable; but, from the stand-point of Liberty, that Providence is clear as the sun at noon. Meanwhile let those who have prevailed yield due honor to the defeated. Their virtues shine amidst the rubbish of error, like diamonds and gold in the gravel of the torrent.

But now new scenes succeed, and other actors enter on the stage, a hardy and valiant band, moulded to endure and dare, — the discoverers of the Great West.

* LA SALLE'S DESCENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI — FROM THE DISCOVERY OF THE GREAT WEST.

The season was far advanced. On the bare limbs of the forest hung a few withered remnants of its gay autumnal livery; and the smoke crept upward through the sullen November air from the squalid wigwams of La Salle's Abenaki and Mobergan allies. These, his new friends, were savages, whose midnight yells had startled the border hamlets of New England; who had danced around Puritan scalps, and whom Puritan imaginations painted as incarnate fiends. La Salle chose eighteen of them, "all well inured to war," as his companion Membre writes, and added them to the twenty-three Frenchmen who composed his party. They insisted on taking their women with them, to cook for them, and do other camp work. These were ten in number, besides three children; and thus the expedition included fifty-four persons, of whom some were useless, and others a burden.

On the twenty-first of December, Tonty and Membre set out from Fort Miami with some of the party in six canoes, and crossed to the little river Chicago. La Salle, with the rest of the men, joined them a few days later. It was the dead of winter, and the streams were frozen. They made sledges, placed on them the canoes, the baggage, and a disabled Frenchman; crossed from the Chicago to the northern branch of the Illinois, and filed in a long procession down its frozen course. They reached the site of the great Illinois village, found it tenantless, and continued their journey, still dragging their canoes, till at length they reached open water below Lake Peoria.

La Salle had abandoned, for a time, his original plan of building a vessel for the navigation of the Mississippi. Bitter experience had taught him the difficulty of the attempt, and he resolved to trust to his canoes alone. They embarked again, floating prosperously down between the leafless forests that flanked the tranquil river; till, on the sixth of February, they issued forth on the majestic bosom of the Mississippi. Here, for the time, their progress was stopped; for the river was full of floating ice. La Salle's Indians, too, had lagged behind; but, within a week, all had arrived, the navigation was once more free, and they resumed their course. Towards evening, they saw on their right the mouth of a great river; and the clear current was invaded by the headlong torrent of the Missouri, opaque with mud. They built their camp-fires in the neighboring forest; and, at daylight, embarking anew on the dark and mighty stream, drifted swiftly down towards unknown destinies. They passed a deserted town of the Tamaroas; saw, three days after, the mouth of the Ohio; and, gliding by the wastes of bordering swamp, landed, on the twenty-fourth of February, near the Third Chickasaw Bluffs. They encamped, and the hunters went out for game. All returned, excepting Pierre Prudhomme; and, as the others had seen fresh tracks of Indians, La Salle feared that he was killed. While some of his followers built a small stockade fort on a high bluff by the river, others ranged the woods in pursuit of the missing hunter. After six days of ceaseless and fruitless search, they met two Chickasaw Indians in the forest; and, through them, La Salle sent presents and peace-messages to that warlike people, whose villages were a few days' journey distant. Several days later, Prudhomme was found, and brought in to the camp, half dead. He had lost his way while hunting; and, to console him for his woes, La Salle christened the newly built fort with his name, and left him, with a few others, in charge of it.

Again they embarked; and with every stage of their adventurous progress, the mystery of this vast New World was more and more unveiled. More and more they entered the realms of spring. The hazy sunlight, the warm and drowsy air, the tender foliage, the opening flowers, betokened the reviving life of Nature. For several days more they followed the writhings of the great river, on its tortuous course through wastes of swamp and cane-brake, till on the thirteenth of March they found themselves wrapped in a thick fog. Neither shore was visible; but they heard on the right the booming of an Indian drum, and the shrill outcries of the war-dance. La Salle at once crossed to the opposite side, where, in less than an hour, his men threw up a rude fort of felled trees. Meanwhile, the fog cleared; and, from the farther bank, the astonished Indians saw the strange visitors at their work. Some of the French advanced to the edge of the water, and beckoned them to come over. Several of them approached, in a wooden canoe, to within the distance of a gun-shot. La Salle displayed the calumet, and sent a Frenchman to meet them. He was well received; and the friendly mood of the Indians being now apparent, the whole party crossed the river.

On landing, they found themselves at a town of the Kappa band of the Arkansas, a people dwelling near the mouth of the river which bears their name. The inhabitants flocked about them with eager signs of welcome; built huts for them, brought them firewood, gave them corn, beans, and dried fruits, and feasted them without respite for three days. "They are a lively, civil, generous people," says Membre, "very different from the cold and taciturn Indians of the North." They showed, indeed, some slight traces of a tendency towards civilization; for domestic fowls and tame geese were wandering among their rude cabins of bark.

La Salle and Tonty at the head of their followers marched to the open area in the midst of the village. Here, to the admiration of the gazing crowd of warriors, women, and children, a cross was raised bearing the arms of France. Membre, in canonicals, sang a hymn; the men shouted Vive le Roi; and La Salle, in the king's name, took formal possession of the country. The friar, not, he flatters himself, without success, labored to expound by signs the mysteries of the faith; while La Salle, by methods equally satisfactory, drew from the chief an acknowledgment of fealty to Louis XIV.

After touching at several other towns of this people, the voyagers resumed their course, guided by two of the Arkansas; passed the sites, since become historic, of Vicksburg and Grand Gulf; and, about three hundred miles below the Arkansas, stopped by the edge of a swamp on the western side of the river. Here, as their two guides told them, was the path to the great town of the Taensas. Tonty and Membre were sent to visit it. They and their men shouldered their birch canoe through the swamp, and launched it on a lake which had once formed a portion of the channel of the river. In two hours they reached the town, and Tonty gazed at it with astonishment. He had seen nothing like it in America; large square dwellings, built of sun-baked mud mixed with straw, arched over with a dome-shaped roof of canes, and placed in regular order around an open area. Two of them were larger and better than the rest. One was the lodge of the chief; the other was the temple, or house of the Sun.

They entered the former, and found a single room, forty feet square, where, in the dim light, for there was no opening but the door, the chief sat awaiting them on a sort of bedstead, three of his wives at his side, while sixty old men, wrapped in white cloaks woven of mulberry-bark, formed his divan. When he spoke, his wives howled to do him honor; and the assembled councillors listened with the reverence due to a potentate for whom, at his death, a hundred victims were to be sacrificed. He received the visitors graciously, and joyfully accepted the gifts which Tonty laid before him. This interview over, the Frenchmen repaired to the temple, wherein were kept the bones of the departed chiefs. In construction it was much like the royal dwelling. Over it were rude wooden figures, representing three eagles turned towards the east. A strong mud wall surrounded it, planted with stakes, on which were stuck the skulls of enemies sacrificed to the Sun; while before the door was a block of wood, on which lay a large shell surrounded with the braided hair of the victims. The interior was rude as a barn, dimly lighted from the doorway, and full of smoke. There was a structure in the middle which Membre thinks was a kind of altar; and before it burned a perpetual fire, fed with three logs laid end to end, and watched by two old men devoted to this sacred office. There was a mysterious recess, too, which the strangers were forbidden to explore, but which, as Tonty was told, contained the riches of the nation, consisting of pearls from the Gulf, and trinkets obtained, probably through other tribes, from the Spaniards and other Europeans.

The chief condescended to visit La Salle at his camp; a favor which he would by no means have granted, had the visitors been Indians. A master of ceremonies, and six attendants, preceded him, to clear the path and prepare the place of meeting. When all was ready, he was seen advancing, clothed in a white robe, and preceded by two men bearing white fans; while a third displayed a disk of burnished copper, doubtless to represent the Sun, his ancestor; or, as others will have it, his elder brother. His aspect was marvellously grave, and he and La Salle met with gestures of ceremonious courtesy. The interview was very friendly; and the chief returned well pleased with the gifts which his entertainer bestowed on him, and which, indeed, had been the principal motive of his visit.

On the next morning, as they descended the river, they saw a wooden canoe full of Indians; and Tonty gave chase. He had nearly overtaken it, when more than a hundred men appeared suddenly on the shore, with bows bent to defend their countrymen. La Salle called out to Tonty to withdraw. He obeyed; and the whole party encamped on the opposite bank. Tonty offered to cross the river with a peace-pipe, and set out accordingly with a small party of men. When he landed, the Indians made signs of friendship by joining their hands, — a proceeding by which Tonty, having but one hand, was somewhat embarrassed; but he directed his men to respond in his stead. La Salle and Membre now joined with him, and went with the Indians to their village, three leagues distant. Here they spent the night. "The Sieur de la Salle," writes Membre, "whose very air, engaging manners, tact, and address attract love and respect alike, produced such an effect on the hearts of these people, that they did not know how to treat us well enough."

The Indians of this village were the Natchez; and their chief was brother of the great chief, or Sun, of the whole nation. His town was several leagues distant, near the site of the city of Natchez; and thither the French repaired to visit him. They saw what they had already seen among the Taensas, — a religious and political despotism, a privileged caste descended from the Sun, a temple, and a sacred fire. La Salle planted a large cross, with the arms of France attached, in the midst of the town; while the inhabitants looked on with a satisfaction which they would hardly have displayed, had they understood the meaning of the act.

The French next visited the Coroas, at their village, two leagues below; and here they found a reception no less auspicious. On the thirty-first of March, as they approached Red River, they passed in the fog a town of the Oumas; and, three days later, discovered a party of fishermen, in wooden canoes, among the canes along the margin of the water. They fled at sight of the Frenchmen. La Salle sent men to reconnoitre, who, as they struggled through the marsh, were greeted with a shower of arrows; while, from the neighboring village of the Quinipissas, invisible behind the cane-brake, they heard the sound of an Indian drum, and the whoops of the mustering warriors. La Salle, anxious to keep the peace with all the tribes along the river, recalled his men, and pursued his voyage. A few leagues below, they saw a cluster of Indian lodges on the left bank, apparently void of inhabitants. They landed, and found three of them filled with corpses. It was a village of the Tangibao, sacked by their enemies only a few days before,

And now they neared their journey's end. On the sixth of April, the river divided itself into three broad channels. La Salle followed that of the west, and D'Autray that of the east; while Tonty took the middle passage. As he drifted down the turbid current, between the low and marshy shores, the brackish water changed to brine, and the breeze grew fresh with the salt breath of the sea. Then the broad bosom of the great Gulf opened on his sight, tossing its restless billows, limitless, voiceless, lonely, as when born of chaos, without a sail, without a sign of life.

La Salle, in a canoe, coasted the marshy borders of the sea; and then the reunited parties assembled on a spot of dry ground, a short distance above the mouth of the river. Here a column was made ready, bearing the arms of France, and inscribed with the words, —

Louis le Grand, Roy de France et de Navarre, règne; le Neuvième Avril, 1682.

The Frenchmen were mustered under arms; and, while the New-England Indians and their squaws stood gazing in wondering silence, they chanted the Te Deum, the Eccardiat, and the Domine salvum fac Regem. Then, amid volleys of musketry and shouts of Vive le Roi, La Salle planted the column in its place, and standing near it, proclaimed in a loud voice, —

“In the name of the most high, mighty, invincible, and victorious prince, Louis the Great, by the grace of God King of France and of Navarre, Fourteenth of that name, I, this ninth day of April, one thousand six hundred and eighty-two, in virtue of the commission of his Majesty, which I hold in my hand, and which may be seen by all whom it may concern, have taken, and do now take, in the name of his Majesty and of his successors to the crown, possession of this country of Louisiana, the seas, harbors, ports, bays, adjacent straits, and all the nations, peoples, provinces, cities, towns, villages, mines, minerals, fisheries, streams, and rivers, within the extent of the said Louisiana, from the mouth of the great river St. Louis, otherwise called the Ohio, . . . as also along the River Colbert, or Mississippi, and the rivers which discharge themselves therein, from its source beyond the country of the Nadooussious . . . as far as its mouth at the sea, or Gulf of Mexico, and also to the mouth of the River of Palms, upon the assurance we have had from the natives of these countries, that we are the first Europeans who have descended or ascended the said River Colbert; hereby protesting against all who may hereafter undertake to invade any or all of these aforesaid countries, peoples, or lands, to the prejudice of the rights of his Majesty, acquired by the consent of the nations dwelling herein. Of which, and of all else that is needful, I hereby take to witness those who hear me, and demand an act of the notary here present.”

Shouts of Vive le Roi and volleys of musketry responded to his words. Then a cross was planted beside the column, and a leaden plate buried near it, bearing the arms of France, with a Latin inscription, Ludovicus Magnus regnat. The weather-beaten voyagers joined their voices in the grand hymn of the Vexilla Regis: —

“The banners of Heaven's King advance,
The mystery of the Cross shines forth;”

and renewed shouts of Vive le Roi closed the ceremony.

On that day, the realm of France received on parchment a stupendous accession. The fertile plains of Texas; the vast basin of the Mississippi, from its frozen northern springs to the sultry borders of the Gulf; from the woody ridges of the Alleghanies to the bare peaks of the Rocky Mountains, — a region of savannahs and forests, sun-cracked deserts, and grassy prairies, watered by a thousand rivers, ranged by a thousand warlike tribes, passed beneath the sceptre of the Sultan of Versailles; and all by virtue of a feeble human voice, inaudible at half a mile.

ERASTUS W. ELLSWORTH

Was born November, 1823, in East Windsor, Conn., where he is at present a resident. He was educated at Amherst College, studied law, but was diverted from the profession by a taste for mechanical ingenuities, and has mainly occupied himself as an inventor or machinist. A spirited poem from his pen, The Railroad Lyric, is an eloquent expression of these tastes.

Erastus W. Ellsworth

Having contributed various poems to Sartain's Magazine, the International, and Putnam's Monthly, in 1855 he published a collection from them at Hartford. The longest of these is devoted to that old favorite theme of the Muse, the desertion of Ariadne by Theseus. Others are patriotic, celebrating General Putnam, Nathan Hale, and Mount Vernon. Still another class is on familiar topics, in a light sportive style. The following, in a quaint vein of morality, is among the most successful.

WHAT IS THE USE?

- I saw a man, by some accounted wise,
For some things said and done before their eyes,
Quite overcast, and in a restless muse,
Pacing a path about,
An I often giving out:
"What is the use?"
- Then I, with true respect: What meanest thou
By those strange words, and that unsettled brow?
Health, wealth, the fair esteem of ample views—
To these things thou art born.
But he as one forlorn:
"What is the use?"
- "I have surveyed the sages and their books,
Man, and the natural world of woods and brooks,
Seeking that perfect good that I would choose;
But find no perfect good,
Settled and understood.
What is the use?"
- "Life, in a poise, hangs trembling on the beam,
Even in a breath bounding to each extreme
Of joy and sorrow; therefore I refuse
All beaten ways of bliss,
And only answer thee:
What is the use?"
- "The hoo!winked world is seeking happiness.
'Which way?' they cry, 'here?' 'no!' 'there?'
'who can guess?'
And so they grope, and grope, and grope, and cruise
On, on, till life is lost,
At blindman's with a ghost.
What is the use?"
- "Love first, with most, then wealth, distinction, fame,
Quecken the blood and spirit on the game.
Some try them all, and all alike accuse—
'I have been all,' said one,
'And find that all is none.'
What is the use?"
- "In woman's love we sweetly are undone;
Willing to attract, but harder to be won,
Harder to keep, is she whose love we choose.
Loves are like flowers that grow
In soils on fire below.
What is the use?"
- "Some pray for wealth, and seem to pray aright:
They heap until themselves are out of sight;
Yet stand, in charities, not over shoes,
And ask of their old age,
As an old ledger page,
What is the use?"
- "Some covet honors, and they have their choice,
Are dogged with dinners and the popular voice;
They ride a wind—it drops them—and they bruise;
Or, if sustained, they sigh:
'That other is more high.'
What is the use?"
- "Some try for fame—the merest chance of things
That mortal hope can wreak towards the wings
Of soaring Time—they win, perhaps, or lose—
Who knows? Not he, who, dead,
Laurels a marble head.
What is the use?"
- "The strife for fame and the high praise of power,
Is as a man, who, panting up a tower,
Bears a great stone, then, straining all his thews,
Heaves it, and sees it make
A splashing in a lake.
What is the use?"
- "Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
To scorn delights, and live laborious days.
Thus the great lords of spiritual fame amuse
Their souls, and think it good
To eat of angels' food.
What is the use?"
- "They eat their fill, and they are filled with wind.
They do the noble works of noble mind.
Repute, and often bread, the world refuse.
They go unto their place,
The greatest of the race.
What is the use?"
- "Should some new star, in the fair evening sky
Kindle a blaze, startling so keen an eye
Of flamings eminent, athwart the dews,
Our thoughts would say: No doubt
That star will soon burn out.
What is the use?"
- "Who'll care for me, when I am dead and gone?
Not many now, and surely, soon, not one;
And should I sing like an immortal Muse,
Men, if they read the line,
Read for their good, not mine;
What is the use?"
- "And song, if passable, is doomed to pass—
Common, though sweet as the new-scythel grass.
Of human deeds and thoughts Time bears no news,
That, flying, he can lack,
Else they would break his back,
What is the use?"
- "Spirit of Beauty! Breath of golden lyres!
Perpetual tremble of immortal wires!
Divinely torturing rapture of the Muse!
Conspicuous wretchedness!
Thou starry, sole success!—
What is the use!"
- "Doth not all struggle tell, upon its brow,
That he who makes it is not easy now,
But hopes to be? Vain hope that dost abuse!
Coquetting with thine eyes,
And fooling him who sighs.
What is the use?"
- "Go pry the lintels of the pyramids;
Lift the old king's mysterious coffin lids—
This dust was theirs whose names these stones confuse,
These mighty monuments
Of mighty discontents.
What is the use?"
- "Did not he sum it all, whose Gate of Pearls
Blazed royal Ophir, Tyre, and Syrian girls—
The great, wise, famous monarch of the Jews?
Though rolled in grandeur vast,
He said of all, at last:
What is the use?"
- "O! but to take, of life, the natural good,
Even as a hermit cavered in a wood,
More sweetly fills my sober-suited views,
Than sweating to attain
Any luxurious pain.
What is the use?"
- "Give me a hermit's life, without his beads—
His lantern-jawed and moral-mouthing creeds;
Systems and creeds the natural heart abuse.
What need of any Book,
Or spiritual crook?
What is the use?"
- "I love, and God is love; and I behold
Man, Nature, God, one triple chain of gold—

Nature in all sole Oracle and Muse.

What should I seek, at all,
More than is natural?
What is the use?"

Seeing this man so heathenly inclined—
So wite I in the mood of a good mind,
I felt a kind of heat of earnest thought;
And studying in reply,
Answered him, eye to eye:—

Thou dost amaze me that thou dost mistake
The wandering rivers for the fountain lake.
What is the end of living!—happiness!—
An end that none attain,
Argues a purpose vain.

Plainly, this world is not a scope for bliss,
But duty. Yet we see not all that is,
Or may be, some day, if we love the light.
What man is, in desires,
Whispers where man aspires.

But what and where are we?—what now—to-day?

Souls on a globe that spin our lives away—
A multitudinous world, where Heaven and Hell,
Strangely in battle met,
Their gonfalons have set.

Dust though we are, and shall return to dust,
Yet being born to battles, fight we must;
Under which ensign is our only choice.
We know to wage our best,
God only knows the rest.

Then since we see about us sin and dole,
And something good, why not, with hand and soul
Wrestle and succor out of wrong and sorrow—
Grasping the swords of strife,
Making the most of life?

Yea, all that we can wield is worth the end,
If sought as God's and man's most loyal friend.
Naked we come into the world, and take Weapons of various skill—
Let us not use them ill.

As for the creeds, Nature is dark at best;
And darker still is the deep human breast.
Therefore consider well of creeds and Books,
Lest thou mayst somewhat fail
Of things beyond the veil.

Nature was dark to the dim starry age
Of wistful Job; and that Athenian sage,
Pensive in piteous thought of Faith's distress;
For still she cried with tears:
"More light, ye crystal spheres!"

But rouse thee, man! Shake off this hideous death!
Be man! Stand up! Draw in a mighty breath!
This world has quite enough emasculate hands,
Dallying with doubt and sin.
Come—here is work—begin!

Come, here is work—and a rank field—begin.
Put thou thine edge to the great weeds of sin;
So shalt thou find the use of life, and see
Thy Lord, at set of sun,
Approach and say: "Well done!"

This at the last: They clutch the sapless fruit.
Ashes and dust of the Dead Sea, who suit
Their course of life to compass happiness;
But be it understood
That, to be greatly good,
All is the use.

WILLIAM W. CALDWELL

Was born at Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1828. He was educated at Bowdoin college, where he received his degree in 1843, and has since resided in his native place, engaged in the business of a druggist. His occasional verses, on simple heartfelt themes, are truthful in expression and sentiment, and happy in poetic execution. He has published also translations from the German poets.  A volume of Poems, Original and Translated, was published in 1857 (Boston, pp. 276). It contained choice renderings from the German of Hebel, Geibel, and Fallersleben.

ROBIN'S COME!

From the elm-tree's topmost bough,
Hark! the Robin's early song!
Telling one and all that now
Merry spring-time hastes along;
Welcome tidings thou dost bring,
Little harbinger of spring.

Robin's come!

Of the winter we are weary,
Weary of its frost and snow,
Longing for the sunshine cheery,
And the brooklet's gurgling flow;
Gladly then we hear thee sing
The reveillé of the spring.

Robin's come!

Ring it out o'er hill and plain,
Through the garden's lonely bowers,
Till the green leaves dance again,
Till the air is sweet with flowers!
Wake the cowslip by the rill,
Wake the yellow daffodil!

Robin's come!

Then as thou wert wont of yore,
Build thy nest and rear thy young,
Close beside our cottage door,
In the woodbine leaves among;
Hurt or harm thou need'st not fear,
Nothing rude shall venture near.

Robin's come!

Swinging still o'er yonder lane,
Robin answers merrily;
Ravished by the sweet refrain,
Alice claps her hands in glee,
Calling from the open door,
With her soft voice, o'er and o'er,
Robin's come!

WHAT SAITH THE FOUNTAIN?

What saith the Fountain,
Hid in the glade,
Where the tall mountain
Throweth its shade?

"Deep in my waters, reflected serene,
All the soft beauty of heaven is seen;
Thus let thy bosom from wild passions free
Ever the mirror of purity be!"

What saith the Streamlet,
Flowing so bright,
Clear as a beamlet
Of silvery light?

"Morning and evening still floating along,
Upward for ever ascendeth my song;
Be thou contented, what'er may befall,
Cheerful in knowing that God is o'er all."

What saith the River,
Majestic in flow,
Moving for ever
Calmly and slow?

"Over my surface the great vessels glide,
Ocean-ward borne by my strong heaving tide;
Work thou too, brother, life vanisheth fast,
Labor unceasing, rest cometh at last."

What saith the Ocean,
Boundless as night;
Tumultuous in motion,
Re-istless in might!

"Fountain to streamlet, streamlet to river,
All in my bosom commingle for ever;
Morning to noontide and noontide to night,
Soon will Eternity veil thee from sight."

JOHN R. THOMPSON

Was born in Richmond, Va., October 23, 1823. He was educated at a school at East Haven in Connecticut, and at the University of Virginia, where he received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1845, having passed an interval of two years in the study of the law. In 1847, he became editor of the Southern Literary Magazine, which he conducted for many years.

Mr. R.: Thompson

Mr. Thompson, besides the articles in his own journal, has contributed numerous poems to the Knickerbocker, Literary World, and International Magazine.

His editorship of the Messenger, the longest lived periodical of the South, and always an important medium of communication of the best Southern authors with the public, has been marked by its liberality and courtesy towards authors of all portions of the country. His poetical writings are finished with care, and display a delicate sentiment.

THE WINDOW PANES AT BRANDON.*

As within the old mansion the holiday throng re-assembles in beauty and grace,
And some eye looking out of the window, by chance,
these memorial records may trace—
How the past, like a swift-coming haze from the sea, in an instant, surrounds us once more,
While the shadowy figures of those we have loved,
all distinctly are seen on the shore!

Through the vista of years, stretching dimly away,
we but look, and a vision behold—
Like some magical picture the sunset reveals with its colors of crimson and gold—

All suffused with the glow of the hearth's ruddy blaze, from beneath the gay "mistletoe bough," There are faces that break into smiles as divinely as any that beam on us now.

While the Old Year departing strides ghost-like along o'er the hills that are dark with the storm,

To the New the brave beaker is filled to the brim,
and the play of affection is warm:
Look once more—as the garlanded Spring re-appears,
in her footsteps we welcome a train
Of fair women, whose eyes are as bright as the gem that has cut their dear names on the pane.

From the canvas of Vandyke and Kneller that hangs on the old-fashioned wainscoted wall,
Stately ladies, the favored of poets, look down on the guests and the revel and all;
But their beauty, though wedded to eloquent verse,
and though rendered immortal by Art,

Yet outshines not the beauty that breathing below,
in a moment takes captive the heart.

Many winters have since frosted over these panes with the tracery-work of the rime,
Many Aprils have brought back the birds to the lawn from some far-away tropical clime—
But the guests of the season, alas! where are they?
some the shores of the stranger have trod,
And some names have been long ago carved on the stone, where they sweetly rest under the sod.

How uncertain the record! the hand of a child, in its innocent sport, unawares,
May, at any time, lucklessly shatter the pane, and thus cancel the story it bears:

Still a portion, at least, shall uninjured remain—unto trustier tablets consigned—
The fond names that survive in the memory of friends who yet linger a season behind.

Recollect, oh young soul, with ambition inspired!—
let the moral be read as we pass—
Recollect the illusory tablets of fame have been ever as brittle as glass:

Oh then be not content with the name there inscribed,—for as well may you trace it in dust,—
But resolve to record it where long it shall stand, in the hearts of the good and the just!

A PICTURE.

Across the narrow dusty street
I see at early dawn,
A little girl with glancing feet,
As agile as the fawn.

An hour or so and forth she goes,
The school she brightly seeks,
She carries in her hand a rose
And two upon her cheeks.

The sun mounts up the torrid sky—
The bell for dinner rings—
My little friend, with laughing eye,
Comes gaily back and sings.

The week wears off and Saturday,
A welcome day, I ween,
Gives time for girlish romp and play:
How glad my pet is seen!

But Sunday—in what satins great
Does she not then appear!
King Solomon in all his state
Wore no such pretty gear.

I fling her every day a kiss,
And one she flings to me:
I know not truly when it is
She prettiest may be.

BENEDICTE.

I saw her move along the aisle—
The chancel lustres burned the while—
With bridal roses in her hair,
Oh! never seemed she half so fair.

A manly form stood by her side,
We knew him worthy such a bride;
And prayers went up to God above
To bless them with immortal love.
The vow was said. I know not yet
But some were filled with fond regret:
So much a part of us she seemed
To lose her quite we had not dreamed.

Like the "fair Inez," loved, caressed,
She went into the distant west,
And while one heart with joy flowed o'er,
Like her she saddened many more.

* Upon the window panes at Brandon, on James Elver, are inscribed the names, cut with a diamond ring, of many of those who have composed the Christmas and May parties of that hospitable mansion in years gone by.

Lady, though far from childhood's things
Thy gentle spirit folds its wing,
We offer now for him and thee
A tearful Benedicite!

 Mr. Thompson has written a number of occasional poems, and has made numerous contributions to leading literary periodicals in America and Europe. These fugitive pieces in prose and verse have never been gathered into a volume. The following poems have been published in pamphlet form: Virginia, A Poem, read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Alpha Chapter, William and Mary College; Patriotism, A Poem, read before the Annual Convention of the Delta Kappa Epsilon Societies, at Washington, D. C.; Poetry, an Essay in Rhyme, read before the Literary Societies of Columbian College, Washington, D. C.; Inauguration Ode, read at the Unveiling of Crawford's Equestrian Statue of Washington, at Richmond, Va.; and A Poem, read before the Society of Alumni of the University of Virginia.

Mr. Thompson was editor of The Record, "a short-lived Confederate weekly, commenced during 1863, in Richmond; and he was, during its existence, the Richmond correspondent of The Index, the Confederate organ in Richmond."* A number of his poetic writings at that date were reprinted in Simms's War Poetry of the South. On account of the failure of his health, Mr. Thompson visited Europe, and lived some thirty months in England, where he contributed to Blackwood's Magazine, Punch, London Society, The Owl, and other journals, besides writing for The Standard, 1864-6. He has since been engaged on the editorial staff of the New York Evening Post. Another failure of his health in the spring of 1873, led him to visit Denver, Colorado Territory, in the hope of benefit from its climate. He died in New York city, April 30, 1873.

GEORGE H. BOKER.

GEORGE HENRY BOKER is a native of Philadelphia, where he was born in the year 1824. In 1841

Geo. H. Boker

he was graduated at Nassau Hall, Princeton, and after a tour in Europe returned to Philadelphia, where he has since resided.

* Living Writers of the South, by Prof. James Wood Davidson, 1869; pp. 367-72.

In 1847 he published The Lesson of Life and other Poems; and in 1848, Calaynos, a tragedy. This was received with favor, and in April of the following year, acted with success at Sadlers' Wells Theatre, London. The scene is laid in Spain, the interest turns upon the hostile feeling between the Spanish and Moorish races.

Mr. Boker's second tragedy, Anne Doleyn, was soon after published and produced upon the stage.

He has since written The Betrothal, Leonor de Guzman, and a comedy, All the World a Mask, all of which have been produced with success.

He has also contributed several poetical compositions of merit to the periodicals of the day.

Mr. Boker has wisely avoided, in his dramatic composition, the stilted periods of the classic, and the vagueness of the "unacted" drama. His plays have the action befitting the stage, and the finish requisite for the closet. His blank verse is smooth, and his dialogue spirited and colloquial.

THE DEATH OF DOÑA ALDA—FROM CALAYNOS.

Calaynos. What wouldst thou, Alda!—Cheer thee, love, bear up!

Doña Alda. Thy face is dim, I cannot see thine eyes:

Nay, hide them not; they are my guiding stars—
Have sorrow's drops thus lotted out their light?
Thou dost forgive me, love—thou'lt think of me?
Thou'lt not speak harshly, when I'm 'neath the earth?

Thou'lt love my memory, for what once I was?

Calaynos. Yes, though I live till doom.

Doña Alda. O happiness!

Come closer—this thy hand? Have mercy, heaven!

Yes, press me closer—close—I do not feel—

Calaynos. O God of mercy, spare!

Doña Alda. A sunny day—

Oh!—(She faints.)

Calaynos. Bear her in—I am as calm as ice.

Come when she wakes—I cannot see her thus.

[Exit OLIVER and servants, bearing DOÑA ALDA.]

'Tis better so;—but then the thoughts come back

Of the young bride I welcomed at the gate.—

I kissed her, yes, I kissed her—was it there?

Yes, yes, I kissed her there, and in the chapel—

The dimly lighted chapel—I see it all!

Here was old Hubert, there stood Oliver—

The priest, the bridesmaids, groomsman—every face;

All the retainers that around us thronged,

Smiling for joy, with ribands in their caps.—

And shall they all, all follow her black pall,

With weeping eyes and doleful, sullen weeds?

For they all love her:—Oh, she was so kind,

So kind and gentle, when they stood in need;

And never checked them, if they murmured at her,

But found excuses for their discontent.—

They'll miss her: for her path was like an angel's,

And every place seemed holier where she came,

Ah me, ah me! I would this life were past!

Stay, love, watch o'er me; I will join thee soon.

So quickly gone! And ere I said farewell!

[A cry within. It rushes to the door.]

(Re-enter OLIVER.)

Oliver. My lord—

Calaynos. Yes, yes, she's dead—I will go in.

Oliver. O, dreadful ending to a fearful night!

This shock has shattered to the very root

The strength of his great spirit. Mournful night!

And what will day bring forth?—but wo on wo.

Ah, death may rest awhile, and hold his hand,

Having destroyed this wondrous paragon,
And sapped a mind, whose lightest thought was worth

The concentrated being of a herd.
Yet shall the villain live who wrought this wo!—
By heaven I swear, if my lord kill him not,
I, though a scholar and unused to arms,
Will hunt him down—ay, should he course the earth,

And slay him like a felon!
If this is sin, let fiends snap at my soul,
But I will do it! Lo, where comes my lord,
Bent down and withered, like a broken tree,
Prostrate with too much bearing.

(Re-enter CALATNOS.)

Calatnos. Oliver,
I stole to see her; not a soul was there,
Save an old crone that hummed a doleful tune,
And winked her purblind eyes, o'errun with tears.
O, boy, I never knew I loved her so!
I held my breath, and gazed into her face—
Ah, she was wondrous fair. She seemed to me,
Just as I've often seen her, fast asleep.
When from my studies cautiously I've stole,
And bent above her, and drank up her breath,
Sweet as a sleeping infant's,—Then perchance,
Yet in her sleep, her starry eyes would ope,
To close again behind their fringy clouds,
Ere I caught half their glory. There's no breath,
There's not a perfume on her withered lips,
Her eyes ope not, nor ever will again.—
But tell me how she died!—She suffered not?

Oliver. She scarcely woke from her first fainting here;

Or if she did, she gave no sign nor word.
A while she muttered, as if lost in prayer;
Some who stood close thought once they caught
thy name;
But grief had dulled my sense, I could not hear.
Then she slid gently to a lethargy;
And so she died—we knew not when she went.

Calatnos. Here is the paper which contains her story:

I fain would clear her name, fain think her wronged.
[Reads.]

O, double-dealing villain!—Moor—bought her!
Impious monster—false beyond belief!
But she is guiltless—hear'st thou, Oliver?
Nay, real; I cannot move thee as she can.

[OLIVER reads.]

He called me Moor.—True, true, I did her wrong:
The sin is mine; I should have told her that.
I only kept it back to save her pain;
I feared to lose respect by telling her.
I see how he could heighten that grave wrong,
And spur her nigh to madness with his taunts.
She fell, was senseless, without life or reason—
Why tigers spare inanimated forms—
So bore her off. Then lie on lie—O base!
The guilt all mine. Why did I hide my birth?
Ah, who can tell how soon one seed of sin,
Which we short-sighted mortals think destroyed,
May sprout and bear, and shake its noxious fruit
Upon our heads, when we ne'er dream of ill;
For nought that is can ever pass away!

Oliver. And shall this villain live?

Calatnos. No, no, by heaven!
Those fellows on the wall would haunt me then—
I hear your voices, men of crime and blood,
Ring in mine ears, and I obey the call.

[Snatches a sword from the wall.]

How precious is the blade which justice wields,
To chasten wrong, or set a wrong to right!

[Draws.]

Come forth, thou minister of bloody deeds,
That blazed a comet in the van of war,

Presaging death to man, and tears to earth.—
Pale, gleaming tempter, when I clutch thee thus,
Thou, of thyself, dost plead that murder's right,
And mak'st me half believe it luxury.
Thy horrid edge is thirsting for man's gore,
And thou shalt drink it from the point to hilt.—
To horse, to horse! the warrior blood is up;
The tiger spirit of my warlike race
Burns in my heart, and floods my kindling veins.—
Mount, Oliver, ere pity's hand can hide
The bloody mist that floats before mine eyes—
To horse, to horse! the Moor rides forth to slay!
[Exeunt.]

 Mr. Boker collected his Plays and Poems into two volumes in 1856. Besides those already mentioned, these contained: Francesca Da Rimini, a Tragedy; The Widow's Marriage, a Comedy; also, A Ballad of Sir John Franklin, Sonnets, etc. From 1861 to 1871 Mr. Boker was Secretary of the Union League, Philadelphia, and did much by his pen, in prose and verse, to uphold the cause of the Union. In 1864 he published Poems of the War, among whose pieces were: On Board the Cumberland; Battle of Lookout Mountain; The Black Regiment; and The Soldier's Dirge, for Gen. Kearney. Königsmark, the Legend of the Hounds, and Other Poems, appeared in 1869, including Our Heroic Themes, a poem read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University, in July, 1865.

Mr. Boker was appointed Minister to Constantinople in 1872. On his arrival in that city, he was made an honorary member of the Greek Syllagos, a literary society that bestows its distinctions only on foreigners of high reputation in literature.

 THE BALLAD OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

The ice was here, the ice was there,
The ice was all around.—COLERIDGE.

O, whither sail you, Sir John Franklin?
Cried a whaler in Baffin's Bay.
To know if between the land and the pole
I may find a broad sea-way.

I charge you back, Sir John Franklin,
As you would live and thrive;
For between the land and the frozen pole
No man may sail alive.

But lightly laughed the stout Sir John,
And spoke unto his men:
Half England is wrong, if he be right;
Bear off to westward then.

O, whither sail you, brave Englishman?
Cried the little Esquimaux.
Between your land and the polar star
My goodly vessels go.

Come down, if you would journey there,
The little Indian said;
And change your cloth for fur clothing,
Your vessel for a sled.

But lightly laughed the stout Sir John,
And the crew laughed with him too:—
A sailor to change from ship to sled,
I ween, were something new!

All through the long, long polar day,
The vessels westward sped;
And wherever the sail of Sir John was blown,
The ice gave way and fled.

Gave way with many a hollow groan,
And with many a surly roar,
But it murmured and threatened on every side,
And closed where he sailed before.

Ho! see ye not, my merry men,
The broad and open sea?
Bethink ye what the whaler said,
Think of the little Indian's sled!
The crew laughed out in glee.

Sir John, Sir John, 'tis bitter cold,
The scud drives on the breeze,
The ice comes looming from the north,
The very sunbeams freeze.

Bright summer goes, dark winter comes —
We cannot rule the year;
But long ere summer's sun goes down,
On yonder sea we 'll steer.

The dripping icebergs dipped and rose,
And floundered down the gale;
The ships were staid, the yards were manned,
And furled the useless sail.

The summer's gone, the winter's come —
We sail not on yonder sea:
Why sail we not, Sir John Franklin? —
A silent man was he.

The summer goes, the winter comes —
We cannot rule the year:
I ween, we cannot rule the ways,
Sir John, wherein we 'd steer.

The cruel ice came floating on,
And closed beneath the lee,
Till the thickening waters dashed no more;
'Twas ice around, behind, before —
My God! there is no sea!

What think you of the whaler now?
What of the Esquimaux?
A sled were better than a ship,
To cruise through ice and snow.

Down sank the baleful crimson sun,
The northern light came out,
And glared upon the ice-bound ships,
And shook its spears about.

The snow came down, storm breeding storm,
And on the decks was laid,
Till the weary sailor, sick at heart,
Sank down beside his spade.

Sir John, the night is black and long,
The hissing wind is bleak,
The hard, green ice as strong as death: —
I prithee, Captain, speak!

The night is neither bright nor short,
The singing breeze is cold,
The ice is not so strong as hope —
The heart of man is bold!

What hope can scale this icy wall,
High over the main flag-staff?
Above the ridges the wolf and bear
Look down, with a patient, settled stare,
Look down on us and laugh.

The summer went, the winter came —
We could not rule the year;
But summer will melt the ice again,
And open a path to the sunny main,
Whereon our ships shall steer.

The winter went, the summer went,
The winter came around;

But the hard, green ice was strong as death,
And the voice of hope sank to a breath,
Yet caught at every sound.

Hark! heard you not the noise of guns? —
And there, and there, again?
'Tis some uneasy iceberg's roar,
As he turns in the frozen main.

Hurra! hurra! the Esquimaux
Across the ice-fields steal:
God give them grace for their charity! —
Ye pray for the silly seal.

Sir John, where are the English fields,
And where are the English trees,
And where are the little English flowers
That open in the breeze?

Be still, be still, my brave sailors!
You shall see the fields again,
And smell the scent of the opening flowers,
The grass, and the waving grain.

O! when shall I see my orphan child?
My Mary waits for me.
O! when shall I see my old mother,
And pray at her trembling knee?

Be still, be still, my brave sailors!
Think not such thoughts again.
But a tear froze slowly on his cheek;
He thought of Lady Jane.

Ah! bitter, bitter grows the cold,
The ice grows more and more;
More settled stare the wolf and bear,
More patient than before.

O! think you, good Sir John Franklin,
We 'll ever see the land?
'Twas cruel to send us here to starve,
Without a helping hand.

'Twas cruel, Sir John, to send us here,
So far from help or home,
To starve and freeze on this lonely sea:
I ween, the Lords of the Admiralty
Would rather send than come.

O! whether we starve to death alone,
Or sail to our own country,
We have done what man has never done —
The truth is founded, the secret won —
We passed the Northern Sea!

THE BLACK REGIMENT.

Port Hudson, May 27, 1863.

Dark as the clouds of even,
Ranked in the western heaven,
Waiting the breath that lifts
All the dread mass, and drifts
Tempest and falling brand
Over a ruined land; —
So still and orderly,
Arm to arm, knee to knee,
Waiting the great event,
Stands the black regiment.

Down the long dusky line
Teeth gleam and eyeballs shine;
And the bright bayonet,
Bristling and firmly set,
Flashed with a purpose grand,
Long ere the sharp command
Of the fierce rolling drum
Told them their time had come,
Told them what work was sent
For the black regiment.

"Now," the flag-sergeant cried,
 "Though death and hell betide,
 Let the whole nation see
 If we are fit to be
 Free in this land: or bound
 Down, like the whining hound,—
 Bound with red stripes of pain
 In our old chains again!"
 O, what a shout there went
 From the black regiment!

"Charge!" Trump and drum awoke,
 Onward the bondmen broke;
 Bayonet and sabre-stroke
 Vainly opposed their rush.
 Through the wild battle's crush,
 With but one thought afush,
 Driving their lords like chaff,
 In the gun's mouths they laugh;
 Or at the slippery brands
 Leaping with open hands,
 Down they tear man and horse,
 Down in their awful course;
 Trampling with bloody heel
 Over the crashing steel,
 All their eyes forward bent,
 Rushed the black regiment.

"Freedom!" their battle-cry,—
 "Freedom! or leave to die!"
 Ah! and they meant the word,
 Not as with us 'tis heard,
 Not a mere party shout:
 They gave their spirits out;
 Trusted the end to God,
 And on the gory sod
 Rolled in triumphant blood.
 Glad to strike one free blow,
 Whether for weal or woe;
 Glad to breathe one free breath,
 Though on the lips of death.
 Praying—alas! in vain!—
 That they might fall again,
 So they could once more see
 That burst to liberty!
 This was what "freedom" lent
 To the black regiment.

Hundreds on hundreds fell;
 But they are resting well;
 Scourges and shackles strong
 Never shall do them wrong.
 O, to the living few,
 Soldiers, be just and true!
 Hail them as comrades tried;
 Fight with them side by side;
 Never, in field or tent,
 Scorn the black regiment!

* DIRGE FOR A SOLDIER.

In Memory of General Philip Kearney.

Killed September 1, 1862.

Close his eyes; his work is done!
 What to him is friend or foe-man,
 Rise of moon, or set of sun,
 Hand of man, or kiss of woman?
 Lay him low, lay him low,
 In the clover or the snow!
 What cares he? he cannot know:
 Lay him low!

As man may, he fought his fight,
 Proved his truth by his endeavor;
 Let him sleep in solemn night,
 Sleep forever and forever.

Lay him low, lay him low,
 In the clover or the snow!
 What cares he? he cannot know:
 Lay him low!

Fold him in his country's stars,
 Roll the drum and fire the volley!
 What to him are all our wars,
 What but death bemoeking folly?
 Lay him low, lay him low,
 In the clover or the snow!
 What cares he? he cannot know:
 Lay him low!

Leave him to God's watching eye,
 Trust him to the hand that made him.
 Mortal love weeps idly by:
 God alone has power to aid him.
 Lay him low, lay him low,
 In the clover or the snow!
 What cares he? he cannot know:
 Lay him low!

* IDLENESS.

If I do no more than this,
 I do something grand, I wis.
 If I do no more than slumber
 Where these locust-blossoms cumber
 The young grass, while in and out
 Voyage the humming bees about;
 And the fields of new-turned land,
 In long brown waves on every hand,
 Mix their strong life-giving smell
 With the violets of the dell,
 Till I, half drunk with country gladness,
 Forget the moody city-sadness;—

If I do no more than gaze,
 Through the flimsy spring-tide haze,
 Far into the sapphire deeps,
 Where white cloud after white cloud creeps;
 Or watch the triumph of the sun,
 When his western stand is won,
 And crimson stain and golden bar
 Are drawn across the evening-star;
 And slowly broaden on my sight
 The glories of the deeper night,
 Till I, o'ertaken with boding sorrow,
 Shrink from inevitable to-morrow;

If I do no more than look
 Into that dark and awful book
 Which, like a prophet's fatal scroll,
 Lies open in my deathless soul;
 Whose pictured joy and pictured woe
 Mean more than any man may know;
 Close secret, hidden in death and birth,
 Reflex and prophecy of earth;
 With earth's sweet sounds and scented bloods,
 Its splendors and its solemn glooms,
 All things the senses care about,
 As clear within us as without;
 As if from us creation grew
 In some strange way, we one time knew:—
 If I do no more than this,
 I do something grand, I wis.

BAYARD TAYLOR.

BAYARD TAYLOR is the son of a Pennsylvania farmer, a descendant of the first emigration with Penn. and was born January 11, 1825, in the village of Kennett Square, Chester county, in that state. He received a country education, and at the age of seventeen became an apprentice in a printing-office in Westchester. He employed his limited leisure in learning Latin and French, and writing verses, which were cordially received by Willis and Griswold, then conducting the New York Mirror and Graham's Magazine. The success of these led him to collect the poems in a volume in 1844, entitled Ximena, with the object of gaining reputation enough to secure employment as a contributor to some of the leading newspapers, while he was making a tour in Europe which he projected. He succeeded in his object, procuring from Mr. Chandler of the Philadelphia United States Gazette, and from Mr. Patterson of the Saturday Evening Post, an advance of a hundred dollars for letters to be written abroad, and with this, in addition to forty dollars for some poems in Graham's Magazine, he started on his European tour. With some further remittances from home he was enabled to make the tour of England, Scotland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and France, during a journey of two years, his expenses for the time being but five hundred dollars. How this was accomplished by the frugal pedestrian was told in his account of the tour on his return in 1846, when he published his Views-a-Foot. He next engaged in the editing and publication of a newspaper at Phoenixville, Pa., to which he gave his labors for a year with an unprofitable pecuniary result. At the close of 1847 he came to New York to prosecute his career of authorship, wrote for the Literary World, and in February, 1848, secured a position as a permanent writer for the Tribune, shortly after publishing his volume of poems, Rhymes of Travel. The next year he became proprietor of a share of the paper and one of its associate editors. His literary labors have been since connected with that journal. He visited California in 1849, and returned by way of Mexico in 1850, writing letters for the Tribune, which he revised and collected in the volumes, El Dorado, or Adventures in the Path of Empire. In the summer of 1851 he set out on a protracted tour in the East, leaving a third volume of poems with his publisher, A Book of Romances, Lyrics, and Songs.

Bayard Taylor

In this new journey he proceeded to Egypt by way of England, the Rhine, Vienna, and Trieste, reaching Cairo early in November. He immediately proceeded to Central Africa, and after passing through Egypt, Nubia, Ethiopia, and Soudan, to the kingdom of the Shillook negroes on the White Nile, reached Cairo again in April, 1852, having made a journey of about four thousand miles in the interior of Africa. He then made the tour of Palestine and Syria, extending his journey northwards to Antioch and Aleppo, and thence by way of Tarsus, the defiles of the Taurus, Konieh (Iconium), the forests of Phrygia, and the Bithynian Olympus to Constantinople, where he arrived about the middle of July. After a month's stay he sailed for Malta and Sicily, reaching the foot of Mount Ætna in time to witness the first outbreak of the eruption of 1852. Thence he passed to Italy, the Tyrol, Germany, and England. In October he took a new departure from England for Gibraltar, spent a month in the south of Spain, and proceeded by the overland route to Bombay. He set out on the 4th of January, 1853, and after a tour of twenty-two hundred miles in the interior of India, reached Calcutta on the 22d of February. He there embarked for Hong Kong, by way of Penang and Singapore. Soon after his arrival in China he was attached to the American legation, and accompanied the minister, Colonel Marshall, to Shanghai, where he remained two months. On the arrival of Commodore Perry's squadron he entered the naval service for the purpose of accompanying it to Japan. He left on the 17th of May, and after visiting and exploring the Loo Choo and Bonin Islands, arrived in the bay of Yedo on the 8th of July. The expedition to which he was attached, remained there nine days, engaged with the ceremonials of delivering the President's letter, and then returned to Loo Choo and China. Taylor then spent a month in Macao and Canton, and sailed for New York on the 9th of September. After a voyage of one hundred and one days, during which the vessel touched at Angier in Java, and St. Helena, he reached New York on the 20th of December, 1853, after an absence of two years and four months, having accomplished upwards of fifty thousand miles of travel. His letters, describing the journey, were all this while published in the Tribune. In their enlarged and improved form they furnish material for several series of volumes.

The characteristics of Mr. Taylor's writings are, in his poems, ease of expression, with a careful selection of poetic capabilities, a full, animated style, with a growing attention to art and condensation. His prose is equable and clear, in the flowing style; the narrative of a genial, healthy observer of the many manners of the world which he has seen in the most remarkable portions of its four quarters.

In person he is above the ordinary height, manly and robust, with a quick, resolute way of carrying out his plans with courage and independence; and with great energy and perseverance, he combines a happy natural temperament and benevolence.

BEDOUIN SONG.

From the Desert I come to thee
On a stallion shod with fire;

And the winds are left behind
 In the speed of my desire.
 Under thy window I stand,
 And the midnight hears my cry:
 I love thee, I love but thee,
 With a love that shall not die
 Till the sun grows cold,
 And the stars are old,
 And the leaves of the Judgment
 Book unfold!

Look from thy window and see
 My passion and my pain;
 I lie on the sands below,
 And I faint in thy disdain.
 Let the night-winds touch thy brow
 With the heat of my burning sigh,
 And melt thee to hear the vow
 Of a love that shall not die
 Till the sun grows cold,
 And the stars are old,
 And the leaves of the Judgment
 Book unfold!

My steps are nightly driven,
 By the fever in my breast,
 To hear from thy lattice breathed
 The word that shall give me rest.
 Open the door of thy heart,
 And open thy chamber door,
 And my kisses shall teach thy lips
 The love that shall fade no more
 Till the sun grows cold,
 And the stars are old,
 And the leaves of the Judgment
 Book unfold!

KILIMANDJARO.

Hail to thee, monarch of African mountains,
 Remote, inaccessible, silent, and lone—
 Who, from the heart of the tropical fervors,
 Lifest to heaven thine alien snows,
 Feeding for ever the fountains that make thee
 Father of Nile and Creator of Egypt!

The years of the world are engraved on thy forehead;
 Time's morning blushed red on thy first-fallen snows—
 Yet lost in the wilderness, nameless, unnoted,
 Of man unbeholden, thou wert not till now.
 Knowledge alone is the being of Nature,
 Giving a soul to her manifold features,
 Lighting through paths of the primitive darkness
 The footsteps of Truth and the vision of Song.
 Knowledge has born thee anew to Creation,
 And long-baffled Time at thy baptism rejoices.
 Take, then, a name, and be filled with existence,
 Yea, be exultant in sovereign glory,
 While from the hand of the wandering poet
 Drops the first garland of song at thy feet.

Floating alone, on the flood of thy making,
 Through Africa's mystery, silence, and fire,
 Lo! in my palm, like the Eastern enchanter,
 I dip from the waters a magical mirror,
 And thou art revealed to my purified vision.
 I see thee, supreme in the midst of thy co-mates,
 Standing alone 'twixt the Earth and the Heavens,
 Heir of the Sunset and Herald of Morn.
 Zone above zone, to thy shoulders of granite,
 The climates of Earth are displayed, as an index,
 Giving the scope of the Book of Creation.
 There, in the gorges that widen, descending
 From cloud and from cold into summer eternal,
 Gather the threads of the ice-generated fountains—
 Gather to riotous torrents of crystal,
 And, giving each shelvy recess where they dally
 The blooms of the North and its evergreen turfage,
 Leap to the land of the lion and lotus!

There, in the wondering airs of the Tropics
 Shivers the Aspen, still dreaming of cold:
 There stretches the Oak, from the loftiest ledges,
 His arms to the far-away lands of his brothers,
 And the Pine-tree looks down on his rival, the Palm.

Bathed in the tenderest purple of distance,
 Tinted and shadowed by pencils of air,
 Thy battlements hung o'er the slopes and the forests,
 Seats of the Gods in the limitless ether,
 Looming sublimely aloft and afar.
 Above them, like folds of imperial ermine,
 Sparkle the snow-fields that furrow thy forehead—
 Desolate realms, inaccessible, silent,
 Chasms and caverns where Day is a stranger,
 Garners whose storeth his treasures the Thunder,
 The Lightning his falchion, his arrows the Hail!

Sovereign Mountain, thy brothers give welcome:
 They, the baptized and the crowned of ages,
 Watch-towers of Continents, altars of Earth,
 Welcome thee now to their mighty assembly.
 Mont Blanc, in the roar of his mad avalanches,
 Hails thy accession; superb Orizaba,
 Belted with beech and ensandaled with palm;
 Chimborazo, the lord of the regions of noonday;—
 Mingle their sorrows in magnificent chorus
 With greeting august from the Pillars of Heaven
 Who, in the arms of the Indian Ganges
 Filters the snows of their sacred dominions,
 Unmarked with a footprint, unseen but of God!

Lo, unto each is the seal of his lordship,
 Nor questioned the right that his majesty giveth:
 Each in his awful supremacy forces
 Worship and reverence, wonder and joy.
 Absolute all, yet in dignity varied,
 None has a claim to the honors of story,
 Or the superior splendors of song,
 Greater than thou, in thy mystery mantled—
 Thou, the sole monarch of African mountains,
 Father of Nile and Creator of Egypt!

Mr. Taylor's journeys in the East, previously noticed, furnished the material for several books of travel, published on his return: A Journey to Central Africa; The Lands of the Saracen, or Pictures of Palestine, Asia Minor, Sicily, and Spain; and A Visit to India, China, and Japan. These volumes were succeeded, in 1858, by Northern Travel, Summer and Winter Pictures of Sweden, Denmark, and Lapland, a narrative of a journey in the countries named, performed in the winter of 1856-7. Mr. Taylor has also published Travels in Greece and Russia, with an Excursion to Crete. The success of these works was immediate. The writer's talent at description, the ease and cultivation of his style, his manly views, and a certain disposition to be pleased, which rendered him an unprejudiced observer of what he saw, received the favor of the public, and edition after edition was called for of the works we have enumerated. As a consequence of his popularity in this department of writing, Mr. Taylor was, in 1856, called upon to edit a Cyclopædia of Modern Travel, an octavo volume, published in Cincinnati, and which has had a wide circulation. In 1862, Mr. Taylor was appointed Secretary of Legation to Russia, while Mr. Cameron was Minister in that country. On his retirement from the office, the ensuing year, he published Hannah Thurston, a Story of American Life, which was succeeded, in 1865, by John Godfrey's Fortunes, related by Himself. These works are original in their material and treatment; the characters and incidents are drawn from the writer's observation and experience; they exhibit town and country life in America, with the opinions and ideas of the day, and are pervaded by a healthy natural sentiment. Mr. Taylor has also published several new volumes of poetry: Poems of the Orient; Poems of Home and Travel; and The Poet's Journal (1863). A general collection of his Poetical Works was published in 1865.

*Mr. Taylor has since added the tenth and eleventh volumes to his books of travel; Colorado, a Summer Trip, 1867; and By-Ways of Europe, 1869, a series of observations and experiences in remote districts not usually visited by tourists. In the preface to the latter he gives an interesting sketch of the manner in which his prolonged wanderings gradually developed their claims on his time, in the line of journalistic duties, and declares that, as he finds his active interest in new scenes abating, and other departments of literature demanding attention, he does not expect to add another to their number. The Story of Kennett; a Tale of American Life in the post-revolutionary days, a novel which some critics regard as his best picture of rural scenes, appeared in 1866. It was followed, in 1870, by Joseph and his Friend: a Story of Pennsylvania; and two years later by Beauty and the Beast, a series of magazine stories.

Four volumes of poems were also published: The Picture of St. John, a poem of artist life, dedicated to the brethren with whom its author had once hoped to be accorded brotherhood, 1866; The Ballad of Abraham Lincoln, 1869; The Musque of the Gods, 1872—the latter, to quote a friendly critic, “an attempt to illustrate the problem of primal Being, to explore the secrets of the Infinite and Absolute, to sound the fathomless depths of the universe and of God”—and Lurs: A Pastoral of Norway, in 1873, dedicated to the poet Whittier.

Perhaps, however, the single work that will best perpetuate the literary reputation of Mr. Taylor appeared in 1871: Faust, a Tragedy by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe; The First Part Translated, in the Original Metres, Vol. I., 1871; The Second Part, Vol. II., 1871. A version of Faust in the original metres, had been a cherished design with him years before the appearance of the First Part translated by that poetic scholar, Rev. Charles T. Brooks, in 1856; and the excellence of the latter merely postponed its achievement. The work as completed has been accepted as the best representation of the German master in the English tongue. “The tones of Goethe's lyre are echoed in the same sweet and sublime music which he drew from its harmonious chords. Not only the mighty thoughts of the inspired artist, but the subtle melodies of his verse are clothed in forms that correspond to the rhythmical proportions in which they took shape in the spontaneous outflowings of his genius. . . . Apart from the merit of this translation as an exhibition of the original, it may be said to add to the poetical treasures of English literature as a poem of singular beauty and power of versification.”*

In the year following Mr. Taylor assumed the editorship of the Illustrated Library of Travel, Exploration, and Adventure, a series of duodecimo volumes containing a connected compilation of what is known of the various lands and races. Japan in our Day, Travels in Arabia, Travels in South Africa, and Travels in the Lake Region of Central Africa, have already appeared.

THE FIRST LITERARY WORK—FROM JOHN GODFREY'S FORTUNES.

On reaching the attic I went into Swansford's room for a little chat, before going to bed. He was highly excited. He looked up at the lithographs of Mendelssohn and Beethoven, shook his fist, and cried, “Oh, you grand old Trojans, did you ever have to endure what I have? I don't believe it! You had those around who knew what you were, and what your art is, but I,—see here, Godfrey! This is the insane, idiotic stuff that people go into ecstasies about.”

He sat down to the piano, played a hideous, flashy accompaniment, and sang, with extravagant voice and gesture, one of the sentimental songs to which we had been treated. I threw myself back on his bed, in convulsions of laughter.

“My words are poor enough,” he continued, “but what do you say to these:—

“When ho-hollow hearts shall wear a mask,
‘Twill break your own to see-he-hee;
In such a mo-moment, I but ask
That you'll remember—that you'll re-MEM-ber
—you'll re—ME-HE-HEM—be-e-e-r me!”

—oh, and the young ladies turn up their eyes like ducks in a thunder-storm at that, and have no ear for the splendid passion of ‘Adelaida’! It's enough to make one despise the human race. I could grind out such stuff by the bushel; why not take my revenge on the fools in this way? Why not give them the absurdest satire, which they shall suck down as pure sentiment? I'll laugh at them, and they'll pay me for it! Come Godfrey, give me some nonsense which will pass for a fashionable song; I'm in the humor for a bit of devilry to-night.”

“Agreed!” I cried, springing from the bed. I eagerly caught at the idea, for it seemed like a personal discharge of my petty spite against Miss Levi. I took a pencil and the back of a music-sheet, and, as sense was not material to the composition, in a short time produced the following:—

“AWAY, my soul! This withered hand
No more may sing of joy:
The roses redder o'er the land
Which autumn gales destroy;
But when my hopes shall shine as fair
As bowers beneath the hill,
I'll bid the tempest hear my prayer,
And dream you love me still!”

“The sky is dark: no stars intrude
To bind the brow of day.
Oh, why should love, so wildly wooed
Refuse to turn away?
The lark is loud, the wind is high,
And Fate must have her will:
Ah, nought is left me but to die,
And dream you love me still!”

“The very thing!” exclaimed Swansford, wiping away tears of the laughter which had twice interrupted my reading. “I've got the melody; give me the candle, and we'll have the whole performance."

*New York Weekly Tribune, June 7, 1871. See also The Nation, March 23, 1871.

He sang it over and over with the purest, most rollicking relish, introducing each time new and fantastic ornaments, until the force of burlesque could no farther go. My intense enjoyment of the fun kept up his inspiration, and the melody, with its preposterous accompaniment, was fairly written before our merry mood began to decline. The piece was entitled "A Fashionable Song," and we decided that it should be offered to a publisher the very next day.

It was late when I awoke, and in the practical reaction from the night's excitement I thought very little of the matter until the sound of Swansford's piano recalled it. He met me, smiling, as he said, "Our song is really not a bad thing of its kind, though the kind is low enough. But, of course, we need never be known as the authors."

He put on his hat, and went out, with the manuscript in his hand. I accompanied him as far as the Park, in order to make a call, to which I did not attach any particular hope, (I had been too often disappointed for that!) but in fulfilment of a promise. Among the new acquaintances I had made at the Winch ball, was a Mr. Lettson, who was acting as a law reporter for various daily papers. In the course of a little conversation which I had with him, I mentioned my wish to obtain literary employment of some kind, and asked whether he knew of any vacancy. He informed me that reporting was the surest resource for a young man who was obliged to earn his living by his pen. Most of the prominent editors, he said, had begun life either as reporters or printers, and there could be no better school in which to make one's talent ready and available.

Something in Mr. Lettson's plainness, both of face and manner, inspired me with confidence in his judgment, and I eagerly accepted his invitation to call upon him at the office of the Daily Wonder, where I hoped at least to hear something that would put me on the right track.

I found him in the fourth story of the building, at a little desk in one corner of a room filled with similar desks, at which other gentlemen were either writing or inspecting enormous files of newspapers. A large table in the centre of the room was covered with maps, dictionaries, and books of reference. There was not much conversation, except when a man with smutty hands, a paper cap on his head, and a newspaper tied around his waist, came in and said, "Hurry up with that foreign news copy! It's time the Extra was out!" To me the scene was both strange and imposing. This was the Delphic cave whence was uttered the daily oracular Voice, which guided so many thousands of believing brains; these were the attendant priests, who sat in the very adytum of the temple and perhaps assisted in the construction of the sentences of power.

There was nothing oracular about Mr. Lettson. With his thin face, sandy eyebrows, and quiet voice, he was as ordinary a man in appearance as one will meet in a day's travel. He seemed, and no doubt was, incapable of enthusiasm; but there was a mixture of frankness, kindness, and simple good-sense in him which atoned for the absence of any loftier faculty. I had no claim whatever upon his good offices; he scarcely knew more of me than my name, and had only asked me to step in to him at an hour when he should have a little leisure for talk. I was, therefore, quite overcome, when, after the first greetings, he said, —

"I have been making inquiries this morning, at the newspaper offices. It is a pity I did not meet you sooner, as the Anniversaries, when extra work is always needed, are nearly over; but there may be a chance for you here. It depends upon yourself, if Mr. Clarendon, the chief editor of the Wonder, is satisfied to try you. An insignificant post, and poorly paid, at first, — but so are all beginnings. So many young men come to the city with high expectations, that there would be no difficulty in getting any number of full-grown editors and critics, while the apprentices' places are rarely in demand. I tell you this beforehand. We will now call on Mr. Clarendon."

Before I could recover my breath, we were in the sacred presence, in a small adjoining room. Mr. Clarendon sat at a library table, which rested on a countless array of drawers. He was writing rapidly on long, narrow slips of paper, which he numbered and transferred from his right to his left hand as they were finished. He must have heard our entrance, but neither lifted his head nor noticed us in any way until Mr. Lettson announced, —

"This is Mr. Godfrey, the young gentleman about whom I spoke to you this morning."

"Very well, Lettson," — and the latter left the room. Mr. Clarendon bowed in an abstracted way, pointed with the top of his quill to a chair on the other side of the table, and resumed his writing.

He was a man of middle age, good presence, and with an expression of penetration, shrewdness, and decision in his distinctly moulded features. His head was massive and finely formed; the hair, once light-brown, was now almost wholly gray, and the eyes of that rich golden-bronze tint which is as beautiful as it is rare. Although his frame was large, I was struck by the smallness, whiteness, and symmetry of his hand.

I took the seat indicated, and waited for him to speak. He wrote half of one of his slips, and then, having apparently finished a paragraph, said, without looking up, —

"So, you want to try your hand at newspaper work?"

I assented, stating that I was willing to perform any kind of literary labor of which I might be capable.

"You have never done anything of the sort, I suppose. Have you ever written for publication?"

"Yes."

"What?"

The few poems and the accepted story seemed very insignificant now, — but they were all I had. I mentioned them.

"That is hardly a recommendation," he said, resuming his writing; "rather the reverse. We want a plain style, exact adherence to facts, and above all — quickness. You may have these qualities, nevertheless. Let us see."

He turned over a pile of newspapers at his right hand, selected, almost at random, the Baltimore American, and handed it to me, saying, "You will find the city-news on the third page. Look over it and tell me if you see anything of sufficient importance to copy."

"Nothing, unless it is this — 'Conflagration at Fell's Point,'" I answered, after rapidly running my eye up and down the columns.

"Now go to yonder table — you will find pen and paper there — and condense this half-column account into fifteen lines, giving all the material facts."

How lucky it is, I thought, as I prepared to obey, that I went through such a thorough course of amplification and condensation at the Honeybrook Academy! My mind instantly reverted to the old drill, and resumed something of its mechanical dexterity. In fifteen or twenty minutes I had performed the work, Mr. Clarendon, in the meantime, writing steadily and silently on his narrow slips.

"It is done, sir," I said, venturing to interrupt him.

"Bring it here."

I handed him both the original article and my abbreviated statement. He compared them, as it seemed to me, by a single glance of the eye. Such rapidity of mental action was little short of the miraculous.

"Fairly done for a beginner," he then remarked. "I will try you, Mr. Godfrey. This will be the kind of work I shall first give you. You will make blunders and omissions, until you are better broken to the business. Six dollars a week is all you are worth now; will that satisfy you?"

Satisfy? It was deliverance! It was a branch of Pætolus, bursting at my feet, to bear me onward to all golden possibilities! I blundered forth both my assent and gratitude, which Mr. Clarendon, having completed his article, cut short by conducting me to the larger room, where he presented me to one of the gentlemen whom he addressed as Mr. Severn, saying, "Mr. Godfrey is to be set at condensing the miscellaneous. He will come here at ten o'clock to-morrow morning. Have an eye to him now and then."

Mr. Severn, who had a worn and haggard look, was evidently glad to learn that I was to relieve him of some of his duties. His reception was mildly cordial, and I was a little surprised that he betrayed no more curiosity to know who or what I was.

Overflowing with joy at my unexpected good fortune, I hastened back to Mrs. Very's to communicate the happy news to Swansford. But I was obliged to control my impatience until late in the afternoon. When at last I heard his step coming up the stairs, I threw open my door and beckoned him in. He, too, seemed no less excited than myself. Flinging his hat upon my bed, he cried out, "Godfrey!" at the same instant that I cried—

"Swansford! such news! hurrah!"

"Hurrah!" he echoed, but his face fell. "Why, who told you?"

"Who told me?" I asked, in surprise; "why, it happened to me!"

"What happened to you? Good God!" he exclaimed in sudden alarm, "you have not gone and sold the song to somebody else?"

In the tumult of my thoughts, I had forgotten all about the song. With a hearty laugh at the comical expression on Swansford's face, I pushed him into a chair and triumphantly told him my story.

"I congratulate you, Godfrey," he said, giving me his hand. "This is a lucky day for both of us. I thought I should astonish you, but there's not much chance of that, now, and I'm heartily glad of it."

"What do you mean?"

"Let me tell my story. When I left you at the Park Gate, I started to go down to Kettlewell's, but, by the time I had reached the Astor House, it occurred to me, that, as he deals in just such sentimental songs as we have burlesqued, I should have but a small chance of doing anything with him. Besides, I dislike the man, although he published my compositions when no one else would. So I turned about and went up street to Mackintosh, who's at least a gentlemanly fellow. I produced the song, first told him what it was, saw that he thought the idea a good one, and then sang it as well as I could. There was another gentleman in the store, and they both laughed like the deuce when I wound up with the grand final cadenza. Mackintosh, I think, would have taken the song, but the other gentleman came up, clapped his hand on my shoulder, and said, 'I must have that. I'll buy it, out and out. Joe shall sing it this very night!' I didn't know who he was, but Mackintosh then introduced him to me as Bridger, of Bridger's Minstrels. 'What's your price, copyright and all?' he asked. Thinking it was a joke, I retorted with, 'A hundred dollars.' 'Fifty,' said he. 'No, a hundred.' I answered, keeping up the fun. 'Well—split the difference. Say the word, and here's your money.' 'Seeing it's you'—I began to say, but before I had finished there were seventy-five dollars in my hand,—here they are!—and Bridger was writing a bill of sale, including the copyright. Mackintosh opened his eyes, but I pretended to take the matter coolly, though I hardly knew whether I was standing on my head or heels. But what a shame and humiliation! Seventy-five dollars for a burlesque to be sung by Ethiopian Minstrels!"

"There's neither shame nor humiliation about it!" I protested. "It's grand and glorious! Only think, Swansford,—ten weeks' board each for an hour's work!"

"I think of years of work, and not an hour of appreciative recognition," said he, relapsing into sudden gloom.

But my sunshine was too powerful for his shadow. I insisted on crowning this dies mirabilis with an Olympian banquet in the best oyster cellar of the Bowery, and carried my point. We had broiled oysters, a little out of season, and a bottle of champagne, though Swansford would have preferred ale, as being so much cheaper. I was in a splendid mood, and again carried my point.

This ravishing dawn of prosperity melted my soul, and there, in the little stall, scarcely separated from roystering and swearing bullies on either side, I whispered to Swansford my love for Amanda and my dreams of the future which we should share.

He bent down his head and said nothing, but I saw a tear drop into his wine.

We rose and walked silently homewards, arm in arm.

THE BRANDYWINE FORD—FROM THE STORY OF KENNETT.

The black, dreary night seemed interminable. He could only guess, here and there, at a landmark, and was forced to rely more upon Roger's instinct of the road than upon the guidance of his senses. Towards midnight, as he judged, by the solitary crow of a cock, the rain almost entirely ceased. The wind began to blow sharp and keen, and the hard vault of the sky to lift a little. He fancied that the hills on his right had fallen away, and that the horizon was suddenly depressed towards the north. Roger's feet began to splash in constantly deepening water, and presently a roar, distinct from that of the wind, filled the air.

It was the Brandywine. The stream had overflowed its broad meadow-bottoms, and was run ning high and fierce beyond its main channel. The turbid waters made a dim, dusky gleam around him; soon the fences disappeared, and the flood reached to his horse's belly. But he knew that the ford could be distinguished by the break in the fringe of timber; moreover, that the creek-bank was a little higher than the meadows behind it, and so far, at least, he might venture. The ford was not more than twenty yards across, and he could trust Roger to swim that distance.

The faithful animal pressed bravely on, but Gilbert soon noticed that he seemed at fault. The swift water had forced him out of the road, and he stopped from time to time, as if anxious and uneasy. The timber could now be discerned, only a short distance in advance, and in a few minutes they would gain the bank.

What was that? A strange rustling, hissing sound, as of cattle trampling through dry reeds, — a sound which quivered and shook, even in the breath of the hurrying wind! Roger snorted, stood still, and trembled in every limb; and a sensation of awe and terror struck a chill through Gilbert's heart. The sound drew swiftly nearer, and became a wild, seething roar, filling the whole breadth of the valley.

"Great God!" cried Gilbert, "the dam! — the dam has given way!" He turned Roger's head, gave him the rein, struck, spurred, cheered, and shouted. The brave beast struggled through the impelling flood, but the advance wave of the coming inundation already touched his side. He staggered; a line of churning foam bore down upon them, the terrible roar was all around and over them, and horse and rider were whirled away.

What happened during the first few seconds, Gilbert could never distinctly recall. Now they were whelmed in the water, now riding its careering tide, torn through the tops of brushwood, jostled by floating logs and timbers of the dam-breach, but always, as it seemed, remorselessly held in the heart of the tumult and the ruin.

He saw, at last, that they had fallen behind the furious onset of the flood, but Roger was still swimming with it, desperately throwing up his head from time to time, and snorting the water from his nostrils. All his efforts to gain a foothold failed; his strength was nearly spent, and unless some help should come in a few minutes, it would come in vain. And in the darkness, and the rapidity with which they were borne along, how should help come?

All at once, Roger's course stopped. He became an obstacle to the flood, which pressed him against some other obstacle below, and rushed over horse and rider. Thrusting out his hand, Gilbert felt the rough bark of a tree. Leaning towards it and clasping the log in his arms, he drew himself from the saddle, while Roger, freed from his burden, struggled into the current and instantly disappeared.

As nearly as Gilbert could ascertain, several timbers, thrown over each other, had lodged, probably upon a rocky islet in the stream, the uppermost one projecting slantingly out of the flood. It required all his strength to resist the current which sucked, and whirled, and tugged at his body, and to climb high enough to escape its force, without overbalancing his support. At last, though still half immersed, he found himself comparatively safe for a time, yet as far as ever from a final rescue.

He must await the dawn, and an eternity of endurance lay in those few hours. Meantime, perhaps, the creek would fall, for the rain had ceased, and there were outlines of moving cloud in the sky. It was the night which made his situation so terrible, by concealing the chances of escape. At first, he thought most of Roger. Was his brave horse drowned, or had he safely gained the bank below? Then, as the desperate moments went by, and the chill of exposure and the fatigue of exertion began to creep over him, his mind reverted, with a bitter sweetness, a mixture of bliss and agony, to the two beloved women to whom his life belonged, — the life which, alas! he could not now call his own, to give.

He tried to fix his thoughts on Death, to commend his soul to Divine Mercy; but every prayer shaped itself into an appeal that he might once more see the dear faces and hear the dear voices. In the great shadow of the fate which hung over him, the loss of his property became as dust in the balance, and his recent despair smote him with shame. He no longer fiercely protested against the injuries of fortune, but entreated pardon and pity for the sake of his love.

The clouds rolled into distincter masses, and the northwest wind still hunted them across the sky, until there came, first a tiny rift for a star, then a gap for a whole constellation, and finally a broad burst of moonlight. Gilbert now saw that the timber to which he clung was lodged nearly in the centre of the channel, as the water swept with equal force on either side of him. Beyond the banks there was a wooded hill on the left; on the right an overflowed meadow. He was too weak and benumbed to trust himself to the flood, but he imagined that it was beginning to subside, and therein lay his only hope.

Yet a new danger now assailed him, from the increasing cold. There was already a sting of frost, a breath of ice, in the wind. In another hour the sky was nearly swept bare of clouds, and he could note the lapse of the night by the sinking of the moon. But he was by this time hardly in a condition to note anything more. He had thrown himself, face downwards, on the top of the log, his arms mechanically clasping it, while his mind sank into a state of torpid, passive suffering, growing nearer to the dreamy indifference which precedes death. His cloak had been torn away in the first rush of the inundation, and the wet coat began to stiffen in the wind, from the ice gathering over it.

The moon was low in the west, and there was a pale glimmer of the coming dawn in the sky, when Gilbert Potter suddenly raised his head. Above the noise of the water and the whistle of the wind, he heard a familiar sound, — the shrill, sharp neigh of a horse. Lifting himself, with great exertion, to a sitting posture, he saw two men, on horseback, in the flooded meadow, a little below him. They stopped, seemed to consult, and presently drew nearer.

Gilbert tried to shout, but the muscles of his throat were stiff, and his lungs refused to act. The horse neighed again. This time there was no mistake; it was Roger that he heard! Voice came to him, and he cried aloud, — a hoarse, strange, unnatural cry.

The horsemen heard it, and rapidly pushed up the bank, until they reached a point directly opposite to him. The prospect of escape brought a thrill of life to his frame; he looked around and saw that the flood had indeed fallen.

"We have no rope," he heard one of the men say. "How shall we reach him?"

"There is no time to get one, now," the other answered. "My horse is stronger than yours. I'll go into the creek just below, where it's broader and not so deep, and work my way up to him."

"But one horse can't carry both."

"His will follow, be sure, when it sees me."

As the last speaker moved away, Gilbert saw a led horse plunging through the water, beside the other. It was a difficult and dangerous undertaking. The horseman and the loose horse entered the main stream below, where its divided channel met and broadened, but it was still above the saddle-girths, and very swift. Sometimes the animals plunged, losing their foothold; nevertheless, they gallantly breasted the current, and inch by inch worked their way to a point about six feet below Gilbert. It seemed impossible to approach nearer.

"Can you swim?" asked the man.

Gilbert shook his head. "Throw me the end of Roger's bridle!" he then cried.

The man unbuckled the bridle and threw it, keeping the end of the rein in his hand. Gilbert tried to grasp it, but his hands were too numb. He managed, however, to get one arm and his head through the opening, and relaxed his hold on the log.

A plunge, and the man had him by the collar. He felt himself lifted by a strong arm and laid across Roger's saddle. With his failing strength and stiff limbs, it was no slight task to get into place, and the return, though less laborious to the horses, was equally dangerous, because Gilbert was scarcely able to support himself without help.

"You're safe now," said the man, when they reached the bank, "but it's a downright mercy of God that you're alive!"

The other horseman joined them, and they rode slowly across the flooded meadow. They had both thrown their cloaks around Gilbert, and carefully steadied him in the saddle, one on each side. He was too much exhausted to ask how they had found him, or whither they were taking him, — too numb for curiosity, almost for gratitude.

"Here's your savior!" said one of the men, patting Roger's shoulder. "It was all along of him that we found you. Want to know how? Well — about three o'clock it was, maybe a little earlier, maybe a little later, my wife woke me up. 'Do you hear that?' she says. I listened and heard a horse in the lane before the door, neighing. — I can't tell you exactly how it was, — like as if he'd call up the house. 'T was rather queer, I thought, so I got up and looked out of the window, and it seemed to me he had a saddle on. He stamped, and pawed, and then he gave another yell, and stamped again. Says I to my wife, 'There's something wrong here,' and I dressed and went out. When he saw me, he acted the strangest you ever saw; thinks I, if ever an animal wanted to speak, that animal does. When I tried to catch him, he shot off, run down the lane a bit, and then came back as strangely acting as ever. I went into the house and woke up my brother, here, and we saddled our horses and started. Away went yours ahead, stopping every minute to look round and see if we followed. When we came to the water, I kind o' hesitated, but 't was no use; the horse would have us go on, and on, till we found you. I never heard tell of the like of it, in my born days!"

Gilbert did not speak, but two large tears slowly gathered in his eyes, and rolled down his cheeks. The men saw his emotion, and respected it.

In the light of the cold, keen dawn, they reached a snug farm-house, a mile from the Brandywine. The men lifted Gilbert from the saddle, and would have carried him immediately into the house, but he first leaned upon Roger's neck, took the faithful creature's head in his arms, and kissed it.

The good housewife was already up, and anxiously awaiting the return of her husband and his brother. A cheery fire crackled on the hearth, and the coffee-pot was simmering beside it. When Gilbert had been partially revived by the warmth, the men conducted him into an adjoining bedroom, undressed him, and rubbed his limbs with whiskey. Then, a large bowl of coffee having been administered, he was placed in bed, covered with half a dozen blankets, and the curtains were drawn over the windows. In a few moments he was plunged in a slumber almost as profound as that of the death from which he had been so miraculously delivered.

 EXTRACTS FROM FAUST.

DONJON — FROM THE FIRST PART.

(In a niche of the wall a shrine, with an image of the Mater Dolorosa. Pots of flowers before it.)

MARGARET.

Incline, O Maiden,
Thou sorrow-laden,
Thy gracious countenance upon my pain!

The sword thy heart in,
With anguish smarting,
Thou lookest up to where Thy Son is slain!

Thou seest the Father;
Thy sad sighs gather,
And bear aloft Thy sorrow and His pain!

Ah, past guessing,
Beyond expressing,
The pangs that wring my flesh and bone!
Why this anxious heart so burneth,
Why it trembleth, why it yearneth,
Knowest Thou, and Thou alone!

Where'er I go, what sorrow,
What woe, what woe and sorrow
Within my bosom aches!
Alone, and ah! unsleeping,
I'm weeping, weeping, weeping,
The heart within me breaks.

The pots before my window,
Alas! my tears did wet,
As in the early morning
For thee these flowers I set.

Within my lonely chamber
The morning sun shone red:
I sat, in utter sorrow,
Already on my bed.

Help! rescue me from death and stain!
O Maiden!
Thou sorrow-laden,
Incline thy countenance upon my pain!

IN MARGARET'S DUNGEON — FROM THE FIRST PART.

FAUST.

Come, follow me! My darling, be more bold:
I'll clasp thee, soon, with warmth a thousand-fold;
But follow now! 'Tis all I beg of thee.

MARGARET (turning to him).

And is it thou? Thou, surely, certainly?

FAUST.

'Tis I! Come on!

MARGARET.

Thou wilt unloose my chain,
And in thy lap wilt take me once again?
How comes it that thou dost not shrink from me?
Say, dost thou know, my friend, whom thou mak'st
free?

FAUST.

Come! come! The night already vanisheth.

MARGARET.

My mother have I put to death;
I've drowned the baby born to thee.
Was it not given to thee and me?
Thee, too!—'Tis thou! It scarcely true doth seem—
Give me thy hand! 'Tis not a dream!
Thy dear, dear hand!—But, ah, 'tis wet!
Why, wipe it off! Methinks that yet
There's blood thereon.
Ah, God! what hast thou done?
Nay, sheathe thy sword at last!
Do not affray me!

FAUST.

O, let the past be past!
Thy words will slay me!

MARGARET.

No, no! Thou must outlive us.
Now I'll tell thee the graves to give us:
Thou must begin to-morrow
The work of sorrow!
The best place give to my mother,
Then close at her side my brother
And me a little away,
But not too very far, I pray!
And here, on my right breast, my baby lay!
Nobody else will lie beside me!—
Ah, within thine arms to hide me,
That was a sweet and a gracious bliss,
But no more, no more can I attain it!
I would force myself on thee and constrain it,
And it seems thou repell'st my kiss:
And yet 'tis thou, so good, so kind to see!

FAUST.

If thou feel'st it is I, then come with me!

MARGARET.

Out yonder?

FAUST.

To freedom.

MARGARET.

If the grave is there,
Death lying in wait, then come!
From here to eternal rest:
No further step—no, no!
Thou goest away! O, Henry, if I could go!

FAUST.

Thou canst! Just will it. Open stands the door.

MARGARET.

I dare not go: there's no hope any more.
Why should I fly? They'll still my steps waylay.
It is so wretched, forced to beg my living,
And a bad conscience sharper misery giving!
It is so wretched, to be strange, forsaken,
And I'd still be followed and taken!

FAUST.

I'll stay with thee.

MARGARET.

Be quick! Be quick!
Save thy perishing child!
Away! Follow the ridge
Up by the brook,
Over the bridge,
Into the wood,
To the left, where the plank is placed
In the pool!
Seize it in haste!
'Tis trying to rise,
'Tis struggling still!
Save it! Save it!

FAUST.

Recall thy wandering will!
One step, and thou art free at last!

MARGARET.

If the mountain we had only passed!
There sits my mother upon a stone,—
I feel an icy shiver!
There sits my mother upon a stone,
And her head is wagging ever.
She beckons, she nods not, her heavy head falls o'er;
She slept so long that she awakes no more.
She slept while we were caressing:
Ah, those were the days of blessing!

FAUST.

Here words and prayers are nothing worth;
I'll venture, then, to bear thee forth.

MARGARET.

No—let me go! I'll suffer no force!
Grasp me not so murderously!
I've done, else, all things for the love of thee.

FAUST.

The day dawns: Dearest! Dearest!

MARGARET.

Day? Yes, the day comes,—the last day breaks
for me!
My wedding-day it was to be!
Tell no one thou has been with Margaret!
Woe for my garland! The chances
Are over—'tis all in vain!
We shall meet once again,
But not at the dances!
The crowd is thronging, no word is spoken:
The square below
And the streets overflow:
The death-bell tolls, the wand is broken.
I am seized, and bound, and delivered—
Shoved to the block—they give the sign!
Now over each neck has quivered
The blade that is quivering over mine.
Dumb lies the world like the grave!

FAUST.

O had I ne'er been born!

MEPHISTOPHELES (appears outside).

Off! or you're lost ere morn.
Useless talking, delaying and praying!
My horses are neighing:
The morning twilight is near.

MARGARET.

What rises up from the threshold here?
He! he! suffer him not!
What does he want in this holy spot?
He seeks me!

FAUST.

Thou shalt live.

MARGARET.
Judgment of God! myself to thee I give.
MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUST).
Come! or I'll leave her in the lurch, and thee!

MARGARET.
Thine am I, Father! rescue me!
Ye angels, holy cohorts, guard me,
Camp around, and from evil ward me!
Henry! I shudder to think of thee.

MEPHISTOPHELES.
She is judged!
VOICE (from above).
She is saved!

MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUST).
Hither to me!

VOICE (from within, dying away).
Henry! Henry!

MIDNIGHT—FROM THE SECOND PART.
Four Gray Women Enter.

FIRST.
My name, it is Want.
SECOND.
And mine, it is Guilt.
THIRD.
And mine, it is Care.
FOURTH.
Necessity, mine.

THREE TOGETHER.
The portal is bolted, we cannot get in:
The owner is rich, we've no business within.

WANT.
I shrink to a shadow.
GUILT.
I shrink unto naught.

NECESSITY.
The pampered from me turn the face and the thought.

CARE.
Ye Sisters, ye neither can enter, nor dare;
But the keyhole is free to the entrance of Care.

(CARE disappears.)

WANT.
Ye, grisly old Sisters, be banished from here!
GUILT.
Beside thee, and bound to thee, I shall appear!
NECESSITY.
At your heels is Necessity, blight in her breath.

THE THREE.
The clouds are in motion, and cover each star!
Behind there, behind! from afar, from afar,
He cometh, our Brother, he comes, he is—Death!

FAUST (in the Palace).
Four saw I come, but those that went were three;
The sense of what they said was hid from me,
But something like "Necessity" I heard;
Thereafter, "Death," a gloomy, threatening word!
It sounded hollow, spectrally subdued:
Nor yet have I my liberty made good:
If I could banish Magic's fell creations,
And totally unlearn the incantations,—
Stood I, O Nature! Man alone in thee,
Then were it worth one's while a man to be!

Ere in the Obscure I sought, such was I,—
Ere I had cursed the world so wickedly.
Now fills the air so many a haunting shape,
That no one knows how best he may escape.
What though One Day with rational brightness beams,
The Night entangles us in webs of dreams.
From our young fields of life we come, elate:
There croaks a bird: what croaks he? Evil fate!
By Superstition constantly insnared,
It grows to us, and warns, and is declared.
Intimidated thus, we stand alone.—
The portals jar, yet entrance is there none.

Agitated.
Is any one here?
CARE.
Yes! must be my reply.

FAUST.
And thou, who art thou, then?
CARE.
Well—here am I.
FAUST.

Avaunt!
CARE.
I am where I should be.

FAUST.
(First angry, then composed, addressing himself.)
Take care, and speak no word of sorcery!

CARE.
Though no ear should choose to hear me,
Yet the shrinking heart must fear me:
Though transformed to mortal eyes,
Grimmest power I exercise.
On the land, or ocean yonder,
I, a dread companion, wander,
Always found, yet never sought,
Praised or cursed as I have wrought!
Hast thou not Care already known?

RICHARD HENRY STODDARD
Was born at Hingham, Massachusetts. He has of late resided in New York, where, having pre-

R. H. Stoddard.

viously been a contributor to the Knickerbocker and other magazines, he published in 1849 a first collection of poems, entitled Foot Prints. In 1852 a collection of the author's maturer Poems appeared from the press of Ticknor and Co. The verses of Mr. Stoddard are composed with skill in a poetic school of which Keats may be placed at the head. He has a fondness for poetic luxuries, and his reader frequently participates in his enjoyment. He has achieved some success in the difficult province of the Ode, and has—an equally rare accomplishment—touched several delicate themes in song with graceful simplicity.

AUTUMN.

Divinest Autumn! who may sketch thee best,
For ever changeful o'er the changeful globe?
Who guess thy certain crown, thy favorite crest,
The fashion of thy many-colored robe?
Sometimes we see thee stretched upon the ground,
In fading woods where acorns patter fast.
Dropping to feed thy tusky boars around,
Crunching among the leaves the ripened mast;
Sometimes at work where ancient grana: y-floors
Are open wide, a thresher stout and hale,
Whitened with chaff upwafted from thy flail,
While south winds sweep along the dusty floors;
And sometimes fast asleep at noontide hours,
Pillowed on sheaves, and shaded from the heat,
With Plenty at thy feet,
Braiding a coronet of oaten straw and flowers!
What time, emerging from a low hung cloud,
The shining chariot of the Sun was driven
Slope to its goal, and Day in reverence bowed
His burning forehead at the gate of Heaven;—
Then I beheld thy presence full revealed,
Slow trudging homeward o'er a stubble-field;
Around thy brow, to shade it from the west,
A wisp of straw entwisted in a crown;
A golden wheat-sheaf, slipping slowly down,
Hugged tight against thy waist, and on thy breast,
Linked to a belt, an earthen flagon swung;
And o'er thy shoulder flung,
Tied by their stems, a bundle of great pears,
Bell shaped and streaky, some rich orchard's pride;
A heavy bunch of grapes on either side,
Across each arm, tugged downward by the load,
Their glossy leaves blown off by wandering airs;
A yellow-rinded lemon in thy right,
In thy left hand a sickle caught the light,
Keen as the moon which glowed
Along the fields of night:
One moment seen, the shadowy masque was flown,
And I was left, as now, to meditate alone.

Hark! hark!—I hear the reapers in a row,
Shouting their harvest carols blithe and loud,
Cutting the rustled maize whose crests are bowed
With ears o'ertasselled, soon to be laid low;
Crooked earthward now, the orchards droop their boughs
With red-check fruits, while far along the wall,
Full in the south, ripe plums and peaches fall
In tufted grass where laughing lads carouse;
And down the pastures, where the horse goes round
His ring of tan, beneath the mossy shed,
Old cider-presses work with creaky din,
Oozing in vats, and apples heap the ground;
And hour by hour, a basket on his head,
Up-clambering to the spout, the ploughman pours them in!

Sweet-scented winds from meadows newly mown
Blow eastward now; and now for many a day
The fields will be alive with wains of hay
And stacks not all unmeet for Autumn's throne!
The grauges will be crowded, and the men
Half-smothered, as they tread it from the top;

And then the wains will go, and come again,
And go and come until they end the crop.
And where the melons stud the garden vine,
Crook-necked or globy, smaller carts will wait,
Soon to be urged o'erloaded to the gate
Where apples drying on the stages shine;
And children soon will go at eve and morn
And set their snares for quails with baits of corn;
And when the house-dog snuffs a distant hare,
O'errun the gorgeous wools with noisy glee;
And when the walnuts ripen, climb a tree,
And shake the branches bare!
And by and by, when northern winds are out,
Great fires will roar in chimneys huge at night,
While chairs draw round, and pleasant tales are told:
And nuts and apples will be passed about,
Until the household, drowsy with delight,
Creep off to bed a-cold!

Sovereign of Seasons! Monarch of the Earth!
Steward of bounteous Nature, whose rich alms
Are showered upon us from thy liberal palms,
Until our spirits overflow with mirth!
Divinest Autumn! while our garners burst
With plenteous harvesting, and heaped increase,
We lift our eyes to thee through grateful tears.
World-wide in bowms, vouchsafe to visit first,
And linger last long o'er our realm of Peace,
Where freedom calmly sits, and beckons on the Years!

THE TWO BRIDES.

I saw two maidens at the kirk,
And both were fair and sweet:
One in her wedding robe,
And one in her winding sheet.

The choristers sang the hymn,
The sacred rites were read,
And one for life to Life,
And one to Death was wed.

They were borne to their bridal beds,
In loveliness and bloom;
One in a merry castle,
The other a solemn tomb.

One on the morrow woke
In a world of sin and pain;
But the other was happier far,
And never woke again!

Mr. Stoddard has published, since the previous notice, Songs of Summer (Ticknor & Fields, 1857); Town and Country, and the Voices in the Shells (Dix & Edwards, 1857); The King's Bell (New York, 1863). The last is a narrative poem in rhyme, exhibiting with much felicity, in a series of picturesque illustrations, the search after happiness of a monarch of the Middle Ages, in whose palace a bell was raised, to be rung only when he was perfectly happy. The usual pursuits of a sovereign are depicted in love, and war, and affairs of state; but the bell, pointing the moral of the insufficiency of life, is rung only at the last, or the hour of death. "Thus," in the words of one of the poet's critics, "the pursuit of pleasure—the inward history of almost every mortal—is allegorically expressed in this poem; and not only does the author depict in this guise the aspirations and hopes of the future, but also the memory of past joys. To our mind, there is nothing in the work more touching than the king's fond remembrance of his young queen, whom, while living, he endured, but whom, when dead, he loved. Mr. Stoddard has given to the public, in the King's Bell, a series of most delicate suggestive pictures, which will cause the reader to often pause and wonder whether, after all, he, like King Felix, is not also awaiting the blissful moment when he can bid his 'happy bell' to sound, and whether he too will only hear its tones upon his death-bed." Mr. Stoddard has also published The Life, Travels, and Books of Alexander Von Humboldt (New York, Rudd & Carleton, 1859), published anonymously, with an introduction by Bayard Taylor; The Loves and Heroines of the Poets (New York, Derby & Jackson, royal 8vo, 1861), an illustrated holiday book, biographical, critical, and descriptive, written with a poet's appreciation of the subject; and Adventures in Fairy Land, a Book for Young People. Mr. Stoddard's next publication was a felicitous poem in memory of President Lincoln.

 In later years Mr. Stoddard has edited four volumes of poetic selections: Melodies and Madrigals, Mostly from the Old English Poets, 1865; The Late English Poets, 1865, a collection of the minor British poets from Matthew Arnold and Alexander Smith to Jean Ingelow and Algernon Charles Swinburne; a new edition of Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America, 1872, which inserts poems from twenty-three additional authors, but does not attempt to represent, or even mention, the many works of the older poets issued since the former edition; and Griswold's Female Poets of America, 1873. His minor writings comprise, in two quarto volumes, The Story of Little Red Riding Hood, and The Children in the Wood, both told in verse, 1865; and the story of Putnam the Bold, 1870. In the following year appeared The Book of the East, and Other Poems, containing the riper fruits of his poetic genius, as The Children of Isis; Adsum, a poem to the memory of Thackeray; The Country Life, etc. He edited The Aldine for several years. The King's Bell has been acceptably translated into German by Adolph Strodtmann.

Mrs. Elizabeth Stoddard is the author of numerous contributions to the magazines, and of several novels: The Morgesons, 1862; Two Men, 1865; and Temple House, 1867. She also assisted her husband in the preparation of an annual for 1869, The Keepsake; and has contributed some pleasing poems to the leading magazines.

 THE KING'S BELL.

Prince Felix at his father's death was king,
So he commanded all the bells to ring
A jubilant peal, and bade his heralds say,
From that time forward every happy day
Should so be honored. "Not an hour will pass,
Nay, scarce the turning of the smallest glass,
Without the merry clamour of my bells,
In sooth I fear they'll banish funeral knells,
And set the mourners dancing! I shall be
So happy the whole world will envy me."

Thus spake the new-made monarch, and indeed
He had some grounds to justify his creed.
Imprimis, he was young; and youth, we know,
Cannot be wretched, if it would be so,
For grant it sometimes weeps, and seems to pine,
It feels through all its royal self, like wine.

Then he was rich as Croesus; bags of gold
Heaped up his treasury, and wealth untold
Smouldered in guarded chests of precious stones,
And blazed like stars in sceptres, crowns, and thrones.

Powerful, and rich, and young—in short a King,
O happy man! why should the bells not ring?

He built himself a palace, like his state,
Magnificent, with many a marble gate;
A great dome in the centre, and thereon
A gilded belfry, shining like the sun,
And in it hung a bell of wondrous tone,
From which a silken cord ran to his throne:

Nor only there, but o'er his royal bed,
(O how unlike the sword above the head
Of that unhappy king of olden time!)

"My people will be deafened by its chime,"
Quoth he, when all was done. And now began
That perfect life, not yet vouchsafed to man.
He chose his ministers as monarchs should,
Among the oldest men, the great and good,
And, placing in their hands the reins of State,
Charged them to make his people good and great.

'For me,' he thought, 'an idle life is best;
They love to bustle—let them, I shall rest.'
He lolled upon his couch with dreamy eyes,
Watching he cared not what—the summer skies,
The nest of swans, the fountain's rise and fall,
Or even the sunlight shifting on the wall.
Perchance he ordered music; at the word
His fancy, flattered from its trance, was stirred
And quickened with sweet sounds, from harp and lu e,

Or some sweet voice that chid the music mute.
Ten times a day he stretched his hand to ring
The bell, he felt so glad, but some slight thing—
A buzzing gnat—the wind too cold or hot—
Deterred him till the impulse was forgot.

'Have you been happy?' something seemed to say
At night: 'I see you have not rung to-day.'

"I must have been too idle," he replied;
And then, at dawn: "I will arise and ride
A league or two in the dew and morning wind,
'Twill freshen and revive my drowsy mind."
He called a sleeping groom, who cursed his fate,
And bade him take his courser to the gate,
That he might mount unseen, and ride away,
Before the court was stirring for the day.
The courser soon was saddled, and the groom
Returned, still yawning, to the monarch's room,
But found him fast asleep, so back he crept,
And late that day both groom and monarch slept.

* * * * *

'Twas known next morning that the king was ill.

The people caught the whisper, as they will,
But caring little for the affairs of kings,
Soon went their ways, and thought of other things.

In his still chamber, darkened from the day,
Low in his bed of state the sick man lay;
A grave physician stood beside his bed,
(He who first told him that the queen was dead,
The prince was born,) the prince, too, pale, distressed,

But hoping, as youth always does, the best.
"You took the prize, I hear." His father spoke.

"Ay, sir, but rather by a lucky stroke,
Than any skill or prowess of my own."

"You'll have another soon—I mean the throne."
"May Heaven preserve you long!" He quickly chid

The foolish, loving prayer: "May Heaven forbid!"

Next day "The king is worse," the rumour ran;
And now it touched the people, who began

To ask his ailment. Would he soon be well?
 What did the doctor think? but none could tell.
 He knew not what to think, with all his skill
 He only knew with them — the king was ill,
 The cause whereof, the cure, he could not reach,
 Though in his day a very famous leech;
 So to his books he went, what Galen thought
 To see, and what great Avicenna taught,
 Cardanus, Paracelsus learned by heart,
 All mighty powers of the Healing Art,
 Compounding drugs, pills, powders with long names,
 And sweltering like a smith above his chemic flames!

The third day's rumour was, "The king will die"
 It passed from mouth to mouth with many a sigh;
 Each had some tale to tell, some proof to bring,
 How happy all had been since he was king.
 "Do you remember now seven years ago,
 The famine-winter when we suffered so,
 He melted up his plate to buy us bread,
 And sold the golden crown from off his head
 To keep life in us, who must else have died?"
 "God bless him, yes!" his earnest listener cried;
 "And, later, when the Pestilence was here,
 (I never shall forget that fatal year,
 My wife died then, God rest her soul above!)
 There never was such courage, so much love
 As his, for us his people, when we lay
 Crowding with deaths each minute of the day!
 Fear made all self-h, flying for their lives,
 Wives from their husbands, husbands from their wives,

The mother from her child, despite its moan;
 The dying and the dead were left alone!
 But he — was ever such a king before? —
 He went from street to street, from door to door,
 Physician, nurse, and friend; no wretched den
 Passed by, nor shrank from the most desperate
 men;

Moistened their lips with water; brought them
 wine;

And talked — the Bishop never talked so fine
 In his long robe at Easter, when he stands
 Blessing the world with much-bejewelled hands!
 Don't tell me, sirs, — he is the best of kings."
 From this the gossip passed to other things;
 One of the youth of Felix strove to tell,
 Another babbled of his famous bell,
 (All knew, alas! that folly of their king,)
 How strange it was they never heard it ring,
 Not even when the victory was won,
 Nor on his marriage, — no, nor birthday of his son!
 And now their thoughts the prince and queen
 divide:

How fair and good she was, how young she died:
 How valiant he, — no knight could ride him down,
 So handsome, too, his golden hair his crown.
 "What better king than he can we desire?
 May he be happy — happy as his sire!"

* * * * *

"Give over, sir," the sick man said at last;
 "The hour when drugs would do me good is past,
 You know not my disease. — and yet 'tis rife."
 To which the leech: "What is it, sire?" " 'Tis Life."

"There is no cure for that." "There is but one."
 "Dear Father! say not so," exclaimed his son,
 His sorrow fainting in a storm of sighs,
 The wild tears raining from his clouded eyes.
 "There's nothing, boy, to weep for; if there be,
 'Tis Life, not Death; weep for yourself, not me.
 That I must die, is but a little thing,
 Not so that you must live, and be a King!"

Here some one entered with a smirking face,
 To say the Bishop waited. "Tell his Grace —
 With all the reverence that befits his state,
 The great, good man! — he comes too soon, or late:
 Too soon — to bury me, too late — to save:
 But bid him come to-morrow — to my grave!
 Enough of him — Who'll lift me up in bed!
 I'm troublesome I know." His raised his head —
 The weeping prince — with more than woman's
 care,

Kissing with loving lips his silver hair!
 And there he sat — a piteous sight to see,
 I'ropped up beneath his gilded canopy,
 Whose purple shadow o'er his features fell,
 And near him hung the cord to ring the happy bell!

"Look up, my son," the dying king began:
 "Weep not, but take what's coming like a man.
 I do and have: you do not hear me sigh,
 I know too much of life — to fear to die;
 Enough to say some bitter things — all true;
 But wherefore should I say them, and to you?
 You could not look at life through my old eyes,
 Nor would my early follies make you wise.
 Youth will be youth, however age may prate;
 'Twill learn like age, perchance, but learn too late!

Besides, I love you so I can not bear
 To darken your young days with future care.
 No, keep the dew, the freshness of your heart,
 As something precious, which must soon depart;
 Be — happy, if you are so, while you may:
 For me, I have not seen one happy day!
 Start not, nor ask the solemn reasons why —
 Time flies too fast — you'll know them by and by.
 This I will say, — I must, for it is true, —
 Could I have happy been, it were with you,
 Whom I have loved — you never guessed how well! —

Almost enough to ring my silent bell!
 You'll wear my crown to-morrow — Take it now,
 O may it sit less heavy on your brow
 Than mine! (See, feel how thin my hair is worn!)
 Why every jewel in it is a thorn!
 Remember what I've taught in my poor way —
 (Would I had strength, I have so much to say!)
 The office of a king — what must he be —
 How good and wise a man, how — unlike me!
 "Dear Father!" cried the prince, up looking then
 With reverent eyes. "you are the best of men.
 May I be half so good!" "Be better, sir.
 Follow — but hark, what's that? I hear a stir,
 A sound like summer rain of many feet,
 And the low hum of voices in the street."

"It is your people, sire, who gather there,
 (Throw up the casemate, you, and give him air,)
 Knowing how ill you — were, (the news would fly,)
 To show their love — they say, before you die."
 "My people love me then?" "Ah Father! yes."
 "Well, that is something, if not happiness."

He closed his eyes a moment, bowed his head,
 And moved his silent lips: at last he said:
 "Sit by my side — just there, and now your hand;
 When one is going to a distant land —
 As I am now — he loves to have a friend —
 A son, say, — as he starts, to cheer him to the end
 Speak kindly of me after I am gone,
 And see my name be graven on the stone,
 'INFELIX,' mind, not 'FELIX,' — that would be
 A cruel, lying epitaph for me.
 And yet I know not, for methinks I seem Slowly awaking from the strangest dream;
 The mystery of my life is growing clear;
 Something — it may be Happiness — is near.

I hear such heavenly music! . . . Did you speak?
Who's shining yonder? Look!" His voice grew weak,

Died to a whisper, while his swimming sight
Strained through the darkness to a shape of light,
Floating across the chamber to his bed,
"Agnès!"— he clutched the cord, and fell back—
dead.

Striking in death the first stroke of his knell.
Thus Felix rang at last the happy bell.

*THE CHILDREN OF ISIS—FROM THE BOOK OF THE EAST.

Typhon and Osiris
Children were of Isis,
Brothers and gods, twin-born, the rulers of her land,
Which prospered, nothing loath,
Under both,

For each the sceptre held with equal hand.

Now Typhon and Osiris
With their great mother Isis
Dwelt: in the cities one, and one in the broad plains

Whereon a subject race,
Dark of face,
Was bondsman unto him in ancient chains.

Said Typhon once to Isis:
"This brother mine, Osiris,
Does wrong to keep this people so long beneath his yoke.

They fetch him corn and oil,
For him they toil,
While idle all the year he sits." So Typhon spoke.

To Typhon then spake Isis:
"My son he is, Osiris,
As thou my son,—both loved, but neither less nor more.

If his these bondsmen born,
Their oil and corn,—
Who built your palaces that line the shore?

"If not the tribe," said Isis,
"That labors for Osiris,
Barbaric,—a much better, as nearer Us than these.
All day they turn your wheels,
And your proud keels

They lay, and plough for you the dangerous seas!

"Typhon and Osiris!"
Said the sad goddess Isis,
"Children of mine, unnatural, unwise as men, no more!

Let each still fill his throne,
And rule his own:
There must be peace between you as before."

To Typhon and Osiris
The solemn voice of Isis
Was as a wind unheeded,—no sooner come than gone!

Speaking their own rash words,
They drew their swords,
And, calling each his millions, led them on.

"O Typhon! O Osiris!"
Cried out their mother Isis;
But neither heard her warning, for each with desperate hand

Struck at the other's heart,—
No one could part;
So war and waste and want were in the land.

In all the years of Isis
And Typhon and Osiris, Never such dreadful battle, such courage, such despair;

Brothers with brothers fighting,
In blood delighting,—
Razed cities, temples sacked, death everywhere!

So Typhon and Osiris
Before the troubled Isis
Fought four dark years together, each bloodier than the last;

Till stronger Typhon's swords
And cunning words
Prevailed, and pale Osiris fell aghast!

Then Typhon slew Osiris
Before the weeping Isis,
And after he was dead by night the body stole;
Whereat who followed him
Limb from limb
Dismembered,—hoping so to slay the soul.

Thus Typhon rent Osiris,
To the great grief of Isis,
And thus his mangled body was scattered through the land:

One had his crowned head,
And one instead
His swordless hand,—but rings were on the hand!

So Typhon hid Osiris
Away from sorrowing Isis,
Who straight began her journeys,—North, South,
and East, and West.

O mother most undone!
Where is thy son?
Where the dead one whose tomb is in thy breast?

Up and down went Isis
Where Typhon and Osiris
Had dwelt before their trouble,—the cities and the plains;

But in no pyramid
His bones were hid,
Nor where his bondsmen wept, without their chains!

To and fro went Isis
To find the dead Osiris,
Along her one great river, and over all the land.
She could not find his head,
Nor crown instead,
His hand, nor the rich rings were on his hand!

The spirit of Osiris
Came in a dream to Isis, Saying, "O mighty goddess! why is your heart
so sore?

Why do you weep so, mother?
Because my brother,
Typhon, has hid my body? Weep no more.

"Immortal mother, Isis,
I am thy son Osiris,
Twin-born,—the king with Typhon, who rules
the land alone.

His men have statues made
Where I am laid,—
A piece of me in each,—one by his throne."

She woke, the wiser Isis,
To seek and find Osiris,
And found, as he had promised, the idols tall and grim,—

His shape in every place,—
With Typhon's face!
But was Osiris there?—A piece of him.

After her dear Osiris
The stern and wrathful Isis
Before the men of Typhon, who trembled at her ire,

Strode up and down the lands;
With her strong hands
Their idols brake, and cast them in the fire!

And now his mother, Isis,
The limbs of lost Osiris
Found,—in every statue of him some precious part;

His head by Typhon's throne;
Beneath a stone
His hand; elsewhere, and last of all, his heart!

The body of Osiris
His goddess-mother, Isis,
Laid reverent on her altar, and bowed her sacred head;

Prayed to some Power unknown,—
Some awful Throne,—
Then rose and kissed the cold lips of her dead.

The soul of great Osiris
Came back again to Isis;
The mouth with breath is warm, and dares to touch her own;

He stretches out his hands;
He stands—stands!
He is himself once more and on his throne.

"Eternal mother Isis,"
Began the god Osiris,
"Where is my brother Typhon?" And Typhon,
"I am here."

He wept,— "O brother! brother!
O mother! mother!"
And Isis wept,— Osiris not a tear!

"Typhon," said Osiris,
"And thou, our mother Isis,
What was the wrong among us?— but righted if it be,

(It must be,) name it not,—
It is forgot

By Typhon and Osiris, and, mightiest Isis, thee!"

 ARSUX.

(December 23-24, 1863.)

I.

The Angel came by night,
(Such angels still come down!)
And like a winter cloud
Passed over London town;
Along its lonesome streets,
Where Want had ceased to weep,
Until it reached a house
Where a great man lay asleep;—
The man of all his time
Who knew the most of men,—
The soundest head and heart,
The sharpest, kindest pen.
It paused beside his bed,
And whispered in his ear;
He never turned his head,
But answered, "I am here."

II.

Into the night they went.
At morning, side by side,
They gained the sacred Place
Where the greatest Dead abide;
Where grand old Homer sits
In godlike state benign;
Where broods in endless thought
The awful Florentine;
Where sweet Cervantes walks,
A smile on his grave face;
Where gossips quaint Montaigne,
The wisest of his race;

Where Goethe looks through all
With that calm eye of his;
Where— little seen but Light—
The only Shakespeare is!
When the new Spirit came,
They ask'd him, drawing near,
"Art thou become like us?"
He answered, "I am here."

 THE COUNTRY LIFE.

Not what we would, but what we must,
Makes up the sum of living;
Heaven is both more and less than just
In taking and in giving.
Swords cleave to hands that sought the plough,
And laurels miss the soldier's brow.

Me, whom the city holds, whose feet
Have worn its stony highways,
Familiar with its loneliest street,—
Its ways were never my ways.
My cradle was beside the sea,
And there, I hope, my grave will be.

Old homestead!— in that old, gray town,
Thy vane is seaward blowing;
Thy slip of garden stretches down
To where the tide is flowing:
Below they lie, their sails all furled,
The ships that go about the world.

Dearer that little country house,
Inland, with pines beside it;
Some peach-trees, with unfruitful boughs,
A well, with weeds to hide it:
No flowers, or only such as rise
Self-sown,—poor things!—which all despise.

Dear country home! can I forget
The least of thy sweet trifles?
The window-vines that clamber yet,
Whose blooms the bee still rifles?
The roadside blackberries, growing ripe,
And in the woods the Indian Pipe?

Happy the man who tills his field,
Content with rustic labor!
Earth does to him her fulness yield,
Hap what may to his neighbor.
Well days, sound nights,—oh! can there be
A life more rational and free?

Dear country life of child and man!
For both the best, the strongest,
That with the earliest race began,
And last outlived the longest:
Their cities perished long ago;
Who the first farmers were we know.

Perhaps our Babels too will fall;
If so, no lamentations,
For Mother Earth will shelter all,
And feed the unborn nations!
Yes, and the swords that menace now
Will then be beaten to the plough.

WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER

Is the son of the eminent lawyer and politician Benjamin F. Butler, a member of the cabinet of Jackson and Van Buren, to whom, in 1824, in connexion with John Duer and the late John C. Spencer, was intrusted the important work of revising the statutes of the state of New York, and author of several addresses and a few poetical contributions to the Democratic Review, and other periodicals.

William Allen Butler was born in Albany in 1825. After completing his course at the University of the City of New York, and his law studies in the office of his father, he passed a year and a half abroad. Since his return he has been actively engaged in the practice of his profession.

Mr. Butler is the author of a number of poems, and is also a spirited prose writer. He has contributed to the Democratic Review several translations from Uhland; to the Art-Union Bulletin, The Cities of Art and the Early Artists, a series of biographical and critical sketches of the Old Masters; and to the Literary World a few pleasant sketches of travel, with the title Out-of-the-Way Places in Europe, and several humorous papers in prose and verse, entitled The Colonel's Club.

In 1850 he was the author of Barnum's Parnassus: being Confidential Disclosures of the Prize Committee on the Jenny Lind Song, with Specimens of leading American Poets in the happiest effulgence of their genius; a poetical squib, which passed rapidly through several editions.

UHLAND.

It is the Poet Uhland from whose wreathings

Of rarest harmony, I here have drawn,
To lower tones and less melodious breathings,
Some simple strains of truth and passion born.

His is the poetry of sweet expression,
Of clear unfaltering tune, serene and strong;
Where gentlest thoughts and words in soft procession,
Move to the even measures of his song.

Delighting ever in his own calm fancies,
He sees much beauty where most men see naught,
Looking at Nature with familiar glances,
And weaving garlands in the groves of Thought.

He sings of Youth, and Hope, and high Endeavor,
He sings of Love, (oh, crown of Poesie!)
Of Fate, and Sorrow, and the Grave, forever
The end of strife, the goal of Destiny.

He sings of Fatherland, the minstrel's glory,
High theme of memory and hope divine,
Twining its fame with gems of antique story,
In Suabian songs and legends of the Rhine;

In Ballads breathing many a dim tradition,
Nourished in long belief or Minstrel rhymes,
Fruit of the old Romance, whose gentle mission
Passed from the earth before our wiser times.

Well do they know his name amongst the mountains,
And plains and valleys of his native Land;
Part of their nature are the sparkling fountains
Of his clear thought, with rainbow fancies spanned.

His simple lays oft sings the mother cheerful
Beside the cradle in the dim twilight;
His plaintive notes low breathes the maiden tearful
With tender murmurs in the ear of Night.

The hill-side swain, the reaper in the meadows,
Carol his ditties through the toilsome day;
And the lone hunter in the Alpine shadows,
Recalls his ballads by some ruin gray.

Oh precious gift! oh wondrous inspiration!
Of all high deeds, of all harmonious things,
To be the Oracle, while a whole Nation
Catches the echo from the sounding strings.

Out of the depths of feeling and emotion
Rises the orb of Song, serenely bright,

As who beholds across the tracts of ocean,
The golden sunrise bursting into light.

Wide is its magic World—divided neither
By continent, nor sea, nor narrow zone;
Who would not wish sometimes to travel thither,
In fancied fortunes to forget his own?

Since 1855, Mr. Butler has been actively engaged in the practice of his profession of the law, in New York, especially in connection with the more important mercantile interests of the city. Though almost wholly engrossed by these duties, he has yet found time, however, occasionally to contribute to the literature of the day, and always with marked success. The poem by which he is most widely known as an author, Nothing to Wear, originally published, anonymously, in Harper's Weekly, in February, 1857, achieved a remarkable popularity. It passed through the usual ordeal of successful anonymous works. Like Mackenzie's "Man of Feeling," the production of a lawyer in active practice, whose literary efforts were aside from his ordinary pursuits, it was made the subject of a claim which compelled the poet to the course adopted by the English novelist, the avowal of his authorship in self-defence, to prevent the appropriation by others of the productions of his pen. It was followed by numerous kindred efforts, imitating, if not adopting, its new style of versification and poetical treatment of current topics and popular ideas. The editions of the poem were more numerous in England than in the United States. Besides the handsomely printed edition of Sampson & Co., a cheap issue had an immense circulation there, and a broad sheet, with colored cuts exhibiting the salient points of the satire, was first issued in London, and afterward reproduced in Philadelphia. It was translated into French prose by one of the Paris feuilletonists, and into German verse, somewhat paraphrased, and with adaptations to the meridian of the translator.

"Nothing to Wear" was followed by a poem of similar character, entitled Two Millions. As the former had exhibited the fashionable extravagance of the day, and its moral had been accepted by the public with the interest with which it listened to Hood's plea in "The Song of the Shirt,"* so the latter was directed against the social immoralities attendant upon the accumulation of wealth in the prevalent rapid development of material interests. "Two Millions" was written at the request of the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Yale College, and delivered before them, July 28, 1858. In 1859, Mr. Butler delivered an address before the New York Bible Society, The Bible by Itself, which was published at the request of the society (New York, Carter & Brothers, 1860, 18mo, pp. 32). In 1860, and subsequently, he published a series of papers, Real Life in New York, and other sketches, in the New York Independent. One of his articles, printed in this journal, written on the decease of President Van Buren, with whom he had been intimately acquainted, was published separately, with the title, Martin Van Buren: Lawyer, Statesman, and Man (New York, Appleton & Co., 18mo, pp. 47).

* In London, "Nothing to Wear" was published with a statement of fashionable extravagance, taken from the proceedings of a Bankruptcy Court, and advertised with humanitarian tracts on the "Evils of the Dress-Making System."

 Mr. Butler published in 1871 Lawyer and Client: Their Relation, Rights, and Duties. Substance of a Lecture delivered February 3, 1871, before the Law School of the University of the City of New York,—a wise and practical exposition of a much-entangled ethical subject. In the same year appeared a volume of Poems, having his autograph on its cover. As its dedicatory preface first brings this gifted author face to face with the great public, and is withal a merited tribute to a pure-minded and modest scholar, one kindly helpful to the youngest of the literary craft,—the original Editor of this work,—it is appended:

“TO EVERT A. DUYCKINCK. I inscribe to you, in token of my sincere personal regard, this volume of poems. Many of them were written, or their material gathered, in scenes visited long since in company with your lamented brother, my cherished friend, George L. Duyckinck. His name, honorably linked with your own in our American literature, I desire affectionately to associate with yours on this introductory page. Others of them were first produced in connection with the editorial labors in which you were both united. The story of ‘The Sexton and the Thermometer’ you told me in 1849, as you had gathered it in that circle of refined good-humor of which the late Dr. John W. Francis was the genial centre, and I versified it at your request. ‘Nothing to Wear,’ before its appearance in print, was submitted to your friendly criticism, with an honest doubt on my part whether, in attempting to ‘shoot folly as it flies,’ the shaft I was aiming might not prove wanting in weight, polish, or momentum; and your kindly suggestions in aid of my intervention on behalf of our earliest American heroine, in ‘Virginia’s Virgin,’ encourage my perhaps forlorn hope that her almost thread-bare school-day story, simply told, may yet find listeners. Knowing, as you do, that, so far from cultivating poetry as an art, or authorship as a pursuit, I have diverted my pen from the strict routine of professional labor only at rare intervals or by way of mental recreation, you will take my volume as it is, a collection of verses, prompted mainly by occasional impulses to exhibit, as faithfully as I could, objects or ideas for whose most effective representation poetry seemed to be the fittest vehicle, whether the motive was narrative, sentiment, or satire.”

Besides the introductory ballad of Virginia’s Virgin,

“So dear to boyhood’s honest trust,
To girlhood’s tender heart!”

and the closing poem of The Two Cities—New York and Chicago—this volume consists of four collections: Poems of Travel, dated 1846–7; Miscellaneous Poems, containing among others At Richmond (in 1858), and The Busts of Goethe and Schiller; Uhland (1846), with Translations; and Poems of the City. In the latter are Nothing to Wear, Two Millions, and a companion piece, recently published in Harper’s Magazine, and entitled “General Average: A South Street Eclogue.” It is a tale of mercantile life, wherein the unscrupulous wits of a Yankee merchant and a Jew trader come in collision, to the discom-future of the latter. The occasion of contention is the value of several cases rescued by the former from the wreck of a steamer, but believed by their Jewish owner to be lost. As he therefore demands tenfold their value, he exposes himself to the exaction of forty per cent. as his proportionate contribution for the burden of their rescue, known as “general average.” It is a tale with a stinging moral in its humor, for the overreaching spirit of buyer and seller.

The other published works of Mr. Butler are: The Bible by Itself, an address before the New York Bible Society, 1860; Martin Van Buren, Lawyer, Statesman, and Man, 1862,—the only biography, thus far, of that eminent statesman, and giving a comprehensive, though brief, view of his character and career. Mr. Butler has made many contributions to the periodical press, yet of late years has confined himself very closely to the practice of his profession in the city of New York.

 NOTHING TO WEAR.

Miss Flora M’Flimsey, of Madison Square,
Has made three separate journeys to Paris,
And her father assures me, each time she was there,
That she and her friend Mrs. Harris
(Not the lady whose name is so famous in history,
But plain Mrs. H., without romance or mystery)
Spent six consecutive weeks, without stopping,
In one continuous round of shopping,—
Shopping alone, and shopping together,
At all hours of the day, and in all sorts of weather,
For all manner of things that a woman can put
On the crown of her head, or the sole of her foot,
Or wrap round her shoulders, or fit round her waist,
Or that can be sewed on, or pinned on, or laced,
Or tied on with a string, or stitched on with a bow,
In front or behind, above or below;
For bonnets, mantillas, capes, collars, and shawls;
Dresses for breakfasts, and dinners, and balls;
Dresses to sit in, and stand in, and walk in;
Dresses to dance in, and flirt in, and talk in;
Dresses in which to do nothing at all;
Dresses for Winter, Spring, Summer, and Fall;—
All of them different in color and shape,
Silk, muslin, and lace, velvet, satin, and crape,
Brocade and broadcloth, and other material,
Quite as expensive and much more ethereal;
In short, for all things that could ever be thought of,
Or milliner, modiste, or tradesman be bought of,
From ten-thousand-franc robes to twenty-sous frills;
In all quarters of Paris, and to every store,
While M’Flimsey in vain stormed, scolded, and swore,
They footed the streets, and he footed the bills!
The last trip, their goods shipped by the steamer
Arago,
Formed, M’Flimsey declares, the bulk of her cargo,
Not to mention a quantity kept from the rest,
Sufficient to fill the largest sized chest,
Which did not appear on the ship’s manifest,
But for which the ladies themselves manifested
Such particular interest, that they invested
Their own proper persons in layers and rows
Of muslins, embroideries, worked under-clothes, Gloves, handkerchiefs, scarfs, and such trifles as those;

Then, wrapped in great shawls, like Circassian beauties,

Gave good by to the ship, and go by to the duties.
Her relations at home all marvelled, no doubt,
Miss-Flora had grown so enormously stout

For an actual belle and a possible bride;
But the miracle ceased when she turned inside out,

And the truth came to light, and the dry-goods beside,

Which, in spite of Collector and Custom-House sentry,

Had entered the port without any entry.

And yet, though scarce three months have passed since the day

This merchandise went, on twelve carts, up Broadway,

This same Miss M-Flimsey of Madison Square,
The last time we met was in utter despair,
Because she had nothing whatever to wear!

NOTHING TO WEAR! Now, as this is a true ditty,
I do not assert—this, you know, is between us—

That she's in a state of absolute nudity,
Like Powers' Greek Slave or the Medici Venus;
But I do mean to say, I have heard her declare,

When at the same moment she had on a dress
Which cost five hundred dollars, and not a cent less,

And jewelry worth ten times more, I should guess,

That she had not a thing in the wide world to wear!

I should mention just here, that out of Miss Flora's
Two hundred and fifty or sixty adorers,
I had just been selected as he who should throw all

The rest in the shade, by the gracious bestowal
On myself, after twenty or thirty rejections,
Of those fossil remains which she called her "affections,"

And that rather decayed, but well-known work of art,

Which Miss Flora persisted in styling her "heart."
So we were engaged. Our troth had been plighted.
Not by moonbeam or starbeam, by fountain or grove,

But in a front parlor, most brilliantly lighted.
Beneath the gas fixtures, we whispered our love.
Without any romance, or raptures, or sighs,

Without any tears in Miss Flora's blue eyes,
Or blushes, or transports, or such silly actions,
It was one of the quietest business transactions,

With a very small sprinkling of sentiment, if any,
And a very large diamond imported by Tiffany.

On her virginal lips while I printed a kiss,
She exclaimed, as a sort of parenthesis,
And by way of putting me quite at my ease,

"You know I'm to polka as much as I please,
And flirt when I like—now, stop, don't you speak—

And you must not come here more than twice in the week,

Or talk to me either at party or ball,
But always be ready to come when I call;
So don't prose to me about duty and stuff,

If we don't break this off, there will be time enough
For that sort of thing; but the bargain must be
That, as long as I choose, I am perfectly free,—

For this is a kind of engagement, you see,
Which is binding on you, but not binding on me."

Well, having thus wooed Miss M-Flimsey and gained her,

With the silks, crinolines, and hoops that contained her,

I had, as I thought, a contingent remainder
At least in the property, and the best right
To appear as its escort by day and by night;
And it being the week of the STUCKUP's grand ball,—

Their cards had been out a fortnight or so,
And set all the Avenue on the tiptoe,—
I considered it only my duty to call,
And see if Miss Flora intended to go.

I found her—as ladies are apt to be found,
When the time intervening between the first sound
Of the bell and the visitor's entry is shorter
Than usual—I found; I won't say—I caught her,

Intent on the pier-glass, undoubtedly meaning
To see if perhaps it didn't need cleaning.
She turned as I entered,—“Why, Harry, you sinner,

I thought that you went to the Flashers' to dinner!”

“So I did,” I replied, “but the dinner is swallowed,

And digested, I trust, for 'tis now nine and more,

So, being relieved from that duty, I followed
Inclination, which led me, you see, to your door;
And now will your ladyship so condescend
As just to inform me if you intend

Your beauty, and graces, and presence to lend
(All of which, when I own, I hope no one will borrow)

To the STUCKUP's, whose party, you know, is tomorrow?”

The fair Flora looked up, with a pitiful air,
And answered quite promptly, “Why, Harry, mon cher,

I should like above all things to go with you there,
But really and truly—I've nothing to wear.”

“Nothing to wear! go just as you are;
Wear the dress you have on, and you'll be by far,
I engage, the most bright and particular star
On the Stuckup horizon—” I stopped, for her eye,

Notwithstanding this delicate onset of flattery,
Opened on me at once a most terrible battery
Of scorn and amazement. She made no reply,
But gave a slight turn to the end of her nose,

(That pure Grecian feature), as much to say,
“How absurd that any sane man should suppose
That a lady would go to a ball in the clothes,

No matter how fine, that she wears every day!”

So I ventured again: “Wear your crimson brocade;”

(Second turn up of nose)—“That's too dark by a shade.”

“Your blue silk”—“That's too heavy.” “Your pink”—“That's too light.”

“Wear tulle over satin”—“I can't endure white.”

“Your rose-colored, then, the best of the batch”—
“I have n't a thread of point-lace to match.”

“Your brown moire antique”—“Yes, and look like a Quaker;”

“The pearl-colored”—“I would, but that plaguy dress-maker

Has had it a week.” “Then that exquisite lilac,
In which you would melt the heart of a Shylock;”
(Here the nose took again the same elevation)—

“I would n't wear that for the whole of creation.”

“Why not? It's my fancy, there's nothing could strike it

As more comme il faut”—“Yes, but, dear me, that lean
Sophronia Stuckup has got one just like it,

And I won't appear dressed like a chit of sixteen."
 "Then that splendid purple, that sweet Mazarine;
 That superb point d'aiguille, that imperial green,
 That zephyr-like tarletan, that rich grenadine" —
 "Not one of all which is fit to be seen."
 Said the lady, becoming excited and flushed,
 "Then wear," I exclaimed, in a tone which quite crushed
 Opposition, "that gorgeous toilette which you sported
 In Paris last spring, at the grand presentation,
 When you quite turned the head of the head of the nation,
 And by all the grand court were so very much courted."
 The end of the nose was portentously tipped up,
 And both the bright eyes shot forth indignation,
 As she burst upon me with the fierce exclamation,
 "I have worn it three times, at the least calculation,
 And that and most of my dresses are ripped up!"
 Here I ripped out something, perhaps rather rash,
 Quite innocent, though; but, to use an expression
 More striking than classic, it "settled my hash."
 And proved very soon the last act of our session.
 "Fiddlesticks, is it, sir? I wonder the ceiling Doesn't fall down and crush you, — you men have no feeling;
 You selfish, unnatural, illiberal creatures,
 Who set yourselves up as patterns and preachers,
 Your silly pretence, — why, what a mere guess it is!
 Pray, what do you know of a woman's necessities?
 I have told you and shown you I've nothing to wear,
 And it's perfectly plain you not only don't care,
 But you do not believe me," (here the nose went still higher.)
 "I suppose, if you dared, you would call me a liar.
 Our engagement is ended, Sir. — yes, on the spot;
 You're a brute, and a monster, and — I don't know what."
 I mildly suggested the words Hottentot,
 Pickpocket, and cannibal, Tartar, and thief,
 As gentle expletives which might give relief;
 But this only proved as a spark to the powder,
 And the storm I had raised came faster and louder:
 It blew and it rained, thundered, lightened, and hailed
 Interjections, verbs, pronouns, till language quite failed
 To express the abusive, and then its arrears
 Were brought up all at once by a torrent of tears,
 And my last faint, despairing attempt at an observation was lost in a tempest of sobs.
 Well, I felt for the lady, and felt for my hat, too,
 Improvised on the crown of the latter a tattoo,
 In lieu of expressing the feelings which lay Quite too deep for words, as Wordsworth would say;
 Then, without going through the form of a bow,
 Found myself in the entry, — I hardly knew how,
 On doorstep and sidewalk, past lamp-post and square,
 At home and up stairs, in my own easy-chair;
 Poked my feet into slippers, my fire into blaze,
 And said to myself, as I lit my cigar,
 "Supposing a man had the wealth of the Czar
 Of the Russias to boot, for the rest of his days,
 On the whole, do you think he would have much to spare,
 If he married a woman with nothing to wear?"

Since that night, taking pains that it should not be bruited
 Abroad in society. I've instituted
 A course of inquiry, extensive and thorough,
 On this vital subject, and find, to my horror,
 That the fair Flora's case is by no means surprising,
 But that there exists the greatest distress
 In our female community, solely arising
 From this unsupplied destitution of dress,
 Whose unfortunate victims are filling the air
 With the pitiful wail of "Nothing to wear."
 Researches in some of the "Upper Ten" districts
 Reveal the most painful and startling statistics,
 Of which let me mention only a few:
 In one single house, on the Fifth Avenue,
 Three young ladies were found, all below twenty-
 two,
 Who have been three whole weeks without anything new
 In the way of flounced silks, and thus left in the lurch
 Are unable to go to ball, concert, or church.
 In another large mansion, near the same place,
 Was found a deplorable, heart-rending case
 Of entire destitution of Brussels point-lace.
 In a neighboring block there was found, in three calls,
 Total want, long continued, of camel's-hair shawls;
 And a suffering family, whose case exhibits
 The most pressing need of real ermine tippets;
 One deserving young lady almost unable
 To survive for the want of a new Russian sable;
 Still another, whose tortures have been most terrific
 Ever since the sad loss of the steamer Pacific,
 In which were engulfed, not friend or relation,
 (For whose fate she perhaps might have found consolation,
 Or borne it, at least, with serene resignation,)
 But the choicest assortment of French sleeves and collars
 Ever sent out from Paris, worth thousands of dollars,
 And all as to style most recherché and rare,
 The want, of which leaves her with nothing to wear,
 And renders her life so drear and dyspeptic
 That she's quite a recluse, and almost a sceptic,
 For she touchingly says, that this sort of grief
 Cannot find in religion the slightest relief,
 And philosophy has not a maxim to spare
 For the victims of such overwhelming despair.
 But the saddest, by far, of all these sad features
 Is the cruelty practised upon the poor creatures
 By husbands and fathers, real Bluebeards and Timons,
 Who resist the most touching appeals made for diamonds
 By their wives and their daughters, and leave them for days
 Unsupplied with new jewelry, fans, or bouquets, Even laugh at their miseries whenever they have a chance,
 And deride their demands as useless extravagance;
 One case of a bride was brought to my view,
 Too sad for belief, but, alas! 't was too true,
 Whose husband refused, as savage as Charon,
 To permit her to take more than ten trunks to Sharon.
 The consequence was, that when she got there,
 At the end of three weeks she had nothing to wear,
 And when she proposed to finish the season
 At Newport, the monster refused, out and out,

For his infamous conduct alleging no reason,
 Except that the waters were good for his gout;
 Such treatment as this was too shocking, of course,
 And proceedings are now going on for divorce.

But why harrow the feelings by lifting the curtain
 From these scenes of woe? Enough, it is certain,
 Has here been disclosed to stir up the pity
 Of every benevolent heart in the city,
 And spur up humanity into a canter
 To rush and relieve these sad cases instantler.
 Won't somebody, moved by this touching description,

Come forward to-morrow and head a subscription?
 Won't some kind philanthropist, seeing that aid is
 So needed at once by these indigent ladies,
 Take charge of the matter? Or won't Peter
 Cooper

The corner-stone lay of some new splendid super-Structure, like that which to-day links his name
 In the Union unending of Honor and Fame,
 And found a new charity just for the care
 Of these unhappy women with nothing to wear,
 Which, in view of the cash which would daily be claimed,

The Laying-out Hospital well might be named?
 Won't Stewart, or some of our dry-goods importers,

Take a contract for clothing our wives and our daughters?

Or, to furnish the cash to supply these distresses,
 And life's pathway strew with shawls, collars,
 and dresses,

Ere the want of them makes it much rougher and thornier,

Won't some one discover a new California?

O ladies, dear ladies, the next sunny day
 Please trundle your hoops just out of Broadway,
 From its whirl and its bustle, its fashion and pride,
 And the temples of trade which tower on each side,
 To the alleys and lanes, where Misfortune and Guilt

Their children have gathered, their city have built:

Where Hunger and Vice, like twin beasts of prey,
 Have hunted their victims to gloom and despair;
 Raise the rich, dainty dress, and the fine broid-
 ered skirt,

Pick your delicate way through the dampness
 and dirt,

Grope through the dark dens, climb the rickety stair

To the garret, where wretches, the young and the old,

Half-starved and half-naked, lie crouched from the cold;

See those skeleton limbs, those frost-bitten feet,
 All bleeding and bruised by the stones of the street;

Hear the sharp cry of childhood, the deep groans that swell

From the poor dying creature who writhes on the floor;

Hear the curses that sound like the echoes of hell,
 As you sicken and shudder and fly from the door;

Then home to your wardrobes, and say, if you dare —

Spoiled children of fashion,—you've nothing to wear!

And O, if perchance there should be a sphere
 Where all is made right which so puzzles us here,
 Where the glare and the glitter and tinsel of time
 Fade and die in the light of that region sublime,

Where the soul, disenchanted of flesh and of sense,
 Unscreened by its trappings and shows and pretence,

Must be clothed for the life and the service above,
 With purity, truth, faith, meekness, and love,
 O daughters of earth! foolish virgins, beware!
 Lest in that upper realm you have nothing to wear!

TWO CITIES.

I.

Girt with the river's silver zone,
 Her feet the ocean woos and clasps,
 An Empress on her island throne,
 The crown she wears, the sceptre grasps.

The light that floods her face is shed
 On countless roofs and thronging spires;
 The cloud-wreath, hovering overhead,
 Is woven from her ceaseless fires.

Her lap with wealth the wide world fills,
 O'er the wide world her wealth she casts;
 The forests of a thousand hills
 Have grown to shape her clustered masts.

With boundless life her senses thrill,
 It throbs through her resounding streets;
 A mighty nation's tireless will
 In all her million pulses beats.

But now, heart-sick, sore tried, and faint,
 Upon her cheek the blush of shame,
 She wears, within, the leprous taint
 That blights and blasts her civic fame.

Yet, with firm hand, aside she tears
 The folds of her imperial robe,
 And, fearless, in the sunlight, dares
 The festering sore to search and probe.

Plunge deeper yet the cleansing knife!
 The heart still pours its vital force,
 The canker has not touched the life,
 The poison is not in the blood!

II.

Some swift enchantment surely fed
 Her virgin grace, her giant might,
 As on her upward way she sped,
 With girded loins and footsteps light;

In living lines, her strange, new name
 Carved on the inland ocean's brim,
 And with her lofty beacon flame
 Fringed the broad prairie's verdant rim.

Past lakes and forests, hills and plains,
 She pushed her iron pathways through,
 Along whose tracks the freighted trains,
 Like fire-winged serpents, flashed and flew.

With the heaped grain her rafters bent,
 The native sheaf her golden crest,
 And through her open gates she sent
 The garnered harvests of the West.

Who now shall blame the glow of pride
 That kindled on her fevered face,
 Restless with thought and eager-eyed,
 Fit type of our impetuous race?

To-night her widowed watch she keeps;
 In sackcloth, by a funeral pyre,
 She sits beside the shapeless heaps
 Where swept the wind-tossed waves of fire.

Not lifeless yet, though maimed and scarred;
 The gulf of flame is not her grave;
 Above these ruins, black and charred,
 Once more the enchanter's wand shall wave.

The magic of the fearless will

That wrought and won, in earlier years,
Still weds to all her strength and skill
The patience of the pioneers.

While from all hearts and hands and homes,
From kindred hearths, from alien shores,
One world-wide benediction comes,
One tidal wave of pity pours;

Still, as of old, the furnace proves
The path divinest love has trod;
Still, in the midst, a presence moves
Whose form is like the Son of God!

So far apart, yet side by side;
Her brand of fire, our badge of shame,
Write the same doom of human pride
Their call to duty is the same.

Though deep the vengeful firebolt cleft,
And deep the foul corruption's stain,
Courage and hope and faith are left,
Manhood and truth and right remain.

The skies are clear, the fresh winds blow,
With trumpet calls the air is filled;
Sweep off the wrecks, and far below,
Upon the old foundations, build!

October, 1871.

JOHN L. McCONNEL.

MR. McCONNEL was born in Illinois, November 11, 1826. After studying law with his father, Murray McConnell, a distinguished lawyer and politician of the West, he entered and was graduated at the Transylvania Law School, Lexington, Ky.

On the sixth of June, 1846, he entered the regiment of Col. Harding, as a volunteer in the ranks. Before leaving the rendezvous at Alton, he was made first lieutenant of his company, and promoted to a captaincy at the battle of Buena Vista, where he was twice wounded. After serving out his term he returned home, and commenced the practice of the law at Jacksonville, Illinois, where he has since resided.

In the spring of 1850 Mr. McConnell published Talbot and Vernon; in the autumn of the same year Graham, or Youth and Manhood; and in 1851 The Glenss. The scene of these novels is laid in the West; and the author has drawn on his experiences of the Mexican War and his skill as a lawyer in the construction of his plots.

These were followed in 1853 by Western Characters, a collection of sketches of the prominent classes in the formative period of western society. It is one of the author's most successful volumes.

Mr. McConnell was in 1855 engaged upon a continuation of this work, and also upon a History of Early Explorations in America, having especial reference to the labors of the early Roman Catholic missionaries. He died before completing the latter, from disease contracted in his Mexican campaign, January 17, 1862.

A WESTERN POLITICIAN OF THE FIRST GROWTH.

A description of his personal appearance, like that of any other man, will convey no indistinct impression of his internal character.

Such a description probably combined more characteristic adjectives than that of any other personage of his time—adjectives, some of which were applicable to many of his neighbors, respectively, but all of which might be bestowed upon him only. He was tall, gaunt, angular, swarthy, active, and athletic. His hair was, invariably, black as the wing of the raven; even in that small portion which the cap of racoon-skin left exposed to the action of sun and rain, the gray was but thinly scattered; imparting to the monotonous darkness only a more iron character. As late as the present day, though we have changed in many things, light-haired men seldom attain eminence among the western people: many of our legislators are young enough, but none of them are beardless. They have a bilious look, as if, in case of illness, their only hope would lie in calomel and jalap. One might understand, at the first glance, that they are men of talent, not of genius; and that physical energy, the enduring vitality of the body, has no inconsiderable share in the power of the mind.

Corresponding to the sable of the hair, the politician's eye was usually small, and intensely black—not the dead, inexpressive jet, which gives the idea of a hole through white paper, or of a cavernous socket in a death's head; but the keen, midnight darkness, in whose depths you can see a twinkle of starlight—where you feel that there is meaning as well as color. There might be an expression of cunning along with that of penetration—but, in a much higher degree, the blaze of irascibility. There could be no doubt, from its glance, that its possessor was an excellent hater; you might be assured that he would never forget an injury or betray a friend.

A stoop in the shoulders indicated that, in times past, he had been in the habit of carrying a heavy rifle, and of closely examining the ground over which he walked; but what the chest thus lost in depth it gained in breadth. His lungs had ample space in which to play—there was nothing pulmonary even in the drooping shoulders. Few of his class have ever lived to a very advanced age, but it was not for want of iron constitutions, that they went early to the grave. The same services to his country, which gave the politician his prominence, also shortened his life.

From shoulders thus bowed, hung long, muscular arms—sometimes, perhaps, dangling a little ungracefully, but always under the command of their owner, and ready for any effort, however violent. These were terminated by broad, bony hands, which looked like grapnels—their grasp, indeed, bore no faint resemblance to the hold of those symmetrical instruments. Large feet, whose toes were usually turned in, like those of the Indian, were wielded by limbs whose vigor and activity were in keeping with the figure they supported. Imagine, with these peculiarities, a free, bold, rather swaggering gait, a swarthy complexion, and conformable features and tones of voice: and—excepting his costume—you have before your fancy a complete picture of the early western politician.

IOHABOD CRANE BEYOND THE ALLEGHANIES.

A genuine specimen of the class to which most of the early schoolmasters belonged, never felt any misgivings about his own success, and never hesitated to assume any position in life. Neither pride nor modesty was ever suffered to interfere with his action. He would take charge of a numerous school, when he could do little more than write his own name, just as he would have undertaken to run a steamboat, or command an army, when he had never studied engineering or heard of strategy.

Nor would he have failed in either capacity: a week's application would make him master of a steamer, a gl. e., or a proficient (after the present manner of proficiency) in tactics; and as for his school, he could himself learn at night what he was to teach others on the following day! Nor was this mere "conceit"—though, in some other respects, that word, in its limited sense, was not inapplicable—neither was it altogether ignorant presumption; for one of these men was seldom known to fail in anything he undertook: or, if he did fail, he was never found to be cast down by defeat, and the resiliency of his nature justified his confidence.

* * * * *

Properly to represent his lineage, therefore, the schoolmaster could be neither dandy nor dandymaster; and, as if to hold him to his integrity, nature had omitted to give him any temptation, in his own person, to assume either of these respectable characters. The tailor that could shape a coat to fit his shoulders, never yet handled shears; and he would have been as ill at ease in a pair of fashionable pantaloons, as if they had been lined with chestnut-burrs. He was generally above the medium height, with a very decided stoop, as if in the habit of carrying burthens: and a long, high nose, with light blue eyes, and coarse, uneven hair, of a faded weather-stain color, gave his face the expression answering to this lathy outline. Though never very slender, he was always thin: as if he had been flattered out in a rolling-mill; and rotundity of corporation was a mode of development not at all characteristic. His complexion was seldom florid, and not often decidedly pale; a sort of sallow discoloration was its prevailing hue, like that which marks the countenance of a consumer of "coarse" whiskey and strong tobacco. But these failings were not the cause of his cadaverous look—for a faithful representative of the class held them both in commendable abhorrence—they were not the vices of his nature.

There was a subdivision of the class, a secondary type, not so often observed, but common enough to entitle it to a brief notice. He was, generally, short, squat, and thick—the latitude bearing a better proportion to the longitude than in his lank brother—but never approaching anything like roundness. With this attractive figure he had a complexion of decidedly bilious darkness, and what is commonly called a "dish-face." His nose was depressed between the eyes, an arrangement which dragged the point upward in the most cruel manner, but gave it an expression equally ludicrous and impertinent. A pair of small, round, black eyes, encompassed—like two little feudal fortresses, each by its moat—with a circle of yellowish white, peered out from under brows like battlements. Coarse, black hair, always cut short, and standing erect, so as to present something the appearance of a chevaux de frise, protected a hard, round head—a shape most appropriate to his lineage—while, with equal propriety, ears of corresponding magnitude stood boldly forth to assert their claim to notice.

Both these types were distinguished for large feet, which no boot could enclose, and hands broad beyond the compass of any glove. Neither was ever known to get drunk, to grow fat, to engage in a game of chance, or to lose his appetite: it became the teacher of "ingenious youth" to preserve an exemplary bearing before those whom he was endeavoring to benefit; while respectable "appearances," and proper appreciation of the good things of life, were the alpha and omega of his system of morality.

J. M. LEGARÉ,

A POET of South Carolina, and a resident, we believe, of Charleston, and a relative of the late Hugh S. Legaré, is the author of a volume, Orta-Undis and Other Poems, published in 1848. They are marked by their delicacy of sentiment and a certain scholastic refinement.

AMY.

This is the pathway where she walked,
The tender grass pressed by her feet.
The laurel boughs laced overhead,
Shut out the noonday heat.

The sunshine gladly stole between
The softly undulating limbs.
From every blade and leaf arose
The myriad insect hymns.

A brook ran murmuring beneath
The grateful twilight of the trees,
Where from the dripping pebbles swelled
A beech's mossy knees.

And there her robe of spotless white,
(Pure white such purity becometh!)
Her angel face and tresses bright
Within the basin gleamed.

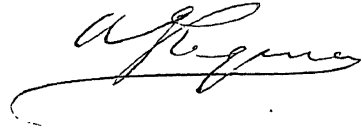

The crowsweetbriers half detained
Her light hem as we moved along!
To hear the music of her voice
The mockbird hushed his song.

But now her little feet are still,
Her lips the EVERLASTING seal;
The hideous secrets of the grave
The weeping eyes reveal.

The path still winds, the brook descends,
The skies are bright as then they were.
My Amy is the only leaf
In all that forest sear.

AUGUSTUS JULIAN REQUIER

Was born at Charleston, South Carolina, May 27, 1825. He was educated in that city, and having selected the law as his profession, was called to the bar in 1844. From a very early age Mr. Requier was a regular contributor to the newspapers and periodicals, and in his seventeenth year published The Spanish Exile, a play in blank verse, which was acted with success. A year or two after he published The Old Sanctuary, a romance, the scene of which is laid in Carolina before the Revolution. He soon after removed to Marion, South Carolina, where, during the leisure intervals which occur in the life of a country barrister, many of his more mature and elaborate pieces in prose and verse were composed. These Poems were collected in book form in 1860. The most prominent of them are "The Phantasmagoria," "Marco Bozzaris," a tragedy; "The Dial Plate," "Treasure Trove," "To Mary on Earth," "The Thornless Rose," "The Charm," "The Image," "The Blackbeard," "The three Misses Grimball," a sketch; the Farewell Address to the Palmetto Regiment, delivered at the Charleston Theatre by Mrs. Mowatt, and mentioned in her "Autobiography;" the "Welcome" to the same regiment on its return from Mexico; an "Ode to Shakespeare," and "Crystalline."

Mr. Requier subsequently removed to Mobile, Alabama, where he attained distinction in his professional pursuits. He was Attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama for eight years, and held a similar office under the "Confederate States." After the end of the war, he removed to New York city. His later poems have not been gathered into a volume.

ODE TO SHAKESPEARE.

He went forth into Nature and he sung,
Her first-born of imperial sway—the lord
Of sea and continent and clime and tongue;
Striking the Harp with whose sublime accord
The whole creation rung!

He went forth into Nature and he sung,
Her grandest terrors and her simplest themes,
The torrent by the beething crag o'erhung,
And the wild-daisy on its brink that gleams
Unharmful, and lifts a dew-drop to the sun!
The muttering of the tempest in its halls
Of darkness turreted; beheld alone
By an o'erwhelming brilliance which appals—
The turbulence of Ocean—the soft calm
Of the sequestered vale—the bride-like day,
Or sainted eve, dispensing holy balm
From her lone lump of silver thro' the grey
That leads the star-crowned Night adown the mountain way:

These were his themes and more—no little bird
Lit in the April forest but he drew
From its wild notes a melitative word—
A gospel that no other mortal knew:
Bard, priest, evangelist! from rarest cells
Of riches inexhaustible he took
The potent ring of her profoundest spells,
And wrote great Nature's Book!

They people earth and sea and air,
The dim, tumultuous band,
Called into being everywhere
By his creative wand;
In kingly court and savage lair,
Prince, Peasant, Priest, and Sage and Peer,
And midnig'it hag and ladye fair,
Pure as the white rose in her hair,
And warriors that, on barbéd steed,
Burn to do the crestéd deed,
And lovers that delighted rove
When moonlight marries with the grove,
Glide forth—appear!
To breathe or love or hate or fear;
And with most unexampled wile,
To win a soul-enraptured smile,
Or blot it in a tear.

Hark! a horn,
That with repeated winding shakes,
O'er hill and glen and far responsive lakes,
The mantle of the morn!
Now, on the mimic scene,
The simplest of all simple pairs
That ever drew from laughter tears,
Touchstone and Audrey, hand in hand,
Come hobbling o'er the green;
While Rosalind, in strange disguise,
With manly dress but maiden eyes,
Which, spite herself, will look sidewise,
E'en in this savage land;

And her companion like the flower,
That beaten by the morning shower
Still in repleat beauty stoops,
Looking loveliest whilst it droops,
Step faintly forth from weariness,
All sorrow in their maidenhood;
Twin-lilies of the wilderness—
A shepherd and his shepherdless,
In Arden's gloomy wood!

But comes anon, with halting step and pause,
A miserable man!
Revolving in each lengthened breath he draws,
The deep, dark problem of material laws,
That life is but a span.

Secluded, silent, solitary, still,
Lone in the vale and last upon the hill,
Companionless beside the haunted stream,
Walking the stars in the meridian beam,
Himself the shade of an o'ershadowing dream;
Blighting the rose
With his imaginary woes,
And weaving bird and tree and fruit and flower
Into a charm of such mysterious power,
Such plaintive tale
The beauteous skies grow pale,
And the rejoicing earth looks wan,
Like Jacques—her lonely, melancholy man!

Ring silver-sprinkling, gushing bells—
Blow clamorous pipes replying,
In tipsy merriment that swells
For ever multiplying!
He comes! with great sunshiny face
And chuckle deep and glances warm,
Sly nods and strange attempts at grace,
A matron on each arm;
He comes! of wit the soul and pith,
Olympian bottle-rinser!
Room for him! Sir John Falstaff with
The merry Wives of Windsor.

Lo! on a blasted heath,
Lit by a flashing storm,
The threatening darkness underneath,
Three of the weird form!
Chanting, dancing all together,
For a charm upon the heather,
Filthy hags in the foul weather!

The spell works, and behold;
A castle in the midnight hour,
Muffled 'mid battlement and tower,
Whereon the crystal moon doth lower
Antarctically cold!
A blackbird's note hath drilled the air
And left the stillness still more drear;
Twice hath the hornéd owl around
The Chapel flown, nor uttered sound;
The night-breeze now doth scarcely blow.
And now, 'tis past and gone;
But the pale moon that like the snow
Erewhile descending shone.
Encrimsoned as the torch of Mars,
While cloud on cloud obscures the stars
And rolls above the trees,
Cleaves the dark billows of the Night
Like a shot-smitten sail in flight
Over the howling seas—
God! what a piercing shriek was there,
So deep and loud and wild and drear
It bristles up the moistened hair
And bids the blood to freeze!
Again—again—
Athwart the brain,
That lengthened shriek of life-extorted pain!
And now, 'tis given o'er:

But from that pile despairingly doth soar
A voice which cries like the uplifted main,
"Glamis hath murdered sleep—Macbeth shall sleep
no more!"

Thick and faster now they come,
In procession moving on,
Neath the world-embracing dome
Of the unexhausted one;
Mark them, while the cauldron bubbles,

Throwing spells upon the sight,
And the wizard flame redoubles
In intensity of light:
Here is one—a rustic maiden
Of the witching age;
Cheeks with beauty overladen,
Blushing like a sunset Aidenn,
Mistress Anne Page!
Here another that doth follow,
Full of starch decorum:
A wise man this Cousin Shallow,
Justice of the Quorum;
A third is timid, slight, and tender,
Showing harmless Master Slender;
A fourth, doth frowningly reveal,
His princely mantle jewelled o'er,
By knightly spurs upon his heel
And clanging sound of martial steel,
The dark, Venetian Moor!
The fifth advances with a start,
His eye transfixing like a dart,
Black Richard of the iron-heart!

And now they rush along the scene,
In crowds with scarce a pause between,
Prelates high, in church and state,
Speakers dexterous in debate,
Courtiers gay in satin hose,
Clowns fantastic and jocose,
Soldiers brave and virgins fair,
Nymphs with golden flowing hair
And spirits of the azure air,
Pass, with solemn step and slow,
Pass, but linger as they go,

Like images that haunt the shade,
Or visions of the white cascade,

Or sunset on the snow.

Then, then, at length, the crowning glory comes,
Loud trumpets speak unto the sky, and drums
Unroll the military chain!
From pole to pole,
Greet wide the wonder of the poet's soul:
With raven plume,
And posture rapt in high, prophetic gloom—
Hamlet, the Dane!

Bright shall thine altars be,
First of the holy minstrel band,
Green as the vine-encircled land
And vocal as the sea!
Thy name is writ
Where stars are lit,
And thine immortal shade,
Mid archangelic clouds displayed
On Fame's empyreal seat,
Sees the inseparable Nine
In its reflected glory shine,
And Nature at its feet.

PAUL H. HAYNE

Is a son of Lieut. Hayne of the United States Navy, and nephew of Robert G. Hayne of senatorial celebrity. He was born in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1831, and has been a frequent contributor to many of the southern magazines, more particularly the Southern Literary Messenger. He was editor of the Charleston Literary Gazette, and was connected with the editorial department of the Evening News, a daily journal also published in Charleston. His poems, collected in a volume in 1855, are spirited, and he has cultivated the music of verse with effect. His longest poem is entitled The Temptation of Venus, a Monkish Legend.

SONNET.

The passionate Summer's dead; the sky's aglow
With roseate flushes of matured desire,
The winds at eve are musical and low,
As sweeping chords of a lamenting lyre,
Far up among the pillared clouds of fire,
Whose pomp of grand procession upward rolls
With gorgeous blazonry of pictured folds,
To celebrate the Summer's past renown;
Ah me! how regally the heavens look down,
O'ershadowing beautiful, autumnal woods,
And harvest-fields with hoarded increase brown,
And deep-toned majesty of golden floods,
That lift their solemn dirges to the sky,
To swell the purple pomp that floateth by.

A PORTRAIT.

I.

The laughing Hours before her feet,
Are strewing vernal roses,
And the voices in her soul are sweet,
As music's mellowed closes,
All hopes and passions heavenly-born,
In her have met together,
And Joy diffuses round her morn
A mist of golden weather.

II.

As o'er her cheek of delicate dyes,
The blooms of childhood hover,
So do the tranced and sinless eyes,
All childhood's heart discover,
Full of a dreamy happiness,
With rainbow fancies laden,
Whose arch of promise glows to bless
Her spirit's beauteous Adenn.

III.

She is a being born to raise
Those undefiled emotions,
That link us with our sunniest days,
And most sincere devotions;
In her, we see renewed, and bright,
That phase of earthly story,
Which glimmers in the morning light
Of God's exceeding glory.

IV.

Why in a life of mortal cares,
Appear these heavenly faces,
Why on the verge of darkened years,
These amaranthine graces?
'Tis but to cheer the soul that faints,
With pure and blest evangels,
To prove if Heaven is rich with Saints,
That earth may have her Angels.

V.

Enough! 'tis not for me to pray
That on her life's sweet river,
The calmness of a virgin day,
May rest, and rest for ever;
I know a guardian Genius stands,
Beside those waters lowly,
And labors with immortal hands,
To keep them pure and holy.

 Mr. Hayne printed a second volume, Sonnets and Other Poems, in 1857, and a third in 1859, entitled: Avolio, a Legend of the Island of Cos, with Poems Lyrical, Miscellaneous, and Dramatic. He wrote a number of fiery, sensational poems during the late civil contest, some of which were reprinted in Simms' War Poetry of the South. Legends and Lyrics, a volume which contains some pleasing versifications of ancient myths and tales, appeared in 1872. It was followed by an affectionate tribute to the memory of a gifted friend, in The Poems of Henry Timrod, Edited, with a Sketch of the Poet's Life, by Paul H. Hayne, 1873.

 THE PRESENTIMENT.

Over her face, so tender and meek,
The light of a prophecy lies,
That hath silvered the red of the rose on her cheek
And chastened the thought in her eyes.

Beautiful eyes, with an inward glance
To the spirits' mystical deep;
Lost in the languid gleam of a trance
More solemn and saintly than sleep.

It hints of a world which is alien and dim,
Of a nature that hovers between
The discord of earth and the seraphim's hymn,
On the verge of the spectral — unseen;

And forever and ever she seems to hear
The voice of a charmer implore,
"Come! enter the life that is noble and clear,
Come! grow to my heart once more!"

And forever and ever she mutely turns
From a mortal lover's sighs;
And fainter the red of the rose flush burns,
And deeper the thought in her eyes.

The seeds are warm of the churchyard flowers,
That will blossom above her rest,
And a bird that shall sing by the old church
towers,
Is already fledged in its nest.

And so when a blander summer shall smile,
On some night of soft July,
We'll lend to the dust her beauty awhile,
'Neath the hush of a moonless sky.

And later still shall the churchyard flowers
Gleam nigh with a white increase;
And a bird outpour, by the old church towers,
A plaintive poem of peace.

 THE TWO SUMMERS.

There is a golden season in our year
Between October's hale and lusty cheer
And the hoar frost of Winter's empire drear,

Which, like a fairy flood of mystic tides
Whereon divine Tranquillity abides,
The kingdom of the sovereign Months divides:

Then wailing Autumn winds their requiems cease,
Ere Winter's sturdier storms have gained release,
And earth and heaven alike are bright with peace.

O Soul! thou hast thy golden season too!
A blissful interlude of birds, and dew,
Of balmy gales, and skies of deepest blue!

That second Summer when thy work is done,
The harvest hoarded, and the Autumn sun
Gleams on the fruitful fields thy toil hath won;

Which also, like a fair mysterious tide
Whereon calm Thoughts like ships at anchor ride,
Doth the broad Empire of thy years divide.

This passed, what more of life's brief path remains

Winds through unlighted vales, and dismal plains,
The haunt of chilling blights, or fevered pains.

Pray then, ye happy few along whose way
Life's Indian Summer pours its mellow ray,
That ye may die ere dawns the Evil Day;

Sink on that Season's kind and genial breast,
While Peace and Sunshine rule the cloudless West,
The elect of God whom Life and Death have blessed.

 MY SON WILL.

Your face, my boy, when six months old,
We propped you laughing in a chair, —
And the sun-artist caught the gold
Which rippled o'er your waving hair!
And deftly shadowed forth the white
That blooming cheek, that roguish smile,
Those dimples seldom still:
The tiny, wondering, wide-eyed elf!
Now, can you recognize yourself
In that small portrait, Will?

I glance at it, then turn to you,
Where in your healthful ease you stand,
No Beauty, — but a youth as true,
And pure as any in the land!
For Nature, through fair sylvan ways,
Hath led and gladdened all your days,
Kept free from sordid ill;
Hath filled your veins with blissful fire,
And winged your instincts to aspire,
Sunward, and Godward, Will!

Long-limbed and lusty, with a stride
That leaves me many a pace behind,
You roam the woodlands, far and wide,
You quaff great drafts of country wind;
While tree and wildflower, lake and stream,
Deep shadowy nook, and sunshot gleam,
Cool vale and far-off hill,
Each plays its mute mysterious part,
In that strange growth of mind and heart
I joy to witness, Will!

"Can this tall youth," I sometimes say,
"Be mine? my son?" it surely seems
Scarce further backward than a day,
Since watching o'er your feverish dreams
In that child-illness of the brain,
I thought (O Christ, with what keen pain!)
Your pulse would soon be still, —
That all your boyish sports were o'er,
And I, heart-broken, never more
Should call, or clasp you, Will!

But Heaven was kind, Death passed you by;
And now upon your arm I lean,
My second self, of clearer eye,
Of firmer nerve, and sturdier mien;
Through you, methinks, my long-lost youth
Revives, from whose sweet founts of truth,
And joy, I drink my fill:
I feel your every heart-throb, know
What inmost hopes within you glow, —
One soul's between us, Will!

Pray Heaven that this be always so!
That ever on your soul and mine
Though my thin locks grow white as snow, —
The self-same radiant trust may shine; —

Pray that while this, my life, endures,
 It aye may sympathize with yours
 In thought, aim, action still;
 That you, O son (till comes the end),
 In me may find your comrade, friend,
 And more than father, Will!

HAMILTON COLLEGE, NEW YORK.

THE founding of Hamilton College is due to the far-seeing generosity of the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, who labored more than forty years as a missionary among the Oneida Indians. Mr. Kirkland was born in Norwich, Connecticut, December 1, 1744, and was graduated from Nassau Hall in 1765. He was the father of three sons and three daughters. The eldest daughter, who was married to John H. Lothrop, Esq., of Utica, is the mother of the Rev. Samuel Kirkland Lothrop, D.D., of Boston, whose recently published life of his grandfather is embraced in Sparks's Library of American Biography. The youngest daughter, Eliza, was married in 1818 to the late Rev. Edward Robinson, D.D., a professor in the Union Theological Seminary of New York. One of his sons, Dr. John Thornton Kirkland, was elected in 1810 to the Presidency of Harvard College. He and his brother, George Whitfield, were twins, and were born at General Herkimer's, on the Mohawk, while their mother was journeying on horseback from Oneida to Connecticut. Her return to Oneida was greeted by the Indians with great rejoicing. They adopted the boys into their tribe, calling George La-gu-ne-ō-sta, and John Ali-gan-o-wis-ka, which means fair-face.

Mr. Kirkland died of pleurisy, February 28, 1808. He was buried in Clinton, in a private inclosure, near his house. Here on one side rest the remains of his second wife and youngest daughter; on the other side, those of the celebrated Skenandoa. The ownership of the Kirkland mansion has passed out of the family. At a late Annual Meeting of the trustees of the institution which he founded, they voted to remove the coffin; from these grounds to the College Cemetery, and to erect over them an appropriate monument.

It was through the influence of Mr. Kirkland that the "Hamilton Oneida Academy" was incorporated in 1793. In the same year he conveyed to its trustees several hundred acres of land. In the preamble to the title-deed, he states that the gift is made "for the support of an Academy in the town of Whitestown, county of Herkimer, contiguous to the Oneida Nation of Indians, for the mutual benefit of the young and flourishing settlements in said county, and the various tribes of confederated Indians, earnestly wishing that the institution may grow and flourish; that the advantages of it may be extensive and lasting; and that, under the smiles of the Lord of wisdom and goodness, it may prove an eminent means of diffusing useful knowledge, enlarging the bounds of human happiness, aiding the reign of virtue, and the kingdom of the blessed Redeemer."

Among the teachers of the academy was Dr. James Murdock, lately a resident of New Haven, and translator of Mosheim's "Historical Commentaries on the State of Christianity."

The academy lived eighteen years, and was largely patronized. At length its guardians were pressed with a demand from the surrounding community for a higher institution. The charter for Hamilton College was obtained in 1812, and Dr. AZEL BACKUS of Bethlem, Connecticut, was elected its first President. He was born near Norwich, Connecticut, October 13, 1765. In early life his companions were rude, if not dissolute; and his youth was marked with great looseness of opinion on matters of religion. He was graduated from Yale College in 1787. After leaving college he was associated for a time with his class-mate, John H. Lothrop, Esq., in the management of a grammar-school at Weathersfield, Connecticut. He was licensed to preach in 1789, and soon after succeeded Dr. Bellamy as pastor of the church in Bethlem, Connecticut. Dr. Backus died December 9, 1816, of typhus fever. One of his children, Mary Ann, was the first wife of the Hon. Gerrit Smith of Perton; another, the Hon. F. F. Backus, was a distinguished physician in Rochester, New York.

A volume of Dr. Backus's sermons was published after his death, with a brief sketch of his life. His biography yet remains to be written in a manner worthy of the part which he sustained in caring for the first wants of a college which has since identified itself with the educational interests of Central New York. A careful memoir, written somewhat after the manner of Xenophon's Memorabilia or Boswell's Johnson, would be welcomed by many readers. In his intercourse with students, Dr. Backus combined affectionate severity with a sea-ning of manly eccentricity. The proverb, "who makes a jest makes an enemy," was reversed in his experience. He was out-spoken and fond of a joke. When speaking of that which he disapproved, his thoughts naturally clothed themselves in the language of ridicule. He was quick and pungent at repartee, as is shown by the following anecdote, which is only one out of many which might be given.

During the administration of Jefferson, Dr. Backus preached a Thanksgiving Sermon at Bethlem, in which his abhorrence of the political views of the day was expressed with characteristic freedom and severity. For thus daring to speak the truth, he incurred a civil prosecution, and was summoned by the sheriff to go with him to Hartford, there to await his trial. As a matter of grace, the reverend prisoner was allowed to ride in his own conveyance, while the officer followed behind. The parson's horse happened to be one of the fastest. He picked over the miles with a rapidity that astonished the sheriff, while it kept him at a respectable distance in the rear. At length, with much ado, the latter managed to bring himself within tongue-shot; and leaning forward, exclaimed, "Why, Doctor Backus, you ride as if the very devil were after you!"

"And so he is!" replied the doctor, without turning his head.

The second President of Hamilton College was Dr. HENRY DAVIS, an alumnus of Yale College, who had been a tutor at Williams and Yale, a Professor of Greek at Union, and President of Middlebury. His administration covered a period of sixteen years, during which the College fluctuated between the extremes of prosperity and depression.

Hamilton College.

In the years 1829 and 1830, no students were graduated. This was owing to a long and bitter quarrel between Dr. Davis and a portion of the trustees, growing out of a case of discipline. After his resignation of the presidency in 1833, Dr. Davis published a thick pamphlet entitled, "A Narrative of the Embarrassments and Decline of Hamilton College." This, with one or two occasional discourses, is all that went from his hand to the printer's. Dr. Davis was distinguished for his strength of purpose, his gravity of manners, unyielding integrity, and strong attachment to the pupils whom he had instructed. He died March 7, 1852, at the age of eighty-two.

The third President was Dr. SERENO EDWARDS DWIGHT, a son of Timothy Dwight. He was elected in 1833 and resigned in 1835. The great historical fact of his presidency was a successful effort to raise by subscription fifty thousand dollars, for increasing the productive funds of the college. Dr. Dwight was fitted by nature and acquired gifts for the triumphs of pulpit oratory. The failure of his health at first made him fitful in the happy use of his talents, and finally forced him to give up addressing public bodies or discharging public duties. His death occurred November 30, 1850. The last fifteen years of his life were saddened by his infirmity, and passed in retirement. W. T. Dwight has written his biography.

The fourth president was Dr. JOSEPH PENNEY, a native of Ireland, and educated at one of its higher institutions. The reputation for learning, piety, and executive talent which he had won by his labors in the ministry at Rochester, New York, and Northampton, Massachusetts, led the friends of Hamilton to think that he was the man to preside successfully over its affairs. The fact that he was unacquainted with the internal peculiarities of an American College caused him to make some mistakes, disquieting to himself and the institution. He chose to resign in 1839. He lived many years; broken in health, yet enjoying the unabated esteem of his friends. His publications are somewhat numerous, yet mostly of a transient form and character.

The fifth President, Dr. SIMON NORTH, is a native of Berlin, Connecticut, and a graduate of Yale College, of the class of 1825. He served his Alma Mater two years as a tutor, and in 1829 was elected to the chair of Ancient Languages in Hamilton College. When he went to Clinton, the embarrassments of the institution were such as to threaten its life. The war between Dr. Davis and the trustees was raging fiercely. There were but nine students in all the classes. The treasury was empty. Debt and dissension covered the future with gloomy clouds. The Faculty now consisted of the President, Prof. James Hadley, Prof. John H. Lothrop, Prof. North, and Tutor E. D. Makbie. They engaged zealously and unitedly in efforts to revive the institution, and to regain for it the public confidence. They were successful.

In 1833, when Dr. Davis resigned, the graduating class numbered twenty.

In 1839, Dr. North was elected to the Presidency, as the successor of Dr. Penney, an office which he held till 1857. The friends and pupils of President North have frequently expressed their appreciation of his public efforts, by requesting permission to publish them. If his published discourses and addresses were collected, they would form a large volume. The most important of these are a series of Baccalaureate Sermons; discourses preached at the funerals of Professor Catlin, Treasurer Dwight, and President Davis; an Inaugural Discourse, a sermon before the Oneida County Bible Society, and an oration before the Phi Beta Kappa of Yale College.

To Hamilton College is conceded a high rank in the culture of natural and effective elocution. Much credit is due, in this respect, to the teachings of the Rev. Dr. Mandeville, who filled the chair of Rhetoric and Oratory eight years, commencing in 1841. His class book entitled "The Elements of Reading and Oratory," first published in 1845, is now widely used in colleges, academies, and high-schools. Dr. Mandeville's system of speaking was taught at Hamilton, with some decided improvements by Professor A. J. Upson, D. D.

Hamilton College has not been forgotten by men of liberality and large means. The Hon. Wm. Hale Maynard, a graduate of Williams College, and a gifted lawyer, who died of the cholera in 1832, bequeathed to the college the bulk of his estate, amounting to twenty thousand dollars, for the founding of a Law Department.

Prof. John H. Lathrop, lately Chancellor of the University of Wisconsin, was the first occupant of this chair. It was long worthily filled by Prof. Theodore W. Dwight, whose able instructions in legal science attracted students from remote sections of the country. The college confers the degree of LL. B. upon those who complete the regular course of legal studies.

Another benefactor of the college, the Hon. S. Newton Dexter, resided at Whitesboro, and enjoyed the satisfaction of seeing a centre of learning made more thrifty and efficient through his liberality. What Mr. Maynard did by testament, Mr. Dexter chose to do by an immediate donation. In 1836, when the college was severely crippled by debt, he came forward with a gift of fifteen thousand dollars for endowing the chair of Classical Literature. This department is supposed to have been chosen as the object of his munificence, not more from its acknowledged importance in a collegiate institution, than on account of his esteem for the character and scholarly attainments of its then incumbent, the Rev. Dr. North, who was afterwards promoted to the Presidency.

The department of Classical Literature is now occupied by Professor Edward North, L. H. D., a highly accomplished scholar and man of letters, to whom we are indebted for the material of this sketch. He succeeded Professor John Finley Smith in 1844. Professor Smith was a musical artist of rare gifts and attainment.

The grounds about the college have been recently enlarged and improved. They now embrace twenty acres, which have been thoroughly drained, hedged, planted with trees and flowering shrubs, and put into lawn, with winding drives and gravelled walks. These improvements have been made under the conviction that no seat of generous culture can be called complete, unless it provides facilities for the study of vegetable growths. Plato's College was a grove of platanus and olives,—philosophy and trees have always been fond of each other's company. The location of the college, on the brow of a hill that slopes to the East, and commands a wide view of the Oriskany Valley, is healthful and inviting. In this valley lies the village of Clinton, with a population of twelve hundred. In the distance, to the left, the city of Utica, the valley of the Mohawk, and the Trenton hills are distinctly visible.

The rural quiet of the place, its elevation, and extended, unbroken horizon, render it most favorable for astronomical observations. An Observatory has been erected, and furnished with a telescope, the largest in this country next to the one at Cambridge. It was made by Messrs. Spencer and Eaton of Canastota, who are alumni of the institution. A large Laboratory has been built, with the new apparatus which the French and German chemists have recently invented. A stone building, originally used as a boarding-hall, has been fitted up for a Cabinet, and now contains ten thousand specimens in Geology, Mineralogy, and Natural History. A Gymnasium has also been built and attractively furnished.

The last twenty years in the history of Hamilton College have been fruitful in evidences of growth, of achieved usefulness, and a vigorous purpose on the part of its officers to make it, in all respects, worthy of its central location and its religious origin.

In 1858, Dr. C. H. F. Peters, a graduate of the University of Berlin, entered upon his duties as director of the observatory. One of his undertakings has been to determine the exact longitude of various places in the State of New York, under the direction of the Regents of the University of which Dr. S. B. Woolworth is secretary. These determinations have been made with great care and accuracy by means of a telegraphic communication with the observatory at Cambridge, Massachusetts. The places whose longitude has been thus far determined are Buffalo, Syracuse, Elmira, and Ogdensburg. Dr. Peters has discovered eighteen asteroids during his connection with the Litchfield Observatory. He also fills the chair of Astronomy, endowed by Edwin C. Litchfield, LL. D., of Brooklyn.

In July, 1858, Rev. Samuel Ware Fisher, D. D., a graduate of Yale College, in the class of 1835, was called to the presidency, as the successor of Dr. Simeon North, who had previously resigned. Dr. Fisher was called from the Second Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, where he had won a national reputation as a vigorous and versatile writer, an eloquent preacher, and a most successful pastor. His "Three Great Temptations," a volume of lectures to young men, and other occasional addresses, had indicated a special aptitude for the intellectual and religious duties of a college president. In his Inaugural Discourse, delivered November 4th, 1858, President Fisher foreshadowed a new system of biblical study, that was soon after introduced at Hamilton College, and was followed by the founding of the Walcott professorship of the Evidences of Christianity. This fund of $30,000 was given partly by Benjamin S. Walcott, a great-hearted manufacturer, who died in New York Mills, January 12th, 1862, and partly by William D. Walcott, his son and worthy successor in the largest business interest in Oneida County.

In January, 1859, Dr. N. W. Goertner entered upon his duties as the college commissioner, to which he has since devoted himself, with results equally honorable to himself and the patrons of liberal and Christian culture, who have so freely responded to his appeals in behalf of the college. Among the benefactions recently received, in addition to the Walcott endowment, are $20,000 for the Robinson professorship of Greek, subscribed in New York and Brooklyn, and so named in honor of Dr. Edward Robinson, a distinguished alumnus, who died in December, 1863; also $23,000 for the Albert Barnes professorship of intellectual and moral philosophy, subscribed in Philadelphia, and so named in honor of another distinguished alumnus; and $20,000 for the Kingsley professorship of logic, rhetoric, and elocution, subscribed in Utica, and so named in honor of the largest donor, Mr. Charles C. Kingsley, a graduate in the class of 1852. Large bequests have also been received from John C. Baldwin, of Orange, N. J.; Samuel F. Pratt, of Buffalo, and Peter B. Porter, of Niagara Falls; as well as donations from Hon. William E. Dodge, of New York, and Samuel A. Muson, Esq., of Utica. Ten thousand dollars were also given by John N. Hungerford, Esq., of Corning, for the improvement of South College.

In other respects, the college has received handsome additions to its material resources and facilities for instruction. The collections in natural history have largely increased under the direction of Professor Oren Root. The most attractive addition in this department, is the Sartwell Herbarium, presented by Hamilton White, Esq., of Syracuse, and well known in scientific circles as a very extensive and valuable exhibition of our North American Flora. It contains eight thousand samples of plants, carefully cured, classified, and labelled by Dr. H. P. Sartwell, of Penn Yan, during fifty years of botanical study, research, and correspondence.

Twelve prize competitions have been endowed by as many individuals, mostly alumni of the college, and have proved highly useful as incentives to industry and thoroughness of intellectual attainment. These prize funds were given by the late Hon. Aaron Clark, of New York; Hon. John V. L. Pruyn, LL. D., of Albany; Horace D. Kellogg, Esq., of Bridgewater; the late Hon. George Underwood, of Auburn; Frank H. Head, Esq., of Kenosha, Wis.; and Martin Hawley, Esq., of Baltimore, Md.

The library of the college has been generously remembered. After the death of Dr. Edward Robinson, the disposition of his private library became a matter of inquiry and interest to many of his friends, who were aware of its great value and richness in apparatus for biblical study. They thought it becoming that the library should go where Dr. Robinson had graduated, where he had served as a tutor, and where he had laid the foundation of his eminence as a biblical scholar. This good thought was quickly translated into generous action, and the Robinson library was purchased, presented to the college, and removed to its permanent home in Clinton. It embraces twelve hundred rare books and maps, such as the biblical scholar delights to be surrounded with. Apart from practical uses, the associations of this unique collection give it an almost sacred character.

After the death of William Curtis Noyes, LL. D., in December, 1864, it was found that he had bequeathed to Hamilton College his large law library, valued at $60,000, and containing nearly every work which a lawyer can appeal to in the history or practice of his profession. In making this bequest, Mr. Noyes was influenced by a natural and commendable desire that his name should be honorably associated with a prominent institution in the county where he had spent his boyhood and won his first laurels. The possession of the Noyes library rounds out the plan for a course of legal study in Hamilton College, as it lay in the mind of William H. Maynard, when he endowed the chair of law, history, and political economy, to the end that the "graduates of Hamilton College might become more useful as citizens of this republic." In this connection it may be added that in the year 1860, Ellicott Evans, LL. D., a graduate of Harvard College, was elected to the Maynard professorship, as the successor of Professor T. W. Dwight, LL. D., who had resigned to accept a similar position in the Columbia College Law School.

The Fiftieth Commencement of Hamilton College was celebrated on the 16th of July, 1862, with an address of welcome by Hon. William J. Bacon, an historical discourse by President Fisher, and a Jubilee Poem by Professor A. C. Kendrick, which were preceded and followed by other literary and social festivities.

 In July, 1866, Dr. Fisher resigned the presidency of Hamilton College, and accepted a call to the pastorate of the Westminster Church in Utica. A year later, a worthy successor was installed in the person of Dr. Samuel Gilman Brown, July 17, 1867. His inaugural address was a powerful exposition of the "Real Aim and Purpose of the American College."

Dr. Brown was born in North Yarmouth, Me., in January, 1813. His father, the Rev. Dr. Francis Brown, was president of Dartmouth College, N. H., from 1815 to 1820. The son entered that college in 1827, and graduated in 1831. He studied theology where he completed his course in 1837. He then passed nearly two years in travelling in Europe, extending his tour to Greece, Egypt, and Palestine. While abroad, he was elected professor of oratory and belles-lettres in Dartmouth College, which office he held from 1840 to 1863, when he was transferred to the chair, which he occupied till 1867, of intellectual philosophy and political economy.

Dr. Brown is the author of numerous orations and addresses, review articles, lectures, &c., characterized by their philosophical tone and genuine literary spirit. In the notice of Dartmouth College, we have spoken of his commemorative discourses on Professors Haddock and Putnam. He has also published an interesting address, reviewing the history of the college, delivered before the society of the alumni, in 1855, and several other college addresses, including The Studies of an Orator; A Eulogy on Henry Clay; The Spirit of a Scholar; The Functions and Privileges of a Scholar in the Crisis of the State, before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Bowdoin College, in 1863. His review articles, contributed to the Biblical Repository, are: "Dr. Chalmers as a Preacher" (1837); "Ancient and Modern Greece" (1842); "John Wesley" (1843); and in the Bibliotheca Sacra, "The Ottoman Empire" (1859). He has written for the North American Review, on "Dante" (1846); "Bartlett's Dictionary of Americanisms" (1849); "Winckelman's Ancient Art" (1850); "Dana's Poems and Prose Writings" (1851); "Ruskin's Seven Lamps of Architecture" (1851); "De Quincey's Works" (1852); "Dr. Chalmers's Life" (1852); "Travellers in France" (1853); "Life and Writings of B. B. Edwards" (1853); "Life and Writings of Fisher Ames" (1855); "Sir Walter Scott" (1858).

President Brown is also the author of a volume of Biography of Self-Taught Men, published in Boston, in 1847; and of an elaborate Memoir of the Life of Rufus Choate, prefixed to the standard edition of his works, also edited by him, published by Messrs. Little & Brown, in 1862.

In addition to these publications, President Brown has written several Courses of Lectures, which are unpublished. One of these embraces "The Earlier English Literature;" another, on "British Orators," was delivered before the Lowell Institute, in Boston, in 1859, and has been repeated in New York and elsewhere.

He was called to be the orator on the occasion of the Dartmouth Centennial, and his able discourse was published in 1870, entitled: An Historical Discourse delivered before the Alumni of Dartmouth College, July 21, 1869, One Hundred Years after the Founding of that Institution.

The style of these various productions is full and equable. They are marked by a close analysis, an air of literary refinement, are candid and comprehensive, and are illustrated by the reading of a scholar and gentleman.

Since the accession of President Brown, various changes have occurred in the board of instruction. Rev. William N. McHarg resigned the Latin professorship in 1869. His successor was Prof. Abel G. Hopkins, on the Benjamin-and-Bates foundation. In the same year, Prof. Charles Avery tendered his resignation, after serving the college thirty-five years in the chair of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy. He was released from active duty, but was retained as an honorary member of the Faculty, with the title of Professor Emeritus. In 1868 Prof. Edward W. Root was elected to the chair of Agricultural Chemistry, on the Childs' foundation. His lamented death, two years later, was followed by the election of Prof. Albert H. Chester.

Dr. A. J. Upson in 1870, after a service of twenty-one years, resigned the Kingsley professorship of Logic, Rhetoric, and Elocution. His successor, Prof. Samuel D. Wilcox, retired at the end of two years, owing to ill health. The present incumbent, Prof. Henry A. Frink, was elected in June, 1872.

After the resignation of Dr. Avery, his department was divided, and Prof. Chester Huntington was elected to the chair of Natural Philosophy. In 1871 Dr. John W. Mears of Philadelphia, the late efficient editor of The American Presbyterian, was elected Albert Barnes Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy.

In October, 1872, James Knox, LL. D., while a sojourner in Berlin, Germany, presented Hamilton College with $10,000, for the improvement and permanent endowment of its Hall of Natural History. A part of this fund will be used for the preservation and enlargement of the collections in Natural History, which, under the fostering care of Prof. Root, have grown to be very valuable.

THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.*

THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA is situated in the County of Albemarle, Virginia, about one mile and a half west of the village of Charlottesville, and four miles in nearly the same direction from Monticello, which was the residence, and contains the tomb of Thomas Jefferson. It is built on moderately elevated ground, and forms a striking feature in a beautiful landscape. On the south-west it is shut in by little mountains, beyond which, a few miles distant, rise the broken and occasionally steep and rugged, but not elevated ridges, the characteristic feature of which is expressed by their name of Ragged Mountains. To the north-west the Blue Ridge, some twenty miles off, presents its deep-colored outline, stretching to the north-east, and looking down upon the mountain-like hills that here and there rise from the plain without its eastern base. To the east the eye rests upon the low range of mountains that bounds the view as far as the vision can extend north-eastward and south-westward along its slopes, except where it is interrupted directly to the east by a hilly but fertile plain through which the Rivanna, with its discolored stream, flows by the base of Monticello. To the south the view reaches far away until the horizon meets the plain, embracing a region lying between mountains on either hand, and covered with forests interspersed with spots of cultivated land.

This University is a State institution, endowed, and built, and under the control of the state. It owes its origin, its organization, and the plan of its buildings to Mr. Jefferson, who made it the care of his last years to bring it into being, and counted it among his chief claims to the memory of posterity that he was its founder.*

The Act of Assembly establishing the University of Virginia and incorporating the Rector and Board of Visitors, is dated January 25, 1819; and the University was opened for the admission of students March 25, 1825.

It is under the government of the Rector and Board of Visitors, by whom are enacted its laws, and to whom is committed the control of its finances, the appointment and removal of its officers, and the general supervision of its interests. The Visitors, seven in number at first, but afterwards increased to nine, are appointed every fourth year by the governor of the state, and the Rector is chosen by the Visitors from among their own number. The first Rector was Mr. Jefferson, followed in succession by Mr. Madison, Chapman Johnson, Esq., and Joseph C. Cabell, Esq.

* We have pleasure in presenting this view, from the competent pen of the former chairman of the Faculty, Dr. Gessner Harrison, of an institution the peculiar organization of which has been little understood.

* Among Mr. Jefferson's papers was found, after his death, the following epitaph:—

HERE LIES BURIED
THOMAS JEFFERSON.

AUTHOR OF THE DECLARATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE, OF THE STATUTE OF VIRGINIA FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM, AND FATHER OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

See Trucker's Life of Jefferson, ii. 497.

The University of Virginia.

The University of Virginia comprises nine schools, viz. I. Ancient Languages, in which are taught the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, with ancient history and literature. II. Modern Languages, in which are taught the French, Italian, Spanish, and German languages, and the Anglo-Saxon form of the English language, with modern history and literature. III. Mathematics, comprising pure and mixed Mathematics. IV. Natural Philosophy, comprising, besides the usual subjects, Mineralogy and Geology. V. Chemistry and Pharmacy. VI. Medicine, comprising Medical Jurisprudence, Obstetrics, and the Principles and Practice of Medicine. VII. Comparative Anatomy, Physiology, and Surgery. VIII. Moral Philosophy, comprising Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, Ethics, Mental Philosophy, and Political Economy. IX. Law, comprising also Government and International Law.

To each school is assigned one professor, except the school of Law, which has two. In the school of Ancient Languages, the professor is aided by two assistant instructors, and in Modern Languages and Mathematics by one each. In the Medical department there is a lecturer on Anatomy and Materia Medica, and a demonstrator of Anatomy.

The administration of the laws of the University, and their interpretation, is committed to the Faculty, consisting of the professors of the several schools and the chairman of the Faculty. The professors are appointed by the Board of Visitors. The chairman, who has little power beyond the general supervision of the execution of the laws, none over the schools, is chosen annually by the Board of Visitors from among the members of the Faculty, and receives as such a salary of five hundred dollars. The professors are responsible to the Board of Visitors alone for the proper discharge of their duties, and have intrusted to them, each in his own school, the conduct of its studies, subject only to the laws prescribing the subjects to be taught, the hours of lecture, and the method of instruction generally by lectures, examinations, and exercises, according to the nature of the subject.

The income of the University is derived chiefly from an annuity from the state of fifteen thousand dollars, subject of late years to a charge of about four thousand five hundred dollars for the benefit of thirty-two state students, who receive gratuitous instruction, together with board and room rent free; from rents of dormitories and hotels; from matriculation fees; and from surplus fees of tuition in the several schools, accruing to the University after the professor shall have received a maximum of two thousand dollars.

Each professor is paid a fixed salary of one thousand dollars a year, and receives the tuition fees paid by students for attending his lectures up to the maximum of two thousand dollars. Any excess of fees above this sum is paid into the treasury of the University. The fee paid by students for tuition is ordinarily twenty-five dollars to each professor attended. This mode of compensation, making the income of the professor to depend so largely upon tuition fees, was designed to act as an incentive to activity and faithfulness on the part of the professor, his own and the prosperity of the school being identified in the matter of emolument as well as of reputation. The maximum limit of income from fees received by the professor is a thing of late adoption, introduced since the number of students attending some of the schools has become very large. It remains to be seen whether this invasion of the principle is the wisest mode of disposing of the question of excessive fees; especially when no provision is made for a minimum income, and none, for the most part, for excess of labor from large numbers frequenting a school.

The method of instruction is by lectures and examinations, with the use of text-books selected by the professor. The professor is expected, so far as the nature of the subject allows it, to deliver lectures on the subjects of instruction, setting forth and explaining the doctrines to be taught, so that by the help of the lectures and of the text-book, the student may not only have the opportunity of understanding these doctrines but of having them more vividly impressed on his attention and memory. The examination of the class at each meeting upon the preceding lecture, embraces both the text and the teaching of the professor, and is aimed at once to secure the student's attention to both, and to afford the advantage of a review, and, when needed, of a further clearing up of the subject.

For the purpose of accommodating the lectures to the wants and previous attainments of the students, and of giving a larger course of instruction, most of the schools are divided into classes called junior and senior. In the school of Mathematics there is also an intermediate class, and a class of mixed Mathematics. In the school of Law also there is an intermediate class. The lectures to each class occupy an entire session of nine months. A student is generally allowed, except in law, to attend, without additional fee, all the classes in a school the same session, so as to receive instruction, if he choose and be able, in the whole course in one year.

Two public examinations of all the members of each school are held every session, one about its middle, the other at its close. These examinations are conducted chiefly in writing. A set of questions, with numerical values attached, is proposed to the whole class, and its members are distributed into four divisions, according to the value of their answers. To insure fairness at these examinations, every student is required to attach to his answers a declaration in writing, that he has neither given nor received aid during the examination. This same certificate is attached also to all examination papers written for degrees.

Students are admitted at and above the age of sixteen, and are free to attend the schools of their choice; but they are ordinarily required to attend three schools.

The session is of nine months' duration continuously, and without any holidays except Christmas-day. Lectures are delivered during six days of the week, and a weekly report is made to the chairman of the Faculty by each professor of the subjects of the lectures and examinations in his school, and of the time occupied in each.

Degrees are conferred in each of the schools of the University upon those students who give evidence of having a competent knowledge of the subjects taught in the school. Certificates of proficiency also are bestowed for like knowledge of certain subjects that may be attended separately, as Medical Jurisprudence, Mineralogy, Geology, &c. Examinations are held with a view to these honors towards the end of each session, and are conducted mostly in writing. The extent and difficulty of these examinations, and the strictness used in judging of the value of the answers, secure a standard of attainment much higher than usual, and render the degrees in individual schools objects of ambition to all, and strong incentives to diligence and accuracy in study. A register of each student's answers at the daily examinations, and of his written exercises, is kept by the professor; and, in deciding on his fitness to receive a degree, regard is had to his average standing in his class. The time of his residence as a student is not counted among his qualifications for this distinction. He may obtain a degree, whenever he shall have proved that he is worthy of it by standing satisfactorily the examinations proposed as a test equally for all.

Besides the degrees conferred in individual schools, and certificates of proficiency in certain subjects, the degree of Bachelor of Arts is bestowed on such students as have obtained degrees in any two of the literary schools (viz. Ancient Languages, Modern Languages, and Moral Philosophy), and in any two of the scientific schools (viz. Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and Chemistry); besides giving evidence of a certain proficiency in the remaining two academical schools, and furnishing an essay or oration to be approved by the Faculty.

The degree of Master of Arts is conferred upon such students as have obtained degrees in all the six academical schools, besides furnishing an essay or oration to be approved by the Faculty, and standing a satisfactory examination in review on all the studies of the course, except those in which he has been admitted to degrees in the current session.

No honorary degrees are conferred by this University.

The University of Virginia has been in operation thirty years, and although it has had to contend with some prejudices, has had a good degree of success, as well in regard to the numbers frequenting it as to the character for scholarship accorded to its alumni. The number of matriculates entered for the session of 1854-5 was five hundred and fourteen; of these three hundred and twenty were exclusively academical, one hundred and fifty-six exclusively professional, and thirty-eight partly academical and partly professional.

The University of Virginia has introduced into its constitution and into its practical working some marked peculiarities; and as its apparent success has called attention to these, it may be well to notice some of them briefly, and to state summarily the chief grounds upon which they are approved and justified.

1. The first and most striking peculiarity is the allowing every student to attend the schools or studies of his choice, only requiring ordinarily that he shall attend three; the conferring degrees in individual schools; the suffering candidates to stand the examinations held for degrees without regard to the time of residence; and the bestowing no degrees as honorary distinctions, but only upon adequate proof made by strict examination, that they are deserved.

This at once sets aside the usual college curriculum, with the attendant division into Freshmen, Sophomore, &c., classes, and, in the opinion of some, is followed as a necessary consequence by the loss to the student of a regular and complete course of study and of mental discipline, which they assume to be given by the usual plan of our colleges. It is taken for granted by such that the student, being free to choose, will attend such studies alone as may suit his spirit of self-indulgence, avoiding those which are difficult; and that the voluntary system does not admit of a regular course. It is said in answer, that the records of the University of Virginia show that the fact contradicts the assumption that the more difficult studies will be avoided, the schools of Ancient Languages and of Mathematics, for example, having always had a fair proportion of students. And that, although no student is compelled by law to follow a certain defined course, yet in practice, and by the influences of causes easily seen, a very large proportion do pursue a regular course; and that the University of Virginia holds out inducements to accomplish a complete course by establishing for its higher degrees a standard which makes them objects of very great desire. Further, as to the matter of a complete course of study and of mental discipline, it is said that it is too much to assume that the best way of securing the same is by the usual college curriculum and the division into freshmen, &c., classes, this being the very question in issue, and the system of independent schools and free choice of studies having been adopted with the very view of giving what the common plan does not; that the alleged evil effects of the voluntary system do not and ought not to follow; and that, on the contrary, it has decided advantages.

It is not pretended that every one entering the University of Virginia obtains a complete education. For some it is not necessary, however desirable, that they should become conversant with all the branches of a liberal education. And yet it is of great advantage to them and to society if they can be well trained in even a few departments of knowledge—those most suited to their wants or to their tastes. They should not be excluded from partial benefits of education because they cannot derive the highest.

And then, if an examination be made of the names of those who, in our Colleges and Universities generally, enter the Freshman or Sophomore classes, and of those who graduate, or pass through the senior class, it will be found that but few of the former are found among the latter, not more than about a fourth. And this, though it results inevitably from the very practice of admitting to degrees by classes, that of those who obtain the degree, much too large a proportion have really very moderate attainments, and could not possibly stand a strict examination on the whole or any considerable part of the course. So in the University of Virginia, a very small proportion obtain the highest degree, or fully accomplish the regular academic course, and beyond comparison a smaller proportion than on the usually adopted plan; and this because the standard is purposely made high. Admitting that this very small number is properly educated, the question to be answered is, Whether it be true, as alleged by some, that all those who come short of this complete course fail of obtaining an amount of knowledge, and especially a mental discipline, equal to that supplied by the common course?

To reach a satisfactory answer to this question it is to be observed, say the advocates of the voluntary system, first, that for the practical purposes of life, and for a right mental discipline, a small field of knowledge, thoroughly cultivated with a hearty energy, and by methods which set the student to thinking and inquiring for himself, is of incomparably more value than a large field cultivated in a negligent and superficial way. A man may study many things and have little sound knowledge and less vigorous training of the mind. A man may so learn a few things as to be able to direct his faculties with their utmost power to the accomplishment of any task.

Secondly, That to secure this energetic, self-propelling activity of the student, which is indispensably necessary to the best discipline of mind, and to the acquisition of habits of thorough and accurate investigation, two things mainly contribute. First, the waking up to an earnest spirit of inquiry and of thoroughness of investigation on the part of the student, by exciting and keeping erect his attention, and variously subjecting his powers to the proof by the lectures and by searching oral examinations; and, secondly, a high standard of examinations for honors, these being bestowed only upon satisfactory evidence of good attainments and capacity. Without the former condition the latter would be impossible; without the latter the former would be insufficient.

Thirdly, That the voluntary system offers peculiar advantages for fulfilling these conditions, which, however able the professors, the common system does not. The several schools being wholly independent, the standard of examinations for degrees may be placed as high as the means and mode of instruction, and what is fairly demanded by the true interest of the student, may allow. A person standing his examination for a degree in Latin and Greek will not be passed, though undeserving, for fear he may not secure his degree in the Mathematics, and so on. The honor being conferred upon reaching a comparatively high standard, and without the question of giving or refusing it being complicated by a regard to the regular progression of classes, it is comparatively easy to maintain the standard. It is one thing for a student to fail and be rejected upon the studies of a single school, the effect ceasing here, and quite another to be cast down in all his classes for failure on one study, with the result of postponing the period of his graduation for a whole year. But the common system allows no good alternative. No College, upon this system, can refuse to pass men who ought to be rejected; for then it consents, under multiplied difficulties, to reduce the ranks of the senior class to something like the proportion of those who obtain the Master's degree under the system adopted at the University of Virginia.

To answer, then, the question above proposed, it is alleged by its friends, that in the system adopted at the University of Virginia, the conditions for obtaining a good mental discipline and accurate knowledge are in some good degree, although imperfectly, fulfilled by the means of lectures, rigid examinations conducted chiefly in writing where degrees are concerned, and a comparatively high standard in conferring degrees. That, putting out of view the idle and those wanting capacity, and those who attend a single course of lectures, there remains a class of students, considerable in number, and respectable for talent and industry, who from lack of time and means, or for other cause, succeed in accomplishing only a partial course, obtaining degrees in some two or three schools, and attending lectures profitably in some one or two more in which they do not stand for degrees. And thus the number that go through such a course of study as, with the mode of instruction employed, involves a useful extent of knowledge and a sound discipline of mind, would seem to be in fair proportion to those who succeed in completing the usual College curriculum.

Again, there is a considerable class of students who aim at completing the entire course of literary and scientific studies, according to the scheme of the University of Virginia, but fail of entire success. But it does not follow, because they fail of obtaining the highest degree under a system with a higher standard for degrees, that they do not obtain as much of knowledge and of sound mental discipline as the same persons would have done if they had succeeded under a system with a lower standard. Under the one system they fail because the standard is high, under the other they would succeed because the standard is low. This on the supposition that the grade of instruction is the same. But it may be assumed that where the standard of examinations for degrees is higher, the grade of instruction also will be higher, and the training more vigorous. There must be some just relation between the teaching and the requirements for degrees. And so it may very well occur that a man shall be a better trained scholar failing under the one system than succeeding under the other.

The advocates of the system introduced at the University of Virginia not only deny that it is followed by the evil effects alleged, but urge, on the other hand, that it avoids, as it was designed to avoid, the obvious and acknowledged evils inherent in the usual course adopted of conferring degrees upon those who complete the curriculum, well nigh as a matter of course, and with but slight examination. They allege that when the standard is reasonably high, and maintained by rigid examinations, without regard to the time of residence, only a few, and those the most diligent and capable, can measure up to it. That to accommodate the standard to the measure of the whole, or nearly the whole of a class, it must be made much too low. That by admitting to the higher degrees those alone who can stand rigid examinations, and show good ability and accurate attainments, real value is given to the degrees, and the best exertions secured of those who seek them. That the use of lectures and oral examinations, in the ordinary course of instruction, affords a better means of disciplining the mind, of begetting habits of active and sustained attention, as well as of thorough investigation. That, as a result, there is obtained, under this system, a better training and a more thorough knowledge on the part of many who fail of success, than the other system ordinarily secures to those who succeed. And that the fact that only a very few obtain the Master's degree at the University of Virginia—some seven in the session of 1854—5 out of 350 exclusively academical students—only shows the extent and rigor of the examinations for this degree, there required by law and enforced in practice.

2. A second peculiarity of the University of Virginia is found in its method of instruction, more especially in the freer use of lectures, followed by oral examinations. Text-books are by no means discarded; but the professor is expected to go before and set in order the truths to be taught, marking their relations, stating their grounds, enlarging upon, explaining, confirming, correcting, and supplementing the text, as the case may require. Every lecture is preceded by an oral examination of the class on the preceding lecture and the corresponding text. And this examination is on the subject itself, whether discussed in the lecture or the text-book, and is conducted with reference to what ought to be held in regard to it, and not simply to what may have been said about it either in the lecture or in the text-book. This method, it is affirmed, is attended by two most beneficial results. First, it stimulates the professor to greater efforts to make himself wholly master of his subject, and to be qualified to view it on every side. It can hardly do less, seeing he is conscious that it is expected of him to exhibit himself as capable of presenting the doctrines belonging to his subject with clearness and force, and not merely of propounding questions on a text-book. He must needs give himself to his work with zeal and assiduity if he would meet the responsibility which his position imposes, or gain the reputation which it places within his reach. Secondly, it excites and maintains the interest and attention of the student a hundred fold. He not only shares the interest of the lecturer, which is one advantage of oral discourse, but finds it a necessity from which he cannot escape, if he would acquit himself well at the examination to follow, as his own self-respect and a regard for the good opinion of his teacher and fellows oblige him to wish to do, that he should give earnest heed to the words of the professor. Above all he learns to enter, with the professor for his guide, upon the serious and earnest investigation of the subject in hand in all its relations, if not from the simple love of truth, yet still because he knows that he may be required to render answers not furnished by the text, nor yet perhaps directly by the lecture, but involved in the principles set forth in either. Thus he is aroused to a spirit of active and manly inquiry, is kept awake to all that he hears and reads, and is led to consider the proper knowledge of a subject to be bounded, not by the partial, perhaps false teachings of a text-book, but by the limits of the true and real. Under the strong impulse of such a spirit, and of the ambition to meet the demands of a standard of examinations for degrees which more fail than succeed in reaching, it is no wonder that he works, and works with an energy, with a sharpness of attention, and with a perseverance of industry, which bring a double reward in stores of solid knowledge and in invaluable habits of mind.

3. A third peculiarity of the University of Virginia is the system of written examinations for honors. This is claimed to have the advantage of securing greater accuracy and fairness, and is regarded as indispensable for maintaining a high standard for degrees. It was introduced by the first professors from the practice of Cambridge University, England; and when supplemented by some oral examination, as the subject may demand, seems liable only to the objection of its great laboriousness to both student and professor.

In a word, whatever success the University of Virginia has had in giving intellectual culture, whether in the academical or professional departments, is mainly referred by its friends to the laborious industry and zeal in the immediate work of the lecture-room, displayed by professors and students alike. These, again, are very largely owing to the use of lectures, and of strict oral and written examinations, both having reference to a reasonably high standard for degrees. And for the introduction of these, the independent position of the several schools, and the free choice of studies, if not absolutely necessary, as they can hardly be said to be, are at least most favorable.

4. A fourth peculiarity is the absence of sectarian influence and control in the University. Much prejudice did arise on this point. Although the importance of man's religious duties was acknowledged in a report of the Rector and Board of Visitors, written by Mr. Jefferson, and although the invitation was given by the Board to the various religious denominations in the state, to establish schools of theology on the grounds of the University, yet because, in the anxiety to shut out the control of any particular sect, no provision was made for religious instruction by the University itself, very many believed that it was designed altogether to exclude religious influence from the institution. A plan, however, was adopted early in the history of the University, whereby the services of religion are regularly performed in a chapel furnished by the Board of Visitors, yet without invading the principle of religious equality. By this plan it was provided that a Chaplain should be appointed by the Faculty every year, from the prevailing religious denominations of the state, taken in rotation. Subsequently the appointment was made for two years. The salary of the Chaplain is provided by the voluntary contributions of the professors, students, and other residents. He holds divine service twice every Sabbath, and daily morning prayers in the chapel. These services all the students are invited to attend; but they are not compelled to be present. As many as attend depart themselves with invariable order and reverence. Besides these services, the students have their own public prayer-meeting, and a society for missionary inquiry, and conduct the Sunday school connected with the chapel, and others in the neighborhood. Nowhere, it is said, is more respect paid to the solemn services of the Christian religion, and in no community is more effectually extinguished the spirit of sectarian bigotry.

5. A fifth peculiarity relates to the discipline. Only one point can be noticed, namely the permitting of students to answer or not, as they may choose, in their own case; the not compelling them to testify against themselves or against each other; and, generally, the assuming that they are incapable of falsehood, and treating them accordingly. The result is, that, as a rule, hardly admitting an exception, no student can venture to speak falsely. He may decline to answer, when charged with an offence against the laws, although he very rarely does; but if he answer, the public sentiment, if not his own sense of moral obligation, will oblige him to speak truly.

For carrying into execution the plan of a University which he had projected, Mr. Jefferson considered it wisest to rely upon men as little as possible wedded to the prevalent system, and not likely to be cramped by its routine. A reform in regard to the extent as well as the mode of instruction, could be had only by seeking men of marked ability in their several departments, and who had either enjoyed the advantages of the foreign universities of most repute, or won distinction by their talent and attainments. To this view was owing the selection from abroad of a majority of the original corps of professors. This policy, naturally enough, excited some prejudice; and although justified by the necessities of the case, as far at least as a reform in the course of instruction was concerned, was attended by its own difficulties touching the important point of discipline. It was not intended to be continued beyond the present exigency, and has not, in fact, been followed in the subsequent appointments to chairs in the University, although it is admitted to be consistent with the interests of the institution to employ the best talents and attainments, wherever found conjoined with the other necessary qualifications. Of the eight original professors, five were from abroad, one from New York, and two from Virginia.

The first professor of the school of Ancient Languages was Mr. George Long, of England, a Master of Arts and Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. A man of marked ability and attainments, thoroughly trained in the system of his college, having a mind far more than most men's scrupulously demanding accuracy in the results of inquiry, and scouting mere pretension, he aimed and was fitted to introduce something better than what then passed current as classical learning. Although he had as yet little knowledge of comparative philology, and could hardly be said to have cultivated the science of language with the enlarged spirit of philosophy which pervades his writings; his uncompromising exactness, and his masterly knowledge of his subject, inspired his pupils with the highest conceptions of a true scholarship. After three years' service he resigned, in order to accept the professorship of Greek in the London University. His contributions to philology, Roman law, criticism, biography, &c., have been large and valuable.

He was succeeded by the second incumbent of the chair, Gessner Harrison, M.D., one of his pupils, who has published an "Exposition of some of the Laws of the Latin Language."

The first professor of the School of Modern Languages was George Blaettermann, LL.D., a German, at the time of his appointment residing in London, and who came recommended for his extensive knowledge of modern languages, and for his ability. He occupied the chair until 1840, and gave proof of extensive acquirements, and of a mind of uncommon natural vigor and penetration. In connexion more especially with the lessons on German and Anglo-Saxon, he gave to his students much that was interesting and valuable in comparative philology also, a subject in which he found peculiar pleasure. His successors have been Charles Kraitsir, M.D., who has published some curious and learned works on philology, and M. Schele de Vere, LL.D., the author of a work on Comparative Philology; a Spanish Grammar and Exercises; Stray Leaves from the Book of Nature, 1856; Studies in English, or A Glance at the Inner Life of Our Language, 1867; Americanisms, or The English of the New World, 1871; the Romance of American History, 1872; and Modern Magic, 1873. He has also edited several volumes of the "Illustrated Library of Wonders."

The first professor of Mathematics was Mr. Thomas Hewett Key, of England, a Master of Arts of Trinity College, Cambridge. Besides his ability as a mathematician, he had the advantage of good classical and general attainments, and by his earnest manner, his clearness of illustration, and his rare power of anticipating and removing the learner's difficulties, succeeded to a remarkable degree in gaining the attention and exciting the interest of his hearers. He resigned at the same time with Mr. Long, in order to accept the professorship of Latin in the London University, and has since gained distinction by his labors as a philologist.

He was succeeded by Mr. Charles Bonnycastle, of England, who, upon Mr. Key's resignation, was transferred from the chair of Natural Philosophy to that of Mathematics, which he continued to fill until his death in 1841. He was educated at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, of which his father was a professor, and was distinguished by the force and originality of his mind, no less than by his profound knowledge of mathematics. His fine taste, cultivated by much reading, his general knowledge, and his abundant store of anecdote, made him a most agreeable and instructive companion to all; and this, though his really kind feelings were partly hidden by a cold exterior. His only published work bore the title of Inductive Geometry, and this did not meet with success. Among his pupils, he left behind him a reputation for ability as high as it was universal.

His successor, Mr. Sylvester, of England also, who remained only part of one year, was followed by Mr. Edward H. Courtenay, LL.D., a native of Maryland, a graduate at West Point, and who had held a professorship in West Point Military Academy, and again in the University of Pennsylvania. He discharged the duties of the chair with eminent ability and faithfulness until his death in 1858. He left behind him a work on the Differential and Integral Calculus, which was subsequently published, and adopted as a textbook in the University of Virginia. Mr. Courtenay's clear and sagacious mind, his large and thorough knowledge of his subject, and clearness in communicating it, his laborious devotion to his duties, and not less his unswerving integrity, his retiring modesty, and his amiable condescension, won for him the unbounded confidence and regard of his colleagues and of his pupils.

The chair was filled in 1855 by Albert T. Bledsoe, a graduate of West Point, formerly a professor in the University of Mississippi, and the author of a work on the Will, and of one entitled A Theodicy.

Upon the transfer of Mr. Charles Bonnycastle from the chair of Natural Philosophy to that of Mathematics, he was succeeded by Robert M. Patterson, M.D., of Philadelphia, formerly a professor in the University of Pennsylvania, and subsequently director of the U. S. Mint. He filled the chair of Natural Philosophy for several years, and had the reputation of a clear, elegant, and able lecturer, while his refined manners, cultivated tastes, and amiable disposition, won for him the warm regard of all that had the pleasure of knowing him.

He was succeeded by Mr. William B. Rogers,

LL.D., who filled the chair until 1853; a gentleman deservedly eminent for his ability, varied learning and science, for his eloquence as a lecturer, and for his contributions to his favorite science of Geology. He resigned in 1853; and was succeeded by the present incumbent, Mr. Francis H. Smith, A.M., a Virginian, and an alumnus of the University.

The first professor of Chemistry was John P. Emmet, M.D., who was educated at the West Point Military Academy, and took his degree in medicine in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York city. He was born in Dublin, Ireland, and was the son of Thomas Addis Emmet, Esq. His striking native genius, his varied science, his brilliant wit, his eloquence, his cultivated and refined taste for art, his modesty, his warm-hearted and cheerful social virtues, won for him the admiration and lasting regard of his colleagues and of his pupils. He occupied the chair of Chemistry and Materia Medica until sickness and death closed prematurely, in 1842, a career not less useful than honorable.

He was succeeded by Robert E. Rogers, M.D., of Philadelphia, now professor of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, and by J. Lawrence Smith, M.D., of South Carolina, now professor in the Medical School at Louisville, Kentucky. The next incumbent of the chair was Socrates Maupin, M. D., of Virginia, formerly a professor in Hampden Sydney College, Virginia, and in Richmond Medical College, and an alumnus of the University of Virginia. He died in 1871.

The first professor of Medicine was Robley Duglison, M.D., of England, who as a writer, and by his learning in his profession and generally, as well as by his ability, was pointed out as well fitted to take charge of this school, when it was designed rather to afford the opportunity of cultivation in medical science to the general student than to give a preparation for the practice of the profession. After eight years he resigned, and has gained a wide celebrity by his distinguished ability as a lecturer, and by his varied and valuable contributions to medical literature. He died in 1869.

His successors have been A. T. Magill, M. D., of Virginia, Robert E. Griffith, M. D., of Philadelphia, and a later incumbent, Henry Howard, M.D., of Maryland, formerly a professor in the medical department of the University of Maryland, all men of learning and ability in their profession.

The chair of Anatomy, Physiology, and Surgery (now of Comparative Anatomy, etc.) has been added to the original schools of the university, and is now filled by James L. Cabell, M.D., a Virginian, and an alumnus of the university. He was preceded by Augustus L. Warner, M.D., of Maryland, afterwards a professor in the Richmond Medical College.

Special Anatomy and Materia Medica are taught by John S. Davis, M.D., an alumnus of the University.

The chair of Moral Philosophy was first filled by Mr. George Tucker, a native of Bermuda, but educated at William and Mary College, Virginia. He was for many years a member of the legal profession, and for some time a member of Congress from Virginia. Before receiving his appointment to the chair by Mr. Jefferson, he had published, among other writings, a volume of essays, characterized by the purity and elegance of style, and by the force and clearness of thought, which have marked all his writings. During his residence at the university he published the Life of Jefferson, an essay on Money and Banks, one on Rents, Wages, and Profits, and another on the Progress of the United States in Population and Wealth during a Period of Fifty Years, as Exhibited by the Decennial Census, besides contributing to the periodicals of the day, as he has done since his retirement, important articles on questions of political economy, etc. To moral philosophy and the other subjects originally assigned to the chair, he caused rhetoric, belles-lettres, and political economy to be added, and gave them their proper value in the course of study in the school. Bringing to the discharge of his duties a mind remarkable for clearness and accuracy, great industry and thoroughness of research, and an extensive knowledge of men, and of books in almost every department of learning, he allowed no topic to pass under review without investing it with the interest of original and searching investigation. Hence his pupils derived not only profit directly from his instructions, but an impulse in the direction of self-culture of the utmost value.

He was succeeded, upon his resignation in 1845, after a service of twenty years, by the present incumbent, the Rev. William H. McGuffey, D.D., LL.D., a native of Pennsylvania, but for many years a popular professor in different colleges of Ohio.

The first professor of Law, that entered upon the duties of the chair, was John Tayloe Lomax, Esq., of Virginia, who, after some five years, resigned the chair to accept the office of judge of the Circuit Court of Virginia. He is the author of works of much labor and value, entitled a Digest of the Law of Real Property and the Law of Executors and Administrators.

He was succeeded by John A. G. Davis, Esq., of Virginia, who met an untimely end by the hands of a murderer, in the person of a student, in the year 1840. He was the author of a work on the criminal law, and was distinguished alike by his legal attainments and ability as a lecturer and by his virtues as a man.

The chair of Law was next filled by Judge Henry St. George Tucker of Virginia, who had long occupied with distinguished ability the place of president of the Court of Appeals of the state, and was as remarkable for the elegant graces of his well stored mind as for his learning and acumen in his peculiar province of the law, and for the polish and charm of his life and manners. He was the author of two volumes of Commentaries on the Laws of Virginia, etc.

The present incumbents of the two chairs of Law, into which the original school has been divided, are John B. Minor, LL. D., and S. O. Southall, LL. D., both of Virginia, and both alumni of the university.

 The University of Virginia escaped material injury during the late contest, and with the return of peace has recovered most of its former prosperity. During the session of 1871-2, 365 students were in attendance in its various schools, now nearly twenty in number. Its faculty consisted of fifteen professors, with the professorship of Natural History and Agriculture vacant, besides three instructors. Charles S. Venable, LL. D., professor of Mathematics, was chairman of the Faculty. Its library, originally selected and arranged by Mr. Jefferson, contained 35,000 volumes. A department of Scientific and Practical Agriculture was founded in 1869, by a bequest of $100,000 from the late Samuel Miller, of Lynchburg. An Experimental Farm was secured, and several scholarships created as prizes for experimental investigations.

 FRANCIS SAMUEL DRAKE.

FRANCIS SAMUEL DRAKE is the eldest son of Samuel G. Drake, the historical writer and antiquarian. He was born at Northwood, New Hampshire, February 22, 1828. His education was received in the public schools of Boston, and at the bookstore of his father in that city. For some years, and until 1870, he was a bookseller and stationer at Leavenworth, Kansas. His leisure moments were occupied in collecting materials for an American biographical dictionary. He was engaged in that task for fifteen years. The completed work appeared in February, 1872, from the press of James R. Osgood & Co., and was entitled, Dictionary of American Biography, including Men of the Time. This royal octavo volume of 1020 pages contained nearly ten thousand notices of Americans, of both sexes, who have made their names known in art, science, literature, politics, or history. A thorough examination of its articles in relation to recent literature enables us to certify to its general accuracy and its comprehensiveness. Its style is clear, concise, and unassuming.

After a brief visit to Great Britain, France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium and Holland, between the months of May and November, 1872, Mr. Drake began the preparation of two works which in the year following were issued from the press: one, a Memorial Volume for the Massachusetts Society of the Cincinnati, containing biographical sketches of its members; the other, a Life of Major General Henry Knox, from the original papers, containing some new historical matter about the men and events of the Revolution.

 SAMUEL ADAMS DRAKE,

A BROTHER of the preceding, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, December 20, 1833. He was educated at the public schools of his native city. In 1858 he removed to Kansas, as the telegraphic agent of the New York Associated Press. He was the regular Kansas correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, the Louisville Journal, and a newspaper of Memphis. For a short period, during the absence of the editor of the Leavenworth Times, he acted as editor of that journal.

On the organization of the militia of Kansas, at the outbreak of the rebellion, Mr. Drake was appointed inspector and adjutant general, with the rank of colonel, on the staff of the Major General of the Northern Division. He served at various times with the militia on garrison and active duty within the State. He commanded the post of Paola, in southern Kansas, during the invasion of Missouri by Sterling Price, and took part in that campaign. At the close of the war, he had attained the military rank of brigadier-general.

In 1871 Mr. Drake returned to Massachusetts, and he now resides at Melrose. His Old Landmarks and Historic Personages of Boston, was published in 1872 (12mo., pp. 484, with illustrations). It has been characterized as one of the most entertaining books of the class to which it belongs, and has had a large sale.

TRINITY COLLEGE.

THE charter of Washington (now Trinity) College, in Connecticut, was obtained in 1823. It was given at the request of members of the Protestant Episcopal Church. At several intervals in the earlier history of the state, application had been made to the Legislature for a charter without success. It was requisite that thirty thousand dollars should be subscribed as an endowment. Fifty thousand were readily obtained, "by offering to the larger towns the privilege of fair and laudable competition for its location, when Hartford, never wanting in public spirit and generous outlays, gained the victory over her sister cities." The college buildings were commenced at Hartford in June, 1824, and recitations were held in the autumn of the same year. The first president of the institution was the Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Connecticut, Dr. Thomas C. Brownell, who held the station for seven years, till 1831. On his retirement he was succeeded by the Rev. Dr. N. S. Wheaton, who presided over its fortunes for five years, till 1837. The Hobart Professorship of Belles-Lettres and Oratory was endowed at this time in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, subscribed by members of the Episcopal Church in New York. In 1835 more than one hundred thousand dollars had been raised for this institution, ninety thousand of which had been given by individuals. The state made a grant of eleven thousand dollars. The next incumbent of the presidency was the Rev. Dr. Silas Totten (later professor of William and Mary), who at the time of his choice was professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the college. His administration lasted twelve years, during which the endowment of the Seabury Professorship of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy was completed and Brownell Hall erected. In 1845 the title of the college was changed, by an act of the legislature, to Trinity College. In this period statutes were enacted by the trustees, modelled after a feature in the English universities, "committing the superintendence of the course of study and discipline to a Board of Fellows, and empowering specified members of the Senatus Academicus, as the House of Convocation, to assemble under their own rules, and to consult and advise for the interests and benefit of the college."* The object of this general external organization was to secure the co-operation and counsel of the alumni of the institution, all of whom are members of the House of Convocation, which includes the president, fellows, and professors. The Board of Fellows is composed of leading men in the church specially interested in the welfare of the college. They are the official examiners, report on degrees, and propose amendments of the statutes to the trustees. There are also a chancellor and vicer, who superintend the religious interests: an office which has been thus far filled by the bishop of the diocese.

Dr. Totten, on his retirement, was succeeded in 1849 by the Rev. John Williams, a descendant of the family which gave the Rev. Elisha Williams as a president to Yale. Two years after Dr. Williams was elected assistant bishop of the diocese of Connecticut.

In 1854 the Rev. Dr. Daniel Rogers Goodwin, formerly professor of modern languages at Bowdoin, succeeded to the presidency.

Many eminent men have been connected with the institution as professors and lecturers. The Rev. Dr. S. F. Jarvis held a professorship of Oriental Literature; Horatio Potter, now bishop of the diocese of New York, of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy—a professorship held also by Mr. Charles Davies, author of the extensive series of mathematical text-books generally in use throughout the country. The Rev. Dr. Thomas W. Coit, the learned author of Puritanism, or a Churchman's Defence against its Aspersions by an Appeal to its Own History, has been professor of Ecclesiastical History; and the Hon. W. W. Ellsworth, professor of Law.*

 In 1860, Dr. Goodwin resigned the presidency to become provost of the University of Pennsylvania. He was succeeded by Samuel Eliot, LL.D., author of the History of Liberty. Four years later the latter was followed by Dr. John Barrett Kerfoot, who was consecrated Bishop of Pittsburg in 1866. Rev. Abner Jackson, LL.D., was inaugurated president in June, 1867.

The trustees of Trinity College recently sold its present site of thirteen acres—originally in the country, but now within the limits of the city of Hartford—to the city authorities, for the erection of a State House. The price paid was six hundred thousand dollars in cash, with the privilege of continuing to occupy the main buildings for a term of five years. The trustees, who do not expect to build for several years, have several appropriate locations under consideration, and intend to purchase for forty-two to ninety-five acres. It is designed to place the new college buildings within an ornamental park; and President Jackson has lately devoted several months in Europe to the study of collegiate architecture, that the authorities may be aided in the erection of a group of buildings that shall, in convenience and beauty, be unsurpassed by other structures.

In all respects, Trinity College is flourishing,

* We are indebted for the materials of this notice of Trinity College to the excellent Historical Address pronounced before the House of Convocation of Trinity College, in Christ Church, Hartford, in 1851, by the Rev. E. E. Beardsley, rector of St. Thomas's Church, New Haven, and from time to time in the Churchman's Almanac.

Its faculty* embraces a corps of fourteen professors and four lecturers. Its library contains about ten thousand volumes, and has for its steady increase the income from an aggregate fund of twenty-seven thousand dollars. A number of scholarships exist for the benefit of indigent students, besides numerous prizes open to general competition. The triennial catalogue of 1872 states the whole number who have received degrees at 967, of whom 758 are living. Its alumni reach 649, with 518 survivors, and 226 of its graduates have entered the ministry.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

THIS institution owes its origin to the exertions of a few gentlemen of the city of New York, among whom were the Rev. J. M. Mathews, afterwards Chancellor of the University, and the Rev. Jonathan M. Wainwright, of whom we have already spoken. A pamphlet was prepared after several conversational discussions of the plan, which was printed with the title, "Considerations upon the Expediency and the Means of Establishing a University in the City of New York." This was read at a meeting of the friends of education, held on the sixth of January, 1830, in the building since known as the New City Hall, and adopted as an expression of the views of the assembly. A charter of incorporation was obtained in 1831, by which the government of the University was confided to a Council of thirty-two members, chosen by the stockholders of the institution, with the addition of the Mayor and four members of the Common Council of the city.

The University of the City of New York.

The University commenced its instructions in October, 1832, with seven professors and forty-two students, in rooms hired for the purpose in Clinton Hall. The first class, consisting of three students, was graduated in 1833, and the first public commencement held in 1834 in the Middle Dutch Church in Nassau street.

Steps were immediately taken for the erection of a suitable edifice, and the edifice was commenced in July, 1833, and so far completed as to be occupied in 1836. It was formally dedicated "to the purposes of Science, Literature, and Religion," on the twentieth of May, 1837. The building occupies the front of an entire block of ground, facing the Washington Parade Ground, and was the first introduction, on any considerable scale, of the English collegiate style of architecture. It contains, in addition to a large and elaborately decorated chapel, and spacious lecture halls, a number of apartments not at present required for the purposes of education, a portion of which are now occupied by the valuable library of the New York Historical Society and the American Geographical Society. The erection of this building, and the period of commercial depression which followed its commencement, weighed heavily on the fortunes of the young institution. By the devotion of its professors, however, who continued to occupy their respective chairs at reduced salaries, its instructions have been steadily maintained. Various appeals to the public for pecuniary aid have been liberally responded to, and by a vigorous effort on the part of the active Chancellor, the Rev. Isaac Ferris, the long pressing incubus of debt has been entirely removed.

The foundations of the institution were laid on a broad and liberal basis, contemplating instruction in every department of learning, with the exception of a school of theology, this omission being made to avoid any charge of sectarianism. A large number of professors were appointed, among whom the institution had the honor of numbering S. F. B. Morse, whose early experiments in the departments of science which have since given him a fame as enduring and extended as the elements he has subjected to the service of his fellow men, were made during his connexion with the University. The course of instruction has, however, thus far, with the exception of a Medical School, been confined to the usual undergraduate collegiate course.

The first Chancellor of the University was the Rev. JAMES M. MATHEWS, D.D., who, for many years preceding his appointment, had occupied a prominent position among the clergy of the Dutch Reformed Church in the city of New York. He rendered good service to the institution by his unwearying labors in the presentation of its claims to public attention, and bore his full share of the difficulties attending its early years. He was succeeded by the Hon. THEODORE FRELINGHUYSEN, late president of Rutgers College, in which connexion he has already been spoken of in these pages. After his removal from the University to Rutgers in 1850, the office he had filled remained vacant until 1853, when the highly efficient and respected incumbent, the Rev. ISAAC FERRIS, a clergyman of the Dutch Reformed Church, and at the head of the Rutgers Female Institute, was appointed.

In the list of the first professors we meet the names of the Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, afterwards Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ohio, Henry Vethake, and the Rev. Henry P. Tappan, both of whom have been at the head of important seats of learning, and the Rev. George Bush, all of whom have received notices at an earlier period of our work. With these were associated for a short time, the distinguished mathematician, David B. Douglas, LL.D., and Dr. John Torrey, one of the most eminent botanists of the country, and a leading member of the Lyceum of Natural History of New York, the American Association of Science, etc. Dr. Torrey died in New York city, March 10, 1873.

*Dr. Jackson published in 1871 a Baccalaureate Sermon on the Holy Scriptures, the Teacher of Wisdom. Prof. John Brocklesby, LL. D., is the author of Elements of Physical Geography, 1868, and Elements of Astronomy, revised edition, 1870. Prof. Thomas R. Fyncheon, D. D., has issued An Introduction to Chemical Physics, 1872.

Lorenzo L. Da Ponte was at the same time appointed Professor of the Italian Language and Literature, and retained the office until his death in 1840. He was the son of Lorenzo Da Ponte, an Italian scholar, forced from his native country on account of his liberal political opinions, and author of an agreeable autobiography, Memorie di Lorenzo Da Ponte Da Ceneda, published in New York in three small volumes in 1823. Professor Da Ponte was a man of liberal culture and great amiability of character, and author of a history of Florence and of several elementary works of instruction on the Italian language.

In 1836, Isaac Nordheimer was appointed Professor of the Hebrew and German languages. He was a man of great learning, and author of a History of Florence and of a Hebrew Grammar, in use as a text-book in our theological Seminaries. He continued his connexion with the institution until his death in 1842.

The Rev. Cyrus Mason was appointed Professor of the Evidences of Christianity in 1836, and occupied a prominent position in the Faculty and business relations of the Institution until his retirement in 1850.

In 1838 Tayler Lewis was appointed Professor of the Greek Language and Literature, and the Rev. C. S. Henry of Moral Philosophy. The first of these gentlemen has already been noticed in relation to his present sphere of labor at Union College.

Caleb Sprague Henry was born at Rutland, Massachusetts, and graduated at Dartmouth College, in 1825. After a course of theological study at Andover, he was settled as a Congregational minister at Greenfield, Mass., and subsequently at Hartford, Conn., until 1835, when he took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was appointed in the same year Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy in Bristol College, Pa., and remained in that Institution until 1837, when he removed to New York, and established the New York Review, the first number of which appeared in March, 1837. He conducted this periodical until 1840, when it passed into the hands of Dr. J. G. Cogswell, who had been associated in its conduct during the previous twelvemonth.

Professor Henry remained at the University until 1852. During this period, in addition to the active discharge of the duties of his chair, he published in 1845 an *Epitome of the History of Philosophy, being the work adopted by the University of France for instruction in the colleges and high schools. Translated from the French, with additions, and a continuation of the history from the time of Reid to the present day.

The original portion of this work is equal in extent to one fourth of the whole, and consists, on the plan of the previous portions, of concise biographies of the leading philosophical writers of modern Europe, with a brief exposition of their doctrines. Professor Henry has executed this difficult task with research and exactness. His work is a standard authority on the subject, and has received the commendation of Sir William Hamilton and other leading philosophers.

Professor Henry is also the author of The Elements of Psychology, a translation of Cousin's examination of Locke's Essay on the Understanding, with an introduction, notes, and appendix, published at Hartford in 1834, and New York in 1839; of a Compendium of Christ an Antiquities,* and of a volume of Moral and Philosophical Essays.† He has also published a number of college addresses,‡ mostly devoted to the discussion of his favorite subject of university education. The style of these writings, like that of his instructions, is distinguished by energy, directness, and familiar illustration.

During the years 1847-1850 Dr. Henry officiated as rector of St. Clement's Church, New York. Since his retirement from the University, he has resided in the vicinity of the city, and has been a frequent contributor to the Church Review and other periodicals of the day.

In 1860, a work was published anonymously by the Messrs. Appleton, the authorship of which, after some little discussion of the subject in the newspapers, was admitted to rest with the Rev. Dr. Henry. It was a genial book of home humors and out-of-door opinions, de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis, much after the manner of Southey's "Doctor," and was entitled, Doctor Oldham at Greystone's, and His Talk There. The book was lively, impulsive, and amusing in its discussion of social and political topics of the day, and brought the public in a conversational relation with the author, previously shared only by his most intimate friends. The humors of Dr. Oldham are kindly, and his thoughts suggestive and profitable.

In 1861, this production was followed by a collection of the author's graver philosophical essays, in a volume bearing the title, Considerations on Some of the Elements and Conditions of Social Welfare and Human Progress, being Academic and Occasional Discourses and other Pieces. The topics treated of are the importance of elevating the intellectual spirit of the nation; the position and duties of the educated men of the country; the true idea of the university; the historical significance of the acquisition of California; the Providence of God; the genius of human history; Young America and the true idea of progress; the

* Phila. 1837.

† New York, 1839.

‡ Principles and Prospects of the Friends of Peace, a discourse delivered in Hartford in 1834.

The Advocate of Peace. A Quarterly Journal, vol. 1, 1834-5. Importance of Exalting the Intellectual Spirit of the Nation; and the Need of a Learned Class. 2d Edition. New York: 1837. Delivered before the Phi Sigma Nu Society of the University of Vermont, August, 1836.

Position and Duties of the Educated Men of the Country. New York: 1840.

The Gospel a Formal and Sacramental Religion. A Sermon. 2d Edition. New York: 1846.

The True Idea of the University, and its Relation to a Complete System of Public Instruction. New York: 1853.

destination of the human race; President-making, in three letters to the Hon. Josiah Quincy, and the relations of politics and the pulpit. The temper of this volume is conservative, but it is a conservatism free from pedantry, and allied with progress in the future, according to the Divine government of the world, which is constantly bringing order out of confusion, and leading the race onward to a higher destiny. In the letters on "President Making," Dr. Henry points out the frustration of the plan under the Constitution of choosing the President, by the substitution of the direct vote of the people in place of the unfettered selection of a proper person by the body of electors; exhibits some of the prominent evils of this departure, and suggests as a remedy a diminution of the Government patronage, and the choice of the President by lot from the list of senators of the United States, under the direction of the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court and his associates. In the essay on "Politics and the Pulpit," he asserts the duty of the Christian ministry to instruct the people in those higher principles, and their application, which affect "the just exercise of their political rights." "It is infinitely important," he maintains, "that the sacred duties and the immense responsibilities inseparable from the possession of those rights, should be taught and practically enforced from the highest moral and Christian point of view," and the pulpit he finds the only adequate means of popular instruction in this light.

Dr. Henry is at present rector of an Episcopal congregation at Newburgh, on the Hudson. In 1868 he delivered an Address on History and its Philosophy, before the New York Historical Society, which was subsequently printed by the Society.

Benjamin F. Joslin, M.D., was appointed in 1838 Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy. He resigned his appointment in 1844. He is the author of several valuable papers on philosophical subjects, which have appeared in Silliman's Journal. He has also written frequently on medical topics, and is a prominent advocate of the system of Hahnemann.

In 1839 Dr. John W. Draper was appointed Professor of Chemistry. Dr. Draper is a native of England. He came to the United States in early life, and was graduated as a physician at the University of Pennsylvania in 1836. His inaugural thesis on that occasion was published by the Faculty of the institution, a distinction conferred in very few cases. Dr. Draper soon after became Professor in Hampden Sidney College, Virginia. He still remains connected with the University, and has contributed in an eminent degree to its honor and usefulness, by his distinguished scientific position, and the thoroughness of his instructions. Dr. Draper has devoted much attention to the study of the action of light, and was the inventor of the application of the daguerreotype process to the taking of portraits. He is the author of text-books on Chemistry and Natural Philosophy, of a large quarto work on the Influence of Light on the Growth and Development of Plants, of a large number of addresses delivered in the course of his academic career, and of numerous articles on physiological, medical, optical, and chemical subjects, which have appeared in the medical journals of this country and in the London and Edinburgh Philosophical Magazine. These papers, it is estimated, would, if collected, fill an octavo volume of one thousand pages. Several have been translated in France, Germany, and Italy. He is entitled from these productions to high literary as well as scientific rank, from the purity of style which characterizes their composition, and the frequent passages of eloquence and of genuine humor to be found at no long intervals in their pages.

Dr. Draper has been a member of the Medical Faculty of the University since its formation, and was appointed by the unanimous voice of his associates president of that body in 1851.

Mr. Elias Loomis, the author of several important scientific text-books, was in 1844 appointed Professor of Mathematics.

Professor Loomis is a graduate of Yale College, and was appointed Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in the University in 1844, having previously filled the same professorship in Western Reserve College, Ohio. He is the author of several volumes and papers on mathematics and astronomy.*

In 1846 Mr. George J. Adler was appointed Professor of the German language. Professor Adler was born in Germany in 1821, came to the United States in 1833, and was graduated at the University in 1844. He is the author of a German Grammar published in 1846, a German Reader in 1847, and a German and English Dictionary, in a volume of large size, in 1848. He has since, in 1851, published an abridgment of this work, and in 1853, a Manual of German Literature, with elaborate critical prefaces on the authors from whom the specimens contained in the volume have been taken.

In 1850 Professor Adler published an able metrical translation of the Iphigenia of Goethe. He is also the author of several articles on German and classical literature in the Literary World.

Since the retirement of Professor Adler from the New York University, in 1854, he was actively engaged as a classical instructor and author till his death at the Bloomingdale Insane Asylum, N. J., August 24, 1868. In 1858, he published at Boston A Practical Grammar of the Latin Language, with Perpetual Exercises in Speaking and Writing, for the use of Schools, Colleges, and Private Learners. In this work, which was well received and passed to a second edition the following year, the author has applied the principles and method of his edition of Ottendorff's German Grammar to instruction in the Latin tongue, by a progressive series of oral exercises, supplying an ample vocabulary, and educating the student at once in the speaking, writing, and construction of the language. With the advantages of the new method, the work combines instruction in the old analytical rules. In 1860, Professor Adler published in New York, by subscription, in an octavo volume, a translation from the French, The History of Provençal Poetry, by C. C. Fauriel, late Member of the Institute of France. This was prefaced by an original critical introduction, from the pen of Professor Adler, with the addition of various learned notes. It was an attractive subject to the editor, this study of mediæval romance, and he was happily enabled to pursue it to advantage, amid the recently acquired European stores of the Astor Library in New York. In 1861, Professor Adler published, in pamphlet form, A Fragment of Text Notes on the Agamemnon of Æschylus, and in 1862 delivered in New York a course of biographical and critical Lectures on Roman Literature, including a survey of the origin of the language, and a general review of the several departments of authorship. During the last few years, Professor Adler had, among other studies, devoted himself to a critical study of Goethe's life-long work, his great poem of Faust, investigating its literary history, and elucidating, particularly in the second part, its learned and philosophical difficulties. In 1864, he delivered a series of lectures on this subject in New York, which would form, if published, an interesting contribution to the already considerable stores of Faust literature. In 1866-8 he published two pamphlets: Wilhelm von Humboldt's Linguistical Studies, and Poetry of the Arabs of Spain: A Lecture.

* Elements of Algebra, 12mo., pp. 280. A Treatise on Algebra, 8vo., pp. 336. Elements of Geometry and Conic Sections, 8vo., pp. 525. Trigonometry and Tables, 8vo., pp. 314. Elements of Analytical Geometry, and of the Differential and Integral Calculus, 8vo., pp. 278. An Introduction to Practical Astronomy, with a Collection of Astronomical Tables, 8vo., pp. 437. Recent Progress of Astronomy, especially in the United States.—He has contributed to the Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, nine memoirs relating to Astronomy, Magnetism, and Meteorology; and to the American Journal of Science and Arts from twenty to thirty papers on various questions of science. The Proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science also contain a number of his papers, and several have appeared in other periodicals.

In 1852 Mr. Howard Crosby was appointed Professor of Greek. Mr. Crosby was born in the city of New York and was graduated at the University in 1814. Visiting Europe a few years after, he made an extensive tour in the Levant, the results of which were given to the public in a pleasant and scholarly volume, in 1851.* In the following year he published an edition of the Ælipus Tyrannus of Sophocles.

Dr. Ferris, the late Chancellor, had the pleasure of making the last payment on the debt of this institution, which amounted to seventy thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, on the 14th June, 1854.

Immediately after, the council proceeded to carry out the great aim of the institution, by measures for organizing the school of art, the school of civil engineering, and the school of analytical and practical chemistry. The first was placed in charge of Prof. Thos. S. Cummings, N. A., well known among us as first in his department of art; the second of Prof. Rich. H. Ball, A. M., an alumnus; and the third of Dr. John W. Draper, whose reputation is world-wide, and who has since given to the scientific world another great work, prepared with great labor and care, entitled History of the Intellectual Development of Europe, and which has already been translated into several European languages. This work, of rare philosophical acumen and singular felicity of style, has been followed by another of similar character, entitled Thoughts on the Future Civil Policy of America, in which the author develops and illustrates his theories of national growth and progression. Subsequently, Dr. John C. Draper and Dr. Henry Draper, the sons of Dr. John W. Draper,* have been associated with him, and the work of the school is conducted according to the best foreign modes of similar schools. The sons brought with them from a careful visitation and examination of foreign laboratories, made in 1856, all that could be of value here, and they have accordingly secured as the result unusual facilities for their students. Dr. Henry Draper has at once secured a high position by his photography of the moon, which has called out the admiration of the scientific. The Smithsonian Institution has honored him by the publication of an exposition of his work in the volume of its proceedings for 1864.

Rev. Henry M. Baird, A. M., son of the late Dr. Robert Baird, an alumnus, has succeeded to the Greek chair. Having spent some time in Greece, he is peculiarly qualified for his department, and is enabled to illustrate the archæology and topography of Greece from his stores of original information. He spent several years in the department of Greek instruction in the College of New Jersey with eminent success. He has published Modern Greece; a Narrative of a Residence and Travels in that Country, with Observations on its Antiquities, Literature, Language, Politics, Religion (New York, 1856).

 In 1870 Dr. Ferris, at his own request, was relieved of the duties of office and constituted Emeritus Chancellor, while Professor Howard Crosby, D. D., LL. D., was elected Chancellor. Besides the works previously enumerated, Dr. Crosby has of late years written various scholarly books. These comprise: The New Testament, with Brief Explanatory Notes or Scholia, 1863; Bible Manual, 1870; Jesus, His Life and Work as Narrated by the Evangelists, 1870; The Healthy Christian, 1871, a series of bracing essays treating of the vital duties of the Christian life; Thoughts on the Decalogue, 1873.

A distinct scientific department was created in 1871, thus making four departments in all in the University—Arts, Science, Medicine, and Law. In the first two of these tuition fees were abolished, and instruction made free to all worthy of admission. These notable changes doubled the number of students in the departments of Science and Arts. The salaries of the professors were also increased, by the liberality of its friends; and its council in 1872-3 was engaged in raising a new endowment of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the permanent enlargement of the course of study. The law school was reorgan-

* In 1867-8 appeared Dr. J. W. Draper's History of the American Civil War, in three volumes. In this able work he discussed, in an impartial spirit, the leading political questions which had agitated the country for half a century, and thus presented a philosophical history of the late Rebellion. His philosophical works have been lately translated into the French, Italian, German, and Russian languages.

* Land of the Moslem, a Narrative of Oriental Travel, by El Mukattem.

ized in 1870, with a new faculty of five professors, having Judge Henry E. Davies, LL. D., at its head.

Independent of the Chancellor, the faculty of the University contained twenty-seven professors in 1872. Samuel Finley Breese Morse, LL. D., the world-famed inventor of the electric telegraph, and professor of Literature of Arts of Design, died in that year, still attached to the institution which only stood second in the labors of his life—April 2, 1872.

Three fellowships, of three hundred, two hundred, and one hundred dollars respectively, to be enjoyed for one year after graduation by the most meritorious students in the department of Arts, have been established, the use of which is conditioned on examinations during the fellowship year.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN owes its foundation to an act of Congress of 1826, which appropriated two entire townships, including more than forty-six thousand acres of land, within what was then a territory, "for the use and support of a university, and for no other use or purpose whatever." When Michigan became a state the subject engaged the earnest attention of its legislators. An organization was recommended in 1837 in the report of the Rev. J. D. Pierce, the first superintendent of public instruction, and the first law under the state legislation establishing "The University of Michigan" was approved March 18th of that year. In this act the objects were stated to be "to provide the inhabitants of the state with the means of acquiring a thorough knowledge of the various branches of literature, science, and the arts." A body of regents was to be appointed by the governor of the state, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The governor, lieutenant-governor, judges of the Supreme Court, and chancellor of the state, were ex-officio members. Three departments were provided: of literature, science, and the arts; of law, and of medicine. Fifteen professorships were liberally mapped out in the first of these; three in the second, and six in the third. The institution was to be presided over by a chancellor. An additional act located the University in or near the village of Ann Arbor, on a site to be conveyed to the regents free of cost, and to include not less than forty acres.

An important question soon arose with the legislature in determining the policy of granting charters for private colleges in the state. Opinions on the subject were obtained from Dr. Wayland, Edward Everett, and others, who agreed in stating the advantage of forming one well endowed institution, in preference to the division of means and influence among many. The legislature did not adopt any exclusive system, though the obvious policy of concentrating the state support upon the University has been virtually embraced.

A system of branches or subsidiary schools in the state, intermediate between the primary school and the college, was early organized. They were to supply pupils to the University.

The first professor chosen, in 1838, was Dr. Asa Gray, now of Cambridge, in the department of botany and zoology. Five thousand dollars were placed at his disposal for the purchase of books in Europe at the commencement of the University library. This secured a collection of nearly four thousand volumes.

Dr. Houghton was also appointed professor of geology and mineralogy. The mineralogical collection of Baron Lederer of Austria was purchased, and added to the collections in geology, mineralogy, botany, and zoology, made within the geographical area of Michigan by the state geologist and his corps.

The income of the University, partaking of the embarrassments of the times, scanty and uncertain, and mainly absorbed in the erection of the buildings and the support of the branches, was not in 1840 sufficient for the full organization of the main institution. There were two hundred and forty-seven students in that year in the branches. In 1842 a portion of the money expended on these schools was withdrawn, and devoted to the faculty of the still unformed university. Professors of Mathematics and of Latin and Greek were appointed.

In the report of the regents of 1849 it appears that there were thirty-eight students in the department of literature and sciences, under the charge of seven professors. No chancellor had been as yet appointed. Each of the professors presided, on a system of rotation, as president of the faculty.

It was not till December, 1852, that Dr. Henry P. Tappan, eminent as a writer on metaphysical subjects, the author of two treatises on the Will and a work on the Elements of Logic, and formerly professor of intellectual and moral philosophy in the University of the City of New York, was inaugurated the first chancellor. The subject of university education had long employed his attention, and he studied its practical working in England and Prussia during a foreign tour, of which he gave to the public a record in his volumes entitled A Step from the New World to the Old. His inaugural address contained an able programme of the objects to be pursued in a true university course. He has since again visited Europe, further studied the workings of education in Prussia, and secured valuable acquisitions for the literary and scientific resources of the University. Among these were the instruments for a first class observatory, now established at the university by the liberality of the citizens of Detroit, over which an eminent foreign astronomer, Dr. Francis Brunnow, the associate of Encke at the Royal Observatory at Berlin, is now presiding.

The revision of the course of studies engaged Dr. Tappan's attention. It is now symmetrically arranged to include every object of a liberal education, with provision for expansion as the growing needs and resources of the institution may demand. The liberally endowed primary schools of the state, a system of associated or union schools in districts, the introduction of normal schools lead to the ordinary under-graduate course of the university, which it is proposed to extend by the introduction of lectures for those students who may wish to proceed further. A scientific course may be pursued separately, and the plan embraces instruction on agricultural subjects.

The following passages from Chancellor Tap-

pan's Report to the Board of Regents at the close of 1853 will exhibit the liberal spirit of the scholar which he brought to his work:—

The ideal character of the Prussian system must belong to every genuine system of education. We must always begin with assuming that man is to be educated because he is man, and that the development of his powers is the great end of education, and one which really embraces every other end. Especially is it important to hold this forth among a people like that of the United States, where the industrial arts and commerce are such general and commanding objects. In the immense reach of our material prosperity, we are in danger of forgetting our higher spiritual nature, or, at least, of preserving only a dim and feeble consciousness of it. We are in danger of becoming mere creatures of the earth—earthly, and of reducing all values to the standard of material utility. And yet man is good and happy only as his moral and intellectual nature is developed. He does not fill up the measure of his being by merely building houses for his comfortable accommodation, and by providing for himself abundance of wholesome food. He has capacities for knowledge, truth, beauty, and virtue also: and these, too, must be satisfied.

Besides philosophy, science, poetry, and the fine arts, in general, are no less essential to national existence and character than agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. In the first place, the latter could never exist in a perfect form without the former, since all improvement must be dependent upon knowledge and taste: and, in the second place, great principles widely diffused, and great men for the offices of the state and of society at large, and great deeds to signalize a nation's existence, and works of literature and art to convey the spirit of a people to other nations, and to the following generations, all depend upon the spiritual cultivation of the human being. Nay, farther, there is no country in which national existence and character will so depend upon this higher cultivation as in ours. Here are vast multitudes collected from other nations, as well as of native growth, thrown together in a breadth of territory whose resources dazzle the imagination, and, for the present, defy calculation. And these multitudes constantly increasing, and with so wide a field to act in, are in a state of freedom such as no people has ever before possessed. We are in a state approximating to absolute self-government. It is not the mere force of laws, and the executive authority of the officers of government, which can control and regulate such a people. We ourselves make and alter our constitution and laws. And laws when made become, in effect, null and void unless sustained by popular opinion.

It is the noblest form of government when a people are prepared for it, and a form which implies that they are prepared for it. It is a form which shows less of the outward form of government, because it supposes a people so enlightened and moral that they do not require it. Rational thought, the principles of truth and virtue, and an incorruptible patriotism, supersede a police, standing armies, and courts of justice. In such a state, it is at least demanded that the enlightened and the good shall predominate. As all this is implied in our constitution and laws, so, as wise men and true patriots, we must try to make it good. And to this end we require a higher education of the people than obtains in any other country. And on the same principle, we ought to have more philosophers, men of science, artists, and authors, and eminent statesmen—in fine, more great men than any other people. We want the highest forms of culture multiplied not merely for embellishment, but to preserve our very existence as a nation.

If we ever fall to pieces it will be through a people ignorant and besotted by material prosperity, and because cunning demagogues and boastful sciolists shall abound more than men of high intelligence and real worth.

The University is supported by the sale of the lands appropriated by the general government and by grants from the state. Students are admitted from all portions of the country on paying an initiation fee of only ten dollars for permanent membership. Room rent and the services of a janitor are secured by paying annually a sum varying from five to seven dollars and fifty cents—so that the instruction is virtually free.

A medical department is in successful operation.*

The number of under-graduate students in 1855 was two hundred and eighty-eight, including fourteen in the partial course, and one hundred and thirty-three in the medical department. Of these one hundred and forty-two were from Michigan; sixteen other states of the Union were represented; there were five students from Canada West, one from England, and one from the Sandwich Islands.

The University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, Michigan, has acquired a permanent prosperity, which places it in the front rank of universities, it being now the most numerously attended in the country. In 1863, the Rev. H. P. Tappan retired from the presidency, and the Rev. E. O. Haven, D. D., LL. D., was elected president. He had several years before been a professor in the same university, and was consequently well known to the people of the State, and was at the time of his election a member of the Massachusetts Board of Education, and chairman of the Joint Committee on Education in the Massachusetts Legislature.

In 1863 a new and elegant building for the department of law was erected, costing $25,000; and in 1865 the building appropriated to the department of medicine and surgery was enlarged, at an expense of $25,000, of which the city of Ann Arbor contributed $10,000. These additions to the property of the university have been made without encroaching upon its permanent funds.

The department of science, literature, and the arts, or the literary college, is peculiar in the great variety of courses of study allowed, while equal thoroughness is required in all, and no degrees are given causa honoris, but only after examination. The classical course is like that pursued by the oldest New England colleges, and graduates in it receive the degree of bachelor of arts. The scientific course requires more mathematics on admission, and also four years study in college, and substitutes English language, science, and modern languages for Greek and Latin. Those who complete it receive the degree of bachelor of science. Courses of study are prescribed for the degrees of master of arts and master of science. There are also special courses provided for those who wish to graduate as civil engineers and as mining engineers, and graduates and others prepared for it are aided by the professors in any special studies which they may wish to pursue. Many resort to the university to investigate thoroughly chemistry in the excellent laboratory, under the charge of Prof. S. H. Douglass; also mineralogy, geology, astronomy, &c., as great advantages are offered connected with the museums and astronomical observatory.

* Full information on the entire school system of the state will be found in an octavo volume, entitled System of Public Instruction and Primary School Law of Michigan, with Explanatory Notes, Forms, Regulations, and Instructions; a Digest of Decisions; a Detailed History of Public Instruction, etc. Prepared by Francis W. Shearman. Published by the state in 1862.

The department of Greek has been under the charge, since its special establishment in 1852; of Prof. James R. Boise, author of an edition of Xenophon's Anabasis, and of a work on Greek Prose Composition, and several other works.

Prof. Henry S. Frieze, who has the charge of the department of Latin, is also well known as the author of an edition of Virgil, and of Selections from Quintilian, an excellent text-book, not only for the study of Latin, but also of rhetoric. Prof. A. Winchell, member of the French Academy of Geology, has published a Report, as State Geologist of Michigan, and many scientific papers. Prof. Andrew White, of Syracuse, N. Y., who, as member of the Senate of New York, so greatly benefited the cause of education by his successful advocacy of the Cornell University, and is also well known for his literary productions, has given to large classes in this university courses of lectures on history, the professorship of which he has held in this university for several years. Prof. James C. Watson, now director of the observatory and professor of astronomy; Prof. De Volson Wood, who has charge of the school of engineering, and other members of the faculty, are frequent contributors to the periodicals devoted to the sciences in which they are respectively interested.

The department of medicine and surgery in this university has been of late the most largely attended medical college in this country. The provision made for it, in buildings and material, is ample. The faculty are numerous, and four lectures are given daily, with frequent examinations of the students, from the first of October to the last of March. The number of students has for several years ranged from three to four hundred and upward.

The department of law was opened in 1860, and has steadily increased in attendance. The course of study embraces two years (like the medical department), from the first of October to the last of March, and by lectures, examinations, moot-courts, the use of the library, &c., it aims to prepare the students for the practice of law in any part of the country.

DR. E. O. HAVEN, who has recently written a manual on Rhetoric, resigned the presidency of the University of Michigan in 1869, to accept that of the Northwestern University at Evanstown, Illinois. Prof. Henry S. Frieze served as acting-president till the inauguration, in 1871, of Dr. James Burrill Angell, late president of the University of Vermont.

The most important changes in this institution of recent years, were the establishment of the Pharmaceutical school in 1867, and the admission of women into all departments of the University three years later. The number of the latter in attendance in 1872 was sixty-four. Instruction was given to both sexes in common in all departments but that of Medicine. As the result of the experiment, President Angell reports: "Their presence has not called for the enactment of a single new law, or for the slightest change in our methods of government or grade of work."

In addition to its three departments—Literature, Science, and the Arts; Medicine and Surgery; and Law—another is in contemplation, a School of Technology. The increase of students has led to the erection of a stately University Hall, having a frontage of 347 feet, and crowned by a dome 140 feet in height from the ground.

Its professors have made numerous contributions to educational literature: Hon. Thomas M. Cooley, in Law; Dr. Benjamin F. Cocker in Philosophy, as in his able work on Christianity and Greek Philosophy, 1870; Dr. James C. Watson in Astronomy; De Volson Wood in Engineering; Dr. Henry S. Frieze in Latin; Prof. Moses Coit Tyler in Physical Culture, as in The Braunville Papers; and Dr. Alexander Winchell in Geology, as in his popular Sketches of Creation, 1870, and Geological Chart. The latter became Chancellor of the Syracuse University in 1873.

The whole number of students in the university, in 1872, was twelve hundred and twenty-four, of whom two hundred and seventy-nine were in the department of science, literature, and the arts; three hundred and fifty in the department of medicine and surgery, and three hundred and forty-eight in the department of law.

THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE.

THE NATIONAL INSTITUTE, at the seat of government at Washington, was organized in May, 1840, for the promotion of science and the useful arts, and to establish a National Museum of Natural History. The first directors were the late Joel R. Poinsett, then Secretary of War, the Hon. James K. Paulding, Secretary of the Navy, with whom were associated, as "Councillors," the Hon. John Q. Adams, Col. J. J. Abert, Col. Joseph G. Totten, Dr. Alexander McWilliams, and A. O. Dayton. Francis Markoe, Jr., was the early and efficient Corresponding Secretary. Sections were planned of geology and mineralogy, of chemistry, of the application of science to the arts, of literature and the fine arts, of natural history, of agriculture, of astronomy, of American history and antiquities, of geography and natural philosophy, of natural and political sciences.

Ex-President John Quincy Adams and Peter S. Duponceau, among others, took an active interest in its proceedings. An address was delivered by Mr. Poinsett in 1841, on its object and importance. The Association was incorporated in 1842 by the name of "The National Institute for the Promotion of Science."

Mr. Levi Woodbury, then a member of the Senate, was chosen to succeed Mr. Poinsett as President in 1845.

The first Vice-President of the Society was Mr. Peter Force, whose valuable services to the country, in the preparation of the Documentary History of the Origin and Progress of the United States, will secure him the gratitude of future ages. In 1855 he held the office of President, and the Corresponding Secretary was Mr. Joseph C. G. Kennedy. Mr. William W. Turner, formerly instructor in Hebrew in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, the associate of Dr. E. A. Andrews in the American adaptation of Freund's Latin-German Lexicon, and afterwards Librarian of the Patent Office at Washington, was the Recording Secretary of the Institute.

One of the objects of the Society, as the nucleus of a National Museum, was soon attained. The Secretary of War deposited a valuable collection of Indian portraits and curiosities. The Society fell heir to the effects, books, and papers, of a local "Columbian Institute for the Promotion of Arts and Sciences," the charter of which had run out. The collections were placed in the Patent Office, together with the objects of science sent home by the United States Exploring Expedition under Capt. Wilkes. The Institute also received many valuable additions to its library and Museum from France, through the agency of M. Vattemare; and numerous choice contributions from various distant parts of the world. Donations from all sides were numerous.

A special meeting or congress was held in April, 1844, to which scientific men were generally invited. An address was delivered by the Hon. R. J. Walker of Mississippi. Ten daily meetings were held, at which papers were read by men distinguished in science.

In 1845, an annual address was delivered before the Institute by the Hon. Levi Woodbury.

The publications of the Institute have been limited, for the want of pecuniary endowment. It has depended on the precarious subscriptions of members, and has languished with funds inadequate for its ordinary business purposes. Four Bulletins have been issued in 1841, 1842, 1845, and 1846. These contain many interesting notices of the growing activity of the country in the departments of science. The meetings of the Society, however, called forth many elaborate papers, which were read in public from time to time, and printed in the National Intelligencer.

The activity of the Institute has lately revived, chiefly through the exertions of a few of its members. The publication of a new series of Proceedings was commenced in 1855, and valuable papers were subsequently read at the meetings, which are held once a fortnight, from October to May, in the Agricultural Room of the Patent Office. The Library, which contains between three and four thousand volumes, with a considerable collection of maps, charts, and engravings, occupies a room in the same building. To these have been added a large and valuable collection of the crude and manufactured products of British Guiana, embracing all the woods of that country, in specimens of longitudinal and cross sections, numbering several hundred; all the fruits, seeds, medicinal roots, barks, models of houses, boats, furniture, manufactures of every kind, Indian curiosities, and implements, fibrous and textile fabrics, the birds (beautifully preserved), and a few of the quadrupeds. This collection was prepared, at very great expense, by a large number of the British residents of the colony, chiefly, it is believed, through the exertions of the late Consul of the United States, Mr. W. E. Dennison, and were designed first for exhibition at the New York Crystal Palace and afterwards to be deposited in the Federal Capitol.

Besides this, there has been added a large and valuable collection of British crude and manufactured products made by order of Her Majesty's Government, being a full duplicate of that exhibited at the London Crystal Palace in 1851, and also at the New York Crystal Palace.

*The National Institute was dissolved in 1858, and its effects were transferred to the Smithsonian Institution.

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

THE liberal founder of this institution was James Smithson, whose will making the bequest for its support, dated October 23, 1826, commences with the following paragraph:—"I, James Smithson, son of Hugh, first Duke of Northumberland, and Elizabeth, heiress of the Hungerfords of Audley, and niece of Charles the Proud, Duke of Somerset, now residing in Bentinck street, Cavendish square, do, &c." Mr. Smithson was the illegitimate son of a Duke of Northumberland. His mother was a Mrs. Macie, of an old family in Wiltshire, of the name of Hungerford. He was educated at Oxford, where he bore his mother's name. He distinguished himself by his proficiency in chemistry, and received an honorary degree at the university in 1786. He subsequently contributed a number of papers to the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society, of which he was a member, and to the Annals of Philosophy.* Provided with a liberal fortune by his father, he passed life as a bachelor, living in lodgings in London, and in the chief cities of the Continent. He was of feeble health and reserved manners.† At the time of his death in 1829 he resided at Genoa. His will provided that the bulk of his estate, in case of a failure of heirs to a nephew, should be given "to the United States of America, to found at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men."

By the death of the nephew without heirs in 1835, the property devolved upon the United States. The testator's executors communicated the fact to the United States Chargé d'Affaires at London, by whom it was brought to the knowledge of the State Department at Washington. A message on the subject was sent to Congress by

* An anecdote of Smithson's chemical pursuits has been preserved by Mr. Davies Gilbert, President of the Royal Society, in an address to that body in 1830.—"Mr. Smithson declared, that happening to observe a tear gliding down a lady's cheek he endeavored to catch it on a crystal vessel, that one-half of the drop escaped, but having preserved the other half, he submitted it to re-agents, and detected what was then called microcosmic salt, with muriate of soda, and, I think, three or four more saline substances, held in solution."

† Letter from the Hon. Richard Rush to the Hon. John Forsyth, London, May 12, 1833. Eighth Annual Report, Smithsonian Institution, p. 163.

The Smithsonian Institution.

President Jackson, December 17, 1835. A Committee of the House of Representatives, of which John Quincy Adams was chairman, was appointed to examine the subject. In accordance with their report, Congress passed an act, July 1, 1836, authorizing the President to assert and prosecute with effect the right of the United States to the legacy, making provision for the reception of the fund by the Treasury, and pledging the national credit for its faithful application, "in such manner as Congress may hereafter direct." Mr. Richard Rush, the American Minister to Great Britain from 1817 to 1825, of which service he published a narrative, "A Residence at the Court of London," often referred to for its faithful and animated contemporary picture of the Court and Parliament, was appointed the agent to procure the fund. He discharged his duties with such ability that by the close of the year 1838, the American Secretary of the Treasury was in possession of a sum resulting from the bequest, of five hundred and fifteen thousand, one hundred and sixty-nine dollars.

For seven years the fund was suffered to accumulate without the object of the bequest having been fairly undertaken. In August, 1846, after considerable agitation of the subject in various forms, an act was passed by Congress constituting the President, Vice-President, the Secretaries of State, the Treasury, War, and the Navy; the Postmaster-General; the Attorney-General; the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Commissioner of the Patent Office, and Mayor of Washington, and such persons as they might elect honorary members, an "establishment" under the name of "the Smithsonian Institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." The members and honorary members hold stated and special meetings for the supervision of the affairs of the Institution, and for advice and instruction of the actual managers, a Board of Regents, to whom the financial and other affairs are intrusted. The Board of Regents consists of three members ex officio of the establishment, namely, the Vice-President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and the Mayor of Washington, together with twelve other members, three of whom are appointed by the Senate from its own body, three by the House of Representatives from its members, and six citizens appointed by a joint resolution of both houses, of whom two are to be members of the National Institute, and resident in Washington; the remainder from the states, but not more than one from a single state. The terms of service of the members vary with the periods of office which give them the position. The citizens are chosen for six years. The Regents elect one of their number as Chancellor, and an Executive Committee of three.* This board elects a Secretary for conducting the active operations of the Institution.

The Act of Congress directs the formation of a library, a museum (for which it grants the collections belonging to the United States), and a gallery of art, together with provisions for physical research and popular lectures, while it leaves to the Regents the power of adopting such other parts of an organization as they may deem best suited to promote the objects of the bequest. The Regents, at a meeting in December, 1847, resolved to divide the annual income, which had become thirty thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars, into two equal parts, to be apportioned one part to the increase and diffusion of knowledge, by means of original research and publications; the other to be applied in accordance with the requirements of the Act of Congress, to the gradual formation of a Library, a Museum, and a Gallery of Art. In the details of the first, it was proposed "to stimulate research, by offering rewards, consisting of money, medals, &c., for original memoirs on all subjects of investigation;" the memoirs to be published in quarto, under the title of "Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge," after having been approved of by a commission of persons of reputation in the particular branch of knowledge. No memoir on a subject of physical science is to be published, "which does not furnish a positive addition to human knowledge resting on original research;" and all unverified speculations to be rejected. It was also proposed "to appropriate a portion of the income annually to special objects of research, under the direction of suitable persons." Observations and experiments in the natural sciences, investigations in statistics, history, and ethnology, were to come under this head. The results were to be published in quarto. For the diffusion of knowledge, it was proposed "to publish a series of reports, giving an account of the new discoveries in science, and of the changes made from year to year in all branches of knowledge not strictly professional," and also to publish occasionally separate treatises on subjects of general interest.

* The body was thus arranged in 1855.

For the library it was proposed first, to form a complete collection of the transactions and proceedings of all the learned societies of the world, the more important current periodical publications, and a stock of all important works in bibliography.

The first of the series of original memoirs was the quarto volume of Messrs. Squier and Davis, on "The Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley," published in 1848. This has since been followed by six others, composed of papers from various eminent scholars of the country, on special topics of astronomy, paleontology, physical geography, botany, philology, and other branches of science. Among the contributors are Mr. Sears C. Walker, astronomical assistant of the United States Coast Survey, of Researches relative to the Planet Neptune; Dr. Robert W. Gibbes, of South Carolina, of a paper on the Mososaurus; Dr. Robert Hare, on the Explosiveness of Nitre; several papers on Paleontology, by Dr. Joseph Leidy, Professor of Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania; botanical articles, by Drs. Torrey and Gray; a Grammar and Dictionary of the Dakota language, collected by the members of the Dakota Mission, and edited by the Rev. S. R. Riggs of the American Board; and a paper by Mr. S. F. Haven, Librarian of the Antiquarian Society, Worcester, reviewing, for bibliographical and historical purposes, the literature and deductions respecting the subject of American antiquities. It should be mentioned, that though from their form the books are in the first instance expensive, yet as no copyright is taken, they may be freely reprinted, and disseminated in various ways.

Fifteen hundred copies of each of the "Memoirs" forming the Contributions are printed, which are distributed to learned societies and public libraries abroad and at home; states and territories, colleges, and other institutions of the United States. The publications of these several bodies are received in return. A system of the distribution of scientific works published by the government has become an important part of the useful agency of the institution in "diffusing knowledge among men" throughout the world.

An extensive system of meteorological observations, embracing the whole country, has been carried out by the institution. Several reports of the results have been published in a series of Temperature Tables, Tables of Precipitation, and Charts of Temperature, and a manual of directions and observations prepared by Mr. Arnold Guyot, author of a volume of lectures on comparative physical geography, entitled "Earth and Man," and Professor of Geology and Physical Geography in the College of New Jersey. The reduction of the observations collected by the Smithsonian system was performed from 1851 to 1854, by Mr. Lorin Blodget. Since his retirement from the duty, the materials have been sent for reduction to Professor James H. Coffin, of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa. Public lectures, of a popular character, are delivered in a room for the purpose in the Smithsonian building, during the winter. A small sum is paid to the lecturers, who have been among the chief professional and literary men of the country.

An extensive system of scientific correspondence is carried on by the officers of the society, who receive and communicate much valuable information in this way. The annual reports of the Regents, in their interest and variety, exhibit fully this development of the Institution.*

The building occupied by the Institution was completed in the spring of 1855. It is four hundred and twenty-six feet in length, and of irregular width and height. It was erected from the designs of Mr. James Renwick, of New York, and is in the Lombard style of architecture. Its cost, including furniture, is estimated at about three hundred thousand dollars.

The chief acting officer of the Institution is the Secretary, who has the general superintendence of its literary and scientific operations. He is aided by "an Assistant Secretary, acting as Librarian." The former office has been held from the commencement by Joseph Henry, late Professor of Natural Philosophy at the College of New Jersey, and author of a valuable series of Contributions to Electricity and Magnetism, published in the American Philosophical Transactions, Silliman's Journal, the Journal of the Franklin Institute, and other similar publications. He was the first to apply the principle of magnetism as a motor, and has made many other valuable contributions to science.

The first Assistant Secretary was Mr. Charles C. Jewett, former Professor of Modern Languages and Literature at Brown University. In his capacity of librarian, he prepared a valuable report on the Public Libraries of the United States of America, which was printed by order of Congress in 1850, as an appendix to the fourth annual report of the Board of Regents of the Institution. He also perfected a system of cataloguing public or other important libraries, by stereotyping separately the title of each work, so that in printing or reprinting, these plates may be used as type, securing both accuracy and economy.

* We would particularly refer to the Ninth Annual Report for the year 1854, for a highly interesting exhibition of the practical working of the Institution.

Professor Spencer F. Baird, editor of the Iconographic Encyclopedia, is now Assistant Secretary, and has been actively engaged in the adjustment of the museum. The exchange of publications and specimens with foreign and domestic institutions, a work involving an immense amount of correspondence and other labor, are also under his care; besides which, he has aided in fitting out the natural history department of nearly all the government exploring expeditions for several years. A report from his pen, "On the Fishes observed on the coasts of New Jersey and Long Island during the summer of 1854," is appended to the Ninth Annual Report of the Institution.

Considerable agitation has arisen in the councils of the Institution and before the public, with respect to the disposition of the funds in the matter of the formation of a large public library. Congress, by the act of 1846, led by the eloquent speech of Rufus Choate the previous year on the subject in the Senate, and the advocacy of George P. Marsh in the House of Representatives, allowed an annual sum for this purpose of twenty-five thousand dollars.* The arrangement of the fund, however, and the views of the managers which have leaned rather to scientific than literary purposes, and promoted expensive schemes of publication, have thus far defeated this object. A struggle in the body of the Regents on the library question, and the exercise of discretion in the interpretation of the original act of Congress, has ended in the resignation of the Hon. Rufus Choate, member as citizen of Massachusetts, and the withdrawal of Mr. Charles C. Jewett, the assistant secretary, acting as librarian.†

The whole question is one of much intricacy of detail, involving the method of appropriation of the fund for building and the practical available resources on hand, as well as the theoretical adjustment of the respective claims of literature and science; and the relative advantages of a grand national library, and a system of learned publications.‡

It is generally known that much diversity of opinion originally existed with respect to the employment of the Smithsonian fund, and among other objects, the foundation of a great national library was regarded with favor by several eminent men. In opposition to this, it was contended that a library is principally of local influence, while it is evident from the terms of the will, "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," as well as from what is known of the life of the testator, that Smithson intended to establish a cosmopolitan institution for advancing science, and for diffusing a knowledge of the discoveries which might be made by means of his bequest. The latter interpretation of the will now receives the general approval of literary and scientific men in every part of the civilized world.

Fortunately for the interests of science, and as if with the sense that, among so many instrumentalities of human culture as presented themselves, no small discretion must be left to the regents of adapting their policy, within certain limits, to progressive views and contingent advantages, the act of incorporation authorized them to make such disposal of any moneys arising from the interest of the fund, and not otherwise specifically appropriated, "as they shall deem best suited for the promotion of the purpose of the testator." Hence the plan adopted in 1847, as before noticed, of dividing the income equally between the active operations and the museum and library, gave way in 1855 to a resolution, "that hereafter the annual appropriations shall be apportioned specifically among the different objects and operations of the institution, in such manner as may, in the judgment of the regents, be necessary and proper for each, according to its intrinsic importance, and a compliance in good faith with the law." This has, from the date last mentioned, continued to be the rule of action; and, in proportion as the terms of the bequest have been better considered, the merely local nature of several of the original objects has been more clearly recognized, and the ever-widening field of scientific research and discovery more diligently cultivated and explored, the department of "active operations" has steadily advanced in public estimation and utility, and justified its claim to a proportionably larger share of the appropriations. It would be impossible to give here even a rapid sketch of the objects promoted or accomplished by the efforts or aid of the institution. Suffice it to say, that there is scarcely any branch of science which has not been fostered by its patronage, stimulated by its influence, and enlarged by its co-operative exertions; it has aided every Government expedition for scientific purposes by instructions or facilities afforded, and projected and supported, in part or in whole, many private ones directed to the extension of knowledge in various departments; it has organized, from Labrador to Central America, and is in daily communication with, a more extensive and better appointed system of meteorological, magnetic, and other observations than is probably anywhere else in existence, and it has succeeded in connecting these with the similar enterprises which enlightened governments are emulously extending over the globe. It cannot be doubted that more has been effected by the institution, during its brief

* When the institution was set in motion in 1846, an additional sum of two hundred and forty-two thousand dollars had accrued from interest, which was allowed in the act of Congress for building purposes, leaving the income of the original sum, about thirty thousand dollars a year, for the support of the establishment. To increase this fund, a portion of the accumulated interest has been added to the principal, and gradual appropriations made for the buildings. Under this plan the objects of the Institution are somewhat delayed, but its income will hereafter be increased, it is calculated, by some ten thousand dollars per annum.

† Upon the retirement of Mr. Jewett, the library was placed temporarily under the charge of Mr. Charles Girard, a former pupil of Professor Agassiz, who has prepared a catalogue of the publications of learned societies and periodicals in the library, the first part of which was published in Vol. vii. of the Contributions. Mr. Jewett died at Braintree, Mass., January 9, 1868.

‡ We may refer for the arguments on this subject to the majority and minority reports in 1854, of the Hon. James A. Pearce and the Hon. James Meacham of the Special Committee of the Board of Regents on the Distribution of the Income. An article in the North American Review for October, 1854, by Mr. Charles Hale, gives the views of the "library" party.

period of activity, toward a knowledge of the natural history, meteorology, mineralogy, and botany of our country than was accomplished in the whole antecedent period of the national existence. The system of exchanges, already adverted to, which is conducted at the expense of the institution, and has been met by a corresponding spirit of liberality on the part of foreign governments, is now by far the most important and extensive medium of literary and scientific communication between the Old World and the New. There is scarcely a museum in the country, public or private, which has not been the recipient of some of the vast number of type specimens which the institution has collected for distribution, and no library of consequence in the civilized world from which it has not received acknowledgments for the gift, and testimonials to the value, of its publications. The scientific influence and authority achieved for the institution by these means cannot but be a subject of just pride to an intelligent people, and gratify them, at the same time, with a sense of having not unworthily fulfilled the comprehensive views and satisfied the laudable ambition of the generous founder.

A fire which broke out in January, 1865, beneath the roof of the building, occasioned by an improperly directed stove-pipe, consumed the upper range of rooms of the centre, comprising the apparatus-room, lecture-room, and that containing Stanley's valuable gallery of Indian portraits and scenery, together with most of their contents. A fire-proof floor here arrested its progress, thus saving the spacious gallery beneath, containing the national collections of natural history, &c. The valuable library of the institution, and the specimens of art which have been acquired, were in the western wing, which, with the eastern, forming the residence of the secretary, escaped uninjured. In the report made to Congress respecting the cause, extent, and damage of the conflagration, the cost of restoration, with improved construction and arrangements, is estimated at $100,000; but, in consequence of a judicious parsimony which has been exercised from the beginning, the expenditure will be met by the funds without diminution of the invested principal or an appeal to the liberality of the nation. In the mean time, the operations of the institution have received no check from this disaster, but proceed with their accustomed regularity and activity.

 In recent years, no important change has taken place in the policy of the Smithsonian Institution, and the plan of "active operations" has been continued with unremitting success. The interpretation of the will which devotes the expenditure of the income to facilitating original research and to publishing the results obtained, thus promoting objects of general, and not those of mere local, interest, has received the approval of the leading literary and scientific men of the age.

At the time of the organization of the Institution by Congress in 1846, a very imperfect idea was entertained of the objects of the bequest, and the Regents were directed to make provision, on a liberal scale, for a library, a museum, a gallery of art, and, indirectly, for an arboretum, and courses of lectures. These objects, though of importance in themselves, were all of local influence, and not in strict accordance with a proper interpretation of the will, while also far too numerous and costly for the income of the Institution to sustain properly. It has been the constant object of the directors to relieve the Institution, as far as possible, from these burdens, and to apply the income to what is deemed the more legitimate objects of the bequest. For this purpose, the grounds, presented to the Institution by Congress, and on the improvement of which nearly ten thousand dollars of the income of the Institution were expended, have been returned to the government; and an annual appropriation for their care is now made by Congress.

In accordance with the original organization adopted by Congress, the Institution collected, by the exchange of its publications and by purchase, a valuable library, consisting of a full series of the transactions of all the learned institutions of the world. After the fire of 1865, Congress consented to take charge of this library, by consolidating it with the Congressional Library, thus giving the Institution free use of the combined collection, while relieving it from the cost of binding and supervision. This union of the two libraries has produced the happiest results. Congress has become interested in its development as a National Library,* and has made liberal provision for its support. At the session of 1872-3, preliminary measures were adopted for the erection of a separate building for its accomodation. Thus the city of Washington has been furnished with a library, the largest and best supported in the United States, while the Smithsonian fund has been relieved from an expenditure yearly increasing in magnitude.

Another burden devolved upon the Institution by the enactment of Congress was the support of the National Museum. The nucleus of this was collected by the Wilkes Exploring Expedition; but it has since been enlarged nearly fourfold by at least fifty government explorations in various parts of the territory of the United States. For the support of this Museum Congress allowed the Institution, until 1870, $4,000 annually, a sum scarcely more than a fourth of the actual expense. Fortunately, however, owing to the better appreciation of the character of the will of James Smithson, and of the objects of the Institution, a more liberal policy has since been adopted. At the two succeeding sessions, Congress has made an appropriation of $15,000 annually for the support of the Museum. It has also provided for refitting those parts of the building left vacant, by the fire and by the removal of the library, with cases for the better display of the specimens.

Thus, by a continuous effort in one direction, the Institution is now on a fair way to effectually realize the legitimate objects of the bequest; viz., "the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," untrammelled by the support of objects of a local character.

* Harper's Magazine for December, 1872, contains an interesting sketch of the growth and present status of the Library of Congress, which now contains over 250,000 volumes.

The Institution has published 18 quarto volumes of Contributions to Knowledge, containing the results of original investigations in various branches of Natural History, Meteorology, Physics, Geology, Archæology and Astronomy; besides 9 octavo volumes of Miscellaneous Collections, consisting of works to facilitate the study of different branches of Natural History, Meteorology, etc.; and 19 volumes of Reports, containing, besides, an account of the annual operations of the Institution, translations from foreign journals, and original papers relative to science, intended especially for teachers and others interested in the advance of knowledge. It has also continued its system of Meteorology, embracing the greater portion of North America, and is now discussing and publishing the results.

The system of international literary and scientific exchanges early established by the Institution, has been continually increasing; and the number of foreign institutions included within its list is now very nearly two thousand. To these institutions are sent, free of cost, not only the Smithsonian publications, but also those of the principal scientific and literary establishments of the country. The returns to the Institution for its publications are deposited in the Library of Congress, while those for other institutions are transmitted to their respective destinations. This system forms the principal medium of scientific communication between the Old World and the New; and its influence on the advance of civilization can scarcely be too highly estimated.

An evidence of the high appreciation of the operations of the Institution is given in the fact that the principal steamship lines between this country and Europe carry the Smithsonian packages free of cost; and that these packages are admitted without duty or examination into all the ports of the civilized world.

The building, after the fire before mentioned, was restored from the income of the Institution, without assistance from Congress, and without an encroachment on the invested principal. By a course of judicious investment and economical administration, the funds continue in a prosperous condition. The Report for 1872 showed that the original bequest, in 1846, of $515,169, to which was added a residuary legacy, in 1865, of $26,210, had been increased by the savings of income by the Regents to $650,000, deposited in the U. S. Treasury, and bearing interest at six per cent. in gold, while additional funds and securities were held exceeding fifty thousand dollars in value.

No change has been made in the principal officers of the Institution. Professor Joseph Henry is still the Secretary, or Director, of the establishment; Prof. Spencer F. Baird, the Assistant Secretary, and William J. Rhees, Chief Clerk.

THE ASTOR LIBRARY, NEW YORK.

This institution was founded by the late John Jacob Astor of the city of New York, by a bequest which is thus introduced in a portion of his will, dated August 22, 1830: "Desiring to render a public benefit to the city of New York, and to contribute to the advancement of useful knowledge, and the general good of society, I do, by this codicil, appropriate four hundred thousand dollars out of my residuary estate, to the establishment of a public library in the city of New York." To carry out his intention, he named as trustees the Mayor of the City and Chancellor of the State ex officio; Washington Irving, William B. Astor, Daniel Lord, jr., James G. King, Joseph G. Cogswell, Fitz Greene Halleck, Henry Brevoort, jr., Samuel B. Ruggles, Samuel Ward, jr., and Charles A. Bristed.

The trustees were incorporated by the state legislature in January, 1849. Mr. Washington Irving was immediately after elected President, and Mr. Joseph G. Cogswell, who had been long engaged in the work, having entered upon it previously to the death of Mr. Astor, was confirmed as superintendent. In the words of the Annual Report to the Legislature for 1853, signed by Mr. Washington Irving: "Mr. Astor himself, during his life, had virtually selected Mr. Cogswell for that important post; and it is but due alike to both to add, that the success of the library must be mainly attributed to the wisdom of that selection."

The Astor Library.

By the terms of the bequest, seventy-five thousand dollars were allowed for the erection of the library building; one hundred and twenty thousand for purchasing books and furniture; while the remaining two hundred and five thousand dollars were to be invested "as a fund for paying the value of the site of the building, and for maintaining and gradually increasing the said library, and to defray the necessary expenses of taking care of the same, and of the accommodation of persons consulting the library." A site for the building was to be chosen from property of the testator on Astor or Lafayette Place. The selection was made from the latter, a plot of ground, sixty-five feet in front and rear, and one hundred and twenty feet in depth. Twenty-five thousand dollars were paid for this ground. The corner-stone of the building was laid in March, 1850; the whole was completed for the prescribed sum in the summer of 1853. The following extract from the Report for that year exhibits some interesting details of the excellent financial management which has attended this undertaking.

An additional expenditure of $1590, for groined arches, which became desirable to render the building more secure from fire, was liberally borne by Mr. William B. Astor. It was not practicable to include in this $75,000, sundry items of expense for equipping the building, including apparatus for warming, ventilating, and lighting, and the shelves needed for the books. The running length of the shelves is between twelve and thirteen thousand feet, and they have cost $11,000. The aggregate of these various items of equipment is $17,141.99. It has been paid mainly by surplus interest accruing from the funds while the building was in progress, amounting to 16,000.53, and the residue by a premium of $3672.87, which was realized from the advance in value of U. S. stocks, in which a part of the funds was temporarily invested; so that, after paying in full for the building and its equipments, the fund of $180,000 not only remains undiminished, but has been increased $2530.88. It is wholly invested in mortgages, except $3500 in U. S. stock, charged at par, but with 122 per cent. in market. There is no interest in arrear on any of the mortgages.

The statement with regard to the library fund is equally satisfactory.

Of the fund of $120,000, especially devoted to the purchase of books, the trustees cannot state with entire precision the amount expended up to December 31, 1853, for the reason given in the treasurer's report, that several of the bills and accounts yet remain unliquidated. He states, however, the amount actually advanced by him to be $91,513.83, and he estimates the unsettled bills at $4500, making $96,113.83 in all. This will leave an unexpended balance of $23,886.17 applicable to the further purchases of books, in addition to that part of the income of the $180,000 to be annually devoted to the gradual increase of the library. The number of volumes now purchased and on the shelves is about 80,000. The superintendent states that the expenditure of the remaining $23,886.17 will probably increase the number to one hundred thousand.

It is seldom that the collection of books of a public library is made with equal opportunities, and with equal ability and fidelity. From the outset the work has been systematically undertaken. The superintendent began his labors with the collection of an extensive series of bibliographical works provided at his own cost, and which he has generously presented to the library. While the building was in progress, Mr. Cogswell was employed in making the best purchases at home and abroad, visiting the chief book markets of Europe personally for this object. When the building, admirably adapted for its purpose, by its light, convenience, elegance, and stability, was ready, a symmetrical collection of books had been prepared for its shelves. The arrangement follows the classification of Brunet, in his "Manuel du Libraire." Theology, Jurisprudence, the Sciences and Arts (including Medicine, the Natural Sciences, Chemistry and Physics, Metaphysics and Ethics, the Mathematics, and the Fine Arts, separately arranged); Literature, embracing a valuable linguistic collection, and a distinct grouping of the books of the ancient and modern tongues; History, with its various accessories of Biography, Memoirs, its Civil and Ecclesiastical divisions and relations to various countries—follow each other in sequence.

To these divisions is to be added "a special technological department, to embrace every branch of practical industry and the mechanic arts," generously provided for at an expense of more than twelve thousand dollars, by a gift from Mr. William B. Astor.

With respect to the extent of the use of the library, we find the following interesting statement in the Annual Report of the Superintendent, dated Jan. 1855.

One hundred volumes a day is a low average of the daily use, making the whole number which have been in the hands of readers since it was opened about 30,000, and as these were often single volumes of a set of from two to fifty volumes, it may be considered certain that more than half of our whole collection has been wanted during the first year. But this is a matter in which numerical statistics do not afford much satisfaction; nothing short of a specification of the books read or consulted would show the importance which the library is to the public, as a source of information and knowledge, and as this cannot be given, a more general account must serve as a substitute. On observing the classes and kinds of books which have been called for, I have been particularly struck with the evidence thus afforded of the wide range which the American mind is now taking in thought and research; scholastic theology, transcendental metaphysics, abstruse mathematics, and oriental philology have found many more readers than Addison and Johnson; while on the other hand, I am happy to be able to say, that works of practical science and of knowledge for every-day use, have been in great demand. Very few have come to the library without some manifestly distinct aim; that is, it has been little used for mere desultory reading, but for the most part with a specific view. It would not be easy to say which department is most consulted, but there is naturally less dependence upon the library for books of theology, law, and medicine, than in the others, the three faculties being better provided for in the libraries of the institutions especially intended for them. Still, in each of these departments, the library has many works not elsewhere to be found. It is now no longer merely a matter of opinion; it is shown by experience that the collection is not too learned for the wants of the public. No one fact will better illustrate this position than the following: in the linguistic department it possesses dictionaries and grammars, and other means of instruction in more than a hundred languages and dialects, four-fifths of which have been called for during the first year of its operation. Our mathematical, mechanical and engineering departments are used by great numbers, and they are generally known to be so well furnished, that students from a distance have found it a sufficient object to induce them to spend several weeks in New York to have the use of them. The same remark applies to natural history, all branches of which are studied here. In entomology we are said to have the best and fullest collection in this country to which naturalists have free access. Passing to the historical side of the library we come to a department in which a very general interest has been taken—far more general than could have been anticipated in our country—it is that of heraldry and genealogy. Among the early purchases for the library there were but few books of this class, as it was supposed but few would be wanted; a year or two's experience proved the contrary, and the collection has been greatly enlarged; it is now sufficiently ample to enable any one to establish his armorial bearings, and trace his pedigree at least as far back as the downfall of the Western empire. From this rapid glance at the library, it has been seen that there are students and readers in all departments of it, and that no one greatly preponderates over the rest; still I think it may be stated, that on the whole that of the fine arts, taken collectively, is the one which has been most extensively used; practical architects and other artists have had free access to it, many of whom have often had occasion to consult it.

The arrangements of the library afford every requisite facility for the consultation of these books. It is open to visitors from all parts of the country or the world, without fee or special introduction. All may receive the benefit of its liberal endowment. It is simply to open the door, ascend the cheerful stairway to the main room, and write on a printed form provided the title of a desired volume. As every day finds the library richer in books, and a system of special catalogues by departments is in preparation, creating new facilities in the use of them, the visitor will soon, if he may not already, realize the prediction of Mr. George Bancroft, "of what should and must become the great library of the Western Continent." We could, at the close of our long journey in these volumes, wish for no more cheerful omen of the bountiful literary future.

 The capacity of the Astor Library building was doubled in 1859 by the erection of an additional and communicating edifice on an adjacent lot, eighty feet by one hundred and twenty, the donation of Mr. William B. Astor. That gentleman also announced to the trustees his liberal purpose of expending "for books, from time to time, such sums as he may think useful." In accordance with his wish, it was formally resolved by the trustees that these donations "were on the understanding, that it was the settled and unchangeable basis of administering the library, that its contents should remain in the library rooms, for use by readers there, and should not be lent out or allowed to be taken from the rooms." The original building was appropriated exclusively to science and the industrial arts, while the northern edifice contained works on history and literature. The vacancy in the presidency by the death of Washington Irving in 1859, was filled by the election of William B. Astor to that office. The total of his donations in lands and money almost equal the original endowment of $400,000 by John Jacob Astor.

Dr. Cogswell, the competent superintendent, completed in 1861, after the patient labor of several years, a catalogue of the 115,000 volumes then in the library. This was printed in four royal octavo volumes, of 2,110 pages in all. In the same year, and at the advanced age of seventy-five, he resigned the active duties of his office, to the great regret of his literary colleagues. At that time, his rare collection of more than 4,000 volumes in bibliography and literary history became the property of that institution by the payment of an annuity of $300. In the following year, he began the preparation of an analytical or classified catalogue, forming an index of subjects for ready reference to this rich collection. This labor he prosecuted diligently, although the removal of his residence to Cambridge in 1865 compelled him to resign his seat in the Board of Trustees. In a resolution expressive of his eminent services, his associates said: "Throughout this period, embracing nearly twenty years, Doctor Cogswell has faithfully devoted to the Library the unremitting efforts of his well-directed and spotless life, exhibiting a singular union of learning and ability, of efficiency and discretion, of modesty and taste, of energy, industry, and disinterestedness, abundantly manifested in the Library itself, the fruit of his untiring labors, and a lasting evidence of the rare and varied qualifications he so happily combines."* The Analytical Catalogue was completed in 1866, and printed as the fifth volume of the general catalogue. "As the work of an octogenarian, embarrassed by bodily infirmities, it may be considered a literary curiosity, as well as the most valuable American contribution to the department to which it belongs."† Dr. Cogswell died at Cambridge, November 26, 1871, aged eighty-five years. "He left, of his moderate fortune, four thousand dollars to a school in his native place, where he was buried by the side of his mother's grave, and where a handsome monument will be erected by his Round Hill pupils, no one of whom ever left the school without carrying away with him a strong affection for the faithful friend and teacher."‡

Francis Schroeder, Esq., filled the post of Superintendent for ten years from 1861; and on his resignation he was succeeded by Dr. Edward R. Straznicky.

The Library, on the 1st of January, 1873, contained 144,178 volumes, which had cost (with catalogues) $256,218. The cost of sites and building was $257,853, and the equipment, shelving, etc., $33,374. A fund of over $200,000 remained invested in bonds and mortgages, for the purchase of books, and the annual expenses. During the preceding year, 111,317 books were delivered to 26,644 readers in the halls, and 5,915 students were admitted within the alcoves for free examination of many works in special departments. The books most sought by the latter, to the extent of a sixth of the whole number, were those relating to Patents. In this department the Library possesses a complete set of the specifications and drawings, from A. D. 1617 to date, issued by the British Commissioners of Patents, and amounting in all to nearly two thousand volumes. In 1872 Mr. William Waldorf Astor presented to the Library a copy of the first letter of Columbus on his discovery of America, as printed in Latin by Planik at Rome in 1493,—four leaves with thirty-three lines to a page,—and of which only six copies are known to be preserved.

* Annual Report of the Trustees of the Astor Library, for 1864, p. 6.

† Annual Report do., for 1872, p. 8.

‡ Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, vol. xi., 1871, p. 122.

 VASSAR COLLEGE.

VASSAR COLLEGE, near Poughkeepsie, New York, is the first fully endowed institution for the education of woman established in America, and indeed in the world. As it seeks to give her an intellectual culture and development as high in degree as that now offered to young men by our leading colleges, its establishment marks an era in the literary history of this country.

Matthew Vassar, its founder, a native of Norfolk county, England, where he was born April 29, 1792, emigrated in boyhood with his parents to Dutchess county, New York. A "self-made man," with little education, he accumulated a great fortune by a half-century's business as a brewer, and devoted its bulk to this beneficent purpose. A charter of incorporation was obtained in 1861, and a board of trustees duly organized, to whom Mr. Vassar confided an endowment equal to $408,000. In his address at that time, he thus defined its character and aims, as approved by many practical educators:

"I wish that the course of study should embrace at least the following particulars: the English language and its literature; other modern languages; the mathematics, to such an extent as may be deemed advisable; all the branches of natural science, with full apparatus, cabinets, collections and conservatories for visible illustration; Anatomy, Physiology, and Hygiene, with practical reference to the laws of the health of the sex; Intellectual Philosophy; the elements of Political Economy; some knowledge of the Federal and State Constitutions and laws; Moral Science, particularly as bearing on the filial, conjugal, and parental relations; Æsthetics, as treating of the beautiful in nature and art, and to be illustrated by an extensive gallery of art; Domestic Economy, practically taught so far as possible, in order to prepare the graduate herself to become a skilful house-keeper; last, and most important of all, the daily regular reading and study of the Holy Scriptures as the only and all-sufficient rule of Christian faith and practice. All sectarian influences should be carefully excluded; but the training of our students should never be entrusted to the skeptical, the irreligious or immoral."*

Mr. Vassar lived to see the college edifices completed and equipped in 1865, and the distinctive merits of the institution recognized by an attendance of over three hundred students. He died while reading an address to its trustees, June 23, 1868. His will made the total of his donations exceed $800,000, and formed an auxiliary fund of $50,000 to assist students of promise and scholarship.

Vassar College has a park and farm of two hundred acres, with landscape views tempting to riding, walking, gardening, and boating.† The main edifice is 500 feet in length by 200 in depth, with connected wings each 170 feet. It is heated by steam, lighted with gas, and has the accommodations of refined home-life for four hundred young ladies. This great family is kept in order by an exact code of discipline, which yet allows much individual liberty, and requires stated physical exercise. An Astronomical Observatory; a Calisthenium, with Riding School attached; a good Museum of Natural History; a Library of 9000 choice books; an Art Gallery, with several thousand drawings and paintings; a Chemical Laboratory; a department in Music, having the use of an organ and more than thirty pianos,—these attest its excellent educational apparatus. Its physical and moral oversight are equally well organized.

This institution provides a liberal education, as alike opposed to merely professional, and to elementary training,—the whole closely modelled on the plan of Mr. Vassar. In the Freshman class, which receives qualified applicants aged fifteen, studies are common to all. In the Sophomore, Junior, and Senior years, they are elective, with moderate restrictions. In 1872, its 415 students represented all sections of the country. Its faculty, besides the president, John H. Raymond, LL. D., and a lady principal, numbered 8 professors and 30 assistants. Miss Maria Mitchell, Ph. D., its Astronomer, has edited a popular volume on The Moon. She is a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and of the Academy of Arts and Sciences.

* Men of Our Day; art., Matthew Vassar. By L. P. Brockett, M. D., Editor of "The Biographical Portions of Appleton's Cyclopædia. Philadelphia: Zeigler, McCurdy & Co., 1868.

† Ibid., "What Are They Doing at Vassar?" Scribner's Monthly, August, 1871.

ORMSBY McKNIGHT MITCHEL

Was born of Virginia parentage, in Union County, Kentucky, August 28, 1810. His father died when Ormsby was about three years old, after which the family removed to Lebanon, Warren County, Ohio. There young Mitchel received his first education, and at the age of thirteen began life as clerk in a country store. After serving in several towns of Ohio in this capacity, he secured an appointment in 1825 to a cadetship at West Point, when he was not yet fifteen years old. He was a bright, zealous student, and graduated with credit in the class of 1829, with the rank of second lieutenant of artillery. He now passed two years as assistant professor of mathematics in the military academy, and was then stationed at St. Augustine, Florida. In 1832 he resigned his military commission, engaged in the study of the law, was admitted to the bar in Cincinnati, Ohio, and for a time pursued the practice of the profession. At the end of two years he was led to return to his original studies, and for ten years, from 1834 to 1844, held the position of professor of mathematics, philosophy, and astronomy at the Cincinnati College. During a portion of this time he was also engaged as chief engineer of the Little Miami Railroad. In 1842, having become earnestly engrossed in the study of astronomy, he undertook the establishment of an observatory at Cincinnati. He prepared the way for this undertaking by the delivery of a series of lectures at Cincinnati. The public became interested through his enthusiasm; he collected funds by a popular subscription, visited Europe to secure the necessary apparatus, and personally superintended the erection of the observatory building. The corner-stone of the pier, which was to sustain the great refracting telescope, was laid in November, 1843, by John Quincy Adams, who delivered an elaborate oration on the occasion. In 1845, the building was completed. Professor Mitchel then began a series of astronomical observations, in which he was assisted by a new declination apparatus of his own invention. In 1846 he began and continued the publication for two years of an astronomical journal, entitled The Siderial Messenger. In 1848 he published a series of lectures which he had delivered in various cities of the country, in a volume entitled The Planetary and Stellar Worlds. It was written with fervor, and was well received by the public. The same year Professor Mitchel was appointed chief engineer of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad. In 1859, he was made director of the newly-erected Dudley Observatory at Albany, while he still retained the supervision of the observatory at Cincinnati. In 1860, he published a second volume of popular astronomy, A Concise Elementary Treatise on the Sun, Planets, Satellites, and Comets, in which he presented the result of his own observations, and the new methods which he had employed in the observatories at Cincinnati and Albany.

From this successful prosecution of his favorite science, Professor Mitchel was now called by the opening scenes of the great rebellion. His whole nature was aroused, and, mindful of his military education at West Point, he hastened to offer his services to his country. He spoke with his usual enthusiasm at the great public meeting in New York immediately following the fall of Fort Sumter. "I only ask," said he, "to be permitted to act, and in God's name give me something to do." The offer was accepted. In August, 1861, he was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers, and was placed in command of the Department of the Ohio, with his head-quarters at Cincinnati. He rendered distinguished service in command of a division of General Buell's army in the advance upon Bowling Green, Kentucky, the occupation of Nashville, Tennessee, and the subsequent movements in Alabama, in the spring campaign of 1862. For his energetic capture of Huntsville, Alabama, he was made a major-general of volunteers. In the autumn of the same year he succeeded General Hunter at Hilton Head, South Carolina, in command of the Department of the South. There, while he was engaged with his habitual ardor in the duties of his new position, he was stricken by yellow fever, and died after a few days' illness, at Beaufort, on the 30th October, 1862.

O. M. Mitchel

General Mitchel left a third series of lectures in manuscript, which were published in 1863. This volume, entitled The Astronomy of the Bible, is an eloquent assertion of the harmony between science and revelation, arranged under the several heads of "The Astronomical Evidences of the Being of a God; the God of the Universe is Jehovah; the Cosmogony as revealed by the present state of Astronomy; the Mosaic Account of Creation; the Astronomical Allusions in the Book of Job; the Astronomical Miracles of the Bible."

THE GOD OF THE UNIVERSE IS JEHOVAH—FROM THE ASTRONOMY OF THE BIBLE.

Look yet higher to God's fiery car, the sun, linked to a thousand revolving worlds! onward its mighty mass, a million of miles in diameter, sweeps through space, bearing with it its retinue of flaming worlds.

God's mighty arm hath projected these stupendous orbs, and his omnipotent power alone hath impressed upon them their amazing velocity. It is not possible to escape from this conclusion, by arguing the laws of motion and attraction. These are but the modes in which God exercises his power, they are not the power itself. Let some gigantic arm reach out and attempt to arrest the moon; were the trial possible, were the power of every human arm concentrated into one, even the power of the thousands of generations which have peopled the earth, even this combined and concentrated power could not check this puny orb of heaven for one single moment in its swift career.

Again, what mighty force restrains the planets in their orbits? There is no one who is not familiar with the force developed in all revolving bodies. If a globe be attached to one extremity of a cord, while the other is retained in the hand, the moment the globe is set revolving it commences a struggle to break the cord, and free itself from the restraining hand. As the velocity of revolution increases, so does this developed tendency to fly from the center increase. If, then, a planet were located in space, at its appropriate distance from the sun, and receive an impulse capable of impressing on it the velocity due to its orbit, unrestrained by any central power, it would fly from its orbit and dart onward for ever through space in a direct line, never turning to the right hand or the left. What tremendous power, then, is necessary to bind these mighty worlds into their circling orbits! It is again useless to say that this is accomplished by the power of the sun. Matter is inert, it can have no power save what God shall give. As well might we declare that it is the power of the bone and muscle of the brawny arm of the smith, that wields the ponderous sledge. Sever that same powerful arm from the body, the form is retained, the muscle and bone are there, but mind, the animating principle, is gone, and at the instant of its departure all power is dead. So sever the sun from the will of God, and in that vast aggregation of matter all power dies, its light fades, and the planets, loosed from God's controlling power, fly madly through the abyss of space.

Nothing short of Omnipotence can hold these flying worlds. These are, however, but the merest atoms of creation; all their combined masses flung into the sun would scarcely augment his bulk by an appreciable quantity; and yet this mighty mass, the sun itself, is no more quiescent than its attending satellites. It, too, is flying through space, impelled and guided by the same Omnipotent hand. Stretching yet farther into creation, we behold an amazing scene. Not a solitary star that fills the concave is at rest; all, all, from the blazing Sirius to the faintest particle of star-dust revealed by telescopic art, are careering onward through immensity. System rising above system; cluster above cluster; universe above universe; moving with majestic grandeur; all held by the right hand of God omnipotent. "He ruleth in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth."

It is, perhaps, less difficult to affirm the almighty power of the Architect of the Universe, than to demonstrate that in wisdom supreme has been reared this stupendous fabric. The mind is far more easily and obviously impressed with the evidences of power than of wisdom. Just as the resistless power of the steam-car forces itself upon our minds through the senses, while the evidence of the wisdom displayed in its complex structure, can only be derived from the steady application of the higher faculties of the mind; so a superficial examination of God's universe, demonstrates, through the senses, his eternal power, while nothing short of a comprehension of the celestial mechanism, can reveal the wisdom supreme displayed in its organization and arrangement.

Nothing short of a knowledge of the true system of the universe, can demonstrate the wisdom of God. There was a time when the human mind, vain of its penetration, conceived it had reached the true rendering of heaven's high record. Cycle and epi-cycle, equant and deferent, marked with terrible and cumbersome complexity, the movements of the celestial orbs, until even mortal genius rebelled, and boldly (if not blasphemously) asserted, that if this were an evidence of the wisdom of God, his mind could have better counseled this imagined omniscience.

Since, however, we have reached to a true knowledge of the celestial architecture, the mind, the deeper it penetrates, is the more powerfully impressed with the wisdom, vast, comprehensive, infinite, eternal, in which and through which the worlds were made.

Let us again call to mind the organization of our solar system. In the center is located the controlling orb. At varying distances from this common center, a multitude of worlds are revolving in reëntering curves until the most remote includes in its capacious orbit, an area whose diameter is 60,000 millions of miles. These globes are to be so arranged, that while each one is subjected to the influence of every other, yet their pathways shall never suffer a change beyond narrow and prescribed limits. Their orbits shall ever expand and contract, their velocities shall ever increase and diminish, the planes of their motion shall ever rock to and fro; but at no period in the ages which are to come, shall any change so accumulate as to affect the equilibrium of this complicated system. If about the sun it were required to launch a single planet, it might not be difficult to determine the direction and power of the primitive impulse, required to produce a determinate result. Indeed, release the planets and their satellites from the disturbing influences of each other, and it would not then be impossible to achieve the resolution of the problem of a perfect and everlasting equilibrium.

But this is not the condition of the problem in nature. There is but one God, so there is but one kind of matter. If the will of God energize the material of the sun, so does it equally energize the material of every planet. While to finite minds complexity reigns, to the infinite intelligence, the oneness of matter, the unity of law, form the essence and perfection of simplicity.

Let us proceed, then, in the examination of this sublime problem. Let a power be delegated to a finite spirit, equal to the projection of the most ponderous planet in its orbit, and from God's exhaustless magazine, let this spirit select his grand central orb. Let him with puissant arm locate it in space, and obedient to his mandate, there let it remain for ever fixed. He proceeds to select his planetary globes which he is now required to marshal, in their appropriate order of distance from the sun. Heed well this distribution, for should a single globe be misplaced, the divine harmony is destroyed for ever. Let us admit that finite intelligence may at length determine the order of combination; the mighty host is arrayed in order. Nearest the center is located the brilliant Mercury, and then the orb of Venus. Next stands this serene globe, and beyond, the fiery Mars, and then a wondrous group of minute worlds, far within the circling orb of Jupiter is placed. Beyond Jupiter stands Saturn with his rings; still more remote is seen Uranus, and farthest of all Neptune stands sentinel on the outposts of this grand array. In one vast line of continuity, these worlds, like fiery coursers, stand waiting the command to fly. But, mighty spirit, heed well the next grand step; ponder well the direction in which thou wilt launch each waiting world; weigh well the mighty impulse soon to be given, for out of the myriads of directions, and the myriads of varying impulsive forces, there comes but a single combination that will secure the perpetuity of your complex scheme. In vain does the bewildered finite spirit attempt to fathom this mighty depth. In vain does it seek to resolve the stupendous problem. It turns away, and while endued with omnipotent power, exclaims, "Give to me infinite wisdom, or relieve me from the impossible task!"

Here we have presented the simplest possible problem. Add to the earth its moon, to Jupiter his four satellites; to Saturn its wondrous rings, and eight revolving worlds; complicate the problem with ten thousand fiery comets; God has computed the perturbations of this complex system, through all its infinite configurations; through infinite ages which are passed, and through endless ages which are to come. It is useless to rise to schemes of yet greater difficulty, for we must be satisfied, that nothing short of omniscience could have constructed a system so involved, so complex, and yet so perfect, in all its multitudinous parts.

And yet how utterly insignificant does this appear, when compared with the marshaling of the mighty host of heaven. Look up to that wondrous zone, begirt with blazing stars, scattered by millions throughout its populous domain. Here is a combination so vast, so profound, so multitudinous, that imagination fails to grasp its mighty boundaries, and yet all is in motion. Each one of these myriads has its appointed track; the wisdom of God hath looked through the wondrous maze from the beginning, and lo! even to the final period of all things, perfection reigns.

ELIZA W. FARNHAM.

The maiden name of Mrs. Farnham was Burhans. She was born at Rensselaerville, Albany County, New York, November 17, 1815. She removed to Illinois in 1835, and was married there the following year to Mr. Thomas J. Farnham, a native of Vermont, and a lawyer by profession, who subsequently became known to the public by several volumes of travels in Oregon Territory and California, the results of his visits to those countries in 1842 and 1845. Returning to New York in 1841, Mrs. Farnham entered upon the career of philanthropy, in which she subsequently distinguished herself by her lectures to women and visits of benevolence to the prisons. In 1844, she accepted the appointment of matron of the Female Department of the New York State Prison at Sing Sing, the duties of which she discharged for four years. She published at this time a volume, entitled Life in Prairie Land, and edited an edition of Sampson's Criminal Jurisprudence. She was connected in 1848 with the management of the Institution for the Blind at Boston. She now passed several years in California, returning to New York in 1856. A volume, entitled California, Indoors and Out, was the fruit of this residence. In 1859, Mrs. Farnham published a work entitled My Early Days. Her most elaborate composition appeared in a work in two volumes published in 1864. It is entitled Woman and her Era. "The purpose of these unique volumes," says a friendly reviewer in the New York Tribune, "is to present a scientific exposition and proof of the time-honored adage, that 'woman is the better half of creation.' Mrs. Farnham accepts this proposition not only as an undeniable truth, founded upon a deep and wide basis in the mental and physical constitution of the female sex, but as a truth of vital importance to the true order of society and the eternal interests of humanity. She would redeem this cardinal idea, as she regards it, from the province of romantic sentiment, trace it to a more profound source in human nature than the enthusiasm of the affections, present it in the light of accurate analysis and philosophical argument, and exhibit its practical applications to domestic and social life. No one can give a candid perusal to her work without being deeply impressed with the sincerity of her convictions and the purity of her motives, whatever view may be entertained of the validity of her reasoning and the soundness of her conclusions. With glaring, and almost odious faults of execution, the transparent earnestness of her book, the lofty standard of womanly excellence which it sets forth, and the faith in God and humanity with which it is inspired, atone, in a great degree, for its perpetual violation of good taste, and stamp it as an original and remarkable production."

Mrs. Farnham died in the city of New York, in December, 1864.

WILLIAM SLOAN GRAHAM

Was born near New London, Chester County, Pennsylvania, April 23, 1818. His father was pastor of a Presbyterian church of the place. He was an ardent student at Delaware, then Newark College, and afterward passed most of his time as a teacher, as tutor in his college, principal of the Academy in New London, and head of the preparatory school at Newark. Afterward he removed to Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, and took charge of an academy. He died there of consumption, October 3, 1847, in his twenty-ninth year. An affectionate memoir, written by his wife, of his religious and literary life, is published in the volume of his Remains, edited by Prof. Geo. Allen.*

His literary life was full of promise of the finest fruits of sensibility and scholarship. He was a student of Coleridge, wrote translations

* Philadelphia, J. W. Moore, 1849.

from the German and frequent verses to his friends.

ISAAC G. STRAIN.

This gallant officer of the navy, whose early death was greatly deplored by the friends of science, was a native of Pennsylvania. He was born about the year 1820, entered the navy of the United States, and rose to the rank of lieutenant. He was an accomplished officer, and acquired several modern languages, particularly interesting himself in the study of the Eastern countries which he visited, their geography and ethnology. His single published volume was a book of travels, Sketches of a Journey in Chili and the Argentine Provinces in 1849, the result of permission which he obtained to leave his ship on the Pacific for the sake of making the overland journey from Valparaiso to Rio de Janeiro, with the intention of rejoining the vessel when she should accomplish her voyage round Cape Horn. The book, published in New York in 1853, showed Lieutenant Strain to be an intelligent observer, and brought him in contact with the scientific men of the country. He was made a member of the American Ethnological Society, and was welcomed by its members in New York. Previously to his journey in South America he had explored the peninsula of Lower California. He was subsequently engaged in the Boundary Commission for running the dividing line between the United States and Mexico. In 1854 he was placed in charge of the Government expedition sent to survey the Isthmus of Darien. The extremities to which his party were reduced in that affair, and the heroism with which he sustained his command under extraordinary difficulties, brought him prominently to the notice of the public. His observations were embodied in a report to the Secretary of the Navy, and a paper read before the Geographical Society at New York. An interesting account of his journey, from his notes and original materials, was also prepared by Mr. J. T. Headley, and published in several numbers of Harpers' Magazine, in 1855. In the summer of 1856, he sailed in company with Captain Berryman, in the Arctic, on her voyage to ascertain by soundings in the North Atlantic the possibility of an ocean telegraph between America and England. Returning to New York after the successful performance of this duty, he passed the winter in the city in broken health, the result of his exposures on the Isthmus of Darien. In the spring he sailed to overtake his vessel, the Oyane, in Southern waters, but he lived only to reach Aspinwall, dying at that place the night of his arrival, May 15, 1857, in his thirty-seventh year.

CORTLANDT VAN RENSSELAER,

A theological writer, was born at Albany, New York. He was the third son of the late Stephen Van Rensselaer, known as "the Patroon." His boyhood was passed at Albany, and at an academy at Hyde Park on the Hudson, under the care of Dr. Benjamin Allen, previously Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Union College. In 1823 he entered Yale College, and graduated in course in 1827. His first application of his powers was to the law, a study which he pursued in the office at Albany of the late Abraham Van Vechten. He was admitted to practice in 1830, but his thoughts were already directed to the claims of divinity. Giving the preference to the latter profession, he studied at the Theological Seminary at Princeton and at the Union Seminary in Prince Edward County, Virginia. In 1833 he received his license to preach from the Presbytery of West Hanover, in the latter State, and began his ministry by an earnest course of labor as a preacher to the slaves in Virginia. Uniting several plantations in this work, he dedicated a chapel in their midst. His devotion to this kind work was, however, interrupted by "unwarrantable suspicions," growing out of his Northern relations and opinions, and he was compelled to abandon his favorite field of exertion. In 1836 he became engaged in the formation of the First Presbyterian Church in Burlington, New Jersey, and ministered faithfully in its pulpit for four years. He afterward preached at Washinton, D. C., and in 1846 became Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church. He devoted the remainder of his life to this important work with great assiduity. His labors included the organization and support of parochial schools, Presbyterian academies, and synodical colleges, with incessant occupation of his pen as editor of a monthly magazine, and the preparation of various addresses and discourses. In the midst of these toils he fell into a decline, and ended his days at his residence at Burlington, on the 25th of July, 1860.

A volume of his Miscellaneous Sermons, Essays, and Addresses has been published, edited by his son. It contains various theological papers, among others a series of articles on Slaveholding, in reply to the Rev. Dr. George D. Armstrong, of Virginia, in which he combats the alleged pro-slavery Biblical defence of the institution, regarding the ultimate dissolution of the relation as "a moral duty, from the general spirit and principles of the word of God." The volume also includes funeral orations on Daniel Webster and Bishop Doane, in whose character, with praiseworthy independence, he found much to admire, though he was so widely separated from him in church relations; and two historical discourses, at the centennial celebration of the battle of Lake George, and a similar commemoration of the capture of Ticonderoga.

THOMAS STARR KING.

Thomas Starr King was born December 17, 1824, in the city of New York, where his mother was then on a visit to her family. His father, Thomas Farrington King, was a distinguished Universalist clergyman of New England. In 1828 he became settled at Portsmouth, N. H., where his son Starr, as he was always called by his friends, was taught at a private school not only the elements of an English education, but acquired before the age of ten a considerable acquaintance with French and Latin. His father, in 1835, removed to Charlestown,

Mass., to take charge of the Universalist Society at that place, where Starr, a bright and enthusiastic student, was instructed at the Bunker Hill Grammar School, and afterwards at the Winthrop School. The illness and straitened circumstances of the father led to the son being placed as clerk in a dry-goods store in Charlestown, a temporary arrangement, which was prolonged by the father's death, in 1839, which left the mother dependent for support upon Starr, then a youth of fifteen. By the influence of his father's friends he was next year appointed an assistant teacher in the Bunker Hill Grammar School at Charlestown, and continued in this position till 1842, when he became principal of the neighboring West Grammar School of Medford. In the following year he increased his means of support by relinquishing this situation for a clerkship in the Government employ, at the Charlestown navy-yard. He was all this time a diligent student, acquiring various branches of learning, and looking steadily forward to the life of a Christian minister. In 1846, having previously preached before a small Universalist Society in Boston, he succeeded the Rev. Dr. Chapin in the ministry of the church at Charlestown formerly held by his father. Here he continued till 1848, when he was called to take charge of the Hollis street Congregational Church in Boston. He remained in this relation, enjoying the reputation of a fervid and brilliant preacher, till 1860, when he accepted an invitation to assume the pastoral charge of the Unitarian Church in San Francisco, Cal. He was received there with great favor, and for the remaining four years of his life exercised an important influence in the community. "He completely," says one of his friends, "identified himself with the social interests of that young and plastic State. His simple and forcible eloquence, his genial, glowing temperament, his overflowing good humor, his sparkling wit, always at hand, and always benignant, and the kindly fervor of his manners, gave him ready access to the hearts of the people, and clothed him with a degree of popular favor, such as is rarely enjoyed by a public man in any station. His exertions in behalf of the Union are well known to the country. The decided, uncompromising stand which he took at once against the rebellion had a mighty effect on popular opinion in California."*

In the midst of this career of usefulness at San Francisco, he was suddenly taken with an attack of diphtheria, which, in a few days, terminated fatally, on the 4th of March, 1864.

The literary productions of Mr. King include various review articles, published in Dr. Balou's Universalist Quarterly, occasional addresses, popular lectures, for the delivery of which he was much in request, and one elaborate work marked by his peculiar enthusiasm and eloquence. This was entitled, The White Hills; their Legends, Landscape, and Poetry.† It is a series of descriptions of the mountain scenery of New Hampshire, traced through the great valleys, by the lakes and waterfalls and grand summits of the region, written with the fancy of a poet, the minute observation and enthusiasm of an ardent lover of nature, and the spiritual insight of a philosopher. The book, a costly volume, was illustrated by pictures of the scenery from the sketches of Mr. Wheelock, and was further enriched by two chapters on the Scientific Explorations and Flora of the Mountains, by Professor Edward Tuckerman.

Immediately after Mr. King's death, a volume of selections from his review articles and theological discourses was published in Boston, bearing the title, Patriotism and other Papers. It was prefaced by a biographical sketch of the author, by his friend, Richard Frothingham, who has since narrated Mr. King's career more at length in a spirited memorial volume, entitled A Tribute to Thomas Starr King. The following lines by the poet Whittier appear as a prelude to the posthumous volume of selections:

The great work laid upon his two-score years
Is done and well done. If we drop our tears
Who loved him as few men were ever loved,
We mourn no blighted hope nor broken plan,
With him whose life stands rounded and approved
In the full growth and stature of a man.
Mingle, O bells, along the Western slope,
With your deep toll a sound of faith and hope!
Wave cheerily still, O banner, halfway down,
From thousand-masted bay and steeped town!
Let the strong organ with its loftiest swell
Lift the proud sorrow of the land, and tell
That the brave sower saw his ripened grain.
O East and West, O morn and sunset, twain
No more forever!—has he lived in vain
Who, priest of Freedom, made ye one, and told
Your bridal service from his lips of gold?

 INDIRECT INFLUENCES — FROM PATRIOTISM AND OTHER PAPERS.

The objects of the physical world continually exert indirect influences upon each other. Each tree, shrub, flower, and spire of grass reacts upon the quality of the air, and in that way affects other trees and flowers, and thus, finally, the health of animals, and of the men and women of the globe. The carbonic acid with which our breathing floods the atmosphere, to-morrow will be speeding north and south, and striving to make the tour of the world. The date-trees that grow round the fountains of the Nile will drink it in by their leaves; the cedars of Lebanon will take it up to add to their stature: the cocoanuts of Tahiti will grow riper upon it; and the palms and bananas of Japan change it into flowers. The oxygen we are now breathing was, in part, distilled for us, some short time ago, by the magnolias of the South, and the roses and myrtles of Cashmere; and, in part, forests older than the flood supplied it.

Every particle of matter, by reason of the various laws of mechanical and chemical influences, exerts unseen and undetected influences upon other particles. The smallest planet, or satellite, in the solar system has some effect upon the orbit and motion of huge Jupiter and far-distant Neptune; and so nice is the adjustment of the celestial forces, that, if these indirect and humble services of the lesser orbs should be lost from the mechanism, the poise of the system would be disturbed, and the motions that now produce such beneficent harmony, would drift towards wreck and ruin. The physical order, stability, and beneficence we behold, are not the result of a few glaring and easily-comprehended arrangements, but the products of a myriad indirect contributions and intricate influences, which deep and patient study discloses to the scientific mind.

* New York Tribune, March 7, 1864

† Published by Crosby & Co., Boston, 1860.

In the structure of society, also, the most powerful agents for good are indirect, and seldom consciously recognized. What a complex thing is that which we call civilization! Of how many delicate and different influences is it compounded! There are times when we are able to see, for an instant, what terrible passions smoulder in the bosom of our Christian society, and what savage feelings can be started beneath the placid order of common life, and how coarse the temper and moral sensibility of large portions of our community really are. And yet all this is generally restrained from destructive fury by subtle influences which are intertwined so skillfully, that the whole strength and pressure of them are no more seen than we see the power and momentum of the wind. The fierce elements of human nature are controlled by civilization, as a lion is entrapped by a net, — each line of which is but a straw in comparison with his strength, but whose knots and meshes bind every muscle, and entangle his feet, and distract his energy, so that his vigor is soon exhausted, and he is no longer a dangerous foe. The best government is that which seems to govern least; whose power and motives and control reach us indirectly, and press upon us steadily and unconsciously as the weight of the air.

That which we call the power of conservatism in society, and which gives permanence and force to all institutions — to many that are bad — is an indirect power. All institutions and customs have many and wide relations with the feelings, habits, and hearts of the people among whom they exist. They throw out fine tendrils into the soil of the sentiments, which we do not like to have disturbed. And hence it is that, after the upper leaves of some great institution have begun to die, and its trunk has rotted, and it is seen by the sharpest eyes to be a cumberer of the ground — and even after the storm has madly despoiled it, and the hot bolt of intellectual indignation has smitten and shivered it, — it will stand in some semblance of worth and majesty, because of the unseen and indirect support that is yet afforded from the tap-roots that strike down into the sub-soil of feeling, and the fibres that are twisted in some corners of the social heart.

So much for the broad law, and the general manifestations of it. Let us notice, next, some of the indirect influences which, as individuals, we are continually receiving from society, and from our companions and friends. We cannot tell how much we derive in this way. A great part of what we know and of what we learn of our opinions and general views — the tone of our judgments, etc. — comes to us and is formed through the spontaneous action of our faculties upon the materials thrown in our way, and the experience which the world forces upon us, rather than by the deliberate reflection and intentional activity of the intellect. We are but slightly conscious, at the time, of the complicated influences that surround us, the various motives that besiege us, or impel us, and the diverse materials that help to build up and draw out our characters. Society is continually acting upon us, not only through our voluntary absorption, but through all the pores of our spiritual nature.

Past ages have an indirect effect upon us, through the institutions they have bequeathed and the general spirit of the civilization they have helped to form. The author of "Euthanasia" and "Martyria" has finely and truly said, "In my character there are the effects of Paul's journey to Damascus, and of the meeting of King John and the barons at Runnymede. There is in my soul the seriousness of the many conflicts, famines, and pestilences of early English times. And of my enthusiasm, some of the warmth is from fiery words which my forefathers thrilled to, in the times of the Commonwealth and of the Reformation. There is in me what has come of the tenderness with which mothers nursed their children, ages ago; and there is that in me which is holy, and which began from a forty days' fast in a wilderness in Judea, now eighteen hundred years since." Every man we meet, every emergency in which we are thrown, leaves its impress, slight or palpable, upon the soul. Just as every particle of food we take, and every breath we inhale, contributes something to the nourishment or injury of the frame; just as we are unconscious of the play of the lungs, the flow of the blood, and of the operation of the forces that digest and assimilate our food; so our characters derive some elements for healthy or unhealthy growth from each of the occasions of life; and all these are digested and worked into our spiritual substance by forces that play without our knowledge, and independent on the control of our will.

The most precious parts of education are those which men do not derive from books, and which they cannot tell how they acquired. Take that practical wisdom which we say comes from experience, and how is it acquired? or take that faculty which we term a shrewd and solid common sense, and how is it developed? Not by books, academies, and the apparatus of study, so much as by intercourse with society, and the training of every-day life, — the indirect culture and discipline which the street, the exchange, the market, the church, and constant communion with the many-sided world, pour sideways, as it were, into the intellect and heart.

GEORGE LIVERMORE.

George Livermore was born in Cambridge, Mass., 10th July, 1809. He received his education principally from the public schools of that place, and at a suitable age was placed in a "store," to fit him for a mercantile life. After some business experience on his own account, in different places, he entered into the wool commission business, in Boston; at first with an older brother, then in other connections. For many years, and at the time of his death, he was one of the prominent merchants in this line of business in Boston. He took pride to the last in being favorably known as a merchant.

Mr. Livermore very early had a great taste for books, which continued through life. He was fond of historical and antiquarian pursuits, but the special subject of his studies was the Bible and biblical literature, concerning which he had collected, with perhaps one exception, the finest private library in the country. He was eminent as a bibliographer, and was especially curious in collecting books to illustrate the history of printing. His library was also rich in large-paper copies and elegant illustrated editions; indeed, containing some of the finest specimens of whatever is recherché connected with the arts of book-printing or book-binding.

Mr. Livermore often wrote for the newspapers and reviews. His style was pure and vigorous; and whatever came from his pen of an historical nature, bore the marks of great thoroughness of research. In 1849, he wrote a series of articles in the Cambridge Chronicle, on the New England Primer, which were afterward collected into a volume, of which twelve copies only were printed for private distribution. In that year he also wrote an article for the Christian Examiner, on Strickland's History of the American Bible Society. The next year he contributed a paper to the North American Review on Public Libraries. In 1855, he wrote and printed, for private distribution, A Tribute to the Memory of James Johnson, a Merchant of the Old School. In 1862, he prepared and printed, at his own expense, an important paper—making a volume of 215 pages—which he entitled, An Historical Research respecting the Opinions of the Founders of the Republic on Negroes as Slaves, as Citizens, and as Soldiers—read before the Massachusetts Historical Society, 14th August, 1862. There were five editions of this work printed, including the edition printed in the Historical Society's proceedings. These were all on superior paper. The last edition was on superb large paper. In 1864, he wrote the annual report of the council of the Antiquarian Society, which he read at the meeting in October, at Worcester. In this he paid an admirable tribute to his venerable friend, the late Josiah Quincy—who had died during the year—and gave a discriminating analysis of his writings.

In 1849, Mr. Livermore was elected to the Massachusetts Historical Society, of which he was an efficient member. In 1850, Harvard College conferred on him the honorary degree of master of arts, and about that time he was elected a member of the Phi Beta Kappa Society, and also a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He was for many years a trustee of the Boston Athenæum, and was their vice-president at the time of his death.

Mr. Livermore not only claimed our respect as an honorable merchant and a scholar, but he won the love of all who had the privilege of knowing him, by the beautiful simplicity of his manners, the kindness of his heart, and, indeed, for all those qualities which constitute the Christian gentleman. He was eminently patriotic, and during the late rebellion gave liberally of his time, strength, and money to the cause of the Union and to the support of the Government. He died 30th August, 1865, after an illness of about three months, and was buried at Mount Auburn.

On the following Sunday a tribute was paid to his memory by the Rev. Mr. Hale, in a discourse on "The public service of a private man," from the pulpit of the South Congregational Church at Cambridge; and at a meeting the following month of the Massachusetts Historical Society at Boston, addresses on occasion of his death were made by the Hon. Robert

C. Winthrop, the president of the society, and by Mr. Charles Deane. Both spoke warmly of his manly virtues and of his love of letters, the latter giving various particulars of the formation of his biblical library, of his studies, of his acquaintance with Dibdin on a visit to England, of his intimacy with Mr. Dowse, whose valuable library he was the means of securing to the society, and of other incidents of his relation to literature.

SAMUEL IRENÆUS PRIME

Was born in Ballston, Saratoga County, New York, November 4, 1812. He graduated at Williams College, Massachusetts, in 1829, studied at the Princeton Theological Seminary, and became a minister of the Presbyterian Church. In 1840, being induced by ill health, he retired from the ministry, and has since been engaged in the editorship of the New York Observer. He has published Travels in Europe and the East, the result of his observations on a foreign tour (1855); Letters from Switzerland, another record of travel (1860); and several works of a devotional character, among which may be mentioned Thoughts on the Death of Little Children, The Power of Prayer, a sketch of the Fulton Street (New York) prayer-meeting; Walking with God, and Life Hid with Christ in God. The Alhambra and the Kremlin, appeared in 1873.

WILLIAM COWPER PRIME,

A brother of the preceding, was born in Cambridge, Washington County, New York, October 31, 1825. He was educated at the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and has since pursued the profession in the city of New York. His writings are numerous, including the Owl Creek Letters, a series of papers contributed to the New York Journal of Commerce; The Old House by the River, a volume of tales and sketches, published in 1853; and Later Years (1854). Mr. Prime's more recent works, by which he is chiefly known, relate to his travels in the East in 1855-6. He has published Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia, and Tent Life in the Holy Land. He has also lectured before the New York Historical Society on subjects of Egyptian antiquities. In 1860 he edited an illustrated work on Coins, Medals, and Seals, subjects on which he has bestowed much attention.

Mr. Prime's next publication was a small volume entitled, O Mother Dear, Jerusalem; The Old Hymn, its Origin and Genealogy. In this a venerable hymn, derived from the Apocalypse, and many an invocation of subsequent Christian writers, is presented in the version of David Dickson, a Scottish clergyman of the seventeenth century, supported by various poems of the Latin Church, of similar import. The author in the preface expresses his indebtedness in the work to the Rev. Dr. Bonar, of Scotland, who has edited the hymn in a volume of curious research, published in Edinburgh in 1852. In 1868 he edited the Passio Christi of Albert Durer. I Go-A-Fishing appeared in 1873.

R. T. S. LOWELL.

Robert Traill Spence Lowell, an elder brother of James Russell Lowell, was born in Boston,

October 8, 1816. He passed his schoolboy days at the celebrated establishment at Round Hill, Northampton, and was graduated at Harvard in 1833. After studying medicine, he changed his plan of life for theology, and was ordained a minister of the Church of England by the Bishop of Newfoundland and Bermuda. He was first stationed at the last-named group of islands as the bishop's chaplain. He next removed to Newfoundland, where he became rector of the village of Bay Roberts. Here he remained until, in consequence of overwork as a commissioner for the distribution of food, during a season of famine, he was forced to remove to a more genial clime, and, returning to the United States, became rector of Christ's Church, Newark. His next parochial charge was at Duanesburg, N. Y.; and he has since held the Head Mastership of a large classical school.

Mr. Lowell published in 1858, at Boston, a novel in two volumes, bearing the title, The New Priest in Conception Bay. It is an original work, forcible in style, philosophical, picturesque, and humorous. The few lines of prelude or preface indicate its temper and quality: "Religious novels there are many: this is not one of them. These Figures, of gentle, simple, sad and merry, were drawn (not in a Day) upon the Walls of a House of Exile. Will the great World care for them?"

The scene of The New Priest is placed in a fishing village on the coast of Newfoundland. The main interest of the story turns on the abduction of a young girl by some over-zealous Roman Catholics, and her subsequent recovery. The New Priest is a convert from the Church of England, who had, before the commencement of the book, abandoned his wife to take up the ministry of his new faith. Coming to Peterport in the exercise of his vocation, he finds his wife living in retirement, and is so influenced by her arguments, and by his disgust at the double-dealing of his associates in the conduct of the abduction, that he finally returns to the Anglican communion. He leaves for the mainland to make a public recantation to the bishop of the diocese, and on his return has to make an overland journey in the depth of winter. The time of his expected arrival having passed, his friends, accompanied by his wife, go out in search, and find him, near his journey's end, frozen to death. The generally grave character of the narrative is relieved by the introduction of a comic character, Mr. Bangs, of the United States, an impertinent Yankee.

In 1861, Mr. Lowell published a small volume of poems, with the fanciful title, Fresh Hearts that Failed Three Thousand Years ago; with Other Things. Many are suggested by incidents in the author's career, and all are in a serious, reflective vein. The poems are vigorous in thought, harmonious, and suggestive. A later edition of these poems, with additions, appeared in 1864, entitled, The Poems of Robert Lowell.

THE RELIEF OF LUCKNOW.

Are there not many that remember (who can forget!) that scene in the Sikh war,—also in India,—when the distant gleam of arms and flash of friendly uniform were descried by a little exhausted army among the hills, and the Scotch pipes struck up "Oh! but ye were lang a-comin'!" (Lachrymamne tenentis, amici? None of us, that have much Scottish blood, can keep our eyes from moistening.) The incident in the present case may not be historical, but it is true to nature, and intrinsically probable, which is all that poetry needs, in that respect.

Oh! that last day in Lucknow fort!
We knew that it was the last;
That the enemy's mines had crept surely in,
And the end was coming fast.

To yield to that foe was worse than death;
And the men and we all worked on:
It was one day more, of smoke and roar,
And then it would all be done.

There was one of us, a Corporal's wife,
A fair, young, gentle thing,
Wasted with fever in the siege,
And her mind was wandering.

She lay on the ground, in her Scottish plaid,
And I took her head on my knee;
"When my father comes hame frae the plough,"
she said,
"Oh! please then waken me."

She slept like a child on her father's floor,
In the flicking of woodbine-shade,
When the house-dog sprawls by the half-open
door,
And the mother's wheel is stayed.

It was smoke and roar and powder-stench,
And hopeless waiting for death;
But the soldier's wife, like a full-tired child,
Seemed scarce to draw her breath.

I sank to sleep, and I had my dream
Of an English village-lane,
And wall and garden;—but a wild scream
Brought me back to the roar again.

There Jessie Brown stood listening,
Until sudden gladness broke
All over her face, and she took my hand
And drew me near and spoke:

"The Highlanders! Oh! dinna ye hear?
The slogan far awa?
The McGregor's? Ah! I ken it weel;
It's the grandest o' them a'.

"God bless thae bonny Highlanders!
We're saved! We're saved!" she cried;
And fell on her knees, and thanks to God
Poured forth, like a full flood-tide.

Along the battery-line her cry
Had fallen among the men:
And they started; for they were there to die;
Was life so near them, then?

They listened, for life; and the rattling fire
Far off, and the far-off roar
Were all;—and the Colonel shook his head,
And they turned to their guns once more.

Then Jessie said, "That slogan's dune;
But can ye no hear them, noo,
'The Campbell's are comin'?' It's no a dream;
Our succors hae broken through!"

We heard the roar and the rattle afar,
But the pipes we could not hear;
So the men plied their work of hopeless war,
And knew that the end was near.

It was not long ere it must be heard;
A shrilling, ceaseless sound;
It was no noise of the strife afar,
Or the sappers underground.

It was the pipes of the Highlanders,
And now they played "Auld Lang Syne,"
It came to our men, like the voice of God,
And they shouted along the line.

And they wept and shook one another's hands,
And the women sobbed in a crowd;
And every one knelt down where we stood,
And we all thanked God aloud.

That happy day, when we welcomed them,
Our men put Jessie first;
And the General took her hand, and cheers
From the men, like a volley, burst.

And the pipers' ribbons and tartan streamed,
Marching round and round our line;
And our joyful cheers were broken with tears,
For the pipes played "Auld Lang Syne."

WILLIAM WHITING.

The Hon. William Whiting was born at Concord, Massachusetts, March 3, 1813. He is descended from Rev. Samuel Whiting, who was a clergyman at Boston, England, and was a gentleman of fortune and culture. He came to this country in 1836, and was soon after settled at Lynn, Massachusetts. Mr. Whiting was graduated at Harvard University in 1833, studied his profession at the Cambridge Law School under Judge Story and Professor Greenleaf, and commenced practice in Boston about the year 1838. He soon rose to a high rank at the bar, and for many years has had an extensive practice in the courts of the United States in several of the Northern States. Many cases in which he has been engaged have been of great importance, and have involved large interests. Although he was always averse from taking any active part in politics, and had repeatedly declined office, yet he was strongly opposed to slavery; and, in 1860, he made several public addresses, and ardently advocated the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency. After the war broke out, Mr. Whiting's speeches show that he was occupied in discussing the great questions of the day. He advocated an entire change in the policy of the country in carrying on the war. He claimed that the Government had, under the Constitution, full belligerent rights against those who inhabited the States declared in rebellion—the right to emancipate their slaves, to capture their property, and to use all other rights of war against the public enemy. These views were not at first appreciated by the members of Congress, to whom they were communicated in 1861, but were received with respect, and Mr. Whiting was urged to put his opinions in writing; and soon after he published his first work on these subjects, entitled, The War Powers of the President and the Legislative Powers of Congress in Relation to Rebellion, Treason, and Slavery. The book soon attracted the attention of the leading statesmen of the country, and was received by them with profound satisfaction. The principles therein set forth were very soon fully sanctioned and adopted by President Lincoln and by the Departments. This work first formulated the war powers of the country. It was called for from all quarters, and more than one edition was sent for from England, France, and other foreign countries. It has passed through ten editions in Boston and seventeen in New York, and is still the hand-book of the American statesman. The later editions are printed with other more recent writings on the same class of subjects, viz.: Military Arrests in Time of War; Reconstruction of the Union, or the Return of the Rebellious States; and Military Government.

In 1862, Mr. Whiting was summoned by the Government to Washington, where, for nearly three years, his strong powers were devoted to aid the President and some members of the Cabinet to decide the great and novel questions of law which have grown out of the war. Many of his opinions, as solicitor of the War Department, and relating to the military laws, have, from time to time, been published by the Government. His public services at Washington were thus in the highest degree laborious and responsible. But he always refused to receive any salary or compensation for all he did. For five years he was president of the N. E. Historical and Genealogical Society.

Mr. Whiting printed in 1871, for private circulation, a genealogical work, entitled: Memoirs of Rev. Samuel Whiting and of His Wife, Elizabeth St. John; with reference to some of their English Ancestors and American Descendants (8vo., pp. 334). In 1872, he received the degree of LL.D. from Colby University, and the same year he was elected to the Forty-Third Congress. He died in Boston, June 28, 1873.

HENRY WHITNEY BELLOWES.

Dr. Bellows was born in Boston, Mass., June 11, 1814, was educated at Harvard College and at the Divinity School at Cambridge, where he completed his course in 1837. At the opening of the following year he was ordained pastor of the First Congregational Church in New York. In 1846 he was one of the principal originators of the Christian Inquirer, a weekly newspaper of the Unitarian denomination, published in New York, to which he has been a frequent contributor. His occasional publications of pamphlets, articles in the Christian Examiner, and discourses, are numerous. In 1857, Dr. Bellows delivered a course of lectures before the Lowell Institute, in Boston, on The Treatment of Social Diseases. In the same year he delivered an address at the Academy of Music, New York, before the American Dramatic Fund Society, for the benefit of the fund. This was published with the title, The Relation of Public Amusements to Public Morality, especially of the Theatre to the Highest Interests of Humanity. This address was at once a plea with the serious or religious portion of the community for tolerance and support of a well-conducted stage, and an appeal to the theatrical profession for the improvement and moral responsibility of the acted drama. In 1860, Dr. Bellows published, in New York, a volume of discourses, entitled, Restatements of Christian Doctrine, in Twenty-five Sermons. In a review of this volume in the Christian Examiner, the writer remarks: "The literary style of Dr. Bellows is his own, the very type and weapon of an individualized power.

It is the style of a worker, an entirely business style, not very compact, classic, or finished, but pointed and effective, ever seeking its end, relieved from all dryness by a perpetual dew of sentiment, open as the dawn, and often lighted up with gleams of unsought brilliance."

During the "War for the Union," Dr. Bellows has filled an important position as the head of the United States Sanitary Commission for the relief of the wants of the army. In 1864 he visited California, to supply for a time the Unitarian pulpit, suddenly vacated by the death of his friend, the Rev. Thomas Starr King.

Henry W. Bellows

 Dr. Bellows printed in 1866, as "an address to his own congregation," a pamphlet entitled: Public Life in Washington, or, The Family Aspects of the National Capital, and the Apparent Tendencies of Political Thought and Feeling in Congress and Cabinet. The two following years he spent abroad on the Continent. After seeing Paris and the Exposition, which gave him an insight into the aspects of French life, he entered Prussia by way of Belgium and Holland, and took much pains, by repeated tours through Germany, to study the condition of its religion and social life. Switzerland, the valley of the Rhone, Austria, and Italy were traversed at leisure. From Messina he sailed to Egypt, and ascended the Nile; then, after exploring Syria and the sacred scenes of Palestine, he turned his face homeward, passing through Asia Minor, Greece and Italy to Paris, then in the hectic height of its gayety. The sights and thoughtful impressions of this visit were embodied in two attractive volumes, in 1868: The Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868.

 DISSOLUTION OF THE PRUSSIAN PARLIAMENT IN 1867
— FROM THE OLD WORLD IN ITS NEW FACE.

Sitting among a favored few in the tribune, or gallery, to which tickets from our minister had admitted us, we looked down upon the gathering of this gorgeous assemblage. Entering informally as they arrived, one or two at a time, we had an opportunity to watch somewhat deliberately their individual appearance. Half, at least, were either soldiers or in military uniforms, of all kinds and degrees of splendor—red, white, green—but always profusely covered with gold lace, and commonly hung about with orders and stars, sashes and ribbons. Another portion were in their usual court dress, which is a kind of Quaker coat that has broken out into colors and gold lace. A few ecclesiastics or professors, in solemn gown and cape, with an order or two on their breasts shining all the more brilliantly from its black background, moved in the motley throng.

Perhaps fifty gentlemen in plain clothes were mixed in the assembly. There were no seats for this assembly, notwithstanding the venerable and infirm appearance of a large number of them. Indeed, the advanced age of most officials and notabilities in Prussia is one of the characteristic features of a civilization where routine and slowness of advancement are painfully in the way of merit and vigor. A few chairs on one side of the simple throne (a classic chair upon a slightly raised platform) were reserved for the privy council and ministers of State, and in these, at three o'clock, twenty dignitaries took their places, with Bismarck at the left nearest the throne. Suddenly a herald announced the King in a loud voice, and William I. came unattended, cap in hand, and at once ascended the platform. He was in full uniform of a dark green, and in boots and spurs, and, after bowing to the assembly, put on his cavalry cap with its fountain plume. One short, simultaneous and percussive "Owa" welcomed him. Bismarck advanced, and, with a very low salute, put the open portfolio containing the royal speech into the King's hands. He read it in a simple and rather awkward manner, without pretension and without effect. One suppressed murmur of applause greeted the close of a paragraph referring to the harmony of the session. At the close (the reading could not have taken three minutes) Bismarck took the address from the King's hands, and, turning toward the assembly, pronounced the parliament, in the name of the King, dissolved. The King bowed and immediately descended from the throne (he had not once sat down), and left the hall amid a few hearty huzzas. Bismarck was dressed in the same white uniform I had seen him in at the Emperor's ball at Paris. He wore jack-boots and spurs. His fine, great head upon his tall, full figure gave him a marked superiority over the whole assembly. Power, prudence, self-possession, capacity, success, are stamped upon his features and bearing. If he is worn with care, he does not show it; perhaps he carries it in those great sacks that hang under his eyes! He seems about fifty-four and thoroughly well preserved. His habits are careful. He rides on horseback, and bathes in summer in the open river, a few miles from the town. He seems to possess much of the attainments of John Quincy Adams, with a tact in statesmanship that never marked that powerful politician. If he had fallen from the skies he could not have come more opportunely, or with qualifications more out of the usual line of German statesmanship. Knowing all that German statesmen ever knew, he has a thoroughly un-German dash and practical quality in him that marks him out from his predecessors, and leaves him wholly alone in his kind. With unsurpassed courage and competency, he possesses distinguished prudence and self-control. He does not undertake the impossible, nor invent a policy. He merely shapes and articulates a public sentiment which for a hundred years has waited for its crystallizing moment. He is not a moral genius, nor are disinterestedness and pure philanthropy his inspirers. But he is a patriot, and sees Prussia's opportunity to lead Germany to her destiny, and perhaps no man could possess qualities or antecedents better fitted to the work. An aristocrat, he puts himself at the head of the party of movement, and advocates all possible reforms in the interests of a larger liberty and a freer life. He swallows and digests his antecedents, and evidently despises all criticism which merely convicts him of disagreement with himself where the disagreement is necessary and born of new circumstances and new opportunities. He is clearly a whole head and shoulders above not only his cotemporaries in Prussia, but European statesmen in general; and the more I see of the slack, tape-tied, broken-spirited character of German politicians—dreamy, mechanical, wordy, theoretical and inefficient—the more I admire the prompt, incisive, practical and bold qualities of this redeemer of Germany.

JOSEPH E. D. COMSTOCK.

Joseph E. D. Comstock was born at South Kingston, Rhode Island. He is the son of Dr. Joseph Comstock and Sarah Robinson Perry, and a lineal descendant of quaint Francis Quarles, author of the Emblems, &c.

His father, Dr. Joseph Comstock, now living (1864), has been a contributor to the press, principally on medical and scientific subjects, for more than sixty years, writing in 1803 for the late Dr. Samuel L. Mitchill, of New York, who there established the first medical journal published in the United States. Dr. Comstock was the author of The Tongue of Time, a large volume crowded with curious and useful scientific facts.

Mr. Comstock's articles, in prose or verse—usually without signature, or with a fictitious one—have been published in Littell's Living Age, Hogg's (Edinburgh) Instructor, Eclectic Magazine, Graham's Magazine, the New York Daily Times, and various other daily and weekly journals. One of his poems, The Door, is written with delicacy, and is familiar to many readers. Another, Nature's Sweet Monosyllables, is a quaint and pleasing poem of fifty verses, expressing in each the sentiment involved in some such object as tree, star, bird, brook, &c.

ELIZABETH A. COMSTOCK.

Mrs. Elizabeth A. Comstock, wife of the preceding, was born in 1817, in New York city, and died 1860. Her parents were Quakers. Her father was for many years a merchant of the old school in New York, and one of the foremost members of the sect to which he belonged.

Her earliest productions were published by Mrs. Child; later ones by Mrs. Kirkland, in the Union Magazine, sometimes with the signature of Elizabeth Emmet, which was the maiden name of her mother.

Tête-à-tête at Heidelberg appeared in the Knickerbocker Magazine, where other passages from her pen, with various signatures, were printed. Her articles, in prose or verse, have also been published in many daily and weekly journals, including the New York Evening Post, Independent, and Littell's Living Age. Her Hymn to the Cross, Snow Thoughts, and Suffering have been especially admired.

LUTHER FARNHAM.

The Rev. Luther Farnham, descended from ancestors among the first settlers of the town of Concord, New Hampshire, was born in that town in 1816. He was educated at Dartmouth College and at Andover Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1841. In 1844, he became pastor of the Congregational Church at Northfield, Massachusetts. In the following year he resigned his office and removed to Boston, which has since been his residence. Soon after this removal he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits, as one of the editors of the Christian Alliance, and also, of the Massachusetts Ploughman. For twelve years he was a regular correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce; writing also for the New York Observer, Hunt's Magazine, and other periodicals. In 1855, he published A Glance at Private Libraries, in an 8vo pamphlet. He has also ready for publication a History of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society. From 1855-61, he was secretary of the Southern Aid Society, a home missionary association to aid especially in preaching the gospel to the poor whites and blacks of the South and Southwest. In 1862, he was elected secretary of the "General Theological Library," a unique institution, founded in Boston that year, "to benefit all religious denominations, and to promote the interests of religion and the increase and diffusion of theological learning," which position he still retains. He has collected thirty-two thousand dollars for its endowment, and a library of eleven thousand volumes.

Mr. Farnham, during his ministry of thirty-three years, has travelled one hundred thousand miles, and delivered, within eleven States, more than three thousand sermons and addresses, collecting in that period sixty thousand dollars for missionary and charitable enterprises. He is now the acting pastor of the Congregational Church, West Gloucester, Mass. He has devoted the leisure hours of four years to the preparation of a history of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and that work will probably be published the present year.

ABEL STEVENS.

An eminent historian of the Methodist Church, was born in Philadelphia, January 19, 1815. He was educated at the Wilbraham Academy, Massachusetts, and at the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut. He was early settled as pastor of a Methodist church in Boston. He travelled in Europe in 1837, and on his return to the United States was stationed for about three years in Providence, Rhode Island. In 1840 he removed to Boston, and edited a religious newspaper—Zion's Herald. In 1852, he became editor, at New York, of the National Magazine, published by the Methodist Book Concern in that city. He visited Europe again in 1855, and on his return, in 1856, was elected editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal.

The editorial duties of Dr. Stevens made him acquainted with various fragments and materials of Methodist church history, which he wrought into a regular narrative. The first volume which he published, devoted to this subject, was entitled, Memorials of the Introduction of Methodism into the United States, comprising Biographical Notices of its Early Preachers, Sketches of its First Churches, and Reminiscences of its Early Struggles and Successes. This was followed by a second series, entitled, Memorials of the Early Progress of Methodism in the Eastern States. These two volumes of Memorials were preliminary to a more elaborate work from the author's pen, published in three volumes (New York, 1859-62), The History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century called Methodism, considered in its Different Denominational Forms and its Relations to British and American Protestantism. This work is devoted to a survey of general Methodism, centralizing in the British "Wesleyan Connection." As a complement to this history, Mr. Stevens has written a History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America, four volumes of which, embracing "the Planting and Training of American Methodism" in the times preceding and during the Revolutionary War, and down to 1820, were published in 1864-7. The style of these works is eminently graphic. They are replete with anecdote and interesting biographical details, and are written with unflagging industry and enthusiasm.

In addition to these historical works, Dr. Stevens has published several volumes, entitled Church Polity; The Preaching Required by the Times; Sketches and Incidents, a Budget from the Saddle-Bags of an Itinerant; The Great Reform; Centenary of American Methodism, 1866; and The Women of Methodism: Its Three Foundresses, Susannah Wesley, the Countess of Huntingdon, and Barbara Heck, 1866.

The "Memoirs" and other writings of the kind by Dr. Stevens have led to the production of various others illustrating the history of Methodism in America. "They have been followed," says he, "by one effect for which I have especially to congratulate myself: they were the first in that numerous series of local narratives of the denomination which have since enriched us with our best historical materials. 'Memorials of Methodism in New Jersey,' by Atkinson; 'Annals of Southern Methodism,' by Deems; 'Sketches of Western Methodism,' and several similar works, by Finley; 'Methodism within the Troy Conference,' by Parks; 'Early Methodism within the Bounds of the Old Genesee Conference,' by Peck; 'Sketches and Collections,' by Carroll; 'Lost Chapters,' and 'The Heroes,' by Wakeley; 'The Heroines,' by Coles; 'Methodism in Canada,' by Playter; 'Methodism in America,' by Lednum; 'German Methodist Preachers,' by Miller; and many similar and equally valuable works, besides almost innumerable biographical contributions to our history, have, since, been incessantly issuing from the press, and it seems probable that few remarkable documents or reminiscences of our early times will now be allowed to perish."^{*}

* THE LAST DAYS OF WHITEFIELD—FROM HISTORY OF METHODISM.

In May he appeared again among the enthusiastic crowds of Philadelphia, preaching twice on Sunday, besides three or four times during the rest of the week. All ranks flocked to hear him, and now even the Episcopal churches were all open to him. The salutary effects of his former labors were everywhere obvious. He made an excursion from the city over a circuit of a hundred and fifty miles, preaching every day. So many doors were open, he wrote, that he knew not which way to turn. He turned finally to

New York, where he preached "to congregations larger than ever." He passed up the Hudson River, and made a tour of more than five hundred miles, preaching at Albany, Schenectady, Great Barrington, and many other places. He reached the New York frontier of that day; for as late as the Revolution the white population west of the Hudson scarcely extended back sixty miles to Cherry Valley, Johnstown, and some scattered settlements in Otsego, Montgomery, and Herkimer counties; and such was still the power of the Indian tribes, that during the war Schenectady itself was likely at one time to become the prominent point of the Western boundary of the state. "O what new scenes of usefulness are opening in various points of this world," wrote Whitefield, as he returned. He saw the gates of the Northwest opening, those mighty gates through which the nations have since been passing, as in grand procession, but he was not to enter there; the everlasting gates were opening for him, and he was hastening toward them. The last entry in his memoranda relates to his labors on this tour up the Hudson: "I heard afterward that the word ran and was glorified. Grace! grace!" He had preached with his usual zeal, and at every possible point, in churches, in streets, in fields, and at one time on the coffin of a criminal, beneath the gallows, to thousands of hearers; "Solemn! solemn!" he wrote; "effectual good, I hope, was done. Grace! grace!"

From New York he went to Boston, and wrote in one of his latest letters that never was the word received with greater eagerness than now, and that all opposition seemed to cease. He passed on to Newbury, where he was attacked with sudden illness; but recovering, he resumed his route to Portsmouth, N. H. During six days he preached there and in the vicinity every day. Returning he addressed a vast assembly in the open air at Exeter. His emotion carried him away, and he prolonged his discourse through two hours. It was an effort of stupendous eloquence—his last field triumph: the last of that series of mighty sermons which had been resounding like trumpet blasts for thirty-four years over England and America.

He departed the same day for Newburyport, where it was expected he would preach on the morrow. While at supper the pavement in front of the house, and even its hall, were crowded with people, impatient to hear a few words from his eloquent lips; but he was exhausted, and rising from the table, said to one of the clergymen who were with him, "Brother, you must speak to these dear people; I cannot say a word." Taking a candle he hastened toward his bedroom, but before reaching it he was arrested by the suggestion of his own generous heart that he ought not thus to desert the anxious crowd, hungering for the bread of life from his hands. He paused on the stairs to address them. He had preached his last sermon; this was to be his last exhortation. It would seem that some pensive misgiving, some vague presentiment touched his soul with the saddening apprehension that the moments were too precious to be lost in rest; he lingered on the stairway, while the crowd gazed up at him with tearful eyes, as Elisha at the ascending prophet. His voice, never, perhaps, surpassed in its music and pathos, flowed on until the candle which he held in his hand burned away and went out in its socket! The next morning he was not, for God had taken him!

^{*} Dedicatory Preface to the "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States."

He died of an attack of asthma, September 30th, 1770, as the Sabbath sun was rising from the neighboring sea. The effulgence of the eternal day had risen upon his beneficent, his fervid, his consecrated life. He had slept comfortably till two o'clock in the morning, when he awoke his traveling attendant, and told him that his "asthma was coming on again." His companion recommended him not to preach so often as he had. "I would rather wear out than rust out," he replied. He had expressed a desire to die suddenly, and now realized his wish. He sat in his bed some time, praying that God would bless his preaching, his Bethesda school, the Tabernacle congregation, and "all connections on the other side of the water." He attempted again to sleep, but could not; he hastened to the open window, panting for breath. "I am dying," he exclaimed. A physician was called, but could give him no relief. At six o'clock he "fetched one gasp, stretched out his feet, and breathed no more."

While at the dinner-table of Finley, at Princeton, he had remarked: "I shall die silent. It has pleased God to enable me to bear so many testimonies for him during my life that he will require none from me when I die." The only words he uttered during his agony were, "I am dying."

Many hundreds followed him to the grave. All the bells of the town were tolled; the flags of the shipping in the harbor were hung at half mast, and mourning guns were fired from their decks. Funeral sermons were preached in the principal cities of America. The magistrates of Georgia assembled in mourning at the State House, and led a procession to hear his funeral sermon at the church, which was hung in black; and it is said that all the cloth suitable for mourning in the stores of the colony was bought up.

The news of his death reached London early in November. The Methodist chapels were hung with mourning drapery. He left Wesley a mourning ring, and had appointed him to preach his funeral sermon. Wesley pronounced the discourse at the Tabernacle, and repeated it at Tottenham Court, Greenwich Tabernacle, Deptford, and elsewhere, remarking in his Journal: "In every place I wish to show all possible respect to the memory of that great and good man." Charles Wesley published an elegy on his death, which does as much credit to his own genius and heart as to the character of his friend.

Whitefield's remains rest beneath the pulpit of the Federal-street Church, Newburyport. A massive marble cenotaph commemorates him near the altar. Many pilgrims visit the venerable church to honor his memory. Passing into an adjacent vestry, the visitor descends, with his guide and lanterns, through a door in the floor into a crypt, and thence, by a side door, into the vault, extending under the pulpit, where, between two ancient pastors of the church, lies the open coffin of the great evangelist. The bare and decaying bones lie upon a slight bed of mold formed of the dust of the body.

Whitefield was a man of no great intelligence, and of less learning, but of unquestionable genius; perhaps the greatest known, in the greatest or at least the rarest power of genius—eloquence.

HENRY HARBAUGH,

An eminent divine of the German Reformed Church, was born near Waynesboro, Franklin County, Pennsylvania, October 28, 1817. His great-grandfather emigrated from Switzerland in 1736. His father was a farmer, and Henry worked on the farm till he was nineteen years of age. The latter went to Ohio in 1836, where he alternately labored, taught school, and studied at an academy till 1840; he then went to Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, and carried on his studies in Marshall College and the Theological Seminary till the fall of 1843, when he was licensed and ordained, and became pastor of the German Reformed Congregation in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania. In April, 1850, he was called to the pastorate of the First German Reformed Congregation in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, where he labored till October, 1860. He then, having received the degree of doctor of divinity from Union College, Schenectady, was called to be pastor of St. John's Reformed Church, at Lebanon, Pennsylvania. In October, 1863, he was elected by the Synod of the German Reformed Church professor of systematic and practical theology in the Theological Seminary at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, and entered upon his duties January 1, 1864.

The writings of Dr. Harbaugh, chiefly on subjects of devotional and practical theology and Christian biography, are numerous. His style is at once pointed, warm, and animated. The fervor of his compositions, supported by his habits of thought and extensive reading, with his judicious choice of subjects, have given his books a widely extended popular support. The following, exclusive of a number of pamphlets on various subjects, and articles of a theological character contributed to the Mercersburg Review, is a complete list of his productions to the present time:—

Heaven; or, An Earnest and Scriptural Inquiry into the Abode of the Sainted Dead (290 pages. Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston. The first edition published 1848. The twelfth was a revised edition, published 1855. Up to the year 1865, eighteen editions were issued). This work, as also the two following, is practical in its design; but aims to develop practical views from a deeper theological and philosophical substructure than is generally the case in practical religious works, with a view of giving greater definiteness to our thoughts and reflections in regard to our future life. It discusses the questions: Is heaven a place? Where is heaven?—reviewing the various theories on this subject. Do the saints pass immediately at death into heaven?—with a review of all the theories. Nearly the whole latter half of the volume is devoted to the sympathy between heaven and earth, under the general heads of Divine, Angelic, and Sainly Sympathy.

The Heavenly Recognition; or, An Earnest and Scriptural Discussion of the Question, Will we Know our Friends in Heaven? (288 pages. Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1851. Twenty-two editions published.) This work traces the history of the doctrine of heavenly recognition in heathen religions, exhibits its Scripture foundations, presents its history in the thinking of the Church, and develops and applies its practical uses, especially in the way of consolation to the bereaved and sorrowing.

The Heavenly Home; or, The Employments and Enjoyments of the Saints in Heaven (365 pages. Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1853. Thirteen editions have been published). This work, after showing how the undertones of the heavenly life are discernible in the substructure of the present life, as exhibited both in pagan ideas of future happiness and in Christian foretastes of it, proceeds to discuss the degrees of happiness in heaven, exhibits the harmony of Scripture and astronomy in relation to the heavenly place, discusses the relation of this place to the bliss of the saints, develops at length the doctrine of the glorified body and glorified spirits, enlarges on the beatific vision and heavenly worship, and concludes with a discussion in relation to infants in heaven. These three volumes together constitute one work on the Future Life, and are also published under this title in a uniform edition as well as separately.

Union with the Church, the Solemn Duty and the Blessed Privilege of All who would be Saved (127 pages, Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1853. Three editions have been published). The object of this work is to meet the case of that class of persons who are well-meaning and favorably disposed towards Christianity, but who do not go forward to make a profession of religion by union with the church. The objections and difficulties that present themselves before them are removed, and the reasons why union with the church is necessary are presented. The book is not written in the interest of any particular denomination, but is catholic in spirit.

The Birds of the Bible (300 pages, 4to. Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1854. Illustrated, two editions). In this work the birds mentioned in the Bible are described; and the passages relating to them illustrated from their nature and habits. A large amount of ancient, quaint, and curious literature concerning birds is interwoven with the descriptions.

The Life of Rev. Michael Schlatter; with a Full Account of his Travels and Labors among the Germans in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia; including his Services as Chaplain in the French and Indian War, and in the War of the Revolution, 1716 to 1790 (375 pages. Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1857). This is an account of the first German missionary sent to this country by the Reformed Synods of Holland, to organize and provide for the rising German Reformed congregations in the United States. It is, to some extent, also a history of the early German settlements in the Middle States.

The Fathers of the Reformed Church in Europe and America (in two volumes. Lancaster, Sprenger & Westhaeffer, 1857-1858), a biographical work, containing the lives of the most prominent reformers on the Reformed side of the Reformation, together with those who labored in the Reformed Church in America from 1726 to 1856.

The True Glory of Woman, as Portrayed in the Beautiful Life of the Virgin Mary, Mother of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (263 pages, Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1858. Three editions). The life of the Virgin Mother of Christ is held up as a model life for woman. In this view she is exhibited in the character of virgin, betrothed, wife, mother, disciple, and saint; after which, the claim that she is entitled to worship is reviewed and combated, and the question of her perpetual virginity discussed. In regard to the character and dignity of the Virgin Mary, the tone of the book throughout is, that while Romanism has unduly exalted her, Protestantism has fallen short of appreciating her full dignity, exaltation, and honor, as being so intimately and deeply associated with the mystery of the Incarnation.

A Plea for the Lord's Portion of a Christian's Wealth, in Life by Gift, at Death by Will (128 pages. Chambersburg, Pa., 1858).

Poems (285 pages. Philadelphia, 1860).

The Golden Censer; or, Devotions for Young Christians (419 pages. Philadelphia, Lindsay & Blakiston, 1860: three editions). This book contains prayers for the various circumstances of life, together with meditations and counsels.

Hymns and Chants; with Offices of Devotion for Use in Sunday Schools, Parochial and Week-day Schools, Seminaries and Colleges, arranged according to the Church-year (384 pages. Lebanon, Pa., published by St. John's Sunday School, 1861, four editions).

The Child's Catechism; containing a Lesson for Every Sunday in the Year, with Prayers and Hymns for Little Children; the whole adapted to the use of Parents and Sunday Schools (50 pages. Chambersburg, Pa., 1861).

The Guardian; devoted to the Social, Literary, and Religious Interests of Young Men and Ladies (a monthly magazine, commenced in 1850).

Christological Theology. Inaugural Address (75 pages. Philadelphia, S. R. Fisher & Co., 1864), exhibiting the christological principle as the fundamental want of the present age.

Dr. Harbaugh performed the duties of his professorship at Mercersburg till his death, December 28, 1867. His last literary labors included the writing of the lives of all the German Reformed ministers contained in McClintock and Strong's Biblical Cyclopædia, and the revival of the Mercersburg Review at the beginning of 1867. Three years later, a posthumous volume was published by the Reformed Church Publication Board, Philadelphia, entitled Harfe: Gedichte in Pennsylvanisch-Deutscher Mundart.

JAMES JACKSON JARVES.

Mr. Jarves was born in the city of Boston, August 20, 1818. A delicate constitution interfered with his plans of professional life, and compelled him, on arriving at man's estate, to become a traveller in southern climes. After visiting Brazil, Chili, and Peru, in the years 1837 and 1838, he established himself in the Sandwich Islands, receiving the appointment of United States Consul at Honolulu. He turned his opportunities of observation in this region, interesting in its romantic scenery and contrasts of recently established civilization, to account by the preparation of a History of the Hawaiian or Sandwich Islands, published at Boston in 1843, in an octavo volume. He has presented in this book a careful narrative of the early history of the Hawaiians, so far as it can be obtained from the scant hints of tradition. With the arrival of Captain Cook, a larger field is of course opened, and various narratives offer picturesque and authentic details. We have the account of Cook's intercourse with the natives fully set forth, with a careful discussion of the vexed question as to how far his unfortunate fate was due to his own imprudence. Mr. Jarves inclines to the opinion that the navigator acted rashly, and with a culpable disregard of the respect entertained by the natives for their rude divinities. The early efforts of American commerce at the island ports follow next in order, with the arrival and rapid success of the missionaries, to whose exertions Mr. Jarves attributes in a great degree the good order and enlightenment now prevalent. A new edition of this work, continuing the narrative to the present time, has been called for from the author.

Mr. Jarves published in the same year with his history, a volume of sketches of travel, entitled, Scenes and Scenery in the Sandwich Islands, and a Trip through Central America, 1837-1842.

In 1840 he contributed to the Americanization of the islands by establishing the Polynesian newspaper at Honolulu. It became, after a while, the official organ of the government, its editor receiving the title of "Director of the Government Press." He continued in this position until his final departure from the islands, in January, 1848. A recent Hawaiian journal gives emphatic testimony to the zeal and efficiency of this early newspaper. After referring to the necessity that then existed for a "newly formed and tongue-tied government" to avail itself of the power of the press, he continues: "Under its first director, J. J. Jarves, talented, witty, and keen, yet unscrupulous withal, a literary Talleyrand, the Government organ convinced or crushed out opposition at home, and succeeded in making itself heard abroad. Those who suffered from its errors will attest that its manly and free-spoken voice, its talents and industry, and its unswerving support of the Hawaiian cause, were, in a moral point of view, worth more to the government than than all the other new-made and still untried institutions together."

On his return home, in 1849, Mr. Jarves received the appointment of the king's special commissioner to negotiate treaties with the United States, France, and Great Britain, a significant recognition of his previous services to the Hawaiian government.

In 1851, he visited Europe on a tour of health and study. His first halt was at Paris, where he remained a year, turning the time to good account by the production of a pleasant work, published in New York by the Harpers, entitled, Parisian Views seen through American Spectacles. It was reprinted in England, and circulated largely in France, until interdicted by the government, on account of its free comment on the stirring events transpiring in the capital at the time of its composition. The work is illustrated by clever designs on wood, selected from recent French publications on the inexhaustible topic of the gay metropolis. It presents a pleasant picture of Parisian interiors, from première to cinquième, the out-door life of street and garden, the humors of café and ball-room.

In 1862, Mr. Jarves removed to Florence, where he passed several years, making frequent excursions in various parts of Italy, and employing his time in the pleasant study of art. In 1855, he published a volume, Italian Lights and Papal Principles, a collection of sketches originally contributed to Harper's Magazine. Another volume, Art Hints, appeared in London in the same year, and was afterwards republished by the Harpers. This work expanded, with the increasing zeal and experience of the author, into Art Studies, a beautifully printed quarto volume of five hundred pages. The volume is principally devoted to a history of Italian art, closing with the career of Michael Angelo and Raphael. The author has turned his rare opportunities of study to excellent account, describing from personal observation the great works of the early fresco painters, on mouldering and rain-stained walls, in quiet old out-of-the-way Italian towns. It is by far the most elaborate work on the subject which has yet been produced in America. It is illustrated by outline drawings from the author's gallery of works by the early Italian masters, collected during his residence in Italy.

In 1857, Mr. Jarves published at Boston a volume, entitled The Confessions of an Inquirer, being the first part of a projected reply to the question, "Why and What am I?" This portion is described as "a narrative of educational experiments and conclusions, embracing a wide and varied field of adventure, erratic, and often at war with commonly received opinions, but earnest, sincere, and thoughtful." The same year, Mr. Jarves published Kiana, a Tradition of Hawaii.

 In three recent volumes, Mr. Jarves has continued to present the results of his studies in the fine arts, with the special object of quickening the spirit of art in America. These works comprise: Art Idea, being the second part of The Confessions of an Inquirer, 1864; The Art Idea: Sculpture, Painting, and Architecture in America, 1866; and Art Thoughts: the Experiences and Observations of an American Amateur in Europe, 1869 — the latter published as his matured and final convictions.

HENRY WARD BEECHER

Was born June 24, 1813, in Litchfield, Connecticut, where his father, the Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher, was at the time engaged in his pastoral duties. Henry graduated at Amherst College, Massachusetts, in 1834, and studied divinity at the Lane Theological Seminary, at Cincinnati, of which his father had become president. His first ministerial charge was in 1837, of a Presbyterian congregation at Lawrenceburgh, Indiana, whence he removed to Indianapolis in 1839, where he remained till 1847, when he accepted the pastorate of the Congregational Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, New York. His oratory, ranging from the usual themes of moral and theological discussion over the vast field of social and political reforms, with frequent reference to negro slavery and the national agitations which have grown out of this question, has given his pulpit a wide celebrity. This influence, exerted upon an always crowded congregation, drawn from the population of Brooklyn and New York, and the throng of visitors from all parts of the country, constantly assembling in these large cities, has been still further greatly extended by the preacher's popularity as a public lecturer. He is also in the enjoyment of an extensive reputation through his contributions to the religious press, chiefly the Independent newspaper of New York, a journal of which he was one of the founders.

The first of the published volumes of his writings, bearing the title, Lectures to Young Men on Various Important Subjects, such as idleness, dishonesty, gambling, dissipation, popular amusements, was printed at Indianapolis, Indiana, in 1844. The style is terse and vigorous, in an earnest vein of expostulation. Several scores of thousands of this work have been published in America, and there have been two reprints of it in England. In 1855 appeared a volume entitled, Star Papers; or, Experiences of Art and Nature, being collections of articles from the Independent, originally signed with a star. A second series of these contributions has been issued, called New Star Papers; or, Views and Experiences of Religious Subjects, which has been republished in England with the title, "Summer in the Soul." These productions are marked by an easy, familiar tone, eloquent and often poetic, with a practical knowledge of life, its duties and its privileges, which is the secret of much of their interest. Following the Star Papers came two volumes of fragments taken down from extemporaneous discourses at the Plymouth Church. They were prepared by ladies of the congregation: the first by Miss Edna Dean Proctor, having the title, Life Thoughts; the second by Miss Augusta Moore, called, Notes from Plymouth Pulpit. Both of these works have had a large circulation in America, and have been republished in England. A few disconnected sentences from the latter will indicate something of the spirit and style of those happy sayings in the pulpit which have doubtless greatly assisted the preacher's popularity: "She was a woman, and by so much nearer to God as that makes one." "A man's religion is not a thing made in heaven, and then let down and shoved into him. It is his own conduct and life. A man has no more religion than he acts out in his life." "When men complain to me of low spirits, I tell them to take care of their health, to trust in the Lord, and to do good, as a cure." "Men are not put into this world to be everlastingly fiddled on by the fingers of joy."

Besides these "beauties" of Mr. Beecher's discourses, an extensive series of the sermons has appeared in a regular weekly report of them taken from his lips, morning and evening, at the Plymouth Church, and published, the one in New York, the other in Boston, respectively in the columns of the Independent and the Traveller.

There is another volume of Mr. Beecher's writings, made up from a series of early articles contributed to a newspaper in Indiana, the Western Farmer and Guardian. It relates to horticultural topics, and has the title, Plain and Pleasant Talk about Fruits, Flowers, and Farming. The papers, the author tells us, were first suggested by the multifarious knowledge on these subjects to be found in the works of the English gardener Loudon; but the naked facts in Mr. Beecher's mind spring up a living growth of ideas, ornamented with cheerful and profitable associations. He always writes of the country with a lover's minuteness and a healthy enthusiasm.

Another series of papers, originally contributed by Mr. Beecher to the New York Ledger, with the title, "Thoughts as they occur; by One who keeps his Eyes and Ears open," was published, with the title, Eyes and Ears, in Boston, in 1862. Like his other writings, they are of an ingenious, practical turn, teaching the art of profit and enjoyment in familiar objects.

In 1862 Mr. Beecher visited England, and rendered an important service to his country by his eloquent vindication of the policy of the American government in the war which it was maintaining for the preservation of the Union. A collection of his discourses on topics suggested by the times, entitled Freedom and War, was published the following year in Boston. As the war was approaching its conclusion, in April, 1865, Mr. Beecher, at the request of the government, delivered an oration at Fort Sumter, on the anniversary of its fall, and the formal restoration of the national flag by Major Anderson.

Of Mr. Beecher's many lectures or addresses, few if any have compared in interest with his oration at New York, in January, 1859, at the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the birthday of Robert Burns. It was rather biographical than critical, balancing with a kind but impartial treatment the virtues and failings of the poet's character.

Mr. Beecher has edited the Plymouth Collection of Hymns and Tunes, a work largely in use in the churches that practise congregational singing.

Mr. Beecher in 1867 wrote for the New York Ledger a novel, entitled Norwood; or, Village Life in New England. Over 370,000 copies of the number containing its first chapters were printed; and the completed work appeared as a volume in the year following. In the attractive character of Dr. Wentworth, the author has full scope to express his philosophic views of life, his poetic love of nature and art, from the standpoint of a cultured and whole-souled representative of humanity. The undertone of the story is essentially religious. It is marked by the large-hearted liberality of spirit so characteristic of its writer, as especially noticeable in the powerful death-scene of an eccentric old sailor, Tommy Taft. A large part of its incidents are related to the struggle of the late war, wherein its hero is engaged from the fall of Sumter to the victory of Gettysburg.

The Life of Jesus the Christ: Part I—Earlier Scenes,—of which the introductory Overture of the Angels came out as a holiday instalment in 1869—was published in 1872. It included the period of the Sermon on the Mount and the earlier labors in Galilee. It was undertaken, to use its prefatory words, "in the hope of inspiring a deeper interest in the noble personage of whom these matchless histories, the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, are the authentic memorials. I have endeavored to present scenes that occurred two thousand years ago as they would appear to modern eyes if the events had taken place in our day. The Jesus of the four Evangelists for well nigh two thousand years has exerted a powerful influence upon the heart, the understanding, and the imagination of mankind. It is that Jesus, and not a modern substitute, I have sought to depict, in his life, his social relations, his disposition, and his doctrines."

In 1872 Mr. Beecher accepted the "Lyman Beecher Lectureship on Preaching," recently founded in the theological department of Yale College, to give three annual courses of lectures. The first series, reported as delivered, was printed as Yale Lectures on Preaching. It contained a masterly analysis of Preaching, and the qualifications of the Preacher as demanded by the best interests of the present age. The second year was devoted to "a consideration of the social and religious machinery as connected with preaching;" and the third to "the method of using Christian doctrines, in their relations to individual dispositions, and to the wants of communities."

Plymouth Pulpit, issued since September, 1868, in the form of octavo weekly pamphlets and semi-annual volumes, has contained a series of phonographic reports of Mr. Beecher's sermons, and has had a wide popularity. A volume of Prayers from Plymouth Pulpit, preserved verbatim by a member of this congregation without his pastor's knowledge, was allowed to be printed in 1867. Lecture-Room Talks: a Series of Familiar Discourses on Themes of Christian Experience followed three years later. Two volumes of Sermons by Henry Ward Beecher: Selected from Published and Unpublished Discourses, and Revised by their Author, appeared in 1868 under the editorship of Lyman Abbott. Several volumes of selections from his discourses have also been published: Royal Truths, 1866, reprinted from a series of extracts prepared in England without his knowledge; and Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises, edited by Lyman Abbott, 1870.

Mr. Beecher has edited The Christian Union since its establishment in 1870. He also contributed an introduction to Una and her Pupils: Memorials of Agnes Elizabeth Jones, 1872. A uniform edition of his copyright works is in preparation, with his Lectures to Young Men as an introductory volume, 1873. It will include a volume of speeches delivered and published in England, in 1863, on the American Question.

As the impress of Mr. Beecher on the present age has been chiefly owing to his magnetic power as an orator and preacher—"one keenly sympathetic to all that concerns humanity, thoroughly wide awake to the needs of the Nineteenth century, and in earnest, morally and spiritually profoundly in earnest, although he may tip one of his keenest shafts with a smile"—the disabilities of utterance that accompanied his childhood, as narrated by his sister, add another name to the list of great orators, headed by Demosthenes and Cicero, who have mastered themselves and mankind through great difficulties:

"Henry Ward was not marked out by the prophecies of partial friends for any brilliant future. He had precisely the organization which often passes for dullness in early boyhood. He had great deficiency in verbal memory, a deficiency marked in him through life; he was excessively sensitive to praise and blame, extremely diffident, and with a power of yearning, undeveloped emotion, which he neither understood nor could express. His utterances were thick and indistinct, partly from bashfulness, and partly from an enlargement of the tonsils of the throat, so that in speaking or reading he was with difficulty understood. In forecasting his horoscope, had any one then taken the trouble to do it, the last success that would ever have been predicted would have been that of an orator. 'When Henry is sent with a message,' said a good aunt, 'I always have to make him say it three times. The first time I have no manner of an idea, no more than if he spoke Choctaw; the second I catch now and then a word; by the third time I begin to understand.' . . . When he was ten years old, he was a stocky, strong, well-grown boy, loyal in duty, trained in unquestioning obedience, inured to patient hard work, inured also to the hearing and discussing of all the great theological problems of Calvinism, which were always reverberating in his hearing; but as to any mechanical culture, in an extremely backward state—a poor writer, a miserable speller, with a thick utterance, and a bashful reticence which seemed like stolid stupidity."*

Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher, who contributes frequent articles to The Christian Union, has written one work of fiction, which appeared anonymously in 1859: From Dawn to Daylight: A Simple Story of a Western Home. By a Minister's Wife. Written to relieve the hours of a tedious convalescence, it was published to show laymen how, by considerate kindness and prompt payments, they could strengthen the hands of their pastors. Her Motherly Talks with Young Housekeepers appeared in 1873.

The three brothers of Henry Ward Beecher, all of whom are in the ministry, are each known by a work of marked individuality. Charles (born in 1815), by the Autobiography and Correspondence of Lyman Beecher, the father, 1864. Edward (born in 1804), by The Conflict of Ages, 1854, The Concord of Ages, 1858, a work on Baptism, and one on the Papacy; and Thomas K. (born in 1824), by Our Seven Churches: Eight Lectures, designed to discourage sectarianism and promote Christian brotherhood, 1870. From the Autobiography we extract a chapter which strikingly indicates the personal individuality of these various members of the Beecher family.

 FAMILY HISTORY OF THE BEECHERS—FROM AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF LYMAN BEECHER.

Between the widely-scattered children and their home a constant intercourse was maintained by means of correspondence; and, to insure a greater regularity, a system of "circulars" was devised. A large folio sheet was taken at the eastern end of the line and sent to the next westward, each one adding something, till the full sheet reached the western extreme, and was returned to its starting-point, and vice versa. We have before us one of these interesting letters missive, with the following postmarks and directions upon it: New Orleans, La.; Jacksonville, Ill.; Walnut Hills, Ohio; Indianapolis, Ind.; Chillicothe, Ohio; Zanesville, Ohio; Batavia, N. Y.; Hartford, Ct. One direction. Rev. Mr. Beecher, served for all except the two extremes. Merely as a specimen of the method, we insert a paragraph or two from each locality.

* Men of Our Times: art. Henry Ward Beecher, by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, p. 509.

Charles.

"Brother George's perfectionism is a curious matter, and lies in a nut-shell. That a Christian can be perfect is evident, else God commands impossibilities. Whether they ever are or not, who can decide? Does a man think himself perfect? Amen. I hope he is not mistaken. So long as he behaves well, let him pass for immaculate. If he does not behave properly, he deceives himself. If you ask, 'Have I attained?' I say, Ask God. The more you try to decide, and the nearer you come to an affirmative, the more probable is it you are deceived. The heart is deceitful: who can know it?"

Mrs. Edward Beecher.

"We received this yesterday, and I hasten to add my say and pass it along. I suppose that we are to pour our sorrows as well as our joys into each other's bosoms through the medium of these circulars, for we should sympathize with each other in affliction as well as in blessings. Our little daughter (you know she is the only daughter that we have ever had, and therefore very dear to us) we have had much anxiety about, because she was a crying child; but she had improved so much in this respect, and appeared generally so well, that we had dismissed most of our fears till a few weeks ago, when she was a little over seven months. I was dressing her in the morning, when I perceived all at once that she was in a convulsion fit. The pang that shot through my heart I can not describe to you. No one can understand it who has not watched for days, and weeks, and months, day and night, the writhings, distortions, and agonies of a beloved object, hoping all the time that death would terminate its sufferings, and fearing that something worse than death would be the result; and then, by degrees, to have every hope extinguished, and that being, which promised so fair to be a comfort and a blessing, prove a constant source of trouble, care, and perplexity. We have lost, or more than lost, three of our six children, and what the Lord means to do with this fourth we know not."

Henry Ward.

"There are some signs of better things among my people; more feeling in church and congregation, and more solemn meetings, and in some cases of incipient anxiety—just that state of things that encourages, yet makes me feel most powerless.

"I wish, George, you could be here a while and help me. I would, if you were here, have continuous preaching, and believe immense good could be done. I thought it possible you might be able to come. Besides, we have grown almost strangers to each other since you groped off to Rochester, and I would fain have some of our long talks again. As to perfectionism, I am not greatly troubled with the fact of it in myself, or the doctrine of it in you; for I feel sure that if you give yourself time and prayer you will settle down right, whatever the right may be; and I rejoice, on this account, that your judgment has led you to forbear publishing, because, after we have published, if we do not hit exactly right, there is a vehement temptation not to advance, but rather to nurse and defend our published views. The treatises which have had influence in this world from generation to generation are those which have been matured, re-thought, re-cast, delayed. Apples that ripen early are apt to be worm-eaten, and decay early, at any rate; late fruit always keeps best. * * * I have seen men by an injudicious effort run so high up aground that there never was a tide high enough to float them again. They dried, shrunk, and rattled. May God never let you run ashore until it is upon the shores of that land of peace where perplexities shall cease their tormenting flight, and all be joy!"

Mrs. Stowe.

"Well, George, it seems to be the fashion of the day to address you firstly and prime; and I, setting apart metaphysics, will enter only that interesting department of physics which your gift of flower-seeds brings to mind. Many thanks for them, hoping that you and S— will be here to see them in all their glory. I have a fine place laid out for them, and shall proceed with them secundum artem. What is your experience about dahlias? for I was never more puzzled in my life than with the contradictory directions I hear about soil, etc. Some say the richest you can find—can't be too rich; and the other day a celebrated gardener of New York advocated dry gravel. What do you think? If you don't write pretty soon it will be too late. I have some roots which might be handsome if they only would be; but last year they brought forth little besides stalks and buds, and some of them run out into single flowers."

Catharine.

"Where is the eastern circular that started from Hartford, or ought to have started, two months since? I shall recommend that any one that delays a circular over a week shall lose the reading of the return one, as a penalty to make them remember. I shall flit about here this summer till I find where it is best to settle next. Love to you all."

Dr. Beecher.

"William, why do you not write to your father? Are you not my first-born son? Did I not carry you over bogs a-fishing, a-straddle of my neck, on my shoulders, and, besides clothing and feeding, whip you often to make a man of you as you are, and would not have been without? and have I not always loved you, and borne you on my heart, as the claims and trials of a first-born demand? Don't you remember studying theology with your father while sawing and splitting wood in that wood-house in Green Street, Boston, near by where you found your wife?"

"Little do those know who have rented that tenement since how much orthodoxy was developed and embodied there; and now why should all this fruit of my labors be kept to yourself! Nothing would give me more pleasure, so long have your interests and mine been identified, than to hear often what and how you are, and how things go on all around you. Our prospects at the seminary are good. I am obliged to work too hard; still, my health is good, and we shall certainly get along now, as I fully believe. Let me hear from you soon—a letter to me in particular, which shall soon be repaid in kind.”

Professor Stowe.

“DEAR BROTHER GEORGE,—As to perfectionism, Brother Charles ‘spresses my mind ‘xactly,’ and I trust you will duly appreciate the patriarchal, paternal, grandfatherly, and most judicious counsel of Brother Henry. Brother Charles’s advice as to faith, and Brother Henry’s as to works, on this perfection matter, are just the thing, according to the best judgment of your dutiful brother.”

George.

“I am quite amused with the sympathy of all my brothers, and their fatherly advice touching perfectionism, as if I were on the verge of a great precipice; but I trust in Him that is able to keep me from falling.”

William.

“We received the circular, and forward it today. The Lord has been with us, and there is now a great amount of labor to be done, and great difficulties yet to be overcome. We expect to build a vestry and repair to the amount of $1000.”

Perhaps these extracts may fail to interest a general reader; and, it must be confessed, they convey a very inadequate conception of the variety of subjects, interests, emotions, shades of thought, and flashes of wit and humor which make these circulars a kind of moral kaleidoscope—ever changing, ever beautiful. By them, many families, wide asunder in locality, of independent and often antagonistic views, were bound together, year after year, in more than patriarchal unity.

*JESUS, HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE—FROM LIFE OF JESUS, THE CHRIST.

No man will ever succeed in so reproducing an age long past that it shall seem to the beholder as it did to those who lived in it. Even if one is in possession of all the facts, and has skill to draw a perfect picture, he cannot prevent our looking upon a past age with modern eyes, and with feelings and associations that will put into the picture the coloring of our own time. But we can approach the times and spirit of Roman life, or of life in Athens in the days of Socrates, far more readily and easily than we can the Jewish life in the time of Christ. He was of the Shemitic race; we are of the Japhetic. The orderliness of our thought, the regulated perceptions, the logical arrangements, the rigorous subordination of feeling to volition, the supremacy of reason over sentiment and imagination, which characterize our day, make it almost impossible for us to be in full sympathy with people who had little genius for abstractions, and whose thought moved in such association with feeling and imagination that to the methodical man of the West much of Oriental literature which is most esteemed in its home seems like a glittering dream or a gorgeous fantasy.

But the attempt to reproduce the person and mind of Jesus, aside from the transcendent elevation of the subject, meets with a serious obstacle in our unconscious preconceptions. We cannot see him in Galilee, nor in Judæa, just as he was. We look back upon him through a blaze of light. The utmost care will not wholly prevent our beholding Jesus through the medium of subsequent history. It is not the Jesus who suffered in Palestine that we behold, but the Christ that has since filled the world with his name. It is difficult to put back into the simple mechanic citizen Him whom ages have exalted to Divinity. Even if we could strain out the color of history, we could not stop the beatings of the heart, nor disenchant the imagination, nor forget those personal struggles and deep experiences which have connected our lives in so strange a manner with his. We cannot lay aside our faith like a garment, nor change at will our yearning and affection for Christ, so as not to see him in the light of our own hearts. His very name is a love-name, and kindles in tender and grateful natures a kind of poetry of feeling. As at evening we see the sun through an atmosphere which the sun itself has filled with vapor, and by which its color and dimensions are changed to the eye, so we see in Jesus the qualities which he has inspired in us.

Such a state of mind inclines one to devotion, rather than to philosophical accuracy. The exalted idea which we hold of Jesus, and our implicit and reverential view of his Divinity, still tend, as they have tended hitherto, to give an ideal color to his person and to his actual appearance among men in the times in which he lived. It is unconsciously assumed that the inward Divinity manifested itself in his form and mien. We see him in imagination, not as they saw him who accompanied with him from the beginning, but under the dazzling reflection of two thousand years of adoration. To men of his own times he was simply a citizen. He came to earth to be a man, and succeeded so perfectly that he seemed to his own age and to his followers to be only a man. That he was remarkable for purity and for power of an extraordinary kind, that he was a great prophet, and lived in the enjoyment of peculiar favor with God, and in the exercise of prerogatives not vouchsafed to mere men, was fully admitted; but until after his resurrection, none even of his disciples, and still less any in the circle beyond, seem to have held that view of his person which we are prone to form when in imagination we go back to Palestine, carrying with us the ideas, the pictures, the worship, which long years of training have bred in us.

There is one conversation recorded which bears directly on this very point, namely, the impression which Jesus made upon his own time and countrymen. It was near the end of his first year of ministry. He was in the neighborhood of Cæsarea Philippi, north of Galilee, where he had been engaged in wayside prayer with his disciples. By combining the narratives in the synoptic Gospels we have the following striking conversation.

“Whom do men say that I, the Son of Man, am?”

And the disciples answered and said: “Some say that thou art John the Baptist; but some say Elijah, and others say Jeremiah, or that one of the old prophets is risen again.”

And Jesus saith unto them: “But whom say ye that I am?”

Simon Peter answered and said unto him: “Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.”

This, it is true, is an explicit avowal of the speaker’s belief that Jesus was the Messiah. But how imperfect the reigning expectation of even the most intelligent Jews must have been, in regard to that long-expected personage, need not be set forth. That the disciples themselves had but the most vague and unsatisfying notion is shown, not alone by their whole career until after the Lord's ascension, but by the instruction which Jesus proceeded to give them in immediate connection with this conversation. He began to make known to them what should befall him at Jerusalem, his sufferings, his death and resurrection; whereat Peter rebuked him, and was himself reproved for the unworthiness of his conceptions.

There is absolutely nothing to determine the personal appearance of Jesus. Some ideas of his bearing, and many of his habits, may be gathered from incidental elements recorded in the Gospels. But to his form, his height, the character of his face, or of any single feature of it, there is not the slightest allusion. Had Jesus lived in Greece, we should have had a very close portraiture of his person and countenance. Of the great men of Greece — of Socrates, of Demosthenes, of Pericles, and of many others — we have more or less accurate details of personal appearance. Coins and statues reveal the features of the Roman contemporaries of Jesus; but of Him, the one historic personage of whose form and face the whole world most desires some knowledge, there is not a trace or a hint. The disciples were neither literary nor artistic men. It is doubtful whether the genius of the race to which they belonged ever inclined them to personal descriptions or delineations.

The religion and the patriotism of the Greek incited him to fill his temples with statues of gods, and with the busts of heroes and of patriots. The Greek artist was scrupulously trained to the study of the human form, with special reference to its representation in art. But the Jew was forbidden to make any image or likeness or symbol of Divinity. The prohibition, though primarily confined to Deity, could not but affect the whole education in art; and it is not surprising that there was no Jewish art, — that paintings and statues were unknown, — that Solomon's Temple was the single specimen of pure Jewish architecture of which there is any history. Probably even that was Phœnician, or, as some think, Persian.

But when men have not formed the habit of representing external things from an artistic point of view, they do not observe them closely. We cannot, therefore, wonder that there is nothing which was at any time said by the common people, or by their teachers and rulers, and that nothing fell out upon his trial, among Roman spectators, and nothing in the subsequent history, which throws a ray of light upon the personal appearance of Jesus of Nazareth.

We know not whether he was of moderate height or tall, whether his hair was dark or light, whether his eyes were blue, or gray, or piercing black. We have no hint of mouth or brow, of posture, gesture, or of those personal peculiarities which give to every man his individual look. All is blank, although four separate accounts of him were written within fifty years of his early life. He is to us a personal power without a form, a name of wonder without portraiture. It is true that there is a conventional head of Christ, which has come down to us through the schools of art, but it is of no direct historic value.

The early Fathers were divided in opinion, whether our Lord had that dignity and beauty which became so exalted a person, or whether he was uncomely and insignificant in appearance.

Both views appealed to the prophecies of the Old Testament respecting the Messiah: "Thou art fairer than the children of men; grace is poured into thy lips; therefore God hath blessed thee forever. Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most Mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty." (Psalm xlv. 2, 3.)

On the other hand: "Who hath believed our report? And to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground; he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him." (Isaiah liii. 1, 2.)

As men adhered to the one or the other of these and like passages, they formed their theory of Christ's personal appearance. During the persecutions of the second and third centuries, the poor and despised Christian found it pleasant to believe that his Master was, though very God, yet as insignificant outwardly, and as wretched, as the most vulgar of his disciples. But when Christianity began to triumph, and to hold the sceptre of government, it was very natural that its votaries should desire to give to its founder a more regal aspect. St. Jerome inveighed against the earlier view, contending that, had our Lord not carried a truly Divine countenance, his disciples would not so implicitly have obeyed and followed him at his first call. It was not far, probably, from the beginning of the fourth century that the famous letter was forged, purporting to have been written by Publius Lentulus, a friend of Pilate, and a contemporary of Jesus, of which we shall soon speak.

It is plain, from a comparison of passages, that his gentle and attractive manners, which made him accessible to the poor, the outcast, and the despised, were accompanied by an imperial manner which none ever presumed upon. Indeed, we have incidental mention of the awe which he inspired, even in those who had the right to intimate familiarity. "And none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord." All three of the synoptical Gospels mention the effect produced by his bearing and by his answers to vexatious questions. "And after that, they durst not ask him any question at all."

There is a poor kind of dignity, that never allows itself to be excited, that is guarded against all surprises, that restrains the expression of sudden interest, that holds on its cold and careful way as if superior to the evanescent moods of common men. Such was not Christ's dignity. No one seemed more a man among men in all the inflections of human moods than did Jesus. With the utmost simplicity he suffered the events of life to throw their lights and shadows upon his soul. He was "grieved," he was "angry," he was "surprised," he "marvelled." In short, his soul moved through all the moods of human experience; and while he rose to sublime communion with God, he was also a man among men; while he rebuked self-indulgence and frivolity, he cheerfully partook of innocent enjoyments; while he denounced the insincerity or burdensome teachings of the Pharisees, he did not separate himself from their society or from their social life, but even accepted their hospitality, and his dinner discourses contain some of his most pungent teachings.

We have purposely omitted those views of Christ which, through the unfolding process of his life and teaching, developed at length, in the Apostles' minds, to the full and clear revelation of Divinity. We have sketched him as he must have appeared during his ministry, when men were gazing upon him in wonder, thinking that he was "that prophet," or "Elijah," or that Messiah "that should come."

We must not, then, take with us, in following out the life of Jesus, the conception of a formidable being, terrible in holiness. We must clothe him in our imagination with traits that made little children run to him; that made mothers long to have him touch their babies; that won to him the poor and suffering; that made the rich and influential throw wide open the doors of their houses to him; that brought around him a company of noble women, who travelled with him, attended to his wants, and supplied his necessities from their own wealth; that irresistibly attracted those other women, in whom vice had not yet destroyed all longing for a better life; that excited among the learned a vehement curiosity of disputation, while the unlettered declared that he spake as one having authority. He was the great Master of nature, observing its laws, laying all his plans in consonance with the fixed order of things even in his miracles; seeming to violate nature, only because he knew that nature is not only and alone that small circle which touches and includes physical matter, but a larger province, enclosing the great spiritual world, including God himself therein.

*THE SEPULCHRE IN THE GARDEN.

. . . 1. There is a sepulchre in every garden. We are all of us in this life seeking for beauty and seeking for joy, following the blind instincts of our nature, every one of which was made to point up to something higher than that which the present realizes. We are often, almost without aim, without any true guidance, seeking to plant this life so that it shall be to us what a garden is. And we seek out the fairest flowers, and will have none but the best fruits. Striving against the noxious weed, striving against the stinky soil, striving against the inequalities of the season, still these are our hope. Whatever may be our way of life, whatever may be the instrumentalities which we employ, that which we mean is Eden. It is this that they mean who seek the structures of power, and follow the leadings of ambition. This they mean who dig for golden treasures, not to see the shining of the gold, but to use it as a power for fashioning happiness. They who build a home and surround themselves with all the sweet enjoyments of social life are but planting a garden. The scholar has his garden. The statesman, too, has a fancied Eden with fruit and flower. The humble, and those that stand high, are all of them seeking to clothe the barren experiences of this world with buds that blossom, blossoms that shall bear fruit. No man sees the sepulchre among his flowers. There shall be no lurking corner for the tempter, overleaping the wall of their happiness, to hover around their fair paradise! There shall be nothing there that shall represent time, and decay, and wickedness, and sorrow! Man's un-instructed idea of happiness in this life is that of a serene heaven without a cloud—a smooth earth without a furrow—a fair sward without a rock. It is the hope and expectation of men, the world over (and it makes no difference what their civilization is, what their culture, or what their teaching), that they shall plant their garden, and have flowers without thorns, summer without a winter, a garden without a rock, a rock without a sepulchre!

It makes very little difference that we see other men's delusions. Nay, we stand upon the wall of our particular experience, as upon the walls of a garden, to moralize upon the follies of other men. And when they have their hands pierced in plucking their best fruits, when disappointments come to their plantings, we wonder that they should be so blind as to expect that this world could have joys without sorrows, or sunshine without storms. We carry instructions to them, and comfort them with the talk that this life is short and full of affliction; we speak to them of the wreaths to be worn by those who bear sorrows; and yet we go as fondly and expectantly to our dream of hope as ever. Ah! it was the cradle of your neighbor that was left empty, and not your own! That fair blossom that was picked was plucked from the next household! You turn with even more than your wonted infatuation to your own cradle, to rejoice in its security. It shall never be desolate!

The experience of every fresh mourner is, "I knew that Death was in the world, but I never thought that my beloved could die." Every one that comes to the grave says, coming, "I never thought that I should bury my heart here." Though from the beginning of the world it hath been so; though the ocean itself would be overflowed if the drops of sorrow unexpected that have flowed should be gathered together and rolled into its deep places; though the life of man, without an exception, has been taken away in the midst of his expectations, and dashed with sorrow, yet no man learns the lesson taught by these facts, and every man lays out his paradise afresh, and runs the furrow of execution around about it, and marks out its alleys and beds, and plants flowers and fruits, and cultures them with a love that sees no change and expects no sorrow!

No man means to have anything in his paradise but flowers and fruits. If there is a rock in it, it is only a rock for shadow and coolness, or a rock for decoration and beauty. No man will have a garden with a sepulchre in it. Your garden has no sepulchre in it. If you are young and fresh, if you are beginning life, you will hear this sermon as a poetic descendant, as a tender, musing homily. In the opening out of your expectant wealth and life it is all garden-like, but no sepulchre is there! There is no open mouth of consuming bankruptcies; there are no disappointments, miscalculations, and blunders that bring you to the earth; there is no dismaying of ambition—no thwarting or turning back of all-encompassing desires. There is fresh dew on the leaf, and rain at the root, and in your mind a full expectation that your garden shall blossom as the rose.

And thus men live as they have lived, every man making his life a garden planted; every man saying, "Flowers! flowers! flowers!" and when they come, every man saying, "They shall abide; they shall blossom in an endless summer." And we go round and round the secret place, the central place—we go round and round the point where in every man's experience there is a sepulchre—and we heed it not, and will not know it.

2. But, in spite of all this care and painstaking, there is no garden in the world, let it be as beautiful as it may, that has not in the midst of it a sepulchre. When we sit over against it with untaught hearts, we find out what we would not permit ourselves to know in all the earlier stages, though it was there all the time. Every one of us is traveling right toward the grave. I mean not the extreme of life; I mean not that common truth that every man is born to die; I include that; but I mean that every man has a sphere of life where there is a sepulchre in which all that makes his life valuable to him while he yet lives in this world is liable to be buried and hidden from his sight. There is no man that is sure of anything except of dying and living again. We see on every side such revelations, such changes, such surprises, such unexpected happenings and events, that it is not mere poetical moralizing to say that no man is certain of anything except death, to be succeeded by life.

*From Sermons by Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by Lyman Abbott.

A plow is coming from the far end of a long field, and a daisy stands nodding, and full of dew-dimples. That furrow is sure to strike the daisy. It casts its shadow as gayly, and exhales its gentle breath as freely, and stands as simple, and radiant, and expectant as ever; and yet that crushing furrow, which is turning and turning others in its course, is drawing near, and in a moment it whirls the heedless flower with sudden reversal under the sod!

And as is the daisy, with no power of thought, so are ten thousand thinking, sentient flowers of life, blossoming in places of peril and yet thinking that no furrow of disaster is running in toward them—that no iron plow of trouble is about to overturn them. Sometimes it dinly dawns upon us, when we see other men's mischiefs and wrongs, that we are in the same category with them, and that perhaps the storms which have overtaken them will overtake us also. But it is only for a moment, for we are artful to cover the ear and not listen to the voice that warns us of our danger.

And so, although every man's garden is planted without a sepulchre, yet every man's garden has a sepulchre, and he stands near it, and oftentimes lays his hand upon it, and is utterly ignorant of it. But it will open. No man will ever walk through this life and reverse the experience, "Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble." It comes to us all; not to make us sad, as we shall see by-and-by, but to make us sober; not to make us sorry, but to make us wise; not to make us despondent, but by its darkness to refresh us, as the night refreshes the day; not to impoverish us, but to enrich us as the plow enriches the field—to multiply our joy, as the seed is multiplied a hundred-fold by planting. Our conception of life is not divine, and our thought of garden-making is not inspired. Our earthly flowers are quickly planted, and they quickly bloom, and then they are gone; while God would plant those flowers which, by transplantation, shall live forever.

3. When, then, our sorrow comes, when we are in the unconstructed surprise of our trouble, when we first discover this sepulchre in our garden, we sit, as these women sat, over against the sepulchre, seeing, in our grief, nothing else but that. How strangely stupid is grief! How it neither learns nor knows, nor wishes to learn nor know! Grief is like the stamping of invisible ink. Great and glorious things are written with it, but they do not come out till they are brought out. It is not until heat has been applied to it, or until some chemical substance has been laid upon it, that that which was invisible begins to come forth in letter, and sentence, and meaning. In the first instance we see in life only death—we see in change destruction. When the sisters sat over against the door of the sepulchre, did they see the two thousand years that have passed triumphantly away? Did they see any thing but this: "Our Christ is gone?" And yet your Christ and my Christ came from their loss; myriad, myriad mourning hearts have had resurrection in the midst of their grief; and yet the sorrowful watchers looked at the seed-form of this result and saw nothing. What they regarded as the end of life was the very preparation for coronation; for Christ was silent that he might live again in tenfold power. They saw it not. They looked on the rock, and it was rock. They looked upon the stone door, and it was the stone door that estopped all their hope and expectation. They mourned, and wept, and went away, and came again, drawn by their hearts, to the sepulchre. Still it was a sepulchre, unprophetic, voiceless, lustreless.

So with us. Every man sits over against the sepulchre in his garden, in the first instance, and says, "It is grief; it is woe; it is immedicable trouble. I see no benefit in it. I will take no comfort from it." And yet, right in our deepest and worst mishaps, often and often, our Christ is lying, waiting for resurrection. Where our death seems to be, there our Saviour is. Where the end of hope is, there is the brightest beginning of fruition. Where the darkness is thickest, there the bright beaming light that never is to set is about to emerge.

 ROSE-CULTURE—FROM NORWOOD.

How happy are proud people! No. Rather how happy are people of pride! That does not hit it exactly.

How fortunate are people with a sovereign self-esteem! I appeal to every one who has ever felt the quality, whether pride or self-esteem. Either of them covers or describes that peculiar faculty which inspires in men the sense of their own being, of personal worth, of eminent selfness—not necessarily selfishness.

Why are they fortunate? In such persons there is apt to be a central content. They are always consciously right. They always speak aright. Whatever they do is right. Whatever they own is of the best. Whatever submits itself to their protection is right. Righteousness is the very quality of their experience. Why should you reason with them? It is cruel and useless—cruel to disturb such profound self-satisfaction in a world not too much given to happiness: and useless, because it is an instinct, not a conviction—an involuntary feeling, and not a deduction of reason.

But not all of this tribe of self-esteem are so happy. All the worse for them. If this potent force allies itself with conscience, the possessor may as well make up his mind to be in bondage all his life. Then the sense of ownership and self-appropriation acts chiefly in the sphere of Duty.

Agate Bissell could not be said to have pride of character so much as Pride of Duty. She saw every thing in the light of duty, and she measured duty by the high requisitions of an intense pride. Every one may see that she had business on hand for the rest of her life. Nothing was good that had not in it some relation to duty. There was no good in the beautiful, unless in some way allied to practical duty. Happiness, springing from duty, was not altogether to be condemned; yet it must be watched, as likely to take the temper out of the cutting edge of duty.

There was no member of Dr. Wentworth's family that did not feel the pressure of honest Agate's conscience, and respect it, too. It made no difference that her good sense restrained her from meddling with other people's consciences. It is impossible for an energetic nature to move about among men under the power of any great central faculty, and not electrify them. You may carry a torch for yourself, but cannot keep the light out of other people's eyes.

"Rose, have you put away your night-clothes?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Are you sure you folded them up and laid them in their proper place?"

A smile came over Rose's fair face, for she recollected that she had laid them on a chair and not under the pillow.

"Rose, it is just as easy to do things right as wrong. Go right up and place them as they ought to be, and then come down to your lesson." For, Rose was already a proficient with the needle, and for an hour in the morning and one in the afternoon she was under Agate's special instruction in reading and writing. But on Saturday the lessons were in the Scriptures and the Catechism. Rose, by nature, was one of the fortunate ones who obeyed those in command, and yet always had her own way. To suppress one tendency was only to open another. She was of a nature so full and vital, that her happiness seemed little checked because stopped in this or that direction.

"The dear child," said Agate, one day, to Mrs. Polly Marble, "is so good that I am afraid she may not live. If she should die, I don't think the Doctor would be good for much."

"I don't think you need take on 'bout it, Agate," said Mrs. Polly. "Mebbe you'll find enough human natur in her to suit you, afore you get through. I've seen just such children before. There's Hotchkiss — till his boy was ten years old he was so good that his folks was afeared he wa'n't long for this world. Ever since, tho', they have felt easier, for if there ever was a critter that had his full share of total depravity, it is that Paul Hotchkiss. If he's ever converted, tho', he'll be a smart man, especially if he has it thorough."

"That may be true, Mrs. Marble. In this world it is not safe to trust appearances."

"That's just what I say to my deacon. You know, Miss Agate, that there never was a kinder creatur nor a better man than he is, if it wa'n't for that wicked levity. After all I've done for him, I don't see that he's got over it a mite. I tell him that nobody is sure, as long as he is livin' in this world of temptation. When a man is safely in his coffin, then we may be comfortable — that is, if he had a hope."

"I sometimes think," said Agate, "that I should like Rose better, if she had a little more — well, a little more nature: — some sparks flung off now and then makes you sure there's fire, and that it is not all ashes."

"Well, I really think I shouldn't trouble myself about that. You can't tell by the way a bean comes up what sort of leaves it's goin' to have afterwards. Some children are like poke-weed. When it first comes up it's just as good to bile as 'sparagus. But in a few weeks it's so strong it would drive ye out of the house if you was to put it in the pot. Now, you know that the child is depraved. Everybody is, even ministers have it, tho' I really don't see but that grace has subdued it in Dr. Buell. Of course Rose is — and I shouldn't worry a bit if I was you. It'll come out in time."

"Mrs. Marble, if there's any such thing as spoiling her, the Doctor will do it. He's the strangest man that I ever heard of. Sometimes I think his books and his foreign learning have unsettled his religious belief. Would it not be dreadful if he was unsound! I know Dr. Buell don't think so. But you ought to hear him make fun of the Catechism! I have trouble enough with the children anyhow. The other Saturday morning, after I had got through the questions, Dr. Wentworth called Rose.

"Rose, what do the apple-trees principally teach?"

"Rose understands her father, and her face looked funny all over; but she turned to me as if she didn't want to make fun of the Catechism:

"Answer him, Rose," said I, "answer your father?"

"And, do you believe it, she looked at him with her great, full eyes, and said:

"They make me think how beautiful God is!"

"The Doctor didn't ask her any more questions, but went off with her in his arms down into the garden."

"Well, Agate, you needn't be discouraged. You know you have the promises. Besides, his wife is a precious woman; and that's in your favor."

"It would almost break my trust in God, if Rose shouldn't do well. No — nothing will ever do that, I hope! But then you can't have such a child by you for six or seven years, and not have your heart bound up in her. I can tell you, Mrs. Marble, there's more dangerous idols than those made of wood and stone."

"A good deal worse! 'Eyes have they, but they see not,' saith the prophet. Now, them idols that have pretty eyes, and see out of them too, is a good deal more to be fear'd. I tell my boys so, of'en."

"If any thing could spoil Rose, it would be the creatures the Doctor has 'round her. It seems to me as if he contrived to pick out the very worst folks, and let Rose run with them. There is that natural, Pete! I do believe Rose would go from me to him any day. The Doctor lets him carry her about the meadows, and woods, and down through the swamp, by half-days together."

"Well, I'd never consent to that. I'd like to see Pete Sawmill about my house! He'd get a piece of my mind about the quickest! He don't do her any good!"

"The Doctor thinks Pete is a true child of Nature. He is not more'n half-witted anyhow. But the fellow is curious about knowin' all sorts of things that are going on in the woods, especially if there is no use in them."

"That's what I tell the Deacon. 'Deacon Marble,' says I, 'if you would shove out of ye all your knowins that ain't worth knowin', and then fill up with sober matter, you would be a sight better deacon, and a better man.'"

"That's much so with folks in general."

"Yes; folks' heads is pretty much like their garrets, where all the rubbish and broken things they've no use for down stairs are stored away."

"As if Pete were not enough, Tommy Taft is round with Rose, and Hiram Beers rides her out every chance he can get. There's about twenty people in this town that seems to think that they own Rose!"

No other person could be allowed to say these things but herself. Should a neighbor, or one whom she less confided in than Polly Marble, indulge in unfavorable reflections, Agate would soon enable them to understand that they were meddling with affairs that did not concern them.

Now and then, however, but with reserve, she intimated to Mrs. Wentworth her fears for Rose's "bringing up;" for if there was one thing in this whole world which Agate had determined should come to pass, and had staked her life on it, it was that "Rose should grow up good and pious."

"Do see that child! She'll be stung to death, as sure as she's alive. Rose, Rose, come away from those bees—come here this minute! I do believe that child is in league with all the animal creation. Nothing is afraid of her, and she is afraid of nothing. See her stepping up nearer and nearer to those hives! I should have had as many stings stuck into me by this time as a baked ham has cloves! She comes home with her pockets full of trash, and with vines hanging about her neck, and with her hands full of bugs and worms. I've given up trying to manage her. It's in her, and it will come out. If you stop her at one thing she just goes straight off to another. And she's so good-natured and so quiet and sweet, that you never think it's wilfulness, but she's got her father's will in her, if it is covered up. She knows what she's about."

"Only yesterday I was sitting," said her mother, "in the bow-window, just as twilight was coming on, with my sewing in my lap, it was getting too dark to see well, when Rose came marching in:—'Ma, I've got something for you!' 'Bring it here, child,' said I. And she emptied her apron into my lap, in a sober and satisfied way. Of all things in this world; it was a great toad, speckled, fat—ugh! I screamed and flounced it upon the floor. I was startled in good earnest, for if there is any thing disgusting, next to a snake, or a green worm, or a spider, it is a toad."

"What did she do?"

"Do? She looked at me with surprise,—then demurely picked up the loathsome creature and walked out with it. I spoke so sharply that I was afraid I had hurt the poor child, and so I went out, and she was sitting on the offset laughing all over, as if it was the merriest experience of all her life!"

Quite unconscious of these remarks, the object of them, a chubby child of six years old, was standing by the very edge of the shelf on which scores of hives were ranged. Bees were flying out with great activity, and coming in, swinging heavily down, with laden thighs. At first a few whirled around Rose as if to warn her off. But seeing at a glance who it was, and reporting the news to their companions, their excitement and curiosity subsided, and the child was suffered to go as near as she pleased and to do as she liked. If one lit on her hand, she suffered it to creep over it undisturbed. Sometimes an in-flying bee would get caught in her hair; she took no pains to help it out; she suffered them to go and come as they would. Sometimes she would gather flowers and bring them toward the hives, and watch the workers as they eagerly sought the honey.

"That child is the doctor's own self in petticoats," said Agate Bissell. "I believe the Doctor could stuff his pockets full of bees," said his wife, "and they would be contented. But if I go near the bee-shed, the angry things fly at me as Rex does at a beggar. They know I am afraid of them. They dash at me with such a way, that I never wait to see what they mean to do, and so they chase me fairly out of that part of the garden."

"I wonder the Doctor will keep them; at any rate so many. There must be as many as fifty hives, and more coming on."

"Oh, it's his music. He would not hear a word against his bees. On bright days, that are still and warm, he lies down by the window yonder, on purpose to hear them hum and buzz. And, I confess, if I am only safe out of their reach, it is a pleasant sound. Though I do not want them to appropriate him, or make a hive out of his hat. Do you know he looked for it yesterday a half hour, and then found it among the bees? He says Rose carried it thither. I say Rose's father did. But the Doctor, you know, likes pleasant sounds, as a kind of mental stimulus. The pleasure of music, he says, consists in the thoughts and feelings which it excites in us. I don't know what bees can make him think of. But, if any thing troubles him he likes to get where he can hear the bees, and then he seems to grow quiet."

"That is better than to brace up with some things," said Agate.

"After that dreadful surgical case he came home looking like a dead man. His face was stern and ghastly. He couldn't eat on that day before he operated, and trembled when he left the house like a leaf. But they say as soon as he took the knife his hand was firm and his body like steel. When he reached home I could not get him food quick enough—he almost cried for it, and was sharp and peevish, till he had eaten enough, which I thought he never could do, and then he went out by the window, where he could see the verbenas and the beds of petunia, and the rows of gladiolus, and lay down, and let the bees chant to him. I quite forgave the creatures their spite at me, when I saw how much comfort he took. After a while he fell asleep, and woke up in half an hour as fresh and merry as he always is."

* * * * * ADVICE TO A FRESHMAN.—FROM NORWOOD.

Dr. Wentworth, to whom Barton was much endeared, went aside from his usual habit, and gave him some advice.

"Barton, I am sure of your courses. I shall lose faith in human nature if you do not hold an honorable career. You are more likely to break down in health. You are too fierce in pursuit, desperate in tenacity; and you have about knowledge the same avariciousness which one sees in men in matters of money—an insatiable greed of more, to which money is only like fuel to fire. Remember, that much of knowledge is growth, not accumulation. The life that one is living in, is the book that men more need to know than any other. Never outrun health. A broken-down scholar is like a razor without a handle. The finest edge on the best steel is beholden to the services of homely horn for ability to be useful. Keep an account with your brain. Sleep, food, air, and exercise, are your best friends. Don't cheat them, or cut their company. Don't fall into the vulgar idea that the mind is a warehouse and education a process of stuffing it full of goods. Don't think your mind to be a pick-axe, either, with which a student delves like an Irishman digging for ore. If you must have a figure, call it a sensitive plate, on which nature forms pictures. The more fine the surface and sensitive the quality, the truer and better will be the knowledge. Do not study for ideas alone, but train for condition. Get and keep a healthy brain. Keep it fine. Train it to sharp and accurate impressions. Give it lunge and vigor. Make it like a mirror, before nature, or a daguerrean plate! Barton, don't mope. Be a boy as long as you live. Laugh a good deal. Frolic every day. Keep up high spirits. A low tone of mind is unhealthy. There's food and medicine in nerve. Quantity and quality of nerve mark the distinctions between animals and between men, from the bottom of creation to the top. Now, Barton, if you come home with your cheeks sunken, and with your eyes staring out of a hollow pit, I will disown you. Good-bye, my dear fellow. God bless you," said the doctor, at the same time taking Barton's hand in both of his, and giving him a cordial adieu, which Barton felt with grateful warmth at his heart for weeks after.

HENRY WILSON.

This energetic and successful statesman was born in Farnington, New Hampshire, on the 16th day of February, 1812, and is most emphatically a self-made man. His parents being poor, he was early apprenticed to a neighboring farmer by the name of Knight, and his hand and heart were early brought to battle with hardship and adversity. Mr. Wilson's educational advantages were as limited as those of Abraham Lincoln; but, like him, he made amends for this in spending his evenings in poring over useful books. He most fortunately had access to the well-stored library of a sister of the late Judge Woodbury; and so well did he make use of it, that on reaching the age of one-and-twenty, he had read, and sometimes re-read, nearly a thousand volumes of English and American history, together with the then published numbers of the North American Review. On completing his minority, Mr. Wilson came to Boston, and thence to Natick, Massachusetts, where he began to work at making shoes, occupying every leisure moment, however, in storing his retentive memory with the legislative history of the country, for even then "coming events cast their shadows before." In 1838 he visited Washington, and observing there the sale of some slaves at auction, swore eternal hostility to the peculiar institution of the South. This is the whole secret of his political life, and to this every thought and word and deed of it have been most true. On returning home, Mr. Wilson attended school some time in New Hampshire, where he studied rhetoric, mental philosophy, and Euclid; but his means becoming exhausted through the failure of a friend, he returned to Natick, taught a "winter school," and then, in 1838, commenced the manufacture of shoes for the Southern market, in which business he continued for ten successive years.

In 1840 he began his political career, as a public speaker in the Harrison campaign, during which he made more than sixty addresses, most of which were of telling effect against his opponents. On his election to a seat in the Massachusetts Legislature, the same year, Mr. Wilson gave his attention at once to the rules of parliamentary practice, and to the questions before the House; and by unwearied devotion to business, soon came to stand in the front rank of the advocates of freedom and a liberal policy. Three years later, he was elected to the State Senate; and in the House, two years after, made one of the ablest speeches against slavery ever heard by that body. In 1848 he purchased the Boston Republican, which he conducted with signal ability for twenty-seven months. The next year, 1849, he was made chairman of the Free-soil State Committee, and became the acknowledged leader of that party. He was speaker of the State Senate in 1850 and 1851; he was nominated for Congress and defeated in 1852; and in the ensuing year he was sent as a delegate, by the towns of Natick and Berlin, to the State Constitutional Convention, where he made about one hundred and fifty speeches, and was absent from his seat but once—and that to attend the funeral of a friend—during the whole of the protracted session. In 1855, Mr. Wilson was elected to serve, during the unexpired term of Edward Everett, as United States Senator; and in the summer and autumn of this year, he visited thirteen of the States, addressing many large audiences on the questions then at issue. The year following, he delivered his important Kansas speech, in the Senate, but made a higher record even in his admirable reply to a challenge from Preston S. Brooks, of South Carolina. Re-elected almost unanimously to the Senate in 1859, he made, in March of that year, in answer to Mr. Hammond, his celebrated speech in defence of Northern labor, than which nothing more effective had been given on the subject since Webster's masterly reply to Colonel Hayne. But though never idle, it was not until the opening of the great drama of the rebellion that Mr. Wilson fairly began to set himself at work. He introduced the acts for the employment of five hundred thousand volunteers; for the purchase of arms and ordnance; for increasing the pay of privates, &c., &c. In view of his untiring industry and effective labor in this national crisis, Mr. Cameron said of him, in 1862: "No man, in my opinion, in the whole country, has done more to aid the War Department in preparing the mighty army now under arms." Some idea of the care and responsibility of his position may be inferred from the fact that as many as ten thousand eight hundred and ninety-one military nominations came before him for decision during the war. In addition to his senatorial duties, he enlisted two thousand three hundred men in the autumn of 1861, organized the Massachusetts Twenty-second Regiment, and, as its colonel, conducted it to Washington. But during these incessant labors, Mr. Wilson did not for a moment lose sight of the great question to which his political life had been consecrated. In 1861 he introduced the bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; in 1862, the bill for the employment of the colored soldiers; in 1864, the bill for paying them, and also that for freeing their wives and children.

In addition to a vast number of speeches, of which the most remarkable are Personalities and Aggressions of Mr. Butler (1856); Defence of the Republican Party (1856); Are Working-men Slaves? (1858); The Pacific Railroad (1859); The Death of Slavery is the Life of the Nation (1864), Mr. Wilson has also made a valuable contribution to our literature in his History of the Anti-Slavery Measures of the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth United States Congress (Boston, 1865, pp. 424), in which he presents a vivid sketch of the progress of the various bills referring to slavery, from their introduction to the final issue—citing the ipsisima verba of the speakers, whether favoring or opposing them. In 1866 appeared Military Measures of the U. S. Congress, a work on the legislation of Congress in respect to the army during the rebellion, which is a valuable record of the noble part our civil leaders bore in the mighty conflict we have just passed through.

 Hon. Henry Wilson was re-elected to the United States Senate in 1865, and again, at the expiration of that term, in 1871. He took a prominent part in the discussions concerning the reconstruction of the Southern States, and advocated a generous yet decisive policy. "Let loyal men alone assume control; let the freedmen be protected; let the governments be reconstructed on the basis of equal rights for every citizen, and loyalty to the Union."* The system of peonage, or servitude for debt, in the territory of New Mexico, was abolished by his efforts in 1867; and that same year he instituted the Congressional Temperance Society at Washington. For the latter act he was given a public reception at Tremont Temple by the citizens of Boston, April 15. Subsequently he made a tour through the South, speaking in the chief cities between Richmond and New Orleans. Throughout the political campaigns of 1868 and 1872, he also delivered many hundred addresses at the East and West.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of Mr. Wilson's marriage was celebrated by his friends at Natick, October 27, 1865. A purse of four thousand dollars and many articles of silver were presented to his lady. Five years later his wife died, May 21, 1870. He spent the summer of 1871 abroad, viewing the social and political institutions of the Continent. He received the nomination of the Republican party as Vice President of the United States in 1872, and was elected by a large majority.

The recent works of Mr. Wilson comprise: Testimonies of American Statesmen and Jurists to the Truths of Christianity, an address to the Young Men's Christian Association at Natick, which was printed by the American Tract Society (Boston, 1867, 24mo., 52 pages); History of the Reconstruction Measures of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congresses, 1865-8 (1868, 12mo., 467 pages), an invaluable monograph of the political history of the United States; and History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America (vol. i. 1872; 8vo., 370 pages). The latter, which will doubtless constitute the crowning work of his life, has already won the rank of a standard authority, by its impartial spirit, thoroughness of detail, clearness of narrative, and inflexible honesty of purpose. The first volume treats of the growth and power of Slavery from its introduction into Virginia in 1620, to the admission of Texas into the Union as a Slave State in 1845. Volume second, which is to follow speedily, will relate the ominous events and political struggles that convulsed the country till the outbreak of the civil war in 1861; while the third and concluding volume will be devoted to that series of measures which overthrew Slavery, destroyed the Slave Power, and reconstructed the Union on the basis of freedom and equal rights to all.

* The Life and Public Services of Hon. Henry Wilson. By Hon. Thomas Russell, collector of the port of Boston, and Rev. Elias Nason, for many years the pastor of Mr. Wilson; pp. 254, Boston, 1872.

WILLIAM G. T. SHEDD

Was born in Acton, Massachusetts, June 21, 1820. He received his collegiate education at the University of Vermont, where he graduated in 1839. He then pursued a course of theological studies at Andover Seminary, graduating at that institution, in 1843; next became pastor of a congregation in Brandon, Vermont, and at the expiration of two years, in 1845, was appointed Professor of English Literature in the University of Vermont. He held this situation for seven years, when he became Professor of Sacred Rhetoric in Auburn Theological Seminary. At the end of two years he was appointed Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Andover Theological Seminary, and was so employed for eight years, when, in 1862, he was called to New York, as associate minister with Dr. Spring, of the Presbyterian Brick Church. In 1864, he became Professor of Biblical Literature in the Union Theological Seminary, in New York city.

Besides contributing articles to the Bibliotheca Sacra, and publishing various occasional discourses, Dr. Shedd has edited Coleridge's works, with an introductory essay (New York, 1853); Augustine's Confessions, with an introduction (Andover, 1860); translated from the German, Theremin's Rhetoric (New York, 1850, and Andover, 1859), and Guericke's Church History (Andover, 1857). He has also published a volume of Discourses and Essays (second edition, Andover, 1862); Lectures upon the Philosophy of History, which have also reached a second edition (Andover, 1862), and A History of Christian Doctrine (2 vols., 8vo., 1864)—republished in Clarke's Foreign Theological Library, Edinburgh.

Of this, perhaps his most important work, an accomplished reviewer gives the following account:—

"In the introduction to these volumes, Professor Shedd presents a careful survey of the ground which he intends to traverse, marking out its boundaries and limitations, defining its exact position in regard to historical science in general, and explaining the methods which he shall follow in the composition of his work. According to his preliminary statements, the history of Christian doctrine presents a very transparent and beautiful specimen of an historic evolution. The germ of the process is the dogmatic material contained in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, which set forth the entire rudimental substance of Christian theology; but this body of doctrine was by no means fully comprehended by the thinking, speculative minds in the primitive Church. The scientific comprehension of the essential faith is a gradual process; the expanded creed bursts out of the narrower, by natural methods of growth; each generation of believers contributes its share to the formation of the common creed; and hence dogmatic history describes the development of revealed truth, through the successive acts of the universal Church to understand its meaning, and to demonstrate its integral, harmonious, and consistent character, in opposition to critical suggestions and inquiries, and to the open assaults of scepticism. With this idea of history, the investigation possesses all the advantages that arise from the theory of organic connections, while it is protected from the naturalism which often infects this branch of inquiry in connection with the thoughts and judgment. Preserving the distinction between a creation and an evolution, the historical is called to do justice both to the supernatural and the natural elements of his subject—to the creative energy which is the cause of all existence, and to the finite development which is the condition of progress. In pursuance of these principles, Professor Shedd arranges his matter into several divisions: the first comprising the influence of philosophical systems upon the construction of Christian doctrine; the second, embracing the history of apologies, or defences of Christianity; the third, devoted to the history of individual doctrine; the fourth, to the history of creeds; and the fifth, to biographic history in relation to the history of doctrines. Without pretending to philosophical impartiality, or indifference to the various theories which he brings under review, Professor Shedd has accomplished his task with fairness, learning, and ability, and produced an instructive work, which will command the respect of scholars, however widely they may differ from his conclusions.”*

 Besides editing the Gospel of Mark in the American edition of Lange's Commentary, Dr. Shedd has, in recent years, prepared several other valuable contributions to theological literature. These works comprise: A Treatise on Homiletics and Pastoral Theology (1867), which has passed through eight editions, and been republished in Edinburgh; and Sermons to the Natural Man, 1871. “The purpose (of the latter) is psychological,” states its author. “I would, if possible, anatomize the natural heart. It is in vain to offer the Gospel unless the Law has been applied with clearness and cogency. At the present day, certainly, there is far less danger of erring in the direction of religious severity, than in the direction of religious indulgence.”

DAVID A. HARSHA.

David Addison Harsha was born in Argyle, Washington county, New York, September 15, 1827. After receiving a thorough classical education, his attention was turned to the study of theology; but, in consequence of a chronic bronchial affection, he never entered the ministry. He has passed the most of his time, thus far, among the beautiful rural scenery of his native town, engaged in the quiet pursuits of literature. In 1851 he commenced authorship, by the publication of a small work entitled Thoughts on the Love of Christ. This was followed, in 1852, by Christ and Crucified, and Immanuel's Land. Two years afterwards he published Wanderings of a Pilgrim. In 1856, these religious treatises were collected and published under the title of The Heavenly Token, a Gift-Book for Christians, of which more than fifty thousand copies have been sold. In 1854, his Lives of Eminent Orators and Statesmen was published by Mr. Scribner, New York, in an octavo volume. This work has been widely used, especially as a text-book. In 1856, Mr. Harsha published, in a duodecimo volume, a sketch of the Life of Charles Sumner, with his great Speech on Kansas. This volume was hastily prepared and published a few months after the brutal assault on Mr. Sumner in the Senate chamber; eight thousand copies of the work were speedily sold. In 1857, was published, by Messrs. Derby & Jackson, the first volume of Mr. Harsha's Library of Christian Authors, containing The Life and Choice Works of Isaac Watts, D. D. The stereotype plates of this work have since passed into the hands of Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. The series is proposed to be continued to four volumes, to comprise the best works of eminent divines, from the period of Jeremy Taylor to Robert Hall, of the present century. In 1864, Mr. Harsha published another devotional work, The Star of Bethlehem, a Guide to the Saviour (Chicago, 12mo, 528 pages), which, like its predecessors, has been well received by a large class of readers. A later work of Mr. Harsha is The Life of Philip Doddridge, D.D., with Notices of some of his Contemporaries, and Specimens of his Style (12mo, Sheldon & Co., New York). This has been speedily followed by the Lives of Bunyan and Baxter, in two volumes, uniform with the Life of Doddridge. Mr. Harsha is also author of a Life of Rev. George Whitefield, with his Select Works (12mo); a Life of Rev. James Hervey, with his Select Writings (12mo); a Life of Rev. Abraham Booth, with his Select Works; a Manual of English Sacred Literature, from the period of John Knox, to the present time (12mo); and editor of Devotional Thoughts, selected from the best Christian Authors, &c., all of which are recent works. Mr. Harsha has also been engaged in writing a work on The Golden Age of English Literature; or, the Life and Times of Joseph Addison; besides, he is a regular correspondent of one or two leading republican newspapers, and a frequent contributor to magazines, reviews, &c.

FREDERIC DAN HUNTINGTON.

The Rev. Dr. Huntington was born in Hadley, Massachusetts, May 28, 1819. His father was a clergyman. The son was educated at Amherst College, where he graduated with the first honors of his class, in 1839. He then passed three years at the Cambridge Divinity School, and on the completion of this course, in 1842, was ordained pastor of the South Congregational Church, Boston, a position in which he remained till 1855, when he was called to the chair of the newly founded Plummer Professorship of Christian Morals, at Harvard College, and was made university preacher of that institution.

*New York Tribune, January 9, 1864.

In 1856, he published a volume entitled Sermons to the People, which has passed through numerous editions. The tone of this series of discourses was at once philosophical and practical, of an earnest, sympathetic, manly piety, calling for a deeper spirituality, "to give vitality to our professions, energy to our efforts, sanctity to our faith, and unconquerable constancy to our will."*

During the four following years, the author's theological views, which, at the time of his induction as Plummer Professor, had been nominally Unitarian, underwent so decided a change that, after the publication, in 1860, of a second series of sermons, twenty-five in number, marked by the same high characteristics as the former, entitled Christian Believing and Living, in which a belief in the doctrine of the Trinity was distinctly avowed, he felt constrained, from motives of honor, to resign his position in the college. His resignation, at first declined, was subsequently accepted, and he very soon received a call from Emanuel Church, a newly formed Episcopal organization of Boston. In September of the same year, 1859, he was ordained by Bishop Eastburn, and at once entered upon the duties of the pastoral office.

Besides the two volumes of discourses already mentioned, Dr. Huntington has published a course of eight lectures, delivered before the Graham Institute, of Brooklyn, in a volume entitled Human Society; Its Providential Structure, Relations, and Offices (New York, 1860); Home and College, a public address delivered in the hall of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, in March, 1860, presenting the characteristic features of college experience, in reference to its perils and successes, with an earnest plea for the peculiar virtues of home training; and has written largely for the religious periodicals, the Christian Examiner, the Christian Register, the Monthly Religious Magazine and Independent Journal, which he conducted for a time. He has also edited or written introductions for various works, including several books of a religious character by the Rev. William Mountford, as "Martyria," "Euthanasia," "Christianity the Deliverance of the Soul and its Life," Archbishop Whately's "Christian Morals;" the Rev. Edward Henry Bickersteth's "Rock of Ages, or Scriptural Testimony to the One Eternal Godhead of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" with two selections of religious poetry, entitled Hymns of the Ages, being selections from Lyra Catholica, Germanica Apostolica, and other sources, and Lyra Domestica, translated from the Psalter and Harp of C. J. P. Spitta, by Richard Massie, with additional selections. He has also edited a volume, Religious and Moral Sentences, culled from the Works of Shakspeare, compared with Sacred Passages from Holy Writ.

In January, 1861, Dr. Huntington established, in association with the Rev. Dr. George M. Randall, a magazine, at Boston, in the interest of the Protestant Episcopal Church, entitled The Church Monthly. Its object, as announced, is to represent the Church "fairly in its Scriptural authority, Evangelical faith, Catholic spirit, Apostolic order, and earnest Missionary activity."

 Dr. Huntington edited in 1865 Elim, or, Hymns of Holy Refreshment. It was followed by two pamphlets: Two Ways in Religion, 1867; and Lessons for the Instruction of Children in the Divine Life, 1868. In 1872, he published a volume entitled, Helps to a Holy Lent; and in 1873, a practical treatise, Steps to a Living Faith. In 1869 Dr. Huntington was consecrated Bishop of the diocese of Central New York.

JOHN N. NORTON.

Rev. Dr. John N. Norton, of Virginia descent, but born in the State of New York, graduated at Geneva College (now Hobart), in 1842, when he delivered the Latin salutatory oration, and received the degree of A. B. After spending three years at the General Theological Seminary, in New York City, he was ordained deacon, by Bishop De Lancey, in Trinity Church, Geneva, on the 20th of July, 1845. During a vacancy in the rectorship of this important parish, Mr. Norton took charge of it for a short period, and, after serving as assistant minister of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, for six months, he was called to the rectorship of the Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, Kentucky, in December, 1846—a post which he held until 1870, when he became Associate Rector of Christ Church, Louisville. His first book, entitled Religion, as Seen through the Church, was published by Stanford & Swords, in New York, in 1845, and consisted of ten church stories, written from his twelfth to his sixteenth year. As it was issued anonymously, few know its author.

His next work was The Boy who was Trained up to be a Clergyman, which appeared from the press of H. Hooker, in 1853. The first edition was sold in a few weeks, and the sixth edition (an enlarged and improved one) was in circulation in 1865. This book was followed by two others, in which the history was continued: Full Proof of the Ministry, published by Redfield, in 1855—now in its third edition—and Rockford Parish, from the press of Dana, in 1857—now in its second edition.

In 1856, the Church Book Society published Mr. Norton's Life of Bishop White, the first of a long series of biographies, in which he has attempted to bring to the notice of "the million," the lives and characters of those great and good men who had before been known to comparatively few—because the world has had no time to spend in reading long-drawn accounts of all who deserve to be remembered. The idea was a new one, and the effort proved not unsuccessful. The lives of Bishops Griswold, Chase, Seabury, Hobart, Moore of Virginia, Dehon, Gadsden, Heber, Ravenscroft, Wainwright, Claggett, Croes, Henshaw, Bowen,

* Sermon on the Doctrine of the Spirit.

Bass, Stewart, Provoost, Wilson of Calcutta, and Archbishop Cranmer, followed, in due order, from the same society; and also the lives of the pioneer missionaries, Phelps and Nash; and of General Washington, in which the religious character of the "Father of his Country" was portrayed. The Life of Washington has been widely circulated, not only among the young, but in the army. "Allerton Parish" was published by the Church Book Society, in 1864.

In 1860, H. Hooker, of Philadelphia, published Mr. Norton's Lectures on the Life of David, and, not long afterwards, his Short Sermons. The last have just gone to a tenth edition (1873). The Life of Doctor Franklin appeared in 1861, designed to vindicate the name of the patriot and philosopher from the charge of infidelity. In 1864, E. P. Dutton & Co. published Mr. Norton's Life of Archbishop Laud, in which he has endeavored to do simple justice to this unpopular and much abused prelate. A number of addresses and sermons, delivered on various occasions, have been published; but it is hardly necessary to enumerate them. In 1863, Mr. Norton received the degree of D. D. from his Alma Mater.

The later works of this author are The Lay Reader, and Every Sunday, two volumes of sermons for the Christian Year; and Milk and Honey, a volume of sermons to children.

SAMUEL MOSHEIM SCHMUCKER

Was born at Newmarket, Virginia, in 1823. His father was a Lutheran clergyman, who, in 1826, was called to preside over the Theological Seminary of that denomination at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania. His son received a liberal education at a college at that place, and at Washington College, in the State, where he graduated in 1840. He then studied theology at the Gettysburg Seminary, was licensed to preach, and became pastor of a Lutheran church at Lewistown, and subsequently at Germantown, Pennsylvania. In 1848, he resigned the pulpit for the bar, studied law in Philadelphia, and was admitted to practice in 1850. After several years in the profession, he developed a taste for literary labor, which he has steadily pursued. His publications, which are numerous, are chiefly in history and biography. He has written a History of the Court and Reign of Catherine II., Empress of Russia; The Life and Reign of the Emperor Nicholas I., of Russia; The Life and Times of Alexander Hamilton; also of Thomas Jefferson; lives of Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and John C. Fremont, published at intervals; Arctic Explorations and Discoveries in the Nineteenth Century; A Life of Dr. E. K. Kane, and other Distinguished American Explorers; A History of the Mormons, Religious, Social, and Political; A History of the Modern Jews; The Public and Private History of Napoleon III., Emperor of the French; The History of the Four Georges, Kings of England. These subjects have been well selected to suit the wants of the public, and the long list is proof of the favor with which they have been received.

Dr. Schmucker began A History of the Civil War in the United States; but he did not live to see the end of that contest. He died in Philadelphia, shortly after the issue of the first volume of his work, May 12, 1863.

WILLIAM REED DEANE

Was born August 21, 1809, in Mansfield, Massachusetts, originally a part of the first purchase of Taunton. He was the son of Jacob Deane, Esq., who died July 15, 1871. He was the seventh in descent from John Deane, who came from Chard, near Taunton, in the County of Somerset, England, about 1636, and, with others from that vicinity, settled at Cohannet, changing the Indian name to Taunton, in regard to their "dear native country." The homestead upon which Mr. Deane was born has been the residence of the family for several generations. Rev. Samuel Deane, his uncle, author of the History of Scituate, Massachusetts, who was pastor of the second parish in that town from his first settlement there till the time of his death, was also born on this old homestead.

Mr. Deane was in mercantile life, and was for many years of the firms of Cushing, White & Co., and Deane, Bradstreet & Co., of Boston. For several years previous to 1855, he was the Boston correspondent of the Christian Inquirer, of New York, and an occasional writer in the Christian Register, and other periodicals in Boston and vicinity. He has published a Genealogical History of the Leonard Family, the Watson Family, and the Deane Family, the latter in connection with John Ward Dean. He was one of the earliest members of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, has held various offices in that society since its formation, and was an occasional contributor to its Register. He died at Mansfield, Mass., June 16, 1871.

AMORY DWIGHT MAYO

The Rev. A. D. Mayo was born in Warwick, Mass., January 31, 1823. He was for a time a student at Amherst College, which he was compelled by ill health to leave before he had finished the usual course of instruction. He subsequently studied theology at Medford, Mass., under the personal direction of the late Dr. Hosea Ballou, the President of Tufts College. Mr. Mayo was ordained a preacher, in Boston, July, 1846. He then was established as pastor of The Independent Christian Society in Gloucester, Mass. There he continued eight years, till 1854, when he removed to Cleveland, Ohio, where he remained for two years, in a similar pastoral charge. In January, he accepted a call to Albany, New York, as pastor of the Division Street Church at that place, and afterwards held a pastorate in Cincinnati.

He has published several works, including two volumes of sermons, entitled, The Moral Argument for the Universal Salvation of Mankind (1847), and Graces and Powers of the Christian Life (1852). Mr. Mayo married Miss Sarah C. Edgerton, a lady of New England, greatly esteemed for her intelligence and piety; and after her early death, published, in 1848, a memorial volume, entitled, Memories of Mrs. S. C. Mayo, with Selections from her Writings. In 1853 he married Miss Lucy C. Clarke, a sister of the well-known author, Grace Greenwood.

In 1859, Mr. Mayo published a volume entitled, Symbols of the Capital; or, Civilization in New York. In this ingenious work, which is written in a spirited, effective style, the author presents in a series of chapters his views on the chief influences at work in modern society, as the topics are suggested "by the institutions of the chief State in the Republic." "It is a sincere endeavor," he adds, in his preface, "to aid the young men and women of our land in their attempt to realize a character that shall justify our professions of republicanism, and to establish a civilization which, in becoming national, shall illustrate every principle of a pure Christianity."

Besides these volumes, Mr. Mayo has been a contributor to the Universalist Quarterly Review; has published various occasional sermons and addresses, and numerous articles, literary and religious, in the Ohio Farmer, the Christian Inquirer, the Century, Cincinnati Commercial, etc. His later works have been chiefly educational.

In 1872 Dr. Mayo removed to Springfield, Mass., and he is now pastor of the Church of the Unity in that city.

WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

The Rev. William Rounseville Alger was born in 1823, in Freetown, Mass. He became a graduate of the Harvard Theological school in Cambridge in 1847, and settled the same year as minister of a Unitarian society at Roxbury, removing thence to a similar post in Boston, in 1855. He received the honorary degree of Master of Arts, from Harvard University, in 1852.

He published A Symbolic History of the Cross of Christ, in an eighteen-mo volume, in Boston, in 1851. In 1856, he became widely known to the literary world by his work entitled The Poetry of the East. This is a series of more than four hundred original metrical versions of the thought, sentiment, and fancy of the East, derived from the materials presented in the records of the different Asiatic Societies and other English, Latin, and German sources. The volume is prefaced by a general essay, "An Introduction to Oriental Poetry"—an interesting and elaborate dissertation, describing the characteristics of Sanscrit, Arabic, and Persian poetry, and presenting an account of all the chief translations hitherto made from those ancient tongues into French, German, and English. A new and enlarged edition of this book was published by the author in 1856.

Mr. Alger's chief work, the result of much study and painstaking, is, A Critical History of the Doctrines of a Future Life, with a Complete Bibliography of the Subject. In its patient thoroughness of research, and condensed and exhaustive arrangement of material, it may fairly be pronounced a monument of learned industry. The bibliographical appendix contains descriptions of some five thousand publications, arranged in chronological order; and is, as nearly as possible, a perfect repertory of the literature of its great theme.

Mr. Alger has also edited, with an Introduction (Boston, 1858), Studies of Christianity; or, Timely Thoughts for Religious Thinkers, by the Rev. James Martineau.

 Mr. Alger published in 1867: The Friendships of Women; also, The Solitudes of Nature and of Man; or, The Loneliness of Human Life, dedicated to Rev. James Martineau. The latter contained an entertaining and exhaustive section on the "Morals of Solitude," besides scholarly sketches of lonely characters, from Confucius and Demosthenes to Byron and Thoreau. These were followed by a volume of Prayers Offered in the Massachusetts House of Representatives during the Session of 1868; and by two pamphlets in 1870: End of the World, and the Day of Judgment; The Sword, the Pen, and the Pulpit: A tribute to Charles Dickens. Mr. Alger has in preparation a life of the late Edwin Forrest, the eminent tragedian.

JOSIAH GILBERT HOLLAND.

Dr. Holland was born in Belchertown, Mass., July 24, 1819. He commenced life as a physician, but, after a short experience of practice, removed to Vicksburg, Miss., where he remained a year, filling the position of Superintendent of Public Schools. In May, 1849, he became associate editor of the Springfield Republican. Under his guidance this daily paper attained a high position of influence throughout New England and the country at large. In 1855, Dr. Holland published, at Springfield, a History of Western Massachusetts, in two 12mo volumes. This was followed, in 1857, by The Bay-Path, a Tale of New England Colonial Life (12mo, pp. 418), written "with the belief that the early colonial life of New England, though cramped in its creeds, rigid in its governmental policy, formal in its society, and homely in its details, was neither without its romantic aspects nor its heroes, in high and humble position, with whose full hearts, independent wills, and manly struggles, the largest spirit of this age may fully sympathize."

Bitter Sweet, first published by the author in 1858, and since in numerous illustrated and other editions, is a poem of New England life. It is, for the most part, in blank verse, of a somewhat rugged character. The book opens with a picture of a wild November storm, raging around a country homestead. The horrors of the night are however alleviated by the bright firelight glowing through the windows of the "old red farm-house," and we have pleasant glimpses of some of its inmates, as they look out from the ruddy background to watch and speculate on the elemental strife. We are soon introduced within, where the old patriarch Israel has gathered his sons and daughters, with their children, to the Thanksgiving festival. The chief characters are sketched and named in a few lines. The key-note of the coming argument is given in two "Songs," introduced in a prelude. The composition now assumes a dramatic form: Ruth, the young daughter of the ancient house, is troubled with doubts respecting the existence of evil. David sets forth the need of discipline to strengthen character, and nerve the soul for the execution of high purposes, and Ruth is gradually convinced. A "First Episode" follows—a scene between David and Ruth in the farm-house cellar, whither they have descended in quest of cider and apples.

"Sixteen barrels of cider Ripening all in a row"

suggest pleasant pictures of the orchard and the mill. Ruth describes and David moralizes, in a pleasant, quaint octosyllabic measure. From the cider, they pass to the brine-casks and the potato-bin; and the contents of these are in like manner eulogized and moralized. We have next a "Second Movement," in a quiet room of the old house, to which Grace and Mary have retired to put the baby to sleep. This accomplished, by a pleasant lullaby, the two indulge in mutual confidences. Grace confesses to doubts of the philosophic David, whom she suspects to have neglected her for the blandishments of a "strange woman." Mary's story is longer. She, years ago, has married a man who turns out a drunken reprobate, and after a long course of ill treatment and ill influences, which taint to some extent the yielding mind of the wife, deserts her by going off in a balloon with a courtesan on a Fourth of July afternoon. Mary has to take the usual city lodgings and needlework, which seem the unflinching fate of oppressed womanhood in American stories. She is here visited by a gentleman in quest of embroidery, whom she wickedly endeavors to fascinate. He resists manfully, but her wiles are overpowering, when a sudden recollection of the old teachings of the farm-house home return, and save the pair. Next follows a livelier scene of boys and girls at play, and a new rhymed version of Blue-Beard for their benefit. In the "Third Movement," a wayfarer is described feebly contending with the storm without. He is brought in, and, after careful treatment, revives. He is recognized by Mary as her husband, now penitent, but dying from a recent shock of delirium tremens. In a conversation with him, she reveals the name of her benefactor, who turns out to be the moralizing David. This of course produces an humble apology from the haughty Grace, and ends the story. The "keeping" of the whole, incidents and description, with the scene and characters, is admirable, and gives the book a place in the select company of really indigenous American productions.

In 1860, Dr. Holland published his novel, "Miss Gilbert's Career." Miss Gilbert is the only daughter of Dr. Gilbert, a bustling village physician, who has transmitted an energetic temperament to his offspring. The young lady's ambition takes the usual form, and she produces a novel. Her father tries the New York publishers, and has his patience, and finally his pocket, sorely tried in return. He guarantees the bills, and the book appears.

Miss Gilbert's book has merits, but they do not overbalance its fatal crudities. Ill success gives her the first great lesson of life. Successive experiences gradually teach her that her "career" is but an idealized selfishness. Success itself—for, after the publication of a more mature work, this is achieved to the fullest extent—is found unsatisfactory. The fêted authoress retires from city soirées to her quiet home to find, in care for the sick, and ministration to the genialities of the household, and of course at last in a lover, the happiness individual success could not afford. A woollen factory plays an important part in the story. A second heroine emerges from its dirty recesses to become the friend and counsellor of all parties. She turns out to be the daughter of a rich man who has refused his consent to her union with his clerk. The young lady breaks off with father and lover, neither of whom hear from her until her retreat is disclosed by a knavish youth employed at the mill. The father comes to the village in search of the daughter, who has in the mean time become the village schoolmistress. Foiled in his attempts to see her, he is so overcome by rage that he falls in a fit. Nursed through his dangerous illness by his daughter, he relents; the lover is sent for, and the pair made happy.

The character of the coarse and avaricious owner of the mill is powerfully drawn. His household, consisting of a vulgar wife, and a daughter educated at a boarding-school up to the point of despising the plain ways of her parents who have spoiled her, forms an equally repulsive and truthful picture. The humorous characters of the book are true to American village life, and are well sustained.

Titcomb's Letters to Young People, Single and Married (12mo, pp. 251), were first published in 1858, dedicated to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and designed in an easy, familiar way, to benefit the persons to whom they were addressed, by practical suggestions on subjects of daily life and experience. Eminently successful in its manner and adaptation to the wants of the country, the book has in a few years passed to a fiftieth edition. Gold Foil Hammered from Popular Proverbs, issued the following year (12mo, pp. 358), has a wider scope in its treatment of social subjects, but is of the same general character as the preceding, with which may also be classed Letters to the Joneses (1863, 12mo, pp. 347); Lessons in Life, a Series of Familiar Essays (1861, 12mo, pp. 344), and Plain Talk on Familiar Subjects (1865, 12mo, pp. 360).

 In 1865, Dr. Holland prepared a Life of Abraham Lincoln, which speedily attained a circulation of eighty thousand copies. Three years later, he visited Europe with his wife and children—two daughters and a young son—spending two years in England and on the Continent.

In conjunction with the firm of Charles Scribner & Co. and Mr. Roswell Smith, he established Scribner's Monthly in 1870, and became its editor-in-chief. Under his management, that magazine has had a pure and high-toned character from the start, and has proved a financial success. In its monthly "Topics of the Time," he has handled the leading questions of the day in a series of earnest and thoughtful essays, which have deserved and received much attention, even from that portion of the public which had not interested itself in his poetry and fiction.

Arthur Bonnicastle, a novel whose hero is conducted from boyhood to manhood through a series of incidents and experiences which exhibit the life of an American boy, was begun in the number for November, 1872. Arthur is a country-born boy, who is soon brought under the influence of peculiar advantages and temptations, being lifted from an humble position to a higher sphere by a hand that may drop him at any moment. This unusual fortune gives a dramatic color to his boyhood; and yet each scene in his career has the naturalness of a study from life. Arthur's school-days, his college life and his religious experiences are shown in a thoroughly sound and healthy fashion. He is not made a saint, or even the regulation good boy of our literature, but a human being moved by motives and impulses.

Dr. Holland has recently published three volumes of poetry. Kathrina: Her Life and Mine: In a Poem, a narrative of a life struggle and the fruits of its experience, appeared in 1867, and has passed its fiftieth edition. Its hero is led through the phases of childhood, youth, love, reflection, labor, and despair, to the consummation, whereby his impetuous daring spirit is chastened and subdued to pray, "Thy will be done!" In The Marble Prophecy and Other Poems, 1872, the introductory and longest poem, with its seeming moral in this Christian age, was suggested by the Laocœon, as it stands in the Vatican at Rome. Garnered Sheaves, a complete collection of his poetical works, was issued in 1873. Among the "vigorous and tuneful" minor pieces, On the Right, Albert Durer's Studio, Where shall the Baby's Dimple Be? Heart of the War, Old Clock of Prague, Words, Eureka, and Gradatim are especially pleasing.

As a lecturer, Dr. Holland has long had a wide popularity in the North and West. He became a member of the Board of Education of New York city in the fall of 1872. His election to its presidency followed, thus placing him at the head of the common-school system of the city, while he also held the chairmanship of the Board of Trustees of the College of the City of New York. Owing to the absorbing character of his literary duties, he declined a re-appointment to the former in April, 1873.

 LAOCŒON—FROM THE MARBLE PROPHECY.

. . . Laocœon! thou great embodiment
Of human life and human history!
Thou record of the past, thou prophecy
Of the sad future, thou majestic voice,
Pealing along the ages from old time!
Thou wail of agonized humanity!
There lives no thought in marble like to thee!
Thou hast no kindred in the Vatican,
But standest separate among the dreams
Of old mythologies—alone—alone!
The beautiful Apollo at thy side
Is but a marble dream, and dreams are all
The gods and goddesses and fauns and fates
That populate these wondrous halls; but thou,
Standing among them, liftest up thyself
In majesty of meaning, till they sink.

Far from the sight, no more significant
Than the poor toys of children. For thou art
A voice from out the world's experience,
Speaking of all the generations past
To all the generations yet to come
Of the long struggle, the sublime despair,
The wild and weary agony of man!

Ay, Adam and his offspring, in the foils
Of the twin serpents Sin and Suffering,
Thou dost impersonate; and as I gaze
Upon the twining monsters that enfold
In unrelaxing, unrelenting coils,
Thy awful energies, and plant their fangs
Deep in thy quivering flesh, while still thy might
In fierce convulsion foils the fateful wrench
That would destroy thee, I am overwhelmed
With a strange sympathy of kindred pain,
And see through gathering tears the tragedy,
The curse and conflict of a ruined race.

Those Rhodian sculptors were gigantic men,
Whose inspirations came from other source
Than their religion, though they chose to speak
Through its familiar language,—men who saw
And, seeing quite divinely, felt how weak
To cure the world's great woe were all the powers Whose reign their age acknowledged. So they sat—

The immortal three—and pondered long and well
What one great work should speak the truth for them,—

What one great work should rise and testify
That they had found the topmost fact of life,
Above the reach of all philosophies
And all religions—every scheme of man
To placate or dethrone. That fact they found,
And moulded into form. The silly priest
Whose desecrations of the altar stirred
The vengeance of his God, and summoned forth
The wreathed gorgons of the slimy deep
To crush him and his children, was the word
By which they spoke to their own age and race,
That listened and applauded, knowing not
That high above the small significance
They apprehended, rose the grand intent
That mourned their doom and breathed a world's despair.

 GRADATIM.

Heaven is not reached at a single bound,
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

I count this thing to be grandly true
That a noble deed is a step toward God,—
Lifting the soul from the common clod
To a purer air and a broader view.

We rise by the things that are under feet;
By what we have mastered of good and gain;
By the pride deposed and the passion slain,
And the vanquished ills that we hourly meet.

We hope, we aspire, we resolve, we trust,
When the morning calls us to life and light,
But our hearts grow weary, and ere the night
Our lives are trailing the sordid dust.

We hope, we resolve, we aspire, we pray,
And we think that we mount the air on wings
Beyond the recall of sensual things,
While our feet still cling to the heavy clay.

Wings for the angels, but feet for men!
We may borrow the wings to find the way—

We may hope, and resolve, and aspire, and pray;
But our feet must rise, or we fall again.

Only in dreams is a ladder thrown
From the weary earth to the sapphire walls;
But the dreams depart and the vision falls,
And the sleeper wakes on his pillow of stone.

Heaven is not reached at a single bound;
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

* WHERE SHALL THE BABY'S DIMPLE BE?

Over the cradle the mother hung,
Softly crooning a slumber song:
And these were the simple words she sung
All the evening long:

"Cheek or chin, or knuckle or knee,
Where shall the baby's dimple be?
Where shall the angel's finger rest
When he comes down to the baby's nest?
Where shall the angel's touch remain
When he awakens my babe again?"

Still as she bent and sang so low
A murmur into her music broke:
And she paused to hear, for she could but know
The baby's angel spoke.

"Cheek or chin, or knuckle or knee,
Where shall the baby's dimple be?
Where shall my finger fall and rest
When I come down to the baby's nest?
Where shall my finger's touch remain
When I awaken your babe again?"

Silent the mother sat, and dwelt
Long in the sweet delay of choice;
And then by her baby's side she knelt,
And sang with pleasant voice:

"Not on the limb, O angel dear!
For the charm with its youth will disappear;
Not on the cheek shall the dimple be,
For the harboring smile will fade and flee;
But touch thou the chin with an impress deep,
And my baby the angel's seal shall keep."

* ALBERT DURER'S STUDIO.

In the house of Albert Durer
Still is seen the studio
Where the pretty Nurembergers
(Cheeks of rose and necks of snow)
Sat to have their portraits painted,
Thrice a hundred years ago.

Still is seen the little loop-hole
Where Frau Durer's jealous care
Watched the artist at his labor,
And the sitter in her chair,
To observe each word and motion
That should pass between the pair.

Handsome, hapless Albert Durer
Was as circumspect and true
As the most correct of husbands,
When the dear delightful shrew
Had him, and his sweet companions,
Every moment under view.

But I trow that Albert Durer
Had within his heart a spot
Where he sat, and painted pictures
That gave beauty to his lot,
And the sharp, intrusive vision
Of Frau Durer entered not.

Ah! if brains and hearts had loop-holes,
And Frau Durer could have seen
All the pictures that his fancy
Hung upon their walls within,
How minute had been her watching,
And how good he would have been!

* ON THE RIGHI.

On the Righi Kulm we stood,
Lovely Floribel and I,
While the morning's crimson flood
Streamed along the eastern sky.
Reddened every mountain peak
Into rose, from twilight dun;
But the blush upon her cheek
Was not lighted by the sun!

On the Righi Kulm we sat,
Lovely Floribel and I,
Plucking blue-bells for her hat
From a mound that blossomed nigh.
"We are near to heaven," she sighed,
While her raven lashes fell.
"Nearer," softly I replied,
"Than the mountain's height may tell."

Down the Righi's side we sped,
Lovely Floribel and I,
But her morning blush had fled,
And the blue-bells all were dry.
Of the height the dream was born;
Of the lower air it died;
And the passion of the morn
Flagged and fell at eventide.

From the breast of blue Lucerne,
Lovely Floribel and I
Saw the hand of sunset burn
On the Righi Kulm, and die.
And we wondered, gazing thus,
If our dream would still remain
On the height, and wait for us
Till we climb to heaven again!

* INFANTILE EDUCATION—FROM MISS GILBERT'S CAREER.

The procession now reached the church, and moved up the broad aisle. There was brisk cheering through the house, and waving of handkerchiefs, and fluttering of fans, as the little creatures mounted the stage—a place to which they had become accustomed by several visits for rehearsal. The limited orchestra (already alluded to) had intended to receive the procession with appropriate musical demonstrations, but the confusion quite confounded them, and they shrank from the attempt.

Order was at last secured. Some of the little boys had been set down very hard, as if it were difficult to make them sit still unless they were flattened. Others were pulled out from among the girls, and made to exchange seats with girls who had inadvertently strayed off with the boys. All were perched upon benches too high for them, and the row of pantalets in front looked very much as if they were hung upon a clothes-line.

Then Dr. Gilbert came forward, and, rapping upon the stage three times with his cane, called the assembly to order. They had gathered, he said, to witness one of the distinguishing characteristics and proudest triumphs of modern civilization. It had been supposed that the time of children less than five years old must necessarily be wasted in play—that the golden moments of infancy must be forever lost. That time was past. As the result of modern improvement, and among the achievements of modern progress, it had appeared that even the youngest minds were capable of receiving ideas, and that education may actually be begun at the maternal breast, pursued in the cradle, and forwarded in the nursery to a point beyond the power of imagination at present to conceive. It was in these first years of life that there had been a great waste of time. He saw children before him, in the audience, older than any upon the stage, who had no knowledge of arithmetic and geography—children, the most of whom had never heard the word astronomy pronounced. While these precious little ones had been improving their time, there were those before him whom he had seen engaged in fishing, others in playing at ball, and others still, little girls, doing nothing, but amusing themselves with their dolls! He had but a word to add. There were others who would address them before the close of the exercises. He offered the exhibition as a demonstration of the feasibility of infant instruction. He trusted he offered it in a humble spirit; but he felt that he was justified in pointing to it as an effectual condemnation of those parents who had denied to their infants the privilege of attending the school.

Administering this delicate rap upon the knuckles of such parents as had chosen to take charge of their own "infants," the doctor turned to Rev. Mr. Wilton, and invited him to lead the audience in prayer. Like many prayers offered to the Omniscent, on occasions like this, the prayer of Mr. Wilton conveyed a great deal of information pertinent to the occasion, to the Being whom he addressed, and, incidentally of course, to the congregation.

It was now Miss Gilbert's office to engage the audience; and her little troop of infantry was put through its evolutions and exercises, to the astonishment and delight of all beholders. They sang songs; they repeated long passages of poetry in concert; they went through the multiplication table to the tune of Yankee Doodle; they answered with the shrill, sing-song voice of parrots all sorts of questions in geography; they recited passages of Scripture; they gave an account of the creation of the world and of the American Revolution; they told the story of the birth of Christ, and spelled words of six syllables; they added, they multiplied, they subtracted, they divided; they told what hemisphere, what continent, what country, what state, what county, what town, they lived in; they repeated the names of the Presidents of the United States and the Governors of the Commonwealth; they acted a little drama of Moses in the Bulrushes; and they did many other things, till, all through the audience, astonishment grew into delight, and delight grew into rapture.

"Most astonishing!" exclaimed Rev. Dr. Bloomer. "Very remarkable!" responded Rev. Jonas Sliter.

"Perfectly—ah—beats every thing I ever saw!" said Rev. J. Desilver Newman, very flush of enthusiasm and very short of adverbs.

Dr. Gilbert calmly surveyed his triumph, or turned from one to another of the pastors upon the stage, as some new and surprising development of juvenile acquisition was exhibited, with a nod of the head and a smile which indicated that he was indeed a little surprised himself. He had never been so proud of his daughter as then. Rev. J. Desilver Newman was also receiving powerful impressions with regard to the same young woman. In fact, he had gone so far as to wonder how much money Dr. Gilbert might be worth; but then, he had gone as far as this with a hundred other young women, and come back safe.

The musicians, who had been kept pretty closely at work accompanying the children in their songs, moved back their chairs at a hint from Miss Gilbert, and took a position behind the pulpit. There was a general moving of benches and making ready for the closing scene and the crowning glory of the exhibition—a representation of the solar system on green baize, by bodies that revolved on two legs.

The mystery of the chalk planetarium was solved. Out of a chaos of frocks and juvenile breeches, Miss Gilbert proceeded to evoke the order of a sidereal system.

"The Sun will take his place," said Miss Gilbert; and immediately the red-headed boy, who bore the banner of "The Crampton Light Infantry," stepped to the centre of the planetarium, with a huge ball in his hand, mounted upon the end of a tall stick. Taking his stand upon the chalk sun, and elevating the sphere above a head that would have answered the purpose of a sun quite as well, he set it whirling on its axis; and thus came the centre of the system into location and into office.

"Mercury!" said Miss Gilbert; and out came a smart little chap with a smaller ball in his hand, and began walking obediently around the chalk circle next the sun.

"Venus!" and sweet little Venus rose out of the waves of muslin tossing on the side of the stage, and took the next circle.

"Earth and her Satellite!" called forth a boy and a girl, the latter playing moon to the boy's earth, revolving around him as he revolved around the sun, and with great astronomical propriety making faces at him.

Mars was called for, and it must be acknowledged that the red planet was very pale and very weary-looking.

"Jupiter and his Satellites!" and the boy Jupiter walked upon the charming circle with a charming circle of little girls revolving around him.

So Saturn with its seven moons, and Georgium Sidus, otherwise Herschel, otherwise Uranus, with its six attendant orbs, took their places on the verge of the system, and slowly, very slowly, moved around the common centre. But there was one orbit still unfilled, and that was a very eccentric one. It was not all described upon the green baize carpet, but left it, and retired behind the pulpit and was lost.

The system was in motion, and, watching every revolving body in it, stood the system's queen, indicating by her finger that Uranus should go slower, or Mercury faster, and striving to keep order among the subjects of her realm. The music meantime grew dreamy and soft, in an attempt to suggest what is called "the music of the spheres," if any reader happens to know what kind of music that is. Heavenly little bodies indeed they were, and it is not wonderful that many eyes moistened with sensibility as they mingled so gracefully and so harmoniously upon the plane of vision.

Still the eccentric orb was without an occupant, and no name was called. At last, a pair of large dark eyes appeared from behind the pulpit, and behind the eyes a head of golden hair, and behind the head a wreath of floating, golden curls. This was the unbidden comet, advancing slowly toward the Sun, almost creeping at first, then gradually increasing his velocity, intent on coming in collision with no other orb, smiling not, seeing nothing of the audience before him, and yet absorbing the attention of every eye in the house. The doctor's eyes beam with unwonted interest. Miss Gilbert forgets Mars and Venus, and looks only at the comet. At last, the comet darts around its perihelion, and the golden curls are turned to the audience in full retreat toward the unknown region of space behind the pulpit from whence it had proceeded.

The house rang with cheers, and the doctor was prouder than before; for this was his little son Fred, the bearer of the banner with the long inscription, Miss Gilbert's darling brother, and the brightest ornament of the Crampton Light Infantry.

Miss Gilbert clapped her hands three times, and her system dissolved — returned to its original elements — and stepping forward to her father, she announced that her exhibition was closed.

Rev. Dr. Bloomer was then informed that there was an opportunity for remarks. He rose, and addressed the assembly with much apparent emotion. "We have seen strange things to-day," said Rev. Dr. Bloomer. "We have seen a millennial banner waving in Crampton, and a millennial exhibition within the walls of the Crampton church. There shall be no more hence — you will observe that I say hence, not thence — an infant of days, for the children of Crampton shall die a hundred years old."

Dr. Bloomer said that he did not feel authorized to speak for others, but he felt that he had learned much from the exhibition. He felt that he should go away from it a wiser man, with new apprehensions of the powers of the human soul, and the preciousness of time. The hour was coming, he doubted not, in the progress of the race, when knowledge would be so simplified, and the modes of imparting it would become so well adapted to the young mind, that the child of five would begin his process of education where the fathers left off theirs. These little ones had already taught him many things, and God would perfect his own praise out of the mouths of babes and sucklings.

Then turning to Miss Gilbert, he thanked her for himself, and assumed to thank her on behalf of the audience, for the great gratification she had given him and them, and for the example of usefulness and industry she had set those of her own sex and age in the community. "Young woman," said Rev. Dr. Bloomer, with an emphasis that brought the tears to Miss Gilbert's eyes, "you have a career before you. May God bless you in it!"

Then Rev. Jonas Sliter rose to make only "a few little remarks," as he modestly characterized them. He had been particularly struck with the other banner; and, while his Brother Bloomer was disposed to take the millennial view of the subject, he was inclined to the military. These children were undertaking the battle of life early. They had enlisted under a captain who had already led them to a victory prouder than any ever achieved by a Cæsar or a Napoleon — an American Joan of Arc, whose career of usefulness, if she should keep her sword bright, and her escutcheon untarnished, would far surpass in glory that of the world-renowned heroine whose name he had mentioned. Heaven forbid that he should flatter any one. He despised a flatterer; but he felt that he was honoring Cæsar and Napoleon and Joan of Arc in their graves by mentioning their names in connection with such achievements as he had witnessed on that occasion.

It is true that Rev. Jonas Sliter rather mixed things, in his more ambitious rhetorical flourishes, on all occasions: but the language sounded well, and, being accompanied with appropriately magnificent action, it was accustomed to bring down the house. It did not fail before the Crampton audience; but the rounding of his period left him vacant. Standing back, as if to wait for the subsidence of the applause, his mind retired behind his glasses, and thrust out its antennæ in every direction to feel for his theme, but he could not find it.

In his desperation he turned, at last, to the children, and said in his blandest tones: "Little children, can you tell me who Cæsar and Napoleon and Joan of Arc were?"

"Cæsar is the name of my dog," responded the little golden-haired comet.

"Napoleon is the name of my dog," cried Mars.

There was an awful pause — a suppressed titter — when precious little Venus, in a shrill voice, with an exceedingly knowing look in her face, said that "Joan of Arc was the name of the dog that Noah saved from the flood!"

What wonder that Crampton roared with laughter? What wonder that Rev. Dr. Bloomer shook with powerful convulsions? What wonder that Mrs. Bloomer and Mrs. Wilton nudged each other? What wonder that Dr. Gilbert and Miss Fanny Gilbert bit their lips with mingled vexation and mirth? What wonder that Rev. Jonas Sliter grew red in the face?

But Rev. Jonas Sliter was up. The sole question with him was how to sit down. What should he say? He waited until the laughter had subsided, and then he told the children they had not got to that yet, but their excellent teacher would doubtless tell them all about it the next term.

"The next term!" The speaker had found a theme; for he deemed it his duty to "improve" all occasions of public speech for giving religious instruction. From the next term of school, he easily went over to the next term of existence, and told the Crampton Light Infantry that, in order to make that a happy term, they must all become Soldiers of the Cross, and fight valiantly the battles of the church militant. Then Rev. Jonas Sliter generously declared that he would occupy the time no longer, but would "make way for others."

Rev. J. Desilver Newman rose, and came forward. He was very red in the face and very shaky in the knees. He regretted that he was left without a banner, there having been but two in the procession, and those having been appropriated by the gentleman who had preceded him. He took it as a hint that he should say but little, and he should say but little. The children were tired, and were eager for their refreshments. He would not detain them. He owed it to himself, however, to say, that no man could be more sensible than he of the splendor of the achievements of these children, and of their accomplished instructress. Though he had no children himself, he was interested in the rising generation, and was a convert to infant schools. He should have one organized immediately in Littleton on his arrival home. He would further gratify his sense of justice by saying that he fully agreed with the gentleman who had preceded him, in the opinion that the young lady who had shown such remarkable ability in training and instructing these children, had the power of achieving a great career.

Mr. Newman sat down, having said a great deal more than he expected to when he rose. Half a dozen had fallen asleep upon their benches. Two or three had begun to cry. The remainder were tired and in confusion. Rev. Mr. Wilton, a quiet, sensible man, had intended to say something, but, seeing the condition of things, came forward and pronounced a benediction upon the audience, and the exhibition was at a close.

Of the gorging of fruits and sweetmeats that followed in the grove back of Dr. Gilbert's house, nothing needs to be said. As evening came on, the throng separated, and the little ones went cross and very weary to their homes.

The ministers and their wives, the minister without a wife, and the doctor and his daughter, took tea quietly at the parsonage after all was over, and one by one, the clerical wagons, still very badly balanced, were driven out of the village.

Miss Gilbert had commenced her career.

TIMOTHY FARRAR,

Son of Hon. Timothy Farrar, LL.D., of New Hampshire, graduated at Dartmouth College, 1807, studied law with Daniel Webster, at Portsmouth, N. H., and was his law partner there from 1813 till Mr. Webster moved to Boston, in 1816. He was Secretary, Treasurer, and Librarian of Dartmouth College, from 1822 to 1826; and, with Judges Butler and Livermore, was on the bench of the Court of Common Pleas, in New Hampshire, from 1824 to 1833. He now resides in elegant leisure in Dorchester, near Boston. He published, in 1819, the Dartmouth College Case, which contains the only report of the great argument of Jeremiah Mason, —perhaps his greatest, and the only one ever drawn up and reported in full. The formal case, in the form of a special verdict, was drawn by Mr. Farrar, as counsel. Among his contributions to periodical literature were the "Review of the Dred Scot Case," in 1857, and the "Trial of the Constitution," 1863, in the North American Review; articles on the "adequacy of the Constitution," "State rights," and "Power of Congress over the Territories," in the New Englander, 1862—most of which were published separately. From 1853 to 1858 he was Vice-President of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society.

Mr. Farrar published his chief work in 1867: Manual of the Constitution of the United States of America (8vo., 532 pages). It was at once accepted as a standard authority, and reached its third edition in 1872. "The formation and establishment of the American Union," states its preface, as the key-note of the treatise, "constituted the origin and result, the cause and the effect, the beginning and the end, of the American Revolution. By that Revolution, the British Empire was divided into two (not fourteen) independent nations. . . . At no period of our history has the trial of our institutions, and their adaptation to expand with the augmented demands of a great increase, been so thoroughly tested, and so cautiously and intelligently accepted, as during the late civil war, which can hardly yet be considered at an end." In the respect of thorough applicability to the political questions of the day, this work differs from any prior exposition of the Constitution.

His alma mater conferred on Mr. Farrar the degree of LL. D. in 1867.

RICHARD COE.

Richard Coe, the author of several volumes of occasional poems, turning chiefly upon themes of the affections and domestic life, was born in Philadelphia, February 13, 1820. His father was a supercargo, and sailed several times round the world, making his principal voyages to Canton and Calcutta. The care of the son's education devolved upon the mother, by whom he was brought up with a view to professional life. The youth, however, preferred entering into mercantile employments, and has pursued a business career. Mr. Coe's publications are a first volume of Poems, in 1850; followed by a book of Poems and Stories for Children, in 1853, and a third volume of Poems, published in 1862. The poems in this last-mentioned volume are classified under the several heads, "Bible Pictures," "Voices of Home," "Lyrics of Love," "Songs for the Times," &c. They are written with ease and simplicity, and characterized by the truest tenderness. He died April 5, 1873.

THOMAS DUNN ENGLISH

Was born at Philadelphia, June 29, 1819, of a Quaker family, which came to America before William Penn, and settled in what is now Burlington County, New Jersey. The subject of this notice was early engaged in literary occupations, writing for the leading Philadelphia papers as far back as 1836. In 1839 he received the degree of Doctor of Medicine, from the University of Pennsylvania. After a short practice, he commenced the study of law, and was called to the bar in 1842. About 1843 he wrote for the New York Mirror the song of "Ben Bolt," which obtained considerable popularity. Afterwards, a partisan lyric, entitled "The Gallows-goers," a vigorous, but coarse invective against the punishment of hanging, attracted attention; and, during the agitation of the death-penalty question in the Northern States, from 1845 to 1850, was much quoted and declaimed, as well as reprinted by hundreds of thousands of copies. In 1855 a collection of Dr. English's poems was printed in New York, but the edition was suppressed.

In 1844 Dr. English made his residence in New York, and edited a daily paper; and, in the following year, commenced the publication of The Aristidean—a literary magazine, which lived through only a single volume. In 1848 he edited a humorous periodical of the school of Punch, entitled the John Donkey—a publication which was conducted with much ability. In the same year he wrote, in conjunction with Mr. G. G. Foster, a work on the French Revolution of that time. Shortly after this, Dr. English removed to Virginia, where, with some intermissions, he continued to reside until 1856. There he produced "the Logan Grazier" and other poems descriptive of life and character in that region. After the last-mentioned year he came to the North, and has since resided in New Jersey, in the vicinity of the City of New York, engaged in the practice of his profession as a physician, and employing his leisure in writing for the leading magazines and journals. His most noticeable recent productions are a series of national ballads, illustrating the history of the country, which have appeared in Harper's Magazine. They are mostly simple narratives, in which an attempt is made, in easy, sometimes peculiar metre, to tell the story of a battle or noted event, with a close attention to detail and the characteristics of the time and place where the scene is laid. Of these we may enumerate: "The Battle of Bennington," "The Battle of New Orleans," "The Battle of Cowpens," "The Death of Walter Butler," "The Fight at Lexington, Sullivan's Island."

Dr. English has written numerous dramas, mostly anonymously, several of which still keep possession of the stage. The only one which has been printed is entitled "The Mormons." These plays owe their success more to sprightliness of dialogue, diversity of character, and the author's knowledge of stage effect, than to novelty of subject or construction of plot. Of other acknowledged writings of Dr. English, we may mention Walter Woolfe, a novel; a satirical political novel, entitled "1844;" and Ambrose Fecit; or, The Poet and the Painter, 1867.

JAMES PARTON.

Mr. Parton, a resident of New York, is a native of England. He was born at Canterbury, February 9, 1822. Brought to the United States when he was but five years old, he received his education at New York and its vicinity, chiefly at a school at White Plains, in Westchester County. He was for seven years a teacher, when he became known as a writer by his editorial employment in the columns of the Home Journal at New York. His first published work, which appeared in 1855, was The Life of Horace Greeley, Editor of the New York Tribune, a remarkable book of contemporary biography, noticeable for its extraordinary research, the minuteness of its statements, its picturesque incidents, and a certain dashing enthusiasm. It is a curious and interesting contribution to the history of American journalism. The work was eminently successful; and, gaining the author a name with the trade, he was next employed on a compilation: The Humorous Poetry of the English Language—a spirited selection which was also received with favor. This work appeared in 1857, and was followed in 1859 by the Life and Times of Aaron Burr. In this book the author, a hearty admirer of the brilliant qualities of Burr, attempts a vindication of his character from the wholesale reproaches cast upon him—a task which was not to be undertaken without exciting hostile criticism.

The Life of Burr led the way to another, extended biographical undertaking in the Life of Andrew Jackson, which was published, in 1860, in three volumes octavo. The critical judgments which have been passed upon this work acknowledge its unfailing spirit, its industrious research, and its air of candor and impartiality in handling the perplexing facts of the hero's career. The accounts of Jackson by previous writers had been somewhat meagre, and generally didactic in their exposition of military and political affairs. Mr. Parton, with unwearied industry, sought out the details of the story in the newspaper and other original memorials of the times. He sifted interests and contradictory testimony; he visited localities, and made the acquaintance of living witnesses who were intimate with his subject. The Catalogue Raisonné of authorities prefixed to his work shows the extraordinary fidelity of his investigations. The style is easy and flowing, warmly colored without extravagance, carrying the reader with pleasure through nearly two thousand pages, filled with striking incidents and events.

James Parton

Mr. Parton published in 1864 A Life of Benjamin Franklin (2 vols. 8vo.), in which he displays his accustomed skill, industry, love of anecdote, and perception of character; and also a memoir of the career of General Benjamin F. Butler in Louisiana.

 The recent writings of Mr. Parton, whose enthusiasm of spirit, thoroughness of research, and vividness of narration appear unflagging, are devoted to his speciality of biographic studies, except when a piquant aspect of social or political life has captured his pen. An outline of his chief motive in authorship, and of the chance beginning of his literary career, is thus sketched in a private letter, now in print: *

"From early in life I have wondered why such men as Dickens and Thackeray should choose to expend themselves upon fiction, when they could find true stories to tell so much more interesting; and I often used to say, 'Some day a man will come along who will create a new branch of the fine arts — Biography.' But it never crossed my mind that I should attempt anything of the kind, for I knew very well that, to make a real and vivid biography, would require an amount and minuteness of investigation which could never be repaid in money, nor done without money. One day, while I was employed on the Home Journal, I dined at a restaurant with the Mason Brothers, publishers, and the conversation fell upon books. I happened to say, 'What an interesting story could be made out of the life of Horace Greeley, if a person could only get at the facts.' One of them said: 'Why don't you do it?' I replied that it would require an expensive journey and a year of labor, and I could not afford it. A few days after, they offered to advance the money requisite; and so the book was done. In New Hampshire and Vermont I went from house to house, making inquiries. The book sold thirty thousand copies, and yielded me $2000 above the cost of producing. Upon that most insufficient capital I had the temerity to set up in business as a book-maker."

* American Literary Gazette, vol. ix., May 15, 1867, p. 38.

A more detailed narrative of his literary life is given by himself, in a prefatory article to Triumphs of Enterprise, Ingenuity, and Public Spirit, published in 1871, which also contains a series of forty-five articles on such subjects of interest as the History of the Sewing Machine, the Invention of Circulating Libraries, the Discovery of the Island of Madeira, etc.

Mr. Parton's later works have generally made their first appearance in print as detached contributions to the North American Review, Atlantic Monthly, Harper's Magazine, and the New York Ledger. Gathered into book form, these constitute some seven volumes: Manual for the Instruction of "Rings," Railroad and Political, and How New York City is Governed, 1866. Famous Americans of Recent Times, 1867, which included able, if not always strictly impartial, sketches of Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Stephen Girard, James Gordon Bennett, Charles Good-year, Henry Ward Beecher, Commodore Vanderbilt, Theodosia Burr, and John Jacob Astor. Smoking and Drinking: Including, Does it Pay to Smoke, by an Old Smoker? Will the Coming Man Drink Wine? Inebriate Asylums, and a Visit to One, 1868. After a painstaking examination, embracing its physical and scientific phases, this author arrived at the conclusion that the only use of alcohol in modern life is, that "it enables us to violate the laws of nature without immediate suffering and speedy destruction." The People's Book of Biography; or, Short Lives of the Most Interesting Persons of all Ages and Countries, a series of some eighty sketches, 1868; The Danish Islands: Are We Bound in Honor to Pay for Them, 1869. Topics of the Time, 1871, a volume partly given to masterly depicting some of the minor weaknesses of administrative life at Washington, under the headings of Uncle Sam's treatment of his servants; the Congressional peccadilloes; how Congress wastes its time; and Log-rolling at Washington; besides papers on International Copyright; The Yankees at home; Our Roman Catholic and Our Israelitish brethren, etc. His magazine articles in 1872-3 comprise some elaborate sketches in the life of Thomas Jefferson.

A new edition of the Life of Horace Greeley, with additional chapters continuing the biography to 1868, appeared in 1869; and it was followed three years later by another yet more complete. A small volume containing the Words of Washington, 1872, introduced a contemplated series of selections from the chief characters of history.

CLAY, WEBSTER, AND CALHOUN—FROM FAMOUS AMERICANS.

It must be confessed, however, that Henry Clay, who was for twenty-eight years a candidate for the Presidency, cultivated his popularity. Without ever being a hypocrite, he was habitually an actor; but the part which he enacted was Henry Clay exaggerated. He was naturally a most courteous man; but the consciousness of his position made him more elaborately and universally courteous than any man ever was from mere good-nature. A man on the stage must overdo his part, in order not to seem to underdo it. There was a time when almost every visitor to the city of Washington desired, above all things, to be presented to three men there. Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, whom to have seen was a distinction. When the country member brought forward his agitated constituent on the floor of the Senate-chamber, and introduced him to Daniel Webster, the Ex-pounder was likely enough to thrust a hand at him without so much as turning his head or discontinuing his occupation, and the stranger shrunk away painfully conscious of his insignificance. Calhoun, on the contrary, besides receiving him with civility, would converse with him, if opportunity favored, and treat him to a disquisition on the nature of government and the "beauty" of nullification, striving to make a lasting impression on his intellect. Clay would rise, extend his hand with that winning grace of his, and instantly captivate him by his all conquering courtesy. He would call him by name, inquire respecting his health, the town whence he came, how long he had been in Washington, and send him away pleased with himself and enchanted with Henry Clay. And what was his delight to receive a few weeks after, in his distant village, a copy of the Kentuckian's last speech, bearing on the cover the frank of "H. Clay"! It was almost enough to make a man think of "running for Congress"! And, what was still more intoxicating, Mr. Clay, who had a surprising memory, would be likely, on meeting this individual two years after the introduction, to address him by name.

There was a gamy flavor, in those days, about Southern men, which was very pleasing to the people of the North. Reason teaches us that the barn-yard fowl is a more meritorious bird than the game-cock; but the imagination does not assent to the proposition. Clay was at once game-cock and domestic fowl. His gestures called to mind the magnificently branching trees of his Kentucky forests, and his handwriting had the neatness and delicacy of a female copyist. There was a careless, graceful ease in his movements and attitudes, like those of an Indian chief; but he was an exact man of business, who docketed his letters, and could send from Washington to Ashland for a document, telling in what pigeon-hole it could be found. Naturally impetuous, he acquired early in life an habitual moderation of statement, an habitual consideration for other men's self-love, which made him the pacificator of his time. The great compromiser was himself a compromise. The ideal of education is to tame men without lessening their vivacity,—to unite in them the freedom, the dignity, the prowess of a Tecumseh, with the serviceable qualities of the civilized man. This happy union is said to be sometimes produced in the pupils of the great public schools of England, who are savages on the play ground and gentlemen in the school room. In no man of our knowledge has there been combined so much of the best of the forest chief with so much of the good of the trained man of business as in Henry Clay. This was one secret of his power over classes of men so diverse as the hunters of Kentucky and the manufacturers of New England.

 THE LARGENESS OF DANIEL WEBSTER—FROM FAMOUS AMERICANS.

Of the three men whom we have named, Daniel Webster was incomparably the most richly endowed by nature. In his lifetime it was impossible to judge him aright. His presence usually overwhelmed criticism; his intimacy always fascinated it. It so happened, that he grew to his full stature and attained his utmost development in a community where human nature appears to be undergoing a process of diminution,—where people are smaller-boned, less muscular, more nervous, and more susceptible than their ancestors. He possessed, in consequence, an enormous physical magnetism, as we term it, over his fellow-citizens, apart from the natural influence of his talents and understanding. Fidgety men were quieted in his presence, women were spellbound by it, and the busy, anxious public contemplated his majestic calm with a feeling of relief, as well as admiration. Large numbers of people in New England, for many years, reposed upon Daniel Webster. He represented to them the majesty and the strength of the government of the United States. He gave them a sense of safety. Amid the flighty politics of the time and the loud insincerities of Washington, there seemed one solid thing in America, so long as he sat in an arm-chair of the Senate-chamber. When he appeared in State Street, slowly pacing, with an arm behind him, business was brought to an absolute standstill. As the whisper passed along, the windows filled with clerks, pen in mouth, peering out to catch a glimpse of the man whom they had seen fifty times before; while the bankers and merchants hastened forth to give him salutation, or exchange a passing word, happy if they could but catch his eye. At home, and in a good mood, he was reputed to be as entertaining a man as New England ever held,—a gambolling, jocund leviathan out on the sea-shore, and in the library overflowing with every kind of knowledge that can be acquired without fatigue, and received without preparation. Mere celebrity, too, is dazzling to some minds. While, therefore, this imposing person lived among us, he was blindly worshipped by many, blindly hated by some, calmly considered by very few. To this hour he is a great influence in the United States. Perhaps, with the abundant material now accessible, it is not too soon to attempt to ascertain how far he was worthy of the estimation in which his fellow-citizens held him, and what place he ought to hold in the esteem of posterity. At least, it can never be displeasing to Americans to recur to the most interesting specimen of our kind that has lived in America since Franklin.

* * * * *

In surveying the life and works of this eminent and gifted man, we are continually struck with the evidences of his magnitude. He was, as we have said, a very large person. His brain was within a little of being one-third larger than the average, and it was one of the largest three on record. His bodily frame, in all its parts, was on a majestic scale, and his presence was immense. He liked large things,—mountains, elms, great oaks, mighty bulls and oxen, wide fields, the ocean, the Union, and all things of magnitude. He liked great Rome far better than refined Greece, and revelled in the immense things of literature, such as Paradise Lost, and the Book of Job, Burke, Dr. Johnson, and the Sixth Book of the Æneid. Homer he never cared much for,—nor, indeed, anything Greek. He hated, he loathed, the act of writing. Billiards, ten-pins, chess, draughts, whist, he never relished, though fond to excess of out-door pleasures, like hunting, fishing, yachting. He liked to be alone with great Nature,—alone in the giant woods or on the shores of the resounding sea,—alone all day with his gun, his dog, and his thoughts,—alone in the morning, before anyone was astir but himself, looking out upon the sea and the glorious sunrise. What a delicious picture of this large, healthy Son of Earth Mr. Lanman gives us, where he describes him coming into his bedroom, at sunrise, and startling him out of a deep sleep by shouting, "Awake, sluggard! and look upon this glorious scene, for the sky and the ocean are enveloped in flames!" He was akin to all large, slow things in nature. A herd of fine cattle gave him a keen, an inexhaustible enjoyment; but he never "tasted" a horse: he had no horse-enthusiasm. In England he chiefly enjoyed these five things, the Tower of London, Westminster Abbey, Smithfield Cattle Market, English Farming, and Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel he thought was "head and shoulders above any other man" he had ever met. He greatly excelled, too, in describing immense things. In speaking of the Pyramids, once, he asked, "Who can inform us by what now unknown machines mass was thus aggregated to mass, and quarry piled on quarry, till solid granite seemed to cover the earth and reach the skies." His peculiar love of the Union of these States was partly due, perhaps, to this habit of his mind of dwelling with complacency on vastness. He felt that he wanted and required a continent to live in: his mind would have gasped for breath in New Hampshire.

 INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT—FROM TOPICS OF THE TIME.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin," like every other novelty in literature, was the late-maturing fruit of generations. Two centuries of wrong had to pass, before the Subject was complete for the Artist's hand, and the Artist herself was a flower of an ancient and gifted family. The Autobiography of Lyman Beecher has made known this remarkable family to the public. We can all see for ourselves how slowly and painfully this beautiful genius was nourished,—what a narrow escape it had from being crushed and extinguished amid the horrors of theology and the poverty of a Connecticut parsonage, — how it was saved, and ever nurtured, by that extraordinary old father, that most strange and interesting character of New England, who could come home, after preaching a sermon that appalled the galleries, and play the fiddle and riot with his children till bedtime. A piano found its way into the house, and the old man, whose geniality was of such abounding force that forty years of theology could not lessen it, let his children read Ivanhoe and the other novels of Sir Walter Scott. Partly by chance, partly by stealth, chiefly by the force of her own cravings, this daughter of the Puritans obtained the scanty nutriment which kept her genius from starving. By and by, on the banks of the Ohio, within sight of a slave State, the Subject and the Artist met, and there, from the lips of sore and pining fugitives, she gained, in the course of years, the knowledge which she revealed to mankind in "Uncle Tom's Cabin"

When she had done the work, the United States stood by and saw her deprived of three-fourths of her just and legitimate wages, without stirring a finger for her protection. The book sold to the extent of two millions of copies, and the story was played in most of the theatres in which the English language is spoken, and in many French and German theatres. In one theatre in New York it was played eight times a week for twelve months. Considerable fortunes have been gained by its performance, and it is still a source of revenue to actors and managers. We believe that there are at least three persons in the United States, connected with theatres, who have gained more money from "Uncle Tom's Cabin" than Mrs. Stowe. Of all the immense sums which the exhibition of this story upon the stage has produced, the authoress has received nothing. When Dumas or Victor Hugo publishes a novel, the sale of the right to perform it as a play yields him from eighty thousand to one hundred and twenty thousand francs. These authors receive a share of the receipts of the theatre, — the only fair arrangement, — and this share, we believe, is usually one tenth; which is also the usual percentage paid to authors upon the sale of their books. If a French author had written "Uncle Tom's Cabin," he would have enjoyed — 1. A part of the price of every copy sold in France; 2. A share of the receipts of every theatre in France in which he permitted it to be played; 3. A sum of money for the right of translation into English; 4. A sum of money for the right of translation into German. We believe we are far within the truth when we say, that a literary success achieved by a French author equal to that of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" would have yielded that author half a million dollars in gold; and that, too, in spite of the lamentable fact, that America would have stolen the product of his genius, instead of buying it.

Mrs. Stowe received for "Uncle Tom's Cabin" the usual percentage upon the sale of the American edition; which may have consisted of three hundred thousand copies. This percentage, with some other trifling sums, may have amounted to forty thousand dollars. From the theatre she has received nothing; from foreign countries nothing, or next to nothing. This poor forty thousand dollars — about enough to build a comfortable house in the country, and lay out an acre or two of grounds — was the product of the supreme literary success of all times! A corresponding success in sugar, in stocks, in tobacco, in cotton, in invention, in real estate, would have yielded millions upon millions to the lucky operator. To say that Mrs. Stowe, through our cruel and shameful indifference with regard to the rights of authors, native and foreign, has been kept out of two hundred thousand dollars, honestly hers, is a most moderate and safe statement. This money was due to her as entirely as the sum named upon a bill of exchange is due to the rightful owner of the same. It was for "value received." A permanently attractive book, moreover, would naturally be more than a sum of money; it would be an estate; it would be an income. This wrong, therefore, continues to the present moment, and will go on longer than the life of the authoress. While we are writing this sentence, probably, some German, French, Spanish, Italian, Russian, or English bookseller is dropping into his "till" the price of a copy of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," the whole of which he will keep, instead of sending ten per cent. of it to Hartford on the 1st of January next.

We have had another literary success in these years, — Mr. Motley's Histories of the Dutch Republic and of the United Netherlands. As there are fifteen persons in the world who can enjoy fiction to one that will read much of any other kind of literary production, the writers of fiction usually receive some compensation for their labors. Not a fair nor an adequate compensation, but some. This compensation will never be fair nor adequate until every man or woman in the whole world who buys a copy of a novel, or sees it played, shall, in so doing, contribute a certain stipulated sum to the author. Nevertheless, the writers of fiction do get a little money, and a few of them are able to live almost as well as a retired grocer. Now and then we hear of an author who gets almost as much money for a novel that enthalls and enchants two or three nations for many months, as a beardless operator in stocks sometimes wins between one and two p. m. It is not so with the heroes of research, like Motley, Buckle, Bancroft, and Carlyle. Upon this point we are ready to make a sweeping assertion, and it is this. No well-executed work, involving original research, can pay expenses, unless the author is protected in his right to the market of the world. This is one of the points to which we particularly wish to call attention. Give us international copyright, and it immediately becomes possible in the United States for a man who is not rich to devote his existence to the production of works of permanent and universal value. Continue to withhold international copyright, and this privilege remains the almost exclusive portion of men of wealth. For, in the United States, there is scarcely any such thing as honest leisure in connection with business or a salaried office.

Now, with regard to Mr. Motley, whose five massive volumes of Dutch History are addressed to the educated class of all nations, — before that author could write the first sentence of his work he must have been familiar with six languages, English, Latin, Dutch, French, German, and Spanish, besides possessing that general knowledge of history, literature, and science which constitutes what is called culture. He must also have spent five laborious years in gaining an intimate knowledge of his subject, in the course of which he must have travelled in more than one country, and expended large sums in the purchase of books and documents, and for copies of manuscripts. Living in the cheap capitals of Continental Europe, and managing his affairs with economy, he may have accomplished his preparatory studies at an expenditure of ten thousand dollars, — two thousand dollars a year. The volumes contain in all about three thousand five hundred large pages. At two pages a day, which would be very rapid work, and probably twice as fast as he did work, he could have executed the five volumes, and got them through the press (a year's hard labor in itself) in seven years. Here are twelve years' labor, and twenty-four thousand dollars' necessary expenditure. Mr. Motley probably expended more than twelve years, and twice twenty-four thousand dollars; but we choose to estimate the work at its necessary cost. Two other items must be also considered: 1. The talents of the author, which, employed in another profession, would have brought large returns in money and honor; 2. The intense and exhausting nature of the labor. The production of a work which demands strict fidelity to truth, as well as excellence in composition, — which obliges the author, first, to know all, and, after that, to impart the essence of his knowledge in an agreeable and striking manner, — is the hardest continuous work ever done by man. It is at times a fierce and passionate joy; it is at times a harrowing anxiety; it is at times a vast despair; but it is always very hard labor. The search after a fact is sometimes as arduous as the chase after a deer, and it may last six weeks, and, after all, there may be no such fact, or it may be valueless. And when all is done, — when the mountain of manuscript lies before the author ready for the press, — he cannot for the life of him tell whether his work is trash or treasure. As poor Charlotte Bronie said, when she had finished Jane Eyre, "I only know that the story has interested me." Finally comes the anguish of having the work judged by persons whose only knowledge of the subject is derived from the work itself.

No matter for all that: we are speaking of money. This work, we repeat, cost the author twenty-four thousand dollars to produce. Messrs Harper sell it at fifteen dollars a copy. The usual allowance to the author is ten per cent of the retail price, and, as a rule, it ought not to be more. Upon works of that magnitude, however, it often is more. Suppose, then, that Mr. Motley receives two dollars for every copy of his work sold by his American publishers. A meritorious work of general interest, i. e. a book not addressed to any class, sect, or profession, that costs fifteen dollars, is considered successful in the United States if it sells three thousand copies. Five thousand is decided success. Seven thousand is brilliant success. Ten thousand copies, sold in the lifetime of the author, is all the success that can be hoped for. Ten thousand copies would yield to the author twenty thousand dollars, which is four thousand dollars less than it cost him.

But Mr. Motley's work is of universal interest. It does not concern the people of the United States any more than it does the people of England, France, and Germany, nor as much as it does the people of Spain and Holland. Wherever, in the whole world, there is an intelligent, educated human being, there is a person who would like to read and possess Motley's Histories, which relate events of undying interest to all the few in every land who are capable of comprehending their significance. Give this author the market of the world, and he is compensated for his labor. Deny him this right, and it is impossible he should be.

England buys a greater number of fifteen-dollar books than the United States, because, in England, rich men are generally educated men, and in the United States the class who most want such books cannot buy them. Our clergy are poor; our students are generally poor; our lawyers and doctors are not rich, as a class; our professors and school-masters are generally very poor; our men of business, as a class, read little but the daily paper; and our men of leisure are too few to be of any account. Nor have we yet that universal system of town and village self-sustaining libraries, which will, by and by, abundantly atone for the ignorance and indifference of the rich, and make the best market for books the world has ever seen. England would readily "take" ten thousand copies of a three-guinea book of first-rate merit and universal interest. A French translation of the same would sell five thousand in France, and, probably, three thousand more in other Continental countries. A German translation would place it within the reach of nations of readers, and a few hundreds in each of those nations would become possessors of the work. Or, in other words, an International Copyright would multiply the gains of an author like Mr. Motley by three, possibly by four. $20,000 \times 3 = 60,000$.

We are far from thinking that sixty thousand dollars would be a compensation for such work as Mr. Motley has done. We merely say, that the reasonable prospect of even such a partial recompense as that would make it possible for persons not rich to produce in the United States works of universal and permanent value. The question is, Are we prepared to say that such works shall be attempted here only by rich men, or by men like Noah Webster, who lived upon a Spelling-Book while he wrote his Dictionary? Generally, the acquisition of an independent income is the work of a lifetime, and it ought to be. But the production of a masterpiece, involving original research, is also the work of a lifetime. Not one man in a thousand millions can do both. Give us International Copyright, and there are already five publishers in the United States who are able and willing to give an author the equivalent of Gibbon's sixteen hundred pounds a year, or of Noah Webster's Spelling-Book, or Prescott's thousand dollars a month; i. e. maintenance, while he is doing that part of his work which requires exclusive devotion to it. Besides, a man intent upon the execution of a great work can contrive, in many ways, to exist — just exist — for ten years, provided he has a reasonable prospect of moderate reward when his task is done. There are fifty men in New England alone who would deem it an honor and a privilege "to invest" in such an enterprise.

Mr. Bancroft's is another case in point. Mr. Buckle remarks, that there is no knowledge until there is a class who have conquered leisure, and that, although most of this class will always employ their leisure in the pursuit of pleasure, yet a few will devote it to the acquisition of knowledge. These few are the flower of their species, — its ornaments and benefactors, — for the flower issues in most precious fruit, which finally nourishes and exalts the whole. We are such idle and pleasure-loving creatures, and civilization places so many alluring delights within the reach of a rich man, that it must ever be accounted a merit in one of this class if he devotes himself to generous toil for the public good. George Bancroft has spent thirty years in such toil. His History of the United States has stood to him in the place of a profession. His house is filled with the most costly material, the spoils of foreign archives and of domestic chests, the pick of auction sales, the hidden treasure of ancient bookstores, and the chance discoveries of dusty garrets. His work has been eminently "successful," and he has received for it about as much as his material cost, and perhaps half a dollar a day for his labor. When the third volume of the work was about to appear, a London publisher offered three hundred pounds for the advance sheets, which were furnished, and the money was paid. The same sum was offered and paid for the advance sheets of the fourth volume. Then the London publisher discovered that "the courtesy of the trade" would suffice for his purpose, and he forbore to pay for that which he could get for nothing. Six hundred pounds, therefore, is all that this American author has received from foreign countries for thirty years' labor. His work has been translated into two or three foreign languages, and it is found in all European libraries of any completeness, whether public or private; but this little sum is all that has come back to him. Surely, there cannot be one reader of this volume so insensible to moral distinctions as not to feel that this is wrong. The happy accident of Mr. Bancroft's not needing the money has nothing to do with the right and wrong of the matter. No man is so rich that he does not like to receive money which he has honestly earned: for money honestly earned is honor as well as reward, and it is not for us, the benefited party, to withhold his right from a man because he has been generous to us. And the question again occurs, Shall we sit down content with an arrangement which obliges us to wait for works of permanent and universal interest until the accident occurs of a rich man willing and able to execute them? It is not an accident, but a most rare conjunction of accidents. First, the man must be competent; secondly, he must be willing; thirdly, he must be rich. This fortunate combination is so little likely to occur in a new country, that it must be accounted honorable to the United States that in the same generation we have had three such men, — Bancroft, Motley, and Prescott. Is it such persons that should be singled out from the mass of their fellow-citizens to be deprived of their honest gains? Besides, riches take to themselves wings. A case has occurred among us of a rich man devoting the flower of his days to the production of excellent works, and then losing his property.

It will be of no avail to adduce the instance of Dr. J. W. Draper. We have had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Draper relate the history of his average day. Up at six. Breakfast at seven. An hour's ride to the city. Busy at the New York University from nine to one. Home in cars to dinner at three. At four p. m. begins his day's literary work, and keeps steadily on till eleven. Then, bed. Not one man in many millions could endure such a life, and no man, perhaps, ought to endure it. Dr. Draper happens to possess a most sound and easy-working constitution of body and mind, and he has acquired a knowledge of the laws which relate to its wellbeing. But, even in his case, it is questionable whether it is well, or even right, to devote so large a part of his existence to labor. It is probable, too, that an International Copyright would, ere this, have released him from the necessity of it, or the temptation to it.

 "FANNY FERN" — MRS. PARTON.

SARA PAYSON WILLIS, a sister of the poet N. P. Willis, was a native of Portland, Maine, and her birthday was July 7, 1811. She was educated at the Hartford Seminary, in which Miss Catharine E. Beecher was principal, and Harriet Beecher a teacher, and won the reputation of a merry, high-spirited girl. In 1834 she was married to Mr. Charles Eldridge, of Boston. His death twelve years later left her with two children to support. A brief, spicy essay, signed "Fanny Fern," was her first literary venture, in 1851; and it led to a brilliant, erratic series that soon gave her a competence. Within a few years, several collections of Fern Leaves reached a sale of more than 130,000 copies. Two novels, Ruth Hall, 1854, and Rose Clarke, 1857, were also popular. In 1854 she made an engagement to furnish a weekly article to the New York Ledger, and fulfilled that agreement without a failure for eighteen years. Two volumes of these essays and sketches have been issued: Fresh Leaves, 1857; and Folly as It Flies, 1868.

"Fanny Fern" was married to Mr. James Parton in 1856. "Both were authors whose provinces bordered on Bohemia. They had apparently many tastes and characteristics in common; they were both acute, independent thinkers, rather than students or philosophers; they were rather special pleaders than reasoners — rather wits than logicians."* She died in New York city, October 10, 1872, aged sixty-one.

HENRY B. DAWSON.

Mr. Dawson was born at Gosberton, near Boston, Lincolnshire, England, June 8, 1821. He came to New York in his boyhood, in 1834, and, for a time, attended the public schools in the city. After several years of farming occupations in the country, he returned to the city in 1839, and was employed at first in a lumber-yard, then as bookkeeper. For more than two years, while engaged at the desk by day, he gave his evenings to the editorship of a weekly newspaper, published in New York. His first composition in the department of historical literature, to which he has since been devoted, was The History of the Park and its Vicinity — a sketch from the revolutionary annals of the city of New York, which was published in the Corporation Manual of 1855. It occupies some sixty closely printed pages of that work. The patient investigation of original authorities, and minute research, which mark this essay, are characteristics of the author's numerous historical tracts, and other publications which have followed at intervals. Mr. Dawson has read papers before the New York Historical Society, on Military Retreats through Westchester County, New York, in 1776; The Sons of Liberty in New York, printed for private circulation, in an octavo of 118 pages, in 1859; The Battle of Harlem Heights, September 16, 1776; The Assault on Stony Point by General Anthony Wayne, July 16, 1779, published, with a map and several fac-similes, in a volume of 156 pages; and The City of New York in April, 1775. He has also read papers before the Long Island Historical Society, on The Battle of Long Island; before the Vermont Historical Society, on The Battle of Bennington; and before the Baptist Historical Society, on The Life and Times of Anne Hutchinson. Two of these papers, as we have indicated, have been published: all are in preparation by the author for the press. Mr. Dawson has also published a tract, entitled, Major-General Israel Putnam.

* "Fanny Fern, by Grace Greenwood" — Eminent Women of the Age, pp. 66-84.

Mr. Dawson is also the author of an extensive work, in two vols., quarto, published by Messrs. Johnson, Fry & Co., in New York, entitled, Battles of the United States by Sea and Land. The plan of this work includes notices of the wars of the Revolution, of 1812, and the Mexican war, with official documents and biographies of distinguished commanders.

Mr. Dawson has also edited, in the most painstaking manner, an edition of The Federalist, the first volume of which has been published by Mr. Scribner, of New York. The essays are printed from the original text, with an elaborate introduction, embracing a review of the political condition of New York in 1787; a notice of the causes which led to the preparation of the work; and an account of the persons who wrote it, and the effect of its publication, together with a biographical description of the several editions. In connection with this work, Mr. Dawson has in preparation The Anti-Federalist: a collection of Essays, and other Publications, written in Opposition to the New Constitution; and, A History of the Constitution for the United States of America.

In addition to these publications which we have enumerated, Mr. Dawson has edited, from the original manuscript, The Diary of David Howe, a Soldier in the Massachusetts line, 1775-77; Recollections of the Jersey Prison-Ship, by Captain Thomas Dring, one of the Prisoners; W. Graves's Letters on the Operations of Admiral Graves in America; and, The Gazette Series, in four volumes. He has conducted the Historical Magazine since July, 1866, and is now printing therein a valuable series of papers on The Conflicts of the War of Secession. He has in preparation an official history of the corporation of Trinity Church, N. Y., and also a Life of General Anthony Wayne, founded on "The Wayne Papers" in his possession.

EDWARD RUPERT HUMPHREYS,

Now well known in Boston, Massachusetts, where he resides, as a classical teacher and author, is the son of a distinguished clergyman of the Church of England, and was born March 1, 1820. After passing through the usual public-school education of England, he entered the University of Cambridge, where he attained distinction as a classical scholar. After leaving the university, he studied surgery and medicine, but soon devoted himself to the occupation of his life—that of an educator and educational writer. At the age of twenty-four he was appointed to the directorship of the education of the British Colonial Prince Edward Island, where he succeeded in greatly raising the standard of instruction. He published, during this period, an edition of Horace, and some minor classical works, for the use of the Central Academy, and an English series of books for the District Schools. In 1848, he was appointed to the head classical mastership of the Merchiston Castle Academy, near Edinburgh, in Scotland; and in 1852, to the head-mastership of the ancient Grammar School of Cheltenham, both of which he superintended with eminent ability. In the latter he introduced various reforms, successfully abolishing the "fag" system, and ingrafting a thorough course of English education upon the old classical curriculum. His services in thus raising the standard of "public school" education in England, were acknowledged by the highest authority. While in Scotland and at Cheltenham, besides contributing to the reviews and magazines, he published Lyra Latina, or Translations from Modern English and American Poets into various kinds of Latin verse; Lyra Hellenica, or Translations from Modern Poets into Greek Iambic verse; Exercitationes Iambicæ, or Original Exercises in Greek Iambic Composition, now a standard text-book at Eton and Harrow; The Third Decade of Livy, with copious Notes and Illustrations (London, Longmans, 1857); Manuals of "Latin and Greek Prose Composition," of "Civil Law," "Political Science," "Moral Philosophy," etc., mostly published by Longmans in several editions.

As the school at Cheltenham increased under Dr. Humphreys' mastership, new buildings were required, which were erected at his own expense; and it was owing to embarrassments from this source that, in 1859, he resigned his position and came to America. He settled with his family in Boston, and was soon recognized, not only as an accomplished classical scholar and teacher, but as an able speaker and writer. He became, and continued for three years, an assistant editor of the Boston Post, and has acquired a high reputation as Principal of "The Collegiate School" in that city. Since his residence in the United States, Dr. Humphreys has published Lessons on the Liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal Church—a work of learning, and variety of information (Boston, 1860); an Essay on the Education of Military Officers (Boston, 1862); and has been a prominent contributor to the National Quarterly Review. He has contributed various articles to the Monthly Masonic Magazine, and the Church Monthly. His recent writings include: Essays on the Higher Education of Europe and America; and America, Past, Present, and Prospective, 1870.

HENRY COPPÉE.

Henry Coppée was born in Savannah, Georgia, on the 15th October, 1821. He entered the Sophomore class of Yale College in 1836; left it in 1837; was for three years a student of civil engineering, and employed on the construction of the Central Railroad from Savannah to Macon, Georgia. Admitted to the West Point Military Academy in 1841, he graduated in the artillery in 1845, served through the Mexican war, and was brevetted captain "for gallant and meritorious services in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, August 20, 1847." At the conclusion of the war, he was ordered to West Point, where he remained as instructor in French, and Principal Assistant Professor of "Ethics and English Studies," until 1855. For the next eleven years he held the Professorship of Belles-Lettres in the University of Pennsylvania, and then accepted the presidency of Lehigh University, Bethlehem, Pa.

Professor Coppée is the author of various works, educational, in military sciencé, and general literature. His Elements of Logic (1858), and Elements of Rhetoric (1859), and Select Academic Speaker (1861), have passed through numerous editions, and are extensively used in our colleges and higher seats of learning. His military works include, Field Manual of Evolutions of the Line (1861); Field Manual of Battalion Drill (1861); Field Manual of Courts-Martial (1863); and a translation of Marmont's Esprit des Institutions Militaires, "The Essence, or Essential Principles, of the Art of War" (1862). In general literature, Professor Coppée has edited the Gallery of Famous Poets, and Gallery of Famous Poetesses, published in Philadelphia, in 1859 and 1860, in a style of unusual typographical excellence and pictorial illustration. Songs of Praise, and Grant and his Campaigns, followed in 1866; English Literature Considered as an Interpreter of English History, in 1872. For two years (1864-6), Prof. Coppée edited the United States Service Magazine—a military and naval monthly. He is also the author of numerous lectures, and articles in reviews and magazines.

WILLIAM HENRY MILBURN

Was born at Philadelphia, September 26, 1823. In 1837, his father, having suffered in the financial disasters of that year the wreck of the fortune which he had acquired, moved to Jacksonville, Illinois. His son William, who had irretrievably lost the sight of one eye, and partially that of the other, in early childhood, exhibited in his youth a passion for learning, and in his new home devoted his time between the humble duties of his father's "store," and such reading as he could accomplish with his imperfect vision. He read, or spelled out, various authors, and became sufficiently accomplished in Latin and Greek to pursue his studies in the Illinois College in the vicinity. He was compelled, however, by failing health in 1843, at the age of twenty, to give up his routine of study, when he was led by the religious associations of his father's family to engage in the service of the Methodist Church, as an itinerant preacher. The travel and change of habit which this required appears to have had a favorable effect upon his health, for he was enabled to continue on the various Western circuits for twelve years. Having been for some time a regularly ordained clergyman of the Methodist Church, and made many friends in his travels, he was, in 1846, chosen chaplain to Congress, in which capacity he was engaged at Washington for ten sessions. In 1848, he became established in Alabama, as a settled preacher; at first at Montgomery, and afterwards at Mobile. He passed about six years in that State, when he removed to the City of New York, and became much engaged as a popular lecturer; his nearly total loss of sight, while it excited the sympathy of the public, making no demands upon their indulgence or forbearance. On the contrary, the lectures were always spirited, and enlivened with the fruits of various mental acquisitions, adding one more to the many honorable examples of "the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties."

Mr. Milburn, in his published writings, has drawn largely upon his recollections of South Western life, in his circuit experiences as a Methodist clergyman. His volume entitled The Rifle, Axe, and Saddle-Bags (New York, 1857), is composed of various lectures, discussing with a variety of anecdotes, among other topics, The Symbols of Early Western Character; The Triumphs of Genius over Blindness; An Hour's Talk about Women; Early Discoveries in the Southwest. This volume, which was well received by the public, was followed by a second in 1859, of a more personal character, entitled Ten Years of Preacher-Life: Chapters from an Autobiography. It is written with care and fluency, is graphic and entertaining, and contains many instructive sketches of Methodist life in the West; with sketches of eminent public characters at Washington. The Pioneers, Preachers, and People of the Mississippi Valley, appeared in 1860.

Mr. Milburn, in 1859, visited England, in company with Bishop Simpson and the Rev. Dr. McClintock. He has recently relinquished Methodism, and joined the Protestant Episcopal Church.

JOHN BIGELOW.

John Bigelow was born at Malden, on the Hudson, Ulster County, New York, November 25, 1817. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1835, studied law with the late Robert Sedgwick, and was admitted to the bar in the city of New York, in 1839. He was for ten years engaged in the practice of his profession, occupying himself in his intervals of leisure, more or less, with literature. In 1842, he was engaged as literary editor of a daily Democratic journal published in New York, entitled The Plebeian. In 1843, '44, and '45, he was a contributor to the Democratic Review. Among the papers from his pen were articles on "Constitutional Reform," "Executive Patronage," "The Reciprocal Influences of Civil Liberty and the Physical Sciences," "Lucian and his Age," and "Pascal." In 1844, he edited a book of travels on the Western frontier, and an account of a residence in New Mexico, by Josiah Gregg, a Santa Fé trader, entitled Commerce of the Prairies. In 1845, he was appointed by Governor Silas Wright one of the inspectors of the State Prison at Sing Sing, an office the duties of which he discharged for three years, introducing various reforms in the prison discipline. In November, 1850, he formed a connection with Mr. William Cullen Bryant, as one of the proprietors and editors of the New York Evening Post, which was continued for more than ten years. During this period, when the paper became greatly distinguished by its advocacy of the free-soil doctrines, which have been incorporated in the creed of the Republican party, he was diligently employed on its editorial columns, with several intervals of absence, when its columns were enriched by his travelling correspondence. In 1852, he published a volume entitled Jamaica in 1850, or the Effects of Sixteen Years of Freedom on a Slave Colony, which was the result of a tour in the island. It gives, upon the whole, a favorable view of the workings of emancipation, and is often referred to in discussions on the subject. In the winter of 1854, he made a similar voyage to Hayti, and gave a portion of his observations to the public in a series of letters in the Evening Post. In 1856, he published, in furtherance of the interests of one of the candidates in the Presidential campaign of that year, a biographical volume, The Life and Public Services of John Charles Fremont; including an Account of his Explorations, Discoveries, and Adventures on Five Successive Expeditions across the North American Continent.

The years 1859 and 1860 were passed by him abroad. His correspondence with the Post presents a view of the progress of the Italian question during that period, and of the progress of events in France, which he made his chief residence. It is interspersed with various sketches of travel, and literary essays on Buffon, Montesquieu, and others, worthy of preservation in a more accessible form. On his return, Mr. Bigelow retired from his connection with the Evening Post, to the enjoyment of a life of literary leisure at a country seat on the banks of the Hudson, in the immediate neighborhood of West Point. He was called from this retirement early in the administration of President Lincoln, by the appointment of American Consul at Paris, which he accepted, and the duties of which he discharged for several years, till on the death of the Minister, Mr. Dayton, in 1864, he was called temporarily to succeed him as Acting Minister, and was presently appointed his successor as Minister Plenipotentiary. During his consulship, he rendered an important service in making known to the Parisians the extensive resources of the United States, by the preparation of a valuable work of statistics, which was published in the French language. It bore the title, Les Etats Unis d'Amérique en 1863: Leur Histoire Politique; Leurs Ressources Agricoles, Industrielles et Commerciales. The information set forth in this work was well calculated to serve the Government at home at the critical period of the war, by exhibiting the means possessed by the country for prosecuting to a successful issue the contest into which it had been plunged by the rebellious States.

Mr. Bigelow resigned his position as minister to France, and early in 1867 was permitted to return to the United States, bringing with him the original manuscripts of Franklin's autobiography, which he published in the following year, in a volume entitled: Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, Edited from his Manuscript, with Notes and an Introduction by John Bigelow, 1868. The singular history of this precious manuscript is detailed at length in the Introduction, from which we take the following paragraphs:

"It is well known that Franklin prepared so much of the celebrated Memoirs of his life as was originally intended for publication, mainly at the solicitation of one of his most cherished friends in France — M. le Veillard, then Mayor of Passy. Toward the close of the year 1789 he presented to this gentleman a copy of all this sketch that was then finished. At the doctor's death, his papers, including the original of the manuscript, passed into the hands of one of his grandsons, William Temple Franklin, who undertook to prepare an edition of the life and writings of his grandfather for a publishing house in London. For the greater convenience of the printer in the preparation of this edition — so goes the tradition in the le Veillard family — William Temple Franklin exchanged the original autograph with Mrs. le Veillard, then a widow, for her copy of the Memoirs, and thus the autograph passed out of the Franklin family. At the death of the widow le Veillard, this manuscript passed to her daughter; and at her death, in 1834, it became the property of her cousin, M. de Sénarmont, whose grandson, M. P. de Sénarmont, transferred it to me on the 26th of January, 1867, with several other memorials of Franklin, which had descended to him with the manuscript. Among the latter were the famous pastel portrait of Franklin by Duplessis, which he presented to M. le Veillard; a number of letters to M. le Veillard from Dr. Franklin and from his grandsons, William Temple Franklin and Benjamin Franklin Bache; together with a minute outline of the topics of his Memoirs, brought down to the termination of his mission to France.

"I availed myself of my earliest leisure to subject the Memoirs to a careful collation with the edition which had appeared in London in 1817, and which was the first and only edition that ever purported to have been printed from the manuscript. The results of this collation revealed the curious fact that more than twelve hundred separate and distinct changes had been made in the text, and, what is more remarkable, that the last eight pages of the manuscript, which are second in value to no other eight pages of the work, were omitted entirely. Many of these changes are mere modernizations of style; such as would measure some of the modifications which English prose had undergone between the days of Goldsmith and Southey. Some Franklin might have approved of; others he might have tolerated; but it is safe to presume that very many he would have rejected without ceremony."

The Editor enters at length into a calm consideration of the questions that arise from the changes in the text; the overlooking of the closing pages; the delay of twenty-seven years in the publication which purported to have been made from the manuscript; and the singular fact that this posthumous work, which has been printed in nearly every written language, and constitutes one of the most popular books ever printed, should never have been verified by a comparison with the original manuscript. He adverts to the motives attributed to William Temple Franklin by Mr. Sparks, for thus delaying to publish these memoirs of his grandfather, and presents facts which give strong coloring to the suspicion that his action in this virtual suppression, for so many years, was owing to the interposition of the British ministry, and the payment of a large remuneration for his silence. The last pages of the work were written in the doctor's eighty-fourth year. They relate to Franklin's visit to London in 1757, and to his conversation with Lord Granville, then president of the council, who told him the startling doctrine that acts in council relating to the colonies when signed by the king became "the law of the land—for the king is the legislator of the colonies!"

Mr. Bigelow is the author of some valuable monographs on social and political phases of French history, which show him to have been a close observer of the national life during his official sojourn at the court of Paris. The most elaborate of these, entitled France and Hereditary Monarchy, was written in June, 1871, the same month that Thiers was elected President of the French Republic, and was published in London and New York. It is mainly devoted to the inquiry whether the transmission of executive power by inheritance is a failure in France, which momentous question it answers in the affirmative; and to an illustration of the gain in stability and public peace that would result were a popular sovereignty established, wherein the people could have the power to peacefully change the executive at stated intervals. A paper containing Some Recollections of the late Antoine Pierre Berryer, was read before the New York Historical Society, February 16, 1869, and afterwards issued as a pamphlet. Another, Beaumarchais the Merchant, contained an analysis of some letters written by his agent in America to Beaumarchais, a copy of which the author was permitted to take by the heirs. And an able article on "Father Hyacinthe and his Church," which traced the rupture of that illustrious pulpit orator with the Roman communion, was printed in Putnam's Magazine, for January, 1870. The latter was issued in pamphlet form, and subsequently added by a London house as an introduction to an edition of Father Hyacinthe's discourses.

He also delivered a speech before the Alumni of Union College, on the subject of Education and the desideration of Professional teaching in America, which was printed.

In December, 1871, Mr. Bigelow submitted to Senator Conkling of New York an elaborate scheme for the suitable commemoration of the first Centennial Anniversary of American Independence. This paper was communicated to the public through the columns of the New York Tribune of the 28th of the following month, and first directed public attention to the approach of that memorable anniversary.

ROBERT TOMES.

Robert Tomes was born in the City of New York, of English parentage, in 1816. He was educated at the grammar schools of the city, and at Washington College (now Trinity), Hartford, where he graduated with distinction. He then pursued the studies of a physician, at the schools in Philadelphia, and, subsequently, at the University of Edinburgh, where he received the degree of Doctor of Medicine. After a diligent attendance at the hospitals in Paris, he returned to the United States, and for some years was engaged in the practice of his profession at New York. He made several voyages as surgeon in the employ of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in the early years of their service, between Panama and San Francisco. His first published volume, entitled Panama in 1855, was a graphic account of an excursion from New York to that city by the newly completed railway across the isthmus. This was followed by two works of popular biography—lives of Richard Cœur de Lion and Oliver Cromwell, published by Messrs. Sheldon & Co., in 1855-'56. He rendered valuable assistance in the composition of the narrative portion of Commodore Perry's Naval Expedition to Japan (New York, 1855), and the preparation of the new, or American matter, in Appleton's Cyclopædia of Biography, published the following year. Dr. Tomes is also the author of two extensive works, published in a serial form, by Messrs. Virtue & Co., New York: Battles of America by Sea and Land, including the colonial and revolutionary battles, the war of 1812, and the Mexican campaigns, completed in three volumes, 4to; and The War with the South, a History of the Great American Rebellion. These popular histories are written in a lively, picturesque manner, and have had a wide circulation. Dr. Tomes has written much for the newspapers and periodicals; sketches of travel and reviews for the Literary World; articles in the Evening Post and Harper's Weekly; and a spirited series of papers on American manners and society, in Harper's Magazine.

Dr. Tomes published in 1867, The Champagne Country, giving the results of two years' experience while consular agent of the United States at Rheims.

JOHN BONNER.

John Bonner, a resident of New York, was born in Quebec, Canada, in 1828. He is the author of three popular juvenile works—A Child's History of the United States, Greece, and Rome, in seven volumes, including A Child's History of the Great Rebellion. In these books, the idea of which was suggested by Charles Dickens's Child's History of England, Mr. Bonner has infused a critical spirit into an engaging, lively narrative. In treating of Greece and Rome he has followed the latest investigations of European scholars, and carefully separated the early mythological and legendary from the ascertained historical periods. In the History of Rome he has availed himself of Sir George Cornewall Lewis's "Inquiry into the Credibility of Early Roman History;" commencing "the real history" of the country with the era of the Republic, B. C. 282. That of Greece is dated B. C. 500. Mr. Bonner is also the translator of De Tocqueville's last work, The Old Régime and the Revolution, published by the Harpers. For several years Mr. Bonner edited Harper's Weekly, and was at the same time an active contributor to the New York Herald, with the editorship of which he was also associated.

WILLIAM V. WELLS.

Mr. Wells was born in Boston, January 2, 1826, and was educated at the Common Schools of that city. He has travelled since boyhood in many parts of the world, originally as a sailor and officer in the merchant service, and afterwards as a mining and commercial adventurer and agent for American capitalists in obtaining grants from foreign governments. In the course of these adventures he has been four times wrecked at sea. In 1849 he went to California, where he built and commanded the first steamboat that ever ploughed the waters of that State. He has followed the growth and progress of American institutions on the Pacific coast from their commencement. In 1856 he published in New York a narrative volume of Walker's Expedition to Nicaragua (Stringer & Townsend); and in 1857, in an octavo volume, Explorations and Adventures in Honduras (Harper Brothers). In 1857 he conceived the idea of collecting the materials for and writing the life of his ancestor, the patriot of the Revolution, Samuel Adams; and has since pursued the work with unwearied industry. The collection of his writings, correspondence, and state papers thus made, with a detailed narrative of his life, acts, and opinions, was published in 1865, in three octavo volumes, bearing the title, Life and Public Services of Samuel Adams.

In addition to these and other occupations, Mr. Wells has owned and edited several newspapers in San Francisco, and written largely for Harper's Magazine and Weekly, besides furnishing various correspondence for the American press from Europe, South America, California, British Columbia, Central America, Oregon, and Mexico. He was recently Consul-General of the Republic of Honduras.

REV. HENRY MARTYN DEXTER

Was born at Plympton, in Plymouth County, Massachusetts, August 13, 1821. He is of the sixth generation, on the father's side, from "Farmer" Thomas Dexter, of Lynn; and of the seventh generation, on the mother's side, from George Morton, of Plymouth, the presumed "Mourt" of "Mourt's" Relation. He graduated at Yale College in 1840, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1844, and was settled as the pastor of the Congregational Church in Manchester, N. H., in the same year. He removed to Boston in 1849, to become pastor of what is now the Berkeley Street Congregational Church, in which position he remained till 1867. In 1851 he became editor of the Congregationalist weekly newspaper, and from 1858 to 1867 was one of the editors of the Congregational Quarterly. In 1867 he became editor-in-chief of the Congregationalist and the Boston Recorder.

In 1859 he published a 16mo, of 216 pages, entitled, Street Thoughts; and, in 1860, a 12mo, of 219 pages, entitled, Twelve Discourses. He published in 1865 a 16mo, entitled, The Verdict of Reason on the Question of the Future Punishment of the Impenitent; and a 12mo, entitled, Congregationalism; what it is, whence it is, how it works, why it is better than any other form of Church Government, and its consequent Demands. This manual has been accepted as a standard. He has also edited for private reprint in "Wiggin's Historical Series," Church's Entertaining Passages Relating to Philip's War, and Mourt's Relation, from the first editions. In 1870 appeared The Church Polity of the Pilgrims of the New Testament.

He has also printed several occasional sermons, with many articles, in the quarterlies.

He has been for some years at work upon a new history of the "Old Plymouth Colony," and is engaged in original investigations in England and Holland, as well as in this country, in reference thereto; in the endeavor to make it exhaustive in those lines of state paper and genealogical research, which are now so much more accessible than they have been to former explorers in the same field. He has prepared, in manuscript, A Bibliography of the Church Struggle in England during the Sixteenth Century, with 1800 titles.

RICHARD EDDY

Was born in Providence, R. I., June 21, 1828. He was apprenticed to the book-binding business at the age of fifteen. In 1848 he went to Clinton, N. Y., and studied theology with the Rev. Dr. Thomas J. Sawyer. He was subsequently settled as Universalist preacher in Rome and Buffalo, N. Y., and in Philadelphia, Pa. He became pastor of the Universalist Church in Canton, N. Y., in 1856, and so continued until September, 1861, when he was commissioned by Governor Morgan, Chaplain of the 60th Regiment New York State Volunteers. He left the army in March, 1863, became pastor of the First Universalist Church, Philadelphia, and was librarian of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania for three years. In 1873 he was pastor in Gloucester, Massachusetts.

Mr. Eddy has published an interesting volume, detailing his camp observations and experiences, entitled, History of the 60th Regiment New York State Volunteers, from the commencement of its organization, in July, 1861, to its public reception at Ogdensburg, as a veteran command, January 7, 1864 (12mo, pp. 360, Phila., 1864). The various statistics of the regiment are given with care, from its first gathering, through its career with the army of the Potomac; the important engagements in which it took part are described, and numerous characteristic minor incidents preserved, which will be of value to the future historian, and of interest to posterity. Mr. Eddy has also published several discourses, including three sermons, entitled, The Martyr to Liberty, preached in Philadelphia on occasion of the death of President Lincoln.

MARY W. JANVRIN.

This lady, the author of various tales and sketches, and other contributions to popular literature, which have been received with favor by the public, is of French ancestry, grafted on the sturdy New England stock; the family having emigrated from the Isle of Guernsey to America, prior to the Revolution. She was born at Exeter, N. H., in 1830. There she was educated at a Female Seminary in the town, and there she has since continued to reside. Early developing a taste for composition, she won a prize in her eighteenth year, offered by the publishers of a leading Boston journal, by the production of a tale entitled, Children's Vows; or, the Cornelian Ring, which, being well received by the public, induced her to turn her attention to literature as a profession. Her pen was immediately in request for the literary papers of the day, not only in New England, but in the South and West, to which she became a constant contributor. She also published various articles, tales, sketches, and poetry, in the Philadelphia popular magazines; and in 1858 commenced an engagement, which long continued, as a regular contributor to Godey's Lady's Book.

In 1856, Miss Janvrin edited and wrote biographical articles for Cypress Leaves, published by James Usher, of Boston; in 1857, Peace; or, the Stolen Will, published by French & Co., Boston; and, in 1858, compiled for the same publishers a series of books entitled The Juvenile Miscellany. In 1860, An Hour with the Children, from her pen, was published by the American Tract Society, Boston. She died August 12, 1870.

DEAN DUDLEY.

Dean Dudley, a New England antiquarian and miscellaneous writer, was born May 23, 1823, at Kingfield, a small new town in Maine, named from Hon. William King (half-brother of Hon. Rufus King, of New York), the first Governor of that State, under whose auspices the town was settled.

Mr. Dudley is descended from the Hon. Thomas Dudley, one of the early Colonial Governors of Massachusetts, through his eldest son. His paternal grandfather, Hon. Nathl. Dudley, one of the first settlers of Kingfield, and his maternal, Capt. Dean Bangs, from whom he was named, both lived to great ages—one to 80, and the other 90 years. His father, Edmund Dudley, was a farmer and school-teacher.

At the age of twelve, he was left to his own resources; but by industry and economy was able to obtain a sufficient education, when he was eighteen years old, to procure a certificate of his ability and qualification to teach a common school from the preceptor of the Waterville Liberal Institute, and another from the school committee of the town of Union, Me., where he was to keep his first school.

He succeeded well in teaching, and, in 1843, went to Massachusetts as a teacher; also studying at academies in that State and New Hampshire.

Some of the papers of his grandfather Dudley, upon the genealogy of the family, coming into his possession, he became interested in the subject and undertook to prepare a biographical account of the family. As an introduction to this, he published, in 1848, an outline sketch, under the title of The Dudley Genealogies, an 8vo of 144 pages. In 1849 he visited England, for the purpose of making antiquarian and genealogical researches, and spent a year there, travelling from town to town, examining old records and monuments, and consulting rare printed works in the libraries at London and elsewhere. While he was absent he was a correspondent for some of the Boston newspapers; and selections from his letters have been published in two different volumes, one in 1851, and the other in 1862. In 1860, he published a History of the First Council of Nice, an octavo of 86 pages. His next work, entitled Officers of our Union Army and Navy, containing brief biographical sketches, with portraits, was published in 1862. One volume only was published, in a moderate sized 32mo. It was followed by Social and Political Aspects of England and the Continent.

He was admitted to the Suffolk bar in 1854, and for five or six years practised his profession in Boston. His health not being sufficiently robust for close application to the law, he quitted it, and is now engaged in publishing directories, and similar works.

ALONZO HALL QUINT.

The Rev. Alonzo Hall Quint was born at Barnstead, N. H., March 22, 1828. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1846, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1852. He was ordained at Jamaica Plain village, in the town of West Roxbury, Dec. 27, 1853, and was settled as pastor of the Mather Church, a newly formed church at that place, the same date. He received the degree of D.D. from Andover in 1866.

He was chosen chaplain of the 2d regiment of Massachusetts infantry, and entered on its duties, June 1, 1861; and after several weeks service was commissioned, June 20. After serving three years, he was, at his desire, mustered out of service, June 1, 1864 (his health being impaired), though the regiment had re-enlisted and continued to serve during the war. He had leave of absence for two years from the Mather Church; and though he sent in his resignation some time before the expiration of that term, it was not accepted till near its close, May, 1863. After he left the army he was settled over the North Congregational Church, New Bedford, Mass., where he was installed, July 21, 1864, and remains pastor.

While at Andover Seminary he commenced his contributions to the New England Historical and Genealogical Register, and in 1850 was admitted a member of the Historic-Genealogical Society. From 1855 to 1856 he was a member of the publishing committee of that society. In 1850 he commenced, in the Dover (N. H.) Enquirer, the publication of a series of historical and genealogical articles, relative to that town and its settlers. These articles are still continued. In January of 1859, he commenced, in conjunction with Rev. Henry M. Dexter, D.D., and the late Rev. Joseph S. Clark, D.D., the Congregational Quarterly, of which he is still one of the editors.

Besides the New England Historical and Genealogical Society, he is a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and has been on the publishing committee. He is also a corresponding member of the New Hampshire and New York Historical Societies. From 1855 to 1861 he was a member of the Massachusetts State Board of Education. Since 1871, he has been the Secretary of the National Council of the Congregational Churches in the United States.

In September, 1861, he commenced writing for the New England Congregationalist (newspaper), Boston, as an army correspondent, and ended his letters from the army when he left service. He still contributes to the paper. A selection from this correspondence was published in 1864, by Crosby & Nichols, under the title of The Potomac and the Rapidan, in a duodecimo of about 400 pages. He published in 1867, The Record of the Second Massachusetts Infantry, 1861-65, 12mo, 534 pp.

GEORGE HUGHES HEPWORTH.

The Rev. George Hughes Hepworth was born at Boston, Mass., February 4, 1833. He entered the Cambridge Theological or Divinity School when he was eighteen years old, and graduated in 1855. In September of that year, he was settled as pastor of a church in Nantucket, Mass., where he continued two years, and then resigned. He then spent one year at Cambridge as a resident graduate. In the summer of 1858, he became the pastor of a new Unitarian church, formed at the south end of Boston, under the name of the Church of the Unity. In December, 1862, he was appointed chaplain of the 47th regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, and accompanied that regiment to Louisiana. In January, 1863, he was transferred to the staff of Major-General Banks, and went through the campaign of the Têche, and was present at the siege of Port Hudson. He returned to his parish duties at the Church of the Unity in the autumn of 1863.

Mr. Hepworth has issued a volume, entitled the Whip, Hoe, and Sword, being a sketch of experiences in the Army of the Southwest. He has issued, from time to time, pamphlet sermons on the topics of the day, which have met with great favor from the public. He was one of the most prominent and eloquent preachers in Boston, and drew very large audiences whenever he spoke.

 In 1870 he became pastor of the Church of the Messiah, in New York city, and two years later entered the ministry of the Congregational Church. He has written: Little Gentleman in Green: a Fairy Tale by Una Savin, 1865; and Rocks and Shoals: Lectures to Young Men, 1870.

HORATIO ALGER, JR.

The Rev. Horatio Alger, Jr., was born in that part of Chelsea, Mass., since incorporated as the town of North Chelsea, January 13, 1834, and graduated at Harvard College in 1852. From 1852 to 1857 he was occupied in teaching, or in writing for the Boston and New York press. In 1860, he completed a three years course at the Cambridge Theological School, defraying his expenses in the mean time by contributions to a variety of periodicals. He spent the greater part of the year succeeding his graduation at the Theological School, in a European tour. From 1861 to 1864, he was established at Cambridge as a private instructor. On the 8th of December, 1864, he was ordained over the Unitarian Church at Brewster, Mass.

His publications in book form are: Bertha's Christmas Vision, an Autumn Sheaf, 1855; Nothing to Do, a Tilt at our Best Society, a Poem, 1857; Frank's Campaign; or, What Boys can Do, 1864; Paul Preston's Charge, 1865.

He wrote verses before he entered college, was appointed to deliver one or two anniversary poems at college, and has since published a considerable number of his poems, which have appeared in Harper's Weekly, and other periodicals.

 In 1866, Mr. Alger removed to New York city, and devoted himself exclusively to the profession of literature. His later writings (1866-1873), include The Ragged Dick Series, and other story-books for children, some sixteen in number. A collection of his poems are in preparation. He has contracted to contribute exclusively to the New York Weekly for a term of years.

ROBERT SHELTON MACKENZIE.

Dr. Mackenzie was born in Drew's Court, Limerick County, Ireland, June 22, 1809. His father was at the time an officer in the British army. Young Mackenzie was educated at a school in Fermoy, and at the age of thirteen was apprenticed to a surgeon apothecary in Cork, with whom he remained three years. After passing his medical examination, he opened a school in Fermoy; and in 1829, having been a newspaper reporter, became editor of a county journal in Staffordshire, England. In 1830-'31, he was engaged in London in writing biographies for the Georgian Era (4 vols., 8vo), and subsequently as leading editor of the Liverpool Journal and other papers; while he was a diligent correspondent on political, literary, and social topics of the Evening Star, a daily paper in New York, published by the late M. M. Noah. In 1845, he was editor and part proprietor of a railway journal in London, and in 1847 was an active member of Lord Brougham's Law Amendment Society. He published in England, Lays of Palestine (1829); Titian, an art novel (3 vols., 8vo, 1843); Partnership en Commandite, a legal treatise (8vo, 1847); Mornings at Matlock, a collection of fugitive pieces (3 vols., 8vo, 1850).

In 1852 Dr. Mackenzie came to America, and made his residence in New York, where he became literary editor of the New York Times, and engaged in various literary undertakings. He edited, with an introduction and notes, Shell's Sketches of the Irish Bar (New York, Redfield, 1854); The Noctes Ambrosiane, a very complete edition, with numerous notes, and biographies of Professor Wilson and other writers; containing a great deal of new matter (1854, 5 vols.); an edition of Curran's Life, by his son, and an original collection, with notes and prefaces, of the writings of Dr. Maginn (5 vols., 12mo).

In 1857, Dr. Mackenzie became literary and foreign editor of the Philadelphia Press, having taken up his residence in that city, where he has continued to reside. In addition to the books whose titles we have given, the record of a life devoted to literature, and the genial furtherance of the literary labors of others, Dr. Mackenzie is the author of Bits of Blarney (1855), consisting of Irish biographies, tales, sketches, and poetry, and of Tressilian and his Friends (12mo, 1859). He also edited Memoirs of Robert Hoodin (1859).*

Dr. Mackenzie has recently written two works of literary biography which are models in their way, having a grasp of illustrative detail that sums up the research of years within a duodecimo, to the exhaustion of the subject, and an easy charm of style that holds the reader's attention to the close. These are: The Life of Charles Dickens: Personal Recollections and Anecdotes—Letters by Bos never before published, and Uncollected Papers in Prose and Verse, 1870; and Sir Walter Scott: the Story of His Life, 1871, inscribed to the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table." Few of the literati of America could have made as copious a collection of incidents and anecdotes worthy of preservation, from written and unwritten sources, to exhibit faithfully the character and writings of these chief novelists of modern times.

Dr. Mackenzie is an industrious and rapid writer, having a thorough mastery of literary incident, anecdote, and gossip. He began to prepare his edition of the Noctes Ambrosianæ in the last week of April, 1854, on receipt of the news, by steamer, of Professor Wilson's death on April 3, and the work was published August 15. In the interim, he had to feed the press at five different printers, besides doing his full quota of newspaper work. The Life of Dickens, begun June 15 and published August 3, was written in five weeks; and the biography of Scott between the last week of March and the publication day on the Scott centenary—August 15.

He received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from the University of Glasgow at the age of twenty-five, and was subsequently admitted Doctor of Civil Law at Oxford.

MRS. ADELHEID SHELTON MACKENZIE, the wife of Dr. Mackenzie, has written several attractive romances: Married Against Reason, 1869; and Aureola; or, The Black Sheep, 1871, a story of social life in Germany, narrating the trials of a young lady dauntless enough to set at defiance the over-rigorous social etiquette of her country.

NOVEL-WRITING BEFORE WAVERLEY—FROM SIR WALTER SCOTT: HIS LIFE.

Before Scott had given over writing long poems, he diverged into another branch of literature, in which he obtained higher and more permanent fame than that which he had won as a minstrel. Many persons have scarcely read his poetical romances; but who is not familiar with the Waverley novels?

As great a novel-reader as Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, and Daniel O'Connell (the last of whom once declared to me that the advantages of steam, as applied to travelling on sea and land, were counterbalanced by the abridgment of the time he used to devote to the perusal of works of fiction), Walter Scott saw, before he began to write, that the novels and romances of the present century, and particularly at its commencement, were unsuited to the changed condition of society in his own time. The dramatists of the Elizabethan age produced stories, historical or comic, which, two centuries later, would probably have appeared in prose as historical romances, or novels of society. In an age when readers were few, the tales acted on the stage were the principal popular sources of intellectual enjoyment. For a long time after the death of Shakspeare, the drama may be said to have fallen into abeyance. Thirty or forty years of civil strife, during which imaginative literature was at a discount, followed the death of Shakspeare; and, though there was a revival of the drama between the Restoration in 1660 and the Revolution in 1688, little effective in that line was presented until Dryden bade the dry bones live. Bunyan's immortal "Pilgrim's Progress," in this time, was the favorite reading of the people; and the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, Rabelais' comic and satiric adventures of "Gargantua and Pantagruel," and Cervantes' wonderful "Don Quixote," became well known in England through translations. So, at a later period, were the Abbé Prévost's "Mannon l'Escout" (like the younger Dumas' "La Dame aux Camélias," the apotheosis of a professional impure), Rousseau's "Nouvelle Héloïse," Le Sage's "Gil Blas" and "Le Diable Boiteux," Voltaire's "Candide and Zadig," St. Pierre's "Paul and Virginia," Goethe's "Sorrows of Werther," and a few other foreign works.

When the seventeenth century opened, the gross novels of Mrs. Aphra Behn, which had delighted the gay and careless courtiers of the closing years of the Stuart dynasty, fell into disrepute. The age of Queen Anne, which has been entitled the Augustan, exhibited comparative decency, at least in its prose fiction; and under the new dynasty, though not quite so scrupulous (for the first two Guelphic sovereigns were themselves unmistakably immoral in their domestic and social relations), public taste became improved. De Foe's "Robinson Crusoe," which does not contain a single impure incident or expression, speedily obtained a popularity which it still enjoys. Swift's "Gulliver," a political fiction, which is a satire on human nature also had (and has) a multitude of readers, who, opening it merely to be entertained by the wonderful adventures it contains, narrated with a most artistic vraisemblance, scarcely notice its too prevailing coarseness. Richardson and Fielding, however, may rank as the inventors of the English novel, though not of its higher class,—the historical. There runs an under-current of indelicacy, not very decided, but adapted to the sensuous taste of the time, through Richardson's sentimentality; and yet the author of "Pamela" and "Clarissa Harlowe" affected to be a purist in morals. Next to him is Fielding,—who had begun as a satirical parodist, and ended by establishing a new school of story-tellers,—who rejoiced in what Scott has called "warmth of description." Fielding, with all his faults, possessed genius, and was followed by Smollett, who photographed the manners and exhibited the vices of many grades of society. Sterne, decidedly a man of genius, was not restrained from gross indelicacy by a sense of what was due to his office as a clergyman. Oliver Goldsmith, whose "Vicar of Wakefield," much as all readers admire it, has serious defects in construction and sentiment, might have produced a real novel of English society, but "died too soon," when Scott was only three years old. Horace Walpole's "Castle of Otranto," written in 1763, was its author's solitary work of fiction, and owed as much at least to his rank as to novelty of design or execution. Clara Reeve's Gothic romance, "The old English Baron," alone remembered out of her many works, was an almost avowed imitation of Walpole's romantic story, and a decided improvement upon it.

When Scott wrote the first chapters of "Waverley," in 1805, the principal living novelist was Mrs. Radcliffe, whose very sensational romances outdid all contemporary productions. With her began high payments for such works. She received five hundred pounds for "The Mysteries of Udolpho;" and eight hundred pounds for "The Italians," its successor. To-day, these stories, crowded with crime and with apparently supernatural effects (all of which are elaborately explained away at the close), would scarcely engage the attention of a novel-reader for half an hour. Henry Mackenzie's stories, popular in their day, were didactic and sentimental, and had got out of fashion. Cumberland the dramatist, preserved in "the crystal amberization" of Sheridan's "Critic" as Sir Fretful Plagiary, had finally lapsed into writing novels which possessed the coarseness of Fielding, without his wit; yet his play, "The West-Indian," which presents the truest character of an Irish gentleman ever put upon the stage, was surpassed in its day only by Sheridan's "School for Scandal," in which even the livery servants and soubrettes converse in epigram. Madame D'Arblay, whose novel of "Evelina" had created a greater sensation among the literati of her time than probably had ever before been caused by any similar production, was reposing on her laurels, but failed to please a later generation of readers. For the copyright of "Evelina" she received twenty pounds in 1778, while for "Camilla" she was paid three thousand guineas in 1796; making fame by the first, and losing it by the latter work. Mrs. Charlotte Smith succeeded, commencing with a translation of "Manon L'Escaut," the heroine of which is a beautiful wanton, and settling down into prose fictions, occasionally indecorous, and usually dull.

Perhaps, strictly speaking, Miss Sophia Lee should be credited with the authorship of the first English historical novel. In 1783-86 appeared "The Recess," in six volumes. Mary, Queen of Scots, is its heroine; but unlike Scott, who carefully adhered to facts when he introduced historical characters, Miss Lee boldly married Mary Stuart to the Earl of Leicester, and introduced two daughters as the fruit of this union!

Mrs. Inchbald, whose "Simple Story" won the sympathies of a large circle of readers; Regina Maria Roche, whose "Children of the Abbey" still finds a considerable sale in this country, though it is almost wholly forgotten in England; Mrs. Opie, whose "Father and Daughter" had the tears of the public in their day, and was successful when adopted for the stage; William Godwin, with his realistic "Caleb Williams" and his romantic "St. Leon;" Dr. Moore, whose "Zeluco" suggested to Byron the character of "Childe Harold;" Sidney Owenson (afterwards Lady Morgan), whose "Wild Irish Girl" and "Ida of Athens" scarcely indicated the promise which subsequently was realized in "O'Donnell" and "Florence Macarthy;" and above all, rational, truthful, and vigorous Maria Edgeworth, — these belonged to Scott's own time, and their works might be safely read with pleasure and advantage. This is not a long catalogue of novelists; but it will be observed, that even then, sixty years ago, most of the story-tellers were of the gentler sex. I have not included Jane Austen, because "Sense and Sensibility," the first of her novels, was not published until 1811, six years after "Waverley" had been planned and partly written; and have not forgotten Anna Maria Porter, who appeared in print before Sir Walter Scott, nor her sister Jane, because neither of them had any influence upon his taste. It is stated by an authority whose general correctness I have pleasure in acknowledging,* that "Sir Walter Scott admitted (conversation with George IV. in the library of Carlton Palace) that this work—Jane Porter's 'Scottish Chiefs'—suggested his Waverley novels;" but considering that "Waverley" was begun in 1805, and that "The Scottish Chiefs" first appeared in 1810, I am unable to believe that he derived any suggestion from a work then unwritten.

Also prior to the commencement of "Waverley" was the début of Charles Robert Maturin, an Irish clergyman of striking genius, with a minimum of discretion. His "Fatal Revenge, or the Family of Montario," which, with its appalling horrors, out-Radcliffed Mrs. Radcliffe, appeared in 1804. In a subsequent romance, entitled "Melmoth the Wanderer," he abated some of these horrors, seasoning them with the naked indecency of Lewis's "Monk;" and in his tragedy of "Bertram," produced at Drury Lane Theatre through Lord Byron's influence, he had originally introduced the Enemy of Man as one of the dramatis personæ!

There is another phalanx of novelists who lived, but can scarcely be said to have flourished, early in the present century. Their works, from the source of their publication in Leadenhall Street, London, were known as "Minerva-press Novels." At the head of these was "Anne of Swansea," Mrs. Hatton, sister of Mrs. Siddons and John Kemble, who dealt largely in common-place, was very deficient in constructive skill, usually extended each of her romances to four and even five novels, and was fond of resonant titles, such as "The Rock of Glotzen, or the Secret Avenger." Mr. Thomas Surr, whose "Splendid Misery," treating of fashionable life, with which he had not the slightest acquaintance, was in eager request at all the circulating libraries in town and country; and a Capt. Thomas Ashe, who carried on for some years the profitable but disreputable trade of writing novels of society upon the current scandals of the day, and never published them if he could induce the persons whom he libelled to buy his manuscript. He lived by literary black-mail. The Minerva-press novels, had as they were, had immense popularity for some years.

No wonder, then, that Walter Scott, who, having shown the world in "The Minstrelsy" and "The Lay" that he was editor and poet, and being himself a novel-reader, should be utterly dissatisfied with the quality of the existing supply. The French Revolution, distinguished by its levelling principle and action, had ended in substituting a feudal empire for an effete monarchy; and, even when Napoleon was re-dividing Europe into kingdoms and principalities for his family and his followers, there had sprung up, or rather revived, a deep devotion to the chivalry which had done so much in the past, and whose traditions had ingrafted grace into history, and breathed reality into song. To this feeling, this principle, Scott had ministered in his poems; and now, acknowledged head of the romantic school, he resolved to extend its limits beyond the ballad or the narrative poem, and use prose as the more suitable medium. He strove to delineate the past as it seemed in the eyes of men who were dubious of the present, and afraid of the future, — noble, stately, glittering, and gay, with the pulse of life ever beating to heroic measures. His view of feudalism, in "The Talisman," "Ivanhoe," and "The Fair Maid of Perth," was not the caricature a few preceding authors had drawn, but a portrait, — faithful, if idealized.

* Dr. S. Austin Allibone's Critical Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors, vol. ii. p. 1646.

"Waverley," as we have seen, had been condemned by Erskine; thrown by, mislaid, recovered, and depreciated by Ballantyne. Scott, having nearly completed his "Life and Works of Jonathan Swift" (published by Constable, in nineteen octavo volumes, on the 1st of July, 1814), — a work which really was supplementary to his history of a particular period of English literary history, — brought out his "Waverley" manuscript for the third time, carefully read it, thought something could be made of it, and permitted the announcement, in "The Scots' Magazine" of February, 1814, that "Waverley, or 'Tis Sixty Years Since," a novel, in three volumes 12mo, would be published in March." Already he had made some progress in continuing the story; for in January he had shown the greater part of the first volume to Mr. Erskine, who at once predicted that it would prove the most popular of all his friend's works. It was determined to publish it anonymously, and unusual pains were taken to prevent the discovery of the author's name. John Ballantyne copied out all the manuscript. Double proof-sheets were regularly printed off. One was forwarded to Scott; and the alterations which it received were, by Ballantyne's own hand, copied upon the other proof sheet for the use of the printers; so that even the corrected proof-sheets of the author were never seen in the printing-office. While "Waverley" was passing through the press, Mr. Erskine read some of the proof-sheets to a few friends after supper; and from the enthusiastic praise they obtained, as well as from the way in which their host spoke, the party inferred that they were listening to the first effort of some unknown but very able aspirant.

When the first volume was printed, Ballantyne placed it in the hands of Constable, who, not doubting who was the author, considered the matter, and offered seven hundred pounds for the copyright. This price was so high (Miss Edgeworth up to that time not having realized a tenth of that sum by even her most successful work), that a novice would gladly have accepted it. Scott's reply, through Ballantyne, was, that it was too much if the novel should not succeed; too little if it did. He would have taken a thousand pounds; but Constable would not offer so much, and published the work on the terms of equal division of profits between himself and the author.

The first volume was printed before the second was begun. Constable, who had become proprietor of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," was bringing out a supplement to that extensive work.

At his request, Scott agreed to write three essays for it, — on Chivalry, the Drama, and Romance, — and completed two in April and May, writing that on Romance some time later. Constable, a liberal man, paid a hundred pounds for each. This episode ended, Scott set seriously to work on "Waverley," and informed his friend Morritt that "the last two volumes were written in three weeks." In corroboration of this, Lockhart has related a personal anecdote, — how, happening to pass through Edinburgh in June, 1814, he dined with Mr. William Menzies (afterwards a judge at the Cape of Good Hope), whose residence was then in George Street, situated very near to, and at right angles with, North Castle Street. "There was," he says, "a party of very young persons, most of them, like Menzies and myself, destined for the bar of Scotland, all gay and thoughtless, enjoying the first flush of manhood, with little remembrance of the yesterday, or care of the morrow. When my companion's worthy father and uncle, after seeing two or three bottles go round, left the juveniles to themselves, the weather being hot, we adjourned to a library, which had one large window looking northwards. After carousing here for an hour or more, I observed that a shade had come over the aspect of my friend, who happened to be placed immediately opposite to myself, and said something that intimated a fear of his being unwell. 'No,' said he, 'I shall be well enough presently, if you will only let me sit where you are, and take my chair; for there is a confounded hand in sight of me here, which has often bothered me before, and now it won't let me fill my glass with a good will.' I rose to change places with him accordingly; and he pointed out to me this hand, which, like the writing on Belshazzar's wall, disturbed his hour of hilarity. 'Since we sat down,' he said, 'I have been watching it: it fascinates my eye; and never stops. Page after page is finished, and thrown on that heap of manuscript: and still it goes on unwearied; and so it will be till candles are brought in, and God knows how long after that. It is the same every night. I can't stand the sight of it when I am not at my books.' — 'Some stupid, dogged engrossing clerk, probably!' exclaimed myself or some other giddy youth in our society. 'No, boys,' said our host. 'I well know what hand it is: 'tis Walter Scott's.' This was the hand, that, in the evenings of three summer weeks, wrote the last two volumes of 'Waverley.'"

 DICKENS AND THACKERAY — FROM LIFE OF CHARLES DICKENS.

Believing that the world has been made brighter and better by the writings and life of Charles Dickens, I can have no hesitation in briefly delineating his character, as Author and as Man. In the whole range, vast as it is, which constitutes the common literature, the rich treasury, of America and England, not to speak of the numerous languages into which they have been translated, there are no purer books than those written by Charles Dickens. There is no line in them which the most scrupulous parent, the most tender husband, the most sensitive-lover, the most fastidious guardian could desire to keep back from the eye of Maidenhood or Womanhood. There are no other works, in the language, so well adapted for all classes and all ages. They may be taken up, at any place or time, and the reader will be gratified by the entertainment they supply, the moral lesson which they teach ;

Age cannot wither them, nor custom stale
Their infinite variety.

No writer has more completely, or more successfully, appealed to the emotional and sympathetic part of human nature. It is doubtful, as he glanced from gay to grave, whether his lively humor or his tender pathos was most to be admired. Whatever vein he indulged in, for the time, he avoided cynicism. Hence, we laugh with, instead of at, his comic characters, taking Pickwick, and Sam Weller, and Wilkins Micawber, and Mr. Toots, and Dick Swiveller, and Captain Cuttle, (that truest of all rough gentlemen,) to our heart, and feeling all the better for having met, and known, and loved them. I do not intend to place Dickens by the side of Thackeray, because it is wearying work to try and discover unlike likenesses which do not exist, but would ask the reader to remember how differently he was impressed by the first works of both. Vanity Fair is a great work, which no man could have written, so severe is even its hilarity, unless he had been world-weary and blasé. The Pickwick Papers are the evident production of a very young man, who, up to that time, had rather glanced at the world than moved in it. Vanity Fair was as palpably written by a person who had circulated freely through society, in various countries ; who had been scathed in the passage ; and who poured out upon paper,

The stinging of a heart the world had stung.

Dickens was entering life, at the age of twenty-three, as he has told us, when he began to write Pickwick, and after the publication of a few sketches, had to draw mainly upon his imagination for the characters and the action of his story. Before he had gone half way through it, a purpose filled his mind, and, what was begun as a burlesque upon Cockney sportsmen, struck a heavy blow at the then unbridled license of advocates in English Courts of law, and so thoroughly besieged that great citadel of Wrong and Oppression, the Fleet Prison, that, in a few years, it was "put down" (as Alderman Cute would have said) by public opinion, embodied in an Act of Parliament. Dickens lived to see imprisonment for debt abolished in England, and to hear all men say, "You have done this."

Thackeray, not much older than Dickens, had been a magazine-writer, a man of all work, for at least sixteen years before the appearance of Vanity Fair. He had begun life as a gay "young man upon town," by burning the candle at both ends, at home and abroad, until his twenty thousand pounds was gone. Then he set to work, and, being highly educated and very talented, obtained a living and made reputation. Vanity Fair, which he produced at an age when Dickens had written his best things — or most of them — was very successful, as it deserved to be. Only a man of genius could have invented and sustained Beckey Sharpe. Had he written only that one story, Thackeray would have ranked as successor to the author of Tom Jones. Yet, admiring Vanity Fair as I do, and reading it enjoyably through, at least once a year, (paying the same compliment to Robinson Crusoe, Gil Blas, the Vicar of Wakefield, Ivanhoe, and the Caxton novels.) I close it with a lowered opinion of human nature. I also read Pickwick, every now and then, and though I do not find in it that thorough knowledge of "life" possessed by Thackeray, (its purchase-money being his glorious youth and the twenty thousand pounds, already named as his inheritance.) I find myself in good humor with "all the world and the rest of mankind." You read Dickens without, so to say, finding a bitter taste on the mind, after it. The flavor of the fusil oil is very strong on the mind, after reading Thackeray. Both writers, let me add, were genial, honorable, benevolent men, and warmly attached to each other.

It is to be especially noted, as showing the idiosyncrasy of each author, that, whereas Mr. Thackeray was perpetually bringing himself, in his books, before the reader, Mr. Dickens rarely alluded to himself, his experiences or opinions, in any of his numerous works of fiction.

Besides remarkable power and wonderful fertility of invention, Charles Dickens had a joyous temperament grafted upon a generous mind. When he wrote of the household virtues, of toleration, of practical charity, of fair humanity, his words had effect, for there was no "sham" in them. His kindness of heart was almost as great as his genius. How remarkable and original that was, I need not point out. But genius without ballast has often been wrecked. In him, it was accompanied by skill, good sense, a well-balanced mind, and a strong purpose of doing good. His infinite variety equalled that of Shakespeare, and it is very possible that the readers of another century, now only thirty years distant, may give Mr. Dickens a place even above that occupied by the Swan of Avon. The world is steadily becoming realistic, methinks, and bids fair to prefer the tales of Dickens to the plays of Shakespeare.

It is universally known that his political opinions were strongly liberal. He was no mere partisan, however. At any time he pleased, during the last twenty-five years, Charles Dickens might have had a seat in the House of Commons. Any of the London boroughs would have been proud and glad if he had consented to be its representative. At least twenty other constituencies, throughout the British Islands, would have voted him their member by acclamation. Numerous offers to this effect were made to him, and declined. He had resolved, at the beginning of his career, to devote himself to literature, wholly and solely, and, as the years rolled on, bringing him increase of power and influence upon the public mind, he believed, more than ever, that abuses were to be laid bare, wrongs righted, and reforms effected, rather by his written than his spoken words. In the House of Commons, with all his earnestness and eloquence, he would have been only one in a crowd — though most probably a distinguished one. From first to last, he relied on the Press, to work out all his public purposes, and was right in doing so. Besides, had he become a Member of Parliament, we should have had comparatively little from his pen.

This brings me to the last point which I design to notice: Will Dickens live? I would answer in the affirmative. Future ages will regard his writings as photographs of middle and lower class life in England during the Victorian era, which had extended to thirty-four years when he died. In other novels of that period, aristocratic society is sketched, rather wearily; but it may be safely assumed that after all, only a few, by Bulwer and Thackeray, will be read in the twentieth century, and these as rarely as the prose fictions of Fielding, Smollett, Richardson, and Goldsmith — the very writers who led Dickens, when a child, into the fair realm of romance — are read now. Dickens is so fresh, so kindly, so picturesque, so true, that his works must live, as Hogarth's do, pictures of the era which produced him.

Dramatist, actor, orator, and thorough man of the world as he was, he realizes the idea of an universal genius more than any other writer who ever lived. In whatever profession it might have pleased him to cast himself, he must have succeeded. Eminently social and domestic, he exercised a liberal hospitality, and though he lived well, as his means allowed, avoided excesses:—with a constant burthen of work upon his mind for five-and-thirty years, to say nothing of other occupations, it was impossible that he could have been what is called a free liver. It is said that he never lost a friend, that he never made an enemy. Of him it might be truly said

He kept
The whiteness of his soul, and so men o'er him wept.

WILLIAM HENRY WHITMORE.

Mr. Whitmore, the son of a merchant of Boston, was born at Dorchester, Mass., September 6, 1836. He studied at the English High and Latin Schools, Boston, having previously, in 1847, received a Franklin medal at one of the grammar schools of that city.

He is the author of various works relating to American genealogy. He has published, Register of Families settled at the Town of Medford, Mass., originally contributed to the History of Medford, by the Rev. Charles Brooks, with portrait and other illustrations (Boston, 1855); A Record of the Descendants of Francis Whitmore, of Cambridge, the same year; An Account of the Temple Family, with Notes and Pedigree of the Family of Bowdoin (1856); Memoranda relating to the Lane, Keyner, and Whipple Families, Yorkshire and Massachusetts (1857); A Genealogy of the Norton Family, with Miscellaneous Notes (1859); A Handbook of American Genealogy, completed on a voyage to Mauritius, and published, during the author's absence abroad, by Munsell, of Albany, in 1862; Notes on the Winthrop Family and its English Connections before its emigration to New England, (1864); The Cavalier Dismounted (1864). The Heraldic Journal; recording the Armorial Bearings and Genealogies of American Families, was edited and mainly written by him from 1865 to 1868. His later works comprise The Hutchinson Papers, 1865; Elements of Heraldry, 1866; The American Genealogist, 1868; The Massachusetts Civic List, 1871, a list of its civil officers from 1622-1714; The Ayres Genealogy, 1870; Usher Genealogy, 1869; Elliot Genealogy, 1869; Hutchinson and Oliver Families, 1865; Belcher Family, 1873; Notes on Peter Pelham and Other Early American Engravers, 1867; and Notes on the Origin of Town-names in Massachusetts, 1873.

On the organization of the Prince Society for Mutual Publication, in 1858, Mr. Whitmore was chosen one of its officers, and in October of that year delivered an oration before the society on the Centennial Anniversary of the death of Thomas Prince, the antiquary, after whom the society was named. He has also edited for it John Dunton's Letters, 2 vols.; The Andros Tracts, 2 vols.; and, with Mr. W. S. Appleton, The Hutchinson Papers, 2 vols. Mr. Whitmore is an active member of the New England Historic-Generalogical Society, in whose periodical Register many of his genealogical publications first appeared. When the Historical Magazine was projected in 1856, he was engaged as the editor, and wrote the prospectus for that work; but business engagements obliged him to relinquish the editorship. In 1860, he edited the fourth American edition of The Poetical Works of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, and contributed a biographical introduction. He has also contributed to the North American Review.

SAMUEL W. FRANCIS,

Son of the late Dr. John W. Francis, was born in New York, in 1835, graduated at Columbia College in 1860, studied medicine, and received the degree of M. D. from the University Medical College, in 1857. He has published several works, including Autobiography of a Latin Reader (1859); Report of Professor Valentine Mott's Surgical Clinics in the University of New York, Session 1859-'60 (1860); Water: its History, Characteristics, Hygienic, and Therapeutic Uses.—a philosophic essay, illustrated by much ancient and modern reading, and a variety of anecdote (1861); Inside Out—a curious Book, a novel described by a journalist of the day as "Carlyle made into a syllabub" (1862); a series of Biographical Sketches of Living New York Surgeons; and A Memoir of the Life and Character of Prof. Valentine Mott (1865). The last is mainly a series of personal reminiscences, an affectionate tribute of a friend and pupil to the memory of the late eminent surgeon. It contains a variety of anecdote, and is enriched by an original memorandum, given by Dr. Mott to the author, of his most important surgical operations and contributions to the literature of his profession. It was followed by Biographical Sketches of Distinguished Living New York Physicians, 1867; and a racy novel of American society, Life and Death, 1871. Dr. Francis has also patented ten useful inventions.

EDWARD SPRAGUE RAND, JR.

Edward Sprague Rand, Jr., was born in Boston, October 20, 1836. He is the son of Edward Sprague Rand, a distinguished lawyer, of Boston, and the grandson of the Hon. Edward S. Rand, of Newburyport. Mr. Rand graduated at Harvard in 1855, and from Cambridge Law School in 1857. He then passed examination for admission to the bar of Suffolk County, and continued study and began practice in the office of the Hon. Richard H. Dana, Jr., and Francis E. Parker. Remaining with Mr. Dana for eighteen months, he then went into partnership with his father, with whom he still continues practice.

Mr. Rand's first published work was a collection of poems (Boston, 1859), which had previously appeared in the magazines and newspapers of the day. It was a small volume, of about two hundred pages, entitled Life Memories. The book was very favorably received and noticed, the edition was speedily exhausted, and the volume has never been reprinted. Mr. Rand has been a frequent poetical contributor to the periodical literature of the day, and has also written extensively on horticultural subjects. In 1863, he published an elegantly illustrated volume on floriculture, called, Flowers for the Parlor and Garden, which has had a large circulation. He has since published a Botany of the New England States—an elaborate treatise on the Culture of Orchidaceous Plants, illustrated with colored plates; Bulbs; Garden Flowers, How to Cultivate Them; The Rhododendron and "American Plants;" and Seventy-five Popular Flowers, and How to Cultivate Them, 1870. Mr. Rand resides upon his farm of "Glen Ridge," on the banks of Charles River, in the town of Dedham, about nine miles from Boston, where he devotes the hours not occupied by the practice of his profession to floriculture and literature.

LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

The maiden name of this popular writer was Chandler. She was born in the year 1835, in the town of Pomfret, in the eastern part of Connecticut, a lilly and romantic region, the natural influences of which, in the cultivation of a poetic sensibility, were impressed upon her childhood. Fond of books in her youth, she early displayed a talent for composition, writing for publication, over the signature of "Ellen Louise," at the age of fifteen. Her first book, a collection of miscellanies—stories, essays, reveries, and poems—entitled, This, That, and the Other, was published by Messrs. Phillips, Sampson & Co., in Boston, in 1854, when the author was nineteen. It was well received by the public, reaching a sale of from thirteen to fourteen thousand. In 1855, Miss Chandler was married to Mr. Moulton, a Boston publisher. Her second book, a novel, Juno Clifford, was issued anonymously, at the close of that year, by Messrs. Appleton & Co., of New York, and, like its predecessor, met with a favorable reception. In 1856, Mrs. Moulton commenced writing for Harper's Magazine, to which, and to Harper's Weekly, she has since been a frequent contributor of tales, poems, and sketches. A new collection of tales from her pen was published by Messrs. Harper, in 1859, entitled My Third Book, containing "The Pride of Moses Grant," "No. 101," "My Inheritance," "The Tenant of the Old Brown House," and other stories of well-deserved popularity. The subsequent magazine stories of this author, published by the Harpers, would fill several volumes; among others, we may mention "Twelve Years of My Life," "A Wife's Story," "Out of Nazareth," and "Three Lives" (Harper's Magazine, 1860-'64). No collection has yet been made of Mrs. Moulton's poems, which, like her prose sketches, are of a refined, sentimental, imaginative character. One of them, "The House in the Meadow," was published, with illustrations, in the London Art Journal.

Mrs. Moulton in late years has been the accomplished contributor of literary notes from Boston to the New York Tribune. She prepared an attractive book for the children in 1873, entitled, Bed-time Stories.

MARY L. BOOTH,

An accomplished author, and translator of numerous valuable works from the French, was born April 19, 1831, at Milville, now Yaphank, a village of Suffolk County, L. I., in the State of New York. She received her early education at home, and attended the district school. From this she passed to several academies and seminaries on Long Island, where she acquired the elements of a liberal education in the classics and mathematics, and an acquaintance with the French language, which she afterwards perfected, under competent instruction, at Williamsburg, L. I., to which place her father removed in 1844, to take charge, as principal, of one of the public schools. Her literary tastes subsequently led her to become a contributor of tales and sketches to various journals and magazines. In 1856, she translated, from the French, The Marble-Worker's Manual (Sheldon & Blakeman, N. Y.), which was followed by translations from the French of Méry's Andre Chenier, and About's King of the Mountains, for Emerson's Magazine, to which she also contributed original articles. In 1859, her translation of the Secret History of the French Court, or Life and Times of Madame de Chevreuse, from the French of Victor Cousin, was published by Delisser & Procter, New York. Miss Booth had been, meanwhile, engaged in the preparation of an original work of much labor and reading, a History of the City of New York, which was issued in 1859, in New York, in an octavo volume, with numerous engravings. After the publication of this work, Miss Booth assisted Mr. O. W. Wight in his series of translations of the French classics, and also translated Germaine, from the French of About, for a Boston publisher.

The breaking out of the Southern Rebellion, in 1861, supplied Miss Booth with new material for translation in several important works by French authors of distinction, who employed their pens in influencing public opinion in Europe in behalf of the Government of the United States. She translated in rapid succession, Count de Gasparin's Uprising of a Great People, and America Before Europe (New York, 1861); Paris in America, by M. Laboulaye (New York, 1863); The Results of Emancipation and the Results of Slavery, by Augustin Cochin (Boston, 1862). She also translated, Human Sorrows, Camille, and Vesper, by the Countess, and Happiness, by the Count de Gasparin. While these works were in progress, Miss Booth maintained a constant correspondence with the Count de Gasparin, Messrs. Laboulaye, Cochin, Martin, and other friends of America in France, and translated many of their articles and papers for the journals and reviews.

Miss Booth has been engaged for years upon a translation of Henri Martin's History of France, of which she published two volumes, embracing the Age of Louis XIV., in 1864. These were followed in 1866 by two others, the last of the original, under the title, The Decline of the French Monarchy, to which will succeed the previous volumes of the work from the beginning; this mode of division and publication having been sanctioned as the most practicable by the author, who has highly complimented the translator, in a letter which has been published, on the fidelity and spirit of her work.

 Since 1867, Miss Booth has been connected with the editorship of Harper's Bazaar. Her History of the City of New York was enlarged to two volumes in 1867. She has translated Laboulaye's Fairy Book, and Mace's Fairy Tales, and has in preparation the translation of an abridgment of Martin's History of France, made by its author.

GEORGE E. BAKER

Was born in Dedham, Mass., 1816. He has passed much of his time in public life. In 1853, he edited, with an ample introductory Memoir, an edition, in three volumes, octavo, of the Works of Wm. H. Seward, to which a fourth has been added, and a fifth, including portions of Mr. Seward's diplomatic correspondence, has been prepared for publication. In 1854 Mr. Baker prepared and published an elaborate pamphlet on The Nebraska Question. While a member of the New York legislature, in 1851, he made an extended Report on the State Prisons, their theory, management, discipline, &c. He also made an argumentative Report on Capital Punishment. Both of these documents were published in extra numbers by the friends of the principles advocated. Mr. Baker has edited several periodicals, and has been a frequent contributor to magazines and newspapers. From 1861 to 1871 he was engaged at Washington, D. C., as the financial agent of the Department of State. On the formation of the new government of the District of Columbia, he was appointed Comptroller of the District, which office he now holds (1873).

CHARLES LORING BRACE

Was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, in 1816. He graduated at Yale College in 1846, studied theology at Yale and the Union Theological Seminaries. After his ordination, he made a pedestrian tour, in 1850, through England and Scotland and portions of the Continent, in company with Mr. F. L. Olmsted, who has given the results of the journey in his work entitled, Walks and Talks of an American Farmer in England. In the following year, Mr. Brace travelled in Germany, Hungary, and Italy, paying particular attention to the condition of the laboring classes, and to the institutions of charity and penal reform. During his journey in Hungary he was arrested as a revolutionary agent by the Austrian Government, and imprisoned in the fortress of Groswarden, until, after some weeks' incarceration, he was liberated at the demand of the Hon. C. J. McCurdy, the American Chargé d'Affaires at Vienna. The observations made in these journeys were embodied in two different works, published by Mr. Brace in 1851 and 1853, entitled, Hungary in 1851, and Home Life in Germany.

Mr. Brace now devoted his time and labors to philanthropic efforts among the street children of New York, and, with others, inaugurated the Children's Aid Society, News-Boys' Lodging Houses, Boys' Meetings, Industrial Schools, and other charitable agencies of a similar nature, the results of which have been to reform or place in good circumstances large numbers of destitute and abandoned children.

In 1854 Mr. Brace visited Great Britain, for the purpose of studying its ragged schools and institutions of juvenile reform. In 1856, he spent a few months in travelling over Sweden and Norway; and the following year, published The Norse Folk, being a narrative of his observations upon that journey, and a comprehensive account of those two countries. Since that time he has been engaged in an extended organization of charitable effort among the poor children of New York. In 1863 he published a compact treatise on ethnology, based on the classifications of languages, and entitled, The Races of the Old World; or, a Manual of Ethnology.

 This work was followed by Short Sermons to Newsboys, 1866; The New West, or California in 1867-8; and The Dangerous Classes of New York, Twenty Years' Work Among Them, 1872. He paid a second visit to Hungary and Transylvania in 1872, and described those countries in the daily press.

FREDERICK LAW OLMSTED

Was born in Hartford, Connecticut, April 25, 1822. He became in early life a scientific student of agriculture, pursuing the studies of engineering and chemistry at Yale College, and subsequently, being practically engaged in farming operations in Central New York, and on Staten Island, where he carried out his plans on land of his own. In 1850, he made a pedestrian tour through Great Britain, and parts of the Continent of Europe, with a view of gaining a practical acquaintance with the modes of agriculture, laying out grounds, etc., practised in those countries. On his return to the United States, he published, in 1852, an account of a portion of this journey, in a duodecimo volume, entitled, Walks and Talks of an American Farmer in England. "I have most desired," he states in the preface, "to bring before my brother farmers, and their families, such things that I saw in England as have conveyed practical agricultural information, or useful suggestions, to myself, and such evidences of simply refined tastes, good feelings, and enlarged Christian sentiments among our English brethren, as all should enjoy to read of." The volume, written in a lively, spirited manner, displayed uncommon powers of reflection, and a rare talent at dialogue and description.

In 1853, Mr. Olmsted made a journey through the Slave States of the South, from Virginia to Louisiana, communicating incidents and observations, on his route, to the public, in a series of travelling letters, published in the New York Times. These he subsequently revised, incorporating the results of a second tour in a volume published in New York, in 1856, entitled, A Journey in the Seaboard Slave States, with Remarks on their Economy. In this work he took a dispassionate view of the system of slave-labor, exhibited its defects in an economical point of view, and its unfavorable influence in checking the growth and prosperity of the country where it prevailed. The same year, Mr. Olmsted undertook a journey on horseback through Texas, with a view of strengthening his health. He studied the country with his usual acumen and diligence; and, in 1857, published the result of his observations in a volume entitled, A Journey Through Texas; or, a Saddle-Trip on the Southwestern Frontier; with a Statistical Appendix. A third volume of this series of travels in the Slave States appeared in 1860, A Journey in the Back Country. In 1861, a résumé of the entire series was published in two volumes: The Cotton Kingdom: A Traveller's Observations on Cotton and Slavery in the American Slave States, based upon three former volumes of Journeys and Investigations, by the same Author. The rebellion originating in the South, and directly traceable to the slave power, had now given increased interest to Mr. Olmsted's studies of its character and development in these volumes, which will remain permanent landmarks of a most important and significant era in the history of the country.

In an interval between his Southern tours, Mr. Olmsted, in 1855, had made a second visit to Europe, journeying through France, Italy, and Germany, and paying particular attention to landscape gardening on his route. His acquaintance with this subject readily led to his appointment, on his return to New York, in 1857, as architect and chief engineer of the Central Park, the successful prosecution of which, with its early splendid results in utility and beauty, are largely owing to his experience, energy, and good taste.

 Mr. Olmsted, on the outbreak of the war in 1861, was appointed by the President one of the Commissioners of Inquiry and Advice in respect to the sanitary condition of the Army and Navy. He resigned his office and removed to Washington. His work there is described in Dr. Stillé's History of the Sanitary Commission (pp. 76-9). He spent the years 1864-5 on the Pacific coast. Since then he has managed park and other public improvements in New York, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Chicago, and elsewhere, and has been president of the Park Commission in New York.

CHARLES P. DALY

Was born of Irish parentage, in the city of New York, October 31, 1816. In very early life he went to sea as a common sailor, was afterwards apprenticed to a mechanical business; then studied law, and, in 1839, was admitted to the bar in New York. In 1843, he was elected a member of the Legislature for the city of New York. In 1845, he was appointed Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of the city, which position he has held for more than twenty years, having been repeatedly re-elected. In 1857, he was made First Judge, or Chief-Justice of the Court. In 1860, the degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him by Columbia College. In 1855, he published an elaborate Historical Sketch of the Judicial Tribunals of New York, from 1623 to 1846 (royal 8vo, pp. 68). This was written and first published as an introduction to the first volume of E. Delafield Smith's Reports of the New York Court of Common Pleas. Judge Daly has also delivered various lectures on legal subjects before the Law School of Columbia College. He has published, in pamphlet form, A Comparison between the Ancient Feudal and Modern Banking Sys- tems; The Past History and Present State of the Law of Naturalization in the Different Countries of the World (8vo, pp. 48, 1860); Are the Southern Privateersmen Pirates?—a letter to the Hon. Ira Harris, United States Senator (8vo, pp. 13, 1862); Origin and History of Institutions for the Promotion of the Useful Arts—a discourse delivered before the American Institute, of the City of New York, in 1863 (8vo, pp. 35); The Nature, Extent, and History of the Jurisdiction of the Surrogate's Courts of the State of New York (8vo, pp. 54, 1863); and, When was the Drama introduced in America? An Historical Inquiry anterior to Dunlap's History of the American Theatre, read before the New York Historical Society, in 1863. In addition to these publications, Judge Daly has written reviews, critical, historical, dramatic, and literary articles in Appleton's Cyclopædia, and in various periodical publications. He also delivered numerous speeches and addresses during the recent civil war; and addresses at the celebration, in the city of New York, of the centennial anniversary of the birth of Schiller; and upon laying the corner-stone, in the Central Park, of the monument to Shakspeare, at the tercentenary celebration of the poet's birth. Judge Daly is President of the American Geographical and Statistical Society, and Vice-President of the American Ethnological Society. He was subsequently engaged in the preparation of A Memoir of the late Chancellor Kent. His latest work is: Reports of Cases in the Courts of Common Pleas City and County of New York, 2 vols, 1866-9.

JOHN SAVAGE

John Savage was born December 13th, 1828, in the city of Dublin. He was educated at a leading academy, with a view of entering Trinity College, but, having displayed a taste for the fine arts, entered instead the Schools of Art of the Royal Dublin Society, with the intention of becoming an artist. He here won marked distinction, taking three prizes in 1845, for water-colors and original designs in ornamentation, and, in 1847, the silver medal for studies of animals, in oils, from nature. His grandfather having been a United Irishman in '98, it was but natural that the Irish agitations of 1843, under O'Connell and the new school of "Young Ireland" writers, should kindle his feelings. The European events of 1847, and the French Revolution of February, 1848, added to the flame, and in the latter year he made an appeal to the students, through the columns of the Nation, which was heartily responded to. The events of the year turned the Royal Society into a barrack. Mr. Savage became active in the clubs, started a couple of revolutionary journals, which the Government suppressed, and in the autumn organized with O'Mahony, and led the armed peasants in the south, at Portlaw, Rathgormuck, and other places on the Commeragh mountains. But the cause was lost, and, disguised as a sailor, Savage made his escape, and landed in New York before he had completed his twentieth year. His life now became one of arduous labor and unremitting study. His first employment was proof-reader on the Tribune, from which he retired in about a year. He followed art for some time, but his exigencies compelled him to seek the more ready resource of journalism, while his nature and feelings found expression in poetry and the critical analysis of art and literature. In 1850, Redfield published his Lays of the Fatherland, which, notwithstanding many defects incident to youth, met with a generous reception.

From 1850 to 1853, he wrote chiefly in the American Whig Review and Democratic Review. In the former, a series on "Evenings with some Female Poets," in dialogue, and a review of "Death Verses," Tennyson's In Memoriam, and the chief English monodies; and in the latter, articles on "Poe" and "Margaret Fuller" attracted attention. In 1854 he became literary editor of The Citizen, and in the fall of this year married Louise Gouverneur Reid (youngest daughter of the naval hero, Captain Samuel C. Reid), and removed to a cottage on Long Island, where, during the next few years, besides journalistic labor, he wrote '98 and '48, the Modern Revolutionary History and Literature of Ireland, which, published in New York in 1856, went to three editions in ten months; "Waiting for a Wife," a comedy, produced 1855; and "Sybil," a tragedy, produced 1858. The latter had a very remarkable success on the stage. He resided in Washington from 1857 to 1861, chiefly connected with The States, the leading organ of the views held by Stephen A. Douglas, with whom Mr. Savage was on terms of close friendship. During this period, Mr. Savage also wrote Under the Rose, a comedy, not yet produced, and Our Living Representative Men, published by G. W. Childs, Pa. On the breaking out of the rebellion, inducements were held out to Mr. Savage to take his paper South. He indignantly refused, and, moving his family to New York, volunteered into the 69th Regiment, under the late General Corcoran. At this time he wrote one of the earliest and most popular national songs, The Starry Flag, and soon after the ballad of The Muster of the North, the usefulness of which was acknowledged by a Government appointment. He took a prominent and active part in the organization of the "Irish Brigade" and "Irish Legion," and, during the first year of the war, was one of a commission of four (with Hiram Barney, Judge Daly, and R. O'Gorman), sent to Washington to urge upon President Lincoln and Cabinet the humanity of initiating an exchange of prisoners, which was successful.

About Christmas, 1863, T. B. Kirker published a collection of Mr. Savage's poems, entitled Faith and Fancy, which was very cordially received, and reached a second edition in five weeks. The principal poems, besides the patriotic effusions alluded to, are of an imaginative and contemplative character.

He paid a visit to Cuba this year (1864), and subsequently found editorial work on the New Orleans Daily Times, which has become the leading journal of the South. In 1864 he wrote a campaign life of Andrew Johnson; and, on his elevation to the Presidency, devoted the summer of '65 to an extended Life and Public Services of Andrew Johnson, in which the career of the President is thoroughly presented from authentic documents. Mr. Savage has also written a poetical romance, entitled Eva, a Goblin Romance, in Five Parts, 1865; and Fenian Heroes and Martyrs, 1868. A collective edition of his Poems appeared in 1867.

THEODORE WINTHROP.

There has been perhaps no loss to the literature of the nation from the war so severe as that of Theodore Winthrop. It is at the same time—and it is one of the remarkable occurrences which mark a period in every respect exceptional—almost certain that we owe the gift of his writings to the public to the war. The sacrifice of the soldier secured the fame of the author.

Theodore Winthrop was, on the father's side, a member of one of the most distinguished New England families, a direct descendant of the younger John Winthrop, the first Governor of Connecticut, and on the mother's of a not less memorable kinship with the descendants of Jonathan Edwards. He was born in New Haven, September 22, 1828. We are not presented with the details of his education until his admission to the Freshman class of Yale College, in his sixteenth year. He was a thorough student, carrying off at his graduation the Clark scholarship, and declared one of two equal competitors for that founded by Bishop Berkeley. The judges unable to decide between the two, the matter was decided by lot, and the lot fell to his opponent.

Winthrop left college in ill health, and wisely sought a re-establishment of strength in foreign travel. His books show that he was no indifferent loungee from place to place, but that he everywhere stored his brain with the rich treasures of art and nature. At Rome he met Mr. W. H. Aspinwall, well known as one of the founders of the Panama Railroad. He became a tutor to this gentleman's children, and, on the return of the party home, an occupant of a desk in his office. However desirable the position, it was probably too sudden a dropping down to monotony from the constant change of travel; and we are not surprised to hear of the transfer of his services to the Isthmus and the Pacific. He passed some time at Panama, and became familiar with the entire range of our western coast in the picturesque days of its early settlement. He had a hard conflict, not only with the local fevers but with the small-pox, which prostrated him at a remote settlement on the Pacific. As soon as he was able to leave his room he was in the saddle, starting on the long over-land journey home.

He returned to New York, was admitted to the bar, and opened an office; but the love of adventure carried him off again to the tropics as a member of the expedition of Lieutenant Strain. Again in New York, we find him making his home at Staten Island, a near neighbor of his friend George William Curtis.

Winthrop's first appearance in print was as the author of a description of the famous landscape, "The Heart of the Andes." An intimate friend of the artist, he had sat by the easel and seen the picture as it grew to completeness under his rapid but sure touch, and the work so warmed his brain that he sought utterance for his admiration in words as glowing as the tropic sunshine of the picture.

In the spring of 1860 he offered two at least of his novels to two publishers. Cecil Dreeme fell into the hands of an appreciative "reader," who confessed in a few days to having, for the first time in his vocation, become so interested in the MS. as to sit up nearly all night to finish it. He recommended it warmly for publication. It was accepted, but the publication deferred, in consequence of the preoccupation of the public mind, until after the election. The other novel was also laid aside for the same reason.

He next sent the sketch, Love and Skates, to the Atlantic Monthly. It met a cordial welcome, but was also laid aside until "the ball was up." It created so favorable an impression, however, on the mind of the editor, that on hearing of the author's departure for the seat of war, he at once engaged him to write a series of sketches. The March of the Seventh was, of course, too stirring a subject not to find its way at once into print, and the magazine containing it was scarcely in the hands of all its subscribers before the author's reputation was made.

Winthrop had always taken a warm interest in the welfare of his country, and in 1856 made a vigorous electioneering tour through the rural districts of Pennsylvania, in advocacy of Colonel Fremont. The state of his health prevented him from rendering like service in 1860. He was following the usual pleasant course of his life, visiting studios, taking country walks, including a spring over every five-barred gate met by the way-side, and giving further vent to his enthusiasm as a fearless rider of fiery steeds, when, after chafing over the long period of inaction, the news arrived of the fall of Sumter.

Mr. Curtis has furnished an interesting record of the way in which this news was talked over in his study. At the call of the proclamation, on the morrow, he obeyed the summons as quickly as his own Don Fulano, "to slay and to save." His subsequent career is vividly before us in his sketches, animated as the music to which he marched, and a few fragments of private letters published by Mr. Curtis. He left the Seventh at Washington to accompany General Butler to Fortress Monroe as secretary, with the rank of major. He planned with his commanding officer the attack on the Bethels, and took part in the action. At a critical time on that disastrous morning of the 10th of June, 1861, he sprang upon a log to rally his men, in full sight of the enemy. A rebel shot pierced his heart, and he fell dead on his face. His remains were brought to New York. The funeral service was read at the armory of the Seventh, and the body was carried in funeral procession on the howitzer which he had helped to drag, only two months before, through the same Broadway.

Cecil Dreeme was published soon after Winthrop's death, and of course at once attracted the attention of the public. High expectations were, however, more than gratified by the work.

Cecil Dreeme is in its plot a romance, in its characters and dialogue a novel of society. Its scenes are for the most part in the studios of the New York University. He has invested this building with a mysterious romantic interest far beyond any thing hitherto attained by our local writers. We must protest against some of the charges of shabbiness, decay, and flimsiness he has brought against an edifice of very fair architectural pretensions. The marble staircase would be a very respectable flight of steps in any college edifice of the Old World, and you can ascend without any fear of flakes of whitewash. The studios are not recitation-rooms deserted for lack of students, never having, to our knowledge, been occupied as such, the second floor of the building affording ample accommodation for hundreds of students and a score of professors. Mr. Winthrop should also have known that the boys did not mob their professors; and that instructors like Dr. Henry, Tayler Lewis, Dr. Draper, and Howard Crosby, were not "mullein-stalks." An occasional injustice must, however, be pardoned to the satirist. His hits are in the main as well deserved as they are sharp.

The main incident of the story turns upon the disguise of a woman as a man, and we are bound to say that we remember no instance of a like success, perfectly pure, modest, and spirited, short of Viola and Rosalind. The secret is also wonderfully well hidden from the reader.

There is a shade of gravity, almost of sadness, thrown over many parts of the work, a warning of impending evil, a submission to fate, that reminds us of a similar atmosphere in the stories of Charles Brockden Brown. We are almost sure, from the similarity, that Winthrop had been a reader of this almost forgotten, but most gifted writer, and our conviction is confirmed on meeting the very striking and musical name of Olitheroe, one of Brown's characters, in the pages of John Brent. The indefinable tone which we have ventured to style the atmosphere of the book, is also a characteristic of Hawthorne. It is an evidence of kindred genius, not of imitation, for it is too subtle an influence to be imitated.

John Brent, his second novel, carries us across the Plains from California in a style such as pen has never crossed them before. The book should have been called Don Fulano, in honor of the matchless steed who so faithfully bears his master to the redressal of wrong and setting up of right, at eventful crises. A horse has seldom been so admirably described, so sharply individualized. It is a work to rank with the great masters of the chisel and the palette as well as of the pen. The descriptions of prairie life, of the mountain-passes, the wavy landscape, the far-off approach of caravans, are admirable. So too is the individualization of the characters, the fresh, vigorous over-land mail-carriers, the Oregon frontiersman, the disgusting rabble of Mormons from Lancashire.

The exchange from trail to rail must be a sad fall from the picturesque to the prosaic. It would have been as well if the story had ended at Independence. There is a sort of fifth act in civilization, which, excellent in itself, suffers by contrast with what has gone before. Readers, we fear, will skip as remorselessly as audiences turn their backs on the moonlight rhapsodies of Lorenzo and Jessica.

Other writings of Winthrop, drawn from his copious stores of manuscript, followed in rapid succession,—Edwin Brothertoft, another novel, and two graphic volumes of travelling sketches, The Cunoe and the Saddle; Adventures among the Northwestern Rivers, and Forests, and Isthmuses, the last relating to Panama; and Life in the Open Air, and other Papers, including his war sketches, "The Heart of the Andes," and a brilliant narrative of a summer journey in Maine.

*THE RIDE OF THE AVENGERS.—FROM JOHN BRENT.

Brent's unerring judgment had divined the course aright. On he led, charging along the trail, as if he were trampling already on the carcasses of the pursued. On he led and we followed, drawing nearer, nearer to our goal.

Our horses suffered bitterly for water. Some five hours we had ridden without a pause. Not one drop or sign of water in all that arid waste. The torrents had poured along the dry water-courses too hastily to let the scanty alders and willows along their line treasure up any sap of growth. The wild-sage bushes had plainly never tasted fluid more plenteous than seldom dewdrops doled out on certain rare festal days, enough to keep their meagre foliage a dusty gray. No pleasant streamlet lurked anywhere under the long dry grass of the savannas. The arroyos were parched and hot as rifts in lava.

It became agonizing to listen to the panting and gasping of our horses. Their eyes grew staring and bloodshot. We suffered, ourselves, hardly less than they. It was cruel to press on. But we must hinder a crueler cruelty. Love against Time,—Vengeance against Time! We must not finch for any weak humanity to the noble allies that struggled on with us, without one token of resistance.

Fulano suffered least. He turned his brave eye back, and beckoned me with his ear to listen, while he seemed to say: "See, this is my Endurance! I hold my Power ready still to show."

And he curved his proud neck, shook his mane like a banner, and galloped the grandest of all.

We came to a broad strip of sand, the dry bed of a mountain torrent. The trail followed up this disappointing path. Heavy ploughing for the tired horses! How would they bear the rough work down the ravine yet to come?

Suddenly our leader pulled up and sprang from the saddle.

"Look!" he cried, "how those fellows spent their time, and saved ours. Thank Heaven for this! We shall save her surely now."

It was WATER! No need to go back to Pindar to know that it was "the Best."

They had dug a pit deep in the thirsty sand, and found a lurking river buried there. Nature never questioned what manner of men they were that sought. Murderers flying from vengeance and planning now another villain outrage,—still impartial Nature did not change her laws for them. Sunshine, air, water, life,—these boons of hers,—she gave them freely. That higher boon of death, if they were to receive, it must be from some other power, greater than the indiscriminating force of Nature.

Good luck and good omen, this well of water in the sand! It proved that our chase had suffered as we, and had been delayed as we. Before they had dared to pause and waste priceless moments here, their horses must have been drooping terribly. The pit was nearly five feet deep. A good hour's work, and no less, had dug it with such tools as they could bring. I almost laughed to think of the two, slowly bailing out the sliding sand with a tin plate, perhaps, and a frying-pan, while a score of miles away upon the desert we three were riding hard upon their tracks to follow them the fletter for this refreshment they had left. "Sic vos non vobis!" I was ready to say triumphantly; but then I remembered the third figure, in their group,—a woman, like a Sibyl, growing calmer as her peril grew, and succor seemed to withdraw. And the pang of this picture crushed back into my heart any thoughts but a mad anxiety and a frenzy to be driving on.

We drank thankfully of this well by the wayside. No gentle beauty hereabouts to enchant us to delay. No grand old tree, the shelter and the landmark of the fountain, proclaiming an oasis near. Nothing but bare hot sand. But the water was pure, cool, and bright. It had come underground from the Sierra, and still remembered its parent snows. We drank and were grateful, almost to the point of pity. Had we been avengers, like Armstrong, my friend and I could well-nigh have felt mercy here, and turned back pardoning. But rescue was more imperative than vengeance. Our business tortured us, as with the fanged scourge of Tisiphone, while we dallied. We grudged these moments of refreshment. Before night fell down the west, and night was soon to be climbing up the east, we must overtake,—and then?

I wiped the dust and spume away from Fulano's nostrils and breathed him a moment. Then I let him drain deep, delicious draughts from the stirrup-cup. He whinnied thanks and undying fealty,—my noble comrade! He drank like a reveller. When I mounted again, he gave a jubilant curvet and bound. My weight was a feather to him. All those leagues of our hard, hot gallop were nothing.

The brown Sierra here was close at hand. Its glittering, icy summits, above the dark and sheeny walls, far above the black phalanxes of clambering pines, stooped forward and hung over us as we rode. We were now at the foot of the range, where it dipped suddenly down upon the plain. The gap, our goal all day, opened before us, grand and terrible. Some giant force had clutched the mountains, and riven them narrowly apart. The wild defile gaped, and then wound away and closed, lost between its mighty walls, a thousand feet high, and bearing two brother pyramids of purple cliffs aloft, far above the snow line. A fearful portal into a scene of the throes and agonies of earth! and my excited eyes seemed to read, gilded over its entrance, in the dead gold of that hazy October sunshine, words from Dante's inscription, —

"Per me si va tra la perduta gente; Lasciate ogni speranza voi, ch' entrate!"

"Here we are," said Brent, speaking hardly above his breath. "This is Luggerniel Alley at last, thank God! In an hour, if the horses hold out, we shall be at the Springs; that is if we can go through this breakneck gorge at the same pace. My horse began to finch a little before the water. Perhaps that will set him up. How are yours?"

"Fulano asserts that he has not begun to show himself yet. I may have to carry you en croupe, before we are done."

Armstrong said nothing, but pointed impatiently down the defile. The gaunt white horse moved on quicker at this gesture. He seemed a tireless machine, not flesh and blood, — a being like his master, living and acting by the force of a purpose alone.

Our chief led the way into the cañon.

Yes, John Brent, you were right when you called Luggernel Alley a wonder of our continent.

I remember it now. — I only saw it then; — for those strong scenes of nature assault the soul whether it will or no, fight in against affirmative or negative resistance, and bide their time to be admitted as dominant over the imagination. It seemed to me then that I was not noticing how grand the precipices, how stupendous the cleavages, how rich and gleaming the rock faces in Luggernel Alley. My business was not to stare about, but to look sharp and ride hard; and I did it.

Yet now I can remember, distinct as if I beheld it, every stride of that pass; and everywhere, as I recall foot after foot of that fierce chasm. I see three men with set faces, — one deathly pale and wearing a bloody turban, — all galloping steadily on, on an errand to save and to slay.

Terrible riding it was! A pavement of slippery, sheeny rock; great beds of loose stones; barricades of mighty boulders, where a cliff had fallen an æon ago, before the days of the road-maker race; crevices where an unwary foot might catch; wide rifts where a shaky horse might fall, or a timid horseman drag him down. Terrible riding! A pass where a calm traveller would go quietly picking his steps, thankful if each hour counted him a safe mile.

Terrible riding! Madness to go as we went! Horse and man, any moment either might shatter every limb. But man and horse neither can know what he can do, until he has dared and done. On we went, with the old frenzy growing tenser. Heart almost broken with eagerness.

No whipping or spurring. Our horses were a part of ourselves. While we could go, they would go. Since the water they were full of leap again. Down in the shady Alley, too, evening had come before its time. Noon's packing of hot air had been dislodged by a mountain breeze drawing through. Horses and men were braced and cheered to their work; and in such riding as that, the man and the horse must think together and move together, — eye and hand of the rider must choose and command, as bravely as the horse executes. The blue sky was overhead, the red sun upon the castellated walls a thousand feet above us, the purpling chasm opened before. It was late, these were the last moments. But we should save the lady yet.

"Yes," our hearts shouted to us, "we shall save her yet."

An arroyo, the channel of a dry torrent, followed the pass. It had made its way as water does, not straightway, but by that potent feminine method of passing under the frowning front of an obstacle, and leaving the dull rock staring there, while the wild creature it would have held is gliding away down the valley. This zigzag channel baffled us; we must leap it without check wherever it crossed our path. Every second now was worth a century. Here was the sign of horses, passed but now. We could not choose ground. We must take our leaps on that cruel rock whenever they offered.

Poor Pumps!

He had carried his master so nobly! There were so few miles to do! He had chased so well; he merited to be in at the death.

Brent lifted him at a leap across the arroyo.

Poor Pumps!

His hind feet slipped on the time-smoothed rock. He fell short. He plunged down a dozen feet among the rough boulders of the torrent-bed. Brent was out of the saddle almost before he struck, raising him.

No, he would never rise again. Both his forelegs were broken at the knee. He rested there, kneeling on the rocks where he fell.

Brent groaned. The horse screamed horribly, horribly, — there is no more agonized sound, — and the scream went echoing high up the cliffs where the red sunlight rested.

It costs a loving master much to butcher his brave and trusty horse, the half of his knightly self; but it costs him more to hear him shriek in such misery. Brent drew his pistol to put poor Pumps out of pain.

Armstrong sprang down and caught his hand.

"Stop!" he said in his hoarse whisper.

He had hardly spoken, since we started. My nerves were so strained, that this mere ghost of a sound rang through me like a death-yell, a grisly cry of merciless and exultant vengeance. I seemed to hear its echoes rising up and swelling in a cloud of thick uproar, until they burst over the summit of the pass, and were wasted in the cranies of the towering mountain-flanks above.

"Stop!" whispered Armstrong. "No shooting! They'll hear. The knife!"

He held out his knife to my friend.

Brent hesitated one heart-beat. Could he stain his hand with his faithful servant's blood?

Pumps screamed again.

Armstrong snatched the knife and drew it across the throat of the crippled horse.

Poor Pumps! He sank and died without a moan. Noble martyr in the old heroic cause!

I caught the knife from Armstrong. I cut the thong of my girth. The heavy California saddle, with its macheers and roll of blankets, fell to the ground. I cut off my spurs. They had never yet touched Fulano's flanks. He stood beside me quiet, but trembling to be off.

"Now Brent! up behind me!" I whispered, — for the awe of death was upon us.

I mounted. Brent sprang up behind. I ride light for a tall man. Brent is the slightest body of an athlete I ever saw.

Fulano stood steady till we were firm in our seats.

Then he tore down the defile.

Here was that vast reserve of power; here the tireless spirit; here the hoof striking true as a thunderbolt, where the brave eye saw footing; here that writhing agony of speed; here the great promise fulfilled, the great heart thrilling to mine, the grand body living to the beating heart. Noble Fulano!

I rode with a snaffle. — I left it hanging loose. I did not check or guide him. He saw all. He knew all. All was his doing.

We sat firm, clinging as we could, as we must. Fulano dashed along the resounding pass.

Armstrong pressed after, — the gaunt white horse struggled to emulate his leader. Presently we lost them behind the curves of the Alley. No other horse that ever lived could have held with the black in that headlong gallop to save.

Over the slippery rocks, over the sheeny pavement, plunging through the loose stones, staggering over the barricades, leaping the arroyo, down, up, on, always on, — on went the horse, we clinging as we might.

It seemed one beat of time, it seemed an eternity, when between the ring of the hoofs I heard Brent whisper in my ear:

“We are there.”

The crags flung apart, right and left. I saw a sylvan glade. I saw the gleam of gushing water. Fulano dashed on, uncontrollable!

There they were, — the Murderers.

Arrived but one moment!

The lady still bound to that pack-mule branded A & A.

Murker just beginning to unsaddle.

Larrup not dismounted, in chase of the other animals as they strayed to graze.

The men heard the tramp and saw us, as we sprang into the glade.

Both my hands were at the bridle.

Brent, grasping my waist with one arm, was awkward with his pistol.

Murker saw us first. He snatched his six-shooter and fired.

Brent shook with a spasm. His pistol-arm dropped.

Before the murderer could cock again, Fulano was upon him!

He was ridden down. He was beaten, trampled down upon the grass, — crushed, abolished.

We disentangled ourselves from the mêlée.

Where was the other?

The coward, without firing a shot, was spurring Armstrong's Flathead horse blindly up the cañon, whence we had issued.

We turned to Murker.

Fulano was up again, and stood there shuddering. But the man?

A hoof had battered in the top of his skull; blood was gushing from his mouth; his ribs were broken; all his body was a trodden massacred carcass.

He breathed once, as we lifted him.

Then a tranquil, child-like look stole over his face, — that well known look of the weary body, thankful that the turbulent soul had gone. Murker was dead.

Fulano, and not we, had been executioner. His was the stain of blood.

CHARLES GODFREY LELAND

Was born in Philadelphia, August 15, 1824. He graduated at Princeton College, at the age of twenty-two, and then continued his studies abroad, at the Universities of Heidelberg, Munich, and Paris, applying himself especially to modern languages, æsthetics, history, and philosophy. Returning to Philadelphia in 1848, after witnessing the revolution of that year at Paris, he studied law in the office of John Cadwallader, and was admitted to the bar. His tastes, however, soon led him to the literary career which he has since pursued. He began to write, while in college, for the Knickerbocker Magazine, and was an editor on Sartain's Magazine, Griswold's International, Graham's Magazine, the Philadelphia Bulletin, and other periodicals. In 1855, he published at Philadelphia a volume entitled The Poetry and Mystery of Dreams, a work of curious research, displaying much reading in out-of-the-way authorities; and in 1856 Meister Karl's Sketch Book. Mr. Leland has succeeded in the accomplishment of a work of much difficulty. He has felicitously rendered in English verse the fine idiomatic poems of the German wit and philosopher Heine, in a volume entitled Heine's Book of Song, and has translated with equal success that author's Pictures of Travel.

Charles G. Leland.

 Besides numerous contributions to literary journals, and to Appleton's Cyclopaedia, as well as an editorship of Vanity Fair, The Continental Magazine, and the Philadelphia Press, Mr. Leland has, in recent years, written and translated some volumes marked by humor and versatility, as well as by the graces of thought and scholarship. His original works include: Sunshine in Thought, 1863, a scholarly plea for gayety and good humor in literature; Legends of the Birds, 1864, a companion volume of poems and pictorial illustrations; The Union Railway, Eastern Division; or, Three Thousand Miles in a Railway Car, 1867; and the Hans Breitmann Ballads, a series of humorous verses in broken English, as spoken by a Deutscher Amerikaner, 1868-71. The latter met a hearty welcome at the outset in Hans Breitmann's Party, published with other droll scenes in rhyme, and successive representations followed of that burlesque character "About Town," "In Church," "In Europe," and "As a Uhlán." These were all collected into one volume in 1871, with a glossary.

Mr. Leland gathered his poems into a volume in 1872, entitled The Music Lesson of Confucius, and Other Poems. In the same year, he published Gaudeamus, a series of rollicking students' songs, translated from the German of Joseph Victor Scheffel. A year later appeared The English Gypsies and their Language, founded on personal investigations made in England; and the Egyptian Sketch Book.

 HANS BREITMANN'S PARTY.

Hans Breitmann gife a barty,
 Dey had biano-blayin;
 I felled in lofe mit a Merican frau,
 Her name vas Madilda Yane.
 She hat haar as prawn ash a pretzel,
 Her eyes vas himmel-pleu,
 Und ven dey looket indo mine,
 Dey shplit mine heart in two.

Hans Breitmann gife a barty,
 I vent there you 'll pe pound.
 I valtzed mit Madilda Yane
 Und vent shpinnen round und round.
 De pootiest Fraulein in de House,
 She vayed 'pout dwo hundred pound,
 Und efery dime she gife a shoomp
 She make de vindows sound.

Hans Breitmann gife a barty,
 I dells you it cost him dear.
 Dey rolled in more ash sefen kecks
 Of foost-rate Lager Beer.
 Und venfer dey knocks de shpicket in De Deutchers gifes a cheer.
 I dinks dat so vine a barty,
 Nefer coom to a het dis year.

Hans Breitmann gife a barty,
 Dere all vas Souse und Brouse,
 Ven de Sooper comed in, de gompany
 Did make demselves to house;
 Dey ate das Brot und Gensy broost,
 De Bratwurst und Braten fine,
 Und vash der Abendessen down
 Mit four parrels of Neckarwein.

Hans Breitmann gife a barty,
 We all cot troonk as bigs,
 I poot mine mout to a parrel of beer
 Und emptied it oop mit a schwigs.
 Und denn I gissed Madilda Yane
 Und she shlog me on de kop,
 Und de gompany fited mit duple-lecks
 Dill de coonshtable made oos shtop.

Hans Breitmann gife a barty —
 Where ish dat barty now!
 Where ish de lofely golden cloud
 Dat floats on de moundain's prow?
 Where ish de himmelstrahlende Stern —
 De Shtar of de shpirit's light?
 All goned afay mit de Lager Beer —
 Afay in de ewigkeit!

 A THOUSAND YEARS AGO.

Thou and I in spirit-land,
 A thousand years ago,
 Watched the waves beat on the strand,
 Ceaseless ebb and flow;
 Vowed to love and ever love —
 A thousand years ago.

Thou and I in greenwood shade,
 Nine hundred years ago,
 Heard the wild dove in the glade
 Murmuring soft and low;
 Vowed to love for evermore, —
 Nine hundred years ago.

Thou and I in yonder star,
 Eight hundred years ago,
 Saw strange forms of light afar
 In wild beauty glow;
 All things change, but love endures
 Now as long ago!

Thou and I in Norman halls,
 Seven hundred years ago,
 Heard the warder on the walls
 Loud his trumpet blow, —
 'Ton amors sera tojors,'
 Seven hundred years ago!

Thou and I in Germany,
 Six hundred years ago —
 Then I bound the red cross on;
 'True love, I must go, —
 But we part to meet again
 In the endless flow!'

Thou and I in Syrian plains,
 Five hundred years ago,
 Felt the wild fire in our veins
 To a fever glow!
 All things die, but love lives on
 Now as long ago!

Thou and I in shadow-land,
 Four hundred years ago,
 Saw strange flowers bloom on the strand,
 Heard strange breezes blow:
 In the ideal, love is real,
 This alone I know.

Thou and I in Italy,
 Three hundred years ago,
 Lived in faith and died for God,
 Felt the fagots glow:
 Ever new and ever true,
 Three hundred years ago.

Thou and I on southern seas,
 Two hundred years ago,
 Felt the perfumed even-breeze,
 Spoke in Spanish by the trees,
 Had no care or woe:
 Life went dreamily in song,
 Two hundred years ago.

Thou and I 'mid Northern snows,
 One hundred years ago,
 Led an iron, silent life,
 And were glad to flow
 Onwards into changing death,
 One hundred years ago.

Thou and I but yesterday
 Met in Fashion's show,
 Love, did you remember me,
 Love of long ago?
 Yes; we keep the fond oath sworn
 A thousand years ago!

 THE TWO FRIENDS.

I have two friends — two glorious friends — two better could not be,
 And every night when midnight tolls they meet
 to laugh with me.

The first was shot by Carlist thieves — ten years ago in Spain.
 The second drowned near Alicante — while I alive remain.

I love to see their dim white forms come floating through the night,
 And grieve to see them fade away in early morning light.

The first with gnomes in the Under Land is leading a lordly life,
 The second has married a mer-maiden, a beautiful
 water-wife.

And since I have friends in the Earth and Sea —
with a few, I trust, on high,

'Tis a matter of small account to me — the way that I may die.

For whether I sink in the foaming flood, or swing
on the triple tree,

Or die in my bed, as a Christian should, is all the same to me.

 THE FALL OF THE TREES.

I have been in the wild green wilderness,
A wood of many ages, leagues away
From human home, when a tremendous storm
Was giving its long warning in those signs
Which every woodsman knows. We sat in peace
In the canoe dug from a single tree,
Well in the water and far out from shore,
For none at such a time will trust to trees,
Since lightning strikes them when they shelter
men;

And as we sat and watched the wide-spread clouds,
I heard from time to time, long miles away,
Deep dull and thundering sounds, like cannon fired
In a ravine, which makes them heavier
And yet prolongs the roar. An awful sound
To one who knew that no artillery
Was in those lonely dales, and that no flash
Had shot as yet from heaven. It was the noise
Of ancient trees falling while all was still
Before the storm, in the long interval
Between the gathering clouds and that light breeze Which Germans call the Wind's bride. At such time

The oldest trees go down, no one knows why,
But well I know from wood-experience
That 'tis before the storm they mostly fall,
And not while wind and rain are terrible.
'Tis wonderful, and seen ere every storm: —
Our great old statesmen died before the war.

 HENRY PERRY LELAND, a brother of the preceding, and a graceful magazine writer, was born in Philadelphia, October 28, 1828,
and died there in his fortieth year, September 22, 1868. "He was a gentleman of many natural gifts, which had been cultivated by travel, and by extensive and various study.
He was an ardent contributor, in prose and verse, to the newspapers and magazines. He had a fresh vein of genial humor, and, if his health had been preserved, he would undoubtedly have risen to high eminence in literature."* In 1856 he published a volume of sketches, entitled The Gray Bay Mare, and in 1863, Americans in Rome. During the war he served as a lieutenant, in the 118th Pennsylvania Regiment, and at Carlisle, Pa., was wounded by a shell, from the effects of which he never fully recovered.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

Mr. Aldrich was born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, November 11, 1836. He passed the early part of his youth in Louisiana, and was preparing to enter college, when the death of his father made it necessary for him to relinquish the design. He then entered a mercantile house in New York; but, becoming impatient of pursuits so far removed from the bent of his mind, retired from the counting-house after three years' experience. Mr. Aldrich then procured a situation as "reader" for a large publishing house in New York, and afterwards became attached in an editorial capacity to the New York Evening Mirror, the Home Journal, and Saturday Press.

Many of Mr. Aldrich's writings have been contributed to the magazines, Putnam's Monthly, the Knickerbocker, Harper's Monthly, and the Atlantic. He has published several volumes:
The Bells, a collection of juvenile verses (1854);
Daisy's Necklace, and what Came of It (1856);
The Ballad of Babie Bell, and other Poems;
The Course of True Love never did run Smooth
(1858); Pampinea, and other Poems (1861);
Out of his Head, a romance in prose (1862);
and a new collection of Poems, with several never before published, in 1863. Still another
"new and complete edition" of Mr. Aldrich's poems appeared two years later. In 1869 The Story of a Bad Boy was published; and it became at once a favorite by its naturalness and purity of spirit. Mr. Aldrich is at present editor of Every Saturday. A volume of choice stories, Marjorie Daw, and Other People, and a revised edition of the poems entitled Cloth of Gold, appeared in 1873.

THE BLUE-BELLS OF NEW ENGLAND.

"The roses are a regal troop,
And humble folks the daisies;
But, Blue-bells of New England,
To you I give my praises—
To you, fair phantoms in the sun,
Whom merry Spring discovers,
With blue-birds for your laureates,
And honey-bees for lovers.

"The south-wind breathes, and lo! ye throng
This rugged land of ours—
I think the pale-blue clouds of May Drop down, and turn to flowers!
By cottage doors along the roads,
You show your winsome faces,
And, like the spectre-lady, haunt
The lovely woodland places.

"All night your eyes are closed in sleep,
But open at the dawning,
Such simple faith as yours can see
God's coming in the morning!
You lead me, by your holiness,
To pleasant ways of duty:
You set my thoughts to melody,
You fill me with your beauty.

"And you are like the eyes I love.
So modest and so tender,
Just touched with daybreak's glorious light,
And evening's quiet splendor.
Long may the heavens give you rain,
The sunshine its caresses;
Long may the woman that I love
Entwine you in her tresses."

 THE BALLAD OF BABIE BELL.

I.

Have you not heard the poets tell
How came the dainty Babie Bell
Into this world of ours?
The gates of heaven were left ajar:
With folded hands and dreamy eyes,
Wandering out of Paradise,
She saw this planet, like a star,

* Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, for 1868.

Hung in the glistening depths of even,—
Its bridges, running to and fro,
O'er which the white-winged Angels go,
Bearing the holy Dead to heaven.

She touched a bridge of flowers,—those feet,
So light they did not bend the bells
Of the celestial asphodels!
They fell like dew upon the flowers,
Then all the air grew strangely sweet!
And thus came dainty Babie Bell
Into this world of ours.

II.

She came and brought delicious May,
The swallows built beneath the eaves;
Like sunlight in and out the leaves,
The robins went, the livelong day;
The lily swung its noiseless bell,
And o'er the porch the trembling vine
Seemed bursting with its veins of wine
How sweetly, softly, twilight fell!
O, earth was full of singing-birds,
And opening spring-tide flowers,
When the dainty Babie Bell
Came to this world of ours!

III.

O Babie, dainty Babie Bell,
How fair she grew from day to day!
What woman-nature filled her eyes,
What poetry within them lay:
Those deep and tender twilight eyes,
So full of meaning, pure and bright
As if she yet stood in the light
Of those oped gates of Paradise.
And so we loved her more and more:
Ah, never in our hearts before
Was love so lovely born:
We felt we had a link between
This real world and that unseen,—
The land beyond the morn.
And for the love of those dear eyes,
For love of her whom God led forth,
(The mother's being ceased on earth
When Babie came from Paradise.)—
For love of Him who smote our lives,
And woke the chords of joy and pain,
We said, Dear Christ!—Our hearts bent down
Like violets after rain.

IV.

And now the orchards, which were white
And red with blossoms when she came,
Were rich in autumn's mellow prime:
The clustered apples burnt like flame,
The soft-cheeked peaches blushed and fell,
The ivory chestnut burst its shell,
The grapes hung purpling in the grange:
And time wrought just as rich a change
In little Babie Bell.
Her lissome form more perfect grew,
And in her features we could trace,
In softened curves, her mother's face!
Her angel-nature ripened too.
We thought her lovely when she came,
But she was holy, saintly now . . .
Around her pale angelic brow
We saw a slender ring of flame!

V.

God's hand had taken away the seal
That held the portals of her speech;
And oft she said a few strange words
Whose meaning lay beyond our reach.

She never was a child to us,
We never held her being's key;
We could not teach her holy things:
She was Christ's self in purity.

VI.

It came upon us by degrees:
We saw its shadow ere it fell,
The knowledge that our God had sent
His messenger for Babie Bell.
We shuddered with unlanguage pain,
And all our hopes were changed to fears,
And all our thoughts ran into tears
Like sunshine into rain.
We cried aloud in our belief,
'O, smite us gently, gently, God!
Teach us to bend and kiss the rod,
And perfect grow through grief,'
Ah, how we loved her, God can tell;
Her heart was folded deep in ours.
Our hearts are broken, Babie Bell!

VII.

At last he came, the messenger,
The messenger from unseen lands:
And what did dainty Babie Bell?
She only crossed her little hands,
She only looked more meek and fair!
We parted back her silken hair:
We wove the roses round her brow,
White buds, the summer's drifted snow,—
Wrapt her from head to foot in flowers!
And thus went dainty Babie Bell
Out of this world of ours!

 CASTLES.

There is a picture in my brain,
That only fades to come again,—
The sunlight, through a veil of rain
To leeward, gilding
A narrow stretch of brown sea-sand,
A lighthouse half a league from land,
And two young lovers, hand in hand,
A castle-building.

Upon the budded apple-trees
The robins sing by twos and threes,
And ever at the faintest breeze
Down drops a blossom;
And ever would that lover be
The wind that robs the burgeoned tree,
And lifts the soft tress daintily
On Beauty's bosom.

Ah, graybeard, what a happy thing
It was, when life was in its spring,
To peep through love's betrothal ring
At Fields Elysian,
To move and breathe in magic air,
To think that all that seems is fair,—
Ah, ripe young mouth and golden hair,
Thou pretty vision!

Well, well, I think not on these two
But the old wound breaks out anew,
And the old dream, as if 't were true,
In my heart nestles,
Then tears come welling to my eyes,
For yonder, all in saintly guise,
As 't were, a sweet dead woman lies
Upon the trestles.

 TIGER-LILIES.

I like not lady-slippers,
Nor yet the sweet-pea blossoms,
Nor yet the flaky roses,
Red, or white as snow;

I like the chaliced lilies,
The heavy Eastern lilies,
The gorgeous tiger-lilies,
That in our garden grow.

For they are tall and slender,
Their mouths are dashed with carmine,
And when the wind sweeps by them,
On their emerald stalks
They bend so proud and graceful, —
They are Circassian women,
The favorites of the Sultan,
Adown our garden-walks!

And when the rain is falling,
I sit beside the window
And watch them glow and glisten,
How they burn and glow!
O for the burning lilies,
The tender Eastern lilies,
The gorgeous tiger-lilies,
That in our garden grow!

 BEFORE THE RAIN.

We knew it would rain, for all the morn,
A spirit on slender ropes of mist
Was lowering its golden buckets down
Into the vapory amethyst.

Of marshes and swamps and dismal fens, —
Scooping the dew that lay in the flowers,
Dipping the jewels out of the sea,
To sprinkle them over the land in showers.

We knew it would rain, for the poplars showed
The white of their leaves, the amber grain
Shrunk in the wind, — and the lightning now
Is tangled in tremulous skeins of rain!

 AFTER THE RAIN.

The rain has ceased, and in my room
The sunshine pours an airy flood;
And on the church's dizzy vane
The ancient Cross is bathed in blood.

From out the dripping ivy-leaves,
Antiquely-carven, gray and high,
A dormer, facing westward, looks
Upon the village like an eye:

And now it glimmers in the sun,
A globe of gold, a disc, a speck:
And in the belfry sits a Dove
With purple ripples on her neck.

 THE AMULET.

Though thou wert cunninger than Vivien, —
Faithful as Enid, — fair as Guinevere, —
Pure as Elaine, — I should not hold thee dear.
Count me not cold, indecorous, unlike men!
Indeed the time was, and not long since, when —
But 'tis not now. An amulet I've here
Saves me. A ring. Observe: within this sphere
Of chiselled gold a jewel is set. What then?
Why, this, — the stone and setting cannot part,
Unless one's broken. See with what a grace
The diamond dewdrop sinks into the white
Tulip-shaped calyx, and o'erflows it quite!
There is a lady set so in my heart
There's not for any other any place.

EDMUND B. O'CALLAGHAN.

Edmund B. O'Callaghan, M. D., LL. D., a native of Ireland, was at one time prominent in Lower Canada as a member of the Provincial Parliament, and editor of the Vindicator, the national organ at Montreal. He was active in the agitation in 1837, which, though failing to secure Canadian independence, resulted in such modifications as make it one of the best governed of colonies.

Since his removal to the State of New York, in 1837, he has devoted himself to the study of the history of the State, and done much to bring to light the real facts as to the Dutch period. For several years he has been connected with the office of Secretary of State, giving his peculiar learning to the proper editing of New York State papers.

He has published, History of New Netherland; or, New York under the Dutch (two vols., 8vo, New York, 1846-48); Jesuit Relations, a bibliographical account (8vo, New York, 1847; issued in French at Montreal, 12mo, 1850); Documentary History of the State of New York (4 vols., 4to and 8vo, Albany, 1849-51); Documents Relating to the Colonial History of the State of New York (11 vols., 4to, Albany, 1855-61); two volumes of Dutch and two of French documents, being translated by Dr. O'Callaghan; Remonstrance of New Netherland (4to, Albany, 1856); Commissary Wilson's Orderly Book, edited by Dr. O'Callaghan (4to, Albany, 1857, xi. 220 pp.); Orderly Book of Lieutenant-General John Burgoyne (4to, Albany, 1860, xxiv. 221 pp.); Names of Persons for whom Marriage Licenses were Issued previous to 1784 (8vo, Albany, 1860, ix. 480 pp.); Journals of the Legislative Council of New York (2 vols., 8vo); Origin of the Legislative Assemblies of the State of New York (4to, Albany, 1861, 37 pp.); A List of Editions of the Holy Scriptures, and Parts thereof, Printed in America previous to 1860 (8vo, Albany, 1861, lx. 415 pp.); Woolley's Two Years' Journal in New York (4to and 8vo, New York, 1860, 97 pp.); The Register of New Netherland, 1626-1674 (8vo, Albany, 1865, 198 pp.); Calendar to the Land Papers (8vo, Albany, 1864); Calendar of Historical Manuscripts in the Office of the Secretary of State (4to, Albany, 1865, xi. 423 pp.); Journal of the Voyage of the Sloop Mary from Quebec, 1866; Voyages of the Stavers St. John and Arms, 1867; Voyage of George Clarke to America, with an Introduction and Notes, 1867; The Sailing Directions of Henry Hudson, 1869; The Laws and Ordinances of New Netherland, 1869.

JOHN GILMARY SHEA.

John Gilmary Shea, LL. D., was born in New York city, in 1824, educated at the Grammar School of Columbia College, and admitted to the bar. The third volume of Bancroft's History drew his attention to the former French colonies in North America, and their romantic interest, and he has since cultivated that field, and incidentally the Spanish colonies, with true antiquarian zeal. A period of six years spent in the Society of Jesus, enabled him to prosecute more especially studies into the history of that order. Although constantly engaged in business, and devoting only leisure moments to literature, he has published, The Discovery and Exploration of the Mississippi Valley (8vo, New York, 1853); History of the Catholic Missions among the Indian Tribes of the United States (12mo, New York, 1854), of which a German translation appeared at Wurzburg; Perils of the Ocean and Wilderness (12mo, Boston, 1857);

Bibliography of American Catholic Bibles and Testaments (24mo, 1859); Early Voyages up and down the Mississippi (4to, Albany, 1862); The Fallen Brave (4to, New York, 1861); and The Catholic Church in the United States (12mo, New York, 1856). He also translated Charlevoix's History and General Description of New France, with extensive notes, 6 vols., 8vo (New York, 1865-72); wrote a Child's History of the United States, 3 vols., 8vo (New York, 1872-3); Bible Stories for the Young, 4to (New York, 1873).

He has written several histories for the use of Catholic schools, and compiled, translated, and arranged several popular prayer-books, the St. John's Manual, Catholic Prayer-Book, &c., besides compiling, editing, and translating a number of works, and contributing largely to periodicals. A series of biographies of Catholic missionaries killed on the Indian missions in the United States, which appeared in the United States Catholic Magazine, were revised by him, and have been issued in a volume in Germany; another series included the history of all the religious orders of women having convents in the country. He has devoted much time to the condition of the editions of the Bible published for Catholics in this country. In 1864 he edited an edition in which many glaring errors were corrected; and in 1870 reprinted Challoner's original edition, correcting only typographical errors, and conforming in punctuation and orthography of proper names to the Clementine edition of 1592, recognized as the standard Latin text. This was the most accurate English Catholic Bible issued for more than a century. He then corrected the more serious errors in two stereotyped editions still published, and in 1873 prepared a new Bible, adhering to Challoner's original text, and adding a commentary translated from the German of Allioli. He also issued in 1873 a small Bible Dictionary, the first Catholic work of the kind in English.

Among works edited by Dr. Shea are: Washington's Private Diaries (12mo, New York, 1861); Miller's New York in 1695 (8vo, New York); Novum Belgium; an Account of New Netherland in 1643-44, translated with notes (4to, New York, 1862); The Operations of the French Fleet under the Count de Grasse in 1781-82, translated with notes, &c. (8vo, Bradford Club, New York, 1864); The Lincoln Memorial (8vo, New York, 1864); Colden's Five Nations (8vo, New York, 1866); Alsop's Maryland (8vo, New York, 1869); Household Book of Irish Eloquence (8vo, New York, 1870).

He published a series of twenty-four volumes, called the Cramoisy Series, of Relations and Memoirs relating to early French colonization, in antique style, with the type, tail-pieces, initials, and heads of Cramoisy, the French printer of the seventeenth century. Besides contributing several papers on the Indian tribes to various works, he issued his Library of American Linguistics in 14 vols.; a series of grammars and dictionaries of Indian tribes within the United States. He edited the Historical Magazine (4to, New York, 1859-1865), Frank Leslie's Illustrated Paper, Chimney Corner, &c. He contributed to the first edition of Appleton's Cyclopædia, and is one of the staff of revisers of the second edition.

HENRY C. MURPHY

Was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1810. He was educated at Columbia College, New York, where he graduated in 1830; in 1833 was admitted to the bar, and became a practising lawyer in Brooklyn, N. Y., and was attorney to the city; in 1842 was elected to the mayoralty, and from 1843 to 1849 represented his district in Congress. He was a member of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the State of New York in 1846. From 1857 to 1861 he was minister of the United States to Holland. On his return, he was elected to the Senate of New York, and has continued a member of that body for twelve years. Previously to his departure for the Hague, in the summer of 1857, a complimentary dinner was given to him by the citizens of Brooklyn, an account of which has been published in a volume of much interest.*

In early life Mr. Murphy was a contributor to the American Quarterly Review, and other periodicals of less note. He has written much in illustration of the early Dutch history of New York, and has translated a number of tracts and other publications by the first settlers from Holland. To the volume of Collections of the New York Historical Society, published in 1857, he contributed translations of Voyages from Holland, A. D. 1632 to 1644, by David Peterson De Vries, with an Introduction and Notes (8vo, pp. 136), and of the tract attributed to Cornelis Meylyn, Broad Advice to the United Netherland Provinces, a Dialogue about the Trade of the West India Company, &c. (8vo, pp. 47). In 1865 he published Anthology of New Netherland, or Translations from the Early Dutch Poets of New York, with Memoirs of their Lives. *A limited edition of this work was published by the Bradford Club (royal 8vo, pp. 206). The poets of whom we have memoirs and translations in this volume are Jacob Steendam, who was a resident in the colony from 1652 to 1660; Henricus Selyns, a native of Amsterdam, who was the only clergyman settled in the ministry in Brooklyn, N. Y., before the Revolution; and Nicasius de Sille, first councillor in the administration of Governor Stuyvesant. Steendam's poem, The Praise of New Netherland, is chiefly devoted to the agricultural products and natural history of the region, while Selyns is a homely moralist and writer of occasional verses. De Sille's few stanzas are found in the manuscript records which he began of the town of New Utrecht, L. I.

 In 1867 appeared his translation, from the Dutch, of a Journal of a Voyage to New York, in 1679-80, of two Labadists, with a history of that strange sect, in Europe and America, by him. It was published in the Memoirs of the Long Island Historical Society. He has, however, particularly interested himself in the early discoveries of our continent; and his Henry Hudson in Holland, printed for private circulation while he was in Holland, is merely a chapter of a larger work which, it is understood, he is soon to publish on the first explorers of the coasts of the United States.

* Proceedings at the Dinner given by the Citizens of Brooklyn, at the Mansion House, on the 5th of August, 1857, to the Hon. Henry C. Murphy, previously to his departure on his Mission as Minister to the Netherlands. 8vo, pp. 90.

CHARLES J. BUSHNELL.

Mr. Bushnell is a native of the city of New York, of New England parentage on the father's side, and descended on the mother's from an old Knickerbocker stock. His father's family resided in Saybrook, Connecticut, and numbered among its members the ingenious mechanician Captain David Bushnell, whose invention of a torpedo, "The American Turtle," is remembered with the history of the American Revolution.

Mr. Bushnell studied law in the office of the late Theodore Sedgwick, in New York, but has not pursued the practice of the profession. His attention was early directed to the study of American history, and particularly to the antiquities of his own city, of which he has collected many curious literary and other memorials. He is also a diligent and experienced collector of coins and medals. He has published, in limited editions, or "privately printed," An Arrangement of Tradesmen's Cards, Political Tokens, also Election Medals, Medalets, &c.; current in the United States of America for the last Sixty Years, described from the Originals, chiefly in the Collection of the Author (1858, 8vo, pp. 126); and a series entitled Crumbs for Antiquarians, including an Historical Account of the First Three Business Tokens issued in the City of New York; Memoirs of Samuel Smith, a Soldier of the Revolution; Journal of Solomon Nash, a Soldier of the Revolution; Memoirs of Tarleton Brown, a Captain in the Revolutionary Army; Life and Adventures of Levi Hansford, a Soldier of the Revolution; Journal of the Expedition to Quebec in 1775, by Major Return J. Meigs; Narrative of the Exertions and Sufferings of Lieut. James Moody in the Cause of the Government since the Year 1776, with an Introduction and Notes. Mr. Bushnell has also edited Recollections of the Jersey Prison-Ship, by Captain Thomas Dring, and the Adventures of Christopher Hawkins, containing Details of his Captivity a First and Second Time on the High Seas in the Revolutionary War by the British, and his consequent Sufferings and Escape from the Jersey Prison-Ship, then lying in the Harbor of New York, by Swimming, now first printed from the Original Manuscript, written by Himself, with an Introduction and Notes, annotated with much diligence; Narrative of Major Abraham Leggett; Narrative of John Blatchford; Memoir of Eli Bickford; The Destructive Operations of Foul Air, Tainted Provisions, Bad Water, and Personal Filthiness upon Human Constitutions, exemplified in the Unparalleled Cruelty of the British to the American Captives at New York, etc.; Narrative of Ebenezer Fletcher, a Soldier of the Revolution.

FRANKLIN B. HOUGH

Was born at Martinsburg, New York, July 20, 1822. His father, Dr. Horatio G. Hough, emigrated from Southwick, Massachusetts, in 1797, and was the first physician who settled in Lewis county, New York. He resided there till his death, September 3, 1830. F. B. Hough, his youngest son, graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1843, and at the Cleveland

Medical College in 1848. He was several years engaged in teaching; practised medicine from 1848 to 1852, at Somerville, New York; resided at Albany from 1854 to 1860; and is now (1873) living at Lowville, Lewis county, New York, chiefly engaged in literary pursuits. He has been a diligent student of the history of the State of New York, and is a proficient in her statistics and antiquities. The following is a list of his publications: A Catalogue of Plants growing without Cultivation in Lewis County, N. Y. (Albany, 1847, 8vo, pp. 36, in the Regent's Report and separately); A History of St. Lawrence and Franklin Counties, N. Y. (Albany, 1853, 8vo, pp. 720, with five maps, nine steel plates, and numerous wood-cuts); A History of Jefferson County, N. Y. (Albany, 1854, 8vo, pp. 602, with six steel plates and many wood-cuts); Results of a Series of Meteorological Observations, made at sundry academies in New York, from 1826 to 1850 (Albany, 1854, 4to, pp. 502; published by legislative authority; second series, 1850 to 1863 (Albany, 1872, 4to, pp. 436); The New York Civil List, containing the names and origin of the civil divisions, and the names and dates of election or appointment of the principal State and county officers, from the Revolution to the present time (Albany, 12mo, Weed, Parsons & Co.). This has passed through seven editions, viz., 1855, pp. 446; 1857, pp. 430; 1858, pp. 444; 1860, pp. 474; 1861, pp. 480; 1862, pp. 487; and 1863, pp. 492. From its being bound in green morocco, it is often called the "Green Book." It has been ordered by the State Legislature many successive years. Census of the State of New York for 1855 (Albany, 1857, fol., pp. 526, by legislative authority); also, Instructions and Circulars for taking the Census, and the Preliminary Report (8vo), of which two editions were issued; A History of Lewis County, N. Y. (Albany, 1860, pp. 320, with twenty-two plates, mostly portraits); Munsell's Guide to the Hudson River (Albany, 1859, 12mo, pp. 58, with eight colored maps); The Comprehensive Farm Record, with Directions for its Use (New York, Saxton, Barker & Co., 1860, 4to, pp. 160). An annotated translation of Banden's "Guerre de Crimée," under the title, On Military and Camp Hospitals, and the Health of Troops in the Field; being the Results of a Commission to inspect the Sanitary Arrangements of the French Army in the Crimean War (12mo, pp. 260, New York, Baillière Brothers, 1862). In the same year Dr. Hough entered the United States volunteer service as regimental surgeon, and served nine months in the campaigns in Virginia and Maryland. A record of this service has appeared from his pen, in a luxuriously printed volume, entitled, History of Duryea's Brigade during the Campaign in Virginia under General Pope, and in Maryland under General McClellan, in the Summer and Autumn of 1862 (8vo, pp. 200, small subscription edition, 1864). In January of the next year (1865) Dr. Hough again took charge of the New York State census, preparing the pamphlet of instructions, &c., by authority of the Legislature.

Of books partly written or edited by Dr. Hough, in addition to the foregoing, the following is a list to the present time: Gazetteer of the State of New York (published under the direction of J. H. French, by R. P. Smith, of Philadelphia, 1860, large 8vo, pp. 740); nearly half of this volume was written by Dr. H., including most of the general articles; Papers Relating to Nantucket, * * * while under the Government of New York (Albany, 1856, large 4to, pp. 164, with map, privately printed for gifts); Papers Relating to Pemaquid, * * * while under the Government of New York (Albany, 1856, printed for the Maine Historical Society, and included in vol. 5 of their collections); Narrative of the Causes which led to Philip's Indian War, by John Easton, with introduction, &c. (Albany, 1858, cap 4to, pp. 208, Munsell's Historical Series, No. 2); Proclamations for Thanksgiving issued by the Continental Congress, President Washington, the National and State Governments on the Peace of 1815, and by the Governors of New York, from the Introduction of the Custom, with those of the several States in 1858, with an Introduction (Albany, 1858, large 8vo, pp. 182); Diary of the Siege of Detroit, in the War with Pontiac, with notes and introduction (Albany, 1860, cap 4to, pp. 304, Munsell's Historical Series, No. 4); Life of Tehoraganegen, alias Thomas Williams, by Rev. Eleazer Williams, the reputed Bourbon (Albany, 1859, 8vo, pp. 92, privately printed); Papers concerning the Attack on Hatfield and Deerfield, by a Party of Indians from Canada, September 19, 1677 (New York, 1859, 8vo, pp. 82; printed by Munsell, of Albany, No. 1 of Bradford Club series); Plan for seizing and sending to New York Colonel William Goffe the Regicide, by John Loudon (historical tract, privately printed); Washingtoniana, a Collection of Memorials upon the Death of General Washington, and the Honors paid to his Memory (two volumes, royal 8vo and 4to). The chief merit claimed for this is a bibliographical list of tracts, &c., published in 1799-1801, embracing orations, eulogies, &c. It also contains a list of coins and medals bearing Washington's portrait. New York Convention Manual: Part 1—Constitutions; Part 2—Statistics, 2 vols, 1867; Besides editing many works on historical and statistical subjects, as well as several memorial volumes, Dr. Hough issued a Gazetteer of the State of New York in 1872, prepared entirely under his own editorial supervision (Albany, 8vo, pp. 740).

JOEL MUNSELL.

Mr. Munsell was born in Northfield, Mass., April 14, 1808. He established himself as a printer in Albany, N. Y., in 1827. From 1841 to 1843 he published and edited the New York State Mechanic. His Annals of Albany, a curious and useful historical compilation, extends to ten volumes, published in the years 1850-58. In 1857 he published a Chronology of Paper and Paper Making, later and enlarged editions of which appeared in 1864, and in 1870. In 1856 he published a volume, The Every Day Book of History and Chronology: embracing the Anniversaries of Venerable Persons and Events in every Period and State of the World, from the Creation to the Present Time (New York, Appletons, 8vo, pp. 537). Mr. Munsell has also rendered an acceptable service to American historical literature by the "Historical Series" which he projected, in which appeared various original works of interest, edited by Dr. F. B. Hough, Winthrop Sargeant, and others. Besides this series, many choice historical publications of the day, of the "Bradford Club," and others, owe their elegance to the press of Mr. Munsell, who has established a reputation for his office in this department of literature. Mr. Munsell's chief publication, of which the four volumes, in royal 8vo, appeared in 1865-71, is of much interest. It is entitled, Collections on the History of Albany, from its Discovery to the Present Time, with Notices of its Public Institutions, and Biographical Sketches of Citizens Deceased. A Manual of the First Lutheran Church in Albany, 1670 to 1870—the oldest in America—appeared in 1871.

HENRY JARVIS RAYMOND.

Mr. Raymond was born in Lima, Livingston County, N. Y., January 24, 1820. His father was a farmer, and the son in his childhood shared in his rural labors. The latter was educated at the academy at Lima, and was sufficiently instructed to become a teacher, at the age of fifteen, of a district school. He subsequently entered the University of Vermont, and graduated at that institution in 1840. He came to New York, studied law in the office of Mr. Edward W. Marsh, supporting himself meanwhile by teaching the classics in a young ladies' seminary, and by contributing to the New Yorker, a literary journal of merit, edited by Horace Greeley. When the latter, in 1841, established The New York Tribune, Mr. Raymond became its assistant editor, and contributed much to its success by his ability as a writer, and particularly by his skill as a reporter, in the more intellectual requirements of the profession. In 1843, he became associated with James Watson Webb in the conduct of his journal, The Courier and Enquirer, writing largely for its pages, and discussing political and other questions in a liberal, philosophical spirit. By temper and education a conservative, he distinguished himself by his advocacy of well-founded religious and social principles, in opposition to such social theories and experiments as those of Fourier and others. A series of controversial articles on "socialism" from his pen, called forth by a newspaper discussion with Horace Greeley, were published in pamphlet form.

Mr. Raymond was elected by the Whigs a member of the New York State Legislature in 1849, and again in 1850, when he was chosen speaker of the Assembly. After a brief visit to Europe, at the close of the season he returned to New York, and in September, 1851, commenced the publication of The New York Times, which he afterwards edited. He was elected Lieutenant-Governor of the State of New York in 1854, and discharged the duties of this office to the expiration of the term, at the close of 1857. He was in the mean time engaged in the organization of the Republican party, drew up The Address to the People, sent forth by its first national convention at Pittsburgh, in 1856, and continued a leading member of its councils.

In 1864 he was elected a Representative to Congress from the city of New York.

In addition to his editorial labors, Mr. Raymond, who was one of the most accomplished orators of the day, has published numerous political speeches and addresses in pamphlet form, and is the author of a Life, Administration, and State Papers of President Lincoln, from Official Documents and Private Papers (New York, 8vo, 1865).

 Mr. Raymond was a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress, 1865-7, and warmly espoused the measures of President Johnson, thus practically separating himself from the Republican party. He assisted in the organization of the "National Union Convention," which met at Philadelphia in August, 1866, and was the author of the "Philadelphia Address" to the people of the United States. At the close of that term, Mr. Raymond resumed his editorial duties, determined to be "once more a journalist, never again to be a politician." The exhaustion of his strength by incessant labors and anxieties led him to seek a few months rest with his family in Europe in 1867. His departure was preceded by the compliment of a farewell dinner from his associates. He soon returned to his duties refreshed in health, and was subsequently called to preside at the farewell dinner given to Charles Dickens by the Press of New York in April, 1868, where he eloquently responded in behalf of "the New York Press." His life was prolonged a year longer, and his decease was most unexpected. "Returning to his residence in West Ninth street at about twelve o'clock on the night of Friday, the 18th of June, 1869, an attack of apoplexy prostrated him in a moment. Two hours later his stertorous breathing attracted the attention of one of his children. The alarmed family, hastening to assist him, found him lying in the hall-way, unconscious, and apparently dying. He had locked the outside door, and closed the inner one. The most eminent medical aid was summoned; but he remained unconscious, and died tranquilly about five o'clock in the morning. Thus ended the earthly life of Henry J. Raymond."* He had just entered on his fiftieth year, and had that morning paid a visit to the grave of a son who had died at the age of fifteen. On the 21st instant appropriate funeral services were performed at the University Place Presbyterian Church, by Rev. Drs. Tyng and Shedd, Revs. Henry Ward Beecher and Alfred A. Kellogg, and the following day he was laid at rest in Greenwood Cemetery.

Perhaps the best tribute to the powers of Hon. H. J. Raymond was from the pen of Horace Greeley: †

"Mr. Raymond's official career, though evincing ability, did less than justice to his comprehensive knowledge and rare intellectual powers. Never so positive and downright in his convictions as his countrymen are apt to be, he was often misjudged as a trimmer and time-server, when in fact he spoke and wrote exactly as he felt and thought. If what he uttered to-day was not in accordance with what he said yesterday, the difference evinced in his essay was a true reflection of one which had preceded it in his mind. He saw both sides of a controverted issue, and if one of them seemed juster to-day, the other might nevertheless command his preference to-morrow. This mental constitution or mental habitude is rare with us, and he would have been more favorably judged as a journalist or politician in Great Britain than in this country. . . . There were probably others who evinced greater ability in some special departments, but, regarding journalism in its broadest aspects, we doubt whether this country has known a journalist superior to Henry J. Raymond. He was an admirable reporter, a discerning critic, a skilful selector and compiler of news, as well as an able and ready writer. There was nothing in the whole range of newspaper work that he could not do well, and (what is of equal importance) with unhesitating promptness. He was never too sick to work when work had to be done, and always able and willing to do any amount of labor that the exigency might require. Others may have evinced a rarer faculty, which some might term genius; but Mr. Raymond embodied talents that have rarely been surpassed.

WILLIAM SWINTON.

Mr. Swinton was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, April 23, 1833. He came in early life to America, and was educated at Amherst College, Massachusetts. He has been a frequent contributor to periodical literature in Putnam's Magazine, the Atlantic Monthly, &c., and has written much for the New York Times. He penned many of the literary articles, which attracted much attention in that journal, in 1858-59. During the war which ensued, he was military editor of the Times, and its special correspondent with the Army of the Potomac, describing most of its campaigns and battles in elaborate articles, distinguished by skill in narration and a critical estimate of men and events. In 1859, Mr. Swinton published in New York a work of English literary criticism, entitled, Rambles among Words, in which he traced their history and commented upon their peculiar force. The book was well received at home, and was republished in London.

 Mr. Swinton published in 1866: The Campaign of the Army of the Potomac: a Critical History of Operations in Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, from the Commencement to the Close of the War, 1861-5; Twelve Decisive Battles of the War: a History of the Eastern and Western Campaigns, in Relation to the Actions that Decided their Issue, 1867; and History of the Seventh Regiment, National Guard, during the War of the Rebellion, 1870. In 1869 Mr. Swinton became professor of Belles-Lettres in the University of California. He has in preparation a series of educational text-books, of a high grade. Some of these have already appeared: Word Analysis; Progressive Grammar; and A Condensed History of the United States.

* Henry J. Raymond, and the New York Press for Thirty Years, by Augustus Maverick, New York, 1870.
† New York Tribune, June 20, 1869.

BUCKINGHAM SMITH.

For the Spanish period or portion of our history, no one has rendered greater services to the cause of American literature than Buckingham Smith, of Florida, whose name happily carries down to the extremity of the Atlantic coast the name of Smith, already identified with Canada, New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

Mr. Smith was born on Cumberland Island, Georgia, in 1810, but was a resident of Florida when it passed into the hands of the United States. He was educated at the Cambridge law-school, and began the practice of his profession in Maine. Entering the field of politics, he became a member of the Assembly, where, with the keen foresight and sound judgment characteristic of the man, he battled manfully against the mad policy which was overwhelming the Territory and State with debts, incurred without reflection or judgment, and for things useless to the people. At a later period he became Secretary of Legation to Spain; and in this congenial land, with all around to recall the heroic pioneers of civilization in Florida, he sought in libraries, public and private archives, in maps, globes, monuments, and family history, whatever bore any relation to the State to which he so entirely belonged.

A similar position in Mexico, where he was for a time Chargé d'Affaires, was similarly improved, and he acquired an immense mass of documents, books, portraits, and monuments of every kind, with that undefinable knowledge of sources and accessories that make a man master of an historic field. His freedom from all jealousy or literary avarice made this knowledge accessible to all; and Sparks, Bancroft, Parkman, and others who have touched the field of Spanish-American history, have been indebted to him for researches, which no other could have made. He has published: The Narrative of Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca (translated, 4to, Washington, 1851); Letter of Hernando de Soto and Memoir of Hernando de Escalante Fontaneda (same, 1854), each issued in 100 copies, at the expense of Geo. W. Riggs, Esq.; Coleccion de Varios Documentos para la Historia de la Florida y tierras adyacentes (4º, Madrid, 1857); Rudo Ensayo, Tentativa de una Prevencional Descripcion Geografica de la Provincia de Sonora, sus Terminos y Confines; ó mejor, Coleccion de Materiales para hacerla quien lo supiere mejor, 5º San Agustin de la Florida, 1863; An Inquiry into the Authenticity of Documents concerning a Discovery in North America, claimed to have been made by Verrazano (New York, 1864); Grammar of the Pima or Nevome, a Language of Sonora, from a Manuscript of the XVII Century (New York, 1862); Doctrina Christiana y Confesionario en Lengua Nevome ó sea la Pima (San Agustin, 1862). He prepared in 1866, to be issued by the Bradford Club of New York, Narratives of the Career of Hernando De Soto in Florida, with a number of documents not before published. These narratives consist of a new translation of the Relaçam, written by one of the company of Portuguese knights and gentlemen who joined in the expedition, covering a period from the time of their departure from Elvas, in 1538, to the arrival of the relics of the army at the city of Mexico, in 1543; and a first direct translation in English of the Relacion of Biedma, a Spanish officer. He died in New York city, January 5, 1871.

GEORGE LONG DUYCKINCK.

George Long Duyckinck, an author and man of letters, was born in the city of New York, October 17, 1823, where his father, Evert Duyckinck, was a leading book publisher, his name being found on the title-page of most of the standard literature issued in the city during the first quarter of the present century. George, the younger of two sons, was educated at Geneva College, New York, and at the University of the City of New York, graduating at the last-named institution in 1843. His tastes and associations inclined him to a literary life, and an extended tour in Europe in 1847 and 1848, after the completion of his legal studies, gave him an opportunity of cultivating in a high degree, and by a diligent study of the works of the best schools, his natural love of art. On his return home, he found a congenial field of labor in the editorship, in conjunction with his elder brother, Evert A. Duyckinck, of the Literary World, a weekly journal, which, from 1848 to 1853, was an influential organ of opinion and criticism, numbering among its contributors many of the best writers of the country. At the close of this publication, with its thirteenth volume, Mr. Duyckinck engaged with his brother in the preparation of the Cyclopædia of American Literature, the first edition of which appeared in 1856, and to which he contributed many of its most thorough and elaborate articles. In the same year he revisited Europe, and upon his return, in 1857, he entered upon a separate career of authorship, in a department most congenial with his habits of thought and his matured convictions. He was, by early education and by deliberate choice, warmly attached to the Liturgy and Order of the Episcopal Church, and especially interested in its biographical literature. To this literature he devoted himself, and, having been elected Treasurer of the Sunday-School Union and Church Book Society, he commenced and prosecuted the task of contributing to the works published by that useful society a series of biographies of the worthies of the Church of England, written in a fresh and attractive style, so as to present their lives in a form calculated to interest readers on this side of the Atlantic, and especially those whose religious training would incline them to their perusal. The first of these biographies was the life of George Herbert, followed, in quick succession, by biographies of Bishop Ken, Latimer, and Jeremy Taylor. These memoirs, though unpretending in form, and not extended beyond the limits of condensed narrative, belong to the best class of biographies, reproducing, with singular fidelity and a rare sympathy, the best traits of the pure and noble characters which they portray. They were received with warm commendation by the most competent critics, and are contributions of high value to the class of works to which they belong, being characterized throughout by the marks of patient and thorough investigation, and by a tender and elevated tone of thought and piety. This well-chosen path of literary labor invited Mr. Duyckinck to further efforts in the same direction, including a life of Archbishop Leighton; but before entering upon its preparation, he was seized with the illness which terminated his life. He died at New York, March 30, 1863, in the fortieth year of his age. The volumes to which this supplement is added bear ample testimony to the patience and fidelity with which he pursued his literary labors.

*EVERT AUGUSTUS DUYCKINCK.

MR. EVERT AUGUSTUS DUYCKINCK, whose name,—with that of his younger brother, George Long Duyckinck,—is borne by the title-page of this work, was born in the city of New York, on the 2d of November, 1816. The family had long been residents in that city, the name appearing in its earliest Dutch annals. Christopher Duyckinck took an active part, on the popular side, in the movements of the Revolution. His son Evert, father of the subject of this notice, about the beginning of the present century became established as a publisher in the book-trade; and for nearly thirty years was actively engaged in the business, being at the time of his retirement the oldest publisher in New York.

Evert A. Duyckinck was educated at Columbia College, New York, a graduate of the class of 1835. After pursuing a course of legal reading in the office of John Anthon, an eminent counsellor of that city, he was admitted to the bar of the State in 1837. He then passed a year in Europe, chiefly in Holland and Great Britain, returning to New York to enter upon the course of literary employments in which, with varying intervals of leisure, he has since been actively engaged. Previously to going abroad he had contributed several articles, on the poet Crabbe, the works of George Herbert, Oliver Goldsmith, etc., to the early numbers of the New York Review. In 1840, with Cornelius Matthews, he entered upon the editorship of a new monthly periodical in New York, entitled, Arcturus, a Journal of Books and Opinion, which was continued through three volumes, closing in May, 1842. To this work he contributed essays, articles on old English authors, and reviews of the rising authors of the time.

After various occasional contributions to the newspaper literature of the day, Mr. Duyckinck, in the early part of 1847, entered upon the editorship of The Literary World, a new weekly review of books, the fine arts, etc., which, with the exception of an interval of about a year, during which the work was conducted by Charles Fenno Hoffman, was carried on by the brothers Duyckinck to the close of 1853. This journal had many eminent contributors; its notices were confined mostly to subjects of permanent value and interest, and it was characterized by its liberal, appreciative tone.

In 1854, the brothers Duyckinck were again united in a work to which their familiarity with the authors of the day, in the conduct of The Literary World, formed a useful preparation. The Cyclopædia of American Literature, projected by the publisher, the late Charles Scribner, was committed to their hands, and for about two years exclusively occupied their attention. The first edition of this work appeared in 1856, and ten years afterwards a Supplement was added by its senior author. To the merits of this standard work, welcomed as it has been by the scholars of this country, it can be scarcely necessary here to allude. Many voluntary testimonials bear witness to the conscientious spirit that animated its editors in their delicate and arduous task. We conceive that the discriminative and courteous tone in which it strives to truthfully narrate and illustrate the progress of our literature, is a happy medium between the laudatory and the censorious extremes of criticism.

Mr. Duyckinck in 1856 edited a volume entitled, Wit and Wisdom of the Rev. Sydney Smith, being Selections from his Writings, and passages of his Letters and Table Talk, with a Biographical Memoir and Notes, a work which has passed through several editions. In 1862 he became engaged in writing the letter-press to the National Portrait Gallery of Eminent Americans, issued by Messrs. Johnson, Fry & Co., New York, in two volumes, quarto, a series of Biographies, from the Revolutionary era to the present day, of which over a hundred thousand copies have been issued. He has also edited a contemporary History of the War for the Union, in three quarto volumes, as well as a History of the World, in four volumes, mainly arranged from the Encyclopædia Britannica, both for the same publishers, who have also now (1873) in course of publication from his pen an extensive series of Biographies of Eminent Men and Women of Europe and America, in two volumes, quarto.

Among other miscellaneous literary productions, Mr. Duyckinck has edited, with a memoir and notes, Poems, Relating to the American Revolution, by Philip Freneau, New York, 1865; and the American edition of Poets of the Nineteenth Century. He is also the author of a Memorial of John Allan, an eminent New York book-collector, printed by the Bradford Club in 1864; and Memorials of Francis L. Hawks, D. D., and Henry Theodore Tuckerman, read before the New York Historical Society, and printed for that institution.

*FREDERICK BUTLER.

FREDERICK BUTLER, a New England writer of a half century since, who has written on historical and agricultural topics, has hitherto escaped the notice of writers on American biography and bibliography. The accessible data of his life and writings are but scanty. He was born about 1766-7, and was graduated at Yale College in 1795, being at that time a resident of Hartford, Connecticut. He published the following works: A Complete History of the United States to 1820; Hartford, 1821, and Elizabeth, New Jersey, 1822 (3 vols., 8vo., pp. 468, 459, 459); The Farmers' Manual; or, The Art of Hus- bandy, with a Treatise on the Management of Bees; Weathersfield, Connecticut, 1821 (16mo., pp. 224); and Memoirs of the Marquis de Lafayette, and his Tour in the United States, with plates; Weathersfield, 1825 (12mo., pp. 418).

* JAMES RUSH,

A SON of Dr. Benjamin Rush, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Philadelphia, March 1, 1786. He was educated at the College of New Jersey, in the class of 1805. After graduating, he studied medicine with his father, and received his degree in medicine from the University of Pennsylvania in 1809. His studies were continued at Edinburgh, Scotland, and he subsequently practiced his profession for some years in his native city. By his marriage to Miss Phœbe Ann Ridgway, who gained much celebrity as a brilliant leader of fashionable circles, he became possessed of a princely fortune; but he chose to lead a very retired and studious life. He is the author of four works of varying value, of which the first alone has been accepted as a standard authority: Philosophy of the Human Voice, 1827; Hamlet, a Dramatic Prelude, 1834; Analysis of the Human Intellect, 2 vols., 8vo, 1865; and Rhymes of Contrast on Wisdom and Folly, a series of verses in the form of a narrative dialogue, designed to illustrate some of the abstruse views of his philosophical books.

Dr. Rush died in Philadelphia, at the age of eighty-three, May 26, 1869. By his will he left his estate, valued at a million dollars, for the endowment of a library, which, at the option of the Library Company of Philadelphia, is to be either a branch of the latter, or else an independent institution. Some onerous conditions were attached to the acceptance of the bequest, including the use of a building site far from the centre of population; and after a course of legal proceedings, the question of its ultimate acceptance yet remains in abeyance.

Among the singular provisions of the testator, was one requiring stated issues of his own writings during the ensuing half-century, in editions of five hundred copies, to be sold at their cost price; and the following, whose singularity of opinion excited the criticism of the public press:

“Let it be a favor for the eminent works of fiction to be found upon its shelves; but let it not keep cushioned seats for time-wasting and lounging readers, nor places for every-day novels, mind-tainting reviews, controversial politics, scribbles of poetry and prose, biographies of unknown names, nor for those teachers of disjointed thinking, the daily newspapers, except perhaps for reference to support, since such an authority could never prove the authentic date of an event.”

* L. Q. C. ELMER.

LUCIUS QUINTUS CINCINNATUS ELMER, the son of an original member of the Society of Cincinnati, was born at Bridgeton, New Jersey, February 3, 1793. He was educated in the schools of that town, as well as at Woodbury, Bordentown, and Philadelphia. Although not a collegiate graduate, he received the honorary degree of A. M. from Princeton in 1824, and that of LL. D. in 1865. He served in the militia during the war of 1812 as lieutenant of artillery, and was promoted to the rank of Brigade Major and Inspector. On the return of peace he was admitted to the bar of his native State; and he was a member of the assembly from 1821-3. He was U. S. Attorney for New Jersey during the terms of Presidents Monroe and Jackson, a member of Congress for one session, 1844-6, and was twice appointed Justice of the Supreme Court, for the term of seven years—in 1852, and in 1869. In the latter year he retired from public life. He was a trustee in Princeton College from 1829 till his resignation in 1864.

His father, Dr. Jonathan Elmer, delivered An Eulogium on the Character of Gen. George Washington, at Bridge Town, Cumberland County, New Jersey, January 30, 1800 (8 vo, pp. 25), copies of which are now rarely to be met with.

Judge Elmer celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his marriage at his residence in Bridgeton, October 6, 1868. Two unmarried daughters, and two married daughters with their families, were present, including nine grandchildren.

He is the author of several works: A Digest of the Laws of New Jersey, 1838; a Genealogical and Biographical Account of the Elmer Family; History of Cumberland County, 1869; History of the Constitution of New Jersey adopted in 1776, and of the Government under it, 1870; Eulogium on Hon. Garret D. Wall, delivered before the Bench and Bar of New Jersey, at Trenton, April 2, 1871 (8 vo, pp. 44); and Reminiscences of the Bench and Bar of New Jersey, printed by the Historical Society, 1872.

* WILLIAM WILLIS,

An accurate antiquarian investigator and historian, traced his paternal ancestry to Michael Willis, a cutler of Dorchester, Massachusetts, and one of the founders of the Second Church in Boston, June 5, 1650. He was born at Haverhill, Massachusetts, August 31, 1794. He was prepared at Exeter Academy for an entrance into the Sophomore class of Harvard College, and took his first degree in 1813. While studying for the legal profession, he made a voyage to Portugal in 1815, returning by way of Norfolk, Virginia; and shortly after his admittance to the bar, in 1817, he visited the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe in the West Indies. In 1819, at the invitation of Hon. Prentiss Mellen, who had been his preceptor, he removed to Portland for the practice of his profession; and sixteen years later he entered into a copartnership, which continued nearly twenty years, with the late Hon. William Pitt Fessenden, a distinguished senator from Maine. “As a lawyer, Mr. Willis stood high; a practitioner of sterling integrity, gentle and pleasing in address, a sound and safe counsellor, he had few superiors.”

“In the prosperity of the Maine Historical Society he was much interested, and was elected a member in 1828, six years after its formation. In the first volume of its Collections, published in 1831, appeared Part I. of his History of Portland; Part II. being published in a separate form two years later. He has been the chief editor of all the publications of the Society, and to most of them a valuable contributor. The second volume, published in 1847, contained Supplementary Remarks to an Account of an Ancient Settlement on Shepscot River, and an appreciative notice of the character and writings of William Ladd, of Minot, both from his pen, while the fourth volume contains a most valuable contribution to American philology in an Essay on the Language of the Abnauquis Indians, with an appendix, in the shape of a letter to the author, from the late Hon. Chandler E. Potter, of New Hampshire; and an introductory address which he was invited to deliver before the Historical Society at its first public meeting, in Augusta, February 2, 1855, in which he gives a rapid glance at the history and statistics of the State and the requirements of the Society. In 1831, he had been elected Recording Secretary, and annually re-elected until 1834, the last year holding at the same time the office of Treasurer. In 1846, he was again chosen to the position of Secretary, and continued discharging the duties of this post until 1856, when he succeeded Hon. Robert H. Gardiner as President, and was successively re-elected until 1865, when he resigned and Hon. Edward E. Bourne was chosen his successor. Upon his accession to the President's chair he delivered an inaugural address dedicated to the memory of his predecessors in that office. A copy of this address he kindly sent me a few years since, enriched, not 'defaced' as he termed it, with his manuscript notes and additions. He had used it, he wrote me, in the preparation of A History of the Law, the Courts, and the Lawyers of Maine, an octavo volume of over seven hundred pages, published in 1863. In 1858, he delivered an interesting and valuable address on the Scotch-Irish emigration to Maine, giving incidentally a brief account of Presbyterianism, to which he subsequently added a Genealogy of the M'Kinstry Family, a second edition of which, much enlarged, was printed in 1866, and a copy presented by the author is in our library. His last literary enterprise for the Historical Society was the supervision last year (1869) of Dr. J. G. Kohl's learned history of the Discovery of Maine, forming the first documentary history of the State, published under the authority of the Legislature, which made a special appropriation for the purpose, and sent the Rev. Dr. Leonard Woods, late President of Bowdoin College, to Europe, to investigate the subject and secure every document and paper calculated to throw light upon it. To the Register of the N. E. Historic-Genealogical Society, of which he was from 1855 to 1859 one of the Vice-Presidents, he made many interesting contributions, the last to the number for April, 1869, entitled A Summary of Voyages to the Northern Atlantic Coast of America in the Sixteenth Century, based upon the work of Dr. Kohl just mentioned. He also wrote a Bibliographical Essay on the Early Collections of Voyages to America, a very careful and able paper, which was printed in the fifteenth volume of the Register. To the Historical Magazine or American Notes and Queries, for January, 1868, he contributed a Sketch of the Origin and Progress of the Maine Historical Society, and to No. 4. of Norton's Literary Letter, published at New York in 1859, a Bibliography of the State of Maine, a copy of which, with manuscript additions by himself, he presented to this Society. He was engaged upon an enlarged and revised edition of this work at the time of his death. The only works of Mr. Willis not enumerated that I can now recall are Smith's and Deane's Journal, which he prepared for the press in 1849, with notes and biographical sketches, and a new edition of his History of Portland, a large volume of nearly one thousand pages, which appeared in 1865. The entire edition of this work which remained in the hands of the publisher, was utterly consumed in the great Portland fire of July 4, 1866.

"Mr. Willis was intrusted by his fellow-townsmen with many important and honorable positions. In 1855, he was a Senator in the Legislature of Maine, and in 1857, Mayor of the city of Portland, and was chosen an Elector of President of the United States in 1860, and appointed President of the Electoral College. He was for many years a Director and Vice-President of the Merchants' Bank of Portland, and President of the Portland Benevolent Society, and also of the Portland Institute, the latter taking the place of a public library. His last public act was as pall-bearer at the obsequies of Mr. Peabody, and in consequence of his fast declining strength, he alone was provided with a seat. Two years ago, Bowdoin College conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws, a well-merited and richly deserved distinction. He was a member of nearly all of the State Historical Societies, including that of Massachusetts. At the annual meeting of this Society, in December, 1867, he was selected as one of its honorary Vice-Presidents, and promptly accepted the position." *

Mr. Willis died at his residence in Portland, February 17, 1870, at the age of seventy-six, "of pure physical exhaustion induced by unceasing activity of brain," after an illness of only half a day. He bequeathed a large portion of his collection of books to the Public Library of that city.

 DORUS CLARKE.

REV. DORUS CLARKE, D. D., was born in West-hampton, Massachusetts, January 2, 1797. His ancestry on both sides were distinguished for those Puritan principles which have given to New England its proverbially distinctive character. He graduated at Williams College in 1817, and three years later at the Theological Seminary at Andover. To qualify himself more fully for his chosen profession, he accompanied the Rev. Asahel Nettleton, D. D., from place to place, to observe his method of preaching as an evangelist, in the revivals of religion then prevailing in Massachusetts and Connecticut. He also placed himself under the instruction of the Rev. Edmund D. Griffin, D. D., the newly appointed president of Williams College, and one of the most distinguished pulpit orators of that day. On the 5th of February, 1823, he was settled in the ministry as pastor of the Congregational church in Blandford, Massachusetts. After a pastorate of twelve years, he accepted a call to the Fourth Congregational Church in Springfield. While there he published a series of Letters to the Hon. Horace Mann, Secretary to the Massachusetts Board of Education, then recently formed, upon the proper relations of that board to the matter of religious instruction in the schools of that State. He also prepared a volume of Lectures to Young People in Manufacturing Villages, with an introduction by the Rev. Amos Blanchard, D. D., of Lowell, which passed through two editions, one in Boston and another in New York. In 1841, Dr. Clarke removed to Boston to become associate editor and proprietor of The New England Puritan, a religious newspaper, published under the auspices of the Congregationalists. For several years he was engaged in editorial duties in connection with the religious press, both in Boston and New York. Subsequently he published a volume of miscellaneous articles, which had already appeared in the periodicals of the day, entitled: Fugitives from the Escrioire of a Retired Editor, 1864 (12 mo., pp. 235). In the more elaborate papers in that volume, may be found the author's views upon some of the profoundest problems of ethical and theological science. He also published The Oneness of the Christian Church, 1869 (12 mo., pp. 105); and Orthodox Congregationalism and the Sects, 1871 (12mo., pp. 169). Both these works have reached a second edition.

* A Tribute to the Memory of Hon. William Willis, LL. D., of Portland, Maine. Read before the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia, at its Stated Meeting, Thursday Evening, March 3, 1870. By Charles Henry Hart, Historiographer of the Society. Philadelphia, 1870; pp. 8.

Since 1868, Dr. Clarke has been the historiographer of the New England Historic, Genealogical Society. A large number of biographical sketches of deceased members of that society, from his pen, have appeared in the New England Historical and Genealogical Register.

* MARSHALL P. WILDER.

MARSHALL PINCKNEY WILDER was born September 22, 1798, in Rindge, New Hampshire, where his father, Samuel Locke Wilder (named for his uncle, Rev. Samuel Locke, D. D., president of Harvard College), was a merchant. Marshall received his education in the town schools, excepting one year at the New Ipswich Academy, and a brief period spent in the study of the languages under the instruction of Rev. Joseph Brown. At the age of sixteen, he chose to be a farmer, in preference to the alternatives of a college education, or a mercantile life; but the rapid increase of his father's business led to his admission into the firm at the age of twenty-one. In 1825, he removed to Boston; and by an extended and prosperous business he has accumulated a handsome property. He is now the senior partner in the house of Parker, Wilder & Co., as well as a director in many financial and commercial institutions.

But trade and the acquisition of wealth have not been the all-engrossing pursuits of his life. He early devoted a large portion of his leisure to agriculture and horticulture. His fame in these sciences has not been confined to this country. One of the most eminent agriculturists of England spoke of him recently as: "One who by his zeal, industry and determination has not only conferred lasting benefits on his country, but has, by careful researches in hybridization and fruit culture, laid the horticulturists of all nations under heavy obligations." For eight years he was president of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society; for twenty years president of the Norfolk Agricultural Society; for six years president of the United States Agricultural Society, of which he was founder. He was also a founder of the American Pomological Society, and has been its president from its organization in 1848 to the present time.

He was enrolled in the New Hampshire militia at sixteen years of age, and had attained the rank of colonel before his removal from that State. After declining four annual nominations, he accepted in 1857 the command of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, the oldest military corps in the New World, as it was organized at Boston in 1638, eight years after that town was founded. A number of political offices have also been given to him, such as State senator and member of the Governor's council. He was president of the Massachusetts senate in 1850, and was succeeded by Hon. Henry Wilson, now Vice-President of the United States.

The "Sons of New Hampshire" residing in Boston have had two public festivals in that city. The first, held November 7, 1849, was presided over by the eminent statesman, Daniel Webster. At the second, November 2, 1853, a year after Mr. Webster's death, Mr. Wilder, who had been a vice-president four years previous, was chosen to preside. On that occasion he delivered an eloquent and able address, containing a touching reference to the departed and lamented patriot.

The two hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the settlement of Dorchester, Massachusetts, was celebrated on the 4th of July, 1855. Edward Everett, a native of that town, was the orator of the day, while Mr. Wilder was the president, and delivered an eloquent address.

In January 1868, he was chosen president of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, vacated by the death of John A. Andrew, the celebrated war-governor of Massachusetts, and has been annually re-elected. Through his efforts, the Society has been enabled to purchase and refit a building for its use at a cost of forty thousand dollars, and to establish a fund of thirteen thousand dollars toward the support of a librarian. He has annually delivered an address explaining the objects, and eloquently pressing the claims, of the Society, as a conservator of the history of New England.

The orations and addresses of Mr. Wilder, if collected, would fill several volumes, and would be a valuable legacy to posterity, replete as they are with enlarged and practical views, the result of original thought and an extensive acquaintance with the world.*

* The following are some of his principal writings: Historical Addresses and Lectures: On laying the Corner-Stone of the first Massachusetts Horticultural Hall, Boston, 1844; Before the Sons of New Hampshire, Boston, 1849; As President of the Sons of New Hampshire, Boston, 1853; On the Reception of the Members of N. H. Legislature—Obsequies of Webster, Boston, 1852; On the 225th Anniversary of the Settlement of Dorchester, 1855; Annual Addresses before the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, Boston, 1868-73; Lecture on California, delivered in various cities, Boston, 1871; Lecture on the Hybridization of Plants, Boston, 1872; On the Progress and Influence of Rural Art; Boston, 1872; Speech at the 25th Anniversary of the Essex Institute, Salem, 1873.

Agricultural Addresses: Before the Norfolk Society at Dedham, at its Organization, 1849; Before the Bristol Society at Taunton, 1849; Speech in the Massachusetts Senate for an Agricultural College, 1850; Before the Berkshire Society at Pittsfield, 1851; Before the Hampshire Society at Amherst, 1851; Before the Massachusetts Board of Agriculture at Framingham, 1863; Before the New Hampshire Agricultural Society, at Manchester, 1851; Before the same at Pittsfield,

 JOHN A. DIX.

JOHN ADAMS DIX, who has won distinction by his administrative abilities in public life and in the military service during the late rebellion, was born in Boscawen, New Hampshire, July 24, 1798. He attended the academies at Salisbury and Exeter, N. H., and spent one year in a French college at Montreal. In 1812, he entered the Military Academy at West Point, but left it soon after, on the declaration of war against Great Britain, to enlist as an ensign.

John A. Dix

He was appointed an engineer in the Fourteenth Regular Infantry in 1813, and succeeded to a second lieutenancy the year after. In 1819, he became aide-de-camp to General Brown, then commander-in-chief, and six years later captain of artillery. He had meanwhile prepared himself for the legal profession, and in 1823, after his return from a visit to Cuba and Europe, he resigned his military commission, and settled at Cooperstown, New York. About this time, he published his first work, on the Resources of the City of New York, 1827. He received the degree of Master of Arts from Brown University in 1820, and that of Doctor of Laws from Geneva College in 1845.

1870; At the Graduation of the first class of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, at Amherst, 1871.

Addresses before the American Pongological Society: On the Inauguration of the Society, at New York, 1848; At its meeting in New York, 1849; At Philadelphia — Eulogy on Andrew Jackson Downing, 1852; At Boston, 1854; At Rochester, New York, 1856; At New York, 1858; At Philadelphia, 1860; At Boston, 1862; At St. Louis, 1867; At Philadelphia, 1869; At Richmond, 1871; At Boston, 1873.

Addresses before the United States Agricultural Society: At its formation, Washington, D. C., 1852; At Washington, 1853; At its First Exhibition, Springfield, Massachusetts, 1853; At Washington, 1854; At its Second Exhibition, Springfield, Ohio, 1854; At Washington, 1855; At its Third Exhibition, Boston, Massachusetts, 1855; At Washington, 1856-7; At its National Field Trial of Reapers and Mowers, Syracuse, New York, 1857; At its Fifth Exhibition, Louisville, Kentucky, 1857; At Washington, 1858; At Philadelphia, 1856.

Mr. Dix was speedily called to a number of public positions, and discharged all their duties with fidelity and zeal. In 1830, he became Adjutant-General of the State; and three years later, Secretary of State, ex-officio, Superintendent of Common Schools, a member of the Canal Board, and a Commissioner of the Canal Fund. In connection with these official duties, he published in 1837, Decisions of the Superintendent of Common Schools, New York, and the Laws relating to Common Schools. He was elected to the Assembly from Albany county in 1842, and three years later was chosen to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate, caused by the election of Silas Wright as Governor of the State, 1845-9. During that exciting period, he took a prominent part in the debates concerning the annexation of Texas, the war with Mexico, the Oregon boundary line, and the admission of slavery into the Territories. On his retirement, he visited the Madeira islands and the Continent, writing a description of his travels in a volume entitled: A Winter in Madeira, and a Summer in Spain and Florence, 1850. President Pierce tendered him the appointment of Secretary of State in 1852, which he declined in favor of Hon. William L. Marcy, becoming instead, for a short period, Assistant U. S. Treasurer in New York. In 1860 he was appointed Postmaster of New York city; and from January to March, 1861, he consented to fill the vacated post of Secretary of the Treasury in President Buchanan's cabinet. It was at this time of public danger and despondency that he sent that famous and characteristic despatch to W. H. Jones, then special agent of the Department at New Orleans, when informed that Captain Breshwood refused to obey instructions: "If any one attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot!"

In May, 1861, he was appointed Major-General of Volunteers, with his headquarters at Baltimore, and subsequently he commanded at Fortress Monroe and the peninsula. In September, 1862, he received the command of the Seventh Army Corps, and was, immediately after the draft riots in New York, July, 1863, transferred to the Department of the East, with his headquarters in that city. He resigned his commission the same year and became a leader of the War Democracy, which co-operated in the re-election of President Lincoln. He was chairman of the National Union Convention at Philadelphia, August 14, 1866, and served as Minister to France for two years, 1867-9. He held the presidency of the New York and Erie Railroad for a short term in 1872, and was elected that same year Governor of New York, by a large popular majority. In 1864 his Speeches and Occasional Addresses were published in two octavo volumes. They chiefly related to the leading questions of the day discussed by him while representing the State of New York in the U. S. Senate, to which are added some lectures and addresses delivered before prominent societies.

 CHARLES HUDSON

Is the only son of Stephen Hudson, a revolutionary soldier, who was taken prisoner by the British and incarcerated in the "Philadelphia Jail." Charles was born November 14, 1795, at Marlboro', Massachusetts, and a part of that town has since been incorporated as Hudson, in his honor. He was a teacher in early life, and afterwards a student in theology. He was settled in Westminster over a society of Restorationists, of which he was pastor twenty years. He represented that town four years in the Massachusetts House of Representatives; the county of Worcester six years in the Senate, and three years in the executive council; and his district eight years in the United States Congress. On leaving Congress, he was appointed naval officer of the port of Boston. He has also been a member of the State Board of Education, an United States assessor of internal revenue, and has filled other public stations. In 1849, he removed from Westminster to Lexington, where he now resides. For a number of years he edited the Boston Daily Atlas, a Whig newspaper.

Mr. Hudson is the author of a History of Westminster (1832, 8vo., pp. 32); Historical Address at the Centennial at Westminster (1859, 8vo., pp. 128); History of Marlboro' (1862, 8vo., pp. 544); History of Lexington (1868, 8vo., pp. 449), to which is appended a Genealogical Register of Lexington Families (pp. 296); Doubts Concerning the Battle of Bunker Hill (1857, 12mo.); Letters to Rev. Hosea Ballou (1827, 12mo., pp. 300); Reply to Walter Balfour (1829, 16mo.); Sacred Memoirs (2 vols., 12mo.), and a series of Sunday-school text-books (4 vols., 30 to 130 pages each). He has prepared Congressional reports on the Protective Policy; legislative reports on Capital Punishment, The North-Eastern Boundary, and The Incompetency of Witnesses on Account of Religious Belief; besides numerous articles for periodicals and newspapers. The amount of printed matter of which he is the author exceeds four thousand pages. His works all give evidence of conscientious care and fidelity to truth. "He has shown great industry in every position in which he has been placed," states a friend. "His life has been one of toil, and few persons have performed as much labor, both bodily and mental, as he has."

 AMOS BRONSON ALCOTT,

"A PHILOSOPHER devoted to the science of education,"* was born at Wolcott, Connecticut, November 29, 1799. His early manhood was given to the teaching of young children, in which he achieved a large measure of success, at first in his native State till 1828, and subsequently in Boston. In that connection, he published two little volumes in 1836, entitled Conversations with Children on the Gospels.

Mr. Alcott subsequently removed to Concord, where he became a contributor to the Dial, and gave his time to the study and discussion of the chief reformatory measures of the age. In 1842 he attempted, with several English friends, to establish a new community on a farm called "Fruitlands," at Harvard; but the project was soon abandoned. He has since been a resident of Boston, and has led, as his friend states, "the life of a Peripatetic philosopher, conversing in cities and in villages, wherever invited, on divinity, on human nature, on ethics, on dietetics, and a wide range of practical questions. These conversations, which were at first casual, gradually assumed a more formal character, the topics being often printed on cards, and the company meeting at a fixed time and place.† Mr. Alcott attaches great importance to diet and government of the body; still more to race and complexion. He is an idealist, and we should say platonist, if it were not doing injustice to give any name implying secondariness to the highly original habit of his salient and intuitive mind."

Amos Bronson Alcott.

He is the author of two scholarly and meditative volumes. Tablets, 1868, is a discussion of various subjects grouped into two books, termed practical and speculative, such as the garden, which is latitudinarian enough to include the orchard and rural culture; recreation, fellowship, books and councils; mind, instruments, genesis, etc. Concord Days, 1872, under the headings of the months from April to September, groups together many charming fragmentary papers on literary subjects, like Thoreau, Margaret Fuller, Plato, Goethe, and Carlyle; on rural affairs, speculative philosophy, etc.

 SCHOLARSHIP—FROM CONCORD DAYS.

Wednesday April, 28.

Apart they sit, the better know,
Why towns and talk away men below,

Freedom from affairs, and leisure to entertain his thoughts, is the scholar's paradise. Hardly less the delight in comparing notes with another in conversation. It is the chiefest of satisfactions this last, where sympathy is possible and perfect. One does not see his thought distinctly till it is reflected in the image of another's. Personal perspective gives the distance necessary to bring out its significance. "There are some," says Thoreau, "whose ears help me so much that my things have a rare significance when I read to them. It is almost too good a hearing, so that, for the time, I regard my writing from too favorable a point of view." Yet the criticism of admiration is far more acceptable and the more likely to be just than that of censure. Much learning does not make an accomplished critic; taste, sensibility, sympathy, ideality, are indispensable. A man of talent may apprehend and judge fairly of works of his class. But genius alone comprehends and appreciates truly the works of genius.

* Biographical sketch in Appleton's Cyclopædia, vol. i, by Ralph Waldo Emerson.

† A recent conversational tour in the West by Mr. Alcott, is described in the Springfield Republican, April 11, 1873.

Nor are all moods equally favorable for criticism. "It may be owing to my mood at the time," says Goethe, "but it seems to me, that as well in treating of writings as of actions, unless one speak with a loving sympathy, a certain enthusiasm, the result is so defective as to have little value. Pleasure, delight, sympathy in things, is all that is real; and that reproduces reality in us; all else is empty and vain." One must seize the traits as they rise with the tender touch, else they elude and dissolve in a moment; pass into the obscurity out of which they emerged, and are lost forever. Much depends upon this, that one make the most of his time, and miss no propitious moods.

Rarely does one win a success with either tongue or pen. Of the books printed, scarcely never the volume entire justifies its appearance in type. Much is void of deep and permanent significance, touches nothing in one's experience, and fails to command attention. Even subjects of gravest quality, unless treated suggestively, find no place in a permanent literature. It is not enough that the thing is literally defined, stated logically; it needs to be complemented ideally, — set forth in lucid imagery, — to tell the story to the end. Style carries weight oftentimes when seemingly light itself. Movement is necessary, while the logic is unapparent, — all the more profound and edifying as it appeals to and speaks from the deeper instincts, and so makes claims upon the reader's mind. That is good which stands strong in its own strength, detached from local relations. So a book of thoughts suggests thought, edifies, inspires. Whatever interests at successive readings has life in it, and deserves type and paper.

My code of composition stands thus, and this is my advice to whom it may concern: —

Burn every scrap that stands not the test of all moods of criticism. Such lack longevity. What is left gains immensely. Such is the law. Very little of what is thought good at the writing holds good over night. Sleep on your writing; take a walk over it; scrutinize it of a morning; review it of an afternoon; digest it after a meal; let it sleep in your drawer a twelvemonth; never venture a whisper about it to your friend, if he be an author especially. You may read selections to sensible women, — if young the better; and if it stand these trials, you may offer it to a publisher, and think yourself fortunate if he refuse to print it. Then you may be sure you have written a book worthy of type, and wait with assurance for a publisher and reader thirty years hence, — that is, when you are engaged in authorship that needs neither type or publisher.

"Learning," says Fuller, "hath gained most by those books by which the printers have lost." It must be an enlightened public that asks for works the most enlightened publishers decline printing. A magazine were ruined already if it reflected its fears only. Yet one cannot expect the trade to venture reputation or money in spreading unpopular views.

Ben Jonson wrote to his bookseller: —

"Thou that mak'st gain thy end, and wisely well
Call st a book good or bad, as it doth sell,
Use mine so too; I give thee leave, but crave
For the luck's sake, it thus much favor have; —
To lie upon thy stall, till it be sought,
Not offered as it made suit to be bought;
Nor have my title-page on poets or walls,
Or in clef-sticks advanced to make calls
For terms, or some clerk-like serving man
Who scarce can spell the hard names, whose knight less can.
If, without these vile arts it will not sell,
Send it to Bucklersbury, there 't will, well."

Time is the best critic, and the better for his intolerance of any inferiority. And fortunate for literature that he is thus choice and exacting. Books, like character, are works of time, and must run the gauntlet of criticism to gain enduring celebrity. The best books may sometimes wait for their half century, or longer, for appreciative readers — create their readers; the few ready to appreciate these at their issue being the most enlightened of their time, and they diffuse the light to their circle of readers. The torch of truth thus transmitted sheds its light over hemispheres, — the globe at last.

"Hail! native language, that with sinews weak
Didst move my first endeavoring tongue to speak,
And mad'st imperfect words with childish trips
Half unpronounced slide through my infant lips,
Driving dull silence from the portal door
Where he had mutely sat two years before —
Here I salute thee, and thy pardon ask
That now I use thee in my latter task.
Now haste thee strait to do me once a pleasure,
And from thy wardrobe bring thy chiefest treasure,
Not those new-fangled toys, and trimming slight,
Which takes our late fantasies with delight,
But call those richest robes, and gay'st attire,
Which deepest spirits and choicest wits admire."

Thus wrote Milton at the age of nineteen, and made his college illustrious and the language afterwards. Yet the purest English is not always spoken or written by graduates of universities. Speech is the fruit of breeding and of character, and one shall find sometimes in remote rural districts the language spoken in its simplicity and purity, especially by sprightly boys and girls who have not been vexed with their grammars and school tasks. Ours is one of the richest of the spoken tongues; it may not be the simplest in structure and ease of attainment; yet this last may be facilitated by simple and natural methods of studying it. Taught by masters like Ascham or Milton, students might acquire the art of speaking and of writing the language in its purity and elegance, as did these great masters in their day. Ascham lays down this sensible rule: "He that will write well in any tongue, must follow this advice of Aristotle: 'to speak as the common people do, to think as wise men do, and so should every man understand him, and the judgment of wise men about him.'"

George Chapman, the translator of Homer, thus speaks of the scholarly pedantries of his time, of which ours affords too many examples: —

"For as great clerks can use no English words,
Because (alas! great clerks) English affords,
Say they, no height nor copy, — a rude tongue,
Since 't is their native, — but, in Greek and Latin
Their wits are rare, for thence true poesy sprung,
Through which, truth knows, they have but skill to chat in,
Compared with what they might have in their own."

Camden said, "that though our tongue may not be as sacred as the Hebrew, nor as learned as the Greek, yet it is as fluent as the Latin, as courteous as the Spanish, as court-like as the French, and as amorous as the Italian; so that, being beautified and enriched out of these tongues, partly by enfranchising and endenizing foreign words, partly by implanting new ones with artful composition, our tongue is as copious, pithy, and significant as any in Europe."

If one would learn its riches at sight, let him glance along the pages of Richardson's Dictionary; and at the same time survey its history from Gower and Chaucer down to our time.

"If there be, what I believe there is," says Dr. Johnson, "in every nation, a style which never becomes obsolete, a certain mode of phraseology so component and congenial to the analogy and principles of its respective language as to remain settled and unaltered, this style is probably to be sought in the common intercourse of life, among those who speak only to be understood, without ambition of eloquence. The polite are always catching modish expressions, and the learned depart from established forms of speech, in hope of finding or making it better; those who wish for distinction forsake the vulgar when the vulgar is right; but there is a conversation above grossness and below refinement, where propriety resides, and where Shakespeare seems to have gathered his comic dialogues. He is therefore more agreeable to the ears of the present age than any other author equally remote, and among his other excellences deserves to be studied as one of the original masters of the language."

* ROBERT DALE OWEN.

ROBERT DALE OWEN was born November 7, 1801, in the city of Glasgow, Scotland. His paternal ancestors, as the name indicates, were Welsh. His father, Robert Owen, born in Newtown, Montgomeryshire, North Wales, a well-known philanthropist and reformer, was the founder of Infant Schools and the advocate of co-operative labor. On the mother's side, his ancestors were from the Highlands of Scotland; his great-great-grandfather, the Hon. Colin Campbell of Ardmaddie, being the youngest son of John Campbell of Glenorchy, first Earl of Breadalbane. The son of this Colin Campbell was cashier of the Royal Bank of Scotland, and saved a large sum of money to the Government, during the rebellion of 1745, by conveying the specie belonging to his bank to the Castle of Edinburgh, which held out against the Pretender. Mr. Owen's grandfather, David Dale (from whom he derives his middle name), married the cashier's daughter. Mr. Dale was a self-made man of humble birth, who worked his way to riches and position; ere he had passed middle age he was already a wealthy merchant and bank-director. In connection with Sir Richard Arkwright, the inventor of the spinning-jenny, he built the village and cotton mills of New Lanark, where fifteen hundred work-people were employed. Mr. Owen's father married Mr. Dale's eldest daughter, and purchased from Mr. Dale the New Lanark establishment, which he conducted for nearly thirty years, amassing a large fortune, while also greatly improving the condition of his work-people. All the children of the villagers, from the age of two years to twelve, were educated gratuitously, and free evening schools were established for the young men and women employed in the mills. Intemperance was eradicated, and the establishment became celebrated for the order, intelligence, and good conduct of the operatives.

Robert Dale Owen

In this village Robert Dale Owen was brought up, chiefly under a private tutor, until the age of seventeen, when he was sent to complete his education at the college of Hofwyl, situated two leagues from Berne, in Switzerland. That institution had then a world-wide reputation, having been founded by the celebrated M. de Fellenberg, a Bernese Patrician, who still continued its president. It was peculiar in this, that it was entirely self-governing, the students enacting and enforcing their own laws. Mr. Owen remained there upwards of three years. He has recently written a full account of the College.*

Mr. Owen came to this country in 1825, and has been a citizen of the United States ever since. His residence, for upwards of forty-five years, has been at New Harmony, in South-western Indiana, where his father had bought in 1824, from Rapp and his German community, a village capable of containing eight hundred people, together with twenty thousand acres of land. Robert Owen had intended to reside there; but finding that the climate did not suit his health, he returned to England, leaving the property in charge of his sons.

Mr. R. D. Owen was elected a member of the Legislature of Indiana in 1835, and he was twice re-elected. During his term of service he procured, after a stormy struggle, the passage of a law by which half the surplus revenue was appropriated to the common schools.

* Atlantic Monthly, May, 1873.

From 1843 to 1847, he was a member of Congress. In January, 1844, he introduced into the House a joint resolution relative to the occupation of Oregon, which, though it failed at that session, passed during the next, and became the basis of the settlement of our North-western boundary, effected in 1846. He also introduced (in December, 1845), the bill under which the Smithsonian Institution was organized, and was chairman of the select committee appointed on that subject, having as a colleague Hon. John Quincy Adams (who had made two unavailing attempts, in former sessions, to procure action in this matter). Mr. Owen was afterward appointed one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, as well as chairman of its building committee. His speeches in Congress on the Oregon Question, the Tariff, and the annexation of Texas, had a wide circulation.

In 1850, he was elected a member of the Convention called to remodel the Constitution of Indiana, and was chosen first chairman of its Committee on Rights and Privileges, and afterward chairman of its Revision Committee, which was composed of the chairmen of all the other committees. The next year he was a member of the Legislature which revised the laws, in accordance with the new Constitution; was again chosen chairman of the Committee on Revision; and was the author of a bill, which has ever since been a law of the State, securing to widows and to married women independent rights of property.

The women of Indiana, grateful for these efforts in their favor, procured, by a subscription which was limited to one dollar each, a large silver pitcher, classical in form and richly chased, for presentation to their advocate. It bore the inscription: "Presented to the Honorable Robert Dale Owen by the Women of Indiana, in acknowledgment of his true and noble advocacy of their independent rights to property, in the Constitutional Convention of the State of Indiana, convened at Indianapolis, 1850." The services were held at a large public meeting in the hall of the House of Representatives, May 28, 1851. Judge Smith of the Supreme Court presided, and the Rev. W. C. Larrabee, afterward State Superintendent of Public Instruction, made the presentation address.

In 1853, Mr. Owen was appointed American Minister to Naples, where he remained five years, and negotiated two important treaties with the Neapolitan government, including the treaty of amity and commerce still existing.

Besides the historical drama of Pocahontas, in 1837, Mr. Owen is the author of a volume on Public Architecture,* issued in 1849 by Putnam, in quarto form and with numerous illustrations; and of a short treatise on the Population question, entitled, Moral Physiology, appearing in 1830, some sixty or seventy thousand copies of which have been sold in this country and England. But his principal works, published later in life, relate to the question, much agitated throughout the last twenty years, whether occasional interferences from another world in this are reality or delusion; and whether there is experimental proof of immortality and a life to come. Two works on this subject have appeared from his pen: the first, entitled Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World, was issued at Philadelphia, in 1860; the second, with the title The Debatable Land between this World and the Next, at New York, in December, 1871. In these two volumes the general ground taken by Mr. Owen, as stated by one thoroughly conversant with his works, is: "That in all ages of the world, there has been more or less intercourse, sometimes direct, more frequently indirect, between the denizens of the next world and the inhabitants of this; one form of such intercourse, Inspiration, being a general element influencing favored individuals; the result showing itself in eminent literary efforts, in masterpieces of art, possibly in wonderful scientific discoveries and mechanical inventions; more especially in the highest order of musical compositions; the most marked phase, however, being of a spiritual character, and Christ being the crowning exemplar of the Inspired. He does not look upon it, however, as an exceptional and miraculous gift of God, restricted to one century and a few favored children of preference; but as a mental or psychical phenomenon, strictly law-governed, often imparting invaluable knowledge to man, but never infallible teachings; the source not of one religion alone, but, in phase more or less pure, of all religions, ancient or modern, that have held persistent sway over any considerable portion of mankind. He holds that the signs and wonders alleged to have been wrought by Jesus did occur, substantially as represented by the Evangelists, and that when they are no longer loaded down by the claim to be miraculous, they will be much more generally believed, especially by men of science." He further holds that "the occurrence among us of spiritual phenomena under law tends to reconcile Scripture and sound philosophy, helps to attest the doctrine of the universal reign of law; and thus explains and confirms the general accuracy of the Gospel narratives."*

As chairman of a Government Commission, appointed by the Secretary of War, in March, 1863, to examine the condition of the recently emancipated Freedmen of the United States, he published the result of his observations in a volume the year following: The Wrong of Slavery, the Right of Emancipation, and the Future of the African Race in the United States. He served also during the war, with Judge Holt, on another Commission, relative to Ordnance and Ordnance Stores. To this Commission accounts amounting in the aggregate to forty-nine millions and a half were referred for audit; and the decisions of the commission, which sat between three and four months, reduced the liabilities of the Government by about fourteen millions of dollars, while not one of their decisions was ever reversed. During the war he wrote and printed a letter to the President, one to the Secretary of War, one to the

*Hints on Public Architecture; containing, among other illustrations, Views and Plans of the Smithsonian Institution; with an Appendix relative to Building Materials; 113 illustrations, 1849.

*Preface to The Debatable Land.

Secretary of the Treasury, and another to the Secretary of State. These letters, chiefly devoted to the advocacy of the policy of Emancipation, as a measure sanctioned alike by the laws of war and by the dictates of humanity, had, through the periodical press, a circulation almost unexampled in the case of a private individual, and averaging from one to two million copies of each.

In March and April, 1860, Mr. Owen had a debate on the policy of Divorce, with Horace Greeley. These articles appeared originally in the New York Tribune, and were afterwards circulated widely in pamphlet form.

He was married in April, 1832, to Miss Mary Jane Robinson, daughter of a New York merchant. He is now a widower, having lost his wife in August, 1871.

Mr. Owen has written one novel, which first appeared in Lippincott's Magazine, in 1870: Beyond the Breakers: A Story of the Present Day. It graphically described village life in the West, and has some powerful scenes elsewhere, noticeably in the case of a conviction for larceny at Philadelphia on fraudulent circumstantial evidence, and in the masterly picture of the destruction of a lake steamer by fire, with the loss of several hundred passengers. In 1873, he contributed to the Atlantic Monthly, as a serial, his Autobiography. It will probably appear, when completed, in book form.

THE LAKE STEAMER AFIRE—FROM BEYOND THE BREAKERS.

The alarm gained the crowd below, which swayed to and fro. Women and children shrieked in terror as the press came upon them. Men's voices rose—a hoarse murmur, like the gathering of a great wind. Tyler endeavored to make his way to the bow, but found that impossible: several stout Irish laborers turned threateningly upon him, "I'll risk my chance above," he said to Hartland, but the latter stayed below.

When the miller reached the upper deck a sheet of fire already rose nearly as high as the smoke-stacks, and the roof of the main cabin had caught. But he saw also in a moment a change that kept hope alive. The smoke and flames, instead of drifting aft, now blew dead to larboard. The captain's command to the pilot had been to port the helm and run the boat on shore.

But this change, bringing the mass of flame closer to the passengers, so that those nearest the cabin felt the hot breath on their cheeks, at first increased their alarm. They crowded fearfully toward the bow, and many must have been thrown into the water then and there, had not a voice called out, "Don't crowd: they're heading her for land." This assurance in a measure quieted the terror-stricken throng. There was the suppressed voice of lamentation, an appeal to Heaven for mercy here and there, but still no clamorous shout, no wild outcry. There could be seen, by that red glare, on some faces the calm of resignation, on others the stillness of despair.

Though the flames spread steadily, the engine continued to work, the wheels did their duty, and the pilot—noble fellow!—still kept his post, though smoke, mingled with thick sparks, swept in circling eddies around him.

Each minute was bearing these four hundred souls nearer and nearer to safety, and all eyes were now strained in the direction of the vessel's course. The blaze from that terrific bale-fire lighted up the lake waters far and wide, and—yes! was at last reflected on a low shore and trees. Some one near the bow cried out, "Land! land!" Others caught and repeated the soul-stirring cry. And though the passengers in the rear of the crowd were already in perilous vicinity to the spreading flames, a faint shout of exultation went up.

But terrible and speedy came the reaction! The boat had been headed more and more to the left, and ere five minutes had elapsed—with a thud so heavy that she shuddered through all her timbers—the vessel struck a hidden sandbar, remaining fast, but before she settled swinging by the stern till her after cabin lay directly to windward. Thus the breeze, which had freshened, blew right from stern to bow.

Fearful was the result! In an instant the whole body of flame swept straight over the masses that had huddled together on the forward decks. At the same moment the huge smoke-stacks, loosened by the violent shock, fell, with a loud crash, down through the cabin, their fall being succeeded by a sudden and tremendous burst of surging fire.

No restraint now! No thought among that doomed multitude save one—escape from the most horrible of all deaths, to be burned alive! In the very extremity of despair they crowded recklessly on each other, sweeping irresistibly forward till the front ranks were borne sheer off the bow: then the next, then the next! Ere three minutes had elapsed the water swarmed with a struggling throng—men, women, children battling for their lives.

A few of the passengers in the rear rushed to the stairs, but they were in flames. No escape from that scene of horror, except by a leap of some twenty feet—from the upper guards down to the waves below, already covered with a floundering mass. But most of those who were left accepted the desperate alternative, flinging themselves over the side of the boat. Many fell flat and became senseless at once, sinking hopelessly to the bottom; others, dropping straight down, soon rose again to the surface. Now and then an expert swimmer, watching an opening in the living screen, dived down head foremost. Scarcely a score remained, the miller among them, on the extreme bow. Even at that appalling moment, his attention was arrested by a brief episode in the scene of horror before him. A young mother—tall, graceful, with a look of refinement and a pale Madonna face, her arms around a baby asleep, it seemed, in their shelter—stood on the very edge of the deck where the rush of the headlong crowd had broken down the guards—alone!—her natural defender—who knows?—swept away by the human torrent, or perhaps, under the tyrant instinct of self-preservation, a deserter from her whom he had sworn to cherish and protect. All alone, to earthly seeming at least, though she might be communing even then with the Unseen, for her colorless face was calm as an angel's, and her large, dark eyes were raised with a gaze so eager it might well be penetrating the slight veil, and already distinguishing, beyond, guardian intelligences bending near, waiting to welcome into their radiant world one who had been the joy and the ornament of this.

As Tyler watched her, a tongue of flame swept so close he thought it must have caught her light drapery. A single look below, a plunge, and she committed herself and her babe to the waves and to Him who rules them.

Tyler rushed to the spot where she had stood, but mother and child had already sunk. For a brief space—moments only, though he thought of it afterward as a long, frightful dream—he gazed on the seething swarm of mortality beneath him—poor, frail mortality, stripped of all flaunting guise, and exhibiting, under overwhelming temptation, its most selfish instincts bared to their darkest phase.

The struggle to reach the various floating objects, and the ruthlessness with which a strong swimmer occasionally wrenched these from the grasp of some feeble old man or delicate woman—it was all horrible to behold. Then again, many swimmers, striking without support for shore, were caught in the despairing clutch of some drowning wretch, unconscious perhaps of what he did, and dragged down to a fate from which their strength and courage might have saved them. From the midst, however, shone forth examples of persistent self-devotion: husbands with but one thought, the safety of their wives; a son sustaining to the last an aged parent; but above all the maternal instinct asserted its victory over death. Tyler, even in those fleeting moments, caught sight, here and there among the crowd, of a woman with one hand clutching a friendly shoulder or a floating support, holding aloft in the other an infant all unconscious of impending fate. In one instance, even, a chubby little fellow, thus borne above the waters, clapped his tiny hands and laughed at the gay spectacle of the bright flames.

Meanwhile, the wind, veering a little to the south, and thus blowing fire and smoke somewhat to larboard, had left, on the starboard edge of the forward deck a narrow strip, on which, though the heat was intense, some ten or twelve persons still lingered beyond actual contact with the flames. But each moment the fire swept nearer and nearer, and Tyler felt that the last chance must now be risked. He dropped into the water, feet foremost, and disappeared.

While these things passed, Hartland, below with the steerage passengers, had witnessed similar scenes. Human nature, cultivated or uncultivated, is, as a general rule, in an extremity so dire, mastered by the same impulses. The difference inherent in race, however, was apparent. The sedate German, schooled to meet hardship and suffering with silent equanimity, and now standing mute and stolid—eyes fixed in despair—contrasted with the excitable Celt, voluble in his bewailings. Hartland, like Tyler, had kept himself aloof from the dense crowd, and so escaped being carried along by the frenzied fugitives when the flames first swept the forward deck. He was one of those men whose perceptions are quickened by imminence of danger. He noticed that the starboard wheel-house, which had not yet caught, afforded a temporary shelter from the drifting fire; and acting on a sudden conviction, he climbed over the guards on that side of the vessel, a little forward of the wheel, and let himself down till his feet rested on the projecting wale of the boat. Thus, holding on by the rail, he was able to maintain himself outside of the blazing current until only a few stragglers were left on deck.

There he remained some time, deliberately thinking over the situation. As a boy he had learned to swim, but for the last fifteen years he had been almost wholly out of practice. He called to mind the rules with which he had once been familiar, and the necessity of keeping the eyes open so as to elude the grasp of drowning men. As he held on there the risk from such a contingency was painfully brought to his notice. From time to time several of the passengers from the upper deck had slid down near him. At last one heavy body, from immediately above, dropped so close that it brushed his clothes and almost carried him down with it. He turned to see the fate of this man. After ten or fifteen seconds he saw him rise to the surface again, and with a start recognized Nelson Tyler. He was struggling violently, and Hartland observed that some one, as the stout miller rose, had clutched him by the left arm with the tenacity of despair. Both sank together, and Hartland saw them no more.

Several times he was about letting himself down, but held back because of the crowds that he saw rising to the surface and wrestling with death and with each other beneath him. At last he was warned that his time had come. Looking toward the bow, where several men, imitating his example, were holding on outside the bulwarks, but unprotected by the wheel-house, he saw the flames catch and terribly scorch their hands, the torture causing them to quit their grasp and fall back headlong into the waves. Still he watched, until, seeing a whole mass of bodies sink together, and thus leave an empty space just below him, he commended his soul to God, and, springing from his support, sank at once to the bottom.

After a brief space, when his eyes had cleared a little, he saw what it has seldom been the lot of human being to witness. On the sand, there in the lower depths of the lake, lighted by the lurid glare of the burning boat, loomed up around him ghastly apparitions of persons drowned or drowning—men, women, small children too; some bodies standing upright as if alive; some with heads down and limbs floating; some kneeling or lying on the ground; here a muscular figure, arms flung out, fingers convulsively clenched, eyeballs glaring; there a slender woman in an attitude of repose, her features composed, and one arm still over the little boy stretched to his last rest by her side. Of every demeanor, in every posture they were—a subaqueous multitude! A momentary gaze took it all in, and then Hartland, smitten with horror, struck upward, away from that fearful assemblage, and reached the surface of the lake and the upper world once more.

There he found the water, not only around the bow, whence most of the passengers had been precipitated, but also between himself and the shore, so overspread with a motley throng that he resolved to avoid them, even at risk of considerably lengthening the distance. He swam toward the stern, where the surface was comparatively free, and after passing one or two hundred yards beyond, seeing no one now in the line of the land, which was distinctly visible, he struck out vigorously in that direction.

Then he swam on, but with gradually diminishing strength and courage, and a little nervous trembling.

He estimated the distance to the land at half a mile. It was, however, in reality, a quarter of a mile farther. But the air was balmy, and, though the wind blew, the waves were not sufficient to impede a stout swimmer. There are hundreds among us who can swim a much greater distance. Yes, if they start fair, mind and body unexhausted. But after such a terribly wearing scene of excitement as that—the man fifty-seven years old, too—will his strength hold out to reach the land?

 WILLIAM WILLDER WHEILDON

Was born in Boston, October 17, 1805. His father was a native of Birmingham, England, and his mother of Groton, Mass. He was educated in the public schools of Boston, and in 1820, in his sixteenth year, commenced an apprenticeship at the printing business at Haverhill, with Nathaniel Greene, who was then printing a small newspaper and a Concordance to the Bible. The next year, Mr. Greene established, in Boston, the American Statesman, a democratic newspaper, of which Judge Henry Orne was principal editor. Under Mr. Greene, Mr. Wheildon soon became foreman of the printing-office and assistant editor; and remained here in frequent association with Jonathan Russell, one of the Commissioners at Ghent; David Henshaw, afterward Collector of the Port and Secretary of the Navy; Andrew Dunlap, U. S. District Attorney, and other leading spirits of the Democratic party, during the Adams and Crawford campaign in 1823-4.

In May, 1827, Mr. Wheildon commenced the Bunker Hill Aurora at Charlestown, which he continued to edit and publish until September, 1870, a period which gave him nearly half a century's experience as a journalist. The Aurora was commenced under the favor and personal friendship of Edward Everett, then member of Congress,—afterward Governor of the Commonwealth and Secretary of State under President Fillmore,—with whom the friendship then formed continued, with a single interruption, until Mr. Everett's death in 1863. The Aurora always maintained a highly respectable position and character, and received many complimentary notices from its contemporaries. To the influence of the Aurora was justly attributed the first defeat of the Know-Nothing political organization in Massachusetts.

Mr. Wheildon's first publication, excepting an occasional pamphlet upon some local subject, was a little volume entitled Letters from Nahant, Historical, Descriptive, and Miscellaneous, concerning that fashionable peninsula, for many years the summer resort of the citizens of Boston. The early history of this famous peninsula, once the favorite resort of the Indian tribes, afterward the herding pasture of the colonists, and finally the fashionable summer residence of Prescott, the historian, and the elite of the city, is full of interest.

In 1862-3, Mr. Wheildon, as chairman of a committee of the Bunker Hill Monument Association, prepared a Memoir of Solomon Willard, its architect and superintendent (8vo., pp. 372). This volume contains a complete history of the great obelisk, and much matter connected with the architecture and public buildings of Boston. It is a handsomely printed volume, and its entire execution, excepting the press-work, was by the author, much of the composition having been performed without previous writing—a method which Mr. Wheildon had occasionally adopted with his editorial articles, and in which he acquired remarkable facility: in these respects the book, which in correctness and smoothness of style will bear very close criticism, is believed to be unique. The whole work was done in odd hours of time during two years of ordinary occupation.

For many years Mr. Wheildon had made the Arctic regions and the voyages of explorers a subject of study, and became impressed with the belief in an ameliorated climate and a probable open sea in the region of the theoretic pole of the earth, and at the same time was led to reject the idea of the influence of the Gulf stream in the higher latitudes as an adequate cause for the known phenomena. In 1860, he read a paper before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, at Newport, on this subject, in which he presented what he terms the "Atmospheric Theory of the Open Polar Sea," which is published in the Proceedings of that association (vol. xiv.), and in 1872 was issued in a separate form. At the meeting of the same Association, at Dubuque, in 1872, Mr. Wheildon read a second and more extended paper on this subject, printed in the Proceedings of that year, together with a narrative of a Scientific Excursion across the State of Iowa. He has also published an account of the discovery of the new Arctic Continent, "Wrangell's Land,"* in pamphlet form, accompanied by a map of the region, furnished by the government; and has now in press (1873), a new volume entitled Contributions to Thought, comprising lectures and essays on "Maternal Progress," "The Principle of Life," "The Origin of the Races of Men," etc., a duodecimo of about 250 pages. Also a historical monograph of "Sentry or Beacon Hill, the Beacon and the Monument"—the latter erected by John Hancock and citizens of Boston, to commemorate the American Revolution, in 1790, which was destroyed by digging away the hill, in 1811, and which the Bunker Hill Monument Association now contemplates rebuilding.

Mr. Wheildon has held various public offices in Charlestown, its Savings Banks and other corporations; in the Massachusetts Mechanics' Association and Grand Lodge of Freemasons; is a member of the Massachusetts Historical-Genealogical Society, and is the author of numerous odes and occasional poems. For the last twenty-five years he has resided at Concord, Mass., where he has a private printing-office for his own use.

 WINSLOW LEWIS.

DR. WINSLOW LEWIS, son of the late Captain Winslow and Elizabeth (Greenough) Lewis, and a lineal descendant of Edward Winslow, Governor of Plymouth Colony in 1633, was born in Boston, July 8, 1799. He graduated at Harvard College in 1819, where his ancestor, Rev. Ezekiel Lewis, in 1695, and his great grandfather, Rev. Isaiah Lewis, in 1723, had been educated. He studied Medicine and Surgery under the late distinguished Dr. John C. Warren. So anxious was he to acquire a thorough knowledge of his profession, that, after he had been admitted to practice, he crossed the Atlantic and attended a course of lectures in London by the celebrated Abernethy, and another in Paris by Dupuytren, a surgeon of great eminence. After a visit to the Continent, he returned home and commenced his professional life in Boston, having married Emeline, daughter of Captain Benjamin Richards, of New London. He soon became known for his tact and science, and rose to distinction. On the death of Dr. Warren, he was chosen to fill his place as consulting surgeon in the Massachusetts General Hospital. His practice was extensive and prosperous. During the period of thirty-five years that preceded his retirement from the toils of his profession, when he relinquished his active duties to his son-in-law, George H. Gay, M. D., now at the head of the Faculty in Surgery, his private pupils numbered nearly four hundred. "No one in his vocation could have been more deserving of success. For, with an unflinching eye and a firm hand he could apply the scalpel to the living body, and, after a painful operation, often dismiss the sufferer, if a poor man, without fee or reward. The poor man always found a friend in Dr. Lewis.

* See Proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, 1868, at Chicago, vol. xvii.

"During a long and large practice he never forgot his academic love of classic literature, and, whenever his leisure permitted, was fond of retirement to a library where he had collected many choice books and specimens of art. He translated from the French Gall on the Structure and Functions of the Brain, which was printed in six volumes; edited Paarton's Anatomy, and another practical work on the same subject. He also made numerous addresses which were published.

"Dr. Lewis was for three years chosen a member of the Massachusetts Legislature from Boston; was Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts three years; has been a member of the city government; was one of the Board of Overseers of Harvard University; and was President of the New England Historic-Geographical Society, which he saw on his retirement from that office taking a high and permanent stand among the finest institutions in the United States.

"Blessed with a competency and health, retaining his taste for literature and the fine arts, and surrounded by troops of friends, while his beloved daughters are happily settled near him, Dr. Lewis, with his amiable and devoted partner, still enjoys the sweets of retirement in a vigorous old age. A more unselfish, generous, genial man we have not among us. Long may they both live and find in a Golden Wedding, to which they are fast approaching, another epoch of felicity rising on hearts which have so often gone out of themselves to think and feel for others."*

 WILLIAM CUTTER.

WILLIAM CUTTER, a native of North Yarmouth, Maine, was born May 15, 1801. He graduated at Bowdoin College in his twentieth year, and settled at Portland, where his parents then resided. In 1831, he edited the Sabbath-School Instructor, a weekly published at Portland. A few years later he removed to Brooklyn, New York, and in 1839 he was associated with Grenville Mellen in editing the Monthly Miscellany, published by Samuel Colman, which had a short existence. He wrote a Life of General Putnam in 1846, and a Life of General LaFayette, which appeared in 1849. To the magazines and newspapers of the day, he contributed many articles, in prose and poetry, some of which were extensively copied. He died at Brooklyn, February 8, 1867, aged 65.

REV. EDWARD FRANCIS CUTTER, D. D., a younger brother, was born at Portland, Maine, January 20, 1810. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1828, and at Andover Theological Seminary three years later. He has been settled in the ministry at Warren and Belfast, Maine, and has preached as a stated supply at Beardstown, Illinois, and Rockland, Maine. In 1856 he edited the Christian Mirror, at Portland. He has published several juvenile books, a sermon before the Maine Missionary Society, and a discourse on the death of President Lincoln.

 RICHARD STOCKTON FIELD,

A GRANDSON of Richard Stockton, a Signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born at Whitehill, in the county of Burlington, New Jersey, December 31, 1808. Soon after the death of his father in 1810, the family made their permanent residence at Princeton, and he graduated with high honors at the College of New Jersey in 1821. He studied law with his uncle, Richard Stockton, a distinguished member of the State bar, and was admitted to practice four years later. Thereupon he made Salem his home till his return to Princeton in 1832.

"For several years Mr. Field was a member of the State Legislature, and in February, 1838, he was appointed Attorney General by Governor Pennington, and in this high and responsible position, which he resigned in 1841, he acquitted himself with ability and honor. He was a leading member of the Convention which met at Trenton on the 14th of May, 1844, and formed the present constitution of the State, and when in 1851 it was resolved to form an Association of the surviving members of that Convention, he was appointed to deliver the address at its first annual meeting. This address, which was delivered February 1st, 1853, has been printed, and contains an eloquent memorial of the great Convention which, sixty-six years before, met in Philadelphia, and with Washington as its President framed the Constitution of these United States.

"In the New Jersey Historical Society, of which he was at the time of his death its third President, he always took a lively interest. To its publications he contributed his most elaborate work, The Provincial Courts of New Jersey, with Sketches of the Bench and Bar. It forms the third volume of the Collections of the Society, and was the subject of two discourses delivered by him in January and May, 1848. At the meeting of the Society in September, 1851, he read a valuable paper on the celebrated Trial of the Rev. William Tennent for Perjury in 1742, which was printed in the proceedings of the meeting, and to the Princeton Review for July, 1852, he contributed the leading article, on The Publications of the New Jersey Historical Society, but more particularly noticing its latest issue, The Papers of Governor Lewis Morris. 'Elected one of the Executive Committee in 1851, he continued to hold the position till 1865, when, on the elevation of the Hon. James Parker to the presidency on the death of the Hon. Joseph C.

* Sketch of Dr. Lewis, in manuscript, by Mr. John H. Shepard, of Boston.

Hornblower, he was chosen First Vice President, and on the death of Mr. Parker in 1868, succeeded him in the Presidency.' At the annual meeting in January, 1865, he delivered An Address on the Life and Character of Chief Justice Hornblower, and at the January meeting, 1869, a similar one on his predecessor, President Parker."*

Mr. Field was a professor in the New Jersey Law School from 1847 to 1855. In the latter year he was appointed president of the board of trustees of the State Normal School, then just organized, and, till his death, he wrote every one of its annual reports to the Legislature. The Power of Habit, an address before Edgehill School at Princeton in 1855, was printed. On the 4th of July, 1861, he delivered a public oration at Princeton, entitled The Constitution not a Compact between Sovereign States. He was appointed to the U. S. Senate in November, 1862, to fill the unexpired term made by the death of Hon. John R. Thompson, and while a member of that body he delivered an able argument on the Discharge of State Prisoners, which, in harmony with the pamphlets of Horace Binney on the Suspension of the Writ, declared that the right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus was vested in the President, and not in Congress. Two weeks later, January 21, 1863, he was appointed, by President Lincoln, Judge of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He took his seat on the bench April 21, 1863, and then delivered "a most learned and excellent charge to the grand jury, which has been printed in a pamphlet of twenty-four pages." Three years later, Mr. Field delivered before the Legislature of New Jersey, at its request, and on the anniversary of the late President's birthday, Feb. 12, 1866, an Oration on the Life and Character of Abraham Lincoln. His last public address, on the subject of Education, was delivered in June, 1869, at the centennial celebration of the American Whig Society of the College of New Jersey. In April, 1870, Judge Field was prostrated by a stroke of paralysis while officiating on the bench, and after several weeks of unconsciousness he died May 25, 1870, and was buried at Princeton, "beside the wife he lost eighteen years before."

* * CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS,

THE son and grandson of Presidents of the United States, was the only child who survived John Quincy Adams. He was born at Boston, Massachusetts, August 18, 1807. The appointment of his father as Minister to Russia in 1809, gave the child some years of excellent training abroad, wherein he acquired the Russian, German, and French languages. After the conclusion of peace with Great Britain in 1815, his father was appointed Minister to that country, and young Adams was then placed at an English school.

Two years later, on his father's return to America, he entered the Boston Latin School, and in 1825 he was graduated at Harvard College. The two years succeeding were spent at Washington, where his father then filled the presidential chair, and in 1827 Mr. Adams began the study of law in the office of the late Daniel Webster. He was called to the bar in 1828, and the year following he married a daughter of the wealthy merchant, Peter C. Brooks, another of whose daughters was the wife of Hon. Edward Everett. After declining one nomination to the Massachusetts legislature, he accepted a similar invitation to enter public life in 1840. By successive elections, he served the next three years as a representative, and for two years after in the State Senate.

"Opposition to slavery," states Mr. Duyckinck, in an appreciative sketch of his career,* "was a duty which he inherited from his father, and the year 1848, in which President Adams died, saw his son the candidate of the new Free-Soil party for Vice-President, on the ticket with Martin Van Buren as President. The men then enlisted in support of the principles of freedom proved to be in a minority, but from the seed sown at that time sprang the great political party in the duties and triumphs of which Mr. Adams was largely to participate. Previously to the election he edited for several years a political daily paper in Boston, advocating the principles which were afterwards incorporated in the Republican creed. He had at different times been an active writer, contributing articles to the North American Review and Christian Examiner, and had given particular attention to the preparation of the writings and Revolutionary memoirs of his family. In 1840 he published two volumes of the Letters of his grandmother, Mrs. Abigail Adams, accompanied by a biographical sketch from his pen, and the following year edited a similar collection of the Letters of John Adams addressed to his wife. A more important literary labor, however, occupied him for many years, in preparing for the press and editing the extensive series of the Diaries and other writings of John Adams, to which he prefixed an elaborate biography. The Life of John Adams, the first of the series of ten volumes in which the works of that author are included, but the last in order of publication, was given to the world by his grandson in 1856. It displayed close and accurate study of historical events, with special reference to diplomatic questions and the political agitations in which the elder Adams bore so prominent a part. It was a difficult subject, involving great labor and wide research, with much nice discussion of disputed topics, and it was admitted by those best acquainted with the history of the times that the author fairly met its requisitions."

Mr. Adams was elected a member of the National House of Representatives in 1858, and his patriotic course in the momentous debates of 1859-61 have been well characterized as "firm but conciliatory." He was re-elected to the

* A Necrological Notice of the Hon. Richard Stockton Field, LL. D., of Princeton, New Jersey. Read before the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia at its Regular Monthly Meeting, Thursday Evening, October 6, 1870. By Charles Henry Hart, LL. B., Historiographer of the Society. Philadelphia, 1870; pp. 10.

* National Portrait Gallery of Eminent Americans, by Evert A. Duyckinck; vol. ii., p. 521-7.

Thirty-seventh Congress, and his appointment as Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of St. James followed in the spring of 1861. "From that moment Mr. Adams," continues Mr. Duyckinck, "during the long four years of the civil war, was employed in an unintermitted effort to enlighten or restrain the untoward policy of the British Cabinet and Parliament, using every endeavor of argument, courtesy, sober appeal or remonstrance, to counteract the threatened interference of the nation to which he was accredited with the public rights or domestic policy of his country. The joint labors of Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State, at Washington, and of Mr. Adams, at London, in their unceasing correspondence with one another, and negotiations with the British Foreign Minister, Lord Russell, are recorded at length in the ample collections of Diplomatic Correspondence, published under the direction of Congress. On every page of these transactions we shall find evidence of the vigilance and energy, the good temper and perseverance of the American minister."

Mr. Adams returned home in 1868. He delivered before the New York Historical Society, in December, 1870, a discourse on American Neutrality, which has been printed; and republished, with slight alterations, the biography of his grandfather, entitled The Life of John Adams, Begun by John Quincy Adams, Completed by Charles Francis Adams, revised and corrected; 2 vols., 1871.

He had also a life of his father in contemplation, but its preparation was suspended for a season by his appointment as the American arbitrator to the international conference at Geneva. After an honorable discharge of the responsible duties arising out of the treaty of Washington, Mr. Adams again returned to private life. By invitation of the New York Legislature, he delivered at Albany, April 18, 1873, The Memorial Address on the Life, Character, and Services of William H. Seward, wherein he paid a glowing tribute to the character and abilities of that late statesman and friend. The address has been printed in pamphlet form, as well as An Address Delivered at Cambridge before the Society of the Phi Beta Kappa, 26 June, 1873.

 SAMUEL FRANCIS SMITH,

THE author of "My Country, 'tis of thee," was born at Boston, October 21, 1808. He was graduated at Harvard at the age of twenty-one, in the class with O. W. Holmes, James Freeman Clarke, etc., and then studied theology at Andover. In a private letter to a reverend brother, he gives the following sketch of his busy literary career:

"My first efforts in poetry commenced before I entered college, and found their way into print while I was yet a boy. From that period to the present I have continued to print often in our periodical literature, . . . and before I was twenty-one years of age, had contributed in translations from the German Conversations-Lexicon about one entire volume to the Encyclopædia Americana. I at once became editor of the Baptist Missionary Magazine, in 1834 was pastor of the First Baptist Church in Waterville, Maine, and professor in modern languages. After holding those offices eight years, I removed to Newton, and became editor of the Christian Review, which I conducted seven years, and wrote nearly fourteen hundred pages in that work, besides most of the shorter book notices and literary intelligence. After twelve and a half years of my pastorate at Newton, I devoted myself to literary pursuits and private teaching, at the same time resuming my literary connection with the Baptist Missionary Union, taking charge of the periodicals of the Union, and translating the documents of the Union which pertain to the French and German departments of our operations abroad. The "National Hymn" was written at Andover, in 1831 or 1832, first used at a children's Fourth of July celebration at Park Street Church, and made a national hymn without my planning or seeking for such distinction; because the people, unasked, took it up and would sing it.*

"I edited The Psalmist in connection with Dr. Baron Stow, which was brought out in 1843, also the Social Psalmist, the same or the next year; and about the same time The Lyric Gems—for the title the publishers are responsible, not I. I wrote largely for the Missionary Magazine in 1833, and at various times, with considerable frequency, since. Few magazines of a literary character have been published, whether now living or dead, which have not had more or less aid from my pen. The Life of Mr. Grafton grew out of my connection with the parish over which he once presided (1845). My poetical contributions to religious and secular papers, ordination and dedication, and anniversary services, have been numerous. I have read anniversary poems three times at Waterville College, twice at Providence, once at the Phi Beta Kappa at Cambridge, once at Bowdoin, at the Oread in Worcester, at Auburn-dale, at Andover, etc. I have also contributed nearly two hundred pages to the Baptist Jubilee—a resume of our progress as a denomination for fifty years. I have also contributed two or more papers to Dr. Sprague's Annals, besides occasional sermons."

 MY COUNTRY, 'TIS OF THEE.

I.

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing;
Land where my fathers died,
Land of the pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.

* Rev. Dr. Smith has also given this more detailed account of its composition, in a letter to George Henry Preble, U. S. N., dated Boston, Sept. 12, 1872. "In the year 1831, Mr. William C. Woodbridge returned from Europe, bringing a quantity of German music-books, which he passed over to Lowell Mason. Mr. Mason, with whom I was on terms of friendship, one day turned them over to me, knowing that I was in the habit of reading German works, saying, 'Here, I can't read these, but they contain good music, which I should be glad to use. Turn over the leaves, and if you find anything particularly good, give me a translation or imitation of it, or write a wholly original song, anything so I can use it.' Accordingly, one leisure afternoon, I was looking over the books and fell in with the tune of 'God save the King,' and at once took up my pen and wrote the piece in question. It was struck out at a sitting, without the slightest idea that it would ever attain the popularity it has since enjoyed. I think it was written in the town of Andover, Massachusetts, in February, 1832. The first time it was sung publicly, was at a children's celebration of American Independence, at the Park Street Church, Boston, I think July 4, 1832. If I had anticipated the future of it, doubtless I would have taken more pains with it. Such as it is, I am glad to have contributed this little to the cause of American freedom."—Preble's Origin and Progress of the Flag of the United States, pp. 510-11.

II.

My native country, thee,
Land of the noble free,—
Thy name I love;
I love thy rocks and rills,
Thy woods and templed hills;
My heart with rapture thrills
Like that above.

III.

Let music swell the breeze,
And ring from all the trees,
Sweet freedom's song;
Let mortal tongues awake,
Let all that breathe partake,
Let rocks their silence break,
The sound prolong.

IV.

Our fathers' God, to thee,
Author of liberty,
To thee I sing;
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by thy might,
Great God our King.

 JOHN S. HART.

JOHN SEELY HART, LL. D., who has had a large and varied experience of more than forty years as an American teacher, and in that period has had the direct training of over seven thousand pupils confided to his care, was born in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, January 28, 1810. In his infancy his parents removed to the neighborhood of Scranton, Pennsylvania, and settled near Wilkesbarre when he had reached the age of thirteen. He was fitted at the Wilkesbarre Academy for an entry into the sophomore class at Princeton in 1827, and three years later he graduated with the first honors. After serving one year as principal of Natchez Academy, Mississippi, and two years as tutor in his alma mater, he became adjunct professor of Ancient Languages at Princeton in 1834. At this time he gave special attention to Hebrew and Arabic, studying the latter under Addison Alexander. The Edgehill School at Princeton absorbed his attention from 1836 to 1841, and the seventeen years following (1842-59) he served as principal of the Philadelphia High School, in which period he brought the latter institution to a high condition of scholarship and discipline.

Dr. Hart began to write for publication as early as his twenty-fifth year, by contributing to the Princeton Review a series of articles, at various times, comprising Jenkyn on the Atonement; The English Bible; Tyndale's New Testament; The Revised Webster; An Argument for Common Schools; Normal Schools; and The English Language. In connection with his professional duties, and partly in aid of them, he has since continued to give no little time to authorship, particularly in the latter stages of his career, but mainly in the two lines of educational and religious literature. In 1844 he edited The Pennsylvania Common School Journal; The Class Book of Poetry, and The Class Book of Prose; and in 1845-6 the philological volume of the United States Exploring Expedition, during the absence of its author, Mr. Hale, in Europe. His first original volume was published in 1847: An Essay on Spenser and the Fairy Queen (8 vo., p. 512), which reached a new edition in 1856. From January, 1849, to July, 1851, he edited Sartain's Magazine. An Exposition of the Constitution of the United States, for the use of Schools, 1845; an English Grammar, 1845; a Greek and Roman Mythology, 1853; Female Prose Writers of America, 1851, and an enlarged edition, 1856, besides the editing of some eight or ten literary annuals, are to be assigned to this period.

Dr. Hart spent the year 1860 in the service of the American Sunday School Union. At that time he projected the Sunday School Times, to the publication of which he gave the year following, and thereafter remained its senior editor, from 1862 to the spring of 1871. During this period of nine years he was also connected with the New Jersey State Normal School at Trenton, for one year as head of the Model Department, and subsequently as principal of the entire institution. In 1872 he accepted the professorship of Rhetoric and of the English Language and Literature at Princeton, having previously delivered several courses of lectures at that College on English Literature.

John S. Hart

For some years the press of educational duties confined the pen of Dr. Hart to a series of pamphlets and minor writings. These comprised: The Bible as an Education Power among the Nations, 1862; Mistakes of Educated Men, 1862, an essay full of wise hints to scholars on health of brain and body; Pennsylvania Coal and its Carriers; Thoughts on Sabbath Schools, 1864; Counsels for the School Room; The Golden Censer: Thoughts on the Lord's Prayer, 1864. These were succeeded by several attractive works on practical piety: The Sunday-School Idea: Its Objects, Organization, etc., 1860; and Removing Mountains: Life Lessons from the Gospels, 1870. A series of educational text-books, compact and very clear in thought, comprise his latest publications: In the School Room, 1868, an illustration of the theory and practice of teaching; Manual of Composition and Rhetoric, and First Lessons in Composition, 1870; A Manual of English Literature, 1872; A Manual of American Literature, 1873, 641 pages, — a work on the biographic plan, with comparatively few extracts, having some new data about minor writers—A Short Course in Literature, English and American, 1873.

If gathered into book-form, Dr. Hart's Annual Reports of the Philadelphia High School, and of the State Normal School at Trenton, prepared during a term of twenty-five years, would make up a half dozen more volumes of five hundred pages each.

 RAREY AS AN EDUCATOR.

Parents, teachers, and all who are charged with the duty of training the young, may learn important lessons from the example of the late Mr. Rarey. The principles on which the horse is rendered obedient and docile do not differ essentially from those to be employed in the government of children, or of men.

Some of the accounts of Mr. Rarey's system, however, which have been published, are liable to mislead, and to foster a mischievous error. His procedure was eminently kind and gentle. The horse became fully assured that no harm was intended towards him. This conviction is essential to success in securing a perfect and willing obedience, whether from brute or human. But the distinctness with which this feature of the treatment was brought out in Mr. Rarey's exhibitions led some apparently to think that this was the main, if not the only feature. Kindness alone, however, will not tame, and will not govern, brutes or men. There must be power. There must be, in the mind of the party to be governed, a full conviction that the power of the other party is superior to his own—that there is, in the party claiming obedience, an ample reserve of power fully adequate to enforce the claim. The more complete this conviction is, the less occasion there will be for the exercise of the power. The most headstrong horse, once convinced that he is helpless in this contest of strength, and convinced at the same time that his master is his friend, may be led by a straw.

Mr. Rarey went through various preliminary steps, the object of which was to make the horse acquainted with him, and to prevent fright or panic. But obedience was not claimed, and was not given, until there had been a demonstration of power—until the horse was convinced that the man was entirely too much for him. By a very simple adjustment of straps to the forefeet of the animal, he became perfectly helpless in the hands of his tamer. The struggle, indeed, was sometimes continued for a good while. The horse put forth his prodigious strength to the utmost. He became almost wild at the perfect ease and quietude with which all his efforts were baffled, until at length, fully satisfied that further struggles were useless, he made a complete surrender, and lay down as peaceful and submissive as an infant.

This point is of some importance. I do not underrate the value of kindness and love in any system of government, whether in the household, the school, the stable, the menagerie, or in civil society. But love is not the basis of government. Obedience is yielded to authority, and authority is based on right and power. The child who complies with his father's wishes, only because a different course would make his father grieve, or give his mother a headache, or because his parents have reasoned with him and shown him that compliance is for his good, or who has been wheedled into compliance by petty bribes and promises, has not learned that doctrine of obedience which lies at the foundation of all government, human and divine. God has given the parent the right to the obedience of his children, and the power to enforce it. That parent has failed in his duty who has not trained his child, not only to love him, but to obey him, in the strict sense of the word; that is, to yield his will to the will of a superior, from a sense of appointed subordination and rightful authority. This sense of subordination and of obedience to appointed and rightful authority, is of the very essence of civil government, and the place where it is to be first and chiefly learned is in the household. To teach this is a main end of the parental relation. The parent who fails to teach it, fails to give his child the first element of good citizenship, and leaves him often to be in after-years the victim of his own uncontrolled passions and tempers. The want of a proper exercise of parental authority is, in this age of the world, the most prolific source of those frightful disorders that pervade society, and that threaten to rupture the very foundations of all civil government. The feeling of reverence, the sense of a respect for authority, the consciousness of being in a state of subordination, the feeling of obligation to do a thing simply because it is commanded by some one having a right to obedience—all these old-fashioned notions seem to be dying out of the minds of men. The popular cry is: Don't make your children fear you; govern them by love; conquer them by kindness; treat them as Mr. Rarey did his horses.

I protest against the notion. It is a misconception of Mr. Rarey's system, and it is not the true basis for government, whether for brutes or men. The doctrine may seem harsh in these dainty times. But, in my opinion, a certain degree of wholesome fear, in the mind of a child towards its parent, is essential, and is perfectly compatible with the very highest love. I have never known more confiding, affectionate, and loving children, than those who not only regarded their parents as kind benefactors and sympathizing friends, but who looked up to them with a certain degree of reverence. The fear spoken of in the Bible, as being cast out by perfect love, is quite a different emotion. It is rather a slavish fear, a feeling of dread and terror. It sees in its object not only power but hostility. It awakens not only dread but hate. The child's fear, on the contrary, sees power united with kindness. It obeys the one, it loves the other. It is the exact attitude of mind to which Mr. Rarey brought the horse that was subjected to his management.

 CONVERSATION.

To converse well is not to engross the conversation. It is not to do all the talking. It is not necessarily to talk with very great brilliancy. A man may talk with such surpassing power and splendor as to awe the rest of the company into silence, or excite their envy, and so produce a chill where his aim should be to produce warmth and sunshine. He should seek the art of making others feel quite at home with him, so that, no matter how great may be his attainments or reputation, or how small may be theirs, they find it insensibly just as natural and pleasant talking to him, as hearing him talk. The talent for conversation, indeed, more almost than anything else in life, requires infinite tact and discretion. It requires one to have most varied knowledge, and to have it at instant and absolute disposal, so that he can use just as much, or just as little, as the occasion demands. It requires the ability to pass instantly and with ease from the playful to the serious, from books to men, from the mere phrases of courtesy to the expressions of sentiment and passion.

The mere possession of knowledge does not make a good talker. The most learned men are often the very dullest in society. Their learning is of no more use in ordinary conversation, than is the antiquated lumber stowed away in your grandmother's garret. Yet these men of learning are the very ones who of all men in the community have it most in their power to redeem conversation from its too common insipidity. Those antique pieces of furniture, if only cleared a little of the dust and cobwebs, and brought down from their hiding-places into the light of day, might add a sober dignity to the ordinary uses of life. It needs, however, a nice sense of propriety to be able in general conversation to use one's special professional knowledge so as not to be offensive or pedantic,—so as to avoid the appearance of lecturing. Yet the thing may be done. Every one has some special point on which he is better informed than any one else in the company. The skillful converser is one who can both use his own special knowledge, and can subsidize equally the several specialities of his companions, to the common pleasure of all,—who can do this without constraint, without apparent effort, and in such a manner that every one else in the company thinks himself acting quite spontaneously.

WILLIAM A. WHITEHEAD.

WILLIAM ADEE WHITEHEAD, an antiquarian scholar who has contributed some valuable monographs to the history of his native State, was born at Newark, New Jersey, February 19, 1810. He attended no educational institution as a pupil after he reached his thirteenth year, and entered at an early age into business pursuits,

...serving at first in a banking institution, and afterward practicing surveying. At the age of eighteen he made a survey of the island of Key West, Florida, and, while engaged there in commercial pursuits, was appointed U. S. Collector of Customs at that place in 1830. He held that post eight years, at the same time filling several minor offices. He removed to New York city in 1838 and became a stock-broker. From 1849 to 1855 he was secretary, and from 1859 to 1871

...was either executive agent or cashier of the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company; during the intervening years, from 1855 to 1859, he was treasurer of the New York and Harlem R. R. Company, and since November, 1871, he has been treasurer of the American Trust Company of New Jersey at Newark. Mr. Whitehead was a commissioner of Public Schools at Newark from 1859 to 1871, when he became president, for one year, of the City Board of Education. He was appointed a trustee of the State Normal School in 1862, and was chosen its president on the death of Hon. Richard S. Field, nine years later. He is also vice-president of the State Board of Education. He was one of the founders, and is now president of the Newark Library Association. Since the organization of the New Jersey Historical Society, in 1845, he has been its corresponding secretary. He is a member of the Historical Societies of New York, Vermont, Georgia, Pennsylvania, and Long Island, as well as the New York Biographical Society, the American Antiquarian Society, the Massachusetts Historic-Genealogical Society, and the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia, in the last two being one of the honorary vice-presidents.

Mr. Whitehead contributed various articles to the newspapers at Key West prior to 1838. In the latter year, he printed a series of "Letters from Cuba" in the Newark Daily Advertiser; and for over thirty years past he has furnished numerous articles to its columns, on historical, literary and social subjects, including an unbroken series of monthly reports of meteorological phenomena from May, 1843, to the present time. His chief writings comprise: East Jersey under the Proprietary Governments, printed by the New Jersey Historical Society, as volume i. of their Collections, 1846; Biographical Sketch of William Franklin, Governor of New Jersey, 1763 to 1776, 1848; Robbery of the Treasury of East Jersey in 1768, a paper printed in their Proceedings, 1850-1; Papers of Lewis Morris, Governor of New Jersey, from 1738 to 1746, edited with a memoir and notes, Collections, vol. iv., 1852; Contributions to the Early History of Perth Amboy and Adjoining Country, with Sketches of Men and Events in New Jersey during the Provincial Era, 1856; a paper On the Appointment of Nathaniel Jones as Chief Justice of New Jersey in 1759, Proceedings, 1857; An Analytical Index to the Colonial Documents of New Jersey in the State Paper Office in England, edited, with large additions of original matter, Collections, vol. v., 1858; a brief paper On the Facts connected with the Origin, Practice and Prohibition of Female Suffrage in New Jersey, Proceedings, 1858; The Circumstances leading to the Establishment, in 1769, of the Northern Boundary Line between New Jersey and New York, Proceedings, 1859; Records of the Town of Newark, from its Settlement in 1666 to its Incorporation as a City in 1836, edited in part, Collections, vol. vi., 1864; Historical Memoir on the Circumstances leading to, and connected with, the Settlement of Newark, on the Bi-centennial Public Celebration of the event, Supplement to Collections, vol. vi., 1866;

The Eastern Boundary of New Jersey: Review of the Hon. John Cochran's Paper on the Waters of East Jersey, Proceedings, 1866; A Review of some of the Circumstances connected with the Settlement of Elizabeth, New Jersey, Proceedings, 1869. With some exceptions, these articles were read before the New Jersey Historical Society; and all the volumes of their Proceedings have been edited by Mr. Whitehead. He has also written, besides some minor contributions to reviews and magazines: What is the Worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church? an article contributed to The Episcopalian of Philadelphia, and reprinted by the Evangelical Knowledge Society as one of its publications.

* GEORGE SHARSWOOD,

A LEARNED and eminent jurist of the age, is a native and resident of Philadelphia. He was born July 7, 1810. His ancestor, George Sharswood, an English emigrant, settled in New London, Connecticut, about 1665. His great-grandfather, George Sharswood, who was born at Cape May, New Jersey, in 1696, removed to Philadelphia at the age of ten, and died there in his eighty-fourth year. His grandfather, James Sharswood, who was born March 24, 1747-8, old style, was engaged as a captain of a company of "associators" in the brilliant movement against Trenton in December, 1776. As he was yet suffering from serious injuries received by a fall the year previous, the exposures of a winter's campaign soon disabled him for active service. In 1804 he was a member of the General Assembly, and five years later he declined a commission as Associate Judge of the Common Pleas. He was the author of various articles adverse to the Bank of the United States, which were published in the Aurora in 1817, under the signature of "Nestor," and afterwards collected in pamphlet form.* His last care was the education of his grandson, the subject of this sketch, whose father, George, died at the early age of twenty-two years. This grand-parent died September 14, 1836, in his eighty-ninth year.

George Sharswood was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1828. He studied law with the late Joseph R. Ingersoll, and was admitted to practice at the Philadelphia bar September 5, 1831. Six years later, he was elected a member of the legislature of his State, and that service was followed by a term of three years in the Select Council of Philadelphia. In 1841 and 1842, he was again sent to the legislature. The main labors of his life, however, have been connected with the bench, which he has adorned by his abilities, scholarship, and impartial spirit. He was appointed Judge of the District Court of Philadelphia, April 8, 1845, and its President in February, 1848. Two popular re-elections to that responsible position, in October 1851 and 1861, attested the public confidence and favor. He became Professor of Law in the University of Pennsylvania, April 9, 1850, and discharged the duties for eighteen years, till his resignation, April 30, 1868. The latter act, as well as his retirement from the District Court in December, 1867, resulted from his election as an Associate Justice in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in October, 1867, which position he still occupies. The honorary degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by the University of the City of New York, and also by Columbia College.

Judge Sharswood is the author of three original treatises on legal science and the practice of law, which have been accepted as standards in their respective departments. His essay on Professional Ethics: a Compend of Lectures on the Aims and Duties of the Profession of the Law, was issued in 1854, and new editions were prepared in 1860 and 1869. Popular Lectures on Commercial Law followed in 1856, and Lectures Introductory to the Study of Law in 1870. He has also edited a number of professional treatises, which have been accorded the same high favor. These comprise: Roscoe's Digest of the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases, various American editions since 1836; Russell on Crimes and Misdemeanors, 1836, etc.; Leigh's Abridgment of the Law of Nisi Prius, 1838; Stephens' Law of Nisi Prius Evidence in Civil Actions, and Arbitrations and Awards, 1844; Byles' Law of Bills of Exchange, Promissory Notes, Bank Notes, etc., 1853; Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, with Notes, and a Life of the Author, 1859; the standard American edition; Smith's Lectures on the Law of Contracts, 1856; Starkie's Practical Treatise on the Law of Evidence, 1860; English Common Law Reports, vols. 66 to 90; and a continuation of Story's Public and General Statutes passed by the Congress of the United States, from 1828 to 1846, vols. iv. and v.; and Tudor's Leading Cases on Mercantile and Maritime Law, with American Notes and References, 1873.

* THADDEUS NORRIS,

A NATIVE of Warrenton, Virginia, was born August 15, 1811. He removed to Philadelphia in 1829, and engaged in mercantile business. From his boyhood an ardent lover of angling, he was in after years well known for his knowledge of the habits, haunts, and instincts of fishes, and for his skill as a fly-fisher, as he spent a greater part of his summers on the fine trout streams in the mountains of Pennsylvania and the northern portion of New York.

When over fifty years of age, Mr. Norris entertained the notion of writing a book on the natural history of what, in sportsmen's phrase, are termed the "game fish" of our country, and the most approved modes of angling for them. He began the task in 1857, and after throwing aside his pages of manuscript more than once—for he wrote during his leisure hours, and with more of the spirit of the sportsman than the ambition of an author,—he recommenced his work in 1862, at the earnest solicitation of some old angling associates. Collecting the articles he had written, and preparing his illustrations, he published his book, an octavo of six hundred pages, with eighty engravings, in 1864. It was entitled: The

*The Lives of Eminent Philadelphians Now Deceased, Collected from Original and Authentic Sources, by Henry Simpson, 1859; Article, James Sharswood, pp. 882-6.

American Angler's Book; Embracing the Natural History of Sporting Fish, and the Art of taking them; with Instructions in Fly-fishing, Fly-making, and Rod-making, and Directions for Fish Breeding; to which is appended Dies Piscatoriæ, describing noted fishing places, and the pleasure of solitary fly-fishing. Its happy vignettes and tail-pieces were drawn by a brother angler, Mr. Walter Brown, of New York. It won the favor of educated and amateur anglers, so that a second edition was needed within six months. Indeed, its "Dies Piscatoriæ" (days of fishing) have the racy flavor of old Izaak Walton.

Thaddeus Norris

Mr. Norris has also made occasional contributions to a number of the leading weeklies and monthlies, and has prepared one other illustrated work, which has been accepted as a standard: American Fish Culture; Embracing all the Details of Artificial Breeding and Rearing of Trout, the Culture of Salmon, Shad, and other Fishes. Porter & Coates, Philadelphia; Sampson Low, Son & Co., London, 1868; pp. 304.

* TROUT FLY-FISHING — FROM THE AMERICAN ANGLER'S BOOK.

But of all places command me in the still of the evening to the long, placid pool, shallow on one side, with deeper water and an abrupt overhanging bank opposite. Where the sun has shone all day, and legions of ephemera sported in its declining rays; the bloom of the rye or clover scenting the air from the adjoining field! Now light a fresh pipe, and put on a pale Ginger Hackle for a tail fly, and a little white-winged Coachman for a dropper. Then wade in cautiously — move like a shadow — don't make a ripple. Cast slowly; long, light; let your stretcher sink a little. There, he has taken the Ginger — lead him around gently to the shallow side as you reel him in, but don't move from your position — let him tug awhile, put your net under him, break his neck and slip him into your creel. Draw your line through the rings — cast again; another, and another. Keep on until you can see only the ripple made by your fly; or know when it falls by the slight tremor it imparts through the whole line down to your hand — until the whip-poor-will begins his evening song, and the little water-frog tweets in the grass close by. Not till then is it time to go home.

If you have dined on the stream, it may be that the trout you roasted were too highly seasoned, and you are thirsty; if so, stop at the old spring by the road-side.

* * * * *

And so my friend asked me if it was not very lonesome, fishing by myself. Why, these little people of the woods are much better company than folks who continually bore you with the weather, and the state of their stomachs or livers, and what they ate for breakfast, or the price of gold, or the stock-market; when you have forgotten whether you have a liver or not, and don't care the toss of a penny what the price of gold is; or whether "Reading" is up or down. Lonesome! — It was only just now the red squirrel came down the limb of that birch, whisking his bushy tail, and chattering almost in my face. The mink, as he snuffed the fish-tainted air from my old creel, came out from his hole amongst the rocks and ran along within a few feet of me. Did he take my old coat to be a part of this rock, covered with lichens and gray mosses? I recollect once, in the dim twilight of evening, a doe with her fawns came down to the stream to drink; I had the wind of her, and could see into her great motherly eyes as she raised her head. A moment since the noisy king-fisher poised himself on the dead branch of the hemlock, over my left shoulder, as if he would peep into the hole of my fish-basket. The little warbler sang in the alders close by my old felt hat, as if he would burst his swelling throat with his loud glad song. Did either of them know that I am of a race whose first impulse is to throw a stone or shoot a gun at them? And the sparrow-hawk on that leafless spray extending over the water, sitting there as grave and dignified as a bank president when you ask him for a discount; is he aware that I can tap him on the head with the tip of my rod? — These are some of the simple incidents on the stream, which afterwards awaken memories,

"That like voices from afar off
Call to us to pause and listen,
Speak in tones so plain and childlike,
Scarcely can the ear distinguish
Whether they are sung or spoken."

But I must start for the open water below — What a glorious haze there is just now, and how demurely the world's great eye peeps through it! Trout are not very shy though, before the middle of May, even when the sun is bright. I have sometimes taken my best fish at high noon, at this season of the year. — I am as hungry as a horse-fly, though it is only "a wee short hour ayont the twal." So I'll unsling my creel by that big sycamore, and build my fire in the hollow of it for a trout-roast. If I burn the tree down, there will be no action for trespass in a wooden country like this.

What boys are those crossing the foot-log? I'll press them into my service for awhile, and make them bring wood for my fire. I know them now; the larger one has cause to remember me "with tears of gratitude," for I bestowed on him last summer a score of old flies, a used-up leader, and a limp old rod. He offered me the liberal sum of two shillings for the very implement I have in my hand now; and to buy three flies from me at four cents apiece.—Halloo, Paul! what have you done with the rod I gave you—caught many Trout with it this season? Come over the creek, you and your brother, and get me some dry wood, and gather a handful or two of the furze from that old birch to light it with. I'll give you a pair of flies—real gay ones.

 NOAH PORTER,

THE President of Yale College, who is recognized as one of the ablest modern writers on Psychology, is the son of Rev. Noah Porter, who died at Farmington, Connecticut, in 1866, after a ministry of fifty-five years. In 1811, the former was born at Farmington. He was graduated at Yale College at the age of twenty, and in 1846 he was appointed its Clark Professor of Moral Philosophy and Metaphysics. His early writings embrace a Historical Discourse at Farmington, November 4, 1840, in commemoration of the settlement of that ancient town; and a small volume, printed in 1851, entitled The Educational Systems of the Puritans and Jesuits Compared.

On the death of his father-in-law, Prof. Nathaniel W. Taylor, D. D., in 1858, he assumed the duties of the professorship of Systematic Theology, which he discharged till the appointment of Rev. Dr. Samuel Harris to that responsible position, seven years later.*

Professor Porter, after the death of Dr. Chauncey A. Goodrich in 1860, was called to the chief editorship of the revision of Noah Webster's Dictionary; and he exercised a vigilant oversight over the preparation of the edition of 1864. Years previously, he had "communicated in writing his views of the changes which ought to be made in the matter and form of the Dictionary; and with a full knowledge of these views. Professor Goodrich had earnestly solicited him to undertake the entire responsibility and direction of the work. When the proposal was renewed by the proprietors of the copyright and by the family of Dr. Webster, it could not easily be declined; for it was enforced by considerations of affection and of duty both to the living and to the dead. But the service was assumed by him with great reluctance, as being foreign to his special studies, and incompatible with very pressing occupations."†

The greatest of his works, The Human Intellect: with an Introduction upon Psychology and the Human Soul, was published in 1868 (8vo, pp. 673). As a contribution to an intricate department of mental science, it is unsurpassed for its clearness of thought, breadth of scholarship, and sound judicial decisions. "The philosophy taught in this volume," states its exact prefatory words, "is pronounced and positive in the spiritual and theistic direction, as contrasted with the materialistic and anti-theistic tendency which is so earnestly defended by its advocates as alone worthy to be called scientific.

The author, though earnest in his own opinions, has aimed to adhere most rigidly to the methods of true science, and to employ no arguments which he did not believe would endure the severest scrutiny." An abridgment, entitled Elements of Intellectual Philosophy, was prepared in 1870, as a text-book for students.

Besides contributions to the Reviews and to religious periodicals, he has also written a critical and suggestive volume on Books and Reading: What Books Shall I Read? And How Shall I Read Them? 1870; American Colleges and the American Public; and Sciences of Nature vs. Science of Man. His address at his inauguration into the presidency of Yale College in October, 1871, was a masterly analysis of The Higher Education, as adapted to and required by the present generation. Having shown the need of a more consummate culture than collegiate graduates have yet attained, he sketched, in some forcible sentences, the efforts making by Yale towards that ideal—not by providing "university studies for undergraduate students," but by making its "undergraduate departments preparatory for university classes and schools."

 GEORGE WASHINGTON LIGHT,

A PRINTER and publisher of Boston, was born in Portland, Maine, January 21, 1809, and died at Somerville, Massachusetts, January, 27, 1868, aged fifty-nine years. He began to learn his trade at Portland, and finished it at Boston, where, at an early age, he established himself in the printing business, to which he subsequently added bookselling. In 1829, he commenced the publication of a quarto weekly paper called The Essayist. This periodical, which he edited with ability, was devoted to the improvement of young writers, and to the elevation of character in young men. In its original form, it was issued nearly two years, and was then changed to a monthly octavo magazine which reached its twelfth number. Many who have since gained a reputation as writers contributed to its pages. He afterwards edited and published The Young Mechanic and The Young Merchant, two monthlies. In 1851 a small volume of his poetry was printed at Boston, under the title of Keep Cool, Go Ahead, and a Few Other Poems, 18mo., pp. 35. His poetry is said to be highly finished, and to abound in pleasant satire and practical maxims of sterling value. "The verses are of that manly, hopeful, animating kind, which is good to have sounding, like stirring music, in the ear, bracing the nerves, quickening the step, and helping one to face trial all the more cheerfully."*

 SYLVESTER BLACKMORE BECKETT,

A NATIVE of Portland, Maine, where he was born in May, 1812, has followed the trade of a printer in that city. In 1846, he edited with his friend, Daniel C. Colesworthy, the Portland Umpire, a weekly newspaper published by John Edwards. He published, in 1860, in a volume of 336 pages, Hester, the Bride of the Island, a poem. In 1870, he made a European tour, during which he cor-

* Ante, vol. i., p. 99.

† Preface to Webster's Dictionary, edition 1864, p. iv.

* The Boston Christian Register.

responded regularly with the Portland newspapers, and these letters were favorably received.

* JEREMIAH COLBURN,

ONE of the founders of the Boston Numismatic Society, and of the Prince Society for Mutual Publication, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, January 12, 1815. At the age of fifteen he began to form a collection of coins, which was at first, as might be expected, of a miscellaneous character. Subsequently, without abandoning his former pursuit, he turned his attention to minerals and shells, and lastly to books, autographs, manuscripts, portraits and engravings relating to America, including colonial and continental money, supplemented by the early and recent issues of paper tokens, from one penny upwards. At the suggestion of Joseph G. Morris of Philadelphia, who was lost at sea in the steamer "Arctic" on her passage to Liverpool in 1840, he began a collection of bank notes, including those of broken banks and the counterfeit bills of the period, his friend believing the day to be not far distant when paper money would be among the things of the past, or at least of great rarity.

When The Historical Magazine was commenced in 1857, Mr. Colburn, at the request of the editor, Mr. Dean, contributed a number of articles on American coins and coinage, which were followed for several years by short articles on these subjects in the department of "Notes and Queries." At various times, and to a number of historical publications, he has communicated copies of valuable documents in his possession, many of which contained important facts relating to the period of the American Revolution. In 1866, at the request of the Rev. Elias Nason, then editor of the Historical and Genealogical Register, and other fellow-members of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, he commenced the compilation of a catalogue of works on the local history of Massachusetts, which was published in successive numbers of the Register, and was subsequently issued in a royal octavo volume of 119 pages, under the title of Bibliography of the Local History of Massachusetts. It is Mr. Colburn's intention that this work, which has been a great aid to those investigating the history of that State and its several towns, shall be reissued with a greatly extended list of titles, and be brought down to the time of publication.

On the formation of the Prince Society for printing historical works, in 1858, Mr. Colburn was chosen one of the Council. From 1863-73, he held the office of treasurer. The second work issued by the Society, Wood's New England's Prospect, reprinted from the original edition of 1634, was edited by him.

He was one of the founders of the Boston Numismatic Society, formed in 1860, and was chosen vice-president and curator. On the resignation of its first president, Dr. Winslow Lewis, in 1865, he succeeded him as president, and still holds that position. In April, 1871, the Society assumed the publication of the American Journal of Numismatics, and Mr. Colburn became one of its associate editors. The Journal, which is the only publication of its kind in the country, is highly creditable to the editors and the Society, and has been received with marked favor.

Mr. Colburn received the degree of A. M., in 1869, from Williams College. For the past twelve years he has been a member of the library committee of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society.

* WILLIAM HENRY BURLEIGH,

A LINEAL descendant of William Bradford, the second governor of Plymouth Colony, and son of Rinaldo Burleigh, a classical teacher of reputation, was born at Woodstock, Connecticut, February 2, 1812. As a boy, he was shy and sensitive, yet gifted with an inexhaustible stock of merry spirits, and addicted to verse-making. In early manhood he became an advocate of reforms then unpopular, and an acceptable lecturer on behalf of temperance and the anti-slavery cause. He removed to Pittsburg in 1837, where he published the Christian Witness, and afterwards the Temperance Banner. Six years later, he was invited to Hartford by the executive committee of the Connecticut Anti-Slavery Society, and assumed editorial charge of its organ, the Christian Freeman, which soon became the Charter Oak. His able services in that position led the Hon. Francis Gillette, in later years, to pay this tribute to his character and life, in the Hartford Evening Post: "As a writer, speaker, editor, poet, reformer, friend, and associate, it was the universal testimony of those who knew him best and esteemed him most truly, that he stood in the forefront of his generation." He entered the service of the New York State Temperance Society, as lecturer, editor, and corresponding secretary, in 1849, and continued therein five years, conducting during part of this time the Prohibitionist at Albany. In 1855 his limited income was enlarged by an unsolicited appointment as Harbor Master of New York, which post he held for one term. He was subsequently a member of the Board of Port Wardens till the year previous to his death, as well as a correspondent of several newspapers, and a hard-working writer. A succession of epileptic attacks shattered his health, and he died on March 18, 1871. The record of his modest, toilsome, and upright career, is fitly told in a memoir by his widow, a representative lady in the "Woman's Rights Reform." In 1871 appeared Poems by William H. Burleigh, with a Sketch of his Life, by Celia Burleigh. His poetry, animated by a deep love of nature, and a profound desire to uphold truth and justice, gives him a place with our first minor poets. The poems are grouped under various headings, such as, Voices of the Years; Songs of Love and Home; With Nature; Songs of Freedom and Fatherland; Faith and Aspiration.

* THE SPHYNX.

Hey diddle diddle! the cat and the fiddle!
Find me a Seer to read life's riddle!
 The sable crows fly over the river—
Caw! caw! caw!

And their glossy wings in the sunlight quiver,
 Evermore to their Caw! caw!
 As they wheel and sink, or soar and turn;
 But the wisest man cannot discern
 Of their life and motion the hidden laws,
 The why they fly, or the cause of their caws.

Hey diddle diddle! the cat and the fiddle!
Nature herself is an unguessed riddle!
 On the warm hill-side the grass grows greenly
 While the showers of the May-time fall;
 And the yellow dandelions throw
 O'er the meadows broad a golden glow;
 But you cannot tell, for you do not know,
 How the buds are born, or the grasses grow,
 Or why by the stilly brook the lily,
 Stately and tall, looks over them all,
 With a regal pride, serenely, queenly,
 That says as plainly as words can say,
 "I am queen of all the flowers of May,
 And by right of queenship, willy nilly,
 Over them all assert my sway!"

Hey diddle diddle! the cat and the fiddle!
Man and his motives are all a riddle!
 In the human heart, that wondrous thing,
 Moved by many a hidden spring
 To the noblest good or the meanest ill,
 What passions fierce or dark are born, —
 Love and hate, and fear and scorn, —
 To lord it over the mighty will,
 And make their parent the veriest slave
 That ever crawled to a vassal grave!
 You may trace their track by the gloom or glow
 That over the path of life they throw;
 But whence they come, or whither they go,
 You cannot tell, for you do not know!

Hey diddle diddle! the cat and the fiddle!
The heart is a wonder and life is a riddle!
 Alas! how little we know about
 The world within or the world without!
 From the sentinel soul to the lifeless clod
 We can only see they are very odd.
 Marvel and question and search may we,
 But the credo ever ends in doubt;
 And we turn from the Now to the dread To Be,
 Baffled ever by all we see —
 Mystery within mystery.

Hey diddle diddle! the cat and the fiddle!
The soul is a riddle involved in a riddle!
 Then, mortal, rest your weary brain,
 Since all your cudgelings are in vain,
 And know that the best philosophy yet
 Begins with "Don't" and ends with "Fret!"
 Beginning, middle, and end — "Don't fret!"
 Death will make the mystery plain,
 And all that is dark in a clear light set;
 And death is certain: so, don't fret!
 Fussing and fuming disturb the brain,
 And dash with acid the lacteal flow
 Of human kindness, till, ere you know,
 A pond'rous cheese usurps the breast,
 Nightmare-y and heavy and Dutch at best.
 Let the sable crows fly over the river,
Caw! caw! caw!
 Let the grasses grow and the flowers bloom ever
 Obedient to an unknown law;
 And love and hate, and wrath and fear,
 Fulfil their mission a few days here,
 Till their force is spent, or their work is done,
 Till we are cold in the dark, damp mould,
 Till the song is sung and the tale is told,
 And the secret of life in death is won!
Hey diddle diddle! the cat and the fiddle!
Death only — the Seer — can read life's riddle.

 ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

O, sorely tried, yet true in every trial!
 With the sad burden of a nation's fate
 Laid on thy heart, not crushed beneath the weight,
 But with new strength endued and self-denial,
 And serene patience — worthiest thou to mate
 With the dear Pater Patriæ! Henceforth Fame
 Keeps for thy guerdon a still prouder name,
 Which a great people, saved from treason's hate
 And from the curse which gave that treason birth,
 Shall shout exultant to the populous earth —
 Salvator Patriæ! So thy name shall be
 The glorious synonym of faith sublime,
 A power and impulse to the after-time,
 A household word wherever man is free!
 May 19th, 1862.

 JAMES W. DALE,

THE author of several works on Baptism that are generally accepted as authorities, was born at Cantwell's Bridge (now Odessa), Newcastle county, Delaware, October 16, 1812. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania as the Valedictorian of his class, at the age of eighteen. He then became a student of law in the office of the Hon. Joseph R. Ingersoll, but soon abandoned that profession for the Gospel ministry. His theological studies were pursued at Andover, under Drs. Wood, Stuart, and Robinson, and at Princeton, under Dr. Hodge and the Alexanders. While a student, he resolved to devote himself to a foreign mission. As the Presbyterian Board was not then in being, he applied to the American Board of Foreign Missions and was appointed to a new station to be established at Rajpootana in Northern India. Financial embarrassment throughout the country prevented his departure, and he meanwhile entered the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania. The subject of his thesis at graduation was the question, "Is Medical Science favorable to Scepticism?" This was published by the late Professor Hugh L. Hodge, M. D., brother of Charles Hodge, D. D., in the Medical Journal, and afterward as a pamphlet.

James W. Dale.

The lack of funds in the Board still delaying the missionary enterprise, Mr. Dale consented to take charge of the State of Pennsylvania in behalf of the Bible Society, and with the permission of the Foreign Board. This service, closely related to missionary work, was continued seven years, till a call from the Ridley and Middletown churches led him to another home-missionary ground. After continuing on this field for twenty-five years, and building several churches, a call to the pastorate of Wayne church, in the same county, was accepted in 1872.

A number of occasional sermons by Dr. Dale have been published, including one at the close of a Twenty-five years' Pastorate; On the Early Settlement of the Shores of the Delaware by Presbyterians; A Sermon preached before the Brainard Society of Lafayette College, printed by that Society; The Cup of the Cross; or, the Baptism of Calvary, preached before the Synod of Philadelphia as retiring Moderator, and printed by request of that body.

The principal works of Dr. Dale are four volumes on Baptism bearing the general title—An Inquiry into the meaning of βαπτισμα as determined by Usage. The separate titles are: Classic Baptism; Judaic Baptism; Johannic Baptism; and Christic Baptism. Immediately after the publication of the first of these volumes, the title of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon the author by Hampden-Sydney College in Virginia, and soon after by the University of Pennsylvania. This action indicates the estimate put upon these volumes, which have all received cordial commendations from the leading theological scholars of various evangelical denominations. This Inquiry includes every case of Classic, Jewish, as well as New Testament usage, with a detailed examination of each. The result lays a new and clear basis for the interpretation of the baptisms of the New Testament. Of these works a distinguished theological professor and scholar says, "You open a new world to me on this subject," and another adds: "I have sometimes spent an hour upon a line of Greek, but here are years spent upon a word. The result seems to me perfectly conclusive as to the use and meaning of the words under discussion." These works are published by Messrs. Wm. Rutter & Co., Philadelphia.

* WILLIAM BACON STEVENS,

THE youngest and only surviving son of William and Rebecca (Bacon) Stevens, was born at Bath, Maine, July 13, 1815. In early life losing his father—an officer in the United States army during the war of 1812—he was brought up in Boston, the home of his maternal and paternal ancestry. His preparations for college, and the ministry to which he had devoted his life, were interrupted by ill-health; and on the assurance of his physicians that pulmonary difficulties would prevent his entrance upon his chosen life-work, he left Phillips Academy, at Andover, and turned his attention to the study of medicine. An extended voyage having been recommended for the re-establishment of his health, he sailed from Boston at the age of eighteen; and in an absence from home of over two years, he voyaged around the globe. During his absence he spent five months in the Sandwich Islands, and a like period in China and parts of the East Indies. Meanwhile he prosecuted his medical studies, and while in Canton, China, he gave his services at the American Hospital, then under the charge of the celebrated Dr. Peter Parker. On his return to this country, he went to Georgia, and in Savannah, under Edward Coppee, M. D., and in Charleston, under Professor Samuel Henry Dickson, M. D., he continued his medical studies. In the fall of 1837, he was graduated a Doctor in Medicine at Dartmouth College. The following year he received an ad eundem doctorate from the Medical College of the State of South Carolina, where he had also been a student. Returning to Savannah, he entered upon the practice of his profession with distinguished success, finding time, in connection with abundant labors, for an active participation in the various literary, benevolent, and social efforts of the day.

In February, 1841, Dr. Stevens, who had been prominent in the organization of the Historical Society of the State, delivered an address at its anniversary which was published, and received the commendation of the most competent students of our American annals. In rapid succession appeared an interesting and exhaustive treatise on the History of the Silk Culture in Georgia, contributed as an appendix to Harris's Memorials of Oglethorpe; and two volumes of Historical Collections, of which he was the editor and annotator, as well as a large contributor of original and selected material. It was by the appointment of the Historical Society, with the approbation of the Governor, that Dr. Stevens was designated as the historian of the State; and the abundant manuscript collections gathered abroad by order of the Legislature were placed in his hands.

The early purpose of his life had not been forgotten, however, and with a complete recovery of health came the desire to enter upon the sacred ministry. Relinquishing a large and remunerative professional income, he pursued the usual theological studies under the direction of his personal friend, the first Bishop of Georgia (Stephen Elliott, D. D.), by whom he was ordained deacon and priest in 1843-4. Almost immediately upon his ordination, he was chosen to fill the chair of Belles-Lettres, Oratory, and Moral Philosophy in the University of Georgia, at Athens, where he also assumed the charge of an Episcopal Mission, which speedily developed into a flourishing Church.

At Athens, Dr. Stevens published several sermons and academic addresses, which were widely circulated, and contributed to his growing reputation. In 1847, the first volume of his carefully prepared History of Georgia appeared. This volume elicited the special commendation of Bancroft, Sparks, and Everett, and placed its writer at once in the fore-front of our State historians. The following year Dr. Stevens yielded to repeated invitations to remove to Philadelphia, to fill the rectorship of St. Andrew's Church; and, before this step was consummated, he was honored by the bestowal of the Doctorate in Divinity from the University of Pennsylvania.

At St. Andrew's, Dr. Stevens's ministry was distinguished by the marked development of the liberality of an attached people, and by the evident prosperity of the parish under his charge, as shown in the large increase of its numbers, and in the inauguration of various and far-reaching schemes of parochial, diocesan, and general church work. In the midst of engrossing pastoral duties, he found time to prepare and publish a large number of occasional sermons, many of them running through several editions, as well as some important volumes of a religious character. The concluding volume of the History of Georgia,* the completion of which had been hindered by his removal from his adopted State, was published in 1859; and the whole work, to quote the language of Dr. A. P. Peabody, in the North American Review, "for thoroughness of research, aptness of method, and adequacy of style, at once took rank among our best State histories."

The works of a religious nature published during this incumbency at St. Andrew's, are notable for the elegance of their mechanical execution, as well as for their literary excellence. They include the Bow in the Cloud, 1855, and The Parables Practically Unfolded, 1855. These volumes were issued by E. H. Butler & Co., in the highest style of art, and were elegantly illustrated. After the lapse of a score of years, they are still favorites with the public, and many thousands of copies have been scattered abroad. Home Service, a manual for the use of those prevented from attending public worship, with a number of appropriate original sermons for private reading, followed in 1856. The Past and Present of St. Andrew's, a record of ten years' ministerial labor, was printed in 1858. Besides these, Dr. Stevens issued, in 1857, a serviceable contribution to the discussion respecting the observance of the Sabbath, in a little work entitled The Lord's Day; its Obligations and Blessings. He contributed to the furtherance of the work of the newly-established Episcopal Hospital in Philadelphia, an admirable address on "Hospitals and Churches," delivered at the laying of the corner-stone. Memorial addresses on the occasion of the decease of Bishops Bowman and Boone were noteworthy contributions, the one to the biography of one of the purest and best of American Bishops, and the other to the story of the mission work of the Church in China.

In 1861, Dr. Stevens was chosen to the Assistant Bishopric of Pennsylvania, succeeding the lamented Bowman; and, on the decease of Bishop Alonzo Potter, in 1865, he became Bishop of the Diocese. This extensive see, comprising at the time of his election the whole State of Pennsylvania, has been twice divided since his consecration in 1862. In the midst of his Episcopal duties, and though from time to time disabled by sickness and providential accident, he has published two charges to his clergy; the first in 1864, on The Undeveloped Powers of the Church; the second in 1870, on The Relations of the Clergy and the Laity;—has issued a volume, The Sabbaths of Our Lord;—has published an exhaustive memorial discourse on the life of Bishop Alonzo Potter, and has given to the press a large number of sermons, historical and occasional. Among them was one entitled Then and Now, giving a résumé of the diocesan history of Pennsylvania for an hundred years. Besides these labors inherent in his episcopate, and these literary efforts, the Bishop has had charge of the churches of the American Episcopal Church on the Continent of Europe. He has made extensive and repeated visitations of these parishes, and, in addition to several sermons published abroad by request, has embodied the results of his investigations in a published address of great merit, entitled A Glimpse at the Religious Aspects of Europe. In 1869, the Bishop received the degree of LL. D. from Union College.

Bishop Stevens's style is always correct, abounding in illustrations drawn from a world-wide personal observation and a varied reading and study. Though ornate, it is never heavy. His polished sentences invite attentive perusal, and by their arrangement and finish impress the truths they contain upon the reader's mind. As an historian, he possesses the rare faculty of filling up the outline of historical facts with a vividness of description, and a fulness of appropriate illustration, which make a most readable work, as well as one which accurately reproduces the past. It were to be desired that the Bishop might yet add to his varied and most successful labors in the past some enduring contribution to the ecclesiastical history or biography of the land, fitting subjects for which cannot be wanting either in the Church of which he is an honored and influential prelate, or the diocese—oldest but one of the American Church—over which he so wisely presides.*

S. AUSTIN ALLIBONE.

SAMUEL AUSTIN ALLIBONE, LL. D., an eminent bibliographer, who gave sixteen years of his life to the preparation of a monumental dictionary of the writers in English Literature, was born in Philadelphia in 1816. The main labor of his career was preceded by the printing of two minor books: A Review, by a Layman, of "New Themes for the Protestant Clergy," 1853; and New Themes Condemned, 1854. At the age of thirty-four, while engaged in mercantile life, he projected, and three years later (August 1, 1853,) he began the compilation of, A Critical

* History of Georgia, from its First Discovery by Europeans to the Adoption of the present Constitution, in 1798; two vols., 8vo., 1847-59.

* This article is founded on, and closely follows, a manuscript sketch of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Stevens, by his nephew, Rev. Wm. Stevens Perry, D.D., of Geneva, New York. Dr. Perry, a scholarly writer on the early annals of his Church in America, was born at Providence, Rhode Island, in 1832, is a graduate of Harvard College, of the class of 1854, and was ordained to the priesthood of the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1858. He is the editor and author of some standard works, the chief of which are: The Historical Collections of the American Colonial Church, to comprise ten quarto subscription volumes, of which those on Virginia, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, have appeared; The Early Journals of the General Conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, 1784-1835, to appear in three octavo volumes, with notes and appendices; Churchman's Year Book with Kalendar for 1870; Life Lessons from the Book of Proverbs; 8vo., pp. 361, etc.

Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors, Living and Deceased, from the Earliest Accounts to the Latter Half of the Nineteenth Century.

S. Austin Allibone
 " "

The toil and sedentary application which this great task imposed, are thus piquantly described by his amanuensis, in a privately printed "Memoranda Concerning a Book Worm," signed M. H. A.:

"The subject of this notice (whom I shall designate as Bibliophile) has naturally a disposition which might truthfully be termed 'energetic and persevering;' but a slavish devotion to literary pursuits has so intensified these characteristics as to render them meaningless when applied to him. An industrial fiend seems to have taken possession of both mind and body, and impelled him onward in the paths of self-inflicted labor and self-denying ease, so that the unsolved problem of perpetual motion is no longer without an exemplification. Rest is abhorrent to his soul and scarcely to be endured by his physical structure; sleep is a natural enemy to be fought and conquered, and relaxation or recreation are words yet to be inserted in his vocabulary.

"A delineation of the proceedings of one day in this remarkable being's life, may better serve to convey a distinct impression of his peculiar modes of action, than these general statements. In the first place, therefore, I would inform the interested reader that, after glancing at a portion of the morning paper (the remainder being kept for perusal toward midnight) the Untiring One takes a hasty breakfast, and enters his workshop. After a few minutes spent in the inspection and arrangement of his tools, he cheerfully commences his task of discovering how many books Thomas Wilson or James Johnson wrote, and also where the aforesaid Thomas and James lived, and moved, and had their being. The striking of the clock acts only as a reminder of the necessity of closer attention to his investigations, as the hours fly with alarming rapidity, instead of each being hailed as a signal for approaching rest. For Bibliophile does rest occasionally, and mechanically leaves the library at two o'clock, to endure a half hour's cessation from toil. Eating is a sad necessity, and the demands of custom, if not of appetite, are formally acquiesced in as a sort of fuel supplying agency to the machine, which is to work until thirty minutes before the next meal. During these precious hours of labor, a presumptuous visitor occasionally enters the library, unheralded and unwelcome, unconscious of the immensity of the evil he is perpetrating. His errand is perhaps to seek information with reference to some literary undertaking of his own; and with a forced smile and politely affected interest, the author answers his queries, and sometimes even rashly elicits his friend's opinions on other matters. Should he so far forget himself as to induce a prolonged conversation, a hair shirt and a cat-o'-nine-tails await him, in the shape of the retribution which is never failing. For at the moment of the visitor's entrance, a glance at the clock informs the author of the position of the hands thereupon, and, when he leaves, the time is also conscientiously noted, to be 'made up' at the first opportunity. The Romish system of penances and works of supererogation enters largely into Bibliophile's literary pursuits, if not into his moral habits or theological tenets; and it is amusing to hear his chuckle of satisfaction over some 'successful carrying out of the 'doctrine of compensation.' In the course of the day, whilst searching for the date or the size of the work of some insignificant writer, his eye may be caught by an interesting passage not pertaining thereto; but with instant self-abnegation he avoids another glance at a page whose ensnaring contents might beguile a few moments. Here I would say, although perhaps 'unnecessarily, that time to this individual has an importance which can scarcely be estimated by ordinary expressions, or indeed comprehended by ordinary mortals. A moment of this mysterious article is considered equivalent to hours in the estimation of the majority of mankind; and lest the consciousness of its value should ever become dim, Bibliophile has made a calculation, and also has had it printed, to show what will be lost in one year by letting a few minutes slip away unemployed. This reminder is conspicuously posted in the library, as a warning to all intruders. By this valuable paper, we perceive that five minutes 'lost,' as it is termed, are in a year equal to three days (of eight working hours), two hours and five minutes; ten minutes thus lost become six days, four hours, ten minutes; and the dreadful sum of one hour daily lost results in thirty-nine days and one hour. Take warning from these statements, all ye lazy ones, and all who think yourselves industrious, but who, probably, would be considered quite the contrary, judged by Bibliophile's standard.

"The bracing winds of Autumn, the breezes of early Spring, and the invigorating days of Winter, equally fail to draw the recluse from his imprisonment. The influences of moonlight evenings are also resisted, except on rare occasions, when a partially enlightened conscience or the remonstrance of friends impels him to an owlish, per functore tramp of a few squares. That eyesight and health should remain after such a prolonged warfare against all the laws of nature, is certainly wonderful, and tends to prove how nearly the human frame can be converted into a machine. On Sunday, of course, the hermit emerges from his seclusion, and either as superintendent or teacher, allows himself no more rest on that day than during the remaining six. It must be acknowledged, however, that in spite of all efforts to listen attentively to the sermon, the minister does occasionally appear to be engaged in the announcement of editions of books; and it is fortunate that the delusion never has been sufficiently strong to provoke an audible comment."

The first volume, exceeding one thousand royal octavo pages, was published in December, 1858. Its notices extended from A to J inclusive; but the volume was subsequently made to include those under K and L also. The second volume, reaching to S inclusive, appeared in the spring of 1870; and the third, T to Z, in the year following. His only assistant was his wife, who copied the manuscript, covering about 20,000 foolscap pages, from his notes.*

* Supplement to the revised edition of Chambers' Cyclopædia, in vol. x, p. 388, art., S. A. Allibone; J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1872.

The entire work contains 3,140 double column pages, and mentions the writings, in articles varying in length from a couple of lines to that of forty-nine pages on Shakespeare, of about forty-seven thousand writers. It goes, at times, into the details of quite interesting memorabilia; but its chief value consists in its accuracy, and generally exhaustive, statement of the books prepared by each author, to which is added a comprehensive selection of critical judgments from those acknowledged as censors in literature. Considering the vast field herein sought to be gleaned, and the great lack of adequate apparatus, the instances of total, and even of partial, omissions, are surprisingly rare. The Indexes are the weak feature of the work, and are of little use, as might be easily illustrated.

While busied with his Dictionary, Dr Allibone prepared some valuable Indexes: one, of 396 columns, to Orations and Speeches of Edward Everett, 1850-9, 3 vols.; another, of 76 columns, to The Life and Letters of Washington Irving, 1861-4, 4 vols.; and also An Alphabetical Index to the New Testament, prepared in spare moments on Sundays.

Dr. Allibone has been secretary of the American Sunday-School Union and editor of its publications, giving his mornings to its service, since 1867. His recent works comprise: the Union Bible Companion, a compendium of Scriptural knowledge, 1871; The New Explanatory Question-Book on the Harmony of the Gospels, and On the Acts, 1869; Poetical Quotations from Chaucer to Tennyson, 8vo., 1873; and a companion volume of Prose Quotations, in preparation.

 GEORGE HENRY PREBLE,

A CAPTAIN in the United States Navy, the son of Captain Enoch Preble, and the nephew of Commodore Edward Preble. — who distinguished himself in 1803-4 by several bombardments of piratical Tripoli — was born at Portland, Maine, February 25, 1816. After a preparatory education in the public and private schools of that city, he entered the Latin and English High School, which he quitted to serve in the bookstore of Mr. Samuel Colman, at Portland. He was subsequently engaged with his father, for a short time, in the sale of West India goods, and then again with Mr. Colman in the publishing business, at Boston. At the age of nineteen he received an appointment as midshipman; and he graduated from the Naval School, then at the Naval Asylum, Philadelphia, in 1841. During a subsequent service of thirty years as a naval officer, he has circumnavigated the globe and visited all its chief countries, as well as the islands of the Pacific and the Atlantic, with the frozen regions north and south. He was engaged in the Seminole war of 1841-2, as well as in the Mexican war, during the attacks on Alvarado, Tampico, Vera Cruz, etc. He was transferred to the coast-survey, from 1847-51; and he did good service later in the destruction of piratical junks in the Chinese seas, in 1854-5. He was on active duty during the late war, and was present at numerous engagements, including the attack on Vicksburg in 1862, and the capture of New Orleans.*

Captain Preble has been a constant contributor to newspapers and periodicals for many years, writing especially on descriptive, historical, and statistical objects connected with his professional life. His first article was composed in his fourteenth year, and appeared in the Experiment, a small quarto printed in Portland, under the nom de plume of Elberp — his family name reversed. These communications are scattered through various volumes of the Portland Transcript, Portland Advertiser, Boston Journal, Army and Navy Journal, Commercial Bulletin, New York Herald, Ballou's Pictorial, Boston Transcript, Philadelphia Saturday Courier, Washington Army and Navy Chronicle, United States Nautical Magazine, the National Intelligencer, etc.

His literary pursuits have made Captain Preble a welcome member of various leading literary associations of the country. These include the Portland Natural History Society; the New England Historic-Geological Society, in which he has been for several years on the committee of Papers and Essays; the Maine Historical Society; the State Historical Society of Wisconsin; the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia; and the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. He has made numerous contributions to the New England Historical and Genealogical Register since 1854, chiefly relating to the Prebles in America; Shipbuilding in New Hampshire and Massachusetts; and a Memoir of William Pitt Fessenden, reprinted with portrait, 1871 (8vo., pp. 24).

His publications in book-form and pamphlets, most of which were privately printed in small editions, comprise: The Chase of the Rebel steamer of War Oreto, Commander J. N. Maffitte, C. S. N., into the Bay of Mobile, by the United States Steam Sloop Oneida, Commander Geo. Henry Preble, U. S. Navy, Sept. 4, 1862 (Cambridge, 1862, 8vo., pp. 60); The Preble Family in America, 1636-1870: Genealogical Sketch of the first three generations of Prebles in America, with an account of Abraham Preble the Emigrant, their common ancestor, and of his grandson, Brig. Gen. Jedidiah Preble, and his descendants (Boston, 1868-70, pp. 340); The First Cruise of the United States Frigate Essex, with a short account of her Origin and subsequent Career until Captured by the British in 1814, and her ultimate fate (Salem, published by the Essex Institute, 1870; pp. 108); U. S. Vessels of War built at Portsmouth, N. H.; Notes on Early Shipbuilding in Massachusetts; Ships of War built in Massachusetts and Boston, from the earliest times to the present; besides sailing directions and charts for the Yang-tsi-Kiang, and for Keebung Harbor, in the island of Formosa. The History of the American Flag, a monograph of much interest and value, with an introductory history of flags and symbols, and some choice illustrations, was published in 1873. He has recently contributed to the Boston Transcript a series of fifty articles on "Whales and Whaling," which may appear in a volume.

*Hammersley's Living Officers of the United States Navy, revised edition, 1870. Drake's American Biography.

Captain Preble has ready for publication several volumes of manuscript. These include a History of the Seal and Arms of the United States, and of the States and Territories; Flotson and Jotsam, a series of leaves from a naval officer's commonplace book; a Sketch of the Discovery and Progress of Steam Navigation, arranged chronologically, complete to 1838; Notes of the Exploits and Ac'ions of American Privateers; Statistics of the Personnelle of the Navy of the United States, from 1815 to 1871; and Longevity—a table of 765 persons who have reached the age of one hundred years, authenticated by notes.

 EDMUND FARWELL SLAFTER,

AN active member of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, and its corresponding secretary since 1866, was born in Norwich, Vermont, May 30, 1816. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1840, studied divinity at the Theological Seminary at Andover, and in 1844 was ordained to the Protestant Episcopal ministry in Trinity Church, Boston. In the latter year he became rector of St. Peter's Church, Cambridge, and remained there till the autumn of 1846, when he removed to Roxbury and was instituted rector of St. John's Church (Jamaica Plain). Here he continued nearly eight years, till impaired health compelled him to retire from the duties of the pastorate. He then became assistant rector of St. Paul's Church, Boston, performing but nominal duties for several years.

He was appointed an agent of the American Bible Society in 1857, to advocate its claims and promote its interests in the Episcopal Church, which duty he has fulfilled to the present time, conducting a very wide correspondence.

While in college, Mr. Slafter printed The Story of Pocahontas, the Indian Princess; and, while in the theological seminary, a Discourse on the Catechism of the English Church. In 1850 he published a Sermon on the occasion of the death of President Taylor; in 1858, a Critique on Sawyer's Translation of the New Testament; in which he maintained that a revision is possible, but that a new translation cannot be successfully achieved; in 1863, a discourse delivered at Norwich University on The Planting and Growth of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States; in 1869, a Memorial of John Slafter, an octavo volume, containing a genealogical account of eight generations of this family, with biographical sketches of the earlier members; in 1870, a discourse on the history and future work of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, delivered on the twenty-fifth anniversary of its incorporation; and, the same year, a History of the Vermont Coinage, originally contributed to the Vermont Historical Society's Collections. Mr. Slafter has also been a contributor to various periodicals. Clearness of thought, vigor of expression, and a mastery of the subject, characterize his writings.

In 1873 he edited a volume in the series of the Prince Society, entitled: Sir William Alexander, and American Colonization.

Besides extensive annotations, Mr. Slafter contributes to this volume a Memoir of Sir William Alexander, the first Earl of Sterling, giving an outline of the character and writings of this distinguished nobleman, especially elucidating his connection with American Colonization for a period of twenty years, from 1621 to 1641. This volume will be a standard work on this important but imperfectly known period of American history.

 DANIEL STEELE DURRIE,

THE librarian of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin since 1858, and a prominent antiquarian scholar of that State, was born at Albany, New York, January 2, 1819. He received his education at that city and at South Hadley, Massachusetts. In his twenty-fifth year he engaged in the business of bookseller and stationer at Albany, and continued therein till his removal to the West in 1850, when he resumed and followed it at Madison, Wisconsin, from 1852-57. He subsequently received the degree of A. M. from the Galesville University, Wisconsin.

Mr. Durrie has held the office of town superintendent of schools at Roxbury, Dane County, Wisconsin. He has been a member of the Madison board of education, and its secretary for one year, and also secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association at Madison. In 1871 he was secretary of the Dane County Bible Society. Besides various fugitive articles for magazines and newspapers, he is the author of a Genealogical History of the Steele Family, and of the Holt Family; Bibliographia Genealogica Americana, or Index to American Pedigrees; of an article on the "Bibliography of the State of Wisconsin," printed in the Historical Magazine, July, 1869, and of a pamphlet on the Utility of the Study of Genealogy.

 EUGENE ANTHONY VETROMILE,

A DESCENDANT of a noble patrician family of Naples, and an apostolic missionary of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide in Rome to the American Indians, was born in the city of Gallipolis, in the province of Lecce (terra d'Otranto)—the ancient Salentina litora in Iapygia, Magna Græcia,—February 22, 1819. After an early training under private instructors, he graduated at the Seminary of Gallipolis, and finished his education as a Catholic priest in the Georgetown College, D. C., where he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He has held the professorships of Belles Lettres in the College of Naples, of Natural Philosophy in the College of Nobles in Naples, as well as of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in the College of the Holy Cross, at Worcester, Massachusetts. His travels embrace every country of Europe except Russia, Norway, and Sweden, besides Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor.

Dr. Vetromile has translated parts of various religious works into several Indian dialects. These include a manual of prayer; Ahiamihe-wintuhangan (the prayer-song), an abridgment of the Gregorian Chant, with other hymns and songs; Wecessi Ubibian (Holy Bible), a compendium of the historical and doctrinal parts of the Old and New Testaments, in the Penobscot and Micmac languages, with a literal translation into English, and 112 illustrations, 1860; The Abnakis, and their History, 1866; and Sande Awikihigan (Indian Almanac), each year. In 1871 he issued, in two volumes, Travels in Europe, Egypt, Arabia, Petraea, Palestine, and Syria. He has ready for publication a dictionary of the several dialects of the Abnaki language, in three folio volumes, and treatises on theology, philosophy, etc., in Latin.

 AUGUSTE LEO DE COLANGE.

DR. DE COLANGE was born in the old French province of Auvergne, in 1819. The cadet of an ancient and honorable family, he early entered the College of St. Louis, Paris, where he graduated in 1837, and in the following year received his diploma of Bachelor of Sciences. In 1838, he also made his first public appearance in the field of literature as author of a poem entitled Toulouse et les Albigeois, which gained for him the Eglantine prize of the Académie des Jeux Floraux.

A. de Colange

Carrying into execution a long-cherished design of acquiring that practical knowledge of botany which is only attainable by the study of living nature, young Colange set out in 1839 on a tour of exploration among the Pyrenées, scaling their summits and inspecting their cliffs and crevasses, from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean, passing several months in this Alpine region, where he led the life of a mountaineer, sleeping at night in the huts of shepherds and cragsmen, and spending his days in researches into the flora of the country, and in taking observations of its meteorological phenomena. On his return home, he published the results of these studies from nature, in a series of papers contributed to the Journal des Sciences Naturelles; and then commenced a course of legal studies in Paris, becoming Licentiate of Law in 1843, and Doctor of Law and Licentiate of Sciences in the two years immediately following.

M. de Colange subsequently married a lady of Toulouse and took up his residence in that city, where the possession of a competent fortune enabled him to relinquish his original intention of pursuing a career at the bar, and to devote his whole leisure and attention to those literary and scientific occupations which were most congenial to his mind. In this period of scholarly ease he established the Journal de Droit Administratif, in conjunction with M. Batbie (now one of the leaders of the Legitimist party in the French National Assembly), and held its editorship until 1858. He also published contemporaneously, La Littérature en France au xvii. Siècle, wrote the entire collection of articles on the Fine Arts in the great Dictionnaire de la Conversation, and acted as one of the chief contributors to the pages of the Revue de Paris, and other literary publications of that day.

Being fond of travel, and having besides a keen taste for and appreciation of archaeology, as well as of the picturesque in whatever form it might appear, M. de Colange visited in succession England, the Netherlands and Germany, and the whole of Switzerland, Italy, and Spain, often making halts of long duration at places where natural scenery or rich antiquities charmed him, or where fine libraries and museums attracted his spirit of inquiry and investigation. The year 1858 found his course of foreign travel extended to Canada, the American Union, and the West Indies. In the United States, pleased alike with both the country and the people, he made quite a lengthened stay, returning to France only a short time before the breaking out of the Civil War, in 1861.

Resuming his literary functions after his arrival home, M. de Colange embodied much of the observation and experience he had acquired of men and things during his absence abroad, in the form of articles contributed to the leading Parisian reviews and newspapers; and, having directed his attention to the consideration of fiscal and financial questions, he originated and elaborated the banking system on which was afterward founded the institution known as the Credit Foncier. He is also said to have scattered about, and carelessly enough, other new and not less valuable ideas, which were destined to subsequently fructify in hands more practical and potential than were his own.

After losing the bulk of his fortune in disastrous stock speculations entered into at the time of the Italian War of 1859, M. de Colange associated himself with the editorial management of the Encyclopédie Universelle, and so remained until, being called by friends whose regard he had gained during his residence in the United States, he was induced to return to that country. Taking up his abode in Philadelphia and New York city for respective periods, he devoted several busy years to the chief editorship of The Popular Encyclopedia,* a work which achieved a high and well-deserved success, and which was followed by The National Encyclopedia, a publication on a smaller scale than the former, though little less meritorious. Dr. de Colange has been since engaged in the preparation of the revised editions of his books, which their increasing popularity has called forth, and in the editorship of the Picturesque World, and other extensive publications.

*Zell's Popular Encyclopedia, a Universal Dictionary of English Language, Science, Literature, and Art. By L. Colange, LL. D. In two volumes, new and revised edition. Philadelphia: Baker, Davis & Co., 1876; pp. 2576.

 FREDERIC HUDSON,

THE late managing editor of the New York Herald, and author of the History of Journalism, was born in the town of Quincy, Norfolk county, Massachusetts, in 1819. He received such an education as was then accessible at Concord, to which town his parents removed in his childhood. In 1836, at the age of sixteen, he went to New York to seek his fortune; and after declining to engage in business with his brothers in that city, he entered the office of The Herald, then recently established. Active, energetic, and ambitious, he quickly developed his rare administrative abilities under the magnetic influence of the late James Gordon Bennett, who was the most enterprising and successful journalist of America—the land of newspapers.

Frederic Hudson,

Mr. Hudson continued as an attaché of the Herald, gradually rising to the responsible and final position of managing editor, under Mr. Bennett—and at times without Mr. Bennett—for thirty years. In 1866, warned by the failure of his health under the keen mental activity and constant excitements of journalism, combined with the arduous duties that devolved on him by day and night, he retired from the establishment. He has since lived a placid and domestic life in the intellectual town of Concord, where he had married his wife years before. His family, his garden, the cultured society for which Concord is peculiarly distinguished, and his record of Journalism in the United States, from 1690 to 1872, which has recently appeared, have since occupied his attention. An access for many years to nearly all the newspapers of the world, which enabled him to accumulate a vast amount of material, an intense affection for the profession of his life, and a picturesque, glowing style, make his work not only an accurate compendium of a vast deal of historic data elsewhere inaccessible, but also a vivid portraiture of the growth of the "fourth estate." It is understood that he has yet in his possession much interesting and valuable data on the same subject, which, it is hoped, will be preserved in a durable form by the issue of a second volume.

 E. L. YOUMANS.

EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUMANS, a leading and popular writer on scientific themes, and the editor of the Popular Science Monthly, was born at Coeymans, Albany county, New York, June 3, 1821. His parents removed soon after to Saratoga, where his boyhood and youth were spent. He went to a country common school, and developed an early passion for reading, being especially fond of books of science. At the age of thirteen, he contracted a virulent disease of the eyes, which interrupted his studies. He had now to meet great embarrassments in continuing his favorite pursuits. His sister read for him, and assisted him in his chemical experiments, while he contrived to write by the aid of a pocket machine of his own invention. Four years later, an attendance of a few weeks at a neighboring academy cost him the remnant of his eyesight. In 1840 he visited New York city in a state of total blindness, in search of medical relief. Though his case was pronounced hopeless by several oculists, he was enabled, by the skilful and persevering attention of Dr. S. M. Elliott, after a long and painful struggle, to recover his vision sufficiently to read and write.

At that time, he marked out for himself the course of life he has since steadily pursued, largely influenced thereto by the writings of Prof. Liebig. Aware that it would be impossible for him, with his imperfect sight, to gratify his desire of making original researches, he devoted himself to the duty of promoting popular scientific education, and of adapting the results of science to the needs of the people. The obstacles in that path were many, but they were successively surmounted by his ardor and close application. Substantial honors attest the value of his services. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Hamilton College, and that of M. D. by the University of Vermont, while Antioch College, in Ohio, appointed him professor of chemistry in 1866. Invitations to professorships followed from other collegiate institutions, but his defects of sight led to their declination. This affection, however, has not interfered with his lecturing extensively in the chief cities of the Union.

E. L. Youmans

Dr. Youmans' first publications were devoted to expositions of Chemistry in a popular form. In 1851, he printed a Chemical Chart of Colored Diagrams, five feet by six, which was revised and enlarged five years later. A Class-Book of Chemistry, 1852, after passing through more than fifty editions, was re-written in 1863.

These were followed by: Alcohol and the Constitution of Man, 1853; Chemical Atlas; or, The Chemistry of Familiar Objects, 1855; and The Hand-Book of Household Science: a Popular Account of Heat, Light, Air, Aliment, and Cleansing, in their Scientific Principles and Domestic Applications, 1857.

In 1864, he introduced and popularized in America the generalizations of the chief scientific scholars of England, by the reprint of The Correlation and Conservation of Forces: a Series of Expositions by Prof. Grove, Prof. Helmholtz, Dr. Mayer, Dr. Faraday, Prof. Liebig, and Dr. Carpenter; with an Introduction and Brief Biographical Notices of the Chief Promoters of the New Views. Two years later he visited England, and delivered an able lecture before the London College of Preceptors, October 10, 1866, entitled: Observations on the Scientific Study of Human Nature. This was reprinted by him in 1867, with a series of suggestive and profound papers by Professors Tyndall, Huxley, Faraday, Whewell, Liebig, etc., in a volume: The Culture Demanded by Modern Life; a Series of Addresses and Arguments on the Claims of Scientific Education; Edited, with an Introduction on Mental Discipline and Education. By his care, an American edition of the profound philosophical works of Herbert Spencer was prepared, in a form more complete than the English.

Dr. Youmans paid another visit to Europe in 1871, to arrange with eminent authors of England, France, and Germany for the preparation of a series of books to be issued in those countries and the United States, under the title of the International Scientific Series. His application was successful. A committee of eminent gentlemen in London, and in Paris, and another in Leipzig, were formed to decide on the books, while each author is to receive a copyright from all the publishers. After his return the Popular Science Monthly was established, under his editorship, in May, 1872, and has already been accepted as a standard periodical.

WILLIAM JAY YOUMANS, a brother of Dr. E. L. Youmans, was born at Saratoga, New York, in 1838. He graduated at the medical department of the New York University, studied entomology under Dr. Fitch, and Biology with Prof. Huxley of London. With the latter he is the joint author of The Elements of Physiology and Hygiene; a Text-Book for Educational Institutions, 1868.

MISS ELIZA A. YOUMANS, the sister of the preceding, is the author of several original educational works on Botany. The First Book of Botany, Designed to Cultivate the Observing Powers of Children, was issued in 1870. It was followed three years later by The Second Book of Botany, a continuation of the same plan, and by a series of attractive Botanical Charts. Her plan is to make Botany a fourth fundamental branch of study in all primary schools, as a means of the systematic training of the observing powers. She aims to organize and give methodic shape to object-studies, by making the examination, analysis, and comparison of plants the constant and indispensable work, the books and charts merely guiding to this end.

 JAMES HAMMOND TRUMBULL,

A SCHOLAR of note in historical and philological subjects, and a descendant in the seventh generation from John and Elizabeth Trumbull, who emigrated from Northumberland to New England about 1636, was born at Stonington, Connecticut, December 20, 1821. He entered Yale College in 1838, but was prevented by ill health from graduating with his class. In 1850 he received an honorary degree of A. M., and that of LL. D. in 1871. He was Secretary of the State of Connecticut, by annual re-election, from 1861-5, having previously been General Registrar and State Librarian, 1854-5, also one of the committee to compile and prepare the Revised Statutes of the State, and Assistant Secretary of State, 1858-61.

Dr. Trumbull has held the presidency of the Connecticut Historical Society since 1863, having been an active member from 1847. He has also been a trustee of the Watkinson Library of Reference, and its superintendent since 1863; a director and the secretary of the Wadsworth Athenæum, Hartford, since 1864; one of the original members of the American Philological Association, and on its executive committee since 1869; a member of the American Oriental Society, the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, the American Ethnological Society; a corresponding member of the New York, Massachusetts, Maine, Vermont, Wisconsin, Long Island, Buffalo, and other Historical Societies, etc.

His publications comprise: The Colonial Records of Connecticut, edited, with notes and appendices, 1636-89, (3 vols., 8vo., 1850-9); Historical Notes on some Provisions of the Connecticut Statutes, a series of twelve papers contributed to the Hartford Evening Press, October 1860 to March 1861; The Defence of Stonington, Connecticut, against a British Squadron, August, 1814 (privately printed, Hartford, 1864); Roger Williams' Key into the Language of America, edited, with introduction and copious notes, for the first volume of the "Narragansett Club Publications" (Providence, R. I., 1866); Thomas Lechford's Plain Dealing, or News from New England, 1642, edited, with introduction and notes, for Wiggin and Lunt's "Library of New England History," vol. iv. (Boston, 1867); The Origin of M'Fingal, reprinted from the Historical Magazine for January, 1868; The Composition of Indian Geographical Names, illustrated from the Algonkin Languages,* 1870; On the Best Method of studying the American Languages, 1871; On Some Mistaken Notions of the Algonkin Grammar,† etc., 1871.

Among various contributions to the proceedings of societies, to periodicals, and the daily press, may be specified papers on the meaning of the name "Massachusetts," in the Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, October, 1867; on "Shawmut," the supposed Indian name of Boston, in the Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, December, 1866 (pp. 376-9); Letter to Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, establishing the authorship of the English translation of the Marquis de Chas-

* Also, Connecticut Historical Society's Collections, vol. ii.

† Also, American Philological Society's Transactions, 1866-70.

tellux's Voyages dans l'Amérique, in the Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, April, 1869; "On some alleged specimens of Indian Onomatopœia," in Transactions of the Connecticut Academy, (vol. ii. pp. 177-85); "Indian Names in Virginia," in the Historical Magazine, January, 1870 (pp. 47-8); and "On the Algonkin name of Manitou," in Old and New, February, 1870.

* SAMUEL GREENE ARNOLD,

A LEADING politician and historian of Rhode Island, and president of the Historical Society of that State, is closely related to several Revolutionary heroes. His grandmother was a cousin to Gen. Nathaniel Greene, and was brought up with him in childhood at the house of her father, Governor William Greene. His grandfather was a cousin of Jonathan Arnold, who wrote "the first declaration of independence, constituting Rhode Island by two months the oldest independent State in America," and which was passed by the General Assembly of Rhode Island on May 4, 1776. He was born at Providence, April 12, 1821, in the house, anciently an inn, wherein the plot was laid for the capture of the royal armed schooner Gaspee, which led to the shedding of the first British blood in the Revolution, June 9, 1772.

Mr. Arnold is a graduate of Brown University, of the class of 1841, and of the Dane Law School at Cambridge four years later, being a member of the last class that received its degree from the hands of Judge Story. He was admitted to the Rhode Island bar in 1845. He has travelled, at various times, in all parts of the world. In 1838-9 he visited Europe and Asia, taking a year out of his college course on account of his health, and going back one class in consequence. He visited Europe on commercial business in 1842, being then connected, for nearly two years, with an American importing house, and again in 1869-70, besides spending nearly four years, 1845-8, in a tour over the world, giving the last twelve months to South America. In 1852 he declined a nomination as Governor of Rhode Island on account of his youth, and was then elected Lieutenant Governor, being the only one chosen on the Whig ticket. The following year he was re-elected, and also chosen U. S. Senator. He was a delegate to the Peace Convention in 1861, and Lieutenant-Governor again in 1861-2. At the outbreak of the late war, he took command of the artillery of his State, and conveyed to Washington the first battery of rifled cannon ever in the national service. He served an unexpired term in the U. S. Senate, from August 1862 to March 1863, and then retired from public life, devoting himself mainly to commercial pursuits.

His writings, beside several articles contributed to the North American Review and the Christian Review from 1845-51,* include the Anniversary Address before the American Institute, October, 1850; Spirit of Rhode Island History, an address before the Rhode Island Historical Society, January, 1853, and another in June, 1869, Greene, Staples, Parsons, on three eminent members of the Society who died in 1868, both of which were published by the Society; and the History of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, 1636-1790, 2 vols., 8 vo., 1859-60.

* RICHARD GRANT WHITE

TWENTY YEARS ago had attained a reputation that entitled him to recognition in a Cyclopædia of American Literature, a reputation which he has since largely increased by his versatile writings; but, at his own special request, his name has until recently been omitted from this and all similar publications.

Rich^d. Grant White

Mr. Grant White, as he is usually called, was born in the city of New York, May 22, 1822. His grandfather, the Rev. Calvin White, was an Episcopal clergyman and a loyalist during the Revolution. The family is honorably known in the annals of New England, Mr. Grant White being the eighth in descent from John White, one of the founders of Cambridge and afterwards of Hartford, and his forefathers having sat for a hundred consecutive years in the General Courts of Massachusetts and Connecticut. His father, a merchant in New York, intended him for the church, to which calling, however, he showed an aversion before leaving college. He graduated at the University of New York in 1839; then studied medicine (although with no intention of practicing), and finally studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1845.

He had passed through his school and his collegiate years with a marked and unusual aversion to literary composition and rhetorical studies; but soon afterwards his powers developed themselves suddenly and strongly. When he was twenty-one years of age, he wrote the celebrated Washington sonnet, which, having got into print anonymously, was frequently quoted as Wordsworth's. The question as to its authorship having been started in the Evening Post some years afterward, it was attributed by Mr. Bryant to Landor, when Mr. Grant White, who was then in Boston, wrote to the Post and claimed its authorship.* His literary tendencies soon drew him away from the bar, and he became a contributor to the New York Courier and Enquirer, although without any avowed connection with the paper. His fondness for music, of which he had been from boyhood a loving student, led him to write a series of musical criticisms, which were so brilliant in style and so full of knowledge that they attracted attention, abroad as well as at home. But with a love of concealing his personality which seems never to have deserted him, he did not own these writings. He ere long was suspected to be their author, however, and was known for some time by the sobriquet of the "private gentleman of the Courier." He had now given himself up to the study of literature and art, and his criticisms on music, painting, and the drama, commanded such constant and admiring attention from the public that they made a literary reputation of themselves. A part of these pages made up his first volume, a Biographical and Critical Hand-Book of Christian Art, 1853.

* Vide, Poole's Index to Periodical Literature.

Upon the publication of the now notorious Collier folio manuscript emendations of Shakespeare, which at first captivated the world, there appeared in Putnam's Magazine† a series of articles directed against the worth and even the asserted antiquity of the emendations. The acumen, learning, and spirited style of these articles compelled general admiration, if not assent. Anonymous at first, they were ere long owned by Mr. Grant White, and were embodied with other matter of the same kind in his Shakespeare's Scholar,‡ published in 1854. The strength and subtlety of criticism, and the research evinced in this volume, gave him immediately, both in Europe and America, a place in the front rank of English critics and scholars, a position which was afterward confirmed by his critical edition of Shakespeare's Works with Essays and Notes,§ upon which he was engaged seven years.

¶ Meantime he published a volume upon National Hymns,|| which was elicited by the appointment of a committee, of which he was one, in the first year of the civil war, to obtain a National Hymn for the people of the United States. Soon afterward he published anonymously a humorous satire entitled The New Gospel of Peace,¶ which was the first of a series under the same title, which produced such an effect, and had such an enormous sale, that they became one of the moral forces of the time, and were reprinted

* New York Evening Post, January 18, 1852.

† October and November, 1853.

‡ Shakespeare's Scholar: being Historical and Critical Studies of his Text, Characters, and Commentators; with an Examination of Mr. Collier's Folio of 1823; pp. 504. 1854.

§ Plays and Poems: The Plays Edited from the Folio of MDCCXIII, with Various Readings from all the Editions and all the Commentators, Notes, Introductory Remarks, a Historical Sketch of the Text, an Account of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama, a Memoir of the Poet, and an Essay upon his Genius. 12 vols. 1857-65.

|| National Hymns; How they are Written, and How they are Not Written; a Lyrical and National Study for the Times; October, 1861.

¶ New Gospel of Peace; According to St. Benjamin. In four books. 1863-6.

in England. Discussion was rife as to their authorship; but so unlike were they to Mr. Grant White's previous writings, that for a long time he was not suspected; and to this day he has never owned them even in their collected form, although it is now well known that he was their author.

During the war he also wrote a series of letters in the columns of the London Spectator, under the signature "A Yankee," which continued through four years. The calm boldness of these letters, their mastery of their subject, and their purity of style, gave them great influence in England, where it was confessed that they did much to restrain the British government from interfering in our affairs,* and caused Mr. Grant Duff, M. P., one of the most distinguished political writers of Great Britain, to say in one of his recent works, that without reading the "Yankee Letters" it was impossible to understand the politics of this country. Again the author kept his own counsel, and it was nearly two years before the authorship, which he has since avowed, was inferred in literary circles.

His last work, Words and their Uses,† a desultory study of the English language, enters upon a field for which his previous literary labor, particularly his Shakespeare, fully prepared him, and has had a marked success, although some of his views have been opposed by some philological writers.

Among his other works are, his volume upon the Life and Genius of Shakespeare,‡ his Essay upon the Authorship of the Three Parts of Henry VI., 1859, of which Mr. J. R. Lowell has said that it settles that disputed point as far as it can be settled by criticism; and a volume of Poetry, Lyrical, Narrative, and Satirical, of the Civil War; selected and edited, 1866.

Mr. White's style is remarkable for purity and clearness, for its union of breadth of view and subtlety in criticism, and for the apparently unconscious ease with which it enlivens the gravest and driest subjects with vivacity and humor. A man of society, he is yet reserved in manner, and studiously avoids personal appearance before the public.

 WASHINGTON: PATER PATRIÆ.

High over all whom might or mind made great,
Yielding the conqueror's crown to harder hearts,
Exalted not by politicians' arts,
Yet with a will to meet and master Fate,
And skill to rule a young, divided state,
Greater by what was not than what was done,
Alone on History's height stands Washington;
And teeming Time shall not bring forth his mate.
For only he, of men, on Earth was sent
In all the might of mind's integrity;
Ne'er as in him truth, strength, and wisdom blent:
And that his glory might eternal be,
A boundless country is his monument,
A mighty nation his posterity.

* See, also, article on Mr. White's patriotic services, by Mr. E. P. Whipple, in the Boston Evening Transcript, August 28, 1865.

† Words and Their Uses, Past and Present, 1870, a series of articles contributed to the Galaxy; revised edition, 1872.

‡ Memoirs of the Life of William Shakespeare, with an Essay towards the Expression of his Genius, and an Account of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama to the Time of Shakespeare, pp. 425. 1865.

"GOD SAVE THE KING," AND THE "MARSEILLAISE"— FROM NATIONAL HYMNS.

How widely do the histories of these two hymns differ, and how characteristic is their difference of the two people who have adopted them! The British hymn, like the British constitution, the product of no man and of no time; the origin of its several parts various and uncertain, or seen darkly through the obscurity of the past; its elements the product of different peoples; broached at first in secret, and when brought to light, frowned down as treasonable, heretical, damnable; but at length openly avowed, and gradually growing into favor; modified, curtailed, added to in important points by various hands, yet remaining vitally untouched; at last accepted because it is no longer prudent to refuse to yield it place; and finally insisted upon as the time-honored palladium of British liberty. The Marseillaise, written to order, and in one night, to meet a sudden, imperative demand; struck out at the white heat of unconscious inspiration, perfect in all its parts, totus, teres, atque rotundus; and in six months adopted by the people, the army, and the legislature of the whole nation. The air of the one, simple, solid, vigorous, dignified, grand, the music of common sense and fixed determination; the words, though poor enough, mingling trust, and prayer, and self-confidence, and respect for whoever is above us, and a readiness to fight stoutly when God and the law are on our side: the other a war cry, a summons to instant battle, warning, appealing, denouncing, fiercely threatening the vengeance of the Furies; having no inspiration but glory, and invoking no god but liberty; beginning in deliberate enthusiasm, and ending in conscious frenzy.

How different the service too, to which the two songs have been put! The one used always to sustain, to build up, to perpetuate, to express loyalty and faithful endurance; a song of peace and plethoric festivity. The other, the signal of destruction, the warning note of revolution; the song that rises from the field where the ploughshare turns up petrified abuses to the light of heaven and vengeance stalks between the stilts; the howl of famished men, and the shriek of nursing mothers whose breasts are dry. The one at best a tonic, but mostly sedative in its operation, and harmless at any time: the other from the beginning a stimulant, and to be used on great occasions only, and for great objects. The Girondists sang the first four lines of it, as—except one who fell before his judges, struck through the heart with his own dagger—they turned away from the bloody tribunal which had condemned them to death in the name of the liberty they had done so much to gain. At the battle of Jemappes, at the most perilous hour of that long doubtful day, Dumouriez, finding his right wing almost without officers, and giving way before the fire of the Austrian infantry and a threatened charge of the huzzars, put himself at the head of his battalions and began to sing the Marseillaise hymn, then not many months old; the soldiers joined in the song, their courage rallied, they charged and carried all before them. And in August of the next year at the fête of the inauguration of the constitution (always a fête and an inauguration!) when the convention and the delegates from the primary assemblies, including eighty-six doyens—which seems to be French for the oldest inhabitant—to represent the eighty-six departments, assembled with a throng of "citizens generally" in the Place de la Bastille at four o'clock in the morning around a great fountain, called the Fountain of the Regeneration, as soon as the first beams of the sun appeared, they saluted him by singing stanzas to the air of the Marseillaise; and then the President took a cup, poured out before the sun the waters of regeneration, and drank thereof himself, and passed the cup to the oldest inhabitants, and they also drank thereof, in their parochial capacity. These ways are not the ways of our race. Indeed, even if Sir John Cope had begun to sing "God Save the King" at Preston-pans, or General Hawley had in like manner lifted up his voice at Falkirk, or General McDowell had favored the army with the "Star-Spangled Banner" at Manassas (always supposing it to be within the compass of his voice), I doubt much whether they would have produced any change in the fortunes of these battles; nay, I fear they would have been greeted only with unseemly merriment. Sir John Cope's regulars would still have "fled in the utmost confusion at the first onset;" General Hawley's veterans would have been "broke by the first volley" and "turned their backs and fled in the utmost consternation;" and General McDowell's raw volunteers, after fighting three hours and a half against an entrenched enemy in superior force, and driving him two miles before them, would still have been seized with a sudden panic and retreated in disgraceful disorder to Washington, leaving their enemy so crippled that he could not, even if he dared, pursue them.

But differing thus entirely in spirit and origin, these celebrated songs have one historical point in common, which is interesting in itself, and full of significance to such folk as say, Go to, let us make a national hymn:—they have both been perverted from their original purpose. The British hymn, made up, as we have seen, of an air from France, and words from Jacobite Scotland, into a song praying for the scattering, the confounding, the frustrating, and the general damnation of the reigning family, with its words altered by this man and the other, and its melody doctored by this musician and its harmony by the other, has come to be the recognized formal expression of loyalty to the very house for whose overthrow it first petitioned. And as to the Marseillaise, the purpose of its author is sadly told in his sad fate. Soon proscribed as a royalist, he fled from France, and took refuge in the Alps. But the echoes of the chord that he so unwittingly had struck pursued him even to the mountain tops of Switzerland. "What," said he to a peasant guide in the upper fastnesses of the border range, "is this song that I hear—Allons, enfants de la patrie?" "That? That is the Marseillaise." And thus, suffering from the excesses that he had innocently stimulated, he first learned the name which his countrymen had given to the song that he had written.

But from the purpose built into its very structure and breathing in its every word, the Marseillaise cannot be perverted. It is a war song, and is only suited to the periods when the liberties of the nation are threatened. Therefore, other national airs are performed on ordinary occasions. "Partant pour la Syrie," attributed to Queen Hortense, is, with no special propriety, the recognized French air at present. "God Save the King" has the advantage of being suited to all times and seasons; so while there is a king in Great Britain no other song will take its place.

And this will be a very long time; much longer than many people think. For not only is John Bull, as I heard a distinguished British statesman say, "a lord-loving animal;" he is a king-worshipping creature also. He may devote his own soul to perdition, but he devoutly prays for the queen and all the royal family. He delights in the very epithet royal, and unless some of his heartiness is bred out of him, utters it with unctuous relish. He rises in his own respect by dealing with the grocer to her Majesty; and his eye beams complacently upon the crown stamped on his pickle jar. Kingship will never be driven out from that land; it will be solicitously retained while it is gradually robbed of even the semblance of prerogative, until at length there will be somebody called a king there who has less power than a constable. And when at last the shadow of royalty has become so faint that even British eyes can see nothing on the throne but velvet and vacuity, and nothing in the crown but emptiness, when the game of monarchy is played out, and "God Save the King" cannot be sung because there is no king to save, be sure that a new national hymn will not be written. The old air will be preserved; the words will be altered as little as possible, and perverted as much as possible, so that Britons, though they no longer express their "respect for their monarch," can yet give utterance to their "national pride," as nearly as may be in the good old way.

*SHAKESPEARE'S CREATIVE GENIUS.

Shakespeare thus used the skeletons of former life that had drifted down to him upon the stream of time and were cast at his feet, a heap of mere dead matter. But he clothed them with flesh and blood, and breathed life into their nostrils; and they lived and moved with a life that was individual and self-existent after he had once thrown it off from his own exuberant intellectual vitality. He made his plays no galleries of portraits of his contemporaries, carefully seeking models through the social scale, from king to beggar. His teeming brain bred lowlier beggars and kinglier kings than all Europe could have furnished as subjects for his portraiture. He found in his own consciousness ideals, the like of which for beauty or deformity neither he nor any other man had ever looked upon. In his heart were the motives, the passions, of all humanity; in his mind, the capability, if not the actuality, of all human thought. Nature, in forming him alone of all the poets, had laid that touch upon his soul which made it akin with the whole world, and which enabled him to live at will throughout all time, among all peoples. Capable thus, in his complete and symmetrical nature, of feeling with and thinking for all mankind, he found in an isolated and momentary phase of his own existence the law which governed the life of those to whom that single phase was their whole sphere. From the germ within himself he produced the perfect individual, as it had been or might have been developed. The eternal laws of human life were his servants by his heaven-bestowed prerogative, and he was yet their instrument. Conformed to them because instinct with them, obedient to, yet swaying them, he used their subtle and unerring powers to work out from seemingly trivial and independent truths the vast problems of humanity; and standing ever within the limits of his own experience, he read and reproduced the inner life of those on the loftiest heights or in the lowest depths of being, with the certainty of the physiologist who from the study of his own organization recreates the monsters of the ante-human world, or of the astronomer who, not moving from his narrow study, announced the place, form, movement, and condition of a planet then hid from earthly eyes in the abyss of space.

Shakespeare thus suffered not even a temporary absorption of his personages; he lost not the least consciousness of selfhood, or the creator's power over the clay that he was moulding. He was at no time a murderer at heart because he drew Macbeth, or mad because he made King Lear. We see that, although he thinks with the brain and feels with the soul of each of his personages by turns, he has the power of deliberate introspection during this strange metempsychosis, and of standing outside of his transmuted self, and regarding these forms which his mind takes on as we do; in a word, of being at the same time actor and spectator.

*EDWARD EVERETT HALE,

A PROLIFIC and suggestive writer, and the editor of the Old and New of Boston, was born in that city, April 3, 1822. He is the son of Nathan Hale, LL.D., and of Sarah Preston Hale, a sister of Edward Everett. His father, a nephew of the Captain Nathan Hale executed in New York as a spy by Sir William Howe in 1776, became the proprietor of the Boston Daily Advertiser in 1814. It was "the first daily in New England, and for many years the only one, and established the principle of editorial responsibility distinct from that of individual contributors. Its influence was great."* He was a public-spirited citizen, and notably active in establishing a system of railroads in Massachusetts. In 1825 he prepared a map of New England, a standard authority, and three years later a work on the policy of a protective tariff. He was a member of the club that established the North American Review and the Christian Examiner. He died at Brookline, Mass., February 9, 1863, in his seventy-ninth year.

Edward Everett Hale was graduated at Harvard College in 1839. He was pastor of the Church of the Unity, at Worcester, Massachusetts, from 1846 to 1856; and of the South Congregational Church, Boston, since that time. He is an active member of the American Anti-Quarian Society, and has contributed many papers to its publications, as well as to the Christian Examiner, and other leading periodicals. The American edition of Lingard's History of England, in thirteen volumes, was published at Boston under his editorial supervision, in 1853-4.

His original works comprise Margaret Percival in America, written as a sequel to a tale by Rev. William Sewall, 1850; Sketches of Christian History, 1850; Kansas and Nebraska, a sketch of the physical characteristics and political position of those Territories, 1854; and Ninety Days' Worth of Europe.

* From Life and Genius of Shakespeare, 1865, pp. 288-90.

* Drake's Biographical Dictionary, art. Nathan Hale, p. 395. Allibone's Dictionary of English Literature.

The Man Without a Country, a story having all the verisimilitude of actual fact, which he contributed to the Atlantic Monthly during the war, under the pen-name of Col. Frederick Ingham, won, as it deserved, the popular favor. Like it, his later writings show power of imagination and a definite moral purpose held in view, though not always such an artistic elaboration of their themes. These works comprise: If, Yes, and Perhaps: Four Possibilities and Six Exaggerations, with some Bits of Fact, 1868, a series of brilliant magazine articles; and The Ingham Papers, 1869. Sybaris, and Other Homes, 1869, sets out to picture what the homes of laboring men are, what they ought to be, and what they ought not to be. Ten Times One is Ten; or, The Possible Reformation: A Story in Nine Chapters, gives a plausible basis on which to inaugurate the millennial epoch, founded on these four principles of social conduct: "To look up and not down; to look forward and not back; to look out and not in; and, to lend a hand." How to Do It, 1871, purports to be a book of suggestions on talking, reading, writing, society, travel, etc. Six of One by Half a Dozen of the Other, 1872 a social romance, was jointly constructed by three lady writers—Harriet Beecher Stowe, Adeline D. T. Whitney, and Lucretia P. Hale; and three gentlemen—Frederick W. Loring, F. B. Perkins, and its projector, E. E. Hale. Christmas Eve and Christmas Day, 1873, a series of stories, with a sketch of the first Christmas celebrated by a king of Italy in Rome, was followed by Ups and Downs, An Every-Day Novel. Mr. Hale is also the editor of Old and New, a literary magazine established by him in 1869.

*THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY—FROM IF, YES, AND PERHAPS.

I suppose that very few casual readers of the New York Herald of August 13th observed, in an obscure corner, among the "Deaths," the announcement, —

"NOLAN. Died, on board U. S. Corvette Levant, Lat. 2° 11' S., Long. 131° W., on the 11th of May, PHILIP NOLAN."

I happened to observe it, because I was stranded at the old Mission-House in Mackinaw, waiting for a Lake Superior steamer which did not choose to come, and I was devouring to the very stubble all the current literature I could get hold of, even down to the deaths and marriages in the Herald. My memory for names and people is good, and the reader will see, as he goes on, that I had reason enough to remember Philip Nolan. There are hundreds of readers who would have paused at that announcement, if the officer of the Levant who reported it had chosen to make it thus:—"Died, May 11th. THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY." For it was as "The Man without a Country" that poor Philip Nolan had generally been known by the officers who had him in charge during some fifty years, as, indeed, by all the men who sailed under them. I dare say there is many a man who has taken wine with him once a fortnight, in a three years' cruise, who never knew that his name was "Nolan," or whether the poor wretch had any name at all.

There can now be no possible harm in telling this poor creature's story. Reason enough there has been till now, ever since Madison's administration went out in 1817, for very strict secrecy, the secrecy of honor itself, among the gentlemen of the navy who have had Nolan in successive charge. And certainly it speaks well for the esprit de corps of the profession, and the personal honor of its members, that to the press this man's story has been wholly unknown,—and, I think, to the country at large also. I have reason to think, from some investigations I made in the Naval Archives, when I was attached to the Bureau of Construction, that every official report relating to him was burned when Ross burned the public buildings at Washington. One of the Tuckers, or possibly one of the Watsons, had Nolan in charge at the end of the war; and when, on returning from his cruise, he reported at Washington to one of the Crowninshields,—who was in the Navy Department when he came home,—he found that the Department ignored the whole business. Whether they really knew nothing about it, or whether it was a "Non mi ricordo," determined on as a piece of policy, I do not know. But this I do know, that since 1817, and possibly before, no naval officer has mentioned Nolan in his report of a cruise.

But, as I say, there is no need for secrecy any longer. And now the poor creature is dead, it seems to me worth while to tell a little of his story, by way of showing young Americans of to-day what it is to be A MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY.

Philip Nolan was as fine a young officer as there was in the "Legion of the West," as the Western division of our army was then called. When Aaron Burr made his first dashing expedition down to New Orleans in 1805, at Fort Massac, or somewhere above on the river, he met, as the devil would have it, this gay, da-hing, bright young fellow, at some dinner-party, I think. Burr marked him, talked to him, walked with him, took him a day or two's voyage in his flat-boat, and, in short, fascinated him. For the next year barrack-life was very tame to poor Nolan. He occasionally availed himself of the permission the great man had given him to write to him. Long, high-worded, stilted letters the poor boy wrote and rewrote and copied. But never a line did he have in reply from the gay deceiver. The other boys in the garrison sneered at him, because he sacrificed in this unrequited affection for a politician the time which they devoted to Monongahela, hazard, and high-low-jack. Bourbon, euchre, and poker were still unknown. But one day Nolan had his revenge. This time Burr came down the river, not as an attorney seeking a place for his office, but as a disguised conqueror. He had defeated I know not how many district-attorneys; he had dined at I know not how many public dinners; he had been heralded in I know not how many Weekly Arguses, and it was rumored that he had an army behind him and an empire before him. It was a great day—his arrival—to poor Nolan. Burr had not been at the fort an hour before he sent for him. That evening he asked Nolan to take him out in his skiff, to show him a cane-brake or a cotton-wood tree, as he said,—really to seduce him; and by the time the sail was over, Nolan was enlisted body and soul. From that time, though he did not yet know it, he lived as A MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY.

What Burr meant to do I know no more than you, dear reader. It is none of our business just now. Only, when the grand catastrophe came, and Jefferson and the House of Virginia of that day undertook to break on the wheel all the possible Clarences of the then House of York, by the great treason-trial at Richmond, some of the lesser fry in that distant Mississippi Valley, which was farther from us than Puget's Sound is to-day, introduced the like novelty on their provincial stage, and, to while away the monotony of the summer at Fort Adams, got up, for spectacles, a string of court-martials on the officers there. One and another of the colonels and majors were tried, and, to fill out the list, little Nolan, against whom, Heaven knows, there was evidence enough, — that he was sick of the service, had been willing to be false to it, and would have obeyed any order to march any-whither with any one who would follow him had the order been signed, "By command of His Exc. A. Burr." The courts dragged on. The big flies escaped, — rightly for all I know. Nolan was proved guilty enough, as I say; yet you and I would never have heard of him, reader, but that, when the president of the court asked him at the close, whether he wished to say anything to show that he had always been faithful to the United States, he cried out, in a fit of frenzy, —

"D—n the United States! I wish I may never hear of the United States again!"

I suppose he did not know how the words shocked old Colonel Morgan, who was holding the court. Half the officers who sat in it had served through the Revolution, and their lives, not to say their necks, had been risked for the very idea which he so cavalierly cursed in his madness. He, on his part, had grown up in the West of those days, in the midst of "Spanish Plot," "Orleans Plot," and all the rest. He had been educated on a plantation where the finest company was a Spanish officer or a French merchant from Orleans. His education, such as it was, had been perfected in commercial expeditions to Vera Cruz, and I think he told me his father once hired an Englishman to be a private tutor for a winter on the plantation. He had spent half his youth with an older brother, hunting horses in Texas; and, in a word, to him "United States" was scarcely a reality. Yet he had been fed by "United States" for all the years since he had been in the army. He had sworn on his faith as a Christian to be true to "United States." It was "United States" which gave him the uniform he wore, and the sword by his side. Nay, my poor Nolan, it was only because "United States" had picked you out first as one of her own confidential men of honor that "A. Burr" cared for you a straw more than for the flat-boat men who sailed his ark for him. I do not excuse Nolan; I only explain to the reader why he damned his country, and wished he might never hear her name again.

He never did hear her name but once again. From that moment, September 23, 1807, till the day he died, May 11, 1863, he never heard her name again. For that half-century and more he was a man without a country.

Old Morgan, as I said, was terribly shocked. If Nolan had compared George Washington to Benedict Arnold, or had cried, "God save King George," Morgan would not have felt worse. He called the court into his private room, and returned in fifteen minutes, with a face like a sheet, to say, —

"Prisoner, hear the sentence of the Court! The Court decides, subject to the approval of the President, that you never hear the name of the United States again."

Nolan laughed. But nobody else laughed. Old Morgan was too solemn, and the whole room was hushed dead as night for a minute. Even Nolan lost his swagger in a moment. Then Morgan added, —

"Mr. Marshal, take the prisoner to Orleans in an armed boat, and deliver him to the naval commander there."

The Marshal gave his orders and the prisoner was taken out of court.

"Mr. Marshal," continued old Morgan, "see that no one mentions the United States to the prisoner. Mr. Marshal, make my respects to Lieutenant Mitchell at Orleans, and request him to order that no one shall mention the United States to the prisoner while he is on board ship. You will receive your written orders from the officer on duty here this evening. The court is adjourned without day."

I have always supposed that Colonel Morgan himself took the proceedings of the court to Washington City, and explained them to Mr. Jefferson. Certain it is that the President approved them, — certain, that is, if I may believe the men who say they have seen his signature. Before the Nautilus got round from New Orleans to the Northern Atlantic coast with the prisoner on board the sentence had been approved, and he was a man without a country.

The plan then adopted was substantially the same which was necessarily followed ever after. Perhaps it was suggested by the necessity of sending him by water from Fort Adams and Orleans. The Secretary of the Navy — it must have been the first Crowninshield, though he is a man I do not remember — was requested to put Nolan on board a government vessel bound on a long cruise, and to direct that he should be only so far confined there as to make it certain that he never saw or heard of the country. We had few long cruises then, and the navy was very much out of favor; and as almost all of this story is traditional, as I have explained, I do not know certainly what his first cruise was. But the commander to whom he was intrusted, — perhaps it was Tingey or Shaw, though I think it was one of the younger men, — we are all old enough now, — regulated the etiquette and the precautions of the affair, and according to his scheme they were carried out, I suppose, till Nolan died. . . .

The rule adopted on board the ships on which I have met "the man without a country" was, I think, transmitted from the beginning. No mess liked to have him permanently, because his presence cut off all talk of home or of the prospect of return, of politics or letters, of peace or of war, — cut off more than half the talk the men liked to have at sea. But it was always thought too hard that he should never meet the rest of us, except to touch hats, and we finally sank into one system. He was not permitted to talk with the men, unless an officer was by. With officers he had unrestrained intercourse, as far as they and he chose. But he grew shy, though he had favorites: I was one. Then the captain always asked him to dinner on Monday. Every mess in succession took up the invitation in its turn. According to the size of the ship, you had him at your mess more or less often at dinner. His breakfast he ate in his own state-room, — He always had a state-room, — which was where a sentinel or somebody on the watch could see the door. And whatever else he ate or drank, he ate or drank alone. Sometimes, when the marines or sailors had a special jollification, they were permitted to invite "Plain-Buttons," as they called him. Then Nolan was sent with some officer, and the men were forbidden to speak of home while he was there. I believe the theory was that the sight of his punishment did them good. They called him "Plain-Buttons," because, while he always chose to wear a regulation army-uniform, he was not permitted to wear the army-button, for the reason that it bore either the initials or the insignia of the country he had disowned.

I remember, soon after I joined the navy, I was on shore with some of the older officers of our ship and from the Brandywine, which we had met at Alexandria. We had leave to make a party and go up to Cairo and the Pyramids. As we jogged along (you went on donkeys then), some of the gentlemen (we boys called them "Dons," but the phrase was long since changed) fell to talking about Nolan, and some one told the system which was adopted from the first about his books and other reading. As he was almost never permitted to go on shore, even though the vessel lay in port for months, his time at the best hung heavy; and everybody was permitted to lend him books, if they were not published in America and made no allusion to it. These were common enough in the old days, when people in the other hemisphere talked of the United States as little as we do of Paraguay. He had almost all the foreign papers that came into the ship, sooner or later; only somebody must go over them first, and cut out any advertisement or stray paragraph that alluded to America. This was a little cruel sometimes, when the back of what was cut out might be as innocent as Hesiod. Right in the midst of one of Napoleon's battles, or one of Canning's speeches, poor Nolan would find a great hole, because on the back of the page of that paper there had been an advertisement of a packet for New York, or a scrap from the President's message. I say this was the first time I ever heard of this plan, which afterwards I had enough and more than enough to do with. I remember it, because poor Phillips, who was of the party, as soon as the allusion to reading was made, told a story of something which happened at the Cape of Good Hope on Nolan's first voyage; and it is the only thing I ever knew of that voyage. They had touched at the Cape, and had done the civil thing with the English Admiral and the fleet, and then, leaving for a long cruise up the Indian Ocean, Phillips had borrowed a lot of English books from an officer, which, in those days, as indeed in these, was quite a windfall. Among them, as the devil would order, was the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," which they had all of them heard of, but which most of them had never seen. I think it could not have been published long. Well, nobody thought there could be any risk of anything national in that, though Phillips swore old Shaw had cut out the "Tempest" from Shakespeare before he let Nolan have it, because he said "the Bermudas ought to be ours, and, by Jove, should be one day." So Nolan was permitted to join the circle one afternoon when a lot of them sat on deck smoking and reading aloud. People do not do such things so often now; but when I was young we got rid of a great deal of time so. Well, so it happened that in his turn Nolan took the book and read to the others; and he read very well, as I know. Nobody in the circle knew a line of the poem, only it was all magic and Border chivalry, and was ten thousand years ago. Poor Nolan read steadily through the fifth canto, stopped a minute and drank something, and then began, without a thought of what was coming,—

"Breathes there the man, with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,—"

It seems impossible to us that anybody ever heard this for the first time; but all these fellows did then, and poor Nolan himself went on, still unconsciously or mechanically,—

"This is my own, my native land!"

Then they all saw something was to pay; but he expected to get through, I suppose, turned a little pale, but plunged on,—

"Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned
From wandering on a foreign strand? —
If such there breathe, go, mark him well,—"

By this time the men were all beside themselves, wishing there was any way to make him turn over two pages; but he had not quite presence of mind for that; he gagged a little, colored crimson, and staggered on,—

"For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim,
Despite these titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentrated all in self,—"

and here the poor fellow choked, could not go on, but started up, swung the book into the sea, vanished into his state-room, "And by Jove," said Phillips, "we did not see him for two months again. And I had to make up some beggarly story to that English surgeon why I did not return Mis Walter Scott to him."

That story shows about the time when Nolan's braggadocio must have broken down. At first, they said, he took a very high tone, considered his imprisonment a mere farce, affected to enjoy the voyage, and all that; but Phillips said that after he came out of his state-room he never was the same man again. He never read aloud again, unless it was the Bible or Shakespeare, or something else he was sure of. But it was not that merely. He never entered in with the other young men exactly as a companion again. He was always shy afterwards, when I knew him,—very seldom spoke, unless he was spoken to, except to a very few friends. He lighted up occasionally,—I remember late in his life hearing him fairly eloquent on something which had been suggested to him by one of Flécher's sermons,—but generally he had the nervous, tired look of a heart-wounded man. . . .

Since writing this, and while considering whether or no I would print it, as a warning to the young Nolans and Vallandighams and Tatnalls of to-day of what it is to throw away a country, I have received from Danforth, who is on board the Levant, a letter which gives an account of Nolan's last hours. It removes all my doubts about telling this story.

To understand the first words of the letter, the non-professional reader should remember that after 1817, the position of every officer who had Nolan in charge was one of the greatest delicacy. The government had failed to renew the order of 1807, regarding him. What was a man to do? Should he let him go? What, then, if he were called to account by the Department for violating the order of 1807? Should he keep him? What, then, if Nolan should be liberated some day, and should bring an action for false imprisonment or kidnapping against every man who had had him in charge? I urged and pressed this upon Southard, and I have reason to think that other officers did the same thing. But the Secretary always said, as they so often do at Washington, that there were no special orders to give, and that we must act on our own judgment. That means, "If you succeed, you will be sustained: if you fail, you will be disavowed." Well, as Danforth says, all that is over now, though I do not know but I expose myself to a criminal prosecution on the evidence of the very revelation I am making.

Here is the letter:—

"LEVANT, 2° 2' S. @ 131° W.

"DEAR FRED:—I try to find heart and life to tell you that it is all over with dear old Nolan. I have been with him on this voyage more than I ever was, and I can understand wholly now the way in which you used to speak of the dear old fellow. I could see that he was not strong, but I had no idea the end was so near. The doctor has been watching him very carefully, and yesterday morning came to me and told me that Nolan was not so well, and had not left his state-room,—a thing I never remember before. He had let the doctor come and see him as he lay there,—the first time the doctor had been in the state-room,—and he said he should like to see me. O dear! do you remember the mysteries we boys used to invent about his room, in the old Intrepid days? Well, I went in, and there, to be sure, the poor fellow lay in his berth, smiling pleasantly as he gave me his hand, but looking very frail. I could not help a glance round, which showed me what a little shrine he had made of the box he was lying in. The stars and stripes were triced up above and around a picture of Washington, and he had painted a majestic eagle, with lightnings blazing from his beak and his foot just clasping the whole globe, which his wings overshadowed. The dear old boy saw my glance, and said, with a sad smile, 'Here, you see, I have a country!' And then he pointed to the foot of his bed, where I had not seen before a great map of the United States, as he had drawn it from memory, and which he had there to look upon as he lay. Quaint, queer old names were on it, in large letters: 'Indiana Territory,' 'Mississippi Territory,' and 'Louisiana Territory,' as I suppose our fathers learned such things; but the old fellow had patched in Texas, too; he had carried his western boundary all the way to the Pacific, but on that shore he had defined nothing.

"O Danforth,' he said, 'I know I am dying. I cannot get home. Surely you will tell me something now?—Stop! stop! Do not speak till I say what I am sure you know, that there is not in this ship, that there is not in America—God bless her!—a more loyal man than I. There cannot be a man who loves the old flag as I do, or prays for it as I do, or hopes for it as I do. There are thirty-four stars in it now, Danforth. I thank God for that, though I do not know what their names are. There has never been one taken away: I thank God for that. I know by that that there has never been any successful Burr. O Danforth, Danforth,' he sighed out, 'how like a wretched night's dream a boy's idea of personal fame or of separate sovereignty seems, when one looks back on it after such a life as mine! But tell me,—tell me something,—tell me everything, Danforth, before I die!'

"Ingham, I swear to you that I felt like a monster that I had not told him everything before. Danger, or no danger, delicacy or no delicacy, who was I, that I should have been acting the tyrant all this time over this dear, sainted old man, who had years ago expiated, in his whole manhood's life, the madness of a boy's treason? 'Mr. Nolan,' said I, 'I will tell you everything you ask about. Only, where shall I begin?'

"O the blessed smile that crept over his white face! and he pressed my hand and said, 'God bless you!' 'Tell me their names,' he said, and he pointed to the stars on the flag. 'The last I know is Ohio. My father lived in Kentucky. But I have guessed Michigan and Indiana and Mississippi,—that was where Fort Adams is,—they make twenty. But where are your other fourteen? You have not cut up any of the old ones, I hope?'

"Well, that was not a bad text, and I told him the names in as good order as I could, and he bade me take down his beautiful map and draw them in as I best could with my pencil. He was wild with delight about Texas, told me how his brother died there; he had marked a gold cross where he supposed his brother's grave was; and he had guessed at Texas. Then he was delighted as he saw California and Oregon;—that, he said, he had suspected partly, because he had never been permitted to land on that shore, though the ships were there so much. 'And the men,' said he, laughing, 'brought off a good deal besides furs.' Then he went back—heavens, how far!—to ask about the Chesapeake, and what was done to Barron for surrendering her to the Leopard, and whether Burr ever tried again,—and he ground his teeth with the only passion he showed. But in a moment that was over, and he said, 'God forgive me, for I am sure I forgive him.' Then he asked about the old war,—told me the true story of his serving the gun the day we took the Java,—asked about dear old David Porter, as he called him. Then he settled down more quietly, and very happily, to hear me tell in an hour the history of fifty years.

"How I wished it had been somebody who knew something! But I did as well as I could. I told him of the English war. I told him about Fulton and the steamboat beginning. I told him about old Scott, and Jackson; told him all I could think of about the Mississippi, and New Orleans, and Texas, and his own old Kentucky. And do you think, he asked who was in command of the 'Legion of the West.' I told him it was a very gallant officer named Grant, and that, by our last news, he was about to establish his head-quarters at Vicksburg. Then, 'Where was Vicksburg?' I worked that out on the map; it was about a hundred miles, more or less, above his old Fort Adams; and I thought Fort Adams must be a ruin now. 'It must be at old Vick's plantation,' said he: 'well, that is a change!'

"I tell you, Ingham, it was a hard thing to condense the history of half a century into that talk with a sick man. And I do not now know what I told him,—of emigration, and the means of it,—of steamboats, and railroads, and telegraphs,—of inventions, and books, and literature,—of the colleges, and West Point, and the Naval School,—but with the queerest interruptions that ever you heard. You see it was Robinson Crusoe asking all the accumulated questions of fifty-six years!

"I remember he asked, all of a sudden, who was President now; and when I told him, he asked if Old Abe was General Benjamin Lincoln's son. He said he met old General Lincoln, when he was quite a boy himself, at some Indian treaty. I said no, that Old Abe was a Kentuckian like himself, but I could not tell him of what family; he had worked up from the ranks. 'Good for him!' cried Nolan; 'I am glad of that. As I have brooded and wondered, I have thought our danger was in keeping up those regular successions in the first families.' Then I got talking about my visit to Washington. I told him of meeting the Oregon Congressman, Harding: I told him about the Smithsonian, and the Exploring Expedition; I told him about the Capitol, and the statues for the pediment, and Crawford's Liberty, and Greenough's Washington: Ingham, I told him everything I could think of that would show the grandeur of his country and its prosperity; but I could not make up my mouth to tell him a word about this infernal Rebellion.

"And he drank it in, and enjoyed it as I cannot tell you. He grew more and more silent, yet I never thought he was tired or faint. I gave him a glass of water, but he just wet his lips, and told me not to go away. Then he asked me to bring the Presbyterian 'Book of Public Prayer,' which lay there, and said, with a smile, that it would open at the right place,—and so it did. There was his double red mark down the page; and I knelt down and read, and he repeated with me, 'For ourselves and our country, O gracious God, we thank Thee, that, notwithstanding our manifold transgressions of Thy holy laws, Thou hast continued to us Thy marvellous kindness'—and so to the end of that thanksgiving. Then he turned to the end of the same book, and I read the words more familiar to me: 'Most heartily we beseech Thee with Thy favor to behold and bless Thy servant, the President of the United States, and all others in authority,'—and the rest of the Episcopal collect. 'Danforth,' said he, 'I have repeated those prayers night and morning, it is now fifty-five years.' And then he said he would go to sleep. He bent me down over him and kissed me; and he said, 'Look in my Bible, Danforth, when I am gone.' And I went away.

"But I had no thought it was the end. I thought he was tired and would sleep. I knew he was happy, and I wanted him to be alone.

"But in an hour, when the doctor went in gently, he found Nolan had breathed his life away with a smile. He had something pressed close to his lips. It was his Father's badge of the Order of the Cincinnati.

"We looked in his Bible, and there was a slip of paper at the place where he had marked the text:—

"They desire a country, even a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city."

"On this slip of paper he had written:

"Bury me in the sea; it has been my home, and I love it. But will not some one set up a stone for my memory at Fort Adams or at Orleans, that my disgrace may not be more than I ought to bear? Say on it:—

"In Memory of

"PHILIP NOLAN,

"Lieutenant in the Army of the United States.

"He loved his country as no other man has loved her; but no man deserved less at her hands."

 WILLIAM T. ADAMS

Is known to the boys and girls of this generation, under the familiar name of "Oliver Optic," as a fascinating story-teller, whose pen never tires or grows dull. He is of English descent, and allied to the parent stock of that family which has given such illustrious statesmen to the nation. His ancestor, Henry Adams, having escaped from the historic "Green Dragon Persecution," settled with several sons at Quincy, Massachusetts, in 1630. One of these sons moved to Medfield, in the same State, and from him descended William T. Adams, who was born at Medway, July 30, 1822. His father kept a hotel in that town till he removed to Boston, when he took charge of the Washington Coffee House, and subsequently had the famous Lamb Tavern. In these hotels young Adams passed his early days, attending the public schools of the city, and the private school of Abel Whitney in Harvard Place. In 1838 the residence of the family was changed to West Roxbury, where his education was continued. It was here that he made his earliest attempts at literary composition. His first piece was eight pages in length, his second twenty-five, and his third eighty pages! Not unfrequently he sat up all night, when his parents supposed him to be abed, writing with his great-coat and gloves on. His first article in print appeared in The Social Monitor, and others soon followed.

William T. Adams

William T. Adams, at the age of twenty, went to Dorchester to teach as a substitute for a month, and in the following spring (1843) he was chosen principal of what is now the Harris School of Boston, as Dorchester was annexed in 1870. The report of the committee speaks of this school as "one of the best, if not the very best, at present in the town." During these three years of teaching his mind and pen were actively employed, while he acquired quite a reputation for songs, dialogues, speeches, and school exhibitions. In 1846, he became an assistant to his father in the management of the Adams House, then the best hotel in Boston, and named after the President. In accordance with his disposition for thoroughness, he visited all the Northern cities, also Richmond, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Montreal, etc., to inspect their hotels, and to advertise that establishment. The Adams House soon came into the hands of his brother Laban and himself, but the enterprise was not a success, perhaps for the rare reason, as his friends said, that they kept too good a house to succeed. After a Southern trip, the incidents of which suggested one of his stories, he entered the Boylston school as a substitute for the usher, and was soon chosen principal. When the Bowditch school was organized, he was put at its head, and continued to be its principal till 1865. In the latter year he resigned and paid a visit to Europe, visiting England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and Belgium, all the while collecting data for new books.

Mr. Adams' career as an author, a career free from the disappointments and annoyances that usually attend a literary life, may be said to begin at this date, when he accepted it as the duty of his life. His industry and his rare facility in composition are such that he has written over eight hundred stories, chiefly on domestic themes, besides sixty-two volumes. In all the years of his labors not one work has failed to achieve a pecuniary success, and their aggregate sale has been carefully estimated at not less than a million volumes. The elements of his popularity are to be found in his live sympathy with the young folks, and in his long and intimate connection with public schools, which has given him a thorough knowledge of childish character and habits. At one time he had twelve hundred scholars and twenty-five teachers under his immediate control; for twenty years he was a Sunday-school teacher, and for ten years a superintendent. His style is sprightly. His stories are entertaining illustrations of real life, devoid alike of all sickly sentimentality and precocity in the personages, as well as of the commonplace tendency to preach morality. Yet a sound morality pervades these parables, so that right and wrong are shown in the light of their results. His motto in writing for the young, as once given in conversation to a friend, is, "First, God; then country; then friends;" and his books illustrate this sentiment. As to the effect of such works on the minds of impressible children, it is a fact, recognized by those best qualified by experience to form a judgment, that the general tone of the present juvenile literature is too highly seasoned and excitable. On this score, this writer has fewer lapses than some of his brethren.

The first notable efforts of Mr. Adams were two temperance tales, originally published in the Washingtonian, in 1845. Four years later he wrote a "sensational" story, entitled Hatchie, the Guardian Slave; or, the Heiress of Bellevue; and previous to its appearance in book-form, he received his first fee as a writer, six dollars, for a story in The True Flag. This was followed by many other sketches for newspapers, which found ready purchasers. He varied his labors by occasional poems for societies and anniversaries, one of which, written for the "Boston Young Men's Total Abstinence Society," was printed in the Flag of Our Union, in 1851, with this caption: 1951: A Poem delivered before the Mutual Admiration Society, by Oliver Optic, M. D. This was the first use of that nom de plume. Mr. Adams took the name of "Dr. Optic" from a character in a play then being performed at the Boston Museum, and put to it the alliterative prefix of "Oliver." Since that time it has been attached to his domestic and juvenile writings. The success of Hatchie, which was published in 1854, led to the rapid issue of a volume made up of several of his stories, and of The Boat Club, the first half of which went to press before the second was written. The favorable comment on the latter work by Putnam's Magazine, then the chief critical authority—"Oliver Optic will do a good work in furnishing books of precisely this character for juvenile readers"—encouraged this author to devote his spare time to this line of literary labor.*

Mr. Adams edited the Student and Schoolmaster, a monthly magazine for young people, for nine years, 1858-66; and from 1867 to date, Oliver Optic's Magazine for Our Boys and Girls. He was elected a member of the school committee of Dorchester in 1867, receiving only one opposing vote in a ballot of 1050, and that cast by himself; and was re-elected in 1870 and 1873. He has acquitted himself with credit in other important positions, including a term in the State Legislature. In 1870 he made a second voyage to Europe to qualify himself to prepare the second series of Young America Abroad, by travel in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland, Russia, Germany, Austria, Turkey, Greece, Italy, Spain, and Portugal.

 JAMES STRONG,

A LAYMAN with ministerial honors, who possesses in rare combination scholarly habits conjoined to active literary tastes and talents decidedly practical, was born in New York city, August 14, 1822. Left an orphan at an early age, and being a lover of books, he soon assumed the responsibility of obtaining an education. After a long training in boarding-schools,

*The following is a complete list of Mr. Adams' works, with the dates of publication. Hatchie; The Boat Club, 1854; All Aboard, 1855; Now or Never, 1856; Try Again, 1857; Poor and Proud, 1858; Little by Little, 1860; Riverdale Stories, 12 volumes, 1860-3; Rich and Humble; In School and Out; A Spelling-Book for Advanced Classes, 1863; Watch and Wait; The Soldier Boy; The Sailor Boy, 1864; Work and Win; The Young Lieutenant; The Yankee Middy; Fighting Joe, 1865; Hope and Have; Haste and Waste; Brave Old Salt; Outward Bound; The Way of the World, a Novel, 1866; Shamrock and Thistle; Red Cross; The Starry Flag; Breaking Away; Seek and Find, 1867; Dikes and Ditches; Palace and Cottage; Freaks of Fortune; Make or Break; Down the River, 1868; Down the Rhine; Our Standard Bearer; Through by Daylight; Lightning Express; On Time; Switch Off, 1869; Brake Up; Bear and Forbear; Field and Forest; Plane and Plank; Desk and Debit, 1870; Cringle and Cross Tree; Bivouac and Battle; Up the Baltic, 1871; Northern Lands; Sea and Shore; Cross and Crescent; Little Bobtail, 1872; The Yacht Club; Money-Maker; Victory of the Basilisk; Sunny Shores, 1873.

at the age of seventeen he went into the family of a physician at Lowville, in Lewis county, New York, to qualify himself for the practice of medicine; but the failure of his health from over study led to his retirement. After a period of rest, he prepared himself by a year's study to enter the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut, and graduated in 1844 with the highest honors. An appointment at once followed as teacher of languages in the Troy Conference Academy, at Poultney, Vermont. His associates here were Rev. Dr. J. T. Peck, afterward president of Dickinson College, and now a bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. Dr. Wentworth, afterward president of McKendree College, and now editor of the Ladies' Repository, and Rev. Dr. John Newman, later a professor at Union College till his resignation. After a service of two years, during which he was married to a lady graduate of that institution, another failure of his health led him to retire for some eighteen months to the keeping of a small farm at Newtown, Long Island. He then settled at the village of Flushing, where he devoted himself to a thorough course of Biblical studies. His practical talents were here utilized as a member of the board of education, as a justice of the peace, elected on the temperance ticket, and as the president of the first railroad from Flushing to the East river, besides the planning of a local cemetery and a new village.

James Strong

A course of gratuitous instruction to private classes, especially in the Greek and Hebrew languages, led Dr. Strong to his first literary labors—the preparation of brief manuals of grammar, so arranged that the important principles of those languages could be mastered in a few months; and to these were added similar manuals of Chaldee and Syriac grammar, the first of which was printed. A brief Theological Compend followed, as an advanced catechism of doctrines. In 1852, he published an elaborate Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels; with an abridgment, entitled Manual of the Gospels, and a companion question-book, adapted to advanced Bible classes. A Greek Harmony of the Gospels appeared in 1854. A treatise on the importance of Sunday-school effort was prepared for the Sunday-School Union of the M. E. Church, and many contributions, chiefly on Biblical topics, were made to religious periodicals, especially to the Methodist Quarterly Review, and the Christian Advocate. In 1856 he received the honorary degree of S. T. D. from his alma mater—a rare honor for a layman. He served from 1858 to 1861 as professor of Biblical Literature and vice-president of the new University at Troy, and then returned to Flushing to engage in public improvements, including the construction of a second railroad. At this time, in connection with Dr. H. B. Smith, he edited an American reprint, from the Edinburgh translation, of Stiers' Words of the Lord Jesus, in three volumes. He also prepared, with some assistance from Mr. Orange Judd, of the Agriculturist, and Mrs. Dr. Olin, a four-volume series of Lessons for Every Sunday in the Year, which formed the model for later Sunday-school manuals, including the "International Series" now so generally adopted. In 1868, he was elected Professor of Exegetical Theology in the new Theological Seminary established by the munificence of Daniel Drew at Madison, New Jersey, and still continues to discharge its duties. He is an active member of the American branch of the "Palestine Exploration Committee," and also of the "Old Testament Company" of the "Committee for the Revision of the Authorized Version of the Bible."

Dr. Strong's chief work, prepared in connection with the late Dr. McClintock, is the Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, the first volume of which appeared in 1867, and the fourth five years later, while the remainder are to follow at intervals of a year each. This standard work of reference, which covers all the subjects of sacred science, and is without a peer in any language for its comprehensive scope, contains contributions from the chief scholars of each denomination. Since the death of his associate, the whole task of its editing has devolved on him. He is also engaged on the translation, with additions, of Lange's Commentary on Daniel, in the series edited by Dr. Schaff. Some other works are also in progress: an Exhaustive Concordance of the English Bible; a Scriptural Reader; a Historical and Critical Bible; a Sacred History, and some minor writings.

 CHARLES PORTERFIELD KRAUTH,

A LEADING historian and theologian of the Lutheran Church in the United States, was born at Martinsburg, Virginia, March 17, 1823. His father, Dr. Charles Philip Krauth, who was born in Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, in 1777, held the presidency of the Pennsylvania College at Gettysburg from 1834 to 1847, and was Professor of Biblical Philology and Ecclesiastical History in the Gettysburg Theological Seminary from 1847 till his death, May 3, 1867. He was the author of various addresses, as well as the associate editor of the Lutheran Intelligencer and the Evangelical Review.

C. P. Krauth.

Charles Porterfield Krauth was graduated at Pennsylvania College in 1839, and ordained to the Lutheran ministry three years later. He has held pastoral charges in Baltimore, Winchester, Pittsburg, and Philadelphia, officiating in the latter city four years, 1859-63. He became editor of the Lutheran and Missionary in 1861, and three years later was appointed Norton Professor of Theology and Church History in the Lutheran Seminary, Philadelphia. The University of Pennsylvania called him to its chair of Moral and Intellectual Philosophy in 1868, and in 1873 he was elected to the Vice-Provostship.

His writings, besides a series of discourses,* and a number of scholarly contributions to leading journals, include: The Sunday Service, according to the Liturgies of the Churches of the Reformation, 1853; The Jubilee Service for the Seventh Jubilee of the Reformation, 1867; an edition of Fleming's Vocabulary of Philosophy, with an original introduction, chronology of the history of Philosophy brought down to 1860, bibliographical index, synthetical tables, and other additions; and a translation of Thobuck's Commentary on Saint John, from the sixth German edition, 1859. He has now in press an edition of Berkeley's Principles, with copious annotations. His chief work is, The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology: as Represented in the Augsburg Confession, and in the History and Literature of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Svo., pp. 850, 1871. The theological position of its author is thus stated in his prefatory words:

"It is the Lutheran Reformation in those features which distinguish it from the Zwinglian and Calvinistic Reformations which forms the topic of this book. Wherever Calvin abandoned Zwinglianism he approximated Lutheranism. Hence, on important points, this book, in defending Lutheranism over against Zwinglianism, defends Calvinism over against Zwinglianism also. It even defends Zwinglianism, so far as, in contrast with Anabaptism, it was relatively conservative. The Pelagianism of the Zwinglian theology was corrected by Calvin, who is the true father of the Reformed Church, as distinguished from the Lutheran. The theoretical tendencies of Zwingle developed into Arminianism and Rationalism; his practical tendencies into the superstitious anti-ritualism of ultra-Puritanism: and both the theoretical and practical found their harmony and consummation in Unitarianism."

The work has been accepted as a standard in its departments, and the leading critics confirm the judgment of the Princeton Review that it has been executed with singular ability and fidelity.†

 LUTHER. — FROM THE CONSERVATIVE REFORMATION.

Among all the tributes which the centuries have laid at the feet or on the tomb of Luther, none are more touching than the words in which Melancthon showed that Luther's death had brought back, in all its tenderness, the early, pure devotion. Melancthon, the Hamlet of the Reformation, shrinking from action into contemplation, with a dangerous yearning for a peace which must have been hollow and transient, had become more and more entangled in the complications of a specious but miserable policy, which he felt made him justly suspected by those whose confidence in him had once been unlimited. Luther was saddened by Melancthon's feebleness, and Melancthon was put under restraint by Luther's firmness. Melancthon was betrayed into writing weak, fretful, unworthy words in regard to Luther, whose surpassing love to Melancthon had been sorely tested, but had never yielded. But death makes or restores more bonds than it breaks. When the tidings of Luther's death reached Wittenberg, Melancthon cried out in anguish: "O my father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!" tributary words from one of the greatest, to the greatest. He was gone of whom Melancthon, cautious in praise, and measured in language, had said, from a full heart: "Luther is too great, too wonderful for me to depict in words."—"If there be a man on earth I love with my whole heart, that man is Luther." And again: "One is an interpreter; one, a logician; another, an orator, affluent and beautiful in speech; but Luther is all in all—whatever he writes, whatever he utters, pierces to the soul, fixes itself like arrows in the heart—he is a miracle among men."

What need we say more, after such eulogies?

The greatness of some men only makes us feel that, though they did well, others in their place might have done just as they did: Luther had that exceptional greatness which convinces the world that he alone could have done the work. He was not a mere mountain-top, catching a little earlier the beams, which, by their own course, would soon have found the valleys; but rather, by the divine ordination under which he rose, like the sun itself, without which the light on mountain and valley would have been but a starlight or moonlight. He was not a secondary orb, reflecting the light of another orb, as was Melancthon and even Calvin; still less the moon of a planet, as Bucer or Brentius; but the centre of undulations which filled a system with glory. Yet, though he rose wondrously to a divine ideal, he did not cease to be a man of men. He won the trophies of power, and the garlands of affection. Potentates feared him, and little children played with him. He has monuments in marble and bronze, medals in silver and gold; but his noblest monument is the best love of the best hearts, and the brightest, purest impression of his image has been left in the souls of regenerated nations. He was the best teacher of freedom and of loyalty. He has made the righteous throne stronger, and the innocent cottage happier. He knew how to laugh, and how to weep; therefore, millions laughed with him, and millions wept for him. He was tried by deep sorrow and brilliant fortune; he begged the poor scholars' bread, and from emperor and estates of the realm received an embassy, with a prince at its head, to ask him to untie the knot which defied the power of the soldier and the sagacity of the statesman; it was he who added to the Litany the words: "In all time of our tribulation, in all time of our prosperity, help us, good Lord;" but whether lured by the subtlest flattery or assailed by the powers of hell, tempted with the mitre, or threatened with the stake, he came off more than conqueror in all. He made a world rich forevermore, and, stripping himself in perpetual charities, died in poverty. He knew how to command—for he had learned how to obey. Had he been less courageous, he would have attempted nothing; had he been less cautious, he would have ruined all: the torrent was resistless, but the banks were deep. He tore up the mightiest evils by the root, but shielded with his own life the tenderest bud of good; he combined the aggressiveness of a just radicalism with the moral resistance—which seemed to the fanatic the passive weakness—of a true conservatism. Faith-inspired, he was faith-inspiring. Great in act as he was great in thought, proving himself fire with fire, "inferior eyes grew great by his example, and put on the dauntless spirit of resolution." The world knew his faults. He could not hide what he was. His transparent candor gave his enemies the material of their misrepresentation; but they cannot blame his infirmities without bearing witness to the nobleness which made him careless of appearances in a world of defamers. For himself, he had as little of the virtue of caution as he had, towards others, of the vice of dissimulation. Living under thousands of jealous and hating eyes, in the broadest light of day, the testimony of enemies but fixes the result: that his faults were those of a nature of the most consummate grandeur and fulness, faults more precious than the virtues of the common great. Four potentates ruled the mind of Europe in the Reformation, the Emperor Erasmus, the Pope and Luther. The Pope wanes, Erasmus is little, the Emperor is nothing, but Luther abides as a power for all time. His image casts itself upon the current of ages, as the mountain mirrors itself in the river that winds at its foot—the mighty fixing itself immutably upon the changing.

* Vide, Allibone's Dictionary of English Authors, vol. i.

† Princeton Review, July, 1871.

* THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,

A GENIAL essayist of ripe culture, whose pen has the happiest union of the fire of the soldier

235 and the grace of the artist, was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, December 22, 1823. His father, Stephen Higginson, formerly a merchant of Boston, was the steward of Harvard College, and was "habitually spoken of as the 'Man of Ross' of his day, from his profuse charities." His mother, Louisa (Storrow) Higginson, was a daughter of Captain Thomas Storrow, of the

Thos. Wentworth Higginson

British army. He is a lineal descendant, on the father's side, from Francis Higginson (1588–1630), who led the first large colony to the Massachusetts settlement, in 1629; and from his son, John Higginson† (1616–1708), who succeeded him in the Salem ministry. Both these were authors; as was also his grandfather, Stephen Higginson (1743–1828), who was a member of the Continental Congress, and navy agent under President Jefferson. The "Laco" letters of the latter, which assailed John Hancock, were famous in our post-revolutionary history, and have lately been reprinted. On his mother's side, he is a descendant from the families of Wentworth and Appleton, well known in New England history.

Mr. Higginson is the youngest of a family of fifteen children, his father having been twice married. He was fitted for college by William Wells, of Cambridge, an Englishman, and 'one of the pioneers of classical learning in America, to whose merit as a wise teacher he has paid a tribute in his writings.‡ James Russell Lowell and William W. Story were among his elder schoolmates. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1841, with the second rank in a class of which he was the youngest member. After some years spent in teaching and as a resident graduate at the University, he graduated at the Theological School of Cambridge in 1847, and was at once settled over the "First Religious Society" in Newburyport, Massachusetts.

* Drake's Biographical Dictionary, article Stephen Higginson.

† Anti, vol. i., p. 29.

‡ Out-Door Papers, "Saints and their Bodies," p. 15.

He left that church, owing to troubles growing out of the anti-slavery movement, in 1850, having meanwhile been nominated for Congress by the "Free Soil party" of that district, and defeated. In 1852 he removed to Worcester, Massachusetts, and was for six years minister of the "Worcester Free Church," with no denominational connexion. During this time he took an active part in the anti-slavery agitation. He was wounded in the "Anthony Burns riot" in 1853, and was indicted at that time with Theodore Parker, Wendell Phillips, and others, though all the prosecutions failed from a flaw in the indictments. He had much to do with the organization of emigration parties to Kansas in 1856, and was in that Territory during part of the civil strife, being on the staff of General James H. Lane, who commanded the "Free State forces." He had a general, though not a detailed, knowledge of Captain John Brown's movements, and organized an unsuccessful expedition into Virginia for the rescue of some of his associates.

In 1858 he retired from the pulpit, in order to devote himself permanently to literature; and he became one of the most frequent contributors to the Atlantic Monthly, then just established.

On the outbreak of the late war, he obtained authority from Governor Andrew to recruit a regiment in Massachusetts, and had made some progress when enlistments were temporarily stopped. In August, 1862, he recruited two companies for the Fifty-first Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and was commissioned as captain. Two months later he was promoted to be Colonel of the First South Carolina Volunteers—afterward the Thirty-third United States Colored Troops—the first slave regiment mustered into the national service. A vivid transcript of his military experiences with them is given in Army Life in a Black Regiment, 1870. He was in service two years, chiefly in South Carolina and Florida, acting part of the time as brigade commander, and making various expeditions into the interior, on one of which he took and held Jacksonville with a very small force. He was wounded in the side at Wiltown Bluff, South Carolina, in August, 1863, and had to retire from the service in consequence, in October, 1864. Since that time he has been devoted to literary pursuits, and has been an acceptable lecturer before popular lecture courses. He resides at Newport, Rhode Island.

He was married in 1847 to Mary E. Channing, a daughter of Dr. Walter Channing of Boston, a niece of the celebrated divine, and sister to the poet William Ellery Channing.

Mr. Higginson is a member of the American Oriental Society, the American Philological Society, the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, and the Boston Society of Natural History. He is also president of the American Woman's Suffrage Association, and vice president of the Free Religious Association. His contributions to literature have a like comprehensive scope and high-toned character. He edited, with Mr. Samuel Longfellow, Thalatta; a Book of Poetry for the Seaside, in 1853; made a new translation of Epictetus, based on that of Elizabeth Carter, in 1865; and prepared for the Harvard Alumni Association the Harvard Memorial Biographies, in commemoration of its graduates slain in the late war, in two volumes, 1866. Besides various pamphlets and speeches, he has contributed to Scribner's Monthly and Macmillan's Magazine, and also, editorially, to the Independent, Tribune, Woman's Journal, Index, and other newspapers. He wrote the biographies of Margaret Fuller Ossoli and Lydia Maria Child in Eminent Women of the Age (Hartford, 1868); and also a memoir of Dr. Thaddeus William Harris, prefixed to his Entomological Correspondence, 1869.

His purely original works, including Army Life in a Black Regiment, already mentioned, are four in number, and are all reprints, in part, from the Atlantic.

Out-Door Papers, a collection of essays, appeared in 1863. Its articles are divided between two leading topics—physical culture, and a study of nature with a lover's eye. The former is treated of with an enticing vim, in Saints and their Bodies, a Letter to a Dyspeptic, the Murder of the Innocents (a plea against the evil of over study required from children), a New Counterblast (against tobacco), the Health of Our Girls, etc. In the latter, after contrasting the climates and the peoples of England and America, he thus tersely sums up the result: "Physiologists must never forget that Nature is aiming at a keener and subtler temperament in framing the American—as beneath our dryer atmosphere the whole scale of sounds and hues and odors is attuned to a higher key—and that for us an equal state of health may yet produce a higher type of humanity." The other topic is artistically elaborated in April Days, My Out-Door Study, Water Lilies, the Life of Birds, the Procession of the Flowers, and Snow.

Malbone, an Oldport Romance, followed in 1869. It is a brilliant drama of home and social life, as seen at Newport, especially notable for its subtle delineations of temperaments and moods, having as its hero one of the fascinating grace of Rousseau, and, like him, with little moral stamina to curb the coquetry of his emotional nature. In its power of insight and its happy bits of description, this work recalls the skilful touch of Hawthorne, with whom its author has been ranked by the poet John G. Saxe. This and the next work were republished in England.

Atlantic Essays, 1871, contained a number of papers written between 1858 and 1870, each marked by its author's peculiar vigor of thought and graceful style. A part, advocating the claims of culture and the demands of literature, were connected by a unity of subject, as a Plea for Culture, Literature as an Art, Americanism in Literature, a Letter to a Young Contributor, and Ought Women to Learn the Alphabet? an argument for her civil emancipation, on the principle that "Woman must be a subject or an equal: there is no middle ground." The more miscellaneous articles included a Charge with Prince Rupert; The Greek Goddesses, a translation of which appeared in the Review Britannique for October, 1869; Sappho; The Puritan Minister; Mademoiselle's Campaigns, a sketch of the career of the Duchesse de Mont- pensier, who specially distinguished herself by the capture of Orleans, during the second war of the Fronde, in 1652; Fayal and the Portuguese, and one On An Old Latin Text-Book.

Mr. Higginson is understood to have in preparation a Child's History of the United States, to be constructed somewhat on the plan of Hawthorne's "Grandfather's Chair." His recent magazine papers about Newport are also to be collected into a volume, to be called Old-port Days.

* WATER-LILIES — FROM OUT-DOOR PAPERS.

The reader may not care to learn that the order of Nymphæaceæ "differs from Ranunculaceæ in the consolidation of its carpels, from Papaveraceæ in the placentation not being parietal, and from Nelumbiaceæ in the want of a large truncated disc containing monospermous achenia"; but they may like to know that the water-lily has relations on land, in all gradations of society, from poppy to magnolia, and yet does not conform its habits precisely to those of any of them. Its great black roots, sometimes as large as a man's arm, form a network at the bottom of the water. Its stem floats, an airy four-celled tube, adapting itself to the depth, and stiff in shallows, like the stalk of the yellow lily: and it contracts and curves downward when seed-time approaches. The leaves show beneath the magnifier beautiful adaptations of structure. They are not, like those of land-plants, constructed with deep veins to receive the rain and conduct it to the stem, but are smooth and glossy, and of even surface. The leaves of land-vegetation have also thousands of little breathing pores, principally on the under side: the apple-leaf, for instance, has twenty-four thousand to a square inch. But here they are fewer; they are wholly on the upper side, and, whereas in other cases they open or shut according to the moisture of the atmosphere, here the greedy leaves, secure of moisture, scarcely deign to close them. Nevertheless, even these give some recognition of hygrometric necessities, and, though living on the water; and not merely christened with dewdrops like other leaves, but baptized by immersion all the time, they are yet known to suffer in drought and to take pleasure in the rain.

After speaking of the various kindred of the water-lily, it would be wrong to leave our fragrant subject without due mention of its most magnificent, most lovely relative, at first claimed even as its twin sister, and classed as a Nymphæa. I once lived near neighbor to a Victoria Regia. Nothing in the world of vegetable existence has such a human interest. The charm is not in the mere size of the plant, which disappoints everybody, as Niagara does, when tried by that sole standard. The leaves of the Victoria, indeed, attain a diameter of six feet; the largest flowers, of twenty-three inches, — four times the size of the largest of our water-lilies. But it is not the measurements of the Victoria, it is its life which fascinates. It is not a thing merely of dimensions, nor merely of beauty, but a creature of vitality and motion. Those vast leaves expand and change almost visibly. They have been known to grow half an inch an hour, eight inches a day. Rising one day from the water, a mere clenched mass of yellow prickles, a leaf is transformed the next day to a crimson salver, gorgeously tinted on its upturned rim. Then it spreads into a raft of green, armed with long thorns, and supported by a framework of ribs and cross-pieces, an inch thick, and so substantial that the Brazil Indians, while gathering the seed-vessels, place their young children on the leaves, — grupe, or water-platter, they call the accommodating plant. But even these expanding leaves are not the glory of the Victoria; the glory is in the opening of the flower.

I have sometimes looked in, for a passing moment, at the green-house, its dwelling-place, during the period of the flowering, — and then stayed for more than an hour, unable to leave the fascinating scene. After the strange flower-bud has reared its dark head from the placid tank, moving it a little, uneasily, like some imprisoned water-creature, it pauses for a moment in a sort of dumb despair. Then trembling again, and collecting all its powers, it thrusts open, with an indignant jerk, the rough calyx-leaves, and the beautiful disrobing begins. The firm, white, central cone, first so closely infolded, quivers a little, and swiftly, before your eyes, the first of the hundred petals detaches its delicate edges, and springs back, opening towards the water, while its white reflection opens to meet it from below. Many moments of repose follow, — you watch, — another petal trembles, detaches, springs open, and is still. Then another, and another, and another. Each movement is so quiet, yet so decided, so living, so human, that the radiant creature seems a Musidora of the water, and you almost blush with a sense of guilt, in gazing on that peerless privacy. As petal by petal slowly opens, there still stands the central cone of snow, a glacier, an alp, a jungfrau, while each avalanche of whiteness seems the last. Meanwhile a strange, rich odor fills the air, and Nature seems to concentrate all fascinations and claim all senses for this jubilee of her darling.

So pass the enchanted moments of the evening, till the fair thing pauses at last, and remains for hours unchanged. In the morning, one by one, those white petals close again, shutting all their beauty in, and you watch through the short sleep for the period of waking. Can this bright transfigured creature appear again, in the same chaste loveliness? Your fancy can scarcely trust it, fearing some disastrous change; and your fancy is too true a prophet. Come again, after the second day's opening, and you start at the transformation which one hour has secretly produced. Can this be the virgin Victoria, — this thing of crimson passion, this pile of pink and yellow, relaxed, expanded, voluptuous, lolling languidly upon the water, never to rise again? In this short time every tint of every petal is transformed; it is gorgeous in beauty, but it is "Hebe turned to Magdalen."

Such is the Victoria Regia. But our rustic water-lily, our innocent Nymphæa, never claiming such a hot-house glory, never drooping into such a blush, blooms on placidly in the quiet waters, till she modestly folds her leaves for the last time, and bows her head beneath the surface forever. Next year she lives for us only in her children, fair and pure as herself.

Nay, not alone in them, but also in memory. The fair vision will not fade from us, though the paddle has dipped its last crystal drop from the waves, and the boat is drawn upon the shore. We may yet visit many lovely and lonely places, — meadows thick with violet, or the homes of the shy Rhodora, or those sloping forest-haunts where the slight Linnæa hangs its twin-born heads,—but no scene will linger on our vision like this annual Feast of the Lilies. On scorching mountains, amid raw prairie winds, or upon the regal ocean, the white pageant shall come back to memory again, with all the luxury of summer heat, and all the fragrant coolness that can relieve them. We shall fancy ourselves again among these fleets of anchored lilies,—again, like Urvasi, sporting amid the Lake of Lotus.

For that which is remembered is often more vivid than that which is seen. The eye paints better in the presence, the heart in the absence, of the object most dear. "He who longs after beautiful Nature can best describe her," said Bettine; "he who is in the midst of her loveliness can only lie down and enjoy." It enhances the truth of the poet's verses, that he writes them in his study. Absence is the very air of passion, and all the best description is in memoriam. As with our human beloved, when the graceful presence is with us, we cannot analyze or describe, but merely possess, and only after its departure can it be portrayed by our yearning desires; so it is with Nature: only in losing her do we gain the power to describe her; and we are introduced to Art, as we are to Eternity, by the dropping away of our companions.

 A CHARGE WITH PRINCE RUPERT—FROM ATLANTIC ESSAYS.

It is Sunday morning, June 18, 1643. The early church-bells are ringing over all Oxfordshire,—dying away in the soft air, among the sunny English hills, while Englishmen are drawing near one another with hatred in their hearts,—dying away, as on that other Sunday, eight months ago, when Baxter, preaching near Edgehill, heard the sounds of battle, and disturbed the rest of his saints by exclaiming, "To the fight!" But here are no warrior-preachers, no bishops praying in surplices on the one side, no dark-robed divines preaching on horseback on the other, no king in glittering armor, no Tutor Harvey in peaceful meditation beneath a hedge, pondering on the circulation of the blood, with hotter blood flowing so near him; all these were to be seen at Edgehill, but not here. This smaller skirmish rather turns our thoughts to Cisatlantic associations; its date suggests Bunker Hill,—and its circumstances, Lexington. For this, also, is a marauding party, with a Percy among its officers, brought to a stand by a half-armed and an angry peasantry.

Rupert sends his infantry forward to secure the bridge, and a sufficient body of dragoons to line the mile and a half of road between,—the remainder of the troops being drawn up at the entrance of a cornfield, several hundred acres in extent, and lying between the villages and the hills. The Puritans take a long circuit, endeavoring to get to windward of their formidable enemy.—a point judged as important, during the seventeenth century, in a land fight as in a naval engagement. They have with them some light field-pieces, artillery being the only point of superiority they yet claim; but these are not basilisks, nor falconets, nor culverins (colubri, couleuvres), nor drakes (drarones), nor warning-pieces,—they are the leathern guns of Gustavus Adolphus, made of light cast-iron and bound with ropes and leather. The Roundhead dragoons, dismounted, line a hedge near the Cavaliers, and plant their "swine-feathers"; under cover of their fire the horse advance in line, matches burning. As they advance, one or two dash forward, at risk of their lives, flinging off the orange scarfs which alone distinguish them; in token that they desert to the royal cause. Prince Rupert falls back into the lane a little, to lead the other forces into his ambush of dragoons. These tactics do not come naturally to him, however; nor does he like the practice of the time, that two bodies of cavalry should ride up within pistol shot of each other, and exchange a volley before they charge. He rather anticipates, in his style of operations, the famous order of Frederick the Great: "The King hereby forbids all officers of cavalry, on pain of being broke with ignominy, ever to allow themselves to be attacked in any action by the enemy; but the Prussians must always attack them." Accordingly he restrains himself for a little while, chafing beneath the delay, and then, a soldier or two being suddenly struck down by the fire, he exclaims, "Yea! this insolency is not to be endured." The moment is come.

"God and Queen Mary!" shouts Rupert;—"Charge!" In one instant that motionless mass becomes a flood of lava: down in one terrible sweep it comes, silence behind it and despair before: no one notices the beauty of that brilliant array,—all else is merged in the fury of the wild gallop; spurs are deep, reins free, blades grasped, heads bent; the excited horse feels the heel no more than he feels the hand; the uneven ground breaks their ranks,—no matter, they feel that they can ride down the world: Rupert first clears the hedge,—he is always first,—then comes the captain of his life-guard, then the whole troop "jumble after them," in a spectator's piquant phrase. The dismounted Puritan dragoons break from the hedges and scatter for their lives, but the cavalry "bear the charge better than they have done since Worcester,"—that is, now they stand it an instant, then they did not stand it at all; the Prince takes them in flank and breaks them in pieces at the first encounter,—the very wind of the charge shatters them. Horse and foot, carbines and petronels, swords and pikes, are mingled in one struggling mass. Rupert and his men are refreshed, not exhausted, by the weary night,—they seem incapable of fatigue; they spike the guns as they cut down the gunners, and, if any escape, it is because many, in both armies wear the same red scarfs. One Puritan, surrounded by the enemy, shows such desperate daring that Rupert bids release him at last, and sends afterwards to Essex to ask his name. One Cavalier bends, with a wild oath, to search the pockets of a slain enemy:—it is his own brother. O'Neal slays a standard-bearer, and thus restores to his company the right to bear a flag,—a right they lost at Hopton Heath; Legge is taken prisoner and escapes; Urry proves himself no coward, though a renegade, and is trusted to bear to Oxford the news of the victory, being raised to knighthood in return.

 A PLEA FOR LITERARY STYLE.*

Granted, that foreign systems of education may err by insisting on the arts of literary structure too much; think what we should lose by dwelling on them too little! The magic of mere words; the mission of language: the worth of form as well as of matter; the power to make a common thought immortal in a phrase, so that your fancy can no more detach the one from the other than it can separate the soul and body of a child; — it was the veiled half-revelation of these things that made that old text-book forever fragrant to me. There are in it the still visible traces of wild flowers which I used to press between the pages, on the way to school; but it was the pressed flowers of Latin poetry that were embalmed there first. These are blossoms that do not fade. Horace was right in his fond imagination, and his monument has proved more permanent than any bronze, vere perennius. "Wonderful is it to me," says Boccaccio, in Landor's delicious Pentameron, "when I consider that an infirm and helpless creature, such as I am, should be capable of laying thoughts up in their cabinet of words, which Time, as he moves by, with the revolution of stormy and eventful years, can never move from their places."

* From the Essay "On an Old Latin Text-Book," in Atlantic Essays.

One must bear in mind the tendencies of the times. If the danger were impending of an age of mere literary conceits, every one should doubtless contend against it; for what is the use of polished weapons, where there is no ammunition? But the current tendency is all the other way, — to distrust all literary graces, to denude English style of all positive beauty, and leave it only the colorless vehicle of thought. There must not even be the smoothness of Queen Anne's day, still less the delicacy of the current French traditions; but only a good, clear, manly, energetic, insular style, as if each dwelt on an island, and hailed his neighbor each morning in good chest tones, to tell him the news. It is the farthest possible from the style of a poet or an artist, but it is the style of that ideal man for whom Huxley longs, "whose intellect is a clear, cold logic engine, with all its parts of equal strength and in smooth working order, ready, like a steam-engine, to be turned to all kinds of work." In Huxley himself this type of writing is seen at the greatest advantage; Froude and Seeley have much the same; and books like the "Essays on a Liberal Education," put together by a dozen different Oxford and Cambridge men, exhibit but one style, — a style that goes straight to the mark, and will stand no nonsense. It is all very well, so far, and this is doubtless better than carving the bow till it breaks, as in Æsop's fable; but is there not room in the world for both science and art, use and beauty? If a page is good that tells truth plainly, may not another page have merit that sets truth in words which linger like music on the ear? We are outgrowing the foolish fear that science is taking all poetry away from the facts of nature; but why should it set itself against the poetry of words? The savans themselves recognize the love of beauty as quite a respectable instinct, when it appears paleontologically. When, in the exploration of bone-caves, they find that some primeval personage carved a bird or a beaver upon his hatchet, they are all in ecstasies, and say, "This is indeed a discovery. About the year of the world thirty-three thousand, art was born!" But if art took so long a gestation, is it not worth keeping alive, now that we have got it? Why is it that, when all these added centuries have passed, the writer must now take the style, which is his weapon, must erase from it all attempt at beauty, and demand only that, like the barbaric hatchet, it shall bring down its man?

 ADVENTURE WITH A BLACK SENTINEL — FROM ARMY LIFE IN A BLACK REGIMENT.

It is this capacity of honor and fidelity which gives me so much entire faith in them as soldiers. Without it, all their religious demonstration would be mere sentimentality. For instance, every one who visits the camp is struck with their bearing as sentinels. They exhibit, in this capacity, not an upstart conceit, but a steady, conscientious devotion to duty. They would stop their idolized General Saxton, if he attempted to cross their beat contrary to orders: I have seen them. No feeble or incompetent race could do this. The officers tell many amusing instances of this fidelity, but I think mine the best.

It was very dark the other night, — an unusual thing here, — and the rain fell in torrents; so I put on my India-rubber suit, and went the rounds of the sentinels, incognito, to test them. I can only say that I shall never try such an experiment again, and have cautioned my officers against it. 'T is a wonder I escaped with life and limb, — such a charging of bayonets and clicking of gun-locks. Sometimes I tempted them by refusing to give any countersign, but offering them a piece of tobacco, which they could not accept without allowing me nearer than the prescribed bayonet's distance. Tobacco is more than gold to them, and it was touching to watch the struggle in their minds; but they always did their duty at last, and I never could persuade them. One man, as if wishing to crush all his inward vacillations at one fell stroke, told me stoutly that he never used tobacco, though I found next day that he loved it as much as any one of them. It seemed wrong thus to tamper with their fidelity; yet it was a vital matter to me to know how far it could be trusted, out of my sight. It was so intensely dark that not more than one or two knew me, even after I had talked with the very next sentinel, especially as they had never seen me in India-rubber clothing, and I can always disguise my voice. It was easy to distinguish those who did make the discovery; they were always conscious and simpering when their turn came; while the others were stout and irreverent till I revealed myself, and then rather cowed and anxious, fearing to have offended.

It rained harder and harder, and when I had nearly made the rounds I had had enough of it, and, simply giving the countersign to the challenging sentinel, undertook to pass within the lines.

"Halt!" exclaimed this dusky man and brother, bringing down his bayonet, — "de countersign not correck."

Now the magic word, in this case, was "Vicksburg," in honor of a rumored victory. But as I knew that these hard names became quite transformed upon their lips, "Carthage" being familiarized into Cartridge, and "Concord" into Corn-cob, how could I possibly tell what shade of pronunciation my friend might prefer for this particular proper name?

"Vicksburg," I repeated, blandly but authoritatively, endeavoring, as zealously as one of Christy's Minstrels, to assimilate my speech to any supposed predilection of the Ethiop vocal organs.

"Halt dar! Countersign not correck," was the only answer.

The bayonet still maintained a position which, in a military point of view, was impressive.

I tried persuasion, orthography, threats, tobacco, all in vain. I could not pass in. Of course my pride was up; for was I to defer to an untutored African on a point of pronunciation? Classic shades of Harvard, forbid! Affecting scornful indifference, I tried to edge away, proposing to myself to enter the camp at some other point, where my elocution would be better appreciated. Not a step could I stir.

"Halt!" shouted my gentleman again, still holding me at his bayonet's point, and I wincing and halting.

I explained to him the extreme absurdity of this proceeding, called his attention to the state of the weather, which, indeed, spoke for itself so loudly that we could hardly hear each other speak, and requested permission to withdraw. The bayonet, with mute eloquence, refused the application.

There flashed into my mind, with more enjoyment in the retrospect than I had experienced at the time, an adventure on a lecturing tour in other years, when I had spent an hour in trying to scramble into a country tavern, after bedtime, on the coldest night of winter. On that occasion I ultimately found myself stuck midway in the window, with my head in a temperature of 80°, and my heels in a temperature of —10°, with a heavy window-sash pinioning the small of my back. However, I had got safe out of that dilemma, and it was time to put an end to this one.

"Call the corporal of the guard," said I, at last, with dignity, unwilling either to make a night of it or to yield my incognito.

"Corporal ob de guard!" he shouted, lustily, — "Post Number Two!" while I could hear another sentinel chuckling with laughter. This last was a special guard, placed over a tent, with a prisoner in charge. Presently he broke silence.

"Who am dat?" he asked, in a stage whisper. "Am he a buckra [white man]?"

"Dunno whether he been a buckra or not," responded, doggedly, my Cerberus in uniform; "but I's bound to keep him here till de corporal ob de guard come."

Yet, when that dignitary arrived, and I revealed myself, poor Number Two appeared utterly transfixed with terror, and seemed to look for nothing less than immediate execution. Of course I praised his fidelity, and the next day complimented him before the guard, and mentioned him to his captain; and the whole affair was very good for them all. Hereafter, if Satan himself should approach them in darkness and storm they will take him for "de Cunnel" and treat him with special severity.

 JOHN FOSTER KIRK,

A HISTORICAL writer of ability and culture, and the present editor of Lippincott's Magazine, was born at Fredericton, New Brunswick, in 1824. He received a classical education, "chiefly in Nova Scotia," states Dr. Hart, "under the private tuition of a graduate of one of the English universities."* He came to the United States in 1842, and was secretary to Mr. William H. Prescott during the last ten years of his life, 1848-59. In 1850, he accompanied that gentleman on his visit to England; and the late Mr. Ticknor, in the memoir of Mr. Prescott, terms

Mr. Kirk "his faithful and intelligent secretary." He was also in his company at the time of the sudden and fatal stroke of apoplexy, January 28, 1859. He continued to live in Boston till 1870, when he became a resident of Philadelphia. Meanwhile he had made two visits to Europe, chiefly, as he has stated, "for purposes of historical investigation in the archives and libraries of France, Switzerland, etc." He has written some literary and historical articles for American periodicals, including the North American Review, Atlantic Monthly, and Lippincott's Magazine.

His chief work is the History of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, published at London and Philadelphia in three octavo volumes, 1864-8. In the preface to his first volume, he gratefully acknowledges his indebtedness to Mr. Prescott, for kindly procuring him the larger part of the authorities needed for his researches. The history begins with an outline of the position of France at the close of the fourteenth century and during the first half of the fifteenth. A picture of the dominions, court, and policy of Philip the Good of Burgundy follows, with a narrative of the events of his reign till the accession of Charles in 1467. It then traces the troublous rule of Charles the Bold, who came at the age of thirty-three "into the possession of an inheritance not surpassed by that of any prince in Christendom," but yet, in a brief reign of ten years, earned the name of the "Great Disturber," and was crushed by the enmities he had excited.

Mr. Kirk has recently prepared a revised edition of Mr. Prescott's works, in which he has incorporated the corrections and additions left by that author in manuscript.

 CHARLES'S LAST FIGHT AT NANCY — FROM HISTORY OF CHARLES THE BOLD.

The "Vigil of the Kings" — Sunday, the 5th of January, 1477 — had come, and the reveille sounded, calling men to wake and die.

Heavy rains, the day before, had washed the earth, the flooded rivers rushing over a frozen current beneath, — impetuous, noisy, full, like the tides of life rolling above the frozen sea of death. But the night had been calm and cold; at dawn the shrunken waters gurgled faintly under a new surface of ice, and the gathering clouds were charged afresh with snow.

Charles had been busy throughout the night. He had resolved neither to abandon the siege nor to await the attack in his camp, but to meet and repel the enemy's advance. His force being too small for him to leave a sufficient guard against sallies from the town, he had drawn off his troops as noiselessly as possible under cover of the darkness.

"A short half league" southeast of Nancy the road through Jarville and Laneville to Saint-Nicolas entered a forest extending from the Meurthe on the east across the range of highlands bounding the horizon on the south and west. Near the verge of the wood, the road was intersected by a rivulet, called now, in commemoration of the events of the day, Le Ruisseau de Bonsecours. On both banks, to its junction with the Meurthe, it was thickly planted with hedges of thorn.

*Hart's Manual of American Literature, p. 529.

Behind this stream the duke posted his troops—the artillery in front, on a mound commanding the road; behind it the infantry,—archers and pikemen,—drawn up in a single oblong square, in imitation of the Swi-s. Here he took his own station, surrounded by his nobles and personal attendants, and mounted on a powerful black horse, called from its race and color Il Moro. Two slender bodies of cavalry composed the wings. The right, under Josse de Lalain, was placed on the high ground towards the source of the brook, but somewhat in the rear of the line; the left, under Galeotto, occupied a meadow, covered partially on the front as well as flank by the Meurthe, which here makes a double bend to the east and north, and is fordable in the angle. The evident object was to arrest and crush the enemy's columns while debouching from the forest. It was the sole chance of coping with a force so superior.

At Saint-Nicolas, after mass had been celebrated in the church, food and wine were served out in abundance, and consumed with gayety and relish by men familiar with dangers and now confident of an easy victory. At eight o'clock they began their march. The troops were about equally divided between the vanguard and the "battle,"—the former comprising seven thousand spears and halberds and two thousand cavalry, the latter a thousand more foot and somewhat fewer horse. Eight hundred arquebusiers followed as a reserve. Herter led the van, with Thierstein as commander of the horse. René, with his suite, rode beside the main corps, on a spirited gray mare called La Dame. He wore over his armor a short mantle of cloth of gold embroidered with the double white cross of Lorraine, the sleeves trimmed with his colors—gray, white, and red. His standard of white satin, decorated with a painting of the Annunciation, floated among a group of banners in the centre.

For him all around, all within, was bright. After a long train of misfortunes, bitter mortifications, cruel disappointments, the hour of assured triumph was at hand. Mingled with the exultation of that thought was a natural pride in seeing himself the sole chief of such an army. But the real leaders—Herter, Waldmann, Käzzy, Hassfurter—were not the men to commit the conduct of an enterprise like the present to inexperienced hands. After passing Laneuville a halt was called and a consultation held. Through scouts, deserters, and reconnoitering parties, the enemy's position and arrangements had been fully learned. The sentiment of the Swiss—expressed in the final charge of the authorities at home—was a determination to finish up the work, to end by a single and decisive stroke a war of which the gains and the glory had been counterbalanced by vexations and estrangements. At Grandson, with inferior numbers, they had met the enemy's attack and seen his forces scatter "like smoke dispersed by the north wind." At Morat, with equal numbers, they had struck his lines obliquely,—shattering, crushing, routing, yet not with the complete destruction necessary for the object. Now, with more than double his numbers,—their men all fresh and bold, his all dismayed and spent,—they had only to close upon and overwhelm him. It was arranged that, while the main body held back,—only a few skirmishers showing themselves on the road, which here inclined towards the river, making the passage straight and perilous,—the vanguard, guided by the Swiss deserters, should strike off to the left, by an old road leading from Jarville up to a farm named La Malgrange, and thence by another turn to the outskirts of the forest directly on the Burgundian flank. These were the tactics of men who had the game in their hands, and who knew how to play it.

René was now told that the safety of his person, being a thing of high importance, required that he should take his station in the centre of the main body, where a hundred men of the corps of Berne would serve as his body-guard. When the hostile force was broken, he would be free to join in the pursuit.

It was noon when the march was resumed. Before the troops had reached the farm-house on which they were to pivot, the snow fell so thickly that no one could see beyond his nearest comrade. In crossing a stream which runs past the building, the new-formed ice soon broke beneath their heavy tread, and left them wading, floundering, sometimes swimming. The road, or "hollow way," as it is also called, seems to have differed from the forest only in being more difficult to traverse. It was overgrown with a stubby and prickly brush. When at last the clearing was reached, the ranks were in disarray and the men half frozen. Sitting down, they poured the water from their shoes and arranged their clothing and arms.

Without having ocular proof of it, they had reached their position, facing the enemy's right flank. Suddenly the squall passed over and the sun shone forth. The hostile forces were in full sight of each other. The Swiss horn, blown thrice with a prolonged breath, sent a blast of doom into the ears of the Burgundians. Wheeling rapidly into line, the troops began to descend the slope at a quick run.

On first catching sight of the foe in this unexpected quarter, the gunners made an effort to turn their pieces. But the process was then a laborious one, not to be effected in alarm and confusion. After a single wild discharge, killing but two men, the guns were abandoned.

But the Swiss were now stopped by the hedge. Charles had time to make a change of front and send forward his archers. The assailants suffered severely. Their weapons got caught in the brambles, and they were unable to break through. A troop of French horse was the first to clear a passage. It was met by a squadron under the Sire de la Rivière and driven from the field. Meanwhile Galeotto had been attacked and was giving way. Lalain was ordered to go to his support. But the arquebusiers, having come to the front, delivered a volley which arrested the charge. Many saddles were emptied. Lalain fell badly wounded. The affrighted horses galloped at random. Galeotto, who was soon after taken prisoner, made off with his men towards the ford.

Charles saw himself stripped of both his wings, assailed at once on both his flanks. He had his choice between a rapid flight and a speedy death. Well then—death!

As he fastened his helmet, the golden lion on the crest became detached and fell to the ground. He forbade it to be replaced. Hoc est signum Dei!—"It is a sign from God,"—he said. From God? Ah, yes, he knew now the hand that was laid upon him!

Leading his troops, he plunged into the midst of his foes, now closing in on all sides. Among enemies and friends the recollection of his surpassing valor in that hour of perdition, after the last gleam of hope had vanished, was long preserved. Old men of Franche-Comté were accustomed to tell how their fathers, tenants, and followers of the Sire de Citey, had seen the duke, his face streaming with blood, charging and recharging "like a lion," ever in the thick of the combat, bringing help where the need was greatest. In Lorraine the same tradition existed. "Had all his men," says a chronicler of that province, "fought with a like ardor, our army must infallibly have been repulsed."

But no; so engaged, so overmatched, what courage could have availed? "The foot stood long and manfully," is the testimony of a hostile eye-witness. But the final struggle, though obstinate, was short. Broken and dispersed, the men had no recourse but flight. Some went eastward, in the direction of Essey, such as gained the river crossing where the ice bore, and breaking it behind them. The greater number kept to the west of Nancy, to gain the road to Condé and Luxembourg. Charles, with the handful that still remained around him, followed in the same direction. The mass, both of fugitives and pursuers, was already far ahead. There was no choice now. Flight, combat, death—it was all one.

Closing up, the little band of nobles, last relic of chivalry, charged into the centre of a body of foot. A halberdier swung his weapon, and brought it down on the head of Charles. He reeled in the saddle. Citey flung his arms around him and steadied him, receiving while so engaged a thrust from a spear through the parted joints of his corselet.

Pressing on, still fighting, still hemmed in, they dropped one by one. Charles's page, a Roman of the ancient family of Colonna, rode a little behind, a gilt helmet hanging from his saddle-bow. He kept his eye upon his master—saw him surrounded, saw him at the edge of a ditch, saw his horse stumble, the rider fall. The next moment Colonna was himself dismounted and made prisoner by men who, it would appear, had belonged to the troop of Campobasso.

None knew who had fallen, or lingered to see. The rout swept along, the carnage had no pause. The course was strewn with arms, banners, and the bodies of the slain. Riderless horses plunged among the ranks of the victors and the vanquished. There was a road turning directly westward; but it went to Toul—French lances were there. Northward the valley contracted. On one side was the forest, on the other the river; ahead, the bridge of Bouxières—guarded, barred, by Campobasso. Arrived there, all was over. A few turned aside into the forest to be hunted still, to be butchered by the peasantry, to perish of hunger and cold. Others leaped into the river, shot at by the arquebusiers, driven back or stabbed by the traitors on the opposite bank, swept by the current underneath the ice. The slaughter here was far greater than on the field. No quarter was given by the Swiss. But the cavalry, both of Lorraine and the allies, received the swords of men of rank, as well from the sympathy of their class as for the sake of ransom. When René came up the sun had long set. There was little chance, less occasion, for further pursuit. The short winter's day had had its full share of blood. Merciful Night came down, enabling a scanty remnant to escape.

* * * * *
If the duke of Burgundy were still alive—that was the thought that now occupied every breast.

If he were alive, no doubt but that he would return, no hope that the war was over. Messengers were sent to inquire, to explore. The field was searched. Horsemen went to Metz and neighboring places to ask whether he had passed. None had seen him, none could find him, none had anything to tell. Wild rumors started up. He had hidden in the forest, retired to a hermitage, assumed the religious garb. Goods were bought and sold, to be paid for on his reappearance. Years afterwards, there were those who still believed, still expected.

Yet intelligence, proof, was soon forthcoming. In the evening of Monday Campobasso presented himself, bringing with him Colonna, who told what he had seen, and gave assurance that he could find the spot. Let him go then and seek, accompanied by those who would be surest to recognize the form—Mathieu, the Portuguese physician, a valet-de-chambre, and a "laundress," who had prepared the baths of the fallen prince.

They passed out at the gate of Saint John, descending to the low, then marshy, ground on the west of the town. It was drained by a ditch, the bed of a slender rivulet, that turned a mill in the faubourg. The distance was not great—less than half an English mile. Several hundred bodies lay near together. But these they passed, coming to where a small band, "thirteen or fourteen," had fallen, fighting singly, yet together. Here lay Citey, here Contay, here a Croy, a Belvoir, a Lalain,—as in every battle-field; here Bièvre, loved by his enemies, his skull laid open "like a pot."

These are on the edge of the ditch. At the bottom lies another body,— "short, but thickset and well-membered,"—in worse plight than all the rest; stripped naked, horribly mangled, the cheek eaten away by wolves or famished dogs. Can this be he?

They stoop and examine. The nails, never pared, are "longer than any other man's." Two teeth are gone—through a fall years ago. There are other marks—a fistula in the groin, in the neck a scar left by the sword thrust received at Montliéry. The men turn pale, the woman shrieks and throws herself upon the body. "My lord of Burgundy! My lord of Burgundy!" Yes, this is he—the "Great Duke," the destroyer of Liège, the "Terror of France!"

They strive to raise it. The flesh, embedded in the ice, is rent by the effort. Help is sent for. Four of René's nobles come, men with implements, cloths, and bier; women have sent their veils. It is lifted and borne into the town, through the principal street, to the house of George Marquiez, where there is a large and suitable chamber. The bearers rest a moment—set down their burden on the pavement. Let the spot be forever marked with a cross of black stones.

It is carried in, washed with wine and warm water, again examined. There are three principal wounds. A halberd, entering at the side of the head, has cloven it from above the ear to the teeth. Both thighs have been pierced by a spear. Another has been thrust into the bowels from below.

It is wrapped in fine linen and laid out upon a table. The head, covered with a cap of red satin, lies on a cushion of the same color and material. An altar is decked beside it. Waxen tapers are lighted. The room is hung with black.

Bid his brother, his captive nobles, his surviving servants, come, and see if this be indeed their prince. They assemble around, kneel and weep, take his hands, his feet, and press them to their lips and breast. He was their sovereign, their "good lord," the chief of a glorious house, the last, the greatest, of his line.

Let René come — to see and to exult. Let him come in the guise of the paladins and preux on occasions of solemnity and pomp — in a long robe sweeping the ground, with a long beard inwoven with threads of gold!

So attired he enters, stands beside the dead, uncovers the face, takes between his warm hands that cold right hand, falls upon his knees and bursts into sobs. "Fair cousin," he says, — not accusingly, but self-excusingly, — "thou broughtest great calamities and sorrows upon us; may God assoil thy soul!" — Gentle René, good and gentle prince, God, we doubt not, hath pardoned many a fault of thine for those tender thoughts, those charitable tears, in the hour of thy great triumph beside the corpse of thy stern foe!

A quarter of an hour he remains, praying before the altar; then retires, to give orders for the burial. Let him who for a twelvemonth was duke of Lorraine be laid in the Church of Saint George, in front of the high altar, on the spot where he stood when invested with the sovereignty won by conquest, to be so lost!

 ADELINE D. T. WHITNEY,

A DAUGHTER of the late Enoch Train, a well-known ship-owner and merchant of Boston, was born in that city in 1824. She was educated at the school of George B. Emerson, a professor whom Dr. Hart has styled a "prince of teachers." At the age of nineteen, she was married to Mr. Seth D. Whitney, of Milton, Massachusetts, and resided in that town till her return to Boston in 1871. Till the year 1859, the duties of home left her little time for the absorbing claims of literature, excepting occasional contributions to magazines, particularly to the Monthly Religious Magazine, then edited by Dr. (now Bishop) Huntington. Footsteps on the Seas: a Poem by A. D. T. W., a first venture of fifty pages, was published in 1857. It was followed two years later by Mother Goose for Grown Folks.

Mrs. Whitney during the war wrote some half a dozen "Poems of Occasion," inspired by the incidents and lessons of the civil strife, which were printed in the Atlantic Monthly. They form the first part of her volume of poems issued in 1872, and are accompanied by one on the Atlantic Cable, dated 1858, and entitled "Consummation."

To these contributions succeeded a series of entertaining and pure-spirited novels of real, every-day life, which have steadily grown in merit and popular favor. They have naturalness of incident, sprightly dialogues, sharply lined characterizations, and an earnest desire, artistically directed, to show the beauty of duty and the strength of love. Boys at Chequasset, issued in 1862, was followed by Faith Gartney's Girlhood, 1863. The Gayworthys: A Story of Threads and Thrums, to illustrate the mishaps of life easily flowing out of misunderstandings, appeared in 1865; it had a reprint and large circulation in England. Hitherto: A Story of Yesterdays, which sets forth the sanctity and solemn obligations of marriage, and attempts a solution of some of its problems, was published in 1869; and Patience Strong's Outings in 1868. The latter, a prose poem of still home-life, pictures how the "comings-in" to a little competence can be made a blessing to many households. A Summer in Leslie Goldthwaite's Life, issued in 1866, formed the opening book of the "Real Folks' Series," having three companion volumes: We Girls: A Home Story, 1870; Real Folks, 1872; and The Other Girls, 1873. They show the privileges, with the resulting responsibilities, of family and social life, as well as the narrowness of pharisaism and exclusiveness. Zerub Throop's Experiment, 1871, is a story of how a bequest of many thousands was quaintly left, in the charge of Providence, for a poor widow; and how the trust was finally discharged to the letter.

Pansies — For Thoughts, 1872, "only a handful — of thoughts that have blossomed to words, and so been gathered," has some pleasing and suggestive verses in its threefold groupings, poems "of occasion," "of suggestion," and "of interpretation and hope." Among these are: Under the Cloud and Through the Sea, The Army of the Knitters, Larvæ, Sunlight and Starlight, Christmas, A Violet, and Released.

 LARVÆ.

My little maiden of four years old —

No myth, but a genuine child is she,
With her bronze-brown eyes and her curls of gold —

Came, quite in disgust, one day, to me.

Rubbing her shoulder with rosy palm,
As the loathsome touch seemed yet to thrill her,

She cried, "O mother! I found on my arm
A horrible, crawling caterpillar!"

And with mischievous smile she could scarcely smother,

Yet a glance in its daring half awed and shy,
She added, "While they were about it, mother,
I wish they'd just finished the butterfly!"

They were words to the thought of the soul that turns

From the coarser form of a partial growth,
Reproaching the infinite patience that yearns
With an unknown glory to crown them both.

Ah, look thou largely, with lenient eyes,
On whatso beside thee may creep and cling,
For the possible glory that underlies
The passing phase of the meanest thing!

What if God's great angels, whose waiting love
Beholdeth our pitiful life below
From the holy height of their heaven above,
Could n't bear with the worm till the wings should grow?

 SUNLIGHT AND STARLIGHT.

God sets some souls in shade, alone;
They have no daylight of their own:

Only in lives of happier ones
They see the shine of distant suns.

God knows. Content thee with thy night,
Thy greater heaven hath grander light.
To-day is close; the hours are small;
Thou sit'st afar, and hast them all.

Lose the less joy that doth but blind;
Reach forth a larger bliss to find.
To-day is brief: the inclusive spheres
Rain raptures of a thousand years.

 CHRISTMAS.

What is the Christ of God?

It is His touch, His sign, His making known.
His coming forth from out the all-alone.
The stretching of a rod,

Abloom with His intent,
From the invisible. He made worlds so:
And souls, whose endless life should be to know
What the worlds meant.

Christ is the dear "I Am,"
The Voice that the cool garden-stillness brake, —
The Human Heart to human hearts that spake,
Long before Abraham.

The word, the thought, the breath, —
All chris'm of God that in creation lay, —
Was born unto a life and name this day, —
Jesus of Nazareth!

With man whom He had made God came down side by side. Not from the skies
In thunders, but through brother-lips and eyes,
His messages He said.

Close to our sin He leant,
Whispering, "Be clean!" The High, the Awful-Holy, —
Utterly meek, — ah! infinitely lowly, —
Unto our burden bent

The might it waited for.
"Daughter, be comforted. Thou art made whole.
Son, be forgiven through all thy guilty soul.
Sin — suffer ye — no more!"

"O dumb, deaf, blind, receive!
Shall He who shaped the ear not hear your cry?
Doth He not tenderly see who made the eye?
Ask me, that I may give!

"O Bethany and Nain!
I show your hearts how safe they are with me.
I reach into my deep eternity
And bring your dead again!

"My kingdom cometh nigh.
Look up, and see the lightning from afar.
Over my Bethlehem behold the star
Quickening the eastward sky!

"From end to end, alway,
The same Lord, I am with you. Down the night,
My visible steps make all the mystery bright.
Lo! it is Christmas Day!"

 A VIOLET.

God does not send us strange flowers every year.
When the spring winds blow o'er the pleasant
places,
The same dear things lift up the same fair faces.
The violet is here.

It all comes back: the odor, grace, and hue;
Each sweet relation of its life repeated:
No blank is left, no looking-for is cheated;
It is the thing we knew.

So after the death-winter it must be.
God will not put strange signs in the heavenly
places:
The old love shall look out from the old faces.
Veilchen! I shall have thee!

 "THE CLEAR FIDGETS" — FROM PATIENCE STRONG'S OUTINGS.

"Don't ever do that," said Aunt Hetty Maria.
"Carry your candle as straight as you can, but never go prowling back into dark closets to look after mischief that you haven't done."

"It's clear fidget, I know," said mother; "but I've done it many a time myself."

I had been looking for something in the little clothes-room. I knew perfectly well that my candle had n't snapped while I was there, and that I hadn't held it near anything; and yet, after I brought it back to mother's room, and gave her the roll of linen she wanted, I went quietly to the closet again, and shut myself in, in the dark, and looked. When I came back the second time and sat down, Aunt Hetty Maria said that.

"Don't do it," she repeated. "Clear fidget is the worst thing you can give up to. It'll come back at times when you can't satisfy yourself.
It's a way you get into, and it'll follow you up.
Don't get out of bed to see if you have locked the door, when you know there is n't one chance in a hundred that you haven't. Don't pull your letter open to see if the money is safe and right, when you know you had it in your hand to put in and it can't be anywhere else. Don't keep making crazy dives into your pocket and bags, to see if your purse and your keys are there, after you've started on your journey, and you can't help it if they ain't. It's an awful habit, I tell you. You'll go back into actions and reasonings and happenings, just so; into trouble, and sickness, and death too. Looking after what never was in 'em; and doubting what you know there certainly was. I tell you, for I know."

Aunt Hetty Maria had had troubles in her life, notwithstanding the silk gown and the white caps, and the looking-up-to of all Dearwood. There were things she was n't sure she had n't made mistakes in, though she was a woman who had always tried thoroughly to do her duty. Perhaps in some other place I shall say more of what I know about it. I understood enough about it then, to feel that she spoke out of a deep place, and that the strong sense that advised me against the "clear fidgets" had had sore battles to fight against them, before it stood up in her so, commanding them all down.

"If I had my life to live over again, there's no rule I'd lay down for myself firmer. And that's why I speak to you."

As if I had my life to live — at thirty-eight!

And, yet — as if I had n't!

I think, sometimes, we don't any of us find out how to live till we have pretty well used up — spoiled, perhaps — one life.

Did anybody ever knit a perfect stocking, right off, at the first learning? Isn't the first experiment a tangle, more or less, of dropped stitches, run all through, or twisted in the picking up; of puckers and stretches, — unpremeditated and misplaced widenings out and narrowings in?

Are n't there patient eyes over the needles, perhaps, in our life-learnings? Is all the yarn spoiled in conquering the stitch? Are we to wear our first poor work, inevitably and always? Or when, out of the knowledge gained at it, we can accomplish a better, shall it not be given us to do and to possess, and the old puckers be quietly unravelled for us and laid away out of our sight?

If mother and Aunt Hetty Maria give me loving and watchful counsel at thirty-eight, looking upon all these years of mine as a mere "setting up," how will the good angels, out of their deep eternity and its holy wisdoms, look at theirs?

The very calm and beauty that sits upon them now, — is it not the smoothing out for a fair and glad beginning again?

"Don't go back into the dark closets!"

It was a dear, bright word to me. Perhaps it is the word that will be said to us in heaven, when we come out into the light there that is fulfilling and absolving love. Perhaps we shall be comforted and forgiven beyond what we can think or hope.

 WILLIAM M. BAKER,

Who has graphically pictured the peculiar aspects of life in the Southwestern States before and during the late rebellion, is the youngest son of Rev. Daniel Baker, D. D. The father was born at Midway, Liberty county, Georgia, in 1791, and died at Austin, Texas, in 1857. He labored successfully as an evangelist and Presbyterian pastor in Washington, D. C., Savannah, Georgia, Frankfort, Kentucky, Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and Holly Springs, Mississippi. His chief works were a Plain and Scriptural View of Baptism, and two series of Revival Sermons.

William Munford Baker was born at Washington, D. C., in 1825. He graduated with honor at Princeton College, at the age of twenty-one. After studying theology one year at Princeton Seminary, and two years under his father, he served as pastor at Galveston and at Austin, in Texas, for fifteen years, from 1850 to 1865. During this period he published the Life and Labors of Rev. Daniel Baker, D. D., 1858. As a Union man, and on conscientious grounds, Mr. Baker carried his church at Austin with him, through the rebellion, in unbroken connection with the General Assembly at the North, to a Presbytery of which it now gives its name. His experiences in those troublous times, only so far modified as to impart dramatic power, are embodied in Inside, a Chronicle of Secession. This powerful tale, which consists of a series of sharply outlined scenes and as keenly individualized characters, forming a vivid panorama, photographic in its fidelity to nature, first appeared in Harper's Weekly. It was published in book form in 1866, under the nom de plume of G. F. Harrington. The hardest hits in the volume are at the men most bitter of all for secession, — the Northern men then resident in the South. As the author and all of his relatives were of Southern birth and residence, it results naturally, as his works testify, that he has never written a line inconsistent with the most ardent love to his section, as well as to his country.

Rev. Mr. Baker in 1865 accepted the charge of the Second Presbyterian Church at Zanesville, Ohio, and he now (1873) ministers to a congregation at Newburyport, Massachusetts. Although he has contributed for years to the various religious journals and magazines of the country, he has always made his literary labors incidental and subordinate to his pastoral duties, to which he gives the chief energies of his hand and heart. His later writings include: Oak Mot, 1868, a Sabbath School volume prepared for the Presbyterian Board of Publication; The Virginians in Texas, which appeared serially in Harper's Magazine; and The New Timothy, 1870. The latter sketches the odd phases of ministerial and social life in the rude frontier settlements of the Southwest, the rollicking humors, boisterousness, and vicious characters of the borders, and the experiences by which the young pastor was taught the tact of becoming "all things to all men." His latest work, Mose Evans, first appeared, in 1873, in the Atlantic Monthly.

Wm M. Baker

* * * THE HUNT OF THE BEARS — FROM THE NEW TIMOTHY.

"Breakfast!" says Bob Long, in the ear of our hero, and he wakes to find it broad day. He dresses rapidly. Washes out under the shed still more rapidly, as the tin pan has a hole in the bottom. Breakfast. Old Man Meggar remains bundled up in bed in a corner of the room in which they eat, only a small opening left through the bed-clothes as an outlet for his oaths. He is perishing for whisky! His sons also suffer; but being younger they can bear the privation better. The boy sent for whisky has not yet returned. As wondering curses fall on him therefore, Mr. Long looks peculiarly solemn. Mrs. Meggar pauses once in pouring out the coffee, glances at Mr. Long, and continues to pour with an inward, "Yes. Bless the Lord, I see!"

The jar of plum-jelly is on the table. Mrs. Meggar's reasoning on that point has been brief but conclusive: "Well, let it all be eaten up this mornin', so that he gets some more!" Very sour it is indeed! Its acidity sharpens Mr. Wall's teeth as for battle, yet, under the circumstances, he makes a religion of eating it.

Out in the yard, after breakfast, he finds the canine lazzaroni in a state of wildest excitement. What remains to them of tails is being violently wagged, and the howling—Thunder augustly silent—is awful. Not a dog there but has entirely forgotten the hope of breakfast which fed his soul during the night, in prospect of a hunt on hand. When at last they ride off from the fence, the feast of a Montfaucon would not have held back for an instant from following the ignoblest cur there. An air of even gravity has settled down upon the men as they ride—they have entered on business now. Doc Meggar, the eldest son and sententious gentleman of the family, is now profoundly silent, swearing inwardly only as he rides, a kind of dignity, even, in the man. By common consent, after they have got a mile or two from the house into the woods, all the rest fall behind to let him ride in front. Mr. Long has the aspect of going to battle. His soul also is troubled, "Sing'lar, I never thought of it onst," he says to Mr. Wall, riding close to him and speaking in a low tone.

"How in the world will we manage to find you afterwards? After we get into the thick of the bresh it'll be like looking for a needle in the biggest sort of a haystack. When we start, you keep as near me as you can. I'll ride as slow as I can, too. An' when you are left behind, don't be skared too much. You listen for the dogs, an' ride for them. Ef you don't hear them, I can yell—a little. Ef it's too far for that, don't you be skared, and try to hunt us up—don't get yourself deranged. Jest stay still where you happen to be, and keep firing your rifle every quarter or so. Climb a tree if night ketches you; and when mornin' comes agin, you jest keep a-firin'. Here's a hunk of bread, put it in your pocket, case you should need it!"

This was altogether a new view of the matter to the person in question. He was about to reply, but a huge grape-vine dangling from a tree overhead at this moment separated them as they rode. In fact, riding together was now becoming impossible as the woods became thicker. Doc Meggar, too, leading the van, sends back over his shoulder the Partlian arrow of a single oath. Silence is the law now. Mr. Wall notices that all the dogs have fallen into a solid group, and trot along with one large black dog well in front of them. Thunder is his name, as our hero knows by this time from the perpetual mention made of him last night and before starting. No tail whatever has Thunder, only one eye is left him, accompanied by the merest fragment of a left ear. A long scar extends from ear to tail. As yet the young minister is unacquainted with his bark; if Thunder had ventured on that anywhere about the house, even if it had been at midnight, not a man in the same but would have sprung for his rifle. He now leads the van, bearing with him the profound respect of every animal there behind him, on foot or in saddle.

As they ride, our novice must needs entangle himself in the branches of a huge tree fallen to the ground. While toiling to force his way through, not unblessed of Toad and Zed, he catches a sudden vision of a brown animal running down the trunk of a tree. To bring his heavy gun to his shoulder and send the contents of one of its barrels after the animal is the work of an instant.

"He's been hunted off of before, that horse, young as he is!" is the exclamation of Jake behind him, however, with increased admiration of the animal. Well he had been, or his rider would have been left at the shot, torn out of his saddle by the brush. Mike only quivers, as it is, with a sense of unpleasant warmth in the tips of his intelligent ears, now browned from the discharge. Thunder pauses a moment on three feet, while his associates break ranks and plunge amidst the brush in search of the wounded animal. No wild-cat there! It is a quarter of a mile away, unhurt. And so the dogs resume their trot behind their leader, now far in advance. The unsuccessful marksman disentangles himself from the brush, and reloads his gun. Mr. Long reins in his temper and his pony and waits for him, while the others ride on, disgusted, after the dogs.

For full an hour our hero winds his horse around the trees and through the dense thickets in call of Mr. Long, but silent. Suddenly he observes off to the left a kind of furrow among the fallen leaves, their under and damper sides being turned up.

"I say, Mr. Long, here a moment. Isn't this the path of a bear?" he calls, reining up. Mr. Long is sorely tempted to vexation. Out of courtesy he rides back to look.

"Hi! Thunder!" he yells, as his eye catches the bear-trail; "good for you, Mr. Wall!" he pauses to say, and calls again and again until the woods ring. Thunder is half a mile off to the right; but in a few minutes he is under their hoofs. Silent until his nose touches the trail, then he opens like the boom of a bell, and disappears along the trail, his nose to the ground. At the sound every dog in the forest opens also through the whole gamut, and soon are following in the wake of Thunder, while the hunters spur and yell after, Doc Meggar silent but soon far in front. Alas for Mr. Long's good resolutions! At the first sound from Thunder the existence of his friend has passed utterly from his mind. With a yell to Bobasheela he dashes after through the thicket and is soon lost to sight.

Favoring Mike with a cry such as he has never before heard—at least from his present master, and digging both heels convulsively into his flanks, Mr. Wall speeds along behind. Mike catches the enthusiasm, and on they tear. It would never have done for the young clergyman to have ridden at anything like this rate through the Institution grounds, or even through Hoppleton. Astonishing the degree to which circumstances alter cases! He has not gone a quarter of a mile, however, before he reins up with a jerk. In attempting to dash through a thicket his hat has been jerked from his head, his powder-horn and shot-pouch torn from around his neck, his double-barrelled gun lies, twitched from his grasp by a grape-vine, upon the ground twenty yards behind, the bridle half plucked off his horse, and broken at that. It is dreadful to stop an instant, for the cry of dogs and men is already far ahead, growing fainter every moment.

Only one course to pursue. The rider dismounts, mends his bridle, puts it on again and fastens his horse. He then mends the shoulder-strap of his powder-horn and pouches, takes off his outer coat, puts his pouches on again, his coat on over that, and buttons it up from neck to waist. He has lost a handful of silver. Never mind, no time to look for that. Future antiquarians coming upon it may wonder and theorize and publish as to how on earth the money ever got there. No time for that now! He then regains his hat and forces it down upon his head, so that if torn off again his head will accompany it. Next a stout switch is cut to assist his spurs. Then the girth of his saddle is drawn up a hole or two, the blanket first pulled well forward. Last, his gun is secured. Remounting, he addresses himself to his task with a sort of desperation. All sounds of dogs and men have now died entirely away. Was he wrong in breathing a swift prayer as he applies switch and spurs to his horse? Right or wrong, wise or foolish, it was a spontaneous act. Let us photograph the man or leave him alone.

He felt amazed at himself as he dashed along in the direction from which the sounds had last come. Ravines over which he would not have dreamed of leaping at any other time, dense thickets through which he would never in a saner moment have supposed it possible for a human being to pass, on and on through a kind of whirlwind of saplings and forest-trees, brambles and grape-vines, he rushed, his hat down over his eyes, his left hand holding his gun upon his shoulder, his right plying the switch. Cabined up all his life, he now gave absolute rein to himself as well as to his horse, enjoying the excitement with all his soul. "And if a bear, say, or a buck had burst through the Institution ground, students, pale tutors, spectacled professors, every soul therein, would have abandoned, for the moment, Church and world too in the mad chase Esau was born before Jacob!" So he reasons as he rides. If Mr. Wall indeed had a guardian angel, that angel used his wings to some purpose to keep in full charge of him as he dashes on, reckless of himself. He has by far the best horse on the ground; he rides at least as headlong as any man there; craziest there of all for the time, he soon makes up for his delay, comes in hearing of the dogs and men again. He observes that the hunters have been left far to the right, while the dogs are off to the other side. An idea strikes him and he turns sharply to the left, for the animal, whatever it is, is evidently making a circuit in that direction. In a few minutes' hard riding he finds that the dogs are ahead of him, while the men are shouting on his trail far behind. To be at last the foremost one in the race! The thought inspires him. He uses switch and spurs with double energy. He has ceased to shout. He finds it is only exhausting him without accomplishing any object. And so he rides silently on. He is evidently coming nearer and nearer upon the dogs.

Suddenly he turns off still more to the left from their cry. Before he knows it he comes upon the object of pursuit—a black bear! It seems immensely large as it shambles along; seems to be going very slow too, considering the eagerness of his friends behind. But the excitement on seeing it! The rider has for a moment forsaken his profession as a minister. He has abandoned his very senses. He yells at his horse, he halloos for the dogs, he screams to Mr. Long. In his frenzy he takes out his penknife, and opens it savagely, with the purpose of jumping off his horse, rushing in upon the monster and slaughtering him upon the spot. Then it flashes upon him to ride his horse upon the animal and beat him over the head with one of the stirrup-irons, which he insanely unbuckles, as he rides, from the saddle for that purpose. Mike is as excited as his rider, he gets within ten steps of the bear, but declines going nearer. In vain the spurs and switch and yells of his rider. If that rider has lost his wits, Mike hasn't his. So the insane sportsman hurls his stirrup, leather and all, at the bear, trundling so leisurely along, a black mass of wool and fat.

Suddenly he remembers his gun. Leaping from his horse, he runs almost upon the bear, levels his weapon, with hands shaking with excitement, full upon it, cocks one barrel, and pulls desperately away at the trigger of the other. The instant he had left his horse Mike entered upon the sport on his own account, and gallops furiously along in the direction of the hunt. The bear goes crushing through the thicket, the dogs now well upon him, Thunder in advance. The dismounted Nimrod can hear the faint cries of the rest of the party far behind. He dashes on after the bear on foot. See! It has turned to bay. He comes full upon it, seated upright, with its back against a tree, wiping at the dogs swarming upon it, right and left, with its huge paws, its red mouth open and foaming. The last particle of sense forsakes the young fool. He advances directly upon the animal, levels his short, heavy gun full at its breast, a small white spot furnishing the mark, cocks both hammers, pulls both triggers, and finds himself at the discharge lying flat upon his back. He has a general impression that the bear will be upon him in an instant, and he scrambles, quivering and shaking with excitement, upon his feet. He need not fear! There had been powder and buck-shot in his rifle sufficient for quite a long campaign of shooting. He was so near, too! There it lies upon the ground, the great unwieldy mass of wool, dead, the dogs yelling and biting at it in a whirlwind of excitement.

The hunter can not believe his eyes. That he—he should actually have killed the bear! He drives off the dogs with difficulty with his empty gun, and seats himself exhausted upon his prey—and a most luxuriant cushion it is—never king happier on his throne!

It occurs to him, panting with exertion, to see if his pockets have not been emptied in his fall, and he takes therefrom knife, pocket Testament, and all. The shouts of the men are coming nearer and nearer. The dogs have fallen exhausted around—these, too, panting for dear life. Two of them are apparently dying—one lies dead from the fight. Thunder is reposing at a little distance looking gravely, not so much at the bear as at the individual seated upon him, ceasing now and then to pant as if he had been struck by some new idea about it. At last he rises with the utmost dignity, approaches the young minister, smells him carefully, elaborately all around, and from head to foot, and resumes his lying down and panting. Not having a tail, it is impossible for him to express the result of his investigation. It is highly flattering to his new acquaintance, but he keeps it gravely to himself.

The cries of the rest of the party draw nearer and nearer. It may be it was from fatigue, but it may be it was from affectation; at any rate our reader keeps his seat upon the bear. Here comes the foremost of the party behind—Doc. Meggar! The blood is streaming down his face from a gash laid open in his cheek by the branch of a tree. He dashes up, jumps from his sweating horse, stands a moment in stupefied astonishment, and then, most emphatically,

"Look here," he says at last. "I say, you, stranger, give us your hand!" very gravely too.

Mr. Wall cordially complies; it is shaken long and vigorously, even solemnly, by Doc, who then falls on the ground and proceeds to drink ravenously from a little pool of green water in which the bear is half lying. There is more mud than water, and as much blood as either, in the pool. It strikes the stranger that Doc drinks as much for the blood as for the water. He swallows down his exclamation, however, and receives with a vast deal more coolness and indifference of manner than of heart the rest of the Meggars who now pour in, tattered from the brush, excited, wondering, and awfully profane. Mr. Wall feels called upon to apologize.

"It is all a mere accident, gentlemen," he says, rising and standing off to one side. "I happened to have a tolerably good horse; and then I happened to be so I could head the bear. It is the first time I ever was on a hunt."

The Meggars have nothing to say at the moment, being busy fastening their horses and getting their knives ready for work on the bear. They have a unanimous and decided opinion on the point; and Zed and Toad know exactly what that opinion is. Not in vain have these eat at the table of the Meggars, slept on the floor of their cabin, had "chaws" from their bars of tobacco, drinks from their whisky-jugs, the use of their greasy decks of cards for so long. Had the Meggars entertained even the least hostile feeling towards the successful hunter, Zed and Toad would have proceeded in advance to curse him for them on the spot; held themselves ready to do any thing besides which their relation to the Meggars demanded. In fact, what Thunder was to the dogs at home, so are these battered, dilapidated, unutterably degraded specimens of the race to the Meggar boys. It is amazing the swarm of just such lice as these this Meggar family are infested by! And then those who dreaded as death to offend them! They were kings—the Meggars—of the whole section! Of course, they drew their followers toward all evil with vastly more ease than if they were working in the opposite direction. Yet Bob Long knew exactly what he undertook; and it was worth the effort. Bob's attempt on them was an effort, in fact, for the whole section through them—an axe struck at the very root of the Banian wickedness of the entire region—a Napoleonic charge upon the very centre of the forces of the devil there. "May talk of accident," says Zed for his patrons; "but it's only to fus-class folks sech accidents happen. Never happen to me!" Zed, as being the last of the alphabet. "Headin'?" yelps the other jackal. "An' a good horse? But it takes a clipper of a chap to make the dash you did, stranger, through these here woods. Wish had a drink of whisky to offer ye!"

The unaccountable failure of the boy to appear with the whisky the night before, and the consequent absence of that essential beverage during the hunt, had been a grief that had accompanied the Meggars and their hangers-on, from the instant they left their suffering parent, through brush and brier, up to the present instant. Mr. Long's reasoning, from long observation and experience, had been that the excitement of the whisky, together with that of the hunt, might be a little too much even for him to manage. By a hold stroke he had cut off the supply of whisky—only the excitement of a slain bear remained.

And this was of a wolfish nature. Hardly had the jackals agreed in their eulogy upon Mr. Wall than they fell into a sudden disagreement in regard to the inches of fat on the bear. Before the young hunter knew a quarrel was brewing, Zed and Toad were rolling over and over upon the bloody ground, their hands twisted in each other's hair, pounding, kicking, cursing each other. It excited not a particle of interest in the others, who were now at work upon Bruin, divesting that stray Russian of his furry robe.

HENRY HOWARD BROWNELL,

THE gifted Union lyricist of the late war, was born in East Hartford, Connecticut, in 1820. He was the son of Dr. Pardon Brownell, and a nephew of the late Dr. Thomas Church Brownell, bishop of Connecticut. He was graduated at Trinity College, Hartford, and then studied law; but literary pursuits proved to be the more attractive. "A little volume of lyric poems, published by him as early as 1850," records a sympathetic biographer,* "gave evidence of rare power and brilliancy. For a time he turned his attention to other fields of literary labor, which if less inviting, yet offered fairer prospect of remuneration. He wrote a History of the War of 1812, giving special prominence to the naval portion of the war, and two or three books of a somewhat similar character.† At the opening of the late war, his whole soul was absorbed by it; he entered first the army, and then the navy, as a volunteer, was a participator in the naval battles of the Gulf and lower Mississippi, and became the intimate friend and private secretary of that noble hero, Admiral Farragut. He was with Farragut at that famous fight in Mobile Bay, and his poem, 'The Bay Fight,' which subsequently gave the title to his volume of war lyrics, was the finest descriptive poem of the war. Mr. Brownell had the dramatic power of Robert Browning, in a large degree, and a rare humanity, which softened and rendered beautiful all the creations of his fancy, all the transcripts of his large and varied experiences. He was a genre poet; he caught his inspiration directly from common things, and rendered them enduring and sublime in the spirited and picturesque forms in which he embodied them. As the war grew in dignity and scope, so grew his poems. He wrote in strong, broad American; sometimes his language was not gracious, but it had meaning; even the rough expression of the tyro soldier bent into poetic form under his facile pen."

He published two later volumes of his poems, the first anonymously: Lyrics of a Day; or Newspaper Poetry, by a Volunteer in the U. S. Service, 1864; War Lyrics, and Other Poems, 1866, dedicated to Vice-Admiral David Farragut. Among these vigorous and imaginative verses occur The River Fight, on the Mississippi, in April, 1862; Bury Them (the dragon's teeth), a memory of Fort Wagner, July 18, 1863; April

* Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1872, art. Henry Howard Brownell, p. 77.

† Pioneer Heroes of the New World; from the Earliest Period (1822) to the Present Time, 1855. The Eastern or Old World 2 vols., 1856.

19, 1775-1861, contrasting Lexington and Baltimore; Let Us Alone, a satiric answer to an anti-war outcry; The Burial of the Dane; a version of the Song of the Archangels, from Faust, and another of Dies Irae. He died in his native city, October 30, 1872. This tender sonnet to his memory is from the pen of a brother poet, Thomas Bailey Aldrich.*

HENRY HOWARD BROWNELL.

They never crowned him, never knew his worth,
But let him go unlaurell'd to the grave.

Hereafter—yes!—are guerdons for the brave,
Roses for martyrs who wear thorns on earth,
Balsms for bruised hearts that languish in the dearth

Of human love. So let the lilies wave
Above him, nameless. Little did he crave
Men's praises. Modestly, with kindly mirth,
Not sad nor bitter, he accepted fate,— Drank deep of life, knew books and hearts of
men,

Cities and camps, and War's immortal woe;
Yet bore through all (such virtue in him sate
His spirit is not whiter now than then!)
A simple, loyal nature, pure as snow.

THE BATTLE SUMMERS.

Again the glory of the days!

Once more the dreamy sunshine fills
Noon after noon, — and all the hills
Lie soft and dim in autumn haze.

And lovely lie these meadows low
In the slant sun — and quiet broods
Above the splendor of the woods
All touched with autumn's tenderest glow.

The trees stand marshalled, clan by clan,
A bannered army, far and near — (Mark how yon fiery maples rear
Their crimson colors in the van!)

Methinks, these ancient haunts among,
A fuller life informs the fall —
The crows in council sit and call,
The quail through stubble leads her young.

The woodcock whirrs by bush and brake,
The partridge plies his cedar-search —
(Old Andy says the trout and perch
Are larger now, in stream and lake.)

O'er the brown leaves, the forest floor,
With nut and acorn scantily strewed,
The small red people of the wood
Are out to seek their winter store.

To-day they gather, each and all,
To take their last of autumn suns —
E'en the gray squirrel lithely runs
Along the mossy pasture wall.

By marsh and brook, by copse and hill,
To their old quiet haunts repair
The feeble things of earth and air,
And feed and flutter at their will.

The feet that roved this woodland round,
The hands that scared the timid race,
Now mingle in a mightier chase,
Or mould on that great Hunting-Ground.

Strange calm and peace! — ah, who could deem,
By this still glen, this lone hill-side,

How three long summers, in their pride,
Have smiled above that awful Dream? —

Have ever woven a braver green,
And ever arched a lovelier blue;
Yet Nature, in her every hue,
Took color from the dread Unseen.

The haze of Indian Summer seemed Borne from far fields of sulphury breath —
A subtle atmosphere of death
Was ever round us as we dreamed.

The horizon's dim heat-lightning played
Like small-arms, still, thro' nights of drouth,
And the low thunder of the south
Was dull and distant cannonade.

To us the glory or the gray
Had still a stranger, stormier dyc,
Remembering how we watched the sky
Of many a waning battle day,

O'er many a field of loss or fame:
How Shiloh's eve to ashes turned,
And how Manassas' sunset burned
Incarnadine of blood and flame.

And how, in thunder, day by day,
The hot sky hanging over all,
Beneath that sullen, lurid pall,
The Week of Battles rolled away!

"Give me my legions!" — so, in grief,
Like him of Rome, our Father cried:
(A Nation's Flower lay down and died
In yon fell shade!) — ah, hapless chief —

Too late we learned thy star! — o'er'ta'en,
(Of error or of fate o'erharsh,)
Like Varus, in the fatal marsh
Where skill and valor all were vain!

All vain — Fair Oaks and Seven Pines!
A deeper hue than dying Fall
May lend, is yours! — yet over all
The mild Virginian autumn shines.

And still a Nation's Heart o'erhung
The iron echoes peeled afar,
Along a thousand leagues of war
The battle thunders tossed and flung.

Till, when our fortunes paled the most,
And Hope had half forgot to wave
Her banner o'er the wearied brave —
A morning saw the traitor host

Rolled back o'er red Potomac's wave.
And the Great River burst his way! —
And all on that dear Summer's Day,
Day that our fathers died and gave.

Rest in thy calm, Eternal Right!
For thee, though levin-scarred and torn,
Through flame and death shall still be borne
The Red, the Azure, and the White.

We pass — we sink like summer's snow —
Yet on the mighty cause shall move,
Though every field a Cannae prove,
And every pass a Roncesvaux.

Though every summer burn anew
A battle-summer, — though each day
We name a new Aceldema,
Or some dry Golgotha re-dew.

And thou, in lonely dream withdrawn!
What dost thou, while in tempest dies
The long drear Night, and all the skies
Are red with Freedom's fiery Dawn!

* Atlantic Monthly, May, 1873.

Behold, thy summer days are o'er —
 Yet dearer, lovelier these that fall
 Wrapped in red autumn's flag, than all
 The green and glory gone before.

'Twas well to sing by stream and sod,
 And they there were that loved thy lays —
 But lo, where, 'neath yon battle-haze,
 Thy brothers bare the breast for God!

Reck not of waning force nor breath —
 Some little aid may yet be thine,
 Some honor to the All-Divine, —
 To-day, where, by yon River of Death,
 His stars on Rosecrans look down —
 Or, on the morrow, by moat and wall,
 Once more when the Great Admiral
 Thunders on traitor fleet and town.

O wearied heart! O darkening eye!
 (How long to hope and trust untrue!)
 What in the hurly can ye do?
 Little, 'tis like — yet we can die.

October, 1863.

 WOOD AND COAL.
 (NOVEMBER, 1863.)

Farmer Smith shakes his old white head,
 Fuel, he says, will be scarce and dear —
 Half our young men are gone to the wars,
 Little wood has been cut this year.

Skipper Jones strokes his grizzled beard,
 Freights, he expects, were never so high —
 Half our hands are shipped on the fleets,
 Coals must be awful, by and by!

Are ye glad, O Cedar and Fir?
 Will ye sing with the Seer of yore,
 Rejoice! no feller, axe in hand,
 Cometh against us more!

Hush, with your wavy boast,
 Your flutter of leafy words!
 The funeral train of your Lords
 Goes down from mountain to coast.

Their dirge is strident and hoarse —
 Screech of bob-sled and chain,
 Groan of drag and of wain,
 Reeling under the giant corse
 Of Oak from Merrimac's rugged source
 And Pine from the hills of Maine.

And down where the dock-yard sits,
 With mighty derrick and sheers —
 Keel and carline, transom and bits,
 The mammoth Skeleton grows and knits
 The spoil of your hundred years.

Are ye quiet, Kobold and Gnome?
 Can ye crouch and whisper at will,
 By lode and drift, in your sullen home,
 Untroubled with pick or drill?

Hark, how angry and fast,
 By valley and mountain-gorge,
 By port and foundry vast,
 The roar of furnace and blast,
 The clang of anvil and forge!

For the powers of Earth to-day
 Are sounding an old, old Song —
 The loud and the dreadful Lay
 Of death to horror and wrong!

A thousand years hath it rang,
 "Crime shall go under!"

Is all but a vast, vain pang?
 God makes no blunder —
 How the armories bellow and clang!
 How the ship-yards thunder!

Ah, not for the fireside glow,
 With its cheery urn and tray,
 And the children's faces all a-row,
 Are the woods and the mines, to-day!

Scant is the spark ye spare for these,
 Dark-ledged caverns and moss-gray trees!
 A grimmer service is yours at last —
 To roll the plate and to melt the cast,
 Bolt the keelson and step the mast,
 And drive the war-ship through winter seas.

So hath it been from the days of old —
 Though the fire go out on the widow's hearth,
 And the orphans cuddle abed for cold —
 That is the way of our weary earth,
 These are the pangs of a Nation's Birth.

Trust and endure! — for 'tis all of Fate —
 And the end shall come, be it soon or late —
 Better that one generation die,
 Than a hundred live in horror and hate —
 There's room for us all in God's fair sky.

 NIGHT-QUARTERS.

Tang! tang! went the gong's wild roar
 Through the hundred cells of our great Sea-Hive!
 Five seconds — it could n't be more —
 And the whole Swarm was humming and alive —
 (We were on an enemy's shore).

With savage haste, in the dark,
 (Our steerage had n't a spark.)
 Into boot and hose they blundered —
 From for'ard came a strange, low roar,
 The dull and smothered racket
 Of lower rig and jacket
 Hurried on, by the hundred —
 How the berth deck buzzed and swore!

The third of minutes ten,
 And half a thousand men,
 From the dream gulf, dead and deep,
 Of the seaman's measured sleep,
 In the taking of a lunar,
 In the serving of a ration,
 Every man at his station! —
 Three and a quarter, or sooner! —
 Never a skulk to be seen —
 From the look-out aloft to the gunner
 Lurking in his black magazine.

There they stand, still as death,
 And, (a trifle out of breath,
 It may be.) we of the Staff,
 All on the poop, to a minute.
 Wonder if there's anything in it —
 Doubting if to growl or laugh.

But, somehow, every hand
 Feels for hilt and brand,
 Tries if buckle and frog be tight —
 So, in the chilly breeze, we stand
 Peering through the dimness of the night —
 The men, by twos and ones,
 Grim and silent at the guns,
 Ready, if a Foe leave in sight!

But, as we looked aloft,
 There, all white and soft,
 Floated on the fleecy clouds,
 (Stray flocks in heaven's blue croft) —

How they shone, the eternal stars,
 'Mid the black masts and spars
 And the great maze of lifts and shrouds!
 Flag Ship Hartford, May, 1864.

 PLACE DE LA REVOLUTION.

(10 THERMIDOR, 1794.)

"When the wicked perish, there is shouting."

Here let us stand — windows, and roofs, and leads,
 Alive with clinging thousands — what a scene!
 And in the midst, above that sea of heads,
 Gooms the black Guillotine.

A scene like that in the Eternal City,
 When on men's hearts the Arena feasted high —
 While myriads of dark faces, void of pity,
 Looked on to see them die.

How the keen Gallic eyes dilate and glare!
 The flexile brows and lips grimace and frown —
 How the walls tremble to their shout, when'er
 That heavy steel comes down!

'Tis nearly over — Twenty heads have rolled,
 One after one, upon the block — while cheers,
 And yells, and curses howled by hate untold,
 Rang in their dying ears.

One more is left — and now, amid a storm
 Of angry sound from that great human Hive,
 They rear upright a dizened ghastly form,
 Mangled, yet still alive.

Like one emerging from a deadly swoon,
 His eyes unclose upon that living plain —
 Those livid, snaky eyes! — he shuts them soon,
 Never to ope again.

As that forlorn, last, wandering gaze they took,
 Perhaps those cruel eyes, in hopeless mood,
 Sought, in their agony, one pitying look
 'Mid that vast multitude.

Sought, but in vain — inextricably mixed
 On square and street and house-top — he surveys
 A hundred thousand human eyes, all fixed
 In one fierce, pitiless gaze.

Down to the plank! the brutal headsmen tear
 Those blood-glued rags — nay, spare him needless pain!
 One cry! God grant that we may never hear
 A cry like that again!

A pause — and the axe falls on Robespierre.
 That trenchant blade hath done its office well —
 Hark to the mighty roar! down, Murderer —
 Down to thy native Hell!

Again, that terrible Shout! till suburb far
 And crowded dungeon marvel what it mean —
 Hurrah! and louder, louder yet, hurrah
 For the good Guillotine!

And breasts unladen heave a longer breath —
 And parting footsteps echo fast and light —
 Our Foe is lodged in the strong Prison of Death!
 Paris shall sleep to-night.

 HENRY C. LEA.

HENRY CHARLES LEA, the author of some of the most scholarly historical monographs yet written in America, was born in Philadelphia, September 19, 1825. He is the son of Frances A. Carey and Isaac Lea, LL. D., a celebrated writer on natural history,* and president of the Academy of Natural Sciences since 1858. His paternal ancestor was John Lea, who settled in Pennsylvania in 1700, and was prominent in the Friends' Meeting. On the mother's side, he descended from Mathew Carey,* who came from Ireland to Philadelphia in 1784, and founded a publishing house which is probably the oldest in the country, and was at one time the leading one, under the successive firms of M. Carey, M. Carey & Sons, Carey, Lea & Carey, Carey & Lea, Carey, Lea & Blanchard, Lea & Blanchard, Blanchard & Lea, and, since 1865, Henry C. Lea. Formerly, it was largely engaged in miscellaneous publications, — printing the Waverley Novels from advance sheets, as well as publishing for Cooper, Irving, Dickens, etc., — but for many years it has confined itself almost exclusively to works of a high grade on medicine and the allied sciences.

Henry C. Lea was educated at home, by private teachers, and never attended college nor school since he was seven years of age. He went into business in January, 1843, at the age of eighteen, and has been a bookseller and publisher for thirty years. He was married in 1850. His first effort as an author was a paper on the Salts of Manganese, contributed to Silliman's American Journal of Science and Arts at the early age of fourteen. This was followed by occasional articles on recent and fossil Conchology, printed in Silliman's Journal, the Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, etc. About the year 1845, he commenced to write on critical and literary subjects. Two years later, however, the attempt to combine study with close attention to business broke down his health from overwork, and for eight or ten years he was obliged to renounce literary pursuits almost entirely.

Mr. Lea was able to resume his studies about 1856, and his attention was then directed to mediæval European history. Soon finding how unsafe it was to trust to second-hand authorities, he endeavored to procure for himself all original sources of information. How he succeeded in his quest, has been incidentally stated by an appreciative critic.† "Mr. Lea's books — especially the one now before us — demonstrate what we have too willingly suffered to be called in question — the possibility of thorough, exhaustive research and truly erudite authorship on this side the Atlantic. Mr. Lea has written on subjects that demand for their study an ample supply of books, antique, rare, and precious; and he has been unwilling to enter seriously into any subject until he had provided himself with a competent apparatus for its investigation. He indeed has made liberal pecuniary outlays, and has had correspondents and agents wherever there was any hope of capturing a stray volume that might serve his purpose; and so entire has been his success that he can hardly be less fully furnished with original authorities in his own library than he would be were he to confine himself to any one of the great European libraries. His books, therefore, have it for the prime element of their value that they contain authentic history, drawn directly from its sources." At the outset of his serious labors, recognizing that the laws of a nation were the most faithful epitome of its condition, he was led to collect and study the earlier jurisprudence of the European races; and the inseparable connection, during the Middle Ages, between the secular and the canon law, drew him into an investigation of Ecclesiastical history. Such was the nature of the literary work which he adopted as a recreation, being able to give it merely the fragmentary leisure afforded by more pressing duties.

* Ante, vol. ii, p. 601. Allibone's Dictionary, vol. i, p. 1071, gives a list of his papers to 1857.

* Ante, vol. i, p. 67-9.
 † North American Review, vol. cxi, July, 1870; art., Studies in Church History.

In 1866, he published, Superstition and Force: Essays on the Wager of Law, the Wager of Battle, the Ordeal, and Torture, in a royal duodecimo volume, a revised and enlarged edition of which appeared in 1870. An Historical Sketch of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church, illustrating the rise, progress, and pernicious influence of enforced celibacy, was issued in an octavo volume in 1867; and two years later followed, Studies in Church History: The Rise of the Temporal Power — Benefit of Clergy — Excommunication. Of the character of these works, the reviewer already quoted has well remarked, in a notice of the latter: "The author has, indeed, his historical theories; he marks with care the development of ideas and tendencies, and traces with delicate skill the filaments that bind seemingly isolated events and give unity to the collective movement of a race or an age; yet he never generalizes till he has all the facts within his grasp — his conclusions never furnish him his premises, he never picks over his materials to select only such as will sustain his theories. Still less does he subordinate history to rhetoric. He is guiltless of all attempts at fine writing. It is perfectly evident that he writes, not to attract but to instruct readers. He makes no draft upon his imagination, dresses up no scene, pieces out no imperfect narrative with the anachronisms which often make historical pictures at once vivid and grotesque, life-like, yet the reverse of truthful. He relates no more than he finds recorded, and gives his story the coloring of its time, and not of his . . . In fine, these essays are models in their kind, — the simple, orderly presentation of facts, events, and movements in their bearing on their respective subjects, — each a complete and exhaustive monograph, containing, with ample means of verification in references and extracts, all that the reader needs to place himself at the point of view which the author has attained by the most painstaking and elaborate research."

Mr. Lea has also contributed largely to periodicals and newspapers, and between 1863-8 he wrote many political pamphlets. During the war, he gave much time to matters connected with its progress. After the enactment of the "Enrolment Law" in June, 1863, he was largely instrumental, as a "Bounty Commissioner," in keeping the quota of his native city supplied. At present, he is president of the Philadelphia branch of the American Social Science Association, is actively engaged as a member of the executive committee of the Industrial League, and is president of the Citizens' Municipal Reform Association of Philadelphia. These manifold duties occupy most of the leisure hours which can be spared from business, so that literature has to receive scantier attention. This is the more to be regretted, as he has been for years collecting material for a detailed history of the Inquisition, and its speedy preparation is now a matter of uncertainty.

 PERPETUITY OF SUPERSTITION.*

Although we may hail the disappearance of the ordeal as marking an era in human progress, yet should we err in deeming it either the effect or the cause of a change in the constitution of the human mind. The mysterious attraction of the unknown and undefined, the striving for the unattainable, the yearning to connect our mortal nature with some supernal power — all these mixed motives assisted in maintaining superstitions similar to those which we have thus passed in review. The mere external manifestations were swept away, but the potent agencies which vivified them remained, not perhaps less active because they worked more secretly. Thus generation after generation of follies, strangely affiliated, waits on the successive descendants of man, and perpetuates in another shape the superstition which we had thought eradicated. In its most vulgar and abhorrent form, we recognize it in the fearful epidemic of sorcery and witchcraft which afflicted the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; sublimed to the verge of heaven, we see it reappear in the seraphic theories of Quietism; descending again towards earth, it assumes the mad vagaries of the Convulsionnaires. In a different guise, it leads the refined scepticism of the eighteenth century to a belief in the supernatural powers of the divining-rod, which could not only trace out hidden springs and deep-buried mines, but could also discover crime, and follow the malefactor through all the doublings of his cunning flight. Even at the present day, as various references in the preceding pages sufficiently attest, there is a lurking undercurrent of superstition which occasionally rises into view and shows that we are not yet exempt from the weakness of the past. Each age has its own sins to answer for, its own puerilities to bewail — happiest that which best succeeds in hiding them, for it can scarce do more. Here, in our boasted nineteenth century, when the triumph of human intelligence over the forces of nature, stimulating the progress of material prosperity with the press, the steam-engine, and the telegraph, has deluded us into sacrificing our psychological to our intellectual being — even here the duality of our nature reasserts itself, and in the obscene blasphemy of Mormonism and in the fantastic mysteries of pseudo-spiritualism we see a protest against the despotism of mere reason. If we wonder at these perversions of our noblest attributes, we must remember that the intensity of the reaction measures the original strain, and in the dismal insanities of the day we thus may learn how utterly we have forgotten the Divine warning, "Man shall not live by bread alone!"

Which age shall cast the first stone? When Cicero wondered how two soothsayers could look at each other without laughing, he showed that the grosser forms of superstition were not universally shared. Such, we may be assured, has been the case at every period; and, in our own day, can we, who proudly proclaim our disbelief in the follies which exist around us, assert individually that we have not contributed, each in his own infinitesimal degree, to the causes which have produced them?

* From Superstition and Force.

THE CHURCH AND FEUDALISM.

There are some crimes over which, for the sake of humanity, it would be well to draw the veil of oblivion, even though they have been perpetrated in the name of Christ, and under the direct supervision of His vicar. Of these is the rebellion of Henry V. against his unhappy father, and we will therefore dwell upon it as cursorily as may be compatible with its bearing on our theme.

Henry V., then a youth of twenty-three years, had been crowned some time previously as King of the Romans; and his father, with that mistrust which had been eaten into his soul by his countless experiences of treachery, had exacted of him a solemn oath never to conspire against him. The way to his succession seemed open and assured, yet he might well listen to the suggestion that, should his father die under the ban of the church, the heritage was liable to confiscation, and any able and powerful prince of the empire might prove a dangerous competitor for the throne. Bold, ambitious, and unscrupulous, he lent but too ready an ear to such promptings; nor was it difficult to find, among the turbulent nobles, chafing under the steady rule of the emperor, enough to organize a most formidable conspiracy. Towards the close of 1104, therefore, the son secretly left his father, and hastened into Bavaria, where his friends rapidly gathered around him. His first care was to dispatch envoys to Rome to demand whether, without injury to his soul, he could break the oath sworn to his father. The blessed Urban II., a few years before, had proclaimed to the world that oaths of fidelity given to an excommunicate were not to be kept, so there was small scruple at Rome in sending to the young parricide all the assurances of which his tender conscience stood in need; and he was speedily comforted with the presence of papal legates, who gave to his unnatural enterprise all the sanctity requisite to shield it from popular abhorrence. From first to last the grovelling ambitions and pervading selfishness which inspired it were carefully kept in the background, and zeal for religion was ostentatiously put forward as its sole and only motive. Funds were raised by inflicting heavy fines on cathedral chapters for their intercourse with excommunicated bishops. The first care of the young king was to expel his father's bishops, and to replace them with his own creatures; he sedulously dug up the bodies of those who had died and cast them out of consecrated ground; and he lost no opportunity of proclaiming that his object was, not to dethrone his father, but to lead him to the reconciliation with the Apostolic See, necessary to his own salvation and to that of the empire. His effrontery of hypocrisy even went so far as to repeat this to the face of his wretched parent when the latter, abandoned by his friends, was forced to surrender, and clasped the knees of his son in agonized pleadings for his life. So the assembly which was convened at Nordhausen, in June, 1105, ostensibly confined itself to regulating the religious affairs of Germany, with a view to removing all traces of the schism. And in the manifesto which, in reply to the complaints of his father, the son published to the world through the Archbishop of Magdeburg, the only reasons alleged for the movement were the destruction of the vineyard of the Lord, and the reduplicated crucifixion of Christ wrought by the hardened and irreligious heart of the emperor.

When Henry, after a vain show of resistance, finding nothing but treachery in those whom most he trusted, gave himself up to his son, it was under a pledge that life and dignity should be guaranteed him, and the opportunity afforded of reconciling himself with the church. Yet when he was brought before the legates at Mainz, and he prostrated himself before his subjects, humbly confessing his rebellious disobedience, and only denying that he had been guilty of idolatry, he was thrown into close confinement, where, denied all the consolations of religion, he daily trembled for his life. In the most civilized parts of his dominions—in the cities, in the Rhinelands, and in Lorraine—Henry had ever been popular, and he had merited the affection of those whom he had endeavored to protect from the scourge of feudal tyranny. When, therefore, the people had recovered somewhat from the stupor caused by the sudden, audacious, and successful rebellion of the son, they rallied around the father, in whose favor all human instincts cried so loudly. Henry escaped from his imprisonment, and soon was able to make a show of strength by no means unimposing. His faithful citizens of Cologne gallantly resisted a protracted siege, which Henry V. was obliged to raise on the approach of his father with a heavy force. Fortune seemed to incline once more in favor of the emperor, and the son sought to open negotiations for an accommodation, when the weary monarch, after a few days' illness, suddenly died, his last act being to send the crown and imperial insignia to his ungrateful son, with the prayer that his body might be allowed sepulture at Speyer, and that those who had remained faithful to him might be pardoned. For the sake of human nature we may well hesitate to credit the assertion that he was poisoned with the cognizance of his son, but it would be no slander to attribute his end to the pious zeal of some enthusiastic son of the church. Urban II. had not long before declared it to be sound doctrine that the slaying of an excommunicate, through ardor for the church, was not homicide. Excommunicates had no rights which the orthodox were bound to respect, and in an age so faithless, turbulent, and ferocious, it was not easy, even were it desired, to impose limits on the devotion of those who had staked their own fortunes on the overthrow of an adversary so formidable to the custodian of the keys of heaven.

The enmity of Rome would not even allow Henry's wearied bones to rest quiet in the tomb. The faithful Liégeois had buried him honorably in the church of St. Lambert, but he had died unreconciled, and his son was warned that if he allowed the body of his excommunicated father to lie in consecrated ground, he would become his accomplice, and be liable to the same punishment. The young king was in the hands of the church; the church was unforgiving, and exacted of him the final act of parricide. He had done too much to hesitate now, and unflinchingly he ordered his father's corpse to be dug up and thrust into the earth in an island of the Rhine, where no religious services were permitted, save that a wandering pilgrim from Jerusalem lingered at the spot, and chanted a psalm over the grave of the once mighty kaiser, who had dared to defy the whole power of the church, and had been broken in the hour of his triumph.

The impatient and unscrupulous ambition of Henry V. had thus thrown away recklessly all the fruits of his father's thirty years of labor and anguish. Hailed for the moment as the new Mac-zabee, and as the deliverer of the church, he had made himself of necessity the slave of the church. It was in vain that by personal violence he extorted from his accomplice Paschal II. the abandonment of the claim to the investitures. To save himself from being declared a heretic, the wretched pope was obliged to disown his own agreement. The chronic rebellion in Germany, revived by Henry, and carefully fostered by the church, rendered his excommunication in 1115 a fatal entanglement, from which he failed to extricate himself by repeating his father's experiment of setting up an anti-pope. His tool, the unhappy Martin Burdinus, paid the penalty of his perilous dignity; and Henry, after prolonging to the last the fruitless struggle, was finally obliged to yield in 1122. A country ruined by anarchy, and the abandonment of the investitures, were the natural results of his alliance with the church—the inevitable price paid for its assistance in destroying his father.

 PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION.

In casting a retrospective glance over this long history of cruelty and injustice, it is curious to observe that Christian communities, where the truths of the Gospel were received with unquestioning veneration, systematized the administration of torture with a cold-blooded ferocity unknown to the legislation of the heathen nations whence they derived it. The careful restrictions and safeguards, with which the Roman jurisprudence sought to protect the interests of the accused, contrast strangely with the reckless disregard of every principle of justice which sullies the criminal procedure of Europe from the thirteenth almost to the nineteenth century. From this no race or religion was exempt. What the Calvinist suffered in Flanders, he inflicted in Scotland; what the Catholic enforced in Italy, he endured in England; nor did either of them deem that he was forfeiting his share in the Divine Evangel of peace on earth and goodwill to men.

The mysteries of the human conscience and of human motives are well-nigh inscrutable, and it may seem shocking to assert that these centuries of unmitigated wrong are indirectly traceable to that religion of which the second great commandment was that man should love his neighbor as himself. Yet so it was. The first commandment, to love God with all our heart, when perverted by superstition, gave a strange direction to the teachings of Christ. For ages, the assumptions of an infallible church had led men to believe that the interpreter was superior to Scripture. Every expounder of the holy text felt in his inmost heart that he alone, with his fellows, worshipped God as God desired to be worshipped, and that every ritual but his own was an insult to the Divine nature. Outside of his own communion there was no escape from eternal perdition, and the fervor of religious conviction thus made persecution a duty to God and man. This led the Inquisition, as we have seen, to perfect a system of which the iniquity was complete. Thus commended, that system became part and parcel of secular law, and when the Reformation arose, the habits of thought which ages had consolidated were universal. The boldest Reformers who shook off the yoke of Rome, as soon as they had attained power, had as little scruple as Rome itself in rendering obligatory their interpretation of divine truth, and in applying to secular as well as to religious affairs the cruel maxims in which they had been educated.

Yet, in the general enlightenment which caused and accompanied the Reformation, there passed away gradually the necessity which had created the rigid institutions of the Middle Ages. Those institutions had fulfilled their mission, and the savage tribes that had broken down the worn-out civilization of Rome were at last becoming fitted for a higher civilization than the world had yet seen, wherein the precepts of the Gospel might at length find practical expression and realization. For the first time in the history of man the universal love and charity which lie at the foundation of Christianity are recognized as the elements on which human society should be based. Weak and erring as we are, and still far distant from the ideal of the Saviour, yet are we approaching it, even if our steps are painful and hesitating. In the slow evolution of the centuries, it may only be by comparing distant periods that we can mark our progress; but progress nevertheless exists, and future generations, perhaps, may be able to emancipate themselves wholly from the cruel and arbitrary domination of superstition and force.

 THE CHURCH AND THE BARBARIANS.†

Under Barbarian rule, the church found itself confronted by a new series of problems. In the Pagan Empire, the church consisted of pastors and people, with common interests and sympathies, exposed to the same evils, and forming an indivisible whole. Under the Christian Emperors, the clergy, endowed with certain privileges, gradually found their personal interests diverging from those of the populations who had been converted in masses. Though technically the church of Christ might still be held to comprehend the laity, yet practically it consisted of the ecclesiastics, with whom naturally the advancement of their order and the preservation and extension of its immunities became the first consideration. This divergence between the clergy and the people was rapidly developed by the incursions and conversion of the Barbarians. There could be little in common between the established clergy of Gaul, for instance, and the untamed German hordes which presented themselves for Christianization and civilization; and the antagonism naturally existing under such circumstances left its indelible impress on the character and policy of the church. The priest who undertook parish duty amid a clan of wild Frankish converts, however conscientiously he might labor for their salvation, could not but feel that in the flesh they were possible enemies who might at any moment drive him away or slay him; and the supernatural prerogatives which, under Roman civilization, were scarcely required to enforce respect for his authority, became the only weapons of self-defence upon which he could rely.

The Barbarian was a man of deeds rather than of words. His laws were few and simple; and for the most part resolved themselves, in their ultimate analysis, into provisions for the payment of damages, which could be eluded by an appeal to brute force. Rude as they were, the history of the times shows that these laws could easily be brushed aside by any one with power and audacity sufficient to disregard them; and it can readily be imagined how hopeless would be the application to the mallum, or court of freemen, by a clerk who would be regarded with double contempt, as a Roman by his conquerors, and as a man of peace by warriors emulous only of martial renown. The attempt to escape this danger introduced a further cause of separation between the clergy and their new converts. As all law under the Barbarians was personal and not territorial, the church found little difficulty at an early period in obtaining for its ministers the advantage of living under the Roman law, thus securing, nominally at least, the privileges and immunities granted by the Christian Emperors; and in addition to this the safety of the ordained clergy was provided for by increased wehr-gilds, or blood-money.

† From Studies in Church History.

Yet, notwithstanding these favors, the church was sorely oppressed by the lawless warriors who found it easier to pass enactments than to observe them or to enforce their observance. In a previous essay we have seen some of the means adopted to meet the necessities of this position, in procuring special privileges with regard to tribunals, and exemptions from ordinary processes of law. But, while these concessions served to separate more than ever the clergy from the laity, they afforded little practical protection from wrong and outrage. What was wanted was some speedy process that should be prepared for every emergency. Every freeman relied on his sword and right hand for self-protection. If the priest were not to be reduced into hopeless servitude, he too must have some ever ready weapon like the freeman's sword, which would either prevent oppression by inspiring salutary fear, or avenge it on the spot.

The only weapon available for these purposes was to be found in excommunication. By heightening the supernatural attributes of the priest and of the sacrament which he made and controlled, he was invested with a vague and awe-inspiring sanctity, most conducive to his personal safety; and if, when no other means of righting himself were to be found, he had recourse to his power over the Eucharist on every trivial occasion, and distributed damnation freely in avenging every petty insult, we should remember the precariousness of his position, and the restrictions which debarred him from recourse to the only other arguments which his untamed flock was likely to respect. An illustration of this is to be found in the fearful curses which, about this time, came to be attached to the charters and privileges granted to monasteries and other religious foundations. The papal chancery had an ample store of formulas for these occasions, in which we see how the audacious violator of the rights of the church was condemned with an anathema which consigned him to hopeless and eternal hell-fire along with the devil and Judas Iscariot. Cursing was the only arm of the defenceless churchman, and if he cursed with heart and soul, we can only measure the apparent intensity of his malignity by the real intensity of his fear.

 NATHAN B. WARREN

Is a native of Troy, N. Y. His ancestors were colonists from England and France, who emigrated to America early in the seventeenth century. His grandfather and father removed from Norwalk, Connecticut, to Troy in 1798, and were merchants successful in business. They were zealous patrons of religion and learning. St. Paul's Church, Troy, Trinity College, Hartford, and the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in New York city, numbered them among their benefactors. From them Mr. Warren inherited an independent fortune, which has enabled him to gratify his cultured tastes in choral music, in literature illustrative of the old-time festivals, and in architecture, as the designer of his villa residence at Mt. Ida, built in a chastely ornamented Gothic style.

A delicacy of constitution and accidental injuries sustained in childhood deprived Mr. Warren of the advantages of a collegiate education. In 1841 he visited England in company with Bishop Doane of New Jersey, who had been invited by Dr. Hook (now Dean of Chichester) to preach the sermon at the consecration of the noble church of Leeds. The English Cathedral-tour that followed suggested to him the idea of adopting the Cathedral or Choral Service of the Church to the American Book of Common Prayer. To further this end, he subsequently published two works: The Order of Daily Service, with the Musical Notation as used in English Cathedral and Collegiate Churches; together with a Collection of Communion Services and Chants, for the Psalms for the Day and Canticles, 1846; and The Ancient Plain Song of the Church, 1855. These services were first introduced, in 1844, into a mission church founded by his mother, and having a girl's school attached. He has also composed some anthem music, and has received the honorary degree of Mus. Doc. from Trinity College.

His chief works, however, are intended to describe and popularize the old-folk lore connected with the ancient holiday festivities. In 1868 appeared, from the press of Hurd & Houghton, The Holidays: Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide; their Social Festivities, Customs, and Carols. That volume collected from the standard authorities the traditions, usages, and superstitions connected with those happy anniversaries, using in illustration the language of quaint old writers, and freeing the subject from the misrepresentations of skeptical and rigidly puritanical writers. It was richly illustrated by F. O. C. Darley, and has reached a second edition. Four years later a companion volume was printed in the same choice style, for private circulation. In Hidden Treasure; or, The Good St. Nicholas; A Goblin Story for Christmas, edited by the Author of The Holidays, 1872, an attempt was successfully made to illustrate the Christmas Holidays in a work of fiction, by presenting in a set of characters and a series of probable events such ancient and picturesque customs and manners as have survived the revolutions of modern times.

 J. T. TROWBRIDGE.

JOHN TOWNSEND TROWBRIDGE, an able sketcher, in poetry as well as prose, of the scenes and humors of New England life, and the managing editor of Our Young Folks, is the son of Windsor Stone Trowbridge. His father, a native of Framingham, Massachusetts, was left an orphan in early life, and was brought up by a farmer in the State of New York. In 1811, Windsor married a farmer's daughter, Rebecca Willey, and emigrated that winter to the wilderness of western New York. He crossed the Genesee river on the ice, near where Rochester now stands,—a site then marked by one house. He settled eight miles beyond, in the town of Ogden, cut down the trees, built a log-house, and made a clearing in the woods for a farm. In this log-house his son John Townsend was born, September 18, 1827, six months too early to make his advent in a new frame dwelling. He was the eighth child, and the youngest but one. His father, whose physique was almost too delicate for a life of hard labor, was passionately fond of music, which he taught in the early pioneer days, and a capital storyteller, often amusing his children with tales in rhyme. His mother, who is still living, is a woman of strong devotional feelings and a sensitive temperament, combined with great energy of character.

J. S. Trowbridge

John Townsend lived the ordinary life of a country boy, going to school six months in the year till he was fourteen, after which he had to work on the farm in summer. But books had more interest to him than his work, and he managed to learn more out of school than in it. He taught himself to read and translate French before he was fifteen, and also undertook Latin and German without an instructor, but did not quite master them. A public library in the town gave him the works of Scott and Byron, which powerfully impressed his imagination, so that he began to plan romances and make endless rhymes while following the plow. At sixteen he wrote articles, in verse and prose, for rural magazines and journals. At the age of seventeen, and in the winter after his father's death, he attended a classical school at Lockport for one term, and passed the next summer on a visit to a sister in Illinois. He taught school the following winter, and then tried farming for one season in the prairie State, but said good-bye to the plow forever when the rust struck his crop of wheat. Returning to Lockport, he again taught school for a term; and soon after, at the age of nineteen, he set off for New York city, where he knew nobody, armed with a little stock of sketches, and the fond hope of earning a modest living by his pen.

Old Major M. M. Noah, then editor of the weekly Sunday Times, kindly received the young aspirant, and counselled him to make literature a profession, but to write prose instead of poetry if he wished to make it "pay." He introduced him to some publishers, who bought a few of his tales and sketches, and one magazine paid him a dollar a printed page for his contributions. As that price would not support him, he ventured to send an article to the Knickerbocker Magazine, which was speedily printed; but the polite editor merely paid in thanks, as was his custom to new contributors. So, after his little stock of money was exhausted, the young writer was often reduced to a last loaf, which he would carry under his arm up four flights of stairs, and eat in the solitude of his chamber on Broadway, while a band stationed in the balcony of the Cafe opposite would entertain him with melody gratis. But he never lost heart in the darkest of those dark days, and perhaps has reason to be thankful for the fruits of such a severe discipline. Some money was occasionally earned, for a few months, by the engraving of gold pencil cases for a manufacturer in Jersey City. After that work had given out, and he had eaten his last loaf, a kind French family opened their doors to him. With them he obtained some practice in speaking the language, and profited by the chance to feast on countless French romances. He was writing for the press again, but, finding it still difficult to meet his weekly board-bills, in August, 1848, he paid a visit to Boston, and concluded to make that city his home, as a better market for small literary wares than New York. The stories and sketches in those times were written under the name of "Paul Creyton."

After the failure of a newspaper venture at Boston in 1849, Mr. Trowbridge, then at the age of twenty-two, edited Ben Perley Poore's Sentinel during the absence of its proprietor in Washington, and nearly put it to a premature death by writing an article on the Fugitive Slave Law, which cost the journal many subscribers. In 1853 he issued his first book, Father Bright hopes; or, An Old Clergyman's Vacation, by Paul Creyton, which had a large sale. It was quickly followed by four other little books; and these together made up the Bright hope Series:—Burrcliff: Its Sunshine and Its Clouds, 1853; Hearts and Faces; or, Home Life Unveiled, 1853; Ironthorpe, 1855; and in 1859 The Old Battle Ground was added. In 1854, he printed Martin Merrivale: His X Mark, in monthly parts; but the market was not ripe for the serial style of publication, and the enterprise was not a success.

He sailed for Europe in April, 1855, passed through England, and spent the summer in Passy, between Paris and the wood of Boulogne. Here he wrote Neighbor Jackwood, an attractive novel of New England life and character. During its composition, he was living two lives, in the greatest possible contrast — one with his friends, in the atmosphere of the brilliant metropolis; the other in the plain Vermont farmhouse. The following winter he passed in Italy, chiefly in Florence, Rome, and Naples. In 1856 he returned home, and soon after published Neighbor Jackwood, also dramatizing the story and bringing it out on the Boston stage, — in both of which forms it was a favorite.

Mr. Trowbridge was one of the original corps of contributors to the Atlantic Monthly. He has printed a large number of papers in that magazine, including poems, stories, sketches of travel, book-notices, and political articles. The Vagabonds, afterward issued in an elegant illustrated volume, and Coupon Bonds, both appeared originally in its pages. He has been a constant contributor to Our Young Folks since its start, and its managing editor for some years past. He was married in 1860 to Miss Cornelia Warren, of Lowell, Massachusetts, who died four years later, leaving him an infant son. His residence is at Arlington, seven miles from Boston.

During the great rebellion, he wrote several stories of the war: The Drummer Boy, 1863; Cudjo's Cave, 1864; and The Three Scouts, 1865. On the return of peace, he spent some four months in the principal Southern States, for the purpose of gaining accurate views of the condition of society there after the war. The result of these observations appeared in June, 1866, in an octavo subscription volume of 600 pages, entitled, The South.

A collected edition of his poems was published in 1869, entitled, The Vagabonds, and other Poems. The volume contains some powerful realistic pictures, the first of which is already a standard favorite; a delicate fantasy, "The Name in the Bark;" several quaintly humorous pieces, and a few "Lyrics of the War." "Author's Night," the longest and most dramatic of his poems, appeared in the Atlantic in August, 1872.

In 1871-2, three volumes of contributions to Our Young Folks were reprinted in book form: Lawrence's Adventures Among the Ice Cutters, Glass Makers, Coal Miners, Iron Men, and Ship Builders; Jack Hazard and His Fortunes, the story of a boy who left the Erie canal to better himself; and the continuation of his haps and mishaps in A Chance for Himself; or, Jack Hazard and His Treasure. These show the same artistic and conscientious treatment of details as his larger works, with the same life-likeness in incident and idiosyncracies of character. Coupon Bonds, and Other Stories, a series of some ten piquant novelettes, mainly on the humorous characteristics of New England life, followed in 1872; and Doing His Best, in 1873.

 THE VAGABONDS.

We are two travellers, Roger and I.

Roger's my dog. — Come here, you scamp.
Jump for the gentleman, — mind your eye!

Over the table, — look out for the lamp! —
The rogue is growing a little old;

Five years we've tramped through wind and weather,

And slept out doors when nights were cold,
And ate and drank — and starved — together.

We've learned what comfort is, I tell you!

A bed on the floor, a bit of rosin,
A fire to thaw our thumbs, (poor fellow,
The paw he holds up there has been frozen),
Plenty of catgut for my fiddle,
(This out-door business is bad for strings),
Then a few nice buckwheats hot from the griddle,
And Roger and I set up for kings!

No, thank you, Sir. — I never drink;

Roger and I are exceedingly moral, —
Aren't we, Roger? — see him wink!

Well, something hot, then, we won't quarrel.
He's thirsty, too — see him nod his head?

What a pity, Sir, that dogs can't talk —
He understands every word that's said, —

And he knows good milk from water and chalk.

The truth is, Sir, now I reflect,

I've been so sadly given to grog,
I wonder I've not lost the respect
(Here's to you, Sir!) even of my dog.
But he sticks by, through thick and thin;
And this old coat with its empty pockets,
And rags that smell of tobacco and gin,
He'll follow while he has eyes in his sockets.

There isn't another creature living

Would do it, and prove, through every disaster,
So fond, so faithful, and so forgiving,

To such a miserable thankless master!

No, Sir! — see him wag his tail and grin!

By George! it makes my old eyes water!

That is, there's something in this gin
That chokes a fellow. But no matter!

We'll have some music, if you are willing,

And Roger (hem! what a plague a cough is, Sir!)

Shall march a little. — Start, you villain!

Stand straight! 'Bout face! Salute your officer!
Put up that paw! Dress! Take your rifle!

(Some dogs have arms, you see!) Now hold
Your cap while the gentlemen give a trifle,
To aid a poor old patriot soldier.

March! Halt! Now show how the rebel shakes,

When he stands up to hear his sentence.

Now tell how many drams it takes

To honor a jolly new acquaintance.

Five yelps, that's five; he's mighty knowing!

The night's before us, fill the glasses!

Quick, sir! I'm ill, — my brain is going!

Some brandy, — thank you; there, — it passes!

Why not reform? That's easily said;

But I've gone through such wretched treatment.

Sometimes forgetting the taste of bread,

And scarce remembering what meat meant,

That my poor stomach's past reform;

And there are times when, mad with thinking,

I'd sell out Heaven for something warm

To prop a horrible inward sinking.

Is there a way to forget to think?

At your age, Sir, home, fortune, friends,

A dear girl's love, — but I took to drink; —
 The same old story; you know how it ends.
 If you could have seen these classic features, —
 You need n't laugh, Sir, they were not then
 Such a burning libel on God's creatures;
 I was one of your handsome men!
 If you had seen her, so fair, and young,
 Whose head was happy on this breast!
 If you could have heard the songs I sung
 When the wine went round, you would n't have guessed
 That ever I, Sir, should be straying
 From door to door, with fiddle and dog,
 Ragged and penniless, and playing
 To you to-night for a glass of grog.
 She's married since, a parson's wife;
 'Twas better for her that we should part;
 Better the soberest, prosiest life
 Than a blasted home and a broken heart.
 I've seen her! Once: I was weak and spent
 On the dusty road; a carriage stopped:
 But little she dreamed, as on she went,
 Who kissed the coin that her fingers dropped!
 You've set me talking, Sir; I'm sorry;
 It makes me wild to think of the change!
 What do you care for a beggar's story?
 Is it amusing? you find it strange?
 I had a mother so proud of me!
 'Twas well she died before. Do you know
 If the happy spirits in Heaven can see
 The ruin and wretchedness here below?

Another glass, and strong, to deaden
 This pain; then Roger and I will start.
 I wonder, has he such a lumpish, leaden,
 Aching thing, in place of a heart?
 He is sad sometimes, and would weep, if he could,
 No doubt, remembering things that were, —
 A virtuous kennel, with plenty of food,
 And himself a sober, respectable cur.
 I'm better now: that glass was warming, —
 You rascal! limber your lazy feet!
 We must be fiddling and performing
 For supper and bed, or starve in the street. —
 Not a very gay life to lead, you think?
 But soon we shall go where lodgings are free,
 And the sleepers need neither victuals or drink; —
 The sooner the better for Roger and me.

GREEN APPLES.

Pull down the bough, Bob! Is n't this fun?
 Now give it a shake, and — there goes one!
 Now put your thumb up to the other, and see
 If it is n't as mellow as mellow can be!
 I know by the stripe
 It must be ripe!
 That's one apiece for you and me.
 Green, are they? Well, no matter for that.
 Sit down on the grass, and we'll have a chat;
 And I'll tell you what old Parson Bute
 Said last Sunday of unripe fruit.
 "Life," says he,
 "Is a bountiful tree,
 Heavily laden with beautiful fruit.
 "For the youth there's love, just streaked with red,
 And great joys hanging just over his head;
 Happiness, honor, and great estate,
 For those who patiently work and wait; —
 Blessings," said he,
 "Of every degree,
 Ripening early, and ripening late.

"Take them in season, pluck and eat,
 And the fruit is wholesome, the fruit is sweet;
 But, O my friends! —" Here he gave a rap
 On his desk, like a regular thunder-clap,
 And made such a bang,
 Old Deacon Lang
 Woke up out of his Sunday nap.
 Green fruit, he said, God would not bless;
 But half life's sorrow and bitterness,
 Half the evil and ache and crime,
 Came from tasting before their time
 The fruits Heaven sent.
 Then on he went
 To his Fourthly and Fifthly: — was n't it prime?
 But, I say, Bob! we fellows don't care
 So much for a mouthful of apple or pear;
 But what we like is the fun of the thing,
 When the fresh winds blow, and the hang-birds bring
 Home grubs, and sing
 To their young ones, a-swing
 In their basket-nest, tied up by its string.
 I like apples in various ways:
 They're first-rate roasted before the blaze
 Of a winter fire; and, O my eyes!
 Aren't they nice, though, made into pies?
 I scarce ever saw
 One, cooked or raw,
 That was n't good for a boy of my size!
 But shake your fruit from the orchard tree,
 And the tune of the brook, and the hum of the bee,
 And the chipmonks chipping every minute,
 And the clear sweet note of the gay little linnet,
 And the grass and the flowers,
 And the long summer hours,
 And the flavor of sun and breeze, are in it.
 But this is a hard one! Why did n't we Leave them another week on the tree?
 Is yours as bitter? Give us a bite!
 The pulp is tough, and the seeds are white,
 And the taste of it puckers
 My mouth like a sucker's!
 I vow, I believe the old parson was right!

MR. BLAZAY'S EXPERIENCE — FROM COUPON BONDS.

. . . That afternoon, having dressed, dined, and finished my cigar, I sallied forth from the "Shoemake Hotel" to call on my future bride.
 I found the cottage; a neat little cream-colored house on a bank of the river; doors and windows festooned with prairie roses; an orchard behind, and maple-trees in front; and an atmosphere of rural beauty and quietude over all.
 I opened the little wooden gate. It clicked cheerily behind me, and the sound summoned from the orchard a laboring man in rolled-up shirt-sleeves, who approached as I was lifting the brass knocker under the festoons of roses.
 "How de do, sir? Want anything o' Mr.
 Thornton's folks?"
 I looked at him. He might have been a porter (at least, he was a brown stout fellow); not above five feet five, and rather familiar for such a short acquaintance.
 "I should like to see Mr. Thornton," I said, talking down at him from my six-foot dignity on
 the doorstep.
 "O, wall! walk right in! We're all in the orchard jest now, gitting a hive of bees."
 "Be so kind then, my good fellow," said I, producing Jones's letter, "as to hand this to Mr.
 Thornton."

He received the letter in his great, brown, horny hands, stared at the superscription, stared at me, "Oh! Jones!" and opened it. "I am Mr. Thornton," he informed me, before beginning to read.

When the letter was read he looked up again, smilingly.

"This is Mr. Blazay, then!" he said.

"Delighted to meet you, Mr. Thornton," I said.

He reached up, I reached down. He got hold of my hand as if it had been a bell-rope, and wrung it cordially. I knew he was glad to see me, as well as if he had told me.

"Will you step into the house or into the orchard?" said Mr. Thornton.

House or orchard, I felt my foot was in it, and it made little difference which way I stepped.

"Wal," said he, as he was taking me to see the bees: "so you've come up here, thinking mabby you'd like to marry our Susie?"

I stopped aghast.

"I—I was n't aware, sir, that Jones had written anything to that effect!"

"A private letter I got from him yis'd'y," said Mr. Thornton; "he seemed to think's best to kinder explain things 'fore you got along. I think about so myself. He gives you a tolerable fair character, and, fur's I'm concerned, if you and Susie can make a bargain, I sha'n't raise no objections."

"Have you," I gasped, "mentioned it to Susie?"

"O, sartin!" said Mr. Thornton. "Mother and I thought best to talk the matter over with her, so's to have everything open and above-board, and save misunderstandings in the futur'."

"And, may I ask, how did Susie regard a—such a—very singular arrangement?"

"Singular? How so? Mother and I looked upon it as very sensible. You come and git acquainted and marry her, if agreeable; or if not, not. That's what I call straightfor'a'd."

"Straightfor'a'd? O yes, to be sure!" I said, and essayed to laugh, with very indifferent, if not with ghastly, success.

A little too straightforward, was n't it? It was well enough, of course, for a couple of hardened wretches like Jones and myself to talk over a matrimonial project in business fashion, and for me to come up and look at the article of a bride he recommended, to see if she suited; but to know that the affair had been coolly discussed by the other party to the proposed bargain made it as awkward and unromantic as possible. I even suspected that I was the victim of a hoax, and that Jones was at that moment chuckling over my stupendous gullibility.

"That there's my darter, and them's the bees," said Mr. Thornton.

"What! that thing in the tree?" said I, using my eye-glass. "It looks like a shocking bad hat!"

"That's the swarm stuck on to the limb," said Mr. Thornton. "We'll have Susie to thank if we save 'em. She heard 'em flying over, and run out with the dinner-bell and called 'em."

"Called 'em to dinner?" I said absent-mindedly.

"Ringing the bell called 'em down, till bimeby they lit on that tree. A swarm 'll gen'ly come to such noises. And Susie's a master-hand to look arter bees."

"What's she doing up on the ladder there?"

"She's cutting off the limb. It's curi's," said Mr. Thornton, with fatherly pride, "bees never tech her, though she goes right in among 'em. Sting me, though; so I keep a little back. Susie's mother, Mr. Blazay!"

At that a freckled, good-natured woman, who stood at a little distance from the tree, with her arms rolled up in a calico apron, took them out to shake hands with me, and rolled them up again.

"What are these little negro boys doing?" I inquired.

"Nigger boys! Ho! ho! ho!" laughed the paternal Thornton.

"Them's our little boys, sir," said the maternal Thornton, with an amused smile. "What you see is veils tied over their faces to keep the bees from stinging on 'em. That's George Washington holding the ladder for Susie; and that's Andrew Jackson tending the clo'es-line."

"This is the second swarm Susie has stopped this season," said Mr. Thornton. "Both wild swarms from the woods, prob'ly. We consider it quite a prize."

"Hive of bees in May, with a ton of hay; hive of bees in June, with a silver spoon; hive of bees in July, not with a fly. That's the old adage," smiled Mrs. Thornton.

"But Susie has good luck with her bees, let 'em swarm when they will," said Mr. Thornton.

"Look out down there!" cried a clear, shrill, feminine voice from the tree.

The fibres of the bough began to crack; and somewhat to my alarm I saw the great, black, bat-like mass swing down as if about to fall to the ground. But I soon perceived that it was secured by the rope, which was passed over a limb above, and then down to Andrew Jackson's hand, who stood looking up through his veil, waiting for orders. Susie severed the bark and splinters that still held the branch, then dropped her little handsaw on the grass.

"Now, Jackson!" Slowly the boy played out the line, and slowly the bough descended with its burden. "Hold on, Georgie!" Georgie held on, and down the ladder came Susie.

Animated, agile, red as a rose, she ran to her bees, I regarding her meanwhile with anxious interest. Taking hold of the bough where it hung, she ordered Andrew Jackson to "let it come," lowered it almost to the ground and shook it. The bees fell off in great bunches and clusters, which burst into buzzing, crumbling, crawling multitudes on the grass,—wave on wave dark surging. George Washington stood ready with a bee-hive, which he clapped over the living heap. And the job was done.

"There, father!" cried Susie, merrily, "what are you going to give me for that? Hive of bees in June—"

She stopped, seeing me.

"You shall have your silver spoon," said Mr. Thornton. "This is Mr. Blazay, Susie."

Determined to perform my part with becoming gallantry, I advanced. Unluckily, I am tall. My bow was lofty; the bough of the tree was low. Before I could take off my hat my hat was taken off for me. Attempting to catch it, I knocked it like a ball straight at Susie's head. She dodged it, and it fell by the bee-hive. At that the Father of his Country rushed to the rescue, and brought it back to me with the air of a youngster who expects a penny for his services.

I was finishing my bow to Susie, when I observed a number of swift, zigzag, darting insects circling about us.

"Stand still and they wont hurt ye," said George Washington, handing me my hat. "Make 'em think you're a tree!"

I assumed the role accordingly, — rooted myself to the spot, — held my tall trunk erect — kept my limbs rigid, — and, I am confident, appeared verdant enough to deceive even a bee. In that interesting attitude I looked as unconcerned as possible. grimaced at Susie, said what a delightful orchard it was, and felt a whizzing, winnowing sensation in my foliage, otherwise called hair.

"There's a bee!" screamed Andrew Jackson.

The General was right, — there was a bee. I began to brush.

"Don't ye stir!" shouted Washington. "That'll only make him mad! Keep jest as still!"

It was easy for the first President to stand there, with his face veiled, and promulgate that theory. But I wasn't up to it. I found myself stirring my stumps involuntarily. I dropped my hat and stepped in it. The bee whizzed and winnowed; I flirted and brushed. Then came a poignant thrill! The assassin had his poisoned dagger in me.

The sublime Washington continued to shout, "Keep still, keep jest as still!" But already my movements had quite dispelled the illusion that I was a tree, and the darning and darning about my ears became terrific. I endeavored to smile calmly at Susie, and talk as became a man of my politeness and dignity. But it was no use. Panic seized me. I stamped, I swung my crushed hat, I took to my heels. I ran like a Mohawk; and I should never, probably, have stopped until I reached a railroad train, had not the same destiny that brought me to Shoemaker conspired to keep me there by casting a dead branch in my way. In giving my head a brush I neglected the brush at my feet. They became entangled in it, and I sprawled my six feet of manly dignity ingloriously on the turf.

The first thing I heard, on recovering my faculties and sitting up, was laughter. George Washington and Andrew Jackson were rolling and keeling over with laughter. Mrs. Thornton was eating her calico apron. Mr. Thornton was suffering from an excruciating attack of colic, while Susie indulged without restraint her very ill-timed merriment.

As I got upon my feet the whole family came forward to see if I was hurt.

"Children! Susie!" I could hear Mr. Thornton saying; "hush! don't ye know better'n to laugh? Did you, sir, git stung?"

"I — I thought the bees were coming rather near," I remarked, cheerfully, pressing my hat into shape, "so I concluded to stand back a little."

"Sartin, sartin!" said Mr. Thornton.

"Susie!" giggled George Washington, "he thought he'd stan' back a little! he, he, he!"

"Did n't his arms and legs fly for about a minute, though!" snickered Andrew Jackson.

"Shall we go and examine the operations of the bees? I feel a lively interest in bees." And I put on my hat, pulling it gayly over the aching eyebrow.

"I'm afraid," said Mr. Thornton, "the bees have been so kind o' shook up 't won't be very safe to go near 'em right away."

"Ah! you think so? A sting is nothing — a — nothing dangerous, is it?"

"O no; but it's sometimes plaguy uncomft-able," said Mr. Thornton, "that's all."

"That all?" said I, glad to hear it. "I'm sure that's nothing so very dreadful. However, if you think we'd better wait until the bees get a little quiet, I can restrain my curiosity."

Susie had found an excuse to go back to the hive. I should have been glad of any excuse to return at the same instant to the hotel. I had seen enough of her, and certainly had heard enough. My interest in the Thorntons was satiated. I had made up my mind that I didn't want to marry. The country was not so charming as I had anticipated. I very much preferred the town.

 CHARLES ELIOT NORTON,

THE SON of the late Rev. Andrews Norton,* an eminent Unitarian divine, was born in Boston, November 16, 1827. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1846, and then travelled abroad. After his return, he published in 1852 Considerations on some Recent Social Topics. Three years later, he edited from his father's manuscript, in conjunction with Mr. Ezra Ab-

C. E. Norton

Bott, A Translation of the Gospels, with Notes, in two octavo volumes.

The seventeen months following (December 1855 to April 1857), were passed by Mr. Norton in Italy, chiefly at Rome, though Genoa, Florence, Orvieto, Naples and Venice were visited and explored. He observed with keen interest the peculiar phases of Italian society, government, and ecclesiasticism, many of which are now merely historic. He paused as well to study the monuments of the mediæval and renaissance periods, being particularly attracted to the aspects of Rome in the times of Dante and of Petrarch. In 1860, he published his Notes of Study and Travel in Italy, wherein he states: "The Middle Ages still possess Italy. In these country towns, even in enlightened Sardinia, one feels himself a contemporary of Boccaccio, and might read many of the tales of the 'Decameron' as stories of the present day. The life of the common people has much the same aspect now as it had centuries ago. Italy has undergone many vicissitudes, but few changes." He continued to say, with a keen forecast which later events have fully justified: "The success of the experiment of constitutional government in Sardinia is at this moment the chief hope of Italy. A liberal and wise spirit of reform is uniting the interests of all classes, and a steady, gradual progress proving the ability of Italians to govern themselves without the excesses of enthusiasm, or the evils of extravagant and undisciplined hopes. While Milan and Venice are hemmed round by Austrian bayonets, and Florence is discontented under the stupid despotism of an insane bigot, — while Rome stagnates under the superstition of priests, and Naples under the brutality of a Bourbon, Turin and Genoa are flourishing and independent."

* Anti, vol. i., pp. 776-7.

Mr. Norton prepared, in 1862, the American edition of the Poems of Arthur Hugh Clough, with a Memoir. During the war, he edited the Broadsides, and other issues of the Loyal Publication Society, from 1861 to 1865. He was also a frequent contributor to the North American Review, and its editor-in-chief from 1863 to 1868.

In 1867 he published, in an imperial octavo volume, the New Life of Dante, Translated, with Essays and Notes. These scholarly Essays were three in number, and related to the Vita Nuova, the date of its composition, and its structure. A portion of this translation, accompanied by a part of what afterward appeared as the Essays and Notes, had appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in 1859, and was printed in a volume for private circulation that same year. This work, which was the earliest of Dante's writings, as well as the most autobiographic in form and intention, gives, in the words of its translator, "the story of his early love—its beginning, its irregular course, its hopes and doubts, its exaltations and despairs, its sudden interruption and transformation by death." The spirit that controlled its translator was a sympathetic literalness, eager to preserve its natural grace—"a regard for the letter of the original, in a belief that thus its essential spirit could be best rendered. In dealing with the intimate revelations of a character so great and so peculiar as that of Dante, a respectful deference is required for the very words in which they are contained. Dante has a right to demand this homage of his translator."

THE LADY BEATRICE—FROM DANTE'S NEW LIFE.

XXVI.

This most gentle lady, of whom there hath been discourse in the preceding words, came into such favor among the people, that, when she passed along the way, persons ran to see her, which gave me wonderful delight. And when she was near any one, such modesty came into his heart that he dared not raise his eyes, or return her salutation; and of this many, as having experienced it, could bear witness for me, to whose might not believe it. She, crowned and clothed with humility, took her way, displaying no pride in that which she saw and heard. Many said, when she had passed, "This is not a woman; rather she is one of the most beautiful angels of heaven." And others said, "She is a marvel. Blessed be the Lord who can work thus admirably!" I said that she showed herself so gentle and so full of all pleasantness that those who looked upon her comprehended in themselves a pure and sweet delight, such as they could not after tell in words; nor was there any who might look upon her but that he needs must sigh at the beginning. These and more admirable things proceeded from her admirably and with power. Wherefore I, thinking upon this, desiring to resume the style of her praise, resolved to say words in which I would set forth her admirable and excellent influences, to the end that not only those who might actually behold her, but also others, might know of her whatever words might tell. Then I devised this sonnet:—

So gentle and so modest doth appear
My lady when she giveth her salute,
That every tongue becometh, trembling, mute;
Nor do the eyes to look upon her date.

Although she hears her praises, she doth go
Benignly vested with humility;
And like a thing come down, she seems to be,
From heaven to earth, a miracle to show.
So pleaseth she whoever cometh nigh,
She gives the heart a sweetness through the eyes,
Which none can understand who doth not prove.
And from her countenance there seems to move
A spirit sweet and in Love's very guise,
Who to the soul is ever saying, Sigh!

This sonnet is so easy of understanding, through that which hath been narrated, that it hath no need of any division, and therefore leaving it,

XXVII.

I say that this my lady reached such favor that not only was she honored and praised, but through her were many ladies honored and praised. Wherefore I, seeing this, and wishing to manifest it to whoever saw it not, resolved further to say words in which this should be set forth; and I devised this sonnet, which relateth how her virtue wrought in other ladies:—

All welfare hath he perfectly beheld
Who amid ladies doth my lady see;
And whose goeth with her is compelled
Grateful to God for this fair grace to be.
Her beauty of such virtue is indeed,
That 'ne'er in others doth it envy move;
Rather she makes them like her to proceed,
Clothed on with gentleness and faith and love.
Her sight creates in all humility,
And maketh not herself to please alone,
But each gains honor who to her is nigh.
So gentle in her every act is she,
That she can be recalled to mind by none
Who doth not, in Love's very sweetness, sigh.

This sonnet hath three parts: in the first, I say among what people this lady appeared most admirable; in the second, I say how gracious was her company; in the third, I speak of those things which she wrought with power in others. The second beginneth here: "And whose goeth;" the third, here: "Her beauty of such virtue." This last part is divided into three: in the first, I tell that which she wrought in ladies, namely, as regards themselves; in the second, I tell that which she wrought in them in respect to others; in the third, I tell how she wrought not only in ladies, but in all persons, and how she marvellously wrought not only in presence, but also in memory. The second beginneth here: "Her sight;" the third, here: "So gentle."

WILLIAM DWIGHT WHITNEY,

A BROTHER of the eminent scientist, Josiah Dwight Whitney, who holds the professorship of practical geology in Harvard College, was born at Northampton, Massachusetts, February 9, 1827. He was graduated at Williams College in 1845, and studied at Berlin and Tübingen in 1850-3. He was called to the professorship of Sanscrit and Comparative Philology at Yale College in 1854. He published at Berlin, in 1856, "in conjunction with Professor R. Roth, the Sanscrit text of Atharva-Veda, from a collation of all the known manuscripts in Europe. Since 1857 he has been corresponding secretary of the American Oriental Society, and a principal editor of its Journal, to which his most important contributions have been a translation, with notes, of the 'Surya-Siddhânta,' fully illustrated editions of two of the 'Prâtiçakhyas,' criticisms on the Standard Alphabet of Lepsius, and on the views of Biot, Weber, and Muller on the Hindoo and Chinese Asterisms, etc. He has also furnished many articles to the North American Review, New Englander,

Nation, and to the New American Cyclopædia. He has contributed valuable material to the great Sanscrit Dictionary of Böhtlingk and Roth, now in course of publication at Saint Petersburg. His other published works have been a volume of Lectures on Language and the Study of Language, 1867; A Compendious German Grammar, 1869; and a German Reader, 1870. He received the honorary degree of Ph.D. from the university of Breslau in 1861, and that of LL. D. from Williams College in 1868, and from William and Mary College, Virginia, in 1869. In 1869 he was chosen first president of the American Philological Association. In 1870 his 'Tāittiriya-Pratiśā khya' received the Bopp prize from the Berlin Academy. As a critic and writer on subjects connected with philology, Professor Whitney is no less distinguished for his clear insight and sound judgment than for his accurate, profound, and varied learning.

Dr. Whitney published in 1873 Oriental and Linguistic Studies, a series of Essays on the Veda, the Avesta, and the Science of Language. These were written at various times, and the original paper on the Vedas was the first that made accessible to English readers the main results of modern study respecting the most ancient period in Indian history.

 JULIA C. R. DORR.

Mrs. JULIA CAROLINE RIPLEY DORR is the daughter of Mr. William Young Ripley, for many years president of the Rutland county bank, Vermont, and of Zulma Caroline Ripley.

Julia C. R. Dorris

Her maternal grand-parents were Jean Jacques Thomas and Suzanne De Lacy, both natives of France, who were forced to flee from San Domingo to Charleston, S. C., by the insurrection of the slaves in that island. She was born at Charleston, S. C., and lost her mother while an infant, whereupon her father removed to New York city and engaged in mercantile pursuits.

Miss Ripley was married in 1847 to the Hon. Seneca M. Dorr, of Chatham, New York,—a gentleman of liberal culture. Subsequently they settled at Rutland, Vermont, whence Mr. Dorr has been repeatedly called to fill positions of trust and honor in the State. A year after her marriage, Mrs. Dorr, who had written since early childhood, became a contributor to Sartain's and Graham's Magazines. "Isabel Leslie," her first prose tale sent to the press, gained one of the hundred dollar prizes offered by the former. Her first novel, Farmingdale, was published in 1854, under the nom de plume of "Caroline Thomas." Two years later, she issued a second novel, Lanmere, in her own name. Both of these books were acceptable to the public, though now out of print. The North American Review awarded her a high rank for "the capacity of managing a sufficient number of side scenes, underplots and episodes, to sustain dramatic interest, without violating dramatic unity." Sibyl Huntington, esteemed by many as her best work of fiction, appeared in 1869; and a fourth novel, Expiation, followed in 1872. Its characters are clearly and strongly drawn; and as the story goes on, the reader is fascinated by the tragic intensity of the plot. A series of "Letters," warmly welcomed as they appeared weekly in a New England journal, were gathered into a volume in 1873, entitled Bride and Bridegroom; and they constitute twenty-six consecutive essays on Marriage.

Much of Mrs. Dorr's writings yet remain distributed through the leading periodicals, such as Putnam's, Harper's, and Scribner's Magazines, Appleton's Journal, the Galaxy, Aldine, etc. In 1871, a number of her rhythmical and thoughtful Poems were put into book-form. The leading poem, The Dead Century, is a powerful and sustained effort. Outgrown, one of the pure-toned lessons wherewith lady writers are leavening our literature; Elsie's Child and Margery Gray are pleasing narratives in verse, and the choice In Memoriam series, illustrate the versatility and womanliness of the themes.

 OUTGROWN.

Nay, you wrong her, my friend, she's not fickle;
her love she has simply outgrown;
One can read the whole matter, translating her heart by the light of one's own.

Can you bear me to talk with you frankly? There is much that my heart would say,
And you know we were children together, have quarreled and "made up" in play.

And so, for the sake of old friendship, I venture to tell you the truth,
As plainly perhaps, and as bluntly, as I might in
our earlier youth.

Five summers ago, when you wooed her, you stood on the self-same plane,
Face to face, heart to heart, never dreaming your souls could be parted again.

* Thomas's Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

She loved you at that time entirely, in the bloom of her life's early May,
And it is not her fault, I repeat it, that she does not love you to-day.

Nature never stands still, nor souls either. They ever go up or go down;
And hers has been steadily soaring, — but how has it been with your own?

She has struggled, and yearned, and aspired, — grown purer and wiser each year;
The stars are not farther above you, in yon luminous atmosphere!

For she whom you crowned with fresh roses,
down yonder, five summers ago,
Has learned that the first of our duties to God and ourselves is to grow.

Her eyes they are sweeter and calmer, but their vision is clearer as well;
Her voice has a tenderer cadence, but is pure as a silver bell,

Her face has the look worn by those who with God and his angels have talked;
The white robes she wears are less white than the spirits with whom she has walked.

And you? Have you aimed at the highest? Have you, too, aspired and prayed?
Have you looked upon evil unsullied? have you conquered it undismayed?

Have you, too, grown purer and wiser, as the months and the years have rolled on?
Did you meet her this morning rejoicing in the triumph of victory won?

Nay, hear me! The truth cannot harm you.
When to-day in her presence you stood,
Was the hand that you gave her as white and clean as that of her womanhood?

Go measure yourself by her standard. Look back on the years that have fled;
Then ask, if you need, why she tells you that the love of her girlhood is dead!

She cannot look down to her lover; her love, like her soul, aspires;
He must stand by her side, or above her, who would kindle its holy fires.

Now, farewell! For the sake of old friendship I have ventured to tell you the truth,
As plainly, perhaps, and as bluntly, as I might in
our earlier youth.

 THREE WHITE MICE.
A crumb for the wee ones.

I will tell you a story of three little mice,
If you will keep still and listen to me,
Who live in a cage that is cosy and nice,
And are just as cunning as cunning can be.
They look very wise, with their pretty red eyes,
That seem just exactly like little round beads;
They are white as the snow, and stand up in a row
Whenever we do not attend to their needs.

Stand up in a row, in a comical way, —
Now folding their forepaws as if saying
"please;"

Now rattling the lattice, as much as to say,
"We shall not stay here without more bread and cheese."

They are not at all shy, as you'll find, if you try
To make them run up in their chamber to bed;

If they don't want to go, why, they won't go, —
ah! no,
Though you tap with your finger each queer little head.

One day as I stood by the side of the cage,
Through the bars there protruded a funny,
round tail;
Just for mischief I caught it, and soon, in a rage,
Its owner set up a most pitiful wail
He looked in dismay, — there was something to pay, —

But what was the matter he could not make out;
What was holding him so, when he wanted to go
To see what his brothers up-stairs were about?
But soon from the chamber the others rushed
down,

Impatient to learn what the trouble might be;
I have not a doubt that each brow wore a frown,
Only frowns on their brows are not easy to see.
For a moment they gazed, perplexed and amazed.
Then began both together to—gnaw off the tail!
So quick I released him, — do you think that it pleased him?

And up the small staircase they fled like the gale.

 DE PROFUNDIS.

Tossed by the heaving of passion's wild billows,
Struggling with anguish and doubt and despair.
Ere the dark waters close o'er him forever,
Hearken, O God, to his agonized prayer!
There is no star in the heavens above him,
There is no rift in the dark rolling cloud;
Only the thunder of storm-beaten surges, —
Only the roar of the waves swelling loud!

Thou who art sitting serene in the heavens,
Judging the ways that Earth's children have trod,

Art thou unmoved by the cry of his anguish?
Dost thou not hear it, Omnipotent God?
Didst thou not fashion him out of the darkness,
Moulding him even when hid in the womb?
Not of his seeking the life that thou gavest,
Burdened with sorrow and heavy with gloom!

Fettered by circumstance, place, and position,
Tempted by foes from without and within,
Wrestling with Evil, alone, single-handed,
After long conflict he yielded to sin.
O thou Immaculate! Thou, the Unsinning!
Thou whose own being is spotless and pure,
How from the heights of thy sinless perfection,
Canst judge us with judgment, just, righteous,
and sure?

Ah! dare I question thee, Thou, the All-loving?
Lo! this the answer we find in thy Word:
"Sitting serene on my throne in the heavens,
Never one cry floateth past me unheard!
O ye disconsolate, heartsick, and erring,
Tempted and languishing, lost and undone,
How can ye question the love that I bear ye
When out of its fullness I gave ye MY SON?"

Thou who didst wander in lone wildernesses!
Thou who didst suffer all pain and all loss!
Thou who didst moan in Gethsemane's garden!
Thou who didst hang on the terrible cross!
Thou who wert tempted as never another, —
Thou who wert man but yet sinless and pure, —
Out of the depths do we lift up our voices,
Only in Thee find we strength to endure!

 HEIRSHIP.

Little store of wealth have I;
Not a rood of land I own;
Nor a mansion fair and high
Built of towers of fretted stone.
Stocks nor bonds, nor title-deeds,
Flocks nor herds have I to show;
When I ride, no Arab steeds
Toss for me their manes of snow.

I have neither pearls nor gold,
Massive plate, nor jewels rare;
Broidered silks of worth untold,
Nor rich robes a queen might wear
In my garden's narrow bound
Flaunt no costly tropic blooms,
Laden all the air around
With a weight of rare perfumes.

Yet to an immense estate
Am I heir by grace of God,—
Richer, grander than doth wait
Any earthly monarch's nod.
Heir of all the Ages, I—
Heir of all that they have wrought,
All their store of emprise high,
All their wealth of precious thought.

Every golden deed of theirs
Sheds its lustre on my way;
All their labors, all their prayers,
Sanctify this present day!
Heir of all that they have earned
By their passion and their tears,—
Heir of all that they have learned
Through the weary, toiling years!

Heir of all the faith sublime
On whose wings they soared to heaven;
Heir of every hope that Time
To Earth's fainting sons hath given!
Aspirations pure and high,—
Strength to dare and to endure,—
Heir of all the Ages, I—
Lo! I am no longer poor!

 IDLE WORDS.

I.

Once I said,
Seeing two soft starry eyes
Darkly bright as midnight skies,—
Eyes prophetic of the power
Sure to be thy woman's dower,
When the years should crown thee queen
Of the realm as yet unseen,—
"Some time, sweet, those eyes shall make Lovers mad for their sweet sake!"

II.

Once I said,
Seeing tresses, golden-brown,
In a bright shower falling down
Over neck and bosom fair
As yon sculptured angel's are,— Odorous tresses drooping low
O'er a forehead pure as snow,—
"Some time, sweet, in thy soft hair
Love shall set a shining snare!"

III.

Once I said,
Seeing lips whose crimson hue
Mocked the roses wet with dew,—
Warm, sweet lips, whose breath was balm,—
Pure, proud lips, serenely calm,—

Tender lips, whose smiling grace
Lit with splendor all the face,—
"Sweet, for kiss of thine some day Men will barter souls away!"

IV.

Idly said!
God hath taken care of all
Joy or pain that might befall!
Lover's lip shall never thrill
At thy kisses, soft and still;
Lover's heart shall never break
In sore anguish for thy sake;
Lover's soul for thee shall know
Nor love's rapture, nor its woe;—
All is said!

 MARY CLEMMER AMES,

The daughter of Abram Clemmer and Margaret Kniel, was born in the town of Utica, New York. Her father's ancestry was of a French and a German stock, while her mother was descended from a Celtic family of the Isle of Man, which, through many generations, was notable for its unworldliness, devout piety, and fondness for books.

Mary Clemmer as a child manifested extreme sensibility, a ceaseless attachment to her friends, a passion for books, pictures, and music, and a love for nature which made all beautiful objects living beings. And as early as six years of age, she was known to have sung her little sister to sleep with songs of her own making. She was married in extreme youth to Rev. Daniel Ames, of Massachusetts, and devoted the spare moments of a purely domestic life to literary studies.

Mary Clemmer Ames

Mrs. Ames began her career as a writer by the composition of many poems, and the contribution of occasional letters to the Utica Herald and the Springfield Republican. In 1865, Victoire, an anonymous novel, was published, a larger part of which had been written before her twenty-first year. It was a dramatic illustration of the text, "He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city." In the following year, she began a famous series of letters from the National Capital to the New York Independent, under the title of "A Woman's Letters from Washington." These exhibited a keen perception of character, a clear analysis of public men and measures, and a strict devotion to truth. In 1870, the exigencies of fortune led her to adopt journalism as a profession. She entered the editorial staff of the Independent and the Brooklyn Union, binding herself by written contracts to furnish an article every week-day for three years. This onerous engagement she fulfilled to the letter.

Her second novel, Eirene; or, A Woman's Right, a plea for the womanliness of woman, and an argument, couched in scenes of social life, for her right to make the freest use of her intellectual powers, appeared in 1870. It was followed three years later by her Memorial of Alice and Phoebe Cary. This worthy tribute of affection to the lives of these two estimable sisters, was written at the request of their executors. Its author was admirably qualified for the task by her personal intimacy with those lady poets, as she had resided at several periods in their cultured home in New York city. She has since edited two posthumous volumes of their poems for publication, 1873-4.

The poems and letters of Mrs. Ames, which cover ten years of emotion, thought, and labor, have not yet been made the basis of a single volume. To quote her own words: "As a worker, my impulse and purpose is, first, to fulfil every obligation of my personal life; next, to serve my generation, so far as I am able, by meeting the demand of every hour. To do these, is more than I can do perfectly, without making the futile attempt, in this era of many and vociferous voices, to speak to posterity." She has lately issued: Ten Years in Washington: Sketches of Life in the National Capital; and Outlines of Men, Women, and Things, 1873; and has nearly ready for publication a novel bearing on a vital question of the times, entitled His Two Wives.

 MARGARET J. PRESTON

Is a daughter of the Rev. Dr. George Junkin, an eminent clergyman of the Presbyterian Church, and a man of letters, who lived from 1790 to 1868. He was the founder of Lafayette College, at Easton, Pa., and was President of Washington College, at Lexington, Va., till succeeded by the late Gen. Robert E. Lee.

Miss Junkin was married to Col. Preston, of the Virginia Military Institute, and has resided a large part of her life at Lexington. From childhood, she has made the pursuit of literature a pleasure and pastime, though not a vocation.

Her first printed work was a quiet, purely-written volume of prose, Silverwood, a Book of Memories, which was commended as an exponent of a true culture. Her early fugitive poems are to be chiefly met with in the Southern journals of ante-war times.

Beechenbrook, a story in verse of the late struggle, was issued in Baltimore in 1865. By its tender pathos and strong Southern sympathies, it reached an eighth edition within a year, and was read from the Potomac to the Gulf. Among its pathetic pieces are Slain in Battle, and Stonecove Jackson's Grave.

A second volume of Mrs. Preston's poems appeared in 1870, entitled Old Song and New; and deservedly won high praise from leading critics. The New York Evening Post characterized her poetry as belonging "to the school of Mrs. Browning," and stated: "No American woman has evinced a truer appreciation of what the poet owes to the art of poetry, and the reader will not find on the three hundred pages of this volume, one careless line or one trivial thought. There is great variety in the contents of this book. From the most unstudied expression of sensibility to the beautiful in the external world, and to the dramatic presentation of ideal or historic characters, they touch the whole circle of art." This book contains poems from Hebrew and Greek story, as well as ballads and verses on domestic themes, sonnets, and religious pieces.

Mrs. Preston, upon the recent illness of the Prince of Wales, wrote a poem, Sandringham, which, when reprinted in England, elicited an autograph letter of thanks from the Princess of Wales. A number of art-poems printed in the leading magazines, such as Victoria Colonna to Michael Angelo, and Mon Lisa's Picture, have been regarded with special favor by readers of high culture. Some ballad-like pieces, illustrative of the teachings of the old legends — The Bishop's Ban, St. Gregory's Supper, and Dorothy's Roses — and Through the Pass, a tender monody on Matthew F. Maury, have had a wide popularity.

 RHODOPÉ'S SANDAL — FROM OLD SONG AND NEW.

Slant, arrowy beams from sheath of Helios dropt,
With golden lustre tipped the willowy marge
Of a pellucid stream that slid
Seaward with low, recurrent lapse,
That lulled the senses like a Lydian flute.

The lotus bowed above the tide and dreamed;
The broad-leaved calamus arose and fell
As on a lover's breast the head
His beating heart hath rocked to sleep;
And all the air was drowsed with tropic calm.

Parting aside the willows, coyly came
A maiden, — stealing on with furtive step
And shy, quick-glancing eyes that turned Hither and thither, like a bird's,
Who fears invasion of her callow brood.

She stood and listened: There, — a heron's plash, —
O'erhead, the sunset crooning of a dove, —
The shrill cicala's cry — the purr
Of rushes laughing in their sleep —
Were all the sounds that broke the solitude.

Then, unafraid, she loosed her sandals off,
And hung her fillet on a pensile bough;

And from her virgin waist unbound
The crimson zone of broodery-work
And slipt her garments from her crouching form.

Instant, she leaped, chin-deep, within the flood,
Waking the waier-lilies with her pluge,
And scattering sparkles all about,
Until her changing hair was crowned
With jewels bright as queenly diadem.

As thus she sported, careless and secure,
An eagle sailing from his eyried height,
—(Her fate beneath his wings,) swooped
down,
And snatched her sandal silver-webbed,
And bore it in his beak, straight up the blue.

Across bare, yellow sands he floated high,
And poised above a royal city, saw
A king sit on his judgment seat;
And in his bosom dropt the prize,
As if some wingéd thing sought shelter there.

Amazed, the king from out his mantle drew
The delicate sandal, — marvelling much, if foot
Of zephyr or of goddess fair
Was fashioned in such dainty wise,
As never yet besemed a mortal maid's.

"Now search the land!" — the monarch cried again;

"Fly east, — fly west and south and north, — nor stay
Until ye find the foot that wore
This little sandal silver-webbed,
And lead the wearer to my palace gates."

Fast sped the messengers, — nor sped they far:
For soon they found the silver sandal's mate,
And fitted both upon the feet
That were like Psyche's, white and small
As only formed to skim Olympian floors.

They drew the maiden from her olive's shade,
And in the simple garments that she wore,
Led her all-blushing, to the king,
Who smiling, raised her to his throne:
And thus fair Rhodopé became a queen.

 WINE ON THE LEES.

"Twelve years ago to-day: — how short it seems!
And but that you have calendared the time
Beyond disproof, I should affirm it less
By half a dozen, since that English June
Gave me the English Margaret for my wife.
Do you remember how we wrangled, strove,
Grew angry and made up a score of times,
Ere we made sure the memorable day —
The golden pivot upon which should turn
Our circling future?"

"Ah, — so like a man,
To question my remembrance! Woman's heart
Is not the waxen tablet that you feign;
Love's stylus wears, for her, a diamond point,
And smooth the plastic surface as she may,
It cuts into the ivory beneath,
And leaves its sharp, incisive characters
Graven there for ever. Wiser man, you see,
Gives Love a reed to write with: there's the difference."

"My inconclusive, sweet philosopher!
Was it a reed I wrote with, when I scored Down in my scroll of life, that 'Tenth of June?'"

"Nay, — for the nonce, I lent my diamond point:
Or rather, I insist it was a reed,
But that the tablet being a woman's heart,
Love's lightest mark became indelible.

— Once groove your name upon a sapling's rind,
And all the erasing years of storm and shine
Will only greeaten it, until the scar
Become exaggerate in its knotted bole:
And even so . . ."

"I do accept it, Sweet!
But memory cannot hold a mirror up
Clearer to you, reflecting fairly back
The precious nothings of that bridal-morn
Than now to me. How well I can recall,
Each sense seemed doubly keen: how full I heard
A lark's song, dropping from a loftier height
Than ever before; and even the overmuch
Oppressive hawthorn-scents, — and how I saw
The bridal-favors at your horses' ears
A long half mile off —"

"If it comes to that,
I know the moment when your eye first caught
Sight of our carriages; you stopped to take
The hedge-rose offered by the cottage-girl —"

"Yes! — with the 'fair good-morrow,' that I thought
So fortunate an omen —"

"That you gave
It me before our greeting, — I remember!
I have it yet, prest 'twixt our wedding cards,
To show to Madge, when she is old enough: —"

"And I, — you know the box of sandal-wood
That holds my dear dead mother's tress of hair,
And other precious things: — this golden key
Here on my chain unlocks it; — Well, beneath
Those packages of lavender'd letters, tied
With ribbon fresh a dozen years ago,
I hide with jealous care, a torn, white glove.
Do you forget, that as we stood together
One moment in the porch of Thorncliffe Church,
Just ere we walked the aisle, — you strove to draw
Your glove with tremulous fingers on your hand,
And rent it piteously? A pretty passion
It was to watch!"

"O, ay, — I see it all!
You, looking down in your seigneurial calm,
On the close-hooded falcon at your wrist,
For whom the jess was fastening!"

— "Mock on so!
I love to feel the flutter of your wings
Under my hand, full conscious all the while,
That did I spread it wide and bid you fly,
I could not shake you from your chosen perch.
Yet say, — the truth bears thousand repetitions. —
Say that you would not, were the power vouchsafed,

Stand in your still unclaimed and girlish grace
Free, in the porch of Thorncliffe Church again."

"So would not I: — For me these years have wrought

To their full round, all woman's experiences, —
Wifehood most blessed, — precious motherhood:
And so with leave to choose, I would not be,
From queen to peasant, aught else than what I am.

And yet the gift of gifts is youth: I scarce
Was twenty then —"

"And twenty cannot be
Full-sunned, heart-savour'd, mellow as thirty-two.
For youth's acerbities can set the teeth
At times on edge, — its alternating airs
Of gust and calm, most easy to be borne
By lovers in patient faith, may yet become Siroccos unto husbands; — its weak gauge

Of life and life's significant loveliness,
 Be reconciliation for the easy loss
 Of tendril graces that climb about the heart,
 And smother it with overflow of bloom.
 Give me then, summer with the sheen of spring,—
 The tropic fruit, inclusive of the flower,—
 Noon with the dew still on it,— progressive years,
 With childhood's zest, — an 't please you, thirty-
 two!

"But see, — the veil of woven gold pales off
 The sunset hills; and now before our Madge
 Comes clamoring for her nightly cradle-song,
 Or Harry with his tangled paradigms
 Beseeches furtherance with amo, — amare, —
 Let loose your fingers on the ivory keys,
 And sing the snatch I scribbled you yesterday."

"Fill the jewel-crueted beaker
 From the earliest vine;
 Gather grapes, ambrosia-fruited,
 And express their wine:

"Honey'd, lucent, amber-tinted;
 — Could old Massie shine
 With a foam whose beaded opals
 Sunnier globes enshrine?."

"When did ivy-crown'd Bacchanté
 Warmer clusters twine
 Round a Ganymedian chalice?
 Yet these lips of mine

"Sometimes crave a racier vintage, —
 Sometimes dare to pine
 For that wondrous, witching essence,
 Orient muscadine, —

"Balmed with immemorial richness,
 Like a royal line, —
 Such as slumbrous decades ripen
 Through their long decline.

"Hence then, young love's pearl-rimm'd flagon!
 Keep the pale-flushed wine;
 Earth it, till its juices fruited —
 Till the lees refine: —

"Till each tinge of harshness mellows, —
 Till all sweets combine
 To prepare a draught quintessent,
 Rapturous, pure, divine!"

 THE MORROW.

Of all the tender guards that Jesus drew
 About our frail humanity, to stay
 The pressure and the jostle that alway
 Are ready to disturb, whate'er we do,
 And mar the work our hands would carry
 through, —

None, more than this, environs us each day
 With kindly wardenship: — "Therefore, I say,
 Take no thought for the morrow." Yet we pay
 The wisdom scanty heed, and impotent
 To bear the burden of the imperious Now,
 Assume the future's exigence unsent.

God grants no overplus of power: 'T is shed
 Like morning manna: Yet we dare to bow
 And ask, — "Give us to-day our morrow's bread!"

 CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, the author of some recent volumes of sketches marked by great geniality, by careful observation of social manners, and by a humor alternately fresh and quaint, delicate and pungent, was born September 12, 1829, in the rugged town of Plainfield, Hampshire county, Massachusetts. He lost his father—a farmer and a man of considerable culture—at the age of five, and from that time until he was thirteen, was obliged to content himself with the scanty training of a district school at Charlemont, near his native place. He had access, in his earlier boyhood, to few books of a character more enlivening and edifying than the ponderous biblical commentary, the half-dozen biographies of eminent and austere divines, and the shelf or two of inflexibly Calvinistic treatises, which formed, until within the last quarter of a century, the whole library of so many remote New England households. In 1842 he removed, with his mother, to Cazenovia, in central New York. At that place better opportunities for an education were open to him, and he attended, for several terms, the Oneida Conference Seminary. During these school years he supplemented his classical studies by a zealous and extended reading of English authors, and acquired a maturity of literary taste which afterward gave him distinction at college. He received his bachelor's degree at Hamilton College in 1851, writing the successful English prize essay of that year.
 239

Chas. D. Warner

While still an undergraduate he contributed articles to the Knickerbocker, and, at a later period, to the first series of Putnam's Magazine. He also prepared in 1853, for a publication-house at Cazenovia, the Book of Eloquence, a minor compilation of the "Elegant Extracts" sort, which not only evinced his familiarity with English and American literature, but displayed a critical and appreciative judgment. Soon afterward he went to the West, his mind filled with literary plans, among them a projected monthly at Detroit, which miscarried by reason of the unexpected failure of the publisher. Forced to abandon for a while the path of letters, he joined a surveying party on the Missouri frontier, and during the year 1853-4 became familiar with the varied phases of border life. He then returned to the East, devoted some months in New York to literary investigation at the Astor library, engaged in the study of the law, and was admitted to the bar at Philadelphia in 1856, receiving the diploma of the Law Faculty of the University of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Warner practiced his profession at Chicago until the spring of 1860, when he became assistant editor of the Press, an evening newspaper at Hartford, Connecticut, of which, at the outbreak of the civil war, in the following year, he assumed the chief control. Under his management it speedily acquired a high reputation for its sagacious comments on political matters, but particularly for its literary and critical articles—a reputation since transferred to the Hartford Courant, one of the oldest of New England journals, with which the Press was consolidated in January, 1867. His letters to the Courant—of which he is part proprietor—from the White Mountains and the Adirondacks, during his summer vacations, as well as from Europe, where he passed fourteen months in 1868-9, were widely copied, and displayed the same comic humor and sportive satire which has since become familiar to a larger circle of readers.

He was married in 1856 to Susan S., daughter of William Elliot Lee of New York, and resides in a pleasant suburban home at Hartford. He is a frequent contributor to the leading magazines and literary weeklies of the day, and has taken an active part in the treatment of some questions of social science in Connecticut, such as those connected with advanced education and prison reform. His occasional addresses have been mostly pleas for a higher individual and national culture, for an enlargement of our collegiate courses, and for an improvement of our collegiate methods. The most noteworthy of them are those delivered at Hamilton College in 1864, before the convention of the Psi Upsilon fraternity, on "Individual Character in the State;" at Bowdoin College in 1871, on "Higher Education;" and again at Hamilton College in 1872, on "What is your culture to me?"

In the spring and summer of 1870, Mr. Warner wrote for the Courant a series of weekly sketches, lightly and humorously depicting the experiences of an amateur gardener, with which were ingeniously interwoven caustic hits at some of the foibles of social and political life. These sketches were directly afterwards published, with a prefatory note by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, under the title of My Summer in a Garden. The amusing descriptions of domestic incidents in this volume, its droll glimpses of the woes and delights of the horticulturist, and the freshness of color with which it invests the most commonplace topics, gave it an immediate popularity with the American public, and led to its speedy republication, by two different houses, in England. It was followed, in 1872, by Saunterings, reminiscences of the author's European trip, portions of which had previously appeared in the Courant and in the Old and New of Boston. They are the sauntering notes of an attentive, cultivated traveller, made principally in the picturesque cities of the Low Countries, among the Alps, at Munich and in Italy, in which especially the incidents of a winter's sojourn in the midst of the orange groves, the sunshine and the poetical associations of Sorrento, are portrayed with vivacity and vividness, and with all the writer's wonted pleasantry.

Mr. Warner's latest production is Backlog Studies, a collection of essays of the highest class, a part of which were first published in Scrivener's Monthly, and which, while retaining some of his earlier peculiarities of manner, evince a notable growth in vigor of expression and thought. The style exhibits greater ease and care, the purity and clearness of diction often recalling the best school of English essayists, while the subjects extend over a wider range and are treated in a higher speculative spirit than in either of his previous volumes. The book is a panegyric of the kindly influences clustering around the old-time, open hearth-fire, before which the author seats himself and about which he groups his characters—the whole fire-side circle discussing current social topics in a vein both of humor and good humor, inspired by the cheerful blaze, the lively crackling of the faggots and the fervid glow of the embers. The opinions expressed, always, however, without any trace of subserviency, show that their author belongs in the advanced ranks of American thinkers.*

 MORAL QUALITIES OF VEGETABLES—FROM MY SUMMER IN A GARDEN.

I am more and more impressed with the moral qualities of vegetables, and contemplate forming a science which shall rank with comparative anatomy and comparative philology,—the science of comparative vegetable morality. We live in an age of protoplasm. And, if life-matter is essentially the same in all forms of life, I purpose to begin early, and ascertain the nature of the plants for which I am responsible. I will not associate with any vegetable which is disreputable, or has not some quality that can contribute to my moral growth. I do not care to be seen much with the squashes or the dead-beats. Fortunately I can cut down any sorts I do not like with the hoe, and, probably, commit no more sin, in so doing, than the Christians did in hewing down the Jews in the middle ages.

This matter of vegetable rank has not been at all studied as it should be. Why do we respect some vegetables, and despise others, when all of them come to an equal honor or ignominy on the table? The bean is a graceful, confiding, en-

*Professor Willard Fiske, to whose scholarly pen we are indebted for the above article, is a native of Ellensburg, New York, where he was born of New England parents, November 11, 1832. He studied at Hamilton College, whence he went to the University of Upsal, Sweden, where, and at Copenhagen, he spent some years in the study of Icelandic and the other Scandinavian languages. On his return in 1853, he was, during six years, assistant librarian of the Astor Library. He edited the Chess Monthly at New York from 1857 to 1860, and in 1859 the Book of the American Chess Congress. In 1862 he was temporarily connected with the United States legation at Vienna, under Minister Motley. He was general editor of the Syracuse Daily Journal in 1865-6, and of the Hartford Daily Courant in 1867. He visited Italy and the East in 1868, and was elected the same year professor of North-European languages and librarian in Cornell University, which positions he still holds. He has written many articles for the New American Cyclopædia, beside contributions to various periodicals in this country, Sweden, and Germany.

gaging vine; but you never can put beans into poetry, nor into the highest sort of prose. There is no dignity in the bean. Corn, which, in my garden, grows alongside the bean, and, so far as I can see, with no affectation of superiority, is, however, the child of song. It waves in all literature. But mix it with beans, and its high tone is gone. Succotash is vulgar. It is the bean in it. The bean is a vulgar vegetable, without culture, or any flavor of high society among vegetables. Then there is the cool cucumber, like so many people, — good for nothing when it is ripe and the wildness has gone out of it. How inferior in quality to the melon, which grows upon a similar vine, is of a like watery consistency, but is not half so valuable! The cucumber is a sort of low comedian in a company where the melon is a minor gentleman. I might also contrast the celery with the potato. The associations are as opposite as the dining-room of the duchess and the cabin of the peasant. I admire the potato, both in vine and blossom; but it is not aristocratic. I began digging my potatoes, by the way, about the 4th of July; and I fancy I have discovered the right way to do it. I treat the potato just as I would a cow. I do not pull them up, and shake them; but I dig carefully at the side of the hill, remove the fruit which is grown, leaving the vine undisturbed: and my theory is, that it will go on bearing, and submitting to my exactions, until the frost cuts it down. It is a game that one would not undertake with a vegetable of tone.

The lettuce is to me a most interesting study. Lettuce is like conversation: it must be fresh and crisp, so sparkling, that you scarcely notice the bitter in it. Lettuce, like most talkers, is, however, apt to run rapidly to seed. Blessed is that sort which comes to a head, and so remains, like a few people I know; growing more solid and satisfactory and tender at the same time, and whiter at the centre, and crisp in their maturity. Lettuce, like conversation, requires a good deal of oil, to avoid friction, and keep the company smooth; a pinch of attic salt; a dash of pepper; a quantity of mustard and vinegar, by all means, but so mixed that you will notice no sharp contrasts; and a trifle of sugar. You can put any thing, and the more things the better, into salad, as into a conversation; but every thing depends upon the skill of mixing. I feel that I am in the best society when I am with lettuce. It is in the select circle of vegetables. The tomato appears well on the table; but you do not want to ask its origin. It is a most agreeable parvenu. Of course, I have said nothing about the berries. They live in another and more ideal region; except, perhaps, the currant. Here we see, that, even among berries, there are degrees of breeding. The currant is well enough, clear as truth, and exquisite in color; but I ask you to notice how far it is from the exclusive hauteur of the aristocratic strawberry, and the native refinement of the quietly elegant raspberry.

I do not know that chemistry, searching for protoplasm, is able to discover the tendency of vegetables. It can only be found out by outward observation. I confess that I am suspicious of the bean, for instance. There are signs in it of an unregulated life. I put up the most attractive sort of poles for my Limas. They stand high and straight, like church-spires, in my theological garden, — lifted up; and some of them have even budded, like Aaron's rod. No church-steeple in a New England village was ever better fitted to draw to it the rising generation on Sunday, than those poles to lift up my beans towards heaven. Some of them did run up the sticks seven feet, and then straggled off into the air in a wanton manner; but more than half of them went gallivanting off to the neighboring grape-trellis, and wound their tendrils with the tendrils of the grape, with a disregard of the proprieties of life which is a satire upon human nature. And the grape is morally no better. I think the ancients, who were not troubled with the recedite mystery of protoplasm, were right in the mythic union of Bacchus and Venus.

Talk about the Darwinian theory of development, and the principle of natural selection! I should like to see a garden let to run in accordance with it. If I had left my vegetables and weeds to a free fight, in which the strongest specimens only should come to maturity, and the weaker go to the wall, I can clearly see that I should have had a pretty mess of it. It would have been a scene of passion and license and brutality. The "pusley" would have strangled the strawberry; the upright corn, which has now ears to hear the guilty beating of the hearts of the children who steal the raspberries, would have been dragged to the earth by the wandering bean; the snake-grass would have left no place for the potatoes under ground; and the tomatoes would have been swamped by the lusty weeds. With a firm hand, I have had to make my own "natural selection." Nothing will so well bear watching as a garden, except a family of children next door. Their power of selection beats mine. If they could read half as well as they can steal a while away, I should put up a notice, "Children, beware! There is Protoplasm here." But I suppose it would have no effect. I believe that they would eat protoplasm as quick as any thing else, ripe or green. I wonder if this is going to be a cholera-year. Considerable cholera is the only thing that would let my apples and pears ripen. Of course I do not care for the fruit; but I do not want to take the responsibility of letting so much "life-matter," full of crude and even wicked vegetable-human tendencies, pass into the composition of the neighbors' children, some of whom may be as immortal as snake-grass. There ought to be a public meeting about this, and resolutions, and perhaps a clam-bake. At least, it ought to be put into the catechism, and put in strong.

WORKING BY THE HOUR — FROM MY SUMMER IN A GARDEN.

And, speaking of the philosophical temper, there is no class of men whose society is more to be desired for this quality than that of plumbers. They are the most agreeable men I know; and the boys in the business begin to be agreeable very early. I suspect the secret of it is, that they are agreeable by the hour. In the driest days, my fountain became disabled: the pipe was stopped up. A couple of plumbers, with the implements of their craft, came out to view the situation. There was a good deal of difference of opinion about where the stoppage was. I found the plumbers perfectly willing to sit down and talk about it, — talk by the hour. Some of their guesses and remarks were exceedingly ingenious; and their general observations on other subjects were excellent in their way, and could hardly have been better if they had been made by the job. The work dragged a little, — as it is apt to do by the hour. The plumbers had occasion to make me several visits. Sometimes they would find, upon arrival, that they had forgotten some indispensable tool; and one would go back to the shop, a mile and a half, after it; and his comrade would await his return with the most exemplary patience, and sit down and talk, — always by the hour. I do not know but it is a habit to have something wanted at the shop. They seemed to me very good workmen, and always willing to stop and talk about the job, or any thing else, when I went near them. Nor had they any of that impetuous hurry that is said to be the bane of our American civilization. To their credit be it said, that I never observed any thing of it in them. They can afford to wait. Two of them will sometimes wait nearly half a day while a comrade goes for a tool. They are patient and philosophical. It is a great pleasure to meet such men. One only wishes there was some work he could do, for them by the hour. There ought to be reciprocity. I think they have very nearly solved the problem of life: it is to work for other people, never for yourself, and get your pay by the hour. You then have no anxiety, and little work. If you do things by the job, you are perpetually driven: the hours are scourges. If you work by the hour, you gently sail on the stream of Time, which is always bearing you on to the haven of Pay, whether you make any effort or not. Working by the hour tends to make one moral. A plumber working by the job, trying to unscrew a rusty, refractory nut, in a cramped position, where the tongs continually slipped off, would swear; but I never heard one of them swear, or exhibit the least impatience at such a vexation, working by the hour. Nothing can move a man who is paid by the hour. How sweet the flight of time seems to his calm mind!

THE PRICE OF ORANGES — FROM SAUNTERINGS.

If ever a Northern wanderer could be suddenly transported to look down upon the Piano di Sorrento, he would not doubt that he saw the Garden of the Hesperides. The orange-trees cannot well be fuller: their branches bend with the weight of fruit. With the almond-trees in full flower, and with the silver sheen of the olive leaves, the oranges are apples of gold in pictures of silver. As I walk in these sunken roads, and between these high walls, the orange boughs everywhere hang over; and, through the open gates of villas, I look down alleys of golden glimmer, roses and geraniums by the walk, and the fruit above, — gardens of enchantment, with never a dragon, that I can see, to guard them.

All the highways and the byways, the streets and lanes, wherever I go, from the sea to the tops of the hills, are strewn with orange-peel; so that one, looking above and below, comes back from a walk with a golden dazzle in his eyes, — a sense that yellow is the prevailing color. Perhaps the kerchiefs of the dark-skinned girls and women, which take that tone, help the impression. The inhabitants are all orange-eaters. The high walls show that the gardens are protected with great care; yet the fruit seems to be as free as apples are in a remote New England town about cider-time.

I have been trying, ever since I have been here, to ascertain the prices of oranges; not for purposes of exportation, nor yet for the personal importation that I daily practice, but in order to give an American basis of fact to these idle chapters. In all the paths, I meet, daily, girls and boys bearing on their heads large baskets of the fruit, and little children with bags and bundles of the same, as large as they can stagger under; and I understand they are carrying them to the packers, who ship them to New York, or to the depots, where I see them lying in yellow heaps, and where men and women are cutting them up, and removing the peel, which goes to England for preserves. I am told that these oranges are sold for a couple of francs a hundred. That seems to me so dear that I am not tempted into any speculation, but stroll back to the Tramontano, in the gardens of which I find better terms.

The only trouble is to find a sweet tree; for the Sorrento oranges are usually sour in February; and one needs to be a good judge of the fruit, and know the male oranges from the female, — though which it is that is the sweeter I can never remember (and should not dare to say, if I did, in the present state of feeling on the woman question), — or he might as well eat a lemon. The mercenary aspect of my query does not enter in here. I climb into a tree, and reach out to the end of the branch for an orange that has got reddish in the sun, that comes off easily and is heavy; or I tickle a large one on the top bough with a cane or pole; and if it drops readily, and has a fine grain, I call it a cheap one. I can usually tell whether they are good, by splitting them open and eating a quarter. The Italians pare their oranges as we do apples; but I like best to open them first, and see the yellow meat in the white casket. After you have eaten a few from one tree, you can usually tell whether it is a good tree; but there is nothing certain about it, — one bough that gets the sun will be better than another that does not, and one-half of an orange will fill your mouth with more delicious juices than the other half.

The oranges that you knock off with your stick, as you walk along the lanes, don't cost any thing; but they are always sour, as I think the girls know who lean over the wall, and look on with a smile: and in that, they are more sensible than the lively dogs which bark at you from the top, and wake all the neighborhood with their clamor. I have no doubt the oranges have a market price; but I have been seeking the value the gardeners set on them themselves. As I walked towards the heights, the other morning, and passed an orchard, the gardener, who saw my ineffectual efforts, with a very long cane, to reach the boughs of a tree, came down to me with a basketful he had been picking. As an experiment on the price, I offered him a two-centime piece, — which is a sort of satire on the very name of money, — when he desired me to help myself to as many oranges as I liked. He was a fine-looking fellow, with a spick-span new red Phrygian cap; and I hadn't the heart to take advantage of his generosity, especially as his oranges were not of the sweetest. One ought never to abuse generosity.

Another experience was of a different sort, and illustrates the Italian love of bargaining, and their notion of a sliding scale of prices. One of our expeditions to the hills was one day making its long, straggling way through the narrow street of a little village of the Piano, when I lingered behind my companions, attracted by a hand-cart with several large baskets of oranges. The cart stood untended in the street; and selecting a large orange, which would measure twelve inches in circumference, I turned to look for the owner. After some time, a fellow got from the neighboring cobbler's shop, where he sat with his lazy cronies, listening to the honest gossip of the follower of St. Crispin, and sauntered towards me.

"How much for this?" I ask.

"One franc, signor," says the proprietor, with a polite bow, holding up one finger.

I shake my head, and intimate that that is altogether too much, in fact preposterous.

The proprietor is very indifferent, and shrugs his shoulders in an amiable manner. He picks up a fair, handsome orange, weighs it in his hand, and holds it up temptingly. That also is one franc.

I suggest one sou as a fair price, a suggestion which he only receives with a smile of slight pity, and, I fancy, a little disdain. A woman joins him, and also holds up this and that gold-skinned one for my admiration.

As I stand, sorting over the fruit, trying to please myself with size, color, and texture, a little crowd has gathered round; and I see, by a glance, that all the occupations in that neighborhood, including loafing, are temporarily suspended to witness the trade. The interest of the circle visibly increases; and others take such a part in the transaction, that I begin to doubt if the first man is, after all, the proprietor.

At length I select two oranges, and again demand the price. There is a little consultation and jabber, when I am told that I can have both for a franc. I, in turn, sigh, shrug my shoulders, and put down the oranges, amid a chorus of exclamations over my graspingness. My offer of two sous is met with ridicule, but not with indifference. I can see that it has made a sensation. These simple, idle children of the sun begin to show a little excitement. I at length determine upon a bold stroke, and resolve to show myself the Napoleon of oranges, or to meet my Waterloo. I pick out four of the largest oranges in the basket, while all eyes are fixed on me intently, and, for the first time, pull out a piece of money. It is a two-sous piece. I offer it for the four oranges.

"No, no, no, no, signor! Ah, signor! ah, signor!" in a chorus from the whole crowd.

I have struck bottom at last, and perhaps got somewhere near the value; and all calmness is gone. Such protestations, such indignation, such sorrow, I have never seen before from so small a cause. It cannot be thought of; it is mere ruin! I am, in turn, as firm, and nearly as excited in seeming. I hold up the fruit and tender the money.

"No, never, never! The signor cannot be in earnest."

Looking round me for a moment, and assuming a theatrical manner, befitting the gestures of those about me, I fling the fruit down, and, with a sublime renunciation, stalk away.

There is instantly a buzz and a hum that rises almost to a clamor. I have not proceeded far, when a skinny old woman runs after me, and begs me to return. I go back, and the crowd parts to receive me.

The proprietor has a new proposition, the effect of which upon me is intently watched. He proposes to give me five big oranges for four sous. I receive it with utter scorn, and a laugh of derision. I will give two sous for the original four, and not a centesimo more. That I solemnly say, and am ready to depart. Hesitation and renewed conference; but at last the proprietor relents; and, with the look of one who is ruined for life, and who yet is willing to sacrifice himself, he hands me the oranges. Instantly the excitement is dead, the crowd disperses, and the street is as quiet as ever; when I walk away, bearing my hard-won treasures.

A little while after, as I sat upon the outer wall of the terrace of the Camaldoli, with my feet hanging over, these same oranges were taken from my pockets by Americans; so that I am prevented from making any moral reflections upon the honesty of the Italians.

There is an immense garden of oranges and lemons at the village of Massa, through which travellers are shown by a surly fellow, who keeps watch of his trees, and has a bull-dog lurking about for the unwary. I hate to see a bull-dog in a fruit-orchard. I have eaten a good many oranges there, and been astonished at the boughs of immense lemons which bend the trees to the ground. I took occasion to measure one of the lemons, called a citron-lemon, and found its circumference to be twenty-one inches one way by fifteen inches the other, — about as big as a railway conductor's lantern. These lemons are not so sour as the fellow who shows them: he is a mercenary dog, and his prices afford me no clew to the just value of oranges.

I like better to go to a little garden in the village of Meta, under a sunny precipice of rocks, overhung by the ruined convent of Camaldoli. I turn up a narrow lane, and push open the wooden door in the garden of a little villa. It is a pretty garden; and, besides the orange and lemon trees on the terrace, it has other fruit-trees, and a scent of many flowers. My friend, the gardener, is sorting oranges from one basket to another, on a green bank, and evidently selling the fruit to some women, who are putting it into bags to carry away.

When he sees me approach, there is always the same pantomime. I propose to take some of the fruit he is sorting. With a knowing air, and an appearance of great mystery, he raises his left hand, the palm towards me, as one says hush. Having despatched his business, he takes an empty basket, and with another mysterious flourish, desiring me to remain quiet, he goes to a storehouse in one corner of the garden, and returns with a load of immense oranges, all soaked with the sun, ripe and fragrant, and more tempting than lumps of gold. I take one, and ask him if it is sweet. He shrugs his shoulders, raises his hands, and, with a sidewise shake of the head, and a look which says, How can you be so faithless? makes me ashamed of my doubts.

I cut the thick skin, which easily falls apart and discloses the luscious quarters, plump, juicy, and waiting to melt in the mouth. I look for a moment at the rich pulp in its soft incasement, and then try a delicious morsel. I nod. My gardener again shrugs his shoulders, with a slight smile, as much as to say, it could not be otherwise, and is evidently delighted to have me enjoy his fruit. I fill capacious pockets with the choicest; and, if I have friends with me, they do the same. I give our silent but most expressive entertainer half a franc, never more; and he always seems surprised at the size of the largesse. We exhaust his basket, and he proposes to get more.

When I am alone, I stroll about under the heavily-laden trees, and pick up the largest, where they lie thickly on the ground, liking to hold them in my hand and feel the agreeable weight, even when I can carry away no more. The gardener neither follows nor watches me; and I think perhaps knows, and is not stingy about it, that more valuable to me than the oranges I eat or take away are those on the trees among the shining leaves. And perhaps he opines that I am from a country of snow and ice, where the year has six hostile months, and that I have not money enough to pay for the rich possession of the eye, the picture of beauty which I take with me.

* THE YANKEE PHILOSOPHER—FROM BACKLOG STUDIES.

A popular notion akin to this, that the world would have any room for the departed if they should now and then return, is the constant regret that people will not learn by the experience of others, that one generation learns little from the preceding, and that youth never will adopt the experience of age. But if experience went for anything, we should all come to a stand-still; for there is nothing so discouraging to effort. Disbelief in Ecclesiastes is the main-spring of action. In that lies the freshness and the interest of life, and it is the source of every endeavor.

If the boy believed that the accumulation of wealth and the acquisition of power were what the old man says they are, the world would very soon be stagnant. If he believed that his chances of obtaining either were as poor as the majority of men find them to be, ambition would die within him. It is because he rejects the experience of those who have preceded him, that the world is kept in the topsy-turvy condition which we all rejoice in, and which we call progress.

And yet I confess I have a soft place in my heart for that rare character in our New England life who is content with the world as he finds it, and who does not attempt to appropriate any more of it to himself than he absolutely needs from day to day. He knows from the beginning that the world could get on without him, and he has never had any anxiety to leave any result behind him, any legacy for the world to quarrel over.

He is really an exotic in our New England climate and society, and his life is perpetually misunderstood by his neighbors, because he shares none of their uneasiness about getting on in life. He is even called lazy, good-for-nothing, and "shiftless,"—the final stigma that we put upon a person who has learned to wait without the exhausting process of laboring.

I made his acquaintance last summer in the country, and I have not in a long time been so well pleased with any of our species. He was a man past middle life, with a large family. He had always been from boyhood of a contented and placid mind, slow in his movements, slow in his speech. I think he never cherished a hard feeling toward anybody, nor envied any one, least of all the rich and prosperous, about whom he liked to talk. Indeed, his talk was a good deal about wealth, especially about his cousin who had been down South and "got fore-handed" within a few years. He was genuinely pleased at his relation's good luck, and pointed him out to me with some pride. But he had no envy of him, and he evinced no desire to imitate him. I inferred from all his conversation about "piling it up," (of which he spoke with a gleam of enthusiasm in his eye.) that there were moments when he would like to be rich himself; but it was evident that he would never make the least effort to be so, and I doubt if he could even overcome that delicious inertia of mind and body called laziness, sufficiently to inherit.

Wealth seemed to have a far and peculiar fascination for him, and I suspect he was a visionary in the midst of his poverty. Yet I suppose he had hardly the personal property which the law exempts from execution. He had lived in a great many towns, moving from one to another with his growing family, by easy stages, and was always the poorest man in the town, and lived on the most niggardly of its rocky and bramble-grown farms, the productiveness of which he reduced to zero in a couple of seasons by his careful neglect of culture. The fences of his hired domain always fell into ruins under him, perhaps because he sat upon them so much, and the hovels he occupied rotted down during his placid residence in them. He moved from desolation to desolation, but carried always with him the equal mind of a philosopher. Not even the occasional tart remarks of his wife, about their nomadic life and his serenity in the midst of discomfort, could ruffle his smooth spirit.

He was, in every respect, a most worthy man, truthful, honest temperate, and, I need not say, frugal; and he had no bad habits,—perhaps he never had energy enough to acquire any. Nor did he lack the knack of the Yankee race. He could make a shoe, or build a house, or doctor a cow; but it never seemed to him, in this brief existence, worth while to do any of these things. He was an excellent angler, but he rarely fished; partly because of the shortness of the days, partly on account of the uncertainty of bites, but principally because the trout brooks were all arranged lengthwise and ran over so much ground. But no man liked to look at a string of trout better than he did, and he was willing to sit down in a sunny place and talk about trout fishing half a day at a time, and he would talk pleasantly and well too, though his wife might be continually interrupting him by a call for firewood.

I should not do justice to his own idea of himself if I did not add that he was most respectably connected, and that he had a justifiable, though feeble, pride in his family. It helped his self-respect, which no ignoble circumstances could destroy. He was, as must appear by this time, a most intelligent man, and he was a well-informed man; that is to say, he read the weekly newspapers when he could get them, and he had the average country information about Beecher and Greeley and the Prussian war, ("Napoleon is gettin' on 't, ain't he?") and the general prospect of the election campaigns. Indeed, he was warmly, or rather luke-warmly, interested in politics. He liked to talk about the inflated currency, and it seemed plain to him that his condition would somehow be improved if we could get to a specie basis. He was, in fact, a little troubled by the national debt; it seemed to press on him somehow, while his own never did. He exhibited more animation over the affairs of the government than he did over his own,—an evidence at once of his disinterestedness and his patriotism. He had been an old abolitionist, and was strong on the rights of free labor, though he did not care to exercise his privilege much. Of course he had the proper contempt for the poor whites down South. I never saw a person with more correct notions on such a variety of subjects. He was perfectly willing that churches (being himself a member), and Sunday-schools, and missionary enterprises should go on; in fact, I do not believe he ever opposed anything in his life. No one was more willing to vote town taxes and road-repairs and school-houses than he. If you could call him spirited at all he was public-spirited.

And with all this he was never very well; he had, from boyhood, "enjoyed poor health." You would say he was not a man who would ever catch anything, not even an epidemic; but he was a person whom diseases would be likely to overtake, even the slowest of slow fevers. And he was n't a man to shake off anything. And yet sickness seemed to trouble him no more than poverty. He was not discontented; he never grumbled. I am not sure but that he relished a "spell of sickness" in haying-time.

An admirably balanced man, who accepts the world as it is, and evidently lives on the experience of others. I have never seen a man with less envy, or more cheerfulness, or so contented, with as little reason for being so. The only drawback to his future is that rest beyond the grave will not be much change for him, and he has no works to follow him.

* ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT.

MR. ROOSEVELT is a descendant of an old Knickerbocker family of New York city. He was born August 7, 1829, within the limits of the district which he represented in the Forty-Second Congress, 1871-3. He was educated for the profession of law, and entered actively into practice in 1850, in partnership with his brother, S. W. Roosevelt. As shooting and fishing formed the relaxation of his leisure hours, he soon began to notice with a sportsman's eye the rapid diminution of wild birds and fish, with the consequent injury to farmers by the increase of destructive insects. To arrest this decrease in an important article of natural food, he aided in uniting the various clubs of the State into a permanent association, that could secure the passage of laws needed to preserve the game.

Mr. Roosevelt's literary writings have included many contributions to the press and magazines. His first article in print was on the condition of Poland; it appeared in the Tribune, and introduced its writer to the friendship of Horace Greeley. In 1862 he published his first book, The Game Fish of North America, with an elaborate article on fish culture—an art till then almost unknown in America. It appeared with merely the signature of his middle name, Barnwell. Superior Fishing, a companion volume, was issued in 1865, and next year followed The Game Birds of North America. These works were popular, and were accepted as standards in sportsmanship. In 1867 a Fishery Commission for New York State was organized at his suggestion, and he was selected a member, with Hon. Horatio Seymour and Mr. Seth Green, the celebrated pisciculturist, as colleagues. Besides distributing large quantities of young fry, hatched artificially, to waters which had been depleted, this commission issued a number of reports, prepared mainly by Mr. Roosevelt, which led to similar efforts in other States. A condensed statement of the condition of pisciculture in America was prepared by him in 1869 for the European Statistical Congress, at the request of the American Commissioner, Hon. Samuel B. Ruggles. This article gave the first reliable information to foreigners of the great progress recently made in the United States, and was translated into the European languages by order of the society.

Mr. Roosevelt entered actively into politics as a reformer and "War Democrat," to aid in the suppression of the rebellion, and also served a short term on regimental duty near Washington. He helped to organize the Loyal National League of New York city, and was one of the founders of the Union League Club. He also allied himself with the Citizens' Association, to reform local abuses in the city government, and was elected its secretary. As chairman of its executive committee, he aided in the creation of an efficient paid fire department, an able health department, and in instituting various sanitary reforms. The New York Citizen became the organ of the Association in 1866, under the editorship of Mr. Roosevelt and Col. Charles G. Halpine, better known as "Miles O'Reilly." After the death of his associate, he merged The Round Table with his paper, and conducted the consolidated journal till the pressure of political and congressional duties compelled him to give up the editorial chair in 1871. Mr. Roosevelt throughout his public life also took a prominent part in resisting the extortionate acts of the "Tammany Ring." He delivered an address on behalf of the "Committee of Seventy" eminent citizens at Cooper Institute, September 4, 1871, wherein the illegal acts of the "Ring" were fully exposed; and of this speech 250,000 copies were printed for distribution. He also assumed the entire charge of the immense details occurring in general elections in New York city, during the several political campaigns for reform.

On the death of Charles G. Halpine, which was sudden, and left his family in destitute circumstances, Mr. Roosevelt collected and edited on their behalf an edition of his friend's poems, paying in the introduction a handsome tribute to his memory. Five Acres Too Much was published by him in 1869. It was a humorous satire on a class of agricultural books which predicted a fortune to any one who would hire or buy a farm, large or small. He has also written a humorous application for admission to the "Sosis," a club of the leading lady writers of New York city, which was rejected, with the mild answer, "Principles, not men."

 CHARLES G. HALPINE,

A JOURNALIST and poet of fluency and versatility, was born near Oldcastle, in the county of Meath, Ireland, in November, 1829. His father, Rev. Nicholas J. Halpine, was a minister in the Established Church, and editor of the Dublin Evening Mail. Charles was graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, at the early age of seventeen. He entered on the study of medicine, but soon abandoned it for the more congenial profession of journalism, beginning on the Irish papers and subsequently contributing for several years to the London press.

Mr. Halpine chose America as the best field for the exercise of his talents, and established himself in Boston, where he was connected with the Boston Post. The Carpet Bag, a short-lived though brilliant journal, was subsequently conducted by Mr. Benjamin P. Shillaber, author of the quaint sayings of Mrs. Partington, Dr. Shepley, and Charles G. Halpine. After its failure, the latter removed to New York and became attached to the editorial corps of The Times, as well as a part proprietor of the New York Leader. He made the latter journal a success by his able articles, and contributed also to most of the papers of that city, writing with facility stories, poems, and editorials on the varying themes of the day. Indeed, almost his entire writings are of an ephemeral character, expressly adapted as they were to the vivid excitement of the moment. In 1854, he issued a volume of Lyrics by the Letter H, a portion of which was reprinted after his death.

In April, 1861, he gave up the pen for the sword, and became lieutenant in Colonel Corcoran's Sixty-ninth Regiment. His administrative and literary abilities soon made him adjutant-general on the staff of General David Hunter, and subsequently with Major-General Halleck, while the latter was general-in-chief. Having advanced to the grade of brigadier-general of volunteers and major in the regular service, he resigned in 1864. Soon after he accepted the control of The Citizen, a newspaper issued by the Citizens' Association to advocate reforms in the civil administration of

New York city, and became its proprietor, as well as Register of the city. Although a ready and fertile writer, he was so prone to write without cessation for many hours, and often for several days without rest, that he was forced to have recourse to opiates to conquer his sleeplessness. This practice resulted in his accidental death, from the inhalation of an undiluted dose of chloroform, at the early age of thirty-nine, August 3, 1868.

Major Halpine, while connected with General Hunter at Hilton Head, South Carolina, wrote a series of burlesque and satiric lyrics in the assumed character of an Irish private at that post. Some of these appeared in the New York Herald, and two volumes, with additional articles, were subsequently issued. Life and Adventures, Songs, Services, and Speeches of Private Miles O'Reilly, 47th Regiment New York Volunteers, appeared in 1864. Among the best of its pieces is a ridiculous and amusing account of a visit of its hero to the President, members of the Cabinet, and foreign ministers, at the White House. Baked Meats of the Funeral: A Collection of Essays, Poems, Speeches, and Banquets, by Private Miles O'Reilly, late of the 47th Reg't N. Y. Volunteer Infantry, 10th Army Corps. Collected, revised, and edited, with the requisite corrections of punctuation, spelling, and grammar, by an ex-Colonel of the Adjutant-General's Department, with whom the Private formerly served as Lance Corporal of Orderlies, followed in 1866. It contained a series of fugitive songs and essays relating to the humors of the war, besides some account of "Fenianism," and also the history of the notable "Flaunting Lie," his first poem for an American journal, which appeared in The Tribune soon after the fugitive slave Anthony Burns had been conveyed from Boston to Virginia in a national vessel. Two years later, a posthumous volume was printed: The Poetical Works of Charles G. Halpine (Miles O'Reilly), consisting of odes, poems, sonnets, epics, and lyrics, heretofore not collected, edited, with a biographical sketch and explanatory notes, by his friend and associate, Robert B. Roosevelt.

NOT QUITE IN VAIN — FROM BAKED MEATS OF THE FUNERAL.

How often in days of our sore distress,
When we faint with an absolute weariness
Of endless labor and endless pain,
The sickening thought in our souls will rise,
Clouding with gloom even the summer skies,
And chilling the pulse and filling the eyes —
"We have lived — we have lived in vain!"

When hearts we thought golden and trusted best,
Prove but shrivelling dross in the fiery test
Which the Fates for all friendships ordain;
As we turn the false picture with face to the wall,
Or veil the lost idol with charity's pall,
How cold on the soul seems the whisper to fall —
"We have lived — we have lived in vain!"

When some prize of ambition, for years postponed,
Is at length attained, yet we feel unatoned
For the struggle that gave us the gain —
Oh, spurning the dead-sea fruit we sought,
"Must it ever be thus?" is the weary thought,

And again to our ear is the whisper brought—
 “We have lived—we have lived in vain!”

Oh friends! how rare in this workaday life
 Are the prizes, if won, that are worth the strife,
 The clangor, the dust, and the strain!
 There is only one in the world below
 But one that, whatever its price of woe,
 Bids the soul in the veins to exultingly know
 That we have not lived in vain.

'Tis that moment unspeakable—best unsaid—
 When blushing downward the dear drooping
 head

To our breast for the first time we strain;
 And the promise is given, not in words, but in sighs,

And the sweet humid tenderness filling her eyes—
 “Oh, soul of my soul, if my love be a prize,
 Then you have not lived in vain!”

 CHARLES NORDHOFF,

A GRAPHIC writer and journalist, who has been editorially connected with the New York Evening Post from 1861-71, was born at Erwitte, Prussia, in 1830. His father served as a young captain of volunteers at the battle of Waterloo, and emigrated to this country with his family when his son was four years old. The latter entered the U. S. navy at the age of fourteen, and embodied his experiences of life at sea in several of his earlier works. His first book was an edited volume—Kern's Practical Landscape Gardening, issued at Cincinnati in 1855. It was followed by Man-of-War Life; a Boy's Experience in the U. S. Navy, 1855, which reached a sixth edition within a year; The Merchant Vessel; a Sailor Boy's Voyages to See the World, 1855; Whaling and Fishing, 1856; Stories of the Island World, 1857. Three of these were republished as Nine Years a Sailor. These works were reprinted in England, and were translated into German. Subsequently Mr. Nordhoff was editorially connected with Harper's Magazine and Weekly, and he contributed an article on “Arctic Adventure and Research” to the first volume of Appleton's New American Cyclopædia.

Mr. Nordhoff printed in 1868, Cape Cod and All Along Shore, a series of entertaining magazine stories contributed to Harper's and the Atlantic. All are fresh and vivid in incident and character, but especially enjoyable are Mehetable Rogers' Cranberry Swamp, and A Struggle for Life, in Indiana. California; A Book for Tourists and Settlers, a record of experiences and observations founded on a recent tour along the Pacific coast, appeared in 1873. It is a volume of exact information for the agriculturist and the invalid, as well as a vivid pen-picture of the phases of social life in that young but alert State. In the spring of that year, Mr. Nordhoff sailed to the Sandwich Islands, to take notes of their social, political, industrial and commercial aspects.

 “JOHN” IN CALIFORNIA.

“He is patient, docile, persevering, quick to learn, faithful, no eye-servant, the best cook or waiter you ever saw”—

“Last week he stole $600 out of my drawer, and is now in State Prison”—

“He is sober”—

“Last night you saw him smoking opium in the most horrible of dens”—

“He saves his money”—

“And takes it out of the State to spend in China”—

“He is indispensable”—

“But he is a curse to the community”—

“He will make a useful citizen”—

“His whole race are vicious and degraded.”

Thus two voices run on about the Chinese in California. Nor do I wonder that there are differences of opinion.

John stands behind you at dinner, arrayed like an angel, in the most spotless and gracefully hanging white, the image—not the image, the very presence—of the best-trained and quickest-witted servant in the world; and naturally you wish your own life might be comforted by such a John; or by such another as his mate in the kitchen, who is delighting you with dish after dish cooked to perfection.

You ask his mistress, and she tells you that she has no disputes, no troubles, no worry; that John has made housekeeping a pleasure to her; if he is cook, he does not object to help with the washing and ironing—in fact, does it better and quicker than any Bridget in the world. And John's master chimes in with an assertion that, since John has reigned below, the kitchen has been the delight of his eyes, so clean and sweet is it. Moreover, John markets for his mistress; he is economical; and he does not make a fuss.

Of course, you say, every body has Johns. Well, no; people have prejudices and fears. You have two or three Johns in the house, and when you go out—if you are the lady of the house—you take the children along. There have been unpleasant occurrences.

From your friend's well served and admirably-cooked dinner you go to Jackson Street and find Policeman Woodruff. He will take you through what is called “China-town.” No doubt John is clean. There is too much evidence to doubt or dispute it. But Mr. Woodruff takes you into and through places so dismal, so wretched, so horrible, that while you are edging your way from a gambling hell into an opium hell, and from an opium hell into a worse place, nobody in the world could persuade you otherwise than that John and all his kindred are the devil's own. I can not say that, even in the worst holes I saw, John looked dirty. The thieves and jail-birds who were leaning over the gambling tables were not dirty, so far as I could see. The thieves, loafers, and other poor wretches who were lying under and on top of shelves, three deep, smoking a “bit's worth” of twice-laid opium, were many of them decently dressed; and certainly, though their surroundings were nasty, they did not look as correspondingly nasty as a similar Five Points population of whites.

Moreover, all that John does, be it virtuous or vicious, he seems to do with a certain amount of sluggish decorum. He swarms in Jackson Street and Dupont Street after night; but he makes no noise. If you accidentally elbow him, he moves gently out of the way. I passed out of the Chinese theatre in Jackson Street at eleven o'clock at night, with a lady and two children; we had to walk through a crowd of Johns, who were just then going up a long alley-way which leads to the door; and it did not even occur to my children, who walked ahead, to be afraid; and not a rude or disrespectful word or gesture was seen in the whole crowd. Now this theatre is, like the lowest of our own, the place of recreation for the vilest class. I can't say that I would have ventured into a place of the same kind, or out of it, in New York, without anxiety. . . .

If you walk through China-town on Sunday you will see a curious sight, and one which, if you are a thoughtful man, will not amuse you. Jackson Street, Sacramento Street, Dupont Street, and the streets and alleys which lie between, are the Chinese quarters of San Francisco. Here they live; here is their multitude of shops; here, in cellars, they make cigars, in shops they work at sewing-machines—the men, I mean; here, in an entry-way, the Chinese cobbler cobbles a shoe, the boy waiting at his side to put it on when it is done. Here are eating-houses, where smoked ducks, pigs' heads, livers and gizzards of fowls, whole chickens cooked in oil, sodden pork, and sausages are sold. Here is their church, or temple, with queer images of wood and tinsel, before which sandal-wood is burned, or small fire-crackers are sparkling.

Well, on Sunday it is all just as it was on Saturday—only a little more so. The shops are all open, and the grave accountants are adding up figures on the abacus, or posting up their ledgers. The cellars are as full as ever of cigarmakers; the eating-houses are fuller than ever; and for every eating-house there are at least a dozen gambling-houses.

A Chinese gambling hell consists of a narrow white-washed entry, at the end of which hangs a flap of cloth. The play-room lies at right angles with the entry, and is, of course, out of view. In the entry sits a man, apparently asleep, or dreaming. Near his head you will perhaps notice a rope belayed to a hook. This rope leads to a door. If you—a white man and not a policeman—should attempt to enter the narrow passage, the watchman would pull the rope, the rope would pull to the door; and as that closes with a spring lock, you would be shut out.

I counted a dozen of these places in a single block; forty-five of them were open on Sunday night; but the police say that it is not easy to prove that they are gambling dens, for no Chinaman will bear witness against them, and they take no money from a white man.

John pays no regard to Sunday. "It is a great convenience," said a gentleman to me, "to have servants who don't want to go to church." Perhaps—but it is not a great convenience to have in an American community a multitude of heathen who not only prosecute their own business on Sunday, but naturally lead our people to do the same. In the Chinese quarter are numerous clothing and other shops kept by white men, whose customers are Chinese. These are all open on Sunday, which one of them told me was his best day.

There are good and bad Johns, as there are good and bad of all nations. He does not yet fit into our ways. Nor do I see, just now, how he is going to be fitted in. But he is here; John is a fact. He has "come to stay;" and it belongs to our wisest and most thoughtful men to see how he is to be made a part of us. You can not drive him out.

John now does most of the wash: g and ironing all over California; "Woogung," or "Ah Lee," or "Fohh Lien," "Washing and Ironing done"—with sometimes the addition "Buttons sewed on strong," is the sign you see oftenest in California towns. In the cities he collects the garbage: he is cook and waiter; he makes the cigars; he works in the woollen mills; go into any manufacturing place and you will see his face; there is a Chinaman and a half on every mile of the Central Pacific Railroad; he raises two-thirds of the vegetables consumed in the State; he makes a good shepherd: in the farming districts the commonest sight is to see John driving a wagon, or ploughing; the lonely ranch-man keeps a Chinese cook; hundreds of Chinese are going over the old mining "slum," and making money by this patient toil; he keeps his New-year's week with jollity and fire-crackers, from San Diego to Sacramento; and so far east as Denver, in Colorado, you see his sign, "Lo Wing, Washing and Ironing." Both political parties in California denounce the Chinaman on their platforms; but if you go to the houses of the men who make these platforms, you will find Chinese servants; if you visit their farms or ranches, you will find Chinese hands; and if you ask the political leader, after dinner, what he really thinks, he will tell you that he could not get on without Chinese, and that the cry against them is the most abominable demagogism; all of which is true.

Slowly, but surely as fate, he is entering one trade and calling after the other and conquering his patient way. Why? Not because he works so cheaply. A Chinese cook in a good family gets $35 per month; a waiter gets from $25 to $30. Elsewhere they work more cheaply, yet their wages keep pace with other wages, and rise from time to time.

It is not because they are cheap. Ask any one who employs them, and he will tell you it is because they do not drink, do not quarrel, are not idle or prone to change, give no eye-service, are patient, respectful, extremely quick to learn, faithful to their instructions, and make no fuss. With these qualities a workingman is cheap at almost any price; and I guess, from what I hear, that John is not slow to learn his value, and will drive his own bargain.

But with these qualities, and endurance for any labor or climate, as was proved when he worked in the snow on the Sierras and built the Central Pacific road, John will not take long to eat his way into the heart of the land. So far as he demonstrates to others, his competitors, the value—the money value—of his good qualities, so far he will be a benefit to the country. He may indeed make steady, patient, persistent toil once more fashionable among us. But in some way, not by laws, for they can do nothing, but by missionary effort, by earnest, general, conscientious training, John must be brought to a comprehension of our customs, so that, even if he does not become a Christian in name or in fact, he shall yet learn to conform his life to that of our American people, and not live among us disordering and disorganizing our own society.

The Chinese quarter of San Francisco is a blot on the city. It is worse, in some respects, than the Five Points. Yet the houses in which gambling, opium-smoking, and other vile practices are carried on are the property of men who call themselves respectable, whose children attend church, and who are not ashamed to draw their living from this vice and wretchedness. It is so with us, too; but it is not pleasant to find in a young city like San Francisco the same unconcern for the poor, the same carelessness of how your neighbor lives, the same heedless, cold, godless disregard of whatever passes outside of our own respectable doors and comfortably carpeted houses, which is the curse of an overgrown and old city like New York.

If free government is to continue among us, we can not afford to have a "lower class;" we can not afford, for our children's sakes, to suffer men, women, and children to live like beasts, for they will in time act like beasts—they will bite. If the whole Chinese quarter of San Francisco, as it is now arranged, could be blown up with gunpowder, and decent accommodations provided for the people who inhabit it, civilization and Christianity and free government on the Pacific coast would make a great gain.

John is inevitable. He has discovered America, and finds it a good country. We shall not keep him out. But it is ours, and not his, to determine whether he shall be a curse or a blessing to us. If we treat him as Christianity teaches that we ought to treat our fellow-men; if we do unto him as we would that others should do to us; if we see that he is instructed in that which we believe to be right, he may become a useful part of us. Teachable he certainly is; a far more civilized being—or, rather, a far less savage creature—than many we get from Christian Great Britain.

But if we choose to pass him by on the other side; to let him live among us as an alien from our manners, habits, customs; ignorant of what we hold as the best, highest, most sacred, and of most importance to our liberty and civilization, John may prove a more troublesome and dangerous creature than any we have yet taken on board our ship.

Just now he is poor. He lives in squalor; and even if a Chinaman is not vicious, in San Francisco his circumstances and surroundings in the Chinese quarter are all degrading.

Without Christianity, free government is impossible. But Christianity means that the ignorant shall be instructed, that the poor shall be kindly treated, that the wealthy, the powerful, the influential shall raise up the poor, ignorant, and despised; and this not by laws, but by improving public opinion, by private effort, by seeking out our neighbor, and trying, each in his own way, to make him a better and worthier man. It was remarked to me that scarcely a Chinaman comes to California who does not know how to read and write in his own language. There is an English school for them already in the city, and no doubt good work has begun; but our own city missionaries have often sadly complained that you can not make men virtuous who live on the Five Points; and so it will be found in San Francisco.

As yet, unfortunately for the Chinese problem, we get only men. There are, I am told, only about five hundred Chinese women in San Francisco, and among them but a very few wives. An important point could be gained if the Chinese emigrants could be induced to bring their wives with them. But no decent man would like to bring his wife and children to the Chinese quarter in San Francisco.

 HELEN FISKE HUNT,

A RESIDENT of Newport, R. I., who has lately won, by the royal might of genius, thought, and culture, a high rank as poet and essayist, is the daughter of the late Professor Nathan W. Fiske, of Amherst College, well known to classical students by his Manual of Classical Literature. She was born at Amherst, October 15, 1830, and was educated at the Ipswich Female Seminary, Mass., and at that of the Messrs. Abbott, New York city. Her husband, Major Edward

Helen Fiske Hunt.

B. Hunt, U. S. A., an assistant professor at West Point, and an engineer officer of ability, lost his life in 1863 by the premature explosion of a submarine battery he had invented. She has contributed to Scribner's Monthly, the Atlantic Monthly, the Independent, Hearth and Home, the Evening Post, etc., besides writing three books of rare delicacy and power.

Verses by H. H. appeared in 1871. These poems, alternately pervaded by a tender humor and a chastened pathos, show the gift of an artist's eye, and the seer's introspective glance into the soul. Many a weighted thought is thrown out to sound the deeps of the perishable and the immortal, for a token of their hidden links,—and the plummet finds pearls. The verses have a meditative beauty, a refined fancy, and a gentle earnestness that charm and delight. In the mention of favorites, it is hard to enforce the rule of omission: Spinning, Love's Largess, My Legacy, Found Frozen, The Message, My Lighthouse, Two Sundays, Thought, At Last, When the Kings Come, My Strawberry, The Way to Sing,—

Bits of Travel by H. H., 1872, is an enticing record of what a lady tourist saw and thought abroad, in a twelve months' tour on the Continent. A chapter in these tit-bit descriptions is given to a crayon sketch of a German Landlady, and another to the Valley of Gastein; but the chief part of the book is devoted to scenes under the Italian skies, such as Albano Days, A Morning in the Etruscan Museum in the Vatican, and a series of piquant, gossipy Encyclicals of Travel.

Bits of Talk About Home Matters by H. H., followed in 1873. Its papers have mainly to do with the ways and moods that make up, or mar, the happiness of the fireside circle; and the sunniest of dispositions is inculcated. Especially does she fall afoul of the "little foxes" so prone to spoil the rare fresh bloom on the olive branches about the good-man's table, and her blows fall, at times, to the detriment of the placid heads of the house. Many would be the wiser for seeing the score of inhumanities set down to parents, including corporal punishment, needless denials, rudeness, and, worst of all, the discipline of "breaking the will." The book has the aroma of reflection, wisdom, and tender affection.

SPINNING.

Like a blind spinner in the sun,
I tread my days;
I know that all the threads will run
Appointed ways;
I know each day will bring its task,
And, being blind, no more I ask.

I do not know the use or name
Of that I spin;
I only know that some one came,
And laid within

My hand the thread, and said, "Since you
Are blind, but one thing you can do."

Sometimes the threads so rough and fast
And tangled fly,
I know wild storms are sweeping past,
And fear that I
Shall fall; but dare not try to find
A safer place, since I am blind.

I know not why, but I am sure
That tint and place,
In some great fabric to endure
Past time and race
My threads will have; so from the first,
Though blind, I never felt accurst.

I think, perhaps, this trust has sprung
From one short word
Said over me when I was young—
So young I heard
It, knowing not that God's name signed
My brow, and sealed me his, though blind.

But whether this be seal or sign
Within, without,
It matters not. The bond divine
I never doubt.

I know he set me here, and still,
And glad, and blind, I wait His will;
But listen, listen, day by day,
To hear their tread
Who bear the finished web away,
And cut the thread,
And bring God's message in the sun,
"Thou poor blind spinner, work is done."

MY LEGACY.

They told me I was heir, I turned in haste,
And ran to seek my treasure.
And wondered as I ran how it was placed,—
If I should find a measure
Of gold, or if the titles of fair lands
And houses would be laid within my hands.

I journeyed many roads: I knocked at gates;
I spoke to each wayfarer
I met, and said, "A heritage awaits
Me. Art not thou the bearer
Of news? Some message sent to me whereby
I learn which way my new possessions lie?"

Some asked me in; naught lay beyond their door;
Some smiled and would not tarry,

But said that men were just behind who bore
More gold than I could carry;
And so the morn, the noon, the day were spent,
While empty-handed up and down I went.

At last one cried, whose face I could not see,
As through the mist he lasted;
"Poor child, what evil ones have hindered thee,
Till this whole day is wasted?
Hath no man told thee that thou art joint heir
With one called Christ, who waits the goods to share?"

The one named Christ I sought for many days,
In many places vainly;
I heard men name his name in many ways;
I saw his temples plainly;
But they who named him most gave me no sign
To find him by, or prove the heirship mine.

And when at last I stood before his face,
I knew him by no token
Save subtle air of joy which filled the place;
Our greeting was not spoken;
In solemn silence I received my share,
Kneeling before my brother and "joint heir."

My share! No deed of house or spreading lands,
As I had dreamed; no measure
Heaped up with gold; my elder brother's hands
Had never held such treasure.

Foxes have holes, and birds in nests are fed:
My brother had not where to lay his head.

My share! The right like him to know all pain
Which hearts are made for knowing;
The right to find in loss the surest gain;
To reap my joy from sowing
In bitter tears; the right with him to keep
A watch by day and night with all who weep.

My share! To-day men call it grief and death;
I see the joy and life to-morrow;
I thank our Father with my every breath,
For this sweet legacy of sorrow;
And through my tears I call to each, "Joint heir
With Christ, make haste to ask him for thy share."

LOVE'S largess.

At my heart's door
Love standeth, like a king beside
His royal treasury, whose wide
Gates open swing, and cannot hide
Their priceless store.

His touch and hold
Its common things to jewels turned;
In his sweet fires the dross he burned
Away; and thus he won and earned
And made its gold.

So rich I find
Myself in service of this king,
The goods we spare, in alms I fling;
And breathless days too few hours bring
Me to be kind.

To souls whose pain
My heart can scarcely dare to greet
With pity, while my own complete
And blessed joy their loss must mete
By my great pain.

Diviner air
Of beauty, and a grace more free,
More soft and solemn depths I see
In every woman's face, since he
Has called me fair.

More true and sure
 Each man's heart seems, more firm for right;
 Each man I hold more strong in fight,
 Since he stands ever in my sight,
 So brave, so pure.

More of sun's fire
 Than days can use, and more than nights
 Can name, of stars with rhythmic lights,
 And sweetest singing flocks, whose flights
 Can never tire, —

More bloom than eyes
 Can reach, or hands to grasp may dare, —
 More music in the constant air,
 Than each round wave can hold and bear,
 Before it dies, —

And more of life
 For living, than all death can kill,
 More good than evil's utmost will
 Can thwart, and peace to more than still
 The fiercest strife, —

All these I find
 In service of this gracious king;
 From goods we spare, such alms I fling;
 And pray swift days more hours to bring,
 More bonds to bind.

O happiness!
 To utter thee, in vain our eyes
 Seek tears; and vainly all speech tries;
 This thing alone our king denies
 In Love's largess.

 AT LAST.

O, the years I lost before I knew you,
 Love!
 O, the hills I climbed and came not to you,
 Love!
 Ah! who shall render unto us to make Us glad,
 The things which for and of each other's sake
 We might have had?
 If you and I had sat and played together,
 Love,
 Two speechless babies in the summer weather,
 Love,
 By one sweet brook which, though it dried up long Ago,
 Still makes for me to-day a sweeter song
 Than all I know, —
 If hand in hand through the mysterious gateway,
 Love,
 Of womanhood, we had first looked and straightway,
 Love,
 Had whispered to each other softly, ere
 It yet
 Was dawn, what now in noonday heat and fear
 We both forget, —
 If all of this had given its completeness,
 Love,
 To every hour would it be added sweetness,
 Love!
 Could I know sooner whether it were well
 Or ill
 With thee? One wish could I more surely tell,
 More swift fulfil?
 Ah! vainly thus I sit and dream and ponder,
 Love,
 Losing the precious present while I wonder,
 Love,

About the days in which you grew and came
 To be
 So beautiful, and did not know the name
 Or sight of me.

But all lost things are in the angels' keeping,
 Love;
 No past is dead for us, but only sleeping,
 Love;
 The years of Heaven will all earth's little pain
 Make good,
 Together there we can begin again
 In babyhood.

New York, February 15, 1870.

 TWO SUNDAYS.

I.

A baby, alone, in a lowly door,
 Which climbing woodbine made still lower,
 Sat playing with lilies in the sun.
 The loud church-bells had just begun;
 The kitten pounced in the sparkling grass
 At stealthy spiders that tried to pass;
 The big watch-dog kept a threatening eye
 On me, as I lingered, walking by.
 The lilies grew high, and she reached up
 On tiny tiptoes to each gold cup;
 And laughed aloud, and talked, and clapped
 Her small, brown hands, as the tough stems snapped,
 And flowers fell till the broad hearthstone
 Was covered, and only the topmost one
 Of the lilies left. In sobered glee
 She said to herself, "That's older than me!"

II.

Two strong men through the lowly door,
 With uneven steps, the baby bore;
 They had set the bier on the lily bed;
 The lily she left was crushed and dead.
 The slow, sad bells had just begun,
 The kitten crouched, afraid, in the sun;
 And the poor watch-dog, in bewildered pain,
 Took no notice of me as I joined the train.

 ALBANO DAYS — FROM BITS OF TRAVEL.

There are but seven in a week. That is their only fault. How clever those gentlemanly fellows, Pompey and Domitian, were, to put their villas on this hill; and as for the cruelties said to have been committed in Domitian's amphitheatre, a few rods from our hotel, we have decided that there is some mistake about that. In Rome one can believe in all tales of old tortures — and new ones too, for that matter. Even when the larks sing loudest in the Coliseum the stones cry out louder; the air reeks with sirocco vapors, and seems not yet purged from the odor of blood. But in the pure, sun-flooded air of this hill, which must always have been full of marvellous delights, it is impossible to believe that bad men ever did bad deeds. Whatever they might have been in Rome, they were virtuous as soon as they got here. I cannot fancy Domitian's ever doing anything worse than having a few larks killed for supper; and I am sure he spent most of his afternoons lying on purple thyme on the shores of the Alban Lake (as we lay yesterday), perhaps slyly reading the good sayings of the poor Epictetus whom he had banished. We read yesterday what Epictetus said "concerning those who seek preferment in Rome"; and, as we looked over at the hot, smoky domes and spires, it seemed hard to believe that any one going thither, even if he were "met by a billet from Cæsar," could choose to stay.

Albano is 1,250 feet above the sea, says Murray. That may be true, say we; but we know it is much more than that above Rome. Have we not been looking longingly at it for months, set high on the side of the Alban Hills? From every height in Rome to which we wearily climbed we saw it, triumphant with banners of clouds, and crowned with green of forests, saying as plainly as tower could say, "Come up here, and I will do you good." When the watchmen in the old Saracen towers saw the pirate-ships coming over the Mediterranean, they sounded the alarm, and all the people in the plains fled into the mountains for safety. To-day the towers are in ruins, and no corsairs sail from Africa across the sea; but the sirocco, a more deadly foe, comes in their stead, hotter and hotter with each day of May, and wise souls escape to high places.

Of all those within easy reach of Rome, Albano is best. It is only an hour off by the cars. And even at the railroad station you are met by beauty and good cheer—a garden full of roses, and white thorns, and wall-flowers, and ranunculus; and a station-master who, if he treats you as well as he treated us, will give you a big bunch of all, and look hurt and angry when you offer to pay him. From this garden to the village of Albano, two miles and a half, over a good road, up, up, up! the air grows purer minute by minute; the Campagna behind sinks and stretches and fades, and becomes only another sea, purpler and more restless-looking than the broad band of the Mediterranean into which it melts. On each side are vineyards, looking now like miniature military encampments with play-guns of cane stacked by fives and threes, and little soldiers in green going in and out and playing leap-frog among them, so fantastic are the baby-vines in their first creeping. Olives, gray and solemn, sharing none of the life and joy, most pathetic of trees. The first man who saw an olive-tree must have known that there had been Gethsemane. Never else could such paths have been put into mere color; they could never have been so gray before that night. Still up and up! It is a long two and a half miles. The bells tinkle slowly at the horse's head. The driver's neck bends suspiciously to one side; he is half asleep. You would not be sorry if the horse and he dozed off together, and you stood still for an hour to look. On the right hand is a valley garden, an old lake-bed, set full of vines and fig-trees and fruit-trees in full flower, and wheat, and all the numberless and exquisite-leaved "greens" which Italy boils, eats, and manages to grow fat on. We find them beautiful everywhere but on the dinner-table. High on the crater-like side of this garden is the tower of Ariccia, looking like a gray bird which had just lit on its way up to Monte Cavo. Between Ariccia and Albano is a sharp ravine; and the sensible Pius IX., some twenty years ago, built a fine stone viaduct across it, toward the cost of which we pay half a franc each time we drive over. But only blind men could grudge the money. From every point it is a most beautiful feature in the landscape, with its three tiers of arches; and from its top you look down two hundred feet into the valley garden on one side, and two hundred feet into the tops of a forest of trees on the other.

You follow the valley garden till it loses itself in the Campagna; the Campagna, till it loses itself in the Mediterranean, which glistens in the sun twelve miles off; and you hear coming up from the forest the voices of thrushes and nightingales and cuckoos and larks, till you believe that there must be a bird-fancier's shop in one of the old gray houses joining the bridge. To stand on this bridge for an hour is to see Italian country-life in drama. The donkeys, the men, and the women of Albano and Ariccia and Gensano act their little parts, and are gone. We stayed late at this play last night. The wardrobes were poor, but the acting was nature itself; such pantomime, such chorus! Priests in black, looking always like a sort of ecclesiastical crow, such silly solemnity in their faces, so much slow flap to their petticoats and the brims of their hats; barefooted monks, rolled up in cloaks of faded brown—they also have their similitude, and look as the olive-trees might if they gathered their rusty skirts around them and hobbled out for a walk; workmen, going home from the fields, with old hoes and pickaxes over their shoulders; women, with the same hoes and pickaxes, going home from the same work in the same fields, and carrying also, firm-set on their heads, bundles, loads of wood, little wine-barrels or water-jars, or anything else which it can happen to an Albanese woman to need to carry. No one gives herself any more trouble about her barrel, or jar, or load of wood, than if it were a second head, which she had worn all her life. They talked and laughed as if it were morning instead of night. They were not tired. Watch them at what they call work, and you will see why. As the sun sank lower the crowd of laborers thinned; and the farmers, one degree better off, came riding on donkeys. Two men and a boy on one donkey; four large bundles of wood and one woman on one donkey; four large casks of wine, a bundle of hay, two chairs, some iron utensils, and two small children on one donkey. Oh the comic tragedy of donkey! the hopeless arch of their eyebrows, the abjectness of their tails, and the vicious twist of their ankles! Nobody can watch them long without becoming wretched. Israelites, coolies, and negroes,—all they have died of misfortunes; but the donkey is the Wandering Jew of misery among animals, and Italy, I think, must be his Ghetto.

Before we reached the hotel we had come upon another drama, in the street,—a lottery drawing; prize, two hens. If it had been two thousand scudi, there could not have been much more excitement. Fifty chances had been sold. The street held its breath, while a store-keeper dropped the counters one by one into a box, held by a rosy boy, mischievous enough, but too young to cheat. Then the boy put in his little brown fingers, and drew out one: "Thirty!" Then the street broke out into chatter for an instant, guessing and betting what would come next; then held its breath stiller than ever. "Thirty-one!" "Thirty-one!" No "Thirty-one" answered. "Thirty-one" was sick at home, or had married a wife, and could not come: and the street grudged him his two hens all the more that he was not on hand to carry them off. The hens screamed and scuffled; the storekeeper crammed them back into a coop on his window; and the street went back to its work, i. e. to sitting about, smoking, and knitting, and selling saddles and fish and shoes and salad and handkerchiefs and donkeys and calico and wine all along its doorsteps, never by any chance being under roof, so long as there is daylight.

We took our sunseting at the Villa Doria. It is a princely thing of the rich Romans to throw their beautiful villas open to the public. Could it be safely done in America? I fear our people are not gentle enough, and have too much money to spend on cake and peanuts. Here no harm comes of it. In the Villa Doria are ilex-trees which are a kingdom in themselves. It would not seem unnatural to make obeisance to them. They stand in groups, making long vistas, high arches, locking and interlocking their branches, their trunks looking as old as the masses of ruins among them; and the ruins belonged to Pompey's walls. At sunset the sun slants under and through these ilexes; the purple and wine-colored bands of the Campagna and sky beyond seem to narrow closer and closer round the hill, and flocks of birds wheel and sing. In the Villa Barberini, higher up, is a great field of stone-pines, stately as a council of gods. No wonder that Theodore Parker, when he saw a stone-pine, asked that one be set on his grave. No tree grows which has such bearing of a solemn purpose. Such morning and evening as this make a day in Albano. Words give but glimpse and no color. For other days there are other villas, and fields, and ruins, tombs of Pompey and of Aruns, Lake Nemy and its village, Gensano, and Marino, and Rocca di Papa, all within easy reach and always in sight. There are four lovely winding avenues of trees, called Gallerie, where you drive for miles under arches of gray ilex as grand as stone, and where the oldest trees are propped by pillars to save their strength and keep them alive. There is Monte Cavo, the highest of the Alban Hills, one thousand feet above Albano, where there used to be a temple, and Julius Cæsar went up to be crowned one day. To think that an English cardinal dared to pull down the ruined temple, and build a convent and church in its stead!

Some of the roads are very smooth and good, others are rough and narrow. For these you must take donkeys, and go perhaps two miles an hour; but, going so slowly, you will have great reward in learning the faces of the wayside flowers and getting into fellowship with the lizards. Fifty different kinds of flowers I counted in one afternoon, all growing wild by the road; and the other day, on the road to Marino, I made acquaintance with two lizards, who were finer than Solomon in all his glory, and had a villa with a better view than the Barberini.

THE AWKWARD AGE — FROM BITS OF TALK.

The expression defines itself. At the first sound of the words, we all think of some one unhappy soul we know just now, whom they suggest. Nobody is ever without at least one brother, sister, cousin, or friend on hand, who is struggling through this social slough of despond; and nobody ever will be, so long as the world goes on taking it for granted that the slough is a necessity, and that the road must go through it. Nature never meant any such thing. Now and then she blunders or gets thwarted of her intent, and turns out a person who is awkward, hopelessly and forever awkward; body and soul are clumsy together, and it is hard to fancy them translated to the spiritual world without too much elbow and ankle. However, these are rare cases, and come in under the law of variation. But an awkward age, — a necessary crisis or stage of uncourtiness, through which all human beings must pass, — Nature was incapable of such a conception; law has no place for it; development does not know it; instinct revolts from it; and man is the only animal who has been silly and wrong-headed enough to stumble into it. The explanation and the remedy are so simple, so close at hand, that we have not seen them. The whole thing lies in a nutshell. Where does this abnormal, uncomfortable period come in? Between childhood, we say, and maturity; it is the transition from one to the other. When human beings, then, are neither boys nor men, girls nor women, they must be for a few years anomalous creatures, must they? We might, perhaps, find a name for the individual in this condition as well as for the condition. We must look to Du Chailu for it, if we do; but it is too serious a distress to make light of, even for a moment. We have all felt it, and we know how it feels; we all see it every day, and we know how it looks.

What is it which the child has and the adult loses, from the loss of which comes this total change of behavior? Or is it something which the adult has and the child had not? It is both; and until the loss and the gain, the new and the old, are permanently separated and balanced, the awkward age lasts. The child was overlooked, contradicted, thwarted, snubbed, insulted, whipped; not constantly, not often, — in many cases, thank God, very seldom. But the liability was there, and he knew it; he never forgot it, if you did. One burn is enough to make fire dreaded. The adult, once fairly recognized as adult, is not overlooked, contradicted, thwarted, snubbed, insulted, whipped; at least not with impunity. To this gratifying freedom, these comfortable exemptions, when they are once established in our belief, we adjust ourselves, and grow contentedly good-mannered. To the other régime, while we were yet children, we also somewhat adjusted ourselves, were tolerably well behaved, and made the best of it. But who could bear a mixture of both? What genius could rise superior to it, could be itself, surrounded by such uncertainties?

No wonder that your son comes into the room with a confused expression of uncomfortable pain on every feature, when he does not in the least know whether he will be recognized as a gentleman, or overlooked as a little boy. No wonder he sits down in his chair with movements suggestive of nothing but rheumatism and jack-knives, when he is thinking that perhaps there may be some reason why he should not take that particular chair, and that, if there is, he will be ordered up.

No wonder that your tall daughter turns red, stammers and says foolish things on being courteously spoken to by strangers at dinner, when she is afraid that she may be sharply contradicted or interrupted, and remembers that day before yesterday she was told that children should be seen and not heard.

I knew a very clever girl, who had the misfortune to look at fourteen as if she were twenty. At home, she was the shyest and most awkward of creatures; away from her mother and sisters, she was self-possessed and charming. She said to me, once, "Oh! I have such a splendid time away from home. I'm so tall, everybody thinks I am grown up, and everybody is civil to me."

I know, also, a man of superb physique, charming temperament, and uncommon talent, who is to this day—and he is twenty-five years old—nervous and ill at ease in talking with strangers, in the presence of his own family. He hesitates, stammers, and never does justice to his thoughts. He says that he believes he shall never be free from this distress; he cannot escape from the recollections of the years between fourteen and twenty, during which he was so systematically snubbed that his mother's parlor was to him worse than the chambers of the Inquisition. He knows that he is now sure of courteous treatment; that his friends are all proud of him; but the old cloud will never entirely disappear. Something has been lost which can never be regained. And the loss is not his alone, it is theirs too; they are all poorer for life, by reason of the unkind days which are gone.

This, then, is the explanation of the awkward age. I am not afraid of any dissent from my definition of the source whence its misery springs. Everybody's consciousness bears witness. Everybody knows, in the bottom of his heart, that, however much may be said about the change of voice, the thinness of cheeks, the sharpness of arms, the sudden length in legs and lack of length in trousers and frocks,—all these had nothing to do with the real misery. The real misery was simply and solely the horrible feeling of not belonging anywhere; not knowing what a moment might bring forth in the way of treatment from others; never being sure which impulse it would be safer to follow, to retreat or to advance, to speak or to be silent, and often overwhelmed with unspeakable mortification at the rebuff of the one or the censure of the other. Oh! how dreadful it all was! How dreadful it all is, even to remember! It would be malicious even to refer to it, except to point out the cure.

The cure is plain. It needs no experiment to test it. Merely to mention it ought to be enough. If human beings are so awkward at this unhappy age, and so unhappy at this awkward age, simply because they do not know whether they are to be treated as children or as adults, suppose we make a rule that children are always to be treated, in point of courtesy, as if they were adults? Then this awkward age—this period of transition from an atmosphere of, to say the least, negative rudeness to one of gracious politeness—disappears. There cannot be a crisis of readjustment of social relations: there is no possibility of such a feeling; it would be hard to explain to a young person what it meant. Now and then we see a young man or young woman who has never known it. They are usually only children, and are commonly spoken of as wonders. I know such a boy to-day. At seventeen he measures six feet in height; he has the feet and the hands of a still larger man; and he comes of a blood which had far more strength than grace. But his manner is, and always has been, sweet, gentle, composed,—the very ideal of grave, tender, frank young manhood. People say, "How strange! He never seemed to have any awkward age at all." It would have been stranger if he had. Neither his father nor his mother ever departed for an instant, in their relations with him, from the laws of courtesy and kindness of demeanor which governed their relations with others.

He knew but one atmosphere, and that a genial one, from his babyhood up; and in and of this atmosphere has grown up a sweet, strong, pure soul, for which the quiet, self-possessed manner is but the fitting garb.

This is part of the kingdom that cometh unobserved. In this kingdom we are all to be kings and priests, if we choose; and all its ways are pleasantness. But we are not ready for it till we have become peaceable and easy to be treated, and have learned to understand why it was that one day, when Jesus called his disciples together, he set a little child in their midst.

 A COMPANION FOR THE WINTER—FROM BITS OF TALK.

I have engaged a companion for the winter. It would be simply a superfluous egotism to say this to the public, except that I have a philanthropic motive for doing so. There are many lonely people who are in need of a companion possessing just such qualities as his; and he has brothers singularly like himself, whose services can be secured. I despair of doing justice to him by any description. In fact, thus far, I discover new perfections in him daily, and believe that I am yet only on the threshold of our friendship.

In conversation he is more suggestive than any person I have ever known. After two or three hours alone with him, I am sometimes almost startled to look back and see through what a marvellous train of fancy and reflection he has led me. Yet he is never wordy, and often conveys his subtlest meaning by a look.

He is an artist, too, of the rarest sort. You watch the process under which his pictures grow with incredulous wonder. The Eastern magic which drops the seed in the mould, and bids it shoot up before your eyes, blossom, and bear its fruit in an hour, is tardy and clumsy by side of the creative genius of my companion. His touch is swift as air; his coloring is vivid as light; he has learned, I know not how, the secrets of hidden places in all lands; and he paints, now a tufted clump of soft cocoa palms; now the spires and walls of an iceberg, glittering in yellow sunlight; now a desolate, sandy waste, where black rocks and a few crumbling ruins are lit up by a lurid glow; then a cathedral front, with carvings like lace; then the skeleton of a wrecked ship, with bare ribs and broken masts,—and all so exact, so minute, so life-like, that you believe no man could paint thus any thing which he had not seen.

He has a special love for mosaics, and a marvellous faculty for making drawings of curious old patterns. Nothing is too complicated for his memory, and he revels in the most fantastic and intricate shapes. I have known him in a single evening throw off a score of designs, all beautiful, and many of them rare: fiery scorpions on a black ground; pale lavender flagrees over scarlet; white and black squares blocked out as for tiles of a pavement, and crimson and yellow threads interlaced over them; odd Chinese patterns in brilliant colors, all angles and surprises, with no likeness to any thing in nature; and exquisite little bits of landscapes in soft grays and whites. Last night was one of his nights of reminiscences of the mosaic-workers. A furious snow-storm was raging, and, as the flaky crystals piled up in drifts on the window-ledges, he seemed to catch the inspiration of their law of structure, and drew sheet after sheet of crystalline shapes; some so delicate and filmy that it seemed as if a jar might obliterate them; some massive and strong, like those in which the earth keeps her mineral treasures; then, at last, on a round charcoal disk, he traced out a perfect rose, in a fragrant white powder, which piled up under his fingers, petal after petal, circle after circle, till the feathery stamens were buried out of sight. Then, as we held our breath for fear of disturbing it, with a good-natured little chuckle, he shook it off into the fire, and by a few quick strokes of red turned the black charcoal disk into a shield gay enough for a tournament.

He has talent for modelling, but this he exercises more rarely. Usually, his figures are grotesque rather than beautiful, and he never allows them to remain longer than for a few moments, often changing them so rapidly under your eye that it seems like jugglery. He is fondest of doing this at twilight, and loves the darkest corner of the room. From the half-light he will suddenly thrust out before you a grinning gargoyle head, to which he will give in an instant more a pair of spider legs, and then, with one roll, stretch it out into a crocodile, whose jaws seem so near snapping that you involuntarily draw your chair further back. Next, in a freak of ventriloquism, he startles you still more by bringing from the crocodile's mouth a sigh, so long drawn, so human, that you really shudder, and are ready to implore him to play no more tricks. He knows when he has reached this limit, and soothes you at once by a tender, far-off whisper, like the wind through pines, sometimes almost like an Æolian harp; then he rouses you from your dreams by what you are sure is a tap at the door. You turn, speak, listen; no one enters; the tap again. Ah! it is only a little more of the ventriloquism of this wonderful creature. You are alone with him, and there was no tap at the door.

But when there is, and the friend comes in, then my companion's genius shines out. Almost always in life the third person is a discord, or at least a burden; but he is so genial, so diffusive, so sympathetic, that, like some tints by which painters know how to bring out all the other colors in a picture, he forces every one to do his best. I am indebted to him already for a better knowledge of some men and women with whom I had talked for years before to little purpose. It is most wonderful that he produces this effect, because he himself is so silent; but there is some secret charm in his very smile which puts people en rapport with each other, and with him at once.

I am almost afraid to go on with the list of the things my companion can do. I have not yet told the half, nor the most wonderful; and I believe I have already overtaxed credulity. I will mention only one more, — but that is to me far more inexplicable than all the rest. I am sure that it belongs, with mesmerism and clairvoyance, to the domain of the higher psychological mysteries. He has in rare hours the power of producing the portraits of persons whom you have loved, but whom he has never seen. For this it is necessary that you should concentrate your whole attention on him, as is always needful to secure the best results of mesmeric power. It must also be late and still. In the day, or in a storm, I have never known him to succeed in this. For these portraits he uses only shadowy gray tints. He begins with a hesitating outline. If you are not tenderly and closely in attention, he throws it aside; he can do nothing. But if you are with him, heart and soul, and do not take your eyes from his, he will presently fill out the dear faces, full, life-like, and wearing a smile, which makes you sure that they too must have been summoned from the other side, as you from this, to meet on the shadowy boundary between flesh and spirit. He must see them as clearly as he sees you; and it would be little more for his magic to do if he were at the same moment showing to their longing eyes your face and answering smile.

But I delay too long the telling of his name. A strange hesitancy seizes me. I shall never be believed by any one who has not sat as I have by his side. But, if I can only give to one soul the good-cheer and strength of such a presence, I shall be rewarded.

His name is Maple Wood-fire, and his terms are from eight to twelve dollars a month, according to the amount of time he gives. This price is ridiculously low, but it is all that any member of the family asks; in fact, in some parts of the country, they can be hired for much less. They have connections by the name of Hickory, whose terms are higher; but I cannot find out that they are any more satisfactory. There are also some distant relations, named Chestnut and Pine, who can be employed in the same way, at a much lower rate; but they are all snappish and uncertain in temper.

To the whole world I commend the good brotherhood of Maple, and pass on the emphatic endorsement of a blessed old black woman who came to my room the other day, and, standing before the rollicking blaze on my hearth, said, "Bless yer, honey, yer's got a wood-fire. I'se allers said that, if yer's got a wood-fire, yer's got meat, an' drink, an' clo'es."

 MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY

WAS born at his father's country residence in Stafford county, Virginia, March 17, 1832. His father, Walker Peyton Conway, was long a magistrate of Stafford county, and some time member of the Virginia Legislature. His mother, Margaret Eleanor Conway, is a daughter of John Moncure Daniel, M.D., a graduate of Edinburgh, and Surgeon-General of the U. S. Army under President Monroe. She is also granddaughter of Thomas Stone, of Maryland, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

M. D. Conway was sent to Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penna., in 1847, where he was graduated in 1849, and from which he received subsequently the degree of M. A. At this college he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. On returning to Virginia, he began the study of law in the office of W. F. Phillips, of Warrenton, contributing, meanwhile, to the Southern Literary Messenger, and also to the Richmond Examiner, then edited by his cousin, the late John M. Daniel, afterward Charge d' Affaires in Sardinia. Here he also wrote a pamphlet, entitled Free Schools in Virginia, warmly advocating the New England system. In 1851 Mr. Conway resolved to enter upon the Methodist ministry, and having been received into the Baltimore Conference, he was appointed to Rockville circuit, Maryland. Up to this time he had held ardent Southern opinions, and had been secretary of a Southern Rights Club in Warrenton. But his views began to change under the awakening influences of an anti-slavery settlement of Quakers, as he has described in a work entitled Testimonies Concerning Slavery, published in London, 1865.

In 1852, Mr. Conway was appointed to Frederick circuit, in the same vicinity. Here his religious opinions underwent changes which led him to ask to be relieved from his charge, and, after a brief visit to Virginia, he went to Cambridge, Massachusetts, and entered the Divinity College. While pursuing his studies here, Mr. Conway was fond of visiting Concord, where he found a friend in Ralph Waldo Emerson, and often enjoyed walks with Thoreau. From the time of his entrance into the Divinity College, he had espoused the views of the more rationalistic Unitarians, maintaining, however, rather the religious philosophy of the Transcendentalists than the naturalism of more negative schools.

M D Conway.

After graduating, Mr. Conway returned to Virginia, with the hope of being able to preach his new philanthropic and religious views in his native State; but rumors of his connection with the affair of the fugitive slave Anthony Burns (who had belonged to the same neighborhood in Virginia), had preceded him, and on arrival at Falmouth, where his parents resided, he was confronted by a company of gentlemen and ordered under threats to leave the State. He left Virginia, and was called to the Unitarian Church at Washington, in 1854. Here, also, his anti-slavery views caused trouble, and finally a discourse concerning the outrage on Senator Sumner led to a termination of his connection with the society.

During this ministry at Washington, several of his discourses were printed, one being On the Life and Character of the Hon. William Cranch, LL. D., late Chief Justice of the District of Columbia. In 1856 Mr. Conway became the minister of the Unitarian Church at Cincinnati. He was here married, in 1858, to Miss Ellen Dana. Several pamphlets by him were published in Cincinnati, among others a Defence of the Theatre, and The Natural History of the Devil. In 1858 appeared his first extended work: Tracts for To-day. It consists of a series of discourses mainly devoted to studies of religious experience, and containing also some discussions concerning the value of the Bible and the functions of skepticism. In 1861 appeared a little volume which gained considerable celebrity before its authorship was known: The Rejected Stone; or, Insurrection vs. Resurrection in America, by a Native of Virginia. (Boston: Walker, Wise & Co.) Its aim was to awaken a conviction that the war was really a struggle with slavery, and to alarm the country against all efforts for compromise. The Golden Hour, a work of similar character, appeared in 1862.

During the earlier days of the war, Mr. Conway visited the chief towns and villages of Ohio, to address the people in town-halls and out-of-door assemblies, devoting his entire time to this work without compensation. He was then invited to give a lecture on the anti-slavery bearings of the war at the Smithsonian Institution. Subsequently he resigned his connection with the congregation in Cincinnati, and came to Boston, to edit a new journal, the Boston Commonwealth, at the desire of a number of gentlemen, among whom were the late George L. Stearns, and Francis Bird, Esq.

After residing, during this service, at Concord, Mass., Mr. Conway, upon consultation with his friends, resolved to visit England, in order to speak and write on the subject then engrossing public attention in both countries. There he delivered public addresses in various districts, and published the work already mentioned—Testimonies Concerning Slavery (Chapman & Hall), which passed through two editions. He also wrote a large number of articles on American questions and themes in the Fortnightly Review and Frazer's Magazine, with which he has since been connected, besides contributing to the London Daily News and the Pall Mall Gazette.

In 1864 Mr. Conway accepted an invitation to preach at South Place Chapel, in London, which had been the scene of the labors of the celebrated W. J. Fox, M. P. This society had dwindled very much after the retirement of Mr. Fox, but it is now one of the largest liberal congregations in Great Britain. In his chapel there is fine music, but instead of the usual prayer, there is an utterance called "A Meditation;" the lessons read are from various Oriental scriptures, and there is no text taken for the discourse.

During his residence in London, Mr. Conway has contributed many articles to Harper's Magazine, among which the most important are the series entitled South Coast Savanterings in England. He has also been for some years correspondent of the Cincinnati Daily Commercial. He is a fellow of the Royal Anthropological Society of Great Britain and Ireland, and Vice-President of the London Dialectical Society. In 1872 he delivered a series of lectures at the Royal Institution on Demonology, and a series on Oriental Religions at the Philosophical Institution of Newcastle-on-Tyne. He has also delivered two courses of Lectures before the Edinburgh Philosophical Society.

His most important work was published in London, 1870:—The Earthward Pilgrimage (Hotten). The idea of this production is to reverse the direction of Bunyan's Pilgrim, as is indicated in the first chapter—"How I left the World to come for that which is." The narration of the excursion gives its author an opportunity to promulgate his own peculiar religious views. In the course of the pilgrim's wanderings, the whole round of churches and chapels are visited, and descriptions are given that may be identified with actual places and eminent living teachers. The work, however, touches upon nearly every great theme of the age—social, literary, artistic—though always with a moral purpose.

The latest work of Mr. Conway is a political brochure entitled Republican Superstitions, Illustrated in the Political History of America (Henry S. King & Co., London, 1872). This work, which is dedicated to his friend, M. Louis Blanc, was meant to strengthen the hands of the Left in the French Assembly, in their opposition to the policy of two legislative chambers, and also to warn the English Republicans against thinking the President a more republican official than the nominal monarch. Mr. Conway quotes the opinions of many very eminent men—Mill, Bentham, Bagehot, Karl Blind, Louis Blanc, and others—in favor of his opposition both to the presidential office and the two-chamber system. He holds that the United States has suffered only from so many of its organic forms as it preserved from monarchical systems, and believes that it will be necessary to replace the "antiquarian state" with the "scientifically organized electoral district," the President with a responsible Premier, the two legislatures with one in which each real variety of opinion shall be represented and meet the other face to face, and the diplomatic system by special commissions. This work has been translated into French, and has been widely and favorably reviewed in Germany as well as in England.

Mr. Conway is advertised as having now (1873) in press a large work entitled The Sacred Anthology: A Collection of Ethnical Scriptures.

THE LITTLE AND LOWLY—FROM THE EARTHWARD PILGRIMAGE.

The worship of the Nazarene peasant and carpenter has its Avatar to-day in the interest gathering about the little and the lowly. At last an age has arrived which begins to understand the secret revealed to St. Augustine, that "God is great in the great, but greatest in the small."

First came Science, the one true representation of the Apostolic Succession in this age, reversing all estimates of high and low. Studious rather of actual flies than of possible angels; turning from the infinite to search into the infinitesimal; finding the philosopher's stone in every pebble; circumnavigating the rain-drop and reporting its curious tribes; pursuing insects as ardently as suns; reading in flowers the laws of constellations; tracing the bursting of cosmical rings and the generation of worlds in a spinning drop of oil; exploring primeval forests in frost-pictures on window-panes; following each step in the ascent of the worm to man; showing the consent of solar systems to the motion of a finger,—Science has come to this generation wearing on its head the dust, and has taught us to see in that dust a crown more glorious than ever adorned the brow of royalty.

Next came Poetry, turning at last from the emptiness of the glittering, to the treasures of the leaden, casket. Burns and the "wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower" disturbed by his plough; Wordsworth, with his reflector turned to the field, holding a celadine; Hood setting to sweet minors the sighs of the sempstress; Leigh Hunt and Keats, competing as laureates of the cricket and the grasshopper; Carlyle, rising to song as the moth finds its pyre in his candle; Goethe, twining the mystical tendrils of souls about the little gypsy Mignon; Browning, telling of the destinies of empires bound up with the carols of barefoot Pippa from the silk-mills; the tender humanities of Beranger, of Lowell, of Whittier, and of Walt. Whitman, who shows the Leaves of Grass as fit subjects for his epic as Homer found for his the heroes of Troy.

* ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN,

WHOSE early poems were signed "Florence Percy," was born in the pleasant town of Strong, on the Sandy River, in Maine, October 9, 1832. That whole region is well wooded and picturesque, having ponds of clear water mirroring the hills, and the hollows alive with streams hastening down to the river, while the latter, after flowing eastward through a succession of fertile valleys enclosed by rolling hills, begins at Strong to wind around the long declivity of Mount Blue, and flows southward to the falls at Farmington. The child reared among these happy influences inherited from her father a mental and physical constitution of rare vigor, and from her mother, whom she lost in early life, the delicate grace and tenderness which characterize her genius.

Her widowed father soon removed to Farmington, where her girlhood was passed, in a community marked by its taste for literature. One of the oldest academies in the State had its seat in that town, while the judges and lawyers who attended the county courts, many of them resident at the county seat, gave a learned tone to its society. Judge Parker wrote and published there, thirty years since, a town history which has been pronounced a model of antiquarian research, and Jacob Abbott's well-known "Rollo" books were written in Farmington. A weekly newspaper has been published there since 1840. In its pages appeared some of the earlier verses of "Florence Percy," which were received with so much favor that the writer, while still on the debatable ground between girlhood and womanhood, was invited by her townsmen to deliver an original poem at a public festival,—a task which she accepted with hesitation and discharged with credit.

Her first verses in print appeared, without her knowledge or consent, in a New Hampshire paper when she was twelve years old. Three years later she sent her first voluntary contribution to a Vermont editor; and in 1855 she became assistant editor of the Portland Transcript. Her first volume of Poems, entitled Forest Buds from the Woods of Maine, was brought out in a neat duodecimo at Boston in 1856. The book was full of promise, and had some choice original studies of the aspects of nature about Farmington. Its literary success enabled her in 1859 to carry into effect a plan of foreign travel, and to spend several months in Europe, journeying leisurely through Italy, and thence more rapidly through France and Germany. In 1860 she was married to Paul Akers, the sculptor, whose birthplace was in a suburban town near Portland. Mr. Akers was then winning a reputation; but death found him, like his own Pearl Diver, when success lay just within his grasp. Already an invalid, he lingered a year after his marriage, and died at Philadelphia in the spring of 1861, at the early age of thirty-five. Their child, Gertrude, was soon laid by his side.

Elizabeth Akers Allen.

Mrs. Akers returned to Portland, and after months of extreme mental and bodily prostration, she again took her old post in the Transcript office. In 1863, when the government first began to avail itself of the services of women at Washington, Mrs. Akers received an appointment in the War Office at the suggestion of the late Senator Fessenden. She witnessed the great events of the next three years in that capital, and was one of the throng of horror-stricken spectators at Ford's Theatre, on the memorable April night when President Lincoln was assassinated.

In 1866 her second volume of poetry, entitled Poems by Elizabeth Akers (Florence Percy), was published in the blue and gold series of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields. It is full of rhythmical beauty and tender suggestiveness, having a keen sympathy with the charms of natural scenery, and a chastened pathos begot of bereavement and resignation. The versatility of its themes, and their even power, reveal a mental activity that must find expression in poetical forms. Beside the gems quoted below, occur a dirge in spring-time, like Violet Planting; Among the Laurels, a fantasy; Left Behind, a revelation of womanly love; The Mountains, a vivid ideal of death; Cradle Time, a companion piece to "Rock Me to Sleep"; White Head, a picture of Casco Bay; and a series of war pictures—Spring at the Capital;

In the Defences, and the Return of the Regiment, wherein,

"Leaning out from the gazing bands
Many a woman silent stands,
Who longs to grasp their hard brown hands,
And wash them white with tears."

In the autumn of 1866, Mrs. Akers was married to Mr. E. M. Allen, and soon afterward accompanied her husband to Richmond. It was during her residence in that city that the extraordinary discussion arose concerning the authorship of her poem, "Rock me to sleep, Mother." That song was written by Mrs. Allen in 1859, and sent from Rome to the Philadelphia Post, wherein it appeared in 1860. The writer had happily embodied a universal feeling in musical verse, and her poem was instantly adopted by the public, copied by the newspaper press, set to music by half a dozen different hands, and finally claimed by no less than five aspirants to the honor of its composition. Mrs. Allen took no pains to vindicate her claim until, in 1868, Mr. A. M. W. Ball, of Elizabeth, New Jersey, ventured to print a pamphlet containing the affidavits of a number of his friends, who thought they remembered that he had written something of the kind ten or twelve years before. Then the real author was compelled to deny that she had stolen her own poem; and the controversy was conclusively settled in her favor by an elaborate review of the whole case, taking up a full page of the New York Times.

In 1872 Mr. Allen went into business in New York, and now resides, with his wife, in Greenville, New Jersey, one of the outlying suburbs of that city. Since the publication of her second volume, Mrs. Allen has been a frequent contributor to the principal magazines, and some of her finest poems are scattered through their pages, including The Willow, Inconstancy, etc.

THE CITY OF THE LIVING.

In a long-vanished age, whose varied story
No record has to-day, —
So long ago expired its grief and glory, —
There flourished far away,

In a broad realm, whose beauty passed all measure,
A city fair and wide,
Wherein the dwellers lived in peace and pleasure,
And never any died.

Disease and pain and death, those stern marauders,
Which mar our world's fair face,
Never encroached upon the pleasant borders
Of that bright dwelling-place.

No fear of parting and no dread of dying
Could ever enter there;
No mourning for the lost, no anguished crying
Made any face less fair.

Without the city's walls death reigned as ever,
And graves rose side by side;
Within, the dwellers laughed at his endeavor,
And never any died.

O happiest of all earth's favored places!
O bliss, to dwell therein! —
To live in the sweet light of loving faces,
And fear no grave between!

To feel no death-damp, gathering cold and colder,
Disputing life's warm truth,—
To live on, never lonelier or older,
Radiant in deathless youth!

And hurrying from the world's remotest quarters
A tide of pilgrims flowed
Across broad plains and over mighty waters,
To find that blest abode,

Where never death should come between, and sever
Them from their loved apart,—
Where they might work, and win, and live forever,
Still holding heart to heart.

And so they lived, in happiness and pleasure,
And grew in power and pride,
And did great deeds, and laid up stores of treasure,
And never any died.

And many years rolled on, and saw them striving
With unabated-breath;
And other years still found and left them living,
And gave no hope of death.

Yet listen, hapless soul whom angels pity,
Craving a boon like this,—
Mark how the dwellers in the wondrous city
Grew weary of their bliss.

One and another, who had been concealing
The pain of life's long thrall,
Forsook their pleasant places, and came stealing
Outside the city wall,

Craving, with wish that brooked no more denying,
So long had it been crossed,
The blessed possibility of dying,—
The treasure they had lost.

Daily the current of rest-seeking mortals
Swelled to a broader tide,
Till none were left within the city's portals,
And graves grew green outside.

Would it be worth the having or the giving,
The boon of endless breath?
Ah, for the weariness that comes of living
There is no cure but death!

Ours were indeed a fate deserving pity,
Were that sweet rest denied;
And few, methinks, would care to find the city
Where never any died!

 IN AN ATTIC.

This is my attic room. Sit down, my friend.
My swallow's nest is high and hard to gain;
The stairs are long and steep; but at the end
The rest repays the pain.

For here are peace and freedom; room for speech
Or silence, as may suit a changeful mood:
Society's hard by-laws do not reach
This lofty altitude.

You hapless dwellers in the lower rooms
See only bricks and sand and windowed walls;
But here, above the dust and smoky glooms,
Heaven's light unhindered falls.

So early in the street the shadows creep,
Your night begins while yet my eyes behold
The purpling hills, the wide horizon's sweep,
Flooded with sunset gold.

The day comes earlier here. At morn I see
Along the roofs the eldest sunbeam peep;
I live in daylight, limitless and free,
While you are lost in sleep.

I catch the rustle of the maple-leaves,
I see the breathing branches rise and fall,
And hear, from their high perch along the eaves,
The bright-necked pigeons call.

Far from the parlors with their garrulous crowds
I dwell alone, with little need of words;
I have mute friendships with the stars and clouds,
And love-trysts with the birds.

So all who walk steep ways, in grief and night,
Where every step is full of toil and pain,
May see, when they have gained the sharpest height,
It has not been in vain,

Since they have left behind the noise and heat;
And, though their eyes drop tears, their sight
is clear:

The air is purer, and the breeze is sweet,
And the blue heaven more near.

 ROCK ME TO SLEEP, MOTHER.

Backward, turn backward, O Time, in your flight,
Make me a child again just for to-night!
Mother, come back from the echoless shore,
Take me again to your heart as of yore;
Kiss from my forehead the furrows of care,
Smooth the few silver threads out of my hair;
Over my slumbers your loving watch keep;—
Rock me to sleep, mother,—rock me to sleep!

Backward, flow backward, O tide of the years!
I am so weary of toil and of tears,—
Toil without recompense, tears all in vain,—
Take them, and give me my childhood again!
I have grown weary of dust and decay,—
Weary of flinging my soul-wealth away;
Weary of sowing for others to reap;—
Rock me to sleep, mother,—rock me to sleep!

Tired of the hollow, the base, the untrue,
Mother, O mother, my heart calls for you!
Many a summer the grass has grown green,
Blossomed and faded, our faces between:
Yet, with strong yearning and passionate pain,
Long I to-night for your presence again.
Come from the silence so long and so deep;—
Rock me to sleep mother,—rock me to sleep!

Over my heart, in the days that are flown,
No love like mother-love ever has shone;
No other worship abides and endures,—
Faithful, unselfish, and patient like yours:
None like a mother can charm away pain
From the sick soul and the world-weary brain.
Slumber's soft calms o'er my heavy lids creep;—
Rock me to sleep, mother,—rock me to sleep!

Come, let your brown hair, just lighted with gold,
Fall on your shoulders again as of old;
Let it drop over my forehead to-night,
Shading my faint eyes away from the light;
For with its sunny-edged shadows once more
Haply will throng the sweet visions of yore;
Lovingly, softly, its bright billows sweep;—
Rock me to sleep, mother,—rock me to sleep!

Mother, dear mother, the years have been long
Since I last listened your lullaby song:
Sing, then, and unto my soul it shall seem Womanhood's years have been only a dream.
Clasped to your heart in a loving embrace,
With your light lashes just sweeping my face,
Never hereafter to wake or to weep;—
Rock me to sleep, mother,—rock me to sleep!

 PROMOTED.

Dead, ere existence reached its perfect prime,
 A hero martyr. In his morning years
 He gathered up the riches of his life,
 His fair, fresh youth, his high and noble hopes,
 All that had been, or was, or would be dear, —
 All that is possible to strong young souls,
 And laid them at his suffering country's feet;
 Saying, as fondly as a lover might,
 "All, even to my life, is hers I love,
 And so my country's." When her sorest need
 Demanded at his hands the uttermost,
 Behold how cheerfully he yielded it,
 Dying as calmly as one falls asleep
 After the perils of the day are past,
 And silver-sweet the evening bugle-call
 Speaks peace and rest.

The world lost much, what time our hero died,
 For rarely has it owned a man like him, —
 As pure of purpose, in these soiling times,
 And single-hearted as a diamond,
 The core of whose transparent soul is light;
 His was as tender as a woman's heart, —
 His nature sweet and artless as a child's,
 Yet strong and helpful. In his serious eyes
 There shone the record of a clean, fair life
 Which had no shame to hide, no stain to weep;
 He earned this sudden honor valiantly,
 The quick promotion of a glorious death, —
 "Killed in the advance, while leading on his men."

And would our selfish grief deny it him,
 And long to call him back? No, warrior-saint;
 Put on thy crown!

I do not know the place where he was laid,
 After the long day's dreadful work was done.
 They buried him upon the battle's brink,
 His war-worn comrades, — gently, reverently,
 With his young laurels fresh about his brow, —
 And I might search there all the summer's day
 Nor ever find him. But it is enough
 To know his tender body is at rest,
 And that the cannon will not break his sleep.
 His name is safe among the shining names;
 His soul is safe in the good Father's care;
 And in the hush of this wet, fragrant night,
 After the dust, the battle, and the heat,
 The loving rain-drops cool upon his grave,
 And the veiled stars will watch there till the day.
 Dear heart, sleep well!

Death, the great purifier, scarce could make
 His face more pure; and yet I long to know
 The added beauty which it printed there.
 But that sweet sorrow will not come to me,
 I can but keep his features as they were.
 I know the fatal bullet dared not strike
 The brow whereon his mother left her kiss;
 I hope there is no blood-stain on his cheek;
 I hope his lips still keep their tender smile,
 That his true hand yet rests upon his sword,
 And that anemones and violets,
 Taught by the grateful year that is to come,
 Will find the nameless pillow where he lies,
 And wrap him in the colors which he loved, —
 The colors in whose dear defence he died,
 Red, white, and blue!

 GEORGE E. WARING, JR.

AN agricultural and miscellaneous writer, the son of George E. and Sarah (Burger) Waring, was born near Stamford, Connecticut, July 4, 1833. He was educated chiefly at College Hill, in Poughkeepsie. In the spring of 1853 he went to study agriculture with Professor Mapes, having always taken an interest in that pursuit. During the following winter he made an agricultural lecturing tour into Maine and Vermont. He wrote his first book, Elements of Agriculture, in 1854. In August, 1855, he took Horace Greeley's farm at Chappaqua, New York, and conducted it on shares for two years. In August, 1857, he was appointed Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York city, where he remained nearly four years, in charge of the draining and all agricultural improvements. Among other services, he prepared the soil of the present "Mall," and set out the four rows of trees upon it.

At the outbreak of the rebellion he was appointed Major of the "Garibaldi Guard" (the Thirty-ninth New York Regiment), in May, 1861, and was in Washington and Virginia till after the first battle of Bull Run. In August, 1861, he was appointed Major of Cavalry by Major General Fremont, went to St. Louis to join him, and raised six companies of cavalry under the name of the "Fremont Hussars." These, being afterward consolidated with the "Benton Hussars," made up the Fourth Missouri Cavalry, of which he was commissioned Colonel in January, 1862. He served in the Southwest, and was mustered out March, 1865. In the spring of 1867, he took up his residence in Newport, proposing to become a market-gardener. During that same year "Ogden Farm" was purchased, and this (with the market-garden and large green-houses,) is still successfully carried on.

Mr. Waring's publications are as follows: Elements of Agriculture, 1854, which was rewritten for the Tribune Association in 1868; Draining for Profit and Draining for Health, 1869; Handybook of Husbandry, 1870; The Dry Earth System, 1870; and the Herd Register of American Jersey Cattle Club, 2 vols., 1871-2, edited for a club of which he was one of the founders and is the secretary. He has also written many papers for the New York Tribune and Hearth and Home; was for three years agricultural editor of the New York Evening Post, and has been for four years an assistant editor of the American Agriculturist. He has also contributed several sketches of army life to the Atlantic Monthly. He has been twice married, and has two children. His first wife was Miss Euphemia Blunt of Brooklyn, New York, and the second Miss Virginia Clark of Pittsfield, Massachusetts.

 JAMES DE MILLE,

A VEPSATILE and brilliant author, has written several dramatic romances and some novels of American life full of comical scenes and characters. The latter have originally appeared in Harper's Magazine, Atlantic Monthly, or Appleton's Journal. He is a native of St. John, New Brunswick, where he was born in 1833. He was educated at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island. For twelve years he has been a college professor, at first at Acadia College, and subsequently at Dalhousie College, Halifax, Nova Scotia, where he now fills the chair of History and Rhetoric. His writings include: Helen's Household; A Tale of Rome in the First Century, 1867; Cord and Creese; or, The Brandon Mystery, 1869; The Dodge Club, a narrative of the humors of tourist life in Italy in 1859, 1869; The Lady of the Ice, a story of Quebec, 1870; The Cryptogram, a romance founded on the intricacies of cypher-writing, 1871; The American Baron, 1872; The Comedy of Terrors, 1873; and An Open Question, 1873. He is also the author of two sets of books of adventure for boys, comprising six volumes each. The B. O. W. C. series was prepared between 1870-2, and contains B. O. W. C.; Boys of Grand Pré School; Fire in the Woods; Lost in the Fog; Picked up Adrift, and Treasure of the Seas. The Young Dodge Club Series is now in course of publication.

James De Mille

*THE SENATOR IN ROME—FROM THE DODGE CLUB.

Still he sauntered through the remotest corners of Rome, wandering over to the other side of the Tiber, or through the Ghetto, or among the crooked streets at the end of the Corso. Few have learned so much of Rome in so short a time.

On one occasion he was sitting in a café, where he had supplied his wants in the following way:

"Hi! coffee! coffee!" and again, "Hi! cigar! cigar!" when his eye was attracted by a man at the next table who was reading a copy of the London Times, which he had spread out very ostentatiously. After a brief survey the Senator walked over to his table and, with a beaming smile, said—

"Good-day, Sir."

The other man looked up and returned a very friendly smile.

"And how do you do, Sir?"

"Very well, I thank you," said the other, with a strong Italian accent.

"Do you keep your health?"

"Thank you, yes," said the other, evidently quite pleased at the advances of the Senator.

"Nothing gives me so much pleasure," said the Senator, "as to come across an Italian who understands English. You, Sir, are a Roman, I presume."

"Sir, I am."

The man to whom the Senator spoke was not one who would have attracted any notice from him if it had not been for his knowledge of English. He was a narrow-headed, mean-looking man, with very seedy clothes, and a servile but cunning expression.

"How do you like Rome?" he asked of the Senator.

The Senator at once poured forth all that had been in his mind since his arrival. He gave his opinion about the site, the architecture, the drains, the municipal government, the beggars, and the commerce of the place; then the soldiers, the nobles, the priests, monks, and nuns.

Then he criticised the Government, its form, its mode of administration, enlarged upon its tyranny, condemned vehemently its police system, and indeed its whole administration of every thing, civil, political, and ecclesiastical.

Waxing warmer with the sound of his own eloquence, he found himself suddenly but naturally reminded of a country where all this is reversed. So he went on to speak about Freedom, Republicanism, the Rights of Man, and the Ballot-Box. Unable to talk with sufficient fluency while in a sitting posture he rose to his feet, and as he looked around, seeing that all present were staring at him, he made up his mind to improve the occasion. So he harangued the crowd generally, not because he thought any of them could understand him, but it was so long since he had made a speech that the present opportunity was irresistible. Besides, as he afterward remarked, he felt that it was a crisis, and who could tell but that a word spoken in season might produce some beneficial effects.

He shook hands very warmly with his new friend after it all was over, and on leaving him made him promise to come and see him at his lodgings, where he would show him statistics, etc. The Senator then returned.

That evening he received a visit. The Senator heard a rap at his door and called out "Come in." Two men entered—ill-looking, or rather malignant-looking, clothed in black.

Dick was in his room, Buttons out, Figgs and the Doctor had not returned from the café. The Senator insisted on shaking hands with both his visitors. One of these men spoke English.

"His Excellency," said he, pointing to the other, "wishes to speak to you on official business."

"Happy to hear it," said the Senator.

"His Excellency is the Chief of the Police, and I am the Interpreter."

Whereupon the Senator shook hands with both of them again.

"Proud to make your acquaintance," said he.

"I am personally acquainted with the Chief of the Boston police, and also the Chief of the New York police, and my opinion is that they can stand more liquor than any men I ever met with. Will you liquor?"

The interpreter did not understand. The Senator made an expressive sign. The Interpreter mentioned the request to the Chief, who shook his head coldly.

"This is formal," said the Interpreter—"not social."

The Senator's face flushed. He frowned.

"Give him my compliments then, and tell him the next time he refuses a gentleman's offer he had better do it like a gentleman. For my part, if I chose to be uncivil, I might say that I consider your Roman police very small potatoes."

The Interpreter translated this literally, and though the final expression was not very intelligible, yet it seemed to imply contempt.

So the Chief of Police made his communication as sternly as possible. Grave reports had been made about his American Excellency. The Senator looked surprised.

"What about?"

That he was haranguing the people, going about secretly, plotting, and trying to instill revolutionary sentiments into the public mind.

"Pooh!" said the Senator.

The Chief of Police bade him be careful. He would not be permitted to stir up an excitable populace. This was to give him warning.

"Pooh!" said the Senator again. And if he neglected this warning it would be the worse for him. And the Chief of Police looked unutterable things. The Senator gazed at him sternly and somewhat contemptuously for a few minutes.

"You're no great shakes anyhow," said he.

"Signore?" said the Interpreter.

"Doesn't it strike you that you are talking infernal nonsense?" asked the Senator in a slightly argumentative tone of voice, throwing one leg over another, tilting back his chair, and folding his arms.

"Your language is disrespectful," was the indignant reply.

"Yours strikes me as something of the same kind, too; but more — it is absurd."

"What do you mean?"

"You say I stir up the people."

"Yes. Do you deny it?"

"Pooh! How can a man stir up the people when he can't speak a word of their language?"

The Chief of Police did not reply for a moment.

"I rather think I've got you there," said the Senator, dryly. "Hey? old Hoss?"

("Old Hoss" was an epithet which he used when he was in a good humor.) He felt that he had the best of it here, and his anger was gone. He therefore tilted his chair back further, and placed his feet upon the back of a chair that was in front of him.

"There are Italians in Rome who speak English," was at length the rejoinder.

"I wish I could find some, then," said the Senator. "It's worse than looking for a needle in a hay-stack, they're so precious few."

"You have met one."

"And I can't say I feel over-proud of the acquaintance," said the Senator, in his former dry tone, looking hard at the Interpreter.

"At the Caffè Cenàcci, I mean."

"The what? Where's that?"

"Where you were this morning."

"Oh ho! that's it — ah? And was my friend there one of your friends too?" asked the Senator, as light burst in upon him.

"He was sufficiently patriotic to give warning."

"Oh — patriotic? — he was, was he?" said the Senator, slowly, while his eyes showed a dangerous light.

"Yes — patriotic. He has watched you for some time."

"Watched me!" and the Senator frowned wrathfully.

"Yes, all over Rome, wherever you went."

"Watched me! dogged me! tracked me! Aha?"

"So you are known."

"Then the man is a spy."

"He is a patriot."

"Why, the mean concern sat next me, attracted my attention by reading English, and encouraged me to speak as I did. Why don't you arrest him?"

"He did it to test you."

"To test me! How would he like me to test him?"

"The Government looks on your offence with lenient eyes."

"Ah!"

"And content themselves this time with giving you warning."

"Very much obliged; but tell your Government not to be alarmed. I won't hurt them."

Upon this the two visitors took their leave. The Senator informed his two friends about the visit, and thought very lightly about it; but the recollection of one thing rankled in his mind.

That spy! The fellow had humbugged him. He had dogged him, tracked him, perhaps for weeks, had drawn him into conversation, asked leading questions, and then given information. If there was any thing on earth that the Senator loathed it was this.

But how could such a man be punished! That was the thought. Punishment could only come from one. The law could do nothing. But there was one who could do something, and that one was himself. Lynch law!

"My fayther was from Bosting,
My uncle was Judge Lynch,
So darn your fire and roasting,
You can not make me finch."

The Senator hummed the above elegant words all that evening.

He thought he could find the man yet. He was sure he would know him. He would devote himself to this on the next day. The next day he went about the city, and at length in the afternoon he came to Pincian Hill. There was a great crowd there as usual. The Senator placed himself in a favorable position, in which he could only be seen from one point, and then watched with the eye of a hawk.

He watched for about an hour. At the end of that time he saw a face. It belonged to a man who had been leaning against a post with his back turned toward the Senator all this time. It was the face! The fellow happened to turn it far enough round to let the Senator see him. He was evidently watching him yet. The Senator walked rapidly toward him. The man saw him and began to move as rapidly away. The Senator increased his pace. So did the man. The Senator walked still faster. So did the man. The Senator took long strides. The man took short, quick ones. It is said that the fastest pedestrians are those who take short, quick steps. The Senator did not gain on the other.

By this time a vast number of idlers had been attracted by the sight of these two men walking as if for a wager. At last the Senator began to run. So did the man!

The whole thing was plain. One man was chasing the other. At once all the idlers of the Pincian Hill stopped all their avocations and turned to look. The road winds down the Pincian Hill to the Piazza del Popolo, and those on the upper part can look down and see the whole extent. What a place for a race! The quick-eyed Romans saw it all.

"A spy! yes, a Government spy!"

"Chased by an eccentric Englishman!"

A loud shout burst from the Roman crowd. But a number of English and Americans thought differently. They saw a little man chased by a big one. Some cried "Shame!" Others, thinking it a case of pocket-picking, cried "Stop thief!" Others cried "Go it, little fellow! Two to one on the small chap!"

Every body on the Pincian Hill rushed to the edge of the winding road to look down, or to the paved walk that overlooks the Piazza. Carriages stopped and the occupants looked down, French soldiers, dragoons, guards, officers — all staring.

And away went the Senator. And away ran the terrified spy. Down the long way, and at length they came to the Piazza del Popolo. A loud shout came from all the people. Above and on all sides they watched the race. The spy darted down the Corso. The Senator after him.

The Romans in the street applauded vociferously. Hundreds of people stopped, and then turned and ran after the Senator. All the windows were crowded with heads. All the balconies were filled with people.

Down along the Corso. Past the column of Antonine. Into a street on the left. The Senator was gaining! At last they came to a square. A great fountain of vast waters bursts forth there. The spy ran to the other side of the square, and just as he was darting into an alley the Senator's hand clutched his coat-tails!

The Senator took the spy in that way by which one is enabled to make any other do what is called "Walking Spanish," and propelled him rapidly toward the reservoir of the fountain.

The Senator raised the spy from the ground and pitched him into the pool.

The air was rent with acclamations and cries of delight.

As the spy emerged, half drowned, the crowd came forward and would have prolonged the delightful sensation.

Not often did they have a spy in their hands.

 LOUISA MAY ALCOTT,

THE daughter of Amos Bronson Alcott, is descended on her mother's side from the Mays, Sewalls, and Quincys, of Boston. She was carefully educated by her father, and her Little Women is said to give a natural picture of the family life in which she was reared. A friend states that she is, "by birth and training, a Protestant of Protestants, an enthusiast for freedom, nature, and the ideal life. Her humor, her tastes, her aspirations, her piety, are all American, as well as her style and opinions, which her books sufficiently exhibit. She is of stately presence, with a fine head, large blue eyes, brown hair, a cheerful and earnest manner, and a lively wit. She is nearer forty than thirty, tall and strong, a vigorous walker, and fond of out-door life; never a student, though a great reader; domestic in her habits, but with a talent for the stage, which she has often indulged in at private theatres."^{*}

Miss Alcott composed fairy stories in her teens, and published a little volume called Flower Fables, about 1857, dedicating it to Miss Emerson, the daughter of her father's friend. She continued to write many tales for journals in Boston, several sets of which have since been collected into volumes, though against her express wishes: Morning Glories, and Other Stories, 1867; Three Proverb Stories, 1868.

During the winter of 1862-3, Miss Alcott was one of the army of volunteer nurses who served in the government hospitals, and her experiences at Washington were embodied in a series of womanly letters to her mother and sisters. At this time she was prostrated by a fever which enervated her health for years; yet during her convalescence she revised these articles, and printed them in the Boston Commonwealth in the summer of 1863. Shortly after, they were issued in a volume, entitled Hospital Sketches and Camp and Fireside Stories. Her first novel, Moods, which embodied, though somewhat incompletely, her idea of love and marriage, appeared in 1865. She visited Europe during the following year, sojourning chiefly in England,

L. M. Alcott

Switzerland, and Italy. After her return in 1867, she wrote many stories, and began her fascinating depictions of child and home life in Little Women. Before the first volume was completed, her tasks proved greater than her strength, and she was compelled to recruit her health by a second tour on the Continent. The natural pictures of child-life in Little Women, or Meg, Joe, Beth, and Amy, made it an instant favorite. It has been followed by a delightful series of hopeful and unaffected companion volumes: An Old-Fashioned Girl, 1870; Little Men: Life at Plumfield with Joe's Boys, 1871; and Aunt Jo's Scrap-Bag, a series of stories, 1872. Shawl Straps, which sketches some travelling experiences, appeared in 1872; and Work; or, Christie's Experiment, an illustration of the difficulties besetting a penniless woman who seeks to earn an honest livelihood with her hands, in 1873.

 BEING NEIGHBORLY — FROM LITTLE WOMEN.

"What in the world are you going to do now, Jo?" asked Meg, one snowy afternoon, as her sister came clumping through the hall, in rubber boots, old sack and hood, with a broom in one hand and a shovel in the other.

"Going out for exercise," answered Jo, with a mischievous twinkle in her eyes.

"I should think two long walks, this morning, would have been enough. It's cold and dull out, and I advise you to stay, warm and dry, by the fire, as I do," said Meg, with a shiver.

"Never take advice; can't keep still all day, and not being a pussy-cat, I don't like to doze by the fire. I like adventures, and I'm going to find some."

Meg went back to toast her feet, and read

* Hearth and Home, art., The Author of Little Women, 1872, 242

"Ivanhoe," and Jo began to dig paths with great energy. The snow was light; and with her broom she soon swept a path all round the garden, for Beth to walk in when the sun came out, and the invalid dolls needed air. Now the garden separated the Marches house from that of Mr. Laurence; both stood in a suburb of the city, which was still country-like, with groves and lawns, large gardens, and quiet streets. A low hedge parted the two estates. On one side was an old brown house, looking rather bare and shabby, robbed of the vines that in summer covered its walls, and the flowers which then surrounded it. On the other side was a stately stone mansion, plainly betokening every sort of comfort and luxury, from the big coach-house and well-kept grounds to the conservatory, and the glimpses of lovely things one caught between the rich curtains. Yet it seemed a lonely, lifeless sort of house; for no children frolicked on the lawn, no motherly face ever smiled at the windows, and few people went in and out, except the old gentleman and his grandson.

To Jo's lively fancy this fine house seemed a kind of enchanted palace, full of splendors and delights, which no one enjoyed. She had long wanted to behold these hidden glories, and to know the "Laurence boy," who looked as if he would like to be known, if he only knew how to begin. Since the party she had been more eager than ever, and had planned many ways of making friends with him; but he had not been lately seen, and Jo began to think he had gone away, when she one day spied a brown face at an upper window, looking wistfully down into their garden, where Beth and Amy were snow-balling one another.

"That boy is suffering for society and fun," she said to herself. "His grandpa don't know what's good for him, and keeps him shut up all alone. He needs a lot of jolly boys to play with, or somebody young and lively. I've a great mind to go over and tell the old gentleman so."

The idea amused Jo, who liked to do daring things, and was always scandalizing Meg by her queer performances. The plan of "going over" was not forgotten; and, when the snowy afternoon came, Jo resolved to try what could be done. She saw Mr. Laurence drive off, and then sallied out to dig her way down to the hedge, where she paused, and took a survey. All quiet; curtains down at the lower windows; servants out of sight, and nothing human visible but a curly black head leaning on a thin hand, at the upper window.

"There he is," thought Jo; "poor boy! all alone, and sick, this dismal day! It's a shame! I'll toss up a snow-ball, and make him look out, and then say a kind word to him."

Up went a handful of soft snow, and the head turned at once, showing a face which lost its listless look in a minute, as the big eyes brightened, and the mouth began to smile. Jo nodded, and laughed, and flourished her broom, as she called out,—

"How do you do? Are you sick?"

Laurie opened the window and croaked out as hoarsely as a raven.—

"Better, thank you. I've had a horrid cold, and been shut up a week."

"I'm sorry. What do you amuse yourself with?"

"Nothing; it's as dull as tombs up here."

"Don't you read?"

"Not much; they won't let me."

"Can't somebody read to you?"

"Grandpa does, sometimes; but my books don't interest him, and I hate to ask Brooke all the time."

"Have some one come and see you, then."

"There isn't any one I'd like to see. Boys make such a row, and my head is weak."

"Isn't there some nice girl who'd read and amuse you? Girls are quiet, and like to play nurse."

"Don't know any."

"You know me," began Jo, then laughed, and stopped.

"So I do! Will you come, please?" cried Laurie.

"I'm not quiet and nice; but I'll come, if mother will let me. I'll go ask her. Shut that window, like a good boy, and wait till I come."

With that, Jo shouldered her broom and marched into the house, wondering what they would all say to her. Laurie was in a little flutter of excitement at the idea of having company, and flew about to get ready; for, as Mrs. March said, he was a "little gentleman," and did honor to the coming guest by brushing his curly pate, putting on a fresh collar, and trying to tidy up the room, which, in spite of half a dozen servants, was anything but neat. Presently, there came a loud ring, then a decided voice, asking for "Mr. Laurie," and a surprised-looking servant came running up to announce a young lady.

"All right, show her up; it's Miss Jo," said Laurie, going to the door of his little parlor to meet Jo, who appeared, looking rosy and kind, and quite at her ease, with a covered dish in one hand, and Beth's three kittens in the other.

"Here I am, bag and baggage," she said, briskly. "Mother sent her love, and was glad if I could do anything for you. Meg wanted me to bring some of her blanc-mange; she makes it very nice, and Beth thought her cats would be comforting. I knew you'd shout at them, but I could n't refuse, she was so anxious to do something."

It so happened that Beth's funny loan was just the thing; for, in laughing over the kits, Laurie forgot his bashfulness, and grew sociable at once.

"That looks too pretty to eat," he said, smiling with pleasure, as Jo uncovered the dish, and showed the blanc-mange, surrounded by a garland of green leaves, and the scarlet flowers of Amy's pet geranium.

"It is n't anything, only they all felt kindly, and wanted to show it. Tell the girl to put it away for your tea; it's so simple, you can eat it; and, being soft, it will slip down without hurting your sore throat. What a cosy room this is."

"It might be, if it was kept nice; but the maids are lazy, and I don't know how to make them mind. It worries me, though."

"I'll right it up in two minutes; for it only needs to have the hearth brushed, so,—and the things stood straight on the mantel-piece, so,—and the books put here, and the bottles there, and your sofa turned from the light, and the pillows plumped up a bit. Now, then, you're fixed."

And so he was; for, as she laughed and talked, Jo had whisked things into place, and given quite a different air to the room. Laurie watched her in respectful silence, and, when she beckoned him to his sofa, he sat down with a sigh of satisfaction, saying gratefully,—

"How kind you are! Yes, that's what it wanted. Now please take the big chair, and let me do something to amuse my company."

"No; I came to amuse you. Shall I read aloud?" and Jo looked affectionately toward some inviting books near by.

"Thank you; I've read all those, and if you don't mind, I'd rather talk," answered Laurie.

"Not a bit; I'll talk all day if you'll only set me going. Beth says I never know when to stop."

"Is Beth the rosy one, who stays at home a good deal, and sometimes goes out with a little basket?" asked Laurie, with interest.

"Yes, that's Beth; she's my girl, and a regular good one she is, too."

"The pretty one is Meg, and the curly-haired one is Amy, I believe?"

"How did you find that out?"

Laurie colored up, but answered, frankly, "Why, you see, I often hear you calling to one another, and when I'm alone up here, I can't help looking over at your house, you always seem to be having such good times. I beg your pardon for being so rude, but sometimes you forget to put down the curtain at the window where the flowers are; and, when the lamps are lighted, it's like looking at a picture to see the fire, and you all round the table with your mother; her face is right opposite, and it looks so sweet behind the flowers, I can't help watching it. I haven't got any mother, you know;" and Laurie poked the fire to hide a little twitching of the lips that he could not control.

The solitary, hungry look in his eyes went straight to Jo's warm heart. She had been so simply taught that there was no nonsense in her head, and at fifteen she was as innocent and frank as any child. Laurie was sick and lonely; and, feeling how rich she was in home-love and happiness, she gladly tried to share it with him. Her brown face was very friendly, and her sharp voice unusually gentle, as she said,—

"We'll never draw that curtain any more, and I give you leave to look as much as you like. I just wish, though, instead of peeping, you'd come over and see us. Mother is so splendid, she'd do you heaps of good, and Beth would sing to you if I begged her to, and Amy would dance; Meg and I would make you laugh over our funny stage properties, and we'd have jolly times. Wouldn't your grandpa let you?"

"I think he would, if your mother asked him. He's very kind, though he don't look it; and he lets me do what I like, pretty much, only he's afraid I might be a bother to strangers," began Laurie, brightening more and more.

"We ain't strangers, we are neighbors, and you needn't think you'd be a bother. We want to know you, and I've been trying to do it this ever so long. We haven't been here a great while, you know, but we have got acquainted with all our neighbors but you."

"You see grandpa lives among his books, and don't mind much what happens outside. Mr. Brooke, my tutor, don't stay here, you know, and I have no one to go round with me, so I just stop at home and get on as I can."

"That's bad; you ought to make a dive, and go visiting everywhere you are asked; then you'll have lots of friends, and pleasant places to go to. Never mind being bashful, it won't last long if you keep going."

Laurie turned red again, but wasn't offended at being accused of bashfulness; for there was so much good-will in Jo, it was impossible not to take her blunt speeches as kindly as they were meant.

"Do you like your school?" asked the boy, changing the subject, after a little pause, during which he stared at the fire, and Jo looked about her well pleased.

"Don't go to school; I'm a business man—girl, I mean. I go to wait on my aunt, and a dear, cross old soul she is, too," answered Jo.

Laurie opened his mouth to ask another question; but remembering just in time that it wasn't manners to make too many inquiries into people's affairs, he shut it again, and looked uncomfortable. Jo liked his good breeding, and did n't mind having a laugh at Aunt March, so she gave him a lively description of a fidgety old lady, her fat poodle, the parrot that talked Spanish, and the library where she revelled. Laurie enjoyed that immensely; and when she told about the prim old gentleman who came once to woo Aunt March, and, in the middle of a fine speech, how Poll had tweaked his wig off to his great dismay, the boy lay back and laughed till the tears ran down his cheeks, and a maid popped her head in to see what was the matter.

"Oh! that does me lots of good; tell on, please," he said, taking his face out of the sofa-cushion, red and shining with merriment.

Much elated with her success, Jo did "tell on," all about their plays and plans, their hopes and fears for father, and the most interesting events of the little world in which the sisters lived. Then they got to talking about books; and to Jo's delight she found that Laurie loved them as well as she did, and had read even more than herself.

"If you like them so much, come down and see ours. Grandpa is out, so you need n't be afraid," said Laurie, getting up.

"I'm not afraid of anything," returned Jo, with a toss of the head.

"I don't believe you are!" exclaimed the boy, looking at her with much admiration, though he privately thought she would have good reason to be a trifle afraid of the old gentleman, if she met him in some of his moods.

The atmosphere of the whole house being summer-like, Laurie led the way from room to room, letting Jo stop to examine whatever struck her fancy; and so at last they came to the library, where she clapped her hands, and pranced, as she always did when especially delighted. It was lined with books, and there were pictures and statues, and distracting little cabinets full of coins and curiosities, and Sleepy-Hollow chairs, and queer tables, and bronzes; and, best of all, a great, open fireplace, with quaint tiles all round it.

"What richness!" sighed Jo, sinking into the depths of a velvet chair, and gazing about her with an air of intense satisfaction. "Theodore Laurence, you ought to be the happiest boy in the world," she added, impressively.

"A fellow can't live on books," said Laurie, shaking his head, as he perched on a table opposite.

Before he could say more, a bell rung, and Jo flew up, exclaiming with alarm, "Mercy me! it's your grandpa!"

"Well, what if it is? You are not afraid of anything, you know," returned the boy, looking wicked.

"I think I am a little bit afraid of him, but I don't know why I should be. Marmee said I might come, and I don't think you're any the worse for it," said Jo, composing herself, though she kept her eyes on the door.

"I'm a great deal better for it, and ever so much obliged. I'm only afraid you are very tired talking to me; it was so pleasant, I couldn't bear to stop," said Laurie, gratefully.

"The doctor to see you, sir," and the maid beckoned as she spoke.

"Would you mind if I left you for a minute? I suppose I must see him," said Laurie.

"Don't mind me. I'm as happy as a cricket here," answered Jo.

Laurie went away, and his guest amused herself in her own way. She was standing before a fine portrait of the old gentleman, when the door opened again, and, without turning, she said decidedly, "I'm sure now that I should n't be afraid of him, for he's got kind eyes, though his mouth is grim, and he looks as if he had a tremendous will of his own. He isn't as handsome as my grandfather, but I like him."

"Thank you, ma'am," said a gruff voice behind her; and there, to her great dismay, stood old Mr. Laurence.

Poor Jo blushed till she couldn't blush any redder, and her heart began to beat uncomfortably fast as she thought what she had said. For a minute a wild desire to run away possessed her; but that was cowardly, and the girls would laugh at her; so she resolved to stay, and get out of the scrape as she could. A second look showed her that the living eyes, under the bushy gray eyebrows, were kinder even than the painted ones; and there was a sly twinkle in them, which lessened her fear a good deal. The gruff voice was gruffer than ever, as the old gentleman said abruptly, after that dreadful pause, "So, you're not afraid of me, hey?"

"Not much, sir."

"And you don't think me as handsome as your grandfather?"

"Not quite, sir."

"And I've got a tremendous will, have I?"

"I only said I thought so."

"But you like me, in spite of it?"

"Yes, I do, sir."

That answer pleased the old gentleman; he gave a short laugh, shook hands with her, and putting his finger under her chin, turned up her face, examined it gravely, and let it go, saying, with a nod, "You've got your grandfather's spirit, if you haven't his face. He was a fine man, my dear; but, what is better, he was a brave and an honest one, and I was proud to be his friend."

"Thank you, sir," and Jo was quite comfortable after that, for it suited her exactly.

"What have you been doing to this boy of mine, hey?" was the next question, sharply put.

"Only trying to be neighborly, sir," and Jo told how her visit came about.

"You think he needs cheering up a bit, do you?"

"Yes, sir; he seems a little lonely, and young folks would do him good, perhaps. We are only girls, but we should be glad to help if we could, for we don't forget the splendid Christmas present you sent us," said Jo, eagerly.

"Tut, tut, tut! that was the boy's affair. How is the poor woman?"

"Doing nicely, sir," and off went Jo, talking very fast, as she told all about the Hummels, in whom her mother had interested richer friends than they were.

"Just her father's way of doing good. I shall come and see your mother some fine day. Tell her so. There's the tea-bell; we have it early, on the boy's account. Come down, and go on being neighborly."

"If you'd like to have me, sir."

"Should n't ask you, if I didn't," and Mr. Laurence offered her his arm with old-fashioned courttesy.

"What would Meg say to this?" thought Jo, as she was marched away, while her eyes danced with fun as she imagined herself telling the story at home.

"Hey! why what the dickens has come to the fellow?" said the old gentleman, as Laurie came running down stairs, and brought up with a start of surprise at the astonishing sight of Jo arm in arm with his redoubtable grandfather.

"I did n't know you'd come, sir," he began, as Jo gave him a triumphant little glance.

"That's evident, by the way you racket down stairs. Come to your tea, sir, and behave like a gentleman;" and having pulled the boy's hair by way of a caress, Mr. Laurence walked on, while Laurie went through a series of comic evolutions behind their backs, which nearly produced an explosion of laughter from Jo.

The old gentleman did not say much as he drank his four cups of tea, but he watched the young people, who soon chatted away like old friends, and the change in his grandson did not escape him. There was color, light and life in the boy's face now, vivacity in his manner, and genuine merriment in his laugh.

"She's right; the lad is lonely. I'll see what these little girls can do for him," thought Mr. Laurence, as he looked and listened. He liked Jo, for her odd, blunt ways suited him; and she seemed to understand the boy almost as well as if she had been one herself.

A HOSPITAL SKETCH.

. . . My Ganymede departed, and while I quieted poor Shaw, I thought of John. He came in a day or two after the others; and, one evening, when I entered my "pathetic room," I found a lately emptied bed occupied by a large, fair man, with a fine face, and the serenest eyes I ever met. One of the earlier comers had often spoken of a friend, who had remained behind, that those apparently worse wounded than himself might reach a shelter first. It seemed a David and Jonathan sort of friendship. The man fretted for his mate, and was never tired of praising John — his courage, sobriety, self-denial, and unflinching kindness of heart; always winding up with: "He's an out an' out fine feller, ma'am; you see if he aint."

I had some curiosity to behold this piece of excellence, and when he came, watched him for a night or two, before I made friends with him; for, to tell the truth, I was a little afraid of the stately looking man, whose bed had to be lengthened to accommodate his commanding stature; who seldom spoke, uttered no complaint, asked no sympathy, but tranquilly observed what went on about him; and, as he lay high upon his pillows, no picture of dying statesman or warrior was ever fuller of real dignity than this Virginia blacksmith. A most attractive face he had, framed in brown hair and beard, comely featured and full of vigor, as yet unsubdued by pain; thoughtful and often beautifully mild while watching the afflictions of others, as if entirely forgetful of his own. His mouth was grave and firm, with plenty of will and courage in its lines, but a smile could make it as sweet as any woman's; and his eyes were child's eyes, looking one fairly in the face, with a clear, straightforward glance, which promised well for such as placed their faith in him. He seemed to cling to life, as if it were rich in duties and delights, and he had learned the secret of content. The only time I saw his composure disturbed, was when my surgeon brought another to examine John, who scrutinized their faces with an anxious look, asking of the elder: "Do you think I shall pull through, sir?" "I hope so, my man." And, as the two passed on, John's eye still followed them, with an intentness which would have won a truer answer from them, had they seen it. A momentary shadow flitted over his face; then came the usual serenity, as if, in that brief eclipse, he had acknowledged the existence of some hard possibility, and asking nothing yet hoping all things, left the issue in God's hands, with that submission which is true piety.

The next night, as I went my rounds with Dr. P., I happened to ask which man in the room probably suffered most; and, to my great surprise, he glanced at John:

"Every breath he draws is like a stab; for the ball pierced the left lung, broke a rib, and did no end of damage here and there; so the poor lad can find neither forgefulness nor ease, because he must lie on his wounded back or suffocate. It will be a hard struggle, and a long one, for he possesses great vitality; but even his temperate life can't save him; I wish it could."

"You don't mean he must die, Doctor?"

"Bless you, there's not the slightest hope for him; and you'd better tell him so before long; women have a way of doing such things comfortably, so I leave it to you. He won't last more than a day or two, at furthest."

I could have sat down on the spot and cried heartily, if I had not learned the wisdom of bottling up one's tears for leisure moments. Such an end seemed very hard for such a man, when half a dozen worn out, worthless bodies round him, were gathering up the remnants of wasted lives, to linger on, for years perhaps, burdens to others, daily reproaches to themselves. The army needed men like John, earnest, brave, and faithful; fighting for liberty and justice with both heart and hand, true soldiers of the Lord. I could not give him up so soon, or think with any patience of so excellent a nature robbed of its fulfilment, and blundered into eternity by the rashness or stupidity of those at whose hands so many lives may be required. It was an easy thing for Dr. P. to say: "Tell him he must die," but a cruelly hard thing to do, and by no means as "comfortable" as he politely suggested. I had not the heart to do it then, and privately indulged the hope that some change for the better might take place, in spite of gloomy prophecies; so rendering my task unnecessary.

A few minutes later, as I came in again, with fresh rollers, I saw John sitting erect, with no one to support him, while the surgeon dressed his back. I had never hitherto seen it done; for, having simpler wounds to attend to, and knowing the fidelity of the attendant, I had left John to him, thinking it might be more agreeable and safe; for both strength and experience were needed in his case. I had forgotten that the strong man might long for the gentle tendance of a woman's hands, the sympathetic magnetism of a woman's presence, as well as the feebler souls about him. The Doctor's words caused me to reproach myself with neglect, not of any real duty perhaps, but of those little cares and kindnesses that solace homesick spirits, and make the heavy hours pass easier. John looked lonely and forsaken just then, as he sat with bent head, hands folded on his knee, and no outward sign of suffering, till, looking nearer, I saw great tears roll down and drop upon the floor. It was a new sight there; for, though I had seen many suffer, some swore, some groaned, most endured silently, but none wept. Yet it did not seem weak, only very touching, and straightway my fear vanished, my heart opened wide and took him in, as, gathering the bent head in my arms, as freely as if he had been a little child, I said, "Let me help you bear it, John."

Never, on any human countenance, have I seen so swift and beautiful a look of gratitude, surprise and comfort, as that which answered me more eloquently than the whispered—

"Thank you, ma'am, this is right good! this is what I wanted!"

"Then why not ask for it before?"

"I didn't like to be a trouble; you seemed so busy, and I could manage to get on alone."

"You shall not want it any more, John."

Nor did he; for now I understood the wistful look that sometimes followed me, as I went out, after a brief pause beside his bed, or merely a passing nod, while busied with those who seemed to need me more than he, because more urgent in their demands. Now I knew that to him as to so many, I was the poor substitute for mother, wife, or sister, and in his eyes no stranger, but a friend who hitherto had seemed neglectful; for, in his modesty, he had never guessed the truth. This was changed now; and, through the tedious operation of probing, bathing, and dressing his wounds, he leaned against me, holding my hand fast, and, if pain wrung further tears from him, no one saw them fall but me. When he was laid down again, I hovered about him, in a remorseful state of mind that would not let me rest, till I had bathed his face, brushed his bonny brown hair, set all things smooth about him, and laid a knot of heath and heliotrope on his clean pillow. While doing this, he watched me with the satisfied expression I so liked to see; and when I offered the little nosegay, held it carefully in his great hand, smoothed a ruffled leaf or two, surveyed and smelt it with an air of genuine delight, and lay contentedly regarding the glimmer of the sunshine on the green. Although the manliest man among my forty, he said, "Yes, ma'am," like a little boy; received suggestions for his comfort with the quick smile that brightened his whole face; and now and then, as I stood tidying the table by his bed, I felt him softly touch my gown, as if to assure himself that I was there. Anything more natural and frank I never saw, and found this brave John as bashful as brave, yet full of excellencies and fine aspirations, which, having no power to express themselves in words, seemed to have bloomed into his character and made him what he was.

After that night, an hour of each evening that remained to him was devoted to his ease or pleasure. He could not talk much, for breath was precious, and he spoke in whispers; but from occasional conversations, I gleaned scraps of private history, which only added to the affection and respect I felt for him. Once he asked me to write a letter, and as I settled pen and paper, I said, with an irrepressible glimmer of feminine curiosity, "Shall it be addressed to wife, or mother, John?"

"Neither, ma'am; I've got no wife, and will write to mother myself when I get better. Did you think I was married because of this?" he asked, touching a plain ring he wore and often turned thoughtfully on his finger when he lay alone.

“Partly that, but more from a settled sort of look you have; a look which young men seldom get until they marry.”

“I didn’t know that; but I’m not so very young, ma’am, thirty in May, and have been what you might call settled this ten years. Mother’s a widow, I’m the oldest child she has, and it wouldn’t do for me to marry until Lizzy has a home of her own, and Jack’s learned his trade; for we’re not rich, and I must be father to the children and husband to the dear old woman, if I can.”

“No doubt but you are both, John; yet how came you to go to war, if you felt so? Wasn’t enlisting as bad as marrying?”

“No, ma’am, not as I see it, for one is helping my neighbor, the other pleasing myself. I went because I couldn’t help it. I didn’t want the glory or the pay; I wanted the right thing done, and people kept saying the men who were in earnest ought to fight. I was in earnest, the Lord knows! but I held off as long as I could, not knowing which was my duty. Mother saw the case, gave me her ring to keep me steady, and said ‘Go;’ so I went.”

A short story and a simple one, but the man and the mother were portrayed better than pages of fine writing could have done it.

“Do you ever regret that you came, when you lie here suffering so much?”

“Never, ma’am; I haven’t helped a great deal, but I’ve shown I was willing to give my life, and perhaps I’ve got to; but I don’t blame anybody, and if it was to do over again, I’d do it. I’m a little sorry I wasn’t wounded in front; it looks cowardly to be hit in the back, but I obeyed orders, and it don’t matter in the end, I know.”

Poor John! It did not matter now, except that a shot in front might have spared the long agony in store for him. He seemed to read the thought that troubled me, as he spoke so hopefully when there was no hope, for he suddenly added:

“This is my first battle; do they think it’s going to be my last?”

“I’m afraid they do, John.”

It was the hardest question I had ever been called upon to answer; doubly hard with those clear eyes fixed on mine, forcing a truthful answer by their own truth. He seemed a little startled at first, pondered over the fateful fact a moment, then shook his head, with a glance at the broad chest and muscular limbs stretched out before him:

“I’m not afraid, but it’s difficult to believe all at once. I’m so strong it don’t seem possible for such a little wound to kill me.”

Merry Mercutio’s dying words glanced through my memory as he spoke: “’Tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a church door; but ’tis enough.” And John would have said the same could he have seen the ominous black holes between his shoulders; he never had, but, seeing the ghastly sights about him, could not believe his own wound more fatal than these, for all the suffering it caused him.

“Shall I write to your mother, now?” I asked, thinking that these sudden tidings might change all plans and purposes. But they did not; for the man received the order of the Divine Commander to march with the same unquestioning obedience with which the soldier had received that of the human one: doubtless remembering that the first led him to life, and the last to death.

“No, ma’am; to Jack just the same; he’ll break it to her best, and I’ll add a line to her myself when you get done.”

So I wrote the letter which he dictated, finding it better than any I had sent; for, though here and there a little ungrammatical or inelegant, each sentence came to me briefly worded, but most expressive; full of excellent counsel to the boy, tenderly bequeathing “mother and Lizzie” to his care, and bidding him good bye in words the sadder for their simplicity. He added a few lines, with steady hand, and, as I sealed it, said, with a patient sort of sigh, “I hope the answer will come in time for me to see it;” then, turning away his face, laid the flowers against his lips, as if to hide some quiver of emotion at the thought of such a sudden sundering of all the dear home ties.

These things had happened two days before; now John was dying, and the letter had not come. I had been summoned to many death beds in my life, but to none that made my heart ache as it did then, since my mother called me to watch the departure of a spirit akin to this in its gentleness and patient strength. As I went in, John stretched out both his hands:

“I knew you’d come! I guess I’m moving on, ma’am.”

He was; and so rapidly that, even while he spoke, over his face I saw the gray veil falling that no human hand can lift. I sat down by him, wiped the drops from his forehead, stirred the air about him with the slow wave of a fan, and waited to help him die. He stood in sore need of help—and I could do so little; for, as the doctor had foretold, the strong body rebelled against death, and fought every inch of the way, forcing him to draw each breath with a spasm, and clench his hands with an imploring look, as if he asked, “How long must I endure this, and be still?” For hours he suffered dumbly, without a moment’s respite, or a moment’s murmuring; his limbs grew cold, his face damp, his lips white, and, again and again, he tore the covering off his breast, as if the lightest weight added to his agony; yet through it all, his eyes never lost their perfect serenity, and the man’s soul seemed to sit therein, undaunted by the ills that vexed his flesh.

One by one, the men woke, and round the room appeared a circle of pale faces and watchful eyes, full of awe and pity; for, though a stranger, John was beloved by all. Each man there had wondered at his patience, respected his piety, admired his fortitude, and now lamented his hard death; for the influence of an upright nature had made itself deeply felt, even in one little week. Presently, the Jonathan who so loved this comely David, came creeping from his bed for a last look and word. The kind soul was full of trouble, as the choke in his voice, the grasp of his hand, betrayed; but there were no tears, and the farewell of the friends was the more touching for its brevity.

“Old boy, how are you?” faltered the one.

“Most through, thank heaven!” whispered the other.

“Can I say or do anything for you anywheres?”

“Take my things home, and tell them that I did my best.”

“I will! I will!”

“Good bye, Ned.”

“Good bye, John, good bye!”

They kissed each other, tenderly as women, and so parted, for poor Ned could not stay to see his comrade die. For a little while, there was no sound in the room but the drip of water, from a stump or two, and John's distressful gasps, as he slowly breathed his life away. I thought him nearly gone, and had just laid down the fan, believing its help to be no longer needed, when suddenly he rose up in his bed, and cried out with a bitter cry that broke the silence, sharply startling every one with its agonized appeal:

"For God's sake, give me air!"

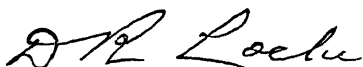

It was the only cry pain or death had wrung from him, the only boon he had asked; and none of us could grant it, for all the airs that blew were useless now. Dan flung up the window. The first red streak of dawn was warming the gray east, a herald of the coming sun; John saw it, and with the love of light which lingers in us to the end, seemed to read in it a sign of hope of help, for, over his whole face there broke that mysterious expression, brighter than any smile, which often comes to eyes that look their last. He laid himself gently down; and, stretching out his strong right arm, as if to grasp and bring the blessed air to his lips in a fuller flow, lapsed into a merciful unconsciousness, which assured us that for him suffering was forever past. He died then; for, though the heavy breaths still tore their way up for a little longer, they were but the waves of an ebbing tide that beat unfelt against the wreck, which an immortal voyager had deserted with a smile. He never spoke again, but to the end held my hand close, so close that when he was asleep at last, I could not draw it away. Dan helped me, warning me as he did so that it was unsafe for dead and living flesh to lie so long together; but though my hand was strangely cold and stiff, and four white marks remained across its back, even when warmth and color had returned elsewhere, I could not but be glad that, through its touch, the presence of human sympathy, perhaps, had lightened that hard hour.

When they had made him ready for the grave, John lay in state for half an hour, a thing which seldom happened in that busy place; but a universal sentiment of reverence and affection seemed to fill the hearts of all who had known or heard of him; and when the rumor of his death went through the house, always astir, many came to see him, and I felt a tender sort of pride in my lost patient; for he looked a most heroic figure, lying there stately and still as the statue of some young knight asleep upon his tomb. The lovely expression which so often beautifies dead faces, soon replaced the marks of pain, and I longed for those who loved him best to see him when half an hour's acquaintance with death had made them friends. As we stood looking at him, the ward master handed me a letter, saying it had been forgotten the night before. It was John's letter, come just an hour too late to gladden the eyes that had longed and looked for it so eagerly! but he had it; for, after I had cut some brown locks for his mother, and taken off the ring to send her, telling how well the talisman had done its work, I kissed this good son for her sake, and laid the letter in his hand, still folded as when I drew my own away, feeling that its place was there, and making myself happy with the thought, that, even in his solitary grave in the "Government Lot," he would not be without some token of the love which makes life beautiful and outlives death. Then I left him, glad to have known so genuine a man, and carrying with me an enduring memory of the brave Virginia blacksmith, as he lay serenely waiting for the dawn of that long day which knows no night.

 DAVID ROSS LOCKE,

WHOSE inimitable letters during the War as "Petroleum V. Nasby" were said by the late Chief-Justice Chase to have formed the fourth force in the reduction of the rebellion, was born at Vestal, Broome county, New York, September 20, 1833. He attended the public school in that neighborhood, and learned his trade as a printer in the office of the Cortland Democrat. He tried his fortune in Ohio as journeyman printer, reporter, and writer, in prose and poetry, on numerous Western journals, till in 1852 he started the Plymouth Advertiser.

Thereafter he was connected, as publisher and editor, with various papers: the Mansfield Herald; Bucyrus Journal; Findlay Jeffersonian, and the Bellefontaine Republican. In 1865 he took editorial charge of the Toledo Blade, with which he is still connected; and since 1867 he has been a popular lecturer. In 1873 he also became a member of the firm of Bates & Locke, as newspaper advertising agents in New York city.

Mr. Locke began to write his "Nasby" letters at Findlay, Ohio, in 1860, and continued the series till after the close of the war. In a quaint, satirical style, reckless in spelling but remorseless in logic, he laughed to scorn the pretensions and fallacies of slavery and its political sympathizers throughout the rebellion. His first volume appeared in 1863: Nasby: Divers Views, Opinions, and Prophecies of Yours Truly, Petroleum V. Nasby, Lait Paster in the Church of the Noo Dispensashun. Three years later that worthy, now "Chaplain to his Excellency the President, and P. M. at Confederate Roads, Kentucky," wrote Swingin Round the Circle; and in 1868, appeared Ekkoes from Kentucky. These three works were subsequently issued in a single volume.

 EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN,

A VERSATILE writer and an imaginative poet, was born at Hartford, Connecticut, in 1833. His grandfather, Griffin Stedman, was a leading merchant of that city, and his father, Col. E. B. Stedman, was married to Elizabeth C., sister of Hon. W. E. Dodge, of New York—a lady richly endowed with literary talent. Her poems and Florentine letters, over her present name of Elizabeth C. Kinney, have a reputation.* She is a descendant of Rev. Aaron Cleveland—the colonial poet—and cousin of the poet-churchman, Arthur Cleveland Coxe.

His father died before Edmund was two years old, and was buried at sea. His mother returned to her father's home in New York, while her two sons were adopted by their paternal grandfather, and placed for education at Norwich, Connecticut, with their grand-uncle, James Stedman, a fine old scholar and jurist of that romantic place. Here Edmund passed his boyhood, and was fitted for Yale College—entering, in his sixteenth year, the class of 1853 as its youngest member. His mother, meanwhile, was married to Hon. W. B. Kinney, editor of the Newark Advertiser, and had accompanied her husband on his mission to Sardinia.

Edmund C. Stedman

Young Stedman distinguished himself while at College in English Composition and Greek; but fell into irregularities and dissipation, which brought about his "suspension" in the course of his junior year. After a term of study at Northampton, Massachusetts, he decided not to rejoin his class, but returned to Norwich, and at the age of nineteen became editor of a local paper in that place. The year following he married a young lady of Connecticut and removed to Litchfield county, purchasing the Winsted Herald, and successfully conducting it for two years. His spirited journalistic career, at this early age, made him a reputation in his own State; but in 1855 he removed to New York, to seek a larger and more congenial field.

Having inherited but a small portion of his grandfather's estate, he now underwent a severe struggle, between pride and poverty, in the city; but after many vicissitudes he gained the ear of the public with "The Diamond Wedding." This well-known satirical poem, "The Ballad of Lager Bier," and "How Old Brown took Harper's Ferry," appeared in rapid succession in The Tribune of 1859. These pieces attracted the attention of Mr. Dana, the editor, and led to an engagement on that paper, and to the issue of a volume of his verses: Poems, Lyric and Idyllic, 1860. It contained "Summer Rain" and "Heliotrope," with "Bohemia: a Pilgrimage," "Tribune Lyrics," etc.

In 1860 Mr. Stedman became connected with the New York World. At the outbreak of the rebellion he hastened to Washington, and for two years exerted himself as the editorial correspondent of that paper, serving through the McDowell and McClellan campaigns. His letters were widely copied in this country and Europe. His health failing, he accepted a confidential position in the office of the U. S. Attorney-General, Judge Bates. He returned to New York in 1864, and gave up daily journalism, to adopt a mercantile pursuit that would allow leisure for more mature composition. With this view he entered the New York Stock Exchange, and has since followed the calling of a broker,—devoting his spare time to study, poetry, and criticism.

In 1864, he published Alice of Monmouth: An Idyl of the Great War, and Other Poems; and five years later, The Blameless Prince, and Other Poems. These writings are marked by a refined and imaginative fancy, as well as by a union of vigor and spontaneity with precision of thought and art. Each new volume has shown a growth in poetic power. A choice edition of his complete Poetical Works, in one volume, was issued in 1873.

Mr. Stedman in 1872 delivered a poem, entitled "Gettysburg," before the annual reunion of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, at Cleveland, Ohio. In that year the corporation of Yale College, in recognition of his literary career, conferred on him the degree of A. M., and also enrolled him upon the list of alumni, as a graduate of his class of 1853. During the last ten years, he has paid much attention to critical writing, and his poems, æsthetic essays, etc., have been a frequent feature of our leading reviews and magazines. Among the more noticeable are a paper on "Tennyson and Theocritus" in the Atlantic Monthly, and a series of articles upon "Victorian Poets" in Scribner's Magazine. For a time he conducted the literary department of Putnam's Magazine. He still keeps his hold on journalism by contributions to the N. Y. Tribune, in which has appeared his touching poetic tribute to Horace Greeley. He is also a close student of classical literature, and has nearly completed a metrical translation of the Greek idyllic poets. With Mr. T. B. Aldrich, he edited in 1873 a volume of poetical selections, entitled Cameos, from the writings of Walter Savage Landor.

THE HEART OF NEW ENGLAND.

O long are years of waiting, when lovers' hearts are bound

By words that hold in life and death, and last the half-world round;

Long, long for him who wanders far and strives with all his main,

But crueler yet for her who bides at home and hides her pain!

And lone are the homes of New England.

'T was in the mellow summer I heard her sweet reply;

The barefoot lads and lasses a-berrying went by;
The locust dined amid the trees; the fields were high with corn;

The white-sailed clouds against the sky like ships were onward borne :

And blue are the skies of New England.

Her lips were like the raspberries ; her cheek was soft and fair,

And little breezes stopped to lift the tangle of her
hair ;

A light was in her hazel eyes, and she was nothing
loth

To hear the words her lover spoke, and pledged me there her troth ;

And true is the word of New England.

When September brought the golden-rod, and maples burned like fire,

And bluer than in August rose the village smoke and higher,

And large and red among the stacks the ripened pumpkins shone, —

One hour, in which to say farewell, was left to us alone ;

And sweet are the lanes of New England.

We loved each other truly ! hard, hard it was to part ;

But my ring was on her finger, and her hair lay next my heart.

“ ‘Tis but a year, my darling,” I said ; “ in one short year,

When our western home is ready, I shall seek my Katie here ;”

And brave is the hope of New England.

I went to gain a home for her, and in the Golden
State

With head and hand I planned and toiled, and early worked and late ;

But luck was all against me, and sickness on me
lay,

And ere I got my strength again 't was many a weary day ;

And long are the thoughts of New England.

And many a day, and many a month, and thrice
the rolling year,

I bravely strove, and still the goal seemed never yet more near.

My Katie's letters told me that she kept her promise true,

But now, for very hopelessness, my own to her were few ;

And stern is the pride of New England.

But still she trusted in me, though sick with hope deferred ;

No more among the village choir her voice was sweetest heard ;

For when the wild northeaster of the fourth long winter blew,

So thin her frame with pining, the cold wind pierced her through ;

And chill are the blasts of New England.

At last my fortunes bettered, on the far Pacific shore,

And I thought to see old Windham and my patient
love once more ;

When a kinsman's letter reached me : “ Come at once, or come too late !

Your Katie's strength is failing : if you love her,
do not wait :

Come back to the elms of New England.”

O, it wrung my heart with sorrow ! I left all else behind,

And straight for dear New England I speeded like the wind.

248

The day and night were blended till I reached my boyhood's home,

And the old cliffs seemed to mock me that I had not sooner come ;

And gray are the rocks of New England.

I could not think 't was Katie, who sat before me
there,

Reading her Bible — 't was my gift — and pillowed in her chair.

A ring, with all my letters, lay on a little stand, —
She could no longer wear it, so frail her poor, white hand !

But strong is the love of New England.

Her hair had lost its tangle and was parted off her brow ;

She used to be a joyous girl, — but seemed an angel now, —

Heaven's darling, mine no longer ; yet in her hazel eyes

The same dear love-light glistened, as she soothed
my bitter cries ;

And pure is the faith of New England.

A month I watched her dying, pale, pale as any rose

That drops its petals one by one and sweetens as it goes.

My life was darkened when at last her large eyes closed in death,

And I heard my own name whispered as she drew her parting breath ;

Still, still was the heart of New England.

It was a woful funeral the coming Sabbath-day ;
We bore her to the barren hill on which the graveyard lay ;

And when the narrow grave was filled, and what we might was done,

Of all the stricken group around I was the loneliest one ;

And drear are the hills of New England.

I gazed upon the stunted pines, the bleak November sky,

And knew that buried deep with her my heart
henceforth would lie ;

And waking in the solemn nights my thoughts
still thither go

To Katie, lying in her grave beneath the winter snow ;

And cold are the snows of New England.

 THE DOORSTEP.

The conference-meeting through at last,

We boys around the vestry waited

To see the girls come tripping past

Like snow-birds willing to be mated.

Not braver he that leaps the wall

By level musket-flashes litten,

Than I, who stepped before them all

Who longed to see me get the mitten.

But no, she blushed and took my arm !

We let the old folks have the highway,

And started toward the Maple Farm

Along a kind of lovers' by-way.

I can't remember what we said,

'T was nothing worth a song or story ;

Yet that rude path by which we sped

Seemed all transformed and in a glory.

The snow was crisp beneath our feet,

The moon was full, the fields were gleaming ;

By hood and tippet shiftered sweet,
Her face with youth and health was beaming.

The little hand outside her muff,—
O sculptor, if you could but mould it!
So lightly touched my jacket-cuff,
To keep it warm I had to hold it.

To have her with me there alone,—
'T was love and fear and triumph blended.
At last we reached the foot-worn stone
Where that delicious journey ended.

The old folks, too, were almost home;
Her dimpled hand the latches fingered,
We heard the voices nearer come,
Yet on the doorstep still we lingered.

She shook her ringlets from her hood
And with a "Thank you, Ned," dissembled,
But yet I knew she understood
With what a daring wish I trembled.

A cloud passed kindly overhead,
The moon was slyly peeping through it,
Yet hid its face, as if it said,
"Come, now or never! do it! do it!"

My lips till then had only known
The kiss of mother and of sister,
But somehow, full upon her own
Sweet, rosy, darling mouth,—I kissed her!

Perhaps 't was boyish love, yet still,—
O listless woman, weary lover!—
To feel once more that fresh, wild thrill
I'd give,—but who can live youth over?

 THE DUKE'S EXEQUY.

Arras, A. D. 1404.

Clothed in sable, crowned with gold,
All his wars and councils ended,
Philip lay, surnamed the Bold:
Passing-bell his quittance tolled,
And the chant of priests ascended.

Mailed knights and archers stand,
Thronging in the church of Arras;
Nevermore at his command
Shall they scour the Netherland,
Nevermore the outlaws harass;

Naught is left of his array
Save a barren territory;
Forty years of generous sway
Sped his princely hoards away,
Bartered all his gold for glory.

Forth steps Flemish Margaret then,
Striding toward the silent ashes;
And the eyes of armed men
Fill with startled wonder, when
On the bier her girdle clashes!

Swift she drew it from her waist,
And the purse and keys it carried
On the ducal coffin placed;
Then with proud demeanor faced
Sword and shield of him she married.

"No encumbrance of the dead
Must the living clog forever;
From thy debts and dues," she said,
"From the liens of thy bed,
We this day our line dis sever.

"From thy hand we gain release,
Know all present by this token!

Let the dead repose in peace,
Let the claims upon us cease
When the ties that bound are broken.

"Philip, we have loved thee long,
But, in years of future splendor,
Burgundy shall count among
Bravest deeds of tale and song
This, our widowhood's surrender."

Back the stately Duchess turned,
While the priests and friars chanted,
And the swinging incense burned:
Thus by feudal rite was earned
Greatness for a race undaunted.

 WHAT THE WINDS BRING.

Which is the Wind that brings the cold?
The North-Wind, Freddy, and all the snow;
And the sheep will scamper into the fold
When the North begins to blow.

Which is the Wind that brings the heat?
The South Wind, Katy; and corn will grow,
And peaches redder for you to eat,
When the South begins to blow.

Which is the Wind that brings the rain?
The East Wind, Arty; and farmers know
That cows come shivering up the lane
When the East begins to blow.

Which is the Wind that brings the flowers?
The West Wind, Bessy; and soft and low
The birdies sing in the summer hours
When the West begins to blow.

 "THE UNDISCOVERED COUNTRY."

Could we but know
The land that ends our dark, uncertain travel,
Where lie those happier hills and meadows low,—
Ah, if beyond the spirit's inmost cavel,
Aught of that country could we surely know,
Who would not go?

Might we but hear
The hovering angels' high imagined chorus,
Or catch, betimes, with wakeful eyes and clear,
One radiant vista of the realm before us,—
With one rapt moment given to see and hear,
Ah, who would fear?

Were we quite sure
To find the peerless friend who left us lonely,
Or there, by some celestial stream as pure,
To gaze in eyes that here were lovelit only,—
This weary mortal coil, were we quite sure,
Who would endure?

 ELISHA MULFORD,

THE author of one of the most valuable contributions to political philosophy made in this generation, is a native and resident of Montrose, Pennsylvania. He was born November 19, 1833. His father, Silvanus Sandford Mulford, is a descendant of William Mulford, who emigrated from England to Southampton, Long Island, in 1643.

Elisha received his preparatory education at Cortland Academy in Homer, New York, and entered Yale College, from which he was graduated in 1855. The year following he gave to the study of the law, in the office of his uncle, Hon. William Jessup. He then became a student of theology in New York and at Andover, and his education was continued in Germany, at Berlin and Heidelberg. This broad culture gave him a comprehensive view of politics and philosophy, and grounded his thoughts in the Catholic theology of the church.

In 1870, he published The Nation: the Foundations of Civil Order and Political Life in the United States. A "Students' Edition" appeared two years later. This work has been described by the Boston Advertiser as "not unworthy to be named with the Politics, The Republic, the Philosophie des Rechts, and the Spirit of Laws." Mr. J. Eliot Cabot, in Old and New, has also justly represented it as corresponding in the main with the idea of Aristotle and Hegel, but "a more adequate representation than before of the meaning and functions of the State."

Mr. Mulford received in 1872 the degree of LL. D., from Yale College. In the winter of the same year, he gave a course of lectures on "The Relations of Politics and Jurisprudence," before the Law School of Columbia College.

 GEORGE ARNOLD,

A NATIVE and journalist of New York city, was born June 24, 1834, and died at the age of thirty-one, at Strawberry Farms, in Monmouth county, New Jersey, November 9, 1865. His parents removed to Alton, in Illinois, when he was three years old, and there he lived twelve years. He never attended school, but was educated at home by his parents. The latter settled at Strawberry Farms in 1849, and there the young poet was brought in contact with the reformatory doctrines of the Fourierites, with which, however, he manifested little practical sympathy. At the age of eighteen, he began to study the art of painting; but he soon abandoned the pursuit as not the fittest for him, and became an excellent art-critic.

"His literary career," states his friend and biographer, Mr. William Winter, "extended over a period of about twelve years. In the course of that time he wrote, with equal fluency and versatility, stories, sketches, essays, poems, comic and satirical verses, criticisms of books and of pictures, editorial articles, jokes, and pointed paragraphs, — everything, in short, for which there is a demand in the literary magazines of the country, and in New York journalism." He contributed a series of "McArone papers" to Vanity Fair and other journals, from 1860 to 1865.

Two posthumous volumes of his poems were edited by Mr. Winter: Drift: a Sea-Shore Idyl, and Other Poems, 1866; and Poems, Grave and Gay, 1867. These pieces are marked by a simplicity of thought and treatment, and reveal a spirit keenly sympathetic to an ideal beauty and refinement, — such as Drift, My Love, Cui Bono? The Golden Fish, Jubilate, In the Dark, and an Autobiography

 DRIFT; A SEA-SHORE IDYL

I.

I wearied once of inland fields and hills,
Of low-lying meadows and of sluggish streams,

Creeping beneath the trees that summer-heats
Had parched to dusty dryness; and a dream
Of fresh, cool breezes and of salty waves,
Of azure skies o'erarching azure seas,
Of tangled seaweed from unfathomed deeps,
Came over me: and so I left the hills,
To sojourn through the riper summer months,
Upon the shore.

There, in a lonely house,
So near the breakers that their misty foam
Whitely enwrapped it when the storm raged high,
I let my summer-days pass idly by.
Yet not all idly: when the morn was fair,
And soft winds bore strange odors from the sea
Through open casements, oftentimes I wrote—
Weaving brief rhymes, disjointed, and, perhaps,
Too simple for the lovers of great poems.

A ship went sailing from the shore,
And vanished in the gleaming west,
Where purple clouds a lining bore
Of gold and amethyst.

Poised in the air, a sea-gull flashed
His white wings in the sun's last ray;
A moment hung, then downward dashed,
To revel in the spray.

The fishers drew their long nets in
With careful eye and steady hand,
Till olive back and silvery fin
Strewed all the tawny sand.

Again I trod the shore; again
The sea-gull circled high in air;
Again the sturdy fishermen
Drew in their nets with care.

The sunset's gold and amethyst
Shone fairly, as I paced the shore,
But back from out the gleaming west
The ship came — nevermore!

II.

After the first days, goodly company
Came to the lonely house beside the sea:
Bright eyes and tresses, voices of young girls,
Made joy within those somewhat mouldy halls;
And a piano, that had long stood mute
In the old parlor, on the landward side,
Grew musical and merry to the touch
Of jewelled fingers.

What rare days were those,
When my chief duty was to write a song,
As often as the brown-eyed Marian Grew weary of my last! And thus our time
Passed, smoothly as a river-current flows.
Music and reading, strolling on the beach,
Gathering colored pebble-stones and shells,
And sea-weed from the rocks beyond the bar,
Were all our pastime.

A flood of sunlight through a rift
Between two mounds of yellow sand;
Three sea-gulls on a bit of drift
Slow surging inward toward the land;

An old dumb beacon, all awry,
With drabbed sea-weed round its feet;
A star-like sail against the sky,
Where sapphire heaven and ocean meet

This, with the waters swirling o'er
A shifting stretch of sand and shell,
Will make, for him who loves the shore,
A picture that may please him well.

III.

Ere the sun went down

We mostly loved to linger by the sea,
Where, seated on some wave-worn slab of stone,
We watched the furrowed waves that rose and fell,
Chasing each other down the beaten strand;
But when the shadows lengthened toward the east,
And the red glory of the sunset shone
Upon the light-house, and the fading sails,
The yellow sand-hills with their sickly grass
And inland-leaning cedars, we returned
To the old parlor: and, as dusk came on,
Sang to each other till the moon rode high.

The light-house keeper's daughter,—
Her hair is golden as the sand;
Her eyes are blue as summer-seas
That melt into the land.

Her brow and neck are whiter
Than sea-foam flying on the wind,
Her mouth is rosy as the shells
That strew the coast of Ind.

The winds caress her ringlets
That down her neck in clusters stray,
And frothy waves flow tenderly
About her feet in play.

I love this simple maiden,
She grows upon me more and more,
And—ask the moon who 't was that kissed,
Last night, upon the shore!

IV.

At times, when moonlight danced upon the sea,
And all the air was musical with sounds
Of waters slowly breaking on the beach,
We sought the bar, and climbed its farthest rocks,
Against whose weedy feet the waves uprose
In phosphorescent foam; and, seated there,
The maidens picturesquely grouped around,
We talked philosophy, or told quaint tales
Of most romantic sort,—of ghosts and ghouls,
Of strange things seen by those whom we had known;
Of strange things we, perchance, ourselves had seen;
Of marvels told by ancient mariners,
The Maelstrom, and the heaven-dropped waterspouts,—
Or sadder tales, of wrecks far out at sea,
Of missing vessels, and of sailors drowned.

The river down to the ocean flows
By reedy flats and marshes bare;
And the leafless poplars stand in rows
Like ghostly sentinels watching there.

An osprey sails, with wings spread wide,
Down-slanting from his even flight,
To a sedgy spot, where the falling tide
Has left some kind of drift in sight.

A blackened mass, by the tide left bare,
In the tangled weeds and the slimy mud.
The osprey shrieks as he settles there,
And a deathly horror chills my blood!

V.

So passed the summer, and we had our fill
Of lotos-eating by the ocean side;
We came to know and love each pleasant spot
About the place; the sheltered nooks where grew Dwarfed flowers, whose downy seeds had come,
mayhap,
Upon the wings of Autumn's winds upborne,

A thousand miles, to drop, and germinate,
In the dry sand; to grow, and blow, and bloom,
And then to wither—'t were a happy fate—
In brown-eyed Marian's bosom. And we knew
Each craggy rock that overhung the sea,
Whence we could gaze far out across the waste
Of heaving waters, dotted here and there
With sails that shone and glimmered in the sun,
Like planets in a mellow evening sky.
Sometimes we went adventurously forth
When northeast tempests raged along the coast,
Flinging the white foam upward in great sheets,
Like hungry monsters rushing from the deep
To swallow up the land.

Then, bits of wrecks,
Odd timbers spiked with rusty iron bolts,
Fragments of masts, and empty water-casks,—
Sad débris of the storm,—came up next day,
Drifting ashore on smooth, unbroken swells.

Oh, cool, green waves that ebb and flow,
Reflecting calm, blue skies above,
How gently now ye come and go,
Since ye have drowned my love!

Ye lap the shore of beaten sand,
With cool, salt ripples circling by;
But from your depths a ghostly hand
Points upward to the sky.

O waves! strew corals white and red,
With shells and strange weeds from the deep,

To make a rare and regal bed
Whereon my love may sleep:

May sleep, and, sleeping, dream of me,
In dreams that lovers find so sweet;
And I will couch me by the sea,
That we in dreams may meet.

VI.

But, while the pleasant season lasted still,
My friends deserted me for other scenes,
Leaving me lonely in the lonely house,
With memory's ghosts to bear me company.
Alone I sang the plaintive little songs,
That brown-eyed Marian had sung with me:
Alone I trod the path along the shore,
Where we so often had together strolled:
Alone I watched the moonrise, from the rocks
Where Marian had erstwhile walked with me,
To let the salt breeze, freshening with the night,
Play in her ringlets, and bring up the bloom
Of rose and lily to her cheek.

Alas!

If I should tell the whole of what I felt,
In waking these dear memories of the past,
This simple idyl would be lengthened out
Into a history of two hearts, that met—
That met—and parted!

Ah! the theme is old,
And worn quite threadbare,—not alone in books,
But in the hearts of men and maids as well.
But then, all stories that are true are old.

The breakers come and the breakers go,
Along the silvery sand,
With a changing line of feathery snow,
Between the water and land.

Sea-weeds gleam in the sunset light,
On the ledges of wave-worn stone;
Orange and crimson, purple and white,
In regular windrows strewn.

The waves grow calm in the dusk of eve,
 When the wind goes down with the sun;
 So fade the smiles of those who deceive,
 When the coveted heart is won.

This sea-weed wreath that hangs on the wall,
 She twined one day by the sea:
 Of the weeds, and the waves, and her love, it is all
 That the Past has left to me!

THE GOLDEN FISH.

Love is a little golden fish,
 Wondrous shy . . . ah, wondrous shy . . .
 You may catch him, if you wish,
 He might make a dainty dish . . .
 But I . . .
 Ah, I've other fish to fry!

For when I try to snare this prize,
 Earnestly, and patiently,
 All my skill the rogue defies,
 Lurking safe in Aimée's eyes . . .
 So you see,
 I am caught, and love goes free!

IN THE DARK.*

All moveless stand the ancient cedar-trees
 Along the drifted sand-hills where they grow;
 And from the dark west comes a wandering breeze,
 And waves them to and fro.

A murky darkness lies along the sand,
 Where bright the sunbeams of the morning shone;
 And the eye vainly seeks by sea and land,
 Some light to rest upon.

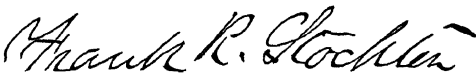

No large, pale star its glimmering vigil keeps;
 An inky sea reflects an inky sky;
 And the dark river, like a serpent, creeps
 To where its black piers lie.

Strange, salty odors through the darkness steal,
 And through the dark the ocean-thunders roll.
 Thick darkness gathers, stifling, till I feel
 Its weight upon my soul!

I stretch my hands out in the empty air;
 I strain my eyes into the heavy night;
 Blackness of darkness! . . . Father, hear my prayer . . .
 Grant me to see the light!

FRANK R. STOCKTON,

A CONTRIBUTOR to the leading magazines, and the writer of some pleasing fairy stories, was born in Philadelphia in 1834. At the age of eighteen, he graduated at the Philadelphia High School, an institution possessing a college charter. He gave several years to designing and engraving on wood, but relinquished that pursuit to engage in literary labor. He has been connected editorially with the Philadelphia Post and Hearth and Home, and is now attached to Scribner's Monthly. Ting-a-Ling, a series of fairy tales written for the Riverside, was issued in book-form in 1869. The same magazine also contained The House that John Built, a story of adventure for boys. Another set of giant and pigmy adventurers also appeared in Hearth and Home. To the Southern Literary Messenger he contributed several novelettes, besides a number of humorous sketches to Punchinello and like journals. His stories are direct and clear in method and style, while their humor is quiet, picturesque, and quaint. His latest work is Round-About Rambles, an illustrated book of sketches for the young folks.

* His last poem, written within a few days of his death.

LUCY HAMILTON HOOPER,

A LADY of culture, and the author of several volumes of Poems, is a native of Philadelphia, and the only child of the late B. Muse Jones, a well-known merchant of that city. She was married to Mr. Robert M. Hooper in 1854. Her fugitive verses were first collected into a volume in 1864, entitled: Poems: with Translations from the German of Geibel and Others. She gave the first hundred copies of that edition to the Great Central Fair in Philadelphia for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission, at which she was chairman of the Ladies' Committee on Booksellers and Publishers. In conjunction with Mr. Charles G. Leland, she also edited Our Daily Fare, the daily chronicle of the Fair.

Mrs. Hooper was for two years assistant editor of Lippincott's Magazine. She is a constant contributor to it, as well as to the Galaxy, and other leading periodicals. A second and complete volume of her Poems was published by the Messrs. Lippincott in 1871. It contains some eighty pieces, a third of which are spirited translations, chiefly from the German of Geibel, and including The Fisher, and The King of Thulé, from Goethe, Thekla by Schiller, with several from Victor Hugo—his Lines written in a copy of the Divina Commedia, A Legend of the Centuries, etc. Among the favorites of the original poems are, Princess and Page, the Duel, On an Old Portrait, Gretchen, Autumnal Lyrics, the King's Ride, Miserrimus, and Too Late.

THE DUEL.

You need not turn so pale, love; I'm unhurt.
 We quarreled at the opera last night
 About some trifle. Nay, I scarce know what.
 We men will quarrel for the merest slight.
 We settled time, place, weapon on the spot;
 Bois de Boulogne, this morning, pistols—well,—
 I fear that you are cold, you shudder so,—
 At the first shot my adversary fell,
 Shot through the heart stone-dead. Nay, now don't faint!

I hate a fainting woman. Here's your fan;
 A little water? So you're better now.
 Pray, hear my story out, love, if you can.
 I think he uttered something as he fell:
 A woman's name—I scarcely caught the sound:
 It passed so quickly that I am not sure,
 For he was dead before he reached the ground.

Ah, poor de Courcy! Handsome, was he not?
 A favorite with the ladies, I believe.
 They'll miss him sadly. More than one fair dame
 Will o'er his sudden fate in secret grieve.

How well he looked this morning, as he stood
 Waiting my fire with such a careless grace,
 The breezes playing with his raven curls,
 The sunshine lighting up his gay bright face!
 Suppose my hand had trembled? If it had,
 I would have fallen instead of him. You're white
 At the bare thought. Nay, here I am, quite well,
 And ready for the opera to night.
 Ronconi plays, and I would like to see
 "Marie de Rohan" once or twice again.
 His acting as De Chevreuse is sublime;
 How he portrays the jealous husband's pain!
 All husbands have not such a wife as you,
 Fair as the sun, and chaste as winter's moon!
 How very pale you still are, dearest wife!
 There is no danger of another swoon?
 How wrong I was to tell you I had fought;
 I think you've scarce recovered from the shock.
 One kiss upon your brow, and then I'll go;
 And pray be ready, love, at eight o'clock!

 ON AN OLD PORTRAIT.

Eyes that outsmiled the morn,
 Behind your golden lashes,
 What are your fires now?
 Ashes!

Cheeks that outblushed the rose,
 White arms and snowy bust,
 What is your beauty now?
 Dust!

 THE KING'S RIDE.

Above the city of Berlin,
 Shines soft the summer day,
 And near the royal palace shout
 The schoolboys at their play.
 Sudden the mighty palace gates
 Unclasp their portals wide,
 And forth into the sunshine see
 A single horseman ride.
 A bent old man in plain attire;
 No glitt'ring courtiers wait,
 No armed guard attends the steps
 Of Frederick the Great!
 The boys have spied him, and with shouts
 The summer breezes ring.
 The merry urchins haste to greet
 Their well-beloved king.
 Impeding e'en his horse's tread,
 Presses the joyous train;
 And Prussia's despot frowns his best,
 And shakes his stick in vain.
 The frowning look, the angry tone,
 Are feigned, full well they know.
 They do not fear his stick — that hand
 Ne'er struck a coward blow.
 "Be off to school, you boys!" he cries.
 "Ho! ho!" the laughers say,
 "A pretty king you not to know
 We've holiday to-day!"
 And so upon that summer day,
 Those children at his side,
 The symbol of his nation's love,
 Did royal Frederick ride.
 O Kings! your thrones are tott'ring now!
 Dark frowns the brow of Fate!
 When did you ride as rode that day
 King Frederick the Great?

 PRINCESS AND PAGE.

I.

Spring in France is sunny and fair,
 Spring's sweet odors enchant the air.
 Into the Louvre's casement wide
 Poureth the sunshine's golden tide.
 Princess Marguerite standeth there,
 Jeweled daisies amid her hair.
 She glances down and whispers low,
 "Who is the page that waits below?"
 "Yon handsome youth with joyous air,
 With broad white brow and shining hair."
 The page looks up — his eager glance
 Rests on the fairest face in France.
 Glance answers glance with meaning sweet,
 Fair page — fair Princess Marguerite.

II.

The summer's scented zephyrs glide
 Into the Louvre's casement wide.
 Summer's sunshine in golden sheen Glimmers around Queen Catharine.
 "What handsome page," she mutters low,
 "Is he that waiteth now below?"
 "The velvet cap that crowns his curls
 Is clasped with a daisy wrought of pearls.
 "Last night he sang an old song sweet,
 'Si douce, si douce, est la Marguerite.'
 "I hear and heed; so have a care,
 My handsome page — my daughter fair!"

III.

The autumn winds chant wild refrain
 Above the dark and sullen Seine.
 A pallid moon with spectral light
 Changes to ghostly day the night.
 Over the river's bosom spread,
 Widens a stain of fearful red:
 Out of the depths there rises now
 A pale dead face with cloven brow,
 And tangled 'mid the blood-stained curls
 There gleams a daisy wrought of pearls.

 MISERRIMUS.

I shaped a fair and stately sepulchre
 From pallid marble of Pentelicus,
 And on the door I 'graved a single word,
 "Miserrimus."
 And then I cried, "Whom shall I bid to rest
 In this fair tomb, that I have shapen thus?
 What dead man claims the crown of wretchedness—
 "Miserrimus?"
 I wandered forth amid the midnight graves,
 I called upon the sleepers to arise,
 And the long-buried dead came forth, and gazed
 With dim, unseeing eyes.
 I asked a youth, upon whose ashen lips
 The wine-cup stain yet lingered, "Is 't thus That those have died who name themselves in death
 Miserrimus?"

A sudden tremor shook the shrouded form,
 And something like to life-breath heaved the breast:

"Blest was the death that said, 'Go, sin no more.
God loveth us. We rest.'"

I passed to where a youthful lover lay,
By death divided from his love. "And thus,"
I cried, "he slumbers who in death is named Miserrimus."

And lo! a voice from out the stony lips
Replied, "O mortal, wherefore judge of Fate?
We are but parted for a fleeting space.
God loveth us. We wait."

And then I lingered where a hero lay,
One of the world's predestined rulers. "He,
Who might have won a crown, yet lieth low,
Must taste death's misery."

Again an answer from the realms of death:
"Who plucks the Dead Sea fruit shall never keep.
What though the ashes all untasted fell,
God loveth me. I sleep."

And then I moaned, "Shall I no tenant find
For this fair tomb that I have shapen thus?
God giveth His beloved sleep. Where lies
Miserrimus?"

And lo! an aged man, upon whose brow
The life yet lingered, slowly came to me,
And said, in broken accents, "Yonder word
Befits my misery.

"Mine are the days that bring no joy or hope,
The grass is green above the lips I pressed;
I have outlived all love and all delight,
And have not yet found rest.

"Yes, I, the living, well may claim to dwell
Behind yon pale slab from Pentelicus.
Who hopeth not, nor resteth, thou may'st name
Miserrimus."

 HARRIET P. SPOFFORD.

HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, a writer of brilliant novelettes and stories, who has contributed to all the leading magazines, is the daughter of Joseph N. Prescott, of Calais,

Harriet P. Spofford.

Maine. She was born in that town, April 3, 1835. In her childhood, she became a resident at Newburyport, Massachusetts, and graduated at the Putnam Free School. After spending three years at an academy in Derry, New Hampshire, she returned to Newburyport, where she was married to Mr. Richard S. Spofford, a lawyer who practices at the Boston bar.

Her first notable sketch, In a Cellar, a leaf from the eventful life of a diplomat at Paris, appeared in the Atlantic in 1858. Sir Rohan's Ghost, her first romance, a story of crime and its retribution, was printed the year following. The Amber Gods, and Other Stories, a collection of seven tales contributed to the Atlantic, appeared in 1863; and Azarian: An Episode, in 1864. Seven years later a volume of New England Legends was published, containing a series of old time reminiscences connected with Charlestown, Salem, Newburyport, Dover, and Portsmouth. In 1872 appeared

The Thief in the Night, a novelette artistic in its unity of action, though perhaps somewhat overcharged with an intensity of passionate incident, the plot turning upon a suspected midnight murder of a husband by his wife, for the sake of a lover.

 SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS,

Who is widely known by his signature of "Mark Twain," an American humorist of decided and peculiar originality, and the possessor of a descriptive style of great vigor and clearness, was born in the village of Florida, Monroe County, Missouri, November 30, 1835. His only schooling was in the ordinary district school at Hannibal, from the age of five to thirteen, when he was apprenticed to the printing business in a newspaper office of that town. He worked at his trade in St. Louis, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, and New York, after the manner of travelling journeymen, and was a member of the Typographical Union, though under age. At the age of twenty he started for New Orleans, with a capital of about twelve dollars, after paying his steamboat fare, and the intention of shipping thence for the port of Para, exploring the Amazon, and opening up a trade in coca, which he had understood was the concentrated bread and meat of the tribes about the head waters of the river. This commercial venture was frustrated by finding that no vessel was likely to leave New Orleans for Para during the next generation; but he had the comfort of knowing that he had not arrived too late, if he had arrived too soon, for no vessel had ever left New Orleans for Para in preceding generations.

Mark Twain.

Having made the acquaintance of some pilots and learned to steer on the way down, he de-terminated to become a Mississippi river pilot. The members of the craft agreed to teach him for $500 on graduation; and for eighteen months he went up and down, studying the river night and day, and supporting himself by helping the freight clerks and standing tricks with the shore watchmen. Obtaining his license as a pilot, he had steady work at a salary of $250 a month, a princely sum in those days of low wages to mechanics. While he was still an apprentice, there was on the river a noted pilot, Capt. Isaiah Sellers, who wrote paragraphs occasionally for the New Orleans papers signed "Mark Twain"—the leadman's term signifying a depth of two fathoms of water. Sellers was an aggravation to all the other pilots, by reason of his assumption of ancient knowledge of the river. If it was high water, he would say it was higher than he had ever seen it before since 18—, naming a date before any other man on the river was born; and he was always referring to islands which nobody had ever heard of before, and naively adding that they had washed away in such and such a remote generation. He was a nuisance to all the other pilots who wanted to be considered veterans. The first literary venture of young Clemens was a communication a column and a half in length to the New Orleans True Delta, under a fictitious signature, in which he ante-dated Capt. Sellers about sixty years, recalling high and low water which belittled his most marvellous recollections, and introducing islands which had joined the mainland and become territories and States before he was born. The communication squelched Capt. Sellers; he never wrote again, and Clemens became the pet of the river men.

Early in 1861 Mr. Clemens went to Nevada as private secretary to his brother, who was appointed Secretary of the Territory. His adventures there are graphically related in his volume called "Roughing It." He had the silver fever, and fought the mines with pick and spade for a year or more, and was actually, as he relates in his book, the owner of a claim worth a million dollars for several days, but lost it by his heedlessness in not taking some necessary steps to secure it. Plunged at once from riches to poverty, he hired out to shovel quartz in a silver mill, at ten dollars a week, but resigned at the end of a week, with the consent and even gratitude of the entire mill company. Meantime he had written an occasional letter to the Virginia City Enterprise, and in 1862-3 he became its city editor, at $25 a week, and continued in that post for three years. In reporting the legislative proceedings, and writing a weekly letter summing up results, which was no doubt rather personal in its comments, he needed a signature, and at the nick of time hearing of the death of Capt. Sellers, he appropriated the nom de plume of "Mark Twain," which he has since been identified with.

When the silver collapse came, he went to San Francisco and reported for five months on the Morning Call; became lazy or enterprising, and travelled to Calaveras county and worked at surface gold digging for three months without result. Returning to San Francisco, he lived by reporting and sketch writing till early in 1866, when he visited the Sandwich Islands and remained there six months, writing diligently to the Sacramento Union. Coming back he found he had a high Pacific coast reputation, and he lectured with great success in California and Nevada. He went East with a pocket-book much fuller than it was accustomed to be: In the spring of 1867 The Jumping Frog and Other Sketches was published in New York. It had a fair sale in this country, and a better in England, where it was reprinted.

In 1868 Mr. Clemens made a pilgrimage, with a party of excursionists in the Quaker City, to the Mediterranean and the Holy Land. He corresponded during his absence with the San Francisco Alta and the New York Tribune; and upon his return he published, in 1869, a very humorous and picturesque account of his travels, called The Innocents Abroad, an illustrated octavo volume of 650 pages, which sold 125,000 copies in three years. In 1869-70 he lectured everywhere to large audiences in the Northern States. In March, 1872, he published Roughing It, in the main a true account of his Pacific coast experiences, with exact pictures of a wild frontier society—an illustrated octavo volume of 600 pages, which sold 91,000 copies in nine months. The fall of 1872 Mr. Clemens spent in England. He was married in 1870 to Olivia L., daughter of Jervis Langdon, Esq., of Elmira, New York. His residence is Hartford, Connecticut.

All the books of Mr. Clemens have been reprinted in England, most of them by two publishers, who have gathered together, besides, four volumes of sketches, many of which have not been in book form here. The author was most cordially received in England, where his writings are in great favor. Tauchnitz proposes to issue his books complete in English on the Continent; and a translation of The Innocents, to be followed by others, is now being made into German.

Mr. Clemens and Mr. Charles D. Warner wrote in 1873 a joint novel, The Gilded Age,—a social and political satire of the times.

 THE PONY EXPRESS — FROM ROUGHING IT.

In a little while all interest was taken up in stretching our necks for the "pony-rider"—the fleet messenger who sped across the continent from St. Joe to Sacramento, carrying letters nineteen hundred miles in eight days! Think of that for perishable horse and human flesh and blood to do! The pony-rider was usually a little bit of a man, brimful of spirit and endurance. No matter what time of the day or night his watch came on, and no matter whether it was winter or summer, raining, snowing, hailing, or sleeting, or whether his "bent" was a level straight road or a crazy trail over mountain crags and precipices, or whether it led through peaceful regions or regions that swarmed with hostile Indians, he must be always ready to leap into the saddle and be off like the wind! There was no idling-time for a pony-rider on duty. He rode fifty miles without stopping, by daylight, moonlight, starlight, or through the blackness of darkness—just as it happened. He rode a splendid horse that was born for a racer and was fed and lodged like a gentleman; kept him at his utmost speed for ten miles, and then, as he came crashing up to the station where stood two men holding fast a fresh, impatient steed, the transfer of rider and mail-bag was made in the twinkling of an eye, and away flew the eager pair and were out of sight before the spectator could get hardly the ghost of a look. Both rider and horse went "flying light." The rider's dress was thin, and fitted close; he wore a "roundabout," and a skull-cap, and tucked his pantaloons into his boot-tops like a race-rider. He carried no arms—he carried nothing that was not absolutely necessary, for even the postage on his literary freight was worth five dollars a letter. He got but little frivolous correspondence to carry—his bag had business letters in it, mostly. His horse was stripped of all unnecessary weight, too. He wore a little wafer of a racing-saddle, and no visible blanket. He wore light shoes, or none at all. The little flat mail-pockets strapped under the rider's thighs would each hold about the bulk of a child's primer. They held many and many an important business chapter and newspaper letter, but these were written on paper as airy and thin as gold-leaf, neatly, and thus bulk and weight were economized. The stage-coach travelled about a hundred to a hundred and twenty-five miles a day (twenty-four hours), the pony-rider about two hundred and fifty. There were about eighty pony-riders in the saddle all the time, night and day, stretching in a long, scattering procession from Missouri to California, forty flying eastward, and forty towards the west, and among them making four hundred gallant horses earn a stirring livelihood and see a deal of scenery every single day in the year.

We had had a consuming desire, from the beginning, to see a pony-rider, but somehow or other all that passed us and all that met us managed to streak by in the night, and so we heard only a whiz and a hail, and the swift phantom of the desert was gone before we could get our heads out of the windows. But now we were expecting one along every moment, and would see him in broad daylight. Presently the driver exclaims:

"HERE HE COMES!"

Every neck is stretched further, and every eye strained wider. Away across the endless dead level of the prairie a black speck appears against the sky, and it is plain that it moves. Well, I should think so! In a second or two it becomes a horse and rider, rising and falling, rising and falling—sweeping toward us nearer and nearer—growing more and more distinct, more and more sharply defined—nearer and still nearer. And the flutter of the hoofs comes faintly to the ear—another instant a whoop and a hurrah from our upper deck, a wave of the rider's hand, but no reply, and man and horse burst past our excited faces, and go winging away like a belated fragment of a storm!

So sudden is it all, and so like a flash of unreal fancy, that but for the flake of white foam left quivering and perishing on a mail-sack after the vision had flashed by and disappeared, we might have doubted whether we had seen any actual horse and man at all, may be.

THE EUROPEAN GUIDES—FROM THE INNOCENTS ABROAD.

Guides know about enough English to tangle everything up so that a man can make neither head or tail of it. They know their story by heart—the history of every statue, painting, cathedral or other wonder they show you. They know it and tell it as a parrot would—and if you interrupt, and throw them off the track, they have to go back and begin over again. All their lives long, they are employed in showing strange things to foreigners and listening to their bursts of admiration. It is human nature to take delight in exciting admiration. It is what prompts children to say "smart" things, and do absurd ones, and in other ways "show off" when company is present. It is what makes gossips turn out in rain and storm to go and be the first to tell a startling bit of news. Think, then, what a passion it becomes with a guide, whose privilege it is, every day, to show to strangers wonders that throw them into perfect ecstasies of admiration! He gets so that he could not by any possibility live in a soberer atmosphere. After we discovered this, we never went into ecstasies any more—we never admired anything—we never showed any but impassable faces and stupid indifference in the presence of the sublimest wonders a guide had to display. We had found their weak point. We have made good use of it ever since. We have made some of those people savage, at times, but we have never lost our own serenity.

The doctor asks the questions, generally, because he can keep his countenance, and look more like an inspired idiot, and throw more imbecility into the tone of his voice than any man that lives. It comes natural to him.

The guides in Genoa are delighted to secure an American party, because Americans so much wonder, and deal so much in sentiment and emotion before any relic of Columbus. Our guide there fidgeted about as if he had swallowed a spring mattress. He was full of animation—full of impatience he said:

"Come wis me, genteelmen!—come! I show you ze letter writing by Christopher Colombo—write it himself!—write it wis his own hand!—come!"

He took us to the municipal palace. After much impressive fumbling of keys and opening of locks, the stained and aged document was spread before us. The guide's eyes sparkled. He danced about us and tapped the parchment with his finger:

"What I tell you, genteelmen! Is it not so? See! handwriting Christopher Colombo!—write it himself!"

We looked indifferent—unconcerned. The doctor examined the document very deliberately, during a painful pause.—Then he said, without any show of interest:

"Ah—Ferguson—what—what did you say was the name of the party who wrote this?"

"Christopher Colombo! ze great Christopher Colombo!"

Another deliberate examination.

"Ah—did he write it himself, or— or how?"

"He write it himself!—Christopher Colombo! he's own handwriting, write by himself!"

Then the doctor laid the document down and said:

"Why, I have seen boys in America only four-teen years old that could write better than that."

"But zis is ze great Christo—"

"I don't care who it is! It's the worst writing I ever saw. Now you mustn't think you can impose on us because we are strangers. We are not fools, by a good deal. If you have got any specimens of penmanship of real merit, trot them out—and if you haven't, drive on!"

He drove on. The guide was considerably shaken up, but he made one more venture. He had something which he thought would overcome us. He said:

"Ah, gentlemen, you come wis me! I show you beautiful, O magnificent bust Christopher Colombo!—splendid, grand, magnificent!"

He brought us before the beautiful bust—for it was beautiful—and sprang back and struck an attitude:

"Ah, look, gentlemen!—beautiful, grand,—bust Christopher Colombo!—beautiful bust, beautiful pedestal!"

The doctor put up his eye-glass—procured for such occasions:

"Ah—what did you say this gentleman's name was?"

"Christopher Colombo!—ze great Christopher Colombo!"

"Christopher Colombo—the great Christopher Colombo. Well, what did he do?"

"Discover America!—discover America. Oh, ze devil!"

"Discover America. No—that statement will hardly wash. We are just from America ourselves. We heard nothing about it. Christopher Colombo—pleasant name—is—is he dead?"

"Oh, corpo di Baccho!—three hundred year!"

"What did he die of?"

"I do not know!—I can not tell."

"Small-pox, think?"

"I do not know, gentlemen!—I do not know what he die of!"

"Measles, likely?"

"May be—may be—I do not know—I think he die of somethings."

"Parents living?"

"Im-posseeble!"

"Ah—which is the bust and which is the pedestal?"

"Santa Maria!—zis ze bust!—zis ze pedestal!"

"Ah, I see, I see—happy combination—very happy combination, indeed. Is—is this the first time this gentleman was ever on a bust?"

That joke was lost on the foreigner—guides cannot master the subtleties of the American joke.

We have made it interesting for this Roman guide. Yesterday we spent three or four hours in the Vatican, again, that wonderful world of curiosities. We came very near expressing interest, sometimes—even admiration—it was very hard to keep from it. We succeeded though. Nobody else ever did, in the Vatican museums. The guide was bewildered—non-plussed. He walked his legs off, nearly, hunting up extraordinary things, and exhausted all his ingenuity on us, but it was a failure; we never showed any interest in anything. He had reserved what he considered to be his greatest wonder to the last—a royal Egyptian mummy, the best preserved in the world, perhaps. He took us there. He felt so sure, this time, that some of his old enthusiasm came back to him:

"See, gentlemen!—Mummy! Mummy!"

The eye-glass came up as calmly, as deliberately as ever.

"Ah,—Ferguson—what did I understand you to say the gentleman's name was?"

"Name?—he got no name!—Mummy—'Gyp-tian Mummy!'"

"Yes, yes. Born here?"

"No! 'Gyp-tian mummy!"

"Ah, just so. Frenchman, I presume?"

"No!—not Frenchman, not Roman!—born in Egypta!"

"Born in Egypta. Never heard of Egypta before. Foreign locality, likely. Mummy—mummy. How calm he is—how self-possessed. Is, ah—is he dead?"

"Oh, sacre bleu, been dead three thousand year!"

The doctor turned on him savagely:

"Here, now, what do you mean by such conduct as this! Playing us for Chinamen because we are strangers and trying to learn! Trying to impose your vile second-hand carcasses on us!—thunder and lightning, I've a notion to—to—if you've got a nice fresh corpse, fetch him out!—or by George we'll brain you!"

We make it exceedingly interesting for this Frenchman. However, he has paid us back, partly, without knowing it. He came to the hotel this morning to ask if we were up, and he endeavored as well as he could to describe us, so that the landlord would know which persons he meant. He finished with the casual remark that we were lunatics. The observation was so innocent and so honest that it amounted to a very good thing for a guide to say.

 AT THE GRAVE OF ADAM—FROM THE INNOCENTS ABROAD.

The Greek Chapel is the most roomy, the richest and the showiest chapel in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Its altar, like that of all the Greek churches, is a lofty screen that extends clear across the chapel, and is gorgeous with gilding and pictures. The numerous lamps that hang before it are of gold and silver, and cost great sums.

But the feature of the place is a short column that rises from the middle of the marble pavement of the chapel, and marks the exact centre of the earth. The most reliable traditions tell us that this was known to be the earth's centre, ages ago, and that when Christ was upon earth he set all doubts upon the subject at rest forever, by stating with his own lips that the tradition was correct. Remember, He said that that particular column stood upon the centre of the world. If the centre of the world changes, the column changes its position accordingly. This column has moved three different times, of its own accord. This is because, in great convulsions of nature, at three different times, masses of the earth—whole ranges of mountains, probably—have flown off into space, thus lessening the diameter of the earth, and changing the exact locality of its centre by a point or two. This is a very curious and interesting circumstance, and is a withering rebuke to those philosophers who would make us believe that it is not possible for any portion of the earth to fly off into space.

To satisfy himself that this spot was really the centre of the earth, a skeptic once paid well for the privilege of ascending to the dome of the church to see if the sun gave him a shadow at noon. He came down perfectly convinced. The day was very cloudy and the sun threw no shadows at all; but the man was satisfied that if the sun had come out and made shadows it could not have made any for him. Proofs like these are not to be set aside by the idle tongues of cavilers. To such as are not bigoted, and are willing to be convinced, they carry a conviction that nothing can ever shake.

If even greater proofs than those I have mentioned are wanted, to satisfy the headstrong and the foolish that this is the genuine centre of the earth, they are here. The greatest of them lies in the fact that from under this column was taken the dust from which Adam was made. This can surely be regarded in the light of a settler. It is not likely that the original first man would have been made from an inferior quality of earth when it was entirely convenient to get first quality from the world's centre. This will strike any reflecting mind forcibly. That Adam was formed of dirt procured in this very spot is amply proven by the fact that in six thousand years no man has ever been able to prove that the dirt was not procured here whereof he was made.

It is a singular circumstance that right under the roof of this same great church, and not far away from that illustrious column, Adam himself, the father of the human race, lies buried. There is no question that he is actually buried in the grave which is pointed out as his—there can be none—because it has never yet been proven that that grave is not the grave in which he is buried.

The tomb of Adam! How touching it was, here in a land of strangers, far away from home, and friends, and all who cared for me, thus to discover the grave of a blood relation. True, a distant one, but still a relation. The unerring instinct of nature thrilled its recognition. The fountain of my filial affection was stirred to its profoundest depths, and I gave way to tumultuous emotion. I leaned upon a pillar and burst into tears. I deem it no shame to have wept over the grave of my poor dead relative. Let him who would sneer at my emotion close this volume here, for he will find little to his taste in my journeyings through Holy Land. Noble old man—he did not live to see me—he did not live to see his child. And I—I—alas, I did not live to see him. Weighed down by sorrow and disappointment, he died before I was born—six thousand brief summers before I was born. But let us try to bear it with fortitude. Let us trust that he is better off, where he is. Let us take comfort in the thought that his loss is our eternal gain.

* JOHN JAMES PIATT,

A POET who has written chiefly on the themes of his native West, is of French descent, his ancestors having emigrated to the island of San Domingo early in the eighteenth century, and afterward removed to New Jersey, shortly before the Revolutionary war. His great-grandfather, Captain William Piatt, served with the patriot forces, was a member of the Society of the Cincinnati, and was killed in St. Clair's defeat by the Indians. His grandfather, James Piatt, raised and commanded a company in the war of 1812, had charge of a garrison at Ellis Island, in the harbor of New York city, and was in the battle of Plattsburg. His father, John B. Piatt, a native of New York, married Miss Emily Scott of Philadelphia, and settled in a small village now known as Milton, in Dearborn county, Indiana, where his son was born, March 1, 1835. The latter received his earliest schooling at Rising Sun, an Indiana town on the Ohio River, and in his tenth year was removed to Columbus. After three years tuition in that city, another removal a few miles northward gave him some experience in the old-fashioned Western log school-house. At the age of fourteen, he was set to learn the printing business in the office of the Ohio State Journal, published then by his uncle, Charles Scott. He subsequently, for brief periods, attended the Columbus High School, the Capital University, and Kenyon College, up to the age of eighteen, when he first began to write verses. In 1856, he accompanied his father and family to Illinois, where he assisted in building a house and enclosing a prairie farm.

John F. Piatt.

Mr. Piatt was led to contribute poems to the Louisville Journal in 1857, through the medium of a college-mate living in that city; and in 1859 he became associated in a confidential capacity with the late George D. Prentice,—who proved a steadfast friend,—as well as a writer of editorial and other articles for that paper. In January, 1860, he published at Columbus, with Mr. W. D. Howells, Poems of Two Friends. Its pages contain the earlier drafts of some verses that reappear, the clearer and mellowed by age, in later volumes, such as The Forgotten Well; If; The Yellow Leaf in the Poet's Book, and The Morning Street.

In March, 1861, he was appointed clerk in the U. S. Treasury Department by the late Hon. Salmon P. Chase; and three months later he was married in Kentucky to an estimable lady poet, June 18. In 1864, he published Nests at Washington, and Other Poems, by himself and wife. Poems in Sunshine and Firelight, issued at Cincinnati in 1866, was followed by Western Windows, and Other Poems, dedicated to George D. Prentice, 1869, and in which was reprinted the chief part of the two preceding volumes. He retained his position in Washington till his resignation in June, 1867, when he removed to Ohio, and became editorially connected, early in the year after, with the Cincinnati Chronicle. In 1869, he entered on the staff of the Cincinnati Commercial. He accepted an appointment as assistant clerk of the U. S. House of Representatives in January, 1870, and in December, 1871, he was designated its librarian. At the latter date his last volume, Landmarks and Other Poems, was published. His home is at North Bend (Cleveland, Hamilton county, Ohio), close by the old homestead and tomb of President Harrison.

Each later volume reproduces with its new poems, to some extent, the verses previously printed, and exhibits a patient and artistic striving towards an ideal poetic excellence. As the author states, his pieces "have been under cover (and under fire, too, for that matter), before; but they are here massed, so to speak,—for a general review."* Among the favorites are The Pioneer's Chimney, Mower in Ohio, and Higher Tenants, first printed in Poems in Sunshine and Firelight; Western Windows, Walking to the Station, and Fire before Seed, in Western Windows; and The Lost Farm, Moore's Chimney, The Forgotten Well, Farther, The Peach Blossoms, If, etc., in Landmarks.

THE MOWER IN OHIO—FROM WESTERN WINDOWS.

June, MDCCCLXIV.

The bees in the clover are making honey, and I am making my hay:
The air is fresh, I seem to draw a young man's breath to-day.

The bees and I are alone in the grass: the air is so very still
I hear the dam, so loud, that shines beyond the sullen mill.

Yes, the air is so still that I hear almost the sounds I can not hear—
That, when no other sound is plain, ring in my empty ear:

The chime of striking scythes, the fall of the heavy swarths they sweep—
They ring about me, resting, when I waver half asleep;

So still I am not sure if a cloud, low down, unseen there be,
Or if something brings a rumor home of the cannon so far from me:

Far away in Virginia where Joseph and Grant, I know,
Will tell them what I meant when first I had my mowers go!

Joseph he is my eldest one, the only boy of my three
Whose shadow can darken my door again, and lighten my heart for me.

Joseph he is my eldest—how his scythe was striking ahead!

William was better at shorter heats, but Jo in the long-run led.

William he was my youngest; John, between them, I somehow see,

When my eyes are shut, with a little board at his head in Tennessee.

But William came home one morning early, from Gettysburg, last July
(The mowing was over already, although the only mower was I:)

William, my captain, came home for good to his mother; and I'll be bound
We were proud and cried to see the flag that wrapt his coffin around;

For a company from the town came up ten miles with music and gun:
It seem'd his country claim'd him then—as well as his mother—her son.

But Joseph is yonder with Grant to-day, a thousand miles or near,
And only the bees are abroad at work with me in the clover here.

Was it a murmur of thunder I heard that humm'd again in the air?

Yet, may be, the cannon are sounding now their Onward to Richmond there.

But under the beech by the orchard, at noon, I sat an hour it would seem—
It may be I slept a minute, too, or waver'd into a dream.

For I saw my boys, across the field, by the flashes as they went,
Tramping a steady tramp as of old with the strength in their arms unspent;

Tramping a steady tramp, they moved like soldiers that march to the beat
Of music that seems, a part of themselves, to rise and fall with their feet;

Tramping a steady tramp, they came with flashes of silver that shone,
Every step, from their scythes that rang as if they needed the stone—

(The field is wide and heavy with grass)—and, coming toward me they beam'd
With a shine of light in their faces at once, and—surely I must have dream'd!

For I sat alone in the clover-field, the bees were working ahead.

There were three in my vision—remember, old man: and what if Joseph were dead!

But I hope that he and Grant (the flag above them both, to boot),

Will go into Richmond together, no matter which is ahead or afoot!

Meantime alone at the mowing here—an old man somewhat gray—

I must stay at home as long as I can, making myself the hay.

And so another round—the quail in the orchard whistles blithe—

But first I'll drink at the spring below, and whet again my scythe.

HIGHER TENANTS.

After Winter fires were ended, and the last spark, vanishing

From the embers on our hearthstone, flew into the sky of spring;

In the night-time, in the morning—when the air was hush'd around—

*Preface to Western Windows, and Other Poems.

Throbbing vaguely on the silence, came a dull,
mysterious sound:

Like the sultry hum of thunder, at the sullen close of day,
Out of clouds that brood and threaten on the horizon far away.

"'Tis," I said, "the April thunder," and I thought of flowers that spring,
And of trees that stand in blossom, and of birds that fly and sing.

But the sound, repeated often — nearer, more familiar grown —
From our chimney seem'd descending, and the swallow's wings were known.

Where the lithe flames leap'd and lighten'd, charm of host and cheer of guest,
There the emigrant of Summer chose its homestead, built its nest.

Then I dream'd of poets dwelling, like the swallow, long ago,
Overhead in dusky places ere their songs were heard below;

Overhead in humble attics, ministers of higher
things:
Underneath were busy people, overhead were heavenly wings!

And I thought of homely proverbs that on simple lips had birth,
Born of gentle superstitions at old firesides of the earth:

How, where'er the swallow builded under human roofs its nest,
Something holier, purer, higher, in the house became a guest;

Peace, or Love, or Health, or Fortune — something Prosperous, from the air
'Lighting with the wings of swallows, breathed divine possessions there.

"Friendly gods," I said, "descending, make their gentler visits so,
Fill the air with benedictions — songs above and songs below!"

Then I murmur'd, "Welcome, swallow; I, your landlord, stand content:
Even if song were not sufficient, higher Tenants pay your rent!"

THE FORGOTTEN WELL — FROM LANDMARKS.

By the old high road I find,
(The weeds their story tell,
With fallen curb and fill'd with stones,
A long-forgotten well.

The chimney, crumbling near,
A mute historian stands,
Of human joy and human woe —
Far, faded fireside bands!

Here still the apple blows
Its bloom of rose-lit snow;
The rose-tree blessed some gentle hands
With roses, long ago.

I can not choose but dream
Of all thy good foredone;
Old alms-giver, thy gifts once more
Show diamonds in the sun!

From yonder vanish'd home,
Blithe children therein born;

The mother with her crowing babe;
The grandsire palsy-worn;

Strong men, whose weighted limbs
Falter through dust and heat;
Lithe youths, in dreamland sowing deeds;
Shy maidens blushing sweet;

The reaper from his sheaves;
The mower from his hay —
These take thy freshness in their hearts,
And pass — my dream — away!

Forgotten by the throng,
Uncared for and unknown,
None seek thee through the wood of weeds
Neglect has slowly sown.

Yet, under all, thou'rt there —
Exhaustless, pure, and cold —
If but the sunshine came to see;
The fountain ne'er grows old!

 FARTHER.

Far-off a young State rises, full of might:
I paint its brave escutcheon. Near at hand
See the log cabin in the rough clearing stand;
A woman by its door, with steadfast sight,
Trustful, looks Westward, where, uplifted bright,
Some city's Apparition, weird and grand,
In dazzling quiet fronts the lonely land,
With vast and marvellous structures wrought of
light,

Motionless on the burning cloud afar: —
The haunting*vision of a time to be,
After the heroic age is ended here,
Built on the boundless, still horizon's bar
By the low sun, his gorgeous prophecy
Lighting the doorway of the pioneer!

THE THREE WORK DAYS.

So much to do, so little done!
In sleepless eyes I saw the sun;
His beamless disk in darkness lay,
The dreadful ghost of YESTERDAY!

So little done, so much to do!
The morning shone on harvests new;
In eager light I wrought my way,
And breathed the spirit of TO-DAY!

So much to do, so little done!
The toil is past, the rest begun;
Though little done, and much to do,
TO-MORROW Earth and Heaven are new!

THE PEACH BLOSSOMS.

Sent to me in the city, with the words, "It is Spring."

It was a gentle gift to send,
This thought in blossoms from a friend:
Within my city room

I seem to breathe the country air,
While April's kisses every where
Start Earth's brown cheeks to bloom!

Oh, beautiful the welcome sight!
(Flushing my paper as I write,
My words seem blossoming!) —
The lovely lighted snow that falls
Rosy around the cottage walls,
A miracle of Spring!

Dream-like, I hear the sunny hum
Of swarming bees; low voices come
Familiar, close, and dear;

I hardly know if I am there,
Or, shutting out the noisy air,
Those birds are singing here!

To the dry city's restless heart
What tender influence ye impart,
My blossoms, soft and wild!
Ah! from this barren cell I feel
Your subtle wand, enchanting, steal
Me to the Past — a child!

A child whose laughter-lighted face
Breaks from some happy door, a-chase
For new-wing'd butterflies:
The wind, how merrily, takes his hair! —
Sing, birds, and keep him ever there
With world-forgetting eyes!

Most gracious miracle of Spring
That gives the dead tree, blossoming,
Its resurrection hour!
Lo! Memory lifts her wizard bough,
(That seem'd as bare and barren,) now
Within my soul, in flower!

IF.

Strong little Monosyllable between Desire and joy, between the hand and heart
Of all our longing; dreary death's-head seen
Ere our quick lips to touch the nectar part!
O giant dwarf, making the whole world cling
To thy cold arm before the infant feet
Of frail resolves can walk, man like, complete,
Steep mountain-roads of high accomplishing!
Dim dragon in the way of our designing,
No Red-Cross Knight may vanquish! Though most brave,
Strong Will before thee crouches, a mute slave, —
Faith dies to feel thee in her path declining!
If! thou dost seem to our poor human sense
The broken crutch of our blind providence!

 TO THE STATUE OF THE CAPITOL.

Looking Eastward at Dawn.

What sunken splendor in the Eastern skies
Seest thou, O Watcher, from thy lifted place? —
Thine old Atlantic dream is in thine eyes,
But the new Western morning on thy face.

Beholdest thou, in reëpparent light,
Thy lost Republics? They were visions, fled.
Their ghosts in ruin'd cities walk by night —
It is no resurrection of their dead.

But look, behind thee, where in sunshine lie
Thy boundless fields of harvest in the West,
Whose savage garments from thy shoulders fly,
Whose eagle clings in sunrise to thy crest!
Washington, D. C.

 SARAH M. B. PLATT,

THE wife of John James Piatt, and whose maiden name was Sarah Morgan Bryan, was born in Fayette county, near Lexington, Kentucky, August 11, 1836. Her grandfather, Morgan Bryan, was one of the pioneer settlers of that State, and her family was related to Daniel Boone.* She lost her mother at the early age of eight years, and was educated chiefly at the Henry Female College, Newcastle, Kentucky. In her girlhood she wrote many verses, which were printed and praised by Mr. Geo. D. Prentice, the friend and patron of young writers at the South. This endorsement by the Louisville Journal secured her talents a popular recognition before her marriage in 1861. Three years later some of her earlier and later pieces were reprinted in The Nests at Washington, and Other Poems. Her poems written since that date were scattered through various magazines, till the appearance of a part in A Woman's Poems, published in 1871, without the author's name, and dedicated to "My nearest neighbor." A thoughtful fancy, pathos, and delicate womanly perception pervade this volume. "At her worst," remarks the critic of the Independent, "she is obscure; at her best she writes poetry delightful for its music, its tender sentiment, its subtle thoughtfulness. We detect, also, in this volume, that new flavor which the maturing life of the West adds to American literature — a flavor not dependent at all upon a choice of Western themes, or 'dialect,' but imbuing the treatment of all subjects; something different from the moralized ideality of New England poetry; something nearer to pure feeling, easier, simpler, and more familiar, yet delicate and authentic." Another volume from her pen is in preparation.

S. M. B. Piatt.

 HER METAPHORS—FROM A WOMAN'S POEMS.

A fairy dream that stole,
With evanescent light,
Across thy waken'd soul,
One early Autumn night —
Am I not this to thee?

Alone and languid rose
That in thy care might bloom,
But on the distance throws,
Vainly, its vague perfume —
Am I not this to thee?

A faint and trembling star
That drew thine eyes awhile,
Still shining on afar,
Deserted by thy smile —
Am I not this to thee?

A pearl cast at thy feet
And worn by thee an hour,
Then left where fierce waves beat,
The plaything of their power —
Am I not this to thee?

A half-remember'd strain,
That once could charm thine ear,
Whose music thou again
Wilt sometimes sigh to hear —
Am I not this to thee?

 MY BABES IN THE WOOD.

I know a story, fairer, dimmer, sadder,
Than any story painted in your books.
You are so glad! It will not make you gladder;
Yet listen, with your pretty restless looks.

"Is it a fairy story?" Well, half fairy —
At least it dates far back as fairies do,
And seems to me as beautiful and airy;
Yet half, perhaps the fairy half, is true.

*Southland Writers, art. Sarah M. Bryan, vol. 1, p. 136.

You had a baby sister and a brother,
 (Two very dainty people, rosily white,
 Each sweeter than all things except the other!)
 Older yet younger — gone from human sight!
 And I, who loved them, and shall love them ever,
 And think with yearning tears how each light hand
 Crept toward bright bloom or berries — I shall never Know how I lost them. Do you understand?
 Poor slightly golden heads! I think I miss'd
 them
 First, in some dreamy, piteous, doubtful way;
 But when and where with lingering lips I kiss'd
 them,
 My gradual parting, I can never say.
 Sometimes I fancy that they may have perish'd
 In shadowy quiet of wet rocks and moss,
 Near paths whose very pebbles I have cherish'd.
 For their small sakes, since my most lovely loss.
 I fancy, too, that they were softly cover'd
 By robins, out of apple-flowers they knew,
 Whose nursing wings in far home sunshine
 hover'd,
 Before the timid world had dropp'd the dew.
 Their names were — what yours are! At this you wonder.
 Their pictures are — your own, as you have
 seen;
 And my bird-buried darlings, hidden under Lost leaves — why, it is your dead selves I mean!

MY GHOST—A STORY TOLD TO MY LITTLE COUSIN KATE.

Yes, Katie, I think you are very sweet,
 Now that the tangles are out of your hair,
 And you sing as well as the birds you meet,
 That are playing, like you, in the blossoms
 there.
 But now you are coming to kiss me, you say:
 Well, what is it for? Shall I tie your shoe,
 Or loop your sleeve in a prettier way?
 "Do I know about ghosts?" Indeed I do.
 "Have I seen one?" Yes: last evening, you know,
 We were taking a walk that you had to miss,
 (I think you were naughty and cried to go,
 But, surely, you 'll stay at home after this!)
 And, away in the twilight lonesomely
 ("What is the twilight?" Its — getting late!)
 I was thinking of things that were sad to me! —
 There, hush! you know nothing about them,
 Kate.

Well, we had to go through the rocky lane,
 Close to that bridge where the water roars,
 By a still, red house, where the dark and rain
 Go in when they will at the open doors;
 And the moon, that had just waked up, looked through
 The broken old windows and seem'd afraid,
 And the wild bats flew and the thistles grew
 Where once in the roses the children play'd.
 Just across the road by the cherry-trees
 Some fallen white stones had been lying so long,
 Half hid in the grass, and under these
 There were people dead. I could hear the song
 Of a very sleepy dove as I pass'd
 The graveyard near, and the cricket that cried;
 And I look'd (ah! the Ghost is coming at last!)
 And something was walking at my side.

It seem'd to be wrapp'd in a great dark shawl,
 (For the night was a little cold, you know.)
 It would not speak. It was black and tall;
 And it walk'd so proudly and very slow.
 Then it mock'd me everything I could do:
 Now it caught at the lightning-flies like me;
 Now it stopp'd where the elder-blossoms grew;
 Now it tore the thorns from a gray bent tree.

Still it follow'd me under the yellow moon,
 Looking back to the graveyard now and then,
 Where the winds were playing the night a tune —
 But, Kate, a Ghost does n't care for men,
 And your papa could n't have done it harm!
 Ah, dark-eyed darling, what is it you see?
 There, you need n't hide in your dimpled arm —
 It was only my Shadow that walk'd with me!

THE HIGHEST MOUNTAIN.

I know of a Higher Mountain. Well?
 "Do the flowers grow on it?" No, not one.
 "What is its name?" But I cannot tell.
 "Where —?" Nowhere under the sun!

"Is it under the moon, then?" No, the light
 Has never touch'd it, and never can;
 It is fashion'd and form'd of night, of night
 Too dark for the eyes of man.

Yet I sometimes think, if my Faith had proved
 As a grain of mustard seed to me,
 I could say to this Mountain: "Be thou removed,
 And be thou cast in the sea!"

QUESTIONS OF THE HOUR.

"Do angels wear white dresses, say?
 Always, or only in the summer? Do
 Their birthdays have to come like mine, in May?
 Do they have scarlet sashes then, or blue?"
 "When little Jessie died last night,
 How could she walk to Heaven — it is so far?
 How did she find the way without a light?
 There was n't even any moon or star."
 "Will she have red or golden wings?
 Then will she have to be a bird, and fly?
 Do they take men like presidents and kings
 In hearses with black plumes clear to the sky?"
 "How old is God? Has he gray hair?
 Can He see yet? Where did He have to stay
 Before — you know — he had made — Anywhere?
 Who does He pray to — when He has to pray?"
 "How many drops are in the sea?
 How many stars? — well, then, you ought to know
 How many flowers are on an apple-tree?
 How does the wind look when it does n't blow?"
 "Where does the rainbow end? And why
 Did — Captain Kidd — bury the gold there?
 When
 Will this world burn? And will the firemen try
 To put the fire out with the engines then?"
 "If you should ever die, may we
 Have pumpkins growing in the garden, so
 My fairy godmother can come for me,
 When there's a prince's ball, and let me go?"
 "Read Cinderella just once more —
 What makes — men's other wives — so mean?"
 I know
 That I was tired, it may be cross, before
 I shut the painted book for her to go.

Hours later, from a child's white bed

I heard the timid, last queer question start:
 "Mamma, are you — my stepmother?" it said.
 The innocent reproof crept to my heart.

 WILLIAM D. HOWELLS.

WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, the editor of the Atlantic Monthly, a writer of inimitable grace and ease in prose and poetry, was born at Martinsville, Belmont county, Ohio, March 1, 1837. Three years later, his father became the publisher of a newspaper at Hamilton, in that State. The son at an early age began to learn the printer's trade, which he followed till he grew to manhood. Long before his majority, however, he wrote verses for the newspapers, and while yet quite young did some editorial work and correspondence for one of the leading daily journals of Cincinnati. He became an editor of the Ohio State Journal at Columbus, in 1853, as an associate with Mr. Henry D. Cooke, who has in later years been at the head of his brother's banking house in Washington.

In January, 1860, Mr. Howells published, in connection with Mr. John James Piatt, a small volume of verses, entitled: Poems of Two Friends. Its pieces have the crystal-like clearness of thought and the exact artistic finish, — hiding all appearance of labor, — so characteristic of his better-known writings. The Movers, Dead, The Doubt, Compliment, The Thorn, printed in the earliest years of manhood, bespeak choice work for mature life, as also this poem of simplicity, — The Mysteries:

Once on my mother's breast, a child, I crept,
 Holding my breath —
 There safe and sad lay shuddering, and wept
 At the dark mystery of Death.

Weary and weak, and worn with all unrest,
 Spent with the strife —
 O mother, let me weep upon thy breast
 At the sad mystery of Life.

He prepared in the same year, for a Western publisher, a carefully-written life of Abraham Lincoln, then candidate for the Presidency. It filled nearly eighty pages of the Life and Speeches of Abraham Lincoln and Hannibal Hamlin, published at Columbus, and was prefaced by these characteristic words: "When one has written a hurried book, one likes to dwell upon the fact, that if the time had not been wanting one could have made it a great deal better. This fact is of the greatest comfort to the author, and not of the slightest consequence to anybody else. It is perfectly reasonable, therefore, that every writer should urge it."

Mr. Howells was appointed United States Consul at Venice in the autumn of 1861, and he retained that position till the summer of 1865. He was married in 1862 to Miss Eleanor Mead, a sister of the sculptor Laikin J. Mead, of Vermont. The characteristics of that city of romance deeply impressed his imagination during those years of residence. He compares it with other cities as "like the pleasant improbability of the theatre to every-day commonplace life;" and declares, "it has never lost to me its claim upon constant surprise and regard, nor the fascination of its excellent beauty, its peerless picturesqueness, its sole and wondrous grandeur." He paused at London, on his return to America, to put to press his Venetian Life, which picturesquely pictures the various phases of its society and scenery.

W. D. Howells.

New York city was his next residence, for a short period, and he became an editorial writer for The Nation. The materials gathered in his travels from Venice to Rome, by the round-about way of Genoa and Naples, with a halt of a day in Pompeii and another of half an hour at Herculaneum, including as well the artistic etchings of notable scenes and the vivid reproduction of quaint impressions, sufficed for another entertaining volume, published at New York as Italian Journeys, in 1867.

Mr. Howells had been an occasional contributor to the Atlantic Monthly since 1860; and during the winter of 1865-6 he was invited to become its assistant editor. His acceptance of that position led to his removal to Cambridge, where he has since resided. On the resignation of Mr. James T. Fields, in 1871, he was appointed editor-in-chief.

No Love Lost, A Romance of Travel, a poem in hexameters, written while at Venice, and happily sketching tourist-life amid its fair scenery, was printed in 1869. A complete collection of his Poems was made in 1873. His contributions to the North American Review also contain some able critical articles on Italian literature, embodying translations of its more recent dramatic and lyrical poetry.

Three volumes of prose, issued between 1871-3, and exhibiting a rapid mastery over the elements of incident and romance, attest the success of Mr. Howells in a new field of literature. All are cheerful works, and all have had a cheerful success. Suburban Sketches, 1871, gives a series of detached out-of-door experiences, as a pedestrian and as a rider in the horse-cars, at and between Cambridge and Boston, with some sensations at the Boston musical festival. Their Wedding Journey, 1872, felicitously pictures, in a sparkling novelette, the humors and romance of the lately wedded, as they flit from Boston to New York, by way of the Hudson to Niagara, and homeward after seeing Canada and the broad St. Lawrence, with satiric side-shows for the warning of too demonstrative Benedicts. A Chance Acquaintance followed in 1873.

 THE MOVERS — FROM POEMS BY TWO FRIENDS.

Parting was over at last, and all the good-byes had been spoken.

Up the long hill-side the white-tented wagon moved slowly,

Bearing the mother and children, while onward before them the father

Trudged with his gun on his arm, and the faithful house-dog beside him,

Grave and sedate, as if knowing the sorrowful thoughts of his master.

April was in her prime, and the day in its dewy awaking:

Like a great flower, afar on the crest of the eastern woodland,

Goldenly bloomed the sun, and over the beautiful valley,

Dim with its dew and shadow, and bright with its dream of a river,

Looked to the western hills, and shone on the humble procession,

Paining with splendor the children's eyes, and the heart of the mother.

Beauty, and fragrance, and song filled the air like a palpable presence.

Sweet was the smell of the dewy leaves and the flowers in the wild-wood,

Fair the long reaches of sun and shade in the aisles of the forest.

Glad of the spring, and of love, and of morning, the wild birds were singing:

Jays to each other called harshly, then mellowly fluted together;

Sang the oriole songs as golden and gay as his plumage;

Pensively piped the querulous quails their greetings unfrequent,

While, on the meadow elm, the meadow lark gushed forth in music,

Rapt, exultant and shaken, with the great joy of his singing;

Over the river, loud-chattering, aloft in the air, the king-fisher,

Hung, ere dropped, like a bolt in the water beneath him;

Gossiping, out of the bank, flew myriad twittering swallows;

And in the boughs of the sycamore quarreled and clamored the blackbirds.

Never for these things a moment halted the Movers, but onward,

Up the long hill-side the white-tented wagon moved slowly.

Till, on the summit, that overlooked all the beautiful valley,

Trembling and spent, the horses came to a standstill unbidden;

Then from the wagon the mother in silence got down with her children,

Came, and stood by the father, and rested her hand on his shoulder.

Long together they gazed on the beautiful valley before them;

245

Looked on the well-known fields that stretched away to the woodlands,

Where, in the dark lines of green, showed the milk-white crest of the dogwood,

Snow of wild-plums in bloom, and crimson tints of the red-bud;

Looked on the pasture-fields where the cattle were lazily grazing —

Softly, and sweet, and thin, came the faint, far notes of the cow-bells —

Looked on the oft-trodden lanes, with their elder and blackberry borders,

Looked on the orchard, a bloomy sea, with its billows of blossoms.

Fair was the scene, yet suddenly strange and all unfamiliar,

Like as the faces of friends, when the word of farewell has been spoken.

Long together they gazed; then at last on the little log-cabin, —

Home for so many years, now home no longer forever, —

Rested their tearless eyes in the silent rapture of anguish.

Up on the morning air, no column of smoke from the chimney

Wavering, silver and azure, rose, fading and brightening ever;

Shut was the door where yesterday morning the children were playing. —

Lit with a gleam of the sun the window stared up at them blindly.

Cold was the hearthstone now, and the place was forsaken and empty.

Empty? Ah no! but haunted by thronging and tenderest fancies,

Sad recollections of all that had ever been, of sorrow or gladness.

Once more they sat in glow of the wide red fire in the winter,

Once more they sat by the door in the cool of the still summer evening,

Once more the mother seemed to be singing her babe there to slumber,

Once more the father beheld her weep o'er the child that was dying,

Once more the place was peopled by all the Past's sorrow and gladness!

Neither might speak for the thoughts that come crowding their hearts so,

Till, in their ignorant sorrow, aloud the children lamented;

Then was the spell of silence dissolved, and the father and mother

Burst into tears and embraced, and turned their dim eyes to the westward.

 DEAD.

I.

Something lies in the room

Over against my own;

The windows are lit with a ghastly bloom

Of candles burning alone —

Untrimmed and all afire

In the ghastly silence there!

II.

People go by the door,

Tiptoe, holding their breath,

And hush the talk that they held before,

Lest they should waken Death,

That is awake all night
There in the candlelight!

III.

The cat upon the stairs
Watches with flamy eye
For the sleepy one who shall unawares
Let her go stealing by.
She softly, softly purrs,
And claws at the banisters.

IV.

The bird from out its dream
Breaks with a sudden song,
That stabs the sense like a sudden scream;
The hound the whole night long
Howls to the moonless sky,
So far, and starry, and high.

THE DOUBT.

She sits beside the low window,
In the pleasant evening-time,
With her face turned to the sunset,
Reading a book of rhyme.

And the wine-light of the sunset,
Stol'n into the dainty nook,
Where she sits in her sacred beauty,
Lies crimson on the book.

O beautiful eyes so tender,
Brown eyes so tender and dear,
Did you leave your reading a moment,
Just now, as I passed near?

May be, 'tis the sunset flushes
Her features, so lily-pale —
May be, 'tis the lover's passion,
She reads of in the tale.

O darling, and darling, and darling,
If I dared to trust my thought;
If I dared to believe what I must not,
Believe what no one ought —

We would read together the poem
Of the Love that never died,
The passionate, world-old story
Come true and glorified.

LIFE IN VENICE — FROM NO LOVE LOST.

Fanny — To Clara.

I.

Yes, I promised to write, but how shall I write to you, darling?
Venice we reached last Monday, wild for canals and for color,
Palaces, prisons, lagoons, and gondolas, bravoes, and moonlight,
All the mysterious, dreadful, beautiful things in existence.
Fred had joined us at Naples, insuff'rably knowing and travelled,
Wise in the prices of things and great at tempestuous bargains,
Rich in the costly nothing our youthful travellers buy here,
At a prodigious outlay of time and money and trouble;
Utter confusion of facts, and talking the wildest of pictures,
Pyramids, battle-fields, bills, and examinations of luggage,
Passports, policemen, porters, and how he got through his tobacco —
Ignorant, handsome, full-bearded, brown, and good-natured as ever:

Annie thinks him perfect, and I well enough for a brother.

Also, a friend of Fred's came with us from Naples to Venice;

And, altogether, I think, we are rather agreeable people,

For we've been taking our pleasure at all times in perfect good-humor, —

Which is an excellent thing that you'll understand when you've travelled,

Seen Recreation deat-beat and cross, and learnt what a burden

Frescoes, for instance, can be, and, in general, what an affliction

Life is apt to become among the antiques and old masters.

Venice we've thoroughly done, and it's perfectly true of the pictures —

Titians and Tintoretts, and Palmas and Paul Veroneses;

Neither are gondolas fictions, but verities, hearse-like and swan-like,

Quite as the heart could wish. And one finds, to one's infinite comfort,

Venice just as unique as one's fondest visions have made it:

Palaces and mosquitoes rise from the water together,

And, in the city's streets, the salt-sea is ebbing and flowing

Several inches or more.

— Ah! let me not wrong thee, O Venice!

Fairest, forlornest, and saddest of all the cities, and dearest!

Dear, for my heart has won here deep peace from cruel confusion;

And in this lucent air, whose night is but tenderer noon-day,

Fear is forever dead, and hope has put on the immortal!

— There! and you need not laugh. I'm coming to something directly.

One thing: I've bought you a chain of the famous fabric of Venice —

Something peculiar and quaint, and of such a delicate texture

That you must wear it embroidered upon a riband of velvet,

If you would have the effect of its exquisite fineness and beauty.

"Isn't it very frail?" I asked of the workman who made it.

"Strong enough, if you will, to bind a lover, signora," —

With an expensive smile. 'Twas bought near the Bridge of Rialto.

(Shylock, you know.) In our shopping, Aunt May and Fred do the talking:

Fred begins always in French, with the most delicious effort'ry,

Only to end in profoundest humiliation and English.

Aunt, however, scorns to speak any tongue but Italian:

"Quanto per these ones here?" and "What did you say was the prezzo?"

"Ah! troppo caro! Too much! No, no! Don't I tell you it's troppo?"

All the while insists that the gondolieri shall show us

What she calls Titian's palazzo, and pines for the house of Othello.

Annie, the dear little goose, believes in Fred and her mother

With an enchanting abandon. She doesn't at all understand them,
But she has some twilight views of their cleverness. Father is quiet,
Now and then ventures some French when he fancies that nobody hears him,
In an aside to the valet-de-place—I never detect him—
Buys things for mother and me with a quite supernatural sweetness,
Tolerates all Fred's airs, and is indispensably pleasant.

II.

Prattling on of these things, which I think cannot interest deeply,
So I hold back in my heart its dear and wonderful secret
(Which I must tell you at last, however I falter to tell you),
Fain to keep it all my own for a little while longer,—
Doubting but it shall lose some part of its strangeness and sweetness,
Shared with another, and fearful that even you may not find it
Just the marvel that I do—and thus turn our friendship to hatred.

Sometimes it seems to me that this love, which I feel is eternal,
Must have begun with my life, and that only an absence was ended
When we met and knew in our souls that we loved one another.
For, from the first was no doubt. The earliest hints of the passion,
Whispered to girlhood's tremulous dream, may be mixed with misgiving,
But, when the very love comes, it bears no vagueness of meaning;
Touched by its truth (too fine to be felt by the ignorant senses, Knowing but looks and utterance), soul unto soul makes confession,
Silence to silence speaks. And I think that this subtle assurance,
Yet unconfirmed from without, is even sweeter and dearer
Than the perfected bliss that comes when the words have been spoken.
—Not that I'd have them unsaid, now! But, 'twas delicious to ponder
All the miracle over, and clasp it, and keep it, and hide it.
While I beheld him, you know, with looks of indifferent languor,
Talking of other things—and felt the divine contradiction
Trouble my heart below!

And yet, if no doubt touched our passion,

Do not believe for that, our love has been wholly unclouded.
All best things are ours when pain and patience have won them:
Peace itself would mean nothing but for the strife that preceded—
Triumph of love is greatest, when peril of love has been sorest.
(That's to say, I dare say. I'm only repeating what he said.)

Well, then, of all wretched things in the world, a mystery, Clara,

Lurked in this life dear to mine, and hopelessly held us asunder
When we drew nearest together, and all but his speech said, "I love you."
Fred had known him at college, and then had found him at Naples,
After several years,—and called him a capital fellow.
Thus far his knowledge went, and beyond this began to run shallow
Over troubled ways, and to break into brilliant conjecture.
Harder by far to endure than the other's reticent absence—
Absence wherein at times he seemed to walk like one troubled
By an uneasy dream, whose spell is not broken with waking,
And it returns all day with a vivid and sudden recurrence,
As a remembered event. Of the past that was closest the present,
This we knew from himself: He went at the earliest summons,
When the Rebellion began, and falling, terribly wounded,
Into the enemy's hands, after ages of sickness and prison,
Made his escape at last; and, returning, found all his virtues
Grown out of recognition and shining in posthumous splendor,—
Found all strange and estranged, and, he fancied, more wonder than welcome.
So, somewhat heavy of heart, and disabled for war, he had wandered Hither to Europe for perfecter peace. Abruptly his silence,
Full of suggestion and sadness, made here a chasm between us.
But we spanned the chasm with conversational bridges,
Else talked all around it, and feigned an ignorance of it,
With that absurd pretense, which is always so painful or comic,
Just as you happen to make it or see it.

In spite of our fictions,
Severed from his by that silence, my heart grew ever more anxious,
Till last night, when together we sat in Piazza San Marco
(Then, when the morrow must bring us parting—forever, it might be),
Taking our ices al fresco. Some strolling minstrels were singing
Airs from the Trovatore. I noted with painful observance,
With the unwilling minuteness, at such times absolute torture,
All that brilliant scene, for which I cared nothing, before me:
Dark-eyed Venetian leoni regarding the forestieri
With those compassionate looks of gentle and curious wonder
Home-keeping Italy's nations bend on the voyaging races, Taciturn, indolent, sad, as their beautiful city itself is;
Groups of remotest English—not just the traditional English
(Lavish Milor is no more, and your travelling Briton is frugal),

English, though, after all, with the Channel always between them,
 Islanded in themselves, and the Continent's sociable races :
 Country-people of ours — the New World's confident children,
 Proud of America always, and even vain of the Troubles
 As of disaster laid out on a scale unequalled in Europe ;
 Polyglot Russians that spoke all languages better than natives ;
 White-coated Austrian officers, anglicised Austrian dandies,
 Gorgeous Levantine figures of Greek, and Turk, and Albanian —
 These, and the throngs that moved through the long arcades and Piazza,
 Shone on by numberless lamps that flamed round
 the perfect Piazza,
 Jewel-like set in the splendid frame of this beautiful picture,
 Full of such motley life, and so altogether Venetian.

* * * * *

A DAY IN POMPEII — FROM ITALIAN JOURNEYS.

. . . It is proper, after seeing the sites of some of the principal temples in Pompeii (such as those of Jupiter and Venus), to cross the fields that cover a great breadth of the buried city, and look into the amphitheatre, where, as every body knows, the lions had no stomach for Glaucus on the morning of the fatal eruption. The fields are now planted with cotton, and of course we thought those commonplaces about the wonder the Pompeians would feel could they come back to see that New-World plant growing above their buried homes. We might have told them, the day of our visit, that this cruel plant, so long watered with the tears of slaves, and fed with the blood of men, was now an exile from its native fields, where war was plowing with sword and shot the guilty land, and rooting up the subtlest fibres of the oppression in which cotton had grown king. And the ghosts of wicked old Pompeii, remembering the manifold sins that called the fires of hell to devour her, and thinking on this exiled plant, the latest witness of God's unforgetting justice, might well have shuddered, through all their shadow, to feel how terribly He destroys the enemies of Nature and man.

But the only Pompeian presences which haunted our passage of the cotton-field were certain small with soft black eyes and graceful ways, who ran before us and plucked the bolls of the cotton and sold them to us. Embassies bearing red and white grapes were also sent out of the cottages to our excellencies ; and there was some doubt of the currency of the coin which we gave these poor children in return.
 "Phantoms of delight,"

There are now but few peasants living on the land over the head of Pompeii, and the Government allows no sales of real estate to be made except to itself. The people who still dwell here can hardly be said to own their possessions, for they are merely allowed to cultivate the soil. A guard-stationed night and day prevents them from making excavations, and they are severely restricted from entering the excavated quarters of the city alone.

The cotton whitens over two-thirds of Pompeii

yet interred : happy the generation that lives to learn the wondrous secrets of that sepulchre ! For, when you have once been at Pompeii, this phantasm of the past takes deeper hold on your imagination than any living city, and becomes and is the metropolis of your dreamland forever. O marvellous city ! who shall reveal the cunning of your spell ? Something not death, something not life — something that is the one when you turn to determine its essence as the other ! What is it comes to me at this distance of that which I saw at Pompeii ? The narrow and curving, but not crooked streets, with the blazing sun of that Neapolitan November falling into them, or clouding their wheel-worn lava with the black, black shadows of the many-tinted walls ; the houses, and the gay columns of white, yellow, and red ; the delicate pavements of mosaic ; the skeletons of dusty cisterns and dead fountains ; inanimate garden spaces with pigmy statues suited to their littleness ; suites of fairy bed-chambers, painted with exquisite frescos ; dining-halls with joyous scenes of hunt and banquet on their walls ; the ruinous sites of temples ; the melancholy emptiness of booths and shops and jolly drinking-houses ; the lonesome tragic theatre, with a modern Pompeian drawing water from a well there ; the baths with their roofs perfect yet, and the stucco bass-reliefs all but unharmed ; around the whole, the city wall crowned with slender poplars : outside the gates, the long avenue of tombs, and the Appian Way stretching on to Stabie ; and, in the distance, Vesuvius, brown and bare, with his fiery breath scarce visible against the cloudless heaven ; — these are the things that float before my fancy as I turn back to look at myself walking those enchanted streets, and to wonder if I could ever have been so blest.

For there is nothing on the earth, or under it, like Pompeii.

The amphitheatre, to which we came now, after our stroll across the cotton-fields, was small, like the vastest things in Pompeii, and had nothing of the stately magnificence of the Arena at Verona, nor any thing of the Roman Coliseum's melancholy and ruinous grandeur. But its littleness made it all the more comfortable and social, and, seated upon its benches under a cool awning, one could have almost chatted across the arena with one's friends ; could have witnessed the spectacle on the sands without losing a movement of the quick gladiators, or an agony of the victim given to the beasts — which must have been very delightful to a Pompeian of companionable habits and fine feelings. It is quite impossible, however, that the bouts described by Bulwer as taking place all at the same time on the arena should really have done so : the combatants would have rolled and tumbled and trampled over each other an hundred times in the narrow space.

Of all the voices with which it once rang the poor little amphitheatre has kept only an echo. But this echo is one of the most perfect ever heard : prompt, clear, startling, it blew back the light chaff we threw to it with amazing vehemence, and almost made us doubt if it were not a direct human utterance. Yet how was Ventisei to know our names ? And there was no one else to call them but ourselves. Our "dolce duca" gathered a nosegay from the crumbling ledges, and sat down in the cool of the once-cruel cells beneath, and put it prettily together for the ladies. When we had wearied ourselves with the echo he arose and led us back into Pompeii.

SCENE—FROM SUBURBAN SKETCHES.

On that loveliest autumn morning, the swollen tide had spread over all the russet levels, and gleamed in the sunlight a mile away. As the contributor moved onward down the street, luminous on either hand with crimsoning and yellowing maples, he was so filled with the tender serenity of the scene, as not to be troubled by the spectacle of small Irish houses standing miserably about on the flats ankle deep, as it were, in little pools of the tide, or to be aware, at first, of a strange stir of people upon the streets: a fluttering to and fro and lively encounter and separation of groups of bareheaded women, a flying of children through the broken fences of the neighborhood, and across the vacant lots on which the insulted sign-boards forbade them to trespass; a sluggish movement of men through all, and a pause of different vehicles along the side-walks. When a sense of these facts had penetrated his enjoyment, he asked a matron whose snowy arms, freshly taken from the wash-tub, were folded across a mighty chest, "What is the matter?"

"A girl drowned herself, sir-r-r, over there on the flats, last Saturday, and they're looking for her."

"It was the best thing she could do," said another matron grimly.

Upon this answer that literary soul fell at once to patching himself up a romantic story for the suicide, after the pitiful fashion of this fiction-ridden age, when we must relate everything we see to something we have read. He was the less to blame for it, because he could not help it; but certainly he is not to be praised for his associations with the tragic fact brought to his notice. Nothing could have been more trite or obvious, and he felt his intellectual poverty so keenly that he might almost have believed his discomfort a sympathy for the girl who had drowned herself last Saturday. But of course, this could not be, for he had but lately been thinking what a very tiresome figure to the imagination the Fallen Woman had become. As a fact of Christian civilization, she was a spectacle to wring one's heart, he owned; but he wished she were well out of the romances, and it really seemed a fatality that she should be the principal personage of this little scene. The preparation for it, whatever it was to be, was so deliberate, and the reality had so slight relation to the French roofs and modern improvements of the comfortable Charlesbridge which he knew, that he could not consider himself other than as a spectator awaiting some entertainment, with a faint inclination to be critical.

In the meantime there passed through the motley crowd, not so much a cry as a sensation of "They've found her, they've found her!" and then the one terrible picturesque fact, "She was standing upright!"

Upon this there was a wilder and wilder clamor among the people, dropping by degrees and almost dying away, before a flight of boys came down the street with the tidings, "They are bringing her—bringing her in a wagon."

The contributor knew that she whom they were bringing in the wagon, had had the poetry of love to her dismal and otherwise squalid death; but the history was of fancy, not of fact in his mind. Of course, he reflected, her lot must have been obscure and hard; the aspect of those concerned about her death implied that. But of her hopes and her fears, who could tell him anything? To be sure he could imagine the lovers, and how they first met, and where, and who he was that was doomed to work her shame and death; but here his fancy came upon something coarse and common: a man of her own race and grade, handsome after that manner of beauty which is so much more hateful than ugliness is; or, worse still, another kind of man whose deceit must have been subtler and wicked; but whatever the person, a presence defiant of sympathy or even interest, and simply horrible. Then there were the details of the affair, in a great degree common to all love affairs, and not varying so widely in any condition of life; for the passion which is so rich and infinite to those within its charm, is apt to seem a little tedious and monotonous in its character, and poor in resources to the cold looker-on.

Then, finally, there was the crazy purpose and its fulfilment: the headlong plunge from bank or bridge; the eddy, and the bubbles on the current that calmed itself above the suicide; the tide that rose and stretched itself abroad in the sunshine, carrying hither and thither the burden with which it knew not what to do; the arrest, as by some ghastly caprice of fate, of the dead girl, in that upright posture, in which she should meet the quest for her, as it were defiantly.

And now they were bringing her in a wagon.

Involuntarily all stood aside, and waited till the funeral car, which they saw, should come up toward them through the long vista of the maple-shaded street, a noiseless riot stirring the legs and arms of the boys into frantic demonstration, while the women remained quiet with arms folded or akimbo. Before and behind the wagon, driven slowly, went a guard of ragged urchins, while on the raised seat above sat two Americans, unperturbed by anything, and concerned merely with the business of the affair.

The vehicle was a grocer's cart which had perhaps been pressed into the service; and inevitably the contributor thought of Zenobia, and of Miles Coverdale's belief that if she could have foreboded all the post-mortem ugliness and grotesqueness of suicide, she never would have drowned herself. This girl, too, had doubtless had her own ideas of the effect that her death was to make, her conviction that it was to wring one heart, at least, and to strike awe and pity to every other; and her woman's soul must have been shocked from death could she have known in what a ghastly comedy the body she put off was to play a part.

In the bottom of the cart lay something long and straight and terrible, covered with a red shawl that drooped over the end of the wagon; and on this thing were piled the baskets in which the grocers had delivered their orders for sugar and flour, and coffee and tea. As the cart jolted through their lines, the boys could no longer be restrained; they broke out with wild yells, and danced madly about it, while the red shawl hanging from the rigid feet nodded to their frantic mirth; and the sun dropped its light through the maples and shone bright upon the flooded flats.

WILLIAM WINTER,

A JOURNALIST and poet, was born at Gloucester, Massachusetts, July 15, 1836. As his grandfather and father were sailors, his relatives and early surroundings were mostly nautical. He attended school at Fort Hill, Boston, till he was ten years old, when his education was resumed at Cambridge, and he graduated at its High School at the age of sixteen. In 1854, he published his first volume at Boston, entitled The Concert, and Other Poems (16mo., pp. 143); and four years later, The Queen's Domain, and Other Poems (12mo., pp. 144), both of which books are now out of print and inaccessible. The former was dedicated to Mr. H. W. Longfellow, an early and helpful friend.

Mr. Winter began the study of law in 1852, and was graduated from the law school at Harvard College. He was admitted to the bar at Boston, but never practiced, choosing rather to lecture to lyceums for a season. He removed to New York city in the autumn of 1859, and has ever since been connected with its city press, — a faithful student and hard worker in his specialties. He entered on the staff of the Saturday Press, as literary critic, in January, 1860, and was married the December following to Miss Campbell, a young lady of Scottish birth. From December 1861, to June 1866, he was dramatic critic of the New York Albion, under the pen-name of "Mercutio," as well as book reviewer. He was connected with the New York Weekly Review, as managing editor and critic, from July 1865 to June 1871. Vanity Fair, The Round Table, The Atlantic and other magazines have contained many of his contributions, while he has been attached to the Tribune as dramatic critic from 1865 to the present time. Two volumes of the poems of his friend, the late George Arnold, were edited by him in 1866-7. His residence, since April, 1871, has been on Fort Hill, at New Brighton, Staten Island.

His third volume of poems, My Witness; A Book of Verse (pp. 128), was published by J. R. Osgood & Co., in September, 1871; and it was followed three months later by the Life of Edwin Booth. The former was dedicated "To my Wife: the inspiration of whatever is gentle and cheerful in the spirit of this book." It contained The World's Martyr, an allegory in varying metres, spoken before the literary societies of Brown University; a series of choice imaginative poems on varying phases of Love—its Ideal, Choice, Question, Triumph, and Queen; a delicately outlined picture of the war, After All; a glowing, sensuous dream of Beauty, and a grouping of minor pieces under the title of Spray.

LOVE'S IDEAL.

Her young face is good and fair,
Lily-white and rosy-red;
And the brown and silken hair
Hovers, mist-like, round her head.

And her voice is soft and low,
Clear as music and as sweet;
Hearing it, you hardly know
Where the sound and silence meet.

All the magic who can tell
Of her laughter and her sighs?
Or what heavenly meanings dwell
In her kind, confiding eyes?

Pretty lips, as rubies bright,
Scarcely hide the tiny pearls;
Little wandering stars of light
Love to nestle in her curls.

All her ways are winning ways,
Full of tenderness and grace;
And a witching sweetness plays
Fondly o'er her gentle face.

True and pure her soul within, —
Breathing a celestial air!
Evil and the shame of sin
Could not dwell one moment there.

Is it but a vision, this?
Fond creation of the brain?
Phantom of a fancied bliss?
Type of beauty void and vain?

No! the tides of being roll
Toward a heaven that's yet to be,
Where this idol of my soul
Waits and longs for love and me!

BEAUTY.

I had a dream, one glorious summer night,
In the rich bosom of imperial June,
Languid I lay, upon an odorous couch,
Golden with amber, festooned wildly o'er
With crimson roses, and the longing stars
Wept tears of love upon their clustered leaves.
Above me soared the azure vault of heaven,
Vast and majestic; circined with that path
Whereby, perchance, the sea-born Venus found Her way to higher spheres; that path which seems

A coronet of silver, gemmed with stars,
And bound upon the forehead of young night.

There, as I lay, the musical south-wind
Shook all the roses into murmurous life,
And poured their fragrance o'er me in a shower
Of crimson mist; and softly, through the mist,
Came a low, sweet, enchanting melody,
A far-off echo from a land of dreams,
Which with delicious languor filled the air,
And steeped in bliss the senses and the soul.

Then rose a shape, — a dim and ghostly shape,
Whereto no feature was, nor settled form, —
A shadowy splendor, seeming as it came
A pearly summer cloud shot through and through
With faintest rays of sunset; yet within
A spirit dwelt; and, floating from within,
A murmur trembled sweetly into words: —

I am the ghost of a most lovely dream,
Which haunted, in old days, a poet's mind.
And long he sought for, wept, and prayed for me;
And searched through all the chambers of his soul,

And searched the secret places of the earth,
The lonely forest and the lonely shore,
And listened to the voices of the sea,
What time the stars shone out, and midnight cold
Slept on the dark waves whispering at his feet;
And sought the mystery in a human form,
Amid the haunts of men, and found it not;
And looked in woman's fond, bewildering eyes,
And mirrored there his own, and saw no sign:
But only in his sleep I came to him,
And gave him fitful glimpses of my face,
Whereof he after sang in sweetest words;
Then died, and came to me. But evermore,
Through lonely days and wakeful, haunted nights,
A life of star-lit gloom, do poets seek
To snatch the mystic veil that covers me,
And evermore they grasp the empty air.
For only in their dreams I come to them,
And give them fitful glimpses of my face,
And lull them, siren-like, with words of hope
That promise, some time, to their ravished eyes,

Beauty, the secret of the universe,
God's thought, that gives the soul eternal peace.

Then the voice ceased, and only on my ears
The shaken roses murmured, and the wind.

 AFTER ALL.

The apples are ripe in the orchard,
The work of the reaper is done,
And the golden woodlands redden
In the blood of the dying sun.

At the cottage door the grandsire
Sits, pale, in his easy-chair,
While a gentle wind of twilight
Plays with his silver hair.

A woman is kneeling beside him ;
A fair young head is prest,
In the first wild passion of sorrow,
Against his aged breast.

And far from over the distance
The faltering echoes come,
Of the flying blast of trumpet
And the rattling roll of drum.

Then the grandsire speaks, in a whisper, —
"The end no man can see ;
But we give him to his country,
And we give our prayers to Thee." . . .

The violets star the meadows,
The rose-buds fringe the door,
And over the grassy orchard
The pink-white blossoms pour.

But the grandsire's chair is empty,
The cottage is dark and still,
There's a nameless grave on the battle-field,
And a new one under the hill.

And a pallid, tearless woman
By the cold hearth sits, alone ;
And the old clock in the corner
Ticks on with a steady drone.

 MARY VIRGINIA TERHUNE,

A LADY novelist whose peculiar mission is the depiction of home-life, its every-day joys, sorrows, and labors, has published all her works under the nom de plume of "Marion Harland." She is the daughter of Samuel P. Hawes, a native of Dorchester, Massachusetts, who subsequently became a merchant in Virginia; and she was born in Amelia county of that State. On her mother's side she is directly descended from the brother of the notable Captain John Smith, of Pocahontas memory. The old Smith coat of arms is still retained in the family. Her father was of old Puritan stock, and a near relative of the late President Franklin Pierce. The ancestral home built in 1630, ten years after the landing of the Pilgrims, is still standing on Dorchester Heights, and is now occupied by a branch of the family. "From her Puritan blood," states a late issue of a New Jersey paper, "Marion Harland" received her rich mental endowments and her remarkable energy of character. Born and reared amid the 'peculiar institutions' of the Old Dominion, in a locality made famous by great historical incidents, and associating with the 'First Families,' while she acquired perhaps a more intimate knowledge of the 'negro lingo' than any other American authoress, and became familiar with the traditional lore of that locality celebrated for its illustrious men, her Puritan blood asserted itself in her uniform hatred of slavery. We may add that when the rebellion broke out, though the home of her childhood and a considerable portion of her property were within the lines of the Confederacy, no woman in the country was more devotedly loyal to the Union.

Marion Harland

"Marion Harland" began to write for a weekly city journal at the age of fourteen; and two years later she contributed a sketch to Godey's Lady's Book, entitled, "Marrying through Prudential Motives." The latter had a checked and wonderful career. It was printed in England, translated for a French journal, retranslated for an English magazine, and then reproduced in this country as an English tale. Her first book, Alone; A Tale of Southern Life and Manners, was published at Richmond in 1854. It was followed by The Hidden Path, 1855; Moss Side, 1857; Miriam; Nemesis, 1860; Husks, 1863; Husbands and Homes, a series of magazine stories, 1865; Sunnybank, 1867; The Christmas Holly, 1867; Ruby's Husband, 1868; Phemie's Temptation, 1869; At Last, 1870; Helen Gardner's Wedding-Day, 1870; The Empty Heart, 1871, and Common Sense in the Household: A Manual of Practical Housewifery, 1871.

In 1856 she was married to the Rev. E. P. Terhune, then pastor of a congregation in Virginia. Three years later, her husband was called to the First Reformed Church, at Newark, New Jersey; and they have since resided in that city. An intimate friend pays this tribute to her estimable literary and social life:

"Marion Harland bears testimony on almost every page of her works to a thorough womanliness. The 'blue-stocking' slander finds in her a notable refutation. A true mother, assuming in her person the education of her children; the wife of a clergyman, sharing heartily with him in all the requirements of an extensive parish; at the head of worthy public charities, and at the same time the model housekeeper, so experienced as to furnish a guide-book in domestic economy to her fellow-women, — her example presents a striking contradiction to the adage 'jack of all trades,' and proves the capabilities of a fully trained mind for excellence in many departments. Her literary works and success are such as might be predicated of this quality of nature. Joined to a marvellously keen power of analysis of character and motive, she displays upon every page a full, glorious humanity; such sympathy with her kind in the aims and struggles of the lowliest, who yet unconsciously dignify human nature by battling with evil and reaching after good; such indignant compassion for the oppressed, tenderness for the weak, and lofty contempt for shams and littleness of whatever kind; such hopeful faith in her fellows, such trust in the guidance of a Higher Power, as must stir the hearts of her readers. That Marion Harland has learned the secret of success in her chosen profession, is demonstrated by the immense sale of her works, at home and broad. Alone, her first book, although published nearly twenty years ago, still sells steadily, as do all of the ten volumes she has written since. In fact, they have quietly taken their place as standards in family libraries, and new editions go to press every month."

 D. G. BRINTON.

DANIEL GARRISON BRINTON, a writer on medical science and on Indian antiquities, is a native of Chester county, Pennsylvania. He was born May 13, 1837, and was educated in early life chiefly by private tutors. He entered Yale College at the age of seventeen, and was graduated in 1858. The following year he commenced the study of medicine at Jefferson Medical College, in Philadelphia. After he received his diploma, in 1860, he went abroad to continue his professional and general studies in Germany and France. At the outbreak of the civil war, he returned to this country, and shortly afterward entered the army on the medical staff, as Surgeon U. S. Volunteers. He served in the field as Medical Director of the Eleventh Army Corps during 1863-4, and was then assigned on various hospital duties till he returned to his native State at the close of the war.

Dr. Brinton published, in 1859, Notes on the Floridian Peninsula, its Literary History, Indian Tribes and Antiquities, the result of a winter's sojourn in that region. This was followed in 1868 by The Myths of the New World: an Essay on the Symbolism and Mythology of the Red Race of America. The author, who regards the religious sense as almost the only faculty peculiar to man, and the key to his origin and destiny, thus outlines the field of his research: "What are man's earliest ideas of a soul and a God, and of his own origin and destiny? Why do we find certain myths, such as of a creation, a flood, an after-world; certain symbols, as the bird, the serpent, the cross; certain numbers, as the three, the four, the seven — intimately associated with these ideas by every race? What are the laws of growth of natural religions? How do they acquire such an influence, and is this influence for good or evil? Such are some of the universally interesting questions which I attempt to solve by an analysis of the simple faiths of a savage race." This work received the endorsement of such authorities as the North American Review and The Nation at home, with that of Professor Steinthal and other able critics in Europe. In 1872, he prepared A Guide-Book of Florida and the South.

Dr. Brinton is one of the authors of the Eclectic Series of Geographies, and has made a number of contributions to medical literature. Since 1868, he has edited the Medical and Surgical Reporter of Philadelphia, the Half-Yearly Compendium of Medical Science, etc.

In linguistic subjects, Dr. Brinton has given especial attention to the aboriginal tongues of America. Under the auspices of the American Philosophical Society, he edited in 1870 the Rev. Mr. Byington's Grammar of the Choctaw Language; and published: Contributions to a Grammar of the Muskokee Language, 1870; The Natural Legends of the Chahta-Muskokee Tribes; The Ancient Phonetic Alphabet of Yucatan; The Affinities of the Natchez Language; and The Arawack Language of Guiana in its Linguistic and Ethnological Relations, 1871.

 CHARLES HENRY HART,

THE present historiographer of the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia, was born in that city February 4, 1847. He received a classical and scientific education, and at the age of eighteen commenced the study of the law in the office of the Hon. Samuel H. Perkins. He was admitted to the bar in 1868, and in the year following he received the degree of Bachelor of Laws from the University of Pennsylvania.

Early in life Mr. Hart showed evidences of a literary turn of mind. His first noticeable article, written before his sixteenth year, was a memoir of Margaret of Anjou. It was the precursor of many contributions to the interesting and important department of biography. In December, 1865, Mr. Hart was elected corresponding secretary of the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia, and three years later its historiographer. It was in connection with this association, which, instituted in 1858, was the first organization for the furtherance of Numismatic science in America, that most of his contributions to literature have been made. In its published volume of Proceedings from May 4, 1865, to December 31, 1866, are contained his biographical notices of Lewis Cass, particularly reviewing his literary life; of the eloquent and gifted Francis Lister Hawks, D. D.; and of Robert W. Gibbs, M. D., of South Carolina, all deceased members of the Society; besides two papers, subsequently reprinted as pamphlets: "Remarks on Tabasco, Mexico, occasioned by the reported discovery of remains of ancient cities being found in that locality;" and "Historical Sketch of the National Medals issued pursuant to Resolutions of Congress 1776-1815." In the latter, he called the attention of the Society to the unmeaning devices on our coinage and their utter worthlessness as monuments of history, and urged that steps be taken for their correction, "so that our coinage may become the repository of the country's history."

To the New England Historical and Genealogical Register for July, 1868, Mr. Hart contributed a Memoir of William Hickling Prescott, which was republished as a pamphlet.

In 1865, upon the death of President Lincoln, when the press throughout the country was groaning under the effusions of the pulpit and the rostrum, called forth by the mournful occasion, Mr. Hart conceived the idea of preparing a bibliographical work on the subject. This was completed, and published by Joel Munsell of Albany, the Pickering of America, in 1870, under the title of Bibliographia Lincolniana: an Account of the Publications occasioned by the Death of Abraham Lincoln, Sixteenth President of the United States; With Notes and an Introduction. This compact volume is a monument to its author's industry, as twelve hundred letters were written and about eight hundred letters and pamphlets received in its preparation. He had earned the right to quote the quaint words of Anthony à Wood in the preface to his History of Oxford: "A painful work it is, I'll assure you, and more than difficult, wherein what toyle hath been taken as no man thinketh so no man believeth, lest he hath made the trial." The introduction was subsequently reprinted as a Biographical Sketch of Mr. Lincoln, and was received with favor by such authorities as his old law partner, Hon. William H. Herndon of Springfield, Illinois; and by Charles Francis Adams, Richard H. Dana, Jr., etc.

In May, 1870, Mr. Hart delivered a Discourse on the Life and Services of Gulian Crommelin Verplanck, LL. D., which was printed in New York by special request. In the same year appeared biographical sketches of Hon. William Willis of Portland, Maine, and Judge Richard Stockton Field, of New Jersey. His last publication was a Memoir of George Ticknor, the Historian of Spanish Literature, who died in Boston, January 26, 1871, in his eighty-first year. This work has been welcomed by competent authorities.

Mr. Hart has prepared a number of biographical sketches, which remain in manuscript, and has contributed communications on various subjects to periodicals and the publications of learned societies. These articles and his other fugitive writings he contemplates collecting into a volume. He resides in Philadelphia, engaged in the active practice of the law; and in order to liquidate that debt which Coke says every lawyer owes to his profession, he has in preparation a Treatise on the Doctrine of Equitable Conversion, based upon the English work of Leigh and Dalzell, published nearly a-half century ago.

 WHITELAW REID,

A FACILE and enterprising journalist, who, at the age of thirty-five, attained the honor of succeeding his late chief, Horace Greeley, as Editor of the New York Tribune, was born at Xenia, Ohio, in 1837. His father, Robert Charlton Reid, an elder of the Cameronian Covenanters, emigrated from his birthplace in Fayette county, Kentucky, and became one of the founders of Xenia, which signifies hospitality. His mother came from a Scotch colony of Covenanters in Vermont.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid was prepared at the Xenia Academy to enter the Miami University, from which he graduated in 1856 with high honors, taking as the subject of his last address the "Noble Traitors" of the past, and especially referring to the contest of opinions then convulsing Kansas. He at once actively entered into the profession of his life, by assuming charge of the leading county paper, the Xenia News; and he conducted it with such ability as to be speedily called to the staff of the Cincinnati Gazette. His after career has been sketched in Harper's Weekly, from which we extract:

"He represented this journal in Columbus during a session of the legislature, and his letters from that city made his signature, 'Agate,' well known throughout the Northwest. His strong, racy English, his courage and energy, his fine faculties of observation, marked him as a model correspondent, and at the first outbreak of the war he was designated to accompany the Ohio troops in their march upon Western Virginia. He served as a volunteer aid upon the staff of General Morris at Carrick's Ford, where the rebel General Garnett was killed, and later in the campaign he was with Rosecrans in the same capacity at the affair of Carnifex Ferry. Returning to Cincinnati, he began to write editorials for the Gazette, and continued for some time in that employment, with occasional interruptions of field work when there was anything especially worth reporting. He was present at Fort Donelson, and went up the Tennessee River to Pittsburg Landing with our advance. He was the only correspondent on the field in that terrible scene of slaughter, to report which he rose from a sick-bed. He passed the fearful night between the two days of battle among the private soldiers on the bluff, and slept the next night on the victorious field in the tent of General Lew Wallace.

"With the prestige of his Western achievements in journalism, Mr. Reid came to Washington, and took charge of the Gazette Bureau in that city. He distinguished himself at once by his bold, incisive, and energetic correspondence. Among all the pens that made and unmade reputations in Newspaper Row in those stirring days, there was none more dreaded and more courted than his. From a certain ascetic habit of thought, which may, perhaps, be derived from his severe and conscientious ancestry, he was always more ready to criticise than to praise, always more eager in attack than in defence. Yet his attachments, if few, were very powerful, and there are not many finer passages of eulogy in our periodical literature than those in which he has expressed his admiration of his friends, such as Henry Winter Davis, and those eminent citizens of his own State, Chase and Wade and Schenck. The routine work of his Washington life was varied by occasional resumptions of the note-book and saddle. He saw and vividly reported the battle of Fredericksburg, the second Bull Run, and Gettysburg. His political services and his scholarly tastes were at once recognized by an appointment as librarian of the House of Representatives.

"When the war ended, Mr. Reid, whose health had become somewhat impaired by unremitting labor, and who was one of those who believed in the possibility of a genuine peace, and in the complete restoration of the South, gave evidence of his faith by removing to Louisiana, and engaging, in company with General Herron, of Iowa, in the culture of cotton. They planted 2500 acres of land, embracing three farms, and employing 300 hands. The year of 1865 was a disastrous one for planters, but in spite of this the two young Northerners managed their affairs with such skill and prudence that they closed their operations without loss."*

Mr. Reid returned to the old homestead near Xenia, where he spent two years in literary labors, and became a co-proprietor of the Cincinnati Gazette. At the invitation of Horace

* Harper's Weekly, July 1, 1871, p. 597-8.

Greeley, he went to New York city in the summer of 1868, to accept an editorial engagement on The Tribune. He won the respect and entire confidence of that gentleman, so that in the year following he was promoted to be its managing editor. He especially distinguished himself in that responsible position by his daring and comprehensive plans for obtaining the earliest news concerning the Franco-German war, consummated at an enormous cost on his own responsibility, during the absence of Mr. Greeley, who was on a voyage to the Bermudas for the health of his wife.

Johnston Reid

He is the author of three books. After the War, 1866, a vivid description of a Southern tour made between May 1865 and May 1866, along the entire coast-line and across the country, by various routes, into the interior, with the object and best facilities for studying the social condition of the lately revolted States. Ohio in the War: her Statesmen, her Generals, and Soldiers, a carefully digested narrative in two royal octavo volumes, the first of which is devoted to a "History of the State during the war, and the lives of her generals;" while the second contains a "History of her Regiments and other military organizations," 1868; and the Memorial of Horace Greeley, published by the Tribune Association, 1873.

 EDWARD EGGLESTON,

A SHREWD and kindly writer of the humors of life in the West, was born at Vevay, Switzerland county, Indiana, December 10, 1837. His father, a Virginian by birth, was a lawyer of ability and learning. He died at the age of thirty-four, when Edward, the eldest of four children, was nine years old. His mother, a native of Indiana, descended from an old Kentucky family that gave some prominent ministers to the Baptist Church. She was a woman of great force of character, and fine conversational powers. Edward inherited a delicate constitution, and suffered much physical pain throughout his early years. An ambitious student, though never well enough to enter college, he acquired in the intervals of sickness a good knowledge of Latin with a less command of Greek, an extensive acquaintance with the French language and literature, besides a fair use of Spanish and Italian. He was also an incessant reader of good English, including its classic works. In the vain hope of finding some occupation compatible with good health, his childhood passed in continual change of employment from school to farm, from farm to store, and from the store back to school again. He became a member of the Methodist Church at the age of eleven, and perhaps the strict austerity and pietism in which he ruled his youth helped to undermine his health. Seven years later, and perhaps for the twentieth time, his life was despaired of, till a trip to Minnesota recruited his health.

On his return, he became a Methodist preacher, when not quite nineteen years old, riding a four-weeks' circuit and laboring with his usual persistency. Six months of such work forced him to return to Minnesota, and while pastor of a church at St. Peter's in that State, he married a good wife, to whose wisdom and excellence he has attributed much of his later usefulness. At the age of twenty-four, he was pastor of the most prominent church of his denomination in Minnesota. His health, however, repeatedly broke down, and forced him three times to give up the pulpit for secular business, till he reluctantly abandoned all pastoral labor and supported his family by a variety of pursuits. He saw "hard times" in his ministerial life in the Northwest, and often felt the pinch of poverty. Once his salary was less than three hundred dollars, and he kept his family without running in debt, though not a morsel of meat was brought into the house for three weeks.

Edward Eggleston

In the spring of 1866, Dr. Eggleston removed to Evanston, near Chicago, where he held for six months the position of associate editor on the Little Corporal, to which he had already contributed a series of Round Table Stories for children. After a few months of independent writing, wherein he could rejoice at each five or ten dollars gained for an article, in January 1867 he became editor of The Sunday-School Teacher, of Chicago. That paper was then in its infancy, with a circulation of five thousand; and under three years of his management it increased seven-fold. Several practical works, the Sunday-School Conventions and Institutes, and The Sunday-School Manual, aided by his happy address as a speaker, brought him into great favor as a teacher of model schools and conductor of institutes. At this period he wrote many stories for children, and some of these were reprinted in book form in 1870, entitled The Book of Queer Stories. For several years he was the regular Western correspondent of the Independent, and in May 1870 he removed to New York to accept its literary editorship. The office of superintending editor followed on the retirement of Mr. Theodore Tilton in December, and in the July following he resigned to accept the editorship of Hearth and Home. He retained the latter for fifteen months, and saw that journal more than double its circulation. Mr. Blake's Walking-Stick, a Christmas Story for Boys and Girls, was published in 1870, and met with favor. "Huldah the Help," which appeared in the second number of Scribner's Monthly, was his first story for adults. In the fall of 1871, The Hoosier Schoolmaster appeared as a serial in Hearth and Home. In book form it sold nearly twenty thousand copies within a year, and enjoyed an English reprint. It is a vivid and seemingly natural picture of the trials of a young teacher in the West a generation since, when the pedagogue had to face and rule by moral courage lads who were burly enough, and willing enough too, to victimize and thrash the master who chanced to give offence by enforcing discipline.

The End of the World, a Love Story, was begun as a serial in the same journal the spring following, and it met with a pecuniary success yet more encouraging in book-form, ten thousand copies being ordered in advance of publication, while reprints appeared in London and France. The tale deals with the vagaries of the Adventists, or "Millerites," whose plans of life were arranged to meet a speedy dissolution of the world, at a date fixed on a peculiar interpretation of sacred prophecy.

In October, 1872, Mr. Eggleston, then a resident of Brooklyn, resigned his editorship to devote himself solely to literary labor. He began a third serial, The Mystery of Metropolisville, with the new year, and it has since been published: The Circuit Rider, a novel of itinerant life in the West, appeared in 1874.

GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON, a younger brother of Edward Eggleston, and his successor in the editorship of Hearth and Home, was born at Vevay, Indiana, November 26, 1839. He began his collegiate course at Asbury University in 1856, and resumed it the year following at the Richmond College, Virginia. After graduation, he studied law, and was entering on a practice at the Virginia bar when the civil war began. He served four years as private and subaltern in the Confederate army. On the return of peace, he went West and took charge of the correspondence of a leading commercial house. During the summer of 1870 he turned his attention to journalism, beginning as a reporter on the Brooklyn Union; and after eight weeks' work in that capacity, he was promoted to the editorial staff for some marked successes in difficult lines of reporting. He resigned in July, 1871, and after a brief series of editorial contributions to the Evening Post and Tribune, became connected with Hearth and Home, of which he is now editor-in-chief. Besides various contributions to the magazines of the day, he has written one work, a fresh and suggestive manual on culture, entitled, How to Educate Yourself With or Without Masters, 1872.

 SPELLING DOWN THE MASTER — FROM THE HOOSIER SCHOOLMASTER.

"I 'low," said Mrs. Means, as she stuffed the tobacco into her cob pipe after supper on that eventful Wednesday evening, "I 'low they'll appint the Squire to gin out the words to-night. They mos' always do, you see, kase he's the peartest ole man in the deestrick; and I 'low some of the young fellers would have to git up and dust if they would keep up to him. And he uses sech remarkable smart words. He speaks so polite, too. But laws! don't I remember when he was poarer nor Job's turkey? Twenty years ago, when he come to these 'ere diggins, that air Squire Hawkins was a poar Yankee school-master, that said 'pail' instid of bucket, and that called a cow a 'caow,' and that couldn't tell to save his gizzard what we meant by 'low and by right smart. But he's larnt our ways now, an' he's jest as civilized as the rest of us. You would-n know he'd ever been a Yankee. He didn't stay poar long. Not he. He jest married a right rich girl! He! he!" and the old woman grinned at Ralph, and then at Mirandy, and then at the rest, until Ralph shuddered. Nothing was so frightful to him as to be fawned on and grinned at by this old ogre, whose few lonesome, blackish teeth seemed ready to devour him. "He didn't stay poar, you bet a hoss!" and with this the coal was deposited on the pipe, and the lips began to crack like parchment as each puff of smoke escaped. "He married rich, you see," and here another significant look at the young master, and another fond look at Mirandy, as she puffed away reflectively. "His wife had no book-larnin'. She'd been through the spellin'-book wunst, and had got as far as 'asperity' on it a second time. But she couldn't read a word when she was married, and never could. She warn't overly smart. She hadn't hardly got the sense the law allows. But schools was skase in them air days, and, besides, book-larnin' don't do no good to a woman. Makes her stuck up. I never knowed but one gal in my life as had ciphered into fractions, and she was so dog-on stuck up that she turned up her nose one night at a apple-peelin' bekase I tuck a sheet off the bed to splice out the table-cloth, which was ruther short. And the sheet was mos' clean, too. Had-n been slept on more'n wunst or twicet. But I was goin' fer to say that when Squire Hawkins married Virginny Gray he got a heap o' money, or, what's the same thing mostly, a heap o' good land. And that's better'n book-larnin', says I. Ef a girl has gone through all eddication, and got to the rule of three itself, that would-n buy a feather-bed. Squire Hawkins jest put eddication agin the gal's farm, and traded even, an' ef ary one of 'em got swindled, I never heerd no complaints."

And here she looked at Ralph in triumph, her hard face splintering into the hideous semblance of a smile. And Mirandy cast a blushing, gushing, all-imploping, and all-confiding look on the young master.

"I say, ole woman," broke in old Jack, "I say, wot is all this 'ere spoutin' about the Square fer?" and old Jack, having bit off an ounce of "pigtail," returned the plug to his pocket.

As for Ralph, he wanted to die. He had a guilty feeling that this speech of the old lady's had somehow committed him beyond recall to Mirandy. He did not see visions of breach-of-promise suits. But he trembled at the thought of an avenging big brother.

"Hanner, you kin come along, too, ef you're a mind, when you git the dishes washed," said Mrs. Means to the bound girl, as she shut and latched the back door. The Means family had built a new house in front of the old one, as a sort of advertisement of better circumstances, an eruption of shoddy feeling; but when the new building was completed, they found themselves unable to occupy it for anything else than a lumber-room, and so, except a parlor which Mirandy had made an effort to furnish a little (in hope of the blissful time when somebody should "set up" with her of evenings), the new building was almost unoccupied, and the family went in and out of the back door, which, indeed, was the front door also, for, according to a curious custom, the "front" of the house was placed toward the south, though the "big road" (Hoosier for highway) ran along the north-west side, or, rather, past the north-west corner of it.

When the old woman had spoken thus to Hannah and had latched the door, she muttered, "That gal don't never show no gratitude fer favors;" to which Bud rejoined that he didn't think she had no great sight to be pertickler thankful fer. To which Mrs. Means made no reply, thinking it best, perhaps, not to wake up her dutiful son on so interesting a theme as her treatment of Hannah. Ralph felt glad that he was this evening to go to another boarding place. He should not hear the rest of the controversy.

Ralph walked to the school-house with Bill. They were friends again. For when Hank Banta's ducking and his dogged obstinacy in sitting in his wet clothes had brought on a serious fever, Ralph had called together the big boys, and had said: "We must take care of one another, boys. Who will volunteer to take turns sitting up with Henry?" He put his own name down, and all the rest followed.

"William Means and myself will sit up to-night," said Ralph. And poor Bill had been from that moment the teacher's friend. He was chosen to be Ralph's companion. He was Puppy Means no longer! Hank could not be conquered by kindness, and the teacher was made to feel the bitterness of his resentment long after, as we shall find. But Bill Means was for the time entirely placated, and he and Ralph went to spelling-school together.

Every family furnished a candle. There were yellow dips and white dips, burning, smoking, and flaring. There was laughing, and talking, and giggling, and simpering, and ogling, and flirting, and courting. What a dress party is to Fifth Avenue, a spelling-school is to Hoopole County. It is an occasion which is metaphorically inscribed with this legend, "Choose your partners." Spelling is only a blind in Hoopole County, as is dancing on Fifth Avenue. But as there are some in society who love dancing for its own sake, so in Flat Creek district there were those who loved spelling for its own sake, and who, smelling the battle from afar, had come to try their skill in this tournament, hoping to freshen the laurels they had won in their school-days.

"I 'low," said Mr. Means, speaking as the principal school trustee, "I 'low our friend the Square is jest the man to boss this 'ere consarn to-night. Ef nobody objects, I 'll appoint him. Come, Square, don't be bashful. Walk up to the trough, fodder or no fodder, as the man said to his donkey."

There was a general giggle at this, and many of the young swains took occasion to nudge the girls alongside them, ostensibly for the purpose of making them see the joke, but really for the pure pleasure of nudging. The Greeks figured Cupid as naked, probably because he wears so many disguises that they could not select a costume for him.

The Squire came to the front. Ralph made an inventory of the agglomeration which bore the name of Squire Hawkins, as follows:

1. A swallow-tail coat of indefinite age, worn only on state occasions when its owner was called to figure in his public capacity. Either the Squire had grown too large or the coat too small.

2. A pair of black gloves, the most phenomenal, abnormal, and unexpected apparition conceivable in Flat Creek district, where the preachers wore no coats in the summer, and where a black glove was never seen except on the hands of the Squire.

3. A wig of that dirty, waxy color so common to wigs. This one showed a continual inclination to slip off the owner's smooth, bald pate, and the Squire had frequently to adjust it. As his hair had been red, the wig did not accord with his face, and the hair ungrayed was sadly discordant with a face shriveled by age.

4. A semicircular row of whiskers hedging the edge of the jaw and chin. These were dyed a frightful dead black, such as no natural hair or beard ever had. At the roots there was a quarter of an inch of white, giving the whiskers the appearance of having been stuck on.

5. A pair of spectacles "with tortoise-shell rim." Want to slip off.

6. A glass eye, purchased of a peddler, and differing in color from its natural mate, perpetually getting out of focus by turning in or out.

7. A set of false teeth, badly fitted, and given to bobbing up and down.

8. The Squire proper, to whom these patches were loosely attached.

It is an old story that a boy wrote home to his father begging him to come out West, because "mighty mean men got in office out here." But Ralph concluded that some Yankees had taught school in Hoopole County who would not have held a high place in the educational institutions of Massachusetts. Hawkins had some New England idioms, but they were well overlaid by a Western pronunciation.

"La lies and gentlemen," he began, shoving up his spectacles, and sucking his lips over his white teeth to keep them in place, "ladies and gentlemen, young men and maidens, raley I'm obleeged to Mr. Means fer this honor," and the Squire took both hands and turned the top of his head round several inches. Then he adjusted his spectacles. Whether he was obliged to Mr. Means for the honor of being compared to a donkey, was not clear. "I feel in the inmost compartments of my animal spirits a most happifying sense of the success and futility of my endeavors to sarve the people of Flat Creek deestrick, and the people of Tomkins township, in my weak way and manner." This burst of eloquence was delivered with a constrained air and an apparent sense of a danger that he, Squire Hawkins, might fall to pieces in his weak way and manner, and of the success and futility (especially the latter) of all attempts at reconstruction. For by this time the ghastly pupil of the left eye, which was black, was looking away round to the left, while the little blue one on the right twinkled cheerfully toward the front. The front teeth would drop down so that the Squire's mouth was kept nearly closed, and his words whistled through.

"I feel as if I could be grandiloquent on this interesting occasion," twisting his scalp round, "but raley I must forego any such exertions. It is spelling you want. Spelling is the corner-stone, the grand, underlying subterfuge of a good eddication. I put the spellin'-book prepared by the great Daniel Webster alongside the Bible. I do, raley. I think I may put it ahead of the Bible. For if it wurnt for spellin'-books and sich occasions as these, where would the Bible be? I should like to know. The man who got up, who compounded this little work of inextricable valod, was a benefactor to the whole human race or any other." Here the spectacles fell off. The Squire replaced them in some confusion, gave the top of his head another twist, and felt of his glass eye, while poor Shockey stared in wonder, and Betsy Short rolled from side to side at the point of death from the effort to suppress her giggle. Mrs. Means and the other old ladies looked the applause they could not speak.

"I appint Larkin Lanham and Jeems Buchanan fer captings," said the Squire. And the two young men thus named took a stick and tossed it from hand to hand to decide which should have the "first chice." One tossed the stick to the other, who held it fast just where he happened to catch it. Then the first placed his hand above the second, and so the hands were alternately changed to the top. The one who held the stick last without room for the other to take hold had gained the lot. This was tried three times. As Larkin held the stick twice out of three times, he had the choice. He hesitated a moment. Everybody looked toward tall Jim Phillips. But Larkin was fond of a venture on unknown seas, and so he said, "I take the master," while a buzz of surprise ran round the room, and the captain of the other side, as if afraid his opponent would withdraw the choice, retorted quickly, and with a little smack of exultation and defiance in his voice: "And I take Jeems Phillips."

And soon all present, except a few of the old folks, found themselves ranged in opposing hosts, the poor spellers lagging in, with what grace they could, at the foot of the two divisions. The Squire opened his spelling-book and began to give out the words to the two captains, who stood up and spelled against each other. It was not long until Larkin spelled "really" with one l, and had to sit down in confusion, while a murmur of satisfaction ran through the ranks of the opposing forces. His own side bit their lips. The slender figure of the young teacher took the place of the fallen leader, and the excitement made the house very quiet. Ralph dreaded the loss of influence he would suffer if he should be easily spelled down. And at the moment of rising he saw in the darkest corner the figure of a well-dressed young man sitting in the shadow. It made him tremble. Why should his evil genius haunt him! But by a strong effort he turned his attention away from Dr. Small, and listened carefully to the words which the Squire did not pronounce distinctly, spelling them with extreme deliberation. This gave him an air of hesitation which disappointed those on his own side. They wanted him to spell with a dashing assurance. But he did not begin a word until he had mentally felt his way through it. After ten minutes of spelling hard words Jeems Buchanan, the captain on the other side, spelled "atrocious" with an s instead of a c, and subsided, his first choice, Jeems Phillips, coming up against the teacher. This brought the excitement to fever-heat. For though Ralph was chosen first, it was entirely on trust, and most of the company were disappointed. The champion who now stood up against the school-master was a famous speller.

Jim Phillips was a tall, lank, stoop-shouldered fellow, who had never distinguished himself in any other pursuit than spelling. Except in this one art of spelling he was of no account. He could not catch well or bat well in ball. He could not throw well enough to make his mark in that famous Western game of bull-pen. He did not succeed well in any study but that of Webster's Elementary. But in that he was — to use the usual Flat Creek locution — in that he was "a hoss." This genius for spelling is in some people a sixth sense, a matter of intuition. Some spellers are born and not made, and their facility reminds one of the mathematical prodigies that crop out every now and then to bewilder the world. Bud Means, foreseeing that Ralph would be pitted against Jim Phillips, had warned his friend that Jim could "spell like thunder and lightning," and that it "took a powerful smart speller" to beat him, for he knew "a heap of spelling-book." To have "spelled down the master" is next thing to having whipped the biggest bully in Hoopole County, and Jim had "spelled down" the last three masters. He divided the hero-worship of the district with Bud Means.

For half an hour the Squire gave out hard words. What a blessed thing our crooked orthography is! Without it there could be no spelling-schools. As Ralph discovered his opponent's mettle he became more and more cautious. He was now satisfied that Jim would eventually beat him. The fellow evidently knew more about the spelling-book than old Noah Webster himself. As he stood there, with his dull face and long sharp nose, his hands behind his back, and his voice spelling infallibly, it seemed to Hartsook that his superiority must lie in his nose. Ralph's cautiousness answered a double purpose: it enabled him to tread surely, and it was mistaken by Jim for weakness. Phillips was now confident that he could carry off the scalp of the fourth school-master before the evening was over. He spelled eagerly, confidently, brilliantly. Stoop-shouldered as he was, he began to straighten up. In the minds of all the company the odds were in his favor. He saw this, and became ambitious to distinguish himself by spelling without giving the matter any thought.

Ralph always believed that he would have been speedily defeated by Phillips had it not been for two thoughts which braced him. The sinister shadow of young Dr. Small sitting in the dark corner by the water-bucket nerved him. A victory over Phillips was a defeat to one who wished only ill to the young school-master. The other thought that kept his pluck alive was the recollection of Bull. He approached a word as Bull approached the raccoon. He did not take hold until he was sure of his game. When he took hold, it was with a quiet assurance of success. As Ralph spelled in this dogged way for half an hour the hardest words the Squire could find, the excitement steadily rose in all parts of the house, and Ralph's friends even ventured to whisper that "may be Jim had cotched his match after all!"

But Phillips never doubted of his success.

"Theodolite," said the Squire.

"T-h-e, the, o-d, theod, o, theodo, l-y-t-e, theodolite," spelled the champion.

"Next," said the Squire, nearly losing his teeth in his excitement.

Ralph spelled the word slowly and correctly, and the conquered champion sat down in confusion. The excitement was so great for some minutes that the spelling was suspended. Everybody in the house had shown sympathy with one or the other of the combatants, except the silent shadow in the corner. It had not moved during the contest, and did not show any interest now in the result.

"Gewhilliky crickets! Thunder and lightning! Licked him all to smash!" said Bud, rubbing his hands on his knees. "That beats my time all holler!"

And Betsy Short giggled until her tuck-comb fell out, though she was on the defeated side.

Shocky got up and danced with pleasure.

But one suffocating look from the aqueous eyes of Mirandy destroyed the last spark of Ralph's pleasure in his triumph, and sent that awful below-zero feeling all through him.

"He's powerful smart, is the master," said old Jack to Mr. Pete Jones. "He'll beat the whole kit and tuck of 'em afore he's through. I know'd he was smart. That's the reason I tuck him," proceeded Mr. Means.

"Yaas, but he don't lick enough. Not nigh," answered Pete Jones. "No lickin', no larnin', says I."

It was now not so hard. The other spellers on the opposite side went down quickly under the hard words which the Squire gave out. The master had mowed down all but a few, his opponents had given up the battle, and all had lost their keen interest in a contest to which there could be but one conclusion, for there were only the poor spellers left. But Ralph Hartsook ran against a stump where he was least expecting it. It was the Squire's custom, when one of the smaller scholars or poorer spellers rose to spell against the master, to give out eight or ten easy words that they might have some breathing spell before being slaughtered, and then to give a poser or two which soon settled them. He let them run a little, as a cat does a doomed mouse. There was now but one person left on the opposite side, and as she rose in her blue calico dress, Ralph recognized Hannah, the pound girl at old Jack Means's. She had not attended school in the district, and had never spelled in spelling-school before, and was chosen last as an uncertain quantity. The Squire began with easy words of two syllables, from that page of Webster, so well known to all who ever thumbed it, as "Baker," from the word that stands at the top of the page. She spelled these words in an absent and uninterested manner. As everybody knew that she would have to go down as soon as this preliminary skirmishing was over, everybody began to get ready to go home, and already there was the buzz of preparation. Young men were timidly asking girls if "they could see them safe home," which is the approved formula, and were trembling in mortal fear of "the mitten." Presently the Squire, thinking it time to close the contest, pulled his scalp forward, adjusted his glass eye, which had been examining his nose long enough, and turned over the leaves of the book to the great words at the place known to spellers as "Incomprehensibility," and began to give out those "words of eight syllables with the accent on the sixth." Listless scholars now turned round, and ceased to whisper, in order to be in at the master's final triumph. But to their surprise, "ole Miss Meanses' white nigger," as some of them called her, in allusion to her slavish life, spelled these great words with as perfect ease as the master. Still, not doubting the result, the Squire turned from place to place and selected all the hard words he could find. The school became utterly quiet, the excitement was too great for the ordinary buzz. Would "Meanses' Hanner" beat the master? Beat the master that had laid out Jim Phillips? Everybody's sympathy was now turned to Hannah. Ralph noticed that even Shocky had deserted him, and that his face grew brilliant every time that Hannah spelled a word. In fact, Ralph deserted himself. As he saw the fine, timid face of the girl so long oppressed flush and shine with interest, as he looked at the rather low but broad and intelligent brow and the fresh, white complexion, and saw the rich, womanly nature coming to the surface under the influence of applause and sympathy, he did not want to beat. If he had not felt that a victory given would insult her, he would have missed intentionally. The bull-dog, the stern, relentless setting of the will, had gone, he knew not whither. And there came in its place, as he looked in that face, a something which he did not understand. You did not, gentle reader, the first time it came to you.

The Squire was puzzled. He had given out all the hard words in the book. He again pulled the top of his head forward. Then he wiped his spectacles and put them on. Then out of the depths of his pocket he fished up a list of words just coming into use in those days—words not in the spelling-book. He regarded the paper attentively with his blue right eye. His black left eye meanwhile fixed itself in such a stare on Mirandy Means that she shuddered and hid her eyes in her red silk handkerchief.

"Daguerreotype," sniffed the Squire. It was Ralph's turn.

"D-a-u, dau——"

"Next."

And Hannah spelled it right.

Such a buzz followed that Betsy Short's giggle could not be heard, but Shocky shouted, "Hanner beat! My Hanner spelled down the master!" And Ralph went over and congratulated her.

And Dr. Small sat perfectly still in the corner.

And then the Squire called them to order, and said: "As our friend Hanner Thomson is the only one left on her side, she will have to spell against nearly all on t'other side. I shall, therefore, take the liberty of procrastinating the completion of this interesting and exacting contest until to-morrow evening. I hope our friend Hanner may again carry off the cypress crown of glory. There is nothing better for us than healthful and kindly simulation."

Dr. Small, who knew the road to practice, escorted Mirandy, and Bud went home with somebody else. The others of the Means family hurried on, while Hannah, the champion, stayed behind a minute to speak to Shocky. Perhaps it was because Ralph saw that Hannah must go alone that he suddenly remembered having left something which was of no consequence, and resolved to go round by Mr. Means's and get it. Another of Cupid's disguises.

 F. BRET HARTE.

FRANCIS BRET HARTE has written some peculiarly racy and artistic sketches, in prose and poetry, of the turbulent mining classes of California and their vicious hangers-on, wherein he has, with the unerring instinct of genius, sought to reveal the remnants of honor in manliness and love in womanliness, despite the besmirchings of vice.

He was born at Albany, New York, in 1839, and his ancestry was, in part, of Dutch descent. In his childhood he lost his father, who was a scholar of ripe culture and a teacher in the Albany Female Seminary, who left little property for his family. After the usual common school education, and when only seventeen, he went to California with his widowed mother. "He walked from San Francisco to the mines at Sonora, and there opened a school. The mines at Sonora probably offered as little encouragement, fifteen or sixteen years ago, to an opening school, as any other quarter of the globe could have done, and Mr. Harte's experiment was brief, and, as we understand, not triumphal; though it helped on his own self-education, by suggesting the use of mining-life in literature, and possibly furnishing material for his early sketch, Miss. He then tried mining; and having picked up the readily acquired art of printing, he became a compositor in a newspaper office at Eureka, where it is said (upon what authority we do not know) that he began life as an author by 'setting-up' various essays and contributing them to the journal in type. During the absence of the editor he once controlled the journal, and incurred popular wrath for censuring a little massacre of Indians by the leading citizens and most remarkable men of the locality. His erring sympathies excited something like a mob, and doubtless involved the editor in endless apologies and explanations."*

After some experiences of active life as the mounted messenger of an express company, and as express agent in several mountain towns, which gave the young observer full knowledge of the picturesque features of mining life, Mr. Bret Harte returned to San Francisco about 1857. He accepted the position of compositor on a weekly literary journal, and by contributing several spirited sketches in type to its pages soon earned an editorial position on The Golden Era. His pieces at this time, chiefly local sketches, include: A Boy's Dog, Sidewalkings, and From a Balcony.† He made many contributions to the daily papers, and held positions under the surveyor-general and the U. S. marshal.‡ His marriage soon after put an end to his wanderings, and it was followed by "an unsuccessful newspaper enterprise of his own — unsuccessful commercially, though The Californian, which he and Mr. Webb managed, was lively and agreeable literature, and merits remembrance for the publication of Mr. Harte's delightful parodies, The Condensed Novels."

He was appointed Secretary of the U. S. Branch Mint at San Francisco in 1864, and in his six years of service found leisure to write some of his popular poems, such as John Burns of Gettysburg, The Pliocene Skull, The Society upon the Stanislow, How are you, Sanitary? etc., which were generally printed in the daily newspapers. The Overland Monthly was founded in July, 1868, with Mr. Harte as its editor; and the rare abilities displayed in that position soon made his magazine as great a favorite on the Atlantic as on the Pacific coast.

Francis Bret Harte.

He contributed to its columns a series of fresh, dramatic, and sympathetic sketches of Californian life, which have won a permanent place in literature. The first, The Luck of Roaring Camp, a story of how a baby came to rule the hearts of a rough, dissolute gang of miners, appeared in the August number. It made his reputation, although it had a narrow escape from the waste-basket at the hands of the proof-reader, — a prudish and indignant woman. It was followed, six months later, by The Outcasts of Poker Flat, relating how a party of profligates were banished from camp in winter, and how they perished by cold and hunger to save some innocent companions. Then came Miggles, Tennessee's Partner, an Idyl of Red Gulch, and many other revelations of the spark of the divine in brutalized humanity. Some quaint verses printed in September, 1870, as The Heathen Chinese, and now known as Plain Language from Truthful James, a masterly satire against the hue and cry that the Chinese were shiftless and weak-minded settlers, were wonderfully popular; yet they had been reluctantly printed by their author, as almost too frivolous for preservation.

Mr. Harte resigned his editorship in the spring of 1871, and declined the professorship of Recent Literature in the University of California, to try his literary fortunes in the more cultured East. An effort was made in Chicago to found a magazine under his charge, and when the project was abandoned he accepted a lucrative call to Boston, in connection with the

* Every Saturday, January 14, 1871.

† Scribner's Magazine, June, 1873, pp. 158-61.

‡ Drake's Biographical Dictionary.

Atlantic Monthly. Among his subsequent poems and sketches were A Greyport Legend, A Newport Legend, The Princess, Bob, How Santa Claus came to Simpson's Bar, etc. In 1873, he wrote a novelette for Scribner's Monthly, entitled An Episode of Fiddletown.

Mr. Harte has issued seven volumes of prose and poetry. The Lost Galleon, with some fugitive verses, appeared in San Francisco, about 1867; Condensed Novels, and Other Papers, at New York in 1867, and a revised edition at Boston four years later; Luck of Roaring Camp, and Other Sketches, 1870; Poems, 1870; East and West Poems, 1871; Red Line and Diamond editions of Complete Poetical Works, 1873; Mrs. Skagg's Husband, and Other Sketches, 1873.

In the main, these books contain reprints of the California writings which made Bret Harte's reputation by their intuitive insight into the heart of our common humanity. Besides Her Letter, Truthful James' Answer, and Dickens in Camp, some of the poems in dialect, are peculiarly fascinating, as Dow's Flat, In the Tunnel, and Alkali Station. Every friend, however, must regret the insertion of such an unworthy parody on Mr. Whittier's Maud Muller as Mrs. Judge Jenkins. The Condensed Novels contain pungent caricatures of the mannerisms of leading novelists, including Chas. Reade, Benjamin Disraeli, Cooper, Lever, Dumas, Bulwer, Dickens, Marryatt, Wilkie Collins, Victor Hugo, Michelet, etc. A number of the sketches have been translated into French and German, and the latter translator, the old poet Ferdinand Freiligrath, pays in his preface this tribute to the peculiar excellence of the young American author: *

"Nevertheless he remains what he is—the Californian and the gold-digger. But the gold for which he has dug, and which he found, is not the gold in the bed of rivers,—not the gold in veins of mountains; it is the gold of love, of goodness, of fidelity, of humanity, which even in rude and wild hearts,—even under the rubbish of vices, and sins,—remains forever uneradicated from the human heart. That he there searched for this gold,—that he found it there and triumphantly exhibited it to the world,—that is his greatness and his merit."

 HER LETTER—FROM POEMS.

I'm sitting alone by the fire,
Dressed just as I came from the dance,
In a robe even you would admire,—
It cost a cool thousand in France;
I'm be-diamonded out of all reason,
My hair is done up in a cue:
In short, sir, "the belle of the season"
Is wasting an hour on you.

A dozen engagements I've broken:
I left in the midst of a set:
Likewise a proposal, half spoken,
That waits—on the stairs—for me yet.
They say he'll be rich,—when he grows up,—
And then he adores me indeed.
And you, sir, are turning your nose up,
Three thousand miles off, as you read.

"And how do I like my position?"
"And what do I think of New York?"

"And now, in my higher ambition,
With whom do I waltz, flirt, or talk?"
"And is n't it nice to have riches,
And diamonds, and silks, and all that?"
"And are n't it a change to the ditches
And tunnels of Poverty Flat?"

Well, yes,—if you saw us out driving
Each day in the park, four-in-hand,—
If you saw poor dear mamma contriving
To look supernaturally grand,—
If you saw papa's pictures, as taken
By Brady, and tinted at that,— You'd never suspect he sold bacon
And flour at Poverty Flat.

And yet, just this moment, when sitting
In the glare of the grand chandelier,—
In the bustle and glitter befitting
The "finest soirée of the year,"—
In the mists of a gaze de Chambéry,
And the hum of the smallest of talk,—
Somehow, Joe, I thought of the "Ferry,"
And the dance that we had on "The Fork";

Of Harrison's barn, with its muster
Of flags festooned over the wall;
Of the candles that shed their soft lustre
And tallow on head-dress and shawl;
Of the steps that we took to one fiddle;
Of the dress of my queer vis-à-vis;
And how I once went down the middle
With the man who shot Sandy McGee;

Of the moon that was quietly sleeping
On the hill, when the time came to go:
Of the few baby peaks that were peeping
From under their bedclothes of snow;
Of that ride,—that to me was the rarest;
Of—the something you said at the gate.
Ah, Joe, then I was n't an heiress
To "the best-paying lead in the State."

Well, well, it's all past; yet it's funny
To think, as I stood in the glare
Of fashion and beauty and money
That I should be thinking, right there,
Of some one who breasted high-water,
And swam the North Fork, and all that,
Just to dance with old Folinsbee's daughter,
The Lily of Poverty Flat.

But goodness! what nonsense I'm writing!
(Mamma says my taste still is low,)
Instead of my triumphs reciting,
I'm spooning on Joseph,—heigh-ho!
And I'm to be "finished" by travel,— Whatever's the meaning of that,—
O, why did papa strike pay gravel
In drifting on Poverty Flat?

Good night,—here's the end of my paper;
Good night,—if the longitude please,—
For may be, while wasting my taper,
Your sun's climbing over the trees.
But know, if you have n't got riches,
And are poor, dearest Joe, and all that,
That my heart's somewhere there in the ditches,
And you've struck it,—on Poverty Flat.

 HIS ANSWER TO "HER LETTER."

Reported by Truthful James.

Being asked by an intimate party,—
Which the same I would term as a friend—
Which his health it were vain to call hearty,
Since the mind to deceit it might lend;

For his arm it was broken quite recent,
 And has something gone wrong with his lung—
 Which is why it is proper and decent
 I should write what he runs off his tongue:

First, he says, Miss, he's read through your letter
 To the end,—and the end came too soon;
 That a slight illness kept him your debtor
 (Which for weeks he was wild as a loon);
 That his spirits are buoyant as yours is;
 That with you, Miss, he challenges Fate
 (Which the language that invalid uses
 At times it were vain to relate).

And he says that the mountains are fairer
 For once being held in your thought;
 That each rock holds a wealth that is rarer
 Than ever by gold-seeker sought
 (Which are words he would put in these pages,
 By a party not given to guile;
 Which the same not, at date, paying wages,
 Might produce in the sinful a smile).

He remembers the ball at the Ferry,
 And the ride, and the gate, and the vow,
 And the rose that you gave him,—that very Same rose he is treasuring now
 (Which his blanket he's kicked on his trunk, Miss,
 And insists on his legs being free;
 And his language to me from his bunk, Miss,
 Is frequent and painful and free);

He hopes you are wearing no willows,
 But are happy and gay all the while;
 That he knows (which this dodging of pillows
 Imparts but small ease to the style,
 And the same you will pardon),—he knows, Miss,
 That, though parted by many a mile,
 Yet were he lying under the snows, Miss,
 They'd melt into tears at your smile.

And you'll still think of him in your pleasures,
 In your brief twilight dreams of the past;
 In this green laurel-spray that he treasures,
 It was plucked where your parting was last;
 In this specimen,—but a small trifle,—
 It will do for a pin for your shawl
 (Which the truth not to wickedly stifle
 Was his last week's "clean up,"—and his all).

He's asleep, which the same might seem strange,
 Miss,
 Were it not that I scorn to deny
 That I raised his last dose, for a change, Miss,
 In view that his fever was high;
 But he lies there quite peaceful and pensive.
 And now, my respects, Miss, to you;
 Which my language, although comprehensive,
 Might seem to be freedom,—it's true.

Which I have a small favor to ask you,
 As concerns a bull-pup, which the same,—
 If the duty would not overtask you,—
 You would please to procure for me, game;
 And send per express to the Flat, Miss,
 Which they say York is famed for the breed,
 Which though words of deceit may be that, Miss,
 I'll trust to your taste, Miss, indeed.

P. S.—Which this same interfering
 Into other folks' way I despise;
 Yet if it so be I was hearing
 That it's just empty pockets as lies
 Betwixt you and Joseph, it follers,
 That, having no family claims,
 Here's my pile; which it's six hundred dollars,
 As is yours, with respects,

TRUTHFUL JAMES.

PLAIN LANGUAGE FROM TRUTHFUL JAMES.
 Table Mountain, 1870.

Which I wish to remark,—
 And my language is plain,—
 That for ways that are dark,
 And for tricks that are vain,
 The heathen Chinese is peculiar.
 Which the same I would rise to explain.

Ah Sin was his name;
 And I shall not deny
 In regard to the same
 What that name might imply,
 But his smile it was pensive and childlike,
 As I frequent remarked to Bill Nye.

It was August the third;
 And quite soft was the skies;
 Which it might be inferred
 That Ah Sin was likewise;
 Yet he played it that day upon William
 And me in a way I despise.

Which we had a small game,
 And Ah Sin took a hand:
 It was Euchre. The same
 He did not understand;
 But he smiled as he sat by the table,
 With the smile that was childlike and bland.

Yet the cards they were stocked
 In a way that I grieve,
 And my feelings were shocked
 At the state of Nye's sleeve:
 Which was stuffed full of aces and bowers,
 And the same with intent to deceive.

But the hands that were played
 By that heathen Chinese,
 And the points that he made
 Were frightful to see,—
 Till at last he put down a right bower,
 Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

Then I looked up at Nye,
 And he gazed upon me;
 And he rose with a sigh,
 And said, "Can this be?
 We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor,"—
 And he went for that heathen Chinese.

In the scene that ensued
 I did not take a hand,
 But the floor it was strewed
 Like the leaves on the strand
 With the cards that Ah Sin had been hiding,
 In the game "he did not understand."

In his sleeves, which were long,
 He had twenty-four packs,—
 Which was coming it strong,
 Yet I state but the facts;
 And we found on his nails, which were taper,
 What is frequent in tapers,—that's wax.

Which is why I remark,
 And my language is plain,
 That for ways that are dark,
 And for tricks that are vain,
 The heathen Chinese is peculiar,—
 Which the same I am free to maintain.

JOHN BURNS OF GETTYSBURG.
 Have you heard the story that gossips tell
 Of Burns of Gettysburg?—No? Ah, well:
 Brief is the glory that hero earns,
 Briefer the story of poor John Burns:
 He was the fellow who won renown,—

The only man who did n't back down
 When the rebels rode through his native town:
 But held his own in the fight next day,
 When all his townfolk ran away.
 That was in July, sixty-three,
 The very day that General Lee,
 Flower of Southern chivalry,
 Baffled and beaten, backward reeled
 From a stubborn Meade and a barren field.
 I might tell how, but the day before,
 John Burns stood at his cottage door,
 Looking down the village street,
 Where, in the shade of his peaceful vine,
 He heard the low of his gathered kine,
 And felt their breath with incense sweet;
 Or I might say, when the sunset burned
 The old farm gable, he thought it turned
 The milk that fell, in a babbling flood
 Into the milk-pail, red as blood!
 Or how he fancied the hum of bees
 Were bullets buzzing among the trees.
 But all such fanciful thoughts as these
 Were strange to a practical man like Burns,
 Who minded only his own concerns,
 Troubled no more by fancies fine
 Than one of his calm-eyed, long-tailed kine, —
 Quite old-fashioned and matter-of-fact,
 Slow to argue, but quick to act.
 That was the reason, as some folk say,
 He fought so well on that terrible day.

And it was terrible. On the right
 Raged for hours the heady fight,
 Thundered the battery's double bass, —
 Difficult music for men to face;
 While on the left — where now the graves
 Undulate like the living waves
 That all that day unceasing swept
 Up to the pits the rebels kept —
 Round shot ploughed the upland glades,
 Sown with bullets, reaped with blades;
 Shattered fences here and there
 Tossed their splinters in the air;
 The very trees were stripped and bare;
 The barns that once held yellow grain
 Were heaped with harvests of the slain;
 The cattle bellowed on the plain,
 The turkeys screamed with might and main,
 And brooding barn-fowl left their rest
 With strange shells bursting in each nest.

Just where the tide of battle turns,
 Erect and lonely stood old John Burns.
 How do you think the man was dressed?
 He wore an ancient long buff vest,
 Yellow as saffron, — but his best;
 And, buttoned over his manly breast,
 Was a bright blue coat, with a rolling collar,
 And large gilt buttons, — size of a dollar, —
 With tails that the country-folk called "swaller."
 He wore a broad-brimmed, bell-crowned hat,
 White as the locks on which it sat.
 Never had such a sight been seen
 For forty years on the village green,
 Since old John Burns was a country beau,
 And went to the "quillings" long ago.

Close at his elbows all that day,
 Veterans of the Peninsula,
 Sunburnt and bearded, charged away;
 And striplings, downy of lip and chin, —
 Clerks that the Home Guard mustered in, —
 Glanced, as they passed, at the hat he wore,
 Then at the rifle his right hand bore;
 And hailed him, from out their youthful lore,
 With scraps of a slangy répertoire:

"How are you, White Hat!" "Put her through!"
 "Your head's level," and "Bully for you!"
 Called him "Daddy," — begged he'd disclose
 The name of the tailor who made his clothes,
 And what was the value he set on those;
 While Burns, unmindful of jeer and scoff,
 Stood there picking the rebels off, —
 With his long brown rifle, and bell-crown hat,
 And the swallow-tails they were laughing at.

'T was but a moment, for that respect
 Which clothes all courage their voices checked,
 And something the wildest could understand
 Spake in the old man's strong right hand;
 And his corded throat, and the lurking frown
 Of his eyebrows under his old bell-crown;
 Until, as they gazed, there crept an awe
 Through the ranks in whispers, and some men saw

In the antique vestments and long white hair,
 The Past of the Nation in battle there;
 And some of the soldiers since declare
 That the gleam of his old white hat afar,
 Like the crested plume of the brave Navarre,
 That day was their oriflamme of war.

So raged the battle. You know the rest:
 How the rebels, beaten and backward pressed,
 Broke at the final charge and ran.
 At which John Burns — a practical man —
 Shouldered his rifle, unbent his brows,
 And then went back to his bees and cows.

That is the story of old John Burns:
 This is the moral the reader learns:
 In fighting the battle, the question's whether
 You'll show a hat that's white, or a feather!

 A GREYPORT LEGEND (1797). — FROM EAST AND WEST POEMS.

They ran through the streets of the seaport town;
 They peered from the decks of the ships that lay:
 The cold sea-fog that came whitening down
 Was never as cold or white as they.

"Ho, Starbuck and Pinckney and Tenterden!
 Run for your shallops, gather your men,
 Scatter your boats on the lower bay."

Good cause for fear! In the thick midday
 The hulk that lay by the rotting pier,
 Filled with the children in happy play,
 Parted its moorings, and drifted clear, —
 Drifted clear beyond the reach or call, —
 Thirteen children they were in all, —
 All adrift in the lower bay!

Said a hard-faced skipper, "God help us all!
 She will not float till the turning tide!"
 Said his wife, "My darling will hear my call,
 Whether in sea or heaven she bide!"

And she lifted a quavering voice and high,
 Wild and strange as a sea-bird's cry,
 Till they shuddered and wondered at her side.

The fog drove down on each laboring crew,
 Veiled each from each and the sky and shore:
 There was not a sound but the breath they drew,
 And the lap of water and creak of oar;
 And they felt the breath of the downs, fresh blown

O'er leagues of clover and cold gray stone,
 But not from the lips that had gone before.

They come no more. But they tell the tale,
 That, when fogs are thick on the harbor reef,
 The mackerel fishers shorten sail;
 For the signal they know will bring relief.

For the voices of children, still at play
In a phantom bulk that drifts away
Through channels whose waters never fail.

It is but a foolish shipman's tale,
A theme for a poet's idle page;
But still, when the mists of doubt prevail,
And we lie becalmed by the shores of Age,
We hear from the misty troubled shore
The voice of the children gone before,
Drawing the soul to its anchorage.

 DICKENS IN CAMP.

Above the pines the moon was slowly drifting,
The river sang below;
The dim Sierras, far beyond, uplifting
Their minarets of snow.

The roaring camp-fire, with rude humor, painted
The ruddy tints of health
On haggard face and form that drooped and fainted
In the fierce race for wealth;

Till one arose, and from his pack's scant treasure
A hoarded volume drew,
And cards were dropped from hands of listless leisure
To hear the tale anew;

And then, while round them shadows gathered faster,
And as the fire-light fell,
He read aloud the book wherein the Master
Had writ of "Little Nell."

Perhaps 't was boyish fancy, — for the reader
Was youngest of them all, —
But, as he read, from clustering pine and cedar
A silence seemed to fall;

The fir-trees, gathering closer in the shadows,
Listened in every spray,
While the whole camp, with "Nell" on English
meadows,
Wandered and lost their way.

And so in mountain solitudes — o'ertaken
As by some spell divine —
Their cares dropped from them like the needles shaken
From out the gusty pine.

Lost is that camp, and wasted all its fire:
And he who wrought that spell? —
Ah, towering pine and stately Kentish spire,
Ye have one tale to tell!

Lost is that camp! but let its fragrant story
Blend with the breath that thrills
With hop-vines' incense all the pensive glory
That fills the Kentish hills.

And on that grave where English oak and holly
And laurel wreaths intertwine,
Deem it not all a too presumptuous folly, —
This spray of Western pine!
JULY, 1870.

 TENNESSEE'S PARTNER — FROM THE LUCK OF ROARING CAMP.

I do not think that we ever knew his real name. Our ignorance of it certainly never gave us any social inconvenience, for at Sandy Bar in 1854 most men were christened anew. Sometimes these appellatives were derived from some distinctiveness of dress, as in the case of "Dungaree Jack"; or from some peculiarity of habit, as shown in "Saleratus Bill," so called from an undue proportion of that chemical in his daily bread; or from some unlucky slip, as exhibited in "The Iron Pirate," a mild, inoffensive man, who earned that baleful title by his unfortunate mispronunciation of the term "iron pyrites." Perhaps this may have been the beginning of a rude heraldry; but I am constrained to think that it was because a man's real name in that day rested solely upon his own unsupported statement. "Call yourself Clifford, do you?" said Boston, addressing a timid new-comer with infinite scorn; "hell is full of such Cliffords!" He then introduced the unfortunate man, whose name happened to be really Clifford, as "Jay-bird Charley," — an unhallowed inspiration of the moment that clung to him ever after.

But to return to Tennessee's Partner, whom we never knew by any other than this relative title; that he had ever existed as a separate and distinct individuality we only learned later. It seems that in 1853 he left Poker Flat to go to San Francisco, ostensibly to procure a wife. He never got any farther than Stockton. At that place he was attracted by a young person who waited upon the table at the hotel where he took his meals. One morning he said something to her which caused her to smile not unkindly, to somewhat coquettishly break a plate of toast over his upturned, serious, simple face, and to retreat to the kitchen. He followed her, and emerged a few moments later, covered with more toast and victory. That day week they were married by a Justice of the Peace, and returned to Poker Flat. I am aware that something more might be made of this episode, but I prefer to tell it as it was current at Sandy Bar, — in the gulches and bar-rooms — where all sentiment was modified by a strong sense of humor.

Of their married felicity but little is known, perhaps for the reason that Tennessee, then living with his partner, one day took occasion to say something to the bride on his own account, at which, it is said, she smiled not unkindly and chastely retreated, — this time as far as Marysville, where Tennessee followed her, and where they went to housekeeping without the aid of a Justice of the Peace. Tennessee's Partner took the loss of his wife simply and seriously, as was his fashion. But to everybody's surprise, when Tennessee one day returned from Marysville, without his partner's wife, — she having smiled and retreated with somebody else, — Tennessee's Partner was the first man to shake his hand and greet him with affection. The boys who had gathered in the cañon to see the shooting were naturally indignant. Their indignation might have found vent in sarcasm but for a certain look in Tennessee's Partner's eye that indicated a lack of humorous appreciation. In fact, he was a grave man, with a steady application to practical detail which was unpleasant in a difficulty.

Meanwhile a popular feeling against Tennessee had grown up on the Bar. He was known to be a gambler; he was suspected to be a thief. In these suspicious Tennessee's Partner was equally compromised; his continued intimacy with Tennessee after the affair above quoted could only be accounted for on the hypothesis of a copartnership of crime. At last Tennessee's guilt became flagrant. One day he overtook a stranger on his way to Red Dog. The stranger afterward related that Tennessee beguiled the time with interesting anecdote and reminiscence, but illogically concluded the interview in the following words: "And now, young man, I'll trouble you for your knife, your pistols, and your money. You see your weppings might get you into trouble at Red Dog, and your money's a temptation to the evilly disposed. I think you said your address was San Francisco. I shall endeavor to call." It may be stated here that Tennessee had a fine flow of humor, which no business preoccupation could wholly subdue.

This exploit was his last. Red Dog and Sandy Bar made common cause against the highwayman. Tennessee was hunted in very much the same fashion as his prototype, the grizzly. As the toils closed around him, he made a desperate dash through the Bar, emptying his revolver at the crowd before the Arcade Saloon, and so on up Grizzly Cañon; but at its farther extremity he was stopped by a small man on a gray horse. The men looked at each other a moment in silence. Both were fearless; both self-possessed and independent; and both types of a civilization that in the seventeenth century would have been called heroic, but, in the nineteenth simply "reckless." "What have you got there? — I call," said Tennessee, quietly. "Two bowers and an ace," said the stranger, as quietly, showing two revolvers and a bowie-knife. "That takes me," returned Tennessee; and with this gambler's epigram, he threw away his useless pistol, and rode back with his captor.

It was a warm night. The cool breeze which usually sprang up with the going down of the sun behind the chaparral-crested mountain was that evening withheld from Sandy Bar. The little cañon was stifling with heated resinous odors, and the decaying drift-wood on the Bar sent forth faint, sickening exhalations. The feverishness of day and its fierce passions still filled the camp. Lights moved restlessly along the bank of the river, striking no answering reflection from its tawny current. Against the blackness of the pines the windows of the old loft above the express-office stood out staringly bright; and through their curtainless panes the loungers below could see the forms of those who were even then deciding the fate of Tennessee. And above all this, etched on the dark firmament, rose the Sierra, remote and passionless, crowned with remoter passionless stars.

The trial of Tennessee was conducted as fairly as was consistent with a judge and jury who felt themselves to some extent obliged to justify, in their verdict, the previous irregularities of arrest and indictment. The law of Sandy Bar was implacable, but not vengeful. The excitement and personal feeling of the chase were over; with Tennessee safe in their hands they were ready to listen patiently to any defence, which they were already satisfied was insufficient. There being no doubt in their own minds, they were willing to give the prisoner the benefit of any that might exist. Secure in the hypothesis that he ought to be hanged, on general principles, they indulged him with more latitude of defence than his reckless hardihood seemed to ask. The judge appeared to be more anxious than the prisoner, who, otherwise unconcerned, evidently took a grim pleasure in the responsibility he had created. "I don't take any hand in this yer game," had been his invariable, but good humored reply to all questions. The Judge—who was also his captor—for a moment vaguely regretted that he had not shot him "on sight," that morning, but presently dismissed this human weakness as unworthy of the judicial mind. Nevertheless, when there was a tap at the door, and it was said that Tennessee's Partner was there on behalf of the prisoner, he was admitted at once without question. Perhaps the younger members of the jury, to whom the proceedings were becoming irksomely thoughtful, hailed him as a relief.

For he was not, certainly, an imposing figure. Short and stout, with a square face, sunburned into a preternatural redness, clad in a loose duck "jumper," and trousers streaked and splashed with red soil, his aspect under any circumstances would have been quaint, and was now even ridiculous. As he stooped to deposit at his feet a heavy carpet-bag he was carrying, it became obvious, from partially developed legends and inscriptions, that the material with which his trousers had been patched had been originally intended for a less ambitious covering. Yet he advanced with great gravity, and after having shaken the hand of each person in the room with labored cordiality, he wiped his serious, perplexed face on a red bandanna handkerchief, a shade lighter than his complexion, laid his powerful hand upon the table to steady himself, and thus addressed the Judge:—

"I was passin' by," he began, by way of apology, "and I thought I'd just step in and see how things was gittin' on with Tennessee thar, — my pardner. It's a hot night. I disremember any sich weather before on the Bar."

He paused a moment, but nobody volunteering any other meteorological recollection, he again had recourse to his pocket-handkerchief, and for some moments mopped his face diligently.

"Have you anything to say in behalf of the prisoner?" said the Judge, finally.

"That's it," said Tennessee's Partner, in a tone of relief, "I come yar as Tennessee's Pardner, — knowing him nigh on four years, off and on, wet and dry, in luck and out o' luck. His ways ain't allers my ways, but thar ain't any p'int in that young man, thar ain't any liveliness as he's been up to, as I don't know. And you sez to me, sez you, — confidential-like, and between man and man, — sez you, 'Do you know anything in his behalf?' and I sez to you, sez I, — confidential-like, as between man and man, — 'What should a man know of his pardner?'"

"Is this all you have to say?" asked the Judge, impatiently, feeling, perhaps, that a dangerous sympathy of humor was beginning to humanize the Court.

"That's so," continued Tennessee's Partner. "It ain't for me to say anything agin' him. And now, what's the case? Here's Tennessee wants money, wants it bad, and doesn't like to ask it of his old pardner. Well, what does Tennessee do? He lays for a stranger, and he fetches that stranger. And you lays for him, and you fetches him; and the honors is easy. And I put it to you, bein' a far-minded man, and to you, gentlemen, all as far-minded men, of this isn't so?"

"Prisoner," said the Judge, interrupting, "have you any question to ask this man?"

"No! no!" continued Tennessee's Partner, hastily. "I play this yer hand alone. To come down to the bed-rock, it's just this: Tennessee, thar, has played it pretty rough and expensive-like on a stranger, and on this yer camp. And now, what's the fair thing? Some would say more; some would say less. Here's seventeen hundred dollars in coarse gold and a watch, — it's about all my pile, — and call it square!"

And before a hand could be raised to prevent him, he had emptied the contents of his carpet-bag upon the table.

For a moment his life was in jeopardy. One or two men sprang to their feet, several hands groped for hidden weapons, and a suggestion to "throw him from the window" was only over-ridden by a gesture from the Judge. Tennessee laughed. And apparently oblivious of the excitement, Tennessee's Partner improved the opportunity to mop his face again with his handkerchief.

When order was restored, and the man was made to understand, by the use of forcible figures and rhetoric, that Tennessee's offence could not be condoned by money, his face took a more serious and sanguinary hue, and those who were nearest to him noticed that his rough hand trembled slightly on the table. He hesitated a moment as he slowly returned the gold to the carpet-bag, as if he had not yet entirely caught the elevated sense of justice which swayed the tribunal, and was perplexed with the belief that he had not offered enough. Then he turned to the Judge, and saying, "This yer is a lone hand, played alone, and without my pardner," he bowed to the jury and was about to withdraw, when the Judge called him back. "If you have anything to say to Tennessee you had better say it now." For the first time that evening the eyes of the prisoner and his strange advocate met. Tennessee smiled, showed his white teeth, and, saying, "Euchred, old man!" held out his hand. Tennessee's Partner took it in his own, and saying, "I just dropped in as I was passin', to see how things was gettin' on," let the hand passively fall, and adding that "it was a warm night," again mopped his face with his handkerchief, and without another word withdrew.

The two men never again met each other alive. For the unparalleled insult of a bribe offered to Judge Lynch—who, whether bigoted, weak, or narrow, was at least incorruptible—firmly fixed in the mind of that mythical personage any wavering determination of Tennessee's fate; and at the break of day he was marched, closely guarded, to meet it at the top of Marley's Hill.

How he met it, how cool he was, how he refused to say anything, how perfect were the arrangements of the committee, were all duly reported, with the addition of a warning moral and example to all future evil-doers, in the Red Dog Clarion, by its editor, who was present, and to whose vigorous English I cheerfully refer the reader. But the beauty of that midsummer morning, the blessed amity of earth and air and sky, the awakened life of the free woods and hills, the joyous renewal and promise of Nature, and, above all, the infinite Serenity that thrilled through each, was not reported, as not being a part of the social lesson. And yet, when the weak and foolish deed was done, and a life, with its possibilities and responsibilities, had passed out of the misshapen thing that dangled between earth and sky, the birds sang, the flowers bloomed, the sun shone, as cheerily as before; and possibly the Red Dog Clarion was right.

Tennessee's Partner was not in the group that surrounded the ominous tree. But as they turned to disperse attention was drawn to the singular appearance of a motionless donkey-cart halted at the side of the road. As they approached, they at once recognized the venerable "Jenny" and the two-wheeled cart as the property of Tennessee's Partner,—used by him in carrying dirt from his claim; and a few paces distant the owner of the equipage himself, sitting under a buck-eye tree, wiping the perspiration from his glowing face. In answer to an inquiry, he said he had come for the body of the "diseased," "if it was all the same to the committee." He did not wish to "hurry anything"; he could "wait." He was not working that day; and when the gentlemen were done with the "diseased," he would take him. "Ef thar is any present," he added, in his simple, serious way, "as would care to jine in the fun'l, they kin come." Perhaps it was from a sense of humor, which I have already intimated was a feature of Sandy Bar,—perhaps it was from something even better than that; but two-thirds of the loungers accepted the invitation at once.

It was noon when the body of Tennessee was delivered into the hands of his partner. As the cart drew up to the fatal tree, we noticed that it contained a rough, oblong box,—apparently made from a section of sluicing,—and half filled with bark and the tassels of pine. The cart was further decorated with slips of willow, and made fragrant with buck-eye blossoms. When the body was deposited in the box, Tennessee's Partner drew over it a piece of tarred canvas, and gravely mounting the narrow seat in front, with his feet upon the shafts, urged the little donkey forward. The equipage moved slowly on at that decorous pace which was habitual with "Jenny" even under less solemn circumstances. The men—half curiously, half jestingly, but all good humoredly—strolled along beside the cart; some in advance, some a little in the rear of the homely catafalque. But, whether from the narrowing of the road or some present sense of decorum, as the cart passed on, the company fell to the rear in couples, keeping step, and otherwise assuming the external show of a formal procession. Jack Follinsbee, who had at the outset played a funeral march in dumb show upon an imaginary trombone, desisted, from a lack of sympathy and appreciation,—not having, perhaps, your true humorist's capacity to be content with the enjoyment of his own fun.

The way led through Grizzly Cañon,—by this time clothed in funeral drapery and shadows. The redwoods burying their moccasined feet in the red soil, stood in Indian-file along the track, trailing an uncouth benediction from their bending boughs upon the passing bier. A hare, surprised into helpless inactivity, sat upright and pulsating in the ferns by the roadside, as the cor-tege went by. Squirrels hastened to gain a secure outlook from higher bounds; and the blue-jays, spreading their wings, fluttered before them like outriders, until the outskirts of Sandy Bar were reached, and the solitary cabin of Tennessee's Partner.

Viewed under more favorable circumstances, it would not have been a cheerful place. The unpicturesque site, the rude and unlovely outlines, the unsavory details, which distinguish the nest-building of the California miner, were all here, with the dreariness of decay superadded. A few paces from the cabin there was a rough enclosure, which, in the brief days of Tennessee's Partner's matrimonial felicity, had been used as a garden, but was now overgrown with fern. As we approached it we were surprised to find that what we had taken for a recent attempt at cultivation was the broken soil about an open grave.

The cart was halted before the enclosure; and rejecting the offers of assistance with the same air of simple self-reliance he had displayed throughout, Tennessee's Partner lifted the rough coffin on his back, and deposited it, unaided, within the shallow grave. He then nailed down the board which served as a lid; and mounting the little mound of earth beside it, took off his hat, and slowly mopped his face with his handkerchief. This the crowd felt was a preliminary to speech; and they disposed themselves variously on stumps and boulders, and sat expectant.

"When a man," began Tennessee's Partner, slowly, "has been running free all day, what's the natural thing for him to do? Why, to come home. And if he ain't in a condition to go home, what can his best friend do? Why, bring him home! And here's Tennessee has been running free, and we brings him home from his wandering." He paused, and picked up a fragment of quartz, rubbed it thoughtfully on his sleeve, and went on: "It ain't the first time that I've packed him on my back, as you see'd me now. It ain't the first time that I brought him to this yer cabin when he could n't help himself; it ain't the first time that I and 'Jinny' have waited for him on yon hill, and picked him up, and so fetched him home, when he could n't speak, and did n't know me. And now that it's the last time, why—" he paused, and rubbed the quartz gently on his sleeve—"you see it's sort of rough on his pardner. And now, gentlemen," he added, abruptly, picking up his long-handle shovel, "the fun's over: and my thanks, and Tennessee's thanks, to you for your trouble."

Resisting any proffers of assistance, he began to fill in the grave, turning his back upon the crowd, that after a few moments' hesitation, gradually withdrew. As they crossed the little ridge that hid Sandy Bar from view, some, looking back, thought they could see Tennessee's Partner, his work done, sitting upon the grave, his shovel between his knees, and his face buried in his red bandanna handkerchief. But it was argued by others that you could n't tell his face from his handkerchief at that distance; and this point remained undecided.

In the reaction that followed the feverish excitement of that day, Tennessee's Partner was not forgotten. A secret investigation had cleared him of any complicity in Tennessee's guilt, and left only a suspicion of his general sanity. Sandy Bar made a point of calling on him, and proffering various uncouth, but well-meant kindnesses. But from that day, his rude health and great strength seemed visibly to decline; and when the rainy season fairly set in, and the tiny grass blades were beginning to peep from the rocky mound above Tennessee's grave, he took to his bed.

One night, when the pines beside the cabin were swaying in the storm, and trailing their slender fingers over the roof, and the roar and rush of the swollen river were heard below, Tennessee's Partner lifted his head from the pillow, saying, "It is time to go for Tennessee; I must put 'Jinny' in the cart;" and would have risen from his bed, but for the restraint of his attendant. Struggling, he still pursued his singular fancy; "There, now, steady, 'Jinny,'—steady, old girl. How dark it is! Look out for the ruts,—and look out for him, too, old gal. Sometimes, you know, when he's blind drunk, he drops down right in the trail. Keep on straight up to the pine on the top of the hill. Thar—I told you so!—thar he is,—coming this way, too,—all by himself, sober, and his face a-shining. Tennessee! Pardner!"

And so they met.

HOW SANTA CLAUS CAME TO SIMPSON'S BAR—FROM MRS. SKAGGS'S HUSBAND.

. . . It was nearly midnight, when the festivities were interrupted. "Hush," said Dick Bullen, holding up his hand. It was the querulous voice of Johnny from his adjacent closet: "O dad!"

The Old Man rose hurriedly and disappeared in the closet. Presently he reappeared. "His rheumatiz is coming on agin bad," he explained, "and he wants rubbin'." He lifted the demijohn of whiskey from the table and shook it. It was empty. Dick Bullen put down his tin cup with an embarrassed laugh. So did the others. The Old Man examined their contents and said hopefully, "I reckon that's enough; he don't need much. You hold on all o' you for a spell, and I'll be back;" and vanished in the closet with an old flannel shirt and the whiskey. The door closed but imperfectly, and the following dialogue was distinctly audible:—

"Now, sonny, whar does she ache worst?"

"Sometimes over yer and sometimes under yer; but it's most powerful from yer to yer. Rub yer, dad."

A silence seemed to indicate a brisk rubbing. Then Johnny

"Hevin' a good time out yer, dad?"

"Yes, sonny."

"To-morrer's Chrississ,—ain't it?"

"Yes, sonny. How does she feel now?"

"Better. Rub a little furdur down. Wot's Chrississ, anyway? Wot's it all about?"

"O, it's a day."

This exhaustive definition was apparently satisfactory, for there was a silent interval of rubbing. Presently Johnny again:

"Mar sez that everywhere else but yer everybody gives things to everybody Chrississ, and then she just waded inter you. She sez thar's a man they call Sandy Claws, not a white man, you know, but a kind o' Chieemin, comes down the chimbley night afore Chrississ and gives things to children,—boys like me. Puts 'em in their butes! That's what she tried to play upon me. Easy now, pop, whar are you rubbin' to,—thet's a mile from the place. She jest made that up, didn't she, jest to aggravate me and you? Don't rub thar . . . Why, dad!"

In the great quiet that seemed to have fallen upon the house the sigh of the near pines and the drip of leaves without was very distinct. Johnny's voice, too, was lowered as he went on, "Don't you take on now, fur I'm gettin' all right fast. Wot's the boys doin' out thar?"

The Old Man partly opened the door and peered through. His guests were sitting there sociably enough, and there were a few silver coins and a lean buckskin purse on the table. "Bettin' on suthin,—some little game or 'nother. They're all right," he replied to Johnny, and recommenced his rubbing.

"I'd like to take a hand and win some money," said Johnny, reflectively, after a pause.

The Old Man glibly repeated what was evidently a familiar formula, that if Johnny would wait until he struck it rich in the tunnel he'd have lots of money, etc., etc.

"Yes," said Johnny, "but you don't. And whether you strike it or I win it, it's about the same. It's all luck. But it's mighty cur'ous about Chrississ,—ain't it? Why do they call it Chrississ?"

Perhaps from some instinctive deference to the overhearing of his guests, or from some vague sense of incongruity, the Old Man's reply was so low as to be inaudible beyond the room.

"Yes," said Johnny, with some slight abatement of interest, "I've heerd o' him before. Thar, that'll do, dad. I don't ache near so bad as I did. Now wrap me tight in this yer blanket. So. Now," he added in a muffled whisper, "sit down yer by me till I go to sleep." To assure himself of obedience, he disengaged one hand from the blanket and, grasping his father's sleeve, again composed himself to rest.

For some moments, the Old Man waited patiently. Then the unwonted stillness of the house excited his curiosity, and without moving from the bed, he cautiously opened the door with his disengaged hand, and looked into the main room. To his infinite surprise it was dark and deserted. But even then a smouldering log on the hearth broke, and by the upspringing blaze he saw the figure of Dick Bullen sitting by the dying embers.

"Hello!"

Dick started, rose, and came somewhat unsteadily toward him.

"Whar's the boys?" said the Old Man.

"Gone up the cañon on a little pasear. They're coming back for me in a minit. I'm waitin' round for 'em. What are you starin' at, Old Man?" he added with a forced laugh; "do you think I'm drunk?"

The Old Man might have been pardoned the supposition, for Dick's eyes were humid and his face flushed. He loitered and lounged back to the chimney, yawned, shook himself, buttoned up his coat, and laughed. "Liquor ain't so plenty as that, Old Man. Now don't you git up," he continued, as the Old Man made a movement to release his sleeve from Johnny's hand. "Don't you mind manners. Sit jest whar you be; I'm goin' in a jiffy. Thar, that's them now."

There was a low tap at the door. Dick Bullen opened it quickly, nodded "Good night" to his host and disappeared. The Old Man would have followed him but for the hand that still unconsciously grasped his sleeve. He could have easily disengaged it: it was small, weak, and emaciated. But perhaps because it was small, weak, and emaciated, he changed his mind, and, drawing his chair closer to his bed, rested his head upon it. In this defenceless attitude the potency of his earlier potations surprised him. The room flickered and faded before his eyes, reappeared, faded again, went out, and left him—asleep.

Meantime Dick Bullen, closing the door, confronted his companions. "Are you ready?" said Staples. "Ready," said Dick; "what's the time?" "Past twelve," was the reply; "can you make it?—it's nigh on fifty miles, the round trip hither and yon." "I reckon," returned Dick, shortly. "Whar's the mare?" "Bill and Jack's holdin' her at the crossin'." "Let 'em hold on a minit longer," said Dick.

He turned and re-entered the house softly. By the light of the guttering candle and dying fire he saw that the door of the little room was open. He stepped towards it on tiptoe and looked in. The Old Man had fallen back in his chair, snoring, his helpless feet thrust out in a line with his collapsed shoulders, and his hat pulled over his eyes. Beside him, on a narrow wooden bedstead, lay Johnny, muffled tightly in a blanket that hid all save a strip of forehead and a few curls damp with perspiration. Dick Bullen made a step forward, hesitated, and glanced over his shoulder into the deserted room. Everything was quiet. With a sudden resolution he parted his huge mustaches with both hands and stooped over the sleeping boy. But even as he did so a mischievous blast, lying in wait, swooped down the chimney, rekindled the hearth, and lit up the room with a shameless glow from which Dick fled in bashful terror.

His companions were already waiting for him at the crossing. Two of them were struggling in the darkness, with some strange misshapen bulk, which as Dick came nearer took the semblance of a great yellow horse.

It was the mare. She was not a pretty picture. From her Roman nose to her rising haunches, from her arched spine hidden by the stiff machillas of a Mexican saddle, to her thick, straight, bony legs, there was not a line of equine grace. In her half blind but wholly vicious white eyes, in her protruding under lip, in her monstrous color, there was nothing but ugliness and vice.

"Now then," said Staples, "stand cl'ar of her heels, boys, and up with you. Don't miss your first holt on her mane, and mind ye get your off stirrup quick. Ready!"

There was a leap, a scrambling struggle, a bound, a wild retreat of the crowd, a circle of flying hoofs, two springless leaps that jarred the earth, a rapid play and jingle of spurs, a plunge, and then the voice of Dick somewhere in the darkness, "All right!"

"Don't take the lower road back unless you're hard pushed for time! Don't hold her in down hill! We'll be at the ford at five. G'lang! Hoopa! Mula! GO!"

A splash, a spark struck from the ledge in the road, a clatter in the rocky cut beyond, and Dick was gone.

* * * * *

Sing, O Muse, the ride of Richard Bullen! Sing, O Muse of chivalrous men! the sacred quests, the doughty deeds, the battery of low churls, the fearsome ride and grewsome perils of the Flower of Simpson's Bar! Alack! she is dainty, this Muse! She will have none of this bucking brute and swaggering, ragged rider, and I must fain follow him in prose, afoot!

It was one o'clock, and yet he had only gained Rattlesnake Hill. For in that time Jovita had rehearsed to him all her imperfections and practiced all her vices. Thrice had she stumbled. Twice had she thrown up her Roman nose in a straight line with the reins, and, resisting bit and spur, struck out madly across country. Twice had she reared, and, rearing, fallen backward; and twice had the agile Dick, unharmed, regained his seat before she found her vicious legs again. And a mile beyond them, at the foot of a long hill, was Rattlesnake Creek. Dick knew that here was the crucial test of his ability to perform his enterprise, set his teeth grimly, put his knees well into her flanks, and changed his defensive tactics to brisk aggression. Bullied and maddened, Jovita began the descent of the hill. Here the artful Richard pretended to hold her in with ostentatious oburgation and well-feigned cries of alarm. It is unnecessary to add that Jovita instantly ran away. Nor need I state the time made in the descent; it is written in the chronicles of Simpson's Bar. Enough that in another moment, as it seemed to Dick, she was splashing on the overflowed banks of Rattlesnake Creek. As Dick expected, the momentum she had acquired carried her beyond the point of balking, and, holding her well together for a mighty leap, they dashed into the middle of the swiftly flowing current. A few moments of kicking, wading, and swimming, and Dick drew a long breath on the opposite bank.

The road from Rattlesnake Creek to Red Mountain was tolerably level. Either the plunge in Rattlesnake Creek had dampened her baleful fire, or the art which led to it had shown her the superior wickedness of her rider, for Jovita no longer wasted her surplus energy in wanton conceits. Once she bucked, but it was from force of habit; once she shied, but it was from a new freshly painted meeting-house at the crossing of the county road. Hollows, ditches, gravelly deposits, patches of freshly springing grasses, flew from beneath her rattling hoofs. She began to smell unpleasantly, once or twice she coughed slightly, but there was no abatement of her strength or speed. By two o'clock he had passed Red Mountain and begun the descent to the plain. Ten minutes later the driver of the fast Pioneer coach was overtaken and passed by a "man on a Pinto hoss," — an event sufficiently notable for remark. At half-past two Dick rose in his stirrups with a great shout. Stars were glittering through the rifted clouds, and beyond him, out of the plain, rose two spires, a flagstaff, and a straggling line of black objects. Dick jingled his spurs and swung his riata, Jovita bounded forward, and in another moment they swept into Tuttleville and drew up before the wooden piazza of "The Hotel of All Nations."

What transpired that night at Tuttleville is not strictly a part of this record. Briefly I may state, however, that after Jovita had been handed over to a sleepy ostler, whom she at once kicked into unpleasant consciousness, Dick sallied out with the bar-keeper for a tour of the sleeping town. Lights still gleamed from a few saloons and gambling-houses; but, avoiding these, they stopped before several closed shops, and by persistent tapping and judicious outcry roused the proprietors from their beds, and made them unbar the doors of the magazines and expose their wares. Sometimes they were met by curses, but oftener by interest and some concern in their needs, and the interview was invariably concluded by a drink. It was three o'clock before this pleasantry was given over, and with a small waterproof bag of India-rubber strapped on his shoulders Dick returned to the hotel. But here he was waylaid by Beauty, — Beauty opulent in charms, affluent in dress, persuasive in speech, and Spanish in accent! In vain she repeated the invitation in "Excelsior," happily scorned by all Alpine-climbing youth, and rejected by this child of the Sierras, — a rejection softened in this instance by a laugh and his last gold coin. And then he sprang to the saddle and dashed down the lonely street and out into the lonelier plain, where presently the lights, the black line of houses, the spires, and the flagstaff sank into the earth behind him again and were lost in the distance.

The storm had cleared away, the air was brisk and cold, the outlines of adjacent landmarks were distinct, but it was half-past four before Dick reached the meeting-house and the crossing of the county road. To avoid the rising grade he had taken a longer and more circuitous road, in whose viscid mud Jovita sank fetlock deep at every bound. It was a poor preparation for a steady ascent of five miles more; but Jovita, gathering her legs under her, took it all with her usual blind, unreasoning fury, and a half hour later reached the long level that led to Rattlesnake Creek. Another half hour later would bring him to the creek. He threw the reins lightly upon the neck of the mare, chirruped to her, and began to sing.

Suddenly Jovita shied with a bound that would have unseated a less practised rider. Hanging to her rein was a figure that had leaped from the bank, and at the same time from the road before her arose a shadowy horse and rider. "Throw up your hands," commanded this second apparition with an oath.

Dick felt the mare tremble, quiver, and apparently sink under him. He knew what it meant and was prepared.

"Stand aside, Jack Simpson, I know you, you d—d thief. Let me pass or —"

He did not finish the sentence. Jovita rose straight in the air with a terrific bound, throwing the figure from her bit with a single shake of her vicious head, and charged with deadly malevolence down on the impediment before her. An oath, a pistol-shot, horse and highwayman rolled over in the road, and the next moment Jovita was a hundred yards away. But the good right arm of her rider, shattered by a bullet, dropped helplessly at his side.

Without slacking his speed he shifted the reins to his left hand. But a few moments later he was obliged to halt and tighten the saddle-girths that had slipped in the onset. This in his crippled condition took some time. He had no fear of pursuit, but looking up he saw that the eastern stars were already paling, and that the distant peaks had lost their ghostly whiteness, and now stood out blackly against a lighter sky. Day was upon him. Then, completely absorbed in a single idea, he forgot the pain of his wound, and mounting again he dashed on toward Rattlesnake Creek. But now Jovita's breath came broken by gasps, Dick reeled in his saddle, and brighter and brighter grew the sky.

Ride, Richard; run, Jovita; linger, O day!

For the last few rods there was a roaring in his ears. Was it exhaustion from loss of blood, or what? He was dazed and giddy as he swept down the hill, and did not recognize his surroundings. Had he taken the wrong road, or was this Rattlesnake Creek?

It was. But the brawling creek he had swam a few hours before had risen, more than doubled its volume, and now rolled a swift and resistless river between him and Rattlesnake Hill. For the first time that night Richard's heart sank within him. The river, the mountain, the quickening east, swam before his eyes. He shut them to recover his self-control. In that brief interval, by some fantastic mental process, the little room at Simpson's Bar and the figures of the sleeping father and son rose upon him. He opened his eyes wildly, cast off his coat, pistol, boots, and saddle, bound his precious pack tightly to his shoulders, grasped the bare flanks of Jovita with his bared knees, and with a shout dashed into the yellow water. A cry rose from the opposite bank as the head of a man and horse struggled for a few moments against the battling current, and then were swept away amidst uprooted trees and whirling drift-wood.

* * * * *
The Old Man started and woke. The fire on the hearth was dead, the candle in the outer room flickering in its socket, and somebody was rapping at the door. He opened it, but fell back with a cry before the dripping, half-naked figure that reeled against the doorpost.

"Dick!"

"Hush! Is he awake yet?"

"No,—but, Dick?"

"Dry up, you old fool! Get me some whiskey quick!" The Old Man flew and returned with—an empty bottle! Dick would have sworn, but his strength was not equal to the occasion. He staggered, caught at the handle of the door, and motioned to the Old Man.

"Thar's suthin' in my pack yer for Johnny. Take it off. I can't."

The Old Man unstrapped the pack and laid it before the exhausted man.

"Open it, quick!"

He did so with trembling fingers. It contained only a few poor toys,—cheap and barbaric enough, goodness knows, but bright with paint and tinsel. One of them was broken; another, I fear, was irretrievably ruined by water; and on the third—ah me! there was a cruel spot.

"It don't look like much, that's a fact," said Dick, ruefully. . . . "But it's the best we could do. . . . Take 'em, Old Man, and put 'em in his stocking, and tell him—tell him, you know—hold me, Old Man—" The Old Man caught at his sinking figure. "Tell him," said Dick, with a weak little laugh,— "tell him Sandy Claus has come."

And even so, bedraggled, ragged, unshaven, and unshorn, with one arm hanging helplessly at his side, Santa Claus came to Simpson's Bar and fell fainting on the first threshold. The Christmas dawn came slowly after, touching the remoter peaks with the rosy warmth of ineffable love. And it looked so tenderly on Simpson's Bar that the whole mountain, as if caught in a generous action, blushed to the skies.

 WILLIAM B. WRIGHT,

A POET whom a leading and veteran critic has ranked, for his purely imaginative power and creative fancy, "among the few genuine singers of the day," and has described from his own writings as "the man of gentle and gracious culture, conversant with the great masters of song, informed with the wealth of lettered knowledge, and studious of artistic effect,"* was born in Orange county, New York, in 1840. He was graduated at Princeton with high honor in 1859, and continued his studies elsewhere in Greek and German Philosophy. Abandoning the idea of preparing as a tutor for college, he returned home in 1861 to enter on the study of medicine; but the outbreak of the war led him to enlist as a private in the New York Fifth Artillery. He served with Gen. Sheridan, became Judge Advocate on Gen. Crawford's staff, and was mustered out in May, 1865, Lieutenant and brevet Major. In the following year, he entered the New York Medical College, and after graduation practiced in Orange county. He published a poem entitled The Highland Ramble in 1867 (Adams & Co., Boston). Four years later, he accepted the professorship of Ancient Languages in the State Normal School, at Buffalo, where he still remains.

Mr. Wright issued in 1873 a second volume: The Brook, and Other Poems. Our extract will illustrate the poetic grace of the leading poem, whereby the artistic description of the passage of a brook from its mountain spring through the meadows to the sea is made to delicately suggest the chief phases in the life of man. The minor poems are grouped under the title of "Songs and Studies."

 THE BROOK—AN EXTRACT.

Brief the search until I heard him,
Sweetest truant at his play;
Such a soul of laughter stirred him,
Could not rest by night or day.
Brief the search until I found him
Gambolling, crumpling all his bed;
Woods and rocks, that loved him, round him,
And the brakes twined overhead.
As I came, away he sped
On fleet pearly feet of lightning
Just behind a rosy cleft:
Flashing thence with sudden brightening,
Tossed his baby head aloft,
And with cries of merriment
Down the sombre forest went.

Madly merry elfin soul,
That peeps askance from silver bubbles,
Whose careless foot the tawny shoal
Plagues with fifty frothy troubles,
Where is thy birthplace, what thy goal?

From the mountain's stubborn womb,
See, he springs, a new-born creature,
Clothed with grace and of immortal feature.

From its jail of eldest gloom,
Lo, his naked spirit is set free,
And, drunken with his godly liberty,
Roms and frisks the heavenly child;
And as a meteor wild,

His bright hair flung in flashing trail
Backward from his forehead pale,
Tiptoe upon nimble feet
He visits and he quits the sight,
An apparition fair and fleet,
Shaped of wonder and pure delight.
O joy, that from a thing so dark
There could be struck so bright a spark!

'Tis but the joyous quality
Of life, that pricks his heart with glee.
So blithe, so rash, he cannot guess
What burdens gather to oppress,
What world-old wrestlers, stanch and grim,
Sit by the wayside waiting him;
Whose savage grapple without ruth,
Unlocks the tender joints of youth.
The child among his rattles,
What though he not forbode
The shock and din of battles
That wait him on the road!
Suffice unto the happy elf
The wonders of his present self.
What profit, though he knew that Fate
Already snuffed his track,
Yea, from behind his very back
Reached stealthy fingers to create
From the toys he breaks and idly scatters
Adamantine links of future fetters!
Yet offices of sovereign power
The gods have granted him for dower;

* New York Weekly Tribune, February 5, 1873.

A sceptre ripens for his hand,
 And mustering myriads wait for his command.
 A kingly germ, that shall wax vast
 And over many lands his shadow cast.
 And old alliances and strong
 To him by right of birth belong ;
 Treaties knit with cloud and sun,
 That never will their bond outrun.
 Fortunate the soul that greets him
 Soft and kindly when he meets him.

What need has my sweet child of wings ?
 He can out-trip all adverse things.
 See his silver sandal flash,
 So cunning-wise, though seeming-rash !
 So soft to glide, so quick to flit,
 What force can bind or intermit
 The motions of his flowing wit ?
 In his mystic pace does dwell
 All the speed of Neptune's shell,
 All the stealth of Mercury's heel,
 All the fire of Phœbus' wheel.
 Languors dull or grosser slumber
 Never stay his ramping limb :
 The gods gave all their gayety
 When they modelled him.
 Playmates has he without number,
 And oh the joy it is to see
 Their games of utter jollity,
 The graceful grapples, the pettish quarrels
 Mixt with careless peals and blithest carols.
 Oft his lithe athletic pranks
 Scale the rampart of his banks.
 Now he flecks with wanton spurt
 The thicket's flower-broidered skirt ;
 Now with light malicious dart
 He elbows all the sleepy sedges ;
 Quarrying now with spleenful art,
 Caverns all his crumbling edges ;
 Now his clear thews plump and strain,
 As with tug and might and main
 He wrestles with the bulky ledges,
 Who with thievish foot thrust out
 Trip him headlong from his route.
 But no boisterous hap or rûde
 Can repress his nimble mood.
 Vanquished, he wears the victor's crown,
 And, often thrown, is never down.
 May'st dash him side-wise from the height—
 Some god has taught him this fine sleight—
 He will upon his feet alight.

Who could lure thee but to tarry
 While he spake a word with thee,
 Take in a net thy spirit wary,
 Till it told its cause of glee ?
 So oft thy humor veers and doubles,
 I cannot guess thy will or reason,
 Or thrid the tangle of thy mind,
 That, never seeking, still does find ;
 Drinks deep through every tingling nerve,
 And thrills through each voluptuous curve
 With dizzy transports of the season.
 But when thy waves are crisped and curled
 Against a lily or a pebble,
 And all about thy woodland world
 Echoes thy dainty-trilling treble,
 Or when with airy leap and laughter
 Thou dancest down the sloping shelf,
 Trailing a hundred ringlets after,
 I sometimes catch the sprightly elf,
 Who cannot always hide himself.
 A wisdom to thyself, a gladness,
 It well beseems thee to disdain
 The mortal's haughty scope of sadness,
 The griefs that make our lives profane.

Oh glorious skein of sunlight,
 Fresh from the spindle of love divine
 Thou art to me a heavenly sign
 To cheer, ennoble, and invite.
 Something within me strongly pleads
 To follow where thy splendor leads
 I cannot doubt the path is right :
 I give myself to thee to guide me,
 Be thou my fate, whate'er betide me.

THE STRAYS.

The budding maid, not half a flower,
 When first the warbling days of June
 Build nests about the household bower,
 Loves to unlatch her little shoon
 And wade and paddle in the grass
 From matin to the glare of noon.
 The tickled soles in frolic pass
 Their wonted range ; she slips along
 From mead to mead, a truant lass.
 Gliding, she purls, a brook of song,
 Tripping, she chirrs, a happy dove,
 Dancing, she shouts, a bacchante strong.
 Crowfoot and buttercup for love
 She gathers, but the fingers fair,
 Though bursting, cannot pluck enough.
 She thrusts them, blithesome, in her hair
 Longwise and crosswise, to her taste,
 And since her hands have yet to spare,
 She trims her bosom and her waist ;
 Then looping up in graceful fold
 Her span of apron, fills in haste
 Its fairy hollow with the gold,
 And, gazing sadly round her, sighs,
 Nigh weeps, because it will not hold
 All the bright meadows in her eyes.
 Anon she smiles, in thought to please
 Her mother with a dear surprise,
 And sitting plaits upon her knees
 A chaplet ; round it throng to sip
 A choir of splendor-drunken bees.
 Right homeward then with trill and skip
 She gambols, dangling from her arm
 The sweet grace of her workmanship ;
 And, entering, springs with kisses warm,
 And clambering to the mother's breast
 About her temples girds the charm ;
 Who lightly chides the foolish quest,
 The truant prank, the hidden play,
 But sits for secret gladness dressed
 In those poor weeds the summer's day.
 O darling maid — And shall I chide
 The wayward muse, the elfin stray
 That brings from brook-marge and hill-side
 Flower-foam and waifs of woodland rhyme ?
 Not I : he not the grace denied
 To wanton in her honeyed prime,
 If faintest foretaste but abide
 Of sober thought in riper time.

VALOR.

Temper the will by day and night
 Flexile as Arab cimeter,
 Yet rough as Saxon mace to smite.
 Burnish it fondly : leave no blur :
 Pendragon's blade of fate arose
 From mythic depths of character.
 Wise Merlin's scrolls perforce disclose
 Their wizard meanings to his eyes ;
 He knows by valor what he knows.
 Love draws the sword and saints are wise
 To seize a timely bolt of fire
 And storm the gates of Paradise.

Craves the coy goddess of the lyre
 Heroic hands her virgin flower
 To pluck, and answer her desire.
 For all fair things are quick with power :
 Beauty for mother, strength for sire,
 These gave the world his natal hour.

 R. K. WEEKS.

ROBERT KELLY WEEKS, a poet who exhibits a subtle imaginative fancy, was born in New York city in September, 1840. He entered Yale College at the age of eighteen, and was graduated in 1863. Returning to New York, he began the study of the law, and graduated at the Law School of Columbia College in 1864.

Mr. Weeks has printed two volumes of poetry: Poems, 1866; Episodes and Lyric Pieces, 1870. The pieces in the latter book are classed into two parts — with Men and Women, and with Nature — a distinction that illustrates the versatility of their themes. Besides the poems here extracted, occur some longer and powerful pieces, as the Return of Paris, and In Corinth, a tale of the persecutions of the early Christians, wherein a Greek lover voluntarily lays down his own life to save the honor of the maiden he loves.

 SONG — FROM EPISODES AND LYRIC PIECES.

An under-cloud that half reveals,
 Half hides a splendid star;
 (Even then more clear than others are,
 As always queenlier.)
 Such was my love to her.

A wilting wind that bends a rose
 Not very long nor far;
 (Even then more fresh than others are,
 As always lovelier.)
 Such was my love to her.

O star of stars, as clear and high!
 O rose of roses, none the less!
 The cloud is blown out of the sky,
 The wind is in the wilderness.

 A CHANGE.

He said, "Dew wets
 No dearer flowers
 Than violets:
 Thro' long Spring hours
 The wandering bees
 Prove all, and meet
 No flowers so sweet."

I planted these,
 Whose perfumed bloom
 I thought would please;
 And he for whom
 I bade them grow, —
 Loves roses now!

God pity me!
 I cannot see
 The end of pain.
 The flowers I know
 Bloom not in vain,

Since Thou wilt care
 To find them fair:
 But Thou art — where?
 Faith falters so
 When love grows dim,
 And 'twas for him
 I bade them grow!

 A PAUSE.

To have the imploring hands of her
 Clasped on his shoulder, and his cheek
 Brushed over slowly by the stir
 Of thrilling hair, and not to speak;

To see within the uplifted eyes
 More than the fallen fringes prove
 Enough to hide, to see the rise
 Of tear-drops in them, and not move;

Would this be strange? And yet at last,
 What weary man may not do this,
 Seeing when the long pursuit is past,
 To only cease how sweet it is?

To only cease and be as one
 Who, when the fever leaves him, lies
 Careless of what is come or gone,
 Which yet he cannot realize;

For all his little thought is spent
 In wonders what it was that gave
 To be so quiet and content,
 While yet he is not in the grave.

 A DAY.

1.

Where but few feet ever stray,
 Far beyond the path's advances,
 All alone an idler lay
 Half a breezy summer day
 Underneath a chestnut's branches;

2.

Not a stranger to the place,
 For the daisies nodded to him,
 And the grass in lines of grace
 Bending over, touched his face
 With light kisses thrilling through him.

3.

Close beside his harmless hand
 Swinging bees would suck the clover,
 And a moment to be scanned
 Sunlit butterflies expand
 Easy wings to bear them over.

4.

All about him, full of glee,
 Careless cricket-songs were ringing,
 And the wild birds in the tree
 Settled down where he could see
 While he heard them gayly singing.

5.

Overhead he saw the trees
 Nod and beckon to each other,
 And, too glad to be at ease,
 Saw the green leaves in the breeze
 Tingle touching one another;

6.

Saw the little lonely rill
 In a line of greener growing,
 Slipping downward from the hill,
 Curving here and there at will,
 Through the tangled grasses going;

7.

Saw the play about his feet
Of the flickering light and shadow;
Saw the sunlight go to meet
Glancing corn and waving wheat;
Saw the mowers in the meadow;

8.

Saw the waves leap up and play
On the palpitating river,
Flowing out to find the bay,
And the white ships far away
Sailing on and on forever;

9.

Saw the hills upon whose side
Slow cloud-shadows love to dally;
Saw the high hills, with the pride
Of dark forests belted wide,
Over many a misty valley;

10.

Saw far-off the thin and steep
Cloudy mountain-lands of wonder,
Where unseen the torrents leap
Over rifted rocks that keep Echoing memories of the thunder;

11.

Saw the self-supporting sky
Ever more and more receding;
Loth to linger, loth to fly,
Saw the clouds go floating by,
Stranger shapes to strange succeeding;

12.

Saw and mused and went away,
Whether light or heavy hearted
It were hard for him to say,
For a something came that day
And a something had departed;

13.

And his soul was overfraught
With a passion e'er returning;
With the pain that comes unsough.
Of unutterable thought,
And the restlessness of yearning.

 "IN THE SPRINGTIME."

See what I saw to-day,
Just as I turned away
To leave the budding wood,
And paused and understood
The meaning of Spring weather;
Two lovers close together,
That, — where at last the laughing brook
Glides to the lake, — with dreamy look
And lips half-parted in a smile —
Stood charmed to watch a little isle,
Past which the waves went rippling on
With softer music to the swan
That sat there in enchanted rest,
Unmoving on her nest.

 MAN AND NATURE.

O steadfast trees, that know
Rain, hail and sleet and snow,
And all the winds that blow;
But when spring comes, can then
So freshly bud again,
Forgetful of the wrong!

Waters that deep below
The stubborn ice can go

With quiet underflow;
Contented to be dumb
Till spring herself shall come
To listen to your song!

Stars that the clouds pass o'er
And stain not, but make more
Alluring than before; —
How good it is for us
That your lives are not thus Prevented, but made strong!

 WINTER SUNRISE.

When I consider, as I am forced to do,
The many causes of my discontent,
And count my failures, and remember too
How many hopes the failures represent;
The hope of seeing what I have not seen,
The hope of winning what I have not won,
The hope of being what I have not been,
The hope of doing what I have not done;
When I remember and consider these —
Against my Past my Present seems to lie
As bare and black as yonder barren trees
Against the brightness of the morning sky,
Whose golden expectation puts to shame
The lurking hopes to which they still lay claim.

 "JOAQUIN" MILLER.

CINCINNATUS HEINE MILLER, a poet of the Pacific slope, whose Songs of the Sierras have received a larger share of praise from English than American critics, has lived a wild and stirring life on the frontiers. He was born in Indiana, in 1841, and was wholly untaught when, ten years later, he removed with his father to Oregon. About the age of fifteen, he abandoned the family log-cabin in the Willamette valley to try his fortunes at the gold mines; but he was not successful. For the four or five years following, he is said to have been alternately a "miner, astrologer, poet, filibuster with Walker, Indian sachem, and Spanish vagüero." In 1860, this prodigal abandoned his wild life and returned to his father's house, "with a ball wound in his left thigh, another in his right arm, and several marks of Indian arrows on other parts of his body." He now began the study of law in Lane county, Oregon, and in a few months was admitted to the bar. In the spring of 1861, he sought the Idaho gold mines, with no better success, and then became an express carrier in the mining districts.

Mr. Miller soon returned to Lane county, and started a Democratic paper at Eugene City, which lived only long enough to make known to him his wife, a poetical contributor named Minnie Myrtle, whom he married in 1862, after an acquaintance of three days. The same year, he practiced the profession of law at Canyon City, Oregon; and in 1864, as the captain of a company of volunteers, he defeated a party of Snake Indians, after a sharp skirmish. In 1866, he was elected judge of Grant county; and after a term of four years, during which time he wrote his earlier poems, he abandoned his family* and sailed for London, to seek a publisher. At first, his quest was a failure. A privately printed volume, however, containing Arizonian and Ina, introduced him to the friendship of some English writers, and led to the issue of Songs of the Sierras in 1871. These glowing, passionate transcripts of lawless, adventurous life; won, despite flagrant faults of style, the praises of the chief reviewers, and, to quote The Saturday Review, "compels us to forgive him for the lawlessness with which he tramples on the conventional limitations of art." The Nation, a vigilant guardian of American literature, declares in its turn: "Fustian in diction, innocence in metrical art, and a child's or barbarian's delight in staring ornamentation and tricks of cheap conjuring, are its principal marks."*

* Vide letter of Mrs. Miller, dated Salem, Oregon, November, 1871, and reprinted from the Portland Daily Oregonian by Every Saturday, December 23, 1871.

Mr. Miller having achieved a popular recognition of his talents, visited California and the tropics, to collect materials for other literary labors. A second volume was issued in London in 1873, entitled Sunland Songs; and a third, in prose, Unwritten History, descriptive of life among the Modoc Indians.

 ARIZONIAN — FROM SONGS OF THE SIERRAS.

"And I have said, and I say it ever,
As the years go on and the world goes over,
'Twere better to be content and clever
In tending of cattle and tossing of clover,
In the grazing of cattle and the growing of grain.
Than a strong man striving for fame or gain;
Be even as kine in the red-tipp'd clover;
For they lie down and their rests are rests,
And the days are theirs, come sun, come rain,
To lie, rise up, and repose again;
While we wish, yearn, and do pray in vain,
And hope to ride on the billows of bosoms,
And hope to rest in the haven of breasts,
Till the heart is sicken'd and the fair hope dead;
Be even as clover with its crown of blossoms,
Even as blossoms ere the bloom is shed,
Kiss'd by kine and the brown, sweet bée —
For these have the sun, and moon, and air,
And never a bit of the burthen of care;
And with all of our caring what more have we?
I would court content like a lover lonely,
I would woo her, win her, and wear her only,
And never go over this white sea wall
For gold or glory or for aught at all."

He said these things as he stood with the Squire
By the river's rim in the fields of clover,
While the stream flow'd under and the clouds flew over,
With the sun tangled in and the fringes afire.
So the Squire lean'd with a kind desire
To humor his guest, and to hear his story;
For his guest had gold, and he yet was clever,
And mild of manner; and, what was more, he,
In the morning's ramble, had praised the kine,
The clover's reach and the meadows fine,
And so made the Squire his friend for ever.

His brow was brown'd by the sun and weather,
And touch'd by the terrible hand of time;
His rich black beard had a fringe of rime,
As silk and silver inwove together.
There were hoops of gold all over his hands,
And across his breast, in chains and bands,
Broad and massive as belts of leather.
And the belts of gold were bright in the sun,
But brighter than gold his black eyes shone
From their sad face-setting so swarth and dun,
Brighter than beautiful Santan Stone.

Brighter even than balls of fire,
As he said, hot-faced, in the face of the Squire:—

"The pines bow'd over, the stream bent under
The cabin cover'd with thatches of palm,
Down in a cañon so deep, the wonder
Was what it could know in its clime but calm.
Down in a cañon so cleft asunder
By sabre-stroke in the young world's prime,
It look'd as broken by bolts of thunder,
And bursted asunder and rent and riven
By earthquakes, driven, the turbulent time
A red cross lifted red hands to heaven.
And this in the land where the sun goes down,
And gold is gather'd by tide and by stream,
And maidens are brown as the cocoa brown,
And a life is a love and a love is a dream;
Where the winds come in from the far Cathay
With odor of spices and balm and bay,
And summer abideth for aye and aye,
Nor comes in a tour with the stately June,
And comes too late and returns too soon
To the land of the sun and of summer's noon.

"She stood in the shadows as the sun went down,
Fretting her curls with her fingers brown,
As tall as the silk-tipp'd tassel'd corn —
Stood strangely watching as I weigh'd the gold
We had wash'd that day where the river roll'd;
And her proud lip curl'd with a sun-clime scorn,
As she ask'd, 'Is she better or fairer than I? —
She, that blonde in the land beyond,
Where the sun is hid and the seas are high —
That you gather in gold as the years go on,
And hoard and hide it away for her
As a squirrei burrows the black pine-burr?'

"Now the gold weigh'd well, but was lighter of weight
Than we two had taken for days of late,
So I was fretted, and, brow a-frown,
I said, 'She is fairer, and I loved her first,
And shall love her last come the worst to worst.'
Now her eyes were black and her skin was brown,
But her lips grew livid and her eyes afire
As I said this thing: and higher and higher
The hot words ran, when the booming thunder
Peal'd in the crags and the pine-tops under,
While up by the cliff in the murky skies
It look'd as the clouds had caught the fire —
The flash and fire of her wonderful eyes.

"She turn'd from the door and down to the river,
And mirror'd her face in the whimsical tide;
Then threw back her hair, as if throwing a quiver,
As an Indian throws it back far from his side
And free from his hands, swinging fast to the shoulder,
When rushing to battle; and, rising, she sigh'd
And shook, and shiver'd as aspens shiver.
Then a great green snake slid into the river,
Glistening, green, and with eyes of fire;
Quick, double-handed she seized a boulder,
And cast it with all the fury of passion,
As with lifted head it went curving across,
Swift darting its tongue like a fierce desire,
Curving and curving, lifting higher and higher,
Bent and beautiful as a river moss;
Then, smitten, it turn'd, bent, broken and doubled,
And lick'd, red-tongued, like a forked fire,
And sank, and the troubled waters bubbled,
And then swept on in their old swift fashion.

"I lay in my hammock: the air was heavy
And hot and threat'ning; the very heaven
Was holding its breath; and bees in a bevy
Hid under my thatch; and birds were driven

* The Nation, September 21, 1871, p. 197.

In clouds to the rocks in a hurried whirl
 As I peer'd down by the path for her.
 She stood like a bronze bent over the river,
 The proud eyes fix'd, the passion unspoken —
 When the heavens broke like a great dyke broken.
 Then, ere I fairly had time to give her
 A shout of warning, a rushing of wind
 And the rolling of clouds and a deafening din
 And a darkness that had been black to the blind
 Came down, as I shouted, 'Come in! come in!
 Come under the roof, come up from the river,
 As up from a grave — come now, or come never!
 The tassel'd tops of the pines were as weeds,
 The red-woods rock'd like to lake-side reeds,
 And the world seem'd darken'd and drown'd for ever.

"One time in the night as the black wind shifted,
 And a flash of lightning stretch'd over the stream,
 I seem'd to see her with her brown hands lifted —
 Only seem'd to see, as one sees in a dream —
 With her eyes wide wild and her pale lips press'd,
 And the blood from her brow and the flood to her
 breast;

When the flood caught her hair as the flax in a wheel,
 And wheeling and whirling her round like a reel,
 Laugh'd loud her despair then leapt long like a steed,
 Holding tight to her hair, holding fast to her heel, Laughing fierce, leaping far as if spur'd to its speed . . .

Now mind, I tell you all this did but seem —
 Was seen as you see fearful scenes in a dream;
 For what the devil could the lightning show
 In a night like that, I should like to know!

"And then I slept, and sleeping I dream'd
 Of great green serpents with tongues of fire,
 And of death by drowning, and of after death —
 Of the day of judgment, wherein it seem'd
 That she, the heathen, was bidden higher,
 Higher than I; that I clung to her side,
 And clinging struggled, and struggling cried,
 And crying, waken'd, all weak of my breath.

"Long leaves of the sun lay over the floor,
 And a chipmonk chirp'd in the open door,
 But above on his crag the eagle scream'd,
 Scream'd as he never had scream'd before.
 I rush'd to the river: the flood had gone
 Like a thief, with only his tracks upon
 The weeds and grasses and warm wet sand;
 And I ran after with reaching hand,
 And call'd as I reach'd and reach'd as I ran,
 And ran till I came to the cañon's van,
 Where the waters lay in a bent lagoon,
 Hook'd and crook'd like the horn'd moon.

"Here in the surge where the waters met,
 And the warm wave lifted, and the winds did fret
 The wave till it foam'd with rage on the land,
 She lay with the wave on the warm white sand;
 Her rich hair trail'd with the trailing weeds,
 And her small brown hands lay prone or lifted
 As the wave sang strophes in the broken reeds,
 Or paused in pity, and in silence sifted
 Sands of gold, as upon her grave.
 And as sure as you see yon browsing kine,
 And breathe the breath of your meadows fine,
 When I went to my waist in the warm white wave
 And stood all pale in the wave to my breast,
 And reach'd for her in her rest and unrest,
 Her hands were lifted and reach'd to mine.

"Now mind, I tell you I cried, 'Come in!
 Come in to the house, come out from the hollow,

'Come out of the storm, come up from the river!'
 Cried, and call'd, in that desolate din,
 Though I did not rush out, and in plain words give her

A wordy warning of the flood to follow,
 Word by word, and letter by letter:
 But she knew it as well as I, and better;
 For once in the desert of New Mexico
 When I sought frantically far and wide
 For the famous spot where Apaches shot
 With bullets of gold their buffalo,
 And she followed faithfully at my side,
 I threw me down in the hard hot sand
 Utterly famish'd, and ready to die,
 And a speck arose in the red hot sky —
 A speck no larger than a lady's hand —
 While she at my side bent tenderly over,
 Shielding my face from the sun as a cover,
 And wetting my face, as she watch'd by my side,
 From a skin she had borne till the high noon-tide,
 (I had emptied mine in the heat of the morning)
 When the thunder mutter'd far over the plain
 Like a monster bound or a beast in pain,
 She sprang the instant, and gave the warning,
 With her brown hand pointed to the burning skies.
 I was too weak unto death to arise,
 And I pray'd for death in my deep despair,
 And did curse and clutch in the sand in my rage,
 And bite in the bitter white ashen sage,
 That covers the desert like a coat of hair;
 But she knew the peril, and her iron will,
 With heart as true as the great North Star,
 Did bear me up to the palm-tipp'd hill,
 Where the fiercest beasts in a brotherhood,
 Beasts that had fled from the plain and far,
 In perfect peace expectant stood,
 With their heads held high, and their limbs
 a-quiver,

And ere she barely had time to breathe
 The boiling waters began to seethe
 From hill to hill in a booming river,
 Beating and breaking from hill to hill —
 Even while yet the sun shot fire,
 Without the shield of a cloud above —
 Filling the cañon as you would fill
 A wine-cup, drinking in swift desire,
 With the brim new-kiss'd by the lips you love.

"So you see she knew — knew perfectly well,
 As well as I could shout and tell,
 The mountains would send a flood to the plain,
 Sweeping the gorge like a hurricane,
 When the fire flash'd, and the thunder fell.
 Therefore it is wrong, and I say therefore Unfair, that a mystical brown wing'd moth
 Or midnight bat should for evermore
 Fan my face with its wings of air,
 And follow me up, down, everywhere,
 Flit past, pursue me, or fly before,
 Dimly limning in each fair place
 The full fix'd eyes and the sad brown face,
 So forty times worse than if it were wroth.

"I gather'd the gold I had hid in the earth,
 Hid over the door and hid under the hearth:
 Hoarded and hid, as the world went over,
 For the love of a blonde by a sun-brown'd lover;
 And I said to myself, as I set my face
 To the East and afar from the desolate place,
 'She has braided her tresses, and through her tears
 Look'd away to the West, for years, the years
 That I have wrought where the sun tans brown;
 She has waked by night, she has watch'd by day,
 She has wept and wonder'd at my delay,
 Alone and in tears, with her head held down,

Where the ships sail out and the seas swirl in,
 Forgetting to knit and refusing to spin.
 She shall lift her head, she shall see her lover,
 She shall hear his voice like a sea that rushes,
 She shall hold his gold in her hands of snow,
 And down on his breast she shall hide her blushes,
 And never a care shall her true heart know,
 While the clouds are below, or the clouds are above her.’

“On the fringe of the night she stood with her pitcher

At the old town-pump: and oh! passing fair.
 ‘I am riper now,’ I said, ‘but am richer,’
 And I lifted my hand to my beard and hair;
 ‘I am burnt by the sun, I am brown’d by the sea;
 I am white of my beard, and am bald, may be;
 Yet for all such things what can her heart care?’
 Then she moved; and I said, ‘How marvellous fair!’

She look’d to the West, with her arm arch’d over;
 ‘Looking for me, her sun-brown’d lover,’
 I said to myself, with a hot heart-thump,
 And stepp’d me nearer to the storm-stain’d pump,
 As approaching a friend; for ’twas here of old
 Our troths were plighted and the tale was told.

‘How young she was and how fair she was!
 How tall as a palm, and how pearly fair,
 As the night came down on her glorious hair!
 Then the night grew deep and the eye grew dim,
 And a sad-faced figure began to swim
 And float in my face, flit past, then pause,
 With her hands held up and her head held down,
 Yet face to face; and her face was brown.
 Now why did she come and confront me there,
 With the mould on her face and the moist in her
 hair,

And a mystical stare in her marvellous eyes?
 I had call’d to her twice, ‘Come in! come in!
 Come out of the storm to the calm within!’
 Now, that is the reason that I make complain
 That for ever and ever her face should arise,
 Facing face to face with her great sad eyes.
 I said then to myself, and I say it again,
 Gainsay it you, gainsay it who will,
 I shall say it over and over still,
 And will say it ever, for I know it true,
 That I did all that a man could do
 (Some good men’s doings are done in vain)
 To save that passionate child of the sun,
 With her love as deep as the doubled main,
 And as strong and fierce as a troubled sea —
 That beautiful bronze with its soul of fire,
 Its tropical love and its kingly ire —
 That child as fix’d as a pyramid,
 As tall as a tula and as pure as a nun —
 And all there is of it the all I did,
 As often happens, was done in vain.
 So there is no bit of her blood on me.

“‘She is marvellous young and is wonderful fair,’

I said again, and my heart grew bold,
 And beat and beat a charge for my feet.
 ‘Time that defaces us, places, and replaces us,
 And trenches the faces as in furrows for tears,
 Has traced here nothing in all these years.
 ’Tis the hair of gold that I vex’d of old,
 The marvellous flowing flower of hair,
 And the peaceful eyes in their sweet surprise
 That I have kiss’d till the head swam round,
 And the delicate curve of the dimpled chin,
 And the pouting lips and the pearls within
 Are the same, the same, but so young, so fair!’
 My heart leapt out and back at a bound,

As a child that starts, then stops, then lingers.
 ‘How wonderful young!’ I lifted my fingers
 And fell to counting the round years over
 That I had dwelt where the sun goes down.
 Four full hands, and a finger over!
 ‘She does not know me, her truant lover,’
 I said to myself, for her brow was a-frown
 As I stepp’d still nearer, with my head held down,
 All abash’d and in blushes my brown face over;
 ‘She does not know me, her long-lost lover,
 For my beard’s so long and my skin so brown,
 That I well might pass myself for another.’
 So I lifted my voice and I spoke aloud:
 ‘Annette, my darling! Annette Macleod!’
 She started, she stopp’d, she turn’d, amazed,
 She stood all wonder with her eyes wild wide,
 Then turn’d in terror down the dusk wayside,
 And cried as she fled, ‘The man is crazed,
 And calls the maiden name of my mother!’

“From a scene that saddens, from a ghost that wearies,
 From a white isle set in a wall of seas,
 From the kine and clover and all of these
 I shall set my face for the fierce Sierras.
 I shall make me mates on the stormy border,
 I shall beard the grizzly, shall battle again,
 And from mad disorder shall mould me order
 And a wild repose for a weary brain.

“Let the world turn over, and over, and over,
 And toss and tumble like a beast in pain,
 Crack, quake, and tremble, and turn full over
 And die, and never rise up again;
 Let her dash her peaks through the purple cover,
 Let her splash her seas in the face of the sun —
 I have no one to love me now, not one,
 In a world as full as a world can hold;
 So I will get gold as I erst have done,
 I will gather a coffin top-full of gold,
 To take to the door of Death, to buy
 Content, when I double my hands and die.
 There is nothing that is, be it beast or human,
 Love of maiden or the lust of man,
 Curse of man or the kiss of woman,
 For which I care or for which I can Give a love for a love or a hate for a hate,
 A curse for a curse or a kiss for a kiss,
 Since life has neither a bane nor a bliss,
 To one that is cheek by jowl with fate;
 For I have lifted and reach’d far over
 To the tree of promise, and have pluck’d of all
 And ate — ate ashes, and myrrh, and gall.
 Go down, go down to the fields of clover,
 Down with the kine in the pastures fine,
 And give no thought, or care, or labor
 For maid or man, good name or neighbor;
 For I have given, and what have I? —
 Given all my youth, my years, and labor,
 And a love as warm as the world is cold,
 For a beautiful, bright, and delusive lie.
 Gave youth, gave years, gave love for gold,
 Giving and getting, yet what have I
 But an empty palm and a face forgotten,
 And a hope that’s dead, and a heart that’s rotten?
 Red gold on the waters is no part bread,
 But sinks dull-sodden like a lump of lead,
 And returns no more in the face of Heaven.
 So the dark day thickens at the hope deferr’d,
 And the strong heart sickens and the soul is stirr’d
 Like a weary sea when his hands are lifted,
 Imploring peace, with his raiment drifted
 And driven afar and rent and riven.

“The red ripe stars hang low overhead,
 Let the good and the light of soul reach up,

Pluck gold as plucking a butter-cup;
 But I am as lean and my hands are red;
 There is nothing that is that can wake one passion
 In soul or body, or one sense of pleasure,
 No fame or fortune in the world's wide measure,
 Or love full-bosomed or in any fashion.

"The doubled sea, and the troubled heaven,
 Starr'd and barr'd by the bolts of fire,
 In storms where stars are riven, and driven
 As clouds through heaven, as a dust blown higher;
 The angels hurl'd to the realms infernal.
 Down from the walls in unholy wars
 That man misnameth the falling stars;
 The purple robe of the proud Eternal,
 The Tyrian blue with its fringe of gold,
 Shrouding His countenance, fold on fold—
 All are dull and tame as a tale that is told.
 For the loves that hasten and the hates that linger,
 The nights that darken and the days that glisten,
 And men that lie and maidens that listen,
 I care not even the snap of my finger.

So the sun climbs up, and on, and over,
 And the days go out and the tides come in,
 And the pale moon rubs on the purple cover
 Till worn as thin and as bright as tin;
 But the ways are dark and the days are dreary,
 And the dreams of youth are but dust in age,
 And the heart gets harden'd, and the hands grow weary
 Holding them up for their heritage.

"And the strain'd heart-strings wear bare and brittle,
 And the fond hope dies when so long deferr'd;
 Then the fair hope lies in the heart interr'd,
 So stiff and cold in its coffin of lead.
 For you promise so great and you gain so little;
 For you promise so great of glory and gold,
 And gain so little that the hands grow cold;
 And for gold and glory you gain instead
 A fond heart sicken'd and a fair hope dead.

"So I have said, and I say it over,
 And can prove it over and over again,
 That the four-footed beasts on the red-crown'd
 clover,
 The pied and horn'd beasts on the plain
 That lie down, rise up, and repose again,
 And do never take care or toil or spin,
 Nor buy, nor build, nor gather in gold,
 Though the days go out and the tides come in,
 Are better than we by a thousand fold;
 For what is it all, in the words of fire,
 But a vexing of soul and a vain desire?"

 ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS,

A GIFTED writer of fiction at an early age, is the grand-daughter of the late Professor Moses Stuart, the most eminent Biblical critic of his age,* and the daughter of Professor Austin Phelps, D. D. Her father, who was born at West Brookfield, Massachusetts, January 7, 1820, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in his seventeenth year, was ordained pastor of the Pine Street Congregational Church, Boston, in 1842, and has served since 1848 as professor of sacred rhetoric in Andover Theological Seminary. Besides assisting in the editing of various works on sacred music, he has written several popular books on practical piety: The Still Hour; or, Communion with God, 1859; The New Birth; or, The Work of the Holy Spirit, 1867; and The Solitude of Christ, 1868. Her mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, who died in 1852, at the age of thirty-seven, was a cultured woman and a brilliant writer.*

Miss Phelps was born at Boston, August 31, 1844. She has resided at Andover since early childhood, and was educated there at the institute kept by Mrs. Professor Edwards. At the age of eight, she lost her mother. How deeply that mother had already moulded the impressible nature of her child, is suggested by a sentence in a private letter, in which Miss Phelps has written: "I can conceive of few things more stimulating to a woman than a gifted mother—unless, indeed, it be the scholarly standards and patient instruction of such a father as my own." As the orthodox preferences of her father and grandfather doubtless influenced her in the acceptance of the Evangelical faith, so the fact that her mother wrote The Sunny Side may have led her to give the world The Gates Ajar.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps

Her literary career began at the age of thirteen, in the shape of various contributions to the newspapers. In 1863 she sent her first article to Harper's Magazine, and it was so cordially received that she became a regular contributor to that periodical, till her more elaborate works left no leisure for shorter stories. Before The Gates Ajar took the popular favor by storm in 1868, she had written a number of attractive juvenile books, the mere list of which attests her unflagging industry. These comprise: Ellen's Idol, 1864; Up Hill, 1865; Tiny, 1866; Mercy Gliddon's Work, 1866; The Gypsy Series, in four volumes, 1866-7—Gypsy Breynton; Gypsy's Sowing and Reaping; Gypsy's Cousin Joy; and Gypsy's Year at the Golden Crescent—the most successful of her

* Ante, vol. i., 708.

* Ante, vol. i., p. 709.

earlier works; Tiny's Sunday Nights, 1867; and I Don't Know How, 1867.

The Gates Ajar, dedicated "to my father, whose life, like a perfume from beyond the Gates, penetrates every life which approaches it," gives the daily journal of an orphaned young lady, who, having lost her brother in the war, passes through the throes of a great sorrow, and rebels in spirit against what the well-meaning consolers about her call a "mysterious but wise dispensation for the glory of God." She finds a loving companion in an Aunt Winifred, who, widowed herself, and having a certain "week-day holiness" in all her life, leads the thoughts of her relative, step by step, to the consciousness that Heaven is merely a riper stage of existence, wherein spiritual laws and beings have much in analogy with earthly experiences. Her conversations on Heaven are scholarly and thoughtful, having many apt quotations from leading authors. She inculcates the belief that a recognition of friends in Heaven, a visible communion with them, and a state of development in the intellect, the moral nature, and the spirit, in progressive harmony with earthly life, are all natural and probable.

Mén, Women, and Ghosts, 1869, a collection of stories from Harper's, The Watchman and Reflector, and Hours at Home, was published in 1869. In the same year, appeared The Trotty Book, one of the most charmingly natural sketches of infantile life in literature. Trotty's Wedding Tour and Story Book followed in 1873.

Hedged In, 1870, whose motto is,

"Most like our Lord are they who bear,
Like him, long with the sinning," has to do with that sphynx-like problem of the age, the career of "one more unfortunate," who now, being found repentant, and more sinned against than sinning, has been rescued by a Christian lady from starvation in the streets, and trained in her family for a sphere of pious usefulness, in spite of the active and passive resistance of the social community.

The Silent Partner, a sad revelation of the hardships and evils which may result to operatives in the cotton mills, virtually reducing the hands to the level of serfs, — evils which the observant lady-heroine of the story, capitalist though she was therein, found it impossible to eradicate, with a picture of the social advantages she was able to furnish the tired workers after mill-hours, was issued in 1871.

Since writing the last work, the health of Miss Phelps has been entirely broken down. Even its closing chapters were completed under her physician's serious protests, and since its issue she has been unable to use her pen, excepting some writing for the magazines and newspapers, wherein her spirit conquered her prudence. She also prepared, in 1873, a little pamphlet on Dress Reform, entitled, What to Wear. Many of the earlier years of her life were largely devoted to Christian labors among the poor families in Andover, but latterly her half-invalid condition has kept her mostly within her study. Yet her heart and mind are ardently enlisted in the reformatory questions of the day, and she has humorously summed up her creed in these three terms: "Heaven, Homeopathy and Woman's Rights." In the latter cause she is deeply interested, especially in the struggle to compass her political rights and industrial advancement.

TROTTY AT SCHOOL — FROM THE TROTTY BOOK.

One bright morning, as Trotty was calmly speculating over his griddle-cakes how he could manage to take from grandmother's work-basket that roll of blue silk cord, necessary to certain telegraphic ventures in which he had planned to embark that day, he was startled from his unsuspecting repose by the announcement that he was to call for Nat at nine o'clock, and spend two hours of the morning at Miss Pumpkin's school. And not that morning only, but all the mornings.

"For a whole long term!" said Lill, a bit triumphantly.

It had always been rather a trial to Lill, that Trotty could stay at home and play, while she must go to school.

"Besides," said she, "I go to school to a nice big man with whiskers, and Miss Pumpkin's nothing but an old maid."

"What's an old maid?" asked Trotty, looking frightened.

"It's a —" Max began to explain. But his mother interrupted in a tone of decision.

"A good, kind, generous old lady, who does not want to be married."

"O," said Trotty, with an air of relief, "I did n't know but it was sumfin that bites."

A little before nine they curled him and washed him and kissed him, and he started away, holding tightly to the tip of Lill's little finger with one hand, and hugging his box of blocks with the other. He passed the basket where the blue silk cord was lying with calmness. Poor little innocent! He really thought it was going to be as much fun to go to school as to play at telegraphing. Just after they had shut the front gate, he carelessly observed that he must go back again for a minute.

"What for?" asked Lill.

"Well, — I guess to get a drink of water. Or, may be, I did n't kiss grandma, you know."

"O, you don't want anything! Come! I'm in a hurry."

But Trotty tossed away her little finger, and ran in. He came out looking very wise, and diligently stuffing both hands into his pocket. As he trudged along, something slowly rose to sight, and stuck out over the edge of that pocket. It was one of Jerusalem's feet. But nobody saw it.

Lill's road turned off at Nat's. Trotty watched her walk away with just the least sinking at the heart. He began to wish that she were going with him.

"What do they make you do at school?" said he to Nat, as they ran along together.

"O, have recess, and play tag. Then if you stick pins into the next boy, you get a whipping. One time I stuck a needle into Johnny Beard. You ought to heard him squeal. Besides, you have to spell your lesson. I can spell Cat; can you?"

"Almost," said Trotty, feeling a little ashamed.

"I don't believe you know very much," grandly from Nat. "I can quite spell Cat. I nearly spelled Kitten last week, too. Besides, I can spell Puppy: P-o-p, pop, p-y, py, Puppy."

"I should n't wonder if I could spell Papa," said Trotty, hopefully. "P-a-r, pa —" he gave out at that point, and coughed thoughtfully. "At any rate," reviving a little, "my father's dead, and hanging up in a beautiful gold frame in the parlor. I'm going to have his watch-chain when I'm a man."

"Well," said Nat, determined not to be outdone, "my father's getting dead, I guess. He's going to be dead, I heard him say so the other day. His watch-chain's all black silk, with a little golden key on it."

By that time they had come to the school-house. Miss Pumpkin kept school in one of the lower rooms of an old, deserted boarding-house. The building looked dreary enough from the outside, with the windows boarded up, and the blinds gone; but the school-room itself was pleasant. About a dozen little children sat at little desks, with little books before them. The windows were open, and the sweet spring air blew in. An English ivy wound about Miss Pumpkin's desk. Miss Pumpkin, sitting behind it, was a gentle-faced lady, very little, and not very young; she had gray hair, and she wore a black dress.

Nat pushed open the door, and dragged Trotty in by the jacket sleeve.

"He's come to school. He walked 'long with me. He doesn't know very much. He can't spell Cat. I can spell Cat: C-a-t, Cat."

Poor Trotty, thus introduced, blushed to his curls, and stood still in the middle of the room.

"That will do, Nat," said the teacher. "You can go to your seat. Well, Trotty, I am glad to see you; good morning."

"Good morning, Mrs. Punksins!" said Trotty, in a very high key. All the scholars laughed. Poor little Miss Pumpkin turned as red as Trotty was.

"I'm not a married lady," she replied, gently. "I'm not Mrs. Pumpkin, but Miss. Hush, children! There! come this way, Trotty; here is a seat all ready for you."

Trotty went, wondering what made the children laugh, and what made the teacher blush. Nobody could ever make him understand. I believe that he calls her Mrs. Punksins to this day.

The children supplied their own furniture at Miss Pumpkin's school; Max had already taken over a bit of a wooden rocking-chair and an atom of a table, for Trotty. The top of the table lifted like a desk-cover. It stood in a corner where a warm, yellow sunbeam fell softly.

Miss Pumpkin told Trotty to put his blocks into the table; then she gave him a spelling-book with pictures in it, and heard him say his letters, and taught him how to spell Cat; then she went away and left him to study by himself.

Now Trotty had just about as much of an idea how to study as Jerusalem. It struck him that two hours would be a long time to sit up at a little table in a little rocking-chair, with a little sunbeam dancing on his head, and he began to look about for something entertaining to do.

The pictures in the spelling-book looked promising, and he began to turn over the leaves very fast. By and by he came to a funny picture of a monkey running away with an old gentleman's hat, and what should he do but laugh right out.

"He! he! he! he!"—the prettiest little gurgle of a laugh that ever was.

"Hush, Trotty!" said the teacher. That frightened him, and for a few moments he turned over the leaves soberly and silently. Pretty soon it came again.

"He! he-e-e-e!"—that irresistible little laugh! "Trotty!" said Miss Pumpkin, biting her lip.

"Here's—he! he! he!—a boy standing on his—he! he!—head!" rippled Trotty: and Jerusalem's feet, over the edge of his pocket, shook as he laughed.

By and by Nat saw those feet, and Nat laughed; then Trotty saw Nat laugh, and Trotty laughed; then Nat caught hold of one of Jerusalem's feet and tried to pull him away, and Trotty held on to the other and pulled him back, and between the two poor Jerusalem was nearly torn in twain.

"Trotty," said the teacher, suspiciously, "are you 'most ready to spell Dog?"

Thus silenced, Trotty opened his spelling-book again; gravely and with some difficulty set the doll down in front of it, and when the children looked up, he and Jerusalem were studying together.

Presently Jerusalem fell down on the floor, and Trotty picked him up by sticking his finger into the hole in his empty head; then he fell down again, and he spiked him up with Nat's jack-knife; then he fell down once more, and he speared him up with a lead-pencil. Poor Jerusalem was in such a state of mind and body that, as he has since told me, he really gave up in despair that morning all idea of completing his education.

By and by Trotty thought what fun it would be to wash Jerusalem's face in Nat's ink-bottle. So he washed it carefully with his own little white handkerchief, and wondered what made the handkerchief grow so ugly and black, and where all those little damp black spots on the table that he kept putting his elbows into came from.

There was a little girl with white hair sitting on the other side of him, and when he was tired of washing Jerusalem, he wondered how funny she would look if somebody poured the rest of that ink right in the middle of her head on top; whether her hair would always be black after it, or whether it would grow a little streaked like a black and white Kitty's, and how the little girl would like it. He leaned across to ask her, with the ink-bottle in one hand all ready to experiment; but Miss Pumpkin shook her head at him, which he thought was very inconsiderate in her.

After that Nat gave him an apple-core, and Trotty nibbled at it for a long time, giving Jerusalem little bites occasionally with a grave face. The way in which Jerusalem used to eat was by having the mouthfuls dropped into his head at the hole on top. Trotty stuffed them in with a jack-straw which he had in his pocket.

This tickled the little girl with white hair so that she laughed quite aloud, and Miss Pumpkin snapped her knuckles. They were soft little white knuckles, and the little girl cried. Trotty felt sorry.

He felt so sorry that he put Jerusalem away in his pocket again, and laid his head down in the sunbeam and kept still. He kept so very still that everybody forgot him, and when the alphabet class was called out to recite, Miss Pumpkin found that he was fast asleep, with his cheek on his hands and his curls in his eyes.

"It's almost too bad to wake him up," she said, "but I suppose I must. Come, Trotty! I want you to say a lesson now."

Trotty dug both fists into his eyes, and winked and blinked and nodded and yawned and coughed, and staggered sleepily out into the middle of the room where the alphabet class was standing.

Remembering that Jerusalem ought to have the benefit of the recitation, he pulled him out of his pocket, and stuck him into his trousers-band where he could see the world.

It chanced that there stood next to him a little boy with a very loose calico apron on; the neck of the apron was twice as large as the neck of the boy, and it stood out stiffly behind, so that you could put your hand down nobody knows how far. Now, while this little boy was reciting, an idea came to Trotty. Jerusalem had not been behaving very well in the trousers-band; he flopped over and hung down the wrong way, and would pay no attention at all to the recitation. It occurred to Trotty what a nice place it would be for him under that stiff apron. So he slowly and softly began to push his head down the little boy's neck. The little boy did not notice. Trotty pushed a little harder. The little boy squirmed. Trotty pushed a little more. The little boy gasped;—a little more,—the little boy choked.

"Spell Dog, Trotty," said Miss Pumpkin.

"D," said Trotty,—push—"O"—push—"G"—another push. Jerusalem was fairly in now. Only his feet showed over the top of the little boy's apron. The little boy began to dance about and pull at the doll, who was caught somewhere on a button, and would n't come out.

"Johnny!" said Miss Pumpkin, "what is the matter? Come here!—Why, Trotty Tyrol! did you do this?"

"O yes," said Trotty, candidly. "Is n't he funny? I did n't s'pose he'd dance round. I wanted to find a place for Jerusalem. I guess I'll take him out now. I'm afraid he'll think it's a little dark."

"Trotty," said Miss Pumpkin, gravely, "you have made me a great deal of trouble this morning. You must learn that little boys cannot play in school. You may take your little rocking-chair and go and sit alone over there by the door, till I call you."

Trotty did as he was told. The children all looked at him. He felt ashamed. He began to think that it was a very bad thing to go to school. He remembered the blue silk telegraph wire, and home and grandma, and felt as if it were years and years since he had seen them. He tried to talk a little to Jerusalem, but Jerusalem hung his mortified head and would give him no comfort. Something began to feel damp in his eyes. Something choked him in his throat. Something rolled down his two cheeks and fell on Jerusalem's inky face.

He began to look carefully at Miss Pumpkin out of the corner of one eye. Then he looked carefully at the door. Then he looked carefully at the children.

He was so still that nobody noticed him.

"Why! where's Trotty?" said Miss Pumpkin all at once.

Where was he? The little rocking-chair was empty. The door stood wide open. Something shot past the window, and away down the dusty road. With curls flying, hat off, and Jerusalem hugg'd under one arm, there was Trotty running for home as fast as he could go.

Grandmother was calmly mending stockings on the porch, when the gate slammed and in walked Trotty.

"Why, Trotty! school can't be out yet. You have n't been gone an hour."

"O, I don't know 's I care if I have n't," remarked my Lord, carelessly. "I don't like going to school. Mrs. Pumpkins made me sit in a chair on the floor. I could n't spell Dog. I got a little inky. Jerusalem made me a great deal of trouble. Now, if you'll let me have some of your blue silk string, I guess I b'lieve I'd rather grow up a dunce."

LIFE IN A COTTON MILL—FROM THE SILENT PARTNER.

If you are one of "the hands" in the Hayle and Kelso Mills, you go to your work, as is well known, from the hour of half past six to seven, according to the turn of the season. Time has been when you went at half past four. The Senior forgot this the other day in a little talk which he had with his silent partner,—very naturally, the time having been so long past; but the time has been, is now, indeed, yet in places. Mr. Hayle can tell you of mills he saw in New Hampshire last vacation, where they ring them up, if you'll believe it, winter and summer, in and out, at half past four in the morning. Oh no, never let out before six, of course. Mr. Hayle disapproves of this. Mr. Hayle thinks it not humane. Mr. Hayle is confident that you would find no mission Sunday school connected with that concern.

If you are one of "the hands" in the Hayle and Kelso Mills—and again, in Hayle and Kelso,—you are so dully used to this classification, "the hands," that you were never known to cultivate an objection to it, are scarcely found to notice its use or disuse. Being surely neither head nor heart, what else remains? Conscious scarcely, from bell to bell, from sleep to sleep, from day to dark, of either head or heart, there seems even a singular appropriateness in the chance of the word with which you are dimly struck. Hayle and Kelso label you. There you are. The world thinks, aspires, creates, enjoys. There you are. You are the fingers of the world. You take your patient place. The world may have need of you, but only that it may think, aspire, create, enjoy. It needs your patience as well as your place. You take both, and you are used to both, and the world is used to both, and so, having put the label on for safety's sake, lest you be mistaken for a thinking, aspiring, creating, enjoying compound, and so some one be poisoned, shoves you into your place upon its shelf, and shuts its cupboard-door upon you.

If you are one of "the hands," then, in Hayle and Kelso, you have a breakfast of bread and molasses probably; you are apt to eat it while you dress; somebody is heating the kettle, but you cannot wait for it; somebody tells you that you have forgotten your shawl, you throw it over one shoulder, and step out, before it is fastened, into the sudden raw air; you left lamp-light indoors; you find moonlight without; the night seems to have overslept itself; you have a fancy for trying to wake it, would like to shout at it or cry through it, but feel very cold, and leave that for the bells to do by and by. You and the bells are the only waking things in life. The great brain of the world is in serene repose. The great heart of the world lies warm to the core with dreams. The great hands of the world, the patient, perplexed, one almost fancies at times, just for the fancy, seeing you here by the morning moon, the dangerous hands, alone are stirring in the dark.

You hang up your shawl and your crinoline, and understand, as you go shivering by gaslight to your looms, that you are chilled to the heart, and that you were careless about your shawl, but do not consider carefulness worth your while by nature or by habit; a little less shawl means a few less winters in which to require shawling.

You are a godless little creature, but you cherish a stolid leaning, in these morning moons, towards making an experiment of death and a wadded coffin.

By the time that gas is out, you cease, perhaps, though you cannot depend upon that, to shiver, and incline less and less to the wadded coffin, and more to a chat with your neighbor in the alley. Your neighbor is of either sex and any description, as the case may be. In any event, warming a little with the warming day, you incline more and more to chat. If you chance to be a cotton-weaver, you are presently warm enough. It is quite warm enough in the weaving-room. The engines respire into the weaving-room; with every throb of their huge lungs you swallow their breath. The weaving-room stifles with steam. The window-sills of this room are guttered to prevent the condensed steam from running in streams along the floor; sometimes they overflow, and water stands under the looms; the walls perspire profusely; on a damp day, drops will fall from the roof.

The windows of the weaving-room are closed; the windows must be closed; a stir in the air will break your threads. There is no air to stir. You inhale for a substitute motionless, hot moisture. If you chance to be a cotton-weaver, it is not in March that you think most about your coffin.

Being "a hand" in Hayle and Kelso, you are used to eating cold luncheon in the cold at noon, or you walk, for the sake of a cup of soup or coffee, half a mile, three quarters, a mile and a half, and back. You are allowed three quarters of an hour in which to do this. You come and go upon the jog-trot.

You grow moody, being "a hand" at Hayle and Kelso's, with the growing day; are inclined to quarrel or to confidence with your neighbor in the alley; find the overseer out of temper, and the cotton full of flaws; find pains in your feet, your back, your eyes, your arms; feel damp and sticky lint in your hair, your neck, your ears, your throat, your lungs; discover a monotony in the process of breathing hot moisture, lower your window at your risk; are bidden by somebody whose threads you have broken at the other end of the room to put it up, and put it up; are conscious that your head swims, your eyeballs burn, your breath quickens; yield your preference for a wadded coffin, and consider whether the river would not be the comfortable thing; cough a little, cough a great deal, lose your balance in a coughing fit, snap a thread, and take to swearing roundly.

From swearing you take to singing; both perhaps are equal relief, active and diverting. There is something curious about that singing of yours. The time, the place, the singers, characterize it sharply,—the waning light, the rival din, the girls with tired faces. You start some little thing with a refrain and a ring to it; a hymn, it is not unlikely; something of a River and of Waiting, and of Toil and Rest, or Sleep, or Crowns, or Harps, or Home, or Green Fields, or Flowers, or Sorrow, or Repose, or a dozen things, but always, it will be noticed, of simple, spotless things, such as will surprise the listener who caught you at your oath of five minutes past. You have other songs, neither simple nor spotless, it may be; but you never sing them at your work, when the waning day is crawling out from spots beneath your looms, and the girls lift up their tired faces to catch and keep the chorus in the rival din.

You like to watch the contest between the chorus and the din; to see—you seem almost to see—the struggle of the melody from alley to alley, from loom to loom, from darkening wall to darkening wall, from lifted face to lifted face; to see—for you are very sure you see—the machinery fall into a fit of rage. That is a sight! You would never guess, unless you had watched it just as many times as you have, how that machinery will rage. How it throws its arms about, what fists it can clench, how it shakes at the elbows and knees, what teeth it knows how to gnash, how it writhes and roars, how it clutches at the leaky, strangling gas-lights, and how it bends its impotent black head, always, at last, without fail, and your song sweeps triumphant, like an angel over it! With this you are very much pleased, though only "a hand," to be sure, in Hayle and Kelso.

You are singing when the bell strikes, and singing still when you clatter down the stairs. Something of the simple spotlessness of the little song is on your face, when you dip into the wind and dusk. Perhaps you have only pinned your shawl, or pulled your hat over your face, or knocked against a stranger on the walk; but it passes; it passes and is gone. It is cold and you tremble, direct from the morbid heat in which you have stood all day; or you have been cold all day; and it is colder, and you shrink; or you are from the weaving-room, and the wind strikes you faint, or you stop to cough and the girls go on without you. The town is lighted, and people are out in their best clothes. You pull your dingy veil about your eyes. You are weak and heart-sick all at once. You don't care to go home to supper. The pretty song creeps, wounded, back for the engine in the deserted dark to crunch. You are a miserable little factory-girl with a dirty face.

 WILL CARLETON,

THE author of Farm Ballads, was born in Hudson, Lenawee county, Michigan, October 21, 1845. His ancestors were of English and Scotch origin, while his father (John H. Carleton) was a pioneer settler who came from New Hampshire. Will remained at home on the farm, tilling the soil during the summers, and attending district school in the winters, till sixteen years of age. In 1861, he became a teacher in a country school, whereby he was indoctrinated into "boarding around," and doubtless had the pickings of some rich experiences among his farmer-patrons, of which he has made use in his writings. For four years he divided his time between teaching, attending school, and assisting his father on the farm, contributing meanwhile, under various signatures, articles in prose and verse to the local and State papers. He entered Hillsdale College, Michigan, in 1865, and was graduated in 1869. Since then, he has been engaged in journalistic and literary work, and has lectured repeatedly throughout the West. His present residence is at Hillsdale.

Mr. Carleton printed a small volume of poems in 1871, for private circulation. In the following year, the most popular of his pieces, "Betsey and I are Out," appeared in the Toledo Blade, and was reprinted, with appropriate illustrations, in Harper's Weekly, wherein some other popular narrative pictures of Western home life have since appeared. Farm Ballads, a collection including "Out of the Old House, Nancy," "Over the Hill to the Poor House," "Gone with a Handsomer Man," "Betsy and I Made Up," etc., was issued in 1873. In his prefatory words, the author states: "These poems have been written under various, and, in some cases, difficult, conditions: in the open air 'with team afield;' in the student's den, with the ghosts of unfinished lessons hovering gloomily about; amid the rush and roar of railroad travel, which trains of thought are not prone to follow; and in the editor's sanctum, where the dainty feet of the Muses do not often deign to tread."

Will Carleton.

 BETSEY AND I ARE OUT—FROM FARM BALLADS.

Draw up the papers, lawyer, and make 'em good and stout;
For things at home are crossways, and Betsey and I are out.
We, who have worked together so long as man and wife,
Must pull in single harness for the rest of our nat'ral life.
"What is the matter?" say you. I swan it's hard to tell!
Most of the years behind us we've passed by very well;
I have no other woman, she has no other man—
Only we've lived together as long as we ever can.
So I have talked with Betsey, and Betsey has talked with me,
And so we've agreed together that we can't never agree;
Not that we've catched each other in any terrible crime;
We've been a-gathering this for years, a little at a time.
There was a stock of temper we both had for a start,

Although we never suspected 'twould take us two apart;
I had my various failings, bred in the flesh and bone;
And Betsey, like all good women, had a temper of her own.

The first thing I remember whereon we disagreed
Was something concerning heaven—a difference in our creed;
We arg'ed the thing at breakfast, we arg'ed the thing at tea,
And the more we arg'ed the question the more we didn't agree.

And the next that I remember was when we lost a cow;
She had kicked the bucket for certain, the question was only—How?
I held my own opinion, and Betsey another had;
And when we were done a-talkin', we both of us was mad.

And the next that I remember, it started in a joke;
But full for a week it lasted, and neither of us spoke.
And the next was when I scolded because she broke a bowl;
And she said I was mean and stingy, and hadn't any soul.

And so that bowl kept pourin' dissensions in our cup;
And so that blamed cow-critter was always a-comin' up;
And so that heaven we arg'ed no nearer to us got,
But it gave us a taste of somethin' a thousand times as hot.

And so the thing kept workin', and all the self-same way;
Always somethin' to arg'e, and somethin' sharp to say;
And down on us came the neighbors, a couple dozen strong,
And lent their kindest service for to help the thing along.

And there has been days together—and many a weary week—
We was both of us cross and spunky, and both too proud to speak;
And I have been thinkin' and thinkin', the whole of the winter and fall,
If I can't live kind with a woman, why, then, I won't at all.

And so I have talked with Betsey, and Betsey has talked with me,
And we have agreed together that we can't never agree;
And what is hers shall be hers, and what is mine shall be mine;
And I'll put it in the agreement, and take it to her to sign.

Write on the paper, lawyer—the very first paragraph—
Of all the farm and live-stock that she shall have her half;
For she has helped to earn it, through many a weary day,
And it's nothing more than justice that Betsey has her pay.

Give her the house and homestead—a man can thrive and roam;

But women are skeery critters, unless they have a home;
 And I have always determined, and never failed to say,
 That Betsey never should want a home if I was taken away.
 There is a little hard money that's drawin' tolerable pay;
 A couple of hundred dollars laid by for a rainy day;
 Safe in the hands of good men, and easy to get at;
 Put in another clause there, and give her half of that.
 Yes, I see you smile, Sir, at my givin' her so much;
 Yes, divorce is cheap, Sir, but I take no stock in such!
 True and fair I married her, when she was blithe and young;
 And Betsey was al'ays good to me, exceptin' with her tongue.
 Once, when I was young as you, and not so smart, perhaps,
 For me she mittened a lawyer, and several other chaps;
 And all of them was flustered, and fairly taken down,
 And I for a time was counted the luckiest man in town.
 Once when I had a fever—I won't forget it soon—
 I was hot as a basted turkey and crazy as a loon;
 Never an hour went by me when she was out of sight—
 She nursed me true and tender, and stuck to me day and night.
 And if ever a house was tidy, and ever a kitchen clean,
 Her house and kitchen was tidy as any I ever seen;
 And I don't complain of Betsey, or any of her acts,
 Exceptin' when we've quarreled, and told each other facts.
 So draw up the paper, lawyer, and I'll go home to-night,
 And read the agreement to her, and see if it's all right;
 And then, in the mornin', I'll sell to a tradin' man I know,
 And kiss the child that was left to us, and out in the world I'll go.
 And one thing put in the paper, that first to me didn't occur:
 That when I am dead at last she'll bring me back to her;
 And lay me under the maples I planted years ago,
 When she and I was happy before we quarreled so.
 And when she dies I wish that she would be laid by me,
 And lyin' together in silence, perhaps we will agree;
 And, if ever we meet in heaven, I would n't think it queer
 If we loved each other the better because we quarreled here.

 CELIA THAXTER,

WHOSE maiden name was Celia Loughton, was born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, June 29, 1835. She was married at the age of sixteen. Since her fifth year, she has passed most of her life at Appledore, in the Isle of Shoals, a series of "low bleached rocks" in the Atlantic Ocean, nine miles off from the coast of New Hampshire. Appledore, the crest of whose four hundred acres is only seventy-five feet above high-water mark, contains a lighthouse, and her home was in the keeper's dwelling at its base.

Celia Thaxter

The charms and mysteries of the ever-rolling surges, through the calm and the storm, and the picturesque features of nature and life as they are affected by the changing seasons in this eyrie of the ocean, were first described by her in a series of glowing, keenly sympathetic papers in the Atlantic Monthly, in 1867-8. These were gathered into a small illustrated volume in 1873, entitled Among the Isles of Shoals.

In 1872 appeared a volume of poems.

 AMONG THE ISLES OF SHOALS.

Swept by every wind that blows, and beaten by the bitter brine for unknown ages, well may the Isles of Shoals be barren, bleak, and bare. At first sight nothing can be more rough and inhospitable than they appear. The incessant influences of wind and sun, rain, snow, frost, and spray, have so bleached the tops of the rocks, that they look hoary as if with age, though in the summer-time a gracious greenness of vegetation breaks here and there the stern outlines, and softens somewhat their rugged aspect. Yet so forbidding are their shores, it seems scarcely worth while to land upon them, — mere heaps of tumbling granite in the wide and lonely sea, — when all the smiling, "sapphire-spangled marriage-ring of the land" lies ready to woo the voyager back again, and welcome his returning prow with pleasant sights and sounds and scents that the wild wastes of water never know. But to the human creature who has eyes that will see and ears that will hear, nature appeals with such a novel charm, that the luxurious beauty of the land is half forgotten before one is aware. Its sweet gardens, full of color and perfume, its rich woods and softly swelling hills, its placid waters, and fields and flowery meadows, are no longer dear and desirable; for the wonderful sound of the sea dulls the memory of all past impressions, and seems to fulfil and satisfy all present needs. Landing for the first time, the stranger is struck only by the sadness of the place, — the vast loneliness; for there are not even trees to whisper with familiar voices, — nothing but sky and sea and rocks. But the very wilderness and desolation reveal a strange beauty to him. Let him wait till evening comes,

"With sunset purple soothing all the waste," and he will find himself slowly succumbing to the subtle charm of that sea atmosphere. He sleeps with all the waves of the Atlantic murmuring in his ears, and wakes to the freshness of a summer morning; and it seems as if morning were made for the first time. For the world is like a new-blown rose, and in the heart of it he stands, with only the caressing music of the water to break the utter silence, unless, perhaps, a song-sparrow pours out its blissful warble like an embodied joy. The sea is rosy, and the sky: the line of land is radiant; the scattered sails glow with the delicious color that touches so tenderly the bare, bleak rocks. These are lovelier than sky or sea or distant sails, or graceful gulls' wings reddened with the dawn; nothing takes color so beautifully as the bleached granite; the shadows are delicate, and the fine, hard outlines are glorified and softened beneath the fresh first blush of sunrise. All things are speckless and spotless; there is no dust, no noise, nothing but peace in the sweet air and on the quiet sea. The day goes on; the rose changes to mellow gold, the gold to clear, white daylight, and the sea is sparkling again. A breeze ripples the surface, and wherever it touches the color deepens. A seine-boat passes, with the tawny net heaped in the stern, and the scarlet shirts of the rowers brilliant against the blue. Pleasantly their voices come across the water, breaking the stillness. The fishing-boats steal to and fro, silent, with glittering sails; the gulls wheel lazily; the far-off coasters glide rapidly along the horizon; the mirage steals down the coast-line, and seems to remove it leagues away. And what if it were to slip down the slope of the world and disappear entirely? You think, in a half dream, you would not care. Many troubles, cares, perplexities, vexations, lurk behind that far, faint line for you. Why should you be bothered any more.

"Let us alone. Time driveth onward fast,
And in a little while our lips are dumb."

And so the waves, with their lulling murmur, do their work, and you are soothed into repose and transient forgetfulness?

EMERSON BENNETT.

Emerson Bennett was born the son of a farmer, in the town of Monson, Hampden county, Massachusetts, March 16, 1822. As a country boy, who was much given to out-of-doors play and work, he acquired robust health, a passionate attachment for scenes of nature, a self-reliant spirit, and that vital force which, in his capacity as a novelist, imparts an intense interest in the plot as unfolded by successive incidents of his stories. He was also an earnest student in his boyhood. The study of mathematics was a delight, and he often solved for himself problems before they were reached by his classmates. At the age of thirteen, he lost his father. Three years more were spent on the farm, and then he began an academical course to qualify himself for college; but the second marriage of his mother soon led to the severance of his home ties.

At the age of seventeen, the stalwart Emerson left the old homestead, and began to gratify his strong desire to visit strange scenes, so that for many days each nightfall found him in a different village or town. But in 1840, the city of New York became his home, and for three years he was a devotee alternately to art and to poetry. The printing of a poem in an Odd Fellows' journal, edited by George Hatch, and its reprinting in The Tribune, led him to write and publish a poem in two cantos, which the critics of the day gibbered. It was called The Brigand, and many of his later novels were treated to titles of a similar character. The winter of 1843 he spent in Philadelphia, where he became a poetical contributor to the Dollar Newspaper. His first romance, The Unknown Countess, though it failed in a prize award, appeared in that journal a year later. In the spring of 1844, he set out for Baltimore, and then journeyed westward to Pittsburg and Cincinnati, arriving at the latter city quite destitute. As a hastily-written sketch, literally written for bread, failed to please the critical taste of the new Western Literary Journal—edited by E. Z. C. Judson, since "Ned Buntline"—the youthful writer became an agent for that magazine, and made a tour of several months in Ohio canvassing for subscribers.

Mr. Bennett on his return to Cincinnati found himself in favor with the Daily Commercial (L. G. Curtiss, editor), as a reprint of his story, The Unknown Countess, had increased the circulation of that struggling journal. An engagement followed to write a novel on a local subject, for which he received his first compensation as a writer; and a second appeared in 1846, entitled, The League of the Miami. A literary venture was tried by him in the Casket, with a partner in J. H. Green, the reformed gambler; but that journal expired in nine months. Among its contributors were the Cary sisters, Alice and Phœbe, then unknown to fame. Though dated at Cincinnati, the Casket was printed at Lawrenceburgh, Indiana, where Mr. Bennett lived during its span of life. Another engagement with Mr. Curtiss resulted in the Bundits of the Osage. This story proved a pecuniary success, adding some thousands to the circulation of the Commercial, while its author also succeeded in selling a book edition of five thousand copies to a Cincinnati firm of book-sellers—Robinson & Jones. This was, in all probability, the first novel published and sold west of the Alleghany Mountains. The task of making a market there and then was a herculean one, for the publisher had to be convinced, by arguments and figures, that a moderate outlay for fiction would be a profitable investment.

Since 1850, Mr. Bennett has been a resident of Philadelphia. He was married in 1847 to Miss E. G. Daly of that city, and has two children—a son, who is a member of its bar, and a daughter, who has printed occasional poems. Mr. Bennett has written some forty romances, and many hundred sketches, which are in the main carefully studied delineations of manners, characters, and adventures of American frontier life. These have chiefly appeared in the New York Ledger and Weekly, the Philadelphia Evening Post and Saturday Night, as well as in Emerson Bennett's Dollar Monthly, which latter, started in 1860, fell an early victim to the civil war. The most popular of his books have been Prairie Flower and Leni Leoti, which have had a circulation of one hundred thousand copies. A uniform edition of his novels is now issuing from the press of Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger, the first of which, The Outlaw's Daughter, was published near the close of 1873, and the second, Villeta Linden, or The Artist's Bride, in 1874.

 JOHN W. FORNEY.

John Wein Forney, a journalist and politician of ability and high repute, was born at Lancaster, Pennsylvania, September 30, 1817. "In 1833 he became an apprentice in the printing-office of the Lancaster Journal, and in 1837 editor and joint proprietor of the Lancaster Intelligencer; and in 1840 he united that paper with the Journal. He removed in 1845 to Philadelphia, where he was long the editor of the Pennsylvanian, one of the most decided of the Democratic journals. In 1851 he was chosen clerk of the U. S. House of Representatives, and was re-elected in 1853. Meanwhile his connection with the Pennsylvanian had ceased, and he had become editor of the Union, a Democratic organ at Washington. He resigned this post in 1856, returned to Pennsylvania, and was chosen chairman of the Democratic State Committee. In January, 1857, he was Democratic candidate for the office of U. S. Senator, but was defeated by Mr. Cameron, and on August 1st following began, in Philadelphia, the publication of The Press, an independent journal. Although he had advocated the election of Mr. Buchanan to the presidency, he became a determined opponent of his administration when the Lecompton constitution of Kansas became a topic of public debate; and was again chosen clerk of the House of Representatives in the 36th Congress by the Republicans. During the civil war he gave a constant support to the national government. In 1861 he began the publication, in addition to The Press in Philadelphia, of a weekly paper in the city of Washington, entitled The Chronicle; this also began to appear daily in October, 1862. From 1861 to 1868 Mr. Forney was secretary of the U. S. Senate."* Six years later he visited Europe a second time, in behalf of the interests of the Centennial Exhibition of 1876.

Mr. Forney has written two books, marked by powers of keen observation and an attractive diction. Letters from Europe, a reprint of a series of sketches contributed to The Press in 1867, picture the scenes and reflections of four months of wanderings, at the period of the Paris Exposition. Anecdotes of Public Men appeared in successive papers in The Press and Sunday Chronicle, and were collected into a volume in 1873. These anecdotes graphically describe the public men who swayed the political fortunes of the country from the administration of President Pierce to that of President Grant, outlining their individualities of intellect, their services, and personal idiosyncrasies. The writer's tone is catholic and generous, and he inculcates a tolerant, self-reliant, and patriotic spirit.

* Appleton's American Cyclopædia (new edition). Vol. vii, pp. 322-3.

I N D E X.

[The CAPITALS indicate the longer biographical articles, which may be consulted for the detailed account of the persons referred to. The names in italics indicate the selections.]

- Abbot, Abiel, i. 877.
 Abbot, Benjamin, i. 717, 877.
 Abbot, Ezra, i. 18.
 Abbot, John, first professor of Bowdoin, i. 916.
 Abbott, Austin, ii. 167.
 Abbott, Benjamin V., ii. 167.
 ABBOTT, JACOB, ii. 164.
 ABBOTT, JOHN S. C., ii. 165.
 ABBOTT, LYMAN, ii. 167.
 Abdy, Mathew, i. 136.
 Abernethy, John, his reception of an American reprint of his writings, i. 821.
 Abraham Lincoln. William Henry Burleigh, ii. 860.
 Absence. E. C. Embury, ii. 329.
 Absent father, the. Hew Ainslie, i. 873.
 Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, ii. 477.
 Acadians, treatment of. George R. Minot, i. 498.
 Accident for Seamen, by Captain John Smith, i. 6.
 Account of a Consulate. D. G. Mitchell, ii. 684.
 Accounts, G. Washington with the United States, reprint of, i. 190.
 Acherley, Roger, i. 172.
 Across the Simplon into Italy. G. H. Calvert, ii. 197.
 Adams and Jefferson, eulogy on. H. M. Brackenridge, i. 703.
 Adams and Jefferson, eulogy on, by Wm. Wirt, i. 646.
 "Adams and Liberty," song. R. T. Paine, Jr., i. 660.
 Adams, Miss Abigail, correspondence of, i. 195, ii. 851.
 Adams, Mrs. Abigail, letters by, i. 198.
 Remarks on execution of Marie Antoinette, i. 199
 ADAMS, CHARLES FRANCIS, ii. 851.
 Edition of John Adams's Diary, i. 194.
 Edition of letters of John Adams to his wife, i. 195
 Memoir of Mrs. Abigail Adams, i. 195.
 Memorial Address on William H. Seward, ii. 136.
 ADAMS, HANNAH, i. 425.
 ADAMS, JOHN, i. 194.
 Admires the French ladies, i. 198.
 Choice of Hercules, the, i. 196.
 Compliment by, to Mercy Warren, i. 173.
 Correspondence with Cunningham, i. 652.
 Correspondence with Jefferson, i. 251.
 Description of the morning, i. 197.
 Disputes between military officers, i. 198.
 Letter on John Quincy Adams to Benjamin Waterhouse, i. 577.
 Letter to, on his election to the Presidency, by Mrs. Adams, i. 199.
 Life and Writings, edited by Charles Francis Adams, ii. 851.
 Notice of Aaron Bancroft, i. 424.
 Notice of Berkeley's lines on America, i. 179.
 Notice of the College of New Jersey, i. 283.
 Notice of Common Sense, i. 208.
 Notice of John Dickinson, i. 193.
 Notice of Duché's prayer in the Continental Congress, i. 230.
 Notice of P. Du Simitière, i. 183.
 Notice of J. Galloway, i. 182.
 Notice of Francis Hopkinson, i. 221.
 Notice of T. Paine's claims in the American Revolution, i. 208.
 Notice of Benjamin Rush, i. 276.
 Notice of Charles Thomson, i. 180.
 Reception of the Stamp Act in America, i. 196.
 Satirical verses on. Philip Freneau, i. 344.
 Satirized by T. Paine, i. 210.
 ADAMS, J. G., Hymns for Christian devotion, i. 621.
 ADAMS, JOHN QUINCY, i. 577.
 Parody of Barlow's song on the discoveries of Captain Lewis, i. 412.
 Life of, by Josiah Quincy, i. 635.
 ADAMS, REV. JOHN, i. 143.
 Lines on Cotton Mather's literary industry, i. 67.
 ADAMS, SAMUEL, life and public services of, by W. V. Wells, ii. 813.
 ADAMS, WILLIAM, discourse on Prof. Stuart, i. 708.
 ADAMS, WILLIAM T., ii. 877.
 Address of the New York Convention. John Jay, i. 273.
 Addresses and Speeches by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 347, 349.
 Adger, John B., ii. 144.
 Adirondaacks, Forest Pictures in the, by A. B. Street, ii. 437.
 ADLER, GEORGE J., ii. 753.
 Adsum. R. H. Stoddard, ii. 727.
 Adulator, the, by Mercy Warren, i. 173.
 Advent, Church of the, ii. 217.
 Adventure with a Black Sentinel. T. W. Higginson, ii. 885.
 Advice to Authors. Philip Freneau, i. 350.
 Advice to a Raven in Russia. Joel Barlow, i. 414.
 Advice to a Freshman. H. W. Beecher, ii. 802.
 Æneid of Virgil, translated by C. P. Cranch, ii. 486.
 Affection, a poem. Susanna Rowson, i. 520.
 After All. Wm. Winter, ii. 967.
 After Icebergs with a Painter, by L. L. Noble, ii. 508.
 After the Rain. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 831.
 After the War, by Whitelaw Reid, ii. 970.
 AGASSIZ, LOUIS JOHN RUDOLPH, i. 19.
 Agathangelus, passage from. Increase Mather, i. 64.
 Age, intellectual delight of. James Logan, i. 83.
 Age of Homespun. Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
 Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine, i. 209.
 Agriculture, Washington's letters on, i. 190.
 Agricultural Addresses, by M. P. Wilder, ii. 841.
 Aiken, Dr. Charles Augustus, i. 921.
 AINSLIE, HEW, i. 872.
 Ainsworth, Henry, notice of, i. 21.
 Airs of Palestine, specimens of. John Pierpont, i. 766.
 Aitken, Robert, account of, i. 208.
 Aker, Paul, i. 298, ii. 932.
 Al Aaraaf, by Edgar A. Poe, ii. 402.
 Alarum at Concord. Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 865.
 Albano Days. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 925.
 Albany, Collections on the History of, by Joel Munsell, ii. 835.

- Albert Durer's Studio. J. G. Holland, ii. 799.
- Aleiphron, G. Berkeley's, written at Newport, i. 177.
- ALCOTT, AMOS BRONSON, ii. 182, 843.
- ALCOTT, LOUISA MAX, ii. 937.
- ALDRICH, JAMES, ii. 344.
- ALDRICH, THOMAS BAILEY, ii. 830.
- Sonnet—Henry Howard Brownell, ii. 895.
- Alethia, the Tragedy of, by M. M. Davidson, ii. 826.
- Alexander, A., History of the Log College, i. 282.
- Alexander, A. (of Phila.), i. 138.
- ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD, i. 639.
- Account of S. S. Smith, i. 284.
- Lines on J. Beveridge, i. 139.
- Notice of Samuel Miller, i. 590.
- Alexander, Caleb, i. 320.
- Alexander, H. C., i. 643.
- ALEXANDER, JAMES W., i. 641, 643.
- Description of Jonathan Edwards's preaching, i. 105.
- Eulogy of Robert Baird, i. 947.
- On J. Witherspoon, i. 288.
- Projects a Commentary on the Scriptures, ii. 50.
- ALEXANDER, JOSEPH A., i. 641, 644.
- Alexander, Sir William, ii. 865.
- Alexander, Stephen, i. 284.
- Alexander, William, i. 640.
- Alexander meets Darius, poem. Anne Bradstreet, i. 56.
- "Alexander the Deliverer," a toast, by R. G. Harper, i. 665.
- Alfieri and Dante. George H. Calvert, ii. 194.
- ALGER, HORATIO, JR., ii. 815.
- ALGEE, WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE, ii. 796.
- Tribute to Theodore Parker, ii. 442.
- Algerine Captive, by Royal Tyler, i. 483.
- Passages from. Royal Tyler, i. 435.
- Algerine Captives, treatment of, i. 633.
- Algie Researches, by Henry R. Schoolcraft, i. 860.
- Alhambra, by Washington Irving, i. 739.
- Ali Bey, Travels of, by S. L. Knapp, i. 755.
- Alice, by J. V. Huntington, ii. 532.
- Alice of Monmouth, by E. C. Stedman, ii. 944.
- Alison, A., Abridgment of his History of Europe, by E. S. Gould, ii. 308.
- ALISON, FRANCIS, i. 405.
- School in Maryland, i. 180.
- Allan, John, a friend of Edgar A. Poe, ii. 402.
- Allan, Col. John, journal and letters edited by Frederic Kidder, ii. 451.
- Allan, John, Memorial by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
- ALLEN, ETHAN, i. 216.
- Lines on. Lemuel Hopkins, i. 833.
- Noticed in Graydon's Memoirs, i. 367.
- ALLEN, ELIZABETH AKERS, ii. 931.
- Allen, George, ii. 769.
- Allen, Ira, i. 218.
- Donation of land to the University of Vermont, i. 831.
- ALLEN, JAMES, i. 245.
- ALLEN, PAUL, i. 670, 775, 874.
- Allen, William, President of Bowdoin, i. 916.
- Anecdote of Lemuel Hopkins, i. 335.
- Character of Samuel Hopkins, i. 160.
- ALLIBONE, SAMUEL AUSTIN, ii. 862.
- ALLSTON, WASHINGTON, ii. 16.
- Belshazzar's Feast. Cyrus A. Bartol, ii. 539.
- Lectures on, by William Ware, i. 891.
- Allyn, Dr. John, Memoir of, by Convers Francis, i. 728.
- Almanac, American, i. 694, 878.
- Almanac Maker, The. Philip Freneau, i. 357.
- Almanac, New England, by Isaiah Thomas, i. 816.
- Almanac, Poor Richard's, i. 118.
- Alpine Sheep, The. Maria Lowell, ii. 610.
- ALSOP, JOHN, i. 514.
- ALSOP, RICHARD, i. 512.
- Notice of, by E. H. Smith, i. 625.
- America, benefits to, of our National Literature. Edward Everett, i. 883.
- And her Commentators, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 403.
- Berkeley's verses on Arts and Learning in, i. 179.
- Dissected, by James McSparran, i. 104.
- Early dramatic and poetical notices of, i. 6.
- Early European friends of, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 761.
- Farewell to. Phillis Wheatley, i. 385.
- Has no grudge against England. Rufus Choate, ii. 72.
- Independence of, foreseen, by Ezra Stiles, i. 169.
- Past, Present, and Prospective, by E. B. Humphreys, ii. 809.
- Prophecy of the greatness of. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 312.
- Prophecy of, by Sir Thomas Browne, i. 179.
- Prophecy of religion in, by George Herbert, i. 179.
- Prophecy of, by Bp. Shipley, i. 179.
- Relations of, to France and Great Britain in 1808. J. S. J. Gardiner, i. 556.
- Rising glory of, by H. H. Brackenridge and P. Freneau, i. 303, 841.
- To Great Britain. Washington Allston, ii. 20.
- AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ARTS, i. 693.
- Aboriginal Languages, Literature of, by H. E. Ludewig, ii. 331.
- Angler's Book, by Thaddeus Norris, ii. 857.
- Annals, by Abiel Holmes, i. 530.
- ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY, i. 316.
- Mather alcoe in the library of the, i. 67.
- Archives, ii. 86.
- Association for the Advancement of Science, ii. 536.
- Bards, a satire, by Robert Waln, ii. 37.
- Bible Union, ii. 447.
- Biography, by S. L. Knapp, i. 755.
- Biography, by Jared Sparks, i. 878.
- Biography, Dictionary of, by F. S. Drake, ii. 749.
- Civil War, Causes of the, by J. L. Motley, ii. 584.
- Civil War, History of the, by J. W. Draper, ii. 754.
- Colleges and the American Public, by Noah Porter, ii. 853.
- Colonial Church, History of, by Wm. S. Perry, ii. 862.
- Colonies, isolation of, a promotion of democracy. G. W. Burnap, ii. 161.
- Conflict, the, by Horace Greeley, ii. 420.
- Democrat, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
- Ethnological Society, ii. 49.
- Family in Germany, by J. R. Browne, ii. 599.
- Farmer's Pleasures. Hector St. John, i. 184.
- Fish Culture, by Thaddeus Norris, ii. 867.
- Flag, History of the, by G. H. Preble, ii. 864.
- Flag, the. J. R. Drake, i. 932.
- Genealogist, ii. 820.
- Geographical and Statistical Society, ii. 49.
- Governors, memoirs of, by J. L. Moore, ii. 133.
- Historical Record, ii. 393.
- Independence, verses on, i. 208.
- In England, by A. S. Mackenzie, ii. 178.
- Journal of Education, ii. 535.
- Journal of Science, i. 101.
- Leaves, by Samuel Osgood, ii. 475.
- Life, round of. Timothy Dwight, i. 877.
- Literature, Cyclopædia of, by Evert A. and George L. Duyckinck, ii. 837-8.
- Literature, history of, proposed by John Neal, i. 875.
- Literature, lectures on, by S. L. Knapp, i. 755.
- Literature, sketches of, by T. Flint, i. 713.
- Local History, literature of, by H. E. Ludewig, ii. 331.
- Loyalists, by Lorenzo Sabine, ii. 450.

- Mechanic and Workingman, essays by J. W. Alexander, i. 641.
- Medical and Philosophical Register, i. 822.
- Metrical Psalter, by George Burgess, ii. 382.
- Monthly Magazine, ii. 269.
- National Thanksgiving Hymn. Sarah J. Hale, i. 827.
- Neutrality, by Charles Francis Adams, ii. 852.
- Neutrality, precedents of, by W. W. Story, ii. 619.
- Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 363.
- People, the. James K. Paulding, ii. 10.
- People, the—their moral and intellectual development, ii. 134.
- PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, i. 596.
- Philosophical Society Address to Dr. Franklin, i. 226.
- Philosophical Society, proposed by Franklin, i. 115.
- Poems, collection of, 1793, i. 333, 624.
- Political Economy, by Francis Bowen, ii. 483.
- Pomological Society, ii. 842.
- Principles of civil freedom. J. H. Hobart, i. 674.
- Printer, by Thomas MacKellar, ii. 463.
- Pulpit, annals of the, by Dr. W. B. Sprague, i. 707.
- Quarterly Register, i. 151.
- Question, the, by W. W. Story, ii. 619.
- Review, by Robert Walsh, i. 726.
- Revolution, history of, by D. Ramsay, i. 318.
- Revolution, influence of its military and political events on the human body. Benjamin Rush, i. 276.
- Taxation. Samuel St. John, i. 478.
- Theatre, history of, by Dunlap, i. 560.
- Themes for poetry. Edward Everett, i. 881.
- The New York, i. 398; ii. 320.
- Times, a satire. 1781, specimens of, i. 478.
- Americans, National Portrait Gallery of Eminent, by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
- AMES, FISHER, i. 486.
- Funeral poem on. J. S. J. Gardiner, i. 557.
- AMES, MARY CLEMMER, ii. 910.
- Memorial of Alice and Phœbe Cary, ii. 659.
- Ames, Nathaniel, i. 486.
- Ames, Pelham W., speeches of Fisher Ames, i. 487.
- Ames, Seth, works of Fisher Ames, i. 487.
- Amherst College, i. 863.
- Reminiscences of, by Dr. Hitchcock, i. 866.
- Amir Khan, by L. M. Davidson, ii. 824.
- Among My Books, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 613.
- Among the Hills, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 815.
- Among the Isles of Shoals. Celia Thaxter, ii. 998.
- Amulet, the. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 830.
- Amusements, relations of public, to morality, ii. 775.
- Amy. J. M. Legaré, ii. 734.
- Anacreon, odes of, translations. David French, i. 126.
- Analectic Magazine, i. 738.
- Anapestic. James G. Percival, i. 944.
- Anarchiad, the, i. 323, 333, 335, 389.
- Anastasis, by George Bush, i. 965.
- Ancient Rome. A. P. Peabody, ii. 428.
- Anderson, Alexander, notice of, i. 348.
- ANDERSON, HENRY J., i. 400.
- Andover Theological Seminary, i. 663.
- André, Major, the fate of. Alexander Hamilton, i. 440.
- Life and career of, by Winthrop Sargent, ii. 69.
- Andrew, John A., ii. 841.
- Andrew, John Albion, life of, by Elias Nason, ii. 514.
- Andrew, Samuel, i. 92.
- Andrews, E. A., ii. 642.
- Andrews, John, i. 406.
- Andros, Sir Edmund, government of, by J. R. Brodhead, ii. 506.
- Angell, James Burrill, i. 835; ii. 757.
- ANGELL, JOSEPH K., i. 804.
- Anglo-Saxon Influences of Home. George P. Marsh, ii. 120.
- Annals of Albany, by Joel Munsell, ii. 835.
- Annoyer, the. N. P. Willis, ii. 271.
- Anthology Club, i. 785; ii. 53.
- ANTHON, CHARLES, i. 399.
- Anthon, John, ii. 172.
- Anthony Burns' Riot, ii. 882, 930.
- Anti-Lucretius, of Cardinal de Polignac, i. 120.
- Antioch College, i. 962.
- Antiquity, close of. Samuel Eliot, ii. 679.
- Anti-rent novels, by J. F. Cooper, i. 811.
- Apache Country, adventures in, by J. Ross Browne, ii. 599.
- Ape, the travelled. Timothy Dwight, i. 376.
- Aphorisms. Joseph Bartlett, i. 525.
- Apology, the. R. W. Emerson, ii. 185.
- Apostle Paul at Athens. Albert Barnes, ii. 52.
- Appeal, by R. Walsh, i. 726.
- Appleton, the Rev. Jesse, President of Bowdoin, i. 916.
- Appleton's Cyclopædia, i. 17; ii. 495.
- Application of Redemption, passage from. Thomas Hooker, i. 30.
- Approach of Age, the. James Lawson, ii. 66.
- Aphorpe, East, i. 154.
- Archæologia Americana, i. 817.
- Archdale, John, New Description of Carolina, 1707, i. 141.
- Arctic Adventures, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
- Arctic Explorations, by E. K. Kane, ii. 675.
- Arctic Incidents. E. K. Kane, ii. 674.
- Arcturus, ii. 578, 591, 838.
- Ariadne. Sura J. Lippincott, ii. 654.
- Arizonian. "Joaquin Miller," ii. 989.
- ARMSTRONG, JOHN, i. 497.
- Army assembled at New Amsterdam. Washington Irving, i. 747.
- Army Life in a Black Regiment, by T. W. Higginson, ii. 882.
- Arnold, Benedict, at Danbury, i. 198.
- Treatment of his effigy in Philadelphia, i. 294.
- ARNOLD, GEORGE, ii. 947.
- Arnold, Jonathan, ii. 869.
- ARNOLD, JOSIAS LYNDON, i. 549.
- Arnold, Oliver, verses at the expense of Benedict Arnold, i. 409.
- ARNOLD, SAMUEL GREENE, ii. 869.
- Art, an Ode. Charles Spague, i. 836.
- Art of being Happy. A. H. Everett, ii. 129.
- Art of Making Poetry, the. J. H. L. McCracken, ii. 503.
- Art, Scenery, and Philosophy in Europe, by H. B. Wallace, ii. 577.
- Art, works on, by J. J. Jarvis, ii. 781.
- ARTHUR, T. S., ii. 516.
- Arthur Bonnicastle, by J. G. Holland, ii. 798.
- Arthur Carryl, by Laughton Osborn, ii. 306.
- Arthur Mervyn, passage from. C. B. Brown, i. 614.
- Artist Life, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
- Artists, book of the, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 494.
- Arts of Design, history of, by Dunlap, i. 560.
- Ascent of Mount Marcy. A. B. Street, ii. 437.
- Ashe, Thomas, Description of Carolina, 1681, i. 141.
- Asten, Abraham, a friend of James Nack, ii. 481.
- Astor House. McDonald Clarke, ii. 42.
- ASTOR LIBRARY, ii. 763.
- Astor, William B., donation to the Astor Library, ii. 764-5.
- Astor, William Waldorf, ii. 766.
- Astronomy of the Bible, by O. M. Mitchell, ii. 767.
- At Home and Abroad, by John P. Kennedy, i. 953.
- At Last. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 925.
- At the Grave of Adam. S. L. Clemens, ii. 953.
- At the Pyramids. William C. Bryant, i. 910.
- Atalantis, by W. G. Simms, ii. 257.
- Athenæum, Boston, books of Cotton Mather, i. 67.

- Athenæum, the, at Yale, i. 97.
 Athenia of Damascus, by Rufus Dawes, ii. 163.
 Atlantic Essays, by T. W. Higginson, ii. 882.
 Atlantic Journal and Friend of Knowledge, i. 778.
 Atlantic Magazine, ii. 57.
 Atlantic Monthly, ii. 373, 882, 960.
 Atlantic Telegraph Cable, History of, by C. F. Briggs, i. 485.
 Attack, an, from Tales for the Marines. H. A. Wise, ii. 634.
 Atwater, Jeremiah, first President of Middlebury College, i. 832.
 Auchmuty, Samuel, letter of Dr. S. Peters to, i. 201.
 Auchtertool. Alexander Wilson, i. 573.
 AUDUBON, J. J., i. 678
 Intercourse of C. W. Weber with, ii. 630.
 Remark on A. Wilson, i. 568.
 August. William D. Gallagher, ii. 311.
 Augustine, Age of St. S. Osgood, ii. 474.
 Aunt Dinah. J. O. Terry, ii. 670.
 Aunt Kitty's Tales, by Maria J. McIntosh, ii. 207.
 Aurelian, by William Ware, i. 891.
 AUSTIN, JAMES T., i. 754.
 Austin, Samuel, President of University of Vermont, i. 832.
 Austin, William, i. 686.
 Authors. H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 494.
 Authorship, by John Neal, i. 875.
 Autobiography of Franklin, i. 116.
 Edited from MSS., by John Bigelow, ii. 811.
 Autobiography of Lyman Beecher, i. 672; ii. 783.
 Autobiographical Sketch. Caroline Gilman, i. 895.
 Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, by Oliver Wendell Holmes, ii. 373.
 Auto de Fé in Spain, an. William H. Prescott, i. 983.
 Autographs, collections of W. B. Sprague and B. F. Tefft, i. 707.
 Autumn. E. H. Stoddard, ii. 723.
 Autumn Landscape, an. A. B. Street, ii. 436.
 Autumn Leaves, by S. J. Gardner, i. 799.
 Autumnal Reflections. S. Woodworth, i. 705.
 Awkward Age, the. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 927.
 A Year's Life, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 610.
 Aylmere, by R. T. Conrad, ii. 418.
- Baby in the Bath Tub. Sara J. Lippincott, ii. 655.
 Bacchanalian Dialogue. Philip Freneau, i. 361.
 Bache, A. D., i. 600.
 Bache, Franklin, i. 599.
 Backlog Studies, by C. D. Warner, ii. 914.
 Backus, Azel, president of Hamilton College, ii. 738.
 Backwoodsman, the, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 3.
 Bacon, David Francis, i. 97.
 Bacon, Sir Francis, allusion to America, i. 6.
 Bacon, Francis, passage on Death, i. 719.
 Baconian Philosophy, discourse on the, by Samuel Tyler, ii. 382.
 Badeau, Adam, History of Gen. Grant, ii. 521.
 BAILEY, JACOB, i. 127.
 Mémorial of, by William S. Bartlett, ii. 453.
 Notice of Mather Byles, i. 128.
 Bailey, John, ii. 268.
 Baird, Charles W., i. 949.
 Baird, Prof. Henry M., i. 949; ii. 754.
 BAIRD, ROBERT, i. 947.
 Baird, Spencer F., ii. 761.
 Baked Meats of the Funeral, by Charles G. Halpine, ii. 920.
 Baker, Daniel, ii. 891.
 BAKER, GEORGE E., editor of W. H. Seward's Speeches, ii. 136, 822.
 BAKER, WILLIAM M., ii. 891.
 Baldwin, Abraham, i. 92, 415.
 BALLAD LITERATURE OF THE INDIAN, FRENCH, AND REVOLUTIONARY WARS, i. 444.
- Ballads:
 Baby Bell. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 830.
 Belles of Williamsburg. James M. Clurg, i. 296.
 Brides, the two. R. H. Stoddard, ii. 723.
 Bunker Hill. S. F. Cozzens, ii. 692.
 Cheerful Parson. Wm. Biglow, i. 659.
 Country Lovers. T. G. Fessenden, i. 619.
 Death of Jasper. R. M. Charlton, ii. 265.
 Death of General Pike. Laughton Osborn, ii. 306.
 Gathered Rose, the, and the Stolen Heart. Emma C. Embury, ii. 329.
 Golden days of Harry Cruger, i. 233.
 Lovewell's Fight, i. 444.
 Of Sir John Franklin. G. H. Boker, ii. 711.
 Rio Bravo. C. F. Hoffman, ii. 321.
 Royal Apprentice, the. Philip Freneau, i. 358.
 Wreck of the Two Pollies. Nath. Deering, ii. 145.
- Ballads of the old French and Revolutionary Wars:
 American Hero, the. Nathaniel Niles, 1775, i. 457.
 American Taxation. Samuel St. John, i. 478.
 Battle of the Kegs. Francis Hopkinson, i. 228.
 Battle of Stonington, the. Philip Freneau, i. 361.
 Battle of Trenton, the, i. 465.
 Bold Barton's capture of General Prescott, i. 468.
 Another version of, i. 469.
 Bold Hawthorne, i. 459.
 Bombardment of Bristol, the, 1775, i. 458.
 Bon Homme Richard, the, and the Serapis. Philip Freneau, i. 360.
 Braddock's Expedition, i. 446.
 Brave Paulding and the Spy, i. 476.
 Burgoyne, the fate of. Wheeler Case, i. 472.
 Burgoyne, John, the fate of, i. 466.
 Camp Ballad, a. Francis Hopkinson, i. 83.
 Columbia. Timothy Dwight, i. 376.
 Come, cheer up, my lads, 1769, i. 453.
 "Come, join hand in hand, brave Americans all," i. 452.
 Congratulation, the. Rivington's Gazette, i. 473.
 Cow Chase, the. Major André, i. 474.
 Eutaw Springs. Philip Freneau, i. 360.
 Faree, the, of Independence. Rivington's Gazette, i. 472.
 Free America. Joseph Warren, i. 460.
 Hark, 'tis Freedom that calls. Pennsylvania Journal, i. 457.
 Hearts of Oak, 1766, i. 461.
 Liberty Pole, song of the, New York, 1770, i. 453.
 Massachusetts' song of Liberty, i. 452.
 Military song by the army on General Washington's entry into the town of Boston. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 304.
 Mount Vernon, an ode. D. Humphreys, i. 391.
 New song called the Gaspee, 1772, i. 454.
 North Campaign, the, i. 466.
 Ode on the Battle of Bunker's Hill. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 303.
 Ode to the inhabitants of Pennsylvania, 1756, i. 448.
 On hearing that the poor man was tarred and feathered, 1774, i. 456.
 On independence, 1776, i. 464.
 Parody to welcome attorney-general Cortland Skinner, 1776, i. 462.
 Poem, a, containing some remarks on the present war, i. 460.
 Progress of Sir Jack Bragg, the, i. 467.
 Review of Burgoyne's Expedition. Robert Dinsmoor, i. 485.
 "Rise, rise, bright Genius rise," i. 464.
 Rivington's Last Will and Testament. Philip Freneau, i. 295.
 St. Tammany, song of, i. 463.
 Siege of Savannah, the, 1778. Rivington's Gazette, i. 473.

- Stanzas written on the evening of the tenth of May, 1776, by an exile from America. Myles Cooper, i. 395.
- Tea, verses on, i. 455.
- Tea Table, a Lady's adieu to the, i. 455.
- Vermonters, song of the, 1779, i. 477.
- War and Washington. J. M. Sewall, i. 302.
- Washington, the Hero of the West, i. 474.
- Wyoming Massacre, i. 470.
- Yankee Doodle, version of, i. 480.
- Yankee Doodle Expedition to Rhode Island, 1778, i. 469.
- Ballads, Lyrics, and Hymns, by Alice Cary, ii. 659.
- Ballou, Adin, i. 621.
- BALLOU, HOSEA, i. 621.
- Ballou, Hosea, 2d, i. 621.
- Ballou, Moses, i. 621.
- Ballou, M. M., i. 621.
- Balzac, article on, by J. L. Motley, ii. 584.
- BANCROFT, AARON, i. 424.
- BANCROFT, EDWARD, i. 238.
- BANCROFT, GEORGE, ii. 98, 819.
- Contrast of Franklin and Wedderburn, i. 116.
- Account of the Gaspee affair, i. 454.
- Eulogy of Prof. John Thornton Kirkland, i. 16.
- Notice of the Astor Library, ii. 765.
- Obligations in his History to the Colden papers, i. 83.
- On Founding a Travelling Fellowship, i. 21.
- On Salem Witchcraft, i. 66.
- Tribute to Franklin, i. 119.
- Baptism, Classic, Judaic, Johannic, and Christic, by Dr. J. W. Dale, ii. 861.
- Barbadoes Gazette, edited by S. Keimer, i. 110.
- Barbara Fritchie. John G. Whittier, ii. 816.
- Barbarism of Slavery. Charles Sumner, ii. 413.
- Barber, Francis, i. 438.
- Barber, the, and the Dandy. William Irving, i. 742.
- Bard, Samuel, receives a song from Franklin, i. 124.
- Life by M'Vickar, i. 399.
- Bard, the. W. G. Simms, ii. 260.
- Barefoot Boy, the. John G. Whittier, ii. 317.
- Barnwell, John, i. 896.
- Barker, E. L., History of Londonderry, i. 482.
- BARLOW, JOEL, i. 408.
- Comments on, in Iniquin's Letters, i. 730.
- Consults J. C. Osborn and R. Alsop about his Vision of Columbus, i. 142.
- Tribute to Thomas Godfrey, Sen., i. 205.
- BARNARD, DANIEL DRWEY, ii. 23.
- Barnard, Dr. Frederick A. P., i. 402.
- BARNARD, HENRY, i. 772; ii. 534.
- Barnard, John, version of the Psalms, i. 23.
- BARNES, ALBERT, ii. 50.
- Barnes, Daniel II., tribute to, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 763.
- Barnum, H. L., the Spy Unmasked, by, i. 807.
- Baron's Last Banquet, the. Albert G. Greene, ii. 146.
- Barry, Edmund D., ii. 78.
- BARTLET, WM. S., ii. 453.
- Journal of Rev. Jacob Bailey, i. 127.
- BARTLET, JOHN R., ii. 246.
- Bartlett, J. R., anecdote of Albert Gallatin, i. 512.
- Notice of Edmunstone, the Quaker, i. 41.
- BARTLET, JOSEPH, i. 523.
- BARTOL, CYRUS A., ii. 539.
- Barton, B. S., i. 235, 600.
- Barton, William, i. 597.
- Life of Rittenhouse, i. 598.
- Bartow, Thomas, i. 558.
- BARTRAM, JOHN, i. 234.
- BARTRAM, WILLIAM, i. 238.
- Bascom, Prof. John, i. 864.
- Bastinado at Cairo. John L. Stephens, ii. 249.
- Batchelor's Hall, a poem. George Webb, i. 111.
- Bates, Joshua, president of Middlebury College, i. 832.
- Bates, Miss, account of J. C. Calhoun, i. 724.
- Battell, Joseph, i. 98.
- Battle field, the. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 904.
- Battle Hymn of the Republic. J. W. Howe, ii. 647-8.
- Battle of Ants, a. H. D. Thoreau, ii. 603.
- Battle of Niagara, by John Neal, i. 874.
- Battle Pieces, and Aspects of the War, by Herman Melville, ii. 638.
- Battle Summers, the. H. H. Brownell, ii. 896.
- Battles of the United States by Sea and Land, by H. B. Dawson, ii. 809.
- And R. Tomes, ii. 812.
- Baudouin, Pierre, i. 167.
- Bawn, Leonard, i. 100.
- Baxter, A., defends Witchcraft in England, i. 65.
- Call, translated in the Indian language by John Eliot, i. 45.
- Bay Path, the, by J. G. Holland, ii. 796.
- Bay Psalm Book, Eliot a contributor to, i. 45.
- BAY PSALM BOOK, i. 21.
- BAYARD, ELISE J., ii. 664.
- Bayly Lewis, his Practice of Piety, translated in the Indian language by John Eliot, i. 46.
- Bear, description of the, in Virginia. Wm. Byrd, i. 81.
- Bear, the Last on the Hills of Warwick. H. W. Herbert, ii. 290.
- Beasley, Frederick, i. 407.
- Beattie, W., Life of T. Campbell, i. 738.
- Beaumarchais the Merchant, by John Bigelow, ii. 812.
- Beaumez, M., i. 171.
- Beauty, from Nature. R. W. Emerson, ii. 185.
- Beauty. Wm. Winter, ii. 966.
- Beccone, story out of, by Cotton Mather, i. 68.
- Beck, John Brodhead, ii. 13.
- Beck, Lewis C., ii. 13.
- BECK, THEONIC ROMEYN, ii. 13.
- BECKETT, SYLVESTER BLACKMORE, ii. 858.
- Bedouin Song. Boyard Taylor, ii. 714.
- Beechenbrook, by Margaret J. Preston, ii. 911.
- Beecher family, the, i. 672; ii. 783.
- Beecher, Catharine, i. 671; ii. 522.
- Tribute to Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 842.
- Beecher, Charles, i. 671; ii. 523, 783.
- Beecher, Edward, ii. 783.
- BEECHER, HENRY WARD, i. 671; ii. 781.
- BEECHER, LYMAN, i. 671.
- Beecher, Mrs. H. W., ii. 783.
- Beecher, Thomas K., ii. 783.
- Beech-Tree, the. R. M. Bird, ii. 201.
- Bee-Hunter, the, by T. B. Thorpe, ii. 537.
- Bee-Hunter, Tom Owen, the. T. B. Thorpe, ii. 537.
- Beers, Timothy P., i. 100.
- Before the Rain. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 831.
- Behemoth, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 591.
- Being Neighborly. Louisa M. Alcott, ii. 937.
- Belcher, Jonathan, i. 281.
- Belfry Pigeon. N. P. Willis, ii. 271.
- BELKNAP, JEREMY, i. 263.
- Bell Bird, the. W. H. Simmons, ii. 455.
- Bell, Robert, account of, i. 208.
- Bellamy, Joseph, i. 258.
- Belles, the, of Williamsburg. James M'Clurg, i. 296.
- Belles Lettres Repository, by S. Woodworth, i. 765.
- BELLOWS, HENRY WILTNEY, ii. 775.
- Benedetta, ii. 651.
- Benedicite. John R. Thompson, ii. 709.
- Benezet, Anthony, biographical anecdotes of, i. 279.
- Bennett, Emerson, ii. 999.
- BENJAMIN, PARK, ii. 344.
- Bennett, James Gordon, ii. 867.
- Benson, Egbert, i. 526.
- Note to Edward's Freedom of the Will, i. 104.
- Bentham, Jeremy, description of Franklin before the Privy Council, i. 116.
- His friendship for John Neal, i. 875.

- BENTON, THOMAS H., i. 732.
Notice of John Marshall, i. 421.
- Berber, the, by Wm. S. Mayo, ii. 466.
- BERKELEY, GEORGE, i. 175.
Gifts to Yale College, i. 92.
Interest in Columbia College, i. 393.
Intimate with J. McSparran, i. 153.
Tribute to. Wm. Crosswell, ii. 218.
- Berkeley, Mass., i. 176.
- Berkeley, Sir William, on Free Schools and Printing, i. 87.
- Bermuda, G. Berkeley's College scheme, i. 175.
- Bernard, Francis, a contributor to Pietus et Gratiulatio, i. 13.
- Bernon, Gabriel, i. 177.
- Berrian, William, i. 673.
- Berryer, Antoine Pierre, recollections of, by John Bigelow, ii. 812.
- Bertrand, General, defence of the United States, i. 809.
- BETHUNE, GEORGE W., ii. 231.
- "Betsey and I Are Out." Will Carleton, ii. 997.
- Bets, Beverly R., i. 403.
- Bets, Dr. William, i. 402.
- BEVERIDGE, JOHN, i. 138.
Account of his school, by Alexander Graydon, i. 367.
William White at the school of, i. 313.
- Beyond the Breakers, by R. D. Owen, ii. 847.
- Bible, Eliot's Indian Translation of, i. 45.
- Bible in the Family, by H. A. Boardman, ii. 452.
- Bible in the Public Schools. Rufus Choate, ii. 73.
- Bible in the Common Schools, by George B. Cheever, ii. 293.
- Bible, the English. R. H. Dana, Jun., ii. 549.
Introduction on the Revision of, by Philip Schaff, ii. 607-8.
- Bible, the English, speech on, by R. H. Dana, Jun., ii. 517.
- Biblical Repository and Princeton Review, i. 640.
- Biblical Repository, i. 880.
- Biblical Researches in Palestine, by Edward Robinson, i. 880.
- Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, Cyclopædia of, ii. 879.
- Bibliotheca Sacra, i. 880.
- Biddle, Charles, i. 774.
- Biddle, Edward, i. 774.
- BIDDLE, NICHOLAS, i. 774.
- Big Abel and Little Manhattan, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 591.
- BIGELOW, JACOB, ii. 37.
Eulogy on Count Rumford, i. 386.
- BIGELOW, JOHN, i. 901; ii. 560, 810.
- Biglow Papers, the, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 610.
- BIGLOW, WILLIAM, i. 657.
- Bill and Joe. O. W. Holmes, ii. 379.
- Bill of Rights of Massachusetts, remark on, by Rufus Choate, ii. 73.
- Bingham, Caleb, i. 589.
- Binney, Horace, ii. 68, 851.
- Biographical Studies, by G. W. Greene, ii. 540.
- BIRD, ROBERT M., ii. 200.
- Birds and Fishes of New England, poetically described. Francis Knapp, i. 78.
- Birds of the Bible, by Henry Harbaugh, ii. 780.
- Birth, the, of a Poet. John Neal, i. 876.
- Bishop George, i. 59.
- Bismarck, notice of Prince, by H. W. Bellows, ii. 776.
- Bissell, Clark, i. 96.
- Bissell, George W., i. 554.
- Bits of Blarney, by R. S. Mackenzie, ii. 816.
- Bits of Talk about Home Matters, by H. H., ii. 923.
- Bits of Travel, by H. H., ii. 923.
- Bitter-Sweet, by J. G. Holland, ii. 796.
- Black Country, the. Elihu Burritt, ii. 433.
- Black Fox, the, of Salmon River. J. G. C. Brainard, i. 968.
- Black Frost, the. Caroline Chesebro', ii. 666.
- Black Hawk, address to. Edward Sanford, ii. 235.
- Black Regiment, the. G. H. Boker, ii. 712.
- Blacklock, T., lines to, by J. Beveridge, i. 138.
- Blackmore, Sir Richard, eulogy on, by Jane Turell, i. 135.
Noticed by Cotton Mather, i. 68.
- Blaettermann, George, ii. 747.
- BLAIR, JAMES, i. 87.
- Blair, John J., i. 285.
- Blair, Samuel, i. 282.
Passage from Rev. S. Davies's elegy on, i. 282.
- Blameless Prince, the, by E. C. Stedman, ii. 944.
- Blanchard, Dr. Amos, ii. 841.
- Bland, Richard, i. 247.
- BLAND, THEODORIC, i. 246.
- Blankly, John, i. 189.
- BLEEKER, ANN ELIZA, i. 379.
- Blessings on Children. W. G. Simms, ii. 261.
- Blind Girl, the. Caroline M. Sawyer, ii. 640.
- Blind Men and the Elephant, the. John G. Saxe, ii. 565.
- Blind Preacher, the. Wm. Wirt, i. 640.
- Bliss, Leonard, ii. 513.
- Blithedale Romance, by N. Hawthorne, ii. 357.
- Bloody Tenet, by John Cotton, i. 26.
- Bloody Tenet Discussed, by Roger Williams, i. 38.
- Blooms no More. S. H. Whitman, ii. 334.
- Blue Bells of New England. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 830.
- Bluebird, the. Alexander Wilson, i. 574.
- Blushes. Julia Ward Howe, ii. 648.
- BOARDMAN, HENRY A., ii. 452.
- Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia, by W. C. Prime, ii. 773.
- Bockett, Elias, elegy on Aquila Rose, i. 109.
- Body of Liberties, by Nathaniel Ward, i. 24.
- Boise, James R., ii. 757.
- BOKER, GEORGE H., ii. 710.
Edited "Devotional Poems" of R. T. Conrad, ii. [419].
- Bonaparte, Charles L., i. 678.
- Bonaparte, Joseph, and F. Lieber, ii. 94.
- Bonaparte, Napoleon. G. H. Culvert, ii. 196.
Essay on, by W. E. Channing, i. 710.
History of, by J. S. C. Abbott, ii. 165.
Life of, by Henry Lee, i. 696.
Lines on, by Joel Barlow, i. 414.
Noticed by Pinkney, i. 705.
- Bond, Prof. George Phillips, i. 18.
- BOND, HENRY, i. 672.
- Bond, W. C., i. 18.
- Bonifacius, by Cotton Mather, i. 68.
- BONNER, JOHN, ii. 812.
- Bonneville, Captain, Adventures of, by Washington Irving, i. 740.
- Book-Making in America. C. J. Ingersoll, i. 731.
- Book of Home Beauty, by Caroline M. Kirkland, ii. 461.
- Book of the Artists, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 494.
- Book of the East, by R. H. Stoddard, ii. 724.
- Books. Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 191.
- Books and Reading, by Noah Porter, ii. 858.
- Books, Favorite, poem. William Livingston, i. 163.
- Books, humorous binding of, by Thomas Hollis, i. 10.
- BOOTH, MARY L., ii. 821.
- Boston Athenæum, ii. 54.
- Boston Atlas, the, ii. 570.
- Boston Bard, the, ii. 33.
City Library, devotion of George Ticknort, i. 974
Fortification begun by Women, verses. Benjamin Tompson, i. 72.
History and Antiquities of, by S. G. Drake, i. 697.
History of East, by Sumner and Trask, ii. 451.
In 1663, described by John Josselyn, i. 75.
In New England, poem. William Bradford, i. 36.
Landmarks and Historic Personages of, by S. A. Drake, ii. 750.

- Massacre, the. George Bancroft, ii. 103.
 Massacre, the, J. Quincy Jr.'s course in reference to, i. 262.
 Massacre, History of the, by Frederic Kidder,
 ii. 451.
 Massacre, poem, passages from. Jas. Allen, i. 245.
 Miscellany, ii. 618.
 Quarterly Review, ii. 144.
 Recorder, ii. 269.
 Tea Party, incidents relating to, ii. 636.
 Boswell, James, anecdote of, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 142.
 Boswell's, Johnson, mention of the Chevalier Taylor,
 i. 138.
 Botanical writings of James Logan, i. 82.
 Botany, introduction of Linnæan system into America, by Colden, i. 86.
 Of South Carolina and Georgia, by Stephen
 Elliott, i. 626.
 Botetourt, Lord, administration of Virginia, i. 87.
 BOTTA, ANNE C., ii. 559.
 Botta, the Historian. G. W. Greene, ii. 540.
 BOUDINOT, ELIAS, i. 246.
 Benefactor of the College of New Jersey, i. 285.
 Boulanger. Christianisme Devoilée, i. 607.
 Bouquet, the. C. P. Cranch, ii. 486.
 Bourbons, the Restoration of. Gouverneur Morris, i. 365.
 Bourville Castle, by John Blair Linn, i. 680.
 Bow in the Cloud, by Wm. B. Stevens, ii. 862.
 Bowden, John, i. 399.
 BOWDITCH, NATHANIEL, i. 20, 653.
 BOWDITCH, NATHANIEL INGERSOLL, ii. 76.
 BOWDOIN COLLEGE, i. 915.
 Donation to, by the Bowdoins, i. 168.
 BOWDOIN, JAMES, i. 167.
 Contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 13.
 Bowdoin, James, Jr., founder of Bowdoin College, i.
 915.
 BOWEN, FRANCIS, ii. 483.
 Boy and the Brook, the. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 288.
 Boyce, Ker, legacy to College of Charleston, ii. 138.
 Boydell's Shakspeare, ii. 2.
 Boyle, Robert, letters from John Eliot, i. 46.
 Bequests for the advancement of the Christian Religion, expended for Indian scholars at Harvard and William and Mary, i. 87.
 Reflections parodied by Swift, i. 68.
 Boylston, Zabdiel, defends inoculation, i. 66.
 BRACK, CHARLES LORING, ii. 822.
 Bracebridge Hall, by Washington Irving, i. 739.
 Bracken, John, president of William and Mary, i. 89.
 BRACKENRIDGE, HUGH HENRY, i. 302.
 And Knickerbocker, i. 738.
 Compliment to Weems's Washington, i. 503.
 Notices of, by H. M. Brackenridge, i. 701.
 BRACKENRIDGE, HENRY M., i. 698.
 Braddock's Defeat. George Bancroft, ii. 101.
 Defeat, history of, by Winthrop Sargent, ii. 68.
 Expedition, ballad on, i. 447.
 Fate, a ballad, i. 447.
 Bradford, Alden, Memoir of J. Mayhew, i. 155.
 Bradford, Dr. Gamaliel, Memoir of, by Convers
 Francis, i. 728.
 BRADFORD, WILLIAM, Gov., i. 85.
 Verses on. Josiah Winslow, i. 50.
 Bradford, William, prints D. Leed's almanac, 1687,
 i. 111.
 His Weekly Mercury, i. 112.
 Bradley, Charles W., i. 98.
 BRADSTREET, ANNE, i. 52.
 An ancestor of R. H. Dana, i. 784.
 Complimentary verses on. J. Rogers, i. 9.
 Prefatory lines to her poems, by Nathaniel
 Ward, i. 25.
 Brain, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 377.
 BRAINARD, JOHN G. C., i. 966.
 Lines on the death of. McDonald Clarke, ii. 42.
 Remains, edited by J. G. Whittier, ii. 312.
 Suggests Halleck's Connecticut, i. 934.
 BRAINERD, DAVID, i. 150.
 Bramston, Rev. Mr., versification of Col. Titus's speech, i. 191.
 Brandywine Ford, the. Bayard Taylor, ii. 718.
 Brant, Joseph, Memoirs of, by William L. Stone, i. 859.
 Bravo, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
 Brazil, A Journey in. Mrs. Agassiz, i. 20.
 Life in, by Thomas Ewbank, ii. 394.
 Breck, Samuel, Recollections of Hector St. John, i. 184.
 Breckenridge, John, discussion with John Hughes,
 ii. 44.
 Breeden-ræet, the, i. 85.
 Bremer, Frederika, intercourse with A. J. Downing,
 ii. 544.
 Brevoort, Henry, anecdote of Sir Walter Scott, i. 349.
 Bridal of Pennacook, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 312.
 Bridal, the. Grenville Mellen, ii. 63.
 Bridal Veil, the. Alice Cary, ii. 662.
 Bride and Bridegroom, by Julia C. R. Dorr, ii. 908.
 Brides, the Two. R. H. Stoddard, ii. 723.
 Bridge, Horatio, ii. 355.
 Brief Remarker, by Ezra Sampson, ii. 216.
 BRIENTNALL, JOSEPH, i. 112.
 Minutes of the Philadelphia Library Company,
 i. 187.
 BRIGGS, CHARLES F., ii. 485.
 BRIGHT, JONATHAN B., ii. 444.
 Brights of Suffolk, by J. B. Bright, ii. 445.
 Bridon, Madame, i. 117.
 BRINLEY, FRANCIS, ii. 444.
 BRINTON, DANIEL G., ii. 968.
 BRISTED, CHARLES A., ii. 668.
 BRISTED, JOHN, i. 685.
 Bristol, bombardment of, a ballad, i. 458.
 British officers in Philadelphia before the Revolution. Alexander Graydon, i. 368.
 British Spy, letters of, by Wm. Wirt, i. 645.
 Brockden, Charles, i. 187, 608.
 Brockett, L. P., ii. 766.
 Brocklesby, John, ii. 751.
 BRODHEAD, J. R., ii. 505.
 His History of New Amsterdam, i. 718.
 Broken Harp, the, by H. C. Knight, i. 870.
 Broken Heart, the. Washington Irving, i. 746.
 Broken Mug, the. J. E. Cooke, ii. 576.
 Brontologia Sacra, by Cotton Mather, i. 69.
 Bronx. J. R. Drake, i. 930.
 Brook Farm, ii. 255, 696.
 Brook, the. Wm. B. Wright, ii. 985.
 BROOKS, CHARLES T., ii. 495.
 Brooks, Evastus, controversy with John Hughes,
 ii. 45.
 BROOKS, JAMES G., ii. 130.
 BROOKS, MARIA, i. 923.
 BROOKS, MARY E., ii. 130.
 BROOKS, NATHAN COVINGTON, ii. 452.
 Brooks, Peter C., i. 883; ii. 851.
 Brotherhead, Wm., edition of Lives of the Signers,
 i. 735.
 Brothers, the. L. M. Child, ii. 212.
 Brothers, the. M. J. McIntosh, ii. 208.
 Brothers, the. Charles Sprague, i. 837.
 Brougham, Lord, remarks on religious toleration of men of science, i. 145.
 BROWN, CHARLES BROCKDEN, i. 608.
 Brown, Francis, i. 552.
 BROWN, GOULD, ii. 14.
 Brown, John, i. 771.
 Brown, John Carter, ii. 69, 248.
 BROWN, JOHN W., ii. 581.
 Brown, Nicholas, i. 542.
 Brown, Robert, i. 609.

- BROWN, DR. SAMUEL GILMAN, ii. 741.
 BROWN UNIVERSITY, i. 541.
 BROWNE, ARTHUR, i. 91.
 Browne, H. K., Statue of Clinton, i. 598.
 BROWNE, J. ROSS, ii. 596.
 Browne, Sir Thomas, prophecy of America, i. 179.
 Passages from, i. 102.
 BROWNELL, HENRY HOWARD, ii. 894.
 Brownell, S., i. 918.
 Brownfield, R., i. 607.
 Brownlee, W. C., i. 602.
 BROWNSON, ORESTES A., ii. 144.
 His Quarterly Review, ii. 144.
 Brutus, by J. H. Payne, i. 850.
 Bryant, John H., i. 913.
 BRYANT, WM. CULLEN, i. 899.
 Address on J. F. Cooper, i. 811.
 Eulogy on Thomas Cole, ii. 126.
 In Memory of Wm. Leggett, ii. 158.
 Interview of C. W. Webber with, ii. 630.
 Notice of Fitz-Green Halleck, i. 939.
 Sonnet to Thomas Cole, ii. 126.
 Tribute to Gulian C. Verplanck, i. 763.
 Buccaneer, the. Richard H. Dana, i. 786, 787.
 Buckham, Dr. M. H., i. 835.
 BUCKINGHAM, JOSEPH T., ii. 12.
 Notice of Dennie, i. 685.
 Buckingham, W. A., i. 98.
 BUCKMINSTER, JOSEPH S., i. 756.
 Review of Logan's translation from Cicero, i. 82.
 Buckwheat Cake, the. Henry Pickering, i. 714.
 Buell, Rev. Dr., i. 336.
 Buffon, admires C. Colden's pamphlet on Attraction and Impulsion, i. 86.
 Bugle, the. Grenville Mellen, ii. 63.
 Building, and the Birds, the. Catharine Luders, ii. 644.
 BULFINCH, S. G., ii. 345.
 Bulkley, Edward, i. 51.
 BULKLEY, PETER, i. 50.
 Bulkley, Rev. Mr., of Colchester, preface to Wolcott's Meditations, i. 84.
 Bulls and the Jonathans, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 10.
 Bull-Fight, the. H. B. Stowe, ii. 528.
 Bulwer, E. L., Last Days of Pompeii, ii. 199.
 Bunker Hill. F. S. Cozens, ii. 692.
 A. B. Street, ii. 438.
 Bunker's Hill, battle of, described by Mrs. Adams, i. 198.
 A Drama, by H. H. Brackenridge, i. 303.
 Monument, founded by Wm. Tudor, ii. 54.
 Association, ii. 849.
 Burder, George, abridges Mather's Essays to do Good, i. 68.
 Buren, Martin Van, by W. A. Butler, ii. 729.
 Burgess, A., Memoir of George Burgess, ii. 383.
 BURGESS, GEORGE, ii. 382.
 Burgoyne, General, ballads on, i. 466.
 Comedies of, i. 468.
 Entrance into Cambridge, i. 174.
 The Fall of, a Ballad, i. 472.
 Burial among the Mountains, a. F. W. Shelton, ii. 567.
 Burke, Edmund, i. 250.
 Anecdotes of, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 142.
 Present at the scene with Franklin before the Privy Council, i. 116.
 Sketch of Love of Freedom in America, i. 194.
 Story of "ditto to," i. 231.
 Burleigh, Celia, ii. 859.
 BURLEIGH, WILLIAM HENRY, ii. 859.
 Burnaby, Andrew, account of G. Berkeley's house at Newport, i. 177.
 BURNAP, GEORGE W., ii. 160.
 Burnet, Governor, i. 115.
 Burning of Schenectady, by A. B. Street, ii. 435.
 Burus, a pilgrimage to the land of, i. 873.
 BURR. REV. AARON, i. 281.
 Eulogium on, by Livingston, i. 162.
 Burr, Aaron, speech of William Wirt on the trial of, i. 644.
 Life and Times of, by J. Parton, ii. 803.
 BURRITT, ELIHU, ii. 430.
 Burroughs, Rev. Charles, i. 91.
 Burroughs, George, victim of the Salem Witchcraft, i. 66.
 BURTON, WARREN, ii. 445.
 Burton, Wm. E., first appearance in New York, i. 765.
 BUSH, GEORGE, i. 964.
 BUSHNELL, CHARLES J., ii. 834.
 BUSHNELL, HORACE, ii. 219.
 Butler, Benj. F., ii. 727.
 BUTLER, FREDERICK, ii. 838.
 Butler, Samuel, lines on Montaigne's Cat, i. 132.
 Passage in Hudibras founded on a story told by Thomas Morton, i. 84.
 BUTLER, WM. ALLEN, ii. 727.
 Butterfly, the, a type of the Resurrection. Mather Byles, i. 130.
 BYLES, MATHER, i. 126.
 Wit combat with Joseph Green, i. 131.
 BYRD, WILLIAM, i. 79.
 Notice of the Indian school at William and Mary, i. 88.
 Byron, characteristics of. H. S. Legaré, ii. 25.
 By-Ways of Europe, by Bayard Taylor, ii. 716.
 Caius Gracchus, a tragedy, by Louisa S. M'Cord, ii. 29.
 Calaynos, passage from. George H. Boker, ii. 710.
 CALDWELL, CHARLES, i. 626.
 Notice of Fisher Ames, i. 487.
 Caldwell, Joseph, president of the University, North Carolina, i. 801.
 CALDWELL, WM. W., ii. 708.
 Caleb Williams, i. 612.
 Calef, Robert, notice of his Wonders of the Invisible World displayed, i. 66.
 CALHOUN, JOHN C., i. 722.
 California, by Charles Nordhoff, ii. 921.
 Californian, the, edited by Walter Colton, ii. 23.
 CALLENDER, JOHN, i. 133.
 Calliopean Society of New York, ii. 2.
 CALVERT, GEORGE H., ii. 192.
 Calvin, John, noticed by Berkeley, i. 177.
 Cambridge, University of, a poetical address to. Phillis Wheatley, i. 384.
 Camel, the, its organization, habits, and uses, by George P. Marsh, ii. 120.
 Camel, introduction of the, into the South-west, ii. 631.
 Camm, John, president of William and Mary, i. 89.
 Campaign of 1812, History of, by J. F. Clarke, ii. 454.
 Campaign of the Army of the Potomac, by W. Swinton, ii. 836.
 Campbell, Archibald, i. 738.
 CAMPBELL, JACOB, i. 501.
 Campbell, Lord, notice of Franklin at the Privy Council, i. 116.
 Campbell, Thomas, borrows a couplet from Benjamin Church, i. 239.
 Borrows a couplet from Philip Freneau, i. 349.
 Life of, by Washington Irving, i. 738.
 CAMPBELL, DR. WILLIAM H., i. 603.
 Campbell, W. W., Life of Clinton, i. 592.
 Canaan, Conquest of, by Timothy Dwight, i. 371.
 Passages from. Timothy Dwight, i. 373.
 Canada, conquest of, by George Cockings, i. 440.
 Canals, History of the rise, progress, etc., of the Western, by Elkanah Watson, i. 540.

- Canot, Capt., by Brantz Mayer, ii. 380.
 Cape Cod, and All Along Shore, by Chas. Nordhoff, ii. 921.
 Cape Cod to Dixie and the Tropics, by J. M. Mackie, ii. 484.
 Capen, Joseph, epitaph on John Foster, i. 115.
 Captain Brand of the Centipede, by H. A. Wise, ii. 636.
 Capture of a Whale. J. F. Cooper, i. 812.
 CAREY, HENRY C., i. 867.
 CAREY, MATHEW, i. 667: ii. 897.
 Carey's Museum, contributed to by Hugh Williamson, i. 199.
 Caribbeana, i. 110.
 CARLETON, WILL, ii. 996.
 Carnahan, James, president of College of New Jersey, i. 284.
 CAROLINA LITERATURE, EARLY, i. 141.
 Carolina Sports, by Wm. Elliott, i. 797.
 Carpenter, Stephen Cullen, i. 683.
 Carriers' Address, 1720, by Aquila Rose, i. 109.
 Carrington, E., i. 795.
 Carroll, B. R., Hist. Collections of South Carolina, i. 141.
 CARRUTHERS, WM. A., ii. 266.
 Cartaphilus, the Wandering Jew, by D. Hoffman, i. 759.
 CARTER, NATHANIEL H., i. 796.
 CARY, ALICE, ii. 658.
 CARY, HENRY, ii. 90.
 CARY, PHOEBE, ii. 658.
 Memorial of, by Mary Clemmer Ames, ii. 911.
 CASE, WHEELER, i. 471.
 Cases of Conscience concerning Witchcraft, by Increase Mather, i. 64.
 Caspippina's Letters, passage from. Jacob Duché, i. 230.
 CASS, LEWIS, i. 731.
 Writes notes to "Ontwa," ii. 65.
 Castile, the Ladies of, passage from. Mercy Warren, i. 174.
 Castles. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 831.
 Caswell, Dr. Alexis, i. 548.
 Cat, Poet's (Byles) Lamentation for the loss of. Joseph Green, i. 132.
 Catacombs of Rome, by W. I. Kip, ii. 430.
 CATESBY, MARK, i. 142.
 Catherwood, Francis, ii. 249.
 Cathedral, the, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 613, 615.
 Catholic Church in the United States, by J. G. Shea, ii. 833.
 Caunonicus, Speech of, a poem by John Lathrop, i. 638.
 Cavaliers of Virginia, by Wm. A. Carruthers, ii. 266.
 Cecil Dreeme, by Theodore Winthrop, ii. 825.
 Centenarians of Harvard, i. 64.
 Centennial celebration of American Independence, suggested by John Bigelow, ii. 812.
 Centennial of American Methodism, by Abel Stevens, ii. 778.
 Centralia Exploring Expedition, ii. 630.
 "Century" Sermon, by Nathanael Howe, i. 622.
 Certain Condescension in Foreigners, on a. J. R. Lowell, ii. 617.
 CHADBOURNE, PROF. PAUL A., i. 864, 865.
 CHALKLEY, THOMAS, i. 106.
 Chalmers, Lionel, i. 141.
 Chalmers, Thomas, tribute to Jonathan Edwards, i. 105.
 Chambered Nautilus, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 377.
 Chambers, Rev. Talbot W., i. 603.
 Champagne Country, the, by Robert Tomes, ii. 812.
 Champe, Sergeant, Expedition of. Henry Lee, i. 427.
 Champions of Freedom, the, by S. Woodworth, i. 765.
 Chandler, Abiel, i. 553.
 Chance Acquaintance, a, by Wm. D. Howells, ii. 961.
 Chandler, Prof. C. F., i. 921.
 CHANDLER, ELIZABETH M., ii. 305.
 Chandler, T. B., notice of, i. 394.
 Change, a. R. K. Weeks, ii. 987.
 CHANNING, EDWARD T. and FRANCIS D., i. 785.
 CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLEBY, i. 709.
 Eulogy of President Stiles, i. 170.
 Letters to, by Moses Stuart, i. 709.
 Memoir of, by William H. Channing, ii. 468.
 Notice of S. Hopkins's theology, i. 160.
 Notice of the Redwood Library, i. 298.
 CHANNING, WILLIAM E., JR., ii. 469.
 CHANNING, WILLIAM HENRY, ii. 468.
 Memoirs of J. H. Perkins, ii. 391.
 CHAPIN, E. H., ii. 515.
 Chapman, Nathaniel, i. 599.
 Character, a, from Walden. H. D. Thoreau, ii. 603.
 Character and Characteristic Men, by E. P. Whipple, ii. 627.
 Character of Mr. Hunt, from Thomas Singularity. H. J. Nott, ii. 31.
 Characteristics of Literature, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Characters and Criticisms, by Wm. A. Jones, ii. 578.
 Charcoal Sketches, by Joseph C. Neal, ii. 296.
 Charge with Prince Rupert, a. T. W. Higginson, ii. 884.
 Charles the Bold, History of, by J. F. Kirk, ii. 886.
 Charles Elwood, by O. A. Brownson, ii. 144.
 Charleston City Gazette, ii. 257.
 CHARLESTON LIBRARY, i. 403.
 CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, COLLEGE OF, ii. 138.
 Charlevoix's New France, translated by J. G. Shea, ii. 833.
 Charles's Last Fight at Nancy, ii. 886.
 CHARLTON, ROBERT M., ii. 265.
 Charms of Fancy, passages from. Richard Alsop, i. 513.
 CHASE, PHILANDER, i. 674.
 Chase, Pliny Earl, i. 601.
 Chase, Samuel, trial of, i. 665.
 Chase, Prof. Stephen, i. 553.
 Chastellux, notice of Jonathan Trumbull, i. 322.
 Translates Humphreys' Address to the Armies of the United States, i. 388.
 Chatham, Lord, eulogist of Franklin, i. 120.
 Chauncy, Charles, second president of Harvard, i. 8.
 CHAUNCY, CHARLES, i. 105.
 Chaunt of Life, by Ralph Hoyt, ii. 397.
 Cheap Enough. John G. Saxe, ii. 565.
 Cheerful Parson, the. William Biglow, i. 659.
 Cheeshahtemuck, Caleb, only Indian graduate of Harvard, i. 47.
 Cheetham, James, account of, i. 210.
 Cheever, Ezekiel, account of, i. 65; ii. 535.
 CHEEVER, GEORGE B., ii. 293.
 CHEEVER, HENRY T., ii. 294.
 CHESEBRO', CAROLINE, ii. 666.
 CHESTER, JOSEPH LEMUEL, ii. 447.
 Chestnut Gathering, from Queechy. Susan Warner, ii. 556.
 CHEVES, LANGDON, ii. 28.
 Chevy Chase, ballad of, quoted in reference to Franklin, i. 116.
 Chicago. John G. Whittier, ii. 319.
 Child, Prof. Francis J., i. 18.
 Child Life, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 316.
 Child Japhet, the. Paul Allen, i. 670.
 CHILD, LYDIA M., ii. 210.
 Child of the Sea, the, by Estelle Anna Lewis, ii. 645.
 Child's Histories, by John Bonner, ii. 812.
 Childhood. William W. Story, ii. 619.
 Children of Isis. R. H. Stoddard, ii. 726.

- Children's Hour, the. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 284.
 Chimney Corner, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
 Chinchas, the Governor of the. G. W. Peck, ii. 595.
 Chittenden, S. B., i. 98.
 Chittenden, W. B., i. 583.
 Chivalry, Modern, extracts from. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 307.
 CHOATE, RUFUS, ii. 72.
 Letter on R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 547.
 Memoir of, by S. G. Brown, ii. 742.
 Withdrawal from the Smithsonian Institution,
 ii. 761.
 Choice, the. Benjamin Church, i. 241.
Elijah Fitch, i. 268.
Susanna Rowson, i. 520.
 CHOULES, JOHN O., ii. 119.
 Christ in Song, by Philip Schaff, ii. 607.
 Christ in Theology, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 220.
 Christian Ballads, by A. C. Coxe, ii. 604.
 Church, History of the, by Philip Schaff, ii. 607.
 Disciple, the, i. 496.
 Doctrine, History of, by W. G. T. Shedd, ii. 792.
 Examiner, ii. 538.
 Nurture, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
 Philosopher, by Cotton Mather, i. 68.
 Passage from. Cotton Mather, i. 70.
 Society and the Church, New Views of. *O. A.
 Brownson*, ii. 144.
 Christianity, its Essence and Evidence, by G. W.
 Burnap, ii. 161.
 The Religion of Nature, by A. P. Peabody, ii. 428.
 Testimony of American Statesmen and Jurists to, ii. 792.
 Christmas. A. D. T. Whitney, ii. 890.
 Christmas Bells, the. John W. Brown, ii. 581.
 Christmas Eve and Christmas Day, by E. E. Hale,
 ii. 873.
 Christus: a Mystery, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 283.
 Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers and of First Planters of Massachusetts, by Alexander
 Young, ii. 118.
 Church, the. Alice B. Neal, ii. 650.
 Church, Alonzo, historical discourse, i. 770.
 Church and Feudalism, the. H. C. Lea, ii. 899.
 Church and the Barbarians, the. H. C. Lea, ii. 900.
 CHURCH, BENJAMIN, i. 239.
 A contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 13.
 CHURCH, CAPTAIN BENJAMIN, i. 148.
 Church, Thomas, King Philip's War, i. 148.
 Church History, by S. F. Jarvis, i. 780.
 History, the, by Philip Schaff, ii. 607.
 History of England, Witherspoon's Apologue on, i. 288.
 Militant, passage from. William Vaughan, i. 2.
 Poetry, selected, by Wm. A. Muhlenberg, ii. 38.
 Record, the, ii. 47, 578.
 Without a bishop, i. 844.
 Churchman, the, ii. 511.
 Churchman's Magazine, the, i. 673.
 Churchyard at Cambridge, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 369.
 Cicero de Senectute, translated by James Logan, i. 82.
 Cicero, visit of, to the grave of Archimedes. *R. C.
 Winthrop*, ii. 348.
 Cincinnati Astronomical Observatory, ii. 767.
 Cincinnati, Journal of the General Meeting of the,
 by Major Winthrop Sargent, ii. 69.
 Cincinnati Mirror, ii. 311.
 Circle of Financiers, the, from Peter Schlemihl.
George Wood, ii. 88.
 Cities of the Plain, the. Lyman Abbott, ii. 171.
 City of my Love, the. Julia Ward Howe, ii. 647.
 City of the Dead, the. Henry W. Parker, ii. 670.
 City of the Living, the. Elizabeth A. Allen, ii. 932.
 Civil Liberty and Self-Government, by F. Lieber, ii.
 94.
 Civil War, Causes of the American, by J. L. Motley,
 ii. 584.
 Civil War in America, History of the, by John S. C
 Abbott, ii. 165.
 Civil War in the United States of America, Pictorial
 History of, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 893.
 Civil War in the United States, History of the, by
 S. M. Schmucker, ii. 795.
 Clam, sonnet to a. J. G. Saxe, ii. 564.
 CLAP, ROGER, i. 49.
 CLAP, THOMAS, i. 92.
 CLARK, GEORGE H., ii. 453.
 CLARK, LEWIS G. and WILLIS G., ii. 400.
 Clark, Prof. N. G., i. 921.
 CLARKE, DORUS, ii. 840.
 CLARKE, JAMES FREEMAN, ii. 458.
 Tribute to Horace Greeley, ii. 422.
 Clarke, Rev. John, i. 105.
 CLARKE, JOHN, i. 43.
 Plea for. Roger Williams, i. 42.
 CLARKE, M'DONALD, ii. 41.
 CLASON, ISAAC STARR, ii. 43.
 Classical Studies, by Edwards, Sears, and Felton,
 ii. 151.
 Classics, first vivid impressions in the. A. P. Peabody, ii. 425.
 Classology, a poem, by Wm. Biglow, i. 658.
 Clavers, Mrs., a New Home, by Caroline M. Kirkland, ii. 460.
 CLAY, HENRY, i. 682.
 Duel with John Randolph, i. 655.
 Life, Correspondence, and Speeches of, by Calvin Colton, i. 990.
 Clay, Webster, and Calhoun. James Parton, ii. 804.
 Claypoole, first printer of Washington's Farewell
 Address, i. 190.
 Cleanliness, essay on. Joseph Dennie, i. 588.
 Clear Fidgets, the. A. D. T. Whitney, ii. 890.
 Cleaveland, Parker, i. 916.
 CLEMENS, SAMUEL L., ii. 951.
 Clemm, Maria, ii. 404.
 Clergy, influence of, in the cause of education, i.
 421.
 Clerical Manners and Habits, letters on, by S. Miller, i. 591.
 Cleveland, Aaron, ii. 604.
 Clever Stories of Many Nations, by John G. Saxe,
 ii. 564.
 CLIFFTON, WILLIAM, i. 628.
 Clinton Bradshaw, by F. W. Thomas, ii. 420.
 CLINTON, DE WITT, i. 591.
 Account of Abimelech Coody, i. 761.
 Tribute to, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 762.
 Clinton, George, i. 591.
 Clio, by J. G. Percival, i. 940.
 Clive, Lord, reflections on the Life and Death of.
Thomas Paine, i. 211.
 Closing scene, the. T. B. Read, ii. 688.
 Club, the Tuesday, i. 585.
 Cobbe, Frances Power, edited works of Theodore
 Parker, ii. 442.
 Cobbett, William, lines on. Philip Freneau, i. 346.
 Rush Light, i. 276.
 Cockburn, Admiral, attack on the city of Washington, ii. 2.
 Cocker, Benjamin F., ii. 757.
 Cockings, George, i. 449.
 Cockloft Hall, in Salmagundi, i. 737.
 Cockloft, Pindar, verses of, in Salmagundi, i. 741.
 Coelestinus, by Cotton Mather, i. 64.
 Passages from. Cotton Mather, i. 71.
 COE, RICHARD, ii. 802.
 Coffin, old riddle on a, i. 634.
 Coffin, James H., ii. 760.
 COFFIN, ROBERT S., ii. 32.

- COGSWELL, JOSEPH G., Article on Nath. Ward, i. 25.
 Edits the New York Review, ii. 47.
 Librarian at Harvard, i. 15.
 At Round Hill school, ii. 99.
 Superintendent of the Astor Library, ii. 768-5.
- COIFFEUR, the complete, by J. B. M. D. Lafoy, i. 765.
- COIT, THOMAS W., ii. 750.
- COLANGE, AUGUSTE LEO DE, ii. 866.
- COLBURN, JEREMIAH, ii. 859.
- COLDEN, CADWALLADER, i. 85.
 A correspondent of James Logan, i. 83.
 Pamphlet on, by Livingston, i. 162.
- Coldenia, named by Linnæus, in honor of Colden, i. 86.
- COLE, THOMAS, ii. 125.
 Eulogy of, by Wm. C. Bryant, i. 901.
 Life of, by L. L. Noble, ii. 508.
- Coleman, Wm., editor of the Evening Post, i. 900.
 Notice of J. H. Payne, i. 849.
 Remarks on Halleck's "Twilight," i. 923.
- Coleridge, S. T., on Female Influence, ii. 338.
 Resemblance to Edgar A. Poe, ii. 408
- Coleridge, Sara, ii. 336.
- COLESWORTHY, DANIEL CLEMENT, ii. 514.
- College Usages and Anecdotes, i. 15.
- COLLEGES:
- Amherst, i. 863.
 - Antioch, i. 962.
 - Bowdoin, i. 915.
 - Brown University, i. 541.
 - Columbia, i. 393.
 - Dartmouth, i. 550.
 - Dickinson, i. 752.
 - Emory, Ga., i. 771.
 - Franklin Ga., i. 770
 - Hamilton, ii. 738.
 - Harvard, i. 8.
 - Marshall, ii. 607.
 - Mercer University, Ga., i. 771.
 - Michigan University, ii. 755.
 - Middlebury, i. 832.
 - New Jersey, i. 280.
 - New York, University of the City of, ii. 751.
 - North Carolina, University of, i. 801.
 - Oglethorpe University, i. 771.
 - Pennsylvania, University of, i. 404.
 - Rutgers, i. 601.
 - St. John's, Md., i. 771.
 - Trinity College, Hartford, ii. 750.
 - Union, i. 917.
 - Vassar College, ii. 766.
 - Vermont, University of, i. 831.
 - Virginia, University of, ii. 742.
 - William and Mary, i. 87.
 - Williams, i. 862.
- Collegian, the, ii. 367, 569.
- Colles, Christopher, i. 598, 822.
- Colles, Christopher. J. W. Francis, i. 823.
- Collett, Isaac, i. 623.
- Collins' New Jersey Gazette, i. 162.
- Collins, Charles, president of Dickinson College, i. 754.
- Collins, Henry, gift of site to the Redwood Library, i. 298.
- Collins's Ode, quoted by Mrs. Adams, i. 198.
- Colman, Benjamin, life of, by E. Turell, i. 135.
- COLMAN, BENJAMIN, i. 78.
- COLMAN, HENRY, i. 695.
- Colonization Society, American, R. G. Harper a benefactor of, i. 666.
- COLTON, CALVIN, i. 989.
- COLTON, GEORGE H., ii. 606.
- COLTON, WALTER, ii. 23.
- COLUMBIA COLLEGE, i. 393.
 First Century of, by Wm. A. Jones, ii. 578.
- COLUMBIA COLLEGE, Lectures of E. D. Griffin at, ii. 214.
- Columbiad, T. Paine omitted from, i. 210.
 Passages from. Joel Barlow, i. 412.
- Columbian Institute, Washington, D. C., ii. 758.
- Columbian Orator, by Caleb Bingham, i. 589.
- Columbus, life of, by Washington Irving, i. 739.
 First Letter of, on his discovery of America, ii. 766.
 Return of, after his first voyage. Wm. H. Prescott, i. 978.
- Colwell, Stephen, i. 408.
- Come in the Moonlight. J. S. Kidney, ii. 606.
- Come to me, love. Emma C. Embury, ii. 329.
- Comets, essay on, by Andrew Oliver, i. 146.
 Lecture on, passages from. Prof. John Winthrop, i. 145.
- Comic Annual, by H. J. Finn, i. 716.
- Coming Home. Phæbe Cary, ii. 659.
- Coming of the Mammoth, by H. B. Hirst, ii. 502.
- Commencement Day at Harvard, i. 15.
- Commerce, Cyclopædia of, ii. 545.
- Common Sense, by T. Paine, i. 208.
- Common Sense, Essay on. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 311.
 In Deshabille, by David Everett, i. 590.
- Companion for the Winter, a. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 928.
- Companionship of the Sexes in the study of literature, ii. 337.
- Comparative Zoölogy, Museum of, at Harvard, i. 19.
- Comparison of John Locke and William Penn. George Bancroft, ii. 160.
- Compendious History of New England, by J. G. Palfrey, i. 956.
- Composition, rules for, by A. B. Alcott, ii. 844.
- COMSTOCK, ELIZABETH A., ii. 777.
- COMSTOCK, JOSEPH E. D., ii. 777.
- CONANT, JOHN, i. 554.
- CONANT, HANNAH CHAPLIN, ii. 447.
- CONANT, THOMAS J., ii. 447.
- Concordance to Shakespeare's Poems, by Mrs. H. H. Furness, ii. 38.
- Concord Days, by A. B. Alcott, ii. 848.
- Concord of Ages, by Edward Beecher, ii. 783.
- Condensed Novels, the, by Bret Harte, ii. 976.
- Condition of China. Wm. H. Seward, ii. 136.
- Condition of Cuba. R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 551.
- Condorcet, Life of Voltaire, i. 197.
- Conduct of Life, by R. W. Emerson, ii. 190.
- Concave Corners, by Benualy, ii. 117.
- Conflict of Ages, by Edward Beecher, ii. 783.
- Congregationalism, by H. M. Dexter, ii. 813.
- Congress, Anti-Slavery and Military Measures of, by Henry Wilson, ii. 792.
- Congress, Declaration of, July 6, 1775, by John Dickinson, i. 192.
- Congressional Temperance Society, ii. 792.
- Connecticut. F. G. Halleck, i. 936.
- Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, ii. 77.
- "Connecticut Farmer's Boy," verses by F. G. Halleck, i. 932.
- Connecticut, General History of, by Dr. S. Peters, i. 201.
 Account of. Samuel Peters, i. 202.
- Colonial Records of, by J. H. Trumbull, ii. 868.
- Documentary History of the P. E. Church in, by Dr. F. L. Hawks, ii. 49.
 History of, by Benjamin Trumbull, i. 322.
 Ode to. J. L. Arnold, i. 550.
 River. J. G. C. Brainard, i. 967.
- Conflagration, the, poem. Mather Byles, i. 130.
- Conquest of Grenada, by Washington Irving, i. 738.
- Conquest of New Netherland, Oration on the, by J. R. Brodhead, ii. 506.
- CONRAD, R. T., ii. 418.

- Conservatism and Reform. F. H. Hodge, ii. 251.
 Conservative Reformation, the, and its Theology, by
 C. P. Krauth, ii. 880.
 Conspiracy of Kings. Joel Barlow, i. 415.
 Constitution Making. John Randolph, i. 656.
 Constitution, Manual of the, by Timothy Farrar, ii.
 802.
 Constitution, What is our? by Francis Lieber, ii. 98.
 Constitution of England and America, Documents of, by Francis Bowen, ii. 483
 Contemplations. Anne Bradstreet, i. 54.
 Contentment. O. W. Holmes, ii. 378.
 Continuity of the Church of England, by S. Sea-bury, ii. 118.
 Contracts, essay on the doctrine of, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 761.
 Contrast, the, by Royal Tyler, i. 432.
 Contributions to Knowledge, by the Smithsonian Institution, ii. 763.
 Conversation. Alice Cary, ii. 664.
 Conversation. John S. Hart, ii. 854.
 Conversations on the Old Poets, by J. R. Lowell, ii.
 610.
 CONWAY, MONCURE D., ii. 929.
 Notice of Mrs. Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 363.
 Cooey, Abimelech, an account of, i. 761.
 Cook, Captain, journal of his last voyage, by John Ledyard, i. 339.
 Cooke, Geo. Frederick, acts with J. H. Payne, i. 850.
 Story of, by Charles Mathews. William Dunlap, i. 562.
 And Cooper at Cato's. William Dunlap, i. 564.
 Cooke, Henry D., ii. 960.
 COOKE, JOHN ESTEN, ii. 572.
 Notice of James M'Clurg, i. 297.
 COOKE, PHILIP P., ii. 571.
 COOMBE, THOMAS, i. 140.
 COOPER, JAMES FENIMORE, i. 807.
 Services to H. Greenough, ii. 245.
 COOPER, MYLES, i. 394.
 Cooper, Samuel, a contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 13.
 Cooper, Dr. S., quotes proverbs to John Adams, i.
 197.
 COOPER, SUSAN FENIMORE, i. 812.
 COOPER, THOMAS, President of South Carolina College, ii. 140.
 Cooper, William, father of J. Fenimore, i. 807.
 Cope, Edward D., i. 601.
 COPPÉE, HENRY, i. 407; ii. 809.
 Copyright Club, address of, by C. Mathews, ii. 592.
 Copyright, International. James Parton, ii. 806.
 Corals and Coral Islands. James D. Dana, i. 96.
 Corn Shucking in South Carolina. Wm. C. Bryant,
 i. 906.
 Cornelia and Gracchus, from Caius Gracchus.
Louisa S. M' Cord, ii. 29.
 Corrector, the, i. 382, 742.
 Correlation and Conservation of Forces, edited by
 E. L. Youmans, ii. 868.
 Correspondence of the American Revolution, i. 878.
 Cosas de Espana, by J. M. Mackie, ii. 483.
 Cotton Boll, the. Henry Timrod, i. 846.
 Cotton Kingdom, the, by F. L. Olmsted, ii. 823.
 COTTON, JOHN, i. 25.
 Life of, by John Norton, i. 28.
 "Singing of Psalms a Gospel Ordinance," i. 22.
 Countess Ida, by Theo. S. Fay, ii. 240.
 Country, An Invitation into the. Jane Turell, i. 135.
 Country Life, the. R. H. Stoddard, ii. 727.
 Country Lovers, a ballad. T. G. Fessenden, i. 619.
 Country Oven, the. H. C. Knight, i. 870.
 Country School-Keeping. Royal Tyler, i. 768.
 Couplets. W. W. Story, ii. 621.
 Coupon Bonds, by J. T. Trowbridge, ii. 903.
 Courier and Enquirer, the, i. 435.
 Court Circles of the Republic, by E. F. Ellet, ii. 531.
 Court of Fancy, by Thomas Godfrey, i. 205.
 Passage from, i. 206.
 Court of St. James, Memoranda of a Residence at,
 by Richard Rush, i. 299.
 Courtin, the. J. R. Lowell, ii. 612, 613.
 Courtship in Connecticut. Samuel Peters, i. 203.
 "Cousin Alice," ii. 650.
 Cowper, William, and his female friends, ii. 338.
 Lectures on the Life, Genius, and Insanity of,
 by George B. Cheever, ii. 293.
 COX, WILLIAM, ii. 243.
 COXE, ARTHUR CLEVELAND, ii. 604.
 Coxe, Samuel H., ii. 604.
 COZZENS, FREDERICK S., ii. 692.
 Cradock, Samuel and Walter, Gospel Liberty, i. 60.
 CRAFTS, WILLIAM, i. 781.
 Cralle, Richard K., edits J. C. Calhoun's works,
 i. 723.
 CRANCH, C. P., ii. 486.
 Cranch, William, discourse on, by M. D. Conway,
 ii. 930.
 Crania Americana, by S. G. Morton, ii. 479.
 Crayon Miscellany, by Washington Irving, i. 738.
 Sketches, by William Cox, ii. 248.
 Cresap, Michael, and Logan the Indian, by Brantz
 Mayer, ii. 330.
 CREVECŒUR, H. ST. JOHN, i. 183.
 Crime against Kansas, by Charles Sumner, ii. 413.
 Crisis, the, by Thomas Paine, i. 208, 212.
 Criterion, the, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 493.
 Critic, the, by William Leggett, ii. 153.
 Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, by A. H. Everett,
 ii. 129.
 Croaker & Co., i. 933.
 Croaker, Jr., To, from the Croakers. J. R. Drake,
 i. 931.
 Croakers, the, i. 927.
 Crocodiles of the St. John's river. William Bartram,
 i. 236.
 Cromwell, Oliver, letter to John Cotton, i. 23.
 Crosby, Prof. Alphæus, i. 553.
 Crosby, Enoch, the original of Cooper's Spy, i. 807.
 CROSBY, HOWARD, ii. 754.
 Crossley, James, i. 118.
 Crosswell, A., remarks on Harvard Commencement,
 1771, i. 15.
 Reply to, by Simon the tanner, i. 15.
 Crosswell, Harry, ii. 216.
 CROSWELL, WILLIAM, ii. 216.
 Article on, by R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 548.
 Croton Ode, the. G. P. Morris, ii. 159.
 CRUGER, HENRY, i. 231.
 Cruger, John, notice of, i. 231.
 Cruger, Nicholas, the early friend of Alexander
 Hamilton, i. 487.
 Crystalline, by F. W. Shelton, ii. 567.
 Crusoe's Island, by John Ross Browne, ii. 599.
 Cuba and Back, to, by R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 550.
 Cuba, A Trip to, by Julia Ward Howe, ii. 647.
 Culprit Fay, the, by J. R. Drake, i. 928.
 Cultivation of Taste, the. William Hague, ii. 470.
 Culture Demanded by Modern Life, edited by E. L.
 Youmans, ii. 868.
 Cumming, John, eulogy on, by R. M. Charlton,
 ii. 205.
 Cummings, Dr., present to Harvard College, i. 197.
 Curiosity, by Charles Sprague, i. 836.
 Curtis, G. T., notice of the Newburgh Addresses, i.
 497.
 Life of Daniel Webster, i. 720.
 Custis, George Washington Parke, Recollections, etc., of Washington, ii. 393.
 CURTIS, GEORGE W., ii. 695.

- Life of A. J. Downing, ii. 544.
 Notice of Theodore Winthrop, ii. 825.
 Curtis, Joseph, life of, by Catherine M. Sedgwick, ii. 84.
 CURWEN, SAMUEL, i. 146.
 Journal and Letters of, passages from, i. 147.
 CUSHING, CALEB, ii. 80.
 Cushing, Caroline, i. 81.
 Cutler, Manasseh, i. 171.
 Cutler, Timothy, i. 92.
 CUTTER, EDWARD FRANCIS, ii. 850.
 CUTTER, WILLIAM, ii. 850.
 Cutting. Fitz-Greene Halleck, i. 939.
 C. Wilkins Eimi, ii. 630.
 Cypress, Jr., ii. 172.
 Cypriad, the, by H. C. Knight, i. 870.
- DABNEY, RICHARD, i. 794.
 Daggett, Naphtali, i. 92, 93.
 Dagobert, Father. C. E. A. Gayarré, ii. 228.
 DALCHO, FREDERIC, i. 596.
 DALE, JAMES W., ii. 860.
 D'Alembert at the French Academy, i. 197.
 DALY, CHARLES P., ii. 835.
 Judicial Tribunals of New York, i. 688.
 Dama Duende, la, of Calderon. George Ticknor, i. 974.
 Dana, Charles A., ii. 495.
 Dana, Francis, i. 784.
 DANA, JAMES D., i. 96.
 Dana, Richard, i. 784.
 DANA, RICHARD HENRY, i. 784.
 Notice of the Allston Gallery, ii. 17.
 DANA, R. H., JR., ii. 546.
 Notice of Josiah Quincy, i. 636.
 " " Edward T. Channing, i. 785.
 Daniel, John M., ii. 929.
 Danish Islands, the, by J. Parton, ii. 804.
 Dante, Giotto's portrait of, i. 806.
 Divine Comedy of, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 283.
 Inferno, translated by T. W. Parsons, ii. 579, 581.
 Life of, commenced by R. H. Wilde, i. 806.
 New Life of, by C. E. Norton, ii. 907.
 On a bust of. T. W. Parsons, ii. 580.
 Philosopher, Patriot, and Poet, by V. Botta, ii. 559.
 Da Ponte, Lorenzo L., ii. 752.
 Daranzel, by David Everett, i. 590.
 Darby's Return, by William Dunlap, i. 560.
 Darley, F. O. C., illustrations of Margaret, ii. 500.
 DARTMOUTH COLLEGE, i. 550.
 Darwin, E., Epistle to. E. H. Smith, i. 624.
 Daubenton's Advice to Shepherds, translated by Bowdoin, i. 168.
 Daughter of Herodias, the. Lucy Hooper, ii. 644.
 DAVENPORT, JOHN, i. 36.
 Davezac, Auguste, i. 688.
 Davidson, L. P., ii. 328.
 DAVIDSON, LUCRETIA M., ii. 324.
 DAVIDSON, MARGARET M., ii. 326.
 Davidson, Mrs. M. M., ii. 327.
 Davies, Charles, i. 401; ii. 732.
 DAVIES, SAMUEL, i. 281.
 Davila, discourses on, by John Adams, i. 195.
 Davis, Henry, president of Middlebury College, i. 832. Of Hamilton College, ii. 738.
 Davis, H. L., i. 772.
 Davis, John, finds a Latin original of Franklin's Epitaph, i. 115.
 Notice of the Port Folio, i. 584.
 Visit to the Loganian Library in 1798, i. 83.
 Visit to Weems's church at Pohick, i. 504.
 Davis, M. L., editor with P. Freneau of the Time-piece, i. 346.
 DAVIS, RICHARD B., ii. 2.
- Davy, Sir Humphrey, tribute to Franklin, i. 118.
 DAWES, RUFUS, ii. 163.
 Dawes, Thomas, ii. 163.
 Dawn to Daylight, from, by Mrs. H. W. Beecher, ii. 783.
 DAWSON, HENRY B., ii. 808.
 Dawson, Thomas and William, presidents of William and Mary, i. 89.
 Day, a. R. K. Weeks, ii. 987.
 Day in Pompeii, a. Wm. D. Howells, ii. 964.
 DAY, JEREMIAH, i. 93, 99.
 Day. Jones Very, ii. 836.
 Day of Doom, passages from. M. Wigglesworth, i. 63.
 Daybreak. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 284.
 Deacon Giles's Distillery, by G. B. Cheever, ii. 293.
 Deacon's Masterpiece, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 377.
 Dead. Wm. D. Howells, ii. 961.
 Dead of 1832, the. R. C. Sands, ii. 62.
 Dean's Bounty, the, at Yale College, i. 92.
 DEAN, JOHN WARD, ii. 552.
 Eulogy of Abner Morse, i. 800.
 DEANE, CHARLES, ii. 545.
 Deane, Samuel, authorship of Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 12.
 Contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 13.
 DEANE, WILLIAM REED, ii. 795.
 Dear Little Truant, to a. Frances S. Osgood, ii. 453.
 DEARBORN, HENRY A. S., i. 735.
 Death, curious incident relating to a, i. 757.
 Death of a Mountain Hunter. John Esten Cooke, ii. 574.
 Death of a Young Child. J. H. Perkins, ii. 392.
 Death of General Pike, the. Laughton Osborne, ii. 306.
 Death of Joseph Warren. Richard Frothingham, Jr., ii. 86.
 Death of Probus. William Ware, i. 891.
 Death of the Christian Tiberius. Charles E. A. Gayarré, ii. 229.
 Death of the Flowers, the. William C. Bryant, i. 903.
 Deathbed, a. James Aldrich, ii. 344.
 Debatable Land between this World and the Next, by R. D. Owen, ii. 845.
 Debates of Congress, Abridgment of, by T. H. Benton, i. 784.
 Decalogue of canons for observation in private life. Thomas Jefferson, i. 256.
 Decius, Essays of, by S. J. Gardner, i. 798.
 Deck and Port, by Walter Colton, ii. 24.
 Declaration of Independence, the. George Bancroft, ii. 106.
 Deems, Dr. Charles F., ii. 659.
 DEERING, NATHANIEL, ii. 145.
 Deerslayer, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
 Extract from. J. F. Cooper, i. 815.
 De Kay, Dr., i. 926.
 Delafield, Dr. Edward, i. 402.
 De Lara, or the Moorish Bride, by Caroline L. Hentz, ii. 329.
 Delevan, E. C., gift to Union College, i. 922.
 De Liancourt, notice of Mercy Warren, i. 174.
 Delirium. L. M. Davidson, ii. 325.
 Della Crusca, lines to. Royal Tyler, i. 52.
 DE MILLE, JAMES, ii. 934.
 Democracy Unveiled, by T. G. Fessenden, i. 618.
 DENNIE, JOSEPH, i. 583.
 Departed, the. Park Benjamin, ii. 345.
 De Profundis. Wm. Croswell, ii. 219.
Julia C. R. Dorr, ii. 909.
 Depuy, H. W., life of Ethan Allen, i. 217, 218.
 Dermot MacMorrogh, by J. Q. Adams, i. 578.
 Descent into the Maelstrom. Edgar A. Poe, ii. 407.
 Desecration, the, of the Flag. H. Greenough, ii. 246.
 Deserted Bride, by G. P. Morris, ii. 157.
 De Soto, Narrative of the Career of Hernando, by Buckingham Smith, ii. 837.
 Despotism in America, by Richard Hildreth, ii. 299.

- De Vere, Prof. M. Schele, ii. 747.
 Devil Fishing. William Elliott, i. 797.
 Devotional Poems. by Robert T. Conrad, ii. 419.
 Dew, Thomas K., president of William and Mary, i. 90.
 Dewey, Joseph, appendix to Wolcott's Meditations, i. 84.
 Dewey, Mary E., Life and Letters of Catherine M. Sedgwick, ii. 84.
 DEWEY, ORVILLE, i. 876.
 De Wint, Mrs. J. P., edits Miss Adams's Journal, i. 195.
 Dewitt, John, i. 602.
 DEXTER, REV. HENRY MARTYN, ii. 813.
 Dexter, S. N., gift to Hamilton College, ii. 740.
 Dial, the, ii. 182, 389.
 Dialogue between Franklin and the Gout. B. Franklin, i. 122.
 Dialogue between Head and Heart. Thomas Jefferson, i. 252.
 Dialogue on the address of the Philosophical Society to Dr. Franklin. Francis Hopkinson, i. 226.
 Dialogues, Original, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 Diamond Wedding, the, by E. C. Stedman, ii. 944.
 Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters, by the Earl of Carlisle, ii. 121.
 Diary of Ezra Stiles, notice of, and passages from, i. 170.
 Diary of John Adams, i. 194.
 Passages from, i. 196.
 Dickens, Charles, Life of, by R. S. Mackenzie, ii. 815.
 James T. Fields, ii. 681.
 Dinner of New York Press Club to, ii. 886.
 Dickens and Thackeray. R. S. Mackenzie, ii. 818.
 Dickens in Camp. Bret Harte, ii. 979.
 DICKINSON COLLEGE, i. 752.
 DICKINSON, JOHN, i. 191.
 Dickinson, John, i. 752.
 Dickinson, Jonathan, president of the College of New Jersey, i. 281.
 DICKSON, SAMUEL H., ii. 89.
 Dictionary of Poetical Quotations, by Mrs. S. J. Hale, i. 827.
 Didactics, by Robert Walsh, i. 726.
 Passages from. Robert Walsh, i. 726.
 Dietetic Charlatany. Cornelius Maheus, ii. 593.
 DINSMOOR, ROBERT, i. 482.
 Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, edited by Jared Sparks, i. 878.
 Diplomatic Correspondence of William H. Seward, ii. 135, 852.
 Directions for Courtship. Philip Freneau, i. 352.
 Dirge for a Soldier. G. H. Boker, ii. 718.
 Dirge for a Young Girl. James T. Fields, ii. 680.
 Discourses and Addresses, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 762.
 Dismantled Cabinet, the. H. Pickering, i. 714.
 Dismissed, the. George P. Morris, ii. 160.
 District School as it was, by Warren Burton, ii. 446.
 Divine Grace Displayed, by David Brainerd, i. 152.
 Divine Tragedy, the, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 283.
 DIX, JOHN A., ii. 842.
 Do not strain your punch. Henry Cary, ii. 90.
 DOANE, GEORGE W., ii. 78.
 Doane, William Crowell, ii. 79.
 Doctor Johns. by D. G. Mitchell, ii. 684.
 Doctor Oldham at Greystone's, by C. S. Henry, ii. 752.
 Dod, Albert B., i. 641.
 Dodge Club, the, by James De Mille, ii. 935.
 Dodington, Bubb, notice of James Ralph, i. 113.
 Dodsley, R., Economy of Human Life, i. 108.
 Additions to, by Z. M. Pike, i. 689.
 Doggett, John, Jr., notice of, i. 118.
 Dolliver Romance, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 363.
 Domestic Happiness, from the Croakers. F. G. Halleck, i. 934.
 Domestic Life a Half Century Ago. S. G. Goodrich, ii. 112.
Dominum collaudamus, poem, by Peleg Folger, i. 103.
 Donjon, from Faust. Bayard Taylor, ii. 720.
 Donjon, from Faust, by C. T. Brooks, ii. 498.
 Don Juan, cantos xvii., xviii., by Isaac S. Clason, ii. 43.
 Don Quixote. George Ticknor, i. 972.
 Doom of Laocœon and Troy, from Virgil, by C. P. Cranch, ii. 487.
 Doorstep, the. E. C. Stedman, ii. 945.
 Dorchester, History of, ii. 452.
 DORE, BENJAMIN, i. 637, 764.
 Memoir of John Fanning Watson, i. 704.
 DORE, JULIA C. R., ii. 908.
 Double Witness of the Church, the, by W. I. Kip, ii. 430.
 Doubt, the. Wm. D. Howells, ii. 962.
 Doubting Christian drawn to Christ, passage from. Thomas Hooker, i. 20.
 Douglass, Dr., opposes inoculation, i. 66.
 Douglass, Frederick, eulogy on Judge Jay, i. 803.
 Douglass, Margaret, Life of, by J. L. Chester, ii. 447.
 DOVE, DAVID JAMES, i. 138.
 DOWNING, A. J., ii. 544.
 DRAKE, BENJAMIN, i. 774.
 DRAKE, CHARLES D., i. 774.
 DRAKE, DANIEL, i. 773.
 DRAKE, FRANCIS SAMUEL, ii. 749.
 DRAKE, JOSEPH RODMAN, i. 926.
 DRAKE, J. R., on the Death of. F. G. Halleck, i. 935.
 Drake, Nathan, notice of James Ralph, i. 113.
 DRAKE, SAMUEL ADAMS, ii. 749.
 DRAKE, SAMUEL G., i. 696.
 Indian Captivities, i. 76.
 King Philip's War, i. 148.
 Dramatic performances, the first, at Boston, i. 660.
 Dramatic productions of the Revolution, i. 462.
 Draper, Henry, ii. 754.
 Draper, J. C., ii. 754.
 DRAPER, JOHN W., ii. 753-4, 820.
 Draper, Lyman C., ii. 893.
 Draper, Sir William, i. 367.
 Drayton, John, i. 249.
 DRAYTON, WILLIAM HENRY, i. 248.
 Dream, a, of Summer. J. G. Whittier, ii. 314.
 Dreams and Reveries of a Quiet Man, by Theo. S. Fay, ii. 210.
 Dreams, Poetry and Mystery of, by C. G. Leland, ii. 828.
 Dred, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
 Drew Theological Seminary, ii. 879.
 Drift. George Arnold, ii. 947.
 Drifting. T. B. Reid, ii. 690.
 Drisler, Henry, i. 400, 402.
 Drone papers, New York Magazine, ii. 2.
 Drought. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 900.
 Drunkenness, passage on, by Samuel Ward of Ipswich, i. 23.
 DUANE, WILLIAM, i. 500.
 DUCHÉ, JACOB, i. 229.
 Duckworth, Dodimus, by Asa Greene, ii. 309.
 DUDLEY, DEAN, ii. 814.
 Dudley, Paul, foundation of lectures at Harvard, i. 11.
 Dudley, Thomas, notice of, i. 52.
 Duel, the, between France and Germany, by Charles Sumner, ii. 414.
 Duel, the, Captain Farrago's instructions on, from Modern Chivalry. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 310.
 Duel, the. Lucy H. Hooper, ii. 949.
 Duels and Duelling, Notes on, by L. Sabine, ii. 450.
 DUER, WILLIAM ALEXANDER, i. 396.
 DUGUE, CHARLES O., ii. 671.
 Duke's Exequy, the. E. C. Stedman, ii. 946.
 Dummer, Jere., donor of books to Yale College, i. 92.

- Dunbar, William, i. 570.
- DUNLAP, WILLIAM, i. 558.
 Account of William Bartram, i. 234.
 Letter to. M. M. Noah, i. 768.
 Life of Cooke, passage from, i. 557.
 Notice of John E. Harwood, i. 575.
- Dunster, Henry, first president of Harvard, i. 8.
 Revises Psalms, i. 22.
- Dunton, John, i. 61.
- DU PONCEAU, PETER S., i. 598.
 Translates two of Schoolcraft's lectures for the French Institute, i. 860.
- Du Pradt, Abbé, i. 699.
- Durand, Elias, i. 601.
- Durbin, John P., president of Dickinson College, i. 754.
- DURFEE, JOB, i. 827.
- Durfee, Thomas, i. 805.
- DURRIE, DANIEL STREELE, ii. 865.
- Duryea, Joseph T., ii. 522.
- Du Simitière, Pierre, i. 188.
 Manuscripts quoted, i. 449, 453.
- Dutchman's Fireside, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 4.
- Dutton, Henry, i. 96.
- Dutton, Warren, i. 515.
- Duyckinck, Evert, ii. 837-8.
- DUYCKINCK, EVERT AUGUSTUS, ii. 838.
 Biography of Charles Francis Adams, ii. 851.
 Dedicatory Preface to, by W. A. Butler, ii. 729.
 History of the World, Supplement to, by Edward S. Gould, ii. 308.
 Memorial of Dr. Francis L. Hawks, ii. 49.
 Memorial of H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 493.
- DUYCKINCK, GEORGE LONG, ii. 837.
- Dwight, Henry E., i. 375.
- Dwight, Sereno E., i. 376.
 Life of Edwards, i. 102.
 Memoirs of Brainerd, i. 153.
 President of Hamilton College, ii. 739.
- DWIGHT, THEODORE, i. 375.
- Dwight, Theodore, Jr., i. 375.
- Dwight, Theodore W., i. 402; ii. 740.
- DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, i. 371.
 Companion of John Trumbull, i. 323.
 Death-bed of, i. 719.
 Notice of Ethan Allen's Oracle of Man, i. 217.
 Notice of Samson Occom, i. 161.
- Dwight, William, i. 376.
- Eames, Charles, ii. 344.
- Early Blue Bird, the. L. H. Sigourney, i. 841.
- Earth, the, a Workshop. Thomas Ewbank, ii. 394.
- Earth's Noblest Men. Thomas MacKellar, ii. 465.
- Earthquake, shock of, Nov. 18, 1755, John Adams' Diary, i. 194.
- Earthquakes, lecture on, by Prof. John Winthrop, i. 145.
- Earthward Pilgrimage, the, by M. D. Conway, ii. 980.
- East Hampton, sketch of, by J. H. Payne, i. 862.
- East Jersey under the Proprietary Governments, by W. A. Whitehead, ii. 855.
- EASTBURN, JAMES W., ii. 56.
- Eastburn, Manton, controversy with the Church of the Advent, ii. 217.
 Notice of J. W. Eastburn, ii. 56.
- EASTMAN, CHARLES G., ii. 670.
- EATON, CYRUS, i. 865.
- Eaton, D. Cady, i. 102.
- Eaton, Nathaniel, first teacher at Harvard, i. 8.
- Ebeling collection of American books at Harvard, i. 15.
- Ecce Homo. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 286.
- Ecclesiastical Characteristics, by John Witherspoon, i. 287, 288.
- Ecclesiastical History of Virginia and Maryland, by F. L. Hawks, ii. 47.
- Echo, the, i. 512, 515.
 Passages from, i. 336.
- Economy of human life, paraphrase of, by Bowdoin, i. 167.
- EDDY, RICHARD, ii. 825.
- Eddy, Thomas, i. 596.
- Edgewood, My Farm of, by D. G. Mitchell, ii. 684.
- Edmundstone, an opponent of Roger Williams, i. 41.
- Education, Cotton Mather's view of, i. 67.
- Education in Europe, by Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
- Education of Men of Leisure. J. A. Hullhouse, i. 820.
- Educational Biography, by Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
- Educational Tour and Reports, by Horace Mann, i. 962.
- Edwards, Benjamin, i. 644.
- EDWARDS, B. B., ii. 150.
- Edwards, Jerusha, her character described by her father, i. 151.
- EDWARDS, JONATHAN, i. 102.
 Description of Brainerd's Journal, i. 152.
 Life and Genius of, by George Bancroft, ii. 105.
 Presidency of Princeton, i. 104, 281.
 Soul of a Christian compared to a flower, by, ii. 294.
- Edwards, Jonathan, Jr., president of Union, i. 917.
- Edwards, Ogden, i. 105.
- Edwards, Pierrepont, i. 104.
- Edwards, Timothy, i. 102.
- EGGLESTON, EDWARD, ii. 970.
- EGGLESTON, GEORGE CARY, ii. 971.
- Egla sleeping in the grove of Acacias, from Zophiel. Maria Brooks, i. 925.
- Ego et Echo. John G. Saxe, ii. 565.
- Egypt and its Monuments, by F. L. Hawks, ii. 47.
- Eirene, by Mary Clemmer Ames, ii. 911.
- Elder, Dr. William, ii. 676.
- Election Scene, from Modern Chivalry. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 307.
- Electricity, Franklin's writings on, i. 118.
- Elegy. John Alsop, i. 514.
 On a Shell. S. L. Mitchell, i. 537.
 On Aquila Rose. S. Keimer, i. 110.
 On Prof. John Winthrop. Andrew Oliver, i. 146.
- Eliot, Charles, writings of, i. 777.
- Eliot, Charles William, i. 20.
- ELIOT, JOHN, i. 44.
 Account of his teaching the Indians. D. Gookin, i. 47.
 (Author of Biog. Dict.) authorship of Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 12.
- Eliot, Samuel, founds Greek Professorship at Harvard, i. 14.
- ELIOT, SAMUEL, JR., ii. 679.
- Ellery, William, i. 784.
- ELLET, ELIZABETH F., ii. 531.
- Ellicott, Andrew, i. 600.
- Ellie, by John Esten Cooke, ii. 573.
- Elliot, S. A., gift of books to Harvard, i. 15.
- ELLIOTT, STEPHEN, i. 625, 861.
- Elliott, Wm., i. 797.
- ELLIOTT, WILLIAM, JR., i. 796.
- ELLIS, GEORGE E., i. 636; ii. 538.
 Memoir of Jared Sparks, i. 879.
- ELLSWORTH, ERASTUS W., ii. 706.
- Ellsworth, Henry L., i. 98.
- ELMER, LUCIUS Q. C., ii. 839.
- Elmer, Dr. Jonathan, ii. 839.
- Elsie Venner, by Oliver Wendell Holmes, ii. 374.
- Elton, Romeo, i. 546.
 Edits J. Callender's Centennial Discourse, i. 134.
 Life of Roger Williams, i. 39, 41.
- Elysian Fields, from Gebel Teir. William Tudor, ii. 55.
- Emancipation, Report on the Results of, by Lyman Abbott, ii. 167.

- Embargo, the, by William C. Bryant, i. 900.
 Embargo, speech on, by Josiah Quincy, i. 634.
 EMBURY, EMMA C., ii. 828.
 EMERSON, CHARLES CHAUNCEY, ii. 183.
 Emerson, George B., ii. 889.
 EMERSON, R. W., ii. 182.
 Account of Margaret Fuller, ii. 388.
 Notice of A. B. Alcott, ii. 843.
 Emerson, William, founds the Anthology Club, ii. 53.
 Eminent Men and Women of Europe and America,
 by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
 Emmet, Thomas Addis. Isaac S. Clason, ii. 44.
 Emmons, Ebenezer, i. 864.
 EMMONS, NATHANIEL, i. 256.
 Anecdote of John Trumbull, i. 323.
 Sermon on Franklin's gift of books, i. 120.
 Emory College, Georgia, i. 771.
 Empie, Adam, president of William and Mary, i. 89.
 Empty House, the. Charles J. Sprague, i. 838.
 Encyclopædia Americana, edited by F. Lieber, ii. 94.
 John D. Godman, a contributor to, i. 915.
 End of the World, the, by Edward Eggleston, ii. 971.
 Endymion, by H. B. Hirst, ii. 502.
 ENGLAND, JOHN, i. 778.
 England, American Farmer in, by F. L. Olmsted,
 ii. 822.
 English, George B., i. 882.
 ENGLISH, THOMAS DUNN, ii. 802.
 English Character, the. Wm. H. Prescott, i. 985.
 Conquest of New Netherland, by J. R. Brodhead,
 ii. 506.
 Language, Lectures on the, by G. P. Marsh,
 ii. 121.
 Language, Origin and History of, by G. P. Marsh,
 ii. 121.
 Language, the. W. W. Story, ii. 620.
 Lark, the. Elihu Burritt, ii. 432.
 Literature as an Interpreter of History, by Henry Coppée, ii. 810.
 Literature, Dictionary of, by S. A. Allibone,
 ii. 863.
 Note-Books, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 863.
 Of Queen Anne's day, a dead language, i. 875.
 Traits, by R. W. Emerson, ii. 189.
 Vocabulary, the. G. P. Marsh, ii. 122.
 Ennui, to, from the Croakers. J. R. Drake, i. 931.
 Ephemera. William Bartram, i. 235.
 The. B. Franklin, i. 121.
 Epigram imitated from Archias. Richard Dabney,
 i. 796.
 On Wedderburn, i. 116.
 Epilogue to Cato. J. M. Sewall, i. 300.
 Epistle from Yario to Inkle, by Isaac Story, i. 662.
 Epistle to . John Beveridge, i. 139.
 Epistle to the author of the Botanic Garden. E. H. Smith,
 i. 624.
Epistolæ Familiæres, by J. Beveridge, i. 138.
 Epitaph by Benjamin Franklin on himself, i. 115.
 Latin, on Rev. Aaron Burr, i. 281.
 Of Elihu Yale, i. 92.
 Epithalamium. John Trumbull, i. 326.
 Equal Rights of All, by Charles Sumner, ii. 413.
 Erasmus, Colloquies quoted, i. 705.
 Errata, by John Neal, i. 874.
 Preface to, passage from. John Neal, i. 874.
 Errato, by William D. Gallagher, ii. 311.
 Erskine, John, publishes Thomas Prince's sermons,
 i. 87.
 Essays, by R. W. Emerson, ii. 183.
 By D. Hoffman, i. 759.
 By H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 493.
 Essays on Labor and Property, by F. Lieber, ii. 94.
 Essays and Reviews, by E. P. Whipple, ii. 626.
 Essays to do Good, by Cotton Mather, noticed by Franklin, i. 66.
 Ethnological Researches, by H. R. Schoolcraft, i. 860.
 Society, American, ii. 246.
 Eulogy of George Peabody. R. C. Winthrop, ii. 350.
 Europe, by A. H. Everett, ii. 128.
 Europe and America compared. Lewis Cass, i. 752.
 Europe, General History of, by J. G. Shea, ii. 833.
 Europe, Poets and Poetry of, by H. W. Longfellow,
 ii. 284.
 Europe, Scenes and Thoughts in, by George Henry
 Calvert, ii. 196.
 European Guides, the. S. L. Clemens, ii. 953.
 European Travel, Reminiscences of, by A. P. Peabody, ii. 428.
 Evangelical Alliance, the, ii. 608.
 Evans, Hugh Davy, ii. 513.
 EVANS, NATHANIEL, i. 247.
 Evening, by a Tailor. O. W. Holmes, ii. 371.
 Mirror, ii. 269.
 Post, i. 900; ii. 153.
 Star, the, i. 768.
 Walk by the Bay. Samuel Longfellow, ii. 289.
 Walk in Virginia. J. K. Paulding, ii. 6
 Eventide. James T. Fields, ii. 680.
 EVERETT, ALEXANDER H., ii. 127.
 Authorship of Pietus et Gratulatio, i. 12.
 Suggests a visit to Spain to W. Irving, i. 739.
 Everett, Charles Carroll, i. 20.
 EVERETT, DAVID, i. 589.
 EVERETT, EDWARD, i. 881.
 Aid to the "Ladies' Mount Vernon Association,"
 i. 886.
 A pupil of William Biglow, i. 658.
 Address on, by R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 550.
 Arranges Webster's writings, i. 720.
 Eulogy of, by Elias Nason, ii. 514.
 Recites the Little Orator, i. 582.
 Remarks on Character of, by George Ticknor,
 i. 974.
 EVERETT, JOHN, ii. 180.
 Everett, Oliver, i. 881.
 Evidence of Christianity from its Propagation. Albert Barnes, ii. 52.
 Evidences of the Christian Religion, by Archibald
 Alexander, i. 640.
 Of Christianity, by Albert Barnes, ii. 50.
 Of Christianity, by C. P. M'Ilvaine, ii. 116.
 Of Christianity, by J. G. Palfrey, i. 955.
 Of Revealed Religion, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 761.
 EWBANK, THOMAS, ii. 393.
 Ewell, Benjamin S., president of William and Mary,
 i. 89, 91.
 EWING, JOHN, i. 406.
 Excelsior. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 277.
 Excursions in Field and Forest, by H. D. Thoreau,
 ii. 604.
 Execution of Major André. Winthrop Sargent, ii. 69.
 Exiles, the, by Mrs. E. Robinson, i. 881.
 Exordium, the, from the Iliad. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 911.
 Experience. Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 191.
 Experience as a Minister, by Theodore Parker, ii.
 441.
 Eyes and Ears, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
 Fabius, letters on public affairs and the Federal Constitution, 1797, by John Dickinson, i. 192.
 Fable, a. Caroline Crane Marsh, ii. 125.
 Fable for Critics, the, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 610.
 Fables and Legends of many Countries, by John G.
 Saxe, ii. 564.
 Failure of the Jesuit Missions. Francis Parkman,
 ii. 703.
 FAIRFIELD, S. L., ii. 198.
 Faith. Frederick Knight, i. 872.
 Fall of Empire. Timothy Dwight, i. 376.
 Fall of the Trees. C. G. Leland, ii. 830.

- Fame. William M. Johnson, i. 608.
 Fame and Authorship. D. Hoffman, i. 760.
 Familiar Letters from Europe, by Prof. C. C. Felton, i. 17; ii. 304.
 Familiar Letters on Public Men of the Revolution, by William Sullivan, i. 664.
 Family History of the Beechers. Charles Beecher, ii. 783.
 Fancy, a Flight of. William Clifton, i. 632.
 Fancy, to. William Clifton, i. 631.
 Faneuil Hall, funeral oration on its founder, by John Lovell, i. 12.
 Fanny, by F. G. Halleck, i. 933.
 "Fanny Fern"—Mrs. Parton, ii. 808.
 Fanny Forester, ii. 558.
 Farewell Address of Washington, i. 190.
 Farewell to New England. Albert Pike, ii. 384.
 FARLEY, HARRIET, ii. 530.
 Farm Ballads, by Will Carleton, ii. 997.
 FARMER, HENRY T., i. 712.
 FARMER, JOHN, ii. 183.
 Farmer, Letters from an American, i. 188.
 Farmer's Letters, by John Dickinson, i. 191.
 French translation of, i. 191.
 Farmers' Museum, i. 583, 661.
 Farmers' Weekly Museum, i. 432.
 Farming, What I Know of, by Horace Greeley, ii. 422.
 Farmington, historical discourse at, by Noah Porter, ii. 858.
 FARNHAM, ELIZA W., ii. 769.
 FARNHAM, LUTHER, ii. 777.
 Farragut and Our Naval Commanders, by J. T. Headley, ii. 521.
 FARRAR, Ephraim, i. 589.
 FARRAR, TIMOTHY, ii. 814.
 Farther. J. J. Pratt, ii. 957.
 Fashion and Famine, by Ann S. Stephens, ii. 395.
 Fashion, in the, and above the Fashion. M. J. McIntosh, ii. 208.
 Fate of Young Marcellus, from Virgil. C. P. Oranch, ii. 488.
 Father Abbey's Will and Courtship. John Seccomb, i. 136.
 Father of an only Child, scene from. William Dunlap, i. 558.
 Father, to my. William Crowwell, ii. 218.
 Faugeres, Margaretta V., i. 880.
 Faust. George Henry Calvert, ii. 197.
 Translated by C. T. Brooks, ii. 497.
 Translated by Bayard Taylor, ii. 716.
 FAX, THEODORE S., ii. 240.
 Article on J. H. Payne, i. 852.
 Federal Constitution. Jeremy Belknap, i. 265.
 Letters of Fabius on, 1778, by J. Dickinson, i. 192
 Federal Orrery, William Biglow a contributor to, i. 657.
 Edited by R. T. Paine, Jr., i. 660.
 Federalist, the, Hamilton's contributions to, i. 439.
 Madison's contributions to, i. 337.
 Edited by H. B. Dawson, ii. 809.
 Feed Us with Bread. R. T. Conrad, ii. 419.
 FELTON, C. C., i. 16, 17; ii. 302.
 Account of Daniel Webster, i. 719.
 Notice of George P. Marsh, ii. 121.
 Female Prose Writers of America, by John S. Hart, ii. 853.
 Female Quixotism, passages from. Tabitha Tenney, i. 521.
 Fenelon, passage from essay on. W. E. Channing, i. 711
 Fenelon in America, by R. Greenhow, ii. 109.
 Fenian Heroes and Martyrs, by John Savage, ii. 824.
 Ferdinand and Isabella, History of the Reign of, by W. H. Prescott, i. 977.
 FERGUSON, ELIZABETH, i. 243.
 Acquaintance with Nathaniel Evans, i. 247.
 Ferguson, Hugh Henry, i. 243.
 Fernald, Woodbury M., Memoirs of Prof. George Bush, i. 965.
 Ferris, Isaac, Chancellor of the University of the City of New York, ii. 751.
 FESSENDEN, THOMAS GREEN, i. 617.
 Remarks on opponents of J. Adams, i. 195.
 Fessenden, William Pitt, ii. 839.
 Field Book of the Revolution, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 392.
 Field Book of the War of 1812, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 398.
 FIELD, RICHARD STOCKTON, ii. 850.
 Field Sports of the United States, by H. W. Herbert, ii. 289.
 FIELDS, JAMES T., ii. 680.
 Fiesco, a tragedy, by William Elliott, i. 797.
 Filmer, Sir Robert, i. 172.
 Finale to Christus. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 287.
 Finley, Rev. Samuel, president of the College of New Jersey, i. 283.
 Finley, Robert, i. 771.
 FINN, HENRY J., i. 716.
 Fire Island Ana, by William P. Hawes, ii. 172.
 Fireside Travels, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 613.
 First Literary Work, the. Bayard Taylor, ii. 716.
 First Snow Fall, the. J. R. Lowell, ii. 612.
 First Year in Europe, by G. H. Calvert, ii. 197.
 Fish, Hamilton, i. 402.
 Fisher, Alexander M., i. 94.
 Fisher, Dr. Samuel Ware, ii. 740.
 FISHER, J. F., early poets of Pennsylvania, i. 111, 126, 138.
 Fisher, Prof. George P., i. 99, 100.
 Fishery Commission of New York, ii. 919.
 Fishes of New England, poetical description of. William Wood, i. 8.
 Fish-hawk, the. Alexander Wilson, i. 575.
 Fiske, Prof. Nathan W., ii. 923.
 Fiske, Willard, ii. 914.
 Fitch, Ebenezer, first president of Williams College, i. 863.
 Fitch, Eleazar T., i. 96.
 FITCH, ELIJAH, i. 268.
 Fitch, John, his steam-engine mentioned in Ezra Stiles's Diary, i. 171.
 MSS. of, deposited in the Philadelphia Library, i. 188.
 Five Acres too Much, by R. B. Roosevelt, ii. 920.
 Five Indian Nations, history of, by C. Colden, i. 86.
 Five Years in an English University, by C. A. Brasted, ii. 669.
 Flag, History of the American, by G. H. Preble, ii. 864.
 FLAGG, EDMUND, ii. 544.
 Fleming's Vocabulary of Philosophy, edited by C. P. Krauth, ii. 880.
 Flesh, the, and the Spirit. Anne Bradstreet, i. 57.
 Fletcher, Phineas, Purple Island, i. 53.
 Flight of Years, the. George D. Prentice, ii. 226.
 FLINT, TIMOTHY, i. 712.
 Florence Vanc. P. P. Cooke, ii. 572.
 Floriculture, works on, by E. S. Rand, Jr., ii. 821.
 Florida, Conquest of, by Theodore Irving, i. 743.
 Florida, East and West, by Bernard Romans, i. 817.
 Florida, evening scene in. William Bartram, i. 288.
 Floridian Peninsula, notes on the, by D. G. Brinton, ii. 918.
 Florio, Poems by, ii. 131.
 Flower de Luce. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 232, 288.
 Flower Gifts, the. Anna B. Warner, ii. 557.
 Folger, Abiah, i. 114.
 FOLGER, PLEGG, i. 198.
 FOLGER, PETER, i. 57.
 Folio, first, of divinity published in America, i. 10.
 FOLLEN, CHARLES, i. 986.
 FOLLEN, MRS. CHARLES, i. 986.

- Folsom, Charles, edits Select Journal of Foreign Periodical Literature, i. 777.
 Librarian of the Boston Athenæum, ii. 55.
- Fontaine, James, i. 80; ii. 258.
- Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World, by R. D. Owen ii. 846.
- Footsteps of Angels. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 277.
- For an Autograph. J. R. Lowell, ii. 614.
- Forbes, P. J., i. 404.
- Force, Peter, ii. 85, 758.
- Forecastle Yarns, by John W. Gould, ii. 308.
- Forefathers' Song, our, i. 73.
- Forest Nook. a. A. B. Street, ii. 439.
- Forest Rose, the, by S. Woodworth, i. 765.
- Forest, the, by J. V. Huntington, i. 582.
- Foresters, the, passages from. Jeremy Belknap, i. 265.
 Passages from. Alexander Wilson i. 571.
- Forgotten Well, the. J. J. Piatt, ii. 957.
- Form of Prayer, use of a. J. S. J. Gardiner, i. 557.
- Forney, John W., ii. 1000.
- Forrest, Edwin, first notice of, ii. 65.
- Forsaken, the. Estelle A. Lewis, ii. 646.
- Foster, J., erects first printing-press in Boston, i. 115.
- Fortune. Samuel Osgood, ii. 476.
- Fortune, to. W. W. Story, ii. 621.
- Fountain, Peter, i. 80.
- Fountain of the Poor, the. Caroline C. Marsh, ii. 125.
- Fourth of July, celebration of, by John Adams, i. 195.
- Fourth of July. G. W. Bethune, ii. 232.
- Fourth of July Ode. J. H. Payne, i. 852.
- Fox, Charles J., personal description of. William Austin, i. 686.
 Seen going to the hustings, by Sam. Curwen, i. 148.
- Fox, George, digg'd out of his Burrows, by Roger Williams, i. 41.
 New England Firebrand Quenched, by Roger Williams, i. 41.
- Foxcroft, Rev. Mr., i. 105.
- France and England in North America, by Francis Parkman, ii. 703.
 And Hereditary Monarchy, by John Bigelow, ii. 812.
 History of, by Parke Godwin, ii. 560.
 Its King, Court, and Government, by Lewis Cass, i. 732.
 Martin's History of, translated by Mary L. Booth, ii. 821.
- Francis Berrian, by T. Flint, i. 713.
- FRANCIS CONVERS, Life of Eliot, i. 46, 728.
- FRANCIS, JOHN W., i. 820.
 Account of Jarvis's bust of T. Paine, i. 210.
 Account of Perkins, i. 618.
 Biographical Essay on, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 493.
 Death scene of Gouverneur Morris, i. 364.
 Dedication to, by H. T. Farmer, i. 712.
 Notice of James M'Clurg, i. 297.
 Notice of Henry Stuber, i. 117.
 Remarks on Daniel Webster, i. 720.
 Reminiscences of Philip Freneau, i. 846.
- Francis, John W., Jr., i. 723.
- FRANCIS, SAMUEL W., ii. 832.
- Frank Forester's Fish and Fishing, by H. W. Herbert, ii. 290.
 Horse and Horsemanship, ii. 291.
- FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN, i. 114.
 Attentions from French ladies, i. 198.
 Catalogue of Philadelphia Library Company, i. 187.
 Communicates Winthrop's Cogitata de Cometis, to the Royal Society, i. 146.
 Horatian ode to. John Parke, i. 320.
 Intercourse with S. Keimer, i. 107-109.
 Journey with. Hector St. John, i. 185.
 Letter from Mather Byles, i. 127.
 Life, by M. L. Weems, i. 503.
 Life, by J. Parton, ii. 803.
 Meeting of, and Voltaire, at the French Academy, account of. John Adams, i. 197.
 Notice of Joseph Brientnall, i. 112.
 Notice of Peter Foiger, i. 58.
 Notices of Cotton Mather, i. 66.
 Poem sent to his nephew Benjamin, i. 114.
 Preface to J. Dickinson's Farmers' Letters, i. 191.
 Preface to his edition of Logan's translation from Cicero, i. 82.
 President of American Society of Useful Knowledge, i. 596.
 Saying of, on Liberty, i. 210.
 Suit of Manchester velvet, i. 289.
 Visit to. Royal Tyler, i. 436.
 Works of, edited by Jared Sparks, i. 878.
- FRANKLIN COLLEGE, GA., i. 770.
- Franklin, James, i. 117.
 Remark of John Witherspoon on, i. 289.
- Franklin, Josias, i. 114.
- Franklin, Mass., town named after Benjamin Franklin, i. 120.
- Franklin, State of, i. 120.
- Franklin, William, biography, by W. A. Whitehead, ii. 855.
- Franklin, William Temple, ii. 811.
- Fraser's Magazine, analysis of the plot of Zophiël, in, i. 924.
- Frazer, Prof. John F., i. 407, 408.
- Fredonia, name proposed by Samuel L. Mitchill for the United States, i. 535.
- Freedman, The, edited by Lyman Abbott, ii. 167.
- Freedmen, future of the, by R. D. Owen, ii. 846.
- Freedmen's Book, The, by Lydia M. Child, ii. 213.
- Freedom. Jas. G. Brooks, ii. 131.
R. T. Conrad, ii. 418.
- Freedom and War, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
- FRELINGHUYSEN, THEO., i. 608.
- Frelinghuysen, Theodore, ii. 751.
- FREMONT, JOHN C., ii. 480.
 Life and Explorations, by C. W. Upham, ii. 449.
 Life and Public Services, by John Bigelow, ii. 811.
- FRENCH, BENJ. F., ii. 115.
- FRENCH, DAVID, i. 126.
- Freneau, Peter, i. 848.
- FRENEAU, PHILIP, i. 841.
 Lines to, on his poems. Robert Waln, i. 850.
 Poem of the Indian Student, quoted, i. 88.
 Poems of the Revolution, edited by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
 Rivington's Last Will and Testament, i. 295.
 Verses on James Rivington, i. 284.
 Writes a commencement poem with H. H. Brackenridge, i. 303.
- Fresh Gleanings, by Ik Marvel, ii. 683.
- Friendly Club, the, i. 591, 609.
- Frieze, Henry S., ii. 757.
- FRISBIE, LEVI, i. 755.
 Memoir of, by Andrews Norton, i. 777.
 Verses on Dartmouth College, i. 550.
- Froissart Ballads, by P. P. Cooke, ii. 571.
- Frontenac, by A. B. Street, ii. 435.
- Frost, the. Hannah F. Gould, ii. 342.
- FROTHINGHAM, NATHANIEL L., ii. 83.
 Notice of Joseph T. Buckingham, ii. 13.
- Frothingham, O. B., ii. 442.
- Frothingham, Richard, i. 622.
- Frothingham, Richard, Jr., ii. 84.
 Tribute to Thomas Starr King, ii. 783.
- Fruits of the Revolt. John Lathrop Motley, ii. 589.
- Fry, William, i. 726.
- Fry, William Henry, tribute to Robert Walsh, i. 727.

- Fuller, S. Margaret, the original of N. Hawthorne's Zenobia, ii. 357.
- Fuller, Thomas, compliment to John Norton, i. 28.
- Funeral Chant for the Old Year. Elise J. Bayard, ii. 664.
- Furness, Horace Howard, "New Variorum edition of Shakespeare," ii. 138.
- FURNESS, WM. H., ii. 137.
- Future Life, Critical History of the Doctrines of a, by W. R. Alger, ii. 796.
- Gaine, Hugh, i. 349.
- Gale, Theophilus, i. 8.
- GALLAGHER, WILLIAM D., ii. 311.
- GALLATIN, ALBERT, i. 509.
- Commented upon, by R. G. Harper, i. 666.
- Gallaudet, Life of, by Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
- GALLOWAY, JOSEPH, i. 182.
- Galt, John, edition of A. Graydon's Memoirs, i. 367.
- Game Birds of North America, by R. B. Roosevelt, ii. 919.
- Game Fish of North America, by R. B. Roosevelt, ii. 919.
- Gammell, William, i. 546.
- Life of Roger Williams, i. 39.
- Gansevoort, Peter, ii. 636.
- GARDEN, ALEXANDER, i. 141.
- Gardens of the Vatican, the. II. B. Stowe, ii. 527.
- Gardenia, named by Linnæus after Alexander Garden, i. 142.
- Gardiner, John, i. 556.
- GARDINER, JOHN S. J., i. 555.
- GARDNER, AUGUSTUS K., i. 799.
- GARDNER, SAMUEL JACKSON, i. 799.
- Garland, Hugh A., Life of John Randolph, i. 655.
- Garnered Sheaves, by J. G. Holland, ii. 798.
- Garnett, James M., i. 792.
- Gaspurin's Uprising of a Great People, translated by Mary L. Booth, ii. 821.
- Gaspie, a history of the destruction of H. B. M.'s Schooner, by J. R. Bartlett, ii. 247.
- Gate of Hell, the, from Dante's Inferno. II. W. Longfellow, ii. 288.
- Gates Ajaz, by Elizabeth S. Phelps, ii. 993.
- Gathered Leaves, by Hannah F. Gould, ii. 341.
- Gathered Rose, the, and the Stolen Heart, a ballad. Emma C. Embury, ii. 329.
- Gathering Blackberries. Phæbe Cary, ii. 660.
- Gaudeamus, translated by C. G. Leland, ii. 823.
- GAYARRÉ, CHARLES E. A., ii. 226.
- Gebel Teir, by William Tudor, ii. 54.
- Gebelin, Count de, i. 599.
- Gems of German Verse, by Wm. H. Furness, ii. 137.
- Genealogical Dictionary of the First Settlers of New England, by James Savage, ii. 46.
- General Assembly of 1866, by H. A. Boardman, ii. 452.
- General Average, by Wm. A. Butler, ii. 729.
- General Conventions of the P. E. Church, Journals of the, by Dr. F. L. Hawks, ii. 49.
- Genius, the Tomb of. J. H. Payne, i. 852.
- Gentius, George, on the Jewish Calamities, i. 120.
- Gentle Hand, the. T. S. Arthur, ii. 517.
- Gentle Humanities. Thos. MacKellar, ii. 465.
- Gentleman, the, by G. H. Calvert, ii. 196.
- Gentleman's Magazine, quoted, i. 116.
- Gentlemanly Character in Politics and Institutions. F. Tieber, ii. 95.
- George Bulcombe, by Beverley Tucker, i. 695.
- Georgia, History of, by Wm. B. Stevens, ii. 861.
- Georgia Lawyer, Leaves from the Portfolio of a, by R. M. Charlton, ii. 265.
- Georgia Scenes, by A. B. Longstreet, ii. 114.
- Georgia Theatrics. A. B. Longstreet, ii. 114.
- Geraldine, by Rufus Dawes, ii. 163.
- German Lyrics, by C. T. Brooks, ii. 496.
- Germany, Home Life in, by C. L. Brace, ii. 822.
- Germany, its universities, etc., by Philip Schaff, ii. 607.
- Germany, Prose Writers of, by F. H. Hedge, ii. 251.
- Gerry, Elbridge, Life of, by James T. Austin, i. 75.
- Gibbons, Rev. Dr. Thomas, collection of hymns, i. 282.
- Gibbs, George W., i. 298.
- Gibbs, Josiah W., i. 96, 100.
- Gibbs, Prof. Wolcott, i. 18.
- Gifford, William, epistle to. Wm. Clifton, i. 116.
- Giles Memorial, the, by J. A. Vinton, ii. 450.
- GILLESPIE, WILLIAM M., i. 920-2.
- Gilliams, Jacob, founder of Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, ii. 477.
- GILMAN, CAROLINE, i. 895.
- Gilman, Samuel, i. 890.
- Gilpin, Henry D., i. 299.
- Giordano, by James Lawson, ii. 65.
- Giotto, discovery, by R. H. Wilde, of the portrait of Dante by, i. 806.
- Giovanni Sbogarro, by Peter Irving, i. 742.
- Girard, Charles, ii. 761.
- Gladiator, the, by R. M. Bird, ii. 200.
- Glance at Comparative Theology, a. James Freeman Clarke, ii. 454.
- Glasgow, Dr. S. Cooper's negro, i. 191.
- GLASS, FRANCIS, i. 708.
- Gleanings in Europe, France, and Italy, by J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
- GLIDDEN, GEORGE R., ii. 479.
- Glossary of Americanisms, by J. R. Bartlett, ii. 247.
- GLOVER, CAROLINE H., i. 897.
- God bless the Mariner. Mary E. Hewitt, ii. 554.
- God in Christ, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 220.
- God is Love. Charles Pettit McTear, ii. 116.
- God of the Universe is Jehovah, the. O. M. Mitchell, ii. 768.
- "God Save the King," and the "Marseillaise," by R. G. White, ii. 871.
- God's Acre. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 277.
- Goddard, W. G., i. 545.
- Godfrey, Thomas, invents the quadrant, i. 205.
- GODFREY, THOMAS, JR., i. 205.
- Godman, John D., i. 914.
- Godwin, Daniel R., president of Trinity College, Conn., ii. 750.
- GODWIN, PARKE, ii. 559.
- Godwin, William, i. 687.
- Compared with C. B. Brown, i. 612.
- Goeller, citation of Knickerbocker in notes on Thucydides, i. 738.
- Goethe, the Angel's Song of, translated. F. H. Hedge, ii. 250.
- Goethe, his Life and Works, by George Henry Calvert, ii. 197.
- Goffe, William, i. 956.
- Gold Mines of the Gila, by C. W. Webber, ii. 630.
- Golden Age, from Ovid. George Sandys, i. 1.
- Golden Fish. George Arnold, ii. 949.
- Golden Fleece, passage from. William Vaughan, i. 2.
- Goldsmith, Oliver, alluded to, i. 114.
- Continuation of his Deserted Village, by Thomas Coombe, i. 140.
- Life of, by Washington Irving, i. 740.
- Visited by Bishop White, i. 314.
- Gone. J. G. Whittier, ii. 315.
- Good-bye, proud World. R. W. Emerson, ii. 184.
- Good English, by Edward S. Gould, ii. 308.
- Good News from New England, i. 4.
- Good Night. S. G. Goodrich, ii. 111.
- Goodrich, Chauncey A., i. 96, 100.
- GOODRICH, FRANK B., ii. 113.
- Goodrich, J. Z., i. 864.
- GOODRICH, S. G., ii. 110.
- Publishes Trumbull's Poems, i. 323.

- Goodwin, Dr. Daniel R., i. 407; ii. 750.
 Goodwin, Thomas, notice of Thomas Hooker, i. 29.
 Goodwin, William Watson, i. 17, 20.
 Editor of Plutarch's Morals, ii. 190.
 GOOKIN, DANIEL, i. 47.
 Gore, Christopher, bequest to Harvard, i. 15.
 GORTON, SAMUEL, i. 43.
 Gospel of John, the. Philip Schaff, ii. 608.
 Gospels, Translation of, by Prof. Andrews Norton, i. 777.
 Goths in New England, by George P. Marsh, ii. 120.
 Gottingen. John L. Motley, ii. 582.
 Gould, Edward S., ii. 307.
 Radicalism in orthography, i. 494.
 GOULD, HANNAH F., ii. 341.
 Epitaph on Caleb Cushing, ii. 81.
 Gould, James, ii. 307.
 GOULD, JOHN W., ii. 308.
 Gout, dialogue between Franklin and the, i. 122.
 Government, disquisition on, by J. C. Calhoun, i. 723.
 Government patronage, passage from speech on influence of. Josiah Quincy, i. 634.
 Grace Greenwood, ii. 653.
 Gradatim. J. G. Holland, ii. 798.
 Graeme, Thomas, i. 243.
 Graffiti D'Italia, by W. W. Story, ii. 619.
 Graham, Edward, i. 623.
 Graham, James, Memoir of, by Josiah Quincy, i. 635.
 Graham, William, i. 640.
 GRAHAM, WILLIAM SLOAN, ii. 769.
 Grahame, James, notice of American progress, i. 179.
 Notice of Governor Winthrop's Definition of Liberty, i. 82.
 Grammar of English Grammars, by Gould Brown, ii. 14.
 Grant and his Campaigns, by Henry Coppée, ii. 810.
 Grant and Sherman, by J. T. Headley, ii. 521.
 Grant, Mrs., Memoirs of an American Lady, i. 370; ii. 4.
 Gratitude to God. Hermon Hooker, ii. 255.
 Graves of the Patriots, the. J. G. Percival, i. 942.
 Gray, Asa, i. 20; ii. 755.
 Gray Champion, the. N. Hawthorne, ii. 358.
 Gray, Francis G., remarks on Early Laws of Massachusetts Bay, i. 24.
 Bequests to Harvard College, i. 19.
 Gray, Thomas, elegy quoted by Webster on his death-bed, i. 719.
 Memoir of, by Henry Reed, ii. 336.
 GRAYDON, ALEXANDER, i. 367.
 Anecdotes of J. Beveridge, i. 138.
 Of D. J. Dove, i. 138.
 Notice of Ethan Allen, i. 217.
 Of James Rivington, i. 295.
 Story of J. Witherspoon, i. 289.
 GRAYSON, WILLIAM J., i. 809.
 Greble, Memoir of John T., by B. J. Lossing, ii. 393.
 Greece. Estelle A. Lewis, ii. 645.
 Greece, Ancient and Modern, by Dr. C. C. Felton, ii. 804.
 Greece, Modern, by H. M. Baird, ii. 754.
 Greek Girl, the, by J. W. Simmons, ii. 456.
 Greek Revolution, speech on. Henry Clay, i. 682.
 Greek type, first used in the United States, i. 758.
 GREELEY, HORACE, ii. 421.
 Tribute to H. J. Raymond, ii. 836.
 Green Apples. J. T. Trowbridge, ii. 904.
 GREEN, ASHBEL, i. 284.
 Funeral address on Rittenhouse, i. 598.
 Notice of Charles Thomson, i. 180.
 James Rivington, i. 295.
 Witherspoon, i. 288.
 Notices the success of Paine's Common Sense, i. 208.
 Green, John C., i. 286.
 GREEN, JOSEPH, i. 130.
 Green Mountain Boys, by D. P. Thompson, i. 945.
 Green, Seth, ii. 919.
 GREENE, ALBERT G., ii. 145.
 GREENE, ASA, ii. 309.
 Greene, Charles G., ii. 32.
 GREENE, GEORGE W., ii. 539.
 Reply to strictures by George Bancroft on Gen. Nathaniel Greene, ii. 106.
 GREENE, NATHANIEL, ii. 22.
 Greene, Nathaniel, eulogium on. Alexander Hamilton, i. 443.
 Life and writings of, by G. W. Greene, ii. 540.
 Life of, by C. Caldwell, i. 627.
 Greene, Prof. Samuel S., i. 548.
 Greene's First Campaign at the South. G. W. Greene, ii. 543.
 Greenfield Hill, by Timothy Dwight, i. 372.
 Passages from. Timothy Dwight, i. 376.
 GREENHOW, ROBERT, ii. 109.
 GREENLEAF, SIMON, i. 693.
 GREENOUGH, HORATIO, ii. 245.
 Greenough, H., Memorial of, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Greenough, Mrs. R. S., ii. 245.
 GREENWOOD, F. W. P., ii. 71.
 Greypoint Legend, a. Bret Harte, ii. 978.
 Gridley, Jeremiah, i. 12, 165.
 GRIFFIN, EDMUND D., ii. 213.
 Griffin, Edmund Dorr, president of Williams College, i. 863.
 Griffin, George, ii. 213.
 Griffiths, Dr., i. 686.
 GRIMKE, THOMAS SMITH, i. 779.
 Grimm and Diderot's correspondence, quoted, i. 120.
 Gringos, los, by H. A. Wise, ii. 634.
 Grinnell Expedition, by E. K. Kane, ii. 674.
 GRISCOM, JOHN, i. 622.
 GRISCOM, JOHN HOSKINS, i. 623.
 GRISWOLD, R. W., ii. 533.
 Account of John Sanderson, i. 735.
 Poets and Poetry of America, edited by R. H. Stoddard, ii. 724.
 Group, the, by Mercy Warren, i. 173.
 Group, the, passage from. William Clifton, i. 629.
 Guardian Angel, the, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 375.
 Guerrilla Parties, the Law and Usages of War concerning, by Francis Lieber, ii. 98.
 Guiana, Natural History of, by Edward Bancroft, i. 238.
 Guild, R. A., librarian of Brown University, i. 516-7.
 Guillotine Song, attributed to Joel Barlow, i. 510.
 Gurney, Ephraim Whitney, i. 20.
 Guthrie's Geography, i. 877.
 Guyot, A. H., Earth and Man, i. 286; ii. 303.
 Hackley, Prof. Charles W., i. 402.
 Hadad and Tamar, interview of. J. A. Hillhouse, i. 818.
 Hadad, by J. A. Hillhouse, i. 817.
 HADDOCK, PROF. CHARLES BRICKETT, i. 558.
 Hadley, Prof. James, i. 100.
 Hagner, Wm. B., i. 772.
 HAGUE, WILLIAM, ii. 470.
 Hail Columbia, song, history of, i. 606.
 HALE, EDWARD EVERETT, ii. 872.
 Hale, Nathan, ii. 872.
 HALE, SARAH J., i. 826.
 HALL, BARNARD RUST, ii. 23.
 HALL, JAMES, i. 852.
 Hall, John E., i. 855.
 Hall, Joseph, occasional meditations, i. 65.
 HALL, LOUISA J., ii. 205.
 Hall, Rev. James, sketch of. C. Caldwell, i. 627.
 Hall, Rev. John, i. 643.

- Hall, Robert, tribute to Jonathan Edwards, i. 105.
 Hall, Sarah, i. 855.
 Hall, T. M., i. 855.
HALLECK, FITZ GREENE, i. 932.
 First acquaintance with J. R. Drake, ii. 929.
 Lines on William C. Bryant, i. 901.
 Lines to James A. Hillhouse, i. 817.
 Lines to the Memory of J. R. Drake, ii. 927.
 Memorial of, by F. S. Cozzens, ii. 698.
 Notices of Life and Writings, by Wm. C. Bryant, i. 910.
 Poetical allusion to J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
 Poetical character of Cotton Mather, i. 68.
Halley, the astronomer, reads a paper by C. Colden before the Royal Society, i. 85.
Hallig, the, by Caroline C. Marsh, ii. 124.
HALPINE, CHARLES G., ii. 920.
HAMILTON, ALEXANDER, i. 437.
 At Columbia College, i. 395.
 Character of. R. Hildreth, ii. 300.
 Connection with Washington's farewell address, i. 190.
 Duel with Aaron Burr. R. Hildreth, ii. 300.
 Funeral oration on. Gouverneur Morris, i. 864.
 Funeral Sermon on, by Eliphalet Nott, i. 917.
 History of the Republic, as traced in the Writings of, by John C. Hamilton, i. 440.
 Oration on, by J. M. Mason, i. 604.
 Reception of the news of his death, by Fisher Ames, i. 486.
 Remark on Jonathan Edwards, i. 104.
 Sketch of. William Sullivan, i. 664.
 Sketch of the character of. Fisher Ames, i. 488.
 Volume of his papers edited by F. L. Hawks, ii. 47.
Hamilton, Dr. Frank Hastings, eulogy on Dr. T. R. Beck, ii. 14.
Hamilton, John C., life of A. Hamilton, i. 440.
HAMILTON COLLEGE, ii. 788.
Hamilton Oneida Academy, ii. 738.
Hamlin, Dr. Cyrus, ii. 167.
HAMMETT, SAMUEL A., ii. 589.
HAMMOND, JAMES H., ii. 263.
HAMMOND, M. C. M., ii. 265.
Hancock, Governor, message on stage plays. The Echo, i. 516.
Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, History of the, by Luther Farnham, ii. 777.
Hans Breitmann's Ballads, by C. G. Leland, ii. 828.
Hans Breitmann's Party. Charles G. Leland, ii. 829.
Happy Release. Frances S. Osgood, ii. 457.
HARBAUGH, HENRY, ii. 190.
Harbinger, the, ii. 368.
HARBY, ISAAC, i. 796.
Hard Cider Melody, a. Edward Sanford, ii. 235.
Hardenbergh, J. R., i. 602.
Hardy, Sir Charles, i. 393.
Harkness, Prof. Albert, i. 548.
Harlakenden, Roger, i. 47.
HARPER, ROBERT GOODLOE, i. 665.
 Correspondence with Robert Walsh, i. 726.
Harrington, Mrs. E. D., ii. 456.
HARRIOTT, THOMAS, i. 7.
Harris, Charles W., professor at University of North Carolina, i. 837.
Harris, Ira, i. 922.
Harris, Rev. Samuel, professor at Yale, i. 99.
HARRIS, THADDEUS MASON, i. 582.
 Authorship of Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 12.
Harris, William, i. 496.
Harris, William Thaddeus, i. 582; ii. 882.
Harrison, Gessner, ii. 747.
 Account of the University of Virginia, ii. 742.
Harrison, Joseph, architect of the Redwood Library, i. 298.
Harry Bluff, scraps from the Lucky Bag of, by M. F. Maury, ii. 253.
Harry Franco, by C. F. Briggs, ii. 485.
HARSHA, DAVID A., ii. 793.
HART, CHARLES HENRY, ii. 968.
HART, JOHN S., ii. 853.
HARTE, F. BRET, ii. 975.
Harvard Alumni, Necrology of, by Joseph Palmer, i. 764.
HARVARD COLLEGE, i. 8.
 Harvard, John, bequest of, i. 8.
Harvard Memorial Biographies, by T. W. Higginson, ii. 882.
Harvey, Peter, Daniel Webster's gift to, i. 719.
HARWOOD, JOHN EDMUND, i. 575.
Hasbrouck, A. B., i. 603.
Haskell, Daniel, president of University of Vermont, i. 832.
Haskins, Elizabeth, edits Remains of J. B. Ladd, i. 533.
Hassard, John R. G., Life of Archbishop Hughes, ii. 45.
Hasty Pudding, method of preparing. Count Rumford, i. 387.
Hasty Pudding, the. Joel Barlow, i. 417.
Hatfield, Julia, "Bryant Homestead Book," i. 902.
Haunted Palace, the. Edgar A. Poe, ii. 405.
Havelock, Life of Gen., by J. R. Leadley, ii. 521.
HAVEN, ALICE B., ii. 649.
Haven, Dr. E. O., ii. 756-7.
HAVEN, NATHANIEL A., i. 971.
Haven, S. F., account of the Mather library, i. 817.
 Account of the origin of the Massachusetts Company, i. 317.
 Communication on Phillis Wheatley, i. 382.
 Paper on American Antiquities, published by the Smithsonian Institution, ii. 760.
Hawaiian or Sandwich Islands, History of the, by J. J. Jarves, ii. 780.
HAWES, WILLIAM POST, ii. 172.
HAWKS, FRANCIS L., ii. 46.
 Memorial of, by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL, ii. 855.
 Notice of T. G. Fessenden, i. 618.
 Original of Maypole of Merry Mount, i. 33.
 Tales in the Token, ii. 110.
James T. Fields, ii. 110.
Hayden, Rev. Wm. B., Notice of Prof. George Bush, i. 965.
HAYNE, PAUL H., ii. 786.
 Edited Poems of Henry Timrod, i. 846.
Hayne, Robert Y., i. 718.
 Passage from Webster's reply to, i. 721.
Hays, Jacob, biography of. William Cox, ii. 243.
Hazlitt, William. W. A. Jones, ii. 579.
 Notices of St. John's American Farmer, i. 184.
 Tribute to Jonathan Edwards, i. 104.
He standeth at the door and knocketh. A. C. Coxe, ii. 605.
HEADLEY, J. T., ii. 519.
Health, a. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 150.
Health and Temperance. Horace Mann, i. 962.
Healthy Christian, the, by Howard Crosby, ii. 754.
Heart of New England, the. E. C. Stedman, ii. 944.
Heathen Chinese, the, by Bret Harte, ii. 975, 977.
Heaven and Heavenly Recognition, by Henry Harbaugh, ii. 779.
Heber, Reginald, notice of Franklin's Parable, i. 120.
Hebrew Grammar, by George Bush, i. 964.
 By M. Stuart, i. 708.
 Lexicon, by C. C. Moore, i. 690.
 Melody, Jer. x. 17. Mary E. Brooks, ii. 131.
Hector's Parting with Andromache. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 911.

- HEDGE, FREDERIO H., ii. 250.
 Notice of Margaret Fuller, ii. 388.
 Hedge, Levi, ii. 250.
 Hedged in, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, ii. 993.
 Heine's Book of Songs, translated by C. G. Leland, ii. 828.
 Heirship. Julia C. R. Dorr, ii. 910.
 Heloise, by Mrs. E. Robinson, i. 881.
 Helps to Education, by Warren Burton, ii. 446.
 Helvetius, Madame, i. 117.
 Account of, by John Adams, i. 197.
 Hemans, Felicia, poems edited by Andrews Norton, i. 777.
 HEMBEL, WILLIAM, ii. 478.
 Hemenway, Abby Maria, i. 834.
 HENRY, C. S., ii. 752.
 Edits the New York Review, ii. 47.
 Henry, Joseph, i. 284; ii. 760.
 Henry, Patrick, eulogy of Archibald Alexander on, i. 640.
 Life of, by William Wirt, i. 645.
 Reply to, by John Randolph, i. 654.
William Wirt, i. 650.
 HENRY, ROBERT, Pres. of S. Carolina College, ii. 142.
 Henry St. John, by J. E. Cooke, ii. 575.
 HENTZ, CAROLINE LEE, ii. 329.
 Hentz, N. M., ii. 329.
 HEPWORTH, GEORGE HUGHES, ii. 815.
 Herbert, George, couplet on jesting, i. 28.
 Prophecy of America quoted by Duché, i. 231.
 Prophecy of Religion in America, i. 179.
 HERBERT, HENRY W., ii. 289.
 Hercules, choice of. John Adams, i. 196.
 Herhan, stereotyping in Paris, i. 86.
 Her Letter. Bret Harte, ii. 976.
 Her Metaphors. Sarah M. B. Piatt, ii. 958.
 Hermit in America, by Robert Wain, ii. 37.
 Heroic Character. B. P. Whipple, ii. 627.
 Heroines of History, by Mary E. Hewitt, ii. 554.
 Heroism. Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 191.
 Herrick, Edward C., i. 97, 100.
 Passages from Stiles' Diary, i. 170.
 Herschel, Sir John, tribute to E. P. Mason, i. 96.
 Hesperia, by R. H. Wilde, i. 806.
 Hesperus, translated by C. T. Brooks, ii. 497.
 HEWITT, MARY E., ii. 554.
 Hewson, Mrs., Franklin's landlady, i. 115, 120.
 Hiawatha, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 281.
 Hibernicus, Letters of, by De Witt Clinton, i. 592.
 HICKOK, LAURENS P., Vice-president of Union, i. 918, 921.
 Hidden Treasure, by N. B. Warner, ii. 901.
 Hieronimus Jobs, translated by C. T. Brooks, ii. 497.
 Hierophant, the, by George Bush, i. 965.
 Higginson, Francis, ii. 881.
 Higginson, John, notice of, i. 29; ii. 881.
 Higginson, Stephen, ii. 881.
 HIGGINSON, THOMAS WENTWORTH, ii. 881.
 Higher Tenants. J. J. Piatt, ii. 956.
 Highest Mountain, the. Sarah M. B. Piatt, ii. 959.
 Highest Spirit, the, by C. T. Brooks, ii. 498.
 HILDRETH, RICHARD, ii. 298.
 HILL, GEORGE, ii. 113.
 HILL, ISAAC, ii. 132.
 HILL, THOMAS, i. 17.
 HILLARD, GEORGE S., ii. 838.
 HILLHOUSE, JAMES A., i. 816.
 Hills of the Shatemuc, by Susan Warner, ii. 556.
 Hireling, the, and the Slave, a poem, by William J. Grayson, i. 800.
 HIRST, HENRY B., ii. 502.
 His Answer to "Her Letter." Bret Harte, ii. 976.
 Historic Americans, by Theodore Parker, ii. 442.
 Historic Progress and American Democracy, by J. L. Motley, ii. 584.
 Historical Collections of Louisiana and Florida, by B. F. French, ii. 116.
 Historical Romances, by W. G. Simms, ii. 258.
 Historical Society (N. Y.) Address, 1852, passage from. Daniel Webster, i. 722.
 Historical Studies, by G. W. Greene, ii. 540.
 Historical View of the American Revolution, by G. W. Greene, ii. 540.
 History of France, by Parke Godwin, ii. 560.
 History of Liberty, by Samuel Eliot, ii. 679.
 History of New England, by John G. Palfrey, i. 955.
 History of the Christian Church, by Philip Schaff, ii. 607.
 History of the United Netherlands, by John Lathrop Motley, ii. 584.
 History of the United States, by Richard Hildreth, ii. 300.
 History of the War for the Union, by Evert A. Duy-ckinck, ii. 838.
 History of the World, by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
 HITCHCOCK, DAVID, i. 656.
 HITCHCOCK, EDWARD, i. 866.
 President of Amherst College, i. 863.
 Hoar, Leonard, Presidency of Harvard, i. 8.
 HOBART, JOHN HENRY, i. 673.
 Last Letter written by, ii. 214.
 Hoboken, by Theo. S. Fay, ii. 240.
 Hoboken. R. C. Sands, ii. 58.
 Hobomok, by Lydia M. Child, ii. 210.
 HODGE, DR. CHARLES, ii. 521.
 Tribute to Dr. W. B. Sprague, i. 707.
 Notice of Rev. Convers Francis, i. 728.
 Hodge, Dr. Hugh L., ii. 860.
 HOFFMAN, C. F., ii. 319.
 HOFFMAN, DAVID, i. 758.
 Hoffman, John L., i. 922.
 Hoffman, Ogden, ii. 319.
 Hofwyl, College of, ii. 845.
 HOLBROOK, JOHN E., i. 922; ii. 513.
 HOLBROOK, SILAS PINCKNEY, i. 869.
 Holcroft, Thomas, i. 687.
 Holidays Abroad, by Caroline M. Kirkland, ii. 461.
 Holidays at Barcelona. J. M. Mackie, ii. 484.
 Holidays, the, by N. B. Warren, ii. 901.
 HOLLAND, EDWIN C., i. 845.
 HOLLAND, ELIHU G., ii. 578.
 HOLLAND, FREDERIC WEST, ii. 248.
 HOLLAND, JOSIAH GILBERT, ii. 796.
 Holland, Harriet, in memoriam, by H. A. Boardman, ii. 452.
 HOLLEY, HORACE, ii. 130.
 Hollis family, gifts to Harvard, i. 10.
 Hollis professorships, at Harvard, foundation of, i. 10
 Hollis, Thomas, i. 10.
 HOLMES, ABIEL, i. 529.
 HOLMES, O. W., ii. 367.
 Notices of A. Holmes, i. 530.
 Tribute to Charles C. Emerson, ii. 183.
 Holmes, Samuel, i. 101.
 Holmes, Silas, i. 285.
 Holofernes, quoted, i. 68.
 Holy Land, Physical Geography of, by Dr. Edward Robinson, i. 880.
 Holyoke, Edward, contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio,
 i. 12.
 Presidency at Harvard, i. 11.
 Holyoke, Edward A., the centenarian, account of,
 i. 11.
 Home Ballads and Poems, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 315.
 Home, influence of. R. H. Dana, i. 794.
 Home, John, performance of his Douglas suggests
 Witherspoon's work on the Stage, i. 288.
 Home Journal, the, ii. 167, 270.
 Homer's Iliad, translated by Munford, passage from, i. 669.

- Homeward Bound. R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 548.
 Homeward Bound, and Home as Found, by J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
 Homiletics and Pastoral Theology, by W. G. T. Shedd, ii. 793.
 Honduras, by E. G. Squier, ii. 673.
 Explorations and Adventures in, by W. V. Wells, ii. 813.
 Honeyman, James, i. 176.
 Honeysuckle, the Wild. Philip Freneau, i. 355.
 HONEYWOOD, ST. JOHN, i. 530.
 Hood, George, History of Music in New England, i. 23, 69.
 HOOKER, HERMAN, ii. 255.
 Hooker, Prof. Charles, i. 100.
 HOOKER, THOMAS, i. 29.
 Elegy on. Peter Bulkeley, i. 50.
John Cotton, i. 26.
 Verses on. Edward Johnson, i. 44.
 Hooper, Lucy, ii. 643.
 HOOPER, LUCY HAMILTON, ii. 949.
 Hooper, Samuel, i. 20.
 Hoosier Schoolmaster, the, by Edward Eggleston, ii. 971.
 Hope Leslie, by C. M. Sedgwick, ii. 81.
 HOPKINS, JOHN H., ii. 215.
 Controversy with F. P. Kenrick, ii. 116.
 HOPKINS, LEMUEL, i. 333.
 Hopkins, Mark, president of Williams College, i. 863, 864.
 Hopkins, Prof. Albert, i. 865.
 HOPKINS, SAMUEL, i. 160.
 HOPKINSON, FRANCIS, i. 219.
 Letter to Galloway, i. 183.
 Advertisement extraordinary, by James Livingston, quoted, i. 293.
 HOPKINSON, JOSEPH, i. 605.
 Hopkinson, Thomas, i. 219, 596.
 Hoppin, Prof. James M., i. 100.
 Horace in New York, by Isaac S. Clason, ii. 43.
 Horace. Lyric Works of, translated by John Parke, i. 319.
 Horace, ode (III. 30) of, translated in the style of Sternhold and Hopkins. J. L. Arnold, i. 549.
 Horace, to Mæcenas, translated by John Adams, i. 144.
 Horrocks, James, president of William and Mary, i. 89.
 Horry, Elna, founds professorship in college of Charleston, ii. 138.
 Horse Shoe Robinson, by J. P. Kennedy, i. 949.
 Hortensius, essays by Livingston, i. 162.
 HOSACK, DAVID, i. 595.
 Gifts to the College of New Jersey, i. 285.
 Inauguration as Pres. N. Y. Hist. Soc., Proce's verbal of, i. 761.
 Medical Instructor of J. W. Francis, i. 821.
 Hosmer, Titus, i. 408.
 HOSMER, W. H. C., ii. 518.
 Hospital Sketches, by Louisa M. Alcott, ii. 987, 940.
 Hospitality. Caroline M. Kirkland, ii. 462.
 Hottinguer, Baron, gift to the Redwood Library, i. 298.
 HOUGH, FRANKLIN B., ii. 834.
 Hours of Life, by Sarah H. Whitman, ii. 831.
 Hours, the, by L. L. Noble, ii. 508.
 House of the Seven Gables, by N. Hawthorne, ii. 856.
 Household of Bouverie, by Mrs. Warfield, ii. 651.
 How a Freec People conduct a Long War, by C. J. Stille, i. 407.
 How I Caught a Cat. S. A. Hammett, ii. 590.
 How it Happened. John G. Saxe, ii. 565.
 How, Samuel B., president of Dickinson College, i. 753.
 How Santa Claus came to Simpson's Bar. Bret Harte, ii. 982.
 How to Educate Yourself, by G. C. Eggleston, ii. 971.
 How Ulysses Bent his Bow. W. C. Bryant, i. 912.
 Howadjí, the, ii. 695.
 HOWE, JULIA WARD, ii. 646.
 HOWE, NATHANAEL, i. 622.
 Howell, Richard, complimented in a paraphrase of Horace. John Parke, i. 321.
 HOWELLS, WILLIAM D., ii. 960.
 Notice of G. W. Curtis, ii. 699.
 HOYT, RALPH, ii. 397.
 Hubbard, Stephen G., i. 100.
 HUBBARD, WILLIAM, i. 61.
 Hubert and Ellen, by L. M. Sargent, ii. 68.
 Huddesford, George, poems of, i. 272.
 Hudibras, a Continuation of, on the American Revolution, i. 464.
 Compared with M'Fingal, i. 325.
 HUDSON, CHARLES, ii. 842.
 HUDSON, FREDERIC, ii. 867.
 HUDSON, HENRY N., ii. 510.
 Hudson, Stephen, ii. 842.
 Hudson, the, from the Wilderness to the Sea, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 393.
 Huggins, the Barber, i. 518.
 And Hugh Gaine, i. 349.
 Hughes, John, ii. 44.
 Letters to, by Kirwan, ii. 162.
 Human Intellect, the, by Noah Porter, ii. 858.
 Human Society, by F. D. Huntington, ii. 794.
 Human Species, Essay on Variety of Complexion and Figure in, by Samuel Stanhope Smith, i. 284.
 Humble Bee, the. R. W. Emerson, ii. 184.
 Hume, David, remark on humor, i. 740.
 Humming Bird, the. Lector St. John, i. 185.
 HUMOROUS POEMS:
 Byles, Mather, Voyage. Joseph Green, i. 131.
 Clock, the Old. James Nack, ii. 482.
 Evening, by a Tailor. O. W. Holmes, ii. 871.
 Father Abbey's Courtship and Will. John Seccomb, i. 136.
 Full and true account of how the lamentable wicked French and Indian pirates were taken by the valiant Englishmen. M. Byles, i. 128.
 Hard Cider Melody, a. Edward Sanford, ii. 235.
 Independence Day. Royal Tyler, i. 434.
 Last Leaf, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 370.
 My Aunt. O. W. Holmes, ii. 871.
 Old Grimes. Albert G. Greene, ii. 147.
 Poet's (Byles), the, lamentation for the loss of his Cat. Joseph Green, i. 132.
 Punch Bowl, on lending a. O. W. Holmes, ii. 371.
 Rhyme of the Rail. J. G. Saxe, ii. 563.
 Sonnet to a Clam. J. G. Saxe, ii. 564.
 Humorous Poetry of the English Language, edited by J. Parton, ii. 803.
 Humphrey, Heman, president of Amherst College, i. 863.
 HUMPHREYS, DAVID, i. 387.
 HUMPHREYS, EDWARD RUPERT, ii. 809.
 Humphreys, Hector, i. 772.
 Hungary in 1851, by C. L. Brace, ii. 822.
 HUNT, HELEN FISKE, ii. 923.
 Hunt, James, teacher of William Wirt, i. 644.
 Hunt of the Bears, the. W. M. Baker, ii. 891.
 Hunter, Colonel, i. 83.
 HUNTINGTON, FREDERIC DAN, ii. 793.
 HUNTINGTON, J. V., i. 18; ii. 532.
 Hurricane, the. Philip Freneau, i. 356.
 Hutchinson, Rev. John, edition of his grandfather's history, i. 141.
 HUTCHINSON, THOMAS, i. 140.
 Letters of, sent from London, i. 199.
 Hyde, Ann Maria, i. 838.
 Hymn for Advent. Wm. Croswell, ii. 219.

- Hymn of the Reapers. Hannah F. Gould, ii. 343.
 On the Ascension, from the Spanish of Luis de Leon. George Ticknor, i. 972.
 Thanksgiving. Sarah J. Hale, i. 827.
 To Ceres. Albert Pike, ii. 389.
 To Peace. Joel Barlow, i. 415.
 Tunes and Graveyards. Wm. P. Hawes, ii. 173.
 Hymns of the Ages, by F. D. Huntington, ii. 794.
 Hymns of the Spirit, by Samuel Longfellow, ii. 289.
 Hymns for All Christians, by Phœbe Cary and Dr. Deems, ii. 659.
 Hymns to the Gods, by Albert Pike, ii. 388.
 Hymns. Wm. H. Furness, i. 137.
 Hyperion, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 275.
 Hypocrites' Hope, the. Lemuel Hopkins, i. 336.
- "I walk in Dreams of Poetry." Caroline Warfield and Eleanor Lee, ii. 650.
 "I would not live away." Wm. A. Muhlenberg, ii. 39.
 Ianthæ, poems by, ii. 828.
 Icebergs of Cape St. John. Louis L. Noble, ii. 509.
 Iceland, rambles in, by Pliny Miles, ii. 641.
 Ichabod Crane beyond the Alleghanies. J. L. M'Connell, ii. 733.
 Ide, Jacob, edits works of Nathaniel Emmons, i. 256.
 Idea of National Union. Richard Frothingham, Jr., ii. 35.
 Idle Man, the, by R. H. Dana, i. 786.
 Idle Words. Julia C. R. Dorr, ii. 910.
 Idleness. G. H. Boker, ii. 713.
 Idomen, or the Vale of Yumuri, by Maria Brooks, i. 925.
 If. J. J. Piatt, ii. 958.
 If, Yes, and Perhaps, by E. E. Hale, ii. 873.
 Ik Marvel, ii. 688.
 Iliad, translated by William C. Bryant, i. 908-9.
 Ill News from New England, by John Clarke, i. 43.
 Illinois, the. Francis Parkman, ii. 702.
 Illinois Gazette, the, i. 853.
 Intelligencer, i. 863.
 Monthly Magazine, i. 854.
 Illustrated Natural History, by S. G. Goodrich, ii. 111.
 Immortality. R. H. Dana, i. 787.
 "I'm with you once again." G. P. Morris, ii. 158.
 Impressions of England, by A. C. Coxé, ii. 605.
 In an Attic. Elizabeth A. Allen, ii. 933.
 In Despair. Alice Cary, ii. 663.
 In School-Days. John G. Whittier, ii. 317.
 In the Dark. George Arnold, ii. 949.
 "In the Springtime." R. K. Weeks, ii. 988.
 In War Time, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 315.
 Inchiquin's Letters, by C. J. Ingersoll, i. 730.
 Quarterly Review of, ii. 2.
 Answered by Timothy Dwight, i. 375.
 Incident in a Railroad Car. J. R. Lowell, ii. 611.
 Incidents of Travel, by John L. Stephens, ii. 248.
 Incomprehensibility of God. Eliza Townsend, i. 825.
 Indecision, by J. K. Mitchell, ii. 204.
 Independence Day. Royal Tyler, i. 434.
 Independence, Declaration of, its authorship, i. 250.
 Independent Reflector, the, by Wm. Livingston, i. 162.
 Index to Periodical Literature, by Wm. F. Poole, ii. 55.
 Indian Biography, by B. B. Thatcher, ii. 341.
 Burying-ground, lines occasioned by a visit to. Philip Freneau, i. 353.
 Camp, the. W. E. Channing, ii. 469.
 Death song of a Cherokee, by Mrs. Hunter, i. 355.
 Education, i. 161.
 Education at William and Mary described by Hugh Jones, by William Byrd, i. 88.
 Journal of David Brainerd, i. 152.
 Languages, by John Pickering, i. 653.
 Languages, structure of, by Peter S. Du Ponceau, i. 609.
 Indian Missions of John Eliot, i. 45.
 Names. L. H. Sigourney, i. 840.
 Pass, by A. B. Street, ii. 487.
 Student, the. Philip Freneau, i. 354.
 The Dying. Philip Freneau, i. 354.
 Travels and Researches of Henry R. Schoolcraft, i. 859, 862.
 Tribes, Synopsis of, by Albert Gallatin, i. 511.
 Indian's Bride, the. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 149.
 Indians, education of, at Harvard, i. 47.
 Of New England described. Wm. Wood, i. 4.
 Of North America, history and biography of, by James Hall and T. L. McKenney, i. 854.
 Provisions for education at Harvard and William and Mary, i. 87.
 Indirect influences. Thomas Starr King, ii. 771.
 Indulgence. Park Benjamin, ii. 345.
 Infantile Education. J. G. Holland, ii. 799.
 Infant's Library, by Dr. J. W. Alexander, i. 643.
 Infidelity, Triumph of, poem, passage from. Timothy Dwight, i. 374.
 Infinite, study of the. George Bancroft, ii. 104.
 INGERSOLL, CHARLES J., i. 729.
 Remarks on J. C. Calhoun, i. 723.
 Ingersoll, Edward, i. 731.
 Ingersoll, Jared, i. 92, 729.
 Ingersoll, Joseph R., i. 731.
 Ingle side, the. Hew Ainslie, i. 873.
 INMAN, JOHN, ii. 244.
 Innocents abroad, the, by S. L. Clemens, ii. 952.
 Inside, a Chronicle of Secession, by W. M. Baker, ii. 891.
 Instinct in Animals and Men, lectures on, by Prof. P. A. Chadbourne, i. 865.
 Intellectual Development of Europe, History of the, by John C. Draper, ii. 751.
 Intellectual Power. James H. Hammond, ii. 264.
 Interference Theory of Government, by C. A. Bristed, ii. 669.
 International Copyright. James Parton, ii. 805.
 International Copyright, advocated by Wm. C. Bryant and G. C. Verplanck, i. 910.
 International Exchange, scientific and literary, ii. 763.
 International law, elements of, by Henry Wheaton, i. 729.
 International Magazine, ii. 533.
 International Scientific Series, edited by E. L. Youmans, ii. 868.
 Interrupted banquet. an. C. F. Briggs, ii. 485.
 Invention in Art in Ostade and Raphael. Washington Allston, ii. 22.
 Iron Grays, the. F. G. Halleck, i. 932.
 Iron Trade of the United States, History of the Rise and Progress of, by Benjamin F. French, ii. 115.
 Iroquois, notes on the, by H. R. Schoolcraft, i. 860.
 Iroquois, the, discourse on, by De Witt Clinton, i. 592.
 IRVING, EBENEZER, i. 742.
 IRVING, JOHN T., i. 742.
 Memoir of R. B. Davis, ii. 2.
 Irving, John T., Jr., i. 743.
 IRVING, PETER, i. 742.
 His share in Knickerbocker's New York, i. 737.
 Irving, Pierre M., i. 750.
 Irving, Theodore, i. 743.
 IRVING, WASHINGTON, i. 737.
 Life, Character, and Genius, by W. C. Bryant, i. 907.
 Life of M. M. Davidson, ii. 326.
 Reminiscences of, by George Sumner, ii. 412.
 Reminiscences of Washington Allston, ii. 18.
 IRVING, WILLIAM, JR., i. 741.
 His acquaintance with J. K. Paulding, ii. 1.
 Writes the Poetry in Salmagundi, i. 737, 741.
 Irving, William, father of Washington Irving, i. 737.

- Irvingiana, edited by Charles B. Richardson, i. 750.
 Isabella, Queen. William H. Prescott, i. 979.
 Isles of Shoals, Among the, by Celia Thaxter, ii. 998.
 Israel Potter, by Herman Melville, ii. 638.
 It snows. Hannah F. Gould, ii. 342.
 Italian Journals, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 363.
 Italian Journeys, by Wm. D. Howells, ii. 960.
 Italian Sketch Book, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 489.
 Italy. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 149.
 Italy, Notes of Study and Travel in, by C. E. Norton, ii. 906.
 Italy, To. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 288.
 Ives, Eli, i. 99.
- Jack Downing, by Seba Smith, ii. 459.
 Jackson, Andrew, letter to H. M. Brackenridge, i. 700
 Life of, by James Parton, ii. 803.
 Sonnet to. James Lawson, ii. 66.
 Jackson, Dr. Abner, ii. 750.
 JACKSON, HENRY R., ii. 669.
 JACKSON, ISAAC W., i. 920.
 Jacobinism, Remarks on the, a Satire, by J. S. J. Gardiner, i. 556.
 JACOBS, SARAH S., ii. 651.
 JAKOB, LUDWIG VON, i. 881.
 JAKOB, THERESE A. L. VON, i. 881.
 Jam Jehan Nima, by J. H. Payne, i. 851.
 Jamaica in 1850, by John Bigelow, ii. 811.
 JAMES, HENRY, ii. 514.
 Jamestown Church. L. H. Sigourney, i. 840.
 JANVRIK, MARY W., ii. 813.
 Japan, As it Was and as it Is, by Richard Hildreth, ii. 801.
 Jarilla, from the Spanish of Carolina Coronado, by W. C. Bryant, i. 909.
 JARVES, JAMES JACKSON, ii. 780.
 Jarvis, Charles, i. 586.
 JARVIS, SAMUEL FARMAR, i. 780.
 Jarvis, S. F., professor of Trinity College, Conn., ii. 750.
 Jasper, the death of. R. M. Charlton, ii. 266.
 JAY, JOHN, i. 273.
 JAY, JOHN, JR., i. 803.
 Jay, John, and the Jay Treaty. R. G. Harper, i. 666.
 Letter to Noah Webster on his orthography, i. 494
 Life of William Jay, i. 803.
 Revision of Washington's farewell address, i. 190
 Jay, Sir James, i. 893.
 JAY, WILLIAM, i. 803.
 JEFFERSON, THOMAS, i. 249.
 At Monticello. William Wirt, i. 650.
 Connection with Philip Freneau, i. 343.
 Epitaph of, ii. 742.
 Inaugural parodied. The Echo, i. 517.
 Letter to Peter Freneau, i. 348.
 Memoir of Meriwether Lewis, i. 775.
 Notice of Ledyard, i. 389.
 Notice of the death of Benjamin Rush, i. 275.
 Notice of, by George Bancroft, ii. 106.
 Observations on the writings of, by Henry Lee, i. 696.
 Passage on. The Echo, i. 334.
 President of the American Philosophical Society, i. 598.
 Satirized by Nathanael Emmons, i. 257.
 Supports Godfrey's invention of the quadrant, i. 205.
 Jeffrey, Francois, in New York, i. 696.
 Jerdan, W., reprints a portion of the Sketch Book in the Literary Gazette, i. 788.
 Jeremy Levis, by Laughton Osborn, ii. 305.
 Jeroboam, sermon by Nathanael Emmons, i. 257.
 Jersey Chronicle, the, by Philip Freneau, i. 344.
 Jersey Prison Ship, Recollections of Capt. Dring, edited by C. J. Bushnell, ii. 834.
- Jesuits in North America, by Francis Parkman, ii. 703.
 Jesus, His Life and Work, by Howard Crosby, ii. 754.
 His Personal Appearance. H. W. Beecher, ii. 785.
 Of Nazareth. Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 842.
 Of Nazareth, by Lyman Abbott, ii. 168.
 The Christ, Life of, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
 Jewett, Charles C., ii. 760.
 Jewett, Pliny A., i. 100.
 Jews, Post-Biblical History of the, by M. J. Raphall, ii. 444.
 Jingle, Bob, Association of the Colonies, passages from, i. 456.
 John Brent, by Theodore Winthrop, ii. 825.
 John Bull and Brother Jonathan, by Paulding, ii. 2.
 John Bull in America, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 3.
 John Burns of Gettysburg. Eret Horie, ii. 977.
 John Doe and Richard Roe, by Edward S. Gould, ii. 308.
 John in California. Chas. Nordhoff, ii. 921.
 John O'Groat's, Walk from London to, by Elihu Burritt, ii. 432.
 John Tabor's side. J. Ross Browne, ii. 597.
 John Waters, ii. 90.
 Johns, John, president of William and Mary, i. 89.
 JOHNSON, EDWARD, i. 44.
 JOHNSON, ELEANOR A., i. 852.
 Johnson, Joseph, account of Peter Freneau, i. 348.
 JOHNSON, SAMUEL, president of Columbia College, i. 398.
 At New Haven, i. 92.
 His acquaintance with G. Berkeley, i. 176.
 Johnson, Samuel, notice of Sir Thomas Browne's prophecy of America, i. 179.
 Remarks on, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 142.
 Visit to, by Bishop White, i. 314.
 Johnson, Samuel R., commemorative discourse on S. H. Turner, i. 831.
 Johnson, W., life of Greene, i. 696.
 JOHNSON, WILLIAM MARTIN, i. 607.
 JOHNSON, WILLIAM SAMUEL, i. 396.
 Johnson, William Woolsey, i. 772.
 Jomini on the Art of War, translation of, by M. C. M. Hammond, ii. 265.
 Jones, Agnes E., Memorials of, ii. 788.
 Jones, Hugh, account of Indian school at William and Mary, i. 88.
 Jones, Paul, names his ship after Poor Richard, i. 118.
 JONES, WILLIAM A., ii. 578.
 Joslin, Benj. F., ii. 753.
 JOSSELYN, JOHN, i. 74.
 Journal of American Oriental Society, i. 101.
 Journal of foreign periodical literature, i. 777.
 Journalism. Parke Godwin, ii. 560.
 Journalism in the United States, History of, by Frederic Hudson, ii. 867.
 Journalist, the. Cornelius Mathews, ii. 592.
 Joy, Charles A., i. 401.
 Judas Maccabæus, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 284.
 Judd, Bethel, i. 772.
 JUDD, SYLVESTER, ii. 499.
 Judges, Lives of Atrocious, by Richard Hildreth, ii. 811.
 Judges of King Charles I., Lives of Three of the, by Ezra Stiles, i. 170.
 Judgment, the, by James A. Hillhouse, i. 817.
 Judson, A., i. 653.
 JUDSON, EMILY C., ii. 557.
 Julian, by Wm. Ware, i. 891.
 June. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 908.
 Junior Partner, the. G. W. Curtis, ii. 700.
 Junkin, Dr. George, ii. 911.
 Juvenile Poems, by Caroline Lee Hentz, ii. 380.
- Kalm, Peter, intimacy with C. Colden, i. 86.
 Kaloolah, by Wm. S. Mayo, ii. 466.

- Kames, Lord, publishes Franklin's Parable on Persecution, i. 120.
- KANE, ELSHA K., ii. 678.
- Kathrina, by J. G. Holland, ii. 798.
- Kean's acting. R. H. Dana, i. 793.
- Keating, John, ii. 489.
- Keble, John, first American edition of his Christian Year, ii. 217.
- Keep Cool, by John Neal, i. 873.
- KEIMER, SAMUEL, i. 109.
Franklin's notices of, i. 117.
Attempt at a new religion. M. L. Weems' Life of Franklin, i. 507.
- Keith, Governor of Pennsylvania, i. 115.
- Kemp, John, i. 398.
- Kendall, Prof. E. Otis, i. 407.
- KENNEDY, JOHN P., i. 949.
Memoirs of Wm. Wirt, i. 646.
Acquaintance with Edgar A. Poe, ii. 403.
Life of, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 494.
Tribute to the Memory of, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 350.
- KENRICK, FRANCIS P., ii. 116.
- KENT, JAMES, i. 525.
Notice of Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
Notice of Stiles's History of the Judges, i. 170.
Tribute to President Stiles, i. 169.
- Kent, Moss, the friend of Lucretia M. Davidson, ii. 324.
- Kent, William, i. 527.
- Kenyon College, i. 677.
- Kerr, David, i. 801.
- KETTEL, SAMUEL, ii. 76.
Specimens of American Poetry, quoted, i. 129.
Notice of Lemuel Hopkins, i. 335.
- KEY, FRANCIS SCOTT, i. 692.
- Key into the Language of America, by Roger Williams, i. 37.
- Keys of Kingdom of Heaven, by John Cotton, i. 26.
- KIDDER, FREDERIC, ii. 461.
- KIDNEY, JOHN S., ii. 606.
- Killmandjaro. Bayard Taylor, ii. 715.
- Killed at the Ford. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 285.
- KIMBALL, RICHARD B., ii. 641.
- Kindar Burial Service, versified. L. M. Davidson, ii. 326.
- King Philip's War, history of, passages from. Benjamin Church, i. 148.
- KING, CHARLES, i. 397, 402, 403.
- King, Charles B., i. 298.
- King, Edward, i. 298.
- King, Mitchell, ii. 24.
- KING, THOMAS STAER, ii. 770.
Tribute to, by Richard Frothingham, Jr., ii. 34.
- King's Bell, the. R. H. Stoddard, ii. 723-4.
- King's Chapel, Boston, history of, by F. W. P. Greenwood, ii. 71.
- Kings, on. Esra Stiles, i. 171.
- King's Ride, the. Lucy H. Hooper, ii. 950.
- Kingsley, James L., i. 94.
- Kinnersley, Ebenezer, i. 405.
- KINNEY, ELIZABETH C., ii. 653.
- KIP, WM. INGRAHAM, ii. 429.
- KIRK, JOHN FOSTER, ii. 886.
- KIRKLAND, CAROLINE M., ii. 460.
- Kirkland, John T., president of Harvard, i. 14, 16, 877.
- Kirkland, Samuel, the founder of Hamilton College, ii. 738.
- KIRKLAND, WILLIAM, ii. 460.
- Kirwan, Letters to Bishop Hughes, ii. 162.
- Kitchen fireside, a, in the Old Dominion. William A. Carruthers, ii. 266.
- Klaus Harms, Autobiography of, by C. T. Brooks, ii. 497.
- KNAPP, FRANCIS, i. 77.
Epistle to Mr. B., i. 77.
Poetical address to Mr. Pope on his Windsor Forest, i. 77.
- KNAPP, SAMUEL L., i. 754.
Account of John Lathrop, i. 639.
Anecdote of Joseph Bartlett, i. 523.
Lectures on American Literature, i. 179.
- Knickerbocker, "Apologety," i. 738.
Popularity of the name, i. 738.
- Knickerbocker Magazine, ii. 320, 400.
- Knickerbocker's History of New York, i. 737.
- Knight, F., reprint of Washington's letters to Sinclair, i. 190.
- KNIGHT, FREDERICK, i. 871.
- Knight, Jonathan, i. 99.
- KNIGHT, HENRY COGSWELL, i. 870.
- Knights of the Horse Shoe, by William A. Carruthers, ii. 266.
- Knowles, James D., Memoir of Roger Williams, i. 41.
- Kohl, Dr. J. G., ii. 840.
- Kollock, Dr. Henry, i. 284.
- Konigsmark, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 3.
- Krauth, Charles Philip, ii. 879.
- KRAUTH, CHARLES PORTERFIELD, ii. 879.
- Krout Club, address of Dr. Mitchell before the, i. 536.
- KUNZE, JOHN C., i. 117, 398.
- Kype, Henry, ii. 430.
- Kype, Ruloff de, ii. 429.
- Labaree, Benjamin, president of Middlebury College, i. 882.
- Labor. Frances S. Osgood, ii. 458.
- Labor. Horace Greeley, ii. 424.
- Laborer, the. William D. Gallagher, ii. 311.
- LADD, JOSEPH BROWN, i. 532.
- Lady Beatrice, translated from Dante. C. E. Norton, ii. 907.
- Lady Byron Vindicated, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
- La Fayette. J. T. Headley, ii. 520.
Address to. Henry Clay, i. 683.
Character of. Charles Sumner, ii. 417.
Intercourse with J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
The Faithful One, by Charles Sumner, ii. 414.
- Lafoy, J. B., M.D. The Complete Coiffeur, i. 765.
- Laiicus, by Lyman Abbott, ii. 168.
- Lake Steamer Afire, the. R. D. Owen, ii. 847.
- Lamb, Charles, notice of John Woolman, i. 156.
- Lamentation of S. Keimer, i. 110.
- Land of Dreams, the. William C. Bryant, i. 905.
- Landmarks, by J. J. Piatt, ii. 956.
- Landor, W. S., epistle to. T. W. Parsons, ii. 579.
Selections from, by George S. Millard, ii. 330.
- Landscape Gardening, by A. J. Downing, ii. 544.
- Lang, John, epigram on, by McDonald Clarke, ii. 41.
- Langdon, Samuel, presidency of Harvard, i. 14.
- Lange's Commentary, edited by Dr. Schaff, i. 922; ii. 608.
- Langhorn, W., Travels, i. 339.
- Langtree, S. D., i. 337.
- Language and the Study of Language, by W. D. Whitney, ii. 908.
- LANMAN, CHARLES, i. 870.
- Laocöon. J. G. Holland, ii. 798.
- La Place, Mechanique Celeste, translated by Nath. Bowditch, i. 653.
- Lapraik, John, i. 272.
- LARNED, PROF. WILLIAM A., i. 100.
- Larvæ. A. D. T. Whitney, ii. 889.
- La Salle's Descent of the Mississippi. Francis Parkman, ii. 704.
- Last Address to his Students. Horace Mann, i. 903.
- Last Days of Washington. Washington Irving, i. 750.
- Last Evening of the World. J. A. Hullhouse, i. 818.
- Last Half-century, the. Parke Godwin, ii. 561.

- Last Leaf, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 370.
 Last Night of Pompeii, by S. L. Fairfield, ii. 199.
 Last of the Foresters, by J. E. Cooke, ii. 575.
 Last of the Huggermuggers, by C. P. Cranch, ii. 486.
 Last of the Molicans, by J. F. Cooper, i. 808.
 Last Request, the. B. B. Thatcher, ii. 341.
 Later Lyrics, by Julia Ward Howe, ii. 647.
 LATHROP, JOHN, i. 637.
 Lathrop, John, Jr., i. 637.
 Lathrop, Joseph, i. 637.
 Lathrop, Mrs. Daniel, i. 838.
 LATIN POEMS. Ad Gulielmum Lauderum. Nathaniel Evans, i. 247.
 Epilogue to Pietas et Gratulatio, by Francis Bernard, i. 13.
 In Laudes Pennsylvaniae, Poema. Thomas Makin, i. 73.
 Morell's Nova Anglia, i. 3.
 Latter Rain, the. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Lauder, William, verses to. Nathaniel Evans, i. 247.
 Laughing, Eulogy on, poem. J. M. Sewall, i. 301.
 Laus Deo. John G. Whittier, ii. 316.
 Law, lectures introductory to, by George Sharswood, ii. 856.
 Law of Compensation in the Atmosphere. M. F. Maury, ii. 254.
 Law of Human Progress, by Charles Sumner, ii. 412.
 Law of Love, and Love as a Law, by Dr. Hopkins, i. 864.
 Law of Nations, History of the, by Henry Wheaton, i. 729.
 Lawrence, Abbott, bequest to Harvard College, i. 20.
 Lawrence, Capt. James, resolutions of Josiah Quincy in reference to, i. 634.
 Lawrence, Jonathan, Jr., ii. 302.
 Lawrence, Professor, i. 664.
 Laws of Massachusetts Bay, i. 24.
 Lawson, Alexander, i. 567.
 LAWSON, JAMES, ii. 65.
 Personal anecdotes of J. R. Drake, i. 929.
 Lawson, John, New Voyage to Carolina, 1708, i. 141.
 Lawyer and Client, by W. A. Butler, ii. 729.
 Lay, Benjamin, biographical anecdotes of. Benjamin Rush, i. 279.
 Lay of the Scottish Fiddle, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 2.
 Lay Preacher, by Joseph Dennie, i. 583.
 Layard, A. H., presents Nineveh slabs to Williams College, i. 864.
 Layman's Breviary, the, by C. T. Brooks, ii. 497.
 LEA, HENRY CHARLES, ii. 897.
 Lea, Isaac, i. 601; ii. 897.
 Leaf from Child Life, a. F. S. Cozzens, ii. 693.
 Learned Blacksmith, the, ii. 430.
 Leather Stocking and Silk, by John E. Cooke, ii. 572.
 Leather Stocking Tales, passage from preface to. J. F. Cooper, i. 808.
 Leaves from Margaret Smith's Journal, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 812.
 Leaves from the Diary of a Dreamer, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Lecture-Room Talks, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 783.
 Lectures, by R. W. Emerson, ii. 183.
 On English Literature, by Henry Reed, ii. 335.
 On the English Poets, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 368.
 To Young Men, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
 LEDERER, John, i. 76.
 LEDYARD, JOHN, i. 338.
 Life of, by Jared Sparks, i. 878.
 Lee, Charles, interview with H. H. Brackenridge, i. 304.
 Lee, C. C., i. 696.
 LEE, ELEANOR, ii. 650.
 LEE, HANNAH F., ii. 88.
 LEE, HENRY, i. 426, 695.
 Lee, H., tribute to M. L. Weems, i. 503.
 Lee, Mrs. E. B., notice of Timothy Dwight, i. 373.
 Lee, Richard Henry, i. 696.
 Lee, Robert E., Life of, by J. E. Cooke, ii. 575.
 Leeds, Daniel, i. 111.
 Legal Hermeneutics, by F. Lieber, ii. 94.
 Legal Hints, by D. Hoffman, i. 759.
 Legal Outlines, by D. Hoffman, i. 759.
 Legal Study, Course of, by D. Hoffmann, i. 758.
 LEGARÉ, J. M., ii. 784.
 LEGARÉ, HUGH SWINTON, ii. 24.
 Legend, a, of the Mohawk. G. P. Morris, ii. 159.
 Legend of Brittany, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 609.
 Legendary, the, ii. 269.
 Legends and Lyrics, by P. H. Hayne, ii. 737.
 LEGGETT, WILLIAM, ii. 152.
 Edits the Evening Post, i. 901.
 Notice of E. C. Pinkney, ii. 147.
 Leicester, Historical Sketches of the Town of, by Emory Washburn, ii. 444.
 Leidy, Dr. Joseph, i. 601.
 Leigh, Watkins, epitaph on James M'Clurg, i. 296.
 Leisure Hours at Sea, by William Leggett, ii. 152.
 LELAND, CHARLES GODFREY, ii. 828.
 LELAND, HENRY PERRY, ii. 880.
 Lenore. Edgar A. Poe, ii. 405.
 Lenox, James, edition of Washington's Farewell Address, i. 190.
 Edition of Van der Donck's New Netherland, i. 85.
 Lent and Holy Week in Rome. W. W. Story, ii. 622.
 Leonard, Daniel, Massachusettsensis, by, i. 104.
 Lesley, Prof. J. Peter, i. 602.
 Leslie, Charles R., i. 782.
 Notice of Allston, ii. 19.
 LESLIE, ELIZA, i. 782.
 Leslie, T. J., i. 782.
 Letter to my Countrymen, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
 To the purchaser of Glenmary. N. P. Willis, ii. 272.
 Letters from Abroad, by C. M. Sedgwick, ii. 82.
 From the East, by William C. Bryant, i. 909.
 From New York, by L. M. Child, ii. 211.
 From Palmyra, by William Ware, i. 891.
 From Spain, by William C. Bryant, i. 907.
 From the South, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 3.
 From Under a Bridge. N. P. Willis, ii. 269.
 Invention of, poem, by R. T. Paine, Jr., i. 600.
 Of a Traveller, by William C. Bryant, i. 901.
 Of Life, by Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 843.
 On the Eastern States, by William Tudor, ii. 54.
 Donald G. Mitchell, ii. 683.
 Lettson, Dr., life of Fothergill, i. 120.
 Leverett, John, presidency of Harvard, i. 10.
 LEWIS, ESTELLE ANNA, ii. 645.
 Lewis and Clarke, American exploration, i. 775.
 LEWIS, TAYLOR, i. 919, 922; ii. 752.
 LEWIS, WINSLOW, ii. 849.
 Lewis, Zachariah, i. 858.
 Lexington, by P. M. Wetmore, ii. 64.
 Libel Suits of J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
 Liberal Education, an address by Dr. Thos. Hill, i. 17.
 Liberty, a poem. Jacob Campbell, i. 501.
 Liberty, a sonnet. George Hill, ii. 114.
 Liberty and Law. Gov. Winthrop, 1645, i. 82.
 Liberty and Necessity, Franklin's Dissertation on, i. 117.
 Liberty and Peace. Phillis Wheatley, i. 383.
 Liberty Pole at New York, i. 453.
 LIBRARIES — Astor, ii. 763.
 Charleston, i. 403.
 Harvard College, i. 15, 16.
 Library Company of Philadelphia, i. 187.
 Library of Congress, ii. 86, 762.
 New York Society Library, i. 408.
 Redwood, i. 297.
 Yale, i. 97.

- LIEBER, FRANCIS, i. 401; ii. 92.
 Lieber, Oscar M., ii. 95.
 Life and Errors of John Dunton, i. 61.
 Life at Threescore and Ten. Albert Barnes, ii. 51.
 Life in a Cotton Mill. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, ii. 995.
 Life in Venice. Wm. D. Howells, ii. 962.
 Life on the Ocean Wave, a. Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 Life's Evening. L. H. Sigourney, i. 841.
 LIGHT, GEORGE WASHINGTON, ii. 858.
 Light. Phæbe Cary, ii. 659.
 Lincoln, Abraham, Address on the death of, by Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 190.
 Bibliographia Lincolniana, by C. H. Hart, ii. 968.
 Eulogy, by George Bancroft, ii. 105.
 Eulogy. Elias Nason, ii. 514.
 Life, Administration, and State Papers of, by
 H. J. Raymond, ii. 836.
 Life and Speeches of, by Wm. D. Howells, ii. 960.
 Life, by J. G. Holland, ii. 797.
 Memorial, edited by J. G. Shea, ii. 838.
 Oration on, by R. S. Field, ii. 851.
 Lincoln, C. R., ii. 47.
 Lincoln, J. L., i. 546.
 L'Inconnue. O. W. Holmes, ii. 370.
 Lines on finding a Fountain in a secluded part of a Forest. John H. Bryant, i. 914.
 On hearing Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream. C. T. Brooks, ii. 496.
 On leaving Italy. E. D. Griffin, ii. 214.
 On visiting Tallulah Falls, Georgia. S. G. Bul-finch, ii. 345.
Samuel H. Dickson, ii. 40.
 To ——. E. F. Ellet, ii. 581.
 To Harry. W. H. Tinsrod, i. 845.
 Written at Laurel Hill Cemetery. *Willis G.
 Clark*, ii. 401.
 Lingard's History of England, edited by E. E. Hale,
 ii. 872.
 Lingering Winter, the. R. T. Conrad, ii. 420.
 Lining, John, History of Yellow Fever, i. 141.
 LINN, JOHN BLAIR, i. 680.
 LINN, WILLIAM, i. 340.
 On Paine's Age of Reason, i. 211.
 Linnæus, a correspondent of James Logan, i. 83.
 Names Gardenia after Dr. Alexander Garden, i. 142.
 Linnard, Anna Jane, Memoir of, by Robert Baird,
 i. 948.
 Lion, a, in the Path. William S. Mayo, ii. 466.
 Lionel Lincoln, by J. F. Cooper, i. 808.
 Lippincott, Sarah J., ii. 653.
 LISZT, HARRIET WINSLOW, ii. 665.
 Literary and Historical Miscellanies, by George
 Bancroft, ii. 100.
 And Philosophical Society, Discourse before, by De Witt Clinton, i. 592.
 Cabinet, i. 97.
 Coronal, ii. 65.
 Gazette and American Athenæum, ii. 65.
 Influences in America. Brantz Mayer, ii. 380.
 Life, a. Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 843.
 Life of James K. Paulding, by W. J. Paulding,
 ii. 10.
 Magazine, the, i. 611.
 Miscellany, the, i. 777.
 Property, law of, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 762.
 Recreations and Miscellanies, by J. G. Whittier,
 ii. 315.
 Remains, by J. G. C. Brainard, i. 967.
 Taste. De Witt Clinton, i. 594.
 World, ii. 380, 592, 837-8.
 Literati, the, by Edgar A. Poe, ii. 404.
 Literature, Advice in the Pursuits of, by S. L. Knapp,
 i. 755.
 Circumstances favorable to progress of, in America, by Edward Everett, i. 833.
 Of the Age of Elizabeth, by E. P. Whipple, ii. 627.
 Sketches of the History of, by Wilkins Tannehill, ii. 629.
 The Consolations of. Rufus Choate, ii. 74.
 Universal, Handbook of, by Anne C. Botta, ii. 559
 Littell, E., i. 726.
 Littell, J. S., edits Graydon's Memoirs, i. 367.
 Little and Lowly. M. D. Conway, ii. 931.
 Beach Bird. R. H. Dana, i. 786.
 Children. Samuel Osgood, ii. 475.
 Florence Gray. N. P. Willis, ii. 272.
 Foxes, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
 Frock, the. Catharine Luders, ii. 644.
 People of the Snow. William C. Bryant, i. 910.
 Trappan. Cornelius Mathews, ii. 593.
 Women, by Louisa M. Alcott, ii. 937.
 Live Oak, the. Henry R. Jackson, ii. 669.
 LIVERMORE, GEORGE, ii. 772.
 Memoir of, by Charles Deane, ii. 546.
 Tribute to, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 850.
 Lives of the Signers, by John Sanderson, i. 735.
 Living Writers of the South, by J. W. Davidson, ii.
 710.
 LIVINGSTON, EDWARD, i. 687; ii. 82.
 Pamphlet on his Code, by C. E. Gayarré, ii. 227.
 Livingston, John H., i. 602.
 Livingston, Philip, i. 97.
 Livingston, R. R., i. 599; ii. 436.
 LIVINGSTON, WILLIAM, i. 161.
 Epithets applied to, by James Rivington, i. 201.
 Remarks on J. Rivington, i. 291.
 Eulogy on the Rev. A. Burr, i. 281.
 LLOYD, ELIZABETH, ii. 665.
 Locke, A. A., ii. 456.
 Locke Amsden, by D. P. Thompson, i. 945.
 LOCKE, DAVID ROSS, ii. 943.
 LOCKE, JANE ERMINA, ii. 652.
 Locke, John, i. 102.
 LOCKE, JOHN GOODWIN, ii. 653.
 Locke, Samuel, presidency of Harvard, i. 14.
 Lockhart, J. G., review of N. P. Willis, ii. 269.
 Log College, the, i. 280.
 Logan, by Brantz Mayer, ii. 380.
 Named after James Logan, i. 82.
 Logan, by John Neal, i. 874.
 LOGAN, JAMES, i. 187.
 Consulted in the formation of the Philadelphia
 Library, i. 187.
 Logan, William, bequest to the Logonian Library, i. 83.
 Logonian Library, at Philadelphia, i. 83.
 London Coffee Room at Dinner Time. *A. Slidell
 Mackenzie*, ii. 181.
 London, Letters from, by William Austin, i. 686.
 Long, George, i. 821.
 Long, George, professor of the University of Virginia, ii. 747.
 Long, Prof. Clement, i. 553.
 Long, R. Cary, ii. 380.
 Long Sentence, by Rufus Choate, ii. 73.
 Longevity of New England Clergymen, i. 64, 258.
 Of Scottish clergy, ii. 636.
 LONGFELLOW, HENRY W., ii. 275.
 Dedication to, a. G. W. Greene, ii. 541.
 Poets and Poetry of Europe, contributions of
 C. C. Felton to, ii. 303.
 Professor at Bowdoin, i. 917.
 Professor at Harvard, i. 18.
 Remark on one of F. Lieber's Poems, ii. 95.
 The Two Angels, ii. 610.
 LONGFELLOW, SAMUEL, ii. 289.
 LONGSTREET, A. B., ii. 114.
 Longworth, David, ii. 2.
 Looking Glass for the Times. Peter Folger, i. 58.
 Looking towards Sunset, by Lydia Maria Child, ii. 213
 Loomis, Elias, i. 100; ii. 753.

- Loomis, Hubbel, i. 877.
 Lord, Daniel, i. 97.
 LORD, DR. NATHAN, i. 553.
 Lorgnette, the, ii. 683.
 Loring, commissary of prisoners at New York, account of. Ethan Allen, i. 217.
 Loring, James S., Anecdote of Rufus Choate, ii. 73.
 Boston Orators, quoted, i. 525.
 Remark on Autograph of Rufus Choate, ii. 73.
 Charles Sprague, i. 835.
 Sketch of Horace Mann, i. 962.
 LOSSING, B. J., ii. 392.
 Field Book of the Revolution, quoted, i. 218, 502.
 Lothrop, Isaac, i. 176.
 Lothrop, John H., ii. 740.
 Loudon, Archibald, i. 637.
 Louis, Philippe, Glance at the Court and Government of, by Richard Rush, i. 299.
 Louis XVI., execution of, remark on, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 141.
 Louisbourg, conquest of, by John Maylem, i. 449.
 Louisiana, History of, by C. E. Gayarré, ii. 227.
 Historical Collections of, by B. F. French, ii. 115.
 Penal code of, i. 688.
 Louisville Journal, ii. 225.
 Lounger, the, i. 853.
 Love. W. W. Story, ii. 621.
 Love and Death. Geo. W. Doane, ii. 79.
 Love and Thought. R. W. Emerson, ii. 190.
 Love, from Essays. R. W. Emerson, ii. 186.
 Love in a Cottage. N. P. Willis, ii. 272.
 LOVELL, JOHN, i. 12.
 Lover's Diary, the, by Alice Cary, ii. 659.
 Love's Ideal. Wm. Winter, ii. 966.
 Love's Largess. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 924.
 Loves, the, of the Shell Fishes. Edward Sanford, ii. 234.
 Lovewell, Expeditions of Capt. John, by F. Kidder, ii. 451.
 LOW, SAMUEL, i. 554.
 LOWELL, JAMES RUSSEL, ii. 609.
 Lowell, John, a contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 13.
 LOWELL, MARIA, ii. 610.
 Lowell Offering, the, ii. 530.
 LOWELL, R. T. S., ii. 773.
 Lower Mississippi, the. J. M. Mackie, ii. 485.
 Loyalist Poetry of the Revolution, by Winthrop Sargent, ii. 68.
 Lubin, Friar, paper by, on the Sparks and Reed controversy in New York Evening Post, i. 190.
 Luck of Roaring Camp, by Bret Harte; ii. 795.
 Lucretius, quoted, i. 120.
 Luders, Catharine, ii. 644.
 LUDWIG, HERMANN ERNST, ii. 330.
 Ludwick, Christopher, baker general of the Revolutionary army, i. 276.
 LUNT, GEORGE, ii. 268.
 Luther. C. P. Krauth, ii. 880.
 Luxury and the Fine Arts, by R. C. Winthrop, i. 349.
 "Lyman Beecher Professorship" at Yale, i. 101; ii. 783.
 Lyman, Theodore, i. 882.
 LYNCH, ANNE C., ii. 559.
 Lyon, Richard, i. 22.
 Lyons's Infallibility of Human Judgment, i. 118.
 M'Bride, James, i. 626.
 M'Cauley, Dr. James A., i. 754.
 McClellan, Life and Campaigns of George B., by George S. Hillard, ii. 339.
 M'CLURG, JAMES, i. 295.
 MCCONNELL, JOHN L., ii. 733.
 M'Cord, David J., ii. 26.
 Memoranda of the Table Talk of Thomas Cooper, ii. 141.
 M'CORD, LOUISA S., ii. 28.
 McCosh, Dr. James, i. 286.
 MCCRACKEN, J. L. H., ii. 508.
 McDowell, John, i. 771.
 M'Fingal, analysis of, i. 324.
 Canto III., The Liberty Pole. John Trumbull, i. 328.
 Mention of Samuel Peters in, i. 201.
 Trumbull's editions of, i. 323.
 M'ILVAINE, CHARLES P., ii. 116.
 McIntosh, John More, ii. 206.
 McIntosh, Lachlan, ii. 206.
 MCINTOSH, MARIA J., ii. 206.
 McIntosh, William, ii. 206.
 McKean, Kate, Manual of Social Science, i. 869.
 McKeen, Joseph, first president of Bowdoin, i. 916.
 M'KENNEY, T. L., i. 854.
 MCSPARRAN, JAMES, i. 153.
 Educates President Clap, i. 93.
 Visits the Narragansett Indians with G. Berkeley, i. 177.
 M'VICKAR, JOHN, i. 399.
 Life of Bard, quoted, i. 124.
 Memoir of E. D. Griffin, ii. 214.
 Macaulay, Catharine, corresponds with Mercy Warren, i. 174.
 Macaulay, Zachary, his opinion of J. A. Hillhouse, i. 817.
 MACKELLAR, THOMAS, ii. 464.
 MACKENZIE, A. SLIDELL, ii. 177.
 Cooper's review of his Somers proceedings, i. 181.
 His life of Paul Jones quoted, i. 118.
 Mackenzie, Adelheid Shelton, ii. 816.
 MACKENZIE, ROBERT SHELTON, ii. 815.
 Mackenzie, William, Bequest to the Loganian Library, i. 83, 189.
 MACKIE, JOHN M., ii. 488.
 Life of Samuel Gorton, i. 43.
 Mackintosh, James, i. 118.
 Eulogy of Edmund Burke, ii. 142.
 Tribute to Jonathan Edwards, i. 105.
 Maclean, Professor John, i. 285.
 Maclean, John, president of College of New Jersey, i. 284.
 MACLEOD, K. DONALD, ii. 671.
 MACLURE, WILLIAM, ii. 478.
 Macon, Nathaniel, character of. Thomas H. Benton, i. 733.
 Macready, William C., recommends reprint of Miss M. J. McIntosh's Tales, ii. 208.
 Macy, Rev. William A., i. 98.
 Mac Poet, the, M'Donald Clarke, ii. 41.
 MADISON, JAMES, i. 336.
 College companion of Philip Freneau, i. 341.
 Connection with Washington's Farewell Address, i. 190.
 Opinion on the Erie Canal, i. 594.
 Passage from the eulogy on J. Q. Adams, i. 581.
 Madison, James (Ep.), president of William and Mary, i. 90.
 Maga Papers about Paris, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 493.
 Magazine, Receipt to make a poem. William Biglow, i. 658.
 Magnalia Christi Americana, i. 68.
 Passage from. Cotton Mather, i. 70.
 Magnolia Magazine, ii. 259.
 Mahmoud, the Image-Breaker. J. R. Lowell, ii. 614.
 Mahon, Lord, remarks on Jared Sparks in his History of England, i. 190.
 Maimonides, the Sepher Ickarim of, ii. 444.
 Main Truck, the. William Leggett, ii. 153.
 Maine, History of the Law, Courts, and Lawyers of, by Wm. Willis, ii. 840.
 History of the Discovery of, by J. G. Kohl, ii. 840.

- MAKIN, THOMAS, i. 73.
 Malibran, Madame, sings in choir of Grace Church, New York, i. 844.
 Malbone, by T. W. Higginson, ii. 882.
 Man and Nature, by George P. Marsh, ii. 121.
 Man and Nature. R. K. Weeks, ii. 988.
 Man giveth up the Ghost, and where is he? W. B. O. Peabody, ii. 68.
 Man in the Claret-colored Coat, ii. 307.
 Man in the Reservoir. C. F. Hoffman, ii. 321.
 Man of Ninety, the. Philip Freneau, i. 357.
 Man Over-board. John W. Gould, ii. 308.
 Man Without a Country, the. E. E. Hale, ii. 878.
 Manchester Velvet, Franklin's suit of, i. 239.
 E. Bancroft's account of the incident, i. 116.
 Mandeville, Dr., ii. 740.
 Mandeville Club in Cheapside, i. 117.
 Manhood. Sarah Palfrey, i. 961.
 Manilius, line of, applied to Franklin, i. 120.
 MANN, HORACE, i. 962.
 Eulogy of Silas P. Holbrook, i. 870.
 Letters to, by Dr. Dorus Clarke, ii. 840.
 Mann, Mrs. Mary, i. 963.
 Manning, James, i. 541.
 Life, Times, and Correspondence of, by James A. Guild, i. 546.
 Marble Faun, the, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 363.
 Marble Prophecy, the, by J. G. Holland, ii. 798.
 Marbois, M., suggests Jefferson's Notes, i. 251.
 MARCH, DANIEL, ii. 50.
 Tribute to Albert Barnes, ii. 51.
 March. A. C. Coxe, ii. 605.
 March of the Seventh, by Theodore Winthrop, ii. 825.
 Marco Bozzaris. F. G. Halleck, i. 935.
 Mardi, by Hermann Melville, ii. 637.
 Margaret, by Sylvester Judd, ii. 499.
 Margaret. J. R. Lowell, ii. 611.
 Margaret's Dungeon, In, from Faust. Bayard Taylor, ii. 720.
 Margery's Room, from Faust. C. T. Brooks, ii. 498.
 Maria del Occidente, i. 923.
 Marie Antoinette, remarks on the execution of. Mrs. Adams, i. 199.
 Marion, Francis, life by W. G. Simms, ii. 259.
 Life by Weems, i. 503.
 "Marion Harland"—M. V. Terhune, ii. 967.
 Maritime Captures and Prizes, law of, by H. Wheaton, i. 728.
 "Mark Twain"—S. L. Clemens, ii. 951.
 Markoe, Francis, Jr., ii. 757.
 Marquand, Frederick, i. 101.
 Marquand, Henry G., i. 286.
 Marriage in Cana, the. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 285.
 Married or Single, by Catherine M. Sedgwick, ii. 84.
 Married Women, by Lydia M. Child, ii. 213.
 Marryatt, Francis, duel with N. P. Willis, ii. 269.
 MARSH, CAROLINE CRANE, ii. 124.
 MARSH, GEORGE P., ii. 119.
 Marsh, James, president of University of Vermont, i. 832.
 Prepares John Adams for Cambridge, i. 194.
 MARSHALL COLLEGE, ii. 607.
 Marshall, Humphrey, i. 235.
 MARSHALL, JOHN, i. 421.
 Martha's Vineyard, account of English ministers at, by Thomas Prince, i. 87.
 Martin, Alexander, tribute to General Francis Nash, i. 469.
 Martin Faber, by W. G. Simms, ii. 257.
 Martyr's Triumph and other poems, by Grenville Mellen, ii. 63.
 Mary. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 150.
 H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Mary Dow. Hannah F. Gould, ii. 842.
 Maryland Historical Society, ii. 880.
 Mason, Cyrus, ii. 752.
 MASON, EBENEZER P., i. 95.
 MASON, JOHN M., i. 603.
 President of Dickinson College, i. 753.
 Mason, Lowell, ii. 852.
 Masque of the Gods, by Bayard Taylor, ii. 716.
 Masquerade, the, by John G. Saxe, ii. 564.
 Massachusetts, by Daniel Leonard, i. 194.
 Massachusetts and Its Early History, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 350.
 Aims and Purposes of the Founders of, by G. E. Ellis, ii. 538.
 Buy, history of, by Thomas Hutchinson, i. 141.
 Civic List, ii. 832.
 General Hospital, History of the, by N. I. Bowditch, ii. 70.
 History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in, by W. S. Bartlet, ii. 453.
 History of Western, by J. G. Holland, ii. 796.
 Horticultural Society, History of the, by Luther Farnham, ii. 777.
 Judicial History of, by Emory Washburn, ii. 444.
 Magazine, i. 316, 660.
 MATHER, COTTON, i. 64.
 Anecdotes of, by B. Franklin, i. 65.
 Books in the American Antiquarian Society Library, i. 317.
 Complimented in verse by Benjamin Tompson, i. 72.
 Elegy on Ezekiel Cheever, quoted, i. 65.
 Epitaph on Michael Wigglesworth, i. 62.
 Eulogy of Anne Bradstreet, i. 52.
 Humorous story of, by Dr. S. Peters, i. 204.
 Notice of John Cotton, i. 27.
 Thomas Hooker, i. 29.
 Ward's Simple Cobler, i. 24.
 Paraphrase of a sermon of John Eliot, i. 46.
 Puns on Uriah Oakes, i. 9.
 Translation of epitaph on Dudley, i. 52.
 MATHER, INCREASE, i. 64.
 Presidency of Harvard, i. 9.
 Mather, Increase, son of Cotton Mather, i. 67.
 Mather, Richard, i. 64.
 Mather, Samuel, life of Cotton Mather, i. 67.
 Notice of Robert Calef, i. 66.
 MATHEWS, CORNELIUS, ii. 591.
 Mathews, James M., Chancellor of the University of the City of New York, ii. 751.
 Mathias and his Impostures, by Wm. L. Stone, i. 858.
 MATUREN, EDWARD, ii. 667.
 Maury, Anne, Memoirs of a Huguenot Family, i. 80; ii. 253.
 MAURY, MATTHEW F., ii. 253.
 Maury, Walker, instructor of John Randolph, i. 654.
 Maverick, Augustus, "H. J. Raymond and the New York Press for Thirty Years," ii. 836.
 MAXCY, JONATHAN, i. 542.
 MAXCY, JONATHAN, first president of South Carolina College, ii. 140.
 President of Union, i. 917.
 May, a Song of. Willis G. Clark, ii. 400.
 MAY, CAROLINE, ii. 665.
 May-Day, and Other Pieces, by Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 190.
 May-Day in New York, H. J. Finn, i. 726.
 May-Flower, the, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 522.
 May Martin, or the Money Diggers, by D. P. Thompson, i. 945.
 May to April. Philip Freneau, i. 355.
 MAYER, BRANTZ, ii. 379.
 MAYHEW, JONATHAN, i. 154.
 Eclogue, sacred to the memory of. Joseph Green, i. 133.
 Passage from a poetical translation by, i. 139.

- Mayhew, Thomas, assisted at Martha's Vineyard by Peter Folger, i. 57.
- MAYLEM, JOHN, i. 449.
- Maynard, W. H., gift to Hamilton College, ii. 740.
- MAYO, AMORY DWIGHT, ii. 807.
- MAYO, WM. STARBUCK, ii. 465.
- Mazy, Arthur, i. 403.
- Meade, William, i. 672.
- Meadville College, Pa., i. 146.
- Means and Motives in American Education. Levi Woodbury, i. 828.
- Mears, Dr. John W., ii. 742.
- Meat out of the eater, by Michael Wigglesworth, i. 62.
- Mechanism in Thought and Morals, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 374.
- Mecklenburg Resolutions of Independence, i. 250.
- Mediæval History, Lectures on, by Dr. F. H. Hedge, ii. 261.
- Medical Repository, the, i. 534.
- Medical Jurisprudence, by Dr. T. R. Beck, ii. 14.
- Medical Science, Border Lines in some Provinces in, ii. 374.
- Currents and Counter-Currents in, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 374.
- Meditation at Athens. George Hill, ii. 114.
- Meditation, essay on. Joseph Dennie, i. 586.
- Meeting of the Female Beneficent Society. Caroline M. Kirkland, ii. 461.
- Meeting of Ulysses and Penelope. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 912.
- Megapolensis, Johannes, tract on the Maquas Indians, i. 85.
- Moigs, Josiah, i. 771.
- Meister Karl's Sketch Book, by C. G. Leland, ii. 828.
- Melbourne and the Chincha Islands, by George W. Peck, ii. 595.
- MELLEN, GRENVILLE, ii. 62.
- Melville, Allan, ii. 636.
- MELVILLE, HERMAN, ii. 686.
- Melville, Thomas, ii. 636.
- Melville, Thomas, Jr., ii. 636.
- Memoirs of a Water-Drinker, by Dunlap, i. 560.
- Memoranda concerning a Book-Worm. M. H. Allibone, ii. 868.
- Memorial to Mrs. Osgood, ii. 457.
- Memory and Hope. George Lunt, ii. 268.
- Men and Deeds of the Revolution. Edward Everett, i. 885.
- Men and Times of the Revolution, edited by W. C. Watson, i. 549.
- Men of Our Times, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
- Men, Women, and Ghosts, by Elizabeth S. Phelps, ii. 993.
- Mennons, John, his reprints of American Poems, ii. 65.
- Mental Character of Franklin. Theodore Parker, ii. 442.
- Mental Portraits, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
- Mental Progress. Mark Hopkins, i. 864.
- Mental Training. Mark Hopkins, i. 863.
- Mercer University, Ga., i. 771.
- Mercurius Anti-Mechanicus, or the Simple Cobler's Boy, i. 25.
- Mercury, American, the, i. 409.
- Merry Mount, by John L. Motley, ii. 582.
- Messer, Aza, president of Brown University, i. 542.
- METAMORA, by J. A. Stone, ii. 65.
- Metcalf, Theron, i. 546.
- Methodism, History of, by Abel Stevens, ii. 777.
- Memorials of, by Abel Stevens, ii. 777.
- Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, by Abel Stevens, ii. 778.
- Metrical Pieces, by N. L. Frothingham, ii. 34.
- Mexican Antiquities, by Brantz Mayer, ii. 380.
- Mexican Boundary Survey, ii. 247.
- History and Archæology, Observations on, by Brantz Mayer, ii. 380.
- War, by N. C. Brooks, ii. 453.
- Mexico, History of the Conquest of, by Wm. H. Prescott, i. 977.
- Notes on, by J. R. Poinsett, i. 689.
- Recollections of, by Waddy Thompson, i. 690.
- Midnight. Wm. W. Story, ii. 619.
- Midnight, from Faust. Bayard Taylor, ii. 721.
- Midsummer. Elizabeth Oakes Smith, ii. 459.
- MILBURN, WILLIAM HENRY, ii. 810.
- Miles O'Reilly, Life and Adventures of Private, by Chas. G. Halpine, ii. 920.
- Miles, J. W., ii. 138.
- MILES, PLINY, ii. 640.
- Military Genius. W. E. Channing, i. 710.
- Militia Muster, by Albert G. Greene, ii. 146.
- Milledoler, Philip, i. 602.
- Millennium, treatise on the, by George Bush, i. 964.
- MILLER, EDWARD, i. 591.
- MILLER, "JOAQUIN," ii. 988.
- MILLER, SAMUEL, i. 590.
- Memoir of C. Nisbet, i. 752.
- Notice of G. Berkeley, i. 175.
- Retrospect, quoted, i. 545.
- Milton, John, allusion to America, i. 6.
- Thomas Hollis's admiration of, i. 10.
- Visited by Roger Williams, i. 41.
- Milton on his Blindness. Elizabeth Lloyd, ii. 665.
- Mimic Life, by A. C. Mowatt Ritchie, ii. 554.
- Mineral Resources of the West, by J. R. Browne, ii. 599.
- Ministers, behavior of. John Witherspoon, i. 290.
- Minister's Wooing, the, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
- Ministry of Angels. Cotton Mather, i. 71.
- MINOT, GEORGE R., i. 498.
- Mint Julep, the. C. F. Hoffman, ii. 320.
- Minto, Walter, i. 285.
- Minute Organisms. George P. Marsh, ii. 123.
- Miriam, and other Poems, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 316.
- Miriam, by Louisa J. Hall, ii. 205.
- Concluding scene of. Louisa J. Hall, ii. 205.
- Mirror, New York, ii. 156, 269.
- Mirror of Taste, i. 685.
- Miscellanies, by Wm. H. Prescott, i. 978.
- By Wm. Tudor, ii. 54.
- Miserrimus. Lucy H. Hooper, ii. 950.
- Mishna, translated by De Sola and M. J. Raphall, ii. 444.
- Miss Gilbert's Career, by J. G. Holland, ii. 797.
- Missionaries to China, instructions to. Bp. White, i. 315.
- Missionary Enterprise, Moral Dignity of. Francis Wayland, i. 543.
- Mississippi, expedition to, by Z. M. Pike, i. 689.
- Scenery of the, from Evangeline. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 279.
- Valley, geography and history of, by T. Flint, i. 713.
- Discovery and Exploration of the, by J. G. Shea, ii. 832.
- MITCHEL, ORMSBY McKNIGHT, ii. 767.
- MITCHELL, DONALD G., ii. 683.
- Mitchell, John, i. 274.
- MITCHELL, JOHN K., ii. 204.
- Mitchell, Jonathan, i. 51.
- Mitchell, Maria, ii. 766.
- MITCHELL, SAMUEL L., i. 534.
- Reminiscences of, by Dr. John W. Francis, i. 824.
- Moby Dick, by Herman Melville, ii. 637.
- Mocking Bird, the. John J. Audubon, i. 679.
- J. R. Drake*, i. 930.
- Modern Chivalry, by H. H. Brackenridge, i. 305.
- Modern Learning: exemplified by a specimen of a collegiate examination. Francis Hopkinson, i. 223.

- Mogg Megone, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 312.
 Mohun, by J. E. Cooke, ii. 575.
 Moliere and Rachel. George H. Calvert, ii. 196.
 Molina, Abbé, history of Chili, i. 514.
 Mona Seven Years Old. Alice Cary, ii. 662.
 Mona's Mother. Alice Cary, ii. 663.
 Monadnock. W. B. O. Peabody, ii. 68.
 Monaldi, by W. Allston, ii. 17.
 Money, Essay on, by J. Witherspoon, i. 288.
 Money King, the, by John G. Saxe, ii. 564.
 Monkey, the. D. Humphreys, i. 392.
 Monody made on the late Mr. Samuel Patch. R. C. Sands, ii. 41.
 Monody on the death of Decatur. W. Crafts, i. 781.
 Monstrous relations in newspapers. Fisher Ames, i. 487.
 Montague, Lady Mary Wortley, introduces inoculation into England, i. 66.
 Montagues in America, the. Eliza Leslie, i. 783.
 Montaigne. R. W. Emerson, ii. 188.
 Montauk Indians, account of, by S. Occom, i. 161.
 Montezuma, death of. Wm. H. Prescott, i. 980.
 Montezuma's Way of Life. Wm. H. Prescott, i. 981.
 Montgomery, or the Falls of Montmorenci, by H. J. Finn, i. 716.
 Montgomery, widow of General, letter of Mercy Warren to, i. 174.
 Month, a, in England, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 489.
 Monthly Anthology, i. 757, 785; ii. 53.
 Monuments, Ancient, of the Mississippi Valley, by E. G. Squier, ii. 672.
 MOODY, JAMES, i. 259.
 Moonlight on the Grave. Jane T. Worthington, ii. 648.
 Moor, Joshua, i. 550.
 Moore, Augusta, editor of "Notes from Plymouth, Pulpit," ii. 782.
 MOORE, CLEMENT C., i. 690.
 Moore, George H., ii. 49.
 MOORE, HENRY E., ii. 133.
 MOORE, HUGH, ii. 340.
 MOORE, JACOB B., ii. 132.
 MOORE, JACOB B., JR., ii. 132.
 MOORE, JOHN W., ii. 133.
 MOORE, NATHANIEL F., i. 397.
 Sketch of Columbia College, i. 394.
 Moore, Thomas, conversation of, narrated by N. P. Willis, ii. 269.
 Moore, Zephaniah S., president of Williams College, i. 863.
 Moorhead, Scipio, i. 382.
 Moral Pieces, by Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 838.
 Moral Qualities of Vegetables. C. D. Warner, ii. 914.
 Moral Reforms Suggested, by A. C. Coxe, ii. 605.
 Moral Uses of Dark Things, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
 Moralities. Thomas Jefferson, i. 255.
 Moravian Burial-ground at Bethlehem, lines on. Emma C. Embury, ii. 329.
 MORELL, WILLIAM, i. 2.
 Morellet, translation of Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, i. 251.
 Morning, Letter on the. Daniel Webster, i. 722.
 Morning and Evening Exercises, by Lyman Abbott, ii. 168.
 Morning Chronicle, edited by Peter Irving, i. 737, 742.
 Morning Sunlight, from Zophiel. Maria Brooks, i. 926.
 MORRIS, GEORGE P., ii. 156.
 Commences the Mirror with S. Woodworth, i. 765.
 MORRIS, GOUVERNEUR, i. 362.
 Life by Jared Sparks, i. 378.
 Poetical satire on, i. 478.
 MORRIS, ROBERT, poetical satire on, i. 478.
 Morrow, the. Margaret J. Preston, ii. 913.
 MORSE, ABNER, i. 799.
 MORSE, JEDIDIAH, i. 509.
 Donation to Yale College Library, i. 97.
 Mention of, in Ezra Stiles's Diary, i. 171.
 Morse, S. F. B., ii. 751, 755.
 Editor of the Panoplist, i. 663.
 Life of L. M. Davidson, ii. 328.
 MORTON, NATHANIEL, i. 50.
 Morton, Percy, i. 500.
 MORTON, SAMUEL GEORGE, ii. 478.
 MORTON, SARAH WENTWORTH, i. 500.
 Poetical correspondence with R. T. Paine, Jr., i. 660.
 MORTON, THOMAS, i. 33.
 Morton's Hope, by John L. Motley, ii. 582.
 Mosquito, to a. Edward Sanford, ii. 236.
 Mosses from an Old Manse, by N. Hawthorne, ii. 355.
 Mother, the, and the Schoolmaster. G. C. Verplanck, i. 763.
 MOTLEY, JOHN LOTHROP, ii. 582, 818.
 Motley Book, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 591.
 Motherly Talks with Young Housekeepers, by Mrs. H. W. Beecher, ii. 783.
 Mott, Valentine, Memoir of, by S. W. Francis, ii. 820.
 MOULTON, LOUISE CHANDLER, ii. 821.
 Mount Harvard, i. 20.
 Mount Vernon and its Associations, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 393.
 Mount Vernon Papers, by Edward Everett, i. 886.
 Mourner of the Last Hope. Wm. B. Walter, ii. 70.
 Movers, the. Wm. D. Howells, ii. 961.
 MOWATT, ANNA CORA, ii. 563.
 Mower in Ohio, the. J. J. Piatt, ii. 956.
 Mr. Blazay's Experience. J. T. Trowbridge, ii. 904.
 Mrs. Skagg's Husband, by Bret Harte, ii. 976.
 Muhlenberg, H. E., i. 600.
 MÜHLENBERG, WM. A., ii. 38.
 Mulberry Hill. Alice Cary, ii. 658.
 MULFORD, ELISHA, ii. 946.
 MUNSELL, JOEL, ii. 835.
 Munford, Robert, i. 669.
 MUNFORD, WILLIAM, i. 669.
 Murder, the Secret of. Daniel Webster, i. 721.
 Murdoch, James E., ii. 690.
 Murdock, James, ii. 738.
 MURPHY, HENRY C., ii. 833.
 Murphy, Henry E., translates Van der Donck's New Netherland, i. 85.
 Murray, Hannah L., memoirs by Dr. Spring, i. 775.
 Murray, John, publication of W. Irving's works, i. 738.
 MURRAY, LINDLEY, i. 269.
 MURRAY, NICHOLAS, ii. 161.
 Muse, the Tenth, by Anne Bradstreet, i. 53.
 Museum, a national, of the United States, ii. 757, 762.
 Music Lesson of Confucius, by C. G. Leland, ii. 828.
 My Aunt. O. W. Holmes, ii. 371.
 Babes in the Wood. Sarah M. B. Piatt, ii. 958.
 Boyhood. J. G. Saxe, ii. 564.
 Brother's Keeper, by Anna B. Warner, ii. 556.
 Castle in Spain. John G. Saxe, ii. 564.
 Chateaux in Spain. G. W. Curtis, ii. 609.
 Country 'tis of Thee. S. F. Smith, ii. 852.
 First Bible Scholar. Lyman Abbott, ii. 109.
 Ghost. Sarah M. B. Piatt, ii. 959.
 Legacy. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 924.
 Mother's Bible. G. P. Morris, ii. 159.
 Son Will. Paul H. Hayne, ii. 787.
 Study. Estelle A. Lewis, ii. 645.
 Summer in a Garden, by C. D. Warner, ii. 914.
 Uncle John, in Salmagundi, i. 737.
 Wife and I, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
 Witness, by W. W. Winter, ii. 966.

- MYERS, P. HAMILTON, ii. 464.
 Mysteries, the. Wm. D. Howells, ii. 960.
 Myths of the New World, by D. G. Brinton, ii. 968.
- NACK, JAMES, ii. 481.
 Nahant, letters from, by W. W. Wheildon, ii. 849.
 Nairne, Prof. Chas. M., i. 402.
 Napoleon. Isaac S. Clason, ii. 43.
 Narrative of James Moody, passages of, i. 259.
 Nasby, by D. R. Locke, ii. 943.
 Nash, General Francis, tribute to, i. 469.
 NASON, ELIAS, i. 622; ii. 513.
 Nassau Hall, i. 281.
 Natick, Mass., history of, by William Biglow, i. 658.
 Nation, the, by Elisha Mulford, ii. 947.
 National Advocate, the, i. 768.
 National Characteristics, by Geo. W. Bethune, ii. 233.
 National Education in Europe, by Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
 National Gazette, by P. Freneau, i. 343.
 National Gazette, by R. Walsh, i. 726.
 National Hymns, by R. G. White, ii. 870.
 NATIONAL INSTITUTE, THE, Washington, D. C., ii. 757.
 National Lyrics, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 815.
 National Medals, historical sketch of, by C. H. Hart, ii. 968.
 National Portrait Gallery of Eminent Americans, by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
 National Song, Monograph on Our, by Elias Nason, ii. 514.
 Nationalism, Fragments of Political Science on, by Francis Lieber, ii. 98.
 Natural History, American, by John D. Godman, i. 914.
 Natural History, United States, Contributions to, i. 19.
 Natural Scenery, seen by the youth and the man. Archibald Alexander, i. 641.
 Nature. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Nature. Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 190.
 Nature and the Supernatural, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
 Nature and Revelation. William Croswell, ii. 218.
 Naval History of the United States, by J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
 Naval Observatory of the United States, ii. 253.
 NEAL, JOHN, i. 873.
 Memoir of John Pierpont, i. 766.
 Revises Paul Allen's Noah, i. 670.
 NEAL, JOSEPH C., ii. 295.
 Neal's Gazette, ii. 649.
 Near Home, by W. E. Channing, ii. 469.
 Near the Lake. G. P. Morris, ii. 159.
 Nearer Home. Phæba Cary, ii. 659.
 Neill, William, president of Dickinson College, i. 753.
 Neilson, Samuel, ii. 39.
 Nelson, Dr. Cleland K., i. 760.
 Nelson, Joseph, the Blind Teacher, i. 602.
 Netherlands, History of the United, ii. 584.
 Nettleton, Dr. Asabel, ii. 840.
 Never Again, by W. S. Mayo, ii. 466.
 Never too Late to Mend. John G. Saxe, ii. 565.
 Neversink. Philip Freneau, i. 356.
 Nevin, Dr. John W., ii. 607.
 New, the, and the Old Song. J. K. Mitchell, ii. 204.
 New Birth, the. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 New England Birds and Fishes. Francis Knapp, i. 78.
 Annals of, by Thomas Prince, i. 86.
 Climate. Rufus Choate, ii. 73.
 A description of, and other tracts, by Captain John Smith, i. 5.
 Divines, library of, by Thomas Prince, i. 86.
 Early Laws of, i. 24, 26.
 Farmer, edited by T. G. Fessenden, i. 618.
 Fishes, described. William Wood, i. 3.
 Fragmentary poem. William Bradford, i. 36.
 Galaxy and Masonic Magazine, ii. 13.
- New England, Genealogical Dictionary of the First Settlers of, by James Savage, ii. 46.
 Historical and Genealogical Register, i. 697; ii. 452.
 Historical Collections of the Indians, by D. Gookin, i. 47.
 History of, by William Bradford, i. 35.
 History of, by Gov. John Winthrop, i. 32; ii. 46.
 History of, by John Gorham Palfrey, i. 955.
 Hymn. Mather Byles, i. 130.
 Impressions of. Thomas Morton, i. 35.
 Ill News from, by John Clarke, i. 43.
 Indians, described. William Wood, i. 4.
 Legends, by Harriet P. Spofford, ii. 951.
 Magazine, ii. 13.
 And New York. Philip Freneau, i. 358.
 Poem, specimen of. William Morell, i. 3.
 Poem. Sellick Osborn, i. 737.
 Pond, a. Francis Knapp, i. 77.
 Preachers, poetical description of, i. 4.
 Puritan, ii. 841.
 Retrospect. Roger Clap, i. 49.
 Sabbath, John Cotton's observance of, i. 27.
 Sabbath-day Chase. Philip Freneau, i. 358.
 Snow Storm. Sylvester Judd, ii. 501.
 Tale, a, by C. M. Sedgwick, ii. 81.
 Trees Described. William Wood, i. 3.
 Trials, by Capt. John Smith, i. 5.
 Two Voyages to, by John Josselyn, i. 75.
 Weekly Review, ii. 225.
- New England's Crisis, passages of. Benjamin Thompson, i. 72.
 Decline. Joshua Scottow, i. 52.
 Lamentation for Old England's Errors, passage from. Thomas Shepard, i. 49.
 Memorial, by Nath. Morton, i. 50.
 Prospect, specimens of. William Wood, i. 3.
 Rarities Discovered, passage from. John Josselyn, i. 74.
 Tragedies, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 282.
- New Englander, the, i. 101.
 New English Canaan, passages from. Thomas Morton, i. 33.
 New Exodus, the. Julia Ward Howe, ii. 647.
 New Hampshire, history of, by J. Belknap, i. 264.
 Historical Collections, by J. B. Moore, ii. 132.
 Patriot, ii. 132.
 Sons of, ii. 841.
- NEW JERSEY, COLLEGE OF, i. 280.
 Provincial Courts of, by R. S. Field, ii. 850.
 Reminiscences of the Bench and Bar of, by L. Q. C. Elmer, ii. 839.
 Unwritten History of the War in, by Peter Force, ii. 85.
- New Netherlands, historical literature of, i. 85; ii. 832.
 Anthology of, translated by H. C. Murphy, ii. 833.
 History of, by William Dunlap, i. 561.
 New Gospel of Peace, by R. G. White, ii. 870.
 New Life in New Lands, by Sara J. Lippincott, ii. 655.
 New Orleans, First Protestant Worship in, i. 636.
 New Orleans, to the Defenders of. J. R. Drake, i. 930.
- New Pilgrim's Progress, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 3.
 New Roof, an allegory, by Francis Hopkinson, i. 220.
 Song for Federal Mechanics. Francis Hopkinson, i. 229.
- New Testament, Alphabetical Index to, by S. A. Alibone, ii. 864.
 Notes on the, by Albert Barnes, ii. 50.
 New Wife, the, and the Old. J. G. Whittier, ii. 313.
 New World, Civilization in the, by A. D. Mayo, ii. 796.
 New World, the, ii. 344, 421.
 New York Convention, for the adoption of the Federal Constitution. James Kent, i. 527.
 History of the State of, by J. R. Brodhead, ii. 506

- New York, History of, by William Dunlap, i. 561.
Annals of, by J. F. Watson, i. 636.
Civil List, edited by F. B. Hough, ii. 834.
Documents of the Colonial History, ii. 832.
In the Nineteenth Century, by Samuel Osgood, ii. 475.
Old Families and Customs of, by W. I. Kip, ii. 430.
State Inebriate Asylum, i. 824.
History of the City of, by Mary L. Booth, ii. 821.
Historical Society, address before, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 761.
Gazetteer, by James Rivington, i. 290, 291.
Notes on, by W. H. Seward, ii. 134.
A Picture of, parodied in Knickerbocker, i. 737.
Review, the, ii. 47.
SOCIETY LIBRARY, i. 403.
Review and Athenæum Magazine, i. 900.
Tribune, ii. 421.
UNIVERSITY OF THE CITY OF, ii. 751.
New Yorker, the, ii. 421.
Newburgh Letters, the, i. 497.
Newport. C. T. Brooks, ii. 496.
Residence of Berkeley, i. 176.
Ezra Stiles, notices of, i. 169.
New Priest in Conception Bay, by R. T. S. Lowell, ii. 774.
Newspaper, a poetical description of a. Robert Waln, ii. 37.
Literature, J. T. Buckingham's, ii. 13.
Thunder-storm, a. The Echo, i. 515.
Newton, Sir Isaac, i. 92.
Newton, Stuart, lines on his "Dull Lecture," by Washington Irving, i. 740.
Niagara. Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 842.
Niblo, William, gift of the "Hawks-Niblo Collection," ii. 50.
Nicaragua, by E. G. Squier, ii. 673.
Nick of the Woods, by R. M. Bird, ii. 200.
Niebuhr, his acquaintance with F. Lieber, ii. 93.
Reminiscences of, by F. Lieber, ii. 93.
Niemeyer, i. 102.
Night. Jones Vary, ii. 386.
Night, a, on the Hudson River with Charles Mathews. William Dunlap, i. 561.
Night Hunt in Kentucky, a. C. W. Webber, ii. 631.
Night-Quarters. H. H. Brownell, ii. 896.
Nile Notes of an Howadji, ii. 696.
NILES, NATHANIEL, i. 457.
Niles, Samuel, i. 457.
Niles's Register, i. 874.
Nineveh, original sculptures from, at Yale College, i. 97.
Nisbet, Charles, president of Dickinson College, i. 752.
No Love Lost, by Wm. D. Howells, ii. 960.
NOAH, M. M., i. 767; ii. 902.
Nobility. Alice Cary, ii. 658.
NOBLE, L. L., ii. 508.
Life of Thomas Cole, ii. 126.
Noctes Ambrosianæ, edited by R. S. Mackenzie, ii. 815.
Nook, the. A. Rouquette, ii. 385.
Nordheimer, Isaac, ii. 642, 752.
NORDHOFF, CHARLES, ii. 921.
NORMAN, BENJAMIN MOORE, ii. 343.
Norman Leslie, by Theodore S. Fay, ii. 240.
Norman Maurice, by W. G. Simms, ii. 258.
NORRIS, THADDEUS, ii. 856.
North America, account of, by R. Rogers, i. 181.
North American Review, i. 194, 785; ii. 54, 426, 483, 613.
North Carolina, History of, by Dr. Francis L. Hawks, ii. 49.
North Carolina, History of, by Hugh Williamson, i. 199.
NORTH CAROLINA, UNIVERSITY OF, i. 801.
North, Edward, ii. 740.
North, Simeon, president of Hamilton College, ii. 739.
Northmen, History of the, by Henry Wheaton, i. 729.
NORTON, JOHN, i. 28.
Norton, William A., i. 96.
Norton, John P., i. 96.
NORTON, ANDREWS, i. 776.
Edits writings of Levi Frisbie, i. 755.
NORRIS, CHARLES ELLIOT, ii. 906.
NORTON, JOHN N., ii. 794.
Norwood, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
Nor' West, the brilliant. J. K. Mitchell, ii. 204.
Not Quite in Vain. Chas. G. Malpine, ii. 920.
Not Yet. William C. Bryant, i. 909.
Notes of a Desultory Reader, by A. Graydon, i. 367.
On England and Italy, by Mrs. N. Hawthorne, ii. 363.
On New York, by William H. Seward, ii. 134.
On the Scriptures, by Albert Barnes, ii. 50.
And Queries, quoted, i. 116, 118, 120.
Nothing to Wear. Wm. Allen Butler, ii. 728-9.
Notions of the Americans, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
Nott, Eliphalet, president of Union, i. 917, 921.
Epigram on, by Josiah Quincy, i. 635.
NOTT, HENRY JUNIUS, ii. 30.
NOTT, JOSIAH C., ii. 479.
Nottway Foundation of William and Mary, i. 87.
NOVA ANGLIA, poem, specimens of. William Morell, i. 3.
Novanglus, by John Adams, i. 194.
Novel Writing before Waverley. R. S. Mackenzie, ii. 816.
Novelettes of a Traveller, by H. J. Nott, ii. 80.
Novelist, the responsibilities of the. E. S. Gould, ii. 308.
Novels. Alexander Graydon, i. 371.
Noyes, Nicholas, notice of, i. 29.
Noyes, William Curtis, ii. 741.
Numismatic and Antiquarian Society, of Philadelphia, ii. 968.
Nun, the. George H. Calvert, ii. 195.
NUTTALL, THOMAS, i. 601.
O ye keen breezes. Epes Sargent, ii. 571.
Oakes, Uriah, president of Harvard, i. 8.
Oblivion, or Dead History. Horace Bushnell, ii. 228.
O'Callaghan, Edmund B., ii. 832.
O'Callaghan, John C., i. 738.
O'Catarnot, Jehu, nom de plume of John Neal, i. 874.
OCCOM, SAMPSON, i. 161.
Ocean Steam Navigation, services of John L. Stephens to, ii. 249.
October. W. H. C. Hosmer, ii. 518.
Ode for Anniversary of Massachusetts Charitable Fire Society. John Lathrop, i. 639.
Ode on decorating Confederate Graves. Henry Timrod, i. 843.
Ode on the Death of General Wolfe. Thomas Paine, i. 211.
Ode to Fortune, from the Croakers. J. R. Drake, i. 931.
Ode to Indolence. J. F. Harwood, i. 576.
Odyssey, translated by William C. Bryant, i. 908-10.
Of thine own country sing. W. R. Wallace, ii. 668.
Officers of our Union Army and Navy, by Dean Dudley, ii. 814.
Ogeechee, To the River. R. M. Charlton, ii. 265.
Ogilby, John D., i. 399.
Professor at Rutgers, i. 603.
Oglethorpe University, i. 771.
Oh, fairest of the Rural Maids. William C. Bryant, i. 903.
Oh, tell me not of lofty fate. Emma C. Embury, ii. 829.
Oh, the Spring has come again, love. J. Lawrence, Jr., ii. 302.
Ohio in the War, by Whitelaw Reid, ii. 970.

- Ohio, shores of the. T. Flint, i. 718.
 Old Age. L. M. Child, ii. 211.
Theodore Parker, ii. 441.
 And Death. Samuel H. Dickson, ii. 40.
 Recounts the History of the Puritan Period.
Anne Bradstreet, i. 56.
 Old Bachelor, by William Wirt and others, i. 646.
 Clock, the. James Nuck, ii. 482.
 Clock on the stairs, the. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 378.
 Grimes. Albert G. Greene, ii. 147.
 Hicks the Guide, by C. W. Webber, ii. 630.
 House at Sudbury, by T. W. Parsons, ii. 581.
 Ironsides, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 868.
 Ironsides. O. W. Holmes, ii. 869.
 Maid, the. Amelia B. Welby, ii. 643.
 New York, by Dr. John W. Francis, i. 824.
 Oaken Bucket, the. S. Woodworth, i. 766.
 Portraits and Modern Sketches, ii. 313.
 Song and New, by Margaret J. Preston, ii. 911.
 Songs. Willis G. Clark, ii. 401.
 Style Farm, an. D. G. Mitchell, ii. 686.
 Testament Shadows of New Testament Truths,
 by Lyman Abbott, ii. 168.
 Town Folks, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
 Trinity. A. C. Coxe, ii. 605.
 Winter is coming. Hugh Moore, ii. 340.
 Oldbug, Esq., John. Leonard Withington, ii. 45.
 Oldport Days, by T. W. Higginson, ii. 883.
 Oldstyle, Jonathan, letters of, by Washington Irving,
 i. 737.
 Old World in its New Face, by H. W. Bellows, ii. 770.
 Ole Bul. L. M. Child, ii. 211.
 OLIN, STEPHEN, ii. 81.
 Olive Branch, by Mathew Carey, i. 668.
 Olive Branch, the, i. 795.
 Oliver, Andrew, i. 146.
 OLIVER, ISABELLA, i. 637.
 "Oliver Optic"—Wm. T. Adams, ii. 878.
 Oliver, Peter, a contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio,
 i. 14.
 Oliver, Thomas, a contributor to Pietas et Gratulatio,
 i. 14.
 Ollapodiana, by W. G. Clark, ii. 400.
 OLMSTEAD, DENISON, i. 95, 100.
 Olmstead, L. G., i. 417.
 OLMSTED, FREDERICK LAW, ii. 822.
 "O Mother Dear, Jerusalem," edited by W. C.
 Prime, ii. 778.
 "Omnium Gatherum," essays, by William Biglow, i.
 658.
 Omoa, by Herman Melville, ii. 637.
 On an Old Portrait. Lucy H. Hooper, ii. 950.
 On Crusoe's Island. J. Ross Browne, ii. 599.
 On Lending a Punch Bowl. O. W. Holmes, ii. 371.
 On listening to a Cricket. Andrews Norton, i. 777.
 On seeing a Young Girl look very wishfully into the street from a window of Miss ——'s boarding-school. McDonald Clarke, ii. 42.
 On the Right. J. G. Holland, ii. 799.
 "One Hoss Shay." O. W. Holmes, ii. 377.
 "Only a Year." H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
 Ontwa, the Son of the Forest, ii. 65.
 Optimist, the, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Oration at Gettysburg. Edward Everett, i. 887.
 Oration on the Death of President Lincoln. George
Bancroft, ii. 108.
 Orations and Speeches, by Charles Sumner, ii. 411.
 Oratory. Alexander Graydon, i. 370.
 Ord, George, i. 570.
 Ordeal, the, ii. 13.
 Order for a Picture, an. Alice Cary, ii. 661.
 Ordinal, the. William Crosswell, ii. 216.
 Oregon and California, history of, by R. Greenhow,
 ii. 109.
 Oregon Question, by Albert Gallatin, i. 511.
 Organ Melodies. George E. Ellis, ii. 538.
 Presented by G. Berkeley to church at Newport,
 i. 177.
 Oriental and Linguistic Studies, by W. D. Whitney,
 ii. 908.
 Oriental Books, presented by T. Hollis to Harvard
 College, i. 10.
 Oriental Harp, by Robert S. Coffin, ii. 82.
 Ornithology, American, by J. J. Audubon, i. 678.
 Ornithology, pursuit of. A. Wilson, i. 567.
 Orthography, Noah Webster's. i. 492, 494.
 Views of T. S. Grimke on, i. 779.
 OSBORN, JOHN, i. 142.
 Osborn, John, Jr., i. 142.
 Osborn, John C., i. 142.
 OSBORN, SELLICK, ii. 736.
 OSBORN, LAUGHTON, ii. 805.
 Osgood, David, ii. 471.
 OSGOOD, FRANCES SARGENT, ii. 460.
 Osgood, John, ii. 471.
 Osgood, S. S., ii. 456.
 OSGOOD, SAMUEL, ii. 471.
 OSSOLI, MARGARET FULLER, ii. 387.
 O'Sullivan, John L., ii. 630.
 Oswald, Eleazer, lines to. John Parke, i. 320.
 Otey, James H., services to M. F. Maury, ii. 253.
 OTIS, JAMES, i. 165.
 "A flame of fire," i. 196.
 Conversation with John Adams, i. 197.
 Life of, by William Tudor, ii. 54.
 Speech of, by L. M. Child, ii. 210.
 Our Country. Julia Ward Howe, ii. 648.
 Countrymen, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 393.
 Father, who art in Heaven. George W. Doane,
 ii. 79.
 Old Home, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 363.
 Seven Churches, by Thos. K. Beecher, ii. 783.
 Yankee Girls. O. W. Holmes, ii. 369.
 Out-Door Papers, by T. W. Higginson, ii. 882.
 Out of the Past, by Parke Godwin, ii. 560.
 Outgrown. Julia C. R. Dorr, ii. 908.
 Outline Sketch of a Novel, an. Theodore S. Fay, ii. 241.
 Outlines of Men, Women, and Things, by Mary C.
 Ames, ii. 911.
 Outre Mer, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 275.
 Overland Journey from New York to San Francisco, by Horace Greeley, ii. 421.
 Ovid, passage from translation of. Geo. Sandys, i. 1.
 Owen, R., settlement at New Harmony, men of science at, i. 873; ii. 478, 845.
 New Ainslie's trial of, i. 873.
 OWEN, ROBERT DALE, ii. 845.
 Paine, Amasa, i. 764.
 Paine, J. R., i. 20.
 PAINE, ROBERT TREAT, JR., i. 659.
 PAINE, THOMAS, i. 207.
 Not a Christian name, i. 659.
 Publication of Age of Reason rebuked by B.
 Franklin, i. 119.
 Rights of Man, John Dickinson's anticipation of, i. 192.
 Painted Columbine, to the. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Printing. P. M. Wetmore, ii. 64.
 Palestine. J. G. Whittier, ii. 314.
 PALFREY, JOHN G., i. 955.
 PALFREY, SARAH H., i. 961.
 Palisot de Beauvais, i. 600.
 PALMER, JOSEPH, i. 764.
 Palmetto Leaves, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
 Panama in 1855, by Robert Tomes, ii. 812.
 Panama Railroad, services of John L. Stephens to the, ii. 249.
 Panidea, by Job Durfee, i. 827.
 Pansies, by A. D. T. Whitney, ii. 889.

- Panther, the. J. F. Cooper, i. 814.
 Paper, a poem. B. Franklin, i. 124.
 Paper and Paper Making, a Chronology of, by Joel Munsell, ii. 835.
 Parables Practically Unfolded, by Wm. B. Stevens, 862.
 Paradise Lost, in prose, i. 105.
 Parentator, by Cotton Mather, i. 64.
 Parisian "Pension," the. John Sanderson, i. 735.
 Parisian Sights, by J. J. Jarves, ii. 781.
 Park, E., anecdotes of Nathaniel Emmons, i. 258.
 PARKE, JOHN, i. 319.
 Notice of David French, i. 126.
 Parker, Edward G., Reminiscences of Rufus Choate, ii. 76.
 PARKER, HENRY W., ii. 669.
 PARKER, THEODORE, ii. 440.
 Parker, Nathan, letter on George Baneroff, ii. 98.
 PARKMAN, FRANCIS, ii. 701.
 Parks, Edwards A., life of. B. B. Edwards, ii. 150.
 Tribute to Prof. Moses Stuart, i. 708.
 Parnassian Shop, a signboard to. Isaac Story, i. 661.
 Parody on Pope's ode to Solitude. John Wilcocks, i. 322.
 Parr, Samuel, educates J. S. J. Gardiner, i. 556.
 Parsons, Theophilus, i. 900.
 PARSONS, THOMAS W., ii. 579.
 Parties. De Witt Clinton, i. 594.
 Parting of Hector and Andromache. James G. Percival, i. 943.
 Partisan Leader, by Beverley Tucker, i. 695.
 PARTON, JAMES, ii. 815.
 Life of Horace Greeley, ii. 421.
 Partridge, Ralph, life of. Cotton Mather, i. 70.
 Passaic, a group of poems, by Flaccus, ii. 294.
 Passaic, to. Thomas Ward, ii. 295.
 Passio Christi, edited by W. C. Prime, ii. 773.
 Passion, an age of. W. R. Williams, ii. 256.
 Passport scene at Calais in the days of the Empire. Lt. Col. Pinkney, i. 705.
 Past, the, a fragment. W. H. Timrod, i. 846.
 Pastime, the, edited by J. H. Payne, i. 849.
 Pastoral, the new, by T. B. Read, ii. 688.
 Patents, specifications, etc., of British, from 1617 to date, ii. 765.
 Pathfinder, the, ii. 560.
 The, by J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
 Patriot Muse, by Benjamin Young Prime, i. 450.
 PATRIOTIC POEMS. Death of General Pike. Laughton Osborn, ii. 806.
 Death of Warren. Epes Sargent, ii. 571.
 Old Ironsides. O. W. Holmes, ii. 869.
 Patriotism and other Papers, by Thomas Starr King, ii. 771.
 Patterson, Robert, i. 598.
 Paul, Moses, sermon on the execution of, by Sampson Occom, i. 161.
 PAULDING, JAMES K., ii. 1.
 Anecdote of H. H. Brackenridge, i. 807.
 Paulding, William Irving, Literary Life of James K. Paulding, ii. 10.
 Paulding, W. J., ii. 4.
 Pause, a. R. K. Weeks, ii. 987.
 PAYNE, JOHN HOWARD, i. 848.
 Articles on Neglected Poets, i. 607.
 PEABODY, ANDREW P., i. 18; ii. 426.
 Peabody, George, i. 20, 101; ii. 350.
 Eulogy of, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 350.
 PEABODY, O. W. B., ii. 67.
 PEABODY, W. B. O., ii. 67.
 Life of Cotton Mather, quoted, i. 66.
 Peace between England and America. R. C. Winthrop, ii. 347.
 Peach Blossoms. J. J. Piatt, ii. 957.
 Peacocks, the two. John Wilcocks, i. 322.
 Pearson, Eliphalet, i. 708.
 Pearson, Prof. Jonathan, i. 922.
 Peasant of Auburn, the, passage from. Thomas Coombe, i. 140.
 PEASE, DR. CALVIN, i. 834.
 Peck, Dr. J. F., ii. 879.
 PECK, GEORGE W., ii. 594.
 Peck, Joseph, ii. 594.
 Peck, Prof. William G., i. 402.
 Peculiar, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 Pedestrianism in Switzerland. G. B. Cheever, ii. 298.
 Peeps from a Belfry, by F. M. Shelton, ii. 567.
 Peirce, Benjamin, history of Harvard, i. 16, 20.
 Peissner, Elias, i. 920.
 Pen and Ink Panorama of New York, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 592.
 Penance of Roland, by H. B. Hirst, ii. 502.
 Pencillings by the Way, by N. P. Willis, ii. 269.
 Penn, Thomas, Epistle to, by J. Beveridge, i. 139.
 Penn, William, life of, by M. L. Weems, i. 503.
 Penney, Joseph, president of Hamilton College, ii. 739
 Pennsylvania. T. B. Read, ii. 689.
 By J. Taylor, i. 111.
 First book printed in, i. 111.
 Gazette, i. 115.
 Herald, i. 667.
 Historical Review of, 1759, i. 115.
 Magazine, the, i. 208.
 Pilgrim, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 316.
 Poetical description of, Latin and English, by Thomas Makin, i. 73.
 Travels in, by H. St. John Crevecoeur, i. 184.
 PENNSYLVANIA, UNIVERSITY OF, i. 404.
 Penseroso. William Clifton, i. 632.
 People's Book of Biography, by J. Parton, ii. 804.
 Perception, on. Henry Cary, ii. 91.
 PERCIVAL, JAMES G., i. 939.
 Imitation of an Inscription on Governor Yale, i. 92.
 Percival, John, ii. 638.
 Père la Chaise. S. L. Fairfield, ii. 199.
 Perfect Life, the, sermons by Wm. Ellery Channing, i. 710; ii. 469.
 Perils of Pearl Street, by Asa Greene, ii. 809.
 PERIODICALS.
 American Church Monthly, ii. 513.
 Journal of Education, ii. 585.
 Journal of Numismatics, ii. 859.
 Journal of Science, i. 101.
 Law Journal, i. 855.
 Medical and Philosophical Register, i. 822.
 Monthly Magazine, ii. 269.
 Museum, i. 668.
 Quarterly Register, ii. 151.
 Review, by Robert Walsh, i. 726.
 Statesman, ii. 849.
 Analectic Magazine, i. 738.
 Aroturus, ii. 578, 591, 888.
 Aristidean, ii. 802.
 Athenæum, at Yale, i. 97.
 Atlantic Magazine, ii. 57.
 Atlantic Monthly, ii. 378, 882, 960.
 Belles Lettres Repository, i. 765.
 Biblical Repository, i. 880.
 Repository, American, ii. 151.
 Repository and Princeton Review, i. 641; ii. 522.
 Bibliotheca Sacra, i. 880; ii. 151.
 Boston Atlas, ii. 570.
 Commonwealth, ii. 980.
 Daily Advertiser, ii. 872.
 Miscellany, ii. 618.
 Quarterly Review, ii. 144.
 Recorder, the first religious newspaper, ii. 269.

- Boston Republican, ii. 791.
 Bunker Hill Aurora, ii. 849.
 Christian Disciple, i. 496.
 Examiner, ii. 588.
 Inquirer, ii. 775.
 Review, ii. 852.
 Union, ii. 783.
 Church Monthly, ii. 794.
 Record, ii. 47, 578.
 Churchman, ii. 511.
 Churchman's Magazine, i. 673.
 Cincinnati Mirror, ii. 811.
 Collegian, ii. 867, 569.
 Congregational Quarterly, ii. 814.
 Corsair, ii. 270.
 Courier and Enquirer, ii. 835.
 Critic, ii. 153.
 Dial, ii. 182, 389.
 Essayist, ii. 858.
 Evening Post, ii. 153, 822.
 Every Saturday, ii. 830.
 Friend of Peace, i. 496.
 General Magazine, B. Franklin's, i. 115.
 Repository, i. 776.
 Hartford Courant, ii. 914.
 Hearth and Home, ii. 971.
 Heraldic Journal, ii. 820.
 Hierophant, i. 965.
 Historical Magazine, ii. 859.
 Home Journal, ii. 167, 270.
 Idle Man, i. 786.
 Illinois Monthly Magazine, i. 854.
 Illustrated Christian Weekly, ii. 168.
 Independent, ii. 782, 971.
 International Magazine, ii. 533.
 Journal of American Oriental Society, i. 101.
 Knickerbocker Magazine, ii. 320, 400, 902.
 Lippincott's Magazine, ii. 886.
 Literary Cabinet, at Yale, i. 97.
 Gazette and American Athenæum, ii. 65.
 Magazine and American Register, i. 611.
 Miscellany, i. 777.
 World, ii. 380, 592, 837-8.
 Lorgnette, the, ii. 633.
 Louisville Journal, ii. 225.
 Lowell Offering, ii. 530.
 Massachusetts Magazine, i. 316, 660.
 Medical Repository, i. 534.
 Mirror of Taste, i. 685.
 Monthly Anthology, ii. 46, 53.
 Magazine and American Review, i. 611.
 Nation, ii. 960, 989.
 National Journal, ii. 86.
 Press, ii. 156.
 Newark Daily Advertiser, i. 799; ii. 855.
 New England Historical and Genealogical Register, i. 697; ii. 859.
 Magazine, ii. 18.
 Puritan, ii. 841.
 Weekly Review, ii. 225.
 New Englander, i. 101.
 New Hampshire Patriot, ii. 132.
 New World, ii. 344, 421.
 New York American, ii. 320.
 Citizen, ii. 919.
 Herald, ii. 867.
 Ledger, ii. 782.
 Mirror, ii. 156, 269.
 Review, ii. 47.
 Review and Athenæum Magazine, i. 900.
 Times, ii. 885.
 New Yorker, the, ii. 421, 847.
 North American Review, ii. 54, 426, 483, 907.
 Old and New, ii. 872.
 Our Young Folks, ii. 903.
 Overland Monthly, ii. 975.
 Pathfinder, ii. 560.
 Pennsylvania Common School Journal, ii. 853.
 Philadelphia Press, ii. 815.
 Pioneer, i. 609.
 Plaindealer, ii. 153.
 Polyanthus, ii. 13.
 Polynesian, ii. 781.
 Popular Science Monthly, ii. 867.
 Port-Folio, i. 584.
 Portico, i. 873.
 Putnam's Monthly, ii. 560.
 Recorder, i. 560.
 Republic, ii. 569.
 Republican Farmer, i. 623.
 Round Table, ii. 919.
 Sartain's Magazine, ii. 460, 853.
 Scribner's Monthly, ii. 797.
 Siderial Messenger, ii. 767.
 Silliman's Journal, ii. 77.
 Southern Literary Gazette, ii. 259.
 Literary Messenger, ii. 403.
 Review, ii. 25.
 Springfield Republican, ii. 796.
 Student's Companion, i. 97.
 Sunday-School Teacher, ii. 970.
 Sunday-School Times, ii. 853.
 Thespian Mirror, i. 849.
 To-Day, ii. 301.
 Toledo Blade, ii. 943.
 Tribune, ii. 421, 847, 969-70.
 Union Magazine, ii. 460.
 United States Catholic Miscellany, i. 778.
 Law Intelligencer and Review, i. 805.
 Magazine, by H. H. Brackenridge, i. 804.
 Review and Literary Gazette, i. 900.
 Service Magazine, i. 407; ii. 810.
 Universalist Quarterly and General Review, i. 622
 Vanity Fair, ii. 947.
 Weekly Inspector, i. 618.
 Western Monthly Magazine, i. 854.
 Whig Review, ii. 606, 630.
 Yale Literary Magazine, i. 97, 101.
 Yankee, i. 875.
 Youth's Companion, the, ii. 269.
 Zion's Herald, ii. 777.
 Perkins, Alfred E., i. 97.
 PERKINS, JAMES H., ii. 390.
 Perkins, Prof. Maurice, i. 921.
 Perkins, Tractors, i. 618.
 Perpetuity of Superstition. H. C. Lea, ii. 898.
 PERRY, WILLIAM STEVENS, ii. 49, 862.
 Persecution, a parable against. B. Franklin, i. 120.
 Person of Christ, the, by Philip Schaff, ii. 607.
 Personal Memoirs of H. R. Schoolcraft, i. 860.
 Personal Narrative, by J. R. Bartlett, ii. 247.
 Personal Reminiscences, by Gardiner Spring, i. 776.
 Peru, history of the Conquest of, by William H. Prescott, i. 977.
 Peter Funk. Asa Greene, ii. 309.
 Peter Parley, ii. 110.
 Peter Pilgrim, by R. M. Bird, ii. 201.
 Peter Schlemihl in America, by George Wood, ii. 88.
 Peter the Great, article on, by J. L. Motley, ii. 584.
 Peters, Dr. C. H. F., ii. 740.
 Peters, Hugh, i. 200.
 A fellow passenger of the Folgers to America, i. 57.
 History of, by Samuel Peters, i. 203.
 PETERS, SAMUEL, i. 200.
 At Lincoln's Inn Chapel, i. 147.
 Peterson, R. M., i. 599.
 Phelps, Elizabeth, i. 709; ii. 992.
 PHELPS, ELIZABETH STUART, ii. 992.
 Phelps, Prof. Austin, ii. 992.

- Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard, i. 15.
 At Yale, i. 97.
 Origin and history of, at William and Mary, i. 90.
- Philadelphia, Annals of, by John F. Watson, i. 636.
- PHILADELPHIA LIBRARY COMPANY OF, i. 187.
 Yellow fever in, 1793. C. B. Brown, i. 614.
- Philanthropist, the, by M. L. Weems, i. 503.
- Philip II., history of, by Wm. H. Prescott, i. 977, 982.
- Philip II., of Spain, by Charles E. A. Gayarré, ii. 229.
- Phillips Academy, Exeter, i. 717.
- Phillips, Edward. Mention of Anne Bradstreet in his Theatrum Poetarum, i. 54.
- PHILLIPS, WENDELL, ii. 331.
- Philo, by Sylvester Judd, ii. 500.
- Philosophic Solitude, passage from. William Livingston, i. 163.
- Philosophic Theology, by J. W. Miles, ii. 138.
- Philosophical Society, Teague a member of, from Modern Chivalry. H. H. Brackenridge, i. 310.
- Philosophy of History, lectures on the, by W. G. T. Sheild, ii. 792.
- Philosophy of the Human Voice, by James Rush, ii. 839.
- Philothea, by Lydia M. Child, ii. 211.
- Phips, Governor, his wife suspected of witchcraft, i. 66.
- Phrenology, first publication on, in the United States, ii. 193.
 Uncle Sam's Recommendation of, by Warren Burton, ii. 446.
- Physical Geography of the Sea, by M. F. Maury, ii. 254
- Physiognomy, passages from. Joseph Bartlett, i. 524.
- PIATT, JOHN JAMES, ii. 955.
- PIATT, SARAH M. B., ii. 958.
- Piazza Tales, by Herman Melville, ii. 638.
- PICKERING, HENRY, i. 713.
- PICKERING, JOHN, i. 652.
 Article on Indian languages, translated by Mrs. Edward Robinson, i. 881.
 Eulogy of Bowditch, i. 654.
- Pickering, Octavius, i. 652.
- Pickering, Timothy, i. 652.
- Picnic at Roaring Brook, from Kavanagh. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 280.
- Picture, a. Charles G. Eastman, ii. 670.
 A. John K. Thompson, ii. 709.
 Song, a! F. C. Pinkney, ii. 150.
- Pictures of Europe, by C. A. Bartol, ii. 539.
- Pictures of Memory. Alice Cary, ii. 658.
- Picturesque America, i. 910.
- Picturesque, the, in Rome. George S. Hillard, ii. 340.
- Pieces of a Broken-down Critic, by C. A. Bristed, ii. 669.
- Pierce, Franklin, appoints Nathaniel Hawthorne Consul at Liverpool, ii. 358.
- PIERPONT, JOHN, i. 766.
- Pierre, by Herman Melville, ii. 637.
- Pierre the Barber's Indian Adventure. James Hall, i. 855.
- Pierrepont, Sarah, i. 103.
- Pierson Abraham, i. 91.
- Pietas et Gratulatio*, account of, i. 11.
- PIKE, ALBERT, ii. 383.
- PIKE, ZEBULON MONTGOMERY, i. 688.
- Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth. R. C. Winthrop, ii. 351.
- Pilgrim Fathers, Oration on the 250th Anniversary of their Landing, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 350.
- Pilgrims, Journal of the, by G. B. Cheever, ii. 293.
 At Leyden, Memoirs of the, by George Sumner, ii. 412.
- Progress, Lectures on, by G. B. Cheever, ii. 293.
 Vision, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 372.
- Pillar of Glory. Edwin C. Holland, i. 845.
- Pilot, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 808.
- Pinckney, C. C., residence of. William Elliott, i. 797.
- Pinckney, Thomas, i. 778.
- Pinckney, William, challenges John Neal, i. 874.
- Pine Forest, the. John D. Godman, i. 915.
- Pink and White Tyranny, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
- PINKNEY, EDWARD C., ii. 147.
- PINKNEY, LT. COL., Travels in France, i. 704.
- Pinkney, William, i. 691.
- Pintard, John, account of P. Freneau, i. 841.
- Pioneer Patriots of America, the, by John S. C. Abbott, ii. 165.
- Pioneer, the, edited by J. R. Lowell, ii. 609.
- Pioneers, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 808.
- Piozzi, Mrs., original anecdote of J. Ralph, i. 118.
- PISE, CHARLES CONSTANTINE, ii. 447.
- Pitman, J., notice of Jonathan Maxcy, i. 542.
- Pitt, William, anecdotes of, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 141.
- Place de la Revolution. H. H. Brownell, ii. 897.
- Plaindealer, the, by William Leggett, i. 722.
- Plain Language from Truthful James. Bret Harte, ii. 977.
- Planchette, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
- Planetary and Stellar Worlds, by O. M. Mitchel, ii. 767
- Plantation, the. Caroline Gilman, i. 896.
- Planting in rain. Catharine Luders, ii. 644.
- Planting of the Apple Tree. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 912.
- Platonic Bacchanal Song. J. G. Percival, i. 941.
- Plautus, quoted by Wedderburn, i. 116.
- Play, a Life of Freedom. Horace Bushnell, ii. 220.
- Plays and Poems, by George H. Boker, ii. 711.
- Plea for Literary Style, a. T. W. Higginson, ii. 884.
- Plea for Maidenhood. Catherine M. Sedgwick, ii. 85.
- Plea for the West. Lyman Beecher, i. 672.
- Pleasures of a Country Life. George W. Doane, ii. 79.
 Of Study, the. Joseph Denite, i. 585.
- Plumer, Wm., Memoir of, by A. P. Peabody, ii. 426.
- Plutarch's Morals, edited by Prof. W. W. Goodwin, ii. 190.
- Plymouth Pulpit, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
- Pocahontas, by L. H. Sigourney, i. 839.
 Intercession of, described by John Smith, i. 6.
 Story of, doubted by Charles Deane, ii. 545.
- POE, EDGAR A., ii. 402.
 And His Critics, by Sarah H. Whitman, ii. 331.
- Poems, by J. G. C. Brainard, i. 966.
 By Elizabeth Akers, ii. 932.
 By T. B. Aldrich, ii. 880.
 By Wm. C. Bryant, i. 910.
 By W. H. Burleigh, ii. 859.
 By Wm. A. Butler, ii. 729.
 By Julia C. R. Dorr, ii. 908.
 By Emma C. Embury, ii. 829.
 By Lucy H. Hooper, ii. 949.
 By Washington Irving, i. 740.
 By Sellick Osborn, i. 786.
 By W. W. Story, ii. 619.
 By R. K. Weeks, ii. 987.
 Collection of, by several hands, 1744, i. 128.
 Of Faith, Hope, and Love, by Phoebe Cary, ii. 659.
 Of Robert Lowell, ii. 774.
 Of Henry Timrod, i. 846.
 Of Two Friends, by J. J. Piatt and W. D. Howells, ii. 955, 960.
 On Man, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 591.
- Poet, a, and his Song. T. MacKellar, ii. 464.
 And Critic, a dialogue. S. Margaret Fuller, ii. 389.
 At the Breakfast Table, the. O. W. Holmes, ii. 375.
 The. Elizabeth Oakes Smith, ii. 460.
 The. Rufus Dawes, ii. 164.
 The. William E. Channing, Jr., 469.
- Poetasters, an Act of Parliament to restrain. Francis Knapp, i. 77.
- Poetical and Prose Reading. Henry Reed, ii. 336.
 Literature of the West, selections from, by William D. Gallagher, ii. 311.

- Poetical Meditations, by Roger Wolcott, i. 84.
 Poetry, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 368.
G. P. Morris, ii. 159.
L. H. Sigourney, i. 840.
 Of Travelling, by Mrs. Caroline Gilman, i. 896.
 Of the Civil War, by R. G. White, ii. 870.
 Of the East, by W. R. Alger, ii. 796.
 Poets and Poetry of America, by R. W. Griswold, ii. 533.
 Poets and Poetry of Europe, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 276, 284.
 Poet's Daughter, a. F. G. Halleck, i. 936.
 Farewell to the Muses. Robert Dinsmore, i. 483.
 POINSETT, JOEL R., i. 689.
 Polhemus, A., notice of Joseph Nelson, i. 602.
 Polignac, Cardinal de, lines applied to Franklin from the Anti-Lucretius of, i. 120.
 Political Catechism, by Francis Hopkinson, i. 220.
 Duties of the Educated Classes, by George S. Hillard, ii. 339.
 Economy, Essays on, by Horace Greeley, ii. 422.
 Economy, Lectures on, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 141.
 Economy, Principles of, by Francis Bowen, ii. 483.
 Economy, Principles of, by H. C. Carey, i. 867.
 Essays, by Parke Godwin, ii. 560.
 Ethics, by F. Lieber, ii. 94.
 Revery, a passage from. Mercy Warren, i. 175.
 Writings, by William Leggett, ii. 153.
 Politicians, the, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 591.
 Politics, the Ancient and Modern Teacher of, by Francis Lieber, ii. 97.
 Politics, duty of the American Scholar to, by G. W. Curtis, ii. 698.
 Polyanthus, the, ii. 13.
 Ponceuch, a tragedy, passages from. Robert Rogers, i. 181.
 Pontiac, History of the Conspiracy of, by Francis Parkman, ii. 701.
 Pony Express, the. S. L. Clemens, ii. 952.
 Pool, Rev. Solomon, i. 802.
 Poole, William Frederic, i. 97; ii. 55.
 Poor Man, the. Cornelius Mathews, ii. 592.
 Rich Man and Rich Poor Man, by C. M. Sedgwick, ii. 82.
 Richard, Common Sense and the Doctor, i. 821.
 Richard, Jr., ii. 218.
 Richard's Almanac, specimens of, i. 118, 119.
 Pope, Alexander, couplet on James Ralph, i. 118.
 Lines to. Francis Knapp, i. 77.
 Parody on lines from Eloise to Abelard. Elizabeth Ferguson, i. 244.
 Sends Mather Byles his Odyssey, i. 128.
 Translation of Homer, lines on a Lady desiring to borrow. M. Byles, i. 128.
 Tribute to Berkeley, i. 178.
 POPKIN, JOHN S., i. 14.
 Population, new ideas on, by A. H. Everett, ii. 128.
 Port Folio, the, i. 584, 627, 775, 855.
 Porter, John A., i. 96.
 PORTER, NOAH, i. 99, 102; ii. 858.
 Porter, Wm. T., Life by Francis Brinley, ii. 444.
 Portico, the, i. 873.
 Portrait, a. Paul H. Hayne, ii. 736.
 Pot Pie Palmer, a Charcoal Sketch of. Edward Sanford, ii. 236.
 Potiphar Papers. G. W. Curtis, ii. 696.
 Potomac and the Rapidan, by A. H. Quint, ii. 815.
 Potter, Alonzo, i. 918.
 Potter, Eliphalet Nott, i. 921.
 Potter, Horatio, ii. 750.
 Potter, Israel, life of, by Henry Trumbull, ii. 638.
 Poverty and Knowledge. J. H. Perkins, ii. 391.
 Poverty, Ode to. Isaac Story, i. 662.
 Power of Solitude, by Joseph Story, ii. 14.
 Powers of Genius, passage from. John Blair Linn, i. 681.
 Prairie, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 808.
 Prayer, set forms of. John Cotton, i. 26.
 The. Jones Very, ii. 887.
 Prayers from Plymouth Pulpit, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 783.
 Preacher, a popular. Gardiner Spring, i. 776.
 Preachers of New England in 1648, poetical description of, i. 4.
 PREBLE, GEORGE HENRY, ii. 804.
 Preble, Life of Commodore Edward, by Lorenzo Sabine, ii. 450.
 Precaution, by J. F. Cooper, i. 807.
 Prehistoric Man and his Contemporaries, by John R. Bartlett, ii. 248.
 Prelections, on Moral and Physical Science, by J. A. Smith, i. 90.
 Prémices, by Sarah Palfrey, i. 961.
 PRENTICE, GEORGE D., ii. 225.
Prenticeiana, ii. 225.
 PRENTISS, CHARLES, i. 637.
 Edits R. T. Paine's works, i. 660.
 PRESCOTT, WILLIAM H., i. 976.
 Bequest of manuscripts to Harvard College, i. 19.
 Eulogium of, by George Bancroft, ii. 105.
 Life of, by George Ticknor, i. 974.
 Literary Habits of. George Ticknor, i. 975.
 Notice of George Ticknor's Lectures at Harvard, i. 970.
 Present, the, by William H. Channing, ii. 469.
 Presentiment, the. Paul H. Hayne, ii. 737.
 Presidential Mansion, the, in Philadelphia, i. 407.
 PRESTON, MARGARET J., ii. 911.
 Preston, Samuel, i. 189.
 PRESTON, WILLIAM C., president of South Carolina College, ii. 148.
 Notice of D. J. M'Cord, ii. 27.
 Pretty Story, by Francis Hopkinson, ii. 220.
 Price of Oranges. C. D. Warner, ii. 916.
 Price of the Divina Commedia. Julia Ward Howe, ii. 648.
 Price, Richard, observations on American Revolution, i. 195.
 Pride, the, of the Valley. S. Woodworth, i. 765.
 Priestess, the, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 PRIESTLEY, JOSEPH, ii. 140.
 Controversy with Prof. John Maclean, i. 285.
 Death-bed of, i. 719.
 Present at the scene with Franklin before the Privy Council, i. 116.
 Priestly, James, i. 640.
 Prime, Benjamin Young, poems of, i. 450.
 PRIME, SAMUEL IRENEUS, ii. 778.
 Tribute to the Princeton Review, ii. 522.
 PRIME, WILLIAM COWPER, ii. 778.
 Primeval World of Hebrew Tradition, the, by Dr. F. H. Hedge, ii. 252.
 Prince, John, ii. 448.
 PRINCE, THOMAS, i. 86, 822.
 Revises Bay Psalm Book, i. 22.
 Prince of Parthia, passages from. Thomas Godfrey, i. 205.
 Princess and Page. Lucy H. Hooper, ii. 950.
 Princeton, battle of, effects at Nassau Hall, i. 283.
 Principles of Action in Matter, by C. Colden, i. 86.
 Printers, Authors, and Booksellers of New York, by J. W. Francis, i. 822.
 Printing, history of, by Isaiah Thomas, i. 316.
 Press, first, in New England, i. 8.
 Public curiosity in regard to, on its first introduction into Philadelphia, i. 108.
 PRIOLEAU, P. G., ii. 89.
 Prior, John, i. 322.
 Prison Ship of New York, i. 341.

- Prisoner of War, a, and exile at Flatbush. Alexander Graydon, i. 369.
- Prize Prologue at the opening of the Park Theatre. Charles Sprague, i. 836.
- Problem, the. R. W. Emerson, ii. 183.
- Probus, by William Ware, i. 891.
- Proctor, Edna Dean, editor of "Life Thoughts" of H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
- Prom to Yamoyden. R. C. Sands, ii. 60.
- Professional Ethics, by George Sharswood, ii. 856.
- Professor at the Breakfast Table, by Oliver Wendell Holmes, ii. 374.
- Progress of Civilization. H. C. Lea, ii. 900.
- Progress of Dulness. John Trumbull, i. 323.
- Promises of the Declaration of Independence, by Charles Sumner, ii. 413.
- Promoted. Elizabeth A. Allen, ii. 934.
- Prompter, by Noah Webster, i. 493.
- Protestant Episcopal Church, Genius and Mission of, by Calvin Colton, i. 990.
- Protestant Jesuitism, by Calvin Colton, i. 990.
- Providence and Life, by E. H. Chapin, ii. 515.
- Provincial Congress, private life of members of. James T. Austin, i. 754.
- Provincial Influences on Literature. De Witt Clinton, i. 593.
- Prue and I, by G. W. Curtis, ii. 697.
- Prussian Parliament in 1867, Dissolution of the. H. W. Bellows, ii. 776.
- Psalm xlvii. George Burgess, ii. 383.
c. Cotton Mather, i. 69.
cxxxvii. William Crosswell, ii. 216.
Fitz Greene Halleck, i. 989.
- Psalm of Life. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 276.
- Psalms, book of, translated by George Burgess, ii. 382.
- Psalterium Americanum, by Cotton Mather, i. 68.
- Psychology, Rational and Empirical, by L. P. Hitchcock, i. 913.
- Public and Private Economy, by Theodore Sedgwick, ii. 81.
- Public Life in Washington, by H. W. Bellows, ii. 776.
- Public Opinion, moral force of. Daniel Webster, i. 720.
- Public Schools, by Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
- Puck's Nightly Pranks, by C. T. Brooks, ii. 497.
- Puffer Hopkins, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 591.
- Pulpit, American, Annals of the, by Dr. W. B. Sprague, i. 707.
- Pulpit, eloquence of the. William Wirt, i. 648.
- Pulpit Ministrations, by Gardiner Spring, i. 776.
- Pulpit of the American Revolution, by J. W. Thornton, ii. 701.
- Pulsifer, David, edits N. Ward's Simple Cobler, i. 25.
- Pumpelly, Prof. Raphael, i. 20.
- Puritan, the, by John Oldbug, Esq., ii. 45.
- Purse, the. St. John Honeywood, i. 531.
- Pursuits of a Philosopher, from Swallow Barn. J. P. Kennedy, i. 951.
- Putnam, George P., notice of Washington Irving, i. 750.
- Putnam, Israel, adventure with the Wolf. David Humphreys, i. 390.
Indian Story, by, i. 197.
S. Peter's version of the Wolf story, i. 202.
Life of, by Humphreys, i. 387.
- Putnam, Mrs., ii. 609.
- Putnam, Prof. John N., i. 553.
- Putnam, Samuel, John Adams studies law with, i. 194.
- Pym, Arthur Gordon, narrative of, by Edgar A. Poe, ii. 403.
- Pynchon, Thomas R., ii. 751.
- Pythagoras and Sappho. Samuel L. Mitchell, i. 587.
- Quail, some observations concerning. William P. Hawes, ii. 172.
- Quaker Rule, the. John G. Whittier, ii. 319.
- Quaker worship. John Woolman, i. 159.
- Quarles, Francis, translations of Psalms, i. 74.
Descendants of, ii. 777.
- Quarterly Review, London, article on Inchiquin's Letters, ii. 2.
- Quatrains, by Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 191.
- Queechy, by Susan Warner, ii. 555.
- Queens of American Society, by E. F. Ellet, ii. 531.
- Quest of the Soul, the. Sarah H. Whitman, ii. 331.
- Questions of the Hour. Sarah M. B. Pratt, ii. 959.
- Quince, Peter, i. 661.
- Quince's, Peter, adieu to the city. Isaac Story, i. 663.
- QUINCY, JOSIAH, JR., i. 261.
Bequest to his son, i. 633.
- QUINCY, JOSIAH, i. 633.
And Judge Story, bon-mots of, i. 635.
Influence of the Mathers at Harvard, i. 9.
- QUINT, ALONZO HALL, ii. 814.
- Quod, John, i. 743.
- Quodlibet, Annals of, by John P. Kennedy, i. 940.
- Quotations, Poetical and Prose, by S. A. Allibone, ii. 864.
- Rab and Ringan, a tale. Alexander Wilson, i. 578.
- Race of Life. O. W. Holmes, ii. 376.
- Races of the Old World, ii. 822.
- Rachel Dyer, by John Neal, i. 875.
- Raciad, the, by W. Crafts, i. 781.
- Radical Problems, by C. A. Bartol, ii. 539.
- Rafferty, W., i. 772.
- RAFINESQUE, C. S., i. 773.
- Rain in Summer. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 277.
- Rainbow, the. Eliza Townsend, i. 825.
The, essays, by William Wirt, i. 645.
- Rale, Sebastian, life of, by Rev. Convers Francis, i. 728
- RALPH, JAMES, i. 112.
Dedication to, of a tract, by B. Franklin, i. 118.
Translation of a psalm, i. 119.
- Rambles among Words, by William Swinton, ii. 836.
- Rambles of a Naturalist, by John D. Godman, i. 915.
- Ramsay, Dr., ii. 39.
- RAMSAY, DAVID, i. 318.
- Ramsay, James, i. 288.
- Ramsay, Martha Laurens, i. 319.
- RAND, EDWARD SPRAGUE, JR., ii. 820.
- Randall, H. S., i. 251.
- Randolph, by John Neal, i. 874.
- RANDOLPH, JOHN, i. 654.
- Randolph, Sarah N., i. 251.
- Randolph, Thomas Jefferson, i. 251.
- Rangers, the, or the Tory's Daughter, by D. P. Thompson, i. 945.
- RAPHALL, MORRIS JACOB, ii. 443.
- Rarey as an Educator. John S. Hart, ii. 854.
- Rattlesnake, the, from the Yemassee. W. G. Simms, ii. 252.
- Raven, the, by Edgar A. Poe, ii. 404.
The. Edgar A. Poe, ii. 405.
- RAWLE, WILLIAM, i. 187, 697.
- RAWLE, WILLIAM, JR., i. 698.
- RAWLE, WILLIAM HENRY, i. 698.
- RAX, WILLIAM, i. 633.
- Raymond, Dr. John H., president of Nassau College, ii. 766.
- RAYMOND, HENRY JARVIS, ii. 835.
- Raynal, Abbé, letter to, by Thomas Paine, i. 209.
- READ, T. B., ii. 688.
- Reading, practical rules for, ii. 192.
- Reardon, a schoolmaster of Virginia, i. 640.
- Reason in Religion, by Dr. F. H. Hedge, ii. 252.
- Reason, the only Oracle of Man, by Ethan Allen, i. 217.
- Reavis, L. U., Representative Life of Horace Greeley, ii. 421.

- Rebellion, History of the, by Horace Greeley, ii. 421.
 History of the Great, by J. T. Headley, ii. 521.
 Latent Causes of, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 493.
 Literature of the, by John R. Bartlett, ii. 248.
 Mr. Ambrose's Letters on the, by John P. Kennedy, i. 953.
- Recollections of a Busy Life, by Horace Greeley, ii. 422.
- Recollections of a Lifetime, by S. G. Goodrich, ii. 111.
- Recollections of a New England Housekeeper and of a Southern Matron, by Caroline Gilman, i. 896.
- Recollections of the West, by H. M. Brackenridge, i. 700.
- Reconstruction Measures, History of the, by Henry Wilson, ii. 792.
- Recorder, the, i. 560.
- Records of Five Years, by Sara J. Lippincott, ii. 655.
- Rector of St. Bardolph's, by F. W. Shelton, ii. 567.
- Red Book, the, by J. P. Kennedy, i. 949.
- Red Rover, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
- Redburn, by Herman Melville, ii. 637.
- Redburn's visit to the Captain. Herman Melville, ii. 638.
- Redeemed Captive, the, passage from. John Williams, i. 76.
- Redfield, William C., i. 300.
- Redwood, Abraham, i. 297.
- Redwood Library, i. 297.
 W. E. Channing's obligations to, i. 709.
- Reed, Deborah, i. 115.
- Reed, Esther, ii. 335.
- REED, HENRY, ii. 335.
- Reed, Joseph, ii. 335.
- REED, WILLIAM B., i. 407; ii. 336.
- Reply to strictures by George Bancroft on Joseph Reed, ii. 106.
- Reprint of letters of Washington, i. 190.
- Rees, James, anecdote of Richard Penn Smith, ii. 204.
- Regicides in New England, the. John Gorham Palfrey, i. 956.
- Rehearsal, newspaper, by J. Gridley, i. 12.
- REID, WHITELAW, ii. 969.
- Reid of Terror, remark on, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 141.
- Rejected Stone, the, by M. D. Conway, ii. 930.
- Relief of Leyden. John Lathrop Motley, ii. 584.
- Relief of Lucknow. R. T. S. Lowell, ii. 774.
- Religion and Literature. W. E. Channing, i. 711.
- Religion in Public Instruction, an address by Dr. Thomas Hill, i. 17.
- In the United States, by Robert Baird, i. 948.
- Religious Affections, treatise on, by J. Edwards, i. 103.
- Opportunities of Age. J. G. Palfrey, i. 955.
- Poems, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 526.
- Repertory, the, i. 773.
- Reminiscence of Early Life, a. Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 383.
- Reminiscences of Boyhood. S. Osgood, ii. 472.
- RENSBLAER, CORTLANDT VAN, ii. 770.
- Renwick, James, i. 400, 401.
 Address on De Witt Clinton, i. 762.
- Repose. William Ware, i. 894.
- Repository, the General, i. 776.
- Representation, advantages of. James Otis, i. 166.
- Representative Men, by R. W. Emerson, ii. 133.
- Repression. H. B. Stowe, ii. 527.
- Reproach, the, of Venus. Laughton Osborn, ii. 806.
- Reptiles of North America, by John C. Holbrook, i. 923.
- Republic, the, ii. 569.
- Republic of the United States. Rise of the, by Richard Frothingham, ii. 34.
- Republican Court, the, by R. W. Griswold, ii. 533.
- Republican Superstitions, by M. D. Conway, ii. 931.
- Republics, Ingratitude of. Joseph Dennie, i. 588.
- REQUER, AUGUSTUS J., ii. 734.
- Rescue, a, from Nick of the Woods. R. M. Bird, ii. 201.
- The, of Everell, by Magawisca, from Hope Leslie. C. M. Sedgwick, ii. 82.
- Rescue Party, the. E. K. Kane, ii. 676.
- Resignation. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 278.
- Resurrection, the, from a sermon. Mather Byles, i. 129.
- Retirement, Ode to. J. B. Ladd, i. 533.
- Retreat across the Dan, the. G. W. Greene, ii. 541.
- Retreat, the. William Livingston, i. 163.
- Retribution, by Emma D. E. N. Southworth, ii. 555.
- Retrospect of the Eighteenth Century, i. 590.
- Reveries of a Bachelor, by Ik Marvel, ii. 633.
- Revivals at Yale, i. 96.
- Revolution, Chaplains and Clergy of the, by J. T. Headley, ii. 421.
- In Italy, by Margaret Fuller Ossoli, ii. 389.
- Men and Times of, edited by W. C. Watson, i. 549.
- Revolutionary Romances, by W. G. Simms, ii. 258.
- Reynolds, John, God's Revenge against Murder, i. 68.
- Reynolds, J. N., i. 703.
- Rhett, R. B., on Webster's religious views, i. 719.
- Rhine, the. Theodore S. Fay, ii. 240.
- Rhode Island, Bibliography of, by John R. Bartlett, ii. 247.
- Callender's Historical Discourse, i. 134.
- History of, by S. A. Arnold, ii. 869.
- Naval History of, by John R. Bartlett, ii. 248.
- Officers, Memoirs of, by John R. Bartlett, ii. 248.
- Principles of the Colony of. John Callender, i. 134.
- Public Schools of, by Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
- Records of the Colony of, edited by John R. Bartlett, ii. 247.
- Whigs, Resolutions on James Rivington, i. 291.
- Rhododaphne, a poem, i. 795.
- Rhodopé's Sandal. Margaret J. Preston, ii. 911.
- Rhyme of the Rail. J. G. Saxe, ii. 563.
- Rhymes Atween-Times, by Thomas MacKellar, ii. 465.
- Ricardo, refutation of, by Henry C. Carey, i. 869.
- Richard Edney, by Sylvester Judd, ii. 500.
- Richards, T. W., i. 407.
- Richards, W., gift to Brown University, i. 546.
- Richardson, Joseph, commendation of his Sir Charles Grandison, by Jonathan Edwards, i. 105.
- Richter, Jean Paul, correspondence with F. Lieber, ii. 93.
- Rickman, T. C., life of Paine, quoted, i. 210.
- Ride of the Avengers. Theodore Winthrop, ii. 826.
- Rifle, Axe, and Saddle-Bags, by W. H. Milburn, ii. 810.
- Rights of Man, by Thomas Paine, i. 209.
- Rights of the British Colonies asserted and proved, by James Otis, i. 166.
- Rio Bravo, a Mexican Lament. C. F. Hoffman, ii. 321.
- RIPLEY, GEORGE, ii. 495.
- "Rise Columbia," song by R. T. Paine, Jr., i. 660.
- Rise of the Dutch Republic, by J. L. Motley, ii. 583.
- Rising, the. T. B. Read, ii. 691.
- RITCHIE, ANNA CORA MOWATT, ii. 553.
- RITENHOUSE, DAVID, i. 597.
- River of Time, the. W. W. Story, ii. 622.
- Rives, William C., i. 338.
- RIVINGTON, JAMES, i. 290.
- Advertisement Extraordinary. Francis Hopkinson, i. 293.
- Interview with Ethan Allen, i. 217.
- Rivington's Gazette, poetical extracts from, i. 456, 472, 478.
- Last Will and Testament. Philip Freneau, i. 295.
- Rob of the Bowl, by J. P. Kennedy, i. 949.

- Roba di Roma, by W. W. Story, ii. 619.
- Robbins, Asher, i. 545.
- Robbins, Chandler, defence of Cotton Mather, i. 66.
- Robert of Lincoln. William C. Bryant, i. 905.
- Roberts, John, i. 348.
- Robertson, David Steuart, ii. 580.
- Robertson, William, History of Charles V., i. 976. America, i. 977. Satirized by John Witherspoon, i. 287.
- Robespierre, interview with Thomas Cooper, ii. 141.
- Robin, Lines to a. William Clifton, i. 631. The. H. B. Hirst, ii. 502.
- Robin, Abbé, notice of Charles Thomson, i. 180.
- Robin Day, by R. M. Bird, ii. 201.
- Robin's Come. William W. Caldwell, ii. 709.
- ROBINSON, EDWARD, i. 879. Library of, acquired by Hamilton College, ii. 741.
- ROBINSON, THERESE, i. 881.
- Rook Me to Sleep, Mother. Elizabeth A. Allen, ii. 932-3.
- ROCKWELL, JAMES O., ii. 267.
- Rodgers, John, eulogy on John Witherspoon, i. 289.
- Rodolph, by E. C. Pinkney, ii. 147. Passages from. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 147.
- Roger Williams in the Forest. Job Durfee, i. 827.
- Rogers, John, i. 591.
- Rogers, John, Genealogical Account of the Family of, by J. L. Chester, ii. 447.
- ROGERS, ROBERT, i. 180.
- Rogers, Robert, the preceptor of W. E. Channing, ii. 16.
- Rogers, Samuel, Home of. H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 492.
- Roget's Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases, edited by Dr. Sears, i. 548.
- Romance Dust, by William S. Mayo, ii. 466.
- Romance of the Ring, by James Nack, ii. 482.
- Roman Lawyer in Jerusalem, by W. W. Story, ii. 620.
- ROMANS, BERNARD, i. 317.
- Rome. S. Margaret Fuller, ii. 387. H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 491. And Greece in America. C. C. Felton, ii. 804.
- Romilly, Sir Samuel, practical joke on James Boswell, ii. 142.
- Room, boys, room. C. F. Hoffman, ii. 321.
- Roorbach, O. A. Bibliotheca Americana, ii. 110.
- ROOSEVELT, ROBERT B., ii. 919.
- Rosalie. Washington Allston, ii. 21.
- ROSE, AQUILA, i. 107. S. Keimer's elegy on, i. 109, 110.
- Rose Culture. H. W. Beecher, ii. 788.
- Rose, Joseph, prints his father's poems, with a preface, i. 107.
- Rosemary, by J. V. Huntington, ii. 532.
- Roughing It, by S. L. Clemens, ii. 952.
- ROUQUETTE, ADRIAN, ii. 384.
- ROUQUETTE, FRANCOIS D., ii. 385.
- Rousseau, J. J., anecdote of, ii. 313.
- ROWSON, SUSANNA, i. 519.
- Royal, Isaac, present to Representatives' room, Massachusetts, i. 197.
- Royal Gazette, by James Rivington, i. 290.
- Rubeta, the Vision of, by Laughton Osborn, ii. 305.
- Ruggles, Samuel B., ii. 919.
- Ruins in Rome. George S. Hillard, ii. 339. Of Athens, by George Hill, ii. 113.
- Ruling Passion, passage from. R. T. Paine, Jr., i. 660.
- RUMFORD, COUNT (BENJAMIN THOMPSON), i. 385; ii. 538.
- Rumor, from Virgil, by C. P. Cranch, ii. 488.
- Rural Life in England. George Bancroft, ii. 102.
- Rural Studies, by D. G. Mitchell, ii. 684.
- RUSCHENBERGER, W. S. W., ii. 301.
- RUSH, BENJAMIN, i. 274. Address on David Rittenhouse, i. 598. Eulogium of, by David Ramsay, i. 319. Induces Charles Nisbet to remove to America, i. 752. Invites John Witherspoon to America, i. 287. Suggests T. Paine's Common Sense, i. 208.
- RUSH, DR. JAMES, i. 189; ii. 839.
- Rush, Phoebe Ann, ii. 839.
- Rush, Richard, i. 299; ii. 759.
- Russell, Benjamin, S. Woodworth apprenticed to, i. 765.
- Russell, Jonathan, educates James Otis, i. 165. And Mercy Warren, i. 173.
- Rutgers, Henry, benefactor of the College of New Jersey, i. 285.
- RUTGERS COLLEGE, i. 601. Medical College, New York, i. 821.
- Sabbath of the Year, the. Caroline May, ii. 665. The, from Krummacher. C. T. Brooks, ii. 496.
- SABINE, LORENZO, ii. 450.
- Sacerdotal Celibacy, historical sketch of, by H. C. Lea, ii. 898.
- SACRED POEMS. Advent, hymn for. William Croswell, ii. 219. Alpine Sheep, the. Maria Lowell, ii. 610. Babylonian Captivity, the. Joel Barlow, i. 409. Blessings of Christ's Universal Reign. H. Baltou, i. 621. Blind Girl, the. Caroline M. Sawyer, ii. 640. Childhood. William W. Story, ii. 619. Christian Lady, to an aged and very cheerful. F. L. Hawks, ii. 49. Paradoxes. M. Wigglesworth, i. 62. Soldier, the. M. Wigglesworth, i. 62. Church, the. Alice B. Neal, ii. 650. Description of a. Francis Hopkinson, i. 227. Militant, the, passage from. Wm. Vaughan, i. 2. Conflagration, the. Mather Byles, i. 180. Contemplations. Anne Bradstreet, i. 54. Daughter, the, of Herodias. Lucy Hooper, ii. 644. Death of a young child. J. H. Perkins, ii. 392. To Urania, on the, of her first and only child. Benjamin Colman, i. 79. On the, of his Daughter. Cotton Mather, i. 71. On the, of his son. Cotton Mather, i. 71. On the, of Rev. Dr. Sewall, 1769. Phyllis Wheatley, i. 384. On the, of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield. Phyllis Wheatley, i. 385. Dedication Hymn. John Pierpont, i. 767. Dominum collaudamus. Peleg Folger, i. 193. Elijah's Ascension. Benjamin Colman, i. 79. Epitaph, an, for an infant. Francis Hopkinson, i. 228. Evening. G. W. Doane, ii. 79. Fisherman's Hymn. Alexander Wilson, i. 575. Flesh, the, and the Spirit. Anne Bradstreet, i. 57. Funeral Dirge. Andrews Norton, i. 778. Have Faith. Frederick Knight, i. 872. He standeth at the door and knocketh. A. C. Coxe, ii. 605. Hymn. N. L. Frothingham, ii. 84. Andrews Norton, i. 778. Jane Turell, i. 184. A Morning. Francis Hopkinson, i. 227. An Evening. Francis Hopkinson, i. 228. For the Fourth of July. F. S. Key, i. 698. Of the Reapers. H. F. Gould, ii. 348. On the Ascension, from the Spanish. George Ticknor, i. 972. Written during a voyage. Mather Byles, i. 131. Hymns. National Judgments deprecated, and National Mercies pleaded. Samuel Davies, i. 282.

- Hymns. William H. Furness, ii. 137, 138.
 I would not live alway. William A. Muhlenberg, ii. 39.
 Invocation to the Almighty. J. B. Ladd, i. 533.
 Jeremiah x. 17. Mary E. Brooks, ii. 131.
 Last Legacy to an Only Child. Hugh Peters, i. 200.
 Laurel Hill Cemetery, lines written at. Willis G. Clark, ii. 401.
 Lines. Governor Dudley, i. 52.
 March, the. A. C. Coxe, ii. 605.
 McLean Asylum, Somerville, Massachusetts. N. L. Frothingham, ii. 34.
 Midnight. William W. Story, ii. 619.
 Moonlight on the Grave. Jane T. Worthington, ii. 643.
 New England Hymn. Mather Byles, i. 130.
 Ode. Joseph Green, i. 133.
 Ordinal, the. William Croswell, ii. 216.
 Prayer unto Christ, a. M. Wigglesworth, i. 63.
 Psalm xviii. Bay Psalm Book, i. 22.
 xlvii. George Burgess, ii. 383.
 cxxxvii. Timothy Dwight, i. 372.
 Of Life. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 276.
 Quest of the Soul. Sarah H. Whitman, ii. 331.
 Reflections, by Roger Williams, i. 38.
 Snowfall, The First. J. R. Lowell, ii. 612.
 Society. John Adams, i. 143.
 Song of Degrees, a. Bay Psalm Book, i. 22.
 Of Emptiness, a. M. Wigglesworth, i. 63.
 Sunday in Summer. McDonald Clarke, ii. 42.
 School. William B. Tappan, ii. 203.
 Sunset, a. Thomas Cole, ii. 127.
 Tallulah Falls, Georgia, lines on visiting. S. G. Bulfinch, ii. 345.
 Thankful Acknowledgment, a, of God's Providence. John Cotton, i. 27.
 They are passing away. R. M. Charlton, ii. 265.
 This also shall pass away. William Croswell, ii. 218.
 Thoughts for the City. B. D. Winslow, ii. 534.
 To my honored father on the loss of his sight. John Adams, i. 144.
 Traveller's Hymn. William Croswell, ii. 219.
 Tread of Time, the. Thomas Cole, ii. 127.
 Trinity, Old. A. C. Coxe, ii. 605.
 True Christian, the. Elijah Fitch, i. 203.
 Twilight. Thomas Cole, ii. 127.
 Two Angels, the. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 610.
 Verses to the Lady Mildmay. A. Winthrop, i. 30.
 Village Clergyman, the. Timothy Dwight, i. 378.
 Wedding Ring, on a very old. G. W. Doane, ii. 78.
 What is the Use? Erastus W. Ellsworth, ii. 707.
 Wounded Spirit, a, who can bear? Roger Wolcott, i. 84.
 Sad Country, the. W. W. Story, ii. 622.
 Sadi, the Persian poet, i. 120.
 Sadleir, Anne, Correspondence with Roger Williams, i. 39.
 Sagacity of Lobsters. H. A. Wise, ii. 635.
 Sage, Henry W., i. 101.
 Salauder and the Dragon, by F. W. Shelton, ii. 567.
 Salem Witchcraft, i. 66.
 SALISBURY, EDWARD E., i. 96.
 Salmagundi, ii. 2.
 By Irving and Paulding, i. 737.
 English reprint of, ii. 65.
 Salmon River. J. G. C. Brainard, i. 968.
 Salt Box, Philosophy of a. Francis Hopkinson, i. 223.
 Saltonstall, Gov., i. 92.
 Sampson, Deborah, Memoir by C. A. Vinton, ii. 450.
 Sampson, Ezra, ii. 216.
 Sanctify Thy Name. R. T. Conrad, ii. 419.
 Sanders, Daniel C., first president of University of Vermont, i. 832.
 SANDERSON, JOHN, i. 735.
 SANDS, ROBERT C., ii. 56.
 SANDYS, GEORGE, i. 1.
 SANFORD, EDWARD, ii. 234.
 Sanford, Joseph, Memoir by Robert Baird, i. 948.
 Sanger, George P., ii. 653.
 Sannazarius, Piscatory Eclogues of, translated by S. L. Mitchill, i. 537.
 Saranacs, Summer in the, by A. B. Street, ii. 437.
 SARGENT, EPES, ii. 569.
 Memoir of B. Franklin, quoted, i. 120.
 SARGENT, JOHN O., ii. 569.
 SARGENT, LUCIUS M., ii. 68.
 SARGENT, WINTHROP, ii. 68.
 History of Braddock's Expedition, quoted, i. 447.
 Sarmiento, D. F., i. 963.
 Sartwell, H. P., ii. 741.
 Saturday Afternoon. N. P. Willis, ii. 274.
 Saul, by A. C. Coxe, ii. 604.
 Saunders, R., president of William and Mary, i. 89.
 Saunterings, by C. D. Warner, ii. 914.
 SAVAGE, JAMES, ii. 46.
 SAVAGE, JOHN, ii. 823.
 SAWYER, CAROLINE M., ii. 639.
 Sawyer, Mrs., benefactor of Frederick Knight, i. 170.
 SAXE, JOHN G., ii. 563.
 Saxe Weimar, Duke of, notice of David Hosack, i. 595.
 SAY, THOMAS, ii. 477.
 Sayings of Dr. Bushwhacker, by F. S. Cozzens, ii. 698.
 Scandella, J. B., i. 624.
 Scarlet Letter, the, by N. Hawthorne, ii. 356.
 Scene after a Summer Shower. Andrews Norton, i. 777.
 Scenery Showing, by Warren Burton, ii. 446.
 Scenes and Incidents in the Life of the Apostle Paul, by Albert Barnes, ii. 50.
 SCHAFF, PHILIP, ii. 606.
 Schamyl, Life of, by J. M. Mackie, ii. 483.
 Schiller, lectures on, by Charles Follen, i. 987.
 Schiller's Love of Liberty. Charles Follen, i. 987.
 Schlatter, Michael, Life, by Henry Harbaugh, ii. 780.
 SCHMUCKER, SAMUEL MOSHEIM, ii. 795.
 Scholar, the American, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 763.
 Scholarship. A. Bronson Alcott, ii. 843.
 School Architecture, by Henry Barnard, ii. 535.
 School Committee-Man, a, and a Lawsuit. D. P. Thompson, i. 945.
 School for Politics, by C. E. Gayarré, ii. 227.
 School-House, the. A. B. Street, ii. 439.
 SCHOOLCRAFT, HENRY R., i. 859.
 Schoolmaster, the. Alexander Wilson, i. 571.
 SCHROEDER, JOHN FREDERICK, i. 734.
 Schuyler, George L., Reply to strictures of George Bancroft on General Philip Schuyler, ii. 106.
 Schuyler, Gen. Philip, an early friend of Union College, i. 917.
 Life and Times of, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 393.
 Schuylkill River, poetical description of, by Aquila Rose, i. 108.
 Science, Objects and Limits of. R. C. Winthrop, ii. 347
 Scientific School at Harvard, i. 14.
 Scotch Clergyman, anecdote of a, i. 305.
 Scott, Sir Walter, indebted to Philip Freneau for a Simile, i. 349.
 At Abbotsford in 1818. Edward Everett, i. 889.
 Intercourse of Washington Irving with, i. 738.
 Mention of George Ticknor and J. G. Cogswell, i. 969.
 Story of his Life, by R. S. Mackenzie, ii. 816.
 Tribute to, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 350.
 SCOTROW, JOSHUA, i. 52.
 Scribner, Charles, ii. 838.
 Scripture Illustrations, by George Bush, i. 964.
 Scriptures, Sacred, MS. Illustrations of the, by Cotton Mather, i. 69.

- Sea Bird's Song, the. J. G. C. Brainard, i. 969.
- Sea Grammar, a, by Capt. John Smith, i. 6.
- Sea Lions, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 811.
- Sea Marke, the, a poem. Capt. John Smith, i. 7.
- Sea, the. W. E. Channing, ii. 470.
- Seaboard Slave States, journey in, by F. L. Olmsted, ii. 822.
- SEABURY, SAMUEL, i. 172.
- SEABURY, SAMUEL, JR., ii. 118.
- Seaman, John E., i. 849.
- Seaman's Manual, by R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 547.
- SEARS, DR. BARNAS, i. 547.
- Sears, Isaac, destroys J. Rivington's press, i. 290.
- Seasons, the. Edward Maturin, ii. 667.
- SEECOMB, JOHN, i. 186.
- Secession, articles against, by Wm. Elliot, i. 799.
- Second War between the United States and Great Britain, history of, by C. J. Ingersoll, i. 730.
- SEDGWICK, CATHARINE M., ii. 81.
Life of L. M. Davidson, ii. 328.
- SEDGWICK, THEODORE, ii. 81.
- Sedgwick, Theodore, Jr., ii. 82.
Memoir of W. Livingston, i. 163.
- Sedition Law, passages from speech in favor of. R. G. Harper, i. 666.
- Self-culture, by W. E. Channing, i. 710.
- Self-taught Men, Biography of, by S. G. Brown, ii. 742.
- Selfish Man's prayer on the prospect of war. St. John Honeywood, i. 531.
- Senator in Rome, the. James De Mille, ii. 935.
- Seneca Lake, to. J. G. Percival, i. 942.
- Senter, Isaac, i. 523.
- Sentimental Epicure's Ordinary, ii. 2.
- Septimius Felton, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 368.
- Sepulchre in the Garden. H. W. Beecher, ii. 787.
- Sermons by H. W. Beecher, ii. 168, 783.
For Children, by John N. Norton, ii. 795.
For the New Life, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
On Living Subjects, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
To the Natural Man, by W. G. T. Shedd, ii. 793.
To the People, by F. D. Huntington, ii. 794.
- Serpent Symbol, the, by E. G. Squier, ii. 673.
- Servian Songs, collection of, by Therese von Jakob, i. 881.
- Settler, the. A. B. Street, ii. 435.
- Seventh Regiment, History of the, by W. Swinton, ii. 836.
- Seven Stories, by D. G. Mitchell, ii. 684.
- Seventy-Six, by John Neal, i. 874.
- Sewall, Rev. Dr., lines on the death of, 1769.
Phyllis Wheatley, i. 384.
- SEWALL, JONATHAN MITCHEL, i. 300.
- SEWALL, STEPHEN, i. 12.
- SEWARD, WM. H., ii. 133.
Memorial Address on, by Charles Francis Adams, ii. 852.
- Seybert, Adam, i. 600.
- Shade of Plato, a poem, extracts from. David Hitchcock, i. 657.
- Shadow of the Obelisk, by T. W. Parsons, ii. 581.
- Shakers, the, at Hancock. C. M. Sedgwick, ii. 83.
- Shakespeare, William, mention of America, i. 6.
Edition of, by G. C. Verplanck, i. 762.
Lectures on, by H. N. Hudson, ii. 511.
Life of, by H. N. Hudson, ii. 512.
Ode to, A. J. Requier, ii. 735.
Once More. J. R. Lowell, ii. 616.
Tempest, origin of, in Purchas, i. 8.
Works of, edited by H. N. Hudson, ii. 511.
Works of, edited by R. G. White, ii. 870.
- Shakespeare's Creative Genius. R. G. White, ii. 872.
- Shark Story, a. Wm. P. Hawes, ii. 175.
- SHARSWOOD, GEORGE, ii. 856.
- Sharswood, James, ii. 856.
- SHAW, JOHN, i. 684.
- Shaw, Journal of Major Samuel, edited by Josiah Quincy, i. 635.
- Shaw, Lemuel, i. 835.
- She blooms no more. Sarah H. Whitman, ii. 334.
- She comes to me, ii. 651.
- She loves him yet. Frances S. Osgood, ii. 458.
- SHEA, JOHN GILMARY, ii. 832.
- Sheaf of Verse, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 493.
- SHEDD, WILLIAM G. T., ii. 792.
- Sheffield, Joseph E., i. 98.
- Sheffield Scientific School, i. 98, 101.
- Shelburne, Earl of, letter to by T. Paine, quoted, i. 210.
- SHELTON, F. W., ii. 566.
- Shenstone, W., verses in a blank book which once belonged to. Francis Hopkinson, i. 227.
- SHEPARD, THOMAS, i. 47.
Account of Eliot's Indian Missions, i. 45.
Elegy on, passage from. Urian Oakes, i. 9.
Epigram on translators of the Psalms, i. 21.
Passage from his Autobiography, i. 48.
Tracts translated in Indian Language by John Eliot, i. 46.
- SHEPPARD, JOHN H., ii. 480.
- Sheppard Lee, by R. M. Bird, ii. 200.
- Sheridan's Ride. T. B. Read, ii. 691.
- Sherman, John, i. 51.
- Shields, Prof. Charles Woodruff, i. 236.
- Shillaber, Benjamin P., ii. 920.
- Ship and Shore, by Walter Colton, ii. 23.
- Ship Canal, the Panama. F. Leber, ii. 97.
- Shipley, Jonathan, Bp. of St. Asaph, i. 117.
Latin Motto to Franklin's Portrait, i. 120.
Prophecy of America, i. 179.
- Shipman, Caleb L., i. 285.
- Short, Prof. Charles, i. 402.
- SIBLEY, JOHN L., i. 15, 18.
- Sidney, Sir Philip, contemplated voyage to America, i. 6.
Elegy on, by Anne Bradstreet, i. 54.
- Siege of Boston, history of the, by Richard Frothingham, Jr., ii. 84.
- Sights from a Steeple. N. Hawthorne, ii. 361.
- Sigourney, Charles, i. 839.
- SIGOURNEY, LYDIA H., i. 838.
- Silent Partner, the, by Elizabeth S. Phelps, ii. 993.
- Silesia, letters on, by J. Q. Adams, i. 578.
- Silk culture in Georgia, history of, by Wm. B. Stevens, ii. 861.
- SILLIMAN, BENJ., i. 94, 99.
- Silliman, Benj., Jr., i. 96.
- Silliman's Journal, ii. 77.
- Silver Bluff on the Savannah, ii. 263.
- SIMMONS, JAMES W., ii. 456.
- SIMMONS, WM. H., ii. 455.
- SIMMS, WM. GILMORE, ii. 257.
Anecdotes of Mason L. Weems, i. 504.
Notice of Beverly Tucker, i. 694.
War Poetry of the South (edited), ii. 260.
- Simms, W. G., Sr., ii. 257.
- Simonds, Ephraim, funeral oration on, by Daniel Webster, i. 717.
- Simple Cobler of Agawam, the, by N. Ward, i. 23.
- Simple Cobler's Boy, by N. Ward, i. 25.
- Simplicities Defence against Seven Headed Policy, by Samuel Gorton, i. 44.
- Simpson, Henry, "Lives of Eminent Philadelphians," ii. 856.
- Sinclair, Sir John, letters of Washington to, i. 100.
- Singing on the Way. T. MacKellar, ii. 464.
- Siuless Child, the, by Elizabeth Oakes Smith, ii. 459.
- Siris, by G. Berkeley, i. 178.
- Sisyphi Opus*, a Touch at the Times, by Robert Wain, ii. 38.

- Six Months in Italy, by George S. Hillard, ii. 339.
 Six of One by Half a Dozen of the Other, ii. 873.
 Sketch Book, by Washington Irving, i. 738.
 Sketch of Old England, by J. K. Paulding, ii. 3.
 Sketches of European Capitals, by Wm. Ware, i. 891.
 Sketches of Paris, by John Sanderson, i. 735.
 Sketches of Switzerland, by J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
 Skip's Lust Advice. Robert Dinsmoor, i. 483.
 Sky Walk, by C. B. Brown, i. 610.
 SLAFTER, EDMUND FARWELL, ii. 865.
 Slave Power in America, History of the Rise and Fall of the, by Henry Wilson, ii. 804.
 Slavery of the Africans, dialogue on, by Samuel Hopkins, i. 161.
 Slavery Extension, a History of the Struggle for, by Horace Greeley, ii. 420.
 Slavery, Testimonies concerning, by M. D. Conway, ii. 929.
 Slavic Language and Literature, by Mrs. E. Robinson, i. 881.
 Small, William, i. 249.
 Professor of Mathematics at William and Mary, i. 90.
 Snibert, John, i. 176.
 SMITH, BUCKINGHAM, ii. 837.
 SMITH, CAPT. JOHN, i. 5.
 Life by W. G. Simms, ii. 259.
 Will of, edited by Chas. Deane, ii. 546.
 Smith, Dr. ASA DODGE, i. 553.
 Smith, Eli, i. 880.
 SMITH, ELIHU H., i. 623.
 SMITH, ELIZABETH OAKES, ii. 459.
 Smith, Henry B., ii. 608.
 Smith, James, signer of the Declaration of Independence. Alexander Graydon, i. 369.
 Smith, John Augustine, president of William and Mary, i. 90.
 Smith, John B., first president of Union, i. 286, 917.
 SMITH, JOHN JAY, i. 189.
 Smith, Lloyd P., i. 189.
 SMITH, RICHARD PENN, ii. 204.
 Smith, Robert, principal of College of Charleston, ii. 138.
 SMITH, SAMUEL FRANCIS, ii. 852.
 SMITH, SAMUEL STANHOPE, i. 284.
 SMITH, SEBA, ii. 459.
 SMITH, WILLIAM, i. 404, 407, 548.
 Smith, William H., ii. 642.
 Smith, Wit and Wisdom of Sydney, edited by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
 Smith, Worthington, president of University of Vt., i. 834.
 Smithson, James, ii. 758.
 SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION, ii. 758, 846.
 Smoking and Drinking, by James Parton, ii. 804.
 Snare Broken, the, a sermon, passage from. Jonathan Mayhew, i. 155.
 Snow. Ralph Hoyt, ii. 397.
 Snow-Bound, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 815.
 Snowdrop. W. W. Story, ii. 622.
 Snow-Flake falling on a Lady's Breast. Wm. M. Johnson, i. 608.
 Snow-Flakes, the. Caroline Lee Hentz, ii. 330.
 Social Science, an Introduction to, by G. H. Calvert, ii. 196.
 Social Science, Principles of, by H. C. Carey, i. 868.
 Society and Solitude, by R. W. Emerson, ii. 190.
 Society, poem on. John Adams, i. 143.
 Solitude. James Hall, i. 855.
 Solitude. Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 842.
 Solitudes of Nature, by W. R. Alger, ii. 796.
 Solomon's Song, translated and explained, by Leonard Withington, ii. 46.
 Song and Instinct. Hector St. John, i. 185.
 Song at Mare Mount. Thomas Morton, i. 33.
 Song of a Spirit. Thomas Cole, ii. 127.
 Song of Israel. W. W. Story, ii. 621.
 Song of Marion's Men. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 904.
 Song of the Bell, translated by Wm. H. Furness, ii. 137.
 Song of the Sower, by Wm. C. Bryant, i. 907.
 Song Writers of America, by G. P. Morris, ii. 157.
 SONGS:
 Absent Father. Hew Ainslie, i. 873.
 Alice Lee. G. W. Bethune, ii. 232.
 America, Commerce, and Freedom. Susanna Rowson, i. 521.
 American Flag, the. J. R. Drake, i. 932.
 Any. J. M. Legaré, ii. 734.
 Bacchanalian Song, imitated from the French. Edward Sanford, ii. 236.
 Bedouin Song. Bayard Taylor, ii. 714.
 Boston Centennial Ode. John Pierpont, i. 767.
 Connel and Flora. Alexander Wilson, i. 573.
 Death of Warren. Epes Sargent, ii. 571.
 Defenders of New Orleans, to the. J. R. Drake, i. 930.
 Dithyrambic on Wine, a. Thomas Godfrey, i. 206.
 Forefathers' Song, i. 73.
 Friendship, Love, Wine, and a Song. Wm. Clifton, i. 632.
 From the Castle in the Air to the Little Corner of the World. Thomas Paine, i. 215.
 Guillotine Song, attributed to Joel Barlow, i. 410.
 Hail Columbia. Joseph Hopkinson, i. 606.
 Hail Independence. Wm. Ray, i. 631.
 Health, a. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 150.
 Home, Sweet Home. John Howard Payne, i. 851.
 How stands the Glass around? General Wolfe, i. 448.
 Hunting Song. Robert Waln, ii. 38.
 Independent Farmer, the. Susanna Rowson, i. 520.
 Ingle Side, the. Hew Ainslie, i. 873.
 Iron Greys. F. G. Halleck, i. 932.
 Lewis, Meriwether, song on the discoveries of, Joel Barlow, i. 411.
 Liberty Tree. Thomas Paine, i. 215.
 Life on the Ocean Wave, a. Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 Love, the leaves are falling round thee. Robt. S. Coffin, ii. 33.
 Love and Liberty. Royal Tyler, i. 845.
 Love rejected. Wm. Leggett, ii. 152.
 Marion's Men, song of. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 904.
 Mary. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 150.
 Matrimonial Happiness. John Lapraik, i. 272.
 Mechanic's Song, the. B. Franklin, i. 125.
 Mother Country, the. B. Franklin, i. 125.
 Music, from Fanny. F. G. Halleck, i. 934.
 Mutual Love. Wiccamaical Chaplet, i. 273.
 My Love to Her. R. K. Weeks, ii. 987.
 My plain Country Joan. B. Franklin, i. 123.
 National Peace, Song for the Public Celebration of the. Sarah W. Morton, i. 500.
 Near the Lake. G. P. Morris, ii. 159.
 New, the, and the Old Song. J. K. Mitchell, ii. 204.
 Oh, the Spring has come again, Love. J. Lawrence, Jr., ii. 302.
 Old Oaken Bucket, the. S. Woodworth, i. 766.
 Old Year, Song of the. J. V. Huntington, ii. 532.
 Picture Song, a. E. C. Pinkney, ii. 150.
 Pillar of Glory, the. E. C. Holland, i. 845.
 Platonic Bacchanal Song, a. J. G. Percival, i. 941.
 Pride of the Valley, the. S. Woodworth, i. 765.
 Sea Bird's Song, the. J. G. C. Brainerd, i. 969.
 Serenade, the. J. G. Percival, i. 941.
 She Loves him yet. Frances S. Osgood, ii. 458.
 Shepherd, the. D. Humphreys, i. 392.
 Sleighting Song, the. John Shaw, i. 685.
 Social Fire, around a. J. L. Arnold, i. 550.

- Soldier, the. J. Q. Adams, i. 579.
 Sparkling and Bright. C. F. Hoffman, ii. 320.
 Stanzas. St. George Tucker, i. 246.
 Star Spangled Banner. F. S. Key, i. 692.
 'Tis said that Absence conquers Love. F. W. Thomas, ii. 420.
 To * * * *. F. G. Halleck, i. 934.
 War and Washington. J. M. Sewall, i. 802.
 War Song from Ponteach. Robert Rogers, i. 181.
 Of the Revolution. John Neal, i. 875.
 Whaling Song. John Osborn, i. 142.
 When Spring arrayed in flowers, Mary. James Lawson, ii. 66.
 When the warrior returns. F. S. Key, i. 692.
 Woodman, spare that Tree. G. P. Morris, ii. 158.
 Young Thyrsis. Thomas Godfrey, i. 206.
 Zophiel, song from. Maria Brooks, i. 926.
- Songs, by Hew Ainslie, i. 873.
 By the Way, by G. W. Doane, ii. 78.
 Of the Sea, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 Of Praise, edited by Henry Coppée, ii. 810.
 Of the Sierras, by Joaquin Miller, ii. 989.
- SONNETS:
 Amulet, the. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 830.
 Clam, to a. J. G. Saxe, ii. 564.
 Cole, Thomas. W. C. Bryant, ii. 126.
 Day. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Henry Howard Brownell. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 895.
 Indolence. Park Benjamin, ii. 345.
 "In the Springtime." R. K. Weeks, ii. 938.
 Jackson, Andrew. James Lawson, ii. 66.
 Latter Rain, the. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Liberty. Geo. Hill, ii. 114.
 Morrow, the. Margaret J. Preston, ii. 913.
 Nature. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 New Birth, the. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Night. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Noyes' Translation of the Prophets, on the completion of. Henry Ware, Jr., i. 890.
J. G. Percival, i. 943.
 Reproach of Venus, the. Laughton Osborn, ii. 306.
 Retirement. J. R. Drake, i. 930.
 Sport. Park Benjamin, ii. 345.
 Summer's Dead. Paul H. Hayne, ii. 736.
 Tasso. R. H. Wild, i. 806.
 Wind-Flower, the. Jones Very, ii. 386.
 Woman's wounded name. Susanna Rowson, i. 520.
- Sophocles, Prof. Evangelinus A., i. 17.
 "Sorsis," of New York City, ii. 920.
 Soundings from the Atlantic, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 374.
 South, the, by J. T. Trowbridge, ii. 903.
 South Carolina, history of and its revolution, by David Ramsay, i. 318.
 Historical View of, by James Drayton, i. 240.
 History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in, by F. Dalcho, i. 596.
- SOUTH CAROLINA COLLEGE, ii. 138.
 South Coast Saunterings in England, by M. D. Conway, ii. 930.
 Southern and Western Review, ii. 259.
 Southern Literary Messenger, ii. 403.
 Southern Quarterly Review, ii. 259.
 Southern Review, i. 626, 806; ii. 25.
 Southey, Caroline, lines to Mrs. M. M. Davidson, ii. 323.
 Southey, Robert, copy of the Simple Cobbler, i. 24.
 Notice of the Davidsons, ii. 828.
 Opinion of Maria Brooks, i. 923.
- Southwick, Solomon, gift to the Redwood Library, i. 298.
- SOUTHWORTH, EMMA D. E. N., ii. 555.
 Souvenir de Kentucky. A. Rouquette, ii. 384.
 Spain, Reminiscences of, by Caleb Cushing, ii. 80.
- Spain Revisited, by A. S. Mackenzie, ii. 178.
 Spanish Armada, the. John Lathrop Motley, ii. 587.
 Bull-Fight. John P. Kennedy, i. 953.
 Literature, history of, by George Ticknor, i. 970.
 Literature, the author's Key-note to. Geo. Ticknor, i. 971.
 Love Ballad, from the Romancero of Pedro Flores. George Ticknor, i. 971.
 Papers, by Washington Irving, i. 750.
 Sparkling and Bright. C. F. Hoffman, ii. 320.
- SPARKS, JARED, i. 877.
 Letters of Washington, i. 189.
 Memoir, by Brantz Mayer, ii. 380.
 Memoir, by G. E. Ellis, ii. 538.
 Notices of B. Franklin, i. 114, 116, 118, 124.
 Reversion of Manuscripts to Harvard, i. 20.
 Tribute to, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 350.
- Sparrow, the. Robert Dinsmoor, i. 484.
 Sparrowgrass Papers, the, by F. S. Cozzens, ii. 692.
 Spartacus, by R. M. Bird, ii. 200.
 Speakman, John, founder of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, ii. 477.
 Specimens of American Poetry, by Samuel Kettell, ii. 76.
 Spectator, influence of the, in American Literature, i. 115.
- SPEECH, CONRAD, i. 623.
 Speeches and Addresses, by John A. Dix, ii. 842.
 Spelling Down the Master. Edward Eggleston, ii. 971.
- SPENCER, JESSE A., ii. 566.
 Sphinx, the. William Henry Burleigh, ii. 859.
 Spinning. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 924.
 Spirit of Jefferson. Theodore Parker, ii. 442.
 Spirit of Poetry, to the. Frances S. Osgood, ii. 457.
 The. J. G. Percival, i. 940.
 The, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Spirit of Song, the. Elizabeth C. Kinney, ii. 653.
 Spirit Rapper, the, by O. A. Brownson, ii. 145.
 Spirits of the Wilderness, the, by Thomas Cole, ii. 126.
- SPOFFORD, HARRIET P., ii. 951.
 Spondee's Mistresses. Royal Tyler, i. 434.
 Sport. Park Benjamin, ii. 345.
 Sporting Scenes and Sketches, by Wm. P. Hawes, ii. 172.
- Spottswood, Gov., efforts in behalf of Indian Education, poetically described, i. 88.
 Aid to William and Mary College, i. 87.
- SPRAGUE, CHARLES, i. 835.
 SPRAGUE, CHARLES J., i. 838.
 SPRAGUE, WILLIAM B., i. 707.
 Life of Timothy Dwight, i. 373.
- SPRING, GARDINER, i. 775.
James O. Rockwell, ii. 268.
William M. Johnson, i. 608.
Henry Timrod, i. 847.
N. P. Willis, ii. 274.
- Spring is coming. Hugh Moore, ii. 341.
 In New England. Carlos Wilcox, i. 898.
 Of Water in Kings County, L. I., on a. Samuel Low, i. 555.
 On the return of. Cynthia Taggart, ii. 163.
 Time. Caroline H. Glover, i. 897.
- Spy, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 807.
- SQUIER, E. G., ii. 671.
 Squier, Phillip, ii. 671.
 Squier, Samuel, ii. 671.
- St. Catharine's. Philip Frenau, i. 856.
 St. Genevieve on the Mississippi. H. M. Brackenridge, i. 700.
 St. James's Park. T. W. Parsons, ii. 581.
 St. John, Hector, account of John Bartram, i. 234.
 St. John, Samuel, American Taxation, i. 478.
 ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, MARYLAND, i. 771.
 St. Leger, by Richard B. Kimball, ii. 641.

- St. Peter's, the interior of. H. B. Wallace, ii. 577.
- St. Thomas Hall, ii. 46.
- Stamp Act, newspaper collection relating to, by Ezra Stiles at Yale College, i. 96.
- Sermon on the repeal of the, passage from. Jonathan Mayhew, i. 155.
- Reception of, in America. John Adams, i. 196.
- Standish, Miles, the Courtship of, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 282.
- Stanton, Prof. B. N., i. 921.
- Stanzas. J. G. C. Brainard, i. 969.
- James G. Brooks*, ii. 182.
- Star in the West, by Elias Boudinot, i. 246.
- Star Papers, by H. W. Beecher, ii. 782.
- State Sovereignty. J. C. Calhoun, i. 724.
- State Triumvirate, the, i. 761.
- Stearns, J. F., Discourse on the Presbyterian Church, Newark, i. 281.
- Stearns, William A., president of Amherst College, i. 863.
- Stebbins, Rufus P., i. 17.
- STEDMAN, EDMUND CLARENCE, ii. 943.
- STEPHENS, JOHN L., ii. 248.
- STEPHENS, ANN S., ii. 895.
- Stereotyping, letter of C. Colden to B. Franklin, i. 86.
- Sterne, Lawrence, his acquaintance with Elizabeth Ferguson, i. 248.
- Sternhold and Hopkins, version of the Psalms in England, 1549, i. 20.
- First American edition, i. 22.
- Stethoscope Song, by O. W. Holmes, ii. 869.
- Stetson, Charles A., remarks on Dan. Webster, i. 720.
- Stewart's Burial. T. W. Parsons, ii. 580.
- Steuben, Baron, induces Peter S. Du Ponceau to emigrate to America, i. 599.
- STEVENS, ABEL, ii. 777.
- Stevens, John, collection of Voyages and Travels, i. 141.
- STEVENS, WILLIAM BACON, ii. 861.
- STILES, EZRA, i. 168, 530.
- Consults the Redwood Library, i. 298.
- Marriage of his daughter to Abiel Holmes, i. 580.
- Notice in his diary of President Williams, i. 93.
- Notice of B. Franklin's religious opinions, i. 119.
- Notice of J. Galloway, i. 183.
- Notice of President Clap, i. 93.
- Notice of the last of the Gortonists, i. 44.
- Tribute to the Rev. Timothy Cutler, i. 92.
- Still Day in Autumn, a. Sarah H. Whitman, ii. 334.
- Stillé, Dr. Alfred, i. 407.
- Stillé, Prof. Charles Janeway, i. 407.
- Stith, William, president of William and Mary, i. 89.
- STOCKTON, FRANK R., ii. 949.
- Stockton, Richard, ii. 850.
- STODDARD, RICHARD HENRY, ii. 722.
- Stoddard, Solomon, i. 102.
- STONE, JOHN A., ii. 65.
- STONE, SAMUEL, i. 51.
- Lines on. E. B. (Wakley), i. 51.
- STONE, W. L., i. 858.
- Stonewall Jackson, Biography, by J. E. Cooke, ii. 575.
- Stonewall Jackson as a Soldier. J. E. Cooke, ii. 575.
- Stork, William, i. 234.
- Storm, on a. Cynthia Taggart, ii. 168.
- Storming of the Bastille, by John S. C. Abbott, ii. 165.
- Story, Elisha, ii. 14.
- STORY, ISAAC, i. 661.
- STORY, JOSEPH, ii. 14.
- Contributes to the Encyclopædia Americana, ii. 94.
- Life of, by William W. Story, ii. 619.
- Notice of William Pinkney, i. 691.
- Obituary notice of Isaac Story, i. 662.
- STORY, WILLIAM W., ii. 618.
- Life of Joseph Story, ii. 15.
- Story of a Bad Boy, by T. B. Aldrich, ii. 830.
- Stoughton, E. W., i. 554.
- Stoughton, William, bequest to Harvard, i. 9.
- Stout Gentleman, the. Washington Irving, i. 748.
- STOWE, CALVIN E., ii. 522, 526.
- STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER, ii. 522.
- Notice of H. W. Beecher, ii. 783.
- STRACHEY, WILLIAM, i. 7.
- STRAIN, ISAAC G., ii. 770.
- Strawberry Girl, the, from Fashion and Famine. Ann S. Stephens, ii. 895.
- Strays, the. Wm. B. Wright, ii. 986.
- STREET, ALFRED B., ii. 434.
- Street, Augustus R., i. 98, 101.
- Strength from the Hills. Elizabeth O. Smith, ii. 459.
- Strike. Ralph Hoyt, ii. 399.
- STRONG, JAMES, ii. 878.
- Stuart, Dugald, tribute to Jonathan Edwards, i. 104.
- STUART, MOSES, i. 708.
- Assisted by Edward Robinson, i. 879.
- Student Life, by Samuel Osgood, ii. 475.
- Student's Life described. John Norton, i. 28.
- Companion, the, by the Knights of the Round Table, at Yale, i. 97.
- Studies in Church History, by H. C. Lea, ii. 898.
- Study. Orville Dewey, i. 876.
- STUPER, HENRY, i. 117.
- Suburban Sketches, by Wm. D. Howells, ii. 960.
- Success and its Conditions, by E. P. Whipple, ii. 627.
- Suffolk Surnames, by Nathaniel I. Bowditch, ii. 77.
- Sukey, by William B. Walter, ii. 70.
- Sullivan, John T. S., life of William Sullivan, i. 664.
- SULLIVAN, WILLIAM, i. 664.
- Sully, Thomas, notice of C. B. Brown, i. 611.
- Summer Midnight, the. J. W. Eastburn, ii. 56.
- On the Lakes. S. Margaret Fuller, ii. 389.
- Summer Storm, the. Alice Cary, ii. 662.
- Summer's dead. Paul H. Hayne, ii. 736.
- SUMNER, CHARLES, ii. 411.
- Notice of John Pickering, i. 652.
- SUMNER, CHARLES PINCKNEY, ii. 411.
- SUMNER, GEORGE, ii. 412.
- Sumner, Horace, ii. 389.
- Sunday in Summer. McDonald Clarke, ii. 42.
- Scene, a., at the South. William J. Grayson, i. 800.
- School Hymn, a. William Crosswell, ii. 219.
- School, the. William B. Tappan, ii. 208.
- Sunland Songs, by Joaquin Miller, ii. 989.
- Sunlight and Starlight. A. D. T. Whitney, ii. 889.
- Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 528.
- Sunnyside, i. 740.
- Sunrise, from Mt. Washington. Rufus Dawes, ii. 164.
- Sunset, a. Thomas Cole, ii. 127.
- Sunshine in Thought, by C. G. Leland, ii. 828.
- Supernaturalism of New England, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 312.
- Superstition and Force. H. C. Lea, ii. 898.
- Superstition, Indian. David Brainard, i. 153.
- Superstitions of New England. E. Turall, i. 135.
- Supplication of J. R. (ivington), passages from. John Witherspoon, i. 291.
- Susquehanna, the. Elihu G. Holland, ii. 578.
- Home on the. Alexander Wilson, i. 572.
- Swain, David L., i. 801.
- Swallow Barn, by J. P. Kennedy, i. 949.
- Description of. J. P. Kennedy, i. 950.
- Swan, to a. L. L. Noble, ii. 508.
- Swedenborg, E., i. 964.
- Swedenborg, the Secret of, by Henry James, ii. 515.
- Swift, Jonathan, proposed bishop of Virginia, i. 83.
- Swingin' Round the Circle, by D. R. Locke, ii. 943.
- SWINTON, WILLIAM, ii. 886.
- Swiss Landscape, elements of the. G. B. Cheever, ii. 294.

- Sword and the Staff. George P. Morris, ii. 160.
 Sydserfe, Walter, i. 187.
 Sylphs of the Season, by Allston, ii. 16.
 Sylvester, Joshua, translation of Du Bartas, i. 58.
 Poem in honor of. Anne Bradstreet, i. 54.
 Systematic Theology, by Charles Hodge, ii. 521.
- Tablets, by A. Bronson Alcott, ii. 843.
 Tact. R. W. Emerson, ii. 184.
 Tafel, Prof. R. L., i. 601.
 TAGGART, CYNTHIA, ii. 162.
 Tai-Ping-Wang, Life of, by J. M. Mackie, ii. 484.
 Talbot, Com. S., Life of, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Talbot, William, translates J. Lederer's Travels, i. 76.
 Tales and Sketches by a Cosmopolite, ii. 65.
 For the Marines, by H. A. Wise, ii. 634.
 Of a Traveller, by Washington Irving, i. 739.
 Of a Wayside Inn, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 282, 284.
 Talisman, the, i. 762, 901; ii. 57.
 Talk with the Sea. L. H. Sigourney, i. 842.
 Talleyrand, M., visit to Ezra Stiles, 1794, i. 171.
 Talleyrand's Descent into Hell, passages from. William Clifton, i. 629.
 Talvi (Mrs. Edward Robinson), i. 881.
 Tammany, St., address, passages from. S. L. Mitchell, i. 539.
 Taney, Memoir of R. B., by Samuel Tyler, ii. 382.
 TANNEHIL, WILKINS, ii. 629.
 TAPPAN, WILLIAM B., ii. 203.
 TAPPAN, HENRY P., Chancellor of the University of Michigan, ii. 755.
 Tarantula, the. Cotton Mather, i. 70.
 Tarring and Feathering, notices of, i. 325.
 Of Samuel Peters hinted at, i. 201.
 Poetical remonstrance against, i. 456.
 Tasso, Conjectures concerning the Love, Madness, and Imprisonment of, by R. H. Wilde, i. 806.
 Sonnets translated from. R. H. Wilde, i. 806.
 Tate and Brady, version of the Psalms, first reprinted in America, i. 23.
 TAYLOR, BAYARD, ii. 713.
 Notice of H. W. Longfellow's Christus, ii. 283.
 Taylor, Isaac, edition of Edwards on the Will, i. 105.
 Taylor, J., i. 111.
 Taylor, Jeremy, Liberty of Propheying, i. 120.
 Taylor, Nathaniel W., i. 96, 99.
 Taylor, Robert, allusion to Virginia, 1612, i. 6.
 Tea, passage from a poem on. William Irving, i. 742.
Bernard Romans, i. 818.
 Revolutionary Ballads on, i. 455.
 Sermon on, by David Ramsay, i. 318.
 Teacher's Lesson, the. S. G. Goodrich, ii. 111.
 Tecumseh, by George H. Colton, ii. 606.
 Life of, by B. Drake, i. 774.
 Teignmouth, Lord, i. 120.
 Temperance, addresses and tracts on, by Edward Hitchcock, i. 866.
 Temperance Tales, by L. M. Sargent, ii. 68.
 Temple, Charlotte, by Susanna Rowson, i. 519.
 Temptation, the. Lyman Abbott, ii. 168.
 Temptation, the, from Hadad. J. A. Hullhouse, i. 819.
 Ten Eyck, Catharine, lines to. Ann Eliza Bleeker, i. 381.
 Ten Great Religions, by J. Freeman Clarke, ii. 454.
 Ten Times One is Ten, by E. E. Hale, ii. 873.
 Ten Years in Washington, by Mary C. Ames, ii. 911.
 Ten Years of Preacher-life, by W. H. Milburn, ii. 810.
 Tennent, Gilbert, notice of, i. 281.
 Tennent, William, account of, i. 280.
 Tennessee's Partner. Bret Harte, ii. 979.
 TENNEY, TABITHA, i. 521.
 Tennyson, Alfred, translation from the Iliad, i. 908.
 Tenor, Mr. Old, a Mournful Lamentation for, by Joseph Green, i. 131.
 Tent Life in the Holy Land, by W. C. Prime, ii. 773.
 Tent on the Beach, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 315.
 TERHUNE, MARY VIRGINIA, ii. 967.
 Terrible Tractoration, by T. G. Fessenden, i. 618.
 Terry, John O., ii. 670.
 Texas, a Journey through, by F. L. Olmsted, ii. 823.
 THACHER, JAMES, i. 392.
 Thacher, Thomas A., tribute to Prof. J. L. Kingsley, i. 91.
 Thackeray. James T. Fields, ii. 680.
 Thalatta, ii. 289, 882.
 Thanatopsis. William C. Bryant, i. 902.
 History of, i. 900.
 Thanksgiving, a sapphic for, passage from. William B. Tappan, ii. 203.
 Thanksgiving Hymn. Sara J. Hale, i. 827.
 THATCHER, B. B., ii. 841.
 THAXTER, CELIA, ii. 998.
 THAYER, M. RUSSELL, ii. 98.
 Thayer, Sylvanus, i. 554.
 Thayer, W. S., ii. 301.
 Notice of R. Hildreth, ii. 298-300.
 J. G. Whittier, ii. 312.
 Theatre in Massachusetts, i. 556.
 Their Wedding Journey, by William D. Howells, ii. 960.
 Thelwell, anecdote of, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 142.
 Theologia Dogmatica, by F. P. Kenrick, ii. 116.
 Theory of Morals and Politics, by Richard Hildreth, ii. 299.
 Thespian Mirror, i. 849.
 They are passing away. R. M. Charlton, ii. 265.
 They Say. J. F. Cooper, i. 810.
 Thief in the Night, by Harriet P. Spofford, ii. 951.
 Thies, Louis, i. 19.
 Thilo, Professor, of Halle, library at Yale, i. 97.
 Thirty Poems, by William C. Bryant, i. 907.
 Thirty Years' View, by Thomas H. Benton, i. 733.
 This also shall pass away. Wm. Crosswell, ii. 218.
 THOMAS, F. W., ii. 420.
 THOMAS, ISAAH, i. 316.
 Account of James Rivington, i. 231.
 Thomas, Nehemiah, i. 765.
 Thomaston, History of, by Cyrus Eaton, i. 805.
 THOMPSON, BENJAMIN, i. 385.
 THOMPSON, DANIEL PIERCE, i. 944.
 THOMPSON, JOHN R., ii. 709.
 THOMSON, CHARLES, i. 180.
 Tutor of William Bartram, i. 284.
 Thompson, Waddy, i. 690.
 THOREAU, HENRY D., ii. 601.
 Memoir and Memorial Verses, by W. E. Channing, ii. 469.
 Notice of, by Ralph Waldo Emerson, ii. 604.
 Thorn Cottage, i. 872.
 Furniture of. Frederick Knight, i. 872.
 THORNTON, JOHN WINGATE, ii. 701.
 Thornton, William, i. 188.
 THORNWELL, JAMES H., president of South Carolina College, ii. 143.
 THORPE, T. B., ii. 536.
 Thoughts at the Grave of a Departed Friend. John Inman, ii. 244.
 For a Young Man, by Horace Mann, i. 962.
 For the City. B. D. Winslow, ii. 534.
 In a Library. Anne C. Lynch, ii. 559.
 On the Poets, by H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 490.
 Thousand Years ago, a. Charles G. Leland, ii. 829.
 Three Books of Song, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 284.
 Experiments of Living, by Hannah F. Lee, ii. 88.
 Hours, or the Vigil of Love, a poem, by Mrs. S. J. Hale, i. 827.
 Little Spades, by Anna B. Warner, ii. 556.
 White Mice. Julia C. R. Dorr, ii. 909.
 Work Days. J. J. Pratt, ii. 957.

- TICKNOR, GEORGE, i. 969.
 Collection of American Poetry, i. 128.
 Copy of Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 12.
 Life of William H. Prescott, i. 983.
 Memorial of Daniel Webster, i. 719.
 Notice of J. S. Buckminster, i. 758.
 Notice of Daniel Webster's Dartmouth College Article, i. 552.
 Notice of William H. Prescott, i. 978.
 Remarks on Edward Everett, i. 974.
 Services to Charles Follen, i. 986.
 H. S. Lagaré, ii. 25.
- TICONDEROGA, conquest of. Ethan Allen, i. 218.
- TIGER-LILIES. T. B. Aldrich, ii. 831.
- TILDEN'S Miscellaneous Poems, passages from, i. 446.
- TILGHMAN, WILLIAM, i. 598.
- TIME. Anna Cora Mowatt, ii. 554.
- TIME-PIECE, by Philip Freneau, i. 345.
- TIMROD, HENRY, i. 845.
- TIMROD, WILLIAM II., i. 845.
- TINKER, NEHEMIAH, ii. 12.
- 'Tis said that Absence conquers Love. F. W. Thomas, ii. 420.
- TITAN, translated by C. T. Brooks, ii. 497.
- TITCOMB'S Letters, by J. G. Holland, ii. 797.
- TITUS, Colonel, speech in House of Commons, i. 191.
- TO * * *. F. G. Halleck, i. 934.
 — with Flowers. Anne C. Lynch, ii. 559.
 An Aged and very Cheerful Christian Lady. F. L. Hawks, ii. 49.
 A Troublesome Fly. Thomas MacKellar, ii. 465.
 Day, ii. 301.
 Fortune. W. W. Story, ii. 621.
 Him who can alone sit for the Picture. J. W. Simmons, ii. 456.
 Italy. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 288.
 Juvenal. Laughton Osborn, ii. 306.
 Mary. Mary E. Hewitt, ii. 555.
 My Big Sweetheart. F. S. Cozzens, ii. 694.
 My Boy. Willis G. Clark, ii. 401.
 My Father. W. Crosswell, ii. 218.
 My Mother at Christmas. M. M. Davidson, ii. 828.
 The Evening Wind. William C. Bryant, i. 904.
 The Daughter of a Friend. J. G. C. Brainard, i. 966.
 The Statue on the Capitol. J. J. Piatt, ii. 958.
 The Unsatisfied. H. W. Liszt, ii. 665.
 Time. Susanna Rowson, i. 520.
- TOILET, a Lady's, poetically described. Mercy Warren, i. 174.
- TOKEN, the, ii. 110.
 The, N. Hawthorne's tales in, ii. 355.
- TOLERATION, views of. Thomas Shepard, i. 49.
- TOMBS, ROBERT, ii. 812.
- TOMPSON, BENJAMIN, i. 71.
- TONSON, JACOB, Latin epitaph on, i. 116.
- TOOKE, HORNE, anecdote of, by Thomas Cooper, ii. 142.
- TOPICS of the Time, by James Parton, ii. 804.
- TORREY, PROFESSOR, Memoir of James Marsh, i. 833.
- TORREY, JOHN, i. 408; ii. 752.
- TORREY, DR. JOSEPH, i. 884.
- TOTTEN, SILAS, Notice of Beverly Tucker, i. 695.
 President of Washington College, Connecticut, ii. 750.
 Professor of Moral and Intellectual Philosophy at William and Mary, i. 90.
- TOUR on the Prairies, by Washington Irving, i. 739.
- TOURO, JUDAH, gift to the Redwood Library, i. 298.
- TOWNSEND, ELIZA, i. 825.
- TRAILING ARBUTUS, the. Sarah H. Whitman, ii. 334.
- TRASK, WILLIAM BLAKE, ii. 451.
- TRAVEL, Cyclopædia of Modern, by Bayard Taylor, ii. 715.
- TRAVELLER, the, from "Curiosity." Charles Sprague, i. 837.
- Traveller's Hymn. William Crosswell, ii. 219.
- Travelling Experiences. Pliny Miles, ii. 641.
- Travels Around the World, by W. H. Seward, ii. 136.
- Tread of Time, the. Thomas Cole, ii. 127.
- Treaty of Washington, the, by Caleb Cushing, ii. 81.
- Trees of New England, poetical description of. William Wood, i. 3.
 In the City. Alice B. Neal, ii. 650.
- Tribune, the. Horace Greeley, ii. 423.
- Tribute, the. Richard Dabney, i. 795.
- Tribute Book, the, by Frank B. Goodrich, ii. 113.
- TRINITY COLLEGE, Hartford, Connecticut, ii. 750.
- Triumphs of Enterprise, Ingenuity, and Public Spirit, by J. Parton, ii. 804.
- Triumphs of Superstition, the. T. M. Harris, i. 582.
- Trojan Watch-Camp. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 911.
- Trollopian, the, by F. M. Shelton, ii. 567.
- TROOST, GERARD, ii. 478.
- Trotty at School. Elizabeth S. Phelps, ii. 993.
- Trout Fly-Fishing. Thaddeus Norris, ii. 857.
- Trowbridge, E., i. 784.
- TROWBRIDGE, JOHN TOWNSEND, ii. 901.
- True Enthusiasm. H. T. Tuckerman, ii. 492.
 Grander of Nations, by Charles Sumner, ii. 411.
- Trumbull, Benjamin, i. 822.
- Trumbull Gallery, at Yale, i. 97.
- Trumbull, Henry, life of Israel Potter, ii. 628.
- TRUMBULL, JOHN, i. 822.
 Collection of papers for History of Connecticut, i. 97.
 Notice of Joel Barlow, i. 409.
 Joseph Gulloway, i. 183.
 David Humphreys, i. 889.
- Trumbull, James Hammond, ii. 868.
- Trumbull, Jonathan, i. 822.
- Trumps, by G. W. Curtis, ii. 698.
- Truth and Life, the, by Chas. P. McIlvaine, ii. 116.
- Truth and Peace, conference between, passages from. Roger Williams, i. 38, 41, 42.
- Tryon, Governor, Expedition against New Haven, i. 98.
- TUCKER, BEVERLY, i. 694.
- Tucker, G., life of T. Jefferson, quoted, i. 250.
- Tucker, Samuel, Life of Commodore, by J. H. Sheppard, ii. 480.
- TUCKER, ST. GEORGE, i. 246.
 Author of a portion of the Belles of Williamsburg, i. 296.
- Tuckerman, Edward, ii. 771.
- TUCKERMAN, H. T., ii. 488.
 Account of H. Greenough, ii. 245.
 Life of John Pendleton Kennedy, i. 958.
 Memorial of, by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 493, 838.
 Notice of Smibert, i. 176.
- Tuckerman, Joseph, ii. 489.
- Tuckerman, Peter, ii. 488.
- TUDOR, WILLIAM, ii. 53.
 His life of James Otis, quoted, i. 105, 129.
- Tully, Dr. William, i. 300.
- TURELL, EBENEZER, i. 135.
 Life of Benjamin Colman, i. 78.
- TURELL, JANE, i. 134.
- Turgot, suggests a work by John Adams, i. 195.
 Latin Epitaph on B. Franklin, i. 120.
- TURNER, SAMUEL H., i. 881.
- TURNER, WILLIAM W., i. 831; ii. 641, 758.
 Notice of Professor Stuart, i. 709.
- Turtle Club, address to, by S. L. Mitchill, i. 536.
- Tuthill, Cornelius, ii. 640.
- TUTHILL, LOUISA C., ii. 640.
- Twice-told Tales, by N. Hawthorne, ii. 355.
- Twilight. Thomas Cole, ii. 127.
 Thoughts, ii. 456.
- Two Angels, the. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 610.
 Cities. Wm. Allen Butler, ii. 732.

- Two Friends, the. C. G. Leland, ii. 829.
 Millions, by Wm. Allen Butler, ii. 728.
 "Sisters of the West," ii. 650.
 Summers. Paul H. Hayne, ii. 737.
 Sundays. Helen F. Hunt, ii. 925.
 Types, the. F. H. Hedge, ii. 252.
 Years before the Mast, by R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 546, 551.
- Tyler, Bennet, i. 552.
 Tyler, Moses Toit, ii. 757.
 TYLER, ROYAL, i. 432.
 TYLER, SAMUEL, ii. 382.
 TYNG, STEPHEN H., ii. 118.
 Typee, by Herman Melville, ii. 637.
 Typographical Mode of Conducting a Quarrel, by Francis Hopkinson, i. 220.
 Tyrian Banquet, the, from Virgil, by C. P. Cranch, ii. 487.
- Uerberweg's History of Philosophy, translated by Geo. S. Morris, ii. 608.
 Uhland. William Allen Butler, ii. 728.
 Ulric, by Theodore S. Fay, ii. 240.
 Uncle Philip's Conversations, by F. L. Hawks, ii. 47.
 Uncle Tom in his Cabin. H. B. Stowe, ii. 523.
 Uncle Tom's Cabin, by H. B. Stowe, ii. 522, 817.
 Under the Palms. G. W. Curtis, ii. 697.
 Under the Willows, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 613.
 Undeveloped Genius. J. C. Neal, ii. 296.
 Undiscovered Country, the. E. C. Stedman, ii. 946.
 Union, appeal for, of the Revolutionary Fathers. F. L. Hawks, ii. 48.
 History of the War for the, by Evert A. Duyckinck, ii. 838.
- UNION COLLEGE, i. 917.
 Magazine, the, ii. 460.
 The, edited by M. M. Noah, i. 768.
 The. Daniel Webster, i. 721.
- Unitarianism, foundation of, in New England, i. 757.
 United States Agricultural Society, ii. 842.
 Catholic Miscellany, i. 778.
 Condensed History of, by W. Swinton, ii. 836.
 Congress, Lanman's Dictionary of, i. 870.
 Defence of, in Paris, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
 History of the, by George Bancroft, ii. 99.
 History of the, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 893.
 History of the, by J. A. Spencer, ii. 566.
 Law Intelligencer and Review, i. 805.
 Literary Gazette, i. 900.
 Magazine, by H. H. Brackenridge, i. 304.
 Manual of History of, by S. Eliot, ii. 679.
 Review and Literary Gazette, i. 900.
 Rise of the Republic of the, by Richard Frothingham, Jr., ii. 34.
 Sanitary Commission, History of, by C. J. Stillé, i. 407.
 Service Magazine, i. 407.
- Unity of Law. Henry C. Carey, i. 869.
 Universalism, Ancient History of, by Hosea Ballou, 2d, i. 621.
 Universities, influence of. G. Berkeley, i. 178.
 University, English, Five Years in a, by C. A. Bristed, ii. 669.
 Unseen Spirits. N. P. Willis, ii. 272.
 Up the Rhine. F. S. Cozens, ii. 695.
 Up the River, by F. W. Shelton, ii. 567.
 Upcott, William, cuttings from American newspapers, i. 452.
 Updike, Wilkins, Rhode Island Bar, quoted, i. 501.
 Upham, Charles W., ii. 448.
 Lectures on Salem Witchcraft, i. 66.
 Upham, Thomas C., i. 917.
 Upper Ten Thousand, by Charles A. Bristed, ii. 669.
 Ups and Downs in the Life of a Gentleman, by William L. Stone, i. 858.
- Ursulines, to the. Caroline Gilman, i. 897.
 Usury Laws, repeal of, advocated by R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 550.
 Utica, "No pent up," &c., couplet, by J. M. Sewall, i. 300.
- Vagabonds, the. J. T. Trowbridge, ii. 903.
 Valedictory, the. Lydia H. Sigourney, i. 843.
 Valentine's Manual, i. 799.
 Valerian, by J. B. Lynn, i. 681.
 Valor. Wm. B. Wright, ii. 986.
 Van der Donck, Adrien, i. 85.
 Vanderbilt Yacht Excursion, by J. O. Choules, ii. 119.
 Vane, Sir Henry, visited by Roger Williams, i. 41.
 Life of, by C. W. Upham, ii. 449.
 VAN RENSSLAER, CORFLANDT, ii. 770.
 Vardell, Rev. Mr., account of Henry Cruger, i. 231.
 VASSAR COLLEGE, ii. 766.
 And its Founder, by B. J. Lossing, ii. 893.
 Vassar, Matthew, ii. 766.
 Vaughan Family, Reminiscences of, by J. H. Sheppard, ii. 480.
 VAUGHAN, WILLIAM, i. 2.
 Vaughan, edition of Franklin, i. 120.
 Velasco, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 Venetian Life, by Wm. D. Howells, ii. 960.
 Venus, transit of, observed by Ezra Stiles, i. 172.
 Transit of, 1761, observed by Professor John Winthrop, i. 146.
 Transit of, poem. Pietas et Gratulatio, i. 12.
- Vermont, S. Peters elected bishop of, i. 203.
 VERMONT, UNIVERSITY OF, i. 831.
 VERPLANCK, GULLAN C., i. 761.
 Notice of John Bowden, i. 399.
 Of William Smith, i. 548.
 Of J. M. Mason, i. 603.
 Of William Cox, ii. 248.
 Quotation from G. Berkeley, i. 179.
 Discourse upon, by Wm. C. Bryant, i. 910.
- Verses, by H. H., ii. 923.
 Verses on the Prospect of Planting Arts and Learning in America. G. Berkeley, i. 179.
 Very Age, the, by E. S. Gould, ii. 808.
- VERY, JONES, ii. 385.
 Veteran, the, and Child. Hannah F. Gould, ii. 342.
 Vethake, Dr. Henry, i. 406, 407.
- VETROMILE, EUGENE ANTHONY, ii. 865.
 Views a-foot, by Bayard Taylor, ii. 714.
 Vigil of Faith, by C. F. Hoffman, ii. 820.
 Village Church, the. T. B. Reed, ii. 689.
 Vindiciæ Hibernicæ, by Mathew Carey, i. 668.
- VINTON, JOHN ADAMS, ii. 449.
 Vinton Memorial, the, by J. A. Vinton, ii. 450.
 Violet, a. A. D. T. Whitney, ii. 890.
 Virgil, translated by Caleb Alexander, i. 320.
 Virginia, account of, by Thomas Harriot, i. 7.
 Allusion to, by Robert Taylor, 1612, i. 6.
 Banishing Tea, i. 455.
 Comedians, the, by John Esten Cooke, ii. 573.
 Prologue and Epilogue to the. John Esten Cooke, ii. 573, 574.
 Good News from, by Alexander Whitaker, i. 7.
 Historie of Travaille into, by William Strachey, i. 7.
 History of, and other publications relating to, by Capt. John Smith, i. 5.
 Marches from, to the West of Carolina, passages from. John Lederer, i. 76.
 Old Churches and Old Families of, by Bishop Meade, i. 672.
 Personal adventures in a survey of the boundary line with North Carolina, by William Byrd, i. 80.
- UNIVERSITY OF, ii. 742.
 Vision of Columbus, by Joel Barlow, i. 408.

- Vision of Sir Launfal, the, by J. R. Lowell, ii. 610.
Of Two Sisters in a Ball-room, poem. William Irving, i. 741.
- Visit from St. Nicholas. Clement C. Moore, i. 690.
- Voice of the Seasons. Catherine A. Ware, ii. 82.
Of Years, the. Louisa S. M' Cord, ii. 29.
- Voices of Freedom, by J. G. Whittier, ii. 313.
Of the Dead. E. H. Chapin, ii. 515.
Of the Night, by H. W. Longfellow, ii. 275.
- Voltaire, meeting of, and Franklin at the French Academy, account of, by John Adams, i. 197.
- Voorhees, Abram, i. 603.
- Voyages, bibliography of early, to America, ii. 840.
- Voyages from Holland, 1632-44, translated by H. C. Murphy, ii. 833.
- Waddel, James, i. 643.
- Waddel, Moses, i. 771.
- Waddell, James, the Blind Preacher, i. 640, 646.
- Wadsworth, Benjamin, president of Harvard, i. 11.
- Wages, Essay on the Rate of, by Henry C. Carey, i. 867.
- Wagoner of the Alleghanies, by T. B. Read, ii. 690.
- WAINWRIGHT, JONATHAN MAYHEW, i. 844.
And Rufus Choate, ii. 78.
- Waiting by the Gate. Wm. C. Bryant, i. 913.
- Walden, by H. D. Thoreau, ii. 601.
- WALKER, JAMES, i. 14, 16.
- Walker, Dr. William J., i. 208.
- Walker's Expedition to Nicaragua, by W. V. Wells, ii. 813.
- Wall, Garret D., eulogium by L. Q. C. Elmer, ii. 839.
- WALLACE, HORACE BINNEY, ii. 577.
- WALLACE, WILLIAM ROSS, ii. 608.
- Waller, Edward, Eulogy on, by Jane Turell, i. 135.
- Walling, James C., i. 772.
- WALN, ROBERT, ii. 37.
- Walpole, Horace, notice of Smibert, i. 176.
- WALSII, ROBERT, i. 725.
Correspondence with R. G. Harper on Napoleon Bonaparte and Russia, i. 605.
- WALTER, WILLIAM B., ii. 70.
- Walton, Iz., Angler, edited by G. W. Bethune, ii. 231.
- Wanderer, the, by W. E. Channing, ii. 469.
- Wandering Recollections of a somewhat Busy Life, by John Neal, i. 875.
- Wants of Man. J. Q. Adams, i. 579.
- War. Charles Sumner, ii. 412.
And Washington. J. M. Sewall, i. 800.
For the Union, Pictorial History of, by Ann S. Stephens, ii. 395.
Lyrics, by H. H. Brownell, ii. 894.
Poetry of the South, by W. G. Simms, i. 846; ii. 260.
Powers of the President, by Wm. Whiting, ii. 775
Song of the Revolution. John Neal, i. 875.
With the South, by Robert Tomes, ii. 824.
- Ward, Andrew H., Memoir by Wm. B. Trask, ii. 452.
- Ward, George Atkinson, Journal of S. Curwen, i. 147.
- Ward, Julius H., Life and Letters of J. G. Percival, i. 943.
- WARD, NATHANIEL, i. 28.
Anagram of John Wilson, i. 9.
Dr. S. Peters's humorous story of, i. 204.
Memoir of, by J. W. Dean, ii. 553.
- Ward, Samuel, of Ipswich, i. 23.
- WARD, THOMAS, ii. 294.
- WARE, HENRY, i. 889.
- WARE, HENRY, JR., i. 890.
- WARE, JOHN, i. 890.
- WARE, CATHERINE AUGUSTA, ii. 32.
- Ware, Mary L., i. 891.
- WARE, WILLIAM, i. 891.
- WARFIELD, CATHERINE, ii. 650.
- WARING, GEORGE E., JR., ii. 934.
- WARNER, ANNA B., ii. 555.
- WARNER, CHARLES DUDLEY, ii. 913.
- Warner, H. W., i. 627.
- WARNER, SUSAN, ii. 555.
- Warren, Dr. John C., ii. 849.
- Warren, James, i. 173.
- Warren, Joseph, ballad of Free America, i. 460.
Death of, by Epes Sargent, ii. 571.
By Mrs. Adams, i. 198.
Life and Times of, by Richard Frothingham, Jr., ii. 84.
Oration on the Boston Massacre, i. 459.
- Warren, Me., Annals of, by Cyrus Eaton, i. 865.
- WARREN, MERCY, i. 173.
- WARREN, NATHAN B., ii. 901.
- WASHBURN, EMOY, ii. 444.
- WASHINGTON, GEORGE, i. 189.
And Napoleon. J. T. Headley, ii. 520.
Anecdote of, by Albert Gallatin, i. 510.
Ballad on, 1779, i. 474.
Character of. Aaron Bancroft, i. 424.
Thomas Jefferson, i. 255.
Henry Lee, i. 431.
John Marshall, i. 422.
J. K. Paulding, ii. 8.
Theodore Parker, ii. 442.
M. L. Weems, i. 502.
- Collection of pamphlets belonging to, ii. 55.
Diary of, edited by B. J. Lossing, ii. 893.
Early anecdotes of. M. L. Weems, i. 505.
Epigram on, by Thomas Paine, i. 210.
Eulogist of Franklin, i. 120.
Eulogy of. George H. Calvert, ii. 193.
William Linn, i. 841.
By R. T. Paine, Jr., i. 600.
By Ezra Stiles, i. 170.
- Genius of. E. P. Whipple, ii. 626.
- Headquarters of, at Newburgh, Sonnets on. Henry Pickering, i. 713.
- In "The Spy," i. 808.
- Last Days of. Washington Irving, i. 750.
- Letter to, by Thomas Paine, i. 209.
- Letter to Phillis Wheatley, i. 383.
- Life of, by Washington Irving, i. 740, 749.
By Edward Everett, i. 887.
By B. J. Lossing, ii. 893.
By John Marshall, i. 422.
By Neal and Watkins, i. 670.
By Jared Sparks, i. 878.
By C. W. Upham, ii. 449.
- Lines to a truly great man. Philip Freneau, i. 344.
- Maxims of, by J. F. Schroeder, i. 735.
- Memoirs of, by Caroline M. Kirkland, ii. 463.
Nominated Commander-in-chief by John Adams, i. 195.
- Passage from funeral oration on. John M. Mason, i. 604.
- Poem to the memory of, by R. Alsop, i. 513.
- Poetical address to. Phillis Wheatley, i. 383.
- Poetical description of. Wheeler Case, i. 471.
- Prediction of S. Davies in relation to, i. 281.
- Present at the performance of Darby's Return, i. 560.
- Recollections and Private Memoirs of, by Geo. Washington Parke Custis, ii. 393.
- Reply to a dedication, i. 660.
- Return from Virginia, paraphrase of Horace. John Parke, i. 321.
- Sonnet. R. G. White, ii. 869-70.
- Words of, edited by James Parton, ii. 804.
- Writings of, edited by Jared Sparks, i. 878.
- Washingtoniana, edited by F. B. Hough, ii. 885.
- Washington's Vita*, by F. Glass, i. 704.
- Watching. Emily C. Judson, ii. 558.
- Waterfowl, to a. William C. Bryant, i. 902.
- Waterhouse, Benjamin, i. 545.

- Water-Lilies. T. W. Higginson, ii. 883.
 Water Witch, the, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
 Waterston, Memoir of, by Chas. Deane, ii. 546.
 Watertown, Genealogies of Settlers of, i. 673.
 Watertown, poem descriptive of, i. 77.
 WATSON, ELKANAH, i. 549.
 WATSON, JOHN FANNING, i. 636.
 WATSON, WINSLOW C., i. 549.
 Watt, J., visit to Paris with Thomas Cooper, ii. 141.
 Watt, James, anecdote of, ii. 628.
 Watts, Isaac, correspondence with the Mathers, i. 67.
 Hymns and Psalms, introduction in America, i. 23.
 Life of, by Jeremy Belknap, i. 265.
 Presents a pair of globes to Yale, i. 97.
 Psalms corrected by Joel Barlow, i. 409.
 Revised by Timothy Dwight, i. 372.
 Reprint of Jonathan Edwards's Narrative of Conversions, i. 103.
 Verses of, recited by Benjamin Franklin on his death-bed, i. 120.
 WATTS, STEPHEN, i. 139.
 Way to Wealth, by B. Franklin, i. 118.
 WAYLAND, FRANCIS, i. 542, 547.
 Weariness. H. W. Longfellow, ii. 284.
 Weathercock on our Steeple, to the. Albert G. Greene, ii. 146.
 WEBB, GEORGE, i. 111.
 WEBBER, C. W., ii. 629.
 Webber, Samuel, president of Harvard, i. 14.
 WEBSTER, DANIEL, i. 717.
 Address on J. F. Cooper, i. 811.
 Dartmouth College case, i. 552.
 Largeness of. James Parton, ii. 805.
 Notice of Alexander Hamilton, i. 439.
 On Jefferson's authorship of the Declaration of Independence, i. 250.
 Statesmanship of. Rufus Choate, ii. 73.
 Tribute to J. C. Calhoun, i. 723.
 Webster, Ebenezer, i. 717.
 Webster, Ezekiel, i. 554, 718.
 Webster, Fletcher, i. 554, 720.
 WEBSTER, NOAH, i. 491.
 Founder of Amherst Academy, i. 868.
 WEBSTER, PRATIAH, i. 286.
 Weccamical Chaplet, i. 272.
 Wedderburn, attack on B. Franklin, i. 116.
 Epigram on, i. 116.
 Wedding Ring, On a very Old. G. W. Doane, ii. 78.
 Wedgwood, Hensleigh, "Dictionary of English Etymology," ii. 121.
 Week, a, on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, by H. D. Thoreau, ii. 601.
 Weekly Inspector, the, i. 618.
 Magazine, i. 610.
 WEEKS, ROBERT KELLY, ii. 987.
 WEEMS, MASON L., i. 501.
 Weir, John F., i. 102.
 Weird Sisters, the. H. N. Hudson, ii. 511.
 Weiss, John, Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker, ii. 442.
 WELBY, AMELIA B., ii. 642.
 Welch, Prof. Ransom B., ii. 921-2.
 Weld, Thomas, i. 21.
 Wellesley, Marquis of, John Lathrop's interview with, i. 638.
 Wells, Anna Maria, ii. 456.
 Wells, Prof. William, i. 921-2.
 WELLS, WILLIAM CHARLES, i. 481.
 WELLS, WILLIAM V., ii. 812.
 Wendell, Oliver, i. 530.
 Wentworth, Sir Charles, History of, a novel, by Edward Bancroft, i. 238.
 Wept of Wish-ton-Wish, by J. F. Cooper, i. 809.
 Wesley, John, Abridgment of Jonathan Edwards's life of David Brainerd, i. 152.
 Described by Samuel Curwen, i. 147.
 West, Benjamin, i. 179.
 West, Samuel, i. 258.
 West, Stephen, i. 258.
 West, the, and other Poems, by F. Lieber, ii. 95.
 Publications on the, by James Hall, i. 854.
 Westcott, William H., i. 299.
 Western Insurrection, by H. M. Brackenridge, i. 700.
 Monthly Magazine, i. 718, 854.
 Politician, a, of the First Growth. J. L. McConnell, ii. 733.
 Souvenir, i. 854.
 Windows, by J. J. Piatt, ii. 955.
 Westover Manuscripts, the, by William Byrd, i. 79.
 Westward Ho, by James K. Paulding, ii. 4.
 Wetherell, Dr. Charles M., ii. 407.
 WETMORE, PROSPER M., ii. 64.
 Whale, fury of the, ii. 637.
 Whaling Cruise, Etchings of a, by J. Ross Browne, ii. 597.
 Song. John Osborn, i. 142.
 Whalley, Edward, i. 956.
 Wharton, Charles, i. 396.
 Wharton, Francis, State Trials of the United States, i. 501.
 What Cheer, by Job Durfee, i. 827.
 What I Know of Farming, by Horace Greeley, ii. 422.
 What is Happiness? J. B. Ladd, i. 534.
 What is the Use? Erastus W. Ellsworth, ii. 707.
 What saith the Fountain? William W. Caldwell, ii. 708.
 What She Could, by Susan Warner, ii. 556.
 What the Winds Bring. E. C. Steedman, ii. 946.
 What to Wear, by Elizabeth S. Phelps, ii. 993.
 WHEATLEY, PHILLIS, i. 381.
 Letters of, by Chas. Deane, ii. 545.
 WHEATON, HENRY, i. 728.
 His History of the Law of Nations suggested by Charles Sumner, ii. 411.
 Edited by R. H. Dana, Jr., ii. 551.
 Life of William Pinkney, i. 691.
 Wheaton, N. S., president of Washington College, Connecticut, ii. 750.
 Wheaton, Robert, i. 729.
 Wheeler, John, president of University of Vermont, i. 832.
 Historical Discourse on the University of Vermont, i. 834.
 WHEELLOCK, ELEAZER, i. 550.
 At Yale, i. 92.
 Wheelock, John, i. 551.
 Wheelwright, John, sermon of, ii. 546.
 WHEILDON, WILLIAM WILDER, ii. 849.
 Where shall the Baby's Dimple be? J. G. Holland, ii. 799.
 Whig Review, the, ii. 606, 630.
 Whip, Hoe, and Sword, by G. H. Hepworth, ii. 815.
 WHIPPLE, EDWIN P., ii. 625.
 Notice of N. P. Willis, ii. 274.
 Whippoorwill, the. G. P. Morris, ii. 158.
 Whistle, the. B. Franklin, i. 121.
 WHITAKER, ALEXANDER, i. 7.
 White, D. A., eulogy of Bowditch, i. 654.
 White, Dr. Andrew, ii. 757.
 White Hills, the, by Sylvester Judd, ii. 500.
 By Thomas Starr King, ii. 771.
 Jacket, by Herman Melville, ii. 637.
 Mountains, Description of, by Levi Woodbury, i. 829.
 Slave, the, by Richard Hildreth, ii. 299.
 Stone Canoe, the. H. R. Schoolcraft, i. 861.
 WHITE, RICHARD GRANT, ii. 869.
 White, T. W., ii. 403.
 WHITE, WILLIAM, i. 313.
 Life of, by J. N. Norton, ii. 794.
 Whitefield, George, i. 93.

- Account of the Log College, i. 281.
 Last Days of. Abel Stevens, ii. 778.
- WHITEHEAD, WILLIAM A., ii. 855.
- Whitewashing, a letter on. Francis Hopkinson, i. 221.
- Whiting, Samuel, Elegy on, by Benjamin Tompson, i. 72.
 Memoir of, by William Whiting, ii. 775.
- WHITING, WILLIAM, ii. 775.
- WHITMAN, SARAH H., ii. 331.
- WHITMORE, WILLIAM HENRY, ii. 820.
- WHITNEY, ADRIANE D. T., ii. 889.
- Whitney, Eli, i. 97.
 Exhibits his Cotton Gin, 1794, i. 171.
- Whitney, Prof. Josiah Dwight, i. 20.
- WHITNEY, WILLIAM D., i. 99, 101; ii. 907.
- WHITTIER, JOHN G., ii. 812.
 Tribute to Thomas Starr King, ii. 771.
 Tribute to Samuel Hopkins, i. 160.
- Why Delay the Violets? Thomas MacKellar, ii. 465.
- Why I Left the Anvil. Elihu Burritt, ii. 431.
- Wibird, Parson, remark of John Adams on, i. 196.
- Wide World, the, is Dear. L. M. Davidson, ii. 825.
- Widow of Malabar, by David Humphreys, i. 389.
- Wieland, passage from. C. B. Brown, i. 613.
- Wife, a, poetically described. William Livingston, i. 164.
- WIGGLESWORTH, MICHAEL, i. 62.
 Memoir of, by J. W. Dean, ii. 553.
- Wilcocks, John, i. 322.
- WILCOX, CARLOS, i. 897.
- Wild Flowers, by A. Rouquette, ii. 885.
- Wilde, John P., i. 806.
- Wilde, Mrs., i. 805.
- Wilde, Richard, i. 805.
- WILDE, RICHARD HENRY, i. 805.
- Wilde, William C., i. 806.
- WILDER, MARSHALL P., ii. 841.
- Wilkie, David, travels in Spain with Washington Irving, i. 739.
- Wilkinson, Gen. James, bon-mot on, by John Witherspoon, i. 289.
- Will, Enquiry into the Freedom of the, by Jonathan Edwards, i. 104.
- WILLARD, EMMA, ii. 825.
- Willard, Joseph, presidency of Harvard, i. 14.
- Willard, Samuel, presidency of Harvard, i. 10.
- Willard, Solomon, memoir of, by W. W. Wheildon,
 ii. 849.
- WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE, i. 87.
- WILLIAMS COLLEGE, i. 802.
- Williams, Elisha, i. 92.
- Williams, Ephraim, i. 862.
- WILLIAMS, JOHN, i. 75.
 President of Trinity College, Connecticut, ii. 750.
- WILLIAMS, ROGER, i. 37.
 Spurious portrait of, i. 41.
- Williams, Samuel, i. 832.
- Williams, Stephen W., edits the Redeemed Captive,
 i. 75.
- Williams, W. F., i. 97.
- WILLIAMS, W. R., ii. 266.
- WILLIAMSON, HUGH, i. 199.
- Willis, George, ii. 268.
- Willis, Nathaniel, ii. 208.
- Willis, Nathaniel, Jr., ii. 269.
- WILLIS, N. P., ii. 268.
 Tribute to James A. Hillhouse, i. 818.
- Willis, Sara Payson, ii. 808.
- WILLIS, WILLIAM, ii. 839.
- Wilmer, W. H., president of William and Mary, i. 89.
- WILSON, ALEXANDER, i. 565.
- Wilson, Bird. Memoir of Bishop White, i. 315.
- WILSON, HENRY, ii. 791.
 Life and Services, by Russell and Nason, ii. 514.
- Wilson, John, Anagram of Crescentius Matherus, i. 64
- Lines on. Jonathan Mitchell, i. 51.
 Talent at Anagrams, i. 9.
- Wilson, Peter, i. 399.
- Winchell, A., ii. 757.
- Wind-Flower, the. Jones Very, ii. 886.
- Windham Frog Story, i. 517.
- Windham, Frogs of. Samuel Peters, i. 202.
- Window-panes at Brandon, the. John R. Thompson,
 ii. 709.
- Wine on the Lees. Margaret J. Preston, ii. 912.
- Winged Worshippers, the. Charles Sprague, i. 837.
- WINSLOW, BENJAMIN D., ii. 534.
- WINSLOW, JOSIAH, i. 50.
- Winter Fireside, the. Samuel Low, i. 554.
 In the West, a, by C. F. Hoffman, ii. 320.
- Opportunities of, for instruction. F. W. P. Greenwood, ii. 71.
- Scene. John G. Whittier, ii. 318.
- Sunrise. R. K. Weeks, ii. 988.
- The cold. 1740-1. James M' Sparran, i. 154.
Washington Allston, ii. 21.
William M. Johnson, i. 608.
- WINTER, WILLIAM, ii. 965.
 Memoir of George Arnold, ii. 947.
- Winthrop, Adam, Verses to the Lady Mildmay, i. 30.
- Winthrop, F. B., i. 404.
- Winthrop, Hon J., epistle to. Mercy Warren, i. 174.
- Winthrop, James, i. 146.
- WINTHROP, JOHN, i. 30.
- Winthrop, John, Governor of Connecticut, i. 32.
 Life and Letters of, by R. C. Winthrop, ii. 349.
- Mission of, to the Court of Charles II., by Roger Wolcot, i. 84.
- WINTHROP, PROF. JOHN, i. 145.
- WINTHROP, ROBERT C., ii. 346.
 Compliment to B. Franklin as Postmaster, i. 120.
 Eulogy on Josiah Quincy, i. 636.
 Eulogy on Prof. C. C. Felton, i. 16.
 Passage on J. Bowdoin and B. Franklin, i. 167.
 Toast in allusion to the seal of Harvard, i. 9.
- WINTHROP, THEODORE, ii. 824.
- Wirt, Agnes, i. 646.
- WIRT, WILLIAM, i. 644.
 Compliment to by Josiah Quincy, i. 635.
 Life of, by J. P. Kennedy, i. 949.
- WISE, HENRY A., ii. 633.
 Remark on H. Melville's Typee, ii. 637.
- WISTAR, CASPAR, i. 598.
- Witchcraft, by Cornelius Mathews, ii. 591.
 Annals of, by S. G. Drake, i. 697.
 Memorable Providences relating to, by Cotton
 Mather, i. 65.
 Salem, by C. W. Upham, ii. 449.
 Tragedy, the. John Gorham Palfrey, i. 958.
- Wither, George, poem on the Juvenilia of. J. E. Harwood, i. 576.
- WITHERSPOON, JOHN, i. 287.
 President of College of New Jersey, i. 288, 752.
- Within St. Peter's. Nathaniel Hawthorne, ii. 364.
- WITHINGTON, LEONARD, ii. 45.
- Without and Within. C. F. Briggs, ii. 485.
- Woes of Modern Greece. H. T. Farmer, i. 712.
- WOLCOT, ROGER, i. 84.
- Wolcot, John, (Peter Pindar) Dinner with. William Austin, i. 687.
- Wolcott, Oliver, donation to Yale, i. 97.
- Wolfe, General, anecdotes of, i. 448.
 George Cockings' poem on, i. 450.
 Lines on the Death of, i. 449.
- Ode on the Death of, by Thomas Paine, i. 207.
- Ode on the Death of. Thomas Paine, i. 211.
- Pastoral to the Memory of, by Thomas Godfrey,
 i. 206.
- Wolfe of the Knoll, by Caroline Crane Marsh, ii. 124.
- Wolfert's Roost, by Washington Irving, i. 740.

- Wollaston, Mount, settlement at, i. 83.
 Wollaston, William, Religion of Nature, i. 117.
 Woman and Her Era, by Eliza W. Farnham, ii. 769.
 Eulogy on. John Ledyard, i. 340.
 Virtuous, the. James Bowdoin, i. 168.
 Who Dared, the, by Epes Sargent, ii. 570.
 Woman's Conclusions, a. Phæbe Cary, ii. 660.
 Poems, a. Sarah M. B. Piatt, ii. 958.
 Profession as Mother and Educator, by Catherine E. Beecher, ii. 526.
 Record, by Mrs S. J. Hale, i. 826.
 Women Artists, by E. F. Ellet, ii. 531.
 Friendships of, by W. R. Alger, ii. 796.
 Of Methodism, by Abel Stevens, ii. 778.
 Of the Revolution, by E. F. Ellet, ii. 531.
 Women's Suffrage, or Reform Against Nature, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
 Wonder Working Providence of Zion's Saviour in New England, by Edward Johnson, i. 44.
 Wonder-Book for Boys and Girls, by N. Hawthorne,
 ii. 357.
 Wonders of the Invisible World, by Cotton Mather,
 i. 66.
 Passage from. Cotton Mather, i. 69.
 Wood and Coal. H. H. Brownell, ii. 896.
 Wood, DR. GEORGE B., i. 601.
 Wood, GEORGE, ii. 88.
 Wood, WILLIAM, i. 8.
 Woodbridge, Benjamin, Epitaph on John Cotton, i. 27.
 First graduate from Harvard, i. 27.
 Woodbridge, William, life of, by Charles Lanman,
 i. 870.
 WOODBURY, LEVI, i. 828.
 Woodhouse, James, i. 601.
 Woodhull, S. S., i. 602.
 Woodman, Spare that Tree. G. P. Morris, ii. 158.
 Woods, LEONARD, i. 668.
 Controversy with Henry Ware, i. 890.
 Woods, Leonard, Jr., president of Bowdoin, i. 916;
 ii. 546, 840.
 Woods, Samuel, i. 668.
 WOODWARD, ASHBEEL, ii. 452.
 WOODWORTH, SAMUEL, i. 764.
 Woolly, Bishop, remark on, by Charles II., i. 67.
 WOOLMAN, JOHN, i. 156.
 Elizabeth M. Chandler, ii. 305.
 John G. Whittier, ii. 316.
 WOOLSEY, THEODORE D., i. 94, 98, 100; ii. 98.
 WORCESTER, NOAH, i. 496.
 Word Series, the, by Susan Warner, ii. 556.
 Words and their Uses, by R. G. White, ii. 870.
 Wordsworth. James T. Fields, ii. 680.
 Wordsworth, Wm., influence of, on W. C. Bryant, i.
 901.
 Work and Play, by Horace Bushnell, ii. 222.
 Work, by Louisa M. Alcott, ii. 937.
 Work while it is Day. R. T. Conrad, ii. 419.
 Working by the Hour. C. D. Warner, ii. 915.
 World-famous Women, by Frank B. Goodrich, ii. 113.
 World-Priest, the, by C. T. Brooks, ii. 498.
 World Sale, the. Ralph Hoyt, ii. 398.
 World, the, a Workshop, by Thos. Ewbank, ii. 394.
 WORTHINGTON, JANE T., ii. 643.
 Wrangell's Land, ii. 849.
 Wreck of the Two Pollies. Nathaniel Deering, ii. 145.
 Wright, Elizur, i. 97.
 WRIGHT, WILLIAM B., ii. 985.
 Wythe, George, character of, by T. Jefferson, i. 249.
 YALE COLLEGE, i. 91.
 Literary Magazine, i. 97, 101.
 Yale, Elihu, i. 91.
 Yale Lectures on Preaching, by H. W. Beecher, ii.
 783.
 Yarnoyden, by R. C. Sands and J. W. Eastburn, ii. 56.
 Yankee Doodle, account of, i. 480.
 Yankee in Canada, by H. D. Thoreau, ii. 604.
 Yankee Letters, by R. G. White, ii. 870.
 Yankee Philosopher, the. C. D. Warner, ii. 918.
 Yankee, the, by John Neal, i. 875.
 Yates, William, president of William and Mary, i. 89.
 Year in Spain, by A. S. Mackenzie, ii. 178.
 Yellow Fever, history of, 1753, i. 141.
 Yesterdays with Authors, by Jas. T. Fields, ii. 680.
 Yosemite Valley, the. Sara J. Lippincott, ii. 657.
 Youcatan, Rambles in, by B. N. Norman, ii. 343.
 "You'd scarce expect." David Everett, i. 589.
 YOUNG, EDWARD L., ii. 867.
 YOUNG, ELIZA A., ii. 868.
 YOUNG, WILLIAM JAY, ii. 868.
 YOUNG, ALEXANDER, ii. 118.
 Eulogy of Bowditch, i. 654.
 Young America. Fitz Greene Halleck, i. 987.
 Young America Abroad, by W. T. Adams, ii. 878.
 Young American, the. A. H. Everett, ii. 129.
 Young, Edward, lines from Zanga, i. 116.
 Night Thoughts, in Latin, by Stephen Sewell,
 i. 12.
 Young, John, i. 248.
 Young Men in History. E. P. Whipple, ii. 628.
 Young, Prof. Ira, i. 553.
 Young Rosalie Lee. P. P. Cooke, ii. 572.
 Youth and Age. Richard Dabney, i. 795.
 Of Jefferson, the, by John Esten Cooke, ii. 578.
 Youth's Companion, the first child's newspaper, ii. 269
 Yusef, by J. Ross Browne, ii. 597.
 Zara, prologue to. General Burgoyne, i. 468.
 Zaragoza. A. S. Mackenzie, ii. 179.
 Zell's Popular Encyclopedia, ii. 866.
 Zenobia, by William Ware, i. 891.
 Fausta and Piso. William Ware, i. 893.
 Zeuma, by James Ralph, i. 113.
 Zinzendorff, by L. H. Sigourney, i. 889.
 Zoology, Museum of Comparative, at Harvard, i. 19.
 Zophiel, by Maria Brooks, i. 928.

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

126 322

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY